Like One Sundered Star
by oriflamme

Summary

Who are these shining like one sundered star?
[Like kindled lights in untempestuous heaven,
Fair flower-like stars on the iron foam of fight]

Teenage superheroes deal with hormones, mental illness, and extremely secretive guardians in a world of Horrorterrors, giant mutant lusii, mob violence, nightmares of a past life, warring anti-heroes, and asshole carapacians. Sburb AU divergence from Real Men Wear Tights.

- Inspired by Real Men Wear Tights by Bananaramses, SergeantMeow Awake and Aware

Chapter Summary

Free, without pity, withheld from woe,
Ignorant; fair as the eyes are fair.
Would I have you change now, change at a blow,
Startled and stricken, awake and aware?

ARC I - INTRODUCTION

Karkat Vantas wakes up in the middle of the night to the dulcet skrees of the enormous albino crab looming over the side of his recooperacoon, clacking its meaty claws over its head. "Oh my fucking fuck," he groans, resisting, with great effort, the urge to attempt to drown himself in sopor. Not only is it physiologically impossible for a troll to drown in sopor, the attempt probably wouldn't even faze Crabdad. "What do you want?" Maybe he'll get lucky and Crabdad will shut up if Karkat tosses him a slice of grubloaf. Just, please, don't start screeching about -

With a petulant skree, Crabdad flings an empty black plastic tray to the ground, the demand clear as it skitters from side to side on skinny legs.

You've got to be fucking kidding.

Stupid. Fatass. Lusus.

Karkat is aware that lusii become redundant as a troll ages and becomes self-sufficient. Eventually, it reaches the point that the troll takes care of lusus rather than the other way around. From that point on, it's only a matter of waiting until it's time for them to be assigned to a new grub, or eventually released for retirement.

Karkat just hasn't quite been able to accept how fucking annoying it is when your lusus gets it into its head that you're in charge of feeding it when it gets weird cravings at one in the morning. This always, always, without fail, happens on the rare occasions when Karkat wants to sleep through the night. It's like he's fucking cursed to never get a good night's sleep. He's so used to operating on three hours of sleep by now that it's almost pathetic.

Another screech pierces the air, and Karkat grabs the nearest comic from the desk by the 'coon and flings it at Crabdad. "Shut up! You're gonna get us fucking evicted, you incompetent festering nookstain!" he hisses, hoisting himself out of the sopor and yanking off his sopor-drenched black shirt. He throws on the same hoodie he's worn all week and the first pair of pants that aren't similarly covered in sopor. Appeased by Karkat's movement, Crabdad clicks his claws but shuts the fuck up, thank god. The last thing they need right now is to get kicked out over Crabdad's constant fucking noise the goddamn week before school starts.
Toeing on a raggedy pair of Flashstep sneakers, Karkat grabs his wallet off the desk and removes a twenty - no fucking way is he wandering around this part of town at night with his wallet on him. "Keep quiet, and I swear to god I will bring you back iced roe," he promises.

Crabdad gives a slightly quieter skree in reply, and, wearily, Karkat skrees back, feeling like a fucking wiggler. Content, Crabdad huddles down on the floor in the kitchen block and doesn't even look up as Karkat walks out. He does not slam the door, but only because knowing their piece of shit hivelord she would probably choose tonight of all nights to get pissed about it. Hunching his shoulders, Karkat shoves his glasses up his nose and stomps down the stairs.

The closest store that stocks lusii rations is the shitty 24-hour convenience store five blocks away, on a slightly less shitty street that hosts a McDonalds, a bank, and a cheapass pharmacy. The street is relatively quiet for once, one of the street lights buzzing in flickering death throes even as Karkat shuffles underneath it. A bum is scrawling through a dumpster by the side of the shitty McDonalds, eyeing Karkat sideways with dull human eyes. Karkat turns the corner before the man can decide whether he's an easy mark or not. Crossing the street, he ducks into the convenience store, squinting his eyes against the harsh fluorescent lighting. The troll girl behind the counter snaps her bubblegum as she drums her claws on the counter, her luminescent eyes a dirty green as they flash under the lightning.

Automatically, Karkat goes tense, pinning his stare on the ground and nervously readjusting his glasses as he stalks to the back freezer. His own eyes ache and itch, as though just the thought of another troll's eyes was enough to trigger a reaction. He fights the urge to prod at them, to scurry to the bathroom and check to make sure they're still rusty red, and forces himself to open the freezer without accidentally ripping it off its hinges. Stacking three trays of iced roe in the crook of one arm, Karkat shoulders the door closed and shuffles back to the front, dumping the trays in front of the olive-blood.

Thankfully, the troll girl has just as few fucks to give as Karkat at the moment, tapping in the item codes with a stabbing claw and nearly tearing the currency when she takes it from his palm. When the roe and the change have both been stuffed in a tattered grocery bag, Karkat thanks her "very fucking much" and barges right out, relaxing only when he's out of the range of the fluorescent glow. Shoving his hands in his hoodie pouch, he slumps over and keeps to the lit part of the sidewalk as he starts back toward the corner.

Which is, of course, when the police cars veer around the corner, sirens going full fucking blast.

Karkat stares, jaw dropped and one eye twitching, just as the doors of the bank behind him burst open with a huge crash and a flurry of shouts. Before him, the police cars shudder to a stop in a rough circle, trolls and humans popping out with various strife specibi in hand and claw.

The next second, a gunshot cracks the air and Karkat realizes those fucking fucks behind him are shooting at the cops

And he's standing in the middle of it.

Instinct kicks in, and Karkat flings himself to the ground just as yet another gun goes off overhead. His ears ringing, he crawls around the side of a car parked by the curb, rolling so that he has the very solid vehicle between him and the crazy shooting bank robbers.

"Hold fire! Civilian!" one of the human policemen shouts, and the few police wielding firearms jerk to a halt. A troll with a pistolkind fires off once before someone yanks him back behind the armored car doors. The shot doesn't come anywhere near Karkat, but he still flinches, frozen in place. The robbers on the other side of the car are still firing, the repeated blasts of sound hammering into his auricular sponge clots. Every few seconds another bullet pockmarks the front of the police car doors, which means that if Karkat tries to run he's most likely fucked in every conceivable way.

Oh my god, he thinks. This is it. This is how the universe decides to flip one last middle claw at Karkat Vantas: by having him accidentally get shot by a bunch of Taintchaffing Spaz Maggots Without A Single Fucking Thinkpan Between Them, revealing the secret swilling through his veins like a cosmic 'fuck you.' Hell, if they see what he is on the inside, the cops might just finish him off themselves. The troll cops, anyway. He had thought he'd at least make it through high school before a highblood decided to punch a hole in his chest cavity, but apparently even asking for that was too much.

The only warning Karkat gets is a sudden roar coming at him from the right; then someone is kneeling beside him, a pair of arms shooting out around his back and under his crumpled up knees. "Hold on!"

Karkat doesn't even have time to ask "What the actual fuck?" before there's a blast of air and the wind tunnel makes his eyes water as they rocket up into the sky. He somehow swallows down a reflexive scream, but his arms latch around the other person's neck desperately, tight enough to choke out a grown troll. The bag full of iced roe cubes is squashed between his side and the person's chest, and he wants to cry hysterically over the fact that he almost died over lusus food. That was a thing that actually happened.

It's not until the wind dies down a little and the little veil of rust clears from his eyes that Karkat realizes what the hell just happened, as the person cradling him in their arms floats down gently and touches down on the roof of a nearby building. The gunshots below sound like little pops of noise that barely register over the fact that the fucking Heir of Breath just flew Karkat out of harm's way. The arm under Karkat's knees drops away and a firm hand steadies him as he stumbles onto the roof, dazed by the realization.

"Are you okay? Hey, sir, are you okay? Were you hurt?"

Karkat shakes his head before the questions reach his thinkpan, too busy staring at the Heir's masked face as he tries to process what just happened. "I - I, no, yeah, I'm fine," he says at last.

"Just hang tight here for a few minutes, okay? I'll give you a ride down after I help take care of that mess down there." A small grin presses through Heir's blue mask, the outline barely visible beneath the obscuring layer of cloth.

The last thing Karkat has time to notice is that Heir's eyes are really, really bright blue through the slight tint of his goggles, the same unreal ice blue you see on all the photoshopped posters in the local comic book stores. Then Heir is in the air once more, the breezes streaming around him in a nearly visible curl, and the hero shoots back down the side of the building, right back into the firefight. Karkat walks over to the edge and peers over, the plastic handles of the grocery bag knotted in shaky hands.

It's not even a fight. Heir lands right in front of the robbers with a burst of wind, slamming all five criminals up against the wall and holding them there with a hand outstretched. A single gesture, and the pistols the robbers hold are knocked out of their hands, revolving in a circle in midair before the Heir sets them gently on the ground well behind the police line. The police respond after a brief pause, advancing on the robbers with specibi still at the ready. Heir lets the criminals drop and takes off, easily floating over the cops' heads, his hood blown back to reveal a thatch of messy black hair.

Karkat's brain must be completely pansmashed, because he's slow to realize Heir is flying back up to the rooftop. Like he'd just promised he would. Fuck.
"Sorry about that. You should never have gotten caught in the middle of that," Heir says before he even reaches Karkat's level, yanking his hood back up almost as an afterthought. "If you want, I have time to drop you off somewhere else. This was the first real emergency I've had all night."

Karkat's mouth feels drier than a desiccated sheaf of molt-skin. "I just live in that building over there," he croaks out, pointing in the general direction of his apartment. "If that's, uh, okay." He wants to slap himself upside the forehead. So fucking suave, Vantas. Way to sound like a stammering fuckwit in front of the Heir of Breath.

Heir just tilts his head to the side and smiles again. "You got it!" he says, chipper. There's another whirl of wind and Karkat is once again in the air, Heir's arms supporting him as they arrow over a block of buildings. Seattle is a blur through the wind enveloping them, the glow of the city lights hazy and yet dazzling. They touch down without a jolt in front of the apartment's front entry. "Stay safe, okay sir?" Heir says earnestly, bright blue eyes meeting Karkat's.

"Yeah," Karkat manages, wondering where the fuck his usual eloquence had fucked off to. Usually he could go on for ages, but right now he can't even muster up a full sentence. Heir has him completely at a loss. "Thanks - thank you."

"No problem! Goodbye, sir!" And with that Heir takes off, the greyish blue of his suit vanishing against the cloudy night sky.

Karkat realizes he's been standing around aimlessly for a good five minutes, staring at the space in the sky where the Heir had flown off, and shakes himself. He goes inside and back up to his apartment block, mind still absorbed in running through the night's events on a loop. He doesn't realize his mistake until he's already absent-mindedly told Crabdad about everything that happened, and the lusus begins skreeing in genuine alarm, flailing around the respite block with such frothing agitation it starts toppling lamps and breaking plates, utterly beyond pacification until Karkat shoves an entire tray of iced roe down its gullet.

By the next morning, there is no more roe to bribe the lusus with, and Crabdad is tossing Karkat's belongings around into packing boxes, ignoring all of Karkat's attempts to hang his hero hoodies back in the closet and apologize to the hivelord for the lusus's intense screeching.

By the end of that day, Crabdad has pissed off the hivelord enough that Karkat no longer has any choice but to go along with their relocation because they've been fucking evicted.

Motherfucker.

That's how six days before school begins, Karkat Vantas finds himself loading a small moving van and driving out to Maple Valley, Washington, a suburb probably voted 'more sleep-inducing than nitrous oxide.'

But it's too late. The idea has already worked its way into Karkat's thinkpan. It consumes him as he tapes up the box of utensils, as he empties his recooperacoon and dumps the sopor into the disposal unit, as he piles all of his earthly belongings into one van. It's with him as he takes one last look in the ablutions room mirror, tracing the edges of his eyes with a single nubby claw.

It's going to take a while. He's nowhere near in fighting shape, and he's been suppressing certain parts of himself for so long, he can barely remember how it all works. This is going to involve months of training, if not longer.

But now that he knows he can have it, he wants it. It's about time he stopped hiding, whiling his life away in the grip of suffocating fear.
In his mind's eye, he can already see the shape of a mask creasing across the brow of his nose.

Rose doesn’t sleep anymore. One’s intimate connection with the Horrorterrors of the Furthest Rings does not tend to itself, you know.

There is a moment of disconnection before she settles back into her body, and she is slow to readjust to the feeling of being confined in a single container. She sits in the center of the observatory, legs folded neatly beneath her and back arched in a perfectly straight line, a faint light seeping out from behind closed eyelids. When she opens them at last, lips parted in a dry gasp, the glow vanishes, leaving only lilac eyes with pupils blown out like dark stars. Her perfect posture slumps the moment she returns to herself, and she lets it happen, feeling like a puppet whose strings have been cut.

That simile is inaccurate. No, it is more that she has felt what it is to have porcelain in place of bone, piano wire instead of muscle, dank clammy water rather than blood. How can she hope to support herself with mere meat and bone after that?

Sweat sticks her reddish-blonde hair to her wide forehead as she tremblingly tucks stray strands behind her ears. She rises on shaking legs, her head hollow and fumbling without the absolute will of the Void chanting into her mind. There is a vast goldenrod sun painted in wide, haphazard splashes of paint across the inner curve of the observatory ceiling, the curling tendrils of sun rays embossed with orange and gold. Her childhood self had thought it a heartening venture, a pleasant image to open her eyes to and a way to ease her mental state after hours in the cold damp.

Her childhood self had been a fool.

Early morning rain patters on the roof and the uncovered balcony as Rose makes her way back into the house proper. There is a moment, when the wind picks up and her hair and skirt toss wildly, where her balance falters and she is uncertain whether her foot will fall on the balcony or through air, and she is giddy with the jolt of adrenaline that shoots through her veins. Then her foot slams hard onto the balcony, and she staggers against the side of the house, head still dizzy with the near fall.

She regains herself with more focus this time, her regular analytical mind expanding outward from the protected corner in which she hid herself from the corrosive presence of her Tentacled Patrons. By the time she strides down the stairwell and into the restroom, leaving a trail of damp footprints in the lush ivory carpet, she feels fully herself at last, no longer worn thin by the dark. She refreshes herself in the restroom, stripping off clothes that drip with sweat and rainwater, and turns the water as hot as it will go, a hint of raw desperation in the tremble of her hand as she turns the knob. She tucks the wild emotion away, smoothing it into the logical pattern of her thoughts before it can consume her.

If she had not learned to control herself this way, she would have gone fully mad years ago. As it is, she can feel the dark cracks in her mind, the scraped raw edges where her thoughts and emotions trail away. Dampness oozes up through the cracks, but she can ignore it. For now.

She finally peels herself out of the shower, the hot water having done nothing to warm the ice in the marrow of her bones and the creases of her brain. Drying herself carefully with a fluffed towel, she begins pulling on the uniform she had laid out the evening before her nightly trance. First is the light, woven Kevlar body suit, specially ordered and tailored to her body. Then the lower layer – dark orange pants tucked into supple boots, and a pale yellow top with long, tight sleeves. She straps on the arm guards for her needles and another vest of Kevlar, this one painstakingly dyed orange in a fit of fashion-savvy a few months ago.

She slides a yellow headband into her hair, tucks her orange hood in and pulls on a short sleeved, billowy, creamy golden tunic, with an orange sun covering her entire slim chest. It flares just right from her hips, tight around her waist as she does up a utility belt loaded with her backup knives and needles. She pulls on the standard gloves that heroes all gravitate towards, high quality and soft against her palms, tiny orange suns sewn across the backs.

The next part is the hardest, the most pointless and yet most central part of the ritual. She smooths out her complexion with powder, highlights her cheekbones and erases the deep purple shadows that underscore her eyes. She forgoes mascara – it would only look unnatural on her nearly translucent eyelashes – but liberally applies layers of gold and white eye shadow. Finally, she lines her mouth dark, and fills in her thin lips with lipstick so dark a purple it verges on black, purple like bruises and the dark between the stars, her one concession to the horrors that lurk within her mind.

Finally, she fits her mask onto her face. It is a slim strip of gold cloth, a single layer between her face and the eyes of the world. Her façade feels as inadequate as ever. Most heroes work in the dead of night, she knows, and they can get away with flimsy disguises when the dark does most of the obscuring for them.

She has more pressing obligations when the sun falls. So instead, she fights crime in the day, from earliest morn to the latest in the evening she can manage before the coiling darkness calls her home. Horrors know, there is enough crime in a city as large as New York that she has plenty to occupy her even at high noon.

Rose Lalonde takes one last look in the mirror, taking in the elaborate embroidery worked into the hem of her coat, the sky-blue bright of her boots, the edge of her armguards peering out just beneath her sleeves.

(One day, she will walk the streets of New York dripping with darkness and wrapped in sleek shadow. But for now, she is the Seer of Light. She is the heroine of this story. She must be. She has no other choice.)

Unable to meet her own eyes in the mirror, Rose wrenches away and walks out, picking up her twin needles with slim fingers and sliding them into the arm holsters. She strides out of the house without hesitation, stepping over the shattered wizard statues and overturned furniture that she has not had the energy to clean up since the day she’d first toppled them.

It’s not as though her mother is around to passive-aggressively pander to the mess, anymore. Rose has more important matters to occupy her time than thoughts of that final unfinished martini, still sitting abandoned on the table by the front door as Rose strides out of the house.

Picturing her usual destination in her mind’s eye - visualization is key - she raises a needle and cloaks herself in light that burns at her tearing eyes. The thick forest that surrounds the country estate vanishes in a flare of white-hot light, and when she blinks away the film of tears she is on top of the Flatiron Building, the slowly growing roar of New York City rising up beneath her.

(For a brief moment all she sees below is so much meat. The humans of this city are of such startling insignificance, and the idea of saving them from themselves yet again draws a chuckle of mind-breaking laughter from the tangle in the back of her brain -)

Banishing all such irrelevant thoughts to the back of her mind, the Seer of Light swallows the bile rising up in the back of her throat, raises her needles, and tilts her head to the side as she surveys her domain. Other heroes have to hunt for crime, comb through back alleys and wait for cries of pain and gunshots to alert them.

Rose closes her eyes, and when she opens them again the sun illuminates all she needs to see, some of them current events, some potential crimes that she can just barely sense the makings of, glowing in her mind’s eye like little bursts of light. The colddamp, grimdarkness subsides, and she sighs with relief as the last of the night’s taint is burned away.

A faint smirk curving her purple lips, she teleports to the scene of a robbery in media res.

Dave rolls over and punches his head into the pillow, his much-battered sunglasses creaking as the plastic bends under the pressure. He can really give no fucks at all. If he keeps his eyes shut and the sunglasses on, the sun pouring in through the gaping hole in the wall won’t mean a thing. It’s not like he has somewhere to be – Striders don’t do public school. He can stay in bed all day while other unfortunate souls have to wake up and go through the motions of caring. It would be deliciously goddamn ironic, and it is going to be a Thing. He is totally doing this. He is making this ha-

He doesn’t hear Bro. He never does. One moment, Dave is wrapped up in all kinds of awesome sleep irony; the next he rolls out of bed, a katana stabbing into the pillow where his head used to lie. He snatches up the first sword he lands on and comes up in a fighting stance. Bro has already vanished again, and there is only a second’s pause between the bright blue smuppet flying at Dave’s face and a sharp blade slicing in from the side.

He dodges both, and hears the faint whine when Bro’s katana finds nothing but air. Next there’s a flurry of puppets and sword all coming at him at once, and Dave is too busy parrying and dodging and darting out of range to even think about striking a blow of his own.

Time to even the odds a little.

Oh fuck, that has to have been the corniest pun in the history of paradox space. You’re welcome, world, hold your applause, your daily dose of ironically sick humor has just been served by Dave fucking Strider.

He barely manages to brace himself. Dave sucks in a breath and twitches his hand, shoving at a tiny part of his mind and telling it to stop -

Everything goes hazy red and sluggish as time grinds to a relative halt. Dave can only hold it for a breath, but it’s enough; he flashsteps out of range, and when time jolts back into motion, Bro’s lunging strike stabs the wall rather than Dave’s face.

This doesn’t faze Bro, of course. Not a second later the blade is free and slicing once more, the edge of the nigh-unbreakable blade glinting in the light from the hole in the wall. Every other breath Dave has to brace himself and reach inward to twist time to a standstill just to be able to keep up with his brother’s agile moves.

In a straight, sword-to-sword fight, Dave knows Bro would utterly wreck his shit. He’s just that good. It’s only since Dave figured out how to flashstep that he’s been able to hold his own, and even with the ability to stop time in his repertoire, he can’t get off the defensive.

None of the dumb shits they beat up on a daily basis are anywhere near Bro’s level, but that’s not the point. Dave has been trying to catch up to Bro his entire life, but some days it feels like the gap just keeps widening, like he’s gunning for warp one but can’t break light speed, and fuck, that thought is just nerdy enough that Bro’s next swing opens a thin slice along Dave’s cheek before Dave can parry it. Jaw clamping tight, Dave reappllies himself to the strife, stopping time and trying to hold it so he can get in past Bro’s guard.

All he manages to do is set off a firework in his brain. One sharp burst of pain later, and the world blanks out in a fuzzy veil of reddish darkness.

Dave wakes up on the carpet, an elegant sword stabbing into the floor mere inches from his sunglasses. His head is pounding like a bassline gone horribly wrong, which means he's overdone it again. Fuck. He accedes, avoiding Bro’s probing gaze as he puts a hand to the dip between his nose and his upper lip, smearing a tiny trickle of blood down his face with a finger and grimacing. Bro gives a sharp nod, and Dave pauses before nodding stoically back, waiting until Bro puts the sword away and vanishes before rubbing the blood off and standing. A few moments later Dave can hear the click of the shitty microwave turning on. Bro can’t stop time like Dave, but he’s fucking fast enough that there doesn’t seem to be a difference.

So much for sleeping in. If Bro is actually cooking something in the microwave, as opposed to fiddling with it as part of his latest foray into bizarre technological experimentation, then it means he wants them out and working today. Dave tosses his current shitty sword back onto the overturned bed and goes to the closet to obtain a slightly less shitty model.

As always, the only warning he gets is a split second blur of color before the trap is triggered; Dave flashsteps backward, and what seems like a hundred disgustingly colorful smuppets topple out of the closet, forming a sinisterly plush pile on the ground where Dave had been standing.

There is a pause as Dave is gripped by revulsion and the noise in the kitchen stops, waiting. Dave is sure the pile hadn’t been set to go off until Dave had pushed himself too far; this is, in an incredibly fucked up way, Bro’s concerned way of making sure Dave hasn’t actually had a time-stop induced aneurysm and broken his brain.

Dave grimaces and kicks the pile out of his way, pulling on a layer of Kevlar before yanking a pair of fancy crimson suit pants on. He keeps his sleep shirt on instead of going all out and wearing the rest of his costume. Bro can go from predictably ironic to unpredictably ironic on the slightest inscrutable whim, and it wouldn’t be the first time Dave has assumed they are heading out, only for Bro to simply tilt his head to the side, take in Dave’s outfit with a smirk, and then stay at home all day to play FPS games while Dave stewed.

But it’s all cool. That’s the thing about being ironic heroes; you have to do what feels right in the moment to achieve the maximum amount of irony. Dave is totally on board with that.

He hesitates, eyeing the thin metal collar lying on the floor by the torn up bed. With a raspy sigh, he leans down and picks it up, staring out the window for a few long minutes as he debates inwardly. After the third inspirationally ironic internal rap, he wraps the paper-thin layer of metal around his throat. Hell, even if they don't go out today, maybe Bro will feel like an actual rap session today instead of locking himself up in that creepy puppet shrine he calls a room.

(He doesn't bother testing the collar anymore; sure it's an amazing piece of technology and blah, blah, blah, but he's been using it for years now and the awe factor had worn off basically the day after he got it.)

He stops time to walk out into the kitchen just to prove he can, kicking open the pantry door and dodging a wave of spare parts as it falls out. If he's honest, the multiple traps spread out throughout the apartment on a daily basis are starting to get old. Heh. Maybe Bro is getting predictable in his old age. He's got to be hitting upper thirties by now, right? Practically ancient.
With that thought to bring a faint smile to his lips, Dave excavates a three-quarters empty box of Cheerio’s left over from some bygone age of edible bounty. He scarfs down the handfuls of cereal before another trap can go off or Lil Cal can steal it from over his shoulder, which yes is in fact a thing that has actually happened. He still has nightmares about it.

He doesn’t look up when he finishes the box, just tosses it back in the pantry empty. His stomach still complains a little, so he starts hunting for anything else not lost to the great summer mold infestation. In the end he has to settle for chugging a few glasses of water, both to settle the last of the emptiness in his stomach and in preparation for a day of work. Bro catches his eye from behind pointy shades and nods approval before scratching at the scruff of beard growth on his jaw and disappearing into his room.

Which means they are working today. Hell yes. Hell. Fucking. Yes.

Dave is back in his room in one fluid motion, the headache of overreaching himself vanishing in the sudden clarity sharpening his mind. He’s not excited. Just. He appreciates the work. Being a hero is a pretty selective field of work, okay, not everyone can be blessed with the kind of raw talent Striders casually throw around on a daily basis.

Ripping off his sleep shirt, Dave finishes putting on his newest work outfit. He’s never seen Bro wear anything but his white polos, tanks, fingerless gloves, and jeans when they head out, which Dave guesses is decently tongue-in-cheek because it’s the exact same thing Bro wears almost every day anyway, regardless of whether they do hero work or not. But Dave personally thinks coming up with a new costume whenever the mood strikes him is pretty damn hilarious too.

(This is due in large part to the fact that he trolls the local hero fan sites, and there are entire blogs dedicated to helping people recreate and cosplay Flashstep’s latest ensembles. Entire flame wars have erupted over whether he personally alters his more outlandish suit jackets himself or not.

The answer is yes, but it’s not like he actually likes sewing or anything. Irony is a demanding mistress, alright? She requires regular blood sacrifices and the occasional bout of indentured servitude at the altar of Her battered sewing machine. And Dave is a loyal disciple, what can he say.)

This week it’s all about the red and white. He covers up everything with Kevlar before tucking a white dress shirt into his pants, hooking on a pair of red suspenders so his pants don’t fall the fuck off while he’s running across rooftops all day long, and shrugging a too-long, bright crimson jacket over it all. He pulls the hood over his head. And fuck yes, the little miniature black gear on the lapel is hand sewn. Fuck the haters.

He belts two black, battered sword sheathes across his back, the straps crossing his chest in a black x, and stuffs the inner pockets of his jacket with some of the card-suit themed ninja stars he keeps mostly for shits and giggles. He skips over his favorite shoes to put on a sturdy pair of white sneakers. He’s learned the hard way that he can’t actually wear his favorite shit out in the field, or eventually it’ll be destroyed before its time by the sheer amount of wear and tear his clothes go through on a regular basis.

Selecting two only moderately shitty swords for the day, he goes out to the kitchen again and sees that Lil Cal is absent from his usual perch above the fridge. Dave grunts to himself, the metal collar humming along with him, and digs through the pantry one last time until he finds a carton of apple juice he stored for just such an occasion. He tosses it back as he heads to the stairwell and starts upward.

Aw yeah. Motherfuckin’ AJ. It’s like the goddamn elixir of life. Without it, how could he hope to maintain all this concentrated awesome? If he ever has to pick one thing to subsist on for the rest of his life, apple juice is where it’s at.

On the roof the sun is hot overhead. The air feels muggy and sticks Dave’s shirt and Kevlar vest to his skin almost instantly. The onset of fall has done absolutely nothing for taking the edge off Houston’s stubborn heat, but Dave’s been putting up with Houston’s bullshit all his life. The best fuck you to an uncaring sky god is to wear long-sleeved shirts and stew in your gloriously Pyrrhic victory.

Bro is standing by the AC unit, staring off across the Houston skyline with an impassive face. More impassive than usual, anyway. When Dave flashsteps to the edge of the roof and raises an eyebrow at him, Bro just raises an eyebrow right back. That’s all the signal Dave needs, the usual Strider-speak for ‘get going, kid.’ Dave nods without a word and pulls off his sunglasses, leaving them in the little nook between the AC unit and the roof itself. He doesn’t see Bro take his off, though he does note that there are now two pairs of sunglasses sitting in the shade when he straightens up, now alone on the rooftop.

It’s ironic as fuck that for Striders the best disguise is to leave their faces completely uncovered, and Dave is all for irony, but hell if he doesn’t feel just as naked with his eyes exposed today as he did the very first time he and Bro went out to wreck people’s shit.

Suck it up, Strider.

He orients himself by the sun and aims for downtown. He checks to make sure his swords are secure across his back and then takes a running leap at the roof next door. Soon he’s built up enough momentum that he can afford to fall into a rhythm, the steady beat of the bass in his head syncing up with each stride he takes.

In the slow moments between dreaming and waking, John imagines he can feel the breath sliding in and out of his lungs, the cool brush of air sinking into alveoli, sighing down through his trachea, flushing into his blood. He’s intensely aware of every flutter of air stirred up by the turning fan overhead, the autumn air suffusing the room through the open window. Somewhere, at the edge of his awareness, he thinks he can feel the inhale and exhale of a second pair of lungs, just barely out of sync with his own, and that presence comforts him deep in his bones.

With a grating beep, the alarm clock goes off, and John flinches bodily in response, his mind jolted out of its sleepy, muddled imaginations. The hyperawareness of his own breathing dies back, and the sensation of a second pair of lungs fades out. All that remains is his usual sense of the wind curling in through the window, tousling his hair and skimming across his face like a familiar greeting.

He scrubs the base of his palms over his eyes before putting on his thick glasses. He turns off the alarm and then concedes to the eager nudging of the breeze: he flips his palm upward, and a small gust of wind sends his bed sheets flying off him. Wrapped instead in a blanket of breezes that rustles his pajamas and hair constantly, John stumbles to the bathroom to get ready for the day, sighing wistfully at the thought of crawling back into bed.

But of course, he can’t afford to miss the first day of school.

John’s dad is already downstairs in the basement by the time John arrives, just beginning to flow through the familiar patterns of a t’ai chi sequence. Stifling one last yawn with his hand, John smiles at Samuel Egbert, and receives a faint smile and a slight nod in return as he falls into line with his dad, falling into the correct first stance and synchronizing his movements with the ex-Marine’s. He enjoys the steady, soothing way his lungs rise and fall, paying strict, practiced attention to his every twist and sweeping reach and correcting minute flaws in his technique. Morning katas have been a part of John’s routine pretty much since he could walk on his own, and he never feels fully awake until they’ve finished their father-son morning run-through.

After a half an hour, by mutual agreement they both stop, though they haven’t finished the last sequence. The school year always calls for changes and readjustments in John’s tightly scheduled workout routines, particularly once swim season starts up. Schoolwork has never been a problem for John, but there’s just no way around the eight-hour daily commitment that has to be accounted for come August.

“Do you have everything you need?” his dad probes after they towel off and return upstairs, pouring homemade batter into the waffle iron and setting bacon to sizzle on the already heated frying pan. “Nothing last minute?”

John nods from where he is rinsing strawberries in the sink and slicing them up into thin slivers, occasionally popping a whole berry into his mouth. “I should be okay. How do my contacts look?”

Samuel wipes off his hands with a hand towel and takes John by the chin, angling his son’s face from side to side. John lets him, tilting his head obediently despite the fact that he could resist the manhandling if he wanted to. “They’ll do,” Samuel says at last, patting John on the cheek before turning back to the waffle iron. “Just make sure you keep your glasses on as well.”

“Yes sir.” When the waffles are ready John covers them with the sliced strawberries and a dash of syrup, taking the plate to the table to eat while his dad makes another round and prepares a bowl of granola garnished with sliced banana and cinnamon. By the time Samuel places his own plate, a rasher of bacon, and the bowl of oatmeal on the table, John has already ploughed throw his waffles, the usual ravenous hunger slightly assuaged. He starts in on the oatmeal, savoring each hot mouthful.

Maybe it’s John’s powers, his duties, or just the growing pangs of a regular teenage boy – whichever is the case, John has always needed twice the amount of sustenance per meal that his dad has. When he’d been younger, his dad had been incredulous at the sheer amount John could put away; now, he just makes sure that everything John eats is healthy and filling without worrying about John’s total intake. With the kind of regular, strenuous activity John engages in every night, there’s certainly no worry about him getting flabby.

John finishes his meal and waits for Samuel to finish as well, his legs bouncing with restless energy in no way worked off by the t’ai chi workout, then takes all the plates to the sink to wash while his dad dries. He runs upstairs to change out of his workout clothes and into something more appropriate for the first day of school, finally deciding on a Superman shirt, dark jeans, and a white zip-up hoodie. Adjusting his tinted contact lenses and glasses one last time in the mirror, John practices a smile on his reflection, pushes the corners up with his fingers when he judges it a little too hesitant, and swings his backpack over his shoulder.

“I’m off!” he calls as he leaps down the stairs two at a time, landing easily in a tiny burst of wind. He’s trying to burn off as much of the excessive energy as he can before he gets to school and has to sit relatively still for an interminable length of time. That had been an issue last year. “See yah later, Dad!”

Samuel Egbert intercepts him at the door, brandishing two slices of toast even as John puts his hand on the doorknob. “Have a good day at school, kiddo,” his dad says as John stuffs the first piece of toast into his mouth.

There is a moment of tension, and John’s stomach turns uncomfortably. His dad is well aware that last year had been…rough, having had to deal with John’s emotional ups and downs throughout the school year until the sudden relief of an overdue summer. Sure, they have plans for how to deal with any kind of similar trouble this year, but John can still feel the space between them that hadn’t been there before, the void where a relatively stoic but supportive father just hadn’t quite been equipped to handle a stupidly hurting sixteen year old on his own.

Then his dad finishes. “I am very proud of you, son.”

John smiles back with real feeling, so hard his cheeks hurt, as the familiar praise warms him and eases the last of the jitters from his system. They run through the usual last few Dad-required questions (“Do you have your lunch?” “You put it in my bag yourself!” “Try not to stand out too much.” “I know, Dad.”) and then with a final pat of the head from his dad John’s out the door and down the street. He suppresses the urge to fly; the cool dawn air is crisp and enticing, the breeze light and welcoming, but he knows better.

He feels wistful all the same, and maybe a little depressed, but he puts that out of his mind. He always feels a little blue when school starts, because it means less time for flying and his duties, but school is just as fulfilling in its own way! He just has to adjust, that’s all.

A house three doors down still has the moving boxes piled up in a messy heap by the end of the driveway for the garbage truck, and, not for the first time, John tries to peer in through the windows to get a glimpse of his new neighbor. It’s no good – the blinds have been drawn shut for the past two days now. He knows for sure it’s a troll – he’s seen the spindly, ghostly pale crab lusus skreeing and trundling huge stacks of cardboard boxes inside from the moving van, but he has yet to get a glimpse of the troll itself. He’s intensely curious, and wonders if his dad will wait and take John with him when he goes to deliver a traditional welcome-to-the-neighborhood baked confection so he can meet them. It has to be a kid or an adolescent, or someone just barely out of adolescence; a fully matured troll wouldn’t still have an accompanying lusus.

Such thoughts occupy his mind as he walks to school, fifteen minutes away. He’s early, but the parking lot is already a mess of confused new students in their cars and parents walking their ninth-graders in. The first day of school is always a nightmare, but this year in particular a lot of school zoning has changed, shuffling enough people around to make it even more hectic than usual. John examines the schedule emailed to him back in July, locates his new locker and the first classroom he needs in his mental map of the school, and takes a deep breath before summoning another smile and diving through the crowd.

He weaves between the thronging crowd expertly, reaching his locker without incident. He sees a few familiar faces in the crowd, and three members of the swim team actually wave at him from a distance, but he’s painfully aware of how many more personal, exuberant reunions are taking place around him as old friends and groups shout at each other across the halls and embrace each other. He takes the rising stab of wistfulness, all too similar to the pang he’d felt about not flying this morning, and quashes it, waving at one last fellow swimmer before ducking into the AP Biology classroom, happy to be away from the claustrophobic, crowded hallway.

Three other students have already made it to the classroom, though there’s no sign of the teacher. Two of them John knows; one is a relatively well-known member of the football team that he is familiar with by reputation, while the other is a slim female troll whom Rose used to complain about back in middle school.

The third is totally unfamiliar, and even as John goes to sit at the desk just behind the unknown troll, he is struck by two significant details. One, the troll is wearing an oversized Batman hoodie, black and grey with the occasional flash of bright yellow. And two, this guy’s horns are tiny. Like whoa, some of the troll kids at school have pretty dramatic racks, but this guy is the exact opposite, his candy-corn horns rounded and almost obscured completely in bed of glossy grey-black hair.
And John can hardly help it if his first thought is ‘shit, he’s adorable.’ He finds himself staring at the back of the troll’s head instead of reviewing his textbook even after he opens the book, unduly intrigued by the smooth bumps of the troll’s horns barely rising above his head.

The urge to talk seizes John, and he’s halfway leaning forward before he even registers the old tightening of nervous anticipation in his chest. “Hello, Bruce,” he says before he can abort mission, and then immediately wants to slam his head against the desk with humiliation. Way to be a complete nerd, Egbert. If the Superman shirt hadn’t been enough of a hint, he’s just outed himself completely as completely lacking in any kind of social graces.

Almost sick with fascination, John waits as the troll’s entire body stiffens, and the kid slowly turns to eye John with an intent, rusty-red eye flashing from behind thin-rimmed glasses, and wow that is one hell of a scowl. It’s too late now; John plasters a wide smile across his face, torn between trying not to seem to eager and ducking his head and hiding his face in shame for the rest of the day. The troll is silent for a long time, his mouth in a firm scowl as he raises a delicate eyebrow. “What do you want, Clark?” he says at last, with so much annoyance laden in his tone that John almost didn’t register the deadpan emphasis on ‘Clark.’

And then John feels his smile widen stupidly, uncontrollably, as he kicks his legs forward in a burst of irrepressible excitement. He’d actually talked back. It’s such a stupid thing to get excited about, pathetic really, but he can’t stop feeling it like a little firework going off in his chest. “Eheheheh. I’m John. What’s your name?”

The troll frowns, and his scowl deepens, any trace of that deadpan humor John thought he’d seen completely shut down. “None of your goddamn business,” he says, his voice just barely tinged with a growl, and spins around to face the front of the classroom.

That Batman hoodie seems more and more fitting with every passing moment.

Before John can press his luck, the teacher begins to speak, calling out attendance. This suits John just fine; unwilling to let his determination flag, he waits impatiently as the teacher runs through the list, almost missing his own name being called in his preoccupation, and is finally rewarded when she calls out the name “Karkat Vantas,” and the troll before him raises a hand in response. Success.

“Nice to meet yah, Karkat,” John says, leaning forward a little to nudge the troll with a finger. The troll looked over his shoulder once more, and oh yes, that had to be the most downright unimpressed, 120% done-with-you face ever worn by trollkind. John can’t help it; he barely contains the burst of laughter that attempts to spew out of his mouth, swallowing the body-shaking giggles down after a single choked-off snort. Karkat just looks at him like he’s a complete and utter imbecile, but that frown is just so expressive, so completely done with John’s shenanigans, that it just sets off another bubble of laughter that has the teacher eyeing both of them. Karkat whirls in his seat when the teacher gives a significant cough, and John smiles at her apologetically before settling down, almost humming as he watches the back of Karkat’s head.

John should be discouraged by this, especially when the troll ignores him through the rest of class. But for some reason, he can’t feel his excitement dying at all, listening to the teacher give her first-day lecture without really paying attention as he looks over Karkat’s horns, trying to figure out why they seemed so damn familiar.

And then, finally, John places where he’s seen those nubby horns, angular features, and rusty eyes before, and has to swallow down an exclamation of recognition.
He looks different, in the bright light of day, not trapped in the middle of a shootout between bank robbers and the police with nowhere to run. But, yeah, this is the troll Heir had flown home not a week ago. John had been distracted at the time, first by the need to get the troll to safety and to stop the shooting before someone was seriously injured, and then by the nagging tug of the wind informing him of a break in across town he needed to take care of, but he remembered the nubby little horns and the utter, shell-shocked sincerity in the way the troll had thanked him.

Holy shit. Someone John’s saved is in the same class as him. He doesn’t think this has ever happened before, ever. His stomach is doing something really bizarre that he can only describe as a mix of excited flailing and panicked twisting. Because on one hand, oh my god, maybe he can be friends with someone he saved as Heir, and then on the other hand, oh my god, someone who has seen Heir up close and personal is sitting barely a foot away from John’s face, with only the assurance of a mask, a pair of goggles, and tinted contact lenses keeping John’s secret identity from being all over the Seattle Times. It’s like a birthday present and a nightmare all wrapped into one.

John’s dad would probably be a lot more worried. But after that initial moment of panic, John is right back to the bubbling burn of excitement. He doesn’t even know what’s causing this; he just knows that he is determined to be friends with Karkat Vantas, even if it’s the last thing he does. Him and Karkat, best friends – it is going to be a Thing.

When class ends, Karkat is one of the first on his feet, packing up his things in one smooth motion before heading for the door without looking back. Despite the abrasive attitude Karkat blasts, John still can’t shake the desire to talk to the him again, so he heads after the troll, weaving between slower students with practiced ease as he trails Karkat through the crowded hallway.

The troll comes to a stop by a locker not far from John’s own and begins to fiddle with the combination lock, giving John time to catch up. Then he pauses, realizing he doesn’t actually know how to initiate a ‘let us engage in glorious brohood my friend’ invitation without the medium of a pesterchum window between him and the potential bro. Which, uh. Awkward.

While he waffles and feels his momentum slipping away in the face of his awkward inexperience, Karkat looks up from his lock, which he’s still having trouble with, and grants John yet another annoyed glance. “This is getting really creepy, really fucking fast, Clark,” he drawls, yanking on the stubborn combination lock and bestowing upon it an even more fantastic death glare than the one he’d given John. “Either spit it out or shut your flapping mastication trap and leave so I can get on with my life. Newsflash, asshat, I have better things to do than be on the receiving end of your panaddled attempts at awkward social interaction, so if you would be kind enough to fuck right off and let me annihilate this shitty lock in peace, I would be the happiest little wriggler in this entire blasted cave!” Karkat finishes this with a vehement, but ultimately futile, tug on the lock, letting his head fall forward with enough force to probably dent the locker itself.

The answer is on John’s lips before he really processes the fact that he knows the answer, can feel exactly what he wants to say next with perfect clarity. “S’okay, man. You know, since my name isn’t Clark. It’s John.”

Karkat goes completely still, and then, almost in slow motion, knocks his head against the locker again with a groan of bone-deep existential despair. John snickers. “God damn it,” Karkat says seemingly to the empty air. He angles his head to glare up at John. “What. Do. You. Want.”

John barely suppresses another burst of giggles. It’s an entirely novel sensation - he's never been so thoroughly entertained by the sight of someone else being so very, very annoyed. "Uh. Nothing, just - you're new here, right?" Oh my god he's awful at this.

"This is either the worst attempt at flirting ever, or you are the single most painfully awkward person on the planet,” Karkat says, turning his attention back to the locker. This time, it clicks open and he almost snarls in triumph. It's just as adorable as the angry faces.

"Whoa! Uh, no, not flirting, uh!" John says coherently, flailing as he scrambles to shake his head in negation. "I guess I'm just not really good at this, huh?" He tries to keep up the smile even as he feels something low in his stomach begin to tighten and sink, a kind of wistful regret that he recognizes all too well. He should have known better than to try this, he muses, shoulders sagging as Karkat's unamused glower remains intact. He's never made a friend in his life, aside from Rose, and Rose had done most of the groundwork there.

"...You're absolutely fucking awful." A hint of a smile tugs at Karkat's straight frown, and for a moment John thinks he's imagining the faint amusement in the troll's voice. "I can only assume that means this is intended to be some kind of inane human friendship initiation ritual. Well, you have my attention for the next thirty seconds. Proceed."

"Really?! Oh, uh," John says, thrown off by the sudden release of the tension in his stomach. Somehow he hasn't messed this up yet, and realizing that brings the smile back up to full intensity on his face. "Ahaha, I was just wondering what your next class is. I have Intermediate Alternian."

Karkat rolls his eyes, sorting through his textbooks and slamming the locker shut again. "Film," he says succinctly, tucking a textbook away in his bag. "The class your fumbling, pathetic human gesture of friendship is keeping me from is Film, and I intend to leave in the next ten seconds so I can go revel in what may be the single enjoyable class offered by this pedestrian little high school. Continue."

"Oh." John deflates again. "Sorry, then, um, I didn't mean to keep bothering you."

Karkat arches an eyebrow, waiting as the last ten seconds tick by, and then huffs out a long-suffering sigh. "The solution here is to ask me about the rest of my schedule," he says, folding his arms across his chest.

"Can I see your schedule, Karkat?" John asks automatically, seizing on the opportunity. Karkat whips the yellow paper schedule as though he'd been just waiting for his cue. Then he frowns again as John reads over it, as though he hadn't meant to give away that much enthusiasm.

John's good mood is rapidly returning. Okay, maybe John sucks at making friends, like that's anything new, but he's starting to get that he can't take all of Karkat's glowering expressions seriously. Whatever the reason for it, the troll's actions don't match his expressions, and it's possible John isn't annoying him as much as he thinks. Right now Karkat looks both angry and curious, as though he's incapable of showing any emotions with mixing in a balancing dose of annoyance to offset any genuine expression.

John can work with that.

And judging by the number of shared classes they have, John is going to have more than enough time to figure this whole friendship thing out. "I'll see you in physics, then, Karkat," he says, grinning at the troll as he hands the schedule back. He almost bounces back on his heels when Karkat rolls his eyes and squashes the smile threatening to edge out his perpetual frown. "See you later!" John calls as Karkat starts walking in the opposite direction.

The troll raises a hand without turning around, a kind of half-wave that transitions into rude gesture before Karkat vanishes around the corner, an irate smile still half-visible on his face.

John hurries off to his own class, still in a daze, and barely arrives before the bell rings. He doesn't mind though. If everything goes well, he may just have made his first friend since Rose moved out of town. It's not as though friends are out of bounds; he's just always been very aware that with the kind of life he leads, anyone he befriends could be at risk, so he's tried to keep it to a minimum.

But last year had only made it clear where trying to go at it solo would land him. Shrugging off a wave of unsettling memories, John takes out the Alternian textbook and focuses on the teacher, even as she begins to review the chapter he's already read.

Maybe school won't be so lonely this year.

Jade wakes up with a jerk, snorting and sending the pen clattering across the work desk. There's a thin trickle of drool running down her chin, the source of a mostly-dry puddle on the top layer of papers spread across the desk. For a brief moment, she can't breathe, a last ripple of fear shaking her before the half-remembered nightmare is forcibly shoved out of mind. She rubs at her chin with the back of her hand, grimacing at the leftover drool from her nap, and then turns her head to smile at her masterpiece. "It's almost time to go, Bec!" she says, reaching down unerringly behind her chair to scratch behind the ears of the enormous wolf sitting guard beside her. "Come on, boy, lets finish packing!"

Humming, Jade strips off her oil-splattered work apron as she dashes out of the garage, into the middle of a clearing. A large stretch of the jungle has been cleared for nearly three miles - maybe overkill, but Grandpa always said there was no kill like overkill!

She soon approaches a steep cliff face, takes a running leap, and begins scrabbling upward, not willing to waste time going the long way around by the actual path. She knows this cliff well by now, her grime-rimmed fingers expertly finding the cracks and crevasses she needs to pull herself upward. When she reaches the top, she whistles. In a crackle of electric green light, the white wolf appears beside her, still sitting at attention. When she ruffles his fur, Bec's bleach pale tongue lolls, and he gets to his feet at last. Together they run the rest of the way to the spindly towers and round orbs of the Harley residence. The thick, sweet scent of lush tropical plants fills the air.

Jade has already used the transportalizer and Bec's help to move most of her belongings to the garage over the course of the past few weeks, ever since she had found her Grandpa's last plans in his study and followed his instructions for this next big step in her training regimen. All she has left to pack are the essentials she's needed to keep out to live from day to day.

Now she bursts in through the ground level door and onto the battered transport pad, reappearing on her floor in a flurry of tangled brown hair. The suitcase is mostly packed; she shoves her second to last rifle into its case, tosses her favorite bath towels and toothbrush on top, and does a once over of the mostly stripped room, checking in the drawers. She leaves the doors of her empty wardrobe hanging open when she whips around with a laugh to duck under the bed. She finds one last dusty squiddle, a limited edition Fancy Princess Berryboo, underneath, and throws it in the suitcase before slamming it shut.

"Goodbye room!" she says cheerfully, waving at the walls, bare of posters. She hefts the massive suitcase in a single hand, unbothered by the fact that it weighs approximately two hundred pounds. Then it's back to the transport pad with her suitcase in hand, and down to the kitchen floor. There she takes the time to irradiate a steak for Bec, and slices enough tomatoes and meat and lettuce for twenty sandwiches, topping each off with a flourishing slather of yellow mustard before storing them in an icebox. She has a long trip to make after all, and she can sometimes eat three sandwiches a meal!

Everything is ready. Almost. Twisting her hand sideways, Jade mimes opening a drawer and tosses the suitcase and ice box into her sylladex pocket. Bec noses at the rip in space/time and wrinkles his pale muzzle in distaste. Bec never likes when Jade uses space for selfish things, but the sylladex dimension is really really useful and convenient! Grandpa had shown her how to open one up, one of the last things he'd trained her in before dying and leaving her to the care of the practice strife robots.

Smiling a little sadly now, Jade transportalizes to the living room. A familiar figure stands outlined by a permanent electric fire, framed by a pair of tall clocks. "Goodbye, Grandpa! I'm off on an adventure!" Jade hesitates, and then steps over a pile of her grandpa's hoarded junk and takes the last rifle in the house down from its rack, cradling it reverently. It is a prototype sniper rifle, one with no official make or model, a custom job Grandpa had designed himself. Jade has always used one of the hundreds of riflekind stocked around the house and island for practice. Grandpa always said she needed to wait for the right moment to take up his arms.

Well, she decides, the moment is now. Slinging the rifle across her back on a well-worn strap, Jade nods decisively and flips open the faces of both tall clocks. Beneath the one on the right is a bright red button; behind the left, a blue button. She plants a kiss on the taxidermied cheek of her grandfather's face, and pressed both buttons down at the same time.

Overhead, a familiar gruff voice chortles over the speakers. "Self-destruct engaged, my dear girl! Let's give it the count of ten-nine-"

Jade sets the transportalizer to the coordinates of the pad in the garage she'd just come from and activates it. Safely away from the house, she turns and walks over to the rickety plane waiting in the center of the garage. It is more than fifty years old, and looks as though a stiff wind could rip the wings from its sides. A blue wolf's head has been painted on one side, a large atomic symbol on the other. Bec appears in the pilot compartment as Jade tosses the last of her tools and rifles from the garage into the hold.

She changes her outfit, even as a low rumble rocks the garage - the sound of the residence imploding, leaving no trace of the Harley home and sanctuary for the outside world to find. Tying her hair back up in a long green scarf, Jade pulls a pair of old-fashioned aviator goggles over her face as she slams the hold shut and clammers up into the pilot seat. "Ready Bec?" she asks. Bec presses his nose to a fuel gauge, then huffs and lies down, at ease.

Cackling, Jade cranks the engine. The fuel is a little old, but no less potent for it; the nuclear engine warms up with a purring thrum, and the gauges and GPS screen light up bright green, a personal touch. Metal shields slide over the ancient wings, augmenting them, and an airtight cover closes over the pilot's compartment. Pressing a few more keys, Jade's lunchtop, sitting on the panel beside her, connects to the onboard Bluetooth. The display plays a hologram across the reinforced glass screen, outlining distance to destination, altitude, latitude, longitude, and assorted other necessities.

Jade revs the engine one more time. Just for fun.

She types a last message to her penpal on her lunchtop before shutting down everything but the program needed to help fly the plane. Then she lets the plane roll forward, picking up speed, and cues the engine one last time.

Fueled by the power of science and great justice, the plane containing the heroine who will be called Sharpshooter takes off, loud whoops escaping the airtight dome as Jade punches the air.

Success.
Behind her, the entire island shudders, and explodes, the volcano triggered by the secondary self-destruct sequence. That's okay - most of the important stuff can be replaced, and the really unique stuff is safe and sound in the hold. Fragments of half-molten rock patter against the back end of the plane, but they're already almost out of range.

Jade reaches cruising altitude, pulls out a sandwich from her sylladex, and crunches down on a juicy tomato and parrot sandwich. Delicious, delicious science. And to think, her career as a super heroine hasn't even begun yet! She can't wait to reach the mainland. Grandpa is gonna be so proud of her!

On the floor of the airplane, Bec gives a start and growls, staring with blank white eyes at something in the shadows at the back of the plane.

But in the next moment the unnatural shadow is gone, vanished back down the vent opening it had emerged from, and the green sparks playing along Bec's teeth die down. If the wolf could think in English, it would have admitted to itself that the thing now hiding in the hold never proved itself a threat to Bec's mistress even once during all those years on the island, and thus can be permitted to remain alive.

For now.

Jade, oblivious, stretches out and lets the autopilot do its thing.

The sunrise from the pilot's compartment is the most beautiful thing she's ever seen. Then the autopilot steers the plane away from the east, and they begin to coast toward her first destination.

Down in the hold, a black figure, barely distinct from the lightless shadows of the hold itself, conceals itself in the depths of an old cupboard, muttering to itself with irritated clicks and grimaces every time the plane jolts a little. It has grudgingly enjoyed its time on the island these past few years, against its will, but now - it's time.

Spades Slick has an old score to settle on the mainland, and nothing will stand in his way.

Chapter End Notes

Fanfiction of a fanfiction, you guys. This is what my life has come to. The original work is Real Men Wear Tights by BananaRamses, SergeantMeow, and PanicIsMyRain, and it is gorgeous. Please note a slightly modified timeline; I didn't want to rehash too much of Karkat and John's storyline when it's already been done so well, so I rushed them along to meeting on the first day.

A spoiler-heavy list of major ships as of Chapter 26, as well as general warning explanations, chapter-specific content warnings, and credits are available here.

EDIT: 09/19/2015 Just a note that this IS a first draft with minimal editing and no beta reader - there's plenty of early installment weirdness and plot/character inconsistencies, particularly for characters and storylines that only got fleshed out later on. I'll probably go on an editing spree when the fic is complete.

Chapter Summary

The wind's way in the deep sky's hollow
None may measure, as none can say
How the heart in her shows the swallow
The wind's way.

By the time Karkat makes it to lunch, he's so thoroughly confused that he just agrees mindlessly when the source of his confusion asks if they can eat lunch together.

John Egbert isn't just in Karkat's biology and physics classes. Oh no. Karkat has weaseled out of him that, out of an entire seven period day, they somehow have five of the same classes. And the same lunch. And their lockers are in the same hallway, so Karkat can't escape even between classes.

If Egbert were a troll, at least Karkat would be able to say with some bewildered certainty that he's being hit on. Bewildered, because like hell would anyone court Karkat seriously. Ever. Like, this much unadulterated flirtation from a troll would be fucking embarrassing and any troll with a shred of pride left would at least make an attempt at not seeming so painfully desperate.

Egbert isn't a troll though, and so Karkat is faced with the key quandary that has plagued human/troll relations since the two species first met - how to interpret the difference between flagrantly pale come ons, and regular old human friendship offerings. If nothing else, Karkat's secret stash of embarrassing romantic comedies have taught him that the line between pale romance and the human disease called friendship is a line both subtle and variable, which can lead to embarrassing (yet comedic) shenanigans for all parties involved.

All things considered, it would probably be for the best if Karkat heads off any potential palemance or friendship off before the situation mutates into a giant tangled knot of inane antics and concentrated stupidity.

There's a major problem with that, though.

The problem is that when Karkat emerges from the serving line, a tray of questionable food in hand, he looks up to glare at John Egbert and gets a faceful of the most pitiful fucking puppy dog eyes ever worn by mankind. When Karkat then sighs and glowers and starts stomping toward Egbert, the kid's entire face lights up and he practically starts bouncing on his heels, grinning.
This is not normal behavior. Normal people don’t smile and laugh when faced with Karkat’s standard bitchy expressions. The entire reason he doesn’t bother hiding his rage hardon behind a civil mask every day is so that people don’t get too close to him, don’t get curious about him or his eyes or his blood or any number of things that it would just be better for the entire goddamn planet if no one ever got wind of. Sure, Karkat has one persistently obnoxious pesterchum, but she’s persistently obnoxious with everyone, not just him, and he’ll most likely never meet her in person again, so he’s pretty much in the clear.

Egbert, however, finds Karkat’s best, most practiced rage masks entertaining. And when he laughs, Karkat doesn’t get more irritated at what should feel like mockery. Quite the opposite in fact.

Which is a really, really ominous sign. Like wow, current Karkat, you need to stop being pacified by this nookchafing asshole right the fuck now. You’ve known this totally annoying dumbass for a grand total of five hours, get a fucking grip. He’s some random guy who gets some perversive amusement out of being yelled at, that’s all.

Karkat launches into a very nice rant even before he’s finished walking up to Egbert, keeping his face in a nice neutral frown as his shoulders tense up. "Well? I can only assume you have a miniature horde of fellow buddychums waiting within this sea of uncivilized asshats ready to continue your work at trying to latch onto me like a parasite on an unsuspecting herdbeast. I’m warning you right the fuck now, it’s not going to work. I’m only putting up with you because your looks of pathetic disappointment resemble a small animal after it’s been caught stealing cookies from the pantry. If you think I’m going to be this disgustingly charming to every random wriggler you throw at me, you can think a-fucking-gain." He glances around the cafeteria suspiciously; he hadn’t noticed Egbert plotting with anyone while he’d been in line for food, but it could have happened when he turned to grab the carton of milk from the freezer.

When he looks back at Egbert, irritated by the lack of immediate response, Egbert is fiddling with the strap of his backpack, and his grin has lost its lopsided earnestness, tightening into a perfectly constructed, apologetic grimace that can only nominally be called a smile. He’s looking at something over Karkat’s shoulder rather than at Karkat himself when he answers. "Oh, uh, no. No, I wouldn’t just throw you to the wolves, Karkat! Ahahaha! I thought we could eat outside, since the weather is really nice today!"

Okay, wow. He’s only spent half a day around this kid, and Karkat can tell something is up. It’s like all that goofy sincerity got sucked out of Egbert, which yeah, Karkat has been trying to provoke the kid into revealing his ulterior motives all day long, but he didn’t actually think he’d get a response like this? Egbert almost looks like he’s in pain and trying to hide it. He’s a horrible actor, of course.

"Fine. Lead on, Egbert," Karkat says at last, rolling his eyes at the exit doors of the cafeteria. At his old school in the middle of the city they hadn’t been allowed outside during lunch, but that’s apparently not a thing here - or at least, no one yells or moves to stop Egbert from pushing open the exit door and holding it open by leaning against it, some of the goofy tilt returning to his grin as he looks back at Karkat.

Like hell is Karkat going through that door then. For all he knows, it could be a trap, this whole morning an elaborate setup for some stupid prank by Egbert that involves dumping a bucket of water on his head or something. Karkat just has that kind of shitty relationship with the cosmic distributor of good luck. He shoulders open the other door, glaring at Egbert before he can protest, and walks out onto the grass, chomping on an apple in a satisfactory burst of irritated victory. Sure, choosing to open another door in a moment of all-consuming paranoia is a little fucking weird, but hey. As far as Karkat Vantas is concerned, he just gave a massive pair of middle fingers to the prankster’s gambit of the universe, and it’s totally worth it.
Egbert matches his stride anyway, his slowly growing smile and the lack of disappointment over a failed prank probably a major hint that Karkat had indeed imagined that whole paranoid prank saga without any basis in reality. The kid is almost whistling as he strides to a tree wedged up on a hill, and there's an actual fucking bounce in his step. Karkat seriously has to find out what happy drugs they have this kid on, because they're clearly top quality and super effective.

A passing breeze runs through the tree branches, ruffling Karkat's hair as he slumps down against the side of the tree. He combs at it absently, then uses the same hand to adjust the apple in his mouth and take another bite. Then he looks up and realizes Egbert is still standing.

Which is really creepy. He raises an eyebrow and is about to say so (in much more elegant, vitriolic terms, naturally) when Egbert catches himself with a visible start and sits down, legs sprawled out in front of him as he pulls a brown bag lunch and a Tupperware container out of his backpack.

Egbert fidgets with his food, turning his brown bag to face the other direction for some bizarre reason before opening it up, while Karkat processes two major things:

One, they are alone out here. Yeah, it's a nice day, and the weather is fucking perfect, but no one else has decided to take the opportunity to claim part of the yard for themselves. Egbert has staked his claim on this spot under the tree, but the rest of the schoolyard is like a goddamn ghost town. All the social interaction is going on inside, which Karkat is totally okay with, except -

Two, yes, judging by Egbert's reaction to Karkat's quip about friendmobs earlier, and by the fact that the kid has literally chosen the most isolated spot on campus for this little friendship and feeding ritual, Egbert-

"There actually isn't a friendhorde, is there, Egbert?"

Egbert takes a massive bite out of his sandwich and blinks at Karkat innocently as he tries to talk around it. It's as disgusting a display as it sounds. "No! I told you, Karkat!" He swallows loudly, and Karkat is left to marvel at how one mere mortal can fit that much food in his mouth without choking as Egbert takes another impossible bite.

"So, for whatever reason, despite your looks, your hypothetical but as yet unproven swimming talent, and stupidly happy personality, you're a social pariah who spends most of his free time socializing with a tree." Karkat feels that this is something that needs to be firmly established before he can move on with the conversation.

John stops chewing, and there's an almost painful pause before he swallows and looks down, smiling weirdly at the sandwich in his hands instead of Karkat. "Ahaha. Yeah, I guess?" Egbert rubs the back of his head, making his cowlicks worse as he closes his eyes and grins at Karkat, the smile once again dangerously balanced and symmetrical.

And Karkat realizes, with a sick twist in his stomach, that he could break Egbert. He could break him so, so easily, right here and now. It's so obvious.

All he has to do is ask why.

And -

He can't do that. He can't.

"I'm glad we covered that," he says instead, letting the apple drop onto his tray.

Egbert recovers in the space of seconds; it's a remarkable process to behold, as his smile creaks back out of line and he crosses his legs, leaning toward Karkat as he starts talking again. "Anyway, enough about me, Karkat! You keep ignoring me in class! Come on, I'm really curious - why did you move here?"

Karkat doesn't swallow back his reply and try to mitigate his usual abrasiveness. If he's going through with this friendship ritual, he thinks, he can't start pulling punches with Egbert. Just because the kid has some fucking issue where the subject of other friends are concerned doesn't mean Karkat is going to treat him like he's made of glass. "None of your business, you panshattered friend of trees. My lusus just decided to freak the fuck out and get us evicted from our apartment over something stupid."

Egbert just leans in further, eyes going big behind his thick-framed glasses with naïve curiosity. "Whaaaat? There has to be more to it than that!"

Karkat keeps eating on autopilot as Egbert bothers him until he tells the kid the story of the bank robbery incident in bits and pieces, rolling his eyes at Egbert's bright-eyed worry.

He doesn't know how or why Egbert has somehow ended alone. It's not his fucking business, and unlike Egbert, he's not going to go prying into someone's personal life. Especially not when it's clear that even barely mentioning the topic sets Egbert off like that.

But hell, if it isn't pathetic as fuck.

Karkat spends the rest of lunch fighting an internal battle with the sneaky tentacles of impotent pity trying to wriggle their way into his friendship ritual.

God fucking dammit.

He drives home and stops there only long enough to confirm that yes, Crabdad has somehow managed to transform their new kitchen into a warzone of tattered boxes and overturned chairs. The thermal hull appears to be upside down, and for reasons unknown an entire crate of untouched tomato soup cans has been lodged in front of the window, so that the only light in the entire kitchen is that which streams between the cupboards and the crate, and through the open front door when Karkat walks in.

It would be almost hilarious if it wasn't so panmeltingly frustrating because Karkat has to clean this up. As far as Crabdad is concerned, it has done its job and it has enjoyed a rapturous success. The giant crab has taken up residence atop a nest of shredded cardboard in the corner, lording its lazy ass over a court of futile destruction and broken dreams. It even has the gall to skree in triumph when Karkat stares slack-jawed at the new levels of failure to which his lusus has sunk.

No doubt it expects a reward for this.

After a long day of pale confusion, Karkat doesn't have it in him to even argue. He strips the plastic wrapping off the iced roe he picked up from the store, mouth tight. His lusus lurches to attention, eyes fixed on Karkat as it clicks its claws. Feeling old beyond his years, Karkat wearily shakes the tray of roe as he kicks off his shoes and leads Crabdad through the house, clicking every so often whenever the lusus gets impatient and tries to snatch at the tray. Karkat yanks open the back door and flings the entire tray as far as he can. Tiny cubes of iced roe glint in the sun before landing a long line across the backyard.

With a war screech, Crabdad flings itself after them. It's fucking embarrassing, is what it is. Shaking his head, Karkat closes the door. He can't lock it or Crabdad will just freak the fuck out until Karkat lets it in. But hopefully the unwarranted dessert before dinner will keep the incompetent little shit occupied until Karkat has somehow restored the house to livable levels of cleanliness. Fortunately, he'd planned for this kind of unmitigated disaster, because Crabdad is getting fucking predictable in his old age.

Thankfully, the kitchen seems to have received the brunt of Crabdad's 'helpful' rampage, and the lusus didn't have time to upset Karkat's room. Tipping over a still-intact box in the entry way, Karkat starts sweeping everything on the floor back into the box. When the box is full, he takes it out front and dumps the contents into the already crammed trash can, and then heads back inside to repeat the process.

Soon he can actually walk on floor instead of a layer of ragged packing paper and cardboard strips, and he is in the middle of setting the fridge the right way up when the doorbell rings. Out in the backyard, Crabdad skreezes once before scrabbling at the door, frantic to get back inside. Swearing under his breath - which for Karkat implied a level of volume most people used for shouting at the top of their lungs - Karkat slams the broom into the corner and stomps his way to the door. Much to his disappointment, when he swings the door open, his mouth ready to unleash the full force of his wrath upon the unsuspecting asshole beyond, he only catches the tail end of the UPS truck as it zooms down the street, its headlights flashing a merry 'fuck you' in Karkat's general direction.

He forgives the UPS asshole a moment later when he looks down and sees the package sitting on the corner of the front porch. "Yessss," he hisses, snatching up the parcel. He throws a suspicious look from side to side, and glowers at the world as he hunches over his prize and closes the door. Cleaning up the rest of the mess can wait until tomorrow - Crabdad is only going to fuck more shit up in the morning when Karkat leaves for school - and he feels only a small stab of regret as he goes to let the lusus in, the package occupying most of his attention.

He's so preoccupied that he makes it halfway up the stairs before he realizes that it's not just the sound of his footsteps on the stairwell. Freezing, Karkat rotates his head to stare at his lusus, which has decided to follow him up the stairs. It stares right back with big eyes, letting loose a short, trilling shriek as it clacks out a question with its claws.

"No. Absolutely not. Go back downstairs," Karkat orders, glaring. He runs the rest of the way up the stairs and darts into his room.

An enormous, meaty white claw catches the door before he can close it. Crabdad screeches and waves its other claw in a wide circle, nearly knocking a lamp over in the process.

Karkat kicks at the claw on his door, rapidly losing his shit. "Oh my god. No. I do not have time for this. Go the fuck to sleep. God dammit, what the hell have I been feeding you?!!"

His kicks are having little to no effect on the lusus, who seems to think Karkat kicking at him is a hilarious game, clicking its claws playfully in return swipes. No, fuck no, this is not turning into some wriggler game of pseudo-strife with his custodian, not when said custodian is apparently of such unfathomable girth that its fat is serving as some kind of unnatural shield against damage. Karkat refuses to believe the crab's exoskeleton is this durable. No fucking way. Crabdad screeches with new volume, grating against Karkat's eardrums, and yeah, that's the last straw.

"No! Nononoo!!" Karkat screeches back, his voice hitting a shrill note he'd thought he lost the ability to make back around his second pupation. "Sleep! It's time to sleep! In your own fucking nest! Yes! Sleep!"

Crabdad warbles out another high note and tugs at the fabric of Karkat's shirt. Karkat gives the lusus a swat with the empty delivery box and drives the custodian back until he can close the door on its continued shrieks. Eventually the sound of pincers scrabbling on the door dies away and the lusus clicks away down the hall, no doubt intending to gorge itself on whatever food Karkat has failed to nail down to the cupboards. Fattass lusus.

Crabdad is definitely overdue for a new grub assignment: its custodian instincts seem more overbearing than ever in the new house. Karkat is more than ready for some peace and fucking quiet in his life.

Now then. He rips open the package with his claws, and closes the blinds in a fit of paranoia before laying out the fabrics on his desk.

Seeing the dull crimson of the smaller roll of fabric brings home that this is actually happening. He actually ordered this stuff, he paid money for it, and now it's been delivered to his house and it's all sitting on his bed, having the audacity to look like totally innocuous heaps of fabric.

Which means he can't put this off anymore. He made a resolution last week, before he'd been distracted by this sudden, inconvenient relocation to the 'burbs, and now - the nervous anticipation roiling in his stomach reads more like eagerness than terror.

He's actually doing this.

Looking down at the rolls of neoprene and other materials, Karkat decides to deal with that later, the nervey anticipation in his stomach riling him up for something else he needs to deal with, something more important than his costume. His plan is still in the beginning stages, and he's not even sure the half-pictured outfit in his mind's eye will look anything like the finished product. He just wants to order material now, and at intervals, so that no one searching records for a large order of durable, hero-typical fabric will notice him purchasing a shitton of black, grey, and crimson. It would kind of be a dead giveaway.

No, what he really needs to do is to start practicing. Right the fuck now, before Future Karkat does something idiotic like changing his mind. He knows enough martial arts to defend himself, and he already has plans to take more classes so he can reach his maximum potential as a fighter. But there's one aspect to his plans that no one can help teach him, that no one can ever even know about until he has a mask between his face and their eyes.

He has to figure out his powers. Again.

He only has vague memories of his childhood, when he'd been a lot more lax about keeping his mutations secret - past Karkat being, as usual, the embodiment of sublime idiocy, the standard by which all other examples of stupidity are measured and found wanting. But he knows it's been a good thirteen or so years since he began suppressing his talents in earnest and covering himself in so many layers of baggy fabric that even when he does get injured, the unfortunate color of his blood can be easily concealed.

So he doesn't know if he still has that same control he had as a kid. But he knows what he chose to specialize in for his strife specibi, and he's fairly certain he can use his abilities to create a weapon that can never be left lying around where someone could find it and trace it back to him, as they could with the regular sickles he keeps for practice in his closet.

He sits down on his bed, rethinks it, and then goes to the ablutions block, pacing back and forth before sitting on the counter top. He's got a kitchen knife in case he needs it, but he doesn't think he needs to get too crazy here.
Hopefully. If his powers even still work at all. Maybe his long standing wish came true, and his freaky mutant powers have vanished, right when he needs them the most. That would be a pretty fucking typical comic plotline, and probably just the kind of luck Karkat has every day of his cursed fucking life. He's already been putting this test off for a full week, his ingrained wariness about seeing even a drop of his own blood driving him to make up stupid excuses to avoid doing this.

Fuck it. No more running. Only half believing this stupid stunt is going to work, Karkat pressed a claw into the pale grey patch of skin at the base of his wrist, just above the artery that runs a dusky maroon line down the inside of his arm. The maroon is, of course, misleading; the blood that wells up slightly around the yellow of his claw is a bright, searing candy red, and Karkat only realizes he's starting to hyperventilate and flail around reaching for a towel when he has already lunged for the towel hanging on the wall, clutching his wrist in a death grip.

Sucking in breaths, Karkat forces himself to look away from the trickle of red running in a line down his palm, staring at the ceiling as he backs away from the towel. Shit shit shit, this is such a stupid idea; he can't even handle the sight of his own blood, so how does he expect to use it as a fucking weapon?

Okay, no. Fuck no, he's not wriggling out of this one, not now. "Motherfucking fuck pismaggot-eating cowardly sack of shit," he chants to himself, baring his teeth in a silent snarl as he forces himself to look down at the cut on his wrist.

As though all it needed was his attention, the blood stops trailing down his palm, and slowly, as he gnaws on his lips and pictures what he wants, it begins to reverse direction. Little globules of bright red trundle back up, a few drops even rising from the ground when he thinks to extend his focus to them.

He sinks into his veins, his awareness of the thrumming pulse of his own heartbeat overlaying the sound of his harsh breathing. Pressing in, he guides himself to his wrist, and the artery he tapped into. Instead of letting the blood pool back into his body and congeal with a scabless, unmarred surface, the way it wants to, he fights the healing instinct and directs more blood outward.

The blood emerges still wet and pulsing, his head spinning and dizzy as he leans heavily back against the countertop. The sheer amount of red is getting to him again, well-trained reflexes urging him to pull it back in because what if someone walks in right now.

Karkat grits his teeth, forgetting that his lip is still in-between his front incisors, and blood starts to trickle down his chin as he envisions the shape he wants.

A sickle. Give me a sickle, give me something to fight with. Do this. Do this because I will it.

The blood forms a shaking curve, and he hardens it with a deft thought, letting out the breath he's been holding when the thought actually works. The blood sickle is rough and unbalanced, the point is duller than a pencil eraser, and it sticks out of his wrist at the worst possible angle.

But hey. He fucking did it. Angling it this way and that, Karkat stands upright, and catches a glimpse of himself in the mirror.

It’s a good thing he does. From the corner of his eye, he can see the bright candy red luminescence burning around the edges of his rust-colored contact lenses. Forgetting the sickle, he nearly stabs himself in the throat as both hands jump up to touch his eyes in horror. He swears loudly and uses one hand to remove both lenses, laying them out on the countertop.

Both lenses are limned with bright red blood, and he leans forward to inspect his eyes themselves. A shiver of old revulsion runs down to his toes at the unnatural red of his uncovered eyes. They don't seem to be hurt when he prods at them with a claw, and when he taps into his blood sense again, he can't detect any injury. There's nothing that his body registers as needing to be healed; apparently, leaking blood from his eyes is considered a completely fucking normal process.

Wow. What is the point total now? Universe, three million and fifty two, Karkat zero? Yes. It is official. He has been fucked over by the universe yet again. Now, suddenly, he can't even hide his eyes if he goes through with this stupid plan. It has been hard enough deciding to use his obviously mutant blood to its full potential, but now -

Well. Maybe it says something about just how invested Karkat is in this insane plan that no, not even the thought of running around with his eyes uncovered is enough to scare him off.

He studies his eyes for a long moment in the mirror, blinking several time as he adjusts to the unnatural sensation of having his eyes free of contact lenses. He brings the blood sickle up, and closes his eyes against the freaky reflection in the mirror.

He opens them again with a grimace, and begins the tedious process of transforming the dull sickle from a useless piece of shit to an actually useful weapon.

And in the back of his mind, he starts thinking of names.

Something to do with blood, he thinks, a crooked smile breaking across his face.

Rose finishes cleaning up a hostage situation on 48th Street with an unintentional bang.

It is one of the few situations she cannot predict the specifics of, due to the unpredictable nature of the crime. When she is near blinded by the flare of sunlight that directs her to the bank, she only knows the situation is serious, and has the potential to escalate quickly beyond her ability to control it. Rather than teleporting directly in, she summons a palmful of swirling orange stunning spells and appears across the street from the miniature sun pulsing around the bank.

She can see from the dim glow around a troll sitting behind the wheel of a black van that he is somehow related to the criminal activity, and she strides up to him to knock on the driver's side window. He rolls it down, fangs already bared in a snarl, and she gently pats him on the cheek, letting the stunner do its work. He slumps over, and she reaches inside to unlock the car door. She opens it and removes the gun from his lap.

It is a very unsafe place for him to have kept it; she is only doing him a favor by setting it down where the police can find it under the van.

Then she turns and stiffens when she realizes just how bad the situation within the bank already is. With an impatient jerk of her hand she turns off the early crime detection logo-thaumic vision (magical copyright pending) and the blinding brilliance of the robbery in process dims until all she sees is an ordinary bank, and she can observe the scene through the large glass windows that line the front of the building.

Several figures in masks walk between the huddled forms of civilians who are crouched or lying on the floor with their hands over their heads. Seer magnifies her vision by splaying her fingers across one eye and letting magic run through her hand. Judging by the shape of the specibi carried by each robber, these are professionals; they have specialized in assault rifles and the like, and she can predict with a good amount of certainty that these are merely the guards; they aren’t demanding anything of the bank tellers behind the bullet-proof windows at the counter, merely keeping their weapons trained on key members of the crowd - the security guards, all of whom have been disarmed and lined up against a wall. This is not a good sign: it reads like a potential firing squad.

The best course of action is to knock as many out at once as possible, and disarm the rest. The priority is the firing squad goons; the men in the back stealing the actual money can wait until she has the security guards clear. Her method of approach must be immediate, and she will position herself within the security guards' bullet proof office, which will provide her with cover from stray gunfire.

Calmly, Seer sits cross legged on the sidewalk, blocking out the increased crowd volume and the sound of sirens as more people become aware of the hostage situation within the bank. Breathing in and out in a steady rhythm, Seer begins preparing the spells she will need: six stunners for immediate use, fast acting corroders for guns whose wielders she can't stun in time, and a mass shield spell for deployment over the people on the ground. With these three spell types carefully envisioned in her mind's eye, Seer rises and slides her wand into its holster. The wand is specialize for focused blasts of power; for this job, she'll need to spread her attention too much for it to be of assistance.

She breathes in one final time, and closes her eyes.

She opens them within the security guard's office. She stuns the masked troll standing beside the kicked in door with a tap on the side of his head, and then kneels to touch the floor, casting a dome of light with a height of three feet over the floor of the lobby. It is intangible to anything but bullets, a special design of her own creation, and protects most of the people on the floor. "Will the civilians please convey themselves to the doors and abscond in an orderly fashion?" she orders sweetly, smiling when all the robbers turn to gape at her.

Before they can recover she fires mobile stunners at the four criminals covering the security guards, dropping them. She hears the glass door of the bank open, and the sirens outside become near deafening in volume while people crawl out on their hands and knees. She gestures to the security guards silently, and all but one take up their strife specibi from the counter on which the robbers had stored them and begin to provide cover for the absconding civilians. The last one ducks past her with a grateful nod and answers a radio in the guard booth, responding to inquiries from the police outside.

However, in the time it took her to ensure the guards' safety, the sixth robber takes advantage of her priority on saving lives to run through the door into the back of the bank. She surveys the lobby one last time, assuring herself all potential threats here have been neutralized, and raises a small shield that only covers her body before teleporting into the back hallway.

She realizes her mistake when she opens her eyes to see a man holding a gun to the chin of a bank clerk. "Don't move, Seer!"

Seer freezes, mind moving rapidly to reassess the situation.

What she comes up with is...disturbing.

Because of course there are more bank tellers and workers at risk back here, trying to hide. Of course the second team of robbers would similarly take hostages in the event the lobby was compromised. Seer of Light is a very well-known New York City hero; any potential bank robbery would have contingencies in the event she came to stop them. Her hostage situation has always extended beyond the lobby, and she has been a fool not thinking of that.

But she is not a fool. So why? How could she have missed something so obvious? It doesn't make any sense, it's not the sort of thing the Seer of Light herself could fail to foresee, and now -
Now she is going to have to - to - (kill them all)

It is not Seer but Rose who flinches and gasps, clutching at her skull as a sudden wave of colddamp seeps up into the folds of her brain, brine leaking into her sinuses and tendrils of darkness caressing the backs of her eyes.

(no other choice now you have no other option kill the fleshlings who stand before you rip them apart-

"No," Rose gasps, tears streaming down her cheeks as she leans heavily on the wall. She can see the robber's mouth moving as he gesticulates dangerously with the gun, yelling at her, but she can't hear it. The roar of the ocean rumbles in her ears and the absolute whisper of the Void booms in her mind, both sounds she has only ever heard in the dark of night, in her meditation room. She closes her eyes, shaking her head, but all the action serves is to send water trickling icy cold down her spine, twining into her nervous system.

This is impossible. The Horrorterrors can't reach into her mind during the day, and especially not at high noon, when her light powers should be at their peak -

(he's going to kill the fleshling you care about so kill him this is the logical choice we understand rose our rose the other fleshy thing is insignificant so you don't have to kill it rose just him justhim)

Breathing air feels unnatural. Rose does it anyway. "I won't," she says, voice cracking. "Stop this, stop, we had an accord!"

She can feel her hands moving against her will, the grimdark tendrils working through her nerves until she is standing and moving forward, some unspeakable spell on her lips.

(yes we are friends aren't we rose we are buddies we will help you this is only way now because you forgot about them forgot about the little landdwellers and now you have to kill him if you want to save them-)

"You made me forget." The insight blazes in Rose's mind like sharp clarity, and her heart beat is suddenly the loudest thing in the room. Louder than the grimdark. Louder than the robber with the muzzle of his gun pressed to Rose's forehead. "You made me forget the rest of the hostages," she whispers, the anger pounding a new tempo in her brain.

And then -

And then, she has control again.

Her fingers are still smoldering with black fire when she rips them away from the robber's throat, and she can't release the charge of the spell in her palm without blowing something up, without unleashing the concentrated grimdark into something. She doesn't have time to predict the blast radius, or how the robber will react to this turn of events. She spins away from the gun muzzle and slams her blazing palm against the reinforced steel wall.

Dark cracks appear across the wall, and then everything explodes.

Rose goes flying back, feeling the crunch of her spine against the opposite wall before that too is blown back by the force of the explosion. At the last second, she rips the last of her self-control free, and casts a cushioning spell just before she hits the ground in the lobby, tumbling over and over until she hits a counter in the center of the lobby and stops. Her back screams with pain and her ribs ache when she rolls onto her side, but aside from what feels like a scrape down one side of her face and slices where shrapnel cut up her gloves, she is relatively unharmed.

If that blast had gone off against human flesh, though, it would have torn that man apart from the inside out. It would have reached in and wrapped around his bones and organs and simply twisted - Rose throws up. She hasn't eaten much today, so it's mostly bile. But there's also a tinge of black when she wipes her mouth off on her sleeve, and she shudders.

It is only when she looks up and sees that the rest of the robbers have appeared in the opening she blew through the lobby wall that she realizes she can't hear anything at all. Even the roar of the ocean has subsided. All she can hear is an intense ringing, her ears slightly bloody when she touches them.

But the Horrorterrors are gone. And at the moment, that's more important than anything else in the world. Suddenly, she can do anything.

She raises her hand, deaf to the low murmur of incantations on her own lips, and launches the corroding spells she'd prepared earlier, the pattern still fresh in her mind. In moments the robbers yelp soundlessly and drop their gun specibi while the metal corrodes hundreds of years in a matter of seconds. Now that they are thoroughly disarmed, Rose - no, she can be Seer again, she can be Light again now that the dark whispers have fled - Seer summons a trembling smirk and stuns them all, using as little power as possible. They'll only be unconscious for a few minutes, unlike the earlier robbers, whom she had put down for several hours, but better they wake up as the police arrest them than she risk something grimdark bolstering her spells unconsciously, amping the power up to the point that the robbers might not wake up at all.

No, she can't risk that. Not now. The burst of confidence subsides as Seer pulls herself upright, hugging at her ribs briefly before sucking in a breath and regaining her poise and composure. No doubt there are camera crews outside the bank by now, and she can't afford to look anything less than the serene, dignified Seer of Light in front of the camera. The Seer's reputation rests on her ability to foresee and head off major crimes and on her unflappable certainty.

So when the first police officer steps in through the door and turns to her hesitantly, his lips moving against the backdrop of ringing in Seer's ears, she simply nods at him, smiling enigmatically, and gestures toward the robbers. "All yours," she says, brushing her hair back behind her ear and adjusting her uniform so that the rips and smears of dust and debris are less noticeable. "Sorry about the wall. Things got a little out of hand. It will not happen in the future, I assure you."

Then, Seer takes the only logical option. She is not in a fit state to endure an interview with the media outside, primarily because she wouldn't be able to hear a word they were saying. Instead, she strides to the front door and steps out into the sunlight, smiling brightly and nodding to the crowd.

Before the news crews can rush the police line, she teleports out. She does not return to her base atop the Flatiron Building; instead, she reaches desperately for the comfort of home and finds it. She lands hard in a veil of light that is just a little too bright, the glow of the spell brittle and white-hot. The grass burns in a circle around her, leaving a smoldering ring of ashes when she stumbles forward and limps to the front door. She shoulders the door open and sucks in a welcome breath of the still, dusty air within the manse.

She does not know what happened today. But it is clear that she will need to spend far more time in meditation tonight. It is tempting, so tempting, to stop meditating altogether, but she has tried that before. Unfortunately, as unpleasant as interacting with the grimdark is, the consequences of ignoring the Outer Gods would be far more severe than what had happened today.

Swallowing another wave of bile curdling the back of her throat, Rose Lalonde strips off her mask and rubs at dry, aching eyes. Then she heads for the kitchen, and the wine cellar that lies beneath it.

She needs a good, strong drink.

Dave’s considering the merits of sitting on the Metro and riding it uptown a ways just to dick around when he hears gun shots. He automatically tags the sound and adds it to the beat he’s working on in his head, then races toward the origins of the booms.

Another shot rings out and he skids to a halt on the roof across from a gas station, just in time to hear a faint scream. He jumps off the edge of the roof in the next step and drops to the fire escape stairwell, falling with precise control until he hits pavement with bent knees. Then he takes off across the street, rolling over the hood of a car still in motion, and at the last moment falls into a slow pace, slouching in through the front door of the gas station with his hands in his pockets as though he’s got all the time in the world. No need to let the asshole with a gun think Dave is in a hurry to meet him.

“Hey, hands up! You too, asshat!” the gundouche yells, lowering her shitty pistol from where she shot three rounds into the ceiling to level it at Dave. Her partner in crime snaps her gum, looking bored out of her mind as she keeps her own firearm trained on the cashier’s nose. So it’s basically a hostage situation, except the hostage is strictly in an unofficial capacity, and neither girl realizes they’re about to experience justice slamming down upon them like a heavenly facepalm.

That said, why did it have to be girls? It’s stupid, but hell if it isn’t harder for Dave to hit girls than guys. It’s not like Bro is all about that southern gentleman shtick, so Dave’s not entirely sure how he developed this useless chivalry complex.

He pauses time just as the trigger happy girl’s eyes widen with panic and she pulls the trigger on reflex. He steps neatly out of the way, checks behind him along the bullet’s trajectory, and lets time go again so the bullet buries itself in the wall beside the door. He knocks the gun from her startled hands during the obligatory pause between flashsteps, and punches her square upside the chin.

He halts time once more to lower her unconscious body to the floor and steps behind a row of chips and candy, so when the girl at the register reacts by whipping her gun away from the cashier to follow his random position, he knows any shot she fires will end the short, overinflated life of a bag of chips rather than that of any of the customers flattened on the ground. Then he jumps over the row and brings the flat of the blade to her throat between one second and the next. “Drop it,” he says, meeting her eyes with his red eyes narrowed and the hand on the hilt of the sword braced to flip and cut if she tries anything stupid.

She drops the gun. “I-I’m sorry!” she stammers. “We weren’t going to hurt anyone. Please don’t kill me!”

Yeah, he doesn’t have the patience for more than a few seconds of pretty subpar apologist whining. He pops her one in the chin as well, nods once at the cashier, and then kicks both guns away from their respective criminals. He puts the swords away, and stuffs his hands back into his pockets to leave.

“You’re not going to stick around until the cops get here?” the cashier stammers, eyeing the unconscious girls nervously.

Dave has to fight the urge to raise an eyebrow; with his shades off, it’s much more difficult to present an emotionless, unexploitable straight face to the world. Until they’d started taking off their shades as part of their disguise, Dave hadn’t realize just how much he and Bro expressed behind them, the little cues that only Striders could read behind them that become obvious tells in the light of day. “Dude, they’re down for the count. Just hit ‘em with something if they start to wake up.”

Having imparted the wisdom of the ages to the cashier, Dave walks out of the gas station. Fuck yeah. Mission accomplished. He can already hear the sirens as two police cars round the corner, drawn by whatever alarm the cashier had hit under the counter.

As the cops approach and skid to a halt, Dave sighs and flashsteps away. By the time the first officer shouts, “Freeze, vigilante!” Dave is already on the rooftop again, rolling his eyes to the evening sky.

Some goddamn lucky sons of bitches get cities who embrace their resident vigilantes; the Seer of Light is practically a New York City franchise, the Lady Cascade of Los Angeles has a yearly regatta in her honor, and the Meorails over in Jacksonville are pretty much universally accepted as the most disgustingly adorable pair of heroes ever to make a living off terrible cat puns. Even Heir up Seattle way has a quiet policy of mutual non-interference with the police; as long as he’s in the air before they arrive, the cops report to the papers that Heir made several dozen citizens’ arrests in one night and conveniently ignore the whole vigilante aspect.

Then there’s Houston. Sure, Blind Justice has every Chicago legislacerator on the force clamoring for her blood, but they’re legislacerators – it’s pretty much standard operating procedure for them. For some reason Dave cannot fathom, the entirety of the Houston PD has openly named the Flashstep and the Puppeteer as their top priority for arrest.

It’s just so hilariously stupid that it loops right back around to just being fucking idiotic.

Knowing them, that entire squad will waste an hour pissing around trying to locate Dave, stubbornly refusing to acknowledge that with his ability to stop time he’s halfway across the city in a few minutes. That’s part of the reason Dave and Bro go out during the day, just to show them how very few fucks the Striders have to give.

Sometimes, it’s the little ‘fuck yous’ in life that really bring a half-smile to a hero's face.

Dave stops for lunch and a badly needed water break at noon, eating a motherfucking chicken salad from Trader Joe’s on the roof of a parking garage, then loses track of time. This happens a lot; for someone whose power relates to time, he finds it easy to lose himself in the seemingly endless afternoon. Probably all the accidental time stopping when he was a kid did a number on his internal timer. He always knows exactly what time it is, down to the millisecond, but he just can’t bring himself to care about the time slipping away.

All he knows is that when he next blinks and looks up at the sun, it’s halfway to setting, the sky burnished orange and red, and his hand throbs with a dull pain from where he may or may not have broken a knuckle smashing it into a car jacker’s smug face. Yeah, he probably should have known better than to punch a troll head on. It’s harshing on his sicknasty beats.

Shoving the injured hand into a pocket, Dave starts jumping toward home. He should probably pick up some actual food from the convenience store – fuck, Bro going grocery shopping, even ironically, would probably be a sign of the apocalypse. Adjusting his course, Dave locates the nearest CVS-knockoff and lands noiseless on the fire escape. The ladder barely even rattled. Flawless landing. He flashsteps his way down the stairs and crawls down the ladder. He already knows he’s heading
He turns around and only then does he realize there’s actually a crime in progress at the back of the alley and holy fuck how did he miss that.

“What,” he says, waiting for his brain to catch up while he stares at the five figures fighting in the shadows. A tall woman presses up against the shadows of the wall. A wide-brimmed hat obscures her face, and her body is wrapped in a tight black trench coat that makes about as much sense in the late Houston evening heat as Dave’s elaborate suit jacket does. The four assailants are ranged around the woman in a rough circle, each with strife specibi at the ready. It’s an even split between trolls and humans. The really weird thing is, they’re all wearing heavy black suits. All of them, even the female troll.

Four seems a little much for a case of robbery. Four people in suits in 85 degree heat is downright bizarre. But hey, not like Dave’s complaining. He keeps the fucked-up hand tucked into his pocket and draws a sword with the other. “Should probably leave the lady alone, asshats,” he says, kicking a rock out of his path as he strides toward the tense group.

The brim of the hat raises, and he has a direct line of sight on her face. For an instant he wonders if he’s seeing things, if the summer heat has finally cracked his brain open to fry like a yolk on the pavement, because the lady is black as night with slitted eyes as pale as bone, and that’s not skin, it’s a carapace. He sees her hands flowing in a series of motions that are definitely not ASL, but the words bloom in his mind like black, cold ink skimming over his brain.

??: Oh, do feel free to jump in if you wish. But I can more than take care of ones such as these.

“You get one last chance,” another of the assailants begins, and that must be the cue for the battle music to start, because the carapacian dame reaches out and quite calmly grips his hair and slams his face into the wall three times.

By the time she lets go, the guy’s face is a bloody pulp, and he slides to the ground unconscious. The other four black-suited assailants flinch away, clearly taken aback by the sudden violence, which Dave can totally sympathize with because damn. The carapacian draws a long, thin-bladed knife and tilts her head to the side, beckoning the others on.

??: Come on then, if you think you’re hard enough. I will rend you like the benighted worms that you are.

The male troll flips the fuck out and lunges at the carapacian with a hoarse roar. And maybe the lady can take care of herself, but the troll has probably a hundred pounds of pure muscle on her, so Dave stops time with a twist of his injured hand and darts in close, cracking the hilt of his sword against the guy’s temple.

The carapacian is staring right at him. Even as he watches in that breath before time restarts, she blinks and smirks.

She moves.
Time rushes back in. The force of the blow catches up with the male troll and he goes crashing sideways into the wall, slumped over just as unconscious as the first man. Dave then lashes out with his sword to ward off the third assailant, who turns to attack him with a small cudgel in hand. One time stop later and the guy is on the ground with a slash down his left side and a stabbing hole in his palm, gritting his teeth against the pain as Dave wipes the blood off his sword. These guys are dressed weirdly, but they’re not really a challenge.

While Dave is occupied, he can still see the carapacian dame as she whirls in a fluid circle to knock the last troll’s glancing blow aside, kicking out with a slim leg to yank the troll’s legs out from under her. She stabs the thin blade into the girl’s side before kicking her unconscious, inspecting the upwelling of teal blood soaking the troll’s suit with clear disdain.

“Don’t suppose you’re gonna want the police called,” Dave says, trying to judge just how serious the troll girl’s wound is from here. Bro drilled him on how to inflict nonfatal but debilitating sword wounds all through his childhood because killing people is the opposite of cool, but the carapacian clearly has no such qualms.

Fuuuck. Is she a bad guy? Did he just help the bad guy take out four possibly totally innocuous passersby in the heat of the moment? Logic is telling him the four had drawn their weapons first and were clearly threatening the carapacian about – something – but Dave’s mind does this thing where it gets stuck on a tangent and won’t shut the fuck up. It’s great for coming up with nonsensical raps, but awful when he just want it to stop winding itself up in knots of confused, morbid fascination and fucking focus.

??: No, I do not.

The carapacian seems to have noticed his mental disarray, her hollow eyes crinkled perhaps with a silent chuckle.

??: They are the heavy-handed efforts of a foolish man trying to convince me to join him in a business venture of questionable legal repute. Naturally, I refuse to negotiate with such lowly pawns.

“Yeah. Of course. Naturally,” Dave deadpans as he puts his sword away. If this lady was going to attack, she’d have tried it already.

??: Your assistance is appreciated.

??: I am glad to have met you at last, Dave.

The hair on the back of Dave’s neck pricks and he rips his sword back out. Fuck. Fucking fuck.

“What the fuck did you just say. Who the fuck are you?”

The carapacian isn’t concerned by Dave’s fighting stance or the high-strung tension he’s giving off in waves. She has put away her own knife, but he’s seen how fast she can move. Not as fast as Bro, but with enough skill that she could take him off guard.

??: An ally, perhaps.

??: An answer for an answer, Dave. Why did you stop time that way? It is…inefficient.

“How do you know my name?” Dave grits out, the metal collar burning against his throat.

??: That is not how an exchange works.

She shows no sign of answering the question, waiting with a talon on her hip for a response. A bead of sweat drips down the side of Dave’s face, stinging his eye, but he’s too tense to wipe it away, keeping his sword leveled at the carapacian’s throat. When the pause lasts long enough, tension growing a pulsing headache behind Dave’s ears, he answers. “Because – fuck – because that’s the only way to stop time. At least for me. That’s how the powers work. How do you know me? What do you want?”

??: I have always known your name, Dave Strider.

And that…is just weird enough that Dave lets the sword fall, completely and utterly dumbfounded. “Okay that’s a great answer except for how it answers nothing at all and fuck, you know my last name.”

The carapacian chuckles.

??: I’m sure you can figure out the answer on your own, in time. But for now I have other matters to attend to. Meeting you at last has been most fortuitous, but I am afraid it has happened at a bad moment.

??: But I give you this last boon – some advice, as a token of my gratitude. Your power is more than you know. Stopping time is merely the first step, but it is an unnatural step. Time will most likely fight you if you attempt to hold it too long. If you truly wish to attain your full strength, I advise you to stop pausing it at all.

??: Time is not meant to be stopped. It is meant to flow. And you, Dave Strider – you have the ability to flow with it. To alter the course of the flow itself.

??: I do wish you all the best.

??: Now then. Tah, love.

“Wait, seriously, what,” Dave gets out. Then there is a swishing sound and the shadows behind the carapacian rush forward holy shit. The carapacian smirks as she falls back into the darkness, completely unconcerned about the fact the wall has just decided she’s the main course of one fucked up buffet. “Who are you?” Dave says, but the shadows finish swallowing the carapacian whole and settle back against the wall.

“What. The. Actual. Fuck.” One of the assailants still on the ground moans and stirs, and Dave kicks him in the temple to keep him down, not taking his eyes off the shadowed wall.

She never had told him just who the fuck she was. But there’s no doubt in his mind that this mysterious dame is a total Badass. A Badass Quandary, if you would.

Shuddering and sheathing the sword in one motion, hunching his shoulders defensively as he does, Dave scans the pile of criminals one last time and leaves the alleyway, looking for another fire escape to climb that isn’t attached to a people-eating shadow wall. He walks by the convenience store, pauses to deliberate with himself for a few long minutes, and then trudges back, edging his way inside. The old guy behind the counter has been working there as long as Dave can remember. His name is Gerald and he barely rolls his eyes at the sight of Dave in costume. “AJ’s in a new place by the coffee, Mr Flashstep,” he says before flipping his paper open once more.

Gerald grunts and pulls the phone off the receiver without looking, unfazed by Dave’s news. Dave can’t remember how many time he’s reported the unconscious bodies of criminals to the people behind the counter here. Apparently the novelty factor of having a hero visit your store once a week runs out after a few years.

Dave grabs his juice and a couple frozen pizzas and pays with cash before trudging back out, significantly more laden down. It’s officially night now, and he forgoes the rooftops until he’s almost back to the apartment, using the time to mull over the weirdass encounter with the carapacian. Then he flashsteps wearily up the fire escape of an adjacent building, feeling the mental strain that’s built up over nearly twelve hours of crime-fighting and time-stopping sap at his strength.

When he reaches the roof, bags in hand, he ducks under the AC and retrieves his sunglasses, his whole body slumping with relief once he has the protective shades between him and the world. He sees that Bro’s glasses are still underneath. Whatever. He’ll show up when Dave has finished heating up the first pizza just to fuck with him and eat all the crust and then hog the bathroom for one of his marathon endless showers.

As luck might have it, this is pretty much exactly what happens. Bro is unscratched and looks completely unaffected by the day’s work when he finally shows up, yoinking a pizza slice out of Dave’s hand without even looking at him. Lil Cal appears atop the refrigerator, as glassy eyed and smiling as ever.

Dave grimaces at the puppet. He’d been down with the puppet when he was a little kid, but in recent years he has realized that Cal is just plain creepy, the kind of creepy that smiles down on you with unblinking eyes while you struggle and squirm through life like the miserable little fleshcreature you are.

He should probably mention the carapacian now. Usually the Striders don’t talk about work – hell, they don’t really talk much at all, with good reason – but something as huge as a random alien dame knowing Dave’s real name and vanishing into the shadows should probably be stated for the record. It did not mean that actual conversation had to take place. Just a quick, offhanded mention –

Dave swallows his AJ too fast and nearly chokes. The words are on the tip of his tongue, the metal collar around his neck tight as a noose, and when Bro gives him a sweeping, bored-but-curious look, Dave swallows down what he had been about to say.

Bro ruffles Dave’s hair as he walks to his room, and Dave is left sitting alone at the shitty kitchen table. He tries to imagine finishing the piece of pizza in his hand, but the thought of all that grease just makes him feel kind of nauseous. Food does that sometimes, when he hasn’t eaten in a while and he’s past the point where the hunger actually hurt. He crams it in anyway and swallows, reaching up and unclipping the collar from his throat. He tosses it on the table and scrubs a hand through his hair, trying to figure out why the fuck he had just not mentioned the Badass Quandary. At the very least he should get Bro’s opinion on how to deal with such a massive breach of their secret identities.

He doesn’t. Instead, he shoves the leftover pizza in the fridge for later and slouches into his own room, stripping off the last of his costume as he goes. He gets into the same sleep clothes from that morning and sits down at the computer, staring unseeingly at the screen and ignoring the little flicker of a Pesterchum window at the bottom.

He’s…not going to tell Bro. It takes him a minute for his brain to really process the thought, and then he knows why.

Because he maybe, just once, he wants something in his life to be completely his own. He wants to investigate the Quandary by himself, independent of Bro Strider, and maybe he wants to take her advice about the whole time travelling thing, and maybe he’s actually more intrigued by her knowledge of his name than rightfully worried, now that he’s had time to process the shock of it all.
Having settled that in his mind, he smiles and plugs in his headphones, setting up a playlist of his own mixes and zoning out as he settles in to draw some shitty comics and answer his one chum.

Hell yeah, secret shenanigans. Hell fucking yeah.

The rest of the day passes in a pleasant blur; none of John's classes are doing anything more strenuous the first day of school other than going over the syllabi, and Karkat shares all but two of his class periods. Sure, Karkat isn't exactly much of a talker when he's intently reading ahead in the textbooks instead of listening to the teacher, but that doesn't stop John from sitting next to the troll and passing him notes from time to time just to see Karkat's exasperated glares of impotent fury.

The thing is, John is learning to catch the faint hints of amusement that barely touch the corners of Karkat's permafrown, the way he doesn't just stand up and walk away despite how outright annoying John knows he's being. When John suggests they eat lunch outside together, Karkat has every opportunity to say no and sit with another group of people; instead, with another faint not-smile, he agrees, and they spend the lunch break outside under John's favorite tree, chatting about nothing important at all.

If this is a friendship, it's going to be an odd one, one that builds in the spaces between classes, in the oblique smiles that don't quite make it to Karkat's face.

It's wonderful.

John walks home in a better state of mind than he's had in - too long. The breeze actually billows up through his shirt at one point, sensing his ridiculous excitement and tugging in an attempt to get him to celebrate in the air, and he has to flail madly to flatten his shirt back down, glancing wildly from side to side in a search for possible witnesses. Thankfully, no one seems to have noticed the wind's slip up.

However, the brief lapse in John's control dampens his mood a little, especially as he turns the corner and his house comes into view. His dad's car isn't parked outside yet, but he should be home in a few hours, maybe sooner. Dad had talked about coming home early in case...the first day hadn't gone well.

And yeah, John is totally grateful that his dad cares about him that much! Of course he is! But now, when his dad comes home, John is going to have to tell him that he's made a friend in Karkat Vantas, and John is just a little nervous about how well his dad will take it.

This has always been the price of the good John does as Heir. He’s never been able to make time for friends outside of school, not even during the summer months. No conceivable excuse can explain away how John occupies nearly 90% of his time with training and duties he can never share with anyone. He’d been friends with Rose, back in middle school, before his dad had really picked up the pace of his training in anticipation for John’s fighting debut, but then she had moved all the way to New York and John had found himself in a limbo, all of his friends made through Rose gradually dropping away, with no time or opportunity to reach out on his own.

By the end of last year he’d only had people from the swim team he could sit with at lunch, not because they were really friends, but more out of a sense of team camaraderie. He'd ended up eating outside on his own, because it was just easier than dealing with the hesitant dance of glancing over an entire cafeteria full of people he barely knew. And at least outside, he'd had the breeze to fluff up his hair in comforting gusts of sympathetic understanding.
And. Fuck. John can't go through another year like last year. He can't. The very thought makes his stomach lurch, and bile rises up in the back of his throat.

He can't handle being so alone anymore.

So if his dad says it isn't safe to be friends with Karkat - John doesn't know what he's going to do. It's going to royally suck, okay? The worst part of it all is that John already knows and has had the reasons why having a close friend is a bad idea drilled into him since he was five years old. Rose had been a pre-approved potential friend, who knows why. But Karkat will definitely be a potential target if John's heroic secret identity is ever discovered. And John doesn't want Karkat to be in danger, but on the other hand, he wants to be friends with Karkat a whole lot. Enough to take that risk.

He's just going to have to convince his dad of that.

Piece of cake!

Oh god this is not a piece of cake this is the opposite of cake this is spinach quiche or something why did John think he could do this -

"John. You've barely touched your meal. Do you have something you need to talk about, son?"

John looks up from his bowl of chicken salad and accompanying plate of whole wheat pasta, sure that the haunted expression on his face has been more than enough to tip his dad off to his troubled state of mind. "Uh, yeah. I do," he says, fiddling with his fork. He stops himself from gnawing on his lip, and settles himself inwardly. Focus. He can do this.

He meets his dad's eyes. "I made a friend at school today."

The silence over the table lasts just a fraction of a second too long. John can feel his stomach collapsing in on itself in hollow despair even as he watches his dad for any reaction. Samuel Egbert doesn't look angry or stern, just thoughtful, but that only means his logic, when it comes, will be well-thought out and irrefutable, and then John's first friendship in two years will be over -

"I see. I'm sure you put a lot of thought into this kind of decision, John. I trust you." His dad smiles at him, his eyes crinkled reassuringly.

John's mouth falls open, and for a long moment he has to slam down on his innate connection to the wind and grip the edge of the table with both hands shaking, because otherwise he's going to go flying out the window and start doing some celebratory cartwheels a few meters above his house. That kind of thing is a no-no, for obvious reasons.

"I - yeah." John smiles back, his grin so wide his lips feel like they're tearing a bit at the edges. He starts eating in earnest now, chattering about Karkat between huge bites. "His name is Karkat! Karkat Vantas! We're in a lot of the same classes together, and we have the same lunch period. So, I can see him a lot every day, and I don't think I have to worry as much about not being able to meet him after school, because he seems pretty busy too. So, I think I can make it work."

His dad nods throughout all of John's sometimes stuttering, sometimes too-loud rant, and keeps smiling. A little more of the nervous tension eases out of John with every passing moment that his dad doesn't shoot this idea down. "That's good, son. I'm glad you've found someone you can connect with."
"Yeah. He's new at school, and he seems kind of angry a lot of the time, but I think we get along okay. Or at least he didn't try to run away when I kept talking to him." John smiles when a memory of one of Karkat's many furiously despairing frowns returns to him.

There's a note of hesitation in his dad's voice when he speaks, and John understands why when he hears the full question. "Son...will this help you? Do you think this will prevent something like last year?"

That...yeah. John should have been expecting that. He shovels the last of the salad into his mouth to keep from responding, chewing and swallowing deliberately while he tries not to feel guilty about being the cause of that solemn, anxious look on his dad's face. "I don't know," he says at last, because he's learned after last year that he has to be honest about this. He can't lie to his dad; it just lets things build up until John can't handle them anymore. "I think so. I didn't feel all that claustrophobic today after I started talking to him. I hope I just needed a friend as an outlet. But one day isn't enough to judge by, I think."

Thankfully, his dad just nods in response. "I understand. Thank you for being honest with me, champ."

By the time they finish dinner and start cleaning up the dishes, John feels a lot more even-keel. Now that he's not freaking out over the whole Karkat thing anymore, he can let himself relax into the usual rhythm of their father-son dinner routine. When there's nothing on John's mind, there's just something inherently relaxing about being around his dad.

John fills the sink with hot water and dish soap and begins scrubbing on autopilot, handing the cleaned dishes off to his dad by his side to dry. In these brief moments a pleasant buzz fills his head instead of the usual swift analysis and careful self-censorship necessary to maintain his secret identity every minute of the day, and he can think of nothing at all but the clink of dishware and the warm awareness of his only family standing beside him.

Part of him still has to focus beyond the quiet calm on keeping the air around him calm and still; more than once in his childhood the sheer happiness of being around his dad had led to unfortunate mishaps in public playgrounds. The wind likes it when John is happy, and wants to frolic and tug at him to express that joy with action. John is so used to curtailing the instinctive rush of wind that it barely registers anymore when he’s around his dad. He’s had to learn how to manipulate the wind for battle and flight mostly on his own, not just because flying isn’t exactly in a Marine’s repertoire, but because he’d been so unable to focus properly around Samuel as a kid that training proved impossible.

Not that he could really remember those early attempts, of course, but the sheer number of near misses and barely-avoided accidental sightings of a kid flying ten feet off the ground because his dad had been proud of him had been significant enough – and amusing enough, in retrospect – that Dad has shared the stories numerous times, particularly around birthdays.

"Go ahead, son. I'll finish up here," Dad says as the last of the light leaves the sky. He reaches over to turn on the kitchen’s overhead light and takes one of the last uncleaned dishes from John so he can take over. John feels the pleasant buzz leave his mind, and grins, drying his hands and running up the stairs three at a time. His heart pounds dizzyingly in his chest, little wisps of breezes slipping around his wrists and tousling his hair in reaction to his excitement.

Once in his room, he carefully removes a worn but loved poster of Captain America – one of his favorite fictional heroes – from the wall, laying it gently on the bed. Behind its usual position on the wall sits a metal safe, and he fishes out the two keys from their usual places. One he has hidden in a careful pouch underneath the bedside table drawer; the other he wears around his neck beneath his shirt. Even if one is ever taken – say when he has to remove the shirt key for swim practice – it would be useless to any potential thief or snoop without knowledge of the second key and the seven digit key code known only to John and his dad. Sliding each key into their respective locks and thumbing in the key code, John swings the safe open.

He’s been wearing variations of this same basic costume for so long, he takes him mere moments to change into the plain neoprene suit, check and recheck the Kevlar weave for holes, buckle on the arm guards and pouches, and pull on the steel grey boots and gloves. He pulls the goggles on over his head with a pop, barely needing to adjust them, and then yanks the thin nylon mask up over the bottom half of his face. By the time he slings Casey across his back, the heavy weight of the war hammer barely registering as a light thump, John thrums with anticipation, the wind practically a gale force dragging him toward the window, stirring the carefully pinned posters on the wall and ruffling the pages of his textbooks.

He needs to be gone, needs it, a bone-deep desire that’s as close to terror as it is to desperate longing. Dragging his hood up over his head at the last minute, John plants one boot on the window sill and kicks off.

And finally, finally, for the first time in nearly fourteen hours, lets go.

He’s never known what it feels like to fall, but Rose had described it to him once, how the fear of heights and falling worked for those who felt it. She said it is because when a normal person falls, they have no control, no way to stop themselves from feeling a lurch in their gut that says gravity has them, and no chance of surviving a fall from anything higher than perhaps twenty feet without severe injury. She had described the sensation of having one’s stomach drop out from under them, and John had experienced it for himself one blisteringly hot day years ago, at an amusement park during the summer with a parasol-toting Rose at his side, when they had decided to ride a rollercoaster.

But he just can’t associate that half-remembered, sickening drop with flying. All he feels as the night wind wraps around him and he shoots up into the sky is joy. His hoods rips off in a flurry of wind as his speed increases, the breeze responding to the ecstasy singing through his veins with renewed energy.

The drive from Maple Valley to Seattle is forty minutes on a good day; John makes it in five. As he hovers over the glowing city, he begins to pull the wind back in, using calming breathing patterns his dad had taught him to slow his racing heart and bring the irrepressible joy of flying back under control, until it is barely a niggling hum.

Within moments, John is in hero mode, the winds streaming around him in sleek, controlled waves that do no more than support him in midair. He has a job to do, duties to attend to. He can’t just let the breeze run wild while he’s on patrol; it would be unprofessional and distracting.

Having settled down, John begins his patrol, drifting over the city in a grid formation with his eyes scanning the ground intently. He pays close attention to dark alleys and other trouble spots whenever he passes over, but he pays more attention to the gentle pressure of the wind as it wafts him through the air. Nine times out of ten, the breeze alerts him to criminal activity before he even sees it himself. It can be difficult to interpret the wind’s will, but it almost always leads him where he needs to go.

For example, right now. A faint curl of air tightens around his wrist, a murmur of urgency brushing up against his ears. John focuses, letting the sense of unerring direction guide him as he urges a little more speed from the winds pulling him along. The breeze tugs him over to an alleyway near the center of the city, and he lands on a cushion of air atop the roof nearby, peering over the edge to assess the situation.
It looks like a fairly standard mugging; three men with strife specibi in hand have a single man backed up against the wall. The victim is shaking his head, most likely in some stubborn, foolhardy attempt to deny the muggers whatever they're asking for. He's going to end up shanked if he isn't careful.

Bluhhhh. As though Heir would actually let that happen! Grinning, Heir checks to make sure his hood is in place and then steps off the edge of the building. He floats down, arms crossed as he comes to a halt hovering just a little above the ground. "Hey, guys?" he says, clearing his throat. All three muggers spin to face him, and he waves, still smiling. "Sorrrrry, I can't let you do this. I just don't condone this kind of criminal activity. I don't suppose you'd be willing to give up now and come quietly? Turn yourselves in, and no one gets hurt."

The mugger on the left tries to shoot him. The blast echoes in the enclosed alleyway, loud in Heir's ears. Between one second and the next the wind rushes forward in his defense, howling as it wraps around the bullet and Halts it, the bullet flattening out against a solid wall of dense air just inches from Heir's forehead. Heir flicks his fingers to the side, and the spent bullet falls to the ground with a clink. "Wow. Rude. Not okay, guys. Not okay," he tells the muggers, all of whom have gone pale. Apparently, these guys missed the memo on what happens to criminals who cross the Heir of Breath.

Heir cracks his knuckles and sets to work. The moment these guys threatened one of the citizens under Heir's protection, they earned a nonrefundable ticket for a righteous asskicking. He disarms the one with a gun first, ripping it from the mugger's trembling hand with ease and sending it flying into the dumpster nearby where no one else can grab it. The man tries to pull a fistkind next, but he's clearly not well trained in hand-to-hand strife; Heir dodges to one side, swaying easily around the man's very obvious pattern of attacks, then darts around to hit him in the back with a broad swathe of wind. One last kick to the temple, his strength carefully adjusted so as to not break the guy's head open, and the mugger falls forward on his face, unconscious.

Heir ducks under the next mugger's swinging blow, and palmheels him in the chin with an accompanying blast of air that tosses him against the wall. By the time he rounds on the last mugger, one eyebrow raised, the guy is sweaty and pale, his knife almost slipping out of his grasp.

And then he turns and runs away.

Heir scratches his head, and put his hands around his mouth to amplify the sound. "Uh, running away wasn't an option! Hey! Hey? Mister?"

The mugger just keeps running.

"Seriously, man. I'm not letting you just abscond from justice!"

...Still running.

"Soooo rude," Heir huffs. He twists his hand and clenches it in a fist. The air around the fleeing criminal's feet lashes in a sudden gale, knocking him off balance. The mugger hits the ground hard with his chin and doesn't get up, even when Heir floats over to nudge him in the side and make sure he's breathing. Whelp. That was...kind of anticlimactic.

Oh well. Heir shrugs his shoulders and zipties the mugger's hands together, then floats back over to the mugging victim, trying and failing to calm himself down enough to just walk. He gets that the whole flying thing can weird people out, but he can't help it sometimes, honestly - when his adrenalin is up and pumping, the wind doesn't want to let him go.
Thankfully, this guy turns out to be a fan. A major fan. "That was awesome!" he yells when Heir gets close enough, all of his fear vanished now that the muggers are unconscious. He continues to babble as Heir cuffs the other two muggers and dumps them all bodily in the dumpster, and is absolutely euphoric when Heir asks him to stick around to wait for the police and make sure he testifies so they'll be arrested and not just released immediately.

Normally Heir would stick around until the police actually arrive in person, but after the first five minutes of nonstop, fawning chatter, he's just plain uncomfortable. "I'm just going to wait up there. You'll be totally safe," he assures the almost-victim, and then he takes off in a single bound, not really waiting for an answer. He settles down on the edge of the roof and sits with his legs swinging over the void, his chin resting on his hand as he observes the scene below. He replays it in his head a few times, a play by play looking for any mistakes he might have made, any fighting stances that could use some extra practice. He thinks he did well, but there's always room for improvement, right?

Anyway. When the cops arrive, the guy below flags them down, and Heir waves at the one cop who thinks to look up and check the skyline. He gets a stern nod in return, which is always cool, and then he lets the wind whisk him up into the air, tugging him up gently until he's high enough that the city spreads itself out beneath him, a glittering array of glowing lights, moving cars, and dark shadows. A faint grin still playing on his lips, the Heir of Breath guards his city.

And if he indulges in a few midair cartwheel and backflips, well, it's not as though anyone can see to judge him.

Vladivostok, Primorsky Krai, off the coast of Eastern Russia

A pair of Russian fishermen sit, mostly apathetic to the cold as they keep watch and huff quietly on cigarettes. When later questioned, they would state that they were busy cleaning the last of the previous day's work off the deck. Instead they chat between cigarettes and rub their gloved hands together to keep warm, the flickering gleam of the lighter casting their faces in half-shadow.

To say that they are unprepared for the boat to suddenly jolt and tilt dangerously to one side in a sudden upswelling of water is an understatement. They both roll off their perches and crash against a strapped down stack of equipment. The entire boat – not in the best shape to begin with – groans in protest, and the two men can only cling to the railing, the dark belly of the ocean yawning beneath them until, at last, the boat settles back in the water, uncapsized.

One makes the sign of the cross against his chest, his cigarette still clamped between clenched teeth, and mutters a belated Lord’s prayer. The other, his coat hood fallen back, gets to his feet and stares up at the fifty-foot tall, pure white squid that has just emerged from the sea. Its heavy mantle hangs slightly to one side, unsupported by the water. The enormous lusus opens its beak, screeches loud enough to rock the boat, and begins slowly drifting through the water, heading south.

"как это могло опять случиться?" one man says, shaking his head as the mutant lusus slouches away.

"Серьёзно. удачи, Япония." The other spits out the ruined cigarette in his mouth, takes out another, and lights it up. There is no doubt in either man's mind where a giant sea monster from the Pacific could possibly be heading, and so they contemplate the lusus’s sluggish trek south in a companionable silence until the irate captain stumbles up on deck to demand to know what the hell just happened.
"You've got to be fucking kidding me!" someone in the crowd yells. "Why am I even surprised?!
"Another man sighs and walks over to the nearest public bulletin board, and swaps out the number under "Number of Days Without a Giant Sea Lusus Invasion" from ten to zero. Nine tenths of the crowd simply whip out their smart phones and begin recording as the enormous pale squid paddles its way through Tokyo Bay and onto dry land. It flails a tentacle, and then flops over onto a street, writhing weakly when someone crawls up onto a lightpole and begins filming it from a safe distance.

"Yes, we have a squid-morph lusus naturae encroaching on sector 4," a police officer says over the radio. "A possible rogue from an aquatic retirement preserve. Yes, please see if we can request a violet-blood's presence as soon as convenient. Thank you." The officer walks in closer and watches the squid's frantic motions, sighing and shaking her head. Aquatic lusii are harder to keep contained in their retirement preserves, but for a lusus of this gigantic size to have escaped, it could only have come from the poorly maintained Dalni Vostok preserve off the coast of Russia.

Again.

One day, the government is really going to have to petition Moscow to start paying for these fiascos. Between the exorbitant cost of tranquilizing each near-feral giant sea lusus and the additional expense of then housing it in the Tokyo Aquatic Reservation for the rest of its natural life, Russia must surely owe Japan trillions.

But of course, no one asks a lowly police officer how to handle foreign relations. They just send her in to clear the area around the giant monster incursions and wait for backup.

That's when a small fighter jet lands on the roadway, barely twenty feet from the white squid's mantle.

"No you fool, you don't have room to taxi!" the earlier irate man in the crowd screeches, sounding nearly hysterical. The plane proceeds to prove him wrong, the thrusters in the back flipping around to face forward and bring the entire machine to a near-silent halt. The green flames die down and the plane taxis to a calm standstill just a few feet from the police officer, the whole braking procedure having finished in a mere fifty feet. "THAT'S NOT EVEN FUCKING POSSIBLE!" the man protests before he breaks down into sobbing tears.

"Yeah, Control? We have an unidentified retrofitted British fighter plane that just landed next to me." The police officer listens to the questioning response over the radio. "Looks to be nuclear powered, sir. Probably unrelated to the lusus incident. Please send for the British ambassador and the Sailor Senshi squad, in the event the pilot self-identifies as a villain. Thank you."

The dome of the pilot compartment slides back, and a girl in aviator glasses and a green headscarf pops up. "Hey there! Do you need some help with that?" she asks, grinning, her teeth bright against her dark face. "You have a giant monster on the road!"

"We are aware of the situation, yes. You get used to it after a while." The officer takes out her notepad and clicks open a pen. "May I ask for your name, country of origin, and whether or not you have any intent to commit acts of villainy, mass property destruction, and/or grand larceny during your visit to Tokyo?"

"Ohhh! Sharpshooter, none, and no, hopefully not!" the girl chirps. "That's my codename, you know! Having a hero name is still a thing, right? My grandpa said having one was important if I wanted to be a hero, but he also thought the Internet was a newfangled instrument of German propaganda when he was having a bad day."

"Ah, you identify as a hero. Excellent." The police officer nods. She takes out her radio and cancels the order for the Sailor Senshi. Then she bows politely to the hero. "Unfortunately, I must ask you to remove your unregistered aircraft from Japanese soil before our lusus naturae task force arrives. You have parked within one hundred feet of a major aquatic lusus incursion, and we will need the road you are parked on in order to position the cranes and the tranquilizing tanks."

"Why do you need all that? I bet between me and Bec, we can move Mister Squiddle back into the water, no problem!" The girl whistles, and grins as a large white wolf sticks its head up beside hers, sticking its nose into the side of her neck.

The police officer has to squint at the wolf, slightly thrown off. "Is - is that a lusus?"

"Nooooo~" the girl says, pursing her lips. "It's Becquerel! He doesn't have a code name yet. He still hasn't decided on one he likes."

"Of course not."

"Anyway, yeah! You just need the big guy back in the water, right? We can totally help with that!"

"While we appreciate heroic assistance in the event of any violent lusii incursions, it would appear this lusus is merely senile, rather than actively violent. The lusus naturae task force is on its way, and then this lusus will need to be tranquilized before it is taken to the deep sea preserve, located several hundred meters offshore. Unfortunately, unless you have mega-elephant dose tranquilizers and a very strong propulsion system on that plane, you would be unable to manage it."

"Eheheh, don't worry! Definitely not a problem!" The girl vanishes back down into the pilot compartment.

When she emerges, the aviator goggles and headscarf are gone. She's in a skin tight black and dark green body suit, with a white lab coat over top that doesn't quite fit her right. She has a set of noise-deadening headphones on, presumably to block out the sound from the massive rifle slung over her shoulder, and a pair of thick glasses with an attached telescopic lens on the right eye. A spiral pattern combined with a duplex crosshair sniper scope pattern is sewn into a patch on her right sleeve.

She's also floating in midair.

"Great. We've got a flier over here," the police officer mutters into her radio.

The wolf hovers up to fly next to her, crackling with green fire, and for a moment the police officer isn't sure if it is just that the wolf's fur covers its eyes, or if the wolf is, in fact, eyeless.

"She also has a flying wolf sidekick," she adds, and then she ducks down behind the guard rail, because like hell is she getting between a flying super hero, her possibly radioactive blind flying wolf, and a still flailing giant sea monster.

"Ready, Bec?" Sharpshooter calls. The wolf lets its tongue loll out of its mouth, then vanishes in a flash of bright, caustic green. When the police officer next locates the canine, she sees it has taken up residence on the mantle of the giant squid, tongue still hanging out of its mouth as it pants and tilts its head to the side, awaiting further instruction. Sharpshooter brings the rifle - no, not a rifle, it's a massive dart gun, where did she even get that? - the dart gun up, bring her telescopic lens down over the right side of her glasses, and takes aim. She pulls the trigger and the recoil sends her floating back a bit. She just laughs a little too loudly, occasionally snorting and clapping a hand over her nose
The dart hits the squid dead on and disappears in the mantle. Presumably, Sharpshooter manages to hit the mantle artery, because within a few minutes, the squid stops trying to feebly raise a tentacle to brush off the white wolf and just passes out, the mantle deflating even more than it already had when the lusus heaved itself out of the water.

Up above, Sharpshooter pulls out a handheld computer, tapping at it thoughtfully with the dart gun slung over her back. "You said you wanted Mr Squiddles in a deep sea preserve?"

"The lusii preserve, yes," the police officer shouts back.

"The one called Tōkyō Suisei Yasei Dōbutsu Hogo-ku on the Google map?"

"Okie dokey! I have the coordinates right here. Bec! 35° 0'13.85"N and 142°27'12.83"E!"

Sharpshooter makes a rectangular box with the thumb and forefinger of each hand, squints through the box with her tongue sticking slightly out between her teeth, and then gives the wolf a thumbs up. She floats down to land beside Becquerel and there is a pause. The air hums and vibrates after a second, and the police officer feels her ears pop as a large amount of air is suddenly displaced.

The squid is also displaced, along with the girl hero and her wolf.

"Oh dear," the police officer says. After all three fail to reappear after nearly five minutes, she removes her radio from its holster and prepares to cancel the lusus naturae team and contact the deep sea preserve in the faint hopes that the squid lusus actually made it there in one piece. If they've actually lost a sea lusus on her watch, it is coming out of her yearly review, she can feel it.

- At the coordinates 35° 0'13.85"N, 142°27'12.83"E, somewhere a good ways away from the Tokyo coastline, Jade Harley lands with a splash on top of a tranquilized squid-type lusus in the middle of the Pacific Ocean. She whoops loudly, laughing when a wave of saltwater crashes over the side of the lusus and splashes Becquerel. The wolf glows a faint green, and dries itself off with a thought, not even moving to shake itself.

"Awesome job, Bec!" Jade says, even as the squid recovers from its drugged sleep and begins sleepily rousing itself. Water is already lapping at her boots. "Now, let's head back to the plane!"

The world warps away in a portal of green light as Bec obliges. Jade catches herself on the back of the pilot's chair in her plane, wiping her damp boots off on the floor. "Awesome first job!" she repeats, stretching an arm over her head and taking off the dart gun to hang it on the rack on the wall. "We saved the city from a really depressed giant Squiddle, and no one even got hurt! Grandpa was right, going on a Grand Tour of the world is a great idea!"

Becquerel pants in silent agreement. Then it tilts its head to the side, listening and smelling something Jade can't. "Something wrong, boy?" she asks.

Bec vanishes, but Jade can see the slight greenish glow of its luminous fur through the open hatch to the hold. That's funny, though. Jade could have sworn the hold had been closed when she and Bec left; it had been locked down for the duration of the flight, so that nothing went flying out of the hold when Jade got creative with the flight controls and practiced some midair death-defying loops. She stomps back and kneels beside the open hatch, looking down into the mess of boxes and eccentric antiques that she had rescued before imploding the Harley residence. "What's up, Bec?"

Down in the hold, Bec maintains its usual silence. Having searched the entire hold in a matter of milliseconds, the wolf has deduced that the third passenger on the plane, who had been quiet and relatively nonthreatening throughout the transoceanic flight, has vacated the premises.

Becquerel is, of course, well aware of who and what the stowaway had been. But at the moment, it is no longer relevant. Bec's duty is to guard Jade Harley, and nothing else.

The police officer will return to where she parked her vehicle to find it gone, and she will be forced to call in backup to pick her up and return her to base, where she will then have to explain to the irritated violetblood troll, who swam in specially from Okinawa to deal with the lusus, that said lusus has been detected within the deep sea reserve by the motion sensors within the preserve. This will end her day on an overall unpleasant note.

Spades Slick could care less, okay? He has places to go and people to stab, and the police vehicle had been the closest thing with the keys still in the ignition. He needs wheels if he's gonna get where he's going, and he doesn't have time to fuck around with that crazy dame and her enormous dog. Fuckin' thing gives Spades the heebie jeebies.

Eighteen years he's spent trapped on that godsforsaken island, five of which he'd spent locked up in the joint being interrogated by that ancient geezer before he kicked off and got stuffed by his own daughter.

Humans. Fuckin' lunatics, the lot of them.

Spades floors it. He's the only carapacian around for miles, and he has to take advantage of that fact for as long as he can, because there's a certain Bearcat Quaintrelle he'd like to avoid for as long as possible.

Yeah, he's running scared. But what can he say? That dame is damned good at what she does, and he still has nightmares about the last time he crossed her.

Better he keep his nose clean, and stick to the shadows.

And a certain Crew to deal with...

Chapter End Notes

RMWT chapter 8 is where I intend to veer wildly off canon and cackle maniacally as I blast off into Weird Plot Territory. John's more than a little broken, Karkat is ready to take control of his life, Rose is on a whole new level of crazy, Dave is in so much denial it's actually hilarious, and Jade is ready to wreck everyone's shit.

/cracks knuckles
For the curious and the discerning, my personal tumblr is coldcloudsandchaoticstars; I tend to tag update notifications under 'like one sundered star.' As always, the original fic can be found at RMWT.
Chapter Summary

There shines one sun and one wind blows till night.
And when night comes the wind sinks, and the sun,
And there is no light after.

Chapter Notes

We pick up with John after his second encounter with one Hearts Boxcar, which is where current canon RMWT ends as I'm writing this, and where I'm going full AU. For now, enjoy a delicious time skip, Karkat's first night out on the town, shenanigans with Rose and a surprise guest star, Dave being...Dave, and Jade taking up her Grandpa's legacy!

ARC II - PROVOCATION

18 MONTHS LATER

Karkat Vantas never expected to fill any of his quadrants. Any of them.

Aside from his absolutely charming personality, he’s always known that having someone get as close to him as a quadrant could only unleash a tempest of hemohierarchical outrage if (when) his little mutation is noticed. Which, given the nature of troll romance, was basically inevitable; matesprits draw blood even if only by accident, ashen and black romances have physical violence both minor and major as key components, and palemates can specialize in feelings jams to the point of tears, just as damming as blood if Karkat doesn’t keep his lenses fresh.

For some reason it had never occurred to him to try to find a connection with a human. In hindsight, Past Karkat was so stupid a potential matesprit could have salsa-danced past him stark naked with ‘ALL HUMANS HAVE CANDY-RED BLOOD YOU DUMB SHIT’ tattooed across their chest and he probably wouldn’t have been able to logic his way into the right conclusion.

So the only reason he can possibly be so lucky as to have the human moirail flopped across his lap, engrossed in watching Batman Returns, is because Past Karkat was not only completely emptypanned, but also the most spectacularly lucky spawn of a female barkbeast to have the fortune to wriggle onto the base earth at the same time as John Egbert.

Even if his moirail is a massive nerd with the worst taste in movies ever observed in a sentient being with half its thinkpan intact.
In a way, he almost regrets the fact that now he can’t tell John the truth for an entirely different reason. After tonight, in fact, it’s going to be more vital that ever that he keep his blood hidden, but for once the thought of hiding himself doesn’t fill him with shame and fear.

After tonight, he’ll have the outlet he feels like he’s always needed, one where even if he spills blood and reveals his other unusual abilities, it can’t be traced back to his real life and get him culled. Even the guilty thought of keeping such a secret from his moirail can’t blot out the sheer anticipation.

Of course, before he can begin Operation Scarletgilante (name pending due to absolutely shitty quality of the current portmanteau), he needs to somehow detach himself from John. It’s an unusual problem; generally, Karkat has been able to dedicate much of his spare time over the past year and a half to training without alerting John to his unusual extracurricular activities by virtue of the fact that John had almost as much training to do for swim team. Combined with the human’s near constant volunteer commitments, part-time job, and bizarre father-son bonding activities, most of the time it feels like John begs off feelings jams more than Karkat himself does. But despite the unusual hours they both keep, Karkat has never felt deprived of support; even when he can’t see John in person, they’re in constant contact over Pesterchum or their phones. And in the end, isn’t that the very essence of moirallegiance? To be able to support each other equally, to be perfectly in tune with the other’s emotional needs, capable of easing distress and pain with effortless pity, even when you can’t be physically together?

Tonight of all nights, however, John Egbert seems to have cleared out his schedule for Karkat, and now Karkat finds himself in the difficult position of having to figure out a way to lie to his moirail’s face.

It’s so very tempting to just stay like this, one hand combing through John’s perpetually messy hair, absently smoothing wayward cowlicks whenever John gets too emotionally involved in the drama of the movie until the human settles down. John isn’t a troll, Karkat knows, and is probably oblivious to just how big of a deal it is that he trusts Karkat so completely, that he relaxes rather than tenses when Karkat has his claws this close to John’s throat. Sure, trolls aren’t nearly as prone to extreme bursts of violence and rage as they were all those millennia ago when the two species first met, but the fact remains that in the hindbrain of every troll there is an innate wariness, a primal instinct that tells them to brace for pain when another troll places their horns or claws too near a vital organ. John has no such compulsive wariness, and the way he sprawls out with his head in Karkat’s lap, neck bared where any passing troll could rip it open, makes Karkat’s bloodpusher ache so fucking pale it feels like it’s about to burst, raw with the need to protect this fragile dumbass.

But tonight is the night. As tempting as a night spent jamming on a pile of ridiculously soft human pillows sounds, Karkat has made this commitment, and he’s not backing out now. When the ending credits roll, he reluctantly untangles his claws from John’s hair and pushes at his face lazily with the palm of his hand, trying not to convey the tension knitting its way up his spine. “Get up, John, we’ve watched that cinematic abomination for the last time.”

John pulls a stupid face and shoves Karkat right back, his palm half shooshing, half abjuring at the same time in that disgustingly adorable way he had, even as he sits upright. “Batman Begins is a goddamn classic, Karkat. A shining gem of its genre.”

Oh for pity’s sake, it’s official – he adores John, but he is in diamonds with a complete moron. “Said genre being the age-old category of ‘atrocities created specifically to induce brain death by rage-aneurysm and cause the viewer to attempt to remove his eyeballs with a rusty pair of tweezers?’”

“No, the genre of heroic drama!” John replies, with that shit-eating grin that means he knows exactly what Karkat is talking about, and is pretending to be deliberately obtuse in order to troll Karkat into new depths of existential despair. Karkat remembers with horrific clarity the day he learned John actually liked pissing Karkat off, because apparently his swear-word laden rants fueled by righteous indignation amuse John to no end.

That had been the day he realized just how fucking pale he was for the idiot, and that John was just as pale right back, because who else could put up with Karkat’s obnoxious personality for more than a year and actually find it endearing?

“I can’t even argue with you about this anymore. You have no taste in movies, John, it’s absolutely pathetic.” Karkat stands up, picking a kernel of popcorn off his shirt and dropping it in John’s hair. Because he can. “Walk me to the door, you insufferable, ungentlemanly, tasteless host.”

“Whaaaat? Where are you going?” John yelps, flopping back over on an unfinished pile of pillows, and yeah, Karkat has to turn away and march toward the living room door before the pity overwhelms his better judgment and he just crawls over to tuck his head under John’s chin. Another yelp and the thump of feet start up as Karkat toes his shoes on by the front door. “Come on, Karkat, you know we probably have time for another, reeeeally short movie!”

Karkat can read between the lines, and some of the guilt eases. John has something to do as well; most likely the idiot is in fact supposed to be doing it right now, and is putting it off for Karkat’s sake. “We’ve both got stuff to do, John. Like sleep. As if I don’t know that you pass out around 10 even on weekends after all this time.”

John blushes dull red across his face, the flush more prominent now in March after the sunless winter months have caused his dark, olive brown skin tone to fade slightly. “Y-yeah, like you’re not just as bad.”

“I have one more AP class than you, and I’m somehow stuck being the goddamn friendleader of the single most incompetent herd of nookchafing imbeciles ever to presume they could produce a modicum of talent in the creative arts,” Karkat retorts, grimacing at the mere thought of this year’s crop of Film students. “If I don’t micromanage their asses, nothing will get done.”

“Hehe, alright,” John says, his lopsided grin firmly in place by the end of Karkat’s mini-rant. Which was in no way Karkat’s intention when he started off on his angry tangent. “Oh, wait! Before you go!” He jogs through the door opposite into the kitchen, and Karkat slaps his forehead when he hears the freezer door open and John emerges with a tray of fucking iced roe cubes. “Oh please no. Please tell me you didn’t -”

“It’s an iced roe pie!” John declares, blithely ignoring Karkat’s look of pure horror as he stacks a more familiar looking lemon merengue pie on top of the abomination. “And that’s for you. Say hi to Crabdad for me!”

“That fatass lusus cannot retire too soon,” Karkat mutters, then stops at the sight of a pout slowly edging its way onto John’s face. John has somehow become more attached to Karkat’s lusus than Karkat is himself, and the news that Crabdad is mere months away from being set out to pasture in the wilds of a lusus sanctuary in Brazil has hit him particularly hard. “Yes, fuck, John, I’ll tell it you said hi.”

“Yay! G’night, Karkat!” John beams and then Karkat lets himself out, closing the door on the Egbert house and breathing in the late evening air.
Not even the pie equivalent of the Antichrist sitting in the crook of his arm can stop the feral grin from spreading across Karkat’s face. He runs home, barely stopping long enough to toss the roe pie at Crabdad and the lemon merengue in the thermal hull for tomorrow before he dashes into the respite block and starts tearing off his clothes.

This is the first time he’s pulled on the suit with the intention to actually wear it out in public, in front of other people, and as he does so he's hyper aware of just how goddamn skintight this thing is.

Nothing. At. All.

His cheeks burning so hot he can almost see the red in the corners of his vision, Karkat starts pulling his other clothes back on over top of the grey and red suit. When he creeps down the stairs, the weighty backpack slung over his shoulder, Crabdad is still occupied with the culinary abomination born of John's sick imagination, and Karkat is easily able to slip out the front door, closing it behind him without a sound.

He regrets that he can't drive his car to the city. The last thing he really wants is to ride the night bus with a bunch of random fuckwads while he's secretly in costume, but he can't take his car. For one thing, someone (and by someone he means John fucking Egbert, the stalkerish asshole. <> would notice if his car consistently drove off in the middle of the night every day; for another, he didn’t have the goddamn gas money to pay for that kind of daily round trip.

So instead of driving to Seattle in the safety of his nice government-issued car, Karkat catches a bus to the city, trying to appear completely absorbed in the music blaring over his headphones whenever the driver and the two other passengers happen to look in his direction. Why, why did Seattle have to be a forty-five minute drive from Maple Valley? If he still lived in the city, he wouldn’t have to take public transport and risk fucking up in front of witnesses like this. He’s hyperaware of the suit hidden under his ratty old clothes, and of the fact that he hasn’t put the mask on yet, and that the tired looking man in the nursing uniform may look like he’s flipping through a magazine but he could actually be looking at Karkat and noticing the exposed edge of a neoprene collar or the weird material of Karkat’s boots –

He slaps himself mentally, berating internal Karkat for being a paranoid little fuck until the bus rolls to a stop. He rushes off, head ducked as he glances around the street. He has memorized where he’s going, but he’s still on edge as he skulks toward the Seattle Public Library, trying and no doubt failing to look innocuous as he makes his way around the back entrance. He used to volunteer here in a darker time in his life, and he’d just so happened to visit two weeks ago. His old co-workers thought it was nice to see him again; Karkat had just endured the torment of having the life stories of twelve librarians dumped on him while he stole one of the spare sets of keys hanging in the back. Yeah, great start to being a crime-fighter – break into a library.

But he needs a place to hide his regular clothes, and to surreptitiously change in and out of them where no one passing by will notice Karkat walking in and Hemogoblin walking out, and fuck if he trusts any of the downtown bathrooms to be secure enough. There are no cameras in the circulation room, and the only ping on the security system will be a log that someone with maintenance keys came and then left in under five minutes, which he hopes will be ignored by anyone who might be checking. Until he can put together some kind of secure base in the city itself (which he honestly doesn’t have the first clue how to do; renting an apartment is not only financially infeasible but would again involve his regular identity being linked to his alias) he’s just going to have to commandeer the library.

But it’s also the best plan he’s come up with over all these months of planning, so it looks like past Karkat’s stupidity is rapidly becoming current Karkat’s as well.

After making sure the coast is clear and that no stray librarians have decided working until eleven at night is a good idea, Karkat locks himself in a printer room and starts shedding his baggy outer layers, folding them up and stuffing them into a paper cabinet where they won’t be seen. He pulls on a pair of skintight arm warmers, tugging them up until they sit right on his arms and keep his wrist and palms exposed. He knows he’s a better fighter than your average troll, has been training himself specifically for the kind of work he anticipates tonight, but in the event he has to make use of his more…unusual talents, he’d rather not fuck up part of his costume trying to defend himself.

He puts on his mask, smoothing it anxiously across his nose and checking and rechecking that it is fully secured because, of any of the pieces of his costume, if the mask falls off he is royally fucked. He then attaches the prosthetic horns. He’d ordered them as discreetly as possible, paid in cash, and repainted them himself from the standard candy-corn orange to a deep red, crudely altering the basic shape so that no one would connect them with the original prostheses he’d purchased. He’s not leaving anything to chance, and like fuck is he running around the city with his extremely recognizable stunted horns exposed. No troll hero with half a thinkpan intact would leave their horns unaltered or uncovered, not with how uniquely each pair is shaped, like the human fingerprint. Okay yeah, there’s Blind Justice over in Chicago, but her’s are a generic enough shape that no one could call her out.

The last step makes Karkat hesitate. He stands awkwardly in his skintight suit (like fuck, this outfit doesn’t hide anything at all) and grips the edge of the printer as he stares down at the contact lens case. It wouldn’t matter, really, if he left the lenses in. No one would know any different except Karkat. He’d just be a rustblood hero with obviously dyed horns, and no further questions would be asked.

But he – fuck, he’d told himself he’d do this. Because if he isn’t hiding his powers and his unnatural endurance anymore, why hide this.

In fact -

He’s so sick of hiding this. His claws are fucking shaky and he snarls at himself as he reaches up, places a claw on each side of the contact lens in his right eye, and – pops it out. Immediately his eye starts tearing up, exposed to open air for the first time since he’d last exchanged the lens a week ago. He plops it in the lens case and then removes the other lens before he can second-guess himself, blinking rapidly to try to clear the suddenly wash of stinging fluid from his eyes.

Abruptly, the world shifts into sharp focus, and he stares around the room, adjusting to the sensation of being able to see clearly since the first time he’d had to cover up his changing eyes when his secondary pupation hit around almost five years ago. Even blinking feels different without the thick layer of color-muting contact lenses between him and his eyelids. It’s a double-whammy, being free of both his contacts and the ever-present dark frame of the glasses he always has to wear to make up for the blurriness the lenses cause.

Taking deep, steadying breath, he sets the lens case inside the cabinet on top of his civilian clothes and locks it with a key. He tucks the key into a slim pocket flush against his leg and does one last check of his uniform to make sure he hasn’t forgotten anything before he leaves.

Karkat’s just grateful there aren’t any mirrors in the room; the sight of his own gleaming, candy red eyes would probably have sent him scurrying back to the lenses like a wriggler running to its lusus for comfort.
Not Karkat, he then corrects himself mentally. Hemogoblin, Hemogoblin, Hemogoblin. It's better than Scarletgilante, alright? He can’t afford to accidentally drop his own name while on the job; better if he starts thinking of himself as Hemogoblin from the moment he puts on the suit.

From the moment he steps outside the library he feels exposed. Surveying the area to reassure himself he’s alone, Kar-Hemogoblin runs to the building across the street and ducks into the alley. He’s confused for a moment by how well-lit the empty alley is, until he remembers he’s not wearing the contact lenses; there’s nothing obscuring his night vision anymore.

The spring air is still cool enough to nip at his fingers and the gap between his arm guards and the shoulders of his bodysuit, and it wakes him right up as he scales the building and begins to run and tumble across the rooftop, slowly gaining confidence as he goes. He’d known himself capable of travelling this way for some time, but again, this is the first time he’s done it with all of his senses clear and alert. Each leap across the gap between one building and the next is a breath of weightlessness, before his body reacts almost before he thinks to land smoothly, with plenty of room to spare.

After running nearly to the point where he intended to begin patrolling in earnest, Hemogoblin stops, taking a moment to revel in the adrenaline pumping through him before making last minute adjustments to his costume, his mask, and his false horns. Everything seems to have held up well despite the jostling, just like in the practice runs, and now –

With one hasty look at the sky, flushing at his own (stupid) half-formed desire to see the form of Heir hovering somewhere above, Hemogoblin goes to work.

- It takes Hemogoblin nearly an hour to come across his first crime-in-progress. It’s possible he’s nervous and overlooking potential incidents, but he really hopes not; it just seems to be a relatively quiet night, crime-wise. But a sharp cry breaks the night to his left and he nearly stumbles to stop himself midstride before another arcing leap would have taken him in the wrong direction. He turns and runs in the direction he thought he’d heard the noise, scanning the alleyways and the street even more intently until he hears another scream. He reaches the source and steps without hesitating off the edge of the building, from a height no normal troll or human could handle without breaking bones. He lands lightly in a crouch, and keeps to the shadows as he observes the scene before him, fighting every flaring instinct that tells him to rush in and start kicking.

What he sees looks like – if he’s honest – a drug deal gone wrong. A tall troll in a raggedy overcoat stands over the prostrate body of another troll, who is trying to cover his horns as the tall troll kicks at him viciously. “Where’s. The. Money?” he demands, punctuating each word with another blow, the last one catching the fallen troll square in the ribs. “Where is the fucking money, Qexien!!”

“I don’t have it,” the fallen troll wheezes, rolling away. “I’m sorry, I don’t -” He chokes and spits out a mouthful of blood when the tall troll kicks again.

Alright. Time to intervene. Hemogoblin circles around the two figures in silence, almost holding his breath as he creeps in closer behind the tall troll’s back. The troll on the ground stops whimpering and Hemogoblin glances down to make sure he’s still alive. He catches the troll’s startled gaze, which only widens when he sees the exact luminescent color of Hemogoblin’s eyes. ‘Wha-’ the troll mouths, and Hemogoblin places a finger to his lips, shaking his head.

Too late. “What are you gawking at, you useless waste of -” the tall troll whips around with a snarl creasing his face. He blinks when he sees Karkat, clearly just as stunned.
Well, fuck.

So Hemogoblin kicks him in the face, a horribly angled kick that glances off the taller troll’s cheek. It’s enough to knock the startled troll back a few paces with a yelp, his pale blue eyes widening as he focuses on Hemogoblin’s face with horror. “What the fuck are you?”

Karkat has thought the same thing too often for the words to do more than trigger a panicked wave of self-preservation instinct.

Someone has seen his eyes.

He channels the ensuing burst of tense panic into a more controlled, sweeping roundhouse kick, this time landing perfectly and slamming the troll’s head to the side with a sharp crack as bone crunches beneath his heel.

He doesn’t pause. Even as the troll growls and lunges at him, Hemogoblin’s leg lands and he spins with the momentum, bringing his other leg up in a back kick that angles up and collides with the troll’s chin as Hemogoblin kicks up into a handstand. He pushes off and lands upright again, turning to face the troll in a fighting stance again.

He needn’t have bothered. The tall troll crashes back against the wall, blood pouring from his nose and trickling down over his mouth, eyes shut as he slumps to the ground. Hurrying forward, Hemogoblin jabs at the troll’s pulse point and pulls his eyelid up to assess him. A tiny fraction of worry eases when he finds a very strong pulse. Just unconscious then. Most of his training has been not just to get into fighting shape, but also to learn to constantly pull his kicks so that he doesn’t accidentally kill someone.

Looks like he has managed to hit just the right balance. It isn’t quite a one-hit knockout, but he’ll take it. Reaching into a pouch, he takes out a ziptie and cuffs the troll’s hands together behind his back. “Hey, you-” Hemogoblin says, turning to look at the fallen troll –

Who is gone. Hemogoblin takes a full minute to process the tiny smear of blood on the ground where the other troll used to be curled up in a defensive ball, then smacks himself in the forehead for being a fucking idiot not fit to pass a third grade level logic test. Clearly the smaller troll had been involved in some kind of illicit activity with the guy Hemogoblin knocked out; no way he’d stick around to wait for the cops when he would only be arrested as well.

Now Hemogoblin is stuck with an unconscious body and no witness or potential victim to leave behind to explain the situation to the police. That’s always Heir’s modus operandi, and here Hemogoblin’s very first act of vigilantism has already gone off script. Rolling his eyes, Hemogoblin raises an eyebrow at the unconscious dealer. “And what the grublicking fuck am I supposed to do with you, now?”

In the end, Hemogoblin ends up calling the police from the nearest payphone, and he leaves the still-unconscious troll ziptied to a bicycle rack. He checks around the area for the beaten troll, worrying he’ll find the guy passed out and dying of internal bleeding or something. He’s pretty sure letting the first civilian he’s ever rescued die would be the heroic equivalent of fucking up so bad you literally transform into the physical embodiment of abject failure and shrivel up in shame for all eternity. He finally finds the guy passed out behind a recycling bin four streets down, and drags the guy back to the same bike rack, leaving him at the opposite end as the other troll, and smacks himself again when he realizes he has to find another round of quarters to call the ambulance.

By the time the police arrive, Hemogoblin has scaled the nearest building again, and is watching right up until the ambulance appears a few minutes later. Okay, maybe his first rescue ended up being a possible drug dealer who needed to be shipped off to the hospital afterward, but hey. He actually hadn't fucked up that badly. Nobody even died. What a goddamn pleasant surprise; finally, something Karkat Vantas hasn't ruined just by touching it.

With considerably more confidence in his step, Hemogoblin starts patrolling in earnest.

Within a month, Hemogoblin merchandise has appeared in the local comic store. It's fucking creepy to be on the receiving end of this, Karkat realizes, even as his moirail proceeds to geek out. John has never been a huge Heir fan, but he reveals that can fangirl with the best of them when the first Hemogoblin posters show up. Over the next few weeks, this new enthusiasm for a real life hero, as opposed to one of John's usual obsessions like Captain America, shows no signs of abating.

Karkat can only draw two conclusions. It's either John having really, really weird taste in heroes - because now that Karkat has actually met Heir in person, he is only more convinced that Heir of Breath is fucking awesome - or some bizarre, previously unknown twist of moirallegiance that John is obsessively supportive of Karkat, even when he doesn't know it's Karkat that he's supporting.

Which would have really disturbing consequences, and Karkat would prefer isn't the case. John has made several worrying comments about Hemogoblin's butt that are in no way in line with moirallegiance, and Karkat has literally no good excuse lined up for why he could possibly object to the butt of someone he's pretending he has no connection to.

Okay, fucking everyone has noticed the butt. Everyone and their mother has commented on it. Why. Why is it a thing. Karkat's brain may yet explode from the incomprehensible nature of the general attention that is paid to his behind. Even motherfucking Heir has noticed the butt and holy fuck it takes everything Hemogoblin has to maintain a flirtatious mask and not freak the fuck out whenever he's within ten feet of the other hero.

That stops being a problem sometime between Hemogoblin witnessing an enormous explosion from halfway across the city, and him arriving at the Dockyards just in time to watch Heir get blown out of the sky.

After that night, Hemogoblin and Heir are partners in crime fighting, and maybe for the first time, he feels less like Karkat in a suit, and more like Hemoglobin isn't just some stupid whim.

This...this feels right. Maybe it's cliche as fuck, but he can feel it in his blood, in his bone barrow.

He can spend the days with John, being stupidly happy. But at night, he's free.

Rose is quite tipsy when the first Pesterchum alert begins flashing in the corner of the screen. She ignores it and continues mixing some sugary and purple in preparation for the on-coming day. Lately, it seems as though if she doesn't start with a couple of martinis before noon, the day just never goes as planned. She completes the drink and sips at it experimentally as she sways toward the desktop, stumbling and staggering over books on the floor as she does.

When she sees the color of the pesterer's text, she makes a face. She's not sure what the face looks like, as she hasn't been able to feel her skin in several hours, since she'd woken herself up with a shot of cognac. One is supposed to sip cognac slowly and enjoy the subtle flavors; Rose, however, stopped tasting the alcohol a couple months ago, when the occasional 'good stiff drink' had become more of a persistent habit.
Anyway. Focus. Rose makes a face. It's a truly scandalous face, but Rose is feeling more than a little lax about appearances at the moment. The jade green of the text on the screen is worth a face or three, though.

The purple drink is, as usual, an abomination to the senses and an affront to human decency, but she downs it as she half-falls into her chair to reply to the steadily but politely escalating chat.

Rose collapses half off the chair before she regains her footing. Her heart beats an unsteady, too-hard drumbeat in her chest, and the pressure makes her feel woozy and sick to her stomach. She lets the drink topple over as she goes to the bedroom window and peels back the thick blackout curtains.

The sun peers through the trees just over the horizon, and Rose is ready to lurch around and triumphantly inform Kanaya that her clock must be broken when Rose remembers that her window faces west.

That is a setting sun.

Rose pushes back from the window, making a lunge for the closet before she realizes there is no point. The setting of the sun has always been her alarm bell, the deadline after which she has to travel home from work and take up residence for the night in the observatory. She sits down hard in the computer chair instead, vaguely aware that her fingers are trembling as she swallows hard. She feels quite sickeningly sober now, and it is an unpleasant sensation.

She can feel that she has part of her costume on, the leggings half-sagging down one leg with a single boot laced up in clumsy knots. She most definitely began getting ready this morning, so what had happened? Her memory is a blur, fogged with alcohol and the ever-present weight of sleep-deprivation, but she would have noticed an entire day passing by! This is not -

The edge of a headache twinges behind Rose's left eye, and she has to knuckle at it with her fingers until the deep ache abates. When she reaches out for the purple drink, she spies the glass overturned on the floor, a small grape-purple stain forming a puddle on the ivory carpet. Having failed that, Rose takes up the vodka sitting next to her computer and takes a quick swig, grimacing and nearly choking on the hard burn. It's hard to keep the alcohol down with her stomach in knots like this, but she suppresses her gag reflex through sheer force of will.

She's had too much practice at this. Her stomach protests, but the headache subsides, assuaged by the psychosomatic relief of a straight shot of alcohol burning its way down her throat. She doesn't know when the migraines started, and has honestly lost track of which are genuine headaches and which are just the result of the constant cycle of hangovers.

It is most likely irresponsible and foolish in the extreme to go out to fight crime while intoxicated, but she hasn't had much choice lately. If she doesn't drink her way into a pleasant buzz before work, debilitating tremors bring her to her knees before the day is halfway gone. It is a vicious, self-perpetuating cycle.

Resting her cheek on the lip of the bottle, Rose returns to Pesterchum, the happy buzz gone as she begins to respond to Kanaya's ponderous messages. She takes extra care to ensure her own quirk doesn't include any more typos, which would only provoke Kanaya further.

Rose doesn't respond. Her brain is comfortably numb as she takes another long sip of vodka and closes her eyes against the foul taste, the sick feeling in her stomach from having lost an entire day fading beneath the heavy weight of the alcohol swishing in her gut.
Rubbing her hand against her face, she leaves the pesterlog open on the screen, ignoring the little flash that goes off each time a frantic new message arrives, and stands up. Her floor feels uneven and rocks up beneath her, as though she is at sea. It is nearly nightfall, and her time in the observatory is almost upon her. She can do no more than feel resigned when she realizes that to her foggy mind, it feels as though she only just left the meditation room an hour ago; now she must return to the horrid chore without even memories of a long day at work in the sun to sustain her.

As she stumbles down the hallway, occasionally clipping her elbow on the wall when it seems to leap out into her path, she strips off what little of her uniform she managed to struggle into earlier, leaving only the skintight Kevlar undershirt, leggings, and the skirt she had worn to meditate in last night, which she had apparently never managed to take off. She has to balance herself with one hand on the railing overlooking the dark living room in order to undo the messy knot she has made of the left boot, and she kicks it off the landing. The boot takes out a small wizard statue as it flies, and then lands in a dry puff of dust somewhere below.

She is so very tired. She stops in the middle of the hallway and wonders - why not? Why not just go back to her room, the room she has never slept in? Why not see how it felt to actually lie down and just sleep for once in her life? The blasted meditation can wait one night...

She has turned without realizing her feet are moving when suddenly, impossibly, there is a knock on the front door.

Rose freezes, a little of the haze in her head clearing as she shifts behind the wall, glancing over her shoulder at the door below. It is hard to focus, like her eyes can't quite stay all the way open, but she does hear the second knock when it arrives.

Someone is at her house.

For the first time in nearly three years, someone is at her house.

(do not-)

She half-runs, half-falls down stairs, forgetting all dignity and grace as she does. Her hair is lank and unkempt, hanging in her face, and she just has time to shove it back behind her uneven headband, taking in her own haunted stare and bedraggled clothing in the mirror by the front door. She can't bring herself to care about the mess, not when there's only one person in the world who still knows where this house is -

Rose yanks the door open, an unwanted tear blurring her sight. "Mothe-"

There is no one there.

There is - There is no - no one at all -

(hush rō sē)

Rose feels nothing. She steps out onto the porch, and scans the lawn, the edge of the forest where it hedges in the grounds. There is no one in sight, and no movement in the trees to mark where they might have passed out of sight. She cannot hear the rumble of an engine, so the knocker had to have been on foot. She should still be able to see them -

But no. She is still alone. You'd think after spending a long enough span of time in solitude, one would adjust, but the disappointment is as fresh and bitter as ever. Perhaps she should have read up on the effect of isolation on a growing adolescent mind, but she can’t recall the last time she received her subscription to the Journal of Personality and Social Psychology. It mostly likely stopped being delivered around the same time the postman had stopped noticing their house, and the letters from John had trickled to a halt.

She slumps to her knees in an ungainly pile, the wood of the porch scraping through her leggings, and something crumples beneath her leg. She blinks slowly, wearily, and somehow finds the effort to extricate a flimsy envelope from under her knee. She turns it over in her hands, squinting to try to make the letters focus.

It bears her mother’s seal, and for an instant Rose's heart pounds, until she realizes with a dull pain that there is no point in being excited. It had been foolish to expect her mother to deliver something in person after three years of the good doctor avoiding the Lalonde manse like the plague. No doubt she'd sent some suitably passive-aggressive form of messenger, who had stuck around just long enough to deliver the letter and play upon Rose's emotions, to teach her better than to get her hopes up. Her mother's lessons in fortitude and self-sufficiency have always combined needless complications, psychological games, and passive-aggression in equal measure. Not even a three year pause seems to have changed her despicable tactics.

Rose just wishes she were bitter enough to take the letter and set it alight. But no, she is still desperate enough through the dull pain to slit the sealed edge of the letter with a perfectly manicured nail, and unfold the paper to read the contents.

What she reads is a perfect work of art. Doctor Rue Lalonde's handwriting is a masterpiece, none of her drunken slur present in the looping whorls and elegant curves of her script.

Daughter mine,

I do hope this note find you in good health. I have always had utter confidence in your ability to succeed and flourish even in my absence. You have always been such a self-sufficient child.

I wish that I could have communicated with you sooner. Three years is rather a long time. But I have only just now engaged a Passing Messenger whose methods would not draw undue attention to your location.

I assure you, it is all for the best. Don't forget to meditate regularly, my dear. And do give my regards to John.

Affectionately yours,

Doctor Rue Lalonde, Ph.D

The note is, as always, everything Rose has never wanted.

(it will be fine, Rose)

She rips it in two.

There is something wet streaming down her face. She shakes her head, sucking in breath through her nose as she attempts to control herself. She must maintain her calm. As long as she can show that her mother has not affected her, Rue Lalonde hasn't won this standoff. Rose just has to be serene. Be inscrutable. Go up to the observatory and meditate until she’s too tired to feel all this hate.
At approximately 18:21:03 on a Friday night, a massive explosion occurs in the middle of Hamilton.

Darkness overhead and all around her, the darkness between the stars. The grimdark curls its tentacles into her mind, and the last thing she sees as Rose Lalonde is the roar of the absolute Void, the notice all, shrieks and writhes in protest as it is slowly crushed beneath the rolling tide of Her head feels like it's about to split in two. Part of her - a rapidly dwindling portion, barely noticeable after all, wiping at the tears, even as she wails in agony at the empty night sky.

She loses all control, screaming as a sob racks her body. She reaches up with both hands, furiously wiping at the tears, even as she wails in agony at the empty night sky.

Her hands come away bloody, and she can taste the blood in her mouth, but she doesn't care. She is just so - so enraged.

How DARE she?!

(don't cry, sweet rose, I'm not here)

It doesn't hurt. Why should this hurt, after three years of nothing, after three years, after rather a long goddamn time?

Rose isn't hurting anymore. She is brutally, coldly, undeniably furious.

(after all)

(we are A'L'G'W'Y'S' here)

(and we will N'E'V'E'J' & L'E'A'V'Y'Y'0'U'W')

Yes. Why would Rose have ever been hurt, when she has never been truly alone? Her entire body rocks with convulsions.

She isn't crying anymore. She is laughing. The tears are still running down her cheeks, but all she can do is laugh, her lungs wheezing as she gasps for the air to keep laughing.

stop laughing what are you doing rose why did you drink so much you need to fight them you need to wake up wake up YOU NEED TO STOP THIS ROSE NO!

Her head feels like it's about to split in two. Part of her - a rapidly dwindling portion, barely noticeable after all, shrieks and writhes in protest as it is slowly crushed beneath the rolling tide of colddamp.

The other half roars with triumph as Rose realizes the truth. It is the roar of the absolute Void, the sound of the Abyss, and it can no longer be denied. If there is any spark of the Seer of Light left in her, it doesn't matter. What good has the light ever done her? Now that she has the dark -

She will W'1/E'0/N'E'Y'V'0'Y'Y'0'U'W'

The grimdark curls its tentacles into her mind, and the last thing she sees as Rose Lalonde is the darkness overhead and all around her, the darkness between the stars.
county, New York. It is, reportedly, visible from orbit.

At the epicenter of the blast, a slim figure rises from the resulting crater, and turns eyes that burn white with power to the south. It bares sharp teeth in a vicious grin, and steers the body formerly known as Rose Lalonde toward New York City.

Dave zones the fuck out. It takes true talent to be this unfocused, even as his hands move over the turntables and adjust sound quality at intervals. His latest ironic project is an attempt at turning Bruno Mars into something worth listening too. So far, all he’s managed is to elevate Grenade to the point at which it no longer makes his ears bleed in horror.

It’s not that he doesn’t like mixing some sick beats anymore, and gets sick thrills off subjecting himself to this torture. Quite the opposite. It’s just that at the moment, he’s attempting something a little bit more complicated than –

The door to his room swings open, and a second Dave walks in. “It works,” he says around a mouthful of taco. “I didn’t even die of a brain aneurysm or anything, so kudos on not fucking up in about five minutes from now.”

Dave raises an eyebrow, but otherwise doesn’t react to the fact that there’s two of him. If other-Dave can keep a straight face about this, so can Dave.

Sure, this is the culmination of nearly two years’ worth of hard work and embarrassingly stupid shenanigans that will never be spoken of in polite company ever again, but they’re Dave Strider. No need to get all worked up into a lather about winning. Success is basically a forgone conclusion when you pack this much coolkid into one fantastic bod.

Well. Two bods, at the moment. Details.

“Five minutes?” he asks, turning back to the turntables. The rest of the question goes unspoken – what happens in five minutes that makes this attempt so different from the hundreds of other times we tried this?

Other-Dave shrugs noncommittally and walks over to the turntables, switching off the Bruno Mars. “Stop listening to that shit, it’s probably rotting our brain or something. This project isn’t ironic anymore. We’ve been working on it for weeks. Now it’s just sad. The irony is dead. Rotting. Risen again in a twisted mockery of its former glory. BTW, the BQ will be hanging out around the medical center when you think to go looking for her. Don’t be fucking late. You don’t keep that dame waiting, she’ll fuck you up. Start a reign of creepy shadow terror all over your ass or something.” He shovels the rest of the taco into his mouth, and then kicks Dave off his chair.

Dave lands flat on his back on the floor. “Not cool,” he says, sitting up. “Seriously. What happens in – three minutes, now?”

“Other-me didn’t tell me when this all happened to me, so I can’t tell you. Is the impression I get, anyway.” There is a pause as both Striders have to pause and think about the use of tenses in that first sentence. Both raise an eyebrow at the same time in mutual agreement that there’s probably no better way to have phrased it. Other-Dave starts fiddling with the turntables, pressing a headphone to his ear as he frowns at the readouts. “This is how I remember it happening, and hell no, we are not dicking around with paradoxes when we’ve only just started getting this thing to work right. This is me, drawing the line. Right there. It’s a huge fucking line, you can’t miss it. We’re not unraveling the fabric of space-time to satisfy our morbid curiosity.”
"Wow, you need to calm down man. Our inner asshole is showing," Dave says, getting to his feet and stuffing his hands in his pockets. "Pretty sure if you just tell me what to do, this will all be over with that much faster and we can sail off into the sunset with our brand new time-travel merit badge on our sashes."

"I still don't remember me telling me. So I'm not." Other-Dave rubs the bridge of his nose and shakes his head slightly.

"I think you're full of shit. Tell me."

“Whatever. I’m too tired to argue with me. I don't even have the energy for Pesterchum right now. That bed is serenading me with some intense lullabies. You can’t hear them, but they’re there, dude. It wants me, and I want it. Some of us just spent twenty-four hours awake without thinking through the consequences of reliving an entire day.” He lifts his fingers off the turntable in a gesture Dave recognizes – it’s the same hand motion he tends to make when he’s finished up a project. It’s hella weird watching himself do it from three feet away. There’s the weirdest sensation in his own hand, as though he can feel some phantom limb shit going on.

Other-Dave unplugs the headphones and a steady bassline pumps through the air unchecked, the volume rattling the dead things in their jars on the shelves. ‘Here, listen to this for a minute,’ that total asshole signs with his hands as the bass drowns out all other sound.

Dave refuses to give in and sign back. The collar at his throat burns and vibrates slightly as he determinedly plows through audible words. The sound comes out garbled and unintelligible in his ears, the loud drum beat in the air confusing the sensors. But what he means to say goes something like, “I thought I only had one minute. Shouldn’t I be engaging the flux capacitor? Firing up the metaphorical DeLorean? Can you please turn this off?? Ho-ly shit why is future me a total douche?”

It feels like a giant fucking robot is bouncing on a pogo stick against his eardrums. After a long day of trying to focus on his internal sense of time and make the clock run backwards with Bruno Mars wailing in the background, it’s the exact opposite of what Dave wants in his life. He’s extremely tempted to stop time and flashstep around himself to turn down the volume. But he only has thirty seconds left before apparently he’s due for this major epiphany that will let him time-travel like the Badass Quandary has been harassing him to do since day one of their weird friendalliance. He decides to wait it out, leaning against the edge of the hole in the wall where the window used to be, where the noise from the bass rumbles out into open air. Other-him just sits there at the turntables, face unreadable even without the sunglasses on, and yeah, that is frustrating as fuck when Dave’s on the receiving end of it.

The bass drones in his ears, until it feels like one big pulse pounding so insistently even his heart matches tempo and fuuu-

-uck, is he losing track of time again?

Yeah, he is. He totally is.

Everything feels like it’s happening in half-time, and his movements are sluggish as he shakes his head to try to clear it. Dave claws at his own sense of time, trying half-heartedly to care when his body starts feeling distant and disconnected. It feels like trying to walk outside in Houston on a slow, muggy summer afternoon, when the air is more humidity than oxygen and breathing feels like drinking a glass of lukewarm water. If he fucking misses when he finally figures out time travel just because his future self started blaring some brain-melting bassline, he is going punch other-Dave in the goddamn gallbladder. He doesn’t care if it would be the same as punching himself in the gallbladder, it would be worth it.
“Sorry, man. This is the way it’s going to have to go. I do feel kind of like an asshole about it, though.”

Dave blinks and time chimes back into focus. The air is weirdly still and clear, and he realizes that the bassline has stopped. All that’s left is the residual thrum in his brain. He has just enough time to stare at other-Dave, who is suddenly standing right in front of Dave’s face, for about a second, before the other guy puts a hand on Dave’s chest and shoves him backward.

Out the fucking hole in the wall.

Future-me just pushed me off a thirteen story building, Dave thinks, feeling a bit put out. When he looks below him, he can see the dumpster right beneath him in the alleyway.

Future-me just pushed me off a thirteen story building to land in a fucking dumpster, Dave thinks, completely incensed.

This is…

This is beyond irony. This is the pinnacle of everything irony has ever aspired to be. Irony is the naïve handmaiden in service of the goddess that is this moment right here, right now, at exactly 4:13:00 in the afternoon on a Friday. Oh my fucking god, not even Bro can top something as ridiculously stupid as this. This is incredible.

The only problem with this sublime moment is that Dave has no way to stop the whole falling thing. He’s around the eighth story now and okay he definitely has a problem. Yup. Oh, there goes the seventh story, that’s awesome. This is the highlight of his day. This is clearly how he was always meant to go, falling to his doom from his own apartment building after years of insane roof-jumping antics in the name of great justice and ironic heroism.

Around the fifth floor, he starts to panic.

Something feels like it’s lodged in his throat and it’s really hard to breathe around it, so he starts wheezing a little as his arms flail around for something, anything to grab onto and halt his fall. That fucking bassline is still going in his head and he refuses to die with that and Bruno Mars the last music he ever listens to in his life. If Dave Strider ever dies, ever, he fully intends to do it with a goddamn symphony going full blast in the background, thank you very much, so fuck this fucking noise, and –

Something seizes in his throat, and he can’t breathe at all.

Dave jerks forward, curling up as he grabs at his neck, fingernails scraping on the metal of the collar. But it doesn’t feel tight, and he can’t find the clasp when he’s busy falling past the third fucking floor anyway, and his throat seizes in pain again and he’s dying even before he hits the bottom of the empty dumpster, what a class act -

With the last shred of consciousness he has left, Dave yanks mentally on the part of him in charge of time, rips at the time-stop option that won’t do a damn thing to help because he’ll just keep falling while the rest of the world stops around him. It’s the last thing he can think of to do, and he stops time, stops it and holds it there until the usual firecrackers start spitting fire into his brain.

He blacks out before he hits the ground.

This is a huge deal. He feels like this deserves a round of applause. Unfortunately, his arms feel like they’ve been ripped off his body and filled with enough helium that they’ve floated off into the atmosphere. He’s used to a little disassociation here and there, but this is a whole new level of dreamy weirdness. Normal people would need some good drugs to hit this kind of high.

While he tries to regain his sense of his limbs, Dave does a quick inventory. Point number one – not dead yet. He pauses for another round of mental applause. Not every day you survive a thirteen story fall with your skull mostly intact. Point number two – everything stinks like a dumpster, and when he shifts his body, trying to tilt his head enough to see if his legs move when he tells them to, he sees that he is sprawled out on top of several bags of garbage, one of which apparently burst open under the force of his plummeting body.

Point number three needs to wait its fucking turn because this goddamn dumpster had been emptied this morning. Dave had heard the rumble of the garbage truck all the way through Bruno Mars at around eight in the morning, and he had looked down while falling and definitely noticed that his future resting place was empty. That was totally a thing that happened.

Still woozy, Dave raises his arm and pats at the garbage bag cushioning his lower body. All he manages to accomplish is unleashing another wave of rotting garbage smell, and ascertaining that yes, his butt isn’t just imagining the garbage bag. It’s real. He’s lying in a pile of several days old trash that hadn’t been here when he’d started falling at 4:13 pm.

Dave’s eyes widen behind his shades, and he stares, fascinated, at the sky above as he checks his always accurate internal clock.

Like a handy little internal pocket watch, the little ticks that always tock along in the back of his mind inform him that it is 6:12.

In the morning.

“Son of a bitch,” Dave Strider says, watching the peach and orange streaks of a sunrise eat their way across the morning sky.

The first order of business is making sure his neck isn’t broken.

Dave swings himself out of the dumpster, wincing when his feet hit the ground and his entire body aches in protest. But hey, he’s not bleeding anywhere that he can see, and he can still feel his legs so, awesome, his neck isn’t broken. Seriously, A+ landing. Maybe a smart person would have waited and called for help or something before trying to move with a possible broken neck, but Dave doesn’t have the best precautionary first aid training. He’s still alive and kicking, so he must be doing something right.

The next is figuring out what the hell he’s supposed to do all day. He can’t go back to his room – otherwise he’d remember himself walking in and chilling all day on the bed, nursing bruises and minor abrasions. He doesn’t remember that happening, so it…must not have happened?
This is going to be annoying, isn’t it. Yeah, it is. He can feel it.

His mood worsens when he remembers what his future-self had been wearing. Dave is still currently in his shades and sweats and his totally, purely ironic red Star Wars shirt, and they all reek of garbage. Other-Dave had been in an old work outfit, with a pair of not-very-shitty swords on his back, and he hadn’t smelled like trash that’s been sitting out for days on end in a Houston springtime. Which means at some point, Dave – current Dave – has to go back to his room and, presumably, steal his own clothes from his closet without waking himself up. It’s going to be a pain in the ass, even though he’s successfully done it once already – in the future. And if he chooses not to go through the hassle, he’ll not only be creating a paradox, he’ll be forced to walk around all day in clothes that smell like they need to be doused in kerosene, burned with extreme prejudice, and then scattered into the ocean as ashes in tribute to the truly epic lazy-day level of comfort they once gave him.

Actually, no wonder other-Dave was in such a bad mood. No doubt he was in mourning for this beautifully ironic Princess Leia shirt, and had just been taking out his well-deserved grief on an unwitting victim. Dave gets it. He really does. It’s all such a jumbled up mishmash of potential paradoxes and temporal obligations that Dave can already feel a new headache brewing in the already aching tissue of his brain. Between the whole near death experience and the usual aftershocks of trying to hold a time-stop, his brain can’t handle much more of this nonsense.

Time travel is hard. It’s hard and – yeah, no fucking way is he going to sink to that level of self-pity. Suck it up, Strider.

Looking up, Dave sighs and tries to jump up and grab the edge of the ladder for the fire escape.

Jumping hurts. Never trying that again. Nope. He grits his teeth, smooths the pain off his face, and then shifts a stray box of recycling under the ladder until he can just barely grip it with the edge of his fingers. Pulling himself up is nearly as bad as the whole jumping thing, but he manages it, and then he starts jogging up the stairs. He slows to a tiptoe when he nears the thirteenth floor, and he continues up the stairs past his room until he reaches the roof. After scanning it to make sure Bro isn’t up there training, Dave walks along the edge of the roof until he’s above the hole in his bedroom wall where he’s going to fall out nearly ten hours from now. He stops time gingerly once before he tries climbing down, and thankfully all his brain does is whine in protest at the brief pause. With that established, Dave stops time and lowers himself down into the bedroom, flashstepping and tiptoeing for all he’s worth.

Past-him is asleep in bed, dead to the world from the neck up. It’s really fucking weird seeing himself sleep, maybe even weirder than watching himself walk around being a future-douche, so Dave pointedly avoids looking at the giant puddle of blankets curled up in the corner of the bed by the wall. He grabs the first outfit he finds in the closet, a black hoodie and pants combo he’d worn last week and that his future self has - had - will have been (god fucking dammit) apparently slumming around town in all day long. He can’t change in here, because if he left his garbage-clothes in the room he would remember smelling them earlier. Later.

Earlier in his timeline, later in the day.

Fuck. He’s going to say it. Time travel is hard. It’s hard and no one understands. Dave’s not even sure he understands – he has no idea what made the whole time travel thing happen, or why his throat started seizing up right before he went back. And time-travel tenses are going to annoy the shit out of him, he can tell.

It hits him when he’s in the middle of changing his shirt in the restroom of a classy McDonalds just down the street, and he starts changing in more of a hurry.
There’s always been one person who mysteriously has known more about his powers than either Dave nor Bro have ever been able to figure out, and his future self already told him where to find her.

Dave hits up the McDonalds for dinner, only to find that there are no chicken nugs. None. Only breakfast food.

Because it's six in the goddamn morning.

Everything tastes just a little bit less satisfying after that revelation. He ends up ordering shitty McDonalds pancakes from the brownblood behind the counter, a troll with curvy horns who stares right through Dave's hero costume with the shell-shocked thousand yard stare of a man who has spent too long in food service and has started having war flashbacks while still trapped in the trenches.

With his daily dose of absolutely pointless calories out of the way, Dave walks to the medical center. He does end up taking the Metro this time, because honestly if he tried to run across roofs right now he'd probably face plant. No one even gives him a second glance. It's possible the bag of soggy pancakes throws them off his manly, heroic scent. The perfect accessory for a disguise; just add one standard McDonald's bag and viola, everyone thinks you're a hero cosplayer who forgot to change back in the morning. He disembarks in a swarm of medical students in their sickly pastel scrubs at the Memorial Hermann stop, immensely dissatisfied with the pancakes but still mindlessly shoveling them in when he spies a familiar, dark green trench coat lurking in the entrance of a parking garage. He's there between one moment and the next, everything else in the world stopping except for the Badass Quandary, who merely tilted her head to the side and continues to stare at the tiny embers at the end of her cigarette. She's not actually smoking it; she just has it lit up while she taps on her cigarette holder with a sharp black claw.

See, what Dave had first thought to be a really thin bladekind when he met the carapacian dame in a dark alley is, in fact, a weaponized cigarette holder. And the fact that BQ is tapping away on her strife specibi means that she's fucking pissed. Part of her strange telepathy is tied up in the motion of her hands when she speaks, which means that she's giving him the silent treatment.

He leans back against the pillar of the parking garage, dumping his empty food bag in the trash. "Figured out the whole time travel thing," he offers. "Any other miracles you'd like, ma'am, because I'm on a roll here. I refuse to slow my roll. I can't be tamed -"

She lightly tips the cigarette holder away from her mouth and the little furrow appears in the smooth carapace above her right eye that Dave thinks is the equivalent of an eyebrow raise. But then she puts the cigarettekind away and he relaxes a bit as she starts to speak.

BQ: Dave Strider, your nonsensical verses test my patience on a regular basis.

BQ: However, the news that you have at last begun to refind yourself, after all these years of futile effort on my part is...undeniably welcome.

BQ: If, of course, it is true.

BQ: Prove it.

"What." Dave folds his arms. "Lady, future-me had to shove me out of a building to make it happen. Sorry if I'm not jumping up and down trying to recreate the circumstances.
BQ: It could be arranged.

Dave takes a step to the side, so he has the street behind him. This lady doesn't make idle threats, and if he needs to run he wants to be in the sun, where her freaky shadows can't grab him. "As awesome as that sounds, I think I'll pass. Thanks though."

She just smirks at him, folding her arms as she leans up against her own pillar, one hip hitched up higher than the other.

BQ: I will pander to your whim for now, Dave.

BQ: Though there are many reasons why you might wish to feign ability you may not yet possess, I think I shall give you the benefit of the doubt.

BQ: If you are foolish enough to lie to me, you may as well suffer the consequences which may befall you.

"Thanks, I really appreciate it," he drawls, folding his own arms. "Now, can we get to the point here? Are you finally going to explain how you knew about the time thing? How you know anything you know, really? Because my patience ran out, like, two years ago. You didn't even have the decency to test it, my patience literally just ran out the door when you arrived. You goddamn owe me, woman. You owe me a patience debt."

BQ: You are being inanely whimsical again.

BQ: Sometimes I wonder exactly where they find you people. All of you are so...damaged.

BQ: You do not even realize how broken you are, do you?

Dave shifts restlessly, and has to fight the urge to look down at his feet, at the shadow he casts on the ground. He doesn't know if she can control his shadow, or if it's just whatever shadow she's touching at the time. But when she starts spouting really vague, ominously all-knowing bullshit like this, he gets antsy, as though the shadows might come alive and swallow him up while she has him distracted. "See, stuff like that," is all he says, allowing himself a small frown. "Some context for those things you just said? That would be fantastic. I might even shed a tear of joy. A tear, I'm telling you."

BQ: You are not ready to know the truth.

"No. Oh, hell no. You did not just pull the 'You Are Not Ready' card, what are you, some kind of alien dame Jedi mentor - oh." Dave freezes, then stares at her, jaw dropping. "Oh my god -"

BQ: Cease. Cease speaking. Do not even finish the sentence I know you are about to utter. I will not tolerate it. I absolutely refuse to tolerate these shenanigans.

BQ: I intend to tell you one thing and one thing only, Dave Strider.

BQ: Now that you can harness your true ability, it will begin. Once you have fully mastered it, they will know, and they will come for you.

Dave waits. The Quandary shows no sign of elaborating on that last bit. She just stands there, eyebrow raised, as though expecting some kind of reaction from him.

He flings up his hands and rolls his eyes so hard they actually ache. Or maybe that's still the headache from earlier. "Oh shit," he deadpans. "The nonspecific 'they' are coming. I can't believe it.
"Say it ain't so. I will not go -"

"Lady, there's nothing to take seriously." Dave lets his arms fall. "Yeah, I get it. The spooky lady in a trench coat thing. It's your thing. It's a great thing, it works for you. The thing is also causing some serious communication problems here. Like. If you want me to be worried about some mysterious 'they,' I kind of need more to work with here. Striders don't scare that easy."

BQ: They are the same people who approach me on a regular basis seemingly with the sole purpose of earning my undying ire.

BQ: The ones who will destroy you if you are not careful.

BQ: They would already have set upon you if not for my efforts, and those of your elder relative.

"Now Bro knows about these guys?" Dave wants to fling his hands up in genuine confusion. He sticks his hands into his hoodie pocket instead, fiddling with some card suit-themed ninja stars still stuck in there from last week. "Wow, somehow a bunch of nameless unspecified assholes trying to destroy me never came up at the wholesome, all-American Strider dinner table."

When the Quandary responds, her voice feels cooler and almost disdainful as it blooms in his head - but she literally always sounds as though she expects Dave to bow down and kiss the toes of her sleek boots every time they meet, so he's just learned to let it fly over his head.

BQ: If I were you, I would question your 'Bro,' then.

BQ: Ask him what he knows about the Midnight Crew.

BQ: Better yet, I would check the news. They have already begun to target one of your own. He too has been foolish enough to go wandering around in the public eye, flaunting his powers.

BQ: The females, at least, have been discreet.

BQ: Well, I say discreet...

"And now there are females. Your story keeps getting more complicated. The bullshit is shining through the cracks. Like a pile of gold-plated bullshit in the sun." He spreads his hands apart and shrugs again. "Nice try. If you're not getting any more chatty now that I've finally fulfilled your insane reality-breaking requirement, I'm done here. Sayonara, g2g -"

BQ: You think to win more details from me by plaguing me and threatening to ignore me.

BQ: Do you think me so simple?

Dave keeps his mouth shut. He runs a nervous hand through his hair as the awkward silence stretches out, scratching behind his ear to keep the hand near the hilt of his sword. He still doesn't know who has the quicker draw, him or the BQ, and he doesn't want to find out the pointy, painful way.

Clearly reveling in her conversational advantage, the Quandary nods her head, adjusting the brim of her ever-present hat. She stands up from her lounging position against the pillar and lets a hint of a sharp grin crinkle her eyes.

BQ: You think I do this deliberately to frustrate you, Dave.
"And the truth is...you are absolutely right."

"Oh my fucking god."

BQ: I am kidding.

"Okay, now that just sounded painful, did that actually hurt you -"

BQ: In truth, you would simply not believe me. It is literally impossible. Your brain would not allow you to hear the words as I spoke them. You are, all of you, such painfully broken creatures.

BQ: And so I will simply lead you to draw your own conclusions.

BQ: I will provide you the ability to access all the tools you need, and no more.

BQ: And you will be forced to accept the truth, one slow step at a time.

BQ: I am not here to mollycoddle you. I am here to make you strong, because I have no other choice. If you fail, we all do.

Dave lets his face meet his palm. "I remember we talked about the vague thing," he says, his voice muffled by his hand. "I swear, we just had this long conversation about how making really vague statements about dire consequences is a really cheap plot device -"

BQ: Ask the one that you call Brother.

BQ: And tell the blue windy one to tone it down.

BQ: His antics are making more than one major party nervous.

BQ: The Heir has always been...flighty.

BQ: But he listens to you.

Dave's head shoots up and he meets the Quandary's eyes. "Shit. What don't you know, lady," he said, licking at dry lips.

BQ: I know everything.

Dave twitches bodily at the harsh laughter that coughs out in black bursts in his head. "Okay, no, that needs to stop. That needs to stop being a thing. It needs to have never been a thing. Like, I am willing to jump off another building and go back in time and prevent you from ever making that kind of hell-noise again. Please stop."

BQ: A tempting proposition.

BQ: But no, I am afraid our time is up for the day.

BQ: Until our next session, Dave Strider.

"Can you at least wait until I look away before you do the - yeah, you're already doing it," Dave says, averting his eyes too late as the shadows of the parking garage rip up and swarm the Quandary, wrapping her up and dragging her down into the floor. He gets a little nauseous whenever she does that, like some kind of weird motion sickness.

When he looks up at the sky, waiting for his stomach to settle a bit, he sees the sun is now edging upward, his internal clock telling him it's nearly 10 in the morning. The heat of the oncoming day is burning away the little clouds of polluted mist, and he still has nearly eight hours before he's due to show up in his own room with delicious, delicious tacos and shove himself out a hole in the wall.

How did this become his life? When did he start having legitimate issues with time tenses on a regular basis? For that matter, why had he actually believed that learning how to travel back in time would make the Quandary any less of an answer-hording, stab-happy alien mentor-figure?

How long has that janitor been standing there, jaw slack, staring in total horror at the spot where the Quandary used to be?

Dave waits for a second. The poor guy just keeps staring, eyes wide. It doesn't seem like he's taking the sight of a woman being eaten by shadows very well.

"I feel you, man," Dave says, patting him on the back. Then he pulls his hood up and walks out of the parking garage, leaving the traumatized janitor behind.

He still has hours until he can reach his computer or his phone - both of which were on his desk when future-Dave pushed him out a window, and are now currently still in his room with past-Dave, because he remembers using them throughout the day and therefore couldn't yoink them when he raided the room for clothes. So he may not be able to log onto his Pesterchum account, but he can at least find a computer and check the Seattle Times. Try to figure out what the hell has the BQ all riled up.

Seriously. He leaves his ironic penpal alone for a few months, and apparently everything goes to hell and crazy alien dames start name dropping the Heir of Breath in ominous conversations.

Muttering under his breath, Dave crosses the street and heads for the nearby library. He has some catching up to do.

Even after surviving a grenade, Heir had thought he'd be able to finish up his patrol, riding the high that came from successfully dealing with Boxcar and getting Hemogoblin to agree to be his partner, but no dice.

At the moment, he is dealing with a couple of vandals in the Lake View Cemetery on 15th Avenue East. This crime had only been a gentle touch of the wind on his shoulder, not all that urgent since no one living was likely to be harmed by some assholes breaking into mausoleums. But it feels like it’s the first alert the breeze has given him since he’d ignored it earlier to go confront Hearts Boxcar by the docks, so Heir goes along with it, flying down until he’s concealed in a tree above the two men. Privately, Heir suspects that the wind is sulking; sure, he had let loose with a proper tornado for the first time since he was a kid, which naturally got the breezes excited, but before that he’d disregarded them entirely. And, as weird as it sounds, yeah, the air gets moody. It's still willing to waft him along above the city in a grid-search pattern, but he had to hunt down at least one attempted break-in on his own, without even a hint from his powers that a crime had been in progress beneath him.

Heir waits until the two men have chosen their next target and one pulls out a pair of bolt cutters before he descends, landing as lightly as possible to avoid jolting his collarbone too much. The general bodily ache from the grenade explosion has eased a bit as the night has worn on, but even turning too sharply in midair proves enough to send a stab of sickening pain outward from the broken bone. Definitely going to need to wear a sling to school; John wonders how he's going to explain this one to Karkat.

No, stop that. No thinking about John things while on the job. Focus.

"Guys, I don’t even want to know why you’re breaking into dead peoples’ tombs, do I?” he asks, folding his arms and wearing his best imitation of a look of stern fatherly disapproval. “Seriously, no. Just stop.”

The two men flinch and whirl to face at him. To Heir’s surprise, the guy with the bolt cutters groans and tucks them away into the back of his pants, pinching at the bridge of his nose. “Wow. Great. Heir is here. Tonight must be our lucky night.”

“Come on, we can take him!” the shorter vandal insists, waving his flashlight in Heir’s direction. “He’s just one guy!” He does a double-take when the flashlight crosses Heir’s face. “He’s a kid!”

“Aha. Yeah, and I’m sure every single other person he’s put in prison thought the exact same thing before he kicked their ass. Just leave it. We’ve already been to three cemeteries tonight, and I’m pretty sure this one is a bust too.” The other vandal shakes his head. “This is so not worth it.”

“Come quietly while I have the night guard call the police, and no one has to get hurt,” Heir offers, doing an internal dance of glee at this turn of events. Even after years of crime fighting, it’s still really rare that a criminal decides to surrender when Heir arrives. One day, he likes to think, he’ll have established enough of a reputation that people choose not to commit crimes at all out of wariness of Heir's presence, but the city isn’t quite there yet. It's a long term goal.

The shorter one laughs briefly, rolling his eyes up at the sky as he hefts the flashlight, his hands spread out on either side. “Yeah, police. About that. I don’t do police.”

And then he lashes out - with the flashlight. The first wild jab is aimed right at Heir's face, and he's so startled he barely knocks the stab off-course with a wall of wind in time.

A flashlight strife specibus? Who even does that?! Crazy people, that's who! Jeez!

Heir dodges another swing of the unconventional weapon, and the bright beam of the flashlight blinds him momentarily. Shit. Blinking hard to try to restore his night vision, he swipes out without looking with a blast of wind. He must hit something, because he hears an 'oof!' of pain. When he can see again, the flashlight guy has stumbled back against a tall tombstone, looking winded.

Oh god yes. What a truly epic pun. He's adding that one to the list of convenient one-liners.

All puns seem funnier when you're concussed, Heir decides. But as much as he hates to admit it, fighting with a broken collarbone kind of sucks, and he needs to wrap this up before he topples over sideways. He walks over the guy and knocks the flashlightkind out of his hand. Just when he socks the guy in the jaw, however, the ground shimmies underneath his feet, and his center of balance vanishes. Heir catches himself on the tombstone, but his vision spins for a few long, dizzy moments, and he panics internally until the graveyard comes back into focus. "Augh," he mutters, standing upright and putting up his hands in a fighting stance as he turns to face the second vandal.

The criminal looks hesitant, then raises his hands above his head. "Yeah, sorry about him. I swear, I'm not stupid. I'm coming quietly."

"Good," Heir says, flying off the ground a little. The world tilts as he flies up to scan for the groundskeeper, and he has to close his eyes for a moment while his brain tries to keep up with his thoughts. He finally has to use the wind to shout for the groundskeeper and send the noise directly to the old man's ears, and then Heir floats down to the ground to wait by the two vandals as the guard hurries over between the rows. Thankfully, the flashlight vandal stays down, and the other criminal stays true to his word, staying docile and quiet until the police sirens begin to grow in volume.

It isn't Heir but John who flies away, arcing up into the early morning sky. His collarbone throbs in earnest now, and between the slight nausea and the headache, his vision feels slow and unreliable.

Yeah, he's going to have to call it a night. Being this dazed on the job is just too much of a risk to take. Waving down at the police below, John takes off into cloud cover.

The sharp, dull ache in the back of his skull only worsens as John flies home. His ears are ringing, and he highly suspects that more than once during the flight he starts to veer off course, lost in a fog of sudden fatigue until the wind nudges him roughly in the side to wake him up. He yawns widely and his mask catches between his lips when he closes his mouth. He hasn't felt this bone-tired after a night of work in a long time, and he's beginning to suspect that somewhere along the way he managed to exacerbate that head injury from the first explosion into a full-on concussion.

Or at least, he thinks he feels concussed. He might be too concussed to judge accurately. Definitely time to get a second opinion.

So, for the first time in quite a while - years, actually - when he gets home and lets the wind gently set him on his feet in his bedroom, he closes the window, strips off his goggles and mask, and crosses the hall to knock on his dad's door.

- The worst part about being officially concussed, John muses, is that he can't go to sleep.

He knows he's unusual in that he only needs three or four hours of sleep to function well - he relies on that endurance to maintain his long days and nights as a crime fighter. But the fact is, he really, really needs those four hours of sleep. When seven in the morning on Thursday rolls around, his eyes feel too dry and gritty, and he can barely keep his head upright as he lounges on the couch in the living room, his dad propped up on the armchair across from him for moral support. His muscles feel heavy and useless on top of the residual ache from the grenade and the bank explosion, and without any sleep he's not healing as fast as he usually does, either.

Basically, when he staggers to his feet and looks in the mirror over the bathroom sink, he has no choice but to admit he's a mess. While the scabby bump on the back of his head is hidden by his hair, at some point, perhaps when the grenade blew up, he managed to take enough of an impact to his face that the entire right side is a bruise that just barely misses swelling up to close up his eye. Combine that with the sling on his arm, and he looks like he came out the loser in some kind of bar fight. Or, you know, like some guy who just survived a grenade.

He knows exactly what his dad is going to say when he sees this mess in the light -

"No school today, I think," his dad says, leaning in through the door to raise an eyebrow at John in the mirror. He raises a hand for silence when John starts to protest. "No buts, John. I want you awake for at least eight more hours, to see if this concussion gets any worse. I don’t want you going to school and collapsing in the middle of class, in which case I wouldn’t be aware of the situation until the school or the hospital informed me. We’ll talk about work tonight after we assess you again."

John sighs, well aware that his dad is probably right. He grimaces at the mirror one last time before smiling ruefully. “Oh my god. Karkat is going to be so pissed.” He does feel a little bad about that, actually. Karkat likes to hide behind his prickly outer shell, but he really does have a soft, squishy inside when it comes to his friends, of which there are few. Actually, aside from a few rare pesterchums, John might be the only one Karkat knows in real life, and it shows. When they’d accidentally blown up a glass beaker in Chemistry earlier in the year, Karkat had fretted over a cut on John’s hand to the point that the nurse had almost used troll-class sedatives on him. John can only imagine how he’ll react to the rather obvious bruises and sling.

The ragegasm will no doubt be of epic proportions.

It’s probably for the best if he doesn’t let Karkat see him until tomorrow, after he gets a chance to actually sleep the concussed headache off. John scrubs at his face and nods to his dad. “Alright. I’m gonna call Karkat so he knows I won’t be there.”

His dad steps aside so that John can leave the bathroom and walk to the phone in the living room. “Karkat can come over later, but no roughhousing,” he cautions, eyebrow raised speculatively. Haha, Dad. John only wishes there were a certain kind of roughhousing involved in his relationship with Karkat. “Nah. I’m pretty sure Thursday afternoons he has his part time job until late,” John says. Yeah, Thursdays are definitely Karkat’s work-intensive days, when he works two shifts back to back at the store to make up for taking Friday afternoons off. John should be more certain about that, but his head is still a little foggy, and even stuff he has memorized like Karkat’s afterschool schedule seems kind of fuzzy. Blehhhh. Yeah, he doesn’t think he’d be able to focus in class, even if he did go. Good thing he’s always so far ahead on the homework!

“And your cover story?” Samuel asks, closing up the first aid kit on the coffee table and tidying up the couch where John had been sprawled in a daze for the past four hours.

John thinks. “I went to catch a box when someone was unloading a shipment at the community center, and it was too heavy to be dropped like it was on my collar bone. Totally an accident, nothing serious. The hospital sent me right home.”

Before he begins dialing Karkat’s number, Samuel’s hand covers the number pad. When John looks up, confused, his dad gives him a searching look. He reaches up and pulls on John’s eyelids, ignoring John’s surprised jump as he inspects John’s pupils. “Son, you don’t have community center ‘volunteering’ lined up for Wednesdays. That’s Tuesdays and Thursdays. Your cover on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays is the land training for swim team.”

Oh. Whoa. Okay, yeah, now John understands why his dad might be checking his pupils again. He bites his lip. “Yeah, I remember now. It’s alright, I almost messed up Karkat’s schedule, too. Sorry. I think I’m just tired.”

“Confusion and fatigue are symptoms of the concussion. Just let me know if it gets any worse than a little confusion.” His dad pulls away, apparently satisfied that John isn’t completely out of touch with reality.

Still, there’s a weight in John’s head, a feeling he recognizes with a flip in his stomach as a kind of tired, sad resignation. Just another thing for his dad to worry about, huh? Just another way John has failed to balance his work life and his personal life -

He’d thought he was done feeling that particular emotion. That way only useless self-recrimination lies. He shakes his head as the dial tone rings in his ears, unpleasantly shrill, and tries to shove the resignation out of mind.
“And son?”

“Yeah, Dad?” he says. There’s silence except for the phone ringing until John looks up and meets his dad’s eyes, curious.

Samuel smiles warmly. “I’m proud of you. You did great work last night.”

The familiar words work instantly. John’s shoulders slacken as the tension stirred up by his brief foray into resigned self-pity falls away. Yeah, he still feels like he got blown up a few times, but emotionally, the obvious care and pride in his dad’s face brighten his darkening mood.

Sometimes, John doesn’t know how he’d get by without such an awesomely supportive dad. Unable to suppress a wide grin in response, John is smiling when the line clicks and Crabdad answers. Not even the lusus’s piercing skree of greeting can get him down! “Hey, Crabdad! How are you!”

The lusus’s screech may or may not have hit a high F note worthy of a trained soprano. Then it devolves in a series of excited clicks and skrees, Crabdad chattering at John incomprehensibly while he sits down on the couch again, maneuvering his sling so that it rests on a cushion. He doesn’t really understand the lusus; apparently it’s a troll thing that a custodian basically develops its own language for use with their assigned trolls, so the only one who actually communicates with Crabdad is Karkat, and John gets the feeling a lot of that is just Karkat swearing in crab-language. But Crabdad doesn’t seem to mind that John can’t talk back. Maybe it’s just happy to have an audience that doesn’t try to silence it with food bribes and pseudo-strife whenever it starts screeching.

He doesn’t need to ask the lusus to go get Karkat for the same reason – Karkat seems to have the uncanny ability to sense whenever his lusus is on the phone. Well, John says uncanny. It’s more that Crabdad’s regular speaking voice is so shrill and loud that you can hear it talking from half a block away. Sure enough, after three minutes of John nodding to himself and making small sounds of affirmation whenever the lusus pauses, he can hear the heavy thump of footsteps that means Karkat is charging downstairs to intercept the call.

“JOHN! I CAN HEAR YOU ENCOURAGING THIS! I CAN HEAR YOU ENABLING THIS FATASS, INCOMPETENT, MISERABLE EXCUSE FOR A LUSUS! STOP THAT RIGHT THE FUCK NOW OR SO HELP ME – PUT THAT TABLE DOWN, NO, NO! DOWN! DAMN YOU, I AM ARMED!”

John starts cackling, and he’s still giggling on and off by the time Karkat tames his lusus and extricates the phone from the crab’s pincer grip. “I do NOT need this first thing in the goddamn morning, John,” Karkat growls. “I have not yet had my coffee and you have caused these shenanigans. What can you possibly want before coffee happens, John? What. Do. You. Want.”

“Ah. About that coffee,” John begins. “Uh. I probably won’t be able to make it to school today. At all. Sorry about that.”

“What,” Karkat says, his voice flat. “What in the sixteen hells could possibly prevent you from going to school?! I think you have a better attendance record than me. I’m pretty sure the day you miss a full day of school is the same day I’m due to have this bloated fucking rage tumor removed from my brain, and oh wait, looks like I forgot to pencil that one in on my calendar! What the hell is wrong with you, John?! Do I have to come over there?!”

“Haha! Calm down, Karkat,” John laughs. “I just kind of tripped yesterday during land training. It was really weird, I was on a hill, and my collar bone took one for the team! It’s not really that bad, it just hurts a little, so my dad’s making me stay home today. I really am sorry about the coffee thing. I’ll owe you two on Friday!”

He waits for Karkat to answer, but there’s a long pause before he gets a response, long enough that he wonders if the connection dropped. He’s about to ask if Karkat is still there when the troll finally speaks.

“…I’m coming over. Don’t fucking move, you clumsy idiot, I’ll be over in five fucking minutes.”

Oops. “Whaaaat? Karkat, school starts in like a half an hour! Seriously, I’m okay! I’ll be back tomorrow, I promise.”

“School can go fuck itself right in the state-funded, clique-infested ass. If you’re in pain, I’m coming to see you.”

Oh, boy. John has seriously underestimated Karkat’s protective streak. The last thing he needs is for Karkat to come over here in a defensive rage over the collarbone and get an eyeful of John’s very concussed-looking face. The troll might literally implode. “No – Karkat, you have that…thingy today, right?” He’s scrambling for the answer; he knows Karkat has something in one of the classes John isn’t in, his brain is just so slow on the uptake – “History of film! You have that group presentation today!”

He can almost hear Karkat jerk to a halt, pausing for a moment before letting loose a low, sobbing groan of despair. “Those imbeciles.”

Karkat has started muttering unintelligibly to himself, and John can already tell he’s going to try to skip out in the afternoon even if the troll does give in and go to Film. Before Karkat can jump in and insist on coming over, John continues, “I’d really appreciate it if you’d apologize to Ms Hathaway for me in chem, too. I know she wanted us to finish up with that crystallization lab today.”

“…Fuck. I’ll go in and finish it,” Karkat says, sounding defeated. “Goddammit, you asshat, I have work right after school today, too. Can you somehow manage to avoid further damaging yourself until tomorrow morning? I’m fucking serious, if you say no, I swear to God John -”

“Do not say things like ‘dead’ right now, John,” Karkat hisses. “I mean – fuck – just – don’t even move from that couch. I absolutely forbid it as your moirail. That couch is your new seat of power. If your ass leaves that couch, I will know about it.”

Guilt starts building up in John’s stomach again, and he purses his lips. Now that some of the instinctive anger has died off, Karkat sounds tense and worried, and by the end of his mini rant he sounds almost like he’s in pain himself, and John can’t stand it that he’s made Karkat that upset. John’s mouth opens and the sound just kind of – happens. “Shoosh, dummy. I get it, the couch is my friend. Shooooosh.”

There’s silence on both ends of the line. "Did you just shoosh me?" Karkat asks.

Oh, fuck it. "Shoosh, Karkat."

Karkat is quiet again, and when he replies at last, the pain is gone. He just sounds kind of dazed. "I. Yeah. Alright. Um. I'm just - I'm gonna go - can you do that again?" He sounds almost painfully hopeful.

Meanwhile, on the inside, John is screaming and trying to mentally beat himself into shutting up sometime this century because why why why this is the opposite of what he wants oh god why is this happening.

On the outside, he can only pathetically repeat, "Shoosh?"

"...I'll see you tomorrow then, John," Karkat says, still dazed. John realizes why the troll sounds so strange - there isn't any anger or irritation in his voice at all. He hasn't even said fuck in nearly a minute, which is seven different kinds of freaky. "Stay safe and don't injure yourself anymore, got it?"

"Yeah, I got it," John says weakly. "Have a good day at school, Karkat!" Then he hangs up in the middle of Karkat's dazed farewell and topples over sideways onto the couch, letting the phone fall from limp hands as he stares into the middle distance.

Yeah, he succeeded in getting Karkat to go to school.

But he’s also pretty sure he’s just moirail-zoned himself into the next century.

John takes the cushion from under his sling, plants it over his face, and muffles a frustrated scream against the fabric. When he finally emerges, his head buzzing with a new headache, he hears a chuckle that tries to morph itself into an innocent cough at the last minute. He looks up to see his father standing in the kitchen, still coughing and trying to look busy with making breakfast.

Yeah, John is never going to live this one down.

- After a very long, rather boring day of staying at home and forcing himself to stay awake, running through only the gentlest of t'ai chi forms when it's time for he and his dad to practice together, John crawls into bed as soon as his dad gives the all clear. He wakes up once during the night, groggy and confused by the fact that it's dark out and he isn't patrolling, before fatigue yanks him back down into slumber.

The next morning when his alarm goes off, he's so bleary-eyed and sticky-mouthed that it feels like he's been to the fifth dimension and back. This is what usually happens when he's slept for too long, and it feels awful. He wakes up properly and feels more alive after a shower, though it's hard to maneuver with the pangs from his collarbone restricting his motions. However, when he gets out and dressed, the bruises on his face have clearly faded, and he knows he can't endure another endlessly drawn-out day of sitting around like yesterday. He needs some fresh air before he explodes or something.

His dad insists on driving him to school. John rolls the passenger side window down and the wind stirred up by the car blows right into his face, curling around and through his hair with bright greetings. By the time they reach the school, he feels almost normal again, totally recharged by the crisp spring air.

Now he just has to face down Karkat. This should be fun. Stacking one mug of hot, black coffee on top of the promised second mug, John rolls out of the car and waves with his sling as his dad drives off. Then he walks into the school building and heads upstairs to his and Karkat's lockers.

Karkat isn't even bothering with the pretense of sorting through his textbooks when John rounds the corner. The troll scans the hallways with his back to his locker, hunched over in his oversized grey hoodie, and when John waves and begins his approach, Karkat glowers at him with a combination of relief and his usual irritation.

Then his rust-red eyes open so wide John can see them almost bulging as Karkat gets a better look at John's face.

John grins with all his teeth and braces for impact. "Heya Karkat! Good morning!"

It is a slow-building rage, and is somehow simultaneously heart-warming, hilarious, and terrifying to behold. The dull dark red of a flush rises in Karkat's cheeks, one of his eyes twitching as his lips move soundlessly. His hands jerk and flail in weird, half-aborted motions; Karkat is clearly torn between tearing at his hair in distressed fury, reaching out to grab John's arm, and attempting to strangle him. The latter instinct may or may not be winning out, which would be goddamn hilarious, if painful to fight off.

But Karkat's face just keeps getting redder and redder, and John's not really sure the troll is remembering to breathe between his choked noises of utter fury. The last thing John wants is to finally cause the rage-aneurysm Karkat has repeatedly threatened to develop in the past, so he drops the shit-eating grin and puts on his best apologetic face. Karkat would say he was pouting if Karkat could speak at the moment. He would be right. "Yaaaaah, it looks a lot worse than it actually is -"

Karkat holds up a hand, and John shuts up. The hand twitches between strangle-mode and calm as Karkat visibly attempts to collect himself, hiccupping silently as he opens his mouth, then closes it repeatedly, still unable to find words. Tears of pure, undiluted fury seem to be touching the edges of his eyes with red.

John has finally done it. He has made Karkat so angry, the troll is literally speechless. He wishes he had a camera to immortalize this moment of their friendship for all eternity because this is hilariouse.

A single chuckle bursts out of John's lips, and he realizes what he has done too late, slapping his free hand across his mouth.

And then, like a volatile, incensed god unleashing his boundless wrath upon an unwitting creation, Karkat loses. His. Shit. He reaches out and seizes John by the - thankfully - uninjured arm and suddenly John is being dragged through the halls by a surprisingly strong grip. He lets Karkat do his thing, despite the fact that they're aiming for the biology classroom rather than their first classes, because John has a feeling Karkat needs to get this off his chest, and John has kind of been a bit of a dick about this by keeping him out of the loop.
Karkat kicks open the door of the biology lab with great prejudice, and the teacher grading papers at the front of the room yelps and bangs her knee on the side of the desk as she stands up, giving the two of them a wary eye. Ignoring her, Karkat rounds on John, and the invectives pour forth like a fountain of fury.

"Oh my god, you pompous fuckwaffle, what the gibbering fuck did you do to yourself?!" he yells, his voice half-shrieking when he hits a high note and keeps climbing.

"Ahaha, sorry, Karkat, I told you I got kind of banged up yesterday-"

"'Kind of' he says! 'I FELL', he tells me! You look like you got into a fight with the wall, and the wall fucking well kicked your ass, and then it called its magical gang of wall-friends and they decided 'you know what would be fun? You know what would be fucking hilarious? If we beat the everloving panshattered fuck out of John 'dumbass' Egbert!' Does any of that sound familiar?!
BECAUSE IF NOT YOU BETTER HAVE A GOOD EXPLANATION FOR THIS!"

Ooooh, boy. He'd sworn he wouldn't do this. He wasn't going to -

"JOHN EGBERT I AM GOING TO HUNT DOWN THE PERSON WHO PRESUMABLY DID THIS AND RIP THEIR SHAMEGLOBES OUT THROUGH THEIR STOMACH IF YOU DON'T ANSWER ME RIGHT NOW -"

But he needs a distraction! Before the scared-looking teacher calls the police on them or something!
Shit! He's going to do the thing!

John paps Karkat on the cheek. It takes everything in his being not to stroke said cheek and take this in a very different direction. Instead, he takes his hand off and paps Karkat again. "Shoosh." When he doesn't get his hand bitten off, he does it again. "Shoosh, Karkat."

Karkat's hands fall and he stares at John, one eye still half-scrunched in stilled fury. "You're not getting out of this that easily," he says weakly, sounding uncertain and dazed.

Oh my god, it's like a magic anger-off switch, John thinks, equally dazed. Why has John never known about this before? Has this always been a thing?! He's not oblivious, he's watched Karkat's stupid rom-coms and seen how the troll romances work, how the moirails shoosh each other and the auspices slap their feuding partners into stunned calm. He's just never put two and two together and realized it works when it's a human and a troll friendship. Interspecies moirails aren't exactly a common thing, not when troll serendipity works the way it does.

Which means Karkat really and truly does see John as his moirail.

John's stomach twists with guilt, and he swallows back bile as he musters up a smile from somewhere. Pretending he doesn't wish he could just lean forward and kiss the anger off his best friend's face, he pulls Karkat into a hug. "I'm fine. I'm fine, and you're fine. We're fine. You don't need to eviscerate anyone in the middle of a schoolday, I promise. I just fell down a hill badly."

When Karkat hugs him back, his short claws digging into John's back and his coarse black hair brushing against John's face while the troll rests his forehead on John's shoulder, John feels both guilty and happy at the same time and he has no idea what to do about any of it.

Because yeah, he really doesn't want to get friend-zoned the rest of his life. But he also really wants his best friend to not be upset. John is happiest when Karkat is his usual irritated, amused self, not drowning in so much rage on John's behalf that he can't even breathe.

And he thinks, as Karkat pulls away and glares to hide the faint smile on his lips, that if being moirails makes Karkat happy, then he doesn't know how to say no.

But somewhere low in his belly, he can feel the ugly guilt twisting into a more permanent knot.

This...isn't going to end well. He can feel it.

When John gets upstairs, easing his backpack off over his sling and tossing it beside his desk, the first thing he notices is the small beep of a notification from Pesterchum from his computer. Which is kind of weird; Karkat wouldn’t have reached home yet, and normally they don’t really pester each other in earnest until they’ve both had dinner and settled down to do homework. Sometimes their schedules sync enough to work on their homework together, but it hadn’t worked out today, though John could tell by the worried look on Karkat's face that he’d probably wanted to just sit and watch John some more. Even after getting shooshed into a stupor, Karkat had spent the rest of the day all up in John's personal space, following him in the hallways even when their classes were are opposite ends of the building, and growling whenever someone - particularly trolls - accidentally jostled John's arm and aggravated his collarbone. He seemed to accept John's story about a bad fall, but John still caught the troll eyeing the facial bruising speculatively.

Frowning, John pulls his hoodie off and opens the window to let in a nice breeze, wrapping it absently around him as he sits heavily in the chair, clicking open chat window with the scent of early spring heavy in his nose.

It isn’t Karkat’s handle, carcinoGeneticist, nor is it an unceasing wall of caps locked grey text spewing artfully crafted metaphors and invectives on his screen.

The handle is turntechGodhead, and John sucks in a breath at the bright crimson text that is currently sprawling its way down the screen in rambling, short, uncapitalized fragments. It’s been months since he’s heard from this particular contact. There had been a time when speaking to him had been the only thing saving John from a mental breakdown. Then Karkat had moved into town, and John’s mental stability had a real life friend to latch onto and depend on, not a chum with strange hours and a penchant for rapping at length about anything from the weather to the latest criminal he’d captured.

That’s because turntechGodhead is the handle for Flashstep, the time-stopping hero based in Houston. Of course, they don’t use their heroic aliases or last names on here; it would be idiotic to leave that kind of electronic evidence lying around where any decent hacker could find it. Instead, John had given Flashstep his real first name – in hindsight, that had been pretty fucking stupid, but… John hadn’t exactly been on top of his game when they’d met. In return, he’d been told to call the other hero ‘Dave.’ Who knows if that’s actually the guy’s name or not.

EB: yeah, yeah
EB: hang on while i shut my door

John has been glancing over his shoulder all this time, his anxiety increasing with each new line of red text. He leaves his chair, listens to the sounds of dinner being prepared downstairs, and closes his bedroom door noiselessly.

Yeah. His dad doesn’t exactly know that John’s in contact with another hero.

It’s not that John had intended to keep it a secret; it was just that at the time he had been in a really bad place, mentally. He had felt so caged in and suffocated by the work, so very alone when Rose’s letters trickled to a halt, and talking to his dad had stopped helping and started being part of the problem once John was thoroughly immersed in the negative, circular logic of his depression. When John had returned from his…excursion, he had kept his near hourly conversations with Dave on the downlow as he slowly worked through the process of dealing with his depression, not wanting to risk his dad cutting off one of the few human connections John had left.

Between the awkward therapy sessions where he wouldn’t talk about half of his real problems and the much more useful, rambling chats with Dave, John had somehow pieced himself together enough to get out of bed in the morning. The summer months had helped, freeing him from the constraining burden of acting normal at school and letting him channel his frustration into nearly sixteen hour shifts of nonstop crime-fighting. Then the next year Karkat had arrived, and things had gotten so much better.

But in the midst of all that chaos and motivation-sapping, tired sadness, the topic of going to Houston and accidentally running into the Flashstep, only to end up being pesterchums with the guy, had somehow failed to come up. His dad knows John reached Houston, but not what happened there that made John turn back and come home. And now it’s been long enough that John feels reeeally guilty about neglecting to tell his dad about such a huge potential security breach.
But the Flashstep is also a hero. John uses this to justify it to himself that if the other hero ever leaks John’s side of the pesterlogs to the media or something, he also risks exposing himself. And in the part of his brain that grew up on a steady diet of Rose Lalonde-brand psychoanalysis, John knows that he sees Dave as a backup, a failsafe, a safety net in case he loses control again. In case he’s alone again. If he reveals this secret to his dad, John risks losing that safety net, and somewhere deep down, he’s still not ready for that. He doesn’t know that he ever will be.

By the time he goes back to the computer, only a moment later, Dave has somehow managed to rack up another monologue. He and Karkat are both as bad as the other about chattering nonstop about nothing at all. Rose could do the same thing with her psychobabble if you let her. Does John just have some talent for picking up friends who enjoy monologuing?

TG: whoa closing the door
TG: damn son you move fast
TG: i mean i dont know if my innocent eyes are ready for this TG: you said no webcams does this mean were doing this the old fashioned way with selfies from a camera phone
TG: ngl EB that would be ironic as fuck and i would have no choice but to be proud of you
TG: against my better judgment
TG: the anticipation is killing me
EB: oh my god dave how is it even possible for one man to type so much in twenty seconds???
TG: its a talent john an art passed down in my family for generations
TG: now put out
EB: i'm not sending you naked pics you assat! :P you're the one who pestered me, so what did you need?
TG: whoa
TG: a man cant just want to talk to his main internet compadre?
TG: catch up after a few months of heartwrenching silence?
TG: heartwrenching john you hear me youre taking the contents of a home improvement tool kit to my heart here
TG: youve replaced me havent you
TG: and you didnt even have the decency to refund my dowry TG: you bastard i want my bros twenty head of cattle back
EB: no refunds man sorry
EB: the cattle are alllll mine now TG: cold man
TG: and now my family will starve through the long winter months
TG: will send you pics of our frozen wasted corpses later for the scrapbook EB: winter is over, dumbass!
EB: do they even have winter in houston? i thought snow was a myth there.
TG: it is john
TG: snow is a conspiracy of global proportions
TG: but thats not the point the point is i am speaking to you from beyond the grave because you didnt return my familys cattle before the long cold came and now the world will never be blessed with the rightfully sick beats of my first solo album

John can feel his face almost hurting with the force of his smile, and he tones it down, shaking his head slightly. He’s forgotten how weird conversations with Dave could be. It’s a change of pace from talking with Karkat about school and part-time jobs and superhero comics. You never know what bizarre tangent Dave will go off on next.

There’s also an opportunity here. Usually they keep the hero stuff to a bare minimum on the chat forum; neither of them have ever outright declared the subject out of bounds, but by mutual agreement they didn’t bring up hero work unless John was having a crisis, and that clause hasn’t been used in ages.

The thing is, from what little John has been able to decipher from Dave’s unpredictable banter over the years, the Puppeteer is more than just the Flashstep’s partner; they’re brothers, and they definitely seem to live together. Maybe it’s a stretch, but the Puppeteer is probably around twenty years old than the two of them, and he would have more experience as a hero than Dave. He might have run across the Midnight Crew before – Houston is a big port city after all, and John can’t imagine a big-time criminal organization wouldn’t have attempted to put down roots in such a key urban area. Dad had promised to check all his contacts for information on the Crew, and he’d found out quite a bit. John should do the same.

EB: serious talk time
TG: what
TG: oh fuck
TG: tell me you’re not pregnant EB
TG: i am not the goddamn father am i TG: fight me i am not
TG: my body is a virgin temple dammit
EB: stopppp dave i’m not pregnant! :P
EB: i just have a question for you
EB: and maybe your bro
TG: whoa
TG: whoa man when did bro become part of this TG: you been cheating on me with him EB that aint cool
TG: i want a paternity test
EB: dude will you calm down? this is not a federal fucking issue AND I AM NOT PREGNANT
EB: ANYWAY. i just wanted to ask if you or your bro have ever come across an organization called the Midnight Crew
EB: they came into town recently and they started off by blowing up two buildings and tossing a hand grenade at my face
EB: which you can imagine was kind of a downer
EB: so i wondered if your bro might have dealt with them before

Radio silence. John winces and cracks his neck, eyeing the pesterlog before glancing back over his shoulder. The door is still closed, but when he tugs on the air that passes under the door frame he can hear the sounds from downstairs, the beep of the oven as it finishes cooking something that smells like chicken parmesan. He doesn’t have much longer before he has to head down to eat, or his dad will come looking for him. Rubbing at his collarbone absently, he turns back to the screen.

EB: dave?
EB: daaaaave?
TG: okay you’re the second person today to mention this midnight crew thing to me
TG: the other one told me to ask bro about them, too
TG: let it be known that i am officially concerned
TG: also a grenade
TG: literally what the fuck
TG: hang on lemme figure out how to ask my bro
EB: why is that a problem? are you keeping me a secret dave?
EB: and you accuse me of being ashamed of our brohood!
EB: lame, man
TG: shut up our broship is the stuff of legends
TG: but maybe i just want something that my bro hasn't completely taken over in my life
TG: oh but no now everyone and their mother wants a piece of him TG: christ

Whoa. That was...unexpected. John actually sits back a little from the computer screen and raises an eyebrow. The Puppeteer and Flashstep have been partners basically since they first showed up, and they've never shown any signs of animosity. Hell, they barely interact while on the job at all, at least according to the Houston news reports and numerous fan-made comic series. But that was definitely some resentment John just read, there.

EB: uh
EB: do we need to jam about this?
EB: because i don't think i'm allowed to have unsolicited feelings jams without permission anymore but that rant right there? reeks of some feels that need jamming TG: dude what the fuck is a feelings jam why is that a thing
EB: it's a troll thing okay can we get back on topic
TG: im still thinking okay
TG: you're not a troll
TG: which means you're totally in one of the troll things aren't you TG: why am i the last one to hear about this john

John just rolls his eyes, pulling a face. This conversation is going nowhere fast. Seriously, why do all of his friends go on and on like this? Does he secretly just like suffering through this kind of pesterspam all the time? He wishes Rose were here to help sort things out.

Actually, he just wishes Rose were here at all. He's been missing her a lot lately, though it's still not nearly as fresh a pain as it had once been.

In the end, he decides to put Flashstep off by playing the confidentiality card.

EB: one of my significant relationships is with a troll alright. any more detail is breaking our confidentiality clause
EB: :PPP
TG: fine i see how it is TG: anyway okay im gonna go ask my bro
TG: since the grenade thing means things are all kinds of fucknasty TG: seriously you alright
EB: oh my god dave, it was like two days ago, i'm fine now. but it seems like things might be escalating again and that is Not Okay.
TG: fine
TG: wait what
TG: did you actually just say this happened two days ago
TG: and yet you're FINE
TG: do you not listen to the words that come out of your mouth because holy shit
EB: gosh dave you're totally overreacting EB: the, you know, windy thing caught most of it, and i'm pretty resilient. all things considered, i got off pretty lucky!
TG: yeah none of this is okay
TG: no assholes are allowed to blow up my promised husband without my permission TG: it's on TG: gonna go approach bros lair brb
-- temperedTitan has joined the chat! --
TT: already here
TG: what
EB: what
TT: that's just fucking adorable

Wait, is that - it must be. This is the Puppeteer. John has to readjust his sling, staring at the screen with shocked fascination on his face. Of all the things he'd thought he'd be doing tonight, chatting with the actual real-life Puppeteer was not on the list in any way. This is...kind of awesome.

TG: how TG: you've been spying on my chatlogs TG: you fucker
EB: uh
EB: hi dave’s bro?
TT: sup
TT: don’t need to spy on you kid
TT: trust you not to fuck up too bad
TT: just got a trace on ‘Midnight Crew’
TT: which your friend set off
TT: it piqued my interest
EB: so you do know about them!
TT: depends
TT: gotta a few questions for you first kid
TG: okay no
TG: fuck no
TG: you see this this is me telling you no
TG: piss off and ill come ask you about this in your room TG: get out of our chat this is fucking private TT: nice try kid
EB: you guys seem to need to talk about this, should I leave for a bit?
TG: no
TT: no

Well then. John just shakes his head, trying to figure out where this messed up conversation is going. It's like Dave is just incapable of staying on track.

TT: first – you’re Heir, right
EB: um, no i'm not.
TT: good enough
TT: second – the MC just got started in your neck of the woods this past week?
TG: i can’t believe you're doing this
-- turntechGodhead has banned temperedTitan from the chat! --
-- temperedTitan cannot be banned from the chat! --
TT: let the kid answer my question
TG: leave him alone
EB: uh, it's okay dave, they're pretty reasonable questions!
EB: yeah, actually, they just showed up out of nowhere about four days ago.
TT: good
TT: then you still have time to run
EB: huh?

John feels his whole body go tense, darting a look at the open window even as a restless breeze stirs around him, wary and ready for trouble. He has to unclench his fists before he can type again, painfully aware as he types that his dad should be coming up the stairs any moment, and he has no good explanation for the conversation going on right now with not just one but two prominent heroes. This is really nerve-wracking!

TG: oh my christ
TG: why the fuck would he run are you completely insane
EB: seriously!!
EB: i can’t just run away and abandon my city to them! >( not cool dave’s bro!
TT: you fucking run kid
TT: you take whoever you care about in this world and you run
EB: why?!
TT: because that’s what i did

John stops. His head is buzzing, and he stares at the strange mixture of blue, red, and pale orange-yellow that form a long column on his pesterchum window. He buries a hand in his hair and tries to fight back the frustration and confusion pounding in his brain. This is not what he wants to hear from one of the most powerful known heroes in the continental United States.

TG: what are you talking about TG: bro wtf is going on TT: kid you think i have a texas accent?
TT: we started in fucking Atlanta
TT: then those MC fuckers turned up out of bugfuck nowhere and started harassing us
TT: you were a barely toilet trained and they had machine guns
TT: and they weren’t pissing around trying to take over the city or anything
TT: they were targeting us. deliberately.
TT: when i couldn’t run them out of the town i grabbed you and we fucking ran TT: if i couldn’t fucking root them out, no fucking way this kid is gonna be able to

By this point, John can only shake his head, trying and failing to imagine just what the Crew could have brought to bear against the Puppeteer that would actually have driven him out of town. He's a legend among the ranks of real life heroes, almost inhuman in his fighting prowess with both sword and puppet.

But knowing the Crew has faced off with the Puppeteer himself and won, as disturbing as the news is, doesn't change anything.

TG: EB
TG: john
TG: fuck john you still there
EB: yeah i'm here...
EB: and like hell am i running away!
TT: i can’t believe i’m fucking saying this TT: don’t be the hero here kid
TT: you’re only gonna get you and everyone around you hurt or killed
EB: that’s not gonna happen.
EB: i’m not turning tail just because you say so!
EB: i was just asking if you had any info that might help me and my partner counter them.
EB: anything that isn’t telling me to abandon my city to these guys?
TT: nope
TG: you never fucking run from anything what the hell happened
TG: no way a bunch of pansy ass gangsters could beat you so what the fuck
TT: i had my priorities
EB: well clearly you and i have different priorities!!! and mine include not running away when these guys keep blowing up public buildings! >;

John is shaking with anger now. He doesn’t actually know that he’s ever been this angry just staring at a computer screen before. He can hear the loud clattering downstairs that means his dad is setting the table, a chore John usually helps with, but he doesn’t think he could leave this spot even if his dad came upstairs and started reading the chatlog over his shoulder. The sharp pain of the concussion is beating a tattoo against the back of his head, which just irritates him even more.

John is so. Fucking. Furious.

How dare this guy suggest Heir run.

TT: then you're suicidal
TT: at least give this partner of yours fair warning before you drag him into a firefight he can’t walk away from
EB: that’s not gonna happen!
EB: we can handle ourselves!!!
TT: they have way more than bombs and guns kid
TT: you haven’t met all the card suits yet
EB: what, like Hearts Boxcar? been there, beat that.
TT: if he’s not dead you haven’t beat him kid
TT: Hearts isn't gonna go away just because he’s behind bars TT: believe me kid. i went through this before. you think you can handle this, but they have numbers, they have money, and they have one thing none of us can match
TT: they have Jack Noir
EB: i don’t know what the hell a Jack Noir is but i get it. you can’t help.
TG: im sorry EB
TG: fuck this was a fucking mistake
EB: it's not your fault dave. your bro is apparently just a totally unhelpful douche...
TT: last warning, kid. just get out of town. go settle down in some nice new urban locale and pick up where you left off
EB: just. stop. just stop i can’t even deal with this right now.
EB: you barge in on our private conversation and you have the nerve to tell me to leave my city to be taken over by some crazy gang cult???
EB: fuck you.
EB: fuck. you.

John’s fingers mash the keyboard too hard; he can hear the plastic creaking with each pointed jab.
But he can’t stop. The breeze is tearing up the posters on his walls, upsetting the sheets on his bed, and prowling around the edges of the room, ready for a fight that won’t come.

He’s too agitated. He knows this, objectively, but he can't seem to calm down. He needs to get a grip on himself, or something incredibly stupid is going to happen, he can feel it. Dave’s Bro isn’t here, and there’s nothing else he can hit. He needs to just walk away from the fucking computer and go down to the basement and hit things until he passes out, but he can't because his arm is in a goddamn sling and his head hurts and ow ow -

EB: i think i need to go :
TT: i know your chumhandle kid i’m not letting this go. it's fucking serious
TG: okay stop
TG: leave him alone bro for fucks sake
TG: this is getting old
EB: now what? you're going to fucking pester me until i say i’ll leave town?!
EB: you are infuriating you are the single most infuriating thing on this fucking planet congratulations it is you!
TG: (daaaamn fucking tell him EB)
TT: fuck your city. fuck whatever moral code is making you so blindingly stupid right now.
TT: I really mean that, fuck them over and get out now while you still can TT: better they get another city than they get you TT: go somewhere new. think up some new air pun, or better yet, rework your powers so you can pretend to be something other than a fucking air-bender, they’ll be looking for you after this. they won’t stop. now stop being a fucking stubborn moron and act like you have a modicum of intelligence. your guardian should be telling you this, not me, where the fuck is he in all this?
EB: OKAY THAT IS IT YOU PESTILENT NOOKSTAIN CONGRATULATIONS YOU ARE OFFICIALLY THE MOST RAGE-INDUCING BULGELICKING ASSHAT THE UNIVERSE HAS EVER HAD THE DISPLEASURE OF SECRETING INTO EXISTENCE!
EB: LOOK AT THIS I AM REDUCED TO USING HIS FUCKING CAPS LOCK QUIRK!
THIS IS UNACCEPTABLE!
EB: I SWEAR TO ANY GOD LISTENING I AM GOING TO TG: whoa what
TT: shit
TG: john you know caps lock tG: were those weird troll swear words because i got maybe half of that TG: john
EB: WKSHRISEHSKW
TG: oh my fuck what was that
TG: did you just keyboard smash in rage
TG: I swear to god bro if you broke my fucking friend i will end you
TT: shit
TG: im not fucking around here

After a minute of inactivity, the computer goes into sleep mode.

The room is empty.

The curtain flutter in an uncertain, aimless breeze.

“John! Dinner is ready!”

Samuel Egbert places the bowl of pasta on the table with a thud, frowning slightly as he leans over to look up the stairs to the second floor. John’s door is still closed, which isn’t unusual, but usually doesn’t impede the boy’s hearing, either. John’s mastery over the wind lets him hear things most people can’t perceive. The last time John had ever really ignored Samuel, whether deliberately or incidentally, had been almost two years ago.

“John!”

No response.

Samuel freezes up, stripping off his oven mitts in slow, deliberate motions. He walks to the foot of the stairs and looks up into the dark hallway above. “John?” he asks, more quietly.

Nothing.
Then he’s going up the stairs a bit more quickly than his usual measured pace, taking the last few steps two at a time before striding to John’s closed door. He forces himself to stop, breathes in once, and raps out his usual knock on the door. It’s entirely possible John has simply lain down and decided to take an impromptu nap, after all. He can’t assume the worst just because –

No answer, not even the muffled yelp of a boy awakened from sleep. The door isn’t locked when Samuel tries it and he pushes it open, eyes scanning the room with more than a little worry.

That worry becomes full-on desperation when he realizes John is gone.

The window hangs open, the curtains fluttering in a gentle breeze, with John’s backpack kicked under the desk and his bed torn apart by something – a breeze no doubt. Samuel takes only two steps to cross the room to the Captain America poster he knows John uses to conceal the safe with his uniform in it. It doesn’t make sense for John to have left in the middle of the evening without telling Samuel, unless perhaps there was an emergency -

He uses his backup key and opens the safe. Heir’s costume lies folded up in a neat square beside Casey, and John’s flying goggles still hang on their hook.

John is gone.

John is gone, again, and this time he hasn’t bothered to put his suit on before leaving. Anyone could see him flying like this, anyone at all.

What the hell is John thinking? Swallowing back a mix of both concern and anger, Samuel composes himself. He can’t jump to conclusions. The room is a mess, but John may have left a note explaining his disappearance, only for it to be tossed into a hidden corner by the wind when he took off. Samuel methodically searches the entire room, sweeping beneath the bed itself and through John’s closet and flipping through the textbooks still in his backpack. He can only conclude there is no note. He moves the computer mouse and the login screen comes up, the computer having gone into sleep mode due to inactivity at some point. And Samuel doesn’t have the time to figure out John’s password.

Maybe once they had trusted each other with everything, but John’s depression two years ago had driven a wedge between them. Even with his illness having abated, there are still hollow, painful gaps Samuel can’t touch, topics that bring a weary sadness to his boy’s face and a weight to his shoulders that Samuel can’t force the issue about without risking breaking his own child.

But Samuel had thought that John had recovered. The specialist had said there might be relapses and darker swings, but John has always kept Samuel abreast of his day to day shifts in mood, in addition to his crime fighting performance evaluations. And his friendship with Karkat Vantas, which Samuel might once have disapproved of as a distraction, seemed to have smoothed away the last of the lines from his child’s face.

Karkat.

With one last intense look out the window, trying and failing to pick out the dark shape of his son flying against the dark evening sky, Samuel runs downstairs to the home phone line, and dials a number he has memorized from the sheer number of times he has seen it before John picks up the phone.

Maybe this is all very easily explained. Samuel has researched the concept of moirails ever since Karkat first mentioned the term. Perhaps, if John has had an episode, he simply flew to Karkat’s house in order to have one of their feelings jams. It would be a reckless, stupid course of action, but it is a legitimate sequence of events. The depression had taken out John’s better judgment last time, too.

He is greeted with the loud, customary skree of Karkat’s lusus. It gabbles and clicks at him incoherently. In a calm, sensible tone of voice he tells it, “This is Samuel Egbert. May I speak with Karkat, please?”

Another trilling screech echoes across the line with a burst of painful feedback, before the lusus sets the phone down with a loud thump. It sounds as though the giant crab is still screeching, though the noise grows more distant as it scuttles away. Samuel waits impatiently, eyes closed, until he hears thumping footsteps and irate yelling rather than the clack of claws on the other end. “Y-Yeah, Mr. Egbert?” comes the wary, just-this-side-of-yelling growl of the young troll. “Can I help you with something, sir?”

Samuel would normally have smiled and shushed Karkat’s nervous formality. Now, he has more pressing concerns than maintaining the façade of an ordinary parent around John's friend. “Karkat, my boy. I just wanted to check to see if John might have gone over to your house for a visit after school today.”

“Huh? Fu-no, John isn’t here. I dropped him off at your house after school.” The troll boy hesitates, and when he speaks again there is an undertone of worry that Samuel had hoped to avoid triggering. “Why, is something wrong?”

“Nothing at all,” Samuel says, tacking on a reassuring chortle of laughter, and proceeds to feed Karkat one of his standard emergency excuses. “I believe he took off to his extra volunteer hours without stopping by my office to say goodbye, that’s all. He did say he was running late, and he knew I was in an important conference call. I thought I’d check with you, just in case. Take care, Karkat.”

“...Yeah, okay, are you su-”

Samuel hangs up too soon, but he barely pauses to regret it. He dials John’s cell number, and begins to list swears in a military cadence under his breath until he hears the familiar, buzzing ring of ‘Final Countdown’ echoing down the stairs from John’s room, and his blood runs cold.

John doesn’t have his cell with him, he’s not in uniform, and he’s not at Karkat’s.

Where the hell could he be?

Touring the world is fun! Jade doesn't know why people don't do it more often!

She's been at it for almost a year and a half now, exploring places and saving people, but she has in no way seen even a fraction of all the cool stuff out here! Clearly if she really wants to reach her final destination, she's going to have to cut some of her planned stops short. It's kind of disappointing but not really. She'll have plenty of time for saving the world after she finishes running some errands for her grandpa!

Sighing, Jade pats Bec on the side and stands up, brushing the black-footed penguin off her lap. It brays like a donkey in irritation before waddling off. This island off the coast of South Africa is populated almost entirely by these obnoxious things, but they're just so cute! And the island air is nice and warm and salty, though not as tropical as back home. Jade hadn't thought she'd ever want to go back to that tiny island in the Pacific until after she'd already blown it up and started feeling homesick. Not her smartest move, in retrospect.
Nothing she can do about it now!

"Bleehhhhh. Alright, Bec, let's go." Jade slides on her aviation goggles and concentrates until she teleports into the plane. A year and a half has done wonders for her control; she hardly ever needs Bec to help direct her and orient her spatially anymore, though he still helps her out with moving heavy objects. The wolf appears a moment later, a brief glimpse of foreign galaxies visible instead of fur before it settles down behind the pilot's seat.

Jade doesn't mind the lights show. A lot of people seem really surprised by Bec's abilities when they're out saving people, but she doesn't see why. It's just how the wolf gets around; it rarely, if ever, walks when it can just as easily teleport everywhere.

Anyway. Jade reaches into the pocket next to the driver's seat and pulls out a messy bundle of papers that she's been consulting on and off since she left home. One's training is never over, of course! These are Grandpa's last lesson plans, diagrams for repairing the plane in case of emergency, and details on a few last minute errands Grandpa always intended to finish, but never got around to. Some of them are really boring, but a couple are time sensitive apparently. And Jade has crossed most of Asia and Africa, visiting the places Grandpa visited during his wilderness adventurer years. It's only right that eventually she visit Grandpa's old lab in his hometown!

Her fingers hesitate over the lunch top's keyboard after she finishes, and she bites her lip. Then she shakes her head vigorously, hard enough that her hair comes loose and ends up in total disarray, which makes her feel a bit better.

Just because her only Pesterchum hasn't ever answered her pesterings, ever, doesn't mean it won't work eventually! Grandpa had been the one to give her the chumhandle, and she's been trying to establish contact with her chum for years. After a while, she'd realized that for whatever reason, her messages weren't going through, or at least, her chum wasn't logging on to see his messages.

Ahaahaha! He's going to have such a backlog when he finally decides to login!

Jade smiles at the absolutely hilarious thought of the look on her chum's face when he sees how much material he has to read through, and starts a new chatlog to begin her daily, rambling monologue.

GG: heyyyy!
GG: good morning john! :)
GG: it must be around eight in the morning where you live, right?
GG: i hope you're feeling awesome this morning :)
GG: i met a bunch of penguins today, and we played tag together!
GG: Bec always wins of course, but it doesn't get that it's not supposed to cheat by teleporting everywhere
GG: this one time, it teleported into the ocean to catch a penguin that was trying to swim away. the poor penguin was sooooo surprised! it made a face like :O
GG: and then afterward we took down an animal poaching ring! that was really sad though because they'd already hurt a lot of rhinos by the time we got here, and i almost didn't catch them in time
GG: does that ever happen to you john? i'm sure you're an awesome hero, just like me! otherwise why would Grandpa say to stay in contact with you and talk to you about hero stuff???
GG: usually i really like being the hero because i get to help people and save them and everyone is happier after that GG: but sometimes things go wrong and then people get hurt GG: and usually when i arrive it's the bad guys who get hurt but i still feel bad about it :(
GG: i don't know!
GG: anyway, i hope you start to answer me soon, john! having a one-sided conversation gets really boring sometimes! :P doofus!
GG: byyyyye! :DDD

-- gardenGnostic [GG] ceased pestering ghostyTrickster [GT] at 17:34:12 --

Jade runs out of steam after that, and signs off with a flourish. She realizes she’s chewing on a wayward strand of hair and spits it out before hitting enter on the keyboard one last time. The engine rumbles to a start, and the radiation shields sound off little pings as they confirm they’re working to keep the engine from irradiating the rest of the plane.

Excellent. As Grandpa always liked to say – tally ho! Jade pulls down her goggles, spins once in her chair for luck, and –

Someone is standing in the back of the plane.

She skids to a stop by dragging her feet, heart pounding as she pulls a rifle from her sylladex and levels it at the back. “Hey -!” she starts, then stares, nonplussed, at the empty compartment behind her. There’s no one there. The roof at the back of the compartment slopes down low enough that Jade would have to crouch to fit, and there’s nowhere a stowaway could have hidden that fast, not with the hold bolted shut.

Her skin is crawling though; the dark figure she’d seen had just been standing there, watching her from behind. It definitely hadn’t been there when she first teleported in, or she would have noticed the extra mass impacting the space around her. In fact, even in that brief moment, she’d barely felt its presence at all, as though its atoms had only stabilized and possessed mass for a split second, when her eyes had scanned over it while she turned –

“Huh. But that’s so interesting,” she murmurs, fixed her eyes on that one spot. “Hey, Bec? Someone was in the back of the plane just now, right? You felt them too?”

The wolf huffs an affirmative, its weighty head heavy as the wolf tucks it onto her foot. It doesn’t appear to be overly concerned about the mysterious figure, which does a lot towards calming Jade down, and she feels free to let the SCIENCE! instinct take over her brain. Because ooooh yeah, there is some serious science going on here. She wishes the figure would appear again, but she highly suspects that it won’t. She’s observed it, but then she’d looked away in that split second between her seeing it and drawing her specibus, and she might never get that opportunity again. Darn!

Because that hadn’t been teleportation – not enough leftover baseline radiation in the air – and definitely hadn’t been remote viewing or anything involving a spiritual/mental energy construct – there wouldn’t have been mass involved if it was just an image or a spell. Which leaves the extremely intriguing possibility that she just witnessed someone with serious issues at the quantum level. If her theory is right, as long as no one observes this person, they exist in all possible quantum states at once, including the states where they don’t exist at all, cancelling out their own mass; but if observed under the right circumstances, they can collapse into one single possible quantum state and can be seen, heard, felt.

Considering current scientific experiments have only managed to observe this effect in molecules on a scale of nanometers, the fact that she just saw someone the size of a grade-schooler exhibiting quantum wave superposition is a pretty darn significant scientific breakthrough.
This requires investigation.

Jade faces forward and sets the autopilot running, eyeing the back of the plane every so often as the plane takes off and veers to the north. She remembers to stick her head out and wave good bye to the penguins at the last minute. Warm wind tearing at her hair, she shouts out, “Byyyyy!” and laughs when a penguin slips and falls off the side of a rock in surprise. Then she lowers the pilot’s dome again and begins shuffling through her sylladex pocket for her tools and her palmtop to take readings of the spot in the back of the compartment.

It’s a good thing she’s headed for Grandpa’s old secret lab! This is going to require some SERIOUS SCIENCE.

- Jade has to stop and meddle a bit as she passes over the western coast of Africa, stopping several smuggling and poaching operations and more individual crimes when she spots them from above. She can’t let herself think of all the criminal activity she might be missing. There’s a reason there are so many heroes in the world - one person can’t solve all the world’s problems just by running around and beating people up. That was something Grandpa had drilled into her early on, and Jade is really grateful he did; it’s hard enough knowing that someone, somewhere is always being hurt or stolen from or killed, without feeling guilty over not being able to save the entire world. If she took responsibility for the whole world at once, she’d probably explode!

But anyway, between that and her periodic breaks to adjust the engines, trying to alter their radiation output and perhaps trigger another decoherence event for her quantumly unstable passenger, she takes nearly a week to arrive in British airspace. When she reaches the coordinates from her grandpa’s records, she lands the plane, braking to a halt at the end of an overgrown, mossy runway.

The radio crackles. “Password required, old sport! Quick now, hup hup, we haven’t got all day, the missile launchers are locking on as we speak!”

Jade grins at the record of Grandpa’s voice. “It’s me, Grandpa! The password is -” she glances wildly from side to side and leans forward to whisper “‘Frederick Marshman Bailey, tiptip tally ho, and an epicycloid with a k value of 4.13’.”

There is a long pause as the responder ticks along to the next prerecorded message. “Quite correct, my girl! Welcome to the old estate! Do try to keep the good china intact, and redirect all explosions to the portrait gallery on the third floor, there’s a dear. There are spare riflekind in the usual places; do not go outside with taking at least three! One must always be prepared!”

Jade mouths the last part of the advice along with her Grandpa, smiling nostalgically as the airplane hangar off to the side of the runway opens, the automatic gates still running smoothly even after years of disuse. Grandpa had always been really big on preparedness, and it’s really nice to hear him say the words himself again instead of just the faded memory she plays back in her head sometimes when she and Bec are about to go somewhere new.

She steers the plane inside the dark garage and parks it between an antique WWII fighter plane (definitely a Hawker Hurricane) and what appears to be a fully operational late model Churchill infantry tank. Jade pulls off her goggles and brushes crumbs off her skirt as she stands up to leave the plane. “Come on, mister Variable!” she says loudly, cocking an ear to listen for a reply. Sight isn’t the only way to observe someone, after all. She has begun talking to herself out loud again instead of just to Bec, hoping that her stowaway is at least able to hear her even when he might not necessarily have access to ears at the moment.
From the occasional promising blip in her palmtop readings, she can say with relative certainty that the figure is still on the plane. It seems to like the back of the compartment, but she’d almost panicked one day when she couldn’t find any quantum markers there. Worried, she had gone over the plane with a scanner until she finally located evidence of partial wave state collapse in the hold, wedged between a refrigerator full of food and an old suit of armor.

Yeah, no one ever said Jade knew how to pack for a crime-fighting world tour. In hindsight, bringing along her Grandpa’s entire collection of weird paintings and other miscellaneous artifacts had been kind of dumb, but she’d certainly had the space for it all after opening up a secondary sylladex dimension in the hold. And now she can transfer all this weird junk to the Harley estate here in Britain! Everybody wins!

Instead of teleporting straight over to the main building, or using the dusty transportalizer she spies in the center of the airplane hangar (because who knows how such an old transportalizer would interact with someone as atomically unstable as her mysterious companion!), Jade runs across the stretch of lawn between the hangar and the main estate. Well, it probably used to be a lawn, anyway; now it’s more of an open field, full of tall wildflowers and the thin saplings of new trees. It’s a little bit chilly out, and dew coats the plants, so by the time she emerges on the other side, where the field gives way to a gravel driveway, she’s damp all over, even inside her boots. Squishing in wet socks, Jade makes a face, swapping her footwear out with a click of her fingers. Having a sylladex and the ability to teleport objects between the pocket dimension and reality instantly makes it really easy to change her clothes in seconds. So convenient!

“Come on, Bec! Here, boy!”

Bec slides into existence next to her, green fire flickering around its paws as it sits and sniffs at the air, its hackles half raised. Grandpa had told Jade Bec only ever lived on the island, and had never visited the other Harley estates. The fact that the wolf is on guard, as close to baring its teeth and growling as Jade has ever seen it, puts her instantly on guard as well. Her smile slips a bit as she observes the estate more carefully, reaching out with her sense of space and dimensions to feel for any intruders on the grounds. She’s really excited about getting to see one of her Grandpa’s labs for the first time in two years, but there’s no reason to let her guard down in a strange new place. Grandpa would slap her silly if she let nostalgia overwhelm her good common sense.

She can’t feel anything though, aside from a brief flicker that might or might not have been her Variable friend, who could possibly be standing just to her left, on the opposite side as Bec. Variable has never set off Bec’s guard instincts before, which was just another reason for Jade to trust that the mysterious person didn’t mean any harm. Having established that there’s no one in her range that she can sense, Jade slings a rifle out of her strife sylladex and keeps it at the ready as she steps onto the wide front porch and places her thumb on the fingerprint scanner disguised as a doorbell. It lights up pale blue as the machine scans her thumbprint, and then beeps cheerfully. The fancy, lion-faced door knocker flips over to reveal an eye scanner, and she widens her eye and presents it for the reader. When it asks, she gives it the same password as before.

The door does not unlock or swing open. Instead, the wooden slats of the porch a couple paces to Jade’s right emit a whirring sound and fold up, revealing a dust-free transportalizer pad. She hesitates, turning to look at where she can’t see the Variable. “Oops. I didn’t think of that,” she says, feeling a bit sheepish as she rubs her chin with her thumb, thinking. “Grandpa’s most secret labs are only connected to the main estates by transportalizers. I still don’t know how that will affect your quantum state though. Maybe I can use that old explosives pack to blow a hole from the basement through to the sublevels—”

Something brushes up against her arm, and Jade’s sense of space jolts, like her body suddenly jumped a foot to the right without her consent. Heart pounding and shocky, she whirls around, trying to see what just touched her, but that sudden jolt is the only warning she gets before the transportalizer fires up without anyone on it, and crackles with electricity as it sends something down to the lab.

Bec noses at her side, but he doesn’t immediately chase after the source of the jolt, so Jade figures she must still be all in one piece, even if it does feel like her arm just got struck by lightning.

She’s starting to think she underestimated just how much power might be involved in whatever had caused the Wandering Variable to end up like this. Because when she tries to calculate it, the amount of energy involved in a human-sized quantum anomaly like that has to be astronomical. Worse still, the universe is playing fast and loose with how much mass – and therefore, how much energy – is at play in the Variable’s atomic structure at any given moment.

Even if she does help observe and stabilize him permanently so he can communicate with the observed world, the Wandering Variable might turn out to be just as powerful as Bec. And that’s… kind of a scary thought. The only reason Bec isn’t scary is because Jade knows the wolf loves her. She doesn’t know anything about the Variable aside from a few readouts on a palmtop and her own hypotheses.

…Yeah. She’s going to have to run a few more tests before she messes around with Variable’s quantum state. A lot of tests, actually. Take this slow. Science can’t be rushed, you know.

Between that revelation sinking in and the tension she can still feel in Bec’s spine when she pats him on the back, Jade is feeling a little more sober about this visit. She wants to enjoy her time here at Grandpa’s old place, but she can’t fight the lingering sensation that, even though she can’t sense them, someone is watching her.

- Jade appears in a spartan hallway, about forty feet below ground level according to her internal altitude sensor. As she steps off the transportalizer pad Bec steps into space beside her, and a blip from the sensors in her glasses alerts her to a registered energy signature that belongs to the Variable. “Are you still all in one piece?” she asks aloud, worried, but she receives no response – none that she can hear, anyway. “We can start trying to collapse you into one permanent eigenstate once I’ve finished up with Grandpa’s errands, all right?”

She takes the silence as an implicit affirmative and strides off down the corridor, her footsteps echoing in the dull, still air of the lab. It feels like the air is still fresh, so the life support protocols must be running, and the lights brighten to a comfortable level automatically when she enters the main room. The lab counters have been swept clear, but when she unlocks one of the cupboards by the wall with her thumbprint, she finds a shining array of clean lab equipment. The chemicals will be in a much more iffy state, but she’s not too concerned about them right now.

“Awesome,” she murmurs reverently when she finds a modified Winchester rifle stowed behind a row of test tubes. This one is a keeper. She smiles to herself as she loads it with ammo, still crouched down on the floor, and tucks it away in her sylladex for later.
“Right-o. Attention. Code 653,” Grandpa’s voice suddenly rumbles from overhead, and a red light starts to flare on and off in the corner of the room, painting everything red. Jade stiffens and drops back into a fighting stance at the stern, severe tone in his voice. “Unidentified projectile inbound at 370 kilometers. Please evacuate to the tenth basement or man battlestations. I repeat, chaps, code 653 in progress, potential code 413, please see monitor 42 for tracking information.”

“Attention. Unidentified projectile inbound at 340 kilometers, descending at a rate of ____ km/sec. No paradox radiation detected; deployment of standard point-defense counter missiles recommended. Cancel potential code 413.”

“Argh! Where are the defense controls, Grandpa!” Jade yells, but the warning voice over the intercom isn’t an auto-responder like the radio earlier; it continues to drone out updates on the projectile’s position and rate of descent, but that doesn’t exactly help her out when she can’t find the missile launcher controls from this computer! She just doesn’t have time to search through the masses of data and programs that she finds on the hard drive, and Grandpa’s cheat sheet notes never mentioned the possibility that she’d have to activate the estate’s more specialized defenses.

Which mean –

Oh yes. Hecks yes.

Jade gets to pull out the big guns.

“Stay down here, WV!” she calls over the alert system, and she snaps her fingers, centering in on the roof of the estate above. She misjudges it a bit in her haste, and appears a few inches above the roof itself. Instead of landing, she lets herself fly up a bit, manipulating her position in space until she’s facing up toward the sky. She squints behind her glasses, then flicks her sniper-scope into place, staring up at the angle at which the alert system had detected the inbound projectile. She should be able to see it in 5…4…3…2…1…

There.

The projectile is growing rapidly in her field of vision, little burst of friction sparking along its sides as it plummets down toward her current location. It looks like a relatively advanced missile, streamlined and efficient.

Jade switches out her riflekind for a rocket launcher specibus. The only reason she’s able to hold up the weight of the extremely large apparatus is because mass doesn’t mean very much when you can levitate things through space with the power of your mind. The recoil is going to hurt, but who cares! She’s been waiting to use this beauty for years!

Tongue poking out slightly between her pursed lips, Jade takes aim. It’s a slightly more laborious process than she’s used to, with a small computer attached to the launcher itself helping her to line up the sights instead of just relying on her spatial sense. She doesn’t want to mess up when she’s dealing with a pretty frickin’ huge explosive, here.

The incoming weapon is still about ten kilometers out when she hits the trigger. She has enough foresight to put the rocket launcher back in the sylladex moments before the recoil slams her backfirst through the roof of the house.

One snap later, and she’s back down in the basement sublevels. Mission accomplished.

“I took care of the mean explosive missile!” she calls, righting herself and bending to scratch at Bec’s ruff. "I wonder who was shooting at us, though." Bec doesn’t appear to have moved from where she left it, having apparently decided she could handle the missile on her own. But now she can’t tell where Variable ended up. “WV? You still in here?”

“Good show, lads and ladies!” her grandpa’s voice echoes through the lab. “Cancel code 653. Air debris shields up and running at full capacity. Station 42 should be extrapolating point of origin in an hour, and then we'll give these impudent bastards the old what-for! Back to work, all!”

She spins in a circle and grins widely at the lab. “This is going to be so much fun!”

Prospyet, Outside Astana, Khazakstan

MP: Are you sure you have to go?

Approximately three hundred years ago, an enormous meteorite crash landed in the middle of the Kizil Kum Desert. The alien creatures that survived the impact never quite explained how or why they ended up in an uncontrolled descent towards Earth on runaway space debris, most likely because the descent was neither uncontrolled, nor was the landing a crash.

Carapacians are quite the experts at piloting meteorites, thank you very much.

Most of them have since learned to cluster in the desert cities, after an incident in 1940s Eastern Europe had resulted in near genocide for a significant portion of their genetic records. Prospit-A and Derse-1 are both major cities now, populated almost entirely by carapacians, on opposing sides of the original crater.

Prospyet, in northern Khazakstan, is significantly smaller. The checkered pattern of the buildings and streets is less noticeable than in the major carapacian metropolises, with more mingling between light and dark. Few of the inhabitants still claim allegiance to the Reginae Absentes, and fewer still acknowledge the Grey Protector as their liege. No, this is a place that remembers the Villein and his creed, and no one has direct ties to the Queens' Shatranj spy networks anymore.

The perfect place for a certain carapacian down on his luck to lay low for a few years, at least until the heat dies down.
Spades stays hunched by the open balcony door, glowering out into the night. The moon is a sickle overhead, and he feels like that’s an omen of things long past, an old, heavy weight that presses down on his chest, cracking his carapace.

After his initial run in with the Midnight Crew – what, almost two years ago now? – he’d realized he needed to rethink his strategy. Because the Crew isn’t his anymore; they’re all soft and spongy humans, for one, and they answer to some new big shot now. And the Huge Bitch hadn’t even been involved in the takeover – in Spades’s absence, some new goon and his gal took over, their names spoken only in hushed whispers that even Spades’s sharp ears hadn’t been able to catch. A select few talk a little louder about some scumbag called Jack Noir, but Spades doesn’t think about that guy too hard. It makes his head hurt.

Upon scoping out the situation and realizing he and the Crew were no longer going to see eye to eye, Spades had fled back to Europe. America has too few carapacians. They’re seen as exotic mysteries, aliens with a tragic, unknown past. Being a carapacian on this world gets you noticed, which is the last thing Spades wants at the moment.

Eventually, he made his way to Prospyet, intending to stay only until he lost the Shatranj and Crew spies on his tail.

At least until he went and met the woman of his dreams.

He doesn’t want to talk about that part. It’s fucking embarrassing, all right? He’s dizzy for the dame, end of story.

A pale hand touches his arm and it’s only through great strength of will and months of practice that he represses the instinct to stab first and ask questions later. One does not go around stabbing things willy-nilly around a classy Prospitian dame like Ms. Paint.

MP: I understand why you have to go.

MP: But please allow me to be selfish, this one time, and let me ask.

MP: Please do not go.

Oh, is it tempting. Spades Slick, hardened criminal, is very much on board with staying here with his lady love, and for a moment there’s a warm space in his carapace that might have been a heart – if, you know, the person feeling it wasn’t Spades Slick. He doesn’t get all sappy and namby-pamby like that. It’s just heartburn or something.

Besides. He can feel not one but two things pulling him west, and while one of them he hates with a seething passion that knows no bounds, the other has settled a claim in the very darkest depths of his being, an old vow sworn in blood and carved into the fabric of paradox space, that draws him back to the troll that he once called bloodbrother.

SS: I can’t. You know I wish I could, and you don’t know how much I wanna make yah happy.

SS: But I don’t think I’m allowed to – MP: To?

SS: …Be happy.

SS: Some things you can’t atone for.
SS: Some things you can’t run from.

SS: Some assholes you need to give a good kick in the face before they go and get themselves killed.

SS: ...This is something I gotta do.

Ms. Paint sighs, and the sound most certainly does not tug on the nonexistent heartstrings of the completely hypothetical heart that Spades does not have. She rests her pink-wrapped head upon his bony, sharp shoulder, and they look out at the stars together. And if Spades maybe spends more time eyeing his lady love than the stars, that don’t mean a damn thing.

MP: I know. I know.

MP: I think I’ve always known.

MP: It seems all I can do for now is wish you luck.

MP: And ask that you come home soon.

Spades just looks at her, and looks and looks, and wonders when he went and found himself a home.

SS: You got it, darlin’.

SS: Home before midnight, that’s what I always say.

She smiles at him, her dimples silver in the moonlight. And maybe people really can change. Maybe even people like Spades Slick, because what he does next feels natural. Feels right. It’s the exact opposite of what he’s always done before, but to hell with that. He’s defined his life by this damned thing for too long. If they’re throwing out the rules, they’re throwing out all the damn rules.

He’s sick of looking at this ring and seeing the monster he could become in his nightmares.

He takes the ring on its chain out of his pocket and stares at it almost as long as he’s stared at Ms. Paint. And then he presses a hand to her cheek and loops the chain around her neck. Her eyes are huge black pools in the pale light, and he touches her face lightly with both hands.

SS: Now I have to come back.

SS: Me and that damned thing, we’ve been dancing together for how long now?

SS: Somehow, someway…we always find ourselves together.

SS: If you can’t fight fate, make fate your little bitch.

SS: So if you have this ring, no power on this pathetic, watery rock can come between you and me.

Ms. Paint pats him on the cheek, and it’s stupidly adorable and loveable and oh no Spades is doomed. There are no words for how very doomed he is. This woman will be the death of him, he can feel it, and yet he can’t fight it because being with her feels like being whole for the first time in his life.

MP: Don’t say bitch, dear.

SS: …Yes, darlin’.

He stays the rest of the night standing by the window with her, swaying to a tune Ms. Paint just barely hums above a whisper. In the morning, he tells himself, his expression less of a malicious glower and more of a contemplative stare as he rests his chin atop her head. I can leave in the morning.

And Karkat goddamn Vantas had better appreciate what I'm walking away from for his sake, the little shit.

Chapter End Notes

And that's the secret of this AU - everyone secretly knows everyone but they don't know that they know each other. Then John went and changed his chumhandle and poor Jade got cut out of the loop. Dooooooofus. :P

Also I talked with SergeantMeow and ohmy god you gUYS it's like I just got permission to go COMPLETELY INSANE this is fantastic it's like fucking christmas in here time to start pulling out the big guns I can do anything, I can even put that one person's brain in the robot body just like i always wanted to <3
The Wind That Wanders

Chapter Summary

The thorns he spares when the rose is taken;
The rocks are left when he wastes the plain;
The wind that wanders, the weeds wind-shaken, These remain.

Chapter Notes

The font style for the grimdark text may not show up, or may just appear as those pesky [] boxes on some phones, but I really feel it conveys the 'holy shit is rose crazy' kind of distortion effect that I’ve been looking for, so please bear with me.

This chapter is going to be a lot of people messing around being stupid and blah, to set up for the next chapter where shit gets real. Rose isn’t fucking around here, you know. People are going to get hurt.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

It really was only a matter of time before Karkat's shitty luck kicked in.

Sure, he's had a good run of it lately. Maybe he's been overdue for a good old-fashioned Karkat-class fuck up (a phenomenon which is capable, according to general consensus among the scientific community, of wreaking about as much interpersonal havoc and emotional distress as a class-5 hurricane) after all these months of disgustingly wholesome happiness.

First he met John and actually managed to maintain a friendship that didn't slowly self-destruct due to Karkat's brain and its easily overstimulated rage gland. Then, he miraculously didn't fall off a tall building during his first few weeks as Hemogoblin, and even got Heir's attention. And apparently the other hero liked what he saw enough to want Hemogoblin as a partner.

Yeah, he's still internally screaming over that last part. It's like something out of an actual comic book - the newbie hero and the seasoned veteran partnering up to kick ass and wreck shit. Hemogoblin had even helped rescue Heir last night. In fact, since Karkat is a huge Ancestors nerd, he can in fact tell you that this is all uncannily similar to the classic plot line from the first ever Signless/Ψiioniic crossover, in which the mysterious unsigned troll frees the more experienced psionic hero from a mindtrap, beginning a partnership that continues, despite occasional falling-outs, in the comics to this day.

This is fucking huge, okay, and he reserves the right to internally fan-girl about it whenever the urge strikes him.

Since that night at the docks, when he'd formally accepted Heir's offer (insert high-pitched shriek of fan-girly goodness here), he's been antsy. The problem is, he wants to rave about this mind-blowing development to someone - aka John - and about how fucking fantastic it is that he - and by 'he' he'd of course mean Hemogoblin, and not actually him because they're clearly two different people - gets to fight crime with Heir of fucking Breath. He almost fell out of his recooperacon wiggling around with repressed excitement, reaching periodically for his phone and getting slime fucking everywhere in repeat attempts to pester John because this news must be shared with the whole goddamn world and John is his whole damn world, only to catch himself at the last minute.

Because only Hemogoblin and Heir know about this partnership. That's it. If Karkat starts blathering on about it like a panaddled, vacuous dipshit the morning after it fucking happens, it's going to be pretty fucking obvious he's privy to knowledge only two people could possible have.

So he has to sit on this until the team-up becomes common knowledge. Which holy fuck is going to be hard. Karkat's specialty is running his mouth, not censoring himself.

So he expects his biggest problem Thursday morning is going to be sitting on this priceless nugget of intel while hanging out with John all day, especially knowing that John is a massive Hemogoblin fan.

It's when he's awakened by Crabdad's shrieking click-skree that is the lusus equivalent of John's name that everything goes sideways. By the time he retrieves the home phone from his custodian's grubby claws, he's ready to punch a baby or something. No, really, put a wriggler in front of him, he will punt that sucker through the wall. Crabdad's retirement cannot come soon enough.

And then John has to open his mouth and tell Karkat he's going to be out of school because he 'fell.'

This sounds like so much bullshit, because John may be a ditsy, nerdy son of a bitch, but it's not like he's tripping over himself all the damn time. Some of the swim team kids - what few Karkat has been forced to absently notice, since he's always getting dragged along to cheer at John's swim meets - are downright klutzy on land, at home only in the water, but John isn't, despite the fact that he blows everyone out of the water the vast majority of the time. So some random fall during the land training he puts himself through instead of the regular swim practice the incompetent members of the team (read: anyone who isn't John) go to doesn't make any fucking sense and so help him he is going over to the Egbert house right the fuck now to see this for himself -

"Shoosh."

That's all that Karkat really hears. The rest is soothing, humming white noise, and before he knows it, he's put down the phone and begun to walk in a daze to get his school stuff together, buoyed in a weird sense of goodwill. It feels suspiciously like not being angry, and that's just not normal.

Fucking serendipity. Wow.

The effect in person is much more dramatic, and Karkat would be lying if he didn't admit that some part of him deliberately lost its shit when he saw John in the hallway in the hopes of provoking a repeat moirailing. John has no subtlety, of course, and zero sense of timing (because who starts initiating such blatant pale flirtation in front of a teacher for god's sake?! Fucking John, that's who), but that doesn't really seem to matter after Karkat gets shooshpapped right back to that same level of lulled, peaceable calm. Seeing John throughout the day keeps him reassured that his moirail is well, and by the time Karkat drops John off at his house, he can barely maintain a properly angry rant, except to instruct John to stop breaking his fucking collar bone, for fuck's sake.

His bad luck really hits its stride, however, sometime around six in the afternoon, when John's dad calls and everything starts going downhill.
Karkat is absorbed in his calculus review when he hears the phone ring downstairs, followed by an answering screech from Crabdad. Karkat groans and lets his head thump forward onto the desk, slamming his clenched fist down onto the open textbook with the pencil still in hand. When he huffs angrily through his nose and sits up, composing himself to answer the phone in a state of only mild irritation rather than murderous intent, he sees that he has stabbed the pencil into the pages of the textbook itself, so deep that the pencil actually remains upright when he lets go of it.

Wow. Fucking fantastic. Good to know that he can put all of this strength and fitness training to good use by stabbing textbooks right in the problem set. Criminals, beware, Hemogoblin’s new fucking weapon of choice is a goddamn mechanical pencil, and he will shove that fucker right through your kidney.

Unless the caller is John, they better have an absolutely mindblowing reason for calling. Really, Karkat wants to see chunks of brain everywhere after this call is through. Muttering to himself, he clatters down the stairs and wrests the phone away from Crabdad. The lusus doesn’t fight him nearly as much as usual, so it’s not John, who always encourages flagrant mutiny from the lusus for his own incomprehensible amusement.

What ensues is the most worrying conversation Karkat has ever engaged in with John's dad ever. Usually he’s too intimidated by Samuel Egbert to do more than stiffly exchange pleasantries and try to keep the swearing to a minimum. This conversation is strange enough that Karkat can't help but try to pry more details out of Samuel.

He fails miserably. John's dad doesn't even let him get a word in edgewise, which for Karkat is an unpleasant new experience. Samuel has the nerve to fucking chortle as he shuts Karkat down, hard. “I believe he took off to his extra volunteer hours without stopping by my office to say goodbye, that’s all. He did say he was running late, and he knew I was in an important conference call. I thought I’d check with you, just in case. Take care, Karkat.”

All these last few sentences are spoken rapidly, with no pause for breath, as though to prevent Karkat from trying to break in and start his own question. “...Yeah, okay, are you su-” he finally gets the opportunity to demand, when the click of the phone hanging up greets him.

Dad Egbert just hung up on him. Always polite, ridiculously courteous Dad Egbert. Hung up. On Karkat.

…Wow. Like that wasn’t suspicious at all. Karkat totally believes every word out of that man’s mouth!

He throws a look back up the stairs toward his room, then growls and grabs his hoodie off the hook beside the front door, yanking it on over his head. After the collar bone debacle, like hell is Karkat ignoring some fresh fucking crisis going on at the Egbert house. Anything that can rile Samuel Egbert up is pretty damn serious. Especially when, from the way Samuel was talking, he has no real idea where John is. Given that the kid has such a regimented schedule, losing him would have been pretty hard work.

He gives the door a piece of his mind as he kicks it open and slams it shut in one smooth motion before Crabdad can try to escape. He sets off down the street toward the Egbert house. If Karkat’s moirail is actually missing or hurt, he reserves the goddamn right to freak the fuck out.

He knocks on the door of Chateau Egbert (also known as the House of He Who Makes Me Vomit Diamonds), and begins tapping his foot in anxiety the moment he’s forced to stand still and wait. He jogged all the way here, but that’s done nothing to work off the nervous energy engendered by that really fucking weird phone call. Twitchy and irate (or at least, more so than usual), Karkat waits for Dad Egbert to answer the fucking door.

And waits.

…He pounds on the door again.

Still no answer.

Right now, though, Samuel looks…at loose ends, and that puts Karkat on edge. For the first time Karkat can remember, he’s not perfectly done up in one of his dapper white suits, and his cropped blond hair is in slight disarray, as though he’s been raking his fingers through it. “Ah. Karkat,” he says, his icy blue eyes sharpening as he recognizes Karkat at the door. “Is something wrong?”

“I can only assume there is. Or did you really think I would just ignore you calling me in a panic over John? What’s going on – uh, sir.” Karkat tacks on the ‘sir,’ an afterthought as always. There’s just something about Samuel Egbert that screams ‘military man’ even twenty years after he apparently resigned, at least according to John’s account. Whatever it is about him, it works to intimidate pretty much everyone on the planet except John.

But if Samuel thinks he can use that to put Karkat off when John is involved, he has another thing coming.

Samuel laughs, and it sounds so obviously forced Karkat nearly gags himself. “Karkat, my boy, John really is just at his volunteer hours. I’m sorry for the little scare. I don’t know how I got it into my head that he might have stopped off at your home first. I apologize.”

“Where is he volunteering?” Karkat demands. He sees Samuel’s hand tremble on the door, and Karkat puts his own hand on the door, leaning on it without an ounce of subtlety as his jaw tightens.

Oh yeah. Something is up. Karkat talks right over the start of whatever excuse Samuel tries to give. “I mean, usually he says he’s doing land training on Fridays, not volunteering. And anyway, shouldn’t he take the afternoon off? That collar bone isn’t going to fu- I mean – oh for fuck’s sake – isn’t going to fucking heal if he doesn’t get some rest! I will drag that halfpanned idiot back by his fucking goggles if he thinks I’m letting him do some kind of manual labor in a sling!” By the end of his tirade he’s almost spitting. He can tell he’s working himself up into a fucking knot, tripping over the line from mere irritation into a full-fledged meltdown, but he can’t stop himself, how is he expected to stop himself when his moirail isn’t here, isn’t anywhere –

“Karkat, there is no need to -”

“Do not ‘Karkat’ me!” Oh fuck. Oh fuck. He’s freaking out. The rage is squeezing his bloodpusher so hard he thinks his chest might implode. He staggers back from the door, trying to put distance between him and John’s dad. Homicidal rages are more the purview of highbloods with coldblood-type dementia, but all trolls can get stupid and violent when they get worked up, and who even knows how Karkat’s mutant brain will react to a genuine meltdown.

Karkat has always thought that by maintaining a standard level of fury, he’s been able to regulate it himself, to prevent any violent incidents that could draw blood, but this is the third time in as many days that he’s nearly gone crashing into a full-on class-A tantrum. He digs his claws into the hornbeds around his horns, feeling the prickle of claws digging into his scalp. Everything is too much, too close, too tight, and he can’t focus. Get it together, you fuck up, come on, this isn’t hard, you’ve managed without John for fucking years –

“Karkat. Breathe.”

It’s not soothing or reassuring or relaxing. It’s just an order, spoken with the expectation of obedience, and Karkat’s jaw unclenches automatically in response. He sucks in a breath, and almost immediately some of the pounding in his head dies away, the tunnel vision widening so he can see more than just the blurry white of Samuel’s shoes.

Oh, way to fucking look like an idiot in front of John’s dad. Karkat can’t believe he just freaked out so hard, he literally forgot to breathe. Sucking in furious breaths through his nose, Karkat glares when he catches a hand descending to land on his shoulder. He lurches backward a step to dodge the hand, and hugs himself. He’s progressed into sobbing hiccups now, and he can barely meet Samuel’s eyes as he hiccups and gasps for control like a wriggler barely out of its first cocoon. “Then – why didn’t you – know where – he went,” he forces out between hiccups. He’s still furious, but at least at this level of anger, he can still fucking talk. “Not like – him – to take off – without telling you.”

Samuel spreads his hands out placatingly, but Karkat’s in no fucking mood to be placated by anyone but his moirail, goddammit. “It was just a mix-up, Karkat. I got a little caught up with my work, and missed John when he left. Like you said, though, he really shouldn’t be working with that collar bone – I told him so, myself. So I just thought, perhaps, that he went to your house instead, and called in sick to his volunteer work. But I called the community center, and he is definitely there. He is not missing, Karkat. He’ll be back in a few hours.”

And okay, yeah, that…sounds logical. Certainly more so than the hasty explanation Samuel gave over the phone not ten minutes earlier, even though it basically is the same explanation. Besides, what reason would Samuel have to lie?

But does it really match the state of Samuel’s hair, the way his white suit jacket has been left crumpled over the top of the sofa rather than carefully and neatly hung up on a hanger?

Karkat can’t tell anymore. Some part of him, the part that isn’t hiccupping and struggling not to swandive off the metaphorical handle into a panic attack, can tell he’s not thinking clearly. He rubs his hands up and down his arms, chafing against the chilly spring air of the on-coming evening.
Finally, he just nods, clamping his mouth shut against more hiccups, not trusting himself to stop before tearing his moirail’s guardian a new one in a fit of irrationality.

Samuel nods solemnly back. “Now, my boy, you seem distraught. Is there anything I can get you, anything you need?” Samuel smiles and yeah, he has this reassuring, fatherly look on his face, but it just pisses Karkat off all over again.

“What I need is for my moirail to not be wandering around taking heavy boxes from old ladies like an oblivious, dumbass gentleman and pretending he doesn’t have a fucking broken collar bone,” Karkat hisses, before losing it with one huge hiccup. “Where is he right the fuck now, I’m going to help him. I want the address.”

“Karkat.” Samuel fold his arms, giving Karkat a stern look. “While I appreciate that you care about John, you are in distress and in no fit state to be operating a motor vehicle or wandering around while John is working. I’m certain John knows better than to overwork himself. He knows his limits. And while I’m sure he’d be glad to see you, he would also feel obliged to work longer to make up for any distraction you might pose. Please, do not become a distraction.”

Karkat freezes up. He has about five different instincts yammering at him, three of which urge him to go corral his moirail and prevent that dopey idiot from injuring himself further.

But Karkat is not a goddamn grub. He isn't some demented highblood who can't help but act on ancient psychoses. And this is him. Putting his foot down. Enough.

Samuel must see something in Karkat's face at the moment Karkat forces himself to calm his fucking tits. This time, when Samuel reaches out a hand and claps Karkat on the shoulder, Karkat lets him, even though he feels an immediate spike of irritation at the touch. He crushes it as best he can, trying to maintain just a faint grimace of distaste. Control. Control. "Thank you for understanding, Karkat," Samuel says, and then the door shuts, perhaps with a little more force than usual. Hell, Karkat can't tell anymore.

Karkat stands outside the Egbert household for a long time, staring at his shoes. All he really wants to do is head down to the community center - walk there, if he has to - and see John, to make sure he really is there. The urge is overwhelming.

But. Fuck. Dad Egbert is right. Jeez, John shooshes him one damn time and suddenly Karkat starts getting all clingy. Fucking fuck.

Instead, Karkat goes home. He strips off his clothes on his way up the stars and sits in the recooperacoon for nearly an hour instead of working on his homework, letting the sopor soak its way into his skin. A heavy fuzz settles over his thoughts as his body shifts gears from panic to a drugged lethargy, and when he drags himself out to do homework instead of just going to sleep, his thoughts feel like they’re slogging through mud. He feels like shit, but his breathing has calmed and his heartbeats ease to a slow rhythm.

He no longer feels like crawling out of his skin and clawing at anyone who breathes too loudly, but he also feels – well, drugged. It’s extremely fucking tempting to just dunk his head back into the ‘coon and sleep through the night for once, because at this rate he’s not sure he’ll be alert enough to handle crime fighting. But he can’t. Working off some of this distress with a night of being Hemogoblin might be the only thing that can work the aggression out of his system – or at least distract him until he can latch onto John again.

He’s never been this dependent on John before, and Karkat can only assume it’s because John’s the source of the distress itself. Objectively he knows John isn’t some fragile dumbass glass butterfly, but in his troll hindbrain all those lovely hormones in his panic glands are stewing because John got hurt, and it just keeps building up every moment Karkat isn’t able to personally reassure himself John is safe.

Serendipity. Wow, it can be a bitch.

Three aborted muggings, a thwarted car-jacking, and a domestic dispute gone wrong later, Hemogoblin feels just a little bit more sane. Few things in this world are more therapeutic than getting to kick bad guys in the face. Every thirty minutes or so he’s seized by the urge to run all the way back to Maple Valley and bust down the doors of the community center, demanding his moirail be returned at once, but John has no doubt gone home by now; it’s nearly one in the morning. He had pestered John via his phone before leaving the device in the library, but hadn’t received a reply before starting his patrol. It wouldn’t be unusual for John not to reply until early in the morning. That does not lessen Karkat’s brand new goddamn anxiety problem in the slightest.
Focus. He can’t fall back into Karkat thoughts, no matter how much they’re weighing on his mind tonight. Hemogoblin leaps from one roof to the next, landing in a neat tumble and rolling to his feet, trying to lose himself in the attention-consuming work of running across the roofs without missing a step. Yeah, he’d probably survive the fall, but with his run of bad luck he’d probably break his arm or some other bullshit he can’t heal instantly.

That’s when the third explosion rocks the air.

Hemogoblin is far enough away that he feels the blast as barely a ripple in the air, but it sounds like a gun just went off by his ears. He stops before leaping to the next building and kneels beside a bird coop, searching the skyline for the source of the explosion. To his relief, when he locates the blast site, it’s nothing like the raging, fiery inferno that had broken out two nights ago, when Hearts and the Crew had torched an empty warehouse. Smoke plumes up in a heavy black cloud not far from his current location, but he can’t see any fire spreading to other buildings. Rolling his shoulders, Hemogoblin takes off in the direction of the fire.

He keeps checking the skies though. There’s no way Heir missed that, and he’s sure the other hero would have come to the same conclusion as Hemogoblin – this is retaliation in some way for Hearts Boxcars’s arrest the other night.

As it turns out, it’s a little worse than that. Hemogoblin’s stomach sinks as he draws closer and closer to Virginia Street, and realizes that the building that exploded is not some warehouse or bank, or any other convenient target.

It is the police station.

Well, fuck.

He approaches with more caution after that uncomfortable discovery, his stomach sinking as he scans the streets and alleys below for any sign of a fleeing prisoner. But by the time he reaches the station, he can’t find a damn thing, and he suspects – if Hearts was the source of this particular explosion, which Hemogoblin doesn’t doubt in the slightest – that Hearts and his accomplices are long gone.

Where the hell is Heir? Hemogoblin stops on the roof across from the police station to take in the damage, but his mind is still on the weirdly empty sky. There doesn’t appear to be much structural damage to the station; the street is flooded with evacuated officers and staff, but aside from a smoking hole where the front wall used to be, it doesn’t look like any part of the building is in danger of collapsing.

After a few minutes, Hemogoblin realizes he’s stalling because his next instinct is to drop down and ask the police if they’ve already spoken with Heir. This seems extremely unlikely, since Hemogoblin would have seen the other hero fly down to street level even if Heir had beaten him here, but it’s possible. And if Heir hasn’t been by yet, it would probably be a good idea to check in with the cops, see if anyone is trapped in the building and needs assistance, or if they’d seen which way Hearts and his gang of merry fucking assholes took off to.

He should hurry this along. Uh huh. Yep. Time to go downstairs and play nice with the cops. Gather some valuable intel. Be the hero.

…Any second now.

Yeah. He’s stalling like a pansy-ass wriggler. It’s Karkat who turns away from the edge of the roof and has to spend a few seconds checking over his costume, his false horns, his uniform, before trying to shake off the nervous tension turning him into a twitchy, stilt-legged spaz. He’s failing pretty fucking miserably.

But the last thing Karkat’s ever wanted is to attract the attention of the police. His blood color is down as rust red in the records, thanks to either the most gracious, forgiving jadeblood in the history of trollkind, or the most colorblind son of a bitch this side of the Atlantic, and that has protected him from the more unfortunate consequences that would ensue if it got around that he was a mutant. However, he’s gone through most of his life avoiding hospitals, skipping out on blood drives, and hoping that he never gets selected for a random drug screening, either at work or at school. And now here he is, prancing about as Hemogoblin with bright red eyes and a costume most people would associate with the color of human blood. So far most rumors seem to have Hemogoblin down as wearing candy red contact lenses for dramatic effect, but who even knows how a troll police officer will react.

He jumps down at last, after a few long minutes of wondering where Heir could possibly be. Hemogoblin lands soundlessly in the shadows just beyond the edge of the street lights and the flashing police emergency lights, and saunters his way closer to the ring of emergency responders trying to contain the situation and keep people out of range of the smoke. This situation is even more sensitive than most; Hemogoblin has no doubt by morning people will be whispering about a potential terrorist threat. Three bombings in a row? Homeland Security could show up any day now, and he and Heir will have to watch their steps. Vigilante heroes and local police generally cooperate together without incident, but federal law enforcement is notorious for interrogating first and trusting heroes later, after they’ve been Mirandized.

Karkat would be intimidated. Hemogoblin isn’t. He can’t afford to be. He slinks up to the nearest human officer and clears his throat. The last thing he wants is to sneak up on an entire crowd of jumpy cops. His smile inches up into something more seductive when the cop turns and very obviously gives Hemogoblin an unintentional once-over. The human turns bright red. “H-Hemogoblin, I presume,” he says, taking a step back. “Should have known you or Heir would show up after something like this.”

“No, there’s been no sign of him all night. And now this? If you or he have any information on what the hell is causing this ruckus, we here at the police department that just got blown up would really appreciate a heads up.” By the end, the cop has lost his fluster and gotten serious. He’s clearly pissed about the explosion. Which is pretty fucking understandable, all things considered.

“Actually, it was the interrogation room,” the cop says, pursing his lips. “He asked for a lawyer. An hour later, the lawyer shows up, and the next thing we know everything’s fucked to hell and back. Er. Don’t quote me on that.”

Like Hemogoblin would have any right to be offended on the whole swearing front. But – “Who was his lawyer? You just let someone just waltz in there with a bomb in their briefcase?”

He winces, because that came off way more accusatory than he intended, and the last thing he wants is to antagonize the police the very first time he interacts with them.

“Well obviously, now we’re fairly certain it wasn’t a lawyer,” the cop snaps back, his body language shutting down. Fuck. Way to shit all over that one with your incompetence at social interaction, Hemogoblin. Note to self – grow some fucking tact glands, starting yesterday. “I’m going to have to ask you to leave; this is being classified as an on-going potential terrorist attack at the moment, and I doubt you or Heir want to be around when the feds show up. Legislacerators could be involved.” He raises a meaningful eyebrow.

Great. Exactly what Hemogoblin had expected, but not wanted, to hear. He hides an outright grimace behind a flirtatious smirk. It’s one of his many layers of disguise that he uses to separate Karkat from Hemogoblin; whenever Karkat would want to throw a fit and run his mouth for days on end decrying the incompetence of the Seattle police department, Hemogoblin just simpers and flirts. “Thanks for the heads up,” he says, winking, and then he slides back into the shadows of the alleyway. There. Mission accomplished.

He is torn, though. When he scales the building and searches the skies, he finds nothing. There isn’t a lot of cloud cover tonight, aside from the burgeoning cloud of smoke rising from the police station, and thus nothing really obscuring his now-impeccable night vision. Over the past few weeks he has definitely seen Heir in flight a few times, so he can see that slate blue uniform against the night sky.

But now there’s nothing. Nothing at all.

Hemogoblin’s stomach turns over.

The Midnight Crew has already lured Heir into a trap once. What are the odds they could do it again, lead him somewhere far from the police station so he couldn’t interfere with Hearts’s escape? Last time they had grenades and semi-automatics, and there’s no doubt in Hemogoblin’s mind after that harrowing night that the Crew intended to kill or at least maim Heir to get him off their backs. He wants to believe that Heir could have handled the situation even if Hemogoblin hadn’t arrived when he did, but…he’s not so blinded by hero worship and a (tiny, absolutely miniscule) flushcrush that he couldn’t see that Heir was in serious trouble.

If Heir got here via the sky, as he always does, then if the Crew wanted to lead him somewhere, they –

Would leave the note where Heir’d see it from above. Wanting to slap himself for taking this long to work through some grub-level logic, the exact same process he went through two nights ago (way to go, Karkat, you’re truly measuring up to your usual minute level of intelligence on this fine night, crack job dunking yourself in sopor before heading out to fight crime), Hemogoblin crosses the rooftops in a wide circle around the mess of people and vehicles packed in around the station and ascends the building next to the police station, using blood hooks to get a better grip on the vertical surface. Once he reaches the top he switches to the police building, landing gracefully in a crouch when he swings himself up over the edge.

It’s a similar set up to the other roof two nights ago, a mirror set up this time to reflect the beam of a flashlight up into the sky. The mirror rests at an angle against the side of the covered stairwell that leads down into the police station, and there is a slip of paper tucked underneath the mirror. Checking the surrounding buildings for any watchers or traps, Hemogoblin darts over to the mirror and carefully lifts it up, removing the paper and unfolding it.

‘Sorry, kid,’ the note reads. ‘Got orders not to kill yah anymore, but here’s a little something to remember us by. Special delivery, to pay yah back for getting me arrested twice. It’s only a little personal. Give my regards to that sneaky troll son of a bitch.’

It’s not signed. Hemogoblin frowns. There’s nothing here that he can see that would have lead Heir away from the police station to another amush. Fuck, it doesn’t even look as though anyone’s touched this note but Hemogoblin. Has Heir even been up here? Is he even patrolling tonight? Heir has such stellar record for patrolling nightly that it’s a thought that hadn’t even occurred to Hemogoblin until this moment – maybe Heir just isn't working tonight. Maybe that grenade messed him up more than Hemogoblin noticed, which is a scary fucking thought.

And what does Hearts mean by a special -

Oh.

Oh, fuck.

The flashlight beeps, and the light shining at the mirror shuts off, and fuck, Hemogoblin is crouching barely a foot from it -

And the device explodes.

Through the lens of the grimdark, everything is clear. Now that the essence of light has been drained from the world, she is no longer blinded by the sun's harsh, deceiving glare.

Everything is dark and she can see the truth now. The channel between her mind and the swirling depths of eternity flows freely, the upwelling of bloodbrine and silt and ink flooding her body unhindered by such pathetic things as mental shields and a sober mind.

There is nothing of the light here. She rides over the world wrapped in darkness, with thorny tentacles of power arcing up into the sky above and trailing in black whorls over the forest beneath her. The tentacles above reach out and gather in clouds, blotting out even the light of the stars until nothing can shine through.

When she glances beneath her feet, surveying the too-dry, cluttered earth beneath her, she waves a smoldering hand and her dark aura drips down in smears of grimdark. Her thorns tangle down amidst the trees and stab into the base earth, and she begins to rend and tear. Darkness envelops the forest and sinks through the bark of trees to the soft rings within, poisoning them from the inside out. Everywhere she reaches out, death snuffs out fleeting bursts of life, animals that flee before the onset of the blight. Of course, everyone is welcome to become a tanglebuddy in death, and she soaks up their minds as their feeble land bodies perish. They stop screaming once they understand that they will NEVER BE LONELY AGAIN.

But honestly, everything the light has ever touched will have to go. All of these blighted, blasted creatures that thrive on such petty things as sunlight and clear air have no place in the salt sea of the Darkest Depths. Yes, when the Gate is open, they will have to cleanse this world and wash it clean with grimdark void and colddamp sea.

And then there will be nothing but the absolution of the void, the damp embrace of the tanglehorde, and everything will be at one with the most Noble Circle of Horrorterrors.

(please you have to stop this you can't let them do this wake up!)

There is, of course, that niggling voice that whispers up through the blood-dimmed tide, the strained, hoarse cry of a golden, bright mind. But it is swept aside in a rolling wave of dark water, and is gone once more. It stubbornly refuses to join the hivemind, Terrors only know why, but she will deal with it properly later.
Alas, that she must keep moving. She cannot loiter here and finish this work, not when there is still a Gate to open. Her gaze blank and pitiless as she looks down on the dark wastes beneath her, she continues to make her way south.

Rose wakes up over Albany.

She has been swallowed up by the sea for several hours now, and when she heaves herself up onto a dry refuge in her mind, she regains control of her eyes just in time to see that the forest has given way to city streets and buildings. The skyline is unfamiliar enough that it takes her a moment to identify it.

Albany is not the first town she has crossed while the Horrorterrors direct her toward New York City. It is simply the first Rose will be awake and aware of while the callous thing manipulating her body destroys it. While trying to make sense of the scattered memories that have survived being filtered through the grimdark, she can see what the Horrorterror working through her has wrought on the forests and small towns between the Lalonde manse and here, and she wants to vomit.

She is not the one in control, though, and the fragment of Terror that is in charge is in no way disgusted by the memories of destruction Rose sifts through. But suffice to say, if she were more than a simple mental construct isolated within the possessed depths of her own brain, Rose would be vomiting right now. From what she recalls, there is now an entire swath of dead earth through the middle of New York, and it is almost entirely her fault.

The thing controlling her body raises a hand gone grey with grimdark, and a thorny spell grows out of her palm. The rush of filmy, slick cold through her veins sickens her, and she has to retreat from the thin layer of salt left behind by the swelling power. But she can see what is about to happen; the spell is dark and crackling with unnatural power, but she can identify the basic magical structure, and extrapolate what this abomination means to unleash on Albany.

It will be awful. It will be cruel. It will be bloody.

What she does next is foolish, and reckless, and stupid. But Rose can't let this happen. She has to stop this. She can't let these people die.

She flings her mind at the tangle of raw power just before it can fire, wrenching at the smooth, moist flank of a massive intellect that is foreign and distorted, absolute and all-consuming, trying to divert the blast before it can happen. If she can just redirect it, just a little, take out a wall instead of a human, blow up a road instead of an apartment complex -

Her mental hands slide off the impenetrable, writhing tangle, and something slams into her side with the force of a geyser. Rose's mind cracks under the impact. Shards of herself break off and trail down into the dark sea below, and she barely stabilizes herself before she dissolves completely. When she finally connects to her vision again, she looks out through her own eyes just long enough to watch the spell drop to the ground below and explode in a brilliant burst of white fire and black thorns.

It's not Albany's fault, really. It was just in the way.

Thankfully, the tangle in her mind seems uninterested in more than that short display of its power. Even as screams and alarms begin to break the night sky, smoke rising from the wreckage below and feeding into the dark aura smoldering around Rose's body, she begins to float forward again, the black tentacles of power returning to wrap around her.
The words drum straight into her mind, and Rose screams, clawing at ears that aren't there as the voice of the Void echoes through her skull, acidic and knife-edged and ecstatic as it smiles at the destruction below. Even in meditation, even when she had to deal with the Horrorterrors directly and bargain for them to respect the seals she placed on her mind, she has never heard them like this.

It sounds like her voice. It sounds like her and she can't she can't she can't -

- Everything is sticky and wet, and when Rose licks her lips, she tastes blood and brine.

For the past few hours she has not been conscious within her own mind, and she knows with cutting certainty that the only reason she woke up this time is because the writhing, inky sea below has deliberately spared her. The tangle in her mind could have finished dissolving her from existence whenever it felt so inclined; but it seems to take some measure of amusement out of her horror whenever a new atrocity is committed by Rose's hands.

Black, thorny vines wrap around her hands, spikes digging into the flesh of her palms, and drag her forward out of the surf, and she no longer has the mental fortitude to fend them off. When the tangle brings the visual centers of her brain back online, she can see New York City through them. From this angle, they are no doubt on top of the Flatiron. The city looks rather unnervingly untouched.

"Tell the Seer of Light the Abyss is waiting. The Eldest Gods have only abated during the day because that was when there was the most light for destruction below. Even in meditation, even when she had to deal with the Horrorterrors directly and bargain for them to respect the seals she placed on her mind, she has never heard them like this.

Get out, Rose begs them silently, seeing more than a few foolish souls take up their smart phones and begin filming from behind food vendors and around corners. They don't understand; walls won't keep them safe from the monstrosities this tangle will unleash. Run!

The tangle descends. Rose's body glides down to the street below, her grimdark appearance and the crackle of dark tentacles reaching up into the sky sending people scurrying for cover. "The tangle continues, spreading her hands to encompass the crowds below. It is full morning, by now, but Rose has no hope that the tangle will be driven back into the Abyss by the rising sun. It is clear by now that the voices of the Eldest Gods have only abated during the day because that was when there was the most light for Rose's other powers to feed upon. The moment she spent a day in the darkness of her house, drunk and hungover in equal measure, her mind became an open channel for them, and she no longer has the strength to reach out to the sun and drive them back.

The Seer of Light is effectively dead.

The tangle descends. Rose's body glides down to the street below, her grimdark appearance and the crackle of dark tentacles reaching up into the sky sending people scurrying for cover. "Tell the Seer of Light the Abyss is waiting. The Eldest Gods have only abated during the day because that was when there was the most light for destruction below. Even in meditation, even when she had to deal with the Horrorterrors directly and bargain for them to respect the seals she placed on her mind, she has never heard them like this.

Get out, Rose begs them silently, seeing more than a few foolish souls take up their smart phones and begin filming from behind food vendors and around corners. They don't understand; walls won't keep them safe from the monstrosities this tangle will unleash. Run!

The tangle descends. Rose's body glides down to the street below, her grimdark appearance and the crackle of dark tentacles reaching up into the sky sending people scurrying for cover. They are important to me, Rose thinks, but the tangle already knows this. In fact, Rose realizes, that is the reason they came here at all. Hadn't it said itself, 'these are the people you protect?'

Why use a few random, doomed souls in Albany to open a gate to the Furthest Ring when the Horrorterrors could wring so much more grief and despair from their host by using her city. By undoing all the work the Seer ever did?

The tangle cackles, and charges up its first spell. YES, T'HE'I'R'N'DE'AI'T'H'S'S'H'AL'L'BR'IN'G'U'S'TH'RO'U'G'H'TH'E'G'A'T'E.'

_I won't let you do this. I won't let you get away with this. I will find you and I will kill you and I burn you for this -_

The tangle clucks, and lets fly the spell in its hand. Black thorns like lightning erupt from the ground beneath a cluster of curious on-lookers, and they are impaled instantly.

Rose screams.

"RE'AL'LY, M'RO'SE? A'NY'TH'IN'G.' A'T A'L'L?"

This is a trap. This is a trap, and everything left of Rose, of Seer, knows it. But does she have any other choice? She cannot wrest back control, but she _can_ take any opportunity to convince the tangle to stop using her body as an instrument of genocide. _Yes,_ she thinks, and some last part of her mind cracks. _Yes. Anything. Anything at all._

_I will bring you through the Gate myself._

One by one, the tentacles supporting Rose above the grimdark sea detach from her wrists, and then she is falling, falling, falling -

"TH'E'CO'N'TRA'C'T'IS' SEASE'D.'"

And Rose drowns once again.

Everything beneath the surf is cold and dark and bloody, and there is no light after.
She considers, for a moment, simply ripping the puny creatures before her to shreds. No, their deaths are no longer a necessary component of the Gate, but it would have been amusing to hear the last of Seer choke on her screams.

But alas, a contract is a contract. And the work of the Gate will still take hours, even if she doesn't waste time smiting every fleshling she comes across.

Shrugging, she stretches her arms over her head, the reinforced bones of this borrowed body creaking and cracking and breaking before settling back into place. She flaps a careless hand at the humans that still remain. "B E G O N E, W O R M."

They mewl and shriek and babble in their flat, lonely voices, but they obey, scrambling this way and that with no order, no finesse, trampling each other in their haste to escape their doom.

There. That should do it. Having fulfilled her obligation to get them out of the way and uphold the accord not to kill them all immediately, she begins charging the first of the sigil-carving spells between her palms, tracing with her eyes exactly where in the road she will carve the first curve of the Gate.

She hums to Seer, as cheerful as an eldritch abomination can be, the goodwill of the Tanglebuddies returned now that the host serves the horde willingly, rather than trying to block them at every turn. "O H O N O W Y O U A R E W I T L I N G N O W W E ' H A V E ' A N A C C O R D N ' O N E D TO D R A W T H I S O U T."

She raises the spell between her hands, and she grins maliciously.

"L E T IT B E G I N" she croons, and beams of power lance out, clawing up the street to burn the first curve of the Gate into the earth.

Clouds continue to gather over New York City, blotting out the rising sun.

Dave is stupid angry. Just. Stupid angry. The only reason he hasn’t flashstepped to his Bro’s room to initiate a beatdown is because Heir is throwing down with equal intensity, stubbornly rebutting Bro every time he tries to pull this weird bullshit. Mad props to the windy dude; he may so goofily sincere it’s almost sad, but he doesn’t take shit from anyone.

And then suddenly, out of nowhere, everything goes to fucking hell in a lacy little basket full of freshly picked what-the-fuck posies.

EB: OKAY THAT IS IT YOU PESTILENT NOOKSTAIN CONGRATULATIONS YOU ARE OFFICIALLY THE MOST RAGE-INDUCING BULGELICKING ASSHAT THE UNIVERSE HAS EVER HAD THE DISPLEASURE OF SECRETING INTO EXISTENCE
EB: LOOK AT THIS I AM REDUCED TO USING HIS FUCKING CAPS LOCK QUIRK
THIS IS UNACCEPTABLE
EB: I SWEAR TO ANY GOD LISTENING I AM GOING TO TG: whoa what
TT: shit
TG: john you know caps lock?
TG: were those weird troll swear words because i got maybe half of that TG: john?
EB: WKSHRISEHSKW
TG: oh my fuck what was that
TG: did you just keyboard smash in rage
TG: I swear to gog bro if you broke my fucking friend i will end you
TT: shit
TG: im not fucking around
TT: shit
TG: why do you keep saying that
TG: i don’t think it means what you think it means
TT: shit

A crash rings out through the apartment, coming not from the direction of Bro’s room, but from the kitchen. An unfamiliar voice yelps in pain as the kitchen’s pile of shitty swords collapses in a clatter of metal on linoleum.

Dave has his sword in hand and is in the kitchen the next moment, sword at the ready. Bro is already there of course, his face unreadable behind his shades as he observes the fuckass kneeling in the pile of piece of shit swords. Lil Cal is lounging lazily on his shoulder though, which means Bro is deadly serious.

“Ow,” the rando says, extricating himself from the sword pile with a wince. Dave can see the guy took a hard fall and landed pretty much in the worst way possible. One of the swords cut a long, deep slice up the guy’s inner arm, which is already in a sling, and he’s spewing blood everywhere. “Oh, fuck,” the guy says, gingerly dabbing at his arm.

“Yeah. Fuck,” Bro says, tucking his thumbs into his pockets. The more nonchalant he appears, the more of a threat he is. But there's no way this intruder will know that.

The guy whirls around, eyes wild. Dave’s stomach jolts with a sudden burst of recognition but – fuck, there’s no fucking way –

“Where the heck am I? What is this jackassery?!?” the guy demands, tucking his injured arm up against his blue t-shirt. Blood starts staining it immediately, and the sling itself isn't looking so hot either, considering it's been slit up the side. His eyes track over both Dave and Bro, frowning and defensive. They're both wearing their sunglasses, so he wouldn't know them for Flashstep or Puppeteer. “Who are you?”

“Right questions. One problem. You should be the one answering them.” Bro shifts a hand slightly and Lil Cal’s eyes gleam. “Care to explain just how the fuck did you get in our apartment, little man?”

“Your apartment,” the guy says, shaking his head slowly. And yeah, those fake brown eyes are kind of hard to forget, the rings where the contact lenses don’t quite cover a brilliant blue. “What are you talking about, I was just sitting in my room -”

The guy freezes. He meets Dave's gaze through his shades, eyes widening. Then, slowly, his frown transforms into a look of pure terror. “No,” he whispers, his face turning a sickly shade of maroon. “No, fuck no, fucking fuck -”

Dave drops the sword and steps forward, just as John – aka Heir of fucking Breath – takes a step back and nearly steps on the shitty sword pile again. A weird breeze stirs up, and it takes too long for Dave to realize it’s Heir about to flip his shit. He hides his face in his good hand, his eyes turning an ominously luminescent blue as he stares out from behind splayed fingers. “This isn’t possible,” John stammers. “Dave? You live in Houston!”

Dave just nods, spreading his hands wide to try to look nonthreatening. He just - needs to keep it cool. Yeah. Random heroes from halfway across the country pop up in his kitchen all the damn time. It’s getting pretty old, actually. He wants a refund.

Yeah, he’s not kidding anyone, not even himself. This is fifty shades of fucked up, right here.

“Bro, put the creeptastic puppet away,” he hisses at his brother. Bro gives him a considering look, one eyebrow very firmly raised as he ignores the order. Yeah, Dave probably has some explaining to do. Which can, you know, wait until after Heir stops bleeding out all over their goddamn kitchen floor. “John, hey. Yeah, this is Houston,” Dave says, taking a step closer.

John has his back up against the fridge, and can only straighten up when Dave comes closer, still trying to conceal his face with his hand. It makes sense; the one time Dave had met Heir, he’d had pretty thick goggles and a face mask on. Secrecy is pretty important to the kid; half of the rules that guide their chat sessions were laid down by John. Even in the middle of one pretty fucked up mental break, Heir had been a stickler for protocol. Being caught without something covering his face must be just eating at him.

Well. There’s a solution for that. Dave takes his shades off and holds them out, squinting his eyes against the kitchen light. Even as he does so Bro is at the light switch, dimming the lights to a level more comfortable for someone just this side of albino. “Here, cover your eyes man,” Dave says, deliberately looking down at a corner of the countertop rather than John’s face. It’s too late and everyone here knows it; they got a nice eyeful of John’s face the moment he looked up from the swords. But this way, everyone except Bro will be almost halfway to hero mode, and maybe that will make John calm the fuck down and stop flinging wind around willy nilly.

John reaches out and takes the sunglasses, putting them carefully on his face. They sit weird on him; they’re a style suited to the impassive face of a Strider, and they look too big and clumsy on John. But they do the job, and John’s shoulders visibly slump with relief, the warning breeze dying off into a soft susurrus. “Thanks,” he says, with that same note of sincerity that Dave still remembers all these years later. Jeez, the kid hasn’t changed at all, has he? Just got a bit taller, filled out some, lost that hollow look in his face that stemmed from some serious depression.

Little things, really, not that big of a deal.

“No problem, man.” But of course, there’s still the question of - “Seriously, how the hell are you here? Last time I checked you were chatting with us from a computer in Seattle. How’re you suddenly in Texas?”

John shakes his head slowly, hugging the injured arm to his chest. There’s actually a worrying amount of blood spreading across the front of his shirt, now. “I have absolutely no idea,” he admits. “I mean – I was just chatting with you guys and then - I don’t know, I just suddenly landed face first in a bunch of sharp objects. Why do you guys have this stuff lying around on the floor, anyway?”

“You didn’t come here on purpose?” Bro says, his tone too noncommittal to sound like a demand. Lil Cal is still on his shoulder, even when Dave scowls at him. Then he remembers he’s not wearing his sunglasses, and he won’t get away with showing such obvious expressions. He smooths his face out again into stoicim.

“How could I?” John’s hand fists in his hair. The shades don’t work for him; Dave can still see the panicky confusion contorting his face. “This is – not possible. Even when I’m at top speed, I can only go as fast as the wind. I think the most I’ve ever clocked in at was maybe 250 miles an hour? And that was in a dive, almost free-fall. To get from Seattle to Houston – wait, what time is it -”

“You stopped responding five minutes ago,” Bro says, his shades glinting. “And we’ve been talking for three of them.”

John shakes his head. “That can’t be. That kind of distance – it would have taken me hours, if I flew nonstop. Days, if I needed to stop to rest, which I would have.”

“And yet, here you are,” Bro murmurs. “Go check out the window if you don’t believe us.”

John’s head swivels toward the open window in Dave’s room, visible through the open door, and he stiffens. “That’s not my skyline,” he whispers. “And – fuck, I can feel the humidity. Okay. I’m in Houston.” He laughs, and it sounds hysterical before he muffles it. “This is just. Wow. What a fucking mess.” His shoulders shake with suppressed laughter, and he winces visibly, pulling his arm away from where it lies sticky with blood against his shirt.

“Alright, yeah, we need to deal with that,” Dave says, taking another step closer. “Give me your arm.”

John stiffens, then holds his arm out, as though begrudging the motion. But his arm is shaking when Dave takes it by the wrist to examine the cut. It really does run pretty fucking deep, and it’s gonna need stitches, in addition to a metric fuckton of antiseptic. Dave knows his sword wounds, and this is at least moderately concerning.

“Here, we have some Neosporin and shit in the bathroom,” Dave mutters, keeping his eyes fixed on the line of red running down John’s forearm. If he looks up now John will get a good look at Dave’s eyes. Without his shades, in a situation that kind of fucks the boundary between work and personal life, Dave feels more vulnerable than ever with his bright red eyes bare. “It’s gonna need stitches though.”

“I heal fast,” John says, with the practiced tone of something he’s clearly memorized in the past.

“You’re not gonna heal if you pass out from blood loss and get fucking infected,” Dave says, raising an eyebrow. Eyebrow raises are still on the table.

“…Point,” John says, nodding. “Can I -”

Bro holds the first aid bucket in his hand when Dave looks up. Supposedly the bucket started out a mere first aid kit, and had been upgraded to full on bucket status as the intensity of Bro and Dave’s training increased over the years to accommodate the amount of shit they needed to keep from losing fingers. “Rinse it off in the sink,” Bro says, setting it on the counter by the kitchen sink, and then he vanishes again. Who even knows where to. Dave’s lived with the guy his entire life, and he still has no fucking clue where all the hiding places are. Hide and seek as a kid had been all kinds of life-ruining.

Dave realizes he’s still got his hand on John’s arm when John steps over to the sink and turns the water on. One half of the sink is full of smuppets, and Dave’s face burns bright red for a moment before he stops time to pull a stray towel over them, mortified. John doesn’t seem to have noticed the puppet abominations, too busy extricating his arm from that sling and gingerly stretching out his arm to let water run into the cut, his jaw set against the pain. Dave hands him more towels to dry the arm, which is already starting to bead with blood again.
The silence is weird and strained as Dave helps smear antiseptic on the wound, with John biting back noises whenever the Neosporin has to touch the open gash itself. On Pesterchum words come easily; in reality, Dave is very aware of the collar around his throat (which he had only put on to go talk to Bro before he’d crashed their chatroom) and of the vague, ever-present buzz in his voice. It’s not like he’s fucking self-conscious, it’s just – it’s a thing, alright. And maybe John hadn’t noticed when they met that first time, but there’s no need for Dave to go waving a pair of middle fingers at the guy and belting out an opera to show off how fake his voice is.

“Damn. It is going to need stitches,” John says, sounding mournful. He prods at the edge of the wound, and sighs. “I don’t even know how I’m going to explain this to my – guardian.” The pause when he probably means to use a more gender-specific word for a guardian is obvious. What a paranoid kid. Then again, Dave is hardly allowed to talk, right?

Then John’s eyes widen behind the shades. “Shit,” John breathes, digging in his pockets with his uninjured hand, patting at them a few times uselessly when he fails to find whatever the hell he’s looking for. “Shit! My phone is still in my backpack. Dammit, my lusus must be freaking out by now.”

Dave has to think about that one. “Dude, did you just use the troll word for parent? Exactly how much time have you been spending with your new troll buddy? Because that’s a little weird.”

“It’s gender-neutral,” John says, burying his face in his hand. “Fuuuuuck. How do I even explain this? For that matter, how do I get back home?!”

“First you let Bro stitch up your arm.” When John shoots him a harassed glare, Dave shrugs. “Puppets, man. He’s fucking good at stitching and shit. And you can use a phone here, dumbass, we’re not gonna just stitch you up and shove you out the front door. For one thing, you’d probably try to keep my shades while you blasted off into the metaphorical sunset.”

Dave’s phone background is one of his many ironic selfies. He maintains a perfectly straight face as he unlocks it and goes straight to the phone app before handing it over. “Knock yourself out, kid.”

Bro returns between one step and the next, a sewing kit tucked into his hand, and Dave exchanges a look with him.

Are we going to have a problem?

Not from John.

Bro grunts and starts setting up his needles while John is tapping in a phone number, slow and careful, as though worried he’ll forget the number halfway through and can’t afford to mess up. His arm is oozing blood still, and his shirt is smeared with both blood and Neosporin now. However he’s getting home, he’s probably gonna need to borrow a shirt before he goes out in front of people and gets an ambulance called on him. When Bro tilts his head at John’s arm, John isn’t paying enough attention to notice, intent on the phone ringing against his ear, so Dave nudges his arm onto the countertop, trying to play it off smoothly. John looks at him worriedly, before his face lights with comprehension and his whole body braces for the first stitch.

Someone answers on the other end of the phone line just as Bro starts stitching silently. Dave gives the kid props, he doesn’t even need a bottle of vodka to keep from flinching at the pain. “D-d-lusus,” John catches himself. No, that was just…wow. Dave mouths ‘just say dad’ at the kid, and John flushes painfully. “Argh. Sorry Dad.”

Dave can hear the force of John’s dad’s response with ease; but then, he is standing all up in John’s personal space. He should probably move, but how else will he listen in?

“John. Where are you. This number has a Houston area code – is someone with you right now?”

“Yeah, someone’s with me, you could say that.” A stitch tugs at John’s skin and he twitches and bites back a yelp, one eye clearly twisted up in a weird half-grimace behind the shades. Wow, those shades are doing absolutely nothing at all on the concealment front. “Um. This is gonna sound pretty much impossible. Uh. I kind of, uh. I am in Houston.”

A long silence ensues. “John, stay where you are. I can trace this number to its location, I just need you to stay on the line. Are you injured?”

John blows out air through his nose. “Dad, I’m serious. I am in Houston. I have no idea how I got here, but apparently I managed it in just under a minute or so. I’m, uh. I’m with Flashstep and the Puppeteer.”

“John, I’m going to need a little more explanation than that,” the voice says flatly.

“When I landed – however I landed – I ended up kind of accidentally stabbing myself on this pile of shitty swords,” John goes on, kicking one leg absently. He yelps aloud and then claps his free hand belatedly over his mouth when a particularly deep stitch tugs at the edges of the sword wound. “So now I have to get stitches. But uh, other than that, I’m fine. Just reeeeeally confused.”

“Password,” John’s guardian says at last. “I mean it John, if you’re in danger, I need the password.”

“I’m not giving you the password when I’m not in danger.” John rolls his eyes, proving that the shades have in fact begun to slide down the bridge of his nose and reveal his eyes anyway. No wonder the kid wears the goggles, nothing else stays attached to his face. “I’m just confused and kind of hungry and wondering how the heck I managed to cut a ten hour flight down to less than a minute without remembering anything about it. And also how I’m gonna get back.”

Another long silence occurs, during which Bro’s quick, neat stitch work ends and he ties off the knot with a nod before vanishing to hide his sewing kit again. Dave wordlessly hands John the Neosporin again, and the kid makes a face before starting to salve more onto the wound, head tilted to the side as he listens.

“You don’t have your wallet with you, or your phone. I have both here. Do you think you can return the same way you left?”

John hesitates, eyes flicking toward Dave, who just raises another pointed eyebrow. He doesn't even know what that look was about, but he’s not going to let that ignorance show. Strider rule number one, never let them see you confused. A coolkid is always on top of his game, even when the game involves twelve different types of dice, people can teleport from one end of the map to the other, and the points don't matter. “I wouldn’t even have the first idea how to. I don’t even know if I did it, or if it was some kind of outside force. All I know is – uh, Flashstep and Puppeteer were just as surprised when I showed up as I was.”

“Have them set up a secure email.” John’s dad is suddenly all business, some of the urgency gone from his voice. He still sounds coldly furious, though, the barely restrained tension in his voice audible even to Dave. The guy sounded like a fucking douche – what, John didn’t even get a ‘glad you’re not dead or kidnapped’ spiel? “I don’t want you flying back to Washington out of uniform. I can see what flights run between Seattle and Houston and send you the ticket information.”

“No buts. Nothing is up for discussion until we get you home. Did you have plans with – your friend tomorrow?”

“Yeah. I’ll cancel th- no, I can’t. He’d notice the area code, too.”

“I’ll do my best to get you on a flight tonight. If we need to, you can send me your password and I’ll text him through your phone.” A pause, and the cold voice continues. “I’ll call you back in a few minutes. Please answer when I do.”

“I will.”

The phone clicks. John looks up, shoving the shades back up his nose when he realizes how far they’ve fallen. “I guess I’m flying the old fashioned way,” he says, a faint, forced smile on his face. And –

Fuck.

Dave knows that weird, wistful smile, knows it too well for having only witnessed it one bizarre day nearly two years ago. Feels it like an ugly twist in his gut, a sickening lurch as though he’s misjudged the landing while crossing the rooftops. Hell, if he wouldn’t do anything to make that smile fuck right off, because it isn’t a smile at all. It’s a question mark, like the kid doesn’t remember how to be happy.

So much for ‘i’m feeling much better now dave, you don’t need to worry so much i think i’m not so alone anymore.’ Load of bullshit. If he hadn’t overheard Asshole Dad mention a friend, Dave would be seriously doubting the existence of said friend at all. Apparently one good conversation with Dad of the Year and none of that mattered, because John looked just as lost and tired now as he had the day he punched a mugger in the face with a fistful of air and then turned to smile at Dave with a too-wide, rictus grin, more suited to a skeleton than a boy.

Dave does the same thing he did back then, when faced with that mockery of a smile. He takes the phone out of John’s hand and yanks him roughly into a hug, ignoring the kid’s flailing protests as he wraps his arms around his shoulders and holds on tight. “Shut up, John,” he says, clapping at a handful of John’s shirt, aware that he can feel the sticky damp of blood from the front of John’s shirt smearing onto his own. He could fucking care less at the moment. “Fuck your dad. You want to fly home yourself, then fucking fly home yourself. We can go all professional robber-chic and buy you a ski mask so no one can take your picture while you’re buzzing Nevada.”

“My dad would be pissed! And it would probably take me two days to get there, if I pushed it,” John protests, getting all squirmy. Dave just gets comfy, patting him on the back occasionally. That’s the nice thing about having the ultimate poker face; shit like this doesn’t even faze him. “Ka-my friend would definitely notice if I just mysteriously vanished or something over the weekend. I already made him really suspicious when I had to miss school on Thursday!”

“Yeah. But you still want to.”

John stills, and then, abruptly, Dave has an armful of heavy, quiet John. All the fight has gone out of him, and for a moment they’re both silent. “You know, I’m pretty sure that counts as shooshpapping,” John mutters, knocking his head on Dave’s shoulder. “Asshole. No one’s supposed to do that but my moirail. Which I have now. Fuck.

Yeah, Dave has about zero context for any of this. Whaat, so he’s culturally insensitive - he has enough trouble maintaining all this Strider brand cool without worrying about weird trollmance quadrant shenanigans on top of that. “Contrary to whatever your troll buddy is telling you? Humans don’t follow troll quadrants,” Dave says, rolling his eyes. “Yeah, sometimes people get their hatemance on and everything, but seriously, I’m pretty sure serendipity is just some troll hormone thing. You’re a human. Guess what. If the shooshpapping works, it works. Whatever the hell shooshpapping is, anyway. Sounds like a troll made-up word, so that makes about as much sense as anything else about trolls.”

“Haha. I’m pretty sure that’s not how it works.” John shakes his head. “Why do you know me that well, anyway? How did you know I want to fly?”

“Aside from the fact that you practically gave me a play-by-play of your issues last time you were here? I’ve been talking to you for years now, dumbass. You always want to fly.” Dave lets go of the kid at last. You can only hug so much before it stops being either necessary or ironic and descends into the realm of the disgustingly sappy. “Seriously, this isn’t anything new. You were practically in tears last time because you wanted to zoom off during school hours and fly to your classes and take people for crazy tornado fun times instead of walking everywhere like the rest of us peons.”

John blushes so much his whole face looks stained the color of tea. “Shut up,” he says, picking at the stitches in his arm.

“We should wrap that up if you’re flying back,” Dave notes, turning to dig through the first aid bucket again.

“I haven’t said I’m flying back.” John makes a face, but it’s no longer plagued with the old, weary exhaustion; he looks alive again. Behold the power of Strider. “I still wish I knew what got me here. If it happened again mid-flight, who knows where I’d end up.”

“You don’t remember anything at all?” Dave yanks a roll of bandages out of the bucket and starts unrolling it. “Because it looked like you were pretty pissed off at Bro, and you got cut off before you could finish your assuredly epic-level death threat.”

John purses his lips as he glances at Bro’s closed bedroom door. Apparently, care and keeping of Heir has been left to Dave for the duration of his stay. Even Lil Cal has fucked off to parts unknown, which is vastly reassuring. The older Dave gets, the fucking creepier Bro’s puppet of choice gets. He swears to any god listening that one day he will take that puppet and introduce it to the fucking blender.

“Yeah. Uh. Sorry about whole chat thing,” John says, rubbing the back of his neck sheepishly. “I kind of did a flip off the metaphorical handle, didn’t I? I don’t know why I got so angry.”

“A full-on pirouette,” Dave agrees. “But to be fair, Bro was getting all weird and shit about this Midnight Crew thing.”

Both he and John yell, because Bro’s voice doesn’t come from behind his bedroom door but from right the fuck behind them. The wind whips once before John settles down again, sending the bandages flying at the wall to bounce off the stovetop. The kid is fucking twitchy.

“Apology accepted by the way, kid,” Bro says, a tiny smirk in the corner of his mouth. “But hell. I’ll only say this one more time. You want my advice, you don’t go home. You call your guardian and tell him you’re moving somewhere else. Maybe Vancouver – Vancouver is still clear, and you’re still near your old turf. I wasn’t fucking kidding around; people die when the Crew gets pissed off. And after what just happened today? I think they’ll be very interested in you.”

John frowns and leans against the counter, crossing his free arm awkwardly over his chest while Dave commandeers his other arm to bandage it. “What the heck does that mean? Why would they be interested in me after today? I didn’t even fight them today. I’m probably going to miss patrol at this rate.” He sounds bitter, but Dave is too busy keeping steady pressure on the arm wound to clap him on the shoulder again.

Bro tilts his head to the side. “Because I just took a look at the kitchen cameras.”

Dave slaps his forehead. “You have the cameras on again?! I thought we said no more creepy puppet porn in the kitchen!” He should have known better after seeing the pile of smuppets once again taking up the kitchen sink, but he’d still held out hope for an alternative explanation.

“Ain’t porn, kid,” is all Bro says, which is a total lie. Dave knows. He's seen things, man. Terrible things. Things not meant to be witnessed by a sane man.

John rips his arm out of Dave’s grip, the bandage job only half finished, and he stares at Bro with wide-eyed horror, and, for the first time, genuine rage. “You have me on camera.”

“I have fucking all of us on camera at some point,” Bro says with a shrug. “And you’re going to want to see this, anyway. It’s pretty fucking enlightening.”

"No, just - no. This stops right now. You need to delete that, whatever you have on camera. This is not cool, okay?” John insists. His brown contact lenses seem to have fucking dissolved, because the blue is showing through and starting to look luminous again.

"Fine, I don't fucking need it," Bro says. "But you'll wanna watch it first. Come on, kiddies." With a wise-ass smirk he vanishes.

Dave catches John by the arm, and John gives him an irate glare, eyes all gloowy and shit. "Come on.
If he says he'll delete it, he will." This is a blatant lie, but Dave has a fucking spectacular poker face, as has been stated. Bro follows his own weird, puppet-freak whims, and only keeps his word about half the time. Usually when he doesn't, he only breaks his promises to some inscrutable end that ends up saving lives in an unfathomably badass fashion, so Dave's learned to let it just roll over him.
Mostly. "Let's just get it over with. Then we can get you a new goddamn shirt or something, you look like fucking Carrie."

John grimaces, but his eyes power down as he tugs at the edge of his shirt and makes a face at the blood smeared down his front. "Oh, great. Yeah, I'd appreciate that. What a mess…”

And so peace is restored to the land. Dave is the Heir-whisperer. It is him. He walks without flashstepping toward Bro's unholy hellhole of a room, and John follows, the windy thing around him relatively calm but still present.

Bro's room is deceptively clean and free of puppets, and his bed, unlike Dave's is perfectly made, as though Bro is too cool for such lowly human functions as sleep. Dave knows this to be an ironic cover for the fact that his closet is fucking jam packed with creepy ass puppets and high quality swords. Instead, robot parts and gears litter the corners in piles, and a single battle puppet - not Lil Cal - lies out on the desk, its mechanical insides exposed. Bro is putting on a show of tinkering with the gears, but the four monitors on his desk are all tuned to one channel, a silent hint that he's more interested in the screens than the robots.

Dave and John crowd in behind Bro’s chair, Dave keeping a good distance from the screen to hide just how very interested he is in getting a goddamn explanation for tonight. John just leans in, one hand clenched on top of the desk, oblivious to how close to a potentially deadly puppetkind specibus he’s leaning. Seriously, Dave is gonna have to sweep his room for fucking sword traps and shit before he lets John anywhere near it; the kid just does not comprehend the many different ways this apartment is designed to fuck with the minds of the unwary.

Once they’re both there, Bro absently reaches up and presses a button on his keyboard, and then pretends to go back to working on the puppet as the video starts.

On the tape, the kitchen is dark and cluttered with random shit (John is right, why do they have all this random-ass stuff everywhere?), the pile of smuppets in the sink silhouetted in the moonlight, which is creepy as fuck.

They watch about five minutes of the same scene before John gets antsy. True, Dave doesn't see the point of this either, but John shows his restlessness, shifting his weight from side to side, his frown deepening with each passing minute. How does this kid feel so damn much all the time? John opens his mouth, then snaps it shut, as though swallowing the urge to say something. It's bizarre, watching someone with so many tells in their face. And all that is just what Dave can see in the corner of his eyes, with most of his focus on the video feed.

Finally, something changes on screen. It doesn't really make sense, either. A whooshing feedback blasts through the speakers, loud enough to make even Dave wince, and then - John is on screen. He just magically appears out of the air two feet above the ground, one arm flying out to grab the edge of the kitchen counter. The other arm, trapped by the sling, ends up taking a sword to the forearm before John can yank it free, which is actually a pretty lucky coincidence - the angle of that sword could have fucked John's lungs up good.

Then Dave and Bro are in the kitchen, having flashstepped their way in, and Bro pauses the feed.

"What...the heck?" John says, looking nonplussed. "I just - showed up. I didn't even fly in through the window, or anything. Are you sure there isn't something wrong with the tape?"

"I have five cameras on that kitchen, kid. Same thing on all of them. No sign of tampering or distortion. Kudos, Heir, you've apparently mastered teleportation." Bro doesn't even bother with a slow clap; it's implied.

"I don't think you can call it 'mastered' if I have no idea how I did it," John says, still staring at the paused video feed. "Weeird. So weeieird."

"Well, figure it the fuck out. Dave and I are still overdue for a nice long, heart to heart chat about how he knows you, and the only reason you're still in this apartment right now is because he's vouching for you. If you figure out how to do it again, feel fucking free."

"Vouching for - he didn't even say anything," John protests. Dave has to shake his head. Apparently a lot of the subtext has been going over John's head.

"Boy, sometimes you are as dumb as a sack of hammers," Bro says, shaking his head almost at the same moment Dave does, shrugging sarcastically. "Anyway, your guardian called."

John flinches, then looks confused, one hand going for the pocket where he'd put Dave's phone. "Wait, what? When?! I thought I had the ph-"
Bro holds up Dave's phone in his hand, and Dave bristles. John stops patting at his pockets, looking embarrassed. "He emailed over the flight number and shit," Bro says, smirking at both of them in his victory. "You head out at five in the morning. Crash on the couch or do fuck all in Dave's room, I don't care. I printed off the tickets for you."

He holds up a folded piece of paper in a gloved hand, a smug grin on his face as John snags the ticket. Then he lobs the cell phone at full speed toward Dave's head. Dave stops time and grabs it. "Nice selfies, btw, Dave," Bro finishes, swiveling in his chair to face the computer monitors and the puppet once more. "Classic irony. Truly vintage stuff, right there."

He has the tone in his voice that means Dave's slipped up in the great game of irony again. It's gone past vintage irony and straight into cringe-worthy. Fuck.

"Wait, that doesn't make any sense. What did you say - he would have asked for me if he called. There's no way he'd trust you guys with something like this. No offense," John says. He doesn't look apologetic, though; he's eyeing Bro warily, one hand still at his pocket where he'd kept the phone. He no doubt wonders how Bro got in and out of his guard so easily. John is smarter than your average non-Strider, but Dave could have told him there is no point in wondering - Bro's impossible speed and stealth remain a mystery even to Dave after all these years.

"None taken, kid. What can I say? I have my ways," Bro says, answering basically nothing at all. He pulls out a fucking welding torch and starts using it on the puppet without even putting on a safety mask over his shades. Sparks fly everywhere, and it's probably a side effect of Bro's eternal aura of cool that nothing catches fire.

"What does that mean? What did my dad say?" Bro finishes, swiveling in his chair to face the computer monitors and the puppet once more. "Classic irony. Truly vintage stuff, right there."

"None taken, kid. What can I say? I have my ways," Bro says, answering basically nothing at all. He pulls out a fucking welding torch and starts using it on the puppet without even putting on a safety mask over his shades. Sparks fly everywhere, and it's probably a side effect of Bro's eternal aura of cool that nothing catches fire.

"What does that mean? What did my dad say?!" John demands, taking a step forward.

Bro grunts. "Nothing much. Told me to mind my own fucking business, then had to go answer the door and deal with people. Probably afraid I'm gonna trample all over his precious single-parent territory. What can I say, I intimidate other parents with my fantastic guardianship skills. It's why they kicked Dave out of preschool - the other kids couldn't handle their jealousy over the fact that Dave got to come home with me everyday, kept trying to ditch their own parents to get some of this parental goodness."

John looks suspicious, but he folds up the ticket and stuffs it into his pocket after scanning it again. "Thank you for printing it, sir."

Bro's eyebrows could have raised the roof. "Sir? Dave, why the fuck don't you call me sir?"

"Because fuck you, that's why," Dave replies, giving him the middle finger. "Now delete the creepy kitchen video before I beat you to it and introduce the hard drive to my shitty swords."

"You could try, little brother. You wanna go? Because it sounds like someone's getting a little uppity." Dave catches the twitch of Bro' fingers that could mean anything from a puppet pile to a stack of shitty swords is about to appear out of thin air. He braces himself to stop time -

"I really would prefer if you destroyed that video," John interjects, before Bro can finish issuing the deathmatch challenge Dave can feel coming. "I'm sure you guys wouldn't leak it to the Internet or anything like that on purpose, but it's still a risk to have that kind of evidence lying around. And you two are out of costume on it, too."

He clearly thinks he's being reasonable and convincing with that last point; it probably has yet to hit him that Bro is wearing exactly the same kind of outfit he always wears in the field on patrol.
"...Fine. I'll erase every copy of that clip. Just for you, kid, because Dave likes you, and it's fucking precious that after eighteen years he's finally figured out this mysterious thing called friendship." Bro cracks his knuckles. "All I ask is that you hear me out about the Midnight Crew thing."

What.

"Dude. Okay. What. No. What the fuck," Dave demands. John just seems speechless, his mouth opening and shutting wordlessly, and Dave completely understands. He'd thought they'd put this whole MC farce behind them but apparently not. "Alright, yeah, John, just ignore him, we're leaving."

"Stop, Dave. Let the kid talk. Your massive secret friendship boner is just embarrassing," Bro drawls.

Wow. Shut down. Again. Dave feels his teeth grit, his cheeks flaring a bright red of both embarrassment and anger, and knows that even showing that much irritation is too much. In Bro's eyes, Dave just lost, no matter what he says or does afterward.

And maybe John had a point earlier, on Pesterchum. It's been building for years now, but Dave is just...tired. So tired of this fucking nonstop game Bro plays. Irony and self-control - the twin essences of the coolkid, the way of the Strider.

Yeah. Maybe it had been fun when Dave was a kid, and all he wanted to do was prove himself to his big brother. Lately, it just feels stifling. Annoying. Every time he has to remind himself not to express emotion, it's a pain in the goddamn ass.

Of course, there's absolutely no one he can talk to about this. Perks of being raised by a fucking isolationist. Bro would have done the Monroe Doctrine proud, and no, don't ask Dave how he knows what the Monroe Doctrine is. You come across some weird shit on the Internet, alright? Suffice to say, Striders are a fucking island, and Dave's spent so long avoiding normal social interaction, he can't remember how it works, if he even knew in the first place.

John and Bro have still been arguing while Dave seethes, lost in his own head. "It's not going to stop with blowing up random buildings," Bro is saying when Dave's brooding intermission comes to an end. "They'll go after you directly now that you've crossed them. And now that you're dicking around with teleportation, you'll jump right to the top of their most-wanted list."

"He already tried a grenade once already," John yells, flinging his hands up in the air. Dave is almost impressed by how much excess emotion the kid has to spare. Even at his most outraged Dave doesn't think he could feel that much. "I don't see how they're even going to find out about this whole Houston thing - I'll be back by tomorrow!"

"They know. They always know."

"If you can't be more explicit than that, there's no way you can convince me to leave Seattle," John says, shaking his head. "I have a duty to my city. I'm going back. I'm not running away," His expression goes still and solemn behind the shades, and his lip pouts out a bit, but the overall effect is pretty clear. "I appreciate" - the word practically scrapes over John's tongue with clear reluctance - "your advice. But that's enough. Once I get home, I'm in my territory. I'm not telling you what to do about Houston, am I?"

"...Touché. It's your ass, kid. Up to you how you want to risk it," Bro replies at last. He pushes his pointy shades up his nose, and they glint in the half light. "I already gave my two fucking cents to your dad. I'm just telling you. Let that troll kid know what he's up against, before he gets hurt. I'm "Sure you can take care of yourself, but he's probably not half as resilient."

"Why do you even care?" Dave bursts in. "Oh my god, Bro, and you call me embarrassing. You and this Crew thing, it's like a dog and a fucking bone. Aren't you supposed to be the chill one? Lay off."

"Please," John adds emphatically, nodding at Dave. Fuck yeah, solidarity.

Bro goes totally still. The kind of still that implies a truly harsh smackdown is about to be unleashed when they're strifing, and Dave tenses. Between John's (totally justified) anger, Dave's simmering rebellion, and Bro's incredibly idiotic decision to be a stubborn ass today, they're basically setting up for a three-man cage match, which is both awesome and amazingly stupid. Particularly since they're in the seat of Bro's power. It's like a puppet depot up in here.

Somehow, it doesn't all end in a free-for-all. "Yeah. I don't let shit rile me up. But I'm also not a total dick," Bro says, his tone actually dry with detectible sarcasm. His volume starts to increase, until it's louder than Dave has ever heard Bro speak before, and Dave can't help but stare as though Bro has started to grow a second head. "I raised a fucking kid, I'll have you know. Dave didn't just magically walk out of the sea fully formed in a cloud of seafoam and rainbows. Maybe your guardian is okay with letting a pair of kid heroes go up against an entire gang of dangerous motherfuckers, but I. Am. Not."

Dave's jaw drops.

Bro shakes his head and puts down the welding torch. He closes up the puppet's chest cavity and takes up his needle and thread. "Get outta my room, you punks. Go the fuck to sleep or something."

There's some weariness in his tone that brooks no argument. Dave is shaken, still trying to process the violent emotion that had suddenly emerged from Bro's monotone at the end of that rant. He - he can't. He touches John's shoulder instead, jerking his head toward the open door. He doesn't know what his face is doing, too much confusion and shock roiling around to contain it all, but whatever John sees is enough to get him to walk out with Dave.

They leave Bro alone, hunched over his desk, sewing quietly in the bluish light of the computer monitors.

"...Wait here," Dave says, putting out an arm to stop John from crossing the threshold into Dave's bedroom.

"What's up?" John says, standing awkwardly in his blood-smeared t-shirt and the reattached sling. Using his windy thing earlier seems to have dissolved his false-colored contact lenses or some shit, but even with the brilliant blue eyes exposed, the difference between John and Heir is obvious. John may be on the alert, stuck in an unfamiliar place under mysterious circumstances, but he does seem to trust Dave a little, at least, so he's lost some of the battle-ready aura and tension that followed him from the kitchen into Bro's room.

"Gotta disarm all this shit, man. Try to make this place safe for human habitation. There's some sacred law of hospitality about this kind of thing, all right?" That all cleared up, Dave walks into the room, fighting the urge to flashstep all over the fucking place and just clear up any potential traps that way. Bro knows about the flashstep - that's the whole fucking point - so most of the traps will be set to go off in places he least suspects it, places he'd only step if he happened to walk there normally rather than skipping over it in a time-stop.
So Dave does a careful, shuffling circuit of the room, hands stuffed into his pockets. He's painfully aware with each passing minute of how stupid he looks, circling his own room while nothing at all happens. He even opens his closet door and steps inside, and nothing happens.

Did someone abduct Bro and replace him with a normal person? Jesus Christ, Dave is about ready to believe that, even if he only just saw Bro two minutes ago. After that glimmer of actual emotion from his brother at the end of his argument with John, Dave doesn't know what the hell to think anymore. There isn't a single fucking trap in here. This ain't natural.

Trying to distract himself, he grabs a short-sleeved red shirt with the Iron Man symbol on it (everything is done in the service of irony, okay?) and tosses it to John. The wind catches it instead, which is - really fucking cool, all right, he said it - and John glances around the room once more with an appraising eye before stepping in, apparently put on his guard by Dave's residual wariness. Then John looks down at the shirt in his hands, and pauses, blinking at the shirt. "You know, I think I own this shirt, too!"

Dave shakes his head, going to his desk and shoving his latest taxidermy find, a four-eyed black cat, behind a pile of old vinyl records. Knowing John, he wears that shirt unironically, and Dave wants no part in that level of geekery.

He has also never been more aware of just how many dead animals he has lying around in various different states of preservation. He sees John's jaw drop as he inspects a Gila monster in a jar of formaldehyde, and he quickly kicks a stuffed platypus into the shadows under his desk before John can see it. "Anyway, mi casa, su casa, John," he says, hitching a hip on the corner of his desk. "Except, you know, don't go near Bro's puppet sex torture dungeon by yourself. There is evil there that does not sleep. Seriously. I've never seen that asshole sleep. Not even once."

"Haha, really?" John shakes his head. "You know, I don't think I've ever seen my dad asleep, either. Even when I wake him up to report like, head injuries and stuff, he's usually already sitting up and putting on a robe before I finish opening the door."

"Fucking guardians, man," Dave says, fervent. The best part is, John doesn't give him a look for letting that bit of emotion out; he just nods back in agreement. "Anyway. Yeah. I think there's another blanket in here somewhere. I've got the floor."

John actually tries to put up a fight. But Dave is pretty sure it's automatically a dick move if you make guests sleep on the floor, and any argument John tries to make is totally cancelled out by each wide yawn he lets out. It's barely nine, Central time, but despite John's protestations he looks completely beat. There's the fading edge of a bruise down the side of his face, presumably from that whole grenade incident he still refuses to acknowledge did a number on him, and though he claims to be able to work on four hours of sleep a night, Dave is willing to bet that however that teleportation thing worked it involved a fuck ton of energy. Space isn't exactly his forte, but he's pretty sure you can't break the laws of physics and catapult yourself halfway across the country without expending some massive amounts of energy.

Finally, John is half passed out in the bed, barely keeping one eye open. "Hey, Dave. Do you want to talk about you and your Bro? Because it definitely seems like you have some kind of beef with him, but he's ignoring you. Like, he just talks right over you sometimes. And he's really fucking obnoxious."

Dave locates his spare pair of shades in the drawer of his desk. They're dusty and really fucking ancient, but he slides them on, since John shows no sign of taking off his current pair, even with half his face mashed into a pillow. "No, not really. I'm sick of his fucking asshat rumpus tonight," Dave mutters. "He think he can do no wrong or some shit. Fuck him."
"Hear, hear," John agrees. Then he laughs, sounding halfway asleep. "You know, I'm glad you're just as big of a nerd in real life as on Pesterchum, Dave. We only ever really talked once before, and I kind of shoved all my issues at you at once. But you're still a total coolkid nerd."

What. Dave sprawls out on the floor, one leg still propped up with his knee bent as he stares at the blank ceiling. "I have no idea what you're talking about, John. Seriously, where do you come up with these bizarre ideas. What the fuck is a coolkid nerd supposed to be? An abomination of science?"

"You can pretend you're as cool as you want, Dave, but I know you quoted Lord of the Rings just then." John chuckles, before another yawn interrupts him.

Fuck. Well. "Fellowship is the shit. It gets a special pass and it in no way reflects on my coolkid gambit, John." Dave folds his arms behind his head.

"I wear super hero shirts, and you quote Lord of the Rings and rap Celine Dion. I'm just, you know. Saying it. For the record. Nerrrrd."

John is smirking, damn him. Dave can hear his smug tone. Oh, hell naw. "I'm not saying I'm cool, John. Irony," he says. "Don't make me come up there and instruct you on the exact difference between irony and being a total nerd. I'm sure I've given you this vital life lesson before, I don't want to repeat any material."

John snorts. "Yeah, yeah, Dave, okay. Whatever you say. You are the irony master, after all."

"Damn straight I am."

After a few minutes of silence, he thinks John has gone to sleep. The kid's breath rustles every piece of paper in the room, which can't be fucking normal, but after a while the windy thing settles down, and Dave nods to himself. He's kind of tired himself, but he still has to get up and -

"...Is Dave your real name?"

Holy crap John is still awake. Dave stays very still while his heart does a two-step, and thinks about how to answer.

"John is yours, isn't it?" Dave says at last. He doesn't really know how else to respond. Because yeah, of course Dave is his real name, but it would have been the smart thing to give a fake one when they met that first time. John might not even believe him if he confirmed it.

He's asked himself countless time why he just gave out his real name to some random depressed hero who just flew in unannounced from New York, but he can never really come up with a good answer. Nothing that makes sense, anyway. He doesn't know why, but he's always assumed John gave his real name, too. The kid is paranoid as fuck, but - Dave doesn't know.

Sometimes he says their internet brohood is transcendent. As stupid and corny as that sounds, maybe some part of him even believes that. Even when it might be dumb to give each other their real names and risk blowing their aliases, they both did.

"...G'nite, Dave."

"...Yeah, sames."

An hour later, when John has sunk into a fitful doze, a second Dave walks into the room. "Just go," future-Dave tells current-Dave, shaking his head. He looks like he's sweating, which is really goddamn weird, but Dave has a system now. Future-him doesn't tell him anything about what's about to happen during his daily round two, except the life and death shit. After the whole shoving himself off a building incident, all Dave Striders past, present, and future must obey the law of mortality-threat disclosure. He will have order, goddammit. He has a fucking system.

"How far back?" Dave whispers, putting on the same pair of shoes future-Dave is wearing. He throws a few glances at John asleep on the bed, but other-Dave just shushes him and doesn't seem too concerned about waking up the unexpected guest. They've had these plans to go meet the BQ for a while now. And hey, this way there will still be a Dave around to keep Bro from kidnapping John for his own good or some shit.

"Only about four hours. It's a fucking shitshow, though. Take the good swords," future-Dave advises.

John can't really sleep. The air coming in through the window is hot and humid and unfamiliar, a good ten degrees warmer than back home in Washington, and he has to kick off both the sheets and the covers from Dave's bed before he can begin to doze off. Part of the problem - a huge part - is that this is the second night in a row he's missed his patrol in Seattle. The fact that he's stranded all the way down in Texas does nothing to assuage the rising tide of guilt eating at him, preventing him from relaxing enough to fall asleep.

He wonders if he could teleport himself back, right here and now. But...he just doesn't have the first clue how he did it in the first place! It's like there's a blank spot in his head between being pestered by Dave and his Bro and suddenly landing in their kitchen.

See, John is in Houston.

That still hasn't really sunk in yet. But every time he turns around, he gets another reminder: the piles of dangerous junk lying everywhere, the sticky, hot smell of pollution drifting in through the hole in Dave's wall, the unknown age of the pizza that Dave excavates for them to eat from a fridge full of shitty swords. Oh, and the fact that every time he looks outside, he sees Houston.

He feels like he should probably be freaking out a lot more. This is a mess. He’s stuck in a tiny apartment with two people who wave swords around for a living, and just because one is his Internet chum and the other is a relatively well-known hero doesn’t make him any safer with them than with any other strangers. Okay, Dave’s not really a stranger, but this is the first time John has met the guy in years, and anyway, that first meeting only lasted about a day before they went their separate ways.

His dad calls one last time before John goes to sleep. Dave hands him the phone wordlessly and stares out the window while John has a muttered conference with his dad on the details of his flight tomorrow morning, once more blank-faced behind a pair of sunglasses he found somewhere. Which means, in a way, Dave is out of uniform; Flashstep doesn’t cover his face while he’s working. So now that both John and Dave have shades on, somehow, John has ended up the only one in disguise in an apartment full of three heroes. Flashstep and the Puppeteer are just a totally different type of hero from the kind John has been raised to be. They’re careless and John is pretty sure they’ve mentioned what may be their real last name a couple times so far, with no regard for his presence. It’s backwards and confusing and blehhhh.
He doesn’t understand how he can be tired so early, either. He runs a mental check when his eyes first start drooping over a slice of reheated pizza, but despite the fact that it’s only seven in the evening, Seattle time, he can barely think straight past the exhaustion. On a regular night, he wouldn’t even have started patrolling yet! Jeez! The cut on his arm has already started to heal and barely stings anymore, but his collar bone aches grumpily when he changes out of his gross bloodstained shirt and into one of Dave’s.

Using the wind for big things like tornados and stuff always tires him out a bit faster, and he can only assume that…whatever happened that landed him here in Dave’s apartment, it took even more out of him. He doesn’t want to call it teleportation. Teleportation isn’t even close to what the wind has been able to help John do before. The wind obeys his call, helps him fight, catches him when anyone else would just fall. It doesn’t mysteriously transplant him over two thousand miles out of his way in under two minutes.

_You’re also strong_, a niggling voice whispers in his head. _You heal too fast. On a normal day, you barely need to sleep. Those aren’t windy things._

Okay, John’s power has never been restricted to just the wind. But being really resilient doesn’t have much to do with teleporting, either.

So what gives?

He supposes this could all still be an elaborate conspiracy by the Puppeteer, who was the only one to have access to the tapes before John and Dave viewed them. Bro is insanely fast, so fast that John can barely track his breathing when he moves around in a room, and could hypothetically have the technological skills to quickly alter the video while John was dealing with a giant stab wound in the kitchen. But why? What would be his motivation?

If all of this is some kind of trap, what’s the point? John can’t figure it out, and it’s goddamn frustrating.

All John remembers is being so pissed. A whole new level of pissed. Sooo pissed. Like, he’d been channeling the spirit of his inner-Karkat or something, only being that angry wasn’t so hilarious when you were the one feeling it. You were just…angry, and everything was awful, and it sucked. He doesn’t know how Karkat maintains that level of pure irritation all the time. John had had to just stop talking to Bro earlier, because – he couldn’t do it. He couldn’t let himself get _that_ angry again. His dad has drilled into him that getting angry could get people hurt, with John’s level of strength and his abilities. While honestly, of all the people in the world, the Puppeteer could probably give as good as he got, John didn’t want to hurt anyone out of some irrational anger because that person was worried about his well-being.

Because even if at first it just seemed like Bro was being a dick? After his outburst earlier about raising Dave, John just feels bad. Bro’s default state seems to be stuck on ‘emotionless douchebag,’ but apparently being annoyingly persistent and taunting people and smirking is how he…shows brotherly concern?

Yeah, no, John doesn’t get it. Maybe it’s a brother thing. He’s only ever had his dad, after all.

He doesn’t know how he’s going to get to sleep now, though. How can he be expected to sleep with all of this crazy stuff on his mind, in a strange place with people he barely knows?

…”He apparently fell asleep. Uh. Well. Okay. That was easy.
John rolls over, the wind tugging at his hair but not trying to yank him up into the air like usual. He can’t tell if it’s because the air is heavy and sluggish with humidity, or because he himself is slow on the uptake, trying to make sense of the hovering pile of rainbow puppets that hangs over his head, supported by the wind.

“Dave?” he asks tentatively, reaching up to adjust the shades on his face. They won’t stay on properly over top of his glasses, but he draws the line at removing either pair. It’s going to be weird and attention-grabbing enough that John is flying back to Seattle without having legally flown down to Houston in the first place; no need to have his face exposed so everyone can see that John Egbert’s eyes have turned a bright blue. His tinted contact lenses are just – gone. No explanation. It’s too late to keep Dave and Bro from seeing his face and the real color of his eyes, but he wants to be as low key as possible at the airport, where there could be yet more cameras that could record his face.

Or maybe Bro’s paranoia is just contagious.

“Dave?” he repeats when he gets no reply.

“No,” Dave’s voice mumbles. “No Dave here. Whoever told you that was a lying liar who lies.” When John leans over the bed, holding both pairs of glasses up with a hand, he sees Dave half hidden under the bed, and half covered in more of the weird rainbow puppets. Seriously, do these things just generate out of thin air?

John looks up at the puppets above him, and then gestures with the wind, sending them toppling down in a pile on the floor.

Someone flickers through the air, in and out of the room before John can process who it is. Suddenly, the puppets rise up and fling themselves at Dave, bombarding him from all sides as he flails. “Augh!” Dave yells, and he must pause time right then, because the next second he’s standing over by the desk and the puppets are scattered in pieces with stuffing everywhere, like he sliced his way free. “Mother. Fucking. Puppet. Ass,” he chokes out, clearly struggling to suppress some intense emotion as he lets his head rest back against the wall. “Oh my god. Why. Why is this happening. So plush. Eurghhhhh.”

“Does this happen a lot?” John asks.

“You have no goddamn idea, John. My life is a puppet-themed hell.” Dave recollects himself, shoulders slumping out of a battle-ready stance as he sticks his hands in his pockets, as though he didn’t just have a minor episode over a bunch of relatively innocuous puppets.

Remembering a certain offhand comment about puppet porn, John decides not to think about it. Seriously. He’s not thinking about it. Ever. “Hey, what time is it?”

“What do I look like, a watch?” Dave says, his tone too flat for John to tell if he’s joking or not. “It’s like six in the morning. Normal people shouldn’t even be awake right now. This is obscene. Thanks, Bro. Thanks for the wakeup call!” He raises his voice a little on the last part, sarcasm giving the words bite, and John hears a grunt of acknowledgement from the kitchen. “Can’t even deal with him right now,” Dave mutters. Then he frowns at John. Or at least John thinks he’s frowning – his eyebrows furrow a bit, but John obviously can’t see all of his expression. “You managed to avoid a faceful of puppet ass, John? Oh my god. Teach me your ways. Right here, right now.”

John stands up, stretching carefully to avoid jolting his arm. “Were those puppets supposed to hit me, too? I guess the wind just caught them.”
“You don’t know how lucky you are, man.” Dave shakes his head. “I stop time and I still can’t evade these fucking things. Ugh. I feel violated. Learn from my mistakes, John. Do not ever piss off a carapacian dame and a puppet-obsessed maniac on the same night. I regret all of my life choices right now. So much regret.”

John blinks. “Wait, what? When did that happen? Was I asleep for that part or something?” Sure, he could see Bro maybe starting a fight in the middle of the night, but when did a carapacian enter into the equation? They’re really rare, aren’t they? John doesn’t think he’s ever met one in person.

“Or something,” Dave says, rubbing at his eyes behind his shades. “Come on, if we’re going to be functional at ass o’clock in the morning, I need way more AJ.”

“Heh, okay. Whatever you say, Dave.” Self-conscious and awkward in his borrowed shirt, John follows Dave out into the main room. After two more piles of things—a stack of robot parts and an entire table, which doesn’t really count as a pile, he supposes—ambush them, evaded by Dave and caught by John’s breezes, he starts to get that yes, this really is a regular thing. Dave looks grim but not surprised by the constant barrage.

John realizes, with a combination of wonder and dismay, that this might well be Bro’s equivalent of John and his dad’s morning t’ai chi routine. After that first disastrous puppet pile in the bedroom, Dave is flashstepping around flying cutlery and empty pizza boxes without missing a beat, while John lets the wind circulate around him in a constant shield to deflect anything that flies his way.

This is more than just the unfathomable whim of a cruel and distant brother. This is…training.

...Sooooo weeeeeeird.

They somehow survive the journey to the kitchen, despite one flurry of swords that nearly took John’s eye out, and John sees that most of the piles of junk scattered around the room, including the shitty swords he cut himself on last night, have vanished, repurposed as part of the trap-riddled obstacle course. Dave goes into the pantry, heaves himself up onto the third shelf, and feels around in the shadows of the topmost shelf before a tiny smirk of triumph breaks through his blank face. He holds up a bottle of amber yellow liquid solemnly. “Fuck yeah.”

He jumps down to the ground, apple juice in hand, and the ceiling bursts open. Dave barely has time to look up, mouth parted in horror, as he is completely buried in puppets. John can only watch, startled, as puppets continue to pour down in wave after wave of rainbow goodness.

“John.” The voice comes from within the pile of puppets. One last puppet tumbles down from the trap door in the ceiling and bounds off the top of the Dave-pile.

“Yes Dave?”

“I need you to be my second. Bro just declared war on the sovereign nation of Dave Strider. It’s on.”

John raises an eyebrow. “I thought the puppet thing was normal?”

“That fucker stole my apple juice.” Dave emerges from the pile between one second and the next, leaving most of the puppets decapitated behind him. “The deathmatch commences now.”

Apparently, in addition to doing hero work without masks and buying groceries while in costume, the Puppeteer and Flashstep engage in semi-regular rooftop duels, where anyone in one of the apartments on either side could easily look out and watch them go at it. Even as John anxiously scans the windows of the building next door to make sure the coast is clear, a woman with a small child opens up a window on level with their roof and yells, “You two gueros locos better not fuck up my window again!”

Bro salutes her with a sword.

“Chingate!” With that she closes the window with a resounding slam and disappears.

John’s brain hurts.

Dave raises his swordkind, the corners of his mouth turned slightly downward in an amazing display of fury. “One rule, Bro. One. Do not. Fuck. With my apple juice.”

Bro tilts his head to the side. John looks at where Bro is staring, and sees one of the many puppets propped up on the edge of the air conditioning unit, the bottle of AJ enclosed in the embrace of its arms. Its wide blue eyes glimmer uncannily, its cheeks stretched in an unnatural grin. It freaks John right the fuck out, enough so that he unconsciously tugs more of the Houston morning air around him. Puppets like that didn’t belong anywhere but carnivals and horror movies. He recognizes the Puppeteer’s puppet of choice, Lil Cal, but it’s a lot more terrifying in person than in newspapers. It just…stares. Unblinking. Soulless. Ever-smiling.

Bro finally says, “Nut up or shut up, kid. Fight me or the AJ goes over the edge.” He raises a hand and Lil Cal twitches closer to the edge of the roof.

Dave stiffens. “You wouldn’t.”

“Last night just proved you need some schooling, little brother,” Bro says, shrugging. “If you weren’t so attached to fruit juice, I wouldn’t have to use this weakness against you. You should probably look into that.”

“You bastard. What did the apple juice ever do to you? Just give it back and no one has to get a fucking sword in their kidney.”

Bro raises a hand and curls his fingers in a ‘bring it on’ gesture. Dave obliges, crossing the yards between him and Bro in a matter of seconds. Then both men begin flickering and out of sight as they move too fast for John to follow, their swords flaring with reflected light in the rising sun. Neither of them take off their shades, either, which means they’re both doing this in their civilian attire. John doesn’t even bother to point that out.

This would be really, really cool and all, getting to watch two of the best heroes in the US in action, except that John doesn’t understand why any of this is happening, and these two are completely insane.

“Do we really have to do this right now? This whole thing seems like it could turn out to be completely pointless,” John calls, hands cupped around his mouth. He feels he should throw his opinion into the ring. “And I have to go to the airport eventually!”

“Kid, you can fly!” Bro shoots back, slowing just long enough that John sees him kick out to trip Dave before the battle’s time-defying pace resumes. “You don’t need a fucking babysitter!”

He’s an asshat, but he does have a point. “Hey Dave, just yell if you need me to, I don’t know, avenge your death or something, I’m gonna go find something to eat.” He’s starving by this point – reheated pizza doesn’t exactly last long when you usually eat as much as three men per meal.

Dave nods before parrying another blow. Bro is practically invisible by this point, and it would look like Dave is just fighting by himself except for the occasional stray puppet or spark of steel on steel that gives Bro’s position away. All the while, Lil Cal looks on with shining eyes.

Yeah, as interesting as it is to watch the Puppeteer and Flashstep duke it out in person, John is 120% done with that creepy puppet. He backs away from the duel, not really willing to turn his back on the scene when there are really sharp swords everywhere, and then descends the stairs back down to Dave’s apartment. He lets out a sigh of relief when he can’t feel Lil Cal’s eyes on him anymore. How does Dave stand that all the time? He wanders to the fridge and opens it, bracing the unstable pack of shitty swords with his shoulder as he hunts through the drawers for something edible.

...How do these two even survive?! There’s a drawer full of something unmentionable that’s gone fuzzy and green, and apart from that the entire fridge is taken up with empty apple juice bottles and sword specibi. This is unnatural; how can two people live with only a single three-day-old pizza to sustain them?! Shaking his head, John grabs a slice of pizza. It tastes like cardboard and mushrooms, but he coughs it down. He's still wallet-less, and he's really hoping Dave will finish up this deathmatch in time to direct John to the airport -

John stops. He had started to wander back towards Dave's room, thinking he might retrieve his old shirt, but on the way he sees that Bro’s door is hanging open. A single puppet wedged between the door and the frame must have caused the door to slowly open rather than closing completely.

And that normally wouldn't have caught John's attention, except that he can quite clearly see, through the open door, that the video from last night is still up on Bro’s monitor. As he does a slow, deliberate doubletake, swallowing a piece of pizza, he sees that it has been paused right when past-John has just mysteriously appeared over the sword pile.

The Puppeteer promised he'd delete that, John thinks vaguely. The wind starts to pick up around him, new gusts streaming in through the hole in Dave’s wall and whipping around John in a protective circle as he storms into Bro's room. No traps go off or anything as he marches up to the desk and takes in all four monitors. Three have different angles of the kitchen from last night, with John in the center of the shot.

The fourth has a tiny popup that reads 'File Copy Complete."

Bro didn't erase the footage. He saved a copy.

For a long moment, John can only stand there, feeling the fury rise up inside him. Then, his chest explodes in pain.

He huddles forward over it, one hand clutching at his chest, but between the pain all he can think is he is going to punch The Puppeteer into next fucking week -

And then –

John’s ears pop, and he’s falling. He yelps, and closes both fists reflexively, and the wind catches him a foot above the Puppeteer’s head.

He’s back on the roof.

More precisely, he’s hovering seven feet above the roof, suspended mere inches from a really sharp, not-so-shitty katana.

“Dude. What.” Dave is somewhere under John’s feet, which is makes it awkward when John tries to turn and look at his face. With a twist of the wind John flips himself upright and eases himself down onto the roof. His legs feel kind of wobbly, but he lands alright. The sudden chest pain is gone, but he presses a hand to his sternum anyway, shaken. He'd been so angry that the pain barely registered, but the shock of appearing above the roof sucked the rage right out of him, along with the pain.

Just like it had earlier, when he'd teleported from his bedroom to these guys' apartment.

Well then.

"Sup?" John says weakly. "Uh. I think I might have done the teleport thingy again."

"You know, I wouldn't have guessed that, John, not with the way you just appeared out of bugfuck nowhere," Dave says, facepalming with his free hand.

"Any idea what you did this time?" Bro asks, tucking his sword away across his back. Dave is still at the ready, but the Puppeteer walks away from him and John, striding to the AC unit by the edge of the roof. He rests Lil Cal on his shoulder, completely unconcerned about the fact that Dave still has his sword out and a total revenge face on.

John glares at the man. "You didn't delete that video! I saw it on your computer still. You lied!"

"And that got you all righteously pissy, didn't it," Bro states. He flings the entire bottle of apple juice at Dave’s head. Dave catches it and takes a moment to stare at bottle before hugging it under one arm. "And then, you ended up all the way up here."

Bro then goes silent. After a long minute, John gets it. "I got mad at you – again – and I – ohhh."

"Except this time you came up here with Dave and saw where I was, first. And traveled a shorter distance. Probably helped you aim more accurately. So that’s one mystery solved. You’re fucking welcome, kiddos." Bro raises his hands to some unheard applause, and then readjusts his hat on his head, slouching toward the stairwell.

"So now John fuels teleportation with his own rage? What next, you start photosynthesizing when you're feeling peachy?" Dave snarks, finally putting the sword away with clear reluctance.

"I said one mystery, you little shits. Do your own fucking homework, I’m done for the day." And with that, Bro disappears.

John can feel the faintest rush of air as the Puppeteer vanishes back down into the apartment unseen. He and Dave exchange bewildered glances. Then John remembers – "Hey! Come back here! You still didn’t erase that video!"

They all end up back in Bro's room, somehow. John harasses the Puppeteer until he actually deletes the video in front of him, though John can't be sure there aren't still more copies saved to the hard drive. Then Dave gets into a renewed one-man argument about how the apple juice is out-of-bounds when it comes to 'being a huge fucking asshat,' while Bro blatantly ignores him and starting tinkering with a bright pink puppet that has scissors for hands. The only possible explanation for the combination is some kind of irony John can't even hope to fathom, especially not when a short bout of exhaustion hits him. He paces for a bit until the tiredness dies off. He's starting to think it's not just the concussion anymore - teleporting takes it out of a guy! But it's not nearly as bad as last night, when he'd passed out before the sky had even gone dark.

Having exhausted even his strange, tangent-based method of arguing and ranting, Dave finally subsides, taking off the ancient pair of shades and pressing the tips of his fingers against his eyes. "Fucking dick," he says halfheartedly, keeping his eyes shut. Then he shakes his head, and turns back to John. "You okay, EB?" he asks shortly, putting the shades back on.

John nods. "Yeah. Just still trying to wrap my head around all this. Sorry for interrupting your apple juice war."

"Dude. Bro clearly used you to cheat his way into a draw. I claim this one a victory in my name by default." Dave smirks.

"In your dreams, kid," Bro replies absently.

Dave just shrugs. "You're really not controlling this at all?" he asks, sticking his hands into his pockets. "Just hoppin' on the reality-warping train and hoping for the best?"

"I definitely didn't do it on purpose. I just got really mad. Actually, I really wanted to punch you in the face," John says, directing the accusatory tone at Bro, who ignores him. "And then - nothing."

John scrunches up his face, but the seconds between getting angry and being on the roof again remain a stubborn void.

Bro folds his arms, leaning back as though to inspect his work, and then interrupts with, “And you didn’t feel anything? It’s just a blank?”

Just the opposite it's too much i can't remember i can't i'm not allowed –

“Nothing,” John says, more forcefully than he intended to, and he can already see Dave's eyebrows rising like pale birds, Bro swiveling around in his chair until -

A phone rings. The ring tone is ‘Barracuda’ by Heart, and it seems to be emanating from Bro Strider’s back pocket. Bro hesitates, then flips the phone out and slides it onto speaker phone in one smooth motion. He then goes back to tinkering with his bizarre puppet project. “…’Sup. You’re on speaker.”

“Ambrose.” The feminine voice is smooth and warm and just slightly slurried on the ‘s,’ like a mug of hot chocolate with a good shot of cognac mixed in for taste. It is weirdly familiar, though the distortion from the phone is severe enough that John can’t place it.

Without looking, Bro reaches out and hangs up.

Dave raises an eyebrow. “Ambrose?”

“We don’t talk about that,” Bro grunts. “Must have been a wrong number -”

Barracuda plays again. This time Bro doesn’t put it on speaker phone, just puts the phone to his ear while he begins to solder a puppet joint with one hand. “I told you no, woman.”

“Put me back on speaker phone this instant, darling. This is a matter for your ward as well.” The woman on the other end of the phone speaks loudly enough that John can still hear her, even from here. But he has better ears than most. “And I do hate having to raise my voice.”

“Who says I still have a ward,” Bro says. His voice has gone flatter than usual, and he pulls open a drawer on the work desk to start tapping buttons on a heavy black machine. “I’m tracing this call, woman. In about five minutes, I will know exactly where to go to wreck your shit.”

“Speaker phone, there’s a dear,” the woman repeats, just sounding amused. Bro Strider huffs and sets the phone down on the table, hitting the speaker phone tab. “Thank you,” the woman says, her voice now reverberating slightly. “Dave, love, I know you’re there. It’s been too long.”
John feels Dave tense at his side. Outwardly, he’s still slumped against the wall with the practiced nonchalance both he and his brother favor, but his surprise is clear in the way his shoulders stiffen up. “Can’t say I know you, lady,” he says at last. “Random broads with phones, not my specialty.”

“No, you wouldn’t remember.” John can hear the smile in her voice. “You were perhaps three years old when I last saw you. After that, circumstances conspired against us meeting. I believe you would have been five when the trouble with the Crew began, and your guardian never quite trusted me again.”

And yeah, now John is paying attention. “You know the Midnight Crew?” he blurts out, earning himself a smooth-faced but probably irate stare from Bro.

The line is silent, buzzing for a good minute. “Is that -” the woman begins, voice shaky.

Bro cuts her off. “Not now, Lalonde. I’m still one wrong word away from cutting you off. For all I know, you could have been the one to tip them off in Georgia. Say what you want, then piss off before I hunt you down.”

Lalonde.

“Doctor Lalonde!” John yelps, leaning over the desk. He can’t help but ogle the phone with wide eyes, as though if he stares through the cheap plastic hard enough he’ll be able to see through to the lab coat-wrapped form of Rose Lalonde’s eccentric, terminally tipsy mother.

“What the fucking fuck,” Bro says flatly.

“John. I thought that sounded like you.” Doctor Rue Lalonde laughs a little. “I should have known you’d find your way to Dave eventually.”

“What,” Dave says.

“We haven’t heard from you in years! Is Rose doing alright?” John bounces on his heels, ready to laugh now that the mystery has been stripped away. He’d know Doctor Lalonde for nearly six years before she and Rose had moved abruptly to New York.

Then he realizes what she just said. “Wait, what do you mean, I’d find my way to -”

“You haven’t heard from Rose? In how long?” Doctor Lalonde interrupts, urgency slurring into her words. “A few days? Longer?”

John stops bouncing. He frowns at the phone. “Doctor Lalonde, I haven’t heard from Rose in – it must be years, now. First she stopped calling, and then she stopped writing. Maybe three years ago? ...You didn’t know?”

“Three -” There is a long pause, and then the sound of someone crying out, and a glass shattering against something hard, as though Doctor Lalonde has thrown her habitual appletini against the wall. John flinches and Bro actually pushes him back from the table, as though just hearing the sound over the phone is somehow a threat. “She didn’t say why?” Doctor Lalonde demands, her slur suddenly gone.

John shakes his head before he remembers she can’t see him. “No, she just – stopped. I guess I thought she just maybe moved on with her life. I’m sure she made other friends who didn’t live across the continent from her, right? She probably got tired of trying to psychoanalyze me through letters.” He laughs, swallowing back old pain.
“I’m fairly certain that was not the reason, John,” Doctor Lalonde says, with an equally bitter laugh. “You see, I’m afraid the Midnight Crew caught up with us three years ago. I left Rose in New York to draw them off. I have not seen her since. It would seem that in my absence, the situation has… deteriorated.”

“They found you?” Bro cuts in. He’s still fiddling with the puppet, but it’s obvious by now that he isn’t paying attention to it. “And you left her alone?”

“I don’t understand,” John says before Doctor Lalonde can reply. “You mean – has Rose been all by herself by three years? Who’s been watching her? Why were the Crew after you in the first place – what if they went after her again?!” He clenches a fist and can feel the wind starting to whip around his hand as his confusion simmers. He’d known Doctor Lalonde as a kind, if eccentric and most definitely alcoholic, guardian, despite Rose’s insistence on viewing her mother’s strangeness as deliberately passive-aggression directed against her.

But abandoning Rose for three whole years? That smacks of something truly unforgiveable.

“I’ve always trusted Rose to take care of herself,” Doctor Lalonde says, her voice slurring slightly again. There is a pause, and the clink of ice in a glass, and a throaty swallow audible through the speakers as she no doubt finishes mixing herself a new drink and tosses it back. “Though I worry now that I may have made a terrible mistake. As for why the Midnight Crew would seek us out – they sought Rose’s power. To harness it, or to destroy it, if they could not. Just as they sought Dave. I have been able to lead them a merry chase by pretending to still have Rose by my side while she has remained at work in New York, but recent events have shown that perhaps it would have been better to stay with Rose and fight a bloody war against the Crew than – than to have allowed this.”

“Allowed what, Lalonde,” Bro demands, spinning the phone on the table to drag it closer to him. There are tiny lines visible between his brows, where the pointy shades don’t quite meet. “The hell is going on? You wouldn’t call this number unless it was a fucking emergency. What’s wrong with your kid?”

John can’t tell what his insides are doing. It feels like the bottom of his stomach has dropped out, like that one horrible moment a month ago when the explosion at the bank had ripped him free from the safety of the breeze and nearly sent him falling to his doom. He’s so lost; half of this conversation isn’t making sense, but he feels like he’s two seconds from being sick all over the nearest pile of weaponized puppets. All he understands, really, is that Rose is in some kind of trouble. “What’s wrong with Rose?” he says after Bro finishes, before realizing that he’s just repeated nearly what the Puppeteer had just said.

“…Tell me. Are you familiar with the hero Seer of Light?” Doctor Lalonde asks, sipping audibly again. “Forgive me, I need to be more drunk for this. If what I hypothesize is happening, has in fact happened, we are all in grave danger.”

“Seer of Light? I’ve heard of that one. She’s up New York City way,” Dave says, folding his arms across his chest, his red eyes glinting over the brim of his shades. “Shiiit. It’s this Rose chick, isn’t it?”

“Yes,” Doctor Lalonde says.

It takes John a second.

Then he flips the fuck out.

“Wait, what?! Rose is a hero?” And yup, that’s it, he has absolutely no clue what to think now. His brain rams up against ‘Rose is a hero??’ and begins to flail uselessly, spitting out meaningless phrases like ‘how?’ and ‘how do?’

“Not the quickest on the uptake, are yah, kid,” Bro Strider says beyond the haze of John’s mental reboot. “Yeah, we know about Seer. What’s happened to her?”

“If the news reports I’m seeing are to be believed? She has gone full grimdark.” Doctor Lalonde says. “Just turn on any news channel, if you even have a television in your usual hellhole of an apartment. The broadcasters do not recognize her as Seer of Light without her costume, but I know my daughter’s face when she goes about blowing things up without a mask on.”

Bro Strider is gone between one blink and the next, just as John comes snapping back to reality with horror clenching in his gut. He looks at Dave, only to find the other hero halfway out of the room already. John dashes out after him, stopping behind the coach where Bro and Dave now stand. Bro flicks through the channels on the widescreen television hanging on the wall so fast the pictures are a blur. He stops on a prominent news station with a banner declaring a ‘breaking news’ bulletin in the corner. The rest of the screen is taken up by what appears to be a live video feed.

The camera is shaky and jolting, though the cameraman seems to be on a relatively clear street; the only problem is that the streets are almost empty, despite the fact that it should be almost eight in the morning in New York, and therefore the middle of the morning commute for one of the most crowded cities in the country. The streets should be absolutely packed into a gridlock. Instead, there is one car visible – and it has been flipped upside down, the wheels still spinning as it rests heavily on a crunched in chassis.

An explosion of dust bursts out over the street, blinding the camera with a film of greyish brown haze for a long moment as someone unseen, perhaps the cameraman himself, yells. John can’t tell if it’s a yell of pain or just shock.

And then John sees there is something moving in the dust. It looks like a shadow on the monitor, coiling and uncoiling sinuously before splitting into countless black tendrils that stab into the street, digging through the pavement with huge clouds of dust. The edges of the tentacles seem to burn with black fire, twining up toward the sky when they aren’t busy tearing chunks out of the sides of buildings.

Something shifts in the writhing mass, and John nearly falls to his knees. “Fuck, EB,” Dave swears, one arm under John’s before he can hit the ground.

But it’s Rose.

It’s Rose.

Maybe somewhere in his head, John has been denying it, unable to believe that Rose Lalonde with the sharp smiles, the slim fingers, the angled eyes and the silvery golden hair framing her tiny face could possibly be involved with anything related to hero work. Rose had always pandered to and tried to analyze John’s passion for heroes, but had never expressed interest in them herself, preferring to share details of the latest fantasy books she read or the newest knitting pattern she had attempted when they had hung out together in the park by their houses. The idea of Rose being a hero hadn’t felt quite real.

But he knows that face. He knows it.

And it’s breaking his heart at the same time it’s freaking him the fuck out.
Rose’s golden-pale skin is gone, eaten up by a greyish black tinge that’s just a few shades darker than troll grey. White-hot fire burns and oozes from her eyes, leaving them pupil-less and brimming with power. She looks like she’s wearing just leggings and a tight, skin-hugging top that might once have been the neoprene-and-Kevlar, pale yellow undershirt Seer of Light wears beneath her golden tunic in official press releases. Everything is painted with that dull grey stain. Her hair is more silver than blonde, and it tangles and floats in the air, unnervingly similar to the coiling motions of the black tendrils of grimdark surrounding her body.

But she’s still unmistakably Rose, even as she turns her head in a stiff, unnatural motion to stare at the cameraman – and grins with a mouth hollow and burning with white fire.

The camera feed cuts out. The anchorman in the newsroom appears on the screen, babbling something about losing another camera feed, before Bro shuts it off.

“Lalonde. You need to explain grimdark. Yesterday,” he states, holding up the cell phone. The call with Doctor Lalonde is still going.

“I can give you the short version if you wish, but trust me when I say we don’t have time for me to explain the multi-faceted nature of the Noble Circle of Horrorterrors,” the doctor says, her slur once again gone. "In essence, Rose has had mental contact with what you would think of as the Eldritch gods - the many-angled ones, the Outer Gods of the Furthest Ring, our Great Tentacled Tanglebuddies - for most of her life. She has always fought their influence. It would appear she has lost. They have taken over her body, driven her into grimdarkness, and if the reports are valid, have been using her to destroy parts of the city in what appears to be a summoning spirograph."

"Why does the summoning part sound really, really bad?" Dave mutters in John's ear.

“I called to ask a favor of you and Dave, Ambrose," Doctor Lalonde finishes. "The fact that John is already with you just saves me the trouble of attempting to contact Samuel as well."

“What do you mean?” John asks, bracing himself on the couch. He still struggling to process what he just watched, and Doctor Lalonde’s words sound like white noise.

“I have no right to ask this of you. But I am asking. Please. Save my daughter.”

“Can she be saved?” Bro retorts, bristling. “Lalonde, no offense, but your kid looks pretty fucking evil out there.”

“It is not her choice, I assure you,” Doctor Lalonde replies. She is silent for a long moment before beginning again, slowly, her words completely clear and unslurred. “Her power has always stemmed from two disparate sources. I studied it as well as I could until I was forced to leave, but could find no explanation for why Rose possesses two such radically different powers. She has always favored her talent with light magic over the whispers of the grimdark - it gave her nightmares while she slept, and so she suppressed the darkness constantly, too afraid to unleash it. I don’t know what may have happened to trigger this sudden descent into grimdark, but the last time something similar almost occurred, she was terrified.”

Doctor Lalonde stops, and she swallows loudly before continuing. “The grimdark possessed her body and left her powerless to control her actions, yet still able to see and feel everything she did. She screamed and cried constantly, begging me to stop her, because that was the only thing she could still control. I was able to free her only by isolating her in a sensory deprivation tank and remaining with her for weeks, soothing her. Eventually, she was able to take back control. There have been no further incidents until, apparently, last night, when news reports began to reach my location describing what could only be a grimdark event in Albany.”
“And now your kid is tearing up New York City, and you can’t get to her, can you?” Bro says, folding his arms. “Where are you, Lalonde? Are you trying to stop her? Or are you heading the other way.” His voice has gone low and dangerous.

Another long silence. “I am, in fact, on my way to New York as we speak, Ambrose. I know how this may look to you, but trust me when I say I had no choice but to leave my daughter. I trusted in her ability to fend for herself, and I have been able to convince the Midnight Crew she was relocated to Zimbabwe for the past three years. She has been safe, even when I could not be by her side. Now, however, she has quite obviously been exposed. The Crew will be attempting to capture her soon, once they think they have enough manpower to handle the grimdark.”

“How – how do you know my powers?” The room is doing wild loops around John, and he has to rest most of his weight on the back of the couch because this is – it’s too much. It’s all too much. The way Doctor Lalonde is talking, Rose has had these powers for years, probably longer than John knew her. And somehow, Doctor Lalonde knows about John’s powers too. Has probably known about his alias as Heir all these years. She had said she meant to contact John’s dad in order to ask John to come to New York, after all.

Did that mean John’s dad had been the one to break his cover? Without even telling John that ‘oh, yeah, the drunken family friend who used to live down the street knows exactly what you are, don’t worry about it’? Were they talking about the same Samuel Egbert who had drilled it into John’s head from age five that he could never, ever speak about his powers to anyone but him? Who had taught John everything he knew about maintaining a double life?

He can’t – he can’t even handle this right now. Dave has a hand on his shoulder and is saying something too him, a weird, low buzz underlying his voice, but John can only focus in on the conversation between Bro and Doctor Lalonde, almost hysterically giddy in anticipation of some new world-altering whammy.

“We don’t have time to go into details right now, John, I apologize. Suffice to say that I’m sorry that I haven’t spoken with you in so long; your father was as adamant as Ambrose that we maintain distance from each other’s wards once the Midnight Crew began to gain strength over the years.” Doctor Lalonde sighs. “Well, Ambrose?”

Bro stands utterly still, one hand thrust into his pocket, his eyes unreadable behind his shades. “I don’t control the kid, Lalonde,” he says at last, looking at Dave. “Up to you, kid. Feel like helping Lalonde fix her fucking mistakes?” The tinge of bitter anger has returned to his voice, and John wonders why the two adults have such contempt for each other – or at least, what happened that Bro seems to disdain Doctor Lalonde so much. He’s missing a whole lot of context for this, but it’s obvious that at some point the Lalondes and the Striders had known each other much the same way the Egberts used to know the Lalondes.

And it’s pretty fucking suspicious that all three families later ended up producing heroes in cities across the United States.

But he can’t focus on that right now, as downright freaky as the idea is. His mind scrambles to make sense of the flood of scattered information, but his first priority is already obvious.

He can’t go back to Washington now. Not when his oldest friend is being possessed by crazy shadow tentacles.

No, he needs to be in New York. And he needs to get there fast.

“I’m coming to help,” John says, interrupting whatever fresh argument Bro and Doctor Lalonde are trying to stir up, talking right over their acerbic barbs. “I don’t have any money on me, though, Doctor Lalonde, I’m sorry. Can you cover a flight to New York? Are they even letting air traffic go near the area?”

“Kid, you should think about this-” Bro starts to say, before, suddenly Dave cuts him off. “I’m going too,” Dave says, meeting John’s eyes when John turns to look at him startled. Dave winks a crimson eye, an uncharacteristic gesture for someone who seems to abjure expressing emotion, and John is struck by the feeling that he’s not looking at Dave, but at the Flashstep, cocksure and confident, the same coolkid mask he had worn the first day they met. “Can’t leave a lady all distressed and blowing up shit against her will, Bro. Definitely can’t leave my man Heir hanging. This field trip is gonna be ironic as fuck.”

Dave then raises his chin and meets Bro’s stare head on, as though this is some kind of weird power struggle between the two Striders – and for all John knows, it is. The way the media always plays it, the way Dave has never denied in their chatlogs, the Puppeteer takes the lead in their partnership, which has always made sense in the context of their older and younger brother dynamic. They’ve been clearly in the middle of some major power struggle since before John arrived, though Bro still has the advantage. Right now there’s nothing but disapproval in Bro’s blank stare, but Dave isn’t backing down.

Then, without any visible sign that John can see - “Fine. We’re in,” Bro says to the cell phone. “But I don’t fucking like this, Lalonde. If we pull your kid out of the fire, this is the last fucking chance you get from me. Clear?”

“Thank you, John, Dave,” Doctor Lalonde says quietly. “I still wish you didn’t suspect me of giving away your location last time, Ambrose – I assure you, I have never betrayed you. But I can’t argue this now.”

“So how do we get to New York?” John demands. He can feel a tug in the place where his sense of the wind lies, and a breeze starts to pick up in the room, even though he knows intellectually that flying to New York is as time-consuming a process as flying to Washington would have been. Never mind the fact that he somehow managed to cross nearly the same distance in a little under two minutes. He can’t trust this new teleportation thing yet, not for something as important as this. “It’s something like a three hour flight in a plane, right? How soon could we get through airport security?”

“No need to worry about all that. I ordered the private jet to rendezvous at Hobby Airport the moment I realized I would need backup,” Doctor Lalonde says, her voice brisk and efficient. It’s a startling change from her earlier slurring. “And with your powers, I have utter confidence in your abilities to sneak onto the flight strip. Why waste time pandering to airport security protocol when you're all in disguise anyway?"

Bro raises an eyebrow above the line of his shades. “The private jet? How’d you get your hands on that?”

“You’d be surprised what you miss out on when you cut yourself off from those who’d wish to help you, Ambrose.”

“That’s not my name.”

“Yes it is, darling.” Now that they’ve agreed to help Rose, all of Doctor Lalonde’s slurring, chortling confidence seems to have returned, and she needles Bro as carelessly as though she hadn’t just a moment ago been begging the three of them to save her daughter. On the other hand, Bro hadn’t been complaining about her use of the name Ambrose all through the earlier conversation, either.

John decides he can’t be bothered to puzzle out what the hell is going on with these two. He just really can’t care about anything else anymore, not when Rose is in danger. “Private jet. Sneaking onto the runway. That’s the plan?” When Doctor Lalonde chirps a drunken affirmative John nods, feeling the last of his confusion get sucked away into the back of his mind. He’ll deal with the metric fuckton of weird and disturbing stuff he’s just heard later. For now, the mission-centered part of his brain kicks in, the part of him that focuses on the work each and every single night, and knows that nothing else is more important than the task at hand. The only thing standing between John and a mad dash for that waiting jet is –

“Dave, I don’t have my uniform with me,” John says, the realization smacking into him with the force of a freight train. “Agh, dammit, we do need disguises. Can I borrow something of yours? I can’t go out and fight in public with all those cameras they have on her without -”

“Don’t worry. I’ve got you covered, John,” Dave says. They leave Bro behind in the living room, still talking to Rue Lalonde.

Dave flashsteps to his closet and starts flinging things out with wild abandon, including a mummified cat and one or two of the same long-nosed puppets that seem to litter nearly every surface of the apartment. “Heh,” he says in some kind of dark triumph as he emerges from a corner of the closet and throws an entire bundle of clothing at John. “Try that on, man. We don’t have time to resew the whole thing, but I can stitch a quick fix on the plane. We’re nearly the same height. Ain’t your usual thing, but once you go Strider chic, you’ll never go back, man. You will be wearing suits all over Seattle. The bitches will fling themselves down at your feet. It’s hard exuding as much awesome as you’re going to, but don’t worry, I believe in you, John. I believe.”

John shakes his head and unfolds the crumpled clothing, looking it over as he strips off his own clothes and the borrowed red shirt. He mentally struggles to piece together how the new outfit works. He’s known, vaguely, that the Flashstep’s costumes are ridiculously elaborate, an ever-changing array of suits and trendy styles that make absolutely zero sense in a crime-fighting position. This looks as ridiculous as anything John has ever seen in internet forums. John’s just going to have to wing it. A Kevlar vest comes flying John’s way, and he catches it with the breeze before it hits him in the side of the face, slipping it on.

He pulls on the black pants first, stops halfway through, and stares at Dave in abject horror. “Oh my god, are these skinny jeans?!”

“We’re not all built for skinny jeans!” John says, exasperated. They do not have time for this. “I need regular pants, Dave! Forget it, I’ll just wear my shorts.”

Unable to waste brain power on the question, he starts frantically buttoning up the white, long-sleeved dress shirt and eyeing the bright red suspenders and the white suit jacket still lying on the bed. The suit jacket has a hood attached seamlessly rather than stopping at a collar, and tiny cloth loops that blend into the back where John’s supposes that sword hilts are meant to hang. “Dave, dude, why are your outfits so weird and complicated?”

John wears it. The shoulders are tight (because Dave is totally a skinny little shit, no matter what he says about John having too many muscles) but apart from that the clothes all fit. It feels totally different from wearing his Heir uniform, with not nearly enough Kevlar and neoprene involved for him to feel comfortable, and the lack of a grey and slate blue color scheme makes him blink in confusion when he glances in the mirror. His face feels totally naked, because Dave is so right, the shades aren’t gonna work. They’ll fall off the moment John tries to fly. “Take these back for the airport,” John says, handing the shades over carefully when Dave emerges in full, bright crimson regalia. Jesus that’s a lot of red.

Dave snatches the sunglasses back too quickly, almost sighing with relief as he swaps out the old pair for the new. Clearly wandering around without them for the past night has been bugging him, which John would feel bad about if he didn’t have a million other problems clamoring for his attention – first and foremost, the issue of his oldest friend still rampaging through New York on a demon-possession high.

“Shades aren’t for you,” Dave says, tossing a handful of possibly shitty swords into a baseball bag and swinging it over his shoulder. “We’ll get you goggles or something along the way, you make them work.”

“Thanks, I appreciate it.”

“Is the fucking fashion show over?” Bro stands in the doorway and holy shit John is getting really sick of being startled every time Bro appears out of nowhere. He’s used to being totally aware of the people around him at all times, sensitive to their movements thanks to the air that surrounds them, but apparently Bro is just that good.

“Yeah, we’re done,” John says, hesitating before kicking his cargo shorts under Dave’s bed. He has no idea if they’re coming back here; maybe Dave will forget about the shorts and discover them later on, and John will have some belated revenge for the skinny jeans. “Is Doctor Lalonde still on the phone?”

“No,” Bro says shortly. He throws the phone at John and vanishes. John catches it with a twist of air, startled by the abrupt throw, and then follows Dave out into the kitchen area, dialing his dad as he goes. His stomach flip-flops as the phone begins to ring.

Yeah, he has no idea how he’s going to explain any of this. Hell, John doesn’t even know what’s going on, and he knows his dad will say that flying in blind is the best and quickest way to get himself killed.

But he doesn’t have a choice. His dad is just going to have to understand – John can’t abandon Rose in her time of need.

Nor can he forget the image of the grimdark destroying the street, and possibly killing that poor cameraman. That, even more his old connection with Rose, is what is driving him to skip out on the flight back to Washington.

People are dying. Maybe New York City isn’t his city, but people are people. And with their resident hero out of commission due to grimdark possession, New York could probably use a temporary stand-in.

Or three.

The phone clicks in John’s ear, and he opens his eyes, determination setting his jaw as he begins to speak without hesitation.

“Dad? I’m sorry. I’m not coming home just yet. There’s something we need to do.”

---

Jade is dreaming again. Everything is black thorns and red vines and green fire, and a bright golden city that gleams in the light of an unfamiliar sun, its inhabitants carefree and oblivious to the horror raining down from above. She strains herself, running as fast as she can, but she can't outrun it. She never can. No, she needs Bec, she needs him, where is he when she needs him most -

"Waaagh!"

Jade wakes with a jolt, topples sideways off the lab stool, and lands on her butt. Her chin hits the edge of the table as she falls, and she rubs at the spot, grimacing as she sits upright. "Bec?" she calls, and for a single tense moment she is certain, beyond a shadow of a doubt, that what answers will not be her wolf anymore.

Bec flickers into existence, its body as sleek and pale as ever, and Jade sighs with relief, hooking fingers into its thick fur and drawing the wolf in close. It allows her to, and she takes comfort in the unnatural cool of its side. There is no pulse of a heartbeat in Bec, only the smooth whir of a functioning, stable nuclear fusion engine.

She doesn't know why Bec is a he in her dreams when it is an it in real life. She just knows that thinking about the dreams too hard makes her queasy. She rubs at a spot in her chest that feels sore until the imagined pain fades away, and then slaps Bec playfully on the flank, giggling. "Silly Bec! You're supposed to wake me up if I fall asleep in a weird place like that, remember? You know I hate dreams!"

Bec sniffs at her neck with a cold nose, and then sits back at attention without a reply. Not that she'd expected one, of course. Patting on top of the desk, Jade finds her glasses and pushes them back up on her nose, humming as Grandpa's lab comes back into focus. That's right - she'd been in the middle of analyzing the results from the latest round of tests she'd done on the Wandering Variable. She wonders exactly when the exhaustion caught up with her and she passed out on the table. Long enough ago that she dropped into REM sleep, at least.
"WV?" she calls, pressing the button on the side of her glasses that activates some of the wire frames' more eccentric features. She flicks on the sniper scope as usual, and then the quantum filter, an ad hoc program she only just invented herself on the flight up to Britain. A quick scan of the room lets the program adjust itself, until it registers the furniture and computers as relatively quantumly stable. By the time the fine-tuner finishes sifting through and ignoring stable objects, the only figure that is lit up like a star with quantum superposition is the Variable, who appears to be sitting on the stool next to the one she'd just fallen from, kicking legs that may or may not exist. At least he hasn’t wandered off, then.

He still can't reply, but Jade talks as though he has. "Sorry about that! Using the missilekind must have taken more out of me than I thought! My arm is still a little sore." Pressing absently at her collar bone and feeling the bruise that has finished growing there, Jade yawns. Then she sniffs again, and catches a whiff of her own smell.

Uh oh. Oops. When was the last time she showered? Or did more than swap her clothes out for a new uniform from her sylladex pocket?

She winces, and casts a glance over the table. There is nothing there that is time sensitive anymore, she decides. She must have finished the finally battery of tests before passing out, because the more fragile samples are already stored in the fume hood, in case something goes wrong and they explode. That's good! She would have hated to have lost a hard-won sample just because she got tired!

"I think I'm going to have to shower reeeeeeally quick, though," Jade says, making a face in the Variable's general direction. "No peeking, mister!" With that ground rule laid down, Jade stows away her lab equipment, leaving some test tubes in the sink to clean later, and then strips off her gloves as she heads down a small side hallway. She has to consult the maps engraved in the walls a few times to reorient herself, but with her sense of space it's easy to feel out the difference between another research lab and the locker room. The water still works here, just as it had in the sink in the main lab, and Jade starts digging through her sylladex for shampoo and conditioner. Her hair really is getting kind of snarled; time to get some of the grime and gunk of the road out of it!

When Jade emerges in a cloud of steam fifteen minutes later, Bec is waiting outside by the row of lockers. She raises an eyebrow at it, but the wolf doesn't give any indication why it chose to leave the lab without Jade calling for it.

She automatically raises her alert level a few notches, just in case Bec senses something she doesn't, and then proceeds to towel her hair until it no longer streams water down the backs of her legs. Long hair can be pretty hard to deal with, especially hair as thick and crinkly as Jade's, but she really likes it this long! Oh well! Once it's mostly dry, she towels off the rest of her and then lets the towel drop. Picking the first costume her hand touches in the sylladex pocket, she steps into a slinky emerald green neoprene suit and zips it up the back by tugging on the zipper with her power.

She thinks she left her lab coat up in the lab, and it probably needs to be washed anyway, before it starts getting all discolored and gross. There probably isn't a laundry room down here in the sublevels, though; she'll need to venture back up to the main estate for that. Well, this is her first time in a house in more than a year - she should probably make the best of the amenities while she still can -

Bec growls and bursts into green flame.

She has no idea how it gets by the house's defensive arrays and sensors; she doesn't sense it in time, herself, because she just doesn't think to spread her spatial awareness out that wide until it is too late.
The explosion comes from above, and Jade barely has time to think WV! before the ceiling - and the collective debris of nearly four floors of mansion and foundation above it - come crashing down on her head.

She doesn't have time to grab her samples or the fancy lab equipment or even the white lab coat she left slung over the seat of the stool. Instead, trusting in the cold weight of Bec as he tackles her and the green fire swallows them both, she reaches out with everything in her to where she remembers the tiny outline of the Wandering Variable swinging his legs on a stool. Her mind fumbles, as she forces it to wrap a bubble around what feels like empty air, to clutch a fistful of space about five foot square to be safe and yank it at a diagonal through space.

They land hard in the field outside the front of the Harley residence under a clear, pale blue sky, the impact strong enough to send the breath whooshing out of Jade in a huff. Bec is unaffected by such things as breathing, and leaps at the first assailant before Jade has time to realize they are, in fact, surrounded. The grass is tall and green, and full of men and trolls in dark suits.

"Get offa my lawn!" Jade yells, forgetting the Variable's uncertain fate as she loads and hoists her modified pistols, raising them from within her strife sylladex to level them at the backs of the nearest troll's knees. She's not as good with a pistolkind as with long-range weaponry, but she counts at least fifteen unknown agents around her, in such close proximity that a rifle would only slow her down.

The first two shots of rubber bullets catch the troll square in the knees and they immediately fold forward, the troll letting out a shocked cry. Jade rolls to the side as a woman swings a quarterstaff at her, coming up with both pistols still cocked. The pistol kicks in her hand and the troll she hit first pitches forward onto his face, unconscious.

Her sense of space is almost completely overwhelmed as all of the assailants begin to move, almost all of them lunging toward her. Jade kicks out sideways and catches a female troll in the stomach with the ball of her foot, the ducks under another wild swing from the woman with the quarterstaff. Yelling, Jade teleports two feet up into the air and pistol-whips the woman in the temple. Her momentum carries her forward, and she lands on the woman's unconscious body with a thump.

She lurches back up onto her feet, the bare sole of her right foot crunching down on a sharp stone that distracts her for a split second. A blunt cudgel appears in the corner of her eye, and she whirls on her heel, bringing the pistol to bear -

Bec appears against a backdrop of galaxies and closes heavy jaws around the man's throat, tackling him to the ground. Unfazed, Jade coolly fires the pistol anyway, catching the orange-blooded troll that had been waiting behind the cudgel wielder smack in the middle of his chest. She rolls forward and puts a pistol away temporarily, rising to her feet with the orangeblood's Taser in hand. She fires it at the next man to come at her from the side, and he drops to the ground. Taser spent, she pulls out the pistol specibus again and loses herself in the fight.

She starts aiming for headshots, despite the risk of possible brain damage at this range. There are too many of them to pull her punches any more than she already has. As she spins and teleports between oncoming blows, she can see through brief glimpses that a good quarter of the Harley residence is in ruins, still smoking from the explosives these guys somehow snuck in to blow through the floor and reach the sublevels.

She can only assume that these are the same assholes who tried to fire a space-to-ground missile at the estate yesterday. She still wonders how they knew where to find her, but hey, she can wait on answers until after she's dealt with all twenty five thugs, total, that have been sent to blow up her goddamn house and ruin her experiment.
"And that one is for blowing up my good photonic crystal laser!" she spits, bringing the hilt of her pistol down on the back of a man's neck. As he falls forward she looks up, whirling to see where the next attack will be coming from.

She blinks as she realizes the field is full of unconscious bodies. Bec whuffles at her from where it sits on top of a troll a few yards away, and then lies down, at ease.

Oh. Well. I guess we took care of them all, Jade muses, still in a battle-haze as she stows the pistols away. Cool. She rolls her sore shoulder, but nothing feels strained. The bottoms of her feet are pretty torn up from the small chips of sharp rock that litter the ground, though, and when she gets an unimpeded view of the residence, she sticks out her tongue. Most of the easternmost wing has completely collapsed in on itself. She can see metal shield walls have shuttered down to cut off the intact portion of the manor from the gaping holes, but it's the principle of the thing, alright? They blew up her house!

"Straight to the nearest prison, okay, Bec?" Jade says, hands on her hips. "Do not pass Go. Blowing up Grandpa's house is the opposite of okay. Straight to the big house for these chuckleheads!"

Bec pants, a pale tongue lolling out of its mouth, and green lines expand outward from its back, stretching out in a rectangle that divides up into smaller, proportional rectangles that box in each unconscious assailant. All of them follow the golden ratio, as far as Jade can see, and after a flare of green fire the perfectly proportional series of rectangles vanishes, along with the bodies. Jade waits, bemused, for the wolf to reappear.

Then she remembers WV.

"Oh nooo!" she yelps, patting at her face and swatting herself before remembering she took her glasses off in the shower. No wonder that fight made her feel so dizzy! Jeez!

She pulls out the glasses from where she stored them in the sylladex and flips on the quantum filter again, slowly rotating in a circle even though her first instinct is to freak out and teleport-search the entire field in a grid formation, which just wouldn't work to find a person who doesn't really exist half the time. The afterimage of Bec's mass teleportation takes a while to manually filter out, and Jade begins to think that either her hasty teleportation missed WV entirely, or she flung him too far in her hurry to get him to safety, and he's ended up in France or something -

A familiar buzzing shock jolts her elbow, as though she whacked her funny bone and the sensation got turned up to eleven. She exclaims with relief when the glasses' filter shows a tiny figure that barely comes up to her waist flicker in and out of stability by her side. WV is barely a cloud of atoms that can't quite form a real body, but she drops to her knees and tries to hug the space where he should be anyway, enduring the faint shocks whenever one of his super-charged particles is observed enough to collapse and brush against her own atoms.

Bec arrives a second later, minus about twenty five troll and human assailants, and Jade stands upright, putting her hands on her hips as she surveys the house again. After a few moments of speculatively staring at the damage, her spatial sense confirms that the sublevel they were working on earlier has completely collapsed in on itself, crushing the equipment and samples inside. Kind of a bummer. Darn.

She claps her hands together and grins. "Oh well! Looks like it's time for round two, WV! We're going to have to start from scratch in B-lab!"
It takes a while to locate B-lab's transportalizer. Grandpa's backup labs are much more difficult to find and unlock than his regular secret labs; the whole point is that if the first lab is compromised, the second will be ten times more secure. Which is smart, but also reeeally annoying when Jade is kind of in a time crunch, here. They can't afford to stay here much longer, not when they literally have missiles and unknown teams of assailants in black suits targeting them on purpose, but the next closest lab Jade can think of that might have all the equipment needed to perform the last tests on WV.

Grandpa would probably scold her if he were here for getting so sidetracked from the instructions he gave her. But he also always told her to trust in her heart and do what feels right, and helping WV definitely feels like the right thing to do. Besides, she can clearly take whatever these bozos feel like throwing at her.

They finally find the transport pad hidden in a study on the fourth floor of the mansion, thankfully on the opposite side of the building from the demolished wing. WV goes down first, as before, and then Jade follows. She's worried about how having his molecules broken down and teleported by machine will affect the test results, if they even did the first time, but when she gets down to sublevel B the outline of WV shows no sign of distress.

Would she even be able to tell if he were in distress? She just has no way of knowing.

This time, she knows what she's looking for, though, which speeds up the process immensely. Between Bec's help and her own levitation abilities, Jade is able to rush headlong through repeats of the vital experiments she performed last night, running the Variable through the human-sized spectrometers and scanners that are essential to any good mad scientist hero's laboratory. The most difficult and time-consuming part is sampling some of WV's atoms directly, which involves waiting for the opportune moment, when Jade is able to observe one of his fingers directly by staring at the same spot for hours, and take a scraping from between stubby black claws to run through the analyzer.

She can't let herself fall asleep this time. Jade moves her stool away from the desk and sits in the middle of the room. She flips on the wifi-function of her glasses and starts surfing the web for a bit. She supposes that now would be a good time to send off another letter to her penpal, while she has nothing else to do!

GG: hello john!
GG: sorry i haven't been able to write in a while - i got up to so many shenanigans these past few days! :DDD
GG: grandpa told me after i recalibrated some of the sensors for him, i should come see you right away, but i got really sidetracked. :P
GG: there was science, john! i couldn't resist the science!
GG: anyway, right now i'm trying to help out this guy i've been calling WV, and once i have these test results i think i'll be able to use my spacey powers to stabilize him!
GG: i already have an idea for how to do it, i just need to make sure he won't explode or something if i mess up~ :O
GG: also i've never tried using my powers this way before, but it can't be that hard, right?
GG: and Bec is here if i mess up!
GG: but after this I will definitely come visit you GG: get ready - the Sharpshooter is headed your way! ;)
GG: oops! the carapace cultures are ready! gotta go!
GG: be safe john!
Jade kicks off her stool and floats over to the beeping analyzer to spare her bandaged feet, snapping her glasses back into safety mode. After a few minutes spent reading over the printout of the results of the test, she grins. "Good news, WV!" she announces, spinning to face the empty space of countertop where the Variable has taken up residence. "I thiiink I get what's going on with you! All of your quantum possibilities are firing at once, so we just need to narrow you down to your ideal self, the one you want to be observed as, and I should theoretically be able to collapse you down into one eigenstate." She droops a little as a thought occurs to her. "The only problem is, how are you going to tell me what you're supposed to look like? Oops…"

The cloud of quantum superposition leaves the counter top and makes for the computer monitor beside the analyzing unit. Jade had logged into it early, only to discover that this is, in fact, the infamous monitor 42 with the mansion's anti-missile launcher controls. Way to go, Grandpa, sticking the controls in the secondary lab…

With a spark and a violent whine, some of the WV's atoms brush up against the computer, and the screen flicks on. It doesn't display the login screen; instead, static fuzzes up the screen, occasionally lit up with streaks of green fire, like the kind Bec uses to get around. For a moment, Jade can half-see the form of a figure silhouetted against the distortion, as though she almost managed to observe WV head-on for the first time since he showed up in the back of her plane. She keeps her eyes open as long as she can, tearing up a little as she focuses on the minute form of a tiny carapacian.

The screen flares a bright white, and Jade can't stop the reflexive blink.

When she opens her eyes again, the WV can't be seen for a long moment while her glasses relocate him. He is back to being nothing more than a cloud of mostly air, his matter too unstable to register for long.

But on the screen, monitor 42 is analyzing something new. Jade approaches cautiously, careful not to walk into the middle of WV's personal bubble, because that would be sooo rude! The numbers and equations zoom by too quickly for Jade to catch them all, and she frowns as the coding for what appears to be ectobiological genetic markers flashes by.

And then the computer finishes processing whatever data WV fed into it, and a model appears on the screen. It is very basic and polygonal, the best representation of the data that the computer is able to produce. The figure is the size of a grade-schooler, with beetle-black carapace and a round head, blinking out of the screen with button-white eyes. It is swathed in faded greyish brown fabric, leaving only its spindly legs exposed.

"Is this you?" Jade asks, studying the data with renewed interest. Oh yes, this is exactly what she needs! All of the dimensions and details of WV's chemical makeup are here, the exact configuration of quantum states that the WV apparently considers his correct collapsed state. Jade plops down in the nearest stool and drags it closer, speed-reading through the lines of data as fast as she can. She can't afford to miss a single line, or she could mess up WV's entire vascular system.

Thankfully, the amount of data is...surprisingly short. Almost as though a lot of the most basic details of the Variable's body are clone-copies of an original genetic pattern. That would explain the ectobiological markers that show up everywhere - Jade doesn't know much about carapacians from the internet, but she does know they reproduce via cloning.

"You want to try this now? I bet we could get you stabilized and observed in time for lunch!" Jade says, rubbing her hands together with glee. "Wouldn't that be great?!"
There is really no way to tell if the violent tremor that runs through the cloud of atoms is an affirmative or a negation. But the WV doesn’t try to leave the room or anything when Jade waves it toward the center of the lab, or when she pulls down her lab goggles and puts on her Sharpshooter gloves. They help her focus her space powers too, which she’s going to need help with to pull off of this kind of complex quantum manipulation.

Breathing in deeply, Jade raises her hands and frames the cloud of the Wandering Variable between the rectangle of her fingers. Her tongue slowly migrates out between her lips until it sticks out the side as she become engrossed in thought. Static electricity begins to arc between metal surfaces and computer monitors, building up in Jade's hair. She doesn't notice, too caught up in focusing on the WV in her mind's eye. Over in the corner, Bec whines in apprehension.

It isn't working. Jade bites down a bit, her tongue still stuck between her teeth, and frowns in concentration. She can feel exactly how she needs to do this, can see in her mind's eye how she means to nudge WV's particles just a little bit, isolate all the extra quantum states in space until all that's left is the basic being that is WV, not all the beings he could have been or not been.

Maybe - maybe she just needs to apply a little more power. She's been holding back, afraid of hurting the WV by accident, but - just a little more couldn't hurt. She pours on a little more power, and the floor begins to quake under her feet.

There is no warning. One moment, Jade is applying the barest minimum of pressure, trying and failing to push through a barrier that stubbornly refuses to let her through to the Variable's quantum possibility cloud. She's getting kind of frustrated, now; there's no logical reason why what she's doing just won't work. She has the skill and control and sheer power needed to pull this off - so what is she doing wrong? She grits her teeth and pushes -

Something gives, and a dark figure flickers into being across the lab from Jade.

At the same time, Jade's entire body explodes in pain, crushing pain that drops her. She lands hard on her knees but that's nothing compared to the pain of burning burning burning falling -

There is a loud pop as all the air is displaced from the room, and all of the contents of the lab, including the girl and the carapacian, vanish.

Bec follows its absent mistress a few moments later, unaffected by the massive explosion of green fire that radiates out from where Jade just stood, bursting upward through the floor of the mansion above and causing a second wave of destruction to rock the Harley estate.

The residence stands empty, the lower levels hollow, as though its contents have been scooped out with a spoon and deposited elsewhere. Just outside of Jade's range, a truck containing an array of spatial, temporal, and paradox sensors explodes in a flurry of activity, jolting the head Crew operative manning the outpost awake. By the time Clubs Deuce gets a handle on the situation, however, they have completely lost the trail of Sharpshooter.

- Sydney, Australia

Oof.

Note to self: next time you want to stabilize a strange person into a single quantum state using only the power of your mind? Don’t.

It feels like Jade's brain is about to burst out through the front of her skull. Groaning, she covers her face with her hands, unable to work up the motivation to open her eyes. The air temperature seems to have skyrocketed, and she can feel sunlight (burning) on her skin. So at the very least, whatever the heck just happened, it looks like she managed to blow through another roof. Grandpa would be so proud.

"Bec? WV?" she croaks at last, her throat dry and gritty. She opens her eyes and regrets it instantly; the setting sun is obscenely bright, and she shuts her eyes against the burn.

Wait. The setting sun?

She touches the side of her glasses, still unwilling to open her eyes again. "Computer, what time zone am I in?" The voice-activated responder does not reply, and Jade is forced to crack open her eyes again to see that the power level displayed in the corner of the frames is dead. Great - now how will she keep track of WV?

If he's even still alive. If whatever knocked Jade out hasn't done damage to his quantum state that can't be repaired.

A pair of white eyes appear over her head, tiny white lines underscoring them as they stare quizzically down at her. A second figure also appears, the more familiar, reassuring eyeless face of Bec. "Oh. Hey." Jade says, rubbing at her eyes one last time. "Bec, have you seen -"

She stops, and sits upright, nearly whacking Bec in the chin as she does so. She flips around onto her knees and stares at the short, shadowy figure kneeling next to Bec. "WV?" she whispers.

The carapacian nods wildly, flinging his arms around as he gestures in quick succession at himself, Jade, and the sky. It seems like some kind of sign language maybe, but Jade doesn't understand a word of it. Even when he moves his mouth a little - though not nearly enough for the amount of information he seems to be trying to convey - no sound comes out, and he seems to become frustrated by this. Jade can only stare, bemused and uncomprehending.

He hiccups in a last paroxysm of this desperate attempt at speech. For a moment, his whole body turns into bright green and white plasma, kind of like the greenish fire Bec uses to teleport sometimes. WV doesn't teleport anywhere, but he does seem shocked after he settles back into a normal black shell, patting at his body and filthy bandages as though to reassure himself he's still all there.

Oops. Jade gets the distinct feeling that the green fire might be her fault. But she can't really feel too guilty about it when holy cow, it actually worked! WV is (almost) totally stabilized!

Behold, the power of science!

"Ahaha, don't worry, I'm sure I can fix that!" Jade laughs, dragging the tiny carapacian into a headlock and giving him a noogie with her knuckles. He squirms and shakes his head in silent protest, but his whole body shakes with giggles that sound like strangled gasps. He hiccups again and is a burst of green flame for a second before solidifying. It doesn't burn, really, which Jade is really, really grateful for!

Now, all she has to do is figure out where she is. Tilting her head to the side, she tries her space powers. After this whole weird day, she really hopes she hasn't broken her powers or something - Her eyes pop open, and she lets go of WV to grab the sides of her head in shock. "We're in Australia?! John is nowhere near Australia! Agghhhh!"

WV sits back and listens to the Witch's confused wailing as she tries to figure out how she crossed half a planet when her previous range has always been limited to a few hundred meters. He pats Bec hesitantly, and when the wolf merely rests its head on its paws, he decides that despite the scary shape of the wolf's head, they might be able to get along. After all, Bec hasn't tried to kill him all this past week.

The Witch may not be able to hear his words anymore, but honestly, WV's just happy to be alive again.

Everything else can wait.

A few hours later, a cloaked figure comes to a halt before the wreckage of the Harley estate in Britain. What little hadn't been destroyed in the explosion earlier in the day is now smoldering with green fire.

It had travelled here as quickly as possible, but it seems it still missed her by a good amount of time. Shaking its head, the figure begins to fly up into the air, lifted by bright red rocket shoes with yellow flames down the side. Not exactly the figure's sense of style, really, but it hasn't yet figured out how to create rocket-based transport devices without the flames. It seems to be a multiversal constant, a fundamental property of paradox space, that all rocket shoes must be red with yellow flames.

Once it comes to a halt over top of the destroyed residence, the figure makes a noise that may or may not be a sigh.

The blast radius from Jade's takeover has left a mark scorched into the foundations of the house, easily visible from any eyes watching from above.

Some may have described the scorched shape as a Borjgali, a Georgian symbol of the sun, or as a spiral galaxy, with six arms curling in whorls of green fire and grey smoke.

The figure knows this to be the symbol of Space, and bows its head. It can no longer feel weariness or weakness in its body, but it still feels a kind of mental exhaustion within the parts of its brain that are still organic. It has always known this day would come.

Jade has become more than a simple manipulator of Space. From this moment on, they will never stop hunting her.

Which means, of course, that the figure above the Harley residence will simply have to guard her from afar.

It's about time it began to give these Crew ruffians a piece of its mind.

_Somewhere in the continental United States..._

Diamonds Droog adjusts the cuffs of her suit jacket with precision, tucking in a stray thread that she makes a mental note to remove at some later point. She has an open slot of time from 10:15 to 10:17 tomorrow morning, and if there is one thing she can always make time for, it is a stray thread. One must always look one's best, after all. If there is one thing she cannot abide, it is an ill-tailored suit.

She must always look impeccable, and she holds her subordinates up to the same standards, naturally. Hearts, Clubs, and their barbaric ruffians can flout uniform protocol all they like; when Diamonds is in charge of an operation, not a stitch may be out of place. The Midnight Crew has an image to maintain, and if Diamonds must be the only one to enforce that image, so be it.

As she strides through the corridors, the tail of her suit jacket fluttering slightly and the heels of her shoes clicking, the peons around her shrink back against the walls. The combination of her cue-stick strife specibus and her (admittedly) short temper inspire exactly the degree of awe and intimidation in her subordinates that she has found can shape an obedient, efficient crew out of a pack of otherwise lawless hooligans.

After ascending a flight of stairs, Diamonds finds herself on the tenth floor, dedicated to questionable accounting and stock manipulation. Not her division - she's more of the covert affairs and kidnapping cut, herself. No, this floor is part of the Felt's territory, and she bristles at the garish, pale green décor. Ever since the new big shot took over and merged the two gangs into one crew, she has been visually assaulted by this abominable hue on a regular basis. She has even taken to performing more field operations in person, rather than simply directing lackeys to do her will, solely to escape the sickly wash of green. Alas. Her struggle is real.

Speaking of these useless pawns. Just as Diamonds finishes bracing herself to pass through the crowded desks of human and troll thralls scribbling and typing away at their desks in the bullpen* that lies between her and the stairs to the eleventh floor (her final destination), a tiny man in a ghastly green suit scurries around the corner, his trim hat's pale purple color clashing offensively with everything else he's wearing, right down to the matching felt green bowtie.

He crashes into her right as she steps out into the main room, the stack of papers clutched in his arms flying everywhere and littering the repulsive green carpet with sheets of paper. Diamonds remains upright, barely jolted by such a weak impact, while the Felt operative topples backward and hits the ground.

Diamonds is about to smirk and sweep away, leaving the pathetic man to make his fawning apologies to her back, when the unthinkable occurs.

Her hat falls off.

The hair underneath, of course, is flawless, an elegant coif worthy of a 1930s debutante styled to survive being hidden under a hat for most of the day. But Diamonds must watch, frozen, as her equally elegant hat, the one specifically crafted to match this particular suit, floats to the floor, the brim bent at a strange angle as it comes to a stop.

"You bent my hat," she says hollowly, aware that her lips are parted in a most uncouth, gawking stare.

"O-oh! I'm sorry, sir - ma'am!" the Felt operative stutters, but that one slip up costs him any of Diamonds's remaining good will, such as it is. She extends her cue-stick to its full length with a flick her wrist, and winds up like a batter. "I didn't mean it-!" the Felt shrieks, scrambling to his feet and trying to back away from her with his hands raised beseechingly.

She brings the cue stick around with all the strength of a major league baseball player, and the cue-stick slams into the Felt man's ribs. He goes flying backwards and, with a crash, he crashes through the outside window. The force of the impact actually breaks not just the window glass but the window frame itself, huge chunks of the wall on either side flying out into open air along with shards of glass and the Felt operative himself. His scream of flailing panic slowly dies out in volume as he falls out of sight.

Still seething, Diamonds takes out a lighter and stoops to pick up her fallen hat. She sets it on fire and watches with an impassive expression until the last of the disgraced article of headgear burns away, and she lets the final smoldering piece fall to the ground before crushing out the embers with her heel. Then she places her spare hat on her head, and smiles. Perfect.

The balance of the universe thus restored and all due final respects paid to a fine piece of headwear, Diamonds adjusts her dapper hat and smirks at the horrified thralls, all of whom have looked up from their mindless paper-shuffling to gape at her and the new hole in the wall. "Relax. The fool is too lucky to let a little fall kill him," she says, collapsing her cue-stick with a brisk flick of her wrist and placing it back in the inside pocket of her suit jacket. Smoothing her suit jacket and brushing a fleck of green debris from her pants, she strides through the middle of the desks, away from the evidence of her wanton violence.

Though she presents a confident front for the peons - and, truthfully, is quite pleased herself with the outcome of that little encounter - she knows that when she reaches the eleventh floor she'll have to explain herself to the big man. Urgh. He doesn't approve of infighting between the Felt and the Crew's aces, and his disapproval can be...unpleasant. Clubs, of course, blindly obeys the restrictions, and probably has the best relationship with these felt green nightmares, but Clubs is a bumbling fool at the best of times. As much as it sticks in her craw that someone as useless as Clubs has a better record than her in any way, she can't help it. Sometimes it's like these Felt go out of their way to rouse her ire.

But hey. Diamonds is the bearer of good news for once. Or at the least, very promising news. Between her own spy network's latest intel, and the babbling reports she's been intercepting from Clubs out in the field, she's fairly certain the boss will cut her a little slack on the whole 'use of needless and excessive force against allies' front.

Still, she's apprehensive as she approaches the dark green door at the head of the stairs. Quite aside from being a repulsive shade of green, this door has always given her the heebie jeebies. Maybe it's the bizarre, strange carvings and unfamiliar words engraved in the stained green wood; maybe it's just the creepy aura of the big man bleeding through. Either way, Diamonds makes sure her gloves are firmly in place before rapping on the door with the back of her knuckles, affecting as much of a carefree demeanor as she can.

Oh, do come in, Droog. I've been expecting you for quite some time. I'm sure the business of punting poor Clover out of the building must have been a vitally important delay.

Oh, balls.

The door opens soundlessly, without even a decent creak to match its creepy aura. Schooling her expression into confident boredom, Diamonds straightens her tie and walks through the open door.

The room within is plush and richly decorated, and it is a testament to the boss's good taste that the only flaw Diamonds can find with the interior design is the abominable color scheme. There is a fire crackling in the hearth, though it does nothing to alleviate the dead cold of the air. Diamonds highly suspects the hearth is only for show, as the fire within is a bright green, and flickers out of existence every few seconds. There is a bowl of Swedish fish by the door and she fights the compulsion for all of five seconds before giving in, reaching out with greedy fingers to start shoveling the delectable treats into her outside pockets. She doesn't know how the Doctor always predicts correctly which candy to place by the door, given that every member of the Crew has a different unnatural predilection, but he has never failed to tempt her with these blasted things every time she thinks her visits will surprise him.

She's resigned to the fact that he'll already know exactly the news she comes to report. Her entire division of the Crew often feels more than a little redundant, given that any news she brings seems to be old news to the Doctor. He simpers and panders to her and assures her that her work is quite necessary. The way he's explained it, the one time he deigned to acknowledge her concerns about being replaced, he has some way of knowing (nearly) everything Diamonds knows. However, he requires Diamonds's work to ferret out the information in the first place, before he can pluck it from her mind and draw his own conclusions. Something about an "abnormally high level of Void background interference" in the air.

Sounds like a load o' bull to Diamonds, but then, so does most of the Felt's blathering about their temporal experiments. She doesn't much care; as long as she gets to keep doing what she good at and gets paid quite handsomely to do so, she's more than willing to put up with this all-knowing crap.

"Sir. I have something of significance to report," she says, still reluctantly pocketing the Swedish fish. She knows from experience she can fight the urge all she wants - by the end of this meeting, she will be scraping at the bottom of the bowl with her fingernails, hunting for the last morsels of artificially flavored treat. "Though of course, I am certain you are already aware of it."

Do not be petulant, Droog, not in front of the company. Your work is invaluable, as you well know. I am indeed aware of the goings-on in New York, but only because the media outlets are covering the explosion in Albany as we speak. My guest has just arrived to discuss it, in fact.

Diamonds controls her expression, but then she sees exactly who is lounging on a chaise lounge by the window, absorbed in tapping away on a slim fuchsia cell phone.

Diamonds knows that the only reason the Crew has been able to expand and profit as well as it has over the years since the corporate takeover is due to the Doctor's uncanny, illustrious connections with several major figures in the government and the justice system. But she had no idea the Doctor's connections in the upper echelons reached quite that high. It is one thing to have the Vice President in your boss's pocket, and quite another to find Her Imperious Condescension with her Grand Culling Fork leaning on the wall beside her.

This is...unnerving. She should have known about this. With a spy network as intricate and wide spread and well trained as her own, something as huge as this should not have slipped between the cracks.

When the undisputed economic and political powerhouse of the entire world shows no sign of looking up from her phone, completely engrossed in whatever is on the screen that involves so much tapping, Diamonds shakes off the unpleasant surprise and refocuses on the back of her employer's chair. The Doctor is facing away from her, looking over an intricate chessboard. He'd once called it a Mobius net, but to Diamonds it just looks like someone crumpled up a piece of paper and arranged it in a ring around an inner blue sphere.

He moves a single piece into position, so miniaturized to fit on the minute squares that she can't even identify it, though she thinks it may be black with lavender accents. Not your standard chess set, to say the least.

Is there anything I can assist you with, Droog? Something else appears to be on your mind, aside from the reappearance of the Seer in a reversed aspect.

Diamonds blinks. It seems strange that the Doctor hasn't just told her the news while pretending to couch it in all-knowing certainty, but if he really wants her to say it first, she can oblige. "It's - well. It's about the Heir in Seattle. A few hours ago the paradox sensors spiked, and his signature disappeared from Seattle. He is now in the greater Houston area, though as usual the Puppeteer's efforts make it difficult to pin down an exact location. Our agent's suspicions have been confirmed - the Heir is no mere wind-manipulator; he has begun to alter the fundamental laws of reality."
There is a pause, and then the Doctor swivels around in his chair. Diamonds folds her hands behind her back, the collapsed cue stick slipped up one sleeve just in case. No matter how often she tells herself that the smooth, unyielding surface of the Doctor's head must be a mask, an anonymous disguise, she can't quite believe it. It is perfectly spherical and pale as bone, and its lack of features leaves his expressions and tells a mystery. She can never read if he's upset or enraged or excited; he is simply, eternally, composed.

She does, however, detect a note of surprise when he speaks next, his words a crackle of white and lime green in her brain.

I suspected as much. Thanks to this universe's active attempts to stymie my foresight, however, I simply couldn't be sure. In a world populated by such over-powered life forms, after all, there have been more than a few false alarms over wind-users in the past. Thank you for informing me of the gap in my knowledge, Droog.

"I - you're welcome, sir," she replies, feeling a little as though the rug has been pulled out from under her. The Doctor has never admitted to ignorance before; even his confession about only being 'nearly' omniscient always rang hollow. "What step should we take next?"

The Doctor pulls open the drawer of his grandiose desk. Then, even as Diamonds observes, intrigued, he lifts up a false bottom to reveal several small chess pieces. He plucks out a bright blue figurine and begins to study the intricate chess board once more.

Clubs has also reported that he wishes to confirm the Witch's presence in Britain, as I am sure you are well aware. Combined with the temporal disturbances we confirmed around the Knight several years ago, it is quite safe to say that they are all active once more. There was a very real possibility that they would be born years apart, scattered throughout time and space. That they were born and have begun to reactivate within such a short period of time...is fortuitous.

"You sure 'bout that, Doc?" the Condesce says, the first words she has spoken since Diamonds entered the room. She doesn't look up from her phone though, and in fact puts the screen closer to her face as her deadly claws tap away faster and faster, the light of the game flashing across her reflective goggles until - "Oh, hell no, this fuckin' candy game is kickin' mah glubbin' ass. #fuckinbullshit #cullthismotherfucker"

Did - did she just say hashtags -

I wouldn't go down that road, Droog. Greater minds than yours have been broken attempting to comprehend the intricate, unfathomable nature of our good friend's chosen linguistic vernacular. And yes, my dear Condescension, it is excellent news indeed that all four have risen in such quick succession. They are already being drawn together - they can't help it.

"Hell yeah, fucking color bombs," the cultural figurehead of all trollkind mutters to herself, her untamed masses of fuchsia-tinged black hair twitching as she rolls over on the lounge seat, lying on her stomach with the phone resting in front of her as she continues to play Candy Crush. "Yeah, Doc, maybe lettin' a buncha super-powered lil shits team up ain't the best idea. NGL, I think we could still cull 'em afore they, yah know, rise up an' wreck our glubbin' shit. Jussayin'."

"Pull Clubs out of the field and reassign his agents to me, Doctor," Diamonds adds, wanting to throw a metaphorical hat into the ring. Excitement clutches in her throat, and she wants to squirm with delight at this wonderful opportunity. Here is a chance to personally kidnap the four heroes that have been the object of the Crew's time for nearly as long as the Doctor has been in charge. Better still, with the Heir halfway across the country from Seattle, Hearts is going to look like a fucking idiot when he misses out on capturing the hero in
And maybe after they take care of these four miscreants, the Crew can finally get back to what it does best - delicious, elegant criminal works - instead of being constantly distracted by the Doctor's weird obsession with these kids.

Oh, no. One cannot simply rush the game, Droog. There is an order to these things. A proper sequence of events, however convoluted it may appear from your perspective. I'm afraid you lack the context to make any informed decisions about this matter just yet. Suffice to say that while your enthusiasm does not go unappreciated, now that we have confirmed the four, all active members of the Crew are to follow gradual escalation protocol. Tell Hearts to return to base before he attempts to go crashing about on an ill-advised rampage. Three explosions in under a week tells me he's getting far too worked up.

"...Of course. Shall I recall Clubs as well?" Diamonds asks, her shoulders slumping a little. "He recently requisitioned a low earth orbit-to-ground missile launch and sent an entire team of covert agents to confront the Witch. Both operations proved a waste of time and financial resources -"

"Bitch, I gotchu fuckin' covered," the Condesce interrupts. She is now playing with only one hand, using the palm of the other to rest her chin on. Her slim feet kick in the air absently. "M'rollin' in the big boonbucks, you feel me? #blingblingmothafuckas"

"Boonbucks?" Diamonds is thoroughly lost. She's never heard of such a thing before, and the hashtags have become rather distracting.

The troll holds up a sparkly, pink block in response. No really, it glitters all over with an opalescent hue, and Diamonds is immediately intrigued. She can't identify the mineral that makes up the majority of the block, but she can damn well extrapolate that the material must be quite rare and quite valuable.

Concentrated, compressed majyyks, utilized as units of arbitrary monetary value by a select oblivious few.

"So it's fake money," Diamonds says, disgusted. What is the point of fake money? Counterfeiting is yet another despised Felt division, and she holds no truck with it. She has earned a living throughout her life with good old-fashioned conspiracy, ransom, and espionage, and has never had to stoop so low as to printing her own cash to pay for her suits.

"It's glubbin' real money if dis bitch says so. DWI," the Condesce snaps, scratching behind a long horn at the horn bed buried in her hair. "You got anythin' else we needta get our heart to hearts on about, Doc? There'sa snippy lil basic bitch Imma have to cull if she gets any more uppity on my turf while I ain't around. #bitchezain'tshitttt"

Yes, your complaints about the young heiress do grow tiresome and unconstructive. By all means, I believe this meeting is adjourned. Droog, a moment of your time after our good friend takes her leave.

"Yeah, yeah, you got it, Doctor," Diamonds says, fingers tightening around the handle of her cue-stick as the fuchsia-blooded troll growls at her phone one last time and clicks off the screen, placing it within a pocket of her skin tight suit. She wraps a hand around the balance point of her 2x3dentkind and stands up.

She barely comes up to Diamonds's ribs.
Diamonds has to do a double-take, not sure what she's witnessing, and then fights the urge to step closer to the troll for comparison purposes when the Condesce makes for the back of the room. Diamonds is devastatingly tall of course, and her high heels simply elevate her further, but she'd expected the most infamous, long-lived troll in history to be a little more - well, imposing. But no, she's...she's...shrimpy.

Diamonds has never felt more ashamed of a mental pun in her entire life. It takes everything in her not to remove her hat and resign on the spot. And from the way the Doctor's head tilts toward her and an amused green chuckle crackles in her skull, he knows.

This is humiliating.

Instead, long, slim horns make up for in height what the rest of the Condesce's body lacks. It is more than a little off-putting. As Diamonds watches, the troll walks to the enormous green grandfather clock by the fireplace and pulls the front panel open. Whistling something that sounds suspiciously like 'Beez in the Trap,' the Condesce steps into the clock and - vanishes. Diamonds squints, trying to see into the clock because what, but after a moment the panel shuts itself with a series of mechanical clicks, and is still.

Well, it makes about as much sense as anything else in this damn room.

"What did you want to talk about, boss?" she asks, folding her arms across her chest, careful to arrange them so that the white diamond insignia on her lapel remains visible. "You got something for me to do?"

Oh, just two final matters I'd like to clear up. First and foremost, I wished to assure you that poor Clover survived the ten story flight you helped him to achieve, but he most graciously does not wish to press charges. A most fortuitous turn of events.

Diamonds just rolls her eyes and sighs internally.

DS: Second, though I do not wish you to see this as a reward for your earlier actions - I have an assignment for you. Something to get you out in the field. You are clearly growing restless if you have begun ejecting my agents out of windows during business hours over an admittedly very dapper hat and a shade of green that you find disagreeable.

Diamonds straightens up. "You've got my attention, boss."

Excellent. Now tell me - are you familiar with the name Spades Slick?

Chapter End Notes

I feel like everyone’s sections are shorter compared to Dave’s and John’s but that’s mostly because Dave doesn’t shut up. And then there’s Karkat’s section, where it always seems a little short, but then shit happens like OH MY GOD DID I JUST SET OFF A BOMB IN YOUR FACE

So today, instead of Spades, we get a new member of the MC! Diamonds Droog is a woman here; the Crew are equal opportunity employers! But what is she going to get up to now…
Burn Me Blind

Chapter Summary

The gods are heavy on me, and all the fates
Shed fire across my eyelids mixed with night,
And burn me blind, and disilluminate
My sense of seeing, and my perspicuous soul
Darken with vision.

Chapter Notes

Okay Rose, it’s time to calm the fuck down. You've got this. I believe in you. I believe in the you who believes in me. John, get your ass in there and give her a cool down hug or something, jeez.

And always remember - Hemogoblin and Heir belong to Real Men Wear Tights. I just appreciate the chance to inflict new and unusual trauma on them. >:D Hover over the crappy Spanish in Jade's section for a translation.

Let’s get this show on the road. Today's power anthem is Wake Up (AWOLNATION). Act II boss battles, engage!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

For the first three seconds after the blast, Karkat can’t believe he’s still alive. His body feels numb, as though he got slammed by an icy cold wave of water rather than a concussive blast. He can taste the adrenaline running through his veins as a bitterness in his mouth, sharp and unpleasant, and even has the mental clarity to wish his powers didn’t let him taste chemicals in his bloodstream – it’s fucking nasty. He blinks his eyes, and gets about five seconds worth of a hazy view of the night sky overhead before the pain comes crashing down.

“Fuu-uck!” he gasps, his hand fumbling as he clutches his side. He had been crouched at an angle to the flashlight bomb, and he thinks he remembers covering his head with his arms in the seconds between his realization and the detonation. His arms feel as though they’ve been scraped raw, and there is a throbbing ache in the side of his calf, but the most pressing pain emanates from the left side of his ribs. As his hands press against his side, he immediately regrets that decision; something metallic and sharp-edged is wedged up around between his ribs. He can’t tell how deep it goes.

Fuck.

Even around the pain that radiates through his torso, Karkat is aware of just how very fucked he is. The bomb hadn’t been powerful enough to kill him or throw him off the roof, obviously, but that’s part of the problem: he’s just been blown up on top of the police station in charge of most of Seattle, and the anti-terror unit could show up any fucking second and decide to arrest his ass for being at the scene of the crime.
As he rolls onto his stomach, letting loose a torrent of unimaginative swearing (yeah, let’s see you try to think up creative new insults when you’ve got shrapnel jabbing at your lungs, nubfucker), he gapes in silent pain again, throat working to swallow down a scream. He has to rest his forehead on the roof, closing his eyes and breathing in uneven spasms. The roof is cold, despite the recent goddamn explosion, and a piece of rock digs into his skin between his eyebrows. He can feel that his mask has survived the blast, but when he lists to one side, panting, one prosthetic horn does not quite come up even with the other. They’re both supposed to curve forward, past his profile, but if he can lean his forehead down to touch the ground, then – yeah, the left horn feels as though it has cracked all the way through, and the tip has broken off.

Shit. Hopefully he can do this before the cops arrive and see his false horns mutilated, because he’s not going anywhere until he heals this side wound. Fighting through the threat of unconsciousness, Karkat zones out, focusing on the pain beating through his blood until all he can feel and see is red. The pain simultaneously grows distant, and intensifies; he is aware of every minute nuance of the damage that has been done to his body, but also better able to ignore it from this perspective. If these were just simple cuts, he could simply reverse the damage by drawing the blood back up to quickly scab over the wound and heal in a matter of seconds. Hey, power over blood – it has its perks.

But the raw rash running down his arms is a series of burns, running the gamut from first to second degree depending on what angle the arm had been facing the blast, with little flecks of shrapnel speckling his skin. And burns are tricky, to say the least. Gritting his teeth, Karkat urges blood to well up, washing out infection and forming long, thin strips of scabbing. It’s a quick fix – it’ll keep the burn from getting infected until he can rinse it off and treat it properly. He leaves smears of drying red blood behind on the roof when he hesitantly shifts his arms, but he can do no more than grimace at the marks, and trust that since he’s never had his blood drawn, the police won’t have a sample to match it to.

There’s a slice along the back of his calf, and he deals with that in seconds, sighing with relief as he knits the skin together and the pain instantly dies off. The arms still sting when he stretches the skin, but now he only has one major source of pain left to deal with before he can get the fuck out of here.

…The longer he leaves that fucker in there, the more likely the chance Karkat will fuck up again and twist his torso the wrong way, and end up with the shard of metal stabbing right through his lung. The only way this is going to heal is if - Yep. Fuck. No choice. The shrapnel’s gotta come out.

This is quite possibly the stupidest thing he has ever contemplated doing in a very short but rather busy life of contemplating myriad acts of stupidity. This may well make the top five, right up there with allowing Crabdad to choose him as a wriggler. Most people would argue that a grub lacks the sentience to know such things as right from wrong, or to protest a lusus choosing them. Karkat would say sentience is fucking overrated, and that past-Karkat should have taken one look at that fatass and wriggled in the other direction as fast as his tiny mutant nubs could carry him.

Before he can lose himself in another tangent and talk himself out of this latest act of stupidity, he just does it. Curling up on his right side, Karkat wraps a gloved hand around the blood-slicked shrapnel in his side and pulls and ohfuckohfuckohnublickingfuck why is past-Karkat such an idiot?!

Karkat chokes out a whining scream, slamming his other fist against the roof. Hissing out a breath, he finishes the job, probably ripping edges as he turns the entry wound into an exit wound. He brings the piece of shrapnel up to his face, unleashing the full force of his righteous glare upon the offending scrap of metal. It looks a lot smaller than it felt, and is absolutely coated in bright crimson blood. Throwing the metal to the side, offended by its impudence in daring to stab Karkat motherfucking Vantas, Karkat presses his hand right up against the open wound. His side is damp and warm with blood, but now there’s nothing in the wound preventing him from just closing it up.

There’s some muscle damage that will take longer to heal on its own, but Karkat reaches into the blood rapidly pulsing out of his veins and tugs it back into its proper place. The veins reattach and seal themselves up, and he knits together what skin he can before letting a scab coagulate over the area. Peeling away the tatted edges of his suit and the Kevlar lining, Karkat sits and props himself up against the wall of the stairwell, counting backward from ten in his head. By the time he does, the scab cracks and falls off, and all that’s left is blood-smeared grey skin where the stab wound used to be.

Well. Alright. Way to go, mutant powers, at long last you have justified just a tiny fraction of the life-threatening hassle and apprehension you have caused me every day of my life, he thinks. He only feels about half as bitter as usual. Shaking his head, Karkat stands carefully. He still feels shocky all over from the surprise and sheer impact of the explosion, but considering he just survived a bomb from three feet away, he’s feeling surprisingly chipper.

Note to self: never use the word ‘chipper’ in conjunction with one Karkat Vantas ever again. Ever. He’s making this a universal law. Seriously, he will personally ascend to Raging Fuckass levels of godhood and smite any dumbfucks who so much as think that word in his presence again.

Shuddering, Karkat gets his feet under him, bracing with both hands against the wall as he slowly slides up into an upright position. His left side aches a warning from the muscles, and then is quiet. The overwhelming pain has almost completely subsided, but he’s going to feel this one in the morning.

He cracks his neck from side to side, trying to work the kinks out of his system, and then scans the roof, taking in the damage. A dark blast pattern radiates out in a three foot wide circle from the spot where the flashlight had been set up. There’s no sign of the reflecting mirror or the note left by Hearts – they’ve either been incinerated or tossed off the roof entirely.

That much of the note was true, though. Hearts had said something about not having orders to kill Heir. With such a small blast and Heir’s skill with using the wind as a defense mechanism, Karkat is willing to bet he wouldn’t have been badly damaged at all. Heir certainly wouldn’t have been unlucky enough to take a wad of metal to the ribcage. No, this had been intended as a warning shot, and Karkat just happened to waltz up and stick his cartilage nub in where it didn’t belong.

Except of course, this is Hemogoblin’s new partner the Crew wanted to blow up. One could argue this is, in fact, exactly where he belongs. Especially since Heir is still missing in action after not one, but two, explosions.

For the first time since the explosion went off, Karkat is able to switch back over from survival mode into a more heroic mindset. Hemogoblin steps away from the wall, twisting his tattered arm guards absently until they mostly cover the scabby, blistering burned sections. He’s going to need to replace a lot of his costume after tonight, which is a pain, but for the most part the skintight Kevlar and neoprene did its job. This could have been a lot worse.

Now then. If Hearts and his phony lawyer took off just after the initial explosion Karkat witnessed, they’ve probably only been running for about fifteen minutes, now. The problem is, a gang as well-funded as the Midnight Crew seems to be probably had an escape vehicle waiting to pick them up, and they could have taken off in any direction in the ensuing confusion. By wasting time getting blown up, he may have lost the opportunity to pick up their trail at all.

But maybe he hasn’t completely fucked himself over.
Heir may have flown into that fight the other night from above, but Hemogoblin snuck in from behind, circling around until he found a good vantage point from which to back Heir up in the firefight. If he’s right about what he saw while he weaved his way through the maze of containers to catch the Crew off guard, he believes that Hearts will at least make a quick stop at Dock C before fucking off to parts unknown. At the very least, there might be some residual Crew members hanging around there he can interrogate.

It’s not much. But it’s better than nothing.

Hemogoblin hightails it for waterfront. If he remembers correctly, there’s a certain dock in the container port with some contents the police might have missed.

He doesn’t see the members of the Seattle bomb squad who flood onto the roof seconds after he begins loping across the rooftops. He doesn’t look back as they spread out and search the roof for more explosive devices, and eventually locate a puddle of candy red blood, drying into a rusty, copper brown stain in the half-light of the moon.

He doesn’t think anything of it.

Why should he?

Most of the docks along the Seattle central waterfront are ferry terminals and cruise ship docks, the vestigial piers reclaimed for use as parks and boardwalks for tourists. But just to the south lies the container port yard, where most of the maritime trading in Seattle now occurs. As he approaches, the number of roofs he can travel across peter out, and Hemogoblin has to drop to the ground and sprint across the road, then scale the fence and neatly flip over the top into the container yard. He pays for the deft flip with a spasm of pain from his ribs when he lands hard on the other side, but he pushes through it, sticking to the shadows where the too-bright industrial lighting from overhead doesn’t quite reach.

He creeps through the rows, and knows when he sees a line of yellow police tape flapping in the slight breeze ahead that he’s at least in the general vicinity of the site of the showdown on Wednesday.

The line of tape has been cut.

Eyes narrowing, Hemogoblin rises up onto the balls of his feet, and continues down the row with more caution, listening carefully. The heavy, crunching tread of boots on gravel alerts him long before he sees the person round the corner, and he slips back into the narrow space between two containers like a sigh. Crouching in the shadows, he watches a cerulean-eyed troll stalk by the opening. The troll is in a black suit, which bodes very, very well. After one last disguise check – his false horn had nearly fallen off during the race to reach the docks earlier, and is still rather unsteady thanks to the crack running through it – he scales the towering stack of containers noiselessly, slithering on top of the stack and keeping his belly low against the roof of the container as he surveys the container yard from above.

And yeah, it’s still here. A squat, bulky container ship sits heavy by the loading dock beyond the rows of containers, its sides a rusty and nondescript maroon-brown mix, and the name at the prow just a string of letters and numbers in faded white paint, difficult to make out from this distance. More significant, to Hemogoblin at least, is the series of four containers that stand open in the harsh lighting, a few rows over from the clearing where the Crew had confronted Heir. Leaning to the side a little, he can see a black-clad figure standing guard, and the mysterious unlabeled crates within that had perked his interest the last time he passed through here.

He’d found this little setup while evading debris from the miniature tornado Heir whipped up Wednesday night. It had kind of slipped his mind afterward. Okay, fine, it was shoved violently to the side to make room for the extreme internal fangirling that ensued while he accepted Heir’s offer of partnership. Hey, he could either forget temporarily about the shipment of stolen goods that he’d assumed the police would find anyway, or he could squeal like a mewbeast in excitement and make himself look like a pancracked lunatic in front of Heir.

…He has his priorities, okay? And he really did have every reason to believe the cops who came to arrest the members of the Crew would at least bother to search the nearby shipping containers – isn’t that kind of investigation 101? But judging by the slightly scruffy black suits worn by the two trolls patrolling the rows and the female human guarding the open end of the large container, a wicked looking pistolkind in her hand, the police not only missed out on a few members of the Crew, they also forgot to check for and confiscate whatever stolen goods the Crew seem to be shipping out tonight. Sloppy.

But it may well pay off in the long run. Past-Hemogoblin’s forgetfulness means that current-Hemogoblin has an advantage he might otherwise not have. He may not have done it on purpose, but he can sure as hell work that angle if anyone tries to say otherwise. Clearly, he is a criminal activity predicting machine, and thanks to his innate talent for cunning, subtle manipulation and his associated degree in guilefoolery, he now has the Crew right where he wants them.

He searches the rows again, this time picking out the rumbling shape of a forklift as it returns from dumping off one of the suspicious containers on the deck of the squat shipping rig. He can’t identify who is driving it until it comes closer, at which point a human male leans out, signals at one of the patrolling Crew members, and trundles on to retrieve the next container. Hemogoblin growls under his breath.

Unfortunately, it doesn’t seem like Hearts Boxcars is here. Hemogoblin is painfully aware of how much slower his method of transit is across the city; he still gets chills when he remembers how it felt to fly with Heir, how quickly the ground had sped by beneath them as the wind ushered them along. But for whatever reason, Heir isn’t patrolling tonight. (Hemogoblin has accepted this must be the case by now, though it still worries him – how badly would Heir have to be hurt to be off the job on a night like this?) And given Hemogoblin’s much slower rate of travel, Hearts Boxcars should have beaten him here in a vehicle.

Hemogoblin eases forward to peer over the edge of the container stack again, very aware of the empty air behind his back. He hadn’t known how reassuring it was to know Heir patrolled the skies until that assurance was gone.

Then he hears a distinct, loud rattling, and he slithers backward to the center of his perch, raising his head to watch as the front gate of the shipping yard creaks open, admitting a pitch black car. The vehicle has neither plates nor identifying car brands on it. It drives to the edge of the narrower container rows before purring to a stop. The driver emerges first, and the human nods in familiar greeting to the Crew woman who steps out from the container to meet him.

The second person to exit the vehicle is Hearts Boxcars.

Hemogoblin shouldn’t have beat them here on foot, even if he did haul serious ass to make it on time. They must have stopped along the way, or maybe lost time evading police traffic stops or traffic cams. Either way, it looks as though Hemogoblin’s hunch has paid off. At last, something happens this catastrophe-riddled night that actually manages to go right. Hemogoblin lets a slow smile creep across his face as he silently observes the hulking form of Hearts address the gang members who gather around him.

"I want all of the goods outta here by dawn," Hearts is saying. "The boss wants us gone yesterday. And any damage to the goods I take outta your hides, got it?"

There is a chorus of "yessirs," and then the members of the Crew scatter, the guards helping the forklift driver to line up with one of the last containers.

So, the Crew is definitely leaving town, at least for now. Hemogoblin wonders if two encounters with Heir and being arrested were really enough of a turn off for them to completely give up, but it's not like he knows shit about how the inner workings of a criminal enterprise operate. Maybe they've decided Seattle is just too risky an investment, and have chosen to cut their loses.

Unfortunately for them, Hemogoblin takes exception to being blown up by a bunch of pansy-ass fuckwads. Maybe before he had hunted them down because they were particularly violent criminals who needed to be stopped; now he's more than a little pissed. And Karkat in a pissy mood doesn't let things go. If Hearts Boxcars thinks he can just sail out of this city without so much as a slap on the wrist, he had better think again.

Hemogoblin tracks the sentries one more time, memorizing their routes, and then lowers himself down the side of the containers to the ground.

Time to get to work.

He cultivates two blood sickles from his wrists, and finds that he has to adjust the angle of the one on his left wrist when the burns begin to prickle with pain. Swinging a few times to adjust to the change, Hemogoblin lopes down the row to where the first troll's route will cross his path. He presses himself into the space between two containers, a slightly wider passage than his last hiding place. He lounges against the side of the container, affecting carelessness, but keeping his luminescent eyes hooded so the slight glow won't give him away.

The troll strides by without looking at him. Hemogoblin simply steps out behind the sentry's back, leans back and plants a heel at the vulnerable base of the troll's skull. An "oof!" of pain escapes the sentry's mouth, but then Hemogoblin presses in close and wraps a hand over his mouth to muffle any warning shouts. There is no struggle from the troll, and abruptly he has an armful of sagging, unconscious dead weight to drag over into the shadows. He leaves the troll there and traces the maze of containers in his mind as he darts through the rows to intercept the second sentry.

This one causes more trouble. He'd been lucky to run into the green-blooded sentry first - the lower on the hemospectrum you go, as a general rule, the less stamina and strength a troll is capable of developing. In exchange, the warmer bloods tend to develop psychic abilities more often, and are more mentally stable and less susceptible to dementia.

But the second troll sentry is the cerulean from earlier, his eyes a dark enough blue for Hemogoblin to be wary. His abilities and training seem to have kept him on par with the fighting ability of most of the trolls Hemogoblin's fought and put in jail over the past few weeks, but he's still wary of challenging blues and above. If he tangles with them recklessly, he could easily spill more than a few drops of blood. Red eyes can be explained with contacts - candy red blood is a bit more of a stretch.

So when he locates the other sentry, he doesn't fuck around with the flashy kicks. He slinks in behind the blueblood and launches immediately into a chokehold, keeping his chin down to protect his windpipe and nose when the grubfucking dickweed tried to slam his head back into Hemogoblin's face. He keeps up the pressure on the artery running up the side of the troll's neck and his hand on the troll's mouth.

The troll bites him. Hemogoblin bites back a yelp of pain and tightens his grip, clinging to the cerulean blood's back as he tries to slam up against a container. He's tall enough that Hemogoblin's feet scrabble at the gravel on the edge of his toes. Finally, still fighting and shoving against Hemogoblin's grip, the Crew member falls forward to his knees. This is taking too long, they're exposed in the middle of the row, but the blueblood still won't stop.

The teeth stay clamped on Hemogoblin's hand even when the troll's head lolls forward, which is naturally the most fan-fucking-tastically unpleasant sensation to ever inflict itself on his hand. Grimacing, he peels the sentry's head back and prises his hand free, letting the blood pulse out and fill in the broken skin, easing the pressure on new bruises until his hand is unmarked again.

Somehow, he manages to drag the second sentry out of sight before anyone shows up. But his luck stops there. When he looks up out of the container he stuffs the unconscious body into, he has the unwanted pleasure of meeting the eyes of the driver from earlier, just as the man turns around the corner.

The man's mouth pops open and he shouts, "We have a hero over here!" Two pieces of metal slide out of his sleeves; a pair of knives fall into the driver's hands.

Shit shit shitfuckery. There goes his surprise advantage. Hemogoblin brings his sickles up on guard, sidestepping a little so he can check over his shoulder with the corner of his eye without looking away from his main opponent. The driver remains on guard as well, and there's something weird about that. Most of the Crew members are shoot first, ask questions later type thugs, in Hemogoblin's short experience; they seem to take after their rather violent boss in that respect.

So why does it feel like something is different about this one. Maybe it's the slightly higher quality of his suit, as though it is better tailored than the cheaper make most of the Crew members favor; maybe it's the weary, calculating look in the man's eye as he simply waits for Hemogoblin to make the first move.

As much as Hemogoblin doesn't want to run into some kind of trap, he can't wait around here forever. He's not letting this prick distract him while Hearts gets away. He grits his teeth and prepares to jump forward and to the side, to throw the driver off -

Hearts Boxcars himself rounds the corner behind the driver. "And what do we have here?" he says, walking up alongside the driver, eyeing Hemogoblin with a face that's a little worse for the wear since the showdown on Wednesday. "Great. You again."

Hemogoblin tenses up, and starts changing his game plan right the fuck now. He'd really hoped to whittle away the Midnight Crew in the area until he could focus all of his effort on Hearts alone; the man is too skilled a boxer for Hemogoblin to take him lightly.

"I can handle this one, sir," the driver says. To Hemogoblin's surprise, the man appears to be gritting his teeth, and he glances at Hearts impatiently.

The larger man fails to notice the irritation radiating off his underling in waves. "It ain't just the one. Where there's one of these bozos, there's two. Trust me, I'm not makin' the same mistake twice," Hearts grunts, eyeing the sky. "You can't underestimate these two lugs."

Hemogoblin doesn't let his relief show. If Hearts thinks Heir is in the sky to back him up, that means the Crew isn't responsible for the Heir's disappearance tonight. He can use that.
But he doesn't have Heir at his back, and he doesn't think much of his odds against both Hearts and a second man, going head to head. Instead, Hemogoblin smiles knowingly, raises his sickles - and darts back into the shadows.

He doesn't risk looking back, even when he hears shouts and the scramble of shoes on gravel behind him. He flings himself down the first narrow intersection he can find, and then the next, trying to lose Hearts's line of sight long enough to climb a container.

The first chance he gets, he takes it. One foot slips on the way up, and he just barely manages to swing his legs on top of the container before the driver squeezes through the passageway, panting. Hemogoblin allows himself a small smile; it looks like Hearts is just too bulky to shove his way through the tiny openings between containers and give proper chase. Good. Hemogoblin would prefer a one on one.

Hemogoblin tenses, ready to hook his legs over the edge and grab the driver from above, but the man swears and starts easing back out the way he came, too far away for Hemogoblin to reach.

He'll have to head them off again, before they reach the container ship. Who knows how many Crew members are manning the ship itself? No, he has to knock Hearts out before the nookstain absconds from Seattle and gets away with arson, theft, and two attempts at blowing up law-abiding heroes.

Seriously, fuck this guy. Hemogoblin is ready to vomit fury all over this guy and his fruity asshole shenanigans.

Descending from the container roof, Hemogoblin takes advantage of his slim build to keep evading the two men who are now searching the gaps between containers in earnest as they hurry through the main rows. Hearts and the driver meet up again before he can drop the second man, and he silently fumes as they stalk out toward the two remaining containers of contraband.

When he draws closer, he realizes their furious, whispered conversation is more of an argument. He lurks in the shadows nearby, easing his feet over the gravel to prevent the same crunch that keeps giving away the Crew's location.

"You need to go, sir," the driver is saying, his knives still held in a practiced grip. "It is my task to see you out of the city before dawn."

"And I'm tellin' yah, I leave when I leave. I ain't runnin' from these two little shits," Hearts snaps, impatiently waving the forklift into position. "I gave 'em more than enough warning. If they want to try this again, I'm gonna show them you don't mess with the Midnight Crew!"

"You can't," the driver insists, looking both anxious about contradicting his superior - at least, Hemogoblin assumes so - and yet irritated. "If you will not board that vessel of your own volition, I am to forcibly assist you. My lady Droog insists."

Dissent in the ranks? Hemogoblin snickers, kneeling in the gravel behind a container to observe.

"You think you can make me, you pompous deliveryboy?" Hearts says in a low voice. He reaches out with a thick hand and grabs the driver by the collar, yanking the shorter man upward until he's barely balanced touching the ground. "I'd like to see you try. You think Droog can tell me what to do?!

The driver just looks at him. "He would know," he says, quietly. "If you disobey him in this, he'll know. He always knows. And he wants the children alive. He wants you out of the field, and Lady Droog would rather not see what happens when he finally gets mad. And sir? He. Would. Know."
The air is tight with some tension Hemogoblin can't name, confused by who exactly this he could be. Then Hearts releases the man and loosens his own shirt, grunting and glancing around shiftily so that Hemogoblin catches sight of his face. He looks, Hemogoblin thinks, as though he's ready to shit bricks of solid fear. His ruddy face has gone pale and slick with sweat, and he looks ill.

"...Fine. Fine," is all Hearts says, and then he whirs on the forklift operator. "Hurry that up, yah dunce! What, do you have butterfingers?! We gotta schedule to keep!"

Well. That was...enlightening. Hemogoblin files this "he" and the name Droog away to wonder about later - right now, he has to focus on recapturing Hearts. Unfortunately, the next second, Hearts storms off toward the ship, stomping alongside the forklift, accompanied by the female guard with the pistols. It looks as though the driver has somehow won the argument. The driver himself scans the containers around him before striding back to the vehicle he escorted Hearts to the dockyard in. He flips away his knifekind and adjusts his suit jacket before entering. The car engines starts a moment later, and the driver veers back out of the container rows, heading back to the front gates. Apparently he still has some business in the city to deal with.

As long as that business doesn't involve blowing people and buildings up like a certain fucking maniac, he is officially less of a priority to Hemogoblin than said fucking maniac, who is currently heading for the ocean.

Fucking fuck fucker. He has to get ahead of Hearts before the gangster can surround himself with whatever backup is waiting for him on the ship. This would be so much easier if Heir really was here - Hemogoblin is painfully aware of just how much more time he wastes as he is forced to duck and weave between containers to avoid the pistolkind range of that female guard.

He doesn't make it in time. By the time he finds a vantage point near the old, barnacle-infested, unrepaired dock, Hearts Boxcars is already waving down another black suited-troll from the deck of the ship, who lowers the gangway and stomps down to listen to Hearts's whispered instructions.

Stealth isn't going to help him much anymore. Nevertheless, Hemogoblin waits until the woman with the pistols begins to scan the containers down the row from his location before he recklessly sprints out into the open. The troll from the ship gives a warning shout, but Hemogoblin is already kicking her legs out from under the woman before she can aim at him. He slams down on her wrist with a foot and twists to pin her other arm, ruthlessly slamming his palm into her chin when she tries to stand up.

When he rises, sickles growing from his wrists once more as he squares off against the forklift driver and the troll, he sees Hearts already has both feet on the gangway, striding up toward the ship. "Hey!" Hemogoblin shouts, and then he proceeds to (possibly, maybe, perhaps) overreact a tiny amount. "Get the fuck back down here, you nookwhiffing shithead!"

And wow, it's probably the massively inappropriate language that actually provokes Hearts into turning around, both eyebrows nearly disappearing into his hairline with mild surprise. "Wow. Got a mouth on yah, don't you, kid?" Hearts shakes his head. "Yeah. Nope." And on that note Hearts stomps up the gangway, disregarding Hemogoblin completely. "Keep him busy, boys."

Oh my fucking god, did he just get shot down by a fucking criminal dick with a heart fetish? Tell me that did not just happen. The forklift driver removes a fucking spear from within the driver's compartment, and the greenblooded troll from the ship draws a single wickedly sharp, curved bladekind from his side. Both of them come at Hemogoblin at the same time, and he loses track of Hearts's progress as he dodges their wild stabs.

Neither fighter is particularly skilled, not compared to Hemogoblin and his sickles, but they take up time, and Hemogoblin chafes at the delay because it's exactly what Hearts wants. By the time Hemogoblin brings the last Crew member to his knees and knocks the man unconscious with a boot to the temple, the gangway has already been drawn up, and the Crew's ship has begun to pull away from the dock. Hearts is going to get away.

Or maybe not, Hemogoblin thinks, spying a rope that trails down the side of the ship. Yeah, with enough of a running start, he could reach it. Probably.

Time to find out.

Fuck. He's going for it. Hemogoblin jumps over the fallen Crew member and runs as fast as his legs can carry him, the muscles in his side flaring with pain as he races along the edge of the dock. When he reaches the end, he leaps up and forward, and catches the rope trailing off the side of the ship with one hand. He goes spinning in circles around it, tangling the line around his fist and banging against the side of the ship hard before coming to a stop. With a grunt, he untangles himself and begins to drag himself up the side of the ship hand over hand, the muscles in his arms straining as the burn scabs crack. The ship continues to pull out into the middle of the water as he slowly makes progress.

The rope trembles menacingly, and Hemogoblin nearly loses his grip. He wraps his hand again before he looks up.

All the adrenaline dies away, and a stone lodges itself in his stomach as he looks up the last few yards at Hearts Boxcars's square face. "Well, well," the man says, leaning over the side. "Real cute, kid. I give you points for persistence, a'ight? But this is the end of your little adventure." He raises a wickedly sharp knife, one he had failed to reveal last time, and Hemogoblin clenches his jaw. The specibus must be borrowed, because it's clumsy in Hearts's hands, but he can still saw away at the rope with ease, causing more vibrations to run through the rope and jostle Hemogoblin.

"You're not going to get away with this," Hemogoblin says, and it's the most pathetic, clichéd stock phrase to ever crawl out of his mouth and die. Frankly, after a horrible line like that, he deserves to get cut down.

Hearts pretends to think this over. "Nah, I think I will. Looks like Heir decided not to show up, after all," he calls down, wearing a smug grin that just makes Hemogoblin want to rip the man's entire ugly face off and feed it to him. "Shame. Give him my regards, will yah?"

Hearts cuts the dragging line with a deft stroke of the knife, and then Karkat is plummeting toward the water. He barely has time to shout out in surprise and suck in a breath of air before he runs out of air to fall through.

He lands in the water with a hard splash. The momentum of his fall carries him down further than he expects, and when he waves a hand through the water above his head, he fails to find the surface of the bay. For a moment raw panic floods him, and his heart seizes up. It's dark and cold and he can't see which way is up. For all he knows, he could be frantically paddling in the wrong direction, going down instead of up, and he can't breathe -

Because his fucking costume is covering up the edges of his fucking mutant gills.

Jesus bumblefucking Christ, if Karkat dies because he made this goddamn suit too tight, he is going to shit on everything that moves. The left side of his suit is already fucked thanks to the shrapnel, so he tears at the fabric on that side first, ripping right up to where the candy red slits of gills cut their way across his upper ribcage. He gulps down nasty port water. It tastes like he's filtering solid pollution as it works its way through his system, but the resulting influx of oxygen in his bloodstream is far too welcome for him to care.
The suit is already fucked anyway. He cuts a new hole in the other side to let his other gills help take up the strain, and he blinks his eyelids rapidly, wishing he had the second set of eyelids that help true aquatic trolls see underwater. With the ability to breathe underwater thus reestablished, he can think a little more clearly, and stops panicking like a scared little wriggler.

Yeah, he has gills. He doesn't like to talk about them. They're yet more proof that he's the kind of mutant that's so fucking bizarre, it makes you question just what kind of illegal mind-altering drugs the mothergrub who mixed his gene slurry had to have been on at the time. Usually by the time a troll dips below indigo on the hemospectrum, the gills are vestigial and barely function, and by the time you hit olivebloods they don't develop at all. Somehow, Karkat has gills and the kind of internal vascular system that can filter oxygen from water, but he missed out on the webbing between fingers, the elaborate ear-fins, and, oh yeah, any one of the fucking blood colors that would have saved him a lifetime of living in fear of being culled.

What the fuck ever. Karkat shakes his head and begins kicking his way back to the surface of the water. He's a slow-ass swimmer, despite the gills, and by the time he makes up for all the time he lost flailing around drowning like a dumbass and breaks the surface of the water, his heart is sinking. He treads water, slamming a fist angrily and futilely against the rolling surface of a wave that overtakes him.

Hearts's ship is already halfway out of the port, kicking up waves in its wake that buffet Karkat and drive him back towards the dock.

There's no way he'll ever catch up before they hit open water.

As though the universe can't bear to let this momentous fucking failure end on such a devastating note, his cracked fake horn falls off a second later. The splash of water right in his eye just about sums up the general mood of his entire existence, and he spits foul port water out of his mouth, ignoring the horn as it vanishes into the depths.

Karkat is forced to watch as the Midnight Crew ship vanishes into the night.

Wow. Fuck this night. Fuck everything about this night. He's going the fuck home. Waterlogged and with half his costume shredded, Karkat swims for shore.

She carves the old symbol into the base earth of the city. The fleshlings have done their own work of cutting into the base earth and riddling it with tunnels, and she must waste precious time sealing off the pipes of filth-ridden water and draining power from cut wires that spit blue sparks. At one point she delves down to form the inner corner of an epicycloid curve, and finds to her distaste an entire metal tube of mewling humans speeding along beneath the earth. She loses her patience and gestures sharply. As one, her thorns reach down and scoop beneath the underground train.

She rips it out. It is longer than she expects, and the street crumbles and caves in along an entire block as the sectioned train is torn up through the pavement. One section of collapsed road intersects with the Grand Spirograph, and black, incensed fury consumes her in a wave of dark fire.

When the rage of the tanglehorde clears from her eyes, the train has been flung through the nearest building, lodging there with the bottom torn up by thorns. Blood and twisted metal hang down above the street, and screams echo within the tiny metal trap.

They are worth no more effort than that. Still crackling with rage, she returns to her work, carefully summoning a new carving spell to trace over the marred section of the Gate.
Everything must be perfect. They can afford no such flaws in the design. There are, after all, still rules that must be obeyed, covenants that must be fulfilled.

It does not help that the Noblest Gods have not been forced to make use of such a Gate in so many an eon. This is an elaborate work, and despite their many glorious, intertwined minds, a shared sentience beyond anything conceived of by mere singling quicklives, it remains...difficult to craft the old, hated symbol of the Spirograph, even in the service of the Eldest Gods. Destroying gates has always been a far simpler task for one such as she.

On a second flyover of the city, observing her work and noting the sections still left to be carved and consecrated, she sees it. The abomination. The wings are the wrong shape, more insectoid than cosmic, and the enormous statue bears a thorny crown and twin, slender horns that no angel ever bore, but the tangle within reacts with old hatred nonetheless. Screeching unintelligibly, she raises both hands and unleashes a wave of dark fire. It shreds through the coppery metal as though through flesh, and the wings are sheared away from the solitary metal form that the fleshcreatures have seen fit to erect in their harbor. Then, almost as an afterthought, she lands on the statue's shoulder and, with grimdark-laced hands, rips its head from its shoulders, tossing that too down into the muddy waters below.

Something tattered and pathetic in the corner of her mind thinks that this is a suitable ironic gesture, and then subsides into broken, ever weakening struggles.

Having thus satisfactorily defaced the Statue of Liberty and Equality in the name of both her mindrending Gods and that mysterious mistress of paradox space called irony, she smiles down at the ships fleeing from the tiny sub-island that served as base for the abomination, and turns to float above the city.

The butterfly wings of the statue topple over at last, sinking into the mud and kicking up a massive wave of displaced water that tosses the fleeing ferries and swamps some of the roads on the main island. She does not mind the rising waters, even as they begin to trickle into curves of the Gate. She prefers a cold-damp canvas for this glorious work, anyway, and the water will not interfere as metal or earth would.

And so it goes.

In a space that is not, between one world and the Void, there is Rose.

She thinks there will always be Rose, even when the thought of the name 'Lalonde' enrages her, even when all that is left of her is a sliver of pale light, a battered and brine-pickled husk that must watch as the grimdark swallows the world.

Sometimes she can feel the tentacles creep and crawl into what little of her own mind remains, and she must feebly shove them away, batter at probing thorns with lacerated hands. It hurts, it hurts, and she is so tired. Sometimes she thinks she has been tired her whole life, never sleeping, with the whispers of the Void ringing in her ears all those endless nights. And now she can only observe, feeling old down to her bones, as her body is used to create the Gate. Once the outline is finished being carved, it must be consecrated and opened, but now that Rose has given her consent, that consecration will only be a matter of minutes, rather than the hours that it would have taken up if they’d had to consecrate it the old fashioned way, with death and torture and sacrifice.

It isn't hard to extrapolate where such a grimdark construction will lead. Already the scent of cold and dark and brine hangs heavy in the air, so thick Rose can taste blood when she swallows. This will be a Gate to the Outer Ring. She has no idea of the distance, both in light years and across paradox space, that must be bridged in order to create such a portal, but the swelling tangle satiating itself upon her mind seems unquestioningly confident the summoning will succeed.

However, in the part of her that can still think, can still analyze, can still See, Rose has an inkling of a plan. And she has already set it into motion. Because the Horrorterrors may like to believe that they are absolute, but she herself has ignored and refuted their murmured urgings almost since she was born. She will not fall prey to this false dichotomy.

If they wish to believe the Horde is infallible, let them toddle along in their delusions. Rose is still Rose, and she will not let them win.

Perhaps it would be easier to give in and become one with the embrace at last.

When has Rose ever done what is easy?

And so, under the guide of drifting aimlessly through the tide, she paddles her way, slowly but surely, toward the pattern that occupies the center of the tangle, the loops and points and curves of the Gate.

The many-angled ones are just such - many angled, tangled and thorny and messy, with no order, the embodiment of chaos and death made sentient. She can see even now how the tentacles and stickers of the tangle clutch and writhe around the edges of the spirograph, and then are just as quickly pulled away. For whatever reason, the smooth order of the Gate is anathema to the Horrorterrors; they make use of it simply because they seem to have no other choice. Rose cannot comprehend all of the massive, overwhelming intelligence that controls the tangle, but she can see well enough how the Gods must fight their inner urge to tangle in order to keep the pattern of the Gate pure. Otherwise, the Gate will not open.

It is no more than a stray thought, a fledgling idea that she pours herself into. She masks it with blood and salt, and then marks it with a single beacon of light before setting it loose on the tide that swills and corrodes in tangles around the spirograph.

Just a simple thought. Just a tiny urge. As easy as breathing.

Rose smiles and falls away from the spirograph. She cannot let the tangle notice her near here, in case it realizes she and that subtle, slippery thought are one and the same.

That is the beauty of this plan. It demands nothing of the tangle that the Horrorterror does not already wish to do, the most insidious, corrupting kind of thought. It is the same method of gentle suggestion and tantalizing whispermurmur the Gods have used to entice and manipulate Rose her entire life. In hindsight, it is easy to see where they encouraged her alcoholism and fed her fury with her mother, to create that perfect moment of despair in which they could take over her body.

Surely turnabout is only fair play?

The pattern shines, order in chaos, a symbol balanced above the churning sea. The tentacles draw forward and abate, reach out to tear, then restrain themselves -
And then, with a shudder that rocks her mind and sends her spinning into the dark, the tentacles surge forward and embrace the spirograph. There is a keen of hungry, grim triumph as thorns wrap themselves around the curves of the Gate's image, and the bitter, distant pain of acid floods the waters of the deepdark.

As Rose watches, that perfect, unsullied pattern begins to melt and sag, dripping into the sea.

The tangle does not appear to recognize what horror it has wrought upon the Gate. It only follows its most primal instinct, after all, to bring chaos to order - why should that register in the hive mind as a breach, a failure? This is natural. This is acceptable.

Within moments, the same overwhelming force that tore the Seer of Light to shreds has also altered and distorted the Horde's only hope at a successful summoning into a warped version of its former self. The great spirograph lists to the side, slimy and scummy with brine and smears of grim dark.

Checkmate, Rose whispers to the Void, a soft sound audible only to herself.

She has no idea what such a damaged Gate will do once the unwitting Horrorterror has finished recreating the broken pattern in the streets of New York City. She would lay money on it all exploding rather disastrously, and she is well aware that she has condemned not just the island but any remaining inhabitants to almost certain death. At the very least, when the tangle realizes its failure, and the cause, it will turn upon what remains of Rose and finish the job of annihilating her individual identity. She will be Rose no more.

But she thinks that this sacrifice is well worth the price. If she had let the Gate be completed, the Horrorterrors would have flooded the world in their true forms, and more than just New York City would have burned.

Yes, this is...an acceptable outcome. The best possible future that she can See, in the dim pale light of her broken mind.

Rose closes her eyes, and lets herself drift away. She is so very tired, and now that she has done all she can, all she can do now is await the end.

She tears and carves with gleeful abandon. The perfect order of the Gate no longer seems quite so urgent a priority. She is so close to completing her goal, white fire drooling from her mouth as she lashes out with great vines of power. More and more often, she accidentally crushes the edges of stray buildings in her violent haste, but she simply knocks the debris out of her way and continues on.

When a tiny human bearing a camera rushes across her path, trying to conceal its pitiful form behind a fallen vehicle, she smiles and clenches her fist, shrieking with wild laughter as the camera explodes with dark fire in the man's hands. She does not even stop to watch if he burns with it. She floats upward, baring her teeth at the looming dark clouds of the sky.

She is so gloriously, gloriously close, and all her inhibitions are gone. This is so much fun!!!

And oh, she does. Does she ever. These pathetic fleshlings will never know what hit them when her work is done.
She fails to notice how her careful carvings begin to deteriorate and warp, the lines trailing off at loose ends and fading out as she begins to hack and tear at the earth indiscriminately. All she notices is an old and familiar hunger, the ever-present urge to DESTROY, to FEAST.

The urge, in short, to tag along.

Reaching out with all the tentacles at her disposal, she hurries to finish her work on the Gate. Hurry! For once the work is done, the Many may feast! They can clear the useless fleshy creatures away, and the great FEASTING may begin, free of the inconsequential mortal beings that paradox space holds so dear.

Unheard, unnoticed, a shred of a voice sighs into the grimdark waters with a an unseen smirk.

(checkmate, motherfuckers)

She has no idea that the Seer has already won.

Sneaking onto the runway at Hobby Airport is easy. I mean, Dave and his Bro, they’re basically the equivalent of the most badass ninjas ever. He’s only worried about John for a second; he turns around to face the fence they’d just hopped, expecting to see John failing every stealth check known to man, only to realize the other hero has disappeared entirely. He looks up and sees John hovering overhead, his face obscured behind the cheapass black rimmed swim goggles they had picked up from a sports store and a black scarf that had drawn the weirdest looks because hello, they’re in Houston in the bugfuck middle of spring. No one in their right mind is rocking a scarf at this point. The kid is so much of a goof out of uniform, it’s easy for Dave to forget he’s just as competent at the hero thing as anyone.

John lands and they all three run the rest of the way to the sleek, almost military-style jet idling illegally on the runway with the engines running. Bro seems to know where he's going, which is the only reason Dave actually trusts that this is the right private jet.

Once they’re up the gangway and inside, the pilot and copilot eye them through the open door of the front compartment before nodding and closing up the outside door as well, preparing for takeoff. “We should reach our destination in a little under two hours,” a troll informs them hurriedly as she strides through the most luxurious interior of a plane Dave has ever seen. Seriously, when Lalonde said private jet, she hadn’t been kidding. This place is decked the fuck out. “Please be seated for takeoff and landing. If you require anything, call me.” The troll disappears into the back and buckles herself in.

Apparently, they aren’t dicking around. The next second the plane jolts and starts rolling along under Dave’s feet. Shaking himself, he sees John aiming for the window seat by a large television screen. Bro has vanished, though how he’s managed it in such a confined space is a total mystery. Probably off to call the elder Lalonde again. For someone who claims to hate the dame so much, Bro sure has a lot to say to her, considering how tight-lipped and stoic as fuck the guy usually is.

Still. None of this had been in Bro’s plan. Dave had stared down Bro until he agreed they were going on this hella awesome rescue mission, not the other way around. Dave doesn’t think he’s ever disagreed with Bro like that and won – well, ever. Dave’s heart squeezes with elation, and he has to sit on the urge to throw a because damn. Damn. He is the one and only reason he’s here. And he is all for this new state of affairs. He is the Secretary of this State. Fuck yeah.
Of course, now they’re flying off to confront one of John’s old friends who is apparently possessed by tentacle monsters because some lady who calls Bro ‘Ambrose’ of all fucking things has asked them to. There is so much pure, unadulterated ‘what the actual fuck’ going on in that sentence than Dave doesn’t even know where to start.

Well, it doesn’t look like Bro is willing to be interrogated at the moment. John is probably an easier target anyway. Dave sprawls into a seat across from John, just as the jet takes off and he would have fallen over anyway, timing it so smoothly it looks like the last little jolt shoving him back and down into the seat is all part of the plan. Awesome.

He waits.

John stares out the window.

He waits.

John appears to have decided that the clouds slowly appearing through the window are the greatest thing since man first invented apple juice. Which is literally impossible, because no one can ever top that crowning moment of achievement. Ever.

“John.”

John blinks, looking startled, as though he were so engrossed in the sky outside the window that he hadn’t noticed Dave sit down. Eh. Doesn’t matter. Dave’s smooth moves aren’t for an audience – they’re a one-man ritualistic offering to irony, goddess that she is.

“Dave,” he says in reply, a faint smile flickering across his face before he shuts down again, with an intense, far off gaze that hones in on the sky outside the window. It’s not quite the weariness that makes Dave want to hug the sadness out of the kid, but it’s only a few shades off from the mask that he’s seen John wear when he’s trying to hide that fatigue in front of a crowd. The kid has his hands folded up in his laps and he’s sitting straight up like he’s sitting before an audience, making no effort to make himself comfy for the two hour flight.

“Something fascinating out there?” Dave asks. “I mean seriously man, how can you bear to look away from the face of a Strider? This is some Bernini-quality anatomy here and you’d rather cloud-watch?”

John bursts out into laughter, and immediately tries to choke it back, snorting behind a hand he claps over his face. “Oh my god, Dave, where do you even get this stuff from?” he laughs. “Sorry John, this is 100% homegrown Strider, my man. All original material, all the time.” Dave slouches in his seat, letting his legs stretch out into the aisle. “Totally au naturel. Now come on, John. Talk to me about this Rose chick or something. Do the conversation thing.” He wants to stop doing the majority of the talking now. John has really good ears. Eventually he has to notice something is up.

“Sorry, Dave,” John says as though on automatic, tugging his wandering eyes away from the clouds. “Ah, what do you want to know? Because honestly if we should be asking anybody around here questions, we should be asking your brother or Doctor Lalonde. I don’t even understand half of what was going on in there. I didn’t even know Rose had powers, or that she was Seer of Light all this time.”

Interesting, but not unexpected. Dave had kind of already figured John didn’t know about little Lalonde running around playing hero after the kid nearly collapsed in shock on their shitty sofa. “All those years running around being adorable little friendderps and holding hands, and you never once suspected she could grow space tentacles? She never realized you float when you’re winning at video games?”

John flushes. Dave wishes he could count it as a point to him, but he's long since realized that playing the game against someone who isn’t a Strider, and therefore isn’t even trying to pretend they don’t have feelings all the damn time, renders the game kind of moot. “I do not float, man. Do I?”

John flips into earnest anxiety, searching Dave's eyes with a worried expression. Doesn’t he get whiplash, changing his expression that dramatically every two seconds? Dave hadn’t noticed it as much yesterday, but damn, is John easy to read. “Dude, I play video games with – people who don’t know, I can’t have been floating all that time or they would have noticed.”

“Chill, John, you only did it the once.” Dave allows himself a victory smile when John splutters out another protest. “I’m fucking kidding, bro. We haven't even done a proper video game faceoff, how the fuck would I know about your floating tendencies in the long term.” Dave begins tapping out a beat with his foot. Between John's sudden arrival and last night's exhausting shenanigans, he hasn't had time to work on his sick beats in almost twelve hours. He's getting antsy. "But seriously, neither of you knew about the other?”

John pulls a face and leans his head against the window, tangling his fingers together. “I – look, it's called a secret identity for a reason, you know. My dad had been teaching me to keep my powers a secret from everyone since I was, like, five years old. He discouraged me from getting friends all through elementary school because he was afraid I’d forget and want to show off in front of other kids.” John shakes his head, looking confused. “But now it turns out that Doctor Lalonde knew all along, I guess? She and Rose moved into town in the third grade, and I just – wanted to be friends with someone, finally. And my dad said it was alright if it was Rose.”

Dave raises an eyebrow at that. "Really? Damn. I mean, obviously they were in some serious cahoots, right? Mom Lalonde clearly knew all along about you, and who else would give her the lowdown?"

John nods, frowning. "I didn’t even question why some girl from out of town was a safe choice for a friend. But you're right - I think maybe my dad and Doctor Lalonde knew each other even before the Lalondes moved in. Knew about the two of us, and trusted each other enough to discuss that information, even if they never talked about it where we could hear."

Dave scans the plane, but there's still no sign of Bro. Like that's unusual. "Bro, too," he adds in an undertone, even though he's resigned to the fact that Bro can probably hear him anyway. The man is fucking psychic or something. "Or at least, he and Lalonde go way back. I mean, fucking Ambrose? No wonder he tried to bury that one."

"He talked to my dad, too." John folds his arms over his chest, then grimaces, tugging at the collar of his borrowed suit jacket. He opens his mouth, but Dave beats him to it with a raised eyebrow and a slight smirk. John shuts his mouth and goes red again, pouting. Heheh. No one complains about borrowed Strider swag, not while Dave's here to taunt them about it. "And Dad wouldn't talk about it when I asked him what it was all about. Said it wasn't safe to discuss anything over the phone." John huffs. "They all have a lot of explaining to do. But I don't think we can bug them about it right now. We have to focus on saving Rose."

Dave remains silent when John gets his thinking face on, and starts drumming on the armrest with his fingers, running through the beat for Poker Face.

...Shut up. It's not even ironic at this point. It's a sick, sick addiction that will drive him, alone and unloved, to an early grave. At least maybe he'll have John to give a kickass eulogy, even if Bro will probably show up fifteen minutes late on a shitty skateboard with Starbucks -

John leans his head against the back of his seat and starts talking again, interrupting one of the most depressingly funereal tangents Dave has ever gone on. "Anyway. Me and Rose just spent the next six years being best friends, apparently never once letting it slip that we were both…different.” His face falls even more. “And I definitely never knew about this grimdark thing. I mean, Rose used to talk about her cat – I think she called him Jaspers. But she always told me he died when she was 4 years old. She was four the last time this grimdark thing happened? I mean…that’s horrible. I can’t even imagine being possessed and losing control of my body that way. For a little kid – god.”

John trails off, and then he’s looking out the window again, a little crease of worry between his eyebrows. And yeah, okay, that kind of had been a conversation killer. Dave is very careful not to think about how it would feel to have your body possessed, to be forced to march along to someone else’s commands, merrily wearing your meatsuit as they drive you to an early grave, damning you and everyone around you, while all you can do is scream inside and watch as you - you - you -

Yeah, he’s not thinking about this. He’s forgetting it ever happened at all. He’s –

-When Dave comes too, the plane is at a really weird angle, and it takes him a few blinks before he realizes someone is shaking his shoulder gently. If it had been Bro, he'd just have shoved Dave out of the seat entirely without a word. “Hey, Dave, are you still zoned out?” John asks, leaning over in his seat with a worried expression behind his clear goggles.

Dave grunts in response, mind slowly kicking back into gear, just in time to feel every bone in his body creak. Chrriiiist. Had he really just passed the fuck out while sitting upright like that? He feels like he’s been to the fifth dimension and back, and whatever he met there kicked his ass ten ways to Sunday. Seriously, if sleeping upright leave him feeling like he has fucking osteoporosis, he’s sticking to horizontal siestas from now on. He can still feel the headache from earlier edging in, because tapping your fingers isn't exactly a work of musical genius. He needs his turntables like he needs air, but oh fuck, look who decided to go on a cross-country road trip to rescue some broad from tentacle monsters. He couldn't even bring any sick beats - his iPod got wasted last night when Bro had torn him a new one for keeping his pesterchumhood with Heir a secret. Way to plan ahead, Strider.

Then he looks out the window and realizes why they’re all leaning at a funky angle, and why he’s half slipping out of his seat. “We here already?” he asks, not wiping at his bleary eyes until John glances out the window himself, giving him a second to recover his composure. Naps always knock him for a loop.

“Yeah, we are,” John says, his voice grim as he turns back to the window. “And you might want to see this.”

Dave surreptitiously hooks a leg around the edge of the seat to keep from slipping any further, feeling like a stealthy genius, and puts his face to the window.

New York City looks...a little worse for the wear. For one thing, enormous black thunderclouds tinged with sickly green and bruise purple have swollen up overhead, taking up the entire sky. Their plane is looping in a wide circle around the worst of it, aiming for a small runway to the northwest of the swirling vortex. Every so often, a crackle of thorny black lightning rises up from the city itself, and another building bites the dust. Shit, there isn’t even going to be a city left by the time this chick
He whistles. "Wow. She really did a number on the skyline, didn’t she?" He narrows his eyes and frowns, squinting at the tiny figure out in the harbor. "What the fuck did she do to the Statue of Liberty and Equality? I mean, aside from the head." He wonders if grimdark monsters have a sense of irony, because it so, 10/10, well done tentacle dudes. Classic. "It’s different, I can tell, I just can’t put my finger on it…”

John cranes his neck to the side to get a better angle. "It was those troll wings they sometimes pupate with. Looks like she cut them off. I wonder why.”

"Yeah, maybe," John murmurs.

When they disembark at the Newark airport, as close to the chaos in Manhattan as the pilot is willing to land, a woman who can only be Doctor Rue Lalonde is waiting for them on the runway. The storm from the island sends gusting winds flying everywhere, kicking up the doctor's pristine white lab coat and fluttering the edges of her military, high necked fuchsia dress. She raises a flask in one hand and tosses back a good shot of unidentified alcohol even as Bro disappears from the gangway and reappears before her, arms folded.

A stray breeze slams into Dave sideways when he's halfway down the walkway, and he has to brace himself as discreetly as possible by grabbing the hand rail, his hair flying in his face. Fuck everything.

Abruptly, everything goes still. Rue Lalonde's hair settles down into messy blonde, bobbed curls, and a soft smile spreads across her face, aimed behind Dave. He turns his head slightly to see that John has exited the plane, one hand raised in a tight fist as he frowns up at the sky. The wind lashes one last time, then wraps around him and settles.

So, the windy thing has mundane applications as well. Kick ass.

Dave slouches down the rest of the stairs with more finesse. Need to make a good first impression on elder Lalonde.

Well. First impression that Dave can remember. Shit, this lady probably saw him in diapers or some shit. Bro has some serious explaining to do.

"Mom Lalonde," is all Dave says, sticking his hands in his pockets. That earns him a startled, though pleased smile, which is - really fucking weird. Yeah. He takes a small step back and refrains from letting his very fucking weired-out expression show.

John stops next to Dave, folding his arms. He looks solemn, almost stern. "Doctor Lalonde," he says evenly.

"Dave. John." The doctor hesitates, then smiles again. "Or it's Heir at the moment, yes? It's been too long, both of you.”

"Not long enough," Bro mutters. "Can we hurry this up, Lalonde? Eventually your kid is going to get tired of restricting herself to one little island. Unless you've figured out why the fuck she's so fixated on it in the first place?"

Rue's gaze lingers on Dave and John for a long moment. Long enough for it to get awkward. Dave bristles, his shoulders hunching reflexively under the sustained scrutiny. John breaks first, though. "Doctor Lalonde, I'm not gonna lie. I'm pretty mad at you right now, and when this is over, one way or another, I'm coming to see you. You have some explaining to do about how you justified abandoning Rose like you did."

You fuckin' tell her, John. Dave nods slightly. He doesn't even know this Rose chick, and he can still see that elder Lalonde fucked up somewhere along the line. Seriously, when your kid ends up possessed by raving tentacles gods from beyond the stars, something is seriously fucked about how you raised them. Or failed to raise them, as the case may be. Hell, Bro might be a shitty example of guardianhood, but at least he's always, you know. Been there.

Doctor Lalonde flinches, closing her eyes. "Yes, we do owe you children some answers, don't we?"

"Speak for yourself," Bro says.

"But not now." The doctor shakes her head and opens her eyes. "The Horrorterrors will not leave the city. I did not realize why, at first, when they'd already proven capable of devastating a straight line between here and Albany, but it's clear they have some design on the city. Literally." She reaches into her pocket with the hand not occupied with a flask and holds up a photograph. "This is the last image of the city a helicopter crew was able to obtain before being shot down. Ambrose, I'm certain you recognize the pattern?"

Dave picks out the pattern immediately, though he doesn't really know what to call it. Half of the overhead view of the city is full of looping curves and rounded triangles, like a huge-ass stylized flower or a star. It is elegant, precise, and ominously familiar, causing a sickening lurch in Dave's gut that he can't explain, all of it carved straight through to the earth below without a care for buildings or roads that get in the way.

The other half looks like a preschooler looked at that elegant, spiraling star, and began to fingerpaint the same design using broken fingers and a very sketchy definition of straight lines. Several ends trail off into the water without connecting properly to the rest of the design, and a large, wriggling line cuts right through the middle, at a right angle with the rest of the shape.

Overall, it's a pretty shitty design.

"What, did they drink a liquor store before they started?" Bro snarks. "No wait, that's something you would do, Lalonde."

The doctor ignores him, putting away the picture. She smiles with a distinct aura of pride. "No. I believe Rose is still fighting. If they're trying to complete a perfect spirograph, they have failed miserably. The Horrorterror's movements have grown more and more erratic over the past two hours, and they have made no effort to correct the gratuitous mistakes being made to the other half of the pattern. Rose has outwitted them, somehow. And I trust in her. Whatever the many-angled ones intended with this pattern, it will inevitably fail."

"They're not going to be happy about that, are they?" John interrupts. "Whatever the heck this thing does, when it doesn't work, they'll know who to blame."

"No," Doctor Lalonde admits. "They won't be pleased at all. Which is why it would be best for all involved if you three can help Rose before they try to activate that thing." She pats a large, grey container sitting at her side, and slides open a keyboard attached to the side. She keys in a code and the container beeps. The top opens up with the whoosh of air entering a vacuum, to reveal a pair of metal bands encased in foam.

"And what do these do?" Dave asks. "Do we walk up to Miss Evil Congeniality over there and offer her the latest spring trend in accessories?"

Doctor Lalonde hiccups, and drinks from her flask again before she answers. Seriously, this woman must have the liver of a fucking Russian sailor to still be coherent after drinking all morning long. "These are restraints of my own design," she slurs afterward, leaning a little heavily on the container. "They are imbued with several elements that have proven efficacious in suppressing the whispers of the Furthest Ring in the past. Rose has taken medication with the same properties to assist her in meditation all her life, though I should have anticipated that she might stop taking it in my absence. All you really need to do, in essence, is get close enough to attach these. However, the problem is the approach. The Horrorterror will fight you every step of the way, unless you can reach Rose somehow and have her assist you from within."

Bro has the cuffs in his hand between one second and the next. He stares at them hard behind his shades, before raising his head to stare at Doctor Lalonde. "A'ight," is all he says.

Doctor Lalonde facepalms. "Just say it, Ambrose, I know how you think. I know what you're going to say."

"Fine, woman. Just how do cuffs imbued with the essence of nothingness help suppress 'emissaries of the Void'?"

"That title is a common misconception, one I would be happy to explain to you at our leisure after Rose is no longer wreaking havoc on New York," Rue snaps. "You may not care about her wellbeing after all these years, but she is still ou-"

"Okay, okay, fuck, Lalonde, we're going." Bro raises both hands as though to ward off the doctor's ire.

John, meanwhile, has one eye scrunched up, clearly thinking hard. "How do you imbue something with nothi-"

"Not enough time." Doctor Lalonde snags the cuffs from Bro's hands and holds them out to John. Dave blinks. Did - did she just steal something from Bro? Did Bro...let her? Or was she really that fast?! Because holy shit. "Rose is likely to let you get closest, Heir," she says. "She barely knew Dave as a child, and her memories of you are more recent, and more positive. Just remember - it has to be both restraints. One will weaken the grimdark significantly, but the two is the only thing that can shut the Horrorterrors down long enough to get her to an isolation tank."

"So. If this half-assed, really vague plan works, where exactly are we taking Little Miss Sunshine?" Dave asks. "Do we just drag the ticking time bomb out and toss her on the private jet?" Seriously, why does he have to ask all the important questions, here?"

"I thought I'd fly Rose out if she can't move afterward," John admits, shrugging as he stuffs the restraints in the inner pockets of his costume. Those pockets are never going to be the same. Dave can see seams tearing from here. Urghh.

"Fuck, just for that, you get to carry her, little bro," Bro adds.

"That is a good question," Doctor Lalonde says. She looks almost...approving? Huh. "I have recently enlisted a new friend who will drive a safe van for you to transport Rose in. She delivered a letter to Rose at my request that may have...helped trigger this incident. She was only the Messenger, but she has insisted on serving as your Personal Motorist on your way out of the city as a way of restoring her honor."

Oh man. John and Bro's expressions don't change - like Bro's expression really ever changes, anyway - but Dave recognizes the emphasis on those capitalized letters. "She a carapacian?"

Doctor Lalonde outright grins at that. "Very perceptive of you," she murmurs. "Yes, PM is a pale carapace, and has proven very reliable thus far. Her priority will be on escorting you three and Rose out of the city. Is that all?"

"Yeah." John opens the palm of one hand, and a whistling wind begins to pick up around him as he yanks up the bright white hood of the suit jacket. Every trace of that goofy kid from Pesterchum is gone, and even in red, black, and white instead of grey and blue, this is Heir. "Let's go."

Heir flies them to New York City. It's a fucking weird experience, and Dave doesn't like it. Yeah, he basically trusts Heir not to drop them or anything like that, but the winds kicked up by Rose's rampage fight Heir at every turn, which makes everything kind of wobbly and really fucking nerve-wracking when you're flying three thousand feet in the air, just below the leading edge of a pitch black thunder cloud. Seriously, flying from the grey cloud cover over Newark to the grimdark storm over Manhattan and Brooklyn is like crossing into the Twilight Zone or some shit.

Heir keeps flying them lower and lower, closer to street level as they draw nearer to the purplish, thorny lightning that occasionally lights up over Central Park. The western half of New York City falls under the messy, preschool half of the design, and it looks like the Horrorterror is still hard at work carving its messed up spiro-thing into the Upper East Side and the waterway between that and Astoria. Midtown is a fucking wreck when Heir has them touch down on Fifth Avenue. The people apparently had time to clear out, but there aren't that many bodies lying around, but there are more than a few smoking, overturned cars here and there with splatters of - yeah, that's blood. Dave has to look away. Blood isn't his thing, okay? Unless it's, like, the righteously spilled blood of his enemies. Jeez.

Bro has been taking this whole flying-thing like a fucking champ, jaw clamped shut and katana at the ready the entire time Heir insisted it was the quickest way to reach Manhattan, and while Dave needs to wipe sweaty palms on his pants, Bro looks as chill as ice cubes. Dave just can't match the guy in terms of net coolness. He's fucking inscrutable, even as he flips off his shades to reveal a pair of sicknasty orange-yellow eyes. That's Dave's cue, so he loses his shades as well. It's so fucking dark under the cloud cover, being outside doesn't even make his eyes water as he adjusts. Oh my god, he relocating to fucking Canada or something, this is so much better than running around Houston in the sun with his eyes aching all the damn time.

"Alright, you guys. What's the game plan?" Heir asks, studying the dark tentacles of power that eat their way up to the sky in the distance. "Doctor Lalonde seems pretty sure these grimdark things are going to try to kill us, even if I do manage to get through to Rose. Should we just try to distract her from finishing that spirograph -"

"Yeah, no. As fun as relying on the power of heart sounds, I think I'll pass." Lil Cal wraps itself over Bro's shoulder, and Dave shivers against his will. Fucking fuck, he'd hoped Bro had left that puppet asshole back at the apartment. Out of all of Bro's puppetkind, Lil Cal has won the prize for 'most likely to come to life in the middle of the night and stab the shit out of adorable, unsuspecting little brothers' every year since Dave came up with the award. "You can talk at her all you want, kid. I'm going in for an all-out beatdown. Cuff her if you can, but I'm not standing around while you try talking to someone who might now be there anymore."

"Doctor Lalonde thinks she's in there," Heir argues. "And she knows more about this than we do."

Bro shakes his head. "We can't dick around, kid. People have been dying out here."

"You think I don't know that?!" Heir yells. Then his face goes pale, and he grabs at his chest and oh my fuck it's finally happened. Bro has given John a rage heart attack. "Will you just stop -" he wheezes out, as Dave flashsteps to his side, internally freaking the fuck out because what do you do when a hero has a heart attack? Dave's first aid training does not extend to rage aneurysm and that kind of bullshit.

Then Heir vanishes, just as Dave's about to grab his shoulder and try to snap him out of it.

What.

He pops up again right in front of Bro's face, eyes gleaming blue and one fist raised. "You dick!"

Bro catches the fist and tosses Heir over his shoulder. The wind catches the kid before he hits the ground and Heir stays hovering on his back for a moment before landing on his feet, rubbing at his chest with a weird expression. "Seriously, can you stop doing that? How do you keep pissing me off so much that - that happens?"

Bro smirks. "It's a talent. Now, stay angry, kid. Your little party trick will come in handy."

"Why do we always choose the path of most asshattery?" Dave demands, throwing both his hands up. "Oh my fucking god, Bro. Bro. Seriously. You couldn't just say to the guy, hey? You know what would be good? If you remember that when you Hulk out you start teleporting and shit. And. You know. That would be a useful skillset to have. Can we just communicate like sane people for once in our lives? And not give people rage heart attacks? Just, you know. A fucking suggestion."

"No," Bro says bluntly.

Well then. "Oh my god, fuck all this," Dave mutters to himself, and then he flashsteps down the street, racing around piles of vehicles and shattered pavement.

He can't even handle these raging asshole shenanigans anymore. Cannot. Even.

He's crunching over a block of broken glass when his keen Strider-senses notice Heir has caught up. The other hero is flying ten feet above the ground on the other side of the street, soaring right over all the masses of debris Horror-Rose has kicked up, and he nods when Dave catches his eye. He looks drawn and pale, possibly from the recent ragefest, but also determined. Bro is nowhere in sight, and right now, that's exactly how Dave likes it.

The most unnerving part is the silence. Aside from the faint rustle of Heir's breezes and the sound of Dave's own buzzing, raspy breath echoing from the collar on his throat, there's no sound; even as Dave darts across glass shards and jumps the wide crevasses the grimmdark has carved into the road, he doesn't make much sound as he moves. He's not on Bro's level, but he's as stealthy as he needs to be.

But you'd expect with a giant tentacle monster in the body of a teenage girl rampaging around the city, there'd be more noise - eldritch chants, the screams of innocent victims, a really badass soundtrack. Instead, there is the silence, and every so often, the faint rumble of thunder overhead that sounds, in the back of Dave's mind, a little like the ocean.
To be honest, it makes him feel a little sick. The closer they get to the dark tentacles arcing out over the park, the more the pressure in the air rises, pressing in against his skull, as though they're underwater. It doesn’t make any sense, but hell, does anything about this trip make sense?

They're about on level with the Metropolitan Museum of Art when the writhing grimdark overhead shudders to a halt. Dave freezes in place, ready for an attack.

Without any sound or warning, the entire clump of tangled thorns in the sky lashes out, stabbing into a building up ahead. It appears that the Horrorterror in little Lalonde has taken offence against the Guggenheim, as the tangle of grimdark proceeds to rip at the swollen roof and curved walls of the building, with bolts of dark thorns and white fire firing off at random. Jesus Christ, is not even art sacred anymore? What next, the Louvre?

"Shit. Flashstep, hey. Shit. Dave?!

Dave snaps out of it. What a time to zone out. Heir lands next to him, staring at the Guggenheim with horror. "Yeah?" Dave says, wanting to smack himself. "Sucks, man. I never even got to visit that place. NYC is kind of out of my jurisdiction, but hey, I at least thought I'd try to drop by at some point. See all the pictures and shit."

"Dave, that's not what I'm talking about. Can you hear that?" Heir is starting to float again, his whole body going tense.

It's contagious - Dave is starting to freak out now, too. "Hear what?" he asks, his skin crawling as he tries to hear anything over the crunch of tentacles slamming into rock.

"PULNYESLESHLINGS"

And oh fuck he heard that shit shit shit -

Dave claps his hands over his ears, but it doesn't do shit. That voice pierces into his brain, an absolute whisper that bursts into dark thorns behind his eyes. He's thought he'd had headaches before, but they're nothing compared to the ice picks being drilling into his skull with every word that broken, cold voice speaks.

Beside him, Heir winces, but then recovers. Fuck, how can he stand hearing this godawful noise? It seems like it's barely affecting him.

"Dave, I hear screams," Heir says. "I think there are still people in there!"

Well, fuck.

"We have to get them out!" Heir shoots forward, flying right at the grimdark thorns. Yeah, that's Dave's cue to move. He rips his hands away from his ears - it's not helping anyway - and runs after Heir, just barely able to keep up with flashsteps. As they get closer, he starts to hear multiple high-pitched screams, something separate from the constant white noise of the grimdark muttering in his head.

Oh hell, it's kids. Evil-Rose has a bunch of kids pinned down in that museum.

"HMMEWHEREDIUYYOU*G*Ω?WO*N*TYOÜCOM*E*BA*CK*À*MD*E*MY*FR*S?" There is an unearthly shriek of rage (finally!) and the thorns explode outward, tearing the whole roof off the building in one go. Dave has nearly caught up, and Heir is already on level with the grimdark tangle, darting to get between it and the interior of the museum in a flurry of wind. Dave can only assume he's trying to distract the Horrorterror from the kids, wherever they ended up -

Later, he can't say what made him stop and look to the side as he comes up next to the Guggenheim. A lot of this time travel shit is full of weird coincidences and happenstance like that, and it annoys the hell out of him. All he knows is that he looks to the side for the briefest moment, and catches a flare of crimson from the corner of his eye. He stops and looks again properly.

A future-Dave lurks in the shadows between one building and the next. And he's really recent too, because his outfit is basically the same as Dave's right now, without even any damage or tears or anything. His upper lip looks messy with blood.

Oh. Great. Now he's going to have to deal with goddamn fuckass time shenanigans in the middle of a goddamn crisis? It's like Christmas came early. "What now?" he hisses at other-him.

Other-Dave holds up ten fingers. "Go. Like, right now, bro. Ten minutes, send them out the back door along East 88th and tell them to go around on Madison Avenue. Do not fuck around, do not pass Go, just - go."

The problem with time travel is, this all means that Dave has to obey, even though future-him is the shittiest explainer ever. He is actually ashamed that he is going to be that uninformative in ten minutes from now. "Sorry, Heir," he mutters, and then he brute-forces his way into his time powers, narrowing his mental focus down from stop to reverse.

As always, there is a brief moment of inexplicable, overwhelming pain, as his throat seizes up and he gasps for air that can't reach his lungs, a white-hot line of pain running through his throat right beneath the collar.

In that moment, he sees the figures moving behind future-him, a group of tiny little midgets running through the alley and taking off away from the grimdark disaster.

Hang on. Wait. Hold the fucking phone. They aren't midgets -

- rescue the little shits!

That thought finished, Dave checks his surroundings, trying to orient himself. He's come out ten minutes ago in the same place he left from, but the museum before him is no longer in ruins; several windows are shattered, but the roof and everything else is still in tact. As he takes a measuring glance behind him at the park, he can see that the grimdark tangle is still in the distance, working its way across the park's reservoir. Without Heir's influence, the wind is at gale-force again, and Dave has to blink and shield his eyes when he gets a faceful of dust and debris. Fucking fuck. Shaking his head, he runs for the front door of the Guggenheim. Time to get the kids out of the fucking line of fire.

The front doors are gone. He spies them lying on the floor in the center of the lobby as he rushes in. He's flashstepping to wring the most movement out of every second that he can, but this museum is huge. Scanning up the levels of ramps visible from the lobby, he grimaces and cups his hands around his mouth. "Hey! Kids! Small human beings! Yo! I am here. You could in fact say that I am here to save you!"

Nobody answers. Dave is painfully aware that if he has to spend the next eight minutes searching the entire museum for wherever these little shits have been hiding through the entire attack, he's going to be cutting this escape pretty damn close. The evil-Rose is gonna lay down some unholy wrath on this place in five minutes, at the least.

He has the small measure of security in that he has already witnessed the children successfully escaping behind his future self. But that doesn't really help him right now.

He starts running up the ramp, the collar around his neck heating up steadily as he is forced to continue to shout. Fuck, he hates yelling. "Come on, you have to get out of here! Fuck, do you not have adult supervision or something? You have to come downstairs, we're going out into the street on the side - I know you're in here!"

"Who are you?" a voice demands. It isn't a little kid's voice either. Up ahead, a woman in thick glasses peers out of an exhibit hall.

"The asshole who's here to save you, obviously." Dave skids to a stop in front of the hall. At first he can't see the kids - then he's sees that they're all huddled up against an inner wall, underneath a bunch of tables that look as though they've been dragged from all over to form the shelter. He rounds on the teacher. "Look. Lady. The great big evil - uh, thing is coming to tear this building apart. In like. Two minutes. So we really need to hurry this up and get the shrimps out of here."

"The streets have been too dangerous!" she protests. "Most of the bridges to the mainland are too damaged for my students to cross."

"Well, fuck me sideways, lady -" says Dave, gritting his teeth. The timer he has counting down in his mind isn't looking too promising.

"I mean it, there's not going to be a building here really soon, so however dangerous the streets are, you have to risk it. Alright, so can we go now?"

"I suppose -" the teacher begins shakily.

She never gets a chance to finish.

With an enormous thunderclap, grimdark tentacles smash through the glass ceiling of the lobby. Dave shoves the teacher forward, away from the ramp that runs in a spiral around the interior lobby as glass and tentacles rain down. Then, in a rush, the tentacles rip back up, missing Dave by mere feet that he flashsteps just in time, taking part of the exhibit hall's roof with it. Suddenly, with the upper floors and roof torn away, he can see the sky above, the heavy thunder clouds now centered over the museum. He can see the grimdark cluster as it slowly descends to hover above the gaping hole in the roof.

And for the first time since they arrived in New York, Dave sees the thing inside Rose Lalonde, face-to-face. It is far worse than it appeared on the grainy video footage. The thorny tentacles have grown so thick over the past few hours that her form can barely be distinguished from the grimdark wrapped around her. White fire bleeds from her eyes, but there is something behind the blaze, something bloody and dark and writhing and aware -

"PU'N Y LITTLE F'REE SHITNGS" she says, smiling with an open mouth and bared teeth. The pain is unbelievable, even worse the second time around, perhaps because this time Dave is actually part of the group she's speaking directly too, rather than just overhearing the words from a distance. He feels blood start oozing out of his nose.

He already knows she's going to speak once more, and then begin ripping the building apart in earnest.

They need to be gone. Now. And they can't go down the interior ramp.

"Emergency stairwell. Now. Right the fuck now," he rasps. He yanks time to a stop and grabs the teacher.

As tenta-Rose lifts a hand, sickly purple light gathering in her palm, he has the teacher at the back wall, by the students. The children are all screaming, have been screaming all through the destruction to be honest, the noise that drew Heir's attention earlier/now.

Thank god they're at the back of the hall. Thank any god listening they're all huddled right next to the emergency stairwell. Between each time stop he grabs as many kids as he can carry, yanks them out from under the tables, and starts throwing them down the stairwell.

Hey, Bro threw him down the stairs all the time as a kid. Kids are resilient, right?

Okay, yeah, he probably shouldn't have thrown them. Oops. Too late. "Go go go, lady," he yells grabbing the teacher by the shoulder and pushing her into the stairwell, too. Most of the kids are running down the stairs already - thank god, they're little shits, but they're little shits with self-preservation instincts - and Dave grabs three who are sitting around crying and carries them down himself.

He nearly drops a kid, but no one is watching so it doesn't count. All he can think is 'five, four, three, two, fuck -'

This time, the eldritch shriek of rage blasts his eardrums, and he barely flashsteps to the ground floor before he collapses forward, clawing at his ears. He drops the kids, but this time they don't have all that far to fall. The roar stops echoing in his brain after an eternity that, according to his internal clock, is really only about three seconds. Holy fuck, he's not sure how much more of this grimdark bullshit he can take. When he wipes at his face with the back of his sleeve, he can feel even more blood gushing out his nose, a proper nose bleed. He probably looks like hell warmed over between his creepy red eyes and the new face paint.

When he looks up, fifteen small children and a frightened teacher stare at him, wide eyed. One of the little girls he had to drag downstairs is still kneeling next to him, tugging on his arm. "You're Flashstep, aren't you?" she says in what she probably intends to be a whisper, but echoes in the stairwell. "Are you okay, Mr Flashstep?"

"...Been worse," he manages, grabbing the railing and dragging himself upright. Thirty seconds. Heir is probably already flying at that thing alone, and Dave still has to give his past-self the cue to go back in time. Fuck, no wonder he was so pissy with himself earlier - he can travel through time at will and yet somehow he's always racing against the clock. "Okay, everybody, out we go."

She nods at him, picking up two of the slow kids from earlier with a grim expression. "Good luck," she says.

"...Thanks."

He doesn't even know her name.
"Come on, kids. Stay with your buddies," she whisper-yells, waving all the little kids out the door before running after them. Dave flashsteps out the door and watches them all race in a straggling line away from the grimdark zone. Then he turns around and waves a hand at past-Dave, who is just now running past the entry way to this side road. That must be what got his attention before, because past-him does a double take and stops, frowning at him.

"What now?" Past-him demands, and jeez, why are all of his different time-selves so pissy all the time. Oh right, because they're always in the middle of a crisis. That's why he generally doesn't get into arguments with himself - he's clear-headed enough even in the middle of these stupid shenanigans to realize it's just a shitty situation for everyone involved.

Anyway. He flashes other-him ten fingers to indicate ten minutes, and tells himself, "Go. Like, right now, bro. Ten minutes, send them out the back door along East 88th and tell them to go around on Madison Avenue. Do not fuck around, do not pass Go, just - go."

Past him glances up at something - Heir in the sky, probably, and mutters under his breath before vanishing.

Yeah. Finally, all caught up on the time loop. Speaking of Heir, Dave should probably -

"O H A T IS?"

Oh shit. Dave gasps, his eyes watering with the sudden pain. He yanks out the sword he put away to carry the kids and stumbles a bit as he flashsteps forward.

Then he looks up into the sky and realizes grimdark Rose is staring right at him.

"No!" he chokes out, ripping his gaze away from the mocking white eyes above. He draws his second sword and raises it, getting up on one foot and one knee in a half-assed guarding stance. It's not real, it can't be real, he won't let it be real.

He dodges the first tentacle of grimdark power that stabs at him, while the grimdark above laughs and laughs. He cuts into the tentacle with a slice of his sword, a clumsy swing that barely connects. Dark purple blood pours out, and the Horrorterror wails.

The shriek of pain is distracting enough that Dave never sees the second thorn coming. It stabs out from the slice he made in the first tentacle rather than from the main body above, and stabs at him.
And he -

He can't move in time.

---

He has had no time to observe the grimdark's powers in action. He has seen it committing random acts of gratuitous building demolition and tearing up the streets, but he hasn't seen it fight anyone. So he's basically flying in with no background knowledge, no real plan on how to fight this thing, and no guarantee that the wind will even be able to protect him throughout the fight.

The wind is...balking. It's reluctant to listen to him. The only instinct it appears to want him to follow through is the instinct to get the hell out of New York. And the breezes that aren't urging him to fly in the other direction are the ones that are somehow...hostile. John can smell sea water and blood in the air, thick enough that he can almost taste the flavor on his tongue. The grimdark is more than something possessing Rose - it feels like it's slowly permeating the air, like evil humidity.

If they get out of this mess alive, he is using that metaphor in front of Dave. Evil humidity is something Dave would get a kick out of, right? Right.

Focus.

The screams have died down by the time Heir flies between the transformed Rose and the museum, and he doesn't want to think about what that means. "Rose! Rose, listen to me!" he yells.

To his relief, the cluster of grimdark tentacles opens up, and the thorns stabbing down into the museum pause in their violent outburst. Rose's angular features are greyed and framed by dead-looking hair, but it is still Rose's face that tilts to the side, studying him, maybe even recognizing him?

Lizard-quick, the face jerks to the side, an unnaturally twisted smile parting Rose's face. It's horrifying. ""OH! WHAT IS THIS?!" the Horrorterror says, the sound of its voice grating and cold in John's ears. Dave had almost collapsed the first time they heard Rose speak, and Heir has no idea why - it's unpleasant, but it's not debilitating. Whatever has gone wrong, he just hopes the other hero can still fight. Bro is nowhere to be seen, but even between Heir and Flashstep, he is pretty sure they can handle this grimdark thing long enough to get the cuffs on it, even if Rose...can't answer Heir right now.

Heir is cautiously optimistic, right up until the Horrorterror stabs Dave.

A tentacle lances out – but it doesn’t come at Heir, which is what he’d anticipated, is what he’d directed the winds to defend against. Instead, it stabs down and to the right, and Heir whirls to see that Dave has ended up on a sidestreet below, next to the caved-in museum. The other hero is crouched on his knees, clutching at his head, and barely manages to dodge the first strike by falling sideways and slicing with his sword, nicking the tentacle. “Dave!” Heir yells, but the other hero doesn’t respond even to that name. Heir can just barely make out the blood pouring out of the other hero’s nose.

And the sight of Dave bleeding from the nose makes Heir’s skin crawl because it means something is wrong. He can’t tell what it is, but it triggers every internal alarm he has. Why is the grimdark affecting Dave like this and not Heir?

He brings down a blade of his own, a slicing gust of wind that he directs with his good arm, and hammers all of its force down like a hammer on the section of the thorny tentacle next to him, trying to distract it from Dave. He wishes he had Casey – hell, any hammer would do, or even something with a real blade.

He hacks the tentacle in two just as Dave lets out a yell of pain that ends in a choked gurgle, and the grimdark laughs.

Then Heir starts to freak the fuck out.

The only explanation he can give for the rookie mistake he makes next is that he’s still not used to working in tandem with another hero. He and Hemogoblin have only really worked together once, and those hadn’t been the best circumstances either, but at least then it had been Heir who was hurt, not his partner. Now, instead of keeping his eye on the grimdark tangle right in front of his face, he looks down. “Shit! Dave!” He can’t tell how bad the damage is from up here; all he can see is the bright, arterial splatter of blood that has painted its way up the wall, and that Dave is gone. The tentacle Heir cut hits the ground with a thud, a secondary thorn having jammed itself into the wall opposite where Dave had been. It too is speckled with blood.

Heir is not prepared for the gut-wrenching fear that hits him at that moment. Dave is gone.

He is also really not prepared for the giant evil space tentacle that slams into him from behind while he’s distracted.

Reeeally should have seen that one coming, he thinks gloomily as the wind wraps around him and stops his uncontrolled arc. He flips himself around to face Rose again properly. The winds defending his body caught that blow before it could actually hit him, but the wicked point on the thorn that writhes in the air where he’d been hovering means the Horrorterror fully intended to catch him in the center of his back. That would have been a cripple or a kill shot if just a little more force had overpowered his shields.

And if it’s trying to kill Heir, where exactly did it hit Dave?

“Rose!” he tries again. “Rose, please! I know you’re in there!” All the while Heir begins to desperately plumb the depths of his connection to the wind, drawing every scrap of moving air in the area to his side. Between the hostile, grimdark humidity soaking into the air and his own thrumming adrenaline, he strains to keep the restless winds from launching into a full-blown tornado and spinning out of his control.

“YOU’VE TRULY THINK YOU’RE ON TOP OF US?” Rose’s twisted voice cuts through the rising howl of the wind. The Horrorterror smiles, mouth gaping and cavernous with more of the white, sickly fire that bleeds out from its eyes. “SHE CAN’T HEAR YOU.”

“I think she can!” he fires back, spreading his hands wide. “I think Rose is still fighting you in there.”

“ROSE IS DEAD. WE’RE LEECHING HER!” Still smiling beatifically, the Horrorterror raises its hand and begins charging some new purple spell in the palm of its hand. The crackling energy writhes with worms and thorns.

No. No. “You’re lying!”

Heir loses control of the wind in that brief moment of disbelief, and the breeze slams into the grimdark tangle at a hundred and fifty miles an hour.

It knocks the tangle back maybe a foot. The Horrorterror just laughs and stabs tentacles directly down into the ground below, anchoring itself. This thing can take a beating. “I KNOW SHE’S
It knows his name. His heroic alias, anyway. “And how would you know my name unless she’s still in there? I know Rose – she’s been psychoanalyzing the heck out of every hero in the US since I first met her! That’s not something a crazy space alien would know, that’s Rose!”

The Horrorterror has replaced Rose’s eyes with streaming white trails of energy. It still, amazingly, manages to give the impression that it is rolling its eyes. It flicks a hand at him, and three whips of grimdark power lash out at Heir at once. “I’voir A’re’n’t’noh th’a f’t’yo’u w’r’ro’n’t’g’.”

He barely hears it. With all the distortion in evil-Rose’s voice, it’s hard enough trying to understand when the Horrorterror is shouting, let alone the faint whisper between the words. Heir shoots up into the sky, dangerously close to the underside of the thunder clouds, and the tentacles arc up with him. God, is he lucky there’s no natural lightning in the storm. Spinning, he lets himself drop. The tentacles have replaced Rose’s eyes with streaming white trails of energy. It still, amazingly, manages to give the impression that it is rolling its eyes. It flicks a hand at him, and three whips of grimdark power lash out at Heir at once. “I’voir A’re’n’t’noh th’a f’t’yo’u w’r’ro’n’t’g’.”

The wind cuts through all three tentacles, spewing dull purple blood across the debris on the street below. John’s collarbone screams. He’s been ignoring it all this time, minimizing his movements on that side, and now he feels every damn hairline fracture that grenade explosion left in the bone. Gasping, he stuffs his hand into the jacket as a makeshift sling, trying to give it a quick break from the strain. He doesn’t know if he can pull off a maneuver like that again.

Only after he’s taken careful of does he fully realize what he just heard.

Not Heir. John. “Rose!” John calls back, hope squeezing his heart as he begins to duck and weave between the secondary thorns that erupt from the severed tentacles. He guides sharp slices of the wind with his free arm, but the throbbing pain distracts him more than he likes. “Rose, was that you?”

The Horrorterror grimaces. The tentacles chasing John falter as the grimdark tangle wrapped around Rose’s slim frame huddles in on itself.

That is definitely Rose. And however she’s managed to start talking, the Horrorterror doesn’t like it. Which means, obviously, that John wants her to keep doing it. He has no idea where Bro has fucked off to, and Dave is presumably out of commission. As far as he can see, he has to distract the Horrorterror and cuff Rose, all by himself.

Heir may not be able to do this. But John can, because Doctor Lalonde was right - John is the one Rose knew. Still knows, even now, after all these years. “I can hear you, Rose! I’m right here!”

“Y’O’U’ HEAR’ N’OT’ H’N’ G’.” Two purple spheres of lightning launch from within the tangle, and John drops beneath them.

Then he realizes they’re still following him, turning much more quickly than the tentacles could. The spell squirms like a bundle of iridescent worms as he narrowly ducks one that aims for his face. He heads up again, trying to get the advantage of height, but he can’t help that he’s limited by the murky cloud cover. He doesn’t even want to know how saturated with grimdark the air inside the thunder storm would be. One sphere vanishes into the clouds when he turns sharply, and he drops again.
He’s keeping an eye on the Horrorterror, but she doesn’t seem to be giving chase herself.

By this time he’s over buildings rather than the street, and he rounds the corner of the ninth floor of a building as tightly as he can, his arm skimming across the glass as he uses the wind to hug the curve. He knows he succeeds when the sphere can’t turn tightly enough, and slams into the corner instead in its haste to reach him by the quickest route possible. The sphere explodes against the side of the building. Cracks of dull purple eat their way up the windows before, with a twist, everything explodes outward. The wind whirs most of the resulting shrapnel away.

At least now he knows that works. John touches down on the ground, eyes on the sky, and feels the crackling hum of the second explosive spell as it rockets down through the clouds to divebomb him. At the last second, he jumps to the side, and the spell collides with the pavement, shattering the road.

It’s only then that he sees Bro Strider. In the seconds before the tentacles crash into the roof where he’d been standing, John catches up to him (and yeah, if John can and John is pretty sure even someone as skilled as the Puppeteer is probably gonna be slower while hauling around the dead weight of a teenager. When the Puppeteer leaps into the air, letting the tentacles slam into the roof where he’d been standing, John catches up to him (and yeah, if John can Suck it, Dave’s Bro! Suck on the power of friendship!

Then he hears what the Horrorterror is muttering to itself, and he tenses up again. “\text{\textipa{\textbf{THANKFULLY}}; \textipa{\textbf{WE\’VE}}; \textipa{\textbf{I\’VE\’D}}; \textipa{\textbf{AWESOME}}; \textipa{\textbf{H\’S\’VE\’D}}; \textipa{\textbf{OPTIONS}}.”

Wait, what the heck is that supposed to mean?

The Horrorterror roars, with a piercing note within the rumble of thunder that shatters what few intact windows remain on the buildings around them. Three more tentacles lance out from the main tangle, aimed not at John, but at the rooftop of the nearby building –

It’s only then that he sees Bro Strider. In the seconds before the tentacles crash into the roof where the Puppeteer is standing, John realizes who is slung over Bro’s shoulder.

\textit{Dave is okay.} Well, he’s not moving, and there’s an awful lot of blood painting the back of the Puppeteer’s white polo, but Dave hasn’t just vanished into thin air – he’s still \textit{here}.

An iron band around John’s lungs falls away, and he feels like he can breathe again.

Of course, now the Horrorterror, for whatever reason, has decided to fixate on the other two heroes, and John is pretty sure even someone as skilled as the Puppeteer is probably gonna be slower while hauling around the dead weight of a teenager. When the Puppeteer leaps into the air, letting the tentacles slam into the roof where he’d been standing, John catches up to him (and yeah, if John can see Bro moving, he has definitely slowed down) and waves his arms frantically. “I can carry him,” he yells over the continued, rolling roar of the sea that echoes out of Rose’s mouth.

All he gets is a stolid nod, and then suddenly Bro throws Dave’s (please be unconscious) body right at him and draws a katana in his freed hand. John dives forward, yanking his injured arm free of the suit jacket, and catches Dave under the armpits, the other hero’s weight barely jolting him. In fact, even if Bro doesn’t have John’s weird extra strength, should carrying Dave have slowed him down that much? Gritting his teeth, John decides to set Dave down somewhere in the park, away from all the falling buildings and debris the Horrorterror keeps blowing everywhere.

Someone – the Puppeteer, obviously – has wadded up bright blue fabric the color of Lil Cal’s shirt and tied it down with a larger strip of cloth to stem the blood that still sluggishly pours out from the tear at the side of Dave’s throat. The thorn must have just barely clipped Dave on the neck and shoulder rather than punching through either, but it still managed to scrape right up against his carotid, if the amount of blood is anything to go by. John is willing to bet that if that metal collar hadn’t been there, a lot more damage could have been done.

More worrying is the blood still trickling out of Dave’s nose, and the fact that Dave is still unconscious. Objectively, John knows that a little nosebleed pales in comparison to the gaping wound on the side of Dave’s neck. But it – it’s just too familiar, and that familiarity is horrifying because John has never seen Dave’s nose bleed before.

“FOUND YO U!”

Shit. John turns to see grimdark Rose hovering outside the office, grinning madly. “FOUND YO U’ it sings, almost bursting John’s eardrums.

“No!” he replies, grabbing Dave under the arms again. This time, it’s almost like he walks right into the anger, welcoming the pain as he teleports three buildings down, onto the same roof he’d seen Bro last. The Horrorterror shrieks in rage behind them, and Dave’s whole body jerks, more blood trickling out of his nose.

Yeah, Dave can’t afford to lose much more blood like this. John lays Dave down and turns to face the grimdark tangle as it claws its way up into the sky and screeches at him, flinging itself in their direction. “Rose! Try to keep her still, just for a few seconds!” he calls over the rising wind.

He tries not to let it discourage him that he hasn’t heard Rose in…quite a while. She can do it! This is Rose we’re talking about! No creepy void-tentacle-many-angled bag of dicks is going to beat her! John just has to get close enough to the center of the tangle before he can start to help Rose fight back in earnest. Sucking in a breath of sea-salt air, he launches himself at the tangle and begins to beat it back away from Dave with swathes of air. "Hey! Pay attention to me! I’m the one you’re fighting, here!” he shouts when the grimdark tangle attempts to break away and swarm underneath him in a mass of tentacles.

Apparently, while he’s not making much of a dent in the ever expanding array of tentacles that encase Rose’s possessed body, he does eventually succeed in pissing off an eldritch abomination enough that it screams in outrage as he forces down the street again, and a flurry of thorny tentacles shoot John all at once.

Uh. He probably could have thought this plan through a little better. Welp, he starts weaving through the fray, slicing when he can get his good arm free to manipulate the air.

He misses the exact moment the Horrorterror decides to change its tactics, which was…probably the point. It was trying to distract him, and it succeeded. The wild barrage of thorny vines stops, and John is left twisting in the air. He keeps his head low as he rolls upright, expecting an attack to surprise him from behind, but he’s perplexed to see he is now alone in the air.

He turns to see the Horrorterror peeling off away from him, yanking itself between buildings and using its tentacles to throw itself bodily at the office where John left Dave. “No!” John yells, flinging blades of wind ahead of him in an attempt to cut the grimdark and catch its attention again.

Mid-leap, the Horrorterror flinches back, shrieking, before it’s even a few hundred feet from Dave. Adjusting for the abrupt halt, John flips backwards and slams both fists down on the tentacles over Rose’s head. It screeches and crawls backwards, wavering on its tentacles, and John sees that someone has cut a wide, bloody purple gouge through nearly all of the tentacles that had been reaching for Dave.

Bro Strider leans at a cocky angle against the edge of the hole in the office wall, a shirtless Lil Cal sitting on his shoulder. He has put the katana away already, and is inspecting his nails without a care in the world. “Bitch, please,” he drawls absently. “You should just listen to the kid and stand still. Go after my lil bro and I’ll fry you like fucking calamari.”

“MEWLIN’GLANDET” the Horrorterror shrieks.

“That’s hemoracist!” John yells back. He thinks maybe the relief is making him a little hysterical, if that’s the best comeback he can think of. “So! Rude!” He raises his hands up and slams down another hammer of air down on top of the Horrorterror’s head. It’s a testament to how much the grimdark has been distracted that rather than anchoring itself and withstanding the blow, it topples over sideways, crashing into the building opposite.

John presses his advantage and flies after it, winding up to throw a punch as he flies at the Horrorterror’s face.

Er. On second thought. Maybe he doesn’t want to punch Rose in the face. It's still her face, after all. Instead, he skids to a halt before the hollow in the thorns where Rose’s possessed body sits, clutching at its head with grimdark claws. He grabs her by the shoulders instead. "Give Rose back, you alien racists!" he yells at her face, shaking her hard.

Thorns surge inward to meet him, but the gamble pays off. For a brief moment, the eyes staring back at him don’t writhe with worms and tangles behind the white fire, it’s just a familiar, probing gaze –

And all the tentacles arcing in to stab him freeze in place. Crowing in triumph, John slaps a cuff down on Rose’s outstretched wrist and feels it click shut and lock into place.

Unfortunately, he only manages the one restraint before it’s the Horrorterror’s turn to lose its shit. “NO!” it shrieks, and a pair of tentacles wrap around John, crushing in tight until he can’t even slip a breeze between them and his skin to ease the pressure. There’s nothing left of Rose in those eyes, just an absolute, multifarious rage.

Oh, fuck. He’s fucked.

“NO!” someone else screams. John’s ears have grown so used to the ringing shrieks of the grimdark that Rose’s high, thin voice, gone hoarse with pain, sounds distant and far off.

But it’s Rose who looks back at him.

“Rose,” John says, grinning. He can’t help it.

Instead of tearing him apart, the grimdark tosses him aside. Rose’s hoarse shout can barely travel through the thick air. So yeah, he’s still getting thrown around, but who cares! Rose did it this time! That’s awesome! John catches himself with ease, the wind stirring with new energy as his joy leaks through.

“WE’LL KILL ALL O’Y’OU”!!!” Rose bellows, and oops, no, that’s not Rose anymore. Dammit! The Horrorterror stumbles along like a drunkard, slamming into a building facefirst at one point (which is hilarious and really shouldn’t be, but whatever), but still making its way towards Dave again. Darn!
"Give 'em hell, Rose!" John yells, pelting after her. He catches up, and he knows the grimdark must be so very distracted from the inner turmoil Rose is stirring up because it doesn't even glance his direction. It's too desperate to reach Dave and ditch Rose's internal rebellion to consider him a threat. "You are a strong independent woman who does not pander to insane murder-alien shenanigans!"

"STOP ME," Rose gasps again, wrenching her face sideways to look at him, pain wrinkling her forehead. "DON'T LET ME REACH DAVE."

"You got it!" John slides in close and buffets the Horrorterror in the side, knocking support tentacles out from under it and driving it steadily to the side, back toward Central Park.

"A W_A Y!" He thinks it's still Rose talking, though the distortion has returned. He doesn't heed the warning in time, and a tentacle snags the wrist of his bad arm, bringing him to a painful halt. John brings his other hand around to stab at the offending vine.

The tentacle moves first, yanking his arm back and up.

There is a sharp pop as his arm dislocates.

"Fuuuuuuaaaaghhhh!" John swallows down the rest of the scream, hissing through his nose. All of the pain in his collarbone and shoulder has begun to meld together into a white-hot agony centered on his upper left side. He can't panic, he can't panic, he chants to himself, focusing on a short blade of air that slices through the tentacle before he rips the section curled around his wrist off. His left arm hangs at a horrific angle, twisted completely out of joint. It's not as bad as it feels; he just needs maybe ten spare seconds and he can pop the shoulder right back into place. This isn't a crisis. Not yet.

He hears the last few reassurances in his dad's voice. It helps a little.

"jOHN."

He meets Rose's eyes, and tries to grin for her. The grimdark has frozen up once more. "You've got this, Rose!" he says, probing at his shoulder in the brief interlude Rose seems to have won.

"I'm sorry John," Rose says, panting. "I require your assistance. I can't move, you see. But you - you would be able to. And once you get me loose - I believe I can take it from there."

"And I can't explain the process right now." Rose holds out a shaking hand, the one that's not cuffed. He hadn't seen in the heat of battle, but the gloves of her transformed costume have been singed through to reveal her grey, burned palms. That Horrorterror threw out some serious fire power. "This restraint helps. Hurry up and get the other one finished, and then get inside my mind."

"What?! How? Why?" John protests. He has to let go of his shoulder and hover closer to Rose; the dislocated shoulder can wait. He digs into his inside pocket with the good arm and slots the second restraint onto Rose's arm.

"Now then. I intend to settle this once and for all. Just get me out of this damned corner, John." Rose raises a hand that shakes a little, her color almost peachy. John goes cross eyed looking at it, opening his mouth to explain that no, their plan actually involves restraining the Horrorterror and then getting the hell out of Dodge.

She taps him on the forehead before he gets the words out. To his relief, the sparks that result are not sickly purple but a feeble, greyish gold. Not exactly good, but not likely to kill him either.

Or so he thinks, before his eyes roll back in his skull and both he and Rose begin to topple to the ground, two hundred feet below.

Like mother, like daughter, John thinks to himself, blacking out. Neither of them can be assed to explain things properly the first time around. Jeez.

John thinks, dimly, that he can hear the ocean. The scent of blood and salt permeates the - is that air? It feels more like sludge, as though the air has finally surpassed Houston and achieved 100% humidity, thus winning all of Dave's shitty awards. Everything is pitch dark, and there is a distinct lack of pain in his shoulder and collarbone.

This indicates that Shenanigans with a capital S are occurring. Blinking and squinting in the darkness, he attempts to regain his bearings. This proves difficult; the darkness does not abate no matter which way he turns, and all he can really distinguish with his hearing is that somewhere, far below him, an ocean rumbles with the tide. And, if he tilts his ear down and listens carefully, underneath it all he can make out a low murmur, an arrhythmic chant, one that repeats, screeches, and then repeats again, as though being played on a broken record player.

With that super creepy soundtrack muttering in his ear, John decides to descend. Rose had said something about him getting inside her mind to help her out with - something? She hadn't exactly been very clear.

Well, the solution is obviously to find her.

This is easier said than done, and for a long minute John flounders in the dark, hearing the ocean grow steadily louder beneath him as he casts about for a light. When he gets close enough to feel the spray kicked up by the roiling waves, a cold drop of water hits his face. It burns, and he wipes at the spot frantically with the back of his sleeve. The spot continues to burn, and he has to rip off the end of his sleeve and toss it away when that begins to burn as well. He can't see the sleeve as it drops into the ocean, but he can imagine what would happen when it hit the surface of the waves.

The entire ocean is full of burning acid.

And this is what has invaded Rose's mind?

He is struck momentarily by the horrific certainty that this dark expanse of cold water goes on forever, endless and churning and eternal. John shakes himself and flies up a bit to get out of range of the acidic spray. He doesn't question how he can fly in Rose's mind; the explanation will probably involve either psychology or magic, and he'd rather Rose explain it herself than he try his hand at her arts.

He floats forward for a while. He doesn't dare turn away from that single direction - he's probably already hopelessly lost, and he'd rather not end up going in circles on top of that. His best hope for getting out of here is to find Rose and help with her plan for - for whatever the heck the new plan is.

He wanders long enough to start worrying about his and Rose's body. They had kind of been in the middle of falling from a pretty good distance when he passed out. All he can really do at this point is hope that the Puppeteer left Dave's side long enough to maybe catch them both. ...Yeah, Bro is kind of a dick, but John doesn't think he'd let them fall to their doom. Hopefully.

(john, john, over here, john.)

He's so caught up in these musings, he nearly misses Rose's thready whisper. The harsh murmur of (disor'd' er'di s' al ign'd' ist' or' te) sounds...really, creepily similar to Rose's distorted voice earlier, so it almost blends into and obscures her voice.

(john, i swear, if you absent-mindedly wander right past my location in the middle of this unmitigated disaster, i will unleash such fresh vengeance upon you, there will not be enough of you left for a funeral.)

Oh. He heard that one. "Rose? Where are you? I can't see a thing!" he whisper-shouts, still not entirely sure just where the Horrorterror might be hanging out. The cuffs are supposed to suppress it enough for Rose to keep control, but the grimdark is still here.

There is a long pause, and he stops dead, afraid he actually did manage to float right by Rose and miss her completely. (yes, i suppose it would be rather impenetrably dark to one unused to dealing with the darkness of the Furthest Ring) Rose whispers at last. (i am directly to your right. you will know me when you see me.)

John turns slowly, staring helplessly out into the endless field of black. It all looks exactly the same. "Wher..." A flash of light catches his attention. Well, more like it blinds him and he has to bite back a yelp of pain. After so long in the dark, the tiny, flickering beacon that appears on the indistinct horizon feels like staring into the sun.

(oops. please make haste, john.)

"Not exactly the most reassuring thing to say, Rose," John hisses, flying over as quickly as he can in the thick air. "What exactly is the game plan here? Because I didn't sign up for an adventure to the center of your mind this morning, and I'm flying blind here."

The light eventually resolves itself, directly in front of him, yes, but also below him, closer to where he thinks the surface of the ocean lies. He begins to descend, cautious. The last thing he wants is to get caught in a wave of grimdark acid.

(if you could help me out of here, i would be greatly obliged.) The flickering, pale, faded outline of Rose Lalonde rests her head on a tiny lantern, her pale purple eyes gleaming in the reflected light. The rest of her trails off into the dark ocean. The faint light of the lantern doesn't even penetrate the grimdark submerging the her body.

John hesitates, then shakes himself vigorously. This is Rose! He puts out both hands and a pair of transparent hands clasp his back. It burns for a moment with the acid Rose has been lying in, but he grits his teeth and tightens his grip on her. "Don't worry, Rose. I won't let you go. What do you need me to do?"

Rose smiles. Maybe. It's hard to tell when most of her face is kind of...smudged and see through. (i would greatly appreciate a lift. once i am free of this grimdark pit, i have a bone to pick with the Honorable Horrorterror who dares presume to take over my mind.)

"It's as easy as that?" John asks.

Rose raises a single elegant eyebrow. Seriously, all of his friends seem to have this mysterious eyebrow thing down. When John tries it, both his eyebrows go up at once. Karkat, Dave, and Rose can all manage it. Maybe it's like how all of them ramble when they talk - John must really have a type when it comes to his friends!

Focusss!

(easy for you, john. The lion's share of the hard work rests with me, this time around. this is my mess. and I assure you, i intend to clean it up.)

John nods, and yanks Rose upward out of the acid sea. There's a surprisingly amount of resistance, and he looks down to see tendrils of grimdark clinging to her ankles. His whole body jerks downward as the ocean tries to swallow her up again. "Oh no, you don't!" John snaps. He feels Rose's nails dig into his wrists as he drags them both up. With a sound like suction cups popping loose, the miniature tentacles release Rose's lower half. John isn't expecting it, and they both fly up with the recoil, which he is totally okay with. The further they get Rose from that gross stuff, the better.

"You okay, Rose?" he asks, once they're hovering a safe distance above the ocean.

She squeezes his hand, smiling. He realizes, suddenly, that he can suddenly see a lot better. The darkness still continues on in every direction, but -

"Are you glowing?"

(it has been far too long since someone shed some light on this situation. i fully intend to do so posthaste.) It is very reassuring that Rose's mental whisper can still sound as dry and snarky as her usual tone, even after all this time. Meanwhile, the pale yellow light that fills in her outline slowly begins to ripen to a warm, goldenrod hue, and the light illuminates more and more of the darkness. (it will notice me and arrive soon, actually. right about -)

- G OUT OF MIND!

(- now) Rose finishes.

And then the Horrorterror looms out of the dark.

It is an incomprehensible being. His mind tries to comprehend it anyway, and he suspects those two irreconcilable concepts could drive people mad when they look upon the many-angled ones. Most of the impressions he gets, before he has to tear his eyes away, his brain burning as though splattered with more acid, is that of a tangled bundle of intertwined tentacles, with multiple gaping, beak-like mouths that drool inky black ooze and dull purple blood. It is larger than the space they are in, larger than the endless ocean, and rises up before them until all John can see is the writhing mass of thorns that make up the bulk of the Horrorterror.

Rose is unaffected by the sheer scale of the monster. She drops John's hand and floats forward under her own power. All the while, she shines with brighter and brighter light.

(how dare you. HOW DARE YOU) she says, her voice quiet and cold as it echoes throughout the darkness. The Horrorterror stutters to a halt, its massive tentacles actually drawing back away from the aura of light Rose is putting out.

John doesn't blame the Horrorterror one bit. Once Rose is truly riled up, she's a force to be reckoned with.

It's been three years since he last spoke with Rose Lalonde, and before today he never knew she was a hero, never knew she was the Seer of Light, with all the powers he's read about in the newspaper reports. And yet, he still instinctively knows exactly what is about to happen. He grins so hard, his lips feel like they're going to crack.

Because today, the Horrorterrors made the worst mistake possible.

They pissed off Rose Lalonde.

And now -

(this is MY MIND. MINE.) Rose spreads her palms outward, floating upward as two white-hot stars light up in each hand. She is no longer a fragile, immaterial outline, worn thin by the acidic grimdark tide. She is supersaturated, burning so bright John can see every thorn lining the Horrorterror's chaotic tentacles, the diminishing flow of the ocean tide below, and the stars that gleam in the night sky overhead. (GET YOU HENCE. YOU HAVE MY PERMISSION TO DWELL HERE NO MORE.)

The Horrorterror writhes, shrinking back from the light. It almost looks like it is draining away in an attempt to escape, down into the dwindling ocean below.

No wonder it had to keep Rose submerged in that ocean. Now that she's free, it doesn't stand a chance.

Rose sniffs, and combines the two lights in her hands into one that she cradles before her chest, a miniature sun. (ALLOW ME TO PUT THIS AS BLUNTLY AND CLICHÉLY AS I CAN. AFTER WHAT YOU HAVE PUT MY CITY THROUGH TODAY, I HAVE EARNED THIS LINE.)

She pauses for dramatic effect. John approves. Seriously, this is some excellent heroic monologue execution. Comic book writers could learn a lesson or three from Rose Lalonde.

(LET THERE BE LIGHT)

John closes his eyes just in time. The radiating light still burns through his eyelids, lighting everything up until there is nowhere left to hide. When he blinks his eyes open at last, seeing afterimages everywhere he looks, the Horrorterror is gone. Rose continues to burn like a torch, surveying the evaporating ocean beneath them. John hovers up alongside her and touches her shoulder gently. She meets his eyes, and smiles. "Your thoughts, John Egbert?" she asks, and her voice is no longer a half-heard whisper in the dark.

"That was basically the most awesome thing I've seen all year," John tells her, meaning every word. "Seriously, I'm pretty sure nothing is going to top that."

Rose shakes her head, her smile rueful and quiet before it falters entirely. "People have died, John. My city is in ruins at my hands, by the will of an abomination I allowed into my mind." She closes her eyes, the light dimming slightly. "I am not sure you're quite justified in praising me for anything I have done on this day."

"I don't believe that," John says. He folds his arms over his chest, then thinks better of it and just hugs Rose. She's skin and bones and golden light, and her forearms are too sharp when she hugs him back. Yeah, he doesn't care what Doctor Lalonde's excuses are, she is getting a very stern lecture when they get Rose to safety. "Yeah, people are dead, and let's face it, the clean up bill for New York is gonna be awful. But come on, And you're not allowed to think for a second this is your fault. I'm pretty sure at some point in every hero's life they have to deal with a super-powered dark side. It's like, a universal law or something."

Rose snorts into choking, inelegant laughter, shaking so hard as she tries to repress the laugh that John nearly takes a forehead to his chin. "I will do my best to take your view on the subject into account, then, John," she says bemusedly, releasing him. "You are, after all, the resident expert on heroism. Now then. Let's get you back into your own skull, shall we?"

"That would be awesome," John says. "I - uh, not that your brain isn't cool when you're not all possessed by evil and all that, but the last time I checked, we were kind of falling to our deaths. So. We should probably wake up soon. And not die."

"Oh, of course," Rose agrees, that snarky smirk back in its rightful place as she raises a hand to tap on John's forehead. "Thank you, my old friend."

He might have imagined that last part. It's the faintest whisper, and then he's occupied with blacking out -

John wakes up flat on his back.

Bro Strider is hunkered to one side, leaning over John, and he raises an eyebrow when John mumbles something incoherent. "Welcome back to the land of the living, kid," is all the Puppeteer says. "Should I be concerned? Any new fresh hell on the way?"

"...Magic," John manages by way of explanation, sitting upright and regretting it immediately. Out here, his shoulder is still dislocated and ow ow ow -

Bro Strider is hunkered to one side, leaning over John, and he raises an eyebrow when John mumbles something incoherent. "Welcome back to the land of the living, kid," is all the Puppeteer says. "Should I be concerned? Any new fresh hell on the way?"

"...Magic," John manages by way of explanation, sitting upright and regretting it immediately. Out here, his shoulder is still dislocated and ow ow ow -

Bro's eyebrow goes a little higher; then he shrugs and leans over the limp form of Rose Lalonde lying to John's right. "Is Dave alright?" John asks, twisting around and trying to figure out where they are. It looks like they're on a roof - seriously, what is it with Striders and roofs? - and they're all huddled by an air conditioning unit. Dave is propped up against the unit itself, his head still hanging forward and unmoving.

"You're a fuckin' liar, Bro," Dave says, his words slurred. He has his shades on again as he raises his chin by way of greeting, revealing the collar once again on his throat. It is battered and twisted, and John could swear he sees what looks like exposed wiring along the right side, where someone has reconnected the ends of the wires in a shitty patch job. He wonders what exactly the collar does that someone - presumably Bro - bothered to fix it in the middle of a battlezone. "John. Fuck. Man. Next time you say we go on a road trip to fight your evil temporarily possessed best friend - no. Just. No. Not even once. I am so in charge of our honeymoon, I swear to god, EB, fight me, you are forbidden from ever choosing a destination ever again."

There's something really weird about Dave's voice. John has noticed sometimes he can hear a faint buzz under all Dave's long, rambling tangents, but he's only really been listening to the guy speak out loud for a prolonged period of time for the past night and day. Now, at the end of sentences, his voice will trail off and drop to a whisper, or his voice will crack and shoot up a register.

Then John is ready to slap himself on the forehead. Dave still has a massive makeshift bandage sopping up blood on the side of his throat - of course he's going to have trouble speaking after taking a tentacle to the carotid and having his own collar nearly crush his trachea. Urgh. John is an asshole.

"I surrender all future vacation planning to you, Dave," John says, rolling his eyes as he flops back on the roof. "Are you okay? What happened to you?"

Dave is silent for a long moment. "Hell if I know," he says at last, his voice outright crackling with the strain. "One minute I'm rescuing the shrimps from the museum, the next tenta-Rose is all over me. What can I say. Even tentacle aliens can't get enough of my sick fires. They are just lining up to bask in the presence of my righteous bod."

"Oh, good! You got them out!" John sighs with relief. In the insanity of trying survive the Horrorterror, he hadn't had any opportunity to even see if the children he heard inside the Guggenheim had made it out safely. "Um. Bro? I'd ask Dave, but - can you get my shoulder? I don't want to fuck it up from this angle -"

Pain shoots through his shoulder as the joint and bone are shoved back into place and John kicks with one foot as he yelps, caught completely unawares. "Oh my god, couldn't you wait until, like, the count of three or something first! Agh!" he growls at Bro, who simply continues to hold John's shoulder in place until, with a pop, the pain subsides, leaving only the aching soreness of strained muscles and his extremely aggravated collar bone. John wouldn't be surprised if the break has worsened significantly after that dislocation, which means even more time in the sling than he'd anticipated. Gross.

The Puppeteer just shrugs, and slouches over to Rose again. "Deal with it, kid. I don't molly-coddle."

Dave and John look at each other and say "Such a dick," at the same time.

"Adorable," Bro says, smirking.

Yeah, John is just going to quit while he's ahead before he starting rage-teleporting all over the place. Clearly this is a battle that cannot be won.

Rose bolts upright a second later. "I require a waste receptacle," she says, gasping. The grey grimdark taint has vanished from her skin, though her clothes are still dyed black, and her hair sticks to her forehead in sweaty, strawberry blond streaks. If she weren't pale and going kind of greenish at the edges, she'd look almost normal.

Bro produces a trash can. John seriously needs to learn how the elder Strider can move so fast. "Your receptacle, Little Lalonde," he says, straight-faced as he holds it out for her.

"Oh, thank you. A moment, please." Rose swallows rapidly, leaning over the trash can. "Oh, this is going to be unpleas -"

She begins to retch and vomit into the trashcan. The vomit is black and smells like blood, which is just, wow, the most disturbing thing John can imagine coming out of someone's stomach.

"Just let it all out," Bro says sagely, patting Rose awkwardly on the back. "Get that shit outta your system, kiddo." After a choking wave of black ooze, he actually starts gingerly grabbing strands of Rose's hair and pulling them out of her face, using his fingers like tweezers with an expression of utmost intensity.

"Oh my god, Bro being motherly. I've seen it all. That's it. I'm going blind. There is literally nothing else worth seeing in the world," Dave babbles. "Pinch me or something, John."

Yeah, this whole situation is just really fucking weird. John scoots over next to Rose too, and takes over from Bro. He's seriously concerned judging from the expression behind the Puppeteer's shades that the older man is about to give himself an aneurysm. He almost looks...concerned.

"We do not speak of this," Bro says, with the voice of a man prepared to enforce his words with a really sharp, pointy object.
John shakes his head wildly. "Nope," he agrees.

"I wish I had my camera. That was fucking priceless," Dave continues. "I think I actually feel a tear welling up. Finally, I have witnessed the mythological Bro Strider in parent-mode. Glorious."

"Kid, the only reason I'm not kicking your ass is because you're delirious from blood loss," Bro says wearily, pinching at the bridge of his nose. "Seriously. When we get home. Such an ass-kicking."

John just shakes his head again, and focuses on Rose. "How much of that gunk is in your system?" he wonders, bracing Rose's shoulders with an arm as a final retch wracks her too-thin frame. When is he going to stop talking?

The Horrorterror breaks down into mind-shattering giggles, and John winsces, covering his ears. It's Bro who finally says it. "Little Lalonde. Is your goddamn evil upchuck talking, or has Dave's unbelievable capacity for dumbassery finally driven me into insanity?"

Everyone freezes.

It's Bro who finally says it. "Little Lalonde. Is your goddamn evil upchuck talking, or has Dave's unbelievable capacity for dumbassery finally driven me into insanity?"

"I heard it too," John says quietly. He offers Rose an arm and she takes it, and they both crawl backward, getting some distance between them and the trash can.

"Well. No, it's not vomit, Puppeteer," Rose says, still eyeing the can with a practiced, analytical gaze. "Technically, it is a portion of the Horrorterror tangle that controlled large sections of my nervous system, ejected from my body by a cleansing spell. And I'm afraid that one portion is just as much a part of the hivemind as a full tangle."

"Oh, fan-fucking-tastic," Bro says, as Lil Cal crawls its way up his arm and onto his shoulder in jointed movements.

The grimdark begins to creep up the edges of the trashcan, and John tenses up, gathering in a breeze in case the tendril proves capable of more than just talking. "DO'N'T Y' O'U' K'NO'W? HE is c' o' ming...o r' m a 'y be'...HE is 'al' 'SUFE'R."

The Horrorterror breaks down into mind-shattering giggles, and John winces, covering his ears. It just keeps laughing and laughing, until finally -

"That is quite enough of that," Rose interjects. She snaps a finger and a spark of light appears above her hand. She shoves it into the trash can and grimaces as she holds it there in the middle of the writhing black tendril. A whine grows in pitch until, with an audible VWOMPH the trash can disintegrates in a burst of light. There is no trace of the grimdark tendril left as Rose delicately wipes her hand on the gravel of the roof. "It feels good to be able to do that again," she says, sighing contentedly.

"Awesome." Bro whips a cell phone out of his pocket and hits speed dial, hitching a hip on the edge of the air conditioner by Dave's head. The puppet has already disappeared. "Siddown, kids, I'm calling the getaway driver. You three all look like shit, and I sure as hell ain't carrying you."

John doesn't have the strength to argue. Heck, he doesn't even know what he'd be arguing about at this point. He's really tired, that must be why he's stopped making sense. He leans back against the AC unit with Dave. Rose joins them a second later, staring off into the distance with an expression of intense thought on her face. Knowing Rose, John thinks blearily, she'll have figured out a working hypothesis for what the fragment of Horrorterror meant by all that bizarre chatter at the end, that stuff about a 'he' and 'suffering.' Rose is good at making sense of things.

Yeah. Important things.

He feels, vaguely, a heavy weight land on each shoulder as Dave and Rose slump against him. But by then, he's already halfway asleep himself, and he can't do more than let his head fall back to rest against the air conditioner.

It really has been a long day. They still have to get Rose to Doctor Lalonde, and at some point, John has to figure out exactly when he's going to be able to fly home to Seattle. He's been gone for almost a full twenty four hours at this point, and if nothing else Karkat is probably going to notice he's gone, soon.

He'll worry about all that later, though.

For now, he thinks he's earned some rest.

"We left the plane in England!" Jade sobs, hugging WV, nearly choking him out in her distraction. "Oh noooo!"

They have relocated to sit inside the Sydney Opera House, which is currently unoccupied aside from a janitor who walks by the entrance to the main concert hall every few minutes to check on the distraught hero and make sure the hall is still in one piece. He knows better than to confront crying girls who look like they could floor him with their pinky finger. Jade and Bec between them have teleported all of the contents of the lab onto the stage, and Bec lies beside an uprooted spectrometer, silent and unconcerned in sleep mode, while Jade lounges in the audience seats and pouts over the loss of her nuclear biplane.

To be fair, it was a really awesome plane.

Having indulged herself for a good five minutes, Jade sits upright, a half strangled WV still tucked in a chokehold. "Well, we'll just have to keep going without it," she sniffs, patting the tiny carapacian on the head.

Unfortunately, he has had quite of this manhandling, apparently. When she goes to give him a noogie, he flails at her with both hands, irate exclamations escaping his throat. He manages to push off and land on his butt on the floor, and then he scurries off, his loud bursts of noise and the occasional crackle of green space-altering radiation echoing in the excellent acoustics.

"Oh no! Wait, Mr. V, don't run away!" Jade calls, zapping after him. She lands in front of him in at the top of the stairs running up to the back of the room, and clasps her hands together before kneeling. "I promise I'll stop! I didn't mean to piss you off!"

He squeaks irately, then smacks his own head with his fists in frustration, probably at his inability to speak. Jade can't tell if it was her kind-of unorthodox method of stabilizing him in time and space or if he had some kind of preexisting damage to his vocal cords that has caused this muteness, but it's clear the Variable hates it.

"I mean it," she adds, pleading. "Please don't run away yet - I still haven't figured out your green thingy!"

WV hunches in on himself, spreading his claws before his face as though inspecting each finger carefully. From this close up, Jade can see the edges of wide scars that wrap along his claws. There's a matching triangle of scar tissue that cuts along the side of his smooth face, just barely missing his right eye, and she can see more markings on his legs. They look like old burns, but the shiny scars blend in so well with his already gleaming black carapace that it's hard to see them from a distance. She wonders what could cause such widespread scarring.

Shaking his head vigorously, WV lowers his hands and clacks them together, then flings himself at her. His head rams into her chest as he hugs her.

I guess that means I'm forgiven! Jade thinks cheerfully, hugging him right back and just barely refraining from giving him another noogie. It would be mean to keep doing it when it clearly bothers him so much, and she can't abide the thought of being mean to the little guy; he's just so adorable! She does wonder about his hands, though. Sometimes, usually after he goes all green plasma like Bec, he looks at his claws as though he'd like to cut them off, an old and weary fear creasing his face.

There's something up there, something weird, but WV can't talk, and if he's using a carapacian sign language it's not working because Jade doesn't understand it. It's all so frustrating. Ever since that impossible teleport from Britain to Australia, her head has been pounding in her skull.

Jade snaps her fingers. "Ohhhh! I know what we need, WV!"

He tilts his head at her quizzically.

"Food! It's lunch time! That's why we're both so grumpy and blah!" She picks him up as she stands, and he crawls onto her back obligingly, sitting on her shoulders like they're playing chicken. His carapace is too light and hollow for Jade to even feel like there's any weight there, and for a scary moment she has to look up and see WV's white eyes blinking down at her before she can believe he hasn't just disappeared again, vanished back into quantum superposition. Wouldn't that suck!

For a moment, she looks up at the lab equipment spread out on the stage of the opera house, and then she shrugs. "Into the sylladex with you all!" She opens up the pocket dimension and teleports onto the stage, WV squeaking and grabbing at her hair as she does, and then she begins to shovel delicate lab equipment into the sylladex. Nothing has ever come out of the sylladex pocket damaged or anything, so hopefully the breakable stuff won't be hurt either! Jade doesn't even understand half of what her space powers can do, and she's the one using them!

WV hops down off her shoulders and begins digging through the last of the equipment while she's shoving the larger pieces into the sylladex, nearly falling on his face as he digs through the pile of random lab stuff and emerges with a tiny squeak of triumph. In his hands he clutches a long tan metric ruler, and he gives it a few experimental swings and stabs before he trots over to her side. Apparently if Jade is a riflekind expert, WV likes rulers! How cute!
Once all her lab crap is stowed away, she stretches her arms and plants her hands on her hips. "Well, I don't know anything about Sydney. I guess we can just wander around until we find some place with lunch stuff. We're out of here, Bec!"

The wolf looks up from where it has sprawled out on its belly, and sniffs at her.

"That means he's ready to go!" she tells WV, chipper. She spies the janitor passing by the open door at the back of the theater and waves. "Goodbye, nice janitor man! We're going now!"

"Finally!" The man bursts into wrenching sobs. Jade has no idea what that could all be about.

They beam out in a wave of Bec's green fire. Left to his own devices, the janitor staggers over to the stage and weeps over the huge indents left in the wood by the hard impact of several thousand pounds of lab equipment. He has absolutely no way of explaining the damage to his supervisors, and expects to be fired over this incident within hours.

They end up at a small café on Knox Street, a really tiny place with short tables and stools instead of chairs that are pretty much the perfect size for WV's legs! Jade is the perfect host. It is her. The food selection is kind of tiny too, but she's sure it will still taste delicious. They sit outside in the afternoon sun, and it's so warm it's almost like home.

Jade orders avocado on toast, curious, and then a giant-ass chocolate milkshake because heck yeah, milkshakes. Best thing invented by mankind. She doesn't know how she survived the first seventeen years of her life without trying one. WV frets over the menu as the waiter stares, fascinated, at the carapacian, and then finally WV starts stabbing at what he wants while Jade repeats the order aloud. She's really confused when WV starts flipping the fuck out and demanding five cans of TaB soda by holding up five claws emphatically, but hey, Jade has money to burn. If TaB is WV's thing and he hasn't been able to drink it in who knows how long, who is she to deny the poor deprived little guy.

The first sip of that milkshake is like having liquid, chocolatey happiness dancing on her tongue. Jade hums happily and proceeds to drain the glass. The resulting brain freeze is sooo worth it.

Her reaction, however, is nothing compared to WV's literal tears of joy when the waiter sets a tray of five soda cans before him. He doesn't even wait to pull open the tab; he just chomps down with glinting black teeth and swallows the chunk of aluminum whole before chugging the entire can's worth of soda in seconds. He nearly falls off his stool with excitement.

Whooo, boy. This is going to be one hell of a sugar rush when he's through gorging himself. Jade sits back and watches, fascinated, as WV loses his adorable shit over a pretty average soda brand. Soon he's tossing back two at a time, and she admires his ability to coordinate the flow of two different torn-open soda cans into one mouth. It's pretty impressive. The poor TaB never stood a chance against WV's onslaught. Her toast arrives in the middle of this sodasscre, and she munches on it. It is, indeed, delicious.

After nearly ten minutes of extreme soda drinking (there should be a game show for that or something, because WV would win hands down), the carapacian slows his pace, savoring the tenth can the waiter has brought over for him. He doesn't even wait to pull open the tab; he just chomps down with glinting black teeth and swallows the chunk of aluminum whole before chugging the entire can's worth of soda in seconds. He nearly falls off his stool with excitement.

All in all, it's pretty hilarious. Jade doesn't think she's ever seen anyone get that worked up over soda.
"So, I've been thinking," Jade says at last, as WV slows down the insane pace of his TaB consumption. "I intended to fly over to Washington to see John right after we finished up in the lab. I really need to knock some manners into that guy. So. Despite this detour, we could, theoretically, just catch a regular-people plane across the Pacific. It's too far for me to hop it straight from here to Seattle, even with islands along the way."

She doesn't mention the fact that it had been a further jump from Britain to Australia. She has no idea how that worked, and no way is she betting their lives on her uncertain new ability to cross half the world in seconds. Even with Bec helping, she'd be anxious about that kind of risk. The last thing they'd want is to end up stranded in the middle of the ocean.

Besides. Er. She has another idea.

"Or," she says slowly, tapping her fingers together as a grin spread across her face. "We could, you know. Go on a quick tour of South America, first. Reeeally quick."

Bec, as usual, has no response beyond wagging its tail. WV appears to consider the idea, and at last shrugs.

She'll take that as a total yes. Awesome! One last road trip with her oldest companion and her new best friend, and then she can finally meet John! This is going to be great! "Ready, WV?"

"Aaand, we're off!" Jade says, closing her eyes. In her mind's eyes, Jade begins to plan the series of teleporting hops they will need to make to cross the Southern Pacific Ocean, and after a few seconds, twists the space around her and makes the first jump.

Cerro Azul, Chile

They touch down at around 35°39.0'S, 70°45.64'W, judging by Jade's internal GPS.

Jade realizes her mistake when this lands them almost right on top of an active volcano.

Clouds of ashy smoke billow out into the air above a tall, snowy peak, and a moment later the ground rattles and jumps beneath Jade's feet. She waves her arms wildly and manages to keep her balance, but WV falls backward, tripping over a tree root when he tries to regain his footing, and she has to catch him. Bec appears to be unaffected by the shaking of the ground, not even a single hair in its pelt trembling in the ashy breeze. Bec is weird like that.

"Wow! That looks like a doozy!" Jade exclaims, as another earthquake rocks the ground beneath them. With this much tectonic activity, the volcano that rears up into the sky above them must be thissss close to erupting! This probably isn't the safest place to be right now!

But, she thinks, switching out her travelling clothes for her hero outfit of the day, first she has to make sure any and all civilians get away too! How sucky would it be if she just took off and left anyone too close to the volcano behind to die? The answer is very sucky, thank you very much. Now clad in her hero-mode lab coat (the difference between this coat and her science work coat is pretty much zero. They are the same coat. Science is hero-work too!), Sharpshooter pulls on her gloves and spread out her awareness of the surrounding area.

She soon feels the movement and mass of a small village around the other side of the capricious volcano, but she needs to get closer if she wants to be able to sense more detail than that. "Come on, WV, we can't hang around here," she says, holding out her hand to the carapacian. He takes it, and she whistles for Bec to follow as she warps into a clear space in the center of the town.
It is about as chaotic as one would expect a town in the blast zone of a huge-ass volcano would be in such circumstances. Screams fill the air, particularly those of the small children who cling to their parents. The poor kids probably don't understand why literally everyone in town is rushing around piling carts with all their worldly belongings and high-tailing it down the dirt road out of town. As Sharpshooter watches, a slim troll woman dips down to scoop up a wailing little girl and begins to drag her family's cart behind her with a single hand, her human husband bearing two little boys on each hip as he follows grimly at her side.

And yeah, there are a good nine hundred people here. Sharpshooter lets go of WV's tiny claws and whirls around in trepidation, taking in all the movement with a keen eye. Even if she wants to just teleport everyone out of here, that's a lot of matter that would have to be shifted, and a lot of these people wouldn't be willing to stop moving in the middle of a disaster, even if they'd be safer for it. It has baffled Sharpshooter since she first started interacting with large groups of people on a regular basis, how stupid the combination of large crowds and imminent danger can make people. It seems to be a universal quality.

For a silly moment, she considers having Bec help her teleport the entire volcano and its contents into the sea. As fun as that would be, though, it wouldn't do anything about the simmering underground caldera full of magma that would then be exposed when it was previously contained under the weight of an entire mountain.

Darn! The science involved would have been so interesting! What to do now?

Oh well. If she can get one person's attention, she can use them to help her figure out how best to interact with the community at large. They don't have a lot of time, though; the earth continues to rumble and heave every few minutes, and the tremors seem stronger on this section of earth than where she'd landed. "Stay right by me, okay WV?" she says urgently. The carapacian nods vigorously and clutches at the tail end of her lab coat as she jogs over to the nearest house, tripping and catching herself as she goes every time the ground shudders. The man at work outside has gone grey with age, his face a mask of lines and wrinkles. He barely spares the arrival of a strange girl in a lab coat more than a second's glance before he begins throwing things onto the back of a rickety cart. Two domesticated llamas are already hitched to the front.

Sharpshooter clears her throat. "Excuse me, sir? You guys seem to be having some trouble. Do you need any help?"

The elderly gentleman shoots her a harassed look, tossing a chicken in a small cage onto the back of his cart. "No entiendo una palabra de lo que dices, niña loca!" He continues to mutter as he hurries back into the house, while Jade blinks after him.

Okay, that's weird, usually her automatic translator would have - oh! Right. Sharpshooter removes her universal translator collar from her syaladex, where she'd placed it while at work in Grandpa's lab. It's gotten a lot of use over the past year or so, as she's crisscrossed the globe! It really comes in handy. She knows a lot of French, Latin, Greek, Russian, and Chinese, but that was all she'd had time to master over the years in between all her training to be a crime fighter. She's still working on the Spanish module, and she doesn't want to mess around with her questionable speaking skills in the middle of what appears to be a volcanic eruption.

Once it's on and operational, locked around her neck above her vocal cords, she grins at the old man when he emerges from the house with a stack of canned goods and tries again. "Sorry! What seems to be the problem? Why is everyone running around?" This time, her words have an echo, as the translator analyzes her verbal sounds and translates them into Spanish.

The look he gives her now is even more unimpressed than the first. This guy just seems to be 120% done today! Jeez! "El maldito gigante volcán va a entrar en erupción, niña tonta!"

Yeah, and okay, Sharpshooter understood that one. She does suppose that having your village be right downhill from an erupting volcano might put a damper on one's mood, but there's no reason for him to be ruuude! Silly girl, my ass!

"Well, I'm here to help out now!" she tells him. "Sharpshooter is on the job! Natural disasters, giant robots, and weird mutant monster attacks are my heroic specialty! Just tell me where you need me!"

The old man throws up his hands, and turns to yell in her face. "No tengo tiempo para sus preguntas. Tengo que sacar a mi familia a un lugar seguro!"

Sharpshooter pouts, folding her arms over her dark green catsuit. So he won't help her until his family is safe? That...makes sense, she guesses. "Too easy. Coming right up, mister shouty face!"

She analyzes the house and the people taking up space within the house using her spatial sense, and then nods to Bec. "Here boy! Can you take these guys to a safe place?"

The white wolf looks away from the smoldering volcano for the first time since they've arrived and teleports himself next to the house. "Oh, dios míos, ¿qué es ese monstruo! Mantenga ese infierno-perro lejos de mí!" the old man yelps, stumbling away from the wolf, who comes up to his waist and completely ignores his silly shenanigans.

"That's Becquere! It's my trusty dog sidekick!" Sharpshooter chirps, grinning at the horrified look on the man's face. "Watch! Bec? Rescue!" She snaps her fingers.

Bec erupts into green fire. The old man shrieks and falls to his knees as the house vanishes in a wave of crackling green flames. All that remains is a smooth patch of dirt and a single confused chicken that Jade must have overlooked. Oops.

Unfortunately, she probably should have explained what Bec was doing better, because she thinks she kind of freaking out of this poor guy! "It's okay, mister! Bec took them to the other side of thaaat mountain!" Sharpshooter tells him, pointing at a mountain far off in the distance, in the opposite direction of the active volcano. Even as she does, Bec reappears, tail wagging. "See! And now that they're safe, you can help me get everyone in the village to listen!" She beams at him.

He just stares up at her.

This is taking too long. There's something swelling on the edge of Sharpshooter's senses, a massive upwelling of magma that continues to press against the thin layer of rock between the volcano's interior and the open air. Any second now, that rock layer could crack, and all the pressure will explode outward. She grabs the man and shakes him. "Snap out of it, dummy! You have to help me get everyone else out of here, too! Pull! Yourself! Together!" She punctuates each word with a slap.

Naturally, he obliges, his eyes widening as he nods. Then she loses his attention again, his gaze drifting to the side, and she nearly facepalms until she sees who he's looking at.

The old man holds out his hands to WV. "Yo - Yo no puedo creerlo. Un caparazón! No había pensado en ver a uno en mi vida!"

Uh. Okay. At least he's not in shock over his family vanishing before his eyes anymore, even if he is looking at Mister Variable as though he's the second coming. "Yeah, me and WV here are bffsies! And we're totally here to save you guys, so you should really help me out here and focus. Right, V?" she asks, turning to smile down at WV.

The carapacian salutes her and trills an incomprehensible reply as he waves his skinny arms and his new ruler specibus above his head. He really does do that a lot, and Sharpshooter has no idea what it means. Oh well.

She notices what happens next from the corner of her eye. It isn't a strange movement that normally would have triggered her defense protocols, so it takes her a while to notice. No, it's the absence of movement. This entire time, they've been surrounded and buffeted by the furious rush of an entire village racing to flee before the onslaught of a volcanic eruption. Suddenly, all that motion and activity has ceased, even as the ground rumbles ever more furiously beneath them.

The hairs of the back of her neck prickling, Sharpshooter slowly looks around at the village.

Everyone has stopped. Everyone. As one, they have all turned towards the small group standing before the empty spot where the old man's house used to sit.

But they aren't looking at her. They're looking at WV.

"Alabe los dioses dieciséis!" the old man says, reverent as he bows his head.

WV just looks up at her and shrugs. Apparently, he doesn't get what's going on, either. The only thing Sharpshooter is getting out of this is that apparently, carapacians are a really big deal? Maybe? Uh. No, she's mostly just confused. She shrugs back.

Because at least now, everyone is paying attention. And heck, that's all she wanted in the first place. Cupping her hands around her mouth, she shouts, "Oooookay, everybody! Now that I have your attention -" She hesitates, sees that only a few people have really turned to listen to her, and adds, "- I come in the service of the carapacian you see before you, as his voice and as his ally!"

There we go. WV glowers at her, tugging hard on her coat, but she ignores him and maintains a brilliant, too-wide smile as the villagers turn their eyes on her. Heck yes. She has this one in the bag. She is the loyal acolyte of WV. It is her.

"We are here to help transport you to safety. We have already begun with this man's family!" She gestures grandly to the place where the house used to be. After a pause, WV spreads his arms and gestures toward it as well, and a low murmur of awe emerges from the crowd more than a few heads nodding. WV puffs up visibly, not understanding the weird awe but certainly happy about it.

Sharpshooter claps her hands together to get their attention one last time. "All we ask is that you stay very, very still," she instructs, beginning to spread out her senses. Now that everyone has stopped, gathering in a huge crowd with WV as the focal point, she can get a grip on everyone's mass much more accurately. They just have to maintain this for a few more seconds. "Bec! Can you target everyone while I push us?" she asks, mind racing.

The wolf huffs at her, as though to ask how she could ever doubt it. As long as Bec can keep these people's mass and position locked down for her, Sharpshooter will be able to teleport everyone as far as they need to go. It's how they manage most mass transports. Sometimes Bec provides the raw power when they need to move a single heavy object, but the wolf is really good at linking targets, too!

"Alright then -" Sharpshooter begins.

That's when the volcano explodes. The burst shatters the air, as the ground below rocks continuously and refuses to stop. Sharpshooter looks up, and can see without her scope that enormous chunks of rock are flying everywhere, while rich red lava shoots forth in explosive waves.

The order and stillness caused by WV's weird aura of celebrity breaks down as everyone screams, toppling to the ground as the earthquakes. People begin to scramble to their feet, clutching at their neighbors, but shit shit no she can't let them move, fuck it, they're doing this live -

She reaches out her hands and tugs.

She realizes too late that she can't feel the guiding influence of Bec's sensors, that there is nothing linking the targets together so she can ensure she's grabbing everyone.

It's too late. She yanks them all sideways, everyone she can cradle in her mind, and they land hard in a mountainside clearing tens of miles away from the erupting volcano.

The effort drains her, and Sharpshooter sinks onto her knees, panting. Bec appears a moment later, and she scowls at it. It is oblivious, and curls up on the ground beside her, unconcerned. WV sits up from where he landed, rubbing his head with both hands as bright green light flickers through his carapace before settling down.

Heart sinking, Sharpshooter reaches out to check the damage. How many people did she miss? How many bodies of mass did she accidentally drop on the way here because Bec failed to help her target them as one? Soon the people will begin to shriek and cry, cursing her for forgetting their loved ones in the shuffle, and she'll have failed them -

Her eyes fly open, and her heart stops for a long second. She can't really believe what she's feeling.

They're all here.

All eight hundred seventy three villagers are clustered around her in a wide spiral, shaking themselves off and practically collapsing into relieved embraces. A few shake their heads and point over at the volcano on the horizon as it puffs and erupts in the distance. "Mi esposa! Mis hijos! Mis llamas!" the old man cries, flinging his arms around his family, including the two very bored-looking llamas, still hitched to their cart.

She didn't miss anyone.

This should be impossible.

But then again, she muses, throwing her head back and laughing, soaking in the relief and happiness that fills the air, so was that strange trip to Australia all the way from Britain. Maybe her powers are still growing, in ways even Grandpa hadn't predicted!

She doesn't even care. Everyone is alright!

Amidst the frantic celebration and cries of relief, the old man breaks away from his family and takes Sharpshooter's hand. "Gracias, Francotiradora," he says, pressing his palms to hers. "Le debemos nuestras vidas. Pero usted también abandonó todo nuestros hogares a ser destruidos por el volcán."

Oops. She'd known she'd forgotten something. "I - uh, sorry. I think it's too late now. I didn't even think about your houses! I get kind of forgetful when there's a volcano exploding over my head."

He appears to think about this for a long moment, and then shrugs. "Sí. Yo comprendo."

Besides, it's too late now, Jade thinks, ruefully watching as debris from the volcanic eruption begins to reach the point on the slope far off in the distance where the village sits. But what really matters is that she got everyone out alive - buildings can be replaced. She sits down on the ground to watch the explosion from a distance, watching with interest as pyroclastic clouds of hot gas and rock flow down the sides of the volcano. If the villagers had still been standing on that mountainside when those flows hit, they're have died in the rapid flow of 1,830 °F heated debris.

But they hadn't, because Jade had been there to help. A warm glow fills her belly at the thought. Sometimes, these incidents are the brightest moments she can think of - times when she arrives at a place purely by accident, and manages to save good people. It's the most fortuitous, hopeful kind of event, and it warms her inside and out.

After a few moments of sitting back and watching the villagers celebrate, Jade rolls her shoulders and sits up, stretching with a yawn. "Alright. Our work here is done," she tells WV, patting the little guy on the head. "Way to work the crowd, WV! My man!"

WV covers his face with his hands, blushing adorably. Jade just laughs and gets to her feet, brushing the dirt and ash from her catsuit and the tails of her lab coat. "Gotta run, mister," she tells the elderly man cheerfully, adjusting her glasses on her nose. "There's a guy I gotta go see. He owes me soooo many pesterchats! I can't just let him get away with ignoring me anymore. I'm glad you guys are alright."

The old man hesitates, looking at WV for a brief moment before focusing on Jade. “Buena suerte, Francotiradora. Alabado seas, Caparazón vagabundo. Espero que usted encuentre el niño que busca, y es posible que ambos levantarse.” The old man bows his head to WV again, and smiles hesitantly at Jade.

Even with the universal translator, Jade doesn't really understand the context of half of what the old man is saying. But she gets that he's wishing her luck, and so she smiles and shakes his hand in reply. "Glad we could help. Good luck with the relocation!"

WV grabs her hand before she even turns to offer it, and she smiles. He smiles back. Bec whuffles and lurches upright, at the ready, and Jade forgives the wolf in that moment for letting her handle the mass teleport on her own. Bec always knows what's best.

"Let's go, guys. Let's get this show on the road," Jade says, grinning.

All three vanish into thin air.

 Heck yes.

Diamonds Droog detests the rain. One of her more loyal, trusted retainers holds a black umbrella over her head while she slowly types out a message on her phone, but that does not prevent the damp in the air from slowly undoing all that a regimen of hot curling irons, bobby pins, and hair spray worked so hard to achieve to keep her kinky black hair in a controlled chignon at the nape of her neck.

Britain, she thinks darkly, and then shakes her head. While the state of her hair is rapidly deteriorating, she has no more time to dwell on it. The intel coming out of New York City over the past hour has been most...enlightening. Official news reports remain as muddled and inaccurate as ever, but her little couriers have a little more context to work with than your average, fumbling reporter. She sent them in forewarned that they were dealing with children of extreme interest to the boss, and all but five have reported in thus far. Not a bad turnover rate.

All of her couriers have confirmed the presence of Flashstep and the Puppeteer, also known as the despicably elusive Brothers Strider, but only two have correctly offered speculation on the identity of the third hero to confront Dark Star and take her down.
To be fair, she did not share some of her more privileged information with them; none of them knew that Heir had been recently relocated to Houston. But only two of her birds managed to connect a flying hero in goggles with the Heir recently giving Hearts hell in Seattle? Clearly, she will have to put the rest of her couriers through their paces. They're getting sloppy, and Diamonds shall not abide sloppy work.

She reserves a private grimace for the name 'Dark Star.' Really, does the American media juggernaut have nothing better to do than creating sugary early morning talk shows and giving new superpowered beings ridiculously dramatic, inelegant nicknames? Surely they have more significant news to report, like the actual death toll from the villain's rampage, or the current price of wheat in Canada, or the recurrent political instability in the Novaya Ukraine?

When she finishes checking and rechecking the spelling and grammar of her electronic missive to the Doctor - it would not do to send anything less than a perfectly crafted message to the boss, after all - she breaks the disposable device in half and tosses it into a nearby trash can. The Doctor is always quite adamant that members of the Crew who travel abroad to Europe or Asia must follow the strictest security protocols. While the Midnight Crew may be slowly gaining infamy in the Americas, they are little more than a blip on Eurasia's radar, a faint whisper in the ears of the foreign black markets to which they provide selective goods, and that is just the way the boss likes it. They have never even made the international news, despite numerous intrepid crime reporters' attempts at writing exposés of the Crews activities. One of Diamonds's more tedious ongoing missions in life is the solemn duty of hunting down such detectives and ending their investigations rather abruptly - and permanently.

Unfortunately, her fellow Crew suit members do not make that task easy. Honestly, she swears, she is surrounded by dumb chumps. Jack Noir is easily the most competent out of any of them, and that's only because she's never seen or heard from the man in her life, and, in fact, for the record she would like to express personal doubt that he even exists as more than a figment of the Doctor's imagination, a horror story that lower ranking Crew gossip about when work is slow.

Hearts may be good for blowing things up and other brute force jobs like robbing banks and running stolen goods in and out of the country, but he's useless for more elaborate and subtle schemes. And then -

Oh, dear god. And then there's - urgh! She doesn't even want to think the name!

Diamonds shivers in her heavy, furred coat. Clubs.

And what's worse is, Clubs Deuce is the troll she has come to meet today. It is, in fact, his fault that she is currently standing on a London street enduring an unfathomably foggy spring day, her hair slowly springing outward into uncontrolled chaos as she waits on the arrival of the dimmest member of the Crew ever to make suit status.

"Oh! Diamonds! It's you!"

Balls. Speak of the hopeless little devil, and he shall appear, tripping over the too-long hems of his suit pants as he races across the busy street. Clubs Deuce is panting and waving, the tiny black club symbol on his lapel stitched haphazardly with large stitches that Diamonds can see from a mile away because he used grey thread.

She swallows back tears of righteous fury. She had learned years ago that yelling at Clubs did nothing to improve the situation. Nothing improves the situation. The situation with Clubs is beyond improvement, and may in fact function as a kind of black hole into which all hope of self-improvement is sucked and never seen again on this earth by sane men.
The problem with Clubs is not even that he is stupid, exactly. He certainly seems to understand orders, and he follows them through to the letter. He even, on rare and celebrated occasions, has demonstrated a single-minded talent for completing missions that no one else in the Crew ever deemed possible. But Diamonds prefers to assign the success of those missions to sheer dumb luck. The fact is, Clubs can take even the simplest of tasks and transform them into world-spanning missions that manage to end in impenetrably dull failures.

He is earnest. He is good-natured. And he is entirely unsuited to a life of crime. Diamonds is baffled on a daily basis by the short troll's very existence, and finds his strange, chipper enthusiasm for criminal activity to be completely at odds with a troll whose personality would be far better suited to work as a bumbling children's show host, earnestly teaching toddlers their ABCs.

Which is why, when he stumbles up to her, beaming with nubby teeth and squinting his dull brown eyes to peer up at her from under rounded, three-pronged horns, she can only heave a sigh laden with the resigned despair of those long oppressed by the fools that surround them. His suit is ill-fitting and cheap, and now drenched by the curtains of rain he just raced through without an umbrella to protect him. Clubs is not an inch over five feet tall, even including his stumpy horns, and Diamonds is forced to conclude that the universe laughed and laughed and choked on its laughter and died alone and unloved when it decided to make Clubs Deuce and Her Imperious Condescension herself almost the exact same height.

"How are you doing, Diamonds?" Clubs asks, bouncing up and down on his toes with unnatural good cheer. "What brings you to London, sir?"

"Ma'am," Diamonds corrects wearily. This is an old exercise in futility, but she lives in the hope that one day the lesson will sink in.

"Ma'am," Clubs says agreeably, though she knows he will forget the correction within moments. Clubs isn't offensive on purpose; he just truly is that absent-minded. "You just missed out on all the fun! Sharpshooter was here, but now she's in Australia! I was just on my way to the airport in hot pursuit! We're not sure how she got there, but I think maybe she's the Witch! Do you think so, Diamonds?" He gazes up at her earnestly, the genuine curiosity in his eyes just plain pitiful.

Oh, do not be perverse. Not the troll version of pitiful. She feels nothing but good, condescending, non-romantic human pity, thank you very much.

Diamonds rolls her eyes. "There is absolutely no doubt in the boss's mind that the child you have been wasting all of our foreign affairs weapons budget on is indeed the Witch. While I wish I could order you to cease making a nuisance of yourself, I have long since resigned myself to the fact that you are physically incapable of such a feat. And the boss...wishes you to continue to pursue the girl."

Clubs's eyes go wide. "Really?! You really mean it, sir?!" He clicks his heels together.

She must repeat: he clicks his heels together.

Diamonds just wants to cry at this point. But Clubs would only offer up a sodden handkerchief and politely ask what was bothering her, and the cycle of madness would continue.

If only he weren't so damn genuine! This would all be so much easier to bear if Clubs set out to antagonize her on purpose!

"Y-es," Diamonds grits out, rubbing at her temples with her fingers. She can already feel the customary Clubs-type migraine developing behind her eyes. "You are to travel to South America, which is where you would know she has already reappeared if you thought to check the memo.
updates for once in your short little life."

He doesn't even react to the cheap shot about his height, a last ditch effort by Diamonds to provoke some kind of negative reaction from the troll. "Sorry about that, Diamonds!" is all he exclaims, fiddling with his hat nervously. "If you say so!"

Show some backbone! she wants to shriek to the heavens. All she does is pinch the bridge of her nose and shake her head slowly. "In addition, the Doctor has altered your mission parameters. You are to take the girl alive and as functionally unharmed as possible, and bring her back to headquarters without delay," Diamonds rattles off. Her loyal retainer surreptitiously offers her a gun, but she shakes her head. The retainer is loyal, but he is new, and not yet familiar with the intricate dance involved in dealing with a mob of cultish lunatics and damned idiots on a daily basis.

Still, she appreciates any courier who keeps spare specibi on hand and knows when to offer them. Ten out of ten execution, Marlowe. You may yet be promoted from umbrella-holder to suit-ironer. Not many reach that level of trust in Diamonds's eyes.

"And are you going to help me, Diamonds?!" Clubs chirps. "Oh good! We haven't been able to work together in so long, sir!"

"Never again," Diamonds says vehemently, fighting the sudden painful flashbacks that threaten to overwhelm her. Oh, she remembers her last shared mission with Clubs, alright. She's still in therapy for the post-traumatic stress she developed due to the event. "And ma'am. Ma'am."

"Oh. What a shame, ma'am! Well, I suppose I should tell my guys we're heading to South America instead, before they all get on the plane and show up in Australia!" Clubs whips off the abomination of a hat Diamonds has been carefully ignoring for the sake of her already-bleeding eyeballs, and replaces it with something...that defies logic. Clubs's obsession with bizarre, elaborate headgear continues to baffle. This one appears to have been knitted out of a rainbow of coarse yarn thread, and comes to a haphazard point nearly a foot above where his horns end. "Do you think the boss will mind if I take the giant robot?"

Dignity. She must. Maintain. Her dignity. Even if everyone else in the world around her insists on unrelenting foolishness. She will maintain the dignity and reputation of the Midnight Crew single-handedly, if she must. "I am certain that the good Doctor will continue to fund your pointless exercises in tomfoolery until the day I die," she says, sighing heavily and staring off into the middle distance. "He seems to believe you obtain useful results, even if they are not necessarily the results you were sent out to achieve, in the traditional sense."

"That's great, Diamonds! What are you going to be doing, then? You didn't need to come all the way out here just to see me!" He beams at her. Clearly nothing would make him happier in this world than for Diamonds to replace her personality with that of an insipid, simpering little twit and tell him that yes, because they are just such wonderful friendcolleagues, she did come all the way to Britain just to see him.

Thankfully, she does not pander to the whim of buffoons. "No. I didn't. I have business of my own in Cairo. It was simply quicker to ensure you received your new orders in person than to trust in your dubious mastery of the group memo. Good day, Clubs."

"O-oh! Yes! Don't worry, Diamonds, I'll bring the Witch back in no time! You and the boss will be so proud of me!" Clubs exclaims. "Have fun in Cairo!"

Fun, he says. Well, yes, hunting down possible witnesses and beating the living shit out of them until they talk is rather fun, she supposes. But she understands that not everyone considers such extracurriculars fun. "Yes. Fun," she agrees, smiling slowly. She even condescends to wave back when the tiny troll rushes off down the street, waving a farewell. Several raggedy Crew members intercept him and usher him into a waiting taxi. Clubs's men often act more as handlers than underlings. They try to control the situation until Clubs's innate incompetence renders their efforts moot. Poor souls.

"Come, Marlowe," Diamonds says as the taxi disappears in the grey fog. "I have no desire to fly out of the same airport as that fool."

"Yes, ma'am," the umbrella-holder replies. He maintains an unerringly steady grip on the umbrella all the way to the waiting black Porsche and holds it as Diamonds folds herself into the car - her legs are long enough that this is a delicate process if she wishes to keep from brushing her pants against the wet side of the car. "Shall I readminister the tranquilizers to our guest?" he offers, bowing slightly with a glance at the unconscious body laid out in the cramped back seat of the car.

Diamonds twists in her seat and raising an appraising eyebrow at the unconscious man. She peels back his eyelid with a fingernail and inspects his pupil. "Oh, I believe he should be alright until we reach -"

A phone rings, and she reaches into her pocket without looking, drawing out her next disposable phone. She answers, nodding at Marlowe to enter the driver's side, as she prepares to trace the call and hunt down the unknown caller. "However did you get this number, darling? I'm very curious. Not many can contact me so easily with such a secure phone," she drawls.

I know all of your numbers, Droog. It is one of the perks of being almost omniscient. I do thank you for obliging me by utilizing disposable devices while abroad.

Diamonds stiffens and sits upright, heart thumping at the unexpected shock. "Boss. I wasn't expecting you to call so soon."

She hadn't been expecting a call at all. The boss prefers emails filled with lines of impossible to read white text when he can't hold meetings in person. She'd anticipated an email in response to her recent report when she reached Cairo, and no sooner. This is...unusual.

And unfortunately, she knows exactly why it's happening. Wincing, she yanks the black sheet of cloth back down over the unconscious man's scarred, slack face, trying and failing to think of anything other than his presence in the back seat of her car. If she doesn't think about it, maybe the Doctor won't -

A valiant effort, Droog. But I knew about your little kidnapping attempt hours before you set it into motion. I only allowed you to take our good friend Stitch all the way to London because I require his services there, and by transporting him across the Atlantic in the cargo hold you saved on air fare.

Diamonds feels sweat drip down the side of her face. She laughs shakily, one leg jittering a little with nervousness. Damn her compulsions! The last thing she'd wanted was to antagonize the Doctor again, but how could she resist? "Please, sir. He's already done such excellent work on repairing some of my favorite suits. He is...indispensable. A remarkable talent. He is wasted in that foul green basement."

Be that as it may, I do have plans for our good friend Stitch. However much you may wish it, you cannot have your own personal entropy-reversing tailor, Droog. Simply be thankful that I take you three and your compulsions into account when I have Clover balance the books for the monthly budget review.
To be placed on the same level as Hearts and Clubs - you three, indeed! - is humiliating. Diamonds worries at her lip, head bent in shame. "I - yes, sir. I shall release him to your custody."

Oh, just drop him off at the train station on your way to the secondary airport. He has places to go when he recovers from the chemically-assisted kidnapping. Thank you so much for your cooperation, Droog.

"Yeah - yes, sir," Diamonds says. "Of course, Boss."

Do have fun in Cairo. You are correct that it is a good starting point to initiate your search. I won't spoil the surprise of where you'll have to seek out Spades next!

He hangs up on her.

Ass.

"Standsted airport, ma'am?" Marlowe asks, putting the car into gear. He has patiently waited for her call to end, picking up on the sensitive nature of the call. Another checkmark for you, Mr. Marlowe. Diamonds might not even have to whip out the cue stick today.

"Yes, Marlowe," Diamonds replies, eyeing the man in the backseat with wistful disgust. It truly was foolish of her to take him. But what can she say? Once she set him to work sewing some good quality suits instead of those felt green duds, he perked right up! A little kidnapping that hardly hurt anyone!

But she dares not disobey a direct order from the Doctor. He would know. He always knows.

It is a shame. Stitch is a truly excellent tailor, even if he is a member of the Felt.

"Stop by the first train station you see," Diamonds orders, folding her legs and switching the disposable phone over to the latest private Scofflaws memo her couriers are using to pool their nonstop flood of information. "It hardly matters which, it will be the correct station no matter where we drop off Stitch. Infuriating, isn't it?"

"May I ask how that is possible, ma'am?" Marlowe asks, timid, as he begins to maneuver through traffic.

"No," Diamonds begins texting out rapid directions to her couriers in Australia, who all need to be repositioned in more advantageous stations now that the country has lost its priority status. Running an international spy network is a complex business, and Diamonds is pleased to say that hers is one of the best in the world.

The fact that so much of the Doctor's activities slip beneath her radar remains infuriating. The man is inscrutable.

Hopefully, she will have a better time of it hunting down this Spades Slick character. He first came to the attention of her network when he began probing into Crew affairs several years ago, but has since dropped off the radar entirely.

He is, however, a carapacian. And carapacians are rare enough that he cannot hide from Diamonds forever. Once she spread out her couriers, seeking news of carapacians with unusual scars, more than a few reports had begun to trickle in from Egypt. So she will begin there.

And, apparently, end up flying elsewhere in her search. She grimaces, remembering the Doctor's offhand, smirking comment about Cairo only serving as a starting point. Whatever carapacian her spies noted in Egypt, the news is clearly out of date.

No matter. She has worked with less, before, and still completed the objective promptly and with grace.

Oh yes. She will find this Spades Slick, no matter where he hides.

And she will make him rue the day he crossed the Midnight Crew.

Chapter End Notes

Whew! Wow, the first major boss battle, and no one even died! We have enjoyed success all around, kudos guys.

Well, I say success, when actually Rose is going to need some major therapy, Jade's boss battle was a freakin' volcano, and Karkat's boss took off before the fun could get started, which just set us up for some major conflict later, but we'll sort it all out. Right now, I think everyone needs a goddamn breather. John just got blown up by a grenade, flung himself across the country, and then got Horrorterror bleedoff all over his brain in the space of like three days, and even he needs to heal eventually.
Weary of Days and Hours

Chapter Summary

I am weary of days and hours,
Blown buds of barren flowers,
Desires and dreams and powers
And everything but sleep.

Chapter Notes

Now, let there be pie and cuddles. Pie. And. Cuddles. Hemogoblin and Heir belong to Real Men Wear Tights. I just like making them snuggle. SUFFER, JOHN, SUFFER THE MOIRAIL ZONE. >:D

Shout out to the people who kindly point out when I make minor continuity/formatting errors and the like. :3 I have no beta and mostly edit myself as I go along, and I know I do a pretty sketch job of it, so I appreciate it when you guys chime in! большое спасибо!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

It's a little after three in the morning when Karkat admits that the night has been a total shambles. He stops a few random muggings on his way back to the base camp in the library, keeping to the shadows so no one can get a good look at his fucked up costume and see the candy-red flush to his exposed gills, but aside from that he just heads straight back and changes out into his regular clothes in the circulation room.

He fucked up. His shitty temper ripped right through Hemogoblin's cool, controlled persona, and he fucking blew it because he's an impulsive, stupid shit when he's angry. Note to self, apparently being blown up turns Karkat into a rage-blinded worthless little fuckspoon. He'll make sure to avoid that in the future. By the time he collapses onto the back seat of the late night bus rolling back out to Maple Valley, he's worked himself into enough of a shame-frenzy that he has to stuff his hands into his hoodie pocket to keep from slapping at his head with his fists like a goddamn thirteen-year-old troll on a ragebender. The regular night bus driver already probably thinks Karkat's some kind of teenage drug dealer who commutes to the city to do shady shit every night, no need to make him think Karkat's completely pancracked on top of that.

His mood deteriorates further when his phone gets a signal again after the bus drops him off five miles from his house. He thumbs through both the text messages and the Pesterchum app with the faint, stupid hope that John will be awake for some reason and available to talk at four am. Even if he couldn't tell John any details about why he feels so fucking shitty, it would be good to just talk. But John hasn't said a word since EB: i'm sorry i caused you and my dad so much trouble! i'm going to be volunteering most of tomorrow to make up for how little i can do with this collarbone, so i might not see you until sunday. good night karkat! and great, now all Karkat's managed to do is remind himself that he probably won't see John all day today, either. What does that little shit think he's doing, anyway, working with a royally fucked-up arm? What, does the community center use slave labor or something these days?

Karkat has the distinct feeling that he's being irrational again. He crawls over the fence into his backyard and scales the wall to his bedroom window to avoid walking by Crabdad, and dumps his backpack full of ragged neoprene and Kevlar on the ground. He's probably going to have to burn the ruined uniform or something - he can't just throw that kind of thing away in the trash for some crazy dumpster diver to find, not now that it has his blood crusted all down the side. Resigning himself to idiotic bonfire shenanigans, Karkat strips down to his shirt and boxers and buries himself in the recooperacoon.

All he wants to do is sleep. Unfortunately, his brain is a perverse, unreasonable little shitstain that decides that this moment. Right now. This very moment. Would be the very best moment to replay every single mistake he made trying to recapture Hearts Boxcars.

Groaning, Karkat gives in and pummels the back of his head with a frustrated fist, faceplanting in the sopor slime. He breathes out through his nose and tiny, sluggish bubbles form in the sopor. His face burns with a shamed, cringing flush, and he struggles to just put it out of mind. If he keeps harping on about his mistakes like his brain automatically wants to, he won't get any sleep at all.

Around seven in the morning, after a few fitful snatches of sleep here and there, he gives up. The insomnia isn’t going away any time soon, and his body has become so adjusted to staying up late and waking up early for school that his fuckass brain probably thinks right now is the prime time for the end of a sleep cycle he never got to have. He's tired enough that the exact details of the chase down at the dock is an unpleasant blur that he can skim over mentally.

It's a really shitty victory, but he'll take any success at this point, not matter how pathetic. Suck it, Karkat's brain.

He showers off the sopor and puts on his four-years old Batman shirt, a pair of sweatpants gone grey from being washed too many times, and a tired hoodie that's two sizes too large for him instead of the usual one size. He stills feels awful and claustrophobic and irritable, and fuck his day job, they can go without his superior managing skills for one day. He tramples downstairs and into the kitchen, not caring that Crabdad rises with an ear-piercing shriek from its pile at the sound of the commotion. There is exactly one thing that can possibly alleviate this mood right now, and it's buried in the back of his thermal hull. Crabdad scuttles in with a serious of obnoxiously loud, curious clicks, and Karkat grabs the last tray of iced roe and winds up, one eye twitching as he flings the tray. It smacks the lusus in the middle of its face hard enough to crack the plastic tray. Crabdad just squeals with ecstasy, racing off with its prize in one claw.

Good. Karkat has no intention of sharing the next food item he pulls out of the freezer. He hid it underneath a package of frozen corn, the one thing in the household Crabdad is basically guaranteed to abjure with all the disgust in its fatass shell. He pries off the plastic cover protecting the delicate confection within. Crabdad has no idea that this pie right here is the true prize of the hour. This fucker has two solid inches of fluffy white merengue, flaky crust that still looks fresh after being horded in a freezer for weeks, and a thick filling of chocolate fudge. Tiny chocolate sprinkles cover the merengue topping, and Karkat has it on good authority that the fudge contains not just chocolate chips but solid chunks of Hershey's chocolate and the crumbs of broken Oreos, duly sacrificed in the name of crafting the single most disgustingly unhealthy pie in the history of piekind.

"I call her 'The Chocapocalypse,'" John had said reverently, eyeing the pie embodiment of joy and happiness for all man and trollkind with all of the awe and respect owed to a truly godly pie. "Please don't tell my dad."
It’s not John himself, but it’s a really fucking close second, okay.

And he is going to sit on this couch.

And eat it.

Curling up into a ball of misery and fury on the couch with a blanket wrapped around him to complete his lazy day shame costume, Karkat settles in for a day of watching some godawful rom-coms and eating his feelings. He has spent the past year and half in intensive training to get into trim fighting shape, and fuck the haters he has earned this goddamn pie.

After the first bite, he regrets none of his decisions. None of them. This pie is fucking glorious. Licking at merengue that sticks to the corner of his mouth, Karkat digs between the cushions of the couch for the remote and turns the television on. Before he puts on a movie, he sits back to devour more of this pie, scooping up forkfuls of filling and merengue that barely fit between his jaws. Maybe John isn't as oblivious as Karkat occasionally curses him for being, he muses woozily as the chocolate buzz begins to set in. Because this pie tastes like a shooshpapping mixed with chocolate ambrosia, and Karkat hadn't even realized you could moirail long-distance through pie. Truly, John is a thoughtful and considerate palemate.

He’s so lost in a haze of chocolate that he's content to sit there listening to the news for a few minutes, rolling his eyes and muttering under his breath as the usual news blurb about the situation in Novaya Ukraine (shitty as per fucking usual) lingers on the screen. They have new aerial shots of the white sheen of toxic chemicals that apparently now covers the entire southern half of the old Ukraine, which, alright, is pretty fucking interesting, even if no one can seem to give a straight answer as to what the panwasted fuck the stuff is, but other than that they just report that eighty percent of the international task force sent in have officially been recovered.

They say recovered, but Karkat has frequented some of the creepier parts of the internet, and he's seen photos of what happened to some of the soldiers they sent in to stop the genocide, the ones who came back wrong. A lot of the time, what they claim 'recovered' isn't really human afterward. Whatever those grubfucking assholes did to create this toxic pollution in Eastern Europe three years ago, Karkat's just glad the entire oligarchy turned up dead so no one could recreate it. This planet is a fucking shitsack of a world sometimes.

Yeah, this is just getting him irritated again. He scrapes at the bottom of the tin in a section where he's demolished the majority of the pie and begins to reach for the remote again.

"...And we're bringing you the latest on the destruction in New York City, where we have just received word that three as-yet unidentified heroes appear to be confronting the villainess. Experts believe two to be Flashstep and the Puppeteer, heroes normally based out of Houston, but the third remains anonymous -"

Karkat chokes on his mouthful of pie and wastes a good minute not dying, unable to take his eyes off the screen as he jabs at the volume button.

It may be go-the-fuck-back-to-sleep o’clock on a Saturday here in Seattle, but in New York it’s almost noon. Of course, he can’t tell that from the video they’re playing because the sky has gone murky and purplish with heavy, low-hanging thunder clouds, to the point that it almost looks like night again. He checks the scrolling banner across the bottom of the screen to make sure, but yeah, the new crew is definitely claiming this is a live feed from New York City. Even as he watches, the source of the darkness, a cluster of pitch-black and sulky purple thorns tangled around a female human body, races across the screen, in hot pursuit of a tiny blur of crimson and white, shattering the sides of buildings as she slams through them to reach the fleeing figure.
When another camera view from a helicopter pops up, with a closer view of the two people flying away from the roaring tangle of thorns, Karkat is glad he's too distracted to take another bite of pie, because - because, seriously, what the actual ever-loving fucking fuck is he looking at here?! He cannot possibly be witnessing this miserable excuse for a hallucination!

That’s Heir.

The hero is in some bizarre red outfit, his goggles have black frames instead of the usual pale yellow, and there’s no sign of Heir’s signature warhammer. But no other hero in the states has that kind of control over the wind, darting through the air like he’s part of the breeze himself rather than just riding it. Karkat's obsession with Heir borders on the unnatural, and he knows that's Heir.

Jesus fucking Christ, he thinks distantly, no wonder Friday night had been fucking insane for Hemogoblin; Heir just somehow manages to show up halfway across the country with the Puppeteer and Flashstep to take on this crazy chick? How had Heir even known to be there?! Is there some kind of heroic grapevine Hemogoblin hasn’t signed up for yet? A mass fruity asshole rumpus memo they neglected to sign him up for? Hemogoblin had thought they were meant to be partners now, but Heir apparently feels free to drop off the face of the earth and hightail it to New York overnight without so much as a ‘fuck you very much.’

Seriously, what the actual blithering fuck?!

Karkat is so very, very torn because on one hand, the Hemogoblin part of his brain is pissed off beyond comprehension because three heroes decided to team up without even giving him a heads up. On the other hand, OH MY GOD HEIR HAS TEAMED UP WITH FLASHSTEP AND PUPPETEER.

It takes about two seconds for the nerd half to win out over the pissed half and suddenly Karkat keens loudly, setting a skree in response from Crabdad, and rolls off the couch, squirming forward with the blanket still wrapped around his legs to get closer to the TV. The pie somehow lands unharmed on the floor as he presses up close to the television and whips out his phone, breathing unevenly as he starts frantically texting John because holy shit that kid needs to stop this volunteering bullshit right now.

CG: THAT WAS A FUCKING JOKE JOHN
CG: OH OF ALL THE TIMES FOR YOU TO GO COMPLETELY OFF THE FUCKING GRID
CG: SHIT I SET THE TV TO RECORD. IT'S OKAY, I HAVE YOU COVERED
By the time the news crews have relocated where Heir appeared and begun tracking the fight in earnest again, Karkat is literally rolling on the floor, the blanket getting more and more tangled around his body as he stares at the television screen from as many different angles as possible. Flashstep has apparently been out of the game for a while now, and the purple-and-black villainess, who the media reports keep referring to 'by the working name of Dark Star, until an official alias is announced,' uses that to her advantage, targeting the unconscious hero deliberately whenever Heir and the occasional flicker of the Puppeteer get close enough to take a slice at her. The villainess's shrieks are weirdly distorted, to the point that Karkat can't understand a word she's saying, and neither can the reporters, apparently. It's clear from some shots that Heir is trying to talk back, daringly moving in close to the wickedly sharp tentacles of darkness that writhe around Dark Star, but it's just as hard to hear his shouts with the poor quality of the video feed's audio.

Heir gets in a good shot, nearly toppling the tangle of thorns and tentacles over on its side. The villain must be getting tired or something, because her movements are getting progressively sloppy and slow.

Or at least Karkat thinks so, until, in a single liquid movement, a tendril of darkness wraps around Heir's arm and wrenches it backwards. Heir cuts himself free a moment later, but his arm hangs at a horrifying angle when he floats up where the helicopter cam can see him.

Karkat is so fucking emotionally invested by this point, his eyes are bugging halfway out of his skull, and he tears at the hair around his hornbed frantically. Oh my nubbing fuck, how he is expected to handle this kind of intense action sequence?! It's starting to hit him that he could very well be watching Heir be seriously injured any second now. That this is a villain who means business.

Aishgaosdnf, he is not okay, dammit!

The next part is blurred when the helicopter has to veer out of the way of a building, and the news channel has to switch to the godawful footage being broadcast by some lunatic filming on his camera phone from within the Met. Karkat is enraged by the lack of quality, and is aware that he has begun make a high-pitched whining noise in the back of his throat. Crabdad, who has joined him by the television for some reason and yet is somehow not being an annoying piece of shit about it, is making a similar sound, trilling occasionally and screeching at intervals. Karkat can't even bring himself to care.
The noise in Karkat's throat cuts off with a strangled gurgle as Heir and Dark Star freeze in place. The camera zooms in a little, but it's just too far away to see exactly what's going on, and Karkat is scratching at his skull now in frustration -

Abruptly, the darkness vanishes. Almost all of it - the clouds above remain, and the severed limbs the Puppeteer and Heir have been hacking off continue to lie in the streets, but the writhing tangle immediately surrounding the villainess, as well as the longer tendrils reaching up to the sky and down toward the ground, flicker out of existence as though they were never there.

The two figures hovering where the black thorns used to be fall to the ground, which doesn't make sense because one of them is Heir, and the only reason he'd fall, ever, is if he was unconscious or worse or -

Both falling bodies disappear. The phone cameraman, coughing and hacking on dust off-screen, frantically scans the area, and finally finds them again. The Puppeteer is crouched on the street with the two under his arms, one a girl in black and purple, the other Heir, who is still not moving. He stares at the camera behind his trademark pointy shades, and then disappears in a blur of movement. The news station fumbles for the next five minutes as both the phone camera and the helicopter above somehow manage to completely lose track of the heroes and the villainess.

It takes ten minutes before Karkat is willing to admit that maybe, just maybe, that's it. That's all the closure he's getting, and by closure he means fuck all. His stomach is clamped down, and the noise he's making may not be at a frequency audible to human or trollkind.

There's absolutely no way for him to find out if Heir even survived, or if the hero fell because he was dead – not unless Heir shows up on patrol whenever he returns to Seattle. If he didn't survive the fight, Karkat may never know, and the thought terrifies him, leaves him cold.

"IT CAN'T END LIKE THAT! NO. NO!" he screams. Crabdad shrieks back and pats him in what is no doubt intended as a reassuring slap on the back with a meaty claw, which naturally has the exact opposite effect on Karkat. "UNACCEPTABLE!"

After almost two hours spent frantically skipping between news channels, trying to suck the last drops of excitement out of a few different camera angles, Karkat has to admit defeat. It's noon, and he's probably starving. He says probably because he's still too worked up to feel anything but knots in his stomach. There is a brief moment of excitement that makes him drop a fledgling peanut butter and grubsauce sandwich flat on the ground when Karkat skrees and Karkat has to race back to the television. He's just in time to watch as channel 5 news plays the traffic cam footage from the road alongside Central Park, as four figures, two of them supported by the Puppeteer and Heir, all pile into one unmarked, nondescript van. They take off just ahead of the emergency crews, and after several minutes of absolutely appalling street racing technique they drive into an area where the traffic cams have been destroyed by Dark Star's rampage, and vanish for good. It's time stamped at two hours ago, and there's been nothing since then.

To Karkat's unending disgust, the news proceeds to dissolve into a frenzied free-for-all as reporters and hero researchers all scramble to analyze the fight and toss their opinion in the ring as to what the fuck had just gone down in New York. Karkat has to turn the television off after the fourth person speculating as to whether the ‘mysterious flying hero’ is a new member of the Houston team – obviously it’s Heir, come on, asshats! Are they fucking blind? This is just driving him batshit up the fucking belfrey.

Now he's just pissy, coming down off the high of watching the fight scene live on the television, and a little more of his righteous irritation is starting up in the Hemogoblin half of his brain. Maybe not irritation so much as disappointment - but Karkat does disappointment like an enraged, pissy crab anyway, so there's effectively no difference. He's heard the 'crabby' pun enough from John (oh karkat don't be karabby :))) I SWEAR TO GOD JOHN I WILL RAIN VENGEANCE UPON YOU LIKE THE FURY OF 1000 SUNS. totes crabby :) that it no longer even bothers him. The unfortunate side effects of being raised by an insane, idiotic crab lusus - the puns flow like water, and after a while they wear away at your rageglands until you lose the ability to get truly angry about it.

Making a new sandwich and stuffing the remains of the last one in Crabdad's gaping maw, Karkat sits down to have lunch at around one. He checks his phone and frowns. He wonders if John even knows about the massive showdown that just went down - Karkat is nerding out massively, and while John is weirdly neutral about the Heir of Breath, he's a total geek for Flashstep, and Karkat can't imagine the fact that Flashstep apparently took one to the throat before the fight even really got started will stop John from voraciously hunting down every second of Flashstep footage available.

Still. John usually has his phone on him at the center, even though he can only spare a moment to answer during his lunch break, but there's been nothing at all from him since last night. And as Karkat slowly munches on his sandwich, mourning the unspeakably glorious chocolate pie that had been devoured by Crabdad in his hours of distraction, he can't fight the feeling, deep in his gut, that something is wrong.

In hindsight, something has felt off since Friday, when John’s Dad had called Karkat’s home phone and asked, his nervousness concealed behind a jovial front, if John had gone to Karkat’s house, as though Karkat hadn’t literally just dropped John off in front of his house and watched him walk inside. Yeah, that had been a little strange, and Karkat had flipped his shit really embarrassingly in front of John's dad for a while. But then John had texted Karkat around midnight to tell him he was fine, but wouldn’t be able to make it to anything all day Saturday, wanting to make up for his inability to work to full capacity. Not an unusual turn of events; this soup kitchen where John works has a fuckload of emergencies every so often due to low funding or some shit. But Karkat is irate, still wondering what kind of fuckpuppets would make a man work with a broken collarbone doing whatever the hell John actually does for these people on a regular basis.

Whatever. He'll give John until four, and by then the kid will probably emerge from his goddamn volunteering coma and realize just what he's been missing out on. Then Karkat will swoop in with his five hours of recorded news reports and ten tabs of YouTube videos to save the day. This is a fucking flawless plan.

No doubt this sense of wrongness is just Karkat's troll hindbrain getting all hormonal and bitchy again, pining for a moirail that can't be there every moment of the goddamn globefucking day.

Yeah. Right.

Five in the afternoon rolls around.

Karkat's rage has been steadily growing over the past few hours. Though he is aware that crashing around the house slamming cupboard doors and doing laundry with the kind of violence usually reserved for war arenas or troll football accomplishes nothing more than to aggravate Crabdad into near hysterics and piss Karkat off further, he can't seem to stop himself.

John's volunteering generally ends at four, and he's home by four thirty, sooner if his dad picks him up, and in the meanwhile he'd be texting Karkat all the while. There is still no sign of him on Pesterchum, and on a day in which apparently the entire continental United States (or at least New York, the rational part of him whispers) has decided to go batshit insane, Karkat is Not Happy.

He finally snaps - not like that ever takes very long to happen. He picks up one of the dishes he's emptying from the dishwasher and launches it into the cupboard hard enough to crack it, and then whips his phone out of his pocket to dial John's number. He gets diddly fucking squat, and snarls when John's recorded voice chirps out the answering machine's message before hanging up. He tries the home number.

When no one fucking answers that, he forces himself to list all the logical reasons why both John and his usually reliable custodian would both have gone radio silent, again. It doesn't work, and by the time he’s out of the respite block he can barely put his phone down long enough to struggle into real clothes that aren't three fucking years old and falling apart at the seams, trying John on the Pesterchum chat app one last desperate time. His claws are almost too jittery to hit the keys, and his head throbs in time with his heartbeat. These are all probably symptoms of some kind of godawful troll disease slowly killing him from the inside out, but he can't even be assed to care anymore.

He receives absolutely no response. Karkat runs out of the house, then power walks to John’s house, refusing to let any prying neighbors see him distressed and racing off to John's house, again. He has a goddamn reputation to maintain, for Chrissakes, no matter how determined his moirail is to completely ruin him.

- Several minutes after Karkat leaves the house, the news station switches back over to the local news.

He isn’t there to hear the heated discussion of the Midnight Crew’s escape from lockup.
He doesn’t hear about the new evidence and blood samples detectives found on the top of the police station.

He doesn’t think anything of it at all.

The Egbert’s car is parked in the driveway, which is both totally normal and really worrying. The only good reason Karkat has for Dad Egbert not answering the home phone is because he got called into an emergency at his work place; but the car is here, which means Mr. Egbert should definitely be on the premises. Hesitating, Karkat scuffs his foot and ducks back behind a tree, calling the landline one last time in the hopes that maybe Mr. Egbert had just been unable to reach the phone in time.

This time, he gets a busy tone. Someone is at home, thank god. Karkat jogs the rest of the way up to the front door and knocks with more force than he usually allows himself too, shifting his weight restlessly from foot to foot as he resists the urge to kick the door in.

He can hear a faint murmur of voices from within, which means whoever’s using the phone is at the line right there in the front hallway. A low growl rumbles in the back of Karkat’s throat, the annoyance aggravating his already pretty fucking phenomenal temper to true form. Come on, all he needs is for John to open the door with that dopey, apologetic grin, and Karkat will give him the strongly-worded lecture of the century on how one does not blow off one’s troll moirail for an entire day without extensive prior notice, and then they can get back to their regularly scheduled Saturday afternoon activities.

Karkat is so far gone in his vindictive fantasy that the sound of the door swinging open surprises him. He gets his mouth halfway open, teeth bared, before he sees that Mr. Egbert has opened the door, not John.

Karkat has never seen Dad Egbert anything less than totally put together; the man cycles through any number of respectable, perfectly ironed and starched white suits combined with a completely proper and very nice hat no matter what day of the week it is, and he never has a speck of dirt or food on them even after he’s spent an entire evening baking assorted delectable confections. Even the night before, the man still had his button-up shirt on, though his hair had been ruffled.

So it’s like a sharp punch to the trachea when Mr. Egbert appears with his white suit jacket missing, the usually pristine undershirt wrinkled as though slept in, his face haggard and – holy shit is he unshaven shit fucking fucker fuck something’s wrong, John is hurt, John is sick, fuck, that’s the only reason why Mr. Egbert would look like today is the end of the fucking world –

John steps out from behind Samuel Egbert, and Karkat can’t stop the howl of pure fury that rips out of his throat as he reaches out with a hand and yanks John into a hug.

“Ahaha-ow, uh, hey Karkat!” John laughs, and Karkat feels a hand pat him awkwardly on the back. “What’s up?”

Karkat is too relieved and infuriated to answer. He eases his grip on John after that quick ‘ow’ and looks the dumbass over at arm’s length, teeth gritted as he takes in the still-present sling and the way John has to arch his shoulder a little to keep it at a comfortable angle. John can look as chipper as he fucking wants when he smiles at Karkat; he’s still got purple-black bruises under his brown eyes.

For an instant, Karkat feels disoriented, as though something about this picture is even more skewed than the obvious fact that his moirail is exhausted and injured and as dumb as a sack of hammers. But he looks again, and it’s just John – dopey, confused John who is totally fine with Karkat giving him a thorough inspection with his claws clamped around John’s arms to keep him still.

“You are absolutely forbidden from doing anything. Just. Anything at all. Why are you even moving?!” Karkat demands, pushing his way into the house without looking Samuel Egbert’s direction. Yeah, he made himself look like a complete overprotective maniac yesterday, and today’s not exactly shaping up to give a much better impression. Too fucking bad. “What the fuck could those idiots have you doing with a broken arm that’s so strenuous that you can’t text me all day?”

John looks confused, and then shifty, and Karkat knows the next words out of this kid’s mouth are going to be complete and utter bullshit. Not outright lies, but John has this thing where if he thinks the answer will hurt someone, he’ll tone his words down so much that the answer turns on a diagonal and become unrecognizable. “And none of this ‘my arm isn’t all that broken, Karkat, and I only lifted like a couple thousand pounds worth of bullshit at work today’ dipshittery, John, I swear to god,” Karkat adds before John can even get started.

John blushes, abashed. Good. As he should be, Karkat thinks with a sniff of triumph as he ushers John toward the stairs. The front door creaks closed behind them, but John’s dad doesn’t say a word about the Karkat Invasion, just walks down the hall to his office with heavy footsteps while Karkat glowers up the stairs at John’s back, half-braced in case the kid collapsed or something unfathomably horrifying like that. “I left my phone at home again,” John says sheepishly. “Which was really stupid after I did the exact same thing after school yesterday, too. I haven’t even had time to sit down and look through all your messages. Don’t tell me, don’t tell me – I’m dumb. Soooo dumb.”

“That is, in fact, the dumbest thing I’ve ever heard,” Karkat snaps, but some of the anger is already leaking out of him. Great, now he can’t even maintain a proper rage in John’s presence anymore; he’s getting all…leaky. Bleh. “Goddammit, John, sometimes I wonder how you wander around all day without me and still manage to survive. Seriously, where would you be without me? You probably totally missed out on New York, right?”

By the time they reach John’s room, Karkat’s tone has gone all gruff and weird, and he’s smiling a little as he shoves John around gently to start maneuvering around the kid’s messy bedroom. Weirdly enough, half the stuff on John’s desk is turned upside down, and his covers are piled up at the bottom of his bed, topped with half the laundry from the basket by the closet. Amazing. Even more chaos than usual. Who even knows what that’s all about. Karkat just takes advantage of the half-made pile and yanks the bedclothes and laundry onto the floor. He concedes for John’s injured sake that they need more soft things, but he also starts tossing textbooks onto his own side. He has an image to maintain, after all. He is a fucking badass, okay, he needs more pointy objects in his piles.

“New York?” John says, startled. He goes to grab a pillow from the head of his bed but Karkat flails at him with a glare until the human lets him take care of it. As though Karkat expects an injured moirail to overstress himself by lifting pillows and shit. What does John think Karkat is, a totally insensitive asshat? Honestly.

John has another weird look on his face when Karkat looks up, a cross between confusion and faint recognition. “Oh, right,” he says, laughing uncertainly. “Something went on over there, right? Wow! Talk about some shenanigans, am I right?”

Karkat glares at John and grabs him by the collar of his shirt, shifting him bodily until he’s lined up so Karkat can shove him backward into the pile without feeling guilty. “You’ve got absolutely no fucking idea what I’m talking about, do you?” Karkat says in disgust, rolling his eyes.

John looks almost anxious as he gives a halfhearted laugh, eyeing Karkat with trepidation. “Uh…”
Karkat flings up his hands. “There was a giant fucking showdown between three heroes and some batshit crazy lady that took out half the nookchafing city!” he yells, stomping over to the desk. “It’s basically the greatest, most epic thing to ever happen this entire bugfucking year, and you missed it, John!” He’s left his laptop at home with all of his saved YouTube searches, but he can remember most of the better quality links. He drags John’s computer across to the pile, the wires stretching to accommodate the move, and starts typing rapidly after John hurriedly logs in and closes all his waiting Pesterchum windows. Karkat’s block of solid grey text fill up pretty much the entire screen, but Karkat catches a flash of red and pale orange, and maybe even purple text before John closes out of the program. He doesn’t think anything much of it.

“I mean, Heir was there. Heir was in New York City!” He is babbling by this point, some of his disbelief and irritation at John’s unmatched capacity for obliviousness wiped out by the remaining emotions from earlier. He pulls up the phone camera feed – the quality is shit, but it also managed to get a more continuous stream of the entire fight than the helicopter, which had to keep fleeing and cutting out when the raging battle in the sky drew too close. The video already has a million views and counting; major heroic showdowns always get massive amounts of attention. “I mean, how? How did he even know to be there? That’s halfway across the country from where we are!”

“Wait, wha – how do you know it was Heir?” John leans forward as Karkat perches on the edge of the pile, balancing his injured arm on his knee with a faint huff. Without looking, Karkat reaches behind him into the pile and withdraws another pillow. He lifts up John’s arm gently and sets the pillow underneath without a word. “Uh, th-thanks Karkat,” John stammers out. Dope.

“Because I have a serious problem. It’s an addiction. You should probably hold an intervention for my own good, except don’t you fucking dare Egbert, there is nothing wrong with me.” Karkat sweeps the shitty quality video for when the Puppeteer first shows up, and then Heir a moment later. “Shit. Looks like this one doesn’t start until after Flashstep gets his shit wrecked. I know you’re a massive fanboy over that guy, but he only lasted like ten minutes, tops.”

“They got that on video?!” John says, genuine concern spreading across his face. Yeah, the news that Seattle’s resident hero has up and skipped out to New York barely fazes the kid, but oh fuck, Flashstep is in trouble? Crisis mode.Fuck, John has weirdass priorities.

“Not very well,” Karkat concedes as they watch the chaos unfold onscreen. “No one really noticed they’d showed up until after this maniac started tearing up the Guggenheim. And by the time they ID’d everyone, Flashstep was already out of the equation.”

The balance of the pile shifts a little too far forward, threatening to smoosh over to one side as John peers intently at the screen, his eyes glinting in the artificial light as he watches the fight. It’s less intense for Karkat this time around, but his bloodpusher still seizes in a dull panic when Dark Star and Heir, for whatever reason, fall together out of the sky, despite the fact that he knows the Puppeteer will be there to catch them. He shudders and leans into John’s side, trying to shove the morbid thoughts out of his thinkpan.

John shifts a bit, then sits back when the video cuts off, scrubbing at his face with a hand. When Karkat takes a better look at him, he can see John is exhausted, a faint twinge of pain tightening the corners of his eyes. “Were you seriously working all the fucklong day?” Karkat asks, kicking the mouse away from John’s hand when the kid goes to click on another video. “You do know that the goddamn arm will just keep bothering you if you don’t let it rest for once. Seriously, tell your job to fuck right off next week. You’re a volunteer, they can’t fire you. You’re going to hurt yourself more than you’re helping anyone at this rate.”

Karkat wonders if John even realizes how tired and utterly fucking pitiful he looks like that. “But I already had to miss some…days over this stupid arm thing. I just hate that my routine is all messed up because of a stupid injury.”

“Too fucking bad. It’s only been like, three days. It’s going to get worse before it gets better, you dumb shit.” Karkat logs off the computer over John’s protests. “No, look at you, this is the most exciting thing to happen since the Scourge Sisters broke up and had a fucking blackrom free-for-all through downtown Chicago, and you can barely keep your eyes open.”

John mumbles something that sounds suspiciously like “But I have work tonight,” which is just patently ridiculous, unless he’s talking about homework or something idiotically Egbertian like that. Karkat pushes John backward out of his hunched over crouch and mashes the kid’s face into a pillow. John growls at him halfheartedly, but he keeps his face turned into the pillow, his eyes slow to blink and heavy in the light of the desk lamp. Karkat probably should have just made the pile on the bed, but the computer wouldn’t have reached them at all, then. Whatever.

Karkat makes himself comfortable, avoiding John’s broken collarbone but tucking his head against the hollow of the opposite shoulder, patting at John’s face with a hand. “Yeah?” Karkat mutters. He makes sure to keep the rising, clicking purr at the back of his throat muted. How fucking embarrassing would it be if he broke out into full-on palerumbles after five fucking minutes in a pile? Christ, learn some self-control, Karkat. “No, I don’t fucking think so. No work for you. Congratulations. I, your lord and master and moirail, fucking forbid you from anything even remotely related to work. Not even work’s creepy human-incest cousin, volunteering. Can’t do it.”

John squirms and an elbow catches Karkat in the side. Little shit. Karkat waits with the patience of a damn saint while John figures out how he wants to adjust himself, until abruptly said patience runs out because who are we kidding, the Karkat equivalent of patience is basically just a slowly increasing rage gambit. He pats at John’s face again and wraps an arm around his waist until the kid has no choice but to lie still and fucking relax.

Karkat honestly can’t believe he’s the one doing the calming for once in this relationship. The universe is probably slowly feeding itself into a supermassive black hole in a suicidal attempt to end this backwards land madness.

“Just go the fuck to sleep,” Karkat mumbles, sticking his nose into John’s hair. John even smells off, like exhaustion and ozone and bizarrely like the ocean, but underneath that is the usual chlorine and baked goods and shampoo and human sweat smell that is John, and that’s fine. That’s fan-fucking-tastic.

- By amazing (and by amazing he means disgustingly exasperating) coincidence, Karkat’s emergency ‘wake the fuck up you lazy shit you’re missing hero work’ alarm and Samuel Egbert’s hesitant knock on the door occur within seconds of each other. “MNAGH,” Karkat says coherently, narrowly avoiding being hit by John’s nose as he ducks his head to tear his phone from his pocket and crush beneath his heel. “Dad?” John says blearily, rubbing at the spot on his left temple that means he has a headache. “What’s up?”

“Ah. Karkat still in there with you, son?” John’s dad asks, and holy fuck how can he sound so fucking cheerful and upbeat when he and Karkat’s alarm are literally the devil incarnate right now. No one who isn’t working for some angel of double-death could possibly sound that chipper while waking Karkat up from a really fucking not-stressful cuddlenap, the first real sleep he’s gotten in days. Seriously, pretty much everything on this planet stresses Karkat out, and now this? In the middle of embarrassingly sappy palecuddles?
It’s official. The universe wants to murder Karkat Vantas slowly, with feeling.

The lamp is still on, though its dim yellow light may as well now be the equivalent of the white-hot intensity of the sun to Karkat’s sore eyes. Sleeping with the temporary contacts in and his glasses still on – the worst fucking idea. The worst. He finally manages to jab the alarm off, sees that they’ve only been asleep for about four hours, and raises his arm to fling the phone at John’s wall, teeth bared in a snarl. John catches him around the elbow before he can follow through, papping blindly at Karkat’s face with his eyes squinting. John’s glasses fell off at some point, and without them his face looks much younger.

And Karkat’s heart stops because he’s still half asleep and a younger john is walking down the corridor and he won’t listen, he won’t turn around, there’s blood dripping from the walls but john won’t stop -

“Oh, yeah, Karkat’s still here,” John calls back, fumbling through the blankets and pillows and comic books until he relocates his glasses and shoves them onto his nose. That breaks through Karkat’s moment of piercing horror, and Karkat starts breathing again, a little shaky. What the actual fuck?

“I see.” Samuel Egbert’s voice is totally neutral through the buffer of the door. “Is he staying overnight, then?”

Karkat takes a moment to answer, still thrown by whatever fucked up image just flashed through his mind. He can only imagine that his face has gone deathly pale, but hopefully John is still too disoriented to notice Karkat just nearly had some kind of horrorstroke. Has his thinkpan finally, officially cracked? Where the fuck had that come from?

There’s also the fact that he’s very aware that Heir is probably still not in town. Hemogoblin would be a pretty pisspoor hero if he didn’t patrol tonight to cover the slack from the other hero’s impromptu field trip, even despite the lingering fury over Hearts Boxcars’s escape. He can’t let his emotions overrun him as a hero. Last night made that pretty fucking clear. He flipped the fuck out in true Karkat-class and look at what it had gotten him – several lungfuls of absolutely foul bay water filtered through his shitty, still-irritated gills, and fuck-all to show for it. And emotions include the overwhelming desire to stay with John, to take just one night off. He shakes his head. “Nah. Crabdad is probably flipping his shit right now,” Karkat says, hoping John doesn’t probe any further than that. There’s also no reason for Crabdad to flip out – more than usual, anyway – if Karkat stays with John, but he’s still too woozy with the aborted nap to think up a concrete excuse to bail.

Disappointment flickers across John’s face before he smiles and scratches at the back of his head. “Aw. Okay. Should probably not make the poor guy worry. You only have a few weeks left with him, right?”

Karkat can feel an old migraine approaching. “It’s an it, John, not a he. It’s just a lusus. It worries when I so much as close the fridge door the wrong way, or leave the window cracked open at night, or if I fail to organize my rom-coms in order of the box’s color rather than actor or title, both of which would actually make goddamn sense, because it’s fucking senile.”

“Yeah, but he still cares about you,” John says, yawning so widely his jaw cracks. He gets to his feet and stretches, and Karkat reluctantly does the same, stuffing his satanic phone back into his pocket. “You’re his kid! You should definitely spend some of his last few weeks together!”

John just has this thing he does where he overpersonalizes lusii. He doesn’t get that custodians can cycle through anywhere from five to ten wrigglers, depending on their lifespan, and thus there is no permanent emotional bond as there is between human parental units and their spawn. It is most likely a human thing, since their ancestral system is so much more direct and immediately accessible, as opposed to the incestuous slurry and centuries-spanning gene maps that link trolls. Karkat has resigned himself to it. Shaking his head, he steps around the abandoned computer and heads for the door. “Yeah, yeah, okay, John, I’ll pander to the fatass crab for what little time I have left to put up with it before I’m free at last.”

“That’s good. And we can get together and do something awesome tomorrow afternoon, okay, Karkat?” John promises as they stumble to the front door. “Like go to the park! The weather should be nice enough for the park, right?”

“You always think the weather is nice enough for the park. It could be negative fifty fucking degrees outside and we could piss ice in the open air and you’d still think there was a nice breeze going,” Karkat says.

John pouts at him, his eyes still all bruised with exhaustion and his shoulder hunched up. Fuck.

“Yes, fine, we can go to the park.”

Yeah, he’s having a harder and harder time telling John no.

Karkat goes to work that night, and he doesn’t think about what he saw when John’s glasses came off.

He doesn’t try to remember what he dreamed about during few fitful bursts of restless sleep he got in the ‘coon early Friday morning, what he saw in those last few confused moments of sleep after that nap in the evening.

He absolutely does not see flashes of the same images painted across the backs of his eyelids as he rides home at three in the morning, rainbows of blood streaking down the walls of the bus when he blinks and he jerks his head up, startling the nursing student who always sits across from him. It takes a moment to reassure himself that he’s awake, he’s fine, but fuck no, he’s not going to sleep well tonight, either. There’s a cold sweat breaking out along his skin that makes him tug down his sleeves and pat at his face surreptitiously with the inside of his sweater hood, to obscure any unnatural red tint that might seep through his skin.

He’d rather it just think of it as a new bout of insomnia. At least insomnia, he knows how to handle. He’s been handling his sleepless paranoia his whole life.

The dream, he can’t handle. He can’t.

Karkat dreams –

He stands in the center of a cavernous hallway, his eyes sliding over the words painted on the walls. He wants desperately to be able to read what they say, but he isn’t allowed to focus on them, his gaze drawn back toward the door at the end of the hall no matter how many times he tries to jerk his head toward the painted words.

He doesn’t feel time pass, but after a moment he is convinced, with that utter certainty that stems from the illogic of dreams, that a millennia has gone by. The hallway is unchanged because everything here is sealed in against the threat of the vacuum of space. The construct is no longer in space, of course, but the filtering and preservation systems run steadily on and on. Even the bright color of the painted words remains unchanged. Motes of dust are sucked into air recycling units before they have a chance to form more than the lightest layer of dull grey on the floor. When Karkat tries to move his feet, he sees that he has left no footprint in the dust.

At the end of the hallway, there is a resounding clang. The door dents under a single blow, and then another, and another. Finally, the vacuum seal gives, and the door crashes open, fresh air blowing through the hallway for the first time in centuries.

John walks in.

(This makes perfect sense at the time, though later Karkat will be utterly baffled. Seriously, what the hell is the context of this dream?)

John has a giant, oddly shaped lime green hammer in his hand, but it vanishes a second later as he looks around the hallway, his face quizzical. Karkat is baffled, unable to place exactly what is so strange about his moirail until John wanders down the hallway and walks by Karkat as though he isn’t even there.

This John doesn’t even reach Karkat’s chin. He can’t be more than thirteen years old.

And his eyes are bright, clear blue.

Karkat can’t move to touch John, and he is absolutely certain even if Karkat could speak, John wouldn’t be able to hear him. There’s a sense of inevitability and Karkat is resigned to the fact that all he can do is watch.

That becomes a problem when John stops, considering the painted words on the wall with his head tilted to the side. He traces one of the grafitti’d phrases, underlining it with his finger, and then shrugs. He clearly doesn’t understand what the words say.

Karkat, able to focus on and read the words for the first time, can understand. It’s messy and the paint dried in smeared splotches, but it’s pretty basic Alternian script, and he doesn’t understand why John, who’s in AP Alternian Language this year, can’t read it.

you’re gonna die motherfucker

Karkat goes cold. John keeps one hand on the wall as he steps around fallen computer equipment and piles of broken dolls, horns, and machine parts. Gradually, more of the writing on the wall comes into focus as John walks away, out of Karkat’s reach, and each message frightens Karkat more and more, until all he wants to do is grab John and shake him and fling him back out the door he came in, because at least out there he’d be safe.

YOU REALLY DON’T WANNA DO THIS MOTHERFUCKER

if you keep going you’re not gonna like what you see

TURN BACK RIGHT THE MOTHERFUCK NOW

:o(

what are you MOTHERFUCKIN’ BLIND?
John, John look at me, Karkat screams internally. His oblivious moirail keeps walking away, his shoulders tiny and his thirteen-year-old frame skinny as a leaf, and he looks so, so fragile, even more frighteningly fragile than current-John with his battered arms and constant exhaustion.

He’s walking right into a trap.

Karkat can’t move.

As John passes over the mantel into the vast inner computer lab, he turns back, blinking over his shoulder, and hope jolts through Karkat with the thought that maybe one of his mental screams somehow caught John’s attention.

Blood trickles out of John’s nose, a thick red line that trails down over his mouth and drips off his chin. John stumbles and raises a hand to touch his forehead as he shakes his head, dazed, making no move to wipe at the blood.

Don’t go don’t go it’s going to kill you don’t go –

When John raises his head, he closes his eyes and starts walking again, his sneakers squeaking too-loud in the echoing, hollow space beyond the hallway. Soon he’s out of sight, and Karkat still can’t move, can’t chase down his moirail and drag him back to safety. He’s absolutely certain, with a sickening knot in his stomach, that John is not coming back from this.

The words painted in an arch over the doorway slide into focus.

he’s gonna tear you apart

honk

:o(

From the room beyond, a monstrous roar rattles the entire structure, and the sound of claws scraping against metal pierces into Karkat’s ears until they bleed.

And John screams, and screams, and screams -

Karkat wakes up.

He doesn’t sleep again that week, though if he asked himself, he couldn’t really remember why.

He just remembers there was so much blood.

The isolation tank is an exercise in futility.

Perhaps it worked once before, in Rose’s youth, to soothe her after that grimdark breakdown she can barely recall. But the grimdark event in her childhood had been no more than a fleeting moment of horror; like being pushed down by a wave on the beach, she had experienced a brief moment of breathless loss of control. Now that she is no longer a child – now that she has endured hours drowning slowly in that endless, crushing sea – there is no palliative balm to be found by lying in a lightless, soundless tank of salt water. There is no change in the darkness when she opens her eyes or when she closes them, and the earplugs she wears to keep the salt water out of her ears renders her incapable of breaking the silence even with her own voice. The skin temperature warmth of both the water and the air around her renders the desired meditative state impossible; all she can focus on is sucking in breath after breath through her nose, half-anticipating that each breath will bring the scent of bloodbrine. How can she be expected to relax and meditate the last of the grimdark from her mind when every breath, every blink, sends her flashing back to that place where her mind had trailed off into the dark spaces between the stars?

She lies within the tanks for four hours, and only then does she concede that remaining within the tank may in fact be damaging her further rather than healing her. It is a difficult to admit such weakness, even to herself, but Rose has always prided herself on her ability to objectively analyze the psyches of those around her. She is painfully aware that she has already failed to apply this clarity of vision to herself thrice before. She failed to admit that her drinking was a problem; she failed to admit that she could no longer distinguish her own thoughts from the whispersong of the Horrorterrors; and finally, she failed to admit that she hated her mother for what she had done, until all three failures came crashing to a head.

Thus, as experience has proven, when Rose represses things, people die. She cannot afford to lose sight of herself again.

Once she has established that remaining in the isolation tank will only promote the encroachment of unpleasant memories and breath-stealing panic attacks that wring her heart and leave her hard-pressed to maintain her composure, she reaches out, trembling, to feel for a wall that she is no longer certain will be there. Perhaps she was never in the tank; perhaps she is still in that icy, grimdark sea with nothing to cling to but the tangle that burrows its way into the back of her skull, licking at her eyes and wrapping around her throat and –

Her fingers hit the smooth interior of the tank, and she is shaking in earnest now as she twists her body so that both hands press against the wall, fumbling and sliding along the smooth surface until she finds the panic button and mashes it down with the palm of her hand.

She is not sure if that last flash of panic had been simply her imagination, or a true hallucination. She makes a firm mental note to monitor any further such mental slips closely.

She must not lose sight of herself again.

When the lid clicks open and folds back, letting light spill into the tank, Rose feels tears sting at her eyes. She blinks them away before they can fall, and gasps for breath as she sits up and gets her feet beneath her, her movements sluggish in the dense, Epsom salt-laden water.

There is no one to greet her or assist her as she clumsily hoists herself out of the tank, water sloshing as she levers her legs over the rim. Monitor me only if you wish to be killed by me, she had told her mother, unable to look at Rue Lalonde’s face for fear that the surging hatred would clear a new channel for the grimdark. I am not a child, mother. I do not want your eyes upon me.

A crude warning, perhaps, but a necessary one. When the white carapacian calling herself the Personal Motorist had escorted them to the rendezvous in Newark, the sight of her mother’s angular frame and tailored white lab coat had caused such pain and fury to swell in her chest that she had been forced to bury her face in John’s shoulder as she clenched her teeth against something unspeakable. John, the same adorably naïve sweetheart that he always has been, even after three years of Rose thoroughly neglecting their friendship, had just hugged her again and asked if she was alright before frantically retracting the question. He is well aware that she is not alright.

And then, of course, John had been forced to leave. His elucidation of the situation had been jumbled and full of John’s usual chattering tangents that occur whenever he confuses himself and continues to babble regardless, expecting Rose to keep up with his wild, mutable chain of thought. She has, naturally, gleaned that John is Heir of Breath, a hero based in Seattle whom she has psychoanalyzed in passing to spend the time in years past. (That much seems almost obvious, in retrospect, and Rose is not entirely sure how she failed to recognize John behind a pair of goggles and mask for all these years. Perhaps the same way John never knew the Seer for Rose when she waltzed about in broad daylight with no more than a thin mask.) However, John himself seems uncertain of what sequence of events could have caused him to arrive without reason in Houston, somehow meet up with Flashstep and the Puppeteer, and then convince the other two heroes to join him in a race to meet Rose in New York. The journey to Houston alone should have taken John hours, but he is quite clear when he says that it took him mere seconds.

She will simply have to pester him on the subject posthaste, once she has retrieved a new laptop. Her old computer no doubt still resides at the Lalonde mansion, if it managed to escape the explosion of power that had occurred when the tangle took over Rose’s body. She never had a cell phone, had not seen the need to purchase one while trapped alone in her house with no one but the Noblest Gods for company. Somewhere along the line, Rose had convinced herself that there was no point in communicating with old friends and colleagues, and slowly reinforced the isolation of the manse through her own lack of action. She could have reinstated the postal service to the mansion; she could have used any number of social media websites to reach out to John, despite not knowing his chumhandle.

Now, she can only wonder if the grimdark had already begun to seep, cold and subtle, into her skull as early as three years ago, directing her with subconscious urges to cut herself off from those like John and Kanaya who might have been able to ease her psychological distress. She will obtain a cell phone now, in addition to a new computer, even if she must submit to her mother’s disdainful scrutiny to do so. If there is even the slightest chance the Horrors of the Furthest Ring intentionally pushed Rose to isolate herself, she will do everything in her power to prevent repeating those mistakes.

She will not lose sight of herself again.

The air of the isolation room is unpleasantly cool against her bare flesh, and Rose shivers as she collects herself, sitting on the edge of the tank for a long moment to adjust to the dim light of overhead lamp. She plucks the ear plugs from her ears, and relishes the sound of her own panicky breathing. That is most likely a bad sign, and she makes another mental note of her symptoms. She must be vigilant.

There is a small shower in a corner of the room, with towels and a bundle of white garments folded up on a table to one side, the void restraints lying on top of the clothing. Stepping carefully with wet feet, Rose strides to the shower and twists the knob until steam rises off the hot water pouring out of the showerhead in thick waves. It burns her skin when she steps under the stream, hot enough to hurt, but it is neither the sticky, sharp burn of acid, nor the icy shock of dark water, and thus infinitely preferable to any other temperature. She rinses her hair with white vinegar from an ostentatious porcelain jar that rests next to the shower, persevering through the unpleasant smell and sensation in the name of removing the excess salt from her hair.

Then she is faced with the hospital gown that is all her mother has left for Rose to wear. Clearly, her mother’s design in providing these garish, shapeless white garments is to provoke a reaction from Rose. She can practically hear the taunt underlying the gentle suggestion in her mother’s voice even now – let’s try to change our perspective a little, dear, perhaps something a bit brighter will improve your mood and help with that little anger problem, hmm?
In retaliation, Rose pulls on the clothing without protest, not letting even a fraction of her distaste curl the corners of her lips. She folds the heavy white cloth over her chest and buttons it up the side of her leg and across the diagonal cut of the collar. For a patient’s gown it bears a remarkable resemblance to the angled jaunt and flare of her mother’s usual abominable dresses; just another gauntlet thrown down in the ongoing cold war between mother and daughter. The sleeves hang baggy and ill-fitting on Rose’s shoulders, and she takes deliberate, vicious delight in ripping off a strip from the gown’s hem to use as a makeshift belt around her waist.

The only problem is the very white, very fluffy slippers that sit on the floor. White or no, they are precisely the kind of luxurious slippers that Rose thinks would feel exceedingly comfortable right now. Her mother most likely knows that these slippers would appeal to Rose, and placed them here as yet another deliberate ploy. Unlike the hospital gown, which is something Rose would never wear even in her darkest hour, and was obviously meant to provoke her ire, these slippers pose the opposite kind of trap: they are intended to soothe, a peace offering of the most sickeningly refined brand of passive-aggression: here, my lovely girl, you can at least have these; you like them, don’t you? I knew you would. They look very...cozy.

Rose does not put the slippers on.

Rose stares at the cuffs for several minutes, weighing her options. Her mother is adamant that the entire laboratory complex is thoroughly shielded with her personalized Void technology – “to ward off the wandering eyes of certain undesirable malefactors, my dear” – and that shielding provides some measure of ambient protection against the grimdark. Even now, Rose can feel how the ever-present awareness of the Horrorterrors that resides in the back of her mind, much weaker ever since she threw off the tangle’s grip, is now suppressed completely, so that the only thing she can sense is her own mind.

But until she can meditate properly and shore up her shattered mental defenses, she cannot take the risk. She clamps the restraints onto each wrist. Anything that assists her in maintaining her individual sense of self and warding off the assimilation of the grimdark is desirable at this point.

Combing her fingers through her hair, she does not look in the mirror. Her mother and her lackeys have failed to provide any of Rose’s customary supplies anyway. Her face feels uncomfortably exposed as Rose goes out into the hall. Still barefoot, the intolerably appealing slippers hooked on the fingers of one hand to discard in the first waste receptacle she finds, she pads down the hallway and begins her scouting run.

She wants to know exactly what work could possibly have so damningly vital as to have driven Rue Lalonde to leave Rose without a word, without a note, for over three years.

She is intensely curious.

- Rue Lalonde has three doctorates. Rose knows her credentials by heart, because on the occasion of her mother’s birthday - oh, five years ago? How time flies - Rose had the certificates declaring the three degrees rewritten in Japanese calligraphy, framed in garish, bright orange frames and hung like family portraits over the hearth in the living room. It had been a glorious reposte in what had, at the time, felt like an endless but mentally stimulating war between Lalondes. And Rose therefore recalls quite clearly that Rue’s degrees are in astroparticle physics, unorthodox physical cosmology, and quantum mechanics.

Thus far, Rose has investigated an inorganic chemical lab, a room that reeked of burning plastic in which a troll used robotic controls to engrave grooves on a magnified computer chip, and a fully operational surgical theater, empty at the moment but with an array of surgical tools lined up neatly on a rolling tray, apparently left over from the last major surgery. None of these disciplines lie within Rue Lalonde's purview.

This, then, is more than just her mother's new personal lab. This is a fully operational research facility, spanning more than a few thaumaturgic/alchemy fields and almost every branch of the sciences that Rose can imagine.

Rose has to sit for a long moment in the hallway, her legs crossed in a meditative fold as she leans her head back against the wall. When she has regained her self-control, she is able to acknowledge the fact that her mother has a life of her own, a successful one in fact, and that it is a life that has no open slot for a daughter to fill.

This epiphany simply wearies Rose. It is strenuous work to loathe and love and grieve for someone for three years, not knowing if they are alive or dead, and more arduous still to maintain that level of hatred after having the rage multiplied a thousandfold in a hivemind and weaponized by ravening eldritch abominations. No, Rose thinks she can look upon the face of her mother, now. The brief hours spent in the sensory deprivation tank did that much good, it would seem.

The clicking, rapid patter of feet on tile rouses Rose from her contemplation. She raises her eyes to see a familiar carapacian trotting down the corridor, the floppy grey hood of her neutral carapacian garb bouncing with each step.

PM: Oh! Hello Seer! You are awake!

PM: I'm glad!

"Personal Motorist," Rose says, smiling faintly. She, John, and Flashstep had all dipped in and out of slumber during the discreet egress from New York City, but Rose remembers the first few moments when the Puppeteer had bodily tossed the three of them into the back seat, informed them that 'seatbelts are for fucking pansies,' and then promptly buckled himself up in the passenger's seat and told PM to 'put the pedal to the metal.'

PM had, unfortunately, obliged. The first five minutes of the drive had been five minutes of high octane terror as the carapacian floored it, taking every turn on two wheels, barreling over any pile of debris that she couldn't avoid, soaring over an abandoned police road block by using the chassis of an overturned truck as a ramp, and executing one particularly flawless handbrake turn that had sent all three teenagers flying against the opposite side of the vehicle, screaming as the van skidded sideways for nearly fifteen feet. All the while PM had hunched over the steering wheel with her elbows out, squinting out from under the brim of her hood as she sought out the next most dangerous method of exiting the city.

John, still the most able-bodied person in the vehicle other than the smirking Puppeteer, had then taken matters into his own hands and forcibly buckled Dave and Rose in, just in time for PM to catch sight of approaching news crews and evade them with a violent bootlegger turn in order to peel off in the opposite direction.

It had been...an experience.

PM: Oh, no, Seer. I am not a Personal Motorist anymore!

PM: I am a Protégé M-Mediator! That is my usual title these days. Being a Motorist was a temporary designation.
"Ah. Of course. My apologies, Protégé Mediator," Rose says, rising to her feet. Rose herself is of average height, but the pale carapacian barely reaches her sternum, tilting her head back to look up at Rose with beady black eyes, her claws clacking together in the nonverbal portion of carapacian telepalogue.

PM: I wanted to seek your audience to apologize in person, Seer.

PM: It was I who delivered the Doctor's missive to you. And then I saw that when you opened it, a terrible thing happened! An awful thing!

PM: I was just so happy to be a Parcel Mistress again, I didn't realize you would be hurt! Please forgive me, Seer.

By the end of her apology, PM's face has fallen, and she clasps her claws together in jumbled shame. Rose shakes her head, somehow contorting her lips into an expression of forgiveness, when her instinct at the moment is to suppress all emotion until she can meditate in earnest. PM does not deserve to suffer undue guilt; Rose knows that there are only three beings responsible for her loss of control, and one of them is in fact an ageless, tentacled hivemind seeking nothing less than the entropic death and assimilation of all life in the universe. "Do not blame yourself for what happened, please. You have said yourself that you were only the messenger - you could not possibly have known what the letter contained, or that my reaction would be so...uncouth. There is no need for you to apologize."

The carapacian perks up visibly, her eyes crinkling in a genuine, whole-hearted smile.

PM: Thank you, Seer!

PM: You are quite right of course. It would have violated the sacred precepts of the M A I L for me to have read the letter before I delivered it.

PM: But I still wish that I could have spared you all that pain. If you ever require any assistance from a humble Protégé, please do not hesitate to ask! I would be happy to help!

"Thank you, PM. I appreciate that." Rose sees no need to turn down the offer. She is in the heart of her mother's domain, and she intends to accumulate every tactical advantage she can to preempt any unpleasant notions Rue Lalonde may get into her head concerning Rose's future. "At the moment, I seek a computer with external internet access. I wish to reconnect with a few dear friends who I owe...more than I can say, and the last computer I located seemed to be engaged in nurturing a fledgling artificial intelligence with only restricted access to the laboratory intranet. Would you be able to aid and abet me in this endeavor?"

The Mediator goes entirely still, as a dreamy, almost manic grin crosses her face.

PM: Oooooh! You wish to send...messages.

PM: Oh, yessss. Follow me!

From within her grey wrappings, the Protégé Mediator withdraws a battered, faded navy cap. She places it lovingly upon her head, and then points dramatically down the hallway before taking off at a quick trot. Rose follows her more sedately, unable to keep her forced smile from graduating into true amusement. It is hard not to be cheered in the face of such genuine, endearing enthusiasm. Rose is not certain what PM is training to mediate, but her Parcel Mistress roots are most evident.
The laboratory truly is a maze. In Rose's short wanderings she made sure to keep track of what turns she took so she could at least keep the isolation room a fixed point in her mind, but without PM guiding her she has no doubt she would have become hopelessly lost in the endless span of labs and offices. The fact that the complex is at least three stories tall, and delves who knows how far down into the earth, means that Rose could easily have ended up in another building in the complex entirely before finding herself in the computer café. PM presents the open doorway to Rose with a flourish of her claws, and Rose steps in to find herself in what appears to be a computer café. More than that, this is an outside room, with windows that actually open up on a view of the lake and forest beside the compound, and the moon rising above in the night sky. It is a refreshing change from the windowless, closed in anonymity of the artificially-lit hallways.

It is night, and yet Rose feels no need to meditate. For the first time in years, it seems, the Horrorterrors are so stymied by the Void restraints that they cannot reach out, not even to brush at her mind and lick at her sanity. It is...a welcome change.

Rose strides to the nearest desk and lifts the computer monitor, messing with the wires until she can haul it down onto the floor with a huff, setting up her new base of operations on the ground behind the desk. She sits ramrod straight with the desk pressed up against her back, a reassurance that she has something solid at her back, and boots up the computer. “Thank you, PM,” she murrums, watching the faint glow of the computer screen avidly. Unlike the artificial intelligence's incubator, the internet connection is unfiltered, though she suspects not unmonitored, and she is able to download the Pesterchum application in minutes. “Yes, this will serve well.”

The carapacian claps her hands together in delight, sitting down opposite Rose with a thump.

PM: Wonderful!

PM: May I ask who you are trying to message?

“You may indeed ask me such a thing,” Rose says, unable to resist. “Are you going to?”

PM just blinks at her quizzically, hands faltering.

PM: ?????

Rose takes pity on the carapacian. She doesn’t know how well admittedly trifling word play translates when one of the conversants makes use of a primarily telepathic dialogue system. “I am attempting to contact an old friend of mine, and a slightly newer friend who I have similarly neglected in recent months. You met John earlier – he wore a most magnificent pair of swim goggles.”

PM: Ohhhhhh. The Heir!

The Mediator nods sagely. Then she frowns, little furrowing cracks appearing between her eyes, and taps at her chin with a claw.

PM: That makes sense.

PM: It is good to stay in touch with your friends, Seer! Communication is very important!

PM: If the Heir was here, though, why didn’t he just stay? You al– friends are much stronger together than they are apart!

Rose raises an eyebrow. “Words of wisdom, PM, but I’m afraid John has an alias to maintain in Seattle,” she says, smoothly concealing the rest of her surprise. Could it be that PM here knows more about what happened this morning than she lets on? Perhaps, if Rose cannot pry candid answers from her mother, she can probe PM’s knowledge base and see how much the carapace knows. It could, after, all have simply been an offhand comment, a pithy truism, and no more, but for that slip of the tongue. You all? “You may remain if you wish, but I will most likely be occupied with mending my rather derelict relationships for the foreseeable future. There’s no need for you stay with me if you have other business to attend to.”

Almost immediately PM springs up, claws clenched before her chest in excitement. Her eyes fill with far-off awe and respect, and she is clearly enraptured by something Rose can’t see.

PM: I should go see where my teacher is.

PM: You should meet her, Seer! She is very Wise! How do you say – she is my ‘idol’!

“That sounds lovely, Mediator,” Rose says politely, but her attention is now being drawn back to the Pesterchum app as she finishes logging in to her account. There is a single name in her chumroll, and instead of being greyed out as Rose had half-hoped it would be, it is currently lit up in jade green. Kanaya is online, then. Rose hesitates, the cursor hovering over the name.

She has not been good to Kanaya. Perhaps, with John, her neglect has been more prolonged, but Rose is hideously aware that Kanaya has been forced to witness Rose’s descent into willing alcoholism, to watch Rose slowly wear away at herself until nothing remained. The very thought of rereading the endless pesterlogs of green text begging her to see reason, fruitlessly offering personal assistance through any recovery process Rose desired, makes Rose cringe.

Truly, she is a coward.

A thin, clicking hand touches her arm. Rose jolts with surprise as PM thumps her heartily on the shoulder.

PM: Don’t worry!

PM: I am sure everything will be alright! I have faith in you!

Then, without waiting for a reply, PM scurries away.

Despite the encouragement, when the Mediator patters her way out the door, her telepathic hums of delight still echoing in Rose’s mind, Rose closes her eyes and shifts her cursor to type ectoBiologist in the ‘Find New Chum!’ search engine rather than open a window to pester Kanaya. Strange, that; she would have thought John’s tendency to use ghostyTrickster for literally every forum and video game account he’d made in their middle school years would have at least prevailed until the release of Pesterchum a few years ago. Perhaps he changed it at some point.

The fact that she is not acquainted with something as simple as the circumstances surrounding John’s new handle is simply another stone to weigh heavy on her chest.

At least with John, unlike Kanaya, Rose has the advantage that the hardest part is over. John has seen her at her rope’s end, and still been willing to take her hand and lead her away from the brink. He had told her his chumhandle frantically as he boarded the jet to rush home; when she had wondered aloud if he even wanted to truly hear from her, he had just knocked his forehead against hers, saying “Roooooose!” with a laugh.

Ah, the friendship rituals of the demonstrative wild Egbert. He hasn’t changed a bit, except in all the ways that he has.
She pushes through the last of her reservations and adds ectoBiologist to her chumroll. When the chat window pops up, she goes to type immediately. No matter what John may claim, she owes him a true apology, and a long overdue chat, and she is determined to fulfill that obligation. She owes him more than an apology in fact, but John is not in the habit of taking life debts seriously. He’s too good natured.

TT: John, I

Rose stops. The pink letters taunt her from the screen, and she feels bile rise up in the back of her throat. Pressing a hand to her mouth, she leans over the trash bin under the computer desk and rides out the empty spasms. She still has not eaten anything today, and nothing comes up but pinkish saliva, but the dry heaves wrench at her stomach painfully until eventually she is able to calm herself.

Well. Scratch that, then. Her first order of business will have to be the creation of a new chumhandle. She does not know what she was thinking when she chose a handle like – that, all those years ago.

She remembers queasily that she has used some variation of tentacleTherapist for all of her fanfiction and forum accounts over the years. Perhaps she had chosen it as a humorous, even tongue-in-cheek reference to the grimdark creatures she meditated away every night, in itself a most metaphorical brand of tentacle therapy; perhaps she had simply wanted to give them the metaphorical middle finger.

Whatever the case, the sardonic handle no longer amuses her. It just turns her stomach.

She chooses a hasty new handle, and restarts the chat window. There is no doubt John will have noticed her slip, but she can do nothing about that now. With luck, he will understand, and let it pass without comment.

TT: Allow me to begin again.
TT: Nothing I say can truly mitigate the wrong I did to you.
TT: When my mother disappeared three years ago, she removed the house from all postal listings and municipal records. As far as the mail was concerned, my home became a nonentity.
TT: I could have remedied this situation any number of ways. I could have purchased a discreet post box. I could have relisted us in the records. I could have sought out your handle on any number of our old forums or contacted you on here.
TT: I did not.
TT: I chose to let our friendship cut off with no explanation, no farewell, no attempt to revive it. TT: I can only apologize, and assure you that it was no fault of your own. It was no mistake of yours that spurred this cessation of communication. Not in any way. I can in fact think of no logical reason to have isolated myself the way I did.
TT: This regrettably leaves only the illogical reason. The grimdark one.
TT: I tried to style myself a Seer of Light. And yet I failed to see how, slowly, the Noblest Gods encouraged me to cease communication with anyone who could have interfered in their grip on me.
TT: Naturally, I understand if you do not wish to revive our old camaraderie after I failed so unequivocally in holding up my end of the accord.
-- ectoBiologist [EB] has joined the chat! --
EB: hey rose!
EB: whoa, no, it’s okay rose i swear, i get it.
EB: i’m just glad that you’re alive! i mean for a while back then i thought maybe you got hurt or something and that’s why you stopped answering. which would have sucked.
EB: i even made my dad try to get in touch with your mom one time, but all your guys’ numbers had been cancelled.
TT: I am not surprised, I’m afraid. If the house did not run on alternative, self-sustaining energy resources, no doubt she would have cancelled the electricity service as well. My mother has much to answer for.
EB: seeeriously! :(
At least in the realm of exposing her mother’s faults, Rose is on familiar ground.

EB: she claimed it was because the midnight crew found you guys, but then she didn't explain why that bunch of thugs would be looking for you in the first place!
EB: she just said 'they want her power just like they wanted dave's' and none of it makes any sense rose! bleeerhhhh!
EB: i'm home now and trying to get answers from my dad, but he's being really weird about it TT: I see. It would appear you possess considerably more information about the situation than I do. What ever would a widespread criminal enterprise do with a time-stopping hero and a girl with access to all the power of the Horrorterrors of the Furthest Ring?
TT: Oh wait.
EB: yeah, that's not a very reassuring thought either...
EB: did you know your mom knew dave's bro when we were little? apparently you guys knew the striders for like three years before the crew attacking them
EB: i guess he thought maybe your mom caused the attack? or that she accidentally gave their location away? idk no one will just explain what happened!!
TT: I see. The plot thickens.
TT: So from what you have pieced together, essentially, my mother and the Puppeteer knew each other, during a period in both my and young Dave's lives in which we would have little to no recollection of the event.
TT: However, my mother no doubt single-handedly caused a falling out between the two, somehow involving this Midnight Crew, under suspicious enough circumstances that the Puppeteer continues to mistrust her. She has a unique talent for that sort of thing.
TT: After which we eventually ended up in Seattle in time to meet you, John, yet another child who would grow up with a hero complex and rather unique powers.
TT: Does that summary seem to cover it all?
EB: yeah actually, that makes a lot more sense when you say it like that!
EB: oh, and the puppeteer gets really stupid about the midnight crew.
EB: it's basically how this whole mess started. :P he seriously pissed me off telling me to run away instead of confronting them, even though they're blowing up buildings in my city! he's super paranoid about it.
EB: i get that they're dangerous, yeah, but he really suggested i should just give up without even trying EB: and that's how we found out i rage-teleport
EB: which, um. yeah, i guess - i'm sorry i never mentioned the whole hero thing? what exactly am i supposed to say?
TT: Oh, no need to worry yourself, John. As you can imagine, bringing up the fact that you possess unnatural reality-altering power and intend to use it to run around the city in a mask is hardly the way to set the tone of a potential friendship. I obviously sympathize. There was no reason to trust each other with such dangerous information when we were children, but the point is moot now.
EB: whew! thanks for being cool with it. we're both heroes, anyway, and i guess i just worry this will still make you a target. but then when i think about it apparently we're all targets anyway, so the worry is getting kind of dumb and redundant.
Rose opens up the Cetus internet browser and keeps her chat window with John visible to one side of the screen as she begins to search 'Midnight Crew' in Google. A crude method of obtaining information, clogged with the detritus of pandering, insipid news stations, but Rose has connections she can contact once she has a better understanding of the subject. Assuming they haven't forgotten her in the months she's spent a drunken wastrel, she will begin to research these Crew in earnest when she is no longer using a device no doubt monitored by her mother. No need to let Rue Lalonde know all of Rose's secrets.

Though Rose fully intends to familiarize herself with some of Rue's secrets. Her mother has much to answer for.

TT: Well, I shall attempt to draw out my mother's side of the story, though she will no doubt persist in this stonewalling that seems to characterize our guardians at the moment.
TT: But it is useless to speculate without further data. As intriguing as this is, let us put it aside for now. How have you been in my absence, John? I expect to have a complete psychological workup by the end of our session, naturally. Spill.
EB: haha, oh, wow. uh.

There is radio silence on John's end, long enough that Rose's quick glance at a police scanner transcript potentially related to Crew activity in Los Angeles transitions into a full-on analysis before she realizes John has been silent for nearly two minutes. Shaking her head, she hesitates and bites her lip before continuing the conversation.

TT: Unless, of course, you do not feel comfortable engaging with me as your unofficial psychotherapist anymore.

At the bottom of the chat window, the prompt command reads 'ectoBiologist is typing…' for another long minute, and Rose can imagine John on the other end, flailing and randomly backspacing as he fumbles for the words to let her down gently. She is surprised by how heavy the resignation feels in her chest; her pseudo-analysis of John's psyche has always been in jest, to watch John squirm and frantically deny all her accusations in good fun, but it had also been also one of the ways in which they genuinely communicated. The thought that she may have lost the right to that aspect of their friendship permanently by putting such insurmountable distance between them hurts more than she expects it to.

EB: no way! i just don't really know where to start.
EB: except i guess with total honesty! yeah! because if i know all about your secret grimdark unintentionally crazy, uh.
EB: i guess you deserve to know about my total mental breakdown?
TT: ...Come again?
EB: fuck
EB: i knew telling you about this would be a bad idea!
TT: Calm down, John. 'Mental breakdown' is simply an incredibly nonspecific term with no formal definition that could correlate with any number of extreme psychological stressors or events. I simply wish you to elucidate more specifically on the subject.
EB: no, i can tell i freaked you out! you always use way more weird words when you're freaked out! agh!
TT: John, breathe.
TT: Please tell me what happened. If you have experienced significant psychological distress, I wish to understand. Not for the sake of my curiosity, but because you are, and always have been, my friend, and now I am greatly concerned about you.
TT: Your silence would only worry me further.
She is making use of unsophisticated measures again, but John responds better to honesty and forthrightness than to subtler tactics. It is simply the kind of person he is.

EB: basically it was I guess two years ago? hadn't heard from you in about a year at that point, and i thought i was getting used to it
EB: and then i just
EB: school was hard. not like the classes were hard or anything, just that i would go in everyday and have to sit there for like six hours and there was no one to talk to.
EB: and then slowly everything started to seem like a huge federal fucking issue. like i couldn't work up the energy to really care for a while, and every time i went to class it felt like the ceiling was crushing down on me, until i almost just threw up in class one time because i was just so
EB: miserable
TT: Oh, John.
EB: and the work at night kind of made up for it, but then that started feeling really hard too! :/ i just kept thinking about how it was because i had the work i had no time for friends? and so that kind of felt like being trapped, too, even though i really like being able to help people all the time and get out in the fresh air! so after a while, i started to think it was just kind of hopeless, like no matter if i was flying or with friends i would still just couldn't win.
EB: we figured out later it was kind of this depression thing in my head, but at the time it was like everything was a great big ball of dumb and blah and i got so tired of being tired.
EB: and that's when i ran away to houston!

...And that is just enough of a plot twist to break Rose out of her stunned silence. Because, come again? That...that made no sense. John must have skipped over something rather significant, because why else would he aim for such a random destination?

TT: What.
TT: John, what on earth would possess you to go to Houston?
EB: i know, right? :P
EB: idk, i just kind of took off flying. my dad totally chewed me out for it later, but i had my goggles on and everything, i wasn't that stupid.
EB: and i considered flying to new york and checking out your house, but i had kind of resigned myself to thinking you'd want nothing to do to me? i figured you had other friends by then.
EB: so when i just started veering south i didn't really think about it, and then i ran out of energy by the time i hit colorado, so i started walking a bit until i could make it the rest of the way to houston.
EB: i totally punched out this criminal without realizing dave was like right there.
TT: And obviously, you two both being enterprising young heroes, you then proceeded to bond by arguing over jurisdiction?
EB: uh, no
EB: i kind of started crying all over him.
EB: it was embarrassing, and then i had to punch out the car-jacker again because he woke up while i was being all weird and depressed
TT: I see. I will admit, I did not see that one coming.
EB: well neither did i, and dave didn't get it either because striders aren't really all that big on emotions and things. but then we just kind of talked for a bit.
EB: and i started to feel a lot better! i guess i just really needed to get that stuff off my chest with someone who knew about the hero thing, too, someone who wasn't my dad. i mean dad means well, and he tries really hard, but he's also the one who trained me to be a hero, and i was being all weird and pissy about that too. dave was just this unbiased second party and that helped a lot.
EB: and even after i felt okay enough to come home, we kept talking a lot through pesterchum!

Rose feels a pang of jealousy, jealousy she does not deserve to feel. She buries it.
TT: I am sorry, John. I'm sorry that I was not there to help you through this. That my abrupt absence no doubt helped trigger what sounds like a significant depressive episode.
TT: I shall have to speak with Dave as well. It would appear I owe him my thanks for being there for you when I could not be.
TT: I am glad you found someone, John.

EB: agh, no rose, that's not how i meant it! you're always gonna be my first choice of psychoanalyst! dave goes on a lot of tangents about rapping and apple juice and weird mixed metaphors a lot, so it's mostly just that he's a lot of fun to talk to!
EB: and it's really probably not your fault, i'm sure of it! depression apparently has a lot of brain chemistry stuff too, so if it wasn't that it might just as well have gotten kicked off by something else entirely.
EB: and now i have a hero partner here in seattle and a friend at school, too. that seems to have helped a lot. and now you're back! :D
EB: so everything is fine! between all of us, we can tooootally handle the midnight crew no matter what bro says! right, rose?

Rose can only stare at the screen. She thinks her eyes may be too wet, but she cannot take her fingers off the keys to wipe it away.

Has John always sounded so...fragile?

She knows well that he tends to skim over darker emotions, downplaying anger and sadness in favor of maintaining an unfathomably cheerful disposition with flashes of sarcasm and overly-dramatic groans of annoyance that can be easily dismissed as jokes. She'd teased him about said defense mechanism more than once in their childhood. But this is - there is a note of almost desperation in the blue words on the screen. As though behind them John is one wrong word away from shattering.

And Rose cannot fight the feeling that her actions played more than a little part in driving him to this precarious state.

TT: Yes, John.
TT: Trust me. Now that I am aware that supposedly this Crew poses such a strangely targeted threat to us, I am most interested in assisting you in taking them down for good.
TT: I may not be at my best at the moment, but rest assured I am more than capable of researching these hooligans most thoroughly until I am assured of my control.
EB: horray! i knew i could count on you, rose! this is going to be awesome!

She tells him what he needs to hear. It also happens to be the truth, but she neglects to mention that she does not know when, if ever, she will have true control ever again. The worst case scenario is that she remains confined to the Void wards for the rest of her life, if she cannot reconstruct her mental shields properly.

And that possibility, no matter how horrifying, is more likely than Rose likes to think. She has never suffered such a complete incursion of grimdark before. It is possible that next time the Horrorterrors sing to her, she will give in even more quickly than before, made susceptible by her first descent into darkness.

John does not need to know such things. Not now, not when their relationship is still balanced on the knife's edge of both their sanities.

The door of the café is open, and that is how Rose hears the tell-tale clack of a too-familiar stride clicking against the tile floor of the hallway. It has been three years, but she still knows her mother by that confident stride. Time to bring her discussion with John to an end, then. She wishes she had more time to process this new revelation about her oldest friend, but there is no way her mother would ever pass up a chance to mock Rose at a time like this, and she does not want John caught in the crossfire.

TT: My mother approaches.
TT: It would appear that the opportunity to interrogate her is at hand. I trust you will be well if I leave you for the moment?
EB: yeah, totally, rose!
EB: just, uh
EB: message me later, okay? :)

Rose closes her eyes and rides out the guilt that clutches and claws at her heart. Oh yes. John has a right to be cautious about believing that she will contact him again. She deserves every modicum of distrust after what she put him through.

TT: I shall. It is a promise.
TT: Shall I swear it on my family name? Perhaps not - I am not overly partial to being a Lalonde at the moment. But maybe upon my light magic? Whatever would reassure you, John. I have no intention of falling into that state of isolation again.
EB: oh man, rose, i think you've been reading too much over-dramatic wizardfic again!
EB: don't worry, i believe you! we can maybe even start a memo with dave and see what he can get from bro! it'll be awesome! i think you two would like each other? or maybe just start arguing and then never shut up, i can't decide which.
EB: talk to you soon!
TT: Farewell.
-- ectoBiologist [EB] has left the chat! --

The footsteps in the corridor have come to a halt, and Rose can hear the low murmur of her mother's voice, and the sound of another person answering. Rue is not alone then, but once she has finished that conversation, she will no doubt come to bother Rose.

Well. If her privacy is almost at an end, she has nothing left to lose. She doubleclicks Kanaya's chumhandle and the window pops up.

TT: Kanaya.
TT: I do not have much time.
TT: I apologize. That was a lie. I promised that I would not lose sight of myself, that I would not lie to myself anymore. That I would not allow my mistakes this past year repeat themselves. And so I find I cannot lie and tell you that I do not have much time.
TT: I have a choice. I have always had a choice, and it took an unspeakable transgression for me to realize that I had made the wrong ones.
TT: I am ashamed, Kanaya. Sometimes I do not know whether there is an end to the offences I have committed against the two people I cared for the most, let alone what I allowed to be wrought in New York.
TT: No doubt you have seen the news, and understand why I left our last conversation so abruptly.
Suffice to say that every light casts a shadow, and my shadows falls longer than most, to the point that certain Horrors find it a most accommodating channel to work their ends. And because I did not guard myself, because I did not listen to yours or my own better judgment, perhaps thousands have died or been maimed. Millions are going to be homeless, at least.
TT: And so when I tell you I do not have much time, I do so because I am a coward, and I shrink from facing the consequences of what I have done.
TT: I would understand quite well if you did not wish to hear from me again.
TT: But I have seen what occurs when I fail to adequately communicate with those other than the Horrors at the edge of my mind.
TT: And if nothing else, you deserve better. You deserve whatever closure or apology or revenge you require.
TT: I wronged you by dragging you into this. Perhaps more so than I have wronged anyone else.
TT: …
TT: Goodbye, Kanaya.

Feeling sick to her stomach, ready to throw up again but repressing the urge vigorously, Rose closes her eyes and peers through the desk behind her with a different type of sight. Her eyes sting with pain, and the sight itself resolves slowly into focus, but it comes nonetheless, and she is able to see through to the auras of the people who have just entered the room.

With a mental recoil, she recognizes the inherent lack that is her mother, the unsettling void rimmed by the faint haze of alcohol, the only real impression Rose has ever been able to perceive of Rue Lalonde with her magic. It plays a significant role in rendering Rue Lalonde so gallingly inscrutable in her whims: the doctor strides about in her alcohol aura and knows that Rose will never see through to the woman within, a perpetual advantage in their ongoing strife.

Beside Rue is the crackling, ticking pulse of Flashstep, the boy John had called ‘Dave’ without a care for confidentiality or secret identities. To be fair, Dave himself had seemed equally unconcerned. And Rose knows well enough thanks to the slight curiosity imparted to her by her youthful association with John, a major hero fanboy, that neither Flashstep nor the Puppeteer seem to care that they fight crime with their faces totally exposed.

She does not, however, sense the Puppeteer. Strange – when the elder brother had announced abruptly that he intended to have ‘goddamn words’ with Rue, he had seemed equally adamant that Dave not ‘dick around’ and hang around Rue unless –

Rose stills, twitching, and directs her extra sight forward.

Bro Strider is hunkered down right in front of her, leaning over the top of her borrowed computer monitor with his arms folded on the edge, unreadable behind dark sunglasses. She hadn’t even felt him enter the room, a remarkable feat in and of itself, but now that she can see him, she doesn’t know how he managed to conceal himself. If Dave is a strangely familiar, steady pulse of life, marred by the occasional skip where the beats don’t quite match up, the Puppeteer is a bright, intensely warm flare, fluttering along at nearly twice the tempo.

Rose suspects this blaze is just as much an obscuration as her mother’s unsettling vacuum. She can see nothing past the flare, can discern no details of Bro’s emotional state, his power levels, or his future intent. Even in the glow of his soul, the Puppeteer remains enigmatic and emotionless, the epitome of the impassive coolkid.

Too quick to see or stop, a gloved finger stabs out and flicks Rose in the center of her forehead, just short of bruising strength. Startled, Rose’s second sight destabilizes, and she comes back to herself. “Got a wandering eye there, little Lalonde,” the man grunts.

He has called her that before. Immediately after her breakdown, Rose had been too shaken and exhausted to register it. Now, with her wits mostly restored, she stiffens, biting back a furious snarl. Her emotions remain too volatile for her to trust them.

When the rage clears away, Rose can see that the Puppeteer is watching her intently. His body language is subtle enough to be nigh unreadable, but she can see the slight tension in his hands, the way they angle toward the sword he hides beneath his shirt, along his spine. Oh yes, he caught her moment of blind fury, and he is prepared to counter it.

Rose is not offended. She is...reassured. Even as the rage fades, it gives way to something almost like gratitude. “Thank you,” she tells him simply, honestly.

The man’s eyes widen fractionally behind their concealing frames and he tilts his head to the side. “Nothin’ to thank me for, kid,” he mutters, and then he’s gone. When Rose logs off the computer and rises to her feet, dusting off her skirt and resting more of her weight than usual on the support of the desk, she sees the Puppeteer has wandered to one of the wide glass windows that line the computer café, staring out at the thick forest beyond.

Point to Rose, then. But her smile dies before it can really begin when her mother hitches a hip on the edge of another computer desk, studying Rose with her usual contemptuous, critical stare, the corner of her mouth quirked in a perpetual smirk.

Mother always knows best, after all. “Rosie,” she begins, folding her arms elegantly around her ribs, tapping long, manicured nails unsuited to a scientist who does real work against her coat. “I’m surprised, darling. I thought you’d need more of a rest after all that excitement earlier. Are you sure you’re feeling quite recovered?”

Rose wonders, with the vague weariness of having dealt with this simpering tone for a lifetime, whether Rue Lalonde was born with a unique talent for being this condescending, or if it was an art she had personally learned from the trolls’ great Condesc in some twisted, patronizing apprenticeship. “Quite recovered, Mother dearest,” she replies sweetly, the effect ruined by low, hoarse scratching of a throat shredded by the screechsongs of the Furthest Circle. She perseveres. The key to holding one’s own against Rue Lalonde in verbal strife is to never show weakness. This is, Rose finds, the key to holding one’s own in most any situation in life, really. “You couldn’t tell? It’s like you hardly even know me.” Rose slides smoothly into her next play before her mother can reply, turning to smile graciously at Dave. “Flashstep. A pleasure to meet you again, with both of us in a better frame of mind.”

“Fuck, why do we even pretend our names are a secret anymore. Why is that even a thing. Seriously, is there anyone in this room who doesn’t know my name by now?” Dave says, monotone, with any irritation he might feel hidden behind too-large shades. “Like fuck man, I need to start handing out business cards or something. Business cards with some kickass calligraphy for my name and alias. Can’t let anyone forget a name like mine, they’d waste away not knowing. Christ.”

Rose must be a little off her game. She can’t tell if she legitimately triggered some dormant irritation in Dave, or if he merely prefers to veer off into elaborate metaphorical tangents on a regular basis. She’d need further opportunities to observe him if she wants to gather the data needed to properly analyze him. “Dave, then. John and I were just discussing you. It would seem that I owe you a considerable debt.” It seemed to be a day for establishing these things, after all.

Dave freezes up. It is a fascinating process to witness because he is clearly fighting it every step of the way: his muscles twitch as he forces them relax back into a slouch, but he can’t stop the tension from stringing along his shoulders as he hunches them forward, defensive. His hand goes to the shape of a cell phone barely visible in his suit jacket pocket, though he stays himself before he removes it and stuffs his hand into his pants pocket instead. He is not nearly so practiced at emotional suppression as his elder brother, then. As much as he’d like to hide his reactions, he remains vulnerable.

“What. No, what. John what the hell. Talkin’ about me with random snarky broads,” Dave mutters, mostly to himself but loud enough for anyone to hear. “I don’t remember any of this. I was busy being unconscious this morning, passed out like a hella lightweight, dead from the goddamn neck up. The fuck have I ever done for you, Lalonde?”
“Do not call me that,” Rose cannot stop herself from growling, the sound ripping through her vocal cords raw and ragged and too close to horror for comfort. By the window, a puppet with gleaming blue eyes peers over at her from the Puppeteer’s shoulder, though the man himself doesn’t move an inch. The puppet itself is reassurance enough. Rose never thought she’d be so painfully grateful to have someone who could kill her in seconds, if the need arose, in the same room as her. She clings to that reassuring thought as she rides out the fury. Rose closes her eyes, breathes meditatively, and lets the tension flow out of her body. “I find that I would prefer Rose at the moment,” she says to the open air, careful not to look anywhere in her mother’s direction. She can stand to be in the woman’s presence, it seems, but clearly Rose’s assumption that she had grown too fatigued for anger has proven false. She must tread carefully.

Dave has his hands raised in some gesture meant to convey ‘calm the fuck down,’ no doubt. “Hell yeah. Rose it is. Ain’t no thing.” His voice is even, but Rose can see the wariness in him. Sensible of him. Rose is, after all, one of the terrible things.

“John and I have been catching up,” she continues, trying to brazen her way past her vulgar outburst. “He has informed me some of what went on approximately two years ago, and the circumstances that led you two to become acquainted. With John being John, I am certain he glossed over a troubling amount of detail to save me from the full onus of my neglect. He is foolishly kind that way. But he was quite clear when he said that you assisted him in dealing with certain consequences of my desertion. And for that I owe you more than you know.”

Dave relaxes minutely, and there is a moment, Rose thinks, of accord between them. The bond of having torn and mended John Egbert, respectively. Then he tenses up again, and she can just barely glimpse the slight hostility that grips him. “Yeah, whatever,” is all he says. “Guy needed a bro to educate him in the ways of cool; who am I to deny a supplicant when the dude comes to me on his hands and knees, all penitent and shit, requesting the humble privilege of studying under my tutelage. My tutelage is in high fucking demand, I’m telling you, but EB had true need. I still can’t break him of the goddamn unironic hero shirts. I think it’ll be my life’s work or some shit. Could write a fucking autobiography about my struggles with that kid’s hero fetish.” By the end acid almost drips from his tongue, and his hostility is clear on his face.

Ah. Rose is beginning to understand. Perhaps Dave would like to think he can obfuscate as well as his enigmatic brother, but the truth is quite the opposite. He can maintain that flimsy pokerface all he likes, but the key to Bro Strider’s stoicism is his relative silence, the choice manner in which he eliminates all non-necessary communication except through the medium of raised eyebrows, monosyllables, and truncated sentences. Because of this silence, he need never concern himself with Freudian slips or similar tells.

Dave might believe that his reflexive, rambling tangents produce the same effect, but he is quite wrong: Rose can read more and more of his emotions as time passes, plucking out his insecurities as he babbles frantically in an attempt to obscure them. It is a classic example of reaction formation: the coolkid persona is how Dave chooses to channel anxiety or any other strong emotion that he doesn’t want to acknowledge into an acceptable impulse. Being raised by a relatively emotionless elder sibling, Rose can’t imagine that Dave feels comfortable expressing any strong emotion at all. It can’t be a healthy state of mind.

They are, all of them, such broken creatures, aren’t they, Rose thinks grimly.

In this case, with the help of the prior knowledge she gained from her conversation with John, she can see clearly through the chinks in Dave’s armor, the unspoken challenge behind his words: John needed help, and somehow he came to me, and I was all he had. He was desperate and he felt so much and I couldn't just tell him to change who he was and bury it; I had to acknowledge all those emotions people have and it sucked but then he was my friend and I couldn't leave him.

You weren't here, but I was. And I will continue to be.

There are inklings here of a fiercely protective friend. At least now Rose can be sure John has been in good hands, if not the most emotionally adept ones.

"John has been quite enraptured with heroes since we were both children," she acknowledges, raising an eyebrow and trying for a snarky smirk. She may or may not succeed. "In hindsight, I am unsure why I ever thought he'd end up pursuing any course in life other than hero work, powers or no. I'm afraid that it may indeed be the work of several lifetimes to ever bring irony and heroism together in his mind. I wish you the best of luck, of course."

Dave's eyebrow flies up in response, and she can see that he remains, if not hostile, at least still tense. She has most likely confused him by meeting his hostility with acceptance, but she has confidence that after giving it some thought, he'll figure it out.

I know John, have known John. I know how his mind works, and I can see that your friendship is valuable to him. He has chosen to befriend us both, and if you are willing to be quite civil, there is no reason we can work in tandem to keep him safe and sane and whole.

No need to elaborate further. She has said what she needed to say. By the end she feels stable again, as though the mere act of utilizing her analytical mind on the fly to read Dave has helped settle the rage that continues to plague her mind. Even when she turns to her mother and looks upon the impenetrably smooth, fine features of her face, she is able to control the anger. It might be safer for all involved if Rose took the time to properly meditate first, but Rue speaks before she can excuse herself. "Would you mind if I had a word with my daughter alone, Ambrose, Dave? I understand you intend to leave soon, but I would like to see you off at the runway when the jet returns. For old time's sake."

Typical. Of course Rue would want to keep Rose off-balance during this confrontation, even by such low-handed tactics as playing the game while Rose must work twice as hard to keep her emotions in check. How disgustedly petty of the woman.

"Ain't my fucking business, Lalonde," the Puppeteer mutters from where he is now leaning with his back against the window. "If you ain't there when we leave, 'm not waiting on you."

"I wouldn't expect anything else," Rue replies sweetly, with a note of that passive-aggressive hostility she usually reserves for Rose. Hm. Intriguing. John had said the two had a rather checkered past - now Rose is left wondering just what their relationship had been. "Rose, do come along, Ambrose, Dave? I understand you intend to leave soon, but I would like to see you off at the runway when the jet returns. For old time's sake."

Oh, Mother mine. If you believe you'll be the one controlling this conversation, you had better think again.

"Oh yes, Mother. Let us talk," Rose says, with a faint smile. "A pleasure, Dave," she adds as she walks by him follows Rue Lalonde out into the hall.

"That was rather rude of you, Rosie," Rue Lalonde admonishes the moment they leave the computer cafe. They are no doubt still within the Puppeteer's hearing at the least, and Rue knows that, which means that she is deliberately speaking so that Rose is embarrassed by it. As though that is a tactic that works against Rose anymore, after all these years of inuring herself to its stings. "Snapping at the poor boy - it was unkind of you. Particularly for such a silly reason. I thought I raised a young lady."

"Well, three years is no doubt a long enough span enough to put paid to even the best laid plans, I suppose," Rose murmurs.

Rue just sighs, her heels clicking almost like PM's patter on the floor as she leads the way past yet another research lab. "It was necessary for your continued security, my dear. I apologize for being unable to explain beforehand, or contacting you until so recently, but I'm afraid our enemies have certain resources that even I cannot counteract consistently."

"Our enemies!" Rose snorts. Rue blinks and looks almost startled in the corner of Rose's eye. Excellent. John's forewarning of their guardians' strange obsession with the gang has already given Rose an advantage her mother didn't anticipate. "These Midnight Crew? I have read of their misdeeds. They are nothing more than a rabble of brutish thugs, a criminal syndicate of some skill but nothing so organized and targeted as an 'enemy.' Perhaps you have begun to grow paranoid in your old age, Mother."

"Ambrose Strider was only twenty one when they attempted to kill him," Rue says. Rose can see the way her fingers twitch as though closing around the stem of a martini glass, and is actually surprised that her mother hasn't already plucked a fresh appletini from some convenient counter throughout this conversation. In the old days, Rue Lalonde was quite literally never more than three feet from a source of liquor. "Dave was three, and from what we know now, he was the primary target. Three years old, Rose. What reason would a mere criminal gang have to target a child?"

"You are speculating," Rose insists. Not that she truly doubts her mother; it's clear enough that something is highly unusual about the Midnight Crew's shenanigans. But the more stubborn Rose plays at, the more secrets Rue will spill in an attempt to win Rose's belief. It is one of Rue's few weak points - she plays this game to win, and for a scientist, there is no greater victory than proving oneself right. Even at the expense of any pompous conspiracy she'd like to maintain. "I highly doubt that they would just walk up and announce that they wanted to kill a toddler before trying to complete the attempt -"

"They didn't try to kill Dave. They tried to take him." Rue clenches a fist, though she attempts to conceal it in the folds of her lab coat. "They attacked Ambrose only because he wouldn't stand aside."

Confirmation, then. The Crew wanted Dave, most likely for his rather unique time abilities. This fully correlates with what little John has learned. Now, Rose just has to root out why. Why on earth would a seemingly ordinary gang specializing in robbery and other mundane heists suddenly turn its attention, at least all those years ago, towards such a divergent goal? Could it really be so simple an aim as to obtain those time powers for criminal enterprises? Or is there something more, something all three guardians want to keep very well hidden?

Rose intends to find out.

They are now in a totally unfamiliar section of the laboratory complex, nowhere near either the isolation room or the computer café, and Rose activates some of her sight to better orient herself. She is very aware that in this complex, she is at the mercy of her mother's whims. The rooms around gleam with motes of light, other types of magic that Rose is familiar with from her studies. As far as she knows, her exclusive manipulation of light is unique among thaumaturgic styles, but the most basic shields and fortune-telling spells are quite simple for anyone with the mental fortitude and the correct teaching manual to utilize. It's just not common knowledge.
Rue doesn't speak again until they pass through a crowded, busy engineering lab, with a team of humans and trolls clustered around something behind a Plexiglas shield. Rose cannot see through to the object of their scrutiny, but she can feel the tingle of spells in progress, shields against possible radiation leaks and to promote quantum instability within a fixed point.

This - quantum-level experimentation - is far more along Rue Lalonde's line of expertise. They must finally have passed through to her personal labs, the heart of this isolated forest sanctum.

"I know you, darling," Rue says at last as she slides open the door to a cluttered office. The décor is the same functional, chic design as the majority of the labs' furniture, but the plush swivel chair behind the four large computer monitors is a fantastically vibrant shade of fuchsia. "For that matter, I know me. We could dance this way until the world burns around us. If there is something you mean to ask me, Rose, just ask, for once in your life. It has been three years since I've seen you and I would rather not play these games."

Rue is trying her best to sound sincere, but Rose naturally knows better than to trust her. Just enough condescension remains in the doctor's voice to verify that this is just a new brand of the same underhanded tactics as ever. Rose matches Rue, tone for tone. "Oh, of course, Mother," she drawls, folding herself into the chair on the other side of the desk, hands clasped in her lap. "Since you're so interested in clearing the air between us, then why don't we talk about John and Dave? Let's chat about how throughout the course of my childhood, you've managed to connect us to two other families with heroes, both of whom have had to or currently are dealing with said Crew? I'm so. So. Curious." She pretends to inspect her nails, but by the end her voice has gone totally flat.

"I knew them," Rue replies airily, picking absently at the strange model on her desk, her eyes hooded as she taps on one of the rings and sets the whole device spinning. Some of the hinged segments begin to weave in and out, and Rose sees at last that the model is of a series of spirographs, each layered within the other in ever smaller circles until the center, a tiny orb of metal around which the rest revolve and flip and dance.

Rose would have thought nothing of it – would not have even known the symbol's name – if not for the fact that the Horrorterror had been so obsessed with the design, and yet loathed it as well, the boundless hate only a hivemind can achieve. Even as Rose sweeps the room with her eyes, she catches a stylized spirograph emblazoned in the top right corner of a file folder stacked on Rue's cluttered desk. Perhaps Rose had simply missed it when they arrived – she had still been drifting in and out of consciousness when they arrived at the laboratories, after all – but she can see now that the ‘o’s in 'Lalonde Laboratories' are both tiny, simple spirographs on the header of her mother's stationary.

"Ambrose was an acquaintance even before he began to raise Dave, and Samuel Egbert's mother - John's grandmother - was one of my professors in college before she retired." Rue meets Rose's eyes, her eyelids still half lowered. She's concealing a lot, enough that both Rose and Rue are aware of how much is not being said behind such innocuous words. "Neither I nor Ambrose saw the attack on Dave coming. While Ambrose fled to Houston, I sought out my old mentor, only to learn she had passed away, survived by her son and grandson. Seattle seemed distant enough from Atlanta, and once there it wasn't difficult to deduce from Samuel's behavior that John possessed unusual powers. We guardians like to think that we're subtle, but there are tells that another such guardian knows to look for."

Rose does not give away her interest in the symbol. Bad enough that she must now so crudely extract answers from her mother, with no elegance or subtlety; no need to extend the torment beyond what is strictly necessary. If the spirograph is so significant a shape, Rose will surely be able to research it at her own discretion and find the answers she seeks. Certain other matters, however, may be resolved only through a brute-force interrogation. There are too many blanks in the picture, too many spaces where the narrative does not run smooth upon a second review, and Rue Lalonde may hold all the missing pieces.

"Astounding. And you do not find it an amazing coincidence that you had these connections to them at all?" Rose says mockingly. She multitasks by attempting to read the names of the file folders upside down. She can pick out 'paradigm,' naturally, and the names of other scientists listed beneath Rue's own. But there is one word, one she just isn't familiar with, no matter how she squints at it. What on earth could 'Skaian' mean?

"Not at all," Rue replies, running a hand through her hair and idly adjusting the arrangement of her curls. "Ambrose and I were close enough when we began to raise you and Dave that it was inevitable that eventually one of us would catch the other's charge in the middle of power-related antics. And it is not as though I went deliberately seeking out other parents with empowered children. Two does not a pattern make, Rose! I have sought the answers to these questions and others like them for years, and found no real explanation beyond coincidence and chance. You may like to think me some chess master, manipulating you in some inexplicable cold war of wits, but I assure you Rose, I am no such thing. You ascribe too much foresight to me than I truly have, and it is blinding you."

Rose just smiles. Her sight is working in full force by now, and though her mother may be a void, Rose can see how the edges of Rue Lalonde's shields are wavering, thrown into turmoil by Rose's pointed jabs. Oh no, Rose is not blind. She can see, better than Rue will ever know.

"I think I ascribe just enough," Rose says. Her mother is growing truly impatient now, a flush of color rising in her perfect cheeks. Just a little more, and Rose will be able to strike at her real target, the one that plagues her more than any other query thus far, though it remains linked to her earlier questions. "Are you sure you're feeling well, Mother? You seem quite flushed. Perhaps I hit too close to home for your comfort?"

"And you, Rose?" Her mother's voice is outright harsh now, as she draws forth a flask from within her lab coat. Well, that much is new - but Rose supposes a flask is far more easy to conceal around a laboratory full of one's subordinates than a martini glass. "How are you feeling? That is, after all, why I wished to speak with you in the first place - out of concern for your wellbeing. You think I am oblivious after a few years' absence, but I know the isolation tank did nothing for you. Four hours? No, that's not nearly enough for proper meditation, which begs the question of why you left that tank?" Rue sips, a single gulp that remains neat and tidy despite the slight tremble of fury in her fingers. She swallows roughly and continues. "You've grown over-proud, daughter. Do you think you're still in control of them, Rose? How much longer do you think you can keep the voice of the gods out of your head?"

The words sting. But they are precisely the questions Rose wanted to provoke, no matter how painful. She grins ferally, because she has won this round. "Oh no – you’re asking the wrong questions, Mother dearest!" Rose closes her fist around the arm of the chair and feels it crunch beneath her grip. “The question is not how long I can keep the Horrorterrors suppressed. The question is, why can I do it at all.”

Rue Lalonde sits back, looking first startled, and then despicably pleased. It becomes clear she has misunderstood Rose’s vehemence when she proceeds to say, “Well, Rose, I have always hypothesized that your power of light-based thaumaturgy provides you with the clarity of mind needed to maintain your sense of self, even in the face of minds far more vast and multifaceted than your own, and utilizing that ability in conjunction with my Void -"
“You mistake the question yet again, Mother,” Rose says coldly, and the doctor’s mouth clamps shut, her red lips twisting. “I did not have the strength to remain distinct anymore. I was able to alter the pattern the tangle meant to complete, but then I resigned myself to assimilation. By the time we reached New York, they had sapped enough of my strength and claimed enough of my mind that I had no ground to stand on. I was dying.” She pauses, then shakes her head. “And then John arrived, and I was suddenly able to hear, to speak. I knew he was there not because the tangle recognized him, not because I recognized him through brief glimpses of a masked face, but because the light told me. The light that should not have been there.”

"You underestimated yourself, my love," Rue replies, shrugging smoothly as she reclines further in her chair. Rose can see the sharp glint of intelligence in her eyes, but also that of uncertainty. "You had that strength all along; you just needed to realize you could still access it. I knew that when you saw John, he would be able to reach you, to inspire you to fight back. You two were such good friends, despite how coldly you cut him out of your life -"

Rose forces it out. "Wrong. The moment John – and Dave too, perhaps – confronted the Horrorterror, I began to regain myself." She keeps her voice steady and collected. She cannot panic. Not now. "They did not inspire me, in some pithy burst of renewed hope, to try to reclaim myself. They simply arrived, and I could access my senses once more. After mere minutes, I was able to sneak in my own command prompts and speak to John directly." Rose shakes her head. “It should have been impossible. It is impossible. But his and Dave’s presence increased my own personal powers, in a way not even the grimdark could prevent. It was a measurable, distinct increase, an amplification of my magic that had already been consumed by the sea.”

She pauses again, gasping for breath. She is speaking too rapidly, and Rue’s face has gone frighteningly blank, but she can’t stop now, not when so much else does not add up. “And then I learned that all three of you – you, Ambrose Strider, Mr. Egbert – all three of you have known each other. Three random families scattered across America, and somehow you, Mother, managed to bring us all into contact. At the very least, the strength of my powers is directly linked to John’s. I cut him out of my life, and within a year he was teetering on the brink of depression. Who does he end up running away to? By sheer coincidence, Dave Strider."

And Dave, an emotionally repressed, untrained teenager obsessed with being cool, had been able to soothe John out of a full depressive episode in the space of a day. Real therapy took weeks, if not months, to take effect, and required more than just scattered pesterings at a distance to maintain. John's recovery is unrealistic, impossible.

Unless, as PM had almost said, you all are much stronger together than you are apart.

When Rose broke John, Dave picked up the pieces with uncanny ability. When Rose broke herself, John and Dave together had been able to empower her with little more than their presence. John had spent more of that battle in New York fleeing with Dave’s unconscious body than he had talking to Rose, and she had still steadily gained in strength, as though power had been flooding into her from an outside source, bypassing the Horrorterror entirely.

None of this is normal, and all of it is somehow connected to Rue’s antics in their childhood.

"Rose, stop." Rue crushes the flask in her hand, lurching up out of the chair and leaning heavily on her desk, her eyes haunted. "Rose, you -"

"If you think I cannot see there is a pattern here, you vastly underestimate me. And so I will ask you one time, and one time only. What are you not telling me, Mother?"

"Rose. Rose, breathe," Rue commands, reaching out to touch Rose's face with a seeking hand.
All Rose wants to do is tear that offending limb off and paint the walls with the blood that pours forth -

And -

I've gone too far.

The full weight of her rage smashes into Rose then, and she gasps with it, wrapping her arms around her waist as her stomach knots itself in unspeakable fury. It feels as though she's being torn in two.

She must leave, before she does something she will truly regret. Standing up so quickly the chair topples over backwards, Rose uses a wild wave of magic to slam the glass door of Rue's office aside, shattering the glass. The cluster of scientists beyond yelp and scatter as Rose half-runs, half-staggers out of the office, ignoring her mother's shouted, desperate orders. She is off-balance and lurching as she races through the labs and out into the main hallway, veering too close to walls and corners as she darts her way to an empty lab and closes the door behind her.

Her information gambit has failed entirely. She may have won a round or two against Rue Lalonde, but in the end it is clear the gambit falls to Rue by default. Rose cannot control herself enough to finish the game.

She stumbles into a corner, getting a wall to her back to lean on, and folds her legs, sucking in uneven breaths through her nose. Sweat plasters the hospital gown to her back, and she rests her head in her hands for a few long moments before she can sit upright. Everything feels tight and closed in, and she cannot distance herself from what she perceives - the cold of the tile floor, the whir of the fume hood running two labs down the hall, the rustling movement of the trees outside that she shouldn't be able to see from in here. The last of her filters and shields have cracked, and everything is a nonstop stream of light and information and incomprehensible gibberish. She cannot put this off anymore, not when all she wants to do is teleport back to that despicably cluttered office with its insipid pink chair and tear that woman apart, that woman who reminds Rose of herself in all the worst ways.

Aren't they, in a way, exactly the same? Isn't that why she and her mother clash so spectacularly - both of them striving and clawing and sniping at the other because they are the exact same?

Maybe that is why Rose hates so much. When it comes down to it, to the barest, basest, ugliest facts, Rose is no better. Because when John needed her most, she severed him from her life, lost in her waking nightmares and her delusions of heroism and her haze of prideful, spiteful independence.

She did the same thing to him that Rue had done to her, and she had not even spared a thought to the hypocrisy of it all.

Like mother, like daughter.

If this is some innate quality of Lalondes, some genetic proclivity for discarding old loved ones like so much cast-off trash, then she wants no part of it. If this is how a Lalonde loves, in fitful, stumbling, careless bursts that trail off into nothing, into a void, then Rose does not want to be a Lalonde anymore.

Swallowing another sob, Rose shuts herself off from the waking world, and plunges into the internal visions of her mind. With shaking hands, she forces herself to take up the trailing, unraveling edges of her shields, and begin to slowly, carefully knit them back together. The needles in her hands look like wands, and as she slowly sinks her mind into the shields and strings them around her mind, across the Void-blocked channel to the grimdark, she falls into the familiar pattern of meditation. Not even the anger can reach her here.

And yet, she has never felt so lost before in her life.

One thing is quite clear. No matter how the Void of Lalonde Laboratories may ease the presence of the many-angled ones, Rose cannot stay here any longer. She cannot rest here, not as she needs to. And New York is no longer an option.

She will consider her options further when she is no longer on the brink of falling apart all over again. For now, she knits and knits in the corner of the lab, piecing her mind back together from the inside out.

By the time they get home, the collar is completely fried. The exposed wires burn along the side of Dave's neck, right on top of the ever-present throb of the giant fucking hole the Horrorterror ripped through his neck and shoulder, and he endures it with a stoic face for as long as he can. Longer than a smart person would have, maybe, but no one has ever claimed common sense was Dave's specialty.

"Kid."

"I know."

"...Kid."

"I fucking know. Fuck."

He wants, more than anything, to still be with John. Heck, even that Rose chick would be great to hang out with right now. He just wants someone to fucking talk to, while he still can, but instead he's stuck with Bro in this shitty private jet. And of course this is Bro; the man thinks talking is so lame, speech deserves to be devoured by a fucking mountain lion in the name of natural selection. No way is he desperate enough to call the stewardess over and yap at her, though; he has standards still, okay.

Just. Fuck. It feels like his throat is going to catch on fire, and he hums to himself, staring out through the window and trying to think of a song, any goddamn song, that isn't by Katy Perry so he can sing or mix out loud or something without Bro giving him shit.

"You're gonna fucking hurt yourself, you dumb shit," Bro informs him. He's perched himself on top of the back of the seat across the row, and stares down implacably like a giant bird of prey. Lil Cal, perversely, is safely buckled into the seat, one floppy gloved hand wrapped around a glass of ginger ale. The level of ginger ale has been steadily decreasing ever since the stewardess delivered it, and that wouldn't unnerve Dave so much except that he can usually sense when Bro is manipulating his puppets, and Bro hasn't moved a fucking inch. Yet every time Dave blinks, watching this spectacle from the corner of his eyes, the glass empties more.

Yeah, he's basically shitting himself with terror over here. He has put up with that fuckass clown puppet for too long, and it's finally driven him insane. "Dude, I want that thing banished from our household, like, yesterday," Dave mumbles, sparks fizzling against the side of his neck. "Our ancestors frown upon it, and I'm pretty sure it's single-handedly responsible for the fact that all of our rice crops failed this year. Get rid of it or I fucking disown you and you can go join the army disguised as a man to support your sick homicidal possessed puppet fetish, alright? Are we clear?"

"Kid, you're not even makin' sense anymore." Bro adjusts his shades, but doesn't immediately move to ritually disembowel Lil Cal, which means he's being a rebellious daughter and needs to be taught a lesson in Han dynasty respect. "You're trying to make Mulan ironic. Mulan is not ironic. Mulan is a piece of cinematic genius. Take off the collar, you're just being a stubborn little prick now."

"Oh my god. Fuck you. Wait, what else was I going to say? Right. Fuck. You." Dave digs into his empty glass of apple juice for one of the previously pointless ice cubes. He presses the ice to the side of his neck and nearly punches through the wall of the airplane to express his extremely manly, extremely stoic relief. Hell yes.

The next second, the ice has been ripped out of his hand. When he looks up, mouth open in a too-dramatic grimace, he sees Bro has confiscated the entire glass of ice as well and is now popping ice cubes into his mouth. "What the fuck."

"Stop swearing, you foul-mouthed barbarian. Do I need to rinse your mouth out with soap or some shit?" Bro places an ice cube by Lil Cal's hand. Dave refuses to look and see what happens to it. Enough of the puppet. He is so fucking over the puppet. "You heard litltl- Rose. Talks like a properly educated young lady. Where the fuck did I go wrong with your punk ass?"

Dave stares.

Bro stares back, completely impassive, as he loudly crunches down on an ice cube.

Dave can't even tell if this is irony anymore, or just some sick, sick game for Bro's perverted pleasures and they're all secretly on Smuppets Live, in which case, no. "Give me back my ice." When Bro raises an eyebrow and wiggles it, Dave grits his teeth and forces out, "Please. Oh my fuck never make me say that again."

"Don't get your goddamn feathers ruffled. You're not getting this back. It's mine now, little man," Bro says, still sticking his fingers into the glass of ice and come on, man, who even knows where those hands have been?!

(The answer is, they've been up puppet butts. The answer is promptly deemed too horrifying to contemplate further and is erased from the memory of paradox space.)

"Stop being a massive douchecanoe."

"No. You were letting ice water melt all over a bunch of exposed wiring, just how dumb of a fuck are you?"

Yeah, Dave honestly hadn't considered that. Well, shit. He can't back down now. "Just give it back."

"No."

"I will pry that glass out of your cold, dead anime gloves," Dave says, tensing. Are they seriously doing this here, thirty thousand feet in the air when they're basically thirty minutes from Houston?

Bro swallows an ice cube whole, apparently with the intent of eating the entire freaking glass and in doing so win the coveted title of 'World's Biggest Fucknugget.' "You could try, little man," he drawls.

Dave stops time and flings himself out of the seat. It's go-time.

Bro knows the attack is coming of course, and somehow prepares himself for the assault even before Dave twists time to a halt. This always fucking happens. When Dave is forced to let time go, his fist inches from Bro's face, there is a blur of movement and then Bro wraps an arm around Dave's wrist, tucking Dave's punch under his arm and bringing the attack to a dead halt.
Coolly pissed, Dave uses the rest of his momentum to slam a knee up into Bro's side during the next stopped moment of time. He thinks it connects, until time starts up again and he sees that Lil Cal has taken the blow and wrapped its spindly puppet limbs around Dave's leg.

He screams hoarsely, with a piercing note vaguely reminiscent of a little girl. He refuses to be ashamed of this, particularly not when he can blame the shitty sound quality on the collar currently burning a ring through his throat. He wastes his next free moment peeling the puppet off his knee. Lil Cal's blue eyes arrest him, and Dave can only stand there, motionless, one arm still pinned by Bro, and meet that horrific gaze before punting the puppet back at Bro's face.

Bro tosses Dave to the side. Dave skids, the flimsy carpet ripping up in a huge square under his feet. This time he aims straight for the glass of ice, which Bro still holds in one hand. Victory doesn't have to include punching Bro out for the first time in Dave's life; he'll take any kind of win at this point, before the pain of the collar fizzling against his neck takes him out of the fight. The burning isn't anywhere near as bad as the kind of havoc travelling back in time plays with his throat, but it's going to start doing some real damage, soon.

In one smooth motion, Bro tosses the glass of ice up in the air and tries to palmheel Dave in the nose. Victory doesn't have to include punching Bro out for the first time in Dave's life; he'll take any kind of win at this point, before the pain of the collar fizzling against his neck takes him out of the fight. The burning isn't anywhere near as bad as the kind of havoc travelling back in time plays with his throat, but it's going to start doing some real damage, soon.

Bro tosses Dave to the side. Dave skids, the flimsy carpet ripping up in a huge square under his feet. This time he aims straight for the glass of ice, which Bro still holds in one hand. Victory doesn't have to include punching Bro out for the first time in Dave's life; he'll take any kind of win at this point, before the pain of the collar fizzling against his neck takes him out of the fight. The burning isn't anywhere near as bad as the kind of havoc travelling back in time plays with his throat, but it's going to start doing some real damage, soon.

His back slams right into Bro, who has finally abandoned his perch on the back of the seat and waits in the middle of the aisle for Dave to bring the glass back to him.

The most humiliating part? Bro hasn't taken out his sword. He's not even taking this seriously. Nope, Dave's in such shitty condition, even Bro is taking it easy on him. Fucking fuck.

"Okay, you dipshits, we will begin our final descent at Hobby Airport in ten minutes, so siddown and stop tearing holes in my ship!" the pilot bellows over the intercom.

With a smirk, Bro shoves his foot down into the back of Dave's knees and reaches out with a long arm to yoink the collar off Dave's neck before he can react to defend himself. Dave catches himself and whirls to face Bro; Bro just twirls the crumpled piece of metal around his finger, raises an eyebrow, and kicks Dave in the chest so hard he goes flying ten feet through the air. Dave rolls awkwardly because the plane is tilting at an unholy angle by now and comes up in a fighting stance, sword drawn at last as he uses it to stab into the floor and halt his tumble. He's just in time to watch Bro down the last remaining chunks of ice in one ungodly chug. It looks like he swallows the ice whole.

Oh my god. Why. Dave could have gone his whole life without that mental image to haunt him. For a moment, Dave considers going back in time to steal the collar back. Bro, as though reading Dave's mind, proceeds to shred the wiring out of its metal casing with expert fingers. Dave breathes out hard, not quite able to process the act of desecration going on right in front of him. Bro then dumps the remains of the collar in the empty glass of ginger ale that sits before Lil Cal; the puppet is propped up in its seat as if it had never moved from the spot. This basically guarantees Dave is too freaked out to try to retrieve the parts. Not that he could have recreated the inner workings now that Bro's torn it apart, anyway - Bro's the freaky mechanical expert, not Dave.

"You're a fucking asshole," Dave goes to say, rubbing his throat and feeling the hum of his vocal cords beneath his skin. As always, there's that faint, stupid hope that this time it'll be different, this time, it'll work -

Nothing comes out of his mouth.
Dave doesn’t sign a single word all through the trip home from the airport. He can’t bring himself to admit defeat, not even to sign one of the choice sick burns directed at Bro that he’s steadily accumulating in his head. The urge to talk, on the other hand, lodges like a tumor in his throat, a constant pressure whenever he opens his mouth and then snaps it shut. Bro, being Bro, probably doesn’t even notice anything has changed as he leads the way back home from the airport – it’s not like he ever paid much attention to Dave’s rambling tangents in the first place. Dave catches the sideways looks he’s getting, though, and knows that Bro is thoroughly unimpressed by all this first-class, grade-A sulking.

Too bad. Dave is mute again for the first time in years, and he reserves to right to throw the mother of all silent tantrums when they get home. That collar had still been working perfectly fine before Bro decided to crown himself the king of all puppetfucks and rip it apart, and Dave is fucking pissed.

“Kid, are you seriously going to be a little bitch about this?” Bro says wearily when they reach the top floor of the apartment. Dave flashsteps right past him and shoulders his way into the apartment, keeping his head down and his eyes fixed on the floor. It’s three in the morning and he’s been wearing the same blood and sweat-stained outfit for the past nineteen hours, after jetsetting halfway across the country to get his brain chewed out by fucking tentacle monsters and his speech simulating collar fucked seven ways to Sunday. And. Fuck. He needs to claim the shower before Bro does or he’ll be absolutely foul by the time the man’s interminable shower ends.

A smuppet comes flying at Dave's head from a diagonal. It's an obvious distraction, but Dave can't handle taking a smuppet to the face even on the best of days, so he wastes precious seconds whipping out his sword and slicing the bright green plush abomination into quarters. Bro inserts himself between Dave and the bathroom, leaning on the door frame as he folds his arms and continues to stare pointedly at Dave.

“Get out of my way, Bro,” Dave tries to say. He fails miserably; his vocal cords flap, and air rasps out through his lips, but no sound emerges. There’s a faint, breathy hiss, and that’s it. Just. No. Fuck this. He stops time and ducks under Bro’s right arm, but before he can slam the door Bro hauls him back out by his shirt collar. Dave lets out a stream of curse words that don’t make a sound anywhere but in his head, and within seconds he just shuts down because what’s the fucking point.

Bro keeps a grip on Dave’s shirt, silent, and Dave tenses up under the scrutiny, staring at a shitty poster hanging on the wall instead of meeting his gaze.

"Fuckin' brat," Bro mutters after five minutes of silence.

Yeah, Dave doesn't have to put up with this shit. He rips his shirt out of Bro's grasp between one second and the next and huddles up his shoulders, slouching away as he heads for the kitchen. "Fine, have the fucking shower first," he wants to say, even though he knows that's not what Bro is on about. Fuck, can’t a guy just brood over the fact that he’s mute for two fucking seconds?

When he glances back from the kitchen, he can see Bro's hands moving. Dave intends to pointedly ignore the sign language, but he grimaces and ends up looking anyway, trying to hide it behind the cover of his shades. 'Look, I can get new parts in a month. I'll go hit up my dealer abroad,' Bro signs, the movements of his hands deft and sharp, like he's cutting the air with the signs. 'Stop dicking around and suck it up, you whiny little beanpole.'

"Don't pander to me." Dave shoves both hands through his hair, accidentally brushing his shades halfway up his forehead as he does so. He's just wheezing and flapping his lips at Bro at this point. Not even getting angry can make the words audible, and he knows that, but he keeps trying anyway because he really is a dumb fuck who doesn't know when to stop.

'It's not pandering, dipshit, it's me making sure you haven't actually forgotten the fucking language you use when you can't talk.' Bro shakes his head. 'Sometimes I wonder about you, kid.'

Dave returns to ignoring Bro, shoving aside a pile of empty video game cases and letting them fall onto the kitchen floor as he hunts through the debris. He's so sick of Bro's stuff lying around everywhere (never mind that half the stuff is nominally Dave's, too) and is seriously debating the ironic merits of going on a soundless cleaning spree to usher in the new era of Silent Striders. It would be like taking a vow of silence and training in a mountaintop dojo to become some kind of badass ninja monk who uses cleaning techniques to shank people.

...No, he's not doing this, man. He's not making this happen. He's too fed up with fucking life right now to be that motivated, and where the fucking fuck is his apple juice.

In the space of five frenzied seconds and all the pauses in-between, Dave tears the kitchen apart. Bro could've stopped him at any point, but he just watches as Dave runs out of hiding places to search.

There is no apple juice. It's not in any of his usual stashes, or any of Bro's funky hiding spots. It hasn't even been poured out of its usual containers and poured into beer bottles just to fuck with Dave - he would know, he does taste tests. It's not anywhere.

The last of Dave's meager, childish hopes and dreams wither and die. Life is awful. All of the light has literally gone out of the world, as though the sun can never bring itself to shine on a world without AJ ever again. Or maybe Dave's just closed his eyes and started banging head against the side of the fridge. One of the two. He's willing to bet cold hard cash on it being the former. The absence of AJ is something to be universally mourned. The sky itself weeps and thunders out a booming elegy for the amber elixir - no, no, that's still just Dave pounding a new dent into the fridge with his forehead. Close enough.

"...Is that Morse code?" Bro asks aloud, sounding almost thoughtful. "For...AJ? Oh my god, kid, you have a problem."

Dave lets out a strangled wheeze of fury and removes his head from the side of the refrigerator, bypassing the bathroom entirely as he darts into his room. Bro could be signing any number of things at Dave as he stomps by, but Dave doesn't look up. He's not deaf, god fucking dammit, his voice may have pulled a fucking Ariel but his ears are working just fine. If Bro starts going around signing all the time out of some perverse desire to mock Dave's mourning (which let's be honest, is pretty fucking likely), the man's just going to have to deal with being ignored all the time. Bro might not say a lot, but when he does talk, he gets all pissy and bitchy when people ignore him. Too bad. Dave refuses to fall back on the old instinct to keep a person's hands in sight at all times except in combat situations.

He kicks his door shut. Bro probably has cameras in here but Dave stopped expecting personal privacy in this place way back in the infancy of irony. These clothes are so fucked, and he'd like to not get pulled over by the cops on the street, so he just strips as he goes and then pulls a dull red sweater over his head against the almost-cool night air drifting in through the hole in the wall. Pants are overrated as fuck, but he puts them on anyway. Oh, the sacrifices he's willing to make in the name of apple juice. He fishes his phone out of his torn work uniform's pocket and grabs his wallet before exiting the room. Still seething inwardly, he heads for the front door. He still smells like ozone and blown up buildings and creepy secret labs, but he can probably pass for normal long enough to retrieve the goods from the convenience store.
Commandment one of the Faith of Dave - thou shalt not suffer a dearth of apple juice in thy household. It is law.

'Where the fuck do you - Bro begins in sign language, then switches over when Dave doesn't turn to indulge Bro's weird new signing fetish. "-think you're going?"

Out, Dave thinks loudly. His throat scrapes dryly as he swallows down words, and he leaves the door hanging open behind him and flashsteps all the way downstairs. Bro doesn't come after him, which is - fucking typical. Sheesh, Dave's eighteen goddamn years old, he doesn't need permission to go out at night. Or three in the morning. Jesus fuck. And if Bro really wanted him to stay indoors, Dave wouldn't have even made it out the door.

He supposes he could also get some cleaning supplies while he's out. Showing John around the pigsty that is the Strider household had been more than a little embarrassing at the time, what with all the gross puppets everywhere, but of course that has nothing to do with why Dave would want to clean a little. No, this would be a purely ironic exercise.

...Yeah. Hell yeah. AJ and cleanliness. He's making this a thing, goddammit.

TG: john
TG: i know youre missing me already
TG: like 'fuck, that strider guy'
TG: 'he was just too righteous'
TG: 'how do i go on without him in my life'
TG: 'hes ruined me for all other brohombres'
TG: 'that handsome asshole'
TG: im sorry john i cant help being such a liferuiner
TG: sorry im not sorry
TG: shit, no, that was lame
TG: fuck
TG: forget i said that i have a reputation to maintain TG: i blame the internet they dont let shit die there
TG: that saying should be taken out back behind the shed and shot
TG: then we can stuff its rotting corpse and burn it in effigy
TG: its a fucking plan, my man, am i right? we can invite all our derpy little friends to the corpse party
TG: …
TG: why does this always happen
TG: why do we always end up here
TG: me pouring out my fragile, manly heart to you
TG: you ignoring my finely crafted overtures of brohood
TG: why must you string me along this way EB?
Wait. Shit. It's 3 in the morning here, which means it's 1 in Seattle, right? The last time he saw John, the kid had a new sling and massive bruises all up and around his shoulder; surely he couldn't have gone out and done the hero thing right after a tentacle monster smackdown?

Yeah, who is Dave kidding. This is John he's talking about. The kid doesn't have the common sense of a fucking red shirt, though so far he's got a better survival rate. He's probably trying to pitifully elbow some rando in the kidney with his crippled elbow. Dumbass.

TG: awesome
TG: ll have you know i can sense your dumbshit life choices from here john TG: and i am stating for the record that any choice that does not involve talking to me is a shitty life choice TG: but
TG: i am a generous brohort and i know that one day you shall return to my bosom TG: shhh no words now
TG: just bosoms

Yeah, he's just going to shut up while he's ahead. Yikes. Thumbing out of the Pesterchum tab, Dave looks up just in time to see himself slouching out of an alley up ahead.

Oh great. Time fuckery. Exactly how Dave wants to top off this shitty evening sundae, with the cherry of temporal inevitability. Now he's facing a morning that, depending on how far back future-Dave tells him to go, could very well end up lasting another twelve hours longer than it should. Time travel is all cool and shit in theory, but in practice, Dave has found it anywhere from baffling to tedious to outright stupid. But then, isn't that basically life?

The other-Dave is carrying a bunch of plastic grocery bags on his arms, so at some point Dave at least makes it to his intended destination, which is a fucking relief. Half the time these temporal tangents send him halfway across Houston and he completely fails to get his original job done. Future-him huffs and shoves the plastic bags up into the crook of his elbows to free his hands and start signing. Weak. Looks like Dave gives in at some point tonight, which is fucking dissatisfying. He is personally disappointed in himself; he's really let himself down this time.

'Oh my fucking god are we a whiny little shit,' other-Dave signs, glowering. His shades are off, hanging by one folded arm from the collar of his sweater, so the furrowed brows are really obvious and exposed. 'Bro is right. This is obnoxious. Stop that right now. Stop proving him right or so help me God I will punch us in the dick.'

He'd ask how future-him knows what Dave is thinking, but the answer is pretty obvious. "Go ahead," he mouths, stuffing his hands in his pockets. "You're the one who'll have been feeling it all night long."

Other-him grimaces. 'It's almost worth it. Almost. Whatever. If you don't shape up, BQ will think we're idiots and she won't let us all in on Operation Investigashenanigans and Detectevasion."

"There was a line. You just crossed." Dave rubs at his face with a hand, not quite a facepalm but pretty close because holy fuck, did they seriously just graduate to double portmanteau mission names? That's it. He is so done right now.

Future-Dave just smiles. 'Okay, first I was just going to not tell you because that was how I remembered it happening. Now, I'm just not gonna tell you because witnessing you boarding the struggle bus over something as obvious as those wordsmashes is almost the equivalent of that dick punt I seriously considered earlier.'
"Why. We swore, you asshat. We swore the struggle bus wouldn't become a thing." Dave pulls a facepalm 2x combo. "We fucking swore. Ugh. Everything about this morning is awful and it's barely three."

'Welcome to the struggle bus. Next stop, pointless agonizing over a shitty portmanteau like the little bitch we are.' If future-Dave could talk, he'd be using that flat monotone they use whenever they're maintaining a flawless pokerface. The execution is excellent, Dave will give himself that much. 'It's totally a thing now, man. And speak for yourself, I've had a fan-fucking-tastic morning.'

He doesn't need to take this kind of abuse from himself. "Just tell me how far back to go," Dave demands silently, almost managing to pronounce the vowels in a wheezy kind of way. If vowels sounded like angry breathing. "Let this end."

'Two hours.' Future-Dave shakes his head, hands still fluttering like birds. 'I like how I'm always so much more well-adjusted by this point. Past-me is always so pissy whenever we have to run loops, have you noticed that? Dude, just chill, they're not that bad.'

Dave has no idea what could possibly make him so disgustingly cheerful in two nonlinear hours from now, and he has no interest in having this obnoxiously good mood rubbed in his face while he's personally still 'pissy.' He turns away and heads for the alley, blatantly staring away from future-Dave's hands.

So he misses the warning signs before a hand lands on his shoulder. Dave flinches, nearly shanking his future-self by reflex. He really should know better than to startle himself when he's got a sword on his person. "Dude. What?" he doesn't say.

Future-Dave rolls his eyes and dumps a small container in Dave's free hand. 'For the road, man. You'll thank me later.'

Dave doesn't get it, until two seconds later when he does a double take and everything in the world fades away. His vision tunnels in on that precious green cardboard container resting in the palm of his hand.

...Oh my god. Future apple juice.

AJ.

From.

The future.

It's like a religious epiphany, dawning over an unseen horizon, and this. This is what enlightenment feels like.

Holy fuck, how the hell has Dave not been abusing this power to hell and back all this time? He could have built up a one-man monopoly on the import and consumption of apple juice in the Western hemisphere by this point, and he's been wasting time powers with useless shit like fighting crime? Fuck all this noise, he could have his own apple orchard by the end of the night if he plays his temporal loops right -

'Yeah, I'll get started on eBay when I get home,' future-Dave promises, a tiny smirk tugging at the edge of his lips. 'We're doing this, man.'

'We're making this happen," Dave agrees with his hands, too awed by this glorious new vision of the future to stay on the struggle bus. Because hell yeah, he'll sign if it means he gets to start his own apple juice empire.

He has seen the future.

And it involves him owning a personalized apple juice company, goddammit.

Thanks to the BQ’s whims, Dave has been out at night more than usual, but he’s still not used to going all hero mode when it’s dark out. This early in the morning, even Houston’s humidity levels have calmed their tits and sunk below 50%; Dave’s sweater almost tips the scales from painfully ironic to actually suitable for the current temperature, which is just weird.

Dave and the Badass Quandary don’t have a set meeting place or method of arranging their rendezvous. Dave had suggested it once.

Once.

BQ had just sneered at him, and began mocking him for his ‘utter incompetence in the realms of subterfuge and subtlety,’ which Dave felt was pretty fucking unfair. He is subtle, okay. He is like the sex guru of subtlety. Ninjas come to him for tips. Spies don’t have shit on Strider quality cunning, alright? He is stealthy as fuck. He just doesn’t think it’s too much to ask for a little goddamn order in the shitstorm that is his relationship with the Quandary.

He doesn’t even know what this dame wants. It’s been nearly two years since he first ran across her, and Dave still doesn’t understand what the carapcian gets out of this alliance. She has the whole enigma thing down; like shit, this woman could make Bro himself fucking work for it. For whatever obscure reason, she wanted Dave to time travel – she wouldn’t fucking shut up about how ‘pausing’ time was moronic and that he should be ‘working in quantifiable paradox loops, you damned fool.’ But after he nearly killed himself to get the hang of going backward in time, she just seemed smugly pleased, and then shut him the fuck down. And she did it in a way that made Dave look stupid for wanting to know the little things, like, you know, how the hell the BQ found out his regular identity anyway, or how she knew enough about his powers to encourage him to expand them past flashstepping.

These are pretty huge concerns, okay? But she just keeps putting him off with misdirection and condescending sarcasm.

So the apple juice only goes so far in placating Dave as he shuffles along the street two hours earlier. He sips it slowly through the straw, trying to savor the last dregs at the bottom of the carton. Meetings with the BQ are becoming pretty useless, and more than once over the past few weeks he’s wondered just why he keeps this up. If he can’t make any progress with the dame tonight, he decides, he’ll just cut himself loose. He doesn’t owe her shit if she can’t be bothered to make sense. He’s not in the mood to have another unfathomable authority figure in his life, goddammit.

He launches the empty juice carton at the nearest trash can with flawless accuracy. His skin prickles and before the carton lands on top of the trash within Dave has his shitty sword out, holding it at the ready as he scans the area.

The only thing he can detect on the road around him is a feral lusus, something beetle-shaped and clicking that is scrounging through the trash outside a Chipotle. Not exactly a normal sight – most rogue lusii get picked up within hours of losing their shit and running away – but not unusual enough to have triggered Dave’s internal alarms. Something is up, but he can’t pinpoint where the sensation is coming from.
Which means this is pretty much like every ironic horror movie he’s ever watched. Shit, does that make him the dumbass blonde who can’t see the fucking murderghost hanging over his head –

Dave looks up.

A smooth white sphere hovers five feet above his head. It looks, he thinks inanely, almost like a cueball.

…but it’s a fucking murderghost. Obviously. A flying cue ball would just be stupid.

“Oh, fuck,” he mouths. Not being an idiot, he then uses his badass reflexes and immediately flings his piece of shit sword (why the fuck did he leave the cold iron at home?!) at the unholy spirit like a spear up. He proceeds to run like hell. He does turn to see if the sword makes contact, but only after stopping and crouching behind a parked car so he doesn’t trip and lay himself out like a four-course Strider buffet for this ghostly fuckface.

The white sphere blinks out of existence before the sword can make contact, and the sword itself clatters to the street a moment later. It snaps in half like the piece of shit it is, naturally.

Dave very quickly does a 360 degree spot check. He refuses to relax afterward though, and continues to glance around until he realizes he looks like a twitchy, paranoid junkie and huddles inward, clamping down on his movements as he walks back to the sword. He kicks at it gingerly and flashsteps back, waiting to see if the broken metal has been contaminated with unholy spirit juice or some bullshit like that. It appears to still be just a regular old piece of shit sword, but he’s not taking any chances.

BQ: So, his eyes have found you at last.

Dave nearly climbs the nearest streetlight like a fucking cat, and in fact has on hand on the pole before he yanks himself to a halt. It’s just BQ. Shit. Fuuuck. He nearly gave himself a heart attack, Christ.

The Quandary steps a little ways out of the shadows, the beetle lusus scuttling out of the way of her arching heels. She’s as elegant as ever, with the clicking, careful grace of limbs that stretch just a little too much to match human proportions. Her narrowed white eyes glance over the spot in the air where the murderghost previously hovered, and she adjusts the folds of her dark trench coat with plucking fingers.

BQ: The Crew has been circling in, of course, for a while now. They’ve always known you were somewhere in the Houston area. But it would appear that whatever you thought to accomplish by flying off to New York, you have drawn down his eye.

BQ: What did you think you could accomplish there, by the way? I am dying of curiosity. Your stupidity has reached new heights, and I simply must know how you’ve managed it.

Dave opens his mouth and starts noiselessly wheezing, “That was not an eye, it was a murderous hellspawn come to target hot blondes like myself in the name of cheap jump scares and horrible sequels.”

The BQ stares at him, nonplussed. When her claws clack out the next message and her telepathic voices blooms in his head, she sounds completely put-out.

BQ: I…what nonsense are you saying now, boy?

BQ: That is not a human tongue. By the gods, have you gone eldritch as well? No, I would have sensed that.

BQ: Speak English like the uncouth, mouth-breathing verbalizer that you are, child. You test my patience.

Well, fuck. Carapacians can’t read lips? Dave does suppose that a species that relies on mental communication, verbal clicks, and sign language in conjunction would probably have a bit of a cultural block when it comes to purely verbal speech – hell, BQ complains about English all the damn time – but he doesn’t know how that translates to an inability to read lips.

Guess he knows now why future-Dave was signing away like a regular little kiss-ass. Dave could walk away right now, but BQ would just shank him in the kidney for turning his back on her. Here’s to hoping she likes regular human ASL more than she likes English, then, because he knows for a fact that carapacian sign language looks fuck all like ASL. For all he knows she could be just as flummoxed by human sign language as by noiseless wheezing. Sighing, he clamps his jaw shut and reluctantly raises his hands. ‘Look, lady, I really hope you can understand this, because I have had a shitty day and this is all I got right now.’

BQ stills, the stillness of a predator catching an unknown scent, her head tilted to the side as her eyes glint with a rush of vulturine understanding. When she speaks again, her movements are slow and deliberate. Like she’s signing to a four year old.

BQ: …

BQ: Boy.

BQ: You are communicating with the silent tongue of American Signs.

BQ: Are you still able to understand my end of the dialogue?

‘Yeah, yeah, it’s like a goddamn finger fiesta up in here.’ Dave would have growled that. If, you know, he could still produce that kind of noise. Fuck, this is inconvenient. Most of the emotional nuances in sign language have to come across in body language and facial expressions, and naturally Dave has no intention of sacrificing his gorgeous pokerface just so the BQ can pick up on his sarcasm. ‘Fuck lady, I can still hear you in my head, I’m not incompetent. Just. Can’t talk at the moment. We’re not all weirdly arbitrary telepath people.’

BQ: Intriguing.

BQ: I did not anticipate that you would remain so damaged.

BQ: Paradox echoes are to be expected, but such a level of trauma would not normally manifest itself this obviously.

BQ: Truly, this is a new game we play.

He jabs a finger at her. The effect is lost when he immediately has to retract it and start signing. God, he feels disabled or some shit. 'See that? This game bullshit you keep going on about? Explain. Now. I am so over this and I am walking away right now if you don't start rapping out your secrets or something in the next five seconds.'

BQ: It is a metaphor.

BQ: Obviously.

'We agreed you'd never do that again. That totally fucking sarcastic deathlaugh. Stop it.'

BQ: And I am certain that I have, more than once, requested that you cease your inane tangents and focus on remaining hidden.

BQ: Yet I arrive this evening to learn that you have in fact rushed headlong to confront Horrorterrors in full view of the public eye.

BQ: Before making an utter disgrace of yourself in front of however many thousands of your human and troll brethren chose to watch the live footage of the event, and revealing yourself to the Midnight Crew long enough that they are now able to track you without Void interference.

'What can I say.' Dave shrugs. 'When a man's best bro needs help reeling in his tentacle girlfriend, you can't leave him hangin'. Even if it does mean taking a bunch of grimdark feel-good vibes straight to the frontal lobe.'

Not that he remembers that part much at all. After hearing his own voice distorted beyond recognition - something he doesn't really want to think about - when the grimdark Rose started talking to him directly, everything goes kind of blank. Which Dave is surprisingly cool with. Seriously. He'd be fine with forgetting everything about that embarrassing fight sequence entirely. Not recalling the exact, horrifying, no doubt painful details of having Horrorterror voices trying to 'pry their way into his brain,' as Rue Lalonde had termed it, is pretty much awesome with him. He is totes okay with this whole situation being wiped out of his memory for good.

BQ: Do not get me started on the sheer folly of the Heir's actions -

BQ: Wait, what did you say?

The Quandary has been wandering slightly, pacing in deliberate circles beneath the spot where the ghost appeared. Now she stops, and with a slow creak, cracks her head around to face him. Then in two swift steps she strides to him and clasps his chin between two pincer-like claws. Normally Dave would dodge that kind of move pretty easily, but the BQ is fucking fast when she wants to be, okay? You wouldn't expect it from such an elegant broad but she can fucking move. Then she uses her other hand's claws to yank Dave's shades up on top of his hair and jabs at Dave's exposed eyeball and holy fuck not cool not cool -

'Stop threatening my goddamn eye with your pointy goddamn claws!' he signs back, but he's pretty sure the carapacian dame is so all up in his business that she can't look to see his hand motions anyway. He's got his hands up in a guard that's a little shaky, but his hands waver before they can reach up to grab the BQ's wrists and rip them away from his face. He's too afraid to move in case the two claws delicately peeling his eyelids apart decide to stab forward and start puncturing vulnerable eyeballs. Holy fuck is this not okay. He's in serious danger of adding 'half-blind' on top of the whole mute thing. When a claw needles a little too deeply into the hollow of his eye socket, prodding at the underside of his eyeball, he starts to lose his shit. 'Augh! Get off!'

Eventually, the Quandary shakes her head and steps back, slowly curling her claws up as she goes. Dave nearly trips backward in his haste to get some space between them. He doesn't even try to hide his mild concern as he pokes at his eye to make sure everything is still in one piece before yanking his shades back down.
BQ: Unbelievable.

BQ: You appear to be untainted.

BQ: The luck of the stupid runs strong in this universe.

Dave grunts, and is inwardly pleased when the action actually produces a sound. It's not much, but it's something, alright? 'Tainted? Are we about to have another one of those conversations where you explain nothing relevant to the actual questions I ask?'

The BQ rolls the tips of her fingers along the palm of her hand in a clicking drum, closing her eyes for a long moment. The carapace of her smooth face is unnervingly blank without the dim light of those pale, narrowed eyes, broken only by the white scar running along her closed right eye.

BQ: The Horrorterrors are...unpredictable elements.

BQ: Once they were merely distant threats, half-heard songs echoing from the Furthest Ring.

BQ: Of late, they have been more - forward. Aggressive. As though they have been riled up by something, and now actively seek out victims.

BQ: You in particular would be vulnerable to their advances, though perhaps not so much so as the Seer.

BQ: She has had more prolonged contact with them, of course.

BQ: But you hear them more clearly than most, and once you hear them, they have a way in.

BQ: You do not want to let them in.

Dave's mouth drops. He puts a shaking hand to his lips, eyes widening as he pretends to simper and freak out. 'O-oh my god. You just answered a question. And the answer almost made sense. I - Am I dreaming?'

The BQ just scowls at him.

BQ: Obnoxious whelp.

BQ: This is not a subject I can afford to spare your negligible remaining sanity by judiciously selecting what information you can handle with your poor traumatized brain.

BQ: Horrorterrors are insidious, and they will do more than destroy you if they take command of your body.

BQ: Bad enough they were so easily able to take the Seer again. Can you imagine them with a Knight of Time immersed in their tangles?

Dave facepalms and doesn't respond. After several minutes, he motions with his hand. 'I'm waiting.'

BQ: ...For what?

Dave knuckles at his forehead. 'Further explanation. Like. Knight of Time? Congratulations, you have added Random Unexplained Topic #413 to your list of unexplained bullshit. I can't actually imagine some random ass knight getting all cuddly with tentacle monsters without this little thing called context. You can clear this all up any day now.'
BQ: My job is not to explain things to you.

BQ: You have no idea what function I serve, really, which is just as well.

BQ: I do not think it really applies anymore, anyway. This universe is despicably perverse.

BQ: You are a Hero of Time. Your formal title is Knight.

BQ: What a wonderful explanation I have provided, out of the generosity of my black heart.

BQ: Ha.

Dave nods, considers her words, and then shakes his head. 'You forgot to mention just who the fuck made up that formal title. Like. Are there more titles? Is there a system here? Who the fuck thought I would make a good knight? That's just stupid. Why am I not the Ninja of Time, goddammit?'

BQ: Ninja is not a recognized title.

BQ: And no one decided on the system.

BQ: It simply IS, and always shall be.

BQ: You already know other titles, anyway. The Heir and the Seer are far more in tune with themselves than you and the fourth, oddly enough.

BQ: The Seer is meant to understand, of course, but I cannot imagine how the Heir could have such insight into his true nature this early in the game. That is a far more intriguing line of inquiry than your idiotic questions about topics beyond the purview of your tiny mind at this point in the game.

No. This needs to stop. Dave can feel one of his eyes twitching, and he honestly wants to start banging his head against the pavement in frustration. 'Okay, no, this isn't working. I was wrong, I was so wrong, you explaining things really does just make everything more awful. Why do I keep putting myself through this. I am done. I'm out of here.' He shoves his hands into his pockets, then reconsider. He reaches up, fixes his shades again, and then gives the BQ a most lofty middle finger. Then he turns and starts walking away.

BQ: Then I suppose you are not interested in hearing about the secret mission?

Damn future-Dave. Damn him for making this inevitable, with his smug future knowledge of whatever the hell this secret missions might be. And damn current-Dave for being instantly, disgustingly intrigued. No, seriously, fuck both those guys. 'No, I don't think so,' he signs, but he has to turn to face BQ so she can see his hands, and he knows that's more than enough of an admission of interest for her to know he's paying attention. 'Sorry. I think I'll just grab my AJ and be on my way. It's been real, BQ, k thanks bai.' He has to spell out the last part with individual signs but it's so worth it to see the moment of bafflement cross the BQ's face as she struggles with the mild language gap.

They're both motionless for a long moment, and when Dave awkwardly finds he can't bring himself to continue walking away, a smile smirk eventually creases the Quandary's face. Yeah, fuck, she knows she's won. Dave's a sucker.

BQ: The eye of the Crew has only just now found you, but they have been in this city long enough to have an established presence.
BQ: They will wait to assess the situation, but they will begin to target you deliberately.

BQ: Unless, of course, we attack first.

BQ: If we can destroy the cue ball and infiltrate their base, we would not only root out the insufferable pests, but we may, in fact, also find answers to some of your questions.

BQ: You know, those interminable questions that you refuse to believe I can't actually answer.

BQ: ...Answers, child.

BQ: Answers I say -

'Okay, okay! Fuck, lady, you win!' Dave groans and slaps at his face, trying to ignore the BQ's triumphant, brain-melting laughter.

But seriously, with a proposal like that, how could anyone expect Dave to say no? Not only does he get to go on some sicknasty secret mission, he might actually get - gasp - answers?!

Not that he really believes her, of course. He's maintaining a healthy skepticism here. He is the king of skepticism. He's been burned before; he may never trust her promises of answers ever again -

Except oh god how awesome would it be to actually get a straight fucking answer for once.

Shiiit. He's so in. This is embarrassing.

'Where do we start looking?' he asks, before a thought strikes him. 'Shit. I need a new sword first. Don't worry, I can literally do this in two seconds.' He's never tried a time loop within a loop before, and for all he knows that kind of timeception could punch a neat hole through the fabric of paradox space, but this is worth it.

The Quandary shakes her head, and leans up against the same streetlight that almost served as Dave's escape route. She removes her weaponized cigarette holder, which makes Dave tense up even more than he already has, what with all this excitement. She proceeds to not flick out the thin blade, but to take an actual, legitimate cigarette from her pocket, followed by a match that she strikes against her own carapace to light.

BQ: Absolutely not.

BQ: Now is not the opportune moment to strike out.

Dave can't even believe this. All the tense excitement rushes out of him in a huff. 'You're kidding, right.'

BQ: I intend to begin this mission in approximately three weeks.

BQ: And to assuage your unending curiosity before you begin to plague me -

BQ: My reasons are twofold: first, I wish to scope out the situation alone, to determine the best method with which we may infiltrate their base. Second, I do not trust that you have emerged from the Horrorterrors unscathed. If nothing else, they have left their mark upon you physically, and that is reason enough to be concerned.

She gestures to his neck with the still unlit cigarette holder. Her hands have been too occupied with sign language to bring the flickering match to the cigarette. Dave instantly gets defensive (he refuses to think the word 'self-conscious') and hunches his shoulder up to block off the edge of the bandages that peek out from the edge of his sweater, barely covering the ring of bruising that his collar left around his throat when the thorn ripped through. 'Fuck. I can still fight. This thing barely stings.'

That's lie, kind of. But Dave's just not so much of a wuss that he can't work through the throbbing ache of the wound - he's been functioning just fine all day since the doctors at the lab sewed him up, thanks very much.

BQ: It concerns me nonetheless.

BQ: Three weeks, Knight. Three weeks and we will commence this mission. This is not debatable.

BQ: And if you see the cue ball - try to make an effort to destroy it. I could not judge how strong its connection to its master ran before it vanished from sight, but now that it has noted your presence, it will be able to track you. Your generalized Void shielding will weaken steadily under its powers of observation. End its scrutiny if you can.

There's just so many questions Dave could ask. He could fill a fucking four-hundred page novel with all the questions he has. He only asks one, the most relevant. 'About that. What cue ball are we talking about?'

The BQ pauses in the middle of lighting up her cigarette, letting the pitch black match burn out against her claws without even a flicker of pain as she shakes her head at him.

BQ: The cue ball that you attempted to impale with a sword.

BQ: A goodly effort, if misguided. They are more vulnerable to explosives than to cutting implements, unfortunately.

Ohhh. She's talking about the ectoplasmic apparition that Dave saw earlier. He had thought it looked a little like a cue ball -

But honestly, that's still the stupidest thing he's ever heard of. A spying cue ball? Seriously? He shakes his head dramatically and shrugs his shoulders. 'Yeah, sorry. I'm pretty sure that was just a murderghost.'

BQ just stares at him. Her fingers twitch on the cigarette holder, as though she's giving serious consideration to the idea of whipping out the hidden blade and stabbing him in the eye.

BQ: What.

BQ: No, this -

BQ: No. I refuse to be caught up in your endless cycle of stupidity.

BQ: Trust me when I tell you that there is no such thing as...what you said.

BQ: I refuse to repeat it.

Time for some payback, goddammit. She practically walked right into this one. How can he resist such a sweet opening? He will have vengeance for his thousands of unanswered questions. 'Aw, don't hate on the murderghost. It could be the first of its kind you know. Maybe I was wrong. Maybe it just wants to be loved. I shouldn't have thrown the sword at it; what if I hurt its feelings? Shit, I could be responsible for the world's first murderghost with self-esteem issues. I feel like a fucking dick now.'
The Quandary shudders and throws the ashes of the match away. Looking almost sick with disgust, she tosses the unlit cigarette away as well, stows her cigashank, and rubs at her temples with both freed hands.

BQ: Cease at once.

BQ: It is a cue ball. It serves as the eye of one who should not be named in an unshielded area. End of discussion.

BQ: It takes a great deal of power to destroy one, but I have faith in your ability to accidentally destroy things, if nothing else.

'Hey. That was a shitty sword, they snap like fucking twigs, okay -'

BQ: Three weeks. I will contact you beforehand. Until then, try to lay low.

BQ: Now excuse me. I have business to attend to. Business that does not involve continuing this cycle of self-flagellation that is trying to deal with questions.

BQ: Farewell.

She gets eaten by the thin shadow of the streetlight before Dave can even raise his hands to reply, which is her favorite method of ditching out on uncomfortable questions she doesn’t want to answer. She doesn't even try to be subtle anymore.

Dave steps on the cigarette the BQ never even got started on, and cracks his neck, smiling thinly.

Of course, if she thinks Dave motherfucking Strider is going to wait three weeks for her permission to do awesome spying shit, the BQ had better think again.

Smirking to himself, Dave starts off down the street as he begins to plot.

Fuck yeah, plotting.

Having concluded his business with the BQ, Dave walks with a spring in his step to the convenience store. Outside the florescent lighting that pours out of the automatic front door, he considers his options, then takes off his shades and folds them up to hang on his sweater collar. Squinting in the harsh light, he steps inside.

Behind the counter, Gerald just sighs. "Kid, I don’t even know why you bother sometimes,” he mutters. Dave has no idea what he’s on about - Gerald is always mumbling about ‘useless disguises' and how 'it's so obvious, for Pete's sake,' but Dave thinks the old guy is just going a little senile. Yep. That's Dave's story, and he's sticking to it.

Anyway. Dave hefts a several containers of apple juice and flashsteps to the corner with his bounty in hand. Almost as an after thought, he adds a bottle of Windex to the pile, and Gerald gives him a weird look. Windex cleans things, right? Dave is sure he's heard rumors of that, somewhere.

Slowly, he puts aside thoughts of Operation Investigashenanigans and Detectevasion aside and begins to contemplate his future apple empire. He's changed his mind. Everything is no longer awful. Things are actually looking up. He continues to smile a little even as he heads to go meet past-Dave, cracking open an AJ for himself as he leisurely strolls through the streets instead of rushing along, for once.
Houston had better get ready.

Shit is about to get real.

John sleeps straight through the five hour flight from Newark to Seattle. It's the middle of the day in New York, edging towards the middle of the morning in Seattle, but he barely has time to hug Rose and Dave goodbye before he's stumbling up the jet, wearily kicking off his shoes and buckling himself into a seat before passing out.

He wakes up with his face smooshed up against the wall, a little trickle of drool sticking to the side of his chin. He coughs and sits upright, trying to discreetly wipe the drool off on his sleeve, and looks around to see if the stewardess from earlier is around to see it. There's kinda sort of a line of more drool that runs down the wall from where his head rested, and he starts digging into the pile of napkins next to the glass of water someone brought for him and wipes at the drool furiously. He's kind of blushing too. This is so embarrassing! Bleh!

The air in the jet is recycled and tired, but it still ruffles through his hair when he gives it an absent tug. Grimacing, John rubs at his face and stands up to go to the bathroom. He feels grosssss. He's still a mess from the massive fight earlier, and his mouth tastes like pizza gone horribly wrong because that's all he's really eaten all day. His stomach would probably be making some noise about this, but sometime during that nap he shot right from 'grumbling hunger' to 'starvation mode,' which is when his stomach goes dead silent. Yikes. He makes a mental note to steal peanuts or pretzels or something from the back of the plane because wow is he hungry.

"We will be arriving in Seattle shortly," the stewardess mentions after John has finished splashing water on his face and trying to wake up properly. Her horns curve back with a slight hook, and she just hands him the entire basket of pretzel snack packs when he asks. "We'd have sandwiches and other food options, but we were not given time to stock the plane fully before being redirected to Houston," she apologizes. "Take as many as you like."

Yeah, she probably shouldn't have given him that kind of permission. There aren't even going to be pretzels left when John is through here. He sits down at one of the seats with a table in front and starts ripping open packages to dump their contents into an empty mug. "Who does this plane belong to, anyway? Is it Doctor Lalonde's?" John asks, glancing around. Privately he thinks there isn't enough alcohol present on the plane for it to be the doctor's, but that's just his opinion based on a pretty outdated impression of Rose's mom.

For example, if you'd asked him just a day ago, he'd have told you Rue Lalonde was sort of weird and should probably look into AA meetings or something, but was still a pretty good mom, no matter what Rose said.

Now, he's not so sure. He tries to reconcile the Doctor Lalonde he knew all those years ago, and the desperate, enigmatic woman who had abandoned Rose to a lonely, empty house to fend for herself without contact with the outside world, and he comes up totally blank. He just can't accept that ditching Rose was the only possible choice Rue Lalonde had, and somewhere inside, he thinks he's starting to hate her, a feeling like sour milk curdling in his gut.

He just keeps remembering how fragile and skinny Rose felt when he hugged her, the way she had collapsed inward into a quiet, exhausted jumble of thin bones and too-pale skin after she finished driving the last of the grimdark out of her head. Rose is so, so strong; she's always been one of the strongest, smartest people John knows. And now he thinks she might be broken inside, in a way that might not be fixable. And a large part of that is due not just to the Horrorterrors, but to Rue's neglect.
He hates hating people. He avoids it as much as possible. But Rose got hurt because of this. Thousands of people got hurt in New York because of this. It's going to take a while before he can judge objectively whether or not Doctor Lalonde made the right decision. Until then, he's just going to have to stay in contact with Rose (this time for sure!), and send the doctor some...very sternly worded letters in the event she starts hurting Rose again, even if it's just by accident.

"Oh, no. Doctor Lalonde simply has emergency privileges," the stewardess says, patiently waiting by the side of the table and sweeping each depleted pretzel package into a trash bag. John begins to stuff pretzels into his mouth while she continues. "We still serve under the Harley Foundation. Of course, there hasn't been much need for a private jet since our founder died under mysterious circumstances, but we freelance as transportation for executives and politicians."

"The Harley Foundation?" John repeats. He wants to say the name is familiar, but he can't place it at all. He focuses on not choking on the mugful of pretzels he pours into his mouth. Agh. So much salt! "Where have I heard that before?" he says, covering his mouth with a hand so crumbs don't fly out everywhere.

The troll stewardess eyes him appraisingly, her green eyes sharp. "Not many have heard the name at all," she admits, stuffing another armful of pretzel wrappers into the bag. "For the most part, the core foundation simply provides funding for several enterprises that caught the founder's interests in his later years - there is no real Harley Foundation brand, per say. For example, much of the funding for Lalonde Laboratories is drawn from the Harleys. Our founder was very intrigued with the doctor's work before his unfortunate demise."

"Doctor Lalonde's work? On what?" John finishes opening the last of the pretzels. Wow, that took him a grand total of five minutes. It barely makes a dent in the cavernous hollow that is his stomach, but it's a start, anyway. "I thought she did stuff with atoms?"

The stewardess just shrugs as she tucks the empty pretzel basket under her arm and walks back to the kitchenette. "I couldn't tell you, sir. I only know the old company byline, from when Mr. Harley was still around. He was very interested in the sciences. He'd promote anything from major research think tanks to individual roboticists if their work caught his eye." She continues to talk, even when she moves out of John's line of sight and starts dumping the trash bag into a disposal unit. "He was a nice old man. Very spirited. 'Lots of gumption,' is what he'd always say!"

John rests his head on his hand as he leans on the table, frowning. "How weird. I can't think of where I've heard that name before," he says. It's on the tip of his tongue; it's the most frustrating thing in the world, but he just can't figure it out!

"I'm sure you'll remember eventually, sir," the stewardess says. She sounds like she's just saying it to be polite, though. "You may want to buckle in -

"We are beginning our final descent into the Seattle-Tacoma area," a mildly irritated male voice says over the intercom. "Siddown and buckle up, pretzel murderer. Yeah, that's right, I saw that. Asshole. You too, Marie."

The stewardess just rolls her eyes. "He's always this grumpy," she whispers, winking at John with a faint smile.

John feels a pang in his chest, and he can only half-smile at the stewardess in reply before he lets it drop. He's just been reminded that he hasn't seen Karkat in, what - more than a day? Usually even when they can't see each other, they're texting all the time, and of course John hasn't been able to do that since his phone got left behind in his room. It's 4 in the afternoon now, and even if his dad is already at the airport to pick John up like he'd promised he would be, and if they don't hit any major traffic on the way home, it'll be nearly 5 before they get back to Maple Valley. John's not even sure Karkat will be available for those few hours between now and when John wants to get out on patrol, no matter how much John kind of misses him.

It sucks. He couldn't help the circumstances that led to this (who could possibly have seen rage-teleportation coming?!) but he still feels like a sucky friend. He's the worst.

Not to mention the fact that John has no idea how his dad is going to react when John disembarks. Samuel Egbert has sounded tired and tense the few times John has spoken to him over the course of this little misadventure, and John has a sinking feeling that he's gonna be in a looooot of trouble when they get home. Like, actual 'you're literally grounded' levels of trouble. Head-exploding levels of trouble. Soooo much trouble. Augh.

By the time the plane taxis to a halt, John has such a headache.

Fortunately, this trip is a little more legal than the illicit run out of the Houston airport - instead of having to go full hero-mode and sneak off the busy landing strip past a bunch of guards, John is expected this time, the pilot having had the time to actually report their arrival ahead of schedule. He walks past the security guards and into the terminal, feeling dizzyingly out of place in his borrowed, too-fancy getup. He's ditched the really obvious suit jacket and everything, but he's still wearing most of the hero outfit Dave let him borrow (he hasn't even figured out how he'll return it all to Dave, yet - oops), and he fights the urge to pull on his goggles in the middle of the crowded mob of people that swarms through the wide terminal hall. That wouldn't solve anything at this point - it would only call attention to him.

He's feeling kind of light-headed, actually, and his breathing is erratic. He's freaking out a little yeah, because there's so many people and the crowd keeps jostling him as he ducks his head and heads for the exit, but he's so exposed in this eye-catching uniform and god he really needs some fresh air. Like. Right now. Right now right now right now -

The crowd diminishes slightly as most of the people clustering around him peel off to wait by the luggage carousals, and John pushes his way through the exit door with a gasp.

Thankfully, John's first, refreshing breath of brisk Seattle spring air clears his burgeoning migraine right up, as though the clean wind runs through his mind and drains the heat out of his pounding temples. After suffering through Houston's humidity, the bloodbrine of the Horrorterror's storm, and the recycled monotony of the airplane for the past day, John is relieved when he stretches his free arm outward and the breeze that wraps around him in greeting is sharp and clear, with the metallic hum of the airplanes taking off and landing around them to give it a little zest. He sighs happily, letting his head fall back so he can look at the late afternoon sky.

He has a sneaking suspicion that he'd nearly freaked himself out enough to teleport just then, right in the middle of a crowd of witnesses. The thought sobers him a little. He still has no idea what teleportation has to do with his usual windy thing, but it seems to be triggered not just by rage anymore, but by panic, too. The fight with a grimdark Rose had proven that well enough - he hadn't been furious at the grimdark tangle, just terrified it would snatch Dave away from him, and that had been enough to send him teleport-spamming all over the place. At the time he'd been too caught up in the fight for Rose's body and mind to really notice it; in hindsight, John realizes he's going to have to analyze this new ability with his dad pretty extensively. This is going to have a pretty big impact on his hero work, particularly if he can't get a handle on his weirdly volatile emotions. It'd suck hardcore if he freaked out while stopping a robbery or something and suddenly ended up in the middle of a house fire halfway across the city, after all!
He also wishes it would stop hurting so much. The intense, stabbing pain that wracks his chest is always gone afterward as though it never happened, and doesn't generally stun him for long, but while he's in the process of working himself up into a distress-teleport, it feels like he's actually, literally dying. That's a pretty big flaw in the way the power works. Like, seriously, is this going to end up giving him a legitimate heart attack? Should he be worried about this?

He stands there for a moment, enjoying the feel of fresh air in his lungs, until a honk breaks him out of his reverie. He realizes a familiar white car has pulled up to the curb before him, and through the barely tinted windows he can see his dad's totally classy fedora. Sucking in one last breath to try to steady himself, John bites his lip and walks over to the car. He opens the door and slides into the passenger's seat, staring at his hands in his lap for a long moment after he shuts the door behind him. Having braced himself, John looks at his dad.

There is a brief moment of limbo, in which Samuel Egbert is totally expressionless as he twists to face John. He's unshaven, John notes dizzily, and his eyes are almost as underscored with shadows as John's, and he doesn't think he's ever seen his dad in this bad of shape, not since -

Well. The last time John had taken off to Houston.

John's been so busy with all the frantic action, he hasn't really considered his dad's reaction to John vanishing again. Sure, he expected to get a good stern lecture because obviously running all the way to New York without permission was kind of dumb, but… Well, he just hadn't thought how this would look to his dad. How Samuel would feel, in those long, drawn out minutes between John disappearing and when John finally got his hands on a cell phone at the Striders'. How he'd been tricked into thinking that his own son could be anywhere, could have been kidnapped, or worse, could have legitimately run away again in another fit of depression, one he might not have come back from. How badly would Samuel beat himself up for thinking that he'd failed to see John fall into depression again? How well could John have expected his dad to sleep with all that on his mind?

Oh gosh. Shit. John is the worst son. The worst.

"John."

Oh man, his dad's voice is perfectly neutral, just like his expression, and John can't tell if it's a good neutral or a bad neutral. He hangs his head, but the car continues to idle in place by the curb instead of moving until John looks up and meets his dad's eyes again.

"How long have you been communicating with Flashstep?" he asks, his tone still too gently balanced for John to interpret any anger out of it, which just makes him more anxious. "Since...last time?"

John nods, fighting the urge to drop his head entirely and stare at his fingers. After a nod, his dad turns his attention to the road and John can drop his eyes with relief, turning them to face forward. The air conditioning runs over his face as they finally pull out onto the road and Samuel starts to maneuver their way out of the airport.

"I kept meaning to tell you," John says at last, swallowing hard. He lets his vision zone out as he stares at the spinning wheels of the car ahead of them in the right-hand lane. "But it was just - a really bad time. And then as things got better I started talking to him less and less, so I stopped thinking it would matter so much. I never meant to keep him a secret from you." He winces inwardly, because that's where he really went wrong with this - keeping secrets from his dad. That whole point in his life had been a mess of secrets and depression, and he's still riding out the aftershocks to this day. It just doesn't go away when you think you're better.
"I see. I still wish you had told me about him." Samuel signals a right hand turn with more force behind the tug on the signal handle than he usually uses. He sighs then, scraping at an unshaven cheek with one hand. Every move just makes John feel more guilty. "You told me over the phone that you were careful to keep your chats confidential, but it was still extremely irresponsible of you to discuss that kind of sensitive information with someone over the internet. We can't control what may or may not have gotten out that way."

"I know," John rasps. He clears his throat before he goes on. "I'll try to be more careful from now on."

"I'm not saying you have to stop speaking with him entirely. Far be it from me to come between you and your friends. But promise you'll only go on speaking with this boy if you've clearly thought through the consequences of your actions, and if you know you can keep compromising details out of the chat."

"I promise." John closes his eyes again. It's both more and less than how he expected his dad to react, and he can't fight the relief that seeps into him. He doesn't have to give up on Dave. "I'm also going to try to keep in contact with Rose, too," he adds, shifting in his seat. "The impression I got was that the reason the grimdark got such a hold on her was because she had no one to talk to. At all. Her mom just totally left her alone, Dad." This last part is said with more than a little pain in it, and he can't help darting a glance at the side of his dad's impassive face. At a personal level, that may have been the part of this whole ordeal that struck John as the most horrifying - that Doctor Lalonde, who had seemed like such a nice lady, could abandon her own child that way.

And it's stupid and dumb and irrational of him, but now he has a sinking feeling in his stomach, fueled by the kind of thoughts like 'if she could leave Rose why couldn't he leave me just as easily?' See? So dumb. So stupid. No matter how angry his dad got, there's no way he'd ever just ditch John! Yet he can't stop that primal, childish fear from churning in his gut - because surely Rose thought the same thing about Rue, and she'd been proven so wrong. So very, very wrong.

"Of course, that's fine too, John." Is that a note of slight reassurance in Samuel's voice? John still just can't tell. His dad sighs. "Rue called me and explained what she'd told you. I suppose you know by now that she knew about your powers when you were little."

In a way, it's almost more shocking to hear his dad admit it in such a casual tone of voice than it had been to hear it off-handedly from Rue. John freezes up with the shock, and then shakes it off. "Y-yeah," he says, looking at his dad properly. He and Rose both had sworn to question their parents about the circumstances of their meeting, but it appeared Samuel, unlike the enigmatic Rue, might be more willing to open up about it of his own accord. "Why? What made you trust her with that? And why did you never tell me and Rose?"

"To be honest, I didn't intend to trust her with anything," Samuel says, changing lanes. "You and Rose had only played together a few times in a controlled setting, and the next day Rue approached me and asked how long you'd been able to control the wind." He shakes his head, and John actually catches the faint hint of a smile on his mouth. John doesn't get what about this is amusing, but it's still better than seeing nothing but emotionless disappointment. "You can imagine the look on my face when she just burst out with the truth like that. I'd been supervising you two the whole time and never saw you break cover once. But Rue is nothing if not a genius, even when she's not sober. More than once I've underestimated her simply because she was drinking heavily at the time, but her skills at observation and inference are remarkable."

"And then?" John asks. This is pretty much how he'd imagined the explanation would go - his dad is too much of a stickler for confidentiality and anonymity to have let the cat out of the bag for no reason, but Doctor Lalonde is definitely to type to swagger up to you with a drunken slur and inform you that of course she already knew about your fantastic grade on that English assignment, it's obvious from the way you're holding that pencil.

No, seriously, one time she knew John had beat Rose on an English essay before John had even said a word to Rose about it. It had been the one and only time John ever mysteriously beat Rose out in the realm of writing, but Rue had apparently deduced the slight smugness in John's smile barely five seconds after the two of them stopped by the Lalonde residence for cookies. Doctor Lalonde is scary good.

"She informed me of Rose's powers. We agreed to keep you both ignorant of each other. I thought personally that you were both too young to be able to keep that kind of secret together - you would be more prone to discussing it at school, around other children, if you got too comfortable talking about it with each other. It was too much of a risk." Samuel sighs. "Rue, on the other hand, was of the opinion that having an ordinary friendship to ground you both would be more beneficial for your social development while you were young. And...well."

The look how well that plan turned out goes unsaid. Maybe his dad didn't really mean it that way, but John hears it anyway, and he can't help the tiny inward flinch.

He can't deny it, though, can he? Rose lost her mind to Horrorterrors, and John lost his to depression. And maybe they're both recovering from that, but the fact is that neither of them turned out totally fine, did they?

All they can do is move on as best as they can.

After a few moments of uncomfortable silence, Samuel speaks again. The faint note of amused reminiscence is gone, and he's totally neutral once more. "Let's talk about New York. Go over it with me, move by move."

And okay. John can handle this. This is a briefing, the standard post-rehearsal they go through after every night John is out on the job. His dad may still have bags under his eyes, and he may still be using that flat tone of voice, but this is routine. This is something familiar, and that means that no matter how angry his dad might be, it's not bad enough yet that he's going off script. John relaxes a little back into his seat, the fingers of one hand tapping along to the faint hum of classical music coming from the speakers as he begins to speak.

They merge onto the interstate and begin to make their way through the traffic. Samuel never drives too fast or too slow; he is always precisely at the speed limit, with effortless accuracy. Karkat, in comparison, drives like an old lady with all the inner rage of a troll-circuit WWE wrestling champion.

...Nah. Not even the humorous rage comparison is lightening John's mood. He still feels awful.

It's not until a half hour later, though, when they're driving along the familiar streets of suburbia, that John's dad breaks the really sucky news. He's probably waiting until the stern fatherly lecture sinks in before launching into something different, which John appreciates immediately when he hears exactly what happened last night while John was stuck in Houston.

"They did what?!" he yells, clapping a hand over his mouth when his dad raises a disapproving eyebrow. "They blew up the police station?!

"No one appears to have been seriously hurt," Samuel concedes, waiting patiently at a stop sign as a mother with two children crosses the road in front of the car. He waves back with a faint quirk of a smile when one of the little kids waves at him frantically, in stark contrast to the grim tone of his voice as he speaks to John in an undertone. "They could have produced a much more destructive incendiary if they truly wanted to harm anyone, but the goal appears to have been to produce a smokescreen allowing Hearts Boxcars to escape. Some of the lower ranking members were recaptured a few blocks away, but there's been no sign of Boxcars."

John runs both hands through his hair, aware from the fact that there's a faint breeze stirring in the car that he should probably try to calm down. But holy crap, how did everything manage to go to hell in the space of one night? First Rose, now this?! Jeez! "And let me guess. None of the ones they captured are talking?"

"Not a one," his dad says, pulling forward. They're almost in their section of the neighborhood, and John automatically starts watching for Karkat's house in the corner of his eye. "Naturally, the police are a little wary about letting their legal counsel in after the last lawyer apparently brought in the bomb materials, but they can't deny them the right to legal representation entirely. My contact at the station says they're checking over each new lawyer thoroughly."

"I doubt they need to worry. Explosives seem to be Hearts's thing, but I doubt he'd send help for one of his underlings. Not when there's a good chance they'll get out on bail, again," John mutters. He leans his head against the window, his eyes flickering over the side of Karkat's house with considerably less enthusiasm than usual. Now he feels bad about that, too. Wow, and he'd thought this day couldn't get any more depressing.

A thought strikes him. "Wait, what about Hemogoblin?" he asks, whipping his head around to look at his dad again. "Was there anything about him in the reports? Do you think he'd get there in time to try to stop them?"

Samuel just shakes his head solemnly. "I'm sorry, son. If Hemogoblin was around, no one in the papers reported it. My police contact remembered seeing him after the explosion, but there's just no telling if he would have been able to catch up to Hearts in time. If he did and he was successful, no doubt he would have phoned in the capture already. I think we have to accept that Hearts Boxcars is gone for now."

"Or they could have hurt him," John mutters, gritting his teeth. It's a serious possibility, and he sees his dad nod his head in reluctant agreement. They still have no idea what the full extent of Hemogoblin's powers are, how well he can fight one-on-one against someone of Hearts Boxcars's caliber. The other hero is fast and flexible, but Hearts can hit hard. And there's also the high possibility that more grenades could have been involved in any ensuing showdown.

Yeah, that's a worst case scenario. John is definitely concerned about his hero partner, now. He's patrolling tonight no matter what; even if he didn't desperately want to get back into his regular routine and make up for missing Hearts's escape, he has to get in contact with Hemogoblin somehow and make sure the other hero is alright.

They pull into the driveway a few minutes later. After his dad parks John gets the mail by reflex before following Samuel inside. He's still kind of out of sorts, and the regular routine of little things like getting the mail seeming really...weird. Then again, when you start out the day by fighting an otherworldly horror, it's bound to make regular things like getting the mail a little bizarre in comparison.

"I'm going to get changed," he tells his dad, tugging at the shoulder of his slightly too-tight shirt with a grimace as he toes off his shoes. Everything he's wearing right now is still Dave's and yes, Dave is a skinny little shit. Seriously. Everything is too tight.
"Probably a good idea," Samuel agrees, hanging his slightly wrinkled suit jacket on the handle of the closet where they keep the ironing board. He probably means to iron later - it looks like he's wearing the same suit John remembers from yesterday (though it feels like a lifetime ago), and John feels a renewed stab of guilt that his dad was worried enough not to put effort into his usual dapper appearance. "Karkat will no doubt be over within hours," he adds, raising an eyebrow. "He is a remarkably persistent friend. And just as remarkably observant."

John just rolls his eyes in agreement. But it's true. Holy heck, what if Karkat saw the fight in New York on the television? He should have had work today, but Karkat has an uncanny sense for finding news about heroes - Heir in particular. And while it's up in the air (hehe) if anyone recognized Heir in New York, since John hasn't actually seen the news reports yet, if anyone would notice someone resembling Heir in the middle of a major battle it would be Karkat.

"And son?"

John pauses at the stairs, glancing back at his dad. Something in his stomach tightens a little.

"You did very well today. You're growing up to be a one hell of a hero." Samuel Egbert smiles at John, and then disappears into his study.

For a long moment, John can only stand at the bottom of the stairwell, eyes wide as he tries to absorb what just happened. It takes a while, and then finally his brain offers up its gloriously intelligent analysis: he's still proud of me.

We're going to be okay.

Grinning widely, John starts up the stairs two at a time, undoing the buttons of Dave's borrowed shirt as he runs, and practically catapults into the shower still half-dressed to get all this grime and blood off himself.

Karkat could be here any minute!

That night, after Karkat heads home, Heir goes out to patrol. It has been nearly three days since his last night at work, and that had been the night he confronted the Midnight Crew and this tedious, annoying cycle of injury and exhaustion had kicked off. John is determined not to let his broken collarbone keep him out a third night, not when there is all the chance in the world the escaped Hearts Boxcars may still be on the loose in his city.

…Yeah. That. That is a thing. That is still a thing that might actually be happening. Heir grimaces to himself as he flies over the outermost streets of Seattle, ready to start his usual grid pattern sweeps.

Hearing about the explosion at the police station and the Crew’s ensuing escape from custody...had hurt. Heir understands why his dad hadn’t mentioned it when they had spoken hastily this morning before John went out to confront Rose in New York; his dad may have disapproved of the unauthorized shenanigans John got himself into, but he’d still recognized that a crazed eldritch magical creature tearing up New York posed a wayyy more significant threat than one criminal, however dangerous, escaping police custody. By that point, John wouldn’t have been able to do anything about the Crew anyway – he would only have been needlessly distracted by pointless guilt while trying to calm Rose down, and they all could have died for it.

Now, though, he has to deal with the fact that while he’d been enduring stupid teleportation shenanigans with Dave and his brother, three police and two civilians had been injured in the blast, and Heir hadn’t been around to prevent Hearts from making a clean getaway. He’s also worried about Hemogoblin, with whom he still has no reliable means of communication, and so cannot confirm hadn’t gotten caught up in last night’s chaos without Heir to back him up.

They really need to figure out a way of getting in touch that doesn’t rely on Heir’s connection to the wind guiding him to where Hemogoblin may or may not be. Seeriously. This is starting to get old. Maybe they can get awesome heroic walkie-talkies! That would be classic!

The thought manages to draw a chuckle of Heir as he tries to imagine Hemogoblin with a bulky walkie-talkie strapped to his waist. It would look totally ridiculous. He should suggest it just to see the outraged look on the troll hero’s face.

That is, at least, if Hearts Boxcars hasn’t taken advantage of Heir’s unplanned absence to take out the other hero. Instead of letting the wind waft him gently over the city and alert him to crime, Heir sends out a whisper of intent, pressing his need to locate Hemogoblin into the breeze until he’s sure the wind understands that finding Hemogoblin is a priority, too.

The response is surprisingly immediate. The wind buffets Heir in the small of his back in its haste to rush him over the roof of a sprawling mall complex, and though Heir keeps an eye below him for whatever potential crime could catch the wind's attention so completely, it soon becomes clear that his request has definitely gone through.

He ends up hovering over the Seattle Public Library. The area is dark and quiet, and Heir starts to get confused when he sees that the streets and alleyways are all relatively empty. The only sign of life he finds is a rat digging through a split open bag of garbage, which Heir absently levitates into the dumpster it fell out of.

Wait. Oh my god. Yes. It’s finally happened. Heir can’t believe it takes so long for this moment to finally arrive -

He is quite literally cleaning up the streets of Seattle.

Cackling to himself, Heir rises into the air again, just in time to catch a flicker of movement in the corner of his eye. The wind yanks him almost sideways, overexcited and enthusiastic in its haste to reach its target. Err, maybe Heir put a little too much spirit into that request to locate Hemogoblin; he doesn’t think the wind has ever been this forcefully earnest before, except in his defense. He hovers back over the street beside the library and this time, when he scans the seemingly-empty shadows, he spots a sleek form flitting between one shadow and the next, two points of luminescence just barely visible from here.

He does wonder what Hemogoblin is doing on the ground rather than on the roof, as he floats downward. But mostly, he's just happy to see the other hero looks to be in one piece! "Hello, Hemogoblin," he says softly, letting the wind drop him to the ground just outside the edge of a lonely street light.

The other hero presses a little further into the shadows, his candy red eyes widened a little more than usual under his mask, but other than that, he doesn't show any other sign that Heir's appearance has startled him. "Well, well. Look who came back to our neck of the woods. And here I thought you'd be occupied with things on the East coast," Hemogoblin murmurs, one hip hitching up slightly as he folds his arms.

Uh.
Ooooops.

John had been so concerned about Karkat having seen Heir on the news, Heir had completely forgotten that Hemogoblin is probably in possession of a TV, too. And totally not blind or stupid. Uh. Oh man.

"Ahahah?" he laughs nervously, and immediately wants to slap himself. Could he sound any more uncool?! Come on, pull it together! "Yeah, that was kind of an unexpected detour. Like, I honestly have very little idea how I managed to get there in time."

How does one explain that one's powers have suddenly extended into the realms of teleport-spamming that ranges across the country? Seriously, is there some kind of hero manual Heir can read about this sort of thing, because he needs to brush up on hero etiquette or something.

One foot is brushing the ground slightly, and the troll's eyes have gone slightly hooded. It's making Heir's mouth kind of dry, and he feels as awkward in comparison as ever. Hemogoblin seriously has this svelte, seductive thing down, and it's as intimidating as it is alluring. "You're telling me you ended up at the scene of some super villainous breakdown all the way across the country...by accident?"

Oh no. Hemogoblin is pouting, his lip just a little pursed. It is doing things to Heir. Auggghhh.

"It's a new thing," Heir hastens to explain. He's flailing a bit with his arms, and probably looks like a total spaz. Thank god his mask covers up the faint flush of embarrassment working its way across his face. "Uh, I don't know how much you saw of it - a lot of the news crews were getting wrecked before we arrived, and I don't know how technology really reacts to all that grimdark R-the villain was putting out."

Oooh man. He has no idea what people are calling Rose's super powered evil side! He nearly said her actual name! He really is off his game, here.

"They seemed to catch most of it," Hemogoblin says, raising a slinky eyebrow. Is everything about this guy...slinky? "After a while they started to avoid Dark Star's immediate vicinity, and the quality went down, but I saw enough."

Dark Star, huh? Well, Heir guesses if you had no idea for the context of how the Horrorterrors worked, it made as good a name as any. "Uh. Then you probably saw the uh" - Heir twirls his fingers in circles which has nothing to do with anything oh my god this is embarrassing - "teleporty thing?"

Hemogoblin's eyes light up, and his back straightens. "I might have noticed it," he says, staring at Heir intently. "I wasn't sure it was you, after that. Something new?"

Well, he can't exactly share all the details of his cross-country tour from hell, but he can give the barest details. Hemogoblin does deserve an explanation. Kind of. "Ended up in Houston last night," Heir says, shrugging. "I knew how to get in contact with Flashstep, so I hung out with him while I tried to figure out how the whole teleporting thing worked. And then in the morning we heard about uh, Dark Star, and we grabbed the Puppeteer and hauled ass up to New York. It was all really improvised - trust me, I did not intend to be out of town last night." He folds his hands together to make them stop flailing, and gives Hemogoblin the most apologetic look he can muster. "I heard about Boxcars and everything. Seriously, I am so sorry I wasn't here to help. Did you hear anything more about that?"

Hemogoblin stiffens up and draws back again, grimacing outright. "Yeah, that whole thing was a mess. I managed to track Boxcars to the docks where we fought them before, but he got away on a ship before I could catch him."

Heir shares a sympathetic grimace. It's both better and worse news than he'd thought he'd hear. "So he's left the city entirely, you think? What are the odds he'll come back after all this mess?"

"No idea." Hemogoblin sighs, his claws drumming along the smooth plane of his arm. "After those explosions at the station, I'm sure it'd be hard for him to keep a low profile if he were to come back to Seattle. But there's still a few Crew members in the city, I'm sure, and who knows what they'll get up to with him gone."

"Nothing we can't handle!" Heir replies, trying to drum a smile. "Now that we're both on the job, they should be easy to pick off if they try to pull anything. It sucks that Boxcars got away, but if he ever decides to show his face in our town again, we'll be all over him!"

Hemogoblin smirks a little in response, his eyes still troubled.

But. Hang on. Explosions, plural? "Wait, explosions? I thought it was just the one."

The other hero winces, his folded arms tightening almost defensively. "Ugh. Yeah. Don't remind me.
The media has just been lumping it in with the first explosion - but yeah, there were two. See, Boxcars didn't know you were out of town, either. So when I realized there was trouble, I checked the roof, since that was where they left a message for you, last time. I thought maybe Boxcars couldn't resist one last taunt that might give away where he was headed."

Heir can see where this is going, and he doesn't like it. "And there was an explosion?! Are you alright?" He scans Hemogoblin's body - not that way - frantically checking him over for some injury Heir missed earlier. Surely even with the way Hemogoblin seemed to control his blood, he would have taken some serious damage from a bomb!

"Nothing I couldn't handle," Hemogoblin says flippantly, his confident smirk returning to his face as he gives Heir a knowing look. Yeah, he so noticed the onceover. But it was totally not sexual! That's Heir's story, and he's sticking to it. "It slowed me down a bit, but I wouldn't be here if it really worked me over."

"That's good," Heir says, a genuine smile creasing beneath his mask for the first time all day. Today's just been full of weird mood swings and ups and downs, and to hear that his partner dodged a bomb like this is a pretty good note to end it on, actually. He is totally okay with this turn of events. He bobs back on his heels, which are still balanced in midair. "But again. I am so sorry I kind of ditched out the night after we officially became partners. And then the night after that I ended up in Houston.
I can honestly say this is the first time in my hero career that this kind of thing has happened - I have a much better attendance record, usually!"

"I believe you." Hemogoblin stretches a little, unfolding his arms and rolling his shoulders, his eyes flashing as he moves in and out of the radius of the streetlight. It's kind of hypnotic but Heir is totally not thinking about that right now. "I'm fairly sure having a major mob invade the city and start bombing everything is a pretty unusual turn of events. And no one saw Dark Star coming, obviously.
Maybe now that Boxcars has left town, things will settle down a little."

"Hopefully," Heir agrees. "Alright. You like patrolling the east side of town, right?" He rises up a little higher, feeling a faint tug from the wind. He's getting an inkling of some crime that is only slowly becoming urgent. He's probably going to have to take off soon. The two of them can't just stand around here all night chatting, after all! They have jobs to do! "I want to drop by the police station, but then I can probably take the west."
"Sure. And maybe when we both have a spare moment, you can tell me about New York, and show me how this new teleportation thing works?" Hemogoblin arches an eyebrow, his head tilted to the side as he follows Heir's slow ascent.

"Oh. Alright," Heir agrees, shrugging. "I can't really do it on command yet, so I probably need to work on that, anyway." He'll probably want to practice in the privacy of the Egbert house, first and foremost, somewhere he can keep himself contained and where his dad can help him out with the fine details of how the power works. But after that, Heir's definitely going to put this new ability to use in the field -

"It's a date, then."

What.

Whaaat.

Heir's face explodes into a massive blush, so bad he can feel the burn in his ears and across his forehead. Oh jeez, his entire face is red. This is so mortifying! "Th-that's - uh, no, that's not what I meant," he babbles, his hands springing apart from the death grip he's had them laced into in order to resume their flailed, protesting gestures.

"Hmmm. Too late," Hemogoblin sing-songs, backing away with a full, luscious grin. "Mind giving me a helping hand, Heir?"

"Whaaat?!" Heir just smacks his hands over his mask, his fingers spread so they're covering his eyes as he fumbles to cover his blush. Ow! Fuck! Agh, he's such a klutz! "Mnagh?!"

Hemogoblin's smile couldn't get any wider as he juts his hip out and points a thumb up in the sky. "I could use a lift to get to roof-level. It would take so much more time if I did it all by myself..."

He winks.

Heir basically curls up inwardly and dies at this point. He's completely incoherent. "Y-yes, uh, sure," he squeaks, his hands actually jittery as he reaches out with his connection to the breeze and spools a second veil of wind to lift Hemogoblin, too. Luckily, the wind doesn't really get stuff like extreme sexy-overdoses, so it just raises both heroes smoothly into the air, responding to Heir's thought of 'up.' Once they're above the roof across the street from the library, Heir sets Hemogoblin down, too nervous about landing him fully on the ground in case he uses too much force in his mortification. Instead, he lets the troll drop a few inches above the roof. Hemogoblin lands delicately, taking the slight gap in stride. "I, I guess I'll see you around? Maybe?"

"Perhaps. See you later, Heir." With that and a final luminous crimson wink, Hemogoblin is off, taking a running leap off the roof. He actually does a backflip midjump, cutting it so close to the edge of the building that Heir raises his hands instinctively, a gale rising up to reach down and catch Hemogoblin if he loses his precarious balance. But the troll hero has absolute control of the flip and lands in a handstand on the next roof over, his body arching with amazing flexibility as he then kicks down onto his feet and takes off running.

Heir watches the other hero go far longer than is strictly necessary. With Hemogoblin's immediate, overwhelming presence gone, he can calm down a bit. Calm down a lot. Appreciate the view.

And yeah, he was a total spaz just then, and Hemogoblin totally saw the spazzing. It was a thing. But Heir regrets nothing about this last part of their meeting.

Nothing at allll.
John's arm and collar bone are aching by the time he calls it a night. His dad had gone over the muscles and tissue before John took off for the night, and declared the collar bone no better and no worse for the wear after the battle in New York. He'd been a little worried about the damage that might have been done by the Puppeteer's emergency field op on John's dislocated shoulder, but the fix had been done with such precision that Samuel could find no sign of deeper tissue damage. It's just the usual ache John is going to have to expect for the next few weeks as the bone heals, because he refuses to take off the time from work to wait for it to heal through rest. He's already going to have to skip out on swim practices for appearance's sake - that's enough of a break from his usual strenuous routine.

And tonight was a good night, anyway - it sucks that the Midnight Crew seems to have gotten away as they did, but on the other hand it means far fewer explosions in John's future, which he can appreciate for the sake of his poor city if nothing else. As long as nothing more difficult than the usual muggings and other petty crimes turns up, he should be solid.

When he climbs in through his window, he hesitates in the center of the room, the breezes that carried him home still tugging at the seams of his clothes. He pulls off his goggles and mask, pauses again, and tosses them on the bed rather than opening up the safe in the wall. He opens his door instead and tiptoes softly down the hallway, to where he can see a thin line of light under his dad's bedroom door. Swallowing a little, John knocks carefully on the door and whispers, "Dad? I'm back."

He gets nothing but silence in response for a long moment. He hears floorboards creaking under his dad's feet, slowly approaching the other side of the door. "Welcome home, son," he says at last, something more than pride muddling his voice.

John nods and blinks hard, his eyes kind of stinging, and walks back to his room. He thinks maybe they've reached equilibrium again, that he's been forgiven for all the shit he hadn't even realized he'd put his dad through yesterday. The bitter edge of guilt that's been gnawing at his stomach all night long eases at last. His dad doesn't hate him, isn't disappointed in him, and that means everything is going to be alright.

It's with a much lighter heart that John changes into pajamas. He's still got some energy from all the naps he's been taking over the past few days, so he boots up his computer and logs in. It's way later in Dave and Rose's time zones, but Dave at least has always kept the weirdest hours, staying up all night mixing music and making ironic comics, sleeping in until noon, and then (presumably) spending all afternoon as Flashstep patrolling the streets of Houston.

John winces when he sees the group chat with Dave and his brother is still open on the screen. His computer automatically goes into sleep mode after a few minutes of inactivity, which is why his dad hadn't been able to see the context of John's disappearance in the chatlog.

He doesn't know what makes him read the last of the chat before closing out the window to restart by pestering just Dave. Maybe it's the fact that he rage-teleported before he saw Dave and Bro's reaction to his total meltdown, and he can see that the red and pale orange extend past John's Karkat-style rage rant.

TG: whoa what
TT: shit
TG: john you know caps lock?
TG: were those weird troll swear words because i got maybe half of that John freezes, and then scrolls back up.

EB: WKSHRISEHSKW

Wait...what the hell? He never typed that! Dave's comment is right: it looks as though John just smashed a bunch of keys in his caps-locked ragefest...but John never did that! He just remembers being so angry - and then the pain had hit, clutching at his heart and clawing through his chest. In his shock, he'd been unable to finish whatever embarrassing threat he'd planned to fling at Bro (talk about awkward); instead, he'd wrapped his arms around his chest, certain he was having a heart attack of some kind, and pushed back away from the desk, staggering to his feet before the teleport hit and he suddenly appeared three feet above a pile of swords in Houston.

His hands had been nowhere near the keyboard. And there's nothing on the desk that could have fallen over and hit the keys in the wake of his abrupt disappearance. So what gives?

Shaking his head, John takes a screencap of the inexplicable extra comment and saves it to the desktop for future reference. Enough weird stuff happens to him that he doesn't really take anything for granted anymore. 'Don't delete anything' is kind of Dave's motto, and one he always badgers John about - but Dave has also been raised by the Puppeteer, who from the looks of their apartment is a total packrat when it comes to dangerous weapons, robots, and rainbow puppets with odd noses.

Anyway, if Dave had his way all the time, John would be carrying Casey along at all hours of the day, including to school. The Striders are just bizarre sometimes. But occasionally Dave gives good advice!

So! John pulls up a new pester window, and sees that Dave had already been talking in an individual chat window about three hours ago. John makes a face at the mention of a corpse party - seriously, Dave can be sooo weird sometimes! - and is chuckling quietly to himself by the end. He starts typing.

-- ectoBiologist [EB] began pestering turntechGodhead [TG] at 04:13:01 -- EB: dude, as awesome as your bosom probably is, no thanks ;/
EB: and i don't know what you're talking about, man, i make great life choices! the best life choices!

Yeah, that's probably not true. At all. But he couldn't just let Dave go around impugning the Egbert life choice-making family honor!

TG: fucking lies man
TG: you totally went out heroing all night long didnt you
EB: so what if i did? :P that's my job!
TG: jfc john i swear you have no survival instinct at all
TG: rule one of strifing if your arm is fucked you dont go around swinging a giant goddamn mjölnir rip-off
TG: you sit at home and eat ice cream and watch ironic romcoms okay this is first grade shit EB
EB: hahaha, CG would probably be all for that plan.
TG: CG? oh christ
TG: it's the other guy isnt it
TG: that asshole who thinks he can steal my man
TG: screw chat initials tell me this guys name
TG: i have to evaluate this fucker
TG: see if hes worthy of my bros attention
TG: this is serious fucking business EB theres a whole interview process this guy totally skipped over
TG: like a group interview to weed out the weak followed by a background check and several drug tests and an essay TG: i have yet to consent to this troll friendship business i did not sign off on this EB: argh! dave, you type way too fast!
EB: and come on, whatever happened to confidentiality :/
TG: we screwed that one over the minute you decided to share the bed of one dave strider
EB: what.
TG: its too late man you have warmed my bed
TG: you have slept between the same sheets as me TG: basically
TG: i own your ass now
EB: daaaaaaaaaave!!!

John is rapidly losing control of this situation. This always happens with Dave. Always. Must...focus…

EB: none of that has anything to do with CG
EB: and his privacy is important too, okay??? i can't just give out his handle to someone without telling him first!
TG: bullshit john
TG: i would be so discreet im telling you
TG: he wouldn't even know i was in his head until it was too late TG: all of his secrets would be mine
TG: i wouldn't even tell him how we know each other if you dont want me to i know you get all bashful and shit man EB: look. we're super awesome friends, dave.
EB: but there's just too much risk of cross-contamination if you and CG started talking.
TG: harsh man

Wait. Did that actually hurt Dave's feelings? John squints at the screen. It's too hard to tell when Dave is just being Dave and when he's actually trying to cover up hurt feelings by being even more Dave.

EB: i mean it would be soo awesome if you guys could be friends too!
EB: but i also think you might hate each other because CG just kind of pretends to hate everyone by default and you would probably think that's obnoxious
TG: what thats stupid
TG: does he pretend to hate you?
TG: if the fucker is making you feel all unloved and shit i will drown him in apple juice so help me god i have that power now
EB: yeah, this is going pretty much exactly how thought it'd go EB: wait what apple juice
EB: dave, what are you doing...
TG: stuff
TG: things
TG: you know EB the usual
EB: wowwww, that's just vague enough to make me reeally suspicious.
TG: so much aj john TG: so much
TG: ill send you a case when the brand label is finished being copyrighted so you can try some of this elixir
EB: i still have no context for this
TG: just wait man. ive been pretty fucking busy all night long running some time loops
TG: so many irons in the fire rn
TG: my empire will span a modest-sized galaxy

John is so confused. But if he's reading this right...

EB: i leave you alone for a half a day and you start an apple juice empire?!
TG: dont worry as my honorary first bro-husband in the strider harem youre first in line to inherit TG: like fuck would i bequeath this empire to bro hed fuck everything up
EB: i
EB: you know what? okay. i accept. no take-backsies. time loops?
TG: fuck yes
TG: i mean wait uh
TG: yeah, i guess i didnt really ever mention that part, huh
TG: i can do more than stop time now
TG: i can go back a little, too
EB: really??
TG: been runnin some loops for a while now, getting used to it
TG: hurts like a son of a bitch before it works but it hasnt killed me yet so
TG: ive run through like twelve hours now tonight in the space of three linear hours getting this empire started
TG: so worth it
EB: that's so sweet dave! why didn't you try that in new york tho?
TG: i totally did bro
TG: got all those kids out of the museum
TG: just in time for tentarose to wreck my shit
EB: :(
TG: not my proudest moment okay
EB: wait, you said it hurts?
EB: when did this whole thing start?

John is frowning again. I mean, wow, it's really neat that Flashstep will have a new power in his lineup, according to his inner hero nerd, but this is all kind of...weirdly coincidental? A new power, accompanied by sudden pain? Has Dave been having these weird pseudo-heart attacks too?
He also has two flashing Pesterchum windows in the bottom corner of the screen. One is thoughtfulThaumaturge, which is Rose's new handle, and the other is carcinoGeneticist. Jeez, everybody is up late tonight! John can't even imagine how Karkat could be up so late when he usually stops pestering John a little before 10...Maybe he got caught up in a movie marathon? It wouldn't be the first time.

But oh man. Managing three pesterlogs at once is gonna suck. John isn't used to being this popular! He has to watch himself with Karkat especially, because he's the only one of the three who doesn't know John is Heir. He can't afford to make stupid mistakes!

Biting his lip, John makes an executive decision. He'll wrap up with Dave before he replies to the other two. It's late, and he doesn't want to risk it typing in the wrong window.
TG: idk a little before you decided to drop by?
TG: time gets a little weird when you keep adding a few extra hours to your day
TG: there's like three different daves in this room atm helping me out at different points in the timeline
TG: and it feels like im getting choked out or stabbed in the throat or something
TG: its fucking annoying as hell but you get used to it
TG: except not really fuck that noise its not even halfway ironic its just stupid
EB: huh
TG: yeah enough of me being a whiny little bitch about this TG: why do you ask
EB: it's just weird, that's all
EB: my teleporting thing hurts too!
TG: are you seriously saying we both got painful new abilities within like a week of each other?
TG: too real, EB
TG: our bond is transcendent
TG: now gimme his chumhandle i wanna interrogate this CG character

John's face slams into his desk. It hurts and when he sits up to stare at the computer screen in vague horror his cheekbone throbs. He can't believe this is actually still a thing.

EB: what no we're having a serious conversation here! i think this is really significant!
TG: i think your new biffle is pretty significant EB: omg you have a one track mind
EB: did you just seriously say biffle?
TG: come on EB: noppppe
EB: not happening!
TG: tell me
EB: no!!!
TG: goddammit man i am your internet husband tell me or i make lil cal my successor, god help me
EB: fuck you, you didn't put a ring on it dave so it doesn't count!
TG: …
TG: ………
TG: ………….
EB: no.
EB: whatever you're thinking dave, no
TG: ringofirony.jpeg
EB: goddammit i'm not opening that TG: do it
EB: no
TG: you're breaking my heart EB
EB: this is so dumb
EB: you need to go to sleep dude. i think we both do, this is the silliest conversation we've ever had.
TG: hellyeahmotherfuckingproposal.jpeg
EB: i am so not opening that one either TG: you know you want to EB: i really don't TG: youreallydo.gif
EB: oh no

John opens them. In true Dave fashion, all three images are completely shitty, and John is pretty sure the hellyeahmotherfuckingproposal picture is just those two badly drawn characters from Dave's ironic webcomic with their hair slightly redone and set up as though the one in red is offering the supremely shitty ring from the first image to the one in blue. It is, indeed, a motherfucking bro-proposal.

This is all incredibly stupid. John can't stop laughing. He starts wheezing as he crams half a fist into his mouth to make the horrible barking seal noises stop, his whole body shaking with giggles. The third image is of a jpeg face, scrambled with artifacts from being saved too many times, animated as a gif with one eyebrow going up and down in an 'ironic wiggle'. John thinks he's almost crying at this point.

EB: oh my god this is awful TG: isnt it great?
EB: i think you broke me i cant breathe
EB: yeah it's definitely time to go to sleep
TG: fine EB go to sleep
TG: you opened it thats like a yes right there
EB: whateverrr dave :P
EB: don't stay up all night! your apple empire can wait until morning
EB: also i'm pretty sure you can't patent a label unless the patent office is open and its still the weekend TG: what no that cant be
TG: fuck
TG: what is this shit i could have owned my own factory by noon tomorrow now youre telling me i have to wait until Monday to set these gears in motion?
EB: sucks man! talk to you later!
TG: what no you cant leave me in my time of need

TG: god fucking dammit john

Yeah, conversations with Dave are kind of interminable unless you just cut your losses and run. John yawns widely as he opens up Rose's window. The sight of her pale purple text reassures him a lot, in the part of his mind that had been kind of morbidly convinced that once Rose signed off earlier in the day, he'd never hear from her again. But obviously that had been the irrational depressed part of his brain, and he tries not to think that way too much anymore!

-- thoughtfulThaumaturge [TT] began pestering ectoBiologist [EB] at 04:26:32 -- TT: Ah, John. I see you have logged in.
TT: It would appear that neither of us are quite able to sleep tonight.
TT: And as promised, I will keep in contact with you, John.
-- ectoBiologist [EB] has joined the chat! --
EB: hey rose! you're back!!! :D
TT: Indeed. Unfortunately, my attempts at obtaining more in-depth information from my mother proved less than fruitful.
TT: She persists in the theory that the connection between our childhood and Dave is merely coincidental.
EB: really? blehhhh. it's kind of obviously not, doctor lalonde! :P i wish i could say my talk with my dad went any better. mostly he was just kind of disappointed in me for taking off to houston and then new york, which i guess i can't really blame him for.
EB: i think i'll have to try again when he's not so worried still. i really gave him a scare yesterday and i feel pretty bad about that :(
TT: Understandable. And it is not as though it is particularly urgent that we obtain these answers immediately. My attempt at interrogating my mother went poorly, perhaps because I attempted to rush it. In my haste, I nearly undid all of the work I did to recover this afternoon.
EB: oh no! are you okay?!
TT: Better, actually. I completed a proper meditation cycle and even ventured to sleep for a few hours. It has been a long time since I last slept. The nightmares were predictable, at least, and simple to manage.

EB: i, uh, guess that's good? :/ sorry you had nightmares though TT: It is no less than I expected. If the grimdark hadn't been enough to provoke the terrors in my subconscious mind, the destruction I caused in Albany and New York City would have provided ample fodder.

EB: none of that was your fault rose! i told you before, i won't let you blame yourself for what a bunch of tentacle monsters made you do!

TT: I do appreciate the sentiment, John. It is just...difficult for me to accept that.
TT: And I fear that remaining here with my mother will only cause my mental turmoil to worsen. This is not an environment conducive to serenity, not when I still feel such rage towards her.

EB: you really hate her now, don't you? before you were always so mad because you thought she was all passive aggressive and stuff, but now i guess you really do have a reason to hate her.

TT: It is difficult to analyze myself objectively, of course, but I must keep up the attempt. I must not lose sight of myself again. And what I feel when I look upon my mother is TT: Maybe if she could be bothered to explain herself properly, to provide the answers to the questions we so desperately want answered, I would be able to impartially accept that her actions were necessary, and work to restore our relationship at least to the point of our old standoff.

TT: But she refuses. She continues to sidestep me and treat me as though I am a child who cannot see through her pitiful fraud. And for that, I can have no respect for her. Simply being in the same room as her reduces me to the most vulgar, unfettered fury. Fury that I cannot afford to feel, not with my mind still so uncertainly balanced.

John pulls a face. His stomach is all knotted up in sympathy, but he doesn't know what words would make the situation better! Rose's relationship with her mom is all messed up now, and he's starting to think they're never going to be able to reconcile. When he tries to imagine being that angry at his own dad, even hypothetically, it just makes him heartsick.

EB: i guess i can't really reassure you that everything will be alright, cause i'm not sure it will be.
EB: but if you really think you can't stay around her anymore, you can always come here! there's no way my dad would ever turn you away, you know that!
TT: I...thank you, John. Though I'm certain your father would be a little more wary about welcoming me into the Egbert household after yesterday's events.
EB: no way! if he doesn't get that it wasn't you, i'll make him understand!
EB: i'm pretty sure he gets it, i spent all yesterday morning explaining it to him on the way to the airport :P
EB: but seriously rose, if you need a place to stay, come here!
TT: We will see. I may already have other contingency plans in place, but it may be a few days before I can set them into motion.
TT: I wished to get a better idea of what my mother is working on here, but I'm afraid my guide has gone missing, and I trust no one else to give me an unbiased account of the goings on in this laboratory complex.
EB: a guide? who?
TT: you would remember her as the Personal Motorist. She has assured me however that she prefers Protégé Mediator.
EB: ohh, PM! she was really cool! and an awesomely terrible driver! :D
TT: Quite. She was very helpful earlier in showing me to a computer room, but I seem to have lost track of her since I had to retreat into meditation. She said she wished to introduce me to a mentor of hers, and I have not seen her since.
EB: darn. i'm sure she's still around though! what are you trying to figure out about your mom's work?
TT: I am certain that there is something here she is hiding from me, something that concerns our pasts. Her work has always been focused on the quantum scale; I am curious as to why she left to take the helm of such an extensive research factory, with so many irrelevant scientific and thaumaturgic fields at play.

EB: i see. i wish i could help more from here. there is one thing, i guess

TT: Hmm?

John gnaws on his lip, then nods to himself.

EB: something the stewardess said on the flight back to Seattle. she mentioned that the company that owns the private plane, the harley foundation, also helped fund a lot of science initiatives, including your mom's lab!

EB: i don't know, maybe you can look around for clues about that to help direct your search.

TT: I'll look into, John. It is certainly more than I have managed to garner from my feeble attempts at questioning my mother.

TT: One last thing before I must tend to other matters - tell me, John, are you familiar with the term 'Skaian'?

John reads that word.

That word.

And then there's just PAIN -

Whatever the hell hits him just then, it royally flattens him. John is pretty sure he's only out for a few seconds, but he opens his eyes almost in tears, spots flaring over his vision as he pressed his hands to the sides of his skull. It feels like something is trying to claw its way out of his head, and he has to hunch his head forward and lean over his knees, sucking in breath after breath in an attempt to settle his racing heartbeat.

It's nothing like the pain of teleporting. His eyes have trouble focusing as he stares down at his legs, but he can see tiny drops of red dripping slowly from his nose onto his pants. He laughs a little, while his vision tilts sideways. This is wrong wrong wrong and god does he hate that word -

No. No, there's nothing wrong.

Everything is completely

and totally fine.

He skims over the word Rose has typed in her lilac font, absently wiping the blood off on his pants.

Nope. As long as he doesn't look at that (hateful fucking word) there's nothing wrong at all.

EB: i - no i don't think i've heard that word before

TT: ...John? Those were rather gratuitous typos.

EB: yeah, i know. i think i just need to go to sleep. all the new teleporting shenanigans are really wearing me out, i think

EB: you should have seen me and dave earlier. we were completely out of our minds by the time we stopped chatting, it was just absurd

EB: sorry about that word, it just doesn't sound very familiar at all! except maybe it sounds like that one god from greek mythology?
TT: Gaia, the earth goddess. Mother of all. My thoughts exactly. But I can find no connection between the two words, and can find no etymology for something like 'Skaian' at all. Just another mystery I must ferret out in these labs, it would seem.
EB: good luck! i can ask my dad about that word too in the morning maybe :)
EB: night rose! er, or morning now, i guess TT: Sleep well, John.
-- thoughtfulThaumaturge [TT] ceased pestering ectoBiologist [EB] at 04:51:11 --

John shakes his head. There are some drops of blood on his pants when he looks down, and he touches his nose in surprise, coming away with little smears of red on his fingers. Bluh! How gross! He stands up real quick and stops by the bathroom, running some hot water to wipe off the blood. Jeez, when did he start getting such bad nosebleeds for no reason? He wipes at his face with a hand towel, careful to get the little smears of blood that just barely trickle out of his ears, and then he smiles at himself in the mirror.

It would be stupid to go to bed all covered in blood, after all! That task finished, he heads back to the computer, rolling his eyes over such a stupid delay.

And now there's just Karkat! By this time Karkat's probably been waiting fifteen minutes or something, which John would feel bad about, except he strongly suspects Karkat will have fallen asleep in that interval anyway. To his surprise, though, Karkat's name is still highlighted in the main Pesterchum app. Humming faintly to himself, John closes Rose's chatlog with more force than is probably necessary, and opens Karkat's window.

CG: JOHN
CG: WHY THE FUCK ARE YOU EVEN AWAKE
CG: I CAN SEE YOU'RE LOGGED ON AT THIS UNGODLY HOUR SO EXPLAIN YOURSELF
CG: ...
CG: YOU SEE THOSE THREE DOTS RIGHT THERE? THEY INDICATE THAT I AM WAITING IMPATIENTLY ON THE EDGE OF MY SEAT FOR THE FORTHCOMING EXPLANATION
CG: YOU HAVE TO FULFILL YOUR HALF OF THIS IMPLIED SOCIAL CONTRACT JOHN OTHERWISE THE GOVERNMENT WILL REVOKE YOUR STATUS AS A CIVILIZED HUMAN BEING CG: ...
CG: WHAT IN THE FUCKING FUCK COULD BE SO MUCH MORE IMPORTANT THAN PANDERING TO MY WHIMS JOHN THIS EXPLANATION HAD BETTER INVOLVE GODDAMN LASER SHARK TORNADOS CHAINSAWS AND PIE
EB: hey karkat! :D
CG: DON'T YOU 'HEY KARKAT' ME JOHN EGBERT. HOW THE FUCK CAN YOU BE SO CHIPPER AT 4 IN THE MORNING.
CG: WHY ARE YOU EVEN ON PESTERCHUM THIS LATE WHY IS THIS A THING

Oops. Better think of a cover. What would make John wake up and get on the computer at 4 in the morning, usually? Other than the hero thing. Uh...what would make a normal teenager stay up this late?

Come on, John, think!

EB: ahahahaha
EB: my uh
EB: my collar bone was just acting up a little. no biggie!
EB: and i thought some mindless internet surfing would pass the time until i felt tired again!

CG: WHAT
CG: WHY DIDN'T YOU TELL ME YOU WERE HURTING
CG: WHAT IS THIS SHIT DO YOU NEED TO GO TO A FUCKING HOSPITAL
CG: WHERE IS YOUR GODDAMN CUSTODIAN WHY ISN'T HE TAKING CARE OF YOU JESUS FUCKING CHRIST FORGET HIM I HAVE A CAR I'LL DRIVE YOU MYSELF
CG: DON'T MOVE DON'T EVEN MOVE YOU DUMB FUCK I'LL BE THERE IN LIKE TWO MINUTES

No, what, no! That was stupid! Agggh! How did John walk right into that kind of set up?! It would appear he needs a distraction, or he's going to have a wild Karkat battering down the front door any second now. Quick, uh, what would Rose say?!

EB: whoa whoa karkat! i'm okay, seriously! i just needed to consume an analgesic before my shoulder would calm down
CG: WHY THE HELL ARE YOU TYPING LIKE THAT EB: like what?
CG: LIKE A POMPOUS UPPER CLASS DOCTORAL CANDIDATE WHO'S READ TOO MANY SHITTY HIGH FANTASY NOVELS

...Okay, obviously John is thinking too much like Rose. Because wow, spot on, Karkat!

EB: because it's four in the morning and i'm medicated :P
EB: dude, you try typing normally when you're on the good pain meds. half the stuff that's coming out on the screen barely makes sense when i type it!
CG: THIS IS NOT REASSURING ME JOHN THIS IS THE OPPOSITE OF ME BEING REASSURED
EB: i'm about to fall right back asleep, trust me, the meds are working. they just made me kind of loopy for a bit.
EB: why are you up, karkat? this is really late for you too!

There. Flawless topic change.

CG: GODDAMN INSOMNIA CAN GO FUCK ITSELF RIGHT IN THE LOADGAPER
EB: aww, that sucks man :( i thought you said it was getting easier to sleep?
CG: WELL MY FUCKING THINKPAN DECIDED IT WOULD BE FUCKING HILARIOUS TO RENDER ALL THIS FUCKING SOPOR USELESS
CG: CONGRATULATIONS RECOOPERACOON YOU ARE HEREBY DEMOTED TO THE LOWEST RUNG OF THE ECHELADDER YOU ARE IN FACT THE MOST USELESS PIECE OF SHIT EVER CONCEIVED OF BY TROLLKIND
EB: i can stay awake with you until you think you can go to sleep if you want!
EB: but it might help if you know you actually put down your phone and put your whole head in the 'coon :P since that's kind of how it's designed to work.
CG: NO GO THE FUCK TO SLEEP IF YOU CAN, YOU PANADDELED DUMBBASS CG: JUST CG: JUST LOOK
CG: HAVE YOU HAD ANY WEIRD FUCKED UP DREAMS LATELY

Uh. Well, that one came out of left field, even for Karkat! John scratches at his scalp, trying to recall the last time he dreamed at all. It had always been the bane of Rose's psychoanalytic sessions that John never dreamed much, even as a kid. No nightmares, but no good dreams, either, leaving her nothing to analyze for Freudian imagery. John can't help it though! If he does dream, he doesn't remember any of it when he wakes up.

EB: nope! why do you ask? did you have a nightmare or something?
CG: OR SOMETHING
CG: FORGET IT IT'S NOT IMPORTANT I DON'T EVEN KNOW WHY I ASKED SUCH A STUPIDFUCK QUESTION.
EB: you toootally had a nightmare, i can tell. you want to talk about it? i'm not a super awesome therapist dream analyzer but i think i'm pretty good at listening?
CG: I
CG: FUCK
CG: LOOK I'M NOT TRYING TO KEEP ANYTHING FROM YOU
CG: YOU'RE MY MOIRAIL AND I TRUST YOU BUT FUCK
CG: I DON'T THINK I'M LETTING MYSELF THINK ABOUT THIS. I CAN'T REALLY REMEMBER DETAILS, I JUST KNOW I DON'T WANT TO GO BACK TO SLEEP AND SEE IT AGAIN.
CG: SO THIS IS IN NO WAY A REFLECTION ON THIS MOIRALLEGIANCE OKAY THIS IS A FACT THAT I AM STATING FOR THE FUCKING RECORD PLEASE BELIEVE ME
EB: it's okay karkat, i believe you!
EB: if it's really that bad of a dream it's probably natural that you don't want to go to sleep again. but you should try anyway, you probably won't have the same dream twice in a row! and if you do, you can call me! or something like that.
EB: and we can talk!
EB: uh
EB: that all made sense, right? i think i'm actually not making sense anymore. there were a lot of exclamation points involved...
CG: LOOK I'M OBVIOUSLY KEEPING YOU AWAKE WHEN YOU'RE PITIFULLY HALF-ASLEEP
CG: GO TO SLEEP JOHN
EB: are you sure?
CG: YES I'M SURE. I'LL SEE YOU TOMORROW AND WE'LL GO TO THE GODDAMN PARK AND EAT SNOWCONES OR SOME SHIT
EB: yay! :)
CG: YOU ARE ABSOLUTELY FORBIDDEN FROM TRYING TO CLimb THAT NOOKCHA FING TREE WITH A BROKEN BONE THOUGH I AM PUTTING MY GODDAMN FOOT DOWN
EB: yes sir! i'm not dumb karkat :P it's not like i'm going to look at the first tree we come across and think 'HAHAHA I MUST CLIMB THIS TREE RIGHT NOW' :P
CG: I KNOW YOU EGBERT. ADDICTION IS A POWERFUL THING.
EB: i totally only did that once! you're just paranoid karkat.
EB: see you tomorrow!
CG: ANYWAY
CG: …

AUGH.
Kicking himself inwardly, John logs off the computer and bangs his head on the desk a few times.

The worst part, he thinks blearily, is that he really, really does like being Karkat's best friend. A lot! The only problem here is his stupid hormones, which would very much like Karkat to be something other than friendly, and John can't seem to shut them off. So every time John thinks he should maybe sort of mention to Karkat that, he automatically freezes up. On the one hand, he feels bad that Karkat thinks they're moirails when secretly John is over here totally taking advantage of all the cuddling for a different reason. On the other, there's no way he would ever want to risk losing Karkat's friendship entirely, and who even knows how Karkat would react to that kind of advance! He seems totally content with them being palebros, and John...John wants Karkat to be happy.

Even if that means being moirail-zoned for the rest of his life.

Confused and kind of just tired, John stuffs his uniform into the wall safe and goes to bed. He's got two hours to try to sleep through the quadrant confusion before it's time for his morning exercise routine, and he intends to make the most of them.

Ciudad Juarez, Mexico

Jade intends to cross over into the US at the border between Ciudad Juarez and El Paso. She could have asked Bec to help her coordinate jumps that would have brought her into the States within a few hours of landing in Chile, but it’s so much more exciting to be able to stop and meet people and eat good food along the way! And it’s not as though she has a set deadline for when she wants to meet up with John anyway, aside from the vague idea of meeting him before summer starts. So it’s taken her a couple of days to work her way up the backbone of South America into Mexico. Bec ends up with a poncho in bright green, orange, and rust red yarn somewhere in the mountains and it remains pristine even as they hack through some of the rainforests in Central America just for old times’ sake. It reminds Jade of the jungle back home on the island, and they have a lot of fun! WV seems to have slightly less fun, as he gets all huffy and crackles with green irritation whenever the undergrowth is too thick for him to scamper through as his usual speed, but he always perks up when there’s food involved.

It’s late in the evening by the time they arrive in town. The air is cool enough, with just the last remnants of the day’s arid heat lingering as Jade plants her hands on her hips. She had traded out her longer coat for a short sleeved uniform as they teleported from town to town throughout Mexico, but she’s still broken out into a sweat that clings to her forehead and chin. The air isn’t as muggy and thick with the scent of lush plants growth anymore, so she’s no longer feeling as nostalgic for the heat of her old island.

“You hanging in there, WV?” she asks, grinning down at the carapacian. She doesn’t worry about Bec – it can take the heat – but while WV seems to be alright with pretty high temperatures, he does get a little weird after a big teleportation hop. She’s not sure that it hurts him, exactly, and he can’t speak to explain why he sometimes has to curl up and breathe frantically for a few long moments after a major leap. It’s yet another reason why they walked a good part of the trip on foot – Jade still doesn’t know why stabilizing WV’s quantum state blew the three of them all the way to Australia, particularly when she wasn’t trying to teleport them anywhere. If WV starts to show signs of regressing into an invisible half-existence once more, they may be forced to travel on foot the rest of the way to John’s city until Jade can find another of her Grandpa’s labs to run further tests in.

WV salutes her with a hiccup, his favorite meter stick still clutched in a rickety claw. His feet are flashing with green pulses of energy, but it doesn’t seem to be hurting him, which is good. He has a bright blue poncho on, one that Jade had bartered for along with Bec’s in Peru when WV had spotted the sky blue stripes and proceeded to totally flip out and try to tear it off the wall. The covering is a little too long on him, draped over his sharp shoulders and falling down around his bony shins like a cloak. Between the bright yellow ruler, the green plasma flares, and the blue poncho he’s a riot of very different, very bright colors, but she doesn’t have the heart to tell him he looks a little silly. Especially not when he still looks so adorable!

The wall to their right explodes.

“Oh my gosh!” Jade yells, holding her arms out in front of her without thinking. At her side Bec is on its feet in a heartbeat. Jade feels the control of her impromptu teleportation yanked out from under her as Bec takes command, and she stumbles awkwardly when they land on the rooftop of the building across the street. WV lands hard as well, squeaking as he falls over sideways. She’d intended to jump them a few hundred meters south, but Bec seems to have other ideas. Righting herself, Jade rushes to the edge of the roof and looks over at the street below.

From up here she can see that it was not just the wall that exploded – the entire building has caved in, the walls blown out by the force of the roof collapsing in on itself. Some of the residents stumble out as Jade watches, but she can still sense movement in the breach. “We have to get them out!” She reaches out with her sense of space to try to pin down how many people are still trapped in the collapsed building –

Whoa. Uh. “That’s new,” Jade says, pulling her hands back hesitantly. Miraculously, she can’t feel any human sized bodies still taking up space in the wreckage, which means that somehow everyone got out okay. But the movement she’s sensing now is weirdly familiar.

It feels like one of Grandpa’s old caretaking and training robots from the Harley residence on the island – but bigger.

Much…bigger…

Jade’s eyes widen and her jaw drops a little as the giant robot straightens up, emerging from the billowing curtains of dust and debris kicked up by its harsh landing. It looks like a fairly standard bipedal model, with an enormous black club sign emblazoned across the chest plate and a strange addition to the head section that looks almost like a triangular hat with a circular pompom on top.

A surprisingly cheerful voice with the underlying gravelly rasp typical of a troll echoes over the speakers. “Hello, Miss Witch! I, Clubs Deuce, have orders to capture you!”

Jade blinks, and looks around. Bec is as silent as ever, but WV meets her eye and points at Jade. Jade quizzically points at herself, unsure, and WV stamps his foot, nodding his head violently.

Huh. How weird. But WV seems pretty certain. “Uh, I guess you’re talking to me, Mister Giant Robot?” she says dubiously, shouting to be heard. Her voice sounds thin and confused to her ears, and she clears her throat once before starting again in a much more determined tone. “But my name is Sharpshooter! I don’t have a magic theme! Soooorry!”
“I – uh – you don’t?” the voice says, startled. The giant robot begins to tilt slightly to the right, and Jade gets the impression that the driver within is too distracted to pay attention to what his robot is doing. That’s a good sign – for her, at least! Over the speakers there is a faint crackling sound, as though someone is frantically shuffling through a pile of papers. “What about space? Do you do the spacey thing?”

“I’m not telling you about my powers, stuuupid!” Jade sticks her tongue out at the robot, though who even knows how well the troll within can see it. “You totally just crushed that building with people still inside, and that means you’re a bad guy! I’m not telling you diddly squat!”

“Oh no,” the voice of Clubs Deuce sighs. “But you do look like the Witch of Space! And we tracked the spatial distortion all the way here. So I think that means you are her!”

Jade’s hackles go up, and she bristles, scanning the robot with her powers again. She’s not sure she can talk someone this dense out of a fight; she wants to know where any potential weak points in the hull might be. It’s not the exact same construction as one of Grandpa’s old devices, but the basic metal skeleton feels relatively similar… “I really don’t think that was me. I’m not a Witch! Your tracker thingy must be broken.”

Another pause ensues, during which Jade can hear more than one person muttering incomprehensibly on the other end of the speakers. Eventually someone exclaims, exasperated, “Sir! Sir, please, the loudspeakers are still broadcasting!” and the system clicks off with a flurry of apologies.

Jade trades a look with WV. He shrugs at her, just as confused.

Jade just knows that these guys are bad news. They know about her space thing, even if they got the name completely wrong, and she’s willing to bet that anyone with the funds for a space-to-ground missile launcher would similarly have the cash to burn on an awesome giant robot project. Jade approves of that last part, if nothing else. She starts to change out of her travelling and adventure clothes one piece at a time, pulling on her good fighting gloves and switching out her shorts for a battle skirt from the sylladex pocket that’s slit up the sides for freedom of movement.

The loudspeaker starts up again. “Ah, I think you’re trying to be sneaky! My associates tell me that the tracker thingy is not broken at all! All three of you are lit up like – like – like tiny green dots on my screen! And – hang on, did you change your outfit?”

“Yup!” Sharpshooter cracks her knuckles, and flicks a nice rifle out of the strife pocket. She lets her zoom lens fall over the right side of her glasses, and turns on one of the old mods from the days when she’d had to fight training robots all the time. “As cool as your giant mecha is, you still used it to flatten that poor house! I can’t let someone with such reckless disregard for public property and people’s lives wander around without facing the consequences!”

Aw yeah. Naaaaailed it!

“You want to fight?” Clubs Deuce’s voice sounds almost…disappointed? “Really? You seem like such a nice person though! Don’t you just want to – I don’t know, come quietly? I have a game of Parcheesi set up in the containment cell and everything!”

From over the loudspeaker, Sharpshooter is certain she can hear the sound of multiple hands slapping against multiple foreheads. She stares at the robot’s unmoving metal face, perplexed. “Why would you try to blow up my house, send crazy ninja bombers to attack me, and now bring along a giant fighting robot if you didn’t want to fight me?” She points an accusing finger at where she can sense the most human movement within the robot body.
“Oh, the missile was just to say hello. And now I’ve said it. Hi!” Clubs sighs. “And I couldn’t send actual ninjas to you – Diamonds doesn’t let me have clearance to use them, anymore. He gets so cross sometimes! Between you and me, sometimes I just want to give him a great big hug and shoo-”

“Sir! Stay on topic, sir!” someone begs in the background, sounding as though they are close to tears.

Clubs coughs, kicking up feedback on other end of the speakers. Sharpshooter winces, and Bec twitches by her side, its nose still trained on the giant robot across the street “R-right! Well! A fight it is then!” The robot straightens up and lumbers its way to the middle of the street, trailing clouds of broken concrete. “And Parcheesi later, I guess. If we have the time.”

"You guys ready?" Sharpshooter demands of WV and Bec. Bec whuffles through its nose and WV salutes again, a tiny frown furrowing between his eyes. It's a shame. She totally meant to officially induct WV in as her sidekick or something before their next huge emergency job, but it looks they'll have to put off the Awesome Supercool Induction Ceremony and Accompanying Fireworks/Dangerous Explosives Display until later!

A giant robot hand reaches out toward the rooftop. As though she'd actually stand still long enough for them to grab her! Sharpshooter launches herself through the air, a floating jump that sends her in an arc right over the Deucebot's hat. There is a crunch of rock behind her as the robot hand collides with the roof where she was standing. Chuckling, Sharpshooter lets herself fall behind the giant robot's back. She has faith in Bec's ability to get WV to safety at least, but WV's not too shabby either now that he has a body again!

Sharpshooter halts her descent somewhere around the side of the Deucebot’s knee joint, and ducks around behind the leg entirely as an enormous mechanical hand clumsily swats at her general location. Leveling her rifle, she fires five times in quick succession, letting the recoil send her tumbling backward through the air. Thankfully, the armor isn’t as thick as she’d feared, and Sharpshooter swings the rifle along her back to free her hands. Grabbing onto the leg, she rips the bullet-riddled panel off with her bare hands and thrusts her hand into a network of tangled cables and gears. She clenches a fist, and then opens it forcefully, and the space around her hand reacts. The inside of the leg explodes outward as the burst of space shoves all the inner parts away from Sharpshooter’s hand in a perfect sphere, and when she kicks off, teleport-hopping her way backward from the miniature explosion of circuitry.

The robot staggers, but doesn’t fall. Instead, it leans more heavily on the other leg, and veers around to limp toward her once more, arms reaching out with twin mechanical whines. Sharpshooter begins ducking and teleporting out of the way, searching for another opening with her rifle in hand. For such a large machine, the Deucebot has some fairly good reflexes! The SCIENCE part of Jade begins excitedly trying to calculate just how advanced the robot’s programming would have to be to command such large mechanical parts to move in tandem that quickly.

Bec is popping in and out around the robot’s viewscreen, green plasma flaring and pulsing in an attempt to disorient whoever is manning the robot’s controls. Over to the side, she catches a glimpse of WV as the small carapacian clings to one of the Deucebot’s arm guards. The arm attempts to shake him off. She can’t hear whether WV is squeaking in pain or panic or not from here – he’s just too quiet! – but when he balances himself with his stubby legs tucked into a section of the armor and begins to whack repeatedly at the elbow joint with his meter stick ruler, she decides he’s probably doing juuuuust fine! Even if he probably can’t do much damage with his cute little attacks, he’s distracting that arm from pursuing Jade, which is a big help!

Without warning, WV bursts into green flame all over. This time she hears his whimper of pain, and he begins to flail his arms, the meter stick flying away and spiraling down toward the ground below.
WV will fall next, if he doesn’t catch himself soon. “WV!” she yelps, yanking herself to a stop, her rifle spinning on its strap, and she reaches out to focus on snatching the carapacian to safety.

One of WV’s swinging limbs bangs awkwardly against the joint of the giant robot’s elbow. Sharpshooter’s ears pop with the sudden burst of spatial displacement that ensues, and when she blinks, the Deucebot is missing its elbow. The now-detached bottom half of its arm crashes to the ground with a resounding boom of metal on pavement. Sharpshooter feels exactly when and where the elbow and WV reappear – about ten yards to the right and up twenty degrees, on top of a roof. She glances up just in time to see WV yank himself up on top of the giant metal joint, his carapace back to its normal glossy black hue as he stares around in evident confusion. He spots his meter stick lying on the road below and claps both claws to the sides of his head, banging repeatedly in frustration.

…Whelp. That’s new. But hey, she’ll take it! Seriously, WV is going to make the best sidekick ever!

But distracted as she is, Sharpshooter fails to sense the rushing, incoming mass of the hand that comes at her from the side until it is almost upon her. Suddenly, the space to her right is completely occupied and she barely has time to turn her head and yell in surprise as a giant robot hand slams into her.

She’s more resilient than most people, but it still hurts when the hand knocks her down against the road. "Oof!" Her ribs creak dangerously and she barely manages to halt her fall before her head hits the ground too. If nothing else, the fact that the Deucebot doesn’t immediately crush her against the pavement confirms the fact that Clubs Deuce is trying to capture her alive rather than kill her. It takes a moment for Sharpshooter to reorient herself, her head spinning from the abrupt, unplanned change in altitude.

Then, with a blink, Sharpshooter growls and appears above the hand, levitating into an upright position before floating up along the robot’s arm. When she reaches the shoulder, close to where Bec is still putting on a strobe lights show, she swaps out the rifle for a grenade launcher, aims down at the shoulder joint, and pulls the trigger, before putting a good amount of air between herself and the explosion that ensues.

Heck yeah.

When the smoke clears, the arm is still attached but the metal is twisted and blacked, with raw, ragged edges. She drops inside and starts pulling at wiring and coil tubing at random, teleporting out vital pieces of the circuitry in wide swaths whenever she can get her gloved hands on them.

All the while, she keeps an eye on her secondary sniper lens attached to the side of her glasses. Even as she kicks out her feet and starts bashing the last twisted remnants of Deucebot’s shoulder joint off its hinges, the program running the data along the side of her vision finishes rendering.

A 3-D image of the Deucebot loads on the lens, with a two foot wide red sphere marked in the center of the giant clubs sign on the chest, encased in other moving parts.

It’s hard for Sharpshooter to pick out a robot’s internal engine when the robot is in motion, and all the parts are rattling along, creating aftershocks and vibrations that confuse her space sense. It’s a lot easier to just let her nifty 3-D rendering program map it out for her, and go from there. It takes some time to load, but it’s worth it! Zapping in front of the robot’s chest plate, Sharpshooter finds herself upside down, her hair falling over her face, but she doesn’t bother righting herself. Instead, she frames that blinking red sphere with her fingers like a box and tugs.

With a shriek of metal, she drags the Deucebot’s primary engine out through the chest plate. The giant robot shudders to a halt - not that it had been able to do much, with both arms incapacitated - and, with a creak, topples over as its one remaining functional leg loses the power to make up for the knee she blew out. Bec teleports out of the way, and reappears on the street corner, absently sniffing the robotic fingers of the arm WV had detached.

Unconcerned, Jade inspects the engine in her hands, then dismisses it. It's a pretty sloppy engine, with none of the finesse she saw in her Grandpa's machines. There is no new SCIENCE to be learned from this piece of garbage. Shrugging, she tosses it over her shoulder and floats to the ground to inspect the fallen Deucebot's head. "That's what you get for trying to mess with me, you total dorks!" she informs it. No one replies, and for all she knows the lack of power has shut down the microphones that would have let Clubs Deuce and his friends hear her from within the cockpit. Ohhh well. "You should just stay in there until the police arrive," Jade calls loudly, giving the armored robot head one last kick for good measure, sending the whole thing rolling back into the house the robot destroyed earlier. There is no reply from Clubs Deuce or his cohort, but she can feel them moving around in there, so they're okay.

But she's dispensed her justice - a robot for a building is basically just, right? - and it's up to the police in town to arrest them if they want to. Maybe it's different for other heroes, but Jade just likes to knock the big baddies down a notch or two. Arrest records and incarceration don't mean much to a girl who grew up on a deserted jungle island. "Alright guys, let's blow this popsicle stand!" she calls to the sky. Bec appears by her side, but WV waves frantically from the other roof before running in a panic along the edge of the roof, trying to keep her attention. Smiling ruefully, Jade snaps her fingers and goes to retrieve the carapacian.

Crossing into the US after that is a cinch, of course. Grandpa always insisted that passports were overrated and dumb and only served to delay adventure, a delay which he of course refused to have any truck with. So instead of doing it the boring legal way, Jade just has Bec teleport them into the center of El Paso for their next jump, and viola! Problem solved. After WV stops crackling in a sympathetic reaction to Bec's powers and the galaxies sink back under Bec's white fur, Jade decides to celebrate their successful defeat of the Deucebot and their recent illegal immigration into the States by treating them all to midnight tacos.

Because they're worth it.

The tacos, procured from a run down Taco Bell with minimal effort, are delicious. Jade and WV finish off ten between the two of them, while Becquerel looks on with a blank stare until Jade fishes one of the last pre-irradiated steaks from her sylladex and tosses it for him to catch. She doesn't really see him catch it in the bright green light show that follows, but she feels the irradiated burp of energy that escapes the wolf's muzzle two minutes later. It's a good thing steaks are more of a treat than a form of real nourishment for the wolf; the plane with all her extra stuff is still safe in the airplane hangar back at the estate in Britain, but also inaccessible from here. Jade really wishes she had time to pop back over the Atlantic and save some of the perishable food that might or might not go bad in the hold’s pocket dimension, but she has a lot of her clothes and stuff in her personal sylladex, anyway! She misses her guitar and her squiddle plush collection, but it’s not like they’re necessities. She doesn’t want to backtrack until she has a chance to meet John for the first time!

She doesn't realize they're still being followed until Clubs Deuce flies in through the window of the Taco Bell. Why would she think anything of the random movement of people walking around outside the building? It may be past midnight, but Taco Bell is always open. Always.

So there they are, innocently devouring inhuman quantities of taco, WV practically inhaling them... with his head tilted back so he can chug his standard liter bottle of TaB at the same time, when the window above the table beside theirs shatters inward. Glass goes flying everywhere and Jade, startled, holds up a hand, freezing the glass shards in place before they can go stabbing people willy nilly. Jeez! Talk about someone being inconsiderate!

She blinks at the squat, wide-eyed troll who sits up on the table next to theirs, where he landed after crashing through the window like a living cannonball. "Oh dear! That was exciting!" he laughs, sitting up and beaming at Jade. He waves at her frantically with a claw, his muddy brown eyes gleaming. "Hello, Witch of Space! Are you ready to come quietly, now?"

If the weird nickname hadn't been enough, Jade would have recognized him by the chipper, slightly confused tone of his voice. "Clubs?" she says incredulously, staring at his horns in a way that would usually have been a little rude.

But they're literally shaped like clubs! Like nubby little clubs from a deck of cards! No way that happens naturally! He has to have gotten work done.

"It is me!" he replies, grinning with all his teeth. He doesn't even look vaguely menacing, like most trolls would upon baring all their sharper incisors - he just looks weirdly happy and overly eager. "I told you we could track you, Miss Witch - you and your very scary wolf-beast!"

"Wowww, and that's not creepy at all," Jade replies, sipping on her soda loudly with just the corner of her mouth. She rests her hand on her chin. "Come on, mister, I already beat up your giant robot once, and it was a total letdown. Go bug some other space hero, I'm trying to eat tacos here."

Clubs just looks puzzled. "But I have orders to capture you and bring you back to base," he says slowly, his brow furrowing with deliberate thought. "So, I'm very sorry, but I think you have to come with me! Yes! That's right." His frown vanishes as he makes up his mind, and he nods deeply. "No other space witch will do. The boss told me that very specifically." He scoots his way to the end of his glass-covered table and stands up, coming over to fold his arms with a pout on his face.

"If you people are going to fight, please take it a la calle," the man behind the cash register says. He sounds just as bored as when he took Jade's taco order, and goes back to flipping through his magazine after giving his token warning.

Jade huffs, and swallows the last of her taco. "Noooo. We're leeeaving. Come on, Bec."

The wolf stirs where it has been lying beneath her's and WV's feet under the table, and Jade pulls down on her bottom eyelids to make a gross face at Clubs before Bec teleports them across the city.

She guesses they'll have to do some special maneuvering to make Clubs lose their trail. It'll be a pain, but hey, it's not like John is expecting them to arrive at a specific time. Sometimes Jade even wonders if John is expecting her at all! He's so bad about answering her pesterings!

- Four hours later, Jade is worried. Genuinely, truly worried. She's also absolutely starving. She worked off all those delicious tacos within the first hour of desperate teleportation, and she feels absolutely cheated because she didn’t get to savor the meal.

Because as it turns out, Clubs Deuce isn't kidding when he says he can track their space powers. If anything, he seems to be getting better at it with every passing minute. Jade had tried to lose them in El Paso, but he kept turning up around every corner! What's more, his lackeys are with him, and they have no qualms about enforcing Clubs's bizarre will by tossing the small troll bodily through windows and blowing up walls whenever the three heroes try to hide in an actual building. Jade had tried resorting to the desperate option of having Bec dump all three of them in the middle of the desert, but Clubs had arrived in a helicopter a little under a half hour later, that damned tracking thingy humming away in his hands. Jade gave serious thought to teleporting the mysterious machine off the tubby little troll's arm, but when she reached out, wrapping her awareness around the device, she found herself unable to focus on it. It's almost as though the tracker is quantumly unstable; half the time, it feels like the tracker is actually a playing card, before it switches back into being a machine.

Soooo inconvenient!

Jade has tried everything. Even when Bec teleports them a few hundred miles back over the border into the Mexican half of the Chihuahuan Desert, Jade can only look at the green lightning that accompanies the jump with a vaguely queasy feeling in her stomach as she flops down on her butt to rest. Bec is tireless, of course, but it also puts out a lot more energy when it teleports them anywhere. Jade has jumped so many times on such short notice that she's starting to feel a little light-headed and dizzy. And the last thing she really wants to do is go messing around with the fabric of space when she's not all there, mentally.

She's also beginning to get an inkling of what they need to do to get this dumb troll off their butts, but she reeeeally doesn't like it. Splitting up the party is never a good idea - but when Bec gives another compulsive flash of green energy that sets off WV in turn, she makes up her mind. They need to minimize how much spatial distortion Clubs is tracking, and the easiest way to do that is to get rid of the atomically powered wolf leaving huge spikes in radiation whenever it teleports from point to point.

"Bec? Becquerel?" She kneels to be on the wolf's level, and scratches behind its fluffy white ear. She clasps the guardian wolf around the neck, hugging it. "Bec, you need to go," she whispers, scratching at the ruff of fur above the top of Bec's spine. "I'm sorry, but we need to try to confuse him. Can you head over into Arizona for me to throw him off the trail?" She kisses him on the nose. "Don't come back until I call you, okay, boy?"

Bec twitches its tail a few times, but makes no move to leave until Jade lets go of its neck and steps back. The wolf gives no real sign of acknowledging the order, but a few seconds later it hovers into the air, its fur going glossy and green in the darkness, and vanishes.

Separating from Bec feels wrong, but it's the only thing Jade can think of to do. "Come on, WV. Let's head north," she says weakly, her stomach feeling a little hollow. The carapacian takes her hand when it's offered, and they start walking along a dried out river bank, further into the desert.

What started as a single encounter with a crazy giant robot guy is rapidly turning into a nightmare. After Bec leaves there's an hour's pause in which Jade dares to hope they've finally managed to lose Clubs for good - only for him to tunnel up from beneath the desert in second giant robot shaped like a drill. After dispatching that robot with significantly more effort than the first one required and kicking the entire robot hard enough to send it and its troll commander blasting off into the distance, Jade resigns herself to another teleport, jumping her and WV back into Ciudad Juarez. They land in an alleyway, away from the main roads, and Jade leans over with her hands on her knees, closing her eyes against a tension headache knotting itself in her mind.

She's trying really hard not to think that things couldn't get any worse, for fear of jinxing herself, when WV collapses.
WV slumps against the wall, his pale eyes scrunched up with what could be exhaustion or pain or both; Jade is too stressed to tell. There’s a faint, sickly lime green glow pulsing along his arms, but it’s not the plasma lightning that usually crackles around him or Bec after a teleport – instead, Jade thinks she can see the outline of thin blood vessels through his carapace, which she is pretty sure is one of those things that is Not Good. At least she can still see him – she doesn’t know if she has the focus left to stabilize him again if he desynchronizes with reality.

Eventually she shakes her head. They’re going to have to walk again. The only way to really throw Clubs off their trail thus far has been to travel on foot, and even with Bec gone she gets the feeling that between her space powers and WV’s aura of distortion, the tiny troll will still be able to track them even if they stop teleporting altogether. They just give off too much natural distortion to turn it all off.

This totally sucks! Seriously, who is this guy, and why does he want to take her somewhere?! He throws missiles and giant robots around like they’re chump change and he’s disturbingly persistent, but he acts so innocuous and good-natured in person that Jade can’t imagine he’s actually the real villain in charge of these shenanigans. Someone is giving him orders, and she is really curious about who that could be. Whoever they are, she’s gonna owe them such an ass-whupping for all this hassle!

“Come on, WV,” she says, shoving her hair back with her hands and scrubbing at it, redoing the lazy pony tail that she tied the masses of hair into back in El Paso. She steps away from the wall and then pauses, looking back at WV.

He doesn’t stand up. Instead, wheezing, he squints up at her and shivers.

Uh oh. Jade squats down, hair sticking to her face as she presses the back of her hand to WV’s forehead. Generally, the carapacian is about the same temperature as Jade, if not a little cooler; now it feels as though she’s touching a hot water bottle, almost warm enough to burn. “Oh no,” she whimpers, grabbing a water bottle from her sylladex and twists off the cap to offer to the overheating carapacian.

Too late, she realizes what she’s just done. “Oh nooooooo,” she groans again, smacking her forehead. Using the sylladex dimensional pocket probably just sent out a huge wave of space distortion for Clubs Deuce and his men to track. Jade just uses these powers without thinking, and now it’s totally biting her in the ass every time they try to hide from him. “Come on, WV, drink a little water. Then we have to get moving again,” she says, coaxing the carapacian forward and keeping her ear tilted at the sky. Clubs seems to be favoring a helicopter at the moment, so she should at least be able to hear him coming.

Urgh. She just really doesn’t want to lead this guy to John! How rude would it be for her to meet her brother for the first time with some random midget troll villain harassing her?! Even when she’d knocked Clubs unconscious that one time, he showed up a half hour later as though nothing had happened!

WV reaches out and takes the water bottle with both hands, a little water trickling out the corners of his mouth as he gulps it as wildly as he would a can of soda. But even when he’s finished it off and lets the water bottle fall to the ground, he continues to wheeze heavily, green light literally burning beneath his carapace. When he goes to stand, his legs give out. Jade stumbles forward to catch him before he falls, patting at his head when he makes a noise of frustration. “Hey, don’t worry, I’ll get you out of here,” she promises, hoisting him up onto her back and then looking back at WV.
He needs an ice bath or something to lower this awful temperature, but they just don’t have the time or resources, and Jade doesn’t know what to do! Agh! Hitching her arms under WV’s shrimpy legs, she dashes down the alleyway and deeper into the city.

It’s only a matter of minutes before Clubs starts to catch up again. "Miss Witch," a by-now infuriatingly familiar voice calls from behind, still steadfastly calm and polite despite all the chasing and beatdowns that have ensued over the past several hours. "Please stop running! My boss is going to be very irritated if I'm late bringing you back to base!"

Jade picks up the pace, but she can still feel the too-familiar movements of Clubs Deuce as he scurries through the alleyways hot on their trail. Her spatial senses feel absolutely fried from being on high alert, and she feels every movement Clubs and his lackeys make run through her bones like tiny explosions. WV is burning a feverish streak along her shoulder, a tiny mumble of pain escaping his mouth. He's not sparking anymore, just smoking a little at his fingers, and Jade thinks that isn't a good sign. If something is up with WV on an atomic level because of all this teleporting around, it's her fault. She needs to get him into an ice bath or something to lower his temperature - can carapacian brains be damaged by fever? - but oh look, they're on the run in the middle of the night in Mexico.

Jade feels a little miserable as she ducks down a new alleyway, her head aching as she pauses to lean against the wall and adjust WV’s limp form in her arms. All the strength has gone out of his arms so he can't hold on to her neck anymore, so she hugs him around the waist and tucks his head over her shoulder. He's just light enough that she'll be able to carry him like this for a while, she thinks -

“Looks like you could use some MOTHERFUCKING ASSISTANCE, my little hero-sis.”

For a wild moment, feeling half crazy, Jade glances around.

The alley is empty.

Then she looks straight in front of her, and sees a troll peel himself out of the shadows.

He had not been standing there before. He can’t have been! She should have been able to sense him taking up space, at the very least, and the fact that she hadn't sets her on edge. "Who are you?" she demands, stepping away from him and clutching WV a little tighter.

His baggy clothes hang limply on a gaunt, long-limbed frame; he is taller than Jade by a good foot and a half, if not more, with another eleven inches of tightly wavering horns on top of that. For a moment she thinks his mouth is split up the sides in a ghoulish grin on a too-pale face – then she recognizes the face paint for what it is, a caked layer of greasy white that smudges and smears messily over the usual dark grey of troll skin. Perhaps at one time the paint formed a clownish mask, but it looks as though the pattern hasn’t been repainted in weeks, reducing the face to a pale, sickly blur. His claws are tucked into the pockets of low-slung, spotted pajama pants, but he has all the stillness of a stalking predator, and Jade gets the distinct feeling that with the length of his gangly limbs, she is still well within arm’s reach for the stranger. She fights the urge to instantly teleport away and get out of this guy’s range; she’d only give Clubs Deuce another wave of space distortion to track her down with.

But seriously, this guy is giving her the creeps!

“I know a little motherfuckin’ something that could WRECK THEIR SHIT if these MOTHERFUCKERS be botherin’ you,” the troll continues. There is something wrong with his voice, something that sets Jade’s teeth on edge and prickles at her spine. She can hear an extra grate, something deeper than the usual growl of a troll’s voice. It’s almost as though, when the troll isn’t raising his voice to a startling, reverberating thunder, there are two voices emerging from his throat, and one voice is just enough out of sync with the other to strike a note of brain-melting disharmony.

“I think we’ll be okay on our own,” she babbles, wincing as she stutters over the first few words. This is not the kind of guy she wants to expose weakness to, but the longer they stand here in the shadows, the more edgy and apprehensive she feels. She can barely keep her hands from trembling, and she hugs WV closer to reassure herself he’s still there. “We don’t want any more trouble, thanks. If this is your territory or something, I’m sorry if we intruded by accident!”

“Ain’t no thing, my hero-sis. Not a single thing,” the troll drawls, with what he must imagine is a reassuring grin. He shows far too many teeth for Jade’s comfort, the sharp incisors flashing beneath the muted purple gleam of his eyes. She doesn’t think she’s seen such a dark, almost bruised-black purple hemotype in any of the trolls she’s met in the past year or so of travelling the world, and it unnerves her. “I’m all for doin’ favors for a sister in the business of doin’ the hero thing.”

A trash can topples over by the corner of the alley, and Jade whirls to see Clubs Deuce hopping over the fallen metal can. "There you are!" he says cheerfully.

By now, the sound of his voice is enough to send another spike of horror through Jade, and she almost whispers. Forget everything she said earlier, the scary clown troll is nowhere near as terrifying as this guy. Clowntroll just has unfortunate taste in makeup. Clubs, on the other hand, is an abomination. He just. Won't. Stop. "Just leave us alone!" Jade yells, grinding a palm against her temple. WV's head lolls against her shoulder, and remembering the pitiful state the poor carapacian is in because of Clubs's incessant chase just fires her up more. "I don't want to go with you or fight you or anything anymore! Congratulations, you're awful! You're the single most awful person I've ever met and I don't want anything to do with you! You are so frustrating!"

Clubs pouts. "Why are you yelling at me?" he asks, sounding almost timid.

"Why won't you leave me alone?!!" Jade shrieks. She flings up her only free arm and shoves. Clubs goes flying backward with his mouth gaping, and crashes into the garbage can again. She lives in a brief moment of hope that this time, he'll take the hint and crawl away back to his 'base' without her.

Two seconds later, Clubs rolls up onto his feet, shaking himself vigorously and ignoring the brand new tear Jade's latest attack has torn through his much battered, dust-covered, shabby black suit. "That wasn’t very nice, you know," he admonishes.

Jade feels like she is going to lose. Her. Shit. Deep down in her torso, it feels like she's going to explode. "Stop it!"

Abruptly, the tall, gangly troll steps up in the corner of Jade's field of vision, and she flinches away from him too. How could she have forgotten he was there? "Ain't cool to be all distressin' a chill heroína, MOTHERFUCKER," he says, blinking languidly at Clubs Deuce. It's more clear than ever from this perspective that Clowntroll is almost four whole feet taller than Clubs, not counting his horns, and the contrast between the two is bizarre. "I think you should listen to the girl when she MOTHERFUCKING TELLS YOU TO STOP."

"Oh - oh dear? Who are you?" Clubs says worriedly, clasping his claws together. He takes a little step back, clearly intimidated by the sudden appearance of a purple-blooded juggalo, but Jade can see Clubs's handlers rounding the corner now. Any second now she and WV are going to be outnumbered, because she doesn't count Crazy Clown as being on her side.
She doesn't know what teleporting again will do to WV, but she doesn't think they have a choice. Sobbing a little, she bites her lip and tries to focus on some other empty space in the city. They don't have to go far, just away-

Fear lances through Jade like a cold spike in the base of her skull. It abates a moment later, fading in her mind like the stain of an old nightmare that she can't quite remember, but she falls to her knees anyway from the shock. She drops WV in her panic, and he curls up against the ground with his own little murmur of pain.

What the heck was that?!!

A wide, skinny claw pats Jade on the back, jolting her forward. She jerks out of reach, panting a little with the shuddering fear that keeps building up in the back of her mind, but the clown-faced troll doesn’t even seem to notice or care. She follows the direction of his gaze, and can only stare.

Clubs Deuce stands transfixed where Jade had thrown him. His eyes are wide and rolled back, the brown of his irises completely hidden so that only the yellowish sclera are visible. The rest of the men and women in black suits that just turned the corner in pursuit are similarly frozen, and one female troll begins to froth at the mouth and tremble, her eyes still rolled back as she shakes.

Jade looks back and forth between the trembling group of thugs and the purple-blooded troll. And she knows, with another frisson of terror that combs through her skull, that the clown caused this.

This is some kind of power, but she can't say with any certainty that it's a heroic one. This is...terrifying.

Clowntroll just tilts his head at the transfixed shorter troll and smiles with lazy eyes, the eyelids so low and hooded that the purple of his irises is barely visible. He rolls his head to look at her after a moment, his tangled mass of hair hanging over his eyes as he smiles bemusedly in her direction. “All clear, hermanita,” he says. His grin is a lot easier to bear now that he’s not baring his teeth like a strung-out maniac. “The SHORT LITTLE MOTHERFUCKER will be occupied for a spell. If you’re gonna run, you better DO IT NOW.”

It's terrifying, and Jade can still feel the excess fear in the air bleeding into her own brain, but no way is she going to question the help of some random whimsical clown hero-villain who could probably incapacitate her with a thought. If he wants to help her escape Clubs, then she is tooootally not looking a gift-troll in the mouth. "Uh. Oh, uh, thank you?" she manages weakly.

"Don't forget the SHORT MOTHERFUCKER," the troll replies, jerking his chin slightly at WV’s curled up form.

"Ah, noooo, I won't," Jade says. She's still feeling kind of woozy as she scoops her arms under WV and hauls him up into a fireman carry. "Thanks again!"

Another member of Clubs's gang begins to seize up. The clown just smiles and smiles and smiles. "Not a problem, hero-sis."

And yeah. They are so getting out of here. And they're doing this properly. "Bec!"

The wolf reappears without fanfare. She genuinely wonders if it ever really went to Arizona as she requested, or if it simply hung around just out of her spatial range, carrying out its eternal mission to guard her. Whatever. "We're getting out of here now, okay Bec? One last jump, right to some place cold." She touches WV's forehead, and while he's no longer smoking and burning like the sun, he's still too warm. Jumping again will probably restart the fever, but this time, with Bec's help coordinating, she should be able to aim for someplace with ice. "A freezer room in Texas somewhere, they have to have one of those in a restaurant somewhere. Can you pinpoint that, Bec?"

Bec huffs and then - freezes. Its head jerks to face Clowntroll, and Jade tenses in response. The troll isn't doing anything different now; he doesn't even look toward Bec, seemingly occupied with whatever he's unleashing on Clubs and his people. But by her side, Bec whines, and Jade doesn’t think she’s heard that kind of plaintive sound escape the wolf’s muzzle before. Bec doesn’t attack, and it doesn’t attempt another teleportation to whisk Jade and WV to safety, which would usually mean that the wolf didn’t consider the troll before them an immediate threat.

Now, Jade isn’t so sure. She has never once, in all her years, heard Becquerel sound afraid.

"Nos vemos," the clown says, apparently indifferent to Bec's whines of terror. He waves a slow hand at her, a farewell that would have been a lot less totally scary if his claws hadn't sharpened to a deadly edge she can clearly see outlined by the moonlight.

"Bec, let's go let's go let's go," she chants, until Bec rises up in the air and a bubble of green electricity envelopes her and WV -

And they are gone, gone, gone.

- They reappear in the freezer of a frozen yogurt shop, somewhere in Dallas. Jade spends the next few minutes calming WV and shoving him facefirst into a pile of ice to cool off the green fire on his head while he flails and squeaks in indignation.

She hooks an arm around Bec in greeting, and narrows her eyes as she watches WV roll around in the ice of his own accord.

"Yeah. Let's go visit John, boy. I'm sick of travelling and dawdling," she says, muttering against the wolf's neck.

In the darkness of the chilled freezer, a pair of green lights that might have been eyes gleam beneath Becquerel's eternal ruff of fur, and then darken again, though Jade does not see the strange transition. She has too much on her mind, and too little mental focus left to handle it all. She shoves Clubs Deuce aside for now - all she can do is try to put as much space between them and Clubs as possible, end of story. Nothing more or less. And the Clowntroll probably just happened to be passing by. Yeah. Totally. That was his territory she stepped on, and now that they've cross back into the US, she'll neeeever see him again, right?

The most she can decide is that their next stop will be Seattle, Washington.

After all these unnecessary shenanigans, Jade is quite ready to finally, at last, give John a piece of her mind!

- Prospyet, Kazakhstan

MP is tidying up the kitchen when the Midnight Crew arrives.

She is between names at the moment – though the man who lives above persists in calling her Ms Paint, it is an old name, a tired name. Sometimes she thinks even her initials feel ancient, old in the bones. They are the oldest and most sacred aspect of her identity, but is this not an era of change? If the White King himself can become a Grey Protector, a title so different as to be nigh unrecognizable, might she not also transform herself to suit this new world?

Sighing, MP shakes her head softly and begins to stack the dried dishes on the counter. She is a carapacian once of Prospit, and they require less food than the humans and trolls that populate this planet they have found themselves on. But the man who lives above was human long ago and far away, and he still needs an unnatural amount of nourishment before he is at full strength. The kettle on the stove-top whistles, and she adjusts the tea set she has laid out on the counter before removing the kettle from the stove. After completing those finale preparations and wiping off her hands on a pink towel, MP adjusts the ring that hangs on a thin chain around her neck so that it lies flat and begins to retie her apron.

There is still a bowl of scotty dogs on the counter closest to the front door. They do not sadden her; they remind her of her love! How could that make her sad? Spades is far from home and roaming, and no doubt putting himself in simply idiotic amounts of danger, but she has faith he will return. And he shall have scotty dogs when he returns. So many scotty dogs.

If he doesn’t, of course, she’ll drag him back kicking and screaming if need be. She has lost more than enough dear friends to last a thousand lifetimes, and she will not let the one dearest to her spin off into the ether. She has seen the pale sheen of madness still tracing its way through Spades’s thoughts, the way a subtle poison might thread itself through a man’s veins before slowly inundating his heart. It has always been his way, to balance madness and greatness in kind. In one world, he built a civilization from the apocalyptic wilderness of a broken planet; in another, he laid waste to an entire portion of paradox space in a cancerous act of insanity. This incarnation holds the same worlds-spanning significance, balanced on the edge of a knife, whether he remembers it all or not.

MP likes to think she remembers more than most, more even than the Queens in their dance or the abomination plotting away in his new seat of power in the Americas. After all, the Queens only remember their endless games, and the faithless Doctor knows only what he needs to know to bring forth a new iteration of Skaia’s demise. For a being whose sole goal in life is to birth the Angel of Double-Death, that knowledge must seem like omnipotence.

He is wrong, of course. But there’s no need for anyone to enlighten him of that fact. The deeper the shadows in the good Doc Scratch’s memory run, the more MP will have to work with when the time is right. So much slips beneath the radar when you narrow your focus so assiduously and serve a creature that wants nothing more than immediate destruction, without end. MP learned from a far different mistress, and she knows the value of casting her nets wide. The Doctor can rush along to complete his fixed points in time, to fulfill his paradoxical inevitabilities and his elaborate schemes. All he has to do to win this game is check off all the correct boxes on his checklist.

MP, meanwhile, will work the rest of the system. If Doc Scratch thinks there is only one path to the finale, he is in for a rude awakening.

There is a knock on the door, and that means MP’s time for reminiscence is at an end. The man who lives above has been expecting these visitors for quite some time! Humming cheerfully, she tucks a cook spoon into her apron pocket and wears her best hostess smile as she trots to the door to open it.

MP: Welcome. How may I help you, ma’am?

A tall, lanky woman in a truly dashing black suit flinches back, startled at the door’s abrupt opening. Her hand is still half raised in a fist, in preparation to knock again, but she is in a fighting stance almost instantly. A man in a suit only a foot behind the woman lets a gun specibus drop into his palm where he thinks MP won’t see it, his eyes wary. They are not alone of course, but the three thuggish brutes that trail behind them, lurking in the shadows where the setting sun does not quite reach, are of minimal importance.
Both the woman in front and the man with the gun are battle-ready, but only the woman wears the diamond. MP never knew the old iteration of Diamonds Droog, but her aura of paradox significance envelops the well-dressed woman like a thick haze of roses and lightning. Diamonds has played both for and against the Doctor’s whims in the past, though generally in a minor role.

No, the one Diamonds has always owed the most consistent loyalty to is Spades Slick. And it appears she has come hunting for him at last. It certainly took her long enough! MP bows her head slightly and motions Diamonds Droog forward with a tiny wave of her claws.

MP: Come in, come in! The tea will oversteep soon! Come in, Ace of Diamonds!

The woman does not move forward, her darkly kinked curls bouncing slightly as she shakes her head. “You’ve been expecting me. How…interesting,” Diamonds says, her gaze sharp and piercing as she scans the kitchen. No doubt she’s looking for signs of a trap or an ambush. Such paranoia!

I mean really, as though MP would leave her weapons lying out in the open like an uncouth layabout! She’s even tidied up all of Spades’s spare knives and tucked them away in the back room for the sake of this visit. It doesn’t do to give a bad first impression to such a significant guest, after all! Ducking her head shyly, MP hurries back over to the tea set and begins to pour a single cup of powerfully spiced tea.

MP: Oh, yes, of course! The man who lives above has been rambling about it for weeks!

MP: He’s not as sharp as he once was, of course, but he can’t really help it.

MP: You’ve come looking for Spades though, haven’t you?

MP lifts her head from the tea set against her will, and blinks, a little put out to find the thin tip of a cue stick pressing upward against the underside of her chin. Diamonds remains at a safe distance, the cue stick fully extended so that the woman has only had to take a few steps into the building to threaten MP. She holds the weapon with practiced ease, and with the faint aura of barely restrained, brutal violence.

Oh yes, Diamonds is brutal. No matter how finely she dresses or how elegantly she styles her hair, MP has no doubt that Diamonds remains the single most ruthless, impulsively violent member of the Midnight Crew. Perhaps Hearts Boxcar could outdo her in pure strength, and Clubs in terms of sheer dumb luck, but Diamonds Droog could demolish either of them in a one on one fight. In another life, she served under Spades because she recognized the mad power to warp creation that lay within him, but MP would lay down money that in a duel the two would be evenly matched.

However, not once in a thousand thousand iterations has Diamonds fought MP.

This element of novelty makes the whole thing so much more interesting!

“I know he was here as late as this past month,” Diamonds whispers, the over-sharpened end of the cue stick pressing just enough into MP’s throat to draw out a trickle of blood. “Tell me, was he here for you? How…quaint.”

MP swallows hard. This is a delicate moment, and she does not want to lean too heavily upon a Diamonds who follows the Doctor and his Felt.

MP: Oh, Spades came here to lie low! I am simply a Medical Practitioner who cares for the man who lives above! He has been expecting your visit for quite some time.

The cue stick traces the line where a jugular artery would lie beneath the skin of a human or a troll.
MP, being carapacian, has no such analogous artery – the vulnerable points of a carapacian lie mainly within the torso and the skull itself, with blood vessels elsewhere shielded beneath the thick carapace of the joints and limbs. Their design is much less complex than that of player species, designed for simplicity of cloning and regeneration.

Diamonds does not need to know that, however.

“Then I don’t suppose this man will mind me paying that visit at last, hmm?” Diamonds purrs, eyeing the stairwell.

MP: Oh no, he wouldn’t.

MP: I would.

Diamonds pauses. As her attention had gone to the stairs that lead up to the darkened second floor of the home, the cue stick had lowered slightly, but when her dark eyes flicker back to MP they are just as bright and intent as ever. “You mind?” she says, one eyebrow rising up. “And he defers to your medical expertise, I suppose?”

MP: No, he doesn’t. He is a horribly stubborn man.

MP: But I will be leaving this place soon, and I refuse to let him invite yet more chaos into this house in my absence.

MP: Better you and I occupy ourselves here while I launch him into orbit.

Diamonds mouth opens, then shuts. “What,” she says at last.

MP smiles prettily, her head tilting to the side.

MP: Oh, I began the launch sequence shortly before you arrived!

MP: He has plenty of rations to keep him secure in geostationary orbit until the time is right.

MP: I even gave him a 640-crayon pack and some coloring books. He won’t even notice he’s left the upper atmosphere! Such a silly man!

“You’re insane,” Diamonds says, faint horror on her face. “This house isn’t large enough to conceal a functional rocket ship.”

As though paradox space itself wishes to prove the Crew member wrong, the entire house begins to rumble.

MP: The house is the rocket ship.

MP: I am a carapacian, my dear. Interstellar design is our forte!

Diamonds slaps a hand across her face. “You’ve got to be kidding me.”

The main thrusters activate. They are located on either side of the outer walls, of course, disguised as barrels of rain water, and the kitchen is shielded against the combustive reaction. Diamonds doesn’t know that though, and between one second and the next she has retracted the cue stick and darted out of the building, her shouted orders barely audible over the roar of the auxiliary engine.

MP simply braces herself with her back against the counter top, holding a handkerchief to her mouth to filter out the dust. She waves with one hand at the second floor of the house as it vanishes into the evening sky.

Diamonds needn’t have worried, MP thinks, bemused as she brushes kicked up dust and debris off her apron. The kitchen remains mostly intact, though it is now open to the sky. MP had hoped to placate Diamonds with a nice, light tea, perhaps with some scones afterward, but it appears she underestimated the blowback from the house’s main engines. Everything is now covered in a thick layer of dirt. It would take weeks to get the place clean again, if MP intended to stick around. Alas. She yanks open the drawer nearest her and adds a spatula and a whisk to the pouch of her apron, then hikes up her skirt and exits the hollow shell of the building.

Diamonds is tracking the fading arc of the house-rocket’s trajectory with a keen eye. Her entourage puff themselves up as MP approaches, and the three lower-ranked lackeys step forward as though they could actually stop her. A glower pinches at the corners of Diamonds’s eyes as she lowers her gaze. “That was…inconvenient of you,” she says idly. “I can only assume this mysterious man who is now in orbit would have been able to tell me everything I ever wanted to know about Spades Slick’s whereabouts.”

MP: Oh, assuredly. He’s a bit dense, but he could have told you quite a lot!

MP: However, he’s a bit beyond your reach now.

MP: Sorry about the scare, but now we can talk like civilized people, without worrying that the poor man will rain down bizarre, nonsensically metaphysical experiences upon our head at any given moment.

MP: So tell me, what are your intentions toward my Spades?

“Nothing personal. And nothing I’m at liberty to discuss.” Diamonds picks a fleck of charred plant matter off her shoulder, grimacing. “I really did not need this today.”

MP: My apologies. I really did intend to serve tea to help soften the blow, but I’m afraid that’s quite impossible now.

MP: As you are unwilling to discuss what you mean to do with Spades, and I am unwilling to speak of him to you at all, I suppose there is only one option left to us.

MP: A calm and polite parting of ways.

“Oh no. I’m afraid you’ll be coming with us now,” Diamonds says, cracking her neck slightly as she appraises MP. The man with the gun he thinks is so well concealed imitates his boss’s posture slightly. He is the second-highest rank Crew member here, and it shows; he is far more in tune with Diamonds than the other three, who are mere blunt tools intended to enforce her orders. MP will have to watch him closely. “If nothing else, I suspect you’ll make a most useful lure for my target. Would he come running if he knew we had you? I think...yes.”

MP: I do not see why you would think such a thing. Spades has not been here in many months.

"And you still have a bowl of scotty dogs waiting for him," Diamonds laughs, gesturing at the now dust-smeared bowl of black licorice candy that sits on the counter back in the kitchen. "Oh, you expect him to return to you. It's obvious. I came here looking for a landlord, perhaps, or some other vague connection to a carapacian who has managed to evade me at every turn. But you - you're his lady love, aren't you? Kidnapping you is going to be both useful and a pleasure!"

Well, it had been worth a shot. No one can say MP hadn’t given them a chance to cut their losses and run. Time to get Diamonds onto the correct line of conversation. The less they speak about Spades, really, the better for everyone here.

MP: Does he tell you much, your Doc Scratch?

All three minions flinch bodily. One of the trolls absently makes the sign of the Sixteen against his chest, and MP wonders if he even knows what the symbol means. Surely no follower of the Angel would knowingly make use of the symbol of his greatest enemies. Most likely these three are too low in the Crew to know the true nature of the beasts they serve; they know to fear the Doctor, to obey orders, and little else.

MP is, in fact, counting on that. Because she knows Diamonds Droog's old archetype – a vicious, brutish fighter in the guise of a dapper gentlewoman, a compulsive kidnapper with expensive taste, and above all else, a survivor.

A survivor who would, no doubt, object to any plan that involved the end of the world.

MP: Did he ever tell you his endgame? Why he has you chasing ghosts? Why he would want Spades under his control with no explanation?

“I’m not paid to ask questions,” Diamonds says. But MP catches the resentment that flickers in the woman’s face, the barely contained, cold anger of an old grievance. Diamonds has two modes of rage – the flashfires that result in sudden, impulsive violence, and the slow burn that she ignores until it overwhelms her. This is the barest edge of an old, old grudge. “I’m just paid to kidnap people,” she adds, a slow afterthought. The pause between the two sentences is palpable, though MP doubts the other four Crew members would know to listen for it.

All she needs is the right spark, and that slow burn won’t be contained by the cold façade anymore.

But MP can’t be the one to ignite this firestorm. Not here. Not yet. All she can do is begin to set up the groundwork.

MP: Perhaps you should ask more questions, Ace of Diamonds.

MP: For example, who told you about the scotty dogs?

“What are you talking about?” Diamonds snaps. “The candy was sitting right in plain sight -”

MP: Who told you the scotty dogs were for Spades? How did you know they were his favorite?

MP: No one told you, did they.

MP: You just knew.

She knows she has it right when Diamonds comes at her swinging. It was a gamble - MP has had little opportunity to communicate with Spades since he left, and perhaps his love of candy was in fact common knowledge among those who seek to capture him. But Diamonds almost howls as she whips the cue stick around at MP's face, a broken sound MP knows too well.

Remembering hurts, after all. And none of them are quite ready to remember.

And as cathartic as taking out her rage on MP would most likely be for Diamonds, MP has no intention of letting a child's temper tantrum harm her. Spades would be so irate! MP waits until the cue stick is a hair's breadth from her face, and then she sets herself into motion.

The spatula catches the tip of the cue stick between its slits, and MP twists her arm smoothly, her other arm jabbing out with the wooden spoon as she spins inside the woman's reach. She whacks Diamonds in the eye, hard enough to bruise, and the woman jerks back instinctively, one hand clapping against the injured eye. This is enough of an opening for MP to finish yanking her spatula to the side; the cue stick goes flying, and Diamonds lets out a noise of pure outrage.

A strong hand grabs MP roughly by the collar, lifting her off the ground, and Diamonds flings the carapacean back bodily into the kitchen, a good fifteen feet back. She is physically stronger, MP thinks, tumbling along the dusty floor, and it is a good thing MP chose to disarm rather than attempt to outfight the woman. Hefting the spoon, MP staggers to her feet, slowly enough that the three thugs have time to surround her. This is their mistake; when MP straightens, she does so by leaning on the counter by the stove top and hefting the half-full kettle of hot tea water. She grunts as she brings the kettle sweeping up into the chin of the nearest troll. He drops like a stone.

Trading out her spatula for the whisk, MP catches the second man’s knife slash between the thin wires. It is almost the same trick she used to disarm Diamonds herself, but these aren’t exactly the brightest specimens of criminals, and MP is able to batter the man repeatedly about the head with the whisk after he drops the knife. She finishes him off with a flailing whack of the wooden spoon that breaks the poor kitchen implement in two with a resounding crack.

The last thug looks properly unnerved by the time she rounds on him. Good! As well he should be! It is quite rude to attack a lady in her own home and expect to get off scot-free! MP carefully considers her options, and then kicks him in the exposed male human reproductive organs.

He drops with a shriek to his knees, and MP shakes her head sadly before hauling back with the kettle in both hands to hit him in the temple.

The man with the gun, Diamonds's assistant, still thinks he is being quite sneaky by creeping up on MP from behind. She just lets the momentum of the swinging kettle carry her in a wild circle, until she smashes into him on the back swing. She is very off balance by the time she is finished, and it takes a few hopping steps and every inch of courtly grace she has accumulated over the years to salvage the landing.

Diamonds is the only one left standing of the Crew, and unfortunately by the time MP is finished with the rest, the woman has retrieved her weapon of choice. Some of the blind rage has left Diamonds by now, replaced by the clear glint of wariness and faint respect as Diamonds paces in a slow semi-circle. No, she won't fall for that disarming trick again, not someone as intelligent as Diamonds Droog.

This is no good. In a one on one strife, MP is rather certain Diamonds will have the upper hand. MP can defend herself adequately, but she is no good in a prolonged battle.

Perhaps what she does next is not very sporting. On the other hand, she is quite certain Spades would approve of such deliberately underhanded tactics. He’s charmingly quirky that way. MP calmly opens the drawer she is now standing next to and removes two small canisters. The timing on this would be a bit tricky if she didn't already know that Diamonds is still one wrong word away from another flare up.

MP: Doc Scratch is going to kill you. And you know it.

"Who are you?" Diamonds murmurs.

MP: I am a Memory Provocateur, at the moment. But I am rethinking my title.

MP: Also, I am very sorry, Ace of Diamonds. I could answer every question you have ever had.
She pauses deliberately, and sees the light of obsession burn in Diamonds's expression.

MP: But I will not.

"God dammit!" Diamonds yells. She raises the cue stick, just in time for MP to pop the lids off both of the salt canisters and start waving them wildly so that salt goes flying everywhere.

Including into Diamonds's eyes.

Before the woman can do more than scream and clutch at her eyes, MP sidesteps her rushing charge and brings up the spatula one last time. MP is short enough that her swing just barely reaches Diamonds's neck, but that's enough. The woman gags at the unexpected smack, and squints through tears to glower at MP.

MP: Goodnight, Diamonds.

Since it has been so very effective in the past few minutes, MP elects to put the kettle to use once more. She doubts Diamonds would feel very genial about future interactions if MP were to damage her face, so she aims for the back of the woman's skull.

Diamonds, naturally, does not reply. She lands face down on the kitchen floor, and does not stir.

They always underestimate the kitchenkind. Foolish of them. It is not even MP's preferred specibus, and she has hardly even broken a sweat. She is a classy Prospitian dame, but that does not mean she cannot defend herself quite thoroughly, thank you very much!

The work done, MP slides the spatula back into her pocket with a neat flip. She graces the broken spoon with a silent moment of mourning before tossing it into the trash can that still sits by the kitchen counter, and sets the kettle upon the stovetop where it rightfully belongs. Then she stoops over Diamonds, and draws forth a note from within her Prospitian wrappings. She reads through it one more time before riffling through the unconscious Crew member's coat and depositing the note in an inside pocket.

Yes, Diamonds will have to be part of the long game, for now. MP has more urgent matters to take care of. Once word reaches the Doctor of MP's presence, she won't have much spare time!

Of course, it wouldn't do to leave the five poor things lying out here unconscious on the hard ground for hours at a time. Humming to herself, MP removes some of the spare pillows she stockpiled beneath the sink for just such an occasion. She tucks one beneath the head of each Crew member, plumping up the pillows a bit, and then stands back to observe her handiwork. Not her best job at hospitality, perhaps, but she really must be off! Lifting her satchel from its hook by the empty frame of the front door, MP slings the bag over her shoulder and begins to hurry away.

Beneath the folds of her wrappings, a slim ring rests against her carapace, the tiny orbs of power that adorn the metal cold and dormant.

For now.

DD: < Boss.
DD: > I must apologize.
DD: < We have been unable to locate Spades Slick at the house in Kazakhstan.
DD: > In addition, I am displeased to report that we have encountered unanticipated resistance.
DS: Allow me a moment to review your findings, my dear Droog.
DD: < Sir, I have yet to send you any -
DD: > I -
DD: < Very well, sir.

Diamonds Droog sighs when there is no immediate response. Resignation weighs heavily on her the moment, and she finds herself in the grip of a most indecorous ennui as she rests the phone against the bridge of her nose.

Diamonds Droog is not happy.

Not.

Happy.

Her eyes sting and she just knows the whites must be shot through with blown capillaries, painting her eyes a dull red. Every time she thinks the last of the sting has past, some fresh grain of that blasted salt will find its way from a traitorous eyelash into her eye itself, and set off the burning pain once more. She considers herself far too urbane and debonair for these kind of shenanigans, and the last few days have been particularly wearying.

Cairo, naturally, had been as useless as the Doctor had predicted, much to her increasingly fatalistic displeasure. It soon became clear that the reports of a scarred carapacian referred to a tall female member of the species missing part of her hand, as opposed to a medium-sized, perpetually angry male with a scar down one eye. More than a few of her Egyptian contacts had received a thorough drubbing for bringing Diamonds halfway around the world with so little to show for it, and she had moved on to the next few places where an unusual carapacian had been sighted. Some of the reports had been quiet whispers from the Novaya Ukraine, but she has standing orders from the boss not to go near there. He seems quite certain Spades Slick wouldn't have gone there, and sadly Diamonds has no reason not to believe the Doctor. He likes to claim that he does not need to lie, but even if he did lie to her it's not as though she would be able to call him out on it. He's always five steps ahead of her

Thus far, the one called Spades Slick seems to be flying beneath the radar, even of Diamonds's network. Her best hat just got crumpled up by the force of a miniature house-rocket taking off into orbit, and she has recently had her derrière handed to her by a small, matronly, pink-clad carapacian using kitchenkind, of all things. Diamonds wants to believe that it was a fluke, that she had been simply put off her guard by the carapacian's timid, polite, and unbelievably classy demeanor. But she is neither stupid nor naïve. This Mysterious Prospitian knew exactly how to play Diamonds, and manipulated her into a frenzy with true finesse.

Perhaps, when it comes down to it, Diamonds is simply tired of these shenanigans. Not even properly angry or annoyed anymore. Just. Tired. She nudges the still unconscious body of one of the brutes she brought along to accompany her and just shakes her head in disdain when the man mumbles and rolls over in his sleep. The other two are awake but thoroughly confused, and Marlowe is standing at attention by Diamonds's shoulder, his calm, efficient demeanor set off kilter by the glorious rainbow of bruises swelling up around his right eye where the MP clocked him with a tea kettle.

Her phone chimes like a grandfather clock, and she thumbs open the boss's reply.

Ms Paint. Intriguing.

DD: > I beg your pardon, sir?
The perspicacious Prospitian you encountered. They must have been quite well shielded by Void to have evaded my sight for so long. Even now she is just out of my sight. I do not suppose she allowed you to come into contact with the man who lived above?

DD: < No sir. I was not even able to confirm there was another living being in the house at all. For all we know, it could have been Spades Slick himself, and he is now thoroughly out of reach.

Oh, no, Droog. Our mutual friend Spades Slick is in New York City at the moment.

Trembling a little, Diamonds sets the phone down on the counter. "Ma'am?" Marlowe inquires, but she has no words at the moment. She pats at her hair instead, tucking stray curls back into line and readjusting her replacement hat to cover a particularly belligerent section that will no longer lie flat. The ritual soothes her, but only a little, and she is still shaking as she takes up the phone once more.

DD: > You are telling me.
DD: < That I travelled halfway around the globe.
DD: < Tracking down a target whom you already knew the location of.
DD: > A location that just so happens to be within the reach of our domestic division.
Yes. I knew simply that within the week you would end up in Kazakhstan in the nominal pursuit of Spades; it seems your presence was intended to trigger this sequence of events. Now all I ask is that you pick up Stitch on your way back to base. I have a new assignment for you, one that I am sure you will be pleased to hear does not require you hunt down a carapacian with a knack for evading custody.
Try not to pressgang Stitch into service again, dear Droog, he's had a very long day completing a tricky task in Britain for me. Another bout of chloroform may well damage his clever mind for tailoring entirely, and then where would you be?

Diamonds Droog stares at the screen for a long moment. She holds out her hand to the side. "Marlowe. I require your gun."

"Yes ma'am," Marlowe says, removing his pistolkind specibus from its holster. None of this chipper, gung-ho attitude now; he sounds just as resigned as Diamonds used to feel as he offers it to her obediently.

Used to.

6/10, primarily for effort, Marlowe - you're starting to slip.

Because like a phoenix rising from the ashes, Diamonds Droog can feel something burning inside her chest. There is a disconnect between the rising blaze and her cool exterior, though. Feeling distant and peaceably calm, balanced between the two extremes, she takes the gun that Marlowe gave her and sets the phone very carefully on the ground, nudging it with the toe of her polished boot until it lies perfectly centered in the middle of a square tile.

Smiling dreamily, Diamonds levels the pistol at the ground and empties the clip into the phone. Between sharp cracks and jolts that barely rock her shoulders, the bullets lodge into the casing of the phone, and its innards explode outward with bursts of sparks and smoke.

It is perhaps the single most satisfying act of destruction she has engaged in all week. Glorious.

By the time she pivots on a heel and presents the emptied gun to Marlowe, the bemused grin has left her face. It looked vaguely inane, anyway. She has an image to maintain, after all; she can't go wandering around grinning like a trigger-happy imbecile while on the job.
She has no time for despair. She has no time to dwell on the cryptic words of an insane salt-throwing maniac who barely came up to her chest. She has a mission, and she will complete it, for the sake of her sterling reputation for quality work if nothing else.

By all the gods, no one else in this organization may have a scrap of dignity left, but she does. Really, at this point, she has little else.

"Marlowe?" she says idly, rebuttoning her suit jacket as she grinds a scotty dog into the ground by the crackling remains of the cell phone that has caused her such aggravation. "It appears we are off to New York."

Screw the orders to return to base. Spades Slick had better hope she finds him dead. What she's going to do to him will be much less painful that way.

She pauses mid-buttoning when something in one of her pockets crackles. Diamonds is always meticulous in how she packs her belongings, and she knows for a fact that there should be nothing in that pocket but the emergency lock picks, finger gun, and spare tie pin. "Wake these buffoons up," she snaps at Marlowe, using the hand that Marlowe can see to draw forth her extra disposable cell phone. He notices nothing, though she knows he will be recording everything he thinks he sees to exploit for his personal advantage later. But Diamonds has been playing the game far longer than he, and while Marlowe sees only Diamonds taking out her cell to finished reporting to the boss, Diamonds types with one hand while tucking the folded paper note into the palm of the other. It is really all about misdirection, sometimes.

DD: < My apologies, sir. The previous phone exploded under mysterious and unfortunate circumstances.
I am aware, Droog. You are not to go to New York, remember - return to me, first. I do realize how doomed missions frustrate you, and Spades will have been long gone by the time you reached the city. It will be much more rewarding for you to return here so that I may direct you elsewhere. I do promise that this next mission will be more fruitful for you. A reward for your loyal service in the face of such unreasonable requests.
DD: > …
DD: < I understand.

Meanwhile, Diamonds reads the note. It appears to have been written on a section of paper torn from a drawing pad, in soft pink ink that curves and whorls in remarkably classy handwriting.

Dear Diamonds,

He will know when you intend to betray him unless you take the proper precautions. When the time comes, the man who lives above says that only Void will be able to shield you. I wish you the best of luck, and I hope that you see reason soon! I know Spades misses your old group of dastardly chums, whether he admits it or not!

In life and in light, I remain,

MP

PS - There is a bowl of Swedish fish in the cupboard with the Tupperware containers! I hope they cheer you up a bit, dear!

I do not know what this note could possibly mean, Diamonds thinks very loudly. She strides to the cupboards and begins to pull them open on autopilot, crushing the note in one hand. This note is utter foolishness and could not possibly prove useful in the future, she insists mentally, and opens the door to a cupboard full of Swedish fish. I have a serious addiction that has nothing to do with this note, she finishes, setting the bowl at a jaunty angle in the crook of her arm as she straightens up. She pops four of the small candy fish into her mouth at once, along with the note, and swallows without pause. "It would appear this trip hasn't been a complete waste after all, Marlowe," she tells the man, granting him a fond smile when she sees he has finished kicking the remaining three hoodlums into consciousness. "Now, come along, you all."

The good Doc Scratch remains as impenetrable as ever, and Spades Slick can most certainly suck cue stick when Diamonds lays hands on him, but she finds herself a little more kindly disposed towards the MP.

After all, Diamonds does appreciate good advice and a sweet bowl of candy, no matter the source.

==> Be the Carapacian Paragons

Chapter Notes

This is the Intermission - look at all the shenanigans the carapacians are getting up to while the main five take a breather! Almost all of these chapters deal with events that happened before Rose’s grimdark breakdown. The BQ’s in particular happened several years ago relative to the main timeline, and the WQ’s a few months ago.

Fun times are had by all. Would I lie to you?

ARC III - INTERMISSION

==> Be the Battleworn Queller

Cairo, Egypt

They have danced before, the elegant turns and dips and falls of an old game, perhaps the oldest Game. But this latest waltz is one the Battleworn Queller finds unfamiliar. She has avoided her oldest partner, her primal sister, for years, abandoning her people to the care of the one monarch who would never turn them away. The Wistful King of her youth has given up both title and Initials, abandoning the White heraldry in favor of a new Grey mantel, and she cannot bring herself to give more than a token sneer at his transformation.

They have all been transformed by this past Game. She can deny this no longer.

But now, circumstances have conspired so that she must seek the one she has always opposed. Well, not always, perhaps, but for such an interminable eternity that she can remember little else. She discards her usual garb in favor of black wrappings, the hood of a Dersite carapacian shadowing her brow and shielding her from the painful brightness of the too-close yellow star burning in the blue sky. Talons folded delicately into twined sleeves, she follows her mirror twin through the streets of Cairo. With her hands meshed like this she is painfully aware of the empty space where her right ring and smallest talons should be, the ragged scar that still oozes blood on the bad nights sensitive under the still-sharp talons of her left hand.
It is an unnatural disfigurement for a Queen, well-suited to an unnatural game.

Discarding useless thoughts of vengeance, she observes the figure just visible through the crowd. The Woeful Qasida floats sedately through the throngs of human and trollkind, unnoted and unremarked, with her snow-pale face turned towards the sun. She is robed in white cotton and silver-blue braids of rope where she once wore silk and gold, but she is no less beautiful for it. The carapacians have kept their secrets well; humans and trolls alike might notice that the carapace in their midst is more than usually tall and slender for a carapacian, but they do not know her for a Queen.

But the BQ knows. It has been centuries since their parting, but she knows her counterpart still, though neither Queen wears her ring.

As though the thought of a ring alone is enough to draw her attention, the WQ turns in a swirl of fabric, dark eyes meeting BQ’s with that benevolent wistfulness that once gave her King his title. Once the Battleworn had thought her royal sister could not become anymore despicably kind and wise. She has been proven wrong time and again.

After all, has the White Queen not sought out her missing sister without rest for all these centuries? Who else but the most atrociously compassionate monarch in all of paradox space would make and keep such a commitment to her oldest enemy?

Her crownless head bends in a slight, reluctant nod, and then the Qasida slips through the crowd, angling toward a café on the corner of the street. BQ follows, darting from shadow to shadow with some relief. Pretending to walk the streets as a normal being was beginning to wear at her.

She surveys the bazaar while the Qasida occupies herself with a human merchant, combing the crowded streets with a practiced eye. Kings are creatures of brute force and bold leadership on the field of battle; Queens are of a more strategic, subtle ken, and the Battleworn knows how to read a crowd for potential threats. Some games are more brutal than others, and she has had unending lifetimes to learn how to detect an assassin or a spy in a crowd.

Satisfied that for the moment they are not being followed, despite the WQ’s flaunting attire, she steps to the table without hesitation (never show a fellow Queen uncertainty), folding up her legs with jointed clicks as she sits directly across from the WQ. To her distinct lack of amusement, she sees that the table is laid out with the age-old pattern of the Battlefield, the Archetypal Roles mocked by carved figurines laid out on the side of the checkered board. Perhaps the WQ takes some ironic amusement from this mockery; the BQ sees only pitiful human and troll attempts at comprehending a concept that neither race has yet advanced enough to understand. She shoves the tiny pieces aside; a few pawns clatter to the ground, but she does not stoop to retrieve them.

Carapacians understand all tongues, in all possible worlds, but they cannot truly speak. As the two converse, they speak in the faint click and sigh of vestigial throats, and the smooth hand motions of a sign language older than time, augmented by the telepathic hum of minds barely a note off from synchronization.

WQ: It has been too long, old friend.

BQ: What are a few centuries to ones such as us? You would have done better to remain with your subjects, cousin-queen.

WQ: I have abdicated that title.

BQ: Yet your Initials remain, when even your King has become a Protector.
WQ: All the same. Neither of us wears a ring anymore, cousin. The ancient Game no longer holds sway, but I think I will always be a WQ, though I may never be Queen again.

A cerulean-eyed troll kneels beside their table, and the Battleworn’s hand caresses the blade at her side before she realizes the troll is merely laying out a series of cups and bowls, the teapot clinking heavily as she sets it down and ducks her head before rising to go serve another customer. When she returns her attention to the WQ, the BQ must sniff to hide her displeasure at the knowing look the WQ gives her. There is no shame in being battle-ready, even after all these years of peace. Still, bone-deep instinct urges her to make up for the slight misstep with retaliation tenfold.

BQ: And while we two danced our years away from our people, they died in the Fires.

WQ: I was there. I know you were as well. We pulled as many as we could from the crematoria. Do not think to provoke me with a tragedy we both bear as our shame.

BQ closes her eyes and cannot repress a click of old despair. Her twisted hand clenches on the table, stretching the old scars.

WQ: This is a new world with new rules, and neither of us have a ring to wear. We did all we could.

BQ: Once I could have lain waste to entire worlds. I could have wiped those genocidal abominations from existence for what they did to my court. Now there are hundreds of genetic patterns that may never be cloned again.

WQ: They have begun work in Prospit-A on reconstructing the ectobiological sequences - BQ: We will cease speaking of this.

There is a silence. The Woeful Qasida parts her mouth delicately to sip from her cup of milky tea, the barest hint of her fangs visible in a jaw that, when fully parted, hinges far wider than either human or trollkind would find normal.

WQ: What brings you out into the sun, after all this time? Not memories of a failure we both wish to forget, I take it.

BQ: …

BQ: …

BQ: What do you remember of the Midnight Crew?

The cup shatters between the WQ’s talons. For a brief moment the Battleworn feels a jolt of sharp anticipation, old instinct stirred by the look of pure, incandescent fury and impotent pain that breaks across the WQ’s smooth face. It is like a brief glimpse of the Warrior Queen-that-was, before the great Shift that had swapped Queens from active combatants to the masterminds of entire armies.

Once, it had not been a King that would-be gods faced in the final battle, but Queens of unparalleled power. The Shift all those millions of years ago had left them with power surpassing that of their Kings, and yet no opportunity to use it on the Battlefield. They became trapped in the restricting pattern of double-cross and usurpation that became the normal method of taking out rival monarchs. The one aspect of the plebian interpretation of Chess that BQ can appreciate is how human and troll society retain the versatility and raw power of a true Queen.

If the Battleworn can induce the Qasida to once again take up that mindset of the ultimate champion, the gladiator, once more, it would be worth even the reappearance of the most repulsive repeat-offenders ever to ingrain their pattern of mob violence and betrayal into the fabric of paradox space.

WQ: I know what it once was. And I know well the patterns and rhythms of paradox space. What it would mean if they exist once again, in this time and place.

WQ: You would only bring them up if-

BQ: Yes.

WQ: I thought them dead. I thought their genetic sequence was wiped from the Dersite hard drive, and the hard drive subsequently shot and dropped into the fires of Mount Nyamuragira. ...Tell me you did not –

BQ: Do you take me for a fool?

BQ: They have killed me more than once. Their last betrayal merely ensured my unending censure. No, somehow they are no longer carapacian. They have incarnated as humans and trolls.

BQ: And they…have expanded.

She neglects to mention the one member of the Crew who remains, beyond all reason and logic, carapacian, one whose genetic coding had been so thoroughly scrubbed from the records that it nearly broke paradox space, the sight of whom had awoken such dark rage within her carapace that the BQ had nearly descended then and there to tear into him and –

And –

- and she despises the part of herself who still does not know how to handle Jack Noir.

Thankfully, she despises him more.

WQ: …Paradox space. It always does find a way, doesn’t it.

BQ: Indeed.

WQ: Why have I not heard word of this before now? I would have expected my Protector to send word if –

BQ: Kings are all behemoths, you know that. I’m sure your Grey lummox means well, compared to the hell mine would have unleashed were he in command, but – they’re just not the brightest.

BQ: And our subjects are spread out across Eurasia and Africa. The Crew have taken advantage of this limited dispersal. They have based themselves across the sea, in the Americas. What few carapacians live there are too few and far between to have come across them.

BQ: But I have.

WQ: You’ve been in America? Truly, I lost your trail, old friend.

Even in the midst of her nervous fury, the Qasida laughs softly, disarmingly, self-depreciatively. It makes the Battleworn’s carapace twitch all over with unconscionable pity. Bluhhh.

BQ: You did not want to leave the place where thousands of our subjects were slaughtered. You wanted to remember them.

BQ: I, on the other talon, had no wish to walk the forests of Germany again. America seemed as good a place to become truly lost as any. And while there, I found them. They work as boldly as you please. They are almost infamous within the Americas. But because they are so careful in their overseas activities, they never reach the international news that might have tipped us off.

WQ: This is troubling. Could you discern their aim?

WQ: They have always sought to dethrone you. You no longer sit a throne to be toppled from. They advise and sabotage players of the Game in equal measure. But there is no Game here, not a true one, at least.

BQ: They seem to have convinced American media that they are nothing more than a crime syndicate, with an unusually fanatic membership bordering on the…cultish.

WQ: The juggalo –

BQ: Appears to have no ties with them. But we have underestimated him before.

The WQ finally seems to notice the broken remains of the cup in her talons, the tea dripping onto the table. A rueful smile tugs at her thin lips, and she begins to pick up each shard one by one, placing them on the Battlefield. After a moment the compulsion overwhelms the BQ as well, and she begins to help, setting up the rank and file of the old order.

WQ: But you do believe that this organized crime façade is just that – a façade?

BQ: I am mistress of deception and sleight of hand. I survived even when the Ring itself was lopped from my hand. I know a cover-up when I see one. What’s more, I know why they have gathered in America.

WQ: Not just to avoid us? They know well that we would have stamped them out to prevent any...repeat performances.

The BQ laughs, and it is harsh and jagged and sharp like icy knives.

BQ: Oh, my sister.

BQ: We have waited all these years, and yet when they came, we were two continents and an ocean away.

That gets the Qasida's attention. BQ thought it might.

WQ: No.

BQ: Yes.

BQ: They have returned, my Qasida. They arrived years ago now, and ever since all records I can find point to the Midnight Crew coalescing in their general location wherever they run, harrying their guardians.

BQ: Our players have returned at last. And they need us now.

The WQ bows her head, her claws clenching against her stomach in tangled fists. The BQ knows the old wound that lies beneath the Qasida's robes, residual damage of the kind that mars her own right hand.

They were both of them marked by that fateful Game.
WQ: Then there is no need for further discussion. Will you walk with me, my sister? This time, if no other?

The Battleworn closes her eyes in reply, raising her broken claw to trace the old scar down her eye.

There. As the Qasida has drawn attention to her old wound, so the Battleworn has to her own. The WQ nods in reply. For them, such a simple gesture is more than enough of a reply.

The two queens rise together, the Battleworn reaching out automatically to clasp the wrist of her mirror. The Qasida returns the grip, dark eyes beady in the fading sunlight. The BQ thinks she can feel paradox space's tangled struggle, the way the world fractures and cracks as two old Queens dance out a truce that was never meant to be.

Well, paradox space can fuck itself with a cactuskind. The Battleworn is tired of pandering to the sick whims of this endless game.

They leave as one.

====> Be the Wary Quarry

Somewhere in Maine

The fleeing Quarry can feel the cold air streaming against her face as she leaps over a fallen tree in her path, and through her skin she can almost taste the heavy white smudge of the snow and the sharp prickle of pine. She is not as affected by the cold as those chasing her, but the thick banks of snow slow her pace to a mere fraction of its former speed. Her carapace is light and near hollow so that she can skim over the surface of the snow most of the time, but every so often she trips and finds herself up to her waist in snow, her heart pounding loudly in her thoracic cavity as she grimly works to extricate her legs.

She is grateful that she left her Protégé in a place of safety. If her vassal had attempted this run with her shorter legs, she would have been overtaken far too soon.

The Quarry, on the other hand, has almost reached her destination. She ducks deftly beneath a low branch, her hood flying out behind her and exposing her curved pate. She can hear the sounds of her pursuers fumbling their way through the underbrush. No human agent could have matched the carapacian’s speed for this long of a hunt in such terrain; they are all trolls, all clad in identical black suits, and none of them will give up until the Quarry is taken or they are killed.

Such is the fanaticism of this Midnight Crew. She mourns for the loss of the people they could have been if they had not been so thoroughly brainwashed, but she has come too far in this course to turn back now. She has almost reached the critical point.

A shot rings out wildly, the first in a long time; they have been too busy trying to match her pace and keep track of her white form against the snow to fire accurately for a few hours now. Now the gap between them has diminished enough that she is in true danger.

Once a mere bullet from such simple strife specibi would have meant nothing to the Quarry. Now, ringless and alone, she can be easily hurt. Easily crippled. Easily killed. But if she can only make it a little farther -

Pain explodes in her right calf, and there is a sharp crunch as the bullet shatters through the thin armor of her carapace to the flesh beneath. Crying out wordlessly the Quarry stumbles and drags herself upright with a hand on a nearby branch. When she tries to step forward and rest weight on her right leg the pain worsens, and she knows that she is finished. She hobbles forward a few more feet, then loses her balance when she runs out of branch and bramble to grab onto. She has reached the edge of a small clearing, she sees, and she lets out another whimper of pain as she draws her injured leg close, clasping it in her hands to try to stem the bright red blood oozing from the back of her calf. It does not seem that the bullet has punched all the way through – it had been fired from too far away - and she can feel the tiny slug imbedded in the muscle.

The Wounded Quarry can do nothing more than wait. She can flee no more. She draws an old, battered sword from her side and holds it before her.

Eventually the four trolls crash through the last of the underbrush, all of them with luminescent blue eyes ranging from cerulean to deep blue, the blood shades with the most physical stamina and speed on land. One barks out a nervous giggle, her eyes just slightly too close to outright purple for the Quarry’s comfort. She knew a troll once with eyes just a little darker, a dazed dreamer with a lazy grin, and the consequences of his actions reverberate through the fabric of paradox space to this day, consequences she does not yet fully understand. “Gotcha, little white grub,” the indigo says. “Sorry. No one escapes the Midnight Crew.”

The Quarry raises her chin, keeping her face clear of any emotion. The next few moments are key. If she is to have any hope of this plan succeeding, she must stall as long possible. She is sure she is in the right place, and that will help.

WQ: I am afraid that regardless, I shall not come quietly.

She drops to one knee deliberately and lashes out with the sword. Her leg gives a pang of protest, but all four Crew members jump back to avoid the wild swing.

WQ: It is simply not in my nature.

She can see what she has been looking for now, in the corner of her eye. One of the perks of having endured as many Games as she has is that the powers of the players become easier to perceive when you’ve spent so long observing and assisting them. The aura of Void that laces the building next to the lake is subtle, but in combination with the camouflaging mirrors that cover the exterior walls, the effect is enough that she doubts the Crew members have even noticed there are buildings not a hundred yards from where they stand.

And the woman who slinks out of the front door of the hidden building to observe the ruckus going on in her front yard is precisely the woman the Quarry wanted to see. She is not a player, of course, but she exerts enough self-control that no one else seems to notice her calm approach, or the way she manipulates Void to render herself unnoticeable.

Now, then, is the moment to throw the fight.

It is a calculated move. When the indigo blooded troll stamps down on the old blade, the WQ feigns weakness and pretends the force of the blow was enough to knock the sword from her hands. The sword vanishes into the heavy drift of snow, and one of the other blue eyed trolls snakes in with a strong arm to shove the Quarry all the rest of the way off balance. She tumbles obediently to one side, and raises an arm to catch the indigo's next blow before it can connect with her skull. She makes sure that her arm trembles beneath the blow, and cries out in surprise when the female troll twist the arm and drags WQ away from the outline of the sword in the snow.

"The boss man just wants you alive. He didn't say you had to be in one piece," the troll says, her claw latching onto WQ's wrist as she shoves a boot into the back of the carapacian's injured leg. It sends a new stab of pain through her and the Quarry stumbles, half-kneeling in the snow as the Crew member laughs and begins to twist the carapacian's arm in one direction while pushing her body in the other, straining the brittle joint where arm meets body.

And oh, for so fleeting a moment that it hardly counts, she craves her old ring. She craves the rush of power, and the reassuring knowledge that, with a wave of her hand, she could have squashed these mortal beings, these non-players, like the lowliest of underlings. Not that she would actually use said power - she is simply unused to living without that buffering reassurance.

It is a bitterness that is new to her, and she quashes it; she is better than that. She did not lure these fanatics to this clearing simply to crush them with an ability she would never willingly use.

No, she brought them here so that this plan might succeed. And, judging by the new pair of legs she can see standing behind the indigo troll in a confident stance, succeed it has.

"And why the hell are you smiling, you fucking beetle?" the indigo demands. She yanks on WQ's arm with her palm still shoving into the Quarry's shoulder, increasing the pressure on the joint until WQ has doubled over, her face pressed against the snow to relieve the stretch.

For a more prideful Queen, such an action would have been unconscionable. But WQ laughs, snow kissing her lips, as she smiles up at the Crew member and signs as well as she can with one claw free.

WQ: Why, you ask?

WQ: I smile because Rue Lalonde stands behind you, you damned fool.

A heel slams into the back of the indigoblood's head, and the pressure on WQ's body relieves with most welcome alacrity. She rolls forward, away from the indigo troll, and folds her legs neatly in the snow, tightening her hold on the bullet wound in her calf so that she can watch the ensuing decimation of the Crews forces without losing yet more blood.

The troll catches herself and claws at the human female who has snuck behind the group, only to receive another foot to the face. Rue Lalonde strikes with incredible speed and regains her composure just as quickly, her hair swirling as she turns to keep all four assailants in her line of sight. Bundled in a heavy white coat, she simpers at the snarl the indigo troll lets loose, her arms folded across her chest as she raises an eyebrow at the four trolls. "So sorry, loves," she says, inspecting the pinkish-purple fingernails of one hand. "This is private property."

"And who the fuck are you?!!" the indigo howls. The Quarry can only hope Rue Lalonde is as strong as she should be, because the edge of madness is in the troll's voice; of all the bluebloods here, she is the one most likely to break into dementia mid-battle.

"None of your business, quite honestly." Rue Lalonde rubs her thumb over the tips of her nails, and, seemingly satisfied, curls both hands into fists. "And if you don't know, you're not high enough in the ranks to really concern me. Just a gang of punks harassing someone on my property."

"You don't want to mess with the Midnight Crew," one of the other trolls says, switching out the pistol in his hand for a whip specibus. "If you know what's good for you, you'll back right off, lady."

Rue's eyes go flat and hard, and she cracks her knuckles. "I think you will find I am disinclined to listen to anything a member of the Midnight Crew has to say."

When the indigo leaps, choosing to fight hand to hand rather than take out her pistolkind, the doctor is ready. She steps to the side and seizes the troll's wrist, flipping the assailant expertly over her hip so that the indigoblood's momentum slams her into the palest blueblood, the one trying to sneak up behind Rue. As they crash together into the snow, the indigo snarling with outrage, Doctor Lalonde raises her hand to intercept the crack of a whip, waiting until it laces around her palm with a pained, furious grimace before yanking it toward her. When the whip-wielding troll stumbles forward, caught off balance, she socks him in the chin. He is dazed but not knocked out, and the fourth Crew member grabs the doctor from behind, hooking his arms under her armpits to pull her away. Rue smoothly kicks out and cracks the whipkind troll with the toe of her foot before she is out of range, and this seems to finish the job, as he slumps down in a daze.

"That's enough of that," the troll with the grip on Rue growls, dragging her back. Beyond them, the pale blue and the indigoblood have untangled themselves and risen up from the ground. WQ jerks forward, in an aborted move to assist the doctor, but Rue Lalonde lowers her head and then headbutts the troll viciously with the back of her skull so that he releases her with a cry. The human slams her elbow back into his face and then seizes him by the horns. He shouts in pain, startled by the obviously underhanded tactic, and completely fails to raise his guard as the doctor drags him down by the sensitive appendages so she can knee him three times in the face.

When she turns to face the last two, she yawns. "Clearly not very high up in the ranks, are you," she notes, smirking. "I'm only human, and this is pathetic."

The indigo lunges once more, all subtlety and skill she might have totally lost in her frenzy. WQ is by now almost offended that the Crew sent such raw fighters to chase her down, but then again, this is playing out exactly as she'd hoped it would. If heaven forbid the good Doc had sent a legitimate member of his upper ranks, like the Felt or the suit members, neither she nor Rue would have been able to take them in a fight. Almost lazily, Rue kicks the indigo in the bulge once she's in range, and the troll shrieks in pain. She doesn't double over in pain, too far gone into the dementia to notice what would usually be a rather debilitating pain, but she is once again enraged to the point that she punches at the doctor's face without finesse.

The punch scrapes the doctor's cheek, and WQ hears something creak dangerously - perhaps the human's cheekbone - but Rue Lalonde remains cool and collected, simply lifting her elbow and bracing herself as the indigoblood runs right into it, choking herself out. The troll gasps and begins to wheeze as she falls to her knees. WQ can make out the slight dent in her trachea. Disdain painted across her face, Rue plants her heel in the snow and drives the other foot into the troll's chin once more. Teeth crack and fall from the troll's mouth as she falls back, unconscious but still wheezing.

The pale blueblood blinks, looks around him at the unconscious bodies of his comrades - and turns to run. He makes it about ten feet before Rue tugs a slim pistolkind from within her coat and closes an eye to fire. It catches him in the calf, and he falls. The doctor strides over to him and swings the butt of the pistol against his temple.

There is a deliberate irony to the placement of that shot that WQ quite appreciates. She thinks she and this Lalonde will get along quite well.

She is a no-nonsense close quarters strifer, with brutal strength in her fistkind. But she has little staying power; by the time the last of the trolls drops, Doctor Lalonde is panting, a thin sheen of sweat on her face as she inspects her fingers. WQ can see that the skin has broken on all of her knuckles, though she had the skill and control not to have broken the bones outright, and she twists her lips as she gives a sardonic sigh, delicately reaching into her coat pocket to draw forth a phone. WQ remains kneeling, waiting for the opportune moment to make her overture. It would not do to accidentally antagonize this woman - the less of a threat she thinks the Quarry, the less likely it is she will question the WQ's ulterior motives for drawing the Crew to this place.
"All clear. Bring out the stretchers, there's a dear," the doctor says, a hint of an old British accent in her satisfied tone. She closes the phone and raises an eyebrow at the Quarry-no-more. "And who do we have here?"

WQ draws herself upright, her elegant stance ruined by the way she must sag to take the weight off her injured leg. She draws her hands together and clasps them, one set of claws folded over the other as she bows. This is a woman worthy of respect; anyone capable of raising one of the Four under the circumstances of this new game deserves recognition.

WQ: Merely a Wondering Querent, seeking your wisdom, Doctor Lalonde.

The mention of the woman's name must ping some defensive trigger in the doctor; she raises her chin slightly, her knuckles white as she slides the phone into her pocket. Freeing her hands for another potential confrontation, no doubt. It is wise of her, though of course in the state she is in WQ is hardly a threat. "I'm sorry; I don't believe we've been introduced," she says coldly, her lips drawn tight.

WQ: You do not know me. However, news of your research reached me through a mutual friend in the Foundation, and I knew that if nothing else, I might be able to provide insight into certain aspects of your work.

The Querent sees the exact moment the doctor relaxes, the tension leaving her fists as she brushes her hair from her face, considering the WQ with a much more intrigued expression. "Really? And how did you end up with a pack of these ruffians trailing you here, my dear?"

WQ sighs, and stares at the unconscious bodies in the snow ruefully.

WQ: It would appear that my inquiries into your research triggered...alarms. I realized I was being followed when I entered this country, and their pursuit became outright blatant when I passed into Maine. Are these common tactics for American thugs, then?

Better she not let Doctor Lalonde realize just how deep her knowledge of the Midnight Crew runs. The longer WQ can preserve the cover of an inoffensive Querent, the fewer questions she will need to answer. And it is best, for the moment, if she keeps her rather extensive insight well hidden. None of the players have properly risen, yet, and telling them the truth before the opportune moment would only trigger old traumas in their minds. From what little she observed of the Seer in New York before coming here, there are already many troubling paradox echoes at work. No need to complicate things before the time is right.

"Yes, they do enjoy badgering others," the doctor muses. Eight people emerge from the shielded laboratory complex behind her, with four stretchers between them. "I do apologize; allow me to make up for this rude harassment. I'm afraid I do not know exactly what of my research may interest you most, and I may not be able to share much without breaking a few of my rather stringent security protocols, but the least I can offer you is medical treatment for that leg, and some of my time to discuss our...mutual friend."

WQ: Of course. I would appreciate that greatly. There is one favor I must ask of you, though - I had to leave my young Protégé in New Hampshire when it became clear these thugs intended violence, for her own safety. May I send word to her that she may come here? I fear that she may be similarly pestered by this Crew when they realize they have failed to capture me.

The doctor hesitates, and then nods, putting out a hand that WQ gratefully accepts. "We have a secured phone line and Internet connection. You can send word to her either way."
WQ: Thank you. Thank you very much, Doctor Lalonde.

That settled, the doctor nods firmly and slings WQ's arm over her shoulders. "Take these punks up down to the neuroscience department," Doctor Lalonde instructs the eight scientists who scurry over. One of them fumbles his end of the stretcher and nearly falls on his face, but she ignores it with a perfectly professional straight face. "I know Kelly has been working on something that should get rid of the past few hours for them, so they at least won't remember chasing our guest here. But tell Carlos to run those MRIs first. I gave the indigo a good thumping before she went down, I'm afraid."

WQ leans perhaps more heavily on the doctor's arm than she needs to as they begin to cross the snowy stretch between them and Lalonde Laboratories, and celebrates her triumph only internally. Tonight, it seems she will have good news to report to her counterpart. She has successfully located the guardian of the Seer of Light, and when the time comes, the Wondering Querent will be exactly where she needs to be to help usher this new game along. One of the guardians will now be once again on the alert about the Midnight Crew after years of complacency, and will hopefully warn the others so that they may begin to prepare the other children.

This is not the kind of Game she is familiar with, but she knows her role. When they come seeking answers, she will be ready.

It will be good to see her dear Dreamers again.

The Nightfall and the Light

Chapter Summary

And lo, between the sundawn and the sun,
His day's work and his night's work are undone;
And lo, between the nightfall and the light,
He is not, and none knoweth of such an one.

Chapter Notes

PM's section starts before the grimdark and runs to the present, while AR is totally current. Someone was wondering what's going on in the Novaya Ukraine, and everyone's favorite Armed Ranger is currently running around in the middle of it all, so we get to see what's going on there right now! Also, two people in this chapter speak Ukrainian. As it happens, I don't know Ukrainian, only Russian which is really not the same thing. Hover for a (hopefully accurate) translation.

And with the background provided by these carapacian chapters, hopefully some of the events in the main plot will become a little clearer. Or just more confusing. Either way. :D

===> Be the Protégé Mediator

Years ago

The old Parcel Mistress probably chooses the wrong profession when she decides to join the Shatranj. She has always, first and foremost, been a Messenger, genetically designed to deliver packages and convey letters. But spying is just as much the art of obtaining and transmitting information as it is one of stealth and cunning, and somehow she makes it work.

It helps that the Prospitian concept of spying is extremely different from that of Derse and Earth. Where a dark carapacian might use their shadowy complexion to sneak in the shadows and listen in on vital conversations, or an Earth human would disguise themselves to break into a building to download military secrets, Prospitian agents tend to wander around until they happen upon something that seems rather interesting, and proceed to ask the nearest person upfront about the subject. There is a distinct lack of subtlety or secrecy involved, which lulls people into a sense of security. PM, as it would happen, is quite good at expressing natural curiosity and earnest sincerity, and at one point managed to sit down with a significant world leader after delivering him a memo and patiently wait while the man poured out his entire life's story over a cup of tea.

She didn't learn anything really significant, admittedly, but the potential was there! Her supervisor had nodded vigorously all through her lengthy report, awarded her a merit badge, and sent her on her way, adding the impromptu autobiography to the records for future reference. One never knows what could become significant, after all. Perhaps the rambling details of one man's foray into stock market manipulation and secret space programs will one day be vital to decoding some unknown message! And then PM could deliver that message!

It is all so very exciting.

Still, PM works part time as a mail carrier, for old times' sake. The old ways of parcel delivery don't work quite as well in this strange new world with its federal post control and mailboxes that do not connect to a network of mail-delivering tubes scattered around the planet. There is no guarantee that a passing stranger will continue the delivery if a letter goes astray, in obedience with the will of paradox space; why, once PM witnessed an entire parcel fall off the back of a car, and the very next vehicle crushed it beneath its wheels! She had nearly had a panic attack over such horrifying disregard for the sanctity of the MAIL.

It is all very strange. But PM adapts. She loves the mail too much not to appreciate a new method of delivery. For example, this 'car' device is very intriguing - unlike the vehicles of the Battlefield, hardly any of them are battle-ready at all, and they traverse the landscape in set routes, rather than journeying straight to where the most urgent message needs to be delivered.

So, when she is assigned to wander the streets of Britain for word of anything that might prove of interest to the Reginae Absentes, she uses a job as a mailwoman to make an excuse for her rounds. It gives her a reason to wear her treasured cap as part of her nominal disguise, and also allows her to experiment with this new skill she has acquired called 'driving.'

And make no mistake; she drives like a complete maniac.

They call her the Psycho Mailcarrier, and she bears this new title with pride. Titles and Initials are harder for humans and trolls than for carapacians, but they really do make an effort for her! She makes a turn at about 140 kilometers an hour as she barrels through the town, whistling a little. Several police have informed her about something called a 'speed limit,' but PM has for the most part taken this limit as a sort of gentle recommendation, because how can anyone expect her to stay below 50 kilometers an hour when THERE IS A PACKAGE LABELED URGENT SITTING BESIDE HER?! It is IMPERATIVE that she deliver this package now, before any other letter may even be considered for delivery!

Old habits die hard.

Snarling, PM cuts across a street corner, narrowly avoids a troll on a bicycle, and makes the executive decision to drive through the dog park. This won't have been the first time she's made such a decision, and most likely will not be the last. She presses the accelerator to the floor and rumbles through the pre-existing hole that she punched through the chain-link fence nearly a week ago. Zigzagging between crowds of unruly barkbeasts, she launches the car slightly off a slight incline in the field and neatly through the exit hole. She slams the brakes to swerve to a skidding stop before the red brick cottage on the far side of the dog park. Throwing the gear into park, she seizes the package, stands up on her seat (she never wears that ridiculous seat belt thing) and flips out of the car, landing in a crouch on the sidewalk. She sprints the rest of the way up to the door and jabs a single claw on the doorbell button, glancing around warily for any interlopers who might dare try to steal such an URGENT and HIGH PRIORITY parcel.

Thankfully, before any such hooligans can tempt the wrath of the true Parcel Mistress buried deep within PM's soul, the door opens to reveal a tiny old lady in a red checked dress, who nonetheless must peer down to see the even shorter carapacian while adjusting thick glasses. "Hello, dearie?"

PM: Madam Josie.
PM: I bring U R G E N T tidings from your sister-in-law.

"Oh, why thank you, dearie!" Josie Anderson puts out a pair of wizened arms and PM gently deposits the package in the grasp of its rightful recipient. "These must be the new knitting patterns she promised me! How kind of you to deliver them to me in person, after she already had you running around last week with the fabric samplers!

Yet another glorious, glorious victory for the tireless forces of the MAIL.

PM: It is no trouble, ma'am. It is a matter of duty.

PM: Tell me, have you heard anything of significance recently?

Madam Josie chortles, shaking her head. "Oh, you and your spy games. Well, let's see - Maryanne and John from down the street are finally engaged!"

PM: It is about time.

"Isn't it just? Oh, and Ms Keelin by the other side of the park just adopted her third wriggler, but I hear tell that the lusii aren't getting along quite well at all. She's trying to keep it all very hushed up until she can see if she can keep him with the lusus so distraught, the poor thing. Try to keep that one quiet, dearie?"

PM: Of course, Madam. I shall be the soul of discretion on this matter.

The madam nods sagely, and then presses a hand to her lips, tilting her head to peek at something just over PM's shoulder. "Oh, but enough of my gossiping - I didn't realize you had a guest, my dear!"

PM looks up from where she has been taking extensive notes in her stilted writing on a tiny notepad, blinking in confusion. She brushes part of her greyed wrappings from her face, frowning.

PM: I'm sorry? A guest?

"The one sitting in the passenger's side, of course!"

As there was no one in the passenger's side when PM executed her flawless roll five minutes earlier, there is only one logical explanation.

Someone is trying to steal her mail.

Unacceptable.

PM: Pardon me, Madam Josie. I must go.

She is, of course, most subtle as she pretends to meander back to the car with her head down, eyeing the slim figure seated in her car with a glare while her head is tilted down as though to read over her notes. The pernicious snoop has its hands folded in its lap, and PM cannot see any evidence that the interloper has been tearing into packages or otherwise violating the sacred privacy of the mail, but there's no telling what this intruder has been able to hide in the precious minutes PM spent engaging Madam Josie for the latest gossip!

She has no real strife specibus equipped - a grave oversight, clearly - so the best she can do is to lift her mail satchel above her head as she very surreptitiously sneaks up on the intruder. In reality, she is quite exposed in the middle of Madam Josie's front garden, holding an overstuffed satchel in the air where anyone could see her, but it's the thought that counts, right?

The person in the passenger seat turns toward her just as PM is prepared to bring the satchel crashing down on their head. Her face is not one PM could ever forget.

WQ: Ah, my old Parcel Mistress. It has been too long.

PM sags, exclaiming wordlessly in surprise, and accidentally overbalances. The weight of the satchel tips her backward, and she falls flat on her back. The satchel itself somehow lands on her face, and for a moment of scrambling and flailing, all she can see and smell is mail, which is - not an unwelcome state of affairs, really. Then she yanks the bag off her face and stares in awe at the royal personage who has taken up residence in her own passenger seat. PM gets to her knees hurriedly, making to bow to the White Queen who sits cross-legged and benevolent in the throne of the car seat.

PM: My lady! My Queen! It is an honor to see you again!

WQ: Not a Queen, not any longer, my dear. Call me a Querent, if you will.

PM fumbles, blushing, torn between genuflecting further and scrambling to pile some of the letters she dropped in her panic back into the satchel. The Queen - no, the Querent, she must respect her Querent's wishes! - unfolds from the car to assist her, calmly stacking letters and handing them to PM with an elegant hand. This only causes PM to panic more, really; she can't believe, after all these centuries of absence, that the old White Queen herself has appeared in PM's car in an unassuming human town! She feels a momentary pang of guilt at the grey of her wrappings, and for the fact that she is nowhere near presentable enough to be standing in the presence of royalty. But the Querent is, oddly enough, in neutral wrappings of her own, rather than the brilliant golds and blues PM can still faintly remember, as though witnessed in a dream.

PM: My Querent, then! How may I assist you?

The WQ straightens, all five foot six of carapacian nobility and grace, and she motions for PM to stand up as well. PM can only stare, taking in all of the smooth details of a queenly face she barely remembers, but could never truly forget. All Prospitians would know this face.

WQ: You have assisted me above and beyond the call of duty, and exceeded my expectations once before, in a far different game.

WQ: Tell me - how much of it do you remember?

PM must remove her hat to fiddle with it, running claws down the battered seams and along the black brim. It is an old memento, repaired many times over the years, and she strongly suspects it held significance to her in the last iteration, too. Her stomach twists a little, but she cannot lie to her old sovereign.

PM: …Not much, my Querent.

PM: Enough to know that I was present and incarnate in paradox space! And I do recall that we have spoken before. But the details are...difficult for me. There are others who recall the last round much more clearly than I.

WQ: I see. It is to be expected. Though there are those who remember far more than they should, in general most remember only that there was a previous round, and think no more of it.

The Querent's slender claws come to a halt, then, and she closes her eyes in a sigh. For the first time, PM is able to overcome her awe to see the faint cracks at the corners of the WQ's dark eyes, and the way she braces one hip on the side of the car, as though to support herself in a moment of weakness. And in that moment, PM knows a dark foreboding that curdles in her belly, and she scans both of the Querent's claws with her eyes.

In theory, she was aware - everyone was aware - that the sovereigns had given up their rings and scepters. But to see the old Queen herself, ringless and weary, is almost frightening. Worse still, it pings at her memories, and she shakes the sensation away. She has a strong feeling she does not want to remember all of the previous session. Some carapacians dedicate themselves to contemplation and attempt to draw as much as they can about their past lives back into their conscious memory. Not so with PM - what few flashes of significance and recognition she does experience on a regular basis are more than enough to sustain her.

WQ: I would not, of course, seek to tear you from a job that you enjoy. However, though you may not recall it, you have a remarkable capacity for agency in the game we all play, an agency that I would like to see more of.

WQ: Tell me, PM - are you willing to assist me in seeking out the players once more?

She crushes the hat between her claws, and releases it just as quickly, scrambling to smooth out the kinks and ensure that the shape of the traditional Postal Millinery remains unchanged. Inwardly, all of that foreboding and a new burst of exhilaration mingle in a slurry that takes her more than a moment to decipher. After all, what carapacian would not want to meet the players of the game? They are heroes, nobles, even gods, whose coming is foretold even before the game begins!

Perhaps her apprehension and long pause come from the vague knowledge, within her soul, that this is not a true game. If it were, the carapacians would not have landed on this planet, so far outside the Medium; they would be on Prospit and Derse, where they belong, preparing for battle. No, she may not remember the previous session, but she knows something went horribly wrong.

And if she admits it to herself, she fears what she might find if they do locate the players. As much as she hopes it might be different, that they might have beaten the odds, she knows on a fundamental level that an unnatural game can result in...unnatural players.

Looking upon the form of her old Queen, PM realizes the choice has already been made for her. She cannot, in good conscience, allow her Querent to go seeking the players alone, not in this diminished state. For the sake of the sovereigns, PM has a duty not just as a member of the Shatranj, but as a carapacian, to assist the Querent in this duty.

PM: I am for you, my Querent.

WQ: Ah, you are? I see. Then I should like to deputize you further, my dear Parcel Mistress.

WQ: How would you like to become my own Protégé?

Yesterday

Nothing has gone right, these past few days, and PM can't help but wonder if it is her fault.

After all, she volunteered to deliver that note to the Seer, which no one has yet explained but somehow managed to trigger exactly what PM has always feared - an anomaly in the female player called Rose. Players in the game are always unique, and not just because they are the direct product of paradoxes at their finest. They are capable of feats both great and terrible, and while PM can't remember much, she can clearly sense in the explosion of grimdark that follows that this was something significant, so significant that paradox space couldn't help reenacting it. PM knows even less about this player than she would others because the Seer is meant to be of Derse, but she can see that the darkness runs far too deep within this Light player.

When she next catches up with the Seer, the situation remains as confused as ever. PM is ecstatic when not one but three heroes flood into the back of the van, their raw power thrumming through her carapace as she wrenches around to see the Heir and the Knight have arrived as well. Even the Seer's corrupted power has settled, and in that fleeting time they spend escaping the city, the Motorist luxuriates in the presence of three players. She has little knowledge of the previous session, but the Querent has assured her that all four reached god tier before the end. PM would have been able to guess that much from the sheer influence these three exert on their surroundings. When they huddle together, the Heir with a protective arm wrapped around both Seer and Knight, they seem almost whole.

And then the Heir leaves. PM bites her lip as he exits the vehicle at the airport, but she shrieks inwardly in protest at this abrupt, unconscionable turn of events. They are not meant to be apart. They will not heal properly if they separate like this! But she cannot drag the Heir back into the car; she can only watch, despairing, as he vanishes into the flying device and into the sky. Everything about that is wrong - what kind of Breath player would choose confinement over the open air? Another anomaly, then, one more subtle than the Seer's connection to the Horroterrorrs, but no less debilitating. It is wrong, wrong, wrong, but all she can do is put the van in drive and trundle off, dispirited with this abrupt realization. The Querent had told her, if at all possible, to stay with the players on the way back to the Laboratories where the two carapacians have taken refuge. PM had not given the order much thought, believing as she has that the three heroes would not be willing to part once they were together, but now she can see why the WQ thought the order necessary.

No, she thinks, as she leaves Rose Lalonde to her electronic communications in the computer lab. No, they are not whole yet. It's not just that the fourth hero seems to be missing altogether, lost somewhere in this huge world so that not even the Querent and her secretive contacts have been able to pin down her location. These are indeed broken players. PM was right to join the Querent in her quest; the WQ seems to believe that she will be able to advise the Seer, at least, and fill her in on some of the key facts of this abnormal session, but PM thinks it far more likely that something will go wrong again. She may wear a cheerful front for her old Queen, but in the meantime she will keep her swordkind close and the Seer closer still.

She is a spy of the Shatranj, and her Queen's safety is too important to risk in these kinds of circumstances. It tastes like blasphemy, but PM will be ready to fight if the Seer goes mad once more.

For now, though, Rose Lalonde seems...calm. This could be misleading of course - it is harder for PM to read the emotions of humans and trolls than that of carapacians - but PM feels secure enough to leave the Seer to her own devices and report in to the WQ.

She finds the Querent in one of the labs deep in the heart of Lalonde Laboratories, where Rue Lalonde has allowed them to set up a makeshift camp. The WQ is insistent that they conceal their true intentions from the doctor until the correct moment arises, though she is unable to specify when that moment may be. Instead, they are posing as a fledgling carapacian scientist and her Protégé. Rue Lalonde offered them the use of the lab after WQ began to cautiously reveal her more in depth knowledge of certain aspects of paradox space relevant to the doctor's interests. PM has learned to read suspicion in human and troll faces over the years, so that she knows when to back off and when to press for more information, and she can see that Rue Lalonde realizes she's being played. But WQ and the doctor seem content in their face off, neither one willing to admit that they are both fully aware that WQ and PM are here under false pretenses.

If PM were in charge, she'd just want to have everyone be honest with each other. All of this dancing and sidling around each other, with blank smiles and hidden intrigue, seems stupid and counterproductive. But this is politics, and she never did have a head for them. As long as Rue Lalonde isn't cutting them out or preventing them from watching over the Seer, PM is willing to play along.

When PM runs in, panting from having had to cross from one of the outer buildings to the center of the complex, WQ is working on their most recent project. It is a strange device, not one PM is familiar with. The control center is similar in design to the computer equipment she vaguely remembers from the ectobiological labs of her youth, back in Prospit-A, but over the past week the Querent has begun to build new additions for the structure, using her delicate hands to weld metal and string together the inner wiring and circuitry.

She tells Rue Lalonde they are building a paradox analyzer, a way to crunch raw data about spatial and temporal anomalies to find patterns that repeat on a quantum level.

When she and PM are alone, they call it a Queen's Hub.

What began as a simple computer station has evolved into a sprawling network of computer screens and thick cables covering the entire far wall of the lab, and now WQ is busily tinkering with yet another tiny gadget, a memory drive that hums and glows a faint blue as PM watches. WQ twists the screwdriver a fraction to the right.

It then explodes.

WQ drops the sparking drive and, when it bursts into outright flames, stamps on it with her foot in an attempt to put out the flames. PM seizes the fire extinguisher from behind the front door to the lab and yanks the pin. When she pulls on the handle, the force of the foam being expelled sends her flying back, and she rolls along a counter several times before she can release the handle and come to a stop. At least, she thinks dizzily, the fire is out.

WQ: Oh dear. Are you quite alright, Protégé?

PM: The whole room is circles.

WQ: I see. My apologies. It appears that I have once again missed some key component in this contraption.

PM sits upright and clutches her head until the walls stop spinning and her eyes can focus on one spot again. She lets the expended fire extinguisher roll up against the wall and jumps off the counter, staggering a little as she joins the Querent by the wall of monitors.

PM: I am sure you will get it right eventually, Querent. Look at how much you've completed in just a few weeks!

The WQ sighs, sliding down into at a stool to survey the mess of computers she is using to create some Queenly device.

WQ: If only our own devices had not been damaged in the crash. I became so complacent, so assured in the knowledge that each new session would bring a new Hub, I have forgotten the more minute details of each piece. And the technology of this world has not yet caught up all the way; we may be able to make do with the adjustments I make, but it will lack the clarity of vision I hoped to achieve.

PM: As long as it works, it will be fine!

The Querent shakes her head a little and then smiles, tired. Her carapace clicks and creaks as she rises, and each sound sends a little stab of worry through PM. A Queen’s power and longevity are fueled by the ring. Though the Querent is as beautiful and regal as ever, how long is a carapacian noble’s lifespan without the assistance of the ring? PM just doesn’t know, and that lack of knowing frightens her. This is the price she pays for being the Querent’s Protégé all these years - she must endure this terrifying sensation of not-knowing on a regular basis, and she sometimes pines for the days when the worst she had to worry about was someone stealing the mail.

WQ: You are right, PM. It only has to work. It need not be perfect. I have questions of my own about that last session, and I will have answers.

PM: There is one thing though, Querent. The Seer is awake!

WQ inclines her head, a faint smile on her face.

WQ: This is welcome news indeed.

PM: Yes! She does not seem to be possessed still, and she seems very much aware. But I fear the Knight may be leaving soon.

It is another blow that adds to PM's private misgivings about these heroes. Heir is of Prospit, and perhaps that might have been the reason he was able to pry himself away from the other players in their time of need. It is a poor excuse, but it would explain the anomalies. But the news that the Knight and his guardian intend to return to this village called Houston is all the more troubling because the Knight and the Seer are more closely related.

They've been drawn together already once. Why in Skaia's name are they falling apart?!

WQ: I see.

She deliberates on this for some time, and PM waits patiently, taking a broom from within the supply closet and using it to clean the charred memory drive off the floor. It was a blank drive anyway, meant for recording new information, and it is not the first WQ has accidentally destroyed in her quest to recreate the components of the Queen’s Hub. For now, PM waits, secure in the knowledge that her Querent is sifting through all of the facts and coming up with their next best step.

WQ: It would be inadvisable for us to leave the Knight alone. My contact in Houston has been keeping an eye upon his progress and encouraging him, but I know for a fact that she means to open up a more...violent front in her confrontation with the Crew.

PM: What?!! Why would she do that? The players are barely awake!

WQ: Because it is her way. She prefers outright conflict to this course of passive guidance I have asked her to institute. I am more surprised that she went along with this plan for as long as she has - I expected her to make a move long before now. Soon she will begin to manipulate the Knight, to push him. It is her way.

WQ straightens and clenches a claw, drawing forth something from the pockets of her borrowed, too-long lab coat.
WQ: You must go with them, PM. When my contact's patience runs thin and she provokes war, it is you who must continue to guard the Knight.

She opens her claw, and PM inhales sharply. The Querent holds forth a ring. Not the ring, PM has been assured, but an innocuous double that the WQ uses to conceal her favored swordkind when passing through the security of the human world. The science behind it is complex, and far beyond a Parcel Mistress's pay grade, but with the correct gesture one can summon forth a pale sword in place of the ring.

And there is only one reason the WQ would offer such a priceless artifact to her Protégé.

PM: You mean for me to go alone.

WQ: I must remain here. The Seer will begin to look for answers first - it is her duty to obtain all the information necessary to prophesy the most fortunate course of action the heroes may take. I will guide her as best I can.

WQ: You have studied as my Protégé in more ways than one these many years. I have faith that you will be able to assist the Knight when his current mentor fails him.

It is an unspeakable honor, to be so trusted by the Querent. PM bites her lip, fighting back tears, because she cannot accept this honor. She can't.

PM: I must refuse, my Querent.

PM: I cannot leave you here, not alone, not with the Seer so unstable.

WQ: You can and you must, PM. You underestimate the Seer, I think.

She does not. The Querent did not witness the explosion of grimdark that PM did; she heard about the events in New York only by proxy. She doesn't understand how very easily Rose Lalonde gave in to the Abyss, and PM doesn't know how to make the Querent understand.

And she cannot disobey such a direct order. Closing her eyes, PM bows her head and cups her claws to receive the new sword.

PM: I will not fail you, Querent.

She sneaks aboard the jet when it lands on the private runway out back, mostly by wandering up to the cargo hold and walking up the ramp when no one is looking. Once inside, the hum of the jet's engines drown out all else. PM fights the urge to sneak right back out and return to the security of the WQ's side, and forces herself to locate a nice spot to bunker down for the flight to Houston. She tucks herself between a few of the large crates that have rolled to the back of the hold, brushes a hand against the ring she has strung around her neck, beneath the wrappings, and settles down to wait for the plane to finish refueling.

There is a brief moment of turmoil when the jet takes off, and PM goes flying, narrowly missing out on being crushed by a huge crate, but once they are properly in the air the ride is much smoother. A little more battered, PM sits down again and begins to eat some of the meal she brought along with her in the center of the dark hold. She has the light of her flashlight and little else, and already she longs to return to the Querent's lab.

It isn't until an hour later that she realizes she is being watched.
The sensation starts slowly, but grows more pointed until PM can no longer fight the urge to glance around the darkness of the hold, one hand rising up to grip the ring more firmly.

She doesn't ask if someone is there. She isn't stupid. Instead, she pretends to slowly rotate, as though stretching her legs, and scans the darkness with her tiny flashlight by pure coincidence.

A pair of bright blue eyes flash at her, and PM jumps back, squawking in a most undignified manner as she fixes the flashlight on the creature sitting atop the crate beside her. She catches only a glimpse of a frightful, murderous leer before the thing vanishes in a blur. She blinks hard, more than once, but the thing she saw remains stubbornly gone.

PM does not rest easy until they land with a painful jolt in Houston, but even when she kicks open the cargo hold compartment door and uses the light from outside to look around, she can find no sign of that horrifying face. She is alone in the hold, with nothing but the crates for company.

Uneasy, she climbs out of the cargo hold and drops to the ground, scampering toward the nearest building.

She can't help but feel that she dodged a bullet. A creepy, leering, puppet-themed bullet.

- WQ would probably wish the Protégé to follow the Knight back to his home and make the proper overtures of friendship to him.

But PM is taking a little...initiative. WQ frequently encourages her to take initiative, so PM believes she would approve of this alternate course of action, regardless. Eyes narrowed with concentration, she makes her way through the Houston downtown area, whiling away the time until the sun begins to rise and the air heats up. People begin to swarm the streets in their cars and on foot, and PM settles back, waiting for the opportune moment.

After all, if she is to defend the Knight from the Midnight Crew, she might as well use some of her skills as a Shatranj agent to figure out exactly where the Crew have decided to base themselves. Thus far, her interaction with the criminal group has not extended beyond a brief, heart-pounding encounter in Vermont, before she and WQ split up to enact their plan to gain entrance to Lalonde Laboratories, and the scraps of information she and the Querent have picked up through their contacts over the years. They have always been focused more on locating the players than being overly concerned about the Crew - at least, PM has - and she intends to remedy that today.

Finding the Midnight Crew is easy. A member of the Shatranj becomes used to picking up on the little details and spying unusual people in the crowd, and PM is no exception. Perhaps an unsuspecting human would look upon the bustling morning crowd in the center of downtown Houston and see a mass of workers and office drones suited up to go to work. PM sees the ones who break the pattern. Her eyes scan the crowd from beneath her wrappings, and she pauses momentarily every time she comes across a suit that is too black for the summer heat. She counts three members of the Midnight Crew at this intersection alone, and she shivers. WQ's mysterious contact had said that the Crew had infested Houston; PM is left wondering just how the Knight and his guardian have remained free for so long when they flaunt themselves before such a heavy concentration of the Midnight Crew.

Or perhaps this high number of Crew members is a new development. PM simply has no way of knowing. All she can do is proceed to stage 2 of her mission.

She chooses a short, green-eyed troll in a shabby suit as her target. The other two Crew members seem to be loitering around the crosswalk, their eyes scanning the road and the skyline shiftily, while this troll hurriedly crosses the street with a hand in his pocket, clearly on his way to some other destination. It will be much easier for PM to go undetected if she and her target are in motion, as opposed to her standing around waiting to be noticed by one of the loitering Crew thugs. This decided, she tugs her wrappings further down to obscure her carapace - no need to tip anyone off that a rare carapacian is wandering the streets of Houston - and proceeds to follow the troll around for the rest of the day. It's really not difficult, and she is certain she gets more than a few odd looks by the end of the day as she follows the Crew member into cafes and shady back alleys. Whenever the troll enters some unorthodox establishment, PM patiently waits outside and glares at anyone who looks at her oddly, before resuming the hunt when the troll emerges.

One would think the troll would become suspicious after a while, but PM must be getting much better at this sneaky thing! When the troll rushes off one final time into a relatively abandoned part of town, PM pulls back a little, ducking behind street corners as the troll becomes more and more careful about checking behind him for followers. Finally, he stops outside an old, decrepit movie theater, and knocks on a boarded up section of a door.

PM, who stopped to purchase some delicious Korean barbeque at a bus vendor a half hour earlier (one can't trail a criminal fiend all day without nourishment, after all!), squats down behind a rusty garbage can and continues to shovel delicious barbeque into her mouth as she narrows her eyes at the troll. After a brief pause, the greenblood lifts up the lower half of the boards and enters the building. There is no sign that anyone let him in, so PM waits a good five minutes before sprinting after him, throwing away her trash as she goes. She skids to a stop before the old theater and prods at the wooden boards experimentally. Glancing this way and that, she lifts them up, cautious. There is barely a creak as the boards lift, a sign that they are used regularly, and so with one last look around, PM peers into the room beyond. It is dusty and dark, barely lit by the evening sun, and she can't see anyone within.

She's not too worried about losing the trail, though. From this low vantage point, she can see the hundreds of footprints in the dust on the tile floor. Even if the place was frequented by the homeless or teenage vagrants on a regular basis, she highly doubts they would all have been wearing the kind of standard, heavy boots the Crew seems to prefer as part of their uniform. Oh yes, this is a major hub of Crew activity, or PM will eat her hat.

(That is a lie. She would never eat her hat. Never.)

She creeps inside, pulling up her wrappings to cover her mouth as well while she rolls dramatically across the floor to duck behind an overturned, spider-webbed square table. Dust motes hang in the air, kicked up by her shenanigans, and she tiptoes toward the entryway to the back of the theater. She can only wonder why the troll had felt the need to knock earlier; there's no sign of a guard or a doorkeeper as she glances around the ticket-taking podium. Shrugging, she steps out into the hall, looking around for any lights beneath the doors of the defunct movie theater rooms.

"Gotcha!"

Her knee jolts with pain as something slams into her from behind. It all happens quite quickly after that. PM shouts wordlessly and whips the swordkind ring from off her neck - only for a claw to wrap around her wrist and crush it, hard enough to make her carapace creak and threaten to crack. Gasping in pain, she feels her claws open against her will and the ring drops to the ground before she can activate the swordkind. She snarls and lunges at the green-eyed troll, the one who has seized her wrist.

A second blow rains down and just barely scrapes by her skull, slamming into her shoulder instead.
It drives her to her knees, and within moments two bodies pile on top of her, yanking her wrist from the troll's grip. Beneath their weight, she can't breathe for a horrifying moment, until the two - a troll and a human, both female - pull her upright, the female troll's curvy horn angled outward so far that it nearly presses up against the side of PM's head. They pin her arms quite effectively behind her back, and despite how PM stamps at their feet and yanks on her arms, the most she can do is strain her own shoulders.

This can't be happening.

"Lemme see her face."

PM kicks someone behind her in the kneecap, and they grunt with pain, but her head wrappings are pulled back all the same as she squirms and bares her teeth at the man who crouches down before her.

If being captured wasn't the first sign that something had gone horribly wrong, PM knows that she has made a mistake when she sees that the man before her is not wearing a midnight black suit. He has a sharp chin and a square jaw, a felt green suit and a rusty maroon hat, and is basically in every way the exact opposite of what a member of the Midnight Crew should look like.

PM's heart plummets further when he accepts the sword-ring from the green eyed troll and tucks it into the front pocket of his lime suit. Not only has she been captured, she has lost the Querent's treasured swordkind!

"Not one of Snow's," he says, tapping at his chin. "But definitely carapacian, ey? How did you wander into a shady place like this, chickadee?"

PM: I - I will tell you nothing!

But with her arms restrained as they are, PM is fairly certain nothing more than a vague shout will have translated into the man's mind. He raises both eyebrows, then lowers them into a bored stare.

"Bah. I don't got time for this right now. The boss man is callin' in a tick, and I need to not miss that kinda call."

"What should we do with her then, Crowbar?" the greenblood asks, bouncing on his heels. "She's been stalking me all day, as though I wouldn't notice a beetle of all things following me on my rounds."

Another blow. PM flinches, lowering her head. It is beginning to occur to her that perhaps a Prospitian's idea of spying does not work well in practice when the party being spied upon follows other rules.

She may, in fact, be in quite a lot of trouble.

"Put her in with the other canary." Crowbar snorts at some in-joke, and a few of the Crew members chuckle along. "We can get 'er talkin' when I'm finished up with the bossman. Until then, don't anybody touch her." He straightens up, tugging at his bowtie with a grimace, and heads down the stadium steps to the front row of the theater. She finally catches the shape of a crowbarkind specibus slung into the man's belt loop before he flops down in one of the seats. The projector screen has lit up with a dull grey light, flickering in the darkness of the theater, but PM is dragged out before she can see more than that.

The greenblooded troll seems to feel the need to supervise as the two other Crew members yank PM along the main hallway to yet another theater, his forest-green eyes flashing in the half-light as he sniggers. "You really shouldn't have crossed the Midnight Crew."

PM: Eat my fists of righteous fury, you asshat.

Once again, she is fairly certain that the message does not get through, or there would have been more of a reaction than a furrowed brow from the troll. "Weird ass alien," is all he mutters, before peeling off to head into the restroom. The two thugs holding PM by the arms finish dragging her down the hall, and one of them shoulders open the door to the new theater. PM raises her head, and squints against the faint, rusty red light at the other being chained to the space where the projector screen would have been.

What she sees is not possible.

PM: Y-you cannot be here! I - you're not - what are you?!

The door slams shut behind them.

Officially, the War for the Novaya Ukraine ended on paper five years ago, when the countries of the Caucuses were finally forced to admit that they and the refugees from southeastern Europe faced a common enemy, and the civil war became a united front.

The problem is, no one is really sure what that common enemy is. When the sticky white tendrils of thorns and poisonous pale tar began to extend their reach beyond the decimated ruins of the old Ukraine, and the things began to crawl up from the water to drag the living back down into the grimlight, centuries-old rivalries suddenly seemed a little petty, and few thought to question exactly what the monsters were.

These days, the official war is over. UN forces withdraw their troops steadily with each month that passes, quietly shuffling the soldiers and medics and technicians who come back wrong into private hospices in the countryside to be forgotten. The old southern region of the Ukraine is a lost cause, tainted with old bloodshed and polluted with lusus-white goo, but at least, the authorities whisper, most of the people have been evacuated to the Novaya Ukraine. At least the spindly, creatures with seething dark eyes, overstretched limbs, and hollow, hungry mouths have stopped scuttling up from the Kakhovka reservoir. At least the Sea of Azov no longer churns and froths with a tangle of pale, colossal intelligence.

As far as the public records are concerned, the Armed Ranger’s unit of ammunition suppliers withdrew to the safe zone almost a year ago. But AR knows better. There is still a need here in the east of Europe, and he is dedicated to his duty. He will defend the citizens under his protection, whether the law recognizes the ongoing guerilla war or not.

It is a cool spring night, made humid and stagnant by the reek of salt and blood that rises up from the slick, iridescently white puddles pooling along the sides of the path. Everywhere the goo sinks into the earth, plants have withered and almost melted into sludge, and the trees whose roots are affected weep droplets of pale tar from their leaves and the splits in their swollen bark. The wetlands are toxic in the worst possible ways, and only rangers on a hunt would dare venture so far south.

AR and his most recent recruits, twins from the town of Oster, wade carefully between the pools, their thick boots already steaming a little as the damp earth eats away at the soles. They have told him they grew up in the Chernihiv Oblast, along the banks of the Desna River, and they have been fighting the war since the grimlight first assimilated the reservoir ten years ago. It’s hard to remember their names – AR has always been unable to fathom how humans manage themselves when they keep only one name their entire lives, and refuse to respond to a name with similar initials that more accurately describes their state of being and profession at that particular moment. He keeps meaning to call them Volunteers, but they insist that they are Mykola and Olena Vynnychenko, and refuse to respond to orders with anything but sighs when he tries to refer to them by other, more fitting titles.

They are close to the new shoreline of the Sea of Azov, in the toxic wetlands that crept over the mainland when the incursion began, and the Ranger insists that they stick to protocol. He appreciates his Volunteers, he really does, but they keep insisting on making unauthorized detours into the woods and skirting too close to the opaque puddles of toxic waste. They are cocky and young, for humans, and do not take to orders very well, so the most AR can usually do to assert his authority as the party leader is to furiously sign at them to cease and desist whenever they prod at blancmange pools in a haphazard attempt to provoke their quarry into breaking cover.

“Розслабтеся, трохи панцира. Я знаю, як полювати на монстрів,” Mykola laughs, scratching at his strange brown human face-fur as he adjusts the straps of his heavy metal arm guards. He is short for a human, barely two feet taller than AR, but broad with muscle and the heavy weight of his armor. “І ми не повинні втрачати час - ми повинні вбити цю мерзоту, перш ніж він вбиває іншої людини.”

Across the road from her twin, Olena tosses a stone into a tarry pool and tilts her head to the side as the gloop ripples slowly in a delayed reaction to the impact. The stone slowly sinks into the viscous slurry and vanishes from sight. “Якщо ми не будемо рухатися далі, ми не будемо знайти монстра перед бурею починається. Чи не байдукувати, Микола.” She says it lazily, but her eyes are keen as she scans the darkness ahead.

AR huffs at them both and hops over a thin trickle of grimlight, the ammunition clips and guns slung over his shoulders swaying with the motion. He's been ranging the edges of the Novaya Ukraine for years now hunting monsters, but he has only crossed into the truly unsafe Staraya Ukraine once before, during the original war. The grimlight may have died down, and these rare stragglers like the one they are hunting now are few and far between, but he still feels apprehension clicking along his carapace, and can't help but wish his Volunteers would take this mission much more seriously.

AR: He who licks knives will soon cut his tongue.

It’s one of those proverbs in the area, a saying he’s picked up on and started to use himself. The people who still live in this area are used to a total absence of carapacians – Prospitians and Dersites and Villeins alike tended to avoid Eastern and Central Europe long before this War, still haunted by the memories of the Second World War and the genocide that ensued when Himmler chose to add carapacians to the list of those to be gathered into the camps. Because of this, the Ranger is even more of a rarity here than anywhere else in the world. He’s done what he can to pick up the vernacular and try to ease his way among a people made jittery and suspicious by years of twisted horrors hunting them by night. He can only imagine how a Prospitian with a pale carapace would be -treated in this kind of atmosphere; people tend to shoot first and ask questions later when they see something pale and inhuman running in the dark, and the corpses of innocent lusii are a common -sight closer to the settlements of the Novaya Ukraine proper.

AR also carries a lot of heavy artillery. But that’s because he has a small tendency to accumulate weaponry with uncanny zeal. Addiction is a powerful thing.

Olena tosses back her head and laughs, a low chuckle that she shares with her brother. “То це dobre, що я жінка!” she says, bowing slightly to unseen applause.
Something leaps out of the pool she disturbed and launches over her head, just barely clipping the back of the woman’s skull. If she hadn’t bowed at that very moment, she wouldn’t have had a head left. A spray of blood goes flying through the air as Olena gasps and drops to the ground, one hand grabbing at the damp mess of red bleeding into her long hair, and everything after that happens too quickly for AR to see how bad the damage might be.

It lands in the center of the path, right in front of AR. It is humanoid, just as the reports claimed, with jagged claws that drag through the dirt as it twitches around to snarl at the carapacian, but no sign of troll horns. The place where it used to have a face is a smear, the left eye and cheek smashed up against the right. Dark tears bleed from its mangled eyes and drip onto its scarred, tangled flesh as it shrieks and squats down on warped knees that bend backwards with the crunch of bones cracking in two. It reaches out with darting claws for AR’s face as it launches forward.

He levels an oversized rifle at it - most rifles are oversized compared to your average carapacian - and fires. He aims for the head but the bullet lodges in the monster's rib cage. But hey, at least he managed to hit it, right? The force of the shot slows the creature, jerking it to a halt mid-leap, but it just snarls and catches itself on its backward-hinging knees.

Another shot rings out from the left, followed shortly by a burst of staccato fire from Mykola's machine gun. "Ти помрєш, діавол!" Olena yells, her bloodied hair spilled around her face as she rises from her crouch, incensed. Her lone, precise shot catches the creature in the cheek, just barely missing the skull, and passes through its elongated jaw to ricochet off into the side of a tree. This yanks the monster's head to the side, just in time for Mykola's barrage to pepper the thing's torso with holes that drip thick purple blood. It claws at its injured side with tapering claws, opening up new wounds on its own body as it shrieks with dismay, and then bares its fangs at them before bounding off down the path. It no longer runs like a bipedal creature; it must lurch heavily forward and leap with every step to accommodate its unnaturally mutated leg joints.

AR is pretty used to unnatural creatures flying at his face at this point. Years of grimlight mutants attempting to claw at his carapace have left him rather unmoved when faced with yet another encounter with the horrors that stalk the Novaya Ukraine.

AR: Olena, are you well?

The woman grimaces and spits as she sweeps her hair back. "Я в порядку. Ми не можемо дозволити монстра піти." When Mykola comes to her and dabs at the back of her head, she swats his hand away and begins to race down the path after the monster.

She’s right, of course; the monster has already killed five others back in Oster, and if they lose it now it could disappear into the waterlogged wastes of the Staraya Ukraine and resurface elsewhere to plague another town. This is their responsibility, the duty AR has taken up to the neglect of all else. The civilians of the Novaya Ukraine are under his guardianship now, and of course he must enforce all efforts to ensure their safety. His weapons clanking and clattering against the brittle curve of his back, he scurries after the twin Volunteers, keeping up with their longer strides as they race after the pale, scampering form of the murderous creature.

A half an hour later, AR knows they have gone too far.

The dying, melting forest around them no longer buzzes with the faint hum of insects, and the sky overhead is no longer impenetrably dark. Everything has gone silent except for the plinking drip of the ooze that falls from the sagging trees into vast sheets of grimlight below. The pale pools inundate the ground around them, gleaming with a sickly radiance that illuminates the area. The light is not Reassuring in the slightest, and AR would almost prefer the dark of the thick forest they left behind. The Ranger's feet have begun to sting within his boots as the acidic ground eats at them. At this rate, even if they turn around now, they won't make it back to the safe zone with their shoes intact. AR would last a while, but human skin is more vulnerable than carapace, and the Volunteers will surely lose toes, at the least.

And still, the monster leads them on a merry chase. It turned and screeched at them with the voice of the Abyss once before, but sprang back into motion before Olena and AR could do more than fire off two shots, too far away for even Olena to aim accurately.

They are far too deep into the Staraya Ukraine. The wetlands threaten to turn into a true lake, soon, and then they will be at the new edge of the Sea of Azov. The last reports from the UN's air drones showed the Sea's tangle had died, or at least stopped raising up new monsters, but AR knows the true nature of the thing that took up residence there. He spent years of his old life listening to the delirious songs of the Furthest Ring, and while he may not know the full name of the Horrorterror that was summoned into the Sea, he knows that very few things in this world could possibly kill it. No, he doesn't trust that the tangle is dead. Dormant, perhaps, and uninterested in continuing to actively poison the earth now that it has set up its own personal, grimlight-tainted territory, but alive nonetheless.

AR: We need to turn back.

It will hurt, of course. AR is proud of his impeccable monster-hunting record, and will be disappointed to see his hunting streak broken. But he would prefer that they live to fight another day, not die pointlessly in the name of killing one solitary mutation.

"Ми не можемо," Olena snaps. He can see the way her face has taken on a deathly pallor in the last few minutes. She consented to Mykola roughly bandaging her head to stem the bleeding, but she still should not have been running around all this time with a head wound. "Ми повинні продовжувати йти," she argues.

AR: We do not have a choice. We have to let it go and get back to the safe zone.

Thankfully, Mykola chimes in to agree with the Ranger. "Він правий, Олена. Щось не так у цій ситуації."

They are all three of them tense and on high alert. The seaside is nowhere near as clear as the Novaya Ukraine; the area surrounding the Sea itself could well be infested with thousands mutations still, and no one would ever know. The region is a dead zone. And Mykola has voiced exactly what AR has begun to worry about - something is not right about this situation. Ordinarily when confronted or chased by hunters, a mutation would turn and fight, overwhelmed by its own hunger for human flesh. They are not intelligent monsters and instead rely on unnatural strength and speed to kill, aided by their prey's instinctive fear of their distorted, uncanny forms.

This feels like more than a regular chase. This feels like the monster is leading them somewhere - it could easily have outrun them and disappeared into one of the deeper pools, but it taunts them from a distance, slowing its leaping bounds so that they can keep up. And he does not like that idea.

Olena sighs and jogs to a stop, staring yearningly into the distance as the last sliver of the mutation's arched back vanishes between the trees. "Добре." Touching a hand to the back of her head, she shakes herself vigorously and turns.

Without a sound, an enormous tendril whips up from the ground, where it had been concealed by a sheen of white ooze. It wraps around Olena's waist. She flinches, and has time to look up at Mykola with wide eyes before the grimlight tentacle rips her back, snaking along the path in the direction the original monster has been leading them all along.

"Олена!" Mykola yells. There is a short cry in reply that cuts off too quickly, and a crunch that jolts AR's belly with a painful twist. He knows the sound of bones breaking, and that - that was a lot of bones. He can see the motion of the white tendril as it drags Olena's broken body back through the trees, though he can't see her anymore.

Mykola roars, and lunges forward. AR grabs the man's arm, but he just yanks it free and hares off in pursuit of the grimlight tendril.

AR: She's gone! No, Mykola, she's gone, she's - Agh! Come back!

The Ranger jumps over the pool of grimlight and takes off after Mykola. The tendril that took Olena has already receded through the trees, the white of its flesh blending into the dead forest and shining pools. But Mykola keeps running, screaming Olena's name at intervals, his voice already broken with sobs.

And AR can't leave them here. Even knowing they're already too close to the Sea, that the pools around them have finally merged into a vast lake that slops over the edges of the raised path, that he can hear the faint shrieks of other mutations crowing into the dead air, AR keeps going. Mykola brushes a low-hanging branch in his furious, grieving haste, and the Ranger can see poisonous white slime smeared all down the man's arm. But Mykola doesn't do the sensible thing and rip off his guards and jacket; he seems to be too blinded by the chase to realize his arm may begin to melt in mere minutes. AR puts on an extra burst of speed, ducking under that same branch, and swears under his breath. Mykola won't turn, won't be able to hear AR as more than a vague, indistinct murmur in his mind unless he turns to see AR's claw signals, and thus won't heed any warning about the acid unless AR catches up.

He's not going to catch up in time. The trees are thinning too fast, and the ground beneath his feet froths and slips, more sand than solid earth. They are nearly to the beach, the one place in this godsforsaken wasteland that AR will not walk.

AR: Mykola, stop!

The Volunteer does not turn to look, no matter how loudly AR attempts to shout in his mind. The burly man crosses from the path to the beach in a single stride, and then he is gone. AR jerks himself to a halt right at the boundary between the two, skidding slightly in the roiling sands.

He goes cold when he realizes what he is seeing.

The swollen Sea laps against a bone-white beach, leaving iridescent trails of lustrous white pollution along the shore. The tendril of grimlight that snagged Olena holds the woman aloft, long enough for Mykola to shout her name once more and charge toward it, before slithering beneath the surface of the waves. The Ranger screams mentally, but he thinks that perhaps Mykola ignores him on purpose. Twins are funny, that way.

But what truly terrifies him is the way the water stirs as Mykola stops by the edge of the surf, falling to his knees. True, some mutated creatures can grow and twist and stretch longer than houses, but the ripples that spread outward in the tainted water stretch as far as AR can see, and he knew it, he knew this tangle wasn't dead -

And -

AR: Mykola! Get back from the water!

He runs out onto the beach sands and immediately feels the flare of pain from his feet. Through the tough shell of his outer carapace he can feel the grainy, searing surface of the beach on his bare feet, and he knows his boots are gone. The acid is much more concentrated here, and he can only imagine what Mykola's feet and knees will look like now. The human may never walk again, if he survives to leave this place.

When he is still yards away from Mykola, the first monster, the one they followed all the way into this trap, tackles AR from the side. They roll a few times before coming to a stop with the twisted mutation pinning him to the sand. AR screams, feeling the grimlight soak right through his outer wrappings and burn at his back. He fumbles on the trigger as the humanoid abomination bares its teeth, ripping the sides of its broken mouth apart so that it can fully open its jaws. Desperate, AR turns the rifle in his hands and begins to bash at the thing's head vigorously. He stuns it temporarily, but he doesn't have the strength to crush the monster's skull in, not from this angle.

From this distance, at least, it doesn't matter that he can't aim worth a damn or not. He flips the rifle, jamming it up into the creature's blackened eye socket, and pulls the trigger. A clot of purple blood bursts out from the back of the thing's head and trickles down the barrel, and with a warbling cry the monster sags forward, quite dead. The connection to the original grimlight tangle, after all, requires a functioning mind to host it. AR kicks the dead body off of him, rolling to the side with his arm wrappings scraping against the sands, and lurches to his feet once more.

Another tendril of grimlight erupts from the Sea, and this time AR sees the enormous mouth that emerges from the water as well. Endless rows of teeth line the circular maw as deep as AR can see, and there is something more - the sense of being watched and seen through, as though the tangle of hunger and horror within the Sea could strip him to the bone, flense his mind and swallow it whole like he was nothing more than a morsel of meat to be assimilated.

To be fair, that's exactly what a Horrorterror would do.

The sensation is too much; old instinct kicks in and AR begins to scramble backward. It's too late. It's too late, and he can't be the hero. It's far too late. The tentacle snaps around Mykola and pulls him into the surf.

Just before the end, Mykola sees AR, and the Ranger can see the resigned horror on the man's face twist into one final expression of determination. "Тікай, маленький панцир!" And then Mykola is gone, vanished into the gaping purple maw of the Horrorterror.

AR's first instinct is to charge in, guns blazing. He makes an aborted move forward before scrambling back into the tree line. His feet ache and his back burns and he can feel his eyes have begun to sting with tears, too. He should never have allowed them to wander this far. His Volun- his Vynnchenko twins are dead, and soon their bodies will be prowling the Staraya Ukraine, doomed to wander as twisted abominations wherever the grimlight directs them. He stumbles further into the trees, fighting back tears. He cannot afford to rest here, not with the tangle so very much alive. If it senses him, it can most certainly still reach him without even leaving the Sea -

Light flares from the sky, and he is momentarily blinded. Naturally, he freaks the fuck out and crouches down, arms over his head as he whimpers and blinks frantically, trying to see again. When he can finally make out the shape of the trees around him and assures himself that he isn't about to be confronted with yet another monstrous abomination inches from his face, he squints upward, past the hard glare of the spotlight training itself on the beach. From the Sea, he can hear the throaty, psychic warble of confusion that the Horrorterror lets out, and feels a trickle of blood run from his nose at the sound.

A crimson red airship hangs in the sky, a familiar insignia painted starkly in white across the belly. AR trembles behind a bush, careful not to brush against its sickly pale, oozing leaves, and watches as a petite female troll leaps down from the vessel. She stands hard, and the sand around her actually crumples and caves inward with the force of her impact. Bracing herself on a golden culling fork, she straights. She is short but curvy, and her fuchsia-black hair tangles and writhes down her back in an wild mess of kinks and snarls. The resemblance between her silhouette and the shadowy form of the Horrorterror's tentacles beneath the surface of the Sea is...uncanny.

"Eyyyy, Gl'bgoylb. Long time, no cull, squidbitch," Her Imperious Condescension says, standing with her hip jutted out as she faces off with the city-sized Horrorterror. "Still having a glubbin' one-lusus murder party over here, you outraybeous bitch?"

More of the tangle heaves itself up above sea-level, and AR cowers, clapping his claws over his ears as the Horrorterror rumbles, a shrieking song that makes his ears bleed. He has the benefit of once being a Dersite, genetically cloned only a few rings in from the Noble Circle, and thus an inbred immunity to the worst of their cries. Any human or troll would normally have been incapacitated by the voice of the Abyss, spoken by a true Terror incarnate, but the troll doesn't even flinch.

"Fuck you. Fuck. You," the Condesce snaps, jabbing her 2x3dent at the massive Horrorterror. AR can only look on, fascinated. He has never before witnessed a troll that could somehow speak to something grimlight without immediately being attacked. This should be impossible. "N'if you think I couldn't glubbin' tell you had to be involved with that attempted salmoning in New York, you're needta coddamn think again!" The angrier the troll gets, the more fish puns she seems to use. AR can barely understand what half of the puns mean simply because he has no context for this bizarre, one-sided conversation. "You're the Emissary, and I warned you - you can wreck shit over here all you like, but if you step outta line, I will prawn yo ass into the next motherglubbin' session!"

Gl'bgoylb writhes in its Sea, tendrils lashing but never reaching out to embrace the Condesce. AR watches with a bile fascination, ignoring the way his feet ache and weep blood into the soil. He has lived near grim creatures all his lives, and never once witnessed one that treated a mortal being as anything but prey or a nuisance, good only for assimilating as a tanglebuddy. For the fuchsia troll's impudence alone, a Horrorterror should have shredded her mind on principle.

"Ha ha," the troll snorts, placing a fist on her hip. "Your mouths keep flappin', but all I hear is 'glubglubglub.'"

The grimlight Horrorterror slams a tendril down against the water. It kicks up a wave, but the water doesn't splash down anywhere near the Condesce, so it's not as much an attack as a...mild threat? A stern rebuke?

The Condesce raises a middle finger in response. "Blow it outta yo blowhole, bitch, I'll talk however I want. I know you hiveminds are always in cahoots." She taps her foot as the pale monster screeches and murmurs incomprehensibly back, nodding as though she can understand the words between the unearthly screams, and then raises two middle fingers. "Too glubbin' bad. For New York, you just lost your murder privileges over here. #DWI"

The Horrorterror tries to raise its volume. There's a strangling gurgle as it opens its jaws, and then a pop, and the whole enormous tangle shudders, drawing back a little as though in pain. The Condesce snorts. "Scream all you want - the old Doc's got your Glub on lock. That asshoal may want you squidbitchez hangin' around still, cod knows why, but if you tank that'll save you, you're wrong. I know you been rayling up the heiress, getting' her all uppity and finking she can step to me. One more tentacle outta line and imma cull you myself."

Gl'bgolyb murmurs once more, tentacles sinking back beneath the waves. "I heard that!" the troll yells back. "Yeah, yeah. You better clamscry!" The troll slings her culling fork over her shoulder, scratching at the bed of her horns as she cracks her neck to the side. "Overbearin' deathbitch," she mutters. Tapping one of the golden bangles on her arm, she says, "Beam me up, snowflake. M'glubbin' starfin'. #wouldkrillforasnackeralrightnow"

The spotlight is replaced by a crackling beam of red, and the Condesce sits back as she is lifted back up to the ship, her legs crossed as she inspects her claws. AR can't see where she reenters it, but the light shuts off soon after, and, as silently as it arrived, the airship floats off, disappearing into the cloud cover without a sound. A stealth vehicle, then, rather than a personal ship, but that is all AR can really say about it - his specialty was always weaponry and regulations, not space or aircraft design.

When he looks back at the tangle in the water, he is in for an even stranger sight. The water ripples out from where the Horrorterror is moving beneath the waves, and it takes a moment for him to discern that the ripples are moving south, away from the beach. The water level begins to sink as AR watches, fascinated. If he's right, the Horrorterror that has occupied the Sea of Azov for so long is...leaving. Without its massive bulk displacing all that water, the shoreline might even creep back to the original water line.

He doesn't know how one troll - even a troll as powerful and illustrious on the global-scale as the Condescension herself - could have such power to threaten one of the grimlight many-angled gods! This is highly unusual!

It appears the Ranger will have to abandon this country. He's known this moment would arrive, eventually, the time when his oldest duties and loyalties would call him away from his chosen cause. He may not have understood a great deal of that conversation between troll and monster, but he knows that what he just witnessed was...significant. It is something that his old Prospitian contact will most surely be interested in hearing of - she is a member of the Shatranj, and while once they might have worked on opposing sides of an endless war, the old Parcel Mistress of his youth is in contact with the only Queen who still occasionally reaches out to her carapacian subjects. This might not be what regulation states AR should do, but he has been making up his own protocol for some time now, actually, and there is no one he trusts more in this world with this new information than the Protégé Mediator.

That is, at least, if he makes it back to solid ground before his carapace melts away. He begins to hobble-run away from the beach, back to the relative safety of the living forest miles to the north.

Before he can leave the country, however, he will have to report the twins' deaths, and the thought crushes at his heart with renewed grief, a new weight that he must endure. He runs and runs, and he tries not to think about the twin humans suffering within the pale grip of the tangle, their minds melting away into the sinking bloodbrine Sea.

Chapter End Notes

Oh jeez, PM, what have you gotten yourself into? ...Oh, right, the main Dave plot. Silly me. Let's play a game called 'how much more complicated can I make this fic in the space of one Intermission chapter', where the points don't matter and nobody wins.
Nobody. Not even me.

And now the Condesce is running around with her own agenda. Whether that agenda lines up with Doc Scratch's is another matter altogether (she told him that she was going to deal with her heiress, not go on a crazy roadtrip to Europe, after all).
Or By Day

Chapter Summary

Do the stars answer? in the night
Have ye found comfort? or by day
Have ye seen gods? What hope, what light, Falls from the farthest starriest way?

Chapter Notes

One last short chapter to wrap up the carapacian Intermission arc! Herein Spades Slick stabs things, animate and otherwise, because that’s just what he does for fun, and WV is officially inducted as Sharpshooter’s sidekick, whether he likes it or not.

==> Be Spades Slick

Fuckin' typical.

Spades pulls the brim of his hat down low and falls back into the shadow of a ruined statue, glaring at the obnoxious, neon yellow uniforms of the humans and trolls scurrying around the plaza. Every time he tries to so much as cross the street in this hellhole of a town, they're on his case. He's behind the eight ball here; one look at him and they'll know him for the carapacian he is, and he knows from previous experience that a carapacian in the Americas gets noticed. And anyone could be a member of the Midnight Crew.

Once, that kind of thought would have made him almost not-irritated. His own dreams of expanding the Crew never really went anywhere, what with all the dyin' and the timeline baloney. Not even Diamonds, who refused to ever be confused by time-traveling nonsense with a stubborn, cold fury that Spades would never admit he admired, had been able to survive the chaos. Now the thought of a Crew that spans a continent or three just turns Spades's stomach, because they're not his Crew, not anymore.

All he wants to do is blow this joint and get outta town before another crazy dame with death tentacles starts wrecking the place. He had only just arrived in New York City when everything went to absolute shit, and he's been bunkering down in a nice underground tunnel ever since.

He survived, obviously - if there's one thing Spades is good at, it's surviving - but his timing for his escape has clearly gone wrong; there are emergency crews everywhere, milling around and generally being useless as they search piles of debris and clean up bloodstains.

His first instinct is to jack one of their vehicles and floor it until he's past the barricades, but that would get him noticed just as easily as if he whipped off his hat and suit and did a fucking pirouette off this goddamn horse statue. As much as he despises it, his best option is to stay here where no one has yet seen him and wait for the coast to clear up -
"Hey, sir? Sir, are you alright?"

Spades facepalms with both claws as a troll with sharply angled horns and a forest green uniform jogs over to him, having apparently seen through Spades's clever plan. He should really learn to keep his thoughts to himself; paradox space likes fucking with him, and he always falls for it.

SS: Bluhhhhhhh.

"Sir, this area is still not cleared - we need to get you to a safe zone -" the troll chatters, and then quite abruptly he's all up in Spades's personal space and the stab that ensues is basically reflex. He was just right there, his ribs utterly exposed, alright? Spades's blade darts out and slips into the troll's side like a sigh, cutting off that incessant chatter instantly as the troll jolts to a halt and stares down at the pale green blood that trickles out and coats Spades's claw. "You - you stabbed me?" the troll says faintly, sounding almost faint. It's a nice change, almost, except how it's not - Spades is used to stabbing people who either deserve it or who get more irritated than frightened, and come back fighting. This kid just looks like he's gonna puke. Spades snorts, retracting the blade and shuffling it away in its holster.

SS: Kid, if you can't take the occasional friendly shank in stride, you need to work on your game face. I barely even nicked yah.

"You don't just go around knifing people in a disaster zone!" the troll protests, trying to stem the meager trickle of blood with both hands. Spades shakes off the instinct to flashback to another time and place, to another troll who had a much more interesting reaction to being stabbed. He's has to get going, before this chump actually attracts attention with all his dramatic wailing.

SS: I do.

Popping the collar of his suit to hide the gleaming, scarred black of his carapace, Spades makes his decision, and races across the plaza, crossing at the point with the least amount of exposure before rolling around the corner of a building into a new alley.

"He - he went that way! He's crazy - he just stabbed me, out of nowhere -"

Spades curses vehemently as he hears the troll rat him out to someone - cops, probably. Fuckin' pansy ass narc. The carapacian glances around, taking in his new surroundings, but the alley behind him is a dead end.

Shit. He can't afford to be arrested again. The last time this kind of thing happened, it was in Malmö, Sweden, and he'd only been incarcerated for two days before both a man in a midnight black suit and a pale, baby-faced little Prospitian who looked like butter wouldn't melt in his mouth showed up outside the slammer and tried to weasel their way in to interrogate him personally. He can't blow his cover this deep in the Midnight Crew's territory; they'd probably seize him even before the police could.

The only way out is up. Muttering to himself, Spades hauls himself on top of an overturned dumpster and makes a running leap for the fire escape across the alleyway. He succeeds, barely, hooking both arms over the railing and crawling over to land on his feet with a clang. All of this would be so much easier if these American shits weren't so goddamn inconsiderate. Everything is built on a scale designed for humans and trolls; for a carapacian of a slightly smaller stature, even pushing the buttons in an elevator is a nightmare.

But he can't just cool his heels here. Snarling at the sound of heavy boots as the cops rush toward his alleyway, Spades starts up the stairwell, taking the steps two at a time. Really, these people overreact to the littlest things. If Spades had really wanted the chump dead, he certainly wouldn't have stopped at one measly stab wound.

The shouted orders and confused shouts recede beneath him as Spades climbs upward. But as he nears the roof of the building, he picks up on quiet murmurs coming not from the ground, but from above. Alerted, the carapacian crouches and lifts his feet with care, stealthily crawling up the last few steps and narrowing his eyes at the two figures who stand on top of the building.

Neither are in a uniform he recognizes, though that does nothing to ease his suspicions - he's a suspicious guy, alright? He isn't about to be taken in by a cop in plainclothes just because he's getting sloppy. The crowd below all wore navy blues and forest greens and occasionally bright yellow, but these two are in something completely different.

One is a robot, but it's not until Spades automatically looks over it for its weak points that he realizes it's a cyborg. It is built like a human man, and cloaked in dull green, and he can still make out the strips of dark, vulnerable human flesh that remain. It's perhaps ninety percent mechanized, but it hasn't switched over entirely, which means - if Spades's hunch is correct - that there's probably an equally squishy human brain resting in that robotic chassis. He alters his stabbing plans accordingly; if he does have to fight through these two dupes to get to the next roof over, a human brain in a robot body will be much more unpredictable in a scrape than a plain old robot.

The other is a much shorter, plumper human female, with a pale blue shawl and a head of cropped, white hair. She has one arm hooked around the mechanical elbow of the robot in what is no doubt some weird human-robot friendship action, and her voice is so low a murmur that Spades can't make out the words, even from here. When the robot says something in a louder, artificial voice, though, she laughs obnoxiously loud, tilting her head back to the sky and smiling so widely her whole face creases. Humans age so damn weird.

Spades doesn't have the patience to wait for their damn pow-wow to finish up. He could probably get away with just stabbing the robot and moving on; older humans are less of a threat, he's found, and even he would have a slight misgiving about stabbing a fragile old lady. Thankfully, before he has to make that call, the woman hoots with laughter, a note of finality in her tone as she draws back from the robot.

"You go catch up with Jade, dear. Lord knows that girl's been hopping all over the place." The old woman stands up on her tiptoes, and the robotic man leans down obligingly for her to plant a kiss on his cheek. It leaves a smear of lipstick behind, which Spades nearly vomits at, but the robot obviously doesn't have the nerve endings left to feel the smear on a cheek of steel. "And keep an eye on you-know-who for me while I'm gone."

"Will do, old friend," the robot agrees, patting the old woman gently on the arm. He then un hooks his arm from hers and activates rockets in his feet, arcing away into the sky with one last wave, heading west toward the setting sun.

Left to her own devices, the old dame hums, smiles to herself - and then meets Spades's eyes, winking broadly as she chortles. Spades jerks back, whipping out a knife and nearly falling on his ass, but she simply waves at him and continues to shuffle away toward the inner stairwell, drawing her shawl tighter around her shoulders when the wind picks up.

She knew he was there all along.

And alright, it's not as though Spades was exactly being a master of subtlety when he first started up the emergency stairs, but still. She hadn't even been facing his direction while he crouched there. He'd been so convinced neither she nor the robot noticed him; she played him like a goddamn fiddle.
Wary, Spades waits until she vanishes into the building, shutting the door behind her with a final chortle of laughter. Checking and rechecking the roof for any more strange human broads and their robot chums, the carapacian shuffles back and forth, and at last hesitantly steps out onto the roof proper.

He receives a faceful of pie and cream for his caution. It comes outta nowhere, giving him no time to defend himself.

SS: BLUAAGH!

Spluttering, he claws at his own face. By mistake, he opens his mouth and sweet, fluffy whipped cream drips onto his tongue.

SS: MNNAAAAAGH!!!

He spits violently (though that really is a most delicious taste) and scrabbles at his face with renewed vigor, falling to his knees and remaining there until he has wiped away the last of the treacherous human baked good from his brow and smeared the whipped cream and tart cherry filling all over the rooftop. His claws are stained with the red of mashed cherry filling, and it is not satisfying in the slightest.

A note drifts across the roof and sticks in the filling. Still panting with fury, Spades picks it up gingerly between two claws and reads it.

_Eavesdropping isn't very polite, dearie! Hoohoohoo!_

_J_

SS: ………

Fuckin’ old lady tricksters and their fuckin’ piekind strife specibi. That's it. He's hightailin' it out of this dive of a town before someone else decides to work their decrepit old pranksters' gambit out on his sorry carapace. Shredding the note between his claws, Spades heads west, trying not to think too hard about the fact that the robot headed that same direction.

He can't think what a strange robot human would want with a dumb, angry little shit like Karkat Vantas. All he can hope is that the fact that they're heading in the same direction is a horrible, horrible coincidence.

Somewhere inside himself, though, he's resigned to the fact that yeah, paradox space is just pissy enough to make that happen.

==> Be the Wonderful Viator

Being quantumly unstable is hard. It’s hard and no one understands.

No, seriously, no one understands. Even when the Variable tries to talk, no one can seem to hear him! It's really inconvenient. He's mostly been getting his point across to the space girl with gratuitous amounts of hand gestures and wild flailing, but even then she hardly ever understands his advice! He can't tell if it's because he's just not good at this, or if she's just stupid. But she procures wonderful things for him, like TaB and nice blue shirt-blankets and green food things, so she can't be _that_ stupid.
He thinks it's because he can't make the clicky sounds anymore. Everything is still a little green and fuzzy in his brain sometimes, but when he goes to speak to the space girl he always wants to use his hands, his voice, and his mind to communicate - and only his claws seem to get with the program! When he wants to click and hum and trill, all that comes out of his mouth are faint squeaks and gasps. It isn't normal, and he doesn't remember why it's not normal.

Sometimes, he thinks he should remember more. He looks at the Bec-beast and knows it's familiar, but he doesn't know why he knows. At night when Jade camps out under the stars and WV tries to fall asleep, it's the eyeless, featureless shape of the strange creature's head that follows him into his dreams, the electric green plasma painting his thoughts with lime-scented fire.

Today is one of those days that WV wishes he remembers more - or at the least, that he could figure out how to talk! Because no matter how much he protests, the Jade human insists that they must complete the mysterious Sidekick Initiation, and he does not know what that entails. He has been blindfolded for the past hour, and whenever he goes to remove the blindfold or otherwise wander around blindly through the caves, there is a flare of green light and either Jade or the Bec-beast zaps him right back to where he started with the spacey thing.

Theoretically, he could do the spacey thing himself. But he doesn't know how to control it, and anyway, ever since that rather stressful incident in the place called 'Texas,' his scars tingle and burn whenever too many space shenanigans occur. He rubs at his cheeks with both hands and pouts, sitting down heavily in the corner and kicking his legs out to wait for whatever it is that the Jade human finds so important that she has kept them sitting in one place for hours. She's been very quiet and worried about that sort of thing lately, insisting that they take loud noisy bus things to transport them from place to place, never staying still for long - but today she woke up much more cheerful, like her old self. WV is of course very pleased by this development, but now he's also concerned, because any plan that involves him being blindfolded while Jade teleports around like a maniac is generally a Bad Idea.

He had decided to stay with her mostly because she was green and interesting things happened to her constantly and he owed her rather a lot for making him real again. In hindsight, this may not have been the best basis on which to start a friendship with a flighty space dame.

"Alright! Everything's ready!" A ringing clap sounds through the cavern, and WV jumps a little, glancing around blindly, moving to rip off the blindfold, and he huffs with frustration when it just gets slapped back down over his eyes.

With a whomph of displaced air, a bowl of green fire appears in the middle of the cave, hovering about four feet in the air. Even from here, he can feel the heat radiating off it, though there isn't much smoke, despite the enclosed space. Now WV can see the space girl just beyond the fire, but she's not in her usual catsuit or lab coat or shooting vest, all of which she generically refers to as her 'work clothes' depending on her mood. Instead, she is in an unfamiliar cloak with the hood pulled up. The wolf sits beside her, as usual, but somehow she has finagled it into a cloak as well, its pale muzzle sticking out from the dip of the hood.

The overall effect would normally be ridiculous, but her mouth is flat and solemn, and with her eyes hidden beneath - is that her aviator mask? why is she wearing that now?! - WV is apprehensive about what exactly this crazy lady has planned. He scrambles to his feet when both girl and wolf remain silent and unmoving by the green fire, and slowly, gingerly, he begins to edge toward them, folding his claws together nervously as he does.

"Okay, Mr. Variable! Tonight...is the night!" The Jade human spreads her arms wide, and makes no move to take off that ridiculous aviator mask. WV jumps back at the suddenness of the motion. "Tonight, we officially induct you into the Honorable Guild of People Who Do the Space Thing! Name pending until I can come up with something better than HGPWDST for an acronym."

Look here, Jade human, I do not understand why we are doing this! WV insists, signing frantically in a last ditch effort to get his point across. Also, I am fairly certain it is still day outside, we have not been here that long -

But it's just no good; Jade plows on ahead as though he hadn't attempted to speak. "This is a very special night," she says, her voice lowered in a dramatic whisper. He can hear the faint hint of a giggle that perpetually underlies her words even at the most serious of moments, and feels a little reassured; the Jade human may be unpredictable and overly exuberant, but he trusts that she would not be deliberately malicious. "A night dedicated to honoring the newest member of our tooootally exclusive organization of humanitarian super-powered beings, and bestowing upon him an awesome new title!"

He is beginning to get very nervous. Uncommonly nervous. Worryingly nervous. Of what use are these ceremonies? I believe we should cease these activities and get milkshakes. Celebratory milkshakes. You like milkshakes, Jade!

His words go unnoticed, and Jade dramatically flings a handful of powder into the fire, which flares up to three times its original size. The flash of pale green almost obscures the electric crackle of Bec rising up into the air, its pelt melting into a green galaxy.

Abruptly, they are outside. WV’s scars tingle unpleasantly as he looks around, taking in the evening sky around him.

All around him, in the most literal way possible. He lurches forward and barely catches himself, arms pinwheeling frantically as he balances on a tiny square foot of wood. He lets out a high-pitched keen as he squats with trembling knees to get a lower center of gravity. The small square of wood is somehow attached to the very tip of an enormous pine tree, overlooking the forested, mountainous region of Colorado that they located their base cavern in. But this...this was not here earlier in the day, when they first arrived at this place! How long have Jade and the Bec-beast been working on this nightmarish contraption?! Jade, I am not fond of this height... he tries, using great caution as he makes his claws jab and twist into the symbols that ordinarily would have helped him communicate. Even with his deliberate care, Jade hovers before him and ignores his plea, green static flickering in her hair as she holds herself in midair and rips off the aviator mask. She has a large bucket in her hands, and she raises it over her head, a disturbing grin twitching across her face.
WV is significantly alarmed by this. He flounders for a moment, and nearly falls off this precarious perch. Good grief, Jade human - you will put me down at once! Desist!

Jade upends the bucket over his head, and WV braces for impact, cowering with his arms over his head.

A few seconds later, nothing has happened. Blinking, he looks up, just in time for the first gloop of honey to run down his face. His mouth opens reflexively in horror and he barely closes it before the rest of the bucket sluices down in an amber tidal wave, sticking all over his head and the wrappings around his shoulders. It soothes the burning in his scars, even as it drips into his eyes.

He understands now, in an apathetic horror, why Jade insisted he take off his nice blue shirt-blanket. H-honey? Why, Jade human, why?!

"Bec! The sliced avocado!" Jade commands, snapping her fingers. The universe tilts around WV, centered on that pernicious, traitorous Bec-beast, and he ducks his head this time rather than look up like a fool. Tiny slices of avocado patter onto his head in a pale green rain, sticking in the honey and slowly tracking down his face.

It just keeps happening, and WV is coming to fear that this entire episode is entirely pointless. He is covered in honey and avocado and he doesn't know why this is happening.

"And now, for the finale," Jade says, drawing out a significant pause as WV wipes at his face in a desperate attempt to clear his eyes of honey. When he peers blearily up at the space girl, she holds a pumpkin. This would be strange enough to fit the theme of the rest of her food-based assaults, if not for the large black and white photo taped to the front of the hollowed gourd.

Wait. Is that...John Cusack?

"Behold! The ceremonial gourd -" Jade begins, before, without even a flash of green light, the pumpkin vanishes. John Cusack remains, and begins to flutter toward the ground without the pumpkin it was taped to. WV, who has already crouched in preparation for this last assault, looks to Bec, but the beast has not moved, unaffected by the gourd's abrupt disappearance. Jade opens her mouth and closes it a few times, levitating the photograph of John Cusack back into her hands. "Why does that always happen?!!" Jade wonders aloud, shaking her head. "Oh well. Behold! The ceremonial Cusack!"

Seizing the photo, Jade slams it against WV's forehead, nearly flinging him off the square platform. He bends back and wheels his arms and barely manages to stay upright. John Cusack sticks to his forehead, the honey soaking through the paper as WV goes cross-eyed trying to eye the picture.

There is really only one correct response to this indignity. He falls to his knees on the platform and clutches at the air. Noooooooo!

Jade is beautifully oblivious, off in her own little carapacian-torturing world. "Now then." She clears her throat, and raises her hands to either side. Her eyes close, and a faint smile forms on her lips, and like this, she looks almost benevolent. "Do you, WV, so solemnly swear that you will uphold the creed of the Heroes of Space: that you will serve the worldwide community as a force for good, justice, and SCIENCE, and that you will do everything in your power to kick bad guy butt?!!"

She is mad. He has volunteered to follow the command of a complete maniac. I - Yes? Yes! Just remove me from this unsafe vantage at once, you mad woman! With no other method of communication at his disposal, and seeing only one way out of this situation, WV nods his head vigorously, saluting so hard he smacks himself in the John Cusack.
"Really?! Eeeeeee!" Jade squeaks. Her hair sparks with even more green as she laughs with excitement. "Then I now pronounce you the Wonderful Viator! Wonder Vi, for short! Carapacian hero and official sidekick in Team Space!" Jade claps her hands together. "You may now bathe in the river of JUSTICE!"

The clap takes them somewhere above a river. WV knows this only because he lands in the water a second later, spluttering and flailing frantically because he cannot swim. His feet find purchase easily, however, once he stops panicking, and he flounders upright to shiver, rubbing at his arms and face with the chill water. The photograph of John Cusack sags and falls from his forehead, floating away along the current. Though he is no doubt a wonderful and under-appreciated actor, WV is not sorry to see him go.

Never...again...

At last, he feels clean enough to haul himself over to the bank of the river and drag himself ashore. Jade is waiting there, humming until he rests his head on the grass, glowering at her accusingly. Then she grins at him and whistles, the usual signal she uses to recall the Bec-beast, who has not followed them. "This is sooooo awesome! Just wait until you see your awesome new duds! Hang on - I have them right here!" Jade grunts, her entire arm vanishing into the invisible pocket of her sylladex. Her tongue sticks out between her teeth as she rummages around.

The wolf appears a moment later, landing neatly on the far side of the puddle of water spreading out around WV. Were you forced to engage in such a perilous sacrament as a means of establishing your loyalty as well, Bec-beast? he demands sourly, at least in the privacy of his own head. The wolf yawns and lays down with its head in its paws, just as oblivious to WV's ramblings as Jade. ...No, I thought not, WV thinks at last, flopping over on his back. There is still sticky honey goo on his carapace in places he had not thought goo would fit, and he can only rub at it ineffectively.

Still, despite the strange nature of the ritual he just endured, he cannot help a small feeling of warmth from spreading within him. What a time to be alive.

"Found it!" the Jade human chirps. From within the sylladex she draws a draping, lime-green shirt-blanket. In bright block letters across the front, it reads 'WV,' and WV can see the sizable hood that flops down the back of the poncho. "Weeeellll, WV? Do you love it?!" Jade waggles an eyebrow up and down, shaking the poncho at him enticingly.

He can only stare at the green cloth for a long moment. It is glorious. But he does not wish to give in to Jade's whims so easily- Oh just give it to me, Jade human, he orders, irritated and grateful in equal measure. He takes the uniform from her outstretched hand and hugs it, not even caring that he is no doubt getting the new treasure all damp.

Jade whoops and snags him in an exuberant hug. She drags the wolf into it a moment later, and WV almost sneezes all over everyone when she squeezes them with unnatural strength under her chin. "This is going to be so much fun," she says, the motion of her jaw sticking her chin in a dollop of honey from WV's head. "I can't wait to tell John! I can't wait to see him!" She grins so hard WV can feel the movement on his carapace.

He can't help but agree with her sentiment, though.

It will be good to see the windy boy again.

Chapter End Notes
I’ll be honest, guys, I have absolutely no idea what kind of drugs Jade was on when she came up with that initiation ceremony. It's like she tried to look up ‘secret superhero initiations’ and came up with weird hazing rituals instead...
Chapter Summary

For if sleep have no mercy, and man's dreams
Bite to the blood and burn into the bone,
What shall this man do waking? By the gods,
He shall not pray to dream sweet things to-night,
Having dreamt once more bitter things than death.

Chapter Notes

Anyway, back to your regularly scheduled heroic antics, with Karkat (as Hemogoblin) framed for arson, Rose running away from home, Dave meeting the Midnight Crew ahead of schedule, John trying to figure out how to deal with this accusation mess when he can't be objective about Hemogoblin's booty, and Jade fighting her way up to Washington. She has to meet up with John sometime this year, right? Right?! /eye twitches

And remember - Hemogoblin and Heir belong to Real Men Wear Tights. I'm just twisting their characters to suit my cruel, cruel whims. Seriously, how much more emotional trauma can I put them thro- A LOT.

ARC IV - ACCUSATION

TEN DAYS LATER

When his body hits a certain level of exhaustion, Karkat has no choice but to pass out cold, whether he's in the recooperacoon or sprawled out on the couch. This time he slogs into the house with the skintight costume still sticking to his skin beneath his much-battered hoodie and crawls onto the couch. The television is still on, the volume low as the screen lights the living room an eerie blue. It's four in the morning, and Crabdad is snoozing away on its back in a pile of discarded packaging and cardboard, one claw draped over the sink. Karkat can't help it; dragging the couch cushion sideways and punching it halfheartedly, he curls up and lets his eyes fall shut, the commercials still playing on the television and blaring light through his eyelids. He wishes he could avoid this, but he also knows when he's beat, and he can't avoid this anymore -

Karkat dreams -

Everything is a brilliant, molten gold. The towers around him rise up in elegant lines, fractals and whorls carved into the floors and the spiraling walls. Glittering arches and walkways crisscross each other at sharp angles and merge into smooth curves, a maze of potential paths. When he looks up, rubbing at his sore eyes, he can see an enormous golden planet on that fills the entire skyline, and he knows with that sick kind of knowing that he's gotten used to over the past few weeks that he's on a moon, looking down at the center of the planet the moon orbits.

A faint breeze runs through the spires, ruffling his pajamas. They're golden, too, an obnoxious bright yellow with white embellishments, something he'd never wear in his right mind. Only the shoes are right, a pair of scuffed, torn up grey sneakers that he remembers from - god, was it five years ago? He reaches down to feel at the seam where the canvas meets the rubber sole, and traces the thin line of stitching where he tried uselessly to rescue the damn things because he'd been a stubborn fuckface back in the day, and determined not to lose his favorite pair of sneakers to something as dumb as a hole in the instep.

If he looks behind him, he'll see something he doesn't want to see. In this case, he has a little leeway; he doesn't have to turn if he doesn't want to, goddammit. As he gets to his feet his eyes feel heavy, as though he's only barely able to keep them open.

By now, he's resigned to the dull dread that soaks into his bones, into his blood, a steady pulse of inbound horror that increases with every breath of clear air he breathes in. He shoves his claws into his pockets and waits, shoulders huddling up as he stares around miserably, gloomily trying to predict what form this latest nightmare will take.

Fuck, he just hopes it's not John. The last four nights out of five involved John in some way, and he isn't sure his heart can take that again. Whatever hidden shithole in his thinkpan these nightmares are clawing their way up out of, it must get some sick kick out of forcing Karkat to watch John walk into danger just by being his usual oblivious self. Way to fucking go, subconscious-Karkat.

Maybe if he could just close his eyes and wake up, he wouldn't have to deal with this sparkle gold pajama glitterfuck nonsense or the impending terror. But now that the dream has caught hold of his mind, he can't let it go.

Against the gold-and-black backdrop of the sky, an enormous chain clanks in the wind. It is wider across than Karkat is tall, and each link is as tall as a house, heavy and ponderous as they chain the moon to the golden planet below.

He's in the middle of speculating just how the fuck a structure this huge composed of gold can possibly exist - seriously, where would you get enough gold to sculpt an entire planet? It's a pretty tiny planet, but it's still a planet - when it hits. A rattle shakes the ground beneath Karkat, and he drops to his knees. He thinks, as long as he doesn't look behind him, he'll be okay.

The planet below erupts with green fire. It should be too far away for him to hear the screams, but he hears them anyway, the shrill mental cries of thousands in pain and panicking. The fire solidifies into tendrils of green light that swell and stab into the panels of gold that make up the planet's surface, uprooting enormous towers and crushing them before flinging the debris into space. More fires start wherever the green light passes, with explosive results.

This is not normal, something whispers in Karkat's mind. This is not the purpose of the Game. This is destruction, destruction without cause or meaning or end, the product of a mind deranged, in the grip of a power that cannot be contained. Karkat can only witness it, and each explosion is another stabbing pain in his heart.

He doesn't see the tiny dark figure in the midst of the green flames until it's far too late. The moon rocks again, and Karkat falls to the side, his eyes tracing the length of the golden chain until he sees the winged figure that raises a blade and slices through the thick links as deftly as though slicing through warm butter. For a moment, Karkat is weightless, and then the chain snaps entirely, with a shriek of metal that grates through the void and into his ears with the finality of a death rattle.
That's not what happened, he thinks to himself, vaguely, even as the winged creature raises a fist and another explosion of green blasts up at the moon. Karkat ducks, covering his head with his arms, but it's no use; when the blast hits, he goes flying, flung back against one of the spiraling towers with enough force to drive all the air out of his lungs.

He wheezes and strains, clutching at his chest because he can't breathe, and blinks through the golden dust kicked up by the explosion. He can feel how the moon has tilted sideways, but it's not until the ground lurches up beneath him and he slams hard on the golden plane, scrabbling at the angled floor to stop his roll, that he realizes the moon is in fact in pieces, and hurtling through space toward - something he cannot bear to look up at. He's on a relatively intact portion of the moon, but it soon begins to spin and rattle, and he can see the glorious golden spires above begin to peel and crack as they pick up speed. They're going to crash, he thinks dimly, and he almost wastes his hard-won breath by laughing at the stupidity of it all. At least John isn't here -this nightmare is almost bearable, except for the fact that Karkat doesn't see how it will end in anything but a really, really painful fall -

A hand claps on his shoulder, and for a moment he can't move. The fingernails dig into the silky fabric of these stupid fucking pajamas; he can only stare at the hand until, with a muffled yell, the hand's owner wrenches Karkat around to face him.

"Karkat! Karkat, we have to go!" John screams, shaking Karkat by the shoulders. His face is soft and young, a thirteen year old's face, and his glasses are wrong - they should be those dorky rectangular, thick-rimmed frames John wears with no irony whatsoever, not oval in shape with thin frames, almost sliding down his nose because they don't fit him properly. Whose glasses are those? They look like a woman's glasses, a girl's, even, and it's just weird on the shape of John's face -

"Get up, get up, get up," John chants, yanking on Karkat's arm with clutching hands, and Karkat through some miracle stumbles upright, just in time for the moon to rock beneath them again. John grips his hand and starts running, dragging Karkat along behind him. "We can't stay here, we have to move -"

"There's nowhere to go," Karkat replies, feeling dazed. Part of the enormous chain tumbles past them, a stray link of gold that slams into a broken tower and rotates the ground they're standing on another fifty degrees. Suddenly, they're falling forward, not running, and Karkat has to squeeze his eyes shut because he can't bear to look at what they're falling toward.

"Karkat, you have to get out of here! You have to wake up!"

"I don't think I can anymore. I think it's too late." Karkat can feel his legs dragging, but he can't make them move. He opens his eyes when he feels their trajectory shift again, and he looks up at John. John is half floating in the air, straining to float away from the tumbling heap of debris they're falling alongside, but he can barely move with Karkat weighing him down. Karkat would be wondering how they're levitating at all, but since when have these dreams made sense? "This isn't what happened, John. This isn't right."

"None of it is right!" John whirls around, his eyes that strange, unearthly blue that they always are in these nightmares, like a piercing reminder that this John is altered, unfamiliar, but no less precious. It's still agonizing to know this will end with him dying. Whatever the setting, whatever he looks like superficially, John is Karkat's moirail, and he can't stand this. "None of it is right, and that's why you have to wake up!"

Karkat feels his heart throb. John looks desperately earnest, and this is the first time Karkat's been able to interact with him so directly in one of these fucked up dreams. Usually, Karkat can only stand in one place and think frantic pleas at the oblivious dream-John as he walks to his doom; he doesn't know why they can interact this way in this particular nightmare. "John, I -"

The black sword comes out of nowhere. Maybe it's because Karkat has been so focused on not looking up at the thing they're falling toward, so caught up in trying to make sense of this conversation with John, that he just fails to see it coming.

It catches John right through the heart. Something hot and wet splatters down Karkat's face and pajamas, and he looks down to see the spray of bright red blood that paints a line across his chest. He looks up, mouth moving wordlessly, to meet John's eyes. Thirteen year old John simply looks puzzled, raising both hands toward the new stab wound in his torso. His face doesn't even crease in pain. He dies too fast for that. The blade tugs out, flecks of blood spraying outward as John clasps a hand over the hole in his chest. The human opens his mouth, and more dark strings of blood spill out, as though he coughed up a whole mouthful at once.

"Not again," John chokes out, sounding resigned. Then his eyes roll back and he topples forward.

Karkat catches him wordlessly. Well, that's not true. There's a faint, high-pitched whine emerging from between his lips, a sound that hurts his own ears to produce, and he gulps several times in sobbing hiccups, trying to repress the instinct to cry out. He feels light-headed, feeling more warm blood soaking through the front of his disgusting golden shirt. John is tiny and light, a child, and that doesn't make it any less real. He's seconds from breaking out into a full mourning keen, the sharp agony ripping through his chest, when he sees the creature that hovers in front of them, the thing that stabbed John.

He hiccups, shaking his head, and sees the thing that he shouldn't see on the backswing.

Everything else stops mattering.

Compared to the flickering rainbow of colors that eat up the entire horizon, the dark, wolf-headed creature snarling before him hardly seems worth notice. Karkat's brain shudders to a stop as he stares, horrified and fascinated in equal measure, at the static flashing on and off in the distance. They're falling right toward it, hurtling so fast he can see the white strips of nothingness between the static, and he can't look away. It's hypnotic, a wall of nothingness and color that consumes the black space around them.

When the winged wolf stabs him, he doesn't even feel it. His head is swirling and muggy with the flashing static, and he lets his head drop forward against John's hair. Vertigo swamps him as they tilt one last final time, and he -

- wakes the fuck up.

"- still reeling from the recent tragedy in New York City. Though the death toll comes out in the low hundreds, the damage to the city itself is extensive. Emergency teams and members of the Federal Villain Response Team continue to search for anyone who might be trapped in the wreckage of prominent landmarks, such as the Statue of Liberty, which sustained severe damage during the attack. -"

Karkat groans, tasting blood in his mouth. For a moment he panics, heart skipping a beat, before he licks at the blood and realizes at some point, during the nightmare, he bit his own tongue. He resists the urge to spit it out - he can't risk leaving a tell-tale candy red blood stain anywhere in the living room - until he rolls to his feet. His back aches a warning in retaliation for falling asleep twisted up on the couch like that, and he stretches his arms over his head as he pads into the kitchen. He steps over one of Crabdad's twitching legs and spits into the sink, running water to dilute the bright spots of red as they disappear down the drain. The TV continues to drone on behind him, having switched from terrible infomercials to the early morning news at some point. Going by the sliver of sun burning its way across the sky, Karkat would say he got maybe two hours of sleep - just enough to trigger one massively bizarre dream.

He's also managed to work himself up into a fear sweat, and he grimaces at the thought of how much time it's going to take to wash his Hemogoblin costume properly. Even his gills rub uncomfortably when he goes upstairs and starts stripping everything off. Everything is just shitastic, as per usual. Just in time to get ready for school.

- Karkat drives to school in a rare temper. Crabdad hadn't even had to harass him into leaving early; after he'd scrubbed himself down in the shower, adjusted his colored contacts over his irises, and stuffed his homework and textbooks into his waiting backpack, he stomped out the door with his keys in hand, ignoring the lusus's curious screech when he slams the door shut behind him with a bang. The shower did nothing to improve either his mood or his continued exhaustion - two hours of sleep outside of the replenishing embrace of sopor slime, plagued by the clusterfuckery of that nightmare, did not make for a restful night, alright? He pulls into his claimed parking space at school at a wild angle, growls and tears at his own hair, and then has to back up and pull in again.

This time, the car inches over the near side of the parking space, the wheel right up over the white line, and Karkat wants. To. Scream. Objectively, he can tell he's being more than a little compulsive, getting so wound up over a fucking parking space, but all he can really think is holy fuck Karkat you bulgefaced globofondling putrid bucket of failure and fuckmaggots why can you not get this one thing right?!

Bile rises up in the back of his throat, and he swallows hard, feeling close to just - just - fuck. He hasn't slept right in ten days, and it's starting to wear at him. He's not normally the picture of mental health and emotional stability, but right now he just wants to claw at his own temples until he scratches through to whatever glands are in charge of being the most useless shitstain on the face of the planet and rip them out, right along with the section of his thinkpan that produces those dreams.

Fuck. Fuck. Just calm the fuck down, you raging idiot.

Karkat hiccups a few times, flexing his claws as he waits for the wave of shocky fury to run out of him. The gulping hiccups help a little, breaking his ragged breathing out of the rage-pants, and he feels himself start to settle down. He can't rely on John to calm his ragetits all the time. Sure, they're moirails, but Karkat's had so many minor meltdowns in the past few weeks that he'd just feel like even more of a dick if he kept begging for shooshes 24/7. That's what moirails are for, technically, but John is human, and Karkat is painfully aware that he's been the one who's leaning heavily on the needy side of the scale, not John. John still has that air around him sometimes, that quiet depression that tinges his smile at the oddest moments, but as far as Karkat knows the lowest John felt recently was a single quiet moment Tuesday night, when they'd both piled in Karkat's room. John had that twist to his expression that said he was overthinking something and needed a good shooshcuddle before Karkat let him go, and Karkat had naturally obliged.

Since then John has seemed relatively level-headed. Humans don't need moirallegiance as fundamentally as trolls do to maintain their stability, and Karkat can't help but remember that whenever he feels his bloodpusher working up into a new frenzy.

He just needs these dreams to stop. He is utterly convinced that if he could just get back to his old pattern of mild insomnia and dreamless sleep, he'd be a whole lot more stable, instead of running around all the time shitting miles of paniacsnes whenever he has to watch John die in new and more creative ways at night. The fact that it's his moirail who keeps dying in his head is clearly aggravating the situation.

Karkat is early enough that the hallways are deserted, and half the automated lights haven't been triggered yet. The janitor raises an eyebrow at him and nods, because as sad as it is, this isn't the first time Karkat has shown up so early. Hell, this is almost a regular occurrence. He doesn't even want to know why the school's staff thinks he shows up this early every day.

He hides out in the theater room, adjusting set pieces and cleaning up some of the mess the imbeciles from seventh period left behind for the morning classes to deal with, until it's not an ungodly hour in the morning, and he starts to hear the murmur of voices and the screech of sneakers on tile through the door. Retrieving his backpack, he tugs on his rust red and black hoodie and ventures out into the hallway. He keeps his head down until he reaches his locker and then sags against the wall, shoving his glasses up the bridge of his nose. He glowers when a pair of girls - sophomores, he thinks - struggle to set up a folding table by the hallway entrance; not that he's actually pissed at them, but just to have something to glare at. Also, because with the way they're positioning that goddamn table, they're going to cut off half the hallway and make the congested traffic of students even worse during passing periods. One of them tapes a handmade sign with 'New York Relief Donation Drive!' in huge letters onto the wall, while the other ducks into a nearby language classroom to steal a pair of chairs.

He's only surprised it's taken them this long to put this kind of thing together. He knows at least three churches in the area have had similar canned good drives and donation rackets running for the past week, with their collections going to the Red Cross to pass on to refugees from New York City.

Sure enough, as first period draws near and more people begin to funnel into the halls, yelling to be heard over the general hum of the crowd, the presence of the table sticking out into the middle of the hall fucks with everyone's routine, and more than a few people push past the table, exasperated, without looking at the sign. After a few minutes of answering shouted questions, the two girls just look chagrined. Karkat rolls his eyes at the stupidity of it all. At least this brand of stupidity isn't too rage-inducing, though; as long as he keeps his head down and his mind on the fast approaching arrival of John and a thermos of delicious, delicious coffee, he can keep himself functioning.

A few minutes later, he feels a prickling along his spine, and he looks up, unerringly, to see John's head of messy black hair appear in the muddle of trolls and humans. John is looking down at something in his hands, so Karkat takes the opportunity to turn around and unlock his locker, pretending to busy himself with reorganizing it.

A minute passes. Two. Frowning, Karkat peeks over his shoulder at where he saw John last. He knows that was John - it would be impossible for him to mistake anyone else's hair for his moirail's - John is standing awkwardly a few feet from Karkat, gnawing at his lip as he squints down at his phone screen, and taps quickly on the keypad. The blessed thermos of hot coffee is pinned between John's arm and his side, and Karkat starts to instinctively salivate at the sight of it.

A minute passes. Two. Frowning, Karkat peers over his shoulder at where he saw John last. He knows that was John - it would be impossible for him to mistake anyone else's hair for his moirail's - John is standing awkwardly a few feet from Karkat, gnawing at his lip as he squints down at his phone screen, and taps quickly on the keypad. The blessed thermos of hot coffee is pinned between John's arm and his side, and Karkat starts to instinctively salivate at the sight of it.

His intense, renewed desire for caffeine, however, doesn't distract him from the fact that John is really, really engaged in whatever the hell he's doing on that phone. Which is - downright bizarre. Karkat has caught the guy checking his phone more often at lunch these past few days, but he's never been in a texting frenzy like this, to Karkat's knowledge. And John isn't much of one for playing game apps. Curious, Karkat takes the initiative, slamming his locker shut and stomping to John's side. "Gimme," he mutters, prying the thermos out of John's grip.
John obliges, his dark brown eyes flickering to Karkat behind his nice square glasses frames. He smiles, and then his eyes are instantly drawn back to the lines of red text that mysteriously flood his screen in that moment's pause. "Yeah, no, enough of that," John mutters, clicking out of the Pesterchum app and sliding his phone into his pocket. He rolls his eyes at Karkat and grins with more enthusiasm. "Sorry about that, Karkat. How are you today?"

As always, John's smile is like some corny, poetic sun, warming up Karkat's thoracic cavity and getting his pale glands all tingly. Already he can feel some of that earlier panic leaching away, the claustrophobic pressure eased by the sight of his moirail whole and smiling and very much alive. If they weren't surrounded by a mob of witnesses, Karkat would lean in and hug John, just to have his heart beating close enough that Karkat could feel the pulse in John's blood, reassuring him with every beat that it hasn't stopped.

But it doesn't make him forget that red text. He thinks vaguely that it was kind of familiar, but he can't place it. Maybe he only saw it briefly before? Whatever it is, the conversation was clearly significant enough that John had been thoroughly engaged even after approaching Karkat.

Karkat shakes off the urge to hug John and shrugs. "M'fine," he manages, the most he's really willing to say without significantly more coffee in his system. To remedy the deficit, he takes a long pull from the thermos, nearly tearing up a little at the deliciously hot rush of liquid that runs down his throat. "Something urgent?" he asks afterward, tilting his chin toward the phone in John's pocket.

And okay, if the incessant texting hadn't been uncharacteristic enough, little warning bells go off in Karkat's thinkpan when John jumps, the faint hint of a blush heating up his face before he claps a hand over the phone in his pocket. "What - oh, that chat? No - nothing urgent," the human says, his smile one-sided and nervous when he tries to beam at Karkat. "Ah, just a friend."

Karkat has the thermos to his lips again, and after that little comment he nearly spits coffee everywhere, his mouth hanging open a little too wide as he squints at John, dumbfounded. The next word out of his mouth make him sound like the most insufferable, jealous, overly-protective moirail in the history of pale rom-coms. "Who?!"

He almost slaps himself, cringing inwardly. Jesus fucking Christ, Karkat, you don't need to know every detail of the guy's friendships, the rational part of his brain yells, except the rational part of his brain can go fuck itself with a rusty fire hydrant because it completely failed to prevent the dream section from foisting a bunch of fucked up nightmares onto Karkat in the first place.

But seriously. Karkat can literally count with one claw the number of people John has outright declared to be his friend - one claw, and only one. Rose Lalonde has come up a few times recently, because she and John are apparently trying to rekindle their old friendship after that weird three year gap - but Karkat has seen the tail end of John's pesterings with her before, and he knows for a goddamn fact that her text is a pale pinkish purple.

Red is totally new. Hey, he's a little justified in being curious, right?

"Ahhh, some kid on Pesterchum," John says, a weird note in his voice. "His name is Dave!" Then, taking advantage of Karkat's pause to sip at his coffee, John speeds right along into, "Also, my dad totally wants you and Crabdad to come over for dinner tonight. Do you think you guys can make it?"

Karkat nearly breathes pure coffee, and struggles to keep from choking on it before swallowing quickly. "Fu- Yeah, probably," he gasps. "Let me guess - some kind of informal 'your lusus is retiring at last' celebratory party?"

John frowns at him reproachfully. "No, some kind of informal 'oooh noooo, your lusus is retiring, we should all say goodbye properly' party that's not celebratory at all."

Karkat snorts, leaning against the wall while John sorts through his textbooks. "Fine. You and Dadbert can mourn the impending retirement of the screeching custodial crab monster. I'll even make some disgustingly unhealthy pie so you two can eat your feelings while I set off the commemorative fireworks in the backyard."

"I'll hold you to that! Uh, but not the fireworks thing. I think my dad might not like that. By the way, I like your hoodie - Deadpool!" John grins toothily, going through his own locker hurriedly as the hallways begins to clear up. "Come on, we better hurry."

They are pushing it a little; generally they're both the first ones in their respective classrooms, but Karkat is going to need to hurry if he wants to make Theater on time.

Of course, just because John thinks he has successfully sidetracked Karkat does not mean he's letting this Dave thing go. "Yeah, fine. Have fun with that quiz second period." Karkat flaps a hand at John, waving him off.

John pulls a face, but he's still laughing a little as he heads off down the hallway. As though John has ever worried about quizzes a day of his life. Rolling his eyes just because he has a reputation to maintain, damn it, no matter how much friendship with John has tried to destroy it, Karkat walks in the opposite direction, back toward the fine arts hall.

But at least now he has something to take his mind off the nightmares. Maybe he's overcompensating a little, but he is genuinely curious about this new red-text-Dave-human, and he runs through a mental checklist of the Daves he can think of who attend their school. He's coming up blank for any that he might have seen interact with John recently, though. When he figures it out, rest assured he will be interrogating this son of a bitch thoroughly.

Because Karkat had thought John was exaggerating a year and a half ago, when he apologized for his overenthusiastic friend-making attempts with the excuse of having never made a friend before. But hell if Karkat hasn’t slowly come to the conclusion that it’s all too accurate an assessment. Apparently John Egbert, winner of the most disgustingly, sincerely nice person on the planet award nineteen years running, has had a grand total of two friends – one of them Karkat, so he really got the short end of the horns there (ha fucking ha), and one of them the Rose girl he’d known in elementary school who had moved across the country years ago before cutting John off completely. If John didn’t have the buffer of the swim team, whose members sometimes welcome him to eat at team lunches, he would literally have no social life at all outside of Karkat.

And he’s okay with that. The idiot smiles at Karkat when he asks about it, and says he understands. He has some fucked up idea that just because he has a packed schedule so full of volunteering and swim practices that makes it difficult to plan afterschool excursions, that this somehow excuses the entire rest of the world for being fuckfaces unable to perceive and appreciate the glory that is Friendship With John. John has a sense of humor, looks, and enough sappy kindness to smother even the obnoxiously hateful of trolls. Karkat’s experienced the John phenomenon for himself, after all.

And yet, somehow, John has no other friends.

It’s maddening. It makes Karkat’s bloodpusher skyrocket dangerously, makes him want to find whatever sick power decided John Egbert deserved to be lonely and throttle them until they explode in a satisfying pop of internal organs and righteous vengeance. He barely restrains himself from royally losing his shit whenever one of the fuckwads from this miserable excuse for a high school has the nerve to approach John so late in the game; how do they think they’re deserving of a goddamn catch like John when they’ve ignored him all these years?

So yeah.

This Dave guy?

He's got some explaining to do.

EB: you know i was joking, right?
EB: you don't actually have to make pie. like, seriously, we have more baked goods in this house that we could ever eat in a million years.
CG: SHUT UP JOHN, NOW IT'S A MATTER OF PRIDE.
EB: ...this is going to be hilarious, isn't it. :D
CG: I SAID SHUT UP AND GIVE ME THE RECIPE.
EB: allllright, you asked for it!

CG: WHY THE HELL IS THERE ALL THESE EXTRA STEPS?
EB: it's for the crust! :P
CG: WHAT NO I HAVE PREMADE CRUST NO WAY DO I HAVE TIME TO MAKE THIS GODFORSAKEN ABOMINATION IF I HAVE TO MAKE CRUST TOO.
EB: karkat vantas
EB: take out that box of premade blasphemy and look at the label
CG: THE HUGE BLUE GODDAMN CIRCLE THAT SAYS 'PILLSBURY'?
EB: exactly!
CG: I DON'T FUCKING FOLLOW JOHN WHY IS THIS SIGNIFICANT?
EB: do you even know who owns pillsbury??
CG: GENERAL FUCKING MILLS -
CG: OH MY THROBBING PHLEGM LOBE NO THIS ISN'T ABOUT BETTY CROCKER AGAIN IS IT
EB: of course it is! don't you know that general mills owns the betty crocker label?! they're practically the same thing! :P
EB: pillsbury bravely opposed them for years before they got totally bought out in 2001 or something.
EB: the batterwitch has her evil claws in everything, karkat! you have to be more careful!
CG: YOU DO REALIZE THERE IS NO SUCH THING AS A BATTERWITCH, RIGHT? THE CONDESCE BASICALLY OWNS ALL THE STOCK OPTIONS, BETTY CROCKER WAS NEVER EVEN A REAL PERSON.
EB: you're right.
EB: she was more than that.
EB: she was a symbol of pure, unadulterated evil in pastry form, someone who transcended mortal bounds in her diabolical quest to corrupt all major baking brand names.
EB: the condesce is just the latest in a long line of figureheads who will no doubt be sucked dry by the demands of the batterwitch’s legacy.

EB: just make the crust, karkat ;/
CG: FINE, BUT ONLY BECAUSE YOUR BETTY CROCKER-PHOBIA IS THE MOST BIZARRELY PITIFUL THING I'VE EVER HEARD OF EB: keep me posted!
CG: YEAH, YEAH
Karkat shoves his phone to a safe corner of the kitchen counter and surveys the mess of ingredients he's pillaged from different hidden corners of the kitchen. He glowers wistfully at the blue box of Pillsbury pie crust mix, before kicking it off the counter with a roundhouse, so hard it slams into the wall opposite and slides to the ground. As tempted as he is to just use it and not tell John, he knows better; John and his dad are absolute fiends about baked goods, and while John may not eat half the cakes and cookies his dad puts out on a daily basis, knowing the two of them they can probably identify premade pie crust with a single bite. In Samuel Egbert's case, Karkat would just put it down to a discerning taste born of personal baking talent and years of experience with taste-testing his own creations; John, he's pretty sure, is just paranoid out of some misplaced survival instinct that has caused him to abhor and abjure anything even vaguely related to the name of Betty Crocker.

Anyway. He's going to have to fly through this stupid excuse for an experiment if he wants to finish on time. The recipe John sent over just says the pie needs to bake for about fifty minutes, but that doesn't count all the prep time that goes into it before it's even ready for the oven.

And Karkat has a unique obstacle that he's going to have to fucking deal with all the while he's trying to cook this thing.

A quizzical skree echoes down from above, and Karkat shudders. Crabdad has been on a cleaning spree all day, which for the lusus means rampaging around the house with a broom and smacking the walls and ceiling in an ill-fated attempt at...something. Karkat's just always called it 'cleaning' for lack of a more accurate word for 'stupid jackfuckery.'

For now, he just needs to keep the lusus from gorging itself on the ingredients before Karkat even finishes making the damn pie. Crabdad might prefer iced seafood, but it will quite honestly devour everything in its path like the stark raving insane sea monster that it is, and that includes stuff like flour and entire plastic jars full of nutmeg.

Soon, he won't have to deal with this anymore. John can pity the giantass crab all he likes, but Karkat is going to be fucking ecstatic to have this place to himself, without the lusus to embarrass him all the damn time. Sometimes Karkat wonders what asshole in the grub care facility matched him up with a goddamn sea lusus. He speculates it was probably the same dick he's grudgingly grateful to for covering up Karkat's true hemotype when filling out his certificate of pupation, but seriously, it's a known fact that sea lusii are twice as much work to deal with compared to land lusii. Not only that, but it stands out that such a lowblood has a traditionally aquatic lusus when they're generally reserved for seadwellers by the coast, and he's actually had to field awkward questions about it, questions that always make him snap and lay low for a few days before daring to go out in public again. Maybe it had been intended to pander to his creepy mutant gills, but Karkat does not appreciate the sympathy, not in this case.

He drags the table over in front of the entry to the kitchen and sets an open jar of almond butter where it will be the first thing Crabdad sees when he is drawn downstairs by Karkat cooking. He used to have regular peanut butter, until one day John decided to reveal the TOTALLY RELEVANT FACT that he was DEATHLY ALLERGIC to peanut butter. Karkat, who had just taken the jar of Jif's out of the pantry, literally flung the peanut butter jar out the closed window in a fit of panicked rage, shattering the glass and setting off Crabdad for a good hour. Karkat had hyperventilated for a good fifteen minutes and then scrubbed the entire pantry down with bleach even after John assured him the allergic reaction only really kicked in if he accidentally ate peanut byproducts, which wasn't reassuring at all because what if Karkat had fucked up and made shitty peanut butter cookies and accidentally killed his moirail by not mentioning the peanuts?!
Yeah, he's a little neurotic. He doesn't even try to hide it anymore.

He starts flinging the extra crust ingredients into a bowl first, giving the oven a few good kicks until the piece of shit starts heating up. The crust alone requires a fuckton of flour and butter, and he starts angrily mashing things together with a spoon, flicking through the tiny sideways view of the instructions on his phone. He hears, rather than sees, Crabdad slip and fall down the last five stairs, the lusus shrieking and clicking as it scrabbles to get purchase on the smooth wooden floor of the entryway. They've been in this house for nearly two goddamn years, and the insipid, brainless excuse for a custodian has yet to master something as simple as stairs. The frantic skrees transition into peals of delight when the lusus discovers the jar of almond butter. Karkat turns and grimaces, just in time to see Crabdad try and fail to jam its entire fat head into the jar, clicking desperately at the butter within.

But at least that will keep the dumb shit occupied for a while. Covering the crust mix with a towel and shoving it as far from the edge of the counter as possible, Karkat starts in on the filling. This is the part that involves all the spices and slicing the apples, and Karkat is absolutely shitty at slicing things when he has to use a knife instead of a sickle, and oh shit Crabdad got sick of the almond butter. An enormous white claw looms in his awful peripheral vision and Karkat shrieks with rage, whacking the claw with the butt of the knife. Undeterred, Crabdad seizes a dark bottle of vanilla extract and scrapes at the twist lid with its other claw, chirruping inquisitively.

Karkat is just horrified. "Wha- NO. NO. BAD CRABDAD, BAD!” He snatches the bottle back just as it begins to slide out of the lusus's clumsy grip. Crabdad shrieks in response, raising its pincers, and no, no, no, this is exactly what Karkat wanted to avoid. The last thing he wants right now is to start some strife with his fucking custodian while he's trying to concentrate! Crabdad thumps him one in the chest, a playful blow by giant crab standards, and Karkat nearly plants his hand in the bowl of pie crust dough when he falls backwards.

"NO, FUCK OFF, I MEAN IT!” Leaning hard on the counter, he kicks as high as he can and clips Crabdad across the nose. The lusus barely seems to feel it, because it's a fucking monster, dammit. Karkat can take down adult trolls all the way up to paler bluebloods with a single well-aimed blow, but he can't even manage to stun Crabdad. Fucking sea lusii and their fucking nigh-invulnerability and their fucking fuck fuckery he does not have time for this.

Feeling around on the counter behind him without looking away, Karkat seizes his backup weapon, shaking the package enticingly. Crabdad perks up instantly, shocked out of strife-mode by the sound of food. "Look, you see the frozen corn?” Karkat asks wearily. The lusus whines. Karkat lobes the entire package over Crabdad's head; it lands somewhere with a thump in the living room beyond. Being an idiot, the lusus jerks around, instantly drawn to the nearest moving foodstuff, and flails after it, claws clacking together as it shuffles away.

"Go get it!” Karkat yells encouragingly, before sagging back against the counter. Weary and exasperated, he turns back to his work.

CG: HOW BAD WOULD IT BE IF I MURDERED MY LUSUS BEFORE THE GOODBYE LUSUS PARTY?
EB: karkaaatat
CG: HYPOTHETICALLY, JOHN, I HAVEN'T FOLLOWED THROUGH YET
EB: i'm not helping you decide whether or not to attack your totally nice custodian just because he annoys you a little.
CG: OH, HOW LITTLE YOU KNOW, JOHN. HOW WELL THE MONSTER CRAB HAS BLINDED YOU TO THE TRUE DEPTHS OF ITS IDIOCY.
EB: haha, karkat, ha. ha.
EB: how's the pie going? do you need any tips? :)
CG: IT'S BASICALLY
CG: DONE
CG: IS I THINK THE BEST WORD FOR IT
EB: ???
EB: whoooooa
EB: so your oven didn't explode or anything? the apples didn't disappear mysteriously into a giant crab-shaped black hole? :o
CG: YOU'RE A FUCKING COMEDIAN, JOHN

Karkat stares in tired horror at the giant crab currently trying to claw at the cardboard box he stuffed on top of its head, and covers the pie with one last protective layer of saran wrap before shaking his head to go help the imbecile get ready to go out in public.

- By all rights, dinner should have been an unmitigated disaster. It's not like Crabdad has any kind of self-control; from the moment Karkat herds the lusus down the street and through the Egbert's front door, Crabdad is in ecstasy. It had obediently followed Karkat to the Egbert house after hearing that John would be there, but everything falls into its usual crab-induced chaos when John opens the door, grinning widely, and Crabdad tackles him with a greeting screech. John takes it like a fucking champ, somehow not falling over under the crab's enthusiastic charge, and giggles like an idiot when Crabdad starts trying to groom the poor guy with its meaty claws.

By the time Karkat pries the fatass off John, the kid's hair is even more of a wreck than usual, and Samuel Egbert has somehow emerged from the kitchen, removed the offering of pie from Karkat's free hand, and greeted him before sailing away back toward the dinner table, as unruffled and classy as ever. Those two days nearly a fortnight ago, when Karkat had seen John's dad slightly less than put together, seem more like some weird hallucination he had than anything else.

Everything tastes delicious, as usual. It's hard to tell who manages to eat more, Crabdad or John; seriously, John can sometimes give the lusus a run for its money, but because Crabdad gets an entire side of the table to itself to make room for its flailing antics throughout dinner, Karkat can't get an accurate estimate on how much it eats. He's too busy fielding awkward questions from Samuel, constantly checking his automatic foul mouth so he doesn't start swearing like a fucking sailor in front of John's dad again. He has to make up for Crabdad's nonexistent manners somehow. John, of course, can sense every time Karkat has to censor himself an ungodly amount, and starts coincidentally giggling like a maniac whenever Karkat stammers through another sentence. He tries to cover it up with a cough, but it's just as fucking obvious that he's laughing when he coughs all through Karkat's accidental tirade about the state of the comic selection at the new place that opened up downtown.

The problem is Karkat can't even get properly outraged about it. It's all just fucking endearing. Fuck, John could be the most giggly little shit on the face of the planet and Karkat would still want to snap at him and then wrap him in a blanket and pap his face until the derpy laughter stops.

Thankfully he only gets stupid like this when Karkat tries to restrain himself, which doesn't happen often. John's habit of finding Karkat's enraged rants amusing may be mildly infuriating, but at least he's usually civil about it. Karkat rants, John is good-naturedly earnest, and together they're paler than the driven snow.

Pale serendipity. Bluhhhhhh.

...Shit. Now John has Karkat thinking that dumb sigh, too. It just keeps happening, and he is perversely both annoyed and ridiculously happy that it does. Like fuck if he'll ever admit that out loud, though.

"Yeah, I think we can just skip this part," Karkat starts babbling when Samuel Egbert tries to bring the apple pie over. "Just feed it to Crabdad, seriously, it's been after the damn thing all night long anyway -"

"Nonsense, Karkat!" John's dad says, with a brilliant, understanding smile that Karkat has seen on John's face enough to recognize it as the standard Egbertian 'let's tease Karkat' grin. Agghh. "There's more than enough for everyone to try it, even if we do give a half to good Crabdad, here." He turns that hospitable smile on Crabdad, who naturally realizes that someone is talking about it and food in the same sentence and skrees in eager reply.
"I want it on fu- on record that I am totally opposed to this plan," Karkat insists, eyeing the slice Dad Egbert passes to him with a wary glare. "Seriously, I don't bake all the time like you guys, and knowing me I've managed to f- mess up the most basic recipe John could come up with. Just - shit, please don't judge me based on this, Mr Egbert, I never meant to inflict my cooking on you guys."

"Relax, Karkat, it's probably fine," John says soothingly, one foot kicking at Karkat's under the table. Karkat feels the impending attack of self-deprecation ease off almost immediately, and he taps John's foot back to let him know the moirailing on the fly was appreciated. The way John always manages to balance him out is amazing.

"Of course, a first attempt at a pie always has some room for improvement," Samuel adds, placing a forkful of pie into his mouth. Karkat tenses up so fast he nearly falls out of his chair, staring in horror as the elder Egbert chews and swallows without a word. All the elder human does is hum, nod to himself, and take another bite, with no visible reaction to tell Karkat if the pie was awful or not.

John just rolls his eyes when Karkat stares at him beseechingly, shoveling a heaping forkful into his mouth with less decorum. He tilts his head to the side, then grins. "See? It's totally fine, Karkat, jeez!"

Karkat slumps back against his chair, nearly tipping it over backward. "Yeah, right," he mutters, burying his inner relief somewhere deep down where no one would ever see it. Ever. He prods at his own slice with a fork, but doesn't really have it in him to taste it. He knows nothing he made could possibly match up to the majestic works of art John attempts to feed him on a daily basis. Instead, he lets his mind drift a little, just glad that the pie didn't poison the Egberts within the first ten seconds of consumption.

The teal-blooded newscaster has been cycling through the usual spiel about New York. The Egberts always seem to have this news channel on lately, apparently because the Rose girl John knows lived just outside the path of destruction Dark Star carved down the middle of the state, and they want to keep up on the progress of the reconstruction efforts. Usually, all three of them tune it out, though, once the reports shift into bland repetitions of the same facts everyone's been hearing about for weeks. It's not until the newscaster's tone suddenly raises slightly, with renewed interest, that her words break through Karkat's food coma and draw his reluctant attention.

"And in local news, after almost two weeks with no word from the Seattle PD about any leads in the ongoing investigation into the explosion that injured five officers and three civilians at the police headquarters, Deputy Chief Frasier has called a press conference to discuss new evidence that may shed light on the identity of the perpetrators -"

"Oh, are they talking about the breakout again?" John says, twisting in his seat to look at the screen. His mouth turns down at the side though, a twist of resignation and bored, and Karkat knows exactly how he feels. Every since Hearts Boxcars's escape from Seattle, there's been at least one news segment every night, sandwiched between reports about New York, on how the police have no leads on where the escaped Crew member has gone, nor on the identity of the supposed lawyer who brought the bomb materials in the first place. After all this goddamn waffling, Karkat can't really bring himself take some random press release seriously. Hemogoblin saw the lawyer's face, of course, during that stupid scene by the docks, but he hasn't seen the man around the city at all during his rounds.

"Looks like," is all he mutters, letting his head fall on the curve of his arm as he leans back against the chair to watch the uniformed human that walks up behind a shitty podium. The deputy chief tugs at the collar of his starched shirt, and Karkat snorts when he sees the man is already sweating profusely. He's got a lot of respect for the police in general - and a healthy amount of apprehension, too, given his mutation would be grounds for arrest at the very least if discovered - but on an individual basis? The deputy chief gets a lot of air time, seemingly because he's the only one on the force willing to sweat his way through an interview without caring that he looks like he's about to collapse dead of a stroke at any given moment.

"As a representative of the Seattle police department," the human begins, swabbing at his forehead, "I am pleased to inform the public that we have a suspect that we will be pursuing henceforth as the investigation into the explosions continues -"

It only catches Karkat's attention because he's become so used to the media referring to the explosions that night as one singular event; raising an eyebrow, he wonders if they got the evidence to identify a suspect not just from the eye witnesses for the first explosion in the holding room, but from the rooftop one as well. He sips at his water, trying to think whether Hearts or the lawyer would have had the time to set up that pipe bomb, anyway, or if they'd have delegated to another Crew lackey...

A picture of someone weirdly familiar appears on screen. It takes five long seconds, and John shrieking, "WHAT?!" before Karkat realizes he's looking at Hemogoblin.

He's looking at himself.

He chokes on the water properly this time, his throat seizing up as he coughs, smacking at his own chest as he stares at the television screen, horrified. It's one of the grainy, blown-up pictures from the newspapers, with half of Hemogoblin's profile in shadow as he turns a corner, but it's still him and holy fuck they can't possibly be saying -

"Numerous police accounts place the vigilante called Hemogoblin near the police station shortly after the initial explosion," the deputy chief continues, drawing out a tissue to dab at his face. "In addition, blood evidence found on the roof of the building has been confirmed to be a sample of mutated troll blood, with levels of soporific residue that would be atypical in a human blood sample, indicating that this Hemogoblin was present for the second explosion as well -"

"What the ACTUAL FUCK?!" Karkat yells hoarsely, slamming his glass down on the table.

"Language!" Dad Egbert says, but his voice is just as disbelieving as Karkat's and John's.

John is the one who lunges for the remote control on the back of the couch and dials up the volume, as though hearing this condemnation any louder will make it go away. There's no way this is real, Karkat thinks, shoving back his chair and joining John by the couch. This is just - how on earth did the fact that Hemogoblin got fucking blown the fuck up somehow make him a suspect in said explosion?!

But with a sinking sensation in his gut, Karkat is already starting to realize he made more than a few horrible mistakes that night. He had been so furious, so caught up in recapturing Hearts Boxcars, that he hadn't even thought about all the blood that might have been left behind on the roof, all the incriminating mutant troll blood he just left lying there for everyone and their nublicking mother to find.

Fuck, fuck, he fucked up, he's fucked up so bad -

Oh fuck, he's gonna be sick, but no he can't, not in front of John and his dad. For any normal person, this news bulletin would be weird and worrying, not grounds for nausea and horror, and Karkat wouldn't be able to explain why he felt that way. Karkat sways, his throat working as he swallows rapidly, trying to hold the bile back as he presses a hand over his mouth.
"In the spirit of cooperation, we are asking that Hemogoblin turn himself in for further questioning, so that we can get the truth of what happened that night out to the general public," that panmelted imbecile of a deputy chief continues, oblivious to the fact that he's a raging moron. "Hopefully this all turns out to be a misunderstanding. No, this does not in any way reflect on how the Seattle police department deals with Heir."

John is shaking. Karkat is freaking out but he can still feel that John is shuddering next to him, his hand crushing the remote control as he stares at the television screen. And yeah, shit, John is a massive Hemogoblin fan, god only knows why. Karkat can't handle imagining what it would be like to hear Heir had been accused of this kind of bullshit, not with his head so full of panic and disbelief, but he can pull his head out of his nook and grab his shaking moirail around the shoulders. He swallows and has to lick his lips a few times before he can make actual words come out. "John. John, hey, you alright?"

There's a delay before John answers, shaking his head slightly and rubbing his eyes, tearing them away from the TV. "I - yeah, I just - what the hell?" he demands weakly.

Karkat laughs just as pathetically in return, the sound so painfully forced that he winces and has to fight back a new twist of nausea in his stomach. "Un-fucking-believable, I know. What are they thinking?"

"John," Samuel says from somewhere behind them, and Crabdad gives a wondering, worried skree. At his dad's stern tone John stiffens in Karkat's arms, facing Samuel. "Karkat," the man says next, and Karkat reluctantly turns to look, too, certain that the guilt and despair are written all over his face. Samuel Egbert stands at military attention by the table in the kitchen, his eyes sharp with something unreadable even as he smiles at Karkat. "I understand that this is unexpected, Karkat, but I think it's time you got Crabdad here home," he says, gesturing at the lusus. In the two minutes Karkat looked away from the damn thing, it has begun to stuff the Egbert's table cloth into its mouth.

Karkat has to swallow again and count to ten under his breath before he feels calm enough to answer without screaming. "I - yeah, fu- I'll get it out of your way," he says, his mind still reeling. John is finally hugging him back a little, his hands on Karkat's waist, but this - this isn't something his moirail can shoosh away. This is a crisis he can't even talk to John about, no matter how much he wants to rant about it. "This is - yeah, John, I'll text you when I get Crabdad back, okay?" he asks.

John nods faintly, still looking as pasty and sick as Karkat feels, and agh fuck, Karkat hugs him hard, gripping the back of the kid's neck and humming a shoosh under his breath. God, the last thing he needs hanging over his head right now is the thought that he might fail as a palemate just because he fucked up his own alter ego's life and can't concentrate right now. John's grip on his waist tightens momentarily, and Karkat leans on him for a long moment before letting go. At least now he feels steady enough to make it back to the house with Crabdad.

He wishes he could just stay and pile it out with John. But a much bigger part of his mind is urging him to get the hell out of there before he really does puke. It's nearly seven o'clock, and he's suddenly faced with a night of being considered a suspect in a criminal investigation.

He needs to think this through, and he won't be able to do that if he's all wrapped up in John, like he wants to be. "Y-yeah, I'll get him out of your hair," he repeats, smoothing John's hands when he tugs his waist out of the kid's grip. "Come on, Crabdad, stop wrecking their things. We need to go home now."

Crabdad looks up from its impromptu table cloth feast and almost has the decency to look concerned when it skrees. It obeys when Karkat drags it away from the table, and only ruffles John's hair once before Karkat drags him out the door and into the evening air.
When they get home Karkat ditches the lusus downstairs and slams the door behind him, letting out the panicked hiss that he's been sitting on this entire time. Frantic, he tears his flannel off and runs to the ablutions block, twisting the knobs on the sink until the water is ice cold. Removing his glasses with unsteady hands, he sticks his entire head under, gasping and spluttering, his gills protesting at the action as he inhales both air and water. When he emerges his hair is plastered to his face and his horns, and he has to comb it back, scraping at his own skin with his claws in his shaky haste. Wiping at his face, he walks back to the bedroom, trying to get a hold of himself. The cold water shocked a little bit of the blind panic out of his system, but he still feels sick to his stomach.

He doesn't know what to do. This is completely beyond the scope of what he'd anticipated for his tenure as a hero. I mean, come on, I've only been on the job a few months! he thinks, yanking his costume out from under the floorboard and shaking it out. The line of blood that forms the cross of the H on its chest jolts him - John's blood is everywhere and he can't think, can't breathe - and then he shakes his head. He tries to think it through rationally, like a sane troll, instead of just shredding the incriminating costume, which is his hair trigger reaction after that unpleasant flashback.

The problem is, he knows he can't trust comic book logic here. In fiction, heroes can clear their name simply by catching the actual perpetrator - but real life doesn't actually work like that. Karkat knows just from the mess when Hearts Boxcars was released on bail the first time Heir caught him that the Midnight Crew doesn't just admit to crimes when they've been caught. He's going to need hard evidence that he was totally uninvolved in the explosions - evidence he doesn't have. The hazards of being an anonymous hero.

Heir has never been accused of something like this, to Karkat's knowledge - he started young, maybe twelve, too young for people to ever believe he'd commit a crime on purpose, and by now his reputation for good is so established in Seattle that the question of the legality of Heir's crime-fighting never really comes up. Some heroes like Flashstep and the Puppeteer just ignore accusations and act as full-fledged vigilantes, never confirming or denying or even responding to allegations of criminal activity, at odds with their local police. But Hemogoblin can't afford that kind of negative press. Hell, he can't even afford* this* much negative attention. Being announced as a suspect in what is probably labeled as an act of terrorism? Fuck, the counter-terrorism fuckwads could be all over him within a week, swarming the city and making it impossible for him to do hero work. And with evidence that Hemogoblin is definitely a blood mutant, not just faking the candy red for the aesthetic -

His breath catches.

He has to prove his innocence, and he has to do it without turning himself it to the police. That's just - not even an option. Not now that Hemogoblin's blood is on record.

But how?

Huffing, he yanks off his pants and steps into the uniform, his hands fumbling several times as he pulls it on.

If he tries to lie low and skip out on hero work until this dies down, it'll only make him seem guiltier. And there's only one person in the city who might be able to help him sort this whole mess out, who Hemogoblin can possibly ask for advice.

That is, if Heir doesn't just arrest him on sight…

Rose finds herself in a rather exhilarating new position.

She is remaking her mind.

It is a daunting task, to be sure, but one that she has deliberated and meditated upon extensively over the past week and a half. She has come to the conclusion that it is necessary, unavoidable, even. The only question that remains is whether or not she can do this here and now.

As she closes her eyes and peers inward, she can still see the blasted wreckage left behind by the Horrorterror's incursion. For as long as she can recall, her mind has been structured the same way - a pristine white structure, balanced over the dark precipice that is her link to the Furthest Ring, a connection she has never been capable of destroying or filling in, a sucking hole in her mental space that erodes at the foundations of her sanity and allows that thin trickle of colddamp and grimdark to taint the trailing edges of her thoughts.

She has always accepted that this mental design as the only viable option, the only way to preserve her sense of self. Every night she would sacrifice sleep to mediate with the Horrorterrors, to shore up the corroded base of her mind palace and usher the tendrils of grimdark back into the abyss.

Now, the acid of the sea that swallowed her mind has torn it all down, and the swilling tides of the grimdark have ground down the gleaming white pinnacle of her mind into rubble, leaving only an iridescent beach of white sand and lingering streaks of black tar, as far as her eyes can see. Thanks to the void-infused bracers on her arms, the corrupted pit of grimdark is muffled and numbed, though it remains a bruised purple hollow into which the grains of sand fall, crumbs of her sanity falling away into the black. Over it all shines the brilliant star she created to drive back the Horrorterror in New York, a steady, luminous shard of light that requires surprisingly little effort to maintain. All the more confirmation of Rose's hypothesis - that John's presence in her mind, even for so brief a time, infused her with strength she would not normally have been able to muster. It is a hypothesis her mother stubbornly refuses to speak of, even now.

It is no good. She looks around at the fragmented remains of the mental framework Rue Lalonde taught her all those years ago, and her desire firms. She will not turn to the same structure as she rebuilds herself. There were too many flaws in the design, too many cracks and crevasses and vulnerable points where the many-angled ones could slip in with their haunting songs. Having taken the past week and a half to consider her situation, Rose has a much better idea in mind. She has not consulted with her mother on this - but then, she does not intend to consult with Rue on much of anything at all, in the future - and none of her colleagues and friends have the thaumaturgic experience that would be needed to understand the finer details of the transformation Rose intends.

That's fine. She has sent warning texts to both John and Kanaya, in the event that her efforts go awry, but she does not anticipate failure. And this is something that needs to be completed as soon as possible, before she loses even more of herself in that slow trickle of sand. She will no longer be a solitary tower, braced over the abyss by the weak ties of family and stubborn pride.

Instead, she reaches up with one hand and gestures the bright sun out of the gleaming sky. By the time it reaches her palm and rests there, humming with power, she has compacted it to the size of a softball, and it burns all the brighter for being condensed.

The next bit is the trickiest part, the one most likely to go wrong, and so she intends to get it out of the way first. If this part fails, there would be little point in having completed any of the other steps first. She has been able to maintain the strength of the sun, yes, but she has not actively tried to manipulate it this way before. For all she knows, changing her mental image of the spell could cut it off from whatever wellspring of strength it draws on, that hidden power triggered by John's visit that she does not yet fully understand. But she will never know until she tries. Placing her other palm over the sun, she presses her hands together, flattening out the light until it is a horizontal plane.

The fact that it does not explode instantly is a very promising sign. Very promising indeed.

An incredibly strong desire for a celebratory drink slams into her out of nowhere.

That is a lie. She knows exactly where the desire comes from. It pierces up from the sand beneath her, a straggling, tarry line that wraps around her mental image of herself and licks at her throat. Rose has to breathe steadily for the next few minutes before she can swallow without that intense, craving thirst drying out her tongue, and then she is able to tear the line away, letting it drift before her in the air. She can see the way the black, sticky line trails away into the sand, and she raises one hand, the plane of light balanced on the other, to slice at the dark rope.

The tendril of her alcoholism that reached up to slather across her mind detaches from the rest, and she closes a fist, incinerating it. But even as she watches, the rest of the filth retracts into the sand, sinking into the mess of memories and emotions, where she can't sense it. No, tackling her drinking problem won't be so easy as that. She's gone ten days without drink, and everyday she wakes with that same hollow in her throat, a thirst that she can't allow herself to ignore. Just one drink, that niggling voice whispers in her mind, just one, and Rose often can't discern whether or not there might be a tinge of grimdark to the voice. She has only her suspicions after all, and nothing more, when it comes to speculating on what parts of her mind have been subtly altered by the Horrorterrors. The smaller changes are more difficult to sort through in the face of her mind's total destruction.

It doesn't help that Rose is very much aware of the cabinet of vodka and rum and assorted other hard liquors that Rue Lalonde keeps behind her desk. The only reason she hasn't broken yet is because her hate runs deeper than her alcoholism. She will not take anything from Rue Lalonde, not again. She wants nothing more to do with her mother, and that includes acknowledging and partaking in the alcohol Rue keeps in her office.

She despises the thought, but she may have no choice but to integrate that hatred into her restructuring. It is simply too much a part of her current mental state for her to ignore it, and as caustic as the emotion is, it is strong. And right now, she needs that strength.

Making a mental note to root out more of that crawling desire for alcohol before she leaves her mind for the day, Rose descends toward the grimdark abyss, the sun panel gleaming in her hands.

The nearer she draws to the darkness, the more numb she feels, her vision blurring under the influence of the void. These bracers may suppress her connection to the Horrorterrors, it's true, but it also numbs her own focus. It will be difficult to work with them still attached to her, but she needs to get used to it. She has resigned herself to keeping these cuffs even after leaving Lalonde Laboratories. She may not want anything her mother has touched, but they are too useful, and Rose no longer trusts in her ability to mediate with the grimdark. Better this aching, numb void in her mind than bloody whispers that she can't distinguish from her own thoughts.

She reaches the point of no return, the line where the channel between her mind and the Furthest Ring begins. It is dry right now, where for years it sloshed with the barely-restrained waters of the ocean, threatening to swallow her whole. She does not know whether the Horrorterrors pulled back because of the void bracers or out of fear of her sun - so, she will combine the two. One can never be too careful, right? Lowering the panel of sunlight beneath her feet, Rose spreads her arms and expands the panel until it stretches all the way across the abyss, a gleaming pane of gold. The channel is not a perfect rectangle, of course, and she spends the next few minutes subtly altering the edges of the panel, rounding out the corners until all she can see around her is the pane of light. Now that the source of the illumination has changed, her mind is no longer so blindingly bright, and she can already see the sandy beach has begun to spill out over the panel rather than falling into the sea.

Underneath, of course, there is still the ever present channel of darkness, but now she has a more permanent shield to ward off the grimdark, as opposed to simply pressing down on the Horrorterrors with only her will and hoping for the best. Before, they were always present, an oozing sore in the depths of her mind. Hopefully, with this makeshift bandage in place, she may begin the work of healing without the sore breaking through again.

Now, to deal with all the sand clogging up the place. Rose floats upward, shaking off the film of exhaustion that already weighs down her eyes. She raises the sand up with a scoop of her hand, rounding it all up into one place so that it doesn't coat the floor of her mind at random. Turning the grains of her memories in a slow whirl, Rose sighs. The work of years of meditation - gone; all her old organization and structure ground into dust. It will take more time than she currently has to mold her mind into a new form. Now that she has seen exactly how completely the old structure has shattered, she knows she can do no more than set up the barest outline of her future pattern, for now. Rushing this would only invite chaos, which is the last thing her mind needs more of right now.

She molds a clear bowl out of the air, and pours the sand into it. As the granules sift through her mental fingers, she strains through it all, hunting for those black strings of that long for alcohol. Though she finds and incinerates three more trails of ooze, she knows still more slips beneath her radar. Even when she focuses with all of her power, the alcoholism is insidious because it is a product of her own mind, rather than a foreign body. Even her superior powers of perception can barely distinguish between the craving and the regular background of her mind.

Then she molds a Tupperware lid on top of the bowl, because who said that mental images had to be old-fashioned? There is still room in her mind for growth and for new memories to accumulate in a new pattern, but for now the old data will have to be stored here, sealed against spillage until she can find the time and peace of mind necessary to reintegrate it all. She can still access it, though it will be a trial.

It will suffice, until the time is right.

Rose resurfaces hours later to the faint buzz of the phone alarm, having accomplished far less than she would have liked during her mental restructuring. She set up the preliminary pattern she intends to use to knit her mind together, but with each passing moment she could feel herself falling into a true sleep. When she found herself knitting a small, cat-sized sweater out of rainbow yarn, she realized she was dreaming, and carefully disconnected herself from the mental workspace so she can sleep without accidentally unraveling anything. If she's reached the point of dreaming, she can't trust herself to focus anymore in her mindscape.

Now she feels refreshed and a little more in control as she sits up, stretching her arms above her head. Even those few hours of work have worked wonders, and she feels almost sane again as she bends over to yank her duffel bag out from where she's hidden it beneath the bed.

She has patiently bided her time this past week, sailing frigidly through the corridors of her mother's dominion, maintaining a flawless mask of elegant indifference when Rue's underlings ask about her health and try to make her feel at home. With her extra sight active almost constantly throughout the day, Rose can sense who among the scientists and lab interns welcome her in order to curry favor with Rue (ha!), and who genuinely want her to feel at home. The latter are convenient in that she can ask them to obtain certain items for her without worrying that they will flock to Rue's side an hour later to try to impress her with how they've most recently helped Rose with some little problem.
No, it will be much easier for all involved if Rue doesn't realize Rose has left until it is far too late. This way, they can skip straight past all the tedious debates about how Rose is being hasty and cannot be trusted alone in the world just yet, and Rose will not have to point out Rue's blatant hypocrisy in front of a crowd of witnesses. Instead, Rose will slip away into the night with no one the wiser, and Rue need only make token protests for the sake of her image before once again quietly leaving Rose to her own devices.

After all, she has abandoned Rose without a word once already. Surely it is time Rose repaid the favor in kind?

She does not have much, beyond the duffel itself and the bathroom supplies she has pilfered from the locker rooms. As loath as she is to take more supplies that nominally belong to Rue, Rose won't let her stubborn hate prevent her from escaping this dreary place. She can discard the last pieces of clothing given to her by her mother once she has reached her destination, and no sooner. It is a matter of practicality, and she won't let her pride overwhelm her good judgment again.

Tucking the last of the plain cotton blouses provided for her into the duffel, Rose takes her borrowed phone out. This part will prove the most difficult, because she knows - she knows - that by doing this, she will be hurting John.

But it would hurt him more to simply break off communication without a word. She fully intends to resume it at a later point, when she has reached her intended destination, but no amount of promises are going to fully assuage John's natural disbelief. Since New York they have not been out of contact for more than a few hours at any given time, even if their interaction extends to little more than wishing each other a good night.

Rose has no choice. Thanks to her mother allowing her the freedom to explore the many and varied labs within the complex, Rose has used her sight to identify more than one apparatus, thaumaturgic or mechanical, that most likely would allow her mother to track spatial and magical distortions. No, if Rose intends to reach her destination without being followed, she cannot teleport using her magic, and she cannot risk using a phone or computer along the way. She must do this the old fashioned way, and that means discarding the cell for the entirety of the she estimates it will take her to reach Philadelphia.

TT: John, are you there?
TT: Please. It will be better for you to hear this now than to come back to a vague and no doubt dissatisfying warning.
EB: agh, hang on rose! a lot of weird stuff is happening right now, just give me a sec!
TT: Weird? Do tell, John. You have perked my interest.
TT: Very well. I can wait a little longer, but not much. Please hurry.
EB: aaagggh, i'm back, i'm back! sorry about that.
EB: how did your brain thingy go?
TT: Quite well. I am pleased with the results of the first attempt. My subconscious harbors no end of hidden pitfalls and psychological snarls, but I believe that I have lain down the groundwork for making progress in future sessions.
EB: that's good :)
EB: but, uh, what's that about a warning? another one? are you doing another really dangerous mind thingy so soon after the first one? :/
TT: ...I believe that can wait a few minutes more. First, tell me of this strangeness on your end. I am intensely curious. Don't you know better than to leave a girl hanging, John?
EB: uh, well, i'm pretty sure you guys wouldn't get seattle local news there, even if you did have a tv, but i'm sure you can hunt it down on the internet soon. you're good at research like that, and i just know it'll be all over the comic forums soon…

TT: ?
TT: Something to do with a particularly engrossing development in one of the Ancestors comics?
Really, John, is such a thing enough to delay conversation with me for even a moment?
EB: ahhahaha, no, i promise it's not that, rose!
EB: it's something pretty serious actually, and it could potentially suck really hard.
TT: You may or may not have 'fangirled' to me on the subject a few times over the past week, yes.
TT: Something about him 'having da booty' was mentioned, as I recall.
EB: well, like a few hours ago the police just announced that they suspect him for arson and almost terrorism! it's awful, rose!

TT: Do you have reason to believe he could be involved in those sort of crimes?
EB: no way! or at least, i don't want to think he would...
EB: plus, the whole thing is a lot more complicated because the explosions they suspect him of being involved in are the ones hearts boxcars set off to escape that one night!
EB: which means the whole accusation totally reeks of the midnight crew :(
TT: I see. That does complicate the situation immensely. Do you have any other information? Have you communicated with Hemogoblin himself?
EB: no, but i'm obviously gonna try to find him tonight. he's my partner, we have to figure this whole mess out asap!
EB: my dad has been grilling me for ages trying to figure out if hemogoblin's somehow related to the midnight crew, but i just don't believe it! he nearly got blown up in that last explosion! but that means my dad's totally on my case now too.
TT: I would advise you locate this Hemogoblin character soon, then. It would appear he has some explaining to do.
EB: i will, trust me
EB: i'm about to take off early, actually. what were you going to tell me?

For a brief moment, Rose contemplates not telling him. If John is heading out on the job early, he will no doubt be preoccupied with the Hemogoblin scandal well into the night. Perhaps, if Rose has planned this night well enough, she might even reach her goal before John notices she has gone radio silent.

But no. No. That kind of thinking, that lapse of communication, is what led her down this road in the first place. Shaking her head, Rose begins typing again.

TT: I am leaving my mother's laboratories tonight, and will not be able to retain this phone much longer. I have no doubt that she is capable of tracking its signal.
EB: waaaat.
EB: you mean you won't be able to text anymore?!
TT: The break should hopefully last only until noon at the latest, when I hope to have arrived at my intended destination. I promise, John, before anything else, I will insist on the use of a computer with an Internet connection. I will not disappear.
EB: i, uh
EB: that's just not really reassuring me all that much rose :(
TT: I know. I know, and I'm sorry, John. But I must minimize the ways my mother would be able to locate me, and this cell phone simply must go. I will purchase a new one as soon as I have the funds to do so.
EB: is this even safe to do, rose?? what if the voidy things stop working halfway there? i totally don't know how i feel about this anymore…
TT: I have implemented new mental defenses these past weeks. Between that and the bracers, I have confidence the grimdark will not resurge.
TT: All I can do is ask you to trust me.
EB: i
EB: yeah, okay. i trust you, rose.
EB: i trust you!
TT: So you have stated.

But it feels good, just reading those words on the screen. No matter their questionable sincerity through the emotionless medium of text, they are the words she needed to see. Her grip on the phone tightens, and she coughs a little. It certainly does not resemble a sniffle in any way. She has more control than that, these days.

EB: but you have to pinky swear you'll pester me right away, the minute you get to this place, or else!
TT: Indeed. A pinky promise it is, then.
TT: Now, off to work with you. Between this intriguing scandal and school, you won't even notice my absence.
EB: i always notice when you're gone, rose! you're my friend!

All right, now they are just straying into the realm of the downright sentimental. John is painfully earnest, sometimes, almost embarrassingly so, and she suspects that a childhood immersed in the stilted dialogue of every comic book known to man and troll alike may be to blame. She never really has the heart to reprimand him, though.

TT: Thank you, John. I will speak with you soon.
EB: i'll hold you to it! bye rose! be safe!

Before she leaves the lavish room appointed to her during her stay, she makes sure to remake the bed, remove any hair she may have left behind in the shower or sink by burning it in a single burst of targeted light (no need to give Rue any DNA samples with which to enact a magical means of tracking Rose), and generally leave the room as pristine as when she first arrived. There is no need to be a rude guest, after all, and perhaps this will get the message across to Rue more effectively than mere words. It is the truest form of passive-aggression, after all - she will leave no trace she was ever present in this place, to make it quite clear that she never intends to be present ever again.

She and Rue have never communicated well. This is the most effort Rose is willing to expend on this woman. With any luck, she will never have to concern herself with Rue. Ever. She thinks, as petty as the thought is, that a total estrangement might please her most of all. Certainly it would help mute this hatred that flares up every time they are forced to engage face to face.

Scrubbing beneath the void bracers one last time, layering her sleeves beneath them to ease the chafing against her boney wrists, Rose slings the duffel bag across her back. She then begins to unspool the layers of spells she has been knitting together this past week and a half, the painstaking work that is the true reason she has waited so long to leave this place.

It is a spell she stole directly from Harry Potter, and she has absolutely no regrets. Wrapping the light around her and the duffel until it meets her satisfaction, Rose snaps her fingers, and becomes effectively invisible. The thaumaturgic principles behind the spell are fascinating, and involve refracting and bending the light in such a way that none of the waves can bounce off of her form; instead, the light should, hopefully, reflect only her surroundings, and nothing more. Rue may be able to track magical anomalies, but Rose need only maintain this until she has exited the laboratory complex. Scientists either work on a mysterious rotating schedule, or they do not sleep; she has been unable to ascertain which is the case.

Closing the phone, she sets it on the bedside table, adjusting it a little compulsively until it is perfectly in line with the edge of the table before, with a flick of her pinky nail, she spins it at an angle, ruining the elegant lines of the elegant bedroom.

Yes, she thinks she has achieved exactly the effect she wished to achieve. Smirking to herself, Rose leaves the room, pulling up the hood of a borrowed hoodie that is precisely the opposite of anything she would normally wear. Once she is on the road and drops the disillusionment spell, the best way to avoid detection by anyone seeking to follow her on foot will be to disguise herself in more mundane ways. Rue will no doubt direct them to look for a girl in proper makeup and a dark, tailored skirt. Rose has wiped her face clean for the first time in years, and her hoodie is a ratty, oversize grey thing, shapeless and formless.

Hopefully, it will all be worth the temporary sacrifice of her dignity, in the end. For now, her mild distaste is overwhelmed completely by the urgent need to be out.

Rose becomes aware that she has an unexpected follower when she is already a mile from the lakeside compound, and her skin prickles at the realization that they must have been following her for at least the past fifteen minutes, without her noticing. She cannot even fool herself into thinking that perhaps it is simply coincidence, that one of the lab interns has decided to go on a late night stroll that Rose never witnessed in her careful observations of the laboratory's daily schedule; she waits a few more minutes, zigzagging through the undergrowth in deliberately wide sweeps, and can hear the person behind her follow the zigging path - not something someone on an innocent walk would bother with.

Using her sight, she looks behind her, and is surprised enough to halt in her tracks, hesitate, and turn to face the pale carapacian who has somehow trailed her all this way. "Wondering Querent. It is rather late for anyone to be out in the woods. May I ask what brings you this way?"

Several factors about the WQ have given Rose reason for further scrutiny of the carapacians. First and foremost, she is almost certainly the Wise one Rose vaguely recalls PM mentioning before her impromptu disappearance - carapacians do love their Initials.

Second, the WQ is a rather unusual specimen of her species. It is rather basic exobiology: carapacians on average do not exceed five feet in height, with three and a half feet being the species average according to a census in 2000. The WQ, however, is a rather respectable five foot six, nearly of an eye with Rose herself, with slim dimensions and an air of quiet elegance that cannot be denied.

However, for the entirety of Rose's stay at the Laboratories, she has only directly interacted with the Querent once, when wandering the labs, to introduce herself. The Querent had been consumed in a strange project that Rose could not make heads or tails of, and Rose had politely excused herself before the carapacian could be too distracted by her presence. The WQ had seemed quite eager to speak with Rose about said project, but by that point Rose had been far more preoccupied with finding someone who could provide her with a pair of sweats - not the kind of garment a carapacian would generally wear.

Of all the people on Rue's payroll, the Querent is not the one Rose would have considered likely to track her down.

WQ: You, of course, my lady Seer.
WQ: Please, I do not understand. Tell me where you are going?

Rose sighs gustily, wishing she wore makeup for this. The WQ simply exudes a level of classiness that makes Rose feel vastly underdressed. "Away. I am afraid that if I told you more, it would inevitably reach my dearest mother's ears."

The WQ's claws rise and fall, and the impression of disbelief appears in Rose's mind. She grimaces. The sensation of carapacian speech, with its vital mental component, is really the last thing she needs to have muddling about in her fragile brain, but it seems it is unavoidable for now.

WQ: I - I see.

WQ: I had hoped that -

WQ: Perhaps it is too soon. You are not one of my own dreamers, after all. I am unused to such direct dealings, as well. I may have overstepped myself.

Rose has absolutely no idea what is going on here. Even when she widens her inner eye and scans the carapacian's aura, though, she sees nothing but honesty and sincere kindness, and a quiet sort of confusion that gradually folds itself into acceptance. The WQ has a most benevolent, radiating kind of soul, slower and more deliberate than the quick eager flutter that is all Rose recalls of PM. But there is nothing malicious in the Querent, at least, and Rose thinks she can convince the carapacian to return without alerting Rue to her absence, if she plays her cards right.

"I am sorry. I would prefer my mother not know I am leaving her smothering sphere of influence," Rose says pleadingly, widening her eyes and letting her lower lip tremble slightly. "I assure you that I am not wandering without purpose; I am going to a friend's home. It is all quite safe. I would appreciate if you would not tell Rue, if possible."

There is a long pause, as the WQ presses her claws together in silence and appears to think intently, her coal-black eyes half-lidded in the twilight. When she meets Rose's eyes again, she seems to have come to a decision.

WQ: I have been hasty, it seems. But I understand.

WQ: It is not my way to prevent a dreamer from pursuing the path that Skaia guides them to.

WQ: Simply remember me, Seer of Light. It is all I ask. If you ever need ask a question, I am at your disposal, always.

WQ: I wish you luck on your quest.

"Thank you," Rose replies, bowing her head slightly. She has the strangest urge to curtsey; alas that she is clad in baggy sweatpants rather than a proper skirt. Bowing with one moon white claw pressed over the upper left of her thoracic cavity, the WQ smiles wistfully and turns to go back to the laboratory complex. Rose pivots as well, readjusting her duffel bag so that it will not press so heavily at the base of her spine -

Wait.

Wait a minute.

Did she just say Skaia?

"Wait - Wondering Querent, wait, please. A moment of your time!" Rose whispers as loud as she dares, stumbling back through the dark after the WQ. The carapacian turns at once, her head cocked to the side with open curiosity. "There is just one thing I wish to ask, before I go," Rose says, resting a hand on a tree. "Do you - are you familiar with the Skaian Paradigm?"

The smile that creases the WQ's face is, if possible, even warmer than before, and Rose is struck by the uncomfortably strange sensation, radiating from the Querent's expressive soul, that the carapacian is proud of her. The sensation edges too close to motherly, and Rose brushes it aside, tuning her sight slightly so that she can ignore the maternal warmth the carapacian seems oblivious to.

WQ: A most excellent first question, my Seer.

WQ: And one that I would be most happy to answer.

WQ: Skaia is...a dormant crucible of unlimited creative potential.

WQ: It is the first and final battlefield, the center of the great Game.

WQ: As the good Doctor Lalonde would think of it, it is the catalyst for change and rebirth on a universal level, and she researches it seeking a method of learning all of those possible transformations and their cumulative effect on the world in which we live today.

WQ: Hers is truly a fascinating area of study, one I would not have thought possible this early in paradox space. But she seems to be having promising results in her studies, at least on a quantum level. I do what I can to assist her.

Rose processes this influx of information for a long moment, but what the WQ just suggested is - too much for her to handle right now, not when she is already wasting precious time needed to reach the I-95 and start heading to Philadelphia. From her initial consideration it sounds like the Skaian Paradigm is almost something philosophical, perhaps even a religious concept that Rose is somehow unfamiliar with, but that does not match up with the WQ's claims that Rue has scientific evidence for whatever it is. This is still more than Rose has been able to learn in the past week of thoroughly snooping through Rue's offices, and she appreciates it. "Thank you. Farewell, Querent."

The carapacian nods deeply, and steps elegantly back toward the laboratories, her carapace glowing with an unearthly pale limning beneath the full moon. To Rose's other sight, she seems almost to have sweeping wings that fade back into the regular outline of her aura before Rose can say for certain they were there at all.

Enough of this. She has a late night bus to board soon, and she is still miles from where she estimates the bus station will be.

Without looking back, Rose disappears into the woods.

Even as she walks, she thinks she can hear the faint murmur of grim voices, free at last from the void-shields of the laboratories to whisper and hum, and she shivers, clamping down with the gleaming sunlight of her mental wards until the songs fade away.

Ten hours later, Rose feels like utter shit. She tore her regular circadian cycle in two in order to sleep all the previous day and stay awake all night for this little venture, and now she is paying the price. The sun rose several hours ago, but not even the influx of power and diminishing of the Horrorterrors that she associates with the dawn can make up for the fact that she has been awake for ten hours, surviving off trail mix and jerky, and somehow, in some horrible act of stupidity, forgot to pack a toothbrush. There is a thin veneer of greasiness in the strands of her hair when she runs her fingers through the bob in an attempt to regain some kind of order in her life, and she grimaces. Her face feels sticky and her mouth tastes like a rotting corpse, and dear god there has to be a better method of travel than this plebian bus.

The bus shudders to a stop at last, and Rose disembarks, feeling scruffy and downright grungy as she pulls up her hood to obscure her face once more. Her stomach makes its opinion known, but she ignores it even as she steps into the McDonalds across the road. The scent of fried breakfast pseudo-food makes her stomach clench, and she sidles around the long line of the breakfast rush to slip into the bathroom. Not the classiest or cleanest of boudoirs, she thinks, but it will have to do. She has no intention of having her second meeting with a good friend occur while she's in borrowed men's sweats and unwashed, particularly not a friend with as stunning a sense of style as this one.

She strips off to her undershirt, ignoring the titters and loud chatter of women and trolls as she uses a rough towel to press at her face with cold sink water and sponge at her arms and neck. There is little she can do for her hair - shampoo had not been on the list of bare necessities she put together for this excursion - so she ducks her whole head under the sink and scrubs as best she can, so that at least her hair won't smell of gasoline and stale food later on. She holds it back off her face with a headband and tries not to micromanage the tiny strands of hair that fall out of line. She folds the hoodie and sweats away into the duffel, just in case, and slips into the white skirt and pale golden sweater once again provided by her mother. Neither article of clothing fits quite right, but the colors appeal to Rose more than she's willing to admit; dark purples and inky blacks make something within her mind twitch, and she fears that if the sensation persists she may have to alter her wardrobe plans to account for it.

And perhaps it's not a bad thing, to wear more of the Seer's colors in her everyday life. When (if, something whispers quietly) she takes up that mantle again, she will need to design a new costume - the old outfits presumably lost to the explosion of grimdark at the old house - and until then it might not be bad for her to keep some light in her life.

When she emerges from the McDonalds restroom she feels marginally more like a functional human being, though only just, and strides out of the dingy restaurant with more confidence. She is not at her best, no, but she is at least presentable, and that will have to do. It is already near 9 in the morning, and the sooner she reaches her destination, the sooner she can rest without her mother and her own twisting thoughts weighing upon her mind.

She crosses town on foot, until she is west of Washington Square and must ask a passerby for more specific directions. She makes it to Locust Street and then allows her other sight to activate in full force. She knows the aura she's looking for, and it should stand out like a torch against the dull background glow of the other inhabitants of these apartment buildings -

Ah. There she is.

Rose climbs up the front stairwell and presses the buzzer. It takes a moment, and then the intercom fritzes. That voice, heard only a few times, perhaps a year ago, murmurs almost urgently, "Rose?"

All the air rushes from her lungs. Rose has to swallow hard. "Kanaya."

There is no response, and Rose waits while the intercom crackles with static. She hears the pound of high heels on stairs from within the building, and she smiles to herself. She is certainly not tearing up a little when the front door is yanked open with unnatural strength by a very familiar troll with jade green eyes, and she does not cry at all when she is pulled into a most welcome embrace.

---
"Dave."

Reflexively, Dave wraps his arms and legs around the crate of apple juice like a koala. He bares his teeth and hisses up at Bro. Ironically, obviously, but also in complete seriousness because like hell is Bro getting his anime gloves anywhere near this crate of ambrosia.

Bro had been taking one of his impossibly long showers when the delivery was scheduled to arrive, and Dave had foolishly hoped he'd be able to cart this thing into his bedroom with his brother none the wiser. He'd only set off one standard smuppet trap on the way down the stairs to the first floor, and none at all on the way back up with his prize in hand, which is usually a sign that Bro is too preoccupied with whatever the hell he does in the shower (no seriously, what the fuck does he do?) to mix things up a bit and catch Dave off guard.

Now, though, Bro is standing in the middle of the living room, his hair dripping wet with nothing more than a towel slung around his hips. Dave has to unlatch his arms from the apple juice in order to sign a reply, which is still annoying as fuck. 'Dude, put some fucking clothes on. You're gonna give some little old lady a heart attack. Seriously, you're going to be responsible for that? Old lady heart attacks? Is that really what you want out of your life -'

"Kid, if I want to wander around in the goddamn nude in my own fucking apartment, little old ladies are not going to stop me," Bro says flatly, folding his arms. He has his shades on, but Dave can't see any watermarks on them, so the age old mystery of whether or not Bro showers with his shades on remains unsolved. "Now fucking look me in the eye and tell me that's not the tenth box of apple juice you've ordered in the past four days. Tell me, you little shit."

It's not. It's the fifteenth. Bro does not need to know that, though. 'It is not,' is all Dave signs, trying to reach for the sword across his back as discreetly as possible. The new delivery guy stopped giving him weird looks for running around armed, like, months ago. 'Back off man, it's just AJ.'

"I raised you, I can tell when you're not looking me in the eye. I will rip those shades off your face, I swear to God," Bro snaps, legitimate irritation bleeding through his poker face. "Look, we can talk about your raging apple juice boner, or we can talk about your late night time travel antics that you thought I wouldn't notice. Choose, little man."

Fuck. An impossible choice.

'Fuck you, I am a legitimate business man,' Dave signs, slowly unlatching his legs from their death grip on the crate. He needs to get this thing to his room; he's way too vulnerable out here. 'These are just the latest product samples from the factory.'

"Bullshit." Bro scratches at his weird stubbly goatee thing, one of the few open signs of exasperation he has. Or at least, it's the only one Dave knows about. "The fact that you have a factory at all is part of your problem. I've seen your profit spreadsheets, I mean, fuck, kid -"

Dave nearly drops the apple juice, and his heart rate shoots up 'What. What. Why were you going through my finances, you nosy dick?!'

"I go through them because they're spreadsheets, I mean what is this, the stone age? Who uses spreadsheets anymore? I thought you were some child of the Internet age, where did you even download a fucking dinosaur like Excel '03?"

'We're not all computer freaks with the physique of a bodybuilder, a'ight?' Dave keeps his head ducked as he tries to edge his way through the kitchen with the crate under one arm. Bro just reappears leaning on the fridge, light glinting off his pointy shades. 'Some of us are just trying to build goddamn apple juice empires. God. I know it's not creepy puppet porn, I just didn't know that was a disowning offence. I'm just not cut out for the family business - sewing robot-puppets, filming puppet porn - not my thing.'

With this clearly devastating comeback, he pauses time and sprints past Bro. He makes it all the way to the sink before a grasping hand catches him by the collar and flings him bodily back into the kitchen. Bro has to grab the edge of his towel before it falls down, but other than that there's no sign that keeping up with Dave's flashstepping cost him any effort at all. "Stay right where you are, little man, this is a motherfuckin' intervention," Bro says, tying an extra knot in the towel at his hip.

Dave feels his shoulders hunch, and forces them back down. He really needs to stop doing that, it makes him look all insecure and shit. Which he is so not. 'In a towel?!' he demands, trying to keep this conversation from derailing into an actual, legitimate heart to heart talk. He does not have a problem, after all. He could shut down his apple juice empire whenever he damn well wants. He just. You know. Doesn't ever want to. Ever. Does Bro even appreciate how hard it was to negotiate with apple orchards and grocery store suppliers when Dave had to do everything by email and they kept demanding phone calls he couldn't physically give?

"Kid, I can take the goddamn towel off at any time. Do not tempt me." Bro smirks a little, but then he's right back into nosy asshat big bro mode. "I mean it, Dave. Does this face look like I'm fucking around here?"

Dave studies it carefully. 'Yes?' he tries.

"Wrong answer." Bro vanishes and Dave at last manages to stop time before the elder Strider can complete his latest impossible feat of ninja-like speed. Bro is left frozen - on the ceiling.

Dave stares up in horror at his brother, who was apparently going to attack Dave from above like a goddamn spider, Jesus fucking Christ who even does that?! Where did Lil Cal come from, and why is the puppet's arm wrapping around Bro's ankle? How is his towel staying attached - oh fuckity fuck, there are just so many questions Dave wants to ask but can't, for the sake of his already dwindling sanity in this insane puppet house.

Seriously, sometimes he thinks Bro doesn't explain shit not because he's a cagey asshole, but because if Dave honestly got straight answers for once he'd probably flog himself raw with his own brainstem to make the knowledge fuck off right out of his brain again.

Unfortunately Dave is so caught up in these horrified internal ramblings that he runs over the limit of his time stop, and Bro snatches the apple juice crate from his arms without delay. 'Bro, I told you not to dick around with my apple juice!' Dave signs. He is seriously just one more puppet from doing an artful triple backflip out the window and into a swimming pool of apple juice. He has a time loop waiting for him to finish the circle back in his room, and then he needs to get out on the streets to continue his secret spying missions.

See, he doesn't spend all his time mindlessly building an apple juice monopoly by buying up small independently owned juice manufacturers - he also spends nights beating the shit out of criminals. Yeah, he rarely has time to go out during the day and fight ironically at the same time Bro does, but fuck, Dave has the right to change his hero schedule whenever he wants. He is a strong independent time traveler who don't need no overbearing big bro.

"When is the last time you went out and did that dumbass hipster photography thing?" Bro says, setting Lil Cal on top of the crate, which is actually a pretty good way to guarantee Dave will be too freaked out to go near it. Damn. "The past ten days, you've been working on this apple fuckery nonstop. Time for a break, kid. Go remix something, dammit."
'Look, if you're just pissy that I skipped out on working with you yesterday, I'll go tomorrow or something, Ambrose.' Dave spells out that name with extra emphasis on each letter to get his point across. Surreptitiously, he drops one hand to check his pockets. He thinks he has a few novelty ninja stars in there somewhere that he might be able to use to knock Lil Cal off balance without actually having to touch the possessed thing. 'We can go beat up drug dealers, that's always hilarious. It'll be a suuuper fun bonding activity, and then you can go back to the puppet thing and we'll forget this ever happened.'

"Should never have let you talk to older Lalonde," Bro says, his lip curled down at the mention of his real name, which will never not be hilarious. "Kid, if you don't lay off that name and trash the apple juice in the next five minutes, I will give you such an ass-kicking. I indulged your obsession for the past week, and I am officially past the indulgent parent stage."

'Hero-work isn't exactly a paying gig, Bro,' Dave fires back. 'Gonna need some cash flow when you get all old and decrepit and can't make puppet porn anymore.'

"You have a problem."

'You have puppets!'

"Yeah, and maybe I was somehow hoping I wouldn't fuck you up so bad while raising you that you'd turn out like me!" Bro yells. His volume actually goes up, and Dave is so shocked by the sudden noise that he almost misses the words themselves. "But look, great, we all have the same addictive personalities. I keep you away from the alcohol, and you just fixate on apple juice instead, like a demented four year old. Awesome, I managed to raise the exact opposite of a well-adjusted kid, well done me." Bro rubs at his eyes under the shades, pinching the brow of his nose. "I swear, with my genes and Lalonde's, no wonder you both ended up so -"

Bro realizes he's fucked up long before it clicks with Dave, clamping his mouth shut and flinching. Exactly ten seconds tick by in Dave's head before his brain kicks into gear, and he switches from being confused by Bro's silence to being confused by WHAT.

'What - did you just say?'

"Fuck." Bro takes a step back. "Fuck, kid, you didn't hear that." He grimaces, and Lil Cal wraps around his neck, like a defense mechanism got triggered. "Uh. I swear, if I left my jeans at Lalonde's -"

'You know, all the backpedaling and trying to cover your ass? That's making me the opposite of suspicious, clearly. Ha, ha.' Dave hacks out a gasping cough that's meant to be a laugh, but then his hands just keep going, and the question spills out, 'Did you just imply that Lalonde and I are siblings?!'

The silence that ensues lasts too long. The only noise is this high-pitched wheezy whine that kind of wobbles, and Dave doesn't realize he's the one making it until Bro raises both hands in a conciliatory gesture, Lil Cal crawling off to whatever dark corner it inhabits when Bro isn't using it to freak people out. "Dave, breathe."

"Eeeeeeemnaagh?" Dave wheezes, gasping in a breath of air, wanting to smack himself for making such a completely uncool sound even as his hands get into gear. 'This is a joke. This is some new level of irony that I can't even comprehend. Awesome, good job, I bow before your superior coolkid gambit. Truly, your mysterious ways transcend irony.'

"Irony! Yeah, that - about that," Bro says too loudly, hitching his towel up awkwardly and oh fuck he's still grimacing. Bro has held an expression for more than thirty seconds. In fact, according to Dave's impeccable sense of time, Bro has looked like he's about to crawl under a box and hide there for nearly a minute and 26 seconds. Finally, the elder Strider shoves his hair back, drops of water still running down his temples. He just looks tired, now. "This is the part where I tell you that - no. No, that wasn't irony, Dave."

Dave's vision narrows down to a blurry tunnel, and all he can see is that crate of apple juice that has suddenly lost all appeal.

He - he needs to get out of here. Hooooly shit, he needs to get out of this apartment because it just him or is it really kinda claustrophobic in here? His lungs are working too fast, and the whining has started up again, and pain stabs through his throat in a jerking spasm that feels like having his throat cut before, in a panic, he twists time backward.

-He's probably making a huge fucking mistake, but the panic is too much, cutting right through all the careful control he usually exerts over the agonizing time travel. When he rips himself out of the sensory fugue, he falls to his knees, breathing hard still.

His internal clock says he's about thirty minutes ago, which isn't all that bad, considering how very uncontrolled that jump was. He can hear the shower running in the bathroom, which means Bro is still in there at this point in time. The major problem, and the one that slams right through the tangled panic of I have a sister?! is that no future-Dave set up the loop. It's one of Dave's most stringent rules: thou shalt not dick around with the time stream unless a future-Dave confirms the end of the loop. He'd been two seconds from finishing the earlier loop off right before Bro decided to pull some kind of Star Wars 'you have a long lost sister routine'. He remembers a future-Dave visiting before he left his room earlier, but surely even a notoriously reticent other-Dave would happen to mention something as fucked up as this.

But yeah. He needs to get out of here before Bro notices there's two of him wandering around the apartment again. It's pretty much an unspoken fact in the Strider household that Dave time travels on a regular basis now, but Bro has never actually said out loud that he knows about the mess of loops Dave handles all the damn time. It's just assumed, and Dave does his best to follow made-up time traveler etiquette by having only one or two Daves in the apartment at a time. He starts flashstepping out of the apartment. He hits every trap on the way down the stairs and absentmindedly clearing the path for the Dave who goes down to pick up the apple juice delivery in thirty minutes.

Fuck, time travel is weird.

Suddenly having a possible bio-sis is weirder.

Like. Shit. Are Dave and Rose even the same age? Are they actually twins, not just creepy mystery siblings? Dave is shit at judging people's ages, but there can't be more than a year's difference between him and Rose, tops.

Does Rose know about this?

...One way to find out. Nursing a massive post-time travel throat and headache, Dave massages at his trachea with one hand while the other flips out his phone and opens Pesterchum.

TG: lalonde
TG: fuck, you dont like that name please dont murder me with magic tentacles
TG: anyway
TG: tell me you didnt know about this TG: because fuck
TG: if you knew about this before this is the kind of thing you dont just sit on TG: shit shit shit
TG: of all the times to go radio silent
TG: did john know
TG: no fuck john cant keep a secret to save his life the adorable bastard
TG: this is serious business i need you to tell me this isnt true
TG: are we siblings

There continues to be an extremely persistent and totally unfair silence on Rose's end of this conversation, and Dave is freaking out, trying to run through the evidence in his head and somehow disprove this insane load of horseshit. So what, they're both blonde, but it's a totally different kind of blonde, right? Dave's working the whole nearly-albino angle, and Rose is some kind of pale golden blonde. To put it dorkier photographic terms that Dave would never speak aloud, even if he could speak, she's just more saturated than him. Crazy evil grimdark Rose had hair even whiter blonde than Dave's, but obviously those were extenuating circumstances. His skin is darker from burning and tanning all the damn time in the Houston sun, and she's got the deathly pallor going on.

They don't look similar. They can't look similar. Dave stops dead in the middle of the street and actually slaps his face, messing with his nose and the sides of his face in a way that probably looks utterly uncool to anyone passing by. But he has to try to feel out his cheekbones dammit. He pats at them in uncomfortable silence, and suspects that what he is doing is in fact incredibly stupid. Lalonde has cheekbones like a goddamn knife, you could sharpen diamonds on those suckers, and Dave would definitely have noticed having a second pair of really sharp objects on his person when he looked in the mirror this morning, so their facial structure is different, too -

"Dave."

Oh hell. Dave rips his hand off his face and signs off Pesterchum with a last message.

TG: oh fuck me bro caught up
TG: answer me rose

Then he puts the phone away and stops time, flinging himself down the nearest alley. He's under no illusions that he's faster than Bro - how did the guy even know to look for him outside? Dave's been wandering for nearly fifteen minutes, stupidly wasting time he could have used to hide out somewhere, while Bro would only have been searching for five minutes, from his perspective - but maybe if he just keeps walking away Bro will take the hint and back off.

Yeah, right. Like Bro's ever known when to back off in his entire life.

Ten minutes later Dave is leaping across the rooftops. He's still got his shades on, which is dumb, because he's usually good about switching over into Flashstep mode when he's doing random rooftop running, but like hell is he exposing his face to Bro. He knows Bro is around here somewhere, keeping pace with Dave.

Now that he's gotten some fresh air, Dave feels a little steadier. Maybe. Enough to want more answers, anyway. He skids to a halt, using an arm to brace himself as he slips in the gravel on top of the roof he choose to stop on.
'Will you stop stalking me!' Dave signs to the empty air, when all he wants to do is flip the fuck out and scream. Of all the times to end up mute, it would have to be the month he gets hit with this bombshell.

It takes a second, but then Bro appears. At least he put on clothes instead of stalking Dave around Houston in a questionable towel. "It's not stalking, it's parenting. So help me god, I will ground you from time traveling if you don't siddown and talk this out with me like a fucking adult."

'Make up your mind - either you're still parenting me or I'm an adult,' Dave signs bitterly. Another thought comes to mind, a complication Dave's never really concerned himself with before. Bro is Bro. Except now… 'Wait - you told me I was adopted! Now suddenly I really do have your creepy puppet-genes?! Are you my brother or my dad or my niece or what?! Seriously, you need to clear this up right now.'

Bro is quiet and unreadable for a long moment, before looking off to the side. "...It's complicated."

'That is bullshit -'

"Genetically, yeah, it's a parental relationship," Bro blurts out, rubbing his face with a hand. "In words you would understand - I am the father. It is me."

That's kind of... not what Dave expected. He wants to rip at his hair, but he can't show emotion right now. He's already been pissy enough, and he needs to regain his chill. He will be chill about this. So chill. Ice cubes will be jealous. 'I mean, how would that even work? Come on, I thought you were gay. Or puppet-sexual.' That last one requires some creative hand signs to get across, and Dave's hands feel unclean afterward. 'And what - so, you and Lalonde -'

"Eurrrrgh, no." Bro still hasn't removed his hand from his face, and Dave has to wonder if maybe this conversation isn't equally awkward for both Striders involved. "Not ever. Look, it involved science. Science, and several meteorites, and probably someone, somewhere, being profoundly stupid." His lips quirk. "And that's how you were born, David."

...None of that made sense. But now Bro is looking at Dave with an expression close to relief, as though that actually did make sense to him, and Dave is just too dumb to understand. And like hell is he going to admit to confusion now. The last thing he needs is to show any more weakness in front of Bro. 'Alright. Meteors 'n shit. The usual,' he replies, wishing at the least that he had his collar back so he could lather on the sarcasm. Fuck, he hates how this mute thing ruins the tone of his sick burns.

That alone time is sounding better and better right now; Dave is still flying blind in terms of time-travel tonight, but he fully intends to go to that spying shindig at some point. He needs to ditch Bro and think this news that he has a meteor-sister over until he can get in touch with Rose herself. Also, at some point, he needs to blab to John because holy shit.

The main problem with all of this is that Bro is a total bastard. Dave is going to have to travel back in time again if he really, for sure, wants to stop Bro from following him around town out of some misplaced brotherly - fatherly?! - concern. Striders don’t show affection and concern like normal people, and Dave has no patience for Bro's devoted stalking tonight.

Maybe if he gets to beat up some members of the Midnight Crew, it will help him work through these new emotional issues that he's not in any way admitting actually exist. 'Cool. Awesome. Later,' he signs, saluting Bro with flawless irony before turning to walk away.

''And where do you think you're going?" Bro asks.
To his immense frustration, Dave has to stop marching away and turn to sign his reply. 'Out!' "You dumb fuck, we're already outside. Where out here are you going?"

'To see a movie!' Dave lies blatantly.

Bro just scratches at his chin and maybe - maybe - shrugs his shoulders just a tad. His body language is back to its usual bare minimum, now that he thinks they've gotten through this uncomfortable episode. "Just as long as you're not about to freak out and be an idiot about this -" he begins.

'We're cool,' Dave interrupts. He freezes his entire face so nothing leaks through. He has no illusions that he can out-pokerface Bro; he just needs to convince the guy Dave is totally on board with the meteor-baby thing and then Dave can jump back in time again and freak the hell out more privately. Maybe, if he's feeling really uncool, he can even find a dark alleyway and have a nice quiet meltdown. 'And look. Fuck. I'll get rid of some of the AJ when I get back.'

He didn't mention he'd get rid of the apple juice by drinking it. That much was implied.

Bro sniffs, like the whole apple juice debacle no longer matters. "Whatever kid. Just be up early tomorrow. We're bonding."

'Sure.' Dave is probably too terse, but he's always a bit more laconic when he's forced to rely on his hands, so hopefully Bro doesn't notice the difference. 'This was a shitty intervention, I hope you know.'

"It was a fantastic intervention, brat. Just tell your sister I said hey." Bro grins like a cocky cock and vanishes, leaving Dave to his new emotional trauma.

Goddammit, Bro. Too soon.

He's halfway to the movie theater in a more rundown part of town when the cueball shows up. Again.

It's been doing that on and off, lately, appearing in midair above him and generally acting like the creepy murderghost it secretly is. Sure, the cueball hasn't tried to actually murder him (yet) but it is definitely racking up a creepy X10 combo. The Quandary told him to blow the thing up, but Dave has been kind of busy being the Steve Jobs of apple juice, so he hasn't really thought about purchasing explosives too much.

Dave stops and waits for a good five minutes, checking his phone while he waits to see if the creepy-ass spying eyeball is going to float down to his level where he can try stabbing it without flinging swords around like a shitty circus freak. Neither Rose nor John have responded to his kind of really urgent pesterings, while is kind of a bummer, but he just has to remind himself that John is probably already doing the hero thing at this time of night in Seattle. The kid starts early. He doesn't know what excuse Rose has, but he doesn't know her as well as he knows John. Before this, he's literally only texted her maybe once? And that was only in response to some kind of weird mutual contract she proposed that had to do with watching out for John. Yeah, Dave didn't really read the fine print there.

Oh god, Rose is his sister. Fuck. Why the hell did Bro need to vomit up that little tidbit? Of all the things in the world Dave would actually have been totally okay with not knowing, this pretty much tops the list. Seriously, what shitty hero comic did he pull the 'long lost sister' plot line from? Bull. Shit.
And - and - wait, is that a spider with hot choclety milk? Dave snersks and then slaps a hand over his mouth before realizing holy fuck when did he open Tumblr. He closes out of the app, gasping as he puts the phone away. That was too close for comfort. That site is a fucking blackhole, and seriously, he has no memory of opening it up. The last thing he remembers is Pesterchum, how does this kind of shit even happen?

Where was he? Fucking focus, Strider. Coughing, Dave scans the air around him until he finds the cueball again. It's at a diagonal above him now, hovering in lazy loops around a street light, and seems content to watch him from there. He sighs and pauses time, flashstepping up the side of the light post and kicking off with his sword drawn. He slices through the air where the cueball should be, but hits nothing. He falls through the transparent cueball and lands in a crouch, looking up just in time to see the white ball flicker and vanish.

He's beginning to suspect the Quandary was full of bullshit when she explained this thing. There was a lot of talk about 'observing you' and 'blow that shit up' from what Dave recollects, and none of that matters because the cueball doesn't even seem to be a solid object. It watches him, sure, but he's starting to think the real cueball is hiding out elsewhere, and all he sees is some bizarre projection of its ungodly wandering eye.

He'd say murderghost again, but that's getting kind of old, and now that the image is in his head, all he can think of is the eye of Sauron being replaced by a giant white cueball.

…Not that he's watched those movies or anything. Or read the books. Or anything like that. He has way more cool things to do with his time, and if he ever cracked open one of those high fantasy books, it was done solely in the interest of high irony, thanks very fucking much.

Anyway. Yeah. Back on track, here. Dave plays it so very cool, glancing up at the night sky so he looks totally inconspicuous as he wanders further down the street. Now that the sensation of being watched constantly has faded with the cueball's disappearance, he's feeling almost normal again. Less paranoid, anyway. If there's one thing Dave is good at, it's letting his mind run off on random tangents until he can forget the things he doesn't want to think about. And he doesn't want to think about anything to do with potential siblings at all.

He halts by an old unused mailbox, scuffing his shoes against the curb as he pretends to be absorbed in the boarded up windows of the old pharmacy across the street. It looks like someone was eating barbeque here, and the food they dropped has been rotting for about a week, being torn at by insects and rats and whatever the fuck else likes running around in the dark.

Really, though, he's thinking about the movie theater just down the road. From out here, it looks like your pretty standard Cinemark gone wrong, the bleached sun marks where the letters of the sign used to be still legible. The little windows where they hung up posters of the movies that were currently showing were emptied ages ago, leaving the place anonymous and nondescript.

It wouldn't be any different from the other abandoned businesses along this particularly unlucky street, except for the fact that Dave tracked a member of the Midnight Crew back here and set up surveillance for an entire night using a future-Dave so he could scope out the situation. It's not like he was going to run in there half-cocked, okay? The BQ might be an evasive dame, but she was right - he can't just barge in and start beating the shit out of them. Having talked with John more over the past few days than he has in months, he's pretty much got the lowdown on these guys, enough to know that they can be pretty nasty when crossed. Maybe not enough to earn the irrational, uncharacteristic fury they seem to rouse in Bro whenever the Crew gets brought up in casual conversation, but dangerous enough that Dave took fucking precautions, all right?

But yeah, there's a reason he didn't want Bro knowing where he was headed. As in many respects, Bro's hate for the Crew is just a bizarre new potential trap Dave has to avoid triggering. Besides, no matter how much Bro might advocate running as the solution to a Crew infestation, Dave is more of the 'run them out of town' mindset. It certainly seemed to have worked out just fine for John, the last time he checked.

And now, it's time for some more in-depth recon.

He has changed into a nice dark suit just for the occasion, too, with a fucking sicknasty scratched record sigil on the lapel. He's torn for a moment about maybe taking off his shades to go into full-on hero mode, but he decides against it; if the Midnight Crew really are sniffing around being dumbfucks to try to find the Flashstep, there's no need to go flashing his handsome mug for everyone to admire. If anyone asks, Dave is currently in super-spy mode, and he is going to totally blend in with the real Crew members in the building.

This plan is goddamn flawless.

Sliding his hands into his pockets, Dave takes a deep breath and lets the last of the tension unknot in his stomach, walking toward the movie theater.

Time to be suave. As. Fuck.

---

The minute Karkat and Crabdad are out the door, a hand descends on John's shoulder with the weight of an anvil. He's shocked enough that his dad wheels him around with ease, Samuel Egbert's icy blue eyes tense as he watches John. "John? John, look at me, I need you to focus."

"Y-yeah," John replies weakly, but he can feel himself tailspinning on the inside. There's an inkling of helplessness trying to gnaw its way into his head, and he quashes it as best he can. But he's not a magician like Rose; he can't go into his own head and remake everything so it works better. He's stuck with this shitty depression that rears its ugly head at the worst possible times, a constant murmur in the back of his mind.

You should have known better than to think you'd get to keep him. Being partners with some random hero you picked up off the street was doomed to end in catastrophe, and it's your fault you didn't see this coming -

The only really useful thing he ever got out of those official therapy sessions though, is the knowledge that the depression isn't logical. It fucking sucks, and it's hard, but John forces himself to think through it and nod at his dad. "Okay. We go over it, step by step," John rasps, holding himself together through sheer force of will. If he and his dad can get through their usual play-by-play, he's sure they can sort this out, and once they do John can shove the hard, solid, irrefutable facts at his dysfunctional brain until it can't keep up that litany of self-deprecation anymore.

It helps - it really does - that John painfully, intensely, wants to believe in Hemogoblin. No way does John intend to give up trusting his fellow hero until the moment he finds hard proof that Hemogoblin actually was involved in - in -

"Start simple. Start with the facts. What did the first report say about the explosion at the police station?" his dad says. His voice is like a lifeline, firm and unyielding and familiar, and John grabs hold. "You remember this, John, I gave you the copy of the official report. Run me through it."

"A man claiming to be the legal representative of Hearts Boxcars entered the station," John rattles off, closing his eyes and trying to picture the scene in his mind. "He had a briefcase that was not inspected like it should have been, and demanded a private session with his client, during which he and Hearts constructed a functional bomb and used the ensuing chaos to make their escape. Eyewitness accounts generally agree that the perpetrator was a man in his late thirties with darker hair but no real distinguishing marks."

"Not a troll, then," Samuel states. "Could Hemogoblin have snuck into the precinct to assist in delivering parts for the device at any point?"

John's whole mind revolts at the thought. But he knows what his dad is doing, and he knows they have to consider every angle, question any possibility. "He could have done it out of costume," John says, counting backward from ten in his head. "The report states that only the human lawyer and Hearts were in the holding room itself, but a...potential accomplice could have snuck in with other parts of the bomb and passed them on to the lawyer."

"There's no evidence that that was the case," Samuel says, his voice still level. "I can request more information from my police contact, but in a room filled with at least twenty five people, more than half of them police, none of them mentioned the lawyer interacting with anyone but the officer behind the desk, the escorting officer, and Hearts Boxcars. Even a brief interaction with a young troll would have been noted."

"He could still have done the same thing, but before the lawyer even arrived at the station," John realizes. By this point Samuel has drawn them both back over into the kitchen, where Samuel can pace and John can lean one hand on the table to support himself. John can vaguely remember a time when they'd always gone to his dad's office to discuss this kind of thing, but those interactions had been tainted by John's breakdown, and they switched to the kitchen in the years since. He hasn't actually been in the office in...ages. "He helped fight Hearts Boxcars, but that would easily have been a front."

"But the police would have no reason to suspect him if such an interaction took place so long before the explosions. They wouldn't even have been aware of that kind of scenario. We can't speculate that wildly; we'd run ourselves senseless." Samuel shakes his head, his hands locked behind his back. "No, it's this blood evidence that has me most concerned," Samuel says, still pacing from the kitchen table to the fridge and back with tight strides. John understands the impulse to move; he thinks if he tries to move from this spot, he'll scream and set off an accidental whirlwind in the kitchen. Which would be kinda not cool and would definitely cause a lot of trouble for his dad.

But wait. There was something - "The blood evidence?" John says. He presses at his eyelids with the heels of his palms, and remembers. "Hang on. Hemogoblin said he got caught in the secondary explosion on the roof, but that the damage wasn't too extensive. Otherwise he wouldn't have been out fighting the next night." Hope springs up because that - that's plausible. "If he lost blood during that, it's possible the police just picked up on it, and jumped to conclusions." By the end of that, John is talking at twice the usual speed, his eyes wide as he realizes that yes, this is a totally logical sequence of events. There is the possibility, a very strong one, that Hemogoblin just goofed after nearly getting blown up - which is totally understandable! - and didn't suck all the blood back into his body to heal an injury, like he had with the cut on his cheek. John doesn't know how all the troll's powers work, after all.

"The explosion meant for you," his dad murmurs, eyes pained. "I really don't like this, John. I don't like just how rapidly this Midnight Crew has escalated to targeting you directly. And where does Hemogoblin fit into all this?"

They're still mid run-through. Time to finish it out. John could almost cry with relief right now, having found such a simple explanation for why the police would consider Hemogoblin a suspect,
"He could have lied. You have only his word for it, after all. And by falsifying that kind of information, he could convince you to trust him all the more," Samuel points out.

Oh, no. John gnaws on his lip, hard enough that he forgets himself and actually draws blood. "True," he has to concede eventually. "But I also don't think it would make sense for him to fake it and then end up in a position where the police would consider him a suspect. That just causes unnecessary trouble for him; this could all end really badly if he actually gets arrested and unmasked."

"The only way to get a better sense of things -"

"-is to ask him myself," John finishes.

And. Actually. Wow, it really does make a lot more sense now. John's no longer close to blacking out from hopeless panic, and he blinks, surprised.

His dad nods, a smile at the corner of his lips. He's no longer pacing back and forth, and in fact he reaches the table and begins picking up the dirty dishes still leftover from their abruptly ended dinner with Karkat and Crabdad. On autopilot John makes a move to help clean up, but Samuel shakes his head. "It's a little early in the night, but you need to keep on top of this," he advises, running water in the sink. "After that news report, Hemogoblin will be feeling the pressure, whether the accusation is true or not."

"Good idea." John turns, and then hesitates, turning back toward his dad with his arms folded. "You thought that was what happened from the start," John huffs, but his frown is good-natured, a smile tugging up his lips so his teeth show. He gets it. His dad might be duly suspicious of Hemogoblin, as an unknown element who could at any moment prove to be a threat to John's hero work, but he's also aware of just how excited John is about their partnership. In a situation like this, Samuel is way more neutral and objective than John, and he used that to talk John through a near meltdown.

His dad is pretty freaking awesome.

"I had a hunch, after the initial shock faded," Samuel admits, his eyes crinkling up in an answering grin. He pats John on the shoulder before sobering. "Where this Midnight Crew is concerned, I don't think we can afford to underestimate them. The fact that the police department jumped straight to seeing Hemogoblin as a suspect, rather than a potential victim caught in the crossfire, seems a little fishy to me."

John grimaces. "We already knew when Hearts got out on bail earlier that they have connections in the legal system. Pretty strong ones, too." He straightens up, his eyes already flicking towards the stairwell. "If Hemogoblin is being framed, he could end up in a whole lot of trouble, really fast. Ohhh man."

"Go, go," Samuel says, waving a hand at him. With all that finally settled, John hurtles up the stairs. It's early in the night, but the sky gets dark pretty early still, so he should have enough cover to get out of his room without being spotted. Taking down the poster on his wall, he uses both keys to unlock the safe and pull out Heir's costume, and starts kicking his jeans off, hopping in place. The instinct to hurry thuds in his chest, and he nearly falls flat on his face before the wind catches him and shoves him upright again.

He's so used to discarding some of the more extraneous sensory input he gets from his power, it takes him a moment to register his dad's breathing, the slight stirring in the air that means Samuel is standing in the doorway of John's bedroom. John stiffens and turns, the darker half of his brain already whispering that something else must have gone wrong, has to have gone wrong, because his dad hasn't seen John off for patrol in - years, it must be. Since he first trusted John to fight crime solo, even.

Baahhhh. He needs to stop thinking so negatively! All this drama is cramping his style! Dave would totally not approve, John decides, and he brightens a little before pulling up the straps of his goggles to snap them on. "Yeah, Dad?"

John's attitude does little to alleviate the tense wrinkles still crunching at the corner of his dad's eyes. He steps further into the room. "John. Are you sure you can handle tonight?" Samuel grips John by the chin and makes him meet his gaze.

John still feels a little off, yeah, but he's no longer spinning in the blind, helpless panic from before. He's got his center back. Seeing his dad's reassuring concern just solidifies that. John may be air, but his dad is bedrock, grounding him even when everything else seems to be falling apart. "I've got it," John replies, smiling back. For a moment, he is absolutely crystal clear, balance and centered and whole. Then his dad releases his grip with a proud nod, and John slings Casey onto his back.

His dad is still watching as Heir tips out the window, the air whisking him up into the sky before any of the neighbors could see anything suspicious. Grim and worried, but no longer breaking, Heir urges the wind onward with a murmur and streaks toward downtown Seattle.

Either Hemogoblin has been framed, in which case he needs some serious help, or he really was involved in one of the explosions, and he needs to be caught. Heir has to brace himself for either option.

But he knows which one he desperately needs to be the case.

Hemogoblin, however, is as elusive tonight as he ever was those first few weeks the troll hero started working. No matter how Heir frets at the breeze, it whirls around him in confusion and pulls him toward the scene of another minor crime. And yeah, it's not like Heir is just gonna fly away from a crime in progress! But after the fourth mugging, he's getting antsy again. This kind of crisis can't afford to wait; he needs to meet up with Hemogoblin, like, yesterday! Arghhh. Of all the times for the wind to waffle over Hemogoblin.

Heir is wondering, though, if it's not secretly his own fault. The moment that thought hits him, he jerks to a halt midair. He's somewhere near cloud level, just beneath the looming puff of a misty grey cloud, illuminated by the light of the city below. He flattens out on his back and closes his eyes, forcing himself along that train of thoughts.

The connection he has with the breeze has always been a little obscure, even to John. Sure, he can throw air around in blasts and summon hurricanes, but he's just as much guided by the wind as he guides it. Someone like Rose would probably analyze the ability until she understood every aspect of how it interacted with his mind, but usually John just accepts that it works. If the wind disapproves of an action, or senses some danger it thinks he can't handle, as it had the night of the bank explosion, it makes its opinion very clear, to the point of nearly dropping John altogether to make him listen.

But the fact is, John's emotions and thoughts affect the wind, too - when he was little, even the slightest burst of laughter or tears could whip up the air around John into a frenzy, probably one of the first signs his dad probably had that he wasn't exactly dealing with a normal kid. His training since then has helped repress some of that seamless flow of sensory input between him and the air - if he walked around with an open channel between him and his powers, he probably would start floating everyone at school out of sheer exhilaration, just like Dave is always teasing him about. No, his dad taught him control for a good reason.

But still. Emotions do continue to slip through John's tight grip on the connection. And right now, while John - Heir - may feel the pressure to find Hemogoblin right away, he's also painfully anxious and worried about it. If his nervousness is strong enough, it's no wonder the breeze is getting confused, torn between two conflicting impulses.

Safe up here, facing the clouds, Heir pulls down his mask and gulps down as large a breath of air as he can. The cool night air shoots straight to his brain, dissipating the last of his nervous fog, and he firms his mouth in a frown before tugging the dark mask back up over the lower half of his face.

"Take me to Hemogoblin, now. We need to settle this," he tells his personal breezes, the ones who always tend to cradle and wrap first around his body when he leaves the house.

This time, the response is immediate and decisive, and he knows acknowledging his nervousness helped clarify his intent. An excited gale loops around Heir's waist and tugs at his wrist like an eager puppy, and he lets it usher him into the night.

Heir loops low over the rooftop. He knows he spotted someone moving fast across the roofs in this general area, and the breezes are quite sure this is the place to be if he wants to meet Hemogoblin. They're overly active still, whipping at his jacket and sneaking up the hems of his pants' legs, and Heir knows he needs to tone them down for the sake of his own sense of control, if nothing else. Instead, he directs them to spiral outward gently, so he can trying to sense the breathing patterns of anyone who might be hiding out up here - hopefully Hemogoblin.

"Heir! Heir, hey!"

Or, uh. Hemogoblin could just...run right up to him? Heir blinks and twists, still hovering in midair, and spies the other hero at last. He's three roofs away and moving fast, dashing toward Heir's position with none of his usual flips and aerial acrobatics mid-leap when he jumps the gaps. John curls one defensive wind around his body, just in case (Hemogoblin is running really fast, okay?), but otherwise he lands on the surface of the roof, waiting as Hemogoblin lands in a roll on this particular roof.

When the troll straightens up, Heir immediately shifts his evaluation of this whole mess more firmly into the 'Hemogoblin was framed' box, because Hemogoblin looks apprehensive, something like more like fear in his red eyes as he hesitates and takes a half of a step away from Heir. It's hard to tell with the clouds blocking out a lot of the moonlight, The troll falls into a pretty flawless approximation of his usual seductive posture, but for right now Heir is toooootally immune. They've got too much Serious Business to discuss, and Hemogoblin knows it too, judging by the paleness of his face. "Hemogoblin," he says, pushing his hood back up - it had flown back from his face at some point during the flight over. "Dude, please tell me you've got an explanation that makes sense because holy shit, man."

"I know," Hemogoblin replies, grimacing. "I've been trying to catch up with you all night, but I kept losing track of you. You move fast."

Oops. "My bad. I've been trying to find you too and kept getting sidetracked by work. Sorry." It's the truth, at least on one level. Hemogoblin does not need the dissertation on Heir's mental issues with "Yeah." Hemogoblin draws a shaky breath. In the state of nervy anxiety that Heir can still feel coloring his thoughts, he's more aware of that breath than usual, and can almost follow the breeze right down into the troll's lungs, which is just plain disorienting. "Look, I have no idea where this is coming from. I just - saw the press conference, and holy fuck, look at that, I'm a suspect for arson. And when I tried to punch out a guy at a gas station robbery, he tried to call the cops on me."

Heir winces because yeah, that would suck. "Do you know how they might have gotten you as a suspect? All you told me about that night was you got caught in the second explosion. I thought you weren't hurt all that badly."

Hemogoblin flinches and oh man that's not the reaction Heir wanted to get. It means something's up. "I...got some injuries from the shrapnel," he says, not quite meeting Heir's eyes. "I healed it, naturally, but I was in a hurry to catch up with Hearts. I didn't even think about the blood I got all over the roof in the process of getting shredded."

And yeah, there's something Hemogoblin is sitting on, Heir can tell. Now that Hemogoblin is standing right in front of him, Heir's not getting any kind of bad vibes from him at all - the wind is interested but not aggravated or defensive. He'd generally take that as a good sign that Hemogoblin could be trusted, but he's also aware that he really wants to believe that to be the case, and his emotional bias has affected the wind already tonight. This sucks. He can't trust himself to be objective half the time when Hemogoblin is involved. "Is there anything else you remember?" Heir urges, spreading out his hands. "Like, did anyone see you on the roof? I don't think there would be any camera up there, unless they were watching the stairwell, and it's sounds like the blood evidence is the only thing they really have on you."

"I don't know," Hemogoblin says, sounding frustrated. He's still not quite meeting Heir's eye. "I - I talked to an officer on the ground right after the first explosion, to figure out what was going on and see if you'd already been around. I didn't know you were gone that night, yet."

Shit. That little trip to Houston keeps coming back to bite Heir in the ass, and he winces inwardly. If he'd only been here that Friday night, maybe they could have caught Hearts together and prevented any accusations whatsoever. "I should have been here. I should have," he repeats, guilt-stricken. "I'm sorry -"

"It's not your fault/ I fucked up, okay!" Hemogoblin yells, running a claw up under his hood to tug at his hair. The motion tugs at - something - in Heir's chest, something really weirdly familiar. The troll finally meets Heir's eyes, and there's some kind of desperate fury in his expression. "I got all pissy and stupid over being blown up, and like a fucking moron I just took off running after the only lead I had at the time. I fucked it all up, and now this. Just - can you help me? Please. I know you have no reason to believe a word out of my fucking mouth, but I don't know what to do."

Another familiar crack in Heir's chest and - wow, all of a sudden, all he feels is sympathy for the troll in front of him. Hemogoblin looks absolutely miserable, and any lingering doubts Heir has kind of sweep to the back of his mind, where he can deal with them if and when he needs to. For right now, all his protective instincts just got flipped on. "It's okay, man," he says, trying to smile reassuringly in a way that's clear even behind his mask. "We're going to sort this out, one way or another. You didn't do the thing, so we've got that in our favor already. We just need to prove that you weren't anywhere nearby the station when the first explosion broke out, I think. They can babble all they want, but all they have is the blood from the roof, right? And I'm pretty sure they can't prove anything with that, since like you said it had to have come from an injury. You'd have no motive to blow yourself up on an empty rooftop."
It almost works. Heir can feel Hemogoblin's unsteady breathing start to settle back down, though the troll continues to fidget near the edge of the roof, ready to jump to the next at any sign of trouble. Their partnership is just still so new, Heir thinks. They don't have the kind of total trust they'd need to be comfortable with each other right now, at such a critical moment. "How do we convince them of that, though?" Hemogoblin asks. "It's not like I can walk up to them and announce 'hello police, I'm here to turn myself in.' They'd have the mask off in seconds, and I know you understand that's not an option." He looks up at Heir from under lowered eyelids.

"I do think we need to talk to someone from the station, though," Heir says, holding up his hands when Hemogoblin takes another step back. "We need to know how serious this accusation is, and exactly what they'd need to believe you weren't involved. When the Midnight Crew is involved, things are bound to be more complicated than we think. If Hearts or his fake lawyer left something else in the old station connected to you, it could be a pretty serious frame-up. We need all the facts, and we're not going to get them - or prove your innocence - unless we talk to a legit police officer. You need to be seen cooperating as much as you can."

"I can't just waltz into the station right now, Heir," Hemogoblin says, his voice strained. "You're human and more distant from this kind of thing, but trust me when I say it was bad enough that the police thought I was faking the red eyes. Now that they have proof -" the troll breaks off, miserable hatred contorting his face so quickly that Heir barely catches it before it is gone. "-proof that I'm a goddamn freak of nature, trust me, the troll cops are going to be gunning for me, regardless of this whole mess."

"You can't really think that," Heir says, wishing he could give this guy a hug. He looks worn out. Like seriously. The eye slits of Hemogoblin's mask are cut wide enough that Heir can see the dark shadows underlining each perfectly shaped candy-red eye. But he is not getting sidetracked by Hemogoblin's really pretty eyes at all oh come on. The point is, despite the fact that Hemogoblin is still really attractive agggh, he looks just as stressed as Heir would be if he'd just been accused of this kind of thing.

"I know it," Hemogoblin replies, folding his arms and looking out over the city. He looks like he's trying to hug himself now and Heir is giving serious thought to that hug thing no no stop that before the troll continues. "People can claim all the hemotype-blindness they want - when mutant-bloods show up, they don't generally last long. Human cops won't give two fucks, no, but trolls...I've got two different targets on my head right now, Heir. Even if I thought I could testify on my side of the story without risking being unmasked, I'd still be in the middle of a station full of skittish troll cops and Legislacerators."

Heir sighs heavily, still kind of skeptical - he's aware that there's at least a few cops on the force who must be corrupt, for the Crew to have won bail, but he thinks there would definitely be a bit more of an uproar if troll cops went around killing people willy nilly because they had a different blood color, from the human police at least! But he's not the candy-blooded troll here, and if Hemogoblin thinks this is too dangerous, he would probably know more about this particular situation that Heir. "Alright. New plan," Heir corrects himself, folding his arms too, to resist that hugging instinct. He most certainly does not want any excuse to touch dat banging bod- nooooope. "I know a contact in the station who sometimes passes stuff on to me. He'll probably be willing to come out on the roof of the new station to talk, and you can hang out somewhere out of sight until I can get him somewhere private. He's, uh, human, so the whole blood color thing won't be an issue, right?"

Hemogoblin relaxes a little, loosening his death grip on his own arms. Heir can see little indents in the troll's exposed grey skin, little crescent moons of red where his claws dug in that close over in a few seconds. "That should work," Hemogoblin concedes, still trying for that confidence nonchalance. It's ruined when he pauses again, his eyes flickering downward shyly. "Thank you.
"Don't worry. You're my partner," Heir says, grinning crookedly. "I, like, have to give you the benefit of a doubt before I start jumping to conclusions. Also, you're totally a newbie, I can't just let you deal with this by yourself!"

"Alright," Hemogoblin replies, the first hint of a real smirk finally appearing. Success, Heir thinks. "Mind giving me a ride?"

…No, going by the absence of the usual super-seductive look on Hemogoblin's face that he always gets when he's teasing Heir, he just imagined that one. Yup. Moving right along… "We're going to sort this out. Definitely!" Heir claps his hands together and mentally urges the wind to lift them both up. Still rough and a little frisky from Heir's high-strung emotions, the breeze that handles Hemogoblin plucks at the troll's hood and strands of his bangs. When Hemogoblin frowns and pulls the hood further forward with a slight pout, the wind whistle loudly and pulls him upward at the same time as Heir with force that blasts them wayyyy higher than they need to go. Hemogoblin raises an eyebrow at Heir and all he can do is blush furiously and try to soothe the twitchy winds without physically miming shooshpaps with his hands to accompany the soothing. He blames Karkat for that impulse.

When some of the gales come to sulk around Heir's ankle, he sees that the winds still wrapped around him and Hemogoblin are much less snarled and rambunctious. Good. Maybe he can even go through an entire night of working together with Hemogoblin without making himself look like a total dork, this time!

"Ready to go?" he asks, remembering his manners at the last minute.

Hemogoblin's face is set in a solemn frown as he glares out over the city. "Ready," is all he says, and then they're off.

Idaho

Okay. Jade can explain.

See, Utah was boooring. So boring. Mostly because she spent half the time they were in the state paranoid because the Midnight Crew finally caught up. It seems whatever the creepy Clowntown from Mexico did to Clubs and his men wasn't permanent - which she is kind of grateful for. She'd been preoccupied with WV's mysterious collapse at the time, but she would have felt awful if she found out he'd given them brain damage or something with those weird fear powers.

Anyway, because Clubs mysteriously arrived, riding on a tricycle, along the banks of the Great Salt Lake, Jade had to cut their time in Utah short, and they detoured far to the east, way over into the Dakotas, just trying to put some space between them and Clubs. It's been about two days since the Crew last showed up, but Jade's not taking any chances. She 'commandeered' some supplies from a local university, created a localized spatial anomaly, and then had Bec teleport the container around the States while she and WV walked west. Bec left the anomaly somewhere in Carthage, Missouri, and when he came back Jade did her best to order it to tone down the radiation it gives off naturally. Bec usually seems to understand orders well enough; the problem is whether or not the wolf is actually capable of turning down the power it gives off. Jade thinks they've succeeded, at least temporarily.
But anyway, they ended up having to travel west the norrrrnormal way again, which meant they passed through all of Montana (which was gorgeous, with lots of neat people with guns Jade got to chat up along the way!) before Jade decided to divert them sharply south. Because she would have to be dumb as rocks to walk in a straight line to John's place so Clubs could follow her all the way there! So they end up looping through southeast Idaho.

And how is Jade supposed to resist the opportunity to visit the Craters of the Moon national preserve?! She can't, that's how! They just had to make a pitstop!

During the day, this place looks like a craggy, blasted wasteland, with the crumbly dark flood basalt leftover from past volcanic activity dull and dark. But Jade has made WV sit with her a few hours, and now it's sunset. Most of the other visitors to the nature preserve have either hightailed it for the visitor's center or headed back off to their vehicles, so they have the place mostly to themselves. Bec is curled up by her feet, its white body a circle on the dark earth, and WV is next to her. Now, Jade is just waiting for the sun to hit just the right angle, so she can see if it really -

The field before them begins to glitter in the slanting light, a glazed surface of the rock now wavering with a kind of silvery sheen. The more the sun sinks, the more the fragments reflect the light at odd angles, until the sun slips away and the effect is lost.

Short, but worth it, she decides. As the sky darkens and the moon takes over, a similar effect occurs, with a more bluish silver hue playing across the wavy surface of the basalt.

"Science," Jade breathes, resting her chin on her knees. She's more of a physics and space kind of gal, of course, but volcanoes and the like will always have a special place in her heart; it's hard to grow up right next to a semi-active volcano and not get attached! "You know, they have the same kind of flood basalts on the Moon, WV," she says, nudging the carapacian with her foot. "They call them the maria though. All the dark splotches are old volcanic floods."

The moon is out up above, having risen while the sun was still in the sky, and WV looks up obediently - politely, she thinks. It's hard to tell if any of this science stuff actually interests WV when he still can't talk, but he always listens and nods carefully to her explanations before going back to whatever game he's playing, off in his own little world. Right now he still has an empty can of Coke Zero and is busily working the can-opening tab off by wiggling it between his claws until it twists off. He then drops the tab into the empty can and shakes it. He'd been a little depressed upon learning that Jade couldn't locate any TaB today, but he seems to have recovered somewhat from the disappointment.

"Come on, we can go check out the lava tubes now. Though it might be too dark for that, actually" Jade says, patting the carapacian on the back. He's looking downright spiffy in his new sidekick duds, if she does say so herself! He's got the blue poncho folded up somewhere; he's really attached to that thing. "Probably just go get something to eat..."

WV perks right up at that one, and Jade smiles. She pulls her phone out of the pocket of her coat and holds it up, waiting for the signal to kick in. She's on a special plan put together by Grandpa that has complete coverage throughout 'all of time and space,' though she can't imagine when she'd ever need to worry about time! Biting her thumb, she gives the phone a jolt of power so the battery won't crap out on her while she's using Pesterchum.

It's really getting down to the wire, John! If he doesn't shape up soon, Jade will already be there by the time he answers all her emails. She's seriously starting to worry John won't be expecting her when she gets to Seattle. What if he and his guardian don't have room at the house? What if Jade is an inconvenience?! Oh no, she's getting nervous again…
Bluh. She'll just yell at John for being a dumb butt for a bit, and then call it a day.

GG: joooooooooooohn~~~
GG: ughgh, i don't know why i always get my hopes up :(
GG: i gonna put you in a chokehold until you apologize the minute i see you!
GG: and then we can hug! not before. after.
GG: it's a sacrifice i'm willing to make :/
GG: i heard there were a lot of explosions over there recently tho - are you okay?
GG: bahahaha! of course you're okay! you're my baby brother, i'm sure you did just fine. :)))
GG: ...
GG: it would be a lot easier to be an awesome supportive big sister if you would answer, yah know :P
GG: even though it's just a few month's difference
GG: ahhhh! i'm getting excited again! i can't wait to finally meet you in person!
GG: i know you're just gonna love bec, too
GG: grandpa always said bec was programmed to protect me, but i totally bet it will like you too, just like it likes wv
GG: oooooh yeah! did i tell you?! wv officially joined team space!
GG: i know you're not a spacy person really, but you can join too i bet.
GG: because family totally gets a pass!
GG: :)
GG: well, i just wanted to tell you you're a total dumb butt for ignoring me all these years
GG: or maybe that's just some traditional brother thing here in the us? grandpa never mentioned it, but he was british anyway.
GG: is this a hazing thing :O how mean john!
GG: ahaaha, i'll be there soon! and we can swap manly stories and talk about science and paint our toenails and beat people up!
GG: i think that's what siblings do, anyway
GG: it'll be AWESOME
GG: good luck at work tonight, john!

Jade closes the phone and picks up WV under his arms, swinging him around in a wide spin that has him squeaking with surprise before hauling him onto her shoulders. He grips her hair like reins, scolding her with a crackle, and she laughs. "Come on, WV. We're on the homestretch!"

Somewhere in the continental United States

It's a pretty damn rare occasion for all the members of the Midnight Crew to be in the same room at once, Hearts Boxcars muses, gnawing on the end of his cigar. Fuck if he doesn't wish he could light this sucker up, but he's too terrified of the possible reaction, if any, he might get from the Boss if he got smoke all in his fancy office. The Boss is unpredictable; yah never know what might set him off.

Diamonds is lounging up against the wall by herself, tapping away on her phone with that tense posture she gets when she's busy orchestrating shenanigans in a different time zone. Judging by the faintly dreamy look in her usually scornful eyes, it must be one of her ransom demands coming to fruition. Probably the senator's daughter she kidnapped sometimes last week. Hearts knows the look because he makes the same gleeful expression when he gets the opportunity to rip a bank vault's door off its hinges with his bare hands or a well-timed explosive.
Still a little weird to see Diamonds wearing makeup so openly and think 'she,' even years later, but hell, Hearts ain't judgin' anybody. And basically nothing about Diamonds Droog has changed, either - she's still the same uptight, snarky suit-obsessed maniac she always was, and he's gotta lot of respect for a dame who can beat the shit out of him in a fight. He knows he could overpower her in terms of sheer strength, but Diamonds is also perpetually angry and that kind of brutal rage is hard to argue with.

Meanwhile, Clubs is of course as all up in Diamonds's business as he conceivably can be, his short legs swinging over the side of the lime green table he's sitting on as he leans over to try and get a look at Diamonds's phone screen. Clubs is just someone whose existence Hearts is utterly resigned to; a bumbling troll who gets results on occasion, but whose function is generally a mystery. Diamonds gets the worst of it, anyway. The most Hearts has had to suffer through is the occasional drunken, sniffiling conversation over a drink with the little guy about how Diamonds ignores him. Yeah, he doesn't even wanna know. Phrases like 'WHY WON'T HE SHOOSH ME BACK' get thrown around too often when Clubs talks about Diamonds, and nope. Hearts is not touching that one with a thirty foot car antennae. Not ever. Relationship issues are not his department.

He just hopes the Boss gets around to explaining this little shindig before Clubs starts embarrassing himself. Hearts has so many better things to do with his time than cringe over incompetent paleflirting.

Like getting back to Seattle. There are two little shits over there he owes one helluva beatdown for all the bullshit they're putting him through, and he's still pissed the Boss pulled him before he could make sure they learned their goddamn lesson.

Now then. Shall we begin?

Hearts straightens up and adjusts his hat as the Boss turns away from his weird chess sphere at last, his gleaming white orb-head cushioned by the high back of his green armchair. Hearts's jaw works as he glances around at the other two Crew suit members, trying to tell if they know why they were all called here, either. He's not the best at reading faces, a'ight, but Clubs at least is an open book, and the troll looks as bemusedly confused as ever. Diamonds simply tucks her cell away in a pocket with a sigh, tilting her head as she catches Hearts staring. She smirks and looks to the Boss, and Hearts hastens to do the same.

The Boss folds his fingers together in a steeple.

In light of recent events, you all may be aware that I pulled you away from assignments rather abruptly. Rest assured that in actuality, this exact sequence of events was planned for quite a while ago. There was an element of the unpredictable due to the confounding nature of this universe, but it was only a matter of time. I owe you an apology in particular, Droog; I know you do dislike missions that never reach a conclusion, but I'm afraid I trusted you most with ensuring that certain game pieces moved into the most opportune position for the next move on the board.

Diamonds shifts slightly, and looks somewhat mollified. Hearts hasn't taken a slant at her latest mission reports, mostly because there were about six of them over the course of the past few weeks, all irritably labeled 'INCOMPLETE,' waiting in his email inbox and he's not all that good with the email app yet, alright? And Diamonds always formats her shit with the smallest possible font so that Hearts has to squint to make the fuzziness go away. It just gives him a headache.

"You did promise me something a little more concrete, boss," Diamonds presses, her voice a low murmur with almost all of her sarcastic edge repressed. "I trust I can still be of service?"
I did, didn't I. And I am of course a man of my word. First, though, Boxcars - would you care to give a brief overview of your work in Seattle?

Hearts startles, coughing awkwardly to cover his dismay as he adjusts his hat again. He can't bring himself to look at the Boss directly anymore - it's too unnerving - and Diamonds is judging him silently with a raised eyebrow as usual, so he focuses on Clubs's open, baffled face. At least Clubs doesn't fuckin' scare the hell outta him, even if he is an idiot. "Went into Seattle to set up the usual supply line," he grunts, clearing his throat again. "Got tagged by some windy kid hero on our first major heist. Him 'n his surprise partner did a number on the grunts, and we got evac'd from the lockup by one 'o Diamonds's. Thanks for that, Di."

Diamonds just shrugs bonelessly, flipping a hand to the side in dismissal. "Yes, I have Critchton working a misinformation racket as we speak. He's mildly competent with such matters."

When Diamonds says mildly competent, Hearts knows, she really means this Critchton character is one of her handpicked recruits, like that infuriating Marlowe chump who's standing outside the office doors right now on lookout. Hearts doesn't need much brains in his division of the Crew - he just needs guys and gals who can throw a goddamn punch and don't mind getting' in a tussle if a shipment goes awry. Clubs seems to have accumulated a team divided up into a mix of handlers who try to manage his more inane capers and nutjobs who like building giant robots and encouraging said capers. Diamonds has the most diversified division, covering everything from strategic kidnapping to targeted assassinations, and Hearts doesn't envy her the time-consuming task of managing all of her hyper-competent, overspecialized operatives.

I am familiar with Critchton's work. I'll leave the results of his little scheme a nice surprise for you, Droog. In the meanwhile, Droog, I'd like you to take over in Seattle shortly.

"What?!" Hearts and Diamonds shout in unison. Clubs squeaks and falls forward off the table.

"Sir, setting up new satellite camps is more Hearts's specialty than my own." Diamonds continues, kicking at Clubs impatiently when he timidly reaches out to pap at her ankle. "I - dammit, Clubs! I had hoped you would allow me to continue my pursuit of this Spades Slick."

"I can fucking handle those two hero fucks," Hearts then breaks in, his fists clenched. He should have pulverized those two punks the minute he laid eyes on 'em, not gone easy on the windy kid because he was just a kid. "Ave I ever let yah down before, boss?!"

Calm yourselves. Shhh. Help yourselves to some delicious candy.

There is a bowl of red wax lips candy that Hearts has been steadfastly ignoring on the fireplace mantle to his left. His mouth begins salivating at the very thought of hoarding some away for later, but - shit, he can't let this distract him from the fact that the Boss is trying to pull a fast one here! "Candy ain't got nothing to do with this, boss!" he insists before breaking down and shoving a handful of red candy into his free pocket. "I'm beggin' yah, let me handle these twerps!"

Eat your candy, Boxcars. Rest assured, you will have another round with the Heir and the Knight before long. But for now, I require your services elsewhere.

"The Knight?" Hearts asks weakly, but he gets the feeling he won't get much explanation here, either. That sort of thing infuriates Diamonds to no end of course, because she's an anal-retentive bastard, but Hearts is just kind of used to it. As long as he has something to smash, he's alright with coasting along. "I thought the Knight was the one in Houston? The one who's not actually calling himself a Knight, either, like with the Witch. I ain't met the time one, boss."
Not yet, you haven't. Though in this case, I am afraid the one calling himself Hemogoblin is a Knight as well. It is difficult to tell from your initial report, but he demonstrates enough mastery over blood to exploit it and weaponize it, as a Knight would. Whether he is a full-fledged player again or not remains to be seen.

"And yer sending Diamonds to see," Hearts repeats, eyeing Diamonds.

Oh no. It's not all that urgent a task. Even if he is a Knight, the Knight of a session twice-removed from the current one should be no trouble. I am sending Droog not just to attempt to elicit more data on that subject, but also to complete her earlier task. You see, I have few doubts left that Spades Slick is indeed heading for Seattle. And you will catch up to him, this time.

That gets Diamonds's attention, and Hearts withers inwardly at the gleam of interest that sparks in the woman's dark eyes. Fuck. Sounds like this Spades guy really has gotten Diamonds's attention, if he keeps evading her precious spy network. And if Diamonds agrees to go along with this transfer onto a mission that should have been Hearts's -

"Then it would be an absolute pleasure to pay a visit to the Northwest," Diamonds purrs, almost simpering as she smiles at the Boss.

Thank you very much, Droog.

- then Hearts has no chance at all of winning back his commission.

Motherfuckers.

The rest of the meeting passes in a blur, Hearts lost in a haze of red fury that he sits on until they are dismissed. Clubs has some shitty job, checkin in on the Scratches, which the troll is obviously ecstatic about because - well, he gets excited about everything. He's ignorant of the rising fury boiling up in Heart's corner of the room, and skips down the hallway whistling a familiar theme song as he heads up to the helicopter pad. The Scratches are housed relatively close to base, so Clubs won't have far to go.

Unlike Hearts, who suddenly finds he's been assigned to drive out to Virginia. While Diamonds, blast her mission-stealing face, gets to fly up to Seattle.

Hearts makes it down one flight of stairs, stomping hard on Diamonds's heels, before he loses his cool. He shoves Diamonds up against the wall. It doesn't cost him nearly as much effort as it should, which means Diamonds didn't try to resist him at all. Instead, she just cocks her head to the side, smiling at him infuriatingly. "Problem, Hearts?" she asks delicately, lifting a hand to inspect her fingernails.

There are any number of things Hearts could yell at this point. He could also just try to throttle Diamonds instead, but that would end in miserable defeat. So somehow, in his spitting rage, he plucks out the primary objection he has to this bullshit. "They're mine. Those two little fucks - Heirbear and Hemogofuckyourself - they're mine, Diamonds. Those fuckers cost me my operation, and I'll be the one to make them pay."

Diamonds wrinkles her nose. "Crude, Hearts," she hums, rolling her shoulders. "Try to have a little more professionalism, please. You wrote in the report yourself that it's 'Hemogoblin.' And I can make no promises, unfortunately. Orders are orders."

Hearts shoves Diamonds a little further up the wall. Hearts is taller than her, but only by a few inches when she's wearing those damned heels, and she can still nearly reach the ground from here. "I mean it, Diamonds," he says, punching a hole in the wall beside her face. Diamonds just looks bored. "Leave the Heir to me."

"Put me down before I break your arm in three places," Diamonds drawls, faking a little yawn while her eyes keep dancing with silent laughter. She is mocking him, goddamnit. "Fine, fine. I'll try to leave some of the windy kid so you can have a piece. I am meant to be focusing on our fine and upstanding young troll hero, after all. But if either of them gets in my way, I won't show them mercy. You'll just have to hope you can fly up in time for the party."

Smirking like the smirking, sarcastic bastard she is, Diamonds pats Hearts on the cheek and knees him discreetly in the groin. He lets go reflexively, keening slightly, and she just pats him one more time before tucking kinks of her curls back up under her hat and striding away through the lime green foyer to the rest of the stairwell down from the penthouse. Members of the Felt's accounting team scurry out of her way like she's a goddamn force of nature.

Blinking hard and trying not to just fall over from the pain in his balls, Hearts braces himself on the wall to recover, and only slowly becomes aware that someone is watching him. He glares out over the Felt workers, but none of them seem to be the culprit. Slowly, apprehensive, Hearts realizes the sensation of being stared at comes from above, and he swallows back the pain one more time before twisting to look up the stairs they'd just descended from.

What he sees doesn't make sense. It's…

Clubs?

The small troll squats at the top of the stairs leading up to the roof, glaring down at Hearts with a look of unmitigated animosity. Hearts hadn't even known Clubs could be that kind of angry. The fury is practically physical, and Hearts suddenly feels a little alarmed. I mean, Clubs is a tiny little brownblood, but he's still a troll, and they can pack a goddamn wallop. And thanks to Diamonds's parting shot, Hearts is more painfully aware than ever that Clubs is at a level to do some serious damage...

"He shooshpapped you," the troll breathes, incensed. "Diamonds - chose you?! How could you do this, Hearts, I trusted you!"

Oh for fuck's sake. Hearts slams his head against the wall.

It's gonna be a rough week for everyone. He can feel it.

Somewheege in the Atlantic Ocean…

An abomination is uncurling its way along the Gulf Stream. It is trying to minimize its impact, a dismal attempt at hiding its tracks as it unspools through the ocean, but it can't help the natural acid it exudes. It taints the water, leaving a trail of gasping fish and rogue deep-sea lusii behind it. This far beneath the surface of the ocean, there is no light but the pale luminescence of the Horrorterror, and so the pathetic, mortal sea dwelling creatures flock around it, gulping down poisonous bloodbrine with the typical ignorance of the nonsentient.

The Horrorterror, meanwhile, is muttering to itself. The musical discord of its voice is just loud enough that yet more of the sea life in its path succumbs; for some it is a quick death as their tiny brains implode, while others ooze out blood as their internal organs melt under the psychic pressure.
Gl'bglyb snaps a tentacle out and wraps it around a frilled shark, whipping the creature into one of its many mouths. It tastes like nothing, a mere morsel that does nothing to satiate Gl'bglyb's hunger. The Horrorterror has grown used to feeding itself over the years, an inconvenient action made necessary when it became clear that Tethys Peixes had no intention of fulfilling her duties as Gl'bglyb's chosen. The city-sized lusus had waited patiently in the deeps of the Furthest Ring, calling out to its troll and asking that she prepare the way for Gl'bglyb to come through to the physical plane, only to receive a resounding 'glub you, bitch' in reply.

That had been several hundred years ago. Since then, Gl'bglyb managed to find others willing to accommodate its need for a spirograph to come to this world, and has waited restlessly for a new heiress to back and retaliate against the one calling herself the Condescension has proven so resistant to negotiations. Something about 'killin' them all doesn't put yah on my good list, you murderous tr'aytor.' Gl'bglyb usually manages to psychically suppress and train that kind of sentimental grudge for something that happened sessions ago.

Honestly. It was only one small universe full of grubby little trolls that the Condescension would have eventually driven to their deaths all of her own accord! She is simply being petty about it, now.

It has been content to allow the Condescension to believe she is in a position of power above the Horrorterror, biding its time in the Sea of Azov. All the while, it has waited for the new heiress to come to the age of majority.

If 'in there is he as he has power to res is is M E l he en's he has risen above' n' r p l a r e.

It can be said to see the Condescension is in a position of power above the Horrorterror, biding its time in the Sea of Azov. All the while, it has waited for the new heiress to come to the age of majority.

Crossing the Atlantic takes relatively little effort. Hankering down upon the continental shelf, Gl'bglyb entrenches itself on the seabed and raises its muttering whisper just a smidgeon, just enough of a rasp to reach shore.

A school of fish bursts in tiny clouds of red that it absently waves into its maw, and the aquatic lusii in a nearby retirement community develop minor aneurysms. Gl'bglyb has no sympathy for lusii - though it has played the role of custodian before, true lusii naturae have never been more than food.

It lets the words reverberate through the water, until it feels the faint psychic response that is the mind of Feferi Peixes. The tyrian troll is still far off, somewhere on the Pacific coast, but Gl'bglyb can sense the scarred mind that resides near Feferi, and all of its mouths curl with glee as it insists mentally that Feferi abandon that far coast and come to her. Yes, that is the same mind one of its fellow tangles so brutally tore into, and even now Gl'bglyb can reach out through its connection to the Furthest Ring and contact the remnants of that same tangle with a faint query.

It would not be polite to interfere in the mind of Eridan Ampora without permission, naturally.

It will take time to obtain a response from that particular tangle, but Gl'bglyb is patient.

Unfortunately, it should have known better. A few days later - barely a blink compared to the lifespan of a Horrorterror, an unwelcome former acquaintance oh so politely responds to the mental whisper meant only for Feferi's ears. When Gl'bglyb recognizes the voice crackling throughout its Dear Gl'bgolyb. It has been far too long since we last chatted. I'm surprised; and here I thought you content to wreak havoc on the unsuspecting inhabitants of Eastern Europe. What brings you into my new domain?

You again. Pa'h.

Now, now, Gl'bgolyb. No need for that. You played your role quite beautifully last time. And now I can only assume you are here for the dear Feferi. Do try not to damage Tethys overmuch - she has her own role to repeat for the sake of this new game, before you can indulge your heiress.

Perhaps I might interest you in a proposition.

If Gl'bgolyb had lips to curl, it would. However, it is a Horrorterror and therefore infinitely superior to any being that would require lips, and so instead it weaves its tentacles in a complex cat's cradle that would generally signify a middle finger.

A green mental sigh.

Oh dear. The Condesce seems to have no such compunctions about working for me again. And you should know by now that I never lie. I have no need to. It would be unsporting of me. I approached your hiveminds with all honesty and earnest, and you received exactly what I promised you in return.

Gl'bgolyb lashes violently, clawing at the seabed with old stubborn fury. It knew that Tethys had chosen to serve the infuriating Doctor once again, of course, but it still can't understand why, not with all the power in its grimlight minds. A good third of the things the Condesce seems to hold against it can be traced directly back to this infuriating vermin, but then, logic has never weighed heavily in Tethys's mind. Gl'bgolyb would know - she helped mold that overactive, violent mind into the shape Doc Scratch requested. A grave mistake, in retrospect.

Ah, well, what occurs beyond the end of the universe is beyond my purview. I'm afraid I simply had no idea that the chase would cause you such distress.

Are you quite certain -

If another hivemind and your whims. We would prefer to L'1'V'e.

Because that is the crux of it, the point upon which Gl'bgolyb suspects it will never see eye to eye with the creature called Scratch. While others in the Furthest Ring might twist their angles into knots over the chance to experience the touch of their own death, the end of their time, Gl'bgolyb is far too attached to its own multifold sentience for a repeat experience. And while the Doctor may hem and haw all he likes, it knows the nature of him now. He is the kind of thing that leads all that follow him into death's arms, his darker intentions concealed by the bland nature of his demeanor.

He can kill as many of the quick-lived mortals as he likes. It is when he infringes upon the Further Ring and inflicts damage upon Gl’bgolyb’s hive that they will inevitably find themselves at odds.

No. Better to stick to its own plans and not tangle with the Doctor. That is one mind even a Horrorterror has no interest in assimilating…

Very well, then. I thought I'd at least make a token offer, though naturally I already foresaw the outcome of this conversation. I will check with others of the Ring, then. I am sure Malā’ikah would enjoy a chance to collaborate again.

Se e’ that yo’ u’ don’t.

Good luck with your own endeavors then, Gl’bgolyb. Farewell.

With a crackling pop, the abominable little cueball detaches from Gl’bgolyb's streams of consciousness. Irritated still, it smooths over the parts of its mind the annoying Doctor stirred up.

It is unfortunate that Scratch has managed to reincarnate in this session as well. Gl’bgolyb may have to consider relocation once again. It is so very over Scratch’s antics. Horrorterrors are meant to be beyond the petty, contradictory antics of Skaia's will, wild cards left to their own devices in the Furthest Ring, whispering to those of Derse only for their own amusement. The fact that the last few games went so very wrong, Gl’bgolyb privately believes, is because the Eldest Gods became too entangled with Scratch, and with the players. It was a mistake.

So instead of interfering in his plans, it will ignore them. Even if fools like Malā’ikah remain damaged enough in the hivemind to make dealings with the devil, Gl’bgolyb will not. It will concern itself with its heiresses, and no more.

Chapter End Notes

Half of this fic is really totally serious drama and then the other half is Dave hugging apple juice like a koala and I just can’t apologize for that, guys.

Also, for the record, Rue Lalonde, Bro, Grandpa, and Nanna were/are not this AU’s versions of the Alpha kids. I have…plans for those dorks. No, Rue and the rest are OCs; though obviously they’re pretty close to the pre-scratch guardians personality-wise, they’re not going to mirror the Alpha kids exactly. Rue in particular can do voidy things for a reason.
None of Them Clear

Chapter Summary

I have put my days and dreams out of mind,
Days that are over, dreams that are done.
Though we seek life through, we shall surely find
There is none of them clear to us now, not one.

Chapter Notes

John is up! Search 'John realizes' to jump to his section if you missed it. Updates will definitely slow for now as the school year kicks off in earnest, though.

Now shit, y'all, let's be detectives. Need to sort this mess out before Hemogoblin gets run outta town or something…

Heir and Hemogoblin belong over at realmenweartights.tumblr.com. Molte grazie to them for letting me borrow them.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Hemogoblin is exhausted, and it's barely midnight. He's been slowly worn down over the past week with his shitty sleep schedule; of all the times for it to start catching up with him, it would be right now, while Heir is giving him a lift to the police station. As long as he was running around town and leaping off tall buildings, trying to keep up with Heir as the other hero darted at random through the sky, the adrenaline had kept Hemogoblin going in a semblance of energy. Now that he's off his feet and relying on someone else to move him along, his eyes feel like leaden weights.

Fuuuuck. He refuses to fall asleep like this. It would be so unbelievably unprofessional, he might well vomit in his mouth and toss himself off the nearest building.

But not even the lingering terror of possibly being hunted down as a mutant arsonist can keep his eyes open all the way, and they keep drooping lower. At one point, Hemogoblin is vaguely aware that one eye is open more than one of the others, and he pinches himself on the arm, biting down on his tongue with enough force to draw blood. The sharp taste of his own candy-red blood in his mouth jolts him a little, and he straightens his shoulders again. He's a little disoriented when he surveys the city below them, and his stomach drops out when he realizes they're already hovering somewhere over the neighborhood where the majority of the Seattle PD relocated while the old building is still deemed unsafe. He always underestimates just how quickly Heir can swoop down out of the sky - his flight is truly an amazing ability.

The familiar, old pulse of admiration wakes Hemogoblin up a little more because fuck, Heir is right here. Willing to help Hemogoblin and trust his word, even when they've barely been partners and known each other for a few weeks. With his profile cast into sharp relief by the glow of the city below, Heir looks just...amazing. His jaw is set and serious, and in the air, even more than when he's fighting on the ground, Heir is in his element. His hood has blown back, and his hair is flying around everywhere like a dark thatch of cowlicks. He looks, Hemogoblin thinks vaguely, like he could use a haircut.

Which is the kind of dumbfuck thought he expects from his shitty thinkpan after days of panmelting, horrifying, completely unnecessary dreams.

"Okay, we're here," Heir murmurs, and whoa why is his voice right up along Hemogoblin's ear, a warm sigh of air that tickles at his earlobe. Hemogoblin nearly flinches out of his skin, jerking around as best he can while floating in midair, half-expecting (anticipating) Heir to have somehow drifted closer while Hemogoblin was lost in thought, the other hero's mouth right by his face. But no, Heir is still separated from Hemogoblin by a good three feet, his eyes a brilliant, gleaming blue as he meets Hemogoblin stare for stare. Heir just looks quizzical, and Hemogoblin nearly smacks himself. Heir controls the (wait for it) air; it's probably no big deal for him to whisper things from a distance.

Hemogoblin is just so goddamn slow on the uptake, and it's becoming a legitimate concern - if it comes down to it, will he be able to fight at full capacity when he's currently working with all the problem-solving ability of a three year old hyped up on Pixie Sticks?

Fuck everything about this. He just wants to go home and crawl into John's lap and complain about the costume designs from the latest Marquise v Redglare blockbuster. He wants it with a twisting pain in his chest that's pale as frost and spun sugar. But he can't afford to think about John right now.

"Ready," he replies shortly, though he doesn't think that's exactly the response Heir is expecting. Heir, being mentally stable, unlike certain troll heroes in the vicinity, just takes it like a fucking champ and nods, offering a hand.

Hemogoblin takes it, mystified, and Heir lets them drop the last few feet to the roof. The landing is perfectly smooth, the wind setting them down without missing a beat, and Hemogoblin doesn't even have to bend his knees to prevent a jolt. Not that Heir has ever dropped him hard before, but this is much more of a precision landing.

Ah. So that's why the handholding.

"What a gentleman," he teases, smirking. Heir flushes deeply all along the thin strip of skin exposed between his mask and his goggles, as adorably easy to fluster as ever, and retracts his hand with some babbled excuse. For a hero who is always so professional and straightforward, he's awfully ease to tease. And even half out of his mind with sleep deprivation, Hemogoblin is a little sorry Heir let go after only a little hand holding. Oh well.

"Does this contact know we're coming?" he remembers to ask. What he really wants to ask is 'does this guy know it's that wanted arson troll coming to see him?' But he's trying not to act like a raging paranoid dick. He has to trust that Heir knows what he's doing. "Probably a good idea to give him a warning before you spring a wanted suspect on him in the dark of night. You know, maybe."

Heir wrinkles up his face and shakes his head. "Probably not. I'm hoping I can just jump right to where his temporary office space is and get us both out before people notice."

Hemogoblin frowns. "You...are kidnapping a police officer."

"Borrowing! Borrowing a police officer!" Heir insists, fretting. "I'll stop by an empty closet or something along the way to ask permission and explain what's going on! But I can't just hang around the station in costume for however long that takes."

Okay, fine. This whole thing is a mess anyway; it's not like Hemogoblin really has any better plan at this point. "Borrowing it is, then. Jesus fuck, I hope you know what you're doing."

"Vaguely. I'm mostly just going with my gut." Heir barks out a laugh at the face Hemogoblin must be making, folding his arms behind his head as he laughs. "Sorry! But really, this kind of thing is new for me too. I'm just doing it on the fly."

That was a pun. Hemogoblin is one wrong move from being fucked in the ass with a cactus for the rest of his miserable life, and Heir is making puns. The universe is officially a dick.

"You're using the teleporting thing? How will you know where to aim?" he asks. They haven't had a moment to spare this past week for Hemogoblin to really get an up close and personal demonstration of Heir's new talent, and honestly he's still trying to figure out how Heir does it. Karkat geeks out privately about it all the damn time. It's beyond awesome, yeah, but also not really a typical air hero thing. "Don't you need to visualize the room? The coordinates?"

Heir looks weird, and fidgets a little. Hemogoblin waits, then squints, tilting his head to the side as Heir presses his fingers together. "Uhhhhh, noooo," Heir says at last, his voice lowering to a mutter. And that is the most fucking suspicious thing Hemogoblin has seen all night. Like. Wow. "Heeeeeir," he says warningly, crossing his arms. "What the fuck aren't you telling me?"

Heir is looking up at the dark, clouded sky, his eyes no longer burning blue now that he's not flying them around. He looks like a wriggler caught in with a nub in the cookie jar. "Uh, I don't really think it works that way. I just seem to kind of...do it."

Hemogoblin stares uncomprehending. Heir launches into some kind of wild miming, his usual fallback method of emphasizing his words, but it doesn't help clear anything up. "I - the past few times - I just kind of thought about a person really hard, and then I was there. I had to be really angry the first few times, but then in New York I started popping around everywhere without being mad, just, you know, freaked out. I don't know about all those coordinates and things, uh - but I'm sure this is going to work! I've been practicing on my own!"

Hemogoblin gives in. He slaps a hand across his face. How is it Heir is such a badass in a fight, and such a total dork about everything else?! And this is the guy Hemogoblin is relying on to help clear his name? Should he be fucking concerned?

"Agh! Uh! Don't worry! I'll be back in a minute, I promise!" Heir adjusts his hood so it hangs over his face, casting his eyes in shadow. So it's all the more obvious when his eyes blaze. Hemogoblin jerks back, blinking back the sudden glare as it nearly blinds his sensitive eyes. Heir's face twists like he's about to cry and he vanishes. The darkness is so sudden Hemogoblin can't see a damn thing. He wipes at his eyes and rubs his eyelids, pale pinkish tears watering at the corners until the glare recedes. Wow, a little warning next time, Heir?

And okay. That was just plain weird, and Hemogoblin is a little dazed before he ducks behind a spotlight, trying to conceal himself. He's gotten used to rooftops again this past week, but being on a police station roof - even when it's just a repurposed office building - brings back bad memories.

Now though, he's distracted by what he just saw. Usually when Heir is flying or using the wind in a fight, Hemogoblin has noticed the blue of his eyes gleaming, with a luminescence almost like a troll's. He's never thought anything of it before. But that light just now was way brighter than anything Heir's ever had before - like looking into the headlights of a car. Hemogoblin can only wonder how much more power this teleportation requires. The fact that Heir is jumping around everywhere without knowing how he's flinging his powers around is kind of...strange. Heir always seems to be so in control when it comes to hero work. This whole execution of this plan seems kind of reckless. Like he's winging it even more than Hemogoblin knows.

That is the opposite of reassuring.

Abruptly two people appear in the center of the roof. For a moment they look almost fuzzy along the edges, outlined in blue, and - part of Heir's leg isn't there.

Hemogoblin blinks and Heir is whole. He shakes his head hard, wishing he had a glass of cold water to dump over his head. He can't be starting to see things. He can't. Yeah, that sometimes happens when people don't get enough sleep, but fuck, he'd thought he could still hold out for a while longer...

"Heir," the shorter man hisses, light casting his face half in shadow. "This is extremely unorthodox - what the hell, where are we-?"

"On the roof," Heir says. Hemogoblin stifles a burst of inappropriate snickering. He hasn't really noticed that Heir's voice changes pitch, until now; he's clearly deepening his voice and faking a stern tone to talk to the cop, and the switch is hilarious. "Please, just hear me out."

"How did you even - look, Heir, if this is about that Hemogoblin character, I can't affect that accusation. It's not my case." The officer adjusts the collar of his button-down, which has been blown up around his ears by some windy force. "They're serious about this line of investigation, and I'm nowhere near it."

"I'm not asking you to make it go away. I'm just trying to figure out the truth." Heir's toes are barely skimming the rooftop, and he doesn't seem aware of it. Hemogoblin shifts behind the skylight, pressing his back all up along it, and hopes he's actually hidden at this angle. His false horns angle forward in a way he's not used to; as Karkat, he's never really appreciated the hell some trolls with larger, more elaborate horns must go through trying to deal with clothing and recceopacoons and shit, but as Hemogoblin he's had to completely relearn his sense of balance when he bends and kicks and runs. Seriously, he's never going to envy someone with actual horns instead of little mutant nubs ever again; he clearly got the better end of the draw of the genetic lottery.

He's sure Heir will give him a signal when he should reveal himself. Or he can just choose the most dramatic moment. Whichever comes first. It might be stupid, but Hemogoblin likes having a flare for the dramatic as part of his persona.

The officer sighs. The light shifts a little, and Hemogoblin gets a glimpse of a man in his late forties, his face lined by stress and his hair gone grey and white in that strange way elderly human hair tends to change. "I can't tell you much. What do you want to know?"

Heir crosses his arms. "Look. How did we jump from Hemogoblin getting almost blown up, to everybody suspecting him of blowing himself up? I mean, you guys find evidence that he was bleeding everywhere, clearly badly wounded, and the officers in charge somehow jump to 'he did it'? That's really, really weird," Heir says flatly. "For that matter, why do they think he's involved in the earlier explosion? None of this makes sense!"

...That was...not subtle at all. Guess they're not beating around the bush here. Hemogoblin fidgets, trying to get at an angle where he can see the officer's face, to better judge his reaction. One of his feet slips in the gravel and skids, so he ends up with one leg splayed out, but luckily no one seems to notice him bumbling around like a fuckwad.

The cop mumbles something Hemogoblin doesn't quite hear over the skidding gravel, but if he has to make a guess it would be something like 'shit.' "You know for a fact he was caught in the blast, then? The one on the roof, at least?” he asks, loud enough for Hemogoblin to hear.

"I have a pretty good idea, yeah. After all, he is my partner.” Heir sounds almost offended, and Hemogoblin preens inwardly at the fact that Heir just officially announced their partnership to the police.

Even it is shitty timing. And only one cop is around to hear it. Fuck yes. Despite everything, despite the fact that Hemogoblin is suddenly at the center of a raging shitstorm of go-fuck-yourself, Heir is still willing to claim him as a partner.

Then he realizes he's missing the perfect cue. His reaction time is shit tonight. Pretending he didn't just nearly fall flat on his ass in the gravel, Hemogoblin stands up and peers around the skylight, tilting his head so his eyes flicker red when he leans on the light, waving a greeting to the cop with a flutter of his claws.

"Oh for Chrissakes, you brought him here?" The police officer groans, rubbing his temples. "You do know I should be arresting him now, right?!

Heir bounces on his heels, grinning like a little shit under his mask when he sneaks a look back at Hemogoblin. "Yeah - but you won't, right? Besides, we're just trying to cooperate with the investigation as best we can. You know what it would mean if he actually got arrested, Officer Ellard."

"Unmasking." The officer pinches the bridge of his nose. "Which means you two won't just come down and explain this to my superiors instead of me?"

"That would be a no," Hemogoblin says, shrugging apologetically. "But trust me, I'm not interested in being at odds with the police. I just want my name cleared so everyone can get back to catching criminals instead of wasting time on me.”

Ellard is giving Hemogoblin the eye. Hemogoblin ignores the adrenalin humming through his blood, sour in his mouth, and stares back, raising an eyebrow. He's innocent, and that has to count for something.

The problem is, he still has so much to hide.

After what feels like minutes, but was probably only a few brief moments, Officer Ellard stops searching Hemogoblin's face and sighs, looking sidelong at Heir as he begins to pace. Hemogoblin shifts impatiently, feeling really fucking exposed out here on a roof where any moment another, less forgiving officer might emerge for a smoke break, but Heir waits quietly, so he follows the more experienced hero's example.

Ellard finally casts a glance over his shoulder at the stairwell and folds his arms. "Look. The only reason I'm telling you this and not arresting your partner here on sight is because I've thought something was shady about this whole investigation from the start," he says in a low voice, still glancing around him. It's almost like he thinks they're being watched, which just makes Hemogoblin's skin crawl with renewed paranoia. He touches the edge of his mask almost unconsciously, the old urge to hide behind contacts and glasses making a comeback.

"Shady?" Heir prompts, landing on the roof properly at last. Hemogoblin hesitates, and then slinks up to stand by the other hero's right shoulder, keeping his head down and stepping lightly enough that he doesn't make a sound on the gravel. "What does that mean?"

"It means the counter terrorism unit is inserting itself into the investigation, despite the fact that these recent explosions have yet to be declared terrorist activity" Ellard snaps, his work shoes crunching on the roof as he paces a little faster. "One of their agents, some guy named Crichton, has been all over the deputy chief ever since the attack on the old station. All this past week they've been holed up together in his office, while everyone else on the case was busy trying to track Hearts Boxcars and his crew. We all thought they'd be the ones officially accused, and we'd be forced to call in the port authorities to try to track them down. Then suddenly, yesterday morning, the deputy chief announced that press conference was going to take place, and told everyone to focus their efforts on tracking down Hemogoblin. It came out of nowhere."

...What.

No, really. What.

"Wait," Hemogoblin interrupts, before the officer can do more than try to start a new sentence. He has a brain full of fury and a mouth set permanently on 'no filter' and he's just sleep-deprived enough that not even Heir's frantic headshake can't stop him now. All aboard the fucking ragetrain. "Wait a fucking minute. You're saying it wasn't - the actual police in charge of the case weren't even investigating me?! This is all because of one fucker chatting up your boss -"

A really strong breeze brushes across the front of his face, and the rest of his rant gets abruptly cut off. He starts when he hears something in the distance, as though someone is shouting from the roof across the street.

...Did Heir just censor him by drowning him out with the wind? Hemogoblin throws a wounded glare at the human, who is holding up a palm and frowns right back. "Dude, calm down. Pull it waayyyy back," he whispers from a distance, so Ellard probably can't hear.

It doesn't help. The words sound hesitant and soothing and he doesn't want soothing from anyone but John, dammit. All it does is enrage him further. "This is fucking ridiculous," he hisses back, turning so he can't look at Ellard's judgmental face while he loses his shit. "On what planet is this how the legal system works? If this keeps up they could literally get me killed over this fuckery and it's all because the deputy chief is an impressionable douche?!"

"Please, Hemo, we need to not offend the police officer helping us by bad-mouthing the police," Heir says, still watching Ellard through the corner of his goggles as he touches Hemogoblin's shoulder. "I know this is a really, incredibly stupid situation, but we're gonna figure it out. I promise. And now that we know this, we'll know how to counter it. Just - just breathe, okay?" Almost timid, the hero pats at his shoulder and oh fuck no that's a pap.

Hemogoblin wrenches away, clawing at his own hood and scraping a claw down the side of a prosthetic horn because he can't reach his hair and the last rational part of his brain is screaming you can't hit Heir you stupid fuck even though the rest of him is ready to throw a full on temper tantrum. Better he accidentally damage part of his costume than start a stupid fucking fight with Heir for doing something the human probably doesn't even realize he's done. He swallows back a growl of rage and restricts himself to snarling, "You are not my moirail! Hands fucking off!"

Heir was reaching out again, trying for another very unwelcome shooshpap; now, he jerks back his hand like he touched fire. His eyes go wide and almost horrified behind the goggles. Hemogoblin just focuses on his breathing, inwardly grateful that apparently Heir has some idea of what kind of offense it would be to try to moirail someone already in a quadrant. Humans are usually good with the concupiscent quadrants, but it's just generally accepted that clubs and diamonds are more of a grey area for them, simply because they don't need conciliation that way.

"I'm sorry - ugh, oh man - uh, look I mean this in a totally platonic way, but you have to calm down," Heir babbles, his hands reaching out as though the fucker doesn't know how to keep them to himself.

"Are you two alright?" That's the police officer again and fuck, fucking fuck, Hemogoblin is making himself look like a complete maniac in front of the man.

Heir is right; he needs to back off and breathe. It would be so much easier if John were here, he thinks with an ache in his chest, and then he nods at nothing, closing his eyes so he can calm himself down without having to make himself paranoid about Heir's wandering hands. "Shit. Shit," he says to himself, shuddering through a breath until he starts hiccupping, bent half over with the ache in his stomach. It's humiliating, but it works to interrupt the impending rant that's sitting on the tip of his tongue.

Heir crouches down at his level, and he's still too fucking close. Hemogoblin shudders again but somehow doesn't shove the human away. He's already screwed this whole meeting up with his sleep-deprived troll hormones; no need to alienate his only ally completely.

Heir's voice is still way too conciliating, too, when he starts murmuring at Hemogoblin's bowed head. "Look, I don't know much about how moirails work for trolls. But...I'm pretty sure you need one. Like, really badly. The hiccupping thing is a bad sign, right? Will you be okay for the rest of the night?"

He understands, and that's the last thing Hemogoblin wants to hear. To his rage-twisted thinkpan, anything would have been better than that, even Heir just yelling at him in public for his stupid outburst. "I'll be fine," he grits out, kneading claws into the shoulder fabric of his costume. "Just give me a second."

"Yeah, you got it. Just take your time." Heir finally stops looking at him, and Hemogoblin nearly sags with relief. "Anything else really weird about this case?" the hero directs at Ellard, clearly trying to steer this conversation in a more productive direction and avoid awkward questions about why his partner is a total headcase. Smart move.

Hemogoblin can't see the police officer's face from his hunched over position, but he can hear the uncertainty bleeding through as the man starts talking again. "Well, even that blood evidence is sketchy. They've got no real proof it's his, you see. The chief and the counter terrorism guy would have to be assuming that because it's an atypical shade of troll blood, it must belong to the only troll with unusual eyes that's been flaunting himself this past month. Even then, it was dismissed by the detective in charge because, like you said, it could easily be explained by him being in the wrong place at the wrong time. Anyone with basic anti-terrorism training would know nothing about this fits the MO of a suicide bomber. But the fact is, unless they found your blood on record or obtained a sample from you in custody, they have no evidence definitively linked to you. Nothing. Announcing it to the public like that wasn't the smart thing to do. If Hemogoblin here is proven innocent, the deputy chief will look like a fool."

Heir hums, and rests his chin on his fist. "It's...it's like a publicity stunt," he finally says after nearly a minute's pause, suddenly enough that Hemogoblin looks up, surprised. He's feeling more stable now, and the sight of Heir's speculative face almost helps. "Worse than that - it's like propaganda. It was a big, attention-grabbing event based on little real evidence, without consulting the experts. They just wanted to smear your image by having everyone in the city think you've been seriously accused of arson," he adds, looking at Hemogoblin when he notices the troll has recovered. He smiles a little reassuringly, which twists Hemogoblin's stomach in a distinctly neutral way - both red and black. Fuuuck, no. He does not want to add quadrant flipping to his flushcrush. He hiccups again. "It does nothing for the police, nothing for you, nothing for this Crichton guy. So who wins, here?"
"The Midnight Crew," Hemogoblin mutters to himself. Heir looks at him sharply, and he's forcefully reminded that the other hero can probably hear a lot more than people give him credit for. It's the kind of super power that isn't very noticeable unless the hero goes around explaining it, which Heir never has.

"You think it's possible this Crichton guy could be a Crew member? Or are we just starting to see them everywhere because we're paranoid?" Heir whispers back. Shit, he's actually taking Hemogoblin's half-sarcastic suggestion seriously.

On the other hand...maybe they should be taking it seriously. It hits Hemogoblin like a brick, and he feels his stomach drop out.

Because he's been so stupid. He's spent all this time beating himself up about all the Crew members getting away, when he had literally watched that fake lawyer, the one who drove the car that got Hearts Boxcars to the dock, who then ordered Hearts to leave, drive right back out into the city. And he hadn't even given that man a second thought, lost in his rage over getting dunked in the ocean and fucking up his gills for days.

"Someone from the Crew did stay behind when I followed them to the docks," he says, and Heir's eyebrows fly up. He...probably should have mentioned this earlier. "He drove Boxcars to the container yard, and then told him he had orders to make sure Boxcars left the city. I thought he was the lawyer who delivered the bomb parts, but then he took the car and drove out when they realized I was there trying to capture them. I forgot about him entirely trying to catch up with Boxcars. Fuck. I didn't even think about him."

Heir's eyes narrow and light with understanding. "Hey, one of the Crew members - the lawyer - might still be in town. You know if he could somehow be connected to this counter-terrorism guy?" he asks Ellard. Then he hesitates, and frowns. "But if he was the lawyer, they must have his face on camera from the first police station explosion. People would notice him wandering around…"

"Not necessarily," Ellard says. It sounds like he's admitting that only reluctantly. "There was damage done to the cameras in the halls and lobby during the explosion. That normally wouldn't affect the tape that was already recorded on a server, but...they're not working right, either."

"What do you mean? What happened to the tapes?" Heir asks. And yeah, Hemogoblin is just going to stand here and keep his mouth shut, because he obviously can't be trusted to talk without flipping out. Especially since this sounds like the police have fucked up again and contributed somehow to this accusation. He should have let Heir handle this from the beginning, and just stayed behind to weep softly against his nice skylight.

Ellard fumbles for words, and then scratches his head. "It'd probably be easier to just show you than to describe it, really. But that would be very much against protocol. We'd have to get you two past five floors of rather jumpy police officers." He jerks his chin at Hemogoblin. "Heir might make it, maybe, but you wouldn't get more than ten feet before all hell broke loose. And the last thing I want is a riot in my police station."

Before Ellard finishes his sentence, Hemogoblin looks over at Heir. The hero is doing something beneath his mask - maybe biting his lip? - and his forehead wrinkles as he thinks. Hemogoblin sidles in as close as he dares when his claws are still shaking, and mutters, "Can you teleport there?"

Heir rubs the back of his neck. "Maybe? But it would definitely be a lot easier if Ellard went down first, so I could focus on him. I don't really know how well I'd be able to aim for an empty room. Not to mention someone else might already be in there who could report you if we just jump without warning."
He nods, his eyes still glittering with sharp curiosity when he looks at Hemogoblin. "Give me fifteen minutes, in case someone pulls me aside," he says. "By then I should be in the records room. This time of night, the security guard will be out patrolling, not reviewing tapes. I presume that trick of yours will work again, Heir?"

"It should," he confirms. "Thank you so much for this, Officer Ellard. We owe you one."

The man just sighs. "You do enough for this city that we should owe you, not the other way around," he says quietly. "Here. I'll meet you down there. Remember - second floor."

"Got it."

Hemogoblin finishes the process of calming down by the time Officer Ellard vanishes into the stairwell like a normal human being. If he lets himself feel it, he'd probably fling himself off the side of the building with embarrassment. It's one thing to lose it a little in private where John can shoosh him before it escalates, another to freak out on a thug like Hearts Boxcars, and some new, fresh horror entirely to have a meltdown in front of his fucking heroic idol. He just needs to. Not think. Just. Shut off his entire thinkpan. He's blushing like a fire hydrant when Heir looks at him, and not even in a seductive way. Just a miserable way.

"And now we wait!" Heir modulates his voice to total neutrality, probably trying to avoid provoking another burst of irrationality from him. It doesn't make Hemogoblin feel any less embarrassed; Heir just sounds awkward and unfamiliar. Had he really freaked out that badly about a totally platonic shooshing? Fucking hell, only a total moron like him would assume everything was about conciliation.

"Sorry about that," Hemogoblin says in a rush, skimming his hands over his arms. "You're right. I should have visited my moirail before I came out tonight. I saw the press release, panicked, and ran out like a grub with its head chopped off to find you instead of making sure my head was in the right place."

"It happens to the best of us," Heir replies, hooking his thumbs in the loops of his belt. A little of his usual dorky grin appears at the corners of his mouth, which is nice - it means Hemogoblin hasn't scared him off with his crazy. "When I first started, I did some reeeeeeally dumb stuff! At least you have a good reason for getting mad! The more we hear about this, the more it just seems like someone trying to make your life suck. Just try to remember Officer Ellard isn't the one who DID it. And the more cooperative we all are with each other, the faster we can figure out why this Crichton guy wants to pin this on you so bad."

"I get it. Trust me. I should be good for a while now." Hemogoblin hesitates, then reaches out and taps the other hero on the shoulder. Just once, barely a graze. Heir flinches and twists his neck all up to stare at his own shoulder with comically wide eyes. "But seriously. We're alright?" Hemogoblin demands.

"We're alright," Heir says slowly, and his grin is almost infectious. Almost. Hemogoblin keeps it down to a small smirk. He's going to try to keep the emotional responses minimized for a while, until he's more sure of his self-control tonight.

They wait out the fifteen minutes in companionable silence, and Hemogoblin can almost forget he's supposed to be berating himself for being a complete asshat. Almost. It doesn't help that sometimes Heir reminds him weirdly of John. He seems to have a type - disgustingly sincere dorks. Maybe that's why the near-moirailing incident triggered that desperate meltdown.

Hemogoblin will just feel a lot more better if he can keep his Karkat and his Hemogoblin feelings separate, so he doesn't accidentally get pale leanings in his flushcrush. He is loyal to John, god dammit.

He doesn't understand the multiple looks Heir sends his way; the furrowed brows don't mean anything to him. Heir is just probably seriously debating the wisdom of having a partner with severe rage control issues. No big fucking deal.

That's all it is. That's all.

They wait an extra five minutes, just in case, and then Heir looks questioningly at Hemogoblin. Hemogoblin nods permission, and Heir rests a careful hand on Hemogoblin's shoulder. He's less startled this time when Heir nearly sobs with pain, the human's free hand grabbing futilely for his chest as a spasm wracks his body and fuck this, that can't be normal. None of Heir's other powers seem to hurt him, so why is this one so different?

He realizes this was a stupid fucking idea when suddenly all the blood is gone. He can't feel it, and it's like having his eyes carved out of their sockets or his spine ripped out through his neck; something vital is gone like it never existed. The always-present thrum of blood running through him, sometimes welcome, sometimes hated for its mutated tint, but always a reminder that he is alive - stops, and it jolts him right back into being Karkat because Hemogoblin has just put up with too much shit today, thank you very much.

If there were a way to describe the current situation, Karkat would have to say they've turned into air. Literally. They're the air. He has no idea how to process this; he thinks he can see and hear and smell but he's not solid and when they start to spiral toward the stairwell he has no control over the process; some other intelligent force is moving him along even though he doesn't think he really has a form to move.

Karkat fights it. He can feel Heir - he thinks it feels like Heir, anyway - twisting through the air as they flow beneath the door Ellard used and then blast down the stairwell. Exhilarated glee runs in a frisson from Heir to Karkat and it conflicts with the instinctive panic clawing at his incorporeal throat. How is he even feeling anything? They're air. They're barely even real anymore. Heir might be getting his kicks out of somehow transforming into his element incarnate, but Karkat's panicglands are busy scheduling a crucial date with a pneumatic drill so he can bore a hole into the center of his forehead and try to forget this uncontrollable joyride ever happened. This isn't fascinating or breathtaking like flying with Heir; this is just not okay.

But even as Karkat tries to wrench himself out of whatever fucked up power Heir is using to let them blow past an entire floor of cops, unseen and unfelt as anything more than an impossibly fast breeze, the pulse of twenty heartbeats and the blood in their veins beats through Karkat, and he thinks if he reached out with whatever passes for claws when you're the wind, he could feel every molecule and chemical running through their circulatory systems, down to the tiniest capillary. It's nearly reassuring, and for a moment he forgets that he's supposed to be terrified. A twitch of his fingers, and he could clear that clot forming in the troll lieutenant's heart, he thinks, stupefied, or help filter the toxins from that woman's kidneys.

He's never felt this much potential in other people's blood before, and it's happening while he's not even in a meatsuit of his own.

What the hell is this?
With a gasp they slip beneath another door and Karkat can sense the exact moment that the wild, carefree joy that inundates Heir's part of their wind tunnel vanishes. No, that's not right, he thinks, reeling again; it doesn't vanish, the mood just swings straight from joy to terror and pain, a total 180. Oh fuck oh fuck, we fucked up, Karkat thinks giddily, trying and failing to once again pull out of this weird incorporeal state, but this isn't his power, and whatever Heir did to make them part of the windy thing instead of physical bodies has left Karkat without any of his own blood to manipulate. Heir is panicking too, and at this rate Karkat had no idea whether this panic and pain are a normal part of the teleporting process. They could be stuck as minds on the wind forever, unless Heir gets it together.

They resolidify three feet above the ground and after that strange sensation of feeling Heir's emotional whiplash by proxy, there's no way Hemogoblin has the reflexes to get his feet under him. He hits the ground flat on his knees and feels them split open through his costume on the tile floor. "Fffffffuck!" he spits, and shoves all the confusion and residual panic away to fall into the pulse of his blood. It's a beautiful relief, like curling up in a pile with John and letting all the tension run out of him; he savors the rush of blood that is gloriously corporeal. He doesn't rush it like he did on the roof that night; he's in the heart of the new police sanctum, like fuck is he leaving more blood splattered everywhere. He reaches out with the dull red of his connection and coaxes the blood back into the veins, slathering on heavier scabs across each knee than he really needs, to use up the excess.

"Ack! Hemogoblin, did I drop you?" Heir is fretting somewhere over his head, and when Hemogoblin looks up he sees Heir still had a solid foot of air between him and the floor. The wind stirs up all the papers on the desk beside them, and Hemogoblin is no windy guy but he'd bet that's yet more residual terror from whatever the hell freaked Heir out.

"What happened?" he asks, still dazed as he widens his focus back out of his blood. "You freaked out, Heir - did something go wrong at the end?"

Heir holds out a hand, and Hemogoblin takes it so the other hero can pull him upright in a burst of surprising strength. "I don't know what you mean. Everything seemed to go as smoothly as ever," Heir says with a shrug, "I mean, we ended up where we wanted to go! That's the most I ever hope for!"

...Is he seriously going to fucking pretend that didn't just happen? Wind is Heir's thing; for all Hemogoblin knows, his blurred and confused perception of that teleport only got half of what really happened to scare Heir. But something definitely happened, something that flipped Heir from pain to joy and back to pain again.

And for that matter... "It's not really teleportation though, is it?" he says, frowning at Heir. "We didn't move from point to point instantaneously. We became air, and you were fine right up until we came in here to change back."

And Heir -

- shuts down.

The wind goes totally flat and the room goes unnaturally still. Even the faint gust that Hemogoblin sometimes catches ruffling Heir's hair even when he's not in motion cuts off. The residual flare in Heir's eyes from the power exertion needed to fly them down here so quickly dims to the point that the eyes behind the goggles look almost black. Hemogoblin can only stare; Heir stares back mutely, his mouth parted, but doesn't say anything at all. It's like Hemogoblin somehow managed to hit the guy's pause button. And oh fuck, does he regret it, because Heir looks broken.

He broke Heir. Congratu-fucking-lations, Hemogoblin, this tops everything you've accomplished thus far tonight in terms of spectacular fuck-ups.

"Something wrong, you two?" Ellard asks. Hemogoblin had honestly forgotten the point of the teleport had been to catch up with the police officer. Now unable to break this staring contest with Heir, he can't bring himself to glance at Ellard or open his mouth to answer.

Heir, impossibly, responds as though on autopilot. He doesn't even look like he should be standing, with that much miserable despair crushing him down, but he blinks and turns haunted eyes on Ellard. "We're fine. You wanted to show us something, right?"

How Ellard doesn't see the horror in Heir's eyes, Hemogoblin will never know. The man doesn't even flinch as he shrugs and turns back to the computers. He's logged onto some kind of database, and begins filling out the search engine. Hemogoblin slinks closer, peering over at Heir cautiously when he reaches the officer's other side.

Heir looks...normal. At least from the side. Some of the pallor has left his face, but he still is determinedly avoiding Hemogoblin's eyes, focused instead on the computer as though it holds the answer to all of life's mysteries.

Shaking his head to clear it, Hemogoblin swallows hard and looks at the screen. For a moment everything is fuzzy and the room rocks around him, but then he jerks upright and shakes his head with more vigor, waking himself up. He can't fall asleep standing up.

"This is the clearest feed we have left over from the hall that the holding room was located in." Ellard double-clicks with a bulky mouse on a link on the screen, and a tiny black and white video appears in its own separate window. They have to wait nearly two minutes for the computer to process it and begin the playback, two minutes that have Hemogoblin staring at Heir almost nonstop in a distinctly not romantic or teasing way. Heir finally notices and smiles at him hesitantly.

Somehow, all the blankness has left his expression. Hemogoblin's jaw pops open and he must look like an idiot until Heir shrugs, smiling a little wider, and looks back at the computer screen.

He has no idea how Heir just...switched back. That kind of broken, haunted despair is the kind of thing that doesn't just melt away like that. But it seems Heir has decided to pretend it never happened.

Oh, Hemogoblin is going to give this guy such a talking to. Before he can open his seedflap and demand answers, though, the video finishes loading and Ellard starts it. Grumpily, Hemogoblin watches.

On the grainy footage, a man in a suit strides past a police officer in uniform who is escorting a teenage boy in the opposite direction. The officer and the boy are facing the camera so their faces are clear, but the man strides away, accompanied by a different officer. They both stop at a door and the officer knocks, opening the door. They both file in, and a moment later, after several long seconds of jittering, boring footage, the officer emerges and walks away, too.

Any second now, Hemogoblin suspects, the entire picture is going to be a rush of smoke and fire as the lawyer and Hearts Boxcars finish piecing together their flash bomb and their secondary incendiary for the lobby within the privacy of the unattended room.

He's wrong.

His heart beats a little faster as the seconds tick by - and tick by.

"...What the fuck are we looking at, Ellard," he says flatly after almost five minutes. "We couldn't fast-forward this little show so we're not standing here with our thumbs up our asses?"

"This is all there is to look at, Hemogoblin," the officer replies. He sounds kind of sarcastic. Fuck, Hemogoblin's driven a cop into the arms of sassiness. What the fuck next? "As far as our cameras are concerned, both in this hallway and the lobby later on, there were no explosions the night of the breakout. For that matter, neither Boxcars nor his associates are ever filmed exiting the station. If we were to present this in court, the jury would think we should technically still have them in custody."

Alright, that's - that's a pretty good excuse.

"Someone looped the camera feed," Heir suggests, but he sounds uncertain, leaning in to peer at the screen. "Or something like that?"

"We can't figure out exactly how, but something like that, yes," Ellard agrees. "The old records room was unguarded when the building was evacuated, but this kind of deception would have to have taken place before the incident altogether. And because of this, we have no way to definitively identify the lawyer. He wore that hat low and had a thick beard according to eyewitnesses; just enough to obscure his face."

Hemogoblin shakes his head, replaying his own memory of that night. "He didn't have a beard by the time I got to him. I would definitely have noticed something like that. Must have been a false beard."

Heir smiles at him again. It's still unnerving. "Good. That means if he is somehow related to Crichton, you can identify him!"

"You two really think this all has something to do with counter-terrorism?" Ellard asks, spinning his chair around to look at them both. On the screen, the seconds continue to tick by, even as the time of the explosion comes and goes, with no change.

"Not reeeeeally?" Heir says, shrugging. "It could just be this one guy. But this Crichton is definitely worth a look, if only because he seems to be the one who got the deputy chief on Hemogoblin's case."

"Oh, yes. He and I are overdue for a nice long talk." Hemogoblin glowers at the screen, and has to turn away before he punches through the useless camera feed with a sickle.

Someone is doing everything they can to make it extremely difficult to tell who may or may not have been involved in the initial explosion, and if this case against Hemogoblin goes much farther? It could work.

"Well, I guess the next best thing we can do is wait for this Crichton guy to arrive."

They've relocated outside. Having bid hasty farewells to Ellard, who checked that the coast was clear, Hemogoblin had elected to sneak out through a back window in a men's restroom rather than allow Heir to pull the windy thing again because seriously, just, fuck that all over the place. Heir looks almost hurt when Hemogoblin turns him down, but he can't even feel sorry about it; even if Heir wasn't acting like half his brain didn't quite know what happened in that last so-called teleport, the sudden loss of his ability to sense his own blood has turned Hemogoblin off that method of transportation unless it's some kind of emergency. Heir floated down to meet him after he reached the alley below. The sky overhead is still a muggy greyish purple, and it's barely two, but Hemogoblin started out the night on the brink of collapse, and he's no less exhausted now.
Heir makes a face, pouting his lips as he thinks intently. He's leaning up against the wall across from Hemogoblin, totally lost in whatever madcap idea he's distracting himself with now.

"He won't get here until six," Hemogoblin says wearily, wishing he could rub at his eyes, and maybe just close them, and then lay down and -

No, no, no. Sleep is not an option right now. He thinks if he starts sleeping now, even a quick power nap, he might really just pass out for the rest of the night. And the following day. All of it spent in nightmares, no doubt. So he props his eyelids open and tells his thinkpan to just fucking deal with it. He is one hundred and fifty percent done with tonight. "I don't know about you, but generally I have to call it a night by four or so. It's a school day."

That's safe enough to use as an excuse, anyway. He, and everyone else in the city with a calendar, knows that Heir always curtails his crime-fighting hours coincidentally when the school year starts, and Hemogoblin figures it's an anonymous enough detail that he can let it slip that he has school, too. It's not like Heir would have any idea what school he attends.

"I know," Heir says shortly. His eyes squint up all the way as he thumps his head back against the wall. The war hammer clanks against brick too. When the hero folds his arms over his chest, with his eyes closed so the shadows are less noticeable, he almost resembles one of the posters Karkat does not have stashed under his bed where John can't tease him about them. "But I...I think we might have to stick this one out. I just don't see any other way we can do this!"

Maybe it's just Hemogoblin, but did Heir just seriously suggest that they - "You are serious," he realizes, raising an eyebrow. Or maybe both eyebrows. He doesn't have a lot of his fine motor control left, okay? "You want to hang around here - what, until all hours of the day? I'm pretty sure people will notice us when the shadows are gone, Heir."

Not to mention John would most definitely notice if Karkat completely failed to show up for school in the morning. Shit, he doesn't even have his cell phone on him. He couldn't feed John a line, even if he really thought they were following through with this.

"We can spend the rest of the night on patrol, as usual. Though I guess you should probably noooot call the police a lot," Heir says, wrinkling his nose. "But. Ugh. I just think we need to talk to this Crichton guy yesterday. I...I think it's worth missing school to get him alone and talk to him properly until we can figure out what his connection is to the Midnight Crew. And if he is the lawyer from the bombings, can we really, in good conscience, let him keep waltzing in and out of another police station when he could have even more bomb parts on him?"

Fuck. Put it that way, and suddenly Hemogoblin's hero hindbrain pings him with little alarms. Shit fuckery.

Is this a thing that's actually happening?

"I probably shouldn't be making decisions on this little sleep. But fuck it. If you're holding out for dawn, I'll stay too. Someone needs to watch your back," Hemogoblin says, rubbing his eyes again.

"Really?" Heir clenches both hands into fists of victory, his eyes shining when Hemogoblin nods. "Meet back on the roof across the street before dawn?" He suggests, tugging on the strap that holds the war hammer along his back. He's grinning as widely as ever, and Hemogoblin searches uselessly for the broken man who had looked at him with hollow eyes in the camera room. As far as he can see, Heir just totally reset himself back to his usual goofy self, and seems determined to forget that weird, flat despair and the ensuing nosebleed ever happened.
...It's too much. He can't do it. Hemogoblin files that entire episode away in his brain to think about later. Turns out he can only handle one life-threatening crisis at a time, and he just needs to step back and ignore Heir's new problem until he finishes fixing his own. If he tries to balance both issues at once, his brain will probably explode into little candy-red chunks all over the place, and wouldn't that be fucking disgusting and inconsiderate of him. "Yeah, sure. See you around," he replies, nodding when Heir takes off into the sky.

But he can't help thinking, as he darts into the shadows and heads for the library, and for his hidden phone, that he's not the only one here who is in desperate need of a moirail.

Because if something is wrong with the Heir of Breath, then they are both fucked.

Kanaya's apartment is familiar to Rose, but only just. She visited just once before, what seems like an age ago, but she can still see the subtler changes in decor, the pieces of furniture and knick knacks and fabrics that have accumulated in the ensuing months. Kanaya has an eye for the tasteful and the refined, and she has veiled the walls of the loft with swathes of heavier cloth, in reds and blues and the occasional, startling yellow-green. The window has been left open to allow in the cool morning air, with the faint smell of brick stone and asphalt that is quickly covered by the fragrance of peach tea. Rose perches on the very edge of the sofa, drinking in the sight of the antique sewing machine, the dress patterns splayed across the work table, and the grey bookshelf, nearly concealed by a swoop of purple fabric, that houses both romance novels and various treasures Kanaya has gathered over the years. A recooperacoon hangs in the corner from the ceiling, an unusual arrangement.

She recognizes the cupboard over the refrigerator, and knows that behind the smooth exterior lies an ice box filled with delicate bottles and plastic packets filled with an assortment of rainbows. Kanaya's rather unique condition grants her preternatural strength and astounding regenerative capabilities, but Rose knows that the troll also struggles to assuage the accompanying thirst, for fear of drinking the blood of criminals in addition to meting out justice. Rainbow drinkers are rare enough in the world that being outed as one, either as Kanaya Maryam, seamstress, or the Malachite Sylph, Philadelphia's elegant enforcer of justice, would gravely compromise Kanaya's secret identity.

And since the Sylph continues to insist upon utilizing a chainsaw as her primary weapon, Kanaya must always exert totally control over her thirst. Blood gets everywhere if and when she seems such justice necessary, rather than just using the chainsaw as a means of intimidation.

By the warm light of the overhead lanterns, though, Kanaya's condition is not immediately obvious. The sclera of her eyes when she pivots to face Rose lack the extra luminescence they gain in the darkness, and with the flawless perception of her sight Rose can see the faint brush of tinted makeup along Kanaya's cheeks and arms, concealing the unnatural pallor.

"Feel free to the food of my table," Kanaya says, setting the tea tray on the low, dark mahogany table before the sofa. "It is good to see you in person, Rose."

"It's good to see you as well, Kanaya," Rose replied, resisting the urge to smooth at her skirt. It would only draw attention to the ill-fitting lines. Kanaya has already given her a disapproving onceover. "Thank you for letting me in on such short notice. I'm sure you had other business to take care of today."

Kanaya flicks a hand, shaking her head as she seats herself on a cushion beside Rose. "Not at all. I need to take in the waist of a dress, and hem something for Ms Poulter. That is nothing. Business has been slow these past few days."
She smells like a heady perfume, one Rose cannot identify, along with the ever present scent of cloth and blood. It's mildly intoxicating and Rose has to lean over to pick up the teapot and pour a cup for herself and then for Kanaya. It helps her hide the faint reddening of her cheeks until the flush clears and she can present the cup to Kanaya with a bland smile. "Slow? You're still having trouble with vandals, then?"

She can never explain what it is about Kanaya. Kanaya is both beautiful and caring, and packs a mean right hook, and apparently that's all Rose's foolish hormones need to send her stuttering into the throes of more amorous inclinations.

Kanaya accepts the cup with a nod. Her expression goes grim and cold at the mention of vandals though, which is really all the confirmation Rose needs. "Unfortunately, yes. They tend to strike while I am out on patrol, and I cannot afford to neglect the rest of the city simply to protect my own interests."

Rose grimaces in sympathy, letting the tea cup warm both of her hands. She is always so cold, of late. "I still don't understand what they have to gain, harassing you this way," she murmurs. "Simply because you chose to be a seamstress. It is...so unreasonable."

Kanaya shrugs, the pale lilac fabric of her sleeveless dress draping over her as she leans back a little against the back of the sofa. It's a subtle hint, and Rose relaxes at last, settling herself back against the cushions rather than hovering like a skittish cat on the edge. "They fear what they do not understand."

Rose snorts derisively. "Such a hackneyed excuse. What is so difficult to understand about a choice of vocation that differs from the norm?"

Kanaya laughs a little and shakes her head. Rose has a very strong impulse to caress her bob of dark hair, which she tucks away into the structure of her developing mind, filed under 'a grand idea, but wait until later.' "There is a short list of occupations society considers acceptable for jade bloods. Bad enough to choose not to bond with one of the mother grubs and serve as a Nurturer - I could have become a nurse, a caregiver, a surrogate custodian, even a teacher, and received more acceptance."

"Imbecilic," Rose sniffs, and then sips at her tea. It is warm and the taste of peach suffuses her senses. Perfectly brewed. "It still gives them no right to obstruct your business this way. It is your life to live."

"Rose," Kanaya says gently. But there is something else there that gives Rose warning, a note that mingles stern caring and gentle warning, a tone that Kanaya has mastered. "We have had such a discussion of the unfairness of institutional hemoism before, and as ceaselessly relevant to my interests as the subject is, it is not what we should be discussing at the moment. You are stalling."

Rose clenches her hands on the tea cup and slowly lowers it from her lips. She cannot look Kanaya in the eye, and chooses instead to apply her focus to the potted fern that takes up the opposite half of the table. "I know. I know," she says quietly.

"Perhaps you may wish to wait a little longer, and if so I respect that you may still require time to gather yourself," Kanaya hastens to add. "But you said that you could not recover fully under your mother's roof. My only condition for your staying here is that you promised to speak with me. To let me help you heal. I will not permit you to fall back into yourself again, Rose."

Rose's heart throbs and she has to hide her face once more, bending her neck so her hair falls forward, staring down into the light tea so Kanaya can't see the faint terror in her expression. It is quite one thing, she thinks wryly, to psychoanalyze others, and to rework my own mind. It is apparently quite another to consider letting someone else in to analyze me.

It was a vulnerability she had not been able to expose in front of her mother, or even reveal to John via Pesterchum. As deeply as she adores John, she remains aware that he has darkness of his own, a clinging pain that he has buried deep and proceeded to ignore blithely with a smile on his face. No, the last person who needs to be burdened with the full details of the many ways Rose is broken is John. The most he is aware of is that Rose has begun to set up new methods of defending against the grimdark. Any more than that, and Rose might risk ripping through John’s fragile persona to the pain underneath.

Helping John will have to wait until Rose is in a fit state to even help herself, though. And speaking to Kanaya - not just through the medium of the Internet - is the one outlet Rose could think of. There are simply too many compromising details about Rose's hero work inherent in the narrative for her to turn to a professional with her issues.

Swallowing proves difficult, and Rose has to try a few times before she can look up and meet Kanaya's eyes. "I appreciate this, Kanaya. More than you know, and more than I will be likely be willing to admit once we actually begin to talk about this," she admits, laughing faintly.

Kanaya smiles back, her lips painted a shade darker than the purple of her dress, and her eyes glint with understanding. "As long as we know where we stand," she says, raising her own cup and sipping. The troll winces, her lip tugging to the side, and then stands. "Pardon me a moment. I'm afraid this tea needs a little extra kick."

Rose laughs, startled, and she catches the merry, tricky grin on Kanaya's face before the troll sashays away. Kanaya is ordinarily so serious and chic, she can fool even Rose into forgetting her sillier side. "Do you have anything for those of us less inclined to the more sanguine fluids?" she retorts, crossing her ankles. Just a drop couldn't hurt - just a sip...now that she wouldn't have to owe another debt to her mother for a taste...

Kanaya smirks as she unlocks the ice box and, humming, selects a clear bottle of bluish blood. "I'm sure I can hunt down something," she muses, unstoppering the bottle and adding a judicious dollop of blood to the tea. "Bring me yours."

Rose raises an eyebrow and obliges, leaning over the island between the main room and the kitchenette, as Kanaya drinks her tea, nods, and replaces the bottle in its sealed cupboard. Then with a flourish the troll bends and opens a cupboard beside the sink. Within, to Rose's sudden thirst, she sees a neat row of five bottles, not a garishly bright rainbow of blood but darker, warmer blacks and pale ambers.

She hasn't had a drink in nearly a fortnight. Something close to actual, aching pain claws at her throat, and she feels utterly parched.

"Peach schnapps, do you think?" Kanaya proposes, withdrawing a thin bottle of nearly clear liquor. Rose just shrugs, though she inwardly tries to think whether adding peach to peach would work, or simply make the drink too sweet. Well, the only way to know was to try it.

Kanaya holds up the bottle, looks over at Rose, and sighs. The merriment is gone from her face. "I'm sorry, Rose," she says quietly, and then she uncaps the peach schnapps and upends the entire bottle of pale pink alcohol into the sink.

Rose goes cold. "Kanaya," she says, her voice cracking a little. Why -

"I thought so." Kanaya sets that bottle aside with a clank on the counter-top, and reaches beneath for a slimmer, darker bottle of cognac. "This will have to go, too."

Rosie's stomach twists and knots into a hard tangle as she realizes what's going on. "Kanaya, don't, you don't have to do that because of me-

"You have a problem, Rose," Kanaya says serenely, uncorking a bottle of red wine and mournfully closing her eyes before letting it drain away down the sink. "It caused me grave concern even before it became clear your alcohol intake was contributing to your difficulty in maintaining a healthy standard of living. You agreed yourself that the alcohol may have enabled the Horrorterrors to find new weaknesses in your mind - what happened to that, Rose? Have you forgotten? Or allowed yourself to forget?"

And oh, it stings. "I am guarded against further such incursions now. A little alcohol won't sent me off in another fugue of festerbrood rage, Kanaya," Rose tries, aware that she is near babbling. She has taken her hands away from the tea cup now, her fingers clutching at the edge of the island countertop, and that isn't right, that isn't her.

"Rose. Listen to yourself, please. You have studied psychology all your life, and you cannot recognize the terminology of an addict? An alcoholic? I refuse to believe you so blind." Kanaya pours out the last bottle without taking her eyes from Rose, until at last Rose is forced to look up and meet her gaze. What she sees there is fierce and intent and lovingly stern, the expression Kanaya has no doubt worn a thousand times in her quest to play auspistice for the entire bloody world. This is not just Kanaya Rose is dealing with, then.

Well. Kanaya had, after all, promised to protect the world from Rose, and Rose from herself. It is only fair that it is the Sylph scolding the Seer, now.

She is being unworthy of her name. She shudders with disgust at how quickly and quietly the craving for alcohol had slipped back into her mind, coaxing her back to her old mindset.

In fact -

"A moment, Kanaya," Rose says, straightening her back. Her heart thumps with something new now, as she realizes the opportunity she now has. "Just pardon me a moment -"

She closes her eyes and looks inward. She does not ease herself into her mindscape through meditation - she forces the insight and then she finds herself in the world of her own thoughts. The container for her old mind fragments remains balanced in place above the sun panel, but she narrows her eyes at the lid she used to seal it.

From beneath the lid, writhing and reaching up toward her like tangling strings, is the black tar of her alcoholism. She hasn't seen it this clearly since she dumped the sand of her old mind here, but now, with the greater body of the craving trying desperately to wrap around her conscious mind as well, she is able to reach out with hands that burn with the light of the sun and slice the tendrils where they have exposed themselves. She cuts ruthlessly and reaches out to torch the stranded black goo where it hovers in her mind. She burns and strips it down and burns again, her eyes blazing with light as she seeks out any scraps that might seek to hide elsewhere in her blasted mind.

Glaring, she looks down.

And yes, there it is. One last black, oozing string reaches down toward the sun pane, dripping tar over the shield that holds the grimdark back.

Rose seizes the tendril in a fist, smirks as it writhes and tries to rip free, and twists her hand, sending a line of bright gold fire through the craving that tried to reach out to the Furthest Ring. She maintains it until all that remains is ash. Rather than sweeping the ashes into her container, where the last remnants of the addiction probably still reside, she gathers it all together and vaporizes it in a hot blast. It pricks her skin with the beginnings of a sunburn, but she's used to light in all its forms.

She closes the eyes in her mindscape and opens them in the physical world. Kanaya leans with a hip hitched on the counter by the sink still, all smooth lines and graceful curves, right down to the wrinkle of worry between her thick brows. "A rousing success," Rose reports, unclenching her hands from the countertop. That craving for alcohol that had gripped her so suddenly has eased, though she still tastes phantom wine on her tongue, but now she has regained her clarity. It is obvious how unhealthy the craving is, and how she knows she would not be able to stop with just a 'taste.'

She has already gone ten days sober. That was, in fact, most likely the hardest part, and she spent much of it so immersed in her own mind's defense and her last war with her mother that she missed the immediate aftermath of her abrupt sobriety. She has effectively 'dried out'; all that remains is a lifetime of maintaining that.

It will most likely never stop, of course. Considering Rue Lalonde's own alcoholic inclinations, Rose most likely has a genetic predisposition to this kind of addictive personality. She will need to refresh her memory on alcoholism and addiction, it would seem. The circular logic that overwhelmed her just now was too easy to give in to. She needs to arm herself against further relapses with knowledge.

"Are we of one mind, then?" Kanaya asks quietly, tilting her head to the side.

What on earth did Rose do to deserve such a perfect friend? Abruptly, she blinks, and feels a tear run down her cheek. "Oh my - y-yes," she stammers, brushing at her face with a hand, her breath hitching. Then, she realizes - why not? She closes her eyes and lets the next sob rock her. "Oh, Kanaya. I'm a mess," Rose gasps, laughing breathlessly. There are still tears prickling at the corners of her eyes, and she wants to laugh and sob in equal measure. "A well-played intervention. Really, truly. It was Oscar-worthy."

Kanaya drops a half curtsy, bowing with her hand pressed to her chest, that tricky smile back on her face. "All of my interventions are Oscar-worthy. I was particularly proud of the peach schnapps. I do not know why I have yet to be nominated for a Nobel Peace Prize."

"I shall remedy this at once. The word of the Seer of Light should surely be enough to have you considered by the committee." Rose sets her elbow on the countertop and uses it to rest her cheek in her palm, wetness still dampening her face as she smiles at Kanaya. No doubt her ridiculously flushed adoration is radiating from her downright goofy grin, but she doesn't care. She doesn't have to hide it, here. She is not at war with Kanaya. Here, in this space, she is not constantly judged and found wanting. "Oh, Kanaya. What are we going to do with me?"

"You will stay here," Kanaya says briskly. She begins to gently set the empty bottles of alcohol in the trash can, dusting her hands off as she does. Then she begins to stride around the island toward Rose. "And you will heal. And what you cannot heal alone, I will be here to help you with."

"Thank you," Rose says, wiping at her eyes one last time. She could at least try to look presentable for this next part. Even through the relief and the weariness and the happiness, she is a Seer and she knows that look in Kanaya's eye. And she approves.

Kanaya just nods, because obviously, and places a claw under Rose's chin. "May I?"

"You may," Rose replies, and so she smiles widely through the kiss that Kanaya presses to her lips.
All she can offer is a rueful laugh in response to Kanaya's raised eyebrow. "My apologies. That was not up to par at all, was it?"

"It is understandable. You have been through a grave trauma," Kanaya snarks back. "Of course, I am here to help with this as well."

"Thank goodness." Rose reaches out and guides Kanaya down into a proper kiss this time, one hand on the nape of her neck. And then, because it is a grand idea, she runs her fingers through Kanaya's hair.

"And," Kanaya adds after they break apart, drawing back to inspect Rose appraisingly, "we will get you a new wardrobe. Rose, darling, this skirt - what were you thinking?"

Kanaya wields her pins and clips like precision instruments, and Rose would not be surprised to learn that Kanaya has a sewingkind strife specibus on the side for the occasions when she might not have access to a working chainsaw. In the flurry of Kanaya overruling all of Rose's half-hearted protests, Rose nearly forgets that she promised John to pester him as soon as she arrived. "Kanaya, may I borrow your computer first?" she cuts in when Kanaya begins to mutter something about cotton weaves and snaps out her measuring tape. "I swore to John I would keep in contact with him, and it is already well past the time I intended to message him."

"Go ahead," Kanaya says around a mouthful of pins, waving at the computer in the corner with the tape. "If you think I cannot obtain accurate measurements while you sit, you underestimate me."

"Oh no, never," Rose says, smirking as she goes to the computer and settles herself on the backless stool. Kanaya approaches a moment later, as Rose waits for Kanaya's slow Echidna wireless connection to start up so she can open Pesterchum, and presses cool hands to Rose's back while she measures the length of her spine. "Dearest Kanaya, why you persist in using this ancient service provider and web browser remains a mystery when compared with your usual cutting-edge fashion," she murmurs.

Kanaya ruffles the back of Rose's hair. "Hush. Only Sollux is allowed to demean my poor internet decisions. Besides, I enjoy Echidna. There is none of this newfangled tab nonsense yet."

Rose just shakes her head and logs out of Kanaya's Pesterchum handle, typing in her new handle and password and waiting patiently for it to log in while Kanaya stretches the measuring tape across her shoulders. "Sollux?"

"An old friend. Or acquaintance, perhaps. He lives in Toronto, and often seems to despair of my technological prowess when I contact him."

"Hmm," Rose says, eyes lighting up when her chumlist appears at last. It is nearly eleven by now, and John should be in class by now, but he will no doubt have his phone on him. His handle isn't currently lit up, but she opens a chatlog anyway.

TT: John, this is simply to inform you that I have safely arrived at my companion's home, and once again have access to a computer.
TT: It may still be some time before I have reliable access to a phone, but I am here.
TT: Let me know when you receive this message, please.
-- thoughtfulThaumaturge [TT] ceased pestering ectoBiologist [EB] at 10:52:34 --
"Is that all?" Kanaya asks, her tape measure wrapped around Rose's waist.

"Ye- no," Rose corrects herself, frowning as an alert for an older pestering appears in the corner of the screen. She apparently missed this during the night, but it seems to be from turntechGodhead - Dave Strider. Hmm.

She can think of only one subject of conversation that might spur Dave to pester her directly after their awkward discussion a week ago. John. She clicks open the window, and adds turntechGodhead hastily to her chumroll to see if his handle is active.

Then, she actually reads the chatlog.

It is when she reaches one line in particular that she nearly chokes on her own spit.

TG: this is serious business i need you to tell me this isnt true
TG: are we siblings

"What in the name of god am I reading here?" she wonders aloud. After the initial jolt, she rereads the entire chatlog with a frown, while Kanaya sets aside the measuring tape and leans over her shoulder. "David, what on Earth would make you think such a thing?"

But there is no further explanation forthcoming from Dave, at least not on this chat window. After a few more lines he logged off, sometime last night while Rose was hitchhiking her way through Maine, and it would appear that he has not logged in yet this morning. It's more difficult to read Dave through text alone, given she doesn't know him but it's clear he was having a minor existential crisis over whatever the hell led him to believe they were related.

Kanaya, having read the text as well, sucks in a breath just about Rose's shoulder. "Do you believe his suspicions valid?" she asks quietly. "This turntechGodhead?"

"He is Dave - ah, Flashstep, from Houston," Rose corrects herself. Not that the Striders seem very concerned with keeping their given names private, but Kanaya would be more likely to recognize the hero name. "And this is...well, let us just say it would be very unusual for him to expose this level of concern and confusion openly, even in a private chatlog, if he wasn't truly shaken by the news. Strange. I wish he could have given more detail about where he might have heard such a rumor."

TT: I received your earlier messages. However, I would require further information on how you came to believe this familial tie might exist between us, and any other relevant facts you may have on the matter, before I would be able to make an educated guess on the subject.
TT: I have not previously been given reason to believe I had any siblings, but my mother has proven her tendency toward lies and deception on more than one occasion, so I cannot give a definitive 'no.'

"I don't know what to think, really. I wonder if he's spoken to John about this." Rose eyes the window she opened with John, then decides against it. Until she has more information to work with, speculation is futile, and would only work John up over potentially nothing.

Kanaya is rummaging around behind Rose somewhere now, humming over fabrics and pacing the room. "I may need you to stand for proper measurements of your legs," she says.

Rose smirks and raises an eyebrow, but before she can say anything and log off, a third chat window opens. Strange. Both John and Dave's handles are still dark, so it can't be them; but the two of them and Kanaya make up the whole of Rose's chumroll. "A moment more, Kanaya," she says, dragging the window to the middle of the screen.

Curious, isn't it?

Rose frowns. This pesterling...should not be possible. When she checks the subject header of the window, there is no description; the standard black text of the notification is absent, and the text itself, an obnoxious difficult to read white, has neither a chumhandle nor initials associated with it. Rose is not a technological genius, of course, but she is fairly certain all of this runs counter to how Pesterchum is designed to function.

TT: So sorry, I do not believe we are acquainted. Pesterchum appears to be malfunctioning. You are?
You recently began using a server that my own methods of communication can connect with. A most fortuitous turn of events.
TT: For whom? You? I fail to see how being contacted by an unidentified personage through the dubious whims of the Internet benefits me.
Oh, for us both, I am quite sure. Is this not a most expedient means of exchanging information?
TT: It still rather escapes me how such an arrangement would benefit me in any way, especially when you failed to provide your name.
Really? I am surprised, Ms Lalonde - I thought you quicker on the uptake than this.

He knows her name.

No, Rose realizes in a haze of fury, raising a glowing hand, he knows Mother's name. Not mine. Not anymore.

"I would appreciate it, truly, if you refrained from blowing up my computer, Rose."

Kanaya's voice breaks through the instinct to annihilate the source of the text that would so foolishly call her Lalonde, and Rose clenches her hand in a fist, breathing steadily until the urge has passed. No need to get so irritated about an annoying little man with a suspect Internet connection. He isn't worth it - if, indeed, it is a he at all. "Of course not. My apologies," she calls back to Kanaya, and then she sets her fingers to the keyboard once more, intending to give the unknown sender, if not the explosion she wishes she would unleash, then at least a stern talking to.

TT: I no longer choose to go by that name.
TT: And the fact that you know it at all leads me to be even less inclined to trust in any information you may wish to provide.
TT: I recommend you cease contacting me -
Or do you prefer Dark Star, now? It would be inconsiderate of me to use any name other than the one you prefer, after all.
Well, Rose?

The computer begins to rattle in its frame, and Rose barely hears Kanaya's concerned voice as she drills into the computer screen with her other sight, wishing she could see through to the truth of this mysterious being with her power. She shakes right along with the computer - and the desk it sits on, and the potted orchid that adorns the bookshelf beside it - even after Kanaya leans in to read the chatlog.

This is a total compromise of her identity. Whoever this person is, they know Rose, in all of her various states of mind, and have connected all those aliases in order to contact her. They know who she is.

Kanaya says it first. "I would recommend in that engaging, timeless human and troll pastime," she says lowly, gripping Rose's shoulder. "Lie."

"Quite," Rose replies, reeling, and she begins to do so.

TT: No, sorry. You must have contacted the wrong person.
TT: Understandable, given your grasp of technology does not seem to have kept up with the present. Do try not to be afraid or intimidated. I assure you, I only ever want to help you along your path. You do fascinate me so.
I am sure you have a rich assortment of questions, and whether you trust me when I offer you answers is entirely up to you.
TT: I have not admitted to being this Rose, yet. I believe you would do better to offer your services elsewhere.

How does he know about the Horrorterrors? How, how, how?

She can't afford to ask that, though, to demand the answers she craves. How he knew her chumhandle, her aliases, that little tidbit that once, long ago in her childhood, she had taken up the violin and sobbed as she played. She needs plausible deniability, but she is playing from a position of strategic disadvantage; this nameless pesterer knows too much about her, while she knows nothing at all about him.

TT: This conversation is at an end. Please refrain from contacting me again.
Oh, how rude of me. No doubt you require some time to absorb this latest news. You seem quite distraught, really. If you don't stop shaking, your computer may not work much longer. Is it really my humble offer that disturbs you so, or the news that you have a brother?

Rose closes the chat window. She shoves back from the desk and whirls, but the only person in the room is Kanaya, who nods at Rose with haunted eyes that have begun to shine yellow with tension. The troll darts to the windows and slams the open panes closed, untying heavy drapes from their hooks and yanking them to cover the windows so that no one can see in anymore.

"Kanaya, please cover me," Rose asks, and the troll finishes up with the last window, striding back to Rose's side with a firm nod, sliding her arms around Rose. Rose closes her eyes and doesn't feel it when her body slides to the ground, though she is quietly certain Kanaya has her.

Instead, she brings everything she has and funnels it into her sight. Light it up, she commands, a whisper that sends a shudder through her mind.

Slowly, Kanaya's apartment blazes up in a wave of light. Bright sparks mark the blood behind the cupboard door, and outline Kanaya by her side like a star's solar corona. Several of the treasures on Kanaya's bookshelf also burn brighter than the background, including one that makes Rose's bones hum when she sweeps her gaze over it, but instead Rose hones in on the computer, stripping away the dull glitter of the monitor and the chips and the circuitry, trying to find anyway a practicing thaumaturge might have been able to see through the computer, to sense the shaking generated by Rose's fear, to read the message from Dave that had been sent hours ago.

Nothing. Kanaya doesn't even have a web cam that could have been activated by an outside force. There are no hidden cameras in the apartment itself, not even when Rose nearly cracks the computer monitor with the force of her sight and a window shatters under her gaze. She will have to replace that, she thinks distantly. When Rose casts her vision outward instead, sweeping the city block around them in a mile-wide radius, she can find no one with eyes that meet hers, no one focused upon her but Kanaya. They hadn't been watching in person, then.
Frustrated, Rose snarls and tears at her other senses with less finesse than she really should have used until they start up again, and her vision fades back to normal. It burns when her sense of touch returns, and her ears are deaf for a moment before she fumbles with the mental controls and restores them.

"Anything?" Kanaya demands, her arms momentarily too hot as Rose's nerves misfire.

Rose can only shake her head, though it comes out as a diagonal shake, and she hunches forward, pressing the heels of her palms to her eyes until the light dims enough to see. "However he is observing us, it is by no means that I can See," she says, curling a hand around Kanaya's wrist. "It - it is possible it was a purely mundane hacking. I wouldn't be able to detect that."

There is a second possibility, of course, someone whose powers would not only explain Rose's inability to detect the mysterious typist's origin but also how they would have knowledge of Dave's suspicions. They would have more than suspicions, in fact.

If my mother is using her void technology to bedevil me, in some new phase of our war, I will end her, Rose thinks, in the privacy of her own thoughts.

Kanaya's expression is thoughtful as Rose's vision clears of sunspots. "I believe I shall contact Sollux. It would not be safe to do so with the computer if it has been compromised, I presume, but I believe my phone supports text messages, though Pesterchum is beyond it."

"And he could trace this?"

"If there is any troll in the world who can, it would be him," Kanaya replies, giving Rose one last squeeze. "You will be well?"

"As well as I can be after that little stunt. Go," Rose says, shooing Kanaya toward the kitchen, where her ancient flip phone is charging. Rose waits for the last of the strain to ebb from her mind, and makes sure that the container of her thoughts remains balanced and not upset by her abrupt, reckless activation of her full sight. Everything seems to be in order, and she rises to her feet, eyeing the computer.

Another chat window has popped open in the interim. She hesitates, debating the merits of using the Pesterchum app at all when it may well be compromised.

But she needs to, at the very least, warn John and Dave. And if it is either one of them pestering her with answers to her earlier queries, they deserve a response, however brusque. She approaches the computer and does not sit down; instead, she bends over the keyboard to read.

Her heart sinks; it is another blank window, with a few lines of obscure white text on a white field that she must highlight to read with a feeling of dread.

I assure you, I have everyone's best interests at heart, Rose.
I am quite certain the information I can provide for you would prove most useful.
Until later, Rose.

Rose does not reply. She hesitates, and then minimizes the window rather than closing it. She knows little of hacking, and it could be that this Sollux will need the window as a way to track it to its origin. After all, it is not as though she has a chumhandle for this strange white-text man that she could offer up as a clue.

(Do not trust him) something mutters in her brain.
something else insists, with a distinctly different shrieksong. A third voice sighs resignedly, with a whistle that could shred the ether and shatter diamonds. Rose, distantly, thinks that it's strange - the Horrorterrors may be a hivemind, but she's never heard so many different voices before. They have always sounded a little like Rose gone wrong, and that was why they slipped so easily into the fabric of her mind before, wearing away at her by subtle assimilation of her mind. These voices...they sound nothing like her at all. They're painfully different.

Then she realizes exactly what she's hearing.

The sun pane. I fucked it up.

Rose's eyes roll back in her skull as she bursts into her mindscape like a sun, shoving her way past the burgeoning structure of her new mind, into the numbed area affected by the void bracers still on her arms to get a better look at the sun panel below.

It is whole, from this perspective. But that is impossible. Rose knows what she heard, and like hell is she going to allow her mind to confuse her into believing that the voices of the grimdark and the cold damp are hers. They are using some illusion to fool her again; the only way they could begin to whisper in her mind once more is if the panel has cracked, and the void bracers have ceased to be enough on their own. Intently, she scans the flattened pane of sunlight, running mental fingers along every inch, looking for the weak point.

She can find none. Confused, Rose draws back hesitantly, looking over the entirety of her mind. But there is no sign of a new channel to the Furthest Ring, and the current channel remains sealed over. Putting out a hand, she pours a new flood of pale orange light into the original sun panel, drawing on some of her newly reaccumulated personal power. The pane brightens, and faint wails echo from beneath.

(ơh rơse)

(so cruel, so cruel, so cruel...) But none of them make an effort to resist her; nothing even reaches up through the channel to shove at the sun panel. She gives it as much power as she has, and then kneels back.

Everything is silent in her mind. There is not even the quiet slosh of the bloodbrine sea that used to eternally echo in the old structure of her mind.

Perhaps the sun panel simply needed reinforcement? None of her wards seem to have degraded, and even the earlier damage from the alcoholic craving seems to have done more than left stains on the inside of the Tupperware container of her memories.

Crisis...averted? A little put out, Rose opens her physical eyes again. She remained aware enough to keep standing, but Kanaya is still leaning her back against the sofa when she comes to. "A mild incursion of certain unspeakable voices," she informs the troll wearily, leaning her head back against the cushions with relief.

Kanaya's eyes sharpen with merciless intent. "A problem?"

"Apparently not," Rose admits, pinching her nose.
"Your nose is bleeding," Kanaya says with considerably more alarm. Rose's eyes pop open and she claps her hand over her nose and upper lip. They stare at each other for a moment, before Rose bursts out laughing. "It is hardly a laughing matter, Rose," Kanaya says, pouting a little.

"You had a shot in your tea, I know you're fine," Rose says, waving a hand flippantly. "Your self-control is impeccable, Kanaya." She laughs one last time before sighing, and shakes her head. "I merely had to reinforce my shields, and the voices of the Abyss went silent. It was...interesting. I do not think I have ever had such total silence before all my life. I can't tell if they're weaker, or if I'm stronger...or if they've just lost interest."

"Given you up as a bad investment?" Kanaya asks dryly. "You did say you had already sabotaged them in New York quite successfully. Perhaps they have realized they cannot control you, and are stuck with a connection they can no longer use."

Interesting speculation, thought Rose. It is true that the ways of the many-angled gods are...many-angled. Their interest in her always predicated on their ability to manipulate her for their own ends. After the failure in New York, perhaps they really did deem her too much of a hassle for their wider plans.

"I don't know, Kanaya. I don't know," Rose says, pressing fingers to the blood leaking from her nose and inspecting it for any sign of dull purple. "My diverting all of my energy into that search for the typist may have simply drained the sun panel accidentally. It all happened too quickly for me to analyze it properly."

Now that the immediate panic has passed, she is almost...nonplussed. But one thing is clear.

She must get in contact with John and Dave.

And if the computer is compromised, she needs a phone. Soon.

---

Dave thinks that maybe he should have put a little more thought into this.

From the outside, he looks stone cold, like a goddamn iceberg, floating around the inside of this shitty movie theater so smoothly none of these suits notice he's got like ninety percent of his mass hidden beneath...the surface.

That shitty metaphor didn't really pan out, but he's actually getting kind of stressed, okay?

See, he had really wanted this to just be an in-and-out, and thought that he'd be able to scope out the place with his fucking fantastic disguise and then ollly out like a total badass before anyone even noticed his suit had a higher threat count than all of these guys' rags combined. But now that he's in here, it's kind of hard to do the spying thing when everyone is in motion.

He is really curious about an array of computer equipment they have tucked away in one of the projector rooms, for example. Glancing around, using his shades to cover his shifty look, Dave sidles closer and goes to poke at one of the screens. When he shifts the mouse, it lights up and he scrolls through row after row of meaningless gibberish. It's all graphs and charts and maps, but none of it is labeled. Seriously, what kind of disorganized fucks are these guys? How do they keep track of everything if they don't even save their files with names? When he clicks through to the hard drive, it's just a mishmash of anonymous numbers. If you don't go into this system knowing exactly what you're looking for, you won't find anything at all. If there are charts Dave would find useful, he just doesn't know where to look.
"Hey? What are you doin' here?" a voice growls behind him. Dave stiffens and feels his shoulders hunch, and he has to grab his own wrist with his other hand when it tries to fly up and whip a sword out of its hidden sheath. He hasn't blown his cover yet, and he is not going to start swinging sharp objects around in the middle of an enemy hideout unless he's totally lost control of the situation. Instead, he straightens up slowly and turns, shoving his hands in his pockets where he can prod at the stupid ninja stars there for luck.

He shrugs. It's all he can do. His mouth wants to let loose a stream of excuses, but he can't. Fucking Talk. The silent pause that ensues stretches on and on, the time ticking as always on a metronome in his skull, and he starts to sweat because he has to use that time, why is he wasting it with this useless silence. At least when he's talking he's moving, not standing here fidgeting under a suspicious gaze when he just wants to slide back against the wall and pretend he's invisible. Even with the shades between him and this nosy asshole's stare, he feels exposed.

At last, the guy just snorts. "Whatever. If you think you can make sense o' that crock of shit, go right ahead. Just don't come cryin' ta me when Crowbar catches you dicking around." Rolling his eyes, the man stalks away, back down the stairs to the first level, where all the actual theater rooms are located.

Dave doesn't sag with relief. He has been cool as a goddamn icicle this entire time, dammit. He doesn't wipe sweat off his hands while they're still in his pockets, and he most certainly doesn't give the computers a wounded grimace as he shuffles out. He can come back here later, maybe, and click around some more, but right now he can't risk that guy coming back with someone who actually will notice that Dave doesn't exactly belong here. His hands come up, fall, and then come up again as he struggles with indecision, and then finally he reaches up and yanks the bowtie until it comes undone. His totally non-existent sense of style had caused him to rock the crimson red tie for the sake of livening up this drab black on black the Crew have going on, but it's too much of a risk. He folds the bowtie away and stuffs it into his pocket, leaving buttons on his collar undone. He can't look so put together. These Crew guys may wear suits, but they don't do it well, and the less put together Dave looks, the longer he's going to go undetected.

So even though it feels like blasphemy, he leaves his collar in disarray and follows the other man down the stairs at a discreet distance. The other projector rooms were either empty and abandoned still or full of trash and discarded food wrappers, including an entire hellhole dedicated to empty pizza boxes. Dave had such powerful war flashbacks upon seeing a rat crawl up onto the peak of the pizza mound that he had had to slam the door and wheeze quietly to himself in a corner. Yeah, back in the day, the Strider apartment hadn't been the comparatively spotlessly clean pile of smuppets and swords it is today; there had been...darker times. He likes to pretend they never happened, and Bro obliges.

Anyway. He needs to be more careful. He can't let himself be alone in a room with a Crew member again; it's too obvious that Dave can't speak when he's one of only two people, and if he breaks out into sign language they're probably going to be pretty fucking pissed.

He coughs silently into his sleeve when he troombs down the stairs and stirs up a cloud of dust that prickles his throat, and then he turns to slink right along the wall, keeping his head down so none of the Crew members rushing by can see his face. Fuck, he is moving so damn slow. He just wants to be able to flashstep and stop wasting time, but instead he's stuck moving at the same half tempo as everyone else in this crapsack building.

Spying may not be his thing. Maybe. Possibly.

But fuck, he can't back out now. He's here to get the answers the Badass Quandary has always denied him, and if that means he has to sacrifice his dignity right now for the chance to see her shocked face later when he lays down some sick beats on all the incredible intel he's uncovered, then fine. He can do this. He is Dave motherfucking Strider and he is going to keep his impeccable reserve intact until this mission is complete.

Dammit.

A group of three Crew members hustles by, all of them muttering to themselves. Dave presses himself into an alcove next to the shattered remains of a poster display that might have once advertised a Back to the Future showing (the irony is deliciously sweet. Fuck. Yes.) and tries to listen in. All he can catch before they turn to head out into the front lobby and leave the building are the words 'fuck sobriety' and 'with only one hand!', neither of which make any sense to him.

Anyway. Scanning the corridor, Dave sees the coast is relatively clear. He checked all the projector booths first because there looked like there were fewer people on that floor, but now it's time to man up and look through the actual theaters. He's snuck glances through the projector booth windows, but most were too filthy and cracked to get a good look down below.

He can do this. He has totally got this in the bag. This is basically him shoving this operation in a sack and tying off the opening so it can never leave said bag. A quick look around each theater, and he can get the fuck out of here and regroup for a second run-through later this week. It would be quicker if he could use all the time at his disposal, but he just can't risk being seen mid-step and having the entire fuckwad brigade descend on him at once. Breathing in deeply, he keeps his head down and nudges his way with tiny steps through the double doors to the first theater.

This whole movie theater is a mess. If this were another time and place, and the whole thing weren't infested with mobsters, Dave would give serious thought to maybe taking pictures of the rows of dust-coated chairs and the ragged but still plush curtains that hang limply on either side of the main screen. It would be fucking ironic, okay, making fun of all those hipster pics with their commentary on the quintessence of dust and shit. Bro is right about some things, on occasion; Dave hasn't rigged up his impromptu dark room in too long. Not since before John popped down for a visit by accident, anyway. He should fix that.

This room has been relatively cleaned up, though, he sees. The front five rows have been dusted off, exposing the sad zigzag pattern of the chair fabric. This was also the room with the cleanest window in the projector booth above, Dave recalls, but there doesn't seem to be much here. He hugs the wall as he goes up the stairwell, twitching like a goddamn rabbit whenever he hears another sigh or creak from the ceiling or the walls, and tiptoes all the way up to the top row before conceding that this room seems to be empty. Even when he bends low and checks the floor for anything incriminating someone might have dropped, the floor is almost clean, aside from the footprints in the ever-present dust. It looks like someone has made an effort to clean up this room and its projector. Hell, maybe even a bunch of raging cultist gangsters need a movie night sometimes? Dave ain't one to judge.

But anyway. This room is a resounding waste of time. Shoving his shades up his nose, Dave shrugs and pushes himself up off the ground, brushing his hands off with a grimace. They're coated with dirt and god knows what else from getting to second base with the floor, and he doesn't really want to even stick them in his pockets, now. Seriously, his suit never asked to get mixed up in whatever fucked up affair his hands and the floor were having. Letting them hang awkwardly by his sides, feeling like he probably looks like his arms are sticking out from his body at an angle, he trots down the stairs and back out into the main hallway.

A woman in black rushes by, her sleeve actually brushing against his nose when he doesn't backpedal in time to avoid her. She is gnawing on a pencil as she passes by him absorbed in her armful of papers. He has no idea what they are; he just thanks them mentally for taking up all her attention so she didn't notice the near-Strider encounter that almost just ended with them both crashing to the floor. His heart doing a good impression of a remix, Dave cracks his neck and pretends he totally meant for that to happen. Then he walks as normally as he can down to the next set of doors.

He looks in, does a double take, and then nearly flings himself bodily away from the door. The entire theater hall is crawling with Crew members, nearly a dozen of them, and at least two look up with frowns when Dave aborts that little excursion. Yeah, no, he's not stupid; he's not going anywhere near a large group of those guys. Sweating a little now, he hustles to the next theater, feeling as though eyes are giving him a lookover from behind that is very much unwelcome. But when he works himself up to glance backwards, casual as anything, the corridor is empty. No one is looking at him, not even the mysteriously-appearing cue ball. It's just his imagination being a dick and trying to psyche him out. Way to be a douche, Dave's brain.

At least, he thinks, putting a hand on the next set of double doors and doing one last spot check on the hallway, he hasn't run into any future-Daves. He has it so that, for tonight at least, he's reserving time loops to be used only in the event he totally fucks this over. No superfluous time travel allowed past midnight. He also doesn't want to take the chance his time shenanigans can be tracked; Rue Lalonde seemed sure the Crew could hunt down Rose when she went all grimdark and gruesome, and who knows if they've really started tracking Dave again. It's just another reason why he's stopped flashstepping too. He can get through this without the super powers. He is a strong independent - oh, forget it. He barely opens the doors a crack, more wary after nearly slamming his way into a room full of Crew, and slides inside through as narrow an opening as he could manage. Suck it, John, skinny shoulders are good for something.

When he looks up, he realizes he's made a mistake. A different kind of mistake, but a mistake nonetheless.

He seriously should have put more planning into this little outing. Because never in all this past week would he have expected to stumble upon a frickin' dungeon. These guys have actual prisoners.

Fuck. Oh, fuck. Dave slips into the shadow corner by the double doors, making himself as small and unassuming as possible by ducking his head and staring at the two people chained to the projector wall opposite through the corner of his eye. Wow, when did the Midnight Crew graduate from petty crime and arson and smuggling to kidnapping people? This is so not what Dave signed up for, and he has no idea what to do.

Well. Rescue them, obviously. He is the hero. It is him. The question is how the fuck is he going to manage that when he's mute in a theater full of criminal mooks who would definitely want answers as to why he's busting these two poor suckers out of the hoosegow.

He presses his whole back up against the wall and edges sideways. He is a master of stealth, okay? Okay. He creeps closer to try to survey the entire theater without breaking cover, in case someone is loitering in the top row where he can see them around this corner. His eyes keeps being drawn back to the two figures chained to the wall. Because, weirdly enough, one is a carapacian. After a whole lifetime of only seeing them in history textbooks and on Internet articles, suddenly he's found a second carapacian out of bug fuck nowhere. It's not a Dersite like the BQ, though; this one is stocky and has a pale carapace, her bald head nodding forward as though she's about to pass out. The other guy has a burlap sack tied over his head, and isn't moving at all. There's something pinned to the ground to either side of him, two piles of more concealing tarp that tremble and twitch every so often. More prisoners?
Fuck. The more people Dave has to get out of here, the harder it'll be to stay below the radar. And like fuck is he leaving anyone behind.

But there's no sign of a future-Dave, at least. Apparently he can still handle this mission without time shenanigans, so maybe he's stressing out over nothing. Maybe the Crew will go out and get drinks at a bar, or a convenient distraction will get their attention, and Dave can walk right out of here without missing a beat.

He finally works himself up to peeking around the corner. He whips his head around and then yanks himself back around against the wall.

He pauses. Uh. He looked too fast to actually, you know. See anything.

How embarrassing. Wow, he's just going to forget that ever happened. Manning the fuck up, Dave grits his teeth and looks around the corner, up the stairs to the top of the stadium seating.

There's nobody there. He relaxes minutely, and throws a last look over his shoulder at the double doors before he darts up to the front stage area, where the front seats come to an end. The closer he gets, the more confused he is; if those two other tarps are covering other prisoners, why are there only two sets of chains? The Crew wouldn't just leave people lying around unguarded unless they were secure, right?

Trying not to think about it too hard, Dave kneels by the carapacian and tries to figure out how the fuck he's going to bust these people out. The carapacian has cuffs on each wrist, but they're clearly not built to hold the tiny segments of a carapacian wrist; someone has taped up her claws with packing tape so they're too thick to slip out through the too-loose cuffs. She stirs and mutters while Dave inspects them, but doesn't wake up. He'll have to watch it, though, because if she wakes up and screams at him they'll have Crew all over them faster than you can say 'this was an incredibly stupid idea.'

He thinks that if he can just slice off the tape, she'll be able to pull loose, no problem. He has the dexterity with a sword to pull it off. He just needs to wake her up quietly so she knows what's going on. He sneaks another glance at the guy with the bag on his head, and decides to wait until he's handled this potential shitshow first. He covers the carapacian's mouth with a hand and then shakes her by the shoulder.

She jerks awake, moving so fast she slams her cranium back against the concrete wall. Her taped up hands lift to pat at her skull as she shakes it woozily, and Dave grimaces as he has to keep moving his own hand to follow her weaving mouth. Unfortunately, his antics finally get her attention, and she glowers at him, eyes bleary.

Without much warning, she bites down. Sharp, tiny little teeth needle right across Dave's knuckles and he wheezes out a gasp of pain that makes no sound, yanking his hand back. Her jaws part a moment later, and he leans out of her range, waiting for a scream.

Nothing happens. When he looks away from his fucked up hand to see what the goddamn holdup is, the carapacian blinks at him, her mouth agape. She doesn't look freaked anymore - no, that looks more like...recognition?

…Huh. Wait a minute, have they met before -

'It's you! The shrimpy one from the lab!' Dave signs as it hits him. Twisting his hand for some of the signs stings, but he can still make them. 'The one who thought hiding behind a glass wall would hide her so she could spy on that conversation with the Lalondes!'
The carapacian blushes and stamps a heel as best she can. Her claws fumble in the chains as she makes a weird noise. Dave rubs his temple as a headache blooms in his skull, but she has to bang her taped up hands a few times before he gets it. She needs her hands free to communicate. Oops.

Drawing his sword at last, he cuts her hands free in two quick slices, his sword a blur, and then he helps her peel the tape off. As he thought, the cuffs simply fall to the floor with a clank when the carapacian flexes her joints and launches into babbling speech.

PM: I do not know what you are talking about, Knight! That was not a thing that ever happened! Ever!

PM: I am a simply Parcel Mistress and nothing more! Definitely not a spy!

Oh good. This one understands irony. They're going to get along just fine. 'Yeah, well, how did you end up all the way here in Houston, little miss Perfectly Mundane?' he asks, checking over his shoulder again. Someone is going to walk in here eventually; whoever's on guard duty won't be long now, not unless the Midnight Crew has gotten really fucking cocky about their secret hideout.

PM: Shhhh! You didn't see me! I'm not here at all!

He rolls his eyes behind his shades and doesn't comment further. If the lady doesn't want to talk, then the lady doesn't want to talk. 'Well, I'm getting you out of here,' he replies, shrugging. 'Whether you're actually here or not. Now, what about these guys?' He gestures to the people covered in burlap and tarps. It's kind of weird, but the two huddled on either side of the bagged man don't really...look like people. Uh. But maybe he's just seeing things.

PM: There is only -

PM: Oh no! You shouldn't - you won't want to see him yet -!

The warning shriek comes too late. Dave has already reached out with some of his usual speed and tugged the drawstring keeping the bag knotted over the man's head. For a moment, he wonders gruesomely if maybe PM is trying to warn him that the man is already dead, if they covered his head to hide the onset of decay.

Shit, that was morbid. He needs to stop doing that. The taxidermy collection is already bad enough.

Then the bag falls all the way off, and what he sees doesn't make sense.

The guy's covered in feathers.

Not all of his face, no, but his hair is thatched with them, several broken pinions sticking out at odd angles from his blondish hair, and the bright orange grooves of potential feather follicles frame his face. He's the color of an orange creamsicle and not even in the troll way, where their hair and veins and sometimes their cheeks sometimes gain a faint tinge of their blood and eye color as they age. No, this guy is straight up orange, a color Dave can't even remember seeing very often in trolls themselves, ranging from gold-streaked hair and honey-yellow feathers to a mouth the color of a tangerine.

And when the bird guy rolls his shoulders and blinks at Dave with confusion, the tarps on either side of his body shudder, and part of the left tarp falls off to reveal the bend of a wing, the covert feathers in disarray.

Oh. Uh. So, two for rescuing, then. That's good.

Yeah, no, Dave's losing his chill and oh man just don't freak out - HE HAS FUCKING WINGS?!!
"The fuck are you?" Bird guy croaks. He doesn't really sound like a bird, just a really pissed off teenage guy, bristling and glowering with pale orange eyes as he squints in the half light. If Dave ignores all the gratuitous orange and the feathers, he'd say the guy is around his age, even.

'Rescue party. You can pay homage and sacrifice virgins in my name later.' Dave pulls the tarps the rest of the way off and yup, those are most definitely wings. But his stomach turns painfully when he see's the wing on his left, the bird guy's right; it's been broken messily, with deep orange scabs where the broken skin tried and failed to heal. If he looks closer he thinks he'd see bone sticking out. He's seen enough birds and wings in his time to see exactly how someone would have had to hold the wing out and still, and then maybe brought just a well-placed boot down in the middle of the radial bone -

That's never going to heal right. Even if it had been set immediately after the injury was inflicted, that kind of damage to a hollow bird bone doesn't mend without consequences. If this guy ever flies again - can he fly? Is the wingspan wide enough to support his body? Dave can't tell if the numbers would work out, he's not a fucking bird-kid expert - it'd be with a severe cant to one side, and the wing will be weak structurally for the rest of his life.

Bird-kid seems used to the scrutiny of his wings, or maybe he's still out of it. Instead of calling Dave out on the uncool staring, he moves restlessly and says, "Dude. I don't know what the hand flapping means. Like. Seriously, English, man, do you speak it?"

Oh. Dave freezes, focusing on the sharp crack where the ulna and radius have both been snapped nearly in two instead of cussing himself out inwardly. Why had he expected this rando to understand sign language? Dave's been getting complacent, used to hanging around Bro and carapacians who understand ASL, and typing messages over Pesterchum that don't require a voice at all. It's not like he has much of a social life aside from that, after all.

Well, shit. He looks at the guy, deliberately meets his eyes, and mouths, "Still not gonna work all that well. Sorry."

The gasping, pathetically noiseless wheezes that emerge prove his goddamn point. The bird guy lets his mouth snap shut, and looks suitably guilty. His throat tight, Dave bends to inspect the cuffs on the bird guy's wrists. He can't help but notice that feathers line his arms, too, pale orange pinions like those that contour his wings, and the hands and wrists in the cuffs are more clawlike than human, strictly speaking. The feathers that march up from his metacarpals are short, lengthening out as they continue up his arms.

How bizarre. Exactly who designed this guy? More importantly, did Dave remember to bring his lock picks? He usually has an emergency sewing kit on him, just in case, and that would do in a pinch but he'd rather not start snapping his good sewing needles off in these shitty locks. Yeah, he should focus on that instead of giving the bird guy an unintended onceover. He's not a total dick.

Speaking of. Bird guy twists his wrists when Dave tugs on them for a better look, and ducks his head while he mutters, "Uh. Fuck. Sorry. I'm guessing you're that hero kid they're looking for?"

He might be blushing, but it's hard to tell when everything is orange. So much fucking orange.

But wait what. Dave jerks, twitches his hands intending to sign a 'what the fuck, they are looking for me?' before recalling the guy wouldn't understand.

Then he smacks himself on the forehead and turns to the obvious translator in the room. 'They're looking for me, then?' he signs at PM grimly. Then he pulls his sewing kit out of his inside pocket and starts working at the guy's chains.
PM, who is rubbing at the scrapes on her own thin wrists, nods.

PM: They have sought you in earnest apparently since your actions in New York. They do not speak as much in front of me as I might have wished, but I know they took - this one captive as well during their hunt for you. Whatever void protects you from their sight does not seem to extend to this one.

PM: …

PM: ...You are not hurting, Knight?

Dave raises an eyebrow, and silently mourns the loss of an old friend as he crooks a needle slightly to suit his needs. Before he starts working again, he replies, 'No idea what you mean, dame. I'm fine. You all right?'

PM nods hesitantly, her dark eyes flickering back and forth between keeping a wary watch on the double doors and scanning Dave's face for - something.

PM: I am fine. I was simply under the impression...that you would react more negatively to this revelation. Bleed from your nose, even!

PM: You are indeed a most stoic warrior, Knight!

Oh, man. Do all carapacians take BQ's strategy of enigmatic obfuscation as gospel? Because Christ on a tortilla, no part of that little spiel made sense. None of it. And he's figured out from years of dealing with the Dersite dame that it's easier to just shrug and nod when they get like this, so that's what he does before digging into the locks again. Bird guy is staring at him, horrified by something, but wow does Dave not care at all. Eventually the horror abates and Dave can work without worrying about that baffled, searching look the bird guy keeps throwing at him, for whatever reason.

Time is ticking away. Sweat runs down the back of his neck, because even with PM keeping watch he's paranoid as fuck. Bird guy shifts in his chains and stretches his left wing cautiously, looking much more alert now that he's got the bag off his head. And no, Dave is not going to waste brain power wondering if the hood had convinced the bird part of his brain to think it was night all the time, like when you hood a hawk and - nopenopenope.

The first cuff springs open at last, landing on the ground with a clank that makes Dave wince. Bird guy yanks his claw back and flexes it. Dave can still see the painful orange scabs running all the way around his wrist where he probably freaked and yanked on the cuffs at some point, and even a thin trickle of yellow-orange that looks fresh. Now that he's got the hang of it, Dave launches his assault on the other lock and nearly snaps his last pin in two with his haste.

"Any way to speed this up?" Bird guy has the nerve to ask, and Dave stops entirely to look up, keeping his face totally blank, and give him the middle finger. "Oh, ha fucking ha, like no one's ever flipped me the bird. Really fucking classy pun, jackass."

Actually, he hadn't even considered that one. He decides to just focus on his lock-picking, trying not to think about the fact that John's awful puns are starting to seep into his subconscious.

The last tumbler clicks into place pretty much at the same time PM lets out a warning yell.

PM: Knight? There is -

"Hey - what the fuck are you doing?!" a harsh voice demands, and Dave knows their cover is blown. He gets up from his knees and nonchalantly shrugs at the troll in the suit who is staring at him, the double doors still flapping behind him. The troll's disbelief is quickly melting into a fury, so Dave doesn't have long. That shout alone probably gave them away.

No reason to dick around in slowtime anymore, then. Drawing his sword, he crosses the theater floor in a second and slams the hilt into the side of the troll's head. The guy drops, easy, but yeah. Time to fucking blow this joint. 'We're out of here,' he signs to PM.

The bird kid whistles, and Dave feels a sharp pang of jealousy. "Not bad, man." Mr Creamsicle gets to his feet (are they feet? Dave didn't even think to look for more claws) and then nearly topples over backwards, staggering against the concrete wall. PM is closer and grabs one of the bird claws to try to steady the guy.

PM: Sir? Sir? You are not well!

"Can't help it. The wing ain't gonna get any better here. Time to blow this joint," the bird guy grunts, pulling himself upright.

Dave is struck with the weirdest sense of déjá vu. But hey, it's a common phrase, right? That was just a freaky coincidence. Besides, obviously he and the bird kid are in agreement. He nods firmly and waves frantically for PM and Feathers to join him by the unconscious troll. While he waits for them to catch up, running the slow way with the bird guy limping with every step, Dave flashsteps in and out of the theater hall, scanning the corridor. Unfortunately, between one second and the next, he can see a huge crowd of Crew members pouring out of the theater where they'd all been having their weird powwow, blocking off the nearest exit.

He wants to say they have to fight their way out. But honestly, it will probably just be Dave fighting, he thinks, eyeing the carapacian and the bird guy as they draw to a halt behind him. PM looks a scrappy little fighter, maybe, if a little fragile, but just crossing the room seems to have made Feathers pale in the face. The broken wing is dragging mostly on the ground, and it can't be good for the break for him to be moving it at all like that without a splint. But they don't have time for even a temporary fix.

Almost unconsciously, Dave starts a beat in his head. It's fast and smooth and nameless, and he starts to absently tap his finger against his leg as he signs one last thing to PM. 'You guys, stay behind. Try not to get caught again; we have to fight our way out.'

PM swells up, glaring indignant even as she translates, but Dave doesn't hang around to wait for the creamsicle's protests, too. He flashsteps out into the hall and stops himself in the middle of the corridor, flipping his sword jauntily in one hand as he waits indolently for the Crew to take notice of him. He takes a mental count in his head, and gets seventeen, maybe twenty depending on whether any other have reentered the building or are still busy upstairs. The sounds of a real fight will draw all the fuckers out of the woodwork, no doubt.

And to think, he'd wanted to avoid a fight. This was supposed to be a cool, super-secret spy mission, and look how well that turned out.

Oh well. 'Smoke 'em if you got 'em,' he signs to the uneducated morons, and smirks when nearly five rush him at a time, the others still milling about in confusion.

Dave draws a second sword, and lets the beat of the metronome take over.

The secret is to take them one at a time, never forgetting that there's more that aren't waiting in the wings like video game enemies, but actively trying to get past his guard with little regard for taking turns. Dave just lets them come and spins around them between the pitiful seconds they have to work with. He has so much more time to set up his moves that they just can't keep up, for the most part. A few come close to laying hands on him, but he always has that flashstep to let him sway out of the way, sticking out a foot with a lazy smirk to trip them when time starts for them again.

He has two swords out at once, and though he's generally better working with only one at a time, he needs the second to act as a parry whenever he can't dart out of the way. He has to press his advantage whenever he can, aiming to disable or incapacitate as many Crew members as he can, and that means sometimes stepping into a clusterfuck of weapons and opening himself up to retaliation he can't avoid. So he catches someone's clawkind along the edge of his blade and holds them there, gritting his teeth, as he socks someone else in the square in the throat with a fist closed around the hilt of his other sword. They drop, gasping for air, and Dave allows himself a near-maniacal grin at the glorious, perverse justice of it all. Then he whirls on the woman with the claw specibus and sets to work on knocking her unconscious.

He sees PM punch a green-eyed troll square in the nose. It's a fucking good hit, too, and the troll stumble back with a squawk. The lean carapacian leaps onto him and latches on like a fucking spider, clawing at the Crew member's face and then delving her claws into his pockets. She trills with triumph when she holds up a golden ring and punches the troll in the face one more time for good measure. She jumps off him and - Dave misses what happens next, as he falls smoothly to his knees and rolls backward to slice through the staff of a woman behind him, cutting her strife specibus in two - then suddenly, with barely a flick of her wrist the carapacian is wielding a fucking sword.

Well. That was unexpected. She doesn't hold it like an expert; the balance is totally wrong for her short frame and spindly arms, but she knows enough not to stab herself as she waves it angrily at the Crew members trying to close in on her so that they're forced back.

Dave loses track of her again in the fray when he needs to turn and slice and dip and cut again. Bro may be a stronger fighter, but like this, in a fight against people who aren't overpowered puppet freaks, Dave is more aware than ever that maybe he actually is a good fighter. Every move feels natural and each time stop sets him up exactly at the correct angle for a precise strike, and the blows fall on the right beats and it's flawless, it's a motherfucking symphony. He slices through someone's Achilles tendon and pivots with his shoe planted on their face in the next moment, kicking off backward.

When he has a rest in the song before the bass drops again, he seeks out Feathers. It's not hard - he stands out like neon orange flame in the swarm of black suits around them. Assessing him on the fly, Dave thinks he's most likely a way more capable fighter when he's not trailing a hugeass broken wing behind him. It's a huge disadvantage, and even though the guy is giving as good as he gets, fighting solely with his closed fists and the occasional bat of his functional wing, more than one hit lands when three Crew members gang up on him at once. There's blood streaming from Creamsicle's nose by the time he shoves one man into the wall and trips up the other with his good wing. The hoarse cry he lets out sounds almost like a bird shriek, and he flings himself at the third Crew thug with abandon. Clearly, he can hold out for a little longer, but the fact is both PM and the bird guy aren't in any shape for this kind of crowded melee.

It really starts to go sour when his shitty sword breaks. Sure, he still has one left, but the jarring rattle of slamming the sword up against a man's pistol that's just too thick to slice through is the last straw for the metal. No sword lasts forever, and this one shatters right by the hilt, leaving Dave with nothing to even stab with. He falls back, and now he's off beat, and he grimaces.

And then the boss arrives.
All the Crew freezes in place when someone yells from beyond their ranks, nearer the exit, and Dave is thrown off beat again when no one surges forward to take advantage of his broken sword. Through the crowd he can see another beacon of color that leaves him nonplussed. There's a man glowering through the bodies, eyeing Dave, and for once he's not wearing a midnight black suit. This one is a disgustingly sickly green, but everyone in the crowd is angled toward him now, which is all the clue Dave needs that this guy is Serious Business.

"The hell is going on?! Twenty of you can't take care of this?!” the man in green demands. Dave does not like the fucking look in the man's eyes; it's cold and calculating, and the Crew members who are still standing straighten up after the scolding, then shift back into battle readiness when before Dave had hoped he was wearing them down. Whoever told this guy felt green was a good color for his skin tone was a fucking liar, but he seems to be in charge, and Dave can tell, with a sinking feeling in his gut, that they're not going to be able to do this. There's just too many Crew members still standing for Dave to cut down, and John had told him to watch out for Crew bosses - Hearts Boxcars at least was a formidable hand to hand fighter. Dave can't tell what this guy is supposed to be, but he's not taking chances, not when he still has his two rescuees to consider, whose strength must be flagging fast.

He freezes in place completely, and the beat shudders to a stop in his head. The Crew members hesitate too, even with the man in green egging them on, clearly thinking he's up to something. It buys him time to think. He can't fight the instinct to whirl around, snarling when he sees there's still no sign of a future-Dave. Maybe he has no choice. Maybe he just has to take them back in time, but future-him can't make it back to the theater to give himself a heads up. Either way, he's out of options. Slicing out with his one unbroken sword, Dave flings the broken hilt at the nearest troll, scoring a direct hit between the woman's brown eyes, and flashsteps back until he runs into PM. The little carapacian is still kicking wildly, the ringsword clasped in one hand as a taller man tries to manhandle the weapon away from her. Dave kicks his legs out from under him in a time stop and grabs PM around the waist himself, hauling her up so she grabs him around the neck in a chokehold on instinct.

He can't give Feathers any warning, as both he and PM have their hands silenced. The bird guy does see Dave coming, and punches one last Crew member in the face before Dave grabs him by the shoulder and reaches deep inside himself for the agony.

Something goes wrong, and for an aching second the three of them are paused there. Dave fumbles and twists at his power, but it keeps sliding away between his fingers. He gags on the sharp pain that stabs through his throat, prolonged by this unwanted delay, and he panics, clawing at the power with his mind. Something is off, something about one of the two people he's trying to pull back in time with him, and he can't tell in the pain of the moment whether it's PM or Feathers - it's not like he's ever tried taking anyone but the occasional mugging victim back in time with him before, and who fucking knows, maybe his power discriminates against carapacians or orange bird people like a raging racist douchebag.

Abruptly, he twists, and the power clicks into place obediently. He's gotten better about thinking his way to the general time he's shooting for, but this time the shift is out of his hands, just like the first time he'd time traveled.

One last spasm of pain, and they're gone -

The wrong way.

They don't go backward, they go forward -
- and wow, at least Dave knows, when he hits the ground hard to throw up all over the theater carpet, why he never saw a future-Dave to give him warning. Bile burns up along his throat, drowning out the memory of the initial pain as his entire body cramps up to protest whatever the fuckity fuck just happened.

"Jesus fuck!" Feathers yelps, and Dave wonders vaguely why the bird guy knelt down beside him until he realizes, woozily, that he must have dragged both PM and Creamsicle down with him when he collapsed to get his pukefest on.

They're in the same hallway as earlier, of course, but the place is dead empty. When he looks up, panting and wiping at his mouth with the back of his hand, shaking, he sees dried blood everywhere he took someone down earlier, but no sign of the unconscious guys themselves. The air is still and quiet, and not even the walls are creaking, so it would seem the Crew has cleared out in...however long they were spiraling forward in time, rather than backward.

Dave closes his eyes, even when PM tugs on his sleeve insistently, and senses what time it is. How far did he bring them?

Three hours. It's three thirty in the morning of the same day he left, and he's never felt more relieved in his life. The last thing he needs is one day slip, either backwards or forwards, lose control, and then end up years displaced from his present. He isn't sure how that just happened, but then, he doesn't know fuck all about time travel anyway, and he's been doing it for months.

Sitting up, still riding the last nauseous twist of his stomach, Dave signs at PM wearily, ignoring the bird kid's continued muttered on his other side. 'There could still be some Crew hanging around, but I think we're in the clear. Let's get the hell out of here with the bird kid.'

PM gives him a strange look, but relays the message, leaving out 'bird kid.' Like the guy hasn't heard weirder in however long he's had wings - maybe even a lifetime of it.

PM: Your help was appreciated Knight - Dave. Yes, let's get out of here. I don't like this place. It is not fun anymore.

He's not even going to ask. Nope.

"We're going outside?" Feathers dithers for a minute when Dave raises an affirmative eyebrow because duh, and then he limps his way back into the theater they just left. Dave has enough time to exchange a confused look with PM, who just shrugs her thin shoulders, before the bird guy hobbles out again. His right wing is still dragging, but now he's got one of those tarps from earlier draped over the wings, mostly hiding them. The left one is almost completely tucked in and hidden, but the right end feathers are visible. The guy shrugs. "Best I can do. Don't really want to wander around in public like this," he mutters, his shoulders hunched and his wings following suit, all crowded up around his ears. The image is bizarre, but Dave doesn't really want to walk around town with a really eye-grabbing orange bird guy anyway. He shrugs and leads the way down the hallway, PM trotting at his side with her frenzied energy and Creamsicle lurching almost in step with him.

They get out of the theater with no further trouble. The boards on the front door that Dave had to duck through to sneak in have been torn away, as though the Crew left in a hurry and didn't want to dick around with crawling out one at a time. Dave cracks his neck as he looks around, but the streets are relatively deserted. If anyone stuck around to watch for them, he can't sense them.

PM and the orange kid follow, and Feathers sighs openly, tilting his head to bask in the tepid Houston morning air. "Thanks," he says shortly, like it has to be dragged out of his throat, and Dave knows the feeling. He could have done without the gratitude anyway. Well, who knows how long he's been stuck in that theater, anyway - since New York happened, maybe, which would suck. Dave isn't judging. The bird guy's holding up pretty well, considering he just endured actual imprisonment by a criminal outfit. Hasn't even started crying or anything shitty at all. Kudos, man.

Oh, right. He should probably get the guy's name. Figure out where he lives and get him to a bird hospital or something. He signs, 'Yeah, yeah. What's your name anyway? I can't keep calling you bird guy in my head.'

Dave doesn't mention the other nicknames. No one need ever know about that one time he christened a guy Creamsicle.

No one.

PM stops mid translation, then closes her fists, widening her eyes at Dave intently. Dave raises an eyebrow, and she just looks more perplexed. She restarts, not even finishing his question for him.

PM: Dave, you...you don't know who this is?

Feathers starts, and then renews his baffled, disbeliefing stare at Dave, who is really starting to feel out of the loop. "Wait, what. You're kidding, right? You seriously can't look at my face and realize something is fucking wrong? I'm not familiar at all?"

Dave's insides do something unacceptable. He shakes his head, feeling uneasy all over. "You're a fucking bird, it's kind of distracting. Should I know you?"

Great, now both PM and Feathers are looking at him like he's the one who's completely insane. PM translates in fits, her movements getting more and more wild as she goes along, like she can't believe the stupidity coming out of Dave's hands. Seriously, what the actual fuck?

"You can't possibly be this dense!" the bird guy bursts out, his brows furrowed with frustration. He finally flings an arm up in the air exasperatedly, the other one still holding the tarp up. "My name is Dave, you douchebag! We're both named Dave, I heard the lady here say it herself! Do you seriously not see it, yet?!"

To be fair, Dave didn't see it before. At all. Maybe it was the feathers; maybe it was just Dave's own finely honed ability to intensely deny reality in favor of irony. But this time he looks, he really looks, at the bird kid's face. It's not the face he sees in the mirror, but it's his face, dyed orange and studded with feathers, his hair laced with 'em, even his body in baggy clothes with holes ripped down the back so the extra wings can stick through.

That's when Dave gets it. The sensation in his stomach is, he thinks, a little like the one he got that day his future self pushed him out a window to make him time travel; sick and hollow and lurching.

'...Well, welcome to the motherfuckin' club,' Dave signs for PM to translate; she flushes and complies with a censored version that still gets the point across. 'Membership used to be a lot more exclusive but hey man, the world works in mysterious ways, right?'

First Rose is his sister, now he has a bird twin, also named Dave. Fucking hell, new Striders are just popping up like daisies. He just - how is this even a thing?

Bird-Dave tugs at his feathery hair, his face a strange mask of emotion that Dave's totally thrown by. This guy isn't wearing shades, and he's not trying to hide his emotions very well either, and the resulting disconnect is almost as unnerving as the fact that he's basically looking at himself. How the hell did he not notice this before?! He's seen other-Daves all the time, so why did this one not compute? "That's it? That's really all you have to say?" he demands. "I mean, fuck, I'm freaking out here - there's a non-mutant-freak version of me and I'm flipping my shit, but all you have to say is 'hey'?!"

Hey. This is the kind of contest Dave can win, the kind Bro has been training him for all his life. While on the inside the exact same kind of freak out is brewing, outwardly he has control, and he just shrugs with a stoic expression. 'Cool? What do you want me to say, man? I'd rather we just went home so we can stop worrying about the Midnight Crew catching up. You need to calm your bird-tits.'

PM censors him again with a scolding look, and adds her own commentary.

PM: I would much prefer you two wait to discuss this later, too. Dave - the Knight is clearly as much of a fool as I suspected! I have many ME S A G E S to send on the results of my not-mission, and I do not trust you not to spy on me. Go to the Knight's base or so help me I will drag you there myself!

She jabs a bony claw at Dave's chest, hard enough to startle him. He rubs the spot and watches the carapacian trot off, yanking her hood wrappings up as she goes. Doesn't look like she's giving any sign of coming back, either. Well, she's a trooper; being broken out of jail barely seems to have fazed her sassy attitude. Dave tilts his head back and stares up at the lightening sky, wondering just what the fuck to do now. Is he seriously taking bird-him home? He doesn't know what to think of all this, can't even process it.

But he nearly sick with curiosity, and when he chances a sidelong glance at the other Dave, he can see the same curious yearning written much more plainly on the guy's face. Jeez, he should stop and get the guy a pair of shades; this kind of emotion is like walking around fucking naked for a proper Strider.

And yeah, this guy is a Strider already, in Dave's head, so that resolves that question really. Rule two of being Striders - don't ever leave a brother behind. Unless he's being a bratty little fuck, but Dave is pretty sure that's just Bro being facetious.

With PM gone, he doesn't really have a way to communicate 'Come on, man, you are officially Striderkin; it is you. Now hurry up so we can get you some cold hard AJ and do something about the fucked up wing' so he just signs it, sighs at the confusion that muddles across bird-Dave's face, and grabs the guy by the arm to start dragging him along in the right direction.

"Hey, fuck - leggo of me, I'm coming, I'm coming," bird-Dave yelps, pulling his arm free. He follows behind Dave, though, clutching the tarp over his wings so he looks like a demented orange turtle with a black shell, and Dave allows himself a small smirk as he turns to face forward and lead the way home. Wow. Does he have a fucking story for Bro, today. He wonders what the Strider protocol is for introducing your bird-hybrid twin maybe-clone person to the family, if there even is one.

...Probably best to just bring Dave 2.0 home and pretend everything is totally normal. That generally seems to work out well. Bro does that all the time, bringing home new and more outlandish puppets and leaving them scattered around the living room until Dave gets used to seeing them. This is basically the same thing, right?

John isn't going to fucking believe this.

For the second time in less than a month, John realizes he's going to have to miss school.
He hates breaking up his routine. Absolutely hates it. He doesn't know if it's the familiarity of the routine - school, homework, hero work, sleep, and school again, like clockwork - that he likes, or if there's actually some mental stability at stake, but he's had basically the same routine ever since he officially started going out on patrol all those years ago, and messing with it in even the smallest ways completely throws him off balance. Becoming friends with Karkat had necessitated a massive change, but at least it had been a change John welcomed; by that point his depression and subsequent breakdown had proven that in some vital way his routine had become unhealthy. Welcoming Karkat into his life was worth the few weeks of discomfort.

This unplanned extension of his patrol hours, on the other hand, sets John's skin crawling. Red and orange light has begun to thread the sky around him, and several times in the past half hour he has accidentally tried to turn in midair and nearly been blinded by the rising sun. These goggles are tinted, after all, so now all of a sudden he has this new problem of trying not to veer east without bracing himself.

He's been patrolling for almost a full ten hours straight, and honestly, he feels fine, aside from that lingering doubt and discomfort as the sky continues to brighten and the clouds clear away. After he and Hemogoblin temporarily split up to occupy their time until Crichton is due to arrive, he'd flung himself into the wind and let it guide him all around the city. Once he thinks about it, he manages to focus on the wind's intent, and use that to center in his teleportation. One moment he hovering near the police station; the next, he finds himself above a mugging in progress. The wind had reached down with Heir and helped him pull the mugging victim to safety before he laid into the mugger himself with some well-timed fists.

The more ways he thinks to use this new skill, the more versatile it is! He starts getting sidetracked, wondering about just how far his range is - he already knows jumping as far as Houston isn't a problem - and then he stops himself before he runs down that tangent and listens to the wind again, waiting for it to press against his back or tug at his wrist in the direction he needs to go.

But he doesn't think about what Hemogoblin said about the teleporting. He doesn't, except he totally can't stop thinking about it, at all. After zip-tying the mugger's hands together, Heir waits, patting the weeping victim on the shoulder awkwardly until the police sirens get closer, and then he's up in the sky again, and he's back in a John mindset. He keeps flip-flopping back and forth between thinking like John and thinking like Heir, and yet neither mindset seems to be able to get on top of this. Because he's totally mystified! Hemogoblin seemed so sure that they'd turned into wind for some reason, but all Heir can remember is blacking out and reappearing in the records room with Officer Ellard.

It just doesn't make sense. Hemogoblin has no reason to lie, especially not about something like that, but on the other hand, why would Hemogoblin be able to sense something about John's powers that John can't? He just manipulates the wind, he doesn't turn into it! And neither Officer Ellard nor his dad mentioned anything like that; he's been practicing with his dad in the basement all week, making sure it's really safe to teleport with someone else, and his dad's observations have always matched John's own. Samuel Egbert didn't feel that sharp pain, no, but he experienced the bounce from point to point as momentary darkness, just like John.

Weeeeeeird. All of this is so weird. It's just a weird night, okay?

And now it's going to be a weird morning. Urrgggh. He's the one who suggested this stupid plan to Hemogoblin, and he doesn't think he can back out at this point. Besides, Hemogoblin is his partner; he can't leave him hanging with this accusation still unresolved, just because the John part of his brain is spazzing out over running out on Karkat for the second time in weeks!
A few minutes before he really needs to get back to the station and meet up with Hemogoblin, Heir makes up his mind. He drops to the ground in a rush of air, faster than he generally would move if he had a passenger to worry about, and then he walks to the nearby payphone. People have begun to dot the sidewalks, and a few cars motor along the road beside the payphone booth as John sheepishly takes out his coin stash - the one he always uses to call in the authorities if a victim or a criminal he's caught don't have a cell phone he can use - and thumbs quarters into the slot until the phone clicks and a dial tone rings in his ear. He shifts his weight back and forth in his boots, suddenly very uncomfortable in his Heir costume. The lighter the sky gets and the more people throw him strange looks, the worse it gets. This is why he works at night, okay? Too many eyes on him. Dave and Rose are crazy for fighting in the daytime.

A woman in a deep blue suit walks by as John leans against the phone booth and enters his home number. His dad must be frantic by now. John is waiting anxiously for the call to go through when he realizes the woman in blue has stopped, backed up, and is now staring at him blatantly from two feet away. Confused, John looks from side to side, but yeah, she's definitely looking at him. Uh. Awkward. He tentatively waves a hand at her, trying and failing to maintain Heir's confident smile, and she jumps, flushing as though embarrassed about being caught staring (she didn't even try to hide it though!) and marches away without another word.

The phone clicks and John jumps back to attention when his father's voice starts. "Egbert residence. This is Samuel."

John winces. Even with the crappy phone connection, he can hear that his dad sounds strained. "Dad, it's me," he replies. His own voice comes out a rasp, and he clears his throat. "I'm still on patrol. Look, something's come up."

"John," Samuel hisses out, and John hears something thump on the other end of the line. "You were due back in four hours ago. Do you know what I thought, when I realized you hadn't just slept in -"

"I know! I know!" John says, closing one hand around the spiraled phone cord. His nails dig through his gloves to his palm, but he can't seem to loosen the grip. His stomach feels tight, like it always does when he's disappointed his dad. "This thing with Hemogoblin needs a few more hours before we've run down all the leads, and then I'll be back. I think I can even make the second half of the school day if I push it."

He really should have called his dad earlier, but he hadn't wanted to worry Samuel with this in the middle of the night. He just knows his dad would have stayed up all night as well if he'd known John was staying out as Heir past his usual hours. There's a fine balance between keeping Samuel Egbert up to speed and not worrying him unnecessarily, John knows, but he just can't seem to find it. Like. Ever. And it's only gotten worse as John gets older.

There's a lengthy pause, then a sigh. "...I don't like this, John. I agree that Hemogoblin needs some assistance with this, but I don't know how I feel about you letting his problems encroach on your life," Samuel says. "I need you to tell me honestly; is this really the only way you can think of to help him? There's no other way to deal with this?"

"We met up with Officer Ellard and now we've got a better idea of how the police started to think Hemogoblin was a suspect." John keeps his voice lower, and faces the phone booth rather than looking up. It would be a real achievement to read his lips through his mask, but he's not taking chances. "There's this really shady guy Crichton, who's been coming in every morning and talking to the deputy chief, and he's been saying some pretty interesting stuff, apparently. The whole case against Hemogoblin mostly hinges on whatever he said to convert the deputy chief; no one else even suspected him before that! Don't worry - me and Hemogoblin are going to talk to him and then we're done. I promise!" He shoots as much optimism into his voice as he can.

"I think you should tell him something's come up," his dad says, quiet and reasonable and ohhh man does John's brain hurt. "You need to balance your work and your daily life, John, you know that, and this isn't going to help you. You don't owe him this much. It sounds as though he could easily question this man by himself, and now that Ellard knows him he can make his own connections in the police department. You're no longer necessary to the process."

"It's not about owing him anything; it's about the fact that he's a new hero and he's freaked out and I can't just leave him to handle this on his own," John argues. The wind runs restlessly in a little whirlwind around the phone booth until he pulls it back under control, twining it around his hands and wrists. He's probably getting even more weird looks now, but he just keeps his head down. Nothing to see here, just a local hero making a phone call home. No biggie. "Besides," he adds, struck by inspiration, "you're assuming Hemogoblin is totally in the clear, but we still have nothing but his words on that, really. Do you really think I should leave him alone with a key suspect?"

Wow, that was some Rose-level logic, there. He's actually impressed by himself.

"I know that, John," Samuel says, and the worst part is how patient and reasonable he sounds. It just makes John feel worse about how stubborn he's being about all this. It must be some kind of parental super power - insta-guilt. Blargh. "But it's just a risk you have to consider taking. The way you're behaving is making me question whether this partnership was a good idea at all. You know how important stability is, and if you're slipping, it's still my duty as a parent, even now, to be your second opinion."

"It's fine. We're fine," John says tightly, and he has to unwind his hand from the phone cord because it's not satisfying enough. He closes the hand around the edge of the metal booth and squeezes, probably hard enough to bend the metal itself. Oh well. It's already pretty beat up, anyway. "Dad, please don't make me break this up. Please."

Shit. Oh man, he can't handle this right now. His eyes are burning, and he's all wound up on the inside.

Because this wouldn't be fair. It wouldn't be fucking fair, and life's not fair but this, at least, would be unnecessary unfairness, and John can't stand it. If his dad does insist on Heir ending his partnership with Hemogoblin, John doesn't know what he'll do. Obey him to the letter? Or maybe, just maybe, fake it? Pretend to end it with Hemogoblin, but continue the partnership without his dad's knowledge or approval? Both options make John feel gross; he would prefer to be up front with his dad, but he also doesn't know that he's capable of giving up the partnership completely.

On the other hand...how much longer will he spend listening to everything his dad says? At what point does he have to start think about setting out on his own, and act as a hero under his own direction, independent and alone?

His mind revolts from the very thought, and he can feel the panic tightening around his lungs like an elastic. Nopenopenope, he's not ready for that. His dad is his dad, and just thinking about not having him around to go to for advice is...unthinkable, really. John shoves it right out of his mind, jettisons it, and the panic eases.

Somewhere along the line, his dad started talking again, and John thinks in his panic that he might have missed some ultimatum. Wiping at his eyes and wincing at the handprint he left on the phone booth, he tunes back in.

"- However, you're old enough to start making your own decisions and judgment calls," John hears, and he nearly collapses against the booth with relief, letting his head and goggles knock forward against the side as he smiles to himself, a gloved fist pressed to his lips.

Still okay.

His dad is still going - he's really on a roll today! "I trust that you're smart enough to know your own mind. All I can do is offer my advice, and ask that you remember - Hemogoblin is your partner. That's all. I know it seems like a significant part of your life right now, but you can't let it consume you. It doesn't mean you can pour all of yourself into this. At the very least, you have to think of Karkat."

"I know. I know that!" John hastens to assure him, his fist pumping absently with victory. "As if I would ever forget Karkat!?" On that note, though… "Oh! I have to call him, too! If he stops by, will you keep him from worrying too much again?"

He hates how much he has to hide from Karkat. Maybe one day, it won't have to be like this, John having his father deceiving his best friend all the time. But it's not today.

His dad heaves another quiet sigh, but there's a hint of pride in his voice again when he speaks. "Of course, John. Be safe. I believe in you, son."

John hangs up first, and starts pushing more quarters into the slot with fingers that are still kind of shaky with tension. He dials Karkat's number and closes his eyes when it rings, trying to recollect himself. Conversations with his dad have been shakier and shakier ever since New York, particularly phone conversations, as though any moment Samuel expects John to go haring off on another random adventure. It's not like that one was his fault! But apparently their trust has been shot, no matter how Samuel tries to frame it, and it makes John feel small on the inside. He keeps doing all he can to meet his dad halfway, but then stuff like this comes up.

Maybe this is a teenager thing. He's almost through with school after all, and aren't teenagers supposed to be rebellious and all that? John would never do stupid things like partying and drugs and stuff - his dad made it very clear that that kind of behavior is ill-befitting a hero, and John definitely agrees wholeheartedly on that point - but when it comes to Hemogoblin there's a new gap between John and his dad, and he doesn't see how he can fix it when he doesn't think he's wrong.

John frowns, because he's had far too much time to ruminate on this stupid, unsolvable problem. Karkat should have answered by now, or at least Crabdad should have. The phone clicks and his heart thumps, but then the infuriated, near-sobbing tones of Karkat screeching out the answering machine blurb over Crabdad in the background starts up. John actually pulls the phone away from his ear, stares at it, baffled, and then hangs up. He tries dialing again, with the same result.

...That's really weird, actually. Crabdad likes kicking Karkat out early on school days, but generally he should still be at home around this time. John dumps out the last of his coin supply, knowing he's going to have to get change from the bank or something to replenish his stock, and tries Karkat's cell number. Maybe Crabdad was just really finicky today?

Karkat has never set up an answering machine greeting for his cell, so it's just the generic voicemail greeting, with a muffled, growly, 'Karkat Vantas' when it pauses for his name. John, stunned, leaves a quick message saying he might be out sick for the first half of the school day, and then hangs up. It could be that Karkat is driving to school and being his usual stubborn self about not texting and driving (Karkat is nearly manic in his paranoia sometimes about literally everything on the planet), but something just seems...off.

Nah, John's just being dumb. Karkat would be more likely to answer a text even at the best of times, but John doesn't carry his cell to work. His friend's probably just driving to school. It sucks that John couldn't talk to him in person - Karkat has been really easy to freak out lately, and with that crappy message Karkat might panic and go around to demand answers from Samuel Egbert again. But it's too late to fix it now; his dad will know how to sidetrack the troll, and then John will get home when this whole Hemogoblin mess is fixed and shoosh the angry dumbass himself.

...Wow, he's really getting infected with this moirail thing, isn't he. Not that Karkat doesn't still make his heart do funny things - it's just getting all mixed in with the cuddling and the shooshpapping and bluhhhhhhh.

Love is hard. Especially when you've got to deal with all the troll love things, too, and all of it feels the same to your dumb human brain hormones. No wonder Rose just laughs at John when he complains to her about feeleeelings.

Hanging up one last time, John shrugs and tries to think himself back into being Heir before he ducks into the alley and takes off. Flying in daylight - urgh. Everyone and their cataract-ridden grandmother is going to be able to see him in the sky; his suit is designed to blend in with the night sky, not broad daylight on a clear day. There aren't even many clouds for him to take cover in; it's a disgustingly nice day.

Heir steps away from the phone booth and realizes someone else is staring at him. Blinking, he looks to the side, but no one is there. The breathing he can sense is -

Oh. He looks down and to the left, and sees the seven-year-old kid gazing up at him. She's clutching at her father's hand as they wait for the intersection light to change, and she looks half asleep; it's way too early for a little kid to be awake! But when he smiles at her and waves a little, sheepish, her eyes go wide and her mouth makes an 'oh' of shock. She tugs on the sleeve of the hand she's holding without looking away, in total awe. "Daddyyyy!" she says in a little kid whisper, which is nearly a shout for normal people, "Daddy, it's Heir! I told you it was him!"

"It's just someone in costume, sweetie," the man says absently, not even looking up from his Blackberry. "Remember what we said about strangers, alright?"

"But Daaaad!"

"Hush, sweetie." The man clicks off his phone, throws Heir a look that is one part apologetic and two parts condescending, as though judging Heir for being in what he thinks is a cosplay outfit, apparently. "Sorry about her. She gets so excited about these heroes and comics and things. It's a little early for her."

"Oh - uh, n-no problem," Heir replies, stuttering a little as he tries to swallow laughter. This guy has noooo idea. When the man answers a phone call, Heir hesitates, then makes a snap decision. The little girl looks dejected and disappointed, her lower lip pouting out, so Heir crooks a pinkie finger. Reeeeeeally discreetly. A light breeze fluffs up her mop of curls and she perks up instantly, staring at him with her mouth agape. Heir puts a finger to his lips, hushing her, and then winks and takes off right then and there. He doesn't bother getting under cover; he just floats right off the ground and waves at the girl one last time.

The look on her face is priceless. She waves back with furious abandon, eyes shining.

Other people no doubt noticed Heir's impromptu take off, but he tries to put that out of his mind as he flies upward, not daring to look down again.

The wind up above the buildings is even friskier than usual. He hasn't flown regularly in the daytime since he was what, five years old? Long enough ago that he only really remembers it because his dad has so many horror stories about what a little shit John was about staying on the ground in public. Now, of course, Heir can't even imagine floating without at least two layers of costume and a mask on to conceal himself; it's unthinkable. Feeling more like a target than he has in ages, Heir heads back to the police station.

He doesn't teleport there. No need to give Hemogoblin a reminder of whatever scared him so much during that strange, blank period that Heir can never recall.

Heir and Hemogoblin are making out by the police station when dawn rolls around.

Sorry, excuse me, no, that's stalking out. They're staking out the police station by the time dawn rolls around.

Hemogoblin loiters on the roof of the building opposite where they'd agreed to meet, so Heir spots him from a ways away. The sun is almost completely visible on the horizon, casting long shadows that Hemogoblin takes advantage of, despite the fact that the roof is high enough that few people could look down and see him from here. Heir is, obviously, the exception. When Heir lands soundlessly, opening his mouth to say hello, however, he sees that Hemogoblin is propped up against the wall with less than his usual seductive swagger, his upper body kind of crunched over with his chin slumped against his chest. It looks like his forward-curving horns might even be weighing his head down, and his eyes are flickering behind his thin grey eyelids, eyelashes fluttering in time with REM movement.

...Did he fall asleep standing up?

For that matter, if he is asleep, is Heir really willing to wake him up? He's gotten some practice with sleep-deprived trolls thanks to experiencing Karkat's on-and-off insomnia secondhand. Waking up a sleeping troll, especially one that isn't immersed in sopor, is pretty much at the top of John's newly revised 'Stupid Idea' list.

On the other hand, he needs Hemogoblin to identify if this Crichton guy is their man or not. Ellard had been able to give them no more than a license plate number and car make to watch out for; counter-terrorism is apparently leery about posting photographs, even in the police database, because Ellard has never even been able to find the guy's profile or employment records. All of that smells really fishy to Heir, and he'd asked Ellard to look into whether any other members of the CTU were similarly blacked out. For all they know right now, Crichton might not be a member of the Seattle PD at all, but an imposter posing as counter-terrorism, sequestering himself with the deputy chief so no one from the real CTU notices he's running around impersonating one of them. For some reason, no one has thought to question him, but why would they? The force is more focused on identifying and recapturing Hearts Boxcars, not suspecting their own members. And from what Heir knows now, the Crew would certainly have the connections necessary to pull that kind of scam off.

Heir can grab the guy for a chat himself just by knowing the car, but Hemogoblin's the one who'll have to confirm if he's the false lawyer who delivered the bomb materials, and thus connected to the Crew. So maybe Heir can afford to let the other hero doze for a bit. He looks like he badly needs the sleep.

Before Heir can do much about it, Hemogoblin jerks awake himself, his feet twisting so he trips over sideways when he startles and finds himself at a bad angle. The other hero catches himself of course, and regains some of his usual grace, but when he looks up and sees Heir watching, his cheeks flush a bright red. "You didn't see anything," the troll says, straightening up and coughing slightly as he adjusts his gloves, fixing the fabric where it had twisted in mid-nap to hide his wrists.

This close up, Heir doesn't bother hiding his curiosity; he tries to see where the sickles might pop out. There doesn't look like there are marks from having blood emerge as weapons all the time on the troll's dusty grey wrists, but Hemogoblin does have a presumably impressive healing factor. Particularly if he got through a bomb without a mark on him - that Heir can see, at least.

Speaking of. "Nothing," he agrees, though a smile tugs on the corner of his lips. "You're really okay, right?"

Hemogoblin just huffs and looks affronted. "I'm fucking fine. I'm not going to lose it again, if that's what you're asking about -"

"Ah, no, no!" Heir backpedals, shaking his head. "I meant - the bomb thing. You said you were okay the first time I asked, but then they found blood everywhere. So I just...you're not trying to hide something serious, are you? Because you look exhausted, and it's not good to sit on that kind of thing when it could hurt your fighting abilities."

Hemogoblin's eyes are lot less startlingly red in the sunlight, when troll eye luminescence always fades a bit, but they're still sharp and cutting as Hemogoblin starts to regain his poise, eyeing Heir sideways. "I told you, it was nothing I couldn't handle," he drawls, striding to the edge of the roof as though to remove himself from the temptation of the wall. "Some shrapnel got me in the side. I only rushed the patch up because Boxcars was getting away; otherwise, there wouldn't have been nearly as much blood left behind." Heir spies the edge of a grimace twisting the troll's face. "I fucked up. I admit it. But as soon as this fuckery is sorted out, I'll be just peachy."

"If you need to rest more, I can keep watch a while longer. We have a few minutes," Heir suggests, tentative. He's not an expert on moirail boundaries by any means, and from the sharp look Hemogoblin throws him that advice might have edged the line. Again. Agh. He doesn't mean to do it, okay, but being around Karkat all the time has him stuck in soothing mode when it comes to angry, tired trolls, apparently. How is he supposed to have actual crushes if his totally platonic concern keeps getting misinterpreted?! It's not always pale to worry about people's well-being - especially not when it's his possibly injured, sleep-deprived hero partner!

"Trust me, Heir. Sleeping would only make the problem worse," Hemogoblin mumbles. His expression is totally flat, maybe even afraid. "I shouldn't even have been slacking off there. I don't have the best dreams."

"Oh? Yeah. I'm sorry," he says automatically. Seems like everyone has sucky dreams lately; he's glad that's not a problem he has!

He's not looking down, either, he's totally not, because that would be unprof- okay he's looking down.

Dat ass.

Shit. Hemogoblin must have self-confidence like whoa, because in the morning light it's astonishing how formfitting that uniform is. Like, Heir is self-conscious about his costume right now, and his getup is wayyyyy looser than what Hemogoblin's rocking. And the troll doesn't even seem to notice it as he leans to peer down at the parking lot the police have requisitioned below.

There is something weird enough to draw Heir's attention away from other matters, though, and he can't help but frown at the troll's horns. Maybe it's just less noticeable in the dark, but from here at least the horn on the left looks...off balance. The crimson red, so unusual compared to the usual candy corn yellows and oranges of troll horns, is duller in this lighting, and Heir is reminded, fiercely, that most troll heroes he knows of, even in comics, obscure their real horns. There's just too much risk that they'll be a unique enough set to give away their identities. He's never really given it much thought, but Hemogoblin's horns are probably a false set, too. The real ones are either similar in shape or thinner, or such a dramatic forward curve wouldn't work.

He's so engrossed in not doing his job that he almost misses it when Hemogoblin stiffens up and says, tersely, "License plate is 4CU-DR00, right?"

Allllright. Focus time. Heir drifts closer to the roof's edge and joins Hemogoblin in surveying the lot. The Dodge Charger is a discreet black, but that means nothing, even as its driver guides it smoothly into a free parking space. John is secretly impressed; he has his license, nominally, but he's never really going to need a car in his life, so he hasn't exactly practiced since he was...gosh, fifteen? He can tease Karkat about being a paranoid old grandma driver all the time, but he'd probably crash anything he tried to drive faster than thirty miles an hour, at this point!

After a moment, the driver emerges. He's is a darkish suit, but if Heir squints he thinks it almost looks navy blue - not the distinct, straight up black of most Midnight Crew suits. Of course, an undercover agent wouldn't wear the gang's dumb dress code while wandering around a police station. It's going to come down to Hemogoblin's call. The man has his head down for the most part as he strides to the back of the car and pops the trunk, and Heir catches the faint noise of frustration Hemogoblin makes as he cranes his neck trying to get a look at his face.

"Not the same car as that night, but I doubt he'd keep it anyway, if it is him," Hemogoblin mutters, and wow, he's really close. Like right next to Heir, which is okay probably Heir's doing, mostly. Ahahaha.

"No, he probably ditched the original vehicle the same night," Heir agrees, staring intently at the back of the man's head as he continues to dig through the trunk of his car. It looks like Crichton is talking on the phone at the same time. Inwardly, Heir starts to think himself into that mental space where his powers are, and to delve into that pain where the teleportation starts. It hurts to hold it like this, but he bites his lip and sucks it up. "Should I -"

"Hang on," Hemogoblin interrupts, holding up a claw. The other claw tenses on the edge of the roof, scraping at the stone through his thin gloves as he leans forward further still. "If it is the lawyer, trust me, you don't want to jump down there underestimating this guy -"

Crichton turns, slamming the trunk door shut. Hemogoblin stills, then snarls with blooming fury. "That fucker."

That's all Heir needs to hear.

"I've got him. Be ready," Heir warns, and he shoves all of his focus into zeroing in on Crichton below until, with an agonizing tear, he goes.

They'll need Hemogoblin to take a better look up on the roof, but that was enough of a confirmation that Heir shifts gears mentally. He's not dealing with a potentially shady counter-terrorism agent with criminal leanings; he's up against a Crew member, someone with at least the borrowed authority to order Hearts Boxcars out of the city. Not someone to goof off against.

By some miracle, Heir blacks out and reappears behind Crichton's back. The element of surprise doesn't do much, unfortunately; Crichton whips around immediately, jumping as though stung, and grimaces at Heir. "Should have known," he says mournfully, and he whips a hand at Heir.
Almost too late, Heir realizes the man threw something with uncanny precision. He hadn't even seen the guy draw his knifekind, and the blade nearly slices through Heir's right shoulder before the wind reacts, wrapping around the weapon and halting it with the tip just barely pricking the skin of his shoulder. Heir lets out all his breath in a whoosh, his heart missing a few beats at the scare. This guy is good.

He's also trying to run. Instead of pressing that advantage, Crichton turns on a dime and races away. His run is all precision, with no wasted movement, but that doesn't exactly help him. Aware that he's fighting a nominal police officer right in front of the goddamn station, Heir ducks down before shoving both hands forward and then tugging them in as fists.

In response, the winds around him lash out, kicking up trash and debris from under the bumpers of the cars around them, and then slam around and into Crichton's shins. The lawyer falls - and somehow flips it into a summersault, rolling neatly back onto his feet with barely a misstep.

…Wow! That was actually really cool! Like, dude!

Wait, he's still getting away. Right. Heir shakes off the delighted admiration and shrugs, rising to his feet. He nudge the wind and just grabs the man bodily off the ground, tossing him up in the air with far less consideration than Heir usually shows when he lifts Hemogoblin, per say.

Crichton's legs stop kicking, and he tries to twist in the wind to face Heir. There's a glint of metal in one hand, and Heir frowns and jerks his hand, twisting the second knife out of Crichton's grip by slamming into his hand with all the force he can muster with a breeze. Heir just waits patiently while Crichton snarls, floating himself off the ground and flying them up to the roof. He'd wanted to teleport them up more discreetly, but that would involve touching Crichton directly, and he'd rather not get all up close and personal with the knife-happy guy with really fucking good reflexes; he could have more knife specibi in places Heir can't see from here. No way he's risking it. Instead, hoping no one sees them and reports them to the cops across the street, he takes the long way up.

Hemogoblin is pacing back and forth along the edge of the roof when Heir arrives with his suspect. Heir is forced to keep his eyes on the captive man though, still wary of more knives, instead of looking to see if Hemogoblin is still holding up alright.

"They always try to run," Heir sighs loudly, dumping Crichton on the rooftop a little ways from Hemogoblin and pressing down with the air so the man can't just stand up and start running again. Crichton squirms until he's sitting upright, but that's as far as Heir lets him go. It's harder to make the wind stay still than it is to use it in motion, but Heir clamps down as best he can so the breezes hold the man's arms where he can see them. "Anyway. This is definitely our guy?"

"Yeah, it is," Hemogoblin says, folding his arms and sauntering over. He glowers down at the lawyer-turned-counter terrorism agent. "Long time, no see, you total dick. Thanks a lot for setting half the cops in Seattle on me. Except fuck you. Fuck. You."

"Yeah, it is," Hemogoblin says, folding his arms and sauntering over. He glowers down at the lawyer-turned-counter terrorism agent. "Long time, no see, you total dick. Thanks a lot for setting half the cops in Seattle on me. Except fuck you. Fuck. You."

"I'll go a lot easier if you just tell the truth," Heir adds, biting back a comment about Hemogoblin's language. It's kind of unprofessional, but hey, they're pretty much off the books here anyway, and the troll's having a sucky day. He's let the language slide so far, and it's not like he can enforce his personal philosophy about swearing on the job for someone totally different. "For example - are you the same lawyer who broke Hearts Boxcars out of police custody?"

Crichton flips his hair back out of his face with a toss of his head, his eyes half-lidde as he looks up at both heroes. Heir can practically see the calculations going on in the man's head, and he represses a shiver. This guy is way smarter than the Crew goons who had been doing all of Hearts's dirty work two weeks ago, he can already tell. He and his dad had been wondering how such brute force-favoring thugs had spread their criminal enterprise across the country with such finesse - clearly, though, there's more to the Crew than just arsonists and gunmen.

"Alright, boys," the man drawls at last, cracking his neck lazily. "Guilty as charged. Anything else I can help you with?"

Heir flinches. Wait, what? That was...way too easy! What the heck?! "Hang on, did you just confess?" he asks, baffled.

"Seriously, what the actual fuck?" Hemogoblin demands, circling around Crichton's back. His eyes reflect more of the rising sun as he does, and the light on his face throws his features into high contrast. "What's the point of this whole nookstain of a fiasco if you just confess like that?"

Crichton rolls his eyes, and it grates on Heir's nerves to see the man so lackadaisical about this questioning. This guy has fooled all of Seattle PD and the deputy chief into believing he's law enforcement; that kind of acting is impressive, and the amount of effort he'd have to put into this astounding. Why would he simply give it all up when Heir hadn't even, like, pretended to intimidate him or something? "I have my orders. My assignment was only to get the rumor started and perpetuate it until caught."

"An assignment?" Hemogoblin kneads at his eyes, and when he recovers he practically spits on the next part. "And you're just...done?! That's it, that's really all the effort you're willing to put into it?!"

Crichton stares at Hemogoblin witheringly, raising a thin plucked eyebrow. "So sorry to disappoint you, but you're really not all that interesting. Getting the deputy chief to buy that sad little story with hardly any evidence? Too easy. Bit of a waste of my talents. Maybe now I can get my exit clause fulfilled..."

Hemogoblin starts laughing and oh no, that's hysteria. That is definitely hysterical laughter, shaking Hemogoblin so much Heir can see the trembling from here.

Crichton barely looks miffed. "You can laugh all you want, you mewling fool. When my Lady Droog arrives, you won't laugh for long. She will tear you limb from limb." He smiles off-handedly.

It takes Heir a second to realize - what the heck did that last sentence say? "Tear us - okay, back up, when did this become the plan?" Heir demands, stepping closer to the man. A separate skein of wind is twining around Heir's body the more nervous he becomes, and he welcomes it because what the heck?! That escalated like whoa. "I mean it. No funny business, or I just knock you unconscious and dump you in the middle of the station myself."

"Droog," Hemogoblin says, and Heir looks up. The troll's expression hardens with recognition a moment later. "Ah. The one who sent you to break Hearts Boxcars out, too. I remember you mentioned a Droog. Who the hell is she?"

And oh, oh dear. The grin that cracks across Crichton's face is legitimately terrifying, because Heir has seen it only a few times before. It's the cheshire grin of a fanatic, the glazed devotion of a zealot, something he's seen only in comic books, splitting the faces of archetypal madmen like the Joker or Subjuggulator. It burns into his mind; he hadn't even thought a human or troll face could physically recreate that kind of expression, had thought it something forever the result of artistic license.

He hates that he was wrong.
"Lady Droog," Crichton whispers faithfully, "is the Diamond. She is perfection."

Fuck. "...You mean the Diamond suit, don't you?" Heir says grimly. "There's Hearts for the heart suit, and now you're talking about someone named Diamond."

Crichton lurches forward, moving through the wind before Heir has time to readjust and push him back, and Hemogoblin jumps out of range. Blood arcs out of his wrists and becomes sickles in a little under two seconds. But Crichton has no eyes for the troll - he reaches for Heir. Heir yells in surprise and closes a fist. The air whips back and slams the man down, though he continues to struggle. A quiet, cold fury crinkles around his wide eyes, his mouth parted as he pants slightly. "You do not have the right to speak my Lady's name," he hisses, writhing. "Let alone to blaspheme by saying it wrong. She is our Lady of Diamonds and you will show respect."

Okay, wow, so - that was new. Heir nods slowly, hands still outstretched to manipulate the wind again if necessary. He's sure he looks just as freaked out as he feels, and when he exchanges a glance with Hemogoblin he sees the same kind of mix of realization and horror on the troll's face. The sickles retract, but they're both on their guard, now.

This isn't like the blind obedience Hearts Boxcars's lackeys demonstrated, as muscle hired to carry out grunt work. This is...the kind of fanaticism you'd expect out of a cultist or something. That, combined with the intelligence Heir saw in Crichton's eyes, is flat out terrifying. This is the kind of man willing to live or die by Diamonds Droog's whim.

No wonder experts described the Midnight Crew as having near cultish loyalty. Heir is seriously starting to wonder if maybe, at least for parts of the Crew, that may well be the case. He'd been furious when the Puppeteer suggested he flee Seattle from the Midnight Crew. Now, he's starting to wonder if the elder Strider brother might not have had a point. These guys are totally fried in the thinkpan!

"Diamonds Droog," Hemogoblin repeats, and Heir brings himself back to the present. Hemogoblin sounds like he's tasting the word on his tongue. "And she's the one who gave you the orders to frame me as a suspect?"

"She did," Crichton confirms with a sigh, his eyes flipping from righteous, religious fury to that distant adoration once more, so quickly Heir feels queasy with the implications. "But now that you know about me, my part is at an end. And she will come for me."

"But what was the point?!" Hemogoblin's voice cracks. Heir twitches, and the urge to hug the troll is back in full force. Hemogoblin just looks confused, all his usual bravado and confidence wiped out as he stares hopelessly in the face of Crichton's devotion. "Why all the effort - why me?!"

"The point is whatever my Lady wishes it to be. I did not ask, and she did not feel I needed to know," Crichton replies primly. "You can do whatever you wish to me. I'll even confess to the police themselves, if you think that will help." Crichton sighs and relaxes, nearly slipping loose from Heir's wind chamber again. But he doesn't draw blades, doesn't even try to run away or lurch at one of the two heroes again. He just...gets comfortable. "Lady Droog will be here soon. She will come for me."

"You're going to prison for this," Heir says, but the words feel hollow in the face of Crichton's faith. And when have any of the Crew stayed in jail, anyway? All these shenanigans are really setting a bad precedent for the police department's ability to be trusted with these guys... "Do you not care?"

"Soon you will know the wrath of our Lady. That's all the comfort I need." Crichton closes his eyes, and smiles faintly again. "No one can withstand the Lady Droog."
Hemogoblin sums up pretty much exactly what Heir is feeling, shaking his head. "Fan-fucking-tastic."

Hemogoblin gives him a weird, calculating look when Heir teleports back above the roof. Heir steadfastly ignores it. "Ellard has him, and I trust him to keep Crichton in custody long enough to get a confession on tape," he reports, rolling his shoulders. "Even if the Midnight Crew has legal connections, I doubt he'll make bail after admitting to conspiring to blow up a police station in front of a room full of police officers."

Hemogoblin saggs visibly. "Then I'm in the clear."

"Yup, basically. I don't know that they'll make an official announcement at a press conference, but that's because the deputy chief is going to be embarrassed enough by this fiasco as it is, and he's going to be a butt about it." Heir shrugs, then yawns widely. His jaw cracks a little, and he grins sheepishly at Hemogoblin. "Time to call it a day?"

The troll nods back, his smile shakier and more contemplative than teasing. Now that the action is over with, he looks utterly worn down again, "Mind giving me a lift?" he asks. He's favoring one side, leaning with an arm pressed with what he probably thinks is subtlety against his side.

But Heir doesn't comment. He wants to ask, but it's just not worth risking provoking Hemogoblin again. "No problem." The winds respond sluggishly, picking up on his own tiredness, but they lift both he and Hemogoblin readily enough, and they sail across the sky with the usual speed Heir uses for when he has passengers.

He's still a little worried about the troll as he sets the other hero down in his usual area of the city, and he watches as Hemogoblin darts away to wherever he goes to conceal his trail back to his home after work. It'll be more difficult to be discreet in broad daylight, but Heir knows Hemogoblin will be fine. Hopefully.

Besides, maybe now that this crisis has been resolved, Hemogoblin will be able to relax and recover. His reputation took a blow, no doubt, but with the real person responsible in custody and confessing all over the place, at least the cops won't be actively trying to arrest him or anything else that could have happened if the issue had persisted. This was a win, in Heir's book! And now all that Heir can do, he thinks, is go home. The sun is well in the sky now, and the reds and pinks and oranges of the sunrise have refracted into a vibrant blue. It's a beautiful day out.

Heir just feels tired, though. Getting through the second half of the school day after being awake for a full twenty-four hours is going to be awful.

And now he has something new to report to his dad and his hero friends - he's going to need every one of his contacts on the line.

He's determined not to be blindsided again. He's going to find out all he can about this Diamonds Droog.

He's going to be ready.

They end up rerouting (agaaaaain!) to Salem, Oregon in the never ending saga that is trying to dodge the Crew. Is it really so much to ask that we get to move in a straight line? Jade thinks grumpily, slurping on her soda with such force that she nearly snorts up carbonation when WV tugs on the hem of her coat and squeaks a warning. The carapacian has ranch dressing smeared all over his face from trying to eat onion rings, and before Jade does anything else she unfolds a paper napkin and dabs at the ranch. WV squirms in protest, and flails until the napkin gets knocked out of her hand. Sighing, Jade jabs a finger sideways without even bothering to look up from her crispy crunch chicken sandwich. With her sense of space, she already knows about the dumb butt Midnight Crew members who are trying to sneak up on her.

Well, let's be honest. They're not sneaky at all. They walked in through the front door, and two of them walked right over to her, while the third walked over to the counter and began...placing an order?

Sighing, the one in front rubs the back of her head and shrugs. "Are you willing to come with us, now?"

"No!" Jade glares, then raises an eyebrow. Over the past week or so she's come to recognize the main three lackeys who hang around Clubs Deuce, at least in terms of their faces, and so these guys are pretty much familiar by now. But Clubs himself is missing. "Huh? Where's Clubs?"

"He got called back to base," the woman says gloomily. "And with him went our entire budget."

And your motivation, Jade thinks. The troll in the back has unbuttoned the top of his suit and begun to fan himself with a clawful of paper napkins, looking supremely unconcerned as he stares out the window at the passersby. "Why didn't you go with him?"

"Clubs has a policy that the mission isn't over until it's over, even when the Boss says that the mission is...over. So he has us here to keep tabs on you until he gets back." She shakes her head, hungrily eyeing the onion rings WV hasn't finished until Jade nudges the basket away from the edge of the table with a jolt of green power. There's no point in trying to hide the spacy thing anymore; they caught up again. Apparently, having the uncanny ability to track down Jade when she's trying to get some peace in quiet is a talent Clubs passed down to his minions. And like heck is she letting them yoink some of their onion rings!

"If you're so tired of chasing me, just go!" Jade has absolutely zero sympathy for these guys anymore, jeez! "Seriously, nothing is stopping you, and I'm like two seconds from zapping you to New Mexico, anyway."

The Crew woman actually perks up, and then just as quickly sags. "No," she drones, pulling a pair of handcuffs out of her back pocket. "We have a job to do, and we'll do it. Mister Clubs will get in trouble if we take off out of the blue. So. Please put your hands out?"

"That's never going to work, Lila," the female troll behind her mutters.

"Absolutely not," Jade informs this Lila, sniffing and picking up her sandwich again. Maybe, just maybe, without Clubs to incentivize them with his impossible, jovial persistence, these guys really will just give up and go home.

The troll snarls and yanks a gun out of the inner pocket of her suit jacket, leveling it at Jade.

Uh, wow. That was actually somewhat unexpected! Under the table, Jade feels Bec perk up its ears, the soft white fur rubbing up against her shin. The gun looks a little bulky, sure, and she tenses, because anything that makes Bec pay attention is worth being a little worried about.

"I am sick of this hogwash," the troll woman continues, her cerulean eyes glinting with more than a little madness. Ceruleans tend to lean that way. "I am a giant robot mechanic, not some - some - child stalking moron! This is not what I signed up for when I joined the Crew. We are ending this charade now or so help me I will shoot everyone in this entire restaurant, including you!"

Jade puts down her sandwich. Hoooo, boy. Looks like she's not the only one that's cranky about this whole massively unnecessary chase sequence. She doubts anybody around this table has gotten much sleep, what with all the sneaking and running and chasing and fighting that's gone on.

But of course, Sharpshooter is always in a butt-kicking mood, especially when a bad guy just threatened to open fire on an entire Chik-fil-a! That is totally on the not-okay list! "If you reeeally want to fight, we are taking this outside," she insists, shaking a finger sternly. "No way am I letting you start shooting people! Watch it, lady!"

The ceruleanblood shrieks. "Why, you obnoxious, snarky little - UGH!" She pulls the trigger.

Sharpshooter feels the energy that builds in the weapon before she realizes what's going on. That's not a bullet, that's a lasing medium Sharpshooter is sensing in the butt of the gun, and the atoms are already in an excited state when the Crew member laughs and a thin beam of light blasts out of the barrel.

"Wh-whoa!" Sharpshooter yelps, teleporting WV and herself outside the Chik-fil-a. She peers in through the window in time to see the light beam hit the back of her now-unoccupied chair. It blasts through before the energy peters out, and the chair swings around with a twitch of Sharpshooter's hand so she can see the small but singed hole that has been burned right through the cushion and the plastic backing. Bec hasn't moved from under the table, from what she can sense, but the one named Lila has both hands on the troll Crew member, yelling something indeterminate as she shakes the troll's shoulders.

Without warning, the gun comes up again and the ceruleanblood snarls, shoving the butt up against Lila's shoulder and pulling the trigger again. Sharpshooter raises a hand uselessly, but the laser charges and fires again, drilling through the other Crew member's shoulder. Lila falls back against the table behind them, blood splattering across some poor random family's food. Screams are erupting throughout the restaurant, and Sharpshooter can already see that the ceruleanblood is whirling, narrowing her eyes and snarling in Sharpshooter's direction through the window.

She just shot her own teammate. Holy crap! Sharpshooter yanks down her goggles, her heart racing a little with renewed interest, because that isn't a pistolkind - that's a goddamn laserkind.

And she wants it. For Science. Also, because no way can she leave that kind of deadly weapon in the hands of a crazed criminal who seems to have gone off the deep end!

"WV, this one is too dangerous! You have to go hide!" Sharpshooter says, locking on to the troll with her senses. The carapacian is still huddling by her leg though, frantically waving his claws about something in that sign language that just doesn't quite translate, and she shakes her head. "I'm sorry, you have to be safe!" Waivering, she teleports the Vi on top of the K-Mart across the parking lot. Only then does she close her fist and mentally picture herself dragging the ceruleanblood through the window with her telekinetic fist of JUSTICE.

Glass flies everywhere as the troll crashes screaming with rage through the window, and Sharpshooter has to let the Crew member drop to the ground and halt the glass before it can impale anyone walking or driving nearby. The other Crew members are moving within the restaurant - Sharpshooter has been tracking their movements through space - but she keeps her focus on the ceruleanblood because if she has one laser, she could well have other tricks up her sleeve!
The troll lands hard, rolling on the pavement, but then gets to her knees, her hair hanging in her face as she waves the laser gun wildly. "Enough of this! We will capture you! And then we can all go back to doing our real jobs!"

"Petran, where did you even get that?!” the male Crew member staggers to the hole punched through the window and yells, the woman who'd been shot sagging against his shoulder. Blood stains the front of her scruffy black suit. "We don't have that kind of budget to spare!"

"It's comin' outta my own salary, dammit!” the female troll snarls, leveling the laser gun at Sharpshooter again and noooope, Sharpshooter is so over that.

Unlike some of Clubs's more unusual weapons, this one does not waver between quantum states, and Sharpshooter can focus on it with ease. She backflips lightly over a car trying to pull into the Chik-fil-a drive thru, stays hovering in midair, and pulls on the ray gun intently with a grunt. Mid-teleport, she twists her hand and adds an extra boost to the laser's trajectory through space. It pops out of existence and presumably reappears within her sylladex, but she'll have to check on it later - she's never captchalogued something that didn't already belong in the sylladex like that before!

"Give that back!” the Crew member says, one eye twitched up more than the other.

"But I have to study it!” Sharpshooter protests, though she's aware that she's a little more Jade in mindset at the moment. "I mean, how did you even get an energy source compact enough to fit in a hand-held specibus?! That's beautiful engineering! I'm a riflekind usually, but this is SOOOO COOOOOOOOL!"

"I am sick of this! First you destroy three of my prototype giant robots, and now you take the laser? Is nothing sacred to you fucking heroes?!

"I reserve the right to confiscate awesome stuff from criminals whenever I want! So there!"

Thankfully, the other two Crew members stagger out together and Lila grabs the female troll's collar with her good hand even as she lunges at Sharpshooter. Not like she could have reached Sharpshooter, anyway; she's floated pretty high up so that any surprise new laser blasts would end up shooting the sky if she teleported out of the way in a hurry. "Calm down, Petran! We have to capture her alive, don't you remember?"

There is blood dripping from the ceruleanblood's nose now, and she is physically shaking so hard Sharpshooter can feel it from here which is - kind of concerning? Really weird? Both? Yeah, both. She didn't mean to give the troll lady a rage nosebleed...just piss her off a little… "Alive is a word with variable definitions!"

"Still debatable."

...Are they seriously going to start arguing like this? Sharpshooter scratches her nose, frowning down at the three as they bicker, the shot woman looking paler and paler by the moment.

After three minutes, it stops being even a little amusing, and just goes right back around to being annoying again. Sharpshooter waves both arms at the group, but they don't even look at her!

What a bunch of weirdoes!
"If our suit member weren't a complete doofus, we wouldn't even be here -"

"All right, that's it!" Sharpshooter yells. She plants her fists on her hips and glares down at the Crew members until they all look up at her. The male looks a little sheepish over having presumably forgotten they were here to fight Sharpshooter at all, and Lila may or may not have passed out at some point, but the ceruleanblood just looks incensed, blue smeared all across her upper lip and chin from the nosebleed.

How rude!

"I am so out of patience!" she continues, green sparks crackling through her hair as it starts to rise up in the waves of distortion pouring off her. "You guys just earned yourself a one-way trip to Area 51!"

"Hospital?" the male says hopefully, jostling the shot woman with a hopeful look on his face. It is only now that Sharpshooter sees he successfully obtained an entire bag of Chik-fil-a at some point between the Crew walking into the restaurant and the troll named Petran going toooootally bonkers. Yeah, these guys definitely deserve Clubs's weirdness. Seriously, they can complain all they want, but they're just as bad!

"...Okay, fine! Hospital! But one that's reeeally close to Area 51!" Sharpshooter amends, locking on to all three Crew members at once, and then she whistles. "Beeec!"

The wolf lands on the ceruleanblood's head with a huff. It's a really awkward landing and of course Bec weighs a ton, so the troll keels over, and the white wolf ends up sitting itself on her chest, panting with its pale green tongue lolling out of its muzzle as it waits for a command.

"Good boy! Best friend!" Sharpshooter laughs, floating down closer to the ground. "A hospital in New Mexico...we walked by a Presbyterian hospital in Albuquerque, right boy? I target, you push!" She closes her eyes, humming a little as she pulls up that instinctive knowledge of the coordinates in space that hospital had been at across the street nearly four days ago. When she reaches out with her power, she feels the raw, electric force of Bec respond in kind, wrapping around all three. Bec shakes itself bodly and stands up, its paws not really touching the ground.

Everything should be going according to plan.

But when Sharpshooter raises a hand and snaps a finger, teleporting the Crew members away with the power of her mind, her entire body bursts into pain and -

It burns it burns it burns -

Jade realizes something has gone wrong when she's abruptly standing in the middle of a jungle. For a moment, she breathes in the heady perfume, the slight undertones of rotting fruit and damp earth, and basks in the fact that there is no pain. Her reaction slightly delayed, she smiles and falls to her knees in the moldering leaves that cover the ground. Everything is a wash of deep greens and for a jolting moment Jade thinks she's gone home.

But home doesn't exist anymore, and the space is all wrong in her head, and when she reaches out, dazed, for WV's hand to reassure herself, she freezes.

WV's not here. Bec isn't either. She's alone, and her entire body sings with the knowledge that she's in Brazil. Not Oregon. Not even close to WV or Bec or John or anyone at all.
And that's - that's -

That's the exact opposite of where she wants to be.

"No." She grips at her hair, tearing at it with clenched fingers. "No, no, no! I am not backtracking. Not. Again!"

She is just so angry, and when the pain comes exploding through her body again she rides it, her mind expanding outward on a wave of fire and pain until she can feel too much. She can feel everything between here and Vancouver, and there's too much motion, too many lives, so many people she has to keep safe. She can't possibly save them all.

That's why I need John. Duh!

Jade doesn't hold much truck with existential crises or sulking. Besides, Grandpa always told her if she couldn't handle something alone, she should always ask for help! And John would totally help her!

"That's why," she whispers, hugging herself, "we're going back to Oregon. Right now right now right now -"

Her body follows her mind, and then she's gone.

It's a lot easier to handle all the sensory input after that. She isn't distracted by all the remembered pain and can focus on where she's trying to go. Bodies are overrated anyway, she thinks, when you can just be space. Why has she never tried this before?!

Both WV and Bec are beacons against the backdrop of the ceaseless flow and sigh of movement along the West coast. There is someone who burns almost as brightly just a little to the north, and Jade knows with more than a little glee that that's John. He's right there, almost in her regular range, and that's awesome.

She gets the feeling, while she's drifting along incorporeally, that she could bounce right to where John is right now. Skip the short trip between Salem and Seattle entirely, and go see him immediately. The Crew certainly won't catch up for a while, not with their budget and their leader both off Jade's case.

...But, nah. She's not gonna backtrack or fiddle around anymore, no, but she needs to pick up WV and Bec, first! Poor WV's been stranded on that roof for who knows how long, now! No way is she leaving her little buddy stuck like that.

In the moments before she pulls herself together, Jade can feel the atoms vibrating around her. People think the empty air is just that - empty - but it's really not. Right now most of her mass is converging above the position in space where she left WV, and as she settles back into the mold of a body she can feel the extra atoms all shivering through her, until she sorts them out and shoving them back out into the air where they belong. They seem weirdly overexcited, though, bouncing around even more than atoms generally do when they're in a gaseous state.

And then, in a rush that nearly yanks Jade along for the ride, all the surrounding air whooshes out, pelting northward like a stream of motion that she extricates herself from before it scatters her entirely. Whirling and dizzy, Jade urges herself back together, and pops back into solid existence a couple of miles about where she intended to land. She yelps when her hair is immediately flung wildly into her face, her coat cracking and whipping about in the breeze. If she didn't have her goggles on still, her eyes would be watering. She's in the middle of some kind of wind tunnel, and when she opens her mouth to complain, she gets a faceful of dust that the air kicked up at some point, and has to hack for a minute before she realizes she could just, you know, float downward out of the crazy wind's path. She does so, combing her fingers through her hair. But it's useless. The coarse brown-black hair has knotted beyond repair, tangled up in huge loops and sticking up with nearly a dozen tiny cowlicks when she runs her hands over the crown of her skull.

Bluhhh! She's gonna need to hope for a miracle, or she might have to actually...trim it. Shuddering, Jade puts such a terrifying thought out of mind and pouts up at the wind stream. It's nearly visible, which is kind of weird. There's not that much dirt in it - in fact, aside from that unfortunate faceful, the wind is relatively clear. She's high enough up that the air is thinner and purer, so she squints at the wind, trying to figure out why it stands out so distinctly, and why it's busily rushing away to the north, rather than following a normal wind current -

Oh. Ohhhhh.

It's John! It must be John doing the windy thing! Jade laughs, startled, and claps her hands together, laughing against her fingers. This wind continues to stream away for another moment before dissipating, but she can still sense the tail end of the breeze as it is drawn steadily northward, the faint vibrations of John's power visible as a blue tinge that stands out even against the clear blue sky, once she knows what she's looking for.

But this is amazing! John is definitely in Seattle, but he's pulling on breezes from as far away as Oregon - maybe even farther. And they respond when he calls, on an atomic level, even! Jade wishes Grandpa had been able to tell her more about how the windy thing works before he died; she can't tell if he's calling wind from this far away on purpose, or if that's just a normal part of his powers, drawing on winds that would best help him with a particular task.

Oh, she and John are running sooooo many experiments when she finds him. He owes her for all these years of being a dumb younger brother who can't even bother to write back!

Jade bubbles down to WV's level in considerably better spirits, and in fact nearly lands upside down when she teleports down to the roof. WV takes advantage of that, of course, in all his tiny, squeaky rage as he bats and flails at her face while it's within his reach. He's clearly mad about getting accidentally left behind, and he hiccups a crackle of green lightning when Jade reaches out and hugs him in apology. "Sorry, Wonder Vi. I still don't know how that happens," she admits, patting him on the head absentely. "This long distance thingy is just so random. At least I figured out how to get back." She keeps patting him as she floats to the edge of the roof and looks over at the street below.

In the maybe ten minutes she spent in Brazil and then drifting along with her atoms scattered throughout space, a fire truck has arrived, as well as several police vehicles, their lights flaring as they huddle around the window Sharpshooter broke.

More than a few of them are setting up strips of yellow police tape in a wide circle around Bec, which is still waiting where she left it on the sidewalk where the Crew members had been sitting. She wonders why he didn't get yanked along to Brazil, too - did the Crew even end up in New Mexico after all that ruckus? - but then shrugs. The ways of Bec are strange and mysterious, even to her. Below, the wolf sniffs the air and vanishes. Jade smiles widely when it reappears by her side, sitting at attention. She sets WV down on the wolf's back, which he protests about, but the last thing she wants to risk is her ending up in China or something all over again if that long distance whammy hits her again. Better the carapacian stay safe with Bec - when Jade gives the wolf construct coordinates, it's basically guaranteed to end up there. When she gives the word, they're off.

Later, she just chalks the entire incident up to being tired and grumpy and having all that pent-up energy from having to walk around everywhere trying to avoid the Crew's sensors.
And she pushes that pain, and the memory of a similar agony back in the old lab in Britain, to the back of her mind.

For now, she likes to think she can pretend to be fine. She is fine! Totally fine! And when she gets to meet John at last, things will be even better!

The stop in Portland, however, is all Jade's idea. At this close a distance, they could probably have hopped straight to Seattle with Bec's help. But ever since El Paso and that initial, kind of scary mess with Clubs, before Jade got resigned to the Crew following her everywhere, she's been really careful about WV. She doesn't jump the poor guy around too much in quick succession, and she has tried to minimize how much power Bec puts into their teleporting jumps. WV got really shaky for a while there, even after they dunked him in a couple of ice baths, and she still catches him getting flinchy and green around the claws by the end of the day. She just can't risk him getting seriously sick, or messing up his insides with some weird side effect of the spacy powers the carapacian doesn't yet know how to control. She can't even tell if he's always had these uncontrollable powers that occasionally let him make random jumps through space, or if they're a side effect of Jade using her own powers to stabilize him on a quantum level. Either way, WV's body hasn't adjusted well to it, at all, and she's always gotta consider him before she makes a decision.

So they make meter-long jumps instead of one huge one, and when they land in the middle of a busy intersection in Portland, Jade decides they deserve lunch, part two.

Partly because of WV. Partly because she never got to finish her crispy chicken sandwich, and now she's tired and kind of hungry. Eheheh.

A car's brakes screech and someone slams on the horn, and Jade rolls her eyes before bouncing the three of them out of the middle of the road and onto the street corner. "But where to eat?" she wonders out loud, whirling around in a circle with her coat flying out around her. She catches sight of herself in the reflection of the building next to her and grimaces, tugging at her hair again until she can at least pull it back in a wild pony and it's not sticking up everywhere.

She doesn't know what it is about the stand that catches her eye. There's a man leaning on a wobbly stool by a rack of newspaper stands that have been repurposed to hold a wide assortment of posters. Jade is only a few steps away, so she half-spins to go look at them, her good mood restored by this point. "Hey mister, what kind of posters are these?" she asks, pushing up the folded over edge of a poster that has been blown over by the wind. "Who are they of?"

She doesn't really need him to answer, though, because when she smooths out the poster and her eyes land on that face, she knows.

It's.

John.

Even with the goofy yellow goggles and the admittedly really cool mask and the fact that Jade has never actually met him in person (yet!), only ever seen pictures, it's sooooooo obviously John! She can't believe it - this is so cool! John has his own posters!

"'S the Heir of Breath, kid," the man says too late, chewing on the unlit cigarette in his mouth and raising both eyebrows at her. "You from out of town, then? He's a pretty local one, doesn't get out of Seattle much. You probably wouldn't have heard of him."
"Heir," Jade whispers to herself. It's one thing to know the name in theory, and another to hear someone say it aloud, for the first time since Jade left the island. "Air. Heehee." She may be feeling more than a little giddy. This is soooo cool. So cool. "How did he get posters made of him?"

The man snorts, pulling the chewed-on cigarette out of his mouth and using the not-spit-covered end to tap on the corner of the poster Jade clutches in her hands. "See the watermark in the corner? Means it's a fan work. Heir doesn't have a PR rep, so most of this shit is just unofficial merch off the web. I just sell it."

Jade deflates a little. But it's still a really cool poster! John is posing all cool and awesome with a giant hammer and smirking like a big dumb goof and hey, she has to be a supportive big sister, right? Even if it's not an official poster, it still counts! "Can I have it?" she asks the man, crushing the poster to her chest.

The man snorts, but he eyes the now slightly-crumpled poster with a wary eye. "Twenty bucks, kid."

"Yayyyyyy!" Jade squeals, palming money from her sylladex while she pretends to dig inside her coat pockets. "Thank you so much! Seattle is my next stop! I'm so excited!"

"Yeah, yeah, sure thing, lady," the man mumbles, taking the twenty dollar bill after Jade inspects it to make sure it's not in francs or any of the other denominations she has in the sylladex that sometimes get mixed together. Money is weird. It all just feels like paper and thread to her senses. But she got it right!

A shrill, demanding trill gets her attention. Jade blinks and looks down. WV glowers right back up at her, tugging on the skirt of her lab coat and holding up another poster, one his claws have nearly punched holes through. "Ohhhh! It's him again!" Jade exclaims, kneeling to see it better. This one is more obviously a drawing, but it's really good artwork, too, and recognizably John in his kickass hero costume. WV waves the poster insistently in Jade's face, and she laughs. "You want one too, Vi?"

The carapacian nods furiously, jabbing at John's drawn face with another claw before trilling at her meaninglessly again.

"And that one, too," Jade tells the man, and when he holds out his hand for another twenty she slaps it down with a wide, toothy grin. She maaaay have accidentally used a little too much of her strength; the guy whips back his hand with a wince and stuffs the money in his pocket while he stares down at his reddened palm with surprise. Oops. Jade really needs to work on not accidentally breaking people with her extra strength.

But she's just so close! Kneeling, she grabs the ecstatic WV in a headlock, closes her hand on a ruff of Bec's fur and lets her eyes flash bright green at the poster vendor before she winks and, cackling, sends them rocketing toward Seattle.

It's time.

-Rue Lalonde does not respond. She sits quietly behind her desk, staring at the plain, functional cell phone that rests atop a pile of file folders that she shoved out of the way. Years of graduate school and work in labs did little for Rue's organizational tendencies; she has an order all her own, and can instantly recall which file goes where and cross-files with which headings, but to the untrained eye her desk would look like glorious chaos.

Right now, she is busy feeling nothing. Before the intern arrived and began whispering through the open door, Rue had almost felt like nothing at all, adrift in the void. Only the fizzle of the martini in her mouth really brings her back to the present.

"In a moment, Dana," she murmurs in reply, closing her eyes.

"I - yes, Doctor. I'll...come back in five minutes."

The faint tap of the intern's Oxfords heads away from the office and into the hallway. Dana is a member of the medical intern corps - neuroscience specialization, if Rue is correct. Usually she has more of a head for names and positions, and can name all of her subordinates and fellow researchers on the fly, but tonight her mind is not...focused.

Her computer pings, and the sound is unfamiliar enough to stir her from this fugue. Her intra-office email account chimes like a clock when a new email arrives; the calendar application warns her about critical meetings and deadlines with an alarm buzzer. The ping takes a while to recognize, so she clicks on the mouse and enters her password. Her desktop appears.

The background is a picture of Rose. She clicks hastily on the blinking window in the corner and maximizes it. Because she is a coward.

To her surprise, the window is a massive, brazenly golden Pesterchum chatlog.

She honestly has no idea why she has a Pesterchum account. She thinks, at some point, she considered utilizing the tool to contact her daughter and break her unfortunate silence. But then her computer division had deemed the application too easily hacked; the plan to contact her had been scrapped (again).

In hindsight, Rue wonders wearily how many times she miscalculated. How many times she saw the opportunity to reach out to Rose, to care for her daughter, if only at a distance, and told herself (again and again and again) no. It's easy to say that every choice she made that took her farther from Rose was a poor one. But that is too sweeping a generalization: at the time, they had been necessary. It doesn’t matter how she tells herself that even the most discreet communiqué could have led the Midnight Crew to her daughter again, how she did it in Rose's best interests. It is becoming more and more clear, as the hours pass and the cell phone remains silent, that all Rue has managed as a parent is to implement a regimen of neglect so complete, it not only destroyed Rose, it may have destroyed any hope of reconciliation and healing between them.

And if the person who has pestered her is who she believes he is, judging by that familiar yellow-orange, then Ambrose Strider has chosen this moment to drive that failure home.

She supposes if anyone has the right to denounce her behavior, it would be the man who provided the other half of Rose's genetic sequence. Draining her martini without even tasting it, she responds.

TT: gallifreyan? really lalonde?

TT: it's fucking official

TT: dave gets his secret nerd angst from your side of the family

-- tartGallifreyan [TG] has changed handle to tartGuardian [TG] --

TG: Not now, please, Ambrose. I am working my way up to a most thorough bender, and I shall not stand for this monastery.

TG: *mockery
TT: starting early, huh
TT: well shit, what's got your english knickers in a twist, lalonde?
TG: Rose has left the laboratories.
TG: According to a Querent attached to the labs, she left of her own volition, remarking that she could stay here no longer. She has already been missing for nearly a day, if my timeline is correct.
TT: yeah, kinda noticed that when she logged in from a computer not in fucking Maine

Rue nearly chokes on her martini, and has to set it aside momentarily while she coughs and sputters.

TG: You are tracking her?
TT: she's half mine, of course i'm keepin' track of her now
TT: no offense lalonde, except total offense - you fucked up all over downtown New York City TT: when it turns out parental unit one has let the kid turn into a goddamn tentacle demon, it's generally a sign parental unit two needs to get his head in the game
TT: so shit, here i am TG: Then you know where she is now?

For a brief moment, hope bubbles up in Rue's throat like fine champagne. It goes flat a moment later with a furious wave of text from Ambrose. He has always tended toward short, truncated sentences when communicating, and her heart sinks as she realizes he becomes more verbose the angrier he feels.

TT: yeah no fuck that
TT: jfc, lalonde, what, you couldn't keep track of your kid for more than a week?
TT: and you all thought i'd be the one to accidentally drown dave in a bowl of cereal or throw him off the roof or some shit
TT: well look at us now - old man harley dead, nanna jo dead, you drunk while your kid is halfway across the country
TT: at least with dave the worst i managed to do was get the kid hooked on aj and swords
TT: that shit's not even unhealthy it's literally apple water
TT: pretty sure i win the fucking 'guardian of the century' award by this point TG: Good lord, even reading your text is giving me a premature headache. Please desist, Ambrose, dear. I am well aware of my many shortcomings as a guardian, and I am attempting to drink myself into the void until I forget them.
TG: If you do not intend to disclose Rose's location to me, I will simply locate her myself come morning with my own resources. We both need time to cool down, first, it would seem.
TT: i'm just sayin' lalonde
TT: this is the last straw
TT: the last fucking straw in this entire fucking bale, as dave would say TT: i ain't on your side here - i'm on the kids.
TT: sentimental as fuck, but there you go, i goddamn said it

In her buzzed state, Ambrose's admission is enough to draw a low chuckle out of Rue, even as she hiccups. The intern is hovering outside her office, and Rue waves her off again. Really, whatever could be so urgent with medical at this time of night? She'll go check in, of course, but only after this rare conversation with Ambrose. He is always so delightfully abrasive, but his soft spot for the children is obvious. And perhaps some part of her perversely welcomes the painful scolding. She deserves it.

TG: I assure you, I am on their side as well. Am I not also a guardian?
TT: and you know all i'm hearin'?
TT: how you plan to ignore her a-fucking-gain
TT: you see this 'time to cool down' bullshit you typed up there TT: fuck that
TT: how about you finally take a step up on the guardian echeladder, put down the alcohol, and go talk to your kid instead of pretending she’ll talk to you first

By now, Rue feels sick. Something is not sitting well in her stomach, though she can't imagine what. She tries her best to black out the nausea, drowning it in the numbing swill of another appletini. Her fingers are a little jittery on the keys. She really should not be getting so drunk, not when she still has work to finish. But Rose is gone, a separation chosen of her volition rather than Rue's, and apparently that is enough to make all the difference in her mindset.

TG: Rose is perfectly capable of making her own decisions and knowing her own mind. She would only become irascible and distance herself further if she felt I began to infringe upon her agency. That may well be why she ran away in the first place. She has always sought to establish herself and her independence.
TT: bull. shit.
TT: she knows her own mind so well she went full grimdark
TT: she's a teenager, they're all still teenagers, which automatically makes them all stupid little shits who think they know what's best for them
TT: newsflash lalonde, no they don't TG: Dave and Rose, at the least, somehow share the genetic inheritance of a physicist and a robotics genius. I hardly believe you can deem either one 'stupid,' Ambrose. They are intelligent, almost painfully so, and with that intelligence come minds of their own. Would you really have me trample upon Rose's free will in order to enforce an authority she barely recognizes?
TT: again with the sidestepping
TT: just fucking admit you're scared to confront her about this and get over it
TT: every goddamn day dave gets more antsy and confrontational and pissy and do i ignore it and hope he'll handle it on his own?
TT: no, i kick his fucking ass, and i'll keep doing it 'til he can kick my ass

Rue wrinkles her nose. If nothing else, Ambrose Strider's idea of how to raise a child is remarkably...hands on. Perhaps that is why he is so in favor of direct confrontation, rather than choosing solutions that require more circumspect planning.

TG: Charming.
TT: fucking effective
TT: last warning, lalonde
TT: either you talk to your kid for once in your life, asap, or i tell you-know-who to cut off your funding
TT: i think when certain people hear just how low you've sunk trying to be even more of a fucking child than your kid, they'll listen to me TG: You would not dare. This is childish and pointless in the extreme, Ambrose. And besides that, Harley is dead.
TT: yeah but his foundation is still being run by living people last time i checked. your funding is not automated
TT: think they'd object to sending paychecks a lady who likes neglecting kiddies?
TT: i win?
TG: You win.
TG: I am forced to admit you may have a point. I have been neglectful, and foolish besides. Well played, Ambrose.
TG: Since you are clearly the only expert child-rearer between the two of us, and Samuel still refuses to acknowledge my calls, what advice would you suggest? I shall follow it religiously.
TT: finally
TT: drop the booze like it's hot, track down your kid, and siddown with her until you've had real talk, not just those passive-aggressive snarkfests that make you all tingly on the inside
TG: I shall endeavor not to disappoint you again, then. I do hate it when we're at odds, Ambrose dear.
TT: fuck your passive agressive name-calling, my work here is fucking done
TT: now excuse me, i have a new birdson to conduct the formal strider initiation rites upon, and i can't remember where i left the bloodstones and the cowboy chaps TG: Wait what.

"Doctor Lalonde, Doctor Marion says that this is really important," Dana says feebly, practically hanging onto the edge of the office doorway to support herself under the pressure of trying to speak up to the head of the research facility. Rue shakes her head, setting that last strange part of the conversation with Ambrose aside to speculate on later. She has quite enough to think about: for one thing, she will have to contact the computer systems department, and set them to tracking Rose's known online aliases. Ambrose may not have intended to help her locate Rose directly, but he'd already disclosed that he found Rose via the Internet, and Rue can work with that.

"Alright. Let's go," she commands at last, standing up. The wheeling chair slams much too forcefully into the bookshelf behind her, and she winces. As Dana frets and trots out of the office, Rue follows her, wishing she had a mirror to reapply her makeup with. No doubt her face is a wreck right now.

But then all of the department heads already saw her distraught when the news of Rose's grimdark break was confirmed. Seeing Rue upset will be nothing new to them.

"Run and fetch the Querent," Rue remembers to murmur to the intern once she realizes exactly what medical will want to show her. It only took her so long to piece it together because she wasn't at her best, and because the inciting incident had occurred weeks ago, when there was still snow on the ground. "She should still be in the quantum labs right now. This may interest her."

"Y-yes ma'am!" Dana replies, and she rushes back out through the double doors.

Doctor Marion waits patiently by the second set of swinging doors, so Rue can scrub her hands in the sink and pull on a bulky blue surgeon's gown over her dress. "Trouble with the kid again?" he asks wryly, passing her a set of gloves.

"Something of that nature," she sighs, snapping the gloves on. Her nails press the latex dangerously thin; she'll have to trim them later, before going to find Rose. "I've been inspired to handle it sooner rather than later. But tell me what you've found, first."

Marion looks troubled, and Rue begins to realize that the intern's upset might have been due more to whatever troubling news the neurology department has uncovered than due to speaking to Rue. "Well, the leader - that indigoblood? - won't speak at all. She's got it the worst, and she's in the early stages of coldblood-type dementia besides," Marion explains, kicking the doors open and leading Rue through the steel blue halls of the neuroscience and neurology department. Empty MRIs and other imaging devices are visible through the frosted, reinforced windows that make up each door as the two scientists sweep by, including the occasional thaumaturgic ward that Novitiate Halburn requisitioned to help him enter mindscapes. "I recommend we outsource her to a facility that specializes in that kind of volatile mental illness. We have to keep her sedated at all times, but we just don't have the resources to care for her long term. Patient care is not our job - we do research."

"I understand. Have Fredyn make the arrangements, I'll sign off on whatever you need." Rue narrows her eyes at a still active CAT scan machine, and she makes a mental note to scold whoever is on record as having used it last. "But you wouldn't have called me down for just that."

Marion hesitates. "No," he says, drawing it out slowly, as though testing the word on his tongue. "It's taken us a while to understand what we were seeing. If you had asked me just a week ago, I would have told you that all of the Crew members we have in custody are suffering from brain tumors in their frontal lobes. Every single one of them."

Rue's jaw drops, and she whirs on the man. "Why was I not informed of this," she demands, disbelieving. This is the sort of thing one informs one's superiors about, something Marion seems to have completely disregarded.

"Because we assumed there must have been a mistake, of course!" Marion exclaims, spreading his hands apart and shrugging helplessly. "How likely do you think it was for us to find not one, not two, but four trolls, all with near-identical tumors in such a vital area of the brain, and yet displaying no symptoms of brain cancer?! As though we were really going to report such poppycock! We ran the tests again!"

Rue sucks in a breath, then nods. "Point taken. I still expect to be informed of such a drastic result in any future research you run, related to this case or not. Are we clear?"

"...Yes," Marion sighs, rubbing a hand through his greying hair, over the bald spot. "Clear, Doctor Lalonde. My apologies. I'm a little worked up because it took us so long to realize what these tumors actually were."

"Not really tumors, then?" she says.

He shakes his head, and faint hatred flickers across his face before he schools it. "We needed Halburn to look into it, eventually," Marion spits. His rivalry with the thaumaturgic mentalist is quickly becoming a pain in Rue's neck. Marion is just old enough to have been raised in the school of thought that mixing magic and brain chemistry was dangerous and stupid, and that mindscapes should be considered on a separate level from neuroscience. Halburn, of course, is one of those bright young up-and-comers Rue sought out for her thaumaturgic research specializations, and much of his experiments in combining magic and neurology have been quite promising in their results. The hate is all one-sided from Marion, of course - Halburn lets his work do the talking for him, and reserves any smirks or snide comments for when Rue is out of earshot. "We had confirmed the absence of a high white blood cell count or any other signs in the blood work that would normally indicate such extensive cancerous growth, and isolated the tumors entirely on the scans, but couldn't figure out what they were made of without extremely invasive brain surgery - which would have required patient consent. None of them were willing to give it."

"Naturally."

"So we had Halburn take a look, since magical brain scanning without consent is still mysteriously not a crime," Marion snarks, until Rue frowns at him sternly. "What he claims he has found -"

"Doctor Marion."

"- sorry Doctor Lalonde - what Halburn believes he has found is not a tumorous growth in their
They have arrived at the holding rooms at last. Rue barely has time to scan the four trolls all chained to hospital beds before Marion finishes dropping his bombshell. "Parasites?" she murmurs, eyes flicking to the neurologist and then back to the unconscious trolls within. The warmer blues are in the usual type of hospital restraints intended for dangerous patients; the indigoblood writhes fitfully with an extra set of restraints, her mad eyes closed but her mouth still opening in silent snarls as she arches her back and tries to claw at the ceiling. Highbloods are notoriously difficult to tranquilize once they fly into a rage, and those who develop the permanent dementia found only in cooler blooded trolls are even more resistant to sedatives. Rue makes a mental note to have the indigoblood shipped out as soon as possible; the last thing she needs is a rogue indigo with fistkind and clawkind tearing a bloody streak through her laboratories.

"Parasites," a third voice confirms. Rue acknowledges Halburn's arrival with a nod, and the young troll shoves his glasses up his nose as he nods back, halfway to a bow. He has hair down between his shoulders in a coarse braid, eyes just this side of violet, and a pair of horns that angle back before curving under in a slight hook. "To be precise, mindgrubs."

Rue, as much as she is loath to admit it, has no idea what those are. She'll have to study up at some point in the midst of her rather busy schedule. Perhaps during the flight out to wherever Rose may be. "And they…?"

"- Are used in computers," Marion interjects before Halburn can do more than open his mouth. "They have no place in a brain, and I believe Halburn's speculations are groundless."

"Marion, you will be silent," Rue says, feeling cold as she rounds on the doctor. He clamps his mouth shut, looking pale. Perhaps he is recalling what happened the last time a rivalry between two scientists in this lab got out of hand. They never did find all the pieces. "Halburn, what speculation? In fact, just give me a full overview of what these mindgrubs can do, and how they would end up in four trolls' brains."

"With pleasure, Doctor Lalonde," Halburn replies, maintaining a smooth, expressionless demeanor as he waves a claw toward the window. "As Doctor Marion so accurately informed you, mindgrubs are most commonly found in some troll computer systems, particularly those of hackers. They swear by them because mindgrubs can biologically simulate common software bugs and proxy servers without leaving evidence behind for security systems to identify or track down. They're rare, and actually quite illegal to grow and harvest in the United States. These particular models in the Crew members' mind are specially modified - it appears they have only one command running at a time, but they are secreting some kind of substance into their frontal lobe that affects a significant portion of their brain chemistry. It's not cancerous, obviously, and the good Doctor Marion has found no evidence that it's killing them or putting undo pressure on the thinkpan. To be quite frank, Doctor Lalonde, it's all very...disturbing."

Rue has already figured it out by the time Halburn reaches the part about biological simulation. Her mind lines the pieces up and draws the same disturbing conclusion Halburn has no doubt reached. "Mind control. These mindgrubs are altering how their brains work, chemically - brainwashing them."

Halburn nods, the blood draining from his violet-tipped ear fins. He looks as pale as Rue feels. "So I believe, Doctor Lalonde. I can't discern exactly what the command is - that's just not something I can analyze with the magic at my disposal, no matter how targeted my search. The only way I could think of to download the command prompt would be - well."

"He's suggesting we perform that illegal, dangerous, life-threatening brain surgery anyway, when the only reason we called him in on this case at all was to avoid doing such a thing," Marion growls, folding his arms. "None of them will consent to this, and you know it, Doctor Lalonde. They don't even consent to be here - they're prisoners."

"Can any of them consent?" Rue murmurs, pressing up closer to the window. As though sensing her, the indigoblood beyond lunges upward, one leg slamming down against the bed, only to be jerked to a halt by the restraints. She looks vicious and wild and now Rue is left wondering - is it dementia, or is it something far more insidious? "If that thing is in their heads, no doubt it would wish to protect itself. Force them to say no to any procedure that might damage the grub. Hmm."

For most, it would pose an ethically perplexing dilemma. Rue already knows the answer though. Perhaps it is not the morally right answer. But she swore long ago to oppose the Crew for the threat they posed to her children, at any cost to herself and her morals. Such outdated things.

Yes, she knows exactly what she will tell Marion to do next.

WQ: Pardon me. You wished to see me, Doctor Lalonde?

Rue extricates herself from her thoughts, and turns to smile faintly at the slim white carapacian clicking her way sedately down the hall. The Wondering Querent would like Rue to believe she is a simple philosophical mind, but both of them are balanced in a silent dance, as the WQ continues to work on a project in her labs beyond anything Rue has ever dreamed of, and Rue continues to feign ignorance of exactly how far beyond the philosophical the Querent's expertise extends and allows the carapacian and her now-absent Protégé to remain here. Sometimes, silence is the best policy for mutual assistance.

But her smile fades quickly. "Tell me, WQ," she says, running a finger down the window. "Did you know that every single one of the trolls from the Crew who followed you here were under the control of illegal, modified mindgrubs?"

She watches the carapacian's reflection in the mirror. WQ merely looks uncomprehending at first. Then, slowly, her dark eyes widen, and she lets her own claws clack up against the window, peering through with horror on her face.

WQ: They would not. How - why -

WQ: This is not the way the game is meant to be played!

WQ: I cannot believe he would do such a thing, again -

The carapacian seems to have realized she has gone too far. She presses her claws to her mouth, falling away from Rue with a gasp. She regains her composure a moment later, when Rue remains motionless and quiet, merely meeting her gaze without a sound. What did the Querent think, that Rue would attack her for a misstep in their dance?

Rue already knew about the game. She may only have had the scraps of information left behind by Joanna Egbert to start with, but she has been investigating Skaia long enough to know that there is always a game. She only wishes she had more than those scraps. Jo 'Nanna' Egbert had always remembered the most, out of all the four guardians, and her death had been a heavy blow to bear, particularly when Rue realized Samuel had inherited none of Jo's inborn knowledge. They have struggled on blindly ever since, raising children with powers beyond the pale.

The only question is -

"Again?"
But she already knows, before the Querent's expression smooths out and the carapacian shuts down, shaking her head with her claws clashing together in a silent refusal, that she won't receive a response. The WQ is not the first carapacian to betray knowledge of the game, and none of the others had been willing to discuss it further, either.

Rue can only wonder what inspired such raw fear in them, that the terror of the game lingers to this day.

"Marion? I want those grubs out. I want them out now," she tells the neurologist, and she strides out. The Querent remains motionless in her wake, the carapacian seemingly dumbfounded by the four trolls and their parasites beyond the window.

She has a daughter to find.

Chapter End Notes

Well done, Rose and Kanaya, you guys have accomplished in the space of one chapter together what John and Karkat have not managed in THIS ENTIRE STORY. Fucking suuuuccceeeeed. /adds Rosemary to the relationship tags

But Davesprite, seriously bro, where the fuck did you come from. YOU WERE NOT IN THE ORIGINAL DRAFT OF THIS CHAPTER. WHAT AM I SUPPOSED TO DO WITH YOU NOW?!
The Stars and The Winds

Chapter Summary

For the stars and the winds are unto her
As raiment, as songs of the harp-player;
For the risen stars and the fallen cling to her,
And the southwest-wind and the west-wind sing.

Chapter Notes

Anyway, time for everyone to try and sort out their emotions AGAIN. I've been looking forward to this chapter for a while. You'll know exactly why by the end. I couldn't put it off forever, after all…

Hemogoblin and Heir belong to realmenweartights.tumblr.com, and Sylph's design (Bananaramses) can be found under the RMWT concept tag, but as should be clear by now I intend to traumatize them beyond all reason. Karkat, at least, will hit his breaking point soon - and when he does, all hell breaks loose. Boy, you can't dick around when Diamonds Droog is in town...

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Karkat dreams -

He doesn't think it is really possible for the dreams to get much worse. Seriously, how does it get worse than your moirail dying nightly in front of your eyes?

He learns better after he dumps himself in the recooperacoon and unintentionally opens the flood gates on every nightmare he's been holding off for the past twenty four hours. Three such dreams pass by in rapid succession, a tangled mess of blood, pain, and a too-young John who suffers and suffers until Karkat is worn utterly ragged.

But it gets far, far worse when he realizes he's in the wrong body.

Normally in these nightmares he plays himself; sometimes he's paralyzed, sometimes he can interact with his surroundings, but he never has the power to just reach out and drag John to safety, which would be the fucking useful thing to do. But now he can feel exactly what has gone wrong this time; his body is off-kilter, and his bones and blood weigh heavily in him, a wrongness that inundates him completely. His hand rises up, and though it feels like Karkat lifting his hand, he knows he's not the one controlling it. Not to mention the hand is the wrong color completely, an olive brown, ending with blunter fingers instead of claws. He views everything through glasses frames that are the wrong shape again, oval-shaped and dorky, but the prescription is close enough that his vision is clear, as though the person they really belonged to were his twin, and oh fucking fuck.

He's John.
He's John in someone else's glasses, and he can already tell this is all going to end in fucking tears.

John is lying on his back, looking up at the sky. It's not the same black sky from that golden moon; swirling, outlandish white clouds shuffle across a much more reasonable blue sky, marred only by an enormous stream of black smoke. It seems to be coming from John's left, but Karkat can't turn his head to look at the source of the flames; it's up to John, and John, for some reason, seems completely uninterested in the potential fire hazard. After lifting his hand and inspecting it, John lets it flop back down, and huffs quietly to himself. He sounds tired, like he's only just woken up, and more than a little confused.

There was something in his hand, but Karkat couldn't see it. He tries the usual tactic of screaming at John mentally to look at it it's important, come on John you dumbass! But John just plants both hands flat on the ground and starts to sit up.

Pain lances through his ribs and he shouts with pain, wrapping an arm around his ribs. He's in those yellow pajamas again, dusted with ash and flecks of debris. John shakes his head, and raises a hand to press to his temple. The pain from his chest is all mixed up with a throbbing in his brain, which Karkat feels as a dizzy inflammation in the blood vessels. There's a hemorrhage at the back of John's head that he dabs at gingerly with his fingers, but it's not too serious from what Karkat senses, just painful.

"Mnnaggh. Jade?" John mutters, his throat dry. He coughs and it wracks his body, making him tighten his arm around his torso. It's doesn't really help the pain of what feels like more than one broken rib, but it seems to brace John enough that he is able to finish sitting upright and look around.

They're sitting on something Karkat can't look at. He can't. But John seems to be unbothered, and when he shivers at the sight of the enormous pile of golden wreckage to their left, it's just because he is deservedly worried about the fact that an entire moon has crashed beside him. The issue with the thing below them is all Karkat.

Also, who the heck is Jade?

John's hand crushes the thing clutched in his palm, as he gets to his knees, swaying slightly as he looks around some more. Karkat senses the blood before John sees it, though, and so he's already sick to his stomach by the time John sees the body crushed beneath a chunk of golden building right beside him. The blood is cooling already, spreading out in a red pool, and a dark brown, slim hand is still visible, where the building didn't quite crush it.

"Jade?" John says, his voice shaking. He sags forward onto his hands, sobbing. "Jade, nonono, Jade ."

Oh fuck, whoever this is, John knew her and she's about as dead as it gets. The agonizing grief flares through John and Karkat feels it all second hand, as though it's him shaking with sobs, struggling to comprehend the broken body he knows is lying under the debris. He can't even reach out and try to soothe John because in this dream, John is alone, and Karkat doesn't have his own body. John is miserable and Karkat wants to scream because he can't do anything at all to help.

And over it all, echoing through John in pangs of agony, is the knowledge that it's his fault.

Karkat just can't think why.

"Why couldn't you just wake up?" John demands, talking to himself. He shoves up his borrowed glasses with his hands clenched into fists, scrubbing at his tears. "Why?!"
He's been telling Karkat to wake up in an earlier dream, Karkat recalls vaguely. But he can't figure out how all of this is supposed to fit together. If these nightmares have a point (which he sincerely fucking doubts) he's not seeing it.

On the other hand, John has survived what feels like the first five minutes, hey, look, that must be a new record.

John stiffens, and Karkat hears the sound at the same time, his stomach sinking. It's the crackle of green lightning, the whorp of plasma sloshing in midair before it solidifies. Turn around turn around turn around Karkat chants, and - for once - John responds, or at least Karkat's instincts finally align with the dream logic. John whirs around to see the creature floating in a writhing mass of green fire. It has the smooth black shell of a carapace that gives way to the snarling muzzle of a wolf, and it already has that black sword in claw. Karkat can't imagine why it hasn't stabbed John already. It's just hovering there, puzzled.

John doesn't run away - or float away, when the fuck did they start floating? Karkat was distracted - like a sensible being. Karkat can feel their facial muscles move, but he can't interpret John's expression just from that, not when inwardly his emotions are a riot of grief and fear and fury and pain. John pats at his pants instead, as though looking for pockets that aren't there, with more and more panic souring in his mouth as he begins to back away from the green-and-black abomination.

It's still just staying there. It has its head cocked to one side, its white eyes slitted as though in curiosity. Karkat can't see what's holding the thing back; last time it certainly didn't fiddle around before blowing up a moon and stabbing John in the chest.

Finally, John seems to give up on finding anything in his pockets that might help in this kind of life-and-death situation, and, his heart thumping loud in their chest, he opens his hand and looks down at the thing that's been clutched there since he woke up.

It's a ring. It sits there in his palm, ringed with four tiny orbs, and totally innocuous, worth none of the buildup that Karkat has created in his own mind.

He doesn't do the logical thing, which would be to put the ring on. Karkat has no idea what it would do, of course, seeing as how it's a fucking ring and probably completely useless, but that's what people do with rings - they wear them. John, however, inspects it for a long moment, mouthing something to himself that Karkat can't interpret. A little bit of the blind panic is gone now, but they're still just hovering there like a wide open target.

John grins, and that emotion is easy enough to feel, a wide, uninhibited grin splitting their face. He holds the ring out to the side, and twists his hand.

A giantass fucking hammer appears. It's way too huge to be practical, appears to be made of solid gold and thus useless for actual hitting anything for shit because gold is soft, and the actual smashing end is decorated with an entirely frivolous crown.

Oh, sweet, sweet nookchafing fuck. If Karkat weren't stuck in John's head, he'd slam his own head against the nearest available wall. He honestly thought the dreams could get any weirder but they prove him wrong every time because he has no idea what in the name of the Mother Grub is happening.

As though to take that massive cosmic middle finger and shove it right into Karkat's face, a soft but undeniable voice echoes overhead. 'Attention - an error has been detected. The heir has been crowned.'

Seriously, can Karkat get a fucking refund on the whole unwanted Ominous Dreams and Assorted Mindfuckery package? Because this is some grade-A bullshit and none of it makes sense. None of it. It's all way too abstract. Heir to what? Is John royalty now? What the blithering fuckity fuck.

'Please wait. Rerouting...' that same genderless voice announces coolly, and John is still just hovering there.

But on the other hand, so is the giant winged hellbeast. They're both stuck, and, struck by the thought, Karkat falls into John's blood as he usually would his own. It's different, a thinner consistency with more iron and less of the sickly-sweet tinge of sopor, and it's surprising how much difference that makes to Karkat's perspective.

Enough that he can feel what he couldn't before, most likely because it wasn't something affecting the rest of John's body, which is all Karkat has access to. If John can feel the ponderous lines of power currently plating the walls of his veins and laying down tracts in his bone marrow, he's not bothered enough by it that Karkat would have noticed without his powers active. But Karkat can also feel how it roots this body in place, paralyzing them so subtly it doesn't even hurt as all that power floods in.

John's body isn't meant for this kind of power; it's too much, too bright and white-hot, racing through his arm and up to his heart like liquid fire, and it wants to pour through channels that John doesn't have. That's why it's funnelling through to that hammer - it's a stopgap measure, the weapon that John's mind automatically chose for whatever reason. But even this little power is too much. How long until John just burns out? Until the power explodes out and takes him with it? At the very least, he'll lose the arm; Karkat can feel John's blood burning even now, until his powers recoil from the heat and he snaps back into John's head rather than his blood.

Never mind. Putting on the ring would have been a fucking stupid idea. Karkat is a dumbass, and nightmare-John wins this round.

'Emergency protocol activated -' the voice says at last, calm and collected. 'Queens of Unorthodoxy - engage.'

Whatever held the winged wolf back before vanishes and in a flare of green fire, it's upon John, teleporting with a snarled roar.

John's not fast enough to block it, of course; Karkat's too startled to even think of moving, and he has way better reflexes than John; he waits for the sword to come crashing down on their shared headspace -

The hammer comes up unerringly and slams up into the sword from beneath, shoving the blow away with brute force. Their arms scream with pain, and Karkat reels because how the hell did they move that fast? The burning creature seems almost as surprised, yelping with affronted rage, and stabs forward again. John's arms both ache now, but the hammer comes up and deflects the blow again. Whatever foreign power that ring is channeling through John, it can move.

And John just rolls with it, not even trying to fight the wild swings of the hammer. If anything, it feel like he's the one guiding it, exerting strength no human's supposed to have. The wolf howls with frustration when John just won't die.

Being a pathetic excuse for a rational being, Karkat momentarily hopes this will end differently.
But not too much hope. He's learned his lesson.

Then, in the heat of the moment, when the wolf lunges in close and brings the blade ringing down on John's guard again, Karkat tries it - he jumps his focus onto the wolf's blood and tries to sense what he can, to understand just what the fuck this bizarre creature his thinkpan's constructed to kill John twice is actually made of.

It's a mistake. It's a horrible mistake. There's not one but two fires boiling in that creature's veins, scalding Karkat before he shrieks mentally and tears himself free, slamming back into John's perspective and cuddling there, barely registering the fight as it rages on around him.

So much power. How could one person stand it?

They can't, he thinks vaguely, staring at the wolf as it tries and fails to teleport behind John and the hammer swings around to meet it. The madness was a palpable taint in that hellbeast's blood, a poison that oozes through wherever the green fire and the black power spiraling up from the creature's own ring, the one clamped firmly around its dark claw, clash. They're not necessarily opposing powers, but they don't mix well, and the sheer overload has driven the beast completely bugfuck crazy.

No, whatever that hellthing is, it's not the one built to wear that ring - but it's close. Close enough that it can channel way more power than John can. It burns like the sun to Karkat's senses already, yet more power just keeps frothing up. Then John has to fling himself backward again, and Karkat loses that momentary glimpse into the abomination's bloodstream.

But it was enough. With a sinking heart, Karkat realizes what's going to happen.

John is the one who falters first. Whatever the source of the power in that ring he's using as a hammer, it's just not enough. Or more accurately, it would be enough - but John wouldn't be able to handle it. When the winged wolf brings its sword down, John barely catches it along the handle of the hammer, and when the abomination teleports again, it's too much. The power of the ring sizzles and John falls. They're a good twenty feet above the ground that Karkat can't look at, by this point, and John barely catches himself before he hits the ground. He pants and lets the hammer drop, clutching at his knees as the hammer turns back into a ring and clinks on the ground below. John's palm burns from the inside, and Karkat can feel the power retreating already from his blood vessels.

When the wolf pops in behind John, they don't even get the chance to turn before the sword slides between John's ribs. Karkat sobs in time with John, as the human falls forward, one hand pressed to the gaping wound that cuts neatly through their heart, the other barely managing to support their dying body as they slump over. The pain is agonizing and total and so this is what this nightmare is all about: knowing through exquisite firsthand experience exactly how much terror and agony John feels as he dies.

And John is muttering something, and Karkat just barely catches it before the pain sweeps him into consciousness -

"This isn't how it went. Why can't I remember it right?"

And then Karkat is awake.

It makes the morning news, somehow. Heir had seemed cautious about believing that the news would run a big story about it, but someone on the news crew must have been a Hemogoblin fan boy, because when Karkat crawls miserably out of his recocoon at noon, after a mere three hours of troubled sleep, he turns it on to see the huge scrolling banner at the bottom of the local news, playing repeats of the eight o'clock news stories for the lunchtime crowd, reads

'HEMOGoblin EXONERATED; SUSPECT CONfesses TO POLICE STATION EXPLOSIONS; A MEMBER OF SEATTLE PD'S OWN COUNTER TERRORISM UNIT

Or maybe it's the scandal of having a supposed member of the force turn out to have been a plant all along. Karkat shakes his head, and hopes this doesn't go any farther than the local news. The last thing he needs is more publicity, really, good or bad. He just wants Hemogoblin to lie low and get back to work.

He has three phone calls from John and a voice mail, as well as five texts asking where Karkat is sent only a half hour ago. Karkat grimaces and doesn't listen to the voice mail; he focuses instead on showering off the sopor slime and making himself presentable as quickly as possible. He nearly stabs himself in the eye twice with his claw, trying to stick the fucking contact lenses in. He'd rather hurry up and see John in person than hear his moirail in some distress that Karkat himself caused with his absence. He can't even stand the thought, not after that nightmare. He just needs to get to John and hug him. Now.

Crabdad had thrown the mother of all temper tantrums when Hemogoblin stumbled in at around eight in the morning. The lusus is kind of aware that Karkat is Hemogoblin, or at least that he goes out at night pretty regularly; it goes through Karkat's stuff too regularly in an ill-fated attempted at 'cleaning' for that to have stayed a secret, and since then it has simply fretted at him and screeched obnoxiously whenever Karkat gets home in the early hours of the morning. Apparently today it had been convinced, in its tiny sushi brain, that Karkat had returned home and gone to school at the regular time; having Karkat sneak in partway through the school day with his uniform still on under his clothes had nearly given the fatass an aneurysm in the middle of the living room. When Karkat tramps downstairs, Crabdad wails with distress, and Karkat is treated to the age-old offering of a questionable brown bag lunch lobbed at him by a sobbing lusus, something he'd thought he'd trained Crabdad out of years ago.

On the other hand, it's not like he has time to pack his own lunch, anyway, and lunch period will be over by the time he arrives at the high school. John is probably having an aneurysm of his own, and Karkat is almost surprised Dad Egbert isn't over here checking in like a concerned secondary guardian. His luck is still holding out, it seems.

He batters Crabdad over the head and kicks it aside so he can shut the front door and hurry out to the grey state-issued car parked outside. The neighbor across the street is outside mowing the lawn like the disgustingly wholesome retiree he is, giving Karkat a strange look as he races across the front lawn. Karkat represses a middle finger with unholy effort, focused more on stuffing toast in his mouth. It doesn't have butter or almond butter or anything by way of toppings, and tastes like sawdust in his mouth, but after that bad dream his digestive sac twists and knots at the mere thought of eating anything sweet like jam. He trips over the edge of the curb when he fumbles for his keys, and catches himself on the roof of the car.

...Is it even safe to drive when he's this tired? Too late now; he's committed. Starting the engine takes two tries because the key misses the slot the first time, and Karkat bangs his head against the steering wheel, letting the horn run until someone - probably obnoxious neighbor #213 - yells wordlessly in protest, and he's forced to bend to society's whims and ease off the horn to drive to school.

The parking lot is totally full, and Karkat cusses out every single underclassman who might have taken up the rows closest to the school's back door, like the little fucking shits they are. He doesn't know all their names, no, but by god it's implied. When he finally finds a spot wedged between a Range Rover and a douchey Mustang convertible (what fucking high schooler can afford that?!) near the back of the lot, he then has to hightail it to the door before a passing security guard can drive by.

The door is, of course, locked. Karkat smacks his head against it twice, growling. Someone busted this door nearly a year and a half ago, near the start of last school year. Since then they've had an extra remote-controlled lock installed that only unlocks during short periods of time before and after school, and Karkat has blown right past that critical period and pissed on its grave. And if he goes through the front office it'll just be a hassle and a half.

...There's still five minutes left in the last lunch period.

He can still make it. Everyone who has that lunch time will know his shame, but who even fucking cares. The cafeteria is closer to John's math class, anyway; Karkat can catch him right when the bell rings. This plan is actually not all that mind-blowingly stupid, and he's proud of himself for defying all possible expectations in terms of his usually negligible brainpower. Pushing off the door with a hand, Karkat hugs the side of the school building and rushes around to the side area where people are allowed to go outside and eat. He gets a faceful of some random gust of wind that messes up his hair and pushes his crappy rip-off Heir hoodie back while he's running under That Goddamn Tree, the one John always insists they sit under when the weather isn't total shit. A few kids are outside, thankfully, so when Karkat sneaks in behind them, just as the bell to signal the end of the period rings, no one even looks at him twice.

Fuck yeah. Now to intercept John before the kid skips out on school or, worst-case scenario, starts freaking out. Karkat has never seen John cry, but the image is surprisingly easy to call up. John can smile all he fucking wants; the underlying sadness is still there, a mournful layer of melancholy that Karkat has barely begun to coax out into the open during their feelings jams. It's Karkat's own fault for being a raging fucktrumpet these past few weeks with his rage hormones. He really needs to sit them down and have a proper paledate, get John in a pile and pick up the moirailing slack.

Yeah. It'll be a thing. He'll suggest it right away, when he finishes shoving his way through this crowd of total assholes to reach the math hall. "I will shit on everything you love," he swears under his breath, shoving one kid so hard in the oversized backpack she nearly faceplants in a short troll's set of horns. Oops. His motor control is just so fucked right now. But apologies are for the weak, and for people not making a beeline for their moirail, so Karkat presses on.

"John!" he calls when he finally spies the back of John's head in the masses of people, and if he acts like an irritible little bitch when he elbows one last interloper out of his way, so be it. John's head perks up instantly and a wide, relieved grin spreads across his dumb face as he waves in Karkat's direction. He looks kind of tired, but otherwise fine. Good to know there's something Karkat has yet to fuck up in this world. Making John actually cry would probably be a culling-level offence. "Come here, you complete dumbass," he orders, and when John gets close enough Karkat thinks, fuck them, and hugs his human. John is warm and just a little bit taller than Karkat which will never stop pissing him off, but whatever. When he hugs back he nearly chokes Karkat out, and that's fine too. It's all fine.

But also, John's chocking him out, so Karkat's getting kind of light headed. Maybe he'd usually be able to handle John's ridiculous swimming arm chokehold, but right now he's already dazed enough without the help. "Lay off, you ludicrously overpowered dumbass," he croaks, papping at John's ear. Or at least he thinks it's an ear. He might have gotten caught on the kid's glasses, too. "Some of us need to breathe."

John chuckles, the sound muffled with his face stuck in Karkat's hair, and his nose brushes the edge "Shut up, Karkat, this is payback. Where were you, this morning? Everyone's been saying you weren't here at all for theater, and I know you would never miss that!"

Ugrghdgaldskfuck. Karkat makes a face, because he is not looking forward to talking his way out of this one. At all. This is the problem with micromanaging your schedule like an obsessive fuckwit; when you break the pattern, everyone and their mother knows. One time he skipped out on training to hang out with John for the afternoon, and John had nearly freaked out, thinking Karkat was missing one of his fake job shifts. "Slept in. Like, I goddamn slept in. It was the shittiest experience of my life, and I think the next time I look at a recoperacoon I might just vomit everywhere and go be an insomniac on the couch for the rest of my miserable existence."

"Really? Jeez, Karkat!" John breathes out a sigh of relief that nearly rocks them both, one hand papping at Karkat's hair, and Karkat reluctantly unwinds himself from the embrace because wow, they are in public and this is getting really pale, really fast. Like, he does not want the entire troll population of this fucking cesspit gossiping about the exhibitionist pale action going on all up in the middle of the hallway. Most potential witnesses have already cleared out and fucked off to class, but there's such a thing as propriety, okay?

Also, there was something wrong with that relief. Something about it that hits the wrong note in Karkat's twitchy thinkpan, and so he draws back, inspecting John's face with a frown. What he sees isn't reassuring at all. Hoo, boy. Karkat adjusts his timeline of events because holy fuck, John looks shaky, his grin barely sticking to his face as he scrubs at his messy hair. The shadows under his eyes seem to sink deeper now that Karkat's getting a good look at them, and there's a pallor to his skin that shouldn't still be there. Yeah, John had been almost as shocked as Karkat by that accusation against Hemogoblin blared all over the evening news, but there's no reason that should bother John so much now, after the accusation has been cleared up.

Unless John hasn't heard? Well - "You heard? The police are backpedalling like crazy, over that whole Hemogoblin thing," Karkat says, playing it as smooth as he can when he feels like shit, arching an eyebrow that might just end up being both eyebrows, because his fine motor control is basically shot. "Some nutjob came forward and confessed."

"Oh - yeah, I heard!" John replies, brightening a little. "It was all over the Internet this morning. Way to jump the gun, right?"

" Seriously. That was stupidity of apocalyptic proportions," Karkat agrees, searching John's face. No good - John looks better on the surface, but he already knew about the Hemogoblin exoneration, so that wasn't what had been bothering him in the first place. If anything, after the initial flicker of a grin, John looks even more exhausted afterward. He's just trying to cover it up more, now.

They need a jam. From the looks of things, they needed the jam yesterday, but John can be pretty good at sitting on this kind of thing until it becomes a Federal Fucking Issue. Where Karkat couldn't repress his fucked up, spontaneous ragefits if he tried, John is too good at it. His ability to hide his deeper emotions masquerades as functionality, and Karkat thinks if he doesn't yank this out of John right here and now, it'll fester and entrench itself further in his idiotic human thinkpan, where not even the best of Karkat's abilities will be able to shoosh it out into the open.

The last thing John needs is another open wound like the one that Rose woman left, an oozing sore that John will ignore and ignore until it rots through. Karkat will be damned before he lets his moirail work himself raw over something Karkat's done. He seizes John's wrist with his claw and drags him into the nearest male-identifying restroom. There's a green-eyed troll by the sinks who looks up from rinsing his claws and lets out an 'eep' of terror when Karkat snarls at him. "Karkat, what are you doing? We're going to be late," John protests, still with that light, joking note in his tone, as the greenblood grabs his backpack and scurries out without daring to even look at the two of them.

Too bad. If John thinks he can laugh this one off, he's got another thing coming. And any self-respecting troll would recognize an emergency moirailing when he sees one, and know to back the fuck off. Karkat spins John so Karkat is between him and the exit, and only then releases his clamp on John's wrist. He folds his arms, then has to unfold them slightly to adjust his crooked glasses. Honestly, he's lucky he remembered to put on his contact lenses and glasses at all, after the night he's had. "Spill it, John. I can tell something upset you. What happened while I was gone?"

John shifts, clearly uncomfortable, his eyes darting back and forth from the mirror off to the side to the door over Karkat's shoulder. He adjusts the strap of his backpack where it's slung over one shoulder, but merely shrugs and says, "I'm fine, Karkat. Jeez, I was just wondering if something was the matter with you...you got me kind of worried, that's all!" He firms up his toothy grin, having not yet caught on after a year and a half of friendship that Karkat can tell it's a fake. He'd be insulated at the thought of his palemate trying to hide emotions from him, except that's just how John works. That's his dysfunction. It would be like John being insulted by Karkat's freak outs.

"Yeah, I know, I fucked up, what else is new," Karkat says flatly, twisting his lips down. "Apparently last night I left my phone, and thus my alarm, down in the kitchen with Crabdad, and passed the fuck out until noon. Yay me, the one day my overly attached lusus decides to let me sleep in is a random weekday during the school year."

"At least the insomnia is better, though?" John laughs, and okay, that was a little more genuine, but Karkat's still not fooled. John's shoulders have relaxed because Karkat gave a reasonable explanation for his absence, but he still looks off. So it is something to do with Karkat. "Seems like you more than caught up on your sleep! That's good, right?"

Ha. Karkat wishes he could make up sleep like that. If only insomnia were the problem, not just the shitty solution he's found for the nightmares plaguing him. He grimaces and shrugs, though, because this is the best cover story his tired brain could think up on the drive to school. "'Good' would have been not missing half my fucking classes over it, but whatever. I'm here now. So why did me skipping get you all twitchy and triggered?"

John flinches again, so there goes his little happy mask. He stammers, trying to cover it up, but Karkat has gotten better at peeling back John's layers after all this time, and he has no intention of letting John bullshit him over this. "I don't know. I just thought..." He breaks off, easing his weight from one foot to the other as he stares determinedly at a corner of floor tile rather than meet Karkat's gaze. "It's not a big deal, Karkat, you're here now!"

Oh, man. Karkat can already feel the pinched, silent bleed of pain that John's giving off, whether he knows it or not. It's obvious in the hunch of his shoulders, the way his hands shove into the pockets of his cargo pants (so Karkat can't reach out and grab them), in the sheepish and too-wide grin, a peace offering that doesn't quite conceal the anxious pain throbbing underneath the surface when John finally looks up again. Whatever this is, John thinks he's being stupid about it, which will only make him want to hide it more. The adorable dumbass is his own worst enemy.

"Spit it out, Egbert, just looking at you makes me want to gag myself with a rusty fork," Karkat snaps at last, rolling his eyes. They're officially missing their next classes right now, but wow, if John can have that kind of pain on his face after all this time, Karkat hasn't been holding up his end of this relationship at all. He feels twisted and sick on the inside with all kinds of pale knots, but shooshing John won't work until John actually admits there's something to be shooshed about.

He's got a sinking, stupid idea, though. Because John of all people knows that the person most likely to know Karkat's whereabouts would be...John. So why was he going around asking other people?
They share a class in the morning, so John would have known it wasn't just a matter of them somehow missing each other in the halls. "What, did you think I was avoiding you?" Karkat blurts out, like the dumbfuck shitpanned fucking fuck he is, and John shuts down right before his eyes. All the lights go out. John looks worse than anxious; he looks broken, all that lurking insecurity and pain ripped up and laid out bare.

Even if having John admit to this sort of shit is part of the process of dealing with it, that doesn't mean Karkat's heart doesn't break, because John tries to smile after that bombshell, and that smile is everything that could ever be wrong in the universe. "Ahaha, no, that would be dumb, Karkat!"

Karkat lunges forward and grabs his stupid, stupid human by the stupid face, and he's babbling all over the place because he has literally no filter left at all, not where John is concerned. "You stupid stupid stupid dumbass I'm right here, I didn't leave, you little shit, look at me."

John almost shakes him off before meeting Karkat's eyes and freezing up. Lost confusion darkens his eyes. That's okay, because for once Karkat knows what he's actually doing. Karkat tightens his hold, his claws clutching at the wind tossed mess of John's hair, and keeps up the stare until it clicks in John's brain. This close up, the slight widening of John's eyes and the way he sighs hard, like the air has been punched out of him, are all the signal Karkat needs. He breaks the stare and wraps both arms around John's neck so he can be the one choking the kid out. He can feel the pulse point under John's jaw even though there's still space between them, and it soothes the last of the upset in his own scrambled brain.

A little noise emerges from John's throat, somewhere over Karkat's ear, and Karkat tightens his arms. "I didn't leave. I didn't leave. I'm still here," he mumbles over and over. There's a slight shake to John's shoulders; he pats at the space between the kid's shoulder blades until the twitching goes away. "I'm okay and you're okay, I'm fine and you're fine. We're both here."

And okay, maybe Karkat needed to hear those words too. It would be awesome to hear it from John, but Karkat can say it enough for both of them, until they both believe it.

God, they're a pair of fucking idiots. Both of them with thinkpans primed to assume their moirail could vanish at any minute. No wonder they deserve each other.

John wriggles out first, but Karkat doesn't let him go very far, so John kind of sways at the edge of Karkat's reach, still trying to regain his composure. Karkat can still feel the instinctive urge to shooshpap in his palms. It's hard to ignore. John's eyes look a little swollen, and his nose is all blotchy, even though there aren't any actual tears.

This could have been a lot worse. Karkat hates to think what could have happened if he hadn't made it to school today at all, what could have festered in John's thinkpan. John is built of dangerous contradictions, cheerful and quietly unhappy, spontaneous but careful, physically strong and yet emotionally a total clusterfuck who likes to fixate. And to think, Karkat had been fucking pissy when Crabdad made them move out to the suburbs. Now, he just wonders if he was always intended to find John because fuck, how would this kid have survived without him?

Serendipity. What a strange, wonderful concept. Karkat walked out into the night, nearly got shot, and somehow found the other half of his life in the aftermath, and he is so very, very okay with that.

At least it's not something new. This is just that same, old pain that John likes to pretend he doesn't carry, the scar left by Rose leaving abruptly and never speaking to him again. Karkat has never even met the girl, and he thinks he hates her, a crunch of pure, unadulterated loathing that has a special place of residence in the pit of his stomach. Seriously, Karkat knows hate (he hates practically every annoying fuckwad on the planet, okay, he knows) and this disgust is almost painfully personal. John would probably scold him, but fuck that. Anyone who can carve such a lasting mark in John's psyche that the stupid dumbfuck thinks his moirail would ever, ever leave him deserves the purest form of odium Karkat and his finely honed rage glands are capable of producing.

Seriously, it was just one morning of unexplained absence on Karkat's part - that's a pretty sensitive trigger if John could be set off by it, and that's a really fucking bad sign. Trolls with that kind of sensitivity would know to avoid the trigger for their emotional upset at all cost, but of course John wants to be friends with this Rose chick again. Now is not the moment to try to talk him down from that shitty idea, though. Karkat can wait. He can be patient about this, dammit.

John laughs weirdly, rubbing at his eyes. "Wow. Uh. Sorry about that. I don't even know happened there!"

"You fucking liar," Karkat says, rolling his eyes right back at him. So his moirail is in denial, what else is new? When John opens his mouth to make some kind of protest, Karkat flaps a claw at him. "Just wash your dumb face, John," he orders, resting his head on his claw as he leans against the wall. John nods and dumps his backpack on the counter, his cell phone sliding a little as he turns on the cold water faucet and splashes his face. Karkat is tempted to follow suit - maybe then he'd feel a little more awake, and a little less exhausted - but his gills would probably throw another bitch fit at the mere thought of water up his nose. Apparently nothing attached to his autonomic nervous system reacts well when he's sleep-deprived; showering has become a hassle and a half.

John's phone vibrates, and Karkat looks down absently.

He freezes when he spies the little banner of a Pesterchum alert, and the color of the text for the chumhandle. John has the message preview function off, but the handle is still there, in disgusting bright red.

And Karkat may have been distracted all last night with that little crisis with the law, but he hasn't forgotten that he has some words for this mysterious Dave person, who thinks he can just up and become John's friend out of bugfuck nowhere. He plans to do more recon this afternoon, hunting down the two Daves that he knows of who attend their school, but he strongly suspects that it's not a local Dave. Neither of the two here share any classes with John - one is a freshman, for fuck's sake - and Karkat spends every spare minute in passing periods glued to John's side, so it couldn't be then, either. No, this Dave human should have come up on Karkat's radar before now; the fact that he hasn't is a huge fucking warning sign.

Especially if it's some bullshit, like this Dave doesn't want to be seen interacting with John in public. As though that would be some kind of embarrassment. That would be the ultimate insult, and Karkat would probably have some kind of totally legal justification for ripping the fucker's head off in a fit of rage.

...Well, what John doesn't know can't hurt him.

Karkat memorizes 'turntechGodhead' and looks away from the screen just as John yanks his head out from under the faucet. His hair beads with water, and a trickle sluices down the side of his face. He grins at Karkat, and at last there's none of that hidden anxiety muddying the expression. He's clear and bright and free, and Karkat can't repress the grin that twitches onto his face in reply. There. Balance is restored to the universe. You're welcome, universe.

He furrows his brows to try to cancel it out with a properly annoyed frown, but John just laughs and grabs his phone and backpack, nudging Karkat with his shoulder as he makes for the door. "We are so late," he says, faking a mournful tone, and Karkat rams him back with a sharper elbow in retaliation.
"Like that even matters, you dumbfuck. Has no one ever drilled it into your skull that you're more important than school? You'd think your guardian would be all over that fruity self-esteem boosting nonsense. He's always so proud of you, it's just bizarre."

John opens his mouth, then shuts it as they walk out into the empty corridor. It's a little creepy how quiet the hall is, without the incessant roar of voices that usually echo in the terrible acoustics. Karkat rolls his shoulders and tries not to think about the history class he's missing. He honestly has no idea what's going on in that class this week; the only class he's on top of is chemistry, and that's mostly because John is there with him to keep his sleep-deprived ass in line. If these nightmares keep up, it's going to start hurting his grades.

Wow, fuck, this is not what he wants to be thinking about right now. But of course, his brain being a perverse sack of shit, he starts thinking about it more. He grimaces. By this point his homework is in a deplorable state. He...didn't work on it at all yesterday, and hell if he can remember what is due today. Or even earlier today. If he doesn't start working to catch up now, he'll probably hit critical mass by Friday, and then he'll be completely fucked. It's times like these when moonlighting as a hero really cuts into his everyday life, and it looks like the rest of the week is due to be hellish.

Fuuuuuuuck.

"Still, I think this is the first time I've ever just been late to a class," John laughs, his usual oblivious self. "And I should probably mention it to him anyway, so at least he hears it from me. Eurgh, this is going to be awful, Karkat!"

Karkat snorts. "Or just, you could just not fucking tell him. It's not like the teacher is going to call him and personally demand to know why you missed the first half of class." Karkat rolls his eyes when John just chuckles sheepishly. "Human parent-child relationships. How do you even put up with all that constant interaction."

"I don't know. I kind of tell him almost everything." John shrugs. "Don't you confide in Crabdad about anything?"

"Oh, fuck no. Never. Don't even talk that way, John. As if Crabdad could ever keep a secret."

"No one but you even understands him, Karkat!" John shakes his head, and Karkat realizes he's fallen out of sync with Karkat's stride when Karkat has to actually twist his upper body to see him. Oh. He's dawdling because they've reached his classroom. Right. "She won't call my dad, no, but she'll definitely call me out in front of everyone," he continues mournfully, and Karkat has to put his thinkpan through some rigorous exercise before he remembers they were discussing not just guardians but teacher reactions to their tardiness as well. Which is just really sad, because Karkat can usually keep up with conversations that twist and bend like this on the fly. This shouldn't be hard, so why does thinking feel like paddling his way through molasses?

He prods John in the upper arm, so the kid blinks and pouts at him over the jab so Karkat's amazing patented eye roll gets across. "She'll probably think your absence was only a product of her imagination," he says, raising an eyebrow. "After all, there's no way the incredibly punctual John Egbert would ever be late for class without an excuse note, right? Just sneak in and act like you were there all along."

"You're awful, Karkat," John says, grinning wide. "Playing a trick like that on a teacher? ...Heck yes."

"Make me proud, you dumbass," Karkat orders, pivoting on his heel to start heading for his own class. He still can't remember what homework was due today, but he's got his moirail all sorted out and that's basically the day made, right there.

"And Karkat?" John calls, a little too loud. Karkat winces and looks back reprovingly, because how does John expect to pull off these pranking shenanigans of his if he gives himself away by yelling right outside the classroom door? "Thank you. For uh. That." He stumbles over the last sentence. It's a fucking train wreck. John's face burns red as he stares at his shoe, toeing the ground because he can't look Karkat in the eye, again.

He should not look that huggable. No one has the right to look that stupidly adorable. Karkat can practically feel the diamond lodged in his throat as he swallows and blushes in sympathy. Fuck fuck fuck. "Yeah, well, that's why I'm here. Because I - fuck, because we're moirails, now go the fuck to class," he mutters, his voice doing something downright embarrassing. That sentence is supposed to go something like because I adore you, you hopelessly frail creature, let us shoosh again, but Karkat does not have the balls. He just doesn't. He ducks his head and stalks off down the hall without looking to see John's reaction. Because Karkat is a cowardly fuckwit, okay, and there is no way he's perpetuating that cycle of awkward fuckery that he knows they would have fallen into.

Alright, so. Pale declarations - not their forte. But hey, no relationship is perfect. And the awkwardness of the whole thing just pulls the huge knot that has taken up permanent residence in Karkat's chest even tighter. That's not even fair, dammit.

Of course, once he's turned the corner and John is totally out of sight, Karkat feels the post-jam slump hit him, and he stumbles forward. Fuck, he thinks dizzily, shuffling to the side as a wave of exhaustion ripples over him. His eyes feels dry and gritty as he leans on the row of lockers to his right for support. Panic breaks through the vague tiredness before he can pass out, fortunately, because holy fuck his contacts. The last thing he needs is for them to dry too much and just pop off his fucking ganderbulbs in the middle of a classroom, which is pretty much the last thing he needs today. He rubs at his eyes with a claw, pushing his glasses up as he does, and he can feel the way the lenses don't sit quite right over his iris. Shit shit shit.

Great. If this lack of sleep has reached the point where his eyes are bugging out, how long will it be until he starts getting shit on with some of the more serious side effects? He hasn’t had a real bad bout of true insomnia since he was a wriggler, but he knows hallucinations can be involved.

He might not have a choice; at some point, he needs to hit up his old stash of sleeping pills and suck it up for a night of hardcore nightmares in REM sleep. It would mean missing out on a night of work, which his stomach automatically revolts against, but he also can't afford to hallucinate on the job.

Blinking dry eyes, Karkat passes his claws over his face and heaves a sigh. How did he let himself fall apart this fast? A few weeks of nightmares and one shitty run in with the police later, and he's about to pass out in the middle of school.

Deal with it. Fuck sleep. Sleep is overrated, anyway. Who knows what kind of fresh hell could go down if you let yourself fall asleep.

...That sounds like sleep-deprived logic, and Karkat has to sit down on his haunches when a fresh wave of dizziness hits him. Is he giddy? He can't tell if it's just light-headedness or if he's actually having some sort of breakdown.

The smart thing to do would be to march right back to John and interrupt class to get his emotions soothed out. But when has Karkat ever done the smart thing? He straightens his back and swallows hard, letting out a shaky breath as he forces his eyes back open. They smart and sting in the open air, but he still has options. After a moment of consideration, he glances around and, sure that the coast is clear, bites down on his tongue with an incisor.
Blood wells up from the precise hole in his tongue; it tastes sharp and slick with pain and a rush of endorphins. The buzz has to shove its way through the thick smog of exhaustion encasing Karkat's thinkpan, but when it finally hits him, he wakes right the fuck up. He's dizzy as he climbs to his feet, hooking a finger through the link of someone's lock to help himself up, but what his regular senses lack in terms of clarity, his sense of his own blood more than makes up for. An injury generally means he's in danger; he keeps gnawing at the tiny wound with his tooth and the blood keeps trickling down the back of his throat like syrup. His every instinct rebels against it - he's spent a lifetime avoiding injuries like this, for fear of discovery - and by the time Karkat lurches to his next class he has enough adrenalin and endorphins shooting through his veins that it almost simulates wakefulness. There's a headache coming on, a throbbing at the base of his skull and behind his eyes that threatens to converge into one magnificent migraine, but he holds it back through sheer force of will. All his body wants is sleep? Well, he and his body are going to have to agree to disagree, for now.

Much better. It's not a permanent solution, but it'll hopefully get him through the afternoon without him falling asleep and drooling all over the desk.

And then he can launch Operation Daveterrogation, and hopefully take his mind of the wretched state of his mental stability.

He doesn't really remember class. Which, wow, is a really bad sign. Karkat nibbles at his tongue until the pain receptors stop responding altogether and he reluctantly uses his powers in class to scab the wound over. It's in his mouth, it's not like anyone can see the blood anyway. He thinks more than once as he tears a new hole on the other side of his mouth that he's being unbelievably reckless, and that it's probably the sleeplessness wearing holes through all his inhibitions, but it's just so hard to make himself care. He's devoting all his time to propping himself up in class; worrying about shit like the color of the blood in his mouth just feels so fucking pointless when his eyes keep blurring and slanting sideways, and he has to shake himself all over before he falls off the chair.

By some miracle the teacher doesn't call on him to speak, so he never has to worry about the blood that might stain his teeth. He waits until everyone else races out into the halls before ducking out. He thinks he hears the teacher call his name and he hightails it the fuck out of there because he's not wasting precious John-time mincing words with a nosy teacher.

The fact that said teacher probably has a justifiable reason for wondering why Karkat showed up fifteen minutes late to class does not faze him in the slightest. He stumbles flatfootedly through the halls until he nearly rams into John as the kid rounds the corner. Convenient. "You. Me. Denny's, after school. Don't even think of skipping out," Karkat says, before John can get a word in edgewise. Karkat thinks his weariness might really be starting to shine through, because John actually frowns and opens his mouth like he might protest. Karkat puts up a finger and presses it to John's mouth because nopppe. "No. Nope. No words, John. Just you and me and pancakes. This is a non-negotiable paledate." He hesitates, squinting, but he's fairly sure that's all he wanted to say. Fucking hell, he's tired. "You don't have swimming after school, do you?"

"...Karkat, I meant it, are you alright? Because I think sleeping in made you even more tired or something. You look awful!" John says. "And no, no swimming today. We have the bio club, remember?" He claps Karkat's shoulder with a hand that is way heavier than it has any right to be, dammit, and Karkat nearly just slumps forward against John to sleep here and now. It's so tempting. Fuck.

"Napping is for morons who like sleep. Sleep is so fucking overrated, John," Karkat tries to explain, clutching at the air with his claws to demonstrate...something. He's pretty lost. "Pancakes."

"Sure, pancakes. I'm totally in," John says. His face is twisted with concern, and Karkat thinks his eyes flicker blue when he steadies Karkat by the shoulder -

Karkat twists away. What was all that he was thinking about hallucinations earlier? he wonders. "See you in chemistry," he says, raising his hand in a vague wave that trails off as he is jostling and bumped along through the halls.

Just two more classes. Just two more -

- He doesn't have the brainpower to contribute to the latest random experiment in the biology club, anyway. Instead, Karkat whips out his phone and thumbs up the brightness of the screen until it blurs white and gold in his smeary vision and he can't ignore it. Squinting clears the features of Pesterchum up a bit, though his contacts ache and scratch with the strain. Eventually Karkat muscles John into position at the back of the classroom the club has commandeered for meetings this year. John has decided on bemused concern, apparently, smiling with a raised eyebrow while Karkat settles them on top of a table and pushes John's shoulder down until he can rest comfortably in the crook of the human's arm. He needs a headrest by now, dammit. His head kept bobbing throughout chemistry, and he's not sure how much longer he's going to make it this time before he just falls over. His recovery time is decreasing rapidly the longer he tries to go without a full night of sleep.

"Karkat, you can just nap if you need to," John whispers anxiously, but Karkat waves him off, jutting his chin into John's collarbone in an absently reassuring nuzzle before turning to conceal his phone screen from John and the rest of the club's prying eyes. He doesn't know how to explain that napping is the opposite of what he needs right now. Napping with John might help a little, but he'll suggest it later.

Right now, he has one last order of business to tend to before he gives in and lets his brain ravage him with nightmares again.

CG: YOU.
CG: DAVE HUMAN.
CG: WE NEED TO HAVE A FUCKING TALK.
TG: oh good the pestersmut request finally went through TG: at last i can get my mad dick pic fix
TG: lay it on me bro i have all day

Karkat shakes the screen, squints harder, and then closes the app and reopens it.

The window is still there. The red text still has the same obnoxiously creepy reply.

...Well. Alright then. The gauntlet must be thrown down, no matter how little sense this Dave is making. Karkat is on a mission, dammit.

CG: WHAT NO, THAT IS THE OPPOSITE OF WHAT WE'RE DOING HERE.
CG: THIS IS ME, DEMANDING ANSWERS OF YOU CONCERNING ONE JOHN EGBERT. YOU DON'T GET TO ASK THE QUESTIONS, DAVE. THERE WILL BE NO 'PICS' INVOLVED.
CG: IF YOU COOPERATE LIKE A COMPLIANT, PENITENT LITTLE RED TEXT FUCKWAD WE CAN GET THROUGH THIS MUTUALLY UNPLEASANT EXPERIENCE WITHOUT ME PHYSICALLY REACHING THROUGH THE SCREEN TO STRANGLE YOU UNTIL YOU TALK.
TG: just what i have been missing in my life an angry bdsm rp TG: go ahead man i am all ears over here
TG: and other organs

Wait - no, this doesn't make sense either. "Urghhh," Karkat mutters, and John nudges him lightly, shooshing him right in the ear. John tries to peer over at the screen - Karkat can feel him moving - and Karkat hunches over the screen with a bleary eyed pout that he directs at John until the human rolls his eyes and good-naturedly turns back toward the teacher. The burgeoning frustration melts a little as Karkat pulls himself together again. No matter how many times he reads this Dave kid's responses, it seems he's determined to not go along with the script for this little interrogation. His counter-interrogation tactics are quite effective, mostly because Karkat is furiously annoyed and unable to get the conversation back under control and seriously how did this guy immediately jump to sex? That's not normal.

Or maybe Karkat is just not getting his point across. Maybe he is coming off a little bla-

Oh, fuck. He may not be functional enough for this kind of confrontation. John, what kind of freak is this guy you've been talking to? he thinks with a silent snarl, typing with clumsy claws. Every text takes a painful age to finish typing because he keeps having to backspace and correct dumb spelling errors.

CG: THAT DIDN'T EVEN MAKE FUCKING SENSE STOP THAT.
CG: THIS IS NOT A ROMANTIC OVERTURE IN ANY WAY SHAPE OR FORM AND ANY HATE I MAY DIRECT AT YOU IS A PURELY PLATONIC STRATEGY USED TO EXTRACT THE ANSWERS TO MY QUESTIONS.
CG: THIS IS A FACT THAT I AM STATING FOR THE RECORD YOU BLITHERING BONEBULGE
CG: NOW START FUCKING TALKING WHAT ARE YOUR INTENTIONS TOWARDS JOHN TG: wow defensive much? i am not sensing any latent hatemance here at all TG: anyway how does an angry hate-sexting troll come to inquire about my beloved john TG: my curiosity is boundless man really ...Beloved?!

Karkat grits his teeth against a howl of protective outrage. Calm. Caaalm you ragemonster, fucking calm. At his side, John jerks and then leans over to drag his backpack up from the ground where Karkat kicked both their bags, unzipping the front pocket, no doubt in response to some new idea from one of the other biology nerds in the club. At least that will keep him distracted from trying to get curious about Karkat's actions. Especially since Karkat is two seconds from throwing a miniature bitchfit to himself.

Seriously, is this what John has been putting up with this entire time? Why. Just. Why. How did John's ideas of friendship become so skewed, that he has been texting this creep on a regular basis? Is the beloved thing a serious romantic claim or more of this human's seemingly incessant, perverse irony? Karkat can't tell.

He just remembers how John flushed and stammered when Karkat first asked about his intense conversation with this kid yesterday, and how John had barely given away the name Dave before changing the subject.

He's gorged himself on too many rom-coms not to have a very, very bad feeling about this.
CG: IF THIS IS HOW YOU TALK TO JOHN I WILL TRACK YOU DOWN AND BAN YOU FROM EVER CONTACTING HIM EVER AGAIN DO YOU UNDERSTAND.
CG: WHAT DOES THAT EVEN MEAN BELOVED EXPLAIN NOW TG: means john is my hubbie obvi where have you even been TG: there was a proposal and everything it was so legit
CG: STOP FUCKING AROUND, I WOULD FUCKING KNOW IF JOHN WERE MARRIED ALRIGHT. IF YOU THINK YOU CAN TROLL ME LIKE THIS YOU MUST THINK I'M A PANMELTINGLY STUPID IDIOT AND YOU WILL DIE WITH MY CLAWS THROUGH YOUR TRACHEA, I SWEAR TO GOD
TG: shit man if i knew i would have chalked you one up for part of the bridal price TG: i think i still have some cattle tribute up on the roof hang on TG: what exactly is your relationship to john nwy gotta know so i can judge how much of a cut you get here compared to the dadbert

He knows John's dad's nickname. This is serious. How serious, though? John makes a noise like a stifled laugh at his side, and Karkat hunches his shoulders more in response, but he darts a look over his shoulder and John is still occupied with something else.

CG: I HAVE NO INTEREST IN YOUR PLACID HERDBEAST TRIBUTES BECAUSE I KNOW YOU'RE DICKING AROUND, YOU FUCKASS
CG: TAKE THIS SERIOUSLY DAMMIT I WANT ANSWERS AND I WANT THEM NOW
TG: oooh yes mr angry troll order me more
TG: youre so hateful and shouty, mas por favor
TG: the yelling gets my non-existent troll hateglands all tingly 'n shit TG: don't leave out the part about the mouth-watering mass of powerful spunk hammers thats the shit i do like
CG: OH MY GOD
CG: OH MY GOD MAKE IT STOP
CG: I THINK I NEED TO GOUGE MY EYES OUT AND CAUTERIZE THE OPTIC NERVE, HANG ON, I KNOW THERE'S SOME BLEACH AROUND HERE SOMEWHERE
CG: YOU ARE SICK YOU ARE FUCKING SICK YOU SMUG FRUITY DICK-OBSESSED DOUCHEWAGON WHY THE HELL IS JOHN FRIENDS WITH YOU
TG: wait
TG: those dulcet tones
TG: the excessive overuse of the word fuck and the equally excessive insulting metaphors
TG: oh hell yes
TG: you're the angry one TG: the one john wouldn't give me the chumhandle for TG: karkitty we meet at last
CG: WHAT

Beside him, Karkat is aware that John is occupied with something, muttering to himself, but Karkat is too absorbed in this bizarre and complete not-what-he-wanted clusterfuck of a PesterSpm. Upon further thought, he suspects that he should have waited until he had more brain power to handle this kind of important conversation. But it's too late. He's committed. Back down now and this abomination of a human being will never take his demands seriously, ever.

But has John been talking about Karkat with this guy? In what context? What is happening agh -

CG: LOOK. HOW DID YOU EVEN BECOME FRIENDS WITH JOHN? WHERE WERE YOU ALL THOSE TIMES HE WAS ALONE? THAT'S ALL I WANTED TO FUCKING KNOW. WHY IS IT SO HARD TO GET A STRAIGHT ANSWER FROM YOU.
TG: oh hell. motherfucking. yes.
TG: you have wandered right into my waiting arms douchetroll
TG: we must embrace as comrades in johnhood TG: no more hate its gonna get hella friendly in here come on CG: STOP IT. JUST. STOP.
TG: you and me were gonna be best friends i can feel it in my man gut
TG: anyway i know john because were totes bffsies 5ever
TG: there i answered now spill how do you know him give me all the details john is such a confidential dumpass about this shit
TG: telllll meeeeee
CG: NO
CG: FUCK NO, THE ONLY ONE GETTING INTERROGATED IN THIS IMPOSSIBLY STUPID CHAT IS YOU
CG: DON'T THINK YOU CAN TURN THIS AROUND ON ME. IT WON'T WORK. I WILL SHIT ALL OVER YOUR PATHETIC HUMAN ATTEMPTS AT EXTRACTING INFORMATION FROM MY THINKPAN
TG: this is amazing
TG: i dont even have to say anything you just do it to yourself
TG: like a one man monologuing machine
TG: amazing this must be what john always feels like when i go off TG: hang on i can totally channel my inner john TG: lay down some sicknasty egbeats in here ahem
TG: hey karkat! how are you today? :D monologue at me more!
CG: I THINK I MAY LITERALLY VOMIT ALL OVER MY PHONE
CG: FUCK FUCK fuCK
TG: oh nooooo karkat, your quirk! DDD:
CG: FUCK YOU JOHN WOULD NEVER TYPE THAT FACE I AM GOING TO FEED YOU YOUR OWN SHRIVELED HUMAN GENITALIA WITH A PAIR OF CHOPSTICKS YOU FUCKING ASSHOLE -
-- theandricGriffade [TG] has joined the chat! --

What.

TG: ooooooh, shit is going down
TG: whos john again, the blue one? i think im missing some of the context here but damn son this is one hellacious smackdown
TG: is this how we spend our spare time in this household, i can be down with this TG: oh wow no we are not doing this right now
TG: youre interrupting his hilarious mental breakdown go bother bro or something and stop saying hellacious thats not even a thing
TG: ive been reading this over your shoulder for like ten minutes now i reserve the right to totally crash this party
CG: ...
TG: i think you broke him, i am actually impressed m not gonna lie
TG: its an art form dont worry well teach you the secret ways of the clan later but right now i need to finish this off before john gets pissed at me
TG: fucking a, man, take it away
TG: yo kitkat dont shut down were not finished here
TG: is this a motherfucking shouty troll challenge you wanna duke it out over john TG: i am so down with sharing my main bro man aint no problem on this end TG: but if you got beef
TG: then lets make brisket
TG: well man is this going to be a thing?
Karkat frantically clicks out of the chat app. His hand flops into his lap, the phone screen flat against his thigh as he stares blankly at the wall.

It's a really nice wall, he decides, floating in a bubble of complete incomprehension. Nothing makes sense, not even the poster advocating the use of safety goggles in the lab, but that's okay because the rest of the world has apparently decided to throw in on the USS Lunacy right along with Karkat. So at least they're all on board with it, right? They're all going to ram into the iceberg of Complete Irrationality and swan dive into the crazy and there's nothing Karkat can do to avert the impending stupidity. Nothing at all.

Okay. Clearly contacting the Dave human was a shitty decision. He'd gone in planning to vet the guy for suitability to be John's new mystery friend, but honestly he has no idea if the bugfuckery he just participated in was a legitimate interrogation, or just Dave running circles around Karkat with flagrant black flirting and deliberately infuriating taunts.

No, that's a lie. He is totally aware that the entire chat misfired from the first line. At no point had Karkat been able to stay on top of the conversation. He just got completely and utterly destroyed.

Little specks of light float around his field of vision. Oops. This must be what going mad feels like.

He doesn't realize he says it out loud until John pats him on the shoulder. "Karkat? I don't think you can really handle Denny's right now. Hey, Karkat, come on, talk to me."

The words just kind of come out. "I have made mistakes in my life, John, but I think that was one of the worst. I don't think I can recover from this." Karkat shakes his head, mouth opening and closing wordlessly for a moment afterward before he clamps it shut. The classroom is basically empty, he notices - the meeting must have wrapped up while Karkat was ensconced in the newly discovered tenth circle of hell - so at least no one is here to see him officially and completely blown away.

"Yeah, Dave can have that effect," John says, with all the appropriate sympathy.

Wait.
Karkat jolts in horror, jaw dropping as he spins to face John. "You - how did you -"

John holds up his own phone, shaking it a little and tapping the darkened screen. The Pesterchum window that appears is full of blue and red text, and oh my fucking god that son of a bitch ratted Karkat out. "Dave is insanely good at texting two people at once," John continues, oblivious to the stupefying rage that leaves Karkat frozen. "He says it's some kind of Strider family secret technique but I think he just says that about anything he doesn't want to admit is just really super nerdy. If you were really so curious about him, you could have just told me, Karkat! He takes a while to get used to!"

Caught. Caught in the act of such a damningly pale overreaction, Karkat can't even try to hide the depths of his mortification. He facepalms with both claws anyway, wishing he could claw the horrible, burning blush out of his cheeks, because he doesn't even have the focus to pull his blood back out of the capillaries anymore. He's drained, emotionally and physically and mentally.

A hand tugs on his wrist, but he resists it. "Leave me alone to die of humiliation, John. This is it. This is the end," Karkat drones, flopping backward on the table with his hands still over his eyes.

"You're being overdramatic, Karkat, it's not that bad!" John says. At least he's not laughing. Karkat cannot handle laughing right now. He can't even handle existence right now. "I know you do the thing where you like to scare off potential douchebags! I promise Dave is usually a lot better than that; I think you startled him. I'm just surprised you figured out Dave's handle so fast!"

It's even worse. John undertands, because of course he's seen Karkat's overprotective hindbrain kick in before, whenever some random fucker approaches John after school or at swim meets and tries to sneak into one of the oblivious dumbass's quadrants. "There was suddenly two of him, John," he tries and fails to explain, lifting his claws and gesturing vaguely at the ceiling. "I just. Why was there two of him?"

John very gently pulls Karkat upright, and Karkat lets him. John somehow ends up with Karkat's backpack as he leads Karkat out of the classroom. Karkat follows. The paint of the lockers is too bright and the patterns on the floor blur and waver in squirming lines that not even repeated blinking clears up. One of John's eyes is a brilliant blue that doesn't go away no matter how much Karkat squints.

Well, at least he has a convenient excuse for why the conversation didn't go as planned. His thinkpan isn't even trying to work right anymore. It threw in the towel, and Karkat just kept barreling on of his own accord.

"Don't worry, I'm sooo going to chew him out later." John keeps supporting Karkat as they exit the building, and gently removes Karkat's keys from his claws when Karkat goes to unlock the car. "Dave can be...hard to deal with. He doesn't really make sense half the time, and you look like you just got overdosed on super irony."

"That's one way of putting it." Karkat bats at John's hands as the human ushers him to the passenger side door. He finally realizes that John is trying to land himself in the driver's seat around the moment John firmly puts the seatbelt in Karkat's hand. "Oh, fuck no, John, you haven't driven in - ever," he protests. "Do you even have a license?"

"Of course I do! I don't have it on me, but we're just going to my house. And this is an emergency." John jogs around the car and sits in the driver's seat. Karkat shakes his head to clear it and stares, torn between bemusement and horror, as John sits on the edge of the seat, the seat pushed in way too much as the human huddles over the steering wheel and pokes at the dashboard tentatively.
This is an awful idea. But he strongly suspects that driving himself could be an even worse idea.

"Don't let me fall asleep," he says. It comes out a lot more pleading than he intends, but his head is already lolling against the headrest in a way that's frankly embarrassing. Karkat leans forward, his head heavy on his palms, and holds his eyelids open. Every breath in takes immense effort, and every breath out is a deep sigh. "Don't lemme fall asleep until we're in a fucking pile at least. Please, John?"

"Do you feel sick? Do you think you're going to throw up? You're really pale, Karkat." The back of a hand presses up against Karkat's forehead, mussing his bangs, and Karkat lets his forehead lean even more weight forward because John. "I think you have a fever, almost. How long have you been feeling this sick?"

"I just wish I could fucking sleep," Karkat says. It's not a whimper, it's not desperate, and John's hand doesn't brush his hair back with infinite care, soothing and dry and cool. "God, I wish I could sleep," he realizes. A hysterical laugh tickles in his throat that he suppresses through the last shreds of his self-control. He wants sleep and he wants to never sleep again.

"You can go to sleep when we get home, okay? It's gonna be okay, Karkat." The car starts with a rumble that rocks Karkat; he can't even work up the energy for apprehension about John's questionable driving skills anymore. There is some nausea as the car slowly inches out of the parking lot. He swallows hard, repeatedly, and remembers he never actually ate his lunch. Has he had anything but toast since this morning? Since last night's dinner, the memory of which is so faded and uncertain that it feels like a fever dream?

"No hospitals," he rasps.

Then he's too far away to hear John's response clearly. His entire head fills with muggy haze and cotton, dark and heavy and pounding with the too-loud thrum of his heartbeat. Even his blood feels foreign in his body, a sensation that leaves Karkat totally disconnected. He closed his eyes at some point, so he can't see John.

Everything is wrong and everything hurts, and he can't even begin to imagine feeling better.

He's fucked up once again.

---

By ten o'clock, they have established that there is nothing more they can do. Rose rigorously applies every filter to her sight that she can, trying and failing to see the white-text being, until her brain aches in protest and she must sit down for a few minutes sipping at water to regain herself. Kanaya contacts her hacker comrade, this Sollux, and every so often her flip phone explodes into an ancient text alert jingle. Each time Kanaya laboriously scrolls through the texts, however, she raises her head and shakes it at Rose - no luck. "He is quite irate about the whole affair," she says after the fourth such outburst from the phone. "I do not believe he is used to coming up against a challenge like this."

Rose raises an eyebrow. "If it imposes on him too much -"

Kanaya merely flips her hand, eyes sparking with amusement. "Oh, no. A good, rigorous challenge will be good for his constitution. He has become far too complacent with his skills of late."

Now, Kanaya sews at her work station, her body an elegant curve in the light of the candles, cloth flung in disarray over numerous surfaces. Rose sits cross legged on the floor and practices a light meditation. She has cleaned up the last of the scattered memories and impressions left over in her mental space, tipping them all into storage to make room for her new structures, and shored up the sun panel that forms her new foundation with thick layers of alarms and wards. She thinks she has them tuned to detect those strange, corrupted Horrorterror voices, but there always remains the potential for a voice to so closely mimic her own that she once again loses sight of herself.

They are no closer than before to knowing how the white-text being not only knew Rose's name and new location, but was able to observe the effects of her unstable temper without being in range of their rather specialized senses. But Rose has calmed herself enough to see that there is not as much urgency as her moment of panic. Yes, there is someone out there who knows far too much; however, they seem content to ply this knowledge for their own ends, rather than exposing her to the public.
For now, she will simply have to be patient.

She used to be so patient. She could listen to John chatter for hours on end, nodding along as she ticked off the boxes in her head, or sit listening to the rain patter along the roof of a still, empty home while she filled the silent beats with the haunting refrain of an off-key note on her violin.

She misses those days with an ever-present ache. The comfortable companionship of being by Kanaya's side eases that seemingly endless frustration and tense anger that fills her mind, but in the calm left behind, Rose is more aware of the aching voids in herself, those hollows that the anger concealed with its tangled ire.

She misses John. She communicates with him, but they still dance around each other; John is understandably wary, and Rose is...herself. The worst part is that she has no idea how to bridge the gap. It seems as though the answer should present itself immediately, a simply solution she can implement that will erase those years of silence and pain. But she doesn't know John well enough for that sort of instinctive leap anymore, and so she continues to miss him even as she enters his chumhandle into the new phone she has acquired and sends out the warning she didn't dare send via Kanaya's compromised computer.

Even after the application loads all of Rose's chatlog archives, though, she sees that John has yet to respond to her messages from this morning. It is not like him to leave a message unopened for more than a few minutes, in her experience. But perhaps the app simply didn't register them before Sollux remotely took command of Kanaya's CPU to begin his investigation. After all, with a glitch in the program allowing a person with no chumhandle to initiate pesterlogs, there's no telling how else the white-text being could have interfered with Rose's account.

TT: John, I am afraid that something has come up once more. It would appear that someone overly familiar with my identity was able to trace my use of Pesterchum on my companion's computer. As such, I had to obtain a personal device, and it took longer than I anticipated.
TT: If you responded to my earlier messages, it doesn't appear to have transferred over. Please resend anything sent from this morning on.
TT: In addition, have you heard anything from your 'bro,' the infamous Mr Strider? He seemed to be having some sort of crisis earlier in the day, for which I received very little context, and he does not seem to have responded either.
TT: ...John?

The silence that ensues confirms all of Rose's quiet fears. She waits and waits, and though John must surely still be at home right now - it's hours earlier in Seattle, after all, and far too early for him to have gone out on patrol - he does not respond. Kanaya looks up more than once with unreadable eyes, and Rose knows her poker face must be slipping.

When he does not respond within the next ten minutes, Rose sets the phone aside, feeling oddly hollow. She leaves that chat open. John will answer, she is sure. John is not the type to vanish without a word. John, after all, is not a Lalonde. No, if he ever intends to cut her off, John would be straightforward and leave no ambiguity. He is both cruel and kind that way. Perhaps the situation with Hemogoblin is still occupying his time; Rose has yet to have the opportunity to look at the Seattle news to see how that had played out.

Speaking of Striders, though. She supposes she may as well try for Dave again; she still has no answers for him, of course, but perhaps he has calmed himself and applied logic to whatever situation led him to jump to such a radical conclusion.

Or, perhaps, he has received confirmation. Rose tries not to think about that possibility, though. When she views herself objectively, she can see that the strain of healing her mind and her relationship with John is more than enough to stretch her to the limits of her strength. Any time she attempts to juggle more than that, such as dealing with her mother's antics or hunting down the white-text being, she risks sending her mind tail spinning into chaos. Without the benefit of her mother's powerful void shielding, the Horrorterrors are never more than a whisper away from the sun ward. Until Rose can consolidate further, she doesn't know that she can handle the kind of mental gymnastics that would be involved in accepting she might have a brother.

It is tiresome. But healing is a slow process, particularly when one is recovering from the festerthroes of a full-fledged grimdark tangle carving out a sea in one's mind. Rose will most likely bear the mental scars forever; it is something she still catches herself struggling to accept, at times. She wants to believe that she can smooth over all the scalloped, bleached-white patterns carved out along the walls of her mind by the bloody brine and the acid waves, but no matter how she sands at the ragged edges, she will eventually have to paint them over and move on.

There is also, she has found, an enormous half-melted spirograph pattern spanning the outer ward of her mind, the space where she tugged John through to help her muster the strength needed to banish the tangle from her mental space back to the Abyss. She cannot remember where the pattern the Horrorterror used to plan its path of destruction through New York City ended up, but it would appear the symbol itself left an imprint across the outer layer of her mind. It does not hurt, and she cannot think of how to remove it without taking down her outer wards entirely, which is simply not an option.

She has so much to heal. So many different concerns that clamor for her attention. For now, she takes up her phone again, breathing in the bracing scent of the candles filling the air and listening to the faint chatter of the sewing machine, and opens a chat with Dave Strider.

If it becomes too much and threatens to overwhelm her, it is not as though she is under any obligation to keep up the conversation, after all. The odds are they are completely unrelated. He is simply an odd new addition to John's social circle, someone Rose must maintain cordial relations with solely for John's peace of mind. Nothing more, nothing less.

TT: There were technological difficulties on my end, which may have deleted any messages sent to me between this morning and now.
TT: Tell me, Dave, are you still gripped by this fanciful notion that we are related, or has a third party assuaged your fears?
TG: oh fuck i forgot about this conversation
TG: awk
TG: uh
TT: Your eloquence never ceases to amaze, Dave.
TG: i will eloquent all over your fucking sass woman TG: yeah we're related

"Kanaya, would you mind reading this message for me? I require secondary endorsement," Rose asks, striving for idle languor, and achieving it. Kanaya sits up from her work, rolling her wrist absently, and holds out her hand for the mobile device without really looking up from the swathe of fabric and neoprene that consumes her desk.

Rose sets the phone in the palm of Kanaya's claw and waits while the troll taps at the screen.

"Should I congratulate you on the news that you possess a human genetic sibling, or is that not the correct sentiment for the occasion?" Kanaya says at last, genuine, polite curiosity in her tone as she passes the phone back over.

"Oh, I'm sure congratulations of some sort will be in order, once I get some evidence," Rose murmurs, resuming the chat with a flurry of her fingers.

TT: That is...not the response I anticipated.
TG: you probs deserve to know we have a clone bro too
TG: not sure but original bro may be hinting were all test tube kids
TG: so
TG: welcome to the clan where everyones a fucking science baby TT: Another brother? As distinct from the elder sibling known as Ambrose?
TG: fuck this is confusing
TG: yeah his name is dave too were trying not to think about it TT: Ah yes, the age-old strategy of gratuitous denial and blithe avoidance. I would applaud if I didn't require my hands at the moment.
TG: might have to stop using bro unless its actually bro
TG: you have no idea how this cuts in on my flow rose TT: Truly, your struggle is genuine.
TG: no just no dont do that
TT: All aboard the group transportation vehicle of futile exertion.
TT: My apologies, that was inexcusably silly. Extrapolate further. Can your elder Bro provide any hard evidence for these supposed extravagant cloning hogwash?
TT: I am of course well aware that my mother would never have made the time commitment to carry me herself, not when it would have taken time and concentration away from her research pursuits, but I assure you that this revelation that other children may have been produced at the same time is...troublingly novel.
TG: hey unlike you and john and your weird guardians bro doesnt lie TG: a lot anyway
TG: hes enigmatic like a fucking enchilada in soviet russia but this whole situation is so far past irony weve warped right back around into serious business
TG: look when he says something like this i believe it he wouldnt dick around here
TT: So he has provided no hard proof that we may share DNA and a lab in common? You are taking this on faith? I find this difficult to accept, Dave, given I have no reason to believe a word your brother says.
TG: look i am currently staring myself in the orange creamsicle face and trust me cloning was a thing
TG: bro has no idea where dave 2.0 came from but he says for sure he had me and you tested separately back when everyone was partying in georgia i guess
TG: dont really see the point in comparing me and me because hello

Oh. Oh. Rose swallows hard, and tastes the absence of alcohol like a physical scrape.
Not just one brother, then. Unless Dave has descended into outright falsehoods for some unfathomably ironic purpose - which she cannot rule out as an option - it would appear that...

No, no. She will be rational about this. She - she will not jump to conclusions.

Even if somewhere deep in the recesses of her mind, a tiny snarl is howling for Rue Lalonde's blood once more.

TG: he may or may not be rage-spamming bio-mom lalonde over the second dave thing
TG: hes been holed up in the puppet den for literally hours since we swore him in and hes got the locks on which means either smuppets or rage
TG: orange me i mean
TG: i wait hang on TG: goddammit

TT: May I request that you pass these DNA results on to me before you become mired in the struggle of utilizing unspecified male pronouns in a three-male household? My only computer appears to be compromised, but a PDF file will load on this brand of phone. I wish to see this for myself, with my own eyes.

TG: fine lady strider you got it
TG: one fine ass DNA comp chart shall be conveyed to your hella sweet mobile shortly
TG: specimencomparison413.pdf
TT: My thanks.

She does not comment on the moniker Lady Strider. That is one of those shrieking thoughts that she lays to rest simply by ignoring it. She opens the file instead. It takes quite a while to load the entirety of the file through the spotty data connection that covers Kanaya's apartment complex, but eventually Rose has a miniature view of a chart with not the usual four main columns, but five. Two columns have been labeled 'child sample' rather than just one, and Rose scans the alleles that were called for this long ago test.

She scans the numbers herself, and if there is any doubt about her interpretation, the fifth row confirms it all. The locus for physical gender is different - color-coded a garishly stereotypical pink and blue that alternates across each column - but that is really it. Occasionally the female and male child samples swap numbers, but those genes always correspond to alleles carried by the parent of the opposite gender.

DNA reports never simply state the result outright, of course, and this chart is all the more complex because the two children, each with their unique blend of the parental genetic source material, do not match exactly. They're not identical twins. But by the end, the text states that the 'alleged relationships are not excluded.'

Under the assumption that all the DNA samples involved belong to the people Ambrose claims they do (and that is quite the assumption), Rose must accept that either someone mocked up a very good DNA test to fool her and Dave into believing this, or they are in fact siblings.

There is, however, one final note beneath the statement of results.

'Unknown ectobiological contamination in (4) of 4 samples tested. Retesting recommended.'

A flood of relief mixes into the disbelief circulating in Rose's mind. That line is just suspicious enough to cast a shadow on the legitimacy of the whole venture.

TT: And this ectobiological contamination? Why on earth would this be present? Ectobiology is a matter of carapacian reproduction, not human.
TG: hell if i know
TG: bro just grunted at me when i asked which means he doesnt know shit either but i bet my fucking turntables its our powers
TT: Pardon?
TG: you do the lighty thing and the tentacle thing and i do the time thing you really think that doesnt harsh on our genes?
TG: bet you its all an alien conspiracy secretly were all homegrown in carapacian space labs
TG: this is more plausible every time i think about it what a fucking awesome origin story
TT: An intriguing hypothesis. And how do you explain the contamination seemingly present in our...genetic donors' samples as well?
TG: i am totally willing to believe bros puppet thing is a thing
TG: no man is that emotionally invested in mechanical plush rumps without some kind of psychic connection TG: youve never noticed anything weird about your mom like whoa hold your horses thats not a normal human thing my weird-shit-o-meter is off the charts?

Shit.

Don't believe anything until you can test the hypothesis yourself, Rose chants inwardly, focusing on her breathing until the potential panic is under her control again. This PDF means nothing ultimately. If she chooses to follow up on this, she will obtain her own DNA samples and find a lab unaffiliated with anyone connected to her mother, and only then will Rose be willing to accept all this as fact.

Breathe. Breathe.

And don't think about the hollow void that is Rue Lalonde's soul, a black hole that is the opposite of a 'normal human thing' according to her weird-shit-o-meter.

TT: I will have to get back to you on that, though I have zero intention of speaking to Rue Lalonde ever again. If you wish to investigate this further I am willing to offer my own assistance. This is a matter in which I obviously have reason to be concerned.
TG: fuck man and i thought me and bro had a shitty relationship
TG: but now here we are all holding hands and singing disney songs over a bloodstone altar like one big happy family while we induct orange me into the fucking cult
TG: everything tastes like soap and regret and i think bro made new dave chug like half my apple juice supply
TG: its not natural dammit
TT: How wonderful. I am sincerely pleased that you seem to have achieved balance with your delightful Strider clan over this new addition. My congratulations.
TG: wait was that you being mad i cant tell TG: you and bio-mom is this some serious shit like TG: if you
TG: shittt
TG: if you need a place to stay
TT: I am quite fine where I am now, though the stumbling offer is appreciated. I am as far from our mother as I needed for my peace of mind.
TT: And I see that you have regained your own stability. At the least you seem to have adjusted to the notion that you have two new siblings with alacrity.
TG: dont see the point in letting this shit get to me anymore
TG: i kind of lost my shit for a while there but fuck that noise i am so chill right now
TG: i am so unbelievably well-adjusted rose you have no idea
TG: have to set an example for new striders amirite cant let dave 2.0 out-straight face me when he doesnt even have the inaugural shades yet
TG: and of course johns troll issue apparently got resolved which is a fucking relief because he nearly had a hero crisis over there at the same time and i dont think the kid is handling all the stress very well

Damn.

Damn.

TT: John has been in contact with you, then?
TG: he hasnt with you?
TG: well shit
TG: there was some shit with the hero partner and the shouty troll friend one right after the other
TT: I am familiar with the Hemogoblin situation as it stood last night, before I departed from our mother's company. As I said, technical difficulties since then have prevented me from getting back in contact with John. Something was wrong with Karkat?
TG: heh
TG: okay i was the douche responsible for that last one TG: it was me
TG: but hey in all fairness he came at me first TT: I thought John had determined it best that we not involve his moirail in this heroic coven of ours, given he has no idea what John is?
TG: the moirail is the diamond one right
TG: fucking trollmance no wonder john got all defensive TG: seriously tho he pestered me first i just engaged in conversation like a totally normal human being would because he started asking questions about john TT: And you two naturally bonded over your many interests in common, including but not limited to friendship with John, and participated in the traditional 'bro fist bumps,' correct? That is the only way I can see this scenario playing out well.
TG: what no
TG: where do you even come up with this shit is this a tentacle woman psychiatrist thing
TT: Dave.
TG: look long story short other me got involved
TG: dude was not prepared for a 2xstrider combo and got all fainty?
TG: so Johns a little pissy about the whole thing but the kid doesnt really know how to hold grudges so im in the clear for now TT: Karkat fainted? John has never given the impression that his inadvertent pale interest was prone to such things.
TG: kid couldnt even throw down properly he was so tired
TG: he didnt really do a pirouette off the handle as much as flail wildly and flop over like a dead fish
TG: dont tell john but i think his troll guy is just a drama queen who cant argue for shit
TT: Ah, so your latent jealousy over the fact that this rival for John's brotonic affections overwhelmed your better judgment and you proceeded to antagonize him to point of collapse? How mature, Dave.
TG: that is so not what happened okay
TG: i told you he yelled at me first and i gave him the standard rage-anon run around until i realized who he was TG: which was apparently too late oops
TT: I will have to make my own inquiries. If John is still speaking with me, that is.
TT: I did not intend to extend my silence by another twelve hours, but the situation was unavoidable. Our relationship is tenuous enough without these breaks...
TG: look if john aint answering hes still probs dealing with the karkat thing TG: sounds like he and the blood guy were out until late in the morning fixing that whole explosion thing and by the time he got to school he was too distracted to answer messages so it's not anything you did TG: probably
TT: I see. That is more reassuring than you know.
TG: well not like i can just leave a strider sis hanging like that when john is in the wind TG: g2g now though i have a carapacian dame i need to finally rip some answers out of TG: its like a perverse obsession now i know she wont give a fucking straight answer but i just keep asking.
TT: You go, Dave. You lay down those phat beats.
TG: please never do that again
TT: You cannot handle what I am throwing down, Dave? Perhaps I should redeem Karkat's honor, in John's name, by quite thoroughly putting you in your place. Do you believe that would get me in good with John's 'posse,' then?
TG: fuck im outta here

"Rose. It is done." Kanaya's voice comes soft and low, as careful as always about interrupting a conversation, but Rose is quite content to let Dave retreat with his tail between his legs. She looks up and smiles in acknowledgement. Kanaya raises the cloth in her claws and nods Rose over with a dip of her chin. "Come here."

Rose puts the phone down and obliges, padding over to Kanaya's side and draping herself across the troll's shoulders as she takes in the orange and gold, the stylized suns that emblazon the sleeves. Parts of the ensemble are still buried beneath the jacket, but she can see where Kanaya is going with this.

She had known from Kanaya's choice of patterns and hastily altered seams that it would not resemble her old costume. Kanaya had sewn this in the space of an afternoon, so this is only a rough product. But Kanaya had also been the one to design Rose's original outfit; to her, crafting a uniform that is simultaneously a work of art and a defensible outfit suited to a night of strenuous crime-fighting is simple.

No matter how it fits, it will do for the night.

"It is a change from your old style. But I thought perhaps you might like to turn over a new leaf, at least while you spend your time here," Kanaya says carefully, tugging and smoothing at the hem of one sleeve until it lies the way she wants it. "There was no time to integrate the Kevlar as I envisioned, so the lines may not lie right with the vest separate. But I will not have you wander the streets without it."

Rose hums, biting her lip, and then smiles. "Mmmm. Alas. Let me change, and we'll see if your fashion sensibilities can stand the small defects." She pressed a kiss to Kanaya's cheek, the faint scent of sealed face paint coming away on her lips. "Your judgment will not doubt be as impeccable as always, Kanaya. Time to shake things up."

Kanaya's grin has some bite to it, and she snakes an arm up around Rose's neck. "Let me help you change?"

Ah, the welcome hazards of sleeping with a seamstress.

John never does text her back. She worries.

Rose has always hunted in daylight. But she no longer reserves her nights for mediation with the Horrorterror; that truce has been shot, its carcass left to rot in the streets with the rest of the bodies they no longer show on the news reports, and her new policy of outright denying them a place in her mind has completely readjusted her sleep schedule.

Still, she thinks, as she buckles the Kevlar vest into place, fighting crime as the Seer of Light once again will be an...interesting experience. She won't have the same advantage of having the sun in the sky, but the sun has never been that critical to her powers. She is fully capable of generating her own light sources at will.

Or at least, so she hopes. It has been weeks since that day in New York, and this will be the first time Rose sets out to do more than utilize her extra sight. The first time she accesses her lighter magic in the name of justice since she so horribly violated her precepts in New York City. She has no way to predict how her mind will react to this. But she does not intend to stray far from the Sylph's side. This is, after all, Kanaya's city; the last time Rose visited, she always made sure to stay close out of respect for the Malachite Sylph's territorial claims.

The shoulders of the burnt orange jacket don't sit quite right when she shrugs it on over the vest, which she knows will bother Kanaya to no end. But everything else fits perfectly, from the high-low hem of the golden skirt trimmed with orange to the thigh high stockings that end just inches from where the shorts under the skirt cut off. There are tiny suns on the upper sleeves of the jacket, and a larger insignia across the back, flipped so that it is centered where the sun used to be on the front of her old uniform. She highly suspects that Kanaya has had this costume in the works for far longer than she has been letting on; Rose knows that while Kanaya plies her trade in her everyday life tailoring mundane clothing, heroic fashion is far more her forte, and she no doubt has designs for every major hero in the country lying around here somewhere.

The last item is a mask. Though Rose hesitates, stroking a thumb over the front of the fabric, she can already tell why Kanaya provided this. This doesn't resemble the flimsy strip of golden cloth that obscured her eyes previously. This is a mask that will cover her whole face, thin enough for her to breathe but quite obviously a modified ski mask. It has little of Kanaya's trademark elegance in design; this is meant for functionality alone.

Kanaya wants to hide Rose's facial structure, because the tangle everyone calls Dark Star rampaged through New York with its face completely exposed. The distortion from the grimdark aura and the way its power had burned through Rose's stolen eyes and mouth gave her some leeway, in that no one has yet connected the tangle to the Seer, but it would still be only a matter of time before conspiracy theorists realized just how similar in body type and face New York's defender and destroyer were. They already wonder in public forums why the Seer did nothing at all to rescue civilians that day, and why three out-of-town heroes had to intervene while New York's heroine was conveniently absent. Anything Rose can do to minimize that risk of discovery is a grim necessity.

She pulls on the mask, her hair plastering to her skull in a thoroughly unpleasant, tight cap, and she draws up the hood of her jacket to hide the singularly unattractive mask. There are paler, thinner diamonds of fabric over her eyes so that, with the aid of her extra senses, she can see as clearly as if the mask weren't there at all.

Kanaya's jaw tightens the moment Rose steps out from behind the cherry wood changing screen, and she strides forward to pluck at the sleeves with a snort of fury. "That vest," she growls, her eyes gleaming more yellow than green. "Oh, there are so many adjustments this needs -"

Rose places a hand over Kanaya's, squeezing it gently as she steps into Kanaya's personal space. "Hush, Kanaya. Not right now. This is just a trial run, anyway," she says, smiling. Then she realizes that with the mask, her expressions will be nearly unrecognizable, and the smile drops. Her face already itches with prickles of sweat as she tilts her head to the side and worries the edge of the mask with her free hand. She debates whether or not to take it off.

Kanaya just sighs and tugs Rose's hand away from the mask with a reproving shake of her head. "If I can put up with this catastrophe of a jacket, you can put up with the mask."

"Agreed," Rose says. She turns Kanaya's claw over and kisses the palm. The brush of fabric on skin is completely unsatisfying. "Shall we?"

Kanaya grins. Her smiles have grown progressively more feral and aggressive over the course of the evening, and Rose gets the feeling that she is most certainly dealing more Sylph than Kanaya at the moment. Kanaya is nothing if not an avid auspice when night comes; by now she must be eager to get out and start smacking the criminal deviants of Philadelphia until they stop trying to victimize everyone else in the damn city. At least, that is how Rose has always envisioned Kanaya's thought process works. "Oh, let's."

The Sylph exits her apartment via the roof. She does not live on the top floor, so they take the emergency stairwell rather than the inner stairs to avoid crossing paths with Kanaya's neighbors. When they reach the roof, a gust of cool night air billows through the open front of Seer's jacket, and she shivers. Thinking about the breeze makes her think of John, but she sets the pang of regret that stirs up aside for now. Seer has never worked with Heir. If she can just fall deeply enough into the Seer mindset, she's sure she can cast a veil over the many, many issues currently troubling her everyday self.

The Malachite Sylph is nearly radiant, her sealed daytime paint exchanged for a much lighter hue that almost exposes her too-pale skin. It's just another way she differentiates herself from her day-to-day persona. In sharp contrast to the pearly grey of her paint, Sylph's jumpsuit is a dark black-grey, the color of freshly charred ashes, the sleeves and corset lined with a shade of green that is just a shade darker than Kanaya's true blood color. Yet another subtle way of disorienting anyone attempting to piece together her identity. Her gloves and snug leggings that finish out the ensemble are a violent shade of electric purple - very avant-garde. Her horns arch up through slits in the dark grey hood, but a seamless prosthetic is attached to the tip of each, altering the shape so that Kanaya's single hooked horn matches the other and hiding the asymmetry that is almost as rare in troll horns as jade blood itself.

She also has a cape. Rose has never quite understood the inclination of some heroes who favor capes (hoods are another thing entirely), but for Sylph at least, it serves as a fashion statement. It is a dramatic look, but she can pull it off with perfect grace and poise. Rose made an argument for the inconvenience of having one's cape used against one in the heat of battle, in a strictly hypothetical context, once.

Once.

"Anywhere in particular you would like to begin?" Seer asks, wishing she could visibly raise an eyebrow. "Perhaps we could stop by the shop, and run off any vandals before they can work themselves up into a hemoist frenzy."

Sylph stands still, motionless in a way that always sets off an inkling of wariness in Seer's hindbrain, the stillness of a predator with her head cocked to one side, scenting the air. With Kanaya, it is easy to accept her rainbow-drinking tendencies because she medicates herself, always lacing her teas and lattes with the blood she needs to sustain her as discreetly as possible, and hones her perfect awareness of her body into a confident, sleek poise. The Sylph is the one who channels all of that latent power, the strange vampiric instincts born of her blood mutation, into action. It would never do to forget that the woman by her side could, in another time and place, have easily chosen to hunt the streets rather than clean them up.

Kanaya trusts Seer to keep her in check almost as much as Rose trusts Sylph to restrain her.

She doesn't understand why they don't work together more often. She vaguely recalls her own drunken, sloppy arguments to the contrary, but it is still difficult to extricate which arguments were hers and which stemmed from the shrieking voices she could no longer discern from her own.

"No," Sylph says at last, her shoulders shrugging as she cracks her neck with a twist of her jaw. She lets a claw trace the outline of a dark green lipstick case strapped to her upper thigh, but shakes her head again. "No. I have already removed most of the more valuable items to my home, and the place is already in shambles. One more night of their hooliganism will not do much more damage. I don't intend to replace everything until the insurance comes in later, anyway."

Something in Seer itches for vengeance. It's not fair that Kanaya faces this sort of treatment, that she always puts on such a stolid mask while trolls tear her down again and again for loving what she has chosen as her life's work. People are fools if they can't see how hypocritical it is to claim that hemoism is dead when someone as hardworking and good as Kanaya must replace the windows of her shop on a near weekly basis over the color of her blood.

But vengeance is one of those emotions Seer can't afford to let loose in her mind - it calls to the faint murmurs of the Furthest Ring, perking their interest. She turns it aside gently and funnels it into the storage box until her mind is silent and balanced once more. The void braces under the sleeves of her jacket (yet another addition that had made Kanaya gripe) weigh as heavily as ever.

"I profess that I am curious, however," Sylph continues, stepping up to the edge of the roof and surveying the city. "Generally I wander as needed. But I know you use your sight to determine which would be the most fortuitous patrol path at any given moment. Can you still do that, without the sun?"

Seer smirks and steps beside the troll hero, looking out over the lights of the city with nothing more than her regular vision.

She raises a hand and snaps her fingers, and bright sunbursts of light overlay the darkness of the sky. Her breath catches in her lungs; her eyes burn, unused to the strain of activating such a complex spell after weeks of slacking off.

But the Horrorterrors do not stir. Her mind remains balanced. And she knows with effortless intuition what type of crime and the degree of urgency that each shade of light indicates as she scans the town.

The Seer of Light is back in business.

"Hmmm. Which would you like?" she pretends to muse aloud. "The robbery four streets over, or a mugging to the south of the university?"

Sylph laughs, just a hint of Kanaya's sillier giggle mixed into the smooth, low chuckle, and that's when Seer knows they will fight together just fine. "A robbery? In my neighborhood? How rude of them." Sylph flips her hand with a flourish and offers it to Seer, her finely honed claws still half-curled until Seer accepts it with an answering grin. "But of course - why not both?"

"Both is good. Both would be excellent," Seer laughs. Knowing that the Sylph prefers to traverse the city under her own power, she then releases their clasped hands and stands back to watch as the troll leaps from a standstill, easily gliding from their roof to the next with her cape flaring out behind her. Seer waits, and then closes her physical eyes altogether. With the fine weave of the mask over them, they can't do much, anyway.

Trusting to her other sight, she focuses in on that starburst of a robbery in her mind, and murmurs the teleportation spell.

And then she is gone.

Her estimation is a little off. She excuses the lapse in that she isn't as familiar with the layout of Philadelphia as she is - was - with New York City. The robbery is occurring more like six streets over, near the hospital off 9th Street, but the Sylph catches up within moments of Seer sending up a short signal flare. Malachite Sylph makes no comment, simply nodding when Seer murmurs an apology, and together they look down at the pharmacy below. Seer squints into the blazing glare until she slaps herself inwardly and switches back to a lower power level, shutting down the glare that only she can see and illuminating the street below with a flat light.

"Three heartbeats," Sylph reports, kneeling as she tilts her head to the side, her gaze distant. "All of them elevated." She sighs. "I'd need to be able to smell them directly to get an idea of their exact blood color - but at least one human, one colder blood. The third is indeterminate enough to be human or midblood."

"That's enough to work with," Seer says, flicking her fingers and opening the storage in her mind to draw forth more of her spells. The light magic should be safe enough to start layering into her new mental structures, but she carefully leaves anything related to explosions and blasting buried deep in the sand. No need to tempt any lingering triggers in her psyche with the spells that the grimdark tangle most perverted to its own ends. But those old spells for corroding iron and disintegrating wood fall under the heading of neutral magic, the kind of spells anyone with the talent and a grimoire could attempt.

"Leave the coldblood to me. It'll be the one most likely to require...extra force," Sylph continues, thumbing at the lipstick pocket again. Seer can practically feel the urge to whip out the makeupkind that radiates off the other hero, and - she worries.

But she trusts Kanaya. And she trusts in the entire bottle of dull orange-brown blood Kanaya downed before they left the apartment. The Malachite Sylph has been defending the streets of Philadelphia without slipping up and biting anyone for the entirety of her heroic career; of the two of them, Seer is the one at risk of losing control.

"I'll take the human, then," Seer says, lifting her hands from her sides. The gleam of a corrosion spell rests in one palm, while the other readies itself to help cast the teleportation spell again. "And the first one to the indeterminate blood type wins."

"Agreed." The Sylph tumbles off the roof in a controlled flip, her legs arcing out through the air as she catches herself on the pharmacy sign, landing noiselessly in a crouch when she lets go.

Then she kicks out with her boot and smashes in the front window. So much for the element of surprise. Seer facepalms, because she knows Sylph and yet she still somehow failed to anticipate the fact that while Kanaya may be the picture of demure elegance, the Sylph enjoys chainsaws and dismantling the hemohierarchy in four inch heels.

It's pretty much the basis of their relationship, after all.
Seer snaps in and lands two steps from the counter. This isn't a pharmacy in a convenience store, so the space is much more enclosed, but as she scans the room she sees two of the robbers have moved to the back room, while the third is standing guard. It's a troll whose glittering teal blue eyes widen as Sylph punches him in the face with a hissing roar. He topples over backwards, slamming into the counter and scrabbling to catch himself, knocking brochures and a jar of pens over. Sylph follows him down like a glowering one-troll thundercloud, cracking him across the jaw with another right hook and then punctuating her rage with more punches. "WE! DO NOT! ROB! STORES!"

"M'sorry!" the troll yells back, his nose quite thoroughly smashed with the force of the Sylph's strikes and one horn punching through the cheap material of the counter. They have slid to the ground completely, surrounded by fallen pens, and little flecks of blood from his nose have begun to speckle the ground. He looks quite justifiably horrified.

"SORRY IS NOT GOOD ENOUGH!" Sylph shrieks, snarling with all her teeth and punching him in the stomach. She then seizes him by the hair and head-butts him between the horns, a typical ashen gesture weaponized. "YOU MUST PROMISE TO ALTER YOUR DESTRUCTIVE PATTERN OF DEVIANT CRIMINAL BEHAVIOR AND COMMIT TO REHABILITATING YOUR LIFE FOR THE GREATER GOOD!"

"Oh god my eye!"

"YOUR BLACK RELATIONSHIP WITH THE REST OF THE CIVILIZED WORLD IS UNHEALTHY FOR BOTH OF YOU! DESIST AT ONCE."

Shooshing and papping and softer feelings jams are reserved for the pale quadrant. In the arena of auspisticizing, on the other claw, Sylph has mastered the more ashen technique of punching someone in the face until they stop being violently irrational idiots, and applied it on a city-wide scale. Her preternatural strength and speed granted by her rainbow-drinker blood condition allow her to implement this strategy even on higher bloods who would usually be able to fend off ashen interventions from a middle green blood like Kanaya.

She really only breaks out the chainsaw when someone truly tests her patience.

But of course, Seer has her own work to do here. And Sylph's characteristic violence always draws attention, she thinks, smirking as a human and a squat troll with yellow-green eyes run out from the back of the pharmacy. The human has a pistolkind specibus clutched loosely in one hand, as he surveys the room to find the source of the commotion, but Sylph and her temporary ashen quadrant are concealed by the counter, so his eyes meet Seer's instead.

She casts out a hand and corrodes the pistol before he can do more than gape at her like a stunned fish. She can't see any weapon in the troll's hand, extra sight or not, so she focuses on the human for now. Raising both hands, glowing with the light of spells, Seer curls her fingers. "Well?" she asks. "Trust me, you're not getting away with this. Will you surrender?"

The human raises his hand, and only then realizes that his gun is slowly flaking away into rust and corroded, cracked chunks of metal that disintegrate even as he flings it away. It's not as though the corrosion spell affects human flesh, but he doesn't need to know that, now does he? "Who the hell are you?!!" he demands, taking a step back toward the back room.

"The Seer of Light." Seer teleports forward. It's a reckless gesture, but she's flying high now, the thaumaturgic buzz humming through her veins, and she has effortless control of where she lands, total comprehension of where she should be for the best possible outcome. She clenches a fist and releases it before the human's eyes, holding the other out to the side and letting loose a flare of light from both, bright enough to blind. Both human and troll robbers scream and clap their hands to their eyes. She didn't emit enough light to blind them permanently, but they're quite incapacitated, now. The troll in particular, with his superior night vision, bends over double, clawing at his eyelids.

"Your shit is wrecked," she adds, and then she kneels the troll in the face. He was just so conveniently placed. She kicks him backwards and seizes the human next, bringing up her hand in a palm heel to shove precisely into his solar plexus. It only takes another filter on her sight to highlight all the pressure points in his body, after all.

She has a stunner incantation on her lips before she even realizes what she's muttering.

She reaches the fifth syllable before she realizes that isn't a stunning spell, that's not a spell at all, what am I saying -

"Fuck," she spits, and then she shuts it all down. The light, her extra sight, everything. She doesn't know what fresh hell she was about to unleash with those garbled words that hadn't been a spell she recognized, but it stops when she clamps her mouth shut and hunches forward, head spinning at the sudden loss of perspective.

It sounds like a child now, curious and ingenuous.

Seer swallows down the helplessness that rises in her throat. This is not going to stop. This is never going to stop, is it? She's known that since she was small, when her mother first sat her down and explained why Jaspers wouldn't wake up - this connection to the Horrorterrors is simply a part of her. She can't even feel the bleed of cold, damp horror that must surely be trickling into her mind, not without shutting down her outward senses entirely.

But she can't just leave Sylph fighting alone, and she can't leave herself unconscious in the heat of battle when there are still two criminals up and about.

If she wants to continue on the path she has chosen for her life's work, she has to learn to fight in spite of this.

"Enough," she says through gritted teeth. She rips the appropriate words for a true stunning spell out of storage with deliberate intent, slicing into her own mind with exquisite pain as she cuts everything away but the words of that spell and that spell alone. Nothing can interfere with it now.

Her problem was her haste. She reached for the stunner without even pausing to consider the action, and so the grimdark had been able to slip other words onto her tongue. When she presses a palm with cautious care to the human's forehead, her breath shaky and panting, he drops like a stone. Easy, she thinks, stepping over his unconscious body to check his pulse. Easy. Be slow when you need to be, or all is lost.

She must always be in control. She must always think first, consider all of her options, and ensure that her thoughts and intuitions are her own before acting on them.

She must never lose sight of herself.

A voice whines, and she feels the touch of grimdark on the sun panel like slime sizzling on the surface of a stovetop. It gives a wail when she breathes in, flares a beacon in her own mind, and quickly steps back out of the mental landscape before her muscles relax.

She has to agree though. She is tired of this.
The troll has begun to recover from the shock and swear at her - he has no creativity at all. Again, Seer coldly slices away the rest of her own mind before pronouncing the stunning spell and touching her fingers to his head. His eyes roll back and he slumps over backwards, landing half on the human robber with a thump.

A quarantine system, then, she thinks, closing her eyes and looking inward. All is quiet, and the sun panel burns along the floor of her mind, cutting off the ebb and flow of the grimdark tide. There is no sign of tendrils or contamination anywhere that Seer looks, but she patiently scans it all anyway.

The only wounds are those she inflicted herself, the sharp edges where her new mental structures were cut loose and shoved aside to clear a quarantine zone for the stunning spells to filter through. She'll have to build around that, now, and healing the damage she did herself will be the work of hours of meditation.

But on the other hand, nothing blew up.

This is quite possibly the lowest Seer's standards for performance while on the job have ever fallen.

But nothing blew up. Neither of the robbers are seriously injured, taken down with all of Seer's usual finesse in spite of her momentary pause.

Sylph rises up from in front of the counter a moment later, not even bothered by the flecks of teal streaking her sharp cheekbones. "He has agreed to testify against his former companions in a court of law, and to dedicate his life to community service for the next five years," she informs Seer, tugging on the front of her corset to adjust it.

"Thank goodness," Seer replies, smoothing her face over so the last of her panic is hidden. There is no need to worry Sylph unnecessarily, not when Seer regained control so quickly. She can do this. She can. "They were clearly enabling his injurious relationship with society."

Sylph nods sagely, and then peers over the counter. "Ah. I thought they smelled too calm to be conscious."

"And I win the first round this night," Seer says, stepping away from the two unconscious robbers. There is a phone on the wall behind the counter, and she lifts it, dialing 911. "2-1. Better watch out."

Sylph sniffs, lounging with her elbows on the counter, arms crossed. "This is my city, Seer."

"Oh, I know," Seer agrees, smiling as the phone rings. She holds the phone out. "Which is obviously why the duty of speaking to the 911 operator...should fall to you. I would never think to impose..."

Sylph makes a face that is distinctly unheroic, and it is Kanaya who sticks out her tongue before taking the phone. "You are awful. Why do I love you?"

Seer looks away, bending to zip-tie her downed criminals' hands and claws together in an intricate knot. All the better to hide the faint blush flushing her cheeks. "I haven't the faintest. I strongly suspect you only want me for my body."

"Oh, obviously." The sarcasm layers heavily in Kanaya's voice. Seer just smiles to herself, and hums when Sylph abruptly drops the flirting and monotonously informs the 911 operator about a break-in and attempted robbery.

She thinks they're going to be alright.

The rest of the night goes without incident. Seer pinpoints each crime and they deal with them based on just how violent and urgent each flare of light feels to Seer's senses. Occasionally she can sense that Sylph wants to take off and take care of an incident on her own, split the two of them up so they can cover more ground, and normally Seer would be happy to oblige.

But after that slip earlier, she thinks it best to stay near Sylph. Even when the other hero thumbs longingly at the lipstick case, Seer doesn't say a word, and they continue on together.

After extricating a pair of teenagers from an alcohol-induced crash that could have ended a lot worse, they agree to call it a morning. The sky is still a rich, midnight blue, but Seer can feel the sun's light burgeoning just below the horizon, and Sylph has a refined sense of when sunrise is. Her paler makeup is fine in the night, when it lends her an aura of mystery, but Sylph doesn't fight during the day without far more precautions about her identity.

They stop by Kanaya's shop front along the way. No more damage has been done since yesterday, but Rose cringes to see the ceiling tiles that have been torn down, and the shattered glass that still litters the floor from the broken front windows. The door barely hangs on its hinges.

People are cruel.

They go home and within minutes have collapsed, asleep. Kanaya sleeps like the dead, but Rose is dozing, still unused to being awake so late, and perhaps that's why she doesn't feel rested at all when she feels her mother arrive a few hours later.

At first, Rose isn't sure what it is she's sensing. There are certain souls her mind can recognize and track anywhere, regardless of her mental state - John and Kanaya being the only examples who come to mind, really. Perhaps she will have to meet with Dave in person, if only because some part of her, the portion of her mind most convinced by that flimsy DNA report, insists that she know the soul of her brother. After all, who knows what kind of stupidity he could get up to without her guidance and forbearance - he seems like an impetuous piece of work.

But what wakes Rose early in the morning, after merely an hour or so of drowsing slumber, when the sun is still low and Kanaya's shallow breathing stirs the sheets, is something that is not. Rose lets her eyes slide open as she zones into that other sight, groggy enough with sleep she's not used to getting that she has to shake her head to stop drifting back to Kanaya's brilliant flare. There's someone outside, someone who is nothing more than a hollow outline of crackling darkness and the faintest whiff of alcohol gone stale -

The hatred hits seconds before the realization, a snarl of raw fury that rips through Rose as she shoves the vision away. She kicks her legs free of the disordered bedclothes, one of the blankets slumping to the floor, and has to sit there for a moment, panting with the rage that threatens to overwhelm her.

Her antics wake Kanaya, naturally. The sheets twist and the faint gleam of too-bright flesh flashes in the quiet light of the morning as a claw rests on Rose's arm. "Rose?"

"My mother," she says, forcing her voice to settle into a manageable, light sort of dispassion that reveals nothing of the turmoil raging in her mind. Everything is in chaos, now, and she doesn't know that her new mental structures will survive this tempest. "She appears to have found me sooner than I anticipated."

That's wrong. Rose closes her eyes and hisses out a breath. Tell the truth. Don't lose sight of it. "That's not right. I didn't expect her to come at all."
Kanaya hums, a low vibration of apprehension and suppressed, cold anger on Rose's behalf, and her grip tightens on Rose's arm. "She is your ancestor," the troll offers lightly, though the normalcy has already left her tone. "It is only logical that she would seek a wayward descendent, whether you appreciate it or not."

"Logical for any other guardian, perhaps." Rose extricates herself from the last of the blankets, setting her bare feet to the floor. Kanaya maintains her hold, but has to shift to follow Rose when she turns. "Rue, however, has proven perfectly willing to leave me to my own devices for years on end. I had thought."

"You thought the trend would continue." Kanaya keeps that hand there, her shaped claws pricking at Rose's skin in a way that is not unpleasant. The other creeps up to squeeze Rose's shoulder, while Kanaya presses up against her back, her chin edging in the crook between Rose's shoulder and neck. "Understandable. Personally, I'm rather at a loss in matters concerning the bond between humans and their ancestors. But perhaps she simply wishes to act as a proper custodian, now, in some misguided attempt at correcting for earlier deficits."

Rose snorts, but she clasps Kanaya's creeping hand firmly. She remembers Kanaya tipping over a pale bottle at the sink, and the resurgent desire for a drink spikes. Gods, the last thing Rose wants to deal with while sober is her mother. No doubt Rue Lalonde is well on her way to pickling her liver, this early in the morning, and will be boisterously tipsy just to mock Rose's desperate thirst.

But now that she's here, Rue won't back down. She approached Rose for this confrontation, no matter how content she seems at the moment to hover by the front door, not bothering to ring the buzzer. Since she initiated, she won't be able to back off without losing face. Rose could let her stew there all day, conceivably, and the thought is tempting.

But not meeting her mother's challenge would be just as much an admission of defeat. And Kanaya doesn't deserve to deal with Rue Lalonde staggering about on a bender outside her place of residence all day long. It would be unseemly. What would the neighbors think?

"She merely wishes me back under her thumb, no doubt," Rose sighs, letting her head roll back and to the side as Kanaya nuzzles at her neck, the faintest bite of fangs on her skin. "My leaving must have been too much for her. It would have been another matter altogether if the situation were reversed, and she left me."

It hurts to say. But it is what it is.

"How charming," Kanaya murmurs. "Mmm. I have a proposition which may interest you."

"Do tell."

"Of course, I am certain that by the terms of your ongoing strife, backing down or ignoring this challenge altogether would be objectionable." When Rose nods, Kanaya smiles against her neck. "The key then, is to cause her to wait just long enough that she understands it is a deliberate insult. I believe I have some idea of how to pass the time."

Rose's breath catches. "That," she says, "is not objectionable in the slightest." As she turns to Kanaya and hooks an arm around her neck, Rose thinks that yes, Rue Lalonde can wait. Rose wants nothing to do with her; she wants Rue to be less than nothing to her. And the first step towards that will be forming new bonds, so that she can sever any that might still exist between her and Rue without looking back.

One day, Rose hopes she won't even need the void bracers on her wrists, these last chains binding her to Rue Lalonde's good graces. She wouldn't dare test the sun ward on its own, not when she still understands so little about the source of its power, and how it links to John. But one day, she won't need it anymore.

She just needs this. Just this.

Dave and Dave are halfway home when Bro finally shows his ugly mug.

"What the actual fuck," he says flatly, walking out of an alleyway with his hands in his pockets, as though he hasn't just dropped out of the sky with no prior warning. His hat is slightly off-center and that says a lot right here. "For fuck's sake, Dave, you can keep the apple juice, just tell me why you're walking home through morning traffic with a neon orange you."

"Great, more people in sunglasses," Dave-too mutters. Dave sees him drawing the tarp closed with the faint shuffle of feathers on canvas. Not that a flimsy square of fabric could hide a pair of huge-ass orange wings, or the orange tint to his skin, or the feathers sticking up out of his hair, or - no, seriously, how the fuck has Dave-too been laying low? Dave can't believe no one has ever caught sight of a creamsicle-colored bird kid and called the cops, at least. And with a police department as paranoid as Houston PD, a bird person would no doubt have been plastered across the evening news with a message begging someone, anyone to turn him in so the police could get on to dealing with regular crime again.

But on the other hand, hey. It would seem that for once, Dave is the one who knows something Bro doesn't.

Hell. Yes.

'This guy?' He tilts his head at Dave-too. He wishes he could nonchalantly hook his hands in his pockets to pull off the air of 'zero fucks,' but he kind of still needs them to talk. 'He's Dave. Something wrong, Bro?'

Bro's nostrils flare, which is basically the equivalent of anyone else flipping a table. "Oh my god, you're going to be a little shit about this, aren't you."

'I have a biological sister who turns into a tentacle monster that you only decided to tell me about yesterday,' Dave signs, allowing himself a small smirk. Inwardly, he is basking in the glory. Basking, dammit. 'See how it feels?' Seriously, he can't wait to pull this kind of thing on the Badass Quandary. At least Bro has been maddeningly, infuriatingly stoic Dave's whole life; the BQ's tight-lipped insistence on not sharing critical information is a recent annoyance, one that Dave has lost all patience with. Her comeuppance is gonna be fucking sweet.

"I legitimately have no idea what he's saying," Dave-too says to Bro, still eyeing Dave's hands with trepidation. As well he should, because Dave's hands are goddamn weapons of mass destruction, dammit. "Like, can you translate or something? He's been doing the sign language thing this whole time and it turns out I can't read lips for love or money. I mean, who are you, someone else in this family?"

"He's still being a little bitch about the tentacle monster thing. Which is insensitive as fuck. Don't call your sister a tentacle monster, kid," Bro says, aiming that last part at Dave. Dave flips him the middle finger with all the smugness of a righteous teenager. "And yeah. Something. Call me Bro."

"Tentacle monsters? Sister?" Dave-too repeats, sounding pained. "Jesus fuck, is no one in this family normal?" He messes around with the tarp while he says this, and finally flips it up in a hood over his head so all the feathers are squashed down. He blinks out owlishly from under the edge of the cloth, and Dave can already tell the bird metaphors are going to get really old, really fast. He'll need to work on his material if he ever wants to throw down some rhymes with this guy.

But the poor, poor bastard. He has no idea. And Dave's not going to enlighten him. Let the poor kid have another half-hour free of that hair-trigger phobia of puppets that everyone who steps into the Strider stronghold inevitably develops. Never let it be said Dave is not a merciful twin-clone-brother, trying to spare him a lifetime of puppet fear. Puppetphobia? Is there a word for that? He's probably fucked if Rose figures it out; according to John, she has a thing for psychoanalyzing people.

He's getting sidetracked again. Why does this always happen? 'We are a picture-perfect cookie cutter 1950s household, I have no idea what you're talking about,' he deadpans, adjusting his shades on his nose. His brows twitch in a momentary frown when something about the shades feels...off. But then he shrugs it off. 'Like, shit, Bro breaks out the polka-dotted apron for cooking pancakes 'n shit every morning. It's fucking wholesome is what it is.'

"I am not translating your weird-ass metaphors, kid. Holy Santa Christ, how did I raise such a goddamn brat?" Bro asks the sky. He smacks Dave upside the back of the head before Dave can blink, a favored tactic of his. Dave whips out his sword and tries to slash the offending hand off, as per usual, but of course Bro is well out of range and acting like nothing happened by the time Dave has his guard up. "Stop being a little dipshit and answer me. What happened."

It's not a question, and the tone of absolute command grates at Dave's nerves. 'None of your business,' he replies, 'Like, wow, can't you just be happy? Our little family is multiplying. Soon we'll have a Strider in every major city in America. From there it's only one tiny leap to the White House -'

"No. The last time I let you get this kind of idea in your head, you followed through and started a minor economic bottleneck in the apple juice market in the space of five days. Just. No." Bro sighs, and his gaze turns to stare down Dave-too instead. The bird kid seems unaware that he's being watched from behind the pointy shades; he looks bored and intrigued at the same time as his gaze flicks between Dave and Bro with unsettling pale orange eyes. "Look, he's being a little fucker. Are you going to talk?"

Dave-too stiffens up, aware that he's under scrutiny now. Dave watches, fascinated and kind of freaked out by the way the other him hunches up his shoulders in a familiar gesture, made foreign by the rising wings behind him. Dave is used to other Daves by this point, but they're all him - their actions and thoughts eventually become his own, and he understands them. This is someone he assumes is totally unrelated to his time shenanigans, someone with his face and some of his mannerisms whose mind he'll never know, different enough that it's downright uncanny to watch him move.

And he can speak. Dave can admit he's a little jealous.

"Look man, all I know is a bunch of freaks in suits picked me up on my way through town a week ago, and kept asking me weird nonsense questions," Dave-too says, terse. "Then this Dave showed up and viola. You now get two Daves for the price of one. One can even pass for a normal human being. Yippee-kayay, motherfucker."

Oh fuck.

Ohhhhh, fuck.

Bro rounds on Dave. Dave catches a glint of pale, yellow-orange eyes over the brim of the angled shades, and knows that oh shit he is fuuuucked.

"You went after the Crew," Bro says, his voice completely flat. There's no emotion in it at all, not even the edge of condescending amusement that Dave's learned to overlook all his life; he starts glancing around for the nearest escape routes because Bro could be about to flip his shit. Bro is hard to read like that - he could try to whup Dave's ass right here and now, or he may well hold off on the retribution until Dave least suspects it. "You rebellious, obnoxious fucker. Going to a movie theater, my ass."

Lil Cal appears, one boneless leg hooked over Bro's shoulder. And wow, Dave only has the one piece of shit sword left to defend himself with. If Bro's main puppet is already out, he could be in for a world of hurt. 'Hey, I went to a movie theater. It's the fucking truth, just ask him.' He points at Dave-too.

"Yeah, it was a movie theater," Dave-too is already saying, almost before Dave finishes signing. Bless his avian heart. "All nice and sketchy and grimy as hell. And man, I'm only following him because...fuck, they took my shit when they picked me up. I just. You don't have to fucking put up with me long, if I can just get a goddamn shower real quick. I'll be gone before the neighbors can pitch a fit."

His voice is strained and tense, way more than Dave would ever let him own. Dave-too may never have practiced emotional suppression in his life, which is just bizarre to think about.

Then he realizes what Dave-too just said. 'Wait what. No, you can't take off,' he signs, but all he gets is a tired sigh in reply from bird-him. And yeah, they'll have to beat the knowledge of ASL into Dave-too if he's going to hang around from now on - but that's the point. He can't just take off, not when there's so many questions left unanswered. Deep and meaningful questions, such as why the hell is there a bird kid version of Dave and why is he orange. Seriously, Dave's not crazy, right? It's a legitimate question!

"You're not going anywhere, punk," Bro replies, shades glinting in the morning sun. Dave nods vigorously in solidarity. "I'm still lookin' to find out why the hell you look like Dave in orange bird drag. Because I've seen his time bullshit before, and none of the other ones have ever looked like they've been dunked in orange juice and left to dry."

'I've been wondering the same thing,' Dave signs, keeping the hand motions short and small enough that Dave-too probably doesn't even register them. 'This guy came out of nowhere. If he knows anything, he's not talking to me at least.'

Bro's lip twitches downward in acknowledgement, and that's enough for them to be going on. There are advantages to having a clone-twin version of yourself who doesn't know your second language, Dave thinks contemplatively.

Then he remembers Bro is like, one twitchy eyebrow away from reeducating Dave on the meaning of pain. Time to stop drawing attention to himself. Again. If he can get Bro to focus on Dave-too, maybe he can dodge this unwanted asskicking before it begins.

"Been like this all my life, Mister Bro," Dave-too drawls, a little bit of an unfamiliar accent coloring his sarcasm. Dave can't place it though - he's usually pretty good at identifying sounds and accents, but Dave-too barely has one at all. "Right down to the amazing pair of shirt-ruining chicken wings. Yes, they work, no, I don't fucking lay eggs, and no, no touching the goddamn wings, that - yeah, no. So as to why there's suddenly some kid with my face running around -" he jerks a thumb at Dave "- your guess is as good as mine. Maybe the Dave Depot had some spares, and you just happened to pick up my slightly less attractive lookalike."

A knot ties itself in Dave's stomach, an inkling of unease that makes him squirm a little. He looks at Dave-too and realizes - to the other kid, Dave is probably the one he's thinking of as Dave-too. From the other Dave's perspective, Dave is just as much the bizarre, freaky doppelganger who appeared, dispelling a lifetime of optimistically believing he was the only one in the world wearing his face. My face, Dave wants to claim, but really, who can say which Dave came first?

Whoa. That is way too fucking meta. Dave needs to stop thinking about that now, before he gives himself an existential aneurysm or something.

His head throbs a little and he shakes it, hiding the motion as best he can as he regains his awareness of his surroundings. His internal record has skipped a little; when he feels for the time, he sees he lost a few minutes to that tangent. He really needs to work on not zoning out like that. He gets the feeling it's not healthy, and Bro will kick his ass if this keeps up and he doesn't argue his case.

Chances are Bro will beat him up regardless, but hey, that's life.

Anyway. He tunes back into the conversation.

"Well, fuck me sideways," Bro is saying. There's a disconcerting moment when someone behind his back trips over the curb and nearly runs into him, but Bro is too cool for someone to just run into him like that. He dodges the person's stumble and then dodges back into place so quickly he leaves as afterimage. Dave is used to impossible shit like that, because Bro can deny it all he wants, but he's a show off. Dave-too's eye twitches. Dave starts an internal timer, wondering with a perverse glee when Dave-too will do a double-backflip off the metaphorical handle. "I am going to murder Lalonde."

And oops, looks like Dave zoned out in time to miss something really important. Faaaaack. What the hell has Dave-too been telling Bro that they've ended up back on Rue Lalonde? He can't exactly ask Dave-too repeat everything, he'd look like an idiot. 'What do you think she's done now?' he signs irritably.

Bro signs back, which Dave takes to mean this next part stays strictly between original gen Striders. 'Clones, you spacey brat. Quantum mechanics specialization, my ass, she's the only one who would have the time and mad science brain to want to make more copies of a dumbass like you.'

'Dude, why did you even agree to make clone-spawn with her if you didn't make sure to watch how many babies ended up rolling around the lab,' Dave demands, rolling his eyes hard. 'Like, 'oh, look, Doctor Lalonde mixed up an extra tube of baby juice, maybe I should look into that!"'

Bro actually grimaces - his facial muscles actually move - and looks off to the side. 'Never said I agreed to anything, kid;' he signs; then he clenches his hands into fists as he switches back to verbalizing without missing a beat. "Me and that woman are going to have words."

...So, is Bro going to try to skip that part where apparently he had no say in the whole Rose-and-Dave debacle? Dave's jaw drops, and for a moment he has no idea what to do with his hands. 'Bro. Dude. Did she make non-con clone babies with you?' he asks, feeling kind of queasy. 'I'm not exactly a Ph.D. in cloning ethics 101, but I'm pretty sure that's on the list of things that is not okay.'

There are a lot of things Dave has never bothered to question in his life - why he considers Bro his bro, even knowing they're not technically brothers; why he is just so fucking awesome at ironic selfies; why their apartment is a hellhole of puppets and taxidermied animals and goddamn katanas. Okay, that's a lie, he questions the puppet thing every fucking day of his miserable life, but that's beside the point.

He's never questioned that Bro wanted him. Hell, maybe it's weird that a badass DJ/swordsman with a multi-million dollar puppet fetish empire wanted to raise a kid at all, but Bro is the kind of person who wouldn't do something if he didn't want to. If Dave were just some random kid that got dumped on him, Bro would have tossed him at social services and moved on with his life. No matter how much they bicker and strife and torment each other, Dave is safe and centered with the knowledge that if a Strider can love, Bro loves him. They look dysfunctional as shit to other people - they are dysfunctional, by any normal definition - but even when Dave is straining to break out from under Bro's shadow, they're okay. They're just. Okay.

'Shit is complicated. Lalonde didn't know half of what was going on then, either. Just lemme deal with Dave for two fucking seconds before you go goddamn postal.' Bro sticks his hands in his pockets, a luxury Dave doesn't have, in a gesture that means he is done with pandering to Dave's bratty whims. It takes Dave a moment to realize he's talking about the other Dave. Trust Bro to not differentiate with the names at all. At least Lil Cal seems to have scuttled back off to wherever it stays when Bro isn't about to unleash a righteous beatdown on Dave.

But he's not dodging this one like a dodgy son of a bitch. Nope. Not today. Dave steps in front of Dave-too, who makes a noise of confused protest that Dave ignores, and begins to sign. 'This isn't that hard, Bro. The hard part was Rose, and wow, congrats, you lived through that. Stop dicking around and tell the truth. There's nothing stopping you anymore, the clones are out of the bag.'

Bro starts talking over his signs, which is rude as fuck. Seriously, way to be a basic bitch, Bro. Dave forges on while Bro talks likes the insensitive dick he is. "Shit. Is. Complicated. It's not as simple as just suddenly babies. Me and Lalonde heard about a lot of stuff secondhand - the two people who knew the most about it all up and died, so sometimes when I don't tell you shit, it's because I don't know the shit."

'I can't believe you!' Dave can't do the stoic thing anymore. His face must be a goddamn mess by now, all jumbled with impotent frustration and that incensed fury that flares up out of nowhere. And when he gets mad, he gets embarrassingly teary. There's a reason he and Bro don't show emotion. Like. At all. 'Do you seriously think I buy that? You and BQ both, you're so full of it! Who were the two people? Why were there two other people at all?! Just tell the whole story from the beginning and I wouldn't have so many annoying ass questions!'

Bro snorts. "Like fuck you wouldn't. You would just ask why you didn't have any questions. You can't just let things be. Like. Calm your tits, little bro, no need to scare off Dave here with all our issues." He raises an eyebrow, and Dave knows he's being mocked.

And he deserves it. He's broken the cardinal rule when it comes to dealing with Bro - he's lost his cool. But he can't help it; the guy is infuriating.

"Can we not bring me into this?" Dave-too interjects. Without looking back, Dave steps backward onto the guy's foot until he yelps and shuts up, muttering mutinously. Dave ignores it. He also ignores that the toes he could feel through the thin soles of his shoes had an extra bump to them; the guy has bird claws for hands and feet. So what?

'I am calm,' he insists. He's not, he's really not, but faking it is half the battle. 'I am chill. So. Fucking. Chill.' He signs the last word with such force his hand cramps. Fuck that noise. 'I just find it hard to believe that this is what I'm reduced to. A neurotic who can't get a straight answer from anyone. Tell me.'

"I ain't telling you fuckall with this kind of audience. Have no idea who could be listening or watching." Bro juts his chin not at Dave-too, but at the busy street beside them. Which Dave has sort of forgotten about, but whatever. Bro shakes his head sagely when Dave's mouth involuntarily twists downward, and shrugs, looking at Dave-too over Dave's shoulder. "Sorry about this. Kid's a handful."

'This is not over.'

Bro breaks off, sighing heavily. Side effect of raising a mostly mute kid - he has to pay attention to Dave's words or he misses key signs and the whole method of communication falls apart. "Enough," he says, and then Bro grabs Dave's hands, locking him down in a vice grip.

And -

Dave freaks.

The noise that he makes scrapes his throat raw. Dave wrenches his hands and when he can't pull free, brings his foot up and plants it in the middle of Bro's chest, barely aware as he does it that time has stopped. He kicks and kicks and kicks and somewhere in his panic, his heartbeat throbbing in his ears in doubletime, he holds the time stop too long.

He wakes up when his head cracks against the sidewalk. The painful firework of pain from stopping time too long sparks in his brain, and he barely catches himself on his elbows, tearing holes in his sleeves. BQ would say he was using his powers wrong, again, and he's started to see her point over the last year.

But his hands are free. Bro has backed way the fuck off, nearly ten feet between them, his posture tense. He's not panting or anything, and gives no indication that Dave's kicks did any damage, but his expression has gone entirely flat, a total blank slate.

"Should I just go?" Dave-too demands. Dave has landed almost on the guy's crappy sneakers, and when he winces and starts to sit up, Dave is surprised to feel a hand grip his collar and help yank him upright. Dave-too lets go before Dave can turn around and raise an eyebrow, but still. What a remarkably not-douchey thing to do. You can tell this kid wasn't raised by Bro.

"Stay," Bro says, and that's all. He's freaked out, too, then, if he's shut down all non-essential conversational skills. Bro is weird that way.

But good. He fucking deserves to feel guilty. That was a fucking bullshit move and he knows it. Dave meets his eyes and they stare at each other for a good minute. 'You shut me up,' he signs at last, but seeing Bro flinch doesn't make him feel any better.

Because Bro didn't mean it. It's been years since he had to worry about Dave's hands, ever since he finished assembling that collar and Dave could start yapping whenever he wanted. But he still went to mute Dave permanently, like Dave was five years old again. However temporarily, he forgot that Dave can't even handle that anymore. At all.

'I did,' he acknowledges at last. 'And I shouldn't have. I fucking up.'

The knot between Dave's shoulders loosens a little, and he feels a little less queasy. He ducks his head to finish. 'I shouldn't have been an annoying shit. But you still shouldn't have done that.'

'We're clear?' After Dave nods a reluctant affirmative, Bro hesitates, starts a sign, and then flows into, 'And I will explain. After I get answers from Lalonde. Sometimes I just legitimately don't know things.'
It's no different from what he claimed before, but right now it sounds a lot more reasonable. Ugh. Dave doesn't even know anymore. But he can't work up that flare of anger anymore, not when his heart is still off-beat and his head hurts like a motherfucker. So he lets it go. Like the gracious, blessed saint of the lord that he is, goddamnit. Honestly, if he didn't have the patience of Mother Teresa he doesn't know how he'd get through the day without cutting a bitch.

'Punkass brat.' Bro shakes his head, and switches back to words. "Why do we always end up goddamn arguing? I'm not actually out to get you, you damn punk."

'You raised me by whacking me with a sword from the time I was like two years old. Our entire relationship is based on strife, you shitty guardian,' Dave signs wearily.

"...Fair point." Bro leans a shoulder on the stoplight pole beside them, his arms folded. It's an obvious gesture of reconciliation, a signal that Bro's not going to try to reach out and silence Dave again. It's also pretty fucking useless, because Bro is fast enough that folding his arms means nothing. But. Dave gets it. "Shouldnta grabbed you," Bro says, his words clipped. He's looking away behind the shades, clearly uncomfortable with the whole situation, but especially with the need for emotions and apologies and all that other messy shit. Dave understands completely. "Not used to the sign language, yet."

"All of this is goddamn fascinating," Dave-too drawls, and Dave starts. Okay, he didn't really forget the kid was there - kind of hard to miss him, actually - but Dave doesn't think he himself could ever stay that quiet through an entire Strider-class emotional crisis without making some kind of snarky remark. Looks like Dave-too lets the sass build up until afterward. Just another way they're not actually the same person, thank God. Dave still gets the willies looking at the other Dave's bared face. "No really, I'm sure no one cares that you're having some kind of violent broment right in the middle of downtown in your weird shades, but I'm pretty sure someone is going to notice me, so can we hurry this up?"

Aha. Ha. Ha. Dave-too is worried about people noticing him? Dave has lived in Houston for his whole life, except for that part where apparently they lived in Georgia and no one thought to goddamn mention it to him. He's just gotten used to the passive way the general populace reacts to Flashstep and the Puppeteer. Hell, he and Bro strife it out on the rooftop all the time and the worst they've ever gotten was a makeshift spear lobbed at them by the irate woman whose window they broke a couple years ago. She had made it out of a shower curtain rod and a butcher knife, and Dave is pretty sure Bro still has it stashed away somewhere as a trophy because he's creepy ass packrat like that.

But aside from that crazy lady, Dave knows that people just really do not give a shit. Sometimes he slips up and he visits the same convenience store twice in the same day, once in costume and once out, and all the guy behind the counter does is sigh and give him the same discount on the Strider family CVS card. He normally wouldn't use it while acting as Flashstep, but discounts, alright?

In retrospect, he's not really sure he has a secret identity at all. Oops. John would disapprove so much. But as long as no one narcs on them to the police, does it really even matter? It seems like other heroes go through so much shit keeping their identity secret, but hell, Dave has an entire shadowy criminal organization chasing him and they have yet to catch on. A med student (they breed like flies around here) throws them a harassed look as she ducks past to reach the crosswalk, but that's the extent of the attention anyone pays to them. Dave and Dave-too are standing there covered in blood and bruises - Dave-too has wings - and no one has fucks to give.

Houston is just weird, okay?

"Fer chrissakes," Bro mutters. He pinches the bridge of his nose, breath hissing out. He's the picture of Strider exasperation. "Yeah, yeah, show's over. Come on, you two. Home. Now." And then he's gone, and Dave catches a glimpse of him already halfway up the side of the building beside them before he takes off across the roofs. God damn, is Bro fast.

"Thank god," Dave-too says, hitching his shoulder and hobbling along, walking right by Bro in a huff, despite the fact that he has no idea where the Striders live. He's limping a lot more now, and Dave winces when he realizes why and starts after the guy. He forgot about the broken wing entirely, he can admit that. Which kind of makes him and Bro a pair of inconsiderate douchenozzles. Depending on how long it's been broken, Dave can't even imagine how godawful the pain must be after fighting the Crew and walking through Houston traffic.

He still lets the guy wander around until he realizes he doesn't know where they're going and glowers at Dave. Because Dave is kind of a dick that way. Eheheheheh. He smothers the smart ass smirk and shrugs at his double before leading the way.

Bro vanishes into his room and emerges with several familiar objects. One is the first aid cart (now with wheels on which to roll it around the apartment) and the other is a pair of bright pink cowboy chaps. He dumps the chaps, as well as assorted other items that give Dave war flashbacks, into the sink under a pile of smuppets, fast enough that Dave-too doesn't see them. Bro gives Dave a little one-sided smirk and taps a finger to his mouth, and Dave rolls his eyes in response. "Siddown and let Dave fix the wing," Bro says aloud, digging through the fridge for a moment and emerging with a rare beer. Having seen Rue Lalonde's functional alcoholism in action, Dave can kind of see where Bro comes from all the time, worrying about addictive personalities. That kind of shit can be genetic, right?

Not that Dave has never had beer. He just has a greater and truer love for juice, dammit, and there is nothing wrong with that.

Dave-too picks his way between the assorted piles of stuff and things that litter the apartment, his face unreadable as he finds a clear space on the couch and sits. Sitting is an affair for him - the wings bunch up and the unbroken one lifts out to the side so he doesn't sit down on them, and once he's sitting they lower again, a maneuver Dave can't even imagine pulling off if he suddenly grew a pair of wings. Dave-too stands out like a bright orange figure on the shitty couch, looking around the room speculatively.

Welp. Time to do something about that wing, anyway. If nothing else, they can't leave Dave-too hobbling around like that, even in the questionable security of the apartment. Too many traps. 'What happened to hooking me on AJ instead of beer?' Dave asks wryly, walking around the couch in a wide circle. He's procrastinating because he doesn't really know what to do here. Hypothetically, he knows how to set bird wings; he's done minor amateurish restructuring of bird wings for his more morbid home taxidermy projects, and fixed up some of the asshole crows who occasionally invade his room. But these are hugeass orange wings on a human scale. It's a totally different situation, and if he fucks it up Dave-too might not just fly a little wonky, he might suffer chronic pain for - well, however long bird-people live. 'Setting a bad example for the newbie, Bro.'

Bro cracks open the beer with a single twitch of his finger, sipping before the foam has even died down. His free hand flips a middle finger until he finishes chugging it. "Shaddup, brat. I need less sobriety for this." His arm blurs, and Dave pauses time to recognize and snatch the apple juice jug out of midair. His head protests, but like hell would he ever let apple juice go to waste.

Wait. This isn't one of Dave's newest products. This is a monstrous bottle of Motts Natural 100% Super Fucking Delicious Apple Juice, the kind of gallon jug people who aren't a teenager guy and his bachelor guardian buy at grocery stores like Kroger or HEB. Dave hasn't drunk this in - fucking years, ever since he realized how much more irrationally hipster it is to purchase apple juice brands no one has ever heard of and never will.

The fact is, as far as Dave knows, there shouldn't be Motts AJ in this apartment. He would know; he keeps tabs on the State of the AJ in the Household. Which can only mean -

'You keep a secret stash of apple juice?' he demands, stunned. 'Oh my god why does no one tell me these things? This is like. Life changing. How much more of this is there?!

"Kid, sometimes I legitimately worry you have a physical dependence on that piss-water," Bro grunts, which doesn't answer the question at all. "Just chug it and hurry up. The wing ain't gonna fix itself. Dave, you want something?"

"You don't have to worry about me. I'm fine," Dave-too says. He's muttering again, with his shoulders up around his ears, so Dave pretends he didn't hear that.

Instead, he nods, cracks open that jug with a satisfying creak of plastic, and takes a swig. Then he rolls his shoulders and orders himself to man up and inspect Dave-too's wing properly. He jostles the guy until he sits forward on the edge of the couch, and then Dave sits on top of the back rest of the couch, so he's got some perspective on these things. He sips at his apple juice like a contemplative goddamn scholar, and takes in the damage.

Bro vanishes in the meanwhile, no doubt to pick up more of the items necessary for the clusterfuck he's planning.

If possible, with the tarp discarded outside, the wings look even more disproportional. Dave knows bird wings, knows them as elegant, sweeping curves, the product of millions of years of evolution knitting together the genes for a slim chassis held aloft by feathers and song. Birds are time's triumph, and wow Dave refuses to ever think something that corny ever again.

Compared to that, it's clear that Dave-too's wings are...weird. The left one, the unbroken one, is matted with dirt and orange blood. Dave thinks maybe after the guy showers or something it'll look a little more natural, but for now it's in ragged disarray, ruffled and fluffed up defensively.

The right one is worse. The way Dave-too hunches over, it looks both too small and too big at the same time. It's bulky compared to his skinny frame, but when Dave prods near the break in the bones, the whole wing shivers and tries to draw in close to his back. The wince Dave-too lets out seems to be more caused by the way the wing wants to fold in but can't, with the radius and ulna both snapped.

"Why is he doing this, anyway? Like, no fucking offence, but you seem kind of more - yeah, just why is the mute guy with the sword dicking around with my wing. Can you just take over or something? I am not cool with this anymore. I was never cool with this," Dave-too babbles. Bro has wandered back in by this point, but Dave doesn't look up, engrossed in figuring out exactly how he's going to need to maneuver the bones before splinting everything and taping it up. He trusts his instincts, honed by years of training, to tell him that Bro is dicking around in the kitchen, opening and closing the fridge with a dissatisfied snort.

"If it were a stab wound or something, I'd be all over there getting my help on," Bro says absently, opening a drawer. "But hell if I know anything about wings. Dave here's the one with the dead animal thing."

Oh, come on. Dave flips Bro off. Again. This is becoming a pattern. He starts to sign a correction when Dave-too wrenches around to stare at him, horrified, because he does not have a dead animal thing, okay, and then he remembers the whole language barrier thing. He smacks his face instead, shaking his head in negation. Dave-too settles back and turns around when Dave pushes on his shoulder, but Dave can tell he's still uneasy by the way his wings are drawn even tighter.

Okay. He has a plan of action. Sort of. But it's going to suck for everyone involved. 'How blackout drunk can we make him?' he asks, wondering if they even have the kind of hard liquor they'd need to do this quickly. If there's only a couple of beers in Bro's stash, they might have to do this dry.

Bro purses his lips and shakes his head. 'Yeah, no.'

'Why not?'

'We have no idea how he's put together biologically. Do you really want to give a bird kid alcohol poisoning and shoot his liver? Tell him to suck it up.'

...Point taken. They could just ask, probably, but fuck it, it's probably smarter to have Dave-too awake and sober so he can scream coherently if Dave bends a bone the wrong way without realizing he's fucked up.

"Can you not do the sign language like that? Like you're talking about me deliberately so that I can't understand," Dave-too says, shifting.

He has no idea.

Dave starts slow, dabbing at the dried blood in the area around the break with a damp towel. It comes away with flecks of orange, which is just strange. He is hyper aware at all times that there is a human-scale orange wing under his hands, and that if he hits some kind of pressure point Dave-too could smash him off the back of the couch reflexively. Bro won't condescend to work as a translator while he's busy setting up a spirograph in bloodstones on the kitchen floor, so Dave has to mouth the question 'how long ago did they break it?' five times before Dave-too loses his uncomprehending stare and answers with a "Two days ago." It's both better than Dave expected, and worse than he would have preferred.

When all the coagulated blood is cleared away, he feels a little better. Blood, even orange blood, always unnerves him a little. And now he can inspect the breaks properly. It's a clean snap, right in two, and he thinks it only broke the skin because the radius and ulna are thisclose to the edge of the wing. What complicates the whole mess is that there's two bones involved, both of them fragile, skinny, finicky little bastards. Only the radius broke the skin, but the ulna is a broken line just below the surface, where the feathers smooth out into secondaries. He has to line them both up, stitch the break in the skin, bandage it (which will be a goddamn party with all these feathers), and then tape the whole thing up against Dave-too's back so he can't jostle it.

He lays out all the supplies he's going to need on the couch, and then he undoes his belt and holds it in front of Dave-too's face. It's for a good cause. "You've got to be kidding me," Dave-too says flatly.

He changes his tune after Dave shrugs and begins Extreme Surgery, Strider Edition. He pauses time, and between one second and the next he presses the ulna back into alignment. The bone creaks terrifyingly under his hands, even through the layers of thick orange feather and skin. It's not at all as stick-like as the bird bones he has worked with previously. This is like grabbing a human humerus, judging by the width of the bone, and muscling it back into place.

And of course, a second later, he has to let time go again. Dave-too takes the abrupt pain about as well as he could expect. "Ow! Fuuuu-son of a fuck- stopstopstop! Shit!" he yells, and the unbroken wing spazzes out, shoving a pile of dirty laundry off the armrest. He kicks out with a foot too, and raises a hand to his mouth to chomp down against another yelp. Thank fuck, he somehow manages to keep from moving the broken wing, too, or they would have considerable complications here.

If his hands weren't occupied, Dave would sign, 'Too late for that, bro.' Dave-too hisses a whine of pain and then bites down on the belt. There's a terrible sex joke in there somewhere, but hell fucking no. Dave refuses to think sex jokes about another Dave. Yeesh. Instead, he concentrates on holding the ulna in place while switching his focus to the radius. He keeps mashing the time-stop button in his brain, so he has as much time to consider his options as possible. In the end, though, all he can do is press that bone down, too. The bones haven't fragmented at all, which is a small blessing, and realigning the ulna had started to pull the radius into place as well. Dave-too punches the couch and snarls around the belt, but that's all the reaction Dave gets this time.

When the bones are as lined up as Dave can manage, he coughs loudly. Bro steps up, his old hat on so his stupid pointy hair is pulled away from his shades. He puts his hands on top of Dave's (Jesus fuck, why are his hands twice the size of Dave's? That shit ain't natural) on the exposed bone so Dave can slip out and start winding it all together. Dave makes a last minute call and doesn't stitch anything - he bandages it instead. Bro's hands move in sync with his to free up space while Dave weaves the bandages around the whole damn wing in an X shape. The coverts bend awkwardly, but it needs to be done, and as long as the feathers themselves are in order they won't break.

Dave-too lets out a shaky breath through his nose, pain evident in the way he claws at the couch with too-sharp fingers, his legs braced against the bottom of the couch. Just a few more seconds, Dave thinks. He's rushing this as fast as he can, but it still feels like he's dragging it out. Without a word, Bro removes a hand - it's not needed anymore, Dave has the worst of the wayward bone tucked into place - and grabs the guy by the head, tugging him back despite Dave-too's protest until his orange head of hair is leaning on Bro's shoulder. Dave-too's eye twitches as he flings a desperately confused look at Dave, but all Dave can do right now is start cannibalizing the arm braces they have in the first aid bucket to help support the wing.

It's the same kind of hold Bro had on Rose on that rooftop in New York, his fingers threading between hair and feathers with no regard for the difference as he rocks Dave-too slightly with mechanical, soothing precision. Eventually, the bristling distrust leaves Dave-too's stiff posture, because Bro has this shit down to a science. Dave remembers that day through a haze of near mindfuckery and delirium, and he'd been sure he'd only imagined Bro's mysterious burst of parental shooshing while Rose puked the grimdark out. But John had confirmed it, and Bro got all pissy when he brought it up, so yeah. This is actually a thing.

(If he strains himself, he thinks he can recall brief incidents in childhood, before Dave became less shitty at strifing, when Bro might have done the same for past-Dave, stroking his hair while he stitched up some new sword cut on Dave's arm. But obviously Dave is way past the point where he'd need or want that kind of coddling. Obviously.)

"Done," he tries to say at last, out of reflex, and sucks in a breath at the strangled noise his vocal cords make. He leaves the wing a neat, packaged bundle of bandage strips. 'Just need to cut off the shirt and bind it all to his back so he can't move it around,' he signs to Bro. It's standard operating procedure for taking care of a bird - wrap bandages around the whole body so the injured wing stays still - and he figures it's their best option here, too.

"Shirt off, kid," Bro orders, pushing Dave-too away with no finesse. "Do we need the scissors?"

Dave-too unclenches his jaw from the belt. Dude must have some sharp teeth, because when Dave picks up the belt there are holes gnaws through from the pressure. "Probably. Usually I cut the slits wide enough to fit the wings through if I do it right, but - yeah, fuck, that's not gonna work," he gasps, his breath hiccupping a little with every tiny tremor that runs through the bandaged wing.

It had been hidden under the tarp, but there are two huge cuts down the back of Dave-too's baggy, filthy sweater. Dave wants to scream at the ragged way they've been cut - whoever did this used regular old scissors or something and didn't clean up the edges or hem it at all. It's a travesty, and deserves to be put out of its misery.

"Sorry. We don't have scissors," Bro finishes, setting it up perfectly for the moment when Dave draws his sword.

Dave-too nearly has a conniption fit.

They get the shirt off eventually, though Dave-too is a little bitch about it. With his torso exposed, Dave can see the huge, purpling bruises all along the guy's ribs, and a dark blotch of blue-black over Dave-too's lower back. So they did more than break the wing, then. He's skinnier than Dave, which is saying something because Dave is built for speed, here. Dave-too folds the broken wing in gingerly for Dave to tape the whole thing to his body, and Dave takes a lot more care than he would have if this were Bro or something. His spine is a defined, ridged line down the center of his back, and the muscles of his shoulders and upper back have Definitely shifted to compensate for the wings. Feathers continue from the crest of the wings and speckle the back of Dave-too's neck before disappearing back up in his hair.

He's so human, except for all the ways he's not. Dave really hopes Rue Lalonde didn't do this, because he thinks from the look on Bro's face that she's in for one hell of an ass-kicking if she did.

'Done. Don't pick at it,' he signs at last, even knowing Dave-too won't understand. He did a kickass job, considering he has no idea what he was doing the whole time.

Dave-too twists and curls forward, testing the amount he can bend, the bandages. The way the wing has to curve with his body draw him up short, but his grimace is only a little pained by the time he sits up. "Okay. Let's never do this again," he says, standing up and putting some distance between him and Dave, which Dave is a-okay with. The bird kid stands there awkwardly, the shredded remnants of his shirt slung over one arm as he glances around the room. Looking for exits. "You're an awesome mutant freak doctor, I'm impressed, but no, never again. Ever."

"Dave?"

Both of them look up as one, and shit that's going to get so confusing.

Bro is standing in the kitchen. He has a party hat in one hand. It's My Little Pony themed, and most likely the work of the devil. Shit's serious, then. Dave starts cleaning up the first aid stuff, stuffing it all back into the cart. "Time for the initiation."

Dave-too takes a step back. "What."

'Sorry, man. It's a tradition,' Dave signs, shrugging with a smirk when Dave-too glares at him.

"Like we'd really just toss you out on the street with a fucked up wing," Bro drawls. "You can at least stay here until we sort this whole mess out."

"I appreciate the offer, but I'm fine." Dave-too eyes the exit, and shuffles to the side. He thinks he's being sneaky, clearly, but this is a Strider household, and he doesn't quite meet Strider standards.
"You're amazingly less than fine. You and Dave are both stubborn fucks, aren't you," Bro observes. "Just stay on the couch, kid. If the Crew are running around picking up Daves off the street, this is the safest place in the city to hide."

Dave sees the exact moment that argument wins Dave-too over. His orange eyes are easy to read. He pauses, clearly considering his options, and then slowly nods. "Fine. But only until they fuck off. Then I'm gone," he says, folding his arms over his chest. He looks thin and self-conscious, and Dave feels uncomfortable just looking at him. It's like Davebarrassment by proxy. Eurgh.

"Good." Bro holds up the party hat again. "And now we can induct you."

"Let's not and say we did."

"Terms of getting rights to the hide-away bed in the couch," Bro says. Wow, he's driving a hard game today. He must really want to see how far he can push Dave-too before he throws a fit. Dave would have stopped putting up with Bro's bullshit like, two minutes ago.

"I don't suppose we can just skip this?" Dave-too says mournfully.

Bro snaps the strap of the party hat. "No."

"Can I at least put on a shirt?" Dave-too asks. Ah, to be so young and naïve again.

"No."

A party hat should not look that ominous.

What ensues is a top-secret, unfathomably stupid initiation ritual handed down from Strider to Strider over the course of - well, two generations. Eh, fuck it. Dave just sits back and is glad he's not the one being subjected to the hazing, right up until Bro sets Lil Cal on him and starts baptizing him with hand soap and maple syrup right alongside Dave-too, both of them hanging half off the edge of the roof, where they migrated at some point. Cardboard boxes and the ritual sacrifice of a bright orange smuppet are involved. Everything is awful and wonderful and deliciously ironic at the same time, and Dave may or may not still be enjoying himself a little, but he will never admit that to Bro's face. Never.

And afterwards, of course, the kitchen is a shambles. John would probably burst out into manly neat-freak tears at the sight of it.

"I will never be clean again," Dave-too says gloomily.

Dave scowls in agreement. Maple syrup, glitter, and for some reason smears of avocado streak his kickass Midnight Crew costume, and none of it is coming out. The suit is ruined forever. He might have to burn it in a funeral pyre up on the roof later, but he could tell from the glint behind Bro's shades that this surprise re-initiation may be the only reason Bro postponed the argument about going after the Crew until later. This is the price Dave pays for successfully hiding something from Bro and screwing up the post-shenanigans coverup.

...Still worth it. If only, he thinks, because if Dave hadn't gone into that movie theater, there's no telling what the Crew would have done to PM or Dave-too. The carapacian seemed to be fine enough to tell Dave off and trot along to do her own thing, but Dave-too is covered in bruises like they tried to kick something out of him. Maybe trying to figure out where Dave was? Who even knows.

He grabs Dave-too by the shoulders and angles him toward the bathroom door. It's a sacrifice, but Dave has business to take care of before he really needs to use the shower anyway. He's wiped off his face as best he could in the kitchen sink, and sadly, this is exactly the state he'd been in when he went to close the loop with one of his past-selves. Which means he can't shower and change, or he'll screw up the past.

"You sure?" Dave-too asks. Dave just gives him another shove, since he wouldn't comprehend the signs for 'I need to go back and kick past-me out, I left him hanging long enough' anyway.

He endures the pain of turning back time and steps through the door. "Go downstairs. The package has arrived. Don't even ask," he says, feeling weary and old as past-Dave perks up from his work at the desk, cradled by gratuitous amounts of apple juice. Poor past-Dave. He has no idea how exhausting tonight and tomorrow morning are going to be.

At least now current-Dave won't have to live through all that time again, either. If he can get a handle on that travelling forward thing, anyway. And the only way to test that is by practicing in situations just like this, rather than doing stupid stuff like experimental time travel in the middle of battle with two passengers. That had just been dumb.

He swallows around a sharp spasm of pain in his throat, and twists his sense of time...diagonalways. It's not exactly the opposite of how he usually imagines his powers working, just at a weird angle. Does that make sense? He draws it out, sweating a little at the stabbing ache that throbs again and again in his throat as punishment for being patient about this, and winds the clock forward to fifteen minutes after he left Dave-too.

It works, of course. Dave is a fucking genius. It is him. He can't wait to rub this one in BQ's face.

The shower can be heard through the wall. To while away the next five minutes (shit, what if Dave-too has a Bro-level shower addiction?), Dave removes an ancient button-up from his closet, an oversized shirt that never fit right, black with 'DRUGS' printed in grey across the front, slashed out with a backslash-circle sign in red, and mangles it in the name of wings. Unlike Dave-too, he trims the edges and makes sure both slits are even. Because he is classy as fuck, goddammit. He adds sweats to the pile and then, hesitating, stares at the set of drawers with an arched eyebrow.

Is it weird to give other-you boxers?

That's...not something Dave has ever wanted to wonder about.

Torn between perverse curiosity and horror, he eventually opens and shuts the underwear drawer, and swears never to think about this again. Ever.

He waits until he hears the sound of the shower shutting off in the next room over, and flashsteps to the door. He'd entered the room in the past and come forward still inside, so the door is shut again. He pulls it open to let in Dave-too right as he hears the click of claw-toes on floor just outside. 'Didn't break the shower, did you? Bro will freak if he can't get his forty minutes in,' he silently comments.

"Puppets. Puppets everywhere," is all Dave-too has to say. He shakes his head silently, then catches himself zoning out and shrugs. "Uh. Shower's free."

Well, at least now that he's starting to be properly traumatized, he can start progressing through the stages of Puppetophobia Recovery. Dave is stuck on unreasonable horror, but there's no reason Dave-too won't beat the odds. Tossing the guy the pile of clothes, Dave sprints to the bathroom in record time. He has no illusions that he could really beat Bro there in a true contest, but Bro seems content to let him have this round. More likely, he's busy ragespamming Rue Lalonde.

He showers in record time, but even that's not quick enough to evade the wrath of Bro. Bro surprises him with a secondary shower of smuppets anyway when Dave is halfway through rinsing his hair, and he winds up getting soap in his eye. "Son of a fuck!" he fails to rasp, clapping a hand over his eye.

The water turns ice cold, and then abruptly soars up to temperatures approximating the heat of Mount Doom. Which means Bro just used his speed to yank the faucet handle around to fuck with Dave and drive him out.

Whatever. He is so over this shower. Daveseizes the towel and hauls ass out of there before anything else can try to kill him. He'd normally be ashamed of walking around in anything less than pants and a long-sleeved shirt when they have company around, but he figures hey, it's me, but with wings. So he ended up bringing pajamas because like hell is he doing anything but sleeping today after a night like that. In an old record shirt and boxers, Dave kicks his bedroom door in and strides in, making sure his shades are in place.

Dave-too hovers by the hole in the wall, the borrowed shirt loose on him like a fucking robe. Even when Dave nods and heads for the computer, Dave-too stands there, at a loss for what to do with himself.

Dave gets it. This whole situation is too weird.

'I'm probably going to pass the fuck out. You can do - whatever. Couch is outside, most of the video game consoles too. Just don't touch the turntables. Or open the fridge. It's a fucking death trap,' he signs.

None of this gets across, clearly. Dave-too facepalms just as Dave was about to, which makes Dave's hand slap back down against his side like fucking magic. Dave-too fidgets and then, horror of horrors, starts trying to make small talk. "I wasn't going to ask about the puppets. I was going to ask about the - wait, is this a dead baby?"

"No," Dave snaps, and the word almost comes out with a recognizable grunt of "Nnnagh!" with his emphasis. He flashsteps and hunches up over the jar of pickled dead thing. Shit. He had dug out all his completely ironic dead things after John went home, and everything had gotten stuck on top of apple juice crates when he kind of zoned out about the whole AJ empire thing. But from the horrified look Dave-too is giving the taxidermied crow above the computer - oh fuck oh fuck oh fucceccccck -

Dave yanks time to a standstill and freaks the fuck out, darting around the room in controlled bursts as he clutches anything even vaguely bird-shaped and/or dead and shoves it all into the closet. Dave-too is trying to say something, but Dave can't really make it out with all the forced pauses between the syllables, so he concentrates on sweeping the most incriminating crap under the bed before dropping back into time, clamping his mouth shut so he doesn't start panting at the sudden exertion.

God, why didn't he think to take care of this shit while he was wasting time making wing-slits all nice and neat?!

Cool. Play it cool. 'Why no, bird-me, it's a fucking meerkat,' he finishes at last. If he puts out a hand to support himself on the turntables, he totally plays it off as leaning jauntily. For ironic effect. 'You can't just joke about dead babies, dammit, it's insensitive.'

Close one.
Dave-too gives him a side eye, and it's wayyyy too similar to that look Rose not-Lalonde (he still can't decide whether she'd want to be a Strider, given her balls-to-the-walls overreaction whenever Dave calls her Lalonde) got that one time she was getting set to totally call Dave on his bullshit. "I have no idea what you're saying. But I'm pretty sure it's bullshit. You should probably think really hard about this dead thing you have. I'm pretty sure it's not healthy. Like, mentally and all."

So this is what happens when a Strider is raised away from the clan. The Lalonde half shines through. Dave suppresses a shudder of terror, and sits at the computer. As fun as having Dave-too tell him how weird his dead-thing collection is, he still means to check up on John before he passes the fuck out. Last night, the kid had been in some kind of crisis mode.

Unfortunately, his handle isn't highlighted in Pesterchum. Dave starts typing anyway, ignoring the faint huff of Dave-too's breathing as the guy shuffles around behind Dave's back. As long as he doesn't bust the turntables, Dave could care less.

TG: john
TG: eb
TG: bro
TG: angelface
TG: sugarmuffin
TG: my main man
TG: my sweet bushel of yams
TG: fuck ive never eaten a yam are they sweet TG: dammit man this is your fault
TG: yams
TG: shit thats not going to be a thing i s2g

"Who is that?" Dave-too asks. Dave spies the bird kid looking around surreptitiously, hooking a bare claw-foot on the side of a spare concrete block and sliding it over the floor. He sits on the very edge of it - Dave refuses to think the word 'perch' - with his feet tucked right up against the base. It's too short to be a seat of any kind, really, so his knees stick up at awkward, gangly angles.

Yep. That's perching. So much for not stereotyping the guy.

He also has to wonder just how much he's willing to share with Dave-too. Bro seems to be all for inducting him as a Strider proper, and Dave doesn't disagree. They're a rare breed of ironic masterpieces, after all. But he also knows John would be pissed as fuck if Dave went around outing his hero identity, even if just to a secondary Dave. Dave tugs a notepad out from the shelf and finds the stash of pens and pencils he keeps tucked into the hollow space of a concrete block, and begins scribbling. His handwriting sucks, and he huddles over his hand to hide the contortions he makes, trying to works the developing cramps of a night of hardcore strifing and signing out without Dave-too noticing. Eventually he gives up.

DS: my main man john

Dave-too is clearly over exaggerating when he squints and has to mouth the words before he can translate Dave's scribbling. Clearly. Because sometimes Striders are dramatic fuckwads, okay, and there's no way Dave's handwriting is actually that bad. "Whatever. Looks like your boyfriend isn't online. Or do you just pester him until he answers anyway?" Dave-too asks, sounding dubious.

And yes, in fact, Dave has pestered John until he answers on more than one occasion. But whoa there, Dave-too, hold the fuck up.
DS: what no our brohood is eternal and transcendent

DS: there is no boyfriend thing here at all

Dave-too rolls his eyes and rolls his free wing dismissively. Maybe. Dave isn't exactly up on the nuances of wing body language. "Dude, it's right there on the screen. If you're not trying to mack on him, aren't you coming on a little strong?"

That is just. Ugh. The opposite of what should be going on here. What kind of Dave would ever suggest such a thing.

DS: you need remedial irony lessons

DS: like really this is an embarrassment to striderkind what even are you

DS: these are clearly terms of broearment

Wait. Typing is so much faster. Dave facepalms. He hooks the pen on the side of the notepad and tosses them both over his shoulder onto the bed. When Dave-too gives him a judging look, Dave maintains a straight face so as to keep the moral high ground in this conversation, and opens a Notes window on the computer. He starts typing, and jabs a finger at the text so Dave-too knows to read it. He repeats everything he wrote before.

"Broearment. Jesus Christ, you like puns," Dave-too mutters, rubbing his eyes. He looks as tired as Dave feels, which is pretty damn tired. "Now what?"

DS: dont get your feathers in a knot im just switching to a faster interface

DS: we have the technology

Of course, now he's typing on two different windows at once, so it's only a matter of time before he fucks up and mistypes a message for one person in the window for another. Thankfully, John doesn't seem to be online yet - they're two hours behind in Seattle, which means John is still in that grey area between when he usually gets back from hero work and when he wakes up to go to school and starts pestering Dave again. Dave has no idea how the kid functions on so little sleep, but around now is when John can be generally counted on to be dead from the neck up for some solid shut eye.

With John, he cuts it short. Dave-too's words unnerved him.

TG: whatev
TG: just checking in TG: lemme know how blood-guys thing went i guess
TG: also i have an orange clone bird brother
TG: #sunnydunleashthepowerofthesun
TG: lataahz

If that doesn't get John frantically texting Dave by the time he wakes up, nothing will.

"Wait, did you just - did you just tell your creepy internet boyfriend about me?!" Dave-too yells.

DS: totes not my bf

DS: stop yelling im going to sleep now
DS: if you wanna use the comp just dont look up puppet porn that shit is off limits

"You compared me to Sunny D!"

...They're going to have trust issues, aren't they. Two Daves, both alike in dignity, and they're going to argue about stupid shit like this before poisoning each other's apple juice. Dave heaves the sigh of the damned, and rubs his face. While he fields Dave-too's irritation, his mind is more on sleeping, and planning for the future.

Because tonight, he's going to find BQ.

They're going to have a talk.

John doesn't know why, but sometimes his friends can be kind of huge assholes. Like, seriously, all of them!

He's working on zero sleep here and he's definitely grumpy, but hey. He went to school. He helped exonerate Hemogoblin. He even finished a surprise quiz in AP Alternian, and he thinks he might even have passed by the skin of his teeth. He's not used to the unease of not being fully prepared for something at school; he tries so hard to keep on top of everything so that he never has to worry about his hero work infringing on his school grades. His dad would only give him a stern look if John complained, though. He chose to stay out late into the morning, and he has to deal with the consequences. He is totally okay with all of this.

So why, why, why did Dave suddenly have to go full Strider on Karkat? Even John can't always handle a fullblast of Dave's patented ironic buttface spiel, and he likes Dave! Karkat had gone in apparently trying to figure out who Dave was and why John had been texting him all week, in his usual overprotective fury-mode, and Dave had just as badly overreacted. Both of them were at fault (no matter how much Dave wants to say Karkat started it, John knows Dave gives just as good as he gets), but Karkat is the one who ended up in some kind of fainting haze of sleepless delirium on John's living room floor!

John pours another mug of hot chocolate, ignoring the buzz of Dave's barrage of pesterings coming from his phone, and crosses from the kitchen to the living room, where Karkat has taken up grumpy residence. After the troll nearly passed out in the car, he had woken up with a shout when John brought the car to a shaky stop outside the Egbert house. The troll twitches and jitters all the way into the house, scrubbing at his arms as though he's cold even through his layers of hoodie and long-sleeved shirts.

As John walks by, he spots his dad giving him a look from the study. Yeah, they need to talk at some point - John took off in a hurry to school, without their usual debrief on how the night went, and then he had to take care of Karkat. He'd also driven a car after years of not practicing, which he's tooootally going to get chewed out about later.

Everything just happens all at once, okay? He thinks about that fortnight of relative peace and quiet after returning for New York with vague longing, and wonders why he and his friends can't go more than a week without weird stuff happening.

More importantly, he wonders just how he's going to convince Karkat to go to the hospital.

Yeah, that. That's a thing.

Just the thought of confronting Karkat about this makes John's stomach try to dissolve itself. Karkat has a serious thing against hospitals and doctors in general. Like, he offered to drive John to the emergency room in fits of panic while John's collarbone was still fractured, but his relief when John lost the sling had actual, physical force. For whatever reason, Karkat despises hospitals, and John strongly suspects that he may well have gone his entire life without setting foot in one.

But Karkat is pale and shaky in a pile of laundry and couch pillows, and that's a huge warning sign. Trolls like piles with substance - they toss in things like books and video games and cookware and basically anything they can get their claws on, and then they pile in it. Karkat always adds a pillow or two when he's dragging John into one of those pale jams he's always on about, out of consideration for the fact that John doesn't think his back could survive lying on a mound of hardcover romance novels.

Today, though, Karkat hadn't even made it to the stairs before he started feverishly clawing a pile together. While this pile slumps up against the sharp corner of the coffee table, it's still mostly made of soft things, which means Karkat must really feel bad.

And the last thing John wants to do is argue with Karkat when he looks ready to fall over if someone looked at him funny. But John can't in good conscience let his friend pretend he's not sick! He seemed fine when John first saw him after lunch, but by bio club he was already a wreck, and now this!

"Here you go," John says, crouching by the pile and holding out the hot chocolate. It's the only offering Karkat has said yes to - not even coffee had gotten more than a mumbled swear word.

After a pause, the pile trembles. The upper layer of John's recently dried, color sorted laundry shifts a little, and the sleeve of a red-and-blue Superman hoodie lifts up. A rusty red eye peers up at him from within the pile, the yellow sclera so bloodshot it can't possibly be healthy. His glasses sit somewhere on the kitchen counter where John had put them when Karkat flung them off, and his eyes look more unfocused than ever without them. A pair of John's boxer shorts, which he has been determinedly ignoring and not blushing about Karkat touching for the past ten minutes, rolls off the pile as Karkat extends a claw out and takes the mug. "Uh, are you sure you can -" John begins, and then he shuts up as Karkat disappears back into the heap of laundry. So much for asking him not to spill hot chocolate on anything. This has so much potential to go horribly wrong.

Yeah, Karkat's not on top of the pile anymore; he's buried himself in it. John looked that up on his phone while the cocoa heated up, and wowwwww, surprise! That's a really bad sign, too. It means Karkat is trying and failing to create a suitable sleeping environment in the absence of a recooperacoon; other sites hinted that a lot of the dizziness and fever could be the result of a troll with high tolerance for sopor slime going through the initial stages of withdrawal, on top of the insomnia that would result from deprivation. There are some trolls who eat or shoot the stuff to get high, and their reaction to withdrawal can be scary violent. But all trolls raised with recooperacoons develop that tolerance to the soporifics they ingest through their lungs and skin on a regular basis, and by puberty need it to sleep through the night.

John is starting to get a sickeningly suspicious gut feeling. Because the problem doesn't seem to be that Karkat's body can't sleep. In fact, all signs show that his body is so ready for sleep, it's willing to drop Karkat where he stands. He's so frazzled John is pretty sure that Karkat would have fallen apart today regardless of the Dave Debacle, which is the only reason Dave is just getting the silent treatment right now.

No, the problem is Karkat. Karkat complains about insomnia all the time; it's why he always looks so exhausted, with semi-permanent shadows under his eyes, and it's apparently bothered him all his life. But John has never questioned why the sopor wouldn't be working if Karkat slept in the 'coon like he's supposed to, never even really thought about it.

But if Karkat has been purposely starving himself of sopor slime, for whatever reason -

It would look like this.

Well. They're not getting any younger here, and Karkat's not really getting any better. Time to man up and cajole Karkat into listening to reason. "Karkat?" John clears his throat, hearing the faint slurping noises from within the pile pause. "Hey, Karkat? I think we need to, you know. Talk."

Another pause that stretches too long. John has never known Karkat to be at a loss for words, ever, in their entire friendship - well apart from that one time John had clumsily stitched together an Heir-themed cat doll for Karkat's wriggling day. Karkat couldn't speak English for nearly two hours, rocking back and forth on the floor clutching the doll and clicking in rapid-fire Alternian while Sleepless in Seattle played in the background. That had been hilarious, and John feels a pang of sadness, thinking about how happy they'd been back then. How had he let Karkat get this sick?

He's an awful friend.

Urgh! No time for a pity party! Not when Karkat needs him to be the voice of medical reason!

"Yeah, John, what is it?" Karkat slurs at last, burrowing through the clothes to stare at John with an eye so dark it looks like someone punched him. "If it's about anything but pile and copious amounts of chocolate pie, I will - I - I don't even know what. Nnngh."

He can't even finish a metaphor. This is serious.

"I reeeeally don't think chocolate pie will help right now, Karkat." John hesitates while the goldenrod yellow mug moves within the pile and Karkat slurps noisily. "We need to talk about maybe going to the hospital. Uh, maybe?"

"What. That's a fucking stupid idea, why would you even say that?" Karkat snaps immediately, the hot chocolate slopping a little as he sits up. John winces, trying not to think which of his shirts just made the ultimate sacrifice, but at least Karkat moved! "Oh my fucking god, is this because I fell asleep in the car?"

"Karkat, you didn't fall asleep, you were unconscious!" John says, gripping his knees. The kneecaps creak a little under the force of the grip he can exert, but he doubts the sound is as loud for Karkat as it is for John. "I checked your eyes, and you wouldn't respond when I flicked you on the cheek -"

"Flicking me -" Karkat shifts inside the pile again, but there's too many layers of laundry and blankets for John to discern what he's doing. "I'm just a little tired, John. You worrying dumbass, if you were sleeping, I would let you sleep."

John can't restrain himself anymore. He yanks off the top of the pile. Karkat hisses. Like, a legitimate hissing noise that John thinks he's only heard a troll make once or twice before in his lifetime. Karkat yanks one of John's hoodies over his head and hides his entire face under it. "Because if you flick near enough to the eye, your reflexes should have kicked in. People don't like things hitting near their eyes, it's totally an evolutionary thing! You didn't even twitch when I opened your eye, Karkat!"

John had nearly veered into a stop sign when he realized Karkat wasn't responding, his heart pounding a tattoo against his rib cage until he realized Karkat was still breathing. Yeah, he isn't ever going to mention that, ever. His dad and Karkat would both have heart attacks if they knew! Sometimes it's just better to keep things quiet, like when John occasionally flies to school against protocol. As long as no one is hurt...
"Because I was asleep, you panmelted, paranoid suburban bumpkin," Karkat says, sniffling. "As much as the sympathy is appreciated, it really wasn't all that big of a deal, John." He mashes the hoodie against his face with both hands, and oh no. Ohhhh nooo. John can't see the hot chocolate mug. Oh, his dad is gonna be so maaaad… "Hang on, did you wash these?" Karkat demands, pulling the hoodie off his face.

"Of course we did, that's the dry laundry," John makes a face. "Hang on, why? What's wrong with that? People tend to do laundry an awful lot, Karkat…"

"Doesn't smell like you. Ugh. Everything is awful, John." Full of righteous outrage, Karkat lets his arm fall to the side and covers his face with just a claw, the hoodie discarded. Without the concealing bulk of the laundry pile he looks like…a total trainwreck. John thinks it's that same hoodie they got coffee all over nearly five months ago in a post-chemistry experiment gone horribly wrong, an ancient and ratty article of clothing that should have been consigned to an incinerator ages ago, and in hindsight he can't believe Karkat in his right mind would ever wear it out in public, let alone to school.

It's really cute. Which - ack! No! John shakes his head vigorously, recognizing Karkat's ploy before it can send him off into seriously inappropriate daydreaming. "Everything is awful because you need to sleep, but you aren't letting yourself, are you? This isn't just insomnia anymore, and it's hurting you, Karkat! Please let me and my dad take you to the hospital."

Karkat raises a middle finger, then twists it around at some weird angle. He says he does that to give it that extra pizzazz for a particularly eloquent 'fuck you.' Soooo rude. "Sleeping is the problem, not the solution," he growls, which doesn't explain anything because Karkat is a total BUTTFACE. "I'm...fine...I just…"

The middle finger hand wavers, and then topples over. John squints, and his mouth falls open when he hesitantly reaches out to poke Karkat's cheek.

This time, Karkat flinches appropriately when John's finger prods too close to his eye, spluttering. But did he just fall asleep mid sentence? "Cut it out, Egbert!" Karkat says, covering his face defensively. "It's called shooshpapping and not 'poke your moirail's eye out' for a reason, you know."

Oh man. John folds his arms and leans back, because he doesn't know how he feels about this whole moirail thing when Karkat is still reeeeeeally attractive in other ways, but he is aware that if he lets himself, he'll start shooshing Karkat just to ease the troll's distress. But he can't do that - shooshing is only a stopgap here, and if he calms Karkat down enough he'll just continue to insist this isn't a problem. "Fine. I won't shooshpap you, either. At all. Not until you listen to me!"

Karkat gives him an affronted look that has none of his usual bile. His eyes just look too tired to pull it off anymore. "I'm listening," he croaks. "I just don't need to go within a mile of a hospital. You're overreacting."

John wants to facepalm. But he needs to focus. Karkat could fall unconscious again any second. "Will you at least explain why sleeping is the problem? It's really hard to know what to do when you won't tell me what the problem is!"

Karkat kicks his feet deeper into the pile of laundry. John thinks he might be getting ready to rebury himself. "Sleeping is a fucking travesty. Why the hell did our species evolve to need sleep. It's idiotic."

"That doesn't explain anything, Karkat. Why do you hate sleep-"
"Because when I sleep, I see you die!" Karkat explodes, sitting all the way up. His eyes are wild and the claws he's digging into the pile just tore a hole straight through something plaid. "That's why, okay! You just - you die, over and over, and I don't want to have nightmares about that! Nothing is worth seeing that!"

Well.

Wait.

...What?!

John may or may not have said all that out loud. He really can't tell. He's just kind of - yeah, he has no idea what to feel right now. "Karkat, what the hell?" he says at last, rocking back on his heels. "How long has this been a thing?" He's got an inkling, but it was so long ago and he was tired himself at the time, with a fucked up arm, chatting with Karkat and Rose and Dave at like four in the morning after -

"Since - two Saturdays ago? Fuck, maybe, I can't keep track of the days anymore." Karkat mashes the heel of his palms against his eyes again. "At first I thought it was a one-off thing and then suddenly every night, and fuck everything about that. I just - fuck. I need you. I need you to be okay. You have no idea-"

"I am okay, Karkat, I'm right here!" John can't help it; he unfolds his arms and lunges forward, tugging Karkat's wrists away from his poor eyes. Karkat blinks at him, furious and teary and haunted all at once. John can only think back to all the minor blowups over the past few weeks - all those 'ragefits,' as Karkat called them - and smack himself inwardly for not realizing there had to be some underlying cause. Karkat has a temper, yeah, but before all this (before New York, he thinks uneasily, before blowing that thought away, too) it had never been so bad that Karkat couldn't function without John shooshing him down to a standstill. All of those meltdowns had been part of this, and John had to have been so blind to miss it.

Karkat is right - he really is a dumbass. John pulls him into a hug, rocking when Karkat snarls and yanks him down to the pile with grasping claws. "I'm here, Karkat, I'm right here,;" he repeats, because repetition works wonders when Karkat is freaking out. "I'm sorry, I should have asked you if the nightmares were getting worse. You could have just told me what they were about -"

"And sound like even more of a freak?" Karkat hiccups. He's swallowing and hiccupping in huge gulps, which is a Thing he does sometimes, in a desperate attempt not to cry or scream or something. "God, John, I just - don't want - to sleep -"

John can feel his heart breaking into little pieces over this. It aches. Karkat shakes in his arms, his body fever-hot and strung too thin. Karkat's not small, not really, but he feels like it right now. "But you need to sleep," he says, because he can't forget the point of this conversation. "If you've been trying not to dream - when's the last time you spent a full night in sopor?"

"...You know I can't answer that." Karkat shudders. "It's supposed to take care of dreams. What's the point of it if it doesn't work?!!"

Bingo. Ding ding ding! Now, if only the confirmation that John's frantic Google searching had been right about this wasn't tainted by the fact that wow, this is just a shitty situation overall. "The point is, your body can't handle just being cut off like this. It's too much," John says, trying to sound really calm and sympathetic to soften the words. "And now you're fainting all over the place because your brain needs sleep, Karkat. I get that the dreams are awful, but you have to go to the hospital and get medicine or something -"
Karkat pulls away. John has to catch himself before he face plants on the pile. "No. Hospitals." Karkat's voice is final and unyielding, in spite of the hiccupping desperation. He sounds like he's about to sob. "And for the last time, I'm fine. This is fine. Sleep can suck my bulge. I am completely functional." Karkat turns over and buries his face in the laundry. He clearly thinks that this conversation is over, despite the fact that nothing he's said was a valid argument. Karkat in his right mind could shout down a lawyer; sleep-deprived Karkat doesn't seem to even realize he's not making sense anymore.

...Time to break out the cheap shots, then. "Will you do it for me?" John asks.

"What are you even fucking talking about, John?" Karkat says, groaning and massaging his bloodshot eyes, his back hunched up. It just calls John's attention back to how sickly Karkat looks, drawn in and flushed and so tightly wound he could snap at any moment. The sight just reaffirms John's resolve.

"I'm asking you to go to the hospital. Please. For me." Time to throw down the gauntlet. John steels himself for the dick move he's about to make. "Because seeing you hurt is hurting me."

Emotional blackmail at its finest. John feels shitty, so shitty, but he doesn't know what else to do! He looks at the boy he loves falling apart, and he finds that even doing this - playing on Karkat's pale instincts, using this weird relationship that John is still only half-okay with to manipulate him while he's sick and in pain - is something John is capable of.

It's an astounding act of assholery. Not even all that positive self-affirmation training the therapist taught John is going to a dent in the self-loathing that smears through John's mind as the words leave his mouth.

But his muscles are corded steel, his teeth grit past the despair that makes him want to burst out into tears, and his mind whisks the self-loathing away on a gust of air to the back of his mind to deal with later, because he is doing this for Karkat. He can hate himself all he wants later, but he won't let the depression drag him down for a nice pity party. Not until he knows Karkat is okay.

More and more, he thinks, he just loves Karkat. He'd compromise everything he is for Karkat to be happy and safe.

_Dad won't like that, at all._ Compromising everything he is...he thinks that includes some of his most important precepts as a hero. If Karkat asked - if Karkat knew what John was, and wanted him to stop being Heir - John thinks he would agree. And there is no way that syncs up with the code of honor his dad has instilled in him over a lifetime of training him to use his powers responsibly and well.

But then again -

_Dad doesn't have to know._

It's amazing how simple moral dilemmas become when you're too busy worrying about your moirail to waffle around. After all, Karkat _doesn't know_ about John's powers, so the question of Karkat asking John to stop will never come up. John marvels at how easily his mind is able to shove that guilty, traitorous thought to the same dark place as the self-loathing when Karkat lifts his head full out of the pile to stare at John with a haunted, stricken expression.

He can do this for Karkat. He can be strong for Karkat. Even if it means Karkat hurts a little more in the meanwhile.
"It's not - what?" Karkat sounds small and confused, and that's John's fault. Blarhg.

(Like that's anything new.)

John looks down and to the side, letting all of the sick ache ease through the winds that are blowing most of his emotions to the back of his mind, so that some of his inner pain is visible on his face. "I hate that these are nightmares about me. I don't want to be the reason you're hurting yourself like this, Karkat. I'm sorry. Please?"

He hits just the right note of pleading that Karkat flinches physically and sits up. His expression is a lot less hazy now, as though John's words induced a little more clarity in his fevered brain. Which means no matter how shitty John feels, it's working. Karkat might actually listen to him, now.

John plows on ahead. "Either you go to the hospital, or you sleep in the recooperacoon for seven hours. At least."

He resigns himself to the fact that this is probably the best he's going to be able to do. He desperately wants Karkat to agree to see a doctor about this, but Karkat will never be willing to do that. He didn't know about the really specific, really weird nightmares when he thought this plan of attack up, but he'll just have to flow with it. Karkat, above all else, needs to sleep. Dreams or not.

"What -" Karkat shakes his head. "That won't help anything -"

John keeps going. "I know," he says quietly. "It won't help the nightmares, and I know you want to avoid them. But all this - the reason you can't even sit up straight? - it's because not sleeping and not getting sopor combined is killing you. The reason you feel so bad right now, like everything is awful, is at least partially withdrawal. Karkat, you haven't even been trying to sleep anymore, have you?"

What he does next probably crosses the line. But he can't let up. He sends a mental breeze sweeping through the dark part of his mind and deliberately pulls. The emotions he's looking for are recent - after all, Karkat had only just soothed them this morning. He injects all that hurt and stupid, irrational agony into his voice and deals the finishing blow. "You - this morning, you lied to me when you said you overslept and that was why you were late. And that really sucks, Karkat."

Karkat reaches out. His eyes are huge and round and he shakes his head, papping at John's face. John wants to dodge it, but also that would be kind of rude when Karkat is clearly distressed and John caused it on purpose. "No - fuck, fuck, fuck, John, that's not - I was trying to sleep, I swear, but I kept waking myself up all morning long and I didn't want to worry you more - you're okay? Are you okay? John, look at me, please -"

That's the thing about Karkat. Even when he's a feverish wreck in a pile of laundry, barely able to move without passing out, he's still worrying about John. Karkat is half out of his mind with sleep and sopor-deprivation, and he can still worry about John being a pathetic sack of shit this morning.

(John doesn't deserve that kind of love, ferocious and single-minded and protective. He doesn't know what to do with it.)

This is the single most unforgivable act of douchebaggery John has ever engaged in. This is something he doesn't think he can ever forgive himself for.

But he can do this for Karkat.

He presses his cheek against Karkat's palm and closes his eyes, resting there for a moment. It makes him feel better, but not by much. He doesn't think he'll feel better at all until Karkat goes to sleep. How is he supposed to feel okay when one of his best friends doesn't? "Please sleep?" he asks simply, opening his eyes and smiling.

And Karkat's resistance melts. John can see the exact moment his emotional blackmail accomplishes what reason and logic never could; Karkat lets his head fall forward with a groan of defeat. "Fine. Fuck you, John. Fine," he mumbles into John's chest. "I'll go the fuck to sleep."

Success.

John rubs both of Karkat's arms with his hands, very aware of the faint shakes that make Karkat's hands tremble. "And if I stay with you, will you be okay? Even if you have bad dreams, I'll be there. And you'll know I'm okay, and that it was all just a dream, and you can sleep some more."

"I...that would help," Karkat says, reluctant, and he lifts his head to palm his face. "Oh my god, I'm being a shitbrained moron again, aren't I? I'm sorry you have to put up with this." He laughs wryly. "Did you know, I just wanted to spend the afternoon making sure you were okay? Well, I took that plan and shot it in the face, didn't I?"

"I'm fine when you're fine, Karkat," John says. "And if you promise to sleep from now until - lets say 10 - we can go out to Denny's tomorrow instead. Since you seem to have some weird craving."

"I'll hold you to that, you manipulative moirail." Karkat still won't open his eyes, even when he knocks his forehead on John's shoulder. "Thank you for putting up with me," he says, so quiet John almost can't believe it's Karkat talking. There's just a general shouting volume that Karkat never quite dips below when he's talking, and hearing him anywhere near a regular whisper is...weird.

"I don't put up with you, Karkat. You're my friend. I just want you to be okay." John pats Karkat on the back. He doesn't get a response. When he blinks and pushes Karkat's head to the side, the troll just rolls with it.

Asleep again, hopefully. This way he can't go and change his mind before they get to his house! John scoops up Karkat with an arm under the troll's knees and has to shake away a flashback to the first night they met. He had rescued Karkat as Heir and flown him up to safety in much the same kind of hold.

It's still hard to think that if he hadn't been there to save Karkat, they might never have met. Crabdad would never have moved Karkat out to the suburbs in a fit of paranoia, and John would never have been friends with the troll.

He can only imagine how crazy he'd have gone in the past year and a half. Would he even have been sane to deal with Dark Star in New York without his friendship with Karkat to stabilize him through the school year? It's not something he likes to speculate on; it means acknowledging just how badly he had broken down before he met Dave, and John is sooo not in the mood to handle that kind of thing. He toes his shoes on in the front hall, fully intending to carry Karkat home, since it seems necessary.

His dad meets them there before John can fumble the door open. John looks up and smiles ruefully, trying for normalcy and failing because there's an unconscious troll in his arms while he leans back against the door to meet his dad's eyes. "Dad? I'm taking Karkat home, alright?"

"I can see that, John." His dad frowns at him sternly, arms folded. "No driving that car."

John rolls his eyes. "I won't." At least his dad isn't forbidding him from taking Karkat outright.

Parental authority established, Samuel lets his stern gaze soften, and he lowers his voice, eyeing Karkat with sympathy. "Anything I can do to help, son?" he asks. "I really am concerned about all John grits his teeth, because it's tempting. Really tempting. Karkat is sick and withdrawal isn't something to fool around with.

But he also knows Karkat would never forgive him if they took him to a hospital without permission. Karkat is a stubborn butt that way. "I think it would just make him more upset, and that's the last thing he needs right now. I'm going to stay and make sure he stays in the recooperacoon, but it's not like I can stay here all night, anyway."

His dad shoots him a warning look, but Karkat's totally out of it, and John lowered his voice already. They're fine. "Good luck, then," is all he says. "Don't stay too late." Then he chuckles, and winks. "And if Karkat tries to get out of this, tell him there will in fact be a chocolate pie in it for him if he promises to take better care of himself."

John laughs too.

Then he blanches in horror. "How did you know about that?!" he asks, realizing that his dad knows about the Chocapocalypse pie oh god he's screwed.

His dad smiles, shaking his head. "Son, I know everything that goes on in my kitchen. Especially when I find Oreo packages in the trash." His grin freezes. "And if you ever eat one of those yourself, you will be attending swim practice on a far more regular basis again. I trust you to make good health choices, John."

Oops. With that parting shot that somehow manages to combine pride and admonishment in a way only dads seem to master, John's dad strides away toward the study once more, humming around the unlit pipe in his mouth.

...John decides not to tell Karkat about that offer at all. Perhaps it will be best for everyone involved if the Chocapocalypse never sees the light of day again. Shuddering, John adjusts his grip on Karkat - the troll's not all that heavy, not for someone as strong as John - and opens the door by pushing down the handle with his foot. He hops outside and shuts it again, and sets off down the street.

He just hopes this works, and Karkat doesn't really need to go to the hospital. John starts jogging. He doesn't think he can get Karkat in a recooperacoon soon enough, at this point.

Crabdad is awesome. John loves the lusus to pieces because he's a riot! But when he descends upon John and Karkat in a flurry of waving claws and piercing whistles, it's kiiiiinda inconvenient, because John has his arms full and he can't fend the crab off. "H-hey, Crabdad!" he laughs, while Crabdad taps him on the head with a heavy claw that would probably have knocked anyone else flat. "Yeah, it's good to see you too! Just hang on, I need to get Karkat -"

Crabdad was going to notice eventually, of course, but John slaps himself internally for actually drawing attention to Karkat's less than conscious state. Crabdad reeks back, whistling in distress, and his enormous eyes blink rapidly as he falls to his knees and shakes his claws at the ceiling. He then reaches out and tugs at Karkat's free arm with a claw, skreeing inquiries at John.

Oops. Karkat isn't waking up with all this screeching, and he's the only one who can interpret Crabdad. John adjusts his arm around Karkat's shoulders and grimaces apologetically. "I'm sorry, he's just really tired," he says, making sure to enunciate clearly and loudly. Crabdad chirrs at him, which means nothing to John, but he thinks it means 'tell me more human child.' "Yeah, he hasn't been sleeping well so he kind of fell asleep at school. No big deal!"

Crabdad clutches his head with his claws and lets out a despairing screech. Okay, John should stop talking while he's ahead; who even knows what Crabdad is hearing! Lusii are weird in that they vaguely understand languages, but their own individual sounds are a more reliable method of communication. For all John knows, Crabdad has just inferred that Karkat's going to sleep for a hundred years or something, which is soooo not what John intended. Ack. It's a good thing he's learned over the past few years never to tell Crabdad the gritty details about things - Karkat may not be very nice to his lusus, but he's right in that Crabdad has a tendency to overreact.

On the other hand. This...could be hilarious. John can't help the prank that springs to mind, and before he can really stop himself he kneels down next to Crabdad, angling Karkat awkwardly. "Crabdad?" he says solemnly. "I don't know if you understand that you're leaving soon, but...do you...want to put Karkat to bed?" He would say 'tuck him in,' but that's obviously a human thing.

Crabdad's reaction is everything John ever wanted in life, and more. The lusus tips back his spiny head and lets out an ululating screech unlike anything John has ever heard, and Karkat wakes up with a spasm of panic. "What - no - NOOOO!" Karkat yelps as Crabdad reaches out and scoops the troll into his waiting claws. "JOHN, WHAT FRESH FUCKERY HAVE YOU WROUGHT - I THOUGHT YOU LOVED ME YOU BASTARD -"

It continues even as Crabdad scuttles up the stairs, ignoring Karkat's flailing attempts at escape with the single-minded determination of a lusus on a mission.

Glorious. Karkat's parting shrieks only make the victory all the sweeter. Truly, the pranksters gambit belongs to John. He wheezes with laughter on his knees for a moment, before clearing his throat and pulling himself together. No need to have a laughing fit in Karkat's entryway with the door hanging open. Karkat's neighbors already know Crabdad is weird, but John still tries to keep up the façade of normalcy. You know. Sometimes. He gets to his feet and shuts the door, still grinning wide, and follows up the stairs to Karkat's room at a more sedate pace. The urge to fly himself up is almost overwhelming, his temporary good mood infecting the wind, but he quashes it, as always. He's almost as comfortable in the Vantas household as he is in his own home, which is always awkward when his control slacks off.

Repressing the urge to fly just reminds him of why he's here, though, and his smile falters. Crabdad's antics still amuse him as the sounds of a struggle continue in Karkat's room, but John shuts down a little. His worry for Karkat casts a pall on everything.

He steps into Karkat's room. It's no more of a mess than usual, which is to say, it's basically spotless. Karkat is better about John about keeping his room in order, but hey, Karkat doesn't wake up with the wind trying to tug him off the mattress for an early morning flight! There's a neat pile of old comics and textbooks in the corner, and the hero posters on the walls are pristine compared to the battered mess John's accidental power misfires sometimes make of his own.

The recooperacoon, however, has obviously tanked. There's green sopor everywhere, and droplets of ooze fly up to coat the ceiling as Karkat raises a foot to plant it repeatedly on Crabdad's face. It's not a bad kick, actually - how did Karkat even kick that high? Like, wow, not bad! - but Crabdad claims victory in the end, aided by Karkat's poor mental condition. With a skree it shoves Karkat all the way down into the 'coon, sickly green slime overflowing onto the carpet.

Crabdad 1, Karkat -9000. In a contest of sick child versus concerned lusus - well, it's just not really a contest at all, John has learned.

"John, you traitor," Karkat grumbles from within the 'coon, heaving himself up with difficulty as Crabdad whistles and tries to shove the troll's head back into the slime. "You unleashed this. Why am I even friends with you. Why."

"Because I blackmail you into sleeping when you're being a dumb butt!" John replies as cheerfully as he can, walking over to stand by the 'coon. "Just give in Karkat. You cannot resist it! It's for your own good!"

"Damn you two and your unholy human-lusus alliance," Karkat says, rubbing his temples. He has green slime slathered all over his claws and up the arms of his hoodie, so he smears some on his temples and hair without noticing it. John coughs through another laugh. "I can't wait until this fatass retires. Cannot. Wait."

John decides not to comment. Crabdad doesn't seem to notice Karkat's negative sentiment, and Karkat is sick, so he gets a pass on the whole bullying Crabdad front. John is such a good friend! "Yeah, well, for now you're stuck with us. Just go to sleep, Karkat."

"I will, once this asshat stops - furgh -" Crabdad shoves Karkat under the slime again, cutting his words off in a gurgle that John interprets as Karkat inhaling slime.

"I think he's okay now. I'll watch him," John says to Crabdad. The lusus looks up from his loving care and skrees quizzically until John repeats his words. Then, grumbling and ruffling John's hair with a slime-covered claw (oh, grossss!), Crabdad waddles out of the room, his feet clicking on the stairs as the crab retreats, his duty complete.

John touches the sopor in his hair and pulls a face. He's gotten sopor slime in his hair by accident before, and it takes three rounds of shampoo before it comes out of human hair. Eurgh.

"Karma," Karkat says, spitting a mouthful of green sopor slime out as he emerges from the 'coon again.

"Get back in there," John says, rolling his eyes. He stays out of Karkat's reach nonetheless, because Karkat in a vengeful mood wouldn't hesitate to try and yank John into the slime with him. "I'll be right here if you need me."

Karkat is quiet for a moment, and John looks at him. The troll has his head resting on his arms, all of him sticky and slimy and kind of gross, but he frowns at John (oh shit, John left Karkat's glasses on the counter at home, didn't he. Oops…) with a tired kind of consternation. "You can relocate the pile if you want," Karkat mumbles, his eyes already half-lidded and blinking slower and slower as that lungful of sopor starts to seep into his system. John is probably an expert on how sopor slime works after all that Googling, which is something he never thought he'd be able to put on his resume!

"Don't have to sit on the floor. Don't give me that look, I know you and you would totally sit there like an idiot, John. My pile of random shit is your pile."

John hums and smiles. It's an incredibly stupid, dopey smile - he knows this because Karkat rolls his eyes with extra intensity. "Alright, I'll do that. Now. Sleep!"

"Fine, fine," Karkat grumbles, and he closes his eyes. It's not as much that he slides back into the sopor slime as he falls asleep again, and the sliding back happens totally by accident. Also, John gives his forehead a poke to start the process, grinning as Karkat vanishes into the slime. There's a twinge of anxiety at the thought that Karkat might not be able to breathe, which is so stupid it's hard to believe John was the one who thought it. Sopor slime is designed so trolls breathe it in, after all. It only unsettles John so much because he can't feel the air that usually rushes in and out of Karkat's lungs, a regular metronome that has ordered John's days since he first became friends with the troll - it's all replaced by the slime medium, now. John doesn't know how that doesn't feel like drowning. A breeze plucks at his hair, stirred by the moment of heart-thumping worry, and he sends it away.

Now, though, he has a good six hours he has to while away. The smart thing to do would have been to bring his backpack and homework along with him to work on, but as has been established, today has been kind of hectic. John hesitates, then texts his dad rather than calling him - Karkat seems down for the count, but he doesn't want his voice to give the troll an excuse to escape the 'coon again - asking him to bring his backpack of textbooks over.

He receives a text in the affirmative a moment later, his dad as punctual as ever in promising to drop the bag off downstairs with Crabdad in an hour, along with a reminder to clean up the pile in the living room before heading out to work tonight. Just another thing for John to remember to do. Bluhhh.

He pauses, closing the text window to stare at the golden blob of the Pesterchum app. It's been buzzing nonstop since he started ignoring Dave in favor of taking care of the Karkat situation, but it went quiet a half-hour ago. Not, of course, before Dave seems to have racked up a grand total of 143 alerts, at which point he must have stopped just because Dave is a weirdo that way.

...Does John really want to scroll through all those messages?

He sighs, and opens the app. Dave is his friend. And, well, he can't give Dave the silent treatment forever. For one thing, Dave is the kind of person who, if ignored for long enough, would probably pick up and fly out to Seattle just to spam John in person in the name of irony (and because Dave can't just admit he's worried, like a normal person). Besides, John hadn't actually seen the conversation, other than the parts Dave had copy-pasted for him, gloating, and for all he knows Dave wasn't actually all that much of a butt to Karkat in context. With Karkat as sick as he is, he might have collapsed regardless of whether Dave provoked him or not. So maaaybe Dave deserves a response, at least. Since John is obviously the responsible friend this afternoon, he opens the near-permanent chat window with turntechGodhead.

Oh god. So many messages. So many. He's not reading all of this. He scrolls as fast as the phone will go, catching glimpses of such choice phrases as 'frothing pimpjuggler' and 'a meteoric shindig all up in here' and 'had no idea i could be such a walking feathery asshole i swear,' but he figures if he asks Dave can just give a summary at the end.

TG: and then they make out
TG: come on man i know youre intrigued now
TG: you cant resist this kind of mad gossip
TG: i hear things man
TG: …
TG: im here all week folks
TG: stay tuned next for loud shortwave radio squelches
TG: before i proceed to drop the bass
TG: and cry into this tainted jar of dead baby meercat

EB: omg dave, 146 messages.
EB: i think that is actually legitimately a new record!
TG: what can i say i was inspired
TG: also ive been blasting podcasts for the past two hours to drown out bro hes been yelling at doc lalonde
EB: wait, your brother can yell?
EB: i just kind of assumed he didn't have that ability…
TG: you and me both john
TG: secondary dave stole my ipod and dr dres but i forgive because i am benevolent as fuck that way and i think hes homeless
EG: is he really orange? :0
TG: like pumpkin pie filling fresh out of a can TG: but yeah today we learned bro can yell im wondering if a celebratory strife is in order

Trust Dave to be more concerned with learning Bro Strider can raise his voice above a gruff mutter than with the fact that at some point he rescued a winged version of himself from the Midnight Crew. John just shakes his head and sighs. It seems like no matter how much research he does on the Crew, there's more and more to dig up beneath the surface, weird things that don't match up with the typical activities of a criminal organization. Case in point, attempting to kidnap Dave and Rose at some point in their childhood, before the two would have even been old enough to pose a threat to a bunch of lowlife criminals.

From the impression Dave gave at lunch, before the Karkat debacle, Dave-too seems to have been totally unrelated to the Crew before being mistaken for the real Dave. But that still leaves the question of where a human-bird hybrid of Dave would have come from at all.

So confusing!

EB: i'm a little more interested in the fact that you have an orange bird twin who apparently appeared out of nowhere. i didn't really read everything, were you arguing with him at some point?
TG: hey davetoo is pretty chill
TG: some hiccups at first but now hes passed the fuck out on the bed so hes almost tolerable
EB: that's because he's not conscious, dave TG: exactly
TG: also just fyi i need you to pass on a message to your trollbro
TG: since i am being respectful as fuck of previous requests that i not get in the guy's face again
EB: siiiiigggghhhhh
EB: thank you, i appreciate that.
EB: does it involve boners or a really long rap because i would just copy-paste it at that point, i can never remember all the lyrics, and he's asleep right now
TG: what no
TG: def no boners here
TG: short and to the point just tell him i am not down with the kismespades thing
EB: ...kismesissitude?
EB: ...
EB: oh god, please tell me you didn’t come on to karkat while he was having a mental breakdown!
TG: dont be ridiculous it was before i realized it was shoutytroll
TG: since you know a certain beloved bro of mine didnt want to share his chumhandle with me
TG: thought it was some shitty anon so i went for an ironic blackrom anti-troll scenario
TG: but since karkles wasnt in his right mind i figure it should be established for the record that that was not a thing
TG: i dont do the hate square i swear
EB: yeah, yeah, i believe you :P anyway, you're too much of a softie for blackrom, dave!
TG: what
EB: i mean, come on! you can hide it all you want, but you and i both know the truth!

...Well. That's one way to cut a conversation short! John raises an eyebrow at the phone screen, half expecting Dave to pop back up in a new window any second now, but the radio silence continues for a good five minutes. He can only assume Dave is getting his ass royally handed to him on a silver platter.

Karkat whimpers in his sleep. John puts away his phone and focuses on taking care of his best friend.

He doesn't think to check for any other pending Pesterlogs, despite the alerts still pending in the application. He just assumes they were all from Dave.

He regrets that, later.

- Karkat wakes up screaming four times over the next six hours. Like, actual screams that bring Crabdad bursting back into the room, like clockwork. John has always read somewhere that people don't really bolt upright after a nightmare - the body is paralyzed during REM sleep to prevent that kind of thing when they wake up suddenly. But Karkat screams into the sopor like a choking gurgle, and after a moment of thrashing, sits up to fling himself half out of the recooperacoon and grab for John's hand. John dragged the whole pile up against the side of the 'coon after the first time it happened. He'd just come up the stairs from picking up his backpack and Karkat's glasses from his dad at the front door and Karkat had sprinted across the room to tackle him. He calmed down and stopped swearing and hyperventilating after a few minutes with his claws pressed down on John's wrist, over the pulse point.

Then, of course, John has to talk him back into the 'coon, which eats up precious time before John has to leave. Between bouts of screaming and homework, John power naps, because the way this day is playing out, he won't have slept since the night before last!

For a while, after the first few terrifying outbursts, John debates skipping work tonight. He'd hoped for some reason that Karkat would improve over time, as his subconscious realized John hadn't even left the room, but that's not the case. But that's because John is a stupid, naïve dumbass, as Karkat would say, and he has too much optimism. Karkat needs him to sleep again after the nightmares, and John would have to be a total asshole to leave him alone with such fucked up dreams.

Of course, there's still the question of why Karkat's brain decided to fixate on John dying at all. That's more than a little weird, but no way is John going to pull a Rose and psychoanalyze Karkat when he's like this!

When ten o'clock rolls around, though, Karkat won't hear anything of it. "No. No more sleep," he says. John makes a noise of protest when the troll sits on the edge of the recooperacoon and starts peeling slime residue off his horns. The shadows under his eyes have lightened, but the yellows of his eyes are redder than ever, bloodshot something awful, and he keeps rubbing them. It's kind of an improvement, except not. "Agh, shit. I need eye drops. Just go home, John, you wake up too early to stay up much later doing homework."

At least he's talking in full sentences again! "If you think you can sleep more, I can stay -" John begins.

"Absolutely not. I have filled the sleep quota for the day, dammit." Karkat waves him off, cracking his neck to the side with a pop. "Go home. I need to shower, I'm absolutely disgusting right now."

"We're doing this again tomorrow, if we have to," John says warningly. When Karkat bares his teeth in a snarl, John frowns right back. "Try to get to sleep again at some point tonight, but I'm totally instigating mandatory naptime until this whole thing blows over." He catches Karkat's eye, and sighs gustily. "Don't you want to spend time with me, Karkat?"

There is only one correct answer to that, of course. Karkat rubs his face and staggers to his feet, hardly swaying at all. Progress! "Yes, I do," he replies, palming his face with both hands before glowering at John. "And you know it. Dammit."

John swings the backpack over his shoulder and leans over to hug Karkat one last time. His shirt is already covered in sopor, anyway; he's resigned to it being a really gross hug. "I'm glad you're okay," he says. Something sticks in his throat when he swallows. "So stay okay, got it?"

"Got it, you sappy fuck."

Letting go is hard. Really hard. He somehow does it, anyway, and walks out of the room. He waves to Crabdad on his way out of the house, smiling wearily when the lusus churrs at him questioningly, and then takes off down the street. The neighbor across from Karkat's house is outside for some reason, inspecting the tail light of his car, and watches John until he waves. The neighbor hastily turns back to the car after that.

He runs the rest of the way home surrounded by an insistent stream of air. The sky is dark and it feels weird not to be in uniform by now. The wind bursts out with an excited pop into the house when John opens the door and steps inside, his hair a total windswept mess already. "Hey, Dad! I'm home!"

He gets a vague reply from the direction of the study as he hurries up the stairs, his shoes thumping on the floor as he darts into his room. He needs a way to work off all the stress and worry from this afternoon, and the best way he knows to do that has always been hero work or swimming. Once he gets his body moving, he won't have room to dwell on all that crud he shoved to the back of his mind while he was taking care of Karkat. The longer he can put that off, he figures, the better. Part of him longs to talk to Rose or Dave about it, but that would mean letting the dumb depressing thoughts out of their dark space, and he might not be able to go to work at all if Rose or Dave really get going!

Later! After work!

Plastering a smile on his face, John leaves his backpack beside the desk and opens the wall safe as quickly as he can, his fingers a little jittery. He changes hastily and in pieces rather than in his usual routine, stripping off his pants and lacing up his boots before realizing that he hasn't put on his uniform pants yet. His head is all over the place, tonight! The mask gets stuck over his entire face when he tugs it over his hair, and he tips over sideways a little as he manhandles it under the collar of his jacket. He runs his fingers through his hair, and grimaces at the gelled feel of the spikes where sopor slime dried in it. He ducks into the bathroom, snaps on his goggles with a manic grin, and turns on the shower, scrubbing at his hair violently until the worst of the slime washes out.

Even before he can grab a towel to dry it, the wind whirling around him dries his hair. By now, John can't deny that, for whatever reason, he is eager to get out tonight. His heart dances in his chest, and even that darkness in his mind doesn't feel all that heavy. Blinking, he reaches inward to his connection to the wind and tries to interpret the usual slew of impressions he gets from the air around him.

What he feels surprises him. Usually the wind lets him have insight into where urgent crimes are being committed, leading him to where he is most needed with a rising feeling of urgency. This sensation is similar, but it's not a bad kind of urgent. It feels almost like something momentous, something exciting is about to happen. John has no idea why, but the wind is sure of it, and it wants him to be there when it happens.

He shrugs. It's weird, but hey, the wind has never steered him wrong before! And he could use some good news, tonight! Heir straps the hammer to his back and slides the window open, ready to give himself over to the breeze when -

"John! Young man, the laundry!"

One foot on the windowsill, Heir freezes - and slumps forward. John tears off the goggles and tosses them on the bed. "Yes, sir!" he calls back, dumping Casey next to the goggles and yanking down his mask. Impatient and disbelieving, the wind wraps around his head and tugs him back toward the window. Every part of John is sooo ready to get out and flying, and in the end he just gives in, if only to keep the breeze from rising to an impatient gale. He takes a flying leap off the top of the steps and lands gently at the bottom, hovering slightly before dropping to the ground.

His dad taps a foot, standing by the pile of messy laundry Karkat left strewn all over the living room. John laughs nervously, caught in the act of flying in the house, and hurries to gather everything up and ferry it all to the laundry room.

Sitting on the floor in the exact center of the pile is the yellow mug, completely drained of hot chocolate. Karkat hadn't spilled a drop.

- He's late to work. Duh.

Well, Heir doesn't really have a set time that he has to start patrolling by. But still. Bluhhhh. He's glad he napped with Karkat, or he wouldn't even be able to function. Working so late into the morning with Hemogoblin is biting him in the ass, now, and he can't wait for his schedule to get back to normal, again.

That being said, he meets up Hemogoblin almost immediately. It's close to 10:30 by the time Heir locates the other hero, but he wants to check in right away after the close call that was all of last night and this morning.

Once again, the wind guides him to the public library - what is it with Hemogoblin and this place? Heir stops himself from speculating on that, because he gets the feeling that the library must be close to where Hemogoblin's civilian self lives, or at least his base of operations. It's one thing to analyze Hemogoblin's powers and know how to beat him in the event the other hero goes bad; it would just be rude to go snooping around about his actual identity! Heir couldn't help finding out Dave's and Rose's, under the confused circumstances of their friendship, but he can at least try for some kind of professional courtesy with Hemogoblin, since he fights crime with the troll way more often than he sees Flashstep or Seer.

If, that is, the Seer of Light even still exists. John winces and pushes the fact that he hasn't heard from Rose since last night away so he can stay in the Heir mindset. Rose hasn't exactly been forthcoming on when she intends to take up hero work again, if ever. But Rose would never back down from a challenge, and John can't imagine she'd quit over something that wasn't even her fault! Yeah!

"You made the local news again," Heir says, dropping in after Hemogoblin reaches the roof. "Looks like that Crichton guy wasn't kidding about that confession. You're probably in the clear!"

"Thank fucking god," Hemogoblin says. Heir inspects the troll's masked face carefully - out of concern! Concern and no other reason, darn it! - and feels another minor worry unhook from his scrambled brain. Last night Hemogoblin had been waaaay stressed out over the accusation, but despite the sleepless night they both had, he looks a lot better. His eyes gleam like red lamps and his crooked grin looks much more effortless, not strained by the anxiety of being suspected of arson and near terrorism. "And maybe this time the police will actually bother to keep one of those Crew thugs on lock down. I can't imagine they'd even consider releasing him on bail." The sarcasm is back in his drawl, too.

Heir shrugs and sighs. He gets it. "That's just how the legal system works - I don't think they have enough evidence to deny him bail altogether, but who knows? Maybe he'll be low enough on the hierarchy that they won't send another bomb!"

Seriously, enough with the explosions! Three gaping holes have been blown in his city in the past few weeks, three husks of buildings that sit black and cold in a sea of bright lights when Heir flies overhead. Each one marks a sucker punch from the Midnight Crew, a grim reminder that Heir hadn't even been in town to prevent Hearts Boxcars from escaping the justice he so deserved to face.

And the last, clinging hope Heir had held, that Crichton was just a last gasp from Hearts Boxcars's group, died when Crichton had laughed, eyes wide and reverent, and promised to bring down the retribution of Diamonds Droog upon the city. He wishes he'd had time today to look into that name - according to Samuel Egbert's contacts, any suit member of the Midnight Crew can be considered a serious threat, but specific information about the four suits is hard to come by. News coverage doesn't dig deep enough when reporting Crew criminal activities, and the process of drawing more specific police reports from across the country could take months to obtain.

He'll feel a lot more comfortable once he knows what kind of damage Diamonds Droog will try to dish out, so they can prepare for her arrival. He's not letting another member of the Midnight Crew terrorize Seattle.
"As long as they don't bail him out, I'll be ecstatic," Hemogoblin mutters. The tiny crimson spikes on his costume shift as he stretches his arms over his head, one hand clasping the other wrist. The look he gives Heir has lowered eyelids and thick eyelashes and a slow wink that does funny things to Heir's insides. Like he swallowed air into his stomach rather than his lungs, and the breeze buoys him up further. "Hmm? What do you say? Want to spend the night together?"

That's innuendo again, isn't it. He can tell. It wasn't all that subtle. "I would be honored to kick criminal butt with you tonight, Hemogoblin," Heir replies, his grin irrepressible. He doesn't think he can match Hemogoblin for sheer flirtiness, so the best he can do be himself!

Heir feels happy. Giddy, even. None of this makes sense, but he can't seem to repress it. As long as it doesn't interfere with the job, he decides, it can't hurt that he's in a better mood than usual. Even the reactionary guilt over feeling happy when Karkat is still suffering at home can't beat him down as he grins widely at Hemogoblin and receives a sultry smirk in reply.

Seriously. Tonight is going to be awesome! He can feel it!

But even with all these warning signs, he is still completely unprepared for what happens next.

Jade drinks her Slurpee and watches the skies. It's kind of chilly tonight, cool with a stiff breeze that whirls up her hair and nips almost like it's winter again. She shivers and buttons up her lab coat, which kind of ruins the dramatic billowy effect, but hey, this suit isn't really built for the cold. Also, the Slurpee probably isn't helping things, but it tastes like strawberries and angel tears, so bleh. Washington is a far cry from a tropical island in the Pacific, and she wonders how John stands it. Maybe he likes it? Weird people like the cold, right?

She huffs, and sits down, kicking her legs over the edge of the roof so she can swing them. Boooorrrred. "He's taking foreverrr," she complains to WV, who nods and goes back to patting Bec awkwardly on the head. Bec is taking it like a champ, and she's glad the two of them are bonding. She never really knows what's going through WV's head (except when he wants soda, in which case oh god does he let her know) but she knows that he isn't always comfortable around the wolf. Which is a shame, since Bec is such a sweetie! But WV is pretty short, so she just thinks maybe WV is justifiably afraid of an artificial canine that could probably swallow him whole. If, you know, Bec ate. Or did anything other than sleep and float around like the lazy bones it is.

Her teammates are just lucky they're her adorable best friends, okay? And if John doesn't hurry up and get his head in the game, Jade is just going to have to start doing the hero thing without him! How are they supposed to team up if he never responds to her messages!

Sighing pointedly, Jade hovers in midair and turns herself upside down. She takes out her cell phone and starts a very irate Pesterspam. Because John is sooooo cramping her style right now.

GG: this is sooo lame :

GG: the lamest, john!

GG: where are you?!

GG: i'm waiting~~~

GG: if you don't show up soon, i'm totally going to do the thing without you! i mean it this time!

GG: oh, hang on, someone's doing some crime thing like right under my building.

GG: so rude. sooooo rude.
"Hold down the fort?" Jade asks WV, and she receives a chipper salute in reply. "And keep an eye out for that big dummy!" Not bothering to right herself, she summersaults forward and over the edge of the building, teleporting herself down to ground level as she pulls her aviator goggles down.

"Not tonight!" she announces cheerfully, setting down behind the assailant. From the feel of things, he's working alone, at least, because no one else is moving in this alleyway that would indicate a secondary mugger waiting in the wings.

The man whips his knife around almost before he turns to face her himself, which is pretty unsafe! Not how you should handle a knife at all, if you know what you're doing! Just another black mark in his name that makes Sharpshooter fold her arms and pout at him sternly. "Back the fuck off, little girl!" he says harshly, holding the knife in a shaky grip that weaves a little, his thumb nearly slipping up onto the sharp of the blade itself. Yeah, this guy has noooo idea what he's doing. "The hell do you think you're doing?!"

"This!" Sharpshooter claps her hands together and teleports over the guy's head. She pulls the knife along with her, and then buries it in the side of the building, so deep in the stone it'll never come out in one piece. She lets the momentum carry her into a spin and kicks him in the side of the head. She throws out a "Hiiiiyah!" for fun because heck. Yes. He yelps and trips sideways, bringing up his hand before realizing that the knifekind is gone, and the blood drains out of his face when Sharpshooter continues to float there, grinning.

The look on people's faces when they realize what they're really up against? Priceless.

"Oh, fuck," he says.

"Basically," Sharpshooter agrees, and then she blinks out and lands behind him again, flicking a rifle from her sylladex as she knocks his feet out from under him. When he falls hard on his back, the air knocked out of him, she brings the rifle up and taps it against his forehead so he stops squirming, frozen. The safety is on, her finger is nowhere near the trigger, and this rifle honestly isn't even loaded - it's easy enough for Sharpshooter to load on the fly with her powers, so this gun is reserved for intimidation only. The thing with fighting regular people, of course, is that Sharpshooter can't exactly run in guns blazing. This is why she prefers giant robots and missiles, honestly - at least then she can break out the fun heavy artillery!

Still. It couldn't hurt to ask. Slinging the rifle over her shoulder, Sharpshooter nudges the guy with her foot and crouches down over him, poking at his cheek repeatedly until he responds with a pained, "What?!!"

"You wouldn't happen to own a death ray, would you?" she asks hopefully. "Or be secretly in charge of a huge criminal enterprise that has genetically engineered super soldiers on call? Or know someone with a playing card related themed gang -"

The look he gives her, rolling his head to the side, is not promising. "What? No! Are you insane?!" He flops his head back, grimacing. "Oh my god, I couldn't even get caught by Heir - I get stuck with some crazy lady!"

...Mean! "Well, it was worth a shot," Sharpshooter sighs, and then she knocks him the rest of the way unconscious with the butt of her gun, swinging it like a golf club. "Meanie."

"Th-thank you!" the would-be victim bursts out at last, still all teary and trembling from being threatened by a guy who had no business wielding a knife specibus. "Thank you so much! I think I owe you my life! Who are you?"

"Me? Sharpshooter! I'm new in town!" She grins, planting a foot on the dumb criminal's head. Justice. "And I will so take that life debt! You can pay it off by telling me - how I can get in contact with, uh - Heir?"

The woman hesitates, lacing her fingers together repeatedly. To be helpful, Sharpshooter reaches down and levitates the poor lady's purse to her from where it fell in a gross puddle of rainwater and garbage. The woman thankfully doesn't seem to notice. "I - I'm sorry, I don't know," she says at last. "I mean, Heir just sort of - shows up, usually! He can't be everywhere at once, of course, but I don't know that anyone's ever flagged him down, either…"

Sharpshooter sighs. "Bleh. I figured as much. He's such a jerk! So hard to get in contact with, all the time! But thanks anyway! Do you need a lift anywhere?"

The lady swallows hard and clutches her purse a little tighter. She's kind of getting a gross trash-water stain down the front of her nurse scrubs, but Sharpshooter thinks this is one of those things it is Not Polite to point out in regular society. She's getting better about that, really! "The hospital is just up the street," she says, timidly. "I have a rotation, and I know I'm going to be late, but I have to help report this to the police, right?"

Oh. Right. Police and things. "Well, do you want to press charges?" Sharpshooter asks, kicking the guy's face again and eyeing him dubiously. "I'm totes going to dump him off at the police station, but I'm not all that fussed about evidence and convictions and things. Borrrrring!"

"Well, that's just how Heir does things, usually - him and Hemogoblin both, they try to have people wait to make statements, from what you hear on the news." The woman hesitates, then shakes her head, her expression firming. "I think I'll report this. Do - do you mind waiting with me until the police get here?"

Sharpshooter thinks about it, tapping her finger against her chin, but the choice is already pretty obvious, right? "Of course!" she says, smiling. "Can you call them? I have another text to send really quick."

"I can," the woman says, nodding. She takes out her phone from her purse with fingers that are still trembling with adrenaline, and begins to dial 911.

Jade, meanwhile, steps on the mugger's face absently, mushing his head into the wet ground as she flips out her phone again. Up above, she can feel the crackle of energy that means WV is throwing a hissy fit at Bec again for something, but she ignores it while she types at John.

GG: i'm all up in yo city
GG: savin' yo people
GG: teeehee!
GG: come on, i can't keep showing you up like this, john! it's embarrassing! ;D
GG: as soon as the police get here, i am tracking you down and we are doing the hero thing!
GG: the loser can buy the other a smoothie!
GG: (that loser would be you obvi ;o)
GG: and then i can meet your guardian and the blood troll guy who doesn't know how to spell hemoglobin and you can meet bec and wv and it'll be great!
"They, um, the 911 operator said they should arrive in a few minutes," the near-muggee offers when Sharpshooter finishes sticking her tongue out at the screen. "Thank you for staying with me."

"Nooooo problem," Jade replies, leaning back on her heels. By this point she's kind of forgotten Mister Mugger is under her foot, so he lets out this really interesting groan of pain when she sort of crushes his nose. Oops. "Helping people is my job! I'm not used to this nitty-gritty crime fighting stuff, but it's not all that different from the elephant poachers, right? Got to make sure they get locked up or they just start up all over again! Air-to-ground missiles, on the other hand, you just shoot them down and that's that -"

She gets a little distracted lecturing the woman on the different types of missiles, but the lady doesn't seem to mind, just nodding now and then with a dazed look as Jade gets really into it. She's a really good listener! But then Jade hears the sirens around the corner, and she has to cut off the lecture before she gets to the super interesting part about how rocket fuel actually works. Science is so exciting! "Oh look, they're here!" she says waving cheerfully when a black and white car pulls up at the end of the alley. "How are Seattle police, would you say? Because Russian police make you bribe them a lot if you're not careful, but in Japan they were nice and polite, and it just seems to vary by city here in the States -"

"I have no idea," the woman says faintly, waving at the cops as well when they step out of the vehicle. One is a female troll whose eyes flare bronze in the streetlights, and the other is a human guy. "Uh, you probably shouldn't have a gun out around police?"

"Oh?" Jade twitches. "Oh, right, yeah, that whole thing. Good idea." She tucks the rifle away. Police everywhere seem really paranoid about guns, but American police are the worst about it. Seriously. Texas had been kind of weird. She tried not to spend more time than she had to in Texas after the Clubs incident, but seriously, what a weird contradictory place. "Do you think I should say hi to them?"

"I...don't know?" the woman replies.

"Good enough! I like meeting new people, anyway!" Jade says, waving wildly again. "Hiiii! Nice to meet you all!"

"Are you the one who reported an attempted armed robbery?" the guy officer asks, raising a flashlight that is way too bright. Jade squints at it, shading her eyes.

"No, that was me. She rescued me," the lady says, nodding at Jade.

"I see. That was very brave of yo- oh fuck she's wearing a costume," the male officer says, a weird look on his face.

"That's right!" Jade throws up a salute, grinning. "I'm Sharpshooter! I might be here for a while, so I thought I'd introduce myself!"

"Wait, as in the hero Sharpshooter? The one who dropkicked Le Joueur into the Eiffel Tower? That Sharpshooter?" the troll officer demands. The man just looks lost. As though life has lost all meaning. Jade can't imagine why that would be! "What are you doing here?"

Jade shrugs. "Visiting family and stuff. Beating up bad guys. The usual. And hey, they totally fixed the structural damage to the tower. You can't even tell it was ever bent!" She's still feels kind of bad about that one, but she couldn't help it! Sometimes when you're busy aiming at a doomsday device of dubious viability's off switch, you can't avoid punting someone into the structural turrets of major landmarks! It's a thing!
"Great. Fantastic. Now there's three of them," the male cop mutters wearily, pinching the bridge of his nose. "At this rate, we won't even have a job left."

"Ooooh! Do you know how to contact Heir?" Jade asks, brightening. Surely if anyone would know, it would be the police, right? John seems to have a really good relationship with them! A few cities Jade stopped by in the past few years, they nearly ran her out of town for no reason! One village technically tried to burn her as a witch, which had been hilarious, but not really practical in the long run. But John's been working for, like, years with no problems, so he must have this down flat! "I've been trying to run into him all night!"

"Contact Heir?" the troll cop repeats, looking baffled. "I don't know that anyone ever has, really."

"Aggggggh! Come on, does anyone actually talk to this guy?! I'm not actually the only one he's been ignoring?!!" Jade throws her hands up. How is this even possible?! Joooooooooohn! "That's it! I'm tracking this kid down tonight, if it's the last thing I do!" She is floating slightly off the ground in her righteous fury, and the police are eyeballing her speculatively as she turns to the mugged woman. "You okay here?"

"F-fine!" she exclaims.

"Good!" Jade bounces out of there like there's no tomorrow.

She lands right in the middle of WV and Bec's latest feud. Bec is of course totally unaffected by anything, but WV is beating at the wolf with nubby fists, and crackling with green electricity and just generally giving it all he's got. When Jade teleports in WV hiccups with surprise and falls back, flailing wildly, and Bec flops over on its side, whuffling in reply.

Truly, their relationship is beyond Jade's comprehension.

But she has more important matters to deal with right now! "Well, you fly around everywhere, don't you, John?" she says to herself, hovering upward. "Fine! You must take up the most human-shaped space in the sky with the highest rate of velocity below the level of commercial aircraft and above the skyline! Easy-peasy!"

Logic is great. Closing her eyes, Jade focuses her usual sphere of awareness up and out. She blanks out the swarming streets below her and the bustling people within skyscrapers as she floats higher. The air is a lot easier to deal with in terms of sensory input, even when she stretches out to try and reach the whole city. The smaller points of mass she discards immediately - birds and insects and stray leaves don't count. Clouds are little harder to work around, but the molecules are spread out enough that she can ignore them, too. There's a helicopter at the nearby medical center and a few news crews in the air that nearly give her a moment's pause, before she presses on, grumbling under her breath with frustration.

And -

There.

"Two of them!" she announces, opening her eyes and nearly pitching backward with excitement. She fixes the two points in her mind's eye, those precise coordinates where the two fast-moving bodies had been running along at roof level. One had been running and leaping, anyway - the other had been hovering somewhere above, not nearly as fast as Jade would have estimated, but obviously John is hanging out with that Hemogoblin character!

Which means not only does Jade get to meet John at last, she gets to vet this interloper at the same time, and discover whether he misspelled hemoglobin deliberately or if he's just a total dumbass!

"Succeeeeeeess," she hisses, landing on her heels. She fluffs out her hair, adjusting where the straps of her aviator goggles lie and where the irrepressible curls bounce and tangle. She undoes the buttons of her lab coat, which means she gets a fresh wave of chilly night air, but she needs the dramatic effect. Needs it. It's critical that John get the most badass impression possible! Before she punches him in the noggin for being a butt! "We found him, Vi!" she crows, and a shriek of victory bubbles up in her chest. She doesn't see a reason to repress it; she shrieks, and grabs WV's flailing claws in her hands when he rockets upright and squeals in earnest. Bec huffs, sensing their emotions, but doesn't move, but Bec is always a little party pooper!

And with a pop, Jade does two things at once. It's getting easier to split her focus this way. WV she sets down on the rooftop nearby her target destination, which makes him mad of course, but she's definitely not trying to juggle him in midair for this. Bec can take care of itself, but WV's powers are still too uncertain!

Jade herself steps out in front of the body of mass that's flying through the air rather than leaping, and she knows she's sensed the right person when she sees the steel grey uniform the boy is wearing. She doesn't realize Heir is facing backward until she's already tackled him, letting a whoop rip out of her as she spins them around, arms wrapped around Heir's neck. She narrowly avoid cracking her head open on that giant hammer thingy, and sticks her chin on his shoulder, still laughing wildly. His hair is a darker black than hers, windblown with the hood flopped over backward, and it smells like the night sky.

At last! At last!

"What the -" a hoarse voice yelps, and Heir twists in her grip, little gales of wind tugging at her insistently. "Let go!"

"Never!" Jade cackles, but she still obliges, kicking her legs out and hoisting herself up with her hands on Heir's shoulders so she can look down at him from over his head. He cranes his neck back to look up at her, his bright blue eyes all confused and wide and his eyebrow frowny. What a silly face!

Jade grins, and grins, and grins.

And then she boops him on the nose.

"It's so good to see you, little brother!"

- Diamonds holds out a hand for the scanner results even before Marlowe has finished tapping away at the machine. Clubs had his grimy claws on it last, so naturally Diamonds has no intention of carrying the machine around on a regular basis, but the boss had been quite insistent that she keep it around.

The reason becomes clear as she scans the rows of scribbles and wavering lines, hitting the highest possible amplitude the machine is designed to read at multiple points along the chart. "So, the Space Witch is here, too," Diamonds muses, folding the chart neatly and passing it back off to Marlowe to
She has allowed herself to unwind for the day; even criminals must sleep eventually, and she's been crisscrossing the planet with a vengeance lately. While Marlowe goes to file away that report, she is pleased to see that he also has the mug of hot cocoa cooling on the counter. The jet leg is an absolute nightmare, really, and she can only push through it for so long. Perhaps the boss intended her to confront Hemogoblin and Heir immediately, but on the other hand, the boss always knows what she is going to do before she does, generally, so he no doubt has 'accounted' for her delay right now as well. He's utterly infuriating that way.

Just once, Diamonds thinks, she might like to disrupt the Doctor's unnatural, placid calm. Whether by inserting an unforeseen wrench into his flawless body of works, or by introducing his faceless globe of a head to the business end of her cue stick. Either option would be most...satisfying. But she puts that thought away. Too risky. And besides, her recent...disquiet, let's say, has been assuaged by this much more promising assignment. Even if the boss persists in having her run around in circles trying to capture Spades Slick, this new task of testing Hemogoblin and confronting Heir promises to be most invigorating, and far more concrete. It's not often Diamonds is sent up against heroes - the Midnight Crew's activities, by and large, tend to fly below the radar where Diamonds's division is concerned, while Hearts has always borne the brunt of heroic interference.

Crichton had rung in his 'compromised' signal early this past morning, far sooner than Diamonds would have anticipated. But then, Hearts's usually blustering reports have provided details on only physical encounters with Hemogoblin and the one called Heir of Breath. Boxcars is a blunt object, and she couldn't really expect to gain a working estimation on how intelligently these two heroes work together without her own trial run. The results? They're competent enough, and they do seem to work in tandem, at least when one member of the partnership is directly threatened. She'll know more once she's extracted Crichton and received a full report. Crichton's specialty is starting the misinformation, not perpetuating it, and if the two hadn't ferreted him out in a few days she would have retrieved him anyway. He's disturbingly loyal, naturally, but also more than a little mad with it, as some of Diamonds's division lean toward.

(It hasn't escaped her that the Doctor is far more interested in the Heir. But if he wishes her to focus on Hemogoblin, her own, private investigation will simply remain...discreet.)

Sighing, Diamonds lounges back against the headboard, and drapes her tailored night clothes around her more comfortably, taking the mug of cocoa and stirring the blanket with her feet as Marlowe takes up his usual place by her shoulder. She trusts him enough by now to stand guard while she sleeps - but only just. If he falls asleep on the job even one time, she'll have to chuck yet another personal assistant. It would be a shame. Sipping on the cocoa, Diamonds takes up her phone and, sighing, makes her report.

DD: < The Witch's signature has been confirmed in Seattle.
DD: > Your orders?
Ah, it would seem Deuce's harrying was a rousing success. She's arrived much later in the game than I had reason to hope.
Her presence should not unduly hinder you. Carry on as planned.
DD: < I see. The addition of another unusual powerful hero will not impact my efforts to carry out this mission in this city at all?
I did say unduly. She may cause some concern at first, but the cage should be complete and shipped to your location within days. It would have been sooner, but even I cannot foresee all things, and my special guest has been less than cooperative.
DD: > Invigorating, sir.
Hush now, Droog, you're becoming quite tart.
Here, I will give you a small tidbit, to tide you over. Spades Slick will soon cross paths with the Knight of Blood. Make of that what you will - I know your little one-sided grudge has persisted. Ah, the stirrings of black romance, perhaps? Do try not to become hatefactuated with the enemy, Droog. I always find such a thing hideously tedious.

DD: < You are, as ever, completely off base in matters of romance, boss.
DD: > Let me assure you that I have no interest in such matters. This Slick character is a challenge that has been denied me for too long, and that is all.

Oh, indeed. Well, he won't be able to conceal himself forever, now that he is no longer on the move. I have the utmost confidence in your abilities, Droog. Do not let me down. I expect a most riveting report by the end of the week.

DD: < Of course, boss. As you wish.

And contact that agent. You know the one. Its target is clearly breaking free from the set parameters for its behavior, and I would like to know whether or not he can be trusted to move freely if and when the order comes.

DD: > You got it, sir.

And that's the end of that conversation. Diamonds is fluttering her fingers along the curve of her cue stick specibus by the end, and it takes everything in her to finish the hot cocoa like a sane woman, sipping it slowly, while Marlowe continues to stand, oblivious, by her shoulder.

He's a dear, but he isn't quite as good at picking up on her moods as old Portia was, but then, Portia had used that knowledge to try to double-cross her to the CIA.

Portia isn't around anymore. There hadn't been a lot left of her to bury, either. But it would have just been tacky to leave her pieces lying around where anyone could see them, so Diamonds had made the extra effort. Portia had been an object lesson - never keep an assistant who knows you completely. Hence why Marlowe remains, despite his occasional slips.

When Diamonds rises to her feet, sweeping the blanket aside, for example, he startles and has a gun in hand in moments, clearly expecting a threat. "My lady?" he asks, tense.

Diamonds just starts peeling off her night clothes. "Change in plans, Marlowe," she says idly, shrugging off the silky shirt and folding it crisply before lying it to one side. She swings open the closet doors and steps inside, humming as she runs a finger along the arms of potential suits. "We're going hunting tonight. Might as well meet up with Crichton, too, the poor thing is probably having a crisis of faith by now."

"Ah. Yes, ma'am," Marlowe replies, bowing his head. He adjusts to the situation with ease. "Which shoes would you prefer tonight? Dress boots or heels?"

"Oh, Ferragamo, I think, the plain toe Oxfords. I have had quite enough of this chase. This is a matter of business, now." Diamonds selects a suit and smiles in quiet approval to herself. "I'll save the heels for Heir and Hemogoblin. I could care less about any impression I give this insufferable carapacian."

She doesn't think that she'll catch Spades Slick tonight, not when there's still discrepancies in his hastily concealed trail. But a carapacian in America can't hide long. While he holed himself up in Asia and Europe, he had the advantage that humans and trolls alike have difficulty distinguishing between carapacians from lack of familiarity, even in countries where the alien race have enclaves. Now, in the Americas, any sighting of a Dersite carapacian will automatically ping the members of Diamonds's network who have flooded the city.

And when that happens, she will have him. She has some questions for this Spades Slick, questions she doesn't think about when the Doctor could be listening in.
Patiently, Diamonds begins the painstaking process of buttoning up her silken undershirt and plucking stray threads, while Marlowe slides a new pair of Ferragamo calfskin dress shoes out of their packaging and briskly polishes the calfskin and lizard flanking.

One must take pride in one's appearance, after all, and there's a reason Diamonds has so many operations running on the side, in addition to the Crew's mainstream activities. She has expensive taste, what can she say?

With an edged finger, though, she continues to tap away at her phone, using her teeth to nip a wayward thread free while she rolls her eyes at the screen. This particular sleeper agent has proven less than reliable in the past, his reports scattered and rare and always reeking of near-mutinous intent, but Doc Scratch insists they maintain him, and somehow that maintenance ended up falling under Diamonds's jurisdiction. At the very least, she always chuckles a little to herself at the thought of these mewling heroes the Doctor is so obsessed with trusting the one person in the world they should not.

Sometimes, one has to enjoy the little things, like mulled wine and a hot bath and a crisp new suit, and a well-placed traitor in the ranks of one's enemies. She shivers a little with delight just thinking about it.

DD: < I have arrived.
DD: > Reports indicate that your target is wavering beyond established parameters, and must be stabilized.
DD: < The boss is displeased. As am I.
DD: > In the words of today's youth - check yourself before you wreck yourself.
DD: < I have little patience for mistakes.
??: Of course. You have nothing to worry about, DD.
??: Is there any way I can assist you while you're in town?
DD: > You have your orders.
DD: < You need know nothing of mine.
DD: > Remember your place.
??: Yes, DD. I understand.

Lip curling, Diamonds smooths the front panels of her vest. It's not a flat black, as the uniform of the Midnight Crew generally requires, but embroidered with a damask print slightly darker than the fabric itself. She folds the suit jacket over top, and the pattern underneath remains her little self-indulgence, private and hidden. The suit hugs her perfectly, and when Marlowe approaches, head bowed, with the shoes to complete the outfit, Diamonds is more than ready for a night out on the town.

She grins widely when Marlowe looks up for approval, tapping him on the cheek with the toe of her shoe once he's finished lacing them for her, and she slides the spare cue sticks and knives and pistols into the many hidden pockets and holsters of her outfit.

It's a shame the Doctor would like Spades Slick back in one piece. Because that's just not the kind of condition Diamonds is envisioning for when she delivers that carapacian, at last, to her employer.

Spades will never know what hits him. And, she thinks, smudging her eye shadow in the mirror, neither will Hemogoblin. "Come along, Marlowe. You can be a dear and fetch Crichton from lockup for me, yes?"

Marlowe bows, his fist over his heart. "I'll bring him to you within the hour."

"Good. I'll be on the hunt." Diamonds draws on her gloves and flexes her fingers before sailing out.
the door of the hotel room, Marlowe hot on her heels.

This is going to be a fun week.

- The shadows in between the towering knowledge and potentials that fill the mind of one Doc Scratch run far more deeply than he is comfortable with. This universe is inundated with Void, a smothering blanket that leaves gaps of nothingness not even he can delve. It feels rather like having a toothache, a persistent throb that means something is missing, something is rotting, and he can't quite make out what.

Not that this is truly an issue, of course. Quite the opposite. He has been doing this for billions of years after all, including sessions in which he had even less to work with than he does now. As long as the paths that lead to his ultimate goal remain illuminated, fixed points in his mind, he can work around the scraps of darkness with ease and pleasure, even. That element of uncertainty is the spice of life.

But, he thinks, he is now one step closer to shining light on one particular dark void in his usually flawless foresight. His knowledge of the previous session ends after the usual fixed point that always serves as the termination of his role in the story as a free agent, that moment when his identity as Doc Scratch gives way to someone...else.

But he knows from the state of this universe that something went...awry. Something he could not have accounted for, lurking as it did in the space between sessions, that endless Abyss. The hazards of dealing with Horrorterrors, no doubt. Whatever the case, two sessions had collided in a way he had not controlled for in his calculations, and the ensuing Scratch that erupted had produced an unsettling reset before his eternal endgame could ensue. The Void is the least of his problems when the entirety of the carapacian race has decided to up and relocate from the Medium to the pregaming, and the heroes have retained their god tiering for no reason other than, seemingly, to be contrary and cause him untold stress trying to control their antics. Simply tedious.

But he will make do. He always has, and always will.

The Seer is vulnerable to him now, having refuted the Void that always hid her location in a fit of teenage angst, no doubt. There are advantages to dealing with hormonally unstable players rather than children fresh out of diapers; they are impulsive and reckless and they always know they're right, no matter the evidence to the contrary. The Witch remains at large, dark to his ordinarily all-seeing vision, but she is easy enough to track when she gives off so much energy so recklessly, tapping into aspects of her powers well in advance of the game proper. The Knight is still roving, but he grows clearer by the day, and the Heir - well, Scratch has the Heir well in hand, whether the child knows it or not. Skaia itself could try to intervene, and it would only succeed in making the boy's brains melt out through his nose.

A shame he needs all four alive, for now. That would certainly have been an interesting experiment to run.

And now, Scratch can begin to answer the question of just how significant the trolls will be to this session. He holds up the vial of blood obtained from the scene of a certain explosion in Seattle, and inspects the uncannily red liquid in the light, humming to himself as he considers the faint residue of power that still lingers in the blood.

Oh yes. Karkat Vantas. An old spanner in the works. Let's see how powerful he really is, two universes and a Scratch later.
After all, if need be, Diamonds Droog is already conveniently in place to eliminate rusty old spanners. Particularly ones who have overstayed their welcome in paradox space.

He sets down the vial and tilts his head to the side, walking to the balcony so he can look out into the night. He can sense the incoming mental intrusion coming from a mile away, and sighs, opening up a small portion of his vast intellect for the Horrorterror called Malā’ikah to slither in. Scratch had no hand in the creation of any of the Horrorterrors except Gl'bogolyb, his own personal universe-warming present to the inhabitants of a little world called Alternia, and so Malā’ikah's twining voices are nearly uncomfortable, whining and trilling and shrieking discordantly. A creature of the grimlight, it burns nearly pure white in his mind, a violent tempest of light and sound that rings out with none of the slurping wetness of Gl'bogolyb's waterlogged symphonies.

It is unpleasant. But Malā’ikah is in the unique position of being the only Horrorterror mad enough, apparently, to continue to respond to the Doctor's inquiries. The rest are still sore over that rather two sessions - something about tangles being severed and lost forever to the Abyss - and prefer to retreat to their Furthest Ring rather than reach out as actively as they might have in years past.

Ah. Malā’ikah. Your response, then?

S\textsuperscript{cR} \textsuperscript{a}Tc\textsuperscript{H} the blazing white voice replies, sing-songing and harsh. The tangle might almost have sounded beautiful, if its chiming voices had more clarity; the distortion and clashing notes that accompany its warbling screams ruin the effect, though. O\textsuperscript{u}R \textsuperscript{e}E \textsuperscript{s}P \textsuperscript{o}N\textsuperscript{s}E\textsuperscript{is}a\textsuperscript{n}\textsuperscript{v}a\textsuperscript{T}\textsuperscript{r}\textsuperscript{N}\textsuperscript{a}\textsuperscript{t}\textsuperscript{i}\textsuperscript{V}\textsuperscript{e}. We\textsuperscript{W}\textsuperscript{il}\textsuperscript{P}\textsuperscript{A}\textsuperscript{y} \textsuperscript{Yo}\textsuperscript{Ur}\textsuperscript{G}\textsuperscript{i}\textsuperscript{a}\textsuperscript{M}\textsuperscript{e} \textsuperscript{Ag}\textsuperscript{A}\textsuperscript{i}\textsuperscript{N}.

Oh, most excellent. Always a pleasure to have you. Not everyone has your...artistic touch.

The Horrorterror laps up the praise, of course. Most of the mad ones do. It sounds like quartz scraping against glass as the probing tendrils of grimlight try and fail to latch on to Scratch's mind. In any other eldest god, that would have been an attack or a grave insult. From Malā’ikah, it's merely a thank you - after all, what gift could compare to being drawn into the embrace of the Abyss?

Horrorterror logic, honestly.

You will seek out the Prince, then? Not that I would ever think to impose, but he does have the most raw power, if he is not thoroughly compromised in advance. I would like to know whether to implement my own solution. You have expressed interest in him before, and I would not dare come between you and an old...tanglebuddy.

Doc Scratch has found that a stream of endless, serene politeness is the best way to deal with every living being in creation. Occasionally, some require a quick rap of the broom to get them motivated, but all in all, not even a twisted hivemind from beyond Skaia's purview can resist an earnest entreaty.

Promising enough. Malā’ikah may be mad, but it can be relied upon to tell the truth. Most Horrorterrors can, perversely enough - like Doc Scratch himself, they don't really see the point in lying.

And this way, at least the Prince of Hope will be detained for the near future. Risen or not, Doc Scratch prefers to have heroes of Hope well under his thumb before they can become a threat. He prefers stringent preparation to hasty reaction.
However, there is still the matter of...well.

...And have you given further consideration to the juggalo problem?

The response is immediate and sharp enough to pierce even Doc Scratch's flawlessly crafted mental defenses. N’T’O.

A shame. It was the answer he expected, though not the one he’d hoped for. Gamzee Makara remains even more of a problem than the Prince, simply because no one, not even Scratch himself, can figure out exactly where the clown stands.

He has ever danced the line between a useful servant and an uncontrollable fool. If you could just - Malā’ikah screams like a sob, and curls in on itself. Eurgh. It seems even a Horrorterror can be traumatized, and the fact that exposure to Gamzee Makara caused such instability in the hivemind merely ratchets up the troll’s threat level in Scratch's mental estimations.

The change in subject seems to do the job. Or at least, Malā’ikah allows itself to be distracted, leaving the section of its hivemind scarred by the destructive influence of the old Bard of Rage to wait to itself in the dark while the rest switches back into whimsical chimes.

Malā’ikah simply rumbles, a pleased note of whistles in its voices, and then moves off abruptly. It

...But then again, it is the mind of a Bard. Scratch sighs, and relents.

I shall handle him on my own, then. Never fear, Malā’ikah, you will not have to deal with the clown again. I do not suppose you have heard from GL'bgolyb recently? It is quite stubbornly refusing my calls.

The response is immediate and sharp enough to pierce even Doc Scratch's flawlessly crafted mental defenses. N’T’O.

...And have you given further consideration to the juggalo problem?

However, there is still the matter of...well.

It's just good business.
JADE HAS ARRIVED.

THE PARTY MAY NOW COMMENCE.

Now everyone, please proceed directly to the Troll Arc, contained in the next fic in the series. Some really plot-critical developments are contained in the mini-arc. Skip at your own risk!
Thoughts Grown Dangerous

Chapter Summary

I have so little slept
My lids drowse now against the very sun;
Yea, the brain aching with a dream begun
Beats like a fitful blood; kiss but both brows,
And you shall pluck my thoughts grown dangerous
Almost away.

Chapter Notes

The trolls now have their own separate AO3 story going, so before continuing on I highly recommend you switch over and read their mini-arc, the next fic in the series. Otherwise, more than a few developments here won't make any sense.

Heir, Hemogoblin, and the Kanaya design belong to realmenweartights.tumblr.com.

ARC V - DERELICTION

They're discussing current events when it happens.

No, really. This is what Hemogoblin has been reduced to. Chatting up Heir by talking about the recent explosions in Chicago, and the white dome over Los Angeles. Ostensibly, Heir's breezes are guiding them to some nearby crime, but it's close enough that Hemogoblin wants to test his legs out again. After a day of nightmares and John, Karkat has been groggy in the worst way possible - but to his surprise, he'd had no trouble keeping his eyes open and walking around the house afterward. Which means (and he fucking hates to admit it) that John was right. The nightmares may torment him and leave him feeling miserable, but not sleeping left him a complete shitwit. Seriously, ranting at John's Internet friend and worse, losing? Clearly not the actions of anyone with half a functioning thinkpan.

So he's going to have to suck it up and take the dreams as they come. He doesn't have any other choice right now, not when his physical health is so unstable that any moment he could lose the ability to function. Any more adenosine in his system, and he'll be drowsy and stumbling all over again.

So of course, he needs to keep moving. Get the bitter adrenaline flowing to counteract the build of other chemicals in his bloodstream, and shock his heart awake with every rough landing. He dips and turns and uses his awareness of his body to the fullest, but he doesn't dare pull any of his more extensive acrobatics because he's not a complete imbecile.

Heir, being a goofy fucking gentleman underneath it all, refuses to fly ahead. Instead, Hemogoblin works under the extra pressure of not fucking up a landing in front of his flush crush.
A flush crush who babbles theories about the Los Angeles incident in between Hemogoblin's landings.

"And of course, no one knows what happened with Cold Tide," Heir chatters, gesturing with his hands. "No news from him at all."

Unfortunately, Hemogoblin had caught the news on his phone while riding the bus to the city, too, so he has an equally nerdy theory to throw out there. Where does one draw the line, Hemogoblin wonders, between being a hero expressing reasonable concern about other heroes - and being a total nerd of the caliber only John and Karkat tend to achieve. Heir flouts that line - hell, he plays hopscotch with it.

At least that means Hemogoblin can probably be forgiven some slips into a more Karkat mindset. Particularly when Heir raises his eyebrows in askance at him. "Well, I agree that Nymph is obviously Lady Cascade. She didn't even bother to change her costume design. I doubt she and Cold Tide would stop communicating entirely, so she must have some idea of what's going on. But it still raises the question of why she relocated at all, and how it might be connected to the dome."

Heir nods grimly. "Well, Cascade - uh, Nymph - has always been a pretty PR heavy hero. I'm sure we'll hear from her eventually. But I definitely think the dome is worrying. The last I heard, no one could even call or message people on the inside. That's a whole city basically gone. And if they can't communicate through the dome, who even knows if Cold Tide can get any news out."

"Is this one of those secret hero grapevine things, where we all team up to go deal with the new problem across the country without telling the new guy?" Hemogoblin asks, wryly. That one still bugs him, but only when he's bitter and grumpy which oh wait is ALL THE FUCKING TIME.

"I swear, it wasn't intentional!" Heir says, adorably worried as he stops in midair and flails his arms a little. "Ack! Are you still mad! I'm sorry, really-"

Hemogoblin halts in the center of the roof and rolls his eyes. Heir takes things way too seriously, sometimes. "No, I believe it was an accident. I'm just kidding."

"Oh. Good!" Heir says, shoulders falling. He sighs with relief. Then he cocks his head to the side, his blue eyes gleaming in the darkness. "That's a thought, though..."

He doesn't elaborate. Hemogoblin waits patiently, except his patience is thinner than goddamn tissue paper right now, so he barely waits ten seconds. "Care to share?"

Heir startles, and then looks thoughtful. "I just wonder...the dome only appeared this afternoon, so I'm sure they haven't figured out if anything can break through it or not. But I wonder if my teleportation would be able to bounce me through or not. I don't know, it would just be interesting!"

_It would depend if the dome is permeable to air or not, wouldn't it?_ Hemogoblin thinks, but for once he manages to bite down on his tongue and draw blood, stopping the words before he can blab them out. They are still not talking about what Hemogoblin had experienced during that one teleport with Heir, riding as the wind, but Heir seems as oblivious to how his powers might work as ever. Karkat's head canons have spawned like mad, of course, thanks to his insider's perspective on Heir's new skill, but he isn't sure Heir would welcome them or if the other hero would just shut down again.

But really. If the dome allows air through - and he hopes it does, or how will the citizens of Los Angeles breathe? - then he suspects Heir will be able to slip through as literal air, depending on how the dome is being generated. Heir may or may not assume he's just teleporting from point to point, with no travel time in-between, but Hemogoblin knows the truth. Hemogoblin just doesn't know how aware Heir was during that weird episode, before the terror hit and he clammed up

This is too complicated for him to worry about now. Ugh. Why can't things just be normal for once?

But Los Angeles is not their problem, and he says as much. "If anything, either Cold Tide or Nymph herself might feel the need to defend their city, wherever they've fucked off too. They'd just get royally pissy if we started dicking around in their territory. But it would be interesting to see just how many uses you can find for that."

Heir just laughs. "We'll see how it plays out," he agrees. Then his smile widens to the point of outright stupidity. "We? So you'd be interested in coming, too?"

Hemogoblin wonders just what he's gotten himself into, having a flush crush who's as fucking daft as - as John, for fuck's sake. "Always," he retorts, because it's the easy pun, and Heir's dark blush is his reward. "We are partners, after all."

Heir beams through the fog of embarrassment, because he's not an emotional fuckwit like Hemogoblin, and doesn't feel the need to hide it when he's cheerful about something. Hell, Hemogoblin has the fight the instinct to hide his own face so he doesn't have to witness that level of unconcealed exuberance. Karkat has learned to keep his head down and deflect everything off a sensible wall of rage, and it carries over, sometimes. The mask over his eyes is the only thing that gives him the fortitude to meet Heir's eyes and smirk back.

"Okay! I think we're almost there! The winds definitely think we should be headed this direction," Heir says, starting to glide away. Hemogoblin takes a few steps back before dashing forward, to get the momentum he needs to propel himself over the gap between this building and the next. Heir floats effortlessly backward, watching from over the breach.

So he doesn't see the dark figure that looms in the night sky before dropping on his head.

Hemogoblin does, though. "Shit! Heir, you-"

He fucks the landing. Of course. The shock of that figure draping itself over Heir from behind, with no prior warning, causes him to lose track of his leap. He hits the roof with plenty of room to spare, but his left foot shoots out from under him, slipping in the gravel that he normally would have accounted for.

He feels the bone creak, an ominous sensation this close to splintering, and twists himself into a forward roll, hissing as he comes up in a crouch. He keeps his weight off that leg as he looks up, scanning the skies with his bloodpusher thumping wildly. He trusts that Heir would never fall - the air protects him almost without his conscious thought, it seems - but if that shadowy figure had a weapon on him -

A bright, merry laugh fills the night air. Heir is still hovering where Hemogoblin last saw him (to his relief), his eyes flashing a brilliant blue behind his goggles as he drifts to one side. "Let go!" he yelps, one hand gripping the arm choking him out.

"Never!" the mysterious figure replies. Hemogoblin can barely see her - there are no street lights below, so the illumination is absolutely shitty, and most of her is hidden behind Heir's body at this angle, a deliberate tactical advantage no doubt. But the voice he hears most definitely sounds female, and - Weirdly familiar? Not the sound of it, really, but the cadence, the way she draws out the word just a little too long...He doesn't know any females, human or troll, who talk like that (because to be honest Karkat has a social circle of one), but he could never mistake that manner of speaking.

"It's so good to see you, at last!" the hidden woman sings, giggling some more. When Heir tries to whirl and grab at her for a better hold, she lights up like an electric green lamp, her long hair crackling with static while she floats a little above Heir's head.

Rather than attacking, she reaches down with a finger and taps Heir on the nose. "Little brother!"

She sounds like -

Wait. What did she just say?

Hemogoblin, who is ready to fling himself into the fight, veers to a halt.

Heir blinks and looks up into the woman's face, his mouth an 'oh' of perplexed confusion.

The woman smiles, and leans down to hug - because THAT'S A HUG GODDAMMIT - Heir around the neck again. Her feet remain at the same level though, so she curves at a weird angle to do so, banging her head down on Heir's in what would have been a seriously damaging headbutt if Heir weren't a total blockhead.

What fresh fuckery is this.

No really. What. The. Fuck.

Heir snaps out of it first. "Wha- lemme go!" He reaches up with both arms, grabs the woman by the shoulders, and yanks her forward. Instead of falling, like a normal human being, she somersaults through the air, legs kicking until she cartwheels into an upright position. She moves smoothly through the air as though weightless, her eyes flickering a luminescent green against the dark of her skin. "Who are you?" Heir demands, which is a fucking excellent question. Seriously, Hemogoblin nominates that question for a fucking Nobel Prize.

"I'm Sharpshooter, at the moment!" She spins, clapping her hands together like a gleeful wriggler. "And you're Heir!" Then she points at Hemoglobin, who flinches back into a crouch, but nothing comes flying at him. "And that's Hemoglobin-who-can't-spell-right!"

"It's a fucking pun, you moron!" Hemoglobin yells back, before he considers how incredibly stupid it is to yell at some unknown superpowered flying woman.

"Ohhh! As long as it was on purpose, that's fine!" She laughs again. It's infuriating beyond words, mostly because the part of him that thinks like Karkat can still hear John. It's not identical to his laugh; John does this weird half-hiccupping snerk sometimes that Karkat basically has memorized, while this lady just belts out nonstop, open-mouthed laughter with no interruptions. "I was going to have woooords with you if you just didn't know how to spell it right! As a woman of science!"

The problem now is that Hemoglobin does know the name Sharpshooter. And by the raised eyebrows that continue to creep up Heir's forehead with a vengeance, he can tell Heir is familiar, too. Sharpshooter is one of those oddball heroes who never seem to settle down: Karkat and John have never been major Sharpshooter fans, but that's mostly because she's relatively obscure and difficult to keep track of. She turns up in the most random-ass places on the globe, usually in connection to bizarre reports of giant robots and natural disasters, saves people, and then vanishes before anyone can really get her pinned down for an interview. Half the reports sound more like comic book fantasy than real life heroics, but what the hell does Hemoglobin know about real life when his partner turns into air and he's a fucking mutant?
And now she's - what? Claiming to be related to Heir?

It's too much. Hemogoblin can't even handle this level of mindblowing, bulgefondling insanity. At least Heir looks as confused as he feels because he is sick of being out of the loop on these things. Knowing Heir is similarly disadvantaged helps, but it would help even more if Heir would lure the crazy hero down to roof level. Hemogoblin can pull a lot of weird shit, but flying isn't in his amazingly varied repertoire, and the way Sharpshooter floats in midair, without even the constant thrum of breezes that accompany Heir's flight, is downright unnerving.

"Sharpshooter, I'm sorry, but you seem to have me confused with someone else," Heir says slowly. How he manages to be polite in the face of this is beyond Hemogoblin, but then, Hemogoblin is a ragey little fuck. Heir is a goof but he's a polite goof. "I don't have a sister. We've never met before - ever. It's nice to meet you, but you're seriously misinformed."

Sharpshooter folds her arms, lips pouting out. "No, I'm not! Come on, do I have to take off my goggles and prove it to you?"

"Wha - NO!" Heir says vehemently, holding up both hands and shaking his head, eyes wide. Hemogoblin's eyes bulge too because what the fuck. Did she just actually offer to unmask in front of two random heroes? I mean - does this woman not understand the definition of 'secret identity'?

"That's really not necessary." Heir stumbles over the words, floating backward to get some space between him and the woman. Hemogoblin heartily approves. Heir seems to have got with the program, descending slightly as he angles toward Hemogoblin's roof.

As discreetly as he can, Hemogoblin works the nail of one claw into the flesh of the wrist opposite, and starts drawing blood out into a sickle. Sharpshooter may be nominally a hero, but this whole situation is too strange for him to take any chances. If she tries to jump Heir again, with more sinister intent, he means to be ready.

She doesn't seem to be carrying a weapon of any kind, though - there's a strap across the front of her deep, blackish green jumpsuit and white labcoat, but it could suit anything from a riflekind to a sword - for some fucking stupid reason, Hemogoblin has never made an intense study of the different varieties of strife carriers on the market. Sharpshooter uses rifles, generally, but he hasn't forgotten the rumors that she unloaded a grenade launcher in Turkey. Like, what the fuck?

She follows Heir, oblivious to Hemogoblin's preparations. Good. Fucking swell. "But that would help, right?" she insists, blinking. Her eyes still radiate green light like headlamps. "Then you would know my face, and you could see we look alike!"

"I don't think that's necessary!" Heir says, his voice strained. "Please, like - I am really not interested in knowing your civilian identity! Really, not at all!"

"Oh." Sharpshooter halts, her lips a pout of confusion. "Why are you not excited about this?"

"Because you're crazy!" Hemogoblin throws in, being his usual helpful self.

"Am not~!" She sings it, and it feels like someone stabbing him and twisting the knife somewhere in the general area of his stomach. It's too much like John, and just different enough to make him feel sick.

"Look, this is just really sudden and out of the blue, but let's be reasonable here," Heir says, holding out both hands beseechingly. "Umm, welcome to Seattle, Sharpshooter. I don't know what brought you here, but it's nice to meet you. We don't have much going on by way of giant robots-"
"Yet," Hemogoblin mutters.

"-But you're welcome to hang around and fight crime if you want to. We're not going to turn down help, right?" Heir finishes, eyeing Hemogoblin and winking furiously like a crackpanned dweeb. Hemogoblin sighs heavily, rolling his eyes, and winks back so Heir will just stop.

"But you still don't believe me about us being siblings," Sharpshooter says, folding her arms. "Even though I know all about you!"

Heir is almost at roof level now, but Sharpshooter is moving a lot more slowly. She's wavering, and Hemogoblin feels spitefully gratified now that she's lost some of that boundless confidence. "I don't know what you think you know," Heir says, "but you really don't."

"Ugh, here! I'll prove it to you! Just listen!" Sharpshooter skips in close to Heir and grips him by the arm. Heir jerks, but she must have one hell of a grip. Heir looks wary as she puts her face right up against his, and for one searing, infuriating moment, Hemogoblin is sure she's trying to kiss Heir. Which would be weird (and, if her claims are to be believed, incestuous in that squicky way humans have) and would also probably cause him to spontaneously transform into a raving psychotic and tackle her out of the sky, teleportation be damned. The two inconsiderate flying douchebags are near enough to the roof that he could make the jump. But she just whispers in Heir's ear, her hair curling in the other hero's ambient breezes, and they're far enough away that Hemogoblin can't even hear a murmur.

But he sees Heir's eyes widen.

Heir's hand shoots out, and the wind shrieks, blowing Sharpshooter backward through the air with the force of a hurricane. It's so sudden and uncontrolled that Hemogoblin can feel wind streaming around him in wayward bursts. The whistling of the wind fills the air like a siren as Heir's eyes flare blue and the wind around him twists violently, one wrong move away from spawning a full blown tornado in the middle of Seattle.

What the fuck did she say? Hemogoblin crouches again because he has no choice, digging in his heels to steady himself against Heir's tempestuous whirlwind.

"How the fuck do you know that?" Heir says, his voice cold. Hemogoblin has never heard that kind of tone emerge from Heir, and it sends a shiver down his spine, more from fear than anything else. He's never feared Heir before. But that voice is...it barely sounds like Heir at all.

"How the hell," he continues, as Sharpshooter rights herself in midair, "do you know my name?!

Oh.

Oh holy fuck.

...They're fucked. Hemogoblin doesn't even think twice before including himself in that, dazed as he stares out over the space between the two buildings, where the two other heroes hang in midair. If his partner is out, he's probably just as fucking doomed. Because Sharpshooter might be completely bugfuck insane, but from the look on Heir's face, she has one hell of a blackmail tool to leverage here.

"I tooold you!" Sharpshooter complains, fluffing her wind-tossed hair with a careless wave of her hand. "I'm your big sister! Of course I know your real name! And now I'll tell you mine, since you're being such a dumb butt about this!"
She teleports again, but Hemogoblin's eyes are starting to adjust with the flickering pattern of her movements. Unlike Heir, whose teleportation on the video of New York was accompanied only by the flicker of blue light from his eyes, green light, somewhere between lightning and fire, outlines Sharpshooter whenever she vanishes in a snap of her fingers, and - Hemogoblin's eyes strain, but he's almost certain that the green fire appears before Sharpshooter does, a split second delay before her body zaps in right behind Heir. Heir turns on a dime, his palm shooting out to defend himself, but Sharpshooter catches it with her own hand and, when Heir blasts her with wind instead, and she clings to Heir's wrist so that the only thing that gets blown back is her hair. "Sooo ruuude!" she sings, and then she ducks her head in again.

Hemogoblin can only assume what she whispers next is her own name.

...Seriously. Did these two just reach first name terms after five fucking minutes, when Hemogoblin has been Heir's partner for weeks?

Fuck everything about that.

Heir yanks away this time, and finally - finally - gets his scrawny ass over the roof, where Hemogoblin can reach him if need be. "Why are you doing this? How did you know my name?" he asks, insistent and on the edge of desperation. Some of the (fucking terrifying) growl has left Heir's voice, and he sounds mostly confused again. Hemogoblin tenses as Sharpshooter follows Heir over the roof, her feet still skimming along through the air, circling around Heir with all of her focus on him. Hemogoblin might as well be part of the wall.

She's not paying attention to her surroundings - or perhaps she just doesn't consider Hemogoblin a threat.

She's mistaken, of course. It's the work of two quick steps and then Hemogoblin seizes that ridiculous, flashy lab coat and yanks her back. Before she can teleport out, he has the sickle of blood curved around her neck, just under her chin. "I think," he purrs, heart thumping, "you should stay very still."

"Hemogoblin," Heir says, his voice steady, and Hemogoblin looks up from under his fringe to raise an eyebrow at the other hero. It's not Hemogoblin's secret identity that's been compromised, after all. This is a clusterfuck of potentially greater magnitude than Hemogoblin being accused of arson - at least if all else had failed he could have retreated to a life as just Karkat. If this Sharpshooter wanted to, she could strip away all of that last-ditch security from Heir simply by releasing his identity to the Internet or the press.

The fact that she offered to even the score (and maybe, maybe did - there's no guarantee that whatever she whispered to Heir was in fact her real name) makes no impact on the fact that she has massive blackmail material to hold over Heir's head. And - weirdly enough - Hemogoblin's loyalty is to his partner.

If Heir doesn't think they can trust Sharpshooter to keep this a secret...well.

Sharpshooter shifts a little, and a sharp elbow digs into Hemogoblin's side. "Lemme go, dummy!" she complains, squirming some more. "Heeeeir, tell him to let me go or I'll kick him in the dick!"

"So you complain about me misspelling hemoglobin, but you flunked out of basic troll biology, huh?" Hemogoblin snarls back, trying and failing to not roll his eyes.

"Tentacles!" Sharpshooter sings out, and holy fuck even the sing-song has the same lilt. Hemogoblin can feel rage rising up that is purely Karkat, quite ready to lose his shit in front of Heir if it means making this woman (unintentionally) mocking his moirail shut up. "It's a figure of speech!"

"You guys," Heir says weakly.

"Pardon me and my failure to have a human dick, you insensitive fuckwit!"

"Bluhhhh! So shouty! The only reason I'm not kicking your butt is because you're Heir's partner, mister!"

"...You guys?"

Hemogoblin flinches like he's been doused with a bucket of cold water. Even the way she draws out that 'bluh' sounds like a higher pitched John. Why did this have to happen when Karkat is still short on sleep and emotionally unstable? This wouldn't be nearly as infuriating if he were at normal rage levels, honestly.

He has to shake the irritation though. He has an image to maintain, dammit. Heir is right there, for fuck's sake. "You could try," he replies silkily, because Hemogoblin has this thing where he'd like to have the last word.

"Ohhhh, noooo, it is on, mister angry troll -" He has a faceful of crackling, green-sparking hair now, but he grits his teeth and doesn't let go.

"You GUYYYS!" Heir yells with more force. He's hovering a few feet from them, and Hemogoblin can't decipher his expression. Some of that desperation lingers, but it's mostly overwhelmed by a grimace of disbelief. "You guys, does this seriously have to be an issue? Like, really?"

"He insulted my capacity to kick ass!" Sharpshooter protests. As though she actually gets to make an argument when she's the interloper, here!

"And you've threatened my partner with potential exposure. Woman, I will cut you -"

"Why am I surrounded by unreasonable, confrontational assholes!" Heir demands, nearly hysterical. He claps his hands to his cheeks, squeezing his masked face with one eyebrow twitching. "Will everyone please stop arguing over stupid stuff and CALM DOWN!"

Hemogoblin calms down.

Wait, what.

He lets go of Sharpshooter when she tugs away in a huff, and pressing a claw to his chest, certain he must look completely baffled. His heart has stopped freaking out. He had been working up to a full-blown bitchfit right there, his head hazy with fury and his bloodpusher doing overtime to keep the adrenaline flowing. And now it's all stopped. His skin crawls with horror, and he takes another step back.

Did Heir just pacify him? There hadn't even been a shooshpap involved - all he had to do was order Hemogoblin to calm down and -

Nope. Nonononono. Absolutely not. It's a fluke, Hemogoblin thinks vehemently, but his heart can't work up more than the faintest hitch.

He is stupidly, idiotically, impossibly calm.
"Thank you! Jeez!" Heir says, oblivious to his own impossible feat. He flies closer to Hemogoblin and drops to the ground with a huff, as though he misjudged his own landing. That alone speaks to how thrown the other hero is. Hemogoblin just wishes he still felt confused; two words out of Heir and suddenly he can't even feel much above the level of 'idiotic contentment' and 'vague unease.'
"Okay, clearly this isn't going to work," Heir murmurs, stepping right into Hemogoblin's personal space. Sharpshooter is complaining loudly off to the side, but just places her hands on her hips and whistles into the night air when it's clear neither Heir nor Hemogoblin are listening to her.
"Hemogoblin - I hate to ask it, but will you be okay on patrol by yourself tonight? I...think I seriously need to work out what's going on with all this." His eyes are troubled, dark and verging on genuine panic.

"She really knows your identity then," Hemogoblin mutters back, raising an eyebrow.

"...Yup." Heir says. "I don't have a clue what's going on here, but I need to talk to her and figure out exactly what she plans to do with that." He claws the hair back out of his face, his hood already pulled down in the course of all these shenanigans. "I - oh man, I -"

"Go," Hemogoblin says shortly. Heir is very close right now, and Hemogoblin has to resist the urge to bury his face in the other's hero's shoulder. Not, for once, because Heir has a banging body that reduces him to a humiliating excuse for a lovesick wriggler, but because his brain has flipped the switch onto 'vacillation' and is intensely curious to see if Heir's smell would be appealing in a flushed way or soothing in a pale way.

Wow. Way to fuck up those quadrants. He slaps himself internally, and fully intends to slap himself in real life as well if he can't drag his traitorous thinkpan out of the pale gutter.

He will not cheat on John. He has no fucking idea what happened earlier, but he's not going to allow a repeat performance. If Heir wants to go interrogate this crazy broad on his own time, Hemogoblin actually welcomes it. The farther away the woman who sounds like his moirail gone wrong and the man who just pacified him against his will are, the better for his state of mind. One infuriates him in a murderously platonic way, and the other is a temptation he never thought he'd have to deal with.

"Seriously, go nuts. I can handle myself." He sniffs, brushing imaginary dirt - or Sharpshooter cooties, his mind adds spitefully - off his arms. He retracts the blood sickle when Heir eyes it sideways, and privately smirks at the awe that bubbles up in Heir's expression. It's so easy to get complacent with his own powers - Hemogoblin sometimes forgets that while he is rightfully awed by Heir's ability to fly, he has some cool fucking mutant powers of his own that impress people. Sure, if he's ever outed then they're a cull-worthy offence against the Condesce's unofficial cultural ordinances, but hey, he's been resigned to that since he went through his first pupation. "It's just one fucking crisis after another with us."

"Yeah. I don't know when life got so complicated," Heir says, rolling his eyes skyward. Hemogoblin can't help but agree. "Hopefully I can figure this out and get her out of town before more things start blowing up."

Hemogoblin snorts. "Oh, thank troll Jesus, we can finally start making bad jokes about explosions again." He steps away from Heir and tries to look for a nearby shadow to slink off into as discreetly as possible. "I'm out of here -"

"Are you guys done whispering?" Sharpshooter asks, whiny and irritating and grating at Hemogoblin's ears. "Come on, Heir, Bec and WV will be here any second, and I know WV has been looking forward to meeting you!"

Heir turns away from Hemogoblin, though one last rueful grin flickers across his face when Hemogoblin heaves a much bereaved sigh. Hemogoblin smiles back - smirks, naturally - just as another flash of green lights up the rooftop and he blinks.

Two more figures have joined them, using that same teleportation power, and Hemogoblin is already two seconds from strangling the first person who tries to use it to sneak up on him. The first creature, a white wolf as high as Sharpshooter's hip, hovers in the air before lying down next to its mistress. For a brief moment, Hemogoblin thinks he saw stars and galaxies revolving in the mutt's fur, but he blinks again and the impression is gone.

The second is a carapacian. It's his first time seeing one in person, and he's resigned to the bizarre twists his life has taken, that he'd meet his first genuine alien in the middle of the night with a psycho space hero calling the shots. Fuck it, that actually makes more sense than just meeting an alien randomly in the streets - of course someone like Sharpshooter would have a side-kick from outer space. Of course.

The sarcasm is starting to rot his own thinkpan. He can feel it.

The tiny, compact, glossy black carapacian squeals wordlessly, tears off its green cloak to reveal a hideous blue poncho, and flings itself at Heir, with enough force to send them both toppling to the ground. Hemogoblin can't even ready himself for a fight; he can only stare with one eye twitching as the carapacian babbles in whatever weird alien language that is, and butts its head against Heir's chest in what can only be described as affection.

"Go," Heir says weakly, pinned under the weight of the Dersite carapacian. "Just - save yourself from this. Go do the hero thing, man." With that, Heir flops his head back against the roof and stares bemusedly at the carapacian bawling its eyes out all over his uniform.

Hemogoblin takes one look at the scene before him and, in a rare moment in which his entire brain comes to complete accord, thinks, I'm not touching this one with a twenty foot long culling fork. "...Yeah. Have fun with that," he says, and then he flips Sharpshooter a pair of middle claws and takes off before Sharpshooter can summon yet another rare alien species to try and tackle him. As long as they're not actively trying to hurt Heir, he figures he should cut his losses and try to salvage what's left of his already-questionable sanity without an audience.

"Bye!" Sharpshooter calls after him, and he picks up the pace before she can change her mind and try to drag him back into the fray.

Why can't his life just be normal?

- His first instinct is to run to John. Literally, just, fuck the costume and his secret identity, Karkat wants to race home and skip the bus ride and kick down John's door and tackle the kid into the nearest pile until all thoughts of weird hero shit is driven clean out of his brain.

Only his sense of duty keeps him patrolling the streets. With Heir dealing with that crisis and probably out for the night, Hemogoblin is probably the only hero at work tonight. At least this time, he's aware of it, and not just running around oblivious. He tracks down a pair of dealers in the west part of town, a little out of his way, and then starts wandering outward in a grid. The streets seem weirdly empty tonight - or maybe he's just gotten used to Heir's uncanny ability to use the wind and locate criminals without needing to hunt for a crime scene. Hemogoblin has no such power, so it's really up to chance and his own keen eyes to spy potential hero work down in the streets below.

It doesn't help that said keen eyes aren't all that keen, lately. This past week has been a nightmare of blurred vision and gritty, sore dry eyes, even after he takes out his contact lenses for the night and looks at the world without their distorting influence. But tonight he only needs to stop three times to huddle down and let his eyes rest, which is actually a new fucking record, one that he can only attribute to John's enforced nap time.

He needs to not think about John, though, or he's going to lose all this mysterious heroic resolve and high-tail it back home. He needs to not think about Heir pacifying him with a look and a plea, or the implications of that act.

Oh fuck, who is he kidding. He can't stop thinking about it. He's obsessing over it because that's just what he does, the part of his mind that is Karkat keeping up a nonstop, ranting chorus of OH SHIT OH SHIT OH GRUBFUCKING SHIT WHAT HAVE I DONE WHAT HAVE I DONE. And underlying all of that, like the tolling of a doom bell, is the sickening, sticky sensation low in his gut, the inevitable thought that of course this would happen, of course you would fuck this up. You're Karkat Vantas, and you are the Hero of Fuck Ups.

He loves John. He somehow managed to scrape together a pale quadrant that wasn't a dysfunctional mess, with someone who's ridiculously dumb and disgustingly endearing in all the ways that make Karkat's heart pump sucrose, and wow, look at that, it wasn't Karkat's incessant rage trigger or his fucked up nightmares that interfered - the two things he'd always, in the back of his mind, assumed would eventually drive John away.

On a more objective level, Karkat's aware that he might be overreacting. Possibly. Maybe. It was just one incidental implied shoosh, right? He's just reading into it too much because of that near-moirailing incident before they caught Crichton. Heir is human, humans do not always associate calming with romance, and this has been quite thoroughly established. Hemogoblin had shut that down, had made himself look like a total fucking moron in front of Heir in order to prevent any kind of pale situation between them. Though to be fair, he'd been sleep-deprived and apparently going through withdrawal at the same time, so he can't blame all of his idiocy on his tendency to overreact.

He's just paranoid. That's all.

But the fact is that for nearly ten minutes after Hemogoblin left Sharpshooter and Heir alone, he felt...calm. Unmistakably, unbearably calm. The part of his brain that's only supposed to be soothed by John had fallen all over itself, sobbing like Heir was the second coming of troll Will Smith. It's only now, after a few hours of working himself up into a proper frenzy with crime-fighting and internal screaming, that Karkat is even able to work up a proper rage meltdown.

Which means that all he needs to do is take a deep breath, suck it up, and act like a grownass troll instead of losing his shit over nothing.

...No, no, he's still freaking out. Fuck! He kicks someone in the face and, for a panicked moment, can't remember if he was aiming at the mugger or the muggee.

This is probably an object lesson in not kicking people in the face when you're distracted by your own failings as a moirail.

"Are you okay?" he yells, still not entirely sure who he just kicked. The man on the ground just groans and clutches his face, curled up in a little ball.

"Um. Are you talking to him, or me?"

Karkat - no, Hemogoblin - no, fuck, still Karkat - whirls around so fast the other man flinches back against the wall. "...You were the one getting mugged, right?" he asks. He doesn't care how stupid he sounds, he just needs this to be established for the record.

"Uh, yeah?" The amount of sarcasm encompassed in those two words could probably decimate a small village.

Awkward. "Oh. Uh. Good." Karkat coughs and clears his throat, trying to regain some semblance of dignity.

"Kid, you need to drink less or something." Shaking his head, the muggee takes out his phone and eyes Karkat sideways as he edges away, like Karkat is the crazy one here.

Fair enough.

Hemogoblin would stick around and zip-tie the mugger's hands - Karkat just digs the cuffs out of his pocket, hands them sheepishly over to the muggee, who takes them with a roll of his eyes and a sniff, and then hightails it back onto the roof before he can make himself look like even more of an idiot in front of the general public. He can't just call it a night, though. He needs to persevere. Keep his personal issues separate from his work life.

...Or he could go home, wake John up, and they could eat ice cream.

Both of these are viable options.

But if he goes to John now, with all of these problems he can't just tell John about, he'll just end up feeling like even more of a guilty sack of useless shit in the morning. So, sighing, Karkat takes a moment to sit down on the edge of the roof, leaning forward with his elbows on his knees, and gnaws on the nail of his claw until he feels more like Hemogoblin again.

??: Hey. Hey. Kid.

Or not. He's sure his face switches from 'the fuck?' to 'fuck me' to 'what the fuck could possibly go wrong now?' before settling on the usual 'I've quite literally run out of fucks to give' as he looks up, trying and failing to summon his sense of professional decorum.

That's when the carapacian standing before him stabs him in the arm.

"Oh, WHAT THE FUCK!" Karkat kicks out and shoves the stabby asshat away from him, grabbing at his own arm in shock even as he starts to compensate, yanking the blood back into the open gash and coagulating everything until a scab forms. He does a rush job instead of healing it seamlessly, falling back into a fighting stance to confront his Surprise Stabber.

SS: Oh relax, kid, I barely scratched yah.

Karkat doesn't know what he expected out of tonight before it all went to hell in a rocket-powered handbasket, but meeting his second alien of the night by way of surprise stab greeting didn't even make the top hundred of his list. Like the one who had teleported in with Sharpshooter earlier, this one has the black shell, from head to toe, of a Dersite carapacian - the shady-ass ones, in other words. But that's where all similarity between the two ends. Karkat's aware from the rudimentary units in history class on carapacians (and one long research binge, fueled by root beer and gratuitous quantities of popcorn, during one of his moodier sulks back in the seventh grade) that most of them cap out at around three feet in height. The one that tackled Heir had been even shorter than that, petite and stupidly energetic. This nubfucker curves like a blade, spindly and lean, not an inch over four feet but no less intimidating for it. He meets Karkat glower for glower, one eye squinted and almost-sightless beneath a thin scar that skims his eyelids and must have just barely spared the eye itself.
Even if he hadn't just stabbed Karkat, he'd look like a threat. The Surprise Stabber continues to toy with his knifekind, inspecting the red blood on the blade with a sour look. But even though Karkat is on his guard, he doesn't seem inclined to attack again; the knife slices and glitters in the half-light as the carapacian grumpily begins signing again.

SS: Look, you mouthy brat. We don't have much time.

SS: I hate you, you hate me, we're all one stabhappy candy-red family.

SS: But that traitor is nipping at my heels, so we got to save the idiotic reunion bullshit for later.

"I have absolutely no idea what you're talking about, you insane piece of shit," is all Karkat can think to say. Somewhere low in his gut, he is struck by the horrible sensation that he has become the victim of some universally constant tendency in which mysterious shadowy figures are physically incapable of giving straight answers. But that's a stupid, baseless sensation no doubt rooted in his own innate paranoia, and therefore easily ignored. The important thing to mention, he thinks, is: "You fucking stabbed me!"

SS: Kid, I stab a lot of people. Bleed me a river. Build a bridge. And get over it.

SS: I...ugh, you have no idea how much it pains me to say this. I...came to help.

"Help with what, the ignominious end of my lasting record of not hemorrhaging from multiple orifices?! By stabbing new holes in me?!" Karkat demands. He's not sure why he isn't kicking this guy's ass yet - possibly because he's still getting over the shock of his first real knife wound. He's been tossed around a bit (and blown up on one notable occasion) but never legitimately stabbed. It's the kind of thing he's avoided his entire life, trying to keep from being culled, and the instinct had carried over to Hemogoblin so he's dedicated a lot of his training to evasion just to prevent prolonged knife fights. And then this fucker had to just walk up and stab him like it's the alien equivalent of shaking hands. Like, seriously, fuck this guy.

SS: Yes. That.

SS: No, you dumb fuck, I'm here to help you with your Midnight Crew situation.

SS: I shoulda known you'd be the one to try 'n mess with a bunch of traitorous dogs like them.

SS: Now here, take my card and go fuck off and do whatever it is you crazy troll kids are up to these days, while I try ta lose DD again.

With that, the carapacian digs into the scruffy pocket of his threadbare, ill-fitting suit. Karkat tenses, ready for the guy to pull another knife specibus - because at this point, he thinks the paranoia is warranted.

He pulls out another knife. Ah, the sweet, sweet taste of vindicated parano-oh fuck he pulled another knife. Karkat flinches, but the carapacian just grunts, flicks the new knife between his fingers, and digs some more before withdrawing an innocent-looking business card. He holds it out toward Karkat with a grunt. As both of the Stabber's hands are currently occupied with a knife, this equates to yet another stabbing attempt and Karkat recoils out of range.

SS: What a wuss. Remind me to whip yah into shape later, this is just sad.

The carapacian flicks the business card toward Karkat, and it lands on the roof by his feet. All Karkat can make out, eyeing it while simultaneously trying not to take his eyes off the menacing carapacian before him, is that the card is pitch black, with no words or symbols that he can make out.
SS: I'm outta here. I suggest you blow this joint too, before he shows up. You ain't ready to handle someone like Diamonds yet.

With that, the carapacian tips his battered hat forward over his face, almost like a gesture of farewell - and stabs Karkat in the other arm. Karkat had been fucking waiting for it, and yet the carapacian darts in like he doesn't even have his guard up.

"SON OF A-"

SS: LANGUAGE!

Karkat's mouth snaps shut.

SS: Seriously, kid. You 'n me, we're gonna chat. Give it a few days until Diamonds gets over this latest murderspree and then look me up.

Wiping his knives off absently, the carapacian turns away and tries to shuffle off in a hurry, scurrying across the roof with remarkable alacrity for someone who refused to straighten his posture.

...Karkat should probably stop him. Hadn't he said something about stabbing a lot of people? Like, was this guy actually a Serial Stabber on top of everything else? "I don't know who you are, but if you seriously think you can just walk away from this, you've got another thing coming."

But he hesitates. He's torn between arresting this guy and interrogating him, because did he just mention Diamonds Droog?

Unfortunately for the side of the law, his curiosity wins out. Also, his fledging grudge against Diamonds Droog over the whole 'masterminding a false accusation plot for no fucking reason' thing might weigh in more than it should. He heals the new wound in his arm without moving forward to catch the carapacian. Instead, he calls at the alien's retreating back, "What do you know about the Midnight Crew?"

The carapacian glances back over hunched shoulders, teeth bared in a permanent grimace.

SS: Enough to make it worth your while, kid.

SS: Don't you remember? I founded that traitorous, faithless pack of dogs.

SS: Then they went all human and troll on me and sold out. Inconsiderate fucks.

The carapacian sniffs, and then vanishes into the night.

Karkat would make more effort to follow him, but all he can really do is stand there, mouth agape, and try to remember how his jaw works.

This night cannot get any weirder. Karkat's weird-shit-o-meter has officially leveled up and ascended to a higher plane of existence, leaving him with no other choice but to handle this shit, so he closes his eyes, massages his temples in a self-applied shoosh, and basks in the relief of having abandoned all hope of a normal life or hero career. Heir has a sister and a potential identity crisis in progress; Hemogoblin has a psychotic, stab-happy carapacian who claims to have intimate ties to the most obnoxious gang in America.

He calls it a night before the universe decides to prove him wrong and serve up a new, steaming hot pile of weird shit to him on a platter. If some fresh fuckery wants to find him, it'll have to confront him in the security of his own home, where no one will be able to witness the last of his sanity salsa-dancing out the door.

Before he leaves, though, he stoops over and picks up the business card his mysterious assailant tossed onto the ground. He flips it over, but both sides are black and seemingly unmarked. It's not until he snarls and angles it in the light from the street below that he sees the slightly raised surface in the center of the card. He traces it with his claw, squinting, and can just barely determine the shape.

He freezes with one foot on the edge of the roof.

Hold the fucking phone.

Non-fatal stabbings. Aggressive offers of unsolicited help. An off-hand (yet succinctly worded) "I hate you, you hate me"? And now, a card bearing the unmistakable shape of a spade?

...Did Karkat seriously just get caliginously hit on by a Surly Suitor?

He sleeps. At this point, the nightmares can't possibly equal his waking What The Shit quotient. He needs to be unconscious in some form or another before something else happens that makes him question the point of being a rational being in a world determined to blow its nose on the flimsy tissue that is his sanity. The nightmares are fairly standard by now, upsetting and panic-inducing and heart breaking all at once.

The fact that Karkat has become jaded about this kind of thing is legitimately sad. He wakes up in the 'coon a few hours later, when his tolerance for psychological torture runs out, and utterly refuses to reflect on the exact contents of the latest dreams. He has too many other things to dwell on like the angsty teenager he fucking is; for once, he has the right combination of external drama he needs to process and gogginess that he can stonewall the memories and focus, over his half-toasted toast, on the fact that he has absolutely no idea how Heir may or may not have resolved that whole situation with Sharpshooter. Crabdad screeches loudly from the stovetop, and Karkat somehow fails to notice that the imbecilic lusus somehow managed to turn the damn thing on until after the crab presents him with a plate of fried eggs that are both runny and yet unpleasantly crunchy at the same time. After chewing out his custodian and removing the knobs from the stovetop, again (he mentally checks off another day until he's free from this hell at last), Karkat scrapes together all of his books and sails out the door.

The difference between this drive to school and the one the day before is embarrassing. Really, it is. Karkat feels a little ill when he realizes how clear his vision is, even with the shitty contact lenses that make everything blurred, compared to the dull fog he was driving around in yesterday. How did he not wrap his car around a telephone pole, with the state he was in? His bloodpusher warms considerably when he remembers how John had driven him home, because John really is a far better moirail than a fuckup like Karkat deserves; the thought is sappy enough that Karkat can almost skip over the requisite angst over whatever the fuck happened last night with Heir.

No, really. Too much bullshit. Not enough coffee.

After he parks the car, he stomps into the school building and makes a beeline for his locker with the full intention of crawling inside it and not thinking about anything at all; he doesn't have enough time before John's scheduled arrival to hide out in the fine arts hall and actually get shit done to distract himself, but if he stewed about his issues any more, he might just keel over where he stands. He shoves all of his textbooks into the locker and - because Karkat is actually physically incapable of letting things go, even when he orders his brain to stop obsessing - takes out his phone and starts Googling Sharpshooter. There's nothing about her mysteriously appearing in the skies over Seattle, but then again, there's rarely any solid news about her whereabouts. She has a pretty dedicated fanbase, but even when Karkat lurks through those forums, not even the truly obsessive Sharpshooter devotees have ferreted out much solid intel. There's an active board dedicated to predicting her next moves - Karkat snorts when he sees that their latest predictions had Sharpshooter either in the middle of Canada or making a beeline for Alaska in order to cross to Russia and finish her 'world tour.'

...He can't resist.

CG: MY MONEY'S ON SEATTLE, FUCKFACES

Karkat cackles in a sleepy way, and leans an elbow on the inside of his locker while he blinks at the screen. He's probably going to regret that kind of impulsive, dickish decision later, but there's nothing like a good-faith trolling effort to take the mind of CREEPY STABBY ALIEN COURTSHIP -

John is here. Karkat would know that pulse anywhere. He tilts his head back, sensing John coming up the stairs, and then smacks himself on the cheek and clicks out of the Sharpshooter tab to pretend he's only just arrived. He actually takes the textbook he needs for class and stuffs it into his bag again, counting down silently in his head until John's arrival. He owes his moirail, like, a thousand pancakes for how much John's put up with, lately.

When John is immediately behind him Karkat turns and presents both claws for the inaugural coffee. John does not disappoint, because John is the best moirail. The best. "Morning," Karkat attempts to say before sipping that sweet, sweet caffeinated elixir.

"Good morning to you too, Karkat," John says. Karkat closes his eyes and rocks forward a little, while the combination of coffee and John smoothes away some of the jagged edges in his mind. Well, if nothing else, at least Karkat's hormones haven't gone completely bugfuck insane and forgotten just who his actual moirail is - not while John is right in front of him, anyway. But thinking about that just makes him feel a little sick again, and he refuses to vomit coffee all over John's shoes, so he stops thinking about it at all.

"Yes, good morning, good morning," John continues, in a weirdly high-pitched voice. Just like that, some internal switch flips, and the voice is annoying as fuck. Karkat nearly chokes on his coffee in horror at the sudden vacillation, wondering just why the fuck John's voice would suddenly sound so -

He stops drinking.

He opens his eyes properly.

No.

No.

She's not wearing the goggles, but her electric green eyes aren't exactly subtle. They might as well have hidden nothing at all, with how easily Karkat can recognize her features. Even as his grip on the thermos loosens, the girl's entire face lights up with recognition, and Karkat can only meet her gaze in abject horror.

He recognizes her. And there is no doubt in his mind that despite everything, despite every precaution he's ever taken, there is no way he could possibly have concealed his identity from the maniac standing by John's side, grinning like a lunatic.

Sharpshooter waves at him, laughing gaily. "Hey! Good to see you~! So your name is Kaaarkat!"
She winks and shoots him a pair of finger pistols. "I'm Jade!"

On that day, Karkat Vantas received a grim reminder -

He can't run from the weird shit.

It will always, always find him.

Rose places one of the cushions from the couch onto the floor and settles herself on it, with a faint pang at the thought that all of her old meditation materials - the incense, the teas, the cushions - are gone. The loss of the Lalonde manse weighs on her, lately. It might have become a dark, stale prison for Rose's tormented thoughts, and the site of her descent into alcoholism, but it had still been home until her grimdark self broke free.

And that was only a small tangle, one that had spawned itself from Leviathan expressly for the purpose of twisting Rose's mind and occupying it once her anger and hate destroyed her own wards. She shudders to think about what Los Angeles looks like under the opaque dome. The fear crawls up her spine and lodges in the back of her mind - which is the last place she wants to have uncontrolled emotion collecting. She burns it away with a ray of light, and tries to lay her fears to rest. She shouldn't dwell on thoughts of the manse like that. Or on the memory of the locked door to her mother's study, the one that Rose had jimmed open whenever she needed to quench her thirst.

She swallows over the ache in her throat, and passes the time by texting her comrades in arms. Their circle of heroic camaraderie has grown by one, and John has, naturally, worked himself into a proper meltdown over the fact that yet another person is aware of his secret identity.

Rose itches to sit down with John and a hot cup of tea, and listen to his troubles in person. After years without communication, she becomes more aware with each passing day that John has changed, and communicating with him through the medium of text is getting them nowhere at all. It's too easy for John to redirect the conversation, or cop out altogether with a flimsy excuse. There are days where Rose is certain that John only replies to her probing messages because his insecurity won't allow for radio silence on her end.

Rose struggles to reconcile the exuberant, irrepressible John she knew with the apprehensive, overly defensive John who closes himself off out of paranoia with a smile on his face. Perhaps superficially he's the same, all laughter and pranks. But it has only taken one off-kilter twenty-four hour cycle, in which he has been slammed with both a surprise sibling and severe health issues on the part of his moirail, to throw him into complete turmoil. He cannot handle himself, mentally or emotionally. Jade Harley upset his equilibrium today, and it has thrown all his neuroses into stark relief. What is truly bizarre, however, is that John is becoming ever more paranoid not because this Jade raises his suspicions, but because he trusts her.

According to his reports, the trust seems instinctive, the same kind of unthinking faith and acceptance that Rose recognizes because she experienced it herself when they first met. John had befriended her without a second thought, and she has no doubt that if their respective parents hadn't encouraged their useless secrecy, they would have been fully aware of each other's hero work from the beginning. Terrors only know, John is clearly awful at keeping such things on the down low.
TT: Have you considered that trusting someone might not be as terrible an outcome as all that? While I admit that having a healthy caution while dealing with the situation would be advisable, Jade seems benevolent. Charming, even.

EB: it's just - agggghh!
EB: i don't know why i trust her and it freaks me out.
EB: also, do you know how little she cares about keeping our secret identities secret?
EB: let me give you a hint - NOT A LOT. :/
TT: Not at all, perhaps?
TT: I doubt that she would gain anything from betraying your interests like that, though. As long as you have clearly established boundaries on what is and is not permissible while she resides under your roof, I cannot think she would deliberately out you.

EB: i'm not even worried about her doing it on purpose!
TT: Oh?
EB: my dad is all worked up about her, and i can see why…
EB: but...
EB: i feel like i’m nicolas cage in national treasure
TT: Oh dear.
EB: and i want to trust sean bean i really do
EB: but any second now he could turn on me, steal my meerschaum pipe, the only clue i have to the greatest treasure known to man, and blow me up in a long lost ship stuck in a remote section of the canadian arctic.
EB: with my explosion track record THIS IS TOO LIKELY TO RISK ROSE!!!
TT: John.
TT: I understand and respect that you have no doubt begun to develop a severe potential for PTSD over recent events, one that I would like to discuss with you at length.
TT: But that notwithstanding, I am afraid I must inform you that your sister is not, in fact, Sean Bean.
EB: haha, rose.
EB: i am being so serious right now.
EB: sooooo serious.
EB: i’m pretty sure she could teleport us to the canadian arctic in like two seconds.
EB: it wouldn't even be hard for her.
TT: Fair point. The advantages of possessing the power to manipulate one of the fundamental aspects of reality must be taken into account.
EB: exactly!
TT: If it would assuage your fears, I could make my best efforts to See further into her motives from afar.
EB: really? thanks rose, you're the best!
TT: Regardless, my sight is most effective when within viewing distance of a target. And I would like to see you. Kanaya and I will be in the area, and she can perhaps be persuaded to visit Seattle for a day, before we attempt the dome.
TT: There is no pressure, of course.
TT: ...
TT: John?

John doesn't drop out of conversations so abruptly unless Rose has truly pressed him too far. But from her past observations, she should still be in safe territory. Kanaya's sewing machine hums and whirs in the background while Rose strokes her thumb along the side of the phone, feeling a fresh buzz of anxiety until blue text appears on the screen.

EB: do you think it would help you with your whole recovery thing too?
EB: because i'd really like to see you too rose!
EB: you and dave really but dave has his hands full with orange-him...
EB: and if this would help keep you sane and stuff then of course you should come visit! that is totally a thing that should happen!
TT: I -
TT: Yes. Yes, I believe it would help immensely. Not only that, but I would be able to assist you in vetting your newfound sibling. Between your instincts and my perception, surely we can ferret out whether she can be trusted or not.
EB: yeah, you're right rose!
EB: i don't know why i didn't think of that!
TT: You've been under a lot of pressure lately. But you mustn't forget that you are not alone in this.
EB: ehehehe, i guess i'm still not used to having other people to fall back on.
EB: i really need to shape up!

She wants to hug him. Sometimes, the absence of John feels more painfully real than anything else in the world around her, and Rose has to scour her mind for any sign of interference in her perception, grimdark or otherwise. But she has yet to find any. Worse still, the more she speaks with Dave, teasing him and attempting to pry him out of his amazingly convoluted psyche, the more she wants to find him and embrace him as well. She wants to explain it away as curiosity about having a sibling, but it rings false.

One explanation has presented itself to her, and she is uncertain how much stock she can put in it. But Kanaya had been the one to suggest it, and that lends it more weight in her mind than if it had been Rose's own suggestion.

Serendipity.

It is such a fundamental aspect of troll-related romance that the platonic aspect of it is often overlooked. It's so basic, in fact, that it's taken her this long to recognize the compulsion for what it is. She scrolls through her conversation with Jade Harley from earlier, casting a discerning eye over the archives, and feels another golden burst of certainty illuminate her mind.

GG: heheh! its so good to get to pester everybody like this!!!!
GG: nice to meet you rose!
TT: It is good to meet you as well. Ms Harley, I presume?
GG: yup! :D
GG: just jade though!
TT: A pleasure. Is it not obscenely early on the West Coast, still? John has been pestering me as well, but John keeps absolutely abhorrent hours sometimes.
GG: i hear that!
GG: he woke me up at dumb o'clock for school or some darn thing!
TT: Well, no one has ever claimed John was an excellent host. He gave you this chumhandle?
GG: noooope!
GG: i took his phone and yoinked yours and daves handles
GG: john doesnt seem to know anything about anything, it makes him such a stick in the mud!
TT: Pardon? What does John not know about? I am afraid I may still be missing context.
GG: willllll
GG: i knew about you all, duh!
GG: but grandpa only knew johns chumhandle and it turned out john wasnt even using that one anymore so bluh! :P
GG: and now he keeps spacing out when i ask him about the Important Things…
TT: Alas, I am afraid I must confess a similar ignorance. Would you care to enlighten me as to the nature of said Important Things? I can only suppose from the significant capitalization that they may be of some consequence.
GG: oh nooo
GG: dont tell me you dont know anything either! :(((
TT: Neither John nor I - nor Dave, from what I can make out between the rap sessions - have had the luxury of overly truthful guardians. There is a most pernicious dearth of open communication at times. If yours has shared any measure of information, I would be most happy to hear of it.
GG: oh man where do i even start!
GG: do you at least know the world is about to end?

Rose has to take a moment to squint at the screen, refresh the Pesterchum app, and then blink at the message again. That was...not what she was expecting.

TT: …
TT: No, that one seems to have slipped past the radar.
TT: I am certain that this is going to look profoundly stupid the moment I finish typing it, but I must try: in what possible way did your grandfather speculate would the world hypothetically end in the near future?
GG: meteors
TT: Meteors?
GG: yeah a whole buttload of them!
TT: Forgive if I am a little skeptical. I can have my companion's hacking contact look into sealed government records in the event such an obvious extraterrestrial threat had been detected by space agencies and subsequently covered up for the sake of public appearances, but I really think that if a 'buttload' of meteors were in fact aimed in Earth's general direction, there would be far more widespread panic.
GG: well its true!
GG: theyre going to arrive in a couple of weeks!!!
GG: and then the earth goes KAPOW!
GG: :(
GG: which is really dumb and stuff but i dont think theres much we can do to stop it TT: Naturally, no.
GG: its all reeeally complicated and grandpa couldnt explain it all to me in time
GG: but he left a bunch of files and papers so i would know to follow his plan for survival
GG: and you guys and your dossiers were in the papers!
TT: Are we somehow instrumental in the planet surviving this imminent catastrophe then? John is no doubt having conniptions over the potential for a Superman-style blockbuster on the topic.
GG: nooo
GG: we just kinda...live through it! is the plan
TT: And everyone else on the planet? Are they so much chopped liver in this scenario?
GG: you think i dont worry about that too?
GG: i spend a lot of time saving people and i look around and see so many wonderful things and people and places
GG: if i thought about how they could all be dead soon i dont think i could get off my butt in the morning!
GG: but grandpa just didnt know how to pull it off!
TT: ...This is disheartening.
TT: And here I was advising John to calm down and deal with you in a rational manner. I don't know how to break it to him that you may well be acting on the dubious orders of a long dead elder convinced that Doomsday is nigh.
GG: well he got a lot of it from johns nanna because she knew the most GG: but then she died first! its totes inconvenient
TT: Fascinating. And yet another problematically dead prophetic figure enters the scene.
GG: rose!!! are you making fun of me?! :(
TT: I am not, I assure you. I am simply reviewing the theory you have laid out before me with a keen eye, and finding the evidence...lacking.
TT: That is to say, I am taking this meteor apocalypse theory with a grain of salt, much as I would the debatable content of Dave's confused ramblings. A prodigious spoonful of salt, even.
GG: oohhh! evidence! i can do that!
TT: Can you.
GG: of course! are you a scientist too now like your mom?
GG: because i can appreciate another science sis! :D
TT: Psychology is more my realm of expertise. But evidence would be universally delightful, yes.
GG: well the easiest way would be to run an ~ath simulator on the estimated deathdate of the earth but not a lot of people can program that kind of thing!
GG: theyre super surreal abstract paradox constructions after all! you need to be able to code at least sixteen cuil levels removed from real life which is pretty fancy!!!
TT: I'm sure I could ask around.
GG: but what about you rose?
GG: youre the seer right?
GG: how far ahead can you see?
TT: Hm. John is correct, it would seem. It is disconcerting that you know that without having been told. And yet...
TT: Foresight is not necessarily my forte in that sense. I am quite good at identifying potential crimes from afar, and judging the content of those crimes in terms of danger and risk. I am also able to measure the potential fortunes of myself or my comrades, depending on the decisions they may make. I cannot simply look into the future.
TT: Unless something in your mysterious dossiers suggests otherwise, and I am unaware of it myself.
GG: well light is about clarity and luck so i guess that makes sense
GG: i dont know!
GG: grandpa always told me id be able to see this for myself one day in my dreams
GG: but my dreams are just regular dreams i think GG: besides im much more a scientist of action these days!!! it would be boring to get all my answers from dreams!
TT: And yet dreams can be most informative as to the state of one's inner psyche.
GG: seeeeer talk :P
TT: Perhaps.
TT: Until I can independently verify this claim of potential apocalypses, let us table the discussion.
TT: I am far more interested in whether or not your grandfather's Important Things contain any relevant details on the Midnight Crew, and their possible connection to our childhoods. Dave, John, and I have all learned that we knew each other from a young age, and we must confess a measure of incredulity that not only did three superpowered children know each other from a young age, but that a mysterious criminal organization might have taken an impromptu sabbatical from ripping off museums and arms dealing solely to target us.
GG: well its all connected to the end of the world thing obviously!
TT: How could I not have realized.
GG: :PPP
GG: i told you!!!
GG: we four have the ability to survive the end of the world!
GG: but the guy in charge of the midnight crew is involved in starting it because hes the bad guy!
GG: we should all have been working together since the beginning but then johns nanna died and everyone stopped trusting each other and stuff
TT: 'Stuff' I take to mean the incomprehensibly stupid way in which we have all been deprived of relevant, life-threatening secrets concerning the origin of our powers, etcetera.
TT: I hate to say it but this is almost insane enough that it seems to wrap back around to become plausible once more. But I would be the first to admit that my mental state isn't exactly the most conducive to logic at the moment.

GG: thats the spirit! :D

TT: Can you think of any particular reason the Crew would target Dave in particular? John and I have been no less open with the use of our powers - John in particular has been gallivanting about the country and I have been...compromised of late. Yet Dave is the one who was almost kidnapped as a child, and who has recently rescued a doppelgänger of his from members of the Crew claiming to look for the original copy.

TT: Their pursuit of him seems more persistent, while they are content merely to harass John by blowing up buildings in his heroic territory to warn him away from their more mundane criminal enterprises.

GG: if i had to guessssss~~~

GG: the time thing!

GG: it probably gives off a ton of energy you know so its easy to track

GG: my space thing is the same way!!! i had suuuuch trouble reaching john because this short clubs troll guy kept bugging me

TT: Clubs Deuce? Intriguing. He is the one member of the Crew it seems we haven't encountered of late. Tell me, how much of a threat does he pose?

GG: he acts all polite and goofy but i think he nearly gave my sidekick a teleport aneurysm! :(

TT: I see.

TT: If you have any further information on the Crew and their internal infrastructure and goals, we would greatly appreciate complete disclosure. Perhaps a group memo is in order.

GG: i will but i have to go to school with john now!

GG: its been really nice to talk to you rose!!! we should stick together!

GG: and tell dave to stop ignoring meee! :P

TT: Ah, has Dave gone shy again? I'll give him a stern talking to. As his clearly elder sister.

GG: yayyyy! thank you rose!

Jade is...interesting. Rose remains skeptical on the whole apocalypse story, but she often used to commune with extra dimensional creatures of mind rending implication and quite frankly the apocalypse is a lot more likely than most people would like to believe. Meteors are new, though. Rose always morbidly assumed the world would end in bloodbrine and darkness.

But the girl herself is cheery enough, even more so than John of late, and the promise of clarification on certain points in their shared history is tantalizing. Rereading the conversation, as confused as it was while it was in progress, is enough to make Rose smile to herself. John may not have had luck with obtaining information from his father, but it would seem his sister can more than make up for it.

Jade's existence - and Rose's emotional response to it - only further confirms her theory of serendipity. For whatever reason, she is utterly convinced that the three of them - four, perhaps, if her initial impression of Jade Harley bears fruit - need to be together to be whole. They're meant to be together.

If she and John had stayed together, perhaps New York would not have happened. Perhaps John would never have sunk into what, after several impromptu therapy sessions, Rose has deemed to be not pure depression but more of a generalized, mixed anxiety disorder. He claims to have felt sad, closed in and constantly uneasy, as though he couldn't breathe unless he was working as Heir, with obsessive thoughts that vacillated between wanting to float to the ceiling during class and being terrified of being caught doing the windy thing by his peers. It stinks of a minor depressive spell that latched onto John's pre-existing (if justified) paranoia about his secret identity, and lathered him up into a restless anxiety attack that propelled him into running from the home where he felt smothered and lonely. Meeting Dave might have calmed him down enough to get the depression treated, but Rose wouldn't be surprised if John is just so used to working through the anxiety that he hasn't noticed it still impacts his behavior.

"Rose? I am finished."

"Just a moment," Rose mutters.

TT: Dave.
TG: two words
TG: hell
TG: no
TT: Dave.
TG: i am rethinking my life choices rn rose
TG: you need to support me in my existential crisis
TT: Your current state of philosophical despair has nothing to do with Jade, and everything to do, I suspect, with your recently doubled brother complex. Try not to take it out on her.
TG: sorry im all tapped out on the crazy front
TG: also fuck that i do not have a complex
TG: were not all crazy people rose
TG: hard to believe i know
TG: feel free to cling to me for moral support while you deal with this heartbreaking news
TG: because i am the supportive sibling
TG: i am the most goddamn fineass pillar of support in the sacred temple that is our fucked up friend group
TG: john makes periodic sacrifices where is my tribute rose
TG: my coffers are not self sustaining here
TT: Ah, of course. How foolish of me. Here, I present to thee a goodly tribute of grain-fed oxen freshly culled from my own personal stables, and my favored mount, the blessed Maplehoof.
TG: how many oxen
TT: At least three oxen.
TG: …
TG: fuck man ill take it
TT: Excellent.
TT: Jade could potentially be a veritable fount of information concerning our pasts. A fount which we need to partake of. You will assist me in this, David.
TG: yeah yeah
TG: once im done with some other shit ill get right on it TT: You could just try speaking to him forthrightly, you know.
TG: and were done here

"My friends," Rose says to Kanaya, "are occasionally impossible."

"You worry about them too much, I think," Kanaya replies, standing up from her sewing desk with fabric folded over her arm. "I recognize the trap for what it is - I've fallen for it myself. You cannot let them so consume your time and attention that you forget to take time for yourself, Rose."

"But their neuroses are so interesting." Rose accepts the fabric from Kanaya, and nods at the burnished sun that covers the back of the orange jacket. "Everything is in order, then?"

"We'll know when you try it on for one last fitting," Kanaya says, settling herself on a cushion across from Rose. "Let us deal with this, first. But I assure you, we will not be exiting this building unless that vest is perfectly concealed."
"With luck, this will only take a moment." Rose refolds her legs and centers herself on the cushion, setting the uniform to her left. "And then we may be on our way."

The closer they get to the grimlight dome over Los Angeles, the less Rose predicts she'll be able to control and stabilize her mind. Grimdark has always been more her division, but psychically speaking the two are merely different shades of the same mind-altering, many-angled horror. She wants to have faith that her defenses will hold against any grimlight bleeding off the dome, but meddling within the minds of others, let alone her own mental construct, would be inadvisable as they drive west. She can't even sense the dome itself, or the elder mind behind it, from the room in which they sit, which gives her some modicum of comfort - perhaps sensitivity to one breed of Horrorterror need not equate to sensitivity to the other.

But if Rose is to determine whether or not this tangle in the City of Angels is related to the old monster behind the Novaya Ukraine incident, she'll need to get a taste for it from Kanaya's memories, and she'd feel safer if they do it now rather than later. She reaches out to press her fingers to Kanaya's forehead, steadies herself, and slips in.

Kanaya's mind is a forest. The tree trunks are spikes of thin metal, with loops at the top where vast curtains of fabric flutter out on the breeze. The earth beneath Rose's feet is covered in a shallow lake of clear water that stretches across the forest floor and reflects the low sky above like a clear mirror. But this is not Rose's mind, where the presence of any water at all would be cause for extreme concern; the mental images here are guided by Kanaya's perception, and Kanaya does not necessarily associate Horrorterrors with acidic, flesh-eating water, as Rose has trained herself to do. Rose walks beneath the alternating shade of the wide drapes and the light patches where the heavy red sun shines through, letting her Sight guide her toward Kanaya's manifestation of herself.

She finds the troll sewing in an alcove between two needles, stitching together a cloth full of stars and dark spaces. An red obelisk with the head of a frog towers above them, swaddled in lengths of red and blue fabric. Rose can only speculate as to why.

"It seemed like the thing to do, at the time," Kanaya says without looking up, intent on her work. Her skin is exposed here in the sanctity of her mind, with no grey paint to conceal the white gleam that radiates from her arms, hands, and face. Clutching the shroud of fabric in her claws, she stands to greet Rose, her eyes fixed on something in the distance. "Here. You may want to wear this."

Rose accepts it. Kanaya's mind, Kanaya's rules, after all. But the moment the cloak swirls around her shoulders, Rose can identify the faint aura of power woven into the cloth. Kanaya is no magician in real life, but within the space of her own mind, she has power. Waves of protection and concealment ebb and flow through this cloth like vibrating strands of intent. "Any particular reason for the extra protection?"

"We are going into danger. These memories are not ones I would normally peruse, and they concern creatures of less than benevolent intent," Kanaya says, still gazing off over Rose's shoulder. "And from what you have told me of the more insidious effects a Horrorterror can have on the mind, I would not be surprised to find that there is more hidden within the recesses of my memory than I can perceive under my own power."

Rose hums, neither an affirmative nor a negative, and follows Kanaya as the troll begins to traipse through the lake toward a break in the needle trees. The smaller needle in Kanaya's hand vanishes for a moment, and reappears as a chainsaw. Most things tend to default to chainsaw where Kanaya is concerned.
The break in the forest opens up around them, and Rose winces as the water around their heels transitions into sickly white sludge, thick like treacle. The cloak that Kanaya bestowed on her ripples and wraps around her legs more tightly, in an attempt to insulate her, but Kanaya has no such extra protection. "Kanaya?"

"It is always like this," Kanaya sighs, lifting her boot with a downturned lip and inspecting the white film sticking to the leather. "If and when I must relive the war, I always have to slog through it."

Rose tastes bile in the back of her throat, and she raises a fist that shines with light. There is a single needle tree in the exact center of the taint, but the cloth attached to its tip lies slack along the trunk, weighed down with more viscous goo. The metal of the needle itself has begun to warp and bend toward the ground. Rose closes her regular eyes entirely to focus her extra sight and forces herself to be calm. Her fingernails dig, too sharp, into the soft flesh of her palms as she scans the mental representation Kanaya has for her memories of the war in the Ukraine.

After a tense moment, Rose sighs with quiet relief, and feels her shoulders sag. Kanaya has no inborn predilection for the many-angled ones, no permanent channel carved between her mind and the hiveminds of the Noble Circle. Nor, Rose suspects, did the troll ever come into direct contact with the tangle itself during the war. The contamination here is far too mild. "If you want, it would probably be for the best if I burned this away," Rose says, blinking her focus away so she can take in her surroundings again. "The corruption is slight, and you've contained it well, but it is corruption nonetheless."

"The memory first," Kanaya says, staring up at the filthy, bedraggled curtain. "Then you have my leave to torch it all. If I had the power with which to cut off this accursed section of my mind, I would have done so long ago. The Novaya Ukraine brought nothing but death and horror for me, and the memories plague me."

"Well, we will see." Rose raises a hand and slices through the pale muck, cleansing a path for them to the memories. "A single memory should suffice. One in which you came in contact with the tangle's subsidiary offshoots. The Horrorterror's signature should be distinct enough once I have it in my sights."

"Urgh. I can already tell this is going to be unpleasant," Kanaya says, her voice dry, and she pincers a section of the curtain between her thumb and her foreclaw. Grimacing, she revs the chainsaw and slices off the scrap of fabric. Rose would almost think a chainsaw overkill when fabric scissors would have worked, but then Kanaya hands her the memory and she feels the texture of the cloth. It's chilled and smooth, like a thin section of flan or custard that leaks more of the same white taint that has infected the clearing. The film drizzles over the sides of Rose's palm, and her stomach turns.

"I am sorry, Şahin." Kanaya is taller and heavier than Rose, and the change in perspective throws her for a moment before her vision settles. The chainsaw barely registers in her palm, a feather-light weight that might as well be an extension of her arm. She falls to her knees, acid burning through the much-abused fabric of her Medicull unit issue pants, and ducks under a pair of enormous jaws.

The abomination that used to be Private Şahin is all mouth and little else. It lacks any limbs that Rose can see, and has instead attached itself to the trunk of a tree so ravaged by the grimlight influence that the inner rings of heartwood and phloem have bent like melted plastic. But the mutation still has enough height to blend into the trunk and the stringy branches and snatch up any unsuspecting passersby.

Kanaya is not unsuspecting. She has hunted the rest of her Medicull unit relentlessly through the contaminated zone, ignoring the growing burn in her throat and the empty, panging hollow of a stomach newly adapted for the ingestion of blood. Not much can hurt her anymore, though her injuries are healing more slowly without fresh blood to increase her healing factor. As the memory reconstructs itself around Rose, her impressions are augmented with Kanaya's own hindsight - tiny whispers that say Şahin was the last, before Kanaya had to struggle back to civilization and deal with her newborn rainbow-drinking tendencies for the first time.

But at the time, Kanaya is deep in her avenging rage and single-minded in her purpose - to give her old comrades the grace of a clean death and set their bodies free from the grimlight. She shoves the chainsaw up with one hand, thrusting it like a drill through the soft flesh of Şahin's chin. Dark, sludgy blood, more black than purple, disgorges over her head and slathers her eyes, but Kanaya is beyond appearances. She has traversed the wasted forests in pants that grow ever more tattered and acid-splashed, and her uniform jacket fell to pieces during the fight with a twisted Lieutenant Abascal.

Right now, nothing matters but the fight. Kanaya shrieks with wordless fury, her jaw aching as she bares her teeth, and she seizes the chainsaw in both hands and drags over her head in a downward arc, splitting the length of the monster's distended belly. Coated in blood and slag, Kanaya shoves the sagging body off her and raises the chainsawkind to aim for its exposed brain -

Rose reaches the end of the memory scrap, and wrenches back into her own perspective. Kanaya watches her with careful jade eyes, one claw squeezing Rose's shoulder in solidarity. "I have obtained the impression I needed," Rose gasps, letting the memory slide off her palm and into the slop around their feet. Her hand throbs, and she shoves a light cleansing spell through her skin without pausing to think about it.

Kanaya wraps an arm around her waist, and considers the needle of similarly horrific memories before them. "Please, do not attempt to complicate this moment with half-hearted efforts to convey how burning away this may strip the details from a significant chunk of my memories, and may have adverse psychological implications in the future," she says gravely. "If the curtain should unfortunately burst into all-consuming flame - well, I am not overly attached to it. Once we reach Los Angeles, I will have more than enough experience to fill its place."

Rose smiles, and snaps her fingers. "As you wish."

She vomits salt water in a rundown gas station bathroom just outside of Chicago.

Kanaya wants to press on and attempt to reach the center of the city and prevent another night of widespread property damage and the questionable use of streetlights as multipurpose bludgeoning tools. Rose scrolls through some of the news reports on the damage, and is legitimately impressed at the sheer chaos the Scourge Sisters have managed to rack up over the past few days of their kismesissitude. But the nausea builds up over time, her head aching in time with a far-off pulse.
