Pushing past the haze, Red found her big blue eyes looking up at him worriedly.

“I’m...” he took a deep breath, the last of his anger vanishing. “...better.”

He placed his arm about her waist, following Christopher as the man led them to a private area.

Liz sat down in the chair Red offered. She watched him cross the space to a door which she assumed was a bathroom.

She sought out Dembe, her concern expressed in her face.

“There is no cause for concern.” she was assured.

Silas pulled her burger from a take out box, shoving it towards her, along with another container. She snatched up the offering, opening them with a flourish, finding her requested condiments.

“Silas...” she mooned adoringly, “you’re the best.”

“Hell, I know that.” he agreed readily, taking a large bite from his gigantic burger.

“I know it’s incredibly rude...” she cupped her own tasty concoction in her hands, “after all that’s happened, but I’m starving.”

“It happens.” Christopher shrugged, always the consummate host. A waiter entered inconspicuously, placing food before those gathered.

Closing the door behind him, Red hesitated in his trek across the room, his eyes taking in the developing scene. Lizzy sat, his hat tipped back up on her head jauntily... hungrily devouring a large hamburger.

“You want a bite?” she questioned around her own mouthful, having noticed his interest. She held up an offering.

“No, baby,” he sat down beside her, moving her drink closer, “you eat.”

She smiled happily, dragging her fries closer, grabbing a couple before waving them through the condiments and shoving them in her mouth.

Red breathed a mental sigh of relief. He listened to the woman giggle in between bites, as she listened to Francis’ embellished retelling of the fight through his eyes, even as Mark and Chris watched the video of events as they had truthfully played out.
He was so sure she would be upset. Would be angry with him.

But she wasn’t. She was starving. She was smiling. She was laughing.

She was happy...

While Red was pleased Liz was handling his loss of control so well, he was also, admittedly a little worried.

Was this the calm before the storm? Would they argue later? He hated when they were at odds.

A platter with a large steak, with equally large portions of vegetables and other side items was placed before him.

He stared at the delicious offering, lacking any real appetite.

He tried so hard to control his temper when she was about, but had failed twice now, in spectacular fashion.

And worse, both times had been because of the woman. He hoped like hell Liz didn’t feel guilty for his own lack of self control where she was concerned.

He had seen a threat to her and neutralized it. That’s what he did.

He protected her, at all costs.

“Red...” she tapped his leg, drawing his attention, “please eat. You haven’t had anything since breakfast. You must be starving,” she frowned at his untouched plate before popping a pickle in her mouth.

Red reached over, clasping her hand in his, squeezing her tightly. She clutched him right back, lifting his busted knuckles, kissing the frayed skin gently.

He winced openly, as her frown deepened in response.

Liz sighed, kissing the tattered flesh once again, conveying her feelings in the simple gesture.

_They were fine. Stop being stupid._

“Eat...” she repeated, handing him a fork and knife.

He took the offering, slowly cutting the expensive meat before lifting a small portion to his mouth. Chewing the succulent beef, he found the woman smiling happily over at him.

He suddenly found himself simply ravenous.

Whatever came of this incident, for the moment he had Lizzy’s forgiveness and good friends surrounded him. In life, it was always the small things that gave the most pleasure.

Red Reddington had discovered that fact many years back.

He never wasted time considering what might have been or second guessing any decisions he made.

He dismissed from his mind any disruptive thoughts that betrayed those facts.
Instead, he focused on the contentment he was experiencing, intent on thoroughly enjoying the ever changing landscape which was his life.

♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥

After a scrumptious meal, Red made his excuses to his host.

“I have to change.” he stated. “Could you tell Antonio and Guiren that I will be along shortly?” he asked of Christopher.

“Yes, of course.” the man replied cordially. “Take your time.”

Liz and Red made their way back to the Villa shortly there after.

He closed the door quietly behind him, stepping into the sanctity of their room. He was totally shocked when her little body suddenly collided forcibly with his. The kiss she offered was both sensual yet fiercely affectionate.

“I’m not mad.” she whispered before he could even begin to gather his thoughts. “You gave Brad fair warning, I gave him fair warning.” she continued. “He chose to ignore it.”

“I should not have lost my temper.”

“That was incredibly rude of him to ignore my demands, and if you ask me, he had it coming.” she raised her chin defiantly. “If it wasn’t you, it was going to be me.”

A soft smile played about his lips. He found he very much enjoyed Lizzy when she was in a surly mood.

“As for that temper…” the woman’s voice lowered, as she sidled closer to him, “I didn’t know you could be so...forceful.”

Red lifted gray eyes, his brows knitting slightly, asking the rhetorical question.

“I didn’t know you could be so...forceful.”

“Always expect the unexpected.” he muttered his delight.

“What?” she asked slightly enthralled by the sound of that throaty chuckle.

“Nothing... just talking to myself.” he kissed her gently, pulling back slightly to read the woman’s expressive features.

“Were you defending my virtue?” she asked lightly, drawing an involuntary smile which replaced the frown on his face.

“Your virtue is fully intact, regardless of Brad’s less than noble intentions.” he murmured.

“Were you protecting your property.” The woman emitted a high sigh of contentment.

“While that concept is absolutely medieval,” he chuckled quietly, having never heard the woman make such a sound before... not when fully dressed at least, “to be truthful, I think you’ve actually hit on it.”

“I think that’s really hot.” she moved closer.

“Oh you do, do you?” his chuckle returned for a moment before his agitation resurfaced.

“Be glad I didn’t kill the asshole...” he grumbled his irritation, visualizing what he had walked up on earlier, his eyes dropping to her mouth, “little bastard trying to kiss my baby...”

Those little endearments aroused her beyond distraction.

His mood lightened, as he once again pressed his mouth to hers. He reluctantly lifted the deeply satisfying caress after a fashion.

“You look awfully cute in that.” He gestured to the startling blue fedora sitting on her soft dark hair.

“We need to get you one,” he said, removing the hat, tossing it to the bureau beside them, “they look quite becoming on you.”

She frowned at the fedora’s removal, until his lips against her neck caught her attention.

“Are you my Sugar Baby?” Red murmured against the soft skin.

Liz tsed softly, rolling her eyes.

“I didn’t say that.” she remembered back to the remark Brad had made concerning Red.

“Well, you didn’t deny it either.” he pointed out the fact.

“I’m your girlfriend...” she hesitated at the term, “significant other...” she screwed up her nose distastefully. That did not work either.

“...Whatever.” Red concluded, trailing a soft line of kisses along her jaw line. He knew the label he would like to apply to her, but she wasn’t ready for that... yet.

“We really must settle on something.” he rumbled deeply. “Sugar baby would work for me.” he grinned. “Though, normally, when I think of you...”

“Don’t even go there yet.” she put a little space between them, a scolding look on her face. “Are you going back to work?”

Red could see her point, moving her closer in his embrace all the same. “Well, I can’t be your Sugar Daddy if I don’t continue bringing in the dough.”

“I can just see it now.” she allowed herself to be maneuvered, completely pliable in his arms, “at the company Christmas party.” she teased. “Hi, I’m Liz and this is my Sugar Daddy, Red Reddington, aka, fourth most wanted criminal in America...”

“And possibly the rest of the civilized world...” he was anything but immodest, “you want to take me to your Christmas party?” he was visibly touched.

“You can be my secret Santa.” she flirted openly.

“Oh, I plan to be your secret Santa.” the grey eyes took on a blue hue as his mood lightened further. “Have you been a good little girl,” his manner turned playful, “because if you have, I get to slip you a special Yule Log this year.”
She stifled a giggle, “Only you know which list I’m on, Santa.” she responded in kind. “Should I leave you some of my special cookies.”

“Oh, hell yeah.” his eyes dropped to her breasts. “I absolutely adore special cookies.”

“I thought you might.” she shook her head woefully, chuckling appreciatively. She tucked herself under his chin, snuggling into his warmth.

“Those cookies are only for Santa, remember.” his tone took on a scolding inflection. “Santa doesn’t like to share...”

“I did not know that about Santa.” she stated playfully. “So territorial...”.

Red pulled back slightly, lifting an eyebrow, “And you’re not?”

He looked at her pointedly, both knowing very well he was remembering her reaction to Natalia.

“Maybe I am.” she admitted impassively. “But I hope I would find something better to say than, he’s mine.” she scoffed, her eyes lifting defensively. “You couldn’t have been a little more erudite where I am concerned?”

“One says thing in the heat of the moment, one often regrets,” he glanced down at her small pout, “but in this instance, I said exactly what I meant.”

Red pulled back reluctantly, remembering his state of dress. He grimaced accordingly.

“I have to get out of these clothes.” He pulled at the shirt, removing it quickly before heading for the bathroom.

“I know that your little wannabe paramour is most likely indisposed...” he called back over his shoulder, “but I would like it if you stayed with Silas.”

“You don’t think Brad will heed the warning?” the blue eyes raised, the amazement apparent.

“He better.” Red said. “Or he’ll find a bullet up his ass.” he muttered, washing himself off before donning a new shirt.

Sighing, he pushed away from the sink. “I know that you are more than capable of handling Brad...” he reached out, brushing her hair gently aside as it fell off her shoulders. “I was so proud of your actions where the bastard was concerned.”

“Thank you.” she smiled gently, truly appreciating his concern for her well being and even more so, his belief in her abilities. “Silas and I were going to play the tables when I got back.

Looping a new tie, he made quick work of the knot, as he looked down at her. “If you should need me...”

“...Call.” she concluded, kissing the warm mouth in open affection.
Liz and Silas hit the tables and as in previous days, they were winning but not as efficiently as Silas would have liked.

“We’re not telling Francis about this, right?” Liz quipped having hesitated placing a large bet, instead lowering the amount considerably.

As they entered their second hour, she tilted her head, glancing curiously at her guard.

“Are you trying to steal my soul, you little Succubus?” Silas asked, tossing his cards back to the dealer, a disdainful look on his face.

“You don’t have a soul.” Liz stated succinctly. “No, I was just wondering where you were earlier, bodyguard o’ mine.”

“You’re asking why I didn’t rescue your skinny ass?”

“Well, in so many words, yes.” she replied, a smile playing about her lips. “Let me guess, a good hair day again?”

“I saw Red coming.” Silas shrugged his stocky shoulders. Liz leaned closer, clearly interested in the turn of the conversation.

“He saw you two and while not pleased, he hung back, giving you a moment.” he explained. Liz smiled to herself, appreciating Red letting her have a go at the jerk.

“When Brad grasped you the second time and made a move on you...” the man paused, taking a drink from his glass, motioning for other cards to be dealt.

“It didn’t matter if you were handling it or not.” the man smirked. “Red was gonna kill him.” he nodded at the truth in the statement. “I wasn’t about to get in the middle of that.”

“Have money on it, did you?” she smiled around the straw in her mouth.

“As if anyone would bet against Red.” Silas scoffed at the very idea.

“Red said you were all placing bets on the outcome.” she quirked her brow. “As is your way.” she allowed.

“No, we were betting on when, how and why Red would finally beat the living shit out of Brad.” he corrected the misconception.

“Was it worth it?”

“There’s nothing like watching a man fight for his lady.” Silas sighed lightly, taking a long drink from his tumbler.

Liz rolled her eyes, then peeked at her card.

“I’m serious.” the guard proclaimed. “With Red having pissed a circle around you now,” he baited
the young woman, “I knew he was going to beat the shit out of that prick son of a bitch in spectacular fashion.”

She shook her head, falling silent before tapping the table for another card. “Pissed a circle around me?” she scrunched her nose at the archaic phrasing.

Silas chuckled into his glass, “He rode you bareback... didn’t he?”

Liz’s mouth gaped as she sucked in a shocked breath. How the hell did he know this shit!?

“He told you!” she hissed quietly. Her temper came to the fore for a brief moment.

The man snorted his amusement. “I don’t have to be clairvoyant.” throwing his cards aside, he sighed heavily.

Liz looked at him pleadingly hoping her semi-pout would affect her guard as it did his employer.

“That won’t work on me.” he patiently waited for his hand to be dealt. “I’ve known Red for a long time.” he didn’t mind telling the story, however. “And I can honestly say, I have never seen him so... sated.”

The man treaded carefully in his use of words. There were certain things that should only be said between the parties involved. In private.

But he also knew Red wouldn’t mind him putting Elizabeth at ease.

“You’re full of crap.” she whispered leaning conspiratorially. “No one can tell things like that just by looking.” she scoffed.

Silas smiled softly, knowing the woman was on a fishing expedition. “Those close to you, those who really care... know.”

Would her team guess at her secret? They were good partners. They even socialized from time to time. But Liz was no where near as close to them as she was Dembe, Silas and Francis. The thought surprised her.

She could not have made that statement a month back.

And even if those at work found out, did she even care? Her first instinct was not to give a damn. Which... actually kind of shocked her. Liz was a people pleaser. Had she changed so much while in Red’s company?

She had tried so hard to gain acceptance and now here she was... not giving a shit about what they thought. What anybody thought.

For the first time she could remember, her happiness outweighed everything else.

Liz leaned in closer, laying her arm on the man’s chair. “Why didn’t he?” she asked quietly.

“Kill Brad?” Silas glanced over to her.

“...Yes.”

“Oh, he wanted to...” Silas thought back to the ending, the way Red had stroked the weapon in his hand so lovingly, “but there was a larger issue.” he waved off the next few hands as he turned so they could converse more privately. “It was imperative that Brad understand the significance of the word ‘No’.”

Liz shook her head, not really following as yet.

“Well, I think he will listen to Red now.”

Silas corrected the assumption. “Yes, Red was pissed off that someone was encroaching on his territory.” it was granted. “But nothing pisses Red off more than someone who does not do as a lady demands.”

“So while Red was... staking his claim,” Liz felt her heart flutter at the thought, “he wanted to make sure Brad didn’t pull what he did with me in the future... with any other women?”

“Pretty much.” Silas nodded. “If Brad wasn’t listening to you, with Red Reddington by your side, who’s to say what he would do with a woman on her own.”

“Is there something you aren’t telling me?” Liz was slightly concerned.

Silas looked at the woman beside him, leaning comfortably into his seat back. “Brad’s daddy is a lawyer...” the man began, “and his son’s record was a little too clean for our tastes.”

Liz frowned at the insinuation, a sickening feeling settling in the pit of her stomach.

“Has he–”

“Unsure.” the man admitted, deepening the frown on her face. “Let it go.” she was advised, as he read her train of thought well enough. “You know damn well Red will have his movements watched... after the bastard is recovered, of course.” he returned to the game.

Liz nodded and relaxed after a moment, trusting in Red.

Francis came straggling in, taking a seat beside them. Heaving a heavy sigh of release, the young man looked around for a server.

Liz heaved a sigh of her own of a different sort as the young man conspicuously adjusted his package to better fit the seat. The woman ignored Silas’ deep chuckle of amusement, changing the subject hastily.

“Where’s Lia?” she asked, looking around for the woman in question, searching the busy gaming room absently.

“She’ll be along shortly.” Francis stretched, throwing in a couple hundreds, entering the game. “She was seeing the bride and groom off at the airport. She’ll call when she’s ready to play.” he groaned, having lost that hand.

“It comes and goes so quickly here in Oz, doesn’t it?” Silas chuckled again at the man’s bad luck.

“They aren’t staying here for their honeymoon?” Liz questioned.

“No, they’re going to Cancun, I think?” Francis shrugged. “And why, it’s not like they’re going to take in the sights.” he was genuinely confused. “Or at least, I wouldn’t.”

“Well, we know what you would do.” she pushed from her seat.

“And we know what you and Red would do.” Silas threw it out casually.
“I have to pee.” she snapped waspishly, throwing the guard an annoyed look.

Silas pushed back his own seat, waving off the next card as he arose.

“I don’t need you to wipe my ass you know.” she frowned at the man towering over her.

“That’s Red’s department.” he drained his glass, setting it on the table. “After this afternoon, I’d rather be close... if it’s all the same to you.”

“You just said–” she iterated.

“Yes well, a normal man would have gotten the message.” Silas justified his actions. “I want to be positive Brad isn’t a psychotic fucker.”

“That’s your job.” Francis cheerfully pointed out.

She shrugged, pointing to her seat. “Keep it warm for me.” she asked Francis, and received a nod in return. Liz had learned the ins and outs of Vegas casino jargon.

She walked alongside her guard, pleased when the man stopped at the end of the hall, instead of trailing her all the way to the toilet.

Silas had an open view of the bathroom and the only exit, so that was fine.

“I’ll be just a minute.” she patted his arm, rushing for the door. She really had to go!

She quickly did her business before looking herself over in the mirror.

“Why don’t you just do us a favor and give it up.”

Sighing, Elizabeth sang, I told you so, in her head as she wondered at the unlucky circumstances surrounding her bathroom trips this day.

Reluctantly turning away from the mirror, she came face to face with... Natalia.

“Excuse me?” she asked pleasantly.

“Red shouldn’t be tied down, it isn’t good for him.” the thick accent made it hard to understand the words, but Liz got the jest well enough.

“He likes to be tied down.” Liz replied innocently, before flicking a stray strand of hair out of her eyes.

“Red is a virile man. Way too much for a naïve woman like yourself to handle on her own.”

“I must be doing something right, he asked me to marry him.” Which, actually wasn’t a lie, come to think of it.

“You just aren’t good enough for him, obviously. He needs someone more,” the blonde looked Liz over condescendingly from head to toe, “...sophisticated.”

Liz repeated the action, with the same scrutiny, “I take that to mean you’re asking I let him free on behalf of someone else then, and not yourself?”

Natalia came at her, missing Liz by mere inches as she side stepped the enraged woman.
Giving Natalia a good shove, Liz sent her careening across the room.

And so the battle began...

Silas glanced between the bathroom door and the main gaming area, keeping a close watch on comings and goings. He nodded an acknowledgment to Mark as the man came from a side door, Red following close behind, with Christopher by his side.

Red, seeing Silas manning a hallway, lifted his chin questioningly. Silas thumbed in the direction of the corridor which he guarded so zealously.

Red sauntered to the table, taking a stance behind Francis. He shook his head woefully when the young man lost yet another hand, sharing a small laugh with the dealer and the men beside him.

Francis cradled the phone against his shoulder, speaking into the gadget as he tapped his knuckles on the felt table, having glanced at the new card thrown his way.

“We’re still in Las Vegas, you tool.” the young man grumbled. “Now why the hell aren’t you here? You said you were coming in on...” he rolled his eyes, sighing his disgust. “I told you not to mess with her. Now don’t you wish you had listened?”

Red caught his attention and Francis craned his head back to fully meet the man’s eyes. “Alina tried to take Ben out.” he answered the rhetorical question.

Red nodded his understanding. Alina was a little more than unstable at times. But it made her no different than most people they dealt with on a daily basis.

“Ben wants to know if we’re still on for—”

“Yes.” Red confirmed. “Now get off the phone.” he shook his head as Francis said his goodbyes and busted... once again.

“Why do you always do that.” Red asked of the boy, stopping the young man from yet again, wrapping his knuckles to signify to the dealer... ‘hit me’. He showed nineteen of the allotted twenty-one. The dealer flipped his card, showing eighteen, leaving Francis the winner.

“Out of curiosity sake,” Red gestured to the cards, “if he ‘hit’, what would he have got next?”

The dealer looked at Christopher, waiting for permission. The owner smiled, gesturing to see the card.

Francis’ shoulders slumped as the dealer showed them the Queen of Hearts.

Ignoring Red’s low chuckling, Francis tossed the card back dejectedly.

Both men instinctively reached for their weapons as they heard a commotion. Silas took off at a full run, bolting down the corridor. A shrill voice followed.

“You little bitch!”

All the men glanced at one another before rushing to the sound. As they neared, they heard the sound of shattering glass.
Red sought out Dembe, relieved to see the man making his way rapidly across the crowded casino.

“Slut...”

Red’s steps pulled up short at the recognized voice. Dembe, offered a double take as well.

That was Lizzy’s voice.

Lengthening his steps, he came around the corner pulling up short, finding Lizzy and Natalia struggling against one another in the corridor. An expensive vase laying near their feet, shattered beyond recognition.

Silas stepped between them, breaking the two women apart. The man laughed quietly as Liz ducked his interference, yanking the blonde from the guard’s loose hold.

“You little shit...” the man chuckled, jerking back, narrowly avoiding the swiping arc of Liz’s arm as it flew past him.

Back handing Natalia across the face, which knocked the blonde into a nearby wall... Liz threw another well aimed blow, catching the woman with her ring, drawing a welling line of blood across Natalia’s cheek.

Natalia pushed back, grabbing Liz’s shoulders. Liz went with the momentum, catching her leg behind Natalia’s calf, causing both women to topple to the floor.

Sitting up quickly Liz drew back her arm, aiming and connecting with Natalia’s eye.

“Damn!” Francis laughed his joy, admiring the technique exhibited.

“Lizzy...” Red scolded quietly, nearing the melee. Reaching down to break the ladies apart, he stepped out of the way quickly as they rolled in his direction. A swift shift, had Lizzy gaining ground again.

“He’s better off with me!” Natalia screeched, desperately trying to elude an expert sidekick.

“He’s mine,” Liz snarled, connecting on a downward blow to Natalia’s cheek line, “you stupid bitch.”

Red’s brows rose exponentially, his lips twitching slightly. A better label... And to think, she had scolded him for using the same vernacular.

Chancing a glance up, Red found Mark laughing silently at the fiasco taking place, but the man managed to give a thumbs up sign, all the same.

Francis was completely charmed by Lizzy’s antics, smiling and cheering her on as if this were a bout of mud wrestling gone awry.

Dembe stoically watched the women, though, a small smile did play at his lips.

And Silas... even as he tried to “break them apart” was throwing out pointers to Liz, that the woman really didn’t need, seeing she was doing a bang up job all on her own.

Raising her fist again, Liz meant to shut Natalia’s mouth forcibly if necessary or to Red’s experienced gaze, that appeared to be the intended target.

Red caught the action, gently dragging Liz out of harm’s reach. His arm tightened slightly about the tiny waist as he lifted the negligible weight easily.

“Let her go, Red!” Francis yelled out sympathetically.

Liz fought against Red’s superior strength, scratching and clawing for her arch enemy.

Grasping Natalia’s ankle, Silas pulled her away from the fisticuffs.

Liz lunged unexpectedly, momentarily breaking Red’s hold, grabbing a fist full of the tousled blonde hair, dragging Natalia back towards her.

“You damn brat...” Silas grumbled his own annoyance.

“Baby, stop...” Red tsked as he tried to break Lizzy’s tight grasp, unsuccessfully, “you’re going to hurt your arm.”

“I’m gonna hurt her!” Red lost his grip on the squirming woman, his amusement not aiding him in this instance.

“I think you already did, sweetheart.” he noted the bruised and bleeding woman on the floor beneath them.

Grabbing hold of Lizzy’s belt loop, Red tugged her back, chuckling when she swatted at him.

Natalia blindly struck out, catching Liz in the shoulder.

“Bitch,” Liz wiggled from under his grasp, punching out, landing a solid blow to Natalia’s jaw, “I’m gonna beat your ass!” she was pretty sure of her proclamation.

Laughing harder, Red finally hooked his hand in the back of her jeans, controlling his little spitfire.

“Come here, you slippery little thing.”

Mark and Dembe, finally taking pity on those involved, helped Silas pull Natalia out of Liz’s reach which allowed him to stand erect, regaining his footing.

Squeezing Liz tight around the waist, Red grinned as she kicked out comically for her feet were off the ground mid-air.

Tightening his grasp around her waist, he pulled her flush against his large frame. Her simmering little body heaved with her exertion, still struggling to break free.

“Cool off!” he whispered decisively in her ear.

“You want me to cool off!” she demanded heatedly. “Then let me go so I can finish kicking that fucking skanky cunt’s ass!”

Red chuckled warmly. “Oh, those dirty words coming out of that sweet little mouth.”

He’d never heard her be so vulgar, but then, she had been in the company of Silas, so it shouldn’t come too much of as a surprise. “You’re turning me on.”
But as humorous, and dare he say, arousing as this all was, it had to stop. She was going to hurt herself if she continued.

Liz struggled against him, trying to get loose from his firm hold. The man grunted low in his throat as her round ass brushed against his crotch in her fight for freedom.

“Lizzy...baby,” he purred against her ear, “calm down.”

She inhaled sharply, turning her head into his voice. The low soothing baritone calmed her, in spite of herself.

“You want to tell me what happened?” he hoped to divert her attention.

“Just what I said would happen!” Liz snapped, fighting to release her arms again. “She got catty in the ladies room.”

“Baby...” He drawled soothingly, nuzzling her neck.

“Stop it.” She grumbled, all the while unconsciously baring her neck to the man. She stopped struggling when his breath tickled her hair line, drawing a course of shivers down her spine.

“It’s over now.” He slid his hand under her shirt, gently rubbing his thumb along her rib cage, calming her further until she relaxed fully in his hold.

“That’s a good girl.” He let go of her arms, stroking her in a soft caress.

He looked over his shoulder, to check on the proceedings. Dembe had Natalia contained, nodding agreeable at what ever Christopher was saying.

Silas stood between the combatants, narrowing his eyes at Elizabeth, though a smile twitched at his lips. “Don’t you even think about it.” he pointed a warning finger.

Dembe led Natalia towards the elevator bank. The woman zeroed in on Red, a malicious gleam in the lovely, if swollen, green eyes.

“Liz...” Silas warned sternly at the heat he saw returning in the little brunette’s eyes, even though he had to admit, he was enjoying this immensely.

He had never really seen Liz in action before. He was more than pleasantly surprised to find she packed quiet a wallop.

“Did you tell her you were with me earlier, Red?” Natalia’s tone was pure venom. “That we... fucked.”

“Dammit, Natalia.” Red snapped his pique. “Shut the fuck up!”

“Bitch!” Liz sidestepped Red, rushing for the woman.

“...Shit.” Silas grumbled disconcertingly.

Red reached for Liz’s arm, just grazing her elbow, missing the target. “Son of a bitch...” he sighed.

Silas made a swipe for, huffing his amusement when the little twirp ducked his effort like a pro-footballer heading for a touch down.

“Lizzy...” Red chortled quietly as he watched Lizzy evade capture. He tried to ignore the look of pride in Silas’s face, other things on his mind at the moment.

Both men grinned as they neared the warring pair.

Francis barked with laughter, shouting at his friend gleefully, “Kick her ass, Lizzy!”

Liz pushed the woman back, slamming Natalia into the wall. She punched her foe square in the nose, producing a resounding cracking sound that echoed sickeningly down the corridor.

Dodging another blow, Red crowded Liz, grabbing her about the front. Spinning, he blocked the blow that had been intended for her with his back. The slight thump he felt more an annoyance than painful.

Silas stepped between Red and Natalia, catching the blonde’s arms easily before turning her face first into the wall, pinning her arms behind her.

“Settle down, Blondie.” Silas murmured, pushing his weight against the squirming she-cat.

“You settle down.” Silas tightened his grip slightly, driving her harder into the wall.

She kicked her feet back, struggling against the man’s unrelenting hold.

Silas sighed, taking the offered zip tie Dembe handed him, looping it around her wrists effortlessly.

“You’ve been a very bad girl,” he grinned as he secured her, “but you’re not getting the cuffs.”

“I’m going to blow a hole in your fucking skull!” Natalia screeched angrily.

“You’re not gonna do shit,” the man replied, “you bottle blonde little bitch.”

“Watch it!” Mark barked as a fist came swinging the guard’s way.

Silas jerked his head back seconds before Elizabeth’s hand reached out, grabbing a fist full of Natalia’s hair.

“Shit...” Francis laughed gleefully as Liz damn near ripped the woman from Silas’ grasp yet again.

“Lizzy, dammit.” Red chuckled at how fierce the woman was... and how determined.

“You wanna control the hellcat.” Silas asked snippily, pulling at the shrill woman in Liz’s grasp.

Liz tightened her hold, yanking the squalling woman closer.

Sighing heavily, Silas pulled his switch blade, cutting quickly through the long blonde locks, chivalrously breaking Natalia free.

“Oh, damn!” Francis choked on his own laughter. “He fucking scalped her!”

“You aren’t fucking helping.” Red pointed out, knocking Francis’ phone away as the young man recorded the proceedings.

Francis righted the phone hastily, falling into Mark, as both men cackled at the sheer look of disbelief on Natalia’s face.

Instantly reaching back to her head, Natalia patted the shorn locks in shock. “You son of a bitch!”
she wailed her astonishment, “I’m going to make you a enu—”

Silas clamped a hand over the woman’s mouth, dragging her towards a smiling Christopher and a large Security guard.

As Liz laughed evilly over the guard’s actions, she threw the hair gripped in her hand in her foe’s face.

She continued her berating long after Silas had deposited Natalia in the capable hands of the hotel Security guard.

Red physically lifted the struggling and bitching woman, effortlessly walking her down the hallway and around the corner, out of sight of the still shrieking Natalia.

Coming to a secluded alcove, the quiet was a most welcome respite. Red blocked Liz’s view with his body, ever so glad when Liz seemed to calm a tad.

“Were you!” Liz snapped out of nowhere, the blue eyes flashing angrily.

“Was I what?” Red looked down at her face, completely lost for a moment.

“Where you with her?”

Red snorted. “...No.”

“Then why did she say you had been?” it was angrily demanded.

“I suppose she thought it would piss you off.”

“Likely story...” Liz scoffed.

“I was with Mark, you know that.” he reasoned, if only to placate her.

“And I’m sure he’ll corroborate your whereabouts.” She bitched, folding her arms defiantly over her chest.

“Yes, him and the other ten people in the room.”

“Yeah, I’m sure they’ll all tell me you were there them whole time, when they all know you were fucking that bitch.”

Red grinned, pushing a strand of hair out of her face. She batted his hand away, making him grin wider.

“What the hell are you smiling for?”

“I like when you’re jealous.” he tried again to tame her wild hair, only to have Lizzy shoo him away irritably. “It’s very sexy...”

“I am not jealous.” She sneered her contempt.

“Then why don’t you believe me?” he tried another tactic. “I’ve never lied to you.”

Well, besides that little tidbit about her father and the fire, but he had explained that.

“Don’t pull that, I’ve never lied to you, shit on me, Red Reddington.” she gritted, poking him hard in the chest with her finger. “It’s one thing to not lie about the work, it’s another when it’s personal.”

He inched forward, speaking roughly in her ear. “I will never lie to you... regardless of the circumstances.”

She leaned into the wall, trying to contain the arousal creeping around the edges of her anger.

“You know that you are all that I want.” he purred.

“You’ve fucked her before!” she hissed.

“Maybe, I did fuck her...” the man shrugged, not denying his past. Not lying to her.

She released a shaky breath, the profanity passing his lips a definite turn on to her great chagrin.

“But I never made love to her, like I do you.” He turned his head, tracing the sensitive shell of her ear with his nose. “You know I only share that with you.”

A flush covered her cheeks and neck, as his voice resonated deeply in her ear, painting a picture of what they continuously shared.

“Why is that?” his raspy voice demanded softly. “Why is it that I only share that with you?”

Liz stood straighter, the blush receding. “Because you’re mine.” she stated without hesitation and with absolute conviction. “You’re my confidant. My protector. My lover...”

Red captured her lips, pushing her into the wall. The man heated when a tiny mewl worked its way into her throat as she wrapped her arms tightly around his neck. Cupping her head, his fingers traced the small of her back, his mouth kissing hers ravenously.

While he knew he would be able to make the woman blush until the end of time, he also knew the things he would teach her from here on out, would make it impossible for anyone, even Silas, to do the same.

And while he would only admit it to himself, he would kind of miss that. He also couldn’t help but feel extremely elated not only for them... but for her.

While they had been having trouble finding a label that fit just who they were... who they had become, one Lizzy would not balk at using.

Lizzy had been having trouble finding her footing in the relationship. For a host of reasons.

But now, she had found a path in a small way.

She had finally voiced what had been bottled up inside. She voiced it loudly, confidently, what he was to her. To Natalia, to those that were standing about... even to himself.

You’re mine. You’re my confidant. My protector. My lover...

It was an emotional release she had needed.

Those words, said out loud, was her equivalent of shouting it from the rooftops that they were... together.

He released her gently, setting his forehead against hers. “I will always be yours, Lizzy.” he whispered coarsely.
Liz nuzzled into the affection, her breathing evening out.

“How’s your hand, arm?” he lifted both, examining the red and slightly swollen appendages, kissing the bruised knuckles.

“Better now.” She grinned.

Francis appeared at their side, breaking the moment. “To the victor.” He beamed, holding a glass of wine out.

Liz laughed quietly, taking the pre-offered refreshment.

Francis cleared his throat, subtly gesturing to four men who were suddenly striding down the hall. The oldest, in the center, swaggered as the other three flanked him protectively.

Liz was instantly intent on the older man. Even from this distance, she could tell he had an aura of power about him. As he grew closer, he gave off an air that subsequently made her think of Frank Sinatra in his later years.

He had style, class and charm. He even resembled the crooner to a certain extent not only in looks, but his classic style of dress and apparent charisma.

“Reddington...” The man held out his hand in greeting, his rumbling timbre washed over her like warmed honey. Something about it made her wish she could request him sing to see if he could belt a tune like Sinatra.

She flushed slightly at such an absurd thought.

“Antonio.” Red nodded his hello.

Liz groaned internally, hoping like hell Red’s business associate had not just seen the display she had caused with Natalia.

“This your lady.” the man smiled at Elizabeth. And she felt the need to seek out Red’s hand.

“Yes,” Red beamed, “this is Elizabeth.”

Antonio took Liz’s hand, raising it to his mouth. Liz grimaced, quickly scanning her hand for any sign of blood just as the man lay his lips tenderly against her reddened fingers.

“You’re quite a little scrapper.” the man chuckled, before winking playfully. “You must be very proud of her.” the man smiled at Red, his eyes crinkling at the corner.

“I am.” Red smiled warmly... proudly, at the woman beside him. “For so many reasons.”

Chapter End Notes

Of all the people who could have said, 'Cunt', first... it just had to be Liz.

I'm so proud of her!
MAY 21

Red lay awake, his mind active and functioning at break neck speed. The sensation was nothing new for the man.

But this activity he was experiencing was different than his usual calculated, precise process. He wasn’t thinking about the business aspect of his life, a novelty in itself.

He listened to the sounds of the room. The soft push of the air conditioner moving coolness about, the soft evened breathing of the woman beside him... calmed his mind.

A tree outside, cast an eerie shadow along the opposite wall of the room. As a child, Red was never bothered by nightmares or fanciful images of ‘monsters under the bed’. He had never believed in such things, even at such a young age. As a grown man, he now realized just how wrong he had been.

There were ‘things’ out in this world that caused childhood monsters to pale in comparison. He had been discussing one such example with Antonio Crocetti this long evening.

The old Mobster had seen twice as much than Red would ever know in his lifetime. Which was a highly disturbing thought, considering the atrocities Red had encountered.

But given Antonio had vast experience in the horrific brutality life could throw in your path, Red found the man to be a great source of insight, knowledge, and even comfort on occasion.

So it was a shock when, during the course of their quiet chat, the tables had turned and Red became the voice of reason for the disoriented and discouraged.

One of Antonio’s Lieutenants had gone off the deep end recently, it seemed, as Antonio had relayed the telling.

The man in question enjoyed killing. Antonio had never diluted himself of the fact, such things were necessary in the line of work chosen, after all. Even so, there were established rules among professionals.

The individual, one Mario Scarpa, had overstepped the boundaries set by Antonio. The old man himself did the deed. It had killed Antonio to have to be the one.

“He wouldn’t listen... maybe he couldn’t?” he sighed woefully into his tumbler. “My heart is heavy tonight, Red. He was like a son to me.”

Red listened respectfully as the tale unfolded for it was clear, Antonio needed a shoulder.

“Life’s too short.” the man pushed aside his heavy heart. “Go to your lady, Reddington.” It was more than suggested. “Make passionate love to her...”

The man looked lost in a pleasant memory for a long moment, “Such a young nubile beauty...” a smile graced the weathered lips, his eyes taking on a serene quality, “never neglect such an exquisite gift.”

A deep seated pain replaced the touch of light that had shown in the older man’s eyes.

“Remember the important things,” Antonio reached out, gripping Red’s forearm, willing him to listen, “keep them... her... first in your heart and mind.”

Red had nodded his agreement and understanding.

“Mario...” the old man’s heart was still heavy with grief and regret, “Mario had so many good qualities.” Antonio nodded absently, deep within the moment. “He came from bad stock. Too much happened as a boy. Too many things before he came to me.” the man muttered angrily. “I tried to teach him...” he trailed off.

The silence fell as Red contemplated the depth of heartache children could evoke.

“I turned a blind eye on so many occasions.” Antonio glanced about their surroundings absently, straightening his napkin unconsciously.

He had not touched his meal, Red noted. The old guy looked his age right at that moment, but Red knew he would rebound.

Antonio Crocetti loved life too much to allow this hurdle to bring him down permanently.

“You did all you could, Antonio.” Red believed his words. “Sometimes, love just isn’t enough.”

“What a damnable reality.” Antonio nodded slowly. The clear, intelligent eyes shifted to Red’s concerned ones.

“What are we doing?” the man spread his hands, encompassing his surroundings. “We have a magnificent spread before us. Good wine. Good friends are near.” he was forcing the darkness aside.

Red had done it countless times enough to see it in others.

“No life is good. Let us partake, while there is still time on our side.” he chuckled at his own particular brand of humor. “God knows, I’m not getting any younger.” the man huffed amusement. “This could be my last meal for al...” the man’s stout voice faded, a supposed fear filling his features.

“Maria is fixing her world renowned pasta linguine this weekend,” he made mention of his wife of forty years, “if I miss it, she will kill me. Never mind about the ‘Almighty’s’ plan.”

Red chuckled warmly, amused by the man’s statement. “She is good for you,” he lifted his wine, sipping the mellow beverage. “I’ve always said as much.” he declared. “And a magnificent Chef to boot.” he added. “When she does the deed, I will be first in line to take your place.”

“You are possibly the only one who could.” A hint of the old swagger returned, Red was happy to see. “Not in bed, of course,” the old man needled his younger counterpart. “After me, she could stomach no other man.”

Red graciously took the cut to his manhood. If asked, he would say the same of his Lizzy.

No one could love that woman like he did.
“That woman has been on a pedestal for fifty years.” Antonio was proud of the fact. “I’ve lifted her so high in that area,” he bragged to Red’s delight, “no one could ever take her to such a state of bliss.”

“Mr. Kaplan says,” Red made mention, “that all men consider themselves irreplaceable in that area of expertise.” he swirled the dark vintage in his glass absently. “When in reality, the very opposite is true.”

“Kaplan doesn’t know everything.” Antonio shook his head woefully. “Especially given that Kaplan is not only competition, but is said to have bigger balls than the two of us combined.” the man smirked at the ambiguity of the statement, drawing a reluctant smile from Reddington, before the older man sobered somewhat. “There are exceptions to the rule.”

“I certainly hope that’s the case.” Red glanced over to another table, his eyes falling gently on the object he sought out, and had made a study of, all evening.

“This one...” Antonio noted Red’s avid interest, “she is different than the rest.” he was a shrewd judge of character. “You feel something for her that the others could not offer.”

“...Yes.” Red’s brow furrowed. “I fought it for a very long time.”

“For her sake.” Antonio understood.

“What right do we have to bring them into our way of life...”

“My Maria knew of my... world before we...” the older man trailed away. “She accepts all that I am. It was not always so, of course. There were troubling years.” the man admitted. “She is a devout Catholic.”

“...Yes, I know.” Red did. “Do you regret–”

“No regrets.” Antonio interrupted, his tone firm. “Not a single one.”

Red glanced at Lizzy again. She was trying to retrieve a stolen French fry from Francis. Her ability to attain her desire results, just as cunning and assertive as it was a short time ago.

He smiled reluctantly at the antics deployed. “She is very young.”

“Teach her to survive, especially...” Antonio watched the farce play out as well, his own amusement triggered, “in your absence.”

Red turned his attention immediately.

“Time and misfortune claim us all.” the man reminded Red of their human frailty. “I have heard of your troubles.” The subject was broached. “Not the whole story, mind you. Only the price on your head raising...” Antonio edged forward, “which in turn, adds to the danger to her...”

Red remained silent on the matter.

“My resources are available to you.” It was offered.

“I want the bastard myself.” Red spat heatedly. “I want his throat in my hands, his blood...” he took a deep shaking breath, suppressing his sudden flare of anger. His lapse of control unacceptable.

Antonio causally glanced about, ensuring no others saw Reddington’s loss of restraint. He understood the younger man’s agitation. If it were his Maria...
“Understood.” he inclined his head regally. “But the offer is always open to you.”

“This I know.” Red nodded minutely, appreciating the man’s discretion. Not only due to the subject matter at hand, but for allowing Red’s enraged response. “And should the circumstances arise, the same can be said for me.”

“You waste your time with an old man when your choice of companion could be more... stimulating.” Antonio’s eyes lit as Reddington’s eyes caressed his lady’s backside lasciviously.

Antonio had to admit, he was enjoying this side of Reddington. He didn’t think he had ever seen the man so distracted, especially over a woman.

He knew Reddington was a lover of women. They were both of the same regard when it came to females. You respect them, cherish them... love them.

But the boy was practically spell bound in regards to the small beauty across the way. He did see the attraction. She was quite a woman. She was pleasing on the eyes, she was humorous, intelligent and was a ferocious fighter when warranted.

She turned their way, having sensed Reddington’s eyes on her. She blushed a charming crimson, before coyly batting the long dark lashes highlighting her baby blues.

Antonio chuckled quietly into his glass as the man across from him grunted low in his chest at the display.

Yes... she was quite an alluring package. One that should not be neglected any longer.

“My time with you is never wasted, dear friend.” Red muttered absently after a long moment.

“You used to be a ‘breast’ man.” Antonio chuckled. “I see you’ve come over to my side of the fence.” he winked playfully, sipping his finger of Scotch. “Nothing like the succulent curve of an enticing backside... is there.”

“And I shall be to the day I die. God willing.” Antonio nodded sagely. “Let’s not forget about their luscious lips...” the man further added to Red’s enticement, “though which one’s we prefer tasting, is always up for question, don’t you agree?”

After further goading of Lizzy’s fine attributes, by his dear friend, Red had left shortly thereafter with his little seductress in hand and now... hours later, he lay here, quietly contemplating his lot in life.

After a private meal prepared by the Villa Chef, a truly wonderful night full of intimate conversation and unbelievably stimulating lovemaking had ensued.

As Red awoke, he had discreetly moved away from Lizzy’s sweet smelling body, the temptation to awake her too much if he tried to remain cuddled close to that ‘enticing’ backside.

They had made love less than a couple hours ago. Sweet, passionate love that sated him completely... or so, Red had believed at the time.

While it was his custom to allow the woman to wake naturally before initiating lovemaking in previous days, his body demanded differently this morning.

Red was a little annoyed with himself, truth told. Usually he was well able to control his carnal instincts.

Visions kept popping in his head. Ones he attempted to dismiss as juvenile... beneath him.

Watching that little ‘affair of honor and proprietorship’ yesterday, when Lizzy and Natalia had been going at each other... Red felt something primordial... deeply satisfying inside.

Lizzy staking her rightful claim on him, caused his cock to pulse to life...

The occasional sight of Lizzy’s round bottom as she tussled with her enemy, or the fleeting glimpse of her breast as her shirt rode up or was tugged at... had fulfilled a deep seated masculine fantasy he wasn’t even aware of having before.

Red had noted Silas look at Lizzy’s bottom as her jeans had pulled tightly over the delectable little area at one point during the melee.

The fact Silas had shifted his eyes instantly, alerted Red, a male, to the fact. The guard had noticed, as a male, the very same thing.

Silas’ deep frown of discontent and overly gruff rejoinder to both women was another indication that, in the large man’s world, he had inadvertently overstepped boundaries set for his rigid code of ethics... which was troublesome to the extreme.

Silas appeared to the lay person, to be rather lax in his... shall we say, approach, where the ladies were concerned. Any woman.

But Red knew the truth. Silas adhered to an almost archaic, chivalrous, overtly protective attitude where a female he truly respected and admired was concerned.

For him to have noticed Lizzy had a great ass, was an unthinkable breech of conduct on Silas’ part.

Lizzy was taken, by someone Silas both admired and held in high regard. That line was written in blood, never to be crossed.

Silas and Red never spoke of their connection or how it began, or the why of it all.

It just was and would always be.

Enough said.

A part of Red found it amusing, the trouble Silas had experienced.

Silas had moved past the momentary lapse easily in Lizzy’s case.

Red had watched the easy camaraderie return seconds later as Silas had thumped Lizzy’s head... hard, when she repeatedly neglected to obey Silas’ direct instructions to ‘settle the hell down’.

Red had let the ‘thumping’ pass, realizing it’s origins.

Silas need to get back to the ‘sisterly’ side of the equation. He had done so in his own inimitable fashion.

Lizzy had complained, bitching and moaning her lot in life, of course, as was her part to play.

“He struck me!”
“I saw that.” Red had admitted.

“Aren’t you going to do something!” Lizzy had demanded. Those big blue eyes had flashed their annoyance at a reticent Silas.

“If I were him,” Silas nodded to a silent Red, “I would gag you to quiet your ass down, but I have a sneaky suspicion you would actually like that sort of thing.”

Lizzy opened her mouth to retort, before getting lost in her inner most thoughts, pleasing both men for differing reasons.

“You’re welcome.” Silas had mumbled discreetly to his boss, before turning on his heel. “Excellent repartee...” he called over his stocky shoulder to his rival, as he left Red to the opportunity afforded him.

Red had sighed and went on with his task of dutifully calming his little spitfire down, again. Having lost her chance to have her row with her favored guard, and still in a temper over her earlier scuffle with Natalia, Lizzy was in no mood to be calmed down.

The man glanced to his bed partner, the dark mussed hair was splayed across the pillow, the soft tendrils lush and full.

He knew from experience, the strands felt like spun silk. His fingers itched to touch them, even now. His eyes traveled her curves beneath the sheet. He eased closer, his arms embracing the decidedly feminine and very soft form. He tucked his arm under her naked breast, enjoying the sensation of the heavy swell curving naturally to his forearm.

He felt her stir, stiffening a moment before recognition set in.

“I’ve heard vicious rumors,” the roughened voice deepened as the object of his affection pushed her warm bottom against his groin, “that you are notoriously susceptible,” he nuzzled the fragrant nape of her neck, “to morning sex.”

“People say the damndest things...” Liz hummed sleepily, settling more comfortably against his solid body. “Are you my alarm clock now?” She couldn’t help but sigh happily.

“Did you say cock?” It was Red’s turn to move closer, if only to illustrate his ‘point’.

“C-Clock.” she stammered, her cheeks reddening slightly. “I said, clock.”

“Say the other for me.” Red wasn’t going to let it go. “It turns me on to hear you say those filthy words.” he mumbled against her shoulder.

She pushed against his fingers as they filtered through her neatly trimmed pubic hair.

“...No.” she pouted at the request, inhaling sharply as one determined finger slid past her attempts to prevent such a move. The calloused edge ran along the more than sensitive ridge of her clit.

She inadvertently moved into the touch, squirming about irritably in the next instance.

“What’s wrong?” his muffled voice tickled her tender flesh.

“I have to pee.” she grumbled, fighting the urge to allow his every whim.

Red chuckled quietly, kissing her bared shoulder.
“So, go.” he lifted his arm, allowing her freedom to move. “I’ll be here when you get back. Trust me.”

She reluctantly rolled from the bed, staggering a little until she got her feet under her.

Red tilted his head, watching the woman make her way across the room. His eyes sweeping her naked form... repeatedly.

“I beg to differ,” he disagreed, watching that perfect ass swish hypnotically, before it disappeared around the corner, “…especially from my point of view.”

He leisurely stroked himself, a slow smile overtaking his face... no need to lose such a promising moment after all...

Of all the lovers he had and as provocative and seductive as they had been in their expensive lingerie and perfect hair and makeup.

Moments like these were fast replacing his concept of just what ‘sexy’ was.

There was something so... genuine about what had just occurred. So... real.

Lizzy didn’t have to be anything other than herself to turn him on.

Her tousled hair, the little crease where the sheet left it’s imprint on her side and her sleepy countenance, made for a stunning image in the hazy morning sun.

He could not remember a time when he had been so damned sexually stimulated as he was right at this moment.

He had every intention of making up for lost time. He had a taste of her now and nothing but Elizabeth was going to fulfill the overwhelming craving he had for more.

The feeling grew as he watched the woman come padding lethargically around the corner. His heartbeat quickened as her supple breasts moved naturally with her drowsy stretch. His eyes traveled downward, taking in that small thatch of dark hair on her sex, his dick throbbing in his now doormat hand.

The man smiled softly, watching Lizzy blink the sleep away, scratching her fingers under her thick mane of hair before lifting heavy lidded eyes which transfixed as she blatantly watched the man unhurriedly stroking his shaft.

Red’s eyes crinkled, his amusement piqued as Lizzy’s mouth fell agape for his actions.

She resumed her steps towards the bed, never once looking away from his hand’s activities, as she absently crawled up beside him.

This was natural. Sharing an affection for one another that millions of other couples did on a lazy morning... was normal.

He wanted to give her that. He wanted to give her so much more, truth told...

He wanted to be home every night to have dinner. He wanted to make plans and keep them. He wanted to be there when Lizzy needed him.
He wanted to make a home, a family, with her.

“I told you I would wait for you.” he muttered as her warm soft body lay against his. It felt like he had waited his whole life for her.

Liz moved her hand between their bodies, wrapping her slim fingers around his girth.

“A man true to his word.” she stated breathlessly.

Pressing her into the cushion of the bed, Red made his move, methodically and meticulously kissing and stroking her body into a heightened state of arousal which she reciprocated.

He kissed between her breasts before suckling the full nipples. He sensually nipped a trail down her torso, pausing momentarily to pay particular attention to the cute little belly button with his tongue. Red knew her weaknesses, her vulnerable spots and felt no compulsion about using this knowledge to his advantage.

He worked his way down the satin skin, his mouth lovingly worshiping the heated flesh.

He took his time, enjoying the journey and the alluring sights along the way.

At one point, he felt her body stiffen slightly directly before the woman’s attitude altered.

He stopped, nuzzling the fragrant down of her sex with which he had been playing, to lift his head, asking the rhetorical question.

“I did the...” she crinkled her nose distastefully, “I know the taste is” she trailed away, her expression a forlorn one, “can’t we just... move on to the good stuff?” she asked hopefully.

Red’s eyes held hers masterfully for a goodly beat. “We’ll do the really ‘good stuff’,” his dry, coarse tone made her melt inside, “of a more in depth connection to what I refer to as ... the really ‘good stuff’.”

The woman hesitantly placed a resisting hand over the area he indicated. “You don’t have to... I wish you wouldn’t... really.”

“Elizabeth,” Red’s tone had altered, “I want to taste your pussy.” he shifted a heated stare, scenting the dark triangle beneath him. “Open your legs to me.” he whispered silkily.

“No.” she pouted determinedly. “You will listen to me on this one Red Reddington.”

Red narrowed his eyes at the woman, wishing he’d never said a damn thing about the taste of that fucking spermicide. He had really only said it in jest at the time, to take the pressure off her making a choice she wasn’t ready for.

“Like fucking hell I will.” he was just as determined to have his way. Clasping his fingers about her wrist, he tugged slightly on the barricade blocking what he wanted.

But she was not going to budge on this issue he sensed, by the set of her pretty features.

Red positioned himself more comfortably, lowering his head. He slid his tongue into the tight slit between her fingers. Liz gasped sharply, her back bowing at the unexpected maneuver. The intense sensation sweeping through her weak limbs.

He worked the roughed muscle expertly, fondling her clit insistently. He rather enjoyed the feel of his tongue trapped between her quickly swelling labia as he massaged hard at her throbbing sex.
He could feel the slight pulse of blood flowing to the rapidly plumping organ.

“Never mind...” he made an executive decision, something better having appeared on the horizon, “keep them closed.”

Concentrating his efforts on the tight alcove, he was pleased as shit to feel the woman trembling uncontrollably under him in record time.

Soft gasps of denial and disbelief escaped her throat from time to time as he practiced the art he knew so well...

Pushing his nose into the curls at her apex, working diligently to produce his particular brand of magic.

Inhaling deeply, he savored the scent of Lizzy. So fixated on that, he noticed nothing else.

Crawling up towards the woman, he stilled her movements, drawing a frown of confusion as he rolled Lizzy to her side.

“Will you open your legs to me now?” He was all to smug, allowing he had so easily produced her orgasm.

“You told me to keep them closed.” she sighed her contentment all the same as Red’s masculine body conformed to her feminine one. “And no, I will not.” He would have to work for this one.

“Very well...” Red gently nipped her shoulder as his rampant erection poked at her back side, “then keep them closed.”

He closed his eyes to the sensation as his thickened cock fell heavily against her silky thigh.

“I don’t like to wait,” he reminded, reaching between them, “reminds me of Glen at the DMV.”

“Your numbers up,” she groaned, arching her hips back searchingly, “come to the front of the line,” she stilled as Red pushed himself against her, the feeling too good to pass up, her pride a forgotten entity suddenly, “to be... served.”

Red smiled happily, enjoying how she quickly adapted to any scenario he threw her way. Though, as he slid into her wet heat... the primal urge he had been experiencing when with this woman, made itself very well known, quickly enough.

Grasping her hip, he tilted her back into his intrusion. He jerked against the woman, captivated by the sight of the natural bounce of her bottom impacting with his pelvis.

“Does this feel good to that little pussy?” he gritted, driving his erection inch by inch into the slick, heated cavern. “Tell me what you like.” he commanded his rights, drawing a low steady moan from the woman’s throat. “Say that naughty word for me.”

He wrapped his arm around the woman, palming her full breast, gently kneading the giving flesh. Threading his fingers through the damp curls on her sex, his fingers danced against her clit, her body responding instantly to his touch.

Liz fought to say the vulgar word, wanting so badly to please him, as he had her.

Hearing that man and that deep sexy voice say, pussy, damn near made her come unglued. Really, any vulgarity he said, especially at such moments as this, made her quiver inside.
Red hardly ever cussed, but when he did, emotions were running high. It meant that he was as deeply invested in whatever project that was at hand.

Just the thought of hearing Liz say that, that she would feel comfortable enough to get past the maidenly modesty instilled since birth to most females... made his erection harden inside her. She could feel it swell as he made his request.

“You can feel it inside you, can’t you.” Red persisted, his tone filled with anticipation. “You’re so tight, it can hardly move and it wants so badly to move, Elizabeth,”

The woman groaned as desire swept through her willing mind and body. Damn, he was good at this! She refused to think of how he came about such knowledge... but was ever so glad he had.

“Tell it to please you...” it was coaxed, “hell, I have no fucking control over it any longer.” he had faced the fact days ago. “It belongs to you, baby... do with it as you wish.”

Liz’s mouth parted, trying to form the words bubbling inside her jumbled thoughts whenever the man was near.

A shrill jangling sound interrupted the need. She started visibly as it continued it’s incessant clanging inside her brain. It trilled three more times before stopping abruptly which is more than she could say for the man whose body was cradled so lovingly behind hers.

Red had not lost one beat, his rhythm steady and confident. He continued the wonderful litany of unrestrained dialogue and sounds she elicited from the man.

There was nothing hotter than listening to Red Reddington get off. The deep rumbling satisfied moans he made... literally made the woman’s stomach flip wildly. That she was the one accomplishing such a feat, astonished her.

Red glanced down, drawing his shaft out to the very tip, just keeping the large crown in place, before slowly sliding back inside. The act left him breathless and euphoric.

“Fuck, baby.” his hissed his appreciation. Curling his fingers around her hip bone, he rolled his hips, completely focused on his steady rhythm and the sound of his cock pumping Lizzy’s tiny wet hole.

Just listening to her corresponding whimpers of delight, made his fucking nerve endings raw and alive like they had never felt before. The music they made together when making love was his most favorite sound in the entire universe.

He felt like a live wire, ready to spark at any given moment, especially when that tight little tunnel of her’s clenched desperately around his driving shaft.

It was if she wanted to grasp hold of him and never let go. A sentiment he more than understood.

Tightening his arms about the woman, Red closed the space between them at every possible avenue. He gently moved the thick waves of hair from his path, his mouth sucking feverishly at her damp nape as he literally ‘marked’ his territory.

Liz’s nails dug into his hip, silently urging the man to go, “... Faster.”

Answering the breathless request, Red focused on Elizabeth’s response both vocally and physically until he garnered the needed results.

Enjoying the new tempo, Liz released a sharp cry, arching her back in praise of his efforts, drawing a low growl of approval from the man’s throat.

“Just there.” he sensed by her response, more than in tune with his partner.

She sighed blissfully, lovingly stroking the large fingers, which were lovingly stroking her.

Red dropped his head into the pillow, groaning his disbelief when the familiar grating sound began anew.

“Answer it.” Liz urged, scratching her short nails over his hip. “Could be important.”

Sighing his aggravation, the man cursed fluently, fumbling for the drawer, blindly feeling for the phone before pulling it free.

“What?” he snapped, beyond annoyed, his large finger softly petted the woman’s clitoris, teasing her mercilessly.

Elizabeth moaned softly, before a large palm was placed gently over her mouth allowing her to smell their combined scents. The sweet smell of sex and show of dominance spiked her arousal to new heights.

And Red felt it. Leaning into her, he continued his unhurried movements, absently listening to the voice on the other end of the line.

“Is he there now...” Red asked somewhat steadily, before lifting the phone away from his mouth, rapidly slapping the dark plastic into the rumpled bedding. The woman had reached between her legs, petting herself and his shaft as it became exposed to the cool air.

“God...” he whispered harshly, before pulling the phone forcefully back. “He can wait, dammit.”

Liz strained for release, pushing her bottom back into the large offering. Opening her lips slightly, she drew one of Red’s fingers inside her warm wet mouth, suckling him in rhythm with her body’s dictates.

“Dear God...” Red sighed shakily, his concentration split between the call and the woman making love to him.

“Now, where the hell do you think I am?” he gritted his anguish, his head dropping against Liz’s shoulder, as he fought for some semblance of control.

“Your cock feels so... good...” she moaned piteously at one particularly hard thrust, “when you d-do that.”

“Oh fuck...” Red’s voice shook noticeably. He hadn’t expected her to say it. Would have been fine, had she not. What it did to his mind, he was having difficulty assimilating.

“Dammit, Mark,” he snapped sharply, “shut the fuck up.” The other man’s constant drone was wearing thin. “I have no damned idea what the hell you’re saying,” it was informed bluntly, “nor do I care.”

Liz whimpered softly, drawing Red’s undivided attention for a brief second.

“Deeper...” she moaned softly, “put your cock... deeper.”

“Son of a...” Red murmured breathlessly, sliding his shaft deep inside. “I’ll be there in an hour...or so...” he panted his involvement, clicking the call off, muting the sound of Mark’s laughter.
Liz held her breath, waiting anxiously as the man dropped the phone to the bed.

“Give me a minute, baby.” Red implored breathlessly.

Grasping a pillow, he slid it against her body, rolling her. Her bottom lifted into his deepened thrusts as she reached out for some sort of stability. Squeezing her fingers around his wrist, the man worked his hand between her and the pillow, fondling her soft spot perfectly.

She groaned as the heavy weight of his cock settled deep in her receptive body, his large crown butting up against her sensitive cervix. The full sensation made her abdomen ache pleasantly.

Red groaned audibly as the woman’s whole bottom shook with desperation.

“Is this what you want?” he questioned roughly.

Liz nodded tightly, concentrating on the man’s thick fingers massaging her sex and the erection intimately encased in her body.

She felt the man move behind her, bracketing her thighs with his muscled ones, holding her legs tightly closed.

Moaning brokenly, she focused intently on his plump shaft pushing against her increased tightness.

Her body erupted in goosebumps as Red exhaled sharply, his hot breath brushing against her shoulders and spine in a rush. Both were fixated on the give and take of her swollen lips wrapped about his hard, wet flesh.

He felt her little toes curl into his shin, a sure sign she was close to coming.

“Like that...” she mewed, bowing her bottom up to take more.

Pushing off the bed, he ran his hand up her sleek back, his fingers grasping her shoulder. Palming her hip, he lifted her slightly.

“Like... this?” he questioned softly, his dark eyes watching his wet erection reappear once more.

“...Yes.” she hissed breathlessly.

“You are so fucking wet for me...” He moaned deeply, his head falling back as Lizzy’s core rippled around him.

They both hummed in contentment when the man nudged her deeply, only exposing a mere few inches to the cool room.

“Do you like that?” he asked quietly, rubbing his free fingers up her spine, groaning at the sight of his darkened hand caressing her lily white skin.

“...Yes,” she sighed dreamily, “... your cock feels so thick... so hard.”

Red’s sack tightened at her use of that word, knowing very well how uncomfortable it was for her to say at this stage in the game. But she was trying to be open, to play...for him. That meant the world to him.

“Touch your clit.” he exhaled amorously.

Though she didn’t really need to, more than pleased with what the man was doing to her, she did as... urged. Reaching back, she rubbed that hardened nub quickly, clenching hard around the thick shaft loving her.

“...Yes...” he drawled, as he felt her tighten around him. Getting lost in the sweet sounds coming from her beautiful mouth and the vision of him taking her body in the early morning sun... he let the exotic feeling wash over him.

Arching into his quickened thrusts, Liz held her breath, her pussy heavy and throbbing. Her panted breaths came in short, sharp gasps. Her abdomen tightened pleasantly, her thighs shaking against Red’s muscled ones.

His own impending orgasm tingled at his spine, the will to hold back simply too much as he felt his pelvis dampen with her arousal.

“Please,” he wasn’t above pleading at this point, “come... for me.”

The man’s thick, wet erection brushed against Liz’s thighs, heightening the sensation, pushing her to climax. Lizzy tensed under him, her tunnel clenching him so tightly, he felt as though he was splitting her in two as he plunged back inside the creamy little hole.

Curving his hands around her waist, he hastily pulled her back as the first rush of his release warmed his shaft.

Their mingled cries of release was music to his ears.

This was all he wanted to do, all damn day. Watch and feel her in the throes of passion. She was so uninhibited, so free, completely focused on how good it felt, nothing else in the whole fucking world seemed to matter.

He had missed this so much. A partner who lost themselves in their lovemaking.

She didn’t care about anything but giving into her body’s demands and he loved it.

Falling unto his arm, he braced himself, slowing his thrusts. He gently bit into her shoulder, grunting animalistically, each thrust filling her with his cum. A deep moan of satisfaction collected in his chest as he felt the heat of their combined arousal give his pulsing erection a damn slick ride.

“You feel amazing,” he groaned as his cock head pushed through the thick cream, “... best fucking pussy I’ve ever had...”

Liz moved up into the heat of Red’s body, shivering at the roughened texture of his chest hair tickling her back and bottom, his masculinity overpowering her. The feeling intensified when the man nuzzled her over sensitized flesh, his heavy breathing and soft lips caressing her shoulders.

“...Thank you.” he rasped his gratitude, unaware he had as yet.

She chuckled breathlessly, easing her sated body into the bedding.

His fingers flexed about her waist, trembling with the last vestiges of his orgasm, “I’ve been waiting to have you in the morning for so long...”

“We’ve had morning sex.” she reminded. She groaned her disappointment as the thick crown of his shaft slid free, the saturated flesh, sliding wetly along her thighs.

“Arguably, but this... this was different.” the man’s voice deepened with pleasure, stroking his waning erection along her ass cheeks. “Nor have I thanked you properly for you... cooperation.”

Liz laughing quietly, enjoying his very apparent gratitude and admiration. Red settled down beside her, happily accepting as she nestled herself against him.

“I take Visa and MasterCard.” She quipped, enjoying the sound of his husky chuckle.

“You’ve never done that before.” she thought back to the new position, her cheeks glowing happily.

She drew shapeless designs on his chest. The man pulled the sheet up around them, warding off the sudden chill in the room.

“I’ve wanted to for a long time...” he admitted freely. “A desire which has magnified since you’ve been sharing my bed.”

“I’m so glad I could indulge you in this little... idiosyncrasy.” she stretched, a grin over taking her face.

“God,” Red smoothed his large hand over her shapely ass, his fingers conforming to the suppleness, “so am I.”

Lifting her slightly, he connected his mouth to hers in a languid kiss that left both sighing contentedly at it’s completion.

She giggled quietly, resting more comfortably against his large frame. She hated to disturb the serenity, but curiosity consumed her. “...Hey.”

“When I first came to stay with you...” she questioned quietly. “When did you...eh,” wondering how to word it correctly so as to receive the best amount of response–

“Know I wanted between your legs?” he surmised the question by her hesitant manner. “Narrowing it down for me, are we?” he chuckled.

She lifted questioning eyes, finding his gaze gentle on her. “I wanted between your thighs long before you came to stay with me.” he reaffirmed. “And you know it.”

She smiled softly, before he returned to the question at hand.

“Well, there were a few times, to be honest.” he admitted. “But the one that stands out is when I had to... take the problem into my own hands, so to speak.”

Liz gaped at the thought that Red had done... that. Though, it was a silly idea to think he never...indulged. What man didn’t?

“Do you mind me asking...” she trailed off.

“When you were doing yoga and fell.” he smiled. “That little ass of yours tuck ed up against my cock and...” he blew out a breath at the memory, “it was either get a moment alone or we would have become better acquainted, right then and there, on the yoga mat.”

Liz snuggled in closer, envisioning the picture painted and felt her body respond accordingly.

“I was already dying to sink myself into your hot little body.” he confessed. “That day, the need to pull down those tight shorts and bare this beautiful ass, was too much to handle.”
Knowing what she did now... she kind of wished he had taken a chance. She may have been shocked at first, sure. But the expertise he would have provided would have swayed her quickly enough.

“I’m sorry, Lizzy.” Red sighed heavily, his own thoughts drifting to another direction. “I should have shut the phone off.”

Hell, she had forgotten all about that, to be honest. She had one goal in mind, and it had nothing to do with that phone.

“It’s not a big deal, Red,” she waved it off. “I hardly noticed, if you want the truth,” she laughed shyly. “I am turning into a major hussy... must be Silas’ influence.”

He had taken calls while having sex in some form or other, before. He had looked upon it as a challenge. Had even unintentionally done it with Lizzy while he’d been with Lexa.

Though, unlike his time with Lexa and partners before that, this time... trying to stay focused had been impossible when intimately attached with Lizzy.

Only a few short moments had passed since he ended the call, and he suddenly realized he didn’t have the foggiest idea what Mark had wanted or even what the man had said.

Red craned his head when he felt her cheek plump into a smile, against his chest. “Is there something I should know?” he smiled softly, picking up the subtle hint well enough.

“It’s kind of exciting, isn’t it?” Liz smiled impishly up at him. “Talking to someone while we... were doing what we were doing.” she laid her head back down, drawing her finger across his torso. “It’s like a secret we’re sharing.”

Though Red was absolutely positive Mark picked up on the fact that he was making love to Elizabeth. He did have to admit that his arousal had spiked... if only because hers had. He had been very aware that she became more involved, her movements more suggestively passionate, she sucked on his finger... said cock for him... after the call came in.

Did he have a little exhibitionist on his hands?

“It is, the best kind of secret.” he agreed. “One I hope to share with you on a regular basis.” he smiled as she chuckled quietly. “Regardless, it was something that certainly could have waited.”

“I understand about work issues, Red.” she reminded. “You are so understanding where my job is concerned.”

“This is what I want to do,” he hugged her closer, dropping a kiss to the crown of her head, “right here. The rest of it, doesn’t mean shit any longer, truth told.”

“So, Ms. Keen,” Liz took on a news reporter tone of voice, holding her hand up like it was a microphone, “how does it feel to have been the catalyst to the downfall of Red Reddington’s empire?”

“Oh, stop it...” the man scoffed. “I could run my empire from this bed, if I so wished.”

Turning to his side, he grasped her hand, wrapping her slim fingers around his length. Without thought, Liz instantly stroked his shaft as Red pulled at the sheet, exposing the woman’s breasts to his gaze.
“So what,” he flicked the rosy peak with his tongue, before capturing it, suckling the roughened nub, “if I’m a little distracted.” his lips muttered loosely around the nipple in his mouth.

“Was that a crack about the size of my breasts?” she sighed, pushing said breast towards the man.

He frowned, taking up an overflowing handful of the giving flesh. “Hell no...”

Reaching between them, Red curved his fingers about hers, tugging at the velvety flesh, pumping the organ quickly.

Pushing his giggling lover flat to the bed, he worked his muscled thigh between her silky ones, maneuvering his bulk easily into the vacant space.

Liz gasped as his growing erection bounced against her center, “You’re gonna be late...” she whispered breathlessly.

“I don’t give a damn...” he groaned against her mouth, stroking his throbbing shaft along his favorite place.

Liz’s eyes opened, staring over the man’s shoulder up into the mirrors. She wriggled in anticipation as he settled his bulk in position and dropped his hips.

Keeping her eyes focused, she raptly watched him inch forward while simultaneously feeling him slide his thick girth past her swollen slit.

“Let them wait...” she mewed, as the man completed their connection.

“Now, you’re getting the hang of it.” he held his smile, glad that they had come to the same understanding.

Even though Red was a good two hours late to the meeting, he found those in attendance in relatively good mood considering.

Antonio seemed to take great delight in his tardiness, grinning knowingly at Red’s serene appearance as the young man took a seat at the long conference table.

This was the fourth day of tense negotiations and countless revised stipulations.

This was a first, in Red’s memory that the Italian Mafia and the Chinese Triad, had come to any kind of understanding over any issue.

With Red and Company acting as mediators, and eventual partners... the three contributing factions had finally settled on the terms of their agreement.

He wasn’t sure about the others, but he was very interested to see how this panned out in future negotiations. He hoped everyone would be able to stand by said agreements.

As they were completing the end stages of finalizing the deal, Red’s text alert went off.

Absently pulling the phone out, he found a picture text. Another text immediately followed.

He always had appreciated Silas sending these on and off throughout the day, as proof of Lizzy’s well being.
Red had felt neglectful to her, not having been able to spend as much time with Liz this trip as he would have liked.

The pictures often showed Liz having drinks at the bar or riding roller coasters and what not with Silas, Francis and the girls.

They always brought a smile to Red’s face.

In one instance however, Red was given a moment of pause when Silas sent a picture of Lizzy cozying up with someone... only to realize on further examination that it was... Elvis. Or a wax figure of the man.

He was happy to see Lizzy enjoying her time in Vegas.

And today seemed no different as he opened the first text. A smile curved his lips. Lizzy was standing in her blue bikini by the pool, her face twisted with amused annoyance at some unseen person.

Most likely Francis.

Opening the other text, this was a closer shot. His grin widened as his eyes raked the photo. It showed Lizzy fiddling with the ties at her hip. He had a sudden urge to pull those strings to see the treasure that lay beneath.

Silas always knew what would make Red’s heart race.

Scrolling to see Silas’s quip for the day, Red’s blood ran cold as he read the caption...

Guess who I found. CRVR

Chapter End Notes

It's been a long couple of day, so any mistakes are totally mine.
May 21

Guess who I found. CRVR

“Jesus!” Red stared at the message, his senses reeling. He sat motionless, allowing the emotions to wash over him, unable to do anything else, truth told.

He had felt fear before. Gut wrenching, heart palpitating, mesmerizing fear, but never one so totally paralyzing, so overpowering, so all consuming... that he could not override the factor and continue on with the task at hand.

Another time came to mind when he had felt something similar. The night of Carver’s attack on Elizabeth Keen.

Visions of the woman’s blood stained clothes, her shallow, haunted eyes, blurred to crystal clarity.

“Lock down the hotel!” He barked, his knuckles white from the exertion exuded on the table top he had grasped for, a stay hold of reality.

Even as he said the words, he felt their uselessness, Carver would not be on the premises. The bastard would have made certain of escape before having sent the... or perhaps not.

Hope loomed large in Red’s soul. “No one leaves!”

The son of a bitch was just egotistical enough to stick around to watch the terror his actions could produce.

Shoving back his chair with an abrupt rising, Red Reddington focused all his energies on one thing, Elizabeth’s survival.

“Now!” his commanding tone conveyed an urgency which transmitted across the suddenly silent area, all eyes having turned to the man’s unexplainable behavior.

Christopher was moving before he knew it, issuing similar orders to his Security teams.

Antonio Crocetti arose with regal dignity, his features masked, his body tense, almost coiled, as he watched the younger man’s face.

Red bolted, Dembe close behind.

The Triad members left behind exchanged enigmatical glances as they unhurriedly followed suit.

Rushing for the stairwell, Red and Dembe literally ran the couple flights before bursting out onto the main floor of the Casino.

Running through the gaming area, people jumped back out of the way, scattering almost comically, faces registering annoyance or avid interest.

Red shoved out the back doors, pulling his gun from its holster.
His heart pounded painfully in his chest as he quickly scanned the large pool and deck as Dembe came alongside him, weapon out, searching as well, with the eyes of a trained observer.

He felt his heart stop, a coldness overtaking him and the panic rising the more he scanned the area, for he could not find the woman anywhere.

“Lizzy!” He yelled out over the people milling around. “Lizzy!” He bellowed louder as he moved through the fast parting crowd. “Dammit, Elizabeth!” his fear turned to terror... had Carver already retrieved his target? “Where the fuck are you!”

“There.” Dembe pointed, his calm tone soothing Red’s anxiety.

The older man spotted Silas finally, over by the West wall, the guard’s weapon at the ready.

Behind Silas’ massive frame, Red could just make out the top of a shiny mop of dark hair. The silver haired guard’s beefy arm encircled Elizabeth’s waist with no effort on his part... as she was pressed tightly against the shelter of Silas’ body.

Not much could be seen of the woman. How Dembe had spotted her, Red did not know and at this moment, he didn’t especially care.

Relief washed over the man, the tension in his body lessening by degrees.

Silas had backed Elizabeth into a convenient walled area, limiting access to the woman while simultaneously guiding her to a possible escape route.

Red noted an entry gate far to the pairs right.

Silas always thought two moves ahead in any situation in life. Perhaps it’s why he stayed alive in such a perilous career choice.

Whatever. Red was more than grateful for such clear thinking at present.

Seeing Lizzy secured allowed Red to return his attention to the immediate threat.

The man scanned the faces of the crowded pool area.

There was a low murmur of confusion sweeping those present. Men with guns drawn often silenced the most boisterous gatherings, or at the least, that was Red’s experience on the matter.

Carver could be among those who looked back at him.

Red had noted Francis Holbrook seconds before when the young man had bolted from his longue chair, a Glock swiftly pulled from the folds of a nearby towel.

Lia and Amanda were shuffled more than efficiently into the confines of the bar area, hidden and secure for the moment as Francis took time to survey the commotion taking place.

The young man’s alert eyes cautiously swept his surroundings, making contact with the stoic black man.

Dembe stood, a beacon of reason and calm in a chaotic storm.

Francis shifted a questioning glance Red’s way.

Red had other priorities however, heading for Silas’ position, as he secured his weapon.
There really was no need for the gun as Silas’ Security team had appeared miraculously out of nowhere seconds before.

Hotel security seemed to be onboard as well. Christopher was doing his job as Red knew he would and he was grateful.

When he was close enough, the large man moved from Red’s determined path, allowing access to Elizabeth.

Any thought vanished as Red’s arms engulfed Lizzy’s small frame, crushing her to his warmth. The man closed his eyes to the reality of the woman. She was safe. He could breathe again.

“W-what’s wrong?” Liz stuttered, feeling the man trembling against her.

The horror of another reality returned.

“Carver.” Red’s tone conveyed the emotions he was feeling as he turned to the patiently waiting guard. “He’s here.”

Silas’ expression remained passive. If the news alarmed or surprised, he would never reveal as much.

“I heard you coming.” Silas motioned a few of his men forward with a nonchalant wave of his hand.

“C-Carver?” Elizabeth’s whisper halted all speech, the men glancing her way.

The blue eyes widened, startled, but Red was pleased to see nothing other than that at present.

She could be in shock of course... Red knew the adrenaline he had felt was wearing off. He had time to process, she had not as yet.

Silas returned his attention elsewhere. The sound of lively music on the far side of the pool deck added to the needed diversion he had demanded from his team, leading the befuddled guests away, to a more contained scene.

Hotel Security smiled pleasantly, as they roamed the guests, arresting any fears, as waiters and bartenders offered up free drinks and food, enticing any undue attention elsewhere for the moment.

Mark and Francis approached their position, weapons holstered as to aid in the containment of the crowd’s curiosity but Red knew those weapons could be drawn and ready in milliseconds if the need arose.

Francis discreetly hid his Glock under folded arms, but his expression did not bode well.

“What the hell is going on?” Francis checked on Elizabeth who still huddled in Red’s embrace, her eyes darting about the crowd.

Francis inched closer, sensing something terribly awry.

“What the fuck, Red?” Mark, usually the consummate gentleman around a lady, forgot his manners. “The Triad thinks something is...” he drifted as he witnessed Elizabeth’s face for himself, “this has nothing to do with the business at hand,” he lifted concerned eyes, “... does it.”

Red shook his head grimly, noting the late arrival of several members of said ‘Triad’. All of whom stood patiently, having watched the previous ‘show’.

They were reserving judgement which in itself spoke highly of Red Reddington’s influence and reputation.

Dembe had sauntered over, for nothing in the entire universe seemed to disrupt the man’s perennial ‘cool’ but a deep scowl on the remarkably handsome face alerted Red to a problem.

Dembe came alongside Elizabeth, craning his neck to the side. Something out of the norm had caught his attention.

Red removed his arm for the large black man was picking at an object below Red’s jacket sleeve.

Dembe pulled at the band-aid like material, removing it with one deft flick.

Liz stood still under his administrations wanting desperately to look over her shoulder to see what the hell was going on.

“Raymond...” Dembe held up the patch, showing the ominous ‘tag’ to his friend and the guard beside him.

Red’s tenseness returned two-fold as he too, read the neatly scripted initials.

\textit{CRVR}

“What the hell is that?” Francis exchanged perplexed looks with Mark Donovan.

“Get her inside, now.” Red hissed, ignoring the question and questioner. He ushered Liz along, his steps hurried.

It was difficult to keep abreast of the man for Lizzy but she managed for a certain type of fear fueled her feet.

Francis was not deterred however. He hastened his own pace, coming alongside the entourage which accompanied his friend.

Elizabeth kept shooting frantic looks his way over the shoulders of the much taller Security people.

Francis motioned curtly, once again and several similarly dressed men surrounded a totally disoriented Lia and Amanda who had watched the unfolding drama from afar.

The two women were ushered into line behind the rapidly retreating Red Reddington who had covered the expanse of ground and was already converging on the upcoming entrance doors that loomed ahead.

Francis marched diligently in step with the contingent surrounding his friends, a million questions filling his head.

When he came abreast of Red, he was of a mind to voice a few, “You want to tell me wha–”

“Not now, Francis.” it was brusquely advised. Reddington had one objective and one alone. “We need to get to the Villa.”

“I want to stay here.” Liz felt an inner anger emerging, balking at the overly rushed steps she was being forced to take. “I want to confront the bastard!” she hissed.

“What basta–” Francis was quick to pick up on the slip.

“On our own playing field.” Red vetoed such a foolish notion.
Both Liz and Francis knew sound judgement when they heard it, falling silent... almost.

“It feels wrong,” Liz protested, but resumed a step as Francis’ hand on her back suggested strongly, she should do so, “like I’m running away. I won’t do that again, Red!”

Red met the stubborn set of her chin, the mounting fury in her stare.

“Pick your battles.” Silas muttered, if only to end the stalemate which had ensued. “Another time, another place without innocents about.”

Red suddenly resented the fact Silas always seemed to know how to reach the woman.

The blue eyes swept the guests absently allowing herself to be escorted forward in the next second with but one curt...

“Don’t stand there, you idiots!” she shoved angrily at Mark and Francis who had flanked her now for some few minutes. “Do you want to be murdered? Do you want to be killed?”

Both men grinned for her mood, nothing more.

“By a beautiful woman right after a night of passionate lovemaking.” Mark quipped to lighten the moment but the remark seemed only appreciated by Francis Holbrook, whose grin widened slightly.

“Preferably in your sleep, right?” Francis stated wryly.

Red’s palm flattened against the glass of the hotel entrance, shoving through the heavy panels, continuing down the long, plush carpeted corridor.

“Get away!” Liz raised her tone and voice for the ‘two idiots’ refused to listen to reason. “Let go!” she tried to jerk from Red’s grip.

“You’re making our job more difficult.” Silas cast a strong look her way and the woman fell silent instantly, her resistance melting into a brooding silence.

Christopher awaited, ushering everyone into a large room at the end of the hall.

A few Triad people had discreetly gathered inside, all standing about, quietly speaking amongst themselves.

A silence fell upon Reddington’s arrival.

Red ignored all else turning to more important matters.

“Transportation?” he issued a taut request.

“It will take a second.” Chris advised just as tightly. “You want to tell me what the hell is going on?” he threw his arms out wide, openly frustrated. “I can’t do my job if I’m left in the dark!”

Red’s eyes lifted slowly, a menace inside the crystal grey depths. He knew Christopher was not to blame for any of this, he could sympathize with the man but right now.... Red need to ‘vent’ and God help any unsuspecting victim who happened to be nearby.

“Hey, man,” Christopher defused the situation as professionally as he knew how, “I’m just wanting to help.”

Red let it go. Dembe stepped in, offering explanations which would suffice.
Red turned his anger elsewhere. “You saw him,” it was surmised, “you must have!”

Liz was startled, unaccustomed to such a tone from the man.

“What did he look like?” the light eyes bore into hers as he curved his fingers cuttingly around Liz’s arms. “Brown hair, blonde?” He snapped in rapid succession.

“I–I don’t know.” She shook in his grasp, wondering at the chill suddenly racking her body. “There were so many people!”

The Triad members milled beside the doorway, disapproving frowns on their eclectic faces as they watched Red manhandling the tiny woman.

“Is there a problem, here?” The leader, Guiren, a distinguished East Asian, stepped forward posing the question on everyone’s mind.

“A slight disturbance only...” Mark turned, explaining the situation, as he knew it anyway... filling in the gaps with acceptable lies.

The man listened, shrewdly seeing past Mark’s diplomatic efforts, understanding Reddington’s fear. He had seen for himself the open affection displayed before this ‘slight disturbance’ had occurred.

If it had been his lady in danger, Guiren knew he’d over react as Reddington was doing now. Reddington would calm down soon enough and love her as much as he was scaring her. He was just that terrified for her, he couldn’t control it yet.

“Think! Who touched you!” Red raised his voice, gripping her tighter. “Focus.”

She closed her eyes, swallowing harshly, when Silas spoke. “A man stumbled against her, medium height, bulky, brown hair, he was wearing–”

Liz wrapped her arms around her body, shivering more in fear than because of the cold air brushing against her wet suit.

She hated this feeling. She was a damn FBI agent for heavens sake. She just couldn’t shake the feeling of dread she felt when that horrible man’s name was mentioned.

“What the fuck were you doing!” Red’s fury was allowed a brief moment of freedom. “How could you not see him!” he yelled.

Liz blinked back the gathering tears, even more scared than Red. That Carver had gotten that close to her and she hadn’t noticed, made her sick. And worse... she felt utterly useless. She had never felt so inadequate in her life.

She was trained to observe. To take in her surroundings. To notice danger around her.

And she had failed, miserably. Her biggest threat in life, not only approached her, but had actually touched her. And she had been wholly unaware.

“He could have taken you away, Elizabeth!” Red snapped angrily. “My God...”

“Reddington...” Antonio’s stern tone conciliated the overwrought man. When Crocetti had arrived,
Red could not have said.

Red’s anxious eyes darted towards the older man, as the full weight of what just happened crashed in on him.

Not only had Carver proved the threat he posed.

Red was berating a visibly unsettled Elizabeth Keen. He had been verbally thrashing an already stricken individual.

Never mind that Lizzy was being stalked and targeted by a psychotic serial killer. Allow Red Reddington to add his own brand of malice to the picture.

The thought sickened the man to the core.

Brushing a hand against his brow, Red was shocked to see it trembling as he grasped the lapels of his jacket to jerk it back into a semblance of order. He adjusted his tone accordingly as the fear he felt for her safety overwhelmed the man.

“He could have hurt you, baby.” he whispered brokenly, the anguished eyes sharing that pain willingly with her.

Removing the warmed linen jacket, Red wrapped it around her small frame, gently tugging her into a fevered embrace. Rubbing his hands up and down her back, he warmed her chilled body. Comforting them both.

Guiren’s frame relaxed finally. There was no real problem between Reddington and his woman. None that existed between the couple at least. Some outside interference, definitely, was rearing it’s ugly head.

He knew this man loved this slight slip of a girl. Reddington’s voice had cracked slightly when he had called her the endearment. He could work with this man, a man not afraid to show how much he cared for those he loved.

Guiren had been trying to get a reading on Reddington since they had first met. He thought perhaps that he would like Reddington from the way Red interacted with the men at his side. He seemed to genuinely like those he employed, respected them to a fault, and care for their well being.

As he watched Reddington’s hand tremble as it pet the woman’s small head, as he pulled her even closer to get a handle on his fear and agitation, Guiren knew this... this was honest emotion.

The head of the Eastern Empire of consolidated crime, and the aged, revered Mobster who had proven himself over the years to be a consummate leader of men, watched Red steer the woman to the couch as he hovered over her.

Chris came alongside Red, his radio raised as he diligently listened to his security chief’s report. “I’ll be right there.” he clicked off the communication, seeking out Red, “They have something for me.”

Accepting a cashmere wrap from Antonio, Red placed it about Liz’s small frame.

“Dembe, can you go and get her some clothes?” Red had noted the slight shiver which traversed her body.

“No, no...” she stilled the large man, “I can change... later.” she had been enough trouble for these
“You all right?” Red asked, kneeling before her, lifting her haunted eyes to his steady gaze. She sat silently, but nodded.

“I’m sorry I yelled at you.” he clenched his jaw, clearly angry with himself for such a lapse.

“You were scared,” She said, her voice steady enough, “rightfully so.”

“I wasn’t scared,” he gently carded his fingers through her damp strands, “I was fucking terrified.”

“Something alerted you.” she had time to consider a few things. “How did you know he was... here?”

“Silas...” he held his hand out, taking the phone back as it was handed over. He scrolled to the first picture. “I got this one first. I just assumed Silas took it.” He showed it to her, remembering how he had smiled, then his expression altered. “Then I got this one.”

Liz shivered involuntarily as she perused the photos.

He had been that close? Well, of course he had, he had touched her, pressed something into her skin, something she had not even felt.

That monster had touched her. Why had her flesh not recoiled? Why hadn’t she become violently ill? She felt as if she would be now...

“He attached this,” Red hesitated before he showed her the caption, “along with it.”

Liz tightened her arms about her waist, turning away from the phone and all it represented.

“Lizzy,” the man closed the phone, his expression grim, “I don’t mean to keep harping, but if there is anything else...” he implored, “anything that might...” he trailed away, seeing the distress apparent on the pretty features.

“I remember someone brushing against me, but...” she kept her tone even, apologizing with her manner, for not remembering more.

It took all she had because images kept resurfacing in her minds eyes, images of that first fateful meeting.

“It happened so fast.” How many times had she heard that statement? It had been so frustrating then. She could imagine what Red must be feeling. So close... but so far.

“I dismissed it.” she closed her eyes. “It happens all the time,” she tried to explain, “a waiter, a busboy...”

“But it wasn’t a fucking busboy... or waiter.” Red whispered hoarsely, he threw a look at Silas.

“What the hell! I did my job.” Silas was a little off-kilter after all, his temper flaring.

“Stop.” Liz pleaded, “for God’s sake. He’s saved my life any number of times and he protected me today... don’t... don’t do this.”

Red felt the rebuke, shifting the focus of his anger. “I know that...” his tone mellowed if only for the woman’s sake.
He was pissed at the world today, or at fate... or God. Or all of the above. “And of course, now is not the time.”

Francis appeared out of nowhere, a tumbler of scotch in hand. “Settle your nerves?”

He bypassed Red to hand it over, a smile for Lizzy. “Not that you need it!” he held his hands aloft in the universal sign of peace. “Not saying that...”

Liz took the liquor gratefully, sipping the warming serum, feeling it sear her throat.

“I’m going to grab the girls.” Francis motioned to the vicinity needed. “If you guys can manage without me?”

Red waved the request aside. “See to them.” he asked of Dembe to accompany the young man. “See to their safety, Dembe...please.”

The large man accompanied Mark and Francis, all three disappearing out the door in seconds.

“Be careful.” Red called out a hasty reminder.

Liz’s tense muscles were beginning to relax in spite of her better judgement. “Can we say, incompetent?” she muttered dejectedly. “I can just hear the team now.”

“We’ll find him, Lizzy.” Red sounded more confident than he felt at the moment. He would regain his equilibrium, he realized, it was simply taking more time than usual.

“Is there anything,” it was stressed, as the quiet solemn man approached, Guiren was genuinely interested in the reply, “we can do to assist?”

Red stood, offering his hand. “I apologize for leaving the meeting so abruptly.”

“Unfortunately, because of this... slight disturbance, I must cut short my intended stay and will be taking my leave.” Red silenced the woman’s objections with a discrete shake of his head. “You will understand the reasons hopefully but I assure you... another more suitable location will shortly be available for our purposes.”

“Of course... her protection is paramount.” the man understood.
Antonio Crocetti had crossed the room, politely awaiting his turn to speak. His eyes fell softly on Elizabeth Keen as he cradled her small face tenderly.

“No harm will come to you, gattina.” he said, patting her gently. “This I promise you.” the man’s smoky timbre washed warmly over her.

He turned to Red, “If need be, our business can be conducted by... other means.” he waved the issue aside, having consulted his counter point before making the statement.

“Our people are at your disposal, Reddington, which most surely goes without saying.” Guiren offered magnanimously.

“Yes, my men will see you safely to your destination and afterward, to the airport when ready.” Antonio offered sincerely.

“I see it as a most promising sign, gentlemen.” Red was pleasantly surprised, indeed. “That our forces have joined together so quickly and efficiently in a time of such distressed difficulty.”

He once again offered the hand of friendship to both individuals. “Thank you for your understanding and support. It is greatly appreciated.”

Christopher reentered the room, glancing to the others gathered within. He had ordered several dealers on site, tables had been set up. His special guests were once again on a more even keel, some trying their luck, but the tension had melted away.

“We thought we had him, but false alarm,” he relayed the news quickly. “It was a new delivery guy, but he was checked out, besides the guy was like eighteen and scared shitless by all the attention focused on him.”

Red hid his disappointment well, offering a smile for Lizzy when she turned devastated eyes his way.

“I’ve got surveillance pulling the feed.” Chris continued with better news, he hoped. “As soon as they get it collected, I will have it delivered to you.”

Red nodded his gratitude. Maybe the bastard had overplayed his hand this time. A clear image would be a literal God-send.

Red didn’t really hold out much hope however. Carver was no fool.

“The car is waiting.” Christopher finished with a wave of his hand.

Liz placed her unfinished drink on a nearby table, clutching his jacket closer about her shoulders as she allowed Red to guide her with a gentle hand. She hesitated in her step, looking back at Guiren and Antonio.

“Again, allow me to apologize for–”

Antonio captured her hand, laying a gallant kiss on her soft skin. “There are other things in this world more important, yes?”

Elizabeth smiled genuinely, grateful for his gracious acceptance for the inconvenience.

“I hope, if you’re ever in DC, you’ll visit?” she replied hastily to the both men, before stepping impulsively to in turn kiss their cheeks. “You haven’t really seen us at our very best, I would love a chance to alter your perception of me.”

A soft smile pulled at Red’s mouth as he watched Lizzy charm the older man. But then, there was also something charming about Antonio’s regard for Elizabeth.

Not a lot of the young up and comers wanted to deal with the old world mobsters because of their traditions or way of doing things, but if anyone asked Red, the young ones were missing out on learning some valuable life lessons.

One of which was playing out, right before his very eyes, and that was how a man should treat a lady.

Liz smiled at the man, wrinkling her nose adorably as Antonio placed another small kiss on her hand before slowly releasing it.

“It would be my pleasure, bella piccolina.” the man laughed quietly, gesturing for his men to accompany Reddington and his girl. “Safe travels.”

Guiren bowed respectfully, taking her offered hand, before he too lay a small kiss on her fingers.

“Call when you are secure.” the older of the two requested of Red, his eyes gentling on Elizabeth.

Nodding once again his gratitude, Red wrapped his arm around Lizzy as he followed Silas out the door. All of them safely ensconced by the protective barrier of a couple dozen armed men.

Liz felt so many emotions, walking down that long corridor that day. It was several days later, when a quiet spell hit, that she would have time to recall them all and analyze all that had transpired.

Several times, she had been one of the ‘protective wall’ of agents surrounding a valuable suspect or witness in her capacity of FBI agent.

She had never given much thought to how that individual felt, too concentrated on doing her job.

She herself, had felt helpless, at the mercy of the whims of a madman. So much anger was directed at Carver that day, for interrupting an idyllic time in her life, for intruding into her private space... yet again.

For having the ability to do so...

So many thoughts had run through her head. The foremost being, how very embarrassed she felt because she suddenly realized, Red did not truly trust in her abilities.

While most of those men surrounding her on that humbling walk to the waiting vehicle did not know her true identity, some did. And those few mattered greatly, what they thought... their beliefs.

An agent of the Federal Government should not pander to something like Carver. They should not have to rely on a contingent of protectors. They should not hide behind a wall of sheer force to keep him away.

A part of the woman had welcomed the reassuring presence of so many capable individuals. As Liz studied the purposely averted profiles of the men who walked beside her, she could sense the confidence and virility oozing from the male contingent.
Those qualities were magnified ten fold in the man at her side. She could sense the tenseness, the coiled strength in Red’s body. His eyes scanned and re-scanned every movement, every face they passed...

How could Red trust in her abilities when she doubted them herself? A sobering thought indeed.

She had not forgotten one second of her time spent under Carver’s gentle, nurturing care. She even remembered the even, unhurried breathing as it fell on the nape of her neck.

Red glanced hastily over at Liz’s profile feeling a shiver traverse her body.

“I’m fine.” she stiffened, her pride stung by the obvious attempts to reassure. She jerked from his grasp, continuing on her own.

She knew her anger was not for the man but rather the circumstances Carver had orchestrated. But it was human nature to lash out when feeling helpless.

Red allowed the move, his expression unreadable.

As they reached the exit, the men beside them pushed out the doors forming a human wall, blocking sight of their group. A few steps and safety beckoned. She could see a long sleek SUV awaiting.

Stepping out into the hot and arid afternoon conditions, Liz sighed a bit in relief as the warmth seeped into her chilled bones. She startled slightly, instantly on the defensive, as Silas reached back quickly, moving her behind his protective bulk as he cautiously approached the vehicle.

He had wished to double check the identity of the driver, just to be cautious. Upon recognizing the man as one of their own, he swiftly hustled Liz inside the car before stepping aside for Red.

After Red shut the door, Liz batted her eyes, shocked and dismayed as men hopped on the sideboards blocking windows and other entry points of possible attack.

She glanced out the front window, watching people pointing at the car, talking rapidly with the people beside them. A few took pictures, others tried to get closer to the vehicle to see maybe what movie star was being transported, only to be moved away by a Triad strong arm or a beefy Italian.

It was surreal as hell.

“I don’t want this!” she was twisting this way and that, her eyes filled with anxiousness, “I don’t want these men risking their lives for me!”

She tried to convey how desperately she did not wish that eventuality, “Tell them to get off, Red.”

“They aren’t doing it for you.” Silas could silence the woman with one well directed statement, Liz settled slowly, her gaze on the back of the guards wide shoulders and neatly coiffed ponytail.

“Go...” Silas muttered to the driver as Dembe settled in place beside Liz.

She looked around in the interior, bewildered and confused, so much had happened so quickly.

“Where’s Mark and Francis?”

“In the other car behind us. Lia and Amanda are safe.” Dembe expertly eased the woman’s disquiet.
Liz looked over her shoulder, to see the truth of the words. Mark was saying something to a large man before shutting the door, just seconds before their car too, was given the same treatment.

“Why would they do that?” she asked the why of it all, as the cars started off slowly, moving through the gathering crowds. “They don’t even know us and yet, they risk their lives to... they don’t realize what he’s capable of?”

“I think Antonio was quite taken with you.” Red smiled, pulling his jacket more securely around her frame. “It’s just a gesture, and no, it wouldn’t matter the reason or cause.”

“It matters to me!” she gestured to the men hanging unto the overhead rack as they moved along. “…this, this is unacceptable Red.”

“Silas... Dembe...” Red pointed out, “we would gladly return the gesture for Antonio’s wife, his children...”

She gaped as they hit the main drive and the men stayed in place, blocking the hoards of onlookers following, still snapping pictures. None of it made sense at the moment.

The man in a crisp cream jacket craned his neck to see around the crowd which blocked his view.

“My God...” his pleasant tone caught the policeman’s wayward attention.

The off duty cop was earning a little extra money today. Ok, he was making a lot of extra money today. He turned to the older man, sensing nothing amiss.

He had seen it all a hundred times before. Celebrities and their need for attention. It got old.

“I hope that isn’t one of the Kardashians.” Carver sipped his colorful drink from a twisting straw, his manner laid back, more than disinterested.

He smiled, enjoying the cool alcohol sliding easily down his throat. He had to admit, his little prey’s bearded guard did have good taste. This drink was marvelous.

“Some people just have to be the center of attention. I personally, will never understand such a mentality.” he watched valets block oncoming traffic, allowing the large vehicles the right of way.

The police officer was of the same opinion, “Well, people like that,” he crooked his head, thinking the gentleman was a very articulate, intelligent type. He was good at ‘profiling’ individuals. He was studying the exams for the Bureau, after all. “They pay my salary so you won’t hear too much dissension on my part.”

“Understandable.” Carver nodded sagely, he pulled at the hem of his ‘I Love Vegas’ shirt before pushing off the stone pillar he leaned against. “Still, it might prove interesting to be a fly on the proverbial wall in that car... don’t you think?” he smile was a pleasant one. “Wonder what goes on in their minds?”

“Probably wondering where to have dinner.” the cop laughed. “They are rather superficial most of the time. They don’t live in the real world like you and me.”

Carver’s face took on a whimsical look, “Oh, I don’t know. God has a way of jolting each of us into reality from time to time.” the cryptic remark left the cop wondering over the profound statement for some few moments, “Perhaps that is all that is needed for people like that... a good jolt.” his eyes on the rapidly retreating motorcade.
He held his expression as Reddington’s right hand man glanced out the window, scanning the surroundings before inevitably landing on him.

The dark eyes held a moment until one of the Italian men blocked sight of them both and the car picked up speed.

Carver walked back into the lush foliage of the front entrance with a cheerful, “Have a nice day, Officer,” he called back over his shoulder, “Nice speaking with you.”

The cop stared after the guy, slightly bemused.

During the short drive around the property, the people followed even as Red and their entourage pulled into the private drive. The guards held back the gathering crowds as the gates closed, leaving them secure. The men hopped off, forming a line once again blocking sight of them, which Red was grateful for.

He knew the people at the gate posed no threat, they were just looking for a photo op of the ‘celebrity’. But Carver was still out there, and he did pose a threat.

Thankfully, Lizzy was shorter than everyone here and got lost behind the wall they had made as he rushed her into the Villa with the others close behind.

Francis had a few quick quiet words with the girls, gesturing for the women to go play in the pool. They smiled happily, traipsing off through the double doors, followed by an unusual number of security guards which missed their notice completely.

“Don’t you ever do t-that again!” Liz snapped, having swirled about quickly once the doors closed.

Red pulled up short before realizing, she wasn’t railing against him, but the outside world.

Francis and Mark seemed surprised to be the sudden center of the woman’s attention.

“What did we do?” they tried to hold their amusement admirably, Mark designated himself the spokesperson, having gestured absently to the other man, including Francis in the question. “It was Silas’ fault.”

Francis nodded in agreement.

“What?” Liz was momentarily thrown off track. She sought out the large guard who only sighed lightly, shaking his head for he was fully aware of Mark’s ploy. “What are you talking about?”

“What are you talking about?” Mark asked innocently.

“You think this is a joke?” the woman was only too happy to have an avenue in which to unleash her frustration and anger. “You think the danger isn’t real? You think you’re invincible? That you can’t be hurt?”

“Let’s talk about that supposed danger.” Francis was all ears suddenly, but his question was more for Red. “Shall we?”

Liz moved more carefully, realizing Francis was not privy to her true identity. “I don’t need you two going off half cocked, being all macho, getting yourself shot up because of me!”

“We’re prone to flesh wounds.” Francis felt compelled to point out, then narrowed his eyes at a chuckling Silas.
“I’m serious!” Liz was livid. “I am a F–”

Red lifted a warning stare having listened to the tirade, taking it in his stride to this point.

“A–” Liz caught her slip instantly, “a f–reaking grown woman...” she faltered, regaining her momentum slowly, “ and I am not afraid of a...a–”

“A past associate has become an... issue.” Red intoned smoothly. “We have reason to believe he will try and take revenge on me through Elizabeth.”

“I need a name.” Francis’ mood altered visibly, the young man’s tone suddenly cold, almost biting.

Liz looked at him quizzically. “I can take care of myself.” she snapped. “I don’t want you involved in this, Francis.”

Francis shifted his scowl to Red Reddington, “And what do you want?”

Red was grateful for the reinforcement, but he too was given pause for thought.

Was it wise to keep the boy in the dark on this one?

“You’re not dealing with him.” Liz reminded, stepping between the two men. “And you,” she pointed an accusing finger at Mark Donovan, “you’re still recovering! What were you thinking!”

“Lizzy...” Red had noted the gooseflesh on the lovely skin of her legs, “you should get out of that wet suit.” he reminded. “All this can wait.”

“I’m fine!” she iterated, wrapping her arms about her shivering body.

Silas rubbed his eyes. Dembe leaned back into a convenient counter, crossing his arms content to wait out the tirade.

Red quirked a brow, it was his turn to sigh heavily. He wrapped his arms about the woman’s frame, tugging her tightly to his strength.

Liz was comforted in spite of her mood, instinctively snuggling to his warmth, even as she still glared at the other two antagonists.

“I want you to listen to what I am saying,” she tempered her foul mood as best she was able. “I couldn’t stand it if you were hurt because of some misguided loyalty to me.”

Both men were touched by the sincerity she exhibited, despite themselves.

Francis tossed his sunglasses to the table. “That little show back at the hotel was more than an old crony looking for revenge.”

Mark nodded his agreement. “You were shook, Red.” he had noted as much. “Who the hell do we know that could get you in such a state.”

“That we couldn’t handle.” Francis concurred.

Red assessed his choices. “I am in the process of narrowing down that list.” he lied proficiently. “I will let you know when it’s time, until then, I’m asking for your patience and ask that you trust me to do what’s best for all concerned.”

Francis shook his head negatively, “That’s bullshit.”
“I am trying to keep a handle on this, Francis.” Red countered. “If you have a name, I know you...you’ll take matters into your own hands and start an all out war.”

“So what if I do?” was the nonchalant reply. “You know I get the needed results.”

“I trust in your capabilities,” Red did, “but my only priority is her safety.” He nodded to the woman in his arms.

Liz’s brows pulled together at the total confidence conveyed in Red’s tone. I trust in your capabilities?

She looked at Francis Holbrook in an entirely different light. It was like they were talking in freaking code! And she had no idea what the encryption key was.

“When she is secure... we will revisit this discussion.”

“Fair enough.” Mark shrugged his concerns aside.

“You’re damn right we will.” Francis huffed his annoyance.

“Antonio wants to be assured of the little gattina’s safety upon arrival in D.C.” Silas held the phone away from his ear, shifting annoyed eyes Liz’s way, “he’s ordered his men to accompany us.”

“We’re going to need a bigger plane.” Mark nodded sagely.

“They have their own transportation, you dolt.” Silas practically snapped.

“Gattina?” Liz had wanted to ask the meaning when Antonio had referred to her as such at the hotel but she hadn’t wanted to appear gauche.

She knew Red spoke countless languages. She spoke English, period. She felt such inadequacies deeply but that didn’t mean she couldn’t learn which she fully intended to do... very soon.

Red quietly kissed her temple, “It means,” he informed her readily, “little kitten.”

“Feral cat, more like it.” Mark seemed impressed. Perhaps he was remembering Liz’s spat with Natalia.

Liz offered the man an old fashioned look. “Antonio is a gentleman... you could take a few lessons.” she made mention. “Especially you, Francis.”

She hoped she had not embarrassed Red in front of his contemporaries by her loss of temper.

She lifted blue eyes to the man’s waiting ones. “I think I should change now.”

Red loosened his embrace willingly, allowing her escape.

She shivered as the cold air conditioner added to her discomfort.

“Let’s get you all warm and comfy, shall we, bella piccolina.” Red stepped back out of her way, watching her progress across the room absently.

Liz halted, her interest piqued.

“Beautiful little girl,” Francis snapped his waning patience, “or in your case, ‘little one with little brain’.” He turned on Red, his feelings hurt. “The minute we get back, I want names Red.” he stressed, attempting to ensure his displeasure on the matter was at least, noted.

Red rolled his neck and shoulders to ease the mounting tension.

_This was a damned mess._

He would have to tread lightly to keep tempers in check and hurt feelings to a minimum.

The less people that knew he was searching for Carver, the better.

They already had a leak in his organization, how else could Carver have found their location?

Silas would already be tracing possible leads for the fucking traitor.

It made Red sick to think someone he trusted could be a Judas goat.

“When do we leave this place.” The ‘fun’ had gone out of the adventure for Francis Holbrook. He had called after Red’s retreating figure as the man went off in search of Lizzy.

“Night fall.”

“Can’t be too fucking soon for me.” Francis grumbled moodily, going off himself. He had some tall tales to tell where Lia and Amanda was concerned.

He wasn’t worried, he could weave a good tale, he had learned from the master himself... Red Reddington.

May 21

As the door closed behind them, Red stopped Elizabeth in her tracks, an imminent request of importance on his mind now for some few moments.

“I know you’re cold...” he muttered tightly, “I need a minute.” he exhaled shakily, allowing his pent up emotions a small outlet.

Liz smiled, snuggling into the man. “This is warming me up just fine.”

He pulled her tighter into his warmth, calming his still thrumming heart from it’s intense high.

The day’s events had scared the ever living shit out of him.

Relaxing in his hold, Liz’s eyes softened as she felt the small tremors traverse Red’s large frame. Stroking his back slowly, she eased the man’s tension, one breath at a time.

“I don’t know what to say to you?” he muttered quietly against her shoulder. “I let that bastard hurt you.”

“No,” she assured quickly, “he didn’t hurt me.” she pulled back a little, looking up at Red. “He never will, with you here... Red, are you okay? Really?” she knew this incident had unsettled the man.

“No really, no.” he shook his head. “But I will be. Especially after I get you safely back home.”

Red grumbled irritably when the phone rang in his pocket. Liz giggled quietly, in hopes of dispelling his annoyance as he pulled the object free.

“Maybe it’s Antonio,” he rumbled softly, “checking on his kitten.” he lifted teasing eyes.

Liz rolled her eyes, before stretching up to kiss Red’s chin as he flipped the phone open.

“Yes.” he intoned absently into the phone, his real interest with the woman still.

“I can get her anytime I want.” a man’s lilting tone came over the line, causing a cold chill to enter Red’s mind.

“Carver.” Red gritted, tightening his arm around the woman who instinctively stiffened against him, having heard the dreaded name.

“The one and only.” the man’s laughter seemed as genuine as his delight, sensing the other man’s distress even over Red’s controlled manner.

“When I find you,” Red stated, the tone more than brittle, “I’m going to skin you alive.”

“Ahh, taking a page from the Master, are we?” Carver chuckled his amusement. “I should warn you however, as one connoisseur to another, before using the skin, you really should let it bleed for at least a day or two.” He explained knowingly. “It’s much easier to manage.”
“No, no...” Red’s voice lowered intently, “I’m having visions of my days in wood shop, with old Mr. Barner.” the man warmed to the tale. “That man, made us all nervous as hell. Had severe arthritis, fingers curved inwards...” he stopped for emphasis and effect, “we always expected a finger to go flying when he used the table saw.” he reminisced.

“Planning on building a hope chest from my bones?” the man queried lightly.

“No, an ashtray from your skull.” Red’s tone chilled effectively. “The eye sockets will make perfect pipe holders.”

“Now, there’s a thought.” Carver’s throaty chuckle made Red’s muscles tense. “I really should plan ahead like that, I’ll be looking to retire at some point.” the man said conversationally. “I should look into selling goods at a flea market... Craigslist.”

“I wouldn’t put much thought into it.” Red replied coldly. “I don’t believe you’ll be around that long.”

“Oh, I think I will.” Carver countered jovially. “Made very evident by the events of the day.” it was cheerfully reminded. “I can obviously get within touching distance of your fuck toy with little problem.” he explained ever so patiently. “As a matter of fact, I’ve been within arms reach of her for a few days, now.”

Red inwardly seethed, angered with himself for dropping his guard and allowing such a lapse in Lizzy’s protection.

Granted, he only had a general description of what this asshole looked like, but he always felt a inner itch when something wasn’t right. He should have sensed the danger to Lizzy. Or was he fooling himself...

“But today, the temptation to touch all that pink flesh was just too much.” Carver taunted jestingly. “She’s going to make quite a nice project to work with,” he goaded silkily, “her skin is as smooth as a baby’s ass.”

Red curved his fingers into that soft flesh, his jaw pulsing as visions of what Carver could do flashed in his minds eye.

“Oh, I can understand your attraction.” Carver hummed lecherously, enjoying the exchange immensely. “Besides, there’s nothing like fucking a Fed. Is there?” he asked innocently.

Red tightened his hold about Liz’s waist before quickly loosening his hold when the woman winced visibly.

“Though, I guess, in your case, she’s doing it willingly. Can’t say the same for mine.” Carver sighed lightly. “The experience might not be the same for you. Pity.” the man tsked. “Suffice to say, I can’t wait to meet with her in the very near future.”

“Oh, please,” Red asked of the man, “stop by anytime. I would appreciate the opportunity to meet you.” The coldness in the tone surprised even Elizabeth.

Carver laughed quietly, “Be seeing you soon.” He ended the call, leaving only silence on Red’s end. Red snapped the phone shut, gritting his teeth as he fought to control his fear and building rage.

“What did he say?” Liz asked quietly, then shivered slightly. “Never mind.” she didn’t really want to know.
Red shook his head, pushing away the continuing visions of what the man would do to the woman, only to have another take it’s place.

Carver had hurt her once. It was evident, the threat remained, in spades. The sick bastard approached Lizzy... touched her, so easily.

The fucker could just as easily take her warmth... her life. A life Red desperately needed to preserve, at any cost.

He opened his eyes, looking down into the little face watching him so patiently, and felt a sudden crashing wave of terror he would fail her.

The thought of being without her smile, her soft touch, or the woman breathing softly beside him in bed as he held her...

It made his heart hurt in the most painful of ways. Not since he had lost his family, had he felt such despair or anything so distressing.

Before he realized what he was doing, he found himself dragging her back against him, kissing her, hard. The need he felt for her, for her warmth... overpowering.

Liz surrendered herself to his affection, understanding he just needed to touch her. To make sure she was really here... safe in his arms.

His roughened hands skimmed her body, before pushing the jacket off her slim shoulders. Readjusting his hold, he pulled the woman flush against him, feeling her feminine curves melt pliably into his thicker frame.

He curled his fingers into her soft skin... her cold skin.

Red shook at the feeling, the images of how Carver could steal that away from him, suddenly reappearing in his minds eye.

He needed to warm her, to feel that human warmth return.

“I’m here...” she whispered against his mouth, as the man trembled against her, “I’m okay...”

But it wasn’t enough.

Liz shivered slightly, the wet suit clinging uncomfortably to her now, feeling like ice in the cold air.

Red determinedly tugged at the strings settled along her spine, his eyes boldly seeking permission. She nodded, as his large fingers deftly pulled at the bows. Both items dropped to the floor, forgotten.

She huddled closer to his heat, suddenly realizing she was very aroused by the sensation of her naked flesh against the expensive cloth of his suit.

She felt at once, both vulnerable, yet entirely at ease in the sphere of his protection.

Red ran his hands up under her hair, bunching the damp strands in his fist, angling her head to deepen his possessive attack on her willing mouth. Grasping her hips, he pulled her further into the shelter of his body.

“It’s not wrong,” he rasped, “...to want this.” Was he trying to validate the thoughts running through his own mind?
It may not be, but to become aroused so readily after the incident of the day. Shouldn’t she be experiencing some sort of turmoil? But then, the more Red touched her... the more alive she felt.

Lifting the woman suddenly, Red crossed the few spaces to the dresser. Sitting her atop the cool marble, he pushed gently at her knee, stepping into the space between her legs he had created.

Liz panted openly against his demanding mouth, softly tonguing his as it fought for dominance.

Reaching between them, Red ran a confident stroke over her nipple, the other hand delving between her legs, stroking her clit incessantly.

“Let me touch you.” Slipping a finger inside her warmth, he curled it expertly, gently massaging the bundle of nerves inside her.

“Open...” he urged roughly, pushing at her thigh.

Liz opened her legs wider under the onslaught, feeling her body quickly respond to his urgency.

Stroking her sensually, he slid another finger into her core, massaging the sensitive spot he had located until his hand flooded with her arousal.

Liz whimpered as the man pulled his thick fingers free, only to feel the hot spread of his crown push at her as it slid easily into her expertly primed body.

The man grunted his satisfaction as she quickly accommodated the sudden invasion of his girth, the sound producing another rush of heat from her center.

Red gripped her hips, sliding her closer as he continued his steady drive into her body. Working his cock in deeper, he pushed firmly against her cervix, feeling the tissue giving into his pressure until the woman shook at the intense sensation as he pressed his sack firmly against her firm bottom.

“...Red.” she gasped, her wayward thoughts gathering for one brief second, a certain type of alarm sounding in her brain.

“Don’t.” he snarled against her swollen mouth. He didn’t want anything between them at such a moment. He had read her thoughts.

Liz trembled with the intensity she was experiencing. His hard length possessed her almost roughly. The demands he made, so unlike his usual gentle administrations.

“B-But...” a thousand thoughts infiltrated her mind, but her body was making dictates of it’s own and where usually, the man helped her sort out such things, this time the captivating eyes only watched her with a deep contemplative patience bore of necessity.

Watching the maelstrom of quiet contemplation flit across the woman’s rapturous features, Red slowed the movements of his thrusts.  But didn’t stop.

“Give yourself to me.” he whispered harshly against her mouth. “Let me have what I so desperately need, Elizabeth.”

Liz did not hesitate. That sensual tone vibrated throughout her chaotic thoughts, silencing any objections or denial. Her head fell back, she moaned her ecstasy as the man slid his length deep inside her body.

Red growled, thrusting against her hungrily. Hastily freeing himself from his clothing which only seemed to irritate the man now, his movements abrupt and precise. He lifted her, walking the few feet to the bed.

Tossing aside the blankets, he settled one knee on the crisp sheets. Grasping her tight with one arm, he braced them with the other before lowering her to the bed, never once having left the cradle of her thighs.

“I need this so much, Elizabeth.” he murmured into her neckline, nipping the delicate skin of her shoulder. “You have no idea... how could you?”

His earlier fear was ebbing the more he thrust against her, the more warm she became... the more his trepidation vanished.

“You’re the only one who can calm my heart,” his tone was hoarse, hesitant, as the woman clenched tightly around him, “...you heal my shattered soul.”

Liz grasped him, drawing him closer. His desperate need for her was overwhelming in one way but so gratifying in another.

“If you weren’t here...with me,” he clenched his fists tight, fighting the roiling emotions. “I think...” his voice lowered to a harsh whisper, “I...I don’t know what I would be capable of.”

Liz accepted the heavy weight of his erection.

“I am here.” the woman reminded, her tone a soothing balm to his tortured soul. “I’m not leaving.” she stroked his mouth with erotic caresses. “I want to be with you.”

“...Yes.” he stated simply but the tension was still high in his frame, she could feel it. “Yes, I want that as well. But...” a dark scowl crossed the handsome face, “I need... more.”

Liz didn’t know how she could give anymore than she already was but something in the man’s haunted eyes made her wish to.

“Tell me,” she encouraged, tightening her arms about Red’s neckline lovingly. “I will do... try anything you say...” she wanted to assist him in any manner she could.

“Will you?” he wondered, his expression a brooding one. He had never asked more of her than she wanted to give.

Carver had shook Red to his foundations.

He was loathe to admit just how deep that fear ran. Being with Elizabeth, being in her arms, her bed, was allowing that terror to abate somewhat.

It was selfish of him, he realized. He shouldn’t ask it, the thing which would make Carver’s imprint vanish completely. He knew what he wanted, he knew what it was.

“Of course I will.” Lizzy was all too confident of her ready reply. “You know I will.” she whispered seductively, her calf easing up and down his taut thigh muscle.

How to say it? The man wanted to present his case intelligently without any of the murky emotions coloring the issue but then, weren’t the emotions exactly what had brought him to this moment in time?

“I need to... be with you... in every sense of the word.” he began slowly, his fingers delving into the lush fullness of her hair, massaging her nape lovingly sending searing waves of pleasure up and down Liz’s spine.

“Without anything between us. Nothing.” his eyes held hers masterfully as he allowed her to read his inner most thoughts. “Nothing, Elizabeth.”

He allowed the meaning to sink in. “Do you understand...”

Elizabeth was slightly shocked because he made it quite clear, “You can’t m-mean...” she cleared her throat self-consciously, “I m-mean...”

“I need you to trust me.” he was asking for so much more.

_To trust him that everything would work out right, that he would be there if it didn’t... to take that leap of faith, with him._

“I want to give you everything I have, Lizzy.” his eyes mellowed for he was speaking of so much more than his monetary worth, and they both knew as much.

A rush of warmth pushed along his shaft and her opening, wetting his pelvis and the crisp sheets.

“Look how wet you are...” he crooned approvingly, his hips pumping her body a little faster, damn well knowing her answer to the question posed. “I think you love the idea as much as I... don’t you.”

Liz trembled hard under his large frame, nodding. “...Yes.” She whispered shakily.

She did love the commitment he was asking of her. She did enjoy belonging to him... with him. She trusted him to her core, which was a very foreign experience with a lover.

That she wanted to share this with him... the sensation was totally freeing. Red made it less frightening. But she hadn’t the foggiest notion as to why.

The man read the serene look which overtook Elizabeth’s face.

“God,” he gasped, “only you can make this feel so fucking wonderful.” he groaned, pumping his shaft feverishly inside her quivering hole.

The heavy drag of his erection rubbed enticingly against and inside her, the slight give of his flesh, exciting her. She had never noticed the heat of his velvety flesh. A heat that was increasing with each passing second. She absolutely loved the intimacy.

Aside from the physical act feeling beyond fantastic... the emotional connection they shared was addictive. She had never been the center of someone’s absolute attention, until Red.

Red made love with every ounce of his being, focusing his entire energy on his partners needs. Drawing his lover in to enjoy the ride, was a concentrated effort on his part.

Everything else was pushed aside and forgotten, she suddenly realized.

She didn’t think about grocery lists, the laundry that had to be done, the case file she needed to complete.... or Carver.

With Red between her legs, the rest of the world faded into the background.

Nothing mattered but the stocky frame warmly sheltering her, the cock pleasing her so perfectly and the deep affection showered upon her.
“Do you trust me, Lizzy?” he panted harshly.

“..Always.” she replied without hesitation, her sweet mouth breathlessly responding to his increased demands.

Red fitted his mouth against hers. All pretense gone as they kissed one another deeply, ardently.

Liz exhaled shakily, tentatively stroking his back lovingly, drawing a husky moan from the man.

He broke the kiss, his heavy breath brushing her swollen mouth.

“Let me...” his voice urged fervently.

Liz tensed slightly, feeling his cock begin to expand and harden further as he neared his release.

“Let me share myself with you.” he felt a tranquility overtake him as the woman beneath him stroked him affectionately.

He gazed heatedly down a the large blue eyes, staring back at him so full of uncertainty and hesitation.

The moment reminded him very much of a virgin losing her innocence. Which in a sense, he supposed in a way of sorts, Lizzy was.

She had never done this before. But by God, she was going to do it now.

“Relax...” he implored quietly, “...let it happen.”

She slowly lifted her hips in response, enjoying the man’s sharp hiss of pleasure to her wordless act of acceptance.

“...Yes.” taking her bottom in hand, he lifted against his downward thrust.

Sharp waves of intense pleasure shot through Liz’s sensitized body. Her abdomen tightened in anticipation, her clit throbbing and tingling with a most exquisite type of pain.

Brushing his lips against her swollen ones, the man eased his fingers into her thick hair, holding her deep blue eyes as he lost himself in her shaky exclamations.

Liz gave herself over completely, surrendering to the intense sensations he evoked.

“God, yes,” Red panted shallowly as the woman’s thighs shook against his sides, “...fuck, that’s it, baby,” the gravelly voice lowered erotically, "come..."

Wrapping her tight in his hold, he pumped her sweet little pussy nice and deep, taking what was freely given... what he needed.

The man released a low rumbling guttural sound of satisfaction that left Liz trembling. Red had always been vocal when they made love, but she had never heard him sound so fulfilled as a heat like she had never felt, surged against her sensitive cervix.

“Oh.. please.” she gasped her awe as the man took her to a sweet crest once more, the rush of his hot cum coating her core. “Please, don’t stop.”

“Lizzy...” he whispered brokenly, “Jesus, that feels so good.”
Liz’s impassioned gaze fell on the man’s face, finding a look of complete contentment that left her quaking under his stocky frame. She sighed blissfully as the man whispered in her ear as he slowed his thrusts.

“Does it feel good?” he murmured softly, his meaning conveying more than the carnal pleasure they shared as he slid inside, pushing their combined juices in and out around his girth, until he was empty and she was full.

Raising slightly, she kissed his lips, languidly flicking her tongue against his in reply.

Red’s lips curved sensually as he took in her sated expression, untamed hair and kiss swollen lips.

He enjoyed looking at her anytime of day, but after they made love... she was absolutely enchanting.

Settling himself against her, they exhaled shakily as he scanned the woman’s dewy flesh, glowing a rosy pink. Her beard burned breasts were a shade lighter against dark tan lines, drawing his attention to the dusky tips sitting erect atop the alabaster mounds.

Continuing his visual journey, he noted the woman’s small rounded stomach undulating against the soft hair on his own belly as she lifted her hips into his, silently asking he stay a few more moments.

More than happy to oblige, Red pushed his waning erection in deep, his smile growing as Liz’s eyes fluttered shut and she sighed contentedly. She pursed her lips, anxiously waiting for him to complete the connection.

He eagerly kissed her responsive lips. Her eyes opened lazily, showing him the light dancing in the azure depths.

She was absolutely stunning.

“Are you warm, now?” Red questioned almost innocently for he knew the answer.

Hearing the deep timbre and pure contentment in his voice, delighted Lizzy. She liked his ‘sex tone’. For the simple fact, it gave her gooseflesh yes, but also because it was present for a damned good reason. And she was proud to have contributed to his wonderful mood.

The woman stretched luxuriously as the feeling of total bliss encompassed her psyche.

“Yeah...” she yawned, blinking sleepily.

Red chuckled quietly, running his finger along her full mouth, “You tired, baby?”

She curled her hands up under his collarbone, snuggling into his warmth. “You take a lot out of a woman.”

“I put a little back in.” he quipped, glancing at the clock, pleased to find more than enough time for a cat nap. He rolled them to their side, grasping the sheet and part of a blanket, pulling it over them.

“Sleep, baby.” his silky tone soothed.

“I should clean up...” she reminded herself more than the man but was loathe to disturb the serenity that had fallen about them.

“Stay...” He pulled her into the cradle of his body, concentrated on her wet center settling against his equally wet cock.
“But we just...” she was a little taken aback by the evidence of his total arousal.

“Leave it.” he refused to brook no argument, other more pressing matters having come to life.

Red’s mood was more hopeful as he returned to the room. Setting the phone on the dresser, his eyes fell on the soft slope of Liz’s back before catching the soft scent of their time together in the air. A scent that instantly calmed his nerves and beckoned him back to her side.

He eased up on the bed, subsequently wrapping his frame around hers, at length. Her warmth instantly soothed him. He nuzzled her neckline, breathing in her natural perfume.

He grunted his growing arousal, finding not one trace of chemical mixed in anywhere.

He worked hard for that eventuality.

Only their essence was evident.

The way it should be. The way God had intended for a man and woman to be...

Gently kissing her bared shoulders and nape, he silently counted the days again in his head.

He had been very aware earlier when he initiated their lovemaking, that she was still ovulating.

There was a very likely possibility that he had just gotten her pregnant.

And he didn’t give a damn.

As a matter of fact, as he came, he had settled himself deep inside, butt up against her cervix pushing his hot cum against the swollen tissue, for a part of him had been striving towards such a goal.

He had some minor reservations, of course. But not one of them had to do with the woman or any consequences his actions might produce.

He didn’t want to think about it right now. He only wanted to think about them...

It had felt so right to experience the everyday moments normal couples did.

Including this. It hadn’t mattered what he had to do to make it happen.

“Sweetheart...” he whispered softly, easing the woman awake.

“Hmm?” she sighed lightly, shifting in the warm cocoon of the covers.

“We need to start getting ready.”

“Five more minutes...” she grumbled, turning her face into the pillow.

Red’s lips curved against her shoulder, his eyes dancing with pure enjoyment.

Laying his arm around her waist, he edged his hand under the warm sheet, stroking his fingers over the soft tuft of hair between her legs.

He craned his head, watching her eyes flicker open just as her legs had. His large fingers slowly rubbed her clit awake. Her small fingers lay over his, pushing him closer.
“If you stop, I’ll hurt you.” she muttered sleepily, her fingers grasping her pillow tightly when the man rubbed her more insistently.

“Now, why on earth would I stop?” he purred, slipping his thick finger in her body, his earlier deposit, leaving her more slick than usual.

“You did the morning after our first date.” she bitched, then moaned, arching her bottom against his stomach for more of his particular brand of ‘placation’.

“I had to piss.” he laughed quietly, purposely increasing the pressure on her clit.

“Well, if that’s a problem now,” she sighed amorously, moving into the man’s hard working fingers, “hold it.” she snapped. “I’m so very... close.”

“Yes, dear.” the man obeyed the command, pushing her even closer to relief until she shuddered blissfully in his arms moments later.

Liz sighed the tension away, stretching her lax muscles, intently focused on the fact that the stickiness between her thighs felt... different. Terrifying granted... but wonderful.

She had very much enjoyed the closeness she shared with Red earlier. In fact, it had been quite intense. Overpowering, yet somehow comforting, for so many reasons she was having trouble discerning at present.

She had really enjoyed the natural feeling of their bodies coming together. The shared closeness. It felt... right. But scary as fuck. What if he had changed his mind? What if–

“Are you awake now?” he mumbled lazily against the dip of her shoulder.

“Do you want me to take emergency contraceptive?” she asked quietly.

“A simple ‘yes, I’m awake’, would have sufficed.” Red sighed his disappointment, rolling her to face him.

“Red, I think we should discuss–”

“No, I do not.” he replied sternly. “If there is something going on in here,” he lay his warm palm over her abdomen, “it’s meant to be. And it’s going to stay there.”

Lacing her fingers with his, she blew out a breath of relief, knowing he was okay with what had transpired earlier.

“You’re scared.” Red surmised.

“Yes.”

“Of what other’s will think?”

Liz frowned, shaking her head a little, “No, I’m...” she darted her eyes to his. “It’s been less than a month, you know.”
“I’ve told you repeatedly of my intentions, of what I want out of this relationship.” the man made it clear in no uncertain terms. “Did you not understand me?”

“...Yes.”

“Do you want to be with me?” his asked, his hand unconsciously massaging her stomach.

“More than anything.” she admitted. “But how can you be so sure you even...”

“I know my own mind. My own emotions” He confirmed. “When you’re ready for more...”

“You’re just gonna wait?” But had he... waited? Had he not just initiated...

“I have been waiting for you for a long time, Lizzy.” he reminded. “Having you to hold, kiss and spend time with, makes the waiting bearable.” he smiled softly then, altering his mood for her sake. “Time isn’t going to change how I feel about you, only make my feelings grow.”

Red snarled quietly as a perfunctory knock interrupted the private moment.

“Dammit, what!” he snapped.

He quickly pulled the sheet up around Lizzy’s body when the door opened without a care, as Dembe and Silas burst their way inside.

“What the hell?” Red grated. “Are you five years old!”

“A five year old wouldn’t knock.” Silas eyed the pair before unceremoniously dropping a laptop on the bed. “Besides, I think we’re all aware by now that mommy and daddy are fucking.”

Liz gasped indignantly but Red only seemed to take the crude remark in his stride.

“Do you kiss your mother with that mouth?” the woman snapped her pique.

“My mother disowned me at a very early age.” Silas seemed okay with the fact.

“And rightfully so!” Liz admonished. “And I assume you were subsequently reared by rabid wolves.”

Silas scratched his nape thoughtfully for the repartee.

“Christopher sent this.” Dembe gestured to the laptop, ignoring the present state of his friend and the woman beside him.

Red sighed heavily, for it was very apparent that he wouldn’t get rid of the men until he looked at what they wanted him to.

Liz looked about aimlessly, feeling definitely under-dressed. She sought an avenue of escape but was also overtly interested in whatever it was Dembe was so insistent Red see.

She pulled the blankets up to her cheeks, fighting the blush she felt from head to toe. Sure, these guys were used to naked women in Red’s bed she supposed but in this particular instance, she just happened to be that woman.

She determined to put on her big girl panties, even if she had none to don, and deal with it.

She threw Silas a nondescript glare all the same for the man’s knowledgeable eyes told her he was sensing her dilemma.

Sliding to his elbow, Red reached over Lizzy, tapping the screen. Surveillance of the pool came up, showing her warding off Francis’ attack with a water gun before the young man was unceremoniously pushed into the pool by Silas.

Red’s smile fell away as a man came out from the left wearing a green shirt and khaki pants. He headed their way before accidentally tripping into Lizzy. She stumbled forward as the large bulk hit her. Silas caught her instantly before shoving the man hard and away from her. A few choice words of animosity followed but Carver’s hands arose in the universal sign of ‘peace’.

Seconds later, Francis ran at Lizzy, wrapping his arms around her before falling back into the watery depths while Silas scowled darkly at the man who dared approach Elizabeth until Carver was out of camera range.

“You saw him.” Red raised his eyes, meeting the head guard’s squarely, hope shining within.

“Yes.” both men confirmed.

Red darted his eyes between Dembe and Silas, the surprise apparent.

“I saw him, outside the hotel, when we were leaving.” Dembe relayed. “It wasn’t until I saw this, I made the connection.”

“I’ve been replaying it since, getting his face focused more each time.” Silas added his own experience.

Dembe tapped the screen, drawing Red’s focus.

The scene picked back up as Carver sauntered from the pool area, making certain to play to each and every camera available.

Red now knew what the man looked like.

To what ends? He wondered as darkly menacing thoughts reared their ugly head.

Carver had walked the area from the pool, to a nearby trash container.

The man, from what Red could surmise, was in his early forties perhaps and quite stocky. The man removed his shirt, a close fitting one beneath.

Carver glanced at the surveillance camera which pointed down the walkway. He pulled a knife from within the confines of his pants pocket, opening the object, holding it aloft as if he knew, sooner or later... Red would be watching.

The man slit the center of his palm, wiping the blood on the green shirt before stuffing it into the flap of the waste container.

He looked directly at the camera as if to say, ‘There, you have my DNA now, what does it get you?’

Red’s mood fell into a dark abyss.

What did it get him? Red’s own DNA had been floating out in the cosmos for years now and no one had been able to track him unless he had wanted it.

Carver was one smart, sadistic son-of-a-bitch, Red would give him that.
Red sat back wearily, accepting the clear and simple challenge Carver was issuing.

Red cleared his mind. How would he attack this problem were Lizzy not involved?

He had to think rationally to catch this bastard. But how could he do that, when he was too close to the issue at hand?

He would have to find a way.

There had to be an answer.

“Dembe, send that to Aram, please.” he slid the laptop towards the man. “See if he can clear that up, get a more detailed still. We have another shot, as well.”

Dembe lifted the small weight, phone to his ear. “You are referencing to where he discards the shirt, of course.”

“You,” Red nodded his acquiescence, turning to Silas, “call Kaplan and set up a meeting with that artist of hers. Maybe he can do a composite. When it’s done, have Dembe confirm the results.”

Red tilted his head, scowling his annoyance at the head guard when Silas simply stood there, smirking at Elizabeth.

“It smells like sex in here.” the man wafted his hand, waving it about as though clearing a fog.

“Well, I would hope so, since we were having sex.” Liz indignantly replied, pulling her face out from under the cover. “We are consenting adults... well, some of us.”

“Did we want a pickle tickle, hmm?” the guard smirked, recalling another conversation on the same subject.

“Yes, and now I want another one.” she kept her voice steady, even though her insides were quaking. She would not allow Silas to best her in front of Red. Not this time! “Go away...”

Red had to admit, he was proud of the way she held her composure... until she turned and hid her face in his chest, her cheeks a crimson red.

He chuckled quietly at the guard’s quirky expression until Elizabeth’s mound rubbed against his shaft, waking it.

“Get out...” he muttered to the man standing over them, “and don’t forget what I said.” he grumbled, before pulling the now giggling woman and her bare bottom closer.

“Get a room...” Silas muttered as he turned on his heel. “Sex fiends.” he feigned disgust.

“If anyone would recognize a fellow ‘fiend’,;” Liz called out after the man, “it would be you... Feathers.”

Silas quirked his brow at the... rather apt nickname. He had forgotten Liz was present at that little incident. “You want to borrow it?”

“Get out!” Red snarled dangerously, as he rolled to his back, settling Liz astride his throbbing erection.

The woman sat up obediently, more important matters taking precedence. The sheet fell away, giving Silas an unobstructed view of the woman’s back and a teasing glimpse of a plump breast before Red palmed the full orb, hiding it from view.

Silas’ brows rose with appreciation.

Not so much because of the nudity, though Liz was quite lovely.

But because she suddenly didn’t give a damn.

Their little FBI agent was growing and adapting to her ever changing circumstances like a pro.

And he was damned proud of her.

“I’ve been thrown out of better places.” Silas gave a lazy salute, closing the door behind him.

Leaving the couple to their well deserved privacy.

Red did not feel any real sense of danger but these days he was questioning his inner warning system. He watched Lizzy and Francis speaking animatedly, his innate sense of decorum coming to the fore.

“Allow me to offer more substantial means of my gratitude.” Red discreetly pushed a thick envelope into Christopher’s hand.

“No, Red. Absolutely not!”

“I want you to have it.” Red turned away from his host without a care, walking rapidly after the woman, catching her arm.

“You wait for me.” Red directed to a reticent Elizabeth Keen.

“We’re just getting–”

“You stay in here.” the notion was vetoed.

“Red, he’s probably in California by now.” she whispered.

“I don’t want to find out the hard way.” Red grumbled. “Wait.” he directed, his tone scolding.

Liz sighed, but nodded her acceptance. She knew the events of the day scared Red somewhat and if this little concession would quell his anxiety, she’d go along with it... this time.

But they would have to have a discussion about his over protectiveness soon...very soon.

“We’ll be going.” Red told the man who had followed along at a more leisurely pace. “Once we’re in the air, I’ll call.”

“I had my men check your plane for any tampering.” Chris said, accompanying them to the exit of the Villa. “It was clean.”

“Thank you.” Red set his hand on the handle, then looked at Liz. “You’re sure you got everything?”

“Yes, I double checked.” she confirmed, before kissing Chris’ cheeks in gratitude for the lovely welcome and accommodations.

Silas took his place in front of Elizabeth. And like earlier, there was a wall of men blocking sight of them as Red quickly ushered Liz to the car. She climbed up in the back seat, shortly followed by Red. The door beside her opened, startling her a little, she hoped she hid it well enough.

Was Carver getting to her as well?

“It’s just me.” Francis smiled as he settled in beside her. “We have quite the little motorcade.” he grinned, pointing to the men breaking formation, heading for other nondescript dark vehicles.

“Go ahead, Dembe.” Red said.

As Dembe turned the car into the outer driveway, Red groaned irritably when he found the flock from earlier still haunting the gate, though it had grown some. The guards pushed at them, unblocking the entrance, but the people still clamored to see who was in the car.

“Oh, this is getting ridiculous.” Liz voiced her opinion.

Red wasn’t certain if she meant the crowd or the commotion with all the guards and security. He had not known how to say ‘no’ to Antonio Crocetti. Not graciously, at least.

Dembe engaged the door locks before Red could even get the first word out, having anticipated Raymond’s thoughts.

Flashes of lights from overzealous photographers brightened the interior as other’s rushed towards the vehicle as the car cleared the gates. Sure enough, the sounds of the handles of the doors being pulled at, came in rapid succession as Dembe eased out the driveway. People cupped their hands on the dark glass of the windows, straining to get a look inside.

“Come here, Lizzy.” Red wrapped an arm around her shoulder, pulling her closer against him and out of sight of the window until they hit the street.

Their faithful followers ran after the car as they came to a red light. The camera flashes resumed making the woman laugh nervously.

“They’re going to be so disappointed when they see the end results.” she chuckled as Dembe rolled slowly behind the lead vehicles.

“I don’t know...” Francis shrugged, “they may have got a few shots of our resident felon.”

“You?” Red’s mouth tweaked.

“I meant you.” Francis straightened his tie, shrugging slightly. “And okay, maybe I fit the bill to an extent.” he preened his hair in a side window.

Liz had not understood the exchange, frowning at Francis Holbrook for the fact. Laying her head into Red’s shoulder, she relaxed more fully, ignoring the crowds’ repeated tapping on the dark windows.

The light changed and Dembe floored it, having felt Raymond’s agitation sucking the air from the car.

Only when they got into a good roll and the security offered to them by Antonio and Guiren surrounded the vehicle, did Red release the breath he’d been holding.

A street down, flashing lights came into view in front of them. Liz tensed as Silas cussed in the front “Shit.” the large guard grumbled, looking over his shoulder.

Red turned, finding three other police cruisers taking position around their car.

“Aw fuck, man.” Francis whined, hanging his head dejectedly. “What have I done to deserve this?”

“How much time do you have?” Red asked rhetorically.

“Is this Lia’s doing? Did I get married?” Francis demanded. “Is she really that vindictive…. ohhh.” a thought had suddenly occurred.

Liz shook her head at the demented outlook.

“Dembe, keep going.” Red advised tersely.

Liz looked up at him, her eyes wide with trepidation. He rubbed her arm soothingly, softly kissing her temple as they drove.

Liz startled as the sound of a phone blared in the otherwise silent car.

Red pulled it free, flipping it open. “Yes?”

“Is your escort there?” Christopher laughed at his own wit.

Red shook his head, a smile pulling at his lips. “Yes, and you about made poor Francis shit himself.” he put the phone on speaker.

Christopher’s laughter filled the car, easing Liz’s shoulders back down from their tense position. “I told him I’d get him back for scaring poor Rosalie.” the man chuckled.

“What did you do?” Liz hissed, embarrassed and didn’t know why as yet.

“He blinded my poor housekeeper by walking around naked.” Chris snickered. “With a full on woody.”

“Hey!” Francis was quick to voice his side of the story. “I was in my damn room!” he defended.

“Where else can I walk around naked, except in the privacy of my own room?” he demanded.

Liz tried very hard not to, but she could suddenly picture the young man, naked wearing the huge glasses, bow tie and hat he wore at the wedding for the keepsake photos.

“You were not in your room,” Chris corrected, “you were at the bar.”

“Which is technically attached to my room!”

“There is twenty foot gap from your door to the bar.” Chris once again corrected.

Francis shrugged flippantly, pouting out the window.

“Anyway, the very helpful police department here believes they are escorting a celebrity.” the man said. “Once at the airport, they will keep a distance, but stay until you are boarded... Antonio insisted.”

“Antonio has influence with the Las Vegas police?” Liz was baffled.
“Antonio has influence with everyone.” Silas threw a look at his employer. He too, believed this spectacle was overkill.

“Thank you for the escort.” Red replied. “And damn you for the visual burned into my mind of naked Francis,” he grumbled.

“I have a very nice body, thank you very much.” Francis protested. “I don’t see what the big deal is... Rosalie acts as though it wasn’t a pleasure to see my nakedness.”

“Yeah, I heard it was no big deal...” Christopher snorted a retort, “Safe flight, guys.” the man signed off.

Francis rolled his eyes, even as he readjusted himself, as though confirming, if anything, that it was indeed a ‘big deal’.

Liz smiled, patting the man’s leg consolingly as they approached another red light. The lead cop blipped his siren, bypassing the red light and all the others they encountered as they meandered their way through the streets, until reaching the tarmac.

Dembe pulled alongside the plane, lining the back door up with the stairs.

“Get on the plane, Lizzy.” Red again directed tersely. “Don’t hesitate, don’t stop.”

She had no intention of arguing. Once they got on the plane, the cops could return to their jobs. She felt horrible, pulling them from their real duties.

Red pushed the door open, taking her hand, ushering her quickly up the steps. The other three quick on their heels.

As the plane was being loaded, one of Antonio’s men came to the door, quietly conferring with Red and Dembe. Handing something to Red, the man waited as Red opened the box.

Liz watched the exchange discreetly. Red laughed his delight and the woman’s tension lessened.

The handsome Italian grinned, before bouncing down the steps, which were raised a moment later as the plane warmed up its powerful engines.

“What was that about?” she asked as Red took the seat next to her.

“He was told to assure your safety onboard.” Red stretched his legs out in front of him, finally relaxing now. “He also was told to deliver this,” he smiled, handing her the box. “It’s from Antonio.”

Her brows crinkled, but she took the offering, opening it expectantly.

She chuckled quietly, pulling the necklace free, holding it up to get a better look at the diamond shaped cat.

“How cute...” she smiled, then looked at Red wincing. “Should I accept it or...”

“Yes, you should accept it.” Red confirmed. “No matter who you are, you don’t turn down Antonio,” he whispered, “besides, he meant it as a compliment.” it was explained.

The bathroom door shut behind them just seconds before Francis plopped down in the seat across from them. The man straightened his jacket, then sighed.
“Seriously, did I get married?” he asked again, not having received an earlier answer to his probing question.

Red shook his head woefully. Liz looked at Francis in open disbelief.

“Well, I have her number!” Francis countered. “I’m not a complete louse.”

Liz snapped her eyes towards Red searchingly, looking for help.

“Lizzy...” the man sighed, “just...” he sighed once more, looking for the answer, “it’s Francis.”

Once they were in the air, drinks and snacks were served before Red settled back beside Lizzy, relaxing. He sat up suddenly, looking around, cursing under his breath.

“What’s wrong?” Liz muttered around her cheese puff.

“Where the hell is Mark?”

Francis cackled, slapping his knee in open amusement. “You forgot Mark...”

Red pulled his phone free, hastily dialing Chris. “Do you have Mark?”

“Yeah, he was with Amanda, didn’t realize it was that late.” Chris shrugged the concern aside. “He’s flying out with Antonio.”

“Tell the moron to call me later.” Red grumbled, closing the phone with a snap, before narrowing his eyes at Francis. “You two...”

“Are going to be the death of you?” Francis finished, snatching Liz’s last cheese puff.

“Stop!” she snapped, throwing a grape at the man, nailing him in the forehead with deadly accuracy. “That’s not funny!”

“At this stage?” Red disagreed vehemently as he watched the boy ferret around for the wayward fruit before popping it in his mouth. “I would pay someone to put me out of my misery.”

Francis’ laughter echoed throughout the plane.

This is in no way political.

We hope you’ll indulge us this remembrance of people lost to us. It is our small way to cherish their memory.

In Memory of:

Marine Pfc. D. Coleman

And to those we lost after their service:

Army Sp/4. J. Thompson
Army SSgt. M. Payne

We will never forget the impact you made...

Memorial Day is a national American holiday for remembering the people who died while serving in the country's armed forces.

Many people visit cemeteries and memorials, particularly to honor those who have died in military service. Such as the Vietnam Veterans Memorial and Arlington National Cemetery.

Many volunteers place an American flag on each grave in national cemeteries.

MAY 25

Red and Lizzy spent half the flight home reassuring Francis that he had not been married in Vegas.

Regardless, Red was amused as Lizzy continuously prodded Francis, on the flight home for information... although to Red, it seemed more like the latest juicy gossip, concerning Francis’ inexplicable ‘break’ with the cute little morsel the man had picked up along the way in Vegas.

Lia was absent at any rate and Elizabeth was perhaps understandably curious as to the circumstances surrounding the fact.
“Things happen.” Francis was more than vague when pressed for details however.

Which was completely opposite of what Red knew of the man’s usual methods of over sharing, which made him wonder, was the young man yanking Lizzy’s chain?

Red sighed heavily, settling deeper into his seat for the farce he was positive lay on the horizon, for some reason or another.

“What things?” Elizabeth had demanded. “Did you hurt her, is she all right? What have you done now!” it was exasperated.

“Of course Lia is all right.” Francis took exception. “Why do you instantly assume it’s something I did?” he demanded an answer. “I didn’t do anything.” he replied in earnest. “I love her. She’s my whole reason for existing.” he repeated emphatically.

“Me thinks he doth protest too much.” Dembe stated in that deep, silky tone and even Red halted his drink mid-sip to acknowledge the impact of the Shakespearean quote from the dark man’s lips.

“I don’t even know what that means.” Francis snapped. “Dembe, speak English for God’s sake.”

Red rubbed woefully at his eyes, before rolling them to an amused Dembe. The man popped a Sunchip, turning his attention back to the entertainment at hand.

“Do you even know what the hell happened between you and the girl?” Silas prompted the question on everyone’s mind. “Do you know anything at all, for that matter?” he muttered, though loudly.

“Why does everyone assume that something happened?” Francis fell into an effective brooding mode, seeking solace at the far end of the plane. “You act as though I purposely set out to sabotage my love life.” the crisp sound of a bottle opening cut the air, dulling the statement somewhat.

“As I said,” the man stressed, flicking the bottle cap into the trash can across the way, pumping his fist when he scored, “I love her, she’s my—”

“Whole reason for existing.” all on board finished in unison.

Silas was given pause for thought, the statement or perhaps more... accusation, puzzling the man somewhat.

“Do you know what they hell he’s rambling on about?” Red queried, seeing Francis was genuinely upset in this instance. Or perhaps not, as the one in questions sulky mood was suitably waylaid by a simple bowl of trail mix the in flight attendant was passing around.

“Does anyone,” Silas quipped jovially, “...ever?” his eyes fell on the man in question, finding the boy digging into the food like a raccoon raiding a trash can. “Does he even know what the hell he’s talking about.”

“Should I comfort him?” Liz felt bad for all her badgering now, worriedly looking after her friend, frowning in discontent down at the bowl in his lap.

“Oh, I think,” Red watched Francis’ dour expression alter instantly to an enthusiastic smile as he pulled a couple M&M’s from the bowl before eating the treasures with relish, “he’ll pull through just fine, whatever the given circumstances.”
Liz sighed heavily, plopping back in her seat, her own expression rather foreboding.

“Men!” she exclaimed rather disgustedly to Red’s way of thinking.

“Am I included in that dire category?” he turned his attention where it was needed.

“You have evolved.” Liz threw a caustic look Silas’ way.

The large guards face took on an innocent air, which to Red’s way of thinking was ludicrous in itself. Silas’ innocence was lost many decades back.

The rest of the flight was finished in relatively good humor after Lizzy’s own mood mellowed.

Upon their arrival, the mob of security, and he meant that in the literal sense, that greeted them rivaled what it had in Vegas.

And Red was more than fine with that.

Once they were in familiar surroundings, his sense of security returned. It was a more confined space, easier to secure.

Which, after having received a relatively reliable tip concerning Carver’s location, made the difficult decision to fly back out the following morning leaving Lizzy in the very capable hands of Silas and Francis, an easier one.

He felt infinitely better knowing that Francis, while not privy to the real state of affairs, was there within arms reach of Lizzy and would protect her, which would allow Silas to do his job to it’s fullest.

And the woman really enjoyed his visits, so that was an added bonus.

As for Liz, when Red wasn’t there, she fell into a structured routine. She had returned to her profiles. In the interim, Silas had constructed a program of rigorous physical training. He infiltrated new defensive techniques and a certain street savvy awareness not present before.

Truth told, she gravitated towards any sort of activity to fill the time in between training and profiling.

Red had been gone a few days now. He called frequently, letting Liz know of his whereabouts and of his rising frustration always being one step behind Carver.

She had shared in his frustration, and it wasn’t just because Red hadn’t caught Carver.

She missed the man terribly.

Especially today. It was the beginning of a three day holiday for her.

Having worked yesterday, splitting her time between profiling and running background on yet another Blacklister for her team, Cooper had assured them all that work would be on hold until Tuesday. Meaning no calls, no working on profiles...

Just rest and relaxation for the next few days.

And Red wasn’t here to share it with her.

She wouldn’t begrudge the man attending to his business, or this Carver issue, but she did wish he were here to share in the downtime.

A bright spot was that Francis, and even Ben Gilchrist, were coming to celebrate Memorial Day weekend with her and were planning to take her to the Rolling Thunder Motorcycle Rally. It was an event she had never attended in the entire time she had lived in D.C.

The morning of the planned activity, Francis had called to say he was on his way, so she went out to wait in the front garden with Silas. A short time later, a low rumble of motorcycles filled the air.

The sound came closer then three cycles actually pulled up into the drive. The three riders slowly approached.

She threw Silas a questioning glance, but her guard didn’t seem fazed by the third rider’s presence.

The bikes rolled to a stop, the men removing their helmets.

She gasped her surprise, joyously rushing across the driveway as Red’s face came into view.

Red kicked his stand, then eased the bike down before sliding off the seat.

“Hey, baby,” he laughed quietly, opening his arms quickly to wrap the rapidly approaching woman up in a tight hug.

“Why didn’t you tell me you were coming home!” she hugged him right back, before pulling away to seek out the humor-laden eyes.

“I wasn’t sure what time I would get here.” he murmured softly, kissing her smiling lips gently.

“Why didn’t you tell me!” she turned on Francis accusingly but her happiness shined through.

“I know you love surprises.” he grinned. “Or... is that me?”

She chuckled, remembering they had lost a better part of an afternoon watching videos of soldiers returning home, surprising their loved ones.

They came up with a convenient excuse for the quiet sobbing which had arose. Nora was fixing lunch and Francis swore she must be chopping onions and that the essence was filling the room.

Liz went along with they fabrication, a little embarrassed herself by the powerful emotions the reunions had stirred.

Red squeezed around her waist, holding out the other hand to the large guard behind her. “Silas?”

The man grinned and pulled out her own helmet and jacket from thin air.

“Ohh! How cute!” she clasped her hands together excitedly at the stylish, though rather heavy jacket.

“Won’t it be too hot?” She asked as Red helped her slide the small jacket on.

“No, these are for warmer weather. Plus, once we get going, the wind can be cool.” He pulled her hair out from under the jacket. “And they have armor in them in case we have an accident.”

Ben and Francis smiled as they watched Red pull her hair back.

“What are you doing?” She turned, only to be stopped when he placed his hand over her head, turning it back straight.
“I’m braiding your hair.” he was already deeply invested in the task, a fixed scowl on the rugged face.

He expertly wove Lizzy’s hair into a braid his daughter would have been proud of actually.

Jennifer had always got on to him about her crooked braids until she made him sit down and practice one day until he got it down pat. She had been four and a little bossy tyrant.

And he had done it without protest, just so he wouldn’t get the “Daddy! It’s lopsided again!” followed by a huff of aggravation.

Though he had secretly found it amusing.

“Would you do mine?” Silas held out a piece of pretty pink ribbon, Red had chosen for Elizabeth.

Francis frowned his annoyance. “Do your own.” he pushed Silas’ offering aside. “This isn’t a slumber party.”

“The way he and Dembe gossip, it may as well be.” Red mumbled.

Silas’ reply was interrupted by Dembe’s arrival on scene. The nondescript SUV slid into it’s usual parking space.

“Duty calls.” Silas shoved the ribbon into Red’s waiting hand, motioning to the other men who crossed the spacious driveway, headed for the vehicle.

The back hatch had been opened and Dembe was already unloading case after case of beer and soft drinks.

“Are we having guests?” Liz was sticking wayward strands of hair beneath a snug fitting helmet.

“So to speak.” Red helped the woman mount the large, sleek Harley. “Don’t touch that pipe, it’s hot.” he indicated.

Liz situated herself, marveling at the shiny chrome and cushy leather seat of the jet black bike she occupied.

Red had donned his own helmet, the dark tinted visor down. He looked every bit the sexy space hero.

“Can you hear me?”

Liz twirled her head this way and that as Red’s sensual voice resonated deeply inside her helmet.

“Stereo!” she giggled.

His quiet chuckle surrounded her. “We’re wired. You’re coming through loud and clear.”

“Can they...” she enquired of the other ‘bikers’.

He shook his head. “I want you all to myself.”

She smiled prettily for him, the words pleasing her. Red smartly fingered her visor down, sliding into the position in front of her.

The huge bike roared to life as the man hit the ignition button. Liz felt a powerful, thrumming vibration between her legs. Not an unpleasant sensation at all.

“This could prove interesting.” she lifted stylish brows enjoying Red’s throaty laugh which met her statement.

“That’s my girl.” he nodded slightly as they waited for their companions to join them. “Keep that thought uppermost in your mind, will you.”

“I don’t know how I couldn’t.” she philosophized. “This is the most expensive vibrator I’ve had the privilege of having between my thighs.” she admitted freely, her reward, yet another rumbling chuckle.

“So far anyway…” Red murmured intimately, “the day is young.” he said, acknowledging Silas with a lift of his hand as the passed the impressive figure.

The small pack headed out, Francis eager to take the lead. Red took his place just slightly behind the two men as they headed down the sloping driveway.

“Silas isn’t going?”

“He likes to spend the day alone.”

Liz fell silent, sensing an underlying cause but didn’t want to pry unless Red further quantified the statement. Which he didn’t. Liz let the subject go.

It seemed they were riding the streets at a rather leisurely pace to the woman, which was pleasant enough. Liz realized they must be allowing her time to get the feel of the bike.

“How you doing back there?”

“It’s very comfortable.” she automatically nodded a ‘hello’ as yet another bike rider passed. Red had not failed to acknowledge one when approaching, with a slight lift of his hand.

“Do we greet each guy on a bike?” she didn’t want to be remiss in her manners. “I’m assuming that’s the proper etiquette?”

Liz narrowed her eyes. “What code?”

“How much time do you have?” she could hear the humor in his voice. “Hold on tight.” it was warned. “I’m going to see what she can do.”

Liz tightened her fingers into the fabric of his jacket, leaning closer.

They hit a stretch of road, the man shifting gears. The large engine responded instantly with a burst of speed.

The corresponding vibration rumbled deep into the frame, traveling instantly into the area between her legs.

She gasped at the strength of the powerful thrumming, trying to ignore the deep, raspy chuckle from the man.

“Enjoying yourself now?” he queried.
“Where are we going?” she snapped a little peevishly. He had done that on purpose. What’s worse, he had guessed at her reaction.

“Are we there yet?” his teased, allowing the moment to pass. “We’re going where ever good American should go.” it was told. “Now relax and be a good little girl. I’ll give you a gift at the end of the day, if you do.”

She wondered at the present. “I was going to say the same of you, but if you don’t behave... perhaps I’ll change my mind.”

She could not see Red’s response which was a wide grin of appreciation for her wit.

“What a concept.” he wondered aloud. “I’m usually generously rewarded for being a bad boy.”

Liz clamped her lips tight, holding her reactionary giggle. She had to admit, she did crush a bit on Red’s bad side, more than she probably should.

“With that being said, I could just ‘take’ that highly coveted gift,” he reminded silkily, “if I really wanted.”

The deep timbre in his voice and the insinuation, made Liz’s stomach flip about wildly. She did enjoy when the man was a bit... demanding in his attention. But he didn’t have to know that... right now at least.

“This isn’t 50 Shades and you aren’t Christian Grey.... thank God.” she rolled her eyes at the disagreeable thought.

“No, from what I’m to understand, I’m more...” he pondered the comparison, “like that guy in that movie you want me to watch. What was it again? The Administrative Assistant?” he grinned in wry amusement.

Red turned his head slightly as the woman edged forward, tightening her thighs about him.

“Now Mr. Grey...” she purred her approval, “I could really get into.”

“Like to be spanked, do we?”

“I don’t know.” she didn’t. “Never tried it.”

“Oh, Lizzy,” the deep sigh ran along her spine, “your sexual education has been sorely lacking. I see we will have to remedy that fact.”

“Soon, I hope?” she was feeling rather light and flirty today. It was a beautiful sun-filled day and getting out of the house was refreshing her spirits. And Red was back and all seemed right with the world.

“I could stop right now.” he offered. “In fact, nothing would please me more than bending you over this bike in one way or other.”

Liz smiled as Francis sped by.

“There are children present.” she reminded but certainly wondered what it would feel like? Red’s large palm stinging her toned bottom.
She had felt a fleeting glimpse of it in Vegas, but had been too distracted by mutual jealousies to concentrate fully on whether it had been intensely pleasurable or not.

Red chuckled again. “I have a long memory, it will keep. But I won’t, I give you fair warning.”

Liz warmed to such a promise... and the playfulness, the experimentation she found within Red. “You’re getting too big for your britches.”

“The more you talk about spanking your perfect little ass,” the man adjusted himself in his tightened jeans, “...yes, you are correct in that assumption.”

Liz’s cheeks brightened in pleasure, admittedly loving the affect she had on the man.

“Speaking of britches,” his thoughts turned to other interesting matters, “are you wearing any?”

“You sound like Silas.” she grumbled, shifting more comfortably into Red’s body.

“Since when does Silas make enquiries concerning your panties or lack thereof?” Red’s pitch altered slightly much to her delight.

“Are you jealous?” she teased, the thought thrilling the woman.

“I can trust, Silas.” it was his turn to grumble. “It’s you I have reservations about.” the banter turned wry. “He is a thing of beauty after all.”

“He is that, he tells me as much, constantly.” Liz laughed musically. “As for your reservations, I wouldn’t want you to get too sure of yourself where I am concerned.” she baited.

“I wouldn’t worry too much about that.” his manner had turned introspective. “You always keep me on guard...” he murmured quietly.

The softly stated declaration actually pleased Liz to no end, in fact, it excited her to the very core. To think, after the likes of Madeline Pratt and Dr. Lauren Kimberly, that she alone held Red’s interest was quite a commendation.

Softly clearing her throat, she looked about, having lost track of their whereabouts.

“Seriously, Red, where are we going?” she had enjoyed the ride through the stately streets for some few moments now.

As they drove the quiet area of the older section of D.C., misshapen beams of light shined through the grand oak and maples lining the road. The hazy glow left her feeling warm and peaceful inside. A feeling she was experiencing more of late, especially when in a certain person’s company.

“Right now?” he shot down the on ramp of the Interstate. “The Freeway.”

Liz, having not anticipated their trek, tightened her hold considerably about Red’s frame as the bike easily picked up speed. The powerful machine held it’s own with the fast moving cars and trucks. If anything, it overtook them.

“Relax.” Red soothed having felt her tension as a semi whizzed by.

She tried to relax but the concrete below flashed by at dizzying speeds.

“You’re as safe as a babe in arms...” he kept his voice even and calm in hopes of easing her nervousness.
She recalled how Red had been with baby Sam and instantly felt better.

“She’s with baby Sam...” the velvety timbre helped further calm her nerves. “It’s not far.”

She took him at his word and soon, having put her head on his shoulder and closed her eyes, the anxiousness subsided.

Soon all she could feel was the return of the tingling vibration between her legs and the alluring scent of Red’s cologne. She nuzzled into the pleasurable diversion, her muscles loosening by degrees.

“That’s my baby...” the man smiled warmly as her little body conformed to his. Her soft breasts pushed into his back as her shapely thighs cradled him. He sighed his contentment as the heat of her pussy moved snuggly into his backside.

After a few seconds of listening to her evened breathing, he tapped her knee.

“Look at Francis.” Red’s voice held a slight hint of pride.

Liz lifted her head, instantly grimacing her dismay.

The young man was weaving in and out of traffic as smoothly as a skater maneuvering slick ice.

“Red, he’s gonna kill himself!”

“I think God has reserved that privilege to me.” he chuckled. “No, he’s really quite good. He races the strips sometimes.”

Liz was constantly amazed at the layered depths to Francis Holbrook. “Drag strips?”

“Yep, watch Ben.” she could hear the amusement in the man’s voice. “He’s constantly trying to best Francis.”

“They’re going to race?” Liz was mortified. “Out here?”

“Those bikes will leave everything else behind.” Red informed. He beeped his horn as Ben Gilchrist had come alongside Francis, bikes abreast of one another.

“Red, stop them!” she protested, but the riders were off.

But it was over before it began really. Francis had a clear shot and took it, leaving Gilchrist in the dust.

Liz could barely make out the tiny dots in the distance but Francis had lifted an arm in the universal sign of ‘victory’, so she assumed him the winner.

“I am so going to give him a piece of my mind!” Liz was sure of the fact. “What are you men thinking!”

“I’m thinking,” Red closed the space between the other riders easily having gunned the cycle now for the last few miles, “…he cheated.”

“He did not!” Liz automatically championed her friend, disregarding her earlier ire. Her face broke into a grin as she saw Francis’ joyous expression.

The young man had lifted his visor, chatting amiably with his competitor over the seventy mile an hour wind rushing past them. Until the man started hacking and spitting on the blurred road beneath
Ben wove dangerously for a second before regaining control as he laughed hysterically at his friends predicament.

Red laughed heartily, shaking his head.

“Francis’ wide open trap just acted as a bug screen.” Red’s gravely cackle amused her, she didn’t think she had ever heard such a laugh from him before.

“Eww.” she crinkled her nose. “You are such a child!” she yelled as they sped past the men.

“Baby, he can’t hear you.” Red took the next off ramp and the men followed suit.

“But they can hear each other out there!” she squeaked.

“Your visor is down.” he shook his head to clear his ear drums. “Please remember to put it up next to should you wish to berate someone... save my hearing, humm.”

“Oh!” her fingers came to her mouth, over the visor, reaffirming that it was indeed down, “I’m sorry...” she winced in sympathy.

He chuckled, “You were in the moment.”

He brought the bike to a stop at the red light, waiting for the other men to come alongside them.

“Are you missing it already?” he asked lightly.

Liz was momentarily lost until the man rumbled the engine for her benefit.

“Don’t knock it.” she advised. “It may get you laid.”

Red hands immediately lifted.

“Conceding defeat already?” Ben Gilchrist seemed to take delight in the concept.

Liz glanced over to the man, wondering how he had even been aware of their discussion.

Red flipped his visor, turning towards the man. “I never concede defeat but I’ve found,” he corrected the misconception, “where a woman is concerned, it’s often better to picks one’s battles if you intend to win the war.”

“War?” Liz questioned his vernacular.

“The eternal battle between the sexes, sweetheart.” the older man soothed any frayed nerves. “I speak only in generic terms, you understand.”

Liz thought he handled the situation well, considering.

“Uh humm.” was her only reply, however.

“Yea, let’s talk about something more important.” Francis was getting bored, obviously. “Did you see me out there?” he looked back to the Freeway. “Was I amazing or what? Loser.” he goaded Ben gleefully. “Winner.” his thumbs turned inward to his chest area. “Loser...” he pointed at Ben yet
“We get it.” Ben was a good loser in this instance. “There’s always next time.” he grumbled his defeat.

“Bring it on... loser.” Francis cackled evilly.

Red smiled and Liz knew he approved of Francis’ gloating.

“Did you see me, Lizzy?” the man preened.

“Yes, I saw you play Venus Fly Trap to a defenseless bug.” she grimaced, taking the man down a notch, even as she heard Red snort in her ear.

“Speaking of which, you got any gum?” the man suddenly remembered his earlier unexpected snack. “He tasted nasty!”

Red slapped his visor down, hiding his laughter from their companions but not Lizzy, as the light changed, thankfully allowing them to move on.

The next few blocks were traveled in congenial and welcomed silence.

Red followed the other two men into a designated parking area, as each chose a slot, coming to a stop.

Francis and Ben were already disposing of their gear before Red slid off the bike, discarding his helmet before assisting the woman.

“Was it too hot for you, Lizzy?” he teased as her pink face came into view.

“I’ll let you know if I reach that point.” she chose to ignore his insinuation that the vibration he caused with the bike had turned her on.

She took his hand, as he helped her off the bike. He pulled her into a quick embrace placing a sensual kiss on her unsuspecting mouth.

“I am very interested in learning what your limits are.” he stared down into the light blue depths, his own mellow.

He nuded her nose with his own, grazing her mouth yet again.

“What about that bike, Liz.” Francis was admiring the gigantic, gleaming Harley beside Red. “Did you like it?”

“Oh, I think she liked it just fine.” Red stated innocently but Liz was sure Francis picked up on the ‘why’ of it all even though the young man held his peace for once.

He did offer a sheepish grin however.

“Actually...” Liz topped Red with a rather smug, “I would like a little more power if it’s out there.” she lifted innocent eyes to a very amused opponent.

“More power?” Francis was stymied, totally forgetting the previous tone the conversation held. “This is it! There is nothing that will compare to this baby!”

“Yes, Red always manages to obtain the best... don’t you, Red.”
“I’ll take that as a compliment.” Red pulled Liz to his side.

“So you enjoyed the ride though.” Francis was anxious she do so.

“I liked the bike ride very much, Francis.” Liz answered demurely. “Was the outing your idea?”

“I thought you’d been cooped up with Silas too long,” Francis replied seriously, “you were starting to wear your hair like his.”

“I thought the look was flattering.” Liz feigned surprise.

“Any look on you is flattering.” Ben stepped up to compliment.

“Thank you, Ben.” she smiled pleasantly. “What a nice thing to say.” she smiled, even as she narrowed her eyes at her best friend.

Red had turned a little at the way the man had stated the remark but Liz’s handling of the matter calmed him.

“Hey, Red.” Francis broke the tension further by pointing out some new arrivals.

Liz tensed however. Striding towards their group was an ensemble of very large, very menacing looking gentlemen.

Their dark scowls did not bode well but soon enough those expressions altered.

“How’s it hanging, Red?” the obvious leader of the men stepped forward, hand clasping hand. A sharp sounding clap echoing between them as they connected.

Red rubbed his arm subconsciously after the greeting. “To the left, Mad Dog,” was the ready reply which brought convivial laughter all around, “... to the left.”

Francis and Ben fist bumped several of the younger ones, before being pulled into bear hugs by the older.

“Nah, I’ve moved on, man.” Mad Dog denied the accusation. “Susie is old news, we parted way back in April, right?” he checked with his posse.

“That was only a month ago.” Francis was confused which brought another round of good hearted laughter.

“Whatever, man.” the man shrugged. “Is this the little lady we’ve been hearing about in all the better circles?” Mad Dog had politely turned his attention to the lone female of their party.

“Elizabeth,” Red made the introductions, secretly amused at the woman’s slight irritation for the term used... little lady, “this is Maurice Morrison.”

“The baddest mother this side of the Pecos.” Francis was obviously smitten with the huge man’s reputation.

“Do you even know where the ‘Pecos’ is?” Red was curious.

“Do you?” Francis countered.
“You have me there.” Red conceded.

“The Pecos River runs from New Mexico to Texas, emptying into the Rio Grande.” Mad Dog readily informed both men, before turning his attention back to Liz. “You can call me, Maurice, Miss.” the large bearded man spoke with gentility that almost shocked her. “Now, I’m not kin to that Morrison puke from The Doors, mind you, just saying.”

“You don’t like Jim Morrison?” the woman was taken aback. She thought such people would naturally enjoy anything from The Doors, but then she realized that she was judging by appearances.

“Well of course I do, why would you think differently?”

“Well...” she sought out Red hastily, needing input, but the man only seemed to be listening intently as was the rest of the imposing clan, “you called him... a puke.”

“I call Francis here a puke too.” The young man was suddenly grabbed into a crushing, yet affectionate, headlock while Mad Dog playfully rubbed his knuckles into Francis’ head... quite hard actually.

“Hey, man!” Francis squirmed about hastily from such gentle administrations. “Not the hair!” he quickly rushed to the nearest side mirror, checking his ‘coif’.

“Don’t mean I don’t like the boy.” Maurice explained patiently to the chuckles which ensued from his actions. “I’m quite fond of the lad, truth told.”

Liz glanced at a suitably miffed, Francis Holbrook.

“Aww, man! Look at that!” he was busily combing his hair back into perfection.

“It’s a pleasure to meet such a beautiful woman.” Maurice was suddenly the consummate gentleman. “Red is a very fortunate individual.”

Liz blinked for the cultured manner seemed totally out of whack with the image portrayed.

“Thank you.” she hastily remembered her own manners, “It’s very kind of you to say.”

“We’re over here, I take it?” Red got things back on track.

The enormous man bowed minutely, “We saved you a spot.”

Liz glanced to the indicated area and the others who sat about with coolers and chairs aplenty scattered everywhere a spot was available.

“No one seemed to mind?” Francis asked tongue-in-cheek.

“No one said anything.” Maurice shrugged massive shoulders.

They made their way across the large greens and through some makeshift barricades in order to get to the others who were taking up quite a bit of viewing space.

Liz noted a multitude of every kind of bike stretching for what seemed like miles in a neatly organized section over to their right.

“How many people are here?” she meant bikers, but didn’t want to ruffle feathers if feathers might be ruffled.
“There’s a few of us here today,” Maurice was the spokesperson for the group, obviously, “but there won’t be any trouble, don’t you fret.”

“I wasn’t fretting...” Liz was quick to reassure. Red grinned accordingly.

“She’s never been before.” he explained. “And she doesn’t fret.” it was assured, even if Lizzy was ‘fretting’ slightly. “Just be yourself Mad Dog. You know how I love it when you are. Always makes for an interesting day.”

Mad Dog seemed to relax, a hearty laugh escaping his frame.

Liz looked about trying to get her bearings. She was totally surprised when several of the women who were seated in a long aisle down the fenced off area smiled up at her in a friendly manner.

She smile right back. Out of nowhere, someone offered her a folding patio chair. Immediately she was drawn into a long questioning session, the women inquisitive about any aspect of her relationship with Red.

Normally, Liz was rather private about such things but the ladies were so open and humorous when discussing their own relationships, she instantly found herself divulging more than she had intended.

She cast hasty glances to Red, whose eyes always seemed to wander to hers as well.

It was odd to watch her well-coifed men mingling and laughing boisterously with the burly, bearded bikers. Francis with his four hundred dollar haircut was having a shoving match with a long-haired surfer looking ‘dude’ which ended in a more laughter and an easy camaraderie that seemed an alien concept on the surface.

Old friends at a long anticipated reunion. That was the impression given by this gathering. And maybe it was exactly the reality in this case. Red seemed to make friends where ever he went.

The men rejoined the women after a fashion, passing Lizzy an ice cold bottle of water that seemed to materialize out of nowhere.

A deep rumble of approaching thunder vaguely echoed in the back ground of conversation and people enjoying themselves.

Liz glanced up at a clear blue sky, puzzled as the white fluffy clouds drifted slowly overhead. She scanned the area absently having noted the crowds gathering on the opposite side of the street.

In the center median, a tall man in a dress uniform took his place. He stood quietly as if awaiting the arrival of something or someone.

“Who is that, do you think?” Liz enquired of no one in particular, her eyes locked, stationary on the imposing figure.

“He’s the ‘Lone Marine’.” a man mumbled respectfully next to her, then fell silent as the sound of rumbling growls grew louder.

All faces turned expectantly, looking down the still empty street.

Liz had to stand, for everyone had risen. A line of police escorted whatever was to come, all dressed in their very best uniforms, she noted.

A movement from the corner of her eyes caught and held. She turned to see the tall, stately Marine lift his arm, smartly issuing a crisp salute.

The sound was growing louder and louder. It echoed through the crowd and around the inauspicious buildings off in the distance.

Liz now recognized the source of the din, but she was having a difficult time adjusting to the scope of such a concept but sure enough... within a few seconds, the first of many motorcycles to come, came into view.

Hundreds of motorcycles neatly lined both sides of the meridian where the Marine stood. They sped by at a good clip and Liz was to learn the why of it all, hours later. At times one or two Veterans would bring their bikes to a halt, smartly returning the salute offered.

Several times, ‘Oorah, Staff Sergeant’, was called out to the honoree.

“He’s done this tribute for years now.” Red’s voice was close to her ear. Liz almost started, so involved with the events had she been.

Liz’s eyes always returned to the ramrod straight figure with his arm raised high and proud, his eyes forward, scanning the multitude of Veterans as they passed.

Francis and Ben whistled loudly from time to time, a continuous clapping applause resounding from the spectators.

Red stood stoically, his eyes never leaving the lone Marine for any great length of time.

They continued to stand and the Marine continued to salute.

The heat was already wearing on Liz but suddenly there was blessed shade.

She glanced up to see an umbrella over her head and yet another bottle of water was handed over.

Liz glanced at the perspiring plastic container, the icy feel making her icy inside. She had shade, she had water...

Her eyes lifted to the Marine, who only kept holding his salute as Veteran after Veteran passed on the rumbling bikes.

She felt her eyes well with tears, her fingers gripping the water bottle tightly.

“Lizzy,” Red had noted her condition, his eyes sweeping her frame with open concern, “is your leg bothering you?”

He knew Silas had demanded a particularly grueling training the day before which had affected her weakened limb.

“Silas shouldn’t hav–”

Liz shook her head curtly, her own spine stiffening accordingly. She admired the stamina of the Marine across the way. She wasn’t about to bother with her own insignificant aches and pains in the light of what that man was honoring this day.

The hour topped with the bikes still roaring down the barricaded street... the sun still beat down... the Marine still stood but at one point he swayed slightly, just for a millisecond. Liz grasped Red’s arm.

“Red...” she refused to look from the man across the way.
Red nodded and two men in their party removed the barricade, heading for the man in question.

They crossed the street dodging the bikes who also dodged them. Having reached the Marine, they blotted his neck and face with wet bandannas and held up water, allowing him to drink.

All the while, he held his salute.

The Marine nodded his gratitude.

The tears rolled down the woman’s cheeks.

Every person present must be feeling the honor and solidarity of this day, not only for the Veterans passing by, but for this man so stoically honoring his brothers-in-arms.

“Drink your water, sweetheart.” she raised the drink automatically, secure in the knowledge that Red would see to the Marine’s comfort.

His friends kept continuous treks to the Marine, cooling and hydrating the man when there was a gap. But even then, he refused to relent.

As they entered the final riders, his arm shook visibly but his stance was strong, his will determined.

Liz could feel his pain. Her own leg had started cramping a while ago, but she too, refused to relent.

It felt like a sacrilege to not only the Marine, but to those who they were there to remember and honor.

Even drinking the ice water Red placed in her hand felt like a slap in the face to those who had fought in some damn hot jungle or barren desert.

“Drink it, Lizzy.” Red raised the bottle himself, tipping it into her warm mouth.

As the final rider passed, the Marine slowly eased his arm down. And Liz found herself quietly crying.

Red turned her chin, making her look at him and away from the man marching proudly, though tiredly, off the center median, as crowds rushed to shake his hand or acknowledge his service.

Liz was ever so glad that soon the man would find shade, a part of her was angry for the people who kept him from his destination but she understood the need to touch this individual.

The shade...

The shade had been over her the entire time she stood there.

Red on the other hand was hot and sweating but smiling warmly down at her.

At his own sacrifice.

While he had suffered, he had shaded her from the hot sun. He had kept her hydrated.

She wrapped her arms around him, weeping brokenly into his chest and he didn’t seem to mind, though he was blistering hot.

She let go, then spun hastily to a nearby ice chest, dousing a handkerchief with water before wiping his face and neck with the cool cloth. Taking the umbrella from his hand, she held it over him as she continued to try and cool him down.
“I’m fine, Lizzy.” he assured quietly.

Her fingers shook as she doused the cloth again and again repeatedly wiping down his arms, until he caught her hand in mid-flight.

“I’m fine.” he repeated and turned her hand, kissing her chilled fingers. “Don’t forget, I wore a uniform too.” he laughed quietly. “I know what it means to suffer.”

Liz mentally slapped her forehead, remembering. He had served in the Navy, of course.

Because of his criminal history, his military record had been sealed, redacted. She knew he had served on a ship, but something in his eyes bespoke of more. She often wondered of his past, perhaps one day that would all be laid open to her.

“T-Thank you...” she said with great difficulty around trembling lips.

“Yes, it was a great difficulty to hold an umbre–” She reached up, covering his lips with her fingers, shaking her head once.

“Thank you for taking care of me and for your service.” she wondered if anybody had ever said that to him. “For your sacrifice.”

Red reached out, brushing her bangs from her eyes, smiling softly, “The sacrifices are worth it when what you cherish most in this world is safe from harm.”

He dabbed away the remnants of her tears, his eyes gentle, “Now, let’s go pay our respects.”

Red gestured the way and she took a step, grimacing, hobbling once. The next thing she knew, she was spun around then soundly deposited over a sturdy shoulder.

“Francis,” Liz giggled, pushing off the man’s back as Red laughed at her predicament, “stop jostling me, I’ll puke.”

“If you’re going to,” the man called back, “you better warn me.”

Each of their companions mounted their own rides, even as Red and his friends mounted theirs.

Before she knew it, they were gliding in behind the Veterans they had just watched pass by, continuing on.

She took in the sea of people, taking great interest in the patches on their vests and jackets. Many of these people had come from very far away to pay tribute to those who had fallen, and she felt even more touched by such dedication. Some, even from Alaska, she heard tell.

That they remembered...

She realized as they walked along with the throngs of people milling about, she didn’t quite know where they were.

They had parked the bikes and then joined in with the others.

Having been too busy looking at everyone and now, being shorter than many people around her, Liz couldn’t really see any pertinent landmarks.

“Where are we going?” she asked quietly, for those around her had adopted a low din of conversation.
“The Wall.” was Red’s solemn reply.

In the time she had lived here, she had not visited The Wall, but then, she hadn’t done much else either. She had just been too busy with work and her crumbling home life.

It seemed only fitting that the first time would be this day.

Liz had always looked at Memorial Day simply as cookouts and a long weekend.

She had forgotten that it was because of these men and women who surrounded her now, that she had the freedom to do such things. What better way to observe their service, but to visit a monument made in their honor.

She looped her arm through Red’s, listening to the smattering of conversations around her. From all walks of life these people had emerged.

Men in uniform spoke amiably with their counterpoints, some laughing, some not.

The new and old generations, connecting on a level only so few could understand but the brave and courageous individuals who had experienced the devastation of war.

As they followed the line of people, Liz’s interest was torn in so many different directions. Off to her right, some women posed next to a statue honoring nurses... while a group of men, all different in age and ethnicity, yet sporting the same platoon badge, did the same next to a statue of three men of varying race.

And as they neared the Wall, the diversity became even greater.

Old war buddies remembering their fallen comrades, lovers mourning their long lost loves... and children, now well into adulthood, connecting with the parent they may very well have never met at all.

Each of them touched the dark slick surface, as though looking for solidity or to even feel just a moment closeness with the one lost to them. They ran their fingers over the etched names reverently. Their eyes searching for something they could not possibly find.

She looked at Red to see his reaction to what was happening around them, only to find him searching the panels. His dedication paid off. He took her hand, guiding her to one section.

He quietly scanned the area, the Wall stretching well above his head. His eyes fixed on a point, then just as the others had, Red reached out, reverently touching the black granite wall.

She watched his finger tracing an etched name, revealing one letter at a time.

JACKSON R REDDINGTON

“My Uncle Jack.” Red said, his solemn voice filling the silence. “I thought he was the next best thing to chocolate milk.” he smiled fondly.

“How old were you?” the reference alerted her to an early age.

“I was five when he left the first time. By the time I reached twelve.... he was gone.” his eyes misted, before refocusing on the point of interest. “A month away from the end of his tour.”

“Jack Reddington.” she repeated in a hushed whisper as she stretched uselessly, attempting to reach the name. Red wrapped his arm around her waist keeping her steady as she tip-toed, her fingers finally joining his to trace the engraving.

“Reddington?” A man next to them spoke up, stepping forward slightly for he clearly had not wanted to intrude on the private moment, “...I knew Red.”

Liz’s ‘Red’ turned to the man, with great interest. “You did?”

“I sure did,” the proud Vet stuck out his hand, which Red took immediately, “great guy...damned prankster. He was always giving one of us the business in some way or other.” the man laughed in remembrance. “We always kinda appreciated it though, you know.” the guy drifted off for a second. “Once, after coming off a hot mission he...”

Liz zoned off into the tale the man told, listening intently but her eyes focused on Red who was unconsciously rubbing his Uncle’s name with his finger while reliving the man’s life through the stories being told.

The older gentlemen obviously had been fond of Jack Reddington and he spoke of him in tones that made Red chuckle or grow intently quiet.

Liz smiled warmly having caught Francis and Ben, as they too listened avidly. She caught site of a volunteer carrying flowers and what looked to be pamphlets.

She tugged on Francis’s arm and he inclined his head so he could hear her, “Give me some money.” She whispered urgently. She had left her belongings at home.

He pulled out his wallet, absently handing it to her, then laughed his delight at the old Vet’s latest description of one of Jack’s shenanigans.

Liz walked over to the volunteer, requesting some items before heading back to Red. She inched up behind him, then tapped his hand gently. He automatically moved it, probably thinking it was someone looking for their own loved one’s name.

Liz had witnessed several occurrences of the same incident happening.

Francis, still enthralled by the stories, stood casually beside Red so she slid his wallet in his back pocket, then discreetly placed the bouquet of flowers in his hand. She smiled softly when his fingers curled instinctively around the bunch, holding them out of sight.

She turned back to the Wall, keeping a running check on Red. The man seemed totally engrossed in learning everything he could concerning his Uncle.

Having placed the paper against the Wall, Liz discovered she was just a little too short to get a proper tracing of the name. She looked about fruitlessly then tapped Francis on the shoulder.

She pointed at the Wall, silently asking for his assistance.

He handed off the flowers to Ben, crouching down, waving her forward. She instantly understood his meaning.

Sitting on his shoulders, the man gripped her thighs and stood effortlessly. She was raised to a perfect height to get a really good tracing without strain.

She checked to see how to do it properly as others were already deep within the process. She softly rubbed the black stick against the white paper until the name started to appear.
“Is this your wife?” she heard the man say, looking down from her concentrated effort.

“No, this...” Red had turned, obviously hesitating when he saw her activity. The man was touched by her thoughtfulness, “...is my fiancée, Elizabeth.”

“You know, if Jack was here you’d have some competition. He did love his brunettes.” the old Vet laughed his delight. “Especially one as pretty as her.”

“He’d have a damn good fight on his hands...” Red grumbled, making the old gentleman laugh out loud.

“You know, I was there when he...” the old guy hesitated, clearing his throat, shaking his head, as he pushed away the visual, but not the memory, “I don’t know if they ever told you, since you were so young... but he fought hard. Saved a lot of lives that day. If it wasn’t for him...” the man looked at the etched name Liz was still tracing, sighing heavily.

“I wouldn’t be here if it wasn’t for him. My tour ended a week after he...” the man nodded once, swallowing hard, “he saved my ass more than once. I will be forever grateful to have been in combat with him.” he fell silent for a moment, before chuckling softly.

“You know after he...” the man trailed off then smiled wistfully, “we got back to base and found that he had short sheeted all of us. How the hell he did that before we left...” he shook his head in sorrow and amusement. “He was a damn good guy.”

“Yes, he was.” Red replied solemnly.

“I’ll let you get back to...” the man gestured, then held out a card, “but if you’d ever like to hear more about him, call me.”

“Thank you, Sir.” Red took the card offered, placing it carefully in his wallet. “It was very kind of you to tell me something about him.”

“My pleasure.” they clasped hands, gripping them. “Ya’ll have a good Memorial weekend.”

Liz was just finishing up her tracing when Red inched closer to her and Francis. He watched the ceremonial gesture silently.

Francis slowly bent his knees, easing the woman down. Red reached out, gripping her hand until her feet were on solid ground. Francis backed away, holding out a long slim folder to Red.

The man opened it, allowing Liz to place the tracing inside, before smoothing it out respectfully.

Ben held out the beautiful flowers, giving them to Red.

Red had of course, seen Lizzy’s movement out of the corner of his eye earlier, but had not known her intentions exactly.

Now he knew.

Red nodded his gratitude to them all, more than touched by the offering, then knelt, placing them at the foot of the tall structure.

He bowed his head for a few seconds, lost in silent thought or maybe even prayer before he stood back up.

“Thank you, Lizzy.” he hugged her enthusiastically before murmuring against the soft skin of her
He loosened one arm, shaking Francis’ hand then Ben’s.

“You’re welcome.” she smiled up at him, then kissed him, holding it for a moment before dropping back to solid ground. Red was after all, a good five inches taller.

They walked the rest of the Wall together, as he pointed out objects of interest as they passed. He was surprised to realize at one point, that they had been holding hands the entire time.

He raised their clasped hands, kissing her fingers. She smiled at him softly, before pointing at something which had caught her interest.

While Francis and Ben occasionally stopped to help people get a tracing of a name, he and Lizzy looped back around to get a better look of some of the statues as they headed back for their bikes. The two men easily caught up at the reunion point.

“Are you tired?” Red asked as he helped Liz onto the bike.

“No, I’m okay.”

“Your leg?” he questioned, having been aware of her favoring it for some time now.

“Silas is trying to kill me.” she replied, then smiled. “I’m fine.” she adjusted her helmet then slid closer to Red as he started the bike.

Red gave Francis a thumbs up before heading off.

Liz was surprised that more than twenty of the bikers accompanied them.

As they approached the bridge, she realized their destination was not home.

“Where are we going now?” she was more than curious.

“Arlington.”

May 25

Liz had never been to Arlington National Cemetery before either. She now felt remiss for the fact. So many took for granted the price others had to pay that they could simply ignore the fact, if they so chose.

She assumed on this day, they would visit Jack’s grave?

Damn... she wished she’d known. She would have bought more flowers or something just as fitting.

Glancing back at Francis, wishing there was some way to convey just how horrible she felt for arriving too such a solemn occasion without adequate–

Francis pulled the zipper on his jacket, showing a bouquet of flowers. The young man had remembered, where she had not.

But Francis had known where they were going, thankfully. She knew Red wouldn’t have thought badly of her for not having brought anything, but she sure as hell did.

With hundreds of others around them bringing tokens of remembrance, she wouldn’t have wanted their little group to be the only ones without something.

Especially for someone Red thought very highly of and a member of his own family who had paid such a high price.

Francis had saved the day. She threw him a grateful wave of her hand before clutching Red’s waist tightly again as the bikes sped along.

After being directed to another designated parking area, they climbed off, each removing their helmets in due course.

“I hope you don’t mind, but I set us up on a little private tour.” Red gestured the group towards a man who waited patiently across the way beside a trolley.

“No, I don’t mind at all.” she smiled, then boarded the spacious vehicle, taking an empty seat, sliding over to make room for Red while Ben and Francis climbed in behind them. The rest of the bikers joined them and soon the train was full.

The guide passed Red a couple folders, one of which he handed off to her. Liz perused the material, having automatically opened the pages. It was a list of all the monuments and answers to frequently asked questions. While the leaflets were passed around, she scanned the literature, surprised by the information she found inside.

Liz had just assumed Arlington was for military members only. She hadn’t realized how many different memorials actually existed. From politicians to scientists... even actors, were laid to rest here. She wondered, however, these people must have served the country in some important manner, surely. Or perhaps they were the spouse of one who did.

Red sat back in the seat, resting his arm behind her as they started rolling. Passing by one memorial after another, the trolley stopped at each, a short presentation and commemoration followed before the guide moved forward.
Visiting John F. Kennedy’s grave site proved to be more powerful than she had imagined. Not only due to the fact of how he had died, but Liz hadn’t known that two of his children were resting beside him. Just babies... the poor little angels.

She couldn’t imagine the pain that Jacqueline Kennedy felt, losing an infant son and then a husband just a little over three months apart.

And for both grieving parents to have done so in the public spotlight....

How could they have possibly survived such an ordeal?

What strong faith they must have possessed. Her estimation of the Kennedys rose considerably.

Red came to stand beside her, staring down at the small headstone, sighing heavily. She reached out, feeling for his hand which he instinctively grasped.

“They didn’t name her?” she pointed to the other small grave marker, a deep abiding sadness overtaking the woman.

“She was stillborn. But I believe they privately referred to her as Arabella.”

“They could have put the name.” she turned away, too emotional to deal rationally with the subject.

What was wrong with her today? She was getting so emotional, but then... maybe one should feel deeply about such things.

“They were Roman Catholic, the church would have declined to give a baptism to a dead person.” Red explained. “And since most Catholics give a proper name at the time of baptism...”

“But they named Patrick?”

“He survived for two days, John had him baptized immediately.” Red sighed sadly, his eyes resting quietly on the two small headstones, “All I know is that I feel extreme sympathy for anyone who has ever lost a child. That is a pain no parent should ever have to face.”

Liz gripped Red’s hand in hers, squeezing his fingers tightly. Red may have not lost a child in the traditional sense, certainly not the way the Kennedy’s had, but that didn’t make his pain any less relevant.

As they headed back to the trolley, Liz came alongside Francis asking discreetly, “Did you find it?”

“No sweat...” was the quiet response.

After once again loading back into the cart, they rolled around a corner. It was then, Liz felt the air leave her lungs, her eyes growing wide with wonder and... incredulous disbelief.

There were so many.... so very many. Far too many graves.

A sea of pristine white stones, one after another as far as the eye could see, stood in all directions.

Red massaged her shoulder consolingly, sensing the impact.

Liz wrapped her arms tightly about Red’s waist, clutching him closer the further they traveled the hallowed grounds in stunned silence.

The area was quite beautiful and serene. Each visitor very respectful of this sacred, dedicated, consecrated grounds. She did hear laughter a time or two, but even that was oddly subdued.

The people weren’t meaning to disrespect the dead, only treasure a memory of the person they were honoring. Much like how Jack’s friend had done back at the Wall. The old Vet had laughed, but there was a tinge of melancholy to the sound as if he was wishing that Jack was there to share in the laughter, rather than just be a cherished memory.

They pulled up alongside a large open auditorium all disembarking. Each person examined their surroundings as they drifted in a common direction.

“The ceremony will begin in a few minutes,” the guide informed in due course.

“Thank you.” Red set his hand on the small of Liz’s back, ushering her around the building to a set of stairs which was rimmed with a black rail. He guided them to the center, then fell silent.

“Where are we?” she whispered reverently for the place seemed to warrant such respect.

“The Tomb of the Unknown Soldier.” he motioned to a lone soldier walking the black path. “The men who guard it are called Sentinels. It is considered the highest honor to be chosen.”

Liz could not take her eyes off the one solitary tomb before which the soldier trod, its’ significance magnified now.

“Only a small amount of volunteers are accepted, and an even smaller amount pass the training.”

“Do you have to be a specific rank?” Francis leaned to speak quietly, a question of his own coming to mind.

“No, as a matter of fact, they wear no insignia when guarding the tomb.” Red continued the narrative. “The occupant’s identity is known only to God, so ‘Rank’ is not a factor in this particular instance.”

“Oh, so they’re equals.” Francis got it. “Doesn’t matter... brothers-in-arms... eternally.”

“Exactly.” Red scowled at a group down the way who were talking above the whisper that Lizzy, and even Francis, had instinctively adopted, even though they had not been told to otherwise. He was proud of them both, even more so of their values and moral conduct.

But he knew, having visited here many times, he need not intervene.

The Sentinel would handle the matter just fine.

While Red didn’t like why this happened, he did enjoy the flush of embarrassment that colored the faces of the guilty parties when publically called out on their disrespect.

Red directed his eyes towards Lizzy, anticipating her reaction when the soldier paused in his steps and turned to the loud people before snapping off a loud and clear rebuke.

“It is requested that everyone maintains a level of silence and respect!”

The man held his belligerent pose, staring at the offensive people until they fell completely silent, totally embarrassed when everyone stared at them with the same level of disgust and contempt, Red was feeling.

Some offenders would bow their heads and hide their faces, ashamed and rightfully so. Others left the area completely after being called on their complete lack of respect.
This group... left.

Red grinned when Lizzy, initially startled by the Sentinels reaction, scowled darkly at the offenders, eyeing them until they were out of sight before turning her attention back to the guard.

Red heard movement off to his right. He tapped Lizzy’s shoulder, pointing to a Superior Officer and the Sentinel’s relief coming on scene for the Changing of the Guard.

“We are to remain silent and standing throughout the ceremony.” he whispered. “Lean into me if you get tired.”

She fell silent as she watched the men change positions. They were so precise in their movements, she could understand why only a few elite were picked for this post. It had to take someone with great discipline, dedication and respect to show the proper dignity due to this sacred place.

She quietly shuffled in front of Red, leaning back into his chest. Red wrapped his arms low around her waist, taking more of her weight until she sighed with relief.

She was going to kill Silas when she got home. She hadn’t realized just how bothersome her previous injuries could be... until Silas put her body to the test.

After the ceremony was completed and two of the men left, she craned her head, whispering again, “Is this an hourly event?”

“Today, I assume they will change the guard every thirty minutes.” Red replied. “It will be expected.”

“When do they stop for the night?” she was curious.

“They don’t.” Red looked at the fresh guard. “The Tomb is guarded twenty four hours a day, year round. Regardless of rain, snow, or heat.”

She watched the Sentinel walk to the end of the path, then face East, and stand there staring at the Tomb. “What is he doing?”

“He holds position for twenty-one seconds, marches twenty one steps,” she had to turn to hear the whispered words, “faces East to honor his brother, before repeating the process.”

“Why twenty one?” she was ignorant on the matter, obviously, but Red loved she was taking the time to learn.

“It signifies the twenty one gun salute.”

She watched the Guard, counting off in her head twenty one seconds each pass, and he was never wrong... not once.

“He’s very dedicated.” she was amazed at the stamina it must take, the discipline.

“Yes, very.” Red smiled softly.

“What?” she obviously had missed something, if his tone was any indication.

“He knows who I am... he’s recognized me.”

Liz expelled a startled breath, her eyes flying to the Sentinel.
“Relax, Lizzy.” it was calmed. “He realizes what he’s doing is far more important than breaking his post to collect the substantial reward on my head.”

Liz watched the guard turn in their direction, his attention instantly focused on Red as he held his pose, before starting back their way. She had to give it to the Sentinel, he didn’t fault his steps once as he bore his eyes into the man behind her.

She looked back up at Red expectantly. The man returned the Guard’s gaze steadily before he inclined his head slightly in openly expressed respect.

The young soldier was visibly taken aback, not having expected such a congenial reaction from the nations number four most wanted criminal.

“With that said, perhaps we should vacate the area,” she smiled gently for the exchange, “if only to put him out of his misery.”

Red nodded his acquiescence, offering a lackadaisical ‘salute’ to his supposed adversary before taking his leave.

Once back on their trolley, they hit a few more memorials. Monument and monument loomed large on the horizon and suddenly Liz was slightly depressed to learn there was a need to commemorate so many battles... so many wars...

Rounding a corner, the trolley slowed. Francis pushed up from his seat, bypassing a confused Red. The guide pointed out, directing Francis where to go.

“Francis?” Red asked what the man was doing.

“We should go over there.” Francis pointed to an area down the path. “Just wanted to pay my respects.”

“What’s over there?” Red’s brow furrowed. “I didn’t know you had people here, Francis. Is it family?”

“Just something I want to check out, if we have time for a detour.” Liz spoke up quickly.

“Of course, baby.” Red consented instantly. “We have all the time in the world.”

Liz leaned towards Francis as the trolley slowed to a stop down the way, “He doesn’t know?” she whispered.

“In case we didn’t find it,” Francis explained his reasoning, “I didn’t want to get his hopes up.” he shrugged. “I didn’t think they’d find him so quickly.”

“The digital age...” she replied.

Everyone departed their seats in due course. The burly men seemed to know the place by heart, heading this direction or that, searching out the people they had come to remember.

Liz walked the grounds aimlessly, giving Francis the time he needed. She was confused by some of the lettering on the headstones, saying as much to her companion.

Red pointed out one, deciphering it for her. “BSM is Bronze Star Medal, PH is Purple Heart.” she was suitably informed.

She enquired of another headstone impression.
“DSC is Distinguished Service Cross,” Red replied quietly, his eyes lingering on the whitewashed stone for a long moment before moving on to the next. “Silver Star.” he pointed to the SS on the marker.

“OLC?” the woman muttered aloud.

“Oak Leaf Clusters.” the decipher was forthcoming.

She nodded sedately. “Okay...” her fingers traced a star on the warmed stone.

“This soldier was Jewish.” Red watched her actions. “The Star of David.”

She looked from one cross to the next and still, the next one over, “Why do they have so many symbols?”

“Well, he was Presbyterian,” Red pointed out the first grave, “ but the one next to him,” he gestured accordingly, “this man was Episcopalian. I think next one over, was Lutheran.” he lifted a hand.

“How do you know all this stuff?”

“When you attended enough funerals here, you start to pick it up.” his tone held a heaviness not there before. The man stood, his gaze taking in the scope of the spiritual idols again. He hoped, whatever faith, they had found peace with it.

They finally caught up with Ben and Francis to find them standing and looking down at one in particular.

Ben gestured from across the way. Red guided the woman carefully between the well kept graves.

Francis’ intent gaze told the woman, as she neared... they had found the person she had asked they locate.

Liz neared, approaching tentatively, not certain what to feel or if she would feel anything at all. She had not known the man personally, after all.

She inhaled sharply having rounded the stone, her hands curling into tightly balled fists.

Seeing that name printed on white granite, bothered her greatly. She closed her eyes and turned away from the sight. Crossing her arms tightly under her breasts, she fought the conflicting emotions.
besieging her mind.

She had not been prepared for such a powerful reaction... not at all.

Liz examined the expressionless features with a critical eye. Perhaps this wasn’t such a good idea, after all.

“You were named after him?” she asked a generic question, floundering a little herself, truth told.

“Each generation carries the name. It is tradition.” Red muttered, tracing the etching, slowly, carefully. “Though, in my case, I really wished they had stopped.” he reached out, setting his hand on the warmed stone, rubbing it. “I thought he was laid to rest... I didn’t think he was here.”

“You never looked?” Francis surmised. “I took a shot. I hope... it’s okay, Red?” the young man was anxious. “Did we do right?”

Red gave the younger man a vague nod of recognition as he knelt and looked at the carving, his eyes silently tracing the letters and numbers. “I never knew he was awarded the Bronze Star.”

Red shut his eyes, placing his hand over the name then felt a smaller hand lay over his and rub his fingers gently.

“I’m sorry for your loss, Red.” Liz leaned into his shoulder, murmuring quietly, her words heartfelt and sincere.

Red smiled gently. “You’re the first person to say that to me.” he curled his fingers, tightening them into a fist but the action was prevented by the slender fingers intertwining with his thicker ones.

“They thought I was too young, didn’t understand what happened.” he had long ago come to terms with the fact. “Maybe they wanted me to hang on to my innocence.” he shrugged. “They came here for the funeral,” he looked around at the trees, then back at her, “and left me home with a neighbor.”

“But you did understand?” the woman half way questioned.

“Yes, I knew.”

“You were just a little boy.” her heart hurt for that little boy.

“With a war vet for a neighbor.”

“He told you?” she was shocked.

Red nodded absently, “In great detail.”

“Why would he do such a thing?” Liz was incensed for that little boy Red had been.

“I don’t think he meant to hurt me, Lizzy.” Red soothed, finally realizing the tale unsettled her. “I think he just answered my questions, like he always did.” he remembered that old grizzled face fondly. “Actually, it was through talking to him, that I was finally able to mourn Jack.”

Red lowered to the freshly mowed grass, stretching his legs in front of him, leaning back into his arms. Liz glanced about for a spot as well, wondering where she should sit when Red moved his legs apart, waving her closer. She moved into the open space, leaning back into his solid frame.
Leaving Francis and Ben to sit opposite sides of the marker.

“I wish I knew what he looked like.” she stated wistfully.

Removing his wallet from his pocket, Red rifled through its contents until he pulled a small picture out, handing it over.

She stared at the black and white photo, her smile a gentle one. “Look at that baby face.”

Liz perused the fresh faced kid in his crisp uniform in a standard pose for that time. He looked proud and erect, but also young as hell. Completely unaware of what he would be facing in his short life.

Liz traced the man’s features, seeing a lot of Red in them. They both shared the same eyes, nose, cheek bones and lips.

“He was quite handsome, wasn’t he?” she voiced her thoughts.

“He thought so.” Red chuckled. “When he came home after boot camp, he thought he was a ladies magnet.”

“Was he?” Liz’s brows rose.

Red sing-songed his head, grinning, “Yes.”

He craned his head, looking over her shoulder at the picture, memories surfacing. “When I was old enough, and he was home, he’d load me up in the car and hit the hang outs. While I played games, he was trolling chicks.” he sniggered at Lizzy’s soft huff. “Seemed like every time I looked up, a new girl was on his arm.”

“He let you tag along?” she asked, handing the photo over to Ben.

“Yes. His mother thought since I was there, he wouldn’t get into trouble.”

“Did he ever...” Liz wondered because, after all... things happened between a man and a woman, especially when so young and it was a reckless time anyway... the sixties and seventies.

“Not to my knowledge.” Red had half expected some woman... okay, several, to show up with such a claim against Jack. “I’m sure if there were, they’d stay away now since the Reddington name is tarnished.”

Liz screwed up her face, annoyed beyond belief but not really knowing why. She stayed silent otherwise.

Red pulled out another photo, “He sent this during his first tour.”

The clean cut face had been replaced by dirt, sweat, a scruffy shadow on the still handsome features. His crisp uniform had been replaced by filthy fatigues which now hung open revealing a masculine chest rippled with muscles.

There appeared to be a leech sticking to his well-toned arm, which made sense, since the man was standing in a knee deep swamp.

In just the short time Jack had been there, he had lost some of his baby fat and gained a tiredness in his eyes. His helmet rode low on his forehead, blocking what appeared to be a blazing sun though not very well, seeing the man was squinting harshly as a cigarette hung from his smirking mouth.
But that wasn’t what grabbed Liz the most, it was how he went from looking like some young optimistic upstart, to a seasoned man in less than a month. For each picture had been hand dated on the back.

The things that kid must have seen had to have been horrific to change him so visibly. The things he would have had to do... must have done.

War makes you grow up fast. That’s what they said. Liz was seeing proof of that statement.

“He did two tours?” Ben asked, his tone a reverent one.

“Yes, well really, three.” Red acknowledged. “He came back after his first tour, took a short R&R and went directly back.” he explained. “He took a longer break after the second, then re-upped.” he fell quiet for a long beat. “The family was not pleased.”

Some would say that Jack hated how he was received back home, the things people called him. Or that he couldn’t acclimate. But Red thought, it was because of the media coverage at the time. The war was so publicized.

They would do a segment that Jack would catch on the evening news. He would see a buddy or know that particular region they were discussing and he’d go silent then head out on to the porch for a smoke.

Red hadn’t understood it until he had been labeled a traitor, the turmoil Jack must have felt. But when he did, Red understood better why Jack had welcomed his company with open arms.

He remembered his father arguing with his Uncle continuously. While his mother was always pushing some new girl on Jack.

And his grandmother, who was thrilled to have her boy home alive and safe, fusses over the man to the point of smothering. Red, even in his child like innocence, kind of understood why Jack wanted to escape to the boardwalk everyday, even if it meant having a kid tag along.

While the adults wanted him to talk about it, or, “Just let it go... move on boy, it’s over...”

How many times had those words echoed in Red’s head. Had he been older, he could have told them all to shut the hell up, that they couldn’t possibly know or understand any of what Jack was going through.

Red had wanted to discuss a new comic book or movie. He hadn’t expected anything from Jack, except to shoot the shit.

It was no wonder soldiers were so great with kids. Their innocence, their light conversation, was a relief in comparison to what the adults expected of them.

“Why do they go back?” Liz always wondered. She could not fathom a reason.

“Guilt, anger.” Red shrugged, having felt many of the same emotions for different reasons in his own life. “He couldn’t sit at a desk while his buddies were dying.”

“I bet his “welcome home” was another reason.” Francis scowled, having heard the stories, of course. He was ashamed of that generations lack of support for men and women who were fighting an impossible war so that the creeps ‘had the freedom’ to kick dirt in a soldiers face when he came back from hell.
“I would imagine.” Red nodded.

“Your family wasn’t happy he was home?” Liz questioned, recalling Red’s previous words.

“No, they were happy. It was everybody else that put a damper on his homecoming.” Red remembered she hadn’t lived through that era. “Sweetheart, returning soldiers were labeled a baby killer the minute they stepped back on American soil.”

Liz grimaced, recalling something about that in an old war documentary Sam used to watch continuously. She was so used to welcoming soldiers home, thanking them for their service, now. She had forgotten that Vietnam soldiers were spit on and called terrible things.

She wasn’t naïve enough to think that some of them probably earned the label placed upon them, but the majority of the soldiers were just doing their duty. They did their tour to the best of their ability, survived and came home... to what?

“I can’t imagine he was happy to have gone back?” Liz looked at the photo. When did it become common place to stand casually in a mosquito infested swamp with a leech neglected on one’s arm, she wondered. But the man in the picture seemed totally resigned... he “fit” now.

“He felt it was where he was supposed to be... his duty.” Red could relate to such thing.

“Do you have more pictures?” she suddenly needed to know more about Jack Reddington.

“Only this one.” Red gave over another picture, though this one was in color. “This was a month before he died, though we didn’t get it until two weeks after.” he tapped the man sitting next to Jack in the photo. “The FNG sent it.”

“FNG?” Liz frowned her confusion.

“Fucking New Guy.” Red smiled, almost impishly, readily relieving her state.

“Red!” she admonished, chiding the man’s responding chuckle. “He was kind enough to send this and that’s what you call him?”

“Well, that’s how he signed the letter, FNG Johnson.” Red shrugged any concern aside. “Apparently, the title was how Jack referred to the kid... PFC Johnson explained it all in the letter. After six months in company, a newbie ‘graduates’ to Vet status, at least in Jack’s eyes.” the light eyes twinkled with mirth. “The kid wanted to honor the ‘code’, that’s all.”

Elizabeth shook her head, sighing, “You men and your ‘codes’!”

She refocused on the photograph. Her finger tracing the outline of Jack’s image.

All traces of the boy that had gone over there were erased. Which was made apparent since the newbie, who had very much looked like Jack did at the beginning of his tour, sat next to him. What a contrast.

The young, wet behind the ears, ‘new guy’ next to the hardened, now... seasoned war veteran and really, only years separated them in age.

Jack made Johnson look like he had just come off the field after scoring the winning touchdown in the high school football game.

Jack had bulked up considerably by this point, his body honed to perfection, probably from carrying what looked to be a hundred pound sack on his back. The sinewy muscles in his arm and neck were taut under his tanned skin.

Though his uniform appeared to be drenched, his face was beaded and running with sweat. The pronounced vein in his temple spoke of a painful headache or overwhelming tension.

But his face... she could see so much of Red in his stern expression. Jack’s jaw was tense, his mouth pinched under the shadowing and dirt on his face, and his eyes... they looked haunted. The man was exhausted, spent.

Jack sat, leaning his head into his filthy hand, the other held a radio, his fingers gripping the dark plastic in open frustration. There was a certain resignation to the set of those broad shoulders... as if he knew, sooner or later, the jungle which surrounded them would eventually be the death of him, which so far... he had managed to escape.

The new kid looked gun ho, fresh and eager. Maybe a little scared, but the determination to beat the enemy was alive in his eyes.

While Jack knew the harsh reality of a never ending war... a never ending day.

“He was only twenty-five?” the woman scowled darkly, perhaps she had miscalculated while computing the math on the headstone. The man in the photo seemed closer to thirty-five.

“Death and destruction ages a man.” Ben philosophized. “As does an enemy army out to kill you, I should imagine.”

“He was still handsome though.” Liz smiled fondly, her fingers still tracing the man’s image, as if in doing so, she could connect with him somehow.

“And don’t think he wouldn’t have told you as much.” Red’s mouth turned up in wry amusement. “One of his last letters said, that while it was true, he had jungle rot, he was still damn fine looking.” He snickered under his breath. “Forget the fact he smelled like hell, he still thought he was a catch.”

“So he and his nephew have that in common.” Francis chuckled as he took the newest picture Liz passed him.

Red looked affronted, “Is my cologne that bad?” he sniffed at his arm. “I’ve been thinking of a change.” he admitted playfully.

Liz giggled and leaned in, “Don’t you dare!” she whispered just for the man’s ears.

He smelled so good.

Francis and Ben nudged each other, catching the spirit which had settled over them.

It was as if Jack himself was present saying, ‘Lighten the hell up, people.’

“Does he pass inspection?” Ben asked, amused at her attempt at privacy under such circumstances.

“He most certainly does.” Liz leaned back into Red, resigned to her fate. “Which is more than I can say for you two...”

Both men automatically sniffed at each others scents.

“But Old Spice assured me that had my grandfather not worn it, I wouldn’t exist.” Ben seemed genuinely perplexed.
“Well, English Leather assures me that women want me to wear this or nothing at all,” Francis nodded sagely, “and since you people frown upon me displaying my magnificent body for public viewing...”

“You and Jack would have gotten along just fine.” Red was relatively sure.

“You know, you look an awful lot like him.” Francis was struck by the resemblance as Ben took the photo. “So, Liz, who would have won the battle? You seem to think Jack is pretty hot.”

“You’re a pain in the ass, Francis... have I told you lately?”

“So Jack would have won.” Ben surmised.

“I’d like to see him try.” Red muttered darkly, before accepting the woman’s tender kiss.

The other men were instantly satisfied with themselves, having managed to get Red’s goat, as it were.

Red checked the sun’s position in the sky, then looked down at his watch. “Damn.”

“Something wrong?” Liz asked solicitously, sudden concern on her pretty face.

“No, I just remembered I promised Danny I’d get him something from the vendors after the rally and I forgot.” He stood up extending a helping hand for Liz to arise from her seated position by the gravestone. “I think we still have time to...”

“Oh, wait.” Francis held his hand up, stilling the words. He unzipped his jacket, handing over the flowers to Red.

Red seemed moved by such a gesture. He nodded his head in deference to the action then for the second time that day, Red arranged the flowers with Lizzy’s help. The man’s eyes closed as he leaned, settling an arm on the top of the white stone for counter balance.

He grew stoically silent for a long moment, his eyes focusing on Jack’s name. He struggled for something profound to say, which for Red Reddington, wasn’t usually a difficult task but today, the words failed the man.

“You were a great guy, an amazing Uncle,” Red swallowed hard at the lump rising in his throat, “and I miss you... so very much.”

Liz’s eyes misted as she pressed her lips together tightly to halt the need to weep at such an emotional exchange.

Red shifted his stance, his eyes still on the boldly inscribed name. “But... you’re not ever going to get my girl.”

Liz chuckled brokenly, the moment lightened somewhat. “Don’t I get a say?” she quipped.

“No.” Red put an end to the issue. He stood a moment, before lightly tapping the headstone, pointing that they could now take their leave.

Liz glanced back, impulsively touching the stone herself, almost caressing it. “Thank you.” she whispered.

Thank you for your service. Thank you letting a kid tag along with you, thank you for being so kind to Red, thank you for loving him.
Red cocked his head, wondering over the private interchange. He watched her contentedly as she rejoined him in the present.

She lay her head upon his shoulder as they walked slowly away. This new open affection she was bestowing on him felt wonderful. He pondered it’s origins but was too wise to question his good fate closely.

There was something different about their connection however and it was a... ‘good’ something although it could not be defined as yet.

Oh, they were affectionate while in a group. She was warming to the expected displays their ‘act’ called upon to preform. Sharing a kiss, holding hands, even embracing was becoming a natural part of the woman’s everyday habits.

He respected her and was more than aware of decorum when with their acquaintances. Red would never trespass on such an obligation.

But today, Lizzy seemed to be within his sphere, not for any other reason but that she just seemed to want to be there.

In other instances, in the past... she had always been upset or scared.

While she did seem emotional today, she didn’t seem sad. Contemplative, maybe. But nothing to warrant actually needing his affection or attention.

But then... perhaps she thought he would need hers?

She liked a shoulder to lean on when she had visited Sam’s grave. Did she think that he would appreciate the same?

Because he did. He appreciated her presence more than she realized.

Jack may have been gone a long time, but this was the first time Red had been able to say good-bye, properly. It meant a great deal to the man to have someone as kind and understanding as Elizabeth by his side this day.

They matched steps as they walked down the hill to the cart, and by the fourth row of headstones they passed, she had looped her fingers casually through his belt loop while she chatted with Ben. And by the time they got to the cart itself. She was trailing along, fingers still holding firm, blindly, yet trustingly allowing the man to lead her safely to their destination.

He almost wished the cart had been further away, because he was really enjoying such closeness.

He wasn’t afraid to admit, he enjoyed the touch of a woman. Even if it was as innocent as this.

Maybe because he had never really experienced such things. His ex-wife, in the early days, would cuddle up to him, but into their first year of marriage, such displays had tapered off. Aside from a peck as he was leaving for the day, sex was the only time she ever really touched him... how had he not noticed that until years later?

He suddenly became acutely aware that with all the women in his life, sex was the only time he had been touched. But there was always something lacking... something missing from the equation. Not that he didn’t enjoy the sex itself, who wouldn’t?

What he had been looking for was... this.
He was never going to turn sex down, especially now that he had Elizabeth. That was a given.

But having a deeper emotional connection, on a daily basis, was just as much a need as the carnal delights a woman could offer.

The man jolted to reality from his musings.

“Where were you?”

“Just thinking.” he shook off the question.

“Are you ready to go?” Liz pointed to the waiting guide.

Red nodded and helped her inside then slid in beside her, “To the bikes, please.”

They got on the road a few minutes later, heading for the rally’s Vendor Row.

She had been silent since their return to the bikes. As they headed back over the bridge, she sighed, “Why didn’t you ride in the rally? You’re a Vet.”

“To be honest, I’m not sure what I’m considered, Elizabeth.” he replied all too quietly.

“Technically, you are.” she debated.

“No, I’m relatively certain the act of treason laid against me has stripped me of my Veteran status.”

Not wanting to start an argument over a dead issue, Liz turned the conversation to her original point. “I guess what I meant was, you should have ridden in honor of your Uncle.”

“To ride for him would have been a slap in the face.” he stated flatly, maneuvering the bike artfully through traffic. “I managed to do the exact opposite of Jack. He honored the Reddington name... I tarnished it.”

“There were extenuating circumstances.”

He didn’t have to see her face to know she was pouting.

“Lizzy, you and the boys helped me honor Jack today in a way that was very meaningful, I think, to both of us,” he pointed out the positive. “Jack would have liked how we’ve spent the day.”

Liz sighed, resting her chin on his shoulder, “You think so?”

“I do.” he concluded. “We celebrated the living, remembered the MIA’s and POW’s.” he lifted an expressive hand but the bike didn’t wobble one bit. “We visited the Wall and found a buddy of Jack’s who spoke very highly of him... that was very special to me.”

He turned his head slightly, moving over a lane.

“We paid our respect to the Unknown Soldier.” she had enjoyed that tremendously. “And we found Jack’s resting place... then spent an hour talking about how wonderful and handsome he was.”

He grinned when he felt her laugh against his back. “He would have appreciated that we took the time, Lizzy.” he patted the leg nestled against his comfortingly.
Pleased that Red seemed content in how they had honored his Uncle, Liz watched the scenery go by, listening to his soft breathing in her ear. She had missed that sound.

“You are staying with me...” she questioned, “while you’re here, right?”

Red smiled at the hesitancy in her voice. He had been hoping that she would extend an invitation to stay with her.

Or he had hoped she would accept his invitation to stay with him...

“I would love to spend the weekend with you.” he replied. “Would you like to stay at the safe house or...”

She pondered the question a moment, “We better stay at my place.” she decided. “Nora and Silas—”

“Yes, you’re right.” he agreed. He had forgotten that they were expected.

“So you’re here...” she paused, “just for the weekend?”

“Well, I had no definite plans, except to spend this holiday with you.” he said. “I only meant, if your team should call after the fact or...”

“Right, yes.” she nodded. “I understand.”

She smiled happily, knowing for the next three days, Red was hers. If no calls should come in from her team or his associates, he would of course stay longer, if she wished it.

It was a heady feeling, having Red Reddington at one’s beck and call.

She tightened her arms about the man, hugging him. He rubbed her exposed hand slowly, just as happy with their confirmed time together, steering the bike in behind Francis and Ben.

After setting down their gear, they walked into the Vendor section, casually strolling the area.

“What did Danny want exactly?” Ben asked, seeing all sorts of goodies, he himself, was dying to search out.

“Oh, some leather goods. I forgot the damn name, but he said it had a Marine...” Red looked searchingly about the numerous stalls, suddenly brightening, pointing to makeshift shop. “That’s it. I’m sure of it.”

They purchased the goods, continuing their aimless wandering, looking at the other products available.

Francis and Ben bought some leather items, new wallets, several new belts. Red bought Liz some pretty little bracelets that had caught her eye.

“You don’t have to do that.” she complained, all the while allowing him to place the items on her slender wrists. She was enchanted by the craftsmanship and beauty.

“You didn’t bring your wallet.” he lifted a teasing stare. As if he wouldn’t have bought them for her anyway. “How convenient, eh?”

“You can afford it.” she waved the issue aside playfully. “Plus lunch, I’m suddenly famished.” she exclaimed half-way through their shopping expedition.
They sat down in the shade of a large tree, watching the people milling by.

“You can’t expect me to finish all of this, right?” Liz waved an enormous turkey leg in the air.

“You do realize that you’ve finished half of it and you’re still eating, yes?” Red turned his own treat around, tearing into the soft flesh vigorously before sipping his lemonade.

“What am I, chopped liver?” Francis was annoyed. “It’s a rule, I take care of any leftovers.” he piped up. “We’ve discussed this.”

“Yes, I remember now.” Liz rolled her eyes. “You’ve been breathing down my neck for the last five minutes, lying in wait, like the vulture you are.”

She took one last bite and held the meat over her shoulder for the man, startling slightly with how fast it vanished from her hand.

Red shook his head as he watched the pair, then stood wiping his hands on a paper napkin, “Knock yourself out.” he handed over his own turkey leg, which was greedily taken from his fingers.

“I’m amazed at that boy’s capacity for food.” He seemed genuinely so as he watched Francis make small order of the object.

Liz chuckled seeing Red’s expression, arising as well while she brushed crumbs off her jeans.

She took a step back, only to collide with a passerby. She turned apologetically, “Oh, I’m sorr–”

She halted mid-statement, her eyes widening with shocked surprise. “Res–” she covered her glaring mistake hastily, “Donald!”

Ressler was better at such things, a plastered smile coming to the fore instantly. He took in the scene with experienced eyes, covering the awkwardness with a professional air Liz suddenly envied.

“Liz...” he nodded his greeting, “good to bump into you like this.” he brought his companion forward with a gentlemanly hand. “This is, Dana. Don’t judge her too harshly please. She’s fresh out of law school,” it was emphasized as a cautionary nod to Raymond Reddington who stood unobtrusively off to Liz’s side, “and delights in flaunting her new found knowledge of criminal behavior.”

“Oh, Donald.” the woman laughed. She was a petite little thing with dark hair and eyes that seemed to take in the world in one fell swoop. “He’s always teasing me.”

“She’s spotted six of the ‘most wanted’ just at this rally alone.” Donald sent a look Red’s way.

“Well, they could have been, you don’t really know.” the slight Texas accent was rather charming if Liz hadn’t been so on edge. “You look familiar too, sir. Have we met?”

“I have one of those faces.” Red stepped, offering a hand. “Although, I do actually spend a lot of time in Texas.”

“What are ya’ll doing in this God forsaken part of the country then?” she quipped, laughing gaily at her own joke.

“I imagine we’re all here as one today,” Red glanced about aimlessly, “for the same reason.”

The woman quietened demurely.
“Dana’s Uncle rode in the rally.” Ressler intoned, casting another oblique look to the two men beside Red.

“It’s nice to meet you.” Liz recovered quickly. “And forgive my manners, Francis... Ben.” she included the others into the introductions. “This is my... eh, friend, Donald.”

Red smiled pleasantly at nothing in particular.

“They surprised me with today’s events.” she beamed, squeezing Red’s hand overly stressed by the unexpected turn of ‘events’. “And they brought a better surprise,” she lifted soft eyes to Red’s countenance, “they brought Ray home.’

“You were traveling?” Dana asked politely as a minute of subdued silence fell. “To Texas, I hope? I’ve been gone only a short while but I do miss home already.”

“Alas, no.” Red grinned charmingly. “Not the Great State, but yes, traveling... for work.” he nodded once, his eyes confident on the pixie like face. “I finished earlier than expected, and I too, am glad to be home.” he squeezed Liz’s hand, raising her soft skin to his lips.

“That is so sweet.” Dana practically gushed, smiling at the couple. “Surprising her like that.”

Ressler frowned slightly at such a warm display from Liz and Reddington, but dropped the façade quickly, not wishing to blow his partners role in Reddington’s masquerade.

“So how do you two know each other?” Dana asked of Liz and Donald.

Liz side-glanced Red, feeling the slight edge of panic start to creep in.

“We used to work together.” Ressler filled the space, smoothly. “A few years back.”

“Oh!” the woman smiled brightly over to a hesitant Elizabeth Keen. “You worked for the F--”

Red dropped his lemonade, the cup exploding on the ground on impact.

“Shit...” the man cursed, quickly wiping at his and Liz’s pants legs. Dana had gasped, rushing to a nearby food truck, grabbing a wad of napkins before hurrying back to the pair. Ressler, who received a good splash himself, dabbed at his shirt front with a fixed scowl.

“Oh my, what a mess.” Dana was dismayed, handing over the remaining napkins.

“Thank you...” Red sighed heavily. “This damn jet lag...” he explained such a lapse, “it hits at the most inopportune times.”

“I know what you mean.” Dana shook her head woefully. “Don’t you hate it? And the TSA.”

“He does actually.” Francis stated.

“I’m sticky...” Liz grimaced, holding her hands out as proof, as she searched about the grounds surrounding them. “Is there a bathroom or...”

“There’s a water station.” Dana pointed the needed direction, “just on the other side of that blue trailer there. You own your own jet you say? My, I’m impressed.”

“He gets that a lot.” Francis nodded sagely.
“I’m just going to...” Liz gestured, desperately wishing to flee the awkwardness, “it was good to see you Donald, and nice to meet you, Dana.” she inclined her head to both before stepping off with Red by her side.

“Yeah,” Ressler adopted another smile, “have a good holiday.” he offered as he directed Dana in the opposite direction... as quickly as humanly possible.

“Those are such nice people, Donald.” Dana was heard to say in passing.

Liz and Red walked quietly towards the water station, intent on keeping the story alive and flourishing. Red reached out, grabbing more napkins from a vendor as they passed, adding to the effect.

“Who was Dudley Do-Right?” Francis gestured back to the couple who was rapidly vanishing into the crowded venue.

“I–” Liz stumbled slightly over a wide strip of electric cord, giving her a few seconds to think of a logical explanation.

Francis frowned slightly at the man’s angered features before his eyes widened with recognition.

That was the Donald, Liz fuc–

Fuck....

“What the hell is it with you two and awkward situations?” Francis threw his hands out at his side.

“Upset you didn’t get to record it?” Red asked pleasantly before leading Lizzy to a nearby tent filled with shiny things sure to distract Francis. He was neither surprised nor disappointed when the ploy worked.

They continued on with their shopping, until Red noticed the woman was once again favoring her leg. “Your leg hurts.”

“I’m okay.” she was quick to deny the accusation.

“No, we’re going.” he gestured to Francis that he was taking her to the bikes.

“Red, I’m really okay.” she protested. “We can keep looking... this is fun.”

“You’re limping.” he motioned. “You don’t want to strain your leg anymore than we already have. We’re going.”

They looped back around slowly, walking through the soft grass, amid those milling about.

“I’m sorry...” Liz was, “but remember, it’s Silas’–”

“Fault, yeah I know.” The man completed the statement, his gentle eyes on the woman.

“Damn leg!” she grumbled her irritation. “You guys don’t have to leave, I’ll just sit here.” she pointed to a bench, hope gleaming on the pretty face. “I don’t want to be a downer.”

“Lizzy, it’s okay. I did what I came here to do.” he had accomplished so much to his way of thinking. The day had brought them closer. “We can go home.”
One of the large biker guys came up to Red, breaking the stalemate, mumbling in his ear. Red frowned, his expression altering visibly. The man sighed heavily.

“Tell him I’ll be right there.” The burly biker took his leave.

“What’s wrong?” she sensed something amiss.

“An old shipmate of mine is here and saw me.” Red motioned in the needed direction. “He’d like a minute.”

“Okay, well like I said. I’ll just sit here and when you’re done...” she smiled, then sat on the shaded bench.

“If you wouldn’t mind?” Red glanced around finding what he sought, Francis and Ben were only a stall away but... the man curtly crooked his hand and two rather menacing men appeared out of nowhere.

“Yes. Now, go. I’m fine.” she raised her foot to the bench, sighing in relief, her eyes watching the mammoth individuals approach. And she had thought bikers were large men.

“Stay with her.” he muttered to the new arrivals. They stood on opposite ends of the bench, smiling and passing out hellos to buddies as they walked by, seemingly cordial, passive beings. She would not have wanted to cross either, personally.

She tracked Red as he walked across the greens to a man who was smiling as Red got closer. She could not see Red’s expression, but he seemed to hesitate when the man stuck out his hand in greeting. Seconds passed before Red finally lifted his hand to make the expected contact.

Was his hesitation due to his dislike of the man? It was obvious, no love was lost on Red’s part. Perhaps Red just assumed that everyone he had worked with believed him to be a traitor and wouldn’t give him the time of day. Not that she thought Red would care either way. But this guy must give pause for thought, surely.

She would enquire on the matter later, of course. Red probably wouldn’t answer, but he had surprised her a few times.

She relaxed back into the curved bench, breathing in the warm air. It wasn’t so bad here in the shade. The wind was coming through pretty well down the path, even with the crush of bodies, so she was cool, for the most part.

It had been an eventful day. Thought provoking, to say the least. Remembering what Memorial Day was really all about.

And more importantly, Red had shared a little of himself with her.

She was surprised that even with his sullied military past, the man seemed to hold high esteem for his one time comrades.

She would have thought he would shun those who had shunned him.

Liz reflected on moments throughout the day. Red had seemed... different somehow. She couldn’t put her finger on it.

The way he stood just as erect during the rally as that Marine had and how he had been so very respectful when visiting Arlington. His aggravation with those who had disrespected the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier... had been admirable.

More to her surprise, she had gathered by the information he had so easily imparted, that he visited the grounds frequently. She wondered what drew him back so consistently.

Was he missing being a part of the military, regardless of what he said. Or was it an ingrained respect he had carried over from his childhood, for the Uncle he had admired so much.

She felt her heart warm at the thought that Red had shared something so very personal to him... with her. Something that wasn’t in his file.

She knew so little about his family, but today, he had let her inside his world a little bit more. And because of it, she felt closer to the man than ever before.

It had been a good day, full of wonderful surprises.

“Liz...”

The woman started at the recognized voice.

This was one surprise she could do with out.

“...Tom.” she muttered dejectedly.

Chapter Notes

Get a snack, a good drink and relax... this is going to take a while.

May 25

“I was going to just come over and say hello, but you’ve got quite the entourage there.” the man who was around Red’s age, but did not hold the years as well, had inclined his head to the ensemble across the way.

“So I just caught the nicest looking one of the bunch’s attention and made an appointment, so to speak.” he held out his hand until Red finally took it. “It’s good to see you again, Red.”

“Is it, Matt?” Red’s tone was acerbic.

“I never believed the shit they pinned on you.” the chill in the air was dispelled by a careless wave of the hand. “And not many of the others did either.” the man’s eyes held a certain sincerity that surprised Red.

“You are maybe one of the very few.”

“Not so few. A lot of us think you got the shaft.” Matt Henson was pleased he could set the record straight. The guy had hem and hawed about approaching Red Reddington after so many years but now, was glad he had. “We’ve been watching your progress over the years. We didn’t know how to show our support... exactly. But we would have given you a pat on the back.”

It was still a touchy subject if Red’s expression, or lack thereof, was any indication.

“Yes, well. Not all I do is reported.” Red replied irreverently.

“I’m sure.” the man chuckled. “Look, I just wanted to say, hey.” the awkwardness was lessening on both parts. “Let you know you got some supporters out here. Speaking of which,” Matt searched out his wallet, extracting a card, handing it over, “take this.”

Red read the neat script absently before returning his arresting gaze returned to the man’s earnest face.

“It’s got my number on it and we’re all linked on the Net. You ever need anything... really. You have help.”

“Are you my groupies?” Red grinned, placing the card into his own wallet.

“Well, a couple of us do have your wanted poster pinned to our walls.” Matt replied pseudo-seriously. “I’m not one to blow kisses at it, but I can’t say for the others.” he nodded amiably. “You know, don’t ask, don’t tell.”

Red chuckled quietly, this day was proving most interesting in more ways than one.
He wasn’t sure how he felt about this new development but, who the hell knew... what he thought would turn out shitty, even become confrontational... was taking a different slant.

“You’ve done well, Red. Sticking it to the establishment and all.” it was chuckled appreciatively. “Hear tell, you’ve made a little on the side as well, huh?” Matt could tell the man’s clothes were of an expensive cut.”

“I do have my own jet.” Red replied straight faced, though his eyes were lit with merriment. “Well. It’s just a small jet.” he regretted his impulsive jibe. “And the gas mileage will kill you.” he made the man laugh.

“Okay,” Matt nodded amiably yet again, “anyone can own a jet, you’re right but still, I’m even more jealous truth told.” the man’s eyes cut to the cute brunette across the way.

“I’m a dirty little traitor. What’s to be jealous of?” Red’s brows furrowed critically.

“You are that.” the ruddy faced man chuckled greatly to take the sting out of the words. “I meant,” he pointed with a lift of his head to the approximate ‘subject’ at hand, “I saw you with that girl earlier, the one kissing you.” impressed brows were lifted.

“She’s a little... young, isn’t she?” he teased but admiration showed in his envious eyes.

Matt took the veiled insult in his stride, “You’re right there.” a slight scowl appeared on the still rugged face. “I couldn’t handle the pressure... say, it looks like you may have a little competition there bud.”

“I doubt it.” Red’s reply was lost in the din of engines approaching, as a formation of WWII planes thundered overhead, the deafening sound disrupting further conversation.

“It’s okay...” Liz held up a restraining hand to the two guards Red had left in charge. “It’s just my ex.” she pulled a disgruntled face which subsequently allowed the men to relax their vigilance to a degree.

Two pairs of belligerent eyes scanned Tom’s frame with the open threat of mayhem should anything out of the norm prevail in the upcoming minutes, however.

Tom chose the better part of valor... discretion. “Liz, we desperately need to talk.” he threw a cautionary glance at Red’s back, which was still turned from the, the man’s attention elsewhere for a moment, “Away from here!”

“Don’t you get it?” the woman was mystified by the guy’s lack of common sense. “I don’t want to talk to you... not ever, ever again!”

“You don’t know what the hell you’re doing! Trusting Red Reddington, for God’s sake.” Tom was beside himself. “What is in your head?”

“I will tell you what is out of my head,” Liz kept her voice low that passerby’s might not be pulled into yet another endless confrontation, “all the lies and pretense you put there... you better leave if you know what’s good for you.” she glanced hastily to Francis and Ben’s location but thankfully, both seemed occupied.
“You’re ruining a perfectly amazing day, if you must know... as usual.” her tone turned angry as did the light blue eyes. “I don’t want these innocent people pulled into one of your sick attempts to turn me to the dark side.”

“You know my abilities, Liz.” the man’s own eyes chilled, “you think these big apes will stop me? I have information about your little friends you need to hear. We can do this the easy way,” he shifted, showing a weapon inside his light weight jean jacket, “or the hard way. It’s up to you. You want them hurt, permanently, because quite frankly, I’m in no mood to suffer one of Reddington’s noble attempts at rescue.”

“It wouldn’t be an attempt.” Liz sneered. “One of these days, he’s going to take your ass down and I fervently hope that I am there to witness it!”

“Yeah, whatever. Are you going to get these people in between a fire fight just because you’re afraid to hear the truth?”

“I know the truth.” she disgusted. The woman cast a hasty glance Red’s way. He looked so relaxed and happy today.

She wasn’t going to let Tom spoil that. “You’ve got three minutes.” she shot the man daggers.

The man jerked his head indicating a secluded spot in which to speak.

Liz felt relatively safe, it was just a hundred meters away over a small knoll.

Small grassy knoll... bad things happened on small grassy knolls.

“Hey guys,” she forced a brightness and big smile for the guards Red trusted to watch over her, “can I have just a few seconds?” she pointed out the spot. “I won’t go far, I promise. You can see me.”

The two men exchanged guarded, wary glances.

“Come on.” Tom put on his best ‘normal guy’ guise. “He knows me, we’re old acquaintances.”

Liz’s forced smile remain fixed. “I’m just going to be right over there.” she reaffirmed. “It’ll be fine. Take just a minute... really.”

It was clear the men did not want to relent but... in the end, they did.

“No further, ma’am.” a dark scowl followed the warning but if was for Tom, clearly.

Tom held up his hands in a sign of ‘peace’.

Liz hobbled a little, the rest had helped her leg.

“What’s wrong with you?” Tom had noticed the slight injury.

“You!” she turned on him instantly. “You’re what’s wrong! What is this information you–”

“No, your leg.” Tom snipped, gesturing.

“My horse threw me on my usual morning ride, what’s it to you?” she was hanging out with Silas too much, Liz had to face facts. “Alright,” at Tom’s confused face, she continued, “what is this great truth you are to impart, oh, Sage One?”

Tom was antsy and impatient, constantly throwing glances Red’s way.
“Yeah, you better err on the side of caution.” Liz had noted the comical state, amused by the man’s jitters. “He catches you within ten feet of me, he’ll kick your ass from here to New York.”

“You mean he’ll have someone do it for him?” Tom’s eyes shifted to the two guards who watched him like a hawk.

“He doesn’t need assistance for the likes of you.” Liz disdained. “He would have put you down years ago if it hadn’t been for me, and you know it.”

“What I know...” the man had more important things to discuss, “is that you are in grave danger and you’re too stupid to see the fact. I have proof!”

“Oh, you do...” Liz nodded sympathetically, smiling tightly for the guards sake only. “If you mean from your feeble attempts to lead me to the Cabal...”

“I mean from him!” Tom gestured angrily then calmed seeing the guards inch closer. He got himself under control with stressed difficulty. “Look, we can’t talk freely here.”

“Spit it out.” the woman snapped her waning patience. “I’m not standing here all–”

“The evidence is in my car.” he gestured just as snippily. “You think I would bring it here in case Reddington–”

“There is no way in hell,” Liz was positive, “I’m moving from this spot, so you had just better–”

Tom’s patience snapped, seeing her intractable stance was a genuine one. He pulled his weapon, aiming with deadly accuracy.

A formation of WWII planes thundered overhead, masking the sound of the weapon firing.

Following the planes path until they flew out of sight, Red’s movements continued, glancing over his shoulder searching out Matt’s meaning. His body tensed instantly, coiled for action.

“Son of a bitch!” Taking off at a clipped pace, racing across the crowded grounds in a desperate dash.

“What the hell?” Matt scowled at the unexpected turn of events. Shots rang out and like everyone else in the immediate vicinity, he dove for cover.

One guard fell heavily, clutching at his knee, blood spurting between clenched fingers.

Tom snapped off another clean shot, taking the other rapidly approaching guard out of commission.

He could see Red Reddington making rapid progress, the man having a clear path now that the crowd, like a herd of wild mustangs, scurried in all directions, seeking shelter from the raining gunfire.

There was only one other man in his field of vision that seemed to have any balls whatsoever. Tom could recognize Liz’s partner in the distance, weapon drawn but the man was too far away to be effective.

Tom sneered his contempt. Stupid people! They got in his way most days. They were useless in the real world. The world he lived in at least.
They went about their meaningless little lives, heads stuck in the proverbial sand, not one of them having any clue about what went on behind the scenes.

In the murky, shadowing depths of those who called the shots... made the plans, guided the future, kept it all afloat.

So that these pitiable creatures could turn a blind eye. The had their cookouts and soccer practices, day in, day out, none the wiser for the simple fact, men like him protected their fat asses from the harsh realities of the world.

He was questioning himself more and more these days... why did he even bother?

The man gripped Elizabeth’s arm in a tight clench, one objective in mind as the rapidly unfolding drama played out.

Francis Holbrook was stuffing the treasures he had purchased today into the compartment on his bike.

He laughed jovially at his biker friend’s telling of a bar fight gone wrong... as if one had ever gone right when the man’s tale was overshadowed by a rumbling roar filling the air around them.

Halting his actions, he craned his head, glancing up at the impressive sight of the enormous planes overhead until they were out of sight.

Sharing a pleased smile with the man across from him, Francis shifted alert eyes when he heard a the subtle popping sound as the planes engines muted.

It had sounded like firecrackers at first but the young man knew instantly, that was not the case.

His eyes darted to the bench where he had last seen Elizabeth Scott.

Several people crouched beside the flimsy makeshift cover, their faces drawn with terror and stress.

Francis’ eyes scanned frantically... out of the corner of his eyes, he saw Red shove someone from his intended path.

The man was moving with remarkable agility.

Another shot followed, cracking crisply in the still air. People scattered or hit the deck, allowing Francis a clear view.

In the back of his mind, he took stock of the situation as it now stood.

Francis followed the natural path Red was taking, spotting Lizzy.

Guards were down, rolling in agony.

She was just past the grassy knoll, being forcibly dragged by some fucker. The woman was not going softly into that good night.

“Fuck!” he rasped hoarsely, his body in motion before he was aware it had taken command.

He was moving with grace and speed of a young athlete, easily clearing the chain lined fence that ran along the sidewalk.
He made quick work of dodging the innocent people taking cover on the ground, bouncing over them as if they weren’t even there.

Red was gaining ground, closing the distance between Elizabeth and her assailant. Francis would reach her first, but he had another target in mind.

“Elizabeth!”

Tom and Liz looked up when they heard Red yell her name to find the man gaining quickly on their position.

“Come on!” Tom grated his growing annoyance. “Stop fighting me, dammit!”

“Let go!” she struggled against his iron grip as he pulled her across the greens. She would have to revise her options. His car loomed in the very near distance. She always hated that ugly thing!

“You’re hurting me!” she pulled uselessly on her arm, unable to break free.

“Dammit, Liz! Come on!” he didn’t want to hurt her but she was narrowing his options.

“Leave me alone!” she swung out, only to have Tom knock her arm away, backhanding her across the cheek.

It was for the greater good, surely. He disliked striking her but he had priorities.

A group of onlookers protested the action. A few of the more courageous, regaining their equilibrium. A large ensemble grouped, starting for the pair.

Tom fired two shots to discourage such a stupid recourse.

Liz had spun about with the hit, losing her footing for a moment. Tom dropped the weapon to his side, unceremoniously jerking her back towards him. Swinging her arm in a vicious arc, she caught the asshole across the mouth, drawing blood.

Tom brushed at the red dribble with his knuckles, tightening his hold on her arm. He could make it... the car door was a few feet away, if he could just get inside...

Liz punched out again, knocking him across the windpipe like Silas taught her, causing the man to release his tight hold, but also strike out himself.

He choked, coughing, sputtering helplessly for a beat.

Stumbling back, Liz snagged her heel on a concrete parking block, falling to the ground. She winced painfully, shaking off the hit and uncontrolled drop. She felt hands grip about her waist as Tom bent over, yanking her lax body up off the ground.

Just as he gripped her thigh. Meaning to boost her over his shoulder and end all this ridiculous, useless struggling once and for all... a heavy blur hit him out of nowhere, the momentum of the hit, tackling Tom to the rough texture of the parking lot.

Liz fell from his hold, hitting the ground hard again, knocking the air from her lungs and jarring her jaw painfully. She pushed back with her feet, distancing herself from the altercation that was now taking place when large hands reached under her arms, lifting her to gently to her feet.

“Time to go...”

Red guided her away from Ben and Tom. He pulled her close against his chest, dodging Francis, who had arrived on scene like the Seventh Calvary. The young man eagerly joined the brutal skirmish.

Pushing through the crowds, Red steered her forward. Liz ducked her head, mortified, embarrassed, by what had just occurred. She hid from the gawking, mouth gaping onlookers.

Protectively shielding the woman, Red held his temper admirably. Not for the crowd, his fury ran deeper and it was for one individual alone.

The sound of running feet gained on them quickly. Instinctively reaching for his weapon, he dropped his hand hastily when he realized it was Ben and Francis who approached.

The crowd once again crouched quickly, becoming unseen entities at the sight of the glinting metal of the gun.

“He got away?” Red demanded tersely.

“I flung his ass towards Francis and he got up and bolted.” Ben apologized. “That bastard can run!”

“He’s had a lot of practice.” Red seethed quietly. “It was her ex-husband.” he spoke in deference to the questioning faces.

“The stalker asshole?” Francis scowled irritably. “I should have popped that fucking bitch harder.”

Liz hobbled quickly, wincing with each step, commencing their trek which had momentarily been waylaid.

Red snagged her elbow. “Slow down.” he advised calmly. “We are leaving, baby. But we are not running away... there’s a difference.”

Liz who was still attempting to acclimate herself to all that had happened in such a small span of time, took a cleansing breath, nodding minutely.

“No, we are not.” she was determined to adopt the same stoic attitude.

Red had pulled up short having reached the motorcycles, his face a grave etching of studied concern.

“Ben, will you see to the men?” he motioned to the crowd that had gathered across the way around the two guards who lay, wounded, but visibly conscious.

One was seen to irritably shake off any assistance offered. The other sat up, allowing a pretty woman to attend to his shoulder wound.

Red was later to learn, that the woman was a Registered Nurse out of Walter Reed Hospital.

He sent her an enormous bouquet of flowers with a note of gratitude. Enclosed was more than enough to pay off her student loans.

He was grateful she had intervened for his men when he could not.

that Liz had left on the bench.

His acquaintances, the ones who had accompanied them on this outing earlier in the day, had arrived on scene moments ago.

“We just heard, man.” Mad Dog was expressing his regrets. “We got here as fast as–”

“No worries.” Red dismissed. “Thanks for these...” he held up the last of the gifts he had purchased which had been retrieved by one of the ensemble. “Danny would be upset if I had forgotten it.”

“Ah, Danny can suck himself.” Mad Dog was of a mind. “You better haul ass, the cops have to be en route by now.”

“Why is it,” Francis wanted to know, “they are always the last to know about anything when it goes down?”

“They saved our asses a few times over the years.” Red reminded, his eyes scanning a reticent Elizabeth, reading her closed off body language easily.

“Not on purpose.” Francis chided.

“So what’s this all about? Who started it?” Mad Dog allowed Red to mount his bike. “You want we should talk to them for ya, Red... explain how very rude they have been?”

Red grinned, his mood mellowing.

“Do you fucking believe this?” Francis pointed, his mouth agape, his features incredulous. “That mother fucker is standing right there!”

All eyes turned.

Tom Keen took the new notoriety in his stride.

He shifted into a more comfortable position, clearly favoring his right side. The one that had hit the pavement with Ben’s less than gentle tackle.

“I’m going to cap his fucking ass.” Francis started off, incensed for such blatant disrespect. Ben by his side.

“Francis!” Liz was aghast. “He has a gun!”

“So do I...” the young man resumed his determined steps. His eyes, had Elizabeth been able to see, turned a glacial green.

“What do you mean you will ‘cap his ass’!” Liz hurried to halt any further advancement.

Tom Keen stood, watching... nothing more.

“Cap him...” Francis clarified, gesturing accordingly, “as in, I’m gonna put a slug right between his beady little eyes.”

“You will do no such thing!” Liz snapped. “Stop being ridiculous... Tom is...” she trailed off, seeking Red’s assistance but none was forthcoming.

“You expect me to stop them?” the man’s voice was brittle. “The fucker hit you... again!”
“This is my fault.” Liz relented, feeling the weight of her words, glancing shakily back to the two fallen men.

“...Yes.” Red grated his fury for one alone but his anger was expressing itself in boundless capacity, “it is.”

Liz was stung by the words and his actions.

“Two men are down because you decided it was okay to let that bastard near you again!” Red motioned curtly to the patiently waiting individual.

“What is this spell he has over you?” Red was beside himself. “That you feel you must give him every opportunity to prove his sincerity?”

“It– it wasn’t like that.” she faltered.

“Then what?” Red exploded, gripping the handlebars of his motorcycle in a death grip. “Explain it to me. Why would you put yourself... my men, in such a position?”

Red knew he was being unfair, unreasonable, belligerent... all of the above and Lizzy’s stricken face tore at his heart strings, but dammit to hell... enough was enough.

He pushed off the bike, standing over the woman. His dark eyes steadily holding her searching ones.

Tilting Lizzy’s chin up to look at her face. Red’s grey eyes twitched angrily, finding her cheek swelling and reddened. His thumb gently stroked the injury, a stark contrast to Tom Keen’s touch.

“Why do you allow him to do this to you?” the roughened voice lowered painfully.

Liz’s eyes fell to his mouth, willing the answers that swirled about madly in her head, to come into focus. Her brow furrowed painfully, trying to make sense of the madness... to find a starting point.

“You still love him.” Red accused...concluded bitingly, after the long silence.

She jerked back, shaking her head slightly, as though not having comprehended the words.

“No...” she whispered her shock.

Red lifted his eyes, staring out over her head... the distrust apparent to her way of thinking.

“He threatened to start something.” Liz disliking being placed between a rock and a hard place, found her focus... her backbone. “What was I supposed to do!” she raised her own voice. “He could have killed any number of those people!” she lifted a pointed finger to the holiday crowd. “Just as he could have the men he shot.”

Red was reminded of Tom Keen’s lack of empathy for other’s than himself.

“I thought if I at least... placated the son-of-a-bitch,” she was close to tears, “I might save some lives... you know what he is capable of.”

“Can you guess my capabilities?” Francis did not like to see his friends hurting, more determined than ever. “He’s trying to drive a wedge and you’re letting him!” he accused Red to his face. “Now, let’s end the mother fucker.”

Francis and Ben began the needed journey with a few decisive steps yet again.
“...No.” Red stated all too quietly, knowing truth when he heard it.

Francis turned, flabbergasted.

“He will hurt you...” Liz’s eyes beseeched.

“No, Liz,” Francis was more than incensed, “he will not.”

Ben stood staunchly by the young man’s side.

“You don’t know him,” she couldn’t explain, not here, not now...

“He doesn’t know me.” the confidence almost convinced the woman.

This was not swagger. This was a cool, calculated rejoinder. The man’s eyes held a confident, calm inner composure that Liz could not define.

“Francis,” Red had tempered his anger. He straddled the bike, his shoulders set, but resigned. “We’ll handle this in another fashion... later. We have to vacate.”

Sirens could be heard in the distance. Speculative gestures and attention from the gathering crowd was growing.

“He will tail us.” Ben reminded. “You want her location known?”

Red weighed the options given him. He shifted non-committal eyes.

There was a leak in his organization. Their whereabouts had obviously been broadcast to the lowlifes in the city....

He already knew Carvers methods. The man would never really attempt anything in the light of day. The Vegas incident had been ‘play time’ only.

Had he not been so shaken, Red would have remembered the bastard’s M.O.

Red had felt confident in the holiday outing. But Tom Keen was a different type of psycho.

A psycho that may or may not have a certain magnetizing pull, the likes of Charles Manson.... with Elizabeth Keen.

She had stated her case as to the why, but there was still doubt...

He had voiced that fear in Vegas and it was a fear that came true today.

How could he protect her, when she blindly followed after that psychopath.

It hurt that there was this wedge... this distrust... between them.

He lifted a steady gaze which Tom returned.

There had to be a reckoning. This had to stop, one way or another. Red refused to live under another man’s terms or conditions.

“Are you coming?” he asked quietly.

Elizabeth’s heart hurt. He had to ask?
She stepped slowly, taking her place beside him.

Mad Dog helped her mount the large bike. She could feel the tension in Red’s body as she settled in behind him.

“There are lots of ways a car can take out a few bikes.” Mad Dog remarked casually, glancing over to Tom Keen then flipped him off absently, which was the man’s way.

Keen’s slight shake of the head said, ‘Consider the source’.

Mad Dog smiled happily, “Want an escort?”

Francis was the one balking this time. He paced restlessly back and forth, having a decision of his own to make obviously, his eyes never having left Tom Keen.

“There are too many witnesses man.” Mad Dog laughed at the absurdity of the move Francis was contemplating.

“Don’t end her day like this.” Red asked rather than told, his eyes placid now. “Don’t end her day with you in cuffs.”

“Oh, now you’re solicitous of her feelings?” Francis was glad to have an outlet for the fury he felt. “Look at her face, man!”

Red hesitated then shifted slightly, turning his head.

Liz’s cheek was swollen more than it was moments ago, a nasty red welt marking the lovely skin.

Red eyes closed, fighting the return of the rising fury.

“He fucking belted her!” Francis snarled. “Don’t you think that was a mood killer in itself!”

Red took a deep breath, quelling his desire to blow Tom’s fucking head off himself. There was a certain pleasure to be derived from standing over a foe... watching the life drain from their eyes... when had that started?

He curtailed such pleasant thoughts, instead turning his attention to his gut feeling. He had always trusted his gut and right now, it was gnawing at him... telling him to leave and get Elizabeth to the safety of the house.

“Getting her home safely, is more important.” Red rationalized to them all and himself. “We’ll get him later.” he promised the boy,... and himself. “I give you my word, Francis. Will you take it?”

A battle of wills ensued for along beat. Liz held her breath wondering what more she could say to sway Francis’ will.

“Francis, we need to go.” Red jerked his chin towards the people pointing their way and the uniformed cops taking note of them in the distance.

Francis cursed under his breath, signifying his displeasure, but nodded curtly, stalking to his bike.

“We’ll get you home, little lady. Safe and sound.” the large biker stated, grinning. “Don’t you even think about it for another second.”

“Thank you.” Red replied, firing the bike to life. He watched all take their mounts, then nodded to the boy who watched with a sullen expression. “Francis, you lead.”
“There’s no need to get these guys involved.” Liz was remembering the guards. She had watched Red don his helmet, before following suit. Mad Dog’s words haunted her. ‘There are lots of ways a car can take out a few bikes’.

“I don’t think he set out to hur–” she trailed off, sickened. It sounded as if she were defending him. “I can handle Tom.”

Red pulled out behind Francis and Ben. As they hit the street, they were immediately surrounded by a veritable sea of Harley’s and Indian’s.

“No, Lizzy. You can’t handle Tom.” Red shook his head. “You’re too emotionally invested.” he sighed heavily. “Tom will always hurt you,” he grated the words. “That’s what he does and will always do. Be it emotionally or physically.” he growled low in his throat, the anger returning with a vengeance.

Liz knew he was right, and what’s worse, she didn’t know how to break the chain. She thought she had been doing well. Had pushed Tom from her mind.

“You could walk away from me...” his jaw pulsed at the remembrance of their earlier relationship. Truth told, he had always liked her spunk. How she didn’t kowtow to him.

“Where is that Lizzy? The one who called me on my bullshit.” Red questioned. “Why can’t you walk away from him?” he finished quietly.

Silence fell between them. Red searched his mind for something to say to lessen the impact of his words but he was too distraught and besides he had to keep his prospective.... he knew Tom Keen would not give up so easily.

He would make things right with Elizabeth when he could... when the emotions were not running so high.

They finally hit a good stretch of road that offered him a straight shot, allowing him to get good speed. Glancing past their plentiful escort in the rearview mirror, his eyes darkened when he saw a dark blue car, fishtail around a corner.

“So it begins...” he muttered absently, his mind working the logistics of the new problem rapidly. He caught Francis’ attention, jerking his head to the rear of the roaring pack surrounding them.

Francis glanced in his rear view mirror watching a blue car gaining momentum toward their little entourage.

Mad Dog had picked up on the commotion, signaling his people who instantly were alerted. The signal passed down the line, one after another having glanced back at the ‘blue’ car fast approaching their locale.

Liz heard the loud rumble as they sped up and before she knew it, they were on all sides of them, blocking sight of their bike.

Ben slowed, having sensed a problem. Francis kept craning his neck, keeping tabs on Tom’s location.

Francis let go of his steering, gesturing to Red, something Liz could not quite ‘get’. Red’s low chuckle thrilled the woman after such a long silence, but couldn’t enjoy it to it’s fullest as she had other priorities at the moment.
She too, kept a running check on the recklessly weaving driver of the blue car.

Mad Dog had understood Francis’ ‘gesture’ all too well, a heavy laugh escaping the individual. He held up his hand, waving his fingers outward and in an instant, his riders parted like the Red Sea, giving their tail car ample time to pass.

Mad Dog even offered a gallant sweep of his burly, tattooed arm as Tom took the ‘opportunity’, gunning his engine, steering the vehicle thought the heavy Harley’s.

He offered a tight scowl as he passed, sensing a trap but it was a chance he would have to take to reach his objective. He was used to taking risks in life.

“Hold on tight, Lizzy.” Red instructed, watching Francis drop back behind their position.

She squeezed Red’s middle, tightening her thighs around his as he ‘hit it’. They flew down a long stretch of ramp, merging into traffic on the interstate without slowing, one iota.

Why make it easy for the asshole, Red philosophized. There was always a good chance Keen would lose control of the car, after all. Pity if that were to happen.

“It will be fine.” Red said calmly, feeling the mounting tension in the woman’s body.

Liz inhaled deeply, easing her nervousness just as she caught a glimpse out of the corner of her eye of a flash of blue.

“You asshole!” she growled angrily as Tom came up alongside them. She flipped him off, then hastily wrapped her arm back around Red. “What the hell is he trying to do? Kill us all!”

Red chuckled low in her ear, appreciating her moxie. “He’s rather persistent, isn’t he?” he sighed, as the plan slowly fell into place. “Uh oh...”

Liz turned her head as Francis appeared out of nowhere to their left. The young man causally moved between their bike and the speeding car. He even more casually produced a weapon from the confines of his jacket... before steadying the bike, taking aim and without a seeming thought or care, he fired.

Tom’s window shattered, making the man weave dangerously on the road. Francis let off another shot and glass tinkled merrily on the pavement as the entire passenger side glass disintegrated, the jagged pieces spraying Tom’s front seat and the man himself.

Mad Dog’s men wanted to play as well evidently for several joined in on the fun. Shots from behind shattered Tom’s back glass.

“Who are these guys?” she asked in wonderment, having noted several lethal looking guns being discretely deposited back to their original hiding places.

“Veterans.” Red laughed his delight as Tom swerved radically, his car not really having the maneuvering capabilities to evade the bikers.

Mad Dog looked to Red for a clue. He, personally, wanted to chase the bastard down and make short order of the guy but Red seemed okay with just allowing him to ‘coast’.

But there was a method to such madness. Maurice could see the off ramp fast approaching. Their turn off was just meters away.
‘Blue car guy’ was already too close to make it safely but with this looney, who knew.

To ensure that eventuality not take place, Mad Dog issued a plan of his own. His guys followed instinctively.

His guys had great instincts.

He took the lead, the large Indian passing even Red’s ride easily.

Liz’s head swirled from side to side as the loud motorcade zipped up.

The convoy split effortlessly, forming a well armed line on either side of the three lone riders.

Red understood the gesture, picking up speed, barreling down the opening with Francis and Ben fast on his six.

He veered unexpectedly, shooting down the off ramp while he watched Tom Keen miss the same exit entirely.

The man crossed three lanes of traffic, his plan evident. He was going to take the next one and circle back but by then Red would have the advantage. He swore he could hear the colorful metaphors Tom must be cursing, grinning widely.

“Shit...” Liz clenched her thighs tightly, as she and Red accelerated down the ramp. Francis and Ben sped past them, coming to a light hastily, giving an all clear.

Only slightly dropping his speed, Red took the corner wide, causing the woman to squeal her dismay, before he gunned the big engines which moved them effortlessly forward yet again.

A part of the woman felt elation, it was a thrilling ride after all.

“He won’t give up so–” before the words left his mouth, Liz’s elation had turned to fury.

They got down a couple blocks, suddenly out of nowhere, the blue car came barreling towards them.

Liz had enough! She glanced down, seeing the black metal protruding from Red’s holster, she fumbled with the weapon, determination overtaking her.

“Don’t even think about it.”

“Why not!” she snapped her growing rage.

“Because Francis is coming up alongside us.” Red replied dryly. “He’s on our side... I think.” he quipped. Let’s not kill him until he does something to irritate me to the point of doing so, which should be within the hour, if I know him.”

Liz craned her head, finding Francis zooming up alongside, blocking sight of her. He aimed accurately, shooting, taking out Tom’s front glass.

Tom could be seen dodging the shot and dangerously splintering spray of glass. The car jerked hard to the right, hitting the curb erratically, coming to an abrupt and jarring stop.

“Almost home.” Red stated evenly, slowing the pace to a casual speed now.

The entrance to the driveway loomed closer. Dembe, Silas and the guys rushed towards the street. They had heard the shots, always the vigilant group, wanting in on whatever action which might be heading their way.

Red slowed, though not by much as he sped past the gathered throng, all with weapons at the ready.

Ben rolled to a stop, his hand going up in the sign of ‘victor’. He turned to a late arrival, another time coming to mind. He gestured triumphantly, his thumbs to his chest, “Winner!” he informed Francis who was just now pulling alongside. He pointed an accusing finger, “Loser!” he gloated.

Francis’ mouth fell agape, “This doesn’t count, I was shooting at a prick!” He defended his stance. “I should get points for that.”

“You do get points.” Ben graciously conceded. “But that does not take away from the fact that I am a winner,” he pointed to his chest, then back to Francis, “and you are a loser.”

Francis wasn’t about to take this sitting down, checking a higher court.

“Take it like a man Francis.” Red advised stoically, helping Liz from her perch.

She eased from the seat, with a slight grimace, her backside abuzz.

She didn’t have time to worry about aches and pains. Fifty rumbling motorcycles were following them into the spacious drive. Silas’ head man acted as parking valet.

Silas was more interested in the blue car, replete with numerous bullets holes and minus any window glass whatsoever, limping to a slow crawl outside the gate.

Mad Dog skidded to an artful stop just outside the looming gates, offering a friendly wave to Tom Keen.

“Why aren’t they shooting at him?” Liz demanded an explanation.

Red sat his helmet on the seat, turning his attention from the scene.

“I told them not to when we pulled up. This means,” He held up his fist, “don’t shoot the fucker or I will shoot you... in very painful places.”

“But–” Liz was incensed, taking on Francis’ viewpoint now that she was safe at home. “Why?!”

Red sighed, “Because Lizzy,” he put his hand on his hip, leaning into his weight, “I would like to spend just one weekend with you where there isn’t any blood shed... you think we could manage that, just once?”

Liz felt her blood pressure rise the longer he sat there. “Well, that ship has sailed.” she stared out across the driveway to find Tom Keen staring back at her with belligerent eyes, the downed guards coming to mind.

Clenching her fists at her sides, she took off at a clipped pace towards the gate.

Francis slid off his bike, quickly heading for the woman, his intent clear. A hand gripped his arm, halting him in his tracks.

The young man jerked a warning glare before seeing the culprit who would dared to intervene in any path Francis chose.

“She has to figure this out for herself.” Red reminded himself along with the man at his side. He watched Liz march angrily across the paved stones.
Silas cast a hasty check Red’s way then slowly stepped aside to allow Elizabeth towards the perimeter of the property.

“This is something she had to do alone.” Red reiterated.

Silas pointed an index finger, thumb cocked, aiming straight at Tom Keen who had exited the vehicle and now stood, waiting patiently for Liz’s arrival. Silas ‘shot’, his eyes saying so much more then the gesture ever could.

Tom sensed the guard meant the promise, for clearly, it was a promise as opposed to a threat.

Francis kept throwing tense looks Red’s way, the closer to danger Lizzy walked, he wanted to do... something, anything, but Red knew the value of patience.

In fact, all of them were tense. Though Red tried very hard not to be.

He had protected Lizzy, he had done what he could to bolster her confidence, he had shown her how a gentleman was supposed to act. How someone who truly gave a damn about you... would behave.

Now it was up to Elizabeth to decide how to handle the matter at hand.

Red watched her get ten, fifteen, twenty feet from him...all the while, nearing that fucking gate. He took a calming breath, readjusted his grip on Francis and waited.

The woman slowed, hesitating mid-step, her steps coming to a hesitant halt.

He watched her for a long moment as she glanced around, looking at the sky and trees, then back down at her feet.

Liz was listening to her inner thoughts, trying to push the anger aside. To think rationally as she knew Red would do in any given circumstances, so she glanced about the beautiful tranquility of the grounds.

She looked up at a clear blue sky and fluffy white clouds. The shade of the trees offering a cool respite from the sunny day. She pondered her feet for a goodly spell.

Red released Francis, “Give me a minute.” he told the younger man.

Stepping towards the woman, he took in the tense line of her jaw as he came alongside.

The quiet contemplation continued, but the woman had turned her profile, having heard his approach.

“I was having a good day.” she said after a long moment. “I was really enjoying it, spending time with you and...” she scuffed her toe along the ground, sighing quietly, “and now, he’s come along and ruined it.”

Red held his tongue, letting her work through the emotions. She needed to voice her thoughts. He could only hope what direction they might take.

“But it’s not just him, is it?” she suddenly realized. “It’s me too. I’m allowing him to ruin a perfectly wonderful day.”

Red felt the weight that sat on those slender shoulders. Couldn’t she have just one damn day to be... normal. To enjoy the world around her without these constant intrusions from those who wanted something from her.
While everyone else was enjoying barbeques, touch football and a day on the lake.

Lizzy was faced with the ex-husband from hell.

“He tried to kidnap me in a park filled with hundreds of people.” she fumed. “What the hell?” the small arms flew out from her side, frustration filling her to the very core.

“He embarrassed me...” she snapped her fury. “He hurt your friends!” the blue eyes flashed fire as they sought out Tom Keen.

Her small hands tightened, the slender fingers curling into the palms of her hand.

“The asshole he hit me... again.” There was pure venom in her delivery. She touched her cheek line tentatively, the white teeth clenched tightly.

Red could feel the woman boiling with anger and indignation... rightfully so.

“But he lost.” she nodded once, taking a few deep breaths, her body losing a little of that fury. “I’m home, I’m safe with Silas... and you.”

His heart swelled with a peculiar type of gratitude. He almost choked on the emotions generated by the simple statement.

Tom was sensing something amiss, she was taking too long. He stalked his way to the fence line.

Silas smiled pleasantly and Tom stopped his steps ten meters outside. Silas waved in an incongruous manner, motioning for the man to enter, but Tom was no fool. He could do what he had to from this safer distance.

“He’s mad.” Liz’s tone deadened, having watched the man. She half smiled, “No...” she corrected herself as Tom came a step closer and she could read his face, “he’s livid.”

Red side glanced the asshole, finding the boy in a fine state, indeed. He was about to blow his top and part of Red hoped he did. Tom’s face was reddened, blotchy with growing rage. He was shifting from one foot to the other, repeatedly. He was glaring at Elizabeth. He was steaming mad.

“His job is to take me to his employers and he keeps failing.” Liz quirked her head to one side. “Poor baby.” she felt nothing for the man in reality, except a certain type of loathing.

Red’s mouth lifted minutely as he watched her spine literally take shape.

Tom was confused. What the hell was going on? Why had she stopped? What was Reddington saying but... Tom knew, Red had said very little in actuality. He sensed Elizabeth needed his particular type of encouragement.

He glanced at Silas, chancing another step forward. “Liz, can we talk? Just the two of us?”

“I have two options here.” she stated quietly to herself, disregarding everything else for a moment. “I can go out there, thereby continuing this never ending cycle of lunacy,” she sighed, the slump in her shoulders returning with a vengeance, “lash out and fight, which obviously will get me nowhere...”

She lifted weary eyes to the man unwaveringly, as was his custom, looking through her.

The air was suddenly awash with the savory mix of barbequing meats, which Silas had been toiling over all morning and the pungent sweetness of blossoming flowers.
She felt a sense of peace, the weight on her shoulders lifting once more.

Her eyes suddenly unfocused, staring sightlessly at the man across the way, an unexpected tinge of excitement tickling at her.

But why?

Her subconscious mind had just made a discovery, but what?

She replayed the last few moments, thinking everything through analytically. Was this Red’s type of thought process? How he always seemed two steps ahead of everyone else. Weighing his options...

The weight...

She had felt relaxed, carefree and content all day.

Now Tom was here and her shoulders were tight. Her gut was in knots. She was agitated. She felt suffocated.

She literally felt beaten, both inside and out. Downtrodden.

Tom was a heavy burden that she felt in every fiber of her being.

Her eyes slid shut of their own accord, her senses savoring the unusually clean air, the smell of leather and the comforting scent Red’s cologne.

The sudden cognizance hit her full force.

“...Or I can take the high road.” she whispered, the strain ebbing in waves.

Red watched the process meticulously.

“He doesn’t care about me.” she had finally understood, all too well. “He never has.” she should be hurt, but she wasn’t. Just resigned to the fact, she had wasted too many years. “It’s all about the money, the power... the end game.”

The words were like music to Red’s ears.

“I can keep having a wonderful day, surrounded by my friends.” she shifted a serene glance. “I can spend time with you...”

Red’s eyes met hers, careful to show no expression, in no way swaying her thought process one way or other.

Would she lash out, confronting personal demons as was her custom, or in this instance... see the futility of such actions.

Liz searched out Tom Keen. Her own expression rather bemused. A slight smile broke through on the full lips.

“I can stay here, with you.” she repeated, another thought occurring. “While Tom has to go back and tell his Masters he fucked up again.”

Red sing-songed his head, “It won’t be the first or last time.” he reminded.

Liz nodded agreeably to the statement.
"I am validating his existence by standing here." It suddenly dawned.

The revelation shocked the man even though it was exactly what he had hoped would happen.

Red blinked once, then stilled. It was a universal signal which most, if not all, of the men present picked up on.

Blink once for yes, twice for no.

Dembe smiled gently having seen Raymond’s secret little message, one obviously missed by Elizabeth.

But Raymond, having had his say, though silently, was now totally relaxed and tension free.

Elizabeth must have conveyed her decision somehow. Tom felt his power over the woman evaporating into thin air.

He had one last ploy, usually the most effective of all. Ignoring the large looming guard, he actually retreated a few steps, his hands going out to his sides in an almost submissive manner.

His anger visibly diminished, although inside, it still simmered deep. He softened his eyes forcing a sympathetic face.

The man’s brows furrowed as the ploy seemed to fall short.

The woman shook her head disgustedly. The chameleon had adapted his skin to his new surroundings. Literally shifting personalities right before her very eyes.

“He thinks I will forget he slapped the shit out of me in front of all those people back at the park.”

She supposed that he believed the sad eyes and solemn expression would still work.

Her body tensed, the anger renewed but in the next instance having taken a few deep breaths she was able to let it go.

She smiled gently for Red Reddington.

“I’m hungry...” she announced cheerfully.

She sought out Tom Keen, one last time. She flipped the bastard off, spinning on her heels. She was symbolically turning her back on the fucker, but more importantly that chapter of her life.

Red smiled, all the worries of the incident put behind him as well. It was with great enthusiasm he loudly announced to one and all who had been waiting patiently throughout the entire introspective soul searching.

“Gentlemen, we have food on the grill.” he waved to the house, inviting her protectors inside. “Silas, show our guests the way.” he deliberately chose the large guard for such a task, glancing back, his expression a solid one.

“I’ll be right there, Boss.” Silas had other priorities. “After I take care of this guest.” he started for Tom who instinctively retreated, his survival instincts well honed.

“Silas.” Red’s word stopped the man in his tracks.

“Aw, come on!” the suggestion was met with childlike disappointment. “Are you kidding me?” Red was petulantly consulted.

Tom waited the moment out but even now, he was checking available escape routes.

“...Please,” Red knew how to get around the anger, “if you wouldn’t mind.” he extended a hand to the waiting crowd who seemed to take great delight in Silas' predicament. Especially Maurice Morrison.

“You hired me to do a job.” Silas wasn’t above pouting, Liz was stunned to see. “Why don’t you let me do it?” he gritted. “I’ve had enough of shit for brains here to last me a lifetime and now the little fucker... pardon my language ladies,” he was gentleman enough to acknowledge the ‘ladies’ gathered who all shared a good laugh over the small breach of etiquette.

“Yeah, fuck you, Silas.” one particularly out spoken lady called out jovially.

“Later, baby...” Silas dismissed with a peevish wave of his hand. “Daddy’s talking business right now.” he clearly wanted to return to the subject of disintegrating Tom Keen.

“Daddy,” Red implored the use of the colloquial term, “has a job to do, granted,” he too, waved an impervious hand, “and that is to make certain that side of beef I purchased doesn’t burn to a crisp. If it does, it comes out of your paycheck.”

“That’s damned gratitude for ya!” Silas asked commiseration from the bikers and got.... none.

“Come on man, my old lady is hungry.”

“I told her to wait.” Silas reminded innocently.

“As if she would want a scrawny scrap of a shit like you.” Mad Dog dismissed happily. “Now where’s the food?”

Silas was clearly torn. He glanced at the man outside the gate, his massive fists clenched at his sides.

Red waited patiently allowing the man his own introspective soul search.

Mad Dog sighed his understanding, sidling closer to the guard who was fighting his natural instincts.

“Next time...” the large biker murmured soothingly. “You can maim and kill the fucker.”

Silas cut stony eyes to the man beside him, the tension radiating off his bulky frame.

“Today is not that day.” Maurice murmured.

“I’m starving and you know how I get when my blood sugar drops.” Francis ended the stalemate, once and for all, drawing a short burst of amusement from Mad Dog.

“You aren’t a fucking diabetic!” Silas snapped.

“I could be.” Francis protested. “I’ve never really been tested.” he reminded plaintively. “Are you going to let me pass out? It’s up to you to take care of me if I do.”

Silas shook his head disdainfully but Francis had caught his attention. “I’d drop your ass in the East River.”

“Why drive all the way to Jersey,” it was questioned, “when the Potomac is right around the corner.”
“Mad Dog...” Francis was crushed, “I’m crushed.”

Mad Dog laughed heartily, physically going out, placing an insistent arm around Silas’ sturdy neck.

“Come on, sweetheart,” he pursed his lips, planting a sloppy kiss on the disgusted guards scruffy cheek, “I’ll let you watch me and my old lady get it on, after you feed us. A man does not live by bread alone... but it helps keep up the stamina.”

“What would you know about stamina?” Silas pushed roughly from the man’s grasp, swiping at his cheek.

“If you didn’t want to feel my soft lips, you wouldn’t have allowed it.”

“It got you to promise to let me watch you and your old lady, didn’t it.” Silas goaded.

Red was happy to see the standoff end. While he would actually pay to see Silas take Tom down a notch or two, today was not the day for such things.

Especially now that Lizzy had come to the conclusion she had concerning her former ex-husband.

Today was to enjoy life because those who were not here had given everything to ensure life was lived to the fullest and Red would be damned before he allowed anything to mar such a sacrifice.

“Francis...” Liz was saying as everyone headed into the opened front portals of the stylish glass entryway, “didn’t you just finish off two and a half turkey legs? How can you be hungry?”

“He’s a growing lad.” Red threw a grateful glance Maurice’s and Francis’ way for the ploy they had used to waylay Silas’ intent. “Shooting out glass takes a lot of energy.”

“I feel faint.” Francis nodded in agreement. “Where’s the food?” he followed the delicious aroma drifting around the house, soon disappearing through the French doors which led to the backyard patio and pool area.

“What’s he doing?” Liz had sighed lightly, turning to Red, the others filed out noisily to the food and planned entertainment.

Red had hired a live band. Liz could hear them tuning up even now, as the audience grew.

“He just sitting out there... in the car.” Red had noted Tom’s retreat.

“It must be hot.” Liz stated absently. “What with no air conditioning or... windows.”

Red shrugged, “Yeah.”

“You hired a band?” the woman turned her head to the sound. “How nice!”

“Do we need to talk?”

“Over all that?” she quipped, the ever growing din outside drowning out all else. “Do we?” she quietened a little.

“It can wait.” he decided. “Would my lady care to dance?”

The heady beat of that ‘Old Rock and Roll’ music rocked the house.

She grinned, extending her hand, her fingers grasped by his stronger ones.
“Do you even know how to dance to this stuff?” she doubted.

“Always doubting my abilities...” he tsked, leading her to the French doors which still stood opened wide. “Come on baby, learn from the Master.”

Liz chuckled her delight. Was there nothing this guy couldn’t do, she wondered.

She stepped out into a beautiful sun-filled day. Friends abounded, good food was plentiful and spread out on carefully laden tables.

It was going to be a wonderful end to an amazing day.

She wasn’t about to allow one bad incident to mar such a precious time.

She was broken from her thoughts, a sharp burst of giggles escaping her smiling face as Red twirled her about unexpectedly.

Red had been correct, he could dance. Very much so. There was something incredibly sexy about they way he moved.

Liz was going to have the time of her life.

Her relaxed and tension free disposition said as much...

♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥

After icing Lizzy’s cheek, they enjoyed hour after hour of good food and even better company.

It had been a fun afternoon of animated conversation, laughter and lively music.

The only small incident had occurred when Liz and Dembe had been slighted for slyly feeding the dog and cat table scraps. Both ignored Red’s chiding continuing to ensure the animals had a good day as well.

It was well after sundown when people reluctantly started creeping towards the exits. The men started trickling for the door, their ladies in tow, waving away Red’s attempt to compensate them for all they had contributed this day.

Best time I've had in years. We should pay you.

Call anytime, Red. Had a great time... in spite of Silas' pouting.

Glad you guys made it safely... as if there was any doubt.

Want us to set up camp out there in case the pecker wood shows his balls?

Francis, boy, you can ride!

“He sure can.”’ one cute little biker chick intoned.

Red smiled at them as they passed, shaking their hands, sending his gratitude in his own fashion. Intermittent sounds of engines revving filled the night. Liz and Red stood on the driveway as they waved their guests off into a cooling night before returning to the house.

“About today...” he turned instantly, once the room was quiet and he and Lizzy were alone. She had time to let it all sink in and process what happened. “...my behavior.”
He smoothed his thumb over her cheek, pleased to find the swelling had gone down, as well as the discoloration. There would be slight bruising, but nothing like the last time that son of a bitch hit her.

“I’ve had the best day, ever.” she smiled softly. “The rest...”

“Must be discussed.” he murmured quietly, laying a gentle kiss on the slight wound.

“Is he still out there?” her mouth twisted in wry humor. She hadn’t had time to actually check nor had she cared, truth told.

Red shrugged, pulling the radio from his belt. “Is our Mr. Keen still haunting the front gate?”

“He is.” Silas confirmed. “I hope you don’t mind, but we took the liberty of ordering Chinese for his stay.” it was informed. “Joe offered to call a windshield repair guy... does the ‘bird’ mean ‘affirmative’?” Silas asked, allowing his puzzlement. “We’re up in the air on that one.”

Red chuckled and to his surprise, Lizzy did as well. “Ever hospitable, Silas. Good man.”

“Red...” Francis came out from around the corner, followed by Ben, both hesitating in their step.
“Are we interrupting? Well, never mind.” he continued on, with Ben offering a hesitant scowl for such behavior. “We need to talk.”

“I’m staying here tonight. So is Ben.” he invited them both without further consultation.

“...Any particular reason why?” Red was interested but unconcerned. Francis was always welcome.
Seemed he knew as much without actual confirmation.

“In case that dick tries anything.” he hooked his thumb in the needed direction.

Red smiled, placing a stilling hand on the tense young man’s shoulder. “The boys are watching him.
Even ordered food delivered to his car for his stakeout.”

Francis narrowed his eyes, “Are we killing him with kindness?” he needed the game plan explained.

“Annoying him, is more like it.” Red murmured aside. “Enough about that asshole.”

Francis pouted, obviously upset they would not discuss this further.

“Francis, you know you are always welcome here. But I assure you, we’re perfectly fine. She’s safe.” he assured, “If you are to stay here, it is as a guest, nothing more.” Red held up his hand to forestall the man.

“You stay, you play. Rules of the house.” he stopped any further protest. “There are multiple guards here to ensure that is possible.”

at something.”

“Do forgive me, Francis. I wasn’t aware I was stifling your creativity.” Red replied pseudo-seriously.
“I’ll tell you what. If Tom should make it through those doors, you may fire at will... as many times as you please, to hell with the cost of ammo.”

“Since when do you buy ammo?” Francis frowned his confusion, then smiled happily when he comprehended what Red said. “Well, okay then.”
Ben seemed okay with the notion too, smiling as contentedly.

Liz frowned critically, nearing the young man, reaching to touch his bottom lip. “He hit you?”

“If he did I don’t remember it?” Francis shrugged. “He hits like a girl. No offense to girls.” he inclined his head towards Liz. “You gonna kiss it better?”

Red lifted a brow, surprised by the request even if said in a teasing manner. But he was more surprised when Lizzy stepped, stretching to caress Francis’ cheek near the small swelling point.

Red tried to halt the tense resentment filling his head.

The boy had meant nothing by the remark, he was sure.

He would have to learn to curb such unreasonable reactions where Lizzy was concerned.

He knew his reaction was stupid, childish even but he did have to admit, the emotions were within him.

Especially as Francis had unconsciously leaned into the moment, the man’s hands coming to land on the shapely hips for a beat.

It was only for counter balance, Red reminded.

Lizzy had to tip toe to reach the corner of the taller man’s mouth, to brace her palms on Francis’ chest.

There was something disturbingly erotic about the scene that Red disliked intensely. Determinedly he pushed such petty emotions aside.

“Thank you, Francis.” Liz mumbled quietly, pulling back from the man, her eyes gentle.

“He’s not gonna mess with our girl.” Francis winked, returning the cheek kiss in open affection. His mood altered rapidly however. “We’re going swimming, you?”

“I’ll be in soon.” Liz smiled at the man.

Francis and Ben headed to the pool, talking animatedly about their day as they went.

Red put his hand on her lower spine, guiding her physically back to his sphere. “If you go anywhere this week, please give Silas ample time to prepare, all right?”

She shrugged. “I’ll try to keep any trips to a minimum, and of course, I will give ample consult time.”

“You live your life, Lizzy. Don’t let Tom, or Silas for that matter, hold you back.” he said, following slowly as she traversed the corridor leading to their room. “I know it may seem a hassle to take Silas with you, but...”

“But what?” she asked, kicking her shoes off, rubbing the insole of her foot. Her leg was beginning to ache again.

“I am in no way saying that you can’t take care of yourself, I just...” he reasoned his protectiveness aside.

“I know you aren’t insulting or disrespecting me, Red.” She entered the closet, dropping her top and bottoms into the hamper, smiling back at the man. “You just worry for my well being... and that’s nice.” the woman arched a pretty brow, her head gesturing to the bastard outside. “Especially given the alternative.”

Red inclined his head, pleased that she was aware he wasn’t meaning to slight her abilities.

“For all we know,” she said, sliding into her bikini bottoms, “because Tom keeps failing, he may employ assistance.”

Red had been thinking along those lines himself, but hadn’t said anything so as not to worry her unduly.

“Maybe when I’m back on my feet I might try a jaunt to the store...” she turned her back to Red, holding up the ties of her swim top. The man dutifully tied the bows, planting a sweet kiss on her shoulder when finished, “but right now, I’d just end up getting somebody hurt.”

Red’s brow furrowed, having not followed along.

“If Tom or even Carver took off with me,” she touched his brooding mouth tentatively, kissing his bottom lip slowly, lingeringly, “you’d have the entire Eastern seaboard underground hunting for me.” her lips twitched with contained amusement.

“And if people didn’t have the answers you wanted...” she trailed off, both knowing where she was headed. “Well, you can be very determined when you wish. Has anyone ever told you that?”

Red wouldn’t argue the fact. Because that’s exactly what he’d do. “I just want you safe...”

“I know...” she smiled softly, laying a affectionate kiss on his lips. “Giving Silas an extra thirty minutes to prepare for a store run isn’t going to kill me, especially, if it doesn’t kill him.”

“He’s a bitch most of the time,” she crinkled her nose, “I can just imagine what a grump he’d be if he were shot.”

Red recalled one instance the man was shot and had to listen to him bitch for hours, not about the hole in his thigh, but that his cigarette pack had been the real victim in the skirmish.

He leaned into the counter, crossing his arms as he watched her twist her hair up into a bun.

“Sometimes I wonder, why me?” she shrugged almost playfully. “My life is so bizarre. The twists and turns of Fate, hum?” she sought him out.

“Now, are you going to come out and watch us frolic?” she asked, grabbing a towel from the pantry.

Red grinned and pushed off the counter, “I am, yes.”

She knew better than to ask if he was joining them. He was not ready for such an eventuality. So she had backed off... when he felt more secure, maybe he might feel more relaxed with the things life had thrown him. But that clearly, was for a later time.

Right now, she was just glad he was coming out to spend time.

Lizzy floated in the foam lounge chair, immersed in the warm water of the pool. She lay back comfortably gazing at the night sky.
It was a clear, hot night and the stars were out in the black void of the heavens.

She mentally traced the twinkling outline of the Big Dipper.

She felt one with the Universe.

Outside these walls, a real world awaited but for the moment, it felt wonderful to drift along, her cares muddled and far away.

Vaguely, she was aware of Francis passing on another side of the large pool, his powerful strokes slashing the water effortlessly.

Ben had long since vacated the water, preferring to lounge around, enjoying a drink with Red and Dembe on the adjoining lanai.

“You’re going to get ‘pruny’. Silas stopped by on his way to join the men under the covered patio area. “And you know I will definitely poke fun at you for the fact.”

Liz pulled a face and stuck out her tongue.

“There are so many better things to do with that little fly trap.” he chided. “But I’m sure he has taught you all about those by now.” he crooked his head in Red’s direction.

“Don’t you ever think about anything else?” Liz sighed her discontent.

“Not really, no.” Silas replied.

“Look at the stars... look at the heavens.” she implored, hoping he would pick up on her philosophical mood.

Silas obeyed, scanning God’s creative abilities absently. “There are probably all sorts of drones zeroed in on us at this very moment.”

Liz allowed her head to fall back, a disgruntled sound escaping. “You are hopeless.”

“Really? Because the little blonde morsel I had last night said–”

“Go away...” Liz groaned, “Let me be reflective in peace.”

“No, you’ll be interested in this...”

“Red!” she pouted. “He’s ruining my Zen moment.”

Red sighed woefully, knowing that tone. “Silas...” he beckoned, his voice holding an entirely different tone.

The man had done his duty, well pleased he had managed to annoy the woman yet again. He continued on his trek, shortly taking a seat next to Red Reddington.

“You off for the night?” Red knew the man needed solitude. This day was always hard on Silas.

He would spend the next few weeks trying to forget... to not think. The days would pass in a blur of whiskey shots and faceless women.

It was an annual pilgrimage Red had grown to expect and had anticipated, having already made provisions for Lizzy’s safety.
Silas was quiet for an unusual moment. He watched Francis slip up under Liz’s longue chair before upending the woman into the water.

He chuckled lowly for the antics as Liz arose from the pool like a Grecian Goddess bent on retribution. She smacked Francis hard... very hard... with a large inflatable rubber ducky float Francis had purchased online.

The duck wore cool Ray-Ban’s and a devil-may-care attitude which spoke to Silas.

The rubber split with the impact, a high, wheezing sound pitifully escaping the dying duck.

“You killed Buzzy!” Francis gasped his horror.

“Be glad I didn’t kill you!” Liz grated. “Though the night is still young...” she growled.

“She keeps hitting me for no reason.” Francis had swum to the edge of the pool to explain his predicament. He frowned at the limp pool float in his hand, sighing his woe.

“Yes...” Red nodded minutely. “I saw the entire episode.” the man’s brow arching.

“Oh...” Francis took the news exceedingly well, lifting his well toned body out of the pool, traipsing across the still warm concrete absently. He jerked a towel off the nearby chairs, “then never mind.”

Silas’ grin widened.

“It’s all right, Silas.” Red returned to the previous subject, “we can spare you... take as long as you need.”

The man looked to Dembe for some obscure reason.

“We understand, old friend.” Dembe inclined his head, the faint accent lending a lyrical quality to his words.

Silas remained quiet... pensive.

“You worried about our little visitor outside?” Red thought he had hit on the reason for Silas’ hesitation.

“He’s asleep.” Silas informed one and all. “Probably resting up for what he thinks will be an eventful night... nah, my guys can handle him.”

“Do not underestimate an opponent.” Dembe advised regally.

“Just know my own capabilities, especially with one so utterly stupid.” Silas explained.

The guard watched Liz rearrange her raft and climb back on, stretching out lazily again. “She needs me.”

“She needs... him.” Francis pointed.

Red scowled to be the sudden center of attention.

“Hey, boss....” Silas’ instincts picked up on the direction Francis was heading. “You want we should vacate so you and your little cock pocket can share some quality time?”

“Quaintly put...” Dembe shook his head slightly, which signified his disapproval.
Silas’ good humor had returned, “We know you’ve been needing a good—”

“Silas...” Red warned. He didn’t know if Lizzy could hear the conversation but he wasn’t going to take any chances.

“Moment to exchange...” Silas rephrased.

“Bodily fluids?” Francis added helpfully.

“...A cultural reciprocal of ideas and life harmonies.” Silas halted, stunned into silence, his own rhetoric amazing even himself.

Dembe scowled deeply at Silas’s statement, a noble brow lifting disconcertingly.

Francis went back to his drink for solace. “I liked mine better.”

“On that sad note,” Ben arose, “I shall take my leave with gratitude for a ‘harmonious’ day well spent with good companions and... Francis.”

Francis waved his drink dangerously about, the liquid rimming the edge. “My room is the one on the right, remember.”

“You’ve only told me fifty times.” Ben called back over his shoulder. “What’s so special about that room?”

“I can hear almost everything that goes on in Red’s room.” the man shrugged. “Must be the vent...” he muttered absentmindedly.

“Oh...” Ben nodded his understanding, “you want to be on the alert for the douche bag out front, if anything goes down tonight.”

Francis was confused for a beat, “Eh... ok, sure.”

It was Ben’s turn to be confused.

“Don’t.” Red sighed heavily. “Best to just let it go... trust me,” he advised.

Dembe shook his head disapprovingly once more, his look a stern one for Francis Holbrook.

“What?” Francis staunchly defended himself. “Wouldn’t you want to learn from the best if you had the chance?”

“Then you should be rooming next to Dembe.” Silas stated quietly.

“Thanks...” Red took umbrage. “Dembe, what is it about you that women find so irresistible?”

“Perhaps it is the fact that he reciprocates the feeling.” Silas surmised.

“Why the hell are you so philosophical tonight?” Francis wanted to know.

“She started it.” Silas smiled mirthlessly, then sighed. “Yeah, I wonder...” he fell silent.

Red signaled the others to ‘let it go’.

“So, Silas, the barbeque was a success, thanks to your incredible ‘secret sauce’,” he began, “thank you for staying behind and lending Nora a much needed hand.”
Silas cast him a bemused look, “I should be thanking you, man.”

“What the hell is going on?” Francis was lost. This was the first holiday he had spent with Red and the guys. His friendship with Lizzy had meant an all exclusive invitation this year.

Silas seemed odd... off-kilter. Something was up and Francis hated being kept out of the loop.

“Nothing, kid.” Silas arose, his shoulders lacking a little of the usual starch. “Look Red, if it’s really okay... maybe I will take a day or two.”

He hesitated, “The guys can handle–”

“Silas,” Red halted the man, “go, we will be fine.”

“Go my friend.” Dembe insisted. “I will find you if you are needed.”

Silas nodded then exited slowly, his massive frame moving into the shadows of the night with no further word or even a glance back.

Francis was more than confused. “Did I say something wrong... again?”

“No.” Red smiled gently at the young man. “He does this sometimes, this is a... difficult time of the year for some.”

“Oh, you mean like Christmas.” the man instantly cringed realizing he had just inadvertently reminded Red of the time of year that his family had disappeared.

Red acted as if he did not pick up on the fact.

“Survivors guilt.” Ben stated, sensing Silas’ predicament and Francis’. “Can we do something?”

“Man...” it was Francis’s turn to fall silent, for all of two seconds. “I’m sorry, Red. I should learn to keep my big mouth shut.”

“He will be fine, he just has some demons to fight.” Red had tried, in the beginning to offer any type of assistance he could but he came to the realization, it was something one could not ‘help’.

Truth told, each year was proving more and more uncertain. Last Memorial Day, Silas disappeared for two weeks and no one could search him out.

Red used every avenue open to him and still Silas showed up looking like death itself has taken a tumble with the man.

Hollowed cheeks, haunted eyes... he had lost weight, his usually immaculate clothing appeared as if he hadn’t changed since his departure. A full growth of grey and white stubble covered a haggard face.

Silas had been through his own particular type of hell.

Red hadn’t been certain how to handle the issue but he had taken his cue from Dembe who had greeted Silas as if he had only been gone a few moments.

In the days following, slowly the old Silas started to emerge from whatever cesspool he had been wallowing in.

And every year, thereafter, a ritual of sorts was born. Silas was the epitome of efficiency and grace under fire most days.

Could Red really fault the man for a small lapse? A tiny chink in the shining armor.

He didn’t, nor would he ever.

He was only grateful to have the man back or more importantly, that Silas chose to return.

And then life would go on.

Red had demons himself. He understood all about being haunted by ghosts of his past.

He looked out over the pool, pleased to see Lizzy dragging her raft to dock. She had played enough for one night.

Francis crossed, lifting the cumbersome float clear, sitting it alongside the surrounding greenery with his own dead rubber ducky.

Red mused quietly, watching the two converse.

His own demons seemed, for the most part, kept at bay these days and he knew it was because of his new formed association with the woman across the way.

He had never felt so comfortable or natural with another female.

Oh, he had women in the past, of course. It would be unnatural had he not. And he could truthfully say that most, if not all, had satisfied him in bed.

Lately, there was a emptiness inside, however, one he could not label. An illusive something that was missing.

That something, as it turned out, was Elizabeth Scott Keen.

He realized, in effect, that he had just been going through the motions with the others, playing a role expected of him.

When had it all changed?

He smiled as Elizabeth neared, absently arising to seat her in one of the vacant chairs.

He could smell the fresh scent of lavender. She always spread the delicious smelling lotion on after her quick rinse down at the outdoor shower area.

Red pulled his attention from the soft curve of her neckline. She liked to be kissed just right there, where the shoulder met the lovely slope.

If he breathed out, warming the flesh, he could usually illicit a soft moan of arousal.

Francis was babbling on and on, some tale about a bar fight gone wrong. Red preferred to look at the vision seated next to him.

Soft tendrils were escaping Liz’s carefully arranged top-knot. The silk moved gently in the slight breeze. They framed her face, softening the line.
She laughed musically, the sound like tinkling ice in a fresh glass of lemonade.

Red so enjoyed that laugh. She so seldom... no, that was no longer so. Liz’s laughter was a constant these days.

She had grown accustomed to this place, the people who frequented it. She liked them all and was liked in return.

Was she considering this her true home finally?

Red hoped as much. And even though the outside world, at times, intruded upon the sanctuary the man had built for her, Liz still was able to maintain her perspective.

She still had good days, good times. Red would see to it those continued, no matter the obstacles or set backs... or price paid.

The woman’s body held a certain mystique for him.

His eyes slid delicately over the curve of her breast. The bikini top had moved slightly allowing him to take note of the darker tan line.

“Are you undressing her with your eyes?” Francis had watched the man now for some few moments, having actually stepped back, allowing someone else to take center stage.

Liz halted her own tale from college days, glancing at the man seated beside her. “He is talking about me, right?” she demanded confirmation.

All attention turned to a slightly disoriented individual.

“I was... musing.” Red corrected. “And of course, he meant you. Who else would I be undressing with my eyes.”

“Dembe is a fine specimen.” Liz reminded tongue and cheek.

“He is that.” Red agreed. “But I’ve seen him sans clothing, the picture was titillating, granted. But evidently I don’t swing that way.”

“You told Maurice that you swing to the left.” Liz had excellent recall abilities.

“I told him I hang to the left.” Red scolded.

“There’s no doubt in my mind, that he prefers chicks.” Francis scoffed. “If he were a Vampire, he would have sucked you dry in seconds, the way he was ogling your neck.”

“I never do anything in seconds.” Red was positive. “And don’t be bringing Vampires or Zombies into this conversation.”

“I’m just saying, if we are holding you back from any debauchery you had planned...” Francis magnanimously offered.

“Well I didn’t want to upset your delicate sensibilities...” Red sighed.

“What sensibilities?” Liz wanted to know.

“Hey, I’m a sensitive guy.” Francis stated for the record. “But I would really like to see you suck her face.”
“Why the hell do I feel like I’m back in Marcie Breckman’s basement playing spin the bottle?” Red grumbled.

“Would you like to do that?” Francis asked excitedly.

Red’s eyes darkened.

“Do I take that as a, no?” Francis asked, slightly deflated, much like his rubber ducky.

“Would you like to go get an ice cream?” Red turned to the woman unexpectedly. His question an earnest one.

“Uh,” Liz was a little taken aback, “I thought we were going to have sex?” she checked with Francis to make sure.

“That is a given on any day or night.” Red was not adverse to the idea. “But right now, my aspirations run to a more lofty goal.”

“Sure...okay.” she was flexible. “Is anything open? It’s a holiday.”

“I know a couple places...” Red assured. “Go get dressed, I’ll meet you back here.”

A few minutes later they rolled up to the moving gate. The woman looked over her shoulder. The usual guard was conspicuously absent.

“The guards aren’t going?” she was flabbergasted.

“No...” He stopped at the edge of the drive, looked right, then sighed as he looked left.

“But,  Tom...” she grimaced her disappointment.

“He can’t go either.” Red replied, as they rolled past the man who sat ostensibly as they passed. “We don’t need a third wheel on our date.”

She heard Tom’s engine turn over as they rounded the first corner.

“No.” she shook her head. “He’ll just cramp your style.” She did secretly wonder how Red would get rid of the pest, however.

Red raised her hand, kissing her fingers, then winked. “Get comfortable, sweetheart.” he advised. “It’s going to be a bumpy ride.”

She settled into the seat, smiling as he pushed on the gas, pulling far ahead of their shadow.

Liz looked in her side mirror as Red took yet another corner, before laying on the gas, furthering the gap between them and Tom.

As she got more comfortable with Red’s ability to drive, the man maneuvered his way through the streets like something she had seen in a Steve McQueen movie.

She giggled as they fishtailed around a cul-de-sac. Her laughter increased to pure joy as the man expertly hooked the wheel, sending them into a spin which landed them pointing in the direction they had just come from.

Where had he learned to drive like this?
Red punched the gas, speeding past Tom as he headed directly toward them but at the last minute Red swerved avoiding a possible collision.

Red had a straight shot of several blocks while Tom was left to maneuver a difficult turn around. Taking another tight corner into an alley, Red shut down the lights, leaving them completely in the dark. He spun the car around, quickly backing into a loading dock area... then waited.

Moments later, Tom came creeping by, looking every which way available, before slamming his hands on the steering wheel, in open frustration, obviously pissed.

Red chuckled quietly, his eyes crinkling with his amusement. He shook his head, shrugging slightly over the other man's lack of skills.

He craned his head, following the man's path until Tom's car was out of sight. Red settled back, then searched out the woman beside him.

"Now, I said something about ice cream, didn't I?"

"You did." she grinned, more than impressed with this man's skills.

A short time later, they were loaded down with their sweet treats and back in the car.

"Are we going home?" she asked, licking at the small drips which had already managed their way down the side of her cone.

"I thought we could take a walk along the river?" he suggested instead.

"That sounds nice."

Red meandered through the streets, as they quietly concentrated their efforts on the fast evaporating cones.

The spot he chose was quiet, with only a few late night visitors milling about. They leisurely strolled down the decorative brick pavers until arriving at the boardwalk.

"This area is closed." she had noticed the signs as they approached.

"Yes, which is why I chose it." he took her hand, helping her over a particularly difficult slope in the grass which led to a walking path.

She impulsively took a long lick from his ice cream.

"Don't leave it hanging out there, if you don't want to share." she wrinkled her nose playfully.

"If you really are in the mood to lick something..." he let that hang in the air for a spell.

"When you mix them together it tastes like caramel." she ignored his insinuation, her cone held up as a peace offering. Red took a bite, shrugging.

"It does." he agreed.

"I'll have you know, Red Reddington," she did finally allude to his mischievous remark, "that I don't feel comfortable doing that here." he was summarily informed. "It is always an option for later, if you're interested."

"Oh, I'm interested." she was assured.
She squeezed the hand in hers as they walked the deserted path. “It’s pretty out tonight.” she had taken note.

“It is, nice breeze, quiet.” Red agreed, allowing the move away from the more controversial subject. They walked another couple of minutes, their hands swinging together comfortably. Red gestured to a bench, guiding her to it before sitting.

“You like the water, don’t you?” she looked up at him, smiling softly, the warm breeze catching her freed hair.

“What makes you think so?” He was quietly evasive

“The only time you go quiet, is when you’re near it.” she remarked, just as evasively.

“Was that your polite way of saying, I talk too much?” he prompted.

Liz giggled quietly, slapping his thigh softly. “No.” She crossed her legs, turning towards him. “I didn’t mean to profile you.” she sought him out, suddenly embarrassed for some reason, “you just seem so at peace... so something.” she sought the word.

“I like the sound of the water.” he quelled her awkwardness. “I find it soothing.” he replied softly. “Much more tranquil than me blathering on about something trivial.”

“You never blather.” she disagreed with his assessment. “Do you miss it?”

He looked out over the glassy sheen of the water, staring at the lights shimmering in the dark ripples off in the distance.

“Miss what?”

Liz sighed heavily, signifying he had said something amiss.

“I was never one to get much sleep. A couple hours at most.” he conceded, actually answering the question. “Sometimes... at night, I would go out on deck and listen to the water, watch the swells.”

He held out his ice cream silently amused when she didn’t hesitate to accept the offer. Red stretched his legs out in front of him, leaning more comfortably into the bench. “If we were lucky, we would be moving off into an approaching storm.”

“Why is that a good thing?” it hadn’t sounded like it to her.

“The seas were more alive.” there was a wistfulness to the man’s manner.

Liz watched Red’s shoulders loosen slightly, “The sea spray, the clean air, the heavy wind.” his eyes fluttered shut, his chin lifting as though he could actually feel the salty mist on his face. “It was very relaxing.”

“It helped you sleep?” she didn’t want to disturb the moment.

“... Yes.”

“You do realize you’d be a pirate back in the day.” she munched happily around her cone, the image not at all disagreeable to her way of thinking.
Red guffawed quietly, “Oh, most certainly.” he chuckled. “I do love getting my hands on some good... booty.”

Liz tried, she really did, to not laugh. “What a filthy scoundrel.” she tsked. “Ravishing those innocent virgins.”

Red grinned his amusement, “I really need to read more of your books.” he shifted, laying his arm along the back of the bench, allowing Lizzy to inch closer to him. “Are you cold?”

“A little bit.” she held up her half eaten cone as to the ‘why’ of the matter.

“You want to go now?”

“Not yet...” she begged off.

It was so rare they had quiet time. Just the two of them, where he talked about his past, especially. She wasn’t ready for it to end just yet.

Red gestured her closer, wrapping his arm around her then patted his thighs. “Put your legs over.”

Liz scooted closer, settling her legs over his, instantly feeling his heat as his hand rubbed against her legs, warming the surface. He fell silent for a moment, getting lost in his thoughts.

“You’re thinking.” she popped the last of her ice cream in her mouth, sighing her disappointment. His half eaten cone entered her line of sight.

“If I don’t eat it, it will just go to waste.” She took the treat, diving in. “This is one leftover I can not save for Francis.”

Red chuckled softly allowing the moment to pass. He returned his attention to the dark murky waters for a goodly while.

“What did you say to Jack?” he prompted.

“I... thanked him.” she replied just as pensively. “For his service... for taking care of you.”

Red tilted his head, looking at her, then nodded. “I’m glad I got to spend as much time as I did with him.”

“Was he...” she hesitated, unsure if it was a direction she should take, “was he dating anyone?”

“He was, yes.” Red recalled the dark haired woman who visited... afterwards. She had been crying at the kitchen table with his mother. It was a visual he would never forget.

Jack had been a skirt chaser for his first two tours. Probably fucking everything he could in a hundred mile radius to keep from becoming truly enmeshed in a relationship.

But after his second tour, he had met her... Rachel.

Having been in Jack’s shoes himself, Red knew Jack figured, having survived two tours of duty and not intending to re-up for another, he could safely get seriously involved with someone.

Rachel was from a military family and understood the call of duty...

Red vaguely remembered hearing Jack talking to his father about asking the woman to marry him. Red always wondered if Jack had actually gotten around to posing the question?
Because shortly afterwards, Jack had received word that a buddy of his had tripped a booby trap and lost not his life, but he had lost the use of his limbs.

In retaliation, Jack impulsively re-upped, intent on nothing more than payback.

While Rachel wasn’t happy, she had understood. She had stood by him.

Red recalled every time she came over to the house. She would often share a letter from Jack before her and Red’s mother would set off to the kitchen, to bake Jack cookies or some other treat.

Only in this case, the third time had not been a charm.

As the year had slowly dragged on, Rachel had stayed faithful, determined and supportive.

And then they got the news.

Red carried that with him, even to this day.

Jack had been just twenty eight days away from his “wake up call” and died. And it had crushed Rachel.

They had been so close to sharing their lives, making a family...

And it was ripped away in the blink of an eye.

“Did she ever marry, do you know?” Liz’s voice seemed far away, distant.

Red was shocked to realize, he had just voiced all of that, out loud.

“I lost touch with her. Or maybe, she moved on.” Red shook his head. “I really don’t remember. I assume she did. She was only twenty four.”

“I don’t know how she...” Liz stared off into the water herself, “it must have been incredibly painful.”

“Time heals all...”

Liz thought the man sounded rather aloof for a second, but the truth of the matter was, he was right.

In the short few weeks without Tom invading her space, she felt completely different about the man. She felt differently about a great many things...

But now she saw how unhealthy and damaging their relationship had been and all she wanted now, was for Tom to leave her alone.

She wanted something more for her life than... she didn’t want to dwell on this anymore.

Liz wiped her hands on her napkin, symbolically washing her hands of the mess.

Enough.

“I’m glad you brought me.” she leaned into the man, hugging him.

Red craned his head, laying a soft kiss on her brow in response.

“I’ve had a nice time.” she glanced up, kissing his cheek.
“So have I.” And he had. It was so simplistic an outing. But he could tell, Liz meant what she said. She had just enjoyed their time together.

It was quite a change from Madeline Pratt say, who always said she could never be truly happy if not surrounded by luxuries of every sort, lavished with gifts from admirers and especially if there were not a new car sitting in her garage every Christmas morning.

He looked over at Lizzy, his mouth lifting slightly. “Actually, I’ve had one of the best days of my life.”

And then, her mouth was on his.

As a man, Red really enjoyed that she made the first move. Not only because she was comfortable enough to do so, but it solidified that they were a couple.

The man’s large hand slid under the heavy, dark tresses. His fingers carding through the soft strands before settling her small head in his palm. He felt her absently playing with a button on his vest.

Edging closer to him, Liz sighed happily as the hand on her rib cage slid upward, the large palm encompassing her breast.

“Ahem.” a throat cleared behind them, as a flash of light skirted over their bodies. “A little old too be necking in public, aren’t you folks?” a man in a officers uniform was suddenly looming over the pair.

“Why is everyone disparaging about my age.” Red winced when the man’s high beam flashlight waved his way, he was more disconcerted by the fact he had not heard the man’s approach.

“He means...” Liz drawled, “we’re just having a date night, Officer.” she explained, then flushed, “not that we would have... I mean...”

Red folded his arms, settling back on the bench allowing the woman to work her way out of the situation herself.

The officer jerked his head back, enlightenment setting in.

“Ah, getting away from the kids.” that concept he could understand.

Red patted Liz’s arm consolingly, holding his amusement. “Our little Francis just never gives us a minute alone, does he, honey?”

Liz dropped her face into her hands, hiding her embarrassment.

“He tells us continuously that we kiss, every five minutes.” Red stressed the words, accentuating them with an eye roll.

The officer chuckled, “My little boy does the same thing.” he clicked off his flashlight, letting it hang by his side. “Only, I get the gagging face along with it.”

Red chortled, truly amused by the statement. “And of course, they want to know why you kiss mommy so much.”

“If they only knew.” the other man winked playfully. “This section of the park is usually closed this time of night, but...” he checked the surrounding area to see if other offenders were about, “I’ll let you slide, just this once.”

Red tightened his hold on Liz, patting her knee. “Thank you, this is our first date night out in
“Have a good night.” the officer smiled, then walked off, only to hesitate a few steps away. “Just for future reference, there’s a area off down a mile or so,” he pointed in the proper direction, “a thicket that is sort of a designated adult only spot that we meticulously avoid.”

“Oh my God...” Liz whispered into her hands.

“Thank you very much for the information Officer Peters.” Red replied seriously having noted the man’s name plate earlier.

Red watched the man get to the corner of the building, then look back at them, throwing up a quick ‘thumbs up’ to Red before turning the corner, vanishing from sight.

He laughed quietly, then out right chuckled when Lizzy groaned into her hands.

“I haven’t been caught necking since the tenth grade.”

“Well, you know...” Red teased in his own manner, “they say history repeats itself.”

She tsked, swatting him playfully. He arose his humor still high, offering his hand.

They walked the short distance to the car, hands clasped, until they reached the passenger side door.

“So, you want to go neck in the car, baby?” he stared down at her half hoping she would take him up on the ridiculous notion.

“Not that it doesn’t sound like a thrill.” she rolled her eyes as the man opened the door for her.

“Could’n’t we just go home and make love in our own bed?”

“That does sound more enticing than having a gear shift rammed up my ass.” the man conceded.

“Or mine...” she mentioned in passing.

Red hesitated to close the door a moment, visualizing Lizzy riding him in the car, naked. Suddenly wondering if he had grown a touch of auto-erotica.

“Why are we not doing this again?” he questioned.

“Because we have a big comfortable bed awaiting us at home.” she hoped that was the reason.

Red nodded quickly, “Right, yes.”

He closed the door, walking to the driver’s side. After situating himself, he hesitated visibly.

“Don’t tell Silas and the guards about that spot.” it was advised. “I have to wonder how much bail money I would be out if they knew.”

“Damned peeping perverts.” she was in total agreement with his assessment.
When I started Focal Point it was with the hope that someone out there in the Cosmos would take a look and understand the story I was hoping to convey.

Given this is the time of year when we are to look back and reflect... I find myself doing just that.

I wanted to take a moment to thank all the readers who stayed with the story through this past year.

I can’t believe how blessed I am to have met such wonderful and supportive people. Your encouragement has meant the world to me.

I wanted to thank you personally for making an amateur writer’s dream come true...

Most importantly, I need to express my heartfelt gratitude for the donations given to St. Jude’s Children’s Hospital. There can be no better gift or better people who give it, in my humble opinion.

Hope everyone had the best Christmas ever and each of you made some happy memories.

Have a Happy New Year!

Daniel

May 25

After their return home, Red was met by a very determined and very large, black man.

“Why did you allow him to follow Elizabeth?” Dembe had finally voiced the doubt on everyone’s mind.

Red knew instantly that he could not side-step the issue any longer. Dembe had a valid concern, of course.

“Keep your enemies close...” Red reminded. “I know where he is, I know what he’s up to, Dembe.”

“It must go deeper.”

Red turned away, not certain he wanted to get into it. It had been a nice day... so far.

“I know you.” Dembe persisted. “Are you hoping he will try something stupid that one of us, or preferably you, will be justified in putting an end to him?”

Red sipped his scotch slowly, taking his time in cultivating an answer. “Would it be so bad?”

“I do not know.” Dembe conceded. “But neither do you. You have withheld any harm to the man because of how Elizabeth might react to you.”

Dembe knew how Red thought and the man did not deny the statement for clearly, it had not been an accusation.

“So many times, Raymond, in the past,” Dembe continued, “the opportunity presented itself and each time, you hesitate.”

Red knew all this, sitting his drink aside.

“Do not allow your concern for Elizabeth’s reaction, to get you killed, I beg you my friend.”

Red was silent.

“Do you think he will hesitate to do so?”

Red shook his head minutely, “...No.”

“No, he will not because he believes you are Satan when it comes to Elizabeth’s welfare. Never mind he has been hired to do a job.” Dembe dismissed with a curt wave of his hand. “It would do irreparable harm to the woman were she to lose you at this stage. I implore you...”

Red turned his head, seeking the man out for the words had both pleased and shocked him.

“If the choice must be made, allow me to make it,” Dembe requested, his eyes quiet. “I am in a much more unencumbered position to do so... are you in agreement?”

“You believe Elizabeth...” Red didn’t know how to state something so very personal, “...that I am, good for her? In some fashion?”

“In every fashion.” Dembe never minced words. “I had my doubts in the beginning, as you know... but now,” the man shook his head, “those doubts no longer exist.”

Red swallowed a lump in his throat, hastily glancing aside, needing time to master his emotions. He had not realized how much the other man’s approval had meant.

Dembe, unbeknownst to the man, had become, over the years, Red’s conscious.

At times Red wondered if he ever possessed one, on occasion. There were moments, more and more of late, where he was beginning to feel things he had long ago put aside.

Emotions that got in the way of things he must do to survive out in this icy world of reality that had been forced upon him so many decades ago.

“...It means a great deal, Dembe,” Red could admit, if only to this man, “that you think that now.”

Dembe inclined his head, the dark eyes observing Red critically. “You must not allow Tom Keen to come between what you have created for Elizabeth and yourself.”

“I’m trying to walk that tight rope.” Red acknowledged.

“You are too close to the matter, Raymond.” Dembe advised quietly. “Today, you lost perspective, did you not?”

Red was losing patience, not sure he was enjoying this dressing down although usually, he took them in his stride because always.... always, Dembe was the voice of reason.
“All right, fine.” he waved an impatient hand. “Maybe I allowed my anger to sway my judgement a bit.”

“And when Silas would have ended the obstacle once and for all, you deliberately tied his hands.” Dembe wasn’t going to let this go.

“Elizabeth wasn’t ready for Silas’ particular brand of ending an obstacle.” Red felt called upon to defend his decision. “Did you see her face?”

“I did.” Dembe replied eloquently. “Perhaps what you mistook concern for Tom Keen, as something it was not.”

“Like what?” Red practically snapped.

“Like, concern for Silas.”

Red’s face must have said it all.

“We know Silas’ level of competency exceeds the norm.” Dembe pointed out. “Elizabeth, she only knows what she has seen, which is very little in comparison to what we have seen where Silas is concerned, yes?”

Red was given pause for thought.

“All right, granted but she still is not ready for Tom Keen to be ended.”

A polite way of saying something that wasn’t even discussed in polite circles.

Ended. What a nice way to put it. Red wondered who had originated the euphemism? Antonio Crocetti, probably. The guy had class, if nothing else.

“Which is what Silas would have done.”

Dembe did not argue the point, “It is very likely for the best. Keen will not try anything here.”

The cup of coffee was lifted to his lips as he sipped the iced brew. “He has her under surveillance, he can afford to relax for the moment.”

“And we have him.” Red felt better knowing where the little fucker was and what he was up to.

“The stalemate will not last.” Dembe reminded. “His Superiors will expect results sooner rather than later.”

Red nodded absently. “When the time comes,” and the man knew it would, “I will take full responsibility. I don’t want any bad feelings between you and Elizabeth.”

Dembe clearly did not approve of the statement.

“Please observe my wishes on this matter, Dembe.” Red asked. “I trust her only to you if something should happen.”

Dembe lifted his head, keeping his thoughts private.

“Listen,” Red wanted to speak of more pleasant things, it had been a relatively good day. Why end it otherwise, “why don’t you take an evening out to enjoy yourself? Make use of the safe house? It will do you some good, my friend.”
Dembe declined the offer politely. “The off-duty guards and I have elected to watch the Super Bowl game we missed while dealing with your insane off-shore prison scheme.”

“Luther Braxton?” Red questioned.

“Was there another off-shore prison scheme you were involved with set during the Super Bowl that I am not privy to?”

“Dembe, I do believe you are garnering a rather dry sense of humor.” Red enjoyed the jibe to his rather dubious plan. “Go, enjoy your evening.”

“And Tom...” Dembe questioned.

“He can’t join you.” Red managed with a perfectly straight face. “And he get’s no more snacks on my dime.”

“Not very generous.” Dembe pointed out. “Say goodnight to Elizabeth for me, please.”

Red watched the large shouldered man walk away. He moved with a grace of a panther. Few knew what truly lurked beneath the seemingly mild-mannered demeanor Dembe portrayed.

But Red knew and the fact somehow made him feel more secure.

After his nightly ablutions, Red climbed into bed, a rather pleasant weariness settling about his frame. He could hear Lizzy rustling about in the master bath.

Why did it take that woman so long to do something so simple. But the end product was well worth the wait, in his opinion.

He stretched luxuriously, reminiscing about the last twenty-four hours. It had been an eventful day.

Whatever had possessed him to suggest such a common place thing as going out for an ice cream? He usually could come up with something totally original, off-the-wall entertainment. He recalled one such outing with a young lady of his acquaintance which ended the evening at a sky-diving establishment.

Needless to say, even though the woman was game right up to that point of actually diving out of the plane... she did not return his calls the next day.

The memory brought a smile.

Red’s thought’s turned to Jack Reddington.

After all this time, given a chance to say a proper farewell had meant a great deal.

His friends, especially Lizzy, had seemed interested and sympathetic to his loss. He had appreciated that fact.

And Lizzy... a shoulder to lean on, a hand to hold... there had been something special about that little hand tucked inside his today that he had truly needed.

To keep the fallen foremost in one’s thoughts, was a difficult task, for life was meant to be lived.
But what did it say about someone who could blithely sail through that life with no serious contemplation or thought to those who had sacrificed their life, their good times, their together forever moments with family, friends... so that another person could go on in his or her stead.

It boggled Red’s mind that such people existed. So wrapped up in their own little sphere, they truly could not grasp such a moving, eloquent gift.

Red always thought his father one of those individuals.

His father. Richard Reddington.

Great military mind, strict disciplinarian, soulless, empty vessel of a man...

Bastard.

A part of Red loved his father, they say every child needs that.

The antagonist, cold, aloof, unapproachable fucker had, over the years, turned that emotion into pure hatred, trumping any affection Red might have given.

It had been him and his mother, a team, united against the world.

They had developed a system, a rapport. A mutual respect.

Then his father came home, throwing everything into chaos and disorder.

For a military family, the break in scheduling was unsettling. What had run like a well oiled machine was quickly thrown into a lurch because Richard Reddington had a better way of running things.

At least, to his way of thinking.

Until of course Jack had let him know in his own special way, what he thought of Richard’s way of doing things.

An argument had ensued, a mother of one. Red had secretly enjoyed the way Jack handled the situation. Taking Red’s mother’s side, telling Richard how wrong the man was to try forcing his methods and beliefs on someone else. Without even having put in the time or effort to learn, if the system already in place, worked.

The bathroom door opened, bathing the room in light, breaking Red from his thoughts.

Red’s eyes followed Lizzy as she shut the light off with her elbow while smoothing lotion over her hands and arms as she walked to the bed.

He rolled to his side, grasping the blankets, pulling them back for her. He smiled softly and the woman smiled right back.

She absently situated herself in bed, rubbing the last of the lotion into her knees and those long shapely legs.

“I’m really glad you came home today.” she said, sliding between the blankets Red was pulling up over her.

“As am I.” he felt a surge of contentment as her naked form slid along his own warm, solid one. “I missed you very much.”
“I missed you too.” she rolled over, slinging her leg over his thigh, getting comfortable.

Red smiled down at the little head laying on his chest, then drifted in the silence, absently stroking her back.

“You’re thinking again.” she stated quietly. She was beginning to know his ‘moods’.

Red had tried without success to think of other subjects, but one kept looming overhead. “I was thinking about my father.”

The way he said the word, father, was anything but warm.

“Why did you say it like that?” she lifted her head to seek out his gaze. “Was your dad–”

“An asshole? Yes, he was.”

“I didn’t mean to pry.” she wondered if that were a true statement.

“Too strict?” she questioned sympathetically, laying back into her comfortable spot, snuggling into his shoulder.

“No, that I didn’t mind.” he could appreciate discipline. “Kids appreciate structure whether they know it or not.” he sighed lightly, pausing for a long beat. “No, he was just a cold bastard. I never understood what my mother saw in him.” it had always puzzled Red. “She was so warm, loving and kind. And he was the complete opposite.”

“Was he mean to her?” Liz asked, stroking her fingers over the soft hair on Red’s stomach.

“If you’re asking if he ever hit her.” Red voiced the question. “No, he didn’t. He was good to her, in the traditional sense.” he admitted. “He gave her a nice home, full bank account and free reign over the house.” he remembered the house being warm and inviting... when his dad was out of it.

“He even treated her to dinner and the like, but I wonder if he was ever actually affectionate with her?” Red purposely thread his fingers affectionately through Lizzy’s hair. “Because, you know, I don’t ever recall seeing them hug or kiss.”

It had bothered Red as a young man, watching his mother go through the motions, pretending a perfect marriage when the opposite was the truth.

“Maybe she was happy with her comfortable life.” Liz shrugged minutely. “It was a different time, another era.” it was reminded. “Secure marriage and that she produced a child, and a son, no less.”

“I suppose,” the man mused, “I don’t think he really loved her.”

“You loved her.”

“Well, not to gross you out or anything, but they did have to have occasional sex... they did produce you.”

“Doesn’t mean it was affectionate or even good.” Red muttered, frowning his empathy.

Liz sensed the depth of Red’s concern.
“Hey, if she was anything like you, and I think that’s exactly where you inherited your kindness and warmth,” Liz snuggled into the man’s warm body, planting an affectionate kiss on his chest, “your dad couldn’t help but love her. Such a thing rubs off on a person.”

Red picked up on the subconscious slip. Could’t help but love her...

Did Lizzy feel those deeper emotions for him? Or was it just a mental slip? Was she speaking merely on generic terms?

The woman’s gasp and frantic movement startled Red from his thoughts.

“No!” she whispered tragically, instantly up and frantically searching about, her hands running over the pillows, under the covers. Nudging him to vacate his spot.

“Sweetheart, what’s wrong?” Red moved aside, reaching for the light. Her stricken features alerted him to a problem. “What are you looking for?”

The large eyes lifted, tears threatening. “My necklace.” her hand instantly went to her unadorned throat.

“I can’t find my necklace!” she began to search in earnest, mindless of her state of undress.

Pushing out of the bed, he secured his robe following after her as she rushed off to the bathroom and closet, upending the hamper, flinging open drawers...

“Calm down.” he was determined to soothe tattered nerves. “Which piece was it?”

“My...my Journey necklace.” her eyes were glittered with unshed tears, her voice trembling noticeably. “My Journey necklace!” an involuntary sob escaped her throat.

“I’ll take the sitting room.” he motioned for the woman to continue her own search. “We will find it, Lizzy. It’s all right.”

“It is not all right.” she returned to her meandering, a hopeless expression on her pretty features.

Slipping some lounge clothes over his nude frame, Red made his way to the sitting room. Looking over the couch, he haphazardly tossed pillows aside.

“What are you doing?” Francis passed in the outer corridor, having retraced his steps.

“Lizzy can’t find her necklace.” Red stuck his hands between the cool leather cushions of the couch, looking in the cracks.

Francis put his plate of goodies aside, quickly joining in the search. “Her ruby one?”

Red retraced their earlier steps, “It has to be here.”

The effort came up empty, however.

Francis enlisted the help of Dembe and the guards who put their ‘Super Bowl’ on pause to pitch in. One even taking a turn in the swimming pool.

Red returned to the bedroom, his expression alerting the nervously waiting woman.

Liz burst into tears, her mouth trembling visibly.
Red’s heart melted. He crossed, taking her in his arms. “We will find it.” he whispered, wiping her face with gentle thumbs. “And if not, I’ll buy you a new one.”

“But y-you gave that to me for my b-birthday.” He must understand the sentimental value alone far outweighed the monetary. The blue eyes beseeched him.

Francis discreetly tapped on the door facing. “I’m assuming we’ll need the car?”

“And flashlights.” Red smiled tenderly down at the dark expression and wet spiked lashes. “What do you mean, we?”

Red spared the young man a glance. “I’ll go, Francis. You don’t have to–”

“Hey, a near replica of that thing got me laid once.” Francis balked. “It means as much to me as it does to her.”

Liz managed a weak smile and Red was once more indebted to Francis’ incredible instinct at reading the woman’s moods.

Red listened as the kid’s footfalls echoed down the hardwood corridor. “I’ll get dressed, we will retrace our steps...” he broke down the game plan, “we will find it, Lizzy.”

She absently followed him to the closet. “I’ll never forgive myself if–” she gasped yet again, quickly grasping for her matching bracelet to ensure it was still in place. “Oh, thank God!” she breathed a sigh of relief.

Slipping into his clothes, Red could feel the tension clear across the room. He grabbed his wallet. “You keep looking here. You didn’t check downstairs yet.”

She seemed grateful for something with which she could occupy herself. “I can go, Red.” she brightened.

“You stay.” he vetoed the notion. “Tom is still lurking about... I have my phone,” he held it aloft as proof before depositing it in his inside pocket, “if you need me. And Dembe is here...”

His eyes softened on the fretting woman. “Don’t sit here worrying yourself sick. Go watch the game with the guys.”

“I know who won.” she pouted. “I’ll be fine, thank you for this, I owe you...” she added sincerely.

His eyes twinkled, laying a kiss on her pouting lips. “Big time.”

Francis was waiting by the car, “Nothing turned up in there.” he crooked his thumb to the vehicle. “I thought Dembe was going to dislodge the back seat, that man doesn’t know his own strength.”

Red nodded his gratitude, lowering himself into the driver’s seat.

As they passed a wary Tom Keen, who watched their every move, Francis took the opportunity presented to flip Tom off, after a cheerful wave of his hand.

They drove in silence for a goodly beat.

“Is this where we discreetly but efficiently, break into the jewelry store and get a replacement?”

Red glanced, seeing the earnest expression on Francis’ face. “Or... I could simply purchase one tomorrow.”
Francis seemed deflated.

“But no,” the older man continued. “Lizzy knows that necklace like the back of her hand.”

“Are you kidding me?” Francis scoffed openly. “She’s always finding new ‘age spots’, the back of her hand is continually changing or ‘morphing’, as she puts it.” the young man shook his head.

“It was a Journey necklace that Giovanni made especially for her.” Red stated. “She will know, trust me. And I wouldn’t do that anyway... it’s dishonest, you twit.”

Francis sat back, resigned, “Lead on, Bwana.”

“Bwana?” Red questioned the form of address.

“That’s what Dembe called you...” Francis remarked off-handedly then sat up straighter in the seat. “Oh wait... I don’t think I was supposed to tell you that.”

Red sighed mentally, turning his attention back to the matter at hand.

Red’s first stop was the ice cream parlor. He ‘tipped’ the staff handsomely to ensure their full cooperation.

_Extortion_, was the phrasing Francis used but Red preferred to trust in human nature and greed.

He offered a couple grand which he waved around like confetti that ‘human nature’ might rise above the usual level of depravity to which he and Francis were accustomed.

But alas, found nothing. Though, he did tip the workers handsomely for trying.

Next, they swept the grounds and pier area meticulously, the search proving uneventful.

Red hastily prevented Francis from pulling his weapon, planting a welcoming smile on his face.

“Officer Peters, you’re still on duty?” Red absently consulted his watch. The officer smiled amiably, a question in his eyes.

“My wife lost her ruby and diamond necklace.” Red managed a worried expression, “A family heirloom.”

“If it helps, she didn’t have it when you were sitting here.” the officer pointed to the bench behind them. “I noted the bracelet though.”

“You’re sure?”

“I’m positive.” Officer Peter’s replied. “Paid to observe and all...” the man chuckled quietly, even as he was _observing_ Francis Holbrook, Red noted.

“My sister is such a pain.” the boy stepped up. “Isn’t there some law that says _she_ has to be the one to come search out something she lost?” he managed a more than convincing lack of desire to be out here at night. “I’m sure that has to be on the books somewhere.”

Officer Peter’s smiled. “Sisters are like that.” he sympathized. “Can’t shoot ‘em, can’t bury them in the back yard with the cats.”
Francis’ face fell, “When the hell did they start that ridiculous law!”

Red relaxed because Officer Peter’s was now relaxed.

“See and you thought Congress just sat on its ass all session.” the cop quipped.

“Well, we won’t take up anymore of your valuable time, Officer.” Red made a leisurely trek past the guy.

“You might try looking in little Francis’ Lego box,” Officer Peter’s suggested brightly, “my wife lost her wedding ring and that’s where it turned up.”

“How did he know I had Lego—”

Red ushered the boy quickly to the waiting vehicle with a sincere, “Good evening Officer, thank you for the suggestion. We will try that.”

Once in the car, Francis felt obliged to explain his earlier reaction. “Sorry, Red. I thought it was that jerk off, Tom, fuck face stalker boy.”

Red sent him a warning shift of his eyes, “Be more circumvent in future encounters.”

Francis nodded his understanding, falling quiet for a beat. “If it’s anywhere, maybe the spot where that bastard belted Lizzy.” he took hope.

Red steered the car, heading in the needed direction.

“Dammit!” Red vented his frustration after yet another fruitless search.

He glanced over, finding the younger man standing perfectly still, his own flashlight hanging motionless by his side.

“What the hell are you doing?”

“Silas says we should all be more ‘Zen’.” Francis explained his behavior. “And apparently he’s right,” the man’s eyes opened, intent on Red. “She had it when we went to the Wall.”

Red was clearly skeptical.

“I remember because I could see it reflecting back when she did the tracing of Jack’s name.”

Red looked at Francis in a new light.

The walk to the Wall seemed to take forever. Once there, the obstacle appeared daunting.

Mementos were strewn the entire length of the Wall. Flowers, rings, bracelets, watches, dog tags and other countless tokens of remembrance.

Red took one end of the black gabbro monument, Francis the other.

When they met in the middle, or more appropriately, under Jackson Reddington’s name panel, the result was the same.

Not one damn necklace.

“We have to be logical here.” Francis warned.
“That’ll be a first...” Red muttered.

“It was an expensive piece, Red. If someone found it...” he let it hang in the air.

Red’s frustration was rising. He too, was a realist but something urged him onward. “You can bail, Francis. Really...”

“Not gonna happen.” the man shook his head vigorously. “Arlington.” Francis shrugged. “It’s gotta be there, unless it fell off during the ride.” the man grimaced.

“God, don’t even say that.” Red replied, then turned mischievous eyes the young man’s way. “If push comes to shove, I’m strapping you to the hood of the car to scour the path we drove.”

“I can dig it.” the man shrugged carelessly. “What? You think this would be the first time I played hood ornament?”

Red was glad for the man’s company, truth told. “Let’s not draw undue attention to ourselves just yet,” he smiled, shoving Francis towards the car, “I’ll have Dembe Google any new laws that may pertain to such actions.”

Arlington was still closed.

Red hung his head dejectedly having been informed of the fact by the stoically, somber guards when he had approached.

He had held up a pacifying hand, explaining their mission.

“The best I can do...” the older guard of the two, shook a sorrowful head, “is thirty minutes before the official opening. We sometimes make exceptions.”

“I got five grand here that begs to ask the question,” Francis begged, “you have one guy here, could you go look?”

The Soldier’s demeanor changed, “I can’t leave my...”

“His post.” Red finished, his tone placating. “Yes, I know, Soldier and I apologize for my friend’s crass remark. Say you’re sorry, Francis.”

“I’m sorry.” Francis obediently responded, putting his wallet away.

“Can I wait over there?” Red motioned to a spot further down the parking area. He didn’t want these people getting antsy. The guard was still eyeing Francis belligerently.

“Hey, I’m really sorry, man. Really.” Francis was sincere.

Red nodded, “Is it okay?”

The Soldier shrugged.

Francis got in the car which Red pulled down the empty spaces.

“Don’t even think of sending me back home empty handed.” Francis read the other man’s mind. “I’m not going to be the bearer of bad news. They shoot people for that. Don’t think I don’t know.”
“Just because you do it,” Red said, “doesn’t mean everyone follows suit. Go home, Francis, it’s late.”

“I don’t think so!” Francis barked, crossing his arms over his chest, staring straight out into the night. Red parked, the silence falling.

“I’ll take the front.” Francis ended the stalemate. “I’m used to sticking things up my ass.” he stared morosely at the gear shift.

“I’m sure you are...” Red sighed heavily, jerking the car door open, exiting grumpily.

Francis chuckled his amusement, stretching his frame out comfortably. He rolled down the windows, pleased a pleasant breeze was coming down the open fields.

“It won’t be so bad.” he listened to Red attempt to find a comfortable spot. “Remember Bangladesh? That time we—”

“I believe,” Red’s disjointed voice came from the darkened interior, “we agreed to never discuss that incident again.”

Francis shrugged stocky shoulders. “Just saying, it could be worse,” a sly grin gracing his features, “...could be raining.”

Both men turned their head as the distant rumble of thunder echoed over the solemn area. Red looked at the young man, throwing a dagger or two the man’s way.

“Oh... the irony.” Francis muttered.

“Shut the fuck up, Francis.”

What seemed a very short time later, Red jerked awake, groaning at the crick in his neck but his reflexes were in perfect working order as another car pulled in alongside them.

Red shared a look of communication with a suddenly wide awake Francis Holbrook.

“Oh...” the other man had a better view. Francis re-holstered his weapon. “It’s just the old ball and chain.”

Lizzy’s pretty face came into view, her fingers tapping the top of the opened window.

“The windows are open?” she was ever more distraught. “Are you guys crazy? There are thieves, killers...”

“I have an alibi, I was sleeping...” Francis grumbled, drawing Liz up short.

“Francis, you’re talking gibberish... more than usual.” Red quipped, efficiently distracting Lizzy. “What are you doing here, sweetheart?” he forced the door open, causing Francis to hastily catch himself from tumbling from the vehicle.

“I refuse to sleep in a comfortable bed knowing, all the while,” she gestured to their sleeping arrangements, “you guys are miserable in this sardine can.”

“This sardine can costs eighty thousand big ones, girlie.” Francis took umbrage.

“And how did it sleep?” Liz demanded.
“Well, it was better than Bangladesh—”

“Francis!” Red snapped, silencing the boy.

“What?” Liz’s brows furrowed.

Francis’ mouth clamped closed, sharing a soft titter of laughter with Dembe. Both men’s large frames shaking with the effort to keep it contained.

“Never mind...” Red chuckled.

Narrowing her eyes at the three amused men, Liz sighed heavily, returning to the reason for her arrival.

“Red, the necklace means the world to me but I never, in a million years expected you to go to such lengths.” Liz implored. “It’s gone. Someone found it. Please come home now.”

“Dembe,” Red took her arm, gently guiding her back to the other car, “take her home.”

“No!” Liz balked. “I won’t go.”

“See? She knows what they do to the bearer of bad news too.”

“Lizzy, I need you to go home.” Red pleaded, “I’m fine here.”

“I’m not leaving unless you do.”

She looked beseechingly at Dembe and Francis for some sort of assistance. “Make him go!”

“Should I shoot him in the foot?” Francis piped up. “It will only be a flesh wound, but everyone seems to think they are just fine and dandy.”

Liz’s hopes fell.

“You knew he wouldn’t leave,” she focused on Dembe, “didn’t you.”

“Raymond can be very determined when he wants something.” Dembe opened the SUV’s hatch, motioning for Francis’ assistance to lay down the seats.

“He doesn’t pay you nearly enough,” the man stared at the equipment Dembe believed a necessity for their late night meanderings.

“No, I do not.” Red agreed readily, “and I dearly love you, Dembe.” he too had come alongside the SUV.

“I am spoken for.” Dembe stated in that stoic manner, pulling the air mattress free of it’s carry case.

Liz had come around, her eyes large and wide as she took in all the paraphernalia. “He really doesn’t pay you enough.” she was flabbergasted.

She hit Red in the shoulder, “Give him a raise.”

“A large one.” Dembe grinned, handing Red a cold compress.

“For Elizabeth’s cheek.” Red was amazed. Dembe had indeed thought of everything.
“No, for your neck.” Dembe shut the cooler’s lid. “This one, is for her injury.”

“You make out the amount from now on.” Red placed the coolness on his neckline, experiencing instant relief. “I’ll just sign the damned check.”

Francis gasped, “Cold beer!” he dove into the cooler with relish.

“The little things in life.” Red philosophized. “Take Lego boy home, Dembe. We’ll try to muddle by on what you’ve brought.”

“It’s three o’clock in the morning.” Liz reminded Francis who was guzzling the ice cold beverage with gusto.

“Oh, sorry.” Francis had forgotten his manners. “Want one?”

Liz sighed heavily, turning aside. She glanced over their impromptu camping gear absently. She knelt, sorting through some pillows and blankets, marveling at Dembe’s efficiency.

“I will stay.” Dembe offered.

“Me too.” Francis popped another top, his mood certainly improved.

“Don’t you trust my abilities?” Red purposely put it on those terms. He waited patiently for the reply.

“We lost the parasite.” Dembe made reference to Tom Keen.

“As I knew you would.” Red was proud.

“We will see you in the morning.” Dembe held the keys to the SUV aloft. Red exchanged items, having his answer.

The fast, speedy car was fired to life, taking off moments later leaving the quiet of the night.

Red waved a nonchalant hand to the guards who had diligently watched the proceedings with a cautious eye.

Lizzy climbed into the back, bouncing her butt on the mattress. “This is remarkable.” she spread her hands out. “What will they think of next? And Dembe didn’t even have like a bike pump or anything!”

“Why don’t you take off your clothes.” Red had other inventions on his mind, one’s God himself had fashioned. “Get comfortable.”

“If I wanted to put on a show,” she arched a brow to the guards who, admittedly could not see through the darkened windows, “I would charge admission.”

“But baby,” Red innocently reminded, “you know how you hate to get all wrinkled.” he said, removing his own vest and shoes, sitting them aside.

“That’s you.” Liz was enjoying the moment more than she wanted to admit. “But I admire you for trying.”

Red’s eyes danced with contained delight.

“Besides, you know how I hate to get arrested.”
“You used to be more fun.” the man chided.

The woman laid back into the bed, unbuttoning her pants and pushing at them until her panties came into view.

“May I assist you?” Red asked, his large fingers already curling into the waist of the tight clothing, assisting the woman tugging them free of her legs.

Liz eyed him, waiting. Red grinned, popping the catch on his own slacks before swiftly removing them.

“Much better.” the man sighed his relief.

“Does that sound like thunder to you?”

Red sighed mentally, stretching out on the makeshift bed. “Blame Francis, he conjured it.”

Elizabeth was lost.

“Oh!” realization dawned. “Young Frankenstein, it could be worse, could be raining.”

“It’s like speaking in code sometimes,” Red moved the pillow about, “having discussions with that boy.”

“But you understood it.” Liz chuckled, taking her spot in the man’s arms, content now.

“I’ve learned a few important cipher keys over the years.”

“Or... you’ve seen the movie.” she corrected.

Red let it go, content to have her close, the night sounds settling about them.

“I couldn’t sleep.” Liz’s thoughts had wandered. “You weren’t there.”

Red turned his head to seek out the woman. He traced the pert nose with an artist’s appreciation.

“I think that’s the nicest thing you’ve ever said to me.” he marveled.

She smiled but the good feeling was soon replaced by a sad one. “Someone else has my necklace, don’t they.”

“You don’t know that.” he soothed, handing over a cool compress. “Here, baby.”

She placed the refreshing package against her cheek, settling more comfortably against the man.

This isn’t so bad, he mused silently. Francis had been right.

The night was dark and quiet, a cool breeze filtered through the nearby trees.

In Bangladesh, they had the cold, hard ground to sleep on.

And he certainly didn’t have this soft, warm body beside him.

“It meant so much to me, that’s all.”
The desolation could be heard in her tone.

“How could I have been so—”

“Never give up hope, Lizzy.” Red advised quietly. “Trust in the goodness of people. There is still some out there in the world.”

Liz didn’t know if she believed that or not. She clung tightly to ‘one’ good person however, because he always made her feel better somehow.

“I’ll try.” she promised. “I really will try.”

“Good girl.” Red brushed his lips on the softness of the silky waves, “I think it was Mark Twain who said, I’ve had a lot of worries in my life, most of which never happened.”

Liz nodded, trying to assimilate the mind-set, “I’ll keep a good thought then.”

Red tried to do the same, for he had envisioned the night ending in an entirely different manner. But found, he didn’t mind because they were together.

Being home again felt good, it felt right. The quiet ice-cream run, the later conversation in the park, even the untimely arrival of the cop.

It had all accumulated into this moment.

The little things in life meant a lot.

Lizzy was a constant reminder of the fact.

Reading the paper on a Sunday morning, cuddled in bed. An uneventful dinner at home. Watching old classics on TV... sleeping in a parking lot in a SUV...

All were just as important, maybe moreso, than the material or even the physical side of a relationship.

Did the sentimental aspect of losing the necklace truly override the monetary value for this woman.

He believed it did. He truly believed it.

He had planned on an elaborate, romantic culmination to the day, for he had missed Elizabeth greatly and needed to make the extra effort to please her... and himself.

But suddenly, Red realized... being here, in this deserted parking lot, surrounded by the essence of the woman, feeling her warmth close to him... it meant more than anything he would ever own.

Time with her was... priceless.

May 26

Red awoke with the first hint of day break where the sky took on a hazy hue of twilight. As though the sky fought against the approaching dawn, the dark blanket struggling to maintain the quiet solitude.

Tightening his arm around the woman spooned to him, he nuzzled his nose into her soft hair.
“Lizzy...” she stirred slightly, waking as slowly as the day, “don’t you want to look for your necklace?”

Her eyes slid open, her hands blindly throwing aside the blankets. “I’m awake.”

“I thought that might do it.” he smiled softly, arising in his own time.

After they were presentable, Red pulled the SUV into a nearby parking space. The guards appeared a little more sedate but otherwise, ushered them inside the gates graciously.

They headed off, until they rounded back to the area of Jack’s grave. Searching each grave they passed, looking for even the smallest glint, and yet, nothing.

Red could sense Lizzy’s frustration, but the woman was putting up a brave front.

As they came around the large tree a short distance from Jack’s grave, Red pulled up short, reaching out to snag Liz’s arm, when she would have continued on.

“What?” she looked up expectantly.

“I’ll be damned.” he muttered, motioning with his head.

Liz turned her head as indicated. An attractive older woman was standing at Jack’s grave, head bowed.

“Is that a member of your family?” she whispered.

“No,” he quickly patted his pants and jacket pockets making certain it was still there, but then, when had it not been, “but damn near close.”

He held his hand out, the woman’s small fingers instantly gripping his. Walking quietly towards Jack’s grave, Red pulled up short a few feet away, his gaze gentle on the woman who stood so solemnly quiet. He too, glanced down at the headstone which held her attention so profoundly.

“Rachel?” he ventured softly so as to not disturb the scene unduly.

The woman turned slowly as if returning from a far distance, “Ye–” she hesitated, then halted mid-word, recognition immediate, “Raymond?”

Red’s eyes softened on the woman and he forced a smile, “It’s been a long time.” an understatement in itself.

“And you’ve been a very bad boy.” the woman scolded lightly, old times coming to mind.

How many times had his mother said those very words and this woman had been present on a few of those auspicious occasions.

Red’s face brightened like Liz had never seen before.

“Some things never change, do they.” he held out his hand, clasping the woman’s cool palm to his warmer one. To his great surprise, he was instantly wrapped in a tight hug. He returned the gesture, just as warmly.

“You sound just like him, you know.” the woman muttered into his shoulder, tears escaping the still lovely eyes.
“Do I?” he questioned, rubbing her back soothingly, his voice and manner the same.

Lizzy stood quietly aside, unwilling to intrude.

“Oh, I’m sorry.” Red remembered his manners, properly contrite. “Rachel, this is my fiancée, Elizabeth.”

The brunette broke the embrace, pulling back to take in the lithe woman. Liz was looked over, the lovely woman’s brows arching slightly.

“Fiancée?” she grinned infectiously.

“Whatever you have to say...” Red drawled, “I’m sure I’ve heard it before.”

“She’s just beautiful.” warm eyes laced Elizabeth’s face.

“That she is.” the man agreed wholeheartedly.

“And most likely too good for you, you rascal.” It was soundly scolded. A hand was held out, gently covering Liz’s. “It’s very nice to meet you.”

Liz muttered the expected inanities, her curiosity more than piqued by this suddenly ‘mysterious stranger’.

“Your every move is usually posted all across the Internet,” the stranger was saying to Red, “I haven’t heard anything about this lovely young thing.”

“The Internet, hum.” Red was amused. “We come from a different era.”

“We all have to adapt to changing times, Raymond.” slender shoulders were shrugged. “Don’t tell me you don’t make use of technology. Now, tell me all about this pretty lady here. How did you two meet?”

Pleasantries were exchanged, basic information forth coming on both parts.

“And now you’re here.” a smiled was beamed. “It’s like Fate brought us to this moment, isn’t it.”

“Rachel is a beautiful name.” Liz had finally found out the identity of the woman.

“A biblical name.” Red recalled how Jack had said it, how the man’s entire being had softened when he did.

“Oh, that’s enough of that.” Rachel chided, “They were always teasing me. Jack used to say, wasn’t anything remotely ‘Biblical’ about the likes of me.” she laughed gently, her hand tracing lovingly across the top of the gravestone, her eyes filling with a mist which she quickly blinked away, forcing a brightness. “Are you here to visit him too?

“We came yesterday.” Red stated. “Spent some time.”

“I don’t like the crowds.” Rachel’s face skewed for a beat. “It’s better when everything is quiet.”

Red nodded, “Yes.”

“I lost my necklace.” Liz blurted.

Rachel blinked, “Necklace?”
“That’s why we came back.” Liz couldn’t shut up, but the other woman’s pain was apparent. Rachel wore it like a shawl. “Not that it’s the only reason, of course. I mean, of course that wasn’t the...” she looked at Red with desperate eyes.

Red smiled gently, understanding and appreciating Lizzy’s rambling’s for what they were.

He tilted his head, looking at the headstone wishing he could make her feel better... make them all feel better.

He took the flowers from Rachel’s unresisting hands. He knelt, arranging them into a decorative display, interweaving them with the bouquet Lizzy had placed the day before.

“I had never got the chance to say a proper farewell to Jack, Rachel.” he began, squinting up, blocking his eyes from the early morning sun. The man absently switched the fragrant scents about, his interest elsewhere, “I had always meant to...”

A solid clink against the headstone caught Red’s attention. He jerked his head to the sound, amazed to see a bright, shiny glint reflecting from the soft rays.

Elizabeth gasped, her hands lifting to her mouth, her eyes large with wonder.

Red tugged the end of the chain carefully for it was intertwined with the stems of the flowers. At length, he produced the glittering strand of rubies and diamonds, holding it aloft.

“Well, I’ll be damned.” the man shook his head with amazement.

Elizabeth quietly squealed her delight, rushing forward. Red had arisen, examining the piece. She slammed into his chest, her arms going about his neckline.

“That’s lovely!” Rachel commented. “How did it ever get there?”

Red held Elizabeth tightly. “Guess Jack was watching over it for us.”

Elizabeth’s eyes shined with happiness. She turned about, lifting her hair.

Red placed the necklace about the woman’s neck, clasping it securely.

Liz touched the heavy pendant reverently before lifting her arms yet again. “Thank you!” she whispered her joy. “Thank you for giving it back to me.”

“I didn’t.” Red looked down, the name on the headstone emblazoned boldly in the morning light.

Liz laid her head on the man’s shoulder, her arms clasped about his waist, under his jacket.

Rachel watched the pair, her eyes holding a deep, profound sadness.

“Don’t wait.”

Red shifted his gaze, having heard the whispered statement. Elizabeth sought Rachel out as well.

“Don’t let anyone dictate what you should or shouldn’t do.” the woman inhaled shakily, her frail fingers grasping the headstone. “Do what feels right for you both. Don’t give a damn what they say.”

Red liked the spunk displayed but the woman’s eyes told another story.
“Tell them to mind their own damn business.” Rachel’s voice wavered with the need to weep.

“Are you all right?” Red stepped, his fingers gently tracing the side of her face. She grasped his hand tight, her pained eyes connecting with his.

“We waited,” her head lowered, as if consulting Jack Reddington. Then she continued, her tone weary, “to get married because Jack didn’t want to stir rumors.”

She smiled wistfully. “When Jack asked, I was on cloud nine. I would have gone to the Registers office that very minute and he knew it but...” she sucked in a ragged breath, “our families said people would talk, say Jack had... you know.” she motioned absently. “My family wanted the big wedding with all the fixings. A proper joining, they said.”

Her fist clenched. “Jack waited... he did it for me because they said we should.”

Liz clamped her lips together, feeling the woman’s anguish so acutely, it hurt her heart.

“We could have had so many months... together.” Rachel’s words caught in her throat. “I should have told them all to go straight to hell!” she hissed her fury.

Red stepped forward, tugging Rachel into his embrace, holding her tightly, allowing her to cry out her heartache.

Liz crept into the small compact unit, embracing both participants. Red had lifted his arm to allow the move, not surprised in the least when Lizzy’s sobs blended with Rachel’s.

“P-Promise me, you won’t w-wait.” Rachel’s fingers gripped Red’s jacket front, her eyes beseeching them both. “That you will listen to your hearts and nothing else.”

“You don’t know him,” Liz swiped at her cheeks, “or you’d know not to ask that,” she forced a weak laugh, “that man is a force unto himself.”

Red’s features softened. He leaned to kiss Rachel’s cheek. “Jack wouldn’t want you in such a state.” he was concerned. “If me being here has caused–”

“Oh, stop.” Rachel shook her mood. “Seeing you has been the best tonic I could have hoped for. I’m fine.” she breathed in deeply. “It’s just... so good to see you again after so long.”

Liz motioned shortly. A new arrival had come on scene. A tall man was approaching, a dark scowl on his handsome features.

Liz had seen those features before....

Rachel beckoned to the uniformed Marine. She heard Red’s sharp intake of breath as the man came closer.

She cast narrowed eyes at him, “I’m assuming, from your reaction... they neglected to tell you.”

“...Yes.” Red’s jaw pulsed.

Liz’s mouth gaped.

The man was around Red’s age... and the spitting image of Jackson Reddington.

“Mom? You okay?”
“I’m fine, son.” Rachel hugged the man affectionately. “Jackson... meet your cousin, Ray.”

“I know who he is mom.” the Marine stated sheepishly but he offered his hand to Red. “I’ve heard a lot about you...” he mentioned, “not all of it good.”

Red took the news well.

“I prefer to believe what mom says though,” he looked down at the smaller woman. “She’s never steered me wrong yet... on any subject.”

“Where are you stationed, Marine?” Liz sensed Red needed more time... more privacy with Jackson’s mother.

Jackson was all too pleased to turn his attention to a pretty girl... a fact Red did not miss.

Liz continued to hold the Marine’s attention.

“Three months into Jack’s tour,” Rachel kept her voice low, confidential, she watched Jackson be charmed by the other woman, her smile a gentle one, “he took a seven day R&R in Hawaii. I met him and we got married as soon as his plane landed.” she explained.

“Did Jack know.” Red looked at the dashing Marine standing beside Lizzy.

“Yes.” she nodded. “He got another break before...” she swallowed, “I flew out to see him against doctors advice.” she flushed a little. “Women were coddled back then... ahh, for the good old days.” she chuckled quietly.

“Oh, he knew.” she smiled over at her son. “Jack was very excited. We were both looking forward to...” she trailed off.

She sighed at the lovely memory. “He quite swept me off my feet. It was a precious time, Raymond.” she met his gaze squarely. “I’ve never regretted one second I had with that man and I never will. It’s all I have of him.”

“Not all.” Red made mention.

“Are you jealous?” Rachel teased.

“Of a wet behind-the-ears pup?” Red closed the gap between he and Lizzy. “You done monopolizing my fiancée’s time, Marine?”

The man reddened, and he hastily put a good deal of distance between himself and Liz who grinned infectiously, “Oh, I didn’t mean anything, Sir. We were just–”

Red grinned, “I know, Jackson.” he patted the well-formed shoulder comfortingly. “I just know us Reddington men and their penchant for brunettes.”

“He has trouble of his own.” Rachel lifted a hand to indicate a wad of people coming over the rise. “Well, there goes our private time with your father.” she seemed resigned. “Jackson’s wife and kids.”

Red counted two little toddlers trying desperately to mount the small rise.

“I hate to cut this short...” the man apologized, “it was really nice to meet you.” he stated.
“I can honestly say, it was great pleasure to meet you... Jackson.” Red swallowed harshly before the man stepped back.

Jackson took off to offer assistance to his very pregnant wife.

Rachel turned, a serene smile gracing her face. “I wouldn’t wish that tribe on my worst enemy and Jackson’s wife...” she made a face, “she’s a Yankee, just like you.” she teased Red. “But more importantly, she prides herself on being up on the very latest ‘trending’ topics.”

“She will know you on sight.” Liz warned.

“Well, I do take a good picture if I do say so myself.” Red was accustomed to being recognized and had long since found ways and methods to ‘cope’ with any given situation but he didn’t want to cause any unnecessary scene with Rachel involved.

“If that’s not Jackson Reddington bragging, I don’t know what is.” Rachel scowled slightly. “You have grown up just like him.”

“I’ll take that as a compliment.” Red smiled watching Jackson Jr. chase his little two year old son about the grass. The Marine ‘tackled’ the tot, lifting him high in the air. The baby squealed his delight.

Jackson’s wife was digging in her diaper bag, searching out sippy cups full of refreshing juices.

“He senses I need a moment.” Rachel knew her son well. “He’ll keep them at bay a few seconds more but that Angela is a nosy little so and so,” she chuckled. “You need to ask me something?” she was an intuitive woman.

“Give you something.” Red corrected, fishing in his wallet, recalling the hectic search of earlier. He extracted a neatly folded envelope. Although it had seen better days.

“This thing is brought out every year at this time...” Red apologized for the condition, handing it over to its rightful owner. “It’s been all over the world, probably more places than Jack himself.”

Rachel opened the contents carefully.

“Read it now or later.” Red indicated the worn, faded print on the letter. “He wrote it before...” he trailed off, “it was in his things they sent.’

Rachel stared at the letter for a very long time. Her voice broke when she could finally speak.

“You don’t know what this means to me.”

“There is something else in the envelope.” Red motioned.

The woman’s eyes blinked as she automatically looked inside. A gleaming diamond band slid free of it’s former resting place.

Rachel gasped breathlessly, lifting luminous eyes.

“Oh, Raymond...” she stared transfixed at the beautiful symbol, visions flashing in her mind’s eye of a day long ago.

“Jack wanted you to have that.” Red knew he would. “He wanted a life with you more than anything in this world.”
It was eerie that he understood his Uncle so well... that there was a common ground between them.

Jack had needed Rachel.

And he needed Elizabeth.

Rachel continued to stare at the band her thoughts private, very much so.

“You gave it back... to the family.” Red watched the woman’s face carefully. “I thought, at first, it was because you could not forgive Jack for going back, for not coming home.”

Rachel lifted startled eyes, “No!” she breathed out, dismayed. “No, never. A man has to do what he must to remain a man. I always understood that about Jack.” she earnestly promised.

“I would never try to change him. He was fine.... just the way he was.” she stated proudly.

“Then... why?” Red already thought he knew the answer.

“Oh, Raymond... it’s all water under the bridge.” Rachel refused to hurt the man. “I’ve long since forgiven and forgotten.”

A small defiant moment came into the woman’s face. Rachel slipped the band on her finger, just as Jack had done some forty years ago.

“It still fits.” she blinked back tears, that day suddenly crystal clear in her mind. “He was... handsome,” she smiled. “And didn’t he know it though.” a chuckle came then a serene silence.

Rachel played with the ring, turning it this way and that.

“You were married but,” Red remembered back, “after Jack died, you didn’t come around any longer.” That had hurt, he remembered that as well.

Rachel sensed where the conversation would lead. “I wanted to...” she placed her hand over the man’s, the diamonds sparkling in the sun, “I wanted to see you so desperately, but...”

“What did he do?” Red hissed.

Elizabeth was surprised at the venom in the statement. She glanced over at Red. His jaw was tensing, rigid and unyielding, his eyes cold... filled with fury.

Rachel glanced at her son and his family. The toddlers sat quietly now, in the shade of a large oak. Jackson had his wife’s shoes off, rubbing her feet.

Angela sat on a bench, arching her back to ease the aches of pregnancy.

“You mother was excited for me and Jack.” Rachel took another route. “Grace went shopping with me for a dress.” her face clouded over. “He didn’t like that.”

“He didn’t accept the marriage?” Red wasn’t stupid, putting two and two together. “What the hell right-”

“Richard refused to recognize the marriage because it didn’t take place in a church.” Rachel laughed hollowly. “You know how forceful a personality he was... I guess the rest of the family just didn’t want to make waves, but Grace...” Rachel chuckled, “Grace was a fireball if pushed into a corner. I think it caused a rift in their marriage. I never wanted that, Raymond.” she promised.
“That’s rich!” Red scoffed disgustedly. “As if Richard Reddington ever set foot inside a place of worship! How dare he—”

“Stop.” Rachel insisted quietly. “Richard is... gone. He can’t do anymore damage unless we allow it. Do you understand what I’m saying?”

“I understand it.”

But Liz sensed, Red wasn’t about to let any of his anger go as yet, if ever.

“Red.” she stepped, settling a comforting hand on his shoulder only to find him shaking with barely controlled rage.

“On behalf of my mother and myself,” Red smiled down at Rachel’s concerned features needing to put her at ease once again, “I need to apologize for the lack of support and empathy that son of a bitch denied you and Jackson.”

“It just isn’t important anymore.” Rachel touched his face gently.

he apologized, sincerely.

Rachel nodded, “Thank you, Raymond,” she freed a bright smile, “for so very much...” the words escaped her.

“You’re family, no matter what that bastard said.” Red continued tightly. “Although why you would want to be associated with—”

“Are you serious?” Rachel quipped to lighten the mood. “I’m the ‘be all and end all’ at the Bridge Club Association because I can lay claim to the notorious Reddington name and lineage.”

Red drew in a calming breath for the woman’s sake, lifting his head slightly.

Jackson sat, rocking his little girl, looking down at the angelic face, his own so blissfully content.

“You’re reputation has earned me a permanent place of immortality among my peers.” Rachel teased. “You keep up the good work.”

She hastily scribbled on the back of the envelope. “This is my number and address,” the tip of her tongue flashed out as she wrote. Red smiled, remembering the habit from when he was a kid.

“I even have an email thingy.” she handed the envelope back. “So that goes right back to where it was.” she jabbed a finger at his wallet. “Only you better not just bring it out once a year.”

Rachel lifted welcoming arms, embracing Elizabeth tightly, “You remember your promise to me, young lady.”

Liz swallowed hard, nodding agreeably, “It was so very special meeting you.”

“Well, of course it was.” Rachel pulled herself together, sniffing gently. “I’m an important person in my neck of the woods, remember.” she chuckled.

She hugged Liz again, “Oh, sweetheart, I’m so very happy to know Raymond has found someone to love.”

Liz stiffened slightly, flushing a tad as her eyes met the man’s.
“You take good care of her.” Rachel gently pushed back. “Take care of each other... and you just better keep in contact with me.”

She had turned on Red.

“Count on it.”

“I will.” she seemed satisfied. “If you don’t, I’ll turn you in myself, if only for visitation rights.”

Red chuckled finally, “Yeah, you’re family all right. Although most would do it for the reward.”

Rachel kissed his cheeks, hugging him tightly, as if she did not wish to let go. “I love you, Raymond.”

The man had not heard that particular sentiment in so very long a time. It touched him deeply.

Eventually Rachel transferred the emotions to Elizabeth.

Looking at the headstone lovingly, she kissed her fingers, laying them gently against the marble. “I love you, Jack.”

Liz’s lips trembled, hiding her face in Red’s arm, clutching him tightly.

Rachel reluctantly took her leave. Red watched her steps as they took her further and further away.

Liz impulsively reached for Red’s hand. She was happy when he embraced her tightly for a long beat.

“I hate that bastard.” there was such bitterness, such vitriol emotion expelled in that one simple statement, that Liz was a little taken aback.

She leaned slightly, seeking out the man’s gaze.

“Rachel was wrong.” Red cast a lingering look. Rachel stopped as the hill sloped downward, offering one last wave.

Red automatically returned the gesture but his eyes were icy cold. “Richard Reddington can do damage... even from the grave.”

He sought out the woman, “Elizabeth, I don’t think...” he managed through gritted teeth, “I’ve ever hated anyone more than I do at this very moment.”

Liz weighed her options, considering the topic was an important one. “Well, that is saying a bit, isn’t it... coming from Red Reddington.”

Red scowled darkly, the insult hitting home.

“To be on your bad side,” she lifted cautious brows, “usually does not bode well.”

The man was speechless and Liz felt cold when his arms dropped away.

She hastened to make her point. “Red, do you remember yesterday, with Tom?”

Red Reddington was reeling. Is that how the woman perceived him... still? As a cold blooded killer who removed everyone in his path who dared go against him in some fashion?
“Rachel was right.” Liz persisted. It was taking everything she had to stand up to the man but she truly believed the truth would set Red free. “You have always shown me that we have choices in this life.”

Red only half heard what was being said, enmeshed in his own misery to concentrate fully.

“I made a choice yesterday, with Tom.” she raised her chin high, proud of her accomplishment. “I think it was the right one.”

Red’s silence was unnerving.

“The world is a bad place at times, filled with crappy people,” she continued undauntedly, “but Rachel and your mother had a sanctuary of sorts, don’t you see?”

Red’s brows furrowed drastically, for he wasn’t following.

“And that was the love you and your Uncle surrounded them with,” the woman smiled gently, her hand touching Red’s cheek tenderly. “In the larger scheme of things, Richard Reddington meant so little because Rachel had her child that Jack had given her and your mother had... you.”

Red was taken aback.

“Don’t you get that?” Liz was astounded. “Your dad couldn’t hurt them, he could never take away what you and Jack gave. It was a constant.”

The tension had gone from the man’s body. The ashen complexion was gradually replaced by the man’s usual healthy glow.

“How the hell did you get so smart in such a short span of years.” he muttered, brushing a stray strand of hair from her eyes.

Liz relaxed visibly, “I had a fantastic support system... that gave me some invaluable insight when I needed it most.” her eyes lifted to his. “If he were to give me advice on how to handle this situation,” she baited, “I would heed it.”

He smiled slowly, “So you’re saying, oh, Wise One, that I should tell Richard Reddington metaphorically, of course, to go straight to hell and get the fuck out of my life?”

“He’s probably already there.” she crinkled her nose adorably. “Why waste more breath on the guy?”

Red actually laughed, his eyes filled with a tenderness not allowed before.

“What did I do to deserve you?” he had quietened considerably after a few seconds, however.

“I don’t know cause we all know what a very bad boy you have been.” she teased now hoping to lighten the mood.

But Red remained pensive, reaching down to trace along the top of Jack’s headstone.

“Elizabeth,” a dark scowl laced his brow, “you said earlier–”

“He,” the woman watched his features religiously, sensing his turmoil, “I try not to be so judgmental any longer. In the beginning...” she lifted resigned arms, “but being with you, seeing your world through different eyes. Now understanding, there are all sorts of grey shades to every situation that exists.”
Red lifted solemn eyes.

“I look back on, well, hell... the last few weeks,” she was stunned, “and think... so much has happened in such a short interval and... I was so naïve,” she chuckled hollowly, “not that I am all that much smarter or savvy now, but...” she searched for the words.

Red listened patiently, so proud of the woman’s growth, he could burst at this moment.

“I know the things you have had to do,” it was her turn to hesitate, “your world is such a harsh, unrelenting, dangerous place. You had to adapt to survive.” the blue eyes were troubled.

Red remained silent, his head turned slightly aside.

“I have a sneaky feeling I have only seen the tip of a very large, hideous iceberg.” she did. “How can anyone possibly judge or condemn unless they have walked in your shoes? What would any one of us have done in similar circumstances?” she was stumped.

“It’s so easy to stand on the sidelines and shout objections, opinions and beliefs but when Fate shoves your ass down into the trenches... what choices would someone truly make to survive?” the woman finished.

Red lifted his head, thinking back on all those choices he had been forced into.

“Jack would have made... other choices.” the man knew all too well. “Better choices.”

Elizabeth looked at the soft green grass covering the grave site.

“Would he?” she wasn’t certain what led Red down this chosen path but she had to wonder at the validity of his statement.

“He was military through and through.” Red had long since resigned himself to what his Uncle would think of the decisions made in Red’s life.

“No matter the reason for my supposed act of treason,” the man shook his head, his body taut, “Jack’s rolling in his grave over my actions.”

Liz remained silently contemplative.

“You don’t know, Lizzy,” Red had to face facts, “the things I’ve done in my life.” he grew quiet again.

“I know you’re a good man.” she knew that much.

“Am I?” he laughed shortly. “Am I indeed.” it was mused.

“Yes!” she snapped. “You damned well are and I’ll tell you one thing, Red Reddington!” she would not hear anymore. “If anyone has a problem with that fact, including Jackson Reddington, let them come and face me!”

Red was pulled from his doldrums by the impassioned little spit-fire by his side.

“I’ll set them straight and in short order!” Liz was certain. “What man hasn’t done things in their lives they regret? Do you think he didn’t come up against horrific decisions in the hell hole he was in?”

Red inadvertently shifted his eyes to the grave site.
The man took his time in reply, for in reality, he had none. Red stopped, turning slightly, seeking comfort.

It was a new sensation for the man. He was the one usually offering comfort.

Elizabeth wrapped her arms around the man’s broad shoulders.

Red sagged gratefully against her, heaving a shudder.

The preceding day had taken a toll on the man, even if he thought he was coping.

Meeting Rachel... Jack’s son.

Emotions collided and in Lizzy’s warm embrace, he found an escape of sorts.

The woman took his weight, both physically and metaphorically.

“He knows, Red.” Liz was certain somewhere, Jackson Reddington was looking down. “He understands.”

Red closed his eyes, mortified to feel wetness building behind his lids. His arms tightened crushingly, his head dropping, his lips pressing into the cotton of her shirt.

He allowed himself to finally experience the heavy weight of grief he had carried for over forty years.

The man sobbed his anguish, the sound tearing Liz’s heart from her chest.

Her own eyes filled with tears when she felt the wet warmth seep into her shoulder as Red unsuccessfully tried to muffle his release of sorrow.

He wept for all the men lost in this most hallow of places... for his own Uncle, for all the men he had personally known over the years... for the life taken from them.

Good men all.

He wept for the lives he had taken, for to do so scarred the man’s soul even if some had deserved to die.

He wept for the life denied him, for his wife and child... a life never meant to be.

He wept for Jack... who would never have a life with Rachel and their son.

He bunched his fists tightly into the woman’s clothing, lost in the agony and anguish gripping his mind.

He was so very grateful to feel the warmth and total acceptance, surrounded by loving arms.

Red Reddington had never felt so vulnerable but in the same instance.... he had never felt so whole.

MAY 30

Tossing her bag across the room landing it on the bed, Liz leaned into the door frame, her body tensed with frustration.

This had been a hell of a week.

The last day of their vacation had been idyllic. Red had all but sequestered them in the back rooms of the spacious home.

They did nothing but relax and unwind.

In the aftermath of their meeting with Rachel Reddington, Red had seemed more at peace, more... subdued somehow.

It was if he needed the quiet, the seclusion.

Even Dembe and Francis had seemed to sense a change in the man, leaving them to their makeshift retreat.

It was a total surprise then, when Silas unexpectedly walked through the door of the back office, making his rounds as though he had never left.

Liz thought back on that day, having crossed the room, glancing out on a beautiful spring day. She tilted the slats of the wood blinds, quietly musing.

Red had tensed that day, looking Silas over critically for a long beat. Something passed between the men that she could not read but whatever was ‘said’, Red relaxed, beckoning the guard to sit, join them.

Silas seemed fine to Elizabeth. Francis had mentioned the fact that usually, Silas would go off, sometimes for weeks... on his own version of a spirit quest.

Lizzy would never understand why men had such difficult times with expressing emotions, instead of continuously repressing them.

In a sense, she supposed women were more fortunate in that area. A good cry oft times solved most of the world’s problems.

The day that Red... let go, seemed to have done the man a world of good.

She was probably seeing it from a woman’s point of view, of course. At first, Red had been a little distant, as if he was embarrassed, maybe, by his loss of control.

She didn’t see it that way. And she never would.

The week had went downhill from the moment of Silas’ interruption, not that Liz blamed the man.

She was glad Silas had returned so quickly and seemed his old arrogant, sarcastic self.

Red had received an urgent call from New Jersey, of all places. There had been a disastrous fire in one of his warehouses which required his immediate attention.

Thereby ending a very pleasant and eventful holiday.

She had occupied her days with the usual things but her work could not hold her interest for very long this time around.

Silas sensed her restlessness, inviting her along on his rounds. As she walked the large estate with her constant companion, her boredom diminished.

Liz loved trading barbs with the large man as they discussed a wide variety of subjects.

On that first day, as they had looped around the side of the perimeter, Liz glanced toward the tree-lined street.

Her shadow sat there in his car, looking straight ahead. She stepped back into the confines of the tall rhododendron bushes.
“You don’t have to hide from that bastard.” Silas scolded. “Get out here in the sunlight, show him what you’re made of, girl!”

Liz hesitated, not wanting to cause any undue trouble for her security team.

Silas shook his head slowly, his eyes chastising her. He glanced about, then placing his fingers to his lips, whistling sharply.

Several guards were alerted, coming at the wave of his hand.

Liz noted Tom had been alerted as well however, shrinking back into the bushes even more so as his attention was caught.

Silas gave a curt command and his men cackled their glee as they spread out in a fanning position, clearing the area in record time.

“What are you doing?” Liz watched the men head for the main gate, their paraphernalia changed out for another type of weapon. She tensed, not being able to make out the models.

Silas had not answered, simply stood, his gaze directed to a wary Tom Keen.

Eight guards had been playing laser tag, over at the East end of the complex.

“What?” Liz watched the scene unfold, skeptically chiding Silas’ proposal. “You’re going to have them ‘laser’ him to death?”

“Unique concept but no.” the man muttered quietly.

His men approached the speedy car, taking defensive positions around the parked vehicle.

Weapons were lifted, placed against stout shoulders.

Liz’s brows furrowed and Tom was even more staid. He waited patiently inside the car, for what... neither was quite sure.

A flurry of paint balls suddenly colored the air, the orange and green orbs making loud splats as they ricocheted off the expensive metallic surface of Tom’s car.

Liz burst out laughing as she witnessed Tom frantically attempting to raise the window against the volley of furiously flying projectiles.

The carnage continued undauntedly for what seemed five minutes until finally, the guards halted their assault, each stepping back to admire the damage they had inflicted.

“Silas, you are so evil.” Liz approved, chuckling her mirth.

Tom had taken the effort in his stride although thirty or forty paint splats decorated not only the inside of his interior but... his own personal space.

He pulled his orange and green garment away from his body, staring morosely down at his once white shirt.

Liz was beside herself, dancing about in the sunlit grass, laughing her ass off. “I’m going to pee my pants!”

Silas cracked a sadist grin, “We aim to please.”
Liz waved happily to a disgruntled Tom Keen. She and Silas had continued their trek, the woman’s mood much improved.

Liz smiled in remembrance of Tom Keen’s car. That thing was Tom’s pride and joy. And something that was quickly becoming the butt of the joke to the guards.

Silas had her antagonists car towed, the day after.

His men had dragged Tom from the car, holding him ‘incommunicado’ for about an hour until the tow truck had come and gone.

Tom was subsequently released... as in thrown bodily out of the gate onto the scorching pavement.

Liz had watched her ex’s trek down the shaded street for a block or two. It had done her heart good but then, the next day, the creepy stalker was back... blue car and all.

A car she had passed by today after returning from her mandatory physical training classes.

She hated those dull, useless sessions. Silas was the only one who knew her real capabilities and limitations.

He never treated her like a fragile, incapable child. Silas pushed her and often as not, the training periods wound up with Liz sweating her ass off and panting like a freight train but they were productive.

She had also learned the use of the unique phrase, ‘Fuck off, Silas.’

It had served her well on some of the more strenuous sessions.

Her aggravation skyrocketed not only because there was no way she could skip the stupid classes even though it was more than obvious she was doing far better on her own.

Upon her return home today, she had received notice that her psychologist appointment had been scheduled as well.

She leafed through a romance novel absently, worrying the paper with her thumb. That physiological test had Liz worried a bit.

Those people always read so much into each little gesture or slip of the tongue. She was curious to see if any one of them would pick up on the new changes in her life.

What was the story she and Red would give everyone this time?

She wasn’t going to pretend she didn’t feel emotions for the man. It would be impossible anyway.

She felt far too much these days.

And her team wasn’t stupid. They would see the growth between her an Red.

Ressler had played it close to the edge with that chance meeting on Memorial Day but Liz wondered what conclusions he had drawn privately.

Besides, she didn’t know for certain what she was going to do concerning her job with the Bureau. She really enjoyed profiling on one hand but on the other, she missed her team and working closely with Red.
There was still time to consider all sides to the issue. She shouldn’t stress.

She put the novel aside, crossing the room. She wandered into the walk-in closet, choosing her clothes for after her shower.

Maybe Francis would show up tonight. She secretly thought Red had hatched a plan for the young man to visit frequently if Red was away.

She enjoyed when Francis was about... the distraction he provided. Although she secretly wondered if she was monopolizing his time.

Francis was so energetic, habitually speaking of all the clubs he frequented.

The quiet nights here must be dreadfully boring to him. All they ever did was watch movies, put puzzles together or play board games if they could con the off-duty guards into it.

She would have to confront Francis and get the truth out of him one of these days.

She set the temperature of the water absently, her mind flitting about.

Red called frequently. It was always good to hear his voice.

She missed him terribly. Today more than most days.

Red had kept in constant contact with her and with each call, she could hear his frustration rising.

He had to fly from New Jersey to London. A new Blacklister had been spotted but the bastard had gone to-ground so the team had asked for Red’s assistance for only he had the needed contacts to hopefully make the guy surface again in a timely manner.

Sighting of Carver had tapered off somewhere around Portland, Oregon.

Red was not happy.

Liz was not happy either.

She would have to inform Red about the new letters which had arrived if Silas hadn’t already done so. Liz lathered the creamy soap between her fingers watching the bubbles grow.

He was thousands of miles away, so she hoped Silas wouldn’t have bothered him until Red’s return.

The woman rolled her neck, letting the heated water ease away tension and stress.

Liz was about to reach her boiling point.

Tom was hovering around hampering her comings and goings although Silas was handling that aspect well, admittedly.

He was simply another annoyance she could do without.

Her blood pressure rose as she recalled the office visit. The doctor had been no help today what-so-ever.

After waiting over a damned hour, the PA had informed her, rather condescendingly at that, the information divulged could have been handled over the phone... that she didn’t even need to come in for an appointment.
Liz tried to ease the once again rising tension in her shoulders, her head was beginning to ache.

She really wished Red was here. He always made the world’s little aggravations disappear.

She soaped her body, her hands running leisurely over the slopes of her stomach, arms and breasts.

She closed her eyes. At times, she could almost feel the touch of his lips on her flesh. Soft, gentle, moving confidently from one vulnerable location to the next.

Her fingers slid between the lips of her vulva. She could feel the heat of his tongue, the grasp of his palms on her buttocks as he held her for his pleasure.

Liz gasped huskily, the clock chiming in the hallway breaking her thoughts.

“Ohh...” she swallowed guiltily, feeling the rush of blood to her cheeks.

The woman hastily finished her shower, determined to keep her thoughts on a more stable course.

She applied her lotions and minimal make-up, the woman looking back in the mirror, a different one than she knew.

Liz hardly recognized herself these days which, she had decided, was a good thing.

She had more color and energy and it showed in her face, her eyes and even her posture.

Had she been that... drained before? Had the life with Tom caused damage in ways even she was not aware?

Liz sat back, considering the fact for the first time ever.

She didn’t want to think about it, dismissing the thought instantly. She was with Red now and things were so much better.

Delicious smells wafted into the sanctity of her bath area. Nora was working her magic again.

Liz hurried to finish her make-up, scurrying to dress in her earlier chosen outfit. She always tried to look her best these days. Red noticed a woman’s body, he took the time and effort to comment and those comments always made her feel beautiful.

Liz had always considered herself only average in the looks department, a ‘five’ on most days, a ‘six’ if she put in the effort.

Put up beside Samar, any woman would pale, so Liz tried to put in the effort if only for morale's sake.

Red made her feel like a ‘ten’ just by the way he looked at her. She wanted to be that ‘ten’ for him, of course but also, for herself because dammit to hell, she was worth the effort and deserved it!

Liz smiled happily slipping into a soft silky blouse of lavender and black design. She chose her favorite jeans that brought out her curves to complement the outfit.

She practically skipped down the long hallway through the archway into the dining area, then kitchen.

Nora hummed as she worked.
She made Elizabeth smile. “I know that song.”

“Then join in.” Nora brought a cutting board over, placing freshly washed celery atop the clean surface.

Liz sat on a bar stool in the large island area, dutifully chopping the vegetable for the salad which would complement that evening’s meal.

Nora continued her work and the song. Liz felt at ease a few seconds into the scene adding her voice to the pleasant humming.

“I’ve been up and down and over and out, and I know one thing,” she grinned over at the older woman, “each time I find myself laying flat on my face,” Liz found courage lifting her voice confidently, “I just pick myself up and get back in the race... That’s life!” Liz really belted it out.

They dissolved into a fit of giggles.

“Ah... Sinatra,” Nora’s eyes turned dreamy as she halted her hands activities, “now there was a man.”

“No arguments here.” Liz poured a portion of the celery into a large mixing bowl.

“Oh, God.” Liz sighed blissfully. “Nora, I must have put on thirty pounds by now. You have to stop putting all this temptation in front of me.”

“You’re young. You can work it off.” the woman grinned. “Or... Mr. Reddington will do it for you.”

“Privileges of age.”

“You aren’t old!” Liz objected strenuously. “You’re a vital, beautiful woman and you know it!”

“Well, I’m not dead just yet.” Nora philosophized. “As a matter of record, I’ve seriously been considering taking young Francis up on his offers. That boy needs to be taken down a notch or two and I think I’m just the old MILF who could do it.”

Liz gasped her delight, laughing gaily. “You’re terrible and a bit scandalous!”

“That child propositions me with every pot roast I sit before him these days.” Nora scoffed. “I’ve got sons his age. I feel like boxing his ears good.”

“Oh, come on,” Liz chided playfully, “you know he’s good for your morale, admit it!”

Nora relented, “Well, there’s no harm done, I suppose.”

“How do you do it?” Liz watched the woman haul large trays from the twin ovens.

Nora glanced over at her, “You mean, ‘taking young men under my wing’?”

Liz was tickled, “No...” she giggled infectiously, “I meant... cook for all of us? Those men eat like an Army.”

“Oh, I enjoy it.” Nora dismissed. “I miss when the kids were at home. They were always bringing friends over for dinner.”

“Well, you’re a better man that I am.” Liz admitted her fallacies. “I would just send out for pizza every night.”

Nora clicked her tongue, “Mr. Reddington doesn’t pay me to sit on my can. And it’s nice to be appreciated again.” she sighed, placing her hand on her hip, looking at Liz thoughtfully.

“What’s going on with that guy in the car out front? Silas came in here and stole all my eggs when he showed up earlier.”

“I don’t know anything about it.” Liz hastily denied any involvement in said crime. Too hastily if Nora’s expression was any criteria to judge by.

“I think they’re planning to egg the car.” Liz had heard the plans being drawn up. “But I didn’t have anything to do with it.”

“So you said.” Nora nodded pleasantly.

“You’d think he’d get the hint.”

“I don’t want to pry.” Nora threw her hands up, crossing to the sink. She ran warm water to wash a few pots in. “Besides, I’ll hear all the gruesome details from Francis, I’m sure.”

“That’s because I keep nothing from my little buttercup.”

Both women turned at the unexpected rejoinder.

Francis Holbrook strolled casually into the kitchen making a beeline for the garlic bread that was cooling on a rack by the oven.

“Didn’t Mr. Reddington almost snap your fingers off the other day for the very same thing?” Nora scolded, smacking Francis’ hand smartly.

“He merely threatened to break them.” it was scoffed before the man made a sound in his throat that was anything but disapproving. “Oh, my angel,” he moved very close to Nora, his tone dropping more than suggestively, “you know it drives me crazy when you discipline me.”

Liz grinned for Nora smacked Francis again as the man attempted to nuzzle her neckline.

“Behave!” it was warned. “Or I’ll tell Mr. Reddington about you and your lecherous shenanigans.”

“He knows I’m madly in love with you.” Francis wasn’t intimidated, trying for the other side of the woman’s nape.

“With my brownies, more apt.” Nora corrected, shoving out of Francis’ playful embrace. “Now, sit.” she snapped, narrowing her eyes at the boy. “I’ll make you up a plate but you better mind your ‘P’s’ and ‘Q’s’, young man.”

“I’d rather watch your rather fetching derriere.” Francis sat obediently, amused for Nora’s annoyed glare.

“You’re incorrigible.” she sighed.

“You know you love me.” Francis flirted openly.
Nora softened, “I tolerate you.”

Francis sent a meaningful kiss her way, having pursed his lips more than suggestively.

The woman groaned mentally, “Here, sweetie,” a large portion was set before Elizabeth, “you dig in before those rowdy men get in here.”

“You don’t have to tell me twice.” Liz obeyed more readily than Francis even. “But you sit, Nora... join us.”

“Now remember, I have that dinner tonight.” Nora reminded. “My daughter is trying her wings... she’s nervous. One of her brothers will be at the table and I should be there to soften the blow if all does not come out as planned.” she laughed.

Liz sucked in a breath, “Oh, I’m sorry, I remember!”

“You can’t just walk out and leave me woman!” Francis managed around a mouthful of lasagna. “I’m so lonely.”

“Clean up that VD and you might score yourself some attention.” Nora patted the man’s hand consolingly, before wiping her hand off on a nearby hand towel.

Liz gasped then struck a line through the air as in ‘one for Nora’.

“Dessert is in the fridge.” Nora continued on as if she hadn’t just cut Francis off at the knees.

Francis mooned happily at the woman, though Liz was unsure why. Because there was dessert or because Nora took him down a notch... again.

“...Along with two extra trays of food.” Nora mentioned aside to Elizabeth.

“I heard that, love of my life.” Francis had.

Nora shook her head, “You leave some for Mr. Reddington and if you don’t,” she fumed, “I’ll tell Silas to... do whatever it is he does to degenerates like you, and that’s a promise.”

“Isn’t she magnificent?” Francis sighed dramatically.

Liz rolled her eyes at the man’s theatrics, shrugging. “You did kind of bring that one on yourself.” she muttered to the other woman. “He did say he liked to be disciplined.”

“Is it any wonder I am so smitten?” Francis continued his passionate soliloquy. “Come here my love!” he stood, a force to be reckoned with. “I’d rather eat you than this delicious offering. Come to me.”

Nora remained, unmoved, “I should wash your mouth out with soap for talk like that, but I fear you may even enjoy that.”

Liz stifled her giggle, well used to the exchanges but she enjoyed the bantering tremendously.

“Have a wonderful time with your family, Nora.” Liz forcefully sat Francis back down on his stool. “I’ll miss you so much.”

Francis slid off the other side of the stool rushing to the older woman. “Don’t leave me like this.” he tugged Nora close to his chest his face all to close to hers. “How can you be so cruel? You know what you do to me.”
“I know what I’d like to do to you.” Nora pinched his ear, pulling him back from her sphere.

“I’d be putty in your capable hands.” Francis eagerly offered.

Liz watched the scene, eyes large and wide, stuffing food in her mouth as if she were taking in a morning soap opera on a rare day off.

“...Yes, you would be.” Nora replied huskily, decidedly positive of that fact.

Francis surprisingly... settled. He watched the woman gather her sweater and purse... his mouth agape.

“Goodnight, Elizabeth.” Nora called back to the woman, walking stalwartly past a still quiet reticent young man.

“Sweet dreams...” the woman swept her hands gracefully down her still voluptuous frame, “are made of this.” she exited with an impertinent smile.

Liz couldn’t be sure but she was almost positive she heard more than an undercurrent of sexual innuendo in Nora’s delivery. She swept a finger through the air once again, giving Nora another mark to her score.

The silence was thick as the man slowly made his way back to his stool beside Liz.

“...I felt that one right down to my toes.” he muttered dejectedly. “She’s just... toying with me and my affections.”

Liz laughed out right, “You’re crazy,” she decided, “you are truly insane,” and she also decided, “and I like you just the way you are.”

Francis shrugged mentally returning to his food, “I’ll break her down...”

“What about Lia?” Liz goaded.

Francis waved distractedly, “She’s already succumbed... many, many times,” he waggled his brows, before sobering somewhat, “I love her, she’s my whole reason–”

“...For existing,” Liz rolled her eyes dramatically, “yes, I know.” she nodded sagely. “How very cosmopolitan of you.”

“You going to eat those green beans?” Francis had zeroed in.

“Yes.” Liz held her plate closer, scowling at the man.

Silas sauntered in from the side French doors holding dozens of empty egg cartons in capable arms.

“You’re out of these.” he held the Styrofoam aloft. “What is that amazing aroma.”

Liz beckoned the man over, “Come and get–”

Before she could finish her sentence, the doors swung open again, two burly men pushing Silas aside in the quest for Nora’s manna.
“...Some.” the woman finished lamely.

Francis scooted out of the way, cradling his precious plate protectively as several more men entered, all seemingly famished. Grasping her elbow, the man directed her to follow as he led her to a safe distance and away from the carnage taking place.

Liz watched the large trays dwindle rapidly as each got their fair share.

“How bourgeois!” Silas grumbled accordingly.

Liz adjusted her plate in her grasp as well, following Francis into the dining room.

The seats filled rapidly, except Red’s, of course. The head of the table and to her right. It seemed fitting somehow.

One team would take their break and another would follow.

It was a noisy, hectic time Liz liked best. The house was full with a din of flurry and excitement.

The men had accepted her presence and if they got a little too ‘accepting’, the speech turning too risqué or to questionable subject matter, Silas would always gently remind them a lady was present.

“Shut the hell up!” he snapped over the raucous conversations taking place, putting a faint smile on Liz’s face. The man did not know the meaning of the term... subtle.

“There is a lady sitting at this table and if you want to remain doing the same, you’ll watch your fucking language!”

Apologetic murmurs would follow with Liz graciously offering a sedate, “Yes, you all heard what he fucking said so... watch it! I am indeed a lady of the highest caliber.” she took the garlic bread, running it around the plate, stuffing the sauce covered delicacy into her mouth to prove the point.

Tensions would ease, Silas would reseat himself and the merriment would once again, commence. Just as it did this evening.

“How do you stay so fit?” Liz had turned to Francis at one point, genuinely perplexed. “You eat like a pig.”

“I got stamina, baby.” Francis stole the last piece of her garlic bread.

Liz frowned for the fact but she let him get away with the theft.

“Stamina my ass.” Silas had his doubts on the matter, clearly. “I’ll lay you ten to one, he’s getting Lipo.”

“The only thing sucking on me,” Francis hooked his thumbs to his chest, “are lips.”

“They make blow up dolls with that sucking function now?” Silas lifted innocently enquiring brows.

“Don’t act as if you don’t know that.” Francis continued.

Regardless of the crude topics of conversation, Liz was glad she had instituted evening meals together.

Francis, for all his obvious money and fancy suits, seemed to fit in otherwise with the hardened, military types.
He never put on airs. He could take anything they dished out and frequently returned as good as he got.

Liz glanced over at Silas as he and the younger man talked. It was odd. She really didn’t know all that much about Francis.

Of course, the same could be said of any of the men who protected the house.

“...So,” Francis interrupted her thoughts, as the men drifted back to their duties or went off to enjoy their downtime, “what’s on the agenda for tonight?”

“Francis,” Liz absently watched Silas clear away his plate, “do you really want to be here?”

“That’s a stupid question... where else would I be?”

“Any number of places I should imagine,” she was resigned but not happy over the matter. “You don’t have to be... I know Red has asked you to look in on me from time to–”

“Let’s watch scary movies.” Francis interrupted rudely. “Have you seen that creepy fog outside?”

“Fog?” Liz glanced toward the French doors but lace covered the panes.

“You want I should murder...” Silas jerked his head in the general vicinity of Tom’s location. “Cause if you do,” he picked up his dessert plate, inhaling the rich aroma, “I have nothing else on my agenda for this wondrous evening.”

Liz sought out the window panes, “My God,” she turned, “it is spooky out there. When did this roll in?”

“So observant.” Silas tsked, crossing to the sink.

“Silas, I’ll get it.” Liz hurried over.

“Oh, I wouldn’t think of denying Junior here of his ‘scare fest’,” Silas pushed up Henley sleeves, “and we can’t have Nora returning to a kitchen sink full of dishes... I got this. I was a Boy Scout once.”

“Sure you were.” Francis’ face said it all.

“Isn’t this... woman’s work?” Liz tested the waters, keeping her humor under wraps.

“You say that to my mama and she’d slap you in the face.” Silas pointed at the woman.

“... You had a mama?” Francis was shocked.

“Unlike you.” Silas retorted. “Didn’t Mulder and Scully find you in Area 51 inside a packing crate labeled, Alien Fetus?”

Francis looked slightly bemused, “Do they label things like that in Area 51? Because you know... it’s a dead giveaway.”

“That’s classified.” Silas delivered the line so stoically, Liz hesitated, almost wondering if he had worked at the Top Secret base.

“If I told you anything,” he lifted solemn eyes, “... I’d have to kill you.”

“Didn’t you just divulge classified information?” Liz brightened. “But on the other hand, it is a perfect night for a murder.” She smiled cheerfully at Francis.

Silas smiled pseudo-pleasantly which in itself was kind of creepy.

“Stop it.” Francis implored the man to do so. “That’s not funny.”

Liz had to agree, “You’re freaking me out.” she sent her guard a determined scowl.

“I’ll change into some jeans,” Francis plucked at his suit and tie, “and meet you downstairs.”

Curiosity ‘plucked’ at Elizabeth Keen, “You look nice,” she said, making the man hesitate in his steps. Her eyes scanned the man’s expensive threads, while the man preened, “where do you work exactly?”

“No where if I can help it.” the man called back over his shoulder.

Liz glanced at Silas but the large man only returned to rinsing and stacking plates in the dishwasher.

Liz popped some corn and gathered a bowlful of assorted candies, heading off to the large room below.

She situated herself having chosen a few different movies from the correct genre, tossing throws on either lounge in case it got cooler later on. The air conditioning always affected her if she sat still for any length of time.

Francis arrived, a stack of movies in hand. She shrugged indifference as he put a DVD into place.

They settled in after the man shut down the lights.

Bad weather had been predicated coming in from the West tonight and on cue, the wind picked up and distant rolls of thunder echoed deep in the dark skies.

“Told you so.” Francis approved on Nature’s assistance. “Perfect night.”

“Yeah, for a tornado.” Liz had never been in one but had seen the aftermath.

“We don’t have tornados in Washington D.C.”

“Yea, and they won’t travel over water or occur on mountainous regions either.” she cast a doubtful glance his way. Especially since she vividly recalled one a couple years ago killing two people.

“All right, maybe we do,” he conceded, “but not tonight.” he assured. “Don’t be a scaredy cat, sit back and enjoy the movie.”

Liz sighed, deciding to do just that although this particular movie, while having some thrills throughout, turned into a fantastically cheese affair which left them both laughing at the lameness of it all.

The second fare was not so ‘lame’. Several times Liz caught herself scrunching back into the seat, grimacing, unconsciously leaning towards her companion at a key moment in the action.
As the drama increased her nerves grew taut, she bunched the soft fabric of her blanket to her chin even pulling it over her eyes a couple times.

She hastily checked with her movie partner, embarrassed to have done so.

Francis hadn’t even noted, his eyes glued to the screen as he nervously nibbled on his Snicker bar.

Liz returned her interest post haste to the gory happenings on the screen as well, unwilling to miss anything of import.

The actress moved slowly down a creepy corridor, the camera allowing the viewer to walk along with her.

At the end of the hall was a flight of stairs and of course, the actress ascended them, one by one. The eerie music of the score added beautifully to the suspense. As the actress reached for the door handle...

“Boo.” a slow deep voice resonated directly behind the moviegoers, hot breath brushing against Elizabeth’s neck.

Followed by a loud crescendo that signaled the end of the actress exactly coinciding with the unexpected fright.

“Holy fuck!” Francis jerked upright, bolting from his seat.

Liz yelped shrilly, kicking out, her foot accidentally toppling the nearly empty popcorn bowl.

Red Reddington chuckled lowly, having enjoyed the fact that both had come unglued so easily.

“Well, thank God I wasn’t the axe murderer.” he mentioned in passing. “Well... not this time.”

Liz had grabbed her heart, and even now was trying to calm it down from its rapid beating.

Bracing his arms on the back of the couch, Red leaned down, placing a kiss on the woman’s pulse point. He smiled against the soft flesh as the little woman’s little heartbeat fluttered with her perfectly manufactured panic.

“I’ve been standing here, breathing down your necks for a good five minutes.” he continued, holding his grin... just. “You both could have ended up on the butcher block.”

“Very funny, Red Reddington!” Liz snapped peevishly.

“I think I just pissed myself.” Francis ‘checked’.

A loud piercing scream filled the room. Liz made a dash for Red before her brain could assimilate that it had originated from the television set.

She halted mid-rush, feeling foolish. “I... I thought that was Francis for a s-second.”

Red’s eyes were filled with gentle humor. He turned his attention to Francis who was still ‘checking’ if an accident had occurred only he had moved to the back of his jeans this time.

The kid held such a serious expression that Red almost laughed out loud.

“Her,” he motioned to Elizabeth with a jerk of his head, “I can see maybe losing it... she’s just a girl.” he disdained the fact.
Liz pulled a face, crossing her eyes at the man for the ‘slight’.

Red held his growing amusement. It was good to be home. “But you, Francis?” the older man tsksed.

“Hey!” Francis jabbed a finger at the offending accuser. “Contrary to popular opinion,” he made reference to Silas’ earlier remark disparaging Francis’ birthright, “I am only human besides, you have thirty-thousand armed men swarming this place,” the tirade was continued, “if I can’t let my guard down here, where can I?”

Red was making his way around the couch, seeking out Elizabeth who had lifted her arms out to his embrace, lifting on her tippy-toes to meet the man’s intended ‘welcome home’ kiss.

Red wasn’t about to deny himself this little perk.

As a matter of record, the minute he crossed the threshold in the past, he had no qualms with the fact, he readily searched her out. He had been anticipating kissing the woman for hours now.

This little mouth, that tonight, tasted of a slight hint of chocolate and red wine, was rapidly beginning to be his greatest vice.

“You’re home.” Liz cuddled up to him, clinging to his presence. She could feel the warmth of his palm against the fabric of her blouse. She had not realized how desperately she had needed the man’s touch.

“I’m glad your constituents were not here to witness that little display.” Red answered Francis’ retort absently, his true interest for the scrumptious little body tucked up against him.

Something felt... off.

Elizabeth was all smiles but the man sensed a current running below surface... something was bothering her.

“Is everything all right?” he murmured for her alone.

“Why don’t you ask me that, you sadistic bastard.”

Red ignored Francis, concentrating on Elizabeth.

She nodded, smiling brightly up at him. “Everything is great... now that you’re here.” she hugged him harder, laying her head on his shoulder after another brief kiss.

“What have you two brats been up to in my absence?” he would definitely explore this topic further but at another time. He picked up that Lizzy would prefer that option.

He tightened his arms about the small body, feeling a slight tremor rack her frame.

Liz felt it as well, hastily leaving the shelter of his arms knowing how astute the man could be. She helped Francis pick up the spilled popcorn.

“We thought it would be a wonderful idea to scare the living hell out of each other since it apparently,” she sought Red out, “was a perfect night—”

“For a murder.” Francis finished in-sync and a private chuckle was shared by the two.

Liz clutched the bowl to her chest as she arose. “Have you eaten? Are you hungry?”
“No, I haven’t.” the man lifted his arm and Liz came into the sphere created more than willingly. “And yes, I am.” he suddenly realized.

His appetite had been ‘iffy’ these past few days. He found it returning with a vengeance. It was truly good to be home... with this woman by his side.

The house felt warm and inviting. The rain had been torrential on his drive from the airport. Visibility was low. It seemed it had taken forever to get here.

Red settled his hand on the small of Lizzy’s back, enjoying the gentle sway of her ass as she steered him to the kitchen.

“What about me?” Francis pouted, following them if only to voice his rising resentment for being neglected. “What am I all of a sudden? A figment of your imagination?”

“How in the hell can you be hungry?” Liz pushed through the kitchen door, making for the fridge. “You had two plates of lasagna and we’ve been snacking the last three hours.” she was beside herself.

“I’ll get that.” Francis pushed past the woman, extracting one of the large pans Nora had prepared.

Red intercepted the object, much to Francis’ chagrin, placing it on the counter top beside the microwave.

“He has a tapeworm.” Red ignored the indignant expression offered his way, sucking the sauce from his thumb which had dripped from the overstuffed pan.

“I know from past experience, to get first chance at food where you are concerned.” Red cut a section of the dish, placing it on the plate Liz provided. “Want some, baby?”

“Yes... thank you.” Francis batted his eyes coquettishly Red’s way.

“I’m good.” Liz chuckled, crossing diligently to secure another few plates because Dembe had entered the colorful scene.

She handed plates to both men with a beguiling smile, “Hello, Dembe. Good trip?”

“Mediocre at best.” was the quiet reply.

“Will you be joining us tonight, Dembe?” Red handed over the heated dish with relish.

Francis was saddened, watching the plate disappear from his reach.

Dembe’s scowl increased two-fold, snatching the plate from Francis’ vicinity. “...My show.”

Red deftly punched the numbers on the keypad, heating up another slice of the delicious smelling delicacy.

“Ah, yes,” he admitted his memory lapse, “I forgot. Well you are going to miss a cultured event, I’m sure.” the man clearly being sarcastic. “I personally can’t wait for, Night of the Living Dead... it’s right up there on my bucket list of movies to see before I die.”

“We already watched that one.” Francis sulked.

“You enjoy Downton Abbey, Dembe.” Red moved on after a slight scowl in Francis’ direction.
“Downton Abbey?” Francis brightened, sitting straighter on the stool he had taken a few seconds earlier. “Hey! Did you see that part where Mr. Bates rpmh–”

Red’s hand hastily slapped over the young man’s mouth attempting to hush a still muttering ‘victim’.

“Do not spoil it for him.” it was warned tersely. “He about killed a man in London for the very same offense.”

Dembe shot Francis a steady glare.

Francis settled instantly, falling quiet. He smiled sedately for a still glowering Dembe.

Red pulled the piping hot plate from the microwave, turning about.

He pulled up short for Francis was standing there, directly in front of him, eyeing the food covetously.

“How did you...” Red trailed off, measuring the distance from where the kid had been to where they now stood.

Red let it go, reluctantly handing over the plate.

“Don’t you dare!” Liz scolded soundly, “Give it back! Red is starving!” she smacked Francis’ bicep soundly, her expression stern.

“It’s all right, Lizzy.” Red chuckled, returning to the near empty tray to try his luck again. “It’s not like I didn’t expect it.”

“It’s not like he didn’t expect it.” Francis stated, taking his food back to his place at the large island.

“You are impossible.” Liz fumed.

Red started the microwave yet again, sighing heavily. He cut Francis a side ways glance, “Is the fridge in the entertainment room stocked or has the gluttonous pig here cleared us out?”

“How you paint me..” Francis said around a mouthful of food.

“Do I need to take a few beers?” he directed the question to Liz who hastily sat the beer down Red had procured for himself upon entering the kitchen.

“Ohh!” the woman glanced at the half-finished bottle guiltily, “Eh... no, there is plenty down there.”

Francis’ expression said it all.

“Well, I didn’t think...” Liz finished the sentence in her head, ‘he would mind me drinking his beer or Francis taking his food’.

Red grinned over at her, “Baby, you know what’s mine is yours, right?”

“Evidently.” Francis smirked condescendingly.

Liz had the grace to flush. “I’ll get you a fresh one.” she instantly rushed to do so. “You go get some comfortable clothes on,” she turned the man gently, “shoo!”

“As you wish.” Red inclined his head slightly, holding his amusement. He hesitated, having made his trek a few steps.
“Francis, if anything disappears off my plate...” Red’s hand reached, gently running the length of the butcher block full of knives, “I will cut you.”

Francis’ smile faded rapidly and the man took a giant step back from his intended advancement toward the unguarded plate, at the not so veiled threat.

“I will guard it with my life, Red.” Francis promised faithfully.

Liz chuckled, shaking her head at the antics. She heated some sides, searching out a serving tray. “You deserved that one.”

Red continued his trek, his foot steps rather jaunty now.

Liz hummed while she arranged Red’s dinner tray.

“I’ll take that for you, Lizzy.” Francis offered politely.

“Oh, no you won’t.” she laughed at the absurdity. “This will be gone in record time.”

“Come on...” the man pooh-poohed such a notion, “you heard Red, I just want to help out.”

“Help yourself to Red’s food more like it.” she wasn’t buying it.

“I won’t, I promise.” Francis persisted. “Cross my heart and hope to die.”

“Your fingers are crossed behind your back, aren’t they.” Liz lifted the tray.

“How utterly childish.”

“Francis, I can see the reflection in the microwave.” she sighed lightly.

Francis hastily uncrossed his fingers.

“I solemnly swear,” he raised two fingers, as if he’d ever pass for a Boy Scout...

“It’s three fingers.” Liz cocked her head patiently.

Another finger was instantly added, “On my grandmothers grave.”

“I thought you were spawned.” she reminded.

“It hasn’t been proven...” he countered.

“Just get another plate, you dolt!” the woman was stupefied.

Francis mood and shoulders dropped, “It’s just not the same. There’s no challenge.”

The woman shook her head woefully, “There is something drastically wrong with you.”

“Maybe human and alien DNA isn’t as compatible as they thought...” the man mused.

Liz had situated the tray in front of Red’s usual seat, remembering to grab a beer from the fridge.

The man himself entered, instantly crossing to exchange plates with Francis who had switched the large piece for the smaller he had cut himself.

Liz gasped, having witnessed the spectacle.
“Could you get me a beer, Liz?” Francis craned about with an earnest expression.

Liz gaped indignantly. “I will not!”

“I was guarding it...” the man explained his actions.

“Your word of honor?” Liz snapped.

“There is no honor among thieves, Lizzy.” Red reminded, having taken his seat, lifting his fork.

“Obviously.” Liz yanked Red’s garlic bread from Francis’s hand.

“You drank his beer.” Francis accused. “And you stole his bacon the other morning.” he reminded.

Elizabeth’s mouth slackened, her shoulders slumping slightly. There was no retort she could make to that.

She had stolen Red’s beer and bacon.

“Set in judgement on me.” Francis tsked. “Little moocher.”

Liz turned to Red wide eyed and pouty. “I did...” her mouth fell further.

“What ever she wants, she shall have.” Red quoted airily. “These green beans are delicious.” he ate heartily.

And the evening progressed.

“Have you seen this one, Lizzy?” Red approved of the old classic Francis had chosen.

Liz was already deeply invested in the movie, however, not hearing the inquiry.

“S... my dad loved this movie.” she replied off-handedly, catching her error in time. “He was always trying to get me to watch it with him.” Liz remembered she had always been too ‘busy’ with one thing or another.

It saddened her now. She should have made the time.

“It was originally set in 3-D.” Red informed the younger set.

But Liz was gone, off in that world where a good movie could take a person.

Red smiled for the fact returning his own interest to the unfolding storyline.

A small, delicate female ran haphazardly through the dark wet streets of a late night New York. Her pursuer was close behind, a misshapen, crippled hulk of what used to be, a man.

Liz held her breath in the quiet of the room. The female star’s shoes clicked noisily on the cobbled pavement of the streets as she ran, alerting her stalker to her every location.

“Take them off you idiot.” Liz whispered tersely.

Thankfully, the heroine wasn’t as stupid as those in the last movie, tugging the buttoned-up half ankle boots frantically from her small feet. Rounding a corner, having been given a small respite from the harrowing chase, she gathered her senses about her.

Liz’s breath caught and held as the grotesquely marred face came into the light of a street lamp as the maniacal stalker halted at one point, just feet away from his intended victim who huddle in terror just around the bend of a building.

The tension ended as the killer turned, heading off another way.

Liz quietly bit her thumb nail as the heroine ran to a nearby house, frantically pounding on a gigantic door.

The killer, of course, heard the commotion, now alerted to his prey’s whereabouts.

The man moved with remarkable speed to be so hideously disfigured.

But finally, the door was opened and the actress was admitted into the bright and relative security of a safe harbor.

By the end of the movie, Liz enthusiastically clapped as the credits rolled. “Oh that was fun!” she had enjoyed the entertainment. “I liked that one a lot. No wonder my dad was so disappointed.”

Francis grabbed a box of Milk Duds from the candy bowl, “The boyfriend should have saved her.”

“Charlie Bronson in an early role, playing one of the bad guys.” Red searched the bowl absently, finally choosing a package of peanut M&M’s. Why not get into the spirit of things. “Wonder why they made him a mute?”

“Vincent Price is wasted on these things. He’s a much better actor than credited.”

Francis’ insight surprised Red, “I think so too.”

Liz was concentrated on opening her Twizzlers.

“I’ve got one here,” Francis held up the DVD, an evil gleam in his eyes, “that will even scare you.”

Red spread his hands agreeably, “Bring it on.”

The last show made Liz’s skin crawl. The plot had more holes than Swiss cheese, but the visuals left you feeling squeamish and slightly freaked out.

As an FBI agent, Liz constantly was considering how she, herself, would get out of the impossible situations presented in the film.

By the end, Liz had tunneled close to Red, squeezing her eyes tightly whenever the buzzing sounds would begin on screen.

“Pansy.” Francis mumbled at one particularly gruesome part, opening his newly acquired Kit-Kat bar.

Red dropped his arm which had been held aloft, onto the back of the couch, inches away from Francis’ position.

The boy jumped ten feet in the air, his chocolate bar flying practically across the room.

Liz chuckled the tension in her body away.

“You think he can save you from my nefarious ways?” Francis fought back.

“Red will always protect me from the criminally insane.” Liz proclaimed proudly.
“I’m no petty criminal.”

Red jerked his head, having taken a drink of his beer.

“I said, petty.” Francis clarified.

Liz sought out her cuddle buddy, “What?”

“I was questioning the ‘insane’ part.” Red quipped.

“Oh...” Francis took his seat only to start visibly as a severed leg flew at the screen.

At the end of the gore-fest, both Liz and Francis gave out short screams of exclamation, faces white and strained.

“You didn’t see that coming?” Red has almost choked on his Junior Mints. “Must be the director’s version of a climax.” he smoothed Lizzy’s frayed hair into a semblance of order. “Thank God it isn’t yours.” he murmured sensually into her ear.

“Does nothing scare you?” Francis was beside himself.

“That fact that your reactions might get out and I have to be seen in public with you.” Red commented dryly.

“If it does get out...” the boy replaced the disc in it’s case, “I’ll know who to come after.”

“And you know where to find me,” Liz wasn’t intimidated.

“I meant him.” Francis was confused now.

Liz giggled, her soft socks rubbing against Red’s shin as she cuddled up closer to the man.

She tried to shiver off her eerie feeling, “No more icky movies for me.”

Red took the hint patting her hip, as she struggled off the couch. He followed her lead. “Yeah, I think we’ve all had enough for one outing.”

Francis stretched luxuriously, sleepily traipsing after the two down the dimly lit hall.

His mischievous side emerged however as he saw a very vulnerable victim who had definitely let her guard down.

He sneaked closer, watching Red more than Liz.

Red turned his head slowly, offering an expressionless stare.

Francis feigned ignorance, managing an indignant huff directly before he goosed Liz, making her jump a good foot off the ground.

Francis whizzed past before Red could deliver the death blow, rushing up the stairs to his room, the loudly closed door shutting off his maniacal laughter.

“Sweet dreams, Lizzy!” echoed down the empty hall in his wake.

“There is something seriously wrong with that man.” Red’s tone held a finality with which Liz could identify.
She nodded agreeably, a fixed scowl on the pretty features.

“I’m going to put these dishes in the washer,” Red had balanced the tray and plates artfully, his free hand having secured her waist, “you can go on to the—”

“No!” she replied too quickly. “I’ll stay with you.”

Red chuckled lowly.

“I’m not scared or anything,” the woman stated stoutly, “I’m not...I just missed you, that’s all.”

“I see.” Red finished the chore, and they went, hand in hand to the master bedroom.

The man closed the door, turning. The woman stood, looking small and fragile in the oversized room.

“Going to shower?” he motioned accordingly, sitting his watch on the bedside table.

Liz thought over the last few hours, “You could join me.”

“I could do that.” Red wasn’t adverse. “I most certainly could do that.”

Minutes later, he had divested her of any encumbrances, he himself, joining the woman in the steamy shower stall.

He was charmed by her lyrical giggle as he moved them under the numerous jets of hot water.

The man glanced down her body, his eyes enjoying the visual treat.

“I’m highly distracted right now.” he forewarned, moving decidedly closer to the slippery little frame. “Anyone could just,” his forefinger lightly moved over the tiny bead of her nipple, “walk right on in here...”

“It’ll just be Silas.” She sighed as the man gathered her long strands, administering shampoo after the fact. She stood perfectly still under such arousing antics, her eyes closing.

“He knocks now, you know.” she muttered distractedly as she soaped the man’s pectorals, drawing little hearts into the downy hair.

“Will wonders never cease.” Red leaned, his mouth trailing soft kisses down her nape.

Liz lost herself in the man’s soothing touch. “It’s much nicer when you are in here with me.” she made mention.

Red soaped the pert little breasts, his palms running over the satin flesh onto the flat stomach, into the heated spot between her legs.

“It certainly is...”

Liz reached behind her, feeling the hard evidence of the man’s arousal. She spread her hands, her fingers grasping the thickness of his thighs on either side.

Liz moved enticingly, pressing his hardness into her backside.

A low sound escaped the man’s lips.
Liz turned about, taking his cock in her hand, squeezing the stiffness encouragingly, her mouth parting for his kiss.

His tongue eased gently past her lips, the tip flitting erotically, dancing with her more timid one.

Her touch was like a soothing balm. Red felt the stress and tension that had been building all week bleed away.

He was acutely disappointed when her warm grip slackened, her hand tracing up his torso, kneading his shoulders with a gentle pressure.

“Bad week?” she had felt the change in his body.

“Long week.” he lay his forehead against hers. “I missed you.”

“That seems to be the general consensus with us.” she smiled. “It’s nice to hear.”

She lifted her mouth and he devoured it hungrily, she pressed her breasts into his chest, her arms lifting about his neck.

Red’s arms tightened, bringing the slender frame closer into his hold. Elizabeth felt the bulge between them, her mouth eagerly responding to this demands arduously.

“Did you miss me...” she had allowed the kiss to run it’s course, breathless at its completion. “A lot?”

“Let me show you how much, baby.” the man’s own tone much more edgier than before, low and intense causing Liz to shiver happily in its wake.

Red lifted her bodily, leaning his back hastily against the heated shower stall, urging her to climb his sturdy frame, his palms lifting effortlessly on the woman’s firm ass cheeks to ensure she comply.

Liz hooked her legs about his waist, easing down on the slick tip of his cock as Red held it for just such an occurrence.

The man groaned brokenly, instantly thrusting gently into the delicious pleasure offered. He gasped breathlessly into her parted mouth.

Elizabeth held tight to his solid shoulders, encouraging any and all activity Red’s inventive brain could devise.

And Red Reddington could be very inventive when he chose.

Both watched their romantic interlude. The visual of Red’s engorged cock, wet with her slick arousal, thrusting quickly into her body brought Liz to a nerve shattering climax only moments later. Red followed very close behind, enraptured by the sight and sounds of Lizzy coming in his strong hold.

It felt so good to feel his hot cream explode inside her suddenly aching cavern, to hear the intense groan of the release as it engulfed the man.

How could she not respond to stimuli like that?

Later, laying in bed, his arms about her, was now the most natural thing in the world.

She savored the quiet sound of his breathing. The wind outside howled fearfully but here, in the sanctuary of his embrace Liz felt a contentment like never before.
“I keep telling you, insisting really,” Red’s thoughts were along similar lines, “that this is your house.” he mused. “I guess you’re wondering why I keep just making myself at home... how I constantly wind up here in your bed.”

“I’m just one lucky girl, I guess.” she shrugged slender shoulders. “But seriously–”

“I thought that was a serious statement.”

She smiled, sighing contentedly, “I don’t like that you think of it in those terms. You said, what’s mine is yours.” she sought him out, flipping on her tummy to do so, “doesn’t it apply both ways?”

“As long as it’s truly what you want.” Red was happy with her reply. “I can be... Silas says I inflict my will on other’s, I don’t consciously do it with you. I hope you believe that.”

“It’s just that...” Red scowled slightly, remembering how he sat his watch on the bedside table, on his side. He hadn’t even second guessed his actions at the time.

He had walked through her house as though he belonged there. Was completely comfortable in his surroundings.

And Lizzy hadn’t questioned it, at all.

“I feel comfortable here, I don’t even think most times...”

“As it should be.” she approved. “It’s very domestic of us, don’t you think?” she smiled happily, pressing her breasts into his chest then sighed at his dour expression.

“Maybe you think too much which is more than we can say for Francis.” she threw the small alarm clock she kept on her night stand at the ceiling, “I’m going to come up there and throttle you Francis Holbrook!”

The man had been making weird sounds up in his room now for some few moments, all of which Liz and Red had chose to ignore.

“How do you throttle someone, by the way?” she lay back on her tummy.

“We’ve never been what one could call... conventional.” Red continued where his thoughts left off. “Nothing about how we came to be,” he motioned between them to indicate his meaning, “has been conventional.”

He personally enjoyed the spontaneity, the off beat path they had traveled which was so very... them.

They had found their own type of ‘normal’, he supposed. The unusual fit somehow.

He had always been a nonconformist.

“We should never have happened, according to logic.” he continued more slowly, feeling his way. “Heads will roll if...when... our involvement becomes public knowledge but,” he scowled, “I guess what I’m asking is... how do you see our relationship for lack of a better word?”

Red had never found himself in such a situation. It stymied him, what was a naïve, younger woman feeling?

He had fallen in love with Elizabeth Keen. Pure and simple but their involvement was anything but simple.
What would she say if he confessed the depth of his emotions for her?

She could not possibly return the sentiment for it was so early on in the proceedings.

His instincts were telling him to take the risk, go on and tell her the truth about how he felt.

But that would force Lizzy into a place she perhaps, was not ready to be.

He could start off small... and build. Actions spoke more highly in Red’s book. He was good with actions but words failed him in this instance.

He had searched high and low for the correct ones but they all seemed to fall flat according to his lofty expectations.

The moment had never been quite right.

What if that moment never came?

The idea did not set well with him. He never gave up hope, he was a realist with a touch of optimistic dreams mixed in. His mother’s contribution, he took for granted.

“Woolgathering?” Liz had resumed her former position beside him, her nails gently writing nondescript trails on Red’s hair covered forearm as she patiently waited for the man to continue his words.

“Lizzy...” Red was getting anxious, fidgety, “are you happy?”

“Yes.” she smiled, happily, her tone soft, a mere whisper of that emotion.

“Do you even know what I’m asking?”

“I’m happy we’ve found each other.” she thought she hit upon it.

“We aren’t exactly like other couples.” he put it mildly.

“What do you mean?” she hesitated. “We go to dinner, we date, we... travel we... make love.” she resumed her pastime.

“Don’t tell me you don’t have reservations about us.”

“You mean,” she didn’t pretend to not understand, “the team?” she had been thinking about that, yes.

She laid quietly for a spell, “It’s none of their business what I do in my private life.” she never pried or interfered with theirs. “Nor am I, in any way, embarrassed by the fact we are together.”

She turned her head slightly feeling his steady breath against the side of her temple. “Red, I’ve done what society expected of me,” the woman heaved a sigh, “all it got me was a psychotic ex-husband with a stalker fetish and anger management issues.”

She turned in his arms, her expression a wistful one. “It’s my turn to live my life how I deem suitable.”

Without knowing it, she had come to a decision and... it felt good.

“I like being a part of...” she motioned to his chest, “I think we have something special here.” she eased up on the notion so as not to startle her prey away. “I enjoy being... a couple. I hope what exists between us, is an ever growing trust. A mutual respect... it is there on my part.”

Red marveled at the growth the woman exhibited.

“When we first started out, I will admit to a bit of confusion maybe,” she wasn’t sure that was the right words, “it scared me, when you said out right that you wanted to move towards... you know.”

Marriage.” he supplied almost sternly.

“Well, yes. But now...” she pulled her bottom lip into her teeth, “people are always expressing unwanted opinions on my life! I guess I was trying to please them instead of myself.”

A deep scowl graced her forehead, “I’m tired of catering to someone who isn’t even a real part of my life!”

She lifted large blue eyes, “You’re a part of my life. A very, very important part. I hope you know that.”

“I do now.” his body had lost all it’s restlessness.

“You give me exactly what I need, Red.” she gently traced his mouth. “In all areas of my life.”

“Don’t placate me, Elizabeth.” he thought for one horrible moment, she might be. Madeline and Natalia were experts at manipulation. Red had grown wary.

“You would sense if I were.” she lifted a focused gaze. “I wouldn’t do that.” she stopped her antics, her fingers stilling. “After Tom... no, I wouldn’t do that.’

“The thought keeps reoccurring,” Red ran his hand about his neck, “I think, maybe you need something... someone more conventional... more normal.”

“Normalcy is overrated.” she disdained. “Why don’t you ask me what I need?” she taunted. “Because I will say it, right out like you do.”

Red hesitated not able to read the woman who lay so passively in his embrace.

“I’m asking.”

“What I need most... is to know that we’re in this together,” she replied quietly, “that you won’t bail when the going is rough.”

“You know me better than that, dammit.”

“I need to know... and believe,” she ignored his mood, “that what is developing between us is... real.”

Red’s mood evaporated into nothingness. He searched the lovely features religiously.

“I know these are just words right now,” he moved closer to the woman, his breath smelling of mint mouthwash and Junior Mints.

“I love whatever it is we have, Lizzy.” he realized it was clumsily stated. “Nothing has ever felt so real, at least on my part.”

She traced his jawline with tentative fingers, her eyes fretful. “I want so desperately to believe you but you know that.”
“If you will be patient,” he prayed she would, “I will prove my sincerity beyond doubt.”

“I’m not going anywhere.” she leaned, her lips parting his sensually, holding a promise for later. “I guess, we both just need reassurance from time to time, huh?”

The dark blue orbs held her affection. “I didn’t expect that from you.”

“That I would want to know if you were,” he wasn’t sure he followed, “happy with our relationship?”

“You’re always so sure of yourself, so confident.” she nodded slowly.

“In work.” he granted. “With you?” he curled a silken strand of hair about his finger, “This wasn’t supposed to happen,” he mused almost guiltily, “but I’m so damned grateful it has.” the light eyes held a steely determination.

Elizabeth’s heart filled with love for the man. She almost declared the fact right there and then. The man sobered somewhat, “…I get afraid that because I want this so much…”

“It will be taken away.” Liz concluded in the same manner.

He lifted his gaze, a searing intensity in the gray eyes.

“…Yes.” he whispered his despair.

“God would not be so cruel.”

“I haven’t exactly been on His good side of late.” he admitted tightly.

“Don’t think like that.” Elizabeth scolded. “Because God doesn’t... he will forgive us much more readily than we do ourselves.”

“Will he?”

“I want you here, is all I know for certain.” Elizabeth did not want to get into semantics at a time like this. “And I have never been so happy, not ever.”

“We will revisit this conversation in the future, I am sure but for now...” he was more than mollified.

His lips gently coaxed a response for the woman, her arms lifting about his neckline.

Red tightened his embrace, situating himself between easily parted thighs.

A scraping sound much like the effect of nails on a chalkboard broke the delicate moment.

Liz startled jerkily in his embrace, gasping audibly, her eyes large and vacant.

Red glanced irritably toward the Eastern most window, “I told the gardeners to take care of that damned thing!”

Liz breathed a sigh of relief, “Guess they didn’t get around to it.” she listened to the heavy limb tap restlessly against the pane.

“The wind must have shifted.” Red returned his interest elsewhere, “Look at my baby,” he teased, “hellcat one minute,” he glanced covetously down at her bared breasts, “and scaredy cat the next.”
“Oh, you jumped too!” she knew he had not though. She huffed, swirling about, pulling the covers up over her shoulders.

“Does this mean I’m not going to score tonight?” Red feared the worst by the set of the small, huddled shoulders.

“You’ve already scored,” she reminded, rather huffily.

“That was just a pre-game.”

The covers were pulled higher.

The man weighed his options which seemed to be dwindling by the second. He leaned over, grabbing the radio off his table.

Liz was instantly up, a fretful look on her face. “You did hear something!”

“No...” Red denied the accusation, “Silas, have a little job for you.”

It was wet inside Lizzy’s pussy too... nice and hot and steamy wet and Red wanted an open invitation... and he thought he knew a way around her pique.

“Could you go bang on Francis’ door, really loudly and then... vanish?”

Silas’ throaty chuckle shivered along Liz’s already tenuous flesh.

“Well that would be downright dastardly, did he frighten our little fawn this evening?”

“Not at all.” Red heeded Liz’s attempts to alert him to the folly of such damaging information in Silas’ capable hands. “Just wanted you to do me a small favor. I’ll owe you one.”

“Pay backs are hell.” Silas was grateful for something to relieve his growing boredom in truth. “I’ll see what I can come up with, Boss.”

“Copy.” Red replaced the radio on it’s perch, well satisfied with himself.

The house fell completely and eerily silent.

The woman had taken her former spot in Red’s arms, her nudity stimulating Red’s already heightened state.

He tried not to let on.

The bed felt good after all the hotel rooms and other not so pleasant places he had laid his head this past week.

Red wondered, because he had stayed a few times in five star hotels... was it the bed or the person in it, which made the structure so inviting.

Liz huddled close, her eyes darting around the room at darkened spots, the shadowing movement of things in the night.

She waited, for what, she had no clue. Silas could probably be diabolical if he put his mind to it.
What did the man have in store for poor unsuspecting Francis, then again, the little shit had been relentlessly pestering her and Red this past half hour now, trying to frighten her, she realized.

She never should have agreed to those spooky movies. She realized her mistake too late.

“Shh, shh...” Red shushed, even thought the woman hadn’t said a word. His tone held a tight glee Liz had never heard before, “here it comes.”

Liz heard nothing, in reality.

She perked her ears up, listening harder.

The woman’s body reacted before her brain when loud stomping, much on the level of Star Wars Stormtroopers, filled the upper landing.

Loud banging thudded the walls, a din of mixed voices lifted, moaning and screeching indistinguishable syllables. A tremendous crash had the woman bolting straight out of bed, a man’s horror filled scream ran the length of her spine.

The woman scrambled back into Red’s arms, clutching him close.

Running feet pounded the thick carpeted floor above them as the young man flung his door wide.

“You bastards!” Francis was voicing his concerns in no uncertain terms, “I think I shit myself across the room!”

Red’s laugh rang out, the outcome of his little prank better than he could have hoped for. “That kid kills me.”

Liz looked at him as if he had suddenly grown two heads. “You are terrible!” she proclaimed but his laughter was infectious and soon, she too was giggling her mirth.

Dembe’s stoic voice interrupted the melee, “Francis,” the cultured accent drifted through the active radio on the side table, “is there something wrong?”

“Didn’t you just hear that rat bastard banging on my door?” Francis was beyond astonished.

“I heard nothing.” was Dembe’s solemn reply.

Red muffled his chuckle.

“You didn’t hear that?” Francis questioned plaintively.

“I heard you.” Dembe delivered his lines with a staid demeanor. “Nothing more.”

Silence filled the air waves.

Liz could only imagine Francis’ face.

“Good night, Francis.” Dembe shut his door, leaving Francis Holbrook examining a completely empty hallway for possible evidence of paranormal activity.

The radio crackled again which made Elizabeth jump.
“Good night, Raymond,” Dembe’s tone was laced with a smile for his part in the previous deception, “...Elizabeth.”

“Good night, Dembe.” Red’s tone had softened with gentle humor. “I rate your acting abilities right up there with Anthony Hopkins.”

“I was striving for Sir Laurence Olivier.” The radio clicked silent.

“Work on the accent my friend...” Red smiled, sitting the radio aside.

“You people!” Liz felt bad for Francis but she had no clue as to why. She scooted to her side of the bed, wanting no part in such mean antics. “It won’t be so funny when you wake up to find Francis crawling in between us.”

She situated the covers primly, laying back on her pillow, shaking her head ruefully for all the goings on around here tonight.

A thunderous rattle of a large fist against their closed bedroom door had the woman reacting instantly.

Liz scrambled, scurrying across the space between her and Red in record time.

She hid her face in the man’s neckline, cursing soundly.

“Haven’t heard language like that since my sea-faring days.” Red chuckled his approval, brushing her hair out of his face.

“What is wrong with you creepy bastards?” she wanted to know, her breath coming in captured gasps.

Red rubbed her back, calming the panicked woman soothingly. He tried very hard to hide his glee.

“Thank you, Silas.” he called out, always one to remember his collaborators.

“No problem, Boss,” Silas called from the hallway, “figured she was being a little shit long about now, thought you could use some help.”

“You fucker!” Liz sat hastily, glaring at the closed door.

“Women...” Silas’ deep baritone was fading as he walked away. “Can’t live with them, can’t fuck a sheep without some prick judging your morals.”

“What morals?” Liz yelled her retort.

“Want me to use my British or Irish accent tonight?” Red soothed expertly, falling into the latter easily. “Lass, did you hear me now?”

Liz turned, all the anger drained from her mind, “What?”

“You’re as beautiful as a soft summer night,” his eyes swept the shadowed view of the enticing breasts, revealed in their entirety by her rash actions.

Elizabeth glanced down at his meaning.

“Now I don’t know what’s wrong with those creepy bastards...” the lyrical accent charmed and beguiled. The man had crooked his head to his meaning.
Elizabeth stared at him, entranced.

“But,” he motioned again, to his own heightened state of arousal, “I know what’s wrong... with me.”

“You’ve never,” she swallowed hard, “...done that.” she made reference to his newly acquired skills.

“I’ve never done many things I’ve wanted with you,” the light eyes were saying so much more than his words, which were provocative enough, “...to you.”

He had arised, the covers falling low about his waist. He lay her into the pillow, “You’re such a wee small thing.”

He lowered his head, his lips pressing lightly to her full ones. Liz felt the contact send a jolt throughout her body. Her toes, nipples and clit humming with awareness.

“And I... am not.” he reminded. “Would you like that?” he questioned roughly. “I think you would rather enjoy the experience of my body pressing yours into the soft bedding.”

The man’s eyes robbed her of any coherent thought or speech, so intense and brooding they had become.

“More so, the heavy weight of my cock,” he murmured in her ear, “sliding ever so slowly into that hot, wet cove.”

His palm moved lovingly over the flesh of her leg easing her thigh along the top of his hip, delighted by the woman’s heightened breathing.

The air hit her exposed genitals feeling deliciously cool.

“Such a wee small hole for a man to lose himself in..” he murmured, his fingers easing into the damp slit teasingly.

Liz inhaled sharply at his touch, lifting slightly to better allow him access.

“Ya like that, do you?” he pressed his lips to her forehead, easing deeper into the molten depths. “I like it as well.”

Liz closed her eyes, moaning softly as his fingers began a distinct slow rhythm. “Squirm for me, Lass. Let me know if I’m doing it right or not.”

Liz’s moans increased as she attempted to widen the gap for him to play but he prevented the act.

“No, no,” his tone washed over her like warm sunshine on a cloudy day, “now that’s my job isn’t it?”

He placed his penis directly against the aching pulse of her clit, inching down to her drenched opening, gently easing the large bulb through the minuscule slot.

Liz welcomed him eagerly, still frustrated for he had situated her to where only he could further any movement.

“There now, is that better...” Red eased an inch or two upward, embedding his shaft into the delicious tightness.

“M-more...” Elizabeth tried to lift, needing all of the hard heat to fill her.
“Aye, you’ll take it…” Red’s mouth feasted on her fuller lips, “every last inch of my cock will fill you, but… not just yet, Lass.”

“Red!” Elizabeth tightened her arms, completely enthralled by this new side of the man, never having experienced it before. “Do s-something!”

She felt all antsy inside as if her very flesh was on fire with sexual tension.

The man pushed roughly, to his full length enjoying the sharp gasp of joy she emitted.

“Is that what ya wanted, girl?” his own breath was becoming more and more shallow. “It’s what I want, now, let me have m’ way with you before Francis comes crawling into bed with us…”

Liz blinked her shock. Was he not as involved as she was? How could he joke at a moment like–

“Shit, Lizzy…” Red was back in full force, his voice laced with his growing lust. “Fuck, it feels so–” he grated the urgency he felt, “amazing, being inside you.’

His thrusts had quickened, his touch no longer gentle but demanding, almost rough.

His eyes dropped, taking in the sight of his cock glistening with her cream in the low light as he slid back into her heat, the low wet sound of his shaft fucking her, thrilling him to the core.

“I love your pussy…” he concentrated hard on his strokes, getting the timing just so. “You’re so hot…” he was feeling the steamy heat rise in her quivering depths, even now, “so fucking wet.”

“Yes…” she encouraged in every way she knew, “…yes, do that.”

Liz gave herself over to his demands, her nails embedding into the hard muscles of his shoulders and chest, the only areas she could reach comfortably.

Red had found a rhythm he liked, his stomach moving erotically, his muscles bunching and tightening, becoming steel under her fingertips.

She could feel him grow inside her, lengthen and thicken, becoming granite.

“Your scent…” he breathed in the fragrant, seductive aroma of aroused female. His female. “I dreamed of it…” his husky voice transported the woman to a sensual place.

Liz’s eyes fluttered open, staring at the man’s face which was etched with tensed strain.

“I fucking hate it when I have to leave you.” he hissed the fact, saying more than he should he knew but the declaration bubbled forth unbidden.

He shifted hastily, changing positions. “Can’t get fucking deep enough.” he growled his annoyance, having pushed her thighs wide as he re-entered her core, his thrusts hard and confident now.

His eyes fixated on the place their bodies joined, remaining steady. “Wider, baby.” his voice trembled with desire. “I want to see you come.”

Liz flushed but did not once think of refusing.

Something inside her shifted as the man shoved his penis deep into her vulnerable flesh. The sensation of every ridge, vein, the pulse of his cock rippled through the slick heat of her cushioned depths.
She moaned melodiously in response.

Red wisely left his shaft buried deep for a long breath.

His eyes closed, his head dropping forward as he too, drank in the sensation, a low guttural sound escaping his throat.

Red’s gaze trained on her flushed cheeks, “Open your eyes, baby.” The dark depths of the man’s eyes bespoke of his need. “I’m gonna fuck you like you’ve never been fucked.”

The man’s raspy voice, the vulgarity... and picture presented of his intentions left Liz visibly shaking.

“You’re going to remember it...” he nodded ever so slowly, the dreamy depths of his gaze deepening, “and want me to fuck this steamy little hole of yours again. I’ll see to it.” he pushed in against her clit, increasing the tightness around his cock.

A smile twitched at Liz’s lips, “Oh, I already do, but... you do what you have to.” she lifted seductive brows.

Inhaling shakily, Red keyed his body’s reaction as best he could.

The shapely legs opened, agonizingly slow.

Red’s attention was diverted from the sapphire blue eyes staring back at his so steadily.

He blatantly stared down at the sight of their intimate union, the neatly trimmed fluff of dark curls beckoning him.

Red withdrew his cock, sliding out to the very tip, then eased into the welcoming body with a slow, measured pace. Grasping her knee, he slid it higher up along his hip, allowing him deeper access.

“...Yes,” he sighed his contentment, inching his way inside, “you just relax for me.” he crooned softly.

Elizabeth closed her eyes, relishing the man’s slow, even entrance. She ran her fingers over his chiseled jawline.

Red caught them, turning her palm to his mouth, his lips burning a searing path into the soft flesh, the tip of his tongue flicking suggestively into the slits of her fingers.

His hot breath sent shivers up her spine. She stifled a whimper of delight.

Liz always marveled at the emotional presence this man could carry.

Her body clasped hold of his cock, her muscles contracting around his engorged shaft, holding him deep within her core.

“That’s my good girl...” his ass flexed with his sharp movements, “take what I can give you.” he muttered tightly.

Red trembled at the reaction his actions caused. The blue depths drew him into her space as never before. He could not look from the ardently alluring gaze.

A sudden surge of feeling, both emotional and physical, robbed him of breath.

The tip of her tongue wetted her lips, a sweet innocence accompanying the gesture.
She wasn’t being coy, she was asking him a question. One to which he knew the answer.

When he had taken her, made love with her as God had intended. He had never felt such euphoria.

But the ‘something’ which had passed between them in the last few moments, heightened the passion... the need.

He knew, in their imminent consummation, he would find fulfillment, an incredibly profound emotional stirring, the likes he had never felt before.

The man put all the prose he felt surging through his body into the act he was performing, wishing to give Elizabeth the answer she sought.

Wanting it with a desperation alien to the man. He intertwined his fingers into the smaller ones, bunching a gentle fist into the bedding.

“Do you feel it, baby?” he murmured tautly, did she feel what he was experiencing?

Red flicked the erect little nipple hungrily, his breath hot on her exposed flesh, “How much I missed you?”

Elizabeth clamped her legs tighter about his hip line, moving up into his hardened flesh. She more than felt it... felt him.

“You are such a vital part of my life now...” he could say this much, “without you here... I feel incomplete.”

The woman empathized with him, breathing the words breathlessly, “Yes... I feel that.”

Red kept his movements slow, calculated, beads of perspiration forming on his brow from the exertion.

He caught her mouth possessively, the kiss finished on his terms only. “I feel centered again,” he rasped the declaration, “coming home... to you.”

Liz’s heart quickened, her hips meeting his thrusts eagerly.

Nuzzling her face into the crook of the man’s neck, she inhaled the earthy scent. Her fingers clasped about the muscled flesh of his arm, feeling the corded steel as he flexed.

“This is just for me and you...” he felt her thighs tremble against his sides, “and nothing...” he moved sacredly, “nothing has ever felt so real.”

Liz’s body was tense and coiled, swept up in the sensual world he created for her alone.

The man tilted his hips drawing a sharp gasp of pleasure from her lips.

Concentrating his length and strength of thrusts, he gingerly slid along the swollen nub of her sex repeatedly drawing soft moans of gratitude and awe from the woman.

“Oh...fuck.” Liz felt herself losing what little control she had managed to maintain. “Ohh, G-God, Red.”

“You like that,” he smiled as much, “right there... is it?”

He pushed his throbbing head along the bumpy ridge he felt, “Yes...” He sighed his bliss, “your pussy likes that, doesn’t it?”

“H-higher.” Liz was not above pleading her cause at this stage.

“As you wish.” he repeated the phrase he had used earlier this evening but now, it held an entirely different connotation.

“You know what I think?” his hot breath caressed her ear. “I think,” the low animalistic growl eased along her nerve endings, “you want to come for me.”

He shortened his technique, increasing the strength of his strokes masterfully.

“And wouldn’t I love the fact...”

Liz rocked her hips, the sound of their bodies impacting turning her own even more so, were that possible.

“Your cock feels so...” she breathed shakily, her moans coming in shallow bursts, “...good.”

“Does it now.” his own labored breathing fanned her face. “Nothing compared to your sweet pussy, believe me, sweetheart.”

Liz reached, wrapping her fingers about his corded neck muscles urging him to her parted lips.

The man devoured the sweet swollen redness eagerly. He broke the kiss mid-tongue, “Oh, shit...” he gritted, “come, baby. Fucking come.” he hissed. “Don’t make me wait any longer.”

Liz arched up into his quickened pace, trembling under the onslaught.

Sliding his hand between them, Red thumbed her swollen clit with enticement to give him what he wanted. He groaned brokenly as the woman’s body clamped tightly around his shaft, grasping hold of the rapidly thrusting thickness in delicious increments that stole his breath.

“God, baby...” he gasped, “...yes, come,” he pleaded, “...do that for me.”

Bowing sharply, she was pushed over the edge by the frantic pleading. Liz shuddered jerkily with the power of her release, crying out into Red’s neckline, her thighs clamping almost painfully against his body.

“Fuck...yes...” Red hissed his gratitude, “listen to you...” he reveled in the beautiful sounds of her completion, “Did you need this, baby?” he hoped to hell she had.

His brow furrowed deeply as he allowed Elizabeth a moment to enjoy the climax she so richly deserved.

“I need to see this...” he gritted, sitting back on his haunches. Grasping her waist, he pulled her roughly against his cock, fucking her hard and fast.

Her breasts brushed against his hands, begging for his touch. Cupping one, he thumbed the pert nipple, drawing the most unrestrained, raw sounds he had ever heard from the woman.

“Fuck, I’m gonna come so hard.” he husked.

Quickening his pace, the man sensed the moment he had needed so desperately was upon them.

A growling moan rumbled deep in his throat, his hips jerking roughly as he stabbed his shaft deep inside her creamy warmth. His sack spasmed, gifting her with his hot essence.

Liz’s plaintive cries blended with his colorful metaphors, her body shaking erratically once again as she joined the man in a complete union of body and soul.

Red slid as far as he could go, the slick little bruised hole accommodating him easily now. He trembled visibly as the last of his thick cum flowed free of his swollen, still pulsating cockhead.

Liz could feel the tension drain from his frame, his breathing eased at length and he lay still and unmoving, perched above on his forearms to take his weight off the slight body beneath him.

“Welcome home.” she whispered, exhaustion filtering into her tone. “Wanted to say it properly.”

He chuckled sensually, “And so you have,” he ran a gentle fingertip over her cheek, his mouth parting hers languidly, “the best damned ‘welcome’ in the entire galaxy.”

“The entire galaxy?” she was impressed.

“That parts I’ve been too.” he played along.

“And all this time, we thought Francis was the alien creature.”

Red studied her for a long beat, “Let’s get back to important matters.”

“What could be more important than extraterrestrial beings among us?”

“Something is bothering you.” he had felt the instant tenseness earlier. “A turn in my bed usually relaxes you completely, but... you aren’t, are you.”

“I was,” she sighed, her body slumping into the cushy bedding, “it can w–”

“No, it can’t wait.” he halted any further debate on the issue.

She sighed but gratefully gave in because the more she talked, the more the stress lifted off her shoulders.

She offered a quick run down of all that had occurred in his absence.

He listened quietly, allowing her to tell it in her own time and manner.

Once or twice, he had asked a pertinent question but otherwise, he sat upright in the bed propped against pillows and just let her talk.

“And then the PA was shitty.” she concluded the gory tale, “and the damned doctor refused my birth control pills.”

“Why would you want them? They make you feel like shit.”

Liz opened her mouth, gasping her shock. The man had been so supportive and non-judgmental, his statement took her by surprise.

“What?”

“Do you think I don’t remember the migraines? Lack of appetite.” he kept his tone respectful. “The depression? Even Tom noticed but it was only to bitch about your moods.”
“That’s just like the–”

“I don’t want you to take them.”

“I think,” she was starting to get angry, “that’s my choice.”

He was quiet an inordinately long time, “Why did you go to the doctor in the first place? Was it only for the pills?”

She glanced aside hastily, “I wanted information on options available to prevent pregnancy. IUD’s, the Depo Shot...”

“You could have gotten that on the net.”

“I wanted more detailed information.” she shrugged as the man simply continued to stare at her. “I told you it could wait. Now you’re in a mood and I’m getting there, so...”

“This is important, Elizabeth.” Red’s tone implied as much as did the fixed scowl on his face.

“Red...” she moved closer, sensing a way around the man.

He reached between them, stilling her fingers which had begun to twirl lazily about his chest hair, his expression a stern one.

“An avoidance tactic.” he motioned accordingly. “We will discuss this as two mature adults. I’ve stated my ideology on the matter, I need to hear yours, straight out.”

“I don’t know...” she whispered. “I don’t know what I think about it all.” she confessed. “It’s so early on in our relationship.”

The silence was thick.

“We’ve been without protection and all.” she tried again. “And it feels amazing, don’t think I don’t enjoy it.” she lifted her eyes quickly to his, offering assurance. “And you’re saying it’s all fine but...”

“You don’t believe me.”

“I believe you think you mean it.” she rephrased.

“I don’t say things I don’t mean.” he calmed. She was young and obviously scared. “All right,” he sighed heavily, “all right, just tell me this,” he lifted cool eyes, “the truth, Elizabeth.”

Red took a calming breath, controlling what could be a sudden rush of anger.

“Did you do something you believe I would...” his jaw clenched, the muscle pulsing, “disapprove of?”

Liz’s brows furrowed, not understanding the question until Red’s eyes dropped purposely to her abdomen.

“Oh!” she gasped. “No! No I would never...I didn’t...I wouldn’t.” she shook her head vigorously.

Red released the breath he’d been holding, relief washing through him in a wave. He knew it was too early for an abortion, but she could have scheduled a date to...

He reached out, gripping her hand in his, rubbing his thumb comfortably along her fingers.
So the problem he was left with now... or perhaps, he hesitated in his train of thought... not a problem at all, to him.

“Are you preg–”

“I’m not pregnant, or...” she had anticipated the confrontation, “Or at least, I don’t think I am? I was the last patient of the day and it’s Friday so...” she would have to wait for the results. “I took one of those home pregnancy tests, it said, I wasn’t.” she lifted wary eyes. “But’s it’s early yet, isn’t it?”

The man was at a loss. Just because he was ready for a family didn’t mean...

“I’m not saying I wouldn’t be... happy if I were.” she had thought about it seriously. “I would want it if... it were there, I would.”

“When I initiated making love protection free,” the man stated firmly, “I well understood the possible consequences. And I accept them wholeheartedly.” his tone brooked no argument. “I’m not some asshole you met in a bar looking for a quick fuck, Elizabeth.”

She squirmed about, disliking his anger, although, he didn’t seem angry, worse, he appeared... hurt?

“If there is a child, if we have made one,” the thought thrilled the man but he kept the truth under wraps, “I intend to be there with you, every step of the way.”

There it was, in a nutshell. Words that meant so much to her. She hadn’t even realized until he said them and made her believe his pronouncement how much she had needed to hear the words.

He had maintained eyes contact, he reaffirmed his commitment to her in no uncertain terms.

“I will always be here... if you want me.” the solemn promise resonated between them.

She threw herself into his arms, allowing the tears which she had held at bay for so long.

“I knew that!” she sniffed holding tight to his neckline. “I did.”

He cupped her head, closing his eyes to the feel of her once again in his arms.

“Francis was right earlier,” he kissed her cheeks lovingly, “not much scares me any longer,” he stated confidently, “so don’t ever do that to me again,” he asked more than told, “because you just scared the fuck out of me.”

She blinked, tears threatening again.

“Not the baby part,” he hastened to explain, though there were aspects of that they still needed to discuss, “God, no, Lizzy. The fact that... something might come between us. Destroying what we have.”

She shook her head negatively. “No, we talk it out... we will, won’t we?”

The fear had not abated on either side.

“I pray to God that will be the case.” he grasped the woman in a crushing embrace. “I will never leave you, Lizzy. Not on my own accord, not ever.”

The woman wept tears of joy.

She finally was able to sleep. His arms encompassed her in a cocoon of strength and stability.
The worries of the week... obliterated.

Chapter End Notes

If there's anything wrong with this, it's all on me. There was a lot to edit in so I might have screwed up a couple times.

Oh, and before you ask. I did write most that last part with an Irish accent in my head. :)

May 31

As the night moved forward, the storm outside increased in its intensity.

Elizabeth slept fitfully, bothered by segments of disturbing images flashing in her fractured dreams.

It was well past midnight when the woman jolted upright from these dreams, jostling her bed partner as well.

Red stirred sleepily, a fixed scowl on the handsome face. “What’s the problem, baby?”

Liz stared out into the vast darkness of the night the large bay window allowing a view of a rain splattered pane.

Flashes of lightning lit the interior of the massive room she occupied with streaks of vivid illumination, casting eerie shadows.

“Did you hear something?” she whispered shakily. Sitting her hand on his chest, she leaned towards where she thought the sound had originated, listening intently to the unnatural silence about her.

Red held his smile, rubbing his hand slowly up her back, “No more scary movies.” he philosophized. “Were you dreaming?” he had felt her restlessness all night.

“I’m sure I heard something.” or... she had been sure, before waking from a questionable state of heightened nerves.

“The guards would have alerted us if anything was wrong.” Red reminded tactfully.

The woman sat clutching the covers to her chest, her body unnaturally tense.

“You sure it wasn’t the echoes of all those chainsaws you were subjected to tonight?” the man could not resist the jibe. “Or maybe it’s just Francis clearing us out of lasagna.” he softened the blow deliberately, before stretching lazily.

She turned her head, searching him out, “You really didn’t hear anything?” she knew the folly of the question having asked it anyway.

“I’m sure it was nothing, probably just the wind and that damn tree limb.” he added pressure to the hand rubbing her back, eliciting a burst of goosebumps along the curve of her spine. “Go back to sleep.”

She searched his face carefully.

“The radio has been silent all night long.” he motioned to the side table.

Liz glanced at the object.
“I could check the house.” he offered magnanimously.

“No.” she stayed his intended rising, “no, I’m just... being a wussy,” she realized as much, “like Francis.”

“Oh, you’re not that bad.”

“And as you said.” Liz smiled at Red’s comment, “Joe is out there.”

“He would alert us if your safety was in question... we would immediately move to a more secure location.” Red explained the established protocol.

The woman glanced to the radio. It sat silent, mocking her.

“See.” he lifted the object. “I’m on channel two.” It was set properly. “The guards... on channel three. If anything is amiss, they simply switch over and we’re set to go. Otherwise, they don’t bother us.”

“It’s no bother.” she was quick to assure.

“It is to me.” he chuckled. “My time with you means a lot. I’d like to keep it just between the two of us, if at all possible.”

Liz nodded, “...Yes.” their time was precious.

Red knew recently the guards had apprehended a neighborhood thief while they slept, peacefully unaware.

“Dembe is up and about as well.” Red had not heard any movement upstairs. He was a very light sleeper so he always knew when Dembe was up and moving.

“Oh... is he having trouble sleeping again?” Liz was instantly concerned.

“Dembe’s demons are his own, unfortunately.” Red had long since accepted the fact. “He has informed me, in no uncertain terms, that he alone, must conquer them.”

The woman felt bad for the man, all the same. “He is such a good guy...”

“He is.” Red nodded his agreement. “Lizzy,” he hesitated bringing up the obvious, “those movies tonight, one of those women were subjected to much as you were under Carver’s–”

“I hated that part.”

“Have you considered that you might be suffering from a form of PTSD?” he had been meaning to bring the matter up now for some time. “We’ve never really discussed it at length. Perhaps some counseling. I would not be adverse to attending sessions with you if–”

“The FBI has me scheduled remember.”

“But are those good enough?” was the question of the day in Red’s mind. “For me even... that time... the pictures in my head are so vivid...” he wiped the graphic images away even now.

“I don’t want to talk about it right now, okay.” Liz rose, scooting to the side of the bed. “I’m thirsty.” she bolstered herself, slipping a pajama set over her nude frame.

“I will get–”
“No,” she stated firmly, “I will not give in to these childish feelings. There are no ghosts or goblins.” she said stoutly. “Only in Hollywood’s nefarious little minds.” she shuffled to the door, calling back over her shoulder, “I’m a big girl. About time I acted the part.”

Those brave words diminished after a few steps down the dark, shadowy hall.

“I’ll keep your side of the bed warm.” Red’s voice drifted down the corridor giving her added incentive to move forward.

“Don’t you do anything unseemly on ‘my side’ of the bed.” she warned, her tone scolding.

“Then you better hurry up and get back, huh.”

The woman chuckled, continuing on down the hardwood path. “Stupid movies,” she rolled her eyes at her own foolishness, “jumping at shadows, seeing zombies being every potted plant.”

Pushing her way into the kitchen, she headed for the fridge, the dim light hurting her eyes after the prolonged darkness of night. She secured a bottle of water for herself and one for Red.

She bumped the door shut with her hip, once again left her in darkness. But unlike a few minutes ago, she felt fine in the inky blackness.

The sound of the fridge whirring, the low hum of the air conditioner and the repetitive click of the seal breaking on her bottle cap all left her feeling centered.

Walking through the dimly lit archway, she looked out towards the garden in passing, pulling up short when the shadowy figure of something danced over the windows and lace curtains of the French door.

Squinting out at the darkened recesses of the outside patio, she slowly inched forward. The woman gasped audibly, stepping back, jolted by a blinding flash of light illuminating the room with startling clarity.

Turning away from the stark glare she startled, gulping her shock. The sound of a loud thunderous boom shook the night air.

“Jesus!” she whispered shakily, clasping her chest, forcing her nervous system to calm by sheer force of will.

Lifting her eyes to the arched windows, she saw the flicking light of yet another approaching storm. She became even more unsettled.

She hated storms...

“Great.” she muttered the realization. “Just what this night needs.” straightening her spine, she moved forward.

“You used to chase storms,” she sighed her discontent, “... now you run from them.”

Readjusting the bottles in her arms, Liz took a deep even breath, determined to conquer the unreasonable fear she was experiencing once and for all when the sight of the shadowy figure reappeared out of the corner of her eye.

“It’s just the trees.” she reminded herself. “Just the freaking trees.” but suddenly, the shadow was looming closer, growing in size.
Stepping forward quickly, she grimaced as the vision of a tree hurtling at her flashed in her mind’s eye.

She shook the sensation, her eyes focusing on the reality taking place outside the house.

A rush of pure adrenaline coursed through her veins. Dropping the bottles to the rug beneath her, Liz bolted for the door, yanking it open.

Running across the length of the patio, she ignored the bite of the cobbled stone against her bare feet. Liz jerked back, stumbling on the hard pavement as the combatants lurched her way.

Two men fought ruthlessly against one another, throwing solid punches, swinging hard and fast.

“Get back inside!” a familiar voice growled viciously through gritted teeth as a swift upper cut was delivered to his opponent’s chin. The recipient staggered back, catching his balance on the wall before hurrying himself back into the fray.

Liz gasped with fear seeing the glint of a blade shine in the low light as a sharp crack of lightning streaked across the sky. Kevin, Liz’s newest guard, threw his arm up as the weapon veered in a downward arc. Kevin’s quick action stopped the intended jab.

“Go! Get Joe!” the guard hissed as he grasped the other man’s hand and wrist, sharply twisting the appendage.

Turning his upper body, he gained a small advantage of control then rushed his opponent roughly back and away from the woman. The men toppled over the stone bench, driving the air from their lungs on impact.

Grappling with the hand which held the knife, Kevin threw his head back, connecting full force with his enemy’s face.

Spinning about, Liz looked around frantically for a weapon of some sort... anything! Grasping the heavy metal vase, she neared the melee, cracking Kevin’s rival over the head.

The reverb stung her hands, making her drop the ornate urn to the ground, their foe following suit.

Pushing away from the disoriented man, Kevin grasped Liz’s arm, rushing her back to the house. As they reached the step, the sound of quickened footsteps approached. Pushing Liz aside, Kevin turned, already on the defensive.

Liz lunged for a walking stick which stood dormant by the side of the entrance door. Kevin gasped sharply. She gripped the makeshift weapon, hoisting it aloft, ready for action.

Kevin lurched forward towards the French door.

She watched the man falling as if in slow motion, the blunt end of a knife stuck grotesquely from the guards back.

The glass door shattered with the heavy weight of his impact.

The vague sound of running feet neared her position.

Gripping the cane tight in her hands, Liz swung about, connecting squarely with the intruder’s face. The blow offered a momentary reprieve. Her first concern was for her guard, of course. She rushed to the fallen man only to be grasped bodily and hauled to her feet.
The assailant swung her about abruptly, lashing out with a beefy fist.

The blow knocked her backwards, her cheek stinging painfully with the hit.

Liz’s heel caught on the step, disorienting her. In a useless attempt to catch herself, her hands shoved haphazardly into a potted plant, knocking the thick blue pottery to the ground, leaving it in shattered pieces.

Red laid his head onto his arm, staring out into the dark room. He watched the clock roll, his brow furrowing.

What was taking Lizzy so long?

Red sat up, too restless to lay still. He absently listened for her footsteps coming down the hallway.

A squawk pealed from his radio, sounding inordinately loud in the silence of the room. He turned his head toward the table, zeroing in on the black device.

“What the fuck!” he was up, grasping his clothes in milliseconds. Having collected his weapon from beneath the pillow, he was on his way down the dark corridor in record time.

It seemed it took him forever to cross the area needed. Red pulled up short, hearing the distinct sounds of a scuffle of some sort.

He eased closer, keeping to the wall, weapon raised.

“Take it easy, bitch.” a male voice was breathing heavily. “You’re wasting my fucking time.”

“Let me go!” Liz’s voice was laced with fury. “I need to help Kevin, he’s hurt!”

“Kevin is beyond help.” the amusement found in the reply struck Red as singularly sickening. “You worry about me... now, let’s go find all those pretty little gems you have hidden in your bedroom, ‘kay.”

Liz stopped struggling for a beat, the statement stunning her senses, “You’re here to... rob the place!”

“I’m not here to redecorate.”

“This house?” she was stupefied, “You pick this house!”

“I don’t discriminate.” the voice was losing patience. “I rob any house. Now, shut the fuck up and–”

“You must be the most stupid man in the entire universe!” she had concluded. “Don’t you know who owns this place?”

“Impress me.” the man did not seem easily swayed.

Liz settled, “Look, if you let me help my guy, I’ll give you anything you want.”

“You’ll give me anything I want anyway,” the tone had turned suggestive, “don’t kid yourself.”

Red’s hand tightened on the hilt of his gun.
“Yeah, whatever but we can do that the easy way... or not.” Liz bargained for time. She knew Red had to have heard the ruckus. “I don’t care about the jewelry... or anything else. Kevin could be bleeding internally. Don’t add murder–”

“What are you, my lawyer?” the man turned the woman about. “Stop playing fucking games and–”

Liz looked at the face. Kevin had done a job on the guy. It was hard to tell where the blood stopped and his features began. He must be hurting.

He was younger than she had thought by his voice but his eyes were hard. He was not a normal run of the mill criminal. She sensed as much.

“I know you from somewhere.” he was studying her face.

Liz glanced anxiously to where her guard lay, so unnaturally quiet and unmoving.

“...Well, I’ll be damned.” the man chuckled. The sound was perverse under the circumstances. Liz returned troubled eyes for the fact. “You’re that bitch everyone’s looking for. I saw your picture.”

The woman was instantly on alert.

“My luck is changing.”

“That’s what you think.” she scoffed. Where the hell was Silas!

“Quite a haul tonight.” he seemed impressed, waving a careless hand about. Liz noticed the glint of the weapon. “Ton’s of shit to hawk and now... a pretty price on your head.”

Liz jerked on her captured arm, “You are a first class moron!”

The man’s temper flared. He pulled her roughly into his arms, deliberately chastising in the worst way possible. His hand ran over her stomach, grasping at a convenient breast.

Liz struggled in earnest preventing his intended move, “You touch me again and I’ll–”

“You’ll what?” it was snapped. “Don’t want a man to touch, don’t show the merchandise.”

Red’s temper flared. Only the emergence of Dembe to his far right stopped his intended advancement.

The large man waved his weapon to indicate another’s arrival on scene.

Francis crept low, coming in from the opposite direction.

Red was able to calm his reactions.

“You disgust me.” Liz’s voice held her contempt.

“Yeah?” the man’s retort was tight with controlled rage. “Bet you’ll change your tune after I’m between your legs for a spell... I could use a good fuck.”

“You’re gonna get fucked all right.” Liz laughed hollowly. “My fiancé is gonna fucking kill your ass. He will end you, you son of a bitch!”

The man laughed darkly, “I believe he’s indisposed, did you forget?”
Liz kept her mouth shut.

“You have one chance of getting out of this alive.” Liz tried another route. “If Kevin is all right, I’ll talk to Red. If you let me go... if you let me get help for—”

“Shut the fuck up!” The man’s patience was at an end.

“You should practice what you preach.”

Red’s head hung forward, relief converging in his body. He recognized that surly, impatient voice.

“You picked the wrong house, asshole.” Joe was continuing to do what he did best... intimidate. “You let her go, you live. It’s that simple.”

“I let her go,” there was a desperation to the intruder’s statement now, “I die.”

“You’re going to die one way or other.” Joe seemed relatively certain of the fact. “Where do you think this fucking weapon is pointed exactly.”

Francis stepped around the corner of the dining room wall, weapon raised and fixed, “Or this one?”

Dembe joined him seconds later. His own gun held in steady hands, aimed at the man’s head.

Red entered quietly from the opposite entrance, his features deathly quiet. He moved forward ever so slowly out of the bastard’s eye sight.

The assailant twisted his head about, sweat glistening on his forehead and upper lip.

“Hey,” he tried for damage control, “this is getting out of hand... tell you what,” he held the gun to Liz’s neck, “I’ll just take the little lady with me and when I get a safe distance away from you gun-totin’ cowboys, I’ll just... let her go.”

“Yeah,” Joe laughed cruelly, “that’s gonna happen.”

Dembe’s eyes were dark and menacing. Francis’ jaw worked angrily, his features cold and distant.

Joe stepped once, purposely.

“Stay back!” the intruder’s weapon trained on the guard instinctively.

Red took the opportunity presented, closing the space needed.

The assailant froze, feeling the cool steel barrel shoved into the back of his head. Red had moved with remarkable agility, his Glock pressing painfully with all the rage he was feeling.

“Let her go.” Red’s clipped and icy rejoinder washed over the man.

The intruder tightened his hold on Elizabeth in response.

“Release her.” Red growled menacingly.

The man stilled all movement, keeping his hold on the woman while he silently weighed the options.

“Sweetheart, you’re gonna be all bloody in a second.” Red warned her assailant more than Elizabeth.

“I don’t care.” she struggled under the man’s tight hold. She heard the click of the hammer on Red’s weapon pull back.

The man instantly released her, showing his arms to his captors.

Liz instantly rushed to Kevin’s side but Silas was already there.

Dembe stepped casually, relieving the asshole of his weapon having grasped the man’s wrist, twisting expertly until the hold was forfeited.

Men came out of nowhere, one stooping to examine Kevin, the others preparing a transport for the still silent individual.

“...Silas?” Liz’s blue eyes lifted, asking the rhetorical question.

“He’s strong.” Silas muttered, too concentrated on the injured man. “Easy, he’s lost a lot of blood.” he snapped when the medical team jostled Kevin.

Red lifted the woman, his hand gentle on her shoulders. “Let them do their job, Lizzy,” he just wanted to feel the woman safe in his arms.

“We need Mr. Kaplan.” Liz sought out the man. “She will help Kevin.”

Silas’ eyes met Red’s, “We had it under control.” his attitude suggested as much.

“Then what the hell happen–”

“I happened.” Liz turned on the man. “Kevin was watching out for me. He could have handled the intruder.” she realized the fact early on. “He told me to get Joe... to get back in the house so he could do his job!”

The emotions were catching up to the woman. “It’s my fault... I should have listened!”

“Yes, you should have.” Silas gravely stated.

“And you,” Red wasn’t going to allow this, “should never have let that fucker get as far as he did.”

“Stop...” Liz whispered.

Red did, for he knew how upset the woman got when he tied into Silas.

“We need to know the weak spots in our defense perimeter.” Silas snapped right back, ignoring Liz for a beat. “The doors were secured.”

“I wanted to help...” Liz said listlessly.

“How did that work out for you, sweet cheeks?” the intruder chuckled his mirth.

Francis cuffed the man on the side of the head with the butt of his weapon.

“Geez man,” the guy shook the blow off as best he was able, “what the fuck?”

Francis cuffed him again, “Watch your mouth or I’ll shut it for you permanently.”

“What are you guys?” the man squirmed about, unable to wriggle too much as Dembe had bound him up good and proper. “Ease up can’t ya? That hurt!”

Red’s hostile utterance washed over the man, “Keep your mouth shut until I get around to you.”
“Take your time old man.”

Francis cuffed the guy... harder this time.

Red nodded curtly and Francis hit the guy again across the cheek, this time, bringing blood.

“Fuck!” the thief gasped his shock. “What the fuck, man!” the guy seemed genuinely perplexed. “Why did you do that?” he spit blood on the spotless floor.

“Would you like me to do worse?” Red stepped, his weapon placed against the man’s head. “No problem, just say the word! I’m a little hard of hearing though, being so old and all so... speak up.” Red cocked the gun, his eyes cold.

“You guys are crazy!” was the general consensus suddenly. “Just call the damned cops... get me out of this loony bin.”

Red’s eyes met Elizabeth’s, expecting to see revulsion for his behavior. Her gaze was clear, unfettered. “Do what you have to do.”

“That’s cold bitch!” the man squawked incredulously.

Francis lifted his arm, his intention more than evident.

“Don’t hit me again... I’m sorry already!” it was belligerently pleaded. “Are you guys nuts or what?”

“Who are you?” Red demanded.

“I don’t have to answer any questions, Pops. I got rights.” the man smirked. “Haven’t you heard?”

Red backhanded the guy, his fury behind the action.

The burglar fell from the chair Dembe had placed him in, clattering noisily to the floor.

He lay, moaning his despair.

“For someone kissing hardwood,” Joe pointed out, “you could lose the attitude.”

“It could very well be the death of you,” Dembe intoned quietly, “if not.”

“Speaking of which,” Red’s manner indicated stressors were present, “he’s bleeding all over Lizzy’s floor, take him out of here!”

“The atrium has a drain.” Dembe reminded one and all.

“Oh, a drain...” the statement had once again amused their ‘guest’, “yeah, right... a drain. I’m shaking in my boots.” he disdained, squirming about aimlessly in his bonds. “Look, let’s cut the crap. My time is valuable.” he threw a glare at his captors. “Just call the cops all ready. I can make bail and be out in time to make sure this night isn’t a complete bust.”

“He just doesn’t learn, does he?” Francis sighed lightly then kicked the guy in the gut... less than delicately.

The man lay gasping, frantically trying not to pass out, coughing and sputtering, like a floundering fish. “You fucker!” he spat venomously. “I’ll kill you for that!”

“When,” Francis was not impressed by the theatrics, “or if we ever release you from your present situations?"

“Who are you guys?” it was pleaded plaintively, “just call the cops! I got rights I tell you!”

“Take him.” Red snapped. “Get him out of my sight!” he had enough.

Joe motioned for one of the many guards who had come in seconds after the little shit was taken down. “Boss wants him to wait in the atrium.”

The orders were immediately carried out.

“I’ll sue you for everything you own!” was the hollow threat which echoed after the departure.

Red turned his attention to Lizzy immediately. “Are you hurt?”

She shook her head, her expression troubled, her demeanor, unsettled.

“Before you explode,” Joe stepped forward hastily, “it was all an unfortunate misunderstanding.”

“Don’t give me that shit.” Red turned, a force to be reckoned with. “Just give me the details.”

“We tracked him as he cleared the fence,” Joe lost no time on preliminaries, “the neighbor’s tree limb is a problem. The rains this year have—”

“I don’t want to hear this shit.” Red was taking his anger out on any and all. He knew it, but he also knew, the man could handle it.

“They are out of town,” Silas intervened, “we couldn’t get clearance to cut the damned thing off and it was too high for anyone to....” he trailed away. Red’s expression said it all.

“The guy must be a fucking acrobat, but we knew of the problem and were trying to handle it.” Silas continued. “You told us, with that fucker out front, we weren’t to cause waves.”

Red calmed because... he had said that.

“People are funny about their trees.” Joe nodded thoughtfully. “We didn’t want to cause any dissension.”

“Cut the damned thing down, tonight.” Red snipped.

“We were tracking the little dick,” Silas resumed his narrative, “like last time, we tracked him to see if the perimeter of the house was penetrable.”

“...Last time?” Liz scowled.

Red glanced at her.

“Did Tom manage...”

“It was nothing, we eliminated the threat.” Silas’ waved a beefy hand.

“You eliminated...” the woman’s eyes were large, “you... killed someone?”

Silas tugged on his ear, “Nah, we phoned in a tip after a few days... I’m sure the cops got him out.”

“Out of what?” Liz wasn’t sure she wanted to know.

“Lizzy, please.” Red wasn’t interested in any of that. “Go on.” he turned impatient eyes to his head
Silas had all ready informed him of the ‘incident’. The lawn crew had spilled gasoline in the garage and had forgotten to relock the window. An almost thief had found the vulnerable spot.

“The back yard has no cover, it was hard for Joe to close the distance without being seen.” Silas clearly hated having to explain his methods, “how do we judge our defenses if we can’t allow someone to test them.”

“Kevin was just coming off break,” Joe laid it out, “he came out of the side doors just as the little creep reached his position.”

“The guy was hiding behind the only cover in miles.” Silas’ tone was brittle. “But that doesn’t excuse the kid’s lack of awareness of surroundings.”

Red was more patient now for it was clear, Silas was bothered greatly by what had gone down.

“Kevin has become too complacent.” Silas bitched clear and simple. “He was not alert, his mind was not on the present, on the job.”

“Stop it.” Liz flared. “Kevin saved my life!”

“Again,” Silas snapped right back, “his job... at least he did that part.”

“Don’t you say anything bad about him!” Liz met the large man toe to toe.

Silas shifted his eyes first, “Whatever...” he grumbled, “the point is,” he stressed, “his radio was off. We could have alerted him to the situation.”

“Why was his radio...” Red let it go. Only Kevin knew the answer to that.

“It was off,” Silas gritted, “because he’s been making calls to a little bimbo in Malibu for about a week now. He turns off the ‘static’ so he can really get into the phone sex.”

Liz cleared her throat discreetly.

“He sometimes ‘forgets’ to turn it back on.” Silas eyed the woman noting her pink cheeks.

“Well...” Liz strived for sophistication, “he’s a young man. He was on break. Things happen.”

“Why did you go out the door.” Silas was angry again. “You were safe inside. Why didn’t you get Red?”

“No more questions.” Red snapped for clearly Lizzy was floundering.

“It c-could have been too late.” she had run all the scenarios through her head at the time. “I thought if I could distract the guy long enough, Kevin could...” she trailed away. “I’m so sorry, Silas.”

Red’s temper was at it’s boiling point but he managed to choke back his own ire for Silas’ treatment of the woman.

The head guard sighed heavily, “I know, kid.” he held up a staying hand, all the emotion draining away. “At least you didn’t run from a fight.” he chuckled mirthlessly at his own questionable wit. “Look,” he faced Liz taking her shoulders between large hands, “what’s done is done. We move on from here, okay?”
She swallowed the threat of tears, nodding.

“We all know,” he indicated those about him, his men, “what we are signing up for. We hold no illusions as to exactly what the job might entail.” he referred to Kevin’s predicament, of course.

Liz’s eyes flicked from one hardened face to the next.

“We also know, a moments hesitation, a lapse in concentration can get us dead real fast.” Silas soothed in his own way. “Your only crime was that you wanted to help someone in trouble, don’t let it eat at you. There were extenuating factors which led to the outcome.”

Liz listened attentively, her mood deadened.

“Review the decisions you made tonight, think about the things you could have done differently, remember the mistakes for future reference.” Silas finished the ‘lesson’. “Never repeat an error. Each encounter is a chance to learn... grow.”

Liz hung her head, taking in the advice for all she was worth, “My mistakes could cost Kevin his–”

“Kevin is still here.” he hoped as much anyway. “Don’t count him out so quickly.” he released her shoulder. “She’s cold..”

It was Silas’ way of saying, Liz was standing about half-dressed in a room full of men. Not that he did not trust the guys under him to live up to his expected code of proper behavior.

The woman had been through enough. It was Silas’ protective side coming to the fore.

Red ran his glance over the almost see through fabric of her night clothes, “Francis, could you...”

“Oh,” the kid kicked into action, understanding the two men needed to discuss something, “come on, Lizzy.” he put a brotherly hand about her shoulders.

Liz didn’t argue. She felt she had caused enough trouble for one night.

Red watched her exit, his thoughts varied.

“You were too fucking hard on her.” the minute the woman was out of ear shot, Red let his feelings be known.

“If I had been harder on Kevin...” Silas continued, “maybe it would have saved his life.”

“Elizabeth isn’t one of your men.” Red reminded.

“You want her strong enough to face what’s on the horizon?” the guard stepped closer, glad to have an outlet for the despair he felt. “Shit happens. Tonight’s fiasco for example, we can’t always be there. You know that! No matter how well we plan.”

Red was reminded why he kept competent people around him.

“Don’t tie my hands,” Silas’ inflection was low, almost menacing, “if we’re not there, I want her to be able to defend herself until we are. I thought we were in agreement on this point!”

Red seethed, “Yeah,” he ran a weary hand across his brow, “yeah, we are.” he waved a dismissing hand.

“Best laid plans.” Joe eased the transition for both men. “We can try every avenue of recourse but in the end, Fate might kick us in the ass. Remember the Cambodia Incident.”

Red remembered it well. “I want to talk to the little bastard, get things straight in my head.”

The men journeyed to the atrium. Even before they arrived they could hear that the fucker’s bravado had returned.

“Silas, upgrade to that new Biometric system you wanted.” Red halted just outside the room, rubbing at the tension in his temples. “He recognized Lizzy, but from where?”

“He mentioned a picture.” Joe reminded and Red nodded.

“Maybe the Ex,” Silas jerked his head in the direction of the street, “could be upping the game. Hoping to catch us off guard by these little diversions. He might be orchestrating them.”

“If that bastard has spread Lizzy’s face to the entire fucking underground...” Red’s temper returned in a flash, “I will put a bullet in what little brains he has, so help me God.”

“I’ve got one that has his name written on it.” Silas remarked helpfully. “Took a while to spell out fucker... but in the end, I got it all to fit.”

Red drew in an even breath, motioning to the trail which awaited.

“If that stupid bitch had just...” Nathan Tuttle was hitting his stride, spewing venom.

Red reached the man in record time, his fist connecting with the upper jaw area of the foul mouth.

Blood split from the gash his knuckle made.

Red stood directly before the guy, his eyes empty of any emotion. “Here’s what we are going to do from this minute forward.,” he spoke almost civilly, “I speak, you respond.”

“If I weren’t tied up like a pig on a spit, old man, I would...”

Red delivered two rapid hits, one to the face, the other to the gut.

“You are tied up and as you so aptly stated,” it was reminded, “like the pig you are. Let’s begin anew, shall we?”

“I’ll remember you, you basta–”

Red silenced the man effectively, his knuckles bloodied and aching from the punishment inflicted.

“I speak,” he repeated patiently, “you respond.”

“When will we hear anything?” Liz paced the wood floor aimlessly as she had now for a few silent moments.

“Let Mr. Kaplan do her thing. She knows the drill.” Francis advised.

The silence returned for a long beat. “Did you know him?” she inquired, seeking the man out.

“He’s the new guy.” Francis knew that much.

“He’s a nice guy, Francis.” Liz’s eyes softened, “a really nice guy. I was just getting to know him.”
Francis wisely allowed her to vent.

“He comes from a large family.” it was relayed. “Four brothers, two sisters.” the woman smiled, “I always wanted a sister.”

Francis could hear the wistfulness in Liz’s voice.

“His younger sister, Megan, lost her husband unexpectedly.” the room was quiet except for her narrative. “Kevin was taking up the slack, helping financially, being there for the kids... you know.”

Francis nodded his understanding.

Liz grew agitated, “I don’t know what she’ll do if–”

Francis arose from his seat in the comfortable chair by the window. “Stop thinking like that.” he crossed, his manner no-nonsense.

Liz tried to control her thoughts and emotions. She zeroed in on the man before her, something occurring.

“...Francis?”

“What?” he placated.

“I’ve never seen you act like that.” it had seemed so off at the time. “How you were with that... man. You seem almost like two different people sometimes.”

The man lifted his countenance, remaining silent.

“How is it you came to know Red?” she was ever so glad to have something with which to occupy her mind. “You’ve never really said.

The man turned slowly, crossing to the window. She watched his trek. “Do you... work for him in some capacity?”

The moment was regretfully interrupted, however, before any answer could be obtained.

Red walked into the master bedroom, casually removing the bloodied shirt he had donned earlier this night.

“Nathan Tuttle.” Red informed Francis Holbrook who had waited patiently with Elizabeth the entire time Red was tending to business.

Francis removed his hand from the pockets of his pants, his brow furrowed. “It sounds... familiar.” he had to admit. He had heard the name before.

Red washed up in the bathroom, slipping into a new shirt. He returned to the room, crossing to Elizabeth.

She gratefully accepted his comforting embrace. “I’m so glad you’re here.”

“Thanks...” Francis quipped, throwing her a cryptic glance. “Let me make a call,” he turned to business, his steps headed out of the vicinity, “give me a few minutes.”

Red nodded, glad to have some time alone with the woman.
Liz lifted confused eyes, “Red? What is it Francis actually does for you?”

“You’re favoring your arm again.” the man had noted. “Did that son of a bitch—”

“Silas says it will take time to heal.” Liz glanced down at the weak appendage. “All my training with Silas and at the Academy...” she sought him out, “it meant crap up beside that asshole. I tried everything I was taught.”

“Stop...” he soothed, enfolding his arms about her, his palm cupping her head. “The bastard had a hundred pounds on you, baby. Don’t let it bother you.” his lips traced the dark scowl of worry on her forehead. “Silas will teach you... you’ll learn more.” he leaned back, forcing her eyes, “All right?”

The comfortable silence returned. Liz was content just to feel the steady beat of his heart.

“Are you tired?” Red glanced toward the bed.

She shook her head fiercely, “I need to know if Kevin is... all right.” she forced the viewpoint. “I’m fine. Did... did that creep say anything about anything else? Besides his name?”

“A picture of you has been floating around now for a few days.” Red stated, leading her to the large chair Francis had vacated. He sought a wrap. She had felt cold. “He didn’t know who was circulating it. He gave us a few names to run down but Silas thinks they will lead to a dead end.”

She nodded absently pulling the cover up to her chin, a cold shiver traversing her body.

“He isn’t from the Cabal.”

“You’re sure?” she lifted hopeful eyes.

“He’s just an idiot in the wrong place at the wrong time... with the wrong people.”

The woman processed, “Red, what... what are you going to do with him?”

“What would you like me to do with him?”

She considered the implications of such a statement coming from the man. She took her time in a reply.

“...He... hurt one of my guys.”

“He did that.” Red couldn’t help her on this one, he knew.

“Kevin might...”

Red remained silent, allowing her to work through the dilemma.

The moment was interrupted as Francis came breezing through the door. “He works for Anthony Burke.” the man held the phone from his ear for a beat, then held up an index finger signaling silence as he returned to the phone connection. “...damn right he’s upset, wouldn’t you be?”

Red had arisen from his stooped position beside the woman’s chair, his attention for the conversation taking place.

“This is bad, Tony.” Francis conveyed the general consensus. “He is not happy if she isn’t happy! He could and rightfully so, misconstrue this incident as an attempt on his organization—”
The man listened for a goodly spell, “He is right here if you need to speak personally on the matter.”

The phone was give over, “Reddington here.” he spoke quietly then fell silent.

Liz tried to read his face but it proved impossible.

She exchanged an impatient glance with Francis’ benign one.

“I will expect you then.” was all Red finally said before shutting down the connection.

He radioed Silas of the expected visitors estimated time of arrival.

Liz sensed Red’s anger, “What will happen now?”

“We’ll have to wait and see.”

“Did they send him and if so...” she was stumped, “whatever for?”

“They said they didn’t.” Red muttered.

“Do you believe them?”

“We’ll have to wait and see.” he smiled down at her, reaching out. Liz placed her fingers in his strong grasp.

“They will sugar coat this.” she was positive. “Let me call Ress–”

Red shook his head, his expression silencing her.

“Who’s Ress?” Francis was intrigued.

“A guy who knows a guy.” Red covered effectively.

“Ahh,” Francis nodded knowingly, “we generally like to handle these things in-house.” he informed Liz.

She had closed her eyes for the unconscious slip. “Who is ‘we’?” she turned the tables with one quick-witted move.

“We,” Francis motioned absentely, “as in Silas and Red and well... me.”

Liz had the sense she was being snowed.

“Isn’t that right, Red?” Francis threw the ball into another court, his expression clear and unassuming.

Red let it go for the moment, “Tony will deal with the problem. He has never failed me yet.”

“Yeah, the prick will get what’s coming to him.” Francis seemed to feel better.

Liz clearly was of two-minds. Her instinct telling her to call in the team on this one... but she trusted Red to do the right thing as well.

She was torn.

The radio squawked, intruding in on her thoughts.
“We’ve set up the large living room as the meeting place.” Silas directed.

“Thank you, Silas.” Red had lifted the device, “We’ll be there momentarily.”

Minutes later, Red was comfortably ensconced on one of the long divans in the designated area, drink in hand.

Francis waited to escort Liz who hastily dressed in something more suitable in which to greet visitors.

It was almost three in the morning.

Greeting visitors at such an hour seemed suddenly commonplace in the world in which she now resided.

She entered the room only a minute or two before Silas ushered in the guests.

Even Red stood when he realized Anthony Burke has not arrived empty handed.

“Antonio...” Red came forward to greet the older man, his smile genuine, “you honor our home by your presence.”

The robust man inclined his head regally, still exuding power and vitality, “I can only state how sad it makes me that it is under less than pleasant circumstances.”

He turned to Elizabeth, lifting her hand to his lips.

Liz was charmed by the gesture, her eyes softening.

“Greetings, little angel.” he spoke in his native language but his eyes spoke the universal language that any woman could understand.

“Mr. Crocetti.” the woman’s smile was full of gentle welcome.

“I thought we had decided on, Antonio,” he feigned an imposition. “Has this incident harmed our budding friendship? I will not be pleased if so.”

“Oh no,” Liz was quick to reassure, “not at all.” she cast a hasty glance at Anthony Burke who, until this moment, had stayed in the back ground.

“Rest assured, Elizabeth,” Burke stepped forward now, however his manner seemingly sincere, “if I may be so bold, yes? Rest assured,” he continued, standing, hat in hand, “I will move heaven and earth to ensure that not be the case. This matter will be handled with the upmost efficiency, to the satisfaction of all concerned.”

Elizabeth managed a smile, “Well, you see... one of my guards... he was...”

“We have been given the particulars.” Anthony nodded to Francis who stood unobtrusively beside Dembe and Silas over by Red.

“Please.” Red offered refreshments and a seat. Antonio smiled his pleasure, once a Cognac had been placed in his hand.
“The small pleasures in life.” he held up the warm liquor. “The night is chilled, these old bones welcome such a treat.”

Red joined the man, “Salut.”

The wise old eyes had been examining the woman who had crossed to Red’s side for some few moments now. “You were unharmed bella mia?”

Liz’s face fell, a shuddering breath escaping. “No, I am...” she shook the descending depression, “he didn’t hurt me,” she lifted solemn eyes, “K-Kevin,” she needed to convey how very important that aspect was, “he is my friend, my...”

Antonio beckoned her with a wave of his hand. Liz instinctively moved closer, kneeling before the man’s chair.

He studied her face, his fingers cupping her chin, “It is all right now.” his touch was warm and soothing, “I am here... it will be put to right.”

Liz closed her eyes, believing the words. The man gently drew her into his comforting bulk. He smelled of expensive aftershave and cigar smoke. She was instantly at ease.

“I know we can not fix what happened,” the man’s smoky voice mollified, “but we can make certain such occurrences never happen again.” it was a promise, clear and simple.

Liz leaned enough to see those penetrating eyes, “You will trust me with this, yes?”

She read the intense depths as they watched her so hypnotically.

“Yes.” she answered readily. “I will trust you.”

“We will see to this young man, your friend,” he consulted Anthony Burke who nodded solemnly, “we will see his family wants for nothing.”

“I will do that, Antonio.” Red offered quietly.

“I would deem it an honor to do so personally.” the matter was clearly settled. The old man rose, taking Elizabeth in his wake.

He smiled down at her. “Such innocence”, he marveled, “still exists. It warms my heart.” he passed her gently off to Red.

“Now, to business.” his expression and eyes hardened, “lead me to this impertinent fellow... that we may discuss this problem at hand... personally, just he and I.”

Red exchanged cryptic glances with Dembe.

Antonio stepped kissing Liz’s forehead paternally, “You are exhausted,” he held her hands at length, his eyes softening once more, “you promised to trust me.”

She nodded that she had... and did.

“Then humor an old man.” he released the girl from his care handing her off to Francis, “I will need your fiancé for but a brief spell.”
Red stepped aside, allowing the move.

“Go, allow us to do what must be done.” he glanced to Francis.

“Come on, Lizzy.” the other man took his cue.

Liz hesitated, leaning back to impulsively kiss the weathered cheek, “Good night, Antonio.” she murmured.

Red stepped forward, cradling the small face. “I’ll be along shortly.”

Plucking absently at a button on his gaping shirt, she nodded before accepting his warm mouth against hers.

The men exited, Dembe closing the double doors behind them.

Liz swallowed hard, “Kevin didn’t make it, did he?” she knew for certain.

Francis closed his eyes, feeling his friends pain, “...No.”

Tears welled and were allowed. She bit her lip harshly, “I... I did this.”

“That fucker did this!” Francis manner shocked the woman, so much so, she startled.

“Don’t you be thinking shit like that.” he snapped. “Don’t you dare! He did it! No one else and in a few minutes.... the bastard will realize the magnitude of his actions.”

Liz’s bottom lip trembled visibly.

Francis calmed with visible effort. He sighed, placing his arm about the woman. “Come on, Lizzy, you have to go to bed. Red will kill me if I don’t get you in there.”

“I want to see Kevin.”

He hesitated, “We’re not doing that.” he spoke with such authority and gravity that Liz found herself allowing his lead.

She docilely followed the man to the back, her mood one of infinite sorrow and regret.

In another part of the house, other emotions were taking precedence.

“I am truly sorry Elizabeth is so distraught, Reddington.” Anthony Burke said sincerely.

Red watched the now unconscious man being dragged down the corridor, his thoughts his own.

“If there is anything else I may do to make amends?” he too, had witnessed Nathan Tuttle’s removal, rather impassively at that. “Whatever are we to do with that... trash.” he mused before seeking out Red’s knowledgeable eyes, “Well, of course we know what we will do... a rhetorical statement only.”

He smiled pleasantly.

“He cannot be allowed to return for Elizabeth, which he threatened.”

“They threaten and boast, do they not.” Antonio nodded sagely. “Anyone under my lead will not involve themselves in this so called ‘bounty hunt’.” the shrewd gaze shifted to Red. “I will find who placed the sum and eliminate the threat. We will make an apt example of Nathan, rest assured.”

Anthony Burke crossed his arms over his chest, his expression a pensive one, “This ex-husband business. I am curious, of course, why have you not eliminated that threat?”

“She’s here,” Red scowled darkly, annoyed for having to explain.

“Of course,” Antonio understood right away. Anthony, not so much.

“Well, it’s your affair but if you wish assistance...” Anthony spread his hands politely.

Red nodded his acquiescence, “Appreciated.”

“Increase your security.” it was not a request, “I do not like many people, as you are well aware,” Antonio would always have the last word, “but your Elizabeth... this woman, I like. I should be most displeased if any harm should befall her.”

“Elizabeth’s safety is paramount with me.” Red assured.

“Then accept my offer of assistance.”

Red could hardly refuse. “I will absolutely do so.” he chanced a glance at Dembe and Silas who had stood stoically aside.

Silas had a shit eating grin on his face. Dembe had lifted a meaningful brow, nothing more.

“Nothing is going to happen to that girl.” Antonio scowled as he headed for the door. “I will contact you tomorrow.”

Red stayed to see his guests off, then returned to the house.

“Arrangements are in the process.”

Red knew Silas was referring to Kevin’s body. He had been notified when Anthony was in the process of chastising his man, Nathan Tuttle.

Red felt the weight.

Another life for which he would have to atone.

It was with a heavy heart, he started off to seek out Elizabeth Keen.

“Raymond...” Dembe halted his trek.

Red followed the man’s meaning.

His hands were once again, bloodied, his knuckles cracked, gashed open from the hits he had inflicted.

He too, had said his farewell to Nathan Tuttle in his own inimitable fashion.

He went to the kitchen to wash up.

But then, he always had blood on his hands, metaphorically speaking. Why did it trouble him so deeply of late?

It never had before... what a somber thought.
“Should I call Kevin’s family now or wait until morning?” Silas asked quietly having stood patiently, watching Red finish his task.

Silas offered a hand towel for the man to dry off with.

“No, we’re not going that route this time” Red wiped his eyes with his fingers, his head throbbing painfully. “We can’t have Kaplan do her thing in this instance, Silas. Let us handle this one.”

Silas, if he had any misgivings, did not voice them. Red was grateful for the fact.

“We need to revisit an issue.” Silas stopped the man in his tracks, for he was in a certain mood now. “Why won’t you let me kill him?”

“He is Anthony’s pr–”

“I’m not talking about that piss ant.” Silas grumbled. “Tom.” the man snapped.

Red lifted his attention, “I told you we aren’t going that route.” he snapped. “Let it go, Silas.”

Silas mused thoughtfully.

“She was going to have children with Tom, she had a life with him...” Red stressed, reminding Silas of the life Liz once had.

“She has gotten to the point she has literally turned her back on that asshole.” he was in no mood to revisit this subject matter. “It would be nice if she had time to process that revelation before I kill the son of a bitch.”

The guard merely shifted to the other foot.

“When that inevitable conclusion comes,” Red calmed a little, “I want it to occur away from this house.”

“It’s just...” Silas rolled his neck, pulling at the mounting tension, “the guy pisses me off. Dembe and I watched those surveillance videos...” the man shuddered. “That fucker is mental, he needs to be put down. Hell, the entire fucking Cabal needs to be put down.” the man seethed.

Liz’s privacy had been invaded to a disgusting degree.

Silas and Dembe had watched countless hours of the video collected from Liz’s last residence.

They had hoped, at some interval, whoever set up the actual surveillance might be caught on camera.

Tom Keen’s dirty work had surprised even the seasoned voyeurs. To have actually seen that fucker turn off the geeky exterior he exuded every time Liz walked out the door was kind of disconcerting.

The Cabal bastard’s had watched as she slept, showered, dressed... had sex with that asshole haunting the gate outside.

Thankfully, she didn’t have to worry about those factions here.

“Do you hear me disagreeing?”

“It goes against my natural instinct. Letting him sit out there, day in, day out.” Silas voiced his displeasure.
“She feels like this is her home now.” Red tried to explain but why he felt the need, he wasn’t sure.

Silas’ brow furrowed, “Yeah, except he’s out there mocking us... her.”

“You feel that as well now, don’t you?” Red knew his way around the subject.

Silas clearly objected to the subject change. It made him uneasy. “What are you talking about?”

“You came back early, after Memorial Day.” Red hadn’t meant to bring it up but it needed to be said. “Why? You didn’t go off the deep end this year, did you.”

Silas was... bothered. “I don’t want to talk about it.”

“You have found something here as well, just like Lizzy.”

The silence was uncomfortable for the guard.

“She has found serenity... a sense of peace... belonging.” Red continued but less acerbically, “I hope that applies to you as well.”

Silas looked like a brooding child, head bowed, expression petulant.

“I don’t want that taken away from her.”

“If he breaches the property—” Silas warned.

“Lizzy would expect you to do your job.” Red confirmed. “To snipe him as he sits out there innocently minding his own business...”

Red waited for the man to work it out himself...

“Would make me no better than Tom fucking Keen, in her eyes,” the guard laughed hollowly, “... and less than a man, in my own.”

Red relaxed.

“Give her time to acclimate to how she feels about him, to grow wary of his surveillance...” it was advised. “Tom will give just cause at some point, Silas. I know him. I’ve always known...”

Dembe adjusted his stance, lacing his fingers together. The closest the man would come to, albeit silently, agreeing with Red’s assessment.

“When did you get here?” Red teased, in fact sensing the man’s arrival some few seconds ago.

“Stage one,” Dembe ticked off on his fingers, not bothering to reply to the snarky statement, “giving her time away, clearing her head and adjusting to her new independence.”

“Stage two,” Red took up the cause, “breaking the repetitive cycle of mind games... seeing past the asshole’s charade.”

“Stage three,” Silas finished dejectedly, “reconciling herself with past mistakes and hopefully... moving on.”

“This has been a set back.” Red could not argue the fact. “Kevin was not something we could foresee.”
All contemplated the fact.

“She’s becoming stronger...healing everyday,” Red took hope, “in part, due to your encouragement and support.”

“Your combat training.” Dembe injected.

Silas shrugged off the praise.

“She punched Tom in the throat.” Red continued. “She could have killed him and was fully aware of the fact.” he stressed.

“She couldn’t have done that three months ago.” Dembe stated knowingly.

“I didn’t teach her very well if she didn’t succeed.” Silas pointed out the obvious.

“How does one get to Carnegie Hall?” Dembe asked seriously.

Red held his grin, “Practice makes perfect, Silas.”

“Practice doesn’t make perfect, practice reduces the imperfection.” the guard quoted Toba Beta.

“The fact is, she delivered the blow, knowing the consequences.” Red reminded. “Her well being trumped Tom’s and even Tuttle’s.” Red tried not to show his pride. “She tried.”

Silas nodded once in agreement. Liz was getting stronger, self assured.

His thoughts were already swirling with what else he should teach her? He knew she was getting better with the barbs, they were almost second nature now.

A million ideas came to Silas... what he could do to improve upon what he had taught her... to enhance that new found belief in herself. To amplify her empowerment.

Red smiled, he could almost hear the gears turning in the guards head. “Before you come up with a detailed plan to make Lizzy an assassin,” the man suggested, suddenly very tired, “...get some rest. Both of you.”

Bidding both men a good night, he headed back for the master bedroom. Stepping through the door, Red pulled up short. Lizzy was fast asleep, resting comfortably against Francis’ shoulder.

Granted, they were sitting up against the headboard, but still the sight slightly irritated Red.

But Liz needed comfort right now, so he refused to allow his own petty jealousies to take that from her.

He could not shake that old nagging reality, it still bothered him, truth told. They were both so young, vital... they looked so natural together.

Francis waved lamely, careful not to jostle the woman. “Everything back to normal?” he whispered.

Red turned off the overhead light, leaving only the side table lights on. “Everything has been resolved.... thanks in part to your timely intervention with Anthony Burke.”

Francis chuckled quietly, a smile gracing the handsome face. “Antonio put you in your place?”

“Yes.” Red sighed. “How long has she been asleep?”
“Not long,” the man admitted. “She’s run the gambit. She’s feeling the guilt over Kevin.”

Red pulled back the blankets, removing his shirt. He glanced at the picture presented, forcing his emotions aside. “You’re good for her.”

Francis glanced at the unruly top of Liz’s head. “I make everyone’s life better by existing,” he stated emphatically, “Now if I could just convince the lovely Nora of the fact.” he sighed morosely.

“This position is killing my arm, you know.” Francis grimaced. “But I will stoically hold up, regardless the cost to my body.”

“Toughen up you pussy.” Red rumbled his amusement.

“First you praise Caesar, then you disparage him.” Francis extolled. “I’m confused.”

“A constant state for you, I should imagine.”

Liz shifted, mewling softly, Red lowered his voice. He gazed upon her peaceful features. “I do not like people that disrespect women.” the thought occurred to him.

“Especially this one.” Francis smiled, before it slipped away. “Where did that come from?”

“Just thinking back over tonight.” Red admitted. “...I wanted to kill him so badly.”

“I should have killed him,” Francis grated, then corrected himself, “...them.” he looked questioningly at Red. “Why aren’t we killing him? I am of course talking about the human speed bump out front.”

“As I said,” Red half chuckled, “it’s handled... for the moment.”

Francis sighed his annoyance, then brightened. “I’m well within my rights to kill him if I see him outside this area though?”

“As you always say: “I got dibs.”, Red sat in the high back chair, crossing his legs, “I’ve waited a long time for that privilege.”

Francis scowled minutely, then shrugged. “I make no promises.”

Red mused overly long. The silence was growing uncomfortable for Francis.

“I may be leaving the day after tomorrow for a quick trip. Will you be here?”

“Red, I’ll be here whenever, you know that.” he was assured. “Mark has also offered—”

“Besides being the only one that I know for certain won’t stab me in the back,” Red shook his head minutely, “I know Lizzy prefers your company.”

“I like hanging with Lizzy... and Nora,” the man was suddenly all smiles, “a lot! You’ll probably have to throw me out, especially if Nora is making her world renowned chili and beans.”

“She gives you beans?!”

“Soon I will have that woman in my clutches and she will give me anything I want.” he nodded knowingly. “I’ll break her down.”

“She will break you.” Red muttered knowingly.
“Why does everyone keep saying that?” his agitation caused Lizzy’s head to slip from his shoulder.

The man rubbed the area soothingly.

She looked around, disoriented.

“Shift change.” Francis slid from the bed, kinking his body this way and that.

Red arose, sitting beside the groggy woman. “Thank you, Francis.” he found he meant the praise, “for taking care of her.”

“Well, it’s your turn now.” Francis yawned and stretched, “I’m going to bed.”

He closed the door behind him when he left with a stifled, “Good night, don’t let the bed bugs bite.”

“Eww.” Lizzy groaned at such a notion.

“Come here, baby.” Red murmured quietly, lifting the blankets for her snuggle closer to him.

“I hate bugs and he knows it.” she frowned her disgust. “Can’t you do something about him?”

Red smiled to himself, “And what would you do if I did?”

The woman raised her head, “Send you a ‘Thank you’ card?”

Red chuckled quietly, his arm bringing her closer. The stillness settled across the room. Outside, the storm still had not abated.

Red glanced to the limb beating intermittently against the window pane.

He checked on Lizzy.

She looked so peaceful, her hands tucked beneath her chin, the naturally alabaster lids closed to the world. Snuffling softly, she inched closer hiking her leg over his thigh, settling instantly. Smiling warmly, he nuzzled her hair line laying a gentle kiss in the thick strands, his eyes softening.

She had exhausted herself, the emotional turmoil of the day taking its toll.

Red lay very still, listening to her breathe, taking a measure of comfort in the sound.

He knew he would have to deal with the consequences of Nathan Tuttle’s actions sooner or later.

The man had touched so many with his thoughtless deeds.

Red closed his eyes, breathing in Elizabeth’s fragrance. The lilac of her hair, the delicate scent of her baby lotion.

His world fell back into place.

He would deal... could deal, now. So simple a thing really. The scent of a woman.

But it now meant everything to the man.

Red Reddington closed his eyes, allowing himself just a measure of the tranquility Lizzy had found.

His eyes grew heavy, lulled by the soft, even breathing of the woman beside him.
They both slept peacefully the rest of the night.

Red’s expression was a bleak one as he read the headline.

“Armed Robbery Leads to Deaths”

He read silently, his thoughts on the small print. According to the article, a struggle occurred between two men, the result, a robbery gone bad.

An unidentified man had been fatally stabbed during the altercation. Before succumbing to his wound, the victim had rebounded enough to stab his assailant in the chest with the alleged robber’s own knife.

Both men were pronounced dead at the scene. Identification was being withheld pending notification to the respective families.

Anthony Burke had called this morning so Red had already been apprised of how the events of last nights debacle now stood. Otherwise, Red would have just bypassed the article and not been aware of what had happened.

He had wanted to be there when Kevin’s sister received the news but to protect Lizzy, Red had to accept that could not be the case in this instance.

It did not sit well with Red however, that all he could do was offer Kevin’s sister money.

To add insult to injury, he had held a badly shaken, inconsolable woman in his arms half the night.

Lizzy had lost people before in her line of work, of course. Most were fleeting acquaintances, if the woman knew them at all.

Kevin had been different.

With Kevin, it had been personal. It cut deeper, of course, the emotional scars would be more painful.

Red sat the paper aside, hearing Lizzy’s approach. Francis picked up the folded section, scanning the print.

Red smiled warmly upon Liz’s entrance, arising, pulling her chair out.

Elizabeth Keen was not a morning person. She sat wearily, reaching out, clutching his coffee in desperate hands.

She partook almost greedily but soon the velvet liquid soothed and calmed rattled nerves.

She took several long sips of the caffeinated beverage before lifting blue eyes to his patiently waiting ones.
“Good morning.” he bade, his gaze a sympathetic one. “Feeling any better?”

“I’m in the acceptance stage they tell me.” she knew the process, “Who the hell thinks to put labels on such a thing?” she was still mad at the world and it’s injustices... it’s nonsensical violence.

“...I’m sorry.” she apologized, her eyes conveying so much more than she could verbally express in mixed company. “I felt... feel so helpless.”

Red nodded his comprehension, “I try to protect you from things like this and it seems I inadvertently bring it to your door most times.”

“You didn’t bring anything to the table.” Francis took exception. “The little creep–” he let it go, seeing Red’s warning glance, before continuing on. “This is no one’s fault. Life...or death happens. It’s our job to try and make some kind of sense of it all.”

The room fell silent as each occupant considered the words.

“It takes time and distance away from the issue before you can make any headway in that area.” he spoke from experience, Red knew. “The best we can do is... remember the good crap when it’s time and let the emotions run their course.”

He sat back in the high backed chair, folding his arms. “I know one thing,” he cast them both a solemn look, “if it were my time, I wouldn’t want you guys sitting around feeling like shit. I would hate to think you were.” his scowl increased, “I think Kevin would hate it too.”

Red sat back down, admiring the man’s intuitiveness. He knew Francis was trying to make it better for Lizzy.

“I... I would hate it too.” Liz knew in her heart, she wouldn’t want people she cared about agonizing over their sadness and anger... so very lost, floundering through the despair she was experiencing.

“If we want to honor Kevin, we should see to what he would if he could be here.” Francis unfolded his arms sitting straighter in the chair. “His family,” he ticked off, “that was his priority. Red has made it his, monetarily speaking.”

“You mean, Anthony Burke.” Red corrected.

“Yeah...” Francis knew the man better than Red believed. “Who sat up the college fund for the sister’s kids? Anthony Burke?”

Liz lifted grateful eyes to Red’s annoyed ones.

“Why don’t you mind your own business for a change?” he grumbled. “You sneaky little bastard. How did you find out about that?” Red was stumped. He knew Dembe wouldn’t have blabbed.

“My ways are inscrutable.” Francis waved a dismissing hand. “The point is, Kevin can rest easy. He knows we got it covered.”

“I can go visit today...” Liz felt better with something to do on the horizon. “Maybe take the little ones on a special outing, give his sister time to–” she was going to say mourn, but that particular stage would take months, maybe years, “well, a little time alone to let it all sink in.”

“We can rent out Disneyland.” Francis warmed to the notion.

“That’s on the opposite coast.” Red pointed out.
“Okay, so the other one.” Francis rolled his eyes. “Disneyworld... it’s down in Florida. Hours away by your jet.”

Red conceded with a shrug, “We could do that.”

“Rent out the entire park?” Liz was slightly bemused. “Don’t you guys do anything half way?”

The men exchanged puzzled looks.

“You don’t think it’s a good idea?” Red asked, his mood a serious one.

“I’ll think about it.” Liz held her amusement. “Until that time... a simple trip to the park might suffice.” she made mention of her original plan.

Francis scoffed over the suggestion, before sullenly playing with his silverware. Liz clicked her tongue quietly in understanding. He had wanted to go to the amusement parks.

Nora entered, balancing plates. “Oh, sweetheart,” her face fell, “I didn’t know you were stirring. I’ll get your–”

“No,” Liz arose, pushing back from the table, “I didn’t know you were stirring. I’ll get your–”

“No,” Liz arose, pushing back from the table, “I am perfectly capable of getting my own breakfast.” she cut Nora an affectionate glance. “As long as you cook it.”

The older woman sat the eggs and bacon in front of the men.

Francis breathed in the delicious aroma of fresh baked biscuits. “And people wonder why I am so smitten with you, my lovely.”

Red scowled darkly Francis’ way for the side-ways compliment.

“Oh, not that I mean–” Francis was mortified that the remark came out wrong.

“No wonder is right.” Nora sighed despondently.

“Nora, is there something wrong?” Liz picked up on the other woman’s mood. “Didn’t the visit with your family go all right?”

“I suppose.” the answer was a lackadaisical one. Nora topped off the coffee’s around the table. “I received the wonderful news that I am going to be a grandmother... again.” she lifted resigned eyes.

“That’s amazing!” Liz bolstered, her brow furrowed quizzically, “...Isn’t it?”

“Yeah.” the woman grumbled. “I just hate the reminder,” the light grey eyes were rolled expressively, “that I’m old... a grandmother.” she shuddered visibly at the word.

“A damned fine looking one.” Francis rallied, pouring on the charm with deliberate ease, Liz noted.

“...Very subtle.” Red remarked aside.

Nora clearly wasn’t buying the effort.

“Nora,” Red tried his hand, “you are still a lovely, vibrant woman.” he stated the facts as he saw them. “Do not let a label make you think otherwise.”

Nora issued a scoffing sound in her throat, sharing a cocked brow with the other woman in the room.
Liz picked up on the expression, clearing her throat gently. “You know, Red...your daughter would be around my age, wouldn’t she?”

The man shrugged, confusion registering on his face.

“It’s a distinct possibility, is it not,” Liz continued her train of thought having both male’s attention, “that you may very well be a grandfather.” she batted her eyes innocently, greatly amused when the older man’s expression fell at the distasteful realization.

Francis laughed at Red’s chagrin, “Yeah, grandpa, how do you feel about that label now?”

Red’s steely eyed glare silenced the amusement... on Francis’ part at least.

“Not that it makes you any less handsome or energetic, of course.” Nora added innocently.

Red digested the moment, then shifted his interest to his cook.

“You are beautiful and spirited,” he stated eloquently, a wicked gleam shining suddenly in those light eyes, “...no matter your advanced age.”

Nora’s pretty mouth tightened with irritation, she tsked the ire she felt aside.

“I would serve him haggis and monkey brains for that remark!” Liz championed her friend.

“Not at all.” Nora crooned, her manner chiding. “My goodness, no. I am not a vindictive person.”

She turned Red a serious gaze, “I hope you will enjoy the tea I’ve prepared for you this afternoon, sir?” she smiled all too pleasantly. “It’s my own... special blend.”

Francis’ chuckle was contagious.

Red laughed quietly into his coffee cup before turning his eyes to the woman. “This tea, would it be made specially for me?”

“Of course, only you, sir.” Nora’s cryptic remark and her hastily laid hand on Liz’s shoulder, sold the effect.

Liz grinned widely, eyeing the moody man triumphantly. “She still likes me.”

“I’m deeply wounded, Nora.” Red made mention.

“You will be, if you drink that tea.” Francis muttered aside.

“You used to be so unassuming.” Red shook his head woefully, ignoring the boy’s commentary.

“Like you, Mr. Reddington,” the woman prepared to take her leave, “I learned how to screw the system, or it’s head masters...” Nora glanced down at an eagerly attentive Francis Holbrook.

“Among other things, I’m sure.” Francis flirted unabashedly.

“...Yes.” the woman’s voice soothed expertly, as it washed over a very susceptible young pupil, drawing the young man back under her thrall “...exactly.”

Red grinned, sensing Francis’ condition, the kid was all but squirming in his seat.

“Yes, Nora...” Red encouraged, “tell us about your life before we came into the picture.”
“Oh, visions of boarding schools abound.” Francis sat up, sitting his chin on the cradle of his fists, a wistful look on the handsome face. “Strict head mistresses, with hard punishing rulers,” he sighed dreamily, “…Mary-Jane's, pleated skirts,” the man purred his delight, “…knee socks.”

The other three looked at the man, expressions askew.

Then, having noticed Red’s disapproving look, “Don’t even act like the knee socks don’t do anything for you.” Francis mocked.

Red chuckled, lifting his coffee absently. He stared down into the dark elixir, having halted mid-lift.

He shook the notion... old habits died hard. Lizzy had tasted the coffee after all.

“No,” Liz cooed soothingly, picking up on his train of thought, “if it were poisoned, she wouldn’t have let it touch my rather inviting lips, remember.” she pursed those lips suggestively.

Lifting apologetic eyes, Red took Nora’s hand, laying a small kiss on the silky knuckles. “Nora, you know how I love to tease you.”

“I’d love to tease her...” Francis remarked more than suggestively.

“Take a cold shower.” Red scowled over at the man.

“Only if she’s in there with me.”

“Are you sure you want her to see you in that light?” Red questioned, covertly dropping his eyes to the young man’s nether regions.

Francis grimaced, eyeing Red seriously. “…Shrinkage factor.” he whispered his disappointment to the older man. “…Fuck.”

Liz made a disgusted sound in her throat, “On that note,” she steered Nora away from such a bad influence, “we will tactfully take our leave.’

The man smiled, watching the women’s trek into the kitchen. Francis was busy devouring his first plate.

Red pulled his closer, lifting his fork. Liz returned promptly with a platter of fresh fruit and a bagel.

“Chick food.” Francis turned up his nose at such fare.

“Anything special on the agenda today?” the woman questioned both individuals.

“Have a meeting with the Chinese today.” Francis replied glumly. “What is the customary greeting again? Namaste?”

“The first being Hindi, the second Japanese.” Red pulled his ear lobe thoughtfully.

“Ni hao.” Red supplied the correct and simplistic enough greeting for Francis' use.

Liz and Francis both turned expectantly one expression accepting, the other suspicious. Francis clearly doubted Red’s abilities. Red let it go.

“Are you talking about Cheung?” Red’s attention was caught, his mood not so light and breezy suddenly.

Francis halted his fork mid-stride, “...Yes.” he had caught the tone. “Why?”

Red mused for a moment, “When did this come up?”

Francis put his fork down.

Liz was astonished, her mouth falling open.

“What’s going on.” Francis demanded “What did I not hear about? I hate when I don’t know what the hell is going on... what’s going on?”

Liz looked to Red as well.

“You didn’t hear about Moran or Byrne?” Red was surprised.

“...I know Moran got hit, no one knows by wh–” the light dawned “You think Cheung is clearing away competition?”

Liz watched the man return to his food, nonchalantly shoveling biscuit and gravy into his mouth by copious amounts, seemingly unfazed by the topic at hand.

“Did he say why he needed to meet?” Red had returned to his own food.

Liz’s appetite had abated somewhat.

“Something about wanting to increase his quantity of shipments.” Francis reached for the strawberry jam which Nora had laid out so appealingly in the China serving dish, “Should have sent the bells clanging,” the man scoffed. “As if I would entertain such a request.”

“It’s always a good idea to at least put up the pretense of considering the notion.” Red looked around for Nora, his coffee was dwindling.

Liz made a face, lifting the decorative urn off the raised rest, pouring the dark liquid, exasperated.

Red smiled happily over at the her for the action.

“Hey, hey, hey...” Francis forced his own cup to the fore.

Liz filled it with a wry expression.

“Thank you, Lizzy.” Red remembered his manners, hoisting his cup on high.

“We should check Cheung’s movements for the last couple weeks.” Francis decided. “You gonna eat that?” he motioned to a wayward piece of bacon laying haphazardly on Red’s plate.

Red pushed the object toward the man’s eager embrace, reaching for his phone. “I can contact–”

He scowled, following the warm hand which instantly covered his, up the slender arm, to Lizzy’s pretty face.

“What?” both men asked in unison.

“You’ll finish your breakfast before it gets cold.” Liz motioned. “I think business can wait for an hour at least.”
Red scowled darkly at the fingers which had clamped decisively around his own.

“This could mean life or death, woman.” Francis forked scrambled eggs onto his plate, “For me no less!”

“I don’t see anyone out there at the moment.” she had checked the outside area. “Do you want seconds?”

“I wouldn’t turn them down.” the guy seemed to feel better.

“We should really get the ball rolling on this matter.” Red reminded Francis more than Lizzy.

“Nora has a fresh batch of biscuits.” Liz won the war, Francis was up and out in seconds.

“Bring some blackberry jam.” she called out.

“Lizzy...” the man’s demeanor was serious.

“Red Reddington,” she stopped the tirade with a stubborn hand, “do you recall me asking you just last week—”

Francis returned, treats in hand. He slowed his steps, sensing a chill in the air.

Both participants had shut the hell up with his arrival. He glanced from one to the other as he sat.

“Okay...” he had looked at his plate, in a considering manner, “it doesn’t take a rocket scientist to know there’s a slight dissension in the air.”

Red cut him a, mind your own business, look.

Liz sighed her growing frustration, “I just wanted a quiet breakfast. After last night...” she trailed away listlessly.

Her fingers drew away from Red’s, leaving the phone in their wake.

Red looked at it morosely.

“And he’s a grumpy bastard, just wanting to get back into the game, huh.” Francis stated knowingly.

Red sent another look, this one a little more distinct in nature, all of which Francis ignored.

“Look,” he spread his hands, “the meeting is later today. We’ve got time.” it was reminded.

“Besides, I’ve seen you plan a hostage rescue in five minutes, then execute it in less than ten.”

Red shifted irritably. He was not accustomed to anyone setting limits on his time or efforts... not even Lizzy.

Francis studied the two, “Do you know what she does when you’re not here?”

Liz sat up, ready to be offended.

Red shifted impatient eyes, interested in spite of his mood.

“She sits there,” Francis pointed, “with puppy dog eyes, just staring at your empty chair.”

Red checked the woman’s reaction, feeling a warmth in his chest. She missed... him?
He knew she had said it before, but it was said while they had been making love. He naturally assumed—

“I do not!” Liz defended halfheartedly.

The man fell quiet, “I guess what I’m trying to say...” he amended, “Red, you once told me that, the business will always be there. The people we care about?” Francis glanced at the woman, “Maybe not. You said...” it was reiterated, “we shouldn’t forget how precious that side of our lives is. That we should never take it for granted, right?”

Red’s mood eased. He sat back in the chair, contemplating the words.

“I get what Liz is trying to say. But, she’s saying it like a chick.” Francis spared the woman a supportive smile. “This means something.” he motioned around the table they occupied. “I half keep expecting Kevin to walk through that door,” he motioned, “and try to steal all the bacon and don’t we all wish he would.”

The silence fell. Liz bit back tears.

“It’s the small stuff.” Francis, too grew contemplative. “Like sharing breakfast with the people you...” he trailed away. “Well, this is getting maudlin.” he snapped out of it. “I’ll be damned if I let a would be player ruin the moment.” his scowl was fixed. “Outsiders don’t have a place here. Not if we don’t allow it.” he threw Red a meaningful look.

“She just wants to spend a few minutes with you, enjoying some quiet time. That’s all.” Francis said knowingly. “You can give her that, Red. The rest of it can wait.” he assured. “And it’s my life that’s in the balance, so I get to call the shots on this one.”

The older man knew a life lesson when one was delivered. He reached over, his hand covering Lizzy’s. His eyes mellow.

“Out of the mouth’s of babes,” he motioned across the table. “...and idiots.”

Liz tightened her fingers in his, “Stop being mean.”

“Yeah, stop being mean.” Francis quipped, swiping Red’s biscuit.

The man sighed heavily. “I wanted that.”

“Nora has plenty more.” Francis bit into the succulent bread. “Unless Silas has already been in this morning.”

“I’ll get some.” Liz held her amusement.

Red lifted his eyes to the woman upon her return, biscuit in hand, “So you missed me, humm?” his eyes danced devilishly.

“Not so you’d notice.” she fought back instinctively.

Red pulled the butter tray closer, searching for his knife. Cutting off a pat of butter, he spread it onto the warmed biscuit, watching the soft yellow melt into the fluffy breading.

This was a treat Lizzy found he enjoyed in the mornings.
This morning he almost missed the opportunity because of a stupid decision on his part.

How could business become more important, to his way of thinking than spending time with her.

“You missed me.” he seemed more than pleased with the fact.

Liz threw Francis a, you'll pay for this one, look as she snatched the coffee urn in her grasp.

The woman marched to the kitchen knowing she had lost ‘round one’.

Well, that battle wasn’t over just yet. She swished her backside saucily sensing Red’s eyes the entire way until the kitchen door closed behind her.

“There!” she stated sotto voce, satisfied with her performance one hundred percent.

“That,” Francis motioned, “was for your benefit.”

“Yes.” Red’s smile touched his lips as he chastised his cock for over-reacting. He subtly adjusted the problem to a more comfortable position, sitting back in his chair. “I picked up on that, Francis.”

Red held his tongue because... the boy was right. He may be older and wiser, but he had totally missed the subtle clues right in front of him. Too fixated on business instead of his personal time. A time he had fervently dreamed of having, with Elizabeth.

The man pushed his phone aside, determined to follow through on Francis’ advice for once.

♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥

It was good hour and a half later, after a leisurely repast and even a second cup of Nora’s enticing brew, he and Francis journeyed to the office.

Red stood now, staring morosely at the pile of mail awaiting his perusal.

Silas had given warning. New ‘letters’ had arrived in Red’s absence.

Francis was distracted, phone in hand. The man sauntered about the office, finding all sorts of objects of interest as he went. He picked up each, examining and prodding before moving down the neatly lined shelves on display.

Red’s brow furrowed with each passing sentence he read.

Your behavior in Las Vegas was sickening. No matter the predicament he has placed you in, there was no need to hang on Reddington like his personal whore. You think his cohorts truly believe that a vibrant, beautiful woman such as yourself would deign to give Reddington even an iota of attention. They’re suspicious of you. Get out now before Reddington gets you killed with this farce.

Red reread the diatribe, trying to make some sense where no logic prevailed.

He moved on to the next.
Why did you fight? What has Reddington told you or threatened you with that you didn’t come willingly? Why the hell are you cuddling up to him? An even better question, why the fuck are you kissing him? Don’t you understand that Reddington is destroying you, Liz? He’s making you a traitor to your own kind. We’re the good guys, not him. Next chance you get, come to me. You know how to contact me.

Scoffing, Red threw the letters into the ever growing pile and turned his attention to the problem at hand.

Francis.

After a couple dozen calls, Red’s contacts confirmed his growing fears.

“There seems to be a pattern emerging.” Francis grinned over at him. “That makes eight by my count. This guy isn’t being very subtle is he.”

Eight casualties in Cheung’s path, not two as Red had previously thought. Eight shakers and movers, eliminated.

“And you are next.” Red pointed out the obvious.

“No one has been able to punch my ticket to date,” the man laughed at the absurdity. “The thing that gets me... the guy is so pleasant to your face.”

“What has that got to do with anything?” Red was genuinely stumped. “This is business. Knock out the competition.”

“Yeah, if you have a ‘forties’ mentality.” Francis shook his head. “That’s not how it’s done anymore and you know it.”

“It is in Cheung’s part of the world.”

“Well, he’s here now. You have to adapt... or die.”

Red spread his hands, “That was a given, yes,” he smirked slightly at Francis’ put out expression. “Glad to see you have caught up with the rest of us.”

“They weren’t even decent competition.” was what puzzled Francis. “Take Moran. He’s been more than disillusioned for a while. Business wasn’t going well, his family disowned him... his wife took up with... what’s his name?”

“The Irish guy?” Red snapped his fingers as the name came. “Finn...”

“Gallagher, right.” Francis snapped his fingers. “I’d be surprised if Moran even put up a fight when the time came.”

“Byrne’s loyalty was in question...” Red pointed out, “how many of his men had bailed to date?”

“If Cheung’s implying I’m not at the top of my game...” Francis took exception.

“Regardless of their situations,” Red soothed, “I believe Cheung’s fishing for big game now.”

Red shook his head woefully as Francis preened, clearly pleased by the praise for his status in the world.

“Damned straight.” he returned his to his perusal of a particular oddity he had located on the highest shelve to the right of Red’s desk. “Well, now what?”

The kid was clearly, totally unconcerned for the impending threat.

Red pondered for a beat, “Change the meeting place.”

“And if he doesn’t go for it?”

“Then cancel the entire show.” Red advised.

“Which will only postpone the inevitable.” Francis made the call.

It was decided the meeting would take place on his home turf. Francis’ home was located on a large acreage, the house settled far back into a canopy of trees. Away from prying eyes... he hoped.

Red had already sent for Silas. Security would be heavy and hopefully, somewhat unexpected. Well, to the point where an egotist like Cheung would consider it a challenge.

It would also be a bragging right to go up against higher odds if he pulled such a coup off for later times in the Organization.

Liz came into the room while the call was in progress. Red held up a staying hand, the woman took the hint, listening attentively until the call was finished.

“We have a two o’clock appointment with the Grim Reaper.” Francis smirked, replacing his cell into its familiar inside picket of the stylish jacket he sported.

Red nodded absently, Silas appeared, pulling up short behind the still silent woman.

“You’re blocking my path.” his gravelly voice held a touch of menace. “That’s a fire hazard.”

“Go around.” Liz responded, just as short and clipped. She had not found any humor in Francis’ last quip.

Silas chuckled his appreciation pushing his bulk past the girl, careening her into a curio-cabinet as he did so.

Liz swung out, smacking the guy on the broad, muscular shoulder. Her hand stung after the fact.

She cradled it soothingly.

“If you ever hit me and I find out about it...” Silas drawled lazily. “My guys are on their way.” he turned his attention to business, directing the statement to Red. “Medical team will set up near the house but far enough away that Genghis Khan has no clue to their presence.”

“Medical team?” Liz was instantly concerned.

“That’s just standard operating procedure” Silas assured the woman.

“Better to have them close as not.” Francis reminded. “Just a precaution, Lizzy. Really.”

Red watched the woman’s face, reading her body language.
“Oh...” she tried to smile, “yeah, that makes sense... that’s good then.”

“What’s wrong?” Red approached, sensing a problem. He encouraged the woman to voice her concerns with his gentle manner. “This is no different than any other time we’ve–”

“I know that.” she hastened to reassure. “It’s just that...” How could she tell him? It was stupid to even her. The feeling of Deja vu... the uneasiness.

“What?” the man’s hands rubbed tenderly up and down her arms. “Tell me.”

“...The last time this happened,” she blurted, “you ended up getting shot... twice!” her entire body was one coiled tension rod. Red could feel it.

“Nora has prepared a cake.” Silas sensed the two needed to talk. “She wants me to lick her bowl... let’s go, Junior.”

“Lick her bowl.” Francis took the hint for once. “She wouldn’t let you within ten feet of her bowl!”

“Wait.” Liz halted their intended departure. “I may need your help... both of you.” she knew how stubborn Red could be. “I’m very concerned about this. I really am. You should listen to me... all of you.”

Silas folded his arms across his chest. Francis glanced anywhere but at the woman. Liz could see the futility of her pleading.

“This guy only wants to kill Francis.” she tried another tactic. “Isn’t it a better strategy to hit him first? When you are calling the shots.”

“Wait.” Liz halted their intended departure. “I may need your help... both of you.” she knew how stubborn Red could be. “I’m very concerned about this. I really am. You should listen to me... all of you.”

Silas compressed his mouth showing deep indentures along the sides of his handsome face. “I picked up on that, yes.”

Francis fell into his ‘sullen’ mode.

“But I was more impressed with the gangster talk.” Silas confided to one and all. “Get a hit on Cheung first...” he grinned approvingly.

“I’m serious here!” Liz snapped, the unreasonable fear dictating her mode. She settled, her eyes shifting between each carefully composed face. “I know you guys have to... do what you do but does it hurt to have a little common sense sometimes?”

Red motioned curtly with his head.

Silas and Francis vacated the room.

Red sighed lightly, returning his interest. The large blue eyes touched his heart.

“It’s odd,” he smiled down at the little face, “having someone give a shit about me.”

Liz lifted her arms, grasping tightly to the strong shoulders. Those blue eyes closed, a dark premonition overtaking her.

“Please don’t go.” she pleaded her desperation.
There isn’t much I would ever refuse you.” he whispered, his embrace tightening about the small delicate frame. “You know that.” he closed his eyes, exhaling his regret.

He made her look at him. “I think Francis need me, Elizabeth. I think it best if I be there.”

“We can call Ressler and the–”

“The will arrest, Francis.” he cut the suggestion short. “You know that. And besides, when has Ressler ever listened to my warnings? He’ll be the one getting himself killed.”

Liz knew the truth when she heard it. Frustrated, stymied... “Then let me help!”

The man’s manner changed. “If you’re there, my focus will be on you and your safety.” he reasoned. “It needs to be on Cheung.”

“You expect me to just sit here and wait for the news that–”

“That is exactly what I expect.” he interrupted curtly, his expression set.” This is just another normal day in the life.” he cautioned. “You’re going to have to become accustomed to that, Elizabeth Scott.”

She fumed, crossing her arms over her chest. “Like the dutiful woman?”

Red softened, stepping closer, “Odd, the word that seemed fit better was... wife.” he smiled at her stricken features.

“W-what?” the winds were taken from her sails, her arms falling away listlessly from her determined stance.

“Not to worry,” Red hastened to cover the unconscious ‘slip’, “I know my place in the scheme of things.” he stepped back, his gaze an unassuming one. “I’m asking that you stay here... trust me to get the job done. Can you do that?”

She was still reeling from the wife retort, truth told. She felt all warm and tingling inside suddenly but deep in the recesses of her mind, the nagging, dark foreboding still lurked, unabated.

“Do your profiles,” he lightened the moment, “harass Tom, make Silas do aerobics. Which is your normal.” Red shrugged mentally. To each his own, after all. “Such are the Days of Our Lives.” he mumbled, searching the area for a pad and pen.

“Safe to come in?” Silas poked his head around the door making point of checking his watch. “Fireworks over?”

Liz’s face said it all. The guard shook his head. “Hey, Basket Case,” he tried his hand at the problem, “I have sent ten men over to the site.” he ticked off on his thick fingers. “Then we got Francis’ guys to add to the fray.”

“It’s even worse than I imagined.” she wailed her distress. “You need that many men?”

“I err on the side of caution... you know that.” her nerves were soothed. He glanced at the other occupant of the room. “We only have an hour or so. Shouldn’t we get the show on the road?”

Silas turned back the to woman. “Everything will be fine.” his brow crooked. “I’ve done this... we’ve done this... right?”

She didn’t look convinced.
“Well aren’t we smug, Mr. Contingency…” she had a ‘what if’ for them both. “Tell me this. What happens when all of your men are out of action and no one can follow procedure?”

“Then Dembe will save the day, as always.” Silas had an answer, of course.

“You go too… with Red.” Liz pushed on the guard’s shoulder.

“No.” Red vetoed the notion in no uncertain terms. “We’re not going there. Joe and Silas will remain here, at their posts.”

“God, you make me so mad, Red Reddington!” she fumed, her ire reaching a fever pitch. “If I were a man, I’d–”

“Oh, honey, please don’t.” Red cringed at the thought. “You profane a subject intrinsically sacred to me.”

Silas chuckled lowly.

Liz turned on her heel, too upset to even deign a reply.

Red barred her path, hands held high, “I’m sorry, baby.” he had instantly regretted his flippancy. “That was shitty of me.” he confessed.

“You caved awfully fast.” Silas pointed out.

The man attempted to embrace Elizabeth. He thought he would be rebuked but instead, she allowed his tactics, her arms clutching at him almost frantically.

“It’s okay, baby.” he embraced her body tightly. “I was a bastard, forgive me.”

His eyes met Silas’ over Liz’s trembling shoulders. Silas grinned widely offering a gesture any man could read a mile away. Red flipped him off rather curtly behind the woman’s back.

Liz’s fingers tightened about Red’s neckline. She took in the scent of the man, breathing in his essence.

Red rubbed her back consolingly.

Silas cupped her head, “It’ll be okay, little girl. Stop fretting now.” the guard made note of the time again as he exited.

The silence was comfortable once again, but Red could feel the tension emanating from the slender frame.

A queasiness overcame the woman. She swallowed hard. The Deja vu was more than unsettling. Liz tried to reason it away with logic and intellect.

Red leaned, his mouth gently coaxing response in spite of the small tremors wracking her body.

Liz relaxed into the sphere of his arms, eagerly returning the insistent pressure of his sensual lips.

She put her whole heart and soul into that kiss, a part of her, a large part, wishing to convince the man to stay.

Wrapping her free arm about his neck, she moved into his body as his hands slid along her waist. A large palm cradled the small of her back, the other threading through her hair.
Red pulled her against him, the warm curvaceous body edging him closer to a decision he could not make at this time. She was making him want to do so, however. Her tender lips pressed against his, little puffs of breath tickling his cheek.

After all they had done, the intimacy they shared. A simple kiss and embrace still felt brand new. He had never felt anything so wonderful in his arms, as Elizabeth Keen.

She meowed softly, relaxing in his hold. Her breasts pressed into his chest along with the rest of her beautiful little body. He grunted his appreciation. The feminine curve of her pelvis settled against his thigh and he almost lost the will to control his rising desire.

All he wanted at that moment was to turn around, find the most convenient damned wall, press into the surface and get between those velvet soft thighs.

He slipped his palm beneath the fabric of her blouse caressing satin flesh. He moved his inquisitive fingers up the familiar expanse of skin, his fingers hooking on the top rim of her bra.

The delicate lace easily gave way to his insistent urging as the back of his fingers raked gently across the heated surface.

Liz moaned encouragingly when he brushed the rosy nipple into a tight peak of arousal.

Her fingers massaged the back of his head lovingly sending delicious waves of pleasure down his spine.

The tip of her tongue melted to his erotically. She moved enticingly against the straining bulge in his slacks, her mouth parting hungrily for his.

Red broke the contact out of necessity. “You think it’s easy to leave you... at anytime?” his roughened voice scolded, forcing a little space between them. “Don’t do this to me, baby.”

Liz closed her eyes, deeply affected by the pain he allowed her to read in the grey eyes.

“I don’t want to go...” he reiterated, his voice strained, “I have to go.”

Liz nodded minutely, her mouth parting his one last time. “Please come back.”

The blue eyes lifted, haunted with the possibility he might not this time.

“Oh, I’ll come back.” he cast her a look, “if only to collect on your promise... and finish what you started.”

She blinked innocent eyes up at him.

“And don’t even pretend you don’t know what I’m talking about.”

She didn’t. “Then you make sure you remember that.”

A knowledgeable glint returned to his eyes, “Ohh, I’ll remember,” he vowed, “and not Cheung or any damn thing else will stop me.”

Francis entered the room, his weapon out of its usual placement holster. “This clip is sticking.” he complained but finally slid the metal into the slot.

“You have your extra?” Red took the clips the man handed over, placing them into the pocket of his linen jacket.
“Of course.” Francis took umbrage. “This isn’t my first rodeo, you know.”

“Yeah...” Red touched Lizzy’s cheek in a display of open affection, his eyes clouding over, “just don’t forget you have it tucked away this time.”

“Are you ever going to let me forget that one little lapse?” it was exasperated.

“Did you inform Silas where we would be?” Red moved on.

“I thought the sitting room with the fireplace.” Francis had pondered the equation, “Strategically, it’s perfect for our purpose.”

Red handed Lizzy a card, “Here are numbers in case my phone is out of commission. These people will know the situation at any given moment. Just tell them who you are.”

Liz glanced at the hastily scribbled numbers. “Do you expect your phone to be–”

“You said, think of all contingencies,” he reminded her of her sarcasm with Silas a few minutes back. “I broke the screen on my phone the last time, remember?”

When he was with Lizzy’s team, when they cornered Patrick O’Brien, he had thrown himself over Samar, cracking the face plate of the phone on her vest, rendering it useless.

“Everything will be fine, Lizzy.” Francis kissed her cheek. The woman surprised him by offering up a bear hug in return.

“You just make sure you’re beside him...” she indicated Red who was preparing his own gear for use, “when he comes through that door.” she pointed.

“I will see no harm befalls them.” Dembe had come through the archway only to pick up the gear from the cluttered table before exiting yet again.

The man caught eyes with Red Reddington.

“No permanent damage, at least.” Dembe would never promise anything he could not deliver without absolute certainty, but the words had been for Red’s ears alone.

Red acknowledged his friend with a smile as Dembe and Francis left the room.

Liz determined to reign in her unreasonable fear, forcing a smile as well, “Be safe,” she whispered, “and you better not wait to call like last time,” she pouted, “the minute it’s all clear–”

“I’ll pick up the phone... or a phone.” he assured.

He hefted a bag of ammo over his shoulder, “Don’t sit around worrying... keep busy. It will make the time pass.”

The sooner he got this shit over with, the sooner he could get back home.

He paused, his hand on the knob of the door. He hesitated further, his eyes taking in the grave expression on the lovely face.

“I will be back, Elizabeth.” it was more a vow to himself now. “I will always come back to you...” his manner was more than comforting, “... always. I promise.”

The room was inordinately still with his departure. Liz hugged herself tightly but didn’t try to stop... the trembling, free to experience the troubling sensations now without having to keep up the brave face for the man.

She stared at the opened doorway, her thoughts running a mile a minute, indecision racking her brain.

Red stalked to the car, yanking the back door ajar, sliding into the cushy interior absently, a fixed scowl on his face.

He glanced over, sensing Francis’ scrutiny.

“What?” the car started, pulling down the long drive.

“Red ironically, really isn’t your color.” the guy handed over a handkerchief, motioning, “you’ve got a little lipstick...”

Red blotted his lips, his mood dropping. It felt as if he were erasing Lizzy’s touch.

“What was it?” Francis continued his teasing. Red knew it was the man’s way of coping with the stress of what was to come. “Was she offering incentive to come back or you guys getting into the kinky shit finally.”

Red cast a dark glare his way.

“Incentive it was.” Francis seemed totally disappointed.

They arrived before the opposition, but just. Red didn’t even have time to finish the drink Francis had provided when the doorbell rang.

“Aren’t they polite... and on time too.” Francis seemed impressed.

“You better get this shit over and done.” Red shot the man a warning glance. “No fucking dawdling. No polite rhetoric... just bring it to a head quickly.”

“So you can get back to, Lizzy.” Francis finished, a big grin on his face. “What did she do, promise you a blow if you came back unscathed?”

Red’s eyes slid shut as visions of Lizzy’s luscious lips wrapping about his cock flooded his minds eyes. The images so vivid, a fine sheet of perspiration broke out of his brow and upper lip.

Francis had expected a retort, checking when one was not forthcoming. He quirked a brow, sensing the reason Red had not responded with his usual aplomb.

The younger man laughed heartily, “Oh hell... did she?” he was thrilled by the notion and the fact, Red seemed so affected by the concept presented. “Boy, she’s got you all riled up!” he cackled his glee. “How the mighty have fallen.”

“Francis,” Red was more than exasperated, “I’m about to stick my foot up your ass.” there was teasing and there was, being a pain in the ass.

It was at that exact moment, Cheung and his entourage chose to enter their domain.
“Greetings my friends.” the Chinese man had included Reddington in his salutation. He clearly had not expected such good fortune to smile upon him this day. “Ah, Red Reddington, what a remarkable surprise. And what has you in such good spirits this fine day, Francis? May I enquire?”

Francis could hardly contain himself, “I never thought I’d see the day a woman would lead this guy,” he hooked his thumb to a suddenly impassive companion, “around by his dick.”

“The picture you paint, Francis.” Nothing was going to phase Red now.

Francis knew the man had dropped into his blasé mode. A face Red presented to his business associates.

“You are a regular Gauguin today, I must say, I heartily approve.” Red finished.

The insincere smile was in place.

“I did not expect to see you here.” Cheung took a seat across from the other man.

Francis noted with interest, the two cryptic looking companions situated themselves strategically, one behind Red’s position, one behind his own.

“Has your dear Madeline forgiven all your many transgressions. I assume she is the only female capable of–”

“You assume wrong.” Francis had turned to the matter at hand himself. “Madeline is so passé she’s not even in the picture any longer... you really should keep more abreast of your enemies foibles, Cheung.”

“Enemies?” the word genuinely surprised the man, clearly. “What...” the man arose from his comfortable position, “why, use such a disagreeable word? I thought we were... amiable companions if not as yet, friends.”

“I wonder what Moran and Byrne and all the rest thought?” Red asked cheerfully, brandishing his unfinished drink about with a flourish. “Do you think they shared the same erroneous misgivings as you yourself... right up to the time you stabbed them in the back, hopefully not literally, of course. It’s not your style, is it?”

Cheung sensed trouble, his eyes darting frantically to his back up plan.

The two men who had accompanied him on this auspicious occasion took their cue, weapons rapidly drawn.

Francis was close enough, for he had purposely made a show of placing his drink on a nearby table, which was very close to where he needed to be at this exact moment...

His arm shot out, the back of his elbow connecting full force with ‘companion number one’s’ jawline.

The guys piece went flying and he staggered back from the unexpected blow.

Things went rapidly downhill from there and the odd thing about it was, even though both men expected the deluge of violence, it still shook their foundations.

Red remembered thinking at the time, the day had started rather well considering the travesty of the preceding night’s events... it appeared it would end in an entirely different manner.
Francis lamented on just how swiftly a person can turn on a dime. Cheung had seemed so amiably pleasant there for a moment... before things started to go sideways.

♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥

Liz could still feel the imprint of Red’s mouth, she touched her lips tentatively wishing to hold the moment suspended in time and space.

She paced slowly in the quiet of the room which suddenly seemed cavernous without the presence of the three men she had come to cherish so much over the past couple months.

The nagging fear amplified with each passing moment. Her first instincts were to follow them. To try and assist in some way... some manner.

The last time she had followed those instincts, it had not turned out well at all.

Red was right. She would be a distraction, which could get someone shot... or worse.

She felt so helpless.

And too, there was the question of Tom ‘The Stalker’ Keen.

Silas would prevent her leaving as well. She knew as much, even if she could find a way past, ‘The Stalker Bastard’. Which is how the guards now jovially referred to Tom Keen.

That those were the least of her concerns spoke volumes.

She was sick at heart.

Would she feel this each and every time a ‘business’ meeting was called?

Could she live like this? In a constant state of anxiety and terror that the man she cared for on levels she couldn’t begin to fathom... might not come back to her one day?

Red meant that much to her.

That Dembe and Francis might not walk through that door? She glanced at the object vacantly. They brought so much light and joy into the house. How could she cope if...

She stopped that train of thought but seconds later it was back.

She felt so close to both men. They made her world feel solid, made each day easier to face. In Elizabeth’s life, well, the life before... the statement meant so much.

To have found people she could depend upon... ones she could rely upon.

And Red...

My God... that man had changed her entire perspective on... everything. Absolutely everything.

The relationship between them had grown in ways she could not have anticipated.

Oh sure, what woman didn’t have a few fantasy moments with a man like Red Reddington?

She had found herself no different in that area.

In those early days, she had staunchly demanded a strictly business like arrangement remain between them.

But sometimes, at her desk, daydreaming... even Samar had wondered, ‘What was the man like in bed?’

Samar was certain Red would be a generous lover, that he would find sexual fulfillment in any partner’s gratification he might choose, over his own.

Little did Samar know, just how phenomenal the man was in bed, but Liz knew. Liz also knew how affectionate, caring and loving a man he was.

He could evoke such contentment simply holding her in his embrace. For the first time in her entire existence, she had found a secure harbor.

And its name was... Red Reddington.

If she lost him...

Liz refused to finish the thought. She resumed her pacing, this time more intently.

It felt like she was standing in a precipice... on edge. She halted instantly, afraid to take another step...

This must be what it felt like... the emptiness, the hollow ache in one’s heart when a woman stood on a pier before the man she adored shipped out to some unknown location, with no set time to return.

Not knowing _if_ he would return at all.

How did all the wives and lovers during wartime stand these conflicting emotions?

How did any military... law enforcement, firefighters... family cope?

The mind boggled. Now that she was actually experiencing the turmoil, the problems seemed insurmountable.

Liz rubbed her temples to ease the building ache, her arms hugging her body to ward off the sudden chill which descended.

What if Red _didn’t_ return? What would she do? Where could she turn for solace... there could be _no_ solace.

They had just begun their journey. So many things yet to experience together, so many things left to explore.

She was suddenly overwhelmed, sitting hastily because her legs could not hold her upright.

She tried to de-clutter her mind, but couldn’t think clearly.

‘...Elizabeth?’

The woman started, shocked from her preoccupation. “Oh,” she breathed easier, “Nora.”

“What’s wrong child?” the woman entered the room, concern on her face. “You’re as white as a sheet.”

“I’m probably coming down with a virus.” Liz smiled wanly. “I’m fine though. Just thinking... woolgathering.”

Nora’s concern did not dispel, “Can I do anything?”

Liz knew she couldn’t just sit here and wait. That much was crystal clear.

“Red and I had a little tiff,” she fibbed, her conscience tugging at her, “plus he left his briefcase.” she grimaced slightly. “I suppose it’s stupid to want to go apologize... clear the air? I can use the briefcase as an excuse...”

Nora relaxed, “Communication is key to a good, solid foundation... to any relationship.” she mused wisely. “We could certainly make the effort but what about...” Nora gestured to Tom’s position out front, “and too, Silas watches you like a hawk.”

Liz lifted a subdued look, “Nora, surely we’re smart enough... together, to work around these obstacles.”

Nora scowled slightly signifying she was putting her mind to the problem presented.

Liz rushed to her room, grabbing necessities, including several extra clips. She checked her weapon, shoving it in her bag.

Nora was in the kitchen waiting patiently. She checked the outside area motioning Elizabeth to follow her lead.

Moments later, Liz was in the back seat floorboard, crouched low with Nora pulling out the gate, waving casually to the posted guard.

Neither woman noticed the forgotten briefcase.

“Where did all these wahoos come from?”

Red and Francis hid behind a couple of ornate pillars, dodging shards of shattered vases and bar glasses as they burst around them.

“More to the point,” Red chanced a peek around the cover, firing off a well placed shot which took down another of Cheung’s men as the guy vied for a better position from which to try and end Red’s life, “where are our wahoos?”

He replaced his clip absently, checking on his companion, “You gonna live?”

The man pulled at his tie, wrapping it tightly about Francis’ oozing leg wound.

“Yeah,” Francis kept a running check on the opposition, “it just stings... a lot.” he grimaced, squeezing his arm, stemming the blood flow as Red secured another make shift tourniquet with Francis’ tie. “I swear to God, if anyone calls this a fucking flesh wound--”

Red noted Dembe to his left. The large man fired a sharp volley before ducking back out of harm’s way. A bullet hit the wall directly where he had been seconds before, shattering dry wall dust in its wake.

Red heard another grunt of pain and the heavy thump of a body fall. Dembe had made his last shot count... as always.
“Is anyone keeping a head count?” Red was serious. “These guys are multiplying like termites.”

Red checked on the boy again, his eyes measuring the blood flow from Francis’ wounds.

Francis had taken a hit when Cheung first pulled his gun, but it was Cheung’s right hand man who had tagged Francis.

Red had offered cover fire, tugging the kid to safety but in the interim, Red had taken a shot meant for Francis.

Cheung had grazed the older man in the side.

Another lucky shot, or unlucky depending on one’s point of view, had entered Francis’ leg before they reached the cover of the pillar.

They had been hunkered down in this relative place of safety now for about ten minutes, having been able to stave off any real advancement for the other team to get.

There was a sudden lull in the mayhem.

“This can’t be good.” Red grunted, having stretched too far to check out the competitions intentions.

“You okay?” Francis picked up on the unwise move, glancing Red’s way superficially.

“We’re making some headway, surely.” Red could see the bodies mounting up between their united efforts. “How many men could he have brought?”

Fire fights outside the house broke out sporadically, whether that was a good thing, Red had no idea.

Red pressed the wound in his side. Well, that shirt and suit was toast.

“I’m okay,” it hurt like hell though. He kept it to himself.

“Until Lizzy gets a hold of you.” Francis chuckled his mirth, “You’ll never hear the end of this one.”

“Work on that delivery.” Francis braced himself. He had seen movement out of the corner of his eye.

Red had never had anyone to answer to but himself. For a brief second, it annoyed him. That Lizzy would definitely be pissed. He hadn’t listened to her warnings. But it... was what it was.

This was his norm. Which was a sad statement in itself, he supposed.

Yeah, she was going to be very pissed at him.

Then... why was he suddenly smiling? Why did he feel kind of warm inside? A surge of affection caused him to chuckle.

“Really?” Francis was concerned. He looked at the guy askew. “This isn’t my idea of a good time but then...” he lobbed off a volley of shots, “it isn’t my definition of a bad time either.”

Red chuckled again for the man’s statements. “Oh, Francis,” he sighed more than heavily for his lot in life, “how do we get ourselves in these... incidents?”

One of Silas’ men broke a secure position to make a dash towards the side hall. A hail of bullets followed his trek but the guy was able to dive for the safety of the corridor.

Red wondered why the risk. He and Dembe had offered the requisite cover fire, of course, but–

A single shot rang out from the vicinity of the hall.

Dembe swiveled, weapon raised but there was no need for alarm.

The assailant had almost managed to flank Dembe’s position. Silas’ man had seen the covert action, eliminating the threat.

Dembe inclined his head, showing his gratitude to a slyly grinning comrade. The guard waved hand nonchalantly in reply.

Dembe caught Red’s eyes that softened measurably, “Be more careful my friend.” Red whispered the hope but knew Dembe had received the message loud and clear.

“We have to finish this...” Francis remarked in passing, “I didn’t think it would take this long.”

“The cops.” Red understood the problem at hand.

“No, the HOA.” Francis popped two rounds but they missed their mark. “Not only are the fees exorbitant, the neighbors can be such bitches. Paint the mail box the wrong color, you’ve committed a cardinal sin.” he gritted, popping off another round. “ This particular brand of noise pollution will create anarchy.... there will be riots in the streets... complete chaos.”

Red glanced over thinking the boy was losing it. Maybe it was the kid’s way of coping, an innate defense mechanism. Or maybe Francis was going into shock. He glanced at the blood soaked clothing.

“You have a brick mailbox.” Red reminded.

“You know they wouldn’t let me put my pink flamingoes in my own damn yard?” Francis was taking his ire out on the competition.

Red had noted a stately pair of the birds right outside the front door, now that he thought about it. “However do you cope under such a strict regime?”

“This is America! I can put my damned flamingoes where ever the hell I please!” the man snapped. “You know...” Francis was musing thoughtfully, his hand running over the Italian marble where he sat, “this floor is cold here... that will be a problem this winter.”

He laughed at the absurdity. “If we get to this winter–” bullets ricocheted all about their heads.

“It’s thinking like that which precedes the fall of nations.” Red eased a quick check about the pillar.

Cheung had chosen the exact moment to do the same. Both men returned to cover automatically but Red now knew the bastard’s location.

“I’ve had enough of this shit...” he stepped out, feet firmly planted, systematically emptying his full clip into the wall behind which Cheung had taken cover.

Plaster and dry wall gave way to the power of his weapon, large holes appearing with each blast of the gun he held. He blindly dropped the depleted clip, slapping a new one in its place before retaking his previous position.
“Nice grouping.” Francis had been impressed. “Too much coffee this morning?” he had to give it to the guy. “I wouldn’t want to be your Barista.”

Red chuckled, “Hell, it relieved some of the tension.” he grasped the cool metal in his hand. “And wasted a perfectly good round.” he checked the spot where Cheung had been, knowing he had missed the bastard completely.

“Well, it put the fear of God into the asshole.... or it would have me.” Francis mused. “But I shit my shorts at a scary movie...”

Red turned back, situating himself more comfortably, his eyes lifting casually to the distant hall. His eyes widened with genuine surprise.

“Fuck!” Francis has seen the approaching danger as well, his good arm lifting, taking steady aim.

Everything seemed to be moving in slow motion suddenly. Intuitively, Red reacted of course, but his arm seemed inordinately heavy.

He sensed he would not be able to take a shot in time.

Vaguely, he was aware of Francis’ gun firing, a loud crack echoing in his ear.

He could not look away from the approaching menace. The man was surprisingly small in stature. He wore a grey coat and black pants. A dark hat was pulled down tight on his head.

Red remembered thinking at the time. It was the end of May. What the hell was the guy doing wearing a winter stocking cap?

Red lifted himself, wishing to meet the attacker head-on.

Again, his legs were not responding as they should. He was aware, out of the corner of his eye, that Dembe’s large frame was on the move.

Red was suddenly blinded by a bright flash.

A shooting pain tore through his head. The sound of the room became muted.

Loud voices dulled to a distant murmur. A black void of creeping haze drifted closer and closer. Red pulled back from the ever advancing edge.

There was something he had to do...

You promised... his mind yelled at him sending a lancing pain through his skull.

“L__Elizabeth.” he rasped the realization, a crystal clarity sharpened images.

People were talking to him. Angry voices, concerned voices.

Panting with exertion, Red fought to open his eyes, to focus.

His body revolted, an unseen force beckoning him deeper into the chasm of darkness surrounding him.

Francis... Dembe... they would take care of her. The thought comforted, calmed.

A profound peace descended.
She would be... fine.

You promised!

A wracking burst of pain filled his senses. He lurched gratefully for the looming void of nothingness which awaited.

A startling white haze engulfed the man. He sank into the silent depths.

He waited.

Images of a sweet, beautiful face swam mockingly about him. He tried to reach out... to touch the wondrous illusion.

He could not lift his arms.

Tears came to his eyes as he repeatedly willed his body to respond but in the end, he had to give up the fight.

The lovely vision floated closer, taunting him.

... So this was hell.

How apropos.

It seemed to take forever, the drive over. Liz kept a running check on the cars behind them.

Nora chatted away, offering motherly advice on how to fix the problem with a man.

Liz listened sporadically, a fixed smile on her face.

It wouldn’t take Silas long to miss her and he would know instinctively where she was going.

She dreaded his anger but her entire focus was on reaching Red. Suddenly the urge seemed paramount.

“My goodness!” Nora was genuinely alarmed. “Is someone shooting?”

Liz laughed the concern away, “Heavens no, Nora. Francis is replacing a part of his roof. I guess,” she glanced at the black wrought iron gates, “sound carries out here.”

Nora relaxed because the noise had momentarily subsided. “Well, should we just drive up?”

“It’s a little walk.” Liz grimaced knowing a firefight when she heard one. “I would like the time to get my thoughts in order, if it’s okay?”

“Well, of course.” Nora smiled. “Should I wait?”

“Oh, no.” Liz forced a smile. “Red will bring me home.”

Nora nodded, “I have my phone if you need me.”

Liz exited the car, grabbing her bag. “Thank you so much for this.”
Nora waved the issue aside, “You stand up to that man... give him both barrels.”

Liz tensed slightly, the off remark hitting too close to home. “I’ll make it right.”

“You do that, now go on,” she motioned, “it’s the right thing to do.”

Liz had her doubts but waved a cheerful farewell, walking up the paved slope of the drive.

Nora waited until the woman entered the unlocked gate and disappeared around the high foliage of bushes which hid the rest of the winding drive.

Liz had held her phone aloft, pretending to dial before she found cover behind those bushes.

She hastily pocketed the object, un-shouldered her pack, extracting her weapon, pocketing extra clips in her light weight jacket.

It would be rough going the last few hundred yards choosing a path up to the main house.

Francis had cleared any and all cover. A sound move for Security’s sake.

Liz could see the house which sat up on a rather high incline, over looking a beautifully manicured lawn to the front and sides. She remembered from her visit here a pool graced the spacious back yard and beyond that tennis courts and what looked to be stables.

As if a city boy like Francis would know one end of a horse from the other.

She wasn’t much better, although Sam used to take her riding on the weekends. She trained for a short period of time and had enjoyed the interval until she had been thrown off. The event scared her. She was still upset with herself for not having got back up on the proverbial horse.

That would not be the case this time.

The house was quiet... too quiet.

The gunfire when she and Nora had approached, had come from within the house.

As she got closer to porch which was obscured by bushes, Liz noted a few bodies laying haphazardly close to the windows or the large oak doors.

Several moaned, some were abnormally quiet, she made a dash, expecting to be felled by a bullet any second.

She had noted the bodies as she passed.

One man had lifted a hand out to her, his face contorted with pain.

She ignored the gesture, moving forward.

The house was abnormally quiet.

The front door cracked. She could see a portion of the tiled foyer, an entry table and a lovely landscape which hung above.

The picture was askew, terribly so.

Liz kicked the bag out of her way, inching closer to the gapped door.
She was instantly assaulted by the stench of burnt gunpowder.

There was a metallic taste of blood in the air.

One sharp crack of a bullet frayed the silence.

She heard indistinctive sounds of rapid movement and Francis’ unmistakable outcry.

It was filled with urgency and anguish.

Liz forgot all else, once again moving forward, her own body reacting to the emotional turmoil of Francis’ voice.

Her first instinct was to call for back up. Her training kicking to the fore.

But this wasn’t business. Francis’ tone had told her as much.

This was personal.

She scanned the gigantic foyer rapidly, her eyes darting to archways and securely shut doors.

Out of nowhere, a man rushed in from her left, running rapidly to a place of concealment... from his point of view.

A Chinese man... an armed Chinese man.

Immediately adjusting her stance for a better shot, Elizabeth did not hesitate.

She trailed the guy as he had run, opening fire when he reached the spot he had sought out.

She rushed to the fallen man, securing his piece in the waist of her jeans, her attention on her surroundings.

Liz arose, alarmed as the gunfire continued but this time it seemed more selective... more focused.

Only one lone shot reverberated about the large Gallery just beyond the foyer.

Suddenly out of nowhere, another large man approached.

He had emerged from the terrace, his direction intent on the Great Room.

She had her weapon trained and steady when their eyes met.

The guy’s weapon was by his side.

She had the advantage... for the moment.

There was a tense, silent battle of wills.

She refused to look away from those stony, cold eyes.

The guy surprised her by slowly lifting his arms out to his side.

He held his firearm by one finger, it dangled in the air...

Her heart pounded with indecision, her palms sweaty. Was this one of Francis’ people?
But... no, this guy was... Chinese.

Something changed in the man’s eyes and she knew.

The gun was rapidly turned about, he was making his move–

Liz pulled the trigger in rapid succession, not hesitating for one second even.

The man’s face froze in a grotesque state of shock, his eyes losing their animosity. He slowly crumpled into a distorted heap, his weapon clacking to the expensive tiled floor.

She dropped low, inching the last few feet, grasping that gun, sliding it beneath a nearby table out of sight.

She hurriedly crawled to the first archway. The gun fire had originated here. She took a deep breath, chancing a peek around the corner of the entryway.

Her eyes skittered across body after body, each laying haphazardly about the elegantly decorated room in various positions and placement.

Francis and Dembe were crouched, huddled around something she could not make out.

Dembe was on the walkie-talkie, his face grave, the dark eyes alert and scanning. He lifted his arm, gun trained before cursing his pique.

Liz had never heard the man speak a profanity.

“Dammit, Elizabeth.” he had lowered the weapon rapidly, pointing it safely away.

Francis turned, jerking his attention, his expression one of disbelief.

Elizabeth read the anguish on the whey-faced features. She scrambled up, running the short space.

The woman pulled up short, her eyes falling downward. The blood drained from her face.

Her entire body grew numb... unresponsive.

She stood, unable to do anything more.

Red lay there, still and unmoving. A hideously ever growing pool of blood billowed out in stark red patterns on the otherwise spotless marble floor.

Dembe wrenched her hard, “Get down!” he growled as a couple shots hit the wall behind their position.

She had impulsively covered Red’s body with hers. She felt Francis’ bulk literally fall over her crouched position.

Dembe took down the imminent threat with a well placed shot.

Liz frantically tried to access the situation, the rapid thoughts, dizzying her.

She fired, getting two shots off. One missed her intended target but hit another.

The man grasped his neck, staggering into the crossfire now taking place.

Bullets riddled his body. He stumbled almost comically, falling face first into a glass coffee table.
Unlike in the movies, the tempered glass did not shatter. The guy lay on the cracked glass, having shoved the decorative bronze globe to the floor.

It broke apart from its base, the globe rolling lazily over to the marble fireplace.

The sound bit at Liz’s nerves which were already stretched taut.

Francis dug at his pants leg, producing his spare firearm. He was wholly concentrated, his face a mask of livid fury.

She cradled Red’s body protectively, her eyes scanning the chalky features with open alarm.

“Red...” she whispered brokenly, “my, God!” she kissed his cold forehead lovingly, “dear, Lord.”

“Red’s gonna kick your ass!” Francis spat venomously, chancing a glance her way. “And if he doesn’t... Dembe will.”

Dembe’s impassive features took in the scene, nothing more.

“He’ll have to stand in line.” she wrapped her jacket up, bundling it gently against Red’s head, her fingers trying to stop the flow of blood to no avail.

He gasped sharply.

“Oh, Red...” she held back her terror and tears, “please stay with me!”

The man coughed slightly and his head exploded.

Squeezing his eyes tightly, he fought the rising nausea and pain.

“Don’t you dare leave m-me!”

That voice...

He knew that sweet voice. As far as hallucinations went, this one wasn’t half bad.

If he was dying, doing so with the sound of the woman’s voice in his ear was as close to heaven as he was ever going to get.

The man fought, struggling valiantly, the white haze dissipating somewhat.

Heavy metal scrapped across the floor as Liz slid the extra Glock she had procured to Francis who had run out of ammunition... finally.

The woman ignored shot after shot which zoomed past the two huddled figures as she worked frantically to stop the loss of blood from Red’s head wound.

Windows shattered, bullets tore into the fabric of chairs and couches.

She was focused on only one thing, there was nothing else.

She glanced about frantically seeking out something, anything which would be of use.

Her clothing was useless. It was too thin to staunch such a flow.

Dembe changed positions, his expert placement clearing an over-growing path in the rapidly dissipating opposition.
Francis limped gingerly forward as his cover fire aided Dembe’s intentions.

Liz glanced at the opened door to the back. A dead man lay in her path. The guy had a head wound too, along with other countless bullet wounds. His blood had long since ceased to flow.

What was in that room? Was there something to help Red?

Liz scrambled to her feet, sliding in Red’s blood as she bolted for the open door.

The gunfire seemed to be receding. Had Dembe and Francis managed to drive the others back?

When would the medical team arrive? Where was Mr. Kaplan?

All these thoughts flooded her consciousness. She threw open drawers, searching for something she wouldn’t find. She was wasting precious time.

The bathroom... her bathroom had all kinds of medical supplies.

She tried to remember the layout of the house but at that moment, so rattled was the woman, she couldn’t even remember the layout of her own home, much less Francis’.

A pair of powerful hands grabbed at her shoulders swiveling her about.

She gasped, stumbling, clutching at a nearby wall.

“You’re his woman!” a menacing growl filled her ears as a looming bulk neared. “He won’t shoot if I have you as a shield,” the hot breath fanned her faced, “will he!”

She was huddled in burly arms, physically forced to move along with the insistent shove of his body.

Liz was hustled down a long corridor, she noted the tight grip the guy held on his weapon that was held close to her face as they moved.

His knuckles were white with exertion.

The guy was scared shitless.

She didn’t give a damn. She had to get back to Red–

She relaxed her body, forcing the instinctual need to fight away for a brief second and sure enough the guys hold lessened just a tad, but... enough.

A shot rang out from nowhere and the guy’s companion – the silent, surly one that had been paving the way, went down.

The large medallion the man wore clanged hollowly on the floor.

The other guy had stopped in his tracks.

Both looked for the source, the one who had deftly put a bullet in the back of their companion’s head.

Red lay on his side, breathing laboriously, eyes ice cold, empty of emotion. His gun sight was focused intently on Cheung’s stricken face.

Cheung swiftly swung Elizabeth about, using her as promised... as a shield.
Elizabeth’s gaze lay gently on Red’s face.

“Let h-her...” Red’s tone brooked no argument, as did the deadly look on his face, “...go.”

“No,” Cheung laughed harshly, “that is not going to happen.”

“Yes,” Liz whispered sacredly, “it is.” Red needed her. He needed this all to end so the medical team could come in.

He needed Mr. Kaplan. She would make everything right again.

The woman lifted herself bodily, kicking off the wall in the narrow hallway. She sent both she and Cheung tumbling back. They careened off the opposite wall before crumbling to the floor in an awkward heap of limbs.

Throwing her arm back, as Silas had taught, her elbow caught soundly with the man’s face full force. She was happy to hear the crunch as she connected squarely with the bridge of his nose.

He cursed loudly, but his hold was broken.

Red Reddington had somehow miraculously raised to his feet. Blood drenched his suit and face, running in rivulets down into the white collar of his shirt. His ankle weapon hung limply in unresponsive fingers.

A deathly quiet intentness was on his face.

Liz was fighting for all she was worth for Cheung had quickly recovered, grasping her waist, pulling her roughly down the dimly lit corridor.

For moment she could only think of Red. She grasped frantically at a convenient doorframe, straining against a superior strength.

“No!” she raged, her eyes constantly on Red’s stumbled advancement.

A vague memory flashed, she allowed her fingertips to release.

Cheung did not expect it and again, she was thrown to the floor as the man struggled to regain his feet under him.

It has to stop! Liz’s inner voice screamed the urgency, Red needs medical attention!

She scrambled on the slick tile, making it to the Gallery.

She was caught by the hair, her eyes briefly connecting with what she needed through the stinging tears.

She grimaced, twisting about as demanded, hands latched unto any part of her person allowed.

She kicked out, her heel landing with accurate precision in the most valuable area a man possessed.

Liz heard the rasped intake of breath. Kicking stoutly with her now freed leg, again connecting between his legs.

The man hunched over, groaning his agony.

Liz crossed the space in record time, her hand reaching beneath the table, her fingers securing the illusive Smith and Wesson she had stashed earlier upon her entry to the house.

She turned back, as Cheung staggered in his approach.

She blindly emptied the clip, several of the shots going wild but one... one hitting a solid mark.

Cheung looked at her, his eyes raging. He raised his hunkered frame slowly.

Liz looked about, searching in vein for any deterrent she could use.

Cheung’s face contorted as he moved forward.

Liz lifted the candle stick, ready for battle. “I’ll beat your fucking brains out!” she was relatively certain of her declaration.

That eventually did not come to pass, unfortunately.

Red fired, placing a bullet in Cheung’s other shoulder, the one Liz had missed.

The man stopped, his face masked... stunned.

Red looked at him for a long moment, silent communication passing between the two combatants.

“Should have,” Red whispered lowly, “let her go.” he fired again, hoping he shot correctly. His vision was doubled.

Cheung fell, nearly missing Liz’s outstretched legs.

Blood trickled from the perfectly placed hole between his eyes.

Red pressed his hand into his throbbing head, collapsing into the nearby wall.

Liz kicked Cheung’s body aside, rushing to a slowly crumbling Red Reddington. She got to his side just in time to cushion his fall.

She struggled with his weight. “I’m here,” she panted from the exertion of the past few minutes, “I’m here, Red.”

The movement jostled Red’s head, shaking his foundation. His brain swam with the motion, magnifying his nausea to uncontrollable levels. He blindly felt for something to grab hold of, something solid to stop the cresting waves of queasiness rolling in his stomach.

The light eyes were clearly trying to focus. “Find... cover.”

“We’re okay,” she hoped as much, “it seems to be out back for now.”

She looked around for cover anyway.

“Find...” the man was sinking fast, “safety!” his head fell heavily against her shoulder.

“Okay...” she agreed hastily, realizing they were indeed, out in the open, “okay, yes. We should.”

How was she going to move him? She was terrified. He was covered in so much blood. His skin was ice cold, he was trembling from head to toe.

It shook her mentally to see him stricken.
Liz was pondering her options as she fervently prayed for guidance and assistance.

Her prayers seemed to go unanswered however.

Two looming shapes filled the arched doorway, Liz twisted having heard their approach.

She shielded Red, moving closer giving the newly arrived gunmen a smaller target.

Their weapons were pointed and for one brief second, time seemed to stand still.

Her own Glock was left by Cheung over by the Gallery table... Red’s gun, she could not reach in time.

She closed her eyes, embracing the man tightly, “It’s okay,” she suddenly realized, “it really is,” she whispered for the man alone, “we’re together.”

She prepared herself for the bullet’s impact, her body tensing slightly. The woman’s lips gently brushed the man’s temple.

Two shots rang out, Liz jumped, her arms tightening about Red’s slumping shoulders.

She felt no pain, no heat... nothing. She swirled her head about, her senses on high alert.

Both assailants lay on the floor, their bodies blocking the entry. She stared at them, unable to assimilate the proceedings as yet.

A mammoth shadow appeared to take the fallen men’s place. This one practically blocked out the sun which showed brightly outside the cool interior of the Gallery.

“I ought to ring that little neck.”

She knew that brusque voice, her eyes desperately trying to adjust as the giant moved closer.

She sat cradling Red, her eyes large and vacant.

“Move the hell aside,” she scrambled out of the way, helping Silas lay the man flat, easing Red’s legs to raised position.

People began to rapidly filter in. Men with stretchers, people in scrubs. Then with breathing machines... supplies.

A woman knelt beside Red inserting a needle into his arm. Another placed an oxygen mask over his face.

Men lifted him effortlessly. Everyone was speaking at once.

It was controlled chaos.

Silas stood aside, his face grim... set. Dembe was suddenly there, walking alongside the stretcher.

He bent, saying something to the unresponsive individual.

Liz realized Red was being taken from her, she bolted forward.

Silas pulled her up short, “Let them do their thing.”

She pushed hard on his grip, “Let me—”
“Elizabeth...”
The woman halted in her antics, seeking out the calm, collected voice.

“I have him.”

“Mr. Kaplan.” Liz breathed her relief, tears coming to the fore.

“Bring her over in a while.” Kaplan directed Silas. “I’ll call you.”

“No!” Liz pulled away, rushing to the woman. “I have to be with him. I have to.”

Kaplan relented, walking away.

Liz turned frantic eyes her guard’s way.

“Get in the damned car.” he snapped but Liz sensed the anger was not entirely for her.

Liz dismissed the sensation, one objective in mind.

Francis stood slumped by the black SUV, a defeated look on his face.

The large vehicle was crowded, not one space available.

Liz craned her neck. “Red! I’m here!” she lifted her voice over the din. “Francis!” she turned stricken eyes, finally noting his wounds. “Jesus, what happened to you?”

Francis waved the question aside, side stepping the woman entirely to return his interest to what was transpiring inside that damned car.

Liz did the same, both waiting despondently. Both were secretly terrified, trying desperately not to let on to the other.

Neither had ever experienced such ... helplessness.

Red Reddington was larger than life. Always so strong. They were the ones who he took care of and guided, not the other way around.

This was wrong. So damned wrong and backwards.

Francis wished more than anything...

He had vacated the SUV to make room for the newly arrived patient but Red had grasped his hand in passing.

“T-Take...” Francis strived to decipher the slurred words over all the noise of the medical personnel, “care of...”

Francis had panicked, getting the jest of the weakly proclaimed request. “Don’t you dare leave her!” he had grated the statement, “Don’t you fucking dare!”

Red was saying his ‘good-byes’ and it shook Francis to his very core.

The ice cold fingers held to Francis’ forearm, “...Prom...”

“I don’t fucking promise.” Francis had shook his head vigorously, the implication of Red’s words, scaring the living shit out of him., “Looks like it’s up to you then, doesn’t it.”
Red smiled weakly.

Francis blinked furiously at the threat of tears, “You bastard! Don’t you put this on me!” his mouth trembled, a rush of emotions suffocating him. “We both know how shallow and useless I am where women are concerned.”

Red’s eyes fluttered open then shut.

Medics had tried to sever the conversation, they needed to work.

“She’s not strong enough yet.” Francis offered one last ditch effort. “She can’t take it... you’re leaving her to the stalker guy. She’s needs you... not me.”

And then Kaplan had kicked his ass out of the vehicle.

“Let me in there!” Liz wanted to be by Red’s side no matter what. “Make a hole!”

Kaplan motioned and miraculously a spot opened up.

Liz slithered through the air tubes and other medical apparatus, her hand instantly gripping Red’s.

Red felt the warmth spread through his body. Lizzy was here. He could sense her presence which calmed his heart.

Silas came alongside Francis, his eyes shrewdly observant.

Francis lifted a haunted gaze. “She’s scared.” he motioned. “Fuck... I’m scared.”

Silas’ blue-green eyes fixated on the distraught man, nodding minutely.

“This is my fault.” Francis stated dismally. “I should have never–”

“Stop right there.” the guard cut the accusations short. “This is no more your fault than last nights fiasco was Red’s.”

Francis took a measure of comfort in the words.

“If I thought it was your fault, I’d fucking tell you.” Silas lay a large hand on the man’s shoulder, returning his interest to the proceedings at hand.

Francis felt better... but he didn’t know why.

“Ray...” the soft whisper washed over the man. Red cursed the white fog.

Stay the hell away from me, he ranted, I’m not ready to go yet!

“I know you can hear me.” Liz felt as much. She leaned close, her face inches from his, her lips brushing his unresponsive ones. “I can’t do this without you.” she pleaded.

Red’s brows furrowed.

“You promised.” Liz wept freely. “You gave me your word and I believed you.” her voice shook. “You go to sleep now and you get better but,” she swallowed hard, “you come to me then, do you hear me?”

Silas took his cue from Kaplan who had motioned at Liz, “We have to let them take care of him now.” gentle hand encompassed her shoulders.

Liz shook free, “He wants me here!” she snapped.

Kaplan shook her head.

Red liked her spunk. He felt a surge of pride.

“We’re in the way.” Silas’ voice was crisp.

“No!” Liz grated. “Just drive. Get him where ever you have to go!”

In his minds eyes, Red was tracing those delicious little lips with his fingers. He was capturing her face in his hands, kissing that pouty mouth.

Gritting his jaw, Silas wrapped his arms about her torso, bodily lifting the woman. In seconds, he had deposited her soundly beside Francis, the guards expression a foreboding one.

The distraught female had fought with all her strength, kicking and screaming her outrage.

But in the end, it was a fruitless struggle. Silas held firm while the medical team took over.

“I’m going to kill you, Silas!” Liz was proving a handful. “With my bare hands!”

Red’s mouth curved into a gentle smile.

_His little spitfire was staying true to the course... good luck there, Silas._

Kaplan frowned hard at the totally unexpected gesture.

The smile still played about the man’s mouth.

“She waits for you.” Dembe too, had seen Red’s response, understanding it perfectly.

“You must hurry back.” he murmured soothingly. “Silas is only one man... how long can he hope to hold out, my friend?”

Red’s smiled softened.

_How long indeed_

Silas’ gruff impatient demeanor settled the woman somewhat. “We’re going with them!” he hastened to explain his actions. “There is no room... Francis needs medical attention.”

Liz stopped struggling instantly, seeking out the younger man who had stood so solemnly still beside her.

She noticed the blood soaked linen of his suit, the way he listed so off kilter.

“Oh, Francis... I’m so sorry!” she was miserable. “Let me help you to the car.”

Francis started to object but Silas’ curt shake of the head warned the man of his folly. Liz needed something to focus on besides Red.

He did not object when Liz took his good arm, offering a shoulder to lean on.

_She waits for you._
Red allowed the mist to wash over him, the sooner he did whatever he had to do, the sooner he could return to her.

Blackness thankfully descended.

May 31

The silence in the car was permeated with a tension so thick, one could cut it with the proverbial knife.

Francis glanced over to his companion. Silas’ jaw line was working prophetically.

The man checked on the woman who sat in the back seat, hunched by the driver’s side door. Liz looked miserable and really quite vulnerable. Her hand clutched the handle in a death grip as if by sheer force of will she could make herself instantly transport to Red Reddington’s side.

Francis knew, the longer Silas kept quiet, the bigger, louder and more dangerous the explosion would be when it happened.

He searched for some logical, safe way to gently lead the giant of a man to an articulate, rational means by which to vent the...

“What the hell were you thinking?” the loud, vicious accusation literally boomed in the still of the car.

Even Francis had started at the decimal level of the explosive impact.

“I was thinking,” Liz had come back instantly, sitting bolt upright in her seat, “that one of you idiots should have listened to me and acted upon the assumption that someone was going to be seriously hurt.”

She pointed to the slowly moving vehicle they followed and had now for some agonizingly slow minutes. “Seems a woman’s intuition isn’t always something to be dismissed so easily, huh!”

“Maybe no one would have gotten hurt if you had kept your sweet ass at home, where you should have kept it!”

“Hey!” Francis took up the fight. “Red’s injury happened before she got there, you can’t lay that on her!”

Silas jerked his head to the man. “You keep the hell out of this.” he grated. “I’m dressing down one of my men... it’s none of your affair.”

Both Liz and Francis’ expressions showed their confusion to the odd statement.

“Red’s injury is bad enough. Your ass could be laying alongside him... how do you think that would fly with him?”

“I hate to remind your sorry ass,” Liz flared incandescently, “I am an F-”

“I know what the hell you profess to be!” Silas snapped right back, cutting the sentence short, “Should I tell you just how much that means to me?”

Liz fell silent, well knowing the man’s views on governmental training methods.
“It means shit!” Silas raged on, his hands tightening on the steering wheel even more so.

“I am more than capable, damn you!” Liz yelled at the man’s averted profile. “Red is going to have to realize the fact... and so are you!”

Francis was confused, “Red’s just trying to protect you, Lizzy. You mean a great deal to him... and us.”

Liz’s frustration grew, “I know that but–”

“Can you really fault us for not wanting anything to happen to you?” Francis reasoned. “Is that so very wrong? This life,” he sighed, “...our work, you should never have been subjected to it.”

Francis worried for the woman. She wasn’t trained to handle what happened today. It was pure luck she had survived.

“Stop coddling her.” Silas gritted.

“He’s not coddling me you gargantuan ape!” Liz took up for her friend, “He’s being kind... maybe you should look that word up since it doesn’t seem to be in your vocabulary.”

“Fuck ‘kind’,” Silas waved an impatient hand, “kind will get you killed.”

“Fuck you!” Liz countered. “News flash, I don’t need Red’s approval... or yours. I will make my own decisions in life and to hell with both of you if you don’t like it!”

“You hesitated!” Silas accused, turning half way in his seat, his eyes flashing at her, “that fucker was playing you.” he had come up at the exact time as Liz’s confrontation with the man in the Gallery. He had seen the hesitation.

“If you mean the guy in the Gallery...” Liz defended her actions, “I thought he might be one of Francis’ men but in the end.... who shot whom?”

Francis was impressed with the grammatically correct phrasing, “You shot someone?”

“And if you were there,” she ignored Francis altogether, “why didn’t you shoot him?” Liz accused.

“I was too fucking far away as yet and would have tagged you, but my eyesight is still perfect.” Silas too ignored the man. “The point being, why did you put yourself in such a predicament to begin with?”

“I don’t have to answer to you.” Liz grated, “I am a grown woman who is perfectly capable of making decisions on my own.”

Liz knew she was being irrational but Silas had put her on the defensive. She once again, for the second time this day, found herself fighting back against superior odds.

The car pulled to a halt, the vehicle in front having paved the way.

Liz opened the car door, her temper high. “Consider yourself,” she hesitated only briefly, her eyes flashing fire, “off the fucking payroll. I will speak to Red... inform him we no longer see eye to eye.”

Francis’ mouth fell agape. He cringed at the power of the slammed door.

The silence was deafening inside the interior of the vehicle. Both men watched Liz hurry to Red’s side, or at least, as close as the medical team would allow.
Francis pulled in a deep cleansing breath. He could feel the coiled tension in his companion’s large frame.

“She didn’t mean that.”

“She meant it.” Silas still gripped the steering wheel but his body relaxed somewhat. “I can’t say that I blame her.”

Francis chanced a quick glance at the stoic profile.

The silence returned but it wasn’t so tense somehow.

“...You don’t know what I felt,” Silas’ voice was so low, Francis had to strain to hear the muttered words, “seeing her wrestling with that fucker, knowing that there was no way Dembe or I could reach her in time.”

“What fucker?” Francis was in the dark.

“Cheung.” Silas replied quietly. “And then there were those other two assholes. Standing there, a breath away from... ending both her and Red.”

Francis’ brow furrowed deeply, “W-What?”

“You should have seen her, Francis,” Silas shifted a glance, “she was beating the hell out of that bastard, fighting like a banshee,” he smiled slowly, “kicking, clawing, punching out... just like I taught her.”

Francis could sense the pride Silas felt, “Then why the hell are you riding her ass so hard if she–”

“Because it could have gone the other way.” Silas reminded quietly.

Francis sat back, drained in more ways than one. The pain of the wounds was filtering through the adrenaline.

“So she depletes the clip in her weapons,” Silas chuckled, “picks up a candlestick and threatens to beat the shit out of the guy.”

Francis smiled listlessly. Yeah, that sounded like the Liz he knew.

The silence returned for a long beat, each man to his own thoughts.

“She shielded Red with her own body.” Silas was still impressed with the gesture.

Francis rubbed his eyes wearily, watching the other guards gather outside the large workshop in which the operating room had been set up.

Men milled about aimlessly.

This was the hard part, after the fight... taking stock of the injured, fighting for the will to regroup...to continue on.

“And then the little shit fires my ass...” the guard chuckled his amusement before turning his attention elsewhere.

“We have to get you some help.” Silas could ponder the ‘what if’s’ of today’s events... later.
“I’m good.” Francis waved the issue aside, “let’s go see how Red—”

“Red is being handled.” Silas waved Dembe over. The man had exited the workshop surveying the area critically.

Silas shoved his weight out of the vehicle, crossing around to the passenger side.

Several men passed, one limping visibly. Silas noted the blood from a stomach wound. Two of his men rushed to the guy’s aide after Silas waved them over.

“Come on, cowboy,” the guard offered a sturdy shoulder. Dembe helped Francis from the car, “you look like you’ve been rode hard and put away wet.”

“Sounds like a good Friday night to me.” Francis fought the wave of dizziness descending, holding listlessly to each man’s support. He pulled up short, gripping their shoulders, “By the way, what the hell does that mean? I’ve always wondered.”

“He has lost a lot of blood.” Dembe pointed out the obvious.

“Can the suit be saved?”

Both men looked at the earnest expression on Francis’ face.

“No.” they answered in unison.

Francis’ face fell.

Minutes later, they were filtering through the injured, seeking medical personnel, which was immediately forthcoming.

Francis watched forlornly as his beloved clothing was shredded in order to tend his wounds as they were revealed to capable hands.

Silas fixated on the larger plastic wrapped area in the center of the structure in which they had taken refuge.

He could make out cloudy figures moving in almost ghost like vagueness, all hunched over a surgical table.

He had been here so many times before in his life, hell... a couple times, Silas himself, had been behind that vague wall of polyethylene.

Red’s medical team gave new meaning to the term, mobile surgical units.

And Kate Kaplan....

The small, slender frame was unmistakable, standing off to one side, so gravely vigilant.

What could one say about such loyalty, such dedication. Grace under pressure.... that was Mr. Kaplan.

And then there was Elizabeth Scott...

Pacing the perimeter, eyes never leaving the hushed going-on’s behind that closed off area.

Silas wanted to go to the woman. To comfort her as Red would want.
He had blown that possibility big time.

“Francis,” Silas felt the weight of his responsibility to Red Reddington, “you have to go make it right with The Hot Head.”

Silas motioned to Liz’s vicinity.

“Oh,” Francis sought out the guard’s meaning. He could read the stress, anxiety and fear on Lizzy’s face from here, “...sure.”

“Not now, you idiot.” Silas put a staying hand on Francis’ shoulder, “after you feel better.”

“I feel all right.” Francis was once again confused.

“No.” Dembe was always the voice of reason. “I will stay with Elizabeth until the doctor,” he motioned to the man attending Raymond’s wounds, “has finished. And then perhaps...”

“I think she needs someone now.” Francis sensed as much.

“I will go.” Dembe exchanged enigmatical looks with Silas. Dembe walked away, his destination clear.

“You have to make this right with her, Silas.” Francis implored. “You were wrong to–”

“No, I was not.” Silas stated bluntly. “And she knows as much, but... yeah, I will make it right, kid. But in my own time.”

Francis wasn’t happy with the words, clearly.

“She needs to focus on Red right now anyway,” Silas motioned to the strangely quiet area behind the plastic, “as we all should.”

There was no argument there. Francis sat back, allowing the poking and prodding. He steadfastly ignored the pain.

All eyes were fixed on the make-shift operational section of the high structure they occupied.

It would be a long night.

Pushing at the fog and pain, Red struggled to make sense of the garbled mess permeating his senses.

His ears felt as though they were stuffed with cotton, his head held below water. Everything was hazy, muffled and jumbled.

Struggling to clear away an obstruction he could not see, he waded through a murky void. It seemed like hours until the muted sounds gradually became more clear. As he broke the surface of the suffocating liquid, he heard Elizabeth’s hushed voice.

Her voice was like a soothing balm, even his pain seemed to lessen. His soul rejoiced for he suddenly realized:

She was okay...

He had vague recollection of an already intense firefight reaching a vicious climax.
He had grown tired of the situation that he and Francis had found themselves in. He had made a reckless unnecessary move.

He had promised Lizzy he would be careful... what had he been thinking? But he had never once thought that Lizzy’s arrival would tip the scales to ending it all.

Even through the confusion and disorientation, one thing was perfectly clear. That bastard, Cheung, had tried to take Lizzy from him.

Though the thought of opening his eyes was not an activity he relished in the least, Red needed to see her. He needed to assure himself that Lizzy was truly in one piece.

He willed his eyes to open but the lids were extremely heavy. Was he medicated?

Why was there so much... pain?

“I don’t know what’s right or wrong anymore.” Liz was saying, “I had to go, Francis. I couldn’t just—”

“Silas is mad at me for getting Nora involved in the whole debacle.” Liz was upset.

Red disliked intensely when she was upset...

“I wasn’t thinking clearly, he’s right.”

“I don’t know if there is a right or wrong to this issue, Lizzy.”

Thank God for Francis. Red heard the shuffle of a sliding chair.

Where was he? It was warm here, warm and pleasant.

It couldn’t be hell at least, although his head felt like any movement would sever it from its rightful resting place, granted.

“When we care about someone, we sometimes react as our hearts dictate.” Francis was continuing, “Only God can say if any decision we make under those circumstances is a good one.”

Red lay perfectly still. He wanted to keep his head. It was a good decision of which God would approve, he was certain.

“Silas has a lot of responsibility on his shoulders,” Francis could see both sides of the issue, that was what made him so good at what he did, “and he has a short fuse.”

Liz hugged herself closer, “How did it all go so wrong?” she felt miserable, “It’s my fault... again!”

Red’s pain spiked. What the hell was going on? He had to get back. He couldn’t stay here.

Haze drifted before his eyes, a grey mist... he had seen this before.

The wheels kick and the winds song
And the white sails shaking
And a grey mist on the seas face
And a grey dawn breaking...

Red’s pain receded a bit.

I must go down to the sea again...

Of course. He remembered now.

He had been at sea. A cold November’s day. How bracing. How invigorating.

What a wonderful day that had been.

The mist thickened and for one blissful moment, Red had welcomed its embrace.

Pain awaited on the horizon of clarity. It was so good to simply... stop the fight.

“It’s not your fault, Liz.” Francis’ voice floated far in the distance, “Silas might have overreacted a bit but it’s only because he gives a shit about you. If you got hurt, what would that do to his relationship with Red?”

“I love you guys for caring, I do!” Liz did, “But, you have to get it, Francis... if I’m going to be a part of Red’s world I have to learn how to navigate inside it.”

“It’s hard for a guy,” Francis could say it so eloquently sometimes, “to step back, it’s ingrained in our make-up. We don’t mean to be Neanderthals, Liz.”

What had gone wrong there? Were Silas and Lizzy at odds?

Red tried to piece the images together.

“I know that.” the soft voice was speaking again.

Red missed that voice.

“I don’t know how to make it right,” Liz sounded so sad, “saying I’m sorry just isn’t going to do it this time, is it.”

“Don’t worry about it.”

“I do worry.” Liz was clearly doing so. “He won’t really leave, will he? He knows I was just... angry... hurt.”

“Silas has a hide like a water buffalo.” Francis dismissed. “If he was going to bail, he would have already split.”

“Maybe I can talk to Dembe, enlist his help?”

“If you want but I think Silas will come around when he thinks the smoke has cleared.” Francis said. “You were pretty pissed, Liz. Give him some time to figure out his next move.”

A small hand closed over Red’s fingers, “I w-wish Red was back. I wish he would just open his eyes. If he was awake... everything would be just fine again.”

Lizzy needed him...

There had been such a poignant trace in the softly whispered request.
The gentle touch electrified him. He urged his fingers to move... close over the small, delicate fingers.

“Francis!” Liz’s voice held excitement, “Francis, come here!”

“What?” Red could hear her movement. He desperately tried to open his eyes. “What’s going on?”

“I felt it—” Liz’s hands gripped his frantically now. “I know I did! Red?”

That delicate, light, evasive fragrance engulfed him... Lizzy’s scent.

He fought harder.

“Red please!” that little voice wavered with emotion, drawing him closer and closer to the surface, “Open your eyes.”

Struggling hard against his body’s demands, Red slit his lids, closing them tightly in the next instant from the sharp, harsh glare.

“Lower the lights, Lizzy.” Francis suggested as he neared.

“Red, are you okay? Can you,” Liz tried to keep the tears at bay, “...hear me?”

“...Lizzy.” the parched, raspy tone croaked out unbidden.

He would kill for a drink of water.

“Thank you, God,” Liz’s whispered gratitude filtered into Red’s being, “... thank you.”

She hugged Red’s body lovingly, careful not to jostle the man. “I’m here.” her voice trembled.

Leaning in, Liz nuzzled the rough shadow of his jaw. She had never been so happy to feel the scruff against her delicate skin. He was warm, breathing... alive.

“Some Ovaltine.” Red mused quietly.

Francis chuckled his relief. “Already quoting old movie lines.” he checked with Liz. “Damned good sign if you ask me.”

Liz’s chuckle was more a gasp of release of all the horror of the last few hours.

Red focused his eyes in the dimmer light, “Is it over?”

“A few hours now.” Francis supplied the necessary info. “Dembe and Silas are cleaning up the mess.”

Red refused to move his head. He had made some sort of deal with God about that... he didn’t want God to renege by not holding up his end of the bargain somehow.

“...Lizzy,” he lifted his fingers cautiously, “are you there?”

“Where else would I be, you idiot?” she hastily wiped at her dampened cheek, catching his fingers instantly.

Forcing his eyes open, he found the darkened strands of her hair and the curvature of her cheekbone in his line of sight. She drew back, smiling down at him.

“...Francis?” he searched out the kid.

“Like a bad penny...”

Red glanced up, finding the man hobbling into view, looking pale but relieved. “I always turn up... sometimes worse for wear,” he granted.

Scanning the area, he frowned when he saw it was only them in the room.

“Everyone is fine, except you.” Liz assured the man. “Now, what do you need,” she repeated, “ice, heat, pills... or all of the above?.”

“...Yes.” Red murmured quietly.

He knew there was more going on in his skull than the migraine, but knew if he lessened that, he’d be able to function. Think more clearly. And having more than enough of them over the years, he had become quite adept at getting the pain down to a bearable level as quickly as possible.

Easing from the bed to keep the shaking to a minimum, Liz set off for the items, glad of something to do finally besides... wait.

Trailing the woman to the door, Red shifted his eyes to the other occupant.

Francis said without preamble, “You scared the living hell out of her.”

“Long as she’s alive.” he said, his voice hoarse. “Casualties?”

“On our side?” Francis quirked a brow. “None, believe it or not. A lot of injuries but all manageable.”

Red breathed his relief. He was so hoping against hope that would be the case. It was too soon after Kevin... especially for Lizzy.

“Cheung on the other hand...” Francis shrugged mentally because it hurt too much to shrug his shoulder.

“...I hope that son-of-a-bitch is already in hell.”

“You blew that fucker away,” Francis confirmed Red’s hazy recollection, “and in spectacular fashion too.” there was a hint of admiration present, “Leave it to you to get a center head shot with double vision, you damned show off.”

Red dismissed the praise, too tired to do much else. “Are you... are they bad?” he motioned to Francis’ bandaged appendages.

“No, just annoying.” Francis flexed his arm, wincing. “Water?”

“Hell yes,” Red was grateful, “mouth feels like I’ve been in the Sahara a week.”

Francis grabbed the bottle, bending the straw, “Don’t move..” he warned.

Sipping the water slowly, Red hoped like hell it stayed down because there was nothing worse than retching when your head was on fire. Keeping perfectly still, he pushed the straw away. Gathering his strength and willpower, he readied himself for what would likely come next.

“Nausea?” Francis asked sagely, watching the other man’s face carefully.

“Uh hmm.” Red closed his eyes fighting the sensation.

Francis got a trash can, waiting. “You owe me a fake fern, by the way.” he informed, then explained further when Red’s brow furrowed with open confusion. “You puked on one at my house.”

“My apologies.” he adjusted himself on the pillow, grimacing, “Don’t remember that part.”

“How convenient.” Francis stated his amusement.

Red’s head pounded relentlessly. He was having trouble focusing his vision.

“Man, I thought you had bought the farm today, Red.” Francis’ concern laced his demeanor. “There was so much blood...”

“Guess it wasn’t my time.” Red remarked off-handedly. “...Too bad for you, hum?”

Francis’ brow furrowed, “What?” he questioned the statement, genuinely caught off-guard by the veiled coldness behind the words. “What the hell does that mea–”

Red rubbed his temples with ever increasing pressure, his thumbs and fingers attempting to drive the hideous pain away by sheer force of will.

“You’d have a clear path,” Red grimaced painfully, “to Elizabeth without me... in the way.”

Francis studied the man diligently, “You had better be delusional.” he grated, “Is that what you think?” he accused bitterly, “Is that what you’ve always thought?”

Red shook his head to clear it, grunting savagely for such an unwise move, “No,” he whispered harshly, “I don’t know why... I said that.”

Red hung his head, his palm bracing his forehead. His flesh was hot... did he have a fever?

What made him say such a thing out loud?

“You’re good for her.”

And I am not.

The thought continued to plague the man. “She risked her life today.... she can’t keep doing that.”

A clarity. Finally. She can’t keep doing that.

“Is that why you continually come up with this ridiculous shit?” Francis stepped closer to the bed. “Are you trying to push her away? Is that the plan?”

“...No.” Red grimaced, lifting his countenance angrily.

“Really?” Francis was skeptical. “What other reason could there be? Just tell her...” it was challenged, “you think she would stay one second where she’s not wanted?”

“I do want her, you son-of-a-bitch!” Red raged. “This isn’t about–”
“Then you tell me what it is about!” Francis snapped.

Both men halted the exchange, both hearing the sharp click of blunt, practical heels coming down the outside corridor.

Francis’ anger was masked instantly but his body was filled with unexpressed animosity.

Red blinked the threat of blackness aside, taking in copious amounts of cleansing air.

Mr. Kaplan had slowed her crisp steps, having entered the room, her shrewd gaze settling on one man then the other.

“Well…” she shifted knowledgeable eyes, “Raymond... you are back among the living, I see.”

“Unfortunately, he’s brain damaged.” Francis stuffed his hands into his pockets turning aside.

Kaplan noted the strident remark.

Red wondered on Lizzy’s absence. What was taking her so long?

Hopefully, Lizzy would keep Kate’s most evil torture to a minimum, since she at least was too happy right now that he wasn’t dead. Not that Kate wasn’t pleased, she just had different ways of showing it.

Red felt a cool swab on his arm, a needle prick and sudden warmth spreading through his body.

“You’ll feel better in a minute.” Kate said brusquely. “Or at the very least, like you won’t toss your cookies.”

“Mr. Kaplan…” Liz scolded happily, breezing back into the room, her mood carefree and optimistic now that Red was awake and functioning, “why are you so mean to him?”

“So maybe he’ll take care and not do something so incredibly stupid again.” Kate took hold of his arm, jostling the man as she took his blood pressure.

Red needed to gauge the extent of his injuries, trying desperately to ignore the fact that gentle jostling had sent wave after wave of nauseating pain throughout his system.

“How bad?” he grated the words.

“... You tell me.” Kaplan’s pinched lips quirked irritably for she was clearly a bit perturbed.

“Oh, God…” Red sighed melodramatically, “not the ‘who is president’ ordeal.” he pleaded. “I’m already close to purging the contents of my stomach.”

“Are you a Republican?” Kate quirked a brow. She had never been quite certain of the man’s affiliations, curious by nature, sometimes to a fault, she realized.

“Why pick the side of a crumbling empire?” Red evaded purposely, if only to irk the small female.

Francis was instantly concerned in spite of his present annoyance with the man.

“Is he talking about Rome?” he directed the question to a bemused Elizabeth Scott. “Ask him what year it is.”

Kaplan rolled her eyes.
Liz scowled, “You ask him.”

“Tell Francis,” Red sighed more than heavily, “I referred to the fact that history repeats itself.” he snapped. “And tell him, I think he’s a twit!”

Liz switched her interest from one man to the other.

Francis gladly returned to his brooding.

“Is there something wrong?” Liz examined both men critically.

Kaplan extracted a stethoscope from her little black bag, “You’re hiding something,” she knew Reddington too well.

“I am not.” the man grumbled.

Kaplan’s keen gaze swept the prone man, “Do you know where you are?” she waved an imperious hand.

“I’m at home.” Red shook his head at the absurdity of such a question.

Liz beamed her pleasure for the remark, that he considered this... home.

“Who’s the twit?” Kaplan probed stalwartly, motioning accordingly.

Red locked eyes with Francis, both men refusing to lose the mood of the day.

“And her?” Kate hooked a thumb to the woman standing beside her.

Red’s eyes softened, “...My Lizzy.”

“Your Lizzy?” Francis goaded purposely, enjoying Red’s flash of icy anger.

“What the hell is going on?” Liz demanded. “Francis are you intentionally trying to upset Red?”

Francis remained moot on the subject, his mood still sullen.

Red bit his lip in an unconscious display of anxiety.

He knew Francis’ given name but for the life of him, he could not remember the guy’s last name... nor could he recall Elizabeth’s, which was even more disturbing.

What the hell....

“What happened to me?” he demanded answers.

“You don’t know?” Kaplan wasn’t going to help him in this instance he sensed.

He closed his eyes, welcoming the blissful silence. If he could just rest a–

Kaplan rattled the pill bottle she had extracted from her bag, “Stay with me.”

Raymond winced, “...Jesus, Kate,” he fought the agony, “a Dominatrix has nothing on you.”

“Flattery will get you nowhere.” the woman administered pain meds through the IV line. “Are you having memory issues? Not to worry if so... I would be shocked if you weren’t.”
Liz gently placed a heat pad beneath the man’s nape and an icepack on his forehead.

Red sighed his relief, “…Yes.” he nodded his gratitude, instantly regretting the action, a grunt escaping his throat.

“How did you get here?” Kaplan needed to gauge a few things herself. She crossed her arms, clearly willing to stay as long as it took to secure answers.

“Cheung.” Reddington snapped. “Leave me alone woman. I want to die in peace.”

Liz’s face allowed her shock and dismay, “Don’t say things like that.”

Kaplan was less affected. “What exactly are you feeling?

“Rising annoyance and severe aggravation!” Red opened his eyes a slit to glare at his executioner.

Kaplan’s features betrayed nothing. She merely… waited.

“My head is imploding, I’m going to throw up on your patent leather shoes–”

“Out of spite?” Kate remarked casually.

Red’s eyes narrowed dangerously.

Liz’s fingers scratched soothingly along his scalp. He relaxed by degrees despite the moment.

“Do you not remember some things, Red?” Liz was more than concerned.

“He hit the floor pretty hard.” Francis felt compelled to inform Kaplan. “…When he fell.”

“A hair’s breath and he would have been at Heaven’s gate… or hells.” Kaplan listened to the man’s breathing for some few moments.

Liz’s blood ran cold, considering the off handed statement.

“You lead a charmed life.” Kaplan raised, folding the instrument absently. “You need food.”

Red’s stomach lurched at the notion.

Francis was instantly by his side, trash can in hand for he had witnessed the instant drain of blood from the man’s quickly greying features.

Red settled his reaction, glaring at Kaplan, “You can be a real bitch when you want.”

She smiled wistfully, “Very kind of you to say… now,” she sought Elizabeth, “where’s that woman that erringly believes she is in charge of this complex?”

“…Nora?” Liz had arisen from Red’s side having taking a chair close to the bed’s edge, “she’s in the kitchen, Mr. Kaplan.”

Kate said not a word, merely grabbed her bag before marching diligently from the room without a backward glance… still a little more than put out with Raymond Reddington clearly, mumbling something about, ‘another new scar on that senseless head’.

“Why is she so mad at you?” Liz was confused.

experiencing, she had given him the good stuff. He floated in a relatively pleasant place right now.

“So, Francis,” there was one last issue with which to contend, “about what I said... earlier,” he would smooth it over. No need to bring unpleasant matters to light at such a time.

Why he had provoked the guy, Red still wasn’t certain.

“Yeah,” Francis nodded sarcastically, stepping to the opposite side of the bed, “let’s clear the air... shall we?”

Liz stepped back, for the man had stepped far too close into her space, her look somewhat comical, “What are yo–”

Francis’ hands latched about her upper arms, hauling her bodily closer.

“Hey!” Liz objected to such rough handling, or handling, at all. Her senses too overloaded to react one way or other, truth told. She sensed Francis’ intent, stunned and disoriented by the fact...

Red’s body tensed, he too, sensing the direction Francis’ anger would take–

Unfortunately, any movement sent waves of sharp reawakened torture spiking in his head, so at the moment, his only recourse was to glare death rays at the individual.

“What th–” Liz pushed on Francis’ advancing chest, incredulously shocked and rattled.

Francis held firm, leaning abruptly, his mouth connecting soundly with Elizabeth’s slightly agape one.

Red felt the nausea rise, closing off his vision to the sickening sight but it was like a bad car wreck...

He could not look away for long.

Elizabeth, at first, stood tense and rigid within the sphere of Francis’ embrace, her fists curled tight into balls of reaction.

Red’s blood boiled as the younger man deliberately ran his palm over the slight bulge of Lizzy’s ass cheek.

The woman gasped, pulling sharply back, her features livid suddenly.

Francis ignored the fact, grasping her head between firm hands, reconnecting his lips to Liz’s mouth as he purposely deepened the already passionate kiss.

Liz shoved hard, severing all physical connection. “Are you fucking insane?!!”

She smacked Francis’ chest hard, shoving him yet again. “Have you lost your mind!” she was relatively sure he had.

She turned stunned eyes Red’s way. “What the fuck!” she sought answers from... somewhere.

“Did you like it, Lizzy?” Francis taunted. “Did you feel anything?”

Liz turned back, hitting the man again, this time... harder. “You crazy bastard! Yeah, I felt something....” she declared to any and all, “I felt like puking in your mouth!”

“Ewww.” Francis grimaced.
Liz spread her hands helplessly, “What the hell is going on inside your minuscule mind!”

“Not my mind.” Francis shrugged nonchalantly, “...his.”

Liz spared Red a glance, “Don’t you bring him into your sick perverted world!” she ranted. “He’s hurt and... and...” she motioned angrily, “and this is how you treat him... treat me? What the hell, Francis.” she was close to tears.

He stepped to confront Red’s steely ice cold stare, “...All your questions answered?”

“If you ever think about doing something like–”

“I didn’t think it.... not once.” Francis seethed, “And that you would think I would...”

Elizabeth’s wide eyes watched the scene with veiled concern.

First Silas and she were at odds. And now... Francis and Red.

What the hell was wrong with this day!

“Stop!” she stepped forward, pleading, “My God! What is happening to our family!”

Red backed off. Francis pulled his attention back to the man. “Stop seeing shit that doesn’t exist!” he warned.

Red seethed in silence.

“Red...” Elizabeth moved haltingly, “you didn’t think...” she felt sick inside.

“...No.” the man lied on impulse... then hesitated, chastising himself. You don’t lie to Lizzy.

“...Maybe.” he muttered.

Liz gasped her dismay, clearly upset by the man’s distrust in her.

Understanding Red’s turmoil, more so, Liz’s distress... Francis came to the rescue. “Look, the guy has a concussion.” he reasoned, “he’s obviously not himself.” he took the fall for the entire incident. “I... overreacted and I totally apologize for being such a jerk.”

It was hard for Francis to lie to the woman, Red could see by the hesitant attitude.

“I’m... I guess... it’s me too.” he motioned to his injuries. “I’m dead on my feet. I’m not,” he shook his head, “...I guess my brain is scrambled too.” he murmured. “I’m exhausted, actually.”

“Francis.” Liz felt terrible. The man had stayed with her the entire time. Even though he had lost so much blood and his injuries were extensive.

“It’s been a rotten day.” Francis conceded. “It’s me, Lizzy.” he smiled wanly, “God, I don’t know what got into me.”

Liz looked from one man to the other, her face falling. “It has been a rotten fucking day!” she wailed.

She started to go to Red for solace, but when her knee indented the bed, the man sucked in a horrendous breath.

Liz hastily froze, easing ever so gingerly away, “I’m so sorry...” her face showed her empathy, “I’m so sorry, baby!”

Red took note of the endearment. He lifted a staying hand. “It’s fine.”

Liz chuckled mirthlessly, “Yeah, I’m sure. Look...” she rolled the tension in her shoulders, “you need to rest.”

“I need you.” he corrected hastily.

She closed her eyes, a wonderful warmth encompassing her body. “I’m not going anywhere. But I want you to sleep now, just for a little bit.”

Red could find no rebuttal to voice.

Francis felt insecure at best, uncertain where he stood with the man, “Well, if I’m not needed, I’ll go home.”

Liz lifted vulnerable eyes.

“What?” Red half smirked, “And miss a prime chance to seduce Nora at dinner tonight?”

Francis hesitated, “I can seduce her some other time... I guess?”

He was offering the man an out, sensing Red was trying to make amends with Liz... not him.

Red opened his eyes, “...You’ll stay for dinner,” he half warned, “and breakfast, as long as you like. Got it.”

Francis ‘got it’. A great sense of relief overtook him. “Well, my angel is making my favorite tonight.”

“You think she’d be making mine.” Red grumbled. “Since I pay her to do so.”

Liz smiled sympathetically at the man.

“Hey, Liz...” Francis was suddenly gravely concerned, “you won’t mention that disturbing event to my precious darling, will you?” he mentioned his earlier behavior. “Women get really defensive about things like that. They just don’t understand th–”

“No, we don’t,” Liz was still mystified, “and no, I won’t. Not to anyone.” she vowed, “Ever!”

Francis breathe easier, “Oh, good.” he was happy again.

“And Francis, if you ever try anything like that again without my express approval...” she smiled sweetly at the man, “I’ll stick your gun up your ass and pull the trigger... repeatedly.”

“Understood.” Francis was still perturbed. “Besides, it was like kissing my sister.” he pulled a face, shuddering visibly. “Well, dinner calls.”

Liz shuddered visibly as well, in total agreement.

Red felt suddenly light hearted.

Of course, it could be the drugs Kaplan had supplied.

“We’ll just put this bizarre episode behind us.” Liz warned superficially. “We’ll chalk it up to male testosterone gone awry.”she included Red in the reprimand. “I don’t know what brought it on but let’s just say... it’s a subject that will never be revisited.”
Red shifted his gaze.

Francis scratched the back of his head aimlessly. “It was his fault, not mine.” he had rebounded enough to feel on more comfortable ground once again.

“But you’re right... enough said on the matter.” he pointed pointedly at the open door. “I’m gone.”

He made a hasty exit, clearly glad to be out of such a sticky situation.

Liz waited a decent interval before turning her attention back to the other occupant of the room.

“I’m not going to grill you right now because I know you feel lousy...” she left the subject open for another time, “but I do want to just say... if you believe for one second that there is anything other than friendship between me and that little twirp... I would be very upset with the lack of trust between us after all that has happened.”

Red stared straight ahead. He deserved the dressing down. Didn’t mean he had to like it though.

“I can only assume something untoward went down between you and Francis in my absence to make him do something so ridiculous.”

“Why, ridiculous?” Red had to question, “he is a perfect match for you... if you think about it.”

“I haven’t thought about it... have you?” she was astounded.

“Only to the extent,” he moved cautiously, “that... I wouldn’t stand in your way if–”

“If what?” she was getting angry.

“If you felt, you might be more content with..” he couldn’t even finish the fucking sentence, feeling less a man for the fact.

“Are you trying to tell me something?” she had remained silent for an inordinate amount of time.

Red had started to sweat, it had taken so long for the woman to reply.

He cut an earnest gaze, “What are you talking about?” he was genuinely puzzled.

“Are you evaluating your options where–” had she pissed him off to such an extent?

He had asked for her to trust his judgement... his ability to take care of himself in any given situation. Had she crossed a line?

“Are you crazy?” he checked the urge to sit up and face her, “what the hell is in your head now?” he could never tell which way her thought patterns would go more often than not.

The woman remained silent, her world slowly shattering into tiny pieces.

She kept her features placid even though inside, she felt like shit.

“Lizzy,” Red sighed heavily, “you have to see it from my point of view, please.” his throat was tight with emotion at the moment. “Where all this goes,” he lifted a vague hand, “it really is all up to you.”

She opened her mouth to speak but he couldn’t take the chance of where the conversation would go.

“Just hear me out.” he swallowed the lump of fear plaguing him. “I am, at present... your lover.” he conceded, or at least he hoped that was still the status-quo, “you’re significant other, if you will. I have no real claim to you... no proper one.”

The woman’s brow furrowed darkly.

“At times...” should he cross this line? Should he lay his cards on the table? “I feel I am at a very precarious stage in our relationship. In that...” he could share this much, “the fact is, you could decide to leave at any given time for any reason you deem acceptable.”

It was true, she could do that even if they had a more permanent agreement. So what was his point?

“I’m very... insecure about some aspects of what we... share.”

The turn in conversation surprised... no, stunned, Elizabeth, “Red...”

He held up a hand, unwilling to meet her eyes as yet.

Red Reddington was insecure? Liz was apprehensive at best. This could not be real... could it?

“The reality is, you are a young, vibrant, beautiful woman who can have her pick of any male out there.”

Well, she didn’t believe that for one second. After all, look what she had picked on the first go round and... why?

Because Tom was the best out of exactly two other men who had shown even a remote interest in her.

Of course, she had decided early on to put her career first. Liz knew she wasn’t unattractive but she was no great beauty either, although Red made her feel beautiful, on most days.

Okay everyday, in actuality.

“Red, I feel that too.” she hastened to inform him. “I feel insecure and out of my depth and at a loss, but...”

He waited patiently now, anxious to hear her out.

“Mr. Kaplan is going to be angry with me.” she knew he should be resting. She glanced haplessly to the opened doorway.

“Fuck, Kaplan.” Red grated. “What were you saying?”

Liz looked at him oddly, “Have you...” she blurted, her curiosity too much to bear in this instance, “...fucked her?”

Red lay his head back, cursing an oath for his stupidity.

“Oh!” the woman commiserated, “God, that had to hurt!” she felt terrible for the man.

“No!” Red grated. “She doesn’t swing that way! And she’s my... friend.” he hissed. “Tell me what you were going to say!”

The light blue eyes beseeched him.

Liz felt bad and embarrassed. “I didn’t mean to...” well, of course she had. Her cheeks flushed yet again, “Silas says he thinks she could be... both.”

Liz bit her lip seeking an out to the awkward subject, “But through it all I also feel... so many other things. Nice things.” she admitted freely. “Amazing things. I guess I was hoping that,” she paused, considering how to save face, “...you would think the good outweighed the bad, because it does for me.”

It was as if Red’s gaze delved into her soul. She wanted to look away from such an intimate examination but found it impossible to do so.

“I know I shouldn’t have...” she stopped. No, she had to take a stand even if it meant there would be a rift between them, “No.” Liz hardened her stance, “No, I’m not going to apologize for caring about you. I’m not going to do that.”

Red’s trepidation melted slowly as he watched the dour little features.

“You promised me you would trust me.” he had to say it or die and right now, that option seemed like it was still on the table, his head pounded relentlessly. He had to know... he had to proceed.

Liz shifted a guilty stare, “Not technically.”

He lifted a scolding glare.

“Well, I didn’t and I won’t in the future.” she stubbornly held her ground. “I want us to be together. I want that very much but if it means walking on eggshells to please you... no, I can’t do that.”

Red weighed his options.

“I will try to make better decisions but...” she shook her head, “I have to be allowed the right to make those decisions or any I see fit to make, Red.”

He wearily closed his eyes, “Elizabeth, did you forget,“ he opened pain filled orbs but it had nothing to do with his head injury, “you could be carrying my child?”

Liz blinked. The man’s gaze dropped to her flat abdomen.

“You put yourself in grave danger, yes, but also...”

“Oh my God.” she gasped the realization. “I did forget!” the fact stunned her. “H-How could I have forgotten such a–”

“Because it isn’t a reality for you as yet.” he knew the answer. “But it is to me.”

“It isn’t a reality at all.” she defended herself. “We don’t know anything... for certain.”

“Which is my point exactly.” he stated quietly.

She fell silent.

Red would give anything he owned to know her thoughts. She appeared so downcast... so unsettled.

“How can I help?” he needed to do so.

Liz touched her stomach protectively, “I don’t know.” It all seemed so very complicated suddenly. So very terrifying.
Did she have a tiny life inside her? One that would be totally dependent on her decisions?

Liz sat heavily in the large chair by the windows.

She pondered the course of actions she had taken this day.

Realization dawned. She could have died and with her death... she would have ended the possibility of a new life coming into this world.

Was that so bad? It wasn’t such a wonderful world... not the parts she had come to know.

Of course it was bad... it was horrible. Beyond horrible... it would have been unconscionable.

She jerked her head to Red Reddington.

His gaze sat gently on her troubled features.

She suddenly understood his almost pathological need to protect something so small and vulnerable... something you cherished above your own life even.

“Oh my God, Red!” she rushed to him, seeking comfort.

Liz lay her head on his chest ever so carefully.

Red’s fingers engulfed her cold ones tightly.

“It’s okay.” he breathed the breath he had unconsciously been holding, his palm cupping her head soothingly. “I’m here.”

“Yes,” she closed her eyes, laying a minute kiss on his chest, the wiry hair found there tickling her lips, “yes, you’re here.

The silence was not uncomfortable any longer, at least not for Red. He stroked her silken strands lovingly.

The medication was strong, he felt himself drifting in and out of consciousness in the quiet room.

He fought the sensation.

“Sleep now.” Liz could feel the tenseness in his frame.

“I’m... fine.”

She smiled softly, the quietness settling in her thoughts.

“Don’t you ever go away from me.” she whispered huskily. “Don’t you ever do that, Red Reddington.”

The man scoffed at such a concept, “Not...gonna happen.”

She lifted slowly, gazing down at the peacefully sleeping man for an inordinate amount of time.

His fingers had loosened on hers but still retained contact. She stared at the strong, thick appendages, her thumb moving lightly over the fine hairs on the back of his hand.

Liz severed the contact, moving to the other side of the bed. She crept into the space beside the man, careful not to jostle or disturb if possible.
She pressed her cheek to his bicep, her hands clutching the muscular area for security.

She watched the steady rise and fall of his breathing, captivated by the light greyish-red of the hair covered skin.

“When I can stand the sound of my own voice...”

She started, unaware he had been with her this entire time.

“I’m going to yell at you...later.”

She grinned, “…I know.” she whispered quietly.

He could hear the smile in her words, “You could at least pretend a little trepidation.” a slight scowl laced his forehead.

Liz’s smile widened, “I’m shaking in my boots.”

“You and Kaplan...” he drew in a long, slow breath, before releasing it, “biggest smartasses I know.”

“I’m deeply honored to be included in such an elite unit.”

Red smiled reluctantly, his fingers trailing lightly over the flat of her stomach.

The man’s breathing evened out. Liz stayed alert and awake, too afraid to close her eyes.

She watched the man sleep, content to feel his warmth, to be by his side.

It was going to be a long night but she didn’t care because in the morning, she knew Red would be better.

He would be here. He hadn’t gone away, in any sense of the word.

The thought settled her Universe. She would wait patiently now. God had answered her prayers.

But... just in case, she would stay alert, she would keep watch because down deep, she knew that is exactly what Red would do were the situations reversed.

Things were better now but not all issues had been addressed. None had actually been resolved.

There was Silas.

She hadn’t seen the man since their confrontation. She suspected he was deliberately staying off her radar.

It hurt to know she had alienated the man. She had no idea how to fix the problem.

And even though the subject of his over-protectiveness and her impulsive recklessness had been broached, Liz had a sinking feeling, it would rear it’s ugly head in the very near future.

She had to make certain there would be no lasting strain between her and Francis over that stupid stunt he pulled.

Liz sighed heavily, willing the hours to pass.

Red slept peacefully, the sound of his steady breathing soothing the woman.
It would all be better tomorrow because as everyone knew...

Tomorrow was another day.

♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥

It was late into the night when the man finally started awake.

Liz, becoming too anxious to sleep, had slipped from the bed after a few hours. It had felt wonderful to lay next to the man, just to revel in his being after the scare he had given her.

But as time passed, nerves jangled. Mr. Kaplan had instructed Liz awake Red periodically throughout the night.

Concussions were nefarious things. One never knew exactly what route they might take.

Liz teetered between attempting to awake Red or allow him to get the much needed rest his injuries called for.

Mr. Kaplan had threatened to kill them both if her instructions were not followed to the letter.

Red had joked, when informed of said threat that, not only could the slight woman carry out such a fact, but cleverly dispose of the bodies after.

Liz had not really seen the humor of the statement.

She was never so glad to hear Red stir.

She crossed, having been staring out at the dark, starry night, from her perch by the window.

“How’s it going?” she smiled softly down as his eyes focused, fixing on her face finally.

“It’s about...” he swallowed, grimacing, his throat hurting, his headache eased but still throbbing somewhat, “...a six now.”

Liz wasn’t following, too intent upon trying to read his body language, “What was ‘it’... before?” she played along, hoping this wasn’t the start of a delusional episode, her worst fears coming to the fore.

“A fifteen.” Red murmured grumpily.

“Oh!” light dawned. She chuckled lowly, “you mean your pain level. I’ll take a six, Red.” she was grateful for the magnitude as a matter of fact. “Six is good.”

“Not from my point of view.”

“Of course not,” she empathized, “of course, it’s horrible, but considering the alternative....” she gently sat on the side of the bed.

He did not flinch as he had done earlier in the day.

“What time is it?” he asked groggily, his hand running over his head absently. He attempted movement and for a brief moment, he thought he was going to loose his stomach.

“It’s too soon.” she had hastily arisen, her hands going out to prevent such an unwise move, but the man shook it off, at length sitting upright.
He lay heavily back on the pillows she had quickly propped. “Well, that was a stupid move on my part.” he decided.

Liz shook her head, “Could have told you that.”

He smiled shortly, “You do what you have to do in life.”

“Well, you do.” she argued. “Mr. Kaplan wants you to eat something. No more pain meds until you do.” she grimaced a supportive smile.

The thought wasn’t as nauseating as he had imagined.

“That woman enjoys torturing me,”

Liz shrugged, “She’s got you this far... let’s not piss her off.”

“God forbid.”

“Nora has concocted some of her world renowned chicken soup.” Liz sweetened the pot.

“The best cure all ever.” Red had to admit. “That actually...sounds good.”

Liz beamed, “I’ll be right back.” she turned flouncing from the room only to halt in her steps to flounce back to the side of the bed.

She grasped the pill bottle from the side table, smiling happily, leaning to plant a hasty kiss to the scowling forehead.

“There are better places to kiss.” his scowl increased.

“When you’re better.” she promised, flouncing away, her steps light and airy.

“When you’re better.” the man mimicked bitterly, his mood a little surly at present.

Liz’s smile widened at the veiled retort, “You’ll feel better after you eat.”

Red sent a dour glare at the now opened doorway. He settled back, his mood dampening with her departure.

“I doubt it.” he grumbled.

But an hour later, that prophecy proved a valid one.

He actually did feel better, his mood much improved, truth told.

“Where’s the clock?” he realized, his brain fog clearing somewhat, that Liz had never responded to his earlier inquiry. “What time is it?”

“Kaplan confiscated them.” Liz glanced at the vacated spots. She consulted her watch. “A little after two.” she reported.

He stopped his spoon mid-stride. “You did eat dinner?” he held up his bowl of steaming soup.

“Nora made sure everyone was fed and happy.” she hedged for in reality she hadn’t felt like eating anything.

Even Francis’ appetite had waned. After Red had awakened, the guy made up for lost time, of “Red, everyone was too wired, too worried after today’s events to react normally.” she explained at his confused expression. “Most of the men are in the dining room playing cards.”

“Worried? Francis said we had no casualties.” he remembered that much. “Has something changed?” he sat the soup aside, his expression having altered drastically.

Liz was flabbergasted, “Red!” she spread her hands out from her sides, “You were shot in the head!”

The man surmised that much.

“Don’t you think we would be a little concerned over the fact?”

“You maybe,” he shrugged, returning to his food, “hopefully anyway. Why would the rest care?”

“I’m beginning to wonder?” she snapped. “Is this how you feel about them... about the men that work under you?”

He considered the question, “I suppose...on some level their safety is a factor, but Lizzy, the men I hire, I do so for a specific purpose. That purpose alone puts any supposed relationship on a precarious basis at best, don’t you think?”

She stared at him, wide-eyed.

“The very nature of the employment they seek puts them at certain risk.”

“That is so... cold.” she was losing ground fast, the very foundation of her belief in the man’s moral ethics shaken.

Silas... Francis, and now...

Red put the soup aside, swinging his legs to the side of the bed. He took a moment to acclimatize and to prepare his next words for he had sensed the woman was upset... more than upset.

“I simply question why such men, men I admire and respect granted,” he waved a hand, “but men who usually have no real loyalty to or great connection with any employer they encounter. It’s the nature of the business.”

“And Dembe?” she asked all too quietly. “Silas?”

“Exceptions to the rule.” Red stated.

“...Kevin?”

Red hesitated, “Kevin was different, he was just a kid.”

“And Joe?” she persisted.

Red was becoming annoyed, “Joe’s been with me a long time.”

Liz studied the man evenly now, more settled, sensing something she had to prove to herself if nothing else, “...Thomas?”

“Thomas is an idiot, someone has to look out for him.” Red snapped his growing disillusionment with the turn of the conversation. “My point is—”
“That you’re lying through your teeth... to yourself.” Liz could finally breathe again, “Each and every one of those men mean something to you, Red Reddington and don’t you dare sit there and act like they don’t.”

“Business is business.” he grumbled, glancing aimlessly about for his cigars. “Where’s my cigar?” he was getting irritable.

When the man was agitated, or extremely mellow, very infrequently granted now that Lizzy was about, but at times, he would light up a smoke.

“Kaplan—”

“ Took them!” he lifted pissed eyes. “That woman has gone too far. Get her scrawny ass in here! I want to have a little talk with—”

“What about the baby?” Liz asked innocently. “Isn’t second hand smoke bad for it? I mean,” she glanced at her stomach, “are you going to smoke afterwards?” those blue eyes lifted almost accusingly.

Red settled instantly, “...Of course not, I won’t.”

“Then why are you upset with Kaplan?”

Red threw her a scolding glare, “It’s not really Kaplan I’m upset with and I think you know that.”

Liz rolled her eyes, “Stop treating me as if I were a fragile China doll.” She didn’t want to get into this but... “I’m not, as you, of all people... should realize.”

She referenced to her status as a fully established agent of the Federal Government.

“I made a calculated decision today... true, I had a momentary lapse regarding...” she wouldn’t get into her possible health issues, “had I remembered, I would have reacted differently, I’m sure but—”

“Would you have, Elizabeth?” he clearly doubted her veracity, “look,” he tried again, “this is my job, it is what I do. Shit happens and it’s not always pleasant. Hell, it’s almost never pleasant.”

Liz drew in a cleansing breath.

“It’s hard enough that you put yourself in harms way for the Agency. I apparently have no say in that matter.”

She lifted a defiant chin, “No, you do not.”

He fell silent for a long beat.

“You blithely dismissed my feelings this morning,” she accused, “I care about what happens to you, Red. And it’s not like I interfere each and every time you walk out that door;” she pointed out, “I know what you do, I even accept it to a point—”

“No, it can’t be to ‘a point’.” he cautioned, “Just as I step back when Cooper gives you and Ressler an assignment, even though my instincts are screaming at me to prevent you going somehow, I check those impulses... don’t I?”

The woman had not looked at it in such a light.

Silence came and it was anything but comfortable.
“Do you have any idea what Cheung’s stock and trade is?” Red was remembering the incident in the hallway, “He buys and sells women... you can guess for what purpose?”

Liz was a big girl, she didn’t shock so easily but she was suddenly remembering a day... night... where the team had acted on a tip which led to the discovery of a small back room in some dingy part of the Garment District in NYC.

That room was teeming with young girls, most no more than thirteen or fifteen.

Their faces still haunted her at night sometimes.

“What if Silas hadn’t arrive on time? What if I truly had been incapacitated to the point, I could not have reached you in time?”

Liz felt her defenses rising, “You know, I was giving a pretty good account of myself, there was no way that bastard would have gotten me out of that house?”

“Like Carver wouldn’t have finished his task had he not been interrupted?”

Liz’s eyes misted, “That is... so unfair. I’m better trained now. Silas has—”

“You are a hundred pound woman,” Red sighed wearily, “no training in the world would have stopped a fucker like Carver because... he doesn’t play by civilized rules, Elizabeth and neither do men like Cheung!”

Red’s head was beginning to ache again, the tension in his muscles not aiding the fact. He knew he should be resting his body.

“Would you be speaking to Samar like this?” she placed both hands on her hips, her temper flaring.

“Samar comes from a different part of the world. She has seen and done things you could only have nightmares about.”

“So you think that makes her a better agent than me.”

“Of course I do,” he was dumbfounded, “which is not to say, you can’t learn... but you are not at such a stage as yet, Elizabeth.”

The woman stared moodily off, refusing to meet his eyes, “This is unacceptable,” she gritted, “you are no better than Tom Keen in my book.”

The blue eyes shifted coldly to his, “At least he was openly honest about what he thought of me and my so called abilities... after he shed his snake skin, that is.”

She was hurting. She hadn’t realized how badly she had needed Red’s approval until this moment which made her feel weak and ineffectual.

“I can’t believe I’ve been this stupid... again!” she voiced tightly.

“You’re being stupid, yes,” he concurred angrily, “if you would just listen to me, I—”

“I’m done listening... to any man... ever again.” she reacted.

The woman turned on her heel, one destination in mind and that was... out the damn front door.

She may even ask Tom for a ride... since she was so stupid.
Her footsteps were brought to an abrupt halt as a massive hand shut the door facing soundly.

She gasped her shock, pulling up short suddenly confronted with a very put out Red Reddington.

The light eyes blazed his anger down at her, “I’ve always expected to die doing this shit, it’s a given. No fucking way will you end up the same cesspool.” his tone was tight with fury.

Every part of the man’s body ached, his head was exploding inside, his muscles were bunched into coiled efficiency and his mood... had been better.

“Where the hell do you think you’re going?” he demanded an answer.

“Away...” Liz was only too happy to supply one, “from you!”

He nodded knowingly, his expression bleak, “I don’t care if I have to order Silas tie you to a damned chair,” he threatened smoothly, he was wholeheartedly willing to do so, “you will stay here and listen to reason.”

“I’ll stay because that’s all you Neanderthals understand,” she used Francis’ term for his species, “brute force but it doesn’t mean I have to listen... does it.”

Red leaned heavily against the door facing. He was cold, his bare feet on the cool floor. The satin of the pajamas he wore not enough protection in his weakened state.

Liz noted the white features, the tired lines about his eyes and almost weakened her stance for a beat.

“Elizabeth....” the man closed his eyes, misery flooding his entire being, “I fucking hate being at odds with you.” he grated his weakness.

She hesitated, “You can’t just dictate my actions,” she couldn’t live like that, “you just... can’t!”

“Carver is out there...” he reminded listlessly, “...Tom.”

Liz’s head fell. She studied his bare feet for a goodly spell, pondering her options. As she saw it... there were few things to ponder. “I’ll just have to take my chances because I can’t live under a double standard. I won’t.”

She lifted a steady gaze, “Can I go now.” she indicated her blocked path.

“You’re not fucking going.” Red declared venomously.

She folded her arms, “Say what you have to say. I’m tired. I need to,” she closed her eyes to the sudden weariness that descended, “...rest.”

Red felt his world slipping away. Had he over reacted? Were his fears invalid ones?

He looked down at the flushed, angry features. Her stance so intractable, so solidly set...

“It’s not safe out there...” he had options as well, “you stay, I will go.”

“No!” she vetoed the offer coldly, “I want to go home.”

The words cut him like a knife, “This is your home.”

“No,” she realized, all had changed. In a matter of minutes, all was different... alien, “I’ll find...something. I want to go.”
The man was at a loss. For once in his life he was confronting a situation he could not contrive, manipulate, or control.

“I shouldn’t have started this.” he realized his mistake too late. He attributed his faulty judgement to his injuries. What else could it be? “We can talk about it in the–”

“There is nothing to talk about.” she stated flatly with such a finality, it stunned the man.

He hesitated. He may be down but he wasn’t out... just yet.

“Elizabeth, we have to find a mutual understanding here.” he would use logic and reason. “Different beliefs... opinions if you will, are a natural part of any relationship. We are going to have disagreements but...” he felt himself losing ground for she had folded her arms, closing herself off completely.

“We have to find a way to discuss any subject without losing sight of whatever it is that brought us together in the first place.” he spread his hands out in an appeasing manner, “Don’t you agree?”

“I don’t know.” she ranted the truth, “I don’t know... anything anymore. I just want it to stop.”

Red was not privy to all she had experienced this day. He thought perhaps, he should find out that information, with the utmost haste.

“What is it?” he urged, “Can you tell me what has upset you so deeply today... I think it’s more than...” he motioned.

She glanced at the man, “I’m tired, Red.” she snapped, “I want some peace and quiet! I don’t want to–”

“All right...” he lifted his hands, “all right, we’ll do that, then. All this can wait. It will keep, are we in agreement in that at least?”

She hesitated. Did she really want to leave? Did she truly want to leave him when he was so hurt? Her heart went out to the man for he had faulted visibly, catching himself on the door behind him to cover the fact.

“Red!” she scrambled to his side only to be held at bay.

“I’m fine.” it was dismissed almost curtly, “I’m good. What I was saying–”

“It doesn’t matter,” she was just as curt, “I want you to get back in bed...do you need help?”

Red fluctuated. Her attitude had altered slightly, which was a good thing but he didn’t want his condition to be the reason she...

“I can help.” she offered a shoulder, “will you at least sit on the bed?”

He relented, in reality so pleased... so grateful to have diverted her from the other topic.

The man looked at the structure, “I’m okay but...” the slender shoulder was moved close and he did not hesitate when the petite form slid closer offering him stability.

The warmth of her body seeped into his cold side. It felt wonderful. A tiny hand wrapped securely about his middle, the other resting tentatively on his abdomen as she matched her steps to his faltering ones.
“Should I call, Dembe?” she searched the chiseled profile plaintively, having felt a definite tremor run through his powerful frame.

He shook his head, sitting his weight on the side of the bed. He was astounded when she sat as well, hovering close.

“Is there anything I can get you? Anything you need?”

“I need,” he suddenly realized, turning a somber look her way, “you, baby.” he swallowed hard, “and that’s all I ever will need.”

She misted, her arms lifting about his neckline as she moved ever so close to his bulk, her embrace tightly clutching his stability.

The room was so still. She could feel his heart beat, strong and steady under the palm of her hand.

His scent surrounded her. What a fucking idiot she had been. It was as clear as a bell in her head now... this is where she wanted to be.

No matter the differences between them, no matter the obstacles they would have to face...

Where ever this man was... is where she would always want to be.

“Oh Red, I’m so sorry.” she sniffled softly, swiping at the threatening tears, “I shouldn’t have said... any of those things I did!” she moved enough to catch his soulful eyes.

“No,” he stated quietly, “you shouldn’t have.” he moved a strand from her cheek then smiled warmly, “but I understand why you did...” he admitted quietly, his eyes mellowing, “You damned near finished the job Cheung started.”

“Don’t!” she clutched him tightly, “Don’t say things like that, even in jest.” she lay her head on his shoulder, closing her eyes, appreciating his presence.

The brown highlights of her hair caught his attention. She was such a beautiful woman. The last thing he had wanted to do was alienate her.

He remembered the lovely hue of her cheeks, all rosy and flushed with the passion of the moment. Those blue eyes flashing their animosity up at him.

He loved the feel of her flesh...

He could feel the plump bulge of her breast pressed into his shoulder.

What he wouldn’t give to reach over and touch that sweet, delicious mound. He staunchly resisted the urge knowing she would not welcome the move on his part at this time but his fingers itched to follow through on his imaginings.

At least she wasn’t thinking about leaving him at this moment in time. He had pulled his ass out of the fire.

It had seemed so important though... he had almost lost her today, twice now.

Once due to her recklessness and unforgivably, once to his own.

How bleak, how unbearable his life would have been...

There was a lull.

A wondrous lull.

He had been given a second chance. One he would never take for granted again. One he would cherish. And one he would fight til his last breath to retain.

“I love you.”

Red Reddington jerked, a spike of pain shooting through his head.

Elizabeth gasped audibly, instantly concerned.

“Oh, God, I shouldn’t have... said that.” she was contrite. “Should I ...have said that? No... of course not!”

Red stared at her, mouth agape... his senses fucking reeling.

Elizabeth flushed scarlet, “It’s way too soon... isn’t it.” the incriminations were sitting in, she couldn’t read his reaction for his face was a mask of incredulous disbelief. “What I meant to say...” she lost all coherent thought for one horrible beat.

Jesus! What an incredibly stupid, stupid... stupid–

“What...” Red had found his voice, even though it was raspy, harsh and coarse, so unlike his normal silken tone. Even he hardly recognized it, “W-What?”

He pressed his temples to alleviate the incessant pulsing caused by his rapid heartbeat, “... Elizabeth?”

“I know,” she held up a staying hand, “I realize I shouldn’t have–”

He leaned, his palms cupping her face, his lips parted hers gently, almost reverently...

The warm hollow of his mouth drew her into the sensual depths. She allowed his lead, even when he lay her back into the rumpled covers of the bed.

Red lifted his mouth reluctantly, his gaze locking with her. “... Repeat,” he whispered ardently, “what it was...” the steady gaze robbed her of any coherent thought, “you just said... to me.”

She licked those luscious lips anxiously, the blue eyes trying desperately to look from that fervent stare.

“Well I...”

Red’s gaze dropped to her mouth, remaining fixed.

“Don’t tell me I imagined it all, Lizzy.” his index finger traced a searchingly slow path. The thick appendage traveled about the shell-like ear.

Red intently settled his body more comfortably alongside her now outstretched form, his bulk pressed intimately close.

“That this incredible declaration wasn’t all a hallucination...” he lifted a sultry stare, “I’m going to discount that theory.”

Lizzy felt the hard evidence of a very vivid arousal pressing to her thigh.

She struggled, words failing her, his gaze robbing her of any sane, reasonable response.

“I’ve been in love with you,” he cut her protestation short, his voice lowering to a steamy caress, “since before that first date.

It was Liz’s turn to stare mutely, mouth agape.

“I’ve been falling ‘in love’ with you,” it was so freeing to finally be able to express his emotions, “ever single day since...”

She stared at the man’s mouth as it formed the words, captivated beyond scope, “You... you can’t mean that.”

“With every fiber of my being.” he stated simplistically, his lips following the exact same path over the sensitive ear his finger had.

Her mouth trembled slightly, a rush of emotions blanketing her. She couldn’t decide whether to laugh or cry. A part of her felt like squealing with the pure joy his words instilled.

But disbelief held the emotional onslaught at bay.

A shiver ran the length of her body, gooseflesh rising on her arms, the ones his palms now traveled seductively.

“You d-don’t have to say that,” she reminded herself more than the man, hoping against hope he would ignore such advice completely, “just because–”

He lifted a perceptive brow, “You did?”

The flush returned two-fold. Liz shifted about restlessly, “Well I... I... after today...”

The man’s attitude changed. He stiffened slightly, “Elizabeth,” his gaze pinned her under its stern scrutiny, “did you say what you did because... I got shot?”

It was a clear accusation and his hands had halted their excruciatingly pleasurable pastime.

“No!” she hastened breathlessly. “Well of course I was... terrified that you,” she refused to think on that subject, “I mean... before.

He scowled darkly, his body tense, rigid with control, “Before... what?”

“After you left... all the horrible things that went through my head,” she shuddered, “I had to face the realization that...” she shook her head fiercely, dismissing the disturbing thoughts, “I need more time with you! God would not be so cruel to... give you to me then...” she swallowed the lump in her throat, “I felt so... bereft. So lost, Red.” she lifted haunted eyes.
The man read the sincerity. He blew out a tremulous breath, his body visibly uncoiling.

“I didn’t really want to leave you tonight.” she blurted, “I was just so...”

“Pissed.” he grinned slowly, “You were that.” he seemed impressed by the fact. “Turned me the hell on.”

She could feel the evidence returning even as he spoke. She glanced down, the long thick imprint of his hardness once again showing against the rich satin of his pajamas. The rigid line of his stiffening erection clearly visible.

Red had shifted strategically just so she could feel his... sincerity.

His eyes roamed her body slowly, resting on inappropriate places for inordinately inappropriate intervals.

“Say it again.” he prompted, his thigh nudging hers wider, his knee sliding smoothly into the heated valley.

She knew her wetness stained the thin material of his pajama bottoms.

Liz lay perfectly still as his forefinger traced the curve of her upper lip, his eyes contentedly following his movements.

“Put some feeling into it,” his mesmerizing eyes lifted, “make me believe...” he leaned ever so close, his breath fanning her face, traced with mint tea, “...you.”

She licked the dryness from those desirable lips, the enormous violet orbs watching his every move.

“...I love you,” she whispered emphatically, “so very... very much.”

His hardness grew, a painful throbbing replacing the previous once... in an entirely different area of his body.

He nodded slowly, “Very good, Elizabeth.” his approval washed over her, making her nipples harden with... anticipation.

Red fixed his stare on the pert little nubs, his tone lowering huskily, “Very good.”

He bit his bottom lip in a conscious display of indecision, “Do you know...” he wondered at the beguiling innocence staring back at him, “have you any idea...” the small fingers clutched at the lapels of his top in something akin to desperation, “just how badly I want to fuck you right now?”

Elizabeth drew in a shallow, shaky breath. Her body reacting to the erotic stimuli, she closed her eyes to... savor his passionate desire.

“Not... make love to you, Elizabeth,” he wanted that perfectly understood. He lay more of his weight against her lower body, his rigidness shoving hard into her vulnerable flesh.

“Fuck you...” he literally breathed the words, his mouth directly above her parted, trembling one, “that’s what I need to do. That’s what my cock is... demanding, I do.”

She moaned weakly, spreading her legs wider without any forethought or hesitation on her part.

“How do you feel about that?” he asked rhetorically.
“Y-Your... head.” she tried for some semblance of self-restraint. His injuries too extensive for such strenuous activities, surely.

“My head...” his tongue traced a searing path over her bottom lip, “is stocked full of deliciously warm cream just... begging me to...” his mouth parted and he breathed, his hot breath washing over her lips.

Liz lifted eagerly, but he refused any real contact as yet.

“...Share with you.”

She locked her leg over the thick burliness of his outer thigh holding him from any extraction he might decide upon, her arms lifting, winding lovingly about the man’s neckline.

“You have pleased me so intensely, my... love.” it felt so amazing to have the freedom to use that word... finally, “I want desperately to please you in return in every conceivable fashion,” he pinched her nipple teasingly, enjoying the slight tremor of desire the effect produced, “given my rather...extensive repertoire.”

“You can’t d-do that.” she tried to convince herself more than the man at this point. Kaplan would really kill her if the woman found out Liz had allowed Red to–

“Of course I can, baby.” Red soothed seductively, “my memory is fully intact, among other vital organs. I haven’t forgotten one single thing. I know exactly what you like.”

“No, I meant–” was he purposely misunderstanding?

“Spread your legs for me.” he coaxed silkily, “I require more room than that, as I trust you remember.”

He had glanced down to where their bodies intermingled.

Liz fought the urge to obey his every whim, “You just got out of a sick bed a–”

“And now, we are back in... bed.” he glanced about their position. “Not that a couch, chair... or desk for that matter, wouldn’t suit me just as well.” he shrugged stocky shoulders, “Name the place, sweetheart. You know how flexible I can–”

Francis burst through the open door, intently leafing through page after page of stapled readouts, “Red you will never guess what that bastard, Cheung, has been up to–” he glanced up, stopping dead in his tracks.

Liz wished the floor would open up and swallow her whole. She fought her flush of mortification for being caught in such a compromising situation,

Red merely sighed heavily, easing his body into neutral gear. It was a Herculean task in this instance.

“Whoa...” Francis grimaced apologetically, “Hey, who knew?” he defended himself after a moment, realizing his faux pas, “You took a head shot!” he lifted a plaintive hand, “Pardon the hell out of me for thinking you were probably down for the count.”

Red shifted a regally cool gaze, “Not to worry, Francis,” he allowed the woman to scramble up, resigned to his fate, “we were just discussing the weather.”

“Yeah...” the man took in Lizzy’s disheveled state, “Hot and sultry with a chance of tropical humidity in the wee hours of the night.” he shook his head woefully, a disgruntled look for Elizabeth Scott, “Why don’t you give the guy a breather... a little downtime wouldn’t kill you, you know.”

Liz’s mouth gaped indignantly, “Me?!”

“Oh, like a guy who took a bullet to the head would initiate that rather torrid display?” Francis was a little incensed for his friend. “Come on, woman. I wasn’t born yesterday.”

“But you may die tonight!” Liz hissed.

Francis exited, clearly disillusioned, not to mention, definitely perturbed, “You’re lucky I’m not a judgmental sort of guy. That’s all I’m saying on the matter.”

Liz looked to Red for assistance, her hands spread wide, “Do you believe that?”

The man shook his head minutely, his expression a clear one, “Some people.” he commiserated, his eyes sweeping her frame boldly, “Now... where were we?”

“Oh yeah, right!” Liz snapped, “You just stay right where you are, Mister.” she motioned accordingly, “Finish your soup! I’m going to set that freak of nature straight, that’s what I’m gonna do!”

She turned on her heels, features set. She places to go.

“Elizabeth...”

The woman turned expectantly, her hand on the knob.

His eyes were saying so much more than she wanted to read at such a delicate moment.

“I love you.” the husky declaration thrilled her down to her toes.

Her eyes softened, as did her stance. The woman’s heart melted, an extraordinary affection for the man overtaking her.

“Well I... I love you too.” the words were easier to say suddenly with him looking at her like that, “But you have to get some rest now.”

His color still wasn’t to her liking, “Promise.”

“You’re not coming back?”

“Not until you are asleep,” she scolded primly, “and I mean that now!”

Red raked her lasciviously, “A pity.”

She smiled just for him, blowing him a kiss before shutting the door gently.

Once outside she leaned against the facing for support, trying to calm her still erratic heart beat. A secretive smile worked it’s way to her lips, her eyes gentle.

Red loved her...

She felt a well of emotion bubble inside her. She was experiencing a maelstrom of emotions. Tranquility, serenity, elation... and unadulterated exhilaration.
Granted, there was also nervousness, apprehension...a little piece of her questioning how much he loved her... who could blame her?

She frowned, willing to erase old habits... old insecurities.

She could search the depth of Red’s emotional attachment... later. For now, she was content with the sentiment being expressed, openly, on both parts.

Time... they had time to explore this. To let it flourish. To become fulfilling in ways they maybe both required.

It was with renewed vigor, she shoved herself erect, “Why don’t you give the guy a little downtime...” she mimicked disdainfully, “I’ll show you downtime, you little shit.” she was off in search of her victim.

Red lay quietly keying his body down. He could still feel the heated imprint of that succulent alcove he had settled in.

So close... he had been so fucking close.

He lay for a time thinking up inventive ways to end Francis’ youthful existence.

Lizzy still had her doubts, he could sense the turmoil inside her.

He was up to the challenge.

After what she had declared tonight. He could face down anything thrown at him.

He had not felt that when he had faced her earlier tonight.

He was persistent if nothing else though and anew determination flowed inside him.

_Lizzy loved him..._

It hadn’t happened as he would have planned, in a romantic setting... candlelight, wine...

He was adapting to their way of doing things. Unpredictable suited them.

He personally found the off script by-play exhilarating as hell, even the fear she had instilled in him had been cutting edge.

He thought back over the milestones in their relationship.

How very different his life with Lizzy was from anything he had ever experienced....

His first wife and he had gone the straight and narrow route, living up to societies expectations.

How very status quo it had all been.

Looking back, the man felt as if he had walked through the entire ordeal.

Had it been an ordeal?

Sex on the sixth date... if you could call it sex. She had allowed him to penetrate her. Why did he have the distinct impression it was all a carefully orchestrated plan on her part?

Was he being unkind?
The weekend trip to Connecticut... it’s what couples did. They exchanged keys just a month later.

He had thought that a mistake just a few days later. Water under the proverbial bridge.

Moving in together, the prolonged engagement as her family insisted and he secretly agreed with... then the marriage.

The topic of children was only discussed some time later, coinciding with his bride’s insistence they have unprotected sex for the first time.

Should have alerted him... bells should have gone off... but they didn’t.

Was he ever so naïve?

Then came Lizzy.

They had lived together before deciding to try a genuine relationship, had sex on their first date, the weekend trip followed immediately, where upon they had returned to a very exhilarating time with languid lovenaking sessions and in less than a month, he was riding bareback into an ever increasing sexual euphoria.

They may even have a little one in the works...

The thought filled him with such an odd sense of peace and subdued excitement over what might be on the unforeseen horizon.

Red drifted off, unaware of doing so, his mind shutting down to the wondrous possibilities which awaited him upon his awakening.

Chapter End Notes

I knew I was forgetting to do something before I posted and it was naming the poem that Red is thinking about. It is:

Sea Fever by John Masefield

I just wanted to make sure that the correct person received his just dues for such a wonderful piece of work.
SUNDAY June 1

Liz made her way down the winding path of sculptured stones. She loved this part of the property.

Farther down, the path curved about to a rather large pond complete with a small dock and fishing shack.

Red had said the pond was stocked with a variety of fish. The former owner was an avid fisherman.

Two boats remained docked and ready for use by any interested takers. She and Red had spent several evenings out on the small lake watching sunsets.

While the Main house and Guards quarters she and the guards inhabited now were being constructed, the owners remained in the original homestead.

She shook her head as the sprawling five bedroom Tudor style structure came into view, remembering when Red had taken her on a tour of the grounds and told her that it had been listed as the Guest Cottage.

She didn’t think she would ever understand how the ‘other half’ lived... but she did have to admit, she did enjoy the peak inside their world.

The house and property were picturesque. The house itself sat back into an array of lilac bushes and a rich profusion of soft green fern. Spots of ivy climbing the stone walls, lush landscaping and early blooming flowers bordering the inlaid stone pathway and large trees looming overhead in the background gave the area a storybook feel.

Perhaps she should look into furnishing it with a few essentials... give her and Red a home away from home for a little privacy, she thought wryly back to the previous evening.

The pungent scent of lilac and honeysuckle filled the early morning air as the woman wandered her way to the inviting front door of the house.

The large oak panels seemed a little off putting today.

Sitting on the stoop, Liz unwrapped the croissant Nora had shoved in her hand before she had set off on her walk, most likely having seen that Liz had hardly touched anything on her plate.

But after last night and being surrounded by the boisterous men that regained their lacking appetites, gathered for the first round of the meal Nora managed... she just couldn’t find it in herself to enjoy the bountiful treat.

Breaking off a piece of the fluffy pastry, Liz popped the morsel in her mouth, chewing thoughtfully.

How the petite woman fed all the people under her care, Liz would never figure out. It seemed an insurmountable task to her way of thinking.

Though Nora still had the chief responsibility of planning the meals plus the actual art of preparing them, Red had supplied the woman with sous-chef’s to aid in prep and the like to ease the burden after a new surge of guards had taken residence.

One particular guard was absent during the breakfast rush, much to her disappointment.

Liz had arisen early hoping to catch Silas this morning.

She had not spoken to, nor seen the man since their last unfortunate encounter.

Letting the rift between them drag on was weighing on her nerves, let alone, conscience.

Dembe had taken off for the airport, Francis informed her... something about, with Red out of commission, Dembe had to take up the slack.

The man had taken the private jet today for a meeting with a prominent associate in the south of France... wine country.

Dembe loved wine and was a frequent visitor to such establishments throughout the European countries which produced the delicate refreshment.

Meaning he would not be returning anytime soon.

With her buffer on a wine tasting excursion, it left Liz to her own devices as to how exactly she should approach Silas.

Francis’ only advice was... cautiously.

Liz wasn’t sure if he referred to Silas’ present mood or the fact that it was advisable to never take the large man by surprise.

Silas never reacted well to... surprises.

Finishing the flaky pastry, she pushed herself up from the stoop, resigned to her fate before walking back towards the main grounds.

She walked quietly, debating her options, staring morosely at the huge double entry doors to the Guards quarters as she neared.

She started when Joe opened the panels unexpectedly.

He grinned at the reaction, “Saw you coming down the hill.” he gestured, radio in hand.

“Saw?” she questioned, before gesturing to the comm in his hand, “Or were informed?”

The large man waved her into the opened concept rooms, grinning, “Both.”

Liz returned his smile, glancing furtively about. She had never been inside the house before.

Off to the right of the foyer, the formal dining room sat with its long oak table and chairs to hold all the guards beefy frames. A Mediterranean style bureau graced the far wall. Large windows at the far end of the room let in an abundance of light.

Joe directed her into the living space, but she waved off the offer to sit on the very large and plush wrap-around-couch that seemed to stretch the length of the room.

David, her evening guard sat at the far end, reading a book. He glanced up, inclining his head in greeting before returning to his pastime.
Following Joe further into the spacious home, she realized Red had obviously went to great lengths to see to their comfort and even amusement.

As they approached what she assumed was to be a family room and a private sitting room, she instead found the large areas had been turned into a home gyms. One complete with weight lifting paraphernalia. The other with treadmills, elliptical machines, bikes and similar items.

Off to her left was a fully equipped man cave complete with bar, pool table, enormous big screen and other entertainment necessities.

She was absolutely fascinated and would like to see more... but she would be stalling.

“Is uh... Silas around?” she unconsciously twisted the ring Red bestowed, her smile fixed, “I don’t want to interrupt it he–”

“He’s back in his room.” Joe crooked his head towards the long corridor which had caught her attention upon entry, “You want I should get him?”

“No.” she decided against that. “Would it be okay if I... spoke to him for a minute? He’s not sleeping or any–”

“Nah,” the suggestion was waved aside, “go on back, first door on your right.”

Liz smiled again, “Are you sure?”

“He’s used to women back there.” Joe teased, sensing Liz’s state.

She relaxed a bit, “More information than I needed to know.” she stated, the dimples on her cheek indented with the slight grimace she offered.

Joe chuckled, “Want some coffee or–”

“Oh no, it won’t take long.” she waved the politeness aside.

“Gonna kick his ass out?”

“Oh my God!” she was instantly contrite, hoping against hope the story had not spread through the ranks, “No!” she hastened to rectify any sordid tales floating about, “Of course not! I intend to beg him to stay.”

Joe pulled a face, “Well, he’ll love that part at least. I personally think he had it coming.” he laughed for the fact, “Someone needs to take that bastard down a notch or two... not that I don’t love him like a brother.”

Liz was growing nervous all over again.

“A big, ugly, mean, obnoxious brother, granted.” Joe shrugged, holding out his had to indicate, “go on... give it to him with both barrels.”

“You are not helping!” Liz whined dejectedly, “Not at all!” she wrung her fingers together helplessly. “Is he in a bad mood?”

“Is he ever not?”

Her hopes fell.
“Just yanking your chain, honey.” the man laughed mischievously, “He’s fine. Go talk to him. Clear the air.”

Liz lifted hopeful eyes, “You think?”

“Yeah, but if things get out of hand and you have to shoot the guy,” Joe offered a solution to the problem, “remember, I don’t see nothing... ever... so, I won’t rat you out.”

She nodded and took a step, before hesitating in her step when the man held her up.

“And if you do have to shoot him,” the man grinned, “aim for the face. He hates that.”

She chuckled in spite of the moment, “I’ve always liked you, Joe.”

Liz crossed the few steps which would lead her to the back where she assumed the master bedroom was. She glanced down the ever growing length of hallway awaiting her.

She smiled at her companion, gearing herself up for the task at hand. She drew in a steadying breath before taking the first steps.

As she neared, she found the door open much to her surprise. She could not immediately see or hear the occupant of the room.

Liz had a few moments to look over the area, she wasn’t certain she had the correct room actually.

Everything looked so orderly, so pristine. The bed was made, the drapes pulled, allowing the sunshine in. It appeared ‘guest’ ready.

There was a tall dresser just across the floor. It was the first thing which caught the eye. On top were a few personal items, unmistakably male.

A watch, a coin dish full of spare change, a black walkie-talkie lay on its side. Beside that, an extra fully loaded clip for a gun.

Silas came into view, a load of clothes in hand which he lay carefully unto the bed.

His head instantly snapped about, a dark glower on the handsome face which instantly relaxed upon recognition of the intruder into his space.

“How’s it hanging.” he nodded minutely after a slight hesitation, the clear grey-blue eyes not giving away his mood or reaction in the least.

“...Eh,” the question threw her momentarily, “fine and you?”

“To the right.” the man had shifted a tad, grimacing slightly having felt the evidence of his proclamation.

“Again,” the woman was always annoyed at just how accepting some males were of her presence, “more than I needed to know.”

“Then why did you ask.” he turned away, folding a shirt up.

“What are you..” she cleared her throat, “...doing?”

“I thought I better wrap up the job before I left.” he ignored her discomfort as was his way.
Liz could see the opened carry case at the end of the bed now as the man lifted the opened valise unto the surface.

He continued to carefully fit boxers into various compartments of the luggage, “I’m assuming Joe will take over until Red can find a–”

“Silas!” Liz stepped hastily into the room, her expression an anxious one. “You know I didn’t mean–”

“Well,” his slow drawl stopped the declaration, “I think it’s better if I vacate for a while anyway.” he shifted a non-committal stare. “We seem to have reached some sort of crossroads. It’s good you stood up for yourself. I approve... for what it’s worth.”

He grinned, going back to the walk-in closet to extract yet another suitcase.

“It’s worth everything!” she stated plaintively. “I couldn’t stand it if you left...” she implored, stepping closer to the large king bed. “And... and what about Tom? Who’s going to bug him?” she hoped another tact might take for her first statement garnered little reaction.

“You’ve come up with some plan every single day to make his life miserable. No one else could be that maniacal and you know it!”

Silas’ mouth pulled into a wicked grin, “Yeah, I know but–”

“No ‘buts’ please.” Liz felt herself losing ground fast for the guy seemed pretty well set in his decision. “I was just reacting yesterday. I was so... upset about Red and...”

“It’s okay, kid.” he held up a hand, lifting another case unto the bed. Liz could see an array of weapons inside, neatly slotted into secure Velcro holdings.

“How many guns are in there?” she hadn’t been able to mentally calculate, astonishment in her tone.

“Oh, those are my favorites. I’ll send for the rest later... if that’s okay?” he thought he should observe formalities for a change.

“You cannot just leave me unprotected!” she grasped at straws, her worst fears coming to the fore.

He chuckled, “This place has more guards than Fort Knox.”

“Silas... tell me what to do to make this right?” Liz was close to tears.

“There is nothing wrong.” he scowled slightly, genuinely concerned for her welfare. “You didn’t do anything wrong. That’s not why I’m going.” he had been trying to lead up to the reason in his own fashion.

“Of course it is.” she wailed. “I opened my big mouth and got all uppity and you’re pissed... rightfully so!”

“What?” Silas was lost.

“I haven’t even told Red... anything.” she blurted. “He doesn’t know I was an asshole. That I... screwed up.” she murmured. “Can’t we work through this?”
“Sit down.” he indicated a chair in an alcove beside the large picture window. “I was coming up to talk to you in a while anyway.”

She didn’t believe him, but she sat, waiting on tenterhooks. The large blue eyes watched the man religiously.

He sat on the edge of the bed, holding both hands aloft to halt the tirade. “Liz, I wasn’t going to leave because of that little episode but I have to go. Red would understand.”

“How can I believe that?” she was more than upset. “’You’re leaving... you weren’t leaving before my little meltdown!”

“I hadn’t got the phone call before.” he exasperated, then at her expression. “Look, suffice to say,” he cut to the chase, “an old acquaintance got in touch with me. There is an... emergency. I have to go help out.” he waited while she processed. “I was coming to tell you as soon as I packed.”

“You’re packing all those weapons.” she stared at the duffel bag. “Is there trouble? Can I help?”

“You can help by staying here with Red and seeing he gets better faster.” Silas nodded. “He has a tendency to jump back into the deep end of the pool when he isn’t a hundred percent... especially after something like this.”

Liz was following and she didn’t want to pry, of course.

“It’s his way of assuring himself his super powers are still intact.” Silas smiled at the woman, “I was coming to clear the air before my flight out... I promise.”

She wanted to believe that... so much.

“Your face is very expressive... work on that.” he instructed. “You don’t believe a word I have said to you, do you.” he took for granted.

“Well, it all sounds a little,” she sought a word that wouldn’t piss him off, “...contrived, maybe?”

“Well, it’s not.” he sighed, sitting back a little, straightening his shoulders, “Okay, listen,” he clearly did not want to get into it, “this guy called, someone from my... a long time ago... he is a family member of...”

Liz listened attentively.

“I think this guy is in trouble. Hell, I know he is.” the guard pulled a face. “He’s always in some mess or another, but I feel obligated to bail him out, if I can, of course. No guarantees there either but I gotta try. Understand?”

She stared at him with those big puppy dog eyes.

“...He’s my wife’s brother.” he snapped because he sensed the woman was placating him. “My brother-in-law. He’s an idiot! Worse than Francis and not half so capable.”

“You think Francis is capa– you have a wife?!” she gasped.

“No... I had a wife.” he quieted. “As I said, it was a long time ago. She... died.”

Liz’s mouth fell agape, not only because of the unexpected background information on her guard. But that he willingly shared a piece of his history... with her.
“I’m... so sorry!”

The large man pushed up from the bed, walking to the window, “She was in a car crash...” his voice trailed away, his eyes fixed on the window pane.

“Oh, Silas...” Liz was speechless. She was out of her depth and knew it.

“Liz, I was only a kid and so was she.” he rolled his neck, agitated, not really knowing why he was over-explaining the situation.

He never told anyone about Anya. Red knew, of course, and Dembe.

“Hell, I don’t even remember being that age.” he scratched his forehead absently, “Was I ever that fucking young?”

Liz thought the forced chuckle was so poignant somehow. She watched Silas’ eyes cloud over, lost in a long ago memory, her heart constricting.

“We never got a happily ever after.” he sought her out, “I guess that’s why I’m so invested in seeing you and Red get one.”

Liz arose, crossing swiftly, her arms hugging the bear of a man, “God, Silas,” she whispered a sacred vow, “I am so very, very sorry.”

“It’s okay.” he was the one doing the actual soothing, for the woman was in an absolute state of nerves.

“Of course it’s not okay.” she swiped at the tears spiking her lashes. “It’s the last thing from okay.”

“Do you believe me now? That the reason I am going away for a spell is a valid one?”

“You have to let Red help... take Joe... or Dembe.”

“Dembe will have his hands full.” he shook his head. “I want Joe here.”

“You can’t traipse off into... where? Where is this man?”

“Russia.”

“Russia?” she was aghast. “That’s halfway around the world.”

“I know where it is. I lived there for three years.” he shifted patient eyes. “I’ve got contacts over there, they’ll be meeting me, everything will be fine... or don’t you trust my abilities.”

“Of course I do bit you always say, shit happens,” she quoted, “plan for any possible contingency.”

“I have.” she was calmed. “I got it covered.”

“Well who is this guy that he feels he can just make a phone call and you will pull his ass out of the fire?”

“I told you, he’s Anya’s younger brother.” Silas explained once again, “She looked after him... it was just the two of them left after...”

Liz touched his arm self-consciously, “Are you really okay?”
He turned aside, returning to his packing, “This brings up bad memories, that’s all.”

She could only imagine. “Isn’t there anything I can do?” she felt so helpless. “You’re my friend. When you hurt, I hurt.”

His hands halted their busy work for a long beat.

“And I know you’re hurting, Silas.” she could read his body language, sense it in the man’s hesitant manner.

Silas was never hesitant. The man was the most decisive individual she had ever met, including Red Reddington.

He crossed to the window again, looking out on a well kept garden of a variety of colorfully blooming flowers and shrubs, he stuck his hands into his pockets.

“If you want the truth, I don’t really want to go.”

The statement was so simplistic, she really did believe it.

She sought for something intelligent to say, some profound remark, coming up empty.

The handsome profile was turned slightly, she noted the chiseled jaw line, the neatly trimmed beared of speckled grey and white which was so distinguished looking on some occasions.

“And Anya would expect me to... help.” Silas knew as much. “She could never see his faults.” he sighed lightly, his attention still on the beauty outside the window. “She had a good heart.”

“So do you.”

He chuckled pensively, “Some say I don’t have one at all.”

“They don’t know you.”

He glanced at her, an odd expression present.

“I don’t either.” she picked up on his reasoning. “Does anyone, Silas?” she wondered. “You are so closed off about your private life.”

“Didn’t think anyone was that interested.” he shrugged massive shoulders, hands still in pockets of the jeans he sported.

“I am.” she was upset he would believe otherwise.

The blue shirt he wore made the blue eyes more startling, “You’re just nosy.” he teased.

Liz couldn’t argue that point, “Can I ask how... when you met your... Anya?”

“She wasn’t mine.” he grinned. “Well, not at first. She was very much her own person. Took me a while to convince her of my... credentials.”

Liz nodded that she understood. Only such a woman could catch his attention and hold it.

“She lived in Chechnya for a good part of her life. It was hard going after the revolution.”

Liz was putting together time lines. Russia. That part was clear.
The man nodded thoughtfully. Red must have shared a little of that time with her.

“The Wall had come down, the Soviet Union was on its last legs.” he remembered back. “Yeltsin was in... it was a bad time for the Russian people.”

Liz tried to recall her Civics class teachings, coming up dismally empty but this guy had lived it. He and Red.

“Red and I chose the losing side, as per custom.” Silas grinned over at the woman. “Federal troops were trying to cease control of the mountainous regions of Chechnya... the Boyeviki were–”

“The what?” she sat forward from her perch at the end of the bed, her hands braced on either side of her slender body.

“Boyeviki.” he repeated. The Guerrilla fighters of that region... were heavily out-manned. Yeltsin had the advantage hands down.” he ticked off his fingers. “Weaponry, combat vehicles, air support.” he shook his head slightly. “But we jumped in head first again, as usual.”

Liz’s attention was rapt.

“In January, I think it was,” he looked off, lost in the memory, it was all a blur after so many campaigns, “the Soviets were seizing strategic buildings throughout Lithuania. That was the beginning.”

His countenance turned dark, “Bastards were undertrained, undisciplined sons-of-bitches. Looting, raping, even wholesale murder of innocent civilians!” he lifted a thunderous expression, “Using them as human shields.”

He quieted after a fashion. It had taken a few moments for the man to expel the images his words must have conjured.

The room was silent, that silence strained.

“After Grozny, the country was in ruins, 500,000 “displaced” people...” he air quoted, a grim smirk on his face. “Worst euphemism I ever heard for what those people were.”

Liz did not know Grozny but she would Google the place after today. If Red was there, if it was a part of his life, she wanted to know... or did she?

Silas’ expression was bleak but then it softened, “...Red organized an airlift operation. It was the quickest way to get the refugees to some kind of safety.

Liz’s heart swelled with pride, of course Red would want to help the helpless. It was in his make-up.

“Anya and her brother, Vadik Sokolov...” he supplied the information, “were among the first to vacate the city.”

Liz was captivated by the tale.

“Which was a good thing because the airport was under attack about three days later. We had to abandon that tact of rescue.”

Liz tried to imagine the scope of the tragedy the man entailed.

“Anya got our attention from the get go.” he chuckled. I thought for a minute Red would order her shot, she was causing such a commotion.”
Liz liked how he said the woman’s name, all soft and tenderly.

“Red would never do that.” she was certain.

Silas quirked a brow, “... Okay. Anyway, the problem was, Red had stated, women and children for the first few flights and men as we could rescue them, of course.”

Liz felt empathy for the families separated in such a horrible time and place.

“Anya was insistent that we allow her brother to board.” Silas continued, “The kid was fifteen, sixteen,” he shook his head, “and there were so many waiting... kids... little ones.”

Liz was getting the picture.

“Our forces could only hold off the Soviets for so long and we knew that. Anya was taking up valuable time.”

Liz would have just let the kid board.

“Red flatly refused,” Silas relayed, “Anya stepped aside. She wouldn’t leave Vadik. So we boarded who we could and prepared for take off. By this time our supporters had to give up the ghost and bail.” Silas smiled wistfully.

Liz was stunned by such nonchalance.

“We closed the doors, the plane was already taxiing...” he lifted his head, rubbing his chin absently, “I’m getting everyone settled for take off amid the chaos of crying, hysterical women and terrified kids... and I look up and there they sat.”

Liz scooted closer, “Anya and her brother?”

“She had somehow managed to get past me... the little shit. She wouldn’t do it today.” he proclaimed stoutly. “I swear to God, I didn’t see them board, so now I’m sweating bullets. Red’s gonna have my ass in a sling for falling down on the job.”

“He wouldn’t really have cared.” Liz pouted. “What’s two more?”

“With that planes capacity?” Silas seemed incredulous she would make such a statement. “I seriously considered jumping out the hatch to make up for the weight distribution.”

She threw him an old fashioned look.

“Well, that and the prospect of having to face down Red.”

“Yeah.” she wasn’t buying it. “Sure.”

“He was more intimidating in the ‘old days’.” he quipped. “I hid Anya and the troll out of sight until we landed in Minsk. I found a safe place for them to stay until something permanent could be scrounged up.”

“And the great romance began.” Liz clasped her hand together happily, tucking them under her chin.

“Hardly.” the guard scoffed, shifting into the chair once again from his standing position. “She hated men, especially me... after what she had experienced, I couldn’t blame her.”

“Why ’especially’ you?”
“She said I was arrogant, conceited... full of myself.” he held his grin, his eyes twinkling, “My words, not hers. Which were much more damaging to my fragile male ego, trust me.”

“She’s the one who toughened up that thick hide?”

“Let’s just say, I grew as a person.” he settled for compromise, spreading his hands out minutely, “Time passed and... she mellowed a little.”

“It’s your fatal charm.” Liz managed to keep a straight face. “How long were you guys... eh..”

“About a year, on and off. Married about a year.” he replied evenly. “It was... a good time.”

Liz smiled gently. It was clear to see the honest emotion this man had felt... still felt for the woman to which he now referred.

Silas sat in the overstuffed chair with its high back, his hands engulfing the wood carving on its handles.

“She knew what I did... a career soldier but... more.” he didn’t know quite how to categorize his chosen vocation even in his own mind. “I was away a lot... but it never seemed to cause too many issues. I would send for her when it was done and we would see a lot of the world together. She loved that part of it.”

Liz processed all that had been said. She was glad Silas had those good years. At least he had a few good memories. Or it seemed he and Anya had been content together.

The silence had gone on for so long that Liz assumed the story was at an end.

She was acutely disappointed.

“...She was coming to me that night.”

The woman lifted her gaze.

Silas’ face was expressionless. For a moment, Liz wondered if she had imagined the words she had heard.

“I sent for her. She was going to fly to Cairo... to meet me.”

Liz closed her eyes to the realization. Did he blame himself? Of course he did. She stared transfixed at the man’s face.

Silas shifted haunted eyes, “She didn’t want to leave Vadik. People were calling the house...” it was like it happened yesterday, “people she didn’t know, asking for the little creep. She knew he was in trouble again.”

Did he need to talk? Had it festered inside too long?

Silas stood, too restless to continue.

Liz felt helpless. She sought things to say that would make it all better for the man. To heal what was broken.

“I convinced her it would be all right. I told her...” he closed his eyes, the conversation replayed in his mind, fresh as if it were yesterday, “my contacts would take care of the problem, whatever it was, just like the last time and the time before that.”
Liz arose, also too agitated to stay still. She approached the man gingerly, “And they did, didn’t they, Silas?” she implored. “You said, she was her own woman. If she really wanted to stay, she would have. She wanted to be with you.”

A large hand scraped his forehead, “I don’t know why I laid all this on you.” he was mystified. “I don’t even know why I started talking about it.”

“Because Anya’s brother called.” Liz surmised.

Silas seemed to come back from a long away place, “Oh... right. The kid,” he laughed shortly, “hell, he’s not a kid anymore, is he.”

“He acts like one,” was Liz’s opinion, “after all these years, his behavior doesn’t seem to have changed.”

“Or mine,” he stated grimly, facing her. “My instincts are telling me to write this guy off. Should have done it years ago.”

“But you can’t.” Liz understood. “Because of her.”

Silas crossed to the luggage on the bed, fingering the strap of the valise. “...Yeah,” he sighed heavily, “because of... her.”

A dark scowl worried the man’s forehead.

“I know you don’t want my advice,” Liz took for granted, “or my two cents worth..”

He cut her a look, “But you’re going to give them regardless, correct?”

She dismissed the sarcasm, “Is it wrong for this guy to keep imposing on you, yes, of course it is.” she moved forward. “Will he ever stop doing so? I doubt it... the truth of the matter,” she shrugged minutely, “doesn’t matter what he does. You will always honor the bond you and Anya shared. You know that and I know it.”

The grey eyes shifted passively.

“You can’t do anything else, Silas because in truth,” Liz “air quoted” this time in the large guards stead, “Anya is still here... in your heart. She never left. I don’t think she ever will, do you?”

The man’s lips compressed absently as he pondered her words.

“She’s the reason you go through women like water in a sieve.” she finally understood. “She’s why you never get attached. Your heart is already spoken for.”

“If that’s true,” the man folded a shirt he picked up off the bed, “it’s a sad damned statement, don’t you think?”

The blue-grey eyes trained on her face.

“I think it’s the most...” Liz halted. The man did not deal with trite platitudes. “What I think isn’t important.” Liz only hope that one day, Red would love her to such a depth but she knew something else. “If it were me, though, I wouldn’t want you to live in such a state.”

Silas’ hands halted their busy work but he did not seek her out as yet.

“I would hope that you could find happiness and contentment in life.” Did Anya feel the same?
“Wouldn’t you want that for her? If the situation were reversed.”

Silas lifted empty eyes.

“Sounds trite I guess.” the woman felt her inadequacies.

“...I wonder if Red knows exactly what he has found,” Silas’ deep tone washed over Liz, “... in you.”

~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~

Red Reddington reluctantly opened his eyes. It was early yet. The drapes were still drawn but he could see a soft light filtering around the slits of the heavy material.

His hand slid automatically, his palms feeling out to the opposite side of the bed.

Lizzy’s spot was cool to the touch. She had been gone long before he awakened.

He carefully moved his head, searching out the clock by the... Kaplan had returned his property.

He smiled mentally. That woman would have made an excellent Storm Trooper.

Ten o’clock. Red never slept this late but again, he didn’t often get shot in the head as a rule.

Turning his head had not produced the dreaded effect of the previous day. No real nausea, slight headache, no throbbing agony to deal with.

He would take it...

He felt grungy... a nice hot shower would do him just fine.

Tossing the blankets gingerly aside, the man eased to the side of the bed slowly pushing into an upright position.

He stifled a groan, fighting a slight head rush. He felt out the bandaged area of his head. A small patch of gauze and tape replaced the wrap the medical team had first applied.

What the hell has she give him that he had slept through not only Kaplan’s presence, but her gentle administrations?

She must be over her pissy spell. Red knew the woman could be infinitely gentle when she wanted...

He had sat through several bandaging’s in the past. She tartly dressed him down but her touch had been kind, careful and caring.

Red had sat obediently quiet, taking his medicine like a good little soldier but only because of that ‘touch’.

He and Kate had a special bond. The man had never tried to define it. He didn’t think Kate did either... it just was.

Red hoped it could always be like that... but he was jaded enough to know, most things changed over time and circumstances.

What a sad day if it ever came to pass. He genuinely liked and cared for the woman as well.
Red arose, shaky on his feet, his legs feeling like rubber for a few steps.

“Really?” he muttered his annoyance, stubbornly working through the weakness. By the time he reached the sink, he was much more stable.

He stared at his reflection in the mirror for a goodly spell. At times he didn’t recognize himself.

So much had transpired in his lifetime. Oft times, it was like he had morphed into someone else’s life.

Lived some other man’s destiny.

He would not have purposely chosen the lifestyle he now lived.

Red had envisioned another path for himself. But this one had brought him to Elizabeth Keen.

The man cocked his head, pushing the philosophical mood aside.

He reached, ripping the bandage off, tossing the bloodied patch into the trash receptacle under the vanity.

He examined the wound. An angry welt of a slash about two inches in length graced the right side of his head just above the temple.

Someone was looking out for him, he mused.

Why was anyone’s guess.

He accepted what was, more than grateful for whatever time he had remaining because it meant more time with Lizzy.

Not that Red hadn’t enjoyed his life before the woman, he had.

Long ago, he made the decision to live life to the fullest, each and ever day because early on, he was taught a harsh lesson about the cruelties that very life could throw at a man.

There was time, after his world was ripped apart, he considered giving up... losing his daughter had devastated the man.

That sweet, innocent little girl had become his whole world. He had doted on his ‘little angel’.

The circumstances that ripped Jennifer away had almost destroyed him, in truth.

But then the anger had materialized, a rage so deep, so all encompassing, directed entirely at the bastards who perpetrated the atrocity... Red was able to pull it together.

His soul purpose, becoming an obsession.

Find his child.

Bring her home, but as years progressed the man had to confront the decisions he had made in order to accomplish such a goal.

Was he being selfish now? Was her life better without him intruding for it had taken years to establish a workable solution to his problem.

Years in which they were not together. Years of explaining to her why he was not able to be there.
At such a young, impressionable age, would his daughter even welcome him back into her life?

If it was difficult for a grown man to understand or accept the reality that had become his norm... what would it be like for his little girl?

Was he just being a coward?

Did he dread the look on her face when he showed up, out of the blue, once again disrupting a life she had become accustomed to?

He could have found Jennifer had he truly wished. He had the resources but it had taken forever to accumulate them.

By the time his network was finally in place, ten years had passed.

She wouldn’t know him... she wouldn’t remember. Nor was his lifestyle conduit to bringing an impressionable young girl into its midst.

Was it just another excuse? Was he so terrified of how Jennifer would perceive him after he had allowed them to take her from him?

Was the guilt and recriminations so horrendous, he refused to even attempt a face to face encounter?

Red scowled darkly, dismissing the unsettling thoughts which often plagued him over the passing years.

The man automatically undressed, throwing his pajama top into the hamper in the walk-in closet.

He selected a slate blue button up shirt and dark gray slacks... the combination fitting his rather subdued mood. Reaching for a gray tie, he hesitated, bypassing the accessory instead choosing blue boxers and matching socks before heading for the shower.

Five minutes under the steamy spray dispelled his depression which he chalked up to Kaplan’s cocktail of meds.

He stood, eyes closed, hand braced against the shower wall, allowing the refreshing spray to pelt his battered body and mind.

The throbbing in his head eased in increments the longer he stood under the waters soothing effects.

His instincts clicked as he heard the soft patter of feet approaching. The man straightened, his hand reaching instinctively for the weapon laying unobtrusively along the top of the shower ledge.

“Does Kaplan know you’re in there?” Liz’s voice sounded miffed.

“I didn’t know I had to report to her.” Red’s hand dropped, lazily reaching instead for the soap which lay waiting in its regular spot. “Think she would like to join me?”

“Alright, I deserved that one.” Liz’s tone still held a little animosity.

He smiled for the fact.

“You sure you don’t need any help in there?” she had seen the bloodied bandage discarded in the trash.

“Why, you going to send Silas in?” he quipped, lathering his body absently.
“Very funny.” Liz snipped. “Head shots bring out the best in you, I see.”

Red chuckled, his hands running over his cock, cleansing the area thoroughly, “This is an awfully big shower... it’s lonely in here.”

“You sure you don’t need help?” she questioned once more.

Well, this was just fantastic. He had the strongest urge to answer that question.

He glanced down, his groin stirring to life in response to the woman’s breathy voice.

In truth, his mind registered that she was using her vexed tone. But to his ears, he heard a seductive lilt that he could not dismiss.

He scowled at the useless thing irritably.

He grunted a noncommittal response, garnering a heavy sigh from the other side.

“I'll go get Silas.” Liz retorted.

Red rolled his eyes. Okay, he had deserved that one.

He rinsed his body, suddenly wanting the shower over and done. He wanted to see the woman. He wanted to kiss her, to feel her in his arms.

Liz had shed her clothes absently. Stepping through the opened portal of the enclosed shower, she hesitated.

Red was rinsing his body, eyes closed as the steamy spray pelted his face and chest.

Liz’s eyes traversed the masculine form, appreciating the muscular thighs and tight calves.

She admired the stocky shoulders and thick forearms with the abundant honey colored hair.

She felt so safe in those arms.

His suntan was dark and stopped just below his waist before picking up again on those powerful thighs.

He had only recently started laying about with her down at the pond to garner the darkened skin. Though he kept a shirt within reaching distance at all times, she had been incredibly pleased and very proud of him for stretching beyond his comfort zone for her.

The first couple days, he had sat beside her, suit intact. Only during a rather passionate petting session... had he removed his shirt.

The day after, he removed it without the added incentive much to her delight.

The man turned aside, breaking her thoughts.

His bottom was taut, well-rounded and pale. And she found it sexy.

She could see the unmistakable protrusion of an early erection from the side view when he turned slightly to rinse the other parts of his body.

“Looks like you got a little problem there.”
Red’s mood lifted instantly, his actions halting in their tracks.

He blatantly stared at the vision who had entered the shower with him.

“Not so little.” he fought back instinctively but the delivery lacked impact, he knew.

She grinned, coming closer. “Why do you look at me like that?” she felt like blushing.

“Like what?” he prompted, his eyes following yet another path down the lovely frame.

Liz slipped her arms about his neckline, leaning against the stoutness of his body, “Like I have no clothes on.”

He glanced meaningfully, “Well... you don’t.”

He relished the feel of the fact, his thighs moving suggestively forward teasing the soft fluff of her mound.

“You’ve seen it a hundred times.” she brushed her lips gently over his, her eyes moving about his face.

“I’ve seen the Venus De Milo a hundred times.” he shrugged. “God’s creative beauty never fails to enthral me.”

“You can be so charming...” she curved her frame to his, the hardness of his ever growing arousal pressing intimately between their bodies, “but today...” she mused, pouting a little for his benefit, “it’s not going to get you anywhere you want to go.”

“It’s not?” his hand grazed the side of her breast, as he lifted the plump orb with a tender touch, his intent quite clear.

“And you’re not going to persuade me otherwise.” she moved out of his touch artfully, her eyes scolding the man. “It’s too soon after... what happened.”

“I’ll let you know when I’m out of commission but until such time—”

“No, no, no.” Liz wagged her finger at the man, her hands trailing a slow, experimental path down the front of his chest, “You can’t always have your way.”

“I bet I can.” his hand cupped her ass cheek lovingly tugging her back, his cock pushing into her abdomen.

“You would lose.” she wrapped her fingers securely about his hardness, her expression a confident one.

The man drew in a breath, closing his eyes to the wondrous feel. His penis reacted to the heated palm instantly, growing in width and length under her gentle guidance.

“If this is losing...” he sighed his gratitude, “I didn’t know what I was missing all these years.”

He lowered his head staring transfixed at the slender fingers surrounding his girth, manipulating his cock to her will. He instinctively pushed into the touch, groaning painfully.

“Let me do it...” she scolded, “you’ll make your head ache.”

“My head is aching.” he grumbled only to sigh his relief seconds later when her fingers eased the growing ache in the engorged crown.

“Good things come to boys with patience.” Liz admonished, slowly kneeling before the man, making herself comfortable in the slot between his parted legs.

“You’re not dealing with... a boy.” Red’s eyes flamed with suppressed desire. Liz glanced at the evidence in hand, her fingers unable to fully encompass the thick appendage she rhythmically stroked.

“I certainly am not...” she leaned, her mouth trailing a searing path down the side of his rigid hardness.

Red situated his body to block most of the water unable to look away from the drama unfolding before his very eyes.

Liz felt her way, enjoying the shape and texture of the man’s heavy organ, not shy in exploring or touching whatever she pleased.

Red gently cupped her head, his fingers tracing the full mouth covering the flesh of his cock lovingly.

“Kaplan said, no fornication.” Liz frowned up at the man, the blue eyes full of innocent inquiry, “That doesn’t mean this,” she sucked the tip of his arousal teasingly, “... does it?”

“No,” he gasped, leaning heavily back into the heated wall, “Hell, no... that’s–” his palm encouraged her closer, “not what it means at all.”

“Oh, good.” Liz smiled happily, taking more of him into the shallow depths of her hot, moist mouth. Red groaned bleakly, feeling a pressure already building in the recesses of his body.

So soon?! Fuck! This couldn’t be happening. Sure, she had surprised him by this little tour-de-force but...

His control couldn’t be that lacking...

But the evidence was clear. The longer that sweet, innocent mouth worked on his cock, the more his willpower weakened.

She spread one soapy hand upward, her fingers easing into his pubic hair, the other worked a slow, agonizing rhythm on his vulnerable shaft.

And that mouth. What that mouth was doing to him was probably illegal in most states, at least biblically.

He pumped his hips in response, pushing into the arousing grasp, his breath becoming more and more labored.

Liz hefted his testicles, having searched out the full, heavy sack. She gentle kneaded the sensitive bundle, suckling harder now, the length of her tongue rubbing along the bulging veins.

The man moaned a stifled gasp of pure pleasure.

“S-Stop now.” he warned breathlessly, hating to say the dreaded words.
“But I like doing this.” she returned to the pastime with determined flourish.

“I like touching you.” she tilted her head slightly, opening her mouth, giving him a clear view of her tongue undulating along the thick length.

“Oh, fuck...” he felt himself losing ground rapidly, his body attuned to her every whim, his damned dick having a mind of its own.

“I like how you feel.” she felt him to her hearts content. There was something incredibly arousing about having the stiff width in her mouth, the velvet softness of his skin brushing against her lips.

“I like,” she suckled him intently for a long beat, “...how you taste, you’re so clean and warm.” she flicked her tongue about his slit, drawing a bead of clear liquid from the swollen tip. She hummed, enjoying the teasing taste of what was to come.

“I’m going to come, dammit.” he snapped, slightly embarrassed for his lapse.

“I should hope so.” she seemed slightly taken aback.

“I want to do it... with you,” he growled, gently pulling at the damp strands of her wet hair, “inside you.”

She pulled at the directive, her hand refusing to stop the incessant pumping of his shaft, her mouth only attending him further... answering his every desire and need.

“And you will...”

“Elizabeth...” he used his, ‘I mean it’ tone.

“Let me do this,” she sighed blissfully, those eyes mesmerizing him, “...for you.”

“We can do it together.” he persuaded, his own voice sounded almost harsh now, raw with the emotion she stirred, “come with me, baby.”

“I will...” she seemed relatively certain of the fact before returning to her administrations.

Red watched ardently as her free hand slid between her milky thighs just as his cock disappeared over and over between her pouty lips. The pink flesh catching slightly on his bulging crown, before the hardened flesh once again vanished into the hot mouth.

God...

His senses were drawn deeper and deeper into the churning void of passion she was diligently creating for him.

Women had pleasured him before but never so efficiently as this woman... Lizzy put her whole heart and soul into the act.

Bracing his feet firmly on the stone of the shower floor, the man allowed the steamy water to wash over him all the while, the volcanic depths of Elizabeth’s succulent mouth enticed him further into a delirium he was only too glad to mire himself within.

His hand covered over the small fingers as he established the rhythm he would need to complete the erotic journey she had taken him on. Those sweet lips parted enticingly.

“Suck...” he urged roughly, “God, yes, “ he hissed, “like that, baby.”
Liz was only too happy to oblige. The man’s constant grunts of pleasure, the veiled curses of astonishment... the raspy words of encouragement guided her.

Red’s bulb throbbed worse than his head had last night, only this pain was an exquisite one.

His fingers tightened about the bunched strands of dark hair as the woman moaned melodically, the sounds vibrating along his cock.

He would pull out... at the last minute, he promised himself. He would pull out... though the luscious mouth was fucking tempting as hell.

“Tell me what to do,” she rasped around the bulbous head, before recapturing it between her luscious lips, “how do I help... you come.”

His fingers curled into the wet strands in response to the unexpected breathy plea, “You want me to come in your mouth?” he groaned harshly, demanding a reply.

She groaned deeply in response, sending another round of delicious vibrations throughout his body.

“My God... do you swallow, baby.” he growled, envisioning the intimacy. “You like to feel that hot cum in your mouth?”

The wondrous suction increased, drawing him deeper into the abyss... under her spell.

He panted sharply, lowering his eyes once more, transfixed by the vision of her hand moving in steady rhythm with her mouth.

“Do you?” he gritted.

He saw the uncertainty behind the large blue eyes looking innocently up at him.

“Fuck...” Red’s head dropped back in ecstasy.

That she was willing to let him come in her mouth was a fantasy he’d carry around with him for days.

That she had apparently never swallowed before, but was perhaps contemplating it...

“Jesus...” he breathed shakily as she suckled him with fervent determination.

“You don’t have to...” he eased her concern, giving her an out should she want one... hoping against hope she would not take it.

Cupping her small head, he got lost in the bobbing sensation as his other played with the pert nipple of her breast, losing himself in this wonderful gift.

Slowly thumbing her nipple, he drew a low moan from the woman’s throat.

His eyes were burning coals of lascivious lust. “Deeper,” he whispered the plea, “take me... deeper.”

The lights flashed a vivid kaleidoscope of cascading sensation as he slid to the back of her mouth, just touching her throat.

Red growled brokenly as the onslaught began, his body tensing, knowing what was to come.

“Son of a–” he panted harshly, a rising heat pooling in his sack.
The woman rubbed her tongue against the sensitive underside of his cock as she lifted his balls up against his body, her fingers just teasing the skin behind the handful she had and he was undone completely, giving himself over to the wild, untamed passion surrounding his mind and feverish body.

“God…” He gasped sharply as his cock head pulsed thick spurts of cum into her willing mouth.

Liz whimpered softly, wrapping her tongue about the throbbing head, tenderly suckling the hot fluid from his sensitive slit.

“Shit… I love you, baby.” he gasped, eagerly rubbing his cockhead between her pouty lips and against her agile tongue.

Some sort of sanity prevailed finally and he jerked his hips back, breaking free of the amazing suction.

Curling his fingers around hers, he tightened her hold. Their hands drew hard bursts of hot cream from his slit, coating the hollow of her throat and breasts in his orgasm.

Elizabeth watched the white arousal as it was lost in the swirling water from the pelting shower head.

“I could watch you do that all day.” she lifted a seductive stare.

Red had no witty reply, too immersed in the moment for a long beat.

She slowly stroked the last few pulses of come from his shaft, her tongue flicking out, catching a stray drop or two. He shook under the onslaught, his cock oversensitive. The intense sensation almost too overwhelming for a moment, nearly making his legs buckle

“...I could watch you do that,” he motioned to her pastime, “all damned day.”

“Flattery will get you,” she accepted his assistance to rise, “quite a lot actually.” she held her grin. “Are you feeling better?”

“Hell yes.” Red remained stationary back against the shower wall, eyes blissfully closed now, “You have no idea how much better I feel.”

“Good to hear.” she rinsed her mouth, reaching for the soap, “Want me to give you a bath?”

She held up the soap.

“I’m not man enough.” he slowly smiled, his eyes seeking out her reaction, “I couldn’t go through that roller coaster ride again so soon...”

She smiled happily, “I like a man who knows his limits.”

“Try me again in an hour.” he boasted, because he felt pretty damned fucking incredible about now.

“Oh, and,” she turned, her hands soaping her beautiful breasts, “I was going to tell you how much I love you but,” she crinkled her nose, “my mouth was full.”

He held his amusement, “Etiquette takes precedence I suppose.”

She giggled softly, tiptoeing to meet the man as he captured her mouth in a deep kiss. He grunted his pleasure, finding a slight hint of his taste in her sweet little mouth.
“You didn’t have to do that.” he murmured against her lips.

“I wanted to...” she replied softly.

“No you didn’t.” he chuckled sensually.

“No really, I like doing it with you.” she realized she did. “You didn’t make me feel...” she searched for the word, “pressured, I guess.” she smiled impishly up at him. “You pulled away,” she teased, “even though I know you didn’t really want to.”

“I would have drowned you otherwise.” he quipped.

She giggled at his honesty.

Something plagued the man, “I’d like to ask you a question,” he pushed the wet strands from her eyes, “it’s none of my damned business but...”

Liz picked up on the direction he was going, “Everyone used condoms... it was college. STD central.” she grimaced. “And with Tom... it was the same.” she confided. “I always wondered about him, but to be truthful it took the pressure off me.”

Red nodded his understanding. They used condoms because Tom didn’t want the intimacy, the responsibility of a pregnancy...

Liz smiled warmly at Red. Tom obviously hadn’t wanted those things...

Red... obviously did.

“You’re fun in the shower.” she said, breaking the mood.

“I’m fun a lot of places.” he lifted the soap from her unresisting hands, his palm sliding over the ripe melon of a mound lovingly, “We’ll have to explore.”

He pulled her back against him, amazed that his body responded to the silky warmth of her bared flesh.

“You said an hour.” she swatted him away, twisting about peevishly.

“I lied.” he reached for her.

“You don’t lie...” she arched a brow.

“All right,” he conceded, “I underestimated my masculine stamina,” he unwillingly told the truth, before his eyes lazily traveled the expanse of the woman’s flush skin, “though why I did under such circumstances is beyond me.”

“You go right now,” she pointed, “and let me finish my shower or I’ll call Mr. Kaplan and she’ll see you naked.”

“She’s seen me naked.” Red retorted.

“She has not seen... that.” Liz pointed to the man’s semi-erect penis. “And she will not see that.”

“A bit territorial are we?”

“Me being territorial over who sees your cock has nothing to do with this.” Liz lifted her chin stubbornly, “I just don’t want to gross her out.”

Red took said cock in hand, presenting it to her, “On a scale of one to ten, how would you rate this?”

“We’re not talking about me.” Liz folded her arms under her breasts. “Mr. Kaplan would rate it a zero.”

“Says who?” Red frowned.

“Silas.” she sighed heavily, as though it should be common knowledge. “Now go...” she shooed the man forward, “I won’t be nice to you and your attractive cock in an hour if you don’t.”

She seemed pretty set in her thinking, Red had to admit.

He raked her nudity with a possessive sweep, “I’m going because I want to.”

“You just told me to go...” he countered, his eyes drifting downwards to the woman’s mound, “make up your mind woman.”

“I meant... oh, you know what I meant.” she practically stamped her foot, turning her back on the man and the subject matter.

Red held his grin, catching her reflection in the mirrors as he set the water temperature of the faucet.

He had a perfect view of that perfect little naked ass.

Liz started humming as she soaped her body with a layer of thick, fragrant lather.

She was slightly tone deaf which Red had always found charming. He would walk through the house to hear Lizzy belting out what he thought might be Adele, with the in house sound system.

Red knew enough of the artist if only due to her recent popularity but couldn’t exactly name a particular tune... though he could recite the entire musical repertoire of Billie Holiday.

But today’s choice had the man’s grin widen as he brushed his teeth, rinsing in the double vanity sink.

“But square-cut or pear-shaped, these rocks don't loose their shape,” Liz admired the ring on her finger, “diamonds are a girl's best friend!”

“Are they now?” he shifted a careful gaze.

She didn’t answer but shortly returned to her humming, and as a bonus... added a sexy little version of the song which had caught her fancy today.

Red turned about, short towel wrapped about his waist, arms folded as he leaned back against the basin to watch the show.

“I’d shower you with diamonds if you did that while sitting on my lap.” he stated quietly, attempting to keep his libido in check watching the seductive swaying of those curvaceous hips. He had caught brief glances of the plump breasts from time to time as well.

He wasn’t doing so well on that libido thing. The fabric of the towel straining taut over his rampant hard on.
“You men are all alike,” Liz rinsed thoroughly, “always think of one thing... thank the Lord.” she giggled.

“How many diamonds again?” she secured a long, luxurious towel, stepping from the shower stall tucking the end securely into the cleft of her breasts.

She towel dried her hair as she approached, trying hard not to note the man’s condition.

“How many do you want?”

“Never ask a woman that question,” she cut scolding eyes his way, “we might just answer truthfully one day."

“I meant for you to,” he intoned, “answer truthfully.” he suggested. “Diamonds, cars, money... you name it, you’ll get it.”

“Eight hundred and twenty eight dollars,” she faced him squarely, “and fifty-two cents.”

“Do you take plastic?” he was intrigued by the sum she chose.

“I’m old fashioned,” she shook her head regretfully, “cash only.”

“I’ll get my wallet.” he pushed off the counter.

She caught his arm, “Don’t you want to haggle over the price?”

“Why should I?”

“...It’s a little exorbitant, isn’t it?” now she was intrigued, “I mean... have you paid for...paid that much... in the past?”

“I don’t pay for it,” he was enjoying the conversation immensely, “as a rule.”

“You just said you would.” she was confused.

“I said... I would pay you.”

She beamed, “I’m special!”

“You certainly are.”

“You’re fun in the bathroom too.” she was delighted with the flattery.

“I could put you up on this basin and show you just how much fun I can be... if you want.” he offered politely.

“Haven’t we done that before?” she tried to be serious. “I wouldn’t want it to get stale between us so early on.” she crooked her head to one side, laying the towel aside. “Are we repeating ourselves already?”

Red liked her hair all mussed and combed only by her fingers.

“Is it all a blur?” he empathized, “I will have to try harder, won’t I.”

“I like the sound of that.” she was in total agreement. “But not until Mr. Kaplan leaves, she scares me.”
“Why hasn’t she left?” he asked peevishly.

“How ungracious.” Liz reached for her lotion. “After all she’s done for you.”

“Done to me.” Red corrected. “It’s not like her to stick around this long.”

“She and Nora have established a rapport.”

“Oh dear God.” terror struck Red’s heart but only superficially to amuse Lizzy, of course.

“I think she has finally met someone she can relate to.” Liz massaged her upper arms absently, smiling gently for his wit.

Red enjoyed the fragrant scent drifting about the bathroom helped along by the fine mist of steam floating in the air after Lizzy’s shower.

He was grateful his condition had improved. The woman clearly did not want intimacy at this time, though... perhaps in an hour...

“What’s on the agenda for today.” he inquired. Disappearing into the walk-in, he dressed for the day. Reaching for his shoes, he hesitated as the woman flounced in, giving him a look over.

“I like that shirt.” she smiled before turning about to her own clothing. “You always look so put together.” she was already wondering what might match and might not.

“I struggle with things like fashion. Guess it’s the price you pay for being raised by a man.” she grinned. “Not that Sam didn’t do his best but he thought it was fine to wear white socks with a tux.”

“First of all, you always dress beautifully...” Red corrected pointedly, “now that your past that awful olive stage.”

Liz rolled her eyes, leafing through the selection afforded her... thanks to Red.

“Your taste suits you... it’s young and fresh and you.” he discarded pair after pair of shoes as he went down the selection, “And secondly, when did Sam ever wear a tux?”

“My junior prom.” she joined the man, looking over his shoulder, “He insisted on being a chaperone so he could kill Rick Westford if he tried anything with me.”

“Good for Sam.”

Liz lay her chin on Red’s shoulder, “Would you have killed Rick too?”

“I was Rick.” he realized.

She laughed and his mood lightened. He turned his head finding her lips very close to his face.

She leaned, lovingly kissing his mouth. “You make me laugh.”

“In a good way I hope.”

“I like being with you.” she suddenly realized.

“Well, it works out just fine,” he felt her sincerity, touched by the sentiment displayed, “because I like being with you as well.”
Liz realized something else. She was happy again.

She and Silas were all right. She hadn’t felt uncomfortable or awkward with Francis this morning and...

“Don’t you ever try to leave me, Red Reddington.” she warned, hopefully keeping her tone light and airy as not to reveal the depth of emotions she was feeling. “I’ll have to do something tragically drastic if you do.”

“Slash my wrists?” he had sat on the bench seat in the center of the large closet to slip the loafers on he had chosen.

“I don’t have that much time.” she dismissed such a notion, “You have Kaplan on speed dial.... I’ll think of something.”

“Tragically drastic?” he teased, content to watch as she rifled through her lingerie draw, still as naked as when she came in. She wiggled into a pair of dark blue panties, totally unashamed of her nudity which is just how the man liked it.

“Are you making fun of me?” she put her hands on her hips.

“Can I taste those?” he motioned to her pert breasts, “the nipples are responding to me even as we speak. I get their vote.”

She covered the amazing mounds with her hands, “You do not,” she decided, “you’re being mean.”

“You are being mean... to me.” he made mention, adjusting the issue in his pants accordingly.

“A little abstinence is good for the soul.” Liz held up a blouse silently asking his opinion.

“I prefer you sans clothing.”

Liz sighed mentally, putting the blouse back on the rack, “I’ll make it up to you... tonight.”

“Then chose the red one.” he motioned to the line of blouses, “And you said an hour.” he reminded.

“Mr. Kaplan may still be here.” she jut her chin out, turning away from the man. “You’ll have to wait.”

“And if Kaplan is still here tonight?” he wanted his parameters set.

“Remember to lock the door.” she cut him a look. “She can’t pick locks can she?”

Red was not certain to be honest, “I’ll hold you to your word then.” he inclined his head minutely, “duty calls I suppose.”

Red didn’t really like the thought of returning to the other world so soon. He was beginning to prefer this one he was creating with Elizabeth more and more.

“Thank you, Lizzy.” he murmured softly.

“You’re thanking me for a blow job?” she tittered.

“No, well, yes.” he shrugged slightly. “Perhaps more for the fact that you wanted me to feel better... the affection you offered.”
“Well then,” she smiled, “you are more than welcome.” she wrapped her arms about his neckline, kissing him softly. “Feel free to call me again in your time of need, so to speak.”

Yes, he was definitely appreciating this new found world they were creating.

“Now, let’s get you fed so you feel a hundred percent.”

“You think your mouth on my cock didn’t achieve that?” Red asked seriously.

“Okay then,” she smiled softly, “a hundred and ten percent.” she grinned before sobering a little. “You should take some down time.” Liz countered on a serious matter herself, situating her blouse inside her black pants, “My God, Red... you just had a serious injury.”

The man was clearly hesitant, torn, “I feel fine.”

“You guys always feel fine.” she disdained. “You are not fine, Red. Please take at least a few days.” it was beseeched.

She massaged his shoulders, her expression a sympathetic one. She kissed his cheek, pulling back.

“What ever you decide.” she was willing to compromise but she wished he would take a breather.

“I’m going for my walk... then will have breakfast.” it was a start. “I’ll make decisions afterward. Don’t plan on an empty stomach.”

“I like the sound of that.” he grinned over at her. “Work on that delivery, or better still,” an idea occurred to him, “we’ll work on it together. Ever play the Orion Slave girl to the Romulan war lord?”

“No, but I speak Klingon, do you?” she countered artfully.

He laughed, “Francis does.”

“What a shocker.” she mused. “You know Star Trek but not Star Wars?”

“I was a child of the sixties...” he shrugged. “I’m serious about trying out a few games.” he lifted his brows. “Are you up for it?”

“Hey, I’m as kinky as the next person.” she feigned bravado for in reality, she had never once attempted such a thing. Which was a damn sad statement about her sex life. “Who gets to be the slave girl first?”

He walked past on his way out, landing a smart smack with his palm on her ass cheek.

It stung deliciously and the woman jumped visibly, stifling a squeak, her eyes widening with surprise.

“Guess.” Red leaned close, breathing softly in her ear the challenging whisper.

Those eyes watched him swagger across the area offering but one meaningful look her way.

That ‘look’ warmed her from head to toe.

Liz ruminated, standing perfectly still after his departure.
Was he serious? Did such things interest him? Did they interest her?

They had played a little before, her the student to the naughty professor... and she had enjoyed the game immensely.

Her bottom still tingled from the imprint of his palm.

It was not an unpleasant sensation to her great surprise.

Which made her very interested in what other talents he possessed.

She found herself smiling for no apparent reason.

The day was looking up.

~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥

Red literally bounded down the two circular steps of the portico of the front entranceway.

He often enjoyed a brisk walk around the property before breakfast, and today was especially pleasant.

The sun wasn’t high enough to produce the oppressive heat as yet. There was a good Northerly wind coming off the Potomac.

The air was fragrant with the scent of a variety of blooming flowers and bushes. There was an array of colors and soft hues to catch one’s attention. The sky was an aqua blue with wisps of fluffy white clouds.

He chuckled to himself, shaking his head slightly. He was practically glowing... and he knew why. He felt like fucking Prince Charming traipsing through the woods after he found his Princess.

He had almost bought the farm yesterday... or so everyone was claiming, which made this morning rather special.

It made a guy more appreciative of the things that mattered in life.

The scents were sharper, the colors more vivid, the sunshine warmer.

The touch of a woman... more intense.

A brush with the Reaper would do that to a man. And Red intended to enjoy the sensations as long as they lasted because it was human nature to slip back rapidly into taking things for granted.

He found his favorite alcove settled back into the property was free from distraction.

Sitting on the provided bench of the little arbor, he inhaled the rich aroma of the roses climbing abundantly over the archway.

He had shared the spot early on with Lizzy, delighted by her reaction.

She had found the quaint spot, charming.

They would sit here after dark once their business issues were handled for the day and share interests.
Red had found out a lot of things about the woman he had only guessed at before.

Her political views for instance. He would have guessed Democrat because she had a soft heart, but she had surprised him... Independent all the way.

She had enquired of his affiliation. He had amused her by giving a straight faced, ‘Whig’.

Another surprise, she actually got the reference, “I would have thought you to be a member of the Know-Nothing party.” she cocked her brow smartly.

The memory brought a smile to the man’s lips.

His thoughts drifted to the events of this morning.

Lizzy had surprised him yet again, in the most pleasant of ways, granted.

As had his erection. He hadn’t been certain of his capabilities in the bedroom after his recent ordeal.

Nor had he been in the mood to jerk one off.

He could feel the crush of her soft fluff covering her mound brushing against his thigh area.

Red closed his eyes, allowing the visions free reign for once.

One of his favorite pastimes of late, was nuzzling that little neatly trimmed muff.

As a man, it was important to him to know for certain he could pleasure her when he went between those velvet thighs.

It was a priority in the male perception of his prowess, or lack thereof.

He loved how he could make her tremble with just a few flicks of his tongue on that sensitive spot.

He knew exactly how to locate it. He could feel it grow under his guidance. She would squirm about when he licked her just so. He adored the feel of her plumping lips and clit in his mouth.

Another smile graced his lips. He took out a cigar he had secured from the desk in the office, lighting it leisurely.

Yes, it was how a man proved to himself he was a man.

He had never felt more so this morning in that damned shower, when she had knelt before him.

Her hands on his body excited him.

She had been unsure of herself, of her abilities. He felt as much but she need not have concerned herself.

Red had more experienced lovers and yes, they had pleased him but there was something fucking appealing in Lizzy’s hesitant explorations.

He could sense something more, that as she went along, her confidence had grown.

That small hand stroking his hardness had felt incredible.

Having her kneel before him stirred something primitive inside. The sight of her bared breasts below, just out of his reach to fully hold them in his warm grasp, was an agony he would gladly suffer over and over again.

For a moment, Red couldn’t decide which pleased him more? That tight pussy or the feel of Lizzy’s hot mouth suckling him hard and confidently.

In the beginning, in the early days... he had fantasized about that treasure between her legs. How would it feel to slowly inch into that steamy heat? What would it look like when she was laying beneath him, legs spread open... and vulnerable.

Did she shave completely? Well he now knew the answer to most of his fantasies.

Her responsiveness to his touch, delighted him. He could make her wet just by using a finger or two in that eager little hole.

She was so beautiful. It pleased him just to look at her. That he was privileged enough to touch that satin flesh, kiss those pouty lips... both pairs...

Red shifted absently, his hardness sliding against his thigh as it grew in length.

Damn! He wished they could have made love this morning as well.

He especially wished it now.

He longed to taste the sweetness of her nipples... he liked how the full creamy breasts filled his palm. He loved the heaviness of those luscious mounds.

Their mouths seemed designed for a perfect fit. There was nothing sweeter than the taste of her lips.

Just as she taught him the intricacies of her body. He had taught her how to use her tongue to entice, plague... tease.

She was a fast learner.

He knew knew how her hot cream felt gushing against the tip of his cock.

He had waited forever for the woman to succumb to his abilities. He wondered how he had kept it together long enough that first time? He was certain he would blow his load the minute he pushed inside her opening.

He loved watching his girth disappear into that pink crevice. It felt agonizingly good to drag his erection along the short dark hairs of her sex.

He could make her come fast and hard... or if the mood struck him, tease her core slowly... excruciatingly so.

She would quiver around him until her felt her frustration at its peak, only then, warming her with his cum. He loved coming inside her. He loved watching her come.

Her hot mouth had engulfed his shaft, a vision designed to bring him to his knees.

That slow bobbing motion that drove him up the fucking walls...

He hadn’t expected her to swallow.

He had pulled out yes, but not in time.
She had... the first few spurts...

He didn’t have the willpower to remove his cock from such an inviting home... not at first.

He tried to feel bad about his lapse but the sensation just felt too good to even pretend such an impossible feat.

This was getting him no where fast.

He glanced down to the rigid imprint of his cock pressed against his trousers.

He sighed mentally, taking in a long drag of the cigar. The heady smoke rolled about his tongue, the sweet flavor tickling his senses.

To be at the mercy of a woman’s whim was a shit-poor thing.

But found in this case... he enjoyed the prospect.

He relaxed his mind, forcing his body back from the edge of a very, very nice precipice.

Oh well... it was a subject best left for another time and certainly, another place.

The man took in his surroundings turning his thoughts to the sounds about him.

The buzzing bees, the whir of a hummingbird’s wings... the rustle of the wind in the trees.

He would discuss this moment of solitude with Lizzy tonight, he decided.

He would discuss it in vivid detail.

The man’s grin was an impish one.

Red Reddington was a detail oriented type of guy suddenly.

It would be... and intense talk.

Chapter End Notes

BlueFedora posted a few pictures back in August on Lizzington Forever as incentive to us writers.

More than a few grabbed my attention and have inspired quite a few scenes.

What apparently worked for this chapter... was a woman kneeling in front of a man in the shower.
June 1

Red had reluctantly left his musings and the pleasant atmosphere of quiet solitude his walk had afforded him.

The man was only allowed short personal intervals these days.

The business empire he headed demanded much of his time and energies.

In the past, he had liked to keep busy. But Lizzy was a large part of his life now and finding time for that relationship was rapidly becoming a priority.

Red entered the side door of the kitchen. He was pleasantly surprised to find the woman sitting on one of the stools situated around the large island in the center of the area.

Nora held up the freshly brewed pot of coffee. The new state-of-the-art brew master system he had ordered the Chef seemed to constantly be put to work on the premises these days due to the varying shifts of the residents.

Much of the kitchen had changed since they took residence. Gone were the normal sized household appliances, replaced by industrial sized equipment.

Due to the influx of people who worked and lived on the property, it had been a necessity not only for storage purposes, but for Nora’s sanity.

The woman had looked at him with profound relief when the new dishwashers, double ovens and so on were set in place.

Little did she know, this had only been a start. When they left for Mark’s, the entire kitchen was to be overhauled and outfitted with a Chef’s Kitchen that Nora deserved.

“Thank you, yes.” he smiled his ‘hello’ and gratitude, nodding that he would love some of the hearty brew she had prepared.

Nora obediently poured a steaming cup. Red had learned long ago, it truly was the simple things in life which provided true happiness.

He savored the first sip, closing his eyes to the aromatic taste, “Nora... you are a Goddess in your own right.”

“You may call me Goddess Caffeina, you sweet talker you.” Nora let him know in no uncertain terms she had heard it all before and it now fell on deaf ears.

He grinned for the fact, turning his attention to the other occupant of the room.

Why don’t you say sweet things like that to me?” Liz asked, sighing lightly for her lot in life.

“You hand me an elixir which tastes like this...” Red hefted his cup, crossing to gently caress Liz’s forehead with a chaste kiss, “and I will.”

“I got your elixir...” Liz muttered under her breath.

Red’s brow arched, his eyes lowering to the woman’s lap, “I know you do, baby.” the man rumbled intimately.

He only wished he had been given the opportunity to drink down her brand of stimulant earlier.

“The way to a man’s heart,” Nora stated emphatically, “is through his stomach.”

“Or the vicinity there of.” Red retorted sotto voce for the younger woman’s ear alone.

Nora did not let on that she had heard the off-colored remark but smiled gently for Elizabeth’s slight blush.

“You guys going to take a few days off now?” Liz forced a brightness to cover the embarrassment the man’s brazen statement had caused. “Wouldn’t kill you, you know.”

“Has Francis been complaining?” Red leaned against the counter top instead of sitting and Liz instantly knew he was just passing through on his way to a more pressing engagement.

Her spirits sank, “Whining is more like it.” she mused. “But Nora is babying him. He’s milking it for all he can, of course.”

“That boy really needs a girlfriend.” was Red’s considered opinion.

“Technically, he has Lia.” Liz reminded.

“An ‘in-house’ girlfriend.” Red pushed away from the counter top sitting his coffee aside, “Where is he?”

“In the dining room.” Liz thought the answer should be obvious. “Where else?”

Liz exchanged resigned glances with Nora. They had been discussing the hope that ‘business as usual’ would be suspended for a while after all the commotion and uproar but it looked like that prospect had ‘flown out the proverbial window’.

Francis was happily downing bacon and eggs upon Red’s entrance but he put the plate aside upon recognition of the new arrival.

Francis stood, his expression a serious one, “So where do we stand?” he was not one for formalities. “With Lizzy not in the room, I mean.”

Red appreciated the candor, “While I intensely dislike how you made your point,” he shot the kid a warning glare, “I can not dispute the results.”

“What the hell was in your head?” Francis disgusted.
“I am damaged goods, Francis.” Red had long since accepted. “To say I have issues is an understatement.”

“I’ll say,” it was agreed. Francis resumed his seat, pulling his plate back.

“It isn’t easy for me to extend my trust.”

“You don’t say.” Francis appeared surprised.

Silas pushed his frame through the side door just at that moment, catching the last of the conversation, “Who don’t we trust now?”

He continued into the room, his expression a benign one as he waited patiently on both or either man to answer his inquiry.

“Is it Dembe because I know for certain,” he continued straight faced, “he was the one who took that little bottle of ‘82 Chateau Haut-Brion you so cherished.”

“You took the wine.” Red corrected, finding a seat at the head of the table.

“I didn’t take it per se.” Silas wanted the misconception cleared up. “It is under my sterling care until an auspicious occasion arises at which time, it will be brought out, in all its glory for a celebratory christening by one and all.”

“You chugged it to wash down a chili dog.” Red reminded distastefully.

Silas looked off, scanning his memory until happening upon the incident in question, “It did have a nice finish.” Silas remembered, enjoying Red’s pained grimace.

“You are the reason I hid the ‘78 Chateau Lafite Rothschild.” Red sighed his discontent. “So you will not get soused one night and drink it along with the rest of your three or four six-packs of inferior vintages.” he chided. “Have you heard from our other errant wine connoisseur?”

“I am a connoisseur. Coors is the best out there.” Silas took umbrage.

“Dembe checked in about an hour ago,” Francis answered the real enquiry between mouthfuls of succulent eggs, “everything is smooth sailing so far. He said he might take a few days downtime if he wasn’t needed here after the transactions have been completed.”

“What?” Red had noted Silas’ dark scowl.

“Oh, nothing,” the large man shrugged massive shoulders but at Red’s look, “… I was going to ask for a few days as well. But if Dembe–”

“What’s Vadik down now?” Red wanted to know.

“You should just let me cap that guy, Silas.” Francis was of the considered opinion. “Save you some grief.”

Silas was moot on the matter, “I don’t feel right going if Dembe isn’t going to be here.”

“We will manage.” Red understood about ‘obligations’. “Do you need assistance?”

“I’ll go.” Francis was eager.

Silas sighed, “And have a stray shot accidentally take Vadik out? No thanks.” the man had lifted a stern brow. “If anyone is going to take the little asshole out, it will be me.”

“Yeah, when pigs fly.” Francis stated his belief.

Francis glanced askew at Red. He had hoped to have more time to iron out details of the situation between them.

“So... you guys were talking about Francis laying a kiss on Liz.”

Both men allowed their startlement.

“How the hell do you know anything about that?” Francis had kept mum and he was certain Red would not have said a thing.

“Did you use your tongue?” Silas was understandably interested.

Red sighed audibly, “Both you assholes know I am twice Lizzy’s age,” he snapped, “wouldn’t that conceivably give a moments doubt in either of your feeble minds if the situation was reversed?”

“I can’t imagine being that old.” Francis couldn’t.

“I can’t imagine having that much doubt ... well, about anything concerning me.” Silas was just as truthful.

Red let it go, “Suffice to say, I know if something happens to me, you will take care of Lizzy, Francis and that gives me peace of mind.”

“Are you implying I’m the inferior choice to the... boy.” Silas was affronted, sitting at an empty seat at the table.

“I’d sooner leave her to the mercies of a lion pit.” Red laughed at the absurdity.

“You’re too old.” Francis waved a dismissive hand ignoring Red’s look of incredulous disbelief for such a callous remark. “Rest assured, Red. Nothing will ever happen between me and Lizzy... until, I don’t know... you die.” he shared a wry grin with Silas.

“Unless you appreciate a challenge, don’t hold your breath waiting for that to happen.” Red dismissed the notion. “Other than that, remember, I can still haunt you in death.”

Francis’ smile slipped a tad, “Yeah but, you won’t have corporeal form and can’t hurt me.” he took hope.

Red stared at him, his eyes expressionless, “Never underestimate my reach, Francis.” he stated in a droll tone.

Francis sat straighter, running his finger along his fork, “I don’t believe in that shit.”

“Yes, you do.” Red goaded the boy.

Francis swallowed hard, given pause for thought.

“I have come bearing good tidings.” Liz brushed through the connecting doors of the kitchen, plate in one hand, coffee pot in another.

She sat the food before Francis much to Red’s chagrin, “From the love of your life, which I believe today, is Nora?” she checked.
Francis seemed stumped for an answer.

“Silas,” Liz beamed her guard a smile, filling his cup gingerly, “are you hungry?”

“What the hell?” Red spread his hand expressively.

“You are ready.” she chuckled having hoped just for that reaction.

“I should hope so.” he settled a little.

“Are you resting your poor little leg, Francis.” Liz nudged the bandaged area purposely.

“Oww!” the man raised an uproar. “You have an evil streak woman!”

Liz smiled happily at nothing in particular, enjoying Silas’ throaty chuckle for her antics.

“Nora wanted me to check on you,” Liz pulled a ‘poor thing’ face, “I checked on you.”

“Can’t you do something about her?” Francis rubbed his leg soothingly, “That was just cold, man!”

Red unfolded his newspaper, “Lizzy, please don’t be so cold to Francis.” he dutifully responded.

“Uh huh,” she replied sweetly, “Francis, do you want more tea?”

“Why, is it Red’s special blend?” the man snapped his pique.

Liz smiled prettily, “I’ll bring you a glass,” she rounded the table, leaning to kiss the older man’s mouth fleetingly, “and I will bring you breakfast,” she stared at him, “because I love you.”

Red did not miss Silas’ pointed lift of his brows at the woman’s casual proclamation just as she kissed him once again.

He felt his body stiffen, though was experienced enough to cover it artfully. He smiled back at the blissful little face, his system reeling in truth.

What the fuck had that been?

Silence was strained after Liz’s departure.

Having followed Lizzy’s trek, he drew his eyes back to the table and found Francis was scowling darkly at him.

Silas was sitting quietly, his eyes intent.

“What?”

“You didn’t like the kiss?” Francis was trying to decide, “or the... what she said.”

“What the hell are you blabbering about?” Red snipped, “And why is it any of your damned—”

“You flinched.” Francis accused ready to be upset for Lizzy if need be.

“What the... I most certainly did not.” Red denied vehemently.

“You did too!” Francis countered, “Maybe not flinched but... something.” he lowered his hiss so his voice wouldn’t carry to the kitchen as he leaned closer. “I think you suck!”

Red rolled his eyes, “I didn’t flinch and I love that she expresses her emotions so freely now.”
“You did!” Francis snapped his belief.

“Do you because,” Silas brought his cup to his lips in a thoughtful manner, “the idiot is right. Something went down between you guys. Are you upset she...” he trailed off, knowing Red very well understood his train of thought.

Silas knew they had not expressed that emotion... love, before. As a matter of fact, he was very aware that Red longed to hear Elizabeth express such emotions to him.

So the question was... what the hell was Reddington’s problem.

“You didn’t say it back either!” Francis hissed.

“I didn’t flinch and I’m not fucking upset.” Red pulled his coffee closer, ignoring Francis. “She inadvertently touched a... tender spot.” he lied, knowing as much but Red Reddington was an excellent liar.

He could sell it if he truly wanted. He had to ask himself, one, why he was lying in the first place and two, why he felt he had to sell it.

“I did fall on my face yesterday, you know.”

Francis narrowed his eyes at the man, before hesitantly picking up his fork unsure he believed his friend.

Silas did not believe him, but the matter was dropped for the time being, Red was grateful.

He needed time to analyze this issue himself.

“Well you just better corral your woman, is all I’m saying because,” Francis returned to his food with but one begrudging remark, “to kick a guy while he’s down is just not a cool thing to do... I have tender spots as well, ya know.”

“She didn’t kick you, she nudged you.” Silas pointed out, adding more cream to his coffee.

“Same difference.” Francis snapped. “It hurt really bad.”

“Nice grammar.” Silas mentioned in passing. “And I have the urge to kill you, so be grateful she got to it first.”

“Well, it did hurt.” the young man pouted.

Red sat his paper aside, as Lizzy brought in his breakfast. She smiled impishly at the man before heading back in to talk to Nora about the evening’s meal.

“Are you going to eat that bacon?” the kid asked politely having perused Red’s plate.

“Yes, Francis.” Red sniped. “I had planned to.”

Francis reached for the jam, “You’re an old grouch today.”

“Getting shot in the head doesn’t agree with me.”

Silas hid his grin behind his coffee cup.

Francis spread the grape jam thoughtfully on his toast, “Well, I was shot too and I’m in an excellent mood, that’s all I’m saying.”

Red and Silas exchanged bemused glances.

“...So,” Silas moved on, “what’s on the agenda for today?”

“You tell me.” Red was curious as to the other man’s decision.

“No, I’ll stay until Dembe gets here. I’ll tell my people to handle Vadik’s situation and hope all turns out well.”

“You can leave, Silas.” Red’s tone had altered. “Anya would want you to–”

“I think I’ll take Liz’s advice,” the large man sat back, his mood a contemplative one, “maybe it will scare Vadik into another direction if nothing else.”

“Something has to change with that guy,” Francis stated gloomily, “he’s a royal pain in the ass.”

Silas shrugged, “I’ll tell him it’s a ‘no go’ this time. He doesn’t have to know that my men are there.”

Red nodded minutely, “What ever you decide but the option is always open, you know that.”

“Yeah.” Silas leaned forward, a serious expression on his face. “You gonna eat that bacon?”

And hour later found the men busy on the phones. Red had two conference calls going at once.

Liz eased into the large office, finding a seat in an out-of-the-way place.

She enjoyed observing the process.

Red’s personality changed considerably in these moments.

He was brusque, no-nonsense and clipped in his speech patterns.

She got to see another side to the man. He never sat still, his stride slow and confident as he issued orders, made hard decisions or threatened consequences were his demands questioned or hesitated over.

There was an essence of power emanating from his person that Liz found exhilarating.

Francis too, seemed entirely different. A dark scowl was often on the handsome face, the boyish grin never displayed, even his tone would alter.

Francis was light and breezy and fun.

The Francis she witnessed in the room today and oft time, in past negotiations, was none of the above.

But the second their eyes would catch, the guy would do something to let her know, Francis was still in there somewhere.

The last time, he had snapped an ultimatum to the man on the other end of the line but with Lizzy, he had crossed his eyes, stuck his tongue out to the side, imitating the gesture of someone being hanged.

Lizzy had giggled appreciatively. She smiled her happiness when Red shook his head at the byplay, continuing with his own part of the business with a sharp tone as though nothing untoward was happening on his end of the line.

Taking possession of Cheung’s business dealings and supply system would run smoothly or it would not.

Both men understood that acquiring new acquisitions was a studied process. Problems must be handled expediently, dissension even more so.

Both men were well versed in the intricacies of the world they inhabited.

Red hung up the phone waiting patiently for Francis to finish his own conversation.

“That about does it except for–” Red glanced at Lizzy who sat wide-eyed and eager, hanging on his every word.

“The women.” Francis sat back, easing his leg into a less cramped position. He massaged the area, grimacing.

“What women?” Liz asked either man.

“Cheung dealt with human trafficking.” Liz was reminded.

Francis popped some pain pills, grabbing his water bottle from a nearby desk, “We are in the process of shutting the sites down but, there are other issues that go along with the problem.”

Liz turned to a more talkative recipient, “Like what?” she was curious, “Are you going to get the authorities involved?”

“That would be a cluster fuck.” Red knew from experience. “We tried that early on.”

“We have better programs.” Francis showed his disdain for the regular government methods.

“They will be given access to counseling.” Red had set up agencies long ago. “Money to start a new life and a chance to pursue a vocation if they so desire.”

“...You do all that for those poor women?”

“Someone should, don’t you think?” Red lifted brows, “After what they have been subjected to?”

Liz beamed her pride.

“Most of them just need down time for a while,” Francis understood the concept, “the money we offer has no strings. It’s just there for their use.”

“They’ve been told what to do for so long, that option is one they can make of their own free will.” Red finished. “But it’s not an easy road to recovery as you can imagine.”

In reality, Liz didn’t think she could imagine, truth told. How could they ever recover from such atrocities?

Red rubbed his eyes absently, an ache was building in his temples.

Speaking of recovery.

“You guys should take a break now.” she suggested. “You were shot in the head.” she narrowed her eyes, ready for an argument, “You have new flesh wounds.” she smirked as Francis balked at the term... loudly.

“Lizzy...”

“Boys, the world can survive without you for a couple hours.”

She had seen Red cupping his forehead and Francis rubbing his leg an hour ago, now, both men looked ragged.

Francis sighed, his shoulders slumping dejectedly, “Red, I am going to bail on you... just for a little while.” the young man looked beat. “Can’t believe how wiped I feel, what the hell?” he spread his hands helplessly, “But I’m making wrong decisions, I think I was too namby-pamby on that last negotiation. Did you catch any of it?” he was concerned.

“It went well.” Red disagreed. “You go, get some rest.”

“It’s a toss up.” Francis retorted. “Which one of us is the most ashen.” he indicated Red’s own complexion.

Red chuckled, “We are fashionably Goth.”

Liz arose, sighing mentally, “Well, I don’t believe it. Two men actually acting sensibly for once.”

She had expected more fight from the two.

“Yeah, as soon as I get some nourishment inside me, I’m going down for the count.” Francis hobbled his way toward the kitchen. “For a couple hours anyway.”

“You just ate!” Liz was flabbergasted.

“Don’t judge me!” Francis called back over his shoulder.

Liz turned questioning eyes Red’s way.

“Threatening people makes him hungry.” Red smiled.

The silence came but it was a comfortable one, at least for Elizabeth.

“Are you okay?” she had noticed the man’s quietness however. “Are you thinking about those women?”

He shook his head, “Just a slight headache coming on.” he smiled absently, his real interest for what had occurred between them earlier however foremost in his mind, “Do you have a moment?”

The man was not one to procrastinate. He dreaded the upcoming confrontation but...

“Maybe we could meet in a few minutes, in the master?” he had a few things to tie up, holding his phone aloft, “This shouldn’t take much longer.”

“Red, is there something wrong?” she sensed a problem now, but he allayed her fears.

“Not wrong, no,” he was quick to reassure, “just something I want to talk over with you.”

“Oh.” that didn’t sound bad at all. Was he wanting her opinion on something? “Then I’ll see you back there in about twenty minutes?”
“Perfect.” Red was left to his own devices for a spell as he pondered the new development which had sprung up unexpectedly.

♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥

Liz was ensconced in the large chair, file in hand when he entered. She had a cup of tea sitting beside her. She sat the file aside, smiling brightly for him.

“Work all done?”

He sat across from her, making himself comfortable on the long bench at the end of the bed.

“All finished for the day.” he was relieved matters had worked out in that area at least.

She scooted closer, laying her forearms on her knees, “So what do we have to discuss that has you so out-of-sorts?”

“Am I?” he asked, “Out-of-sorts?”

The woman remained serious, “Something is bother you, right?”

Red had to agree on that point. He needed to test the hypothesis he had arrived at upon, considering what had happened earlier today.

The man lifted his hand, which Elizabeth took, allowing herself to be manipulated as Red situated her by his side.

He cocked his head, smiling gently, his hand moving, thumb running down the side of her hair as he place a stray strand back into place.

Liz loved his touch, reacting to it, closing her eyes as the man made his move.

Red was experienced both as a lover and as a man. Liz got the benefit of that expertise and she was not exactly unhappy about the fact.

Her smaller hand rested on Red’s chest. She cuddled close welcoming the feel of his mouth capturing her lips.

The warm hollow of his mouth drew her senses into its inviting depths. She found herself lifting her arms automatically, wanting to be closer.

Red smelled so good, always. She especially liked his scent after a shower. He would splash aftershave but his natural smell was very evocative in itself. It screamed male... power... sensuality.

The feel of his arms around her created an aura of security and strength she cherished. But there was a more persuasive emotion invading her senses at the moment.

Unfortunately, Red broke that moment much to Liz’s dismay and shock, “W-What?”

The blue eyes stared at the man, totally upset.

Red hadn’t felt it... the odd sensation of before. Lizzy’s lips had tasted sweet and warm and intoxicating, as always.

“What was that?” the woman took exception.
Red chuckled, caressing her lips lovingly, “I’ve been thinking for the last few hours and there is something I should share with you.”

“I thought we were about to ‘share’... you know,” Liz was pretty sure the moment was going in the right direction, at least, “what’s with you pulling back on me?”

She chuckled as well after a fashion, feeling more comfortable with the man’s expression saying, ‘not a chance, baby’.

“I didn’t pull back,” he corrected, “I was experimenting.”

“I’m all for experimentation, Mr. Reddington.” she curved her body closer still, her tone suggestively seductive.

The full sensual mouth teased his with light, evasive pressure.

The now familiar jolt traversed the man’s frame and once again, he broke the contact.

Elizabeth had felt the disconnect this time however, and was up and off the support in seconds, severing all avenues of contact as quickly as possible.

“Did I do something wrong?” she gaped, stunned at the man. “Are you upset about...earlier?”

Red had the grace to be bothered, “It’s not what you think.” he lifted pacifying hands. “Let me explain–”

“Yeah well, you better explain.” she was suddenly livid. “What the hell was that, Red? What?” she felt a flush of embarrassment. Questioning her earlier actions, questioning herself suddenly...

Did he not like how she kissed? Had she come on too strong earlier? What was going on?

“You said we could discuss difficulties that arose,” he reminded hastily, “you said you were in agreement with taking that action.”

Liz tried to calm herself, “You can’t stand for me to kiss you? I think that’s a little more than–”

“It has nothing to do with... that.” he sighed heavily, “Hear me out.” he lifted scolding eyes.

Liz swallowed hard, the threat of tears on the horizon. She glanced about aimlessly, her world teetering on the verge of collapse but at length, she sat in the chair, having no recourse but to ride the turbulent storm out.

Red studied her face, his eyes softening, “Let me preface this by stating, it has nothing to do with you or anything you have done or not done.”

Liz lifted troubled eyes.

“I told Francis earlier,” the man heaved a heavy sigh, “I have... issues, baby. Deep, dark places inside me that haven’t seen the light of day in decades... longer.” which was an understatement he knew.

“You give that side of me light and truthfully,” he sought her out, “more and more of late, its like a port in the storm that keeps me afloat most days.”

Liz sat, hugging her body tightly, his words giving her hope.
“I told myself after Carla I would never allow a connection that strong to develop with a woman again.” he shook his head. “… It hurt, she hurt me, Elizabeth. I didn’t believe I could feel that lousy but… it… it was bad for a time.”

He disliked sharing that part of himself but to make this work, he had to be brutally honest with himself and this woman sitting so gravelly still before him.

“When I decided,” he hesitated. Was it too much too soon? “After you left Tom, the dynamics of our relationship for lack of a better term changed... at least, for me.” he wanted to reach out physically, but sensed this was not the time, not yet.

“Elizabeth?” he mused, taking his time, working out what and how to share his emotions.

The woman waited on pins and needles, hanging on the man’s every utterance.

“It’s been said, and I agree with the assessment, that,” he stared at the hardwood floor raptly, his hands twisting slowly together, “I can be very calculating... very single minded about something I want. I think that is a true statement.”

He lifted honest eyes, “I decided I wanted you,” he was quick to reassess, “to experience you. I held no illusions it could ever be more.” he smiled wistfully for the fact, “And I felt fucking less a man for that decision back then.”

He shifted his weight, the thought troubling him. “It didn’t stop me from pursuing you in every capacity granted me. I wanted you sexually. I had to come to terms with that weakness. But once I did,” he shrugged, “nothing else mattered.

“You–” she was so fearful of where this was going, “you consider that a weakness.”

“A very nice one for me, not so much for you.” he conceded, “I put my needs above yours but with full intention that, when the time came,” he allotted, “I would step back and allow you to leave whenever you said it was over and done.”

“What are you talking about?” she stood, too anxious to remain seated. She jerked from his attempt to capture her hand.

“I thought, once you had... shared my bed, sooner or later, the interest would fade,” he stated earnestly, “a young woman as vital and–”

“I’m so sick of this!” she snapped.

“Allow me to finish.” he arose as well, his tone altering.

Elizabeth bit her lip to keep the trembling to a minimum. The blue eyes ripped the man’s heart from his body.

“Don’t look at me like that, baby.” he closed his eyes to her anguish, “This is killing me–”

“Good!” she turned away, swiping at the tears rolling down her cheeks.

Red lifted his hands only to lower them, “I need to touch you so fucking badly.”

She moved further away.

“When you stayed, when we grew closer, I was in Seventh Heaven.” he continued. “I simply could not believe you found some kind of merit in me but over the days you convinced me of your sincerity.” he cut to the chase, not certain how much more she would stand.

“One of those dark places lit with such luminosity, it warmed my soul, Elizabeth.” he beseeched, “For a man like me... do you have any idea what that means?”

There were a myriad of things she didn’t understand, the foremost being his statement concerning, ‘a man like him’.

“I know the depth of my own emotions, I’ve been attempting to tell you.” he emphasized, “What I don’t know for certain, is the depth of yours and I don’t think you do either. When you said you loved me—”

He was becoming frustrated with his inability to reach the woman.

Elizabeth was floundering. She thought all this had been cleared up.

“Earlier today,” he brought the topic full circle, “when you said, I love you, something dawned on me.” his brow furrowed darkly, “you said it so off-handedly, so causally... as if it didn’t really hold any true meaning for you—”

“What?” had she made him believe such a foolish thing? “No, I just... I know the guys were there. I didn’t want to embarrass you,” she tried to explain her reasoning, “but I felt so happy... so...” she struggled with the words, “everything was so good again. I wanted to share that feeling with you. The world really, I guess.”

Had she been naïve, “Was it too... aggressive. Should I have—”

“No, it occurred to me that we haven’t really said it except...” he shifted to another foot, his hands expressively ‘speaking’ along with the words, “when we are being intimate.”

“That’s not true... is it?” she searched her memory. “And so what if it is?”

Red hesitated, pondering the legitimate question. They could share their love physically. But there should be more to their relationship than that, right?

Trying to make sense of his jumbled thoughts, he shook his head, grimacing as a sharp pain tore through his skull.

Right... priorities were making themselves known.

He had receive a good blow to the head. He smirked inwardly at the unintentional pun before sobering.

He needed to focus, get his thought back on track or he risked losing Lizzy.

“Because I feel the emotions at the other times,” he motioned with his entire body, “my point being, we haven’t... explored that avenue. My question is, I guess is,” how to state it articulately, “a lot of yesterday is jumbled for me, fragmented.”

He had sought to recover bits and pieces all to no avail because it was like a large puzzle missing key pieces.

“The moment you said, I love you, is crystal clear,” his eyes held hers steadily, “but what did the words mean to you, truly. I won’t be hurt or offended if—”

with you... that I love what we have and that I want to explore the possibilities open to us.”

“Of course,” he agreed, “that’s what I though you meant.” he tried to hide his disappointment.

“What is wrong with all that?” she expounded fretfully.

“Nothing.” he soothed expertly.

“You said we would be honest with each other!” she sensed he was holding back crucial information.

“Perhaps we have had enough honesty for one day.” he mused wearily, sensing some things himself.

“I handled this badly. “ he rubbed his forehead, the ache suddenly excruciating.

“Don’t do this.” the woman grasped his forearms, plaintively beseeching the man.

“Baby, I’m not trying to hurt or upset you,” he cupped her face lovingly, “just the opposite.”

“Then talk to me!” she insisted. “I know it’s hard for you to share yourself. I know you’re a private man.”

“Not with you, never with you.” his lips brushed her forehead, his voice a husky whisper, “it’s okay, everything is....” he enfolded her in his arms, “good, we’re good.”

She shook her head unable to articulate her fears, just clinging tightly to the man for support and guidance as to what the hell was going on.

“I can wait,” he knew he could, “until it’s right for you too. Until...” he cupped her head gently, closing his eyes to the feel of her in his arms.

Until the words meant as much to her as they did to him.

“How can I make you understand?” she pulled back enough to see his features. “Red, if something happened to you... if you weren’t in my life? I don’t think....” her fingers curled about his lapels.

“I don’t think I could go on. I wouldn’t want to. That’s how much you mean to me,” she was desperate for him to comprehend what she was saying. “I felt that... when you got shot, when I thought...” she refused to say it even, “is that what you mean? Is that what you are trying to say?”

“Don’t talk like that.” he grasp her shoulders almost roughly, “of course you will go on. I’ve made provisions for that day.”

“You are so stupid sometimes!” the blue eyes filled with unshed tears, “You are not only missing the point.” she snapped her annoyance. “But you can’t make provisions for something like that. I have to be allowed to feel whatever it is I feel.”

Red wasn’t pleased at all, “Francis will be here to take care of you. This is off-topic.” he snapped his growing disillusionment.

“Off topic?” she threw up her hands, her frustration at a boiling point, “I don’t want Francis. I want you.”

Red turned aside, “I can’t promise that.” his line of work alone and too, he was so much her senior, “and you know as much... don’t do this to me.”

“Do this to you?” she was beside herself, “You are the one telling me you don’t want my love.”
He jerked his head about his mouth agape, “My, God... is that what you’ve heard?”

She spread her hands out, “It’s what you said!”

Red’s eyes closed, his head dropping back, “I never said any such thing.” he grated. “You said the words, yes... but how much emotion was behind them?” his temper flared for in his opinion she was being unreasonable.

“Those words mean everything to me... everything!” he stressed. “When you say them, I want you to feel them to the depths of your soul and right now... I don’t think you do. How can you?”

Elizabeth stood, ashen faced, totally lost.

“We’ve been together, what... almost a month?” he calmed, “How can you possibly know what you’re feeling. Everything is new and wonderful... at least on my part. I’m thinking about the long haul, are you?”

“Do you know what you are feeling?” she countered.

“I’ve lived more of life, so yes, I know Elizabeth.”

“Don’t pull that, I’m older and wiser, crap on me.” the woman flared. “I know my own mind.”

“You loved Tom.” he reminded. “I think a part of you still does or maybe... the idea of him.”

“You think wrong.” she scoffed her disgust, “The great Red Reddington can be wrong, can’t he? You’ve made a gross error in judgement.”

He quieted, trying to control his temperament.

“I know there are no fairytale endings out here in the world,” she continued, “I know any relationship takes hard work and due diligence. Why do you think I stuck it out with Tom? Did you think I was really content with him? I wasn’t.”

Red was taken aback, “...You seemed to be.”

“Contrary to popular opinion, I’m not stupid.” Liz begged to differ on the matter, “I could sense something was wrong. Warning bells were going off in the first few months.” she confided.

“I chalked it up to marital discord... the honeymoon period had ended, real life began.” she glared at the man across from her, “I didn’t turn and run when I so easily could have... I didn’t put my head in the sand.”

Red blinked, unaware of any of what Lizzy was sharing.

“I knew there were problems but what marriage doesn’t have problems?” she raged.

“You just deal with it or you bail... okay, I should have bailed but in my mind.” she stepped closer, confronting the problem and the man, “what you accuse me of not being able feel... to understand,” she sneered, “I felt and understood all too well!”

Her eyes hardened, her back straightening, “I was hanging in, trying to salvage something I had vowed to God to try and work out... for the long haul!”

Red was given food for thought, growing quiet.
“And who is to say what you felt won’t happen this time,” he questioned softly, “with me.”

“With Tom, I felt nothing but frustration and smothered,” she tightened her fists, the frustration apparent, “But with you, aside from you pissing me off, I feel optimistic, excited... I can breathe again.”

The silence stretched into minutes. Liz was angry. She refused to be the first to speak. Childish, yes. Petty? All right, but it was what it was.

“I was hoping... for more, that’s all.” the man reluctantly admitted his flaws. “I was hoping... all right, it was childish of me, petty even,” he realized, “I should be grateful for what you have given. And I am. Really.”

Liz’s head lifted, a bemused expression on her face. He felt such things?

“What do you mean you were hoping for more?” she was hoping he would elaborate. Keep talking. Communicating.

Red usually said just enough to pacify. That he was allowing her a glimpse into his private side was amazing even though it was a somewhat frightening journey in this instance.

She had no idea where this was heading or even why he had brought the subject up.

“We’ve come so far in such a short time.” the man reseated himself. “I honestly am not fully aware how we arrived at this point in time. I am only glad we have, Elizabeth. Please don’t think otherwise.”

She remained moot on the matter not certain what to comment on or what not.

“I remember the early times,” he did, vividly, “... you hated me.”

“Hate is a strong word.” Liz objected, embarrassed for her behavior before.

“But an apt one.” he reminded.

She could not debate the statement, but there was a flaw in his logic.

“Red, you were giving me every reason to run away from the marriage I was fighting to maintain.” she sighed. “You were giving me the perfect out. I think... I was more angry with myself for wanting to give up. Take the easy route in leaving Tom.”

Red laced his fingers, tightening them painfully. If he could have only been straight forward with her, told her what he knew of Tom. But his fears, again won out. He thought, to tell her that he had hired Tom, would have meant he would have lost her.

Had he known...

“All that has changed.” she stated the facts as she knew them. “That is the past, all that matters now is the future.” she said, uncertainty in her tone. “Isn’t it?”

“It’s my fault.” the man shouldered the burden, “The only time I’ve expressed my love is when I’m trying to get between your legs or you were between mine.”

She fought the blush and won.

“I want to make it perfectly clear,” he held her attention, “what I feel transcends the physical intimacy we share.”

“I feel the same.” she blurted.

“It is very... difficult for me to vocalize my emotions.” he confided. “I’ve become wary of doing so, as I stated. It’s easier for me to ‘show’ you through my actions.”

She could find no fault with the statement.

“That’s the easy way, for me,” he reiterated, “as I said and that is not acceptable to me any longer.” he was angry for his lapse in showing her proper emotional attachment. “You deserve better than that.”

“You are such a complicated man.” she was only beginning to realize as much.

“A guarded one.” he concluded, “I have to mentally remind myself, it’s okay to let down my guard with you. It’s okay for the walls to drop.”

Elizabeth touched his face. He instantly grasped her hand, turning his lips into the warm, dry palm for a brief kiss.

“The years have hardened me, Elizabeth. I am not... what... who I used to be.” his brow furrowed darkly, “I am not happy with what I have become some days. I wish you could have know me... before.”

“I like you just the way you are now.”

He stared long and hard at those blue eyes. Windows to her soul...

“I wish I could be better for you.” he stated quietly. “I wish there wasn’t so much baggage.”

Elizabeth knew the man would not be so disconcerted if he cared nothing for her.

What was Red trying to convey?

It was clear Red was truly troubled, truly upset. She was no longer certain, whatever it was... pertained to her however.

He seemed even more upset that he couldn’t articulate the words to make her understand exactly what the issue was.

She took a moment to reflect on all that had been said, a thought finally coming to the fore...

“As long as you care for me,” she explained her point of view, “as long as you don’t shut me out...” the small fingers grasp his tightly, “we’ll be okay, Red.”

He nodded minutely.

“I’m glad you came to me today,” she cocked her head, regaining his attention, “something was bothering you, something wasn’t quite right, was it. And you shared that feeling with me.” she realized what had gone down finally, “it had nothing to do with my kiss, did it.”

She leaned slowly, her lips gently placed to his.

The man stood very still under her guidance, closing his eyes to the myriad of emotions cascading through his mind.
Elizabeth’s lips parted, breaking the sweet kiss. She smiled gently up at the brooding man. “You didn’t pull back.”

“I didn’t pull back before.”

“No,” she sighed happily, “no, you didn’t. It’s just that you won’t stand still for bullshit... of any sort.”

Her smile widened with understanding, “You had to get it out... set it right between us, didn’t you.”

“I wanted to make sure it was right between us.” he corrected.

Elizabeth studied the enigma before her, “I don’t think it’s ever been so right.”

He downed his head then... smiled, “You think?”

She nodded slowly.

“You stood up to me.” his eyes twinkled almost mischievously.

Liz considered the statement, “Wasn’t I supposed to?”

“You were pissed at me.”

“I certainly was.” she concurred.

“Was.” he needed confirmation.

She inclined her head, “... Was.”

His smile came again, “Will you blow me?” he tested the waters now that things seemed to be back on an even keel, “if I tell you how very much, I love you.”

She cut him a wry look, “I don’t think so.” she took his hand leading the man across the shining hardwood floor as she went. “What I will do, is lay here with you for a while.” she indicated the neatly made bed, “and let you get some rest.”

“I don’t need to rest,” his hands shook free instantly, cupping her hips as he stepped casually into the space between her legs.

He glanced down to where their bodies met. His look one of masculine approval. “Shall I tell you what I do need?”

“Oh gosh,” she bit her lip anxiously, “I might think you only loved me for what’s between my legs if you did that Mr. Reddington.”

He sighed lightly, his head falling back, “I asked for that one, didn’t I.” he realized.

She chuckled her mirth, “You sure did.” she appeared well pleased with herself. “We had a rough night and not a in a good way. I’m exhausted. I’m going to take a nap for the simple fact, I can. The question is,” she lifted perfectly arched brows, “will you be joining me or do I have to go get Francis?”

Red eyes deepened, “No one sleeps with you but me.”

“But Francis looked like he needed a nap,” she pointed out, teasing, “you state that you are all bright eyed and bushy tailed.”

“My cock isn’t bushy,” he pushed his growing hardness forward, “but it is... other things.”

She gave him a scolding look, “Are you going to behave?”

“I doubt it.” he told the truth.

“I’ll be really, really nice to you later tonight if you do.”

“...How nice?” the tension in his shoulders was better but truthfully, his head was spiking each time he moved it too quickly. She didn’t have to know.

“Really, really.... really nice.”

“Blow job nice?”

“You liked that, huh?” she perked up. “Sure, I’m flexible, why not. I might even let you reciprocate.”

“You’ll let me.” he chuckled.

“Sure, why not.” she cut him a flirtatious up and under look. “You’re pretty good at it when you put your mind to it but right now,” she mused, “I don’t think you could put your whole heart and soul into the act, am I right?”

She touched his temple lovingly.

Red closed his eyes to her touch, the cool fingers feeling so good on his skin, “Okay, but just for an hour or so...” he sensed he had done a little too much today, “don’t think you’ll get your way each and every time you use these methods though.”

“What methods?” she asked innocently.

“Tease the cock, method.” he was only too happy to supply the answer.

Liz kicked her shoes off, sliding into the bed. Red closed the shutters, blocking the sunshine and the outside world.

He rid himself of his own shoes and belt but was suddenly too tired to care about the rest of his attire.

Liz was situating the blankets, tossing his side back for his entrance.

He cuddled close, his arms about her small frame. The quiet of the room settled about them. Elizabeth yawned, sinking down into the warmth of the covers.

The air conditioner and ceiling fan hummed quietly overhead.

The last time Red had been in bed with a woman fully clothed came to mind.

Siberia, dead of winter, freezing his ass off, hoping for a rescue from a rather dire predicament.

The occasion had not been especially pleasant.

There was nothing what-so-ever to compare this moment with the other.

It felt wonderful to simply lay here, feeling Elizabeth’s warmth... the gentle rise and fall of her body.
He closed his eyes, laying his head more securely into the pillow.

His head was hurting but he sensed the pain was only superficial. It was his own fault, jumping back into work too quickly.

The emotional confrontation had not helped either but he had to know where he stood with Elizabeth, so that, he did not regret.

He shut his mind off. It would hold another day.

He needed to rest. He could do that now. He could shut the world out. It was becoming easier and easier.

Red glanced down at the crown of Elizabeth’s shining hair, planting an absent kiss of the fragrant waves.

Yes, it was becoming easier and easier.

Red shut his eyes, breathing in a cleansing breath.

The clock clicked forward....

He tightened his hold on Elizabeth and in minutes, the drowsiness overtook him.

He slept soundly.

♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥

Red opened his eyes to a silent, dusk filled room as he waited for his vision to focus.

Elizabeth lay beside him the naturally light lids closed, her breathing slow and even.

The man lay still, getting his bearings.

A lazy shaft of fading sunlight stole through the neglected slit in the picture window drapes.

He had been more tired than he thought. He checked the clock by the bed, turning his head to do so.

His headache had totally receded.

The warmth of Lizzy’s body seeped into his side. His arm was asleep.

He flexed his hand and fingers but the woman’s nape had cut off the supply of blood.

He grimaced, not wanting to awaken her by risking movement. He deliberated his options.

Luckily, Lizzy shifted a tad. He took the opportunity to withdraw his arm. She snuggled back into her pillow.

Red lay still, content to have her near. He was enjoying this moment of relative quiet.

A discrete knock alerted him to an intruder into that special world he and Lizzy created.

Red was up instantly, quickly extracting the weapon he kept under his pillow. He didn’t expect any real danger but in his world, that was the exact time danger chose to appear.

He crossed rapidly to the door, listening carefully for any tell tale signs of anything amiss.
“Red…” Francis’ whispered voice filtered through the thick portal, “are you there?”

Red opened the door instantly, his gun falling to his side.

“Didn’t want to disturb you guys but we have a problem.” Francis noted the weapon, proceeding undauntedly, “Michael is not answering his phone. He has missed two check-in calls.”

“Red?” Liz’s voice interrupted the conversation.

He glanced back holding up a couple fingers.

“Just a minute, baby, everything is fine.” he returned his attention where it needed to be. “I’ll be out in a moment, can you get Bret on the line for me?”

Francis was doddering away in the next instance.

Red closed the door crossing to flick a bedside lamp on.

Liz sat up in the bed, rubbing her eyes even though the light was not especially bright.

“Who’s Michael?” she stifled a yawn, seeking the man out.

“A colleague.” Red watched her struggle into awareness, “I like your hair like that.” he did. All mussed and unruly and lush.

“Is this colleague a good guy or a bad one?” she slid out of the bed, searching for her shoes.

“A good one.” Red smiled, heading for the bathroom. He needed to slap some water on his face, brush his teeth, take a leak, “he’s fallen off the grid which is not normal. We have to locate him.”

“Can the Bureau help?”

Red set the temperature on the tap, “We have our own network. It’s faster. We’ll locate him.”

She came up behind the man, preparing her own toothbrush, “Can I help?”

He rinsed his mouth which curved into a smile. “You already have.” he dabbed his mouth with a clean cloth, “you just gave me the best afternoon nap I’ve had in years.” he leaned kissing the back of her ear in open affection, “My headache is gone and I feel like my old self again.”

She brushed vigorously, “I knew you had a headache.”

He chuckled, “Past tense.”

He checked himself in the mirror. Pulling his wrinkled shirt off overhead, he walked into the closet, coming out moments later with a shirt and vest on, but his collar open.

“I have to commandeer the office for a while.”

She nodded, “I know.” she watched his retreat in the mirror, “I’ll bring food and coffee.”

He turned, sending her a grateful nod, “Sounds good.”

He stopped in his tracks, retreating in his steps back towards the woman. She turned a confused expression up his way.

“I love you…” he murmured.
A flush rushed her face, a smile playing about her lips, “...I love you too.”

Inclining his head, Red kissed her forehead, retreating from the bathroom, leaving a serenely smiling Elizabeth Keen in his absence.

♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥

A half hour later, she was passing around trays laden with sandwiches, fruit and various desserts Nora had prepared on the spur.

She listened to Red practice his magic.

His tone was light and airy but even she sensed the calculated lightness hid a darker, more menacing undercurrent.

“You are telling me things I already know, Bret.” he was pacing slowly back and forth, wandering aimlessly about the large space of the room. He occasionally pinged a pencil on a nearby surface. “I don’t pay you the ridiculous amount I do for you to tell me things of which I am already aware.”

Francis cringed for the guy on the other end of the line.

“I think what I pay Silas is ridiculous as well.” Red replied to the unheard retort, sighing his annoyance.

She noted the older man was once again showing signs of tension. It must be terribly frustrating for a man like Red to have to delegate a problem.

He was a doer, an achiever. He got things done. He was also a bit of a control freak, she knew.

“He’s been off the grid for forty-eight hours.” Red’s clipped words marched on. His fingers kneaded his nape absently. “That’s an awful long time, Bret. Remember your little sojourn to Cartagena last year?”

Francis nodded knowingly, “We had to pulls his ass out of the fire.”

Liz got the drift.

Red cricked his neck right and left, shifting the muscles tautly, “I want Michael extracted. I don’t care what it takes.” his tone altered slightly.

He sat heavily in his office chair, the pencil between his finger beating a restless rhythm on the leather pad covering the rich mahogany wood.

“I can’t believe I was not informed of this problem two days ago.” he was getting upset, clearly, so he visibly calmed his reaction knowing anger solved no problems.

Liz came up behind the man sitting a fresh cup of coffee before him on the desk.

He smiled absently at her, “The only casualties I care about would be for our side, Bret.” the pleasant tone had returned.

Liz sighed, placing her hand on his shoulders, her fingers automatically massaging the tight bundle of muscles found there.

Red closed his eyes letting out a hasty gasp of gratitude. He dropped his head forward encouraging her touch.
He sat quietly, enjoying the exquisite moment to the fullest, “Francis will relay that information as it becomes available,” he murmured, “have your people ready and mobile when it arrives... do your damned job, Bret.” it was more aggravation than real anger now, Liz surmised.

She pushed hard on a bunched up knot of nerves she felt in his lower back.

Red arched, grunting shortly.

“Get Michael to safety... call when you have him secured.” Red snapped his phone shut. He dropped his head further, sighing, “...I know, baby.”

Liz couldn’t help the chuckle that escaped. He had pushed himself and was waiting for his scolding.

She returned her efforts to the man’s shoulders so he could lean back and relax, “I expect a handsome gratuity for my services.” she mentioned in passing.

“We’ll take it out in trade.” Red quipped.

“Too much information!” Francis grimaced accordingly, “Here I’ve sent this on.” he indicated as Red perused the readout.

“Is this that wanna-be group down in Cape Town.”

“Yeah, but this time, they chose the wrong British tourist to mess with.” Francis stated, “I can’t wait to give Michael the what-for, for allowing his guard to drop so far.”

“I’ll lay you three to one there was liquor involved.” Red philosophized.

“When will men learn?” Francis disdained. “Women, liquor, drugs and rock and roll.”

“I don’t know Francis,” Red shifted a sagely wise glance, “when will you?”

“Me?” the guy was taken aback, innocence in itself.

“Istanbul, last summer,” Red ticked off his fingers, “Paris, last year, Morocco, the year before that.”

“Oh, now you’re keeping track?” the kid was annoyed, “How typical.”

Red moved Liz’s hands to the opposite side of his neck, “Just there, baby...” he crooked his head accordingly, “damn, that feels good.”

“You get a massage,” Francis whined, “what about me? I was hurt just as much as you were.”

Elizabeth tsked sympathetically, “Poor baby.”

“You don’t really mean that.” Francis wasn’t fooled, going back to his sulking.

“No, I don’t.” Liz confirmed, “Does that feel okay, darling,” she soothed Red’s temples gently.

“Does that feel okay, darling.” Francis mimicked sarcastically. “Nora is the only one that gives a crap about me...” the young man arose moodily, “I’m hungry. I need nourishment.”

“Wait a minute,” Red grumbled for his respite having been interrupted, “What’s the prognosis on Michael. Can we extract him without too much danger to his well being?”

“The assholes who took him are disorganized, undisciplined, you know that.” Francis grumbled right back. “They will probably leave him tied up somewhere while they go out on the town just because they’re bored.”

“Let’s hope they follow that scenario.” Red approved, “Which begs the question, how did Michael allow himself to get taken by such an inept group.”

Francis settled a tad, “We’ll ask him when we see him.” he took the time to really examine his friend, “You look wiped, Red.”

“I’m okay,” Red replied automatically. No one liked a complainer after all, especially in the crowd he hung out with, “I wish these interruptions would stop for a while though, how about you?”

“That’s why we get the big bucks.” Francis said.

Elizabeth marveled at these guys. The acted as if they didn’t have a care in the world. As if one of their own wasn’t in dire straights, wasn’t being extracted from some God-forsaken spot across the continent... or maybe two of three continents, for all she knew.

Both men had arisen, stacking papers, dropping pens, appearing for all the world like typical business men taking a break from a meeting.

“Thanks, baby,” Red touched her face gently, “I needed that.”

“Yeah well, I needed it too but I didn’t get it?” Francis’ irritation had returned.

Red grinned at the woman as they followed the pissed off man to the kitchen. Fresh coffee and a break sounded great along about now.

An hour later Red’s ashen grey complexion had returned to a healthier pink.

Elizabeth had entertained the men with harrowing tales of her time as a teenager growing up with a ridiculously over-protective father.

“I hadn’t known all the colorful details, “Red chuckled appreciatively at the amusing tale, “I’ll bet Sam was furious.”

“He grounded me for a month but he forgave me in time for the Junior prom.” Liz remembered fondly, “Three days short of my projected release date.”

“Come on, Nora, “Francis had moved on apparently, “you have to take chances in life. I’ll show you the time of your life.”

“You’ve already done that.” the older woman chuckled her mirth, “Sweetheart, you’ve made my year just by being here. But no,” she was adamant, “I will not go out on a date with you... not ever.” she held up a staying hand, “Not because I don’t adore you, I do.”

Francis was up at headed for the woman in seconds, beaming.

“Down boy,” Nora’s tone squelched his enthusiasm, “I’m going to say this once and then the words will never pass my lips again.” she held up a warning finger.

“I love your lips my precious.” Francis chimed in, “I would kill to taste them.”

“Takes on a whole new meaning when he says that, doesn’t it.” Red quipped sotto voce.

“What do you mean?” Liz was curious.
Red waved the inquiry aside, chuckling lowly.

“Well don’t hold your breath, Junior.” Nora cocked a brow, “I’m too old for such shenanigans, I’m too old for you.”

Francis gasped, “That’s blasphemy woman!”

“You get on the phone and connect with that cute little saucy wench you picked up out in Vegas.” Nora put more food on Francis’ plate. Stacks off pulled pork with barbeque sauce on the side, “Tell her you will be on the next plane out. I will even come visit to cook for you but other than that…”

“You’re breaking my heart.” Francis grasped his chest dramatically, “I can’t survive without you. I need you in my life. Come live with me. Let me take you away from all this drudgery.”

“Thanks.” Red scowled disapprovingly, “Stop trying to steal my people out from under me.”

“Nora, you better not leave me.” Liz was appalled. “Especially for that little two timing dog.” she turned stricken eyes Red’s way, “Offer her more money... a 401K!”

“I’m not going anywhere,” Nora stated firmly, “but that 401K sounds good.” she winked at Red, “Francis stop sulking and cut your food.”

“I have no appetite now.” his mood dropped drastically.

Nora started to remove the dish. He grasped the rim of the place hastily, his look incredulous.

She stepped back, folding her arms chastely, “Pie for dessert. I’ve made your favorite.”

Red drank his coffee, hiding his amusement.

“Cherry?” Francis lifted hopeful eyes.

“With homemade whip cream.”

Francis felt a little better, “I’m crushed. I can’t go on.” he seemed positive, “Can you make me one to take home?”

“You’re actually leaving?” Red put his cup down with a sharp thud.

“I can’t stay here knowing this woman jilted me and to my face.” he wailed.

“Do you want some dinner rolls to take home as well, honey?”

“Oh, could you my beloved?” Francis turned on the charm, “If it’s not too much trouble.”

“No trouble for you, sweetheart.”

“Are you two sure you’ve come to a parting of ways?” Red was confused.

“I’ll add some of those chops,” Nora decided, “and some potato salad,” she mused.

“And maybe that green bean casserole?” Francis lifted puppy dog eyes.

“Of course…” Nora nodded.

“I love you my precious cupcake!” Francis felt better, “speaking of cupcakes—”
“Stop!” Liz arose from her seat by the large island, “You just better stop right there you little shit!” she confronted Francis head on. “Stop taking advantage of my friend and hire your own assistant!”

“I got a promotion.” Nora beamed, pouring Red more coffee, settling a slice of cherry beside the steaming cup.

“Well deserved, I’m sure.” he bit into the slice, savoring the taste.

“You take your pie, chops and casserole—” Liz was on a roll.

“And potato salad!” Francis was gathering his goodies even as Liz was hastening him from the kitchen, motioning Nora to load him down with promised goodies.

“You can’t carry all that,” Nora tsks, “let me help you out to your car.”

“Nora!” Liz wailed her dismay.

“He can’t drive with that leg,” the older woman noted Francis’ exaggerated hobbling.

“He drove to the donut shop today.” Red pointed out.

“That’s because I made pancakes this morning,” Nora explained, “bad call on my part there.” she conceded.

Liz looked a bit sheepish, it wasn’t Nora’s fault she had never told her pancakes were not a favorite.

“You did make a fuss about it then.” Francis pointed an accusing finger at Liz.

“Get out!” Liz yelled at the man as he took his foiled plate happily, “Go!”

“What are you so bent out of shape about?” Francis was stumped. “Can I have some extra sauce, sugar drawers?” he craned his head around Liz to inquire of a fretful Nora.

“I’ll sugar drawers you!” Liz threw a wooden spoon at the man, one she had seen on a nearby crockery bowl.

“Ow!” Francis rubbed his chest absently. “What is your problem? Red can’t you do something here?”

Red finished his pie, pushing the plate aside for his coffee, “No, sugar drawers, it’s out of my hands. Nora?” it was his time to turn on the charm, he lifted his empty plate, “I know I shouldn’t...”

Nora beamed him a smile, forgetting all about the little ruckus taking place steps away.

She hurried to refill the plate, “You seldom indulge that sweet tooth. I feel honored.”

“It is I, rather...” Red objected gallantly, “who is the privileged one.”

“Well, let me just puke.” Francis knew a ‘take-over’ when he saw one, stopping in his tracks which gave Lizzy a chance to hit him again with her spoon.

“Owww!”

Lizzy drew back again, “You little thief!”

“I offered to pay her!”
Liz hit him again.

Red winced for the guy then pulled his pie closer, a serene smile touching his lips, “Life is good.”

Nora was pleased with the proclamation clearly, “I’ll get you some more whipped cream.”

“How about you?” Francis put a chair between himself and his adversary, “I’m not hearing this. Say it ain’t so!”

Liz leaned swatting his bandaged arm a good smack.

“Okay! That hurt!” he instantly cradled the wound.

Liz swiped at him yet again but he stumbled out the French doors onto the paved lanai.

Liz locked the door, sticking her tongue out, her face planted to the window pane of the door.

Red leaned, pulling his ringing phone from his pocket, answering it. Covering his ear, blocking out the two bitching across the way, he listened to the other end, nodding.

“Lizzy...” he rumbled over the din, halting the tirades. Waving his fingers, signaling that he needed a moment with Francis, Red held his amusement.

Liz sighed dramatically, cracking the door slightly ajar, allowing Francis to hear whatever needed to be said.

“They got him.” Red gave a thumbs up before returning his attention to the phone, “Michael, what have you gotten yourself into now?”

Liz looked at Francis, shrugging, then shut the door forcefully, locking it again with flourish.

“You gave me a key.” Francis rolled his eyes.

“You better not use it.” Liz screamed to be heard. “I’ll tell Silas to shoot you on sight.”

“Knowing him, he probably would too.”

“Go home.”

“I can take a hint.” he bellowed, “You don’t have to hit me over the head with a mallet you know.”

“I wish I had thought of a mallet!” Liz shut the wood blinds with a finality.

“It’s nothing, Michael,” Red sighed, “it’s just Francis.” he explained, “Get some rest and we’ll discuss this in the morning.” he said, ending the call.

“Nora,” she rushed over to the woman, “you can’t go with Francis! We’ll give you—”

The woman chuckled. “I like it here. Feels like home.” she proclaimed. “Speaking of which, when I get this mess cleaned up, I’m outta here. Okay, Captain.”

Red sat back patting his stomach, “Nora, you have to stop having out with the guards.”

“They,” she proclaimed, “hang out with me.”

“I stand corrected.” Red stated.

“But you’re staying, right Nora?”
“Oh, honey,” the woman soothed Liz’s frayed nerves with a hug, “wild horses...” she offered a sedate look that said it all.

“I’ll get this, you go home and rest.” Liz hurriedly scraped nearby dishes.

“You most certainly will not.” Nora took the matter into her own hands with a stern reprimand, “Captain?”

Red obediently arose, taking Liz in hand, “Come along.”

“I can help.” Liz managed around Red’s broad shoulders as he gently but firmly guided her from the kitchen.

“She doesn’t need your help.” Red knew the woman’s capabilities, “That’s why she’s in charge. She’s self-sufficient.”

Nora waved cheerfully to a disgruntled Elizabeth.

Liz marched down the corridor, her spirits still high, “Do you believe that little twirp?”

“That pie was delicious,” Red said, “I can understand Francis’ view point.”

“Well, I can’t!” Liz turned on the man. “I’m going to push him in the pool the next time I see him... the deep end!”

“Watch your step, baby.” Red caught her in time to prevent a run-in with the door facing to their bedroom.

She had been walking backward, too pissed not to unburden herself on a convenient sounding board.

“You just better take him to task tomorrow, do you hear me?” she pointed an accusing finger.

“Which means, shoot him in the other leg or bury him with the fishes.” Red surmised, rolling his aching neck, producing a resounding crack in the open room.

She pulled a face, “Very funny.” then, a sudden thought occurred.

Liz caught Red’s vest in her hands, pulling the man close.

“Go to your office.” she stated, her voice firm.

Red’s mouth twitched, nodding slowly at the declaration. “Why would I go there when everything I want is here.”

“Because I say.” she reiterated.

“Don’t I have a say in this?” he teased, wondering where this conversation was leading.

“...No.” she decided.

“But I have a twenty-five year old bottle of Glenfarclas in the closet over there calling my name.” his eyes sparkled with merriment.

“You’ll just have to make due with what you have in the bar...” she replied in a no-nonsense tone, “besides you have a thirty year old woman here that’s obviously better vintage.”
“Well, when you put it that way,” he grinned, “I suppose I can make due with that...” he shrugged lightly, “and the forty year old bottle of Glenlivet I have stocked... in your bar.”

“I’m so glad you saw reason.” the blue eyes narrowed, hiding the amusement contained within. “Now go, you can’t be here.”

Red glanced around the room absently attempting to ascertain her ploy.

“You go to your office.” she pointed to the unseen room, “you always go to your office before you come to bed... you always do that.”

Red’s tongue traced the outline of his lips, “You want me out of the way for a while.” he got the drift.

“Well... yes.” she managed to look contrite. “I said I would be really nice to you tonight. I promised.”

He slipped his hands about her hips, “You said... really, really, really nice.”

“Yes, so...” she shoved him away, “go to your office for a little while.”

Red sighed mentally, “How little a while?” his appetite was already whetted, truth told.

“Twenty minutes, tops.” Liz was certain she could prepare everything in that time. She would have already slipped away to do it but for that shit head, Francis.

“You’re awfully bossy tonight,” he said, the hint of affection more than clear in his voice, “again, don’t I have a say in this?” he asked.

“I said no.” she replied succinctly.

“Then who am I to argue?” Red cast a doubtful glance, “Twenty minutes.” he consulted his watch, “Not one second more.”

She smiled brightly for him, “Go, get out.”

“I know how Francis felt.” the man went begrudgingly.

Red and his bottle of forty year old Glenlivet made their way to his version of a man-cave.

He sat, relaxing in his comfortable chair. He lit up a cigar, determined to make the wait a bearable one.

He sipped the warm beverage absently. Frankly, he would rather have the thirty year old woman who waited in the back room than the vintage he sampled.

Or perhaps share with her the wonderful vintage after she revealed whatever surprise she was preparing for him.

The thought made him smile. He blew the grey mist of smoke into the air watching the swirling rivulets dance about.

He should be making calls, shipping manifests. He sorely missed Dembe’s presence.
He did make a call to check on the man. Dembe was ‘occupied’ so the call was a short one. Red could hear the throaty chuckle of a female in the background.

Red’s smile returned. He was pleased his friend was truly taking some down time.

Good for Dembe!

He checked his watch, finished his drink, reluctantly rolled the cherry off his cigar before heading back to the master bedroom.

His curiosity was definitely piqued, he had to admit.

Closing the door behind him, he was immediately struck by the change in atmosphere.

Lights were dimmed, strategic candles scented the air and set a wondrous mood.

A large fluffy stack of towels sat on the end of the bed.

Soft music played in the background.

Red kicked off his shoes just as Elizabeth appeared, framed in the ambient light emanating behind her.

He took in the long satin gown with its high slits on the side which revealed a hint of lovely thigh as she moved. The very, very low cut lace bodice which only just covered the luscious mounds.

The lace was so thin and delicate he could clearly see the imprint of tiny nubs of nipples straining against the fabric.

The woman smiled pleasantly at him as she passed, arms laden with bottles of every shape and size. She neatly lined her products on the bedside table.

Red took a moment to run the length of her amazing figure.

He loved the rounded smoothness of the satin as it caressed her buttocks. The inviting swell of her pert breasts captivated him.

The lace was cut to reveal most of the delicious mounds with only the barest of sheath over the center to hide the necessities.

The lace made his hands wish to uncover the hidden treasure beneath.

“You need to take off your clothes.” the blue eyes shifted to his, the depths alluring, the soft voice affecting his nervous system.

“You first.” his eyes deepened as his imagination took over, once again raking her body.

“You booked the appointment, Sir.” Liz feigned professionalism. “We assume you wish to make use of our... amenities?” she motioned gracefully with her hand to the bottles on the table. “We were given to understand... you’ve had a very stressful few days.”

“We?” he gave the area a compulsory glance, “Will more be joining us?”

“Do you require... more?” she tested the waters with a lifted brow.
Red wisely backed down, “You will suffice.”

Again, his look told her just how much this belief was instilled in him.

She smiled gently, “If you are certain then... perhaps we should begin.” the smile remained transfixed. “Would you like assistance with your clothing?”

He considered the request, “...Oh, hell yeah.”

Elizabeth stepped, deftly divesting him of his vest, she hung the light weight over the Valet stand.

Stepping about the man, her fingers slowly, unhurriedly unbuttoned the front of his shirt. The blue eyes lifted to meet his stare.

“Are you here for a long stay?” she made polite conversation.

Red played along, “A few days... a few nights.”

“Business trips can be so stressful.” she eased the shirt from his shoulders.

“They certainly can,” he watched the shirt meet the same fate as his vest. “I’m ever so glad to have found your... agency. You can imagine my delight after hours upon hours sequestered away in a dull, boring, boardroom.”

His eyes enjoyed the slight bounce of her breasts as she lowered herself before him. The young inviting cleft beckoned his interest.

She unbuckled his belt, easing the zipper of his slacks down over the beginning bulge of his rapidly growing erection.

“I can only imagine.” she sympathized, leaning to nuzzle the hardness with her nose, “You can forget about all that for a time,” she sought him out, “it’s my job to ensure you do.”

She tugged his slacks down. Red stepped out of the legs handing them over to capable hands.

She smiled that smile, her fingers tenderly easing inside the waistband of his boxers. In seconds, they had followed the same path of his slacks but instead of being laid neatly over a perch... she had tossed them aside carelessly.

They landed on the floor somewhere, he didn’t take time to note for she had curved sensually to him, the small hands engulfing his stiffness protectively.

“You are stressed, Sir. Please,” she tugged ever so gently on his captured shaft, “come lie down. Let me see what I can do to alleviate that.”

“I am not one to argue.” he more than willingly followed her lead.

She released his cock and he felt cold.

Liz situated the towels, “If you will lay here?” her hand swept the area, “We will begin.”

He wasted no time in obeying those orders. His muscles slumped into the comfortable bedding even though the other parts of him were considerably more tense.

He felt warm oil drip to his back for she had indicated he should lie on his stomach.
Several seconds of slow, agonizing massage eased the tension in his body considerably.

“This is,” he breathed out a low moan of delight,” ...amazing.”

It had been forever that he had a massage let alone the sensual back rub the woman was supplying.

His skin erupted in gooseflesh, anticipating the treat.

The excruciating torture continued. Red could not prevent long, drawn out groans of appreciation.

It didn’t get any better than this.

Sighing, the man relaxed further into the support of the bed as gentle fingers stroked his back, sides, adding more pressure as Elizabeth mapped out the line of his body.

Legs, ankles, thighs even the soles of his feet were given much needed attention.

Slim fingers kneaded the smooth tautness of his backside.

The warm oil drizzled evocatively between the crack of his ass. He was loathe to prevent a guttural sound of arousal in his throat.

A teasing tip of a manicured finger ran the length of the cleft for a gentle but insistent palm had pushed on the inside of his thigh asking for entrance.

He eagerly granted the invasion which ended in a loving cup and illusive graze of his testicle sack.

“How does this feel good?” she continued the exquisite pastime, watching her activities thoughtfully.

“How? he could barely articulate, “I don’t think that adjective quite covers it...” he swallowed a tightness in his throat. “Amazing, incredible.... fucking fantastic...” he couldn’t find enough words to express what it felt like.

No, it definitely did not get better than–

He felt the bed move with the indentation of her weight.

She straddled him lazily, her thighs rubbing along the outside of his.

He knew she was sans panties. He could feel the heat of her mound on his buttocks.

She leaned her weight into the massage of his neck and shoulders. “You are tight...”

She frowned over the tautness of his muscles even after all the work she had put into relaxing them.

“I will wager...” he lifted his head slightly, “you are as well.”

Her hands stopped for a beat and he worried he had moved too fast, spoiled the game for her.

His mind raced to solve his gaffe.

She settled that naked ass over his welcoming buttocks, laying her body to his.

“There is only one way to ascertain the answer to that inquiry,” her voice whispered in his ear, sending shivers down his arms, “it will cost you extra.”

“I’m so fucking hard it feels like, if I move,” he rasped huskily, “it will snap off from its base.”
“That would be terrible,” she slipped her hand beneath his body, grasping his hardness, “I have need of it.”

Red rolled quickly, allowing her more freedom of touch. He groaned loudly as she shifted taking the heated flesh into her mouth.

The stiff erection of his penis jutted straight out, having bounced heavily with the movement of his turn.

The hot hollow of her mouth engulfed him, that amazing little tongue swirling about the rounded tip lovingly.

Another gasp escaped the man.

His hands gripped the bed covers for support as she continued to work her magic on his straining flesh.

Straddling his waist, Liz felt the hard shaft tap against her backside, a pool of heat instantly settling in her core.

Rubbing the warmed oil into her hands, she kneaded the tightness from his arms and chest, occasionally flicking her thumbs teasingly across his nipples. She smiled gently as the peaks tightened, and the man beneath her moaned brokenly.

“You don’t have to do this.” he practically pleaded his case.

Scooting back a hair, Red’s erection slid along the crease of the woman’s ass, drawing a sharp gasp from them both.

Dropping his hands to her thighs, Red curled his fingers into the white flesh. Elizabeth rubbed her fingers gently over his stomach, sliding back purposely.

His erection bent with her movement, her slit easing wetly along the hardened shaft.

Inhaling shakily, Red held his urge to impale her on his cock. Her fingers bypassed his groin all together, instead heading for his legs and feet.

“You! fuck me!”

“I like a man who knows his own limitations.” she ignored the tense request however, instead for countless minutes, she massaged his tension away. So lost in the sensation of the tightness bleeding away from his limbs.

Red lost track of time until Liz’s slim fingers combed through the short hair on his groin.

His cock jerked with the touch, the slit of his crown beading with wetness.

Slowly stroking his hardness, she massaged his sack, gently tugging them as her hand encircled his head.

“Listen to me!” Red hissed, his body needing a release.

Liz hesitated, having wanted to take him into her mouth once more.

His rough, unsteady voice thrilled her. The sight of his cock, so hard for her, changed her mind.
She reluctantly gave the power over, laying face down into the pillow.

Red nudged her and she lifted as indicated. He placed a pillow beneath her stomach raising her ass into the air.

He nudged her again, sliding his thighs between hers as she parted her legs wider.

He could almost taste that sweet little pussy. He stared at the soft pink and darker outer layer of her lips.

“You are fucking beautiful...” he stated shakily, his hands encompassing her back.

Red watched the small frame disappear repeatedly under the width of his hands. There was something incredibly erotic about the sight.

A drop oozed freely from the sensitive slit as his shaft brushed against her cheeks. He smiled when the woman lifted into the sensation, which shoved his head between the soft swell of her bottom.

Red’s face was suddenly grim. He was hurting so deliciously. He allowed the woman to rock herself against his erection, his cock head catching on the puckered hole of her ass.

Liz inhaled sharply, backing against his fat crown. Red’s head fell back, his eyes closing with pure elation, euphoria overtaking his mind.

“I’m dying here...” he murmured roughly, “and I don’t give a fuck.”

“...Yes.” she sighed, understanding completely. She lifted her bottom enticing him further into the abyss.

Leaning forward, Red added slight pressure to her backside as his hands skirted the plumpness of her breasts.

God...

“Now this...” he breathed heavily, his eyes blazing his ever growing desire, “is heaven.”

“You like it?” she questioned quietly.

“Hell yes, I like it.” he sighed breathlessly.

He pushed against her pleasure, wetting the tightness with his pre-cum before inching downward, enjoying her mewl of disappointment.

“I’m going to make you climb the fucking walls, baby...” he breathed, anticipating the outcome of his declaration. He gently turned her to face him.

His eyes focused on her pink nipples, which grew into tiny pebbles, hard under his stare. He touched her rib cage, arms, shoulders... everywhere but those tiny peaks.

Teasing her relentlessly, as she had done to him. He centered his attention on the canvas of her beautiful body, deliberately replacing one sort of tension with another... finding new erogenous zones along the way.

Leaning into his arm, he finally took the rosy nipple into his mouth, his tongue massaging the tight bud in an entirely different manner. She squirmed under the technique.
She scratched her fingertips into his scalp, drawing a low content groan from his occupied mouth.

Liz whimpered when the man pulled away, only to writhe with anticipation seconds later as he slithered downward.

“No!” she reached for him as he moved down the bed, determined he should end the agony... the ecstasy he was causing.

“Spread your legs for me.” the man demanded, ignoring her completely.

The tenor of his voice excited her deep inside. Her already hardened nipples tingled with sensation and her heavy sex, throbbed deliciously.

“I’ve been wanting this all damn day.” he murmured roughly, lowering his face between her damp thighs.

Red groaned his appreciation, finding the small lips sensitive. Nuzzling against her, he drowned himself in the natural scent of her arousal.

“So wet for me...” he moaned, sucking the peak of her sex. “So succulent...” Grasping her hips, he expertly built the tension layer by layer.

Liz’s breath came in heated rasps. Red licked her in long sinuous strokes before capturing her clit. The gentle tug of his mouth, pleasured her beyond measure.

She shivered, finding the man’s darkened eyes staring intently up at her, “You have to stop this...” she whispered breathlessly.

Rubbing his nose into the fragrant mound, Red focused on the matter at hand, his tongue rubbing along her clit greedily, devouring the treat hungrily. Sliding his thumbs between her plump cheeks, he rubbed her in rhythm with his relentless strokes.

“R-Red...” the woman stuttered incoherently. His large thumb rubbed against her ass, his pre-cum leaving her slick and sensitive to his touch. It felt so good... so amazing.

Red grunted his pleasure. This is where he wanted to be. Nudging her gently, he sought out her reaction. She stared hazily down at him, her mouth parting as soft, sharp moans passed the parted lips.

“More...” she begged breathlessly, rolling her hips, pushing against his mouth. Grasping her breast, she pulled restlessly at her nipple as she cradled his head, pulling him even closer.

Red reached around, palming her breast, gently kneading the heavy mound. Turning his hand, he pushed his fingers against her ass, rubbing the touch-heightened flesh and felt the woman’s body tense.

Lovingly suckling her clit into his mouth, he rubbed his tongue incessantly against the swollen tissue. Finally giving way to the emotional onslaught, the woman shook violently, clasping his head with her creamy thighs. His mouth filled with warmth as she bucked sharply against the intense sensation, coming hard under his tutelage.

She dropped to the bed, gasping and shaking with the intense orgasm. Seconds later she felt Red’s large hands push at her trembling legs, shoving them wide as he knelt between the curvy alcove presented.
“You didn’t set a price...” his voice was husky, his fat crown pushed at her opening. The man was thoroughly aroused. “So I’ll extract what I need, we’ll discuss terms later on...”

“My supervisor will not be pleased.” Liz murmured as he adjusted himself at her fluttering opening.

“You worry about pleasing me.” he murmured. He groaned brokenly as he slid into the steamy depths of her cavern.

Liz loved the thick spread she felt when Red pushed into her body.

Cupping her ass, he lifted her slightly, thrusting against her pliable flesh. Their heightened breath mingled, mouth catching mouth, kisses long, lingering and passionate with the heat of the moment.

Red situated her leg over his shoulder, needing to be deeper inside the quivering hole.

He raised her higher, jabbing his hardness inside her faster and faster, the tempo meeting the coiled tension in his body.

“...Yes,” he hissed, the woman’s shaky cries of ecstasy becoming louder and more breathless, “fuck!”

Curling his fingers inward around her bottom, he gently petted the tight hole of her ass as he pummeled the other with his shaft.

“Shit...” he panted harshly, squeezing the cheeks in his palms, increasing the tightness of her body. “God yes, squeeze my cock hard, baby... just like that.” he approved, losing himself in her body.

He pushed against her ass as incentive, producing the desired results. “Jesus... you are such a good little girl for me.”

Squeezing him tight in her core, she felt the first wave of her orgasm settle in her abdomen, a heat spreading through her limbs at breakneck speed.

Red lowered his eyes, hypnotized by the sight of his hard flesh plunging into her drenched depths. His long, fat erection, spreading her open easily with each stab he offered, before disappearing from sight into the volcanic heat of her pussy, “I need to fuck you...” he breathed shallowly, “I need...”

“Harder.” she pleaded, hooking her heels on his shoulders, lifting her own pelvis expertly to allow him better access.

“Fuck...” he palmed the tiny ass, roughly yanking her against him.

Fixating on her face which twisted into a state of bliss, he thrust into her in rapid succession, pushing sounds from her throat in sharp bursts of undeniable lust.

Her soft breasts bounced erotically as she gripped the headboard, her fingers tightening, bleeding them of color. Her legs fell to the side, her back lifting off the bed as she tensed. The sweet melodious mewl of her release filling his ears.

His thighs and sack were soaked with her arousal, “Look how wet you are...” he hissed his delight, “do you like being fucked hard.”

“...Yes... yes...” she whispered seductively, thrusting against him, driving him inside her body. “I love it so much.”

Bracing himself on his arms, fucking her hard and deep, Red lost himself in her body.
“Do you like... to fuck me?” she urged him on, drawing his balls tight against his body.

The soft moans of her encouraging taunt and the wet sound of his cock fucking her body was his undoing.

“...Oh, fuck,” he panted shakily, “gonna come so hard, honey.”

“I want it.” she whispered. “It feels so good...”

“You want me to give it to you?” he needed to hear it.

“Please...” she panted breathlessly, “...please!”

Capturing the woman’s reddened lips, Red tongued the pouty mouth open. His slit pulsed hard with his first release. The hot rush of cum exploded from the tip, leaving the man shaking in it’s aftermath.

“...Yes.” she moaned sharply against his mouth, her body quivering around his in response.

“Take it...” he gasped hard, jerking his hips, pushing his thrumming erection deep, filling her with his viscous climax.

She whimpered, lifting her pelvis to his obediently.

They lay afterwards, bodies bathed in the sweaty sheen of their activities. Slick, damp curls of their sex shimmering with each others arousal as they came together in the low light of the room. A feeling a contentment permeated Red’s mind like he had never felt before.

The sense of peace he had been searching for settled over him. The soft scent of their union filled his senses, leaving him satisfied beyond measure.

She hugged herself to his body, nuzzling her nose into his neckline. She sighed when he returned the favor, laying his warm mouth against her damp, beard burned flesh.

The woman stirred finally from the embrace of his body, the strength of his arms.

Red grumbled for the disturbance, “It’s not over until I say it’s over.” he reminded.

He smiled softly as the realization hit him.

He had just made love to the woman he was meant to share his life with.

The woman he had searched for, was right here... basking in the aftermath of the love they shared. Both physically and emotionally.

A rush of tingling currents ran the length of his spine as they both trembled with aftershocks of their extreme high.

They really should have made love, considering their shared confessions. But in their own unique fashion he had come to adore... they had fucked the system as it were, once again doing things their own way.

Perhaps he should have delivered a more romantic interlude, because Lizzy deserved that. He understood now however, that the passion had been so heightened between them, the only release of those frenzied and unrestrained emotions... had been delegated to the extreme.

Liz reached out, laying her palm against his torso. Sliding her fingers upwards, her palm settled over the man’s heart, the erratic beat, easing gradually under her touch.

“...I’m happy.” she whispered, lifting her eyes to meet his.

“You are, huh?” his mouth tilted lazily at the corner, his fingertip tracing the curve of her cheek.

Nodding slowly, she lifted her hand, touching his mouth, “I am so happy that I took a chance,” her eyes shining brightly with unconcealed adoration, “...that I trusted my heart.”

He cleared his throat, drawing in a deep breath, barely controlling the wash of emotions filling his heart.

He was affected by her words, no matter how simplistic they were. Perhaps because they were delivered with the overwhelming fulfillment and tranquility she felt when with Red.

“...So am I.” he openly confessed. “I’m damn glad you took that chance.”

He smiled warmly as the woman snuggled closer to him, seeking his warmth. He chuckled adoringly sliding free, which cause a small pout to appear on her kiss swollen lips.

He peppered the luscious mouth in soft kisses until she was once again... happy.

“I love you, Lizzy...” he murmured lowly, wrapping the woman in his tight embrace.

“How did you know my name?”

He grinned down at her, “Games are over for tonight.” he advised. “There’s only one woman I want in my bed and I have finally found her.”

Chapter End Notes

Any mistakes are mine. These two literally drove me out of my mind.
Monday, June 2nd

Red was a light sleeper. His chosen profession had taught him to be constantly on guard.

He had felt the movement beside him, but thought it more advantageous to pretend as if he had not, in this particular instance.

The sensual sensation of full lips and an agile tongue traveled the stubbled flesh of his jawline, moving gently down to his neck roused the man fully from a most pleasant dream like state.

To a reality even more pleasant.

He lay very still enjoying Liz’s newfound assertiveness.

He inhaled the last traces of her baby lotion and the alluring salty aroma of aroused female.

“Hey lady...” his sleep roughed voice tickled her nape for she had straddled his body strategically, “I’m sorry,” he feigned mild consternation, “did you need something?”

Liz curved her thighs into his hips, the long silky legs intertwining with his dormant ones.

It was the only thing dormant about the man at this moment in time.

“I didn’t mean to disturb you,” the seductively innocent tone hardened the man’s cock all the more, “I have a little problem here, you see.”

She slid along the length of his shaft slowly, the hot wet muff heightening his senses.

Liz moaned softly, squirming about the surface anxiously.

“Uh huh.” he managed throatily, his mouth suckling her neckline hungrily, “I can see that... go on.” he encouraged, his lips peppering the fragrant skin with light, nipping kisses.

His rough palm cupped the plump ass cheeks, rubbing the woman up and down his cock in slow, calculated thrusts.

“I was...” her breath was shallow, “having the most amazing dream.”

Liz pressed into the excruciating sensation as the man’s shaft thumped against her slit, the wide head of his crown sliding against the curve of her sex to her plump cheeks.

“Dreams can be so realistic at times.” he knew first hand.

“And so frustrating.” she pouted prettily for him, “I woke up just when it was getting... good.”

“Oh no,” he commiserated, his fingers kneaded her bottom purposely, widening the gap between her legs with expert tension, “I am so sorry to hear that,” he managed sincerity, “what can I do to help?”

Elizabeth’s stomach pitched erotically when the man’s stiff flesh connected soundly with her clit.

“Oh my,” he tsked, having felt what he needed to feel, “you are all swollen,” he frowned his sympathy, “that must be painful,” his tone had dropped into a lascivious caress, “... show me.”

Liz lifted large blue eyes as she allowed the man to shift, taking her with him as he went.

He rolled her unto her back, his palm parting her legs.

Red’s eyes traveled the smoothness of her flesh, over the alluring mounds of her bare breasts, past the small, flat abdomen and beyond.

His eyes flamed as her fingers spread the silken hair covering the tumescent lips of her labia and vulva.

His cock pulsed greedily at the sight of her mons glistening in the early morning sun. His gaze heated further when the woman’s thighs, sparkling with moisture, came into view.

“You see.” Liz played her part to the hilt, her voice melancholy, a little miffed.

The shimmering mound of her sex, reddened and exposed to him, allowed him a glance of her engorged clit. The sight of the woman’s puffy slit overwhelmed him with alluring images.

Fantasies of pounding into her mercilessly one moment were replaced by visions of him taking her clit in his mouth in the next.

He controlled them.

“My poor baby,” he sighed heavily, “it just makes me want to tongue that steamy little alcove and suckle your delicate flesh...” he whispered, “give my hot, precious pussy the attention it so clearly needs.”

Elizabeth closed her eyes, mewling desperately, “Y-Yes,” her thighs trembling visibly, “do that.”

“Yes, I could do that,” he certainly was not adverse, “but if I did, you might come entirely too quickly for my liking.”

“No, no I wouldn’t,” she breathed the lie breathlessly, “I really wouldn’t.”

“No?” he lifted a scolding brow, “then prove it,” he insisted, “touch yourself.”

Elizabeth hesitated, feeling as he made her feel, she wasn’t certain she wouldn’t come at this stage with the least amount of stimulation.

Red was beginning to love these morning sessions. Elizabeth was becoming more passionate, showing her emotions uninhibitedly.

She was expressing desire, trust was growing between them. He had worked meticulously hard to gain that trust.

His hand rested on her thigh, a studied scowl on his handsome face.

The slender fingers danced idly over her warm flesh, squeezing the delicious pain of sexual awakening from her mounds before moving lower through the dark, damp wispy hair on her mons.

Red lay his palm flat on her stomach, holding the woman in place.

He lay stretched out beside her, his thigh holding her legs spread open for his pleasure.
She was entirely exposed to his gaze, naked and vulnerable.

“You can do better than that.” he approved of the tiny nubs of the pert breasts rising stiffly at his continued stare.

Elizabeth reached, her fingers spreading the lips of her labia open, boldly sharing herself with her lover.

Red eyes deepened, “That little opening is already welling with cream.”

Liz’s body reacted to the lust-laden tone.

“You are so wet for me.” he watched the slick nectar ease from her opening, disappearing between her rounded cheeks.

Gooseflesh spotted her skin at the sexy proclamation.

The woman’s heady aroma filled his senses leaving his mouth watering and warm liquid trickling from his cock.

Her fingers pushed in against her tingling sex attempting to alleviate the incessant throb deep inside.

“This is all for me, correct.” he pushed his index finger into her body, extracting the slick appendage. He massaged her clit with the product tenderly.

Liz tried to clamp her thighs shut, but he refused to allow her the luxury.

“I will take the ache away, baby.” he soothed, pushing her own fingers aside as they tried to complete the act on their own, “Just tell me what it is you want.”

“...You,” she breathed shakily, “I want... you.”

“You want my cock,” he corrected silkily, “which I will gladly give but I need to hear those sweet words from that beautiful mouth.”

She opened her legs wider in open invitation, her eyes fixated on his face, “Are you going to make love to me?”

“I can do that,” he nodded minutely, “you know I’ll give you anything you want.”

Elizabeth trembled at the man’s confident delivery of the sultry words.

“I’ll make you feel all better,” he crooned lovingly, “Open your legs for me, baby. Let me in.”

Opening her legs wider to accommodate his bulk, Red rolled into the curvy alcove, settling his weight on the slender body beneath his.

Red smiled warmly at the woman’s sullen features, before lifting and bracing himself on his hand.

Taking his cock in hand, he brushed his weeping slit against her clitoris, producing a fresh warm gush of milky white fluid trickling from her center.

Liz moaned brokenly, wiggling closer to the bulbous head teasing her. She squirmed in earnest, whimpering despondently.

“Be patient, baby...” he murmured, intent on his task.
The woman’s brow furrowed as he lifted his cock away from her. She opened her mouth in protest but still at the sight of his head, thick and full for her.

His own slit was parted with arousal. A translucent bead of moisture oozed from the tip, holding her rapt attention.

Stroking the bulging shaft once, Red watched the bead travel the rounded tip of his erection. The clear liquid dripped into the pink hole, drawing a soft gasp of his growing arousal.

“Only you make me this hard.” the man whispered urgently, “so quickly.”

He cursed his lack of control but marveled at his advanced state of ardor.

“Then do something about it.” she breathed a shaky sigh, her bottom lifting in total supplication.

She felt the growing wet spot beneath her on the sheets.

“That must have been a hell of a dream.” he stated his belief, aligning his cock head between the ripe flesh awaiting him.

Leaning determinedly, the man gently shoved past the tight resistance of her labia, demanding entrance into the wet depths awaiting his exploration.

Elizabeth groaned, gratefully welcoming the invasion, “...The reality is better.”

“God,” Red moans joined hers, as the intense pleasure of the steaming cavern spread for him, only to close back around his hard flesh as he pushed further into the tight sheath, “I fucking concur...”

A shaky gasp of relief escaped Liz’s parted mouth as the girth opened her wide. The man’s foreskin massaged her cushioned depths, increasing the ache in her core in the most delectable, torturous way.

“So... so much better.” she whimpered her delight as Red rocked his hips, opening her to his intrusion, inch by agonizing inch.

“There now,” he whispered faintly, “is this helping ease that ache?” he enquired, his tone raspy with growing passion.

“Yes.” she pleaded, lifting her hips to greet his shallow thrust. “Don’t stop, please...”

He should have done this last night... made love to her.

His undisguised and shameless lust for the woman won out.

Not that either had complained.

But this... this was breathtaking.

“I love you.” he whispered, settling his entire length into her body. He breathed a deep sigh of contentment as her soft down meshed with his own, the connection complete.

Liz nuzzled into the shadowing on his face, a sense of tranquility calming her heart.

The coarse hair of morning beard scraping her delicate skin and the man’s husky voice whispering words of love in her ear, sent tingles along her spine to the sensitive area between her legs.
They had been making love for weeks now and it was phenomenal. She felt cherished beyond scope.

This morning... what they shared was stunning in its intensity. They were united not just in the physical sense, but emotionally. It was as if they were one entity. Souls bound together.

Liz’s cheeks flushed, a swell of emotion flooding her psyche. Her tummy flipped, her heart fluttered, her breath quickened with passion, she felt absolutely... exhilarated.

She recalled a moment in her teen years when she experienced a similar occurrence while reading her first romance novels.

The worlds created in her imagination had been an enchanting one.

She had become conscious of her sexual desires... an awakening.

The lust between the characters was potent. The build up in tension, captivating. Until the point they gave into their yearning and consummated their carnal desires.

She masturbated many times to the erotic pictures painted.

But above all else, to the fantasies of... him.

The hero. The knight in shining armor that came in on horseback, wooing the damsel in distress. Or the swarthy and ruthless Viscount romancing the beautiful, yet, untrusting Governess.

Each protective, faithful, infatuated and passionate about their lady loves.

She dreamed of having a man such as that one day.

And now, here she was... living the dream.

The good-hearted Criminal loving his supposed sworn adversary, a Federal Agent.

And he was doing it so well... so very, very well.

Red was living up to expectations he wasn’t even aware she possessed, being what she needed in every respect.

She had his protection. His commitment. His respect and admiration. But above all else, she trusted him implicitly.

They had love.

They had this... the carnal connection the likes of which she never experienced.

She never had a wish come true but as Liz felt the gentle tug of Red’s warm mouth on her captured nipple, the wet slide of his heavy erection... it was as close as she would get to perfection.

She knew without a doubt that wishes did in fact, come true.

Pushing the pale flesh of her breast closer, Liz whimpered, eager for more of his brand of attention.

Flickering the rosy tip, Red wondered what thoughts captivated her moments ago.

Although fully involved in the physical sense, lifting into his slow rhythmic thrusts, he sensed her mind was momentarily elsewhere. Her eyes held an unfocused, dreamy look in the blue depths.

Whatever it had been, left the woman blissfully tranquil and eagerly receptive to his unrequited passion.

Perhaps she had been recalling her earlier dream...

“God,” he exhaled pent up emotion, a little pensive himself suddenly, “you have no idea how much I need this with you.”

Wrapping his tongue around the puckered flesh of her pert nipple, Red groaned about the little nub, observing her reaction to his efforts.

Ragged breaths escaped Lizzy’s parted mouth as Red leisurely nipped a stiff peak, leaving a sweet, torturous pang between her legs.

“You need me...” she whispered in a rush, clasping his head to her breast with shaky fingers.

Entranced by the rhythmic motion their bodies performed, both enjoyed and lost themselves in the unfettered moans and gasps their lovers released.

“I’ve waited such a long time for you, Lizzy...” he openly admitted. “Did you think a month ago, I’d be here... making love to you?” The fact still enthralled the man.

She had to admit, there was a part of her that had been intrigued by the idea. But she never imagined it actually happening.

“No,” she confessed, “but I am so damn glad you are.” she gasped as he slid in deep, rubbing against her throbbing clit.

“I want this,” she breathed, grasping the man’s forearms tight in a desperate hold, “...every morning.”

Red dropped his chin, watching his girth disappear inside Lizzy’s tiny hole, “I’ll put it on top of my ‘to-do list. Trust me...” he grit, pushing into the wet depths he adored.

“I want to start each day...” she rasped, raising her hips into his downward thrust, “just like this.”

“We need a compromise,” his lips curved playfully, “because I want you every night.” he counter negotiated, captivated by the slim hips meeting his wantonly.

The woman’s thighs shook with the intensity of the man’s concentrated movements and attention to their activity.

“Jesus...” she sucked in sharply, “right there.”

Undulating his hips, he directed his shaft where she needed, his breath shallow and uneven.

“...I stated my requirements.” he reminded her of the negotiations taking place.

“Yes,” Liz arched into the deep thrust of his heavy shaft, “morning... night.” she babbled incoherently. “Any time,” she was flexible, “God, Red..”

Liz’s arousal heightened as she read the excruciating torture on the man’s face.

Red’s head fell back, his face showing his state of ecstasy. A rumbling growl tore from deep within his stocky, hair covered chest on the long downward stroke of his beautiful cock.
The velvet soft thickness, framed by curly honey blond hair, came into view. The thick bulging veins in his cock caressed her touch-heightened flesh, drawing her closer to the precipice of climax.

He was so handsome, sexy... so masculine.

“It feels good...” she whispered, “doesn’t it.”

“You have no idea how exquisite you are...” Red moaned brokenly, grasping the pillow in the strong hold of his clenched fingers, “I dreamed of this...” he tightened his arms at her side, cupping her little face in his calloused palms.

Liz kissed the man’s full mouth, panting against the damp flesh.

“So many times, I wanted to be with you, just like this,” he allowed more of his weight to settle on her, “surround you with my warmth,” he murmured, “and part your lips with my cock, slide into this sweet, amazing body.”

His eyes slipped closed, reveling in the euphoria of doing just that, “My cock ached to experience your body giving into my intrusion,” he growled shakily, “to savor the sensation of your hot, snug pussy cradling my cock.”

Liz flicked her tongue sensually against his, picturing the images he painted for her,

“Nothing could prepare me for how wonderful you truly feel,” he murmured, “that I would get to experience you... like this,” he stared down at his bare cock shining with Elizabeth’s arousal, “is something out of my most primitive imaginings.”

Catching her lip with her teeth, she bit into the tender flesh just as captivated by the sight.

“Knowing I’m the only one afforded this gift,” he nuzzled her dampened neckline, drawing in her sweet scent, “that I am the only one who ever will warm you...”

The man’s eye darkened, amplifying the rolling pitch in Elizabeth’s abdomen.

“Feeling you come around me...” the husky voice lowered intimately, “is excruciatingly pleasurable.”

Liz’s clit jolted with sharp piercing waves of desire. The delectable, thrumming heaviness between her legs cried out for release. A warm rush of fluid poured from her quivering heat, drawing a rumbling moan from her lover.

“...Yes,” he encouraged breathlessly, “baby, I need you to come.”

Red’s breath hitched as the woman’s face lit with an inner glow of ecstasy. Her tiny feet curved into his thigh, her fingers grasping his ass in a tight grip, pulling him roughly against her center.

Shortening his strokes to an almost manic pace, Red nudged Lizzy’s engorged clit encouragingly. A whispered rush of amazement escaped the woman.

The man’s body reacted, his testicles tightening in anticipation of his release.

“Don’t hold back...” he rasped, “those sounds are torturing me in the most delightful way.”

The woman’s breathy sighs and moans against his sensitive flesh, heightened his senses to a feverish pitch.
Red blatantly watched the show unfolding before his eyes. The woman’s knees tightened against his hips, her thighs shaking uncontrollably. Her back lifted from the bedding, presenting her breasts for his warm mouth’s caress.

Rubbing the tiny peaks with his tongue produced incredible results. A vicious snarl of compliance pushed from his throat as her core clamped his pumping shaft tightly.

“God, that’s it...” he growled his approval as Lizzy’s heels dug into his thighs.

Her slim fingers curled into his low back as she cried out, her body coiling tight.

“Please...” she whimpered, working too hard, wanting the release too much to control or synchronize her body’s need, “Red...” the unasked request touch the man’s heart.

Wrapping an arm about her waist, he tilted her pelvis, dragging his bulging shaft roughly against her over sensitized clit. He knew what to do... how to help.

“Come,” he demanded, his tone heated, “come for me, baby.”

“Oh...o-oh... God!” her voice quivered as the man nuzzled into her neckline, nipping the damp flesh.

Pushing against the fluttering tunnel, Red felt his control slipping as the little hole rushed with wet heat, soaking his groin in the milky fluid. His sack brushed against her ass cheeks, sending a staggering jolt up his spine.

The images it conjured... the sounds she was making... the unrelenting pull of her pussy...

It all drove him out of his fucking mind.

“...Jesus Christ,” he husked, “...yes.”

Hugging herself to the man, she surrendered herself to the moment.

She loved the sounds Red made when he loved her. The low grunts, growls, breathless snarls... the lustful moans as he took her deep. The long slide of his cock pushed at her tight walls, spreading them relentlessly.

Cupping his face in her hands, she captured his mouth in a fiercely passionate kiss. Their lips and tongues imitating the movement of their bodies below. The unrestrained need in that kiss made her core quiver and tug at the fat cock fucking her, drawing another pleasurable moan from the man’s throat.

“Let me feel you...” she whispered, kissing his jawline, “love me...”

“I do love you...” he whispered in a rush, “so very much.”

Opening his eyes, he connected with the deep azure blue staring back up at him. A slow smile spreading those incredibly sensual lips.

Capturing her mouth once more, he broke the passionate embrace.

“Oh, God, I’m gonna come...” she panted, the peak of her euphoria reaching a fevered pitch.

“Lizzy...” he implored she follow her body’s dictates, “please don’t stop...” his breath quickened, “God, please.”
Her mouth gaped, an abrupt erotic cry breaking free as she felt his crown expand, the shaft throbbing explosively.

Thrusting against her opening, Red pushed deeply into the oozing slit, forced to still his movements. Lizzy’s body responded accordingly, assisting in the incredible journey he was about to undertake. Hissing through clenched teeth, the creamy heat of his cum washed over his cock head as he gave himself over to the rapturous thrill.

A rush of endorphins blinded their senses. Hearts pounded rapidly as sounds faded into background, only to amplify in their own heads.

“There baby...” Red’s tone was pure indulgence as he basked in the afterglow of a job well done, “...there.” he whispered luxuriously.

Shaking with the intensity of the hot rush of his cum against her cervix, Liz tilted her hips, taking him further into her body, her pussy quivering about his straining organ.

“Did that help?” easing his cock back into the warm cushion, he gasped his awe, catching her panting lips hungrily in a kiss so intensely sensual, its completion left the woman breathlessly limp.

Liz closed her eyes, riding the wondrous wave crashing over her. Her calves tightened about his thighs, holding him deeply encased within her body.

“...Yes,” he whispered soothingly, “that’s what my baby needed.” he knew she was at the apex. He intended to enjoy each second afforded him.

Liz’s heart pounded loud in her ears, fire erupting in her veins. She was on a crest and the feelings were breathtakingly stunning.

Red’s large palm cupped her bottom, lifting her into his offering.

“That’s my good girl...” he encouraged silkily, nudging her sex, gently rutting her deeper, “take it all, baby.”

Liz pushed into his offering eagerly, her clit convulsing with the last surge of her climax. She slumped back into the soft bedding, panting with the exertion her body had expended.

Red moaned a breathy release, relaxing gradually.

The pleasant throb of completion radiated throughout his groin and thighs before traveling in a pulsing wave throughout his body.

Trembling with the aftershocks of their lovemaking, Red lay into her, smiling warmly when she lovingly wrapped herself about his bulky frame.

Trailing gentle kisses over her forehead, his eyes lit with adoration for the woman who had given him so much contentment. Wild, untamed locks of silky hair twisted about his fingers as if they too, wished him closer.

He nuzzled her nose affectionately, lavishing languid kisses on the receptive, full lips.

“I love you.” she murmured lazily, drifting in a state of total bliss.

His eyes flit over her face, a gentle smile reaching his mouth, “I love you.” he repeated the emotions back, feeling the depth of their meaning.

His flaccid cock slid free, drawing a soft disgruntled sound from both. Red chuckled lowly for the action signaled the ‘moment’ ended. It had been a very nice moment indeed.

Liz shifted begrudgingly, loathe to end the moment as well.

Smiling her contentment, Liz stretched languorously before allowing the man to gather her in his arms once again.

Relaxing in his hold, she absently traced the freckles on his shoulder.

Rubbing his hand along the slope of her spine, Red smiled as Lizzy cuddled closer into his frame. Her fingers idly played with the hair covering his torso.

“Do you think…” Red began before hesitating long enough Liz’s fingers stilled in their pastime. His mind wandered to the most oblique subject. Why, he had no clue.

“Think what?” she questioned, shifting her head to look up at the man.

“I suppose it’s naïve to assume I’m not,” he sighed, his brow knitting, “she’s a mature woman after all.”

“Red what are you rambling on about?” Liz huffed.

“… A grandfather?” he muttered. The notion at once exciting, yet vexing on the other hand. Was that a vain outlook? Of course it was.

“What?” she scowled.

“Do you think I could be?” was the question of the day. He shifted to read her expression.

Liz frowned a moment before it registered. “Are you talking about the other morning with Nora?” she questioned, “…Oh, Red we were just teasing you.” Liz soothed.

She hadn’t thought at the time... she should have, of course. Considering the man had no idea where Jennifer was... it had been a cruel joke.

“I know, I know that.” Red soothed her immediately, kissing her temple to ease the growing strain she was experiencing.

He knew it had just been a joke and had reacted in kind. But the subject nagged at him, leading him to speculate about the possibility, he could very well have a grandchild out there somewhere in the world.

“It just... it made me wonder if—”

“Red, I’m so sorry.” Liz lifted to her elbow, cupping his cheek in her palm. “I didn’t take into consideration that—”

“It’s all right, sweetheart.” he stressed, kissing the sadness from her lips. “I know you didn’t mean to hurt me. And you didn’t. I just... I’ve missed so much.” he had been made to realize.

Liz moved closer into his embrace, her eyes gentle. “We will find her, Red.” she promised.

Red nodded absently once again becoming lost in his thoughts. He looked at her after a beat of silence, needing her point of view on the matter, “But... I could be, right?”

“I suppose you could be, yes.” she murmured softly. “Jennifer and I are around the same age,” she shrugged, “and you know our own predicament.”

Red’s eyes softened, snuggling the woman closer. They were awaiting news of the baby kind, themselves.

Red sighed as his next thought materialized, “Does it bother you?”

“No.” she replied without hesitation.

“I’m old, Lizzy.”

“For an old guy, you have amazing stamina.” she giggled at the absurdity of his statement.

“Reality sucks.” he grumbled despondently.

“Your advanced age,” Liz teased, “didn’t stop you from just knocking my socks off.”

“You weren’t wearing socks,” he muttered, playfully nipping her shoulder, “or much of anything else. Thank the Lord.”

She continued on, ignoring his diversion tactic, “Lauren Bacall and Humphrey Bogart, Michael Douglas and Catherine Zeta Jones, Celine Dion and that French guy–”

“I get your point.” Red conceded. He had to admit if only to himself that he knew of a dozen couples he personally associated with that had a significant gap in their age brackets.

And they were happy. Or surface appearances would have it, at least.

“I love you,” she kissed his chin, “no matter how decrepit and aged you are.” she trailed off, hiding her mischief filled eyes.

Red tweaked her side in response, eliciting a sharp yelp from her.

Playfully wrestling with his little troublemaker, he chuckled as the woman valiantly tried to escape his reach but was too waylaid by her own laughter to make much headway.

“I suppose I should thank you for praising my talents.” he got the giggling woman under his control, kissing her smiling lips.

Her eyes softened as the man rolled to his back, taking her along with him as he went.

Laying in the quiet, Liz drew shapeless patterns across his chest, waiting patiently.

She finally understood what Red meant when he said he could almost hear her thinking.

He was practically screaming he had something on his mind... something was bothering him, though he had not said a word. Would he share freely this time or...

“How can I ever make up for everything I missed?” he confided solemnly, finally breaking the silence. “Would she even care if I tried?” he didn’t see how it could matter now, after so long a time.

“If it tells you anything,” Liz began, “I know my parents were rotten to the core but if they came back, genuinely wishing to make amends for...” she trailed off, sighing, “I honestly think Jennifer would open herself to at least trying, Ray.”

She held his eyes for a long moment until the man grudgingly nodded, accepting her outlook on the situation.

“She couldn’t help but love you, Red.” she added, before laying her head back down, cuddling the man.

Tucking his cheek against her soft hair, he remained silent, letting the words settle.

He hugged the woman closer, needing the warmth she exuded both emotionally and physically.

He hoped beyond hope she was correct in her assumptions where his daughter was concerned.

♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥

Red and Liz lay ensconced in the quiet seclusion of their bed until Lizzy’s stomach rumbled hungrily.

He smiled his affectionate as she tried to hide the fact obviously not ready to leave the warmth of the bed or their private time.

While Red had to agree, he wasn’t ready to leave the confines of their room and deal with the world outside either. This particular morning, unlike previous ones, started on a high note.

Both were well rested and thoroughly sated.

He sincerely hoped to do as Lizzy wished and begin each day in the same manner although he knew life rarely allowed for such luxuries.

While it went without saying he adored the physical intimacy they shared, it wasn’t just making love he enjoyed.

He totally appreciated the uninterrupted time and conversations they shared.

They often spoke on an eclectic series of subjects ranging from dream vacations to favorite subjects they studied in school.

And now, Jennifer had been addressed and how he missed so much in his daughter’s life.

They spent many such mornings, wrapped in the sheet and little else... baring themselves to one another on the most intimate level imaginable. It went beyond the physical.

Is that part of why they were so open with one another in these moments? They couldn’t hide their faults or imperfections physically... so why not go ahead and share confidences which bared their souls as well?

These unhurried early mornings together were a favorite part of his day and he knew they meant a great deal to Lizzy as well.

Having experienced rushed mornings where there was barely time to savor a cup of coffee, let alone greet their other half was a small blessing many couples took for granted.

He recalled many times arriving on base, realizing that Carla had not returned his wish for a good day or said ‘I love you’ as he closed the door behind him.
Lizzy had experienced much of the same, within the confines of her marriage.

Stolen moments where a couple were alone, together, were not only cherished but beneficial to any relationship.

If they should make love in the midst of that perfect morning and share stolen kisses as they dressed... it made their day that much better. Or at least, it did Red’s.

And truth told, he secretly thought, should something happen to him he would know he left Lizzy with a pleasant memory of intimate private time... and now the words, ‘I love you’.

As much as they would love to continue on with the lackadaisical way the day started off... duty called.

After enjoying an extended breakfast with Lizzy, they both more than reluctantly readied themselves for work.

Liz settled into her routine, opening her email. She smiled when she was greeted with the new office gossip which Aram supplied on a regular basis. Along with the good stuff, a mountain of new files for her to profile also filled her inbox.

Red seemed to be engrossed in a lengthy conference with Michael Fairfax involving the little incident in Cartagena.

While she was not privy to all the details of what exactly transpired, or the ‘why of it all’... she did know Red informed her he had to leave for a brief trip to New York on Michael’s behalf.

Much to her vexation.

The man had just been shot in the head, for heaven’s sake, which she pointed out in no uncertain terms. Her words fell on deaf ears.

Red had wrapped his arms about her waist, drawing the pouting woman against him.

“I'll be taking Francis with me.” he soothed her fretful brow, “How much trouble can we get into?” he teased.

“God only knows.” it was vowed. She lifted blue eyes at that, taking solace that her friend would be there to pick up the slack if need be.

“You’ll call...” she lowered her eyes, fingering his lapel and tie, “when you land?”

“I'll call every chance I get.” he assured. “I promise, this won’t take too long.”

“It better not.” she frowned, stroking a gentle finger over the scab on his head.

“Trust me, Lizzy,” he rumbled deeply, “I’ll do everything I can to be here in time to enjoy another wake up call with you.”

Red held his smile admirably, until the woman flushed faintly, rolling her eyes to cover the moment.

“I love you.” Red murmured, a peace settling in his chest to be able to say the words so freely.

Liz relaxed in his embrace, her eyes clearing. She ‘loved’ hearing the phrase, “I love you too.”

Reluctantly kissing Red goodbye. She wistfully waved her farewells until he pulled from the drive, no longer in sight.

She closed the door behind her, leaning into the solid wood, listening to the stillness of the house.

She never realized how much the men’s presence permeated the space until now. It was as if they had taken the energy, the soul of the space... the essence, along with their departure.

She couldn’t be sure if the quiet was a good or bad thing at present.

Usually, Francis would already be here providing distraction with his charismatic charm and good-natured laughter, but since he was accompanying Red on this outing, it left Liz a bit out-of-sorts.

She pushed off the door facing, resolved to getting on with the day at hand. Looking off down the hall, she smiled at the sight of the budding blooms and lush lawn through the French doors...

What a lovely sight. It cheered her heart. She pulled up slowly, her steps halting as a thought occurred.

The normal wired restlessness she experienced when Red left... was subdued. She felt at ease somehow, even without Francis here to fill the void.

There was a different vibe suddenly. This wasn’t so bad after all. She continued on absently, her destination predetermined.

A small smile curved her lips as she remembered the activities of this morning. She was incredibly pleased Red had been so receptive to her early morning demands.

But then, he had been since the first time she made sexual advances towards him.

She had been so nervous that first time, but the ache between her legs demanded she comply to her body’s dictates.

Tom had always been slow on the uptake. He would blink bleary eyes, go to the bathroom, let the dog out... leaving her in bed writhing anxiously.

Tom left her feeling guilty for having awakened him and frustrated sexually because usually, he would get off and leave her in the lurch. Fucker that he was...

Red, on the other hand, never hesitated to deliver.

She dearly loved the man’s ability to conform to any situation.

He was awake and ready to perform within the blink of an eye. And perform he did. Red made her feel sexy, sensual and loved. She never felt neglected with him.

She really appreciated that Red didn’t fuck and run.

She really loved when they got to spend quality time together. It was an amazing feeling knowing Red wanted to be with her even after the fact.

But today, it felt different.

To anyone else, it may seem like no big deal.

That he shared self-doubt... trusted her enough to confide an incredibly personal detail about himself. He expressed his love for her in ways she never imagined a man could... or would bother.
She felt an inner peace she never experienced before.

So many little things were coming together so seamlessly.

His need to be certain she was in this for the long haul. Her need to know she was his confidant. So many pressing questions were being answered.

Pulling her phone free, she impulsively shot off a quick text, telling Red how much she loved him. She grinned a moment later when Red, who hated to text, replied in kind... he said it so much better than she ever could have, of course.

Yes, it was the little things that meant so much... just as Red always said.

June 3

As promised, Red called the moment they landed in New York. He promised another call back shortly with a progress report on the issue at hand because, “I know how you like to gossip and carry on about things that are really none of your concern.”

She laughed, sticking out her tongue.

“There are better things to do with that tongue little girl.”

Liz had blinked her surprise to know the man could sense her reaction even over the phone.

Four hours later, she was becoming angsty, admittedly when Red’s expected call did not materialize. But finally he chimed in again just when she was about to make contact herself.

An unexpected encounter with a Blacklister had thrown a wrench into the works.

Red was juggling priorities.

He was keeping tabs on the guy but he needed assistance from the team as manpower was in short supply this day.

Liz jotted down the pertinent information to relay.

“It will take time to get there, Red. They don’t have your resources.” she realized.

“Tell them to pack an overnight bag.”

“No...” she moaned, “I was hoping you could come back this evening.”

“From your sweet lips to God’s ear,” he sighed, “but no, baby. This will take some doing but if they move their asses we can contain this bastard in no time, considering.”

She had nodded her understanding.

“This fucker deals with chemical warfare,” the man continued, “I want him gone, out of the picture before I return home.”
“Of course,” she commented, “I just miss your cock.”

“You have all those little toys in the bedside table.”

She wrinkled her nose, “Not the same.”

“Not even the purple one?” he teased.

“Is this going to be one of ‘those’ calls?” she settled down to enjoy the ride if so.

Red checked his watch, “Give me a rain check. I want to Google the subject... get it right before I attempt an assault on your sensitivities.”

“You’ve never had phone sex before?” she perked up totally interested in his reply.

“You’ll never believe this story,” Red settled back to relate the tale, “I was in Baltimore in March of ’84, cost me nearly $4,000 to buy this thing...” he winced with the memory, “was talking on the Motorola DynaTAC 8000X, one of the first handheld cellphones...”

Liz held her amusement. She always enjoyed these insightful history lessons.

“I was talking with Petty Officer Virginia Sherman one quiet spring night while on night patrol on base...”

“You were talking on a cell phone while on patrol?”

“And one thing led to another, as things invariably will...” he cocked his head smiling at the reminiscence.

“Bet you looked great in your uniform.” she had often imagined the image.

“And we were just about to reach the pinnacle of all that smoldering pent-up desire...” the man steadfastly ignored the interruptions.

“This is turning me on actually.” Liz quipped.

“When I dropped the damn phone into my lap...” he grimaced accordingly, “needless to say spoiling an otherwise perfect moment.”

Liz tried to stifle her chuckle.

“My God, do you remember how large those phones were?” he shook his head regretfully, “it was like dropping a brick on my who-who.”

She spit out an infectious bout of laughter, “Your who-who?”

“It’s a wonder I can perform at all, considering.” he enjoyed her laughter so very much, even if it was at his own expense.

“I’m thinking about touching my own who-who after such a titillating tale.” she confided.

His throaty chuckle alleviated her doldrums, “You behave,” he instructed, “I’ll make it up to you and your who-who when I get there.”

It was safe to say, Liz was more than ready for the man’s return.
Red called early the next morning, informing her the team nabbed their man. He sounded tired but upbeat.

While they had been gone, Liz had taken the opportunity to dive into work. Aside from meals Silas demanded she eat in the dining room to give herself a break, she stayed ensconced in her room. Pumping out profile after profile.

...Until now. A snag had put an abrupt halt to her flow.

“Stupid thing!” Liz groused, punching the keys on her laptop excessively hard. After hours of research and two restarts to her computer, she barely had a paragraph written. All because this stupid computer wasn’t cooperating with her.

This criminal appeared to possess no past or present except one sheet of a general report on his recent arrest. The net could produce nothing else what-so-ever.

No digital footprint.

Was Google purposely screwing with her?

She checked possible issues with her search engines using her own name. Not much information out there, but enough to know she existed. She didn’t have social media accounts but an old article appeared in her hometown newspaper which amused her.

There was the engagement announcement and wedding photos dutifully displayed. My God, was that the hairstyle she had chosen?

She appeared on the census report under Sam’s name.

She had even been registered with Classmates. Elizabeth Keen did indeed exist in the world, somehow.

But... not this bastard.

She threw up her hands, considering stopping for the day but an idea struck her. She wasn’t a quitter, after all.

She mischievously typed in Red’s name. He had his own Wikipedia page. Color her impressed. She shook her head, reading it if only out of morbid curiosity.

She read studiously, a fixed scowl on her face. “Well, that’s just a lie.” she disagreed vehemently with several ‘facts’ listed.

How the hell did someone issue a correction on this erroneous information? She was incensed for Red but she knew it didn’t really matter to the man what people thought or said.

She wished she could develop that thick skin. She wasn’t at the point just yet.
Scrolling, she crept up on his personal information, only mildly disappointed that she was not listed as someone of import. His first wife was afforded four entire paragraphs.

It was a silly thought of course, but there was a part of her that wished she was listed as someone significant to Red. Humans were so petty.

Smiling to herself, she cleared the page. She was absolutely sure now that her equipment was working properly.

Reentering her search parameters of the man she was profiling, she once again hit a dead end.

Typing in another name, her fingers hesitated over the keyboard. She suddenly realized... she didn’t know Silas’ last name.

She never asked, and it had never been supplied. Though, she was positive if she were to ask, Silas would say he didn’t need one, as he was just that special.

He would be among the ranks of the other one name wonders such as Socrates, Pythagoras, Cher, Bono, Prince... or The Artist Formally Known As...

Liz chuckled at her thoughts, sipping her coffee absently.

She sat the cup aside, a brilliant thought striking her.

The woman rapidly typed in Francis Holbrook’s name.

She waited patiently, chomping into one of Nora’s still warm chocolate chip cookies. She had settled more comfortably in her seat. The screen lit up with paragraph after paragraph of neat print.

She coughed painfully as she unintentionally swallowed the steaming liquid. Liz’s mouth fell agape as she scanned the list.

Scrolling the numerous pages, she attempted to comprehend sentences she saw.

Keywords popped out at her, one after another.

Tax evasion, racketeering, extortion, conspiracy, weapons trafficking, money laundering... conspiracy to commit murder...

Murder??

Her heart pounded loudly in her ears.

Criminal charge after criminal charge splayed out before her very eyes.

Sure, she had surmised the guy was some sort of criminal...

She hastily ran to the top of the page once more, grasping at straws. She had surely typed in the wrong name.

Oh my God...

Liz sat back, stunned... confused... she didn’t know what to think... to do... to feel.

Fantastic profiling skills you have there, Lizzy.
She felt like a fool.

Snippets of past conversations flashed through her mind, past actions, scenarios....

Francis vouching for Red Reddington with Antonio Crocetti’s brother. Red’s total belief in Francis’ abilities to handle a ‘war’ as it were after Carver approached her in Las Vegas.

Francis’ total lack of concern or fear when he and Red had gone up against Tom or Cheung....

Her nerves were shot, her hands shook as she sat her cup down, the porcelain vibrating against the wood. Setting one hand over the other, she placed it solidly on the desk.

She stared at the object morosely, clenching her hands tightly together.

She instinctively reached for the phone, retracting her hand as if the device were red hot.

What would she say? How could she possibly get any coherent thoughts out?

Her eyes flitted to the walkie-talkie constantly by her side.

Did Silas even know?

Of course Silas knew.

She clasp her hand to her mouth.

She was an FBI agent for God’s sake. She should not be associating....

What an absurd thing to say! She already was associating with a known criminal. A very well known one!

She was in love with the guy!

She was going to kill the guy when she saw him for keeping her in the dark like...

“My darling little sugar baby,” the guy’s warm, earthy voice filled the space around her, “you home?”

Liz released the breath she had unconsciously been holding, relief washing over her.

She had not heard the front door open, so engrossed in the horrible discovery she had blundered into.

She raised from the chair hastily, scrambling forward to the opened door of her bedroom only to pull up short at another recognized intruder joining in on the conversation.

“Afraid she’s off dwindling down your fortune?”

Liz panicked, clear and simple, rushing back to the laptop, minimizing the tabs with lightening speed.

“Woman of the house...” Red was in high spirits, using his Irish accent freely.

She could hear footsteps nearing, her eyes darting to the screen.

“Where’s me tea?” the lilting voice enquired.

“Oh shit.” she breathed out, turning about just as her desktop image appeared. She plastered a smile on her face.
“Irish, eh?” Francis was nodding his approval as they entered the room, his attention on his companion so Liz had an opportunity to settle a bit before the inevitable face to face confrontation.

“I can do French really well.” Francis smirked. “Or so says my dates.” the man preened. “Though, my ‘Italian’ is perfection.” he boasted. “Want to hear it?”

“I prefer your Klingon.” Red tossed his fedora on the bed spread, leaning to kiss Liz’s mouth gently. “Hello, baby.”

“That new system already has some bugs.” Francis was checking his messages, his face askew.

“We expected that.” Red’s attention was elsewhere.

Liz kept a bright smile going, her system reeling in the younger man’s presence, in truth.

“Everyone needs to be patient and let things evolve.” Red’s scowl had deepened. He pulled Lizzy closer.

“Therein lies the problem, doesn’t it?” Francis rolled his eyes. “I’m all for it, but the old bastards....” he groused, “that remains to be seen.”

“You know, they think the same about you young hooligans.” Red cocked a brow.

“Thanks... at least I’ve been upgraded from street rat to a hooligan. Guess that means I’m getting somewhere” Francis smiled cheekily. “As for the ‘old ways’,” he air quoted, “sure, some methods may work still,” he granted, “but the updated methods aren’t all that bad either.”

“I don’t always agree with them either, Francis.” Red conceded. “But you can learn a lot from their side as well.”

“Antonio, I don’t mind.” Francis admitted. “He’s moved with the times. But the others...” he groaned. “Now I know how people felt going up against the Luddites.” he sighed.

Red pulled up short, looking at the boy queerly.

“What?” Francis frowned. “It may not be the Industrial Revolution they’re against, but it’s the same difference, for the most part.”

“No,” Red waved the issue off, “I was just surprised you knew what a Luddite was.”

“I do read you know.” Francis screwed up his face, slightly annoyed.

“I assumed you did...” Red nodded, “I didn’t think you had graduated past Mad magazine.”

“They did an issue on the subject.” Francis chuckled, defending his choice of reading material. “But no, my source was from Uncle John’s Bathroom Reader.”

“Of course.” Red shook his head woefully.

“If you didn’t want me to read them, you shouldn’t have turned me on to them.” Francis shrugged the conversation aside.

“What are you two talking about?” Liz asked politely, sensing Red’s overt interest.

Red cocked his head to one side, “All right, what’s going on?”
Liz did not lose her carefully controlled façade, “What do you mean?”

“You just got home,” Francis muttered, “and you’re already in trouble. How the hell did you manage that?”

Red shrugged, just as baffled as Francis. But had to concur, there seemed to be a shift in the Cosmo’s since he was last here, though he wasn’t sure why.

“Well, this should prove interesting.” he too wondered at the woman’s mood, shifting his weight to the other foot, “What have I done now?”

Sighing heavily, Liz shook her head for the lack of decorum. Sometimes Red could be so perfect. And then so perfectly male in his denseness.

“What have I done now?” she pinched her lips sternly.

Red sensed his faux pas but didn’t really get the problem.

His eyes widened slightly, a thought occurring to him. Perhaps in his absence, Lizzy had learned news about their little predicament?

Francis laughed quietly, shaking his own head with open sympathy. “You’re digging a grave man!” he warned. “Stop while you’re ahead.”

Red smiled, “Pass me the shovel.” he quipped, “It’s just, Francis.” he hooked his thumb to the guy.

“Still, a little propriety wouldn’t kill you sometimes.” Liz muttered. “It could be a very private matter.” she narrowed the pretty eyes once more.

“Drop an anvil next time... it’s more subtle.” Francis smiled at the woman’s vexation, taking the folder Red handed him. “I’ll check to see how things are moving along.” he said, waving the folder about. “When you’re done getting your ass reamed... call.”

Liz sat at her desk, her legs giving way.

Red listened as the man’s footsteps cleared the hallway before pulling a chair up in front of her.

“Now, you want to tell me what’s wrong?” Red gave her every bit of his attention.

“Do you know who Francis is!” she hissed quietly, reopening the page she had previously viewed.

Red scowled slightly unprepared for the turn in conversation. He had thought...

“Of course you know!” the woman rolled her eyes expressively, jabbing the screen.

Red leaned forward, his expressionless eyes scanning the page. He scrolled the page a little, sitting back in his seat... chuckling.

Liz’s mouth gaped, then closed, only to gape open once more.

“Francis is not an Associate of the Mafia.” Red shook his head at the absurdity.

Liz pointed at the screen again offering proof, “Google doesn’t lie!”

“In this case, and the case of Silas’ mystery mole... it does.” he sighed, getting comfortable in his

“What the hell are you saying!” she bitched.

“When I happened upon Francis again, he was a street rat.” Red smiled, remembering back all those years. “I suppose he felt he fit the surroundings.” his eyes softened, as had his voice.

“Street rat?” Liz searched her memory for the meaning of the slang expression.

“The ears on the street for a mobster I had dealings with.” he sat back, crossing his ankles. He was getting comfortable for story time, she sensed as much.

“No one noticed him hanging around because he was young, looked appropriately grungy. They thought he was just some homeless kid.”

“How did he get from street rat to... to... whatever he is today?” she gestured wildly to the computer screen.

“His present position, you mean?” Red enquired.

She hesitated, “Yes... yes, I mean that!”

“Me.” Red lifted gray eyes, holding her blue ones easily.

“I despised the bastard he was running for, thought he treated his men like shit, especially the incredibly loyal ones, like Francis.” Red recalled the beginning with a certain fondness.

“Go on!” she prompted urgently, her nerves strung tightly.

“I gave Francis information about some product that would rake in lots of cash,” Red shrugged, “and instead of taking it to the Boss, as was protocol,” he grinned mischievously, “Francis took it to the bank, like I hoped he would.” he stated proudly. “Made a name for himself overnight.”

“But... the guy, this mobster guy, he didn’t kill Francis for... for what he did?”

“He tried, but we were there.” Red shrugged. “It was messy, it was violent, but Francis and my team won out in the end.”

“So, then what happened.” she was on tenterhooks.

“Francis took his place.” he spread his hands accordingly.

It seemed an obvious progression to Red.

Liz’s eyes widened at the implication. “Are you saying that Francis is a... a... mob boss?”

“That is exactly what I’m saying.” he nodded. “Well, to be more precise, Francis is considered the Godfather of the Mafia.”

“No...” she faltered, “that... can’t be,” she was totally confused, “...Antonio.”

“Despite his age, Antonio stepped aside.” Red explained, “Antonio is lower in the ranks than Francis.”

Liz sat back, drained. She took a moment to digest all that had been said. “Francis treats him—”
“With the respect the man has earned.” Red replied. “Besides, Antonio paved the way for Francis.”

Liz’s scowl increased a little, “Why would he do that? I thought once they had the power...”

“Antonio is smarter than that besides,” Red stated, “it was time to step down.”

Liz seemed deflated, “It’s not like in the movies...”

“Despite his age at the time, Antonio demanded the men give Francis the respect of his rank.” Red clarified, chuckling for her outlook, “He had fought for it and won, after all.”

“So he’s...” Liz’s finger shook as she pointed to all the charges listed.

“Well, he’s no Gambino or Luciano, if that’s what you’re asking, not yet anyway.” Red shrugged. “But essentially, yes. Or to an extent.”

Liz’s face paled considerably at the thought Francis could... no, that didn't even make sense.

"I don't understand..." she confessed, "Francis is so... so..."

"Stupid?" he chuckled, "I assure you Lizzy, that is just a façade he projects. He is far from... stupid."

She looked at him doubtfully.

“In his defense though, most of those charges and some others not listed, pertain to me as well.” Red motioned, “Have you read my page?”

She looked guiltily aside.

“For instance, mine states I’m in the prostitution business.” he explained. “And you know I would never involve myself in that.”

“But m-murder?” her eyes fell sadly, as did her hopes.

“Don’t worry, Lizzy. Francis doesn’t go around putting people in cement over shoes.” Red chided. “He’s actually cleaned up a lot of what the bastard before him did.” he tried to sound impartial. “Let’s just say the neighborhoods that used to be terrified of seeing these guys coming, now instead, feel relief.”

Liz felt torn. Before, Francis had just been a funny guy she enjoyed spending time with, even knowing he did some off the book business.

He made her laugh. She had fun with him and was so fond of him, it hurt to think...

She really liked Francis, a lot.

No, she loved Francis. He was her best-friend. Her only true friend.

Now, she discovered he’s like Tony Soprano.

You can sure pick them, Lizzy.

Red watched the woman growing paler by the second and knew for a fact what she was thinking.

“Lizzy, look at me.” he dipped his head, finding the woman’s troubled eyes. “Your instincts tell you, that you like Francis, it’s all right.” he assured.
“Why didn’t you tell me.” she wailed.

“Because you love him.” Red clasped her hand, gentling her fingers.

“I saw how close you were getting and knew that given time, what he is wouldn’t matter to you.” Red told the truth. “He’s a good man.” he squeezed her slim fingers comfortably, understanding her state. “I would tell you otherwise, trust me.”

Hope filled her eyes. She wanted so desperately to believe him.

Red slid forward, his legs bracketing hers. “You remember when I warned you about Edward?” he said quietly. “That I said he was no good, and I was right?”

“Yes.”

“I’m telling you,” he rubbed her knee soothingly, “Francis is good people.”

Liz read his features for a moment, finding the absolute truth staring her back in the face.

“Okay.” She breathed her relief.

She liked Francis so much, she would have been heartbroken to find out he was ‘that’ type of person later on.

“And Mark, Ben?” she questioned, suddenly apprehensive.

“I wouldn’t have let you get close to them if I thought they were totally corrupt.” he teased, “I would have told you to keep your distance.”

“All right.” She didn’t have many friends, and obviously wasn’t a great judge of character. She had grown close to the men. She felt better that Red vouched for the guys.

“Granted, anyone can turn disloyal in the blink of an eye,” he reminded her to be on alert, “but Francis... he will never turn against me.” he stressed. “Ever.”

“Because of your history?” she questioned.

Red’s mouth pulled into a smile, as he chuckled quietly. “...Yes... partly.”

Liz’s brow furrowed at the small smile on the man’s face. “What?”

A soft knock on the door interrupted the session. Red pushed out of the chair to respond, leaving Liz with more questions than answers.

But on the bright side she had received more answers than she ever imagined or usually received in one setting with Red Reddington.

A few moments later Red was back at her side, reseated and patiently waiting.

“What are you doing here?” Red tapped the papers beside her, breaking her reverie.

“Oh, this guy got me started on this journey.” she sighed, flicking the papers in disgust. “I kept searching for anything on him but came up empty each time.” she sat back, crossing her arms over her chest. “There is absolutely no footprint at all.”

She slid the papers over to the man beside her, her frustration resurfacing. Red looked them over carefully, taking his time.

“No birth certificate, census record, not even a parking ticket!” Liz sighed heavily.

“Well, maybe if you looked under his real name.” Red drawled, having sensed the woman’s aggravation.

“Are you telling me I’ve been sitting here for I don’t know how many freaking hours looking for someone who—” she snapped.

“His name is not Timothy Phillips.” he shrugged, gingerly sliding the folder back her way. “It’s Mario Rosselli.”

“I can’t freaking believe...” she gritted through her teeth. Liz dropped her head back against the chair, whining her despair.

Red stood up, looking down at the scrunched face. “Baby, do yourself a favor and start shooting me a picture of them or the preliminary paperwork you have,” he chuckled, dropping a small kiss to her forehead, “just on the off chance I might know them.

Raising to his full height, he carded his fingers through her long hair, easing the tension in increments until she sighed and relaxed.

Flipping her page over, she sat up straight, putting pen to paper, ready to begin her renewed search, “Hope spring eternal.” she mused, “If you have the right freaking name.” she reached for the keyboard, drawing up short.

“Red?” she looked up at the man, a nagging issue plaguing her, “What’s Silas’ last name? Better yet, is Silas, Silas’ name?”

The man snickered under his breath, shaking his head in open amusement. He opened his mouth to issue a reply, only to have the sound of a ring tone interrupt.

Growling under her breath, “I don’t believe this!” Liz staunchly returned to her keyboard... ignoring Red’s throaty chuckle of amusement as he answered the call.

“Told you, you were a gossip.” he quipped lightly.

♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥

After lunch, Liz lost Red to the Universe once again. But now that she had Mario Rosselli’s real name, the profile came together quickly. She signed off on it after about an hour.

She looked at the large stack of manila folders requiring her attention with a menacing glare.

She used the excuse that it was prudent to wait for Red’s input before continuing, which also lessened the guilt about–

“What’d you do?” Silas breezed his way in, holding a large vase of flowers, “blow Red during lunch?” he held the bouquet aloft.

Liz sighed, pushing up out of her chair, meeting the man halfway, directing he sit them on the dresser.

“If I had done that, I would’ve got chocolates too.” she scanned the large arrangement absently.
“What?” Silas had sensed something amiss from her reaction but was waylaid when Joe entered, holding a box in capable hands.

Silas grasped the flowers hastily, shoving them at the unsuspecting guard, “Get them out of here.”

Joe rushed from the room, vanishing from sight as quickly as he had arrived.

“You didn’t deliver flowers and chocolates to me, did you?” Liz had followed her own instincts, having dialed Red hastily, “...I didn’t think so.”

Silas pulled the radio from his hip, depressing the button. “Put the package in the box.” the man ordered. “I’ll handle it shortly.”

“No, we both thought they were from you at first,” she explained, “then I really looked at the bouquet and it just wasn’t your style.” she confessed her misgivings.

She looked at her guard, finding the man scowling as he talked quietly into his radio.

“Silas made Joe get rid of them...” she further added. “Easy come, easy go, I guess.” she listened attentively, then handed the phone out for her guard.

“The package is secure.” Silas confirmed for Red. “I will address it when you arrive back.”

Shutting down the phone, he handed it over, shaking his head. “We’re going to have to take extra precautions.”

“We couldn’t have known.” she soothed the man.

She knew he was worried about his oversight. If it had been anyone else, it wouldn’t have been odd to receive flowers from a man, especially one as thoughtful as Red Reddington.

But then, they weren’t just anyone else. And Red, being the type of man he was... would deliver his gifts personally.

They were all treading into new territory here and it seemed, everyone would have to be on their guard.

She knew it was going to eat at Silas all day, or until Red told him to let it go... but it didn’t occur to her either that something was wrong until she really looked the bouquet over.

They were beautiful flowers but... they were all white.

Red would have gone out of his way to infuse color into the arrangement. To have meaning behind any gift he sent.

The flowers he had given her the night of Francis’ party, were vivid and fragrant. In hindsight, they were a perfect mixture of friendship and admiration.

The flowers he gave her on their first date had been just as startling, but one solid color. On her return home from New York, she had been curious why he picked orange roses, and had been pleasantly surprised to find they signified a new journey, but also the growing desire and passion Red felt for her.

“Silas, it’s all right.” she frowned at her guard who stood brooding by the doorway. “Red is thoughtful. It’s not an impossibility he would send me flowers.”
“No.” Silas grated his rising anger for his lapse. “Red would have called to alert me of their arrival.”

“All right...” she granted, “but let me ask you this,” she looked up at the man, “have you ever been put in this position before? Of taking a delivery of flowers for a woman Red is dating?”

“That’s not his style.” Silas replied.

“Well, that surprises me, as well.” she confided, a little embarrassed truth told. “So... we’re all new at this. Aren’t we?”

Silas grudgingly nodded his understanding.

“It’s settled then, we’ll just have Red inform you of any incoming deliveries, so you know they’re safe.” she found the simple solution. “But don’t you dare tell me anything is coming!” she warned playfully. “I want to be surprised.”

“I just don’t want you getting killed.” Silas sighed impatiently. “He’ll be in a horrendous mood if that happens.”

Liz’s shoulders slumped at the easy way the thought rolled off the man’s tongue. He didn’t seem all that upset at the thought of her demise.

“I will go out of my way to prevent that from happening.” she stated sarcastically.

“You get a paper cut and Red gripes about it all week.” he bitched, continuing his tirade. “Can you imagine the alternative?”

“I’d rather not, you morbid bastard.” she told the truth.

Red came sweeping into the room, making a beeline for the woman. He drew her into a crushing embrace, burying his face in the lush fragrance of her hair.

“I may never buy you flowers again.” the man murmured into her neckline, so very glad to feel her safe and unharmed.

“You better buy me flowers again.” the woman chuckled into his shoulder.

“Where are they?” Red turned his attention to the guard, his entire manner businesslike.

“Joe put everything in the box.”

“What the hell is this box you keep talking about?” Liz demanded.

“Any suspicious packages are put in the box in case they explode.” Silas replied evenly.

“You put the flowers...” she screwed up her face, “in a blast resistant box?”

“The liquid they are contained in could be explosive, for all we know.” Silas stated off-handedly.

“Is he always so paranoid?” Liz questioned, half teasing, half... not.

“Are you kidding?” she scoffed, “You expect me to work? I’ve worked all morning without a break.”
“You had lunch.” Silas retorted.

Liz gave him a ‘shut-up’ look.

“Read a book.” Red suggested. “Just don’t come out of this room. Silas needs to concentrate and he can’t do that if he’s bickering with you.”

She sat at the end of the bed, grudgingly. Already waiting.

“When we’re done, I’ll let you know.”

“When we’re done,” she mimicked, “we’ll let you know.”

Red gave her a look that spoke volumes.

The minutes passed at a snails pace. Red came back sticking his head in the door waving for her to follow twenty long minutes later.

Bolting from the edge of her seat, Liz trailed after the man as they made their way to the guest house garage, of all places.

“I’m sure you’ve made the connection that the flowers all signified purity, innocence...” Red related what he had learned himself, informing the woman of the progress so far.

“And the package?” she questioned Silas and a carefully looked over box.

Silas waited by the object in question, his look one of sheer boredom.

Liz glanced over the articles on display.

“A purity ring and other paraphernalia.” Red sighed, waving over the host of gifts the package had enclosed.

“Okay...” she drawled, “he knows I haven’t been a virgin in a while.” she lifted a pensive stare.

“Apparently, you are to wear these,” Red smiled, “to ward off my evil spirit,” he explained, presenting a letter that had arrived with the package, “and I’m sure to curb my sexual advances.” the man’s brow crooked oddly.

“That ship has sailed.” Dembe prophesied sagely.

“Yeah, he’s a little late to the party, isn’t he?” she grinned. “Besides, to my way of thinking, he really should have sent them to you.” she batted her eyes coquettishly at Red.

“Why, because you are evil or just a hussy.” Silas muttered.

“Well, I’m not evil.” the woman smirked a reply.

“Says you...” Silas grumbled, fingerling the exposed parts of the box absently. “It’s totally clean.” he shrugged any concern aside.

“From now on, all packages are to be screened.” Red directed. “All deliveries—”

“Confirmed before passing the gate.” Silas finished the thought verbatim.

“What are we gonna do with that.” she gestured to the gifts.
“They’re going in an off site safe.” Red handed them over to Joe, who in turn handed them to David who looked around for someone to hand off to, coming up empty.

“Why,” Liz asked cheekily, “do you think they’ll explode?”

“No,” Silas replied sourly, “but they may be bugged, twirp.”

“Seriously... are you always this paranoid?” she questioned once more.

“Since you’ve become so popular with the psycho crowd?” the man answered sweetly. “...Yes.”

“I don’t recall Jared advertising the ‘Wiretap Your Obsession’ jewelry collection?”

“It’s their new Fall line,” Silas narrowed his eyes, “on the shelves for the Christmas shopping season.”

Red tried to concentrate on the newly arrived communication.

“Lizzy?” he got the woman’s attention away from her guard. “Before we went to Vegas and just again recently, this jackass said to meet him in your special place and that you would know how to contact him,” he recalled. “Do you know what he’s talking about?”

“Why don’t I just go ask him?” Silas offered politely. Dembe stood as well by his friend, ready to go confront Tom on a level he personally had wished to do, for some time now.

Red pointedly ignored the men.

Liz thought of places Tom would consider special to them, but couldn’t pinpoint a single one. None of their old haunts held any special meaning to her now.

“Nothing is really coming to mind,” she shrugged, “the park near campus where we first met, the theater where we had our first kiss...” she named off a couple, ‘gagging’ slightly on the latter.

She fell silent having enjoyed Silas’ chuckle for her antics. Liz dug deep into her mind, trying for anything that might be of use.

“You know...” she began, “when I was dating Nik, I started seeing Tom on the side a little.”

“Like I said,” Silas muttered quietly, “...hussy.”

Liz’s lips quivered with amusement, but she forged on. “I would call this restaurant to make plans with him.” she scrunched her nose, a little put off by her behavior then as well. “I don’t recall the name or number, really. I’ll have to think about it or,” she perked up, “maybe I can drive there.”

Red nodded slowly, getting lost in his own thoughts. “We’ll take a drive,” he decided. “Did you have a specific time you would call?”

“I think it was about seven.” she remembered back.

“Silas, has Tom left at any specific times?” Red questioned the guard.

“He comes, he goes” the man replied.

“Not much has changed, I see.” Liz muttered aside.

Silas chortled quietly, before returning his attention to Red, “About three times a day. No specific times.”

“\text{I want you to make note of the times he—}” Red was handed a small book. He started to peruse the listings inside.

“And if he does leave at seven?” she craned her neck to see what Silas had written down.

“Maybe we can trap the bastard.” Red said.

Liz glanced at the clock, grimacing. “Oh shit, I’m gonna be late.”

“Late?” Red frowned.

“For physical therapy.” Liz reminded. “Silas?” she looked at her guard, “I can be ready in five.”

“When I see it, I’ll believe it.” the man inclined his head, “We’ll make it. I’ll get the car.”

“Thank you.” she smiled as the man retreated from the room.

Red shook his head, “Baby, I don’t think—”

“Red, I have to go.” Liz reminded. “Plus, I’m not going to let some psycho control my movements.”

The man hung his head, nodding, “You’re right.” he apologized with his tone. “I just–”

“Worry...” Liz smiled. It was nice to know he truly cared.

“...Yes.” Red sighed.

“It’s a couple miles away.” she cooed. She snuggled up to the man, peppering his chin with kisses, “And I’ll only be there for an hour.”

“Are you managing me again?” Red looked down at the upturned face, holding his smile.

“I don’t know...” she winced adorably, her eyes sparkling with humor. “Is it working?”

Red lowered his mouth to hers, gently flicking his tongue against her full mouth, “...Yes.”

Liz batted her long lashes, drawing a chuckle from the man. “Go on,” he pat her bottom, “before I manage you.”

♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥·♥

“They’re fucking useless!” Silas spat as he opened Liz’s door, giving her a hand into the back seat. “I should have taken the bastard down right there and then... show him how it felt!”

“It was an accident, Silas.” Liz cradled her wrist, situating herself in the seat. “I’m fine, I promise.”

“No... you’re not.” Silas closed the back door, yanking the driver door open, “What kind of idiot trainer doesn’t spot his client?”

Liz smiled as the man continued to grumble his discontent, pulling the car out into the thoroughfare. It really had been an accident. Liz had felt her wrist going weak, tried to compensate for it... and lost her grip.

She thought the exercise too strenuous so early on, but she could have spoken up. The action had yanked the wrist painfully, leaving it bruising and swelling.
“I’ll just put some ice on it,” she inserted her two cents, “it’ll be fine in the morning.”

“Stupid mother fuc...” Silas muttered, executing a right turn onto a less traveled road, “Are you hungry?”

Liz guffawed before she could catch it, “You really do hang out with Red too much.” she patted the man’s shoulder, referring to his sudden change of topics , “And no, I’m fine.”

The man continued to rant as drove, his eyes constantly checking the back-up crew in the inconspicuous SUV tailing them.

“I don’t know why you don’t just tell them to fuck off,” the man snapped, “tell them I’m training you.”

“I did tell them.” she smiled sweetly.

“So why the hell are we still going?” the man gritted his teeth.

“They said you weren’t sanctioned by the FBI.”

“Thank God for small favors!” Silas continued on his tirade. “It’d be an embarrassment to be associated with such morons!”

Liz covered her mouth, hiding her smile and holding her laughter. The low ringing of her phone drew the woman’s attention from the perturbed guard to her bag.

Rifling through the dark contents, she pulled the lit phone free.

“Hello?” she sighed, shaking her head as Silas hit the steering wheel once again, his anger still high.

“Hello, my little escapee.” the velvet menace washed over her like a smothering fog.

The voice instantly sent shivers up Liz’s spine. The urge to vomit surged with the dark distressing chuckle it delivered.

“Who is this...” Liz questioned shakily, though in her gut... she all ready knew.

“Oh...” the man tsked sorrowfully, “have we forgotten me so soon.”

Silas turned his head, his jaw pulsing. He had heard the tremor in the woman’s voice loud and clear, alerting him to a problem. His eyes met her frantically searching ones in the rearview mirror.

Liz stared at the phone helplessly, before blinking away her inaction, putting it on speaker for Silas to hear.

“I haven’t forgotten you.” the man continued on, intoning pleasantly, “As a matter of fact, I lovingly recall the sensation of your small bones breaking in my hands just like it was yesterday.”

Liz wrapped her hand tightly around her throbbing wrist, squeezing the flesh until her fingers tingled from the loss of blood supply.

“I saw you...” it continued, his voice making her stomach pitch sickeningly, “with the older woman...”

Liz lifted startled eyes, meeting Silas’ dark grey ones in the mirror. The guards presence gave her a sense of security.
His eyes were clear, steady... only leaving hers to get his bearings while he drove. He searched for a spot to pull over.

“What was her name again...” the man teased lovingly, “Oh, yes. Nora, right? A lovely name. A lovely woman.”

Silas calmly held Liz’s panicked gaze as he pulled his phone free, dialing the house.

The guard half listened to the man on the end of the line, before murmuring quietly into his own phone, checking on Nora’s safety.

“Is it a special occasion for dinner tonight?” Carver questioned lightly as if carrying on a normal conversation, “You two poured over the grocery selections for a goodly while, didn’t you.”

Liz curled her arm about herself, drawing a measure of comfort from the action. She sighed her relief when Silas slid his phone in his shirt pocket.

Nora was safely at home.

“Long enough that I mapped out your little body to my hearts content.” he laughed shortly, “We’re going to have such a splendid time on our next meeting.” he breathed into the phone.

The woman’s eyes closed, only to snap open when she was inundated by visions of what the man may have pictured in his warped, sick mind.

“I admit, I usually get my thrills feeling my blade tearing through flesh,” the smile in his voice was repulsive, “but then, there is a certain thrill wondering what it is exactly that Reddington likes about having those long legs wrapped about him.”

Reaching out, she grabbed Silas’ shoulder. Curling her fingers into the warm fabric of his shirt. She felt the steadiness of a trusted person. Silas reached up, curling his fingers around hers in added comfort.

“Hang up the fucking phone.” Silas directed curtly. He rolled down the window, jerkily waving, ordering the back up guards closer. The black SUV surged forward, staying less than a car length away.

“That’s a fetching outfit you have on now,” Carver baited, “I bet Reddington is going to strip those little black shorts off your tiny ass the minute you walk in the door.” the man’s voice lowered, “If you arrive home safely, that is.”

Liz glanced down quickly, finding her tight black shorts snuggly in place. The fact somehow calmed her.

“Liz, dammit,” Silas snapped, “hang up!”

“I’d personally just cut through that tight blue top you have on there.” Carver continued undaunted.

“What do you want.” Liz damned the tremble she heard in her own voice. “Why are you doing this?” she bit at the soft flesh of her mouth nervously.

“Why, my little angel...” the man purred, “don’t you know? Haven’t you guessed?” he chuckled sensually, “I want you,” the throaty exclamation was repulsive in nature, “all for myself.”

Pushing his foot hard on the gas, Silas and the crew behind him cut through traffic like it wasn’t there. The man looked in his mirrors checking for a tail... but didn’t see a damn thing.

So either Carver could still see them... or the fucker knew exactly where they were heading.

“We have some unfinished business, wouldn’t you say?” Carver questioned lightly.

“Don’t let the sick fuck get to you.” Silas urged. “Because he never will.” the man encouraged.

Liz looked up at the guard anxiously before reluctantly nodding. Even if Carver was following her... he hadn’t approached.

“I’m going to make you bleed...” the man promised in a harsh whisper, angered by Silas’ warning.

Liz startled, gasping loudly.

A dark blur of a car came into her peripheral vision, approaching at a breakneck speed “Silas!”

“Fuck!” the guard snapped viciously, swerving hard to miss the approaching vehicle.

The grotesque sound of glass shattering and metal twisting deafened the occupants of the car.

Liz grasped for the side handle, the phone flying from her hand as the car spun out of control.

Silas yanked the steering wheel to no avail. The shrieking peal of the tires skidding across the asphalt and the taste of burnt rubber filled the windowless car.

Instinctively raising her arms, Liz curled inward as the car continued its dizzying and disorienting spin.

It rammed to a jarring stop, blanketing Liz and Silas in what was left of the glass. A sharp crack and deep grunt from the front seat terrorized Liz. Seconds later, she had her own demons with which to contend, a sharp agonizing cry escaping her lips.

The sudden quiet was deafening. It lasted only seconds.

Liz wearily shook her head, trying to focus. She heard the metal slide of Silas pull his weapon, then silence.

“Honey...” Silas panted, obviously in pain “can you get down?”

Liz pulled weakly at her seat belt, coughing fitfully, her ribs felt like they were crushing her. An overpowering smell of gasoline filled the car.

“No...” she pulled frantically at the buckle to no avail, “the latch...”

“Calm down,” Silas turned his head slightly, catching the frantic woman’s eyes, “it’s all right...” his steady gaze helped her focus. Blood dripped down his arms and forehead.

“Don’t move.” the man slurred his demand. It took forever to extract his phone from his pocket.

Liz drew in a staggering breath, maneuvering as much as the locked seatbelt would allow. The sound of shattering glass and barked demands sounded far in the distance.

The back up team!

Liz turned her head, seeking the shattered window. The other guards stumbled from the SUV, limping quickly toward their car, weapons drawn.

“Fucking phone.” Silas cursed fluently, “I dropped it, do you fucking believe...” he felt the areas beside him gritting his teeth with the pain movement caused.

“I have mine.”

Blinking past the haze, she found her phone on the side floorboard.

Reaching for it, she hesitated in her movements, finding her fingers dotted in blood.

She gasped, reaching for her face.

“You’re fine...” Silas assured seeing the fear return in the blue depths, “just small cuts...” the man grimaced, bad choice of words there... seeing as how she had just been talking to that fucker Carver, “…from glass.” he clarified hastily.

Liz nodded, taking a deep controlled breath, settling her nerves before reaching for the phone.

She stopped short when a searing pain shot up her leg.

“What?!” her guard was getting angsty but for the moment, all she could manage was to sit very still so the agonizing pain did not return.

She lay her head back slowly, closing her eyes for a brief second. Outside people were moving. People were shouting.

What the hell had happened?

An accident.

Was it Carver? Her blood ran cold, her eyes flying open.

The airbags had been deployed. There was glass everywhere. The smell...

She could see the back of Silas’s head. Her guard was abnormally quiet and still.

She jerked on the locked seatbelt. She had to get to him. But the sudden pain was so overpowering she almost lost consciousness.

Why didn’t they come? Where were all the people she heard? She could still hear them but they were far off in the distance.

She wanted Red...

She needed Red...

Where the hell was Red...
Red had a lot of irons in the fire this morning. The schedule was ultra-hectic, but he seemed to thrive in such an atmosphere.

Michael Fairfax was safely back in Italy, at his post, operating at full capacity after the harrowing incident in Cartagena.

Red valued the man’s abilities, pleased the outcome had been favorable for all concerned.

One thing checked off the ever growing list of things which must be addressed.

Aside from his business dealings with Francis, he promised his little Profiler he would scan a few files to see if he could offer any information on the mysteries Lizzy was attempting to solve.

An unexpected obstacle cropped up this morning, however.

“Well...” Red tossed the file he had been perusing to the desktop, “Federal agent Donald Ressler, to what do I owe this unexpected... pleasure.”

Pleasure? Was that the word he searched for? Red didn’t think so.

There was a noticeable moment of hesitation that Red did not miss.

“I know that you specifically signed on to provide us the Blacklist,” Ressler cleared his throat, “and it’s not in your forte to stray from your–”

Red waited impatiently for the agent to get to the point, “I have a life, Donald.”

“Such as it is.”

“Pot calling the kettle black.” Red retaliated effortlessly, “When’s the last time you got laid?” he baited the young man. “Because I had a lovely morning with–”

“Anyway,” Ressler forged ahead, ignoring Red’s quiet chortling in his ear, “I’ve got this guy...” the man trailed off, obviously irritated.

Red grinned as Ressler hesitated, knowing full well the man regretted his choice of wording after Red’s prior comment.

“I mean, there’s this guy I need help finding–”

Red frowned his confusion, “I haven’t sent you a new–”
“No, he’s not one of the Blacklisters,” Ressler corrected, “I thought, if you could...” the red head pushed his seat back, sitting upright in the hard leather, “I owe this to someone I worked with that is out for information on... the guy we’re discussing.”

“Does this guy have a name?”

“Samuel Lawford.”

“Run of the mill mobster...” Red knew the guy in this instance.

“So you know him?” Ressler perked up.

“He’s connected sparsely to the organization.” Red admitted, though he was sure he’d regret getting involved, “He’s more a liability than an asset if you ask me. How is he on your radar?”

“We believe he operates out of Chicago, right?” Ressler reluctantly trusted Reddington’s Intel over even the Bureau’s data.

“Yes, Chicago... that toddling town.”

“Lot of charges, none have stuck.” Ressler finished all he knew.

“I must be getting soft.” Red realized he had mentally already agreed to help the agent, if only in his mind.

“What?” Ressler inquired quickly.

On one hand, regardless of his promise to Lizzy to play nice in the sandbox, he wondered why he should involve himself.

On the other hand, Red was still in a spectacular mood after Lizzy had initiated their early morning playtime the other day... so he preferred to think that was his reason for capitulation.

“I’ll send you what I know,” Red conceded, “work habits, associates, known hangouts...” the man sing-songed his head, sliding closer to the desk he occupied, “his mother’s maiden name, passwords to his Facebook account, yada, yada, yada.”

Ressler half expected to receive the latter, “Thanks, Reddington. I owe you one.”

“Yes Donald, you do.” was the rather sinister reply before Red gently rang off.

After sending a break down on Lawford’s dealings to Ressler, Red wanted to get back to tracing the packages sent this day, but as soon as he reached for his phone, it rang again.

Seemed he spent half his time on the damned thing.

Maybe that new system he and Francis were working on, connecting the business network through his tech team’s efforts on the Dark Web might free up some of his time.

“What do you want from me, Ressler.” Red had listened patiently, again, to the guys new problem.

“Do you have anymore data? Anything else that may lead us to Lawford.” Ressler asked, the discomfort in his tone plain.

“What else could I possibly give you? You want me to size up his ball sack?” Red snipped. “What do I have to do for the FBI so they can get off their collective asses and actually do a job themselves for a change?” he was stupefied.

“No wonder Lizzy is so much in demand, mindless of your claims Profiling is a useless art form.”

“Where is Keen?” Ressler demanded, venting his frustration.

“She is attending one of your mandatory, not to mention totally useless, physical training sessions.”

“I hate those things.” Ressler shuddered, “She can slip them cash on the side and get out of it.”

“I believe Elizabeth would prefer to handle matters on the up and up.” Red didn’t get it either.

“Whatever.” Ressler shrugged.

Red threw his pen aside, shoving his pad away, “I’ll draw you a map with ‘X’ marks the spot, Donald.” he stated, “Can you manage to set aside a time to pick the guy up or should I book an Uber.”

“Very amusing, Reddington,” Ressler had the grace to feel the burn, “I’m handling this alone, I would appreciate a little back-up here.”

Red crooked a brow, “You must owe your friend big-time.”

“Like you said,” Ressler smirked, “a debt should be repaid.”

“All right, I’ll do what I can.” he promised, “Stay by your phone.”

Red hung up once more.

When did Ressler not have that fucking phone glued to his side? It was more important than the guy’s weapon.

If only to keep tabs on the multitude of ‘girl-friends’ the agent shifted through on a weekly basis.

The thought brought a grin to Red’s face.

He absently jotted a reminder to himself concerning Ressler’s request.

Red’s thoughts turned elsewhere.

Lizzy was contemplating the options available to her regarding work.

She missed the team, Red was aware, but she was also proud of the volume of cases at the BAU she helped close.

The mental challenge was stimulating as well.

Instead of the usual censure she received from her associates regarding her association with him, Lizzy was finally getting the accolade she so richly deserved for her intelligence and work ethics.

Which is why he kept his personal feelings on the matter quiet and his mouth shut, offering support when a discussion arose about what position was better suited for the woman.

Each job held finer points to offer.

Though, if a baby was in the making...
Well, time for that discussion could be made down the line.

In the meantime, the promise he made Lizzy about working with her team during her absence was one he was slowly beginning to dislike.

While Samar and Aram were willing to listen and learn, the other three males were proving a royal pain in the ass.

He had written four profiles for the FBI. Why, he could not fathom.

At first, he thought someone had been yanking his chain because Red was accustomed to leaving Lizzy the most simple clues which she could pick up on.

Maybe being with him, some things had rubbed off, who knew?

Maybe she was starting to think outside the rigidity of the proverbial box an organization like a government agency insisted everyone follow.

Ressler oft times surprised Red with his insight but with Liz’s absence, the agent seemed to be resorting to his old tactics.

Or maybe hanging out with Moore and Wilson was affecting his perspective. Shades of Ressler’s superior attitude were resurfacing more often than not.

Red had no issue what-so-ever with taking the boy down a notch or two when Ressler’s Napoleon complex reared its ugly head.

It was only after the ‘Old Boys Club’ mentality was pointed in Samar’s direction, did Red take issue with Ressler... but only in private.

Though no voices had been raised, everyone was well aware of the dressing down Red had given Ressler in that window encased room that day.

Red had been fully aware that Samar did not need his assistance and could well take care of herself in handling the men on her team.

He could not in good conscience, allow such treatment from a team leader, just because one of his ‘men’ happened to be a female.

It was a dangerous situation when a fellow team mate could not be relied upon in or out of the field.

Especially since Samar’s theory had been proven one hundred percent correct.

Now, the question of the day was, why Red sitting here grinding out yet another full-blown profile when the information he formally supplied should have sufficed.

There was an upside to this in-depth delving into a person’s life, however. Red was becoming more aware of the people he worked with on a regular basis.

If any one of them should turn to the dark side, Red knew for a fact, it would be much easier to locate the bastards.

For instance, take Bob Delany. His go-to man for reliable transportation overseas. Bob had a penchant for the horse track and Cajun cuisine.

Frank Martin, a local vendor Red used more and more frequently for various sundry... Frank was obsessed with antiques and a cute little blonde waitress who worked the night shift at Guido’s.

Little things made the world go round.

They even nabbed a Blacklister in Jersey because the guy had an addiction to Bingo parlors.

All information was useful, no matter how trivial.

Red wondered if it would prove his own downfall? Some simple little habit he wasn’t even aware he possessed.

Dembe would never allow such an error.

Red smiled.

He absently checked his watch.

Lizzy’s session was ending. She would be home soon.

Red sighed heavily, trying to concentrate.

This mobster guy, Sam Lawford... there was a certain amount of hostility between Lawford and Francis Holbrook.

That feud had been festering for a while. Wreaking havoc on Lawford’s end of the game, set well with Red.

Francis was a big boy and normally, Red wouldn’t interfere.

Red disliked Lawford from the get-go, however, due to the fact Lawford had purchased a three thousand square foot cabin in Montana in order to hide his mistress from his wife.

Lawford was fucking around on his woman and it pissed Red off. He liked the woman. Lawford had kids with the woman.

Maybe the fact Red would give anything to be in the same boat with Elizabeth, to have that level of commitment in his life... made what Lawford was doing so distasteful.

Divorce, or better still, trying to fix the problems in a marriage... that was the way to go.

Surely, that had to be the only option for a real man. Red didn’t like to judge, but he knew firsthand, on this one.

To get the bitter taste out of his mouth, Red hoped for a quiet evening at home with his woman. It seemed Elizabeth could change his mood just by a smile or the sound of that contagious laugh of hers.

He glanced at his watch again.

Thoughts of seeing her face urged him to finish up the profile he was sending to Ressler.

Red pushed from the desk, rising, wandering aimlessly to the front of the house.

The man peered out the arched windows.

These sessions were good for Elizabeth. Red knew Silas thought the techniques and methods taught were useless and ineffective.

In reality, while Red believed the same, it was good for Lizzy to get away from the BAU work for a while, plus the exercise worked off stress and restlessness.

Restlessness which had grown exponentially since the time for the sessions to end approached. Two more to go, along with her psych evaluations.

Lizzy would be reinstated soon... perhaps too soon for her liking. Red couldn’t read her state-of-mind as yet.

His phone rang.

Red rolled his eyes, instinctively lifting the object to his ear.

Sounds invaded his senses. Loud, unnatural sounds... chaotic, sharp, heart stopping sounds.

“Elizab–”

“Red...” the harsh, raspy voice caught Red’s attention, causing his heart to halt for a long beat.

“Silas?” the other man sounded so unlike himself, Red wasn’t certain it was actually his head guard on the other end of the line.

The guard tried to steady his breathing, knowing it was too shallow. He squinted through blood soaked lashes, focusing his vision. Silas cradled his arm protectively, pushing the pain of broken ribs aside.

Red strained to hear the man’s labored voice strain out an intersection near the house. He rapidly made a mental note of the coordinates.

“Silas, what happened? Is Lizzy all right?” the man could not keep the fear from his voice, “Are you? What’s your situation?”

The silence was terrifying.

“Silas!” Red barked but already was on the move, covering the space to the front foyer in record time.

Dembe had heard the commotion emerging from the library, his features set quizzically.

Red motioned curtly, “Something’s wrong.”

Dembe fell into rapid step beside his friend, covering the distance to the car quickly.

Red repeated the street address, sliding into the front passenger seat.

Dembe fired the powerful engine to life, pulling the large SUV out of the security gate in record time.

“It is not far, Raymond.” Dembe offered a quick glance at his overwrought companion.

Red noted Tom Keen was not at his usual place outside the home.

“Stalker boy isn’t here.” he stated grimly, his first thought... Tom Keen was very likely the cause or reason for Elizabeth’s situation whatever it could be... or Silas’s uncharacteristic lapse.
The tension in the car was palpable. The drive, though short, seemed to take eons to Red’s way of thinking.

Dembe tried to picture the area to which Silas directed they go.

A Catholic church sat on the Northeast corner. It was an affluent residential area with one of the better high-schools just blocks to the South.

Raymond had chosen well when it came to the community in which Elizabeth could recover and now call... home.

They took the corner on two wheels, rounding about a shaded and tree-lined street.

Dembe screeched to a halt behind a green Honda sedan.

Red surveyed the area with frantic eyes. He sucked in a sharp breath at the scene laid out before them.

Flashing lights, traffic backed up. They were at least a block from all the real commotion due to a large fire truck blocking both lanes of traffic.

An ambulance was rolling slowly forward weaving through a scene of pure carnage as it went.

Red’s mind could not take in the full scope of all the disorder going on around him but he exited the car before Dembe could pull it to a full stop.

His eyes swept the scene, his heart beating frantically in his chest.

The smell of gas, broken glass, burnt rubber and blood filled his nostrils.

A car of an undistinguishable model, right in front of him, was mangled to pieces. The front end, bent upwards at an unnatural angle. The impact it had sustained curved the thick metal in the middle, leaving the car bowed... all doors off set from their rightful place, the glass, shattered from its frames.

Darting his eyes to his left, another vehicle, this one a larger SUV model, sat in the middle of the intersection, flipped to its side. Moving closer towards it, the panic he felt surged when he recognized it as one of his fleet.

Following the line of carnage, Red found Dembe nearing the same area, his large frame darting through the emergency workers. Rushing after the man, he came around the front of the SUV, stopping dead in his tracks.

Another black car was severely demolished. The driver’s side was caved in, apparently t-boned. The passenger side, curved inward, rested against a light pole.

It sat meters away, at the far side of the intersection, resting ominously. It was turned completely around facing the opposite direction, on the wrong side of the street.

Two of Silas’ people stood guard about the vehicle, faces stoically composed, obviously men accustomed to handling unnatural circumstances.

No weapons were drawn which somewhat reassured Reddington until he realized, there was only two of his employees present.

Dembe was leaning into the crushed drivers side, his actions indistinguishable from this distance.
Red quickened his steps, “Elizabeth...” he whispered sacredly, rushing forward.

“Hey,” a guy in a yellow vest caught at Red’s arm but he shoved roughly away, continuing on, “you have to stay back!”

The demand fell on deaf ears.

“Hey!” the man’s urgent words faded into oblivion.

Red cursed fluently, coming to an obstacle he could not shove aside... the light post held the car door wedged tightly.

She was inside, half-sitting, held by the seat belt, half hunched over, her hair obscuring her face but he knew...

“Baby...” an anguished gasp escaped his suddenly parched lips. His brain kicked in even when his senses couldn’t.

He yanked frantically on the mangled door, the sound of twisted metal creaking and groaning against itself at the power he exuded in his effort.

“Lizzy!” he snapped anxiously, frustrated beyond endurance as the door resisted all attempts he offered.

The woman stirred, her head turning slowly. Blue eyes locked with light grey.

“Elizabeth!” he expelled relief and a prayer to a benevolent God for the awareness looking back at him.

“Oh, Red...” she closed her eyes, blinking back tears. She had needed him to be here and now... he was. Or... was she hallucinating?

“I’m here, baby...” the shaky statement answered her own prayers, “I’m here.” he reached into the shattered window mindless of the sharp shards still edging the frame.

His fingers touched her face, easing the dark hair behind a convenient ear, “I’m right here. Don’t try to move... please.”

He surveyed the scene rapidly. Dembe’s eyes reassured from over the top of the front seat headrest.

“He is injured...” the calming tone helped Red focus... commit, “how badly, I do not know.” he was carefully supporting Silas’ slumping bulk as best he could.

“I’m,” Silas’ voice lacked its normal vitality, “...fine.”

Elizabeth laughed shortly, tears allowed, “He’s fine.”

She shook her head, grimacing at the pain the movement caused.

“Keep your head still, baby,” Red snapped fearfully, “try not to move, okay?”

She swallowed, remaining still.

“Is she...all right?” Silas was trying to sit up, to turn about.

“Be very still, my friend.” Dembe prevented the unwise action.
Silas had gasped at the pain, a coughing spasm following the stilted movement.

Red winced, seeing blood splatter on Dembe’s crisp white shirt. “She’s good, Silas, stay the hell still!” he barked, afraid for his friend now as well, his mind began to function properly, finally.

“The others?” Elizabeth’s thoughts had long since focused, “the other... guards.”

Red sensed Silas’ interest as well for the man’s broad shoulders had stiffened noticeably.

Dembe glanced about with the eyes of a trained observer. “They are being extracted from the SUV... they appear functional. At least from this distance.” he scowled. “Amir and Justin are here,” he nodded to the Frenchman who stood just outside the vehicle, “on duty.”

“Thank God.” Elizabeth murmured serenely, “…Red, you won’t... go will you.” she tried to keep the tears from her voice.

“Fucking wild horses, baby.” he returned tightly, “Where do you hurt?”

Silas barked a curse as the steering wheel turned sharply. Rescue workers were now working on the front of the car.

“Fuckers!” Silas grated angrily.

“They are attempting to extract you.” Dembe could see the efforts whereas the others could not. “The front end is twisted. You are trapped until they...” he trailed away, “what do you need?”

“A shot of whiskey.” Silas grinned almost impishly but his face instantly contorted into a fixed grimace of pain.

Dembe produced a flask, holding it for his friend to partake.

“Red!” Elizabeth was dismayed, “Don’t let him do that!”

Red remained silent on the matter, “Where do you hurt?” he repeated sharply.

The woman closed her eyes wearily, “...Everywhere,” she smiled bravely then sobered, “…my leg,” her brow furrowed, “my leg really...hurts.” she realized, “Oh man!” her breath expelled in a whoosh, “What the hell happened?”

Red’s eyes darted to the wrecked automobiles absently, returning his interest to more pressing matters.

The front seat pushed down painfully on Lizzy’s shin, her foot was jammed up underneath the edge.

“My head is killing me.” she made mention, “Dembe... hand me that flask.” she quipped.

“Where the hell are the firemen?” Red snapped, “Why isn’t someone–”

“They must alleviate the weight of the seat.” Dembe motioned to a now collapsed, very silent head guard, “Silas must be extracted first.”

“How long?” Red gritted, his fingers tightening on Elizabeth’s.

“Red, that hurts,” she wiggled her hand to signify.

He loosened his grip instantly, “Sorry, baby.” he was contrite. The fear he felt powered through him.
“A few minutes only.” Dembe assured, or placated, Red wasn’t certain at this point.

The silence came in the car but around them, sounds exploded.

Red shut it all out concentrating on just one thing. He smiled gently at Lizzy, “I leave you alone for one minute and look at the mess you get yourself into.”

“Why is Silas so quiet?” Liz was more than apprehensive, struggling to see her guard, to check on his condition.

“He thankfully...” Dembe hastily replied seeing Red’s reaction to her movements which brought severe repercussions. She had cried out with the sharpness of pain, “has passed out. It is a good thing, Elizabeth.”

Elizabeth’s face registered distress and fear.

“Calm yourself, please.” Dembe was reaching the woman where Red could not. “Silas is strong. He will come through this.” he soothed. “He is just resting now that we are here.”

She visibly tried to obey.

“Mr. Kaplan is on her way.” Dembe further put her mind to rest.

“Did she give an ETA?” Red jerked his head to the man’s dark gaze, his own apprehensive to say the least.

A fireman stepped in beside Dembe, alerting him to the situation. The man nodded, taking the item handed him.

“Ten minutes, Raymond.” Dembe replayed the information, securing a thick chain around the steering wheel before feeding it through the open windshield to the waiting rescue workers.

“We... we can do ten minutes, right?” Elizabeth was asking more for Silas it was understood by all, “I m-mean, Silas can do ten minutes in his sleep.”

“He once went two days in the Sudan with his arm hanging out of its socket after an IED device took out our vehicle,” Dembe recalled, “cursing like a sailor the entire time but...”

Elizabeth smiled. She knew that had been the least of Silas’ injuries at that time. The guards had shared the gruesome tale.

“Yeah... he can do ten minutes.” she felt infinitely better, and then... she didn’t. Nausea reared its ugly head. “You better not get too close,” she grimaced adorably, “I might puke.”

Red surveyed the vehicle, “Hold on, sweetheart.”

“Don’t go!” she panicked, feeling his warm fingers release.

“No...” he hastily reassured, “I think I can get in the other side.” he wasn’t sure and it took a Herculean effort from both he and Dembe but then he was sliding across the glass strewn seat, easing ever so gently to her side.

She lay her head on his shoulder, seeking his warmth. “I’m cold.” she shivered involuntarily.

Dembe reached past his unconscious friend heaving a jacket to the back seat.
Red carefully draped the dark fabric over her arms and chest. “You just stay very still. Kate will make it all better,” he crooked his head to see her face, “you believe that, right.”

“I know.” she drifted in a very nice place. The pain was receding.

"You're going to be okay." Red soothed, gently kissing her forehead. "I promise."

Minutes passed.

Red began to sweat.

His guard’s body was covered in blood. Silas’ light blue shirt, streaked with blots and oozing wounds.

The man’s breathing was ragged, a gargling sound deep in his chest.

Blood was filling his lungs, Red realized from previous experiences along similar lines.

Lizzy was probably going into shock. Silas already was...

“Did they get him?”

Red practically started at the woman’s voice.

A church bell chimed several times in the far distance over the uproar of activities taking place inside their very small world.

“What?” he questioned, pulling her closer.

“...Carver.” the woman answered quietly.

“...Carver.” the woman answered quietly.

Red’s heart stopped completely then sped ahead frantically, “...What!” Was she getting delusional?

“He was on the phone with us,” Elizabeth couldn’t really see any urgency now. The damage had been done, after all, “...just before...” she scowled.

Before what?

Oh yes, the blur... the dark blur.

Reddington was reeling. Carver? No, it was Tom... wasn’t it? It had to be... Tom.

Carver knew Lizzy’s number?!? How the fuck did–

“Awww, shit.” Silas had come to, groaning weakly, “fuck...”

Dembe exchanged subdued looks with a wildly speculating Red Reddington.

The loud grating sound of the hood collapsing into itself halted all coherent thought for a beat.

The chain Dembe had secured about the steering wheel had done its job.

Silas cursed fluently as the heavy object veered slowly away from his body.

Blood rushed rapidly from the man’s mouth.

Thankfully darkness descended.
Dembe moved aside to allow the extraction.

Elizabeth watched, breathing a sigh of relief, “Ten minutes is a really long time.” she concluded.

She yelped like a little hurt puppy as Silas’ weight left the seat, a searing pain ripping through her leg.

Red closed his eyes. She was hurting and there was not one fucking thing he could do to help.

“I’m here.” he murmured the useless words, “...I’m here.”

Ages passed... eons passed but finally.... finally, Elizabeth was freed, placed on a stretcher.

Dembe got Red’s attention.

Their own ‘ambulances’ had arrived.

Red held tight to Liz’s hand, “Where’s Kaplan? He pressed for information not having seen the woman in all the chaos surrounding them as yet.

“She is waiting at Dr. Bryan’s,” the answer seemed apparent to the attendant, “in case we needed the space in the ambulance.”

Red wasn’t happy for the woman’s presence always calmed him but he understood the reasoning.

Silas’ ambulance pulled away, sirens blaring.

Red watched it weave rapidly through the maze of carnage and the enormous crowd which had developed.

“Sir..”

Red turned having stepped aside to allow Lizzy to be lifted into the back of the second ambulance.

A uniformed officer approached, his smile a gentle one, “Everything will be fine... they will have your wife at the hospital in no time.”

Red glanced at the woman. Kaplan’s people were efficiently calming and reassuring Elizabeth as they hooked her to bags and leads.

He calmed at the words, your wife.

He took a steadying breath, letting it out slowly.

His anger... his fear would be a distraction.

“I’m Officer Andrews.” Red was handed a card.

He stared at it, not seeing the print.

“Look, I know you don’t want to deal with this right now.” he held out a sheet of paper.

Red took if for he sensed he should

“I want to give this to you for later.” the cop was continuing. He gestured to a totally mangled maroon late model sedan, “it’s the other drivers information.”
Red must have seemed lost.

Had they caught Carver? Was the bastard in that fucking car? Had he been extracted first? Had they taken him away?

The officers eyes softened, “I get it. If that were my wife trapped in that...” he pulled a face, seeing the damage done to the sturdy Mercedes, “I just thought you would want his insurance information.”

“Who?” Red demanded.

“... The other driver.” the cop thumbed back again to the maroon car. “Damned teenagers,” he shook his head woefully, “blew through the light while texting. The front seat passenger... kid about seventeen...” he looked sad, “went through the windshield,” he lifted grave eyes, “no seat belt. Probably won’t make it, but ya never know, ya know.”

Red nodded absently, his own face grim.

“The two in the back seat aren’t fairing much better. At least they were wearing seat belts.”

Red rubbed his temples.

“Are you saying...” he tried to comprehend it all. No words would form.

An idiot kid caused all this mayhem?

“They took him first,” the cop nodded, “he’s already in surgery. I think he was also high... drunk?”

Realizing he had said too much, the guy backed off, “We will have more information as the day wears on. Call that number in an hour or so,” he motioned, “I see they are ready to transport. I will be at the hospital. We can speak further there.”

Red watched the guy walk away.

He knew he wouldn’t be at their hospital.

The cop stuck his head in the ambulance, “They taking good care of you, Ma’am?” he smiled cordially, “Everything is going to be fine.”

Liz tried a smile. She didn’t think it took. Was that the standard ‘go to’ line for all males?

Everything is going to be fine.

Silas had been ‘fine’.

“My name is Ethan. I’m here to see you are okay... but you look like a strong type of gal.” he grinned, “I’ll put my money on you to recover one hundred percent. You have to...” he continued, glancing back at Red, “your husband is about to shit kittens out here worrying about you. You gotta let him know everything will be–”

“...Fine.” Elizabeth smiled genuinely, “I will Offi–” she hesitated, “Ethan, thank you for being so solicitous and kind. It is very appreciated.”

The man nodded, stepping aside as Red came forward to grip Elizabeth’s small fingers in his.

Red leaned, kissing the woman’s forehead.
“Are you shitting kittens?” she teased lovingly.

“I don’t shit kittens.” he murmured, “although, if you do this to me again... I might cut my own fucking wrists.”

“What a waste of a perfectly adequate penis.”

“Adequate?” he lifted his brows ever so happy to be beside her, trading quips again, “Seriously, woman,” his voice dropped an octave, “you put me through hell these past few minutes. Don’t you ever do that to me again... promise.”

She brought his hand to her lips, lingering a soft kiss on his fingers, “I promise.”

“I’m going to let them take you now.” he was suddenly all business, “Dembe and I will follow in the car because,” he soothed any objections or demands, “they can get you to Kaplan quicker. And the cop is going to want your information and if... when we don’t show up at the hospital...”

She nodded, “I understand but hurry... please.”

“You got that right,” he hated not going with her but he wanted the world he created for her to stay intact if at all possible.

Running from the police would not ensure that eventuality.

He had no idea how far Carver had integrated himself into the situation but Lizzy was safe and secure at the house.

He hoped nothing had changed.

Besides bringing the fucker to a place of Red’s choosing was far preferable to meeting Caver on another, unfamiliar turf.

He glanced out the open doors, watching another SUV meander a path towards them. Lizzy’s other guard, David, hopped out... heading their way.

Liz caught Red’s hand, directing his attention her way, "I love you."

"I love you." Red kissed Lizzy briefly, “Do as Kate tells you.”

“I’m afraid not to.” Liz told the truth, “She’ll see to Silas first, right?”

Red stepped down out of the large ambulance, waving Lizzy’s guard, David, to take his place.

He pointed a finger, stepping out of the way of the closing ambulance doors, “Do as Kate tells you!”

Red crossed rapidly, extracting his fake ID. He gave the needed particulars to Officer Andrews.

“This could have waited, really.” the guy was being cool.

“I want her to rest once everything calms down.” Red smiled tightly, finishing up the task with a brisk, “I’ll come to the station and retrieve all those cards, Officer. I really just want to be with my wife, if I could.”

“I’ll leave them at the front desk. You know where the station is located?”

Red knew where most police stations were located, in truth, “I’ll find it and thank you again for your understanding."

The cop turned aside.

Red searched the crowd for Dembe.

His eyes scanned slowly, carefully...

He was a little miffed, startled... to see one of Silas’ guards withdraw his weapon, assuming a crouched position to steady his aim.

Red was torn between lashing out a reprimand... he had just soothed matters over with the police, after all.

Or again... wondering at the cause behind the man’s actions.

The answers came in rapid succession.

Having followed the guard’s line of sight and now ignoring all the startled yelps, outcries and panic a visible weapon can cause....

Red locked gazes with a serenely smiling.... ominous nemesis.

Carver stared back at him, out of a crowd of rapidly dissipating members.

Officer Andrews reacted as his years on the force would demand and in a most timely and efficient manner, Red had to acknowledge.

Dembe artfully disarmed, not to mention, completely disabled the now downed cop.

Officer Andrews lay peacefully on the pavement, his bulky body outstretched like a toddler taking a much-needed nap.

Dembe was fluidity in motion, his own weapon raised, aimed...

Carver pulled a female in a bright pair of leggings and a yellow stretch top in front of his body, a wicked grin on the totally malicious face.

Amir approached carefully, but he did not have a clear shot as yet, Red sensed.

Red stood, glued to the spot, trusting his men to do their job.

“If looks could kill, hey old friend.” Carver gleefully taunted, all the while shielding himself behind a terrified, screaming human shield.

He whispered something to the captive woman who fell instantly silent, her eyes showing the sheer terror she was experiencing.

The guard on the left, Justin, was working his way into a more favorable position.

Carver, sensing as much, ended the stale-mate by hastily slicing a blade across the woman’s throat before disappearing into a row of well-trimmed bushes which lined the church property that boarded the block.

The guards gave chase.
Dembe had even managed a couple of well-placed shots into the vicinity of the bushes.

All hell had broken loose.

The crowd panicked. Cars were backing up, revving engines, honking feverishly at those blocking their avenue of escape even though escape was impossible.

Firemen had inundated the fallen police officer but now everyone was diving for cover, except a few individuals who still worked tirelessly over the man who was slowly reviving.

Red headed for the downed woman, waiting patiently for the teams to inform him of their progress.

His guards reemerged making a bee-line for their employer.

Dembe was diplomatically calming individuals as he strolled back.

Most shied away from the guy because he forgot to dispel the dark scowl on his face.

“He had a car waiting, Captain.” Justin arrived first. The guy wasn’t even breathing hard. “We couldn’t pursue.”

The guard lifted helpless brows motioning to the wrecked SUV over in the intersection.

“We could turn the car upright.” Amir offered magnanimously.

Red scowled at the guy.

“Leave it.” Red waved off the two younger men, keeping his hold on the woman’s neck. “Go with the back-up team.” he jerked his head to the waiting SUV.

“The other teams might get him, Captain. We radioed,” the guy continued, “they were well in route.”

Red glanced about. People were beginning to stare, getting a little more brave.

“Make yourself scarce.” Red replied tightly, “You know the routine. Thanks for the attempt.”

“We’ll get the son-of-a-bitch.” Justin was unfazed by the events of the day.

The black SUV rolled up beside them, blocking sight of the surrounding people.

“The woman?” Justin asked grimly watching the firemen doing their thing with the still offset police officer.

“Take her.” Red directed of the woman.

“But,” Justin hesitated only enough to ascertain if the situation could be helped, “the guy is good at what he does.”

Red felt his blood pressure spike, “Elizabeth would want us to try...” he snapped.

Justin crouched, taking Red’s place, keeping pressure on the wound. Amir came about to assist the man into the back of the transport.

“We must go Raymond.” Dembe’s hand guided the man from the turmoil in more ways than one.
The guards discretely dispersed leaving the wreckage of the day in their wake.

♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥

A half hour later, Red sat in the quiet of a rather cheerful room, considering.

He took in the plain blue paint of the walls. A nice enough color. He hated the depressing grey of a hospital room.

It was supposed to be white; he was certain, but it always appeared a dingy off-grey.

Maybe it was just the depressing circumstances in which one invariably found themselves if a hospital was needed.

He always thought of himself as a ‘glass half full’ type of guy.

Maybe not...

Lizzy’s fingers pressed to his.

He smiled, seeking her out, “Look at you.” he was content to do so.

“Yeah,” she lay very still, immobile due to a neck brace and stiff, uncomfortable backboard, “look at me.”

His smile widened, and he shifted closer to the side of the bed.

“You look like a million bucks to me.” he confided.

“Have you ever actually seen a million bucks?”

“Who hasn’t?” he seemed stumped, “Your curiosity returns... a good sign.”

“Have they said... about Silas?”

“Would you be this worried about me?”

“Red...” she was bothered by the taunt.

He waved the matter aside, “Kaplan is working her magic. He was awake and bitching when I came through.” he motioned, “Another good sign. Have you ever witnessed those two when they are at odds? We should sell tickets.”

She chuckled then, grimaced, “Don’t make me laugh.”

The silence came. Red lifted her hand, his lips gently caressing her skin.

“You were kinda hot out there today.” she mentioned in passing.

“Well, it is springtime in Washington D.C.”

“I meant,” she let him know by her ‘look’, “hot as in... knight in shining armor arriving on horseback to rescue his damsel in distress hot.”

It was his turn to chuckle.

“Or at least,” her voice softened, “that’s what it felt like to me.”
His laughter died away, his eyes hold hers willfully.

“I so needed to you be there and then... you were.”

He leaned kissing her mouth gently, “Let’s keep it that way... always,” he nudged his head slightly, “okay?”

She nodded minutely, “What would I do without you?”

“We’re not going there.” he sat back, subject closed, “So tell me, what were the events which led up to this rather... cryptic days events?”

She told him to the best of her abilities, “I thought it was Carver... ramming our car.”

He kept mum on the ‘Carver’ sighting afterwards. She had enough guilt on her plate at present.

“I saw your ankle, before they wrapped it.” he motioned, “Looks broke. The skin was purple and swollen.” he artfully changed the subject.

“I still have some movement,” she disagreed, “a couple days and I’ll be... fine.”

He shifted her a sardonic look.

“Well, I will.” she was determined. “I’m more worried about Silas.”

“Good to hear someone is.”

Elizabeth gasped at the sight of the mammoth guard lumbering into view.

“Silas!” she practically squealed her delight but Red was seeing past the bravado the other man exuded.

“What the hell are you doing out of bed?” he could only guess at the guard’s true condition.

Dembe stayed close.

Red surmised it was to catch Silas when he collapsed, from the look of him.

“That damned woman is a masochist!” Silas jerked his head meaningfully, “She drained my fucking lungs. I think she drank the blood... didn’t bother with a pump.”

Dembe sighed lightly, “You should not be up. She will not be pleased.”

“Oh well, let’s not ruffle her feathers.” Silas held up an adamant hand, “God knows what she’ll drain next.”

“You wish,” Kaplan pushed past the burly individual coming around the opposite side of Liz’s bed, “don’t hold your breath there... not that you could right now.” she smiled rather unpleasantly, noting the tightly wound bandage around Silas’ chest area.

“You like tight things?” Silas was feeling particularly foul at the moment, “I do too.” his stare dropped, holding firm at the apex of Kate Kaplan’s legs.

“Something you will never know for certain,” Kaplan lifted Liz’s wrist in a most professional manner, “which is killing you by degrees,” the dark void eyes shifted to the guard, “isn’t it. A woman you can’t manipulate.”
“I don’t give up so easily,” Silas retorted, “I have so much,” he hooked his fingers in his belt, drumming his thick fingers over the bulge in his pants, “…to offer.”

“I prefer my partners with a bit more…” Kate held her tone, ‘bounce in their step.’

Silas dropped his eyes to the woman’s breasts, more than catching her meaning.

“You and me both, honey.” he agreed. “You got small tits… but a guy only needs a mouthful.”

Liz felt the woman’s fingers tighten on her wrist.

Silas was affecting Mr. Kaplan in spite of her resolve.

Red was honestly unsure who would come out as top dog in this little tête-à-tête, but he was more that interested to find out.

“Oh, he’s so full of it Mr. Kaplan,” Liz hastily intervened, “Stop pouting, Silas.” she turned on someone she felt more comfortable with. “You big wussy.”

“I don’t pout,” she was summarily informed, “I brood…..” his eyes challenged Kaplan, “women blow me when I do.”

Red hid his smile tactfully.

Dembe sighed again, this time more heavily.

Kaplan held the moment admirably.

“Well, it’s all for naught,” Liz stated airily, “there are no women present who are falling for any of this crap.”

“I am feeling a little turned on.” Red admitted freely for Lizzy’s ears only.

“No?” Silas wasn’t so easily deterred even in his present condition. He shifted to the other foot, his arm favoring his left side. He stared unrelentingly at Kaplan who stared right back. “I think it’s actually working a little bit.”

“Operative word,” Kaplan sought out the guys crotch, “…little.”

“Ouch.” Red winced, shifting in his seat in open sympathy.

Silas only smiled, “You couldn’t handle what I’ve got… never had to before, have you.”

“By choice,” Kaplan crooned gently, “would you be interested in the reason behind my decision?”

Silas straightened slightly, grimacing, his body straining from the effort asked of it this day.

“Yeah, yeah, men don’t know how to use the equipment God gave them.” he heard it all before. “Why don’t you try a real man for a change.”

“Yeah and why don’t you try a real woman,” Liz felt bad for Mr. Kaplan but she wasn’t sure why, as the woman herself seemed perfectly at ease, “instead of the little blonde bimbo at the grocery store who helps you decide on which type of cooking oil you should use on fried Tilapia as if you have ever fried Tilapia in your entire existence.”

“That’s women’s work…” the man pushed deliberately.
Dembe stepped murmuring to Silas, “You said your mother would smack you if she ever heard that phrase coming from your mo–”

Silas scowled at the man, waving him off lest Dembe ruin his pestering of Mr. Kaplan.

Kaplan didn’t fall for the bait.

“Or the brunette at the gas station who gave you directions to our neighborhood.” Liz rolled her eyes.

Neither Silas nor Kaplan seemed to be paying her any mind, a battle of wills ensuing. Liz felt the crackle of tension in the room.

Red appeared totally unfazed by the fact.

“Or the red head–”

“Oh, yes...” Silas’ attention was caught, “I remember that one. Thank God I still have her number.” he smiled all too sweetly at Kate Kaplan, “I have to reconnect with that amazing little fire snatch again... soon.”

“She would kill you in your present state.” Kaplan philosophized. “Good riddance, I say.”

“You hurt my feeling.” Silas pouted, the grey eyes saying so much more than his words.

“He only has the one.” Dembe explained the lapse.

“What the hell goes on when you two are driving around all day?” Red was curious. “Such open camaraderie.”

He had decided to help Lizzy out of the predicament Silas had manifested even though, he personally was enjoying the hell out of the exchange between Kate and his head guard.

“Could you enlighten us further, Lizzy,” he encouraged, “concerning Silas’ many failings.”

“Oh... you should see the master at work,” Liz rolled her eyes, “he stands there acting all indecisive, like the proverbial ‘lost man’.”

Silas grinned, proud of his methods, obviously.

“And then, here they come... out of the woodwork.” Liz had seen it countless times, “All offering him much needed assistance.”

“Truly?” Dembe’s tone was curious itself as was his look.

Kaplan placed a pressure cuff on Liz’s arm.

“Tell the truth...” Silas pushed the envelop for he was in a particularly grumpy mood today and he felt like shit, truth told.

He was taking it out on the world in general.

His grey-blue eyes fell on an unsuspecting Elizabeth Keen, “Didn’t you ever fall for it as well?”

She sputtered, embarrassed that Silas would ask such a thing in front of... the blue eyes darted to a mellow Red Reddington who seemed to be waiting for a reply as well.
Damn him!

“You secretly never wanted to blow me?” Silas asked innocently.

“Blow yourself, you big lout!” she gasped indignantly.

“That wasn’t a no...” the guard pushed.

“I want to blow a hole through you!” Liz hissed, “he’s the only one who will ever...” she motioned to Red as best she could then stopped mid-motion, her cheeks flushing heatedly.

“Doesn’t seem fair,” Silas let her off the hook, “I did all the work but he gets the benefits.”

Red reached out, laying his hand against Liz’s chest, keeping her from raising from her position.

Keeping his head down, Red fought for control of his mirth, actually appreciating how quickly the grizzly man could rile Lizzy up, before craning his head towards the head guard.

“Looks like you’ll have to find your ‘head’ elsewhere.” Red lifted a confident stare.

Silas smirked before wincing visibly.

“Strike one...” Red was proud of his woman. He glanced at Kaplan, a challenge issued, clear and simple. “You’re still up at bat.”

“You’re off the clock and obviously in better condition that I thought,” Liz fumed still smarting from her guard’s innuendo, “Daylight is burning... and so is your wick, at both ends! Obviously!”

“What is it with everyone thinking I’ll need more than a couple hours to find someone who will,” the man moved carefully across the room finally coming very close to.... Kate Kaplan, “suck me off.”

“Stop talking.” Liz advised hurriedly, “You are so much cuter if you keep your mouth shut.”

“She thinks I’m cute.” he leaned conspiratorially, whispering in Kate’s ear.

“I think Tarsier’s are cute too,” Liz countered, “don’t take it to be a grand compliment.”

“They both do have startling eyes.” Mr. Kaplan lifted a subdued stare, “and about the same mentality I should imagine.”

“Do not insult Tarsier’s.” Dembe asked respectfully.

Silas smiled at both antagonists, “I bet you’re great in the sack.” he zeroed in on one.

“Yes, I am rather great.” Kaplan sat her bag aside, her voice dripping with sarcasm, “For instance, I’m certain were it a choice between you or I... your fiery little redhead would always prefer my skills over yours... each and every time.”

Red scratched the back of his head absently, his grin a contagious one.

“Damn, baby...” Silas’ tone had dropped considerably, “God, you just made me so hot.”

“I know.” Kaplan soothed, glancing down at the straining bulge growing in the man’s jeans. “Isn’t it sad, how easy you are when it comes right down to it?”

“How about it?” Silas wasn’t above begging, obviously, “You... me...? We could make some tiny “Can’t you make her... quiver, by yourself?” Kaplan seemed stern. “Not afraid of being upstaged?”

“I sure as hell wouldn’t mind finding out who bests who.” Silas replied seriously. “Damn, I’m begging you here, woman.” he was at his wits end, “I don’t beg.”

“Obviously, you do,” Kaplan disagreed, “and I secretly think... you like it.”

Silas swallowed... hard, “Look, just think about it. Get back to me.” he spread his hands, quickly going back to his cracked rib cage to support and cradle, “No rush... no pressure. I’m flexible.”

“Not as much as I.” Kaplan assured so sweetly.

“Oh, fuck...” Silas closed his eyes, “...I have to go lay down for a while.” he turned, half in half out the door, lifting his good hand to his ear and mouth to signify ‘call me’ to a whimsical Kate Kaplan.

It was hard going for the man... in more ways than one, Red imagined.

Red breathed out slowly, expelling pent-up emotions.

“Damn...” Elizabeth grated beneath her breath, “it was just getting good.” she watched her guard hobble out the door.

Red shared the moment with a discrete lift of his brows, acknowledging her assessment.

Kaplan pretended she didn’t hear and was back to her old businesslike self.

“I will assist him.” Dembe shook his head disapprovingly at the older woman. “I expected better, Kate.”

“I gave as good as I could.” she blinked innocently.

Dembe was not amused, “He is gravely injured.”

“I told him he shouldn’t be... up.”

“Well, he is now.” Red had seen the evidence.

Dembe scowled, taking his leave.

Outside the door, the man pulled up short.

Silas was leaning heavily on the wall for support. His teeth gritted against the pain. Dembe motioned and instantly an orderly pushed a wheelchair over to their position.

“I’m not even going to argue on this one.” the guard eased carefully into the seat. He checked with Dembe. “Do you think she fell for it?”

Dembe shook his head. “You did not have to go to such lengths.”

“You don’t know the depth of that little twerp's insecurities.” Silas debated. “She had to believe that I was fine or the guilt would have eaten her alive.”

“Let us hope you survive your noble attempt.” Dembe stated stoically pushing the man down the long corridor.
“No sign of that fucker Carver I suppose.” it was weighing on Silas’ mind since his team had brought him up to speed.

“You concentrate on recovering so that when we do locate him,” Dembe suggested, “we will have you operating at peak efficiency.”

“Am I getting old?”

Did Silas need reassurance?

“Yes.” Dembe replied succinctly.

♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥

“Why do I feel reprimanded?” Liz wanted someone to explain the sensation, “I didn’t do anything.”

“I will give you something to help you sleep.”

“No!” Red arose quickly, “No drugs, Kate.”

The woman quirked a brow, glancing at Elizabeth who flushed again but Liz didn’t know why.

That ‘reprimand’ feeling was back.

“I wouldn’t give her anything that would harm–”

“No... I know that, it’s just that...” Red had wanted to tell the woman in a different setting... a different manner, “she might be... pregnant.”

Liz kept quiet, feeling the tension emanating from the man beside her.

“I see...” Kate slapped the needle down into the sheet beside Liz’s thigh, her look a thunderously disapproving one, “I must check on something.”

Red kept his cool, remaining silent as well. He compressed his lips tightly waiting for the tempest to hit full force.

Kaplan stuffed the needle into its case, her manner livid, “...Never think of the consequences.” she muttered under her breath.

“Kate...” the man warned with his tone.

She stormed out with but one lethal glare at Red Reddington.

He drew in a calming breath, exhaling slowly, “...Well, on the whole,” he mused thoughtfully, “I think that went very well... considering.”

“Considering what?” Liz hadn’t thought it went well at all.

“Considering she could have easily severed my jugular with that look alone.”

“Why is she so upset...” Liz bit her lip anxiously, “what did I...”

“You’re upset with her.” Liz realized, beginning to read his moods.
“I don’t like people judging me unduly.” he stated succinctly, “Even when I deserve the censure. Not even Kate, who has every right to make such a judgement call.”

It was a difficult admission for the man.

“I... don’t understand.” Liz was upset as well now.

“Really!” Francis Holbrook breezed into the room animated, flustered and clearly upset. “...Really?”

He spread his expressive hands wide, his face incredulous, “Oh my God!”

He stopped dead in his tracks, “Look at you!” he gestured wildly, “Silas is on his deathbed! The man’s obviously delusional spouting off something about ‘red snatches’ and what the hell is wrong with Mr. Kaplan?”

Red sat back, straightening the bottom of his vest absently, “And hello to you too, Francis.”

“Something like this happens,” the young man’s gestures were becoming more adrenalized, “and you don’t even bother to call me?”

“Oh, I’m fine, Francis.” Liz wasn’t certain yet exactly how to act with the man.

“Fine!” he gestured wildly back and forth taking in her condition, “Fine??” he looked at Red accusingly.

“It was a horrible accident.” Liz stated her belief.

“Do you think?” Francis was beside himself, “My God, look at you!”

“Mr. Kaplan is erring on the side of caution.” Red looked at Lizzy. The woman could hardly move, strapped up like a calf at a rodeo, that damned neck brace considerably limiting her movement. The backboard a necessity he disliked intensely.

“I don’t believe someone didn’t even bother to call me!” Francis was on a roll. “I had to get my information secondhand. Thank God, Joe gives my feelings a modicum of credence at least.”

“I was going to call in a minute.” Red soothed, “It’s been a little hectic around here.”

Francis... settled, “Yeah well...” he still was a little miffed but pulled up a chair, sitting. His shrewd eyes examined the woman critically, “Kaplan give you the okay?” he needed reassurance. “Are you all right?”

Liz smiled warmly, “I got the best of the deal from what I hear.”

Red had not told her about the teenagers but one of Kaplan’s people had let it slip on the way over in the ambulance.

Red was going to take care of the guy but Kaplan had beat him to it. No one who worked under either, ever revealed any more information than was absolutely necessary at any given time.

Liz had asked if anyone was aware of the particulars regarding the accident and the guy didn’t have the brains to even pretend to lie.

Such people had no place in Red’s organization.

Of course, Red would have simply fired the man. He wasn’t quite certain how Kaplan herself had handled the situation.

One just never knew with the woman.

“You look like hell warmed over.” Francis decided, his eyes critical on Elizabeth’s battered face.

“...Yeah, well,” she tried to shrug, but it hurt too much, “you know.”

“Did you sustain a head wound?” Francis turned to Red for a coherent explanation. “What did that even mean?”

“She’s attempting to be stoic.”

“No...” Liz objected, “it’s just that, I feel so bad about those kids... their families.” she told the truth, “It seems wrong to lay here and feel sorry for myself.”

“What kids?” Francis sat up.

Red relayed the story.

Francis sat back, “Well, if the little bastard pulls through, it’ll be a waste... cause I’m gonna go ice the fucking so and so.”

The silence in the room was oppressive.

Liz looked like a deer in headlights, a fixed smile on her face.

Red glanced down, dusting imaginary lint off his trousers.

“What?” Francis rolled his eyes, “I was kidding.” he exasperated.

The smile remained fixed. Red lifted his head sensing Lizzy’s thoughts. He met Francis’ gaze easily.

“We know...”

“Do you?” Francis was astute at times, “What’s going on?” he questioned Liz more than the man sitting beside her, “I’m getting some bad vibes here. Did I do something?”

It suddenly occurred to the man, his manner altering visibly, “Oh!” he realized, “I was supposed to bring something!” he breathed a sigh of relief, “Sure... right, but I didn’t want to take the time to stop at a flower shop or arcade.”

Red’s brow went up at that last one...

Francis was patting his person down, his face suddenly brightening, “I got gum!”

He offered the package over, “It’s not even opened yet!”

Red smiled gently, taking the offering when Lizzy couldn’t.

“Thank you for the thought... and gift.” Red held the gift aloft.

Liz relaxed a bit, “...Oh, Francis.” a slight chuckle escaped, but she paid the price for it.

Each man winced in empathy, “That had to hurt.” Red frowned, lifting her fingers to his lips.

“Bet it’s gonna leave a mark.” Francis nodded sagely.
Liz laughed again, “S-Stop...” she pleaded her case.

Francis did as he was asked, “Sorry...” he nodded at nothing in particular, “so what do you need next? I’m here...” he was ready to help in any way.

“We’re covered but I might call on you later if it’s no imposition.” Red ‘covered’ nicely.

“Imposition?” Francis scoffed, “Are you sniffing Kaplan’s good stuff again? What’s with this imposition shit?”

A thought occurred, “She didn’t leave any, did she? Kaplan... the good stuff?”

“You ever known me to share?” Red ‘shared’.

Francis’ face fell, “...Major bummer.”

Red felt better, Lizzy’s eyes had softened on the kid.

“Look, I’m going to go, let you get some rest because Kaplan said if I didn’t, she would ‘cap me’.”

Francis arose, taking Liz’s hand, “I know you’re worried about those stupid kids,” he sensed as much, “I’ll go check out the hospital. Sometimes just not having to worry about the medical costs helps out... that, I can do.”

Liz’s eyes misted, “... Thank you, Francis.”

Kaplan appeared at the door, her face stern but when was it not, Red wondered.

She zeroed in on him in particular but Francis had taken her arrival as a warning for himself.

“I’m sorry all ready.” he hastily released Liz’s hand, “Keep it in the holster, woman.”

He glanced fretfully at Red, now realizing the other guy was in the hot seat, “I would rather face a Klingon Tribunal...” he sympathized with Red’s fate, confiding secretively, as he took his leave.

He cautiously made his way around the diminutive woman, smiling as he passed, “Have a good evening, Mr. Kaplan.”

“Leave, Francis.” the woman replied dryly.

“Thank you, Ma’am.” Francis bobbed his head, making a hasty retreat.

Red arose, smiling down at an apprehensive Elizabeth Keen.

“I’ll only be outside the door.”

Kaplan turned, exiting.

She waited patiently watching Red close the door to the room.

“You should have informed me of the... situation beforehand,” she began without preamble, “I could have ordered tests which might otherwise be detrimental to a-”

“Perhaps I thought...” Red interrupted, his manner frosty to say the least, his speech clipped, precise, “it was really none of your business... my personal life.”

Kaplan fell silent, “I am only thinking of her well-being... and the child, if one exists.”
“Is that what you’re thinking of?” he doubted it, clearly, “Or is it the fact that you have disapproved of any association which might conceivably develop between Elizabeth and a man twice her age?”

“I don’t question the ‘age’ issue...” she spoke bluntly as was her way, “I have grave doubts about pulling her into a way of life which can only... ultimately mean Elizabeth’s downfall.”

What rebuttal could there be to that, Red wondered bleakly.

“There is so much we have yet to do, Raymond,” Kate reminded, softening a tad, “Have you lost sight of the goals you are trying to accomplish? Why we started on this journey in the first place?”

_Had he? Perhaps so._

“You have a weakness now... where none existed before.” it was reminded, “Which puts her life in imminent danger. With a child... what _limits_ will you put upon yourself?”

“I have been doing this, trying to accomplish these goals for twenty years now, Kate.” the man fumed inwardly. “Twenty years. I’ve lost _everything_ I’ve ever valued...” he raged, “when do _I_ get a little happiness?” he spat. “Is that out of _the_ question? Don’t _I_ get a chance at _some_ kind of life?”

The woman was torn, clearly, “I don’t know what my purpose is any longer... I can’t protect you from yourself, Raymond.”

The man hung his head, his eyes closing.

“I can’t be of assistance if you no longer trust my judgement.” she was truly floundering, “Or heed my advice.”

She lifted troubled eyes.

“There is no one’s judgement I value more, Kate,” he told the truth, “I could not function without you about to keep my ass in line but...” he moved slowly, the last thing he wanted to do was alienate the woman now.

“I’m trying to find my way as well.” he was struggling, reaching out to someone he trusted implicitly. “This is all new territory for me. Sometimes I feel...” he searched the emotions churning inside of him, “my intellect, what there is of it, has always dictated my actions in the past.”

He shook his head minutely, the silence resurfacing but this time it was less tense.

“I’m tired, Kate.” he ran a hand across his brow, his shoulders slumping with his mood, “I’m just... so tired of it all.” he sighed.

Kaplan digested the moment. She had a decision to make, clear and simple.

She made it.

“We can do a simple urine test,” she handed over a plastic cup, “You’ll have at least one answer. I can’t guarantee it will be the one you hope for.”

Red looked at the cup.

“We can determine if x-rays can be done safely.” Kaplan looked through the glass pane of the door. Elizabeth hastily turned her head as the dark eyes met blue.

Kaplan’s lips cracked a bit, “She’s worried... I wonder about who?” those dark eyes shifted almost mischievously. “You... or me?”

“She think’s you’re invincible.” he confided.

“She thinks incorrectly,” it was simply stated. Kate sighed lightly, “I’ll give you both a moment’s privacy then...”

She turned, leaving without another word.

♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥

Red waited on pins and needles.

Kate had said it wouldn’t take long.

It didn’t.

The woman entered stepping quietly forward.

Elizabeth stiffened, anxious... uncertain as to her own feelings at present.

Did she want a baby so soon into the relationship? Was she ready for such a gigantic challenge?

Part of her was all flushed and excited to think she might be carrying a little spark of life inside her.

Part of her was terrified of the very same thing.

She tried to read Kate Kaplan’s face, but it was impossible until... the severity softened solemnly...

“...I’m sorry,” the woman spoke quietly, “the test was... negative.”

Red had carefully composed his own face, years of practice kept his devastation completely hidden.

Elizabeth’s eyes darted to his.

He forced a smile, reaching for her hand, “It’s fine,” he stated almost automatically, “It’s all right... really.”

Elizabeth relaxed visibly, “Ohh... okay.” she wasn’t sure how, or what, she was feeling, “...Okay.” she repeated absently.

Was she disappointed? Was this... disappointment? Of course she was disappointed.

She didn’t think it would be this... intense.

“Well...” what should she say? Was there an acceptable response one was supposed to give to such news, “...okay.”

Kate Kaplan lay a gentle hand on Raymond Reddington’s shoulder.

She felt the tension radiating through the man’s body. She squeezed reassuringly.

He was hurting, she knew.

The news had hurt him. She hated being the one to do so.

His hand covered hers for a brief second then dropped aside.
He was thanking her in his own way.

He had to be strong for Elizabeth, but inside, Kaplan knew he felt anything but.

“I’m sorry.” Elizabeth apologized sincerely, “I’m so sorry, Red.”

“It’s fine.” he smiled reassuringly, “Everything is fine, baby.” he turned to Kaplan, “Can we get those x-rays now? Get her out of that damned neck brace at least?”

Kaplan nodded, “It will take a second. I’ll have them bring the machine.”

Red hastily put a restraining hand when Kate would have removed hers from his shoulder, “Thank you, Kate.”

She smiled down at him, quietly taking her leave.

Elizabeth thought, for one second there, the other woman truly looked at peace... truly appeared... not so severe, not so... austere.

Elizabeth wondered what Mr. Kaplan had looked like as a young girl.

But then, Elizabeth’s thoughts turned to...

Other things.

No baby. She had no little, tiny person inside her.

Why did she suddenly feel so bereft?

No... it was fine. Red had said... it was fine.

They could try another time.

They had... so much time in the long run.

She shook her head, sighing heavily, “I’m so sorry, Red.”

“Stop it.” he advised softly, “We have all the time in the world, Lizzy.”

She sought him out.

“God will bless us when it’s time.”

“...Do you believe in God, Red?” she had asked him once before, but wasn’t sure if he was being serious in his reply.

“In this instance...” he leaned, kissing her mouth, “... yes, I do.”

She felt infinitely better, “... So do I.”

They had all the time in the world.

Red Reddington practically promised as much.

She could take it to the bank.

She lay quietly listening to the sound of the man’s steady breathing.
It calmed her need to weep...

Chapter End Notes

Gee, Silas sure was in a grumpy mood...

And then he wasn't. :)
“You and I both know, if Carver is aware of our location...” Silas broached the subject while Kaplan prepared Elizabeth to depart from the make-shift hospital, “we have two options.

Red listened attentively, trusting his friends input implicitly, even as the large guard hid the fact he was in pain from any interested on-looker.

But he knew better... and admired the man all the more. Even in serious agony, Silas was at the top of his game.

“We can haul ass, set up at another location...” Silas continued, “which only postpones the inevitable, if you ask me.” the large shoulders shrugged bringing a grimace to the handsome face. But it was fleeting and then gone. “Or we find the leak in the organization. It’s apparent we have one. Who, is anyone’s guess at this point.”

Red nodded his agreement his own features tense. To think someone he trusted was out to betray him, royally pissed him off.

“I don’t want Elizabeth run out of her own home.” Silas snapped.

Red’s jaw tightened, angered by the idea that her home... her very stability, her bit of normalcy had been compromised.

“This son-of-a-bitch is taking her security away. We’ve worked too fucking hard to get her to this point.”

“You aren’t a hundred percent.”

Silas fell silent at the veiled accusation, “...No,” he admitted grimly, “but I am functioning.”

“Are you?”

The grey eyes shifted, “Yes.”

“You need time to heal, as well.” Red reminded, “I know the variables. Let me have time to think them through.”

Silas nodded curtly but Red could tell the guy was itching to get at Carver. To put an end to the fucker.

Who wasn’t?
“We’ll get him.” Red laid a hand on his friend’s shoulder. Silas winced. Red eased the pressure. “But on our terms.”

Silas remained silent.

“Can we protect her for a couple days?” Red needed more input.

“He’ll hit us at our lowest point.” Silas reminded.

“Is this,” Red needed to know, “our lowest point?”

“He thinks it is.” Silas grinned. “Might work to our advantage, but I don’t want Elizabeth within a thousand miles when we confront the bastard.”

Red patted the stocky shoulder absently, “Give me twenty-four hours.”

Silas inclined his head minutely.

“Right now, she needs to be home.” Red realized, “She needs to feel normal for a while. Can we give her that?”

“We’ll give her any damned thing she wants,” Silas rolled his eyes, “when have we not?”

“Which is how it should be.” Red grinned, “It’s our job to pamper and spoil.”

“You take it to the extreme with this one.” a beefy thumb was jerked in the appropriate direction.

“You disapprove?” Red’s grin widened.

Silas thought about it, “Nah, I guess it works in this instance but don’t expect me to put up with her crap.”

Red rolled his own eyes. Silas was just as bad, if not worse, about babying Lizzy. Today was proof of that. The man had left his sickbed in order to make Lizzy... feel better.

Though, it wasn’t Red’s preferred method. He had enjoyed watching the woman almost go for the guards throat. By the looks of Silas, it was perhaps a good thing Lizzy had been strapped to that backboard. She could have easily taken him down.

“God forbid,” Red held up pacifying hands, “I realize you are a throw back to the Neanderthal period. I wouldn’t think of disturbing the natural order of your evolution.”

“Just so we know where we stand.” Silas wanted matters straight and clear.

“You’d give your fucking life for her,” Red called the guy’s bluff, “and you know it.”

“It’s my job to give my fucking life.” Silas explained patiently as if to a young child, “Doesn’t mean I have to put up with shit.”

Red nodded sagely, pointing to a chair, “Sit down before you fall down.”

Silas looked at the object and surprisingly... sat.

The ride home was quiet. Each person too tired from the day’s events to put out much effort for small Red’s heart went out to Elizabeth Keen.

She had not had an easy time of it this past year.

The woman sensed his gaze, turning her head to offer a small smile.

His gaze softened, his fingers seeking the small hand. He brought the cool appendages to his lips, “Are you tired?”

“Glad to be going home.” she avoided the direct answer, “Silas, are you feeling better?”

“Don’t bother me, woman,” the guard looked out the window, “I’m contemplating the universe.”

Liz leaned, smacking the side of the guy’s head smartly, “Not in my presence you aren’t.”

Red winced for the man. That had to hurt, but the guard hid the fact well. He frowned his confusion when he realized the guard was holding his smile and Lizzy looked... disgusted.

“He contemplates the universe... a lot.” she grimaced, her hand mimicking a jerking motion.

Red sighed, dropping his forehead into his palm. His head was throbbing. Pushing his fingers against his skin, he dulled the ache briefly.

“Can’t you do something about her?” Silas turned his head lazily but even he returned to a brooding silence not having gathered a rise from the woman.

Lifting his head, Red kinked his neck moving closer to Elizabeth. Leaning into the small frame, his arm tugged her close, “When we get home, how does a nice hot shower sound and a late dinner?”

“Amazing.” Liz was happy again, Silas forgotten for a moment. “We can make omelets or–”

“Nora stayed over,” Francis leaned forward, resting his arm along their seat, “she said she couldn’t let her little angel come home to cold leftovers.”

“Little angel,” Liz quirked a brow, “meaning you?”

“Who else could she have been talking about?” Francis was stumped.

Liz sighed lightly, exchanging cryptic glances with Red, “I’m glad she stayed. Red,” the woman was suddenly apprehensive, “should she have her own guard now? She should stay with us... we have the private apartment downstairs.”

“Why does Nora need a guard?” Francis sat forward again, alert, “What’s going on that I don’t know about?” he shot Red an accusing glare, “Is Nora in danger? Why would she be?”

The throbbing in Red’s head intensified. He wasn’t in the mood to deal with this shit.

“The man who accosted Lizzy in Vegas...” Red reminded the young man.

“You think he’s responsible for the accident today,” Francis followed Red’s train of thought, “but what does Nora...”

“Before the accident, he called Elizabeth, threatening her... and Nora.”
“Are you fucking kidding me!” Francis unbuckled his belt, sliding even closer to get the lowdown.

“Francis don’t!” Liz reacted, “Get back in that belt!”

Red shifted non-committal eyes at the unexpected outburst.

Francis slowly complied, “Okay....” he drawled, his face twisting comically Red’s way in response before he settled back into the seat, clicking the belt in place.

The silence was uncomfortable.

“I’m sorry...” Liz felt foolish, “...I guess I’m a little shell-shocked.” she didn’t like how fast the car was moving. The road sped by at a ridiculously high rate of speed. Everything was a blur.

Dembe slowed to a more acceptable speed, “Forgive me, Elizabeth. I simply wished you home as soon as possible.”

“No...” she laughed hollowly, “I’m all for that. I’m just being stupid. I’m sure everything will get back to normal... in time, right?”

She sought the answer from a serenely relaxed Red Reddington.

“Of course it will.” he caressed her temple with the soft pressure of his lips.

Liz sighed again, her gaze fixed on the passing scenery, “Will it?” she had to wonder sometimes.

Would things ever be normal in her world? Did she even want that?

Right now, the word and the idea sounded wonderful.

“Yes, baby.” Red had heard the wistful rejoinder, “I’ll see to it.”

Liz pulled herself out of her doldrums forcing a smile, her fingers squeezing his reassuringly, “I’m just hungry. You know how cranky I get.”

“We all do.” Silas piped up from the front seat.

Liz’s mouth tightened but Red could see the remark made her feel... normal.

She settled back against him, cuddling into his warmth, “That man needs a keeper,” she decided, “or a muzzle.”

Red chuckled, so very glad to have her safe in his arms again.

Francis joined in and Dembe even cracked a smile.

“...What?” Liz was pleased to have amused them all, for she sensed she had, but couldn’t figure out why.

“You sounded like Eeyore.” Francis laughed appreciatively.

Liz chuckled as well at the thought, “Have you seen my tail?” she mimicked playfully.

“Yes, I have.” Red whispered seductively for her ears alone, his look sending delightful shivers down her body, “And I can’t wait to see it again.”
“Behave.” she scolded, glancing fretfully to the other passengers in the car.

Red cast her an innocent look, his palm rubbing along her spine.

“Well, I’m sorry.” the woman hastily moved forward with but one chastising glance at the man beside her... but allowed his hand to settle on the curve of her bottom.

Red stopped his advancement, content in its placement.

“I guess I’m in a mood. I wasn’t expecting this set back, you know?”

She sought Silas’ assistance, “We were doing so well, weren’t we, Silas. I was getting stronger... wasn’t I?”

“Set backs don’t mean shit,” Silas grumbled, “Let it roll off your shoulders. I’ll have you back up to par in a week’s time.”

She brightened, “Oh,” she reconsidered, “that’s not so bad at all.”

“Look on the bright side,” Red chimed in, lifting her wrist, his fingers gently probing the bandaged area, “you didn’t break it.” he included her leg in his assessment with a look.

Liz definitely felt better, “You’re right.” she decided. “It could have been worse.”

Each person in the car turned his head simultaneously as Francis cheerfully began to whistle the Monty Python classic, “Always Look On the Bright Side of Life.”

~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~

After a shower and a change of clothes, Liz felt more herself.

She sat now, around the large dining table, close to Red, listening to Dembe and Silas debate the pros and cons of semi-automatic versus automatic weapons.

Nora was admonishing both men about the proper topics one should discuss at the dinner table.

Liz’s thoughts turned inward. She recalled earlier tonight, just after she and Red parted company for a time with the others.

It was agreed they would all assemble in an hours time but Red insisted she shower and change.

“Doing something normal... brings normalcy.” he stated in that matter-of-fact way he had about himself.

Liz had to agree. The shower renewed her spirits. Being home, made the days miseries fade into the background.

They would have to be dealt with emotionally she knew but this time was a welcomed reprieve.

She had stumbled in the hallway.

She wasn’t watching what she was doing. She stumbled.

Red had been there to catch her.

When had he not been of late? She smiled.
The man lifted her into his arms. She felt weightless engulfed in that strong embrace.

His eyes stole her heart from her body.

She hadn’t even protested. She wanted him closer. She wanted to be in his arms. She needed this moment all day.

When Red had lifted his mouth away from nuzzling her neck, she kissed him passionately, wantonly, allowing him to know how deeply he affected her.

She wouldn’t have cared if they had missed this dinner.

It was so good to feel his hands on her body. He undressed her, joined her in the shower but he had not made a move.

Only kissed her body, in innocuous places. He seemed to enjoy touching her.

She enjoyed his touch, tremendously.

But tonight, she wanted more.

Was it wrong? She kept thinking about those poor teenagers. Was she a bad person for thinking about...

But something primal happened between Red and her in that hallway.

He lifted her so easily. He wasn’t even breathing hard when he sat her down in their room.

And the way he held her gaze all the way down that long corridor...

“A penny for them.”

“Big spender,” she quipped, giving over her full attention, “just thinking what an incredible man you are.”

“Should I be suspicious?” Red draped his arm along the back of her chair, “Or appreciative.”

“I would have showed my appreciation,” she lowered her voice.

The debate was getting loud. Francis had joined the discussion. He advocated a gentlemen’s weapon... light sabers.

Red’s interest was caught by Liz’s words however, clearly enjoying the turn of the conversation immensely.

“An hour ago,” Elizabeth lifted perfectly arched brows, “in our bedroom... our shower.”

“Do you know what it took for me to...” Red stopped, he wouldn’t proceed with that thought, “that’s not what you needed.”

“Shouldn’t I be the judge of that?” she was confused even more so.

Red concentrated on his expensive shoes.

“You were just so... loving. I wanted to return the gesture.” Liz tried to explain.

He reached, covering her hand with his.
Nora opened the door, signaling, “I thought you would all prefer a more... comfortable setting.” she motioned.

Liz could see food set up buffet style laid out on the large island.

It signaled to her that Nora didn’t want to be left out tonight. That the other woman needed to feel connected.

“Oh God,” Nora shook her head at her own stupidity, “I forgot about your injury. How could I be so–”

“Oh, fudge and cornflakes,” Liz laughed gaily, “you build it, we will come.” she quoted an old Kevin Costner movie haphazardly, “I’m already there.”

She took Red’s support in the way of a steady guiding hand and in moments everyone had found a plate, looking over the scrumptious offerings laid out so appealingly by a loving hand.

“I’ll get that for you, Silas.” Nora took Silas’ plate.

“Hey, hey!” Francis let his feelings on the matter be known. “He’s not dead. I am your go-to guy, remember?”

“Now you sit,” Nora scolded, “I’ll get to you after the injured are taken care of.”

Francis sulked effectively.

“You’re still my favorite.” Nora soothed.

Francis felt better, clearly, making certain Silas had heard the comment.

The large guard sat heavily, his look speaking volumes. Behind Nora’s back, he flipped Francis off.

“Doesn’t matter.” Francis was secure. “She still likes me best.”

“Placates you best, you mean.” Silas countered.

Liz watched Red, her eyes gentle on the man. He was doling out drinks which tonight did not include the heavy stuff.

Beers, tea and soda were the choice of beverage.

“Oh, Nora, this is absolutely lovely. Thank you for staying.” Liz accepted her plate graciously, “You are invaluable and a good dear friend.”

“Well, this is my new home or at least,” Nora looked to Red, “you’ve all made me feel as much. I wanted to help out in some way. No matter how trivial.”

“Oh, angel face,” Francis arose, leaning to kiss the woman’s cheek in open affection, “this isn’t trivial,” he waved the banquet over, “this is a feast fit for royalty... am I your knight in shining armor.”

“Sure.” Nora smiled placatingly, “More casserole?”

Francis wasn’t shy about seconds.

“We haven’t even started.” Silas grumbled moodily. “This guy’s already asking for seconds.”
“I didn’t have to ask.” Francis pursed his lips suggestively at Nora.

“Honey, are you all right? Truly?” Nora smiled absently at Francis, her true interest for Elizabeth.

“Silas is the one who got the worst of–”

“I said don’t be mothering me.” Silas mechanically snapped. The man winced, cricking his neck slightly when fingers pinched his ear. “Ow, damn!”

“I’ll show you mothering.” Nora snapped right back. “Don’t be surly.” her tone demanded no nonsense, “Eat! You need food!”

Silas begrudgingly... ate, to Elizabeth’s shock and delight.

Red beckoned, “Nora, sit.” he indicated a vacant spot by Dembe, “tell us about your day.”

The woman laughed bringing her coffee to the seat. Dembe arose, assisting her to situate herself comfortably.

“Well, it wasn’t anywhere near the excitement of yours.” she lifted an arched brow, “I baked a cake. I ran the dishwasher.”

Red smiled, “You baking anything is the equivalent to Rembrandt painting another masterpiece.”

“Not sure he would agree on that one.” she chuckled delightfully, “but thank you and yes, Francis... I made your favorite dessert as well.” she held up placating hands.

“Told you so...” Silas mumbled, even as he protectively covered his ear from Nora’s grasp.

As he had many favorites, Francis grilled the woman about which dessert in particular she had made just for him. Silas and Dembe sighed, returning to their plates, barely listening to the man rattling off sweet treats he adored.

Liz looked at Red, finding the man looking across the room, his eyes unfocused. His fingers tapped a rhythmless beat on the tabletop, nodding to himself as though having come to a decision about something. Liz’s brows furrowed, wondering what the man was contemplating.

“You all look exhausted.” Nora scanned the faces at the table in good time.

“Move in with us, Nora.” Red said in response, shocking the woman silent.

Liz’s mouth fell agape, before widening into a delightful smile, “Oh, Nora, please say you will.”

“I’m...” the cook sputtered her disbelief, “pardon me?”

“Lizzy would like you to stay,” Red replied, “and so would I.”

Dembe and Francis lifted their eyes searching out Red, the smiles on their faces sobering.

Silas sat back in his chair, wrapping an arm tight about his rib cage.

All the men were pleased Red was taking the cook’s safety into consideration. They liked Nora and hated to think of her being put in harm’s way.

“There’s a private fully equipped two-bedroom apartment downstairs.” Red added to the allure, “All the amenities on the house grounds are available to you.”
“The pool, tennis courts, entertainment room, the lake, river, stables...” Francis added, sweetening the pot.

“We don’t have horses.” Liz rolled her eyes.

Red smiled at the man, inclining his head, “Enclosed parking.”

Francis lifted a hand, gesturing excitedly, “No more cleaning your car off in the winter.”

Liz was nodding eagerly herself, “And... and you can paint and decorate it any way you want.” she added her two sense.

Nora swiveled her head between each person, trying to take in all the information flying at her.

“Whoa...” Nora chuckled, holding up a stilling hand, “what’s this all about?”

“We would love for you to stay here...” Red repeated, “with us.”

Nora looked at her boss, her head cocking slightly.

“You live alone, yes?” Red questioned.

“I do, but...”

“There is twenty-four-hour security here.” Dembe joined in the fray.

Nora looked at the man with interest, garnering Red’s interest.

“Is something wrong, Nora?” the man questioned.

“No...” she drawled, her fingers idly tracing a flower etched into the tablecloth, “I suppose it would be nice to have reliable security about.” she murmured, “I am getting older after all...” she chuckled flatly.

Silas sat forward, a frown creasing his forehead, “You don’t feel safe at home.”

Nora laughed shortly, sitting up in her chair, “We women hear noises at night.” she waved away his concern. “Just rats in the attic.” she smiled at Francis and Liz, sharing the in-joke from a favorite movie.

Dembe reached, patting the woman’s hand in understanding.

Francis fell unusually quiet. Silas turned knowledgeable eyes towards his boss.

Carver...

Had the son-of-a-bitch been watching her? Making noises to frighten her?

Or was it just the sound of an empty house?

Red couldn’t be sure. And he didn’t want to find out.

Red lifted a calming hand to the both men in turn, looking Elizabeth’s way.

His heart tightened painfully, finding her fearful eyes boring into his. He remain calm and determined which relaxed the younger woman visibly.

“You know who I am...” he addressed Nora.

Nora stared across the table, her gaze steady on the imposing man, “...I do.”

“Then you know I’m a dangerous man.” Red said.

“I don’t believe you are.” Nora countered.

“Not with you.” Red’s face softened, “Never with you.”

Nora’s shoulders relaxed, a questioning look on her face wondering what his point was exactly.

“I can’t promise that my...” Red hesitated, “occupation will never follow me home.” he breathed, a sorrow filling his heart, “But I can promise you that no harm will ever come to you as long as you are here.”

Liz swallowed the knot in her throat.

“I think you are well aware I would do anything to ensure Elizabeth’s safety.” Red stated a fact.

“I am...” Nora replied without hesitation.

“Know if you stay with us,” Red continued, “I offer you the same protection I give the woman I love.”

“I demand nothing less.” Francis said, smiling at the woman. Though everyone at the table, including Elizabeth, knew he was absolutely serious.

Silas rolled his eyes, shoving his plate forward, garnering the woman’s attention, “I demand nothing less.”

Nora’s eyes flit from one person to the next, until falling on Elizabeth’s face. The woman pushed back from her chair, walking to the younger woman. She reached out, tucking a stray strand of hair behind Liz’s ear.

“I’ll stay...” she murmured.

Liz’s face lit with joy as she pushed from her own chair, wrapping her arms about the woman.

“Tell Joe and David to take Nora home and gather her things.” Red quietly directed Silas. “I don’t want her staying there tonight.”

“I’ll have a moving company gather the rest of her belongings tomorrow.” Francis said.

“I will see to her safety personally until such time a private guard can be assigned.” Dembe stated succinctly.

“We’ll handle all of that tomorrow.” Red decided. “All I want tonight is Nora safely here with us.”

Red turned finding Lizzy hobbling towards him, beaming brightly. She threw her arms about his shoulders, squeezing him tightly.

“Thank you...” she whispered in his ear, burrowing closer to him.
Nuzzling his nose behind her ear, he inhaled her sweet scent, his heart calming. “Whatever you want...” he whispered, “you shall have.”

Reluctantly stepping back, Red cupped her small face in his hands, kissing her forehead.

“...Anything.” he murmured.

Liz lifted blue eyes to his, taking the breath from him. She looked so content, so happy...

Pleasing her gave him so much pleasure in return.

“I have everything I need,” she smiled softly, “right here.”

Red inclined his head, kissing the mouth lifting to his. Settling into the soft kiss, he flicked his tongue against the sweet mouth, deeply grunting his pleasure when it opened for him.

Pulling the woman closer, Red lost himself in the hot little mouth, gently caressing the small tongue, capturing her delighted little moan in his mouth.

“You’re blocking the way.” Francis jolted the two from their affectionate embrace. “Nora needs to get my dessert.”

Red growled his displeasure when Lizzy’s mouth broke from his, breathing heavily.

Francis relaxed, walking past the two crossing his eyes at Elizabeth’s reprimand.

“I know.” she leaned into the thick fingers threading through her hair and massaging her scalp.

“That’s all you had to say.”

Red’s stomach flipped in response. Knowing Lizzy held such unrelenting trust in him still shocked him sometimes.

He was broken from his reverie by the return of Francis and their newest tenant... Nora, carrying plates of cakes and a tray of coffee.

Reseating themselves at the island, they enjoyed their sweet treat and more in-depth conversation.

“Oh!” Francis became animated, “Speaking of which...” he settled in and Red immediately knew they were about to regaled by one of the boy’s infamous off-colored tales.

“Francis...” Red sighed heavily, “there are ladies present.”

“I’ll clean it up.” Francis jovially hit Liz on the shoulder, one ‘guy’ to another.

“Is this the one about the mermaid?” Dembe halted his food, mid-lift.

Nora laughed heartily, “That was a good one, right Dembe?”

Dembe smiled his remembrance, “Colorful to say the least.”

“What the hell goes on in this house when I’m not here?” Red bemused.

Liz grinned over at him. She was beginning to lose the tightness in her muscles.
Francis tore through the bawdy anecdote complete with gestures, pauses for effect and infectious abandonment.

Liz was relaxing by degrees, the soft spot in her heart for Francis Holbrook prying back open, minute by hilarious minute spent in his company.

Francis, regardless of his choice of vocation, would always just be... Francis.

Unpretentious, forthright, up-front...

A good friend.

While she felt some trepidation, she couldn’t help but appreciate that while Red had wanted an evening alone with her... he had extended the invitation to allow her to get back on an even keel with Francis.

And she was never so lighthearted.

The somewhat questionable joke was rounding down and Liz gave her complete attention over.

“So the daughter asks, A Christmas tree?”, Francis said, “And the mother replied, Yes, dead from the root up and the balls are just for decoration.”

Silence fell around the table except for the sound of a barely contained raspy chuckle from Francis.

Liz leaned over, chuckling quietly despite the questionable content just shared.

Lifting her eyes, slowly, she found the other occupants shaking with silent laughter... except Red. Which only increased her amusement.

Red sighed, ignoring the unladylike snort that came from his right, “Thank you, Francis, for keeping it clean.”

Silas finally broke, a deep throaty chuckle welling from his chest. He instantly protected his rib-cage.

Liz caved as well, a bubbling well of laughter bursting past her quivering lips.

Red eyed the woman, his face minus any expression at all. Which amused her all the more because she knew secretly, he was just as entertained as they had been.

His eyes softened, pleased to see her in such good spirits and more importantly, the reason why.

“You’re a nutcase.” Liz hugged Francis’ neck fiercely, holding tightly about his sturdy frame.

Red sat back, enjoying the moment. He had hoped Lizzy would come to such a conclusion on her own. He had been a little worried when she had said less than five words in the first twenty minutes of dinner.

But when he had found Lizzy, who was admittedly shocked by the retelling... muffling her infectious giggling into her hand, he knew everything would be all right.

“Whoa, woman...” Francis returned the hug but was overpowered by the unexpected exuberance of the embrace and its duration.
It was as if Lizzy didn’t want to let go.

“…What’s this?” he questioned Red more than Liz’s action, “Was it that entertaining?”

Liz chuckled, releasing the man reluctantly, “I’m just happy to be home... with all my family.”

Francis beamed, “You consider me... family?”

“I consider you hopeless... but family, yes.” Liz reseated herself beside Red. “Where did you hear that awful joke?”

“Lia.” Francis announced proudly.

Even Silas did a double take at that bit of information.

Red laughed his delight, “That girl has hidden depths.”

As the evening wore on, Red and Lizzy showed Nora her new accommodations which she loved before Joe and David took the woman to gather her things, leaving the others to settle into a familiar routine.

Silas intended to hit his rounds but Red vetoed that notion past-haste.

“You’re no good to me in your present state,” he pointed out the obvious, “delegate the minor shit, Silas. Heal your body.”

Surprisingly, the large guard agreed to the sound reasoning for once, “I’m staying in-house tonight.” was his only stipulation.

Red shrugged his compliance.

An hour later, he was relaxing on the lanai, cigar and drink in hand. He could just make out the profiles of his two companion’s in the quickly fading light of another day ending.

Upon Nora’s return, Liz attempted to help Nora gather her belongings only to be shooed away by Nora and the guards alike. They assured her it was only a few items and would only take one trip with just the three of them.

Grudgingly she kissed the woman’s cheek, wishing her a good-night and a peaceful sleep before meandering her way back to Red just in time to watch Francis struggle with juggling his phone, cigar and drink.

She shook her head. She was beginning to hate the cell phone. It seemed they could not have even one relaxing moment these days without an interruption of some sort.

The night air was heavy with the scents of the garden wafting on the gentle breeze.

Liz loved this time of night. She sat next to Red propping her feet on the ottoman even as the man had done earlier.

“Yeah?” Francis sighed, flicking the thick ash off his cigar. “No, I’m not home, I’m at Red’s.” he scowled slightly, shrugging.

“Well, how the hell should I know.” he scratched his forehead having set his tumbler on a nearby table, “You still pissed at Adam?” he directed the question to a totally spaced out Red Reddington.
“...Adam who?” Red needed clarification... which was so Red, Liz chuckled mentally.

“Adam Fields.” Francis supplied.

“Depends.” Red hadn’t thought about the subject matter one way or another. It was very low down on his priority list. “What does he want?” he asked, blowing a stream of smoke in the air.

“He has a new shipment.” Francis related the answer. “Wants you to have first crack at the consignment. Says he owes you.”

“Yes, he does.” Red rolled his cigar lovingly watching the red embers on the end spark to life. “He almost cost me a good client last time.” he recalled. “Could have turned ugly ‘cause the kid was late.”

“He respectfully reminds you,” Francis was taking on the role of go-between, “it was a holiday and no one expected the cops to set up the road blocks for drunk drivers.”

“He should have called.” Red’s anger was resurfacing.

“Does he have the merchandise on hand... now.” Red had calmed. Business was business.

Francis nodded, “The safe house?”

“Tell him to hold for a moment.” Red gestured his head towards the woman.

Francis got up and walked out into the yard, most likely explaining that Red’s fiancée was in residence and was making plans to distract...occupy her.

“Safe house?” she frowned. “You were staying with me tonight.”

“I will.” Red assured, he glanced at Lizzy, laying his hand on hers, “We have some business headed our way. Can you spare me for a while? Silas has doubled the–”

“Like what happened with Cheung?” she fretted.

“Nothing like that.” Red waved his cigar about gracefully, “It’s not dangerous per se, only advisable for you... if the transaction occurs elsewhere.”

She was intrigued, “You’re trying to get rid of me.”

“I am, yes.” Red nodded amiably. He sensed she wasn’t going to ‘go gently into that good night’ with this one, “It’s drugs, Lizzy.” he confessed.

She tried not to react, “I... I thought you didn’t deal with–”

“I do the semi-legal sort. At least... in some states.” he waved the cigar to and fro.

She caught on quickly. “It’s legal in Colorado.”

“Be that as it may...” Red conceded, “it’s not here, not yet.” he reminded.

“Do you know something I don’t know?” she was sensing as much.

“I always know something you don’t know.” Red grinned at her expression. “Trust me, it will become legal in DC by next year.”

“I don’t see what the big deal is here.” she shrugged. “You met with that one guy, Jamie, about the same thing.”

“And I recall you getting in a tizzy about my meeting with Jamie.” Red recalled vividly.

“I did not get in a tizzy.”

“You did.” Red disagreed. “And just like last time, very large quantities are involved. I assumed you would rather opt out of the proceedings.”

“I... I said I wouldn’t get in the way of your business and I won’t.” she staunchly stated.

“You do understand in keeping with appearances,” Red didn’t think she did, “we will have to sample the product.”

Red looked out at Francis, gesturing the meeting take place here. Francis gave a ‘thumbs-up’ gesture, returning his attention to the phone.

“Have to,” she chided, “or want to.”

“I don’t put anything out there I haven’t given approval on myself,” Red advised, “and yes, I want to. It’s been a shitty week.” he confessed just as he heard Francis come up behind him. “He’s on his way?”

“They are, yes.” Francis replied, then side eyed Liz.

“She knows.” Red said.

“All of it?” Francis asked.

“Yes.”

“We need munchies.” Francis clapped his hands , rubbing them together briskly.

Liz watched the man exit, a bewildered expression on her bemused face, “Didn’t he have four plates at dinner?” she said helplessly.

Loud clattering and clanging coming from the direction of the kitchen interrupted the flow of conversation.

“What is he doing in there?” she made her way hastily to the spot in question, “Nora will kill him if he messes up her spotless kitchen!”

Red followed more languidly.

She watched Francis clear the cabinets of chips and junk food.

“You’ll need all that?” she shook her head.

“Can you make some of those sandwiches Nora taught you how to make?” he loaded down a tray with his bounty, “the oven baked ham and what not?”

Liz threw her hands out, exasperated, “I...I guess so.”
“Oh!” Francis remembered, “and some of those little pizzas.” he motioned to a pile on the counter Nora had pre-made and froze for them.

“How many people will be at this little... get together.” she unwrapped the pizzas, setting them on oven trays.

“Well the guards aren’t involved so...” Red wanted most present to have a clear head, “we’re not doing what we did last year.” it was warned to Silas who had just wandered into all the commotion.

“They might still be hungry.” Liz countered, before grabbing a loaf of bread and slapping a package of ham in Red’s hand. He looked at it queerly, but held the package.

She hesitated in her busy movement, eyeing the guard.

He had napped a whole hour, by Liz’s calculations, “What are you doing up?”

She sighed fretfully, staring expectantly at Red.

“What?” Red held his grin.

“You’re not helping...” she waved over the cheese laden bread.

“Baby, I can’t help you if you don’t tell me what you’re doing.”

She rolled her eyes, taking the ham from the man. She slapped two pieces on the other slice, then shoved the meat back in his hands. Red nodded amiably, doing as directed, turning his attention back towards the guard.

“Couldn’t sleep.” Silas grumbled, “Joe said we have company on the way?” he clearly wasn’t pleased with the news.

“We’ll go to–”

“No.” Liz quickly arranged her sandwiches, setting the temperature, “Have your meeting here. It’s less work for Silas and his team.”

Red checked with Silas, “You want to postpone?”

Silas thought about it, “Nah, just keep it contained to one area, don’t disturb Nora.”

“The patio?” Liz queried. She was new to this type of entertaining but was determined to meet the challenge.

“And share with the neighbors?” Red quipped. “Better the Great room.”

It had a lot of area to sit and relax. There was a full bar plus fridge for other refreshments... it would work well.

Shooing Francis off with another tray, Liz scurried about the kitchen cleaning and arranging quickly.

“You’re still not helping...” she rushed past Red, only to be caught and pulled back his way.

“Everything is fine,” he looked about the spotless kitchen. “Take a breath.”

Liz inhaled a deep breath, rolling her shoulders... relaxing. She sucked in a startled breath, rushing away again, mindless of Red’s quiet sigh. She peered into the massive ovens, checking on the already bubbling pizza and sandwiches.

She opened the door just as Francis breezed back in, loading his arms down with bowls of chicken wings and potato salad.

He inadvertently bumped into her butt sending the woman off-kilter for a beat.

Reaching out to catch herself, her hand scraped along the inside of the oven door.

“Dammit!” she yelped, shaking the burning appendage to rid it of the sharp sting.

Red instantly grasped her wrist guiding her to the sink. Cool water eased the burn instantly.

“Shit! I’m sorry, Lizzy!” Francis had hastily unburdened himself of the excess luggage needing to see the damage.

“Oh it’s... fine.” she dismissed, “I swear, I am the most clumsy person in Washington D.C.”

She examined the red wound critically, “We need to get those sandwiches out of–”

“Got it.” Francis was instantly on the task, “...I know why they keep you out of the kitchen though...” he tease, chuckling at the woman giving him the evil eye only to fall silent a moment later when he found a stone faced Red Reddington glaring at him.

Red sighed, holding his temper. Francis didn’t know Tom used to tease Lizzy mercilessly about that very thing.

“Your big ass knocked me into the stove!” she wailed.

Red grinned over at the distraught woman, pleased to see she found fault in Francis... and not herself.

“He’s just trying to get a rise out of you.” he lifted her wrist, planting a gentle kiss on the flesh.

“Well...” Liz settled, enjoying the way Red was babying her right now, truth told, “he does have a big ass.”

“My ass is perfection.” Francis demurred, reloading his arms with his bounty. “If you are finished kissing hers... you can push that tray into the room for me.”

“I bet women just love your bedside manner.” Liz taunted, upset for Francis’ needling of Red.

“If I kiss anything that starts with ‘B’ it won’t be a boo-boo, trust me.” Francis scoffed, already well down the connecting hallway to the opposite side of the house.

“Oh, that man!” Liz pulled a decorative platter down from the pantry, loading neatly cut slices of pizza unto the large surface. “Silas, can’t you just shoot him or something?” she lifted hopeful eyes, “Just a flesh wound... maybe.”

Silas took one of the sandwiches laying out on the counter into capable hands, “Why, he’ll just hold up here during his entire convalescence period and you and Nora will wait on him hand and foot.”

Liz fell silent trying to ignore Red’s grin of amusement.

“Well, no sandwich for him!” Liz proclaimed staunchly.

“What are you...” Francis breezed back through, “the sandwich Nazi?” he grabbed up a convenient golden brown cut of bread and meat stuffing the delicacy into his mouth.

“Is that any way to treat a guest in your home?” he motioned to a reticent Red.

“You’re not a guest.” Liz snapped, “You’re a pest!”

“You say tomato,” Francis countered just as snippily, “some say to-mah-toe.”

“These are really good, baby.” Red soothed frayed tensions expertly, having bitten into one of the crispy delights. They were so delicious in fact, he hoped like hell he kept the surprise from his voice, because he was... surprised as shit.

Liz beamed happily, preening under Red’s attention and more so... enjoying the glowing compliment to her cooking. A first in her lifetime.

“These are really good, baby.” Francis mimicked expertly.

Liz pinched her lips, scowling hard at the man. Red ran a hand over his mouth, hiding his smile.

He really enjoyed watching her get riled up way more than he should.

“God, you baby her to death, are you aware of that fact?” Francis disdained.

“Yes.” Red drawled lazily. “Any objections from the psycho ward will be duly noted and summarily dismissed.”

Francis shut up.

Silas put his radio back on the counter, raising his sandwich. He had gotten a beer from the fridge to go with his snack.

“Your guests have arrived.” his tone left little to the imagination as to just how high on the food chain Silas considered the new arrivals, “Shall I show them in?”

Red chuckled, waving the task aside, “Francis will see to the comfort and well-being of his friends.”

“Not my friends.” Francis sneaked a pizza slice his way, “thought they were your friends.”

“Whatever.” Red rolled his eyes towards the boy, his jaw working feverishly, “Go greet them.”

Francis threw up his hands, sighing, “I don’t know why I have to play host...not even my house,” he grumbled, “do I look like Lurch?” he questioned, pushing his way through the door.

Red turned his attention elsewhere, the matter forgotten in his sphere, “Can you occupy yourself?”

“I’m a big girl.” Liz reminded, “I’ll be fine.”

“The door will be open,” he reminded, leaning to kiss her mouth lovingly, “if you need me, don’t hesitate to come to me.”

“What a sweet thing to say.”

No one noticed Silas rolling his eyes.

“I’m just that type of guy.” Red was in a good mood, a playful one. Lizzy was home, having averted a major catastrophe to his way of thinking.
Silas would keep her safe from the maniac running around out there. A plan was already set up and working if Carver dared storm the Citadel they had improvised.

Red took a swig of his beer, motioning accordingly with the bottle, “Stay with one of the guards... no roaming about on your own tonight, agreed.”

“I’m just gonna read and relax.” she had devised a working plan of her own in her head, “that’s all I’m gonna do.”

“Good girl.” he approved, “I might be late tonight, don’t wait up.”

Red hesitated, he had wanted to ‘connect’ with the woman tonight on more than a spiritual level, so to speak.

Maybe this meeting could be postponed after all...no, on second thought.

The last thing Lizzy needed was some man rutting about her person. She needed to rest tonight. Sleep.

It would be better if he occupied himself elsewhere for the evening.

“When have I not?” she demurred.

Silas almost choked on his sandwich at that one, his head jerking about sharply.

Liz chuckled, “It was almost worth it just to see that reaction.”

Red laughed his mirth.

Silas’ look said it all. Red took his leave with but one moment of silent communication with the large, burly guard.

Liz cleaned up the last of the mess in the kitchen, dusting her hands primly at a job well done.

Nora would be none the wiser when she came up for breakfast tomorrow morning. Liz was glad the woman agreed to stay here and make it her home.

“I think I’ll take a walk before I–”

Silas’ glare stopped Liz in her tracks, “What? I was going to take Joe or...someone.”

“You just told Red you were going to read and–”

“Well, it’s not written in stone is it?” Liz objected. “Am I a prisoner now? In my own home?”

“Don’t take your usual path.” he grumbled, “And stay away from the front gate. Stalker boy got the courage to get out of his car tonight.”

Liz’s lips quivered, “Joe offered to shoot Tom for me. You never have.”

“Not today anyway.” the guard shrugged. “My plans for him today are more on the macabre side.”

Silas ventured, turning about on his stool, hand to hip, “Want to hear them?”
Liz chuckled, “No, thanks. I’d like to sleep tonight.”

The man looked slightly disappointed.

“Silas?” Liz’s curiosity was more than piqued. “Have you ever... sit in on one of those business meetings? The kind the guys are having tonight?”

“I keep my head clear at all times... for the most part.”

“So you’ve never... indulged?”

“Didn’t say that.”

Liz sat on the opposite side of the island, absently fingering a decorative salt shaker, “When I was in college that stuff was every where, of course.” she felt comfortable sharing with this man, “I went to a few parties, ya know.” she wrinkled her nose.

“I knew I had to stay clear of that stuff,” she lowered her voice, “considering the direction my career choices would take me but...” she leaned into her narrative.

“You were always curious.”

“Well, yeah.” she spread her hands out, “That’s natural, right?”

Silas nodded casually, “Knowing Red and Sam, they probably would have sheltered you from such activities when ever they presented themselves.”

“I was at college, what could they do?”

Silas remained mum on the matter.

“Anyway,” she sighed lightly, “guess I’ll go for my walk...” she brightened, “would it be okay to swim a few laps afterwards?”

“As you wish...”

“Oh, that’s from the Princess Bride.” one of Liz’s favorite movies. She had clasped her hands together, pleased by the man’s delivery as well as his quote.

“Yeah, whatever.”

“Well, that moment passed quickly enough.” she grumbled. “Must you ruin everything?”

“My ex-girlfriend says I do...”

“You had a girlfriend?” she leaned into her fist, her interest caught.

“It surprises you I have an ex-girlfriend?”

“No...” she sighed, “not one bit.” she curled her lip disgustedly. “I’m getting my shoes on.”

“I’ll alert the media.” Silas used another famous movie quote.

Liz’s head fell back, grumbling once again, “Whatever!” she snapped, going on her way.

She did not notice her guard’s genuine smile in her wake.
The sound of The Doors drifted down the hallway.

Liz was at once tickled yet miffed. The Doors? Really.

She half expected strobe lights to filter out into the adjoining space as she approached the massive Great room.

She had discarded her day clothes, having changed into a bathing suit for later but a discrete silk robe covering in dark royal blue hid her figure from view.

Sighing despondently for her lot in life, she secured her boot about her leg before slipping one lone suede sandal on her foot. Lifting her leg, she smiled at the cute little butterfly and flowers adorning the sides and top.

Pushing off the bench, she walked down the long corridor. Aside from the heavy black boot... she felt kind of... sexy. The silk of her robe felt luxurious as it billowed in a dark ripple behind her. The one sandal highlighted her bare leg and manicured toes.

Liz rolled her eyes expressively having come along par with the opened doorway.

Sure enough, a large strobe light swirled lazily around, the walls dotted with psychedelic patterns of streaking lights.

“Jesus...” she chuckled involuntarily.

Where the hell had Francis procured such a thing on short notice? He was always talking about proper ambiance so maybe he carried the thing around with him.

Strings of “People are Strange” filled her ears, Well, it describes Francis to a ‘T’, she had to agree.

She scanned the dimly lit entranceway, her eyes not adjusted to the difference of hallway and ‘mom’s basement’ atmosphere as yet.

Red Reddington sat on a long ‘L’ shaped sofa, his arms spread out on either side.

He was alone.

She sensed others in the room but none were close enough to the man.

His eyes settled on her.

Liz stood, transfixed for a long moment, she wondered on his thoughts.

He was trying to convey something with that stare but she couldn’t quite grasp its meaning.

Did he want her to join him? Should she move away, continue on her way?

Red held his expression, wondering what the woman would do, how would she respond.

His fingers twitched along the cushion edge. He wanted so badly to wave her in, but the decision would have to be hers.

The man realized how curious Lizzy must be. She was ever curious. About a myriad of things.
He enjoyed that about her.

He would never deny that part of her.

He and Sam had taken the necessary measures to ensure she never be confronted by drugs or other illicit activities when Lizzy was growing up... her college days were more of a challenge, of course.

She wasn’t exactly a wall flower in those days.

Parties where booze abounded were plentiful and frequent. She was of a legal age for alcohol, and there wasn’t much they could do about that. But Sam was particularly inventive and cagey when it came to his little girls proper upbringing... and drugs were off limits.

Unseen, unheralded body guards would discretely intervene at the right time, always be at the right place. Her college years were littered with a series of tripped fire alarms.

It was a running gag between he and Sam, that no one could find a fire exit faster than their girl. He bet even now, no one could find a fire exit route faster than his Lizzy.

The FBI would take a dim view on any police record a candidate might garner along the way.

Lizzy’s ambitions to enter the law enforcement community were always carefully kept uppermost in Sam’s mind.

Red knew, secretly, the other man would have put the restrictions on Lizzy regardless but it was a good enough reason when the girl got a little touchy about overprotectiveness displayed.

Lizzy wasn’t a little girl any longer. However, Red believed, experimentation often lead to enlightenment of some sort and as Francis had pointed out just a few minutes past, “Wasn’t it better for her to experiment when they were around than not?”

Red was torn, to be truthful.

Liz started, the spell broken. Some clumsy oaf had dropped a tumbler, the heavy glass thwacking gratingly against the marble counter top of the bar.

Red cast a disparaging glance, hastily seeking out his prey once again.

Liz smiled wistfully, offering a small insignificant wave before continuing on her way.

Red watched her trek, catching glimpses of her as she made her way past the large picture windows he had installed to look out onto the garden path outside the rooms.

He checked his instinct to follow the woman’s route.

He didn’t really want to be here. He had enjoyed such pastimes before. He wondered at the change which came over him.

“Red?” Francis held several different pipes aloft, “Which one do you want?”

Red frowned superficially, “The ‘red’ one...” he quipped, determined to get on with it, “of course,”

Liz walked into the pool room. She was a little surprised no one was here.

“Joe?” she called out.
The echo sounded hollow coming back across the spacious pool.

Silas had said the other guard would meet her.

Indecision pulled at the woman. Her senses were calm however. The warm air surrounded her. The pool looked inviting.

She hadn’t swam in what seemed like ages and so loved to float in the heated water.

Joe was likely on his way.

She was being silly. She took off the soft wrist cast and her boot and sandal, setting them aside.

The flowy overgarment was discarded on a convenient lounger. She stepped gingerly down the first few steps into the luxurious arms of the welcoming water.

After a few laps, her leg felt better. She hardly noted the stiffness of her wrist.

This set back wouldn’t be as bad as she had imagined, she realized.

She refused to allow negative thoughts, floating lazily in the delectable sphere of the buoyant water.

After a spell, she decided enough was enough. The water had healed her soul if not her wounded body.

Liz walked up the stairs, wringing her hair of excess moisture, heading for a towel.

She loved this place. The house, the beautiful grounds. She felt stable here. Safe.

A tiny scowl fixed her brow.

What an anomaly... had she not felt the same in her first home? Where she had been spied upon. What a creepy thought... still.

Once Red informed her she had been spied on, she had changed her shower curtain for a solid colored one. Changed in her closet. Even sleeping had been a challenge, feeling like she was a unwilling patient in a sleep study.

But here....

Liz glanced about the lush surroundings.

This place had proven a safe haven. She was mending, not only physically, but emotionally.

She didn’t feel so fragmented any longer.

She ate here with people she cared for, she laughed here... here, she slept peacefully, soundly.

It could be the guards, she supposed. But she attributed Red’s solid presence beside her as the deciding factor.

The fact he slept with a loaded .45 under his pillow didn’t hurt either, she mused her amusement.

She slipped the casts back into place, pulling the flowing cover-up over her shoulders, setting it about her still damp body.

After the trauma of the day, such moments were miraculously healing.
As large and extravagant as this house was, to Liz, it was cozy, inviting and most welcoming.

Hooking her sandal on her finger, she made her way across the tiled space, her thoughts pleasant and varied.

She rounded the corner, pulling up short, suddenly confronted by a totally unexpected barrier.

“Oh!” the woman gasped her shock, hands out to steady herself, “I’m sorry... I didn’t see you there.” she laughed the situation aside, stepping back cautiously.

“I saw you.” the smile the man offered was not exactly pleasant although Liz was sure it wasn’t meant to be.

Liz’s expression cooled by degrees, “If you will excus–”

“I saw you... out the window of the room,” the guy persisted, blocking her intended escape route, “I didn’t catch your name earlier.”

“I didn’t throw it out,” she stated flatly, “but if you must know...it’s Elizabeth. Red’s fiancée.” she stressed the latter frostily. “Now, let me pass.”

“That’s a beautiful name.”

Liz sighed mentally. Her ploy had not worked. She really wished there was a rule book of etiquette to follow in these awkward moments.

“My name is Travis.” he gave it the old college try, “I’m great at warming lovely ladies up, just FYI.”

Liz blew out a long breath. One well placed palm straight to this bastard’s nose would put a swift end to this stupid situation.

Would Red’s fiancée be expected to know such a calculated move?

The creep leaned closer. Liz’s scowl deepened, her body tensing. She wasn’t going to put up with much more of this shit.

“You’re such a little bitty thing.” the creep was saying. He drew a finger over her collar, easily moving the silky garment, baring her shoulder. Ignoring all the warning signs of a move gone bad.

Liz’s eyes dripped ice. She moved from the contact, “Are you fond of that hand?”

“You are very beautiful when you’re all fired up.”

“Red thinks so.” a deep masculine voice intervened. “Back up...now.”

Both participants reacted to the new arrivals presence differently.

Good old Travis backed the hell off, his manner suddenly a little sheepish, definitely awkward in nature.

“Hey, man,” the guy ducked his head, “just passing the time of day here. That’s all... really.”

“Pass it... elsewhere.” Silas suggested, his tone rather chilling to Liz’s ears.
“Sure,” Travis hastily took the cue, “no problem. Just trying to make a connection, ya know.”

“That would be like...” Silas moved steadily forward.

Travis... retreated.

“A bastard breed trying to ‘make a connection’ with a thoroughbred show pony.”

Travis’ ears burned bright red, “Hey man, you never know until you try, right?”

“I catch you anywhere near Red’s territory again...” it was no threat, mere fact, the way it was stated, “even a Forensic team won’t be able to find even ‘little bitty’ parts of what’s left of your sorry ass after I get done with you. Do we understand each other?”

Travis’ Adams’s apple bobbed nervously, “It’s okay, everything’s cool here... all right? We don’t want to ruin the business going on inside, right?”

Travis was desperately searching for an exit... any exit.

“Go join the rest of the doper squad.” Silas jerked a thumb to the Great room, “You’re out of your league here... fucker.”

Travis gratefully made his retreat, his face flaming with humiliation.

Liz stood, arms folded, expression set, “I could have handled—”

“Look,” Silas held up pacifying hands, “that’s my job. That’s what I’m here for. Red expects appearances to be kept.”

Liz wasn’t quite pacified.

“I know you could have dealt with that insufferable punk. Hell, you could do that much with your FBI training alone.” Silas shook his head woefully. “That’s not the point, is it.”

The woman tapped her foot impatiently, unaware of her actions.

“We keep up appearances. We put up a front when a business deal is going down.” Silas waved a massive hand to the imaginary place this was all transpiring, “that’s what you agreed to... wasn’t it?”

“Where’s Joe? This is his fault.” she lashed out. “He was supposed to—”

“Joe has... intestinal problems. He had Mexican earlier.” Silas shrugged. “I was here and that’s all that matters.”

Liz pulled a yucky face, “Can I help? I mean... I have some medic—”

“Yeah, it’s all covered.” Silas held up a testy hand.

“I’m going to have to talk to Red about this crap.” she allowed the man to take her arm and lead her down the hallway. “I don’t know the rules. How can I?”

“Yeah, yeah...” Silas sing-songed his head, “If I got paid for everyone who bitches at me for one thing or another...”

“You do get paid for that.” she jerked her arm from his, sending him a scathing glare.
The man grunted quietly.

He walked with her to the master, checking the room before his exit.

“Keep your radio close.” the man directed, “Lock this door.” he motioned from his position in the corridor. “That fucker approaches you again, beat the hell out of him until I take over and kill him. Got it.”

“Is that a rule.” she grumbled.

Liz closed the door, locking it soundly.

She glanced around the silent room her eyes falling on her romance novel, sighing heavily. It just wasn’t what she wanted to do tonight, she suddenly realized.

She knew exactly what she wanted. It was suddenly crystal clear.

Showering hastily, she rushed to the closet, choosing a dress Red bought for her.

Liz really liked it now but at first, had reservations about the style. It was kind of Bohemian and wispy. Liz didn’t think it suited her. But when she had tried it on the other day, besides the fact that it was comfortable as hell, she felt very pretty in it.

And it was very versatile. She could wear it up on her shoulders or push it down, baring them, which was kind of sexy.

It sat just at her knees. She usually covered her knees because she’d scraped them when she was younger and hated how the scarring looked. But her scars got lost against the jet black of the dress, which almost hid them, blending beautifully with the shade of fabric.

Twisting her hair up loosely and pulling down a few tendrils along her neck, she studied her reflection in the mirror. The look satisfied. It seemed very put together for once. She approved.

She readied herself, marching from the room, determined and spirited.

Red saw the woman’s entrance.

She halted uncertainly at one point, her eyes adjusting to the light or perhaps it was the rapid beat of Jefferson Airplane’s “White Rabbit”, he couldn’t tell.

Her eyes adjusted and fell on Red.

She crossed, head held high, plopping down next to the man.

He could sense something amiss, “Anything wrong?”

“No one little bitty thing.” she cast Travis a granite stare, then softened, “Nothing I can’t handle.”

She cuddled to Red’s side, watching Francis’ actions, Travis all but forgotten, “What’s he doing?”

“Tamping down the leaf.” Red explained.

“This one is sweet,” Francis clearly did not like ‘sweet’, “What you’d think?”
Red lifted the small metal pipe, wafting it under his nose, inhaling the sweet aroma.

Francis drew in deep, holding the breath. He hung his head, bouncing it with the slow beat of “Free Bird”.

Liz’s lips quivered slightly as the man’s head fell back, bobbing along with the music before gradually blowing out a billowing cloud, “Has a nice strong after affect,” Francis’ heavy lids cracked slightly, “...good buzz.”

She backed up a little as the pungent scent assailed her nostrils.

Red smiled indifferently, lighting up. Drawing on the pipe hard.

Liz’s attention was rapt. Her eyes were glued to the man’s profile.

The woman glanced around the huge room. “Mama told me not to come.” she whispered as the eerie atmosphere filtered into her brain.

“That’s right.” Francis pointed an accusing finger at the woman. “You should always listen to your mama.”

“I like that song.” Dembe nodded at nothing in particular.

Liz’s eyes were as big as saucers, “Dembe?”

She was astonished to find the man present.

“Et tu, Dembe?” Red asked mellowly, sensing the woman’s dismay.

Dembe nodded minutely, gallantly bowing deeply from the waist, his hand slicing the air theatrically.

“The phrase spoken by Roman dictator Julius Caesar to his friend and protégée, Marcus Junius Brutus at the moment of Caesar’s assassination but also referenced in an even earlier play, Caesar Interfectus by Richard Eedes.”

“Act Two, Scene One.” Red nodded sagely.

“Dembe knew Julius Caesar?” Francis was confused.

Liz giggled, “Oh, Francis...”

She settled in for the ride... suddenly glad she came.

Chapter End Notes

Nora quoted a tid-bit of dialogue from a favorite movie of mine. Journey to the Center of the Earth. The cast included James Mason, Arlene Dahl and Pat Boone.
Red cleared the pipe of resin, taking a new offering being passed his way.

He studiously studied, then placed a small amount of product inside the receptacle, his brow furrowed, his manner intent.

Elizabeth Keen watched, her attention fixed, rapt.

The man inhaled leisurely on the deep draw holding it auspiciously.

The woman unconsciously mimicked the move, releasing her breath long before Red Reddington did his.

She couldn’t hold it any longer. How the hell did the man hold his breath that long?

He must possess the lungs of an Olympic swimmer.

Color her impressed.

She frowned critically, her attention returning to the unfolding melodrama.

The entire room was pungent with a sweet melodious odor, the dim lights adding to the ambiance.

Red exhaled slowly, a white smoke pouring from his nose and mouth.

Liz waited impatiently for the verdict which was finally forthcoming.

Red looked at the pipe critically, “...Good taste, mellow... but a potent aftertaste I personally find... amusing.”

Liz relaxed. She felt as if the compliment was for her, “You sound like you’re rating a good wine.”

“It is nothing like a good vintage.” Dembe almost scolded, lifting his feet to a nearby coffee table.

Liz gasped softly for the breach of etiquette.

“I was recently in the South of France.” Dembe continued.

“Where he got laid,” Francis stated moodily, “I didn’t get laid.”

“What about Lia?” Liz enquired pleasantly.

“Perhaps if you journey to the South of France?” Dembe lifted a brow, ignoring the comment all together, “As I was saying...” the man garnered everyone’s attention.

But to Liz’s consternation, the large black man fell silent, though she was the only one who seemed to notice.

“What was the middle thing you said?” Francis had lost track of the conversation, apparently.

He scratched his head, leaning forward to check with Dembe.

Dembe turned a mellow gaze, but he did not reply.
“I was in the South of France once.” Red remembered back, a contemplative look on his face.

“Did you get laid?” Liz cut him a disapproving look.

“It was Summer,” Red recalled, “there was lavender in bloom everywhere. It rained the entire time,” he smiled, “it was glorious.”

“That is so deep.” Francis talked around the breath he was holding, little puffs of smoke blowing out of his nose.

He reminded Liz of a dragon.

Francis laughed at nothing, another cloud of white smoke caught in the air, the blue lights of the disco ball highlighting the now hazy grey smoke. He instantly replaced the mist with a chicken wing.

The woman felt a ridiculous urge to sing “Puff the Magic Dragon”. She stifled the urge hastily, realizing a moment later she was humming the upbeat ditty. Though no one seemed to notice.

Red’s head tilted to one side. He shut his eyes, his expression blissfully serene.

“It’s like floating on a marshmallow floatie.” Red’s head tilted the other way, “No, a marshmallow cloud.”

Liz shifted confused eyes.

“This one is giving me a good buzz.” Francis was staring hard at yet another chicken wing.

Liz wasn’t sure if the ‘buzz’ was coming off the pipe or the chicken wing.

She leaned, examining the product lined up haphazardly on the long surface of the coffee table.

She could not for the life of her, figure out why anyone would find those little balls of prickly looking lint so damned enticing.

“What do you think, Dembe?” Red obviously wanted input.

“The third and fourth... very mellow.” the man nodded his approval. “The second lacked potential. The first...” he offered a disgusted smirk.

Red sat back, seemingly totally satisfied with the critique. “There was an electrical storm,” he held up a scholarly finger, “it struck the very top of the Eiffel Tower. Very impressive display indeed.”

The man sat back, easing his shoulders into the cushy length of the couch.

Liz’s lips twitched, positive they hadn’t heard the last of his tale.

“Puff the magic dragon...” Francis sang, “lived by the sea and,” he sat back, packing his pipe with flourish, “frolicked in the autumn mist in a land called Honahlee.” he lit the herb, inhaling deeply. Holding his breath, he continued in his attempt, his voice muffled.

“A dragon lives forever but not so little boys.” he sang on the exhale, a cloud escaping his parted lips, “Painted wings and giant rings make way for other toys. One grey night it happened, Jackie Paper came no more...”

Liz pinched her lips together, holding her smile having enjoyed the lively rendition. She shifted her eyes when a deeper voice joined in.
Dembe added his own tone to the song. Tapping the metal pipe in cadence with his singing, “Without his lifelong friend, Puff could not be brave.” he smiled at Red, taking the offered lighter, “So Puff that mighty dragon sadly slipped into his cave oh...”

Francis sniffled from his seat, mournfully dragging the last of his smoke into his body, “That is so sad...”

Liz covered her mouth, hiding her giggle.

“Lovely rendition, boys...” Red nodded his approval, “Do you happen to know Tom Dooley–”

“That makes me cry.” Francis scowled.

Ignoring Francis, Red continued on, “Or perhaps,” he hesitated, his brow furrowing, “...What was that damn song you entertained us with the other day.”

“He has to pick just one?” Dembe enquired, remembering Francis had regaled them with a few choices.

Francis evil-eyed the man. Dembe waved off the dirty glare, giving an encouraging thumbs up of approval.

“You sing!” Liz perked up thrilled that her friend had a pleasing singing voice.

“Like a jailbird.” Silas quipped from the corner.

Snickering, Red tapped his pipe clean, nodding at the woman beside him, “He’s quite the little warbler.”

“Did I have to pee?” Francis was confused as to why he was standing.

Liz sighed under her breath, her shoulders slumping. Francis’ attention span was that of a monkey distracted by a shiny object... most of the time anyway. Tonight, it was amplified to the extreme.

“No.” Red pointed to the tray of pizza slices the boy had been intent on before getting lost in the Cosmo’s.

Francis beamed happily at the newfound treasure. Snatching a large piece, he settled back into his chair, devouring the treat.

Red reached for the next container, breaking off a minuscule piece. He passed the supply around graciously. “When I remember that song, you will sing it.”

Nodding indifferently, Francis held out his hand taking the newest batch. “I was in Montana once.”

Nodding indifferently, Francis held out his hand taking the newest batch. “I was in Montana once.” he caught up to a long past conversation. “There was a mother of a thunderstorm but it didn’t strike the Eiffel Tower or anything.”

“The Eiffel Tower can grow more than six inches during the summer.” Red added after the fact, “The high temperatures make the iron expand.”

Dembe nodded patiently at nothing in particular.

Elizabeth tried to read the men present.

No one seemed impaired per se. She didn’t know exactly what she had expected.
Red and Dembe just appeared more relaxed than usual.

Red always used an ottoman when... if he kicked back. Tonight he sat, long legs stretched out, like Dembe, making use of the coffee table.

Aside from Red having more than the usual number of interesting facts on hand, Liz couldn’t understand most of what was being said because the guys never finished a sentence.

No one seemed bothered by the fact and what’s more, seemed to understand each and every syllable muttered.

“Aren’t you supposed to pack that down pretty good?” the woman didn’t know protocol but wasn’t it similar to smoking a pipe? The legal kind.

“Only sampling, baby.” Red corrected the misconception, “we’re going for taste and affect.”

“If you consistently fart for 6 years and 9 months,” Francis held up a knowledgeable finger, “enough gas is produced to create the energy of the atomic bomb.” he waved a cheese stuffed pretzel around like it was Excalibur.

Dembe’s brow furrowed, but he remained passively quiet.

“What the hell does that have to do with anything?” Liz demanded to know.

“Weren’t we talking about things expanding?” Francis was suddenly animated, “I’ve got another one,” he seemed inordinately proud, “Cornflakes were invented to prevent masturbation.”

Francis face fell, “It doesn’t seem to be working with me.”

Silas, who had been leaning against the wall, could not pass up such a golden opportunity. “A man will ejaculate 18 quarts of semen in his lifetime... you have exceeded the expected norm.”

Francis was happy again.

Liz was getting a little hungry. Hadn’t she ate an hour ago?

But that pretzel looked delicious.

“...Shit.” Francis dropped his forehead into his hand.

Red glanced over as did Dembe. Both men watched and waited.

“Are you all right?” Liz was instantly concerned. She moved closer to the young man.

Francis cocked his head from side to side, “Oh man...” he totally approved, his tone soft and awe-inspired, “that one made my head expand.”

Red took another hit off the same stuff, bobbing his own head, nodding silently.

Dembe shifted more comfortably into his chair smiling at the supplier who kept hovering about, presenting containers, talking amiably.

Francis drew odd little designs into his forehead.

Liz leaned forward, grabbing a pretzel.
She listened to the stilted communication wondering what plane of existence they were on...

“This can not be helping your headache.” she sipped her tea absently.

Red was impressed with her perception, “I did indeed, have a headache,” he hefted his pipe, “but this only helps, trust me.”

“Do you want a pretzel?” she offered hers over.

Red’s eyes deepened, “Can you ‘do’ a pretzel?”

The woman’s expression altered, “Are you being uncouth?”

“Could be.” the man philosophized, “there once was this woman in Marrakesh…”

“Is this a limerick?” Francis asked.

Dembe sighed, “She was a student of the Kama Sutra... very proficient at the art.”

“Not that one.” Red wagged his finger back and forth disapprovingly.

“The chick in the dirty limerick?” Francis was... lost.

Liz reached out, smacking his arm in a bid to silence the man lest she distract Red and Dembe.

“Her sister?” Dembe asked.

“No, the other one.” Red sighed heavily.

“I had a headache the other day,” Francis remarked then grew contemplative, “or was it a sinus infection?” he questioned, then shrugged, “I thought I was going to die.”

Liz rubbed her forehead, pushing against the gathering ache having suddenly realized, Francis had been one step behind in the conversation since she joined the fray.

“This one is just for newbies. It takes the edge off,” Adam was animated as he presented his prize, “has a nice finish. It’ll give mom and dad a nice buzz. Perfect when the kids are…"

He glanced around the room, something catching his attention. The guy had a very short attention span. He and Francis would get along well, Liz surmised.

Red pulled little pieces out of the small container, rubbing it between his fingers before picking something out and throwing it.

“Are those yucky?” Liz had noted the process before, “Why do you do that?” she asked conspiratorially, looking at Adam suspiciously.

She had to lean very close to be heard over, ironically enough, “The Sounds of Silence”.

“Adam delivers top-notch product, I just prefer mine clean of stems and seeds.” Red explained his actions. “Besides, I’m gonna load up on this one because it’s weaker and will need the added space in the bowl.”

“I saw lightning strike a cow before...” Francis commented. He had taken off his shoes and socks, counting his toes and fingers.
He seemed troubled by some obscure fact. Liz wondered if Francis was thinking about the cow.

“Seven percent of American adults believe chocolate milk comes from brown cows.” Red shook his head woefully.

Francis frowned, “Are you implying it doesn’t?”

Red continued on, accepting the challenge, “It used to frighten me that these people not only voted... but procreated.”

Red inhaled deeply, a contemplative look on his handsome features as he stared at the boy.

“...You’re fine.” he assured around the breath he was holding.

“How can you say that!” Francis gasped his disbelief, showing his hands as proof. “I’m missing limbs!”

Liz leaned, poking each finger, “One, two, three—”

“Slow down!” Francis focused his pin-point eyes, “You’re going too fast!

She dipped her head, stifling her laughter.

“Okay... okay...” Francis nodded, his unblinking eyes wide and alert, “go ahead.”

“One...” she started over, slowly counting out the man’s fingers until reaching ten.

“Oh my God...” he wailed.

Liz sat back, content her work there was done.

“There’s two missing...” Francis whispered his despair.

The woman beside Red looked at him with open wonder, drawing a throaty chuckle from the man.

“How many fingers do you think you have?” Red enquired.

Liz watched Red casually tilt his lighter, the flame igniting and burning the green lint. The herbs were fast disappearing.

He held his breath, patiently waiting for Francis to respond.

“I don’t know...” Francis groaned his dismay.

Laying the pipe down, Red lifted his hands, showing the young man his wiggling fingers, “Ten, Francis.”

Francis turned his hands about, curling the long fingers into his palms before unfurling them slowly.

“Well, that’s well and good for you.” he rasped. “What about us normal people?”

Red shook his head fretfully, “You’ll survive with ten. Trust me”

Francis watched the fingers waving about slowly, “...Streamers,” he complained somewhat coherently, “what the hell is in that pipe?”
“I told you to watch the laced shit...” Red reminded.

“Laced?” Liz sat up, suddenly alert.

“He’s fine.” Red sat back, patting her knee with his free hand.

“We need to make this a top seller.” Francis pulled at his fingers, content they remained in place. “It’s amazing.”

Red blew out softly, allowing the smoke to roll off his tongue, “That would feel so good on your clit.” it was his turn to lean over and share.

Liz’s body tightened with longing, an erotic sensation traveling to her center having caught up to the imagery painted. She leaned into his arm, pushing her breast into the muscled flesh.

“Horizontal refreshment was a nineteenth century slang for sex by the way.” Red shared again.

She opened her mouth to relay she would enjoy a little horizontal refreshment, right about then... but was waylaid by the man himself.

“This isn’t bad, Adam.” the man approved. “Probably be your best seller?”

“We’ll make it up in volume if nothing else.” Adam agreed, “I’ve got a few more...” he was off, across the room conferring with one of the two men who had accompanied him.

Liz’s gaze fell on the other member of the small trio, sipping her tea absently.

The guy’s eyes fell hastily as he noted her looking his way.

She shrugged mentally. He appeared uneasy now... fidgety.

Could be Silas’ constant presence over by the doorway.

The guard had not left his post except for one brief second to confer with another guard who had vied for his attention.

She eyed him critically, noting Silas was favoring his side. She glanced at the clock, wondering why time was moving so slow. It seemed like the next shift would never begin and her guard needed his rest.

“So you remember the name of that Sherpa in Nepal?” Red was asking Dembe.

“Kami?” Dembe was helpful, “Back in ’98?”

“No, no...” Red waved his hand about almost theatrically, “the one is ’53, with Edmund Hillary.”

“Tenzig Norgay?” Dembe supplied the answer.

“Exactly.” Red pointed sharply.

Both men returned to their pastime.

Liz scowled. She wasn’t going to let this one pass, “What about him?” she demanded.

“Speaking of mountains,” Red continued on, “did you know... were you aware, that Zurich is considered one of the twenty-five best places on Earth to live? Would you like to move there?”
“A lovely city.” Dembe concurred. “Founded by the Romans. They referred to it as Turicum.”

“Ehh... no?” Liz faltered at the sudden turn in the conversation. “I asked about the Sherpa guy.”

“I think I was a Sherpa in a past life.” Francis stated quite seriously.

“He complained about hiking the Foothills of Malibu.” Red reminded sotto voce.

“Do you believe in that stuff?” Liz was curious. “Past lives, I mean.” she felt she should specify which topic she was on.

“Who do you think I am?” Francis scoffed, “Shirley MacLaine?”

The woman sighed heavily.

“China is the best place to live.” Dembe almost scolded the fact.

“It is quite picturesque.” Red stated, “If you ignore all the glaring issues, that is.”

“They invented something important...” Francis seemed relatively sure of the fact, “peanut butter or something cool like that.”

He went off in search of peanut butter in the next instance.

Liz hung her head resigned, opening a fresh bag of chips. Understanding they all seemed to be communicating on a wavelength only they understood, she popped a chip in her mouth, intent on enjoying the show.

While it was frustrating to only hear short bits of their inner thoughts, she had to admit... she was fascinated by how quickly topics changed and how they all, aside from her, seemed to understand the thought process.

A sudden thought this should be part of psychology courses came... and went as quickly as the thought entered her mind.

“Did you know,” Red inhaled the sweet smoke, his head easing back into the couch cushion, “peanuts are not nuts but seeds.” he toed his shoe, easing it from his foot.

Liz eyes widened as the other shoe followed, both hitting the floor with a loud thunk. Red never took his shoes off until they were in their room.

“In fact,” he continued on, “walnuts, cashews, almonds...” he lazily rolled his hand indicating there were more, “they’re seeds too.”

Where he came up with these random facts, she didn’t know. All she knew for certain was that while odd, they were kind of interesting.

“Speaking of seeds, the man who planted the Johnny Appleseed trees didn’t expect his fruits to be eaten, but rather made into alcoholic apple cider.”

Smiling softly, she leaned closer to the man, “What else do you know?”

“The Chinese invented everything that is important.” Red stated succinctly. “Papermaking, printing...”

“The compass.” Dembe added regally.
“There were four...” Red searched his mind, which at this stage of the game was expansive indeed, “four great inventions.”

“They invented ketchup.” Francis reminded.

“Yeah....” Red nodded absently, “but that’s not it.”

All three stared out into various parts of the room, falling silent.

Liz’s head fell back into the couch cushion, groaning her dismay before looking to Silas for help.

“Gunpowder.” the man stressed, as though it should have been the obvious answer to the people sitting in that particular room.

“Yes!” Red smiled happily.

“What about that Terra cottage cheese army they found over there?” Francis was back full force, arms loaded down with goodies.

“Oh!” Liz stood hastily, helping the man unload his bounty, “I want these.” she rattled a package of chocolate chip cookies.

“They found the army.” Dembe pointed out the flaw in Francis’ thinking.

“Were they lost?” Francis queried. “What the hell kind of army gets lost?”

Dembe shook his head, his eyes closing, “The army wasn’t invented.”

“Well, somebody invented it.” Francis debated artfully. “Harry Potter didn’t conjure it up did he?” he seemed rattled by the idea.

“Sometimes,” Dembe deep timbre soothed Elizabeth’s ears, “I imagine myself consorting with the Lady of the Lake.”

“Hot chick...” Dembe had Francis’ total approval. “Scotland has 421 words for ‘snow’.”

“You made that up.” Liz was relatively sure. She pointed an accusing cookie at the guy. For a second there it concerned the woman she had followed Francis’ train of thought from the ‘hot to cold’ metaphor.

“Sadly, no.” Red empathized with the woman.

Dembe stretched luxuriously, “I so enjoy these sessions... much is learned.”

Silas snickered from the doorway, “And forgotten the next day.” he straightened slightly, lifting his voice, “Hey Francis, did you know banging your head against the wall will burn 150 calories an hour?”

“Yeah, that’s an out and out lie.” the young man countered.

Silas broke out into a hearty laugh, “…The Slovenia Incident?”
Francis threw him a side-ways glance, “We’re not talking about that.”

Red set there, head resting comfortably, eyes closed. A smiled graced his lips, “I’ve got you all beat.”

Dembe had assumed much the same pose, “We all wait with bated breath.”

“Wombat shit is cube-shaped.” Red announced with a flourish.

The silence was deafening.

It did not last long.

“So what,” Francis exclaimed, “so is mine if I’m constipated.”

“And you thought you had him.” Dembe chuckled lowly. The man mused thoughtfully for a long beat, “There is something I once read in Reader’s Digest…”

“So it must be true.” Red nodded sagely.

“In 1965, a patent was filed for a ‘birthing apparatus’,” Dembe continued, undaunted, “which would spin a pregnant woman around at as much as 7G’s until their baby was flung out from the centrifugal force.”

“Dembe!” Liz was horrified at such an outrage. “That is not funny, okay.”

Everyone was afraid to offend for a few seconds.

Silas was holding his side to protect it from the quaking of his body as he tried desperately to hold his mirth.

“But it would explain Francis so well…” he pointed out to all present.

At which point, the laughter exploded.

Liz rolled her eyes, patting Francis’ shoulder sympathetically only to find the man rolling with laughter himself. She gave up.

She put her hands on her hips, facing her adversaries squarely, “I have one which seems to apply.” her eyes darted from smirking face to face. “The Declaration of Independence was written on hemp paper.”

Red glanced over at her amid the chuckles and reluctant admiration displayed by his contemporaries. “I think I’m in love.” he purred seductively.

“Read a book.” Dembe rolled his eyes, “Google isn’t the answer to everything, you know.”

“What Google doesn’t know, Alexa does.” Francis pulled a face. “Don’t even pretend you knew that.”

“It’s okay Francis,” she soothed, thanking him for the support.

Francis was instantly better, “Want a hit?” he offered to share.

“Francis!” Red’s tone was sharp.
“What?” Francis was dismissive, hadn’t they discussed this earlier. “You do want to try it, right? I mean... I wasn’t meaning to pressure you or...”

Liz looked at the pipe the man held, its allure growing stronger with each minute spent here.

“...I ... I don’t know?” she faltered, the decision surprisingly difficult. She sat her chin on Red’s shoulder, “What’s it like?”

The man hesitated, “Would you have asked such a question a month ago?”

Red felt the weight of a problem he hadn’t noted before. Was association with him forcing Elizabeth to do things she might not attempt otherwise?

“I’m not a child, Red.” she wasn’t certain if she should even have to ask permission of the man. “I can make my own decision.”

“Is it a decision you would have made on your own, had it not been easily accessible.” he clearly doubted the fact. The man arose.

Dembe followed suit out of habit.

“I never should have brought this shit in here tonight.”

Silence fell over the room.

All stopped in their tracks, waiting, breaths held. Red started for the door, Liz hot on his heels.

“What’s the big deal?” Silas’ deep voice broke the tension and silence. “All her buddies at work do it... it’s not like you’re offering her the hard stuff.”

Red shifted a cold, empty stare, “I wasn’t offering it to her at all.”

“Lighten up.” Silas’ tone softened. “Where’s the real harm?”

“What do you mean, all my buddies at work?” Liz was flabbergasted by the guard’s implication.

Large blue eyes sought Red’s bloodshot ones.

“Not as white washed as you thought, huh?” Silas was blasé about the whole thing.

The conversation was kept between the four of them. Dembe stood off slightly, his eyes keenly aware... watchful.

Red cocked his head sharply to the left, his mood altering slightly.

“What does he mean, Red?” Elizabeth’s gaze shifted between Silas and the other object of her interest.

She moved closer, lowering her voice, “Who is he talking about?” she couldn’t fathom any of her colleagues doing something so totally illegal.

Silas kept his expression neutral.

“I’m not judging them.” Or was she? Did she feel unsettled that one... or more of her contemporaries–

“It makes the stress more bearable.” Red felt compelled to offer excuses for her friends but he wasn’t exactly sure why? In doing so, perhaps he would find one which suited himself.

“Well... of course,” she strived for an open outlook, “I mean, if Cooper–”

“Not so much Cooper,” Red sing-songed his head, “...Ressler...” he shrugged lackadaisical shoulders.

Liz’s mouth fell agape, “Ress?”

“Occasionally, Aram.” Red liked the guy better when he was high, actually.

“Aram?” Liz was shocked. “No! No way!”

“Oh, yes...” Silas assured her.

“Samar, if she’s on assignment and it’s required.” The woman became softer, gentler. The dark eyes smiled more Red had noted.

“Or if you approach her just right...”

Red threw Silas a dark glare. The guard’s mouth twitched irresistibly, but he shut up.

“I... I don’t know what to say.” how could she not have known such a thing about her...friends?

Especially Ress, who read her the riot act about proper procedures and what not.

Moments passed.

Francis arose, crossing the area slowly. He came alongside the woman.

“Why are we all over here?” he looked back at the expansive area.

The room almost glowed with a Moorish blue mist.

Streaks of colored lights whizzed by on the walls.

Shadows seemed elongated, exaggerated.

Music pounded into the brain but the steady beat somehow calmed the heart.

“Well, I will not be the only one who hasn’t tried it.” Liz was adamant.

“You think an aspirin alters your mental capacity.” Red warned putting a restraining hand on the woman’s arm. “Have you ever even smoked a cigarette in your life?”

Liz felt her cheeks flush. All eyes were on her.

Dembe’s were gentle and patient. Silas’ were sarcastically amused. Francis’ were... blank and expressionless.

Red’s were... very concerned.

“I... I have.” she lifted a defiant chin.
“What, that one time Sam caught you?” he remembered that one.

Sam had flipped his lid. It took Red an hour to calm the man.

It was a normal teenager thing... it’s what they did. Smoked, drank and had sex in the back seat of cars.

Well... all except Lizzy.

The man read the determined set of her mouth.

He relented, his hands spreading graciously, “If it’s what you want.”

Liz wasn’t sure but she couldn’t back down now.

“You can back out, Lizzy.” Red stressed, giving her an out... hoping she’d change her mind.

She turned, pointing to the table, “Show me.”

Francis gallantly waved her on, following the woman’s path as she practically skipped back to the couch, her eyes eager and excited.

He glanced back over his shoulder, damning himself for bringing it up when he saw the dejected set of Red’s shoulders before the man straightened his posture.

“She’ll be fine, Red.” Silas muttered. “It is better she is here, safe, with us.”

Red nodded aside, watching the woman take her seat as Francis took a new pipe Adam handed over.

“If she did it with Aram...” Silas pointed out, “or even Samar, she’d be down on her guard.” he reminded. “I’m here... you’re here. She’ll be fine.”

Red blew out a long breath, “I just didn’t...”

“I know.” Silas sighed as both men watched Francis showing Liz the basics.

Red set his jaw, working his way back to her side. Dembe set back into his chair, getting comfortable.

Silas shook his head slowly, still feeling the waves of despair coming off Red Reddington.

Elizabeth Keen was the only pure and innocent thing in his world... and by association, Red believed he tainted that innocence.

When in reality, by subjecting her to the harsh reality they all lived in, Red was allowing Liz a safe space to broaden her outlook, gain confidence and a street savvy know-how she needed in her line of work.

Besides, Silas honestly believed after tonight, they would not repeat this little endeavor.

Elizabeth was just curious by nature and needed to know.

Once she achieved that knowledge, she would move on to the next unknown.

If anything, to see her facing this unexplored activity with such determination made him very proud.

Unlike a kid not wanting to leave their mothers side out of fear or shying away from a new exotic food... Liz was ready to step out on her own and take a bite out of the new experience.

Silas stepped back into his alcove, leaning casually against a nearby chair.

His eyes scanned the room and passing guard outside the windows, doing exactly as he had promised Red Reddington.

“I’ll work the lighter.” Francis ended the tutorial. “Are you sure you want to do t–”

“Francis...” she sighed, holding her pipe aloft.

He glanced at her shaking fingers which negated the determined set of her eyes. Nodding once, he flicked the lighter, holding it over the small bowl.

Two hits in and the woman’s limbs felt oddly heavy. She felt tingly and warm.

She was having trouble controlling the cough. No one else had coughed.

“Light weight.” Francis teased, seeing the effect the drug was already having on the novice.

Liz shook her head, blinking as the lights of the room slowed considerably. The music had a dreamy quality to it.

Like one of those old 45 vinyl records slowed down to a crawl. It was soothing in a distorted sort of way.

It was not an unpleasant state at all.

She tilted her head, and it felt like it kept moving.

She put her hands up to stop the fluidity of the movement.

Red sat close to her, his gaze intent.

“What do you want to stop?”

She kept her eyes closed, “No... but don’t leave.”

“Not going anywhere.” she was assured.

Red sat back, alert and functioning.

The woman had turned a blind eye to most of his activities of late.

He had wanted her closer. He had wanted her to be a part of his world.

Not this part though...

It bothered him terribly that he allowed her into this seedier side of what he had become.

Was he changing who she was?

He looked at her half mast eyes, her entire manner altered from minutes before... that’s what this shit did right?

Was it a bad thing? He had never thought so until...
“My heart is beating so fast.” she put her hand over the area.

Red’s brow furrowed. She shouldn’t be experiencing that. Just the opposite.

Was it just nerves?

“Come here.” he welcomed her into the comfort of his arms, hoping to crush any anxiety creeping in.
Liz scooted into the security offered, snuggling in. She laid her head onto his chest, listening to the slow, steady beat of his heart.

Red’s fingers trailed a pleasurably searing trek over her temples, his hand languidly brushing the side of her head absently.

Elizabeth sighed lightly letting the weird feeling flow through her body.

“I’m all floaty.” she smiled at nothing in particular.

“You need something in your stomach.” Red waved the next round of product aside, starting to rise, “I’ll get you some food.”

“No, no.” the woman waved his efforts aside. “I’ll get it. You stay.” she smiled down at him.

Had it taken an inordinate amount of time to stand? She wondered absently, dismissing the thought in the next instance.

She traipsed to the long bar, checking out the array of food set out on decorative plates.

Had she done that? Well, what a good little hostess she was turning out to be.

She giggled at the thought.

“Hey...”

Elizabeth frowned hard at the hand touching her forearm, following the arm attached up to the owner’s face.

Her own face hardened.

“No, hey... I wanted to say I’m sorry for... before, ya know.”

That guy Travis was standing beside her.

“You’re too close.” she retorted, pointing a finger at the man.

He stepped back instantly, “Oh... sorry.”

He glanced nervously at very vigilant guard whose grey eyes bore into his with a steely glare.

“I was out of line. I thought if you were of a mind, you know?”

“I wasn’t and I’m not.” Elizabeth’s mind wandered freely and for a second she forgot her train of thought. “…But it’s okay. But go away now.” was all she truly wanted.

The guys eyes hardened for a brief second but then he smiled.

Elizabeth felt creeped out.
“Okay, just wanted to clear the air.”

“Good luck with that.” Elizabeth waved her hand trying to move the heavy smoke floating everywhere.

Travis ducked his head, heading for the opposite side of the room.

Red had patiently watched the exchange.

He was worldly enough to see some sort of connection had been previously made between the two people he focused upon.

Lizzy had evidently handled the matter sufficiently. All the same, Red’s stare was a cold, calculating one as it met the tall, gangly man’s.

Travis smiled instantly to alleviate any possible misconceptions.

Red wasn’t buying it, clearly.

The guy cleared his throat, shifting his gaze to a safer subject matter.

Red continued to stare however and within seconds, Travis had arisen, seeking out his contemporaries just as Lizzy plopped down next to him nibbling on her snacks.

Even as Francis and Lizzy chatted amongst themselves, Red held his vigil.

Dembe and Silas glanced at one another, then back to their friend, waiting with bated breath for the explosion.

Both tensed, ready for action when Red abruptly shoved at the table with his foot, sending it sliding in a glide across the hardwood.

Silas stood slightly, one foot perched on the rung of his chair as Dembe clasped the arm rests...

Francis stilled at the quick movement, darting his eyes Red’s way, fighting for clarity in the murky surroundings.

Red stood, holding his hand out to the woman.

Liz glanced at the other’s in confusion at the sudden change but took the offering only to be pulled into Red’s warm embrace.

A soft blush covered Elizabeth’s cheeks, being the center of attention, before suddenly being drawn into Red’s sphere.

His large hand settled about her back, his fingers wrapping about her smaller hand.

She quickly fell into step with the man as they swayed to the romantic, yet haunting, melody which filled the surrounding space.

Rubbing his cheek against the soft strands of her hair, Red spun them slowly, his dark eyes settling on his foe.

Tearing his eyes from the couple, Francis glanced at Dembe and the guard intently focused on Red... and the problem at hand.
Francis smiled, finally understanding. Though he missed whatever transpired, it was obvious to him Red was staking a claim.

Francis hummed the melodious tune, smiling warmly at Dembe as the man relaxed in his stance.

The other occupants in the room stilled in their movements, afraid to break the spell they were under. Francis had to admit, it had been a long time, at least over twenty years, since he had seen this side of Red.

It had been sorely missed.

He craned his head towards the guard, snickering. Silas turned the dial on the lights, lowering them even more, setting the tone of the romantic atmosphere.

Possibly in hopes to quell Red’s urge to kill their guests.

Though, Lizzy seemed to be doing the job well enough on her own.

The hazy fog of smoke and dancing lights, subdued colors flickered across their bodies, casting them in shades of blues, reds and deep purples.

Glints of shining illumination flittered across their faces, highlighting and drawing attention to their mouths and eyes in the brilliant light show.

Red lowered his gaze, his eyes softening when the woman wrapped her arms about his neckline, snuggling up into his embrace.

Neither noticed Dembe subtly restarting the song as the woman unconsciously pulled Red further under her influence.

Silas settled back into his chair, crisis diverted for the moment.

Red focused his full attention on the woman in his arms, his hand tracing the gentle swell of her hip.

The crystal clear azure depths, as stunning and unpolluted as the waters off the Maldives, lifted slowly.

Mesmerized, he watched the long lashes flicker, almost bashfully, before revealing the shimmering blue eyes just as the powerful lyrics washed over him.

His lungs seized, his breath stolen from him.

Grasping the woman, he pulled her closer, dipping his nose into her neckline needing her touch so badly.

Francis felt a pull in his own chest as he watched the man almost burrow into the woman.

How could anyone truly not understand how very much Red needed this... needed his Lizzy.

Francis’ eyes trained on the couple and the shadow of their reflection dancing hypnotically along the wall in unison.

The sensual impression of their lovemaking only an echo of the deep love present between the two.

He harmonized with the singer, drawing an unexpected smile from Dembe and Silas.
Teasing the woman, Red’s lips subtly brushed over her cheek, the silken skin heightening his senses. Leaning, his long lashes caught hers. The soft tickle fluttered against his cheekbone, urging him closer.

His full lips grazed the corner of her mouth, drawing a deep breath from the woman.

“Lonely rivers sigh,” Francis sang, his focus on the loving couple, “Wait for me, wait for me. I'll be coming home, wait for me.”

Capturing her lip, Liz bit at the plump flesh as Red’s eyes bore into hers. Almost willing her to hear his inner thoughts.

Dropping his gaze, Red licked his lips at the sight of the rosy mouth swelling under his attention.

“Oh, my love, my darling,” Francis continued, feeling the tension between the couple, “I’ve hungered, hungered for your touch…”

Lifting her hand, she tenderly cupped Red’s cheek. The subtle sound of the shadow on his face scratched roughly against her soft palm.

Nuzzling into the gentle touch, Red’s eyes fluttered closed, savoring the intimacy.

“A long,” Francis’ eyes softened as Red’s hand curved into her dress, bunching the material tight in his fist, “…lonely time.”

Her lip quivered as Red’s eyes flashed with pain as the words hit home.

“And time goes by,” Francis fought at the knot in his own throat, “so slowly.”

Red’s dark eyes penetrated hers, needing Liz to understand how long he had waited for this… for her.

“And time,” the young man blinked against the gathering wetness in his eyes, understanding Red’s desire… his need for companionship, for her, “…can do so much.”

Tears skirted down Liz’s cheeks as she felt every aspect of the man. Did he feel healed by having her in his life as much as she felt complete with him in hers?

Threading his thick fingers through the silky tresses, Red cupped the small head in his hand. Drawing her closer to his mouth, his lips just barely touching the inviting ones.

“Are you still mine?” Francis choked out, his breath taken by this powerful moment.

Liz gasped as Red’s pupils contracted, the pinprick orbs fluctuating, showing his arousal.

“I need your love.” Francis fought to breathe, as Red pulled the woman tightly against his body slowly dipping his head.

Red captured the tempting mouth, swallowing her sharp gasp.

She trembled against him, the emotions… the sensation of his deep yearning for her, overwhelming.

“I…” Francis felt the ache in his own chest that Red must feel at this point, “I need your love.”

Tightening his embrace, Red lifted her into his frame, gently flicking his tongue against the rosebud mouth, demanding entrance.

Opening for him, she sighed shakily, the bruising kiss robbing her of any equilibrium.

Backing her into a wall, Red furthered his loving assault. His hand curled about her waist, drawing her flush against his body. His other cupping her bottom, the large fingers kneading the supple flesh.

“God speed your love...” Francis breathed just as shakily, a sudden wash of melancholy overtaking him, “...to me.”

The song floated away in a rising crest of strings before flowing into another sensual ballad. Not that either seemed to be aware of the fact still caught up in their passionate embrace.

Shifting embarrassed eyes, Francis breathed a sigh of relief finding the guard focused on the couple and not his uncustomary display of emotions.

Silas worried his thumb across his lips, sighing heavily. He knew of Red’s longing for Elizabeth and even now knew the man grasped hold of it with both hands... afraid it would slip away.

But then, they had reason to feel as they did. Red had lost his family... and he, Anya.

No one more than he, understood the desire for a soul-mate.

Movement in the corner of his eye broke the moment. Shifting his keen eyes, he zeroed in on Adam crossing rapidly, approaching the pair.

Red sensed the nearing intrusion, growling under his breath. Breaking the lock on the woman, he turned dark eyes on the interloper, barely controlling the urge to strike out when he felt the woman’s panted breaths against his neckline.

He needed her... not this shit.

Adam stilled in his tracks, his head lowering respectfully. Waiting...

Taking a deep breath, Red kissed the pouty mouth once more. His groin stirred when Liz mewed softly as he pulled back.

“Why don’t you get us a drink, baby.” his roughened voice coaxed silkily. “I’ll only be a moment.”

Lowering to her feet, she nodded dejectedly, pushing her bottom into his warm palm.

“I promise...” he soothed, squeezing the rounded flesh. He pat her gently, pushing off the wall, allowing her room to move.

Red watched the sway in her hips as she crossed the short path, collecting their drinks as she spoke quietly to Francis and Dembe.

He turned his eyes, the dark orbs menacing. He inclined his head after a second, allowing Adam’s approach.

“Hey man,” Adam sent a scathing glare back at Travis, “I’ve been informed there’s an issue going down... am I right?”

Red remained silent, his gaze a direct one.

Adam swallowed hard, “Look... all I want to do is sell my stuff and not piss you off.” the guy was sweating profusely, “I was stupid to bring the asshole but... he’s one of my distributor’s and...” he swallowed again.

“I would consider a change in distributor’s.” Red suggested deliberately.

“You know how it is,” Adam was practically whining, “you can’t get good help anymore. This guy thinks he’s irresistible to chicks... can’t keep it in his pants, you know?”

“A guy could get it chopped off that way.” Francis pointed out as he came alongside the men.

“Yeah...” Adam’s day was going from worse to dismal, “yeah, well... he’s tried to make it right with your old lady...” and at Red’s altered expression, “not that she’s old... oh, God.” he winced, “It’s just an...so anyway.” he stopped for a breath.

Red remained pointedly silent.

“Look, all I’m trying to do here,” the guy motioned dejectedly, “is trying to make a living. I came from shit... I don’t want to go back, all right.”

Red tilted his head slowly, the light slate-blue eyes giving away nothing.

“I’ll get rid of the problem. I’ll send him home if you–”

“No one leaves once the deal has begun.” Dembe vetoed the suggestion all too quietly, the dark eyes as unreadable as Red’s.

“No... no, sure. I get that.” Adam got that. “I’m just trying to keep this thing contained. So...” he spread his hands haplessly, “I’m open to suggestions here.”

Red took his time in a reply, “I’ve always found, you’re only as good as the people you surround yourself with.” he hated ending his sentences with a preposition, but grammar aside, “Men like him,” Red motioned his head, “are always a liability.”

Adam scowled, following Red’s meaning, “...He’s family.” he stated his despair.

“Worse kind of liability.” Dembe nodded sagely taking a hit off his pipe.

“It’s your decision.” Red shrugged, retaking his seat, “But when the shit hits the fan, don’t expect any leeway from me.”

Adam looked deeply concerned.

Elizabeth made her way around Adam’s tall frame, plate in hand. She sat, handing Red their drinks. Adam envied the woman. She clearly had this man’s total approval.

Liz sat her plate on Red’s upper leg, nibbling delicately on a carrot.

“Orange food makes your poop look a Wombats.” Francis pulled a face having noted her choices.

“Are we okay here, Miss?” Adam needed some sort of confirmation.

Elizabeth lifted vague eyes, “...Are you talking to me?” she motioned to her person, surprised to be singled out.

Adam hastily checked with Reddington. Just receiving a cool stare, he worked on instinct.
“I thought there was a problem,” he jerked his thumb to indicate, “I wanted to apologize personally if one of my–”

“Oh...” Liz got it, “No,” she could feel Red’s eyes, moving carefully, “no, everything is fine... really.” she assured Red more than Adam.

“Is everything fine, Mr. Reddington?” Adam needed concrete confirmation.

Red considered his options.

This was an ongoing issue he had intended to speak to Elizabeth about.

It was a Catch-22. And not the likes of what they had faced in Las Vegas and with Brad.

If a man approached, which men were known to do with a beautiful, young woman... choices had to be considered.

His instinct told him to simply beat the bastard to a pulp. It would eat at him if he did not follow his natural instinct.

It was eating at him now.

If he intervened somehow, she would think he didn’t believe her capable of handling the matter.

He sensed the woman was walking a tightrope. She didn’t want to make waves with his associates... didn’t want her presence to interfere with business as usual.

As far as Red was concerned, his associates could kiss his ass.

No one he worked with was as important as Elizabeth Keen.

He would have to inform her and in no uncertain terms... that he didn’t care what she did, if she felt the need to defend herself.

Even if some creep made her feel slightly uncomfortable, he wanted to know about it.

He wouldn’t step in hopefully until a discussion of the matter had ensued.

He leaned conspicuously, kissing behind her ear. He smiled when she reacted, giggling.

“You’re tickling me.”

He chuckled sensually, enjoying her reaction.

Adam breathed out a sigh of relief, “Those two were hard hitters,” he got things back on track hastily, directing the remark to Dembe, “not wise for the lady to try the next few, okay?”

Red crooked his chin, the feel of gentle kisses leaving him a little off-guard.

He glanced hastily finding Elizabeth snuggling ever so close. He made room for her, scooting slightly as her thigh nudged him enticingly.

“You smell so good...” the tiny nose nuzzled the hollow of his nape.

Liz felt the masculine prickle of shadowing on Red’s leathery skin.

“I love how you smell,” she closed her eyes to the erotic emotions washing over her.
Adam cleared his throat, grinning sheepishly.

Generally, Red would enjoy the hell out of such a little interlude but his senses were prickling in alarm, “Francis, did she take a hit off your–”

“No.” Francis held the pipe away covetously. “She has her own... which is just the mom and pop shit.”

Red examined Elizabeth critically.

Red’s scowl increased exponentially as he observed the woman’s behavior.

She kissed him, her arms lovingly wrapping about his neckline.

The warm lips passionately intimate in nature, made his senses tingle in another fashion entirely.

While the man returned the antics, his mind was on another subject.

The man gently put a halt to any further display, “Tell you what, baby,” he smiled down at the upturned little face, hanging on his every utterance, “why don’t we take this to a more–”

Elizabeth looked about, jerking a startled exclamation, “Oh my, God...” she gasped, frantically searching for Red’s stability, “the cops are coming!”

In the distance, far off sirens could be heard. They were so faint, Red was at a loss momentarily as to what she had actually referred.

He chuckled listlessly, “No, baby... there’s no–”

Liz’s eyes were wide with alarm, however.

“It’s fading,” Red assured, “there are no cops... I promise.” he felt a twinge of guilt for her state, “See, no sirens now.” he sighed mentally for Lizzy still seemed totally adrift, “Baby, I think it’s time to stop now, okay.”

“Oh...” she settled little by little, almost cowering into the protection of his embrace, “...okay.”

“I swear to God, Red...” even Adam was picking up on the older man’s vibes where the woman was concerned, “She didn’t get any of the laced shit. I swear on my mother’s grave. You said you wanted a few heavy hitters, so I loaded up for you and your guys here but...”

Red glanced at Dembe.

Elizabeth couldn’t seem to get close enough to Red. Her skin literally crawled when he would move even a fraction away even for a second.

She grasp his forearms, clutching tightly, nuzzling him at every possible vantage point.

“...God,” she couldn’t take in enough air and she felt so drowsy.

Not warm and fuzzy drowsy but a heavy, almost hypnotic state which left her irritated yet... subdued, “What’s wrong with me?”
She watched Red’s lips. He had the most sensual mouth in the entire world. She could feel those thick lips on her flesh... tasting, teasing...

She moaned weakly, her fingers grasping his nape, dragging his mouth hungrily to hers.

Red allowed the move only for a fraction of a second, pulling back, “What the hell is going on here?”

Elizabeth was never so openly affectionate when strangers were about.

“Y-you don’t... want me?” the thought devastated, tears threatened in the sapphire eyes.

“Fuck that...” he dismissed such a stupid statement irritably, “Look at me!”

His fingers forced her face up, his eyes examining the vacant gaze feverishly.

Elizabeth was listless now, allowing his every whim.

“Shit.” he read the signs easily. “Some fucker spiked her drink.” the bitterness and frigid iciness shocked even himself.

Those emotions were transferred to...

Travis... who had been standing apart from the other contemporary who had accompanied Adam this night... started visibly to be the sudden center of attention.

Silas’ head jerked meaningfully to the little bastard. The guard moved his bulky frame with amazing grace and agility, his mammoth hands securing a rigid stay hold on Travis’ clothing as Silas lifted the guy effortlessly aloft.

“You fucking little bitch.” Silas’ face was inches from the terrified man’s, “I’ll rip you apart with my bare hands! I told you–”

Adam was instantly there, attempting reason where none existed he realized early on, “We don’t know for sure what happened here.” he frantically sought Red’s assistance, “He’s going to kill him.... please! Do something!” Adam was afraid to intervene where Silas was concerned.

He approached a higher source.

“I’ll hold his coat.” Red gently disengaged from a rather desperately clinging Elizabeth Keen.

“Don’t go.” she whispered piteously, “I can’t stand it if... you go.”

“I’m not going anywhere, baby.” his mouth caressed hers hungrily. “Francis!” he handed her off to a capable friend.

“It’s okay, Lizzy.” Francis forgot all about his pipe and the remaining product. “He’s not going anywhere, see?” he pointed.

Liz held tightly to Francis’ hands which squeezed her smaller ones reassuringly.

Red approached Travis who by this time was one quivering mass of denial and desperation.

Silas held the guy by the scruff, his look a dangerously quiet one. He awaited Red’s decision.

“Look, I’ll do what has to be done here just...” Adam was desperate but Red wasn’t sure of the exact reason as yet, “I don’t want to know anything about it, all right?”

“For God’s sake, Ada—” Travis screeched hysterically.

“Don’t!” Adam jerked a shaky finger at the man, “You got yourself into this mess! I told you to keep it in your pants, but you just couldn’t, could you! Now,” the young man was livid, “I’m supposed to risk everything to save your sorry ass!”

Red waited it out.

“The future I’ve planned for my kids? My wife?” Adam was trembling. Red wasn’t sure it was from rage or fear. “You know, above anyone else... what I’ve had to do to get to this stage of the game and you jeopardize—”

Words were simply too difficult.

Adam turned his face away, “What you said before, Mr. Reddington...” his voice was harsh with regret and anguish, “I understand it, I understand about...liabilities.”

Red read the sincerity of the man. He straightened to his full height, tugging his vest down in back, turning his attention to Elizabeth Keen.

“...Do you also understand that—” Red turned back, his features bleak, “no one hurts what is mine without repercussions.”

“I totally understand that, Sir.” Adam knew how he would feel is someone, anyone, hurt or even disrespected his wife. “I can only apologize for bringing this into your home.

Adam had meant Travis.

“I brought it in.” Red meant... more than Travis. His gaze was tender on Lizzy, “And believe me...” his voice dropped as did his spirits, “I’m paying the price.”

He drew in a deep cleansing breath, “I want the product. The entire shipment.” he turned to something over which he had control.

“The entire...” Adam’s mouth fell agape.

“Dembe?” Red sought out his friend.

“I will handle the particulars.” Dembe lifted a casual hand.

Adam knew a polite brush off when he heard one. He sought out Travis.

“Don’t leave me here, man.” desperation had turned to anguished pleading.

Silas jerked heartily, silencing the little fucker, “One more word and it actually will be your last.”

Travis’ eyes beseeched Adam but something in Silas’ threat rang true so... he kept silent.

Adam was torn, clearly.

Red waited patiently for the guy’s decision. It didn’t matter to him one way or another.

Dembe sat an expensive looking brief case on the nearby bar opening the silver catch to reveal...
“Half now...” Red motioned, “half on delivery of the goods.”

Adam scanned the neatly stacked hundreds. Row after row after row of them.

His kids college education was in that case... a new house out of the neighborhood, a good life for the new baby on the way...

“I’ve been in this country for six years,” he ruminated quietly, his eyes never leaving the cash, “it hasn’t always been...” his voice trailed away.

The guy checked on Elizabeth who sat huddled down close to Francis Holbrook.

“My daughter is just fifteen,” Adam reminded himself, “fifteen... if anyone ever...”

Red could only guess on the man’s thoughts.

Adam held his hand out.

Red took it.

“What are you doing, Amigo?” Travis’ accent was suddenly very pronounced, his true ethnicity coming to the fore, “you cannot do this!”

Both men had been very careful not to conceal but certainly not advertise their race.

“Pay them... give them back the dinero,” Travis was beside himself, “I didn’t even do it, she’s fine. It was a joke that’s all. A fucking joke! I said I was sorry!”

Silas’ eyes hardened, his fist clamping down, knuckles white, “How’s that working out for you?”

“Wrap this up.” Red was anxious to get back to Elizabeth. “What’s it going to be? I need an answer.”

The woman sat quietly seemingly disinterested in the proceedings now.

“Compañero,” Travis was scared shitless, “por favor!”

Adam’s face set grimly, “Go take care of your woman.” he stepped, clicking the briefcase shut, hefting it aloft.

“How’s that working out for you?”

Adam hesitated only slightly before addressing Red. “I will call you?”

Red nodded, “Dembe will show you out.” he caught Silas’ eyes, instant communication passing between them.

Red stepped strategically, his body blocking Liz’s viewpoint.

Silas pulled his weapon instantly, setting it in the direct center of Travis’ forehead. “How much?” he growled threateningly, “How long?”

“Half hour... maybe twenty minutes.”

Travis winced as the steel barrel was pushed meaningfully into his skin. “One pill..” the answer was immediately forthcoming, “Half hour... maybe twenty minutes.”

Silas yanked the guy closer, his face a mask of frozen rage.
“You son-of-a-bitch!” Red seethed his fury. “I should kill you where you stand.” he moved, his manner more than intimidating.

Silas snapped, hitting out instinctively. The heavy blow sent Travis’ head cracking sickeningly against a hardwood column. The sound imminently satisfying to Red’s ear.

“Get that fucking trash away from me.” Red snarled.

Silas jerked Travis, hauling his ass down the long corridor, the guy yelling and screeching the entire way.

“If it’s a roofie, it will wear off.” Francis had been gently questioning Elizabeth. “What the hell is in a guy’s mind to fucking do that?” he murmured dispiritedly. “It’s okay, Lizzy…” he soothed, patting the woman’s back. “Silas will kill that prick for you, good and proper.”

“What prick?” Liz was floundering, her mind too slow to catch up to all that was being said, “…Is Tom here?” she looked about absently.

“No, baby,” Red stooped before her, “don’t worry about it… everything is fine.” he smiled softly his hand cupping the side of her face.

“What do these things keep happening to me?” she wailed.

Not certain exactly what was happening, she knew what she was experiencing was not normal.

“Is this what it’s like?” her voice shook.

If smoking that shit made a person feel this crappy… she pushed the pipe across the table, far away from her reach.

“Good girl.” Red leaned, placing his lips to her forehead. “Now if only I had the foresight…” he mused.

“To what, Red?” Francis sensed the man’s guilt. “There is nothing you did that caused this.” he motioned to Liz who had leaned into Red’s comforting embrace. “Where is the harm in a little smoking? Really?”

“I open up the door and shit like this just floods in.” Red shook his head, his large palms soothing, caressing Lizzy’s back and shoulders, “I thought…”

Francis waited but Red had fallen silent, “…You thought what?” it was encouraged.

“I wanted her to see my world… to accept all that I am.” Red closed his eyes for a beat, “It wasn’t enough the other way.”

Francis sat back, sighing heavily, “What guy doesn’t want acceptance. Even his dark side.”

Red wasn’t pacified.

“You can’t shield her every second of the day,” Francis reminded, “give her a little credit for God’s sake. She’s resilient, capable and a hell of a sight stronger than you think she is.”

“What if that fucker’s plan worked to his advantage?” Red growled.

“Don’t fight.” Liz asked, her palm going to each man’s chest front, “Can’t we all just get along?”
Francis chuckled away the pent-up frustration, “Yeah, Red... come on. I love you, man.”

“Aww, that’s so sweet.” Liz was touched.

“Tell him you love him too, Red.” she pleaded, “let’s all just love one another.”

“What a wonderful would this would be.” Francis commiserated, finally sensing some sort of humor in the situation.

Red threw him a stare.

“Oh, lighten up. She’s going to be fine.” Francis patted Liz’s head affectionately sorta like a favored pet. “I’ve got this covered, so go maim and kill the little prick that started all this.” he motioned, “It’ll make you feel so much better.”

Red sighed mentally, examining the woman worriedly, “I want Kaplan to look at her.”

“Then you call her at three in the morning.” Francis suggested, strongly, “She’ll tell you what I’m gonna... let her sleep it off.”

Red didn’t think he would follow that advice at all.

“Don’t call Mr. Kaplan,” Liz whispered secretively, “she doesn’t like me. She’ll be mad I smoked shit.”

“She doesn’t like anyone,” Francis stated, “don’t take it personally.”

Liz looked at Red, those big blue eyes ripping his heart asunder, “Baby, she can get this stuff out of your system so much faster.”

“Don’t tell her I smoked—”

“That shit. Sure.” Red knew that was one promise he would have to break, but it was for the greater good, surely, or maybe he could spin the tale so Kaplan didn’t have to know everything.

“Sure.” Francis echoed agreeably.

He and Red exchanged benign looks.

“Are you out of your fog?” Red wanted to know.

“Mostly.” Francis self-evaluated.

“I have to...” the blue eyes were watching every move he made. He moved carefully, “...speak to Silas.”

“Elizabeth?” Red changed tactics and manner his hands covering hers lovingly, “Can you go with Francis to our room? I’ll call Kate, then get you something on a tray. You haven’t eaten anything to speak of...”

Liz looked at Francis.

“He’ll get you comfortable and settled in, okay?” Red ducked his head to catch her wandering attention, “Okay?”

“Sure.” she said.
Red was having second thoughts, “Maybe I better stay with–”

“You don’t trust me to do a simple meet and greet?” Francis was hurt.

“Meet and gree–”

“You know what I mean.” the younger man grimaced, “I didn’t want to say babysitting in front of...” he cocked his head to Elizabeth Keen.

“I’m Red’s baby.” the woman piped up cheerfully having heard half of the sentence in truth.

Red’s heart softened, “Yes... that’s right.”

Liz snuggled up into the man, ducking her face into Red’s neck, sniffing the man to her hearts content.

“Ugh... sugar shock.” Francis moved onward, “Come on... baby.” he smirked.

Red chuckled quietly when the woman turned on Francis, frowning hard.

“Red’s baby...” she repeated firmly, smiling impishly up at him.

“You’re only Red’s baby, huh?” Francis grinned at the woman nodding seriously.

Red’s eyes softened on their own accord. He truly hadn’t expected to hear something like this from her.

He had read that when you called your woman baby, it caused instant emotional stress relief. He had to wonder if there was some truth to the statement because when he used the endearment with Lizzy, her eyes lit happily. She was more relaxed and content.

He knew when he said it... he felt at peace... yes, and happy too.

Red stared down at the woman. She was chattering away as if she had not a care in the world.

He set his chin on the crown of her head, vaguely listening to what Francis and Lizzy were discussing.

“How about lizard tongue?” Francis asked, drawing Red back into the fray. “That’s a great nickname I can call you.”

Liz scrunched up her nose, shaking her head that she didn’t like it. Red smiled at the seriousness of her expression.

“Sweetheart,” he rumbled softly, “I want you to–” he hesitated when the woman turned away from him, sighing heavily.

“I sense a problem.” he kissed the shoulder available to him.

“Now, what’s your malfunction?” Francis wanted to know.

She sought out Red’s gaze, her own definitely annoyed.

“What the hell did you do to piss her off now?” even Francis picked up on the faux pas.

“I didn’t do anything.” Red grinned at the woman but her scowl begged to differ. “Or... maybe I
Liz leaned towards Francis, waving him closer. She shared a confidence.

Red leaned forward, straining to hear what was being said. Francis sniggered his amusement.

Liz sighed heavily, appreciating Francis commiserating with her. She refused to even looks Red’s way, enjoying her sulking tremendously.

Forget the fact she still was hugging him, she wasn’t going to give him the time of day until Red said what she needed to hear.

Which, just amused the shit out of Red.

The man bit his lip, hiding his smile.

Francis continued a serious conversation with the woman.

“But you know, you are his sweetheart.” the man reminded, tongue-in-cheek.

Liz batted those large stoned eyes, nodding a little in agreement, following so far.

“You’re also his Lizzy.”  Francis’ lips quivered as the little chin jutted out obstinately.

She now ignored both of them.

“Well, now I know what I did wrong.” Red nodded his understanding.

“If we told you once...” Francis rubbed salt in the wounds, “we’ve told you a thousand times.” he cocked his head, “It’s baby... baby... baby.”

Red beamed at the little face, dropping a kiss to her cheek, “...I’m sorry, baby.” he rumbled deeply, nuzzling the soft cheek.

Liz pushed into the affection, a smile lighting her face. She turned rewarding Red with a kiss.

She stretched up on her toes, nuzzling Red’s nose with hers which drew a soft chuckle from the man.

She sure was expressive when she was lit.

Speaking of which... he had an issue to handle.

“Baby, go with Francis.” he started to transfer her into Francis’ capable hands but was waylaid when the woman puckered her lips in an over exaggerated manner, signifying he was about to commit yet another cardinal sin.

Red obligingly lowered his head, obeying the silent request for a good-bye kiss. He smiled against her lips amused and charmed by her manner.

She literally skipped towards Francis, linking her arm through his, “...I have to pee.”

Red’s mouth quirked irresistibly, “Watch her.”

Francis crossed himself in a semi-religious manner, “I’ll get her snuggled up safe and warm... as God
Red’s steps were swift and sure but to be honest he couldn’t be certain of the direction he needed to go.

He activated the Comm he had retrieved from his office.

“...Silas, on my way,” he informed his head guard, “...which would be where exactly?”

“It’s being handled,” a curt reply was immediately forthcoming, “take care of Liz.”

“I believe I asked–”

“I said...” Silas’ tone was brittle, “he is being handled... or don’t you trust me to do that now?”

Silas was in pain, he should be in bed. Red knew that. Just because the guy was up and functioning didn’t mean shit at this late date.

Red took the man’s state into consideration, “I missed it too.” he grumbled, understanding Silas’ emotional state for what it was in both men’s book... dereliction of duty, “I didn’t see the cock sucker do the deed either.”

“According to shitbag, he was only trying to do you a favor,” Silas’ tone was contempt itself, “said he was trying to cement good relations between Adam and you.”

Red stopped in his tracks.

“How far do you want me to take this?” Silas asked, “Cause I have no problem seeing it through to the endgame.”

“I know that.” Red nodded, his shoulders relaxing a tad.

The silence came, and it was semi-comfortable now.

“...I feel responsible.”

“That’s not on you.” Red stated tersely, “Did you hear that.”

“Yeah,” Silas’ tone was back to normal, “I heard that.”

Red ran a weary hand over his face.

“Not on you either... we have the douchebag who is responsible.” Silas reminded.

Red rubbed his eyes, “Put shithead on ice. I’ll decide after...” he had lost that ‘killing’ feeling.

“If that’s what you want.”

“It is for now.” Red hoped any decision he made could be a logically thought out one but you just didn’t ever know in life.

He turned about, retracing his steps.

“Make this the worst night of that son-of-a-bitches life.”
“Copy that.” Silas signed off.

Red felt better as he rounded the corner of the hallway which led to the South wing of the house.

That good feeling went away in a flash as he witnessed the scene taking place before him...

He must have been a good fifteen meters away, but he covered the distance in record time.

~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥

Elizabeth was perched on the side of the pool looking down into the crystal depths below...

The sparkling, shimmering blueness was almost hypnotic in nature.

It drew her closer... down... down....

~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥

Red hit the water at a full running gait, clothes, shoes and all... the force sent water splashing haphazardly high.

His body sliced the surface effortlessly, pushing hard into the deep end of the pool.

His strokes were powerful, bringing him closer and closer to Lizzy’s limply floating body. Reaching out, he grasped her arm pulling her into his hold. Pushing towards the surface, he lifted her upward until hands came out of nowhere, lifting her quickly out of Red’s reach.

Following her ascent, Red quickly broke the surface.

Francis was smoothing the hair from the woman’s face, “Talk to me!” His tone, while authoritative, was by no means panicked... as Red’s mind was, at that moment.

Lizzy’s cheeks billowed. Seconds later, a warm gush of water hit Francis’ face full force.

She giggled infectiously as the man swatted and peddled backwards immediately.

Liz rolled, giggling her amusement to see the man disappear over the edge and out of sight into the shimmering depths behind him in a spectacular splash.

“You little shit!” Francis broke the surface, sputtering, washing his face frantically, “You scared the fuck out of me!”

“Good!” Red barked, his own concern overriding the common sense that told him, the woman was just fine. “You can handle the situat-”

“She faked me out!” Francis tread water effortlessly, “Said she had to pee!” the young man scowled at the woman, then checked hastily down to the water he was treading as if to ascertain if the pool had been contaminated by said ‘pee’.

“Uhh...” realization dawned on Liz, “I do have to...”

Francis sighed his relief as the woman’s eyes widened, “Red! You came swimming with me!”

Red’s jaw worked tightly, “Elizabeth... are you all right?” he needed someone to take something, anything, seriously.
“I’m ‘A’ okay!” she snapped off a smart salute before crawling to the water’s edge. “Let’s go again!”

“Get back here, dammit!” Red rushed after the woman, just missing her by inches as she took the plunge once more. “Dammit!” the man hissed as he went in after her.

Kicking away from the wall, Liz evaded capture. Laughing with abandon, she swirled about, relaxing in the warmth.

Red pushed towards her, capturing the slowly descending woman. Pulling her about face, he frowned his displeasure over her antics.

“Swimming makes you grumpy.” the woman pulled a ‘grumpy’ face.

Francis’ powerful strokes had landed him ‘on deck’ long before Red who tarried with the slower moving woman.

“Arms up!” Francis called down as Liz reached the edge of the pool.

She lifted her arms obediently which Francis latched onto, lifting her effortlessly.

“Whee...” she was deposited soundly next to a chuckling individual.

Red fluidly hoisted himself, shedding clothes as he neared.

“Your shoes are still down there.” Francis had noted the brown leather laying at the bottom of the pool.

“My shoes are the least of my concern,” he hastily lay his ear upon the woman’s wet top, “Breathe in,” he stated brusquely unaware he used his ‘command’ tone.

Elizabeth pushed back, turning pointedly aside, her arms crossing willfully over the area in question.

Her chin lifted defiantly.

Red was given pause for thought, seeking out a reluctantly amused Francis Holbrook.

Red’s temper rose, “Cough, Lizzy!”

“Do I turn my head?” she bitched right back, not losing the aforementioned attitude.

Francis’ head dropped down and Red knew instinctively, the guy was enjoying the hell out of his dilemma.

“I’m just trying to ascertain if you have any water in your lungs.” he gritted.

“Ascertain... this.” she flipped him off.

Francis stifled a chuckle... unsuccessfully.

“You think this is funny?” Red took his worry and anger out on a safe subject.

“Sure.” Francis shrugged amiably. But then the man relented, “Hey, Lizzy...”

“What?” she replied briskly.
“Are those clothes wet?”

She glanced down, “Oh my God...” she scrunched up her nose her fingers picking at the saturated garment, “I’m all wet.”

“Accident.” Francis replied airily, “You know what would probably be wise?”

Elizabeth was all ears, “What?”

“For you to get into some dry clothes.”

“You are absolutely right!” she started off post-haste.

“Hey...”  Francis stopped her in her tracks, “Red is all wet too,” he smiled benignly at a put out Red Reddington, “And I mean that kindly,” he returned his interest to a patiently waiting woman, “can he tag along and dry off too?”

“Oh, sure.” Liz smiled warmly at the older man, “this has been one strange night... hasn’t it?” she questioned.

“I second that emotion,” Francis nodded contentedly, “You kids run along now...” he smiled that shit-eating grin Red was slowly beginning to hate. “I’ll check in with you later.”

Upon seeing Red’s look...

“Or maybe not?”

“You stay here tonight you little shit.” Red grated as he passed, “You’re as high as a kite. I don’t want you running a perfectly good Aston Martin into a tree and wrecking the car.

Francis reached for a towel, “Wasn’t gonna drive my car... gonna borrow one of yours.”

“Like hell.” Red called back over his shoulder.

It was his way of saying a reluctant, thank you, but he was in no mood to be actually forced to say the fucking words.

“I love you too, man!” Francis hit his chest twice, sending out his arm, his fingers poised in the universal sign of ‘peace’.

Red returned a ‘sign’ all his own all of which Lizzy missed so intent upon holding her clothes away from her body was she.

Francis chuckled for Red’s mood.

The night was looking up.

The silence in the bedroom was difficult for Red.

He followed Liz into the bathroom giving her a little space while she discarded her wet clothes.

He divested himself of his own, tying a robe about his waist as he carried the sopping garments to the sink.
The woman emerged, a towel securely tucked into the cleft of her breasts.

She smiled warmly at him.

He was a little taken aback, having expected her previous mood to have prevailed.

“...I love you.” she scrunched her nose adorably, forcing a reluctant chuckle from the man.

“...You do, huh?” he leaned back on the sink, folding his arms over his chest.

“Yeah...” she approached slowly, a mischievous glint in her eyes, “do you know why?”

He mellowed in spite of himself, “... Tell me.” he coaxed, ever so glad when the woman eased her way into his ready embrace.

“Well...” she mused overly long, and he knew she was deliberately taking her time, deliberately pushing her body into his straining one, “you’re a pretty good kisser... as kissing goes.”

“Am I?” he lowered his head, holding her eyes hypnotically, enjoying the slight catch of her breath as the luminous lids shut dreamily just a second before his lips made contact with hers.

She moaned into his parted mouth causing his organ to expand exponentially.

His arms tightened systematically as he deepened the kiss.

The woman’s tongue played a sensual dance with his...

When she finally pulled back, his breath was more shallow than it should have been at such an early stage but...

She had been so giving, so open...

“You’re a very nice man. I like... nice men.”

“I can be.” he knew he wanted to be... for this woman. “If anyone had told me ten minutes ago that we would be...” his eyes dropped to where their bodies melded together, “as we are, I would have called them a liar, to their face.”

“What?” she was puzzled.

“No reason,” he moved on hastily, loathe to remind her of the ‘reason’, “you were extolling my virtues... do I only possess two?”

She pressed those luscious breasts into his chest, her arms lifting about his neckline.

“Let me count the ways...” an old poem flitted across her mind but the rest of the stanza vanished like vapor in a mist.

“That we’ve made love?” he trailed soft, breathy little kisses down her neckline, his voice husky with growing desire.

“No, no....” she scowled, leaning her neck gracefully for more of his pleasurable attention, “that you’re a nice man.”

“I prefer the other topic.” he bit gently on the hollow between her shoulder and nape, eliciting a moan of delight.
“I fucking love those sounds you make,” he tried very hard to assure she made them, “makes my dick hard.”

Her fingers traveled over his sides, inching between their bodies.

He sensed their destination, allowing the move.

“Don’t you believe me?” he smiled, the gesture disappearing in the next second as that little exploration trek found its mark.

He grunted savagely because a thought suddenly occurred, “...We can’t do this.”

Her fingers stopped their excruciatingly gentle trace down the side of his engorged cock.

She sought him out, “We can’t?”

“I,” he amended determinedly, “can’t.”

“You feel like you can.” Liz was confused.

“No, baby,” he had exhausted his patience but only with the world in general, “I can... I shouldn’t, not when you are... like you are.”

She glanced down her body mystified, “Should I put on a dress or someth–”

“No!” he answered too quickly, too loudly, catching himself in the next instance because all he really wanted to do was flick that towel loose, lift her leg and slide inside that hot, tight pussy.

That’s what he wanted to do...

“No, what you’re... wearing...” for lack of a better term, “the towel is charming.”

She smiled charmingly, “Aren’t you sweet.”

“Another virtue,” he sighed mentally, “Hard to live up to all those moralistic rituals at times.”

“Doesn’t sound like you.” she concurred, her hands went to the ties of his robe.

Red instantly covered those busy little fingers with his, “You know what we should do?” he took a page from Francis’ book... divert, misdirect...

“Yes.” she assured him, her fingers wiggling about under his, her attention going back to her pastime.

Red shut his eyes, “Baby, you’re killing me here.”

“Oh?” she was instantly concerned, her hands stopping their activities, “Is your head hurting?”

“More than you know.” he shifted his cock to a comfortable position, his hand easing over the poignantly aching head, “…No, sweetheart, what I mean–” he halted his train of thought for her countenance had altered visibly, “What?”

She lifted pouting eyes, her beautiful mouth trembling.

“What?” Red was totally at a loss, “Really?”

“You called her... that.” a dark scowl creased her forehead, “I’m not... that.” she lifted a scolding
She demanded he remember.

He remembered, “I apologize.” he took for granted Lizzy was referring to Madeline Pratt, “but honestly, I never ever referred to her by that endearment. I swear.”

“You didn’t?” hopeful eyes sought his.

“I did not.”

She snuggled closer, her arms embracing his waist, “I’m cold... you have to keep me warm,” she sighed blissfully, “it’s your job.”

He smiled, planting a kiss on the top of her head, “It most certainly is. I would like nothing better but you remember, Mr. Kaplan is coming soon.” he had found his salvation, “Shouldn’t we get ready for her visit?”

“She doesn’t like me.” she warned.

“I think you’re mistaken.” he wasn’t really sure of his facts on this one. “It just takes a lot of time for her to warm to anyone. Look at me.” he gestured, “Look how she treats me.”

“She loves you.” Liz dismissed with a sigh, “All women love you.”

“She tolerates me.” he passed over the latter remark entirely. “She cares for me and I, her, of course. Is that okay?”

“Oh! Yes, Red,” her eyes lifted, “I care for her too. I do!”

Red smiled, “You should get into your pajamas.”

He wasn’t sure how much longer he could keep pushing her away otherwise because he knew every inch of that delectable body hidden by that towel...

He wanted to touch it, taste it... revel in its glory.

“I don’t like clothes.” she grimaced.

“But Mr. Kaplan does.”

Liz turned, making a bee-line for the closet. Red sank back on the sink basin, drained emotionally and physically.

What have you been smoking?” Kaplan’s gruff accusation caused Elizabeth to gasp her dismay.

Big blue eyes turned accusingly to...

“I didn’t say a word!” Red held up pacifying hands, “I swear.”

“I’m just so damned intuitive.” Kaplan snapped, “No one had to tell me anything.” the woman tsked, “I’ve got eyes.”

Liz fell sullenly silent... for all of two seconds, unreasonably depressed suddenly.
“I told you she hates me.” she shared with Red, whispering the statement, her voice quivering slightly.

Kaplan heard, of course, her hands halting their busy work for a brief interval.

She sought Reddington’s eyes, her own resigned.

“I’m sorry, Mr. Kaplan,” Liz wanted the air cleared, “it wasn’t my fault... it was somebody else’s fault.”

Kaplan drew in a breath, opening the IV line, “Drink the water.” she motioned, “you are severely dehydrated... again.”

Liz snatched the bottle indicated, drinking hastily.

She emptied another when the older woman handed it over.

“The medication will run its course.” Kaplan couldn’t help that, “The line will lessen the effect at least.”

She trained a critical eye on the pouting brunette under her care. “Did you... take care of the man who put her in such a state?”

“No yet.” Red didn’t want to discuss that issue. “He’s with Silas.”

That seemed to satisfy Kaplan’s righteous indignation.

“Are you all right?” she approached Elizabeth slowly, her manner without its usual edge.

Liz lifted trusting eyes, “I’m fine, Mr. Kaplan.” she smiled brightly, “Really, thank you for asking.”

Kaplan lifted a brow but remained silent.

Red was shocked when the stern-faced woman reached out, gently brushing Liz’s bangs out of her eyes.

“You must be more aware of your surroundings.” Kate tried a smile but it only half succeeded. “People are rarely what they appear to be.”

Liz nodded eagerly and Red noted, she had leaned into Kate’s gentle touch.

The woman turned aside brusquely, studying Red’s pinpoint pupils critically, “Do you need anything?”

“Have I ever?” he countered.

Kate huffed a reply, gathering her supplies.

“You interrupted my dinner, I’m going to the kitchen.” Red was summarily informed.

“You were having dinner at three in the morn—” he shut up after the caustic glare he received, “Can I send for carry-out?” he offered to buy on his dime.

“I’m going to inform Nora that you said that.” Kaplan arched her brow.

Liz cast worried eyes Red’s way. The man sighed, patting her hand consolingly, “She was joking.”
Kaplan remained silent on the matter though her brow moved an inch higher.

“I’ll stay here tonight,” she left the rest unsaid. In case of complications.

Red felt infinitely better, “Thank you, Kate... as usual.”

“Tell Dembe to bring me a bottle of that precious wine he so covets...”

Red nodded, “Anything for you, Kate. You know that.”

Kaplan glanced at the woman sitting so primly and quietly in bed.

“Goodnight, Elizabeth,” she stated quietly, “Sleep well.”

Red’s heart warmed. He watched the small woman exit with no further word of farewell for the likes of him.

“Why don’t you lay back, try to get some rest.” he smiled down at the woman who looked so small in the gigantic bed.

Liz sighed, obeying, closing her eyes as she sank back onto the welcoming pillow. She stiffened, fingers clutching the covers frantically.

“The bed is spinning!”

Red was instantly beside her, “It'll pass, baby,” he soothed, holding her tightly in his embrace. “It’s all right.” he whispered his encouragement, “I’m here.”

Liz held onto him, clutching tightly, the spinning roller coaster ride she was on speeding faster and faster along shaky tracks.

She felt nauseous, her breathing deeper and faster, panic rising.

Red’s stability kept her focused, centered.

“I promise, Lizzy,” he knew what she was experiencing. “Just hang on, it will pass.”

He closed his eyes, holding her ever so close, “This is why...” he grated his own misery, “I didn’t want you to feel this!”

“I’m s-scared.” she tried to burrow into his being.

“Yeah...” his voice was grim, “I know... I know.” he stressed. He leaned into her, adding a measure of his weight. “It’s getting out of your system... don’t fight it, sweetheart.”

He glanced rapidly to the steady drip of the IV line, “I could kick the shit out of myself for–”

“Don’t,” she clung to him for dear life, “I’m fine.” she soothed his torturous mind, “I’m good, Red... just...” she breathed out, “hold me.”

His powerful arms obeyed, taking the breath from her body. He eased slowly as he felt her relaxing by degrees.

“Don’t let go.” she whimpered, her full lips searching aimlessly for the sweetness of his mouth.
“Never.” the man vowed, breathing directly into the warm hollow, the tip of his tongue flicking sensually to her waiting one.

The kiss melded into prurient possession within seconds, Red holding himself in reserve for her state.

His solid frame stabilized Liz enough that the panic started to ebb.

The warmth of his mouth working erotically on her lips enthralled and delighted her overloaded senses.

He could feel the heat of her center through the lightweight fabric of the sleepwear she had donned.

She had looked utterly ravishing when she had exited the closet earlier.

He had expected her to come out in one of his shirts and some panties...

He did not expect the little thigh length black chemise and matching panties she was wearing.

The triangle cups sat snug against her breasts, a tiny red satin bow sitting front and center. The top tapered off into flowing pleats of semi-translucent fabric that swished around her thighs as she walked towards him.

He had stood, rooted to the spot as the vision came nearer to him. His mouth watering. He had stared at the negligee for countless moments before getting his wits back. He grabbed her satin robe, hiding the teasing sight from his view.

She was his very own gift that he wanted to unwrap. He wanted to uncover those pert nipples... ease that tiny strip of cloth over the ample swell of that incredible backside...

He shifted uncomfortably, another pang of longing shooting through his ball sack, traveling the length of his cock.

His defenses were low tonight. That shit was messing with his head too... and his libido.

God, was it affecting that.

He had to get some space because if he didn’t he’d wind up taking advantage of her vulnerable state which made him just as fucking wrong as that cocksucker Travis.

She was quiet now, the IV doing its job finally. The tremors had stopped. Her body was calming down.

He wished the same could be said for his.

His senses were heightened by the drugs he took. The mellow buzz had been replaced by something more... urgent.

He hated to disturb her but something had to give. If he stayed under the influence of that rather lethal body tonight, he could not be responsible for his actions.

“Baby,” he tried to keep the desperation out of his voice, “my head is killing me.”

Well, that much was true.

“Would it be all right if I took a quick shower?”
Liz stirred from her dreamlike state. She had been drifting in a very pleasant place, “Are... are you okay?”

“I’ll just be a few feet away and I’ll make it quick.” Or as quickly as he could masturbate the problem away... “I hate to bail on you but... I’m in agony.”

“Poor baby.” she tried to rise.

“No... stay.” he tucked the covers about her chin. “You rest... you need to rest.”

“I want to shower with you.” she stated sleepily.

“No, you don’t want to do that.” he managed through clenched teeth, “Kaplan wants you to finish your IV and get some rest, remember?”

“You... you won’t be long?”

“I won’t go if you–”

“No...” she smiled sleepily up at him for he had moved out of the bed a few moments back, “I’m much better now. Just... come back quickly. I can’t sleep without you.”

Red didn’t believe that. She was already out of it.

He smiled finally, “Keep it that way.”

He kissed her mouth gently, heading for the shower in the next instance.

Keeping the water stream low in case she had a nightmare or something, Red’s head cleared once under the hot, pulsing spray.

He simply stood, keeping his thoughts on neutral subjects.

It was going to be a long night...

A part of him dreaded going back out there... facing his weakness for the woman.

Another part reveled in it.

So he stood quietly allowing the water to wash away some of the dirt of the night, some of the guilt...

His selfishness had almost cost Lizzy dearly tonight.

Did he need her acceptance so desperately?

He had some reevaluating to do. Some self-examination surely.

Finally, stepping out of his self-imposed exile, he reached for a towel.

Drying himself absently, having tucked a smaller towel about his waist, he checked on Lizzy.

She slept peacefully, one hand curled beneath her cheek.

A sweet pang shot through his heart. It was a moment which moved him.

Sometimes he loved Lizzy so much, it hurt.
In the best way possible.

The man closed his eyes, wearily crossing the room, moving closer.

He checked her IV then settled in the chaise lounge, close to the window. He lay his head back, staring out at a starry sky.

He found the constellation, Cassiopeia. The Queen on her throne.

_Ah, Cassiopeia, more beautiful than the Nereid... hell hath no fury like a Sea Nymph scorned._ Red mused.

It was the last conscience thought of the night.

June 4

To say Red Reddington had an interesting life would be a gross understatement. The man ruminated on the many twists and turns of said life tonight. He often found himself in a pensive state. It was as if an enormous decision loomed on the horizon. One he dreaded to make. It was a reprieve of sorts... to allow his mind to rest tonight. The drugs pushed the troubling doubt and recriminations back for a brief spell. But always, his mind would clear and all too soon, the cycle would begin again. There was so much guilt for allowing Elizabeth Keen into his sphere. So much joy... she brought so much to his life but he wondered, what did he bring to hers? In the quiet of this room, he could not hide from the questions which plagued him. To an outsider, Red appeared a rather easy-going guy. One might even say, frivolous, devil-may-care. He took great pains to present such an image. No one ever took such a man seriously or considered him a threat... until it was much too late. But those who knew Red well, realized how complicated, how dangerous he could be when he set his mind to it. Life taught hard lessons. Red learned well and adjusted each and every time. He glanced at the slight form in the bed beside him. Elizabeth slept peacefully all curled up like a kitten in a basket. The chaise was comfortable enough, but he longed to cross those few steps...a hunger burned inside him. A hunger for the taste of Elizabeth’s favors. Why he didn’t just get up and go over there? He had no answers this night. None that satisfied at least.
It bothered him.

Why he allowed this slip of a woman into his heart was a genuine mystery.

He had experienced many more sophisticated, worldly women in his life. Lovely women really.

Red loved all women. God put this creation before man to be worshiped and adored, didn’t He?

But Elizabeth was different. Had been from the beginning. When had the protective nurturing side of the man turned to some stronger emotions?

He knew exactly when. He remembered the night like it was yesterday.

Red’s eyes traveled the well-rounded hips. The sweet dip of Lizzy’s waist.

He fought the emotions for months.

He remembered that as well.

Was he so weak? That one small creature could bring him to his knees?

He didn’t mind that position. On his knees before the woman... gave him better access to... wondrous things.

Tonight had shaken him.

The ‘could haves’... ‘should haves’... ‘what ifs’...

Another weakness emerged. The need to have the woman accept him fully, completely.

Hell, most days he couldn’t accept himself. What he had become.

He never used to think about such things. What he did, what he did not do that he should... water under the bridge.

So what...

Life had kicked the shit out of him. He learned how to stand and kick back... so what?

He was trying to be a better man for Lizzy. Too little, too late, he supposed.

Would God give him something so precious a second time only to take it away in some capricious whim?

Did God even give Red Reddington a second thought these days?

He didn’t think so, and that was scaring the shit out of him.

If God didn’t give a shit, what was to protect Lizzy from all the evil forces out there?

He had purposely steered the woman into the den of iniquity he called his domain this night.

He tried to protect her from such things especially if he was involved.

How did God like that?

Red wasn’t religious, but he was a devoutly spiritual being, deny it though he may to any and all onlookers.

In his heart, he knew there was a Higher Power one answered to when the time came.

He hoped that Higher Power was a patient one. Red’s list of cardinal sins would fill a phone book.

The man gave up his musings for the night, his soul and mind depleted.

He stepped to the bed, carefully removing the IV before making a spot beside the woman, even more careful not to disturb her.

Red fell into a fitful sleep.

He refused to allow the strong sexual urges their lead this night, stubbornly denying his need to sate them in Elizabeth’s warm, succulent body.

At least that was one thing he had jurisdiction over, one thing he could control.

Liz flipped over, urgently pulling at her panties. Her fingers fumbled clumsily, the damned things catching at every possible venue to her dismay.

“Leave them.” he had no time for formalities, his body on fire.

Red tugged her, positioning her legs astride his hips as she drew up on her knees.

“Hurry...” Liz pleaded, her cheeks still flushed.

Hooking the filmy fabric with nimble fingers, he moved them aside, lining himself up with her drenched core.

Red pushed at her hip, choking on the air as her hot little hole engulfed his cock head easily. Settling her hands on his chest, she sat back, taking the full erection in one deep plunge.

“God...” Red moaned sharply, curling his fingers tightly into her hips. His body more than grateful for the gift bestowed, “You have no idea how much I needed this, Lizzy.” he managed to croak out his ardent entreaties.

He sent up a silent prayer on-high, “I ached so badly... denying myself this sweet addiction.”

She panted, already deeply involved with the movement, finding her rhythm within moments, “I told you earlier,” she stated tightly, “there was no need to ...wait.” she moaned urgently as the man pushed strongly up against her downstroke.

He needed better leverage, physically bringing her to a sitting position.

He suckled her through the thin gauze of her top, drawing her tiny nipples into sharp peaks within seconds. Nipping the buds, he snarled through his teeth as her pussy clenched snugly around him.

Glancing down, Liz gasped sharply at the sight of her body sliding along the man’s rigid shaft. The heavy girth pushed at her walls, disappearing from sight.

Red sighed shakily as the woman tightened her knees about his thighs. She rocked harder against the stiff rod between her legs.

Clasping his head to her breast, Liz drove the heavy weight of him deep inside her core. Tilting her bottom, she rut her clit against the hard flesh, drawing a rumbling growl of approval from her lover.

“...Yes,” he hissed, watching the soft fluff of her mound impact against his, “find your pleasure.”

Because he knew, in finding her pleasure, he would find his.

Red was living the dream which had awakened him earlier.

The man had been deep within the luscious depths of an erotic world his mind had created.

To wake... to find his Lizzy all hot and ready for his attention, was something out of the best kind of wet dream.

Recapturing her breast, Red’s mouth drew against the wet flesh, suckling her in time with her frenetic and unrelenting rhythm which only increased with the suction of his heated lips.

Grappling with his hand, Liz wordlessly placed it against the cheek of her ass, hoping he received her silent message.
Tightening his fingers around the full globe, Red rocked her fervently along his throbbing shaft. Working his fingers under her sheer panties, his cock throbbed as his fingers felt her labia part as the hard girth vanished inside her warmth.

The reality of the warm, smooth flesh beneath his fingertips aroused and tantalized his already heightened state.

He deliberately slid between the crevice of her plump cheeks, increasing the pressure, teasing the sensitive skin behind where they were connected. She clenched hard about him in response, drawing a deep groan from his chest.

He smiled around the pink nub in his mouth when the woman snarled her pleasure, riding his cock much more determinedly than she had been.

He was doing something right.

Running his hand over her silky thigh, he clutched the soft muscle in his hand yanking her closer, nudging the tight passage intimately with his cock.

Squirming closer, she keened softly when the full sack pushed against the sensitive skin of her bottom. Dropping her gaze once more, she took in the visual of the union, her mouth falling agape. The emotions of the moment rather overwhelming a thing to deal with.

Everything she was experiencing seemed magnified to unbelievable proportions.

How Red’s cock felt was indescribable.

He always felt amazing, but tonight the tip was engorged and rock solid, spreading her wide open.

The sensation of the extra skin on his shaft dragging against her labia and clit sent jolts of incredible pleasure throughout her entire body.

Sharp tingles flowed from her head down to her toes, leaving her primed and coiled tight for the release she knew he could give her.

Liz felt on the edge of orgasm from the moment he entered her body. And the intensity kept rising with each deep plunge of his shaft.

Even the soft hair of his groin brushing against her clit left her shaking and trembling inside. Thick cream rushed from her opening in copious amounts in response to the overpowering stimulation.

Red tightened his hold on the small bottom aiding the woman in her goal, something primal... possessive, in his touch. Lizzy unfurled warmly with each passing moment spent under his influence.

He had never seen her so impassioned. So relentless. So focused.

She had been an incredibly pleasurable lover from the start. Opening herself to his lust each time he bedded her, but tonight, she was a force to be reckoned with... and he was very much enjoying the challenge such a desirable partner presented.

Regardless of the fact his ego said he was the catalyst for such an erotic display, the man was positive this randy escapade was due to the last of the drugs in her system dissipating.

It didn’t matter.

He had truly never seen anything so captivating as Lizzy letting go, allowing her baser needs to dictate her behavior. She was breathtakingly beautiful... wild and free.

He leaned, his mouth capturing her lips. He nipped the swollen flesh tenderly. “You’re so enchanting...”

Her little brow furled, too concentrated to focus on a mere man for the time being. Her moans turned desperate as she strove for the release she needed.

He cooed sympathetically, rubbing his thumb against her lust laden sex, coaxing her closer to relief. “There...” he soothed, pressing harder against the fleshy nub, “is that what you need.”

Over time, he had learned to read her face and body’s reaction to fulfill any needs she had quickly.

He chuckled as she bit into his neck and rut that little pussy needily against his hand. She presented her breast to him, silently demanding he suckle.

Obeying, his warm mouth pulled at the pink flesh, eliciting yet another soft moan of delight. He worked hard for those sounds, after all. Red groaned his own pleasure when her core clamped hard about his body which stiffened in gratitude.

“...I’m...yes...” she moaned breathlessly as the man tugged gently on her panties, sending a pleasant jolt through her clit, “oh, shi...” she tensed sharply before cresting a high peak of rapturous bliss.

It seemed to come out of nowhere with a force that rocked her world. She had been working toward coming but when the crescendo hit, it felt like a bolt out of the blue.

The man had pushed her through an endless portal filled with vivid, brilliant colors, sharply swirling into a startling white light.

Liz cried out involuntarily, tiny pricks of electricity traversing her body.

Her tunnel quivered violently, pulling at Red’s shaft in violent waves of intense pleasure.

A harsh, guttural sound, deep in the man’s throat rushed freely from his parted mouth. His head fell against the soft padding of her breasts, the scent stimulating him even more so.

Her passionate embrace enfolded his cock, demanding he relent to the summit to which Elizabeth had exquisitely taken him.

Wrapping his hands about her waist, he lifted the woman from his stiff erection, hissing when the hot flesh met unrelenting cold air.

“Shh, baby...” he shushed her mewling protest as he lay the woman flat against the soft mattress, “you have no idea how much I want to come...” he rasp roughly.

Rolling to his knees, he parted her quivering thighs, kneeling in the open space. His cock strained towards the soaked slit, his crown throbbing painfully. The creamy little hole beckoned him.

Liz dropped her gaze, her hand reaching for the man. Her breaths came in shallow bursts, the sight of his engorged flesh shining with her wetness excited her. She opened her legs inviting him in.

Red panted harshly, pushing the boxers further down his stocky thighs. His cock bobbed heavily with the frantic movement.

Leaning into her open space, Red snarled deep in his throat, lifting the heavy flesh, his large hand encompassing the stiffness. He studiously stroked her clit, the weeping center mesmerizing his attention. The dark red crown pushed at the fluttering opening.

Liz lifted her eyes, watching Red’s face as he submerged himself in her body. The relief shown made her tummy flip with anticipation.

Red’s head fell back, a low groan rumbling in his chest. His cooled cock rejoiced as her heat engulfed him once more. The tight sheath grabbed at him, pulling him deeper into the delectable little body.

Expertly rolling his hips, he pushed against the tiny obstruction barring his path, demanding entrance.

“Sweet little pussy...” he breathed.

His eyes darkened, dilating as she lifted her bottom higher, wiggling against him in enticement.

Quickly adjusting his stance, he rocked against the offering. Nuzzling her pubic bone suggestively, the soft hair massaged the sensitive skin intimately until her thighs trembled against his side.

Withdrawning slowly, Red heard a whispered breath pass her lips upon his exit. The soft fuzz of her folds, dragged along his shaft. His hips shoved indulgently as he sank back into her hidden depths. The tight lips of her slit collapsed around his girth.

Her tunnel closed about his shaft in a wave, the tight cushion massaging his erection. His toes curled into themselves as the hot walls collapsed around him, covering every inch of the hard flesh in liquid velvet.

He had often wondered before what it would feel like...look like... to slide his cock inside Elizabeth... and now he knew.

Red had known for a while now. Seeing the image over and over, again and again...had not waned in the least.

The slit of his penis trickled with thick warmth and hardened, his sack pulling up against his groin. His heart raced, his mouth parched. The man’s physical love for her... soared to new heights.

Every time truly felt like the first time.

A piteous moan escaped Elizabeth. Her small hands clutched Red’s broad chest, capturing his attention, drawing him back to the present.

“I’ll give you...” his roughened voice washed over her, “and your greedy little pussy what you want.”

Leaning into his arms, Red pumped her slick depths in long languid strokes, his face a mask of concentrated effort.

Liz rode the storm, grasping his forearms, the sinewy muscles contracting, flexing under her fingertips.

Panting with excitement, Liz traced the bulging lines, captivated by the sight of the strong arms tightening with each movement.

His pectoral muscles hardened under her touch. She curled her fingers into the fine hairs covering the area.
She could feel his heartbeat, the rise and fall of his chest, the warm skin.

Liz nuzzled the tiny nub of his nipples with her nose, the tip of her tongue darting out to make contact, teasing the coral flesh.

The man hissed sharply through his teeth, enjoying the excruciatingly satisfying caress.

Forcing her eyes open, she took in the sight of his body moving suggestively over hers. The beads of sweat dampening his chest... the inviting hollow of his throat. The shadow of his hips brushing repeatedly along her thighs.

She felt empowered... bold... so very alive. Everything around her was in vivid technicolor.

The sound of their lovemaking titillated her. Red was usually a very vocal lover. The fact he was uniquely less verbal tonight, expressed how intensely engaged he was in their lovemaking.

As the man’s deep breaths grew ragged, Liz experienced a delightful tightening in her tummy and clit. His low grumbling moans of pleasure grew closer and more punctuated as they moved in their sensual dance.

The raspy catch of his calloused hands brushing against her sheer negligee, the rustle of the sheets... the slide of his erection gliding effortlessly into her body sounded inordinately loud in the silence of the room.

“...Ray.” she breathed her awe of his abilities. Clasping his arm, her hand rested over his heart as she grasped for stability. Her senses were inundated by sensation.

If what he felt was heightened to this extreme, Lizzy had to be overwhelmed by the sights, sounds and intensity of their bodies connection.

The white mounds of her breasts swayed erotically against the jet black negligee. The billowing fabric brushed against his stomach as he thrust his cock against her.

Lizzy’s dark, bed tumbled hair stuck to her flushed face and neck. Her dark blue eyes slit seductively, the long lashes fluttering like delicate butterfly wings against her rosy cheeks.

Her kiss-swollen lips parted, releasing a plethora of breathy moans that delighted him.

Red dreamed of hearing the desperate sounds of sexual pleasure escape her lips.

“I know, baby...” he growled. He could well sympathize with those precious little mew of unrequited passion.

She cried out, arching her bottom, which allowed his cock to push in further.

The man’s large crown slid against her cervix, gliding wetly along the seeping womb.

Red’s jaw clenched as her body accepted him to the hilt, the sensation robbing him of coherent thought.

Curling his fingers into the strap on her shoulder, he pulled, exposing more of her creamy mound to his gaze... and mouth. Craning his head, he flicked his tongue rapidly over the tight peak, coaxing the tiny nub higher and tighter.
Wrapping his tongue about the tip, he moaned against the wet fabric, sending shivers down between her legs.

Suckling her in rhythm with his ever deepening force, he encouraged a response. Her tunnel rolled about him, pulling at him in insatiable waves.

The subtle sound of their bodies connecting and her sharp, panted cries were driving Red out of his fucking mind.

Liz’s brow furrowed anxiously, the emotions the man evoked inside her, boiling to a fevered pitch in her center. She quivered uncontrollably, her face lighting with ecstasy.

That pouty mouth gasped, falling agape, for the intensity flooding her body. She tried to assimilate the turbulent reaction she was experiencing.

Grasping the man’s forearms, the only port of security afforded her, the woman squeezed tightly, arching into the exquisite pang. Her entire body shuddered with unrestrained passion.

Red reveled in her release, closing his eyes to his own particular brand of exquisite deliverance.

“God...” he whispered hoarsely feeling her jerk under him.

A delectable rush of warmth encompassed his erection, those succulent walls fluttering helplessly around his shaft.

“I needed this so much...” he lifted his head, enjoying the lovely pass of emotions over her expressive face.

He loved watching her climax.

“Fuck...Lizzy,” he panted, having waited as long as humanly possible, “baby, I’m gonna come.”

“Y-Yes...” she implored avidly, “come inside me.”

The raw request unleashed his primal instincts.

Clutching the sheet tightly in his hand, his erratic thrusts shortened. He rode the rising tide of stimulating sensation gratefully. The tight pull of her center manipulated his cock as he yielded to the rapture encompassing his senses.

His heavy sack convulsed with a potent, searing heat. The pent-up cream burst from the crown of his shaft in copious amount, flowing freely into her warm body.

Driving his cock deeper, he hissed heatedly as he allowed the sensations he was experiencing free reign. Red stayed deeply encased in her rising heat, pushing urgently at her womb.

His vision blackened when Lizzy whimpered as a deluge of their combined release once again engulfed his pulsing cock head.

Panting against her breast, his eyes finally opened as he drifted down from the very high pinnacle he had attained. His eyes took in the damp fabric of the sexy lingerie.

The man smiled wistfully, forcing himself to move. He struggled to his forearm.

Bunching the filmy material in his hand, Red lifted the soft material off over her head.
Lizzy grumbled for being disturbed which amused the man.

He dropped her top beside the bed. It drifted unnoticed to the floor.

He situated himself, laying against the soft mound of her breast. Red smiled languidly watching the peak tighten as his warm breath brushed against it.

“I love you...” he whispered, welcoming the lethargic surge inundating his body.

Wrapping herself about his bulky frame, Liz squeezed him tiredly, gently kissing his neckline. “I love you...”

Once again managing an ounce of motor control, Red pushed up on his arm, bracing himself. They both groaned their dismay as his spent shaft slid free of her body.

He watched earnestly as his cock head emerged from the steamy hole, allowing a rush of their love to follow his retreat.

His heart sped up a tad, very much enjoying the visual of their coupling.

Shoving at his boxers, he kicked them free, turning his attention back to his lover.

Curling his fingers in the thin strings at her hip, he tugged the sodden panties down over her legs, carelessly tossing them somewhere off to the side.

Laying back, he gathered her close, feeling her tremble with the aftershocks of her powerful climax. He wasn’t fairing much better, truth told.

Lizzy settled her head unto his chest, her heavy breaths stirring the fine hair. She exhaled shakily moments later, having finally regained her breath.

Red brushed his hand through her thick hair, sighing his contentment.

“Next time...” she swallowed, a matter coming to mind, “just fuck me...okay.”

“Do you plan to get drunk or high often?” Red questioned, holding his amusement for the casually stated proclamation.

“I plan to relax and enjoy myself,” she corrected, “now that I can. But no, it will not become a habit.” she wrinkled her nose at the thought presented, “What I did tonight will definitely not become a habit.”

Red enjoyed that she felt comfortable enough to let go of her inhibitions, or at the very least, trust in him to make sure nothing happened to her when she was vulnerable.

But to make love to her when she was in an altered state... did not set well with him no matter what she claimed.

“We did...” she reminded, another thought resurfacing, “in Las Vegas.”

“You were tipsy in Las Vegas.” he countered. “You were wasted tonight.”

“I'll always want to be intimate with you...” she had hesitated to admit such a weakness, “besides, I knew what I wanted.” she stated boldly to hide the self-doubt.

He was undecided in what course of action he should make regarding that. She was more sober now, more aware of herself.

“You were still under the influence of the drugs, Lizzy.”

If he should do as she suggested, and she wasn’t of a mindset to be intimate with him... it would be a violation he would never forgive himself for committing.

“I said it earlier... all of which you ignored,” she continued, “I wanted it then, just as much as I did a few minutes ago.” she raised her head, kissing him softly to lessen the reprimand. “You have my permission. I will always want to be with you... regardless of how wasted I am.”

He sighed, keeping his thoughts to himself, for the moment.

“Look,” she noticed the quality of the silence, understanding it for what it was, “just try it once, all right.” she negotiated. “If it doesn’t work for you or I decide it didn’t work for me, we’ll discuss it then. Okay?”

“Why is this so important to you?” he wanted to know.

“...It just is.” she couldn’t put it into words right now.

“And if you see it as a violation?” Red questioned, voicing his fears.

“I won’t, because of this discussion, right here.” she replied. “I said you had permission to play with me, you took me at my word.” she yawned sleepily, snuggling into his warmth. “Besides, just because I’m wasted doesn’t mean I can’t say, no.”

“All right.” he agreed. “But if I feel you aren’t really–”

“I know.” she cupped his face, tenderly kissing his soft lips. “I love you more than I did moments ago.”

He smiled at the quip, “I should hope so.”

Both settled into a quiet moment.

Tracing his fingers idly along the curvature of her spine, Red felt his eyes getting heavier with each exhalation of the woman’s soft breath, as her body further relaxed into his.

His weight settled deeper into the mattress, sinking him further and further into a warm abyss of blessed weightlessness as sleep pulled at him.

Red’s mouth tugged at the corner, realizing the signs. His body was completely and truly devoid of any tension.

Only Lizzy made him feel that utter sense of contentment and completion.

Red settled his head on the crook of his arm, preparing to enjoy a well-deserved sleep.

His body was relaxing into the tiny frame, the warmth of Lizzy’s naked body soothed every nerve ending he possessed.

A perfect end to an ‘iffy’ day.

The quiet of the room enveloped him. He listened to the sweet sound of Lizzy’s breathing which had become even and steady.
Suddenly, he jerked awake unaware just how far he had slipped into the nether regions of a dream state.

His eyes hardened, training on the black comm which sat so innocently on the bedside table.

Red Reddington knew the sound of muffled gunfire when he heard it.

Lizzy was up and scrambling for the device, handing it gingerly over to its proper owner... her once totally relaxed body now on full alert.

Red sighed more than heavily. His hand lazily unfurling just in time to take the communication device as it cracked to life.

“Situation contained.” Silas stated crisply. “No need for alarm, resume your activities... whatever they may have been.”

Red shifted a lifted brow Lizzy’s way. She sat upright, covers pulled up to her neckline, eyes wide and watchful.

“What the hell happ–”

“Minor incident.” Silas iterated, “It’s under control.”

Red read between the lines. Minor incident in Silas’ world could be anything from a fellow guard throwing his guts up after a long night’s binging to a Special Forces team storming an enemy compound.

“Do you want to tell me what happ–”

“No.” was the stoic reply.

Red glanced again at Lizzy’s unsuccessfully attempt to stifle a muffled giggle.

Red cut his losses, “We’ll discuss this tomorrow.”

He would have to talk to the bastard about his evasiveness... tomorrow. The sooner Silas finished showing Travis hell on earth... the better.

“Copy that.”

There were indistinguishable sounds in the background that sounded vaguely like someone dragging a heavyweight... say... like a dead body or some facsimile thereof, before the comm went dead.

“What was that sound?” Lizzy too, had her doubts now.

Red cut her a blank but telling look.

“They’re probably just covering for some intoxicated guard.” she sounded less sure than she felt.

“Whose weapon...” Red scorned, “discharged accidentally?”

“...Sure, why not?” Liz was suddenly covering for the guard as well, her loyalties kicking in, “At the Quantico firing range, Agent Smith’s weapon discharged when he was re-holstering it.” she felt proud she had come up with a possible explanation.

Red looked at her much as he had the comm-link.
She sighed mentally.

He clicked the device to life, “Silas...”

“I want to go to bed dammit!” the large man snapped belligerently, “Can’t a man get any sleep around this place?”

“I might ask you the same,” Red snapped right back, “What the hell do you think I was trying to do!”

“I think you were banging the little brunette.” Silas countered.

Red’s jaw pulsed, his eye twitching irritably, “I’m gonna kick your fuc–”

Liz covered the man’s mouth, taking the radio from his hand, “Get some rest, Silas.”

She tossed the radio to the dresser, gently pushing Red back.

Laying back into the pillows, Red spread his arm open in invitation, “Come here, baby.”

Lizzy looked over her shoulder, her teeth worrying her lip, “Mr. Kaplan should look at Silas. I’m concerned he isn’t–”

“Everything’s fine.” she was assured. Red rubbed his palm against her chilled skin, “Lay down,” he pulled the sheet free, beckoning her closer, “you’re cold.”

Nodding reluctantly, she lay against him, snuggling into his warmth.

She lay stiffly against him, quieting her breathing.

“Relax,” he rubbed his thick fingers along her scalp, massaging gently, loving the feel of her thick hair, “Silas would tell us if there were a problem. You know that.”

“Oh, he would not.” she scoffed, “damned macho asshole.”

Releasing a shuddering breath, she looked up at him, “Why are you men so thickheaded?”

Liz sulked, settling down once again, “We think we can fix you.”

Red felt her warm palm rest against his chest. It comforted him somehow.

“It makes the world go round, Lizzy.” he placed his lips upon her forehead, “The differences between male and female.”

“A centuries-old struggle,” she cut him a teasing glance, “who’s winning the war?”

“If I were a betting man,” Red shrugged, “which I am. I would put my money on the ‘weaker’ sex.”

Liz lifted, her mouth parting his lovingly, “You get a gold star,” she settled her leg over his thighs, “you always know just what to say.”

She laughed softly, snuggling back down.
“Sleep, baby,” Red was suddenly tired.

He continued to massage her back, easing her into a rested state until her breathing became heavy, her body melding to his.

Red closed his eyes pushing the days concerns far back into his consciousness.

Sleep came blissfully fast.

Chapter Notes

Silas is in a grumpy mood. Just warning you. :)

June 4

Elizabeth had hated to leave the inviting place of warmth and security this morning.

Red’s arms were a sanctuary she could spend countless hours within, given the choice.

She studied her reflection in the three-way mirror her dressing area provided. Did her face look puffy? No more late nights for her, she determined. That time she was roofied in college was nothing compared to last nights fiasco.

Red’s supply was of a higher quality than the college fare. Which accounted for the obvious distinction.

She had chosen a simple, tailored black dress suit for the funeral.

She hoped the service wouldn’t drag on.

Maybe that was a terrible thing to wish. When her time came, she was determined to go with as little fanfare as possible.

Morbid thought that.

Liz shook the mood, going off in search of her contemporaries... and Red Reddington of course.

~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~

Red poured his drink, watching the amber liquid swirl about the expensive tumbler.

He left Lizzy to her shower, going to his office early today.

He rarely imbibed so early but he needed a quick bracer this particular morning.

He hated funerals but there was no getting out of this one.

When it was his turn, he hoped no one took any real note until a couple days passed.

The ritual involved with death was for the living. The need to say goodbye... one last moment to connect... to hold firm to what once had been, he supposed.

Humans needed ritual. It gave comfort of sorts no matter how truly useless it was.
He made a few calls, tied up a few loose ends that had been dangling for the past week or so in the business arena.

Nothing really large loomed on the horizon this day, thankfully.

Still, he would prefer to spend it with Lizzy, out on the lake perhaps. Sailing always gave him a new perspective on life.

He heard footsteps coming down the corridor outside his office. Familiar footfalls indeed.

Dembe rounded the corner, coming into view.

The man sported a dark suit, a dapper yet subdued tie, you could see yourself in the shine of his leather shoes.

Red lifted impressed brows, “You look...” he swept the large bulky frame with approval, “very elegant, Dembe.”

“I hate these things.”

Red held up a tinkling glass, “Helps me get by... want one?”

“It is ten o’clock in the morning.” Dembe pointed out.

Red took solace in the pungent scent of his whiskey, “It certainly is.” his brow rose higher, “Your point?”

“Elizabeth will think it disrespectful.”

“No disrespect meant.” Red stated sincerely, “Just a simple coping mechanism,” he sobered for his tone had been a little light-hearted, “helps keep the guilt down to a manageable level.”

“You can not take on the guilt of the world.” Dembe scowled, “In our line of work, there will be losses.”

“He was too young.” Red stared out the window into the grey haze of a stormy day, “the young should stay... live out their time here as it was meant to be.”

“Kevin chose his–”

“He didn’t choose to die!” Red snapped then... closed his eyes, regretting his tone, “...Sorry.” he managed bleakly.

Dembe recognized the outburst for what it was, “The burden you carry is a heavy one, my friend,” he sighed heavily, “but you are correct... the young were meant for something better.”

“Are we so ancient, Dembe?” Red wondered. “It feels so today, I must say.”

“I prefer seasoned.” Dembe corrected, sorting through the stack of correspondence on Red’s desk, “...I thought everyone emailed or texted these days.”

“They tried, but I forgot to check the damned thing,” Red shrugged mentally, “They went back to the old-fashioned methods.... the hard to trace methods.”

“Or they phone you.” Dembe stated wryly.
Red glanced at the dreaded thing, “They do that.”

“How is Elizabeth fairing today?” Dembe enquired graciously.

“We discussed the matter,” Red took a few of the envelopes handed him, glancing through the selection Dembe had deemed important, “she is of a mind to ‘keep and open mind’ but I’ll be damned if I ever bring that shit around her again.” Red frowned over a bill he perused, “What is this for? Two thousand and sixty-two dollars?”

“The bar tab for Kevin’s wake.”

Red’s mouth fell open, then he shut it resoundingly, “Pay it.”

“Of course,” Dembe took the papers back, “we have received no new letters of late.”

“No,” Red confided, “which is good news, I suppose.”

“If he is not writing letters,” Dembe questioned, “what is he doing?”

The thought was unsettling. Red took another bit of his drink, “Speaking of parasites, is he out there?”

“He will not be an issue, Raymond.” Dembe assured. “Tom will not disrupt the proceedings or approach Elizabeth this day. You have my word.”

Red was satisfied, “A display would not be appropriate.”

“I will be discrete.”

“I know you will.” Red hefted the last of his liquor in mock ‘salute’. “When have you not? I only stated my thoughts.”

“The men are outside... on the front drive,” Dembe continued, “The vehicles are ready for departure. The neighboring guards kindly offered their services in our absence.”

Most had been referred by Silas for the man liked competent allies about him at any given time so Red felt comfortable leaving them in charge for a few hours.

“They have been briefed about Carver?”

“In a round-about manner,” Dembe knew Silas’ established routine, “but a thorough sweep will be made before Elizabeth’s return... by our present security team. You know that.”

“I’m just feeling antsy today,” Red sighed the feelings aside, “...What about Nora?” their newest guest came to mind.

“She wished to attend. Silas will drive her himself.”

“I hate,” Red’s lips tightened, “that this is even taking place.” he iterated his growing frustration and anger, “Kevin is...” he caught the slip, some of the anger replaced by a useless sadness and worse still, accepted resignation, “was... a good man.”

Dembe remained silent in deference to the fact.

“Silas and I... and you...” Red motioned, “we strategize, we plan, we work up all the solutions, think we have every contingency planned and still—”
“An unfocused man is a vulnerable man.”

“Meaning me.” Red faced the fact grimly.

“Meaning, Kevin.” Dembe corrected. “He was on duty, his mind elsewhere. A lethal combination in our profession, yes.”

Red mulled over the words, then nodded slowly.

“Unforeseen circumstances befall us all.” Dembe had realized years and years ago, “Now it is time for us to pick up the pieces, to honor our contemporaries as best we can, in whichever way conceivable... and move forward.”

“I know all you say is true,” Red did, “but it doesn’t take away from the fact... I am responsible yet again for another person’s demise.”

Liz had hesitated outside the door, having followed the men’s voices to her present position. Her heart ached for Red Reddington.

She entered, her eyes full of concern and empathy.

“Red...” she approached hesitantly, really not knowing what to say. She could never be as erudite as Dembe, “If Kevin were here, right now... what do you think he would say?” she hastened to add, “Knowing he couldn’t stay, that he had to leave his family behind? What would you want to say?” she hated the scenario, but it had to be faced by everyone in this room, eventually.

Red lifted his head, taking in the lovely sight of her almost ethereal beauty. Dressed so solemnly, her complexion so fragile against the black clothing. She looked like an angel descended from heaven.

Perhaps, at this moment, that is exactly what she was... reminding him of the frailty of life itself.

“I would say...” the man pondered his words seriously, his brow furrowing deeply. His eyes transferred to Dembe, “take care of my own...” a silent communication passed between the men.

Keep her from harm.

Elizabeth’s eyes softened on the man who returned his attention.

“If she is alright,” he reached for her cooler fingers, his expression unreadable, “I am alright, no matter where I end up.” he smiled slightly to lessen the barb for he knew his final destination.

“You could rest... knowing that,” she fought the lump in her throat, “couldn’t you.”

He nodded slowly his eyes warming considerably.

“Then why would you think Kevin is any different?” she asked. “I have to live with the fact, Kevin died because of me...” she held up a hasty hand when both men would disagree.

“I can’t change that fact and neither can you. What I can do,” she turned slightly, her thoughts turning introspective, “is watch out for his sister. Make sure her life is what he would want it to be.”

She turned back forcing a smile, “I can be her friend which is exactly what I intend to be.”

Red’s heart swelled.

She straightened her posture, lifting her head.
“Be my friend...” Silas poked his head in the opened doorway, the rest of his bulky frame following as an afterthought as he sauntered forward. “You people move your respective asses and let’s get this show on the road.” he checked his watch to illustrate the ‘why’ of it all.

She drew back, totally shocked. Silas was dressed in a dark suit, crisp white shirt and stylish tie. She didn’t even know he owned a suit, let alone a tie. If that weren’t shocking enough, every hair on his head was in place and he had trimmed his facial hair.

“You look... decent.” she voiced her awe, her mouth still agape.

“I may look decent,” the guard smirked, “but that’s about as far as it goes.”

Liz sighed, “You...” she pointed at the man, “don’t even think of speaking at the funeral.”

“I’m giving the eulogy,” he spread his hands, his expression innocence itself.

Elizabeth’s shocked expression was comical.

“Are we ready?” Red interrupted the two before they started trading barbs.

“We were born ready.” Silas quipped, enjoying Liz’s huff of exasperation.

Grabbing his glasses and fedora, Red set them in their proper place. Settling his hand on Elizabeth’s back, he guided her towards the door.

The turnout was better than Red expected. Dembe parked the large SUV in a long line of cars.

Red grabbed his fedora, stepping from the vehicle.

Silas was already at Liz’s door, their eyes meeting over the top of the car.

Red rested his hands on the latter, scanning the area. He lifted an enquiring glance not finding the object of his perusal.

Silas jerked his head in the needed direction, “Little prick is across the street, behind the blue Jeep.”

Liz had collected her thing, accepting Silas’ hand as she too, exited the car, “Why does he keep hanging around?” she joined the men in their activity as all three sought out Tom Keen.

Red’s eyes had found the ostentatious car easily. For a supposed spy, Tom really didn’t understand the art of subtlety.

“He will not be a nuisance this day.”

Red had felt the presence before actually having seen the older gentleman approach.

Antonio Crocetti lay a comforting hand on his counterparts shoulder.

Red smiled a welcoming smile, “Antonio,” he extended his hand, “I didn’t expect to see you in attendance today.”

He was frankly shocked in reality. And to add to the sensation, Anthony Burke stood off to the right, his gaze averted.
“No,” he agreed quietly, “he will not sully such a solemn occasion.”

Two rather imposing large gentlemen approached Tom’s vehicle, flanking both doors in time.

Their muscled girth and deliberate air of ease dissuaded Tom from even attempting to exit the safety of his automobile.

“Antonio...” Liz welcomed the older gentleman’s gentle attention, lifting her cheek for a chaste kiss, her hands secured by the strong grasp of confident fingers, “how lovely a surprise.”

“I wanted to see for myself that you were well,” he pulled back, a gentle smile caressing his face, “after your recent accident.” he motioned to the soft cast on her foot.

“Just an old war injury,” she quipped, “I am healing rapidly and how is your lovely wife?”

“Francis assured me you were,” Antonio wasn’t sure who was charming whom? “Maria is feisty and content. She sends her condolences.”

Elizabeth had wormed her way into the old mobsters heart. Why, he could not have said but staring down at the deep blue eyes blinking up at him in such a beguiling manner, Liz’s unguarded expression warmed his heart.

It was no wonder Reddington was so attracted to Elizabeth. Aside from her beauty and attractive form... her innocence was a captivating enticement for men such as he and Reddington.

To this day, his own Maria had an air of innocence. He knew she was well aware of his business dealings, but he had gone out of his way to secure a sphere of serenity and contentment around the woman that she could almost forget who he was... what he did.

When he went home to her, he wanted nothing to take away from their time together if at all possible.

From what he knew of this slip of a thing, Elizabeth would not stand for such tactics... not that he did not admire the young woman for her spirit and gumption. And most of all, her tenacity.

She was a fighter... that much was apparent. A woman after his own heart.

“I am so glad you are here today.” Elizabeth meant the words. “You somehow center me. The world doesn’t seem so scary when you are about.”

“Really?” Red spread his arms out at his side, slightly gesturing to himself.

Antonio chuckled, a warmth settling in his chest. Elizabeth was quite the little charmer.

Waving a hand to the grand church, he offered his arm, “Shall we?”

Obediently accepting the gesture, Liz took Red’s hand in the other as he came alongside.

“Oh,” she drawled taking in their surroundings as they walked the paved walkway to the grand entrance, “it’s so beautiful.”

The church was grand indeed. The gothic cathedral looked better suited to fairytale weddings rather than funerals.

The tall spires seemed to stretch on forever towards the heavens. Stained glass windows dotted every window, painting the sidewalk and surrounding grounds in glittering shades of vibrant color. Lush landscaping and well-placed trees decorated the lawn.

It was a tranquil... peaceful. The sun had come out, the clouds drifting away.

“I promised you,” the older man patted her hand, “Kevin’s family would not want for anything.”

Liz’s eyes shimmered with wetness. It touched her Antonio remembered her guard’s name, “Do you ever break a promise?”

“With you, little one,” he murmured affectionately, “... never.”

Red’s mouth pulled at the corner, listening in on the quiet conversation. There seemed to be a natural fondness between Elizabeth and Antonio.

He knew the man had always wanted a daughter... a little princess to dote on.

Red’s heart ached suddenly, understanding Antonio more than he did moments before.

They walked though the grand entrance, Liz’s eyes flitting from one thing to another, taking it all in.

The warm glow of the stained glass danced against the dark mahogany wood. The gentle scent of aromatic candles burning and numerous flower arrangements filtered through the cavernous space, giving it a welcoming atmosphere.

Gesturing to a row of seats, Dembe walked into the space dominating it, followed by Red, Liz and finally Antonio.

The hushed reverence of the area quieted all speech.

Nora unhooked her arm from Silas’, taking the seat the man offered. Silas settled in beside her. The other guards filled the rest of the seats.

Two spaces directly behind Liz and Antonio were kept for some unseen persons as yet, but everyone seemed to instinctively know not to take them.

Red shifted his eyes as a side door to his left opened, allowing Anthony and Francis to enter.

Red’s eyes softened when Lizzy’s brightened seeing her friend in attendance. He nodded his gratitude to the man, pleased Francis kept his word.

Francis inclined his head in deference, extending his hand to the old mobster. He slipped in behind Liz, playfully tugging her hair.

“Hey, squirt.” he murmured affectionately, leaning to kiss her cheek.

Red’s chest ached as her little face looked up at Francis, a small smile gracing his features.

Even as somber the occasion was, he couldn’t help finding her impish features... adorable.

Francis rested his elbow along the back of Red’s seat, leaning between him and Dembe.

“Extra guards are on Tom,” he whispered, “and the exits.” he took his seat next to Nora and Anthony.

The service was very emotional for the family, of course. Liz was moved to tears several times, Kevin’s younger sister touched her heart when she tried to say a few words about her brother.
The graveside memorial, at which several of Silas’ men spoke, was more a celebration of Kevin’s life.

Silas himself, recounted an amusing incident that happened the first few years of their acquaintance when Kevin was a member of an elite search and rescue unit out of Kuwait.

Kevin and his team went in country in search of a missing government official. The guy had gotten himself in a shit load of trouble by assuming he was above established protocol.

They had learned from a supposed exchange of information involving an alleged Iraqi informant, the man’s location.

The ‘reliable source’... Silas air-quoted the phrase, rolling his eyes which said ‘reliable source’, in his world...equaled incompetent asshole.

The Iraqi informant must have felt along similar lines.

The information he had supplied Kevin and his unit concerning this ‘high-placed government official’, landed them in a ‘high-end’, fully operational and very, very busy... house of ill-repute.

Our government had released two political prisoners as a show of good faith... on the basis of this sterling bit of Intel.

Kevin had a hard time making out his report because he had been laughing so hard.

Red couldn’t really concentrate on the proceedings. He watched the activity across the way.

Had now for some time, although he was trying hard not to allow anyone know of his distraction.

He wasn’t being disrespectful to Kevin. The hairs on the back of his neck were tingling.

There was another service being held a goodly distance away. Red knew he recognized several faces in the gathering. He could count on one hand, five Underbosses of the local mob underground.

The men with their white carnations, requisite sunglasses, lit cigarettes dangling from their mouths... the women in their fashionable lace coverings over their heads and bling purses. Black handkerchiefs discreetly placed under grieving eyes.

The garish floral decorations spelling out the name of the dearly departed. The crowd could have filled the Colosseum in Rome.

Antonio nudged his shoulder inconspicuously.

“A small gathering, as it were, considering,” the older man had picked up on Red’s preoccupation, “Big Louie passed.”

Red’s interest was caught. He kept his tone as low as Antonio, “...Passed?” he quirked his brow.

“Natural causes.” Antonio spread his hands innocently, “The man was a walking coronary waiting to happen.”

“And Mr. Kaplan?”

The woman in question primly picked particles from skirt and sleeves.

“Since when does she feel the need to attend—”
“Oh, she asked a favor of me.” Antonio shrugged the question aside, “She is a hard woman to refuse.”

Red searched out his head guard.

Silas frowned... nothing else, before averting his eyes.

Alarm bells chimed in Red’s head, “Antonio—”

“No need to fret,” the old mobster soothed kindly, “the hole was there...” the matter was settled in the man’s mind. “Louie hated to be alone anyway... this way,” Antonio patted Red’s forearm, “he will have company for all eternity. A win-win situation, right?”

“Although, admittedly,” Anthony Burke was finding the whole situation amusing, obviously having eavesdropped on the private conversation, “Big Louie preferred the fairer sex to males.”

Antonio shrugged, “Perhaps, but at least these two have something in common.”

“Who is buried in that grave?” Red feared he suddenly knew. The supposed ‘lint’ Kate was brushing from her clothes, now looked suspiciously like dirt smudges... as in... from a gravesite.

“I told you,” Antonio clipped his reply, “no harm will come to Elizabeth.”

Red shifted his eyes towards Silas, meeting the stoic grey ones.

Obviously, his head guard had neglected to inform him of a certain conversation that had taken place with Antonio. A conversation that related to Elizabeth’s well-being.

“Reddington,” Antonio scolded, “we are disrespecting a brave young man here.” his look was a sad one. “Should we not turn our attention to Kevin’s grieving family?”

Indeed, the service was breaking up, people drifting back slowly, aimlessly to their cars.

Antonio led the way as each man in turn, consoled Kevin’s mother, expressing their condolences.

“Kevin had set aside this sum.” Red pressed the check into her cold palm. “He planned for Amelia to go to college. I’m certain you knew, of course.”

“...No,” the bewildered woman stared at the envelope, her mind befuddled from the stress of the day, “no, he never said a word.”

“He did to me,” Red lied, “it’s a modest sum and should your daughter ever finds she needs more, I would be only too happy to—”

“We-we could not possibly ask—” she floundered, “We d-don’t even know you, Sir. I mean...”

“I knew your Kevin and had... have a great respect and affection for your son, Madam.” Red brooked no argument, “I couldn’t live with myself, in good conscience if I thought the people he cared for were in any way... wanting.”

“I don’t understand the ins and outs, but...” she was clearly lost, vulnerable, “apparently Kevin left an annuity... whatever that is.” her fingers shook as she lifted them to trace her forehead, “A man came to the house. He said a bank account was opened in my name before,” the tired faded eyes misted, “... before...”

She closed her eyes. Red’s heart softened.
“It’s a normal precaution most soldiers take.” Red pacified, “Kevin was only thinking of you and your family.”

Antonio nodded agreeably, “A thoughtful young man.”

“Pity more aren’t as conscientious.” Anthony Burke put in his two-cents.

“You are associated with Kevin... how?” she enquired taking in the erudite men.

“We were privileged to have known him.” Antonio side-stepped the question artfully. He took the weathered hands in his, “Had I a son...”

Red’s eyes shifted, his head shaking negligibly. The man in fact had sons, but that wasn’t important now.

Antonio continued, “I would want him to be just like the man you reared.”

The woman was mollified, “I could not have wished for a better...” her own voice broke. Guests gathered about hastily, comforting their friend and relative.

Red replaced his hat, nodding his farewell. Antonio Crocetti patted the lady’s shoulder comfortingly before taking his leave as well.

Liz waited patiently, Francis by her side.

On their way to the car, Liz conveyed to Red, “Remember, I have that appointment,” she cocked her head, her brow furrowing, “Is that Mr. Kaplan?” she was thrilled to see the woman herself, in attendance.

Red scratched at his neck, his eye ticking, “Lizzy, I–”

The older mobster stepped forward, blocking Elizabeth’s line of sight, taking the woman’s hand in his.

Red blew out a controlled breath, thankful for the distraction. Until he knew the particulars of why Silas had made use of Kate’s services... perhaps this was not the best time to delve into that incident.

Liz smiled at Antonio, as the man placed gentle lips to her hand, “It was so good to see you again. Even under such circumstances, Antonio.”

“And you little one.” the man was genuine with the comment, “You must come and meet with my Maria. We are celebrating our fortieth wedding anniversary soon.”

“I would love that.” Elizabeth leaned, kissing the weathered cheek affectionately, “don’t forget to issue an invitation.”

“Consider it an ‘open’ one,” he jerked his thumb, “Reddington knows the address.”

Francis took the man’s attention for a beat.

“I need to borrow Silas, can Nora ride home with you guys?”

“You sure you don’t want me to–”

She kissed Red’s cheek, “Do your business. I’ll see you at home later today, okay?”
He glanced across the gravestones, his expression a brooding one.

“Tom is well contained.” she sensed his thoughts, “It’s just a routine doctor’s visit. You said I should keep my scheduled—”

“I know,” he held up his hands, “Okay, just, be alert out there.”

“I don’t for one minute underestimate Carver’s abilities.” she had read his mind again.

“Yeah, well, I’m sending another car just to be safe.”

“You always do.” she smiled, caressing his lips gently, her eyes soft for the man. “...Say, if you really want to make me safe and content,” she tried a ploy, “you’ll give over the name of that—”

“She’s one of my most valuable sources,” Red declined, “I won’t help you make a case against—”

“It was worth a shot.” she teased, flirting openly, “I will graciously concede defeat.”

“That’ll be the day.” he prophesied gloomily.

Elizabeth emerged from the office door, scanning the busy area with curious eyes.

She finally saw Silas’ bulky figure.

He was ‘guarding’ the corridor.

To Elizabeth, his methods seemed questionable this day.

The man leaned, casually... his body conveying confidence verging on arrogance. His hand propped against the wall.

It appeared to Liz’s trained eyes that Silas was hitting on a little ‘stacked’ blonde but perhaps it was just an erroneous misconception on her part.

If that were the case, however....

He had great taste, Liz had to give it to him.

The petite, little angel had an amazing figure, glorious hair and large, brown doe-eyes.

A dangerous glint splashed in Liz’s eyes. She set her shoulders, keeping an evil grin under wraps as she flounced across the well-decorated room.

“Angel baby!” Liz sidled up to the handsome man, her expression a poutful one, “I’ve been looking for you everywhere!”

She spared the gorgeous blonde a ‘mean’ look.

She wrangled her arm into the man’s muscled bicep, turning an endearing face his way.

“This is so exciting, isn’t it!” she managed ‘bubbly’, “I hope it’s a boy, and he has your...” she glanced down meaningfully, “...personality.” she snuggled to him lovingly.

Silas’ expression was... priceless. “What the—”
“I can’t wait,” it was emphasized, “to pick out things for the nursery!”

The blonde huffed indignantly, gathering her pride and flouncing away.

Silas exploded, “What the hell,” he turned his attention post-haste, “was that!?” he watched the hot blonde bounce away, his mind filling with mouth watering images.

“Paybacks are a bitch.” Liz mused thoughtfully.

Silas jerked his head about, his mouth agape.

“Banging the little brunette?” his words thrown back at him in that saccharin voice he was beginning to hate.

“You couldn’t just dock my damned pay!” he hissed, headed off in the direction needed.

“I think I heard the nurse say your little friend was here to pick up a prescription for syphilis,” Liz called after him, stopping the man in his tracks.

Silas looked helplessly from Liz to the tight little ass showcased so well by the yoga pants his ‘little friend’ sported.

“Syphilis?” he mused desperately, “That’s curable right?”

“Eww! You are hopeless.” Liz chortled, giggling her mirth, “You still think you can salvage this situation... daddy.” she patted her tummy playfully.

“I’ll ‘daddy’ your ass.” he started toward the object of his ire.

“I’m saving you a lot of ‘shot time’ here, fella.” she teased, “Show a little gratitude.”

“You are one cruel bitch when you want to be, you know it?”

“You kiss the mother of your child with that mouth?” she batted her eyes innocently. She shielded her stomach protectively.

The man shook his head as an old lady sitting nearby gave him a scathing look of disdain.

Liz had noted the interchange, “Breastfeeding or bottle?” she queried, a glint in her eye.

“I was going for the breastfeeding,” he quirked his head to the blonde, “now, I’ll go home to cradle the bottle for solace.”

“Oh, honey! You picked up on the theme!” she beamed a ‘happy’ smile.

The old woman... did not.

~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥

“How does that woman do it?” Elizabeth sighed blissfully, kicking off her shoes before heading to her most favorite spot in the room, beside the huge monstrosity of a bed, “Nora excels each and every time.”

The chaise lounge looked so inviting as did the marked pages of the novel she immersed herself in these past few days in her off time.
Red caught her hand, seeing her destination.

It had been an established routine these days.

Elizabeth would finish off her cases for the day, then read for an hour or so before dinner. The man would pile into some comfortable clothes, heading for his laptop.

There were so many emails to answer these days. Red longed for a time when technology did not invade every aspect of one’s daily life.

A tech-based world was his reality. Red dealt in ‘reality’. He didn’t have to like it. He just had to do it.

He had also set aside three days a week for some downtime with Elizabeth.

A relationship required the proper amount of time and effort.

He was only too glad to give over the hours needed.

But this afternoon was not supposed to be a free day.

Try telling his libido...

He drew the woman back within the sphere of his arms, his lips coaxing a response from the full, sensual mouth he captured.

The best feeling in the world was when Lizzy’s arms crept slowly upward, winding lovingly about his neckline.

The feel of the warm, fragrant body crushing intimately to his was a feeling he was beginning to treasure.

One of the worst feelings in the world was when his fucking phone jarred him from such a pleasant place of contentment.

Lizzy scratched the underside of her chin with a sculptured nail, her eyes dancing with flirtatious amusement.

“Duty sucks, huh.” she commiserated, pulling a ‘sad’ face in the next instance.

Red sent her on her way with a meaningful smack to her backside, enjoying the muffled giggle his actions produced.

He sent her a look before turning his attention to the phone caller.

Red listened half-heartedly to the person babbling on the other end of the line. His look was a sour one had anyone cared to note.

He had definite plans for Elizabeth Keen tonight and now, it appeared those plans would have to be put on hold.

He sighed repeatedly, shifting from foot to foot, “If I ran my organization the way the FBI runs the one you work for...” he concluded his opinion, “I’d be out of business in a week’s time.”

Liz looked up from her comfortable perch by the window, shooting him an are you including me in that assessment look.
The ‘look’ he gave her sent tiny little shivers of repressed flame between her thighs.

“Whatever!” he snapped at the person on the other end of the line, “Don’t get your panties in a bunch. We’ll be there when we get there!” he closed the phone with a definite snap.

The man crossed to an inquisitive female, grasped her hand and led her on a wandering trek across the room.

“Are we going to have sex on the basin again?” Liz was in a playful mood.

Red stopped, his head dropping with his mood.

He cast her a ‘grumpy’ shift of his eyes, “No, we’re not going to have sex on the basin again.”

She held her giggle for his sour mood, “On the ottoman?” she was flexible.

The man groaned, “I can call Ressler back and tell him I’m tied up for the night which means...” he smiled pleasantly, “we’ll be having sex on the dining room table. The legs are perfect for securing ropes.”

Liz chuckled, “Nora would kill you if she found out.” she quipped, “What’s up with the team?”

“Oh, so now sex is off the table.”

“I said, Nora would kill us anyway.” Liz remarked, “but the ottoman is still open. What’s up with the team?”

Red glanced at the ottoman wistfully, “We’re going to Montana.”

She pulled a face, “Montana?” she was growing curious, “What’s in Montana?

“Open skies and buffalo I hear tell.” he trudged into the walk-in closet, pulling down suitcases. He filled her in on what info Ressler had given over.

Liz considered her options, “How long will it take to ready the jet?”

“About forty minutes give or...” he stopped pulling clothes out of drawers, “...Why?”

The woman smiled serenely, crossing to sit primly upon the large circular ottoman gracing the center of the closet.

She shifted patient eyes, “Well come on, Sailor... we don’t have all night.”

Red threw the boxers which dangled from his fingers over his shoulder, moving his body fluidly forward unbuckling his belt...

His mood incredibly improved.

Dembe nodded, taking Red’s instructions as they drove. The man stifled a yawn, “...Sorry.” he apologized for Red had halted his narrative.

“No, I apologize, Dembe, for the short notice.” Red smiled at the man in the rearview mirror, “You’re a good friend.”
“Perhaps I am simply an adrenaline junkie.” Dembe offered an alternative synopsis.

Red chuckled, his attention caught as Liz snuggled closer to his side. “Are you cold?”

She shook her head, stifling a yawn as well, “I’m out of the routine... you’ve babied me for too long.” she smiled up at him, “Not used to these last-minute junkets any longer. Not that I’m complaining.”

“That would be a first.” Silas grumped from the front seat. “And that’s not why you’re tired.”

“What’s up his ass?” Red had made note of the other man’s bad mood this evening.

Granted, the man was right. Lizzy was more... sated, than tired. But the guard’s tone held more disdain than usual regarding their alone time.

“He’s still mad at me for spoiling his fun at the doctor’s office.”

“Your little bundle there has the hots for me, by the way.” the guard crooked his head about enough to speak, “She wants to have my baby. Thought I should be up front about things.”

Red’s brow furrowed.

Dembe rolled his eyes.

“That’s right, Red.” Liz nodded amiably, “I’ve tried and tried... just can’t keep my hands off that magnificent body of his.” she yawned once more.

She felt the man’s own body lose some of its tension.

“We all know he’s too much for just one woman, of course.” she smiled sweetly at the back of the guard’s neck, “But I just didn’t feel like sharing today. I made that horrible little blonde floozie go away, didn’t I baby cakes.”

“Kiss my ass sweet cheeks.” Silas grumbled, “I could be in Seventh Heaven right now instead—”

“You could be at a clinic getting syphilis shots.” Liz chided playfully.

Red exchanged looks with Dembe in the rearview mirror once again.

Silas went back to his brooding, happy to do so, “I still vote to muzzle her.”

Liz stifled her giggle into Red’s jacket.

Red shook his head to clear it, “I’m still on the ‘wants to have your baby thing.’” he turned expressionless eyes towards his guard, “Which is not going to happen by the way.”

Silas waved the issue aside, “All I’m saying is... when I’m circling my prey. Maybe she should shut the hell up and let me enjoy the meal.”

“Is that a metaphor or a simile?” Dembe was curious.

“Your meal would have made your little soldier fall off.” Liz muttered.

“I’ve had a stretch of bad JuJu,” Silas vented, “and I think I deserve a little downtime between the sheets if you get my meaning.”
“How could we,” Dembe asked, “you are such a subtle creature.”

“I had a clear shot with that blonde and she wrecked it all.” he jabbed a finger at the back seat in Liz’s vicinity.

“I would say she was anything but ‘clear’.” Liz shared her thoughts with Red.

Silas turned about, his expression incredulous.

Red’s laughter mingled with Dembe’s low, controlled chuckle.

“Is that why you came along?” Red had wondered over the fact. “To air your grievances?”

He had informed Silas that there was no great need for him to accompany them to the airport. That the man could fly out in a day or so.

Red actually was concerned that his head guard just might possibly need some ‘heal’ time.

Lizzy would be surrounded by her team and Red didn’t intend to leave her side so, he felt it advantageous to allow Silas some much needed personal time.

“I’ll not have her saying I shirked my duties.” Silas was still in a mood, clearly.

“Oh, I say that all the time.” Liz needled artfully, “Don’t I, Red.”

“Yes you do, baby cakes.”

Liz laughed her delight at his dry delivery.

“At least you have the good sense not to listen or believe the afflicted.” Silas threw a knowledgeable look to the back seat, “And if you must know...I came along because I know Dembe can’t see to drive at night.”

Liz was instantly concerned but also a little puzzled, “Then... why aren’t you driving?”

“Well, I didn’t want to hurt the guy’s feelings.” Silas managed, straight faced.

Dembe shook his head woefully, shifting into a more comfortable position, “You are full of shit, my friend.”

Silas chuckled appreciatively.

“Dembe, are you all right?” Liz scooted up, her hand on the back seat, her expression a worried one.

“He’s fine,” Red reassured, “not so sure about pretty boy, here.”

Silas laughed again, “She always falls for it.”

“Perhaps because of her innate kindness?” Red suggested.

“Nah,” Silas dismissed the thought, “just that innate naïveté... and she’s just a sucker for a sob story.”

Liz sat back, a sheepish look on her face, “He’s right... I’m an idiot.”

“You are not an idiot.” Red nuzzled the woman’s temple, “You are–”

“Mentally challenged.” Silas corrected magnanimously.
“A brilliant profiler.” the man continued, his eyes narrowing, “Which is infinitely better than being unemployed.” Red stated a warning.

Silas sighed heavily, “You always take her side.”

“Well...duh.” Dembe offered in that eloquent way he had about him.

Silas laughed again, his good mood restored.

Red sat back, his thoughts turning elsewhere. He watched the lights of the city from across the river as they shimmered in the reflecting waters.

Now was as good a time as any he supposed, to broach a matter that had been on his mind.

“Lizabeth,” his brow was furrowed. He was glad Dembe had started up a conversation with Silas, “I need to ask you something.”

Red was striving for a measure of privacy. He glanced at the occupants of the front seat, moving closer to the woman, lowering his voice discretely.

She was attentive, the slender fingers intertwining with his, “A problem?”

“I’m not sure,” he confessed, “listen, this will be the first time we’ve connected with the team since we...” the tip of his tongue pressed to the center of his upper lip as he pondered his options, “...well, our relationship has evolved considerably. Wouldn’t you say?” he turned patient eyes her way.

Liz processed, “We are all adults here, Red.” she thought she understood what he was asking, “I don’t see why there would be–”

“Speculation?” he sat back, sighing mentally.

Sometimes he forgot how the young could rationalize any rule... bend them to suit the moment.

“Lizzy, I am a known criminal,” he understated, “I am supposedly your CI.”

“So?”

“You are half my age,” he continued, “trust me... eyebrows will raise when people find out we are... associated in the Biblical sense.”

“Since when do you care what people think?”

“I care if they say or think derogatory things about you.”

“My friends wouldn’t–”

“I’ve come to terms with it all.” Red had long ago. “I’m not sure anyone else can say the same at this point.”

“I’m just saying,” he held up a staying hand at her expression, “it might be easier if we...” he couldn’t even say it, the thought going against every principle he believed.

The man bit his lip thoughtfully. Could he do it for Lizzy? Could he pretend that none of what had transpired between them simply did not exist.

“I have no intention of running around hiding my true feelings.” the woman was getting angry.
“You know that is not the case.” he stopped that line of thought cold in its tracks. “A lot has gone down between us that even Ressler and Samar–”

“They can handle it,” Liz stated firmly, “well...maybe not Ress.” she teased to lighten the moment,
“Hey... let’s give him the business.”

Red tried to pick up on the woman’s mood but... “I’m kind of up in the air on this one.” he admitted.
“This could conceivably affect your career. I don’t want that, Elizabeth. I don’t want to be the cause–”

“I understand what you’re saying.” Liz’s tone softened.

“Do you?” he didn’t think so. “If you want to keep our situation under wraps for the duration of this outing, I will understand.”

It rather hurt Liz, truth told, “Could you do that?”

Red sat back, returning to the passing scenery, “I can do what has to be done.” he thought he might be able to, at least. He cut her an unreadable look, “It doesn’t mean I have to like it. Make no mistake about that, Elizabeth.”

“Well, I don’t like it.” she let him know her feelings. “Not one bit.”

“Think carefully before you make a decision on this one.” he advised. “Bravado is all well and good, but if this gets to the wrong people in the Bureau...” he let it hang between them, “You’ve worked long and hard to get where you are. Move carefully, baby.”

The conversation in the front seat had died down on that note.

Liz fell silent, given food for thought.

Silas was ticking off time on his fingers, Dembe picked up on the action, a smile spreading slowly over his handsome face.

“If that’s the type of organization I work for...”

“Three seconds,” Silas muttered to his companion, “I knew she couldn’t keep her mouth shut for–”

“Maybe I shouldn’t work for it.” Liz was becoming incensed more she thought about it, “They wouldn’t even have these cases if it weren’t for me...” she caught the slip, “and you... helping me.”

Red smiled.

“My private life has nothing to do–”

“Be reasonable, Lizzy.” Red sighed, “Our situation is a little unique, you have to admit.”

“It’s because of my job we were put in this situation.”

“With the understanding, it was all supposed to be a means to an end.”

“And we’ve delivered enough of these ‘ends’,” she pointed out, “they should be more than satisfied with the results you have provided.”

Red knew that would not be the case.
“Your friends accept us,” Liz stated, “Mine will as well and as for the others,” she shook her head stubbornly, “they don’t matter. I like my job but not enough to allow anyone other than myself, to dictate my life choices.”

Dembe and Silas exchanged looks, “Easy words to say,” Silas stirred the pot for Red’s sake, “can you live up to them?”

“I can get another job if I have to.” Liz wasn’t worried, “Nothing is written in stone.”

“A few things are,” Red disagreed, “like, if you say we’re ‘on’, I have no intention of pulling any punches for appearance’s sake.”

Liz blinked over at the man, “I’ll kiss you when I want, I’ll hold you in my arms if the mood strikes,” he ticked off his conditions.

“You can play footsie,” Silas quipped, “It’ll be like foreplay.”

“...We will sleep in the same bed.” Red continued.

“If I’m on the mood.” she had provisions of her own.

“I can get you in the mood.” he wasn’t worried.

Liz chafed at Silas’s throaty chuckle.

“I just want everything clear before we hit the airport.” Red could see the object looming on the distant horizon.

Dembe eased the vehicle into the lane which exited the freeway.

Liz sat back, “Pity really,” she had made her decision, “it would have been nice to give Ressler the business.” she smiled finally, “He’s always bragging about how astute his instincts are... how intuitive he can be.”

“I didn’t say we couldn’t harass Ressler,” Red sort of liked the idea of screwing with the other man, “but when you say it’s over... it’s over.”

Liz cast him a scornful glance, “You’re getting as bad as him.” she motioned to Silas.

“I only meant,” Red amended tactfully, “I’m not sure how long I can go between any kind of intimacy with you. I’d like to know there will be a reckoning at some point.”

“Good save.” Silas approved, throwing the comment back over his shoulder, “Keeping in mind, this is coming from the guy who was held captive once for eight days without any hope of ‘reckoning’ in sight.”

Red lifted an annoyed stare, “That was my pride.. The other would involve my libido.”

“Ahh,” Silas hadn’t thought in those terms. He understood all about libidos these days.

“Why am I even here?” Liz was confused. “I’m still on leave, aren’t I?” she fidgeted in her seat. Suddenly, this outing didn’t seem all that exciting anymore.

“Two reasons,” Red explained, “firstly, Silas here won’t take a break with you about.... it’s something to do with his job, I’m given to understand.”
“I don’t need a friggin’ break,” the man mumbled, “who said I did.”

“Your libido?” Dembe muttered aside.

“And secondly,” Red ignored the interruption entirely, “I don’t trust you at home to do the things the doctor said you must, to heal.”

“Excuse me!” she sputtered indignantly.

“He doesn’t trust anyone to watch you while Carver is on the prowl,” Silas corrected, “that’s the excuse I got at least.”

“I trust you when you are in peak condition,” Red soothed any ruffled feathers, “but the truth is,” he turned back to Elizabeth, “this particular case should be relatively straightforward. It provides an excellent opportunity for you to get your feet wet with the least amount of—”

“Danger?” Liz dared him to say it, her eyes narrowing.

“Stress or exertion,” he continued, “Aram is another factor. I’m sure he will appreciate your calming presence.” Red could come up with any number of excuses or reasons if pressed. “He hasn’t been in the field since you left.”

“What aren’t you telling me?” Liz was beginning to read between the lines where this man was concerned.

Dembe guided the large SUV effortlessly around the buildings, along the back lot, onto the tarmac.

Dembe pulled up alongside a government issue SUV, the jet waited in the background, its door open and inviting.

Liz took in the area and the people gathered alongside the other car.

Red slid effortlessly out of his side of the car, patiently waiting as she struggled with her gimpy leg. A reluctant smile pulled at her lips at the thought. At one time, she would have considered it her injured leg. Now, due to Silas’ bad influence... she was gimpy.

“I hate this damn thing.” Liz groused morosely, suddenly not looking forward to facing those who waited.

She wished she had grilled Red more about the case. She really had fallen out of old habits.

She hadn’t realized how much until this minute.

“What the hell happened?” Samar approached gingerly, meeting Liz and Red as they made their way around the car. “You were out of that damn thing when I saw you last!”

The woman wore dark pants and low scooped neckline shirt. A colorful scarf adorning her neckline draped in a fashionable cowl dip.

Her hair was down, windblown from the open field lining the runways on this side of the airport.

She looked lovely as usual.

Liz had not second guessed her apparel until just now. Had she been the only one not in a suit, she would have been embarrassed. Only when she realized Samar was dressed in a similar fashion, did she relax.
“Little accident...” Liz glanced down at the offending object, accepting the warm reception, “It’s only for a couple days.”

Red’s earlier encouragement, echoed his earlier sentiments bringing a smile to his lips.

She leaned, accepting Ressler’s earnest handshake.

Over his shoulder, another man waited patiently, an expectant look on his oddly symmetrical face.

She knew this guy. Or at least... he seemed familiar. She searched her memory.

“Hey, Keen,” Ressler broke free, motioning the guy forward, “you know Andrew Wilson, right? He came over from Organized Crime and Domestic Threats a couple months before you....”

A memory stirred, “I do know you,” she managed a smile, “the break room about... what was it, four months ago? It was still cold outside.” she remembered that part vividly.

The man took her hand, shaking it, smiling sheepishly, “I spilled coffee... well, everywhere.”

“Been there,” Liz made him feel more comfortable, “done that... too many times to count.”

“Four,” Ressler counted, “to date.”

Liz slipped him a wry side glance catching Samar out of the corner of her eye.

The woman was discretely poking fun at Wilson’s ‘bright’ choice of tie. Samar feigned momentary blindness.

Liz was hard pressed to hold her smile, but managed, “I love your tie.” she hoped she sounded sincere. But she wasn’t. “It’s so... stylish.”

Wilson seemed genuinely pleased, “We’re always accused of being so traditionally boring.” he shrugged unassumingly. “Don’t know if it works, but it brightens a long day.” he quipped.

Liz liked him instantly, “It brightens mine too.” she decided.

“It’s so good to finally, formally meet you,” Wilson continued, his manner open and friendly, “I’ve learned so much about you from your team and I understand you are an excellent profiler as well?”

“Don’t know about excellent,” she modestly denied the praise, “but I enjoy that aspect of the job, yes.”

Red stared hard at the hand holding Lizzy’s, more specifically the thumb stroking her. He sighed deeply as the other agents approached, the day just getting all that more gloomy.

“Do we really have time to hold a family reunion or gab session?”

Liz scowled darkly at the new arrival on scene. Another car had arrived moments before, delivering another of their ensemble.

“...Moore.” Elizabeth’s tone had definitely altered having recognized the guy, “I thought you would have been assigned to a field office in Nowhere, Idaho by now. What are you doing here?”

“Scott,” the same acerbic response met her ears, “good to see you too.”

“It’s Agent Keen, actually.” Liz corrected coolly.
“He was in Nowhere, Nebraska.” Samar interjected, more than intrigued by the animosity between the two agents. “And before that, it was Nowhere, Alaska wasn’t it, Dick?” she smiled pleasantly at the man.

“You two should take it on the road.” Moore bitingly replied, “You’re hilarious.”

Dembe stepped between the two warring factions, his attention focused on Agent Richard Moore, “We are commencing boarding.” his silky voice brooked no argument.

“Now would be an excellent time to... take your seat.” Silas narrowed his eyes.

Moore unconsciously backed away, looking the man up and down, “And you would be?”

“The guy who told you to take your friggin’ seat.” Silas’ attitude lacked the finesse of Dembe’s, “So take your fucking seat before I–”

“Silas.” Red intoned quietly.

“You’ll have to excuse him,” Dembe didn’t sound as if he cared one way or other if the guy did or didn’t, “he hasn’t been laid in a while.”

“Makes me... cranky.” Silas’ stony expression was foreboding on the best of days.

“Poor baby.” Samar’s silky caress grabbed the guard’s attention, as it did every man present, Liz assumed, “That’s so sad.”

Silas was instantly by Samar’s side having moved very, very close to the woman, “Yes, yes it is sad. Almost criminal, you might say.”

Liz noted his tone had changed considerably as well as his manner.

“You’re a law enforcement specialist aren’t you?” Silas’ eyes moved slowly over Samar’s beautiful body, stopping in all the right places, “Can’t you do something about a situation like that? I mean,” the light grey eyes lifted sensually, “if you were of a mind?”

Samar’s lovely mouth hinted at a smile, the dark eyes examining Silas much as he had her.

“Help a man out, can’t ya?” the guards tone dipped erotically, hidden innuendo behind the statement.

“No!” Elizabeth gasped, rushing to the rescue before the situation got out of hand, “No, don’t help a man out... don’t do that.” she scolded Samar soundly, guiding the woman out of harms way, “Not at all.”

Silas was not deterred this time, seeking a higher court.

Samar smiled playfully back as Liz continued to drag her to safety.

The large guard eyed the Iranian beauty covetously, “Hey, Red,” he interrupted a conversation between Ressler and his employer, “about me staying behind...”

Samar pretended to be listening to Liz’s lamentation concerning the terribly unwise move a woman, any woman, could make if she even considered getting involved with a degenerate such as Liz’s guard was turning out to be.

It was clear to Red, Samar wasn’t taking any of the well-meaning advice to heart.
Silas smiled charmingly back at the receptive playmate, “I think I could best serve—”

Another car appeared on the tarmac, this one speeding forward in an erratic manner.

Silas stiffened, halting his narrative.

Dembe stepped decidedly closer to the two women by the steps of the jet.

Red’s brow furrowed darkly, he too, preparing for action if indeed, action was called for.

The car skidded to a halt. Even before the vehicle pulled to a stop, Aram’s long legs exited, his arms full of laptops, tech gear and other odd looking paraphernalia.

He stumbled hastily towards the gathered group of Agents, his look a harried one.

“Oh, thank goodness. I thought you might have left already... without me.”

He unloaded his burden, handing off equipment to Ressler and Wilson as he spoke, “The traffic was horrendous, we couldn’t catch a break.”

The man rushed back to the car, extracting luggage and yet another laptop.

“I tried to phone, but no one was picking up,” he was upset, “I thought– Agent Kee–Liz!” his face beamed, “I didn’t realize you would be here!”

He approached both women, “You didn’t answer your phone.” he looked hurt.

“I’m sorry,” Samar took the laptop he juggled, “it was hectic. I didn’t hear it.” she lied to lessen the blow.

“Oh.” Aram was happy again.

“...Silas?” Red pulled the man’s attention away from the proceedings, “What were you saying?” he knew, of course. But Silas’ manner had altered now.

The man seemed abnormally quiet, “Eh... nothing,” he shook his head, “it wasn’t... it was nothing important. Can I help with the luggage?”

“If you want to go, you can.” Red encouraged, his eyes seeking out Samar purposely, “No reason you shouldn’t.”

“Yeah,” Silas pulled his eyes from the woman who tried desperately to find a moment to connect with the brooding stare, “there’s one important one.”

Red was concerned for the man’s lackadaisical manner. It wasn’t like Silas to give up so easily on anything, let alone–

“He laid claim first.” Silas clearly meant Aram, “I don’t trespass on another man’s dream.”

Red scowled, “She a free agent, Silas.”

“I need to rest.” he replied curtly, hefting two bags in capable hands. He crooked his head, “I’m good.” he forced a smile, “Really, when have you ever known me not to be?”

“It’s not like she’s not interested.” Red stated encouragingly. He had seen the interaction between the two.
Silas shook his head, going to the plane. Red watched the bulky form disappear then reappear moments later.

Silas cast a regretful smile Samar’s way, waving nonchalantly as he passed the gathered trio.

Liz noted the man’s quietness, a studied frown on the handsome features.

She sought Red out, a questioning look passing between them.

Red spread his hands, a helpless gesture signifying, his ‘hands’ were tied on the matter.

Liz’s scowl increased. She fought a tendency to go after her guard. She bit her lip anxiously.

Samar appeared a little down now as well.

Aram kept a running discourse going, to take the woman’s mind off what ‘could have been’.

“You’re loaded up.” Silas proclaimed, taking the keys from Dembe, “I’ll call when...”

He glanced at Moore who was pretending to check the closures on his luggage.

The guy was blatantly listening in on any and all conversations available.

“...That matter has been handled,” Silas stated, “If there is a problem out there, call.”

“There won’t be a problem.” Dembe stated.

Silas glanced longingly at Samar, “No... I guess you guys can handle that part of the equation.”

“You never know.” Red couldn’t dash hope in such a cold manner.

“I think there is enough agents on hand,” Moore was amused a want-to-be hired mercenary thought his assistance might be called for, “we can handle anything thrown at us. Civilians will only be in the way.”

“Who the fuck asked you?” Silas bristled, his beefy hands curling into massive fists, “A fucking moron like you couldn’t cross a street without consulting a fucking manual first.”

Moore hefted his backpack and one lone valise, choosing to ignore the surly guard’s attitude.

“Fuck you.” Silas grit.

Reddington set a calming hand on the guard’s forearm, stifling his amusement.

Moore ducked his head, crossing to the luggage compartment of the jet.

He felt three sets of icy stares the entire way.

A tiny trickle of fear ran the length of his spine. He chose to ignore that as well.

“I want to put a round in that idiot fucker’s brains.” Silas snapped.

“Why waste a bullet?” Dembe was curious.

“He’s paying for it.” Silas commented, Moore forgotten as soon as the bastard was out of sight.

Red grinned, “I wonder if it’s a right-off?”
“It would be a service to a government agency,” Silas grumbled, “it should be.”

Red watched the man cross the tarmac, entering the vehicle they had exited. The SUV spun out at a high rate of speed.

Dembe waved wistfully in its wake. Red shook his head, “He was never one for long goodbyes.”

“Lizzy,” Red had other priorities now, offering his hand, “that leg bothering you?”

Liz grimaced, accepting his assistance readily, the small fingers grasping his for needed support, “I can see I’m going to be a big help.” she prophesied.

Red was silently pleased she took his hand without a second thought. She would not have a couple months ago.

“Lean on me, sweetheart.” Red’s arm snaked about her waist. He guided her toward the steps of the plane.

Wilson checked the strap on his holster unit, “...Sweetheart?” he drawled to Ressler who was cleaning the lens on his sunglasses with his tie.

“It’s just Reddington’s way,” Ressler dismissed, “Every woman is sweetheart or angel or... something inappropriate.” the agent placed his hand on his hips, “We try that today and we’d get written up for sexual harassment.”

“Which is a hanging offense.” Wilson quipped, “It’s getting so a guy is afraid to open his mouth.”

“Open mouth, insert foot.” Ressler grinned, “Moore hasn’t caught up to this century yet.”

Both men shared a chuckle.

“I’m surprised Keen lets Reddington get away with it.” Wilson said.

“I think Liz gave up on trying to sway him a year ago.” Ressler shrugged. “Besides, I don’t believe he means it in a demeaning manner when speaking to her,” the man shrugged, “or any woman for that matter.”

“I hate to say it,” Ressler watched the pair’s progress up the steps, “Reddington really stepped up and supported Keen after her ex went off the rails.”

Reddington quickly steady the small brunette, looking worried for a moment until Keen waved a negligent hand indicating she was fine.

The strawberry blonde spared Wilson a glance, “You heard she was attacked by a psycho, right? Shortly thereafter?”

Wilson’s face clouded.

“She’s had a hard time of it this past few months.” Ress picked up his bags, “Sucks really. She’s... okay.” he shrugged off the compliment.

“I don’t mean to cause trouble but a thought occurred.” Wilson’s brow was troubled, “how do we know Reddington didn’t orchestrate the events.”

Ressler pulled up short, his temper flaring, “What the hell is that supposed to–”
“I don’t know the guy at all,” Wilson hurried to catch up to the rapid steps of the other man, “Could he be manipulating the situation? Save a Fed... get a gold star.”

“Reddington is a lot of things,” Ress said, tossing Navabi’s bag into the cargo hold, “but he’d never hurt Keen.” The accusation was blown off. “Especially for something he couldn’t give a damn about receiving.”

“What do you–”

“Reddington could disappear in the blink of an eye,” Ressler disgusted, “he couldn’t care less about appeasing or pleasing a government piss-ant.”

“I’ve wondered about the reason he made the deal to catch these Blacklisters.” Wilson agreed, “He will only share info with her, correct? But... why?”

“Take a wild guess.” Moore had retraced his steps, bag in hand, “They tell me I have to put my stuff in here. She gets her bag on board... do I have to explain that as well, Wilson.”

“Explain it to me.” Ressler got the jest of the accusation.

“Hey, I didn’t mean to cause trouble,” Wilson hastily interjected, “I’m new here,” he looked from one to the other, “I’m just trying to understand the dynamics of the team.”

“Keep out of this,” Ressler snapped, returning his ire to the object of his disdain, “you implying something about Keen?”

“Open your eyes,” Moore suggested caustically, “Something is going on between those two,” he pointed in the vicinity of the jet, “It’s not just normal interaction between a CI and his–”

“Do you think Reddington was sleeping with Liz before he turned himself in?” Samar approached, hefting Aram’s computer bag, “Or that he wants in her panties now? Winning her favor by supplying the Blacklisters.”

“Liz was married.” Ressler bristled even more so, not liking the implication one bit, “I’ll knock you on your ass–”

Samar soothed by placing a hand on the man’s stocky shoulder, “Let’s clear the air because...” she glanced at the plane, “if Reddington catches wind of any sort of derogatory issue involving Elizabeth–”

“He won’t hesitate to put a bullet between your eyes...” Ressler stated flatly, “and quite frankly, I wouldn’t blame him.”

“Reddington does not play by any set of rules you are familiar with,” Samar continued, “he’s allowed your disrespect because of his deference to that woman in there...” again she pointed, “his patience is about at its end... my God, can’t you sense that?”

“I meant no disrespect to Agent Keen...” Wilson was quick to pacify, “I have heard–”

“I know what you heard.” Ressler grated, knowing very well the office gossip.

“I understand you’re curious, we all are,” Samar admitted, “but it’s crass to judge someone on the basis of appearances... and what if it is true?” she wanted to know, “We are all adults here, aren’t we?”

“Oh, grow the hell up.” Ressler suggested strongly, “you’re trying to get to first base with that blonde in accounting... what makes you any different than–”

“You shut the hell up about Melody,” Moore advanced threateningly but Ressler wasn’t impressed, “she’s a decent woman.”

“And Liz isn’t?” Samar was suddenly livid, “You American men make me sick, acting all pious where women are concerned and you assholes running with your dicks hanging out, panting after anything that will spare you the time of day.”

Ressler’s mouth quirked irresistibly.

“Liz is good at her job, better than you will ever be, Moore,” she flared, stepping toe-to-toe with the guy, “if Reddington and she have established a bond, there is a good reason!”

Ressler stood back and watched the sparks fly, proud of his partners verve truth told.

“He took care of her emotional and physical well being when we couldn’t,” she motioned to Ressler and herself, “he saved her from a serial killer’s gentle administrations... we weren’t there to do that either!”

Moore’s expression altered slightly, “I know she’s had a hard time of–”

“Hard time?” Samar was incredulous, “Yeah, she’s had a little trouble of late in her personal life... just a tad.”

“Listen...” Wilson seemed very uncomfortable with all the dissension, “please, this isn’t getting us anywhere.”

“Keep your damned mouth shut and your thoughts to yourself,” Samar snapped in Moore’s direction, “I don’t want to hear them.” she started off only to turn smartly on her heel.

“And what if they are fucking each other?” she was beyond livid, “it’s none of our damned business. We’re here to do a job... get psychos off the street.”

The lovely eyes flashed fire.

Ressler grinned, enjoying the show.

“We’re doing that with flying colors regardless of what is or is not, happening between Red and Liz’s sheets.” she pointed out, “I don’t remember our stats being so good before Reddington came into the picture.”

She marched off without a backward glance.

Ressler chuckled his delight closing the compartment with a thud, “What she said.” he sauntered away, his mood very much improved. “And one other little tidbit, you wreck this arrangement with Reddington in any way shape or form... and I wouldn’t want to be in your shoes when you have to explain the why of it all to Cooper.”

Grasping his computer bag, Ressler took a step, hesitating.

“Watch out, Navabi’s got a mean right hook.” he warned in reminder... to Moore.
Red watched the fiasco from his seat, peering out the window of the jet in the dusky light.

“You do know they’re discussing us, don’t you?” he turned a lazy stare to the woman beside him.

“Yes.” she giggled, twisting the cap off her preferred tea. She sat back getting comfortable.

“Samar is pissed,” he watched the woman pace back and forth just off the stairs, “she defended your honor.”

Liz craned her neck to see, “How do you know?”

“A woman doesn’t get that livid over anything less.”

“I’ll go talk to her.” Liz felt bad.

“I don’t want her feeling bad because of me.” Liz objected.

“She feels great, actually.” Red chuckled, “She just wants to kill someone. Moore, probably.”

“I sympathize.” Liz pulled a face, “I wish we could push him off the plane after we were high enough.”

“How high is high enough?” Red smiled.

“Thirty-thousand?” she questioned. She hadn’t done anything of the sort before but the height she quoted seemed reasonable.

Red looked at her oddly, “We must go below radar range...” he informed her, “it will still kill him.” he reassured.

She giggled at the conversation, going back to her original thought, “I wonder what was said?” she wasn’t sure if she really wanted to know though.

“I wonder what wasn’t.” Red stowed Lizzy’s computer bag.

“Samar told them, if we are having sex, it’s no one’s business but our own.” he said.

“Well, it isn’t.” she agreed, “Still, Samar is so cool. I admire that style she possesses.”

“She came by it the hard way, baby.” Red’s voice was wistful, “She’s done a hell of a lot of undercover work... Honeypot operations and the like,” he scowled. “A shit poor thing for a woman to be asked to do.”

“How far do you think she had to go?” Liz often wondered such things, “Oh! Not that I’m judging–”

“I know you don’t.” he patted her hand comfortingly, “odd, men judge her more harshly than one of her own species.”

“I... couldn’t imagine having to do... that.” Liz scowled deeply, “I would hate to make the decision.”

“Any woman does.” Red knew, “She had a very different life than you, Lizzy.” he was sad for the fact, “You were sheltered, Samar... wasn’t. She had to grow up quickly, learn how to survive in a world you can’t even imagine.”

Liz couldn’t, she knew.

“She’s a hell of a woman.” Red chuckled quietly.

“What does that make me?” Liz was a little concerned.

“I have a gimpy leg,” she ticked off the ‘qualities’ in rapid succession, “I bitch and moan about everything under the sun, according to Silas... and can’t cook worth a damn according to...well, anyone that has ever tasted my efforts—”

“You are an excellent profiler, capable of seeing the broader side of any personality,” he began, correcting her misconception of herself, “you are now, thinking outside the box, you are getting stronger mentally each and every day.”

Liz loved the touch of his hand. It traced the side of her face gently.

“You are pushing past your boundaries, becoming more self assured.” he was proud of her achievements, clearly.

“You are smart... and beautiful,” he concluded, “You are finally becoming your own person, Elizabeth, and that is a woman I am privileged to know.”

Liz leaned into his soft touch, smiling.

“You and Samar have become quite formidable in your own right.” he nodded amiably.

Liz sat back, the praise delighting her. Red sat back as well, turning his attention to the outside world.

“I wasn’t aware you knew Moore.” a thought occurred. The man in question had glanced up at the portal of the plane before turning aside.

“I didn’t make the connection until I saw the asshat on the tarmac.” Liz admitted.

Red lifted his brows silently waiting for the tale to unfold because he sensed there was one, his interest keen.

“We went through training at the same time. Quantico is a very competitive place.” she shifted comfortably, “It seemed he and I were always pitted against one another in some form or another,” she rolled her eyes, “Isn’t that the way of things. The thing you hate most is always shoved in your face.”

“Who won?”

She looked hurt, “I did!”

Red chuckled his amusement, his hypothesis confirmed.

She leaned closer, “I’m surprised he’s here,” Liz admitted, “on the team, I mean.”

Red glanced back out at the man who was pacing up and down, Wilson following back and forth, speaking animatedly, “Why? Because he’s not worth anything?” he sought her out, “Or you thought he’d be dead by now.”

“Wishful thinking on my part.” she crinkled her nose, “That was tacky... sorry, but,” she sighed under her breath, “You know he never did make any of the top ten spots.”

Red watched the man, his shrewd eyes summing the guy up.

“I overheard one of the instructors talking about him,” Liz had, “Mediocre at best, was the verdict.” she shrugged, “I always wondered how they classified me?”

“Classy and hot.” Red supplied the answer.

She waved a dismissive hand, “Bumbling but game, more like it.”

Red chuckled under his breath, taking a drink from his tumbler.

The guy was getting pissed off at Wilson now, clearly.

“Another said, Moore would be a victim of an unfortunate case of friendly fire.”

A bubble of laughter collected in Red’s chest. He shared a smile with an amused Dembe.

“I have a weapon,” Liz’s eyes narrowed considerably. Moore stalked off, leaving a bewildered Wilson in his wake.

Liz felt sorry for the tall, gangly agent. Wilson seemed so eager to fit in... to belong.

Red broke the woman’s train of though, his fingertips under her stubbornly set chin, “Don’t kill him... just yet.” he cooed lovingly, “Get your badge back and make it legal.”

She smiled, leaning to kiss the lips that had given her a glimmer of hope, “You always give the best advice.”

“I always give the best everything.”

He slowly pulled away as agent by agent filtered through the loading door. He winked at Liz playfully before arising, joining Dembe at the flight deck.

They closed the cockpit door, sharing a private conversation.

Liz smiled brightly to their ‘guests’, “Bar is to left, bathroom... rear,” she motioned much as a flight attendant might, not even realizing the fact.

The engines whirred to life.

She fell immediately silent, hastily buckling her seat belt, her fingers gripping the arm rests tightly, her body tensing.

Red’s low chuckle for the woman’s state was pointedly ignored, “We haven’t even started to move yet.” he eased into his seat grasping her cool fingers in a tight clasp, “You know flying is a much safer mode of transportation than driving.”
“Tell that to the pit of my stomach,” she squeezed his hand in a death grip.

Ressler noted the contact. Red noted Liz noting the fact.

“She hates flying,” he explained the obvious, grimacing slightly as the plane started to move because Liz’s grip had viced-up a notch, “...a lot.”

Ressler glanced once again to the contact. “Man up, Keen.” he remarked, “We all have to go sometime.”

Red sighed heavily, “Not helping,” he tried to wriggle his fingers a little bit.

“Really?” Samar snapped her pique, throwing a disgruntled look Ressler’s way, “Shall we have a discussion about the smell of baby diapers.”

“Oh my God woman,” Ressler’s face turned a sickly green. He wretched visibly as the images conjured, rushed though his minds eye.

Dembe laughed appreciatively for the agent’s discomfort.

“Lizzy, we’ll be perfectly fine,” Red patted her ice cold hand soothingly.

“I know that.” she replied way too fast, her tone clipped.

“Would I let you get on here if I wasn’t sure it was safe?” Red tried again.

“No,” she watched the plane taxi slowly, the ground outside a safe haven she wished she was on at the moment.

“I have this jet serviced at each and every stop to ensure your safety,” he stretched out his legs, purposely taking a relaxed pose.

“That’s nice,” she swallowed hard. The plane was turning onto the runway, “what do you do while we’re in the air,” was a more prevalent question, “you should issue parachutes for your passengers.”

Red held his smile.

“Liz, flying really is very safe these days.” Samar interjected.

“It’s unnatural,” Liz was certain. The plane was positioning for take off. “If God meant man to fly, he would have given us wings.”

“The plane has wings.” Aram pointed to them, his finger falling slowly when Reddington shook his head minutely.

“That frequently fall off.” Liz reminded.

Samar and Aram shared a quiet chuckle.

“I wasn’t going to tell you this...” Red tried another tact, “I know it will probably piss you off.”

Liz turned her head fleetingly. The plane was picking up speed fast.

“It’s something Silas said before we boarded.”

Liz scowled darkly, her head whipping back. “What did he say?” she demanded.
Red held her attention and her eyes willfully, “He said...” the plane lifted effortlessly, gliding through the air with precision accuracy, “be sure and think up something to take the dingbats mind off the lift off... you know how crazy insane she gets.”

Samar compressed her lips, a musical chuckle finally escaping.

Liz was slightly annoyed.

“I’m sorry,” Samar seemed genuine, “but...” she motioned to their present position, “it worked. We’re airborne.”

“And still alive,” Ressler’s tone was slightly superior.

“Baby shit...” Samar gave the man a caustic look and yet another reminder of his own fallacies.

Ressler gagged yet again. Red knew instantly, exactly what Donald Ressler’s Kryptonite was.

“See now, that wasn’t so bad was it?” Red inquired.

“You did that on purpose,” Liz accused, “Silas didn’t even say anything, did he!”

“He did.” Dembe assured.

“Can I have my hand back now?” Red eased the appendage out of Lizzy’s death grip. “I would like to regain feeling in it before we reach Montana if at all possible.”

Liz turned up her nose, “Very funny,” her tone implied otherwise. “It’s perfectly natural to be a little uneasy when flying,” she stated. “There are national statistics on the subject, you know.”

Everyone shared in the easy teasing of the woman except Moore, who sat apart from his contemporaries further back in the plane.

If anyone noted his anti-social behavior, they didn’t remark on the matter.

Wilson kept continuously casting fretful glances to the man, even once or twice trying to draw him into the conversations.

Otherwise, the flight was uneventful.

The plane did not fall down from the sky... no one needed a parachute that Red noted.

After a few drinks, Liz even settled down enough to enjoy a short lived reunion with her friends and colleagues.

Every once in a while, Red would bring up the subject of baby shit just to see Ressler’s reaction.

Stretching back into his seat, Red closed his eyes, relaxing into the warmed leather, “Lizzy...”

“Hmm?” she hummed distractedly.

“You’ll let us know, of course...” he lay his hand on the arm rest in anticipation, “if you see anything on the wing of the plane?”

“Damn you, Reddington!” she bitched, leaning over his seat to look at the wing before clutching his hand like it was a life line.
Chuckling under his breath, Red squeezed her hand back.

All in all, it was a very nice flight.

June 4

It was an idyllic setting in which they drove.

Liz took in the serene countryside with large ‘city girl’ eyes, “I’ve never seen so many trees in my life.”

Red’s mouth quirked. He craned his neck, catching a glimpse of the other SUV behind them.

He decided on white this time. Less conspicuous. More ‘family vacation’ oriented, he hoped. Draw less attention to their presence.

One white, the one he and Lizzy shared, silver.

Dembe maneuvered the vehicle expertly through the two-laned highway system.

“It’s so beautiful out here,” Liz was still entranced by the scenery. She turned her head, seeking him out, “but... why cabins? Is it a prerequisite form of lodging out here?”

“We’re not on Mars, baby,” he quipped, “they do have hotels.” he grinned at her expression. “But no, Lawford bought a retreat just offset to the one we booked.” he explained.

A dark scowl still graced her pretty face.

“What’s the matter? You a ‘city girl’ at heart?” he teased, already knowing the answer. “Afraid there won’t be any Starbucks out here in the wilds.”

Liz sent him a sturdy look, “I’ve roughed it before, Mr. Reddington.” he was assured. “Sam took me fishing all the time.”

“And you complained...” Red remembered the tales, “all the time, you and he were bonding over fish guts.”

Liz sighed peevishly, “I did not.” she lied, “I can clean a carp better than you can.” she imagined.

“Well, good. That’s what we’re having for dinner tonight,” Red sat back, “after you and Dembe catch them.”

Dembe laughed his mirth.

The car fell silent.

Dembe counted in his mind, remembering what Silas had said concerning the woman’s lack of stamina where speech was—
“There really are Starbucks here though, right?” Liz seemed genuinely concerned.

Both men found the remark amusing.

“...No,” she needed an answer, “really.” it was earnestly asked.

Dembe had pulled off on a well-paved road that winded this way and that up into what clearly was, private property.

The metal gate had been opened, welcoming them. But the further they drove, the more evident it was... the area was secluded and very set apart from the open road they previously traveled.

They pulled up into a circular drive and Dembe shut the engine down.

To her right, a spacious lawn stretched into infinity ending gradually, disappearing entirely as mammoth pines and cottonwoods swallowed it up.

Before her stretched majestic mountains towering the bluest sky Liz had ever seen.

She turned her head, her senses stunned by the quiet beauty of an ice blue river which gurgled and danced over boulder like rocks of magnificent hues.

“Oh my God,” she breathed out a sudden fear, “I’m not really going to have to catch dinner...” wide blue eyes full of apprehension sought out an amused Red Reddington, “...am I?”

Red laughed his delight, shaking his head sorrowfully, “Oh dear, Lizzy,” he lamented, “only if I wished to die of starvation.”

“Yeah... is that a no?” she scooted out the car door he had only just exited, lifting inquisitive eyes.

Something more astonishing caught her interest, however, “...Is that...” she accepted his assistance to exit the vehicle, her mouth agape, “your idea of a little cabin in the woods?”

A two-story structure loomed large directly in front of the visitors.

A-framed with an enormous addition stretching out back, elegantly placed into a nearby hillside to blend in with its natural surroundings. Their new lodging took on the scale of a five-star hotel in Liz’s eyes.

Gigantic windows surrounded the stained oak walls affording a spectacular view from all sides of the structure.

A long wrap-around porch with a rustic railing ran the length of the front and west sides.

Sets of colorful rockers welcomed one to sit and enjoy the show Mother Nature provided.

“Oh, Red,” she clasped her hands beneath her chin, eyes bright and shining, “how utterly breathtaking. This isn’t like any cabin I’ve ever seen!”

“Well, I’m not Daniel Boone.” he philosophized having watched for her reaction, pleased he had surprised her.

Ressler pulled his car alongside the other, Agents exiting in droves.

Samar’s lovely face echoed Liz’s delight as she came alongside the woman, “Your United States offers breathtaking beauty, I must admit.”
“Your accommodations are a little further down the drive,” Red showed the woman a spot about two hundred meters away, “It’s up on a hill so catching a signal will be easier and Lawford’s place is just through that patch of Fir.”

“We aren’t staying here?” Ressler was confused.

“Samar is... if she so wishes.” Red lifted the woman’s hand to his lips sparing her his attention for a beat, “you guys will have to rough it.”

“Yeah...” Liz had eyed the second cabin for sometime now, “that place probably doesn’t even have electricity.”

In truth, the second set of accommodations was just as beautiful as the first.

“This cabin only has four bedrooms.” Red explained the problem.

“Only four you say.” Samar managed a sad commiseration face.

“One should seek comfort when at all possible.” Red stated his philosophy.

“There’s comfort,” Moore grumbled, “then there is excess. Is this all on the tax payers dime?”

“It’s on my dime.” Red smiled pleasantly. Never a good sign. “But if it makes you feel any better, I can scrounge up a tent and sleeping bag for your personal use if you would prefer.”

The guy fell silent. Ressler chuckled for Reddington’s comeback.

“No, Mr. Reddington,” Wilson seemed enthralled by the surroundings, on the other hand, “this is simply amazing. It’s very kind of y–”

“Shut up, Wilson.” Moore snapped his irritation.

“Well, it is!” Wilson snapped right back. “And I for one, appreciate the hell out of his generosity. You know something, Moore...” the guy was agitated, “you have no class.” the fact really seemed to bother the agent. “You really don’t.”

All eyes were on Moore.

“What I have is integrity.” Moore’s face was flushed with anger. “Maybe you all should try a little of that once in a while.”

Wilson grimaced, “Whatever.” he grated. “You should try loosening your asshole once in a while.”

Moore stopped in his steps, his mouth falling agape. He wasn’t accustomed to Wilson showing any kind of bravado, especially in connection with him.

“If we help with your bags,” Wilson’s mood brightened, “Mr. Reddington, will you help with ours?”

“You are the diplomat of the group, I see, Agent Wilson,” Red nodded, “An agreeable exchange.”

Dembe popped the hatch.

“After we get settled, we’ll get eyes on Lawford.” Red laid out a plan securing a couple suitcases in hand. “If that is agreeable as well?” he glanced at a sulking Moore. “To all concerned.”

“I’m starving.” Ressler’s stomach was conveying the fact, “Can we order some takeout?”
“I think we can do a little better than that,” Red said, “Lizzy, I’ll get that.” he took the suitcase from her hands.

“Hey, I’m not an invalid.” she resisted his tug.

“Then why are you limping?”

“The ground is uneven.” she flushed feeling Samar’s eyes more than the men’s.

“Your ankle is swollen.” Samar motioned, “At these altitudes, that will be the case.”

Liz looked down, having pushed through the pain for some few hours now. The ride in the car had taken its toll because gravity was working against her.

“I’m going to be a hindrance.” she forewarned. “I should have stayed behind with Silas.”

“I should have stayed behind with Silas.” Samar murmured dejectedly. “No, Liz... you may not be as ambulatory as you like but your input is needed on this one, trust me.”

Red was grateful for the woman’s remarks. He had not heard the one concurring Silas but Liz had, her eyes blinking the shock away in time.

Samar leaned close to share a confidence, “Wilson tries, but he’s green. Moore knows everything so there’s no common ground there. I, for one, am ever so glad you are back on the team.”

Liz beamed her joy, “Really?”

Samar smiled, “Go sit down. Lift that leg.”

“This cabin has a downstairs bedroom,” Red sat the bags down, indicating a room off the main corridor, “Lizzy can navigate here. The bedrooms in your cabin are all upstairs.”

“I miss my cart.” Liz confided to Samar.

“Your what?”

“She has transportation at home but I was forced to take away her keys after she mowed down several of my guards at a very high rate of speed.”

Red had taken the time to harass the young woman. It was one of his favorite pastimes anymore.

“It was only one guard, and he was fine.” Liz aggravated. “You embellish any given story.”

Samar took up for one of her own, “Your guard’s reflex’s are clearly off.”

Red shut his mouth knowing a no-win situation when he heard one.

“Mr. Reddington, where would you like this?” Aram held up a valise.

This was one of those pivotal moments Red had waited for, “Just sit it on the bar, Aram. Thank you.” he motioned, “I’ll probably just camp out on the couch there.”

The L-shaped divan was a sprawling sectional constructed of cushy leather and sensible pillows thrown about.

“In case Lizzy might need me.” he smiled pleasantly.
“We have a system down.” Liz interjected. “But... I can take the couch. I’m smaller and smarter than you.” she smiled pleasantly right back.

Samar chuckled.

“I can see the writing on the wall.” Red nodded sagely. The women were forming a tight-knit bond already. “We’ve had this conversation a hundred times before... minus the intellect remark... your leg will be cramped on the couch.”

“Your entire body will be cramped.” she continued, each knowing very well just where Red Reddington would be laying his head this night.

It was a show to be played out for the others, nothing more.

“I’ve slept in worse places.”

Aram chuckled at the bickering.

“He also sleeps with a gun, can you believe it?” Liz confided to those present. “Slept in a chair one night, woke up complaining about a peculiar pain in his side.”

Red took the good-natured jabbing in his stride.

“Well, yeah,” Ressler nodded knowingly, “this surprises you?”

Laughter erupted from those gathered.

“What?” the agent was lost, “What’d I say?”

Liz turned to Red, her eyes softening for the discomfort he had suffered on her behalf.

“Peas in a pod.” she murmured.

“Get off the leg and ice it.” he shrugged off the gratitude clearly shining in her blue eyes.

“Get off that leg and ice it.” she mimicked playfully, “He’s so bossy.” she crinkled her nose over at Samar.

“In a nice way.” Samar reminded, her tone a gentle one, “Enjoy it while you can.”

Liz shrugged, finding a comfortable spot on the divan, “Oh look, Red,” she propped her leg dutifully, “an ottoman.”

She lifted innocent eyes.

The man’s deepened, “She has a thing for ottoman’s” he smiled tightly at Ressler whose expression was quizzical... and confused, “Freaky really.”

“I’ll say,” Ressler agreed, looking at the woman oddly, “You’ve changed.”

“Have I?” Liz queried, “For the better, I hope.”

“Jury is still out.” Ressler decided.

Liz chuckled lowly accepting the ice from Red’s hands, “Service with a smile?”
“You move from that spot before I return...” he warned, “you don’t get... dessert.”

Liz picked up the man’s double entendre, narrowing her eyes at him.

Samar barked her amusement, “Oh, that is just cruel and unusual punishment.”

“I know her weaknesses,” Red held Liz’s willful stare easily, “no fruit cup for you.”

“Thank you, Nurse Diesel.” Liz imparted sarcastically, “You’re so strict.”

“You like that... right?”

“If I don’t get any...” she left him hanging for a beat, sending the guy a message, “neither do you.”

Ressler sniggered catching the reference.

Samar sent him a look that quieted his mirth.

“Go get your guests settled,” Liz grumbled, having been bested and knowing it. “Ressler has infected me... I’m suddenly hungry.” she waved him off as if shooing a fly.

“Gentlemen, and I use the term loosely.” Red gestured towards the door following the slowly filing agents to the exit.

Samar waved goodbye to her contemporaries, “I’m gonna stake out the best bedroom upstairs.” she hurried up giggling as Dembe rushed past her in attempt to top the stairs first.

“I actually believed you to be a gentleman, Dembe.” she cleared the first landing a second behind the man.

Dembe waved a gracious hand indicating she should proceed him.

She inclined her head regally before once again making a race of it, her look a mischievous one.

Dembe renewed the good natured rivalry lagging behind purposely, Liz knew as she had watched the play.

“Rest that leg.” Red’s warm breath thrilled her nape and ear lobe. He had tarried just enough to give her fair warning.

He braced himself on the back of the couch, leaning dangerously close.

“I want to fuck you later...” his sensual demand titillated and teased causing the special spot between her legs to twinge with delicious awareness of his abilities, “hard and fast so... you better be ready.”

He pushed off the couch, heading out the door without a backward glance.

Liz watched him move with that confident swagger easing his body forward.

She blew out a tremulous breath as the door snapped closed behind him.

Pushing restlessly at the seam of her pants, she eased the ache the man had created... just barely.

“He always has to have the last word.” she mused.
It was going to be a long damned night.

Ressler had established a workable routine within an hour of their arrival and settling in.

They had spotted the target arriving at his resort shortly after the Agents set up their equipment but then, the guy just as hastily hauled his ass back in his Landrover and headed out to parts unknown.

“I told you guys one of us should get our ass down there.” Ressler groused moodily.

“Our vehicles are too conspicuous.” Red vetoed the idea. “Dembe will pick up a Jeep while we’re in town, but relax,” he continued, “Lawford is just going for supplies I’ll wager. Which is what we should do as well.”

“Hey, if the house is empty,” Aram held up his electronic gadgets pointing to the area across the sparse thicket, “Now would be a good time for me to tap into his systems.”

Ressler felt better, “You’re sure the guy is coming back?”

Red called his own computer expert who tapped in to Lawford’s GPS which located him in town, a short distance away.

Thirty minutes later, job accomplished on Aram’s part, they all headed out for dinner. Finally.

Driving back through the scenic surroundings, Dembe pulled up to a cozy-looking restaurant.

“Oh, no...” Liz muttered dejectedly seeing the long line of waiting customers. “Uh, Red,” she lamely pointed to the lengthy line, “my stomach thinks my throat has been cut.” she held her stomach trying to halt the rumbling.

Red smiled, helping her from the car as Liz’s team pulled alongside them. They had all changed into more casual clothing to better fit in.

“I hope they come out with an appetizer tray.” Ressler said, looking around for another place to eat.

“Oh, ye of little faith.” Red motioned, leading his ensemble to the front of the line.

Which did not set well with one of the locals. A big guy with a mean looking expression on his face.

“Hey buddy!” he carped as Red passed, “The line starts,” he jerked a thumb, “back there.”

Liz’s fingers dug into Reddington’s arm, her body tensing. She cast a hasty glance up to Red’s striking profile, her look a worried one.

How would he handle this situation, with her team present... law enforcement agents who would be put in an awkward position if the matter wasn’t handled with the greatest finesse.

“Not to worry.” Red patted Liz’s hand absently. “I’ll only be a minute.” he had waved Dembe’s intended assistance aside as well.

Red sized the guy up, “Couple hints of advice,” he stepped right up the guy’s position, eyeing him stare for belligerent stare although Red’s own expression was more than amiable, at present.
Liz knew how that could change in a flash.

“It’s always pleasant when a man takes the time and effort, if only for his lovely lady’s sake,” Red smiled brightly at the man’s companion, “to make reservations in advance... that she does not have such a tedious wait in line...”

Several wives and sweethearts gave their husbands and dates a frosty glare at the news conveyed.

“Secondly,” he made note of all the overly interested stares they were receiving which clearly unnerved the belligerent guy’s companion, “you want to impress the lady?” Red waved his hand, “Don’t draw unnecessary attention her way.”

The man glanced, even he taking note of the woman’s embarrassment.

Red pulled his wallet free, holding a couple twenties aloft for a cab.

The woman snatched them gratefully, slipping off into the crowd, making a hasty retreat from all the attention garnered.

The guy seemed stunned by the turn of events, “Angela, wait–”

Red put a solid hand of the guy’s shoulder when he would have hurried after his date.

Reddington’s eyes were different, cold and empty suddenly, “Never put a woman in such a predicament again...” his tone matched his eyes, “you just never know... who you will come up against next.”

“Yeah, like the FBI’s fourth most wanted.” Ressler muttered under his breath.

Something in Red’s demeanor alerted the loud-mouth to his mistake. The man swallowed hard, taking off at a clipped pace to salvage what he could from the situation he had created.

Red turned, all grace and poise, the smile back on his face, as if the incident had never even occurred, “What an amazing place–”

Liz lifted her head, proud to be on the arm of a real gentleman who knew exactly how a lady should be treated.

“Shall we begin our adventure?” he escorted the ensemble following along at an easy pace.

Liz’s eyes were drawn to an older man who had exited the establishment and now waited patiently at the doors.

“Red,” he grinned, offering a hand of welcome, “teaching the locals some manners, are we?”

“Probably not.” Red had already dismissed the matter, taking the hand offered, “Greg, this is Elizabeth,” he waved a fan-fare of a hand, “my fiancée... and some of our friends.”

Introduction were made by name. Though Red stumbled over Moore’s name. The habitual urge to call him ‘asshole’ biting at Red’s tongue.

Greg led the group inside, down the atmospheric aisles of his domain, “The private room,” he gestured to a secluded area of the restaurant, “your waiters and sommelier are in attendance.”

“Superb.” Red was happy again.
“Ohh...” Liz clasped her hands together.

A gigantic window afforded a magnificent view overlooking a crystal blue lake set amid a towering forest of crisp, green trees.

“How lovely a setting.” Samar smiled her pleasure.

“I am so pleased it pleases you.” Greg was a consummate host, seating the woman himself, leaving Red to assist Liz.

“I’m simply overcome by the views.” Wilson mimicked the women’s reaction.

“Well, hell...” Ressler pulled out a seat for the man with a flourish, “take a seat, buddy.”

Both men laughed at the shared moment.

“You’re both amusing... assholes.” Samar took the jesting in stride.

Elizabeth made a face at the two.

“One must choose one’s friends carefully.” Red quipped to Greg Forester. “As you can see, I learned that lesson too late in life.”

Greg chuckled, “I know, Red. Don’t forget... I’ve met Francis.”

Samar managed a beautiful pout for Red’s slight concerning his friends.

“Not you, of course.” Red soothed instantly. “Present female company excluded.”

Samar flashed him a grin, “Always the perfect gentleman.”

“Nobody’s perfect.” Moore managed under his breath but Ressler heard, sending the guy a caustic look and a veiled suggestion...

“Lighten the hell up.”

Red took his designated seat next to Lizzy having waited for Dembe to seat himself as usual, apart from the rest.

He grinned for the man’s ways, shaking his head, “Dembe, I think on this occasion, you may join us.” he swept the room meaningfully. “We have enough collective fire power between us to overtake a third world country.”

Dembe waved the request off, his ever vigilant eyes scanning and re-scanning the area they occupied and beyond.

Red sighed mentally, knowing a losing battle when he fought one, “He is so conscientious.”

Liz cast a fond glance Dembe’s way, “He is that.”

“I will check on you periodically.” Greg inclined his head to his guests. “Enjoy your evening. If there is anything you wish, please simply ask.”

Liz watch the man’s exit, “I understand he is an associate,” she took for granted, “what in God’s name is he doing up here, so off-the-beaten path?”
Red leaned closer, “Trade routes.” came the simple reply. “The border patrol between the US and Canada is, shall we say... lax? In this particular area.”

Menus were supplied. Red was handed a wine list which he now perused studiously.

Liz scanned the variety of selections, her brow crinkling quizzically. She checked Red’s menu shifting a questioning stare. There were no price lists available.

“He owed me a favor.” he smiled over at the confused woman.

“How much does this stuff cost?” Ressler had questions of his own. He flipped the menu back and forth, his eyes scanning the pages.

“Order whatever you please, Donald.” Red continued his own perusal of selections. “Their fresh caught trout is to die for.”

Ressler was clearly uneasy with the situation.

“Would you rather have a burger and fries?” Red teased. “A footlong chili dog, perhaps?”

“I intend to order from every selection offered.” Dembe had evidently cast his decision, mentally ticking off items in his head.

Red laughed outright.

“Is that a challenge?” Liz took up the cause, hoping to make everyone else feel more comfortable.

“If I had a gauntlet,” Dembe lifted his noble head, “I would throw it down.”

“Oh, it is so on, fella.” Liz went back to her menu with a vengeance. “Well, I’m starting with an appetizer but I’m going to build from there.” she mused openly.

Red chuckled, “I’m duly warned.”

“That trout actually sounded delicious.” Aram fell into the spirit.

“It is superb.” Red encouraged, his spirits lifted as Lizzy’s friends rallied.

Moore grumbled his discontent, pulling forty dollars from his wallet, tossing it to the table, “I’ll pay my own way.”

Red genuinely was amused, “Not with that meager amount, you won’t.” he sat back, spreading his hands wide, “My God man, look around you... you couldn’t even walk through the doorway of this establishment for that sum.”

Ressler snapped his breadstick in two, his look a murderous one. Even he had picked up on the slight offered their host.

“You aren’t at the Outback Steakhouse,” Red explained, “Not that I don’t frequent the place myself, I do but...really?”

“Yeah, Moore,” Samar batted languid lids, “show a little class why don’t you?”

“If we all put in a forty,” Wilson was calculating on his phone, his expression a serious one, “will that be a good enough tip at least?”
Red laughed his delight. It had been a long time since he gave thought to such things, “I apologize.” he even included Moore in the gesture, “I should have explained beforehand... this is entirely my treat. I chose this place. I thought it was understood. The host always pays.”

Liz’s heart warmed for the man. That he was offering to pay for her friends meant a great deal to her. “I would be incredibly insulted otherwise.” he turned cold eyes Moore’s way, “And since this is supposed to be a pleasant outing, let’s endeavor to keep it that way, shall we?”

“No more talk of money.” Liz beamed hastily. “It’s settled. Please.” she pleaded her case. “It’s such a nice place and the food just smells heavenly... can’t we just all have a good time and forget about formalities for one evening?”

Moore opened his mouth. “Have a freaking breadstick.” Ressler snapped the object the man’s way. Moore for once, kept his peace, although reluctantly, Liz could tell. “It beats eating off the government dime.” Ressler inclined his head graciously in thanks to his host.

Liz squeezed Red’s hand tightly under the table, a sure sign she was pleased at Ressler’s gesture. Red sent the man a nod in return. He and Ressler often butted heads, and he knew that would not change. But in this instance, he was grateful for the man’s tact, if only for Elizabeth’s sake.

The dinner proceeded with no further incident, thankfully.

Wilson playfully kept track of whether or not Liz was outdoing Dembe, pigging-out wise. As Red was later to comment, wine flowed, good conversation abounded as God’s creative abilities delighted the senses.

Liz thought he had summed it up perfectly.

She had missed her friends, and it was good to be back with them. Her life had been so busy and fulfilling with Red, she hadn’t paid attention to anything other than living in the moment.

She had changed in so many ways she had not realized. Samar mentioned the fact even.

Liz tried everything suggested in the way of appetizers, wines or food, for example.

“You never would have that before.” Samar had motioned to the bite Reddington had slid to Liz’s plate for her to try that was summarily eaten without hesitation. “You were strictly a meat and potatoes kind of gal.”

“Was I?” Liz asked around the delectable morsel, astonishment in her tone. “...No...” she disagreed. “Yeah.” Samar debated. “Remember when I brought in that pot-luck for Aram’s birthday a couple months back?”

“It was delicious.”

“You barely touched it.” Samar laughed. “And now look at you. Association with Reddington had broadened your outlook.”
Liz sought out Red’s opinion, “Told you I was good for you.”

Liz was given pause for thought. She suddenly realized, life with Tom Keen had been rather routine.

Friday nights, dinner at the Italian bistro. Saturday’s, Thai food. Starbuck’s in the morning before work, comfort food at night for dinner. Chinese takeout was written in stone.

Was there anything wrong with that though?

She looked around her present surroundings.

She was momentarily confused over the matter.

Was she more content now and if so... why?

She studied Red’s profile.

He sensed her interest, those grey-blue eyes turning her way, a question in them as well.

“...Was I boring before?”

“I didn’t say you were boring.” Samar interjected.

Liz needed the man’s input, however.

“I would never assign that adjective to you.” Red stated. “What’s this about?” he had missed some of the conversation.

“I told her... her interests had broadened.” Samar explained. “Which is a very good thing.”

“Self-growth is always a good thing.” Red agreed. “For anyone.”

Liz felt better, “I’m just hungry.” she stuffed another hors d’oeuvre in her mouth, letting the subject go for now. “Try one of these.” she held the treat aloft.

“So did I.” she was not understanding. “You don’t see it slowing me down, do ya?”

He accepted the finger sandwich, the tip of his tongue darting out to caress her fingers lovingly.

Liz blinked having felt the delicate sweep. She swallowed, quickly covering the moment.

“Would you like to try a stuffed mushroom?” she asked brightly.

He leaned closer to inspect the selection on the decorative tray, speaking for her alone, “I’d like to sample you.”

He shifted her an erotic glance.

“Oh...” she murmured breathlessly. She straightened, gathering her wits, “F-Francis would have said he’d like to stuff my mushroom.”

Red snorted softly under his breath, shaking his head knowing a truth when he heard one, “What the hell does that even mean?”

“I don’t know...” Liz giggled.
Red collected a few tidbits, popping one in his mouth before sitting back to continue his interrupted conversation with Dembe.

Red was pleased the agents had not once fallen back on shop talk this evening.

He was well aware of the dour mood and reason behind Moore’s refusal to accept the situation now at hand.

Personally, he would have enjoyed taking the asshole out back, beating the shit out of him and leaving his carcass hung up in a tree somewhere for the bears to play with but...

Lizzy would then have to deal with the consequences of such actions.

Whether she wanted to admit it or not, there would be repercussions concerning the attachment they now shared.

Whether those repercussions were in the form of Moore’s tactics tonight... vague, cruel innuendos or the unmistakable disapproving looks the fucker was constantly giving over to Elizabeth... it did not matter.

They would be damning to her.

She had her friends about her this particular evening. They were softening Moore’s slights. Lizzy could shrug it off...chalk it up to ‘consider the source’.

But what would she do, how would she handle it, were it Cooper, say... being forced to address the issue.

If Moore followed through on his obvious disapproval for the relationship he was witnessing between Red and Liz... criminal prosecution was a definite possibility Lizzy would have to face.

Cooper would deflect as much as possible, of course, but Moore was a ‘by-the-book’, ‘don’t step out of boundaries’ kind of asshole. He would give anything to crucify Elizabeth.

Red could spot them a mile away.

People so deathly afraid to step outside their own comfort zone, they envied and even hated those that had the courage and foresight to take that leap of faith. They lacked something vital inside themselves.

It would be no problem to rid the world of one less fucker, of course, but how many would Lizzy face in the future if word of their true relationship surfaced.

Even Mr. Kaplan could not clean up that big a mess.

Lizzy would find herself in a world of trouble all because she associated herself with him and his organization.

Red looked about the table measuring each individual present.

Ressler? He started out by-the-book. Ressler would blame Reddington, not Liz for any infraction of rules broken. But he would still expect her to act the part of a professional agent.

Samar? She would applaud ‘fuck buddy’ status but anything more? She had standards she adhered to, and she expected no less of any other female agent. Sex was a tool Samar took advantage of but no true emotions were to come into play... ever.
Aram would hurt Lizzy the most and he would be hurt in return. He might surprise though. Red was still considering which direction the man might go.

He honestly hadn’t given Wilson much thought, but he seemed to be a doppelgänger for Ressler and being a stickler for the rules.

Seeing Lizzy with her friends this afternoon only cemented Red’s feeling concerning the need to conceal his and Lizzy’s true involvement.

She had been adamant earlier today. Perhaps losing her position at the FBI wouldn’t concern her all that much. But it would affect any other position she attempted to secure.

Red wasn’t sure why she felt the need to work but it was clear, she was independent and would hate not making her own way in the world.

She had grown accustomed to the instant acceptance his world offered. Francis, Mark, Dembe... while they encouraged their romantic entanglement, it would not be so with the outside world and Red sensed as much.

Red could whisk her out of the country before ink dried on ‘criminal charges pending’ papers. Set her up with a new identity? It was second nature to the man by now but at what cost to their relationship?

Would Lizzy eventually blame him for destroying the life she had made for herself before he came into the picture?

Leaving her established life would cause strain, he knew from experience just how much. Elizabeth had no concept.

Would she tire of the stress? Would she want him out of her life?

There had to be a middle ground. He would find it.

He had no choice.

The man was jostled from his thoughts, sighing his disgruntlement.

He lifted his attention moving subtly away from the intentional contact.

The waitress smiled down in a beguiling manner, “Is everything to your satisfaction, Sir?”

Had she meant the overt brushing of her ample breast against his shoulder or the meal and service provided.

Her look told him, it was the former.

Red shook his head, slightly bemused. Was he putting off some sort of pheromone which drew the opposite sex to him?

It was true, he wanted sex all freaking day but... really. This was getting ridiculous. True, he complained before but... he checked with Lizzy.

How things changed. A year ago, this would certainly not have been a problem.

Lizzy’s eyes held a certain sly amusement. She obviously picked up on the interchange.
Well, of course she had. It was just that type of day.

The waitress was attractive. She even had Lizzy’s dark hair and blue eyes but... she was not Elizabeth Keen.

Red had the real deal, sitting right here beside him. And even better, she would be warming his bed and other vital parts of his anatomy... later.

If he played his cards right, at this moment.

The waitress was not making his job easy. She leaned across him, a definite breach of etiquette, to secure Lizzy’s plate for removal.

“I am here to please.”

Even though the remark was directed to all concerned, Red felt an odd tick jerk his face because the woman’s smile was just for him.

“Anything you wish, you just have to ask.”

Ressler halted his fork half-way to his mouth.

Each male present felt the current run through the room.

Yes, even Moore, who squirmed about, shifting in his seat.

Wilson tugged at his brightly colored tie.

Aram blotted his brow with his cloth napkin.

Dembe sipped his wine deliberately.

Red sighed heavily, “We’re fine, thank you.” he addressed the situation head-on. “We’re wrapping up here... it’s about time to go.”

The woman’s face fell. She retreated silently into the kitchen.

Red shook his head minutely, musing quietly.

“I think she likes you.” Liz made mention, dabbing her mouth primly to hide her smile.

“You crushed her hopes.” Samar scolded.

“Seriously,” the man wanted to know. Red spread his hands helplessly. “Am I doing something?”

“You are not.” Dembe replied evenly, his attention rapt on his dessert.

“You’re just being you.” Liz shrugged. “I think they scent the masculinity.” she nodded knowingly, her lips quivering with delight for his predicament.

“Or the money.” Samar added her two-cents, sensing Liz’s amusement.

“Could be,” Liz leaned, sniffing lightly, “my God, he does smell like a crisp hundred-dollar bill.”

“Only a hundred?” Red wasn’t going to be topped. “I must speak with my tailor.”

“You guy’s talking about the waitress making eyes at Reddington?” Ressler dove into the fray, popping fried shrimp into his mouth.

“How very astute of you, Donald.” Red lifted a frigid stare. “Thanks for the help here.”

“I’m surprised she hasn’t ‘accidentally’,” Liz air-quoted, “fallen into his lap.”

“Or just ‘accidentally’,” Samar couldn’t resist air-quoting as well, “pressed his face between her breasts.”

“You missed that?” Liz tittered. “A few minutes past?”

Both women shared a chuckle.

Red eyed them belligerently.

Normally, Liz might have been upset by the totally uncalled for behavior concerning the waitress. Some women had a lot of gall.

She realized, early on, that incidents involving Red Reddington where her species was concerned would probably be many and varied.

But really... while his woman was right there at the same table?

Can we say... tacky?

Red was so obviously put out over it and ill-at-ease in this instance, she could kind of take it in her stride.

Maybe Aram summed the matter up best as he concentrated diligently, twirling a lengthy pasta dish about his fork...

“Maybe she just wants a good tip?”

The comment broke the tension, all sharing a good laugh over the issue... all except Moore, of course.

“She wants more than the ‘tip’ of something.” Samar joked, bringing a vivid blush to Aram’s cheeks.

A peculiar lurch pitted Elizabeth’s stomach which had her clutching her fork abnormally tight for a few seconds.

She sought out Red Reddington. He looked so dapper this evening in his grey linen suit and darker pin-stripe vest.

But when did the guy not look good? Her eyes drifted involuntarily to the matching slacks... more specifically, to the junction where his legs met.

She knew exactly what that fabric covered.

Suddenly, Liz couldn’t blame the waitress for how she must feel.

Red was a very attractive man in every sense of the word.

Liz’s brows furrowed slightly. Did she used to be so sexually charged? She had never have a lover like Red.
Everything about the man screamed ‘male’.

Even now, sitting this close, his cologne was sensually stimulating.

The way his hand would reach every so often to cover hers, to squeeze gently as if he needed constant contact.

Was she just being fanciful?

Liz only knew, she would be the one going home with him tonight. She would be the one feeling his kisses, his caresses.

As much as they made love of late, one would think, she would have had her fill but that was not the case at all.

She never tired of his advances, of him wanting her.

Would he... tire of it all eventually and want to move on?

How many women had he made love to? Could one woman hope to satisfy such an eclectic lover?

“Problem?” Red had watched the emotions flit across the pretty face. “You don’t really think I’m interested in—” he crooked his head.

Liz smiled brightly, “You better not be.” she teased lightning her mood.

“Don’t complain about anything yet.” Wilson was holding up his glass of red wine. “This hasn’t been empty all evening.”

“The important things in life.” Red nodded his agreement, his hand squeezing Liz’s gently.

The woman noted the contact, her smile softening.

“Take one for the team, Reddington.” Ressler chuckled for the other man’s predicament. “Good service is hard to come by these days.”

Red smiled absently, his heart not even in the conversation. Liz’s skin felt so warm and soft.

He knew her entire body was... warm and soft with deliciously hidden alcoves of sensual delight.

He wished all these people would simply disappear for a spell... that he could be alone with the woman.

Make love to her under the watchful eye of these magnificent surroundings.

Maybe mountain air really did stimulate the appetite...

He only knew he was sexually charged right now... was that what the waitress was picking up on?

Was it a tangible force people could sense?

Those at the table seemed oblivious, thankfully.

Dropping his hand subtly to Liz’s thigh area, he allowed his palm to rest casually on the fabric of her short skirt.

The others were discussing the merits of fly-fishing versus deep-sea fishing.
Samar, surprisingly, was adamantly defending her views on the matter.

“You’ve been deep-sea fishing?” Moore clearly was skeptical.

“Swordfish off the coast of Greece, just last year.” she was proud of her accomplishment.

“Did you catch anything?” Moore baited.

Red flipped the flouncy skirt aside, shifting comfortably in his seat, his thumb probing as his fingers slid up the silk of Lizzy’s inner thigh.

“A hell of a cold.” the woman laughed at herself. “It rained the entire time we were there but it was exhilarating.” Samar’s eyes were bright and alive. “The ocean was angry and the fish... so magnificent. I was glad it broke the line, in reality.”

Liz swallowed hard, trying desperately to concentrate on cutting her chicken into precise pieces.

Red’s fingers brushed the lace of her panties directly over a spot he should not.

He smiled slowly.

He was positive just by the slight touch that little labia was already plump with arousal.

Perhaps Lizzy wanted more than just the tip of something substantial as well as the waitress.

He would gladly oblige the minute they were alone. He was relishing the idea, in fact.

“That looks good.” his eyes dropped to the confines of her lap. Liz knew instinctively he did not mean the meal.

“It is.” she parried, smiling sweetly at him, breaking from her trance-like state. “It's very... tender.” she squirmed a little under the constant, deliberate pressure his fingers exuded, “Very... moist.”

Red grunted a primal response, his eyes flaming to life, “I know...” he soothed expertly, “so is mine.”

Again, he wasn’t talking about the food.

Liz glanced at his half-eaten steak absently, her bare foot sliding slowly along his leg, feeling the roughness of the abundant hair found there.

It was Red’s turn to smile.

She had her way of playing... he had his.

He pushed in on the puffy slit, massaging carefully for a beat.

She tensed at the excruciating pleasure, shivering slightly in his wake.

“How are you cold?” he was instantly solicitous, removing his jacket, settling it about her shoulders.

But in doing so, he had taken away the exquisite feeling, much to her dismay.

She lifted luminous eyes, “That will get you into all sorts of trouble.” he predicted for the unconscious pout of reprimand.

“What are you doing there, Aram?” Red made the pretense of leaning over to crane his neck, seemingly interested in the computer geek’s diagram he was sketching on a convenient cocktail
Liz felt Red’s hand slip back to its former resting place.

She cursed herself as her legs spread willingly of the own volition.

Aram rattled on about something to do with their surveillance on Lawford.

Red’s head nodded sagely, his attention... elsewhere as his fingers hooked the rim of her panties, sliding under the lace.

Liz swallowed hard, her body tense and enthralled by his actions.

Her trimmed little bush teased the tips of his fingers.

Nodding critically at Ressler’s remarks concerning the pros and cons of Aram’s plans, Red ‘teased’ her right back, flicking Lizzy’s clit drawing a drop of wetness from her center.

He enjoyed the grunt of arousal he produced.

Slowly rimming the tiny hole, he drew the wetness across the length of that sweet nub, circling the swollen bump lovingly.

“I think we’re all on the same page here.” Red smiled happily to those gathered, including his ‘victim’ in the scan, “Right?”

“Yes, Liz...” Samar wanted Liz’s input as well, the brown eyes earnestly seeking the younger woman out, “what do you think?”

Liz’s eyes snapped to her teammates.

She had no idea of the response needed having lost track of the conversation moments back.

Why were they singling her out? She wasn’t even on active duty yet.

“I agree with... the consensus.”

Samar nodded, clearly pleased with the reply.

Ressler resumed his meal.

Liz had dodged the bullet on that one. She sent Red Reddington an annoyed glare.

He smiled amiably, sliding his middle finger unceremoniously forward into the hot depths of her body.

Liz practically gasped. Her traitorous center sliding forward almost greedily to accept the invasion.

Red seemed to sense as much, his finger began an excruciatingly slow rhythm inside her body.

“Lawford...” Red frowned superficially, “you’re wanting to catch him in the act of... what exactly? Why is he so special?”

Ressler sat down his fork, leaning his forearms into the table explaining his reasons for getting involved..

Red would bring Liz to the edge of orgasm by his calculated thrusts only to back off at just the exact moment her body was ripe, wanting desperately to complete the delicious pang of unrequited lust.

“So you see, it’s not only the rise of crime in the area,” the man continued, “it’s the civilians getting caught in the crossfire,” Ressler explained, “that my friend has been trying to catch Lawford for years.”

Liz squirmed into Red’s activities.

“If we can follow Lawford, listen in to what he’s doing...” the man further explained, “maybe we’ll have a large piece of the puzzle we’ve been missing to shut him down.”

“That would be quite a coup.” Red admitted. “But that’s not all... is it?” He knew Donald too well.

While Red was not in the business of harming innocents, both men were aware that casualties happened. There was more to the story than what Ressler was telling him and Red had a pretty good inkling what it may be.

Ressler’s jaw tightened, his eyes scanning the table. Moore left moments ago for the men’s room. Wilson... he didn’t exactly trust yet, but the opportunity presented itself and he would not waste it.

“It is also of a personal nature.” Ressler conceded. “This piss ant Lawford put a hit on my friend’s son.”

“Was this son’s work involved with the mob?” Red wanted to know.

“He’s the D.A going after Lawford’s organization.” Ressler stated.

“The one in the papers recently?” Wilson was connecting the dots. “The one out of Chicago? Scott Benton, right?”

Ressler nodded.

Red knew of the situation, had been keeping tabs. He was aware of the invasion Lawford and his men had been making on the D.A’s life. More specifically, his family’s life.

Graffiti on the house. Tripped alarms at night. General nuisances that most would write off as minor incidents.

But Benton’s wife knew better and they were scaring her. Rightfully so, since Red knew they would only escalate. These were just warnings. If Benton didn’t back off...

It was one thing to threaten D.A. Benton. It was another to get his wife and child involved in the mess.

Red eyed the younger man, his focus intent. “Who is Benton to you?”

Ressler sighed, “Michael Benton is my mentor.” he replied. “I took the same criminal justice classes in college with Scott, his son.”

Red sighed as he felt the tiny quiver of Lizzy’s beginning climax on his finger building ever so slowly as he reluctantly slid free.

Liz’s bereft moan silenced the conversation, all eyes turned her way.

Red leaned, murmuring softly in her ear, “Not to worry, baby,” he soothed, his eyes lit with an inner flame, “you’ll get the dessert I promised.” he stated a little louder.
Liz blinked, unfocused, her body crying out for fulfillment.

Red twisted, grabbing the waitress’s attention, “Desserts all around.” he motioned accordingly to those gathered at the table, returning to Elizabeth solicitously. “There now... all better?”

His expression altered visibly as he made a pretense of situating his napkin on his thigh, “Don’t look now... and this means you, Donald...” Red eyed the man in warning, “but the man of the hour just strolled in.”

“He doesn’t know you, right?” Ressler’s tone was tight.

“Only in passing. Not enough to exchange pleasantries.” Red casually settled his arm along the back on Lizzy’s chair, “Don’t worry. Even if he recognizes me, I’m here with some associates having a pleasant sit-down.” he reminded. “Does he know you?”

Ressler shook his head, “No,” he assured, “I only did some background for Benton.”

When Lawford had settled at a table, each agent took their time in scrutinizing the target up close and personal so to speak.

The waitress sat a cart of various dessert selections close by.

Selections were made and coffee brought.

Red noted Lizzy’s quietness, amused by her subdued manner, “Have I broken your spirit?” he murmured lowly for her ears alone.

She lifted blue eyes full of animosity and sullen exasperation.

“Didn’t think so.” he stated.

Retribution was in order but her ire, he could weather. The time teasing that little hole was worth any price he had to pay.

They lingered at the restaurant for a bit longer, vaguely listening in on Lawford making lame overtures to his mistress leaving Red, in particular, ready to vacate.

“On that note...” he pushed his chair back, rising. He noted Lizzy’s stifled yawn as well.

She was tired. Jet lag had set in. All the agents were better accustomed to traveling. Lizzy had gotten out of the habit of late.

Besides, he desperately needed time alone with the woman.

Ressler had worked up a schedule. He favored working with Samar. They would take the second shift, so the woman would be returning with Red and Liz this night.

Dembe drove the short distance to the cabin, parking in the garage, allowing a shorter distance for Liz to traverse. Though, Samar was the one trudging tiredly into the house.

“I hope you don’t think I’m rude,” the dark-haired agent yawned, “but I’m going to catch some sleep before my shift.”

Liz smiled, as she eased from the back seat, “Goodnight.”

Samar gave a tired wave, pushing her way inside, leaving the three of them alone.
Red stopped short in his tracks as his phone broke the silence as the three made their way to the entrance of the cabin.

Liz halted her steps, hesitantly.

“Greg,” Red put all concerned at ease, “didn’t I leave a large enough gratuity?”

He listened politely, a smile breaking his lips. He lifted a scolding stare, “You forgot your purse.”

Liz gasped, realizing the object was indeed missing. She dropped her head woefully, sighing for her forgetfulness.

“No...I’ll come back and fetch it.” Red settled the issue. “I’m just a few minutes away. Thank you. I appreciate your kindness.”

Dembe headed back to the driver side.

“No,” Red waved him off, “get some rest. I’ll be back before you know it. Really.”

His look reassured the other man, “I don’t mind, Raymond.”

Red waved again, “You need to sleep.” he frowned, “I know you didn’t sleep very well last night.”

Dembe sighed, before acquiescing. “If you should need me...” he said before disappearing through the door.

“Please tell me...” Red turned on Liz, something coming to mind, “you didn’t have your badge tucked away in–”

Liz shook her head, “Truth?” she looked bemused, “I forget it most days. Odd, I never would have gone anywhere without it before.”

She wondered what that meant?

“I’ll be just a few if you–”

“No,” Liz shook her head, reaching for the passenger door, “no, I’ll go with you. I left it there so...”

“You don’t have to go, baby.” Red reminded her yet again.

“You hoping to see that little waitress again?” she half-teased. Red rolled his eyes, shutting the door on her quiet giggling.

“You know...” she looked longingly at the spacious area, “I would turn you in for a chance to put this damned leg up for a spell.”

He chuckled, “You can be bought. I always suspected as much.”

“For the right price,” she shrugged, “and the price on your head....” she whistled brightly.

Liz slid out of the car before Red could think to assist. She scooted the length of the seat bracing her back against the darkened tint of the side window.

“I hate this boot.” she removed it, stretching her toes, massaging the tight muscle in her leg, “I hate the crazy bastard that put me back in it... more than I already did.”

That was an understatement. “I not only hate him,” Red seethed, “I want him dead.”

“You and me both.” Liz groaned as the muscle relented to the incessant kneading, “but you didn’t hear me say that. You know... since I’m a federal agent and all.”

Red smirked, “One who forgets her badge.” he snickered when the woman huffed indignantly. “You said it, not me.” he reminded. “When does that thing come off again?” he rapidly changed subjects.

Liz glanced at the dreaded thing, “I would like to accidentally lose it out here in the wilds.” she surveyed a suitable spot. “Would you rat me out?”

“In a heartbeat, sweetheart.” Red pulled the car onto the two-lane highway, “Because it’s good to follow the doctor’s orders.”

“Which you do at every opportunity.” she reminded tongue-in-cheek.

“My doctor is usually Kaplan.” he reminded, “if she really wants me to stay put and I don’t do as she says, she will shoot me.”

“Defeats the purpose.”

“But gets her point across quite aptly.” Red chuckled for the irony.

Liz sighed, glad to be rid of the cumbersome weight.

“Did Ressler assign me a shift?” her voice filtered from the back after a time. “I dozed off somewhere between the reenactment of the Alamo and the fly-fishing.” she quipped.

“You aren’t on active duty.” Red called back, catching her eyes in the rearview mirror.

“Doesn’t mean I can’t park my ass in a chair for a few hours to give someone a break.” she reasoned.

“You push yourself when you shouldn’t.” he scowled. “You’re tired, admit it.”

Liz shrugged, “If given the right incentive... I’ll perk right up.”

Red eyed the woman in the mirror, his brow lifting, “So do I, baby.”

He turned off the highway into an almost empty parking lot. It was late. The customers had vacated but there were a few employees vehicles near the back entrance.

Red closed his eyes, cursing his luck. A lone figure waited by the front entrance steps.

The man groaned his dismay as he eased the car closer, recognizing the waitress from earlier.

“Isn’t that sweet.” Liz’s tone baited him, “you don’t even have to leave the car... curbside service with a lecherous smile.”

“Brace yourself,” he warned, his tone low and edgy, “I’m snatching the purse then bolting.”

“Red Reddington, afraid of a little slip of a thing.” Liz teased, giggling. She relaxed back into the shadows, interested to see where this might lead. “What would Francis say?” She tsked.

“He’d date her only to find her kneeling over him one night with a butcher knife and wonder why he hadn’t seen it coming.” Red muttered over his shoulder, ignoring the small snort of amusement as he pulled alongside the young brunette, rolling the window down, “... Good evening,” he decided on politeness.

“Hi...” the bubbly, cheerful greeting was like nails on a chalkboard. He forced a smile.

“Thank you for finding that. My fiancée was frantic.” he lied fluently, holding out his hand.

It was dropped to her side.

Red drew in a long breath, “I really should be–”

“I was wondering...” she was making a pitch, he sensed as much. She had stepped decidedly closer to the car, leaning her arms on the breach of the window casing.

Red moved directly back.

“Would you like to... spend some time together?” the full lips were wet with a sweep of her tongue, “I mean... tonight?”

The girl's bold approach slightly impressed Red. She had a poise beyond her years.

Most her age were all giggles and blushes.

Even Liz noticed the approach. She knew, in her younger years, there would have been no way in hell she would have taken on a man like Red Reddington.

“I can make it worth your while.” the young waitress had stepped up her game, her tone cool... absent of the flirtatious coyness. Now deliberate and calculated, that’s how Liz would label it.

“It’s such a nice night...” she gestured absently to an unseen spot, “there is a very private secluded area by the lake I would love to show you.”

Liz applauded the woman, her brows lifting of their own accord for such audacity.

“I noticed you tonight in there,” she referenced the restaurant behind her, “you’re not like other men. I was instantly... attracted to you.”

“That’s very kind, but–” Red tried graciousness.

“I’ve been told I’m very, very good at pleasing a man,” the battle ensued, “I love the feel of cock in my mouth.”

Liz’s mouth fell open.

“Okay...” Red nodded calmly, “I think what we have here is... a failure to communicate,” he quoted one of his favorite movies.

“I would love for you to fuck me.” the girl stated breathlessly, caught up in her own fantasy. “Am I communicating well enough now?”

“I got your drift.” Red answered, unperturbed. “But there’s only one person I am interested in fucking tonight,” he could be blunt as well.
He threw an oblique look to the rear-view mirror because that person was sitting right behind him... being as quiet as a church mouse... allowing him to stew in his own juices.

Being no damned assistance what-so-ever.

“So... while the offer is tempting,” Red softened the blow, not wanting to bruise the young woman’s ego or frighten her off for the next guy, “I will sadly have to... decline.”

The young lady bit the inside of her cheek, wondering about her next tactic where this incredibly sexy man was concerned.

“May I have my fiancée’s purse, please?” he hinted to yet another reason why he had rejected her invitation, holding his hand out.

“Oh!” the blue eyes brightened, definitely not what Red had hoped for. “Is that all?”

At that moment, the side door opened, spilling bright light out into the parking lot. A couple of wait staff emerged, chatting amiably, breaking the stalemate.

Red was more than relieved to see a bulky figure follow them out, immediately recognizing the silhouetted frame.

Greg Forester sauntered toward the car, his expression a bleak one, “...Give him the purse.” he was tense, no-nonsense.

The waitress scowled but obediently did as bid, handing Red the bag, her expression a sullen one.

Red lightly tossed it over the seat, purposely aiming for Lizzy.

He held his retort as a whisper of a giggle met his efforts.

“I explained why this man was different,” Greg’s tone was a scolding one. “He is engaged.”

“She can join us.” the waitress was being very solicitous this evening.

Liz’s mouth popped open once again, her eyes widening with awe.

“They don’t do that.” Greg was patience itself, “You don’t... right?” he was polite enough to check at least.

“Not at this date.” Red held his smile because he was visualizing Lizzy’s face... good, that’s what she deserved. “The future is not ordained.”

Greg nodded that he understood the parameters, returning to the problem, “I’ve told you... if you need a fuck,” he lifted the young woman’s chin, his eyes steady and direct, “come to me.”

Liz’s brows were as high as they were ever going to get for the blatant overture.

“Is that it?” Greg was concerned. “Do you need cock, honey? Is your little pussy aching?”

The waitress fell into his arms, whining like a little kitten, “I hurt so, Daddy.” she lifted luminous eyes.

Red knew a lost cause when he saw one. He could sense Greg’s weakness even from this distance.

“Go wait in my office.” Greg managed a gruff retort. “You’ve disobeyed me...” he cocked his head towards Reddington, “there will be repercussions.” his scowl darkened. “You understand that?”

The girl nodded eagerly.

“You think about how disappointed Daddy is...” he sent her on her way with a sturdy smack to her bottom, “Go on now. I’ll be with you in a minute.”

The girl gave Red a last look. One that said, ‘look what you lost’. She flounced off, disappearing into the side entrance.

The door shut with a decided thud.

“I’m sorry, man.” Greg was instantly apologetic. “She was angry with me, wanted...” he trailed off. "I didn’t want to reprimand her too harshly...” he sighed.

Red waved the matter aside, “Save it for the ‘office’.” he quipped. “But, it was a little uncomfortable over dinner.” he admitted. “She does her act with the wrong woman present and... it could get ugly.”

Greg looked listlessly at the closed entrance door, “I don’t know what to do. She’s Big Jake’s daughter.”

“Shit..” Red shook his head sympathetically. “Does he know about...” he waved his between the man and the absent woman.

“Well, he knows we’re dating,” Greg nodded slowly, “not that we’re,” he cleared his throat, “...playing.”

Red lifted a brow, a silent warning conveyed.

“Was your woman upset? Offended?”

“Apparently not.” Red muttered under his breath, throwing a dirty look into the darkened seat of the car. “Since she left my ass floundering up here like a fish on a damned hook.”

Lizzy’s laughter pealed from the back.

Greg’s expression was priceless.

“Yeah, she heard it all.” Red smiled pleasantly. “The little shit has a warped sense of humor... damned heathen that she is.”

But the chastisement only brought more laughter. Lizzy leaned into the light, waving jauntily at a red-faced Greg Forester, “It’s Francis’ influence.” she kissed Red’s cheek soundly. “You both handled that so well. Color me impressed.”

Red grunted his discontent.

“It was interesting to see the Master at work.” she teased Red relentlessly.

“Why don’t you sit back down and... be quiet.” Red shook his head, a little vexed. “Since you’re so good at it.”

Liz fell back, tittering gleefully.

Red turned his attention to the other man.
“I didn’t know she wa–”

“Goodnight, Greg.” Red dismissed the intended apology.

“Yeah, goodnight,” Liz called from the back, “...Daddy.”

Red sighed heavily.

Greg laughed his delight, “Goodnight, Elizabeth.” he was back in form, “Drive carefully, Red.”

Red lifted unamused eyes, seeing the giggling woman squirm about in the back seat, full of malice and glee.

“I’m going to get you for that one, Lizzy.” he vowed which only brought on another bout of fitful joy.

“I’m shaking in my boots.” she snickered happily.

Red bit the inside of his jaw, already carrying visions of just how he might carry out his prophesy.

Ressler stretched out the kinks in his neck as he walked the quiet property.

He had laid down but sleep was evasive tonight.

He hoped a quick late night stroll might clear his head which was buzzing with ideas and plans.. and the dressing down he had given Moore for antagonizing Reddington.

The air was clear and crisp. The night filled with a billion stars.

You didn’t get a view like this in the city, he had to admit.

Maybe sleep would come easier.

His watch was coming up fast though, so he headed back to the cabin, hoping for at least a couple hours before he had to put in an appearance.

The man stuck his hands in the pockets of his lightweight jacket, hunching his head, directing his steps purposely.

He had only made it a few yards when the sound of tires crunching on gravel stopped him in his tracks.

He stepped back into the shadows of a group of Fir trees watching as a large SUV came around the bend which led to the cabins.

He could not recognize a driver or the vehicle from this distance but it was too late for any casual visitor to simply drop by.

The powerful beams of the car shut down as the driver continued on with only the fog lights to guide his or her way.

The car bypassed the two cabins entirely. It pulled off in a thicket far down the road and the lights clicked off.
Checking Lawford’s place instinctively, the agent found himself settling his hand on his weapon.

He returned his focus to the thicket and the unexplained vehicle.

He moved stealthily forward in a low crouch...

Chapter Notes

I got this idea while listening to “Cruisin” by Smokey Robinson and added a couple reviewer suggestions while I was at it. :)

I received a funny review back way back in chapter 55 that I’ve been patiently waiting to use... somewhere. I hope she has a good laugh if she reads it. :)

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

The eternal struggle.

Red Reddington grappled with it this very night. He watched the night sky deepen in hue as it slipped from nautical to astronomical twilight. A range of blue fading from deep aqua to indigo merged effortlessly into the inky black of the heavens.

His calm eyes shifted, taking in the warm glow of soft light from the city tucked in the valley of the majestic mountains. The orange radiance also fading into the dark edges of night.

Pressing a button, the overhead sunroof slid back, giving him a quick unfettered view of the blanket of stars twinkling merrily overhead, the edge of the Milky Way highlighting the tail end of a shooting star.

A breathtaking night... with a breathtaking woman.

He glanced sideways, his thoughts on the silence of the woman beside him as she too, took in the resplendent beauty.

Usually, Lizzy was a chatterbox of questions, suppositions and endless inquiries.

He couldn’t gauge her mood.

Elongated shadows swept over the road as the white headlights moved along trees, road signs and the occasional mailbox.

The yellow hint of reflectors and the eyes of creatures tucked away into the heavy brush, shown brightly as they traveled further away from civilization and deeper into the darkness ahead.

His futile brain ticked away. It wasn’t easy keeping a woman, any woman... entertained. For what Red had in mind, he would have to be especially creative because this woman was... unique, well worth the effort.

But it was more than that even.

Red enjoyed the challenge presented, plain and simple.

He managed to sate Lizzy’s appetite for food. He too enjoyed the fare but... his appetite was running towards the baser things in life now.
Red shifted into a more comfortable position, his pants too restrictive on a certain part of his anatomy.

The short skirt the woman wore lay woefully neglected, the fabric rising far too high on the captivating cream of Lizzy’s exposed thighs.

The flimsy material draped provocatively into the crest between her legs.

He wanted to reach over, run his fingers into that neat little slot. Feel the warm flesh between those heated little thighs.

But... he hoped he had more finesse... more maturity than to simply ‘cop a feel’, like some teenage boy on his first....

An idea sparked.

Red slid a calculating glance to the pretty averted profile, his mind ticking away.

But... would she pick up on the role? It could fail dismally... explode in his face.

That was part of the thrill... the unknown, wasn’t it?

“What time is it?” he murmured aloud.

The woman jostled from her musings instinctively glancing at the sleek dashboard. This thing rivaled a cockpit of an aircraft. It not only displayed a digital readout of the time but the temperature, their location and knowing Red... the trajectory of outbound missiles he may have illegally obtained.

“Eleven twenty-three.” she turned quizzical eyes his way.

“We’re gonna be late...”

Liz watched his profile for some sign, “Late?”

Red turned a lazy stare her way, “The curfew your dad set for us.”

He watched the expressions flit across the pretty face as she... processed.

“Oh my God!” the startlement, the wide-eyed shock... all perfection. “You turn this car around and head home this very instant.”

“Well....” he flicked the lights down, easing the SUV past the cabin with expert precision causing the least amount of noise on the graveled pavement, “I would love to do that...” he turned woeful eyes her way, his face managing a ‘sorry ‘grimace, “...but.”

“Don’t you dare tell me we’ve run out of gas!” she dared him to do so, her body facing him squarely now, hand on her shapely hips.

Red clicked off the engine, the lights dying down almost instantly, the white light fading, leaving them in the dark.

“I filled it up, baby,” he spread apologetic hands, “I don’t know what the problem is... it’s been sluggish the past few miles.” the man fabricated the tale easily, “I’m afraid to push the engine too hard right now. Might overheat...”

Liz looked over the steering wheel and dash as if, by doing so, she could will the car to ‘go’.
"You're the guy... do something." she chided.

"I am." Red assured easily. "I’m letting the engine cool down." he motioned. "It will probably be good to go in a few minutes."

"We don’t have a few minutes." she clicked the digital readout with a well-manicured nail as a reminder.

"Hey, your dad knows this old jalopy is temperamental sometimes." Red debated artfully. "He trusts me to take care of you if anything happens... and I will."

Liz slid him an amused look, “Does he...” she stated teasingly.

“Don’t get bent out of shape.” the waitresses' words coming to mind. “It’s a cool night. I’ve wanted to show you this secluded, private spot for some time now. I’ve never shared it with anyone before.”

Liz’s amusement grew, “I’ll bet.”

“God’s own truth.” Red held up his hand. If he had a bible, he would have sworn on it, his look said as much.

Liz thought briefly. What had Red Reddington been like as a gauche, young teenager? She couldn’t see past the debonair, confident exterior he exuded as a man.

“We might as well get comfortable.” the man in question glanced at the back seat of the car. “...More room back there.” he indicated with a nod of his head.

“You’re joking, right?” this game was getting out of hand quickly and while Liz held no objections to ending the evening on a high note... the comfort of the cabin’s king-size bed was calling out to her.

Red pushed at the interior doors, having flicked the switch to the overhead lights before attempting the feat.

He walked casually about the car, popping the hatch, allowing the unseasonably warm wind inside.

“All the comforts of home.” he lowered one side of the seats with an effortless push of a button.

“I am not getting back there.” she turned about, crossing her arms over her chest.

Red sighed. She was going to make him work for this one.

All the better.

“Aww, baby, don’t be like that.” he sat on the bumper. “What’s the deal? We can’t sit back sit back here and look at the stars while the engine cools down?”

Liz scooted back around, her expression a thoughtful one, “Well... I guess that would be okay.” she exited the car, careful of her bare feet in the tall grass, joining him in time.

Red converted the back area into one large space by now, offering his hand as the woman came around the end of the car, “See? It’s beautiful out here.”

He encompassed the starry night sky with its myriad of stars shimmering down.

“It is.” she sat comfortably on the bumper, bracing her hands on either side of her body. “It really “Reminds me of you.” he took a shot looking down at her face in the waning moonlight...

“That’s so sweet of you to say.” she played her part, managing to look aside shyly.

He unclipped his weapon, discretely sitting it aside. She pretended not to notice. “It’s how I think of you,” he mentioned in passing, giving his full attention. “I think of you a lot.”

“Do you?” she queried. “Were you thinking of me when that car hop was making eyes at you?” she improvised.

“Baby, she is nowhere in your league.” he disgruntled. “She looked a little like you... brunette, passably pretty...”

Liz shot him her own disgruntled look.

“You are more than passably pretty. I meant,” he offered hastily, his eyes roaming her silhouette freely, “with a killer body.”

She stretched back, presenting her breasts in a much better light, “Really?”

“I dream about that body.” he put just the right amount of angst in his delivery.

“...You just want me to put out.” she snubbed his efforts.

Loosening his tie, he pulled the slip of silk, tossing it beside them.

“Where would you get such an idea?” he moved decidedly closer, his gaze a suggestive one as it traveled the ripe body. “It’s just that... for a guy,” he sing-songed his head, “… it’s hard.”

Well, that was a true statement if ever there was one.

Liz checked to see if he was telling the truth as well. She kept her gaze pinned.

“We have all these things happening in our bodies and...” he remembered back long, long ago, “it’s easier for you women, I guess.”

Liz leaned on her elbow, measuring the length of his play toy. “You think so?”

“Must be.” Red held his smile for the bold way she was looking at his hard-on. “You turn it on and off so easily.”

“I know what you’re doing.” she lifted a sultry stare. “You want to get in my pants.”

“You’re wearing a skirt... technically.” he helpfully pointed out.

His fingers brushed the flowing material to prove his point.

“And I don’t want that at all.” his eyes told her how much it was taking for him to sit here, making idle talk. “I just want us to be... closer.”

“How much... closer?” she leaned to his chest provocatively, her breath fanning his face smelling of cinnamon.

“I’ve been thinking about the last time, that’s all.” his finger traced the edge of her skirt. “You let me
“Only a little,” she pouted, “through my blouse.”

“You got me so hot.” he curved his hand about her hip, drawing her into his sphere, “I ached all night, baby,” his tongue slipped expertly into the slightly parted mouth. His arms pulling her close to finish the kiss to his satisfaction, “...just like now.”

“There was nothing wrong with what we did.”

“Oh, I know that, sweetheart.” he gently lay her back, his arms cradling her body lovingly. “You know I’d never pressure you.” his palm brought the hem of her skirt higher as he pressed his body half-on, half off her slender form. “I’ll only go as far as you want. I swear to, God.”

Liz looked above her wondering how she got into this prone position so very quickly. She was more than slightly amused.

Leaning on his elbow, his thick fingers idly danced over the shapely curves.

He spread his fingers just barely touching the beginning swell of that sweet succulent back-side, “I stopped last time, didn’t I? Just like I said?” he coerced her to see things his way.

“Well...” she squirmed her bottom into his waiting palm, “yes... you did.”

“Yeah, I did.” he cupped the rounded flesh, pushing her into his arousal. “Do you feel that?”

Liz’s breath escaped in a soft sigh. She closed her eyes, “...Yes.”

“That’s what you do to me, each and every time.”

“I know but....”

“I’m just saying,” he backtracked, his middle finger rubbing teasingly along the crease of her ass. “I love your skin... how it feels all warm and you smell good.” he nuzzled the front of her blouse. “So good.” he tugged the blouse free of her skirt waistband, joining his lips to hers passionately.

Liz moaned softly, their breaths mingling.

His finger deftly popped the pearl buttons on her top, exposing her bra to his lecherous gaze.

“You shouldn’t do that,” she whispered in enticement.

“That’s like saying,” he covered one straining lace covered nipple, his heated breath taking her breath away, “I shouldn’t breathe.”

Her skin erupted in gooseflesh for his antics and she lifted her mounds for his ministrations, groaning a breathy sigh.

Her tiny pink areolas strained against the white lace of her bra. The alabaster flesh pushing at the confinement, the heavy mounds overfilling the low cups with every breath she took.

Red ran his hand along the slender collarbone, his fingers sliding between the warm valley. The creamy mounds rubbed against his fingertips.

“You are better than a damned pin-up,” he recalled a few of those in his time as well. “Every man’s fantasy....” he murmured quietly, “my fantasy.”
Red’s scowl was fixed and concentrated as he stared longingly at the beginning swirl of amber circle his handiwork produced.

It was almost better than the real thing... partially seeing the beauty he knew the lace hid.

....Almost.

Liz’s heart thumped wildly, the ache between her legs surged, an overwhelming heat settling in her abdomen.

Fiddling with the buttons on his shirt she finally pulled them free. She loved the feel of his bared flesh pressed against hers.

He barely touched her lips, his mouth emitting hot, heavy breaths, canceling out all coherent thought.

It was as if he was denying her full access which maddened her senses. She strained nearer, trying to fulfill the need his actions caused.

Red’s fingers spread, traveling the slope of her spine until he encountered the ridge of the lace bra.

With one expert flick, the elastic bunched from the weight of her heavy mounds, freeing them from confinement.

Red’s hand slid under her blouse, taking the unresisting cup of the bra in its wake until he felt the stiff tip puckering against his palm.

The pliant orb bobbed erotically having been freed.

Liz moaned appreciatively, grunting as his experienced fingers gently rolled, tweaked, explored the wonder of her body.

With each touch, she trembled expectantly, her moans becoming a melodious symphony to the man’s ears.

He leaned, shaping the tiny nub teasingly with his tongue, his breath washing over the ripe melon. He palmed the full soft breast, kneading it tenderly.

Liz’s fingers threaded the back of his nape, holding him firm to his pastime. In doing so, she forced the quivering nub of her nipple into his waiting exploration.

She arched her throat, groaning rapturously as his hot hollow engulfed her flesh.

Red drew on the distended peak lasciviously, all his yearning expressed in that one simple movement.

“You’ve–” Liz breathed her awe, “never done this before.”

“I’ve wanted to,” he was falling more into his role, feeling very much like an oversexed teenager right now.

He wanted to see her nakedness, to recall the experience of a young man looking at his first Playboy centerfold, “I want to... feel you up so badly.”

“W-What does that mean?” Liz’s center strained with the ache of the reality of the meaning. Every inch of her body, calling out for his touch.
Red ran his hand up the outside of her leg, transferring deftly but unhurriedly to the opposite thigh, pushing the appendage apart.

Liz closed her legs, a Herculean task feeling as she did, “No!” she pouted up at him.

“I’m just showing you.” Red’s eyes told her, he knew she wanted to be persuaded. “You asked what I meant.”

“I don’t want to know.” she was being totally unreasonable, and she knew it but... hey, he wanted to play.

She hoped his patience would withstand the test. There was no way in hell she would not experience Red Reddington tonight.

Red returned his interest elsewhere, trying a frontal assault.

He captured the rosy bud, his tongue flicking rapidly over the more than sensitive skin, the gentle tug diligent for some few moments.

Lizzy’s legs loosened with each passing sweep of his tongue, drawing a soft breathy moan from his lover’s chest.

His nose nuzzled the lacy garment out of his way. He made certain his hand did not move an inch on her thigh.

Liz unconsciously squeezed her thighs almost rhythmically. She was not aware of doing so but the rising ache in her core dictated her behavior.

Red Reddington was aware, however. His eyes traveled the bared expanse of the full, ripe melons he uncovered.

“You are beautiful, baby.” his tone low and affected.

“Ohh!” Liz gasped, crossing her arms over her nudity in the age-old gesture of feminine modesty.

“Don’t hide from me.” that rough, gravelly tone caused a ripple of anticipation to traverse her body.

He gently captured one small wrist, his eyes holding hers easily.

“Didn’t you like it?” he provoked purposely, she knew. “When I sucked on your nipples?”

Her nipples stiffened painfully.

“Y-Yes.” she confessed breathlessly unable to pull her eyes from those all-seeing orbs that stared back at her.

She could feel that motionless hand laying so still and innocently poised between her legs.

The need to squeeze her thighs and writhe until this fucking ache subsided was a growing need....she wanted his hand to move higher still until he finally touched...

And what was worse... Red Reddington knew exactly what she was feeling.

“It felt good,” his eyes measured her hands more so, then what they attempted to cover, “…didn’t it?”

His lack of finesse amused him but there was something to be said about the straight and to the point strategy as well.

Lizzy’s thighs had gapped considerably with the past few seconds.

He itched to inch his hands... higher.

“...It felt... okay.” she had to shift her eyes at such an enormous lie. It felt phenomenal.

Taking the slight in his stride for he knew it was a lie, Red lifted her wrist when she resisted, he stubbornly tightened his efforts, achieving his goal. His mouth descended.

“No..” Liz felt, at that moment as if she missed her calling, “... don’t.” she could have been a passable actress, “Stop...”

If he did. She would kill him.

Red’s lips and tongue quieted her protests instantly. His hand cupped her breast passionately, the nimble fingers working their magic.

In seconds, Liz was mewing contentedly like a little kitten.

Teenage boys, while crude and unrefined, were on the right track... get to the good stuff with as little fuss and bother as possible.

Red suckled, teased and bit on the delicious treat he found, taking Lizzy’s mind off his true objective.

His palm began a featherlike advancement up her thigh, dancing over her silky skin.

He transferred some much-needed attention to her forgotten breast, shifting his weight, his leg thrown carelessly into the chasm he created between her legs.

Liz pushed weakly on his chest, mewing her protests but he hastily squelched that denial.

His index finger stroked the entire length of her center, pressing just enough to feel the outline beneath that damp material which covered his prize... if he played the game correctly.

Liz whimpered her delight.

“I love sucking your tits.” a little of the baser needs he was experiencing surfaced. He enjoyed the freedom to be blunt, disguising the bumbling blurs of a teenage boy. “I could do it all night and not get enough.”

Liz hesitantly lowered the barrier between them, her fingers stroking his neckline seductively, sending shivers of pleasure along the man’s back and arms.

“It feels good,” he needed to hear it, “doesn’t it, baby.” he coaxed the woman to his way of thinking.

“G-God, yes.” she wasn’t sure if she meant his ministrations to her breasts or... other parts to which he attended.

His thumb slipped under the lace of her panties, running a constant back-and-forth beat across the all too sensitive wetness he found.

“W-We can’t do this.” her voice lacked any real conviction she knew. She willed her legs to close but... it felt so very good. His touch, the grunts of delight he emitted from time to time.
“Just a little longer, baby.” Red asked, his husky voice strained with need. His thumb passed teasingly over her clit to sway her decision.

An electric jolt shot through her body for his antics. She moaned her gratitude.

Red brushed her lips fleetingly with his own, refusing any real connection as yet.

He was driving her over the edge.

Her entire body was tuned to the man’s every whim, truth known.

Liz’s pride kept her in the game.

She tried to close her legs. She would show him...

“I can make you feel so good.” he rasped, his middle finger slipping into the hot cavern of her sex.

“Ohh!” Liz’s legs fell apart.

The skirt was bunched far above her legs now, the fabric laying on her abdomen.

Red took the time to glance at his domain.

“Jesus...” he breathed amorously at the sight.

The startling white lace of her panties lay against the contrast of her skin. Tiny bows trimmed the waistband lining her hip bone. He thought that was so cute.

His took in the dark thatch of hair that lay beneath and the shapely gap in her thighs.

A gap he would soon fill.

He kept his finger very still. A smile spreading, when he felt Lizzy slide her body provocatively up and down the filler.

He put a stop to that immediately, removing his finger from inside her body.

“No!” Liz gasped her shock, bereft suddenly, her eyes flying open.

Hooking the delicate lace, he pushed it aside, his eyes taking in the soft fluff covering her labia.

He grunted deep in his throat, thrilled by the sight. He traced the dark thatch of hair shadowed beneath the flimsy lingerie.

Liz felt the cool air on her exposed genitals wanting him so badly. Crying out for fulfillment only he could give.

Her fingers brushed the hair on his chest feeling the hardened muscles flex under the wealth of curly hair.

The pebble of his nipple tightened noticeably.

A tingling thrill shot through Liz at the realization. She was affecting him as much as he was her.

“I don’t think we should–”

His fingertip teasingly circled her slickness, causing a well of cream to trickle from the area.
Liz gasped, her body on fire.

Her brow furrowed critically when she felt that finger reenter her, inching into the creamy depths.

A searing ache spread through her sex in response.

She moaned piteously, despair washing over her as he withdrew his gift.

“Shh...” the man soothed quietly, peppering her neckline with small kisses. “Shh, baby.” he breathed out, his tongue gingerly flicking her rosy mouth, searching and connecting soundly at length.

Inching his way back into the tight hole, he gently pumped his finger into the rippled tunnel.

He increased the passion of his kiss, his thumb passing laboriously over her clitoris.

Dipping his head lower, breaking the lascivious kiss, he gently nipped the little nub. His tongue danced erotically over the tortured peak, his breath hot and heavy.

He did not feel like a teen any longer. He felt like a man... with a man’s wants and needs.

Red nuzzled his nose into the fragrant valley between the plump breasts, his fingers catching the top of her panties.

His hardness had grown by leaps and bounds.

He desperately needed an outlet.

He left the succulent feast her breast supplied, following an agonizingly indolent, invisible path, marking her ribs and tummy as he went, staking his claim.

He tugged the panties, his thumb hooking the material, easing it down, managing to persuade her to lift her hips. The delicate lace slid over the shapely bottom. Red was determined to reach his objective.

Liz realized his intent, her heat rising to volcanic proportions.

A hasty hand snaked out, covering his intended target but already her body was crying out for capitulation.

She felt carpet against her bare flesh, wondering at his abilities.

She didn’t even remember the incident.

Raising to his knees, Red gradually unzipped the front of his slacks taking in the sight of the white lace wrapped about her thighs.

Liz watched, transfixed, “I...you can’t do that.” she breathed her growing excitement.

“Actually,” he was working his belt, his movement efficient and unhurried, “I can do it... very well.” the man’s husky voice strained.

Liz knew that was no lie.

“I mean...” she faltered, something coming to mind, “I... I didn’t... you know,” she bid him to look, her fingers spreading revealing just enough to tantalize, “...shave or... anything.”
The soft fluff of her curls bristled quietly as it was revealed to his gaze.

The tight damp flesh of the pink mons beckoned him.

His tongue darted out, wetting his parched lips. His cock twitched painfully in his trousers at the idea of taking her in his mouth, tasting the delectable treat.

He unconsciously rubbed the ache in his cock.

Liz watched the hard bulge move this way and that with his maneuver.

The small hand deliberately covered his sight once again.

A disgruntled sound from his throat caused a blush of pleasure on Liz’s cheeks.

“We are moving so fast.” her tone was velvety soft. “Maybe—”

“Move your hand.” he gritted, his eyes holding a burning flame.

She captured her lip with her teeth, biting at the flesh. She loved when he was masterful...

“I don’t want you to be... disappointed.”

Red breathed in her scent in the clear mountain air, his system attuned, his blood heating.

He clenched his jaw, “Then... move your hand.” he took her wrist, accomplishing the task himself.

Liz waited, her nerves alive and tingling.

Red’s eyes surveyed his territory, “You are stunning,” he growled deeply, “just the way you are.”

He traced the neatly trimmed bush, his gaze lingering... possessive.

Liz flushed, breathing out shakily.

She knew the game had come to an end.

This was Red Reddington standing... kneeling before her.

All male... confident... all-consuming.

His fingers threaded through the small hairs he played in, his heart thudding hard in his chest.

“I love this,” he continued to gaze upon her, his tone soft, “so beautiful... so feminine.” he seemed entranced by the alluring vision.

His fingers danced lightly over the slippery little surface, petting the soft, dark curls.

Sensing... hearing how much her body turned Red on made her quiver inside.

“When I think of you, I think of sex,” he admitted, “in its most natural... primitive state.”

The low intense tone thrilled her no end.

The light eyes lifted sensually, “You are the sexiest woman I have ever encountered.”

“...It lacks sensation.” she felt bold and adventurous suddenly. Wanting desperately to live up to his words. “When I... masturbate.”

Her fingers filtered with his over the tiny bristles of hair.

Red watched the process, his chest heaving laboriously.

“I want to watch that.” his throat was parched. He had barely been able to get the words out.

His fingers trembled.

“I need to... see it.” those eyes took her breath away. Liz flushed with heat, not embarrassment.

He passed his thumb over her clit adding pressure here and there, “Promise me something.” he whispered seductively.

Liz moved into his touch, “W-What?” her concentration was off. What was it he wanted?

His hand slid her panties past her thighs. They rested at her ankles.

Red measured the different hues if the beautiful flesh, captivated. “Promise me...” he leaned, his nose trailing gently along her inner thigh.

He felt Lizzy jolt at his touch.

Flitting his tongue over the silky flesh of that thigh, he tugged the lace hindrance off her legs, his tone rough with involvement.

“...You won’t touch this.” he grunted luxuriously, her scent alluring, drawing him closer, “It’s mine.” he leaned, making himself comfortable between her spread legs.

Liz gasped sharply, not having realized the man had advanced that far.

“It belongs to me, Elizabeth.” as if to prove his point, his tongue snaked out, flicking teasingly over her clit.

She shivered, a searing heat running through her veins. She moaned her encouragement.

“Promise.” his voice was almost scolding. He undulated his tongue about his favorite spot moaning deeply as a burst of scent and taste inundated his senses.

Liz’s entire body shuddered, a weak groan of acquiescence escaped her parted, panting lips.

“I... p-promise.” she whispered, parting her legs to give better access.

Red inserted his middle finger into the molten depths, feeling her response.

Liz lifted her bottom gratefully into the gentle pumping, grasping for a stay hold of equilibrium.

“Good girl.” his voice rumbled with sensuality.

The man groaned as his slick finger slid free of her tight hold and against his tongue, gifting him with her sweet essence, “Very good...”

The man shouldered closer nudging her creamy thighs further apart, caressing, searching, exploring the vulnerable flesh.

The sensation of his tongue gently parting her folds... the five o’clock shadow on his face brushing tantalizingly against her over-sensitive skin.

His hot, welcome breath stimulated, excited her to new heights.

Her sex tightened deliciously, a sharp agonizing pang of liquid heat traveled through her center in waves.

She trembled with repressed desire.

The man’s lips moved erotically in a sensual rhythm, his tongue matching the action.

He was kissing her center very much the same way he did her mouth.

Tears pricked her eyes. He was caressing her so tenderly... so lovingly... down there.

He lifted, placing a tender kiss on the peak of her sex.

Liz stared at the man, her chin quivering uncontrollably. She was deeply affected... more than she thought she would ever be.

She sniffed quietly, unable to control her turbulent emotions.

Red hesitated, lifting from his pastime, his eyes meeting hers.

He sensed a problem, her face confirming his hypothesis, “...What’s wrong?”

He was instantly concerned, his body tensing.

_Dammit!

He abruptly realized... he wasn’t playing the game. He dropped the ball somewhere along the way but...

“Nothing’s wrong.” Liz sniffed once again, her smile quivering, the small chin lifting.

Red tenderly, carefully eased his finger free.

The blue eyes misted with tears of joy for his tenderness.

“Baby...” Red’s senses were telling him something else. He gently smoothed her hair back, his eyes searching her face religiously, “what did I do?” he was at a loss, a first for him. “Did I hurt you?”

He searched her person hastily for signs.

“You’re making love to me.” Liz suddenly realized.

The game stopped yes, but somewhere along the line, it evolved... at least on Red Reddington’s part.

“What a lovely thing, Red.” she misted again, “the way you were... touching me.”

“What are you–” he shook his head, agitated somewhat.

“It was so gentle...” she remembered, her love and affection for the man growing by leaps and bounds, “so... loving.”

To say Red was confused was an understatement. His face showed as much.
He ran a restless hand over his head.
The large blue eyes rested on him, long lashes spiked with wetness, framing the deep azure depths... taking his breath away.

He relaxed, comprehension dawning.
Lizzy had moved past the game as well. It had just taken a little longer.

Sensations and emotions were heightened to the extreme.
If you immersed yourself in the game... the role, coming out of the moment was difficult.
Emotions strong enough to break the spell shook one to the core.
He leaned, brushing her mouth, a small smile lightening his features.
She had felt when his emotions changed, morphed into a raw, urgent need.
But she also felt his reserve, his need to take the utmost care with her emotions.
No matter the cost to his own system.
It was second nature to Red, but he was gratified Lizzy recognized his efforts.
“I would hope, this is not the first instance you have felt... how very much you move me,” he stated almost absently, his emotions still involved with the need to connect physically with the woman.
“It was different.” she was certain.
“Each time...” he nodded minutely, “is different. Because you allow more of your true self through.”
She was befuddled, “What do you–”
“Your walls are dropping but then...” he lifted a subdued brow, “so are mine, I suppose.”
“Is that what I felt?” she was enthralled and a little frightened. Could she handle Red Reddington with all his many-faceted traits and darkly brooding emotions... that he kept hidden from others.
“I am falling in love with you more and more as each day passes,” he stated so simply, it shocked her senses.
Red’s love revealed itself in tiny increments a deep abiding emotion, which she believed to be genuine and steadfast.
“Whether that is a good thing or bad, remains to be seen,” he muttered.
“I don’t understand.”
“It’s a good thing for me.” he quipped. “You will have to decide on your own if I am worth the trouble.”
She relaxed a bit, kissing him languidly.
Red always tasted of the most delightful things. Exotic liqueurs, expensive tobacco, delicious chocolate truffles... always wondrous substances.
Tonight, even with his previous pastime... it was spearmint gum. She had not seen him chewing any sort of gum this evening. The man was an enigma who made her smile wistfully... an amazing puzzle to fit together, a mystery to be solved.

The hesitancy of her kiss brought a smile, “Is the game afoot?”

She wrinkled her nose, shaking her head negatively, “Sometimes I’m just not sure how to... approach you.”

He chuckled his delight, “Sans clothing comes to mind... what are you talking about?” he genuinely wanted to know. “I would hope you could ‘approach me’ at any time, for any reason.”

She shook her head. He wasn’t getting her meaning, “...I’m in love with you as well.”

“Good.” he approved whole-heartedly.

“It’s a wonderful feeling but...” she cuddled into his arms, snuggling to him, “it scares me too.”

Red’s eyes smiled. He planted a kiss on her shiny locks, “Any overwhelming emotions oft-times are frightening. Hard to deal with.”

He drew back a little, taking in the lovely features, “Are you trying to tell me something?”

Liz wasn’t sure how much to confess. What if what he felt was not as deep as her emotions?

“I’m just so glad you want to be with me.” she lifted shining eyes. “I’m so glad we’re... together.”

“That is the singular most important statement anyone has ever made to me.” his eyes held hers willfully, a dark glowing ember deep inside, “...Ever, in my existence.”

Liz’s heart hurt with joy.

She lifted her arms about his neckline, her mouth flowering passionately under his.

“I love you.” she sighed her contentment, nuzzling into his neckline, whispering the words.

Red’s arms tightened systematically, “I love you more.” he chuckled, more than willing to play this particular game.

“I love you to the moon and back.” she inhaled his exotic scent, nuzzling into the leathery flesh of his neckline as she nipped him playfully.

“I love you to the depth and breadth...” he had taken a moment to consider his answer.

“Depth and breadth of... what?” she countered, wondering if he would remember the first time he had said this to her? There was no way he could top that moment.

“The depth of God’s ability to forgive and the breadth of his awe-inspiring universe.”

Liz was shocked by such eloquence.

Red’s tongue slipped past the delicate moisture of her lips, his arms tightening on the small of her back.

He pressed her body lovingly to his feeling, a deep tremor run its length.
He broke the kiss, his brow furrowed, “Are you chilled?”

“No...” she whispered, her eyes shining with love for the man.

“Do you want to go home?” It was a two-fold question.

Did she need to go back to the cabin... end this? Or... did she wish to pick up where they left off?

“I want to stay,” she traced his face with her loving gaze, “with you.”

Red’s lips brushed over hers seductively, a gentle sweep, drawing a breathy moan from the woman.

He deepened the kiss second by urgent second, working ardently for more contented sighs.

“Thank the Lord.” he growled his relief, settling a knee between her legs, nudging them apart.

“‘Cause I really... really,” he eagerly sucked her neckline, his hot breath titillating, “need this time with you.”

Liz mewed breathlessly feeling the rock-solid evidence of his statement nudge her inner thigh.

The heat took only seconds to rise for the man’s hands were fanning a flame to life, traveling every inch of her body, stopping in all the right places.

His large palm cupped a bared breast, his thumb eliciting a response from her already straining bud.

She ran a painfully stroking pass over his engorged penis.

He grunted, encouraging such familiarity on her part.

He felt her rapid heartbeat through the full mounds of her breasts cradled so lovingly against his chest, as he slid his fingers over her tumescent clitoris into the hot tunnel awaiting his exploration.

Liz’s kisses turned his insides to a quivering mess of jelly.

He pushed offending material of his slacks out of the way, grappling inside the confinement of his boxers to release his painful erection.

The night air brushed enticingly against his heated flesh. His long, thick shaft flexed its freedom, the head throbbing mercilessly.

His thigh gently shoved her legs apart, his eyes molten stones as he surveyed the handiwork he revealed.

Taking himself in hand, he purposely ran his length along Lizzy’s slick, slippery labia, watching his progress with avid interest.

Liz’s breath was raspy and uneven, her body lifting for his purpose.

He pushed incessantly at the gaping hole, parting the resistant skin teasingly.

Liz jerked, her breasts bobbing luxuriously.

“Let me, baby.” he whispered, sliding deliberately along the length of the wet crease at an agonizing pace, testing the sensitive flesh, “…relax.”

Did she want the game to resume as well?
Women...

Red sighed mentally. No matter. Whatever it took was what he was going to do.

“It won’t hurt.” he panted shakily, his muscles quivering with barely contained lust, “Just the tip...”

Were they playing again? Liz felt her abdomen contract in response to the sexy intonation of his voice.

She wanted to please him. Desperately.

“I’ve... never...” she tested the water, her small hands holding him at bay. It was the very last thing she wanted in reality, but... what the hell.

She lifted doe-eyes slowly, “Well... once or twice with... you know..” her eyes deepened. “I have a few... toys.”

“Shit,” Red’s tone dropped to a sensual caress. “Toys... you say?” it was beyond difficult to speak clearly.

Red’s breathing deepened as he listened to the story she wove, the imagery she painted for him. His fists curled tightly, envisioning Lizzy with her hands between her legs, crying out as she brought herself to orgasm.

It was a stunning picture indeed.

And he wanted to play with that vision... wanted to lose himself in the world she created.

She nodded minutely, “Is it the same?”

“Yeah...” he improvised, “the very same. Your toys don’t hurt, do they?”

“No,” she silkily agreed, “well... what I’ve been able to use of them.” she bat large eyes at the man.

Red groaned deep in his chest, understanding the hint well enough, “Well then... what harm can just the tip of my,” he motioned, “...do?”

At any other time, this conversation would amuse him greatly, but right now, all he wanted was to enter her tight hole... fall into the sensual world that was Elizabeth Keen.

He was intelligent enough to know how to accomplish his goal.

He would figure out a way to work himself into her hot, succulent body if it killed him.

“We should stop.” she was pretty sure that should be her line along about now. She finally understood why teenage girls had such a difficult time saying ’no’.

Liz moaned hesitantly as Red shifted, the bulbous head passed purposely against her straining vagina.

“Let me.” he rasped roughly. “Just the head, baby. It will feel so damned good. I promise.”

Her eyes fluttered shut, she offered a tiny gasp. The pressure of the thick head at her center made her wish to obey anything asked of her.

Red moaned lowly as his cock oozed liquid heat, saturating the tiny hole as he prepared her for his coming invasion.

Liz braced her palms on his shoulders, shaking her head minutely... playing her part to the hilt, the blue eyes managed a worried confusion.

“Just relax, baby.” Red’s voice shook with restrained lust. “I’ll do all the work... you won’t regret a thing.”

Liz knew gospel when she heard it but she still managed to shove weakly against the muscles rippling under her fingertips.

Pushing gently, Red breached the taut labia. He rasped a rather vulgar oath, euphoria rushing through his veins.

The man’s head fell back, his eyes closing to the rapturous joining he was about to partake.

“Jesus Christ!” he hissed, the ridge of his head pushing resolutely past the tight ring. He was instantly clamped inside the snug tunnel.

Liz cried out faintly. The sensation a joyous one. One which felt at once both familiar, yet foreign. She knew it was Red inside her, of course, and yet, the man was so skillful at play-acting, it almost felt as if they actually were some fumbling teenagers... on a country road somewhere secluded and shut off from the entire world.

Which is exactly where she wanted to be... with him.

Red lowered his eyes to the sight of their union. His bulging shaft appeared almost obscene against the small mound he invaded.

Pushing stubbornly against the resistance she was offering, the breathy exclamation of denial tested the man’s control.

He knew Lizzy was using her knowledge of the inner workings of his mind against him at this moment.

It made the game so much more challenging.

Why they had fallen back into the scenario, he could not have said.

All Red knew was he was having the time of his life.

Quick short breaths escaped Lizzy’s body.

Lips that called out to be kissed by someone who knew how to accomplish the feat, beckoned him.

The woman could not believe how good his penis felt. How very sensitive she was... down there.

The thick head raked against a bundle of nerves he usually by-passed.

She could not stop the continuous stream of gasps and moans the feeling elicited.

It felt... incredible.

It took everything Red had to keep still, to hold back from sliding his length into that luscious caress he knew awaited him.
But the knowledge that... “You like that.” edged out his libido’s need. His tone sounded edgy and tense even to his own ears.

“...Y-Yes.” she whimpered sweetly.

A wave of heat traversed his body for the hesitant acknowledgment. He groaned his gratitude, his palm kneading her breast religiously.

Bracing his body on his outstretched arms, the man swiveled his hips, a purpose in mind.

He watched his head disappear then... reappear with his steady, deliberate and agonizing pace.

His vision blurred momentarily, the emotions too raw as her labia parted and collapsed about his girth.

The lure of her delectable clit tugged gently at his movements. The white fluid of her arousal wetted his head, the silken liquid aiding his efforts.

“Damn.” his whispered awe washed over the woman, her reaction intensifying.

“It fills me...” a broken cry escaped her as Liz enveloped herself within the turbulent emotions the man caused, “... so full.”

Her tunnel fluttered convulsively as she pushed up to better feel his width but Red held back.

Capturing her chin with his fingers, he tilted her face to watch the chaos he was creating inside the woman’s body.

“Let me in.” his tone brooked no refusal, “I need to give you my whole cock.”

Liz’s hot panted breath brushed over his face. The vulgarity somehow heightening the moment for her.

“Every last inch,” his fingers shook visibly, his voice a shadowed whisper of repressed desire. “You can take it,” he eased down, his features set, “I know you can.”

Liz shuddered uncontrollably.

Red grasped her hair in a tight fist, his mouth parting hers hungrily. In seconds, his tongue mimicked the agonizing motion of his cock as he sank deeper and deeper... pausing at each inch gained to acclimate himself to the wonders her body could offer.

Liz was totally taken by surprise as her clit’s ache intensified to the extreme. Sudden waves of a strong orgasm grasped her body shaking it to its core.

Flame surged up like quick-silver as the woman cried out her elation.

Red’s eyes slid shut for a brief time when she quivered about him. His dark, brooding gaze penetrated hers, his jaw pulsing with checked reserve.

The man’s jaw shifted into a tight hold, his breathing labored... his chest heaving visibly.

“Tell me you want it.” nothing else would suffice, his impassioned statement left no room for debate.

Liz’s eyes measured him languidly. What she ‘wanted’ was to give him as much of herself as the man had shared.
She had been waiting for his control to snap... for him to reach his limits as she had done seconds earlier.

She forgot with whom she was dealing with but yet maybe...even Red Reddington had a breaking point.

Testing her theory, Liz wriggled about under him, her movements sliding his cock farther into her body.

“Son of a...” he snarled, his hand grasping those mischievous hips to still their actions, “bitch!”

She blinked innocently, wondering if that word had been directed at her.

“You want to play?” he asked tightly. “We can do that, Elizabeth.”

She felt reprimanded, like a naughty school girl who had been displeased her Professor.

What a delicious feeling.

“Answer me!” Red growled harshly, pulling back deliberately, she knew, denying his own needs. “Say... the fucking words.”

His crown slid purposely against her clitoris giving added incentive.

Liz sighed her contentment, lifting into the seductive touch.

But Red pulled back, beads of perspiration visible on his temples.

She was affecting him. It was enough... more than... enough.

“Yes,” she whispered almost eagerly.

“Yes... what?” he demanded.

“I want you inside me.” she gasped brokenly. “Deep...inside.” she could almost feel the ‘width and breadth’ of him. “I want to feel you.”

“You will, honey.” he panted his relief, his entire system attuned to her every wish now, “It’s so fucking hard for you.”

Diligently pumping his hips, he finally inched his ramrod cock deep into the tiny crevice, spreading her gradually.

Liz’s brow furrowed. She expected him to slide home. He earned the reward after all.

Her orgasm left her slick as hell, primed and ready for a proper connection.

She clamped as hard as she could about the pulsating girth willing the man to complete her.

“Shit...” Red groaned the realization, “You have the tightest pussy I’ve ever...” he trailed away.

Not the best time to bring up past... encounters, but it was true.

Liz pretended not to note the slip... but did chuckle inwardly at the slight grimace that crossed the man’s face for his faux pas.

Grasping her knee, he pulled it tight against his side, enjoying her moan of pleasure when his cock raked roughly against her pink clitoris.

The tiny nub was once again, throbbing and alive with sensation.

Liz moaned as the intense pleasure racked her body.

“That feels damned good doesn’t it, baby.” his own organ was rippling with the effect.

His fingers reached, parting her already spread folds, allowing him a little freedom to sink even deeper.

“What you need…” his voice captivated, “is a good fucking.”

She could hardly dispute the fact.

“I can do that.” he promised. “I probably need it a hell of a lot more than you,” he admitted sotto voce, his attention fixed and riveted.

Elizabeth lifted her arms above her head, stretching in a kitten-like manner, basking in the rhythmic motion of their union.

The rising tide of sweet bliss inched closer.

Red caught her bared breast, suckling her feverishly.

“Feel me…” he willed, “inside you.”

The core of her being convulsed, his cock rippling inside the recesses of her body, the friction causing delicious pangs of awakening to stir.

She marveled at the feel of him... it was exquisite.

The sweet pang fluctuated around his shaft, Lizzy’s breathy cries of enjoyment stimulated him beyond scope.

He hit a special spot, feeling her form stiffen with delight, a shaky exclamation escaping the woman’s throat.

Red buried his face into the fragrant curve of her neckline, his hot breath fanning her electrified flesh.

“That excites the hell out of me.” he had no trouble admitting the fact.

Liz’s breath quickened, the tightness in her abdomen signifying she felt the same.

Leaning into his forearms, Red surrounded her with his warmth, murmuring softly, “Don’t stop... don’t hold back.”

Liz’s sex pulsed obediently, grasping the man’s erection.

Red groaned brokenly, biting her neckline teasingly as a reward.

“Come for me.” his tone laced with desperation.

But... she already had. Didn’t he know, wasn’t he aware?

“I love how it feels...” he whispered his encouragement, “do it again... .” his rough voice rushed over her like thick honey.

Of course, he knew. He always knew.

Liz tensed sharply. She wasn’t aware she had been holding her breath.

Red wedged his arm between their bodies, his thumb rubbing teasingly against her swollen nub.

Liz felt as if she would shatter into a million pieces if she gave into his incessant prodding.

Her emotions were raw... Her body crying out for release.

But... if she didn’t give in... she felt her flesh would burn alive, her body would be consumed in flames.

“I love you, Elizabeth.”

The simple statement was her undoing.

She flung her arms about the man’s neckline, her mouth searching ardently for his.

Red pushed repeatedly into the tight sheath, his thrusts increasing fervently as the tension in his own body mounted.

“God, your pussy feels so good.” he panted warmly against her neck, sending shivers down her back. “It’s so good...” his voice shook with heightened passion. “Shit...I can’t stop.”

Liz’s stomach tightened watching... listening to the man lose himself to the passionate exchange.

“Baby...” his large hand wrapped about her nape, his fingers tightening in her thick hair, “I’m gonna come.”

Within seconds the most arousing, primal cry ripped from Elizabeth’s throat.

Red’s low, rumbling growl followed by a sharp guttural gasp, mingled with yet another feminine groan.

The atmosphere was charged with sexual tension for one brief eternity as both lovers found a common release in each other’s body.

~~~♥~~~♥~~~♥~~~♥~~~♥~~~♥~~~♥~~~♥~~~

Ressler inched forward quietly, careful not to disturb the ground over which he walked.

Limbs and dried leaves were making a rough go of it.

A twig snapped under his weight. The man hesitated, grimacing for the fact.

The sound was muffled in the loose dirt. He hoped he had not given his position... or presence away.

Focusing his vision into the inky darkness, nearing the darkened outline of the large vehicle which loomed in the near distance.

He pulled up short. Even in the shadowed area, the glint of the deep silver alerted the Agent to the true color of the car.

It had appeared black in the indistinct light of a quarter moon.
Was that Reddington’s SUV? If so, what the hell would the man be doing out here in the middle of nowhere... this late at night?

The agent halted, uncertain as to his next move.

He was able to see through the windshield into the interior of the car. The front seats were unoccupied.

Creeping forward, weapon drawn, pointed down, out to his side, as was protocol.

He scanned the nearby surroundings.

Shadows hid much. The heavy brush and overgrowth a possible lurking spot for... anyone or anything.

His ears strained for any sound amid the rustling wind coming off the mountain range surrounding them.

He cocked his head, attuned to the low tone of a male voice carried on the warm breeze.

Ressler started. Lifting his weapon instantly.

A worried scowl puckered his forehead for a very feminine cry pricked the silence of the night.

His eyes dilated, his mind focusing. The man eased carefully down the side of the vehicle, alert and cautious.

~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~

Red tensed.

Elizabeth felt the change, seeking him out.

The chiseled jawline was set, the full lips tight, pressed together.

Grasping his weapon, he sat his free hand on Elizabeth’s torso, stilling the woman’s normal reaction.

He first caught the movement as a shadow passed in his peripheral vision.

Red’s demeanor alerted Elizabeth. She remained still and silent waiting it out.

He placed his finger to his lips, signifying she should remain quiet.

Red turned, following the shadowy figures trek. He waited, gun targeted. He hastily adjusted his clothing best he was able and now was poised... weapon pointing out the opened hatch.

Ressler weighed his options. His senses told him, he had been seen. The night was too still. The hairs on the back of his neck tingled with alarm.

“Federal Agent!” he barked his best command tone.

Using what shield the back panel of the vehicle offered, which wasn’t much, if whoever was in the back of this damned car decided simply to shoot through the flimsy metal which seemingly protected him.

Red’s finger lifted off the trigger of his weapon with a heavy sigh.
“Exit the vehicle immediately!”

Elizabeth’s eyes widened drastically, a small gasp of shock escaping her.

Red’s large hand clamped over her mouth, silencing her instantly. The man’s dark eyes penetrated hers, the look on his face demanding she comply. She quickly jerked her head, understanding the parameters he sat down.

“Aren’t you…” Red spread his hands out to the Universe, his tone rather unfriendly.

Ressler lowered his weapon, annoyed beyond belief, “What the hell…” he shifted about the vehicle, his own ire present, “are you doing out…?” his words trailed away.

Federal Agents were trained observers.

Ressler observed… a set of men’s shoes laying haphazardly on the ground before him, a bunched up pair of lace panties… a pair of bare feet, very feminine ones, and Reddington… kneeling between them.

His mind clicked as he added up all the variables. He was a guy… so he got it almost instantaneously.

“…Oh.”

“Really?” Red was not a happy camper. He somehow scooted somewhat into view, his expression not exactly a welcoming one.

“Well, what the fuck!” Ressler spread his arms, allowing his frustration.

He noted immediately Reddington’s condition. The usually impeccably dressed man was now decidedly… disheveled.

The guy’s shirt was untucked, hanging askew. His pants loose, unattended.

The bare feet had turned into shapely legs.

“I always pay my debts,” Red explained patiently, his tone verging on sarcasm to Ressler’s ears. “My little waitress wanted her gratuity.” he waved an imperious hand into the shadows of the car, “I’m in the midst of… giving it to her.”

Ressler rolled his eyes, his head shaking his growing annoyance.

“Is that against some Federal Regulation of which I am unaware?”

“Well, how the hell was I supposed to know?” Ressler defended himself. “I was just doing my job.”

“And I was doing mine.” Red smiled ever so pleasantly. “A task I should very much enjoy returning to.”

Ressler dropped his head. He was never going to live this one down.

Reddington, on the other hand… seemed to have dismissed the entire episode.

The man scooted back to his previous position, a soothing tone used for the woman that waited inside.

“Forget about him… you concentrate on me.” the man was advising.
Ressler felt very much like a third party, but something perverse kept him rooted to the spot.

Red knew he had to get them out of this sticky situation and fast. He upped the ante hoping his ploy worked.

Elizabeth grimaced adorably, her expression an anxious one.

“I’ll give you all the tip you want, baby.” Red proclaimed to any and all drawing a stifled giggle from the woman. One she muffled with a hand over her mouth.

“Fuck... my balls ache.” Red enjoyed the small snort from Lizzy. “I’m going to fill you so damned full of cream....” the man continued, amused for her reaction, “it’s going to be running down your thighs.”

Ressler pulled an ‘eww’ face, turning quickly making his getaway back through the multitude of trees and shrubs which impeded his hasty escape.

He tried to block the visual provided, but couldn’t.

He trudged resolutely back to the cabin, his mind filled with the disturbing thoughts.

What would it be like... to stand there and watch? Would he even want to... join in at some point?

The man’s dick hardened. He winced, moving it about to ease the ache.

What the hell was wrong with him? Thinking such things!

It was Reddington’s fault. His twisted influence was rubbing off on him... yeah, that was it.

He pushed on, quickening his steps. The farther away he got from the SUV, the better it would be.

What was with Reddington anyway? Sure, the guy had needs. What guy didn’t?

Ressler had been planning on pursuing that avenue with his latest romantic interest himself.

They had only started the dating process and there was some question about the birth control issue. And... she apparently, hated condoms.

Ressler’s mood was dropping by the second.

Birth control.

The man mused.

Reddington’s statement led Ressler to believe the guy was riding bareback.

In this day and age? But again, Reddington was Old School.

Maybe the guy wasn’t aware, it was protocol today to carry test results around like they were credit cards, to be swapped as proof no STD’s were out there, undetected.

Besides, the Agent’s instincts had told him, Reddington had a thing for Keen.

The man could simply be blowing off steam with a very willing partner, sure but... the chance something detrimental could be passed on if ever...

Ressler dismissed the thought which was even more disturbing than what he had just witnessed.
Reddington would protect Keen with his life. Ressler knew that much at least.

He didn’t have to think beyond that constant.

Still, he envied Red Reddington.

A quick roll in the proverbial hay was exactly what Donald Ressler needed this night.

He admitted it, if only to himself.

His steps halted. The cabin loomed ahead.

It was a hell of a commitment to make.

Ressler’s thoughts turned introspective. He stood, leaning against the trunk of a large Fir, fumbling for a cigarette.

He promised himself he would give up the habit and succeeded to a degree. He only rarely allowed himself the luxury.

His head bent, his hands sheltering the flame of his lighter from the wind.

He inhaled the strong, tangy flavor of the tobacco, savoring the taste.

A hell of a commitment. Riding a woman without protection. He had done it with Audrey but they had been in a committed relationship.

Fuck, it had felt phenomenal.

His cock twitched in remembrance. He allowed the freedom, closing his eyes.

He did not lack for a willing partner these days. Sex was a need he fulfilled but deep down, he knew these encounters were transitory, meaningless.

No woman had touched him like Audrey.

There were moments with Samar...moments he usually dismissed rapidly from his mind.

It would never work... they were partners.

It never worked.

But she was so desirable, intelligent, a warm giving woman when she set her mind to it.

Any man would be lucky to...

Donald took another draw on his cigarette. His mind flitted this way and that. At the conclusion of the turbulent exploration of possibilities, he made a decision.

Upon his return to D.C... he would pursue the possibility of a more intimate, lasting relationship with the only woman he truly wished to do so...

It was time.

~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~

“We got caught by a cop.” Liz was all giggles and lightness now.
Red chuckled along with her, “He wasn’t as bad as when Penelope Ann Marston and I were caught by Sister Mary Agnes.” his eyes traced the woman’s nakedness appreciatively, “behind the bleachers at the homecoming game.”

Liz chuckled her delight.

“That woman could wield a riding crop...better than Kaplan.” he loved to make her laugh, the sound was most delightful. “I still have marks, both physically and mentally.”

Liz shook her head, her eyes softening on the man, “Penelope Marston, huh?”

“Penelope Ann Marston.” he corrected. “I was the only one who could tease her about her middle name. Do you know why?”

“Please tell me.” Liz shifted comfortably in his arms. This was one of her favorite times. Basking in the aftermath of their lovemaking but also.... the intimate stories that emerged.

A personal side Red only shared with her... or at least she hoped as much.

“Because I’m special.”

“You’re full of horse hockey.” Liz corrected holding her need to laugh at his antics. “Besides, I thought you would say because you could tease her so well...” she arched her brow meaningfully.

“Well, that too...” Red shrugged, sighing at the nostalgic memory. “I thought I was so special back then.” he admitted.” Life has a way of dissolving youthful conceit.”

“You’re special to me.” she admitted quietly.

His eyes held hers so long she flushed a bit, hastily changing the subject.

“I thought you said you didn’t care if they found out about us... the team, I mean.”

Red nodded silently.

“Why didn’t you just...tell him who I was?”

“Firstly, it’s none of his business who I take to my bed... or in this instance... my SUV.” he advised. “And secondly, if we are to allow them into our private lives, there is certainly a better way and time to do so, don’t you agree?”

She couldn’t argue that point. She wasn’t sure how Ressler would have taken such a shock and now, she was beginning to wonder about Samar’s reaction.

“When did your little waitress come to mind?” she was curious. “You came up with that one pretty rapidly. Was she in your thoughts?”

“The only thing in my thoughts was... how I might get into your hot little pussy.”

“And here I was going to compliment you on your ability to say all those three-syllable words while in the midst of... copulation.” she teased.

“Does it get you off?” he asked, his voice roughened and raspy.

“How crudely put... but, yes.” this time the smile was allowed.
“I feed off your response.” he shared, his eyes boldly measuring her features. “You know that, right?”

Liz didn’t.

“I come harder... and cream longer than I’ve ever done with... the others.”

“Let’s not bring them up.” she scolded. “...Right now anyway.”

Red was given pause for thought. “The point is... I’m more involved all because of your reaction to my efforts.”

She pondered his words, thrilled by the admission, “It’s a two-way street.”

He inclined his head minutely, “I hope it is.”

“And when it gets old?” the thought troubled her. “Having the same old thing day in and day out?”

“Are you already feeling that?”

Her eyes widened, “Me?” she was astounded. “You are the one who likes the variety of life.”

“When it comes to food... wine. The possibilities of adventure...” he conceded. “But I would rather have one woman to which I am committed, warming my bed.”

“Or SUV.”

He smiled, then turned serious for a long beat before he continued, sensing how important the issue was to the woman.

“Lizzy, I’ve had more than my fill of... the others. It leaves you cold and empty inside.”

The man remembered the ‘after’ part.

“I prefer loyalty and love over a quick, unemotional fuck any day of the week.” he did. “Those are not simply words. I’ve lived them. I know what I want in life. There are no doubts on my mind.”

He studied her evenly, “I plan to ensure none remain in yours.”

“I don’t have any doubts.”

He smiled placatingly, “The bravado of youth, again?”

“Stop.” she snapped. “I know my own mind, Red.”

“I hope you do, baby,” he prayed as much most nights. “I’ll get my shoes.” he put an end to the discussion. “Thank God that boot was up front.” he laughed as he retrieved a particularly interesting article dangling it before the woman’s slightly flushed face. “It would have been a dead giveaway.”

Liz grasped the white lace panties from his finger, giving him a teasing look, “Want a souvenir?”

She twirled the lace about her index finger provocatively.

Red snatched out, his reflexes in perfect working order, seizing his acquisition, a smug look on his face.

Lizzy offered him an indignant huff which he found amusing. He stuffed the prized possession in his pants pocket.

He helped her struggle out of the hatch, patience itself.

She primly straightened her clothing, checking her make-up in the side mirror before sliding into her customary seat.

“What am I, the chauffeur?” he laughed at the distracted action.

Liz glanced about immediately catching his meaning, “Oh!” she whacked her forehead, clamoring out changing her position to the front seat. “What the hell was I...” she mumbled, fastening her seat belt.

“What’s on your mind?” he closed her door with a decided click, leaning his forearms on the base of the window.

Liz had rolled it down to breathe in fresh, crisp air.

She loved this place already. It called out to her. The century-old mountains, the towering trees that reached up to the bluest sky she had ever seen.

She didn’t remember what state exactly was God’s country but this had to be it, surely.

“Oh, nothing of import.” she dismissed. “Just musing. Guess it’s one of those evenings.”

Red followed her gaze.

The night was full of sound. He had not noted before. The air smelled of an approaching rainstorm.

The lights of the cabins were dimmed, only the security lamps ablaze.

He craned his head glancing to the inky purple of the night sky.

“Do you believe those stars?” she asked wistfully staring up as well. “They take your breath away.”

“At night, out on the ocean,” Red nodded at nothing in particular, “they look like this, only closer.”

“How amazing.” she practically gasped at the picture painted. “I envy you, having seen them.”

“It reminds you just how insignificant a human being really is.”

“I don’t feel insignificant when I look at them.” she didn’t. “I feel....”

“Humbled?” he smiled down at her, the face lifted like a cherub praying to God.

“Yes.” he had hit in it exactly. She transferred her eyes. “Red...”

“Hum?” he encouraged she continue with her quiet response.

“...Do you see us...” she hesitated. Was it a stupid question?

“Tell me.”

“Growing old together?” she shifted placid eyes, watching his response. “...I mean, do you think we’ll be one of the few who actually... make it?”

“Yes.” he replied without hesitation.
The truth was, originally, the man had visions of himself dying long before he reached old age but... that image kept fading into the background these days.

Apparently, as long as Lizzy was by his side, his will to fight all life threw at him remained strong. He planned to live a long and contented life now.

“You do? You think that?”

“Even with gray hair, you’ll be quite the looker.” Red’s eyes twinkled as the woman’s face blanched at the image he presented. “What about you?” he pushed the envelope. “See us sitting in rocking chairs watching the sunset?”

“A couple of times I have.” she didn’t like to think about growing old though. Was that vain?

“And not once,” he chuckled, “did you imagine yourself with grey hair, did you.”

“Well!” she huffed, “Of course I did.”

“Liar.” he shook his head, knowing a lie when he heard one.

“I do not have a vain bone in my body. I’ll have you know.”

“All I know,” he tweaked her pert nose, “Is that we will finish this life together. If there is a God in Heaven... and I know there is for a fact, since he gifted me you...”

Liz blinked at the wetness gathering in her eyes at the wonderful words.

“...He would not be so cruel as to deny us that path.” Red continued.

“Really, Red?”

“I have no doubt.” he leaned in, kissing her sweetly. “None in this world... or the next.”

She beamed him a smile.

“Now that I’ve found you, Elizabeth.” his eyes held hers easily. “Nothing will take you from me.”

“I don’t want to go away from you.” she covered his fingers with hers, her gaze a loving, trusting one. “So you make sure you keep your word, Red Reddington.”

“I always keep my word,” he tilted his head slightly, his tone holding a confident edge, “...to you.”

Liz sat back, sighing her contentment.

The man crossed to the driver’s side of the car, sliding in.

“You know...” she mused playfully, her spirits high, “I’m past eighteen....” she slid him a seductive look. “I don’t have to go home... or at least... to my home.”

“Your old man doesn’t have to shoot me in where it hurts most,” he waved over his crotch, “with a shotgun but...” he smiled sweetly at her, “he will.”

“He’s not that bad.” she tsked. “Aren’t I worth it?”

“Well, I don’t know...” he sized her form up lasciviously, because even at this moment the woman had leaned her warm palm massaging his already receptive crotch with a loving stroke.
“Let’s go to my home...” he put the car in gear, “and find out.”

June 5

Liz floated between the evasive state of slumber and twilight sleep. Something had awakened her but... what?

Her mind was aware of sounds drifting about but her physical being relished in the warmth provided by the down comforter surrounding her naked body.

She fought the ever encroaching wakefulness.

The room was pitch black which is how Red liked it for whatever reason.

Liz secretly believed it was because the darkness gave an advantage if any would be interloper should intrude.

Red’s eyes were already adjusted. He could see where the other guy couldn’t. Those precious few moments the eye took to adjust was all Red needed to gain the upper hand.

Or... maybe she was just becoming more paranoid in her old age. The thought brought a smile to her lips.

Liz could head the steady hum of the air conditioner. It was somehow soothing.

She allowed her lids to slide shut once more, snuggling down into the cushy softness of her bed.

Fanciful thoughts invaded her mind, pushing any real attempt at sleep aside, however.

A smile curved the woman’s lips as memories surfaced.

A night under Red Reddington’s care... in his bed... would bring a smile to any woman’s lips, she thought ruefully.

After their romp in that damned SUV, Liz thought she would find her muscles stiff and sore.

That was not the case. Not one iota of tension or stress invaded her body.

Eyes softening, a well of happiness surged as details of what had transpired in that car emerged.

Playing with Red was oddly therapeutic. Not to mention, downright fun.

Opening herself to these odd little games had proven very fulfilling on a sexual plane.

Emotionally, she felt as if they were helping her to rewrite her own history, so to speak.
Replacing not so fond memories with certainly more acceptable ones. She didn’t know before, such a thing was possible.

Liz had timidly approached Tom with the thought that perhaps they could broaden the parameters of their sexual activities a few times in the past.

She wasn’t sure what she had in mind back then but something was lacking. She couldn’t have put a name to it at the time.

Now, she realized, it had been the fact there was no true connection other than the sexual aspect.

Red made her feel so many other emotions. Good emotions... amazing emotions... deep abiding ones that shook her to her core.

Last night for instance, he had fallen so easily back into the game, setting the tone for an even more exciting adventure which was to emerge.

So into the proceedings was she at one point that Liz half expected if she and Red became to raucous in their lovemaking... that a bevy of drunken frat boys would burst into the room.

Red wove the scene so well, she was allowed the freedom to immerse herself.

She recalled muffling her cries of passion into a handy pillow, even biting Red’s neckline on occasion when the joy of sex became too much not share with her lover.

Her lover found these incidents most amusing, of course. That he could move her to such heights.

That was okay though because she had moved him a couple times as...

The distinct sound of the door knob unlatching had those blue eyes flying open post-haste.

Liz’s body tensed.

A slight crack allowed the light from the hallway to throw a slanted shaft along the opposite wall... the light shut off hastily, the door gently closing.

Light footsteps scuffed along the hard wood of the floors.

She was no longer alone in the room.

Liz’s senses tingled but there was none of the alarm or uncertainty of danger lurking.

She waited, her ears pricked for anything which might alter that state.

She had not been aware of the running water from the bath before but then, the air conditioner had kicked off.

Someone was in the shower.

Liz processed quickly, her mind sorting rapidly through all possible scenarios.

She immediately ruled out Janet Leigh for the simple fact. If Janet were in the shower then the intruder into her private space would logically be Norman Bates.

Liz shook the morbid thought, wondering over the quirks of her mind. It was Francis’ fault, she concluded after a moment.
Red was in the shower... ergo... who would dare enter her bedroom knowing the man’s propensity for shooting first and asking questions later.

Dembe.

The footfalls were lighter than a man’s. They had progressed to the bathroom door having made only one error in judgement so far.

A slight bump against the ottoman which protruded slightly out into any given walkway.

Liz pondered her options.

Samar Navabi felt more comfortable now. She even searched the nearby wall for a light switch.

The shower water told her of Liz’s location, however.

At first, the agent had felt odd about simply entering someone’s bedroom, even another woman’s, but Aram’s jet lag had kicked in and Ressler said to ask if Liz wouldn’t mind filling a seat at the surveillance table until Aram’s eyes were open completely to the world.

Not finding the light switch, Samar used the small slit of light from the bath door as her beacon.

She opened her mouth to announce her presence just as her hand pushed the door ajar.

Words halted in her throat, no sound escaped at the sight which greeted her unsuspecting eyes.

The dark gaze roamed the male body appreciatively, “Holy...” whispered awe filtered into the woman’s tone as she voiced her opinion of the sight revealed, “...shit.”

Liz bolted upright at the totally recognizable voice, blankets were tossed unceremoniously aside as she fumbled for her robe.

Grasping the satin material, she jerked it on rapidly, clutching the lapels frantically, her senses reeling from the turn of events.

“Samar!” she whispered raspingly, rushing forward, making her way around the bed in record time.

“What are you–”

Samar had pulled the door to quietly, shushing Liz’s approach.

“Stop,” the older advised. “There is no way in hell we can’t take this opportunity... be still–”

Liz gasped indignantly, “What are you–”

“Shh!” Samar hit the woman’s forearm smartly. “You have got to see this!”

“I most certainly do not!” Liz was affronted for Red. She grasped the door handle securely over Samar’s strong grip.

The women were so loud, Red sighed lightly inside the shower, shaking his head woefully.

He lathered his hands absently, tilting his head back and forth, his lips pulling into a grin.

“Jesus!” Samar blew out a breath from pursed lips. “Have you seen what that man is packing?”

“Stop it!” Liz flushed. Red was her property. Samar had no right...
“A friend would not let a friend not see it!” Samar was adamant, hitting Liz’s hand aside, cracking the door slightly.

Dread filled Liz’s gut as she tried in vain to wrestle the handle from the other, more determined individual.

Samar crook her head, signifying Liz should take a peak.

Liz shook her head vigorously but Samar urged her forward with a not so gentle nudge which almost cracked her cheek on the door facing.

Red stood under the hot spray, his warm skin glistening with soapy suds.

One large palm ran across his head, his arm bulging with his movement.

The muscles at his side pulled, tightening his stomach in response.

His back was turned away from them so full frontal was allowed.

He briskly soaped his neckline and shoulders absently, eyes closed to the hot wash of water wetting his face.

Liz watched the suds cascade down his frame.

She was vaguely aware of Samar’s breath tickling the side of her cheek.

Red’s thick fingers massaged the white foam into the wealth of hair on his chest, trailing down slowly to the tapered hair at his stomach.

The frothy rivulets skirted down his slightly parted thighs all the way to his sexy feet.

Liz swallowed hard at the sight of his fingers dancing idly into the light hair of his groin, over his long thick erection.

His sack hung heavily between toned thighs.

His bulging shaft bounced with his languid movements. Soapy water trickled down the ramrod length, the steady stream mimicking the thick cream of his release.

“If I had panties on...” Samar whispered sacredly, “they would be dropping by now.”

Liz snapped the door shut, turning about, her expression more than harried.

“See?” Samar asked triumphantly, “I told you!”

“This was... unconscionable!” Liz was pretty sure of her facts, her hand fluttering to the closed door.

“Yeah.” Samar totally agreed. “Want to see some mo–”

“No!” Liz snapped, smacking the woman’s hand from the vicinity of the doorknob. “Be quiet!” she insisted. “He’ll hear you!”

Red glanced down to his raging hard on.

Thank God he wasn’t a particularly modest or shy man.

Having two women watch, one especially who had no desire to share... while you showered, had its benefits.

He stroked his cock from root to swollen tip, easing the ache.

He lowered his head, letting the river of water run down his body. His thoughts pleasant to say the least.

What a wonderful way to start the morning.

“Hell, he probably knows we were watching.” Samar waved a dismissive hand. She flipped the light on, sighing lightly. “Why is it, all the good ones are taken... or on the Most Wanted list?”

Liz was still trying to regroup. She looked guiltily at the closed bathroom door.

“Did you see his dick?” Samar’s lovely features were incredulous. “I would pay good money to have that thing plowing between my thighs.”

Liz gasped audibly, “Samar!”

“Well, I wouldn’t really pay.” the agent rolled her eyes at the absurdity. “But I bet it would be worth it. It’s evident Red Reddington knows how to treat a woman.” she nodded amiably, crossing to sit on the ottoman.

“Sometimes he’ll give a look that makes my cherry pop... if I had one.” she chuckled. “I’ll tell you... that man is packin’ quiet a weapon and I’ll wager he knows exactly how to use what God has given him.” she arched her pretty brow. “You know, they say the more skilled they are with a firearm the more—”

“We shouldn’t have done that” Liz wailed, interrupting the woman.

“You’ll thank me later.” Samar was relatively sure. “When the shock has worn off.”

Liz sat on the bed, drained. She had to think of dead puppies... anything to get Red’s cock out of her mind’s eye.

That Samar had seen it as well left the woman feeling slightly ill inside.

Samar stood, her palms slapping her thighs absently. “Some woman will be a lucky recipient if she plays her cards right.” her eyes were suddenly all too knowing as they rested on Liz’s face.

“He’s a one woman man you know... you did pick up on that, right?”

“What d-do you mean?”

“Oh, like any man, he’ll fuck anything in a skirt but in the end...” Samar waved an airy hand, “he really will be true to only one female.”

“How do you know... that?” Liz had arisen, her face flushed.

“You know it as well.” Samar wasn’t buying it. “...Has he taken you to his bed yet?”

Liz’s mouth fell agape for such audacity.

“I have to wonder why not... if so?”

“Kill me now.” Liz threw her hands out from her side, her own expression aghast. I expect this from Samar chuckled gently, “You need to blow off some steam... release some of that tension.”

“He’s my C.I.” Liz pointed out. Or was she getting a feel for Samar’s true reaction. Should she confide in the woman about the change in hers and Red’s relationship?

“I didn’t say fall in love with the guy.” Samar glanced about. Had she brought those papers in here? “I said... fuck him.”

Liz’s eyes blinked with shock.

“Use him for your own pleasure.” Samar tried again. “…Okay, Liz. When was the last time you got laid?”

“You’re picking up American slang far too well for my peace of mi–”

“Tom?” Samar rolled her eyes. “While I’m sure he was a stud in the sack... get real, all right. You need a man not some little wanna-be, between your legs.”

Liz shook her head, bewildered, “I haven’t even had my coffee–”

“Reddington gets it.” Samar continued undauntedly. “He would show you a good time without all the hassle. No muss, no fuss.” The woman swiped her palms together to illustrate, “It’s hard... in our line of work. Relationships fall to the wayside.”

Samar fell silent for a beat, thinking on a few of her own ‘failures’.

Liz watched the beautiful face feeling sadness descending but Samar quickly veiled her emotions.

“Reddington could be the perfect guy for you...” she walked to the door, hesitating, the dark eyes leveled and sincere. “As long as you keep your wits about you.”

Samar opened the door, stepping outside into the hallway, “Ressler sent me to fetch you. Feel like an outing today?”

Liz once again secured her robe cinch as she followed Samar to the front of the house.

“I came through the garage.” Samar motioned when Liz had traipsed the opposite way.

Liz’s eyes had fallen on something of more interest for the moment, however.

“Did you hear me?” Samar wondered at the other woman’s hesitation, gesturing to the back door she could now see across the kitchen expanse.

Liz turned questioning eyes to the waiting female.

Samar sensed something amiss, closing the few steps easily.

Liz stared at the pretty face, the disheveled hair of the bundle lying on the living room divan.

Samar thought quickly, “Dembe works fast.” she hoped she covered well enough. “Thought she was interested in Reddington but any port in the storm, right?”

Liz shrugged mentally, “I guess so... isn’t that what you were just advocating?”
Samar fell silent, “I’m not... judging.” but that’s exactly what she had been doing, she realized.

“So whether Red or Dembe,” Liz saw an opportunity and took it, “I’m not either man’s keeper.” she managed a smile. “I’ll get dressed.”

Samar’s cell rang, “Shit...” she fumbled for it in her pocket, “probably Ressler wondering what’s taking me so long.”

“I’ll see you in a bit.” Liz was careful not to disturb the sleeping beauty on the couch.

Samar picked up a stack of papers on her way out the back entrance, phone to ear.

Liz’s eyes fell on the still slumbering face of the waitress from last night’s dinner before returning to the room.

Once inside, she locked the door securely before crossing to the bath, her steps purposeful.

“Enjoy your peep show?” a very masculine chuckle greeted her arrival.

She cast a dark glare at the man, suddenly more upset that the man’s eyes were closed and he had missed it.

“And you women calls us perverts.”

“Why didn’t you call a cop.” she hung her robe on an available hook, sidling closer to the naked man. “Any hot water left?”

Something in her tone alerted him, not all was well. He opened his arms wide.

Lizzy tucked her body inside the welcoming embrace, snuggling lovingly, finding comfort in the man’s erection which slid across her stomach easily.

Her quietness alerted him to her mood. He could only guess at what had transpired.

“I rate only fuck-buddy status in Samar’s world, huh.” he threw out his hypothesis.

Liz lifted sad eyes which rapidly rimmed with unshed tears.

Red’s heart ached for the woman. He had hoped Samar might surprise him but...

“I thought she would understand.” Liz lay her head back on his shoulder.

“Shh...” he soothed, kissing the top of her wavy strands. The water glistened in the dark silk.

He gently massaged her back and shoulders, “We are so much more, Elizabeth.” he reminded. “Isn’t that all that should matter?”

His eyes closed painfully, the small head laying against him nodded dejectedly.

“Give them time, baby.” he suggested. “They might come around in the end.” he wasn’t sure if he believed the words or not, human nature being what it was...

“Dembe, Francis...Silas,” Liz sniffed, “they accept us.” she lifted a hopeful stare. “It’s wonderful but you’re right. I just need this.” she returned to his arms. “Your support... the comfort you give.”

“And hopefully,” he lifted her chin to stare into those blue depths, “my love?”
She smiled, happy again. Liz closed her eyes, relief flooding her very soul.

Yes, she had exactly what she needed here... within the sphere of Red Reddington’s arms.

Her fingers gently traced the bulging veins of his penis. The object had caught and held her attention for many seconds now.

The light touch caused the turgid shaft to jerk.

She felt the man tense.

“Lizzy, this is probably,” he cursed the nuisance which was his raging libido, “not the best time to...” his lips compressed, “I’m perfectly content to simply remain as we are.”

Lifting to her toes, her mouth gently silenced any protests he could make, “We’re more than that.” she whispered against his lips.

Red sensed her meaning. She needed the emotional connection. The thing that only they could share.

He sighed, all the stress of the last decision fading away, feeling her slowly stroke him, building the fire that would soon consume them both.

His lips trailed along the silk of her neckline, drinking in the fragrance he loved so well.

“I love you.” he whispered then abruptly moved, his powerful arms lifting her slight weight, his body pressing hers into the heated wall of the shower stall.

Red absently followed Elizabeth down the hallway, searching for his phone.

“Would you have a plausible explanation,” she stepped aside, waving a gracious hand, “for... this?”

“Jealousy becomes you.” he smiled slowly, sensing her meaning.

Liz snubbed him, pushing past him into the kitchen, “You are so amusing... and diluted.”

Red’s smile widened, “Greg called last night needing a–”

“I didn’t hear your phone ring.” she halted her perusal of K-cups for the coffee machine, her eyes suspicious.

“You were...” he grimaced sympathetically, pausing for effect, “ever so tired after our late night... exertions.”

Liz flushed, ignoring his implication. She crossed to drop the pod into the coffee machine

Red took the veiled slight in stride, preparing his personal blend with the air of an aristocrat.

“Business reared its ugly head. He didn’t want her in harm’s way.” Red had crooked his head to the subject matter now at hand.

The little waitress stirred groggily at the voices drifting from the kitchen, nothing more.

“More likely,” Liz watched the dark liquid drop merrily into her cup, her mood not so cheery, “he didn’t want her making a pass at any and all available associates.”
Red’s grin widened, “You’re in a surly mood this morning.” he sidled up behind the woman, careful not to touch her. He leaned ever so close, his tone holding just the right amount of sexual innuendo. “...I like it.”

Liz threw him a ‘surly’ look but inside, she was smiling.

She crooked her head, the brows lifting imperiously, “Are you supposed to drive her home?”

“Would you mind if I did?” he pressed his luck.

“Would you like your dick cut off with a butter knife?”

“I’m very turned on right now.” the man seemed surprised by the fact. He watched the woman sip her coffee, the blue eyes losing none of the frost of combat. “Greg is coming by this morning to...”

A quiet knock interrupted the explanation.

Red’s hand went instantly to his weapon. Elizabeth turned her head to the back door, “Do they knock politely now?”

“...Some.” Red’s tone was softly menacing as was his eyes until...

“Intruder alert.” Greg Forester pushed his head through the door, a grin on the handsome face.

He glanced at Red’s stance, “It’s always safer to announce one’s arrival around the likes of him.” he shouldered on through the door, sauntering forward.

“Porch pirates proclaiming their presence.” Red beckoned the man forward. “How polite.”

“Oh, please,” Greg looked covetously at the coffee cup in Liz’s hand, “I passed my plundering porch pirate phase back in prep-school.”

“Nothing ordinary about me, Elizabeth.” Greg assured. “Is that coffee free or do I have to plunder it?”

“Pilfer it,” Red corrected handing over a cup, “I believe is the correct terminology.”

“God’s own elixir.” Greg closed his eyes having drank the strong, hearty brew. “All’s right with the world.” he sighed happily.

He checked on the woman who still slept peacefully in the living area. The tiny bundle was visible from the large cut-out bar area.

“Was my little kitten any trouble last night?”

Red noted Lizzy’s flush of embarrassment. The way Greg had said the pet name held a wealth of meaning.

Liz busied herself, fumbling with bread for the toaster.

“Not at all.” Red covered the awkwardness. “Your playtime probably wore her out.” he shared the last with the man alone, his eyes twinkling.

Red understood young lust. There were times of late he found himself loathe to leave his own
“So much to play with,” Greg nodded, sotto voce, “so little time.”

Red smiled, “You should tarry a bit. Take a shower, wake up before you drive back.”

Greg ran a hand over his growth of beard, “These late night affiliations are killing me,” he grumbled, “I’m getting too old, Red.”

“For the work,” Red questioned, “or play time with her?”

Greg spared the man a sardonic glance.

Red chuckled, “Everything will look better after a hot shower.” he slapped the man on the shoulder.

Greg was unconsciously checking with Liz.

She smiled warmly at the man, “You’ll feel human again.”

“...That sounds really wonderful actually.” Greg kneaded his nape hard.

“Mi ducha es su ducha.” Red waved a hand toward the master bedroom.

“Oh, hell.” Greg’s shoulders slumped. “I forgot. I have to get back and approve the manifest.”

He dropped his forehead begrudgingly, “I didn’t want to make a nuisance of ourselves and all the product had not as yet been—”

“Do you have the list with you?” Red offered. “I’ll meet with the distributors and phone the count as soon as it’s in for your approval.”

“Oh, man.” Greg was beaming. “I would owe you big time, Red. I’d kill for an hour to shake the cobwebs.”

“Consider it done.”

“You guys are the best” Liz was included in the gesture. “Really.”

She smiled at Red, surprised to be taken into account by the other man, truth told.

“I have to go... see Samar.” she reminded Red. “You’ll have the house to yourself after a few minutes.” she held up her toast and jelly.

“Give me the keys.” Red waggled his fingers. “I’ll get the invoices. You relax for a while.”

“You don’t have to twist my arm.” Greg was out of the kitchen in record time. “Thank you again, Elizabeth... for extending such hospitality to virtual strangers.”

“Any friend of, Red’s...” she shrugged graciously. “Extra towels are in the linen closet.”

“This is so kind of you.” Greg made a discrete exit.

Red chuckled, sitting his coffee cup down, “Are you truly okay with this?”

“Oh, sure.” the woman shrugged. “I’ll get finished here and head on over to Ressler and the guys.”

“I’ll leave—"
“No, you will not leave Dembe.” she headed him off at the pass. “You’ll not walk into that meeting without back-up.”

“These are friendlies, baby.” he chuckled.

“Friendlies or not,” she put her foot down. “Ressler can come fetch me if he wants me that badly... or I can drive.”

“It’s not that.” Red didn’t want her driving, but it was just a short distance. “You’re unprotected.”

“Greg is here. Ressler is there.” she pointed.

Red hesitated.

“I’ll only be a few minutes, Red.” she exasperated. “I just have to get a few files and my computer.”

“I’ll fetch your computer.” Red held up a hand. “Greg is back there.”

“Well, okay.” she didn’t want any more surprise unveilings today, so she relented.

Red came back in seconds, “Promise me... right over to the team.”

“Hand to God.” she promised.

Still, he hesitated.

“...Really?” she questioned. “Are your spidey senses tingling?”

“No, and that’s what’s bothering me.” he grumbled.

“Go.” she pointed, her manner no-nonsense.

Red leaned, kissing her soundly, “I’m going to buy you a Dominatrix present.”

“Already have one,” she smiled sweetly up at him. “I borrowed it from Mr. Kaplan.” she waggled her brows suggestively. “It’s latex.” she smiled cheekily. “Because everyone should practice safe sex.”

“I won’t be gone long.” he chuckled his amusement. “See if you can stay out of trouble for the duration, hum?”

“Back at ya.”

~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~

Samar had tried to reason it all out. Tried to see it from all sides but in the end her allegiance to one of her own kind had won out.

She was pissed, pure and simple.

Pissed at the way of things... at the world in general.

She didn’t particularly care who knew.

The woman shut the door behind her with a bang, entering the ill-lit area, her eyes blinking, adjusting from the bright sunlight outside.
Ressler started upright in his seat, snapping alert.

Aram struggled from his half-asleep state as well, both seeking out the cause of their disturbance.

“What the... hell?” Ressler demanded just barely managing to catch the equipment sent his way.

Samar plopped down opposite him in the chair provided, arms folded over her chest.

She eyed the other occupants of the room belligerently, the long tresses shaking ominously, the dark eyes flashing fire.

“What’s your problem?” Ressler wasn’t sure he wanted to know.

“Why are men so stupid?” she demanded an answer, rising angrily.

Both ‘men’ exchanged puzzled glances.

“Navabi... I got maybe an hour’s sleep last night. I’m not really in the mood for a philosophical chat or twenty-questions.”

She sent him a death glare.

“You want to cut to the chase here?” he tried a more reasonable approach.

“Reddington was supposed to be smarter than most of his species.” Samar ranted for Liz’s sake.

“Turns out... he’s just as stupid as all the rest.”

Ressler scratched a palm over his head, his own irritation rising.

“I’ve never thought of Mr. Reddington as... stupid.” Aram differed to disagree.

“Oh, really?” Navabi turned on a dime. “Then why did he bring his little fuck toy home with him last night?”

Aram’s face ashened. First, for the vulgarity coming from such a voluptuous mouth and second, “The waitress?”

Ressler’s head fell back. It was beginning to throb, “Oh, hell... not that.”

Samar’s interest was immediate and focused, “You knew?” she accused. “And you didn’t tell me?!”

“Why would I tell you?” was a mystery to Ressler clearly. “Hell, I didn’t even want to know myself!”

The silence in the room was deafening.

“I don’t understand,” Samar slumped back in her chair, the conversation sapping her strength, “I thought... hell, we all thought...”

She checked with her contemporaries, “Didn’t we?”

“That Mr. Reddington wanted to get in Agent Keen’s pants?” Aram offered meekly.

“Why are we even having this conversation?” Ressler pleaded his cause.

“Yes!” Samar pointed exactingly to the computer geek.
“But, isn’t that just the ruse they are perpetrating?” Aram was confused now.

“Didn’t you sense it was more?” Samar could not believe men were so blind and yet... if that were the case... “Then why did he bring that Jezebel home last night?”

“Trollop?” Samar offered cheerfully.

“It’s none of our business.” Ressler practically yelled his belief.

“I’m completely thrown on this one.” Samar stated. “I’m beginning to doubt my own judgement.”

“Well, maybe we should.” Aram agreed hastily. “We don’t know if the young lady is a... tramp, do we?”

“She said, trollop.” Donald reminded uneasy with the adjective.

“We have a pretty good idea.” Samar folded her arms, then sighed. “Maybe I am being a little harsh.” she shrugged. “Why am I bitching about her?” she scowled. “Reddington’s the whore.”

“What?” Ressler’s brow furrowed. “Did you expect Reddington to remain celibate for a long shot that might never materialize?” the man dropped his forehead against his palm, pressing hard into the ache, “What the hell am I even saying?”

“...No.” Samar sighed reluctantly. “...I feel like an idiot now.”

Ressler’s scowl increased, “And why would you feel that?”

“Because I was standing there, foot-in-mouth, trying to convince Liz to take Reddington on as her fuck-buddy.” Samar explained in an overly polite manner.

“You did... what?” Ressler questioned the woman’s sanity.

Samar continued, “All the while, not knowing Reddington’s little...”

“Trollop?” Aram supplied helpfully.

“Floozy,” Samar corrected with a smirk, “was lying there, half-naked on the couch after a night of God-knows-what.”

Unwarranted visions flashed in Ressler’s mind’s eye, “God, don’t bring that up.”

Samar glanced at him suspiciously, “What does that mean?” she demanded.

Ressler hesitated, then leaned closer, “Look, it’s none of our business of course, but...”

Aram was jerked back by his head set. He had slid too close to the hastily lowered voice Ressler adopted.

He rid himself of the nuisance hastily, getting as close as possible to the ensuing conversation.

Ressler shared his late night encounter, “So I rounded the corner just in time to catch them...”

“In flagrante delicto?” Aram murmured his shock.

“I drew my weapon on them.” Ressler wanted his side of the sordid tale told before Reddington’s came out.

“You are such a prude.” Samar tsked.

“How the hell was I supposed to know?” Ressler defended himself. “I heard a woman... she sounded in distress.”

Samar lifted a brow, “Maybe she was... if you had seen Reddington’s cock–”

Aram’s gasp was more than audible.

“And when the hell have you ever seen his cock?” Ressler demanded to know.

Samar rolled expressive eyes, “This morning... in the shower.”

Aram gasped... louder.

“Not with me.” Samar dismissed the misconception. “He was alone.”

Ressler’s mind was boggling, his expression said as much.

“Oh, don’t even!” Samar refused to live under a double standard. “As if you two perverts wouldn’t grab a chance to see me or Keen naked.”

Aram blushed heatedly.

Ressler’s scowl increased.

“Don’t judge me because Liz was there too, right alongside me,” Samar informed the self-righteous bastards. “Little Miss Goody Two-Shoes.”

“The other agents call her that... not me.” Ressler bristled. “I used to knock the hell out of them for it but then I wondered, why?” he spread his hands out to Aram.

Aram shrugged helplessly, “It really isn’t a derogatory term.”

“Not in this day and age.” Ressler agreed.

“I’m sorry I said that,” Samar digressed, “... about Liz.” she grimaced. “You two just make me so crazy, that’s all.” she cast them both a look. “It’s your fault.”

Ressler threw up his hands.

“Well...” Samar second-guessed herself, yet again. “Maybe it was my fault for insisting she take a peek but come on,” she pleaded her cause, “the man is hung like–”

Ressler arose post-haste, “Shut it! No more please, for the love of God!”

Samar’s mouth snapped shut... for all of two seconds, “You’re just jealous.”

Ressler drew up short, narrowing his eyes, “Why should I be jealous.” he was beside himself. “How do you know I’m not hung like a... whatever it was you think he’s hung like?”

Samar cocked her head, checking him out, “...Are you?”

“I’m just saying... don’t assume.” Ressler turned on his heel, barking back the words.
Aram was biting his thumb anxiously, “Can’t we all just get along?”

Both combatants spared him a vexed glance.

A shoe pounding on the upstairs bedroom floor let them know, the discussion was getting a little loud.

Aram closed his eyes, dread filling his mind for such a callous statement.

“Is that the best you got?” Samar’s hackles rose. “I haven’t heard that before.”

Ressler immediately regretted his statement, “I’m sorry,” he quickly apologized, “I’m sorry, Navabi. That was...”

The woman read his sincerity, calming as well.

“I’m sorry,” Ressler couldn’t look her in the eye for a moment. He felt horrible to have stooped to the level of his contemporaries.

The silence was a reprieve for all concerned.

“...Look,” Ressler sought the dark eyes out finally, “I know you’re just defending your friend. I got that.”

Samar settled even more so, her look a rather sheepish one.

“My senses were telling me the same thing at first,” the agent reasoned, “but with all that’s gone down,” he gestured, “I guess we were wrong, right?”

Samar took a deep breath.

“Reddington knows all the pitfalls that relationship might entail.” Ressler continued. “He’s not stupid.”

“By any means.” Aram agreed.

“If he has Keen’s best interest at heart, wouldn’t it be better if they were not involved?” Ressler reasoned. “Really?”

“You didn’t see her face.” Samar sulked. “When she saw that... woman on the couch.”

“To involve herself with Reddington is wrong, on so many levels and you know it.” Donald reminded all present.

“We aren’t normal people.” Samar countered. “To have a ‘normal’ life is just not in the cards for us.”

“Yeah but you’re not talking about hooking Keen up with a prospective date off Tinder.” Ressler tried logic and reason.

“Like the men on Tinder are so much better,” Samar stated her opinion. “At least we know Reddington won’t kill her.” she changed her tactics. “It’s so hard to meet a good, decent person, Donald.”

“Are we still talking about Red Reddington here?” the man was flabbergasted.
“Grow the hell up.” Samar’s anger was returning. “For the most part, he is good and decent.”

“Unless you cross him.” Donald reminded.

“In my world,” Samar pointed out, “that would make him a revered leader of men.”

Donald spread his hands helplessly. He couldn’t argue with her logic. Samar came from a different world. Different values, different beliefs.

“Maybe Agent Keen isn’t aware of Mr. Reddington’s interest?” Aram offered a suggestion. “If... there is ‘interest’ involved here, I mean.”

Samar lowered the binoculars. She had been scrutinizing Lawford’s domain meticulously.

“Well, it’s true.” Ressler laughed hollowly. “Sometimes she’s not the sharpest tool in the shed.”

Samar opened her mouth to defend and criticize.

“Hear me out.” Ressler held up his hand in the universal ‘peace’ sign. “Take Tom Keen... how many times did she have to be hit over the head before finally kicking him to the curb?”

“She is young and hopeful for the world.” Samar reminded.

Aram nodded his agreement.

“Okay, every case we go on...” Ressler ticked off his reasons on his fingers, “Reddington forewarns of all the dangers and pitfalls...”

Samar waited patiently for once, binoculars dangling in idle hands.

“She rushes in, gung-ho to do her thing, thinking she knows more than a seasoned criminal on how to handle any given matter.” Donald pointed out.

“Like you, you mean?” Samar batter languid eyes at the man.

“All right yeah but... I’m a guy.”

Samar took no offense smart enough to know the statement actually held merit for some occasions.... she was loathe to admit.

She was a highly trained operative and several times a larger foe had landed her on her ass with a well-placed fist to the face.

Donald, on the other hand, could take a punch... he’d had so many delivered in his time as an agent, they seemed to bounce right off him. Or at the very least, he was used to his brain rattling about. She smiled to herself at the thought.

“No offense meant.” Donald was quick to point out.

“None taken.” Samar bowed her head in deference.

“My point is...” Ressler had almost forgotten his point, “Reddington may have been smacking her in the face with clues he was ‘into her’, metaphorically speaking...” the man powered his laptop up, “say our instincts were right, of course.”

“Which has not been proven,” Aram stated emphatically.
“...Just for argument’s sake,” Ressler wasn’t ready to concede either way on the sordid subject, in truth, “maybe everything he’s tried has zinged right past Liz’s face?”

“Then he would lay his cards on the table.” Samar disagreed. “Say it outright.”

“Okay,” Donald shrugged. “If that’s the case, the only thing we can assume is... Keen didn’t go for it.”

“Which would explain Mr. Reddington’s understandable dalliance with this young, ‘willing’ lady.”

All pondered the evidence set before them.

“Maybe he’s simply attempting to regain Agent Keen’s attention.”

“By fucking another woman?” Samar shifted a wary stare.

“Do you have to be so crude?” Aram’s shaft lengthened each and every time the lovely agent spoke so freely.

“I thought you liked it?” Samar smiled sweetly her eyes dropping meaningfully.

“God, don’t you two start.” Ressler groaned.

Aram flushed, fumbling with his headset. All thumbs suddenly.

“Reddington is a very persuasive man.” Samar sensed as much. “Liz wouldn’t stand a chance against him if he truly wanted to stake a claim.”

“Says you.” Donald disagreed entirely.

Samar shrugged.

“I think, whatever has gone down between them is over and done.” the man continued. “Reddington was riding...” he trailed off.

Aram looked innocently, waiting.

Samar was already calculating and sorting, “Was... what?”

“Nothing.” Donald abruptly changed subjects. “We have work to do.”

“Reddington was... what?” Samar insisted, stepping closer. “Why are you so certain everything is over and done?”

Ressler knew the woman would not let his slip pass by unchallenged. “It’s a personal thing Reddington would not like advertised, okay?”

Samar hesitated, fiddling with the straps of the spyglasses, “So, it’s your considered opinion Reddington has moved on.”

A weight settled in Ressler’s chest but he wasn’t sure why the prospect disagreed with him, “Yes.”

But after what he witnessed last night between the waitress and Reddington, he could draw no other conclusions.

“...Then he’s just as dumb as the rest of his gender.” Samar sighed heavily, returning to her busy work. “Just as I originally thought.”

Ressler thankfully let the matter ebb.

Aram grimaced to be lumped into the general consensus but he too, went back to his task, grateful the episode hadn’t blossomed into out-and-out war.

Liz had meant to vacate the cabin instantly but a phone call from home delayed the departure.

Nora had called to share an amusing incident between Keres, the cat, and Hudson.

A fight ensued when Hudson tried, unsuccessfully, to confiscate Keres’ favorite cat-nip toy.

General confusion and chaos ensued with hilarious results.

It was so good to hear Nora’s voice. Liz hadn’t realized how much she missed home and her friends there.

The guards had been very helpful in moving furniture and lugging boxes to the downstairs apartment allowing Nora to settle into her new domain.

Hastily finishing her toast and coffee, Liz hurried along, passing through the French doors.

It was such a lovely day, she walked outside while visiting on the phone.

Her footfalls hesitated.

The house was quiet.

How odd. It felt weird. Not bad weird just...

She had become so accustomed to Nora puttering in the kitchen. Sounds of laughter from passing guards. The gruff bitching of Silas’ deep timbre over any and all perceived grievances.

Comfort was found in those sounds. Liz loved those sounds.

To think, at one time, she found them intrusive, unbearable even. Resented what she thought they represented.

What a fool she had been.

Red never thought her incapable. He only supplied back up in rough, uncertain moments.

He surrounded her with capable, quality people whom she had grown to care for deeply.

For all Silas’ rough, sarcastic exterior... she felt so safe when he was about. Most of the guards held some quirky, amusing traits she found likable, endearing even.

And then there was Nora. Precious, patient Nora. The quintessential mother figure Liz secretly longed for her entire life.

Yes, the sounds that filled a house... a home, meant so much especially if they were absent.

Liz sat her cup and saucer in the sink, glancing fruitlessly about for her purse.
Where the hell had she dropped it last night? Odd, where once before, because it held her weapon and badge, the damned thing was attached to her hip.

Things which once permeated her life were almost second thoughts now.

Her eyes fell on the computer bag Red fetched earlier for her.

What the hell did it all mean? Was she losing herself in the world created for her and if so... it didn’t seem to matter all that much.

She was happy, clear and simple.

Her footfalls were light and carefree as she made her way to the master bedroom. Even the boot didn’t aggravate her as it usually did.

A male voice pulled her up short, her first instinct was to panic.

She was sans weapon... and–

“I didn’t tell you to stop.” the low, melodious murmur did not sound particularly menacing, however. In fact, it sounded... contented and ever so mellow.

“I can’t find it in me to... reprimand you.”

Liz stared at the half-cracked door facing, rapidly weighing her options.

Should she back off quickly, make a hasty retreat or–

“Oh, but... you so love to be reprimanded,” the gruff tone altered to a hoarse whisper, “...don’t you?”

A soulful moan accompanied the proclamation.

A very feminine whimper followed.

Elizabeth startled visibly, eyes widened with shock.

“You have been such a good little kitten, however...”

Liz finally recognized the insatiable way in which that word was stated.

That... word.

“You can do better than that.” Greg Forester’s tone was provocatively silky in nature. “Such a warm little mouth...”

Elizabeth’s mouth fell open for her senses were alerting her far before her brain, as to what was going on behind that half-closed door.

Liz’s first instinct was to sneak stealthily away, retrace her steps but something perverse held her stationary.

“You want my cream, kitten...” he coaxed.

A soft whispering moan met Liz’s ears.

“Then work harder...” Greg persuaded artfully.
Another contented sigh followed.

Liz hesitated, inching forward enough to peek through the crack in the frame.

Her hand came up instantly to her mouth, and she barely stifled a gasp.

She could see a shadow of a man, a very... naked one. His thighs were thick and muscular.

A woman was on all fours before him, attending to a very prominent erection.

Brown hair obscured the female’s face until gentle fingers moved the long curls aside.

Greg bunched the dark strands in his fist when she suckled the tip.

“...Yes.” the man chuckled hoarsely, hissing his delight. “Suckle me with that little tongue.”

Liz’s face flushed fully, and she drew back hastily, cheeks ablaze.

That’s what one got when one eavesdropped, she supposed.

She swallowed hard, fighting her blush determined to make a gracious retreat if only to salvage some of her dignity.

“You do me so well, little one.”

The husky statement stopped Liz in her tracks much to her chagrin.

“You love my cock in your mouth?”

Liz’s hand flew to her red cheeks.

“I know just how much, but I guess I can’t fault you.” Greg was literally petting his little playmate. “I very much enjoy licking my kitten’s pussy... it tastes so sweet.”

Liz’s hands went in the air. On that less than cryptic note... she was more than determined to vacate.

My God. She had been reduced to nothing more than a peeping Tom!

“Come here...”

Liz’s eyes flew to the door facing.

“Daddy will give you all the cream you want...” he soothed, “but... only my way.”

Liz covered her ears, her brain screaming...

Go... Leave... Do not stay here!

Greg growled his delight, “You want daddy’s cock inside your hot pussy, don’t you.”

The woman seemed more than eager for such an eventuality.

He pulled the woman upright, pulling her curvaceous frame flush against his muscled body, kissing the mouth that had given him so much pleasure.

“Let daddy get his favorite pussy all nice and wet for his cock,” he growled against the woman’s pouty mouth.
The hand cupping the woman’s bottom smartly popped the giving flesh.

Liz startled at the unexpected action and more so, the reaction.

The woman gasped even as she melted further into the man’s embrace. His large palm soothed the love tap, rubbing across her cheeks tenderly.

His thick fingers slid into the space between her thighs, kneading the soft skin before delivering another concentrated, yet oddly sensual spank to the lower curvature of her ass.

Liz grimaced, turning about, blindly searching for a way out of the predicament she had gotten herself into... running instead into—

Red Reddington’s hard chest.

Steady hands righted her, amused eyes staring down at Liz’s astonished ones.

He placed a cautionary finger to his lips.

Liz’s blush was back in full force. She pushed determinedly, trying to turn the man about that they could leave this horribly private place.

Red resisted, however, holding tightly to prevent her escape.

He craned his neck, watching the show taking place.

Liz refused to look, decorum suddenly a must.

“Oh...” Greg was beyond hearing or caring about any intrusions at this stage.

His large hands cupped the woman’s petite bottom, his fingers strategically placed to elicit a most appreciative groan of acquiescence.

“Look how anxious my kitten is... for her gift.”

Red grinned slowly watching Greg stroking his cock along the sodden folds of his lover’s vaginal area.

“But this time...” Greg’s tone hardened, “I want something in return, Alison.”

The young girl whimpered for the unexpected delay, “I’ll obey you, daddy. Please... please...”

The pleading sounded far too real to Liz’s ears. She pulled at her captured arm throwing Red a meaningful ‘look’.

“Give me your cock...” Alison was aching, it was clear, “I need it so much.”

“I’ll give it to you...” Greg was calm and firm, “but you must give me something I want.”

“Anything!” Alison wiggled about fretfully, “...Anything.”

The woman rolled her hips, pressing her center into the rigid flesh of his penis.

Red’s brow lifted, Greg was handling the matter well in his opinion.

Greg pulled the condom free, reinserting his cock into a more than willing receptacle.
“This time...” Greg was in total control, “when I give you my cream... you take it and keep it safe and warm.”

Alison’s head fell back, her back arching as Greg slid further into her willing body, “Daddy...” she moaned piteously.

“What’s it going to be, Alison?” Greg’s jaw pulsed, his palm running a searing path between the woman’s full breasts.

“...No...” she reached for the man, “Not now... later...”

Red held a hand when Liz would have responded to the urgent denial.

“Then...” Greg removed his shaft completely, “we can’t do this.” he took a deep breath, releasing it shakily. “Don’t think any other man can give you what I can... will play with you just how you want... you already tested that hypothesis. What did it get you?”

“B-But...”

“I want you to give me a little kitten of our very own, baby.” Greg rubbed enticingly up against the hot, ripe body awaiting his pleasure.

“I want that more than anything,” he stressed. “We’ll make a new... more binding contract but only this time, on my terms.”

Red’s brow arched with understanding, a smile pulling at the man’s lips.

“...No.” Alison pouted.

Greg crawled over the woman, his shaft laying perfectly against the swollen flesh.

The woman backed away only to be caught in his sure grasp. The man settled his weight into the small body, his hand cupping the small head in his large palm.

“Daddy does not like that word.” Greg husked.

Alison panted shakily, her mouth straining to touch his.

“Say, yes...” his lips grazed the plump mouth, teasing the heightened flesh.

His hand slid the length of her body, rolling them slightly. His wrist flicked, delivering another smart pop across Alison’s ass cheeks.

It was all Red could do to hold Liz back.

“Say it...” Greg rasped roughly, “say, yes, Alison.”

Tightening her arms about the man’s shoulders, Alison nodded against his neck furiously, “Yes, daddy...” she was more than a willing victim suddenly, “...Y-Yes, Greg...” she amended.

Liz stopped her struggles, her senses reeling for the more than hasty capitulation on Alison’s part, her mouth falling agape.

Red grinned down at her.

She jerked away indignantly, a mix of emotions flooding her.
“Baby...” Greg was just as suddenly all caring and warm and loving. “I love you so much. You drive me crazy at times,” he peppered her mouth with lingering kisses. “I want you so desperately.”

Red closed the door quietly, motioning.

Liz gladly made her escape from the incredibly claustrophobic area.

“I know how that looke–”

“Ressler called.” he halted the woman’s words. “There has been a development.”

“Fine, but I want to explain–”

“Nothing to explain.” he shrugged. “We should go.”

He had walked gathering her computer bag and... purse which hung unobtrusively on the back of a dining room chair.

“I don’t want you thinking...” she was becoming frustrated, “that I deliberately–”

“We’ll talk...”

His tone was much as Greg’s suddenly and the way his eyes looked at her, made Liz all weak and compliant inside.

“...Rest assured,” the man continued, “but... it’s a conversation that may take hours.”

Liz feebly accepted her bag, her thoughts swirling chaotically.

“I don’t want any interruptions...” he tilted his head, his eyes deepening considerably, “... none what-so-ever.”

~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥

Liz fidgeted this way and that in her seat.

Red’s amusement over her supposed predicament increased.

She kept looking at the back of Dembe’s head, a concerned scowl tracing the pretty brow.

Did she think the man could read her guilty thoughts?

Red glanced out the window. The second cabin was easing up on his right.

“Dembe,” Red’s eyes met the other man’s in the rear-view mirror, “tell me again why I insist upon dealing with the Canadians?”

“One... they have easy access to Russian Vodka.” Dembe did not miss a beat. “Two... their hockey teams are the best in the world.”

Red’s idle talk eased Elizabeth’s mood, he noted. “Again...” he shook his head as if to clear the cobwebs, “this is incentive, why?”

“One, you have a great distaste for the swill other countries produce.” Dembe iterated verbatim, Red realized. “And secondly, when you place a bet on any given team your chances of winning are highly increased.”

“Well, I do so love to win.”

“You are very competitive.” Dembe agreed.

“Still,” Red sighed heavily, “it doesn’t seem enough.”

“Did the meeting not go well this morning?” Liz was glad to stop the harried thought of her time spent, spying on Greg Forester and the man’s little kitten.

“Well enough.” Red shrugged. “I just detest stupidity in all its radiant forms.”

“And half rate hooch,” Dembe drawled.

Liz was stymied, “The shipment was bad?”

“Good booze,” Red corrected, “incredibly inept handlers. I’ll inform Greg of the issues...” he turned a lazy stare Liz’s way, “later... after he’s finished with his current project.”

Liz flushed, averting her eyes.

Red held his grin, “You are a constant delight to me, Elizabeth. Have I told you so?”

She sought him out, “You mean, you like poking fun at me.” she corrected moodily.

“I mean,” he leaned, kissing her temple lovingly, “It’s these little moments I live for these days.”

His tone and gaze was so tender, Liz’s annoyance slipped into oblivion.

“How the hell I survived without them before,” the man touched her ear, his fingers tracing the small shell. He watched his progress with rapt attention, “...escapes me.”

“Your moods have definitely improved for the better.” Dembe nodded regally.

“My moods were fine.” Red shifted a languid stare.

“They were not.” Dembe obviously disagreed.

“I love you, Elizabeth.” Red’s tone caressed her. “Not so sure about you, Dembe.”

“Is it my association with your head guard?” Dembe mused thoughtfully. “Which is to blame.”

“Then stop ‘associating’ with him.” Red suggested. He slapped his hands on his thighs.

Liz jumped slightly at the sound, so lost in her other more pressing thoughts.

Red ignored the action, “All right, let’s recap events to this stage.”

He wasn’t sure if Lizzy even heard most of the information he supplied on the first leg of their journey over.

“Michael Benton’s son, Scott and his wife, Sarah... have been clearly targeted by some, as yet, unknown assailant.”

“A sad state of affairs.” Dembe turned his head, listening intently. “One which must be rectified immediately.”
“We are on the same page.” Red approved. He appreciated the slow trek Dembe had taken to reach the other cabin.

These little moments with Elizabeth by his side often erased the vexations of his day.

“Alert Silas to be on standby,” Red asked more than told. “We may need assistance on this one.”

“What will you tell Agent Ressler?”

Liz was interested as well. Red’s priorities had shifted.

Scott Benton had made his own bed with his chosen career but the man’s son and wife were innocent parties in the debacle. That they had been targeted and were now in danger, trumped Lawford’s antics and anything which came with it.

Ressler had to understand, surely.

“Donald already knows.” Red supplied. “...You grab the bags, I’ll get the gimp.” he directed to Dembe.

Liz’s mouth tightened for the slight, then she giggled. She slid her hand into Red’s extended one. He vacated the car and stood now, eyes twinkling with her supposed annoyance.

Dembe came about the car, “No, I meant... will we take the time to wrap up the problem here before leaving for Chicago?”

“There is no time for that.” Red had already decided. “And Agent Ressler realizes as much. We will send assistance in the way of manpower and information.” Red had long since dreaded that course of action.

Moments later, they entered the house to find Samar and Aram at their posts.

Aram had looked better, but he was gamely hanging in, headphones snuggly in place.

Ressler nodded a silent greeting handing over the discussed photos.

Reddington’s brow furrowed as he perused the shots.

“Michael Benton received these early this morning.” the agent explained. “They were taken last night at a charity dinner attended by Scott and his wife.”

Red studied the pictures critically for a beat before handing them over to Dembe.

“If you will have Silas compare those with the ones taken at Elizabeth’s birthday dinner, I would be appreciative.”

Dembe immediately tackled the problem, turning aside.

“What has one to do with the other?” both Samar and Liz were puzzled.

Samar held one listening device to a free ear while listening to the ensuing conversation in the room, her eyes communicating with Liz.

Dembe held his phone aloft, “He wishes to speak with you.”

Red obediently took the phone, waiting patiently for once, “Did you receive the pictures?”
“You have my hopes up.” Silas replied. “Are they dirty, because if so... I’m there.”

“Sorry to disappoint.” Red’s mouth quirked with amusement. “Did they come through?”

“Do you even know the definition of patience?”

“I was under the impression this fantastical age of technology negated the need.”

“It hasn’t even been a minute.” Silas pointed out. “Liz is a bad influence on you... in that regard.”

“I want you to assemble a team and get them to Chicago post haste.”

“I hate flying coach.” Silas grumbled.

“I didn’t say you, I said ‘a team’.” Red reiterated. “They are to secure D.A Benton’s wife and her child.”

“Ah.” Silas nodded his dawning understanding.

“Then locate Hunter Gaines and secure him as well until I arrive.”

“Hunter Gaines.” Silas’ brow lifted, nothing more at the name mentioned but even that signified much to anyone who knew the guard well. “Hang ten, pictures are arriving.”

Red looked over the room absently. Lizzy had found a seat, earphones already attached to her head. Ressler was at the window binoculars lifted. Dembe sat quietly aside in a convenient chair, Sudoku book in hand.

“Oh, I pulled up the shots of Liz at the diner.” Silas had them displayed on another computer at his desk. “...Looks like Gaines’ signature trademark except—” he traced the targets which had been marked on Liz’s head with a careful finger.

Silas’ brow furrowed, “This third one...” he studied thoroughly, “is marked with an ‘X’.” the guard murmured. “Two shooters?”

“A protégé?” Red threw out the possibility.

“We won’t know until we have Gaines to ask him,” Silas stated quietly.

The silence was a static one. “Get the team to Chicago.” Red snapped. “I want Hunter found.”

“Going to Chicago will take—”

“Take Antonio’s jet.” he glanced fondly over a diligently concentrated Lizzy Keen. “Tell him I’ll owe him and... that it’s for his girl.”

“You mean your broad,” Silas grumbled.

“Same difference,” Red smirked.

“Understood.” Silas clicked off without further adieu.

“Hunter Gaines?” Ressler had been paying attention.

“I think he’s been hired to track Lizzy.” Red motioned to the woman who was blissfully unaware of the conversation.
“I’m taking it, this guy is a Blacklister?” Ressler had never heard of him, at least.

“A man who takes his given name far too seriously.” Red returned grimly. “He’s very, very good at his chosen profession.”

Ressler realized the importance of the statement.

“Why Lizzy hasn’t been—” Red trailed off. “He isn’t known for procrastination or failure to do his job.”

Ressler glanced at his partner as well, “He’s targeted Benton as well?”

“It appears so.” Red inclined his head.

“You should hear this.” Samar got everyone’s attention.

Liz swiveled in her seat, the phones pushed closer to her ears as her eyes caught Red’s.

“No... no.” Lawford’s voice filtered into the motionless air, loud and clear. Aram had clicked to ‘speakerphone’. “I already have someone on Benton. He is not your concern.”

Ressler’s brow darkened considerably.

Red held Lizzy’s eyes comfortingly.

“I have another... issue, I need you to handle.” Lawford was continuing, unaware his words were being heard and taped for posterity.

Red stepped closer to Elizabeth unaware of his action as yet. She stared up at him, wide blue eyes clear and smiling.

“Yes, it entails a very nice chunk of change.” Lawford sighed his growing disillusionment with those with which he must associate. “Enough of a cut, minus yours, of course, to even keep my lovely wife off my back for a goodly while.”

Red peered through the binoculars across the field strewn with wildflowers of vibrant hues and shapes.

Windows lined the entire length of the South side of Lawford’s domain. He was standing by one such portal, oblivious to the world around him. The man was lovingly stroking his mistresses uplifted cheek, staring adoringly down at the blonde beauty.

Red was suddenly pleased that soon, he would be sending ample evidence to Lawford’s wife to ensure the woman received a nice alimony settlement.

He could not stomach the callous, almost cheerful tone Lawford exuded when speaking of someone else’s demise.

Finally, the voice on the other end of the line spoke. Red could not immediately place or recognize the speaker.

“If this issue you’re talking about is Holbrook or Reddington...” The man was saying, his voice holding an ever so faint hint of an accent, “you can kiss my ass, I’m not interested.”

All eyes looked to Red, but the man kept his expression purposely unreadable.
“I’ll handle Holbrook.” Lawford’s tone held his disdain, turning moodily, headed for his bar.

“No, you won’t.” the voice on the phone clearly doubted the other’s abilities. “Others better than you have tried... and failed.”

“I’m not paying you for a God damned critique.” Lawford’s good mood was a thing of the past. “This is an easy score I’m handing you... a woman.”

The silence was eerie to Liz’s ears.

“Even you can handle that I suppose.” Lawford snapped.

Again silence spoke volumes to Red Reddington.

“I would move carefully were I you.” there was a quiet menace to the jab. “Do you forget to whom you are speaking?”

Lawford hesitated his complexion blanching. Red smiled ruefully. Even from this distance, he could smell the fear.

“Doesn’t matter to me who the target is...” the voice was continuing, “I’m sure someone out there would pay handsomely for your head... or... maybe I’ll just consider it a practice shot.”

Lawford gulped down his drink, “...Very funny. Are you going to help me with this or not?”

The man’s tone was definitely altered.

“Who is this target?” the voice ended the stalemate, the tone curt and no-nonsense.

Lawford relaxed visibly, “...Elizabeth Keen.”

Liz gasped, her eyes widening with shock.

Red threw the binoculars on the windowsill his steps purposeful.

Dembe exited directly behind the man.

Ressler cursed under his breath, realizing too late the implication of their departure.

He also realized the futility of going after them but in this instance, he had no choice.

Liz hobbled after the agent and Samar, who had run to catch up to her partner.

Ressler was already out the cabin door and into the driver’s seat before Samar slid into her side of the car.

Liz finally managed the space, flinging open the cabin door just in time to see the tail end of Ressler’s car fishtail about a curve in the road.

Ressler was gaining ground fast but there was no way he would catch up to Dembe’s expert handling of the other car.

“Aram–” Liz turned pleading eyes the other man’s way, “drive me.”

“I...I don’t think Mr. Reddington would want you–”

“Then I’ll drive myself.” she stubbornly set out for the Landrover Dembe had procured.
“Well, let me get your purse.”

“Fuck the purse,” Liz called out over her shoulder.

“Aren’t the keys in there?”

“This is your car.” she exasperated.

“Oh, oh, of course.” Aram still hesitated. “Should I wake Wilson and–”

“There’s no time for that.” Liz was beyond herself. “Just give me the damned keys.”

Aram responded to the urgency of her tone and her state, running back into the house.

It seemed ages before Aram was finally behind the wheel because his usual mode of transportation was a mountain bike.

He seemed momentarily lost and disoriented which made Liz want to scream.

“I hate when he does this shit.” Ressler wasn’t being shy about voicing his consternation, his hand gripped the steering wheel tightly as he maneuvered turn after harrowing turn at breakneck speed. “Why does he do this to me?”

“Aram is still recording,” Samar was a little more level-headed, “if Reddington does what we believe he will, it will be swept under the rug as usual.” she shrugged, gripping the handle provided as they hopped a dip in the road. “I don’t know why you’re complaining. If Lawford is out of the picture, your friend Benton is free and clear.”

Ressler screeched to a jolting halt just a few yards from Lawford’s cabin entrance.

Reddington’s car was already there. Both doors opened and gaping, the car sans driver and passenger.

Ressler’s weapon was drawn and at-the-ready as both agents approached the all-too-quiet structure.

The front door was opened, the large side panel hanging askew, off its hinges.

Ressler chanced a peek inside the large plate-glass windowcased along the wrap-around porch with its pergola overhang.

Samar approached for the other side, crouched low, moving cautiously closer.

She watched her partner for hints of directions to take.

Ressler could see most of the spacious living area.

Dembe held Lawford against the far wall just below the stairwell... his gloved hand pinched into Lawford’s throat tightly. Dembe’s gun was cocked and held securely to the other man’s head.

Reddington stood off to the center of the room, unusually quiet, not making any obvious threats.

But then again, why should he bother?

Ressler hurried forward, entering the foyer quickly, his weapon still poised to fire.

It only took milliseconds to survey the scene.
Slowly, he lowered his weapon somewhat, his eyes asking the rhetorical question.

The woman known to him as Lawford’s mistress, whimpered despondently, hidden partially behind the couch to Ressler’s right.

Her eyes said she was clearly in shock.

Samar positioned herself out of harm’s way, but close to the female, weapon trained, her features hard and uncompromising.

Another vehicle approached.

Red’s head whipped about...

“Benton is off limits.” Red drew Lawford’s attention.

Lawford’s eyes narrowed, “What has–”

Dembe cut off his air supply so he shut up for a beat, gasping for air his only real interest for a goodly while.

Reddington just stood, expression blank.

Ressler began to sweat. Something was wrong, but he couldn’t put his finger on it as yet.

Dembe caught an ever so subtle movement in Red’s face, his fingers loosening somewhat.

Lawford gasped drawing in air in huge gulps.

“Call off your dogs, Lawford.” Red finally spoke, his tone quiet, almost pleasant, “Benton is protected.”

“How did you–” realization dawned, “you got this place bugged.”

“You are so intelligent.” Red stated sarcastically. “I can see why Francis holds you in such high esteem.”

“Holbrook sent you?” the man spat. “Well, look at you, his little errand boy. Won’t do him any good,” Lawford laughed hollowly, “Benton’s as good as dead.”

Red inched forward, something in his manner quieting the other man’s bravado.

Red leaned ever so closer to state what had to be stated. He enjoyed the sheen of perspiration and stench of fear emanating from Lawford.

“So... are... you.” Red held the man’s eyes for a long beat.

Lawford looked away first, “I got no beef with you.” he stated almost meekly, “whatever is between Holbrook and me... What is your interest?”

Red remained silent, just staring at the guy. He sighed, his head tilting, “Benton is our interest.” he repeated.

Ressler caught his confused scowl before anyone saw it. Why was the attention suddenly focused on Benton and not Keen?

Liz had accepted Aram’s assistance, hobbling up on the porch, cursing silently for her predicament.

She felt so useless, sensing the others already did what needed to be done.

On the ride over, she wondered what exactly she planned to do to assist them.

She only knew, she could still brandish a weapon if back-up was called for and she wasn’t about to let her friends... and especially Red and Dembe, risk their lives and not offer some sort of support.

She could see that Lawford was under Dembe’s gentle nurturing care already. Samar had secured the mistress.

She had arrived too late.

Too little... too late.

She inched toward the opened doorway. Aram hanging back, taking her old position by the plate-glass window.

Liz had no intention of causing her team any trouble.

She would hang back and listen for once.

There was no need for her even to enter the cabin now.

She would stay out of harm’s way, allowing those more capable to do their jobs.

She peeked about the corner of the doorframe, her eyes meeting Lawford’s for a brief beat.

A sudden coldness gripped her stomach. His eyes narrowed, full of contempt.

She didn’t even know the guy.

What had she done to him? Why did he want her dead?

Liz moved back slowly, her mind reeling. She searched her back cases, wondering if she had encountered the man before but was coming up empty at every turn.

Red had noted her arrival and for once, was proud of her discretion.

“You have what you need?” he questioned Ressler. “He as much confessed his part in a pay-for-hire hit.”

“My God, Reddington,” Lawford was astonished, “you’ve been reduced to nothing more than a common snitch for the FBI?”

“There is nothing common about me.” Red’s look spoke his disdain. “I assume,” he returned his interest to Donald Ressler, “you were still taping?”

Lawford shook his head, “You know the drill, Reddington.” he scoffed openly, “I give the FBI some info and they make me a deal. In a year, I’ll be living in Boca Raton under an alias, free and clear.”

Ressler’s face flushed heatedly.

“So what’s the deal here?” Lawford was still puzzled. “What’s in it for you?”
Red remained stoically quiet.

Liz wondered the same but maybe Red was involved because of Francis? Did this guy really present such a threat?

Dembe turned the criminal over to Ressler’s hands.

Donald shouldered his weapon, reaching for his cuffs.

At that moment, Lawford lurched unexpectedly shoving Dembe off-stride and knocking Ressler to the ground. He struggled frantically to withdraw Ressler’s weapon but the agent held a steady grip.

Lawford judged Liz’s position once again scrambling forward, clearly trying his best to reach his objective.

He rushed for the door, making a beeline for Elizabeth Keen who had stood back, against the outside wall.

Red had bounded over and past the combatants, his objective to put his body between Elizabeth and the impending danger, having sensed Lawford’s intent.

He blocked the small frame with his own larger one, pulling her into the sphere of protection he offered.

Liz thrust her weapon into his capable hands, hunkering low that he might have a better shot advantage if he could manage it.

Samar found an opening in the melee, her weapon firing. The bullet hit Lawford’s thigh, slowing the man considerably.

Donald grasped the same leg, jerking his entire weight on the wounded area.

Lawford screeched a blood-curdling yell, as Dembe righted himself, a beefy hand connecting with the side of Lawford’s head.

Aram kicked out, his booted foot landing soundly under Lawford’s chin.

The man fell back, moaning, all the fight gone out of him. He clutched his leg, blood seeping past his spread fingers.

Ressler stood over the man, his fist coming down with brute force.

Lawford fell into oblivion, the blow landing soundly.

“Police brutality.” Dembe grinned over at the younger agent. “I approve.”

Ressler’s face was grim. He was beyond embarrassed to be caught so off-guard especially before Reddington.

His eyes traveled the room falling on the woman huddled over by the fireplace, a stuffed pillow held precariously in shaking fingers, eyes large and vacant.

Ressler had other priorities, dismissing the mistress entirely. He roughly flipped Lawford over, securing his cuffs.

“Watch my damned leg.” Lawford cursed at the less than gentle handling, grimacing his pain.
“If I had my way,” Ressler growled, “I’d break it as well.”

Dembe grinned his camaraderie.

“Read him his fucking rights,” Ressler hauled Lawford up with Dembe’s assistance. “He makes me want to shoot him in the head.” the agent bitched to his partner.

Lawford threw Liz a glacial stare as he passed.

Red turned his head slightly, his eyes chips of ice, holding Lawford’s easily.

“That fucker will never see the inside of a courtroom,” he stated quietly, so much so, Liz had to strain to hear the words.

“Red,” such talk bothered her, “you don’t have to do that for me... if it’s the reason you–”

“I do have to do it... for you.” Red snapped his head back around. “If only to show others what will happen if they even think about harming you in any way, shape or form.”

Liz was troubled, “The Justice system–”

“Is a damn joke.” Red disdained. “People like Lawford only understand one thing. Are you understanding that?”

Liz was saved a reply with Ressler’s arrival beside them.

“I guess we have to take the asshole to the Emergency room.” he clearly wasn’t happy for the fact. He glanced grimly at the vehicle where Samar and Dembe and Aram waited for his presence. “Maybe he’ll bleed out before we get there.”

“Ress.” Liz scowled.

“Maybe he will now...” Red had fallen into his Irish accent out of the blue, his eyes twinkling almost mischievously, ‘God willin’.”

“Red!” Liz snapped at the questionable humor passing between the two men.

Ressler laughed shortly, “Some of these creeps get under my skin.” he admitted his failing freely. “...Maybe it’s time I thought about a change of careers?”

Red couldn’t imagine Donald Ressler as anything other than what he was.

“You got any openings on your payroll?”

“What a red-letter day, indeed.” Red lifted surprised brows. “Never thought to hear those words out of your mouth, Donald.” he nodded approvingly. “My regard of you has lifted somewhat.”

“Yeah...” Ressler was disgruntled, more so than Reddington imagined. “Well, times they are a changin’.”

He spared Liz a worried look, “We’ll pick up Wilson and Moore.” he motioned with his head. “Get our things and head out to the plane? After we get out of the E.R.”

“Sounds like a plan.” Red approved.

“You may secure your prisoner in the back of the plane.” Dembe offered as Red, Liz, and Ressler approached the SUV. “There’s a small, rather uncomfortable bathroom. You will find a very strong unbreakable chain under the sink.”

Ressler’s brow furrowed more and more with each passing sentence.

“There are several hooks imbedded into the floor... and any number of locks available in the overhead compartment.”

“Why would you–” Ressler thought better of questioning such a set-up. “...Never mind.”

Turning back to Reddington, he spared Dembe one last quizzical glance before, “I have to contact Cooper, notify him of our status. What about the hit on Benton and–”

“One problem at a time, Donald,” Red suggested, reading the guy’s thoughts.

The agent turned his back, motioning Reddington further from the car and prying ears, ignoring Lawford’s entreaties for medical assistance. “Yeah, yeah, don’t get your panties in a bunch.”

“I’m reporting you to your superiors!”

“I could be dying. I need medical attention.” Lawford screamed out the partially closed window from the backseat of the car.

“You need a good swift kick which is about what I’m going to give you if you don’t shut the hell up.” Ressler had stalked to the car, confronting the man.

“One more interruption and I’ll leave your ass in a clump of trees somewhere and you can take your chances with the local wildlife... I hear bears smell blood from five miles away.”

Lawford fell silent, a morose look on his face.

“You aren’t in charge, asshole,” Ressler leaned menacingly close, “I am... got it?”

Red held his amusement.

Liz’s mouth was slightly agape. Samar’s look was one of admiration.

Dembe was scratching a bug bite on his neck, his opinion on the matter withheld.

Aram stepped quickly out of Donald’s path as the man stomped moodily back to where he had left Reddington.

“What is this shit about a hit being put out on...” Donald jerked his head to the woman beside Red. “I thought it was supposed to protect her... being associated with you. What was the whole purpose–”

“Let me worry about, Elizabeth.” Red cut the tirade short. “Do you doubt my ability to protect her under any given circumstances?”

Ressler fell silent for a beat, “That woman in there. She hasn’t really committed any crimes or broken any laws...”

“I’ll see to her,” Red assured.

“As in, you’ll get her home safely, _see to her_, or something more Red Reddingt–”
“How you paint me, Donald.” Red laughed such absurdity aside. “I’ll see to her plane fare and send her merrily on her way.”

“Oh, Ress!” Liz tsked sorrowfully, her disappointment made abundantly clear. She marched back to the car she and Aram arrived in.

“Wrong way.” Red reminded her before she had gotten but a few feet. “Dembe and I shall escort you back to the cabin.”

“I’m not sure I want to go with you.” she snapped petulantly.

“I have chocolate cremes in my car.”

“Are you implying I can be bought?” she narrowed her eyes.

“And fresh donuts Dembe purchased just this morning.” Red evaded an answer, sort of.

“...Chocolate or glazed?” Liz pondered for a goodly few seconds.

“Both... of course.”

She trudged back, “Well... all right but don’t even think you can bribe a member of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.”

Ressler sighed heavily, “You caved like an old ghost mine.”

Liz lifted a haughty brow, “Well, at least I don’t turn green at the mention of baby poop.”

Ressler, right on cue, swallowed bile which had rimmed his throat, hurrying away.

“Touché...” Red applauded the woman’s abilities. “All those sparing contests with Silas have served you well.”

“Yeah...” she shrugged carelessly, “where are the donuts.”

Red chuckled his mirth, heading her way.

“You told that woman to pawn anything Lawford left behind.”

“I did, yes.” Red nodded amiably.

“That was still his property.”

“He won’t be needing it.” Red patted her hand comfortably.

“Stop saying things like that.” she pulled her hand aside. “It upsets me.”

“It upsets you that I am Red Reddington?” Red put it on the line. “Because, Elizabeth,” he had turned to face her in the seat, “it’s who I am.”

“It’s just wrong to kill people indiscriminately.” she was pretty sure. “Some, like the Blacklisters....” she trailed off.

She sounded so pious even to her own ears. Was she setting herself up as judge and jury for... Red Reddington?
“I have never killed indiscriminately, but I have killed and will very likely continue to do so,” Red stated grimly. “I cannot change the past or predict the future. The world I deal in, oft times, can be cruel and unforgiving.”

Dembe drove in silence. He knew, at some point, this conversation would have to take place.

He felt bad for his friends... both of them.

It was a crossroads.

He hoped some sort of understanding or compromise could be reached.

“To survive, I must be just as cruel... and unforgiving.”

Liz glanced out the window, her arms folded over her chest.

What had she expected, she wondered? That she could change what was? That she could change Red Reddington.

Did she even want to change him?

It was her problem, this aversion to taking human lives so... seemingly callously.

And yet, Lawford clearly had no qualms about taking her life.

And why... it was still a puzzle.

She looked at Red, feeling his stare.

“...It’s confusing,” she sighed heavily, “I’m confused.”

“Which is only human.” Red inclined his head. He sat back, pondering over his own thoughts. “Perhaps I have stopped seeing the gray areas in life.”

He shifted his eyes, “What about it, Dembe?” he went to a source he trusted. “Do I only see black and white now?”

“Elizabeth is young still,” Dembe stated. “She can not possibly be as jaded as you and I, concerning our world.”

Red drew in an even breath, exhaling slowly.

“And yes, you do see only in black and white...” Dembe met his friend’s eyes in the mirror, “when it concerns the ones you love.”

Elizabeth moved through the space separating them, her arms going about Red’s neckline. She held on tightly to his stability, glad to feel the strength of his arms in return.

“If it makes you both feel better,” Dembe continued, “Raymond does not kill everybody indiscriminately.” he reminded. “You have many Blacklisters in custody, yes?”

Liz nodded slowly after a moments thought.

“But some,” the large man returned his attention to the road, “Raymond must handle accordingly.”

Red’s jaw pulsed, his arms tightening about Lizzy.
“If Lawford were to discuss what was seen today,” Dembe stressed, “not only would you be in danger, Elizabeth. But Raymond himself.”

“If I could protect you from that part of me, Elizabeth,” Red closed his eyes to the feel of her, “I gladly would but like you... I seem to be at a loss as to how to coincide one part of what I am... with the other.”

She rested her head against his shoulder, “I don’t even know why I should be feeling such things about... that awful man.” she didn’t. “He wants me dead.”

“Stop saying things like that.” Red placed his cheek on the crown of her head. “It takes years off my life and I only have so many remaining.”

“Then you stop saying... that.” she lifted troubled eyes.

Red smiled, his mouth brushing her gently.

“Why don’t you both just stop speaking for a while,” Dembe stated.

Red chuckled and Liz sighed, returning to Red’s embrace.

“I imagine my picture is inundating the underground even as we speak.” Liz bemoaned fiddling with a button on Red’s vest.

“Dembe just asked us not to...” Red reminded tongue-in-cheek, “speak, that is. But... I will handle that aspect of the matter. Do not concern yourself.” he crooked his head. “Do you believe that?”

Dembe tapped a readout of the elaborate dashboard, “Communique for your head guard...”

“A communique...” Liz murmured, impressed, “how very James Bond of you.”

Dembe read rapidly, dividing his time between the road they traveled and the readout. “The plane is secure, and the team is headed out.”

“See?” Red waved his hand expressively. “Silas is on it.”

“Well, I trust the big ape to an extent.” Even now her muscles were easing of tension. “If only because he wouldn’t want to tarnish his reputation if one of his charges got whacked right under his superior nose.”

Red chuckled easily, and she giggled, “Yes,” he agreed wholeheartedly, “thank God for the man’s ego.”

The comfortable silence came. Dembe drove into the paved parking lot halting the car a few feet from the entrance of Greg Forester’s establishment.

As they approached the entrance to the restaurant, both men hooked their arms under Elizabeth’s on either side, lifting her effortlessly up the stairs, unto the spacious portico.

“Oh, stop!” she wiggled out of their grasps, ignoring their shared tittering. “I can get up those stairs faster than you two old farts, let’s all be honest.”

“How quickly they turn on you, eh, Dembe?” Red shook his head woefully.

Dembe grinned over the top of the shorter female’s head, nodding his agreement, “Try to be chivalrous in this day and age...”
Liz sighed heavily for her lot in life.

Entering the domain, all allowed their eyes to adjust to the difference in light.

“I’ll drop off the manifest,” Red got down to business, “and then we can be on our way.”

Elizabeth glanced about for something with which to occupy her time.

Dembe pulled out a deck of cards from his pocket.

Liz brightened, “I won five dollars off Francis last time we played.” she sat down her purse on a nearby table, ready to get down to business herself.

“I am not... Francis Holbrook.” Dembe assisted her to sit.

“I’ll say you’re not.” Liz was clearly impressed with his solicitude. “Francis would have tried to pull the seat out from under me... the dork.”

Dembe laughed, sitting.

Red watched for a moment, content to do so.

“Red...” Liz lifted entreating eyes, “you wouldn’t happen to have a few dollars? I’ll give you a cut.”

The man frowned slightly, digging into his wallet, “If I only had a nickel every time I’ve heard those words.”

He forked over three twenties, his brow lifted skeptically, “He cheats... very efficiently.” he nodded towards her playing rival.

“I do not.” Dembe corrected. “Well... not with, Elizabeth.”

Red left his woman happy and content, making his way to the back offices behind the bar.

Greg Forester greeted him cordially, looking refreshed and revived.

“I have to thank you again for this.” The man held the manifest aloft as they entered Greg’s conference room.

The area was large and rustic, a magnificent mahogany table holding center court, comfortable padded seating surrounded the long object.

Books lined shelves the entire left side of the room. Greg’s love of sailing was showcased by several Galley, Frigate, and Galleon sailing ships.

A couple of Majestic Man O’ War ships took center stage. All were impressive and incredibly intricate with their countless riggings, bowlines, tacks and gun decks.

Red appreciated the attention to detail.

The portals, allowing miniature cannons leeway were three decks high. The billowing half mast rolls of sails draped listlessly. Open, sun faded material, curved as though caught in the ocean winds as the ship sailed to its next port of calling.

Red’s eyes brightened as the largest of the ships took on the appearance it was sailing in the night. The dark tint of the sails looked almost midnight blue, its glowing edge shown brightly in stark contrast as the moonlight overhead, reflected off the hearty fabric. The black hull shimmered from sea spray with the stars overhead tinkling against the glistening surface.

If he closed his eyes, he swore he could feel and smell the warm sun and salt-tinged air misting his face, hear the rolling waves lapping at the stern... the stirrings in his heart to explore, crested as impressively as a stormy sea.

He grinned at the familiar emotions.

This was quite an enviable collection.

It took a special eye to note that most were modeled after famous ships in history, many of them fittingly... Pirate ships.
Greg sat down his coffee mug, breaking Red from his pleasant adventure.

“...And for allowing me some downtime this morning,” the man continued, the lines of stress he carried earlier were absent. “I really appreciated the gesture.”

Taking one last look at the ships, Red turned away, setting aside his sense of adventure for more... current topics.

“Yes,” Red nodded his growing amusement, “I saw how you... regrouped.”

“.Pardon?”

“Totally by accident and rest assured, I made a hasty yet discrete exit.”

“...Oh,” Greg got the drift, “...listen, if I was out of line by taking advantage of your hospi–” the man trailed off. “I changed the sheets...” he offered the conciliatory gesture.

“I more than understand.” Red held up a silencing hand. “You did me a favor.” he could not wait to garner the rewards from Elizabeth Keen, as a matter of fact. “You schooled dear Elizabeth on a few of the baser points of a relationship you and...” he lifted his brows, “I don’t think you’ve properly introduced...” he let it hang.

“Alison.” Greg supplied readily his eyes softening instantly, “Alison Moran. Ally...”

Red had been unaware the girl took Big Jake’s name, “She’s very lovely.”

“She is.” Greg showed his pride. “And quite a handful at times.”

“But that’s what makes them so exciting, isn’t it?” Red’s own eyes softened at the thought of his own handful. “Besides, you expect anything less from Jake’s daughter?”

“I had no idea what to expect, to be honest,” Greg admitted. “But when Jake asks for a favor, you just don’t refuse.” he laughed good-naturedly. “I am ever so glad he did though... now.”

“I heard about the slight trouble his daughter had gotten herself into.” Red replayed. “Put her to work, did he?”

“Thought it would force her to grow up or at least, see how the other half has to live.” Greg shrugged. “No one could foresee how it’s turned out, least of all... me.”

Red nodded, “Life has a way of sneaking up on you when you least expect it.”

“Well anyway,” Greg’s brow furrowed, “I will extend my apologies to Elizabeth. I thought the house was empty.” he looked at Red oddly. “I thought...”

Red waited patiently, his manner open, encouraging Greg to be honest... upfront.

“I thought you would have... approached the matter with Elizabeth already.” a puzzled scowl was present on the handsome face. “Concerning... the sexual aspect of what went down this morning, I mean.”

“I’m working on it.” Red mused. While he was open to discuss any sexual endeavor... some things were better-left private between him and Lizzy.

“I don’t know about you, but that session this morning netted me exactly what I hoped.” Greg was proud. “Congratulate me. I’m soon to be a married man.”

“Congratulations...” Red shook his hand gingerly, his smile a genuine one, “Did you already receive Big Jake’s blessings or will this be a shotgun wedding?” he asked in jest.

Greg blanched suddenly, “No...no, I haven’t yet. But that shotgun thing... it may very well be a real issue... now.”

Red was curious, “An issue for you or Jake?”

“Not me, no.” Greg was quick to reassure. “I want it very much... all that it entails.”

“You had better.” Big Jake held old-fashioned, family values. “Is there a... problem?” he sensed there was one.

Greg nervously pulled his tie, blowing out a shaky breath, “How much... did you uh, hear this morning?”

Red looked at the man who was suddenly blotting a sweaty brow with a shaking hand, understanding dawning on him.

Red’s mouth quirked slightly, “Enough to know you’re extremely worried about the illegitimate kitten your lady might now be carrying,” he laid the cards on the table. “And that Big Jake is very proficient at math.”

Greg’s shoulders slumped, “I planned this for weeks. What I said... did.”

“Planned for everything except Big Jake’s reaction...” Red shook his head woefully, musing on the problem.

Greg dropped his face wearily into his palms before pushing from his seat, restlessly pacing the spacious room. “What if he doesn’t go for a union between us?” was the real question in Greg’s mind.

Red opened his mouth only to close it a second later when the man continued rattling on.

“And if by some stroke of luck he gave his permission,” Greg tugged his ear absently, “Jake will expect a lavish wedding affair,” the man had run the numbers in his head all morning long, “she’ll be showing by then and Jake will kill–”

“Time is of the essence then.” Red interrupted, lifting commiserating brows. “Isn’t it?”

Greg halted in his steps, slumping dejectedly to a nearby stool, frowning, “...Not following.”
“Cut him off at the pass.” Red shrugged.

Greg arose from the stool, a hopeful expression on his face, his ear attuned to every word... though not comprehending them.

Red rolled his eyes, sighing, “If you’re already married, not much he can do about it.” he further explained.

“He can make Alison a very young, attractive widow.” Greg mused.

Red held his smile, “If I find nothing objectionable about you, neither can he, although he will likely put up a good show for not having been considered in the decision making.”

Red could see the wheels turning in Greg’s head.

He fretted, “The license and blood tests will–”

“Dembe can be very persuasive when necessary.” Red waved the issues aside. “He can cut through the red tape faster than anyone I know.”

“Are you... serious?” Greg’s mouth slackened. “You would...help?”

“If you want it.” Red shrugged. “...Truly.”

“I do.” Greg responded rapidly. “Yes... yes.” his excitement was building with each passing moment. “I really do.”

“You haven’t said how Alison would view the matter herself.”

Red chuckled quietly when Greg’s mouth instantly snapped shut.

His eyes gradually softened as Greg stood silent for moments on end, seriously taking the woman’s needs into consideration over his own.

“I think...” Greg stood straighter, his confidence returning, “she would wish the same.”

Red held up a finger, going to his phone.

He explained the pending situation to Dembe, asking that Elizabeth be brought to him.

“She is winning,” Dembe reported. “I will be only too happy to end the game.”

Red heard the woman’s protests over the phone, smiling, “Tell her the planned activity... what woman could resist assisting us woefully unprepared males to get it right.”

Red hung up, checking on Greg’s condition, “The classic signs.” he grinned, “Nerves kicking in?”

The older man put a calming hand on Greg’s back, “I have to line up a doctor for the blood test.” Red’s gears were attuned and functioning. “And a Justice of the Peace? This place does have one, correct?”

Greg laughed nervously, “We’re not that backward.”

“Then all that’s lacking is...” Red spread his hands, “the bride.”
Greg hesitated as if any moment Red would make that appear by magic as well.

“That would be...” Red held his laughter, “your department.”

“Oh.” Greg snapped to. “...Oh! Yeah!” he started off instantly. “The bride. We need... a bride.”

The man halted his steps, a comical look on his stunned face, “...I need a... bride.”

“What about witnesses?” Greg’s panic sat in.

Red sighed mentally, “That would be me and Elizabeth.”

“Oh.” Greg breathed out a thankful breath. “Yes, of course. You and Elizabeth can be... witnesses.”

Elizabeth came in just as Greg was exiting, the man almost ran smack into her smaller frame in his haste.

“Sorry!” he sped past, a sincere grimace offered backward. “Sorry, Elizabeth. My fault entirely. I have to fetch the bride. I’ll b-be right back.”

Elizabeth, who had been happily counting her winnings, dropped her hands to her sides, staring after the guy listlessly.

She sought out Red, “Dembe said come on through, that you would explain everything?”

Red watched her approach.

“What was that all about?” she motioned, lifting a fist full of dollars in Greg’s general vicinity.

“Explain..”

Red did so in the most economical manner possible.

“A what?” Liz was flabbergasted. “Red, you just don’t...” she gestured again, wildly this time, “conjure up a wedding just like that!”

“You do if you’re afraid for your life.” Red reasoned further tacking on the Big Jake part.

“... Oh,” Liz’s sails deflated, “well, yeah. I see your point, I suppose.” she frowned, “He’s not just doing it to save his hide, is he?”

Red’s mouth lifted at the corner, shaking his head, “No, I think he’s been wishing for this occurrence for a long time.”

He held out his hand. “My share of the winnings if you please.” he motioned with his fingers.

Elizabeth’s face fell, “You aren’t really going to hold me to that, are you?” she put the money behind her back.

“You either pay me now in hard cash,” he smiled pleasantly, “or later tonight...” his eyes ran her body slowly.

Liz breathed in a sigh of relief, shoving her ill gotten gains into her back pockets. “Well, you drive a hard bargain but...”
Red was hard pressed to hold his smile.

Greg entered, Alison in tow. He gently urged the young girl forward.

Liz realized suddenly, that was exactly the term for the little brunette who stood quietly, large blue eyes devoid of any real emotion as yet.

Greg made the introductions.

Alison’s flush came and stayed, “I-I didn’t mean... anything last night. Really, I didn’t.”

She concentrated more on Liz.

“I was angry with Greg... Mr. Forester.” she corrected, stammering slightly.

“You can call me by my given name, angel.” Greg clearly found the unabashed sincerity charming. “Seeing as how we’ll be man and wife in an hour’s time.”

Alison’s mouth fell agape. She stared up at her future husband, a light shining in the suddenly misty eyes, “You... sure you want to?” she whispered wistfully. “Really and truly?”

Liz’s animosity and misconceptions melted into oblivion at that moment.

“I’ve dreamed of this day, Princess.” Greg gently kissed the trembling lips. “Your dad will expect something more fitting but... this one is just for us, okay?”

The girl’s face fell. She looked down at her waitress get-up, dismay filling her heart and soul.

“You guys are going to have to give us a few minutes.” Liz ‘got it’. “We women have some wardrobe issues to tackle.”

An hour later, Alison stood nervously aside, looking at her reflection in a handy mirror.

“...Does it look... all right?” blue eyes sought Elizabeth out.

“You look absolutely beautiful.” Liz looked over her handiwork, smiling happily.

She flicked the newly arranged curls with expert precision, placing a lovely sprig of baby’s breath and a tiny rose into the perfect spot, affixing the tiny bundle with a bobby pin.

The cute little white dress was of a simple design but the girl’s figure made it work.

Liz beamed her relief offering a ‘thumbs up’ to a suddenly ‘beaming’ bride-to-be.

“You think so?”

Liz reassured with her confident smile, “This is all I could conjure...” she pulled a hopeful face, producing a small bouquet of pretty but mismatched flowers.

“They’re perfect.” Alison’s eyes misted yet again.

“No, no!” Liz warned. “We’ll mess our make-up.”

Alison laughed, sniffling, exhaling shakily, “I guess... we’re ready?”

Liz noted the fingers holding that small bunch of flowers trembled.
Panic struck, “Oh, Lord!” Liz whispered under her breath. “No! Don’t you move yet.”

She rushed to the door. Dembe waited patiently on the other side.

“I need, Red.”

The large man lifted his brows.

“Oh, Dembe... it’s terrible!” Liz wailed. “We need something old, borrowed, blue and... that other thing! We don’t have any of it!”

Dembe nodded calmly, taking his leave.

Red approached minutes later holding up his hand having seen Lizzy’s frantic expression.

“I come bearing gifts,” he chuckled, holding aloft...

“Dembe’s tie clip.” he gestured to the blue crystal on the end. “What d’ya think, baby? Your bracelet for the borrowed?”

Liz fumbled with the clip, attaching it to Alison’s dress. It sparkled cheerfully. She hastily removed her bracelet, handing it over but Alison was shaking so badly, Red himself slipped it on the slim wrist.

Liz turned expectantly, hands held out, “Two more to go.” she breathed excitedly.

Greg himself shoved a small box through the door.

“Get out!” Liz ordered sharply. “You can’t come in here.”

“I’m not looking, I swear.” Greg held up the box, shaking it. “I got these for her a couple days ago.”

Liz grasped the offering handing it to Alison, “You better not be looking.”

Red grinned as the man bolted before turning his attention back to an expectant face.

He had grappled with the ‘old’ portion of the tradition during their hasty search of the establishment until he happened upon perfection in Greg’s office.

He held his hand out, his eyes sparkling when Lizzy sighed her exasperation for his dramatic pause. He eased his fingers apart, allowing the delicate gold chain to fall freely from his palm before snapping straight as the heavy weight at the end failed gravities test.

The antique compass swung like a pendulum from his finger, the sun shining off the glass face before spinning like a top to show her a sailing ship on the other side.

“To guide the couple on their journey...” Red’s deep voice rumbled intimately.

Liz’s eyes misted at the romantic gesture. She took a breath, leaning forward to kiss that fabulous mouth, “You really do say the sweetest, most romantic things.” she whispered against his soft lips.

“How can I not?” he whispered right back, looking down at her little upturned face, “When I have been gifted the most wonderful inspiration ever.”
Turning the hand in his, he laid a gentle kiss on her scar, holding her eyes as he did so. Red’s heart beat heavily in his chest when Lizzy's long lashes fluttered and the sweet pink hue of her cheeks flushed.

The soft sound of a clearing throat and a presence beside him broke the spell.

“Raymond, the Justice of the Peace is here.” Dembe stated softly.

“Thank you.” Red inclined his head to his friend before easing Lizzy’s hand back to her side, “When you’re ready…”

She smiled warmly to the two men, holding up the last trinket with gratitude before slipping the door closed.

“Whew!” Liz settled. “That was close.”

“I’m going to cry.” Alison proclaimed.

“Don’t you dare,” Liz sniffled. “You just stop now.” she smoothed the curls back so the earrings shown brightly. “Those are to die for!”

Alison touched them gently, blowing out a controlled breath, “Let’s get this show on the road.”

Red’s smile was gentle on both women, “Alison, I have never seen a more lovely bride-to-be.”

His eyes fell on his Elizabeth, his heart swelling. The woman had made this into an event to remember.

When Dembe had escorted Alison to her blood test, Liz, and the staff had prepared a romantic and charming altar on the outside patio in record time.

Soft candles and twinkling lights surrounded the area. The majestic mountains provided a backdrop of epic proportions, setting the romantic aura so needed.

Liz had pulled it together and gone with the flow. Her eyes now shone with subdued excitement.

She was as caught up in the proceedings as if it were a dear friend’s wedding which she attended.

The woman looked as radiant as the bride-to-be. Liz preceded Alison down a makeshift aisle.

A bubbling exuberance flowed from her, the blue eyes shining with a tender affection as they met Red’s.

He stood solemnly beside Greg who was shaking in his boots but so obviously enamored, it was verging on pathetic.

Though... he probably suffered similar moments when it came to Lizzy.

Dembe played a melodic tune from his tablet as each took their place in the time-honored ceremony.

As the bride approached her groom, all fell contentedly silent, each to their own thoughts as the Justice of the Peace opened his bible to the appropriate page.

Simple but meaningful vows were exchanged. The Justice’s words were humble yet effective.

The depth of their meaning impressed even Red Reddington.
Spur of the moment though this had been, the look on Greg’s face as he hesitated before kissing his new bride, was worth every second of preparation and thought.

Red could only hope that one day, he and Lizzy could be afforded the same opportunity.

A small gathering followed where Red toasted the newlyweds. Cake and drinks were shared by all.

In lieu of a proper wedding gift, Red slapped Greg a couple grand in a plain white envelope, apologizing for the ungraciousness of it all.

Greg handed it back, “I think you’ve done more than enough to–”

“Nonsense.” Red refused to debate the subject. “A trip to the Big Island is in order. Bring me back a Mai Tai and I’ll be content.”

“I downloaded the pictures to Alison’s email.” Dembe had acted as photographer for the occasion. He showed the latest of his efforts to the two men.

A group shot of friends smiling and lifting a glass of cheer.

“You’ve missed your calling, Dembe.” Red approved. “I want an 8x10 of that... and a wallet size, when you get a chance, Greg.”

“After today, anything you want... anytime,” Greg clearly meant the statement, “all you have to do is pick up the phone.”

The men shook hands and Red took his leave with a still buzzed Lizzy in tow.

She finally sat back, cheeks aglow, kicking her shoe off, massaging her foot.

Red eased the boot off, massaging her free one.

“That was amazing wasn’t it?” she fell back, closing her eyes. “And it turned out just fine,” she sat up worried and fretful, “don’t you think?”

“I think it was fabulous.” Red consoled immediately. “What say you, Dembe?”

“A most auspicious affair.”

Liz beamed, falling back again, “Ohh, that feels so good.” she wriggled her toes happily. “I’m so stoked!” she giggled enthusiastically. “Did I drink too much?” she was worried again.

“That’s it.” she sighed happily. “I feel... carefree and luminous.”

Red loved her mood.

“I love weddings.” she frowned. “Although, I never used to.” she was puzzled a beat. “But I loved that one. I hope mine is....” she trailed off self-consciously, her eyes flying to Red’s.

“Hope yours is... what?” he encouraged.

She stared wide-eyed at him, “...I-I didn’t mean...” What? What had she meant or not meant, in this case? What did she mean, right now at this moment? “...I didn’t mean to imply... anything.”
“Too bad.” his eyes deepened. “But then again, you did catch the bouquet. This makes twice now, doesn’t it?”

“That’s just a silly superstition.”

“Is it?” he mused. “Well, if one believes in tradition...” he let it hang, “who can foretell the future, right?”

She sat back quietly bemused.

She lifted luminous eyes, the sight of repressed hope barely hidden within the sapphire depths.

She dropped her head quickly, hiding her flushed cheeks.

Red sat back, his thoughts just as private as the woman’s who sat next to him.

Who could foretell the future?

All he knew for certain was his future would contain Elizabeth Keen.

Come hell or high water, he would move heaven and earth to see his vision would come to pass.

Today’s events only cemented the determination he felt.

“We’ll figure it out, Elizabeth.” he murmured quietly, glancing at the passing scenery. “I promise you that.”
June 5

“...So,” Ressler approached Red Reddington in what he hoped was a casual enough manner, “we’re not heading back to D.C., I take it?”

Cooper, Red knew, ordered the agents back to home base, “I vetoed the notion.”

“Does Cooper know?”

Red nodded, “And he was no happier than your associates.” the Master Criminal nodded to the two sulking FBI agents in the back row of the plane. “Still a little miffed they missed out on all the fun?”

Ressler spared his contemporaries a glance, “You snooze, you lose.” he philosophized in his own fashion. “Maybe I should have taken the time to rouse them but you kinda took that option off the table.”

“One must take an opportunity when it presents itself.” Red said.

Ressler was referring to Red and Dembe’s unexpected exit back at the cabin, Red realized.

“Didn’t really want them in the way,” Red admitted.

Ressler knew Moore would have been a pain in everyone’s ass. He also knew, no one dictated procedure or demanded Reddington do anything the man did not wish to do.

Not even Cooper.

Ressler gave up the fight, sticking his hands in his pockets, “Do I inform Benton we’re on our way?” he had another dilemma on the horizon.

“No,” Red replied quietly. “Let’s get a feel for the situation first.” he once again eyed the two men sitting several rows behind them as they conversed.

Ressler remained silent, his brain ticking feverishly away at his options.

His instincts were to go by the book, follow procedure.

Which was to put a call into the Chicago Field Office, request a detail be assigned to Benton whose life was in imminent danger.

But that would take away precious minutes of time... time they might not have.

Red understood the man’s turmoil.

This was personal to Ressler...

“Benton made his bed when he became District Attorney.” Red reminded, which drew a disgruntled grunt from Ressler. “His wife and child are another kettle of fish.”

While Ressler held opposing objectives, he sensed Reddington’s methods might lead them to the same results... faster.

“Tell the local office you’re in the area,” Red let the guy off the hook, “following a promising lead.” he arched a brow, conveying his own message. “Advise them it might be advantageous to have a team on standby should thing’s head south.”

The tension in Ressler’s shoulders eased.

Reddington provided an out... a paper trail, a feasible explanation he could sell if he had to.

“No not tell them about Benton,” Red warned. “Lawford might have ears on the inside.”

Ressler nodded his understanding, extracting his phone from the inside coat pocket he sported.

“And for God’s sake,” Red suggested sourly, “sit down.” he motioned to an empty seat by the window. “You’re giving my neck a kink staring up at you like this.” the man eased his muscles with his fingers. “And keep your voice low.” he lifted a lazy stare to the back of the plane.

Ressler sat beside Dembe, his sigh a heavy one, “You don’t trust them.” he indicated his fellow agents.

“I don’t trust anyone until they’ve proven they can be trusted.” Red propped his feet on the seat opposite him having removed them for Ressler to pass through the aisle. “You would be wise to emulate that belief.”

Ressler only shook his head, getting down to business.

Dembe handed over his projected list of people and equipment which might be useful on the excursion they already laid plans for.

Red looked it over with a perfunctory glance, “You’ve relayed this to Silas?” he asked absently.

“No without your consent.” Dembe managed straight-faced.

Red lifted a sarcastic smirk, “Yeah... right.” he laughed the statement aside. “Since when have you two ever needed that?”

“I was striving for professionalism.” Dembe sat back, his head turning slowly. “What with all these government officials on board.”

Ressler took the jesting in his stride, ignoring the large black man as best he could, “I’m on hold here...” he mentioned.

“Well, of course, you are;” Red stated brightly, “you’re dealing with a government official.”

Ressler shifted, turning his back on his two antagonists.

Red grinned over at Dembe, absently shifting his interest across the way after a fashion.

He was surprised to find Samar’s eyes on him.

He thought better of an amiable smile for the woman’s lovely face was laced with a very set frown of dissension.

Sensing something definitely amiss, he listened in on Elizabeth’s running commentary for a while, having made himself quite comfortable first.
He stretched out his arms, at length interlocking his fingers behind his head. His eyes locked with Dembe’s for a beat. He held his grin.

“This should be very enlightening.” Dembe confided sotto voce. He turned his head to check on his theory.

Samar sat across from Liz, studying the photos from the impromptu wedding at which Elizabeth had been the self-titled Maid-of-Honor, Red was to hear.

Dembe pulled an ‘impressed’ face at the news.

“I was lead photographer.” he made mention.

“You were the only photographer.” Red reminded.

“It was just enchanting Samar.” Liz was still caught up in the moment, her eyes bright and wistful. “You would have loved it.”

“It looks charming.” Samar nodded. “You did a remarkable job on such short notice, I must say.” Samar held Dembe’s tablet for Liz to see her meaning. “I see... you caught the bouquet.”

Liz flushed as she perused the photo, “There were only two other women present.” she raised a sheepish look. “I was just faster... it was instinct. It’s just a silly superstition, anyway.” she laughed.

“If you say so.” Samar cackled gleefully and Liz flushed more fully.

“Well, I do say so.” she snipped.

Red was the only one who could read the true meaning of that blush. His eyes softened for the fact.

In her haste to move matters along, Liz blurted the first thing to come to mind, “We were searching desperately to fulfill the superstition involving something new.” she continued her narrative. “Greg had bought lovely diamond earrings but if you ask me...” her tone altered expressively, “she already had something new.”

Samar lifted a lovely brow at Liz’s next proclamation.

“Oh!” Liz grimaced, “...Not that I meant anything derogatory.”

“She’s pregnant?” Samar’s brow furrowed two-fold at the new Liz related.

“What’s so special about that?” Liz wanted to know. “In this day and age?”

Samar shifted Red an annoyed, disapproving glare.

Red was taken aback by the animosity displayed.

Dembe leaned, his tone low, almost soothing. “I believe, Elizabeth has mistakenly led the lovely Agent Navabi to believe...” he smiled to ease the blow, “you have slept with Greg Forester’s new bride... before the actual nuptials.”

Red spread his hands helplessly.

“And that the child is... yours.”

“Mine?” Red was aghast for all of two seconds. “My God,” he leaned his head sideways, “this is rapidly becoming an episode of Young and the Restless.”

Dembe inclined his head slightly.

Red cocked his head, a thoughtful expression on the man’s face, “I wonder, when my twin brother shows up... will he be the good or evil one?”

“I believe the latter position has already been filled.” Dembe muttered.

Red sat back embracing Samar’s disapproving glare, “This is simply too entertaining.”

“I agree.” Dembe sat back, crossing his arms over a well-muscled chest.

Dembe waved the issue aside. “It is a colossal series of exaggerated misunderstandings and perceived implications.”

“Well, I know,” Red was about to take affront, “but, really.” he decided it was more fun not to.

He winked flirtatiously at Samar Navabi instead, which caused the woman’s beautiful mouth to pull into an irritated straight line.

Well, that had been a little spiteful on his part, Red admitted.

But Samar urged Lizzy to take him as a lover only. Advising not to get emotionally attached and now, the agent was vexed because supposedly, Red slighted Liz for the young waitress.

Women...

He swirled the dark amber liquid in his glass, musing to himself, holding a chuckle.

To add injury to insult... Samar believed he would shirk his responsibility having left Alison in the family way. At which time, Red callously arranged a marriage to get out of the predicament. Pawnning off his illegitimate child to some poor unsuspecting fellow.

Emmy winning material that, he had to concede.

He shrugged mentally.

Liz moved on as well. She was excitedly conveying detail for detail how she and the wait staff transformed the once dismal setting into a fairytale backdrop for young Alison’s wedding.

Hearing the ‘happily ever after’ part pissed Red off royally.

Seemed everyone was allowed a way to be together except him and Elizabeth.

A well of frustration erupted in his gut.

It just wasn’t good enough. Nothing he envisioned prevented Lizzy’s future from being bleak at best... if she stayed involved with him.

His best offer was to spend their lives on the run, hiding out, waiting for the day they would be found by whatever agency tracked them down.

No...

He would not take Lizzy from the things she loved, her work, friends, home...
He refused to turn her life upside down simply because he had fallen in love with her.

His mind swirled about with concerns, awareness of escape, possible...

The man’s brain activity halted suddenly.

“...Marvin,” he muttered the name, a thought emerging above all else.

Red quickly drafted a memo to his attorney, outlining his concerns and requirements. He sent the message immediately.

With luck, the lawyer would respond soon.

Sitting back in his chair, he closed his eyes, clearing his mind of everything... for now.

He took the opportunity to recharge.

He did so by resting his mind certainly but more so, by listening contentedly to Lizzy.

That woman always saw the good in life, always seemed so hopeful and buoyant.

The very sound of her voice delighted him.

The way she would blurt out things before she truly thought matters through, amused him.

The warmth of her concern for Aram, who was still suffering a form of jet-lag and wasn’t averse to anyone knowing it... warmed his heart.

Red smiled absently, hearing Lizzy’s genuine concern and caring as she listened to the continual complaining.

He chuckled at Agent Navabi’s curt, “Suck it up... be a man.”

Agent Navabi was not one to suffer a man’s ailments easily, it appeared.

But his Lizzy was. She hastily soothed the ranks with sympathetic platitudes, ending any threat of strife quickly.

“Now Samar, remember when we were in New Mexico last year and you–”

“Don’t bring that up.” Samar held her stomach grimacing accordingly. “Please!”

“Okay but, traveling can be... adventuresome.” Liz reminded. “Aram isn’t used to gallivanting about the country willy-nilly.”

Samar let it go and soon, both women were trying valiantly to make Aram’s lot in life a little better.

Red kind of envied the guy.

Having two beautiful women hovering over you like mother hens? It was his idea of bliss. Well, one of his ideas, at least.

His phone disturbed the pleasant state he had drifted into. He sighed heavily, answering the call.

“We got him.”

Red sat up, opening his eyes, “So quickly?” he was pleased.
“Hunter didn’t take into account he could end up being,” Silas’ rich mellow tone filled Red’s ears, “...the hunted.

“They never do,” Red muttered his belief.

“Besides, we knew he would be relatively easy to find.” Silas continued, the usual boast infiltrating the words.

“I hear a ‘but’ coming.” Red sat his glass aside.

“We knew he would be on either Benton of his wife.” Silas side-skirted the issue. “But it was odd... it was almost like he expected us to show up.”

Red frowned at the news, lost in thought, “He couldn’t have known we saw the photos because they were delivered to the Blacksite, not to me.”

“Or that you were involved with Liz,” Silas had more time to process, “in whatever form.”

Red wasn’t involved romantically with the woman at that point.

It didn’t make sense... yet.

“Where are you holding him?”

“Francis’ office, Monroe and Wabash,” Silas replied. “The other one, we couldn’t trace. He was using a burner phone.”

“We’re nearing final approach.” Red looked down over the city as it loomed large in his window. “I’ll be there shortly.”

“Copy that.” Silas clicked communications shut.

“Dembe,” Red caught the man’s attention as he passed in the aisle, “would you be so kind as to inform Edward we will be landing at Chicago-Midway, please.”

A half hour later found the passengers deposited on the tarmac, luggage loaded in neutral vehicles, each individual wondering over their role in the upcoming hours.

“I’m assuming you will want to get on Benton.” Red surmised.

“And what will you be doing?” Ressler resented not being kept in the loop.

“My priority is elsewhere, as you know.”

“You’re going to, Sarah.” Ressler relaxed.

“We have her and the child safe.” Red was annoyed Ressler would think he would wait to do so. “While you’re standing here wrestling with protocol measures, Benton is a walking target, may I point out.”

“You’re trying to get rid of us.” Ressler sensed as much.

“My tactics don’t always meet with your superior’s approval.” Red reminded. “What you don’t see... you aren’t accountable for. Do you want this ended or not?”
Ressler resented being spoken to in such a manner, clear and simple.

Liz sensed as much, “It’s not you, he’s trying to get rid of.” she whispered. “Trust him, Ress.” she asked. “He knows what he’s doing. He knows how these guys operate. You know that.”

“We can deal with your ethics after,” Red said, “after we shut down whatever plan that’s in the works.”

Liz threw the man an impatient sigh, “Let’s just do what we have to.” she implored. “And pray that everything gels.”

Ressler nodded curtly, “I’ll text when we have Benton.” he turned on his heel, heading for the others.

Minutes later, Dembe drove through heavy rush hour traffic.

Liz sat quietly in the back seat.

Both men kept looking suspiciously at her for the fact.

“I had to piss him off.” Red explained his action. “He’ll be more alert. He functions much better in a ‘livid’ mood.”

“Who?” she questioned.

Red realized he had been on the wrong track, “Why so quiet?”

“Why didn’t you tell Ress you had Hunter Gaines?” she overheard Dembe’s report to Red.

“He needs to concentrate on Benton.” Red stated. “We don’t know how many hit-men were hired... or by whom.”

Dembe pulled down a long side-street.

The numerous skyrise buildings and bustling streets packed full with every kind of shopping you could want, caught Liz’s attention. It was a shock to the system after the quiet picturesque setting of Montana.

She craned her head, just barely able to see the tops of the towering structures. She closed her eyes a moment, envisioning mountains and open spaces in their place.

The smell of the downtown area shook her out of her imaginings. She crinkled her nose distastefully as the crisp, clean air she had become accustomed to was replaced by popcorn, chlorine, exhaust, and fish.

A train rambling overhead drowned out the delicate sounds of wind rustling leaves and birds chirping. A sharp horn blast a blaring reminder they were no longer in a quaint setting but in the bustling city.

She missed the quiet...

Dembe pulled down a thin alley, dodging lines of trash cans and crates, maneuvering the wide car expertly before pulling alongside out of the way.

Red looked at the woman, dreading the confrontation he sensed on the horizon.
“Let me guess,” she guessed, “I stay here and you go in.”

“Best case scenario,” he nodded.

The woman sighed heavily, settling back into the plush leather of her seat. “It would be kinda stupid of me,” she admitted. “If someone has paid this guy to whack me... there’s no reason to make it ridiculously easy for him, right?”

Red was taken aback.

“I mean, how do we know this isn’t part of the plan?” she waved a hand. “Get himself caught so you bring me right to his little waiting web.”

Red didn’t think that was the case but, “I am so very proud of you, Elizabeth,” he was, “for thinking like that.”

“I didn’t always.” she mused ruefully. “You guys are bad influences.”

Red conceded, she had a point.

“Dembe, are you hungry?” she asked amiably. “Should we go get a coffee? Assuming...” she scowled darkly at Red, “there are more good guys in there than bad and you are in no danger what-so-ever?”

“No more than normal,” he teased, kissing her gently. “You are being surprisingly rational,” the man eyed her suspiciously, “...vigilant.”

“Yeah, well.. Don’t get used to it, could be a passing phase.” she smiled prettily for him. “If I get bored, I’m going for a danish and your ass will be grass if the shit hits the fan because... Dembe is going with me.”

“I wouldn’t have it any other way.” he chuckled, sliding to the door.

She caught his arm, “Silas sent men he trusted, right?”

“I gave him a bonus on his last check,” Red acknowledged, “so yes, he did.”

Liz rolled her eyes dramatically.

“I’ll be fine, and I’ll contact you as soon as we’re finished.”

Liz watched the man walk from the car, at length entering a side door that miraculously opened for his entrance.

Liz slid close to Dembe, watching whatever transpired outside the darkened windows of the car.

Red disappeared but Liz recognized Joe, who poked his head out, his fingers waving jauntily.

Liz waved back frantically but she couldn’t be seen through the dark tint of the windows.

Joe continued to wave, even as he secured the door.

His wide grin soured immediately as he sobered at Red’s carefully composed expression.

The guard straightened his posture, clearing his throat, “…They’re straight down the hall, boss.” he pointed, “On the left there.”
He self-consciously scratched at his nape, “We’ve been real polite.”

Red lifted a cool appraising stare, “Go have coffee with Lizzy. Take her down to the waterfront.”

Joe glanced about motioning another guard into position, “I can stay if—”

“I need to concentrate.” Red arched his brow. “Go...to...Lizzy.”

“I’m gone.” he made good on his word as he bounded for the door without a backward glance. “We’ll bring stuff back,” he yelled over his shoulder.

“Take your damn time,” Red warned. He wouldn’t have to worry Lizzy was losing patience as long as she was occupied.

A reluctant smile pulled at Red’s mouth but he stubbornly squelched it, his footfalls echoing down the ridiculously long hallway.

About ten feet from the opened portal, a large shadow blocked the light streaming from the room. It grew exponentially along the opposite wall.

Red pulled up short, scowling, “...What in the hell,” he grated, “are you doing here?”

Silas’ mammoth frame came into view, his handsome face creased with a wicked grin, “I was bored.”

“You were recouping, as I recall.”

“Quit bitchin’.” Silas grumped pushing from the framework of the door, unfolding his muscular arms.” I’m getting really hungry.”

Red’s jaw worked irritably, but he managed, “Has he said anything of import.”

“Said he wanted to wait for the Big Cheese.” Silas turned following Red down yet another long corridor.

“I’m disappointed in you,” Red threw back a look over his shoulder, “You didn’t try torturing him? Waterboarding him?”

“You said to be sweet.” Silas lied easily. “Besides, you were on approach. How much damage could I have done in such a measly span of time?”

“Consider it a challenge next time.” Red continued on. “I have no intention of using kid gloves at such a time or under any circumstances.”

“You’re bitching at me for wasting times.” Silas caught the fedora Red slapped into his chest, following on. “And here you stand... wasting time.” he waved a hand in the needed direction.

“I swear to God, Silas,” Red muttered his growing discontent, “one of these days–”

“Yeah, yeah,” the man opened a door, stepping aside for Red’s entrance, “you’re going to put a bullet in my head.”

“In the ass, more like it.” Red snapped indignantly.

“Friction among the troops?” a man sat, seemingly at ease, in a sturdy wooden chair. His expression was almost expectant, an air of amiability surrounding him.
Red stepped closer, coming to stand directly before the man in question, his eyes cool, devoid of any emotion suddenly.

The silence was brittle.

“My goodness,” the man winced, “the temperature has certainly dropped in here.”

“...Were you ordered to kill Elizabeth Keen?” Red’s tone was disturbingly quiet.

“No one orders me to do anything.” Hunter Gaines cleared up the misconception. “I was paid to observe and report back for further instructions.”

“How did you find her?” Red demanded.

“I was given a name... Amir... Amar?” the guy was totally forthcoming. “He’s some kind of computer specialist. Through him, I was able to track her.”

Red controlled his expression, careful not to react to anything said. He made a mental note, Aram needed to be shadowed in the future, along with Samar, and Ressler very likely.

He only thought of them in terms of FBI agents. Who, in their right mind, would be stupid enough to...

Or smart enough...

“Have you taken on a protégé?”

“I don’t need or especially want one.” Hunter’s brow furrowed. “Why?”

Red threw the photos down on the tabletop next to the man.

Hunter perused them, “Yeah, I took these.” he admitted. “That’s my signature mark, which I’m sure you already knew.” his scowl increased. “What are you so bent out of shape for? This only shows I have the target in sight.”

The silence came yet again.

Hunter looked from Silas to Reddington, “Hey, I backed off the minute I saw your two guys here. See?” he motioned with his head.

Silas moved onto the opposite side of the table, fingerling the photos, “You got my best side, I see.”

He plopped his ass down on the tabletop, folding his arms leisurely.

“Thought you didn’t have a bad one.” Hunter quipped. “Look, I put an ‘X’ on the woman see? Which indicates, I would not complete the job.”

Hunter lifted confused eyes, “When I saw Mr. Fantastic here, I figured she was either on the payroll or... under your protection. Was I right?”

Red refused to answer.

“Which means, if I went ahead with the plan, you would hunt me down,” Hunter added two and two for them, since they seemed a little slow today, “...and kill my ass.”

Red remained silent, that possibility still very much in the works.
“Ergo... I politely backed off.” Hunter finished rather eloquently, Red thought.

“Did Lawford say why he wanted her dead?”

“Lawford?” Hunter was all confused. “He didn’t hire the hit, what’s he got to do with it?”

Red shared a look with his head guard at the unexpected news, “Who did you send the photos to?”

Hunter sighed, “You know how it works.” he disdained. “I left them at a designated drop off spot.”

Red hoped for more, but yes, he knew protocol in such matters.

“When I received the callback from the interested party, I warned them to back off.”

Red processed, rolling his hand slowly to indicate... continue.

“Needless to say, they were not impressed with my less than professional stance.” Hunter shrugged.

“I get another call, this time from Carver, warning me to back off.”

Red stiffened.

“Said he would shuck me like a corn husk if I didn’t.” Hunter pulled a face. “There is something terribly wrong with that bastard.”

He laughed, his expression almost benign, “One of these days, I’m going to pit my strengths against his...” his eyes held an odd light. “Wonder who will win?”

Red studied the man.

There was no fear in his eyes... none.

“Do you know who I am?” Red asked quietly, an odd light within his own eyes.

Do you know exactly what I have become?

The unasked question plagued Red’s conscience these days.

“Everyone knows who you are.” the younger man shrugged nonchalantly, his movement restricted by the tight bonds. “Everyone who matters at least. If he’s there,” his head jerked to Silas, “then you are not far away. It’s a given, as I said earlier.”

Red needed this guy to be afraid. How could he get answers if there was no fear of reprisals?

“I know you by... reputation.” Red shrugged. “And more.”

Hunter’s face remained passive, “Not much to know.”

“I disagree.” Red made himself comfortable. He hoped this wouldn’t take all that long but... he pulled out a chair, seating himself.

He searched his pocket, coming up with a few folded sheets of paper. Dembe was very efficient as well.

He perused the sheets absently for he had already memorized the data within.

“...Says here, Hunter Gaines, a young boy fresh off the farm... Minnesota,” Red lifted his brows, “lovely fall weather up there.”
Hunter was interested, Red could tell. The man eyed the papers speculatively.

“Entered the Corp, September 1991.” Red pretended to read on. “Discharged... honorably.” he lifted a stare. “We would expect no less but... look at this,” he showed Silas the paper, “A Silver and Bronze Star, four Purple Hearts.”

Hunter grinned, “Yeah I pawned them off the first year I was out.” he shifted Silas a smug look. “Gave the Hearts to a few women along the way... makes for easy marks, right Silas?”

“How would I know?” Silas didn’t want to play.

“Never earned any?” Hunter commiserated.

“Are you thirsty?” Silas countered. “That waterboarding activity is starting to sound so very appealing.”

Hunter chuckled, “I almost drowned over in Iraq in,” he thought back, “summer of ‘93. No way in hell I was going to drown in the middle of a fucking desert. I’d be a laughingstock. So I sucked it up. Still....” he grinned, “didn’t like to bathe for a long time after that little incident.”

“Shouldn’t have got captured.” was Silas’ point of view.

“I was young and green.”

“How did you find out about Elizabeth Keen?” Red got matters back on track.

“Usual manner. I have a contact site on the dark web. Sometimes word of mouth.” Hunter stated the obvious. “But in the case of Benton... Lawford was an idiot. Contacted me personally even gave his name like it would magically open doors or something.”

Red hoped for clarity but this info was only confusing him more. He didn’t allow it to show.

“I’m sure you’re aware of the flyers being passed around of course.” Hunter took for granted. “Those showed up after I turned down the job.” the man clarified. “But see, I did you a square. Everyone knows I passed on the job and the why of it all. Those more experienced will be smart enough to follow my lead.”

Red flexed his joints, his fingers cracking softly. Silas’ people’s reputation was working in his favor.

“Still, there is always some up-and-coming newbie that wants to take his place in history,” Hunter warned.

“This man who contacted you... concerning Elizabeth Keen...” Red said.

“The first guy,” Hunter held no special allegiance to anyone other than himself, “his voice was gravely... smoky like he had too many cigarettes.” Hunter perked up. “Like the guy on the X-Files.”

Silas shook his head, sighing heavily.

“But the second one,” Hunter surprised them all, “his voice was clear... sharp. Younger.”

Red tapped the tabletop with his fingers, “You aren’t giving me much, are you.”

Hunter studied his heavy boots thoughtfully for a long beat, racking his brain, “...I don’t know if it means anything,” he lifted clear eyes, “but, I heard a boat in the background when speaking to the second guy.”
Red’s eyes connected with Silas’, instant communication passing between...

Tom.

Silas shrugged sturdy shoulders, “We already assumed that loser was involved.” he stated the obvious.

Red nodded absently. If what Gaines was saying was on the up and up... some of the top snipers already begged off the invitation.

A small relief right now but Red would take what Fate could give.

If the price on Elizabeth’s head was raised, that status quo might shift.

Hunter remained silent, his fingers curled casually about the armrests of his seat.

The guy stared silently at the opposite wall, stoically awaiting his fate.

“We can handle this, Red.” Silas’ cocksure confidence somewhat reassured.

It wasn’t bragging if it was true.

“I wasn’t going to say,” Hunter wrestled with his conscience in the ensuing silence, “…I’m assuming you still have men on Benton... his family?”

The guy looked a little ill-at-ease like he was betraying something he would rather not, “…I saw the kid.”

Red allowed the moment as Gaines contemplated the inevitable.

“Lawford said, if he was out of contact over ten hours at a stretch,” he lifted a steady stare, “well, matters were to proceed in rapid succession, if you get my drift.”

Red checked his watch. The cut-off point was rapidly approaching.

“Son-of-a-bitch.” Silas snapped his pique. “We should have anticipated that little point.” his massive fist clenched, his anger at himself apparent.

“Was there an order to this...chain of events?” Red demanded.

“The wife goes first as leverage for Benton to back off.” Hunter relayed. “The kid was to be held in reserve if Benton got all high and mighty.”

“They want Benton alive?” Silas was surprised.

“A D.A in your pocket is worth two in the bush.” Red nodded his understanding. He shifted slate-blue eyes. “We’re sure the wife is contained?”

“Contained or not…” Hunter shrugged. “Better to ask, was she traced and is she near a window?”

“We’re not stupid.” Silas snapped.

“You guys forgot about the computer guy.” Gaines reminded. “Just saying. There is always a way, Reddington... if one is patient and vigilant.”

Red grasp his hat, setting it properly, fingerling the brim into place, “You have been most forthcoming. I won’t forget it.”

Silas followed the man’s retreating footsteps.

“Hey...” Hunter called out, stopping Red in his tracks. He looked a little unsettled, almost embarrassed. “There’s no reason you should trust me but... I can help in this.”

Silas huffed suspiciously, “Why would you... there’s no money to be had now.”

Hunter’s expression went all askew, “Hey, I didn’t contract for the woman or the kid. I don’t do that shit...” finally the guy showed a weakness. “Besides, you guys... you don’t think like I do.”

“Point in our favor.” Silas turned to leave.

“No, it isn’t,” Hunter called out angrily. “I know how it will go down. The guy that picked up the gauntlet in Lawford’s absence is a major prick. He won’t hesitate to take the shot.”

“Or,” Red had another theory, “you get a clear shot at Benton... wasn’t that in your contract?”

“Does that paper there say anything true?” Gaines’ tone held disdain, referencing the report dangling from Red’s fingers. “The first guy I took out... what’s it say?”

Red exchanged glances with Silas wondering at the turn of events. “An Iranian big-wig... can’t remember the name.” Red lied. He knew the name. The guy had operated an international sex-slave ring.

The world was a better place without the bastard.

“That was my fifth takedown.” Hunter shook his head woefully. “The first guy was the one that turned me down...” the man’s jaw pulsed angrily, “I did how many tours of duty... risked my life, just to have some pencil pushing prick tells me I don’t qualify for any sort of benefit to help my wife and kids.”

The silence was tense all around as each man present contemplated the statement.

“Then I went up the ranks,” Hunter’s voice softened, his eyes flints of steel. “The Supervisor of Vet affairs... maybe you read about it?”

Silas turned his head, the story familiar.

“A couple of my old Commanding Officers,” Hunter remembered fondly, his eyes staring off into space. “You know the ones that sit behind their desks all safe from harm but send others out to die in useless, career-making excursions?”

Every man in that room knew... their faces said as much.

“Go into that town soldiers... Intel says it should be a relatively easy sweep.” Gaines laughed hollowly. “This mission is a breeze, a walk in the park. I wouldn’t send you in otherwise...”

Red shifted his gaze, his heart constricting for all those lost souls to which Gaines referred.

“Serial numbers on a sheet of paper... that’s all we were to them... it’s all we still are.” Hunter trailed away.

“I did what they trained me to do.” Hunter lifted cold eyes, “I killed those who caused harm... the enemy.”
The silence lasted for a long stretch. Red searched for something to say because he felt the man’s pain but really... there was nothing which could be said.

“My family is well taken care of now.” Hunter lifted an even stare. “I can’t be with them as much as I like, of course. I can sometimes feel when the demons will come but...” he smiled, “they don’t want for nothing and I don’t have to sit before a superior bastard and beg for something that rightfully should be given over. I earned... everything I asked for.”

Hunter’s brow furrowed deeply, “Benton’s kid... he’s my son’s age.”

Red’s report said Gaines had two children. A two-year-old little girl with blonde hair like her mom and a six-year-old boy... dark hair like his dad.

“I was planning on putting a bullet between his father’s eyes... just so my kid,” the scowl deepened, “could have the start of a college fund.”

Red shook his head. How did things get so complicated in life?

“What the hell does that say about me?” Hunter seemed totally confused... floundering for a beat.

Then his face hardened, “What the hell right do any of you have to judge me?”

Red conceded the fact mentally.

“Not judging you, asshole,” Silas walked, his knife slicing the ropes cleanly. They fell away from Gaines’ body in a heap on the floor beneath the chair. “You’ll be with me and one false move” Silas looked down at the guy, his features grim, “and I’ll put a bullet between your eyes.”

Red smiled wanly, “But rest assured if it does come to that eventuality, your family will be cared for...”

Silas’ face remained the same, dark brooding grimness.

“I’ll behave.” Hunter’s eyes twinkled. “Can’t say it doesn’t feel odd though... being on the right side again. You guys are the ‘right’ side, correct?”

“As close as you’re gonna get,” Silas stated.

“Depends on your definition of, ‘right’.” Red shrugged.

“Do you get the job done?” Hunter queried. “Would you face the same danger as your men here?”

“I would,” Red replied. Oddly, he didn’t feel a moment of hesitation for having revealed as much.

Hunter side glanced Silas, noting the man’s reaction to his boss’ word. The guard remained stoic as was his way. But it was enough for Hunter.

“Then you’re on the correct side.” Hunter sat straighter in his chair. “I do get my weapon back.” he was overly fond of that thing, he knew.

“At the appropriate moment.” Silas guided the man’s way.

“Say, I heard about that shot you took over in the Congo few years back.” Hunter made mention. He rubbed the blood back into his extremities as he walked. “Impressive... two thousand, two hundred and eighty-six meters, wasn’t it?”
Silas lifted his head as if recalling the incident.

“Too bad though.” Hunter smiled politely. “I bested it... last year. Ecuador. Two thousand, three hundred meters.”

Silas pulled up in his tracks, eyeing the guy appreciatively... before tsking his disdain, “Child’s play.”

“Oh, you’ve done better.” Hunter was clearly doubtful.

Silas smiled... politely, “Shall we go, we’re burning daylight.”

“Quoting John Wayne won’t get you out of this one.” Hunter took umbrage. “Really, I need confirmation... and proof.”

“Boy...” the term in this instance was definitely derogatory. “I could tell you stories...” Silas relaxed into ’story mode’.

Red followed the two men, half-ass listening to the ‘bragging right’s’ tournament.

He wasn’t sure about his decision to take this man along but Red learned early in life... few things were dead certain.

He trusted Silas’ gut oft-times more than his own and he knew Silas would watch Hunter Gaines like the proverbial hawk.

Things might just be taking a turn for the better.

Cars were lined up outside the towering building, the alley full of inconspicuous vehicles.

Joe and Elizabeth were handing out coffee cups right and left from cardboard containers.

Red squinted as light refracted off a passing airplane into the building opposite the one they departed. Adjusting his glasses, he took in the scene.

Lizzy approached, handing him a Starbuck’s cup, “I got cream and sugar,” she motioned with her head.

Red assumed she meant the stuffed bags resting precariously on the hood of Dembe’s vehicle.

“...And some of those swivel stick thingies.” she rummaged in the bag she held, her tongue sticking out the side of her mouth.

He took the pre-offered coffee, “Sweetheart...”

“You have to go meet Ress and I have to sit with Joe.” she muttered sagely, before triumphantly producing a small straw like object.

He held his smile, “Stay with, Dembe.” he corrected.

“Dembe goes with you, it’s a rule.” she looked past the man, assuring herself the new guards Silas hired were in place as well.

“And who made this rule?” he tested the waters.
“I made this rule,” hands went to shapely hips, “Red Reddington.”

He held up his hands, coffee cup and all, “Just asking.”

She settled, “Is there something new going on?” she looked to Silas and the new guy beside him. “Is that who I think it is?” she frowned hard. “Is he going to try to cap my ass and if so, why did you allo–”

“He’s offered his services.” Red interrupted. “Might come in handy.”

“That didn’t really answer my question.” she realized.

“Same old story.” Red walked her towards the car, his hand on her back. “Take down the bad guy, save the sort-of good guy.”

Liz smiled, following his lead, stepping to the lead vehicle, “Heard anything about Benton yet, one way or other?”

Red shook his head, “No, but things are in the works and moving fast. That’s why we better get our asses in gear.”

She nodded her understanding.

Joe approached, his expression a puzzled one, “When I left, that guy was tied up like a hog on slaughter day... what happened?” he hooked a thumb Hunter Gaines’ way.

“He’s not your problem,” Red guided Liz over with a gentle nudge, “she’s being difficult today.” he teased if only to get a reaction.

“Hey!” Liz immediately took umbrage as Red knew she would. “I got coffee, that’s all I did!”

“Every Starbuck’s run dwindles my fortune down considerably.” Red quipped. “But yes... you did well this time. I was thinking of the incident with Lawford.”

“Oh, get over it. That was just... habit.” Liz had the grace to be bothered... a little. “I stayed out of the way and you know I did.”

The man leaned, kissing her forehead lovingly, “Yes, well,” he pulled back, lifting a brow, “habits are made to be broken. Keep working on it, hum?”

Liz took his coffee back, a smug look on her face.

She flounced off, disappearing into the back seat of the car in seconds.

Joe laughed, amused for her bravado... and theft.

Red gave the man a ‘look’, securing Joe’s coffee cup in the next instance.

Joe sighed heavily, going off to fetch another before securing his charge.

Liz ducked her head, donut in mouth as he slid into the driver’s seat, a ready smile of welcome on her pretty face.

~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~

Red quietly contemplated options as Dembe navigated through the busy streets of downtown.
Chicago.

The man wearily rubbed his face, closing his eyes hoping in that few seconds the caffeine would do its job and clear the cobwebs. He was inundated with the scent of coffee, aftershave and gun oil which permeated the inside of the vehicles cabin.

Which was a step up he supposed, from body odor, sweat and gun oil he and his constituents had been subjected to on past missions.

He swore, even as he felt the rich linen of his suit rub against his thigh, that if he opened his eyes, he would find Silas decked out in fatigues, camo face paint and the guards signature black bandana pulled tightly over that grey-streaked hair.

How things changed... yet always remained the same.

Thoughts came at break-neck speed. He contemplated his lot over the past decade or so...

When had Red’s life been reduced to nothing but the next mission? The next life or death situation?

He told Lizzy a short time back those long ago memories seemed as if someone else had lived them.

When the missions started to snuff out that life, he wasn’t sure. He knew the exact date he had last seen his family but exactly when his job started invading that life... he wasn’t entirely certain.

He only hoped in those dwindling moments with his daughter, he had stopped to cherish that precious time with her.

It was bad enough having lost his family. To think he may have neglected Jennifer...

He understood Hunter Gaines more than he wanted to admit. But Hunter still had a chance at his life... to be with his family. To be with the ones who needed him. To be with those he loved

To heal.

Hunter could not envision that possibility, very likely.

Red could get him counseling. He could set Gaines up with employment that would ensure a steady paycheck. Give him back his dignity and self-worth which, hopefully, would lead to a path back to the man’s wife and children.

There was hope for Hunter.

Unlike men like Red Reddington. His family split apart. The damage to his reputation irreversible. He was jaded...

Some would label him broken.

Men like Red Reddington did not have happy endin–

“You do know she’s tailing us, correct,” Silas muttered the obvious, sliding his full clip back in place, his expression one of slight annoyance.

But then again... Red’s mood lifted considerably. Maybe there was happiness to be found for men like him in the guise of a spirited and beautiful brunette whose tenacity often outweighed her good sense.
Red’s mouth curved into a reluctant smile. He controlled the urge to turnabout, knowing if he did... the woman in question would instinctively try to duck out of sight.

How that was possible in a moving vehicle was beyond him. He could clearly see the familiar car and very likely Joe, who would be staring at Elizabeth, an odd, puzzled look on his face.

Clearly visible to any and all onlookers for it would never ever occur to the seasoned Veteran to attempt to conceal his presence.

Elizabeth’s action were instinct even though she would sheepishly realize it too late.

Joe’s continued scowl would aid her in that realization.

The guard would have realized long since that Silas would have spotted the tail.

“I assumed she would.” Red’s eyes lit with merriment. “And she was doing so well too.”

Hunter noted the other car as well, “I thought you two had lost it.” he once again leisurely turned his head to check on the whereabouts of Elizabeth’s vehicle.

Red put a restraining hand on the man’s forearm, “Don’t rain on her parade.” he chuckled. “She probably truly believes she is being inconspicuous.”

Dembe watched the car weave in and out of the heavy traffic, “It would be relatively simple to lose them.”

“It would break her heart.” Red pooh-poohed such a notion. “Besides.. Joe knows where we’re going.”

“Wouldn’t it be wiser... not having her there?” Hunter was confused. “Do you want her in the midst of what’s surely to prove, a dangerous situation?”

“She lives for danger.” Silas studiously worked the greased slide of his weapon back and forth. “It’s her middle name, didn’t you know?”

“Joe has been given his instructions.” Red sent Silas an annoyed glance. “He will keep the sneaky little imp duly occupied.”

“Will he?” Silas doubted Joe’s abilities it seemed. “Keeping that woman diverted is a Herculean task on any given day. If she believes you are in imminent danger... it’s like trying to keep a lion from her babies.”

“I don’t like that analogy... at all.” Red scowled.

“That’s why he chose it.” Hunter assumed, checking with a smirking head guard.

“Lizzy can handle herself,” Red stated.

“My God,” Silas was aghast, “when did we decide that?”

“She can be our ‘go-to’ backup plan if anything goes awry.” Red decided that much.

“When... anything goes awry.” Silas corrected.

“It is what it is.” Red conceded.
“You’re protecting this woman, putting your lives on the line one second,” Hunter was still clearly processing, “and then next, trusting her to come through when the shit hits the fan.”

Red craned his neck glancing at the tall buildings along the boulevard they traveled. Too many vantage points from which to take aim, he mused.

Why hadn’t he picked a better spot for this rendezvous? Benton himself was the culprit.

The guy was making everyone’s life difficult. Instead of staying at his office or at the Court House, both which were heavily secured being state buildings... he decided it was a perfect time to give a lecture at DuPont University to up-and-coming law students.

Ressler and the team secured the guy’s safety for the moment but Red could have hoped for a more strategic place from which to extract the target.

Red’s team, or Silas’, stationed themselves outside the perimeter of the back exit of the University, all attempting to be as inconspicuous as humanly possible in their fully complemented tactical gear.

Red was pleasantly surprised as he gave the pre-arranged signal to Joe in the tail car. The guy immediately pulled over by the green awning covering the beginning of an adjoining alleyway.

He could hear Lizzy’s retorts already ringing in the poor guard’s ears but the car stayed stationary as Dembe moved further down the street.

Having made a left turn, Dembe brought them down a block over, at length making a right one into the same adjoining alleyway.

“How are the opposing teams getting along?” Red was curious.

“Moore is the only cog in the wheel,” Dembe reported. “He doesn’t understand the need for outsiders clogging up the works.”

“You’re quoting David, right?” Silas grinned. “He’ll understand better when a bullet whiz’s by his head, I imagine.” he grinned. “Or, one can hope anyway.”

“So you are expecting trouble.” Red sighed. Why couldn’t anything be simple?

Silas did a running check of the surrounding buildings in his head, “Those trash cans could hamper us... or provide much-needed cover.”

“Perhaps that is the noxious odor you speak of...” Dembe delivered straight-faced.

Whether they wanted to, the occupants of the car chuckled quietly.

“You know what the smell is like?” the head guard sought out his own kind.

Hunter listened attentively.

“When the scent of gun oil and sweat blankets you in the second before you take the shot...” the man murmured. “The stillness...”

Hunter contemplated, his stare almost dreamlike.

“When everything stops, the only sound is the wind and your own breath.”
Hunter nodded minutely.

Red watched the two men’s faces.

Both were devoid of emotion, both pair of eyes blank... seeing something even Red Reddington couldn’t see.

“Who’s David?” Hunter broke the spell first.

“David Russo... out of Beirut.” Silas supplied.

“He went off the grid a few years back.” Hunter was confused. “Thought he was dead.”

“Just changed employers.” Red smiled at nothing in particular. “Where the hell is everyone?”

“Well, if you see them, it would defeat the purpose.” Silas scowled. “More to the point, where’s the FBI when a guy needs them?”

As if on cue, Moore’s head popped out the glass door of the Colleges back exit.

He quickly disappeared having ascertained that their transport was in place.

Out of no-where David Russo appeared securing the unguarded door.

“That wasn’t obvious at all,” Silas grunted his dissension. “That stupid bastard caused my man to have to show his position needlessly.”

“David can explain the folly of Moore’s actions later, personally. But right now,” Red agreed. “our hand has been forced.”

Red flipped his phone open, making the necessary call, “Ressler,” his tone curt, “I thought we agreed you’d give my people ample time to secure the area.”

“What are you talking about?” Ressler was just as curt.

“Moore is a fucking idiot but I’m not his keeper.” Ressler defended himself.

Red heard the underlying tone. Ressler and Moore were butting heads about seniority... at the worst possible time.

“What the hell do we do now.” Ressler sighed irritably.

“Just move the package, we’ll be ready.” Red snapped the phone shut.

Hunter and Silas already exited the vehicle, Dembe retained his seat for the moment, all hoping for a smooth transfer.

Silas was kinking his neck though, never a good sign. His eyes scanning the windows of surrounding buildings.

Sun glistened off the multitude of mirrored plates.

“Too risky... too populated.” he decided, lowering his search to more accessible rooftops and entryways.
“Tempered glass fucks up trajectory...” Hunter mentioned, “two shots minimum.” he ran the scenario with Silas.

“We’re good on ammo,” Silas assured.

“Saw it.” Silas searched the structure absently. “That’s where I would station a few men.”

“Did you?”

“David handled it.” Silas stepped to Red’s side of the car. The guy was already half-way out of the opened door. “How the hell can I protect you if you don’t wait for the all clear signal to emerge?”

“They aren’t here for me.”

“They will always be here for you.” Silas countered. “A measly grand or two. Upside the bounty on your head? Hell, I thought about taking your ass out myself from time to time.”

“That’s why I give you habitual raises... and a dental plan.” Red straightened his clothes absently, rising to his full height.

The hair on the back of his neck stood just as high, “You’re right,” he grimaced, his eyes darting from one alcove to the next, down the small confined area, “this is not going to be a walk in the park. I just felt a target fall on my back.”

Silas’ weapon was out, hanging by his side. Hunter retrieved a similar side-arm from the arsenal in the car but he kept continuously looking longingly at his rifle with its precision scope.

Red met David’s eyes from across the short expanse. The guy was standing, seemingly at ease, a tactical assault rifle resting lightly on his hip but something in those clear green eyes signaled an unease.

“We’ve searched the perimeter meticulously.” Red approached, his steps unhurried. “But something is off... it doesn’t feel right.” David reported.

Silas nodded, “Lawford hires the best.”

“Thank you.” Hunter absently, politely accepted the praise.

“They won’t be sloppy.” David finished Silas’ thought.

Ressler appeared at the top of the stairs leading to the exit, his footfalls purposeful as he made his way to the men.

Red entered the small alcove, meeting the man’s descent.

“Have to give it to your men, Reddington,” Donald spoke first. “They almost made us seem unnecessary.”

Red was proud of his men’s abilities, trying hard not to show it. A force of habit, not letting anyone know how important people were to you.

“With all this fuss, I have to wonder if Benton doesn’t mean more to you than you’re letting on.” Donald was the suspicious kind. “...You don’t have him in your pocket, do you?”
Red raised a brow, “You know your friend better than I do.” he said. “Do you think he could be bought?”

Ressler dropped his chin, looking at the wingtips on his shoes... silently.

Red shifted his eyes to David, gauging the guard’s assessment. The guard merely shook his head.

It didn’t matter. Really, no point wasting time on it.

“I only buy Judges, Donald.” Red grimaced distastefully. “Not lowly, D.A’s.”

For some reason, Ressler felt better, “How tactless of me.” he apologized for the faux pas.

Silas and Hunter had not relaxed one iota, Red noted the stiffness of each man’s body.

“It looks clear. Your men are--”

“Looks can be deceiving and although we’ve only got two-three meters to traverse...” Red cursed the trash receptacles for being in the way, “for a professional... that’s enough.”

“I’ve told Benton, but he’s being stupid,” Ressler’s face was grim, “thinks this is all an over-dramatic display of stupidity on our part.”

“Has he been apprised of the danger to his wife and child?” Red was flabbergasted by such a cavalier outlook.

“Says Sarah is imagining things...” Ressler said, “the phone calls, the other shit. He says she got this way with the baby when it first arrived. Over-cautious, jumpy at every little sound.”

“First, tell that bastard to never underestimate a woman’s intuition.” Red’s temper flared.

Ressler brows lifted at the unexpected remark.

“Maybe we should walk away then.” Red fumed. “What the fuck am I risking my men’s life for?”

Ressler sighed, heavily, “I appreciate your help, but you’re right... something’s wrong here. I sense it too. I trust Samar’s abilities but Moore and Wilson...” he lowered his voice because the sound of footfalls could be heard approaching, “I don’t know them from Adam. I’d appreciate someone at my six I know will cover my ass when shit goes downhill.”

Red checked with Silas for the man’s approval. It would be his and his men’s neck on the line more than anyone.

Silas’ jaw clenched, wondering if the possible casualties were worth it.

“The guy’s a douche, but his kid...” Hunter murmured to the man beside him. “We can do this.” he counseled. “Four, five minutes tops.”

Silas jerked his head in approval.

“Can’t we get the show on the road all ready?” Moore’s face was impatience itself. “What’s the hold up?” he led the way, Wilson following, and Samar’s pretty legs just in view of the top stairs of the landing.
Red waved a nonchalant hand, “Be my guest.” he indicated the opening which awaited.

Moore’s expression slipped, his eyes falling on the suddenly very open and vulnerable breezeway.

“Come on, people.” a handsome man in an expensive suit pushed his way past Samar and Wilson’s protective circle. “Aren’t we being a little overly cautious here?”

Red sized the younger man up with shrewd eyes.

“Donny,” the guy jovially slapped the agent on the shoulder, “I love all this attention,” he playfully jabbed at Ressler to lighten everyone’s mood, “you’re overreacting, fella.”

“Could be,” Donald replied stonily. “But I’m not going to be the one to notify Sarah if our Intel proves to be correct.”

Benton sobered a bit, “Sarah is a reactionary, always has been and I’ve had threats on my life before, believe me.”

“Oh, I believe someone has threatened you before....” Red narrowed his eyes at the man. “Though, never has the threat been from someone of Lawford’s caliber,” he said. “Shocking, I know.”

Benton eyed the man, a puzzled scowl lacing the darkly tanned features, “Don’t I know you?”

The silence was palpable.

“Could be the end of yours.” Ressler grated. “You better start taking this shit seriously. You haven’t dealt with anyone like Lawford before. His reach isn’t limited by jail bars.”

“You need to take Donny here seriously,” Red’s patience was waning, “and shut the hell up. Every second you delay here puts my men in danger and quite frankly, I’m beginning to second guess my assumption your ass is worth it.”

Red turned on his heel, pushing out the glass partitions, stalking to the side of the breezeway cover.

Silas moved to a better position, across the bricked stepping path. Hunter Gaines was nowhere to be seen but Red wasn’t worried because he knew, Silas knew where the man was.

Ressler organized a quick order of accession with Aram taking lead.

The computer geek bravely ventured forth to the glass doors as directed by Samar.

He clutched his precious bag protectively to his chest, ducking his head, taking the plunge secure in Mr. Reddington’s assurances.

David grasped Aram’s arm, gingerly guiding, leading him into the specially reinforced safety of the spacious van which awaited.

Red noted a niche behind that van that could possibly provide extra cover if needed.

It was something in his nature. It was something he did. Something that kept him alive all these years.

“Surely this is only harassment, Donny.” Benton’s face lost its jovial mood, his eyes worried now. “These cases bring out the worst kind of people.”
Ressler ignored the byplay, sending Samar and Wilson through.

Samar sidled up to Red, tucking inside the man’s peripheral vision, just behind his shoulder.

He could feel her warmth, smell the crisp aroma of Shea.

Wilson made good time, but he did not enter the van, taking up a tactical spot on the very spot Red wanted to utilize himself.

Red’s brow furrowed darkly.

Samar smiled, sensing the interplay, “Did he steal your place in line?”

Red ran his hand around his nape, “Stay close, Samar.”

The woman fell silent, picking up on the tension.

“We can deliberate the issue later.” Ressler motioned Benton forward then stepped in front of his charge. “Let’s just get you to Sarah and the kid.”

“...They are safe though?”

“Oh, now it’s sinking in.” Ressler snapped then altered his stance, putting a firm hand on Benton’s shoulder. “Stay low out there.”

David hunched his body over the District Attorney, fingers tight about Benton’s upper arm as they moved in unison across the open space to the van.

Immediate gunfire erupted from a second-story window. Taking most by surprise even though everyone expected trouble.

Silas and Hunter lifted ready weapons at the sound of shattering glass milliseconds before the shots rang out.

Red’s arm went out instinctively, barring Samar’s intended run for cover.

David went down hard taking his charge with him. Blood splattered from David’s thigh but between Donald Ressler and Russo’s handling, Benton was shoved headlong into the opening of the van.

Aram pulled Benton into the recesses.

Red laid down cover fire while Wilson pulled David into the van.

Ressler rolled under the vehicle gauging his options.

Silas miraculously obtained a double-barreled shot-gun which he was using to his advantage for this close contact attack.

Two men emerged from the end of the alley after the first shots.

They were put out of action by Silas’ men who waited patiently for just such an advance.

Several shots reigned down from different rooftops, however.

One of Silas’ sharpshooters was systematically eliminating that threat however from the neighboring rooftop.
The enemy had a perfect line of vision to the van’s location and were causing havoc with Silas’ ground team.

Silas commanded men up the cleared stairwell, moving to join them, but Red waved him off.

Ressler rolled clear of the van, crawling forward on his forearms. He jerked, flinching as loud pings ricocheted off a nearby railing.

A man stepped out from an opposite doorway, coming out of nowhere.

He had Ressler in his sights.

Samar’s back was pressed against Red’s. He heard the repeated sound of her regulation weapon being put to good use and the occasional swaying as she was forced to change out clips.

Red lay his own weapon over the top of a electrical junction box to steady a shot.

Ressler tucked quickly, rolling aside as a bullet embedded itself close to his head.

Red took his shot and Ressler’s antagonist fell crumpled into the shadows of the doorway he exited from.

Ressler’s eyes flit quickly over the scene. He rose to his knees, firing off two quick shots.

Unfortunately, his second shot went wide, giving the new assailant ample opportunity.

Donald felt the molten fire tear through his body. The agent fell into an ungraceful heap about two, three meters from Red’s position.

Red could see into the opened van. Aram’s body was protecting Benton’s. The agent’s face was chalky but his eyes were clear and not panicked.

Moore was blocking the vehicle, still firing at some unseen perpetrator.

He was in the way of the van moving.

“Moore!” Samar yelled at her contemporary. “Get Ressler in the van! You’re blocking it! Move!”

A small window beside Red shattered, spraying him and the woman with bits of sharp, stinging glass.

He pushed Samar back into a corner, protecting her with his body. As he lowered his head, shards of glass fell from the rim of his fedora.

He checked his clip.

“That fucking idiot!” he gritted his teeth. “If he would move–”

Dembe had made his way to a nearby trash can.

Red felt better knowing the man was close by but then where else would he find Dembe?

The battle waged on...

“We have to do something!” Liz gripped the dashboard, her fingers white as she watched the carnage taking place.

“If that fucking idiot would get out of the way of the van...” Joe yelled into his radio yet again but no one copied his request.

Liz bit her lip nervously, holding her breath, her instincts screaming as loudly as Joe’s orders.

She could not see Red or Samar. They were hidden from her sight.

She had seen Ressler go down. The man lay unnaturally still.

Out of nowhere, a large hulk of a man appeared from the van.

David Russo single-handedly man-handled Ressler’s unresponsive body into the van.

Out of a second-story window, a man fell with a shrill scream of surprise and horror.

Liz saw the body break through the shattered window pane but the surrounding buildings blocked the actual fall.

Silas recognized the sound of Hunter Gaines’ special-made weapon resounding overhead.

He watched the body fall and hit with a sickening thud.

He turned his attention upward for a millisecond.

There was no sight of Gaines but he wouldn’t expect there would be.

They had someone else on a higher-level now. The playing field was leveling out finally.

The driver backed the van ever so slowly down the long, endless alleyway.

Moore moved along with it, finally making a dash for the doorway as he was given no option but to do so.

Dembe’s position was now the one closer to the slowly creeping vehicle.

He rolled effortlessly into the opening, seeing to the wounded as he waited for an opportunity to get Red assistance.

Silas heard the distinct sound of sliding metal, swirling about.

A man was positioned on the fire escape. Red Reddington in his sites.

Red was unaware, too concentrated on protecting Samar Navabi’s sweet ass.

Silas fired.

The fire escape guy staggered back, hitting hard into the brick of the building. He lost his balance, leaning precariously over the thin railing.

Fumbling for a handhold and finding a convenient rung... he hung there in mid-air for a lifetime before his hold weakened.

Liz grimaced painfully at the sight of the man bouncing off the unforgiving concrete below.

Silas took the opportunity to make his way to Red and Samar for Hunter Gaines was giving their foes a hell-of-a-fight upstairs.

Silas could hear the distinct pop-pop of his own unit’s weapons too.

They reached their objective.

The second-floor assault would be shut down shortly.

Hunter leaned over the parapet, grinning down at the trio of gawkers, “They don’t give up, do they?” he grinned.

“I don’t respect a quitter,” Silas yelled back. “Do you?”

“I wouldn’t hold it against them right now.” Hunter laughed, ducking back quickly as a bullet almost took his ear off. “Who! I heard that one!”

Silas rolled his eyes, a reluctant smile pulling at his mouth.

“You guys go on. We’ve got this covered for a while!”

“Not too long a while!” Silas glanced at his watch. “Your time’s almost up, cops are on the way!”

The van hit the bumper of Red’s car, shoving it back. Dembe dashed from the van, sliding over the hood of the car, taking his place behind the wheel.

Red knew the guy would not budge one iota until he was sure Red was safe and contained.

“Raymond!” Dembe yelled through the open passenger sides of the doorways he flung open.

“Take her!” Red barked the order.

“No!” Samar balked. “We all go!”

Silas’ eye ticked but did as Red bid. His strong forearm slid about Samar’s waist as he lifted effortlessly, falling into a hasty run.

The burn and strain of his broken ribs caused the guy to grunt loudly but he did not once break stride.

Red lay down cover fire.

Hunter Gaines more than did his part, the expert marksman hitting his target time after time.

Liz was on tenterhooks having to sit and watch and... do nothing.

She could see Samar now.

Silas moved too rapidly, Samar’s feet all but dangled at the guy’s side.

He tucked the woman against his body, falling into the open passenger seat. Their momentum throwing them towards Dembe.

Red breathed a sigh of relief, “Hunter!” he yelled over the constant barrage.

“Still here.”

“Silas will order his men out now, you go with them!”
Red could hear the distant scream of sirens approaching.

“Aye, sir!” the man snapped off a smart salute. “It’s been a hell of a ride!” laughter echoed down the alleyway.

Red caught Silas’ eyes. Dembe waited, one foot out the open doorway, ready should he be needed. Red gave a nod before both men lay down resounding blasts which echoed down the way, deafening those gathered.

Dembe took his place in front of his passenger who slipped effortlessly into the back seat.

In seconds, Red Reddington having been secured, the vehicle backed rapidly down the alleyway, making a path for the van to follow.

Dembe executed a sharp turn around the large, lumbering cargo transport whipping into the opposite alleyway.

Wilson followed the cars lead for he, himself, had no idea where the hell to go.

Shots were intermittent however and the only real worry seemed to be, would the thick glass hold up still under the constant bombardment of well-placed shots.

Wilson winced as a bullet shattered directly in front of his face. He watched the shards splinter in beautiful geometric shapes within the structure of the windshield glass.

He wasted no time in steering the van into the relative safety of the adjoining alley.

Dembe already exited onto the street. Another car pulled rapidly away from the curve.

Wilson acted on instinct, turning the van in the same direction of the second car.

Red and Dembe fell in behind the large vehicle as it screeched away, in seconds already half-way down the block, almost to the intersection.

The light was red but Joe floored the lead car through... Wilson ignored the approaching traffic, speeding behind.

Dembe laid down on the horn, managing to miss an overzealous Dodge truck, whose owner was too busy looking at road signs to note the ruckus taking place around him.

Red held on to the safety strap of the car implicitly trusting in Dembe’s reflexes, his attention on the caravan in front of him.

“David?” he asked grimly.

“I’ve got a tourniquet on the leg, his body armor protected anything vital.” Dembe kept pace with the van easily. “Agent Ressler... I had no time to assess.”

Red was silent. Cop sirens were louder... closer but behind them.

“We have to get off the grid,” he stated the obvious, he knew. “Head for the Emmisary Hotel.”

Dembe shot through yet another light mindless of the screeching and honks his actions received. “Chicago is a bustling town.”
Red couldn’t help but crack a smile, “I believe we have worn out our welcome.”

Dembe lay into the gas pressing the men into their seats with the motion.

Red made a few calls.

Kaplan’s team was put on alert, first and foremost. The second was to the lead car, giving Joe the directive on their escape route which now changed due to Ressler’s state... whatever that might be. And of course, David’s, who valiantly risked his own safety for that of a perfect stranger.

The Emmisary’s sharply etched roofline was rapidly approaching.

Red wanted desperately to speak to Lizzy, to hear her voice but there were matters of import to which he must first attend.

He waited impatiently for his third call to be connected.

“Where the hell are you?” Francis Holbrook’s voice broke the silence on the line.

Dembe pulled into the back of the impressive hotel having followed the lead cars.

“No time for pleasantries,” Red’s clipped tone interrupted, “get your men in Chicago to secure Lawford’s holdings... is it doable?”

“Ooh!” Francis perked up happily. “Is this a birthday gift?”

“Wrapped in a bow and everything.” Red evaded. “Can you do it?”

“Consider it done.” Francis was already tapping into files on his computer, his fingers flying quickly over the keyboard. “I sense trouble in Dodge City?”

“Whatever dirt you can dig up must be handed over to the proper authorities.”

“What the hell kind of present is that?” Francis’ disappointment was acute. “I wanted to keep it for myself.”

Dembe slid into place, putting the car in park. The man exited the driver’s side.

“That’s what your men are for, you twit!” Red grumbled. “You can keep the goods. I want the other charges you have on Lawford.”

“Oh, the boring shit.” Francis was pleased. “You want all of it? The tax evasion, racketeering and–”

“Anything to nail his ass, but good,” Red confirmed.

“What brought this about?” Francis was curious.

“Let’s just say, he overstepped.” Red twisted his mouth distastefully.

“So I take it,” Francis switched computer screens, correlating with another set of files, “Lawford is out of the scene?”

“If you do your job, yes.”

The sound of typing tapered off, a stilted silence filling the line. “I would like to think this was a surprise gift for me...” Francis said lightly, “but you wouldn’t have gone after Lawford for kicks.”
the young man sobered. “...Is he the one trying to hurt Lizzy?”

Red hesitated, unsure how to respond exactly, “...Indirectly. It’s a long story, Francis. One I can’t get into right now. I have to see to my people.”

“Understood.” Francis did. “One thing before you go. Is Lizzy all right? Is she with you? I can go to her if need—”

Red looked at Lizzy.

The woman waited patiently outside the van, throwing occasional looks his way.

Ressler was being unloaded with precision care.

David walked into the hotel on his own... well, limped in under his own power.

“She’s with me, she’s fine.” Red’s tone softened. “Blissfully unaware of my business for the day,” he stressed.

“And is to remain blissfully unaware.” Francis understood the tone well.

“I’m glad we understand one another,” Red replied shortly.

“I’ll get back to you. I have more on the slimy bastard coming out of New York.” Francis read the data rapidly. “How urgent is this?”

“Stay on it,” Red stated. “I’ll be held up here for a while. I’ll have more in an hour.”

“That’s sufficient time to secure Lawford’s holding’s there.” Francis relayed.

“I’ll be in touch.”

Both men signed off.

Red hauled ass, heading directly for his team and the waiting arms of... Elizabeth Keen.

JUNE 5

Red approached the gathered throng of people milling around the vacated cars.

He took a quick assessment of his people before his eyes fell on an apprehensive Elizabeth Keen.

He managed a smile for her alone, stepping close, his hand rubbing the woman’s back soothingly.

Ever mindful of the audience on hand, he refused to allow any more of a liberty.

“You’re all right?” he murmured for Lizzy’s ears alone.

The pout of a mouth pulled into a mischievous grin, “That defensive driving training really pays off, doesn’t it?” she hooked her thumb in her guard’s direction. “Did you see us weaving and bobbing out in that traffic?”

“Never took the course.” Joe admitted. “I learned to drive from my mom.”

“You had a mother?” Red was determined to lighten the gloom of the pall that had fallen over everyone present.

Samar watched Donald Ressler’s stretcher push through the back doors before disappearing out of sight.

Where they were taking the agent, she had no clue. This was a hotel not a hospital.

But the people who had taken Donald were dressed in the requisite hospital garb.

They seemed efficient and well able to handle emergencies.

She fought her instinct to follow the gurney to its final destination.

“Where are they taking him?” Aram whispered in her ear. “Who were those people?”

She sought the man out.

“Isn’t this a hotel?” the guy craned his neck up the many storied building.

Elizabeth was gently wiping blood from Red Reddington’s face. The brick exploding from a near hit had marred the area somewhat.
“You’re hurt.” Liz tsked, retrieving a handkerchief from her ever present carry all which she laughingly referred to as a ‘purse’.

But what Red called a ‘catch all’. He had a mind to take her on Let’s Make a Deal, knowing she would most likely be carrying whatever was required.

“If this is the worst that ever happens to me,” Red chuckled, privately enjoying her pampering, “I’ll be happy.”

Liz finished up her task, turning to the other of her group.

She rushed to hug Aram and Samar, embracing them briefly, expressing her relief they came out of the skirmish relatively unscathed.

She turned on the large man who had been looming at her side.

Silas’ expression slipped into a menacing scowl, “Don’t you even think—”

Liz’s face broke into a joyous grin of delight as she impulsively engulfed the man into a tight bear of a hug.

He grunted sharply, the sound breaking her action.

“Oh!” she eyed his slouched position regretfully. She had forgotten his injuries.

“What is it with you and this touchy feely shit?” he grumbled her concern away. “I have an image to uphold.” he motioned to his men who milled about aimlessly, trying to regroup.

“You think I won’t accost them next?” Liz laughed gaily, “Should I sing a few choruses of “Macho Man?” she teased. “Would that make you feel better?”

“You’re tone deaf, so no.” Silas checked the area again. “What would make me feel better is to get this lot organized and back on track.”

“Ever diligent.” Dembe approved.

“Are we expecting trouble?” Samar questioned Silas more than Red.

Aram and Samar had wandered over, hearing the last of the conversation.

Silas’ eyes met the dark beauty’s solemnly, “Lawford’s men don’t give up so easily.” his senses were telling him so. “So yeah, we are.”

At that exact moment, a large SUV turned into the parkway. It eased slowly down the long alleyway.

A few men to Samar’s right instantly took up defensive positions behind a large substation, semi-automatic rifles aimed and ready.

Silas waved them off, however, having recognized the driver of the vehicle, for it had pulled enough down the way for him to do so.

The dark-tinted windows on the driver’s side was down.

“It’s the rooftop team.” Joe explained the matter to the others. He peered closer into the interior of the car. “What the hell is that guy doing with them?”
Silas commiserated, “I would have thought he would have been the first one to pull out.”

Red asked the rhetorical question on everyone’s minds which lifted a few brows.

“It’s Hunter Gaines.” Silas explained.

Joe waved the car into an out-of-the-way spot.

Red pulled Silas aside for a moment, quietly discussing a matter of interest with the head guard. Silas nodded slowly before shrugging. Red inclined his head, the matter seemingly settled.

“Now go...” Red ended the discussion. “Get checked out. I don’t want to hang around here any longer than necessary.” he waved the large guard to the back entrance of the hotel. “After we unload Benton, we’ll get the hell out of here.”

“What’s to stop Lawford’s men from a repeat of what went down today,” Samar had thought about the problem, “once you’re off the grid again?”

“We will have given ourselves time.” Red explained the drill. “We still have our bargaining chip. Lawford will be given an offer he can’t refuse.”

Aram brightened, waving a hand towards Red, “The Godfather.” The computer geek prided himself on all the movies he had watched to catch up to the references Red often made.

“It will greatly reduce the threat level to Benton and his family.” Red said.

“Lawford doesn’t strike me as someone who frightens easily.” Samar had met men like him before.

“It’s all in how you present your side of the issue.” Red knew a man who could be ever so persuasive with all sorts of odd contraptions. “Until Lawford sees the light, we have him as a shield to use to our advantage.”

“Ergo...” Silas was still overly cautious and alert, “they will want him back and the reward for Benton’s head is still a go until Lawford rescinds the offer.”

“And you are sure he will be so magnanimous?” Samar clearly doubted the fact.

Both Red and Silas remained pointedly silent but something in their demeanor told the woman of their certainty.

The tension and the looks exchanged between the lovely agent and the mammoth guard was palpable.

Silas’ brooding stare burned brightly every time it chanced to land on the beautiful face.

Samar was female enough to pick up on the exchange, “I haven’t thanked you for earlier.” she stepped closer, her tone altered the dark eyes holding Silas’ easily. “For manhandling me out of dangers way.”

She looked him over consideringly, “I do so now.”

Silas’ gaze shifted to Aram.

The guy was checking the outside of his briefcase for damage.

The light grey stare shifted back to the exotic woman. He inclined his head sharply, his manner totally professional.

Red shook his head minutely for such stupidity but he felt Silas’ sense of honor. He even understood it... to a degree.

Silas wasn’t going to make a move because Aram was so obviously enamored of Samar Navabi, it verged on the ridiculous.

Silas had picked up on the dynamics of the situation, refusing to cross the imaginary lines which had been drawn.

 Didn’t mean he had to like it... which explained his more than sour mood of late.

“Aram,” Red placed a hand on the hapless man’s shoulder, “if you will go through that door on the right,” he pointed just inside the entrance, “there is a fully equipped office two doors down.”

Aram looked about, totally lost.

“You can get in touch with Cooper,” Red gave a feasible excuse, “get him up to speed on our present situation.”

“Oh!” Aram’s face brightened. “Yes, yes, of course. That would be good.” he nodded rapidly, rushing up the ramp. In seconds he was out of sight.

Samar turned a lazy stare to a disgruntled guard. She waited patiently.

“...I don’t tread on another man’s property.”

Samar’s lovely brows shot up, “Excuse me?”

“What?” Liz looked about, her confusion apparent.

Red knew that tone well. He guided Lizzy out of the battle zone which was quickly escalating.

“What’s going on?” Liz whispered urgently, resisting his gentle urging. “I wanna hear.”

“Yes, I know you do.” he patronized, continuing on his intended path.

Lizzy’s sweet mouth tightened irritably, as she jerked from his grasp, suitably annoyed.

“You are a buzz killer, Red Reddington.” she seemed pretty sure of the facts.

He held his amusement, his eyes twinkling down at the set little features.

“I went through hell in my country just so I could get away from that antiquated thinking.” Samar’s pretty features were clouding over meanwhile, just out of earshot.

Liz watched anxiously, trying desperately to read lips. She craned her head about Red’s shoulders as he blocked such efforts where and if he could, much to her exasperation.

“I don’t belong ...” Samar's hands came to her shapely hips, “to any man. Until I say I do.”

Silas took it well, “Guys have a certain code, has nothing to do with you or your back water country’s views.”

She settled somewhat, “What are you saying?” she challenged. “Or aren’t you man enough to not play stupid games?"

Silas took the intended insult well, again, “If he wasn’t in the picture... I would make my play.”

Samar’s temper eased considerably.

“Tell me... he’s not.” Silas could issue a challenge of his own.

Samar glanced after the absent Aram Mojtabai, her look a very controlled one, for she knew the guard watched her features carefully.

“That’s what I thought.” Silas read what any man would have.

Samar touched his forearm, holding firm when he shifted a cool stare to the contact which transfixed to the lovely face.

“...It’s complicated.” Samar’s brow furrowed, her eyes open and unreadable. “Can you do,” the dark eyes softened, “...complicated?”

Silas’ expression altered, the tenseness leaving his body the longer he held the captivating, troubled gaze.

Samar’s fingers slid from his forearm. She walked away, a sadness about the tall, statuesque frame.

Liz frowned, watching the interplay, “What? What just happened?” she looked helplessly at Red.

“Nothing,” Red had witnessed the short exchange as well. “Not yet...”

Liz pinched her lips irritably, wishing he would stop talking in riddles!

“Did you see something I didn’t?” she tossed her hands out to her side, growling her impatience.

Silas still looked after the dark beauty, his gaze rather mellow to Red’s way of thinking.

“What do you think about,” Red gestured, “those two,” Liz looked back at Silas and Samar questioningly, “...together.”

“You can’t mean...” Liz sputtered.

Red raised his brows, looking at her meaningfully.

Liz’s mouth gaped, her thoughts swirling. She looked at Samar... then Silas. It would be nice if Silas could find someone after Anya, her romantic tendencies took hold before common sense prevailed.

“They would kill each other within a week!”

“One way or other.” Red’s lips twitched for the reality of her words. “But it might be a death worthy of Valhalla.”

Liz hit his shoulder, taking her frustrations out, “You men are all alike... except you, Dembe.”

“Thank you, Elizabeth.”

Liz walked away, determined to put Samar in a better frame of mind after whatever happened between her and that big ass, Silas.

“What the hell was that?” Red’s expression skewed.
Dembe smiled, well pleased with himself, clearly, “Is it my fault she sees me as a more responsible, mature individual?”

“Yes!” Red snapped the nonsensical retort which only caused Dembe’s smile to grow. “I meant,” he grumbled, “you, my dearest friend, my confidant... left me floundering.” he bitched. “Why didn’t you concur with my observation? I know you do!”

“I enjoy watching Elizabeth give you a what-for.” Dembe shrugged.

Red cut dagger like eyes his friend’s way... holding a smile for the observation. He rather enjoyed Lizzy in a prickly mood... now that he was in a position to persuade that mood to alter for the better.

And if the beautiful glowering eyes pointed in his direction meant anything, he had his work cut out for him this evening.

A smile pulled at the corner of his mouth, furthering her ire.

He did so love a challenge.

Silas’ attention diverted hastily from his perusal of the two women who conversed meters away.

Both Red and Dembe moved instinctively closer to natural cover.

A couple police cruisers rolled down the block toward their location.

“And the logistical nightmare continues.” Red murmured, checking the position and actions of his people.

Silas had moved to Elizabeth and Samar, urging them to a place of safety, “Get inside... both of you.”

His clipped tone brought different results from both women.

Samar grinned, allowing herself to be manhandled. Liz bit back a retort. Well... she tried.

“You are such a nudge!” she snapped. “Can’t you ever be polite?”

“Get inside the damn building,” Silas grated, “...please.”

Two more cruisers were converging from the opposite end of the building.

Red’s senses went on high alert. He crossed rapidly, taking Liz from Silas’ hold.

Shoving his charge to the outcrop of the entrance of the hotel, he shielded her, his arm holding her behind his back.

“They could be friendlies.” Liz reminded, staying put.

“And pigs can fly.” Red murmured, his thoughts on the matter as the cars pulled to a halt.

“Why don’t we show them our badges?” Samar countered. Silas had maneuvered her to the solid mass of columns supporting the overhang of the loading dock. “This could be a pissing contest between agencies, you know.”

“One way to find out.” Liz hastily dialed her phone.
Assistance came quickly. The emergency operator was on the other end as Liz conveyed the urgency of the matter.

Red watched and waited.

All cars were communicating.

Silas’ men were ready and stoked.

“We are the FBI, we need your people to stand down.” Liz was explaining. “There is no cause to engage.”

It was just about then that the ‘engagement’ began...

The police had taken up position behind their doors, the only cover afforded them.

It was a plus for Red’s team. Their weapons could easily penetrate the thin metal.

Gunfire proved the point. The cops scrambled for more adequate protection.

Red’s men were very efficient at what they did. In seconds, the loud weapons fire halted.

Red surveyed the scene.

Four men were laying about the vehicles, all moving to some extent.

One lay half-sitting, close to a parked vehicle. Nursing his leg wound. He hadn’t been able to make the dash across the barrage of bullets.

Red had a standing order where cops were involved. Wound only, clean shots.

It was too much a hassle, coping with the stigma of ‘cop killer’.

Quite frankly, he never felt a desire to earn the label. They were simply people, doing their jobs to the best of their ability.

“Well, whether or not you are showing involvement,” Liz’s tone was sharp and angry, “Let me tell you firsthand, lady... something is going down! I take it you heard that volley of gunfire!”

Liz signed off, her eyes taking in the carnage rapidly, “They will be dispatching more patrols.”

Red had stepped out, clearing an empty clip, replacing it automatically.

She took it to mean the ‘all clear’ had been sounded.

Samar noted the cops’ hands lifted high. Silas’ men approached alert and cautious.

“You took that guy down.” Silas weapon hung loosely in his hand as he waved it in the needed direction.

“You know... I do this for a living.” Samar arched her brow. “I even enjoy it on occasion.”

Silas’ eyes raked her body with interest, “I enjoy a lot of things.” he kept his tone a scolding one for appearance’s sake. “Doesn’t mean I want to see anyone die when doing it.”

Samar’s expression grew thoughtful, “Well... that depends on what you’re doing, doesn’t it?”
Silas lifted his head, cocking it slightly. He trusted his men to wrap up the loose ends of what had transpired but he kept a watchful eye on their antics, anyway.

“You’re just this side of kinky... aren’t you?” he shifted a neutral look.

“Only one way to find out.” Samar shrugged delicate shoulders.

Silas removed a clip, cleaning his chamber. He caught the ejected bullet mid-flight, “You’re turning me the hell on.” his stare told Samar just how much so.

Again, the lovely brows arched, “Maybe that was my intent.” she smiled slowly. “But that was before I saw how quickly you cleared your... chamber of its load.”

Silas watched her hips as the woman swished saucily away, a slow grin overtaking his handsome features.

Red gave the man a meaningful, yet amusing look for the burn, “Ouch.”

Silas lowered his head, shaking it, a smile still in place before returning his interest to the matters at hand.

He had something to ponder over now. The fact brought the dark scowl back to his rugged face.

“Red, you can’t be here.” Liz had long realized as the sounds of yet more sirens met her ears. “Samar and I can clean this up, but you have to vacate.”

Still the man hesitated, fighting his instincts.

“Silas can handle it.” Liz urged. “Go!”

Dembe nodded slowly, “It is best.” he counseled. “You being here will only add to the... problem.”

Red’s jaw pulsed, his eyes locking on Lizzy before allowing Dembe to lead him away.

“Not far, Dembe.” he muttered tightly.

They disappeared into the confines of the building just as the real cops pulled up with a screech directly behind the other patrol cars.

Red worried the weapon in his hand as he stared out the window at Lizzy, and more importantly, Silas taking on a protective stance as the cops approached.

“She will be fine.” Dembe assured quietly.

Red grunted, damning his position either way.

~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~

Liz felt better now that Red was safely ensconced inside the mass of rooms of the hotel.

His normal routine would be to exit the front before the area was shut down. She hoped he didn’t stop by the makeshift medical ward first.

Surely he had enough sense to not do that.

She sighed internally, knowing the man would most likely do it... because he could.
Liz smiled brightly as a formidable police officer approached. She instinctively reached for her back pocket, her stomach plummeting.

“Shit...” Red murmured watching her reactionary move, knowing her badge was not in place.

Samar sensed Liz’s hesitation. She stepped forward, smiling and extracting her badge, showing it hastily to thwart any misunderstanding, distracting the Officer.

Liz stepped in behind the woman, Silas coming alongside as a show of unity.

Samar gestured to the two, obviously introducing them as members of her team before directing the officer’s attention to the scene.

Red relaxed, breathing out a sigh of relief.

Dembe frowned, looking between Raymond and the scene unfolding outside, “There is no need to worry. They are legitimate officers.”

“Lizzy doesn’t have her badge.” Red explained. “She shouldn’t even be here, let alone out there.” he continued. “Samar just saved us a whole day of avoiding pointless red tape.”

“She is a very formidable woman.” Dembe said.

Red cocked his head, disbelief etching his features, “Not you too?”

Dembe grinned, “I am... involved.”

Red turned on his heel, “You better be.” he grumbled. “I can’t take another member of the Samar Navabi fan club.”

Liz kept glancing about half-expecting Red to pop back-up. She could feel his eyes on her.

Her nerves were on edge for the fact.

Hunter Gaines felt the same, “My instincts are telling me to bugger the fuck out of here.”

Silas pulled his eyes from Samar Navabi charming the cop, “You get used to it.” he watched the surrounding commotion.

He rolled exaggerated eyes, hooking Liz’s belt loop, keeping her close. Liz pinched irritated lips, swatting the man’s hand to no avail. Hunter watched the show, amused.

“Stop it, you freak.” Liz bitched.

Silas pulled her back, grumbling in her ear, “I’ve got your back, he’s,” he jerked his chin to the policeman, “got your front.”

Something was still nagging at Silas. He sensed danger for the woman... in what direction it would come, he was not certain.

Liz’s mouth gaped, her instinct to move a powerful one.

“He’s also wearing body armor.” Silas reminded. “You’re... not.” he snipped quietly. “Let him protect and serve...” he grumbled, turning back on Hunter when Liz settled. “You’re on the payroll so, stand down. I’ve got this covered.”
“What’d you mean...” the man’s surprise was evident, “on the pay–”

“If anyone asks, you’re part of my team,” Silas said, “you’re supposed to be here.”

“They can’t recognize me.” Hunter grasp his neck rubbing the tense muscle. “No one has ever seen my face–”

“And lived to tell the tale.” Silas made mention.

“It still feels hinky. Being among all this,” he waved at the mess before them, “and by the way...” something had been troubling him, “why were we shooting at cops, before?”

“Those were on Lawford’s payroll,” Silas stated, “bad, naughty cops.”

“Not too bright ones, coming to a gunfight where they are out-manned and out-gunned.”

“Didn’t say they were smart cops.” Silas amended.

The silence was a companionable one.

“How long will this take?”

“You got somewhere you gotta be?” Silas asked.

Hunter shrugged, “Got a long drive. Was gonna take my boy out in a couple days.”

“Yeah?” Silas nodded. “His birthday?”

“He’s uh...” the man smiled brightly, “He’s graduating kindergarten.”

“You’ll be there in time to see your boy on his big day.” Silas promised.

Hunter relaxed some, nodding, “What’s with you and the Fed?”

Silas shifted a cold stare.

“It’s just that you haven’t taken your eyes off her ass for... some time now.” Hunter teased.

“I have a question for you.” Silas countered.

“Okay, it’s none of my business–”

“You want to be on the official payroll?”

Hunter’s face showed his shock, “What are you–”

“Think it through before you answer, dumbass.” Silas warned. “Think of the benefits of a stable... gainful employment. No more hiding in the shadows.” the guard paused for breath. “Do it for your family while the opportunity is here.”

“Reddington?” Gaines was astounded.

“A couple condos on the same block come with the deal.” Silas added. “For when the demons plague you.”

Hunter was deeply touched... more than that.
“You can be close to your kids,” Silas faced the man, “there are a couple conditions.”

“Always is.”

“You’re probably gonna have to relocate.” Silas warned.

“Like we haven’t done that before.” Hunter shrugged. They were a military family after all.

“And you have to see a psychiatrist.” Silas said. “One Red uses himself and trusts implicitly.”

Gaines mused, “He thinks I’m a nutcase?”

“He thinks we all are,” Silas smiled, “and he’s right, isn’t he.”

“So you see a shrink?”

“Yeah, but I insisted mine be a female.” Silas told the truth. “Think about it... and don’t let stupid pride sway your reasoning.”

Hunter’s face gave away nothing.

“Hey, he’s only offering you what should have been yours from the beginning.”

Hunter fell silent.

Silas let it go. The guy had some tough decisions to make. He didn’t need any interference or unwanted advice.

He only hoped the man made a wise decision.

~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~/

Red had insisted... just as Liz had predicted, on stopping to check on his men’s condition.

A man in scrubs approached, “Mr. Reddington, we haven’t formally met but Mr. Kaplan has vetted me thoroughly. I’m Bond, Dr. James Bond.”

“Well, of course you are.” Red took the outstretched hand, exchanging enigmatical looks with Dembe.

“I’ve heard it a thousand times so thank you for not saying it.” Bond seemed relieved. “Agent Ressler is stable. He suffered a through and through, right upper shoulder. We have stayed the blood loss which was a major concern as you can surmise.”

Red liked the no-nonsense approach. He was very short on time, after all.

“Mr. Russo,” Bond shook his head, clearly annoyed, “he refused to stay. I advised him to remain under our care. His artery was nicked, but we closed the wound. Though, someone saved his life with an expertly applied tourniquet.”

Red clapped Dembe on the shoulder proudly, “Good man.” he smiled before returning to the problem at hand. “Someone will be on hand shortly to corral David more efficiently.”

“The rest of the men,” the doctor waved about the clear, sterile atmosphere, “well, two I ordered transported to our hospital. Precautionary only I hope, but I wished to perform X-Rays and deeper wound care. Hopefully they will be released shortly. The rest are able to be released momentarily.”
“The cops are here.” Red mentioned.

“Mr. Kaplan established this a legal clinic.” Dr. Bond took offense. “I am also a Board Certified–”

“Just a heads up.” Red calmed, understanding Kaplan had trained the staff in proper... procedure.

“Understood.” Bond ‘calmed’. “We were the nearest facility, after all.” he said, confirming Red’s hypothesis.

Red crossed to David Russo who stood by a window watching the commotion taking place. “I missed all that?”

He looked wounded in more ways than one.

“That’s the beauty of it all, David,” Red glanced out, watching Silas and Hunter shadowing Lizzy. The head guard gestured Joe over, talking to the man, “there will always be... another time.”

“Another place.” Dembe concurred.

Red was carefully examining the man.

“Don’t worry, boss.” David waved the concern away. “It’s just a minor flesh wound.”

“That’s Francis Holbrook’s claim to fame.” Dembe reminded.

“It certainly was not minor,” Dr. Bond took exception, “you should not be standing.” he gave up, sighing heavily, “Do you need these papers concerning wound care?”

“We are all well versed in such matters, Doctor.” Dembe took them politely, however.

“What the hell are you still doing here?” Silas was escorting a new patient into ‘intake’, his expression incredulous.

“What are you?” Red searched frantically for signs of injury.

Silas hooked a thumb, “The dumbass here neglected to tell anyone he’d been tagged.”

“Did you do it?” Dembe managed with a straight face.

“Nah, a cop... a good one!” Hunter laughed gaily, showing his torn shirt. “My favorite shirt too.”

“How can you tell?” Silas grumbled. “Just how many camo shirts do you own?”

“Well, I think this is my favorite.” Hunter hopped up on a table Bond offered.

Red was confused, “Why did a good cop–”

“It was a total accident.” Hunter managed straight-faced as well. “Or at least that’s what the guy said. He was really apologetic. Offered me his untouched Starbuck’s and donut to absolve his guilt.”

Dr. Bond sighed and worried over the new wound, “This one is stuck in there good and proper.”

“It stings a mite.” Hunter nodded as the doctor again cleansed the wound on his side.

“You take the other table.” Red motioned.

“I gotta get back down.” Silas vetoed the suggestion.
“Get on that damned table or I’ll put a bullet in you so you’ll have to stay put for a while.” Red snapped.

“Would that not defeat the purpose.” Dembe wanted to know.

“They can put your ass down for a week or two so they can heal naturally.” Red bitched.

“Or you two can stop stirring shit up for a couple days.” Silas rolled his eyes but begrudgingly sought out the table.

Dembe clamped his mouth shut, hiding his amusement, helping the guard ease the shirt from his body.

Even Red was shocked to see the deep bruises on Silas’ torso.

Shades of deep purple verging on black spread about the man’s side. The discoloration wrapped around, disappearing into the waistband of his black trousers.

“I am so sick of this macho shit!” Dr. Bond wasn’t happy with the color shown either, looking helplessly about his crowded sick ward. “Don’t any of your men know the meaning of the words... common sense?”

Silas and Hunter looked around sheepishly.

Red replaced his hat.

He and Dembe made for the nearest exit.

His men were well looked after. Joe was on Lizzy.

Red and Dembe stealthily made their way through a maze of hallways, stumbling on Moore and Wilson coming in from a side door.

Red pulled up short, his hands lifting at his side in question.

“They clammed up.” Wilson relayed. “Wouldn’t say a word without an attorney but it’s obvious they were on Lawford’s payroll.”

Red shrugged, “Are Samar and Elizabeth--”

“They were finishing off.” Moore clipped the reply. “Filling in the blanks.” he glared at Red.

Red held the man’s cold stare easily, “Since you couldn’t.”

Moore’s angry eyes narrowed further at the slight.

“Where’s Lawford.” Red continued on to more important matters.

“With the local field office.” Wilson frowned.

“Who came up with that moronic idea?” Red glanced at Dembe incredulously, before walking away from the pair without a backward glance, pulling his phone free.

“Francis...” Red snapped into the line, “we have a situation here.”
Red quickly wove a story of three warring sides consisting of Red’s team, Lawford’s team... and the very unwelcome FBI.

During the gunfight, Lawford had been secured by the Fed’s and placed in their custody.

Due to unfinished business with Lawford, Red wanted him back.

Francis had found great amusement in Lawford playing hot potato between the factions but even in the midst of laughing at Red’s ire, had dispatched his men to handle the issue with promises to call back with an update on their progress soon.

Secure that Francis would have Lawford back in their clutches soon, he slipped the phone in his pocket.

He and Dembe made their way across the street mingling into the rapidly growing crowd of curious onlookers.

From this vantage point, they could watch from a safe distance if any new menace reared its ugly head and yet be considered a mere annoyance by all the police that were now converging on the scene.

Red could afford to be patient now.

“Dembe, have the planes readied for take-off, please.” he looked to the future. “This farce shouldn’t take too long and then... we can be on our way, hopefully with no further delays.”

The gentle motion of the jet landing awoke Red from a short nap.

Lizzy’s warm body had lulled him into a light sleep. He glanced down at the top of the shining crown of her hair.

His eyes fell on the man across the aisle. Red’s guilt returned full force.

Silas grimaced, instantly straightening, which brought on another grimace.

Red knew how much pain his friend was in. Silas’ stoic act didn’t fool Red one bit.

The guy was in pain, pure and simple.

Red sat, watching Silas since they boarded. That the guard was sitting quietly, or giving the impression at least, while Samar Navabi was a few seats back... spoke volumes.

Red wished he could offer some constructive assistance.

Lizzy’s head slipped from his shoulder jarring the young woman awake.

“We’re here already?” she stifled a yawn, straightening her legs from their curled position against Red’s thighs.

“So it appears.” Red rubbed the ache from his neck.

The other occupants of the plane were stirring about, readying to disembark.

Red was surprised any of them rested given the flurry they left behind in Chicago.
Red sat up, working the kinks from his back watching Samar fussing over a very drowsy, drug induced Donald Ressler.

It had been rather unexpected when the medical team gave the go-ahead for the injured Agent to fly. Donald, in his lucid moments had insisted on doing so, however. Adamant about finishing the task at hand.

Benton was supposedly safe and secure having been foisted off to the local chapter of Chicago’s FBI.

Red didn’t trust that the game had as yet ended, especially from Lawford’s point-of-view. It appeared Ressler was aware of that fact.

Although protocol dictated Red was to turn Lawford over to the proper chain-of-command within the agencies, true to his word...Red kept possession of the high card in the playing deck for just a while longer.

Until he was certain Lawford called off the vendetta, he would remain within the sphere of Red’s influence for a while longer.

After adjourning to the Chicago airport, while hurrying Lizzy, Aram and Ressler into the safety of the plane... Red awaited word from Francis and the last team in transit.

It amused Red when all the Agents texts started blaring at once.

As did his with a message that simply read... Package en route ;)

There was a nasty rumor that some subversive faction rushed in out of the blue and took possession of the FBI’s prize criminal of the day.

Thanks to Red’s impeccable timing and... Francis Holbrook’s ability to hold a grudge.

Francis put together a small but effective group of elite people whose sole purpose in life became the acquisition of Samuel Lawford from the less than capable hands of those into which Lawford had been entrusted.

Francis said later, after Red was airborne, that it was ridiculously simple to secure the guy.

Not one shot was fired. A precision mix-up in an elevator served its purpose.

A rather dramatic, not to mention entertaining, staged fight between two very passionate lovers ensued... and Lawford was whisked away without even a bat of an eyelash.

It was incredibly easy to gauge human nature at times. Even FBI agents were not immune to a good, rousing argument.

When the smoke cleared, and the supposed lovers made up... Lawford was already in the back of a borrowed delivery van on his way to Antonio’s jet which waited patiently on the tarmac for their departure.

With Francis’ team a short distance off, Silas recommended they depart.

While Red had wanted to stay, assuring that Lawford was truly in his clutches... it would be better to free the runway, should the teams need to make a hasty departure.
Plus, his entourage looked rather... worn thin.

A short time later, Joe called, informing him they were in the air and Lawford was sleeping through the flight and hadn’t given them a minute’s trouble.

A healthy dose of chloroform would do that to a guy.

Everything had worked according to plan.

Red smiled as Dembe and Samar gently eased a loopy Ressler unto his unsteady feet.

“Was I that bad?” Liz’s face showed concern. “When I was in the hospital last year?”

“Let’s just say, I was forced to fight off several unwanted advances.” Red lied fluently. “It was a most embarrassing situation.”

“You are a big fat liar.” Liz dismissed, grasping her purse.

“Hand to God.” Red persisted in playing with the woman.

“God is going to chop off that hand one of these days.” she warned.

As Samar was assisting Ressler, Liz decided to be helpful herself, “Samar,” she called out over the back of the seat, “I’ll get your bag, don’t worry!”

The woman smiled her gratitude, assisting Dembe to guide Ressler out first. Red and Liz stayed out of the aisle allowing them a clear passage.

Silas struggled to his feet, following Samar. Neither had said a word since the exchange at the hotel, Red noted.

Neither looked any happier for the fact.

Red reached, beating Lizzy to Samar’s bag.

“What a gentleman.” Liz was impressed, showing as much.

Red remained stationary, blocking any avenue of egress.

“You’re in my way, fella.” she tried not to be amused at his stance but he was just so damned smug and self-confident, it tickled her.

“Pay the toll, baby,” Red murmured contentedly, “and you can pass.”

It felt so good to be alone with her finally. It had been a long, long day, and it wasn’t over yet.

Liz managed a stricken up and under look, patting her pockets superficially, coming up empty, “I don’t seem to have any cash on me.”

“I don’t take cash.” he tsked for her situation.

“Let me see... what do I have that might be of interest to you?” she inched closer to her antagonist. “What if I should let you make a.. direct deposit later on tonight?” she flicked some imaginary lint off his tie. “Would that suffice, do you think?”

Red’s eyes dropped and remained on her breasts, “Are you offering me a bribe?”
Liz scowled slightly, “I would never do such a thing.” she curled her fingers about the tie, pulling him closer. “It’s... illegal.”

Red cocked his head, intrigued by the turn of events, “Let me get this straight... this deposit of which you eluded I am to give you?”

“Simply an exchange of... liquid assets.” she explained, whispering seductively against the man’s mouth.

Red grunted deeply into the sweet mouth, his tongue flicking hers sensually. The visions conjured erotic and most welcome.

“...Damn.” he whispered, his growing erection lengthening, thickening.

“Do we have a deal?” she asked innocently feeling the evidence of his arousal for she had leaned provocatively to his straining frame.

Red mindlessly dropped Samar’s bag, his fingers curving involuntarily about Lizzy’s rounded derriere. He pushed her into the bulge in his pants, his mouth leisurely plundering the sweet nectar of her lips.

“Signed and sealed.” he growled softly. “I expect this transaction to take place... tonight.”

“Why not now?” she puzzled, pushing his limits. “I know you’re... up for it.”

“Perhaps discretion should be the better part of valor in this instance.” a male voice interrupted the couples playtime.

Red scowled darkly over at an amused Dembe who stood by the exit door, head inside.

He grinned at Raymond’s surly glare, “The other plane is approaching our locale.”

“Then handle the proceedings.” Raymond suggested... strongly.

“I could do that.” Dembe agreed jovially. “But the natives are restless. Silas was already grousing about your absence.”

Raymond was suitably forewarned, “When is that man not bitching?”

“There is nothing he would enjoy more than to interrupt you at a... crucial moment in time, if you get my drift.”

Liz tittered softly, enjoying Red’s reaction just as much as Dembe.

“I am very discrete.” Dembe spread his hand helplessly. “Can you sat the same of your head guard when he’s in a salty mood?”

Red glanced at Lizzy who was trying ever so hard to keep her pretty features straight.

He lifted a cool brow her way for the fact.

Which only caused the woman to giggle infectiously.

Red sighed heavily, knowing a lost cause when he saw one. A state which was a common occurrence for him these days...
Well, at least he would have this evening with which to console himself.

He waved Dembe away with a disgruntled gesture, “I’m coming...I’m coming.” he nodded his defeat.

“You will be...” Liz blinked nonchalantly, “later. I promise, honey.”

Dembe had not heard the actual exchange but he was man enough to sense the jest of the words the woman whispered for Raymond’s ears alone.

“I will,” Red adjusted his erection accordingly, his mind set, “extract the proper compensation for this, Elizabeth... you understand.” his eyes promised as much.

“God, I hope so.” she smiled happily.

Red’s stare dropped to that voluptuous ass as it swished hypnotically away, his cock jerking in his pants.

He glanced down at the throbbing appendage, “Our time is coming, my friend,” he eased his pain this way and that. “Later... you’ll be inside her tight little hole and you can stay as long as you wish.”

He took a moment to regroup then headed down the steps of the plane.

“What’s the plan?” Liz waited patiently on the tarmac for his arrival.

“I don’t know about you,” Red tossed Samar’s bag into Dembe’s capable hands, “but I’ve had enough circulated plane air for one day.” he looked down into the dark blue orbs.

She sighed, “That sounds good. We take a rest stop?”

“Ressler is a factor.” Red searched for another excuse, one his pride could accept. “He should have at least eight hours of uninterrupted rest.”

The real reason was, Red wanted at least eight hours of sack time with the woman standing next to him.

Resting or not.

“Speaking of which?” he didn’t see Donald anywhere

“He’s out again,” Samar approached, gesturing to a nearby vehicle, “I don’t think he fully roused. Those drugs your guys gave him... where can I get some?”

“I hate the sensation,” Red differed in his point of view, “not being in control of my faculties.” he constantly fought against it in the past, at least until he was in a secure location.

It meant a great deal to him that Ressler... didn’t.

Even if they were on the opposite sides of the law and were antagonists more often than not... Ressler apparently trusted him and his team enough to submit to the haze of the drugs, they had given him.

“Well, you would hate giving up control.” Samar stated. “You’re a major control freak.”

Red chuckled, “That was an awfully polite way of saying, anal retentive.”
“That is an apt description, if I ever heard one.” Silas ventured forth, his large frame swaggering with something verging on arrogance.

Samar’s eyes met the man’s for a brief moment, dropping in the next.

Liz frowned, “I thought the doctor said Ress’ head—”

“It’s better to err on the side of caution, yes?” Red was ever practical.

“I can stay with him.” Aram offered. “Share a room...”

Red smiled, inclining his head, “There’s the team spirit.” he dropped a beefy hand to the computer specialists, before glancing about.

Samar lifted her head glancing down the way, “Is that the jet we’re waiting for?”

The large jet eased into its landing with nothing more than a slight hop across the field, gliding smoothly into position very close to Red’s own jet.

The sound of several vehicles rumbling unto the stretch of road caught everyone’s attention before the convoy lined the outbuildings of the airport.

Liz tensed, her hand instinctively reaching for her weapon.

“That’s a pretty impressive entrance.” Samar scowled as the vehicle numbers mounted.

“Subterfuge.” Red nodded sagely.

“Subterfuge?” Liz was stymied.

“Lawford’s men here,” Red explained, “will surely be present and accounted for.”

“With so many vehicles to follow,” Silas knew how Francis thought, which was a scary thing in itself, “they will have a hell of a time trailing or detecting the correct car.”

Samar shook her head at the antics displayed.

Silas was suddenly too close, she noted the fact, turning her eyes to seek his quiet gaze.

She cleared her throat gently, moving artfully away.

“Kind of like that sound.” Silas made mention.

Samar sought him out, her expression almost hurt, “Make up your mind.” she suggested smartly. “I don’t like indecision.”

“That makes two of us.” Silas arched his brow meaningfully.

Red glanced between the two curious to see how this round would play out. Silas obviously took time to think on the plane ride about revisiting the topic, seeing if anything had changed.

Samar narrowed her eyes dangerously then looked down at her feet sheepishly when the man looked pointedly at the computer specialist speaking with Liz.
“Like looking in a mirror,” Silas crooked his head slightly, “isn’t it.”

Red sighed, his head shaking imperceptibly. These two were going to be impossible.

“Silas,” Red got the man’s attention, “would you be so good as to escort Lawford to the designated vehicle.”

Silas watched a few of his men disembark, followed by Moore and Wilson, “If Moore gives me lip, I swear to God,” the chipped grey eyes were icy, “I’m gonna take him out. Fair warning.”

Liz’s mouth fell agape for the coldness of the tone. She truly thought Silas meant his threat this time.

“I’ve had it up to here!” Silas’ hand chopped crisply to his forehead.

“He thinks Cooper has ordered Lawford to the New York office.”

“Hasn’t he?” Samar was wary.

“In a manner of speaking.” Red continued with a reassuring smile for the woman.

“Moore is one whining mother fuc–”

“We are well aware of your views.” Red silenced the guard. “But I want a clear transition this time. I trust you to accomplish the fact.”

Silas fumed in silence.

“Agent Navabi,” Red took the woman’s hand, “I’m going to ask for your trust a while longer.” he gave his full attention, the dark eyes watched him closely. “We need Lawford for a very brief time then he will be turned over to your capable hands.”

Samar glanced at Elizabeth the back to the man, “I’m rather hungry, truth told.” she made her decision. “It would be nice to grab a bite to eat before returning to duty.”

Red smiled his pleasure, “Thank you.” he glanced over his shoulder. “Silas, after Lawford is secure, escort the lovely agent here to one of the better New York eateries.”

Liz noted Silas’ body stiffened rigidly, his expression masking hostility.

“I-I have been here alone many times,” Samar saved Silas the awkwardness suggested, “there is no need–”

“There is a great need.” Red contradicted, still holding the woman’s hand. “You are a most capable agent, don’t get me wrong but I could not, in all good conscience... chance that Lawford’s people might try to get an exchange of prisoner through you.”

Samar’s eyes flitted to the guard.

Silas snapped off a command to one of his nearby ‘agents’, “You’re with me, O’Neill. Secure the package then... you’ll be on me and Agent Navabi here for the remainder.”

“Remainder of what, boss?” Justin enjoyed Silas’ moods just like the rest of his constituents, taking every opportunity to needle the guy when possible.

“Did your mama drop you on your head as a child?” Silas groused, his temper flaring.
The man chuckled, “The FBI jerk is under the impression he will be escorting the package to a yet undisclosed destination, boss.”

“The FBI fuckwit is sadly mistaken isn’t he.” Silas replied.

“I guess he is.” the guy proceeded Silas to the plane, holding his amusement... just. “Should I take the lady with me?”

Silas’ mood was no better for the fact, “You do that.” he turned to Samar. “If you will accompany Justin here, I’ll join you momentarily.”

Samar was clearly of two minds for a second but in the end... she went peacefully.

When both were out of earshot, Silas turned on Red, “That was a dirty, fucking, rotten thing to do and you know it.”

“Make sure Navabi’s accommodations are secured for the night.” Red managed to hold his own mirth as well as Justin had, sensing Silas’ reluctance to be alone with the lovely agent. “She is in the same hotel as we are, of course.” he poked. “Perhaps you could show the woman safely to her room?”

“Kiss my ass.” Silas grumbled emphatically before spinning sharply on his heel, stomping off in the needed direction.

Red chuckled a low gravelly laugh.

“Red!” Elizabeth fretted. “Silas is in a horrible mood. I hate when he is!” she hit Red’s arm. “It’s not funny!”

“It is actually.” Red’s amusement grew, but he tampered it for the woman’s sake. “Don’t baby him. There isn’t anything really wrong.” he assured. “Silas is just... tense.”

“About what?” she demanded. “Can’t you fix it?”

“I’m trying, baby.” he spread his hands. “Hand to God.”

“Stop saying that.” Liz looked at her friend helplessly. “...Maybe Samar will get him out of his bad mood?” she wistfully hoped.

“Yeah,” Red nodded sagely, “maybe she will.”

“I know I should be used to all this...” Elizabeth Keen shook her head, sighing lightly.

She looked over the city below, shielding her eyes from the sun’s rays which had already started their descent towards dusk.

She glanced about the luxurious surroundings behind her, the elegant rooms chocked full of charm and decadence.

Walking the wall of windows afforded the high-rise hotel room, she closed her eyes enjoying the warmth of the sun’s rays as they sliced along her body.

Liz rolled the tension from her shoulders, her eyes opening absently. A pall fell over the city below.
Twinkling street lights replaced the sunlight shimmering off the Hudson as the sun dipped further towards the horizon.

The city looked almost fit for a fairytale as surrounding buildings took on an orange glow, leaving them gold in appearance. The hazy skyline heavy with exhaust was shades of pinks, purples and deep blues.

It had quite a dreamlike feel to it.

She tracked a ferry shuttling tired passengers back from the last tour of the Statue of Liberty.

A Port Authority boat traveled in the opposite direction, cutting sharply over the water.

An ambulance below in the crowded streets caught her wandering attention. Its red and blue strobe lights flashed along glass storefronts like a Rave gone askew.

On their trip through the New York streets, a cacophony of grating sounds had inundated her senses. Horns honking, cop sirens blaring, brakes screeching, wheels squealing and the low, constant hum of a million plus voices gave the city its unique sound.

Up here, so high above the chaos, it seemed surreal to look down on the bustling, hectic pace below and hear... nothing but blessed silence.

A most welcome sound, were she honest with herself.

It had been a long, tedious day.

One filled with a plethora of emotion.

Disappointment, joy, love, fear, relief, worry... she had experienced it all this day.

Red had thankfully been at her side for the most part seeing she came through it all with a measure of sanity.

When their eyes met after that first fire-fight, she had felt his concern. That his thoughts had been with her even as her own had... the man.

His eyes said so much more than he could with others about.

His touch had been so gentle, so loving on her back, his fingers touching hers reverently.

She felt communication even though none could be properly expressed.

She smiled gently, smelling the warm aroma of his cologne near her before she heard him approach. Her eyes focused on the hazy apparition of the man’s reflection nearing in the window.

She welcomed his arms as they encompassed her slender frame from behind, her fingers covering the hair strewn tops of his hands lovingly.

“Am I interrupting?” he murmured against the shell of her ear.

She clasped his thumb in her hand, scowling from such a question, “Interrupting?”

“Your solitude.” he clarified quietly, unwilling to break the tranquility she established. “The quiet.”
She relaxed in his embrace, “It only makes it better... to share it with you.”

Red nuzzled the woman’s neck, kissing the fragrant flesh. He sighed lightly, “…I have to go attend to Lawford, speak to Francis’ people concerning a few ends which need tying up.”

She remained silent for a long beat, a question finally coming to mind, “Red, does Francis know anything about your involvement with us? The FBI?”

“No.” Red stated. “It must remain that way for the foreseeable future.”

“I don’t like lying to him.” she confessed, idly playing with his fingers.

“I know you don’t.” he nodded minutely.

“He’s my friend.” she lifted sorrowful eyes, craning her neck to meet his gentle ones. “By not being up-front with him... honest, I feel like I’m deceiving him.”

“There was a time,” he mused, “when you would have turned him over to the law.”

“At one point,” she turned in his arms, “but now, it’s different.”

“He has become your best friend.” Red was pleased. “You love him, Lizzy.”

“Not like I love you.” she urged quickly, “Not like that at–”

“I know that... now.” he soothed.

“I know it’s wrong, that I shouldn’t let my feelings cloud my judgement...” she worked it out in her own mind.

“Is it wrong to be human?” Red debated. “I’m proud and happy you feel what you feel, Elizabeth.”

She settled a little. She liked being close to the man, liked having the freedom to touch him whenever... wherever, she pleased.

She trailed her fingers along the collar of his shirt, a small frown on her full lips.

“He loves you too, you know.” Red made mention. “You may think that is the norm but I assure you, for Francis... it’s not.”

She lifted puzzled eyes.

“He doesn’t give his trust easily, which is an understatement in itself.” Red realized. “But to lower his walls the way he has with you? Unheard of.”

“He falls in love with every woman he meets.” she rolled her eyes.

“Superficially.” Red smiled down at the woman. “Except Lia, of course. She is the love of his life.”

Liz tittered softly under her breath, “And Nora.”

Red stroked his thumbs soothingly on the small of her back, smiling gently, “We’re not talking about that kind of love anyway, are we.”

She dropped her eyes, fiddling with his shirt-front, “No, I suppose not.”

“I should be concerned, perhaps.” he kept a straight face. “His bad habits seem to be rubbing off on “W-What?” such a statement totally confused her.

“You think nothing of stealing people’s belongings for instance.” he teased.

“Does Francis steal people’s belongings? What do you mean?” she demanded indignantly.

“You steal my bacon, robe, socks, shirts...” he held his laughter.

“Oh, brother.” she turned aside, having the grace to be embarrassed. “You said...” she challenged, “what’s yours is mine. You said it repeatedly!”

“I knew that would come back to haunt me.” his mouth pulled into a grin.

The woman settled a tad, moving back into his sphere. She lifted a coy stare, “You know,” her mood altered considerably. Liz looked the man over speculatively, “that can go both ways.”

“Is that so.” Red’s eyes dared mischievously.

He enjoyed that look and playing the game lovers played. He couldn’t help do so with this woman. He was also fascinated how many times a day the woman could make his cock stir.

“For my part,” she admitted, wriggling further into his ready embrace, “there must be something I have which interests you, surely.”

He lowered his gaze to the delectable décolletage. He grunted appreciatively when her mound pushed seductively into his thigh.

“Yes,” he nodded, his tone a husky reply, “you have exactly what I want.”

Red’s hand cupped her cheek, his thumb stroking the soft skin delicately, “I want it... very much.”

Liz’s heart beat increased, the blood in her veins thrumming with passion, “…Which is?” she subtly flirted.

Red kissed her temple, his mouth moving enticingly across the sensually closed lids, Lizzy’s eyelashes tickled his lips.

He slowly, meticulously, worked his way to the rosebud mouth.

“Your love.” he whispered hoarsely, his mouth claiming hers passionately.

At the completion of the ardent caress, Liz’s eyes fluttered open, her breath stuttering, reading the quiet intenseness in him.

“You already have that.” she choked back the emotion his statement caused. “In abundance.”

“And you, mine.” he countered. “I hope you never tire of hearing the mundane because I intend to express my emotions... frequently.”

“You do that.” she lifted to her toes, her mouth parting his gently. The kiss deepened systematically, both participants losing themselves in the steamy depths.

The arrival of another person entering the room shattered the moment.
Red broke the kiss, his temper high, “For God’s sake, Dembe... I thought we had already settled this issue earlier.”

Dembe’s smile said he took no offense.

“Just once,” Red was beside himself, “could you just... having seen the obvious,” the man gestured wildly, “gone...away?”

“You asked me to remind you of important dates and times,” Dembe spread expressive hands, “and then berate me when I do as asked. I am understandably distressed.”

“You don’t look particularly distressed.” Red reminded, crossing to his ever present fedora, his movements choppy and... distressed.

“I have learned to conceal my true emotional state.”

Liz sensed Dembe was enjoying the exchange a little more than he should, amused for the fact.

She dutifully tried to commiserate with Red’s mood, but the twinkle in her eye gave her secret away.

“Learn to conceal a six-inch barrel cause that’s what I’m gonna stick up your ass next time you intrude on me and my woman when we are...” Red stopped for a breath, “sharing a private moment.”

“Which reminds me,” Dembe’s memory was suitably jogged, “you must call Brimley to meet us at the warehouse.”

Red hung his head dejectedly, all the fight gone from him.

Liz kissed his cheek consolingly, “Have a good day at the office, honey.” she smiled brightly for him.

Red offered her a disgruntled grunt, taking his leave, if reluctantly, “You’re as bad as he is.”

Liz stood, waving warmly as the two men exited.

Dembe shared a communal smile as he gently shut the door.

Red returned post-haste, sticking his head in the door.

Liz was startled, “Did you forget something?”

“Do you have a little black dress?”

Liz blinked, disoriented, “…Always.”

“Squeeze that sweet little ass into it. I would love to take you to dinner tonight.” Red mentioned. “In about an hour?”

Liz was elated, “Oh! Oh, yes... yes, I would love that.” She had thought she only rate room-service tonight.

“Dembe won’t be coming along.” Red threw a caustic look outside the door he held securely half-closed.

Liz dimpled accordingly.
“You are hurting my feelings, Raymond.” Dembe’s staid and muffled voice filtered in from the hallway, increasing Liz’s smile... and Red’s ire.

“Do you mind...” Red groused, “I’m trying to make a date here.”

Liz’s heart skipped a beat, enjoying the moment more than she had been.
She loved the open, playful, relationship Red and Dembe had, always did. She even envied it. Now, she felt a part of it. Like she was a welcome addition to their special bond.

It meant more to her than she could say.

She also appreciated that Red constantly made an effort. Once in a relationship, date nights often tapered off. But Red continued to woo her.

And she liked that. It made her feel... special.

“My apologies...” Dembe inclined his head graciously, “I will be your wingman.” he assured Red.

“Please tell him yes, so we may go.”

“That’s it?” Red had to question that one. “That’s the extent?”

Liz dropped her eyes to the rich carpet, her lips quivering with amusement. She quickly straightened her features, lifting luminous eyes, “I would love to go on a date with you.”

Red’s eyes softened, a smile lighting his face. He rather enjoyed hearing her say those words, even now.

“This will be just for us, okay?” his eyes roamed her body possessively. “A special night.”

“Are we celebrating something?” she raked her memory for a date, coming up empty. She wasn’t positive she even knew what day it was, to be honest.

Red’s eyes held hers confidently, “You tell me.”

“Where are we going?” she stopped his intended exit.

“Brooklyn, René’s.” he replied before closing the door on a very perplexed, very intrigued... Elizabeth Keen.

“You know, my friend,” Red was still chafing from Dembe’s actions, “paybacks are a bitch.”

“They are oft time... a bitch.” Dembe nodded absently, steering the vehicle about mounting New York traffic.

“Is Ressler happy and content?” Red moved on finally.

“He is coming around.” Dembe reported. “He had eaten finally and is more alert. He is refusing any further pain medication.”

“His call.” Red understood.

“I was pleasantly surprised by the efficiency of Brimley.” Dembe seemed in a relatively good humor. “It took less than half an hour for Lawford to break.”
“Brimley is...” Red shrugged, “Brimley.”

“Thank you for allowing Josef to assist him this time.”

Red’s mouth quirked, “Joe enjoyed it more than he should.”

“What surprised me was Hunter Gaines’ involvement.” Dembe brought up the fact.

“A multi-faceted man.” Red’s brows rose as well. “Perhaps it was a simple reprieve from the tediousness of the routines they have established.”

“Brimley’s antics are their version of cat videos.” Dembe had decided.

“Excuse me?” Red was all too afraid he had followed the statement, however.

Dembe let it pass, “It has been a rather eventful day considering.”

That was an understatement if ever there was one.

“Lawford can be turned over to the lovely Agent Navabi. Francis will be pleased when he hears Lawford is in FBI custody.”

Dembe’s head turned for a beat, meeting Red’s eyes, “More importantly, Elizabeth is safe.”

“For how long?” Red sighed heavily.

“This too, will end, Raymond.” Dembe consoled. “Have faith that everything will fall into place as it usually does.”

Red refused to ruin the night he had planned with morbid thoughts.

“Take a right up ahead, three blocks.” he ventured, motioning with his hand in the direction needed.

“Did you not tell Elizabeth you would inform her when you were finished with your business dealings?” Dembe reminded dutifully.

“Well, I’m not finished yet.” Red crooked a wry smile.

“You lied,” Dembe’s tone held his disapproval, “to Elizabeth.”

“A gentleman can relate a small falsehood,” Red defended himself, “if a surprise for his lady is involved.”

Dembe turned the needed direction.

Secure that his co-conspirator was on board, Red focused on his plan of action.

“I will not wear that hideous thing!” Liz argued heatedly, staring at the cumbersome boot she had discarded while adding finishing touches to her make-up and hair. “It ruins the look of my beautiful dress.”

Red’s stare remained direct and fixed however...his mind set.

Having lost the battle put her in a rather dour mood but the excitement of the evening soon moved that mood into a light, expectant one.
As they crossed the bridge heading into Brooklyn, she took in the surrounding city.

It seemed to be a living, breathing entity all to itself.

Having access to some of the best five-star restaurants in the world only minutes away from their hotel, Red had instead chosen the off-beaten track for which he was famous.

Liz began to appreciate his choice.

The private sitting room offered by the establishment he picked charmed her.

Soft candlelight set the mood in the quaint, intimate atmosphere surrounding them.

Sequestered away from the noise and bustle of the main dining area, private staff attended them.

The dinner was superb, the wine Red selected, perfection.

As usual, the man fell into a jovial mood, telling tales which amused and oft-times mystified.

He had led such a diverse, interesting life.

After dinner, they swayed in each other’s arms to the melodic music which drifted in from a live orchestra in the main atrium of the building.

It was a lovely setting... even if she was forced to compensate for her recent injury by the stupid, hideous contraption on her foot.

Red had even switched the ringer off on his phone.

No talk of work reared its ugly head. No discussion about the odd, eclectic day they had suffered through... she adored the fact.

As they were finishing the last of their dessert, Liz was surprised to look up to see a pretty blonde heading their way.

“Red!” the smile beamed up a notch or two, lighting the room. “It’s so wonderful to see you!”

That the man held a great affinity for the new arrival, was apparent.

He had arisen, taking the small hands in his. A soft kiss planted on presented cheeks.

“René...” he rumbled his pleasure, offering the polite introductions immediately.

Liz smiled back, nodding her, hello.

“Let me look at her!” Red’s grin widened as he perused the well-rounded tummy which extended between their bodies. “Goodness! How precious is this!”

He appraised the baby bump with keen eyes.

Liz gasped softly as his large hands encompassed the sphere.

She knew most women disliked such familiarity during their pregnancy.

This woman seemed to love the attention, taking great delight in the man’s joyous attitude, “My husband and Red knew the baby was a her before I did.”
Liz was graciously included in the moment.

“And don’t think either has let me forget it!” René scolded Red with a look. “Oh!”

“Whoa!” Red smiled broadly, his face lit with amazement. “She’s gonna be a goal-kicker!”

A small foot pushed jerkily against the pressure of his palm.

He reached quickly, placing Lizzy’s hand beside his.

Elizabeth offered an apologetic grimace but the woman merely laughed quietly for Red’s awed expression.

The baby rolled away from the intrusive prodding, settling deep into a new, more comfortable position.

“I knew the minute I felt that little munchkin kick, it had to be a girl.” Red proudly proclaimed. “Only a girl has such a swift, punctuated kick.”

“Speaking from experience?” René teased.

“I’m no dummy.” Red pleaded off. “I’ve never given a woman just cause to kick me... there.”

“One or two has stabbed him.” Liz murmured, primly folding her napkin in her lap. She sought his amused eyes. “But not there... yet.”

Red beamed proudly, “Lizzy isn’t one to let an open shot pass by if she can help it.”

“Stick ‘em where it hurts,” Liz winked playfully, “that’s my motto.”

Red chuckled, pulling out a chair, gesturing for René to sit.

“I didn’t mean to intrude,” she begged off, “just wanted to say–”

“No, please.” Liz insisted. “You should get off your feet whenever possible.”

René eased awkwardly into the chair with Red’s assistance.

“How are you feeling?” Liz asked a generic question.

“Like a Sherman tank.” René cast Red a rueful glance. “But otherwise, I feel great.” she rubbed her hand along the slope of her stomach.

“All women are exquisite when with child.” Red stated his belief. “They emit an inner glow that no artist has been able to capture as yet.”

Both females gawked at him, expressions carefully neutral.

“Must be the gas.” René quipped. “This kid has given me the worst heartburn known to man.”

Liz chuckled.
“You’re following doctor’s orders?” Red asked warily. “I know how stubborn you can be.”

“Me!” the woman took umbrage. “Oh, don’t even get me started.” she cast a sympathetic look. “Am I right?”

Liz opened her mouth to agree but was rudely silenced.

“As you may have guessed, this unique establishment belongs to René.” Red waved a hand about the romantic atmosphere, continuing on, praising the woman’s accolades as a chef. “But when she gets something in that thick head...”

“Pot calling the kettle black.” René rolled her eyes.

Liz was beginning to like this woman.

“She was trying to continue to run this place, on her feet, twelve hours a day.”

Liz’s brows furrowed empathetically.

“So Mr. Big Shot here,” René hooked a thumb, “goes and hires three of the top chefs out of Culinary Institute for me.” tears misted the lovely eyes.

“Excuse me... damned hormones.” she sniffled, taking the handkerchief Red offered. “Anyway, they’re working out marvelously but I had to break them of old habits. They were brainwashed to do things the wrong way.”

“Meaning, not her way.” Red interrupted.

“The wrong way.” René snapped. “But now, everything is running like clockwork again.”

“So you met here... at the restaurant?” Liz was curious.

“René saved my life.” Red looked at the woman fondly.

“By feeding you properly?” Liz was puzzled. Red could be over dramatic when it came to food, she thought fondly.

“Before this, I was a nurse.” both Red and René shared a laugh.

“Someone had to keep your snarky ass in line.” René crossed her arms, resting them on her bump. “He’s a pain in the ass when he’s sick, let me warn you.”

René side-glanced the man with a look that would cower most stout-hearted men.

Liz nodded, side-glancing the man as well.

“That’s the look I’ve been working for.” the man chuckled happily. “Still puts me in my place.”

“I highly doubt that.” René was not impressed.

“René was with me in the early days.” Red confided. “Right after I met with Mr. Kaplan.”

“Speaking of drill instructors...” René sought out the man, clearly interested. “How is the old bulldog?”
Liz’s eyes widened. She had never heard anyone speak of Mr. Kaplan in such a way except Silas but... that was Silas.

“She bites on occasion as well.” Liz stated ruefully, joining in.

“Yeah, that’s Kaplan.” René nodded benignly.

“She’s still trying to fill the gaping hole you left behind.” Red informed his friend.

“Is she still harping on that?” René was appalled. “Seriously?”

“You know she can hold a grudge.” the man reminded.

“It was your fault, anyway.” René took umbrage.

“Oh, now I am interested.” Liz sat up closer, ready to hear the tale.

“Oh, you can’t want him to rehash ancient history.” René was positive.

“Oh, yes, I do.” Liz was crestfallen.

“She’s nosy.” Red explained.

Liz’s mouth fell open.

“Yes, that’s the way to win her heart.” René chided. “Men? Right?”

Liz cut the man a stern look, silencing him.

“Well...” the woman began the story herself, clearly warming to the incidents as she reminisced, “we were stuck on the outskirts of... Nowhereville, right?”

Again, she hooked a thumb, “He was wounded, recuperating. As usual.”

Liz checked with Red. His expressing was amused but quiet.

“We had the bare essentials on hand, that’s about it.” René put her hand on her side, pushing her back for support.

“Our circumstances were pretty desolate, truth told.” she continued. “So much so, Silas and Dembe... you’ve met them, right?”

Liz nodded quickly, already enraptured by the story.

“They took to hunting local game for our survival.”

“Squirrel meat is not that much a step-up from the MRE’s we had.” Red frowned. “We couldn’t use our weapons... it would alert the enemy to our position. I thought we were screwed.”

“And he had no compulsion stating his lack of faith in the boys tracking abilities.” René chuckled.

“Silas goes all Rambo on us... fashions a bow and some arrows.” René’s eyes were alight with humor. “Lo-and-behold, Dembe fells a deer.”

Liz clasped her hands together in delight. Then her face fell, “But Dembe loves all animals.” she knew for certain.

“Yeah well, circumstances what they were,” Red philosophized, “Peter Cottontail didn’t stand a chance.”

The story enraptured Liz, she listened intently as the lurid tale progressed.

“What I did not know,” Red quipped, “was that, while Blondie over here was a trained survivalist, a given fact, she also knew her way around an herb garden.”

“Mama taught me all she knew.” René giggled.

“While I lay there, in a blissful haze of drugs,” Red mused, “the boys were out on the proverbial hunt and she,” the man shook his head, still impressed at the woman’s skill after all these years, “was out doing her own thing, gathering bounty off the land.”

“Roman soldiers were once paid in salt, did you know.” René recalled a bit of trivia. “That’s how important seasoning was... and is.”

“That’s gospel.” Red agreed wholeheartedly.

“If I had to eat one more vegetarian omelet...” René cringed visibly, “I was going to kill you, myself.”

“Put us both out of our misery,” Red nodded his agreement, “so I would have gladly allowed it.” he sat back, folding his arms. “The chili mac wasn’t bad though.”

René shrugged, nodding grudgingly.

Liz chuckled for the dramatics displayed, “Since that eventuality did not come about, how does the story actually end?”

“Imagine my delight, awakening at last, to the mouth-watering aroma of...” he waved his hand about the remains of their scrumptious meal, “well, this.”

René waved the lavish praise aside, “It was just a few simple meat and veggie meals.”

“That’s like saying Michelangelo was just a house painter.”

René flushed with pleasure, “It’s that Irish blarney that hooked me in.” she sighed.

“That last two weeks spent in hell were filled with the most amazing... and still to this day,” Red looked at the other woman fondly, “unmatched venison and rabbit feasts I ever had the privilege.”

“He swept me away,” René was resigned, “not for my medical expertise mind you, but his bottomless pit of a stomach.”

“How long were you with him?” Elizabeth wasn’t certain if she felt a twinge of jealousy or not.

“Too long.” René stated emphatically. “Thank God I met my future husband. He got me away from the spell this one can weave.”

Elizabeth understood all about spells Red Reddington could weave.

Though, unlike René, she had no wish to leave.
“I wanted to settle down. Stay in one place for a while.” René recalled fondly.

“And what does your husband do for a living?” Red could see the irony, amused for it. “He’s military, through and–”

“Retired... military.” René corrected.

“I’m stuck in the Indies, shortly thereafter,” Red threw the chef a look, “eating slop and I just knew she and her new boyfriend were off having braised ribs and succulent–”

“Damned right.” Red feigned anger, making both women laugh at his expense. “I’ll never forgive you deserting me.”

“You already have,” the woman’s eyes were gentle on the man.

“Why does Mr. Kaplan blame Red for your having left?” Liz was pondering the issue.

“I concocted a brilliant plan to win her back.” Red was proud of the fact, clearly. “I offered her boyfriend–”

“My husband.”

“A lucrative spot on my ever-growing band of merry men.”

“A very lucrative spot.” René scolded, recalling the time well. “Damn you. My charms almost weren’t incentive enough.”

“...So?” Liz was on tenterhooks.

“My husband caved... not him.” René’s eyes sparkled mischievously. “I had something even Red couldn’t compete with.”

Red shrugged his shoulders, “I took a shot, anyway. You had put in your time.” he gave credit. “She wanted... deserved... this.” he waved a hand about the restaurant, before settling his hand on the swell of her stomach. “Who am I to argue.”

“You always argue.” René was flabbergasted by the statement.

Liz envied the woman to a degree.

While she appreciated the urge to live a normal life and Liz’s ambitions ran a different gauntlet, it wasn’t the same anymore.

Red had become part of Elizabeth’s vision of the future.

With Red came certain realities.

The idea of a normal life had become subdued. As busy as their day had been, she found enjoyment in the chaotic, frenzied pace.

Granted, Liz could have done without the firefight... but the rest of the day had been rather exciting.

She watched Red, sharing memories with his friend. Liz couldn’t imagine the man even sitting still for very long a time, not really.
She was shocked to realize, she was just fine with the notion.

An air of intrigue surrounded the man next to her. Something mysterious seemed to lurk just in the background, waiting to emerge when he was about.

Life with Red Reddington would never, ever be... boring or dull.

“When is that little pumpkin seed going to sprout?” Red’s eyes had returned to the rounded orb of René stomach countless time, Liz noted. As if staring long enough would make the baby emerge.

“A month and some change.” René eased her back yet again. “If it’s anything like my husband, she will be fashionably late, of course.”

“It must be hard... the waiting.” Liz commiserated.

“I expect a gift.” René perked up. “I open them immediately,” she confided in Liz. “At least I don’t have to wait for that.”

“What do you need?” Red had perked up as well. “A new house? A car?”

“How about a baby swing?” René was appalled. “Don’t you ever do anything halfway?”

“What the hell kind of gift is that?” Red was more than disappointed. “A fucking baby swin–”

“A practical one?” Liz asked, sighing her delight.

Red rolled his eyes, a little put out.

“...Oh my God.” René was aghast. “You didn’t.”

The man glanced about the room rather sheepishly.

“You...did...not.” René tried to stand, knocking away Red’s assistance.

Red sighed, holding his hands aloft, waiting.

René grumbled irritably, clutching the man’s forearms, helping her ease to a standing position.

“What?” Liz arose as well, sensing something in the wind.

“I bought all that practical stuff.” Red grimaced the thought aside. “But it wouldn’t fit in the house you had.”

René stared at the guy, amazement filling her eyes, “So... you bought another house?”

“Your family is growing.” Red defended his actions. “You need a bigger house.”

Liz’s mouth fell agape, “Red, you didn’t.”

“Sure he did.” René’s eyes lit with an inner glow. “That’s exactly what he did.” she threw her arms about Red’s neckline, hugging him dearly. “You crazy bastard.” she whispered lovingly. “What am I gonna do with you!”

“Name the baby after me.” Red was happy again.

“Not gonna happen.” René eyes filled with tears of joy, however, Liz noted.
“I can’t let you do this... it’s beyond generous.”

“That’s what you said last time.” Red feigned confusion.

“I was in shock last time.” René chuckled. “What person in his right mind just ups and gives an entire house for a wedding present?”

Liz knew the answer to that one.

“You’ll love it... good neighborhood, amazing schools.” Red’s excitement was returning by leaps and bounds.

“You can’t do these things.” René’s tone was a gentle reprimand. “We consider you our friend, Red. What kind of people would we be—”

“The kind that is having a baby and needs a new, bigger house.” Red supplied. “You’re my friends as well, stop all this nonsense. It’s something I delight in doing.”

“He really does.” Liz helped out. She sensed how important the issue was to the man.

After all, Red was not the type of person to call just anyone... his friend.

René was shaking her head, “Our house is perfectly fine, really.”

“And will bring a good value on the market... to set up the minion for college.”

“He already has her in college.” René threw up her hands, exasperated.

“Or you could use it as a rental property.” Red had thought it through.

“Red...” Liz tried a logical approach, “I don’t know... René’s husband, but maybe,” she wrinkled her nose, “he would resent the gesture?”

“Why would he?” Red was confused.

“Well, some men might. Is that the case, René?”

“It has a two-car garage, and a work shed... what’s to resent?”

“God, don’t tell Charles that!” René hastily advised. If her husband found out... he’d be hooked.

“See?” Red spread his hands.

“That is not the issue.” René sighed heavily.

“Then what is the issue?” Red wanted to know. “A guy can’t give his best friends a house or... a few cars?”

“W-What do you mean... cars?” Both René and Liz whipped their heads about, seeking out the man.

“Well,” Red hesitated but only briefly, “I bought you an SUV. Francis said,” he threw the young man under the bus, “Charles would feel left out if he didn’t get a Jeep or something cool to drive too...”

René sat, the wind taken from her sails.

“That SUV has the best safety record out there.” Red sweetened the pot. “It also comes with a top-rated car seat for the podlet.”

René sought assistance but Liz only shrugged non-committed shoulders, “That has to be considered, right?”

René spread her hands helplessly.

“René,” Red used his paternal voice, “how many times did you risk life and limb for me? Coming into all those less than savory places at a minute’s notice, putting your life on hold?”

“You paid me to do that–”

“Don’t give me that shit.” Red disdained. “You can’t pay for that type of loyalty.”

René flushed prettily, “Oh, you are so full of s–”

“I love you, Dembe loves you, hell even Silas loves you.” Red said. “Lizzy loves you.” he topped the last statement, motioning to the woman.

“She doesn’t even know me.” René laughed, her eyes misting.

“No, he’s right.” Liz jumped on the bandwagon. “If it wasn’t for you... Red may not be here. And I...” she trailed away, swallowing at the lump in her throat.

Red’s eyes softened, squeezing Lizzy’s hand, “See... the only one I’m not sure of is your boyfriend.” he quipped to make René feel better.

“He’s my husband.” the woman wailed helplessly. “Husband!” she showed her ring.

“Why don’t you come back to work for me?” Red teased. “Where you know for certain you are loved and cherished.”

Liz rolled her eyes, “Now I know where Francis gets it from.” she muttered.

René sat back, mentally exhausted, “You wear me out.”

“As long as I’m wearing you down.” Red quietened. “Are you all right? Do you need to go rest? Put your feet up?”

René wasn’t tired in the least, she was elated beyond scope, “No... no, I’m not. Well, of course, I’m all right. I mean, I’m fine.” she chuckled. “More than fine. Shell-shocked, maybe but... just fine, Red.”

Her eyes shone with affection, “You are, without a doubt,” she choked up, “the finest man I have ever met.”

“If you put me up against your boyfriend,” he mused, “of course, I’m going to shine.”

The woman laughed raucously, hitting the man playfully.

“Speaking of which,” Red checked his watch superficially, “the old ball and chain will be here any minute to pick you up.”

“To take me to see my new house and cars?” René lifted a brow. “I should have known he would be in on this conspiracy.”
“He chose all the colors for the walls.”

“Oh my God, Red.” René sat up, alarmed. “You didn’t really let him–”

Red laughed heartily.

René sat back, her hand to her heart. “Oh, thank God.” she whispered sacredly, making Liz laugh as well.

“Everything would be khaki or battleship gray.” René swore which amused Liz all the more.

“Can you see the nursery?” René rolled her eyes. “Pink camouflage walls?”

“Dembe bought her a pink commando outfit.” Red lied.

“He did not.” René knew better. “Dembe will buy the only practical gift out of you lot.”

“What about Silas?” Liz was having a ball, the evening turning into a wonderful adventure shared through her companions’ eyes. “A big teddy bear?”

“An assault rifle... Nerf style.” Red differed.

René eased to the edge of her seat, seeking Red’s hand. He gallantly assisted her to rise.

“I kid these louts but I’ll tell you one thing,” she spoke to Liz directly this time, “I would walk to the ends of the Earth to help one of them out if he... when he, needs help.”

Liz’s eyes softened on the pretty a face.

“Even in my present condition.” it was ruefully promised. “And this one here,” she hugged Red dearly, “I would have my boyfriend lay down his life for...” she quipped.

Red chuckled appreciatively, “Awfully generous with his life.”

René shrugged any concern away, “He feels the same.” she reached for Liz’s hand. “You take good care of Red for me, okay?”

Liz nodded minutely, “I’ll do my best.”

“I’m gonna let you two get back to your evening.” René looked tired but happy. “And I will go find a chair that reclines, then get me the biggest piece of chocolate cake I can find.”

Both Red and Liz held their amusement.

“And if you say one thing about it, Red Reddington...” she narrowed her eyes playfully.

Red’s expression altered to a mock seriousness. He held his hands high.

René tiptoed to kiss the man’s cheek then clasped him tightly for a long beat.

She sniffled quietly seeking out Elizabeth, “It was such a pleasure to meet you.”

Liz smiled warmly, impulsively kissing the woman’s cheeks, returning the sentiment.

Red’s eyes softened as he watched the woman’s exit.

“She is such a nice person, Red.” Liz sought him out. “I like her very much.”
“I hoped you would.” the man was relieved. “She is a very dear person to me.”

A short time later, Red pulled out into traffic as they made their way back to Lower Manhattan, side glancing his passenger on several occasions.

He didn’t sense any particular emotion coming from Lizzy but she had been unusually quiet for some time now.

He took it as long as he could, “Something wrong?”

“What?” she pulled from her thoughts. “Oh... oh, nothing at all.” she smiled to prove as much. “I was just woolgathering.”

“Something you can share?” he was understandably curious.

“Just thinking about how kind you can be,” she glanced at his handsome profile, “how incredibly generous.”

“And loving.” he sent her a look which warmed the cockles of her heart. “Why don’t you slide over here and let me prove my boast.” he patted the seat next to him.

Liz smiled wider, sliding the space to the man, careful not to impede his driving motions.

“Get back in that seat belt.” he scowled.

“Well, make up your mind.” she chuckled, scooting back over good-naturedly. “I guess this rules out any chances of a blow job for you, right?”

She motioned, indicating the distance between them now.

Red sighed lightly, “For the present.” he concentrated on the road to take his mind from such a pleasant thought.

Liz chuckled, “You always have to have the last word.”

“If your mouth was full of junior,” he responded, “you wouldn’t be talking, anyway.”

Liz sent him a scolding glance, “Junior?”

“Big Red?” Red tried another nickname.

Liz laughed outright, “You are not normal.” she realized gleefully.

“You said normalcy was overrated.” he reminded.

She settled back thinking on the matter, “I’ve come to the conclusion,” she had, “that aside from the occasional firefight, I rather enjoy every aspect of our lifestyle.”

“There must be times,” he was certain, “it gets to be too much though.”

Liz’s eyes traced the staggered outline of the New York skyline absently, pondering his question.

“I did have a moment today,” she recalled, “when the sights and sounds... even the smells inundated my senses.” she confided. “You ever experience something like that?”
Red nodded. He understood perfectly what she was wishing to convey.

“It evened out quickly enough.” she shrugged. “We seemed to have found a certain... levelness in that regard, however.” was that the word she sought?

She looked at his profile, “You are what centers me.”

Red glanced over, “Do I, baby?”

“Yes.” she whispered quietly. “It’s like... a series of roller coaster rides filled with highs and lows but through it all, you are my constant.”

Red was quiet so long a time, Liz thought the conversation had ended.

“But... you are enjoying the ride,” his brow had furrowed deeply, “on this particular roller coaster?”

“As long as you are there to enjoy it with me.” she murmured quietly.

He lifted her hand to his lips, placing a soft kiss on the velvety flesh.

The man jerked free suddenly, cursing under his breath.

The car swerved sharply. Red’s arm was throw protectively across her breasts as he maneuvered the vehicle about an idiot driver who had darted in front of them from the opposite lane.

Red laid on the horn, his temper flaring incandescently, “You fucker!” he bitched out the moron.

The guy had the gall to slow down having whipped back into his original lane coming nose to nose with Red’s vehicle.

The bastard was gesturing wildly, clearly yelling obscenities, his face a mask of angry contortion.

Red flipped him off, looking for an opportunity to floor the car to get away from such a stupid predicament.

With Lizzy in the car, he wasn’t about to take any chances that the road rage might escalate into something even more unpleasant.

The guys countenance altered visibly, at one point, becoming slack-jawed, a look of sheer panic and disbelief crossing his face.

Red glanced hastily over, sensing the fuckers attention was now focused elsewhere.

Lizzy was leaning casually forward, her weapon aloft. She waved it leisurely about grabbing the idiots full attention.

She smiled prettily, the weapon coming to bear on the unsuspecting target.

Red eased back in his seat, giving her ample room.

The car quickly dropped back, the guys wheels screeching with his effort to get the hell away from the crazy woman with the gun.

Red chuckled lowly, the sound a very sensuous one which ran along Liz’s spine most pleasantly.

Liz quietly, unobtrusively replaced her weapon into her purse, settling back into the comfort of the
She sighed airily, rolling her head on the headrest, returning her interest to the towering buildings looming large before them.

“The city is so beautiful at night.” she made mention.

Red’s chuckle increased, “I don’t think the prick with the road rage shares your outlook.”

“I should have gotten his license.” she mused. “I could have made his life a living hell if I really set my mind to it.”

“That’s my girl...” Red was still very much amused at how she handled the situation. “Never piss off an agent of the Federal Government. That’s my motto. At least, in regards to you.”

“Good motto to live by.” she approved.

“I sincerely enjoy having my own pistol packin’ baby.” Red was smitten. He threw her an affectionate look. “Kind of got me hot back there.” he admitted. “If I pull off on a side street, will you give me that blow we were discussing?”

“And chance getting mugged?” she gasped playfully.

Red chuckled again.

“You know,” she met his gaze, “as soon as we get back, the interruptions will start.”

Red drew in an even breath, agreeing with her assessment.

“It’s all right though.” she touched his hand which lay idly on his upper thigh. “We’ve had a wonderful evening. A nice private dinner. Time alone... I met a lovely woman from your past. One I didn’t want to shoot in the face.”

Red’s mouth curved into a grin.

“And whatever form the interruption takes,” she continued, “you’ll handle it with the upmost expediency, I know.”

“And you know this, how?” he quipped. “Because I’m hot for a blow job?”

“That too.” she conceded. “But logically it only stands to reason...”

The man was interested to see how her mind worked, listening intently as she ticked off her thoughts.

“It’s late. By now the Bureau has taken possession of Lawford. Number one problem off the list.” she shifted her eyes his way, “Our respective teams have had time to settle into their rooms.”

Red nodded that he was still here, listening.

“Another example of your generosity by the way.” she made mention. “It’s not often an agent gets the chance to stay at a five-star hotel. Don’t think they aren’t gawking with awe at the accommodations you provided.”

“But for you,” he teased, “it’s just old hat now, right?”

“Are you kidding?” she pulled an adorable face. “I was stoked when I saw the gift basket full of “goodies.”

Red chuckled.

She loved to make him laugh, “But that big ass complimentary robe... Red, I felt like I died and went to heaven.”

Red’s chuckle increased, “Are we going to steal it?” he queried lightly.

“Well, you’re just going to have to tell him about such things.” she was positive. “He’s making us all look bad.” she sighed. “Tell him, if he won’t steal it for himself... steal it for me.”

Liz’s face fell.

“It’s okay. It’s all compiled and ready.” he held up a staying hand.

She relaxed visibly, “There, you see...” she sat back, totally relaxed, “I told you, you were a good man, Red Reddington.”

“My people want the information Francis gathered on Lawford... and they want it by the morning.”

Liz’s face fell.

“Why don’t you inform the guy who put my face on all the post office walls.” he asked plaintively.

“Regardless,” she shrugged the issue aside, “think what you like, but others see it. René... Hunter Gaines.”

“I owed René, still do.”

“And Hunter Gaines?” she debated. “You saw a reflection of yourself in that man, admit it. I know it, you know it.”

At one point it would have bothered Red that Elizabeth could read him so well but in truth... now he rather cherished the idea.

She wasn’t relying on her profiling skills and he knew it.

Her observations were borne of an emotional connection that had grown between them.

That snuggle time in bed had produced a deeper, more in-depth understanding of his psyche, apparently.

For which he was grateful.

“I wasn’t in as difficult...” he checked over his shoulder before changing lanes, “or dire circumstances as Hunter.” he tried to explain the unexplainable to a layman, “but I do understand his frustration with government stupidity. The inept bureaucracy is unconscionable.” he confided.
“Where men like Gaines are concerned.”

He worried her fingers with his own, his mood transmitted through the contact.

“Hunter fought impossible odds on missions no one should have to endure.” Red’s eye ticked as similar missions resurfaced in his memory. “Survived torture that would break a normal man in seconds... lost time with his family. Didn’t get to see his little ones grow...”

Liz pondered the quiet words, her own fingers gripping Red’s hard now.

“For what?” the contempt could not be hidden, but she knew the man’s anger was not directed at her.

Red needed to voice... something. She sensed this as well.

“To be told all those sacrifices meant shit in the grand scheme of things?” Red’s tone was incredulous. “By someone who worked behind a desk all day? Who never saw a weapon let alone fired one... when you’re looking in the face of another human being?”

Liz swallowed hard. Red had crossed some kind of line. He wasn’t talking about Hunter Gaines any longer but perhaps he spoke for all those nameless men who had weathered similar situations.

Speaking for... himself.

She blinked back tears, feeling the desolate state those men... Red, must have felt.

“...It may not have mattered to that small-minded, unfeeling asshole, Red,” she stressed, her fingers tightening around his, “but it matters to Hunter’s wife.” she lifted luminous eyes, “it matters to every decent human being alive today, it matters,” she choked on the emotions, “…to me.”

Red glanced at the woman, the words penetrating the fury he felt. He swallowed hard against the knot in his throat.

And... it mattered to him.

Even twenty years later... the time he had taken from his family. The precious minutes he had missed with his daughter....

It meant... everything.

Did he need to believe it had not been in vain?

“We struggle with the words to tell you guys,” she had on numerous occasions, “we can’t find the right thing to say to express how deep our gratitude runs. All those things you did... the time you offered. You missed out on your lives so we...”

She shook her head, “So we could be with the ones we loved, could be safe. Untouched by the horrors you saw, you experienced day after day. Long, horrible days...”

Red looked stoically ahead, his features grim, the words touching his heart and mind.

“And what do you come home to?” she shook her head at the realization. “Do we take care of you like you did us? Do we give every last thing to see you are repaid for something that is priceless?”

Red glanced away, sensing the depth of emotions she tried to express, hurting for her.
“No... we turn a blind eye and trust a system that is beyond flawed. Do we hold those in charge accountable for how they treated you?”

The silence was beyond strained as Red sought vainly for away to alleviate her suffering.

“I wouldn’t be surprised if God has set a day aside for our reckoning.” Liz was positive. “He will judge our callousness... our insensitivity... our indifference.”

She looked at the man, “But you won’t be among us... you know why?”

Red’s face was expressionless.

“Because you,” her voice gained strength, “you... do something.”

“Elizabeth...” he ventured, words failing him. He gripped the steering wheel in a clenched manner.

“You make a difference, Red.”

The silence returned. Red cursed his inability to respond.

A soft horn honked alerting the man the light had changed. Red blinked, breaking his focus or lack thereof.

He moved along, his mind stagnant.

He pulled into the entrance of the hotel, his mind on auto-pilot.

Turning the car over to a valet, he guided Elizabeth through the ornate lobby, his hand gentle on the curve of her back, his thumb absently rubbing a soothing motion.

They slipped into the elevator which was thankfully, unoccupied.

“...Elizabeth–”

“I’m not done.” her warm, slim fingers fell over the curvature of his mouth, her eyes holding his hypnotically, “I want to say the words to you.”

She needed him to know.

“I also know what you give up for me.” her love washed over the man like a silken balm. “The sacrifices you make on a daily basis–”

He shook his head in swift denial.

“You’re always on alert, never able to let your guard down,” she didn’t know where to begin, “always thinking two steps beyond the rest of us, never allowing your mind to rest.”

“You lose sleep,” she refused to allow his modesty to stop her, “you shoulder the burden, you protect me often... from my own folly, I realize.” she smiled swiftly. “I am free because of what you give of yourself... for me.”

The elevator bobbed slowly to a halt. They had reached the top of the hotel. The doors quietly slid apart with a gentle swoosh.
They trekked the corridor, Red swiping his key card, words thick in his throat.

Elizabeth clutched the man to her once they were inside the closed door. She held tightly to his stability.

“This...” she whispered huskily hoping he would get her meaning, her breath warm on his neckline, “this... when your arms are around me, when I can feel you close, where there is only you... and me.”

She lifted expressive eyes, “This is my... everything.”

She hugged him, closing those eyes to the reality that was Red Reddington, “I just needed you to know.”

Red’s face grimaced, his arms tightening almost painfully. He could not end the moment. He had no wish to do so.

Liz understood the vulnerability he was sharing, albeit, wordlessly.

He buried his face in the lusciousness of her hair, holding on with his whole soul.

One part of the man was afraid of such weakness. What he felt was so powerful an emotion, he instinctively guarded himself, building walls.

Elizabeth was slowly dissolving the very building blocks he had so meticulously cemented together.

Another part reveled in the need to give in...

She must have sensed as much for those eyes sought him out looking into him with a clarity which awed.

“Let me be to you,” she whispered, stressing the sentiment, “what you are... to me.”

Elizabeth wondered why he should trust to that extent, however.

Their relationship over the past year had been rocky to say the least.

Her inconsistencies astounded even the woman.

She couldn’t blame the man for being wary of sharing himself fully with her.

To trust his deepest thought to her.

Wondering when she would turn on him, as she had in the past... bolt to the nearest convenient scapegoat available.

She could only have faith that this obstacle could be overcome just as they had others in their relationship.

“You already are...” his eyes softened

She searched his face religiously for something which she had yet to find.

“Waking up in the night,” he began slowly, “finding you beside me...” the word search was a difficult one for the man. “Looking up to see you smiling at me across a table...”
He grew restless. It wasn’t coming out correctly, he sensed.

He brooded, tracing her pouty mouth with a dark scowl, “Being able to touch you, being allowed the freedom... anytime I please.”

Her eyes crinkled with gentle amusement.

“Hearing that infectious giggle.” he smiled too for a beat but then the scowl returned.

The man lifted a heady stare, “Seeing that certain look you give when I’ve done something just right...”

She blushed but couldn’t have said why.

Red stroked a gentle finger over those precious cheeks.

Liz dropped her gaze to his mouth to see the wondrous words form.

“There is nothing I wouldn’t do,” his tone was hoarse, rough, “to keep you by my side, Elizabeth. Nothing.”

Liz wondered at the words and their meaning when stated by such a man... such a glorious man.

“Nothing is more important to me.” he leaned brushing that beautiful mouth with a possessive caress. “I love you more than anything in this entire world. Never... ever doubt that fact.”

She snuggled close, lost in the moment and the strength of his arms, “You make me fall in love with you more and more each day... you know that, don’t you?”

The man hadn’t known, no. It still shocked him to the core that this woman seemed to accept him to the extent she did.

“...The sex ain’t bad either.” Liz wanted to lighten the man’s mood for her own had soared. “Don’t you think?”

“I’m fucking addicted to it.” he admitted freely, his tone holding a certain reverence she cherished.

“Yeah?” she pushed slightly away. “...Are you trying to tell me something or is that just your phone vibrating down there?”

He chuckled, the moment broken, “I don’t vibrate, more’s the pity.” he confessed, checking the screen absently. “But you have a few toys that make up for my inabilities, don’t you? Want to try a few out later on?”

“You’ll make me blush.” she feigned shock. “How do you know what toys I–”

“Bottom drawer, night stand.” he cocked his head. “I certainly hope you grabbed a few for the trip?”

“Haven’t needed any to date.” she mused. “But I’m open to suggestions.”

“When I return,” he held up the phone, “we’ll continue this little discussion, shall we... in minute detail.”

“I’ve always been a stickler for... details.” she confessed, her heart racing thunderously.

She wondered if she was affecting him as much as he was her.
“Fucking phone.” he grumbled dejectedly, taking a more than reluctant leave.

She watched him go, elation singing through her body, “You just better not be too long... I might start without you.”

“You do,” he hesitated, hand on the opened door, “and I’ll blister that sweet little ass with my opened palm.”

“Ohh.” she sighed happily, sending a kiss his way. “Is that a promise?” she perked up.

He scowled darkly but... took his leave.

Liz giggled, rushing off to ready herself for what surely would be a most interesting end to the evening indeed.

~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~

Liz tossed the towel to the basin, peering into the vanity mirror.

She tousled her wet hair with her fingers glancing her image over.

She was smiling. She chuckled. She had hummed a song the entire time while showering.

Her mood was high, and she felt fantastic.

Her skin seemed to glow.

A scowl appeared on the pretty brow.

Must be that new moisturizer.

The thought made her titter again.

Who was she kidding? It was Red Reddington that caused this mood that made her feel beautiful... inside and out.

She glanced at her watch which lay discarded on the basin beside her make-up kit.

The scowl returned post-haste. She noticed today’s date.

That could not be...

A man would not remember such an insignificant date.

One month...

She asked earlier if this night was a celebration of something important.

Such a small milestone but suddenly to her... it meant so much.

They had weathered so much in this short, eventful month.

They had grown so close. Which was evident after their discussion a short time ago.

Suddenly the short time span the man had been gone felt like ages!

“Oh...” she winced visibly.
Red had treated her to a wonderful evening full of romance and wine and music.

She felt horrible, “Dammit!”

She had nothing to give back, not even a damned card!

She was a terrible person!

“Shit!” she hissed. “Shit, sh!”

She sought vainly about, her frustration mounting.

She rushed for the closet, hastily rummaging through her luggage.

Something sexy and slinky and...

“Damn!” she cursed her luck. “Damn, damn!”

Nothing would work. Nothing was special enough.

Just when she was about to give up hope, her eyes fell on an object.

Possibilities began to form in her fevered mind.

“...It could work.” she was fairly certain. “I could pull it off...”

Could she though? Could she really?

She flushed, the thought making her giggle nervously.

Quickly gathering what she needed, the woman rushed back to the sink. The image looking back was a woman she barely knew.

It was exciting and nerve-wracking, yet incredibly exhilarating.

“Well, it isn’t a new tie but,” she bit her lip anxiously, “maybe, just maybe... it might work.”

Chapter End Notes

Wanted to thank my mom for her input and assistance with the dialogue/reactions with Red and René.

And before you think of skinning me alive for the Sherman Tank remark Red made... that was a shout out to my Uncle when he said my mom looked like a bowling ball when she was pregnant.

A remark my Aunt overheard.

Guess who slept on the couch later that night :D

Watching her reflection in the mirror, Liz tried looping the tie once more. She stared morosely at her sullen expression.

This day was going so well earlier. When had it gone to the dark-side, she wondered?

Red’s blue pin-striped shirt hung open over her slender body, its tails gracing the bottom of her thighs.

Her bared breasts peaked out of the parted front, alluring any onlookers. The slope of her flat tummy resting against the soft fabric.

She pouted prettily, unaware of her charms.

“This sucks.” she mused fretfully. The only thing she could cook up to hopefully arouse and entertain Red was rapidly vanishing with all her carefully considered hopes for a sexy night in.

She tried once again with the uncooperative tie, stamping her foot angrily when her effort once again, literally, fell short.

She grasped her phone, dialing the needed number, “Come here,” her tony conveyed her mood, “quickly!”

The man grunted with pain, hastily pushing his reclined position to a fully upright one.

Silas favored his side, moving briskly down the needed corridor. He had traversed the yardage in record time despite his injuries, pushing the pain aside.

He did not hesitate at the closed bedroom door, charging through, weapon raised and trained.

The man’s penetrative eyes scanned the quiet room. He hurried forward hesitating at the slightly ajar door, listening with sharp ears.

He threw the obstacle aside, his senses on high alert.

The woman sat on the side of the sunken tub, alone and silent. Agitated.

The blue eyes lit with hope as she stood, her hands holding the shirt she wore tightly closed, rushing towards the new arrival.
“Oh, Silas!” her tone suggested little more than worried vexation. “What am I gonna do?”

The blue eyes beseeched him.

The man’s brow furrowed darkly. He re-scanned the area for any possible signs of trouble.

He checked the walk-in closet, then lifted a dark scowl her way, “Don’t see a problem here,” he made mention, “what the hell is going on?”

“Oh, Silas...” she wailed, her expression a rather forlorn one.

“You said that.” he put his weapon away, finally noting her state of dress...or undress.

He liked that shade of polish on those bare toes. He scowled harder for the fact.

“You’re not dead.” he stated the obvious.

“You’re so dramatic!” Liz griped.

“Me!” the man barked. “I thought someone was killing you dead.” he snapped his irritation. “Don’t do this shit!” he spread his arms plaintively, encompassing his annoyance. “What’s the matter with you?”

Liz glanced fretfully at the clock, watching the precious seconds tick by. A short time ago, it had been like waiting for water to boil, anticipating Red’s return. But now... time was slipping by in frantic slices of urgency.

“He’ll be back any minute now and look!” she tugged on the stupid tie angrily. “I can’t even make a simple knot work for me.”

Silas processed, seeing her state of duress.

She held the garment aloft, shaking it in his face, “I forgot what day it was so I didn’t even get a gift. What am I gonna do?”

“I thought,” the guard had issues of his own. He snatched the tie absently from unresisting fingers, “someone was murdering your ass!”

She sighed dramatically, “So they kindly allowed me to make a phone call?”

He looped the tie about her neck, roughly tugging her closer, “Chose your words carefully,” he suggested with an impatient snarl, “I’m in position to do great harm at the moment.”

“Stop bitching!” she snapped right back, holding her shirt front shut. “God, you’re so grumpy!”

Silas’ face registered his exasperation, “Now what are you rattling on about?”

“We were so busy, I didn’t realize the date and tonight Red–” she broke off her rapid speech when Silas held up a stilling hand.

“Cliff notes.” he grunted.

“We’ve been dating a month.” she worried her lip. “Two days ago.”

Silas nodded inwardly, understanding her panic. He had been out on a mission when he and Anya...it had only been a month, but it had been an amazing one. Upon his return, he only had time to get flowers and candy. It hadn’t seemed like enough... he sighed, shaking off the regret.

“You were busy, he knows that.” he soothed her concern. He fed the tie through with practiced ease, easing the knot up the slick fabric. “You gonna do a tease?”

“What?” she worked the knot upwards only to have Silas bat her fingers away.

The man reset the knot between her breasts, “You’re giving him your kitty in lieu of a present, right?” he spoke slowly as if speaking to Francis. “Are you taking the shirt off or will that be his job?”

She stared at him, stunned into silence for a beat, “You make it sound so sordid.” she huffed indignantly, rethinking her options.

“Don’t be stupid. What man wouldn’t want pussy instead of a wallet?” he disdained. “Best damned gift ever, if you ask me.”

She settled, “…Really?”

Silas gauged her body analytically, “Make him take it off.” he decided the course of action to take, before glancing down. “…Where’s your honey pot stop exactly?”

“Stop looking at me like that?” she balked, gathering the shirt more securely in her hold.

“Yeah, in your dreams.” the guard rolled his eyes. “One, Red would cut off my dick and shove it up my ass and two…” he didn’t want to think about the other, “just don’t go there. I have to fix the end so it hides your… gift.”

“Oh…” Liz relaxed, glancing down even as the guard was. “About here.” She showed the exact spot.

The tie was placed approximately where it would do the most damage to Red’s psyche because it strategically hid the one thing a man would crave to see.

“This is all really dumb, isn’t it?” she was fast losing confidence.

“This is a big deal.” Silas shrugged. “It’s an important occasion, right?”

He lifted shrewd eyes, “You and Red... you’re beating the odds.”

Liz lifted trusting eyes.

“You guys got something special.” he knew as much. “Maybe it should be celebrated.” he shrugged his shoulders.

She bit her lip anxiously wanting desperately to believe the words.

“Keep the shirt open.” Silas advised. He walked the room, shutting down lights.

Liz traipsed after him, her ears attuned to what the man had to say.

“Bend over, shake your hair out.” the man nodded her way.

Liz hesitated then followed his instructions rapidly. She looked herself over in the mirror, enjoying the results.
“When you hear him...get on the bed.” he motioned walking back her way. “The tie should drape between your breasts, the tail hides what he will want most.” he held her gaze. “Show just enough skin to tantalize.”

“You sound like you’ve done this before.” she arched a knowing brow.

“One of my fondest memories, so don’t blow it for the guy.”

“How could I blow it?” she was suddenly desolate.

“By not following through.” Silas answered. “Don’t let modesty or that Catholic upbringing slow you down... enjoy yourself.” he spread his hands. “This will be a blast... if you let it be.”

Liz calmed, “I... I can do that.”

“Of course you can.” Silas had faith. “Your tits are small but they’re perfectly shaped. Get a little cold... show off those perky–”

“Stop, you perve!” she snapped.

He grinned at her returned spunk. He sat Red’s fedora on her head, “Tip it like this and give him a slow up and under look when he arrives.”

Liz’s eyes lifted to the brim of the hat.

“Get’s a man’s blood racing,” Silas nodded knowingly, “that look.”

He studied his handiwork, pleased by what he saw, “You look good.” he bolstered.

“Don’t psyche yourself out.” he sauntered across the room. “Think dirty thoughts until he gets here.”

Liz sighed, “Silas...”

The man halted, hand on the doorknob.

“Thank you.” she winced. “For not calling me stupid... for helping me.”

“You aren’t stupid, Elizabeth.” he scowled. “You are a warm, giving, loving woman.”

The woman blinked her shock.

“Red is lucky to have found you.” the handsome brow furrowed even more so. “But he knows that.” Silas waved a dismissive hand. “And don’t worry about not experiencing a hell of a lot more of these milestones. I think you guys are in it for the long haul, for what it’s worth.”

Liz’s eyes misted, “Stop being nice to me.” she snipped, annoyed for her lack of control. “I don’t know how to handle it. You’re freaking me out.”

He grinned once more, “Just handle ‘Big Red’ tonight. Get the old bastard in a good mood.” his grin widened. “Make everyone’s life easier.”

She gasped, “Did he tell you...” she frowned, suddenly wondering what else Red had shared of their private conversations.

“Tell me what?” Silas scowled.
“Big Re—” she broke off, grimacing.

Silas grinned, then outright laughed, “That’s what you named his coc—”

“I didn’t do it!” Liz shook her head vehemently, increasing the man’s laughter.

“Oh... he’ll never live that down.” Silas muttered to himself.

The phone rang on the table beside the man, his laughter trailing away. He handed it over.

Liz forced a brightness, “Oh, hey!” her voice and manner softened. She was unaware of the fact but Silas caught the change, his smile an approving one. “How did it go?”

She fiddled nervously with the tail of the shirt she sported, unaware of that fact either.

Silas shook his head, sighing lightly averting his eyes as any proper gentleman would do... or that’s how he supposed such a man might act.

His own instincts ran to ‘looking’ but this was Elizabeth.

So he waited patiently for once until she finished the call.

“Put it on vibrate.”

She blinked.

“The phone.” he chuckled, realizing her thoughts veered in another direction. “No interruptions tonight. I’ll see to it personally.”

“...Even Dembe?” she was stunned, pure and simple.

“Dembe can be bought.” Silas made his way once again to the door. “You just have to know his weaknesses.”

“He has weaknesses?”

Silas sent her a look, “Have a good time... happy anniversary.”

Liz smiled happily.

He closed the door on a very private world she had created.

Liz hurried about, lighting candles, putting last-minute touches on the fantasy in which she was about to embark.

~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥

Red ducked his head inside the opened door, peering around the deserted area. Assured the coast was clear, he held the door ajar, shushing the waiter who pushed the rolling cart into the room.

The man smiled genially, easing the cart to a stop, “Do you need assistance, sir?” the man whispered, for Red’s actions seemed to deem it necessary.

Red shook his head, “You have done more than enough.” he whispered back quietly, holding a crisp bill out to the young man, “Everything looks amazing, thank you for your help.”

The waiter ducked out as silently as he arrived. Red went about examining the tray. Everything must be perfect this night.

He glanced up at the sound of footfalls.

“Easy, Tonto.” Silas warned. “It’s just me.”

Red stepped forward, “Is Lizzy all right?” his voice was laced with concern.

Silas frowned, “I’m here, right? Why even ask?”

Red’s scowl deepened.

“Just making my rounds as I am paid to do.” the guard lied easily. He looked over the tray with all its bounty, nodding his approval. “Special occasion?”

Red nodded slowly, taking in the assortment laid before him, “You probably wouldn’t think so.” he muttered absently, sighing.

“No,” Red hesitated confiding in the man. Silas wasn’t the sentimental sort.

Silas waited, finally rolling his hand irritably indicating, ‘continue before I lose all interest together’.

“I obviously haven’t done this in a while,” Red gestured between himself and the empty room, “a relationship, I mean.”

He fingered a rosebud back into position, second guessing himself. This was an emotion he was not accustomed to experiencing.

“Too much?” Silas scowled.

“Pressure.” Red added. “It’s stupid to expect she would remember...” he took his hat off, scraping his hand across the shorn head irritably.

“This is one juvenile idea to celebrate one month together?” Red looked around aimlessly. “Get rid of the damned cart.” he motioned curtly.

Silas leaned, resting his ass on the edge of the couch, crossing his arms. The man held his tongue for once, understanding Red’s dilemma more than he wanted to admit. He had felt the same with Anya and now...

He sighed, “No, snide remarks.” the guard replied. “It’s neither juvenile nor stupid.”

Red lifted stunned eyes. He had not expected that.

“Women like this shit.” Silas nodded to the cart. “What’s wrong with it?” he shrugged. “Maybe more of us should make the effort.”

Red traced the edge of the fine China holding the assorted treats, nodding.

Silas leaned, resting his ass on the edge of the couch, crossing his arms. The man held his tongue for once, understanding Red’s dilemma more than he wanted to admit. He had felt the same with Anya and now...

He sighed, “No, snide remarks.” the guard replied. “It’s neither juvenile nor stupid.”

Red lifted stunned eyes. He had not expected that.

“Women like this shit.” Silas nodded to the cart. “What’s wrong with it?” he shrugged. “Maybe more of us should make the effort.”

Red traced the edge of the fine China holding the assorted treats, nodding.

“Are you drunk?” Red checked on the guy.
“I don’t think so.” Silas told the truth. “I’m just saying,” he continued, “what I think is happening here... is just a method to officially observe the time you’ve spent together so far and to say how much you’ve enjoyed it.”

Red hadn’t looked at it that way.

“Quite frankly,” Silas dropped his arms beside his body, leaning into his fists, “it’s my considered opinion, Liz deserves the attention. She needs to know she’s loved... and that someone gives a damn.”

Red’s brows lifted superficially, his surprise genuine.

“And so do you.” Silas admitted.

Red’s brows furrowed. When did Silas start giving a shit about what he needed?

“You need to build something concrete with Liz...” Silas continued, “and she needs that something to be real... do you even know ‘real’ any longer? Not sure I do.”

Red sat his hat down, intrigued by Silas’ input.

“But then, we all need something,” Silas stated, albeit reluctantly, “whether we want to admit it or not.”

“That include you?” Red had to ask the question he thought perhaps he knew the answer to.

Silas was quiet so long, Red assumed he would not answer the obvious.

“Who the hell knows.” the man arose, a restlessness overtaking him. “We weren’t discussing me.” he said. “It’s past time you two had something to hold on to, to trust in and celebrate.”

Red remained quiet, listening.

“For people like us...” Silas looked down at his heavy boots, “moments like that are few and far between.” he said. “We actually appreciate them. Cherish the simplicity.” he glanced at the table again. “We know what’s important at the end of the day.”

Red’s mind’s eye filtered through a few of those important things he and Lizzy shared in this last month. And yes, he truly cherished their time. There seemed to be no trivial moments in his opinion. He had a lifetime of regrets. He had no wish to experience more.

Which was the point Silas was trying to make, he supposed?

Red Reddington was a risk taker. He grabbed life with both hands.

Why should this relationship with Lizzy be any different?

Regardless of how Lizzy may view this moment he wished to share with her, he needed her to know he truly loved having her in his life. That he was enjoying every minute of their allotted time.

“Who the hell knows,” Silas interrupted Red’s thoughts, “she may be just as insecure as you.”

Red followed the man’s slow trek across the room.

“Maybe she’s hoping you would say something to let her know what you’re feeling.” Silas checked his tone, keeping it neutral. “If I were you, I’d come up with a plan that shows her how important you believe this milestone to be... that it was worthy of acknowledging.”

Red’s brow furrowed critically as he tried to read between the lines.

“Be inventive why don’t ya?” Silas lifted a lazy stare. “Improvise... adapt...”

“Overcome.” Red knew the motto well.

“Maybe.” Silas wasn’t sure how far Liz wanted to take her little charade tonight.

“You’re a lot more interesting to talk to when you’re not being a prick.” Red stated the facts as he knew them.

“I surprise even myself at times.” Silas replied in a droll tone. “Now, go tap your girl’s ass and leave me the fuck alone.” he said, grabbing a beer and nuts from the bar area. “My show’s coming on.”

Red shook his head wearily... hooking the cart with his fingers, dragging it along behind him as he took his leave.

“Oh,” the guard remembered, “Hunter needs to see his boy.”

“Get him a flight out in the morning.” Red replied. “My tab, Silas.” he stressed. In this case, he had no qualms about buying the man’s loyalty. “Are we sending David along for the ride?”

Silas nodded his acquiescence. David would get a feel for what the family needed housing wise, one and second, he could gage whether Hunter would stick to his word. The trip would also give David the chance to rest his leg, far away from his trouble making cronies.

“I’ll set it up.” Silas replied, lifting the remote as he parked his ass on the couch in the main living area.

Red hooked the cart once more, hesitating in his steps, “Just for the record,” he said, drawing Silas’ attention, “you’re the side-kick... Tonto.”

“You got it,” Silas smirked as he glanced cryptically at the back of Red’s head, “…Big Red.”

Red rolled his eyes downward, knowing hell on Earth had just arrived.

“Goodnight... asshole.” Red murmured before heading for the master bedroom without another word.

Turning back the bed and fluffing the pillows, Liz stepped back, admiring her handiwork. She narrowed her eyes critically, hastily putting the bed back to rights.

She viewed her handiwork once more... folding the blankets back at the foot of the bed, fluffing the pillows.

It wasn’t perfect, but it served its purpose, “I need to Google, ‘first months established requirements’ to see what is deemed acceptable.” she muttered to herself.

Climbing up on the bed she took a steadying breath, she glanced down hastily, unbuttoning the rest of Red’s shirt before draping it and the tie, how her guard suggested.
Hearing footsteps approaching, she quickly adjusted her stance, fluffing her hair as the footfall reached the door.

Her eyes widened in remembrance, her mouth forming a gasping, “Oh!”

She quickly raised her hand, tilting the hat forward.

Outside the door, Red patted his pocket. The square box thumped resoundingly against his hip. It was securely tucked in place.

He peered through the small slit Silas had left in his exit. The room was dim. He pondered the fact, pushing the cart aside for now. He quietly walked the last few feet, easing the door open.

He halted in his tracks at the vision which greeted him. He took in the visual, his senses momentarily stunned.

Soft candlelight flickered sensually in a rich, warm glow, casting alluring shadows on her face and body.

Those blue eyes had lifted with a sultry stare from under the brim of his fedora.

The look made his blood heat and cock stir to life.

Son of a bitch....

Red’s eyes swept the petite frame slowly, meticulously, gravitating to minute details.

She had donned his blue pinstriped shirt... which engulfed her small body making her appear tiny, somehow vulnerable.

He instinctively wanted to cross the room, take her in his arms... offer protection and warmth.

She knelt on the bed, her legs parted, tucked under. The tails of the shirt rode high, showing quite a bit of thigh.

The shirt was pushed off her shoulders, the lapels falling naturally against the swell of the perfectly formed breasts that were hidden beneath far too much fabric for his tastes.

A well formed knot hung seductively between the plump velvet allowing him to trace the path of his blue tie.

The tiny pearls of her nipples pushed stubbornly against the loose restraint.

He could warm those little peaks nicely with his tongue, he imagined.

His cock imagined it as well, swelling inside his boxers.

His gaze dropped ever so meaningfully until it rested on the spot between her thighs.

The damned tie end hid the treasure which lay beneath. It wasn’t wide enough to hide the entire surface, however.

He could make out a dark thatch of pubic hair on the right side... just giving him a small, whetting peek that was enough to send his imagination soaring.

Was this what Silas had meant?
Be inventive?

Suddenly, an entire list of ideas popped into his mind on how to respond to Elizabeth’s grand gesture.

God... this was the best anniversary ever.

Moving his cock into a more comfortable position, Red’s face twitched jerkily for a brief moment.

Elizabeth insides fluttered crazily at the sight of the well-defined bulge as it jostled about under Red’s trousers.

She must be doing something right, she surmised.

Her tiny tongue darted out, wetting her lips provocatively.

Red swallowed hard, deciding on a scenario he wished played out. He hoped beyond hope... Lizzy would pick up on the ‘game’.

“Miss Scott,” he forced his tone to be a little hard. It was all he could manage because his dick was... very hard at this moment, “you do realize, you have mistaken my room for yours?”

Liz was thrown for a moment, glancing about ‘the room’, but soon enough those blue eyes returned to his, that same, confident stare within.

Red’s heart skipped a beat, pleasured beyond belief to see the gears in her mind churning away as she decided which course of action to take.

“A room is a room, right?” she sat back more comfortably, the tie pulling up further.

A dark hollow filled the gap just below that tie’s end but he couldn’t make out any real detail.

He didn’t have to... he knew what was there, awaiting his exploration... if he played the game correctly.

“Are you still upset with me?” the beautiful face pouted just for him.

“We missed an important deadline because of you.” he improvised. “Lest you forget.”

Liz pulled an adorable face, “I tried to explain about that,” the blue eyes beseeched him from under the hat. “It’s just sometimes, I get these... urges and if I don’t do something about them... it gets worse, and I simply can’t concentrate.”

“Urges?” he stepped forward slowly. No need to frighten his prey so quickly after all. “You didn’t mention anything about... urges, before.”

“Others were about,” she too, improvised, “but, since we are alone here... I trust you to be non-judgmental, Mr. Reddington.”

Red’s gaze dropped to the end of that tie. Being this close, gave him a much better view of the shadowy hollow.

“I try not to judge other people’s proclivities, Miss Scott... back to these urges to which you referred.”

“I don’t really understand them,” she confessed. “I’ll be typing at my desk and suddenly, I find myself squirming in my seat,” she grimaced adorably, “I feel pain... down there.”

The blue eyes lifted innocently, “Do you know what it could be?”

“I do actually, yes.” Red was feeling a very similar pain even as he spoke. “You should have confided in me...” he chastised, “I can help you with your problem.”

“Yes?” she smiled happily up at him.

Red zeroed in on her perky breasts and slightly hidden areola, “I am confident of the fact.” he leaned, placing a chaste kiss on her cheek, his eyes holding hers willfully. “Are you experiencing this... pain now, Miss Scott?”

She nodded soulfully, “How did you know, Mr. Reddington?”

“I am very intuitive about such things.” his eyes measured the flat of her tummy. “I’m no longer upset with you by the way. I totally concur with whatever action you had to take to relieve your horrible suffering.”

Red’s head cocked slightly, his eyes caressing the area behind the tie.

“I missed the meeting.” she reminded. She looked up at him slowly, her eyes startling under the charcoal lining highlighting the deep blue depths.

“I forgive you entirely,” his tone caressed her. “Tell me... can you show me from where exactly this pain originates?”

She moved, which pushed her breasts together, moving the tie aside, “...Here, Mr. Reddington.”

He traced the cleft where her thigh met her upper leg, the tempting sight of the neatly trimmed thatch of hair peeked from the edge of the tie.

“...Here?” he skimmed his finger ever so closer to the pouty lips which, while still hidden, called out to him. He kept his palm flat against the beloved thigh, his eyes lifting questioningly.

“Y-Yes.” Liz’s voice trembled, “...Almost.”

“Almost.” he repeated silkily, nodding thoughtfully.

“That pain is back again.” she put some feeling into the statement.

“Miss Scott...” his tone held a wealth of empathy, “what can I do to help?”

“I don’t think anyone can help.” she mused. “I just need to... be by myself for a time.”

“And that is why you missed the meeting.” he nodded sagely. “Well, we can’t have that though, can we. We must find a way to alleviate the problem before any important business arises.”

Speaking of arising... the man’s cock was throbbing with ‘urges’ along about now.

“You are mistaken in the assumption that I cannot be of assistance in such a time, however.” he assured. “Will you trust me to... demonstrate what I speak of?”

“But... how?” she allowed him to remove the jauntily placed hat.

He lay it aside absently, taking in the lovely mess of her wispy hair... those big blue eyes looking up at him so invitingly.

“There is such a simple method which effectively relieves the particular type of tension you are experiencing.” he boldly traced a slow trek over the slope of her breast, the tip circling the cold little nipple with a light, feathering touch.

Liz gasped shakily.

“But for me to help you... you must put yourself completely in my hands.” he shifted a stern look.

Liz lifted into his touch, her movements easing much of the shirt material aside.

Red’s fingers hooked inside the front opening, touching bare flesh.

Liz drew in a startled breath as his forefinger and middle just captured her nipple, gently pinching the crinkled flesh in a rolling motion.

Red watched her face, reveling in the heady sound of the first pangs of awakening he caused.

“Oh, b-but, Mr. Reddington–” she feigned shock, feeling as if she should move away from such amazing stimulation at this early stage.

His fingers increased the pressure about her nipple bringing a tiny cry of startlement.

“If you don’t obey me... my instructions, Miss Scott,” he eased his fingers back into the sensual probing, taking the slight ache away entirely, “this will never work. You do feel badly about how remiss you were in your duties today, correct?”

She placed his other hand on her opposite breast, “I really, really do, Sir.”

“...Good, girl” he lavished sensual praise, leaning to gently kiss her lips before pulling back leisurely.

He watched his handiwork as he bared her breasts completely, “You are simply...” the beauty took his breath away, “stunning, Miss Scott. Has anyone ever told you?”

She shook her head woefully.

“I will remedy that sad fact.” he leaned, his lips brushing her nipples teasingly.

She raised to her knees, his hands lifting each mound as he partook of the sweet flesh to his hearts content. Favoring each straining nipple with his painstaking attention until he was satisfied the woman was primed for the next step in the plan he executed.

He ran his hand up the inside of her thigh, making sure to take added caution to not hurry the pace.

“Now, I surmise, most, if not all your suffering derives from...” his fingers had reached the edge of her swollen lips. He traced the line of one wet, glistening ridge, “this locale, am I correct.”

Liz was pulsating with need, “Y-Yes... right there, Sir.”

“Here?” he ran his thumb up the sodden slit, playing gently over her clit, “or... here.”

He pushed his index finger into her steamy core.

“Oh!” Liz felt wetness ooze from her vaginal area, the thick finger causing pangs of desire to pulsate within. “There, yes!”
“I thought as much.” Red eased his finger deeper into her opening.

She moved against the probing hand, rolling her hips erotically.

“You must have discipline.” he eased his finger out, enjoying her gasp of despair, the soft moan of loss. “Now lets try this again. You sit very quietly while I continue my instructions, all right?”

She nodded eagerly. He returned his gift and at its completion Lizzy was moaning her growing desire.

“You must offer incentive to anyone who assists you with your problem.” he kissed her voraciously “Are you willing to do that?”

She nodded.

“Such a beautiful mouth.” he teased the full mouth with the promise of a proper kiss. “Such a warm welcoming pussy.” he held his amusement for the soft intake of breath the vulgarity caused.

She had hit her cue perfectly.

“Does that word bother you, Miss Scott?” he held a slow predatory smile for he had felt the little tremor traverse her body which he held securely with one capable arm about the tiny waist.

He wanted desperately to take the time to rid himself of clothing to better feel the vibrant flesh but... that would have to wait, he supposed.

One task at a time.

“You will have to become accustomed to my rather filthy vocabulary before the evening is over,” he murmured soothingly, “you are bringing out the best in me.”

Elizabeth whimpered in his mouth, that little tongue flicking sensually against his own.

“Now, Miss Scott,” his free hand gently cupping and kneading her breast, fell to his side slowly, “show me that succulent little pussy.”

Liz moaned deep in her throat, her fingers grasping the offensive silk, brushing it to one side. Her hand slid the length slowly, revealing first, the alabaster breasts he worshiped.

He touched the ample cleavage reverently, feasting his eyes on her beauty, “No matter how you move, that tie points in all the right directions, doesn’t it?”

Liz basked in his approval, her hand moving down the silk cloth.

Red’s breath caught in his throat. The red puffy lips beckoned him.

“My God,” he sighed hoarsely, “what a captivating sight.”

He would never tire of gazing upon her nudity. His entire body responded to the spellbinding sight she allowed.

“You take my breath away,” he could hardly get the words through the tightness in his throat. “I could honestly stare at you all damned day... if you would but allow.”

“Mr. Reddington!” Liz played her part, feigning indignation. “That wouldn’t be proper.”
“No.” he readily agreed. “But I would pay good money to see you walk around my office all day, sans clothing.”

“You would be cross.” Liz moved closer, sinking his finger deeper into the recesses of her body. She sighed blissfully at the sensation. “We wouldn’t get much work done... would we?”

“Not on my part.” he once again caressed the adorable mound with loving eyes, “but man does not live by work alone, Miss Scott.”

The dark wispy triangle framed her tiny mons and labia to perfection, he found the sight alluring indeed.

“This feels heavenly...” he mused, his thumb drifting over her clit teasingly, “so incredibly... feminine.”

In Lizzy’s natural state, while rushing around getting ready for the days activities, she felt free enough now to simply walk about in the nude before him.

At such a time, her labia was delicate in appearance. Her lips a tight, healthy pink.

A man noticed things a woman took for granted.

It was all Red could do, lay there in his bed, pretending a reluctance to rise while in reality... he took the opportunity to watch and revel.

In the woman’s aroused state, her labia would plump, glistening with a welcoming sheen of wetness that pulled a man like a magnet to steel.

The pink hue took on the color of rosy red as the blood flow increased to her genitals, as though calling to him.

It was Red’s job to make that blood heat. He took his job very seriously.

No matter how tired or stressed the day had left him, all that was needed to perk him up was a quick glance of her arousal... of that captivating little bush.

When he mounted the woman, the rest of the world faded into oblivion. There was no better feeling in the universe than when he sank into the depths of Elizabeth’s snug cradle.

“Lie back,” he coaxed silkily, “spread your legs for me.”

She hesitated.

“Don’t be selfish, Miss Scott,” he asked politely, “I need to see fully... what you have to offer any interested party. And believe me when I say,” he smiled warmly down at her, “I am most interested.”

He was transfixed, focused as Lizzy eased back into the comfort of the bed. She held his eyes almost stubbornly, he thought, as those shapely legs were slowly, hypnotically... widened.

That pesky tie was giving him fits along about now. It had fallen once more over her mons.

He scowled, flicking it out of his way, “Now look at that.” he purred, his fingers played in the dark, fine pubic hair, “what man could resist such an inviting sight?”

Liz’s mouth parted sensually, shifting her legs even further apart.
Red shifted his thumb, allowing it to follow the fine hair dusting her opening, “This is going to feel amazing along some fortunate man’s cock.”

“I thought,” she halted his narrative hastily, interjecting at just the right moment. She bit her lip, holding the effort, her eyes managing doubt when in fact, she felt none.

“You thought... what, Miss Scott?”

Liz reveled at his ability to put her in her place but wasn’t out of the game just yet... meeting that confident stare boldly.

“Mr. Reddington, you said earlier,” she had caught his slip. He hadn’t intended to voice his needs so early on, she knew. “That I must offer incentive to anyone who assists me with... my problem.”

Red cursed his lack of control then, he feverishly welcomed the fact she had picked up on it now.

“It’s only polite, Miss Scott.”

“And I’ve noticed that you have been tense these past few days,” the innocence she conveyed in those eyes had even him convinced, “am I mistaken?”

“Are you offering to alleviate that stress?” he scowled imploringly. “However would you accomplish that feat?”

“I thought, Sir... you could instruct me.” she held her smile recalling his fascination with a certain activity they had discussed earlier.

Performing the act for Red Reddington brought a bounty of rewards. Watching the man melt by degrees as she exerted her imagination was most empowering. It was not often the man allowed himself to lose control but she was woman enough to know, at that particular time... she held all the cards.

She warmed to the turn of the conversation.

“You have always been so good to guide me through the process...” was she over playing the ingénue? “Oh, not that I haven’t... eh...”

Red waited patiently allowing her to stew in her own juices, curious to see how she would move the play forward.

“I mean...”she wished she could manage a blush but was having too much fun... this new role was too exciting. She was enjoying the challenge, “of course, I have... I’m not a young school girl, God knows.”

“Sitting there as you are,” Red’s eyes had softened considerably, “you look...” he rolled his tongue, his eyes darkening, “guileless and very appealing, Miss Scott.”

She smiled for him, “I’ve been concerned for you of late, Mr. Reddington. The business takes all your time and effort. Don’t you ever take any ‘me’ time?”

Red shifted his eyes. He wanted more than anything to take ‘me’ time along about now.

His cock jerked urgently in its constrictive space.

“Isn’t that important?” she blinked.
Red furrowed his brow, “I am no school boy either.” he wasn’t going to drop the game so easily for he sensed Lizzy was very much into it now. “Other women, well, they have offered their favors but in the end... they only wanted to step up the corporate ladder.”

He lifted a cool gaze, “Is that what you are suggesting here?” he hoped she understood the ploy.

The tactics he used would further the enticement of the game if all participants played their parts.

“Are you wanting to fuck the boss? That is what we are talking about, correct?”

“I hadn’t thought that far in advance.” Lizzy surprised him by the reply.

“...Excuse me?” he was thrown and loving every minute of his confusion. It wasn’t often anyone could top Red Reddington. Let alone a woman in the bedroom. He prided himself in the fact that he was the one to constantly surprise them.

“Well, goodness,” Liz tsked... politely, “I was just trying to show you how much I appreciate all you’ve done for me in the past.” she shrugged shoulders, a slight frown tugging at her brow. “You already have everything a man could want, I wasn’t thinking about... that though.”

She kept her eyes downcast, her manner simulating the proper sadness.

“Perhaps I’ve overstepped myself,” Red was quick to placate. “You know, I hired you because you weren’t like all the others and now... here I am accusing you of just that.”

Still Liz refused to lose the melancholy which had fallen over her. She fiddled with the tie absently.

Red’s eyes traveled her body hungrily, the teasing peaks of flesh were driving him crazy.

“I’m sorry, Miss Scott but,” he wanted desperately to move game along, “what exactly are we speaking of here if not...”

She refused to look at him.

Red’s eyes flicked the nudity anxiously now. Was he beginning to sweat?

“Miss Scott!” he hardened his tone. “When I put a question on the table I expect an answer be forthcoming.”

Those blue eyes lifted instantly, “I thought you might enjoy... a simple,” she crinkled her nose into a wince, “I mean, some men like it when a woman...”

Red relaxed, the tightness in his stomach easing instantly, “Miss Scott,” his tone had returned to a sensual caress, “are you offering what I hope you are?”

She raised to her knees, a tiny scowl on her pretty features, “It’s such a small gesture, Sir...” she moved very close to the man. “I hope you aren’t offended?”

“Offended? No.” he was quick to reassure. “God is my witness. No.”

She searched his face religiously.

“I am touched and heartened by such... generosity on your part.” he reached, steadying her. His hand settled against her rib cage, the heavy swell of her breast resting against his thumb.

“Really, Mr. Reddington?” she beamed up at him, because even on her knees, he was a good head above her.
Red reached between her legs, his large finger petting her clitoris teasingly. He enjoyed Lizzy’s soft moan and the way she leaned towards him.

“I rather enjoy when choices are left to my discretion, however.” his voice held the pent-up tightness of a man controlling himself, Liz thought.

“Do you, Sir?” her hands were braced against his jacket front. “I’m n-not sure what that means?”

“It means...” he readily supplied, “while I would dearly enjoy your... servicing me. I would never allow my own pleasure before a lady’s.”

She shifted him a heated stare, fully realizing his meaning now, “You wouldn’t?”

“What sort of man would I be if I were so remiss?” he continued sliding his finger over the silken depths of her vaginal area.

Liz was on edge, wanting that appendage inside her at this stage, “A normal enough one, I would imagine, Sir.”

Red glanced down. His hand was braced on the small mound, his thumb playing in the crispness of her pubic hair.

“I wonder if you taste as sweet as you feel, Miss Scott.”

Liz’s blood heated at the tantalizing suggestion, “You don’t have to do... that, Sir. I want to be accommodating to you, remember?”

Red loved the soft whisper of seduction. Lizzy had widened her legs for him as well. He was doing something right.

It was how he learned a woman’s likes and dislikes... he gauged her reaction.

So far, he was doing all right, he guessed... but he would never take anything for granted where Elizabeth was concerned.

“I want this to be about you, Mr. Reddington.” Liz reminded herself. This evening was supposed to be her gift to him but, the notion that Red wanted to go down on her... was not exactly one she wanted to refuse.

Still, it would be selfish on her part–

“You don’t understand,” Red wasn’t adverse to sharing a secret most women probably weren’t aware existed, “A man... well, a real man... derives his pleasure from knowing he has bestowed his woman with something no other man can offer.”

“That doesn’t apply to you though.” she was intrigued at the new direction the man was heading. “I’m just your--”

“You are invaluable to me, Miss Scott.” he told the truth, using the guise of his role-playing to unburden himself of things he wanted to say. “I could not do without you.”

Liz’s eyes softened, “Thank you, Mr. Reddington. That means a great deal to me.”

“As I was saying, however,” he digressed, idly petting the fluff between her legs, “a man’s pleasure in the act we are discussing, a great deal of it at least,” he smiled amiably at her, “involves the realization that he is man enough to give his partner just as much pleasure... as she gives him.”
He truly enjoyed the act.

The soft erotic moans he could elicit simply by the sweep of his tongue along the delicate curvature of her lips. The uncontrollable trembling in her thighs if he suckled that tiny pearl of a clit just right.

The way her hands gently pushed on the back of his head when he hit that special spot, holding him stationary that the feelings he elicited could continue.

And he found just as much excitement and fulfillment bringing her to a nerve-shattering climax as he did with his own release of the pent up emotions she caused within his own body.

“Men are base animals at heart.” his eyes scanned her nudity, what was revealed to him. “We love the taste of pussy, especially...” he canted his head, feasting his eyes, “one as delectable as this one appears to be.”

Liz flushed, caught up in the wonder of his words, “I’ve been told... I am sweet tasting.” she blurted, mortified in the next second.

The blue-grey eyes held a twinkle as they caught hers, “Have you, Miss Scott.” his tone was pure indulgence.

“Well...” the man moved smoothly aside, hooking a nearby chair with his hand, “what an titillating statement.”

He sat the chair beside the bed, straddling it with masculine ease, “Sit... just here, won’t you.” he patted the edge of the mattress.

Liz looked at the spot his hand patted. To do as he bid would leave her fully opened... vulnerable to his view.

“Uhm,” she weighted her options.

Did she want to give him the upper hand so early on? Was this little game progressing too fast for her liking?

The man’s movements were unexpected and achieved with rapid success.

Red brushed her legs aside causing the woman to fall back unceremoniously into the sheets of the bed.

He tugged those gorgeous legs with one purposeful action, spreading Lizzy wide on either side of his position.

“Oh!” the woman squealed her surprise, gasping for the breath that had been taken from her.

She studied the ornate molding above her head for a brief interval, wondering at her present position.

Red dragged her ass to the side of the bed, having enjoyed the small little yelp of surprise as he did so.

He sat perfectly at ease. Her ripe, succulent pussy was right in front of his face. Right there... for his viewing and tasting pleasure.

“Sweet tasting, you said?” he questioned again, his imagination taking flight as he perused the glorious vision before him.
Discretely adjusting the rod in his trousers, he squeezed it, soothing the throbbing ache. He had never wanted anything so damned much.

“That was not very nice.” Liz decided, her eyes closing, willing herself to relax under his penetrating gaze.

“I will make it up to you, Miss Scott,” he murmured heatedly, lowering his face to the tender flesh, “...rest assured.”

Gently laving her swollen slit, he smiled as the woman quivered under his tongue. Pushing lightly at the fragrant alcove, he worked the roughened muscle between her slit, parting the tiny folds hidden beneath her labia.

He truly enjoyed everything about this activity. How she responded, how she tasted, her heady aroma... the wet sound of his tongue slipping along this very intimate, private part of her anatomy.

A very private part only he was allowed to see, feel, taste... fuck.

Lowering his nose against her enlarged clitoris, he inhaled her rich scent, grunting his satisfaction. Rubbing his nose against her clit, his pink muscle poked at the small opening leaking with wetness.

Flattening his tongue, he pressed gently against the little pearl.

Liz startled under his mouth, pushing against the arousing touch. “Mr. Reddington?” she practically whispered her distress, so caught up in the emotion of the moment.

Red lifted his mouth away, casually flicking the tip against the soft skin of her thigh, “Yes, Miss Scott?” he replied dryly.

“Are y-you enjoying yourself?” she gasped sharply, trying to calm her trembling thighs.

“Immensely.” the man’s thick, silky voice sent shivers into her very center. He lowered his mouth against the delicacy he had been offered.

“You taste of warm honey and the sea... you are, quite delectable.” he lovingly kissed the ripe flesh, leisurely flicking his tongue through her sweet nectar.

Liz shook hard as the man’s hot breath brushed tantalizingly over her damp flesh.

As he drew on her center, she felt the delicious pull in her lips and clit as his tongue undulated along the same area.

It felt.... amazing.

“Mr. Reddington,” she mewled brokenly, “I... I really like that.”

Red’s dark eyes shifted, the hungry gaze traveling over the curves of her body, taking in the lovely glow on her face.

Reaching around her naked hip, Red palmed a firm breast, gently tugging at her distended nipple, drawing a long moan from the woman’s beautiful mouth.

He worked his free hand under his chin, his fingers erotically teasing her gateway.

“You’re so soft,” he husked, gently petting her lips with his tongue, “like the richest satin. So seductive... welcoming.”
Gradually sliding inside her molten depths, he grunted lasciviously in his throat when her body closed around his finger, pulling him deeper into its steamy recesses.

“Such a snug embrace,” he stroked the hot little hole deeply, his palm caressing her clitoris lovingly, “I would dearly love to be enfolded in this warm, wet cushion.”

Liz’s body shook, her mind painting the imagery he provided. His words made her truly feel she was the only one in existence that could pleasure him this fully.

His eyes softened on the beauty afforded him. She was so damned sensual...alluring. Her back arched up off the bed, presenting her breasts to his unwavering gaze. The already firm breasts plumped under his every touch.

The soft thatch of hair on her mons tickled his nose and mouth as he dined on the delicately sweet treat. His slick finger brushed against his lip, gifting him with a burst of her essence.

What must this look like, from across the room? He rather enjoyed the image conjured. The idea that his head was between her thighs was enough to make his cock throb with need.

Increasing his suction slightly and the movement of his tongue, he felt the first tell tale signs of her approaching orgasm around his finger...making his sack ache desperately.

“...Re–” she gasped, grappling for a stayhold of reality. She felt the game slipping away by degrees.

Red reached out, lacing his fingers through hers.

“Oh, God...” Liz squeezed his hand fiercely.

How could something so simply base in nature, feel so, intimate? In just seconds, the emotional connection... the love between them was off the scales. Was this love... or lust? He made it feel like the former.

Her heightened breathing hitched with anticipation. Red curled his finger upward, leisurely rubbing the hardened nub inside her in a gentle circular motion.

The woman trembled visibly, her tiny fingers curled tightly into the bedding and his hold.

“Please...” drawing in and holding her breath, Liz tensed further under his touch, hanging on a threshold only he could create, “oh, God... p-please.” she mewed tightly, pleading for his assistance.

Slowly increasing the pressure of his finger, Red felt a burst of wetness cover his knuckles seconds before the throbbing clitoris pulsed under his tongue.

The woman released a sharp cry of release, a cresting wave of shocking sensation running the length of her body.

The unrestrained exclamation of surrender excited him beyond measure. His pleasure soared as she crested, coming hard from his actions.

Her soft thighs brushed erotically against his face, lost in the intense pleasure she was experiencing.

Releasing the light suction, his tongue gentled her pulsing clit, easing her down from her high. She breathed out in short quivering gasps, her spent body collapsing into the plush bedding.

Lifting his face from his pastime, Red gently kissed the small fluttering labia, his eyes softening.
Standing, he leaned over the supine woman, his gaze a very masculine one.

“You are very sweet, Miss Scott.” the man’s warm breath brushed over her pouty mouth, the sweet scent of her arousal filling her nostrils. “I don’t believe I’ve ever had the pleasure of partaking of anything so... exquisite.”

She swallowed, gulping for air, “I hope so, Sir...” her eyes opened, trying to focus her emotional state, still ‘exquisitely’ relaxed and euphoric. “You are enjoying your down time?”

Red’s lips twitched with amusement for the double entendre. She was still very much in the game, he realized. “I am finding this very relaxing. Thank you for your solicitous remarks.”

He dipped his head, kissing between her heaving breasts, nuzzling the pliant flesh, allowing her a moment to catch her breath.

Peppering the flushed skin with open mouth kisses, he inhaled her natural scent, grunting under his breath.

“I do admit to a slight... tenseness which still plagues me somewhat.” his mouth grazed hers, catching her full lips in an eager embrace, “Is this wondrous mouth as perfect as your pussy?”

Curling his fingers around the tie, he gently tugged on the slick fabric, raising Lizzy from her reclined position on the bed.

“You will have to judge that, Sir.” she replied.

“No one has ever complimented your performance?” he seemed shocked.

“Only one man.” she lifted her eyes to his, letting him know without doubt the identity of that man.

“It only takes one...” he murmured, rubbing his thumb studiously over the full mouth.

He pulled at his belt, removing it from its loops before dropping it to the floor. She watched the large hands intent movements, her breathing quickening.

“I trust you are as excited as I to feel that gorgeous mouth wrapped around my cock, Miss Scott?” he asked, popping the top button on his trousers.

“You make my tummy feel... odd when you speak so freely, Sir.” she brushed the flat stomach with an absent swipe. She inched forward, catching her plump lip with her teeth, wetting the coral flesh.

Damn... he loved her eagerness.

“It isn’t your tummy, Miss Scott,” he lifted his brows, “it’s that insatiable little pussy wanting more.”

“And you, Sir? Do you want... more?” she enquired as the man’s large fingers grasped his zipper and pulled it down without ado.

“God, yes.” he hissed. Dropping his hand into the waist of his boxers, he pulled his burgeoning shaft free, presenting it to her. “You’ve made me very hard... as you can see.”

She curled her fingers into the waist of his pants, easing the dark slacks down his hips until his heavy sack was exposed to her view. His erection bobbed heavily, straining towards her.

Her heart beat rapidly seeing the tip all ready glistening. Red was the first man that allowed his emotional state to be shared without excuses or supposed vanity. She found the fact... very arousing.
Liz reached, letting her fingertips dance lightly over his thickened erection.

“That is definitely a move in the right direction,” he breathed out his growing excitement, “please continue.”

Recalling the first time she had done this for him, Lizzy flicked her tongue out experimentally, testing his taste, texture... response.

The large cock bounced at her teasing touch, before searching for her in earnest. The heavy weight lifted towards her, catching on her lip.

There was something almost sinful seeing his cock jutting out between the tails of his shirt. She almost felt like she was actually committing the scenario he had provided her... blowing her boss in his office, or his room, as it were. What a naughty little thought. And so very thrilling.

Inching forward, Liz let his crown slip between her rosebud lips, drawing a rumbling groan from the man.

Red’s eyes slid closed as she traced a searing path along the ridge of his glans. The pink muscle of her tongue widened, the agile organ cradling him, gently suckling the underside of his shaft.

He raptly watched the woman ease closer, the tip of his cock sliding smoothly into her hot, humid mouth. His lips parted allowing him the oxygen needed for she literally had taken his breath away.

Moving back and forth, she wet him in increments, taking a little more each time until she hit her limit. She drew back, allowing him to slide wetly past her pouty lips only to have his thickness caught in the sure grip of her tiny hand.

Slowly pumping the velvet hard flesh, she looked up at him, those powerful eyes making contact. The man’s breathing increased as Lizzy settled his cockhead far back in her mouth, joining the two forces together, stroking him in unison.

She held his eyes seductively, an invitation issued. One a man could not ever mistake for anything but what it was.

“My competition did not lie,” Red moaned eagerly, threading his fingers through her hair, “you give excellent head.”

Liz hummed her appreciation of his compliment. Cupping his ball sack, she pulled at him a little, directing the man to come closer. Red followed the gentle directive, his head falling back in ecstasy as he watched her cheeks hollow, enclosing his shaft in the slick cushion of her mouth.

“Yes, that is so very good,” he praised her work, “...suck me with that little mouth.”

Stroking him, she went as far as she could comfortably go, before withdrawing. Red’s brows furrowed, instantly missing the warmth, only to feel her tongue flickering against his frenulum seconds later.

“God...” he sighed blissfully, “stroke your tongue right there,” she did as asked, rubbing his pleasure spot, “...yes...”

She really loved Red Reddington. She especially loved the man for giving her guidance at such a crucial moment. It made this so much easier. She felt much more confident that she was pleasing the man, maybe as much as he pleased her.
“You’re so hard,” she lifted a sad little face.

Red’s cock pulsed, affected by the emphatic, forlorn features, “...Jesus.” he breathed shakily.

She kissed the fat tip, her lips soft against the hard surface, “I knew you needed me.”

“God, Elizabeth,” his body, his heart... ached with need, “I do...so damn much.”

Forcing his eyes open, Red focused on the pink muscle flitting about his cock head. She flattened it one second, rubbing against him so perfectly... only to flicker about the next second, almost mimicking a vibrator set against the sensitive flesh.

The sight of his cock setting in her open mouth and the agile tongue pleasuring him made his sack pull up tight in preparation to unload. He desperately wanted to see his cum shoot into that delicious little...

He pulled away abruptly, bending to kiss her swollen mouth hungrily which silenced any protest she harbored.

Grasping her thigh, Red tugged at her unexpectedly, once again felling the woman unto her back.

“Oh!” she startled as he pushed at her leg, opening her body to him.

Red’s hand encircled his shaft, squeezing the engorged tip until the need to come abated just enough.

Rubbing the large glistening head against Lizzy’s clit, he pushed against the warm skin urgently.

“I need this, Miss Scott.” he set his crown at her opening, further wetting his weeping cock.

She closed her legs about his hips, stilling him. “...Sir, I thought we decided–”

Red nuzzled his thickening against her, further opening the woman to his upcoming intrusion, “You wanted me to feel better, yes?” he questioned roughly.

“Well,” she pouted just enough to portray indecision, “...yes.”

“Then you just relax, sweetheart.” he urged, pushing past her tight hole. “I’ll make us feel better in no time.”

Liz gasped shakily as the man nudged his way in, opening her easily.

“It seems your body agrees with me.” he grunted. “Look how easily you’re accepting me.”

Liz found it difficult to keep her part in the act in play. All she really wanted was for the man to fuck her raw. But she managed to lift doubtful eyes.

“Are you on the pill?” Red played the game to perfection however.

She searched his face, wishing she knew which answer would turn him on the most, “...No, Sir.”

“Even better...” he grunted roughly. “How fortunate for me.”

Her heart rate increased. Her gamble had paid off. He had run with it, just as she hoped he would.

Liz feebly pushed at his chest, “You are so... large, Mr. Reddington.”

“I need to mount this amazing pussy of yours, Miss Scott.” Red muttered heatedly against her mouth, pulling the tie from about her neck.

She felt the man grasp her wrists, the tie quickly wrapped about them in a make-shift cuff.

“Now you be a good girl...” he panted, easing his hips forward, “and get comfortable,” he suggested, sliding his erection inside her welcoming body, “because there is nothing more intoxicating or thrilling than fucking unprotected pussy and I plan to thoroughly enjoy myself.”

“But, sir...” Liz panted heavily, slightly resisting as Red pulled at the tie, raising her arms above her head.

Red leaned into the binding, holding the woman captive. He thrust slowly against her opening, his eyes lit with passion.

“Not to fret, Miss Scott.” he groaned, feeling her slick lips part for him, “...you have my word.”

Liz felt a surge of excitement in her tummy. She was thoroughly enjoying watching Red enjoy his gift.

She loved playing with Red because he got into his part so well. But tonight, it felt on the edge already, he was so lost in the fantasy.

“Miss Scott...” he moaned breathlessly, sliding out to the tip, before pushing his way ardently back in.

“You’re such a tiny thing,” he grunted his approval, “aren’t you?”

“Don’t go so deep, Sir...please,” she mewled her disappointment as he eased out. Damn him.

“Even as little as you are,” a tightness rumbled in his throat, “I bet you’ll accept my entire cock,” he crooned his encouragement, “won’t you.”

“I... I’m not sure, Mr. Reddington... if I can.” she pursed her lips, her brow furrowing at the intense sensation of the thick organ spreading her sensitive opening wide.

“Honey, I know you’re going to...” was his soundly stated assurance.

Her sex throbbed in response to his confident demands. Liz truly wished for nothing more than to fulfill those demands.

Red braced his arms, glancing down to where their bodies were connected. He truly would never tire of the sight of his cock spreading her open.

“Look at us, Miss Scott.” he directed her eyes to where his were fixated. Grasping the tie in his hand, he lifted her slightly, allowing the action.

Liz shivered at the visual of their union. How utterly erotic was that sight. She loved feeling him inside, deeply connected to her.

So much so, she felt her body open involuntarily, welcoming his invasion.

“Yes...” Red sighed contentedly, “relax for me, honey.” he murmured, feeling every nuance her body experienced.

Leaning, he eagerly caught her mouth, his tongue slipping sensually past her parted lips. Kissing her greedily, he increased the passion of their kiss moment by moment.
Their tongues mingled as one for a brief interval which filled the man with a glow of lustful thoughts.

Cupping her ass in his hand, he drew her up into his next thrust, sliding deep inside her moist cavern.

“Shit...” he groaned brokenly, enjoying the ride, shoving in further to better feel the sensations. “Yes, open wide for me.”

He nudged her cervix relentlessly. Lifting her leg against his side, Red slid even further, until Liz’s thighs shook at the extreme sensation the pressure provided.

Grasping her full bottom in hand, Red tilted her small body easily.

Liz slit her eyes lazily, looking at the man as he concentrated on his task, “What are you doing?” she questioned breathlessly.

Adjusting her slim hips, Red manipulated his cock in to the hilt, forcing a raw, quivering cry from her throat.

“Shh....” he soothed, his breathing heavy and labored. He had never taken her so deeply. Always holding back, mindful of her sensibilities and needs.

His erection throbbed joyfully, finally being fully encased in her dripping heat.

The meaty shaft flexed, leaving a searing ache in Liz’s core that was so fucking mind bending, she wanted the feeling to go on forever.

Even with her eyes closed, her vision wavered in and out with an excitement which built exponentially. Her mouth was parched from breathless pants.

Her senses reeled.

Her body desperately fought to adjust to his invasion. The heavy weight of his erection pushed against her, the fat shaft spreading her wide like never before.

Red barely controlled a rather animalistic urge to fuck the hell out of the minuscule little hole.

The woman’s face lit with the most torturous rapture he had ever seen grace her features.

Liz’s thighs trembled uncontrollably against his sides as he nudged his hips, keeping his cock firmly in place.

“Am I hurting you?” Red murmured tenderly, his nose brushing affectionately against the side of her face.

“Uhm...” she swallowed with difficulty, “...no.” her eyes fluttered open, looking up at the man. It was a type of pain he caused but certainly not the one he meant.

“Can you feel me?” he slowly swiveled his hips, driving his cock deeper, prodding the sensitive tissue.

A rush of air left his mouth as her body clenched when he moved the large helmet of his shaft across the rounded bump inside her. The hardened opening of her cervix teased his glans, drawing a stream of pre-cum from his slit, slicking the surface further.

“Oh!” she gasped sharply, pulling at the binding of the tie instinctively which chafed her delicate wrists now. “Jesus...yes,” she fought for clarity, “I f-feel....” she was feeling so very much at this state of the game.

Red relaxed into her soft curves, his thick chest pressing into her breasts. He savored her condition knowing he was the cause.

Slowly pumping his hips, he nestled his face into her neck line nibbling the delicate skin. The incessant thrumming beat of her pulse point traveled the length of his tongue.

“That feels good... doesn’t it?” he nuzzled her jaw line, growling deeply as his crown snapped past that tight band he prodded so persistently.

“Mr. Reddin–” Liz mewed, raising her hips into the delicious assault. “P-Please...” she whimpered, her breath taken away for a long beat. She pushed her breasts into his chest as some sort of appeasement.

Red’s decision was cast. He released his grip on the binding, lifting his weight from her body, leaving her to feel the chill of the room.

Liz focused intently on the man who tugged at the knot of the tie around his neck until the silk unraveled in his large hands.

His darkened gaze swept her sinuous frame, heightening her senses. His thick fingers leisurely pulled at the buttons on his shirt.

She feasted her eyes on the wealth of hair covering his broad chest as it became exposed. There was something disturbingly masculine about that sight.

Red’s cock twitched at the satisfied sound she emitted. He wasn’t afraid to admit, he was pleased she found him attractive. She pleasured him in so many ways, it was a relief to know he returned the favor occasionally.

She licked her lips, wriggling in anticipation. She missed the heat of his body against hers.

“Does this meet with your approval?” he grasp her wrist, laying her palm against his chest. Did he need to actually hear her say it?

She nodded jerkily, threading her fingers through the fine hair, “...Yes.” she whispered, a rush of emotion washing over her.

Leaning, he lay the mat of hair on her soft skin. He sighed his satisfaction as her breasts pushed against his taut chest, the pliant flesh pillowing his weight.

Liz encircled his shoulders, curling her fingers into his nape, scratching him soothingly. She got lost in the amazing sensation of his downy pelt tickling her nipples and clit.

She wrapped him in a cocoon of her silky legs, urging him closer still.

Red obliged the silent request, sinking into the delectable body once again.

He allowed a couple inches of his shaft to remain free, increasing the tightness of her pleasurable hold around the ramrod flesh.

“I knew you’d love it deep.” slipping his erection deep back within the confines of her opening, causing beads of perspiration to appear on his brow. “Look how wet you are for me.” he praised.
Liz tightened her core to encourage the man to increase his depth and speed of his thrusts.

She tensed around and under him in preparation of what was to come, holding her breath the closer she got to climax.

“God, my cock is so fucking hard...” Red groaned the realization.

He was right, his cock was hard... and so thick. Even as wet as she was, the heavy drag of his erection spread her, manipulating every inch of her sensitive core. The rigid flesh rubbed against her lips and clit to perfection.

A sudden jolt of his head shoving past a tightness deep inside the recesses of her body, left her soaking wet.

The liquid sound of him sliding inside her body was so arousing, so intimate a sound. Her body gifted him with more lubrication, exciting them both.

Liz felt so completely full and content, yet so vulnerable, as the man took possession of her body.

Drawing him closer, she fixated on his hard body pressed against her. She absolutely adored everything about how the man felt.

His size seemed to dwarf her, which made her feel protected and cherished. That wealth of hair which tantalized her softer skin... and his smell. It was comforting and arousing at once.

Red’s powerful arms drew her as close as humanly possible. Allowing her to feel every inch of his body, increasing the intimacy of the act they shared.

The muscles in his arms bulged and flexed around her with his assertive thrusts. She had a slight fixation on that man’s arm that bordered on addictive.

“Harder....” she mewed desperately, “...sir.”

Wrapping an arm about her waist, he lifted her negligible weight, curving her back, allowing the full length of his textured shaft slide hard down her straining core. She quivered around him, striving towards the release she desperately sought.

There was nothing Red loved more in this world than watching Elizabeth treading the rapturous edge of orgasm... but listening to the woman getting off sent shivers down his spine every single time. The sharp short bursts of her excitement grew closer and more acute as she neared the vortex of bliss she craved.

He had never heard anything so fucking arousing.

“You make the most sensuous sounds when a man is fucking you.” the man’s husky voice lowered intimately. “Are you always like this, or is this just for me?”

“...Y-You.” she gasped shakily, her little face lit with ecstasy.

“This is just for me...” his deep voice resonated with pleasure.

She nodded quickly, catching those torturous sounds as best she could in her throat, knowing they signaled her weakness for the man. She quelled the trembling in her lips, biting down on the plump redness determinedly.

“No, no...” Red thumbed her chin, gently breaking her lip free of its confinement, “let me hear how much you love my cock fucking you.”

Bunching his fingers in her hair, held her head stationary, drawing her into a deep kiss, sucking at her bottom lip teasingly, “Your tiny pussy is squeezing me so tight...it feels heavenly.”

The woman tensed under him, coiling rigidly. Stretching her bound arms above her head, Lizzy clutched at the bedding. Her breasts, free from confinement, bounced sensually with their frantic movements of... lovemaking.

“Let me feel you come, Miss Scott.” Red urged. “Which will... make me come...”

Planting her heels on the edge of the bed, she rolled her hips, expertly thrusting against his downstroke.

“Fuck...” he watched the show with heated eyes, “Miss Scott you follow direction so well,” he gritted his ever growing awareness of the woman’s abilities, “fucking come on my cock...”

Releasing an expulsion of air, she cried out, shaking violently. Her legs clutched as his sides, trembling with the explosive release.

Red pushed against her clitoris, rubbing along the swollen nub. Grasping her ass in his hands, he quickened his pace, thrusting into the quivering depths.

“So beautiful....” Red rasped, “you are so breathtaking... when you come.”

He lithe body arched gracefully as an unearthly glow lit the woman’s features, her body shimmering radiantly in the flickering candlelight. She appeared like some magical sprite basking in the warmth of dawn.

“Jesus Christ...” Red’s gasped his awe, running a large palm between her full breasts. The pounding rhythm of her heart beating erratically under his touch.

Red quickened his pace, driving the sound from Lizzy as he drew her orgasm out, making his quickly approach.

“Shit...” he panted harshly, reaching between them quickly, he made to grasp his cock but was blocked from doing so by Lizzy’s legs tightening around him.

“Lizzy...” he gritted, too close to the precipice to even try remaining in the game. “I need to come dammit!”

“...Stay.” she whispered urgently.

“I promis–”

“Please...” she moved into his thrust, keeping him in place, “stay.”

Red weighed his options, coming up most undecided.

Game or not, he had given his word. But Lizzy was damning the game, wanted him to do something that went against his grain.

But he promised...

Hooking her knee with his hand, he pulled, breaking her hold on him. Once free, he quickly eased his fingers inside her core, before taking his cock in hand.
Pumping his over sensitized flesh, he felt Lizzy clench around his fingers. His cum forcefully exploded from his slit, the thick strands landing over her tummy and mound.

Liz whimpered at the loss but made do with the substitute the man offered. She stubbornly raised her hips, directing the continuing thick streams to hit her labia, enjoying the warm bath.

Red exhaled shakily at the sight of his essence marking her, which left him feeling oddly fulfilled in a way he hadn’t expected.

Sliding back into her opening, he moaned deeply as the scorching heat of her core engulfed him.

He said he would pull out... true. But he had not promised anything more.

The head of his shaft pulsed, the heavy shaft constricting repeatedly, giving them both a sense of utter contentment.

Slowly pumping his hips, the tip dribbled the last of his orgasm as he watched her slowly trail her fingers over her tummy and through the thick cum.

“I said you coul–”

“I know what you said.” he could not pretend anything other than pure indulgence at this stage. “But I did promise.” he grasped her bound hands, easily tugging the knot free with a little jerk.

Liz smiled, realizing she could have broken free anytime she had wished.

Navy guys and their knots...

“Some promises are meant to be broken.” she reminded, pseudo-stern. The man wrapped himself about her body, warding off the sudden chill. She cuddled to him.

“In regards to you...” he kissed her softly, “it’s a very hard habit to break.”

Gathering her in his arms, he snuggled the woman close. His eyes grew heavy at the feeling of his cum wetting his abdomen.

“Besides, the visual was very stimulating.” Red sighed happily. “At least, for my part.”

“Silas said it meant, a man was pissing a circle around his woman.” she wrapped her arms about the man’s shoulders, rubbing her fingers into his scalp. She smiled when Red pushed into the contact, a rumbling moan vibrating through his chest.

“What the hell were you two discussing for such a topic to arise.” Red muttered, dropping a smoldering kiss to her swollen mouth.

“The Dow Jones Average.” she quipped. “There is something seriously wrong with that man.”

They lay snuggling against one another, exchanging small intimate kisses, quietly coming down from their former exertions. Lizzy shivered in his arms which signaled the end of a very wondrous event.

Sighing, Red rolled from the bed, disappearing into the bath for a time. Emerging, he flicked a low lamp on, a warm cloth in hand.

He took great care in cleaning his essence from her curvy frame. A quick wash set him to rights.
Covering her with a nearby plush throw, he slid into his robe. Holding up a hand to ward off any questions, he disappeared through the main door.

Liz snuggled into the warmth, the cushy blanket feeling luxurious against her sated flesh. She hoped against hope, the man was informing the guys he was staying in for the rest of the evening.

Red came back moments later with a rolling tray loaded down with some fancy treats, a small bouquet of fragrant roses and an ice bucket and two glasses.

“Champagne?” he asked, his mood a cheery one indeed. He sat the ice bucket aside, flipping the fragile glassware between his nimble fingers with a flourish.

She smiled brightly, nodding her acquiesce. Her fingers traced the delicate petals of the flowers, absentmely watching the man pour the bubbly liquid.

He sat beside her, tinkling his glass against the one he offered.

“Happy anniversary, baby.” he smiled gently at her, his eyes a loving caress.

Liz could not think of a more fitting end to their day.

“I can’t wait to celebrate many more with you.” Red replied seriously, before sipping the cooled beverage.

“Happy anniversary.” she responded in kind, partaking of the chilled, bubbly drink. Her heart filled with love and gratitude for the kind man Red Reddington had turned out to be.

She had always loved champagne during a celebratory moment. It was so effervescent and light, just like she felt inside.

Red smiled as the bubbly drink tickled her, making her nose wrinkle adorably.

He stretched his arm out, hooking his jacket. “I got you a gift to celebrate the wonderful occasion.”

“You didn’t have to...” Liz winced, her guilt returning. “I haven’t had a chance to get y–”

“You gave me exactly what I wanted.” the man silenced her worry with a gentle kiss, his look making her believe him. “You’re the best gift any man could have, Elizabeth.”

She smiled softly, a well of excitement knotting in her stomach as a gaily wrapped gift was handed over.

She tore into it, flipping the box open, her heart skipping a beat at the exquisite sight which greeted her.

“You do know, the way you buy me jewelry...” she chuckled, lifting the gift aloft, her eyes glittering with tears, “someone will suspect I’m a kept woman.”

She ran her finger over the diamonds, tracing the shape of the eternity symbol wrapped about a heart.

“Red... this is just too much... even for you.” she shook her head woefully but couldn’t take her eyes off her prize.

“I would very much like to keep you...” Red murmured quietly, “which is why I vetoed Google’s suggestion of only flowers and a freaking poem...”
In fact, he had searched for days for what to give her. He had planned to take them on a short stay at his Villa in Italy, and still would love to. But he had happened upon this bracelet and it seemed perfect for a month anniversary gift.

Red had gifted jewelry to Lizzy before. He was now aware of what sentimental value it held for the woman.

He hoped that this gift would be just as important due to it’s deeply personal meaning.

He happily watched her lovingly running her fingers over the pendant. “...For a more substantial gift, professing my commitment to you.” he continued. “Not too over-the-top?”

Liz lifted shimmering eyes, listening to him intently, “It’s absolute perfection.”

“I chose a visual reminder of what I wish for us,” his finger joined hers, tracing the looping figure, “...an eternity of love.”

Only Red Reddington could have taken such a simplistic milestone and made it so... wonderful and memorable.

It was only a month. But it had been such an amazing month they had weathered together. Through the ups and downs, they had been at each others side, been partners in every sense of the word.

“I don’t think I can ever top this.” she stared at the bracelet. “Words can’t express...” how much this gesture truly meant to her, she finished the thought to herself.

He was here. And would always be here, she sensed it now, her heart swelling with elation and love. A tear ran down her cheek as she looked down at the symbolism of their future journey, a surge of happiness overwhelming her.

She chuckled under her breath, looking adoringly up at the man.

“So, I don’t get a romantic quote or anything?” she sniffled, teasing him. “An Irish limerick?”

Red’s mouth twitched at the corner, his eyes lighting with joy. “Is there anyone in particular you wish me to quote?”

The man was somewhat proud of his ability to recite famous quotes.

“Why, Shakespeare of course.” she lifted her pert nose airily.

Red looked down at his champagne a moment, swirling the sparkling fluid before lifting intense eyes. He considered many, choosing an apt expression.

“I would not wish any companion in the world but you...” he said, his stare a fixed, earnest one.

“...Another.” she clasped his hand, touched by the intent behind the lovely words.

Red didn’t think he could top the last statement but he searched his mind, lifting his glass...

“Time is very slow for those you wait, very fast for those who are scared,” he ran a gentle thumb against the scar on her wrist...her worry stone, “very long for those who lament, very short for those who celebrate,” he paused, holding her gaze, “but for those who love... time is eternal.”

“How do you quote such beautiful things so effortlessly?” she questioned. “How can you remember
“When you love someone as deeply as I do you,” he began slowly, feeling his way, “the words are an outlet of the emotions I feel inside.”

“What else do you feel?” she asked, hypnotized by the man’s supposed passion for her. “I can’t get enough, it seems.” she was enthralled.

“You found parts of me that I didn’t know existed...” he glanced at their joined hands studiously for a long beat, “and in you,” he sought her out, “I found a love I no longer believed was real.”

Liz inhaled shakily, astounded that Red seemingly felt the same way as she was at this exact moment. She never thought she could love wholeheartedly after Tom... that she would ever find anything real and concrete in her life again...

And she certainly never expected Red would uncover unknown depths of emotions that were inside her... some so hidden away, she hadn’t been aware they even existed.

“By my soul, I can neither eat, drink, nor sleep;” he continued unprompted, “nor, what’s still worse,” he lifted her small hand, gently kissing each finger tenderly “love any woman in the world but her.”

He lifted his eyes, a light shining in the blue depths. “If you live to be a hundred, I hope I live to be a hundred minus one day, so I never have to live without you.”

Liz frowned, vaguely recalling the quote from somewhere... “I know that one.”

She dug into her memories, frustration rising when she couldn’t quite grasp hold of the elusive quote. She lifted questioning eyes, finding his lips twitching in open amusement.

“Winnie the Pooh.”

“Oh, bother!” she laughed softly, playfully swatting her hand at the man.

Red chuckled as he recaptured it, bring it to his mouth. “You are my heart, my life...” the man’s tongue flicked her palm sensually, his eyes holding hers willfully, “my one and only thought.”

Liz’s heart calmed. Scooting closer to the man, she wrapped an arm about his shoulder, her fingers gingerly dancing about the man’s shoulder blades.

Leaning, her breast brushed erotically against the mat of hair covering his chest, her lips grazing his.

“I ask you to pass through life at my side - to be my second self, and best earthly companion.” she murmured softly, offering her own outlet of emotion.

Closing in, she completed the kiss. Red pulled her closer into his warm embrace, deepening the powerful connection until all worldly thoughts faded away for a brief second in time.

Slowly parting, their returned breaths mingled as one, brushing against tender mouths and aroused flesh.

Without a word, Red removed the long stemmed flute from her hand and stood, taking his glass along with him to the bar. He shut down the far light, leaving them in the soft glow of the bedside lamp.

He tossed his robe casually across a nearby chair as he passed.
Turning towards her, the man’s cock jut out proudly. The long, thick flesh, framed by light lush hair, bobbed heavily as he walked slowly back to her.

Liz’s heart quickened at the sight. He was so impressive a specimen. So masculine.

As the man neared, the sight of his full scrotum bulging against the tightening skin increased the wetness between Liz’s thighs. She was shocked at how easily he could arouse her body.

And mind. She never had a lover speak to her like Red did. She loved it.

Red’s eyes closed rapturously as he scented the heady aroma of Lizzy’s arousal in the air, a bead of liquid collecting on the thick head of his shaft in response.

She unconsciously held her breath, sensing his emotional state. The heavy appendage twitched noticeably, affected by her attention.

Liz’s breath quickened, her breasts rising and falling rhythmically which enthralled Red’s senses, the beautiful sloping curves pulling his attention like a magnet.

The longer he stood, prolonging the ecstasy of their agony, the better the final release would be, he knew and yet, his impatience was rapidly nearing its end.

Lifting her chin, he broke her avid gaze to fixate on his impassioned one. Her open and eager expression warmed his heart with the most pleasant sensation.

He lowered his mouth to hers, the kiss a most reverent one.

“I love you,” he murmured against the pouty mouth, “...Miss Scott.”

He smiled softly as the woman exhaled shakily, her mouth ardently seeking his.

“...I love you, Mr. Reddington.” she replied breathlessly, feeling a ghost of his heat brush against her sensitive flesh.

Blindly taking the box from her hands, Red turned slightly, sitting it on the side table.

Liz impulsively reached out, her small hand enveloping the stiff rod. She leaned, bringing the glistening tip to the warm flick of her tongue, catching the droplet of arousal weeping from his stiff erection.

Red’s breath caught sharply as the warm impression of her touch swept his frame, the searing caress igniting him.

“Baby...” he sighed brokenly, “you have no idea how much I love how you suck cock,” he praised, even as he pulled back, “but this,” he ran his forefinger over her plush lips, his brow furrowed as he watched its trek, “is not where I envisioned coming.”

The woman scowled at him, not certain she liked the turn of events.

Red pulled her from the bed, kissing her mouth roughly for a long beat.

Searching his face, her mouth fell slowly, the pretty pink lips pouting invitingly. “I want to do this for you.”

She truly did. She felt bad still. Her gift certainly did not equal his in her mind. But she knew Red enjoyed oral sex. Why was he refusing to allow her this small thing?
Red eyes softened, knowing the woman’s thoughts.

“Being intimate with you,” he brushed back her wild hair, “is the best gift I could imagine receiving.” he told the truth. “And I’m not just talking about sex.” he stressed. “I am perfectly content to snuggle on the couch and talk.”

She idly traced his collarbone, her finger tracing a scar there, listening to the words, hearing the truth in them, but still...

She felt his large erect shaft poke against her stomach, before lifting playful eyes, “But you’re not going to turn down the sex either, right?” she felt better suddenly.

“Hell, no.” he husked, his large palm wrapping about her bottom. Lifting her effortlessly, she wrapped her legs about his waist, settling into his hold. She trusted him implicitly, casually draping her arms across his shoulders for the duration.

“Baby,” he took a few steps with his passenger, “we’ve only just begun our journey. I don’t know about you, but I intend to mark each occasion we achieve.” he said. “What’s important is sharing those milestones together, recognizing their importance.” he stressed. “Not stressing over whether we had time to go shopping for a gift.”

“You got me a gift.” she reminded peevishly.

“And I got mine...” he reminded post-haste. “All wrapped up in a pretty package.” his eyes traversed his gift lecherously. “It had a bow on it and everything.”

“It was a tie.” she corrected, finally smiling, truly understanding this private time was just what Red wanted. “You’re just so hard to shop for... that’s all.”

He tipped the nearby bottle, pouring the sparkling fluid in the tall glass, “You can never go wrong with what God himself gave.... and God knows I don’t need another damn wallet.”

Taking a mouthful, he offered the glass to her. He easily supported her weight, the freed hand reaching to heft her breast. He played contentedly while she drained the glass and sat it back on the bar.

Liz sighed delightedly when the man made his way back towards the bed, his shaft thumping soundly against her bottom as they moved.

“About that little promise you made,” she frowned, as Red sat her on her feet, looking down at her patiently, “don’t do it again.”

She reminded him of his previous withdrawal, apparently less than pleased with the action he had taken.

“I will do as I please, Miss Scott.” the man scowled right back, though his eyes were lit with an odd, enticing light as she pouted back at him. “Especially when it’s play time.”

“I missed you...” she countered, her mouth drooping, “your warmth.” she would use ‘what God gave her’ to get her way in this instance.

“You act as if I’m done with you.” he muttered against her neckline. He smiled when the woman opened to his attention. “We have all night, you know.”

“But the deadline, Mr. Reddington...” she fluttered her large blue eyes up at him, rejoining the game.
“Fuck the deadline,” he stated heatedly.

“Sir?” she fought the grin wanting to escape her sweet lips when Red eased effortlessly back into his role.

“Or better still, Miss Scott...” he whispered roughly. “Bend over the bed, so that I might fuck... you.”

“How crass, Mr. Reddington.” she mused thoughtfully.

He turned her about, butting his erection up against her cute little ass.

“Get use to it.” he husked, running a large palm over the small rump. “I have a feeling this...diversion will happen frequently.”

Wrapping his hands about her hips, he dragged her back against his pelvis, snarling quietly as his fingers touched along her abdomen. She was so tiny in comparison to him, a surge of protectiveness overcame the man for a fleeting second.

A deep seated need to fuck her overrode his common decency for once.

What he was experiencing was incredibly animalistic, he was sure. He realized, he had never wanted to rut anyone as badly as he did Elizabeth at this moment.

There was something deep inside him, a carnal lust growing, gnawing at his psyche...a need to mount and mate her. To come deep inside her... filling her womb with his seed.

Fuck... if she only knew how badly he wished for that eventuality... it might shake her idealistic view of him.

The soft damp curls of her sex teased his sack and shaft, driving his innate humanity aside. He allowed it.

“I want to see that luscious pussy open wide for me... again.”

Lifting the woman until her toes barely touched the floor, he took in the beautiful sight of body opening for his pleasure.

His cock fell perfectly against her slick labia, his large bulb parting her swollen flesh effortlessly, drawing a long, breathy moan from the woman’s mouth.

“Miss Scott...” the man’s voice roughened as he slid slowly into her heat.

She mewed as his girth spread her wide, “That feels so... wonderful, Mr. Reddington.”

“I can absolutely promise you,” he hissed as his sack pressed against her clit, “I will not be pulling out this time.”

Liz’s mouth curved sensually, “...Whatever you think best, sir.”

There were gifts, it seemed.

And then there was... the perfect gift.

Maybe she had hit upon it after all...

June 6

Red lay quietly, his eyes hazily focused on the lights from the city reflecting overhead on the ceiling, his thoughts serene... contemplative.

It seemed only a short time ago he, too keyed up from his earlier exertions with Elizabeth, awoke from a short, refreshing nap.

He shifted his interest.

Silently watching the woman beside him sleep, Red’s sated gaze traveled the expanse of Lizzy’s lithe frame, hesitating on small slivers of flesh that had peeked out from under the rumpled sheets covering her body.

The man often found himself rendered speechless by her ethereal beauty.

How many times he found himself enraptured by the sight of that long hair laying against the curvature of her spine, just tickling the flaring curve of her waist and full bottom.

His heart quickened when the woman shifted beside him, baring the long line of leg to his appreciative gaze.

Slipping his hand under the luxurious sheet, his fingers danced idly over her stomach before curving about the woman’s waist.

His sack contracted when the woman sighed sleepily, moaning softly at his touch. The sound added to his heightened arousal.

He covertly eased his bulky frame over the woman’s recumbent form, bracing himself on threaded and rippling forearms.

The tension built when Lizzy shifted once more, relaxing under his intent, sensing his proximity.

As he bared Elizabeth’s body to his gaze, the ache in his groin became unbearable.

His cock stirred, brushing against the springy curls of her sex. A low unexpected snarl escaped from his throat.

His palm cupped her breast, the giving flesh conformed to his gentle and exploratory hold. The memory of tenderly laving that coral hued nipple into a crinkled whirl was imprinted on his tongue. He itched to take it in his mouth and suckle her once again.
Red found himself spellbound every time Elizabeth removed the silk or lace cradle which restrained those glorious breasts.

Once he had been in the phone, distracted, admittedly... annoyed with the inefficiency of the world in general when he had halted all speech or coherent thought, at Lizzy’s thoughtless actions.

The woman released her breasts from confinement innocently changing into a more relaxed outfit.

Those pert breasts bounced as they lost the battle to gravity, falling into their natural slope. The gentle sway of the soft, pliable flesh mesmerized him as did the way her nipples puckered in the cool air of the room.

Her breasts alone could inspire poetry.

The natural essence of the woman was most hypnotic.

In stealth like fashion, Red inched his way around her body, basking in the silky feel of her skin brushing tantalizingly against his.

Gently nudging his warm hand against her thigh, he coaxed her legs to open, allowing him a warm nest in which he settled comfortably.

The man’s eyes lit with repressed fire at the first sight of Elizabeth’s form.

Her little lips and adorable clitoris were so damned physically appealing. Even her grooming left him sexually stimulated.

Red often wondered if women were as excited by the sight of their lovers?

Inhaling deeply, his heart raced as he took in the rich scent along with the evocative musky aroma of their love making which tinged her delicate flesh.

His hot breath whispered sensually over Elizabeth’s still form. She stirred slightly.

Red nuzzled into the caressing touch of one silky thigh brushing against his cheek. He stilled, waiting patiently until she settled once more.

Leaning, he tenderly placed his mouth against the hot, inviting surface awaiting his exploration.

Red had always enjoyed going down on his partners. It was an activity he not only excelled... if he said so himself. It also made his cock ramrod hard.

The sensation of having such a private area in one’s mouth was... exhilarating. The texture, taste, response... all women varied.

He was lucky to have been on the receiving end of some beautiful and delicious variety in his day.

But never one like Lizzy’s.

Female genitalia, the vagina specifically had been described as many things in fiction. A flower budding or delicate petals shimmering with rain after a spring storm... among other things.

His Naval buddies, less than subtle in their attempt at prose, described it as an exclamation point. The long line punctuated by the little hole beneath it, certainly took on the appearance of one. And if they were all honest, nothing inspired exclamation more than seeing or feeling a woman’s God given gift.
If he were asked to describe the female form... Red would personally compare the stunning vision to an intricate, elusive, butterfly.

Elizabeth’s in particular entranced and amazed him.

If he had to be poetic about it; when aroused, the woman’s plump, wet labia... took the shape of bountiful dew covered wings spread open in flight.

If one were being technical, the woman’s labia mimicked a butterfly’s wings in appearance. Rounded at the top and tapering in the center, they drew attention to that delicious little center he so coveted.

Could one truly describe such a masterpiece? How many songs, poems and art were based on this marvel?

Adam himself disobeyed God for access to Eve’s... virtues.

Red never really saw himself as a religious man. But after first hearing the story, he had to question what the hell Adam had been thinking, disobeying God, of all beings.

He immediately had to rethink his stance after first having sex. It hadn’t been perfect, but God... had it been delectable. Kept him on an euphoric high for days.

Yes, God was all powerful and all knowing. But what had he been thinking by giving Adam access to Eve, arguably the most perfect woman in history... then making Adam chose between her and the established rules?

Simplistically put, granted. But Red himself would have failed miserably had the decision been left to him.

There was a reason men fought... and died throughout the ages for women.

Dueling was defined as a chivalrous act, defending a woman’s honor. And he wouldn’t argue with that honorable act.

But Red knew damn well knew the other reason behind the issue at hand.

Men were defending the one thing they wanted most in this world. And if killing off the competition was required, so be it.

If he were honest with himself, Red had gladly been an active participant in just such a contest. He had beat Brad within an inch of his life to defend Elizabeth’s honor, yes.

But also, to simply remind the other man of the established ‘rules’.

And any man present realized the battle was a clear indication Red was laying claim to what he considered marked territory.

Elizabeth belonged to him. It was so ridiculously simple.

However you wished to view it, and he often wondered what a woman’s perspective would be...

For a man that one little mound of ecstasy, was everything. The be-all, end-all.

Yes, Elizabeth had many virtues that captivated him any given moment of the day, but one stood out each time she came into view. Sooner or later, carnal lust would enter into the picture.
To be allowed the privilege of intimacy on that special level with a female... moved a man’s emotions like nothing else.

Red’s body shook with excitement and anticipation whenever the woman willingly parted her legs, allowing him a full view of the smattering of dark curls damp with her arousal.

He had a hell of a time controlling himself watching the woman writhe about, as eager for their joining as he, himself.

After he had finally been awarded the ability to feel her in the flesh... he almost lost all sense of himself in the wonder and awe of the emotional onslaught he experienced.

When he set his cockhead at the entrance of that steamy opening and felt the small flutterings as Elizabeth prepared to take him in, with the well of her arousal wetting his way... it was a fucking euphoric moment he cherished.

When her folds parted and collapsed back around his glans as his girth demanded entrance into that tight hold... he honestly wondered if this was what it felt like being allowed entrance to heaven.

When that center pulled at him, tugging him deeper into the secret recesses of her body, his mind exploded with rapture... he truly never experienced such ecstasy.

And that ‘special’ connection, the love that was present... was absolute bliss.

Even though they had not verbally expressed the words... Red felt the depth of that emotional connection he had been dreaming of building with Elizabeth.

They said so much in that simple act, even when nothing was said at all.

Men were stupid, Red realized a long time ago.

Men constantly searched out the wonders of the world when in reality, they had to look no further than between a woman’s thighs to find the most wondrous of all.

Gently kissing the still reddened flesh, his mouth curved when the small alcove responded to his attention, unlike its owner, who still slept peacefully.

The cradle that held him so lovingly filled with the heady aroma that was all Lizzy.

He very much enjoyed her sharp intake of breath when she roused from her slumber to find him gingerly licking her slit.

Only when he was positive he had Elizabeth’s undivided attention, did he take her still engorged and sensitive clitoris in his mouth.

Being this intimate, this close, this... connected, was the only thing which fulfilled that incessant need only she could provide.

Red groaned deeply, contentedly, when his taste buds were inundated with that one-of-a-kind potion.

Elizabeth’s soft moan stirred the man.

He made himself more comfortable, settling in for the long haul, looking forward to the up-coming hour... or so.

The woman shocked him in the next instant by wriggling out from under his planned attack.
“No, no...no,” the sleep-laden tone scolded him.

Red blinked his surprise, watching the woman situate her body out of his reach.

He instinctively followed, a dark scowl laced his brow. Had it pissed her off he awoke her out of a sound—

Red’s thoughts halted abruptly.

Tiny fingers grasped his shaft.

The man was wise enough to stop his natural inclination to question that action, at least.

He obeyed Elizabeth’s subtle urging as she moved closer, her warm mouth sliding over the crown of his dick in a gentle, teasing sweep.

“Payback’s are hell.” he murmured serenely, easing up to a convenient pillow. “Baby,” the man’s tone was raspy with involvement all ready, “if you think I’m going to apologize for...”

Liz explored his nether regions, mapping out his weaknesses.

Sighing, Red’s gaze drifted downward, watching Lizzy’s little head bob slowly with her actions. He thread his fingers through the dark locks tickling his thighs, unveiling her activity to his rapt attention.

He assumed this was the woman’s way of reprimanding him for his earlier transgressions....not that he was complaining in the least.

In this instance, he would gladly take the punishment. And love every moment.

The inquisitive little mouth was probing and exploring freely.

“Miss Scott...” Red gasped, bunching the thick strands in his hand, holding the woman to one particular pastime, “your skills at oral dic—” he hissed when her tongue curved about his shaft, stroking the rigid flesh with practiced ease “…dictation are superb.”

Red cursed quietly as her already pouty lips swelled, the pink mouth pulling against his girth. Her whole mouth seemed to conform to him, massaging the velvet hard flesh.

Her little tongue flit along the hard length, suckling him. The gentle tugging motion demanded he comply to her will.

“Are you enjoying yourself, honey?” Red eased the dark strands of her hair aside, fixated on Lizzy’s tongue which darted about the head of his cock.

She seemed intently focused on his slit.

“God knows, I am.” a whispered croak escaped his throat.

Liz caught the slick fluid oozing freely from the tip, her eyes closing, “You taste good...” she sighed blissfully when the man gifted her with more, “like warm mulled wine.”

He had read once that soul mates were attracted to their lovers natural pheromones, and he had to wonder... was there some truth to that?
Lizzy seemed to appreciate his natural flavor... and he more than returned the sentiment.

Everything about Elizabeth’s elixir thrilled him like no other, she quite literally drove him insane, she was so fucking intoxicating.

He found himself craving her at random parts of the day. His tongue begged to savor her essence. The urge to let her stir his palate left him salivating and aching with need.

He sucked in a stilted breath, his thoughts stagnating.

Red’s eyes closed rapturously when the slick, hot cushion of Lizzy’s mouth slid along his cock head, eagerly sucking him, desperately seeking more of that flavor she obviously adored.

The bumpy tissue reminded him very much of another opening he dearly loved.

A battle of wills ensued for the man, for she had brought him ever so close to release.

One part wished to waste himself inside this slippery bit of absolute bliss.

The other, wished to partake of the tight creamy hold which offered him a glimpse of heaven on earth.

He flashed back to visions of Lizzy’s eyes dreamily shifting to a crystalline blue as she slid along his cock and the look of awe on her face when he took her deep... the echo of her euphoric cries as he filled her with his thick cream, permeated his mind.

“I absolutely love your present activities, my precious... but you should really allow me to return–” Red gasped shakily. “Yes...just... there, baby. Just like that, yes.”

Red closed his eyes sinking into the lascivious stirrings she was eliciting, “That feels so...” his cock was ultra-sensitive, hardening further with each wave of Elizabeth’s heated tongue.

“I want to...” What? His mind was fragmented with slices of lucidity.

“I should be...” he zoned off into the wonderful sensation, before gathering his wits, “I wanted to do you, baby. Why did you stop me?”

At that moment, he really didn’t care about the reason though, if he were being truthful with himself.

He opened his eyes, fixated on that little ass waving in the air.

“Why don’t you come a little closer,” he suggested, his voice thick with suppressed need, “so I can finish giving you the rest of my... dictation.”

The woman let him go with a wet pop, which left him cold and bereft. Red’s eyes instantly took in the vision of her wet lips and seductive eyes.

“Come here, baby.” he rasped roughly.

Grasping himself in hand, he beckoned the woman closer. “Sit right here...”

Liz crawled her way over him, her breasts dragging along his stomach and chest.

“Yes, Mr. Reddington.” she whispered thickly.

The man’s eyes darkened with lust at the woman’s husky voice. She lifted to her knees, lining up with his throbbing shaft.

Red’s blood surged though his veins, his entire system attuned and on high alert.

“Jesus Christ...” Red groaned his disdain for a discrete tap on the bedroom door shattered the mood and moment. “Go the fuck away!”

He turned all his pent-up frustration and ire on the intruder.

“Phone call.” Silas’ deep muffled voice came from the other side with a definite hint of amusement for Red’s predicament. As a man, Silas understood it completely.

“It’s important.” Liz rolled to Red’s side, covering herself with the sheet. “Silas wouldn’t interrupt tonight if it wasn’t.”

Red cocked his brow, a look of disbelief in his eyes.

“No, really, go ahead...” she smiled pleasantly, “I’m not going anywhere.”

“And neither is this.” Red gritted, waving a hand over his unyielding erection before Lizzy tossed the sheet over it. The man stewed, inwardly wincing at the need to squelch the emotional and physical state she brought him to.

“Come!” he barked, a mulish rasp to the command.

“You speaking to him,” Liz crooked a thumb to the intruder outside the door, “…or me?” she muttered aside, which drew a reluctant smile to Red’s face.

Silas pushed the door open, heading for the man, phone extended.

“Sorry,” the guard said, his eyes expressing regret more to Elizabeth than Red, “but this one really is important. It’s Michael Fairfax.”

Red was summarily informed.

Liz remembered Michael Fairfax was an integral part of Red’s organization. They had extracted him a couple days back from a rather tight situation where he was held hostage.

Red took the phone, bringing it to his ear. “What?” he griped snippily.

Sighing, he settled into the inevitable. He listened half-heartedly to what was being said on the other end of the line, nodding once or twice.

Liz realized just how vulnerable a state she was in, sinking further into the warm bed, tugging the sheets higher on her breasts.

Silas’ attention wasn’t for her, however. His brow was knitted, his gaze resting on Red’s darkly brooding features.

“How is this time any more critical than–” Red listened, finally focusing his interest.
Liz tugged at Silas’ dark cargo pants.

The man glanced down, his scowl deepening.

Liz smiled prettily, pointing her reasons for daring to touch his person without express permission.

The guard told her; he had killed men for lesser offenses, which tickled her greatly at the time.

If she were honest with herself, it was the reason she invaded the man’s space now.

He wasn’t the only one who could be annoying, after all.

Silas followed the direction of the woman’s well-manicured finger, grasping her meaning.

He sighed melodramatically but crossed obediently, grasping the champagne bucket and glasses in one hand.

Liz gasped, pointing diligently for Silas had forgotten something vital.

The guard’s patience was clearly waning, but he trudged back securing the plate of chocolate-covered fruits in capable hands.

Liz sat back into her pillows, waiting patiently for her goodies to arrive.

Dismissing her surly guard’s mood readily, Liz selected a plump, ripe berry from the selection offered. Smiling happily, she bit into the juicy treat.

She reached for her flute, pouting sullenly.

Silas’ expression did not bode well, but lifted the bottle, pouring the sparkling beverage until the woman beamed sweetly up at him around her strawberry.

Liz graciously offered him a sip... but it only darkened the man’s scowl more.

Silas sighed wearily turning his attention back to the ensuing conversation.

Red had witnessed the exchange, slightly amused by it but also wondered how a woman could turn off such heightened emotions so easily?

Was she not as involved as he in the proceedings in which they had frolicked?

Red scowled down at the outline of the still ‘very’ involved evidence on his part.

He watched Elizabeth bite into the delicious fruit; she felt his eyes, offering him some of her treat.

He couldn’t help the smile, the gesture so sincere, so ingenuous, it rather touched him. He shook his head vetoing the gift.

Liz settled back, pulling her treasure closer, merrily sipping her champagne.

Silas heaved a sigh indicating he was getting bored. The guard glanced about, heaved the bottle out of the ice bucket and finished the remaining liquid in a few gulps.

Liz giggled for Silas’ audacity and Red’s exaggerated lift of offended hand.

How funny the way things changed.
Liz realized she should feel embarrassed, mortified even to have someone present while she and Red were in such a state and a short while ago... that would have been the case.

But now... it seemed natural. Even relaxed.

She rather enjoyed the level of comfort she had found with the man. To her, Silas had quickly become her right hand. She felt she could confide anything to the man at it would remain confidential.

Sure, the man would rib her tomorrow about what he interrupted, but even that... she felt like there was a camaraderie between them. A bond.

She allowed him to see her during an unguarded moment... and in turn, he shared Anya with her.

They were finding their own balance. Their own trust.

Her heart warmed for her guard. Silas was to her... what Dembe was to Red.

She crossed her eyes at the man, tittering her amusement when Silas took her glass away, sipping the cooled liquid before shoving it back into her nimble fingers.

She playfully batted his hand away when he tried to swipe a sweet treat, only to lose the battle when she hastily grasped the sheet to her breast.

The man smirked knowingly, victoriously popping the stolen bite into his waiting mouth.

“You’re on the way?” Red questioned. He shifted his eyes, wincing inwardly. He certainly did not wish to interrupt such a time with Lizzy.

Liz frowned, her head tilting, “What?” she mouthed, halting her glass mid-sip.

“This has to be handled...” Red sighed wearily. “However, the timing is not exactly conducive to–”

Liz waved a hand to get his full attention, halting the man’s words, “Go...” she whispered, nodding her acquiescence, her eyes softening.

The indecision was clear in Red’s features. He didn’t want to go. He wanted to stay. It warmed Liz’s heart.

“I know what’s at stake, dammit!” Red snapped into the line.

While Michael Fairfax’s interest ran to the money and routes this would afford them...

Red’s only thought was for the lucrative opportunity which would allow him access to connections and merchandise that would aid in his endeavors.

Yes, he well knew the stakes involved on this particular mission.

Disappointment welled in his heart. He would have to make a difficult choice.

Liz smiled sympathetically, understanding his dilemma.

She caught his hand, bringing it to her cheek, nuzzling into it before kissing his palm in open affection.
She hoped the small gesture alerted him to the fact she didn’t feel one bit neglected or insignificant. He had long since taken such emotions away.

Side glancing her guard, Liz hoped the man would give a hint of some sort that would convince Red... in this instance, business must be first on the list.

Silas scratched his head, shifting to the other foot.

“How far out are you, when will you arrive?” Red asked.

Michael was in flight, on his way to Red’s location.

“I will meet you.” the decision was cast. Red’s mood fell.

Liz felt the man’s disappointment keenly, empathizing.

She instinctively lifted her hand to his shoulder, her eyes falling absently.

“...Oh.” the man’s still evident arousal burned an imprint under the sheet. She lifted a devastated glance Silas’ way.

Had he seen the....

Silas emitted a throaty chuckle which brought a vivid blush to Elizabeth’s cheeks, her question answered.

And why? She felt comfortable with this man. Why should she feel otherwise? So what he saw the evidence of a job well done! One of which he encouraged!

She fought the blush, proud of her achievement.

Silas knew the face well. He rolled his eyes, admirably hiding his pride in the woman.

Liz had approached the evening with a steady determination... she had listened and prevailed. That much was obvious if the... evidence at hand was any indication.

Red covered the phone in hand, “Don’t you have somewhere you have to fucking be?” he hissed his annoyance.

Silas’ chuckle continued as he sauntered his impressive bulk across the room.

Red’s expression was thunderous as he followed the cocky retreat.

“You two kids have fun now but remember...” the guard halted half in, half out the door, his look an insolent one, “practice safe sex.”

Red’s jaw worked irritably, instinctively reaching under his pillow, his hand curving about the stock of his weapon.

“Now, Red,” Liz tsked her concern, staying his intent, “he’s just being flippant. Ignore it.”

Red ‘flipped’ the guy off.

Silas’ chuckle returned as he shut the door, his mission in life, complete.

Red fumed in silence, staring daggers at the closed door, “I swear to God, one of these days...”
His interest fell away abruptly, another more pressing one taking form in the guise of Elizabeth’s small fingers wrapping securely about his erection which sprang to sudden life once again with the warm touch.

She moved... closer, innocent eyes meeting his inquiring ones.

“Almost finished?” she crinkled her nose. Her free hand trailed a soothing path up the inside of Red’s thigh.

She cupped his sack lovingly, leaning into his sphere. The blue eyes watching him intently.

“...Michael,” Red cleared his throat, trying again for his voice had lacked its usual power, “Michael, oh...no,” he drew in a calming breath, parting his legs willingly when Elizabeth’s exploration of his nether regions continued undaunted.

Settling her lips against his neck, her mouth curved when his breathing increased at the slight, teasing touch.

“No, it was just Silas being... Silas.” he explained quickly. “Listen, normally any other time, I would offer over my complete and undivided attention but...” he caressed Lizzy’s brow gently with his lips.

The woman boldly encircled his cockhead with practiced ease, teasing the taut flesh, idly circling the large helmet.

Red closed his eyes to the feel, “You’ve caught me at an awkward moment, I fear.” he released pent-up emotions with an exhale, “I was in the middle of enjoying my...” he sought Lizzy out, his stare a heated one, “anniversary gift.”

He ignored the man’s knowing chuckle, more interested in Lizzy’s gentle fingertip as it traveled from his slit to the more than sensitive underside of his shaft.

“But we finish our business upon your arrival?” Red’s tone held a certain amount of strain, he realized. Considering however, he thought he was holding up remarkably well under the circumstances.

“Teterboro, nine a.m.? Got it.” he nodded absently. “I’ll meet your flight.”

Emboldened by his response, Liz grinned impishly at the man, straddling his thighs.

He grunted brokenly as Lizzy quickly situated his shaft against his belly, sliding her hot center evocatively along his strident length.

“Fuck...” he whispered hoarsely.

Liz nipped his lip, flicking a teasing tongue over the abused skin.

“What? Oh, yes.” he recovered quickly. “I will be sure to give her your best.” he closed the phone off, giving over his full attention.

His hands slid about the small hips, situating the woman where he needed her to be.

“Or rather,” he playfully teased, his mouth seeking the full, pouty lips in a searing kiss, “I will give her my best.”

Liz giggled for such audacity, “Oh, Mr. Reddington, you say the most risqué things.”
“What a little cock-tease you are, Miss Scott.” he managed a half-scowl. “I shall have to break you of such bothersome traits, I think.”

Liz smiled placatingly, “You can try, Mr. Reddington.”

“A challenge.” the man murmured, his blood heating. “I do so love one.”

Liz moved slowly, back and forth along his length, in truth, driving the man up the fucking wall.

“Why don’t you be a good little secretary,” he murmured, gently petting the dark fluff rubbing against him as incentive, “and sit on my lap, Miss Scott.”

“If I had a nickel for every time I’ve heard that,” she mused, glancing down to her pastime.

“I will make it worth your while, I promise.” he enjoyed her spunk. The repartee amusing him. “There is a bonus in it for you... if you follow my directive.”

Wiggling her little ass, Liz re-centered the man’s shaft to drag along her clitoris, humming her delight.

“A big one.” Liz murmured, her eyes closing to the sensations his body elicited.

Red’s low chuckle sent a shiver along her spine.

“A very substantial one, yes... and in the process,” his eyes dropped to her activity, mesmerized by the sight of his cock head emerging from between her labia, “perhaps we can curb those pesky urges of yours.”

He growled deep in his chest when her clitoris slid along the sensitive underside of his cock, drawing a translucent bead of moisture from his slit.

Lifting to her knees, she bowed her bottom, gasping when the large erection bounced against her backside.

Reaching for the man’s shaft, she set it at her opening, easing the thick head inside, “That would be so nice, Sir.”

Elizabeth painstakingly slid down his length, mewing softly as the pleasure engulfed her senses.

Red pushed upward, the feminine gasp of gratitude pleasing him to no end.

His system went on high-alert. He held her hips firmly in place that she not take his delight away.

Bracing her hands on his broad chest, Liz settled him deep inside, sighing her contentment.

Red’s eyes closed rapturously when her warm bottom settled against his thighs and sack.

“That is the most... sublime sensation,” he whispered breathlessly.

Elizabeth writhed about anxiously, “If you don’t assist me, Mr. Reddington,” already the desire was building, “that may be the only sensation you will be afforded.”

“You can do it, Miss Scott.” his tone caressed silkily. “I have complete faith in your abilities.”

Liz wasn’t happy with his response, or lack of one... all ready the ache inside was causing great distress.
Red knew Lizzy preferred when he took command of the ship, though, he rather liked watching the woman perform when the opportunity presented itself.

He smiled warmly as she situated herself determinedly over his thick thighs. Bracing her small hands more securely, she settled more fully on his cock, slowly rocking her bottom at a measured pace.

“I knew that tight little sheath would fit me like a glove.”

And it did, the silken luxury held him so lovingly snug.

Red’s eyes fluttered closed, envisioning what this must look like from the foot of the bed. It was the most delightful image.

Her fingers curved into the mat of hair on his chest, squeezing the tense muscle beneath it. Her arms tightened, pushing her breasts together. The pert mounds bulged against their confinement, her nipples straining with her growing arousal.

Red’s breath caught as her thumb rubbed teasingly against his own nipple, drawing it into a tight pebble.

“It’s times like these,” he lifted once feeling her frustration through the small out-cry, “I remember why I hired you Miss. Scott.”

Red moaned weakly for the tight little cavern constricted powerfully as the woman struggled with her quest.

His heart raced as the slow, graceful roll of her slim hips found the rhythm that pleasured her most.

“Oh...yes,” she moaned shakily, bouncing with more determination.

“There you go...” he husked his encouragement.

His fingers curved loosely about her hips, the delicate flesh brushing erotically against his warm hands.

His fingers slid up her torso, cupping her soft mounds, her nipples sharp against the soft of his palm.

“M-More...” Liz leaned, her dark locks falling about them in a cascade, swishing hypnotically with their increased movement.

His crisp chest hair tickled her nipples, their breathing becoming more than labored suddenly.

Guiding his hand to her back side, she moaned her relief as the man took her cheek in his grasp, pushing her down as encouragement against his upward thrust.

“Yes...” she gasped her elation. “God, yes...Red...”

Red’s eyes darkened listening to the fucking erotic sounds of the woman getting off. His excitement soared as Lizzy’s unrestrained cursing and the shaky, breathless cries of her passion increased as she neared rapture.

“You feel so good...” he growled his exhilaration watching his cock rapidly disappear into her dark curls, “...Yes.” he hissed sharply.

Elizabeth’s wanton mouth silenced him for a goodly spell. He had no cause for complaint.
Soon enough, the two lovers sank deep into the erotic dance, moving in concert with one another. Their aroused cries intermingling as one...

Red realized, what a fool he had been.

It took this one moment to make him fully comprehend how truly blessed and fortunate he was to have her support and understanding.

He worried in the beginning she might grow to resent... even hate the constant strain his position might put on their relationship.

He need not have worried, obviously.

Lizzy just let him know, in her own subtle way, should she desire his undivided attention... she would, without doubt... get it.

Only, he never expected in a million years that should he be waylaid by business or any other distraction, that Lizzy would capture his attention using this very unique method.

It went without saying, he was very much enjoying the surprise and was more than ready to handle those demands when they should arise.

While she enjoyed, even basked in his attention... she was just as content emerging herself in work or simply enjoying some quiet downtime, alone.

A precious commodity to a male. And to a female, he imagined.

It calmed his heart realizing that she found her comfort in solitude. She finally found her balance.

What was the old adage? How can one make another happy if he is not content unto himself?

An apt question and one couples had struggled with down through the ages.

Red has his own struggle at present. He decided to put his whole heart and soul into resolving that.

Which is exactly what he did.

Elizabeth walked carefully, cautiously, her eyes constantly darting into the creepy, shapeless shadows of the endless alleyway.

The dirt and filth of the place permeated the air. Trash of every sort blew along the wet pavement at her feet. The pungent stench of decay wrinkling her nose.

Oily water lay in stagnant puddles and ran haphazardly into the numerous crack and crevices of concrete that had seen better days.

The oppressive heat, stale air and tall tenement buildings towering overhead, closed in around her, leaving it hard to breathe.

Large dark, cracked window panes stared back sightlessly. Her eyes darted from one to another... finding none held her reflection within.

She startled, spinning about quickly as a large rodent scurried unhurriedly across the dimly lit path she walked, its grotesque face making her shiver involuntarily...
Red awoke, some inner sense alerting him to a problem.

The woman beside him lay tense and coiled, the beautiful brow furrowed broodingly. She shivered visibly. He moved instinctively closer.

Elizabeth forced herself to move onward. She sensed she must... she had to keep going. She must reach him, she could not fail him.

He needed her.

Red raised to his elbow, watching the lovely face with a critical eye. Much of Lizzy’s features were shadowed in the darkness of the room but he sensed her distress, wondering at his options.

It was late. She was tired, surely.

Perhaps whatever disturbed her rest would pass on its own.

The wind picked up, the strength of it whipping Liz’s hair into her line of vision.

She raked the strands absently aside, swallowing hard.

A mammoth door had materialized. It stood, baring her path. The path she must tread... a deep-seated fear now gnawed at her mind.

She did not want to approach that door, let alone open it.

What lay behind?

She stepped back, recoiling from its vicinity for it moved closer and closer, looming menacingly over her, taunting her...

Terrifying her.

Red moved closer, soothing the woman’s brow, the soft murmurs of a nightmare alerting him to Elizabeth’s state finally.

He conformed his body to hers, leaning over the troubled woman, his own brow furrowed with concern.

“Wake up now...”

The words reassured and suddenly the door didn’t seem such a fearsome thing. She knew that voice.

“I’m here...”

Elizabeth rushed forward, her hand gripping the ornate handle rapidly.

She threw wide the door...

Her smile of relief faded into oblivion.

They were standing over him... their faces holding a sadistic grimace of triumph... delight.

“No!” she knew their intent, just as she knew, nothing she could do would prevent it.

“D-Don’t!” her pleading fell on deaf ears. “Stop!”

She scrambled, reaching around... the fear... the hopelessness intensifying, when she found her weapon missing.

“No!” she screamed at the hands holding her back, struggling against their unmovable power.

Red tightened his embrace on the trembling form, closing his eyes to the terror present in Elizabeth’s frantic cries.

“Wake up, baby.” he whispered his own growing desperation. “It’s just a damned dream, that’s all...”

They looked at her... all three of them.

The faceless men looked at her with empty, soulless eyes.

She sought the man who lay at their feet... in the grime and dirt of the street.

Red’s eyes held such an infinite sadness... he shook his head minutely, those eyes softening for one brief second in time and she knew he was saying his last goodbye.

Everything moved in slow motion.

The weapons were lowered, pointing.

She screamed... pulling with all her strength on the sightless obstacle holding her back.

The fire spurt from the deadly barrels, lighting the darkness with each explosive burst.

Red’s body jerked upward as the bullets penetrated his torso...

Over and over... again and again...

Red started, surprised by the shrill screams. He pulled back slightly, reacting before he could prevent the action.
Joe burst into the darkness of the room, nearly taking the door from its hinges, weapon drawn and aimed with deadly accuracy.

Red’s own weapon lifted automatically as he shielded Liz’s body protectively.

Joe hastily averted the weapon, rushing to the far edge of the room, scanning the darkened interior for signs of trouble.

Red’s arm lowered as Silas’ bulk filled the doorway, as the guard too arrived, ready to assist in whatever crisis had arisen.

Dembe was not far behind, hovering outside the door, a formidable back-up to be reckoned with.

Silas flipped the light switch. All three men approached the center structure of the room, all having ascertained that no real problem presented itself this night.

Liz’s struggles were real, however. She frantically squirmed about, twisting and turning, this way and that.

Red was careful to preserve her modesty, but it was becoming more difficult to prevent the woman from harming herself, her strength surprised him.

Liz rushed to Red, kneeling beside him. The unforgiving concrete jabbing painfully into her knees. Her eyes anxiously scanning the blood-soaked area of his clothing.

Oozing red rivulets of life trickled out with each ragged breath the man took. One wound in particular caught her attention. She placed her hands over the gaping hole, physically attempting to hold back the flow of thick, sticky blood.

“My God.” she whispered brokenly, watching the red liquid seep through her fingers. “...My G-God.”

Red’s breathing was shallow, raspy, an odd wheeze escaping his blood spotted lips.

She looked at him, meeting those light blue orbs which stared back at her, the light fading second by second within.

“M-Me?” a terror filled her heart. “Red... don’t go!” she sensed it was out of his hands this time... that he had to leave. “Please, stay here!”

Silas knelt beside the bed, studying the woman diligently, “It’s a night terror.”

All those present witnessed such things with their men before and after combat situations. Hell, had even experienced the occurrence themselves.

“Move carefully, Raymond.” Dembe warned. “It is very real to her, whatever she is experiencing.”

Wrapping his arms about her, Red held the fighting woman stationary. Quickly rolling the woman into the bedding, he forced his knee between Lizzy’s, settling into the gap provided. Leaning his weight into her small body.

Tucking her arms at her sides, Liz pressed at some imaginary wound in Red’s chest.

“Please!” she whimpered, still fighting Red’s hold for all she was worth. “Please...someone help him...”

Joe was troubled for the young woman. He’d grown fond of Elizabeth. He hated she was going through such a horrible ordeal.

When he heard the raw, uninhibited feminine sounds coming from Red and Liz’s bedroom, he’d been amused. Tonight had been no different from any other night.

The quiet ensued after a spell, however. He settled down to his routine. Minutes ago... that spine chilling scream jostled him from normalcy.

All he could do at the moment was wait, just like everyone else and hope Elizabeth came out of the nightmare soon.

Nightmare hardly described what the woman was experiencing. He knew how real... just how horrific the journey could feel.

“Don’t go...” Elizabeth sobbed faintly, all the fight and hope gone, “Red...please... don’t leave me here.”

Red’s brow pinched with strain, watching Lizzy in the throes of her terror.

“Elizabeth!” he snapped sternly, brusquely jolting the bed as he did so.

The woman’s face scrunched with distress, her balled fists pushing helplessly at Red’s weight, fighting the restraint weakly now.

“I can’t do this alone.” she whispered shakily. “I can’t.”

“Dammit...” Red hissed. He controlled his own distress, taking a calming breath.

“Lizzy...” Red murmured in the woman’s ear, “it’s nothing but a nightmare.” he soothed. “If you’ll open your beautiful eyes,” he kissed the delicate lashes before working his way back to her mouth, “...you’ll see.”

The man’s mood fell further when the woman’s lip quivered uncontrollably, tears falling from the corner of her eyes.

“We’re safe..” he continued softly, gently kissing the tears away, “it’s over, baby...”

Tightly squeezing his eyes shut, he fought against the urge to forcefully drag the woman upright and shake her into awareness... her despair was so acute.

The woman’s lips curved into a tight pout but she slowly turned towards the sound of his voice, easing her struggles even more so, he gratefully acknowledged.

“Yes...” Red tenderly kissed the concentrated frown, “you hear me, don’t you?” he crooned, peppering her mouth with gentle affection. “I’m here, sweetheart,” he assured.

Elizabeth sensed her life ebbing right along with Red Reddington’s.

She felt his breath lessen with each passing second. Steadily holding her hands over the heart area, but the strong vital beat had diminished.

She could not feel even the slightest tremor inside his chest cavity. She felt numb inside.

The red ooze halted its flow. Readjusting her hold, she added more pressure.

She was doing it wrong... something was wrong.

Something was terribly wrong.

“Hey...” Silas spoke in an even tone.

Elizabeth started... she knew that voice as well.

“Get out of the way.” Silas’ customary brusque tone filled the silence of the tense room.

The man gently moved Elizabeth’s hands aside.

“I got this... I can do it.” Silas stated.

Liz’s hand twitched under his hold, hesitating a moment, “He won’t... listen to me.” she replied tearfully.

“I’m not going anywhere,” Red stressed his tone, “I promise.”

“He will listen to me.” Silas promised as well.

The woman eased her hand from under the large palm, allowing the invasion.

Coming alongside Silas, Dembe crouched, “Raymond is fine...” he said in his calming manner.

Liz struggled, trying desperately to break the surface of the dark murky substance surrounding her.

Red tenderly petted the wild hair framing her face. He took the handkerchief Dembe offered, blotting away the beads of sweat on her small face.

Liz took a lungful of air, gasping for reality.

“Yes...” Red soothed, “open your eyes.”

Turning away from the bedside lamp, the woman squinted away from the light Silas had switched on. Red grasp her chin gently, making sure the first thing she saw, was his face.

Liz startled awake, her eyes flying open.

“We’re all right...” Red urged quickly.

Her eyes flew to Red’s torso, finding Silas’ hand on Red’s chest... just as he promised, for the man had hastily replaced the appendage knowing her senses would be fuzzy when she first came around.
Liz’s trembling hand gingerly reached for the imaginary wound that had caused her so much pain and despair. Silas removed his hand, showing her... Red’s unblemished flesh.

Red caught her fingers, pressing them against his warm, dry skin as further assurance.

Elizabeth stared transfixed.

It had seemed so real... so very... real.

She lifted a dazed stare.

Red engulfed her in his embrace, holding tightly to the shaking form, his stomach churning chaotically for her state of mind.

“Shh,” Red opened himself to the distraught woman, “it’s all right. It was just a bad dream.”

Liz scrunched herself closer into his tight hold, grasping at his stability.

“See,” he crooned softly, pulling the trembling woman closer, “we’re all here. Everyone is okay... everyone is fine.”

Liz shifted her eyes to her surroundings. They were not in a filthy alley at all.

Dembe and her guys stood beside the bed, armed and alert. She found solace in that. She glanced between them, wondering how it was possible for men wearing nothing but pants, to be so imposing.

“I’m sorry...” she wept her embarrassment and regret.

“Do not concern yourself, Elizabeth.” Dembe murmured solicitously.

Liz nodded jerkily against Red’s neck, tightening her arm about his shoulders.

Easing to his side, Red took her with him as he went. The woman inched closer into his hold, regardless.

Dembe grasped a throw blanket. Joe moved the blankets at the foot of the bed, closer to Red’s reach, both men sensing a small way to assist.

Once situated, Dembe billowed the throw specifically over Elizabeth.

“Thank you all,” Red rubbed the woman’s back in a methodical pattern. “I think the worst has passed.”

Lifting his eyes slowly, checking with Dembe and Silas who nodded minutely in agreement.

Dembe gestured for the other two to proceed him, “Call if assistance is needed.”

Red waved a hand, silently thanking each man for their timely response and concern, the door was closed behind them.

The room went back to its normal, complacent quietness.

Running his large palm against the naked expanse of Liz’s back, Red gently adjusted her even closer into his hold, allowing her body to become flush with his warm one.
Why now? He wondered. He thought they were working well towards erasing any doubts or fears she may carry.

“Lizzy? Talk to me.” Red muttered softly, rubbing her hip, warming her chilled frame.

The woman shook her head, keeping her face hidden in the crook of his neck. She wasn’t ready.

Sighing, Red ducked his face into her neckline, kissing the baby soft skin, allowing her a moment to gather her thoughts.

He learned quickly on, Lizzy would always need a few moments to find her center... her reality.

He would just have to wait it out.

He supposed, he couldn’t blame her.

It had been eons since the woman had a trusted confidante she could truly be vulnerable with.

He understood the premise of such a way of life.

It had been so long since someone had comforted him that when Lizzy offered her support as they stood over Jack’s grave at Arlington... he had needed a moment to let that reality sink in.

She administered to his fragile state so lovingly. He still reveled in the gentle nurturing embrace as he wept that day.

When the hell was it the last time he cried, and not just cried... but sobbed his heart out?

When he lost his daughter, he supposed. No other time came to mind. Red had learned how to channel his grief, how to bottle his emotions... how to shut them down completely if necessary.

The words Lizzy bestowed upon him that day had also been wholly unexpected. She didn’t just see the monster anymore, but the human inside.

There had been no censure that a man, who killed supposedly without conscience, could feel pain for someone he loved who had passed. He felt no form of judgement from Lizzy.

There were no empty phrases to appease the man either. Just quiet words of empathy. Liz had lost loved ones. She knew... she understood.

And if he were to admit it, Red had seen a glimpse of himself he thought long dead, at that grave.

In that split moment in time, Red had seen another side of Elizabeth Keen.

She had been steadfast in her comfort, the long minutes he grieved.

Such a private moment had arisen this night as well. And at this moment, Lizzy sought him out, needed his comfort.

She held him close, her arms embracing him tightly, allowing the pain to ebb in its own time.

Everything he lost in his life seemed magnified that fateful day. All of it pouring back like a downpour designed to bring the man to his knees. It would have been so easy to surrender to the overwhelming emotions.

But Red hadn’t been beaten because Elizabeth had been there. Her compassion filling the gaping holes of his life which had been torn asunder.

Such a private, special moment... grievously intimate in nature, and yet made totally acceptable by the ready empathy from Elizabeth... that even Red Reddington was allowed a moment of weakness.

She was a port in the storm that day... a stay hold when he needed it most.

He tried so hard to be the same for her.

And so, he waited patiently now, feeling his inadequacies deeply. He wished he could do more.

Most of his contemporaries found such an emotional state uncomfortable, he knew. Consoling a distraught female was something they avoided like the plague.

Red didn’t feel like that at all.

That’s not how he saw it.

There were good times. There were bad times. One didn’t cancel out the other.

They just were. You handled them to the best of your ability and hopefully came out stronger on the other side.

Lizzy settled a bit, her tears subsiding. He waited for a better sign, however, that all was well.

Shifting to wrap his other arm about her, Red methodically rubbed what he could reach of her small body, hopefully soothing her further.

“Tell me...” he muttered encouragingly, his tone supportive, concerned.

Over time, Liz slowly repeated her dream to him in hesitant stages. She constantly sought to connect her hand, reaching, touching him, as if reassuring herself this was not a dream.

“You were down,” she sought his eyes, the pain within them undisguised, “… and they just kept shooting you.”

Red got lost in the slow rhythmic motion of his hand massaging small circles into her flesh, concentrated in the sordid, violent tale she related.

He could understand now where the trauma originated.

It had been a long couple days, weeks really. One tragedy after another seemed to plague them.

So much had transpired in their lives. A few incidents came to mind. He had been shot... twice. She and Silas made it through a car wreck, Carver approached her, Tom was stalking her...and today, she had watched her lover taking heavy fire.

It was no wonder the woman cracked under those conditions.

He should have anticipated this... especially after tonight.

Lizzy had been given a token glimpse of the life she and Red could experience if matters were different. If he was not who he was.

...If she were not who she was.
Their evening had been... wonderful.

Dinner, dancing, romance... followed by playful lovemaking and a gifted symbol of commitment and promises of so much more, all of which were given to her by a man who loved her deeply and without reservation.

But Lizzy, having a touch of fatalistic tendency, waited for that to be ripped away from her.

And who the hell could blame her?

Everything she loved had been stolen away her entire life.

But not this time, not if he had anything to say about it.

He couldn’t promise her nightmare would not eventually come to pass. That things like that would never happen. He couldn’t even assure her he would evade such a circumstance, especially considering the events that took place earlier.

He sighed mentally, “We take all the precautions we can, Lizzy,” he murmured. “All we can do is try to prevent such an occurrence. I do try my best. I assure you.”

She exhaled shakily, reaffirming her hold.

“Trust me on that.” he asked. “I will do everything in my power to come home to you every day.”

The silence engulfed them for a few moments. Liz’s hand gripped his tightly at one point, worrying his fingers with her own, a good sign her anxiety had not passed. She wrapped her arm around his waist, moving decidedly closer to him.

“What are you thinking?” he murmured, sensing she needed something he had not supplied as yet.

“It’s just...” she said, “it was such a great evening and–”

“And it still is.” Red assured. “We’re here, together, right?”

She nodded, settling more comfortably in his arms.

“But... that’s not what you were thinking.” he said. “Is it?”

Red smiled when the woman slumped dejectedly against him... knowing he wouldn’t let her off easy.

“If we don’t discuss it, it won’t get better, will it.”

“Is it...” she hesitated, “always like that? Today, I mean?” she asked, lifting trusting eyes. “I know you don’t tell me everything and--”

“Today was... an odd occurrence.” he replied readily. “We’re usually afforded more cover.” he admitted. “More man power.”

Having time to rethink the incident, she fretted, “Why didn’t Francis--”

“Francis was willing to send a whole battalion but,” Red captured her lips in a fleeting brush of intimacy, “that would have made things too confusing. I surround myself with capable men with each passing circumstance. They will adapt, regroup and manage.”
Liz knew that. There had to be a clear definition of who was who to limit the chances of friendly fire, as well.

“I saw...” she exhaled shakily, recalling the moment, “one of our guys, on the roof.”

Red remained quiet, allowing her to gather her thoughts. To express her fears aloud.

“He had a problem with his weapon or,” she shrugged minutely, “something, I don’t know.”

Red frowned slightly, wondering where she was going with this.

“He had to fight, hand to hand with a guy up there.” she said.

Red’s frown deepened. It was unlike his men to not carry a back-up. He would look into the matter.

“I think,” she lifted confused eyes, “he stabbed the other guy.” she shook her head. “All I know for certain is, the bad guy fell. It was horrible, Red. The reality.”

The man tempered his reaction to want to protect her from such a sight, even knowing what the woman did for a living.

Red would never understand the nature of humans, those that couldn’t look away from a car wreck or that would crowd around to see Carvers victim in a body bag. It was a knee jerk reaction he couldn’t tame. It disgusted him, such people. It disquieted the man.

He wanted desperately to spare Lizzy such things in life even though he knew such things were a reality of life.

He was fully aware she knew such things existed. Had even seen a few. But to think of her seeing it playing out in real time, was a totally different kettle of fish. He couldn’t help wishing to shield her from the horrors mankind inflicted on their brethren.

Red had lived a full life; he knew what happened out in the world. More than most. And if he was honest with himself, delivered the death blow himself more times than he wanted to count.

At one time he thought he may have lost his humanity, but if that were true, would he be wishing to cover Lizzy’s eyes, blocking sight from the horror of it all?

Maybe she had found a little piece he had left inside? A piece only she could bring out of him? A piece that had been there all this time, waiting in reserve, to be used for the right person?

Waiting for... her.

But as to the question itself, what about it had stuck in her mind?

“The method of one’s demise can be very disturbing,” he agreed. “But you know that. What exactly was the point of your observation?” he finally asked.

She swallowed hard, taking a breath, “Have you...” she hesitated, “ever... what was it like for you...”

Red became introverted, not certain this was the time or place. He placated.

“I was not always as I am, Lizzy.” he tried to recall those times but it was becoming increasingly difficult, for he suppressed that period diligently for so many years now.

“I’m just trying to,” she wasn’t certain what she was attempting in reality, “I guess I hope that, you don’t feel, what I felt today. Seeing that man... fall.”

Red remained silent, his face grim.

“Does it hurt you? Did you feel...” the words she searched for, forming. “The first time...”

“I felt sick. It bothered me for a very long time.” his jaw tightened, recalling the emotions. “I didn’t want...” he sighed, pushing the misery aside, “he didn’t give me an option. I tried to push him away, to give him an out...” he explained, shaking his head.

“But I was the enemy and you kill the enemy.” he continued, reciting the mantra he had been taught. “It came down to him or me. And with a new baby at home, I was going to make sure it was me that walked away.”

“There must have been times...” she hesitated, unsure how to voice the question. “Was there a moment when you believed you wouldn’t...”

Red understood the question all too well.

“I’ve been in firefights so intense, you could sense Death looking over your shoulder, standing by... waiting,” he licked suddenly parched lips.

“The sound of a bullet tickling your ear drum made you numb for a moment, with the thought... what could have been.” he admitted. “A few close combat situations that got a little hairy.” he shrugged those away.

“Were you scared?”

“Sometimes, but sometimes I wasn’t.” he told the truth. “When I was younger, I was cocky.” he arched a brow, remembering his over-inflated ego. “As I got a little older, I realized I wasn’t so invincible. But then, I had experience and a lot of anger on my side.” he chuckled hollowly. “It really just depended on the situation.”

“Did you ever think you were going to die?”

“A few times, yes.” he nodded.

“How, what happened?” she was on edge. Coiled so tight, anxiousness and despair were the upmost emotions present.

“...Lizzy.” he sighed wearily.

“I need to know.” she whispered tightly. “I need to know what the worst has been so I know your chances of walking away.”

Red hesitated, unsure of his options here. He studied her face for a long moment. He read the fear.

In this instance, not knowing would cause more damage than the truth which he could spin any way he wished to protect her.

“There was one time,” he kept his tone calm and steady. He hadn’t been so calm and steady at the time, he remembered. Viciously pissed, was a more apt description.

“I had been taken prisoner. For some reason I can’t even fathom now, I was being most uncooperative.” he smiled but she couldn’t echo the gesture, those eyes troubled and fretful.
“So there I was... a prisoner, immobile. At the mercy of this guy who I was certain was relatively pissed off at me,” he sing-songed his head, telling the tale in his own inimitable fashion.

“And for no reason I could fathom, completely out of the blue,” Red halted the narrative, wondering if he should stop sharing so freely, “the son-of-a-bitch sticks a gun in my mouth.”

Liz stifled her gasp of horror for she needed the knowledge that was forthcoming. She needed it even more desperately now.

Red revisited that moment in his life, taking a few seconds, “I didn’t like the sensation of the damned thing at all... left a rather unpleasant metallic taste in your mouth for days.”

“Red...” she sighed wearily for his flippancy. The silence was strained for her, not so much for the man.

“You know, I just sat there... watching as he pulled that trigger back,” he flicked his tongue about his mouth, “it’s amazing the things one considers at such a time. I kept thinking of this old dog I once saw on the side of the road...”

Liz lay quietly, her head against his chest. She listened to the rolling timber of his voice. His heart beat.

“Dembe and I had taken a wine tour in the South of France. We were driving down this dirt road, our GPS having gone on the fritz, failing us dismally... and there he was,” Red waved a hand, “looking half-starved, large brown eyes staring up at me, tongue hanging out to the side... the dog, not Dembe mind you.”

Liz couldn’t get past the trigger being pulled back. The thought of how very close the man had come within...

“Dembe pulled over. I mean, what else could we do, right?” Red laughed shortly. “So there we were, out in the middle of nowhere, sharing our lunch of sorts. A bag of roasted peanuts we bought off some kids peddling them on a street corner and what was left of my breakfast...”

He nodded to himself in remembrance, “If we’re ever in that part of France, remind me to take you to this quaint little bistro. They make the most exquisite quiche...”

Liz held tight to his stability of the man, the soft, melodic voice calming her nerves like a soothing balm.

“We shared our water and wine with our canine friend, he seemed to have an affinity with Dembe’s Merlot... no accounting for taste, there.” the man stopped to breathe, “All in all, we spent a most pleasant hour. All three suitably bolstered by our respite.”

Red lowered his eyes taking in the woman quietly listening, “We took to our respective paths in life... the dog scampered off into the orchards and Dembe and I, our spirits renewed, were once again determined to persevere in our quest for the elusive winery that had eluded us thus far.”

The silence returned.

“Red,” Liz lifted a soulful stare, “what happened with the man?”

“My people rushed in at exactly the right moment to save my ass.” he shrugged nonchalantly. “Which is what I pay them handsomely to do, isn’t it?”
Liz processed, her voice steady enough now, “Did they kill him?”

Red briefly thought about lying. He thought very hard on the subject.

“...No.” he said, “he escaped, sadly.”

“The information he wanted. That you wouldn’t give him,” she had already figured it out, “it was about me, wasn’t it?”

Red could already surmise the outcome of this little tête-à-tête, “In a manner of speaking,” he hedged his bets.

“So, he is still out there... looking for me?” her tone sounded so normal, so mundane that the man crooked his head to catch a glimpse of her expression.

“If that is the case, he is wasting what little time he has remaining on the planet,” again, he evaded, “let’s just say, we have some unfinished business that needs attending.”

“What does he want from you?” Liz was at a loss.

Red tightened his arm around her, dropping a kiss to the top of her head. “...You.”

Liz was stunned, sudden realization dawning. While she had been living daily life; going to the grocery store, watching a movie, enjoying a meal. Doing all the normal trivial things a person did, day to day...

Red had been there, in the background... watching over her, protecting her.

Even to the extent of risking his own life to ensure hers continued on.

Not giving away her location, even when some maniac stuck a gun in Red’s mouth... he hadn’t sold her out... he’d protected her.

Liz shuddered visibly, “...Why?” She breathed her awe, her stricken eyes seeking an answer.

“Why does he want you?” Red queried quietly.

Liz shook her head, “Why would you give up your life... for mine?” the idea boggled her mind. “And why is this bastard necessitating that you do?!”

Red took his time formulating an answer. He could feel the nervous tension in Lizzy’s body.

“He thinks I facilitated Katarina’s disappearance.” he rubbed his fingers into his tired eyes. “He wants to get his hands on the Fulcrum, for his own benefit, reasons.” there were any number of reasons. “It’s complicated, Lizzy.”

The woman’s head was reeling with the reasons and possibilities and what-ifs.

She knew this was probably not the best time to get into a long complicated explanation, “You’re speaking about... my mother’s husband.”

“Yes.” Red drew in a breath. “But none of it matters because he will never, ever, get to you.” he lifted her face with a gentle hand.

“What kind of person is he?” she had to wonder. “This man who acted the part of my father in some capacity for at least four years,” Liz was getting upset again, anger boiling to the surface for the injustice of it all, “four years for God’s sake... apparently he had no feelings for me at all. His only interest, his only concern is... the Fulcrum.”

“Consider the source and when you do... realize that in the larger scheme of things,” Red reminded, kissing her forehead gently, “these people have no importance in your life what-so-ever.”

“Never did, I guess.” she lay back against him, mentally exhausted.

If she had learned nothing else tonight though, Liz knew, without doubt, Red Reddington protected those important and close to him.

“Are you afraid?” he hated to think she might be experiencing such turbulent emotions.

“I’m more pissed,” she granted, “and worried for everyone around me. That they could end up hurt or worse because of me.”

“Well, don’t be. None of us are ready to check out, just yet. We’ll go when we’re damn well ready to and not one second before.” he assured. “Roll over.” he pushed gently on her hip.

She rolled to her other side, giving him space. Red moved forward, wrapping his body around hers. His evened breathing and warmth relaxed Lizzy, making her eyes heavy.

“We’re all safe.” he crooned quietly in her ear and continued to do so until she relaxed. “And you know damn well that wasn’t what I meant. I asked if you were afraid.”

Liz dropped her eyes, idly tracing the lines in the large hand laying against her stomach.

“I couldn’t help you today, I couldn’t do anything to–” she huffed her irritation. “I was useless to you and everyone there.”

Tom Keen... Carver. Her inability to assist them today. They had thrown Lizzy for a loop. She was feeling unsure again, unsure of herself.

Just like he had, even after facing great uncertainty.

She needed reassurance she would get through this... recover and persevere.

Red had felt these things countless times when he was her age. He understood. He knew how to fix the problem.

“You’ll be normal again, Lizzy.” he murmured quietly. “You’ll go on just as you did before.”

She was quiet a moment before turning her head slightly. “How do you know?”

She had been looking to him for the security she had been missing, but was slowly gaining back under his ever patient care. It scared her now though... this set-back.

When he had been taken down, it rocked her stability, her foundation.

She thought if there wasn’t hope he would be all right, then what chances did she have?

It hadn’t mattered that he ended up being fine. That it all seemed to muddle, fade into the background after tonight. To see someone she saw as larger than life, unshakable... go down with one shot. Lizzy kept replaying that horror in her mind’s eye.

Failure was a relative term to Red. That he was alive and breathing was a win, in his opinion. He had changed his viewpoint a long way back..

“Everyone gets bruised and battered along the way,” he said, “it’s how you come out on the other side that matters.” he truly believed that axiom for he lived it most days.

But Lizzy hadn’t learned that yet.

With Carver, she fought against a large man and survived. That she hadn’t taken him down... that he was still out there, taunting her. She considered it a failure on her part she hadn’t ended the bastard.

After her accident with Silas... she held herself together. And twice today, she proved herself cool and calm under pressure.

Red remembered thinking these things to himself, but he never voiced them to her. He should have reminded her of the strength and fortitude she had within herself.

Hell, even Red needed to be reminded sometimes what his end goal was...especially when everything was going to hell. That’s what Dembe was there for, among a multitude of other reasons.

“You didn’t lose. You are not useless. And you sure as hell are not a failure.” he grumbled. “You survive where others don’t.”

She sighed her disgruntlement, shaking her head.

“Baby, survival is paramount.” he stressed. “Not winning.”

She fell quiet for a long moment, so long in fact, he thought perhaps she drifted back to sleep.

“How do you do it?” she whispered. “How do you push past the... fear?”

“Because I have something to live for.” he kissed the back of her head, enjoying the soft tickle of her hair. “Something to fight for.” he tightened his arm about her waist.

She moved back, letting him curve more of his body around her.

“When you have that...” he continued softly, “you can beat any odds they throw at you, didn’t you know?”

Liz turned her ear towards the soothing voice, focusing.

“No one can take that away from you...” he whispered urgently.

“Keep that in mind at all times, Lizzy. They don’t have it.” he explained. “They are at a disadvantage whether they know it or not. You always have the upper hand.”

Clasping his hand, she squeezed it... hard.

“And you will always,” he closed his eyes, his world suddenly serene and calm, “... have me.”

You are sorely missed, DLR.

You will forever hold a special place in our memories and hearts.
June 6

The next morning proved to be a bright and sunny one. Moods were very much improved by the promise of cheerful rays filtering down.

After a lingering lovemaking session, Red finally allowed Lizzy to leave the sanctuary of the shower.

Red smiled as the woman flittered about the bathroom, a flurry of activity... as usual.

He was certain there was a method to her madness but since becoming familiar with it, he often caught himself wondering how the woman ever completed the act of readying herself for the day. She wasn’t that organized but no one could dispute the end product.

Looping his tie about his neck, he chuckled quietly watching the woman flick undecidedly through her selection of make-up before deciding on one that suited her that specific day.

She did that everyday. He hesitated, realizing... he was now intimately acquainted with Lizzy’s morning routine. The thought warmed him.

She halted mid flick, her mascara wand held precariously to her lashes, sighing wearily when the low ringing of a phone invaded their space.

“I’ll get it.” Red smiled, patting her bottom as he passed by.

She leaned closer to the mirror even though one with a retractable arm was right beside her on the wall.

“Oh!” she tsked her discontent, “Red Reddington, you made me mess up...” she growled, yanking tissues from their holder, after a disparaging sound.

Chortling under his breath, Red found he enjoyed that part of their routine as well.

He craned his head as he neared the night stand, glancing down at the screen of his phone.

“It’s mine...” Red informed the woman. Pushing the button, he silenced the aggravation.

Looking in the mirror, he straightened the dark silk of his tie, running his fingers down the long strip before settling it in place behind his vest.

Reaching for his watch, he hesitated, something catching his eye. Staring down at the cart with the leftovers from their celebration, a smile covered his mouth. His twisted ties draped carelessly over the empty plates, the shredded paper that had held Lizzy’s gift lay in a crumpled ball beside her flowers...

His mood dropped slightly.

There never seemed to be enough time. There never seemed to be a respite long enough to allow them any real amount of intimacy. At least not on the level he required.

Red knew Lizzy felt more comfortable in Dembe’s presence now. She didn’t find her guards intrusion anything more than a slight interruption or breather between lovemaking moments but...
Dammit all to hell, _he_ wanted alone time with the woman _without_ the fucking world knocking at their door every available second.

“Who was it?” Liz asked as she walked into the room, absentmindedly flicking a wayward lock of hair from her eyes.

“Telemarketer.” Red replied in a droll tone, kissing the lips she presented for just such an occasion.

Liz’s mouth twitched, “If you can’t escape them, there’s no hope for the rest of us.”

“When AARP finds me, I’ll worry.” Red quipped, drawing a small chuckle from the woman.

Grasping his watch, he sighed, fastening it in place.

Liz frowned slightly at the sound, before noticing his attention was once again, focused on last nights frivolities.

“I forgot to tell you…” Liz began, she too, had glanced at the cart fondly, “I had a wonderful time last night.” she soothed his dispirited mood.

Red nodded slowly, still slightly put out with how the evening shaped up. She was so important to him. He still wished he had been able to do more.

“Did you…” he murmured dejectedly.

“I did, yes.” she reached for her new bracelet, holding it and her arm, out to the man.

Red took the charm, looping it about her delicate wrist, securing it.

“To be honest… with my team here and everything,” Liz foraged on, determined to make him understand how much last night meant, “I didn’t think we would get as much uninterrupted time as we did. Last night was a treat I hadn’t expected.”

Red tried to look at it from a different viewpoint. He was sure Ressler would have been calling them every ten minutes, or worst case scenario…camped out in their front room.

Turning her hand in his, he kissed her scar. He knew she was self-conscious about it. Personally, he always looked at it as a shared mark between the two, she had _her_ scar and he had his.

He was more than warmed by the thought Lizzy chose this wrist to display her new adornment.

“Well, we did have a little interruption, didn’t we?” he disgruntled.

“Who doesn’t.” she replied airily, watching his lips hover over their shared history. “If it’s not work calling, it’s family dropping by unannounced, the dog jumping on the bed or,” her cheeks flushed, “…kids.”

Red remembered his daughter had the uncanny knack of barging in at the most inopportune moments, but still...

“It’s part of life, Red.” Liz soothed, fastening her earring in place. “Don’t worry about it. I’m not.”

“Lizzy, you can’t tell me what happened last night didn’t embarrass you.”

“It might have at one time…” she admitted, “but…” she hesitated, canting her head, “may I ask you something?”
“Of course.” he leaned into the night stand, wrapping his hands about her hips, pulling her close.

“Has Dembe ever walked in on you making love?”

“Dembe has walked in on me having sex.” Red corrected. “I only make love to you.”

Liz’s eyes softened, wrapping her arms about his shoulders, “Were you embarrassed?”

“No, I’m a guy.” Red told the truth. “I admittedly covered my partner to maintain her modesty but… he sighed, “men look at sex differently than women, Lizzy.”

Liz inclined her head at his reasoning. Maybe that was a true statement.

“Were you trying to make a point?” Red asked.

“I wasn’t embarrassed because, Silas,” she smiled, “is to me, what Dembe is to you.”

Red’s brow lifted slightly as he digested the words. He had hoped Elizabeth and Silas would become comfortable with one another, even build a friendship. He never expected Lizzy to see in Silas, what he, himself did, in Dembe.

He was extremely pleased to know Lizzy found that level of comfort and trust in her guard.

“While it may not have played out exactly as you wished,” she trailed her hand down the lapels of his vest, her heart fluttering, remembering their evening, “last night meant a great deal to me.”

To date, Red Reddington was the only man to ever celebrate that milestone with her. It had meant so much that he had been so thoughtful and attentive.

Women dream about men like that and so seldom find one, she realized.

“I don’t know about you,” she lifted unguarded eyes, allowing him in, “but I celebrate being your partner, confidante and lover every single day.”

Red’s breath caught at the words, shocked to hear them delivered so openly, “And... I count every minute with you as a blessing.” he confided.

“Those little interruptions in between,” she said, “don’t make up a whole moment,” her eyes sparkled with tears, “but they do make us who we are, don’t they?”

A faint flush brightened her cheeks when the man turned their linked hands, tenderly kissing her fingers.

“They do...” he whispered roughly, his prospective altered entirely by her confessions.

She was right. This life, the things that occurred, happened because of who they were. If that didn’t exist; what they were, what they had... most likely wouldn’t exist.

Those minor interruptions changed them in ways neither expected.

Lizzy had found her confidence along with her right hand man. And Red, was realizing what was important in life. His priorities were changing.

“I had a wonderful time with you last night, Elizabeth.” he murmured intimately. “I truly hope we have many more of those... moments... together.”
Liz leaned catching his lips in a gentle kiss. It meant so much to hear Red say those words...to know he fully expected to continue their new found traditions.

~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥

Breakfast that morning was a flurry of activity on Red’s part. Liz watched the man work effortlessly through a maze of phone calls while fielding questions from Dembe and his Head of Security. Dembe had given Red the itinerary for the day, indeed confirming that both men were leaving out at a little after nine, that day.

“Silas, did you make arrangements for Hunter?” Red asked, stuffing toast in his mouth.

“I figured since we were going to Teterboro anyway...” Silas shrugged.

He had the needed discussion with Hunter, confirming the man was very interested in the position Red had offered which would provide stability for Hunter’s family.

Silas lifted a hesitant glance, “Why? Did you change you mind?”

“No, I want him on payroll.” Red assured the guard. “I was just going to say, since I’m going to California,” he said, “I’ll take David and Hunter with me. It’s faster.”

“He’ll appreciate that.” Silas nodded amiably.

“What’s going on?” Liz questioned, sitting her coffee aside.

“Hunter’s boy is graduating kindergarten.” Silas filled her in. “Wants to be there for the big day.”

Liz smiled, before cocking her head slightly, a frown on her pretty features, “Should I find it charming that the man sent to kill me, wants to see his little boy graduate kindergarten?”

Red chuckled into his coffee, patting her hand, “You get used to it.”

She shrugged carelessly, smiling happily when Dembe passed the Blackberry jam.

“Speaking of personnel,” Red paused, watching Lizzy apply the jam to his toast, “get Security on the line.” he pointed to the phone beside Silas. “All of them.”

He had an executive decision he wished to share.

Liz frowned, wondering what Red was up to. She looked at Dembe, finding the man just as clueless as she.

The head guard shrugged, dialing the house. Amir answered immediately.

“The Lord and Master wishes to convey something, to all Security.” Silas informed.

Amir quickly assembled security, putting the line on speaker as did Silas.

Red refused to meet Lizzy’s questioning eyes, instead pouring himself another cup of coffee.

Liz sat straighter in her chair. She could feel a sudden tension rolling off Red in waves.

“When I hired you to protect Elizabeth,” he sat his cup aside, “what did I ask you give her?”

A beat of silence met the question. Silas sighed heavily, throwing his hands up in the air, glaring at the phone. How often had he drilled the mantra into their wee little brains?

Dembe dropped his face against his hand, rubbing his eyes, wearily.

Joe’s head slumped as he rolled his eyes upward, “In their defense, boss, you would have been met with the same silence if you asked them to spell, potato.” he muttered aside.

“Even the Vice-President didn’t know that.” Liz was quick to defend her guys.

“Privacy, Boss.” Silas gritted. “You asked us for... privacy.”

Liz gasped, her mouth falling agape. Hadn’t they discussed that just this morning! She thought she had made herself perfectly clear on the subject?

She looked at the man sitting at the head of the table, those blue eyes showing their ire.

Red held up a stilling hand, silently asking her to give him a moment to finish.

Liz frowned, hoping Red didn’t reprimand anyone. He had better not!

Her people weren’t being purposefully intrusive, just doing what they had been hired to do. In their defense, Red often had just returned home in some instances, so they were not aware she was in his company. They quickly apologized for the interruption and backed off immediately.

She had grown accustom to it now. They were as much a part of her as Red was.

She smiled warmly at the thought. But not to Red Reddington. She fumed in silence.

“I would like to add an addendum to that request.” Red continued. “From this moment forward, unless it is of a dire emergency,” he looked between the men at the table and the phone, “no interruptions after we go to bed. No phone calls, specifically.”

Dembe lifted his cup, sipping the warmed beverage, his brow furrowed thoughtfully.

“There will be some significant changes coming soon.” Red stated emphatically. “Priorities have changed.”

Liz felt a little put out, truth told. She felt responsible for her guys being on the receiving end of this reprimand.

“I know you have to make your rounds, I know you have to see to her safety...” Red said, “but a simple radio check enquiring as to our well being will suffice from now on.”

A round of mumbled assurance followed.

“To state it bluntly,” Red laced his fingers, leaning into his elbows, “Lizzy and I are dating and we want time... alone. Without the threat of being stumbling over while we are being intimate.”

Silas dipped his head, pinching his mouth together... tightly. He shifted uncomfortably in his seat, his brow darkening as well.

“Unless there is an imminent threat to Elizabeth’s safety, some dastardly foe is threatening a takeover... or someone is near death or has died,” Red narrowed his eyes, “when the bedroom door is closed,” the man’s tone hardened, “I demand privacy... for us. Is that understood?”

A more pronounced round of, ‘Yes, Sir’s’, followed.
Red jerked his head once, content that his point was made. “Thank you for your understanding on this matter.”

He hung up the phone, leaving the room in silence.

“I am in no way negating your assistance during Lizzy’s... nightmare,” Red clarified to those sitting at the table, “I–”

“There was a standing order of ‘do not disturb’,” Silas interrupted, “seeing that it was an important occasion.” the man’s eyes softened on the woman across from him, much to Red’s surprise. “But with Dembe off the clock and Michael in flight...”

“I understand.” Red nodded. And he did. “I was not referencing your interruption, Silas. It only made me realize something had to change, however.”

Silas sat back, crossing his arms, waiting.

“I don’t expect any of my people to respond to business dealings if they are off duty, as you know.” Red continued. “That most of you do is testimony to how correct I was in my decision to add you to our little family.”

The men at the table shrugged off the praise nonchalantly, much to Liz’s vexation.

“I know you were between a rock and a hard place,” Red said, tapping his finger idly on the table top, his attention once again for Silas. “And my work with Michael, as you know, is usually time sensitive.”

Liz watched Red’s finger move rapidly on the surface of the wood. It was a sure indication Red’s brain was firing and active.

“Congratulations are in order.” he said suddenly, looking between the two guards. “You two,” he gestured accordingly, “have just been promoted.”

“What?” Silas questioned instantly, his brow furrowing.

“You know this job just as well as we do.” Red waved a hand between himself and Dembe. “You know my preferred associates and merchandise.” he continued. “There is no reason why you should wait to have my ‘go-ahead’ to move a damn shipment.”

Dembe nodded his approval and agreement, “You and Joseph are more than capable of moving things along.”

Silas brooded, “I don’t want that responsibi–”

“You have it.” Red interrupted Silas’ refusal. “Deal with it.”

Dembe nodded again, “Deal with it.”

Silas sulked, “And if we should fuck up?” he questioned seriously.

Red cut his eyes, the look contained within, an obvious one, “You won’t.” he was positive.

“But if we did.” Silas stressed.

“Raymond fucks up all the time.” Dembe shrugged. Raymond exchanged a disgruntled stare.
Liz's brows lifted with surprise, hearing the unexpected profanity pass Dembe's lips.

"Be that as it may." Red offered one meaningful glare to Dembe, "There isn’t anything we can’t fix." he assured still looking at Dembe.

"Oh, yeah," Silas remembered one incident in particular, "remember that time you screwed up that arms shipment deal--"

"That wasn’t me." Red snapped. "It was Francis."

"It was you." Dembe corrected.

"They were ‘bad ju-ju’ guns," Red air quoted irritably, "that’s why Francis changed his mind at the last minute and messed up the deal."

"That’s not how it was at all." Silas remembered another version of the story.

"Bad ju-ju guns?" Liz had picked up on the phrase instantly.

"The cache had been used in some questionable activities." Dembe explained the use of the odd descriptor. "It is considered bad luck to pass on such items."

"Questionable activities?" Liz was enraptured.

"You’re missing the point here." Silas argued. "We’re talking about Red screwing up."

"Now, wait a minute," Red took umbrage, "I said... it wasn’t m--"

"Francis saved the day, not you." Dembe purposely pushed his friends buttons if only to see Red’s reaction.

"What?!" Red barked. "If he hadn’t wanted the damned rifles we could have simply passed on the whole deal, but no."

"He’s not psychic, Red." Silas jumped on Dembe’s bandwagon sensing the game was afoot. "How could Francis know the guns were tainted?"

"And why not acquire the weapons, they sold for a good profit, didn’t they?" Dembe countered.

"Because," Red reminded, "I negotiated the new price."

"No harm, no foul." Dembe nodded regally.

Red’s expression was incredulous.

Liz held her amusement admirably knowing Dembe and Silas were just prodding the man.

"Can we get back on topic?" Red demanded.

"Do I get more money?" Silas enquired. "And a fancy new title?"

"I’ll think about the money and no, you get no fancy title." Red snapped.

Joe looked decidedly crestfallen, "I wanted a fancy title."

"Look, we’ll do a trial run." Red offered. "Six months, see how things go."
Silas nodded after a moment, agreeing to the terms, “I want to be addressed as Chief of Security and Defense.” he hooked a thumb at Joe. “He can be my Secretary.”

“Oh, hell no.” Joe protested strenuously. “He’ll want me to get his coffee.”

“Other than that,” Red managed to curtail his tendency to draw his weapon, “keep me the hell out of it. Making up an out and out lie to whomever is wanting my attention, is totally fine with me as long as I am not disturbed otherwise.”

The men looked to one another, shrugging.

“Look, we’ve been at this long enough, we know a real emergency when we hear one.” Red sighed.

“Replacing the inventory after a warehouse fire can be handled anytime.” Dembe agreed, adding his own thoughts to the matter at hand. “Francis getting shot at...”

“Is to be expected.” Silas muttered into his coffee cup.

Liz held her giggle admirably, but not her smile.

Red sighed, shrugging slightly himself. “The point of the matter is,” he turned his eyes to Lizzy, “we deserve some damn down time. Between the four of us, that shouldn’t be too hard to accomplish.”

The men digested the words, not disliking the intent behind them.

“On a personal note,” Red’s eyes softened on Elizabeth, “I need time, alone... with her.” he murmured. “Private time.”

That had been the whole reason behind the announcement today, after all.

All the men at the table more than understood that sentiment.

“It’s high time Elizabeth, and my private life, took priority.” Red rubbed his suddenly aching neck. “You people give me a headache.”

“You used to be able to multi-task.” Silas tsked. “You’re slipping, Red.” he remarked casually.

“I beg to differ.” Liz defended Red’s honor. “He’s more than efficient at multi-tasking.”

Scoffing quietly, Silas popped the last of his bacon in his mouth, pushing his seat back just as Dembe and Joe did.

“It’s good to know at least Big Red,” Silas managed tongue-in-cheek, trailing after Dembe, “isn’t falling down on the job.”

Dembe smiled his amusement as the men exited the room.

Red rolled slow eyes Lizzy’s way, his expression a scolding one. Liz ducked her head, quickly biting into her muffin, hiding her silent laughter.

“I’m going to get you for that, Lizzy.” Red mumbled his discord.

~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~

Red leaned against the car, his arms wrapped about Elizabeth’s hips, his wrists linked. The ground crew loaded luggage and fueled Michael’s jet.
He smiled indulgently as the woman looked about her surroundings with avid interest, watching all the scurrying about as a new flight crew arrived, relieving the others. Silas and Hunter assisted David up the steep staircase, all the while ribbing the guy for being such a nuisance.

“You haven’t said much since we left the penthouse.” Red remarked casually. “Are you angry with me?”

“Well, yeah, at first but not now,” Liz pulled back slightly, frowning, “Why? Should I be?”

“About a great many things.” Red replied. “I would imagine.”

“Your little meeting with the guys was impromptu, I’ll give you that.” Liz quirked her mouth derisively. “But no... I’m not angry. Not after I realized what was going on.”

Red’s expression roughened as did his tone, “I do need time alone with you.”

She smiled softly, “It was nice to hear it said aloud.”

He scowled irritably, “I’m not asking for too damn much in the grand scheme of things... am I?”

Liz frowned, hearing the man’s underlying guilt. “Red, whether I’m in the picture or not, any man under the constant strain and stress you are, needs downtime. As much as he can get, if you ask my humble opinion.”

Red rubbed his shoulder, working the tense muscle.

“Stop feeling guilty for being human.” she settled into his chest. “Even you need to sleep.”

Red looked tired today. She studied his face, “I’m sorry I disturbed your sleep last night.”

Red could not simply shut down his mind as she could. He was awake long after she had drifted off, she knew.

He had a habit of running scenarios and possible ways to handle such occurrences should they happen again.

It was just his way.

Red sighed, soothingly rubbing his palm against the small of her back, “I feel shitty, leaving you after what happened last night.”

Liz sighed, shaking her head at all this guilt the man was experiencing this morning.

“Stop it, please, I’m fine.” she assured, even as doubt edged his features. “I would tell you if I wasn’t.”

“Would you?” he shifted an edgy look her way.

“I confided in you last night,” she reminded, “didn’t I?”

Red nodded grudgingly, “And if it happens again tonight?”

Liz held his eyes, scratching her nails soothingly into his nape, a small smile curving her lips.

“You are definitely one of the good guys, Red Reddington. Why didn’t I see it sooner?”
He worried about a repeat of last nights performance, he obviously wished to be there for her... which touched her deeply.

“Then I will call you.” she leaned, kissing him softly. “I promise.”

Red pondered the woman’s mood, his own a little low.

She genuinely seemed all right now... and he did believe she would reach out in some form or other.

“What are you doing today?” he changed the subject in hopes she would be free and could possibly accompany him.

“With Ressler out of sorts,” she shrugged, “I guess I’ll be helping the team with paperwork.”

Samar said what was found so far would fill three warehouses. Lawford had an extensive racket going on.

Red sighed internally, disappointment welling in his chest.

“There’s a lot of inventory to categorize,” she stated casually, “from what I’m understanding?”

Red knew, Francis’ men had already cleared out the bounty they wanted before giving the locations to the Fed’s. But what was left on the preliminary lists was a lot to break down.

“Was there a reason you asked?” Liz questioned.

“Wishful thinking on my part.” Red confessed. “Thinking perhaps, you could fly out with me.”

“I could take the files with me...” Liz was quick to offer.

Red cricked his neck, popping it.

“I would love for you to go,” he hedged indecisively. “But you’re needed here to act as my go between should Francis’ men deliver more dirt on Lawford.”

He just didn’t trust anyone other than Lizzy to get the information to the correct sources. The end game mattered on this one.

“How long do you expect to be gone?” she frowned, trailing a finger over the knot in his tie.

“Could be a day or two.” he realized. “I really don’t know. There are going to be a lot of players on the field.”

“Oh...” she slid her hand down his chest, playing with his vest button, “well, we should be about two days here so... maybe we’ll get done at the same time?” she lifted hopeful eyes.

Red nodded solemnly, sighing his resignation. As much as he would love to spend every minute with Lizzy... they did have work and other outside interference to contend with. Such as life.

His eyes shifted over her shoulder when Dembe came into view in the jet’s doorway. The large man gave a simple wave indicating they were ready to depart.

“At least we’ll both be busy.” she tried for a brightness she didn’t feel. “The time will go by quickly, right?”

Red stood, kissing the mouth he adored, “I hope so, baby,” he got lost in those blue eyes for a long Red reluctantly took his leave, boarding the plane. Liz smiled brightly when the man turned at the top of the stairs, looking down at her... the indecision still clearly written in his features.

An unseen person distracted him to his left.

She chuckled to herself when Red instantly turned, bitching at whoever disturbed their last farewell.
He sighed heavily, offering one last wave before disappearing from view.

Standing beside her guard, Liz waved absently at the plane as it taxied past her.

As the jet roared down the runway becoming airborne in seconds, she was embarrassed to feel a rush of heat fill her eyes. Blinking rapidly to hide the fact, she was mortified when she could not prevent the hot tears wetting her cheeks.

She had not expected the depth of emotion at the man’s absence. She certainly didn’t anticipate this reaction, especially not in front of her surly guard.

To her shock, Silas only smiled, handing over a handkerchief. He opened the back door of their car, esthering her inside.

Liz quickly accepted the out, grateful to have the time and privacy to put herself to rights before meeting with her team. She knew there was nothing that would alter her somber mood, but she attempted the mind-set of a staid FBI agent.

“Where to?” Silas asked, sliding the SUV effortlessly into the heavy traffic flow of an early New York morning.

“The hotel, I guess.” she ran the edge of the handkerchief along her eyes, blotting away the small streaks beneath them. “Ressler, if not the team, should be there.”

Checking in the mirror, Silas crossed lanes easily, heading in the needed direction.

As they neared their location, Liz was surprised to realize she felt indifferent about meeting with her team.

On second thought, maybe not so surprising. There was a new dynamic in play, one which she was uncertain about as yet. Wilson seemed to gel well enough with everyone. But Moore...

She felt the muscles in her body start to tense, readying itself for conflict.

There was a possible bright side, she reminded herself. With Ressler on restricted duty; Moore,
Wilson, and poor unfortunate, Samar would be left to the off-site duty of securing Lawford’s bolt-holes scattered about the city.

Working with Donald and Aram would be just fine with her.

Silas eased up towards the valet who guarded the grand hotel’s opulent threshold like a Sentinel of old.

Liz gathered the last of her belongings as Silas came around the car, waving the young attendant aside.
Silas reached for her door, hesitating in his movements as Joe approached, a pinched look on the other man’s handsome face.

Liz looked out at the two men as they conferred. Both sought a location around the back of the car.

She knocked restlessly at the window, waving impatiently for them to move so she could exit the vehicle.

Silas rolled his eyes at the impatient woman, opening the door, “Stay close.” he directed.

“What’s going on?” she frowned as Joe secured her satchel, offering a hand as she clamored out of the back door.

“Tom’s across the street.” she was informed, Silas’ surliness having returned in spades.

“God...” Liz groaned dismally, “doesn’t he have a life?”

As her guards guided her forward, Liz’s eyes swept the street, finally landing on the nuisance she was trying to locate.

“It’s like a sick game of, Where’s Waldo.” she huffed her annoyance, irritated by the smile Tom offered.

They stepped inside the safety of the hotel lobby, both men taking flanking positions about her as they steered her towards the elevator bank.

“He was between the nun and the hotdog stand.” Joe helpfully replied.

“A nun and a hotdog stand.” Silas snipped.

“The nun and the beach umbrella?” Joe tried again to appease Silas’ darkened mood.

Liz chuckled, picturing the scene. New York did resemble the chaotic and eclectic venue Waldo usually found himself in.

“Waldo was a snazzier dresser.” Silas muttered, jabbing the button for the correct floor.

Liz tittered, a thought occurring, however, “Did Tom just arrive?”

“Night-shift said they saw him arrive about seven this morning.” Joe replied.

“How did he find us here?” she frowned her concern. “How did he know we would come here?”

“Dipshit worked for Lawford a couple times.” Silas shrugged. “And we haven’t been at the house...”

Liz’s brows lifted with initial surprise only to quirk a moment later, the surprise gone. How many other things did she not know about her former husband?

“Knowing Red wasn’t a fan of the bastard,” Silas continued, “it probably wasn’t hard to guess how Lawford ended up in federal custody.”

“Say what you like, but Stalker boy isn’t stupid... for the most part.” Joe had to give props where they were due.
And of course, Tom would know Red had an advantage, being in cahoots with the FBI. If Red wanted Lawford out of the picture for whatever reason, Lawford didn’t really stand a chance.

Oh, well...

“But how did he find us here?” Liz still had to wonder.

“You think he followed one of the team?” Liz questioned.

“That,” Silas nodded, “or he knew this was really the only place that would house all the people in our entourage.”

Liz frowned hard at the thought. Was Red getting predictable? Had he been so distracted by her that he was allowing-

“Don’t worry.” Silas checked the floor before guiding her out of the elevator.

“When Red’s here,” Joe took the rear position as they walked the hall, “management locks this place up nice and tight. Fort Knox pales in comparison.”

“Red says it would be easy to break into Fort Knox.” Liz relaxed, pushing away her earlier concerns. Of course Red would stay where they were afforded the best security.

“But,” a sudden thought occurred, “it stands to reason security would resume normal operations with Red not in house.” she halted her steps, concern flooding back.

“No,” Silas said, “because you’re here.” he cut her a glance that said, she should know better. “Red... and your surrogate daddy, made it very clear if something happened to you, Ricco would be pushing up daisies.”

“Ricco,” Joe air-quoted,” is management.”

Liz gaped, her eyes widening, “What do you mean... surrogate dadd–”

“Ricco is an associate of Antonio Crocetti’s.” Silas shrugged, as if that explanation were enough.

Liz’s cheeks flushed. She was very fond of Antonio, probably more than she should be but it felt funny, the phrase Silas had used.

She wasn’t offended, certainly because she found Antonio’s presence very comforting. Something about him just... put her at ease. Should it be that way?

“They don’t really think I’m...”

“Antonio’s daughter?” Silas grinned. “If I didn’t know the man, I would assume you were, the way he’s taken to you. It’s logical to assume such a thing, isn’t it?”

“Not so much of an assumption,” Joe snickered behind them, “You should hear Ricco’s men gossiping about how Antonio’s illegitimate daughter is shacked up with Reddington.”

Silas chortled quietly, shaking his head at the news, “Look at you, keeping it in the family.” he approved.
Liz groaned, dropping her reddened cheeks into her hands, “How embarrassing.”

“Don’t knock it.” Silas shrugged. “Because of such beliefs, you have some of the best in the underground offering protection. People will think twice before treading into those dangerous waters.”

“Tom knows I’m not Antonio’s daughter though.” Liz reminded.

“Doesn’t matter what that prick knows.” Joe said. “All that matters is what Ricco and his men think.”

Liz drew in a cleansing breath, sighing it out, “I hope so.”

“And those men have been provided a photo of Stalker Boy.” Silas assured. “He’s not getting on the property.”

“Unless they want him to.” Joe remarked innocently.

Liz and Silas scowled at the man, until Liz shrugged carelessly. If Tom was dumb enough to try and breach the property and get caught while doing so... it was no skin off her back.

“If Tom does get on the property,” Silas added, “it was by design and it’s not going to be pretty, let’s just say that.” he shrugged carelessly. “He hasn’t made a move so far. Why rock the boat, especially here?”

“It still boggles the mind though.” Joe commented. “Why the guy just lurks about. What’s it proving? What’s his game?”

“He has an agenda, rest assured.” Silas knew. “He’s waiting for the right moment. Waiting for an in... which will never come.” he narrowed his eyes at the woman beside him. “Will it...”

“I hope not.” Liz murmured, lost in her private thoughts.

Liz felt a release of tension she hadn’t been aware she was carrying at the words. She would trust Red and Antonio’s reputation and continue to see Tom as nothing more than the pest he was.

Coming align with her teams door, she took a deep fortifying breath. Might as well get the show on the road.

The team hit their stride within a half hour and kept the pace well. The paperwork and data entry had been as expected. Cataloging inventory as it became available was a no-brainer.

But six hours in, Liz was ready to pull her hair out.

Things had not progressed as she had envisioned.

Though the suite was spacious, the entire team made the space feel suffocating. Trying to make headway while squeezing past each other for access to printers and other key systems, was aggravating.

That, along with the constant bickering and lack of a break and food, was slowly wearing her thin.

Liz’s only distraction was looking up every once in a while, finding her guards offering amusing facial expressions, or interesting hand gestures behind Moore’s back every time the Agent opened his mouth to insert foot.

Liz arose, stretching her aching and cramped foot. She distracted herself by offering Silas and Joe each a cup of coffee.

She more than understood their boredom... and overwhelming annoyance which was clearly evident in their stances and frequent sighs. She offered them a commiserating glance of apology.

Taking a mouthful of the much needed caffeine, Liz turned her attention back to the ongoing conversation. There finally seemed an end in sight.

Ressler was stacking a file of discarded information already entered, “We have a handle on this end of things.” Ressler indicated Liz and Aram. “You can get out there now,” he gestured to Samar, “and get moving on this. Navabi, will take lead on the–”

Moore halted in his stride, his brow furrowing darkly, “What a minute,” he shot a disparaging scowl to an unsuspecting Samar Navabi, “are you naming her as team leader on this outing?”

Ressler’s expression altered at the veiled tone and intended insult, “You got a problem with my call, Moore?”

Navabi’s lovely features clouded over. It wasn’t as if she was not accustomed to such male posturing and tactics.

She had encountered them her entire life, even more so these past few years as an Agent.

It still royally pissed her off that her credentials were constantly being called into question.

“I got nothing against women out here on the front lines,” Moore lied through his teeth but was smart enough to have learned how to navigate the political minefields of his day, “but if we’re being honest here. I actually have seniority in this matter. If you’ve forgotten the fact, I would like it officially noted... I am reminding everyone present.”

Liz quickly took a drink, smothering her laughter when Joe released a low but continuous expulsion of air from below the belt... alerting Moore just what he thought of the man’s seniority.

Silas gave the man an approving nod.

Ressler’s body language was stiff and unyielding, “When I want or need a reminder on any point, I’ll let you know.”

Liz watched Silas carefully for the man had broke off his good-natured ribbing of Joe and had fallen uncomfortably quiet. The light blue-grey eyes watched the unfolding scene with veiled animosity.

It was adamantly clear, Moore had made a grievous mistake in questioning Ressler’s decision.

Liz wasn’t certain why her guard was suddenly so invested in the subject at hand but she did sense a problem was about to rear its ugly head.

“I neither want or need input in my decision making.” Ressler let it be known.

How anyone, male or female, could question Samar’s worth or believe the woman anything other than capable was a mystery to Elizabeth Keen.

“You got an issue with that, take it up with Cooper.” Ressler was in pain, his temper short today.
“I’m just saying,” Moore shrugged carelessly, “there are procedures in place. There is a lot of interest in this case. People high up on the food chain are watching how we handle this.”

“When are they not?” Aram mumbled, irritated for the entire conversation rankled his ire, truth told. He felt bad for the woman beside him who stood by so gravely quiet.

“Yeah well, Navabi has more training in the field than you do.” Ressler pointed out purposely, to Moore if nothing else.

The guy’s complexion reddened for Silas had chuckled lowly... not a particularly pleasant sound either.

“As a Mossad agent.” Moore scoffed his disdain.

Silas’ chuckled died an unnatural death. The man’s expression altered visibly. He slowly pushed himself from his slouched pose against a convenient wall, “What the fuck is that supposed to signify?”

Liz cut him a warning look which was promptly ignored to her chagrin.

Silas approached Moore, his features masked into rigid placidity, “You have something you want to air, spit it out.”

Moore looked the massive man over carefully, “Their training is not the same, is all I’m saying,” the Agent waved a dismissive hand, “we aren’t allowed the freedom they are. Such tactics get our cases blown out of the water in an American court of law. Is that what we want here?”

“You know what I want?” Silas leaned into Moore’s space, his tone almost pleasant. “It’s to throw your sorry, useless ass out the first available fucking window I find.”

Moore was taken aback by the hostility displayed, “What’s your problem? I’m raising a legitimate point here.”

“I don’t need you to take up for me.” Samar stepped between the two men, her pretty features off-putting to say the least.

She pushed Silas’ bulky chest with a slender finger.

The man glanced at the contact.

Liz chewed nervously on her swizzle stick, the taste of coffee somehow soothing her frayed nerves.

Silas refused to move one iota, his gaze a placid one of the pretty Agent’s face.

Samar turned about, her voice not once raising, “Mossad training far exceeds your rather inadequate American tactics.”

“Then I would say.” Moore felt on more comfortable ground facing down a female, “your loyalties might be called into question, if you truly believe that crap you’re spewing.”

Silas’ beefy fist lashed out around the tiny figure between him and his nemesis, his fingers curling tightly into a band of steel about Moore’s lapel and shirt.

“Silas!” Liz hastened forward, her coffee cup slammed down hard on a surface as she passed. “Stop! Don’t!”
But Silas wasn’t having any of it at present. He swiftly stepped around Samar, shoving Moore hard against the opposite wall before anyone could blink.

The momentum sent Moore stumbling back, his head hitting the surface with a sickening thud. A shelf beside them crashed to the floor, masking the sound of the air knocked from the man’s lungs.

Shaking his head, Moore was more stunned than anything at present. He tried to assimilate what had happened so rapidly, it took him by total surprise.

“Silas!” Samar snapped her growing anger.

Liz grasp the man’s burly bicep feeling the tendons pull and tug as the guard secured Moore securely in place.

Silas’ face was a mask of rage and discontent.

“Silas, you listen to me!” Liz commanded. “Stop this, this instant!”

Silas fiery eyes held Moore’s, “Gonna throw your disgusting ass out that window over there....” he jerked his head accordingly to the nearest ‘exit’ available.

“I figure it’s a ten story drop... think you’ll shit yourself before you hit the concrete below? I’m betting,” he seethed, sliding the puny individual closer to the window, “…you will.”

“Silas!” Liz was beside herself. “I said, no!”

Moore, having been taken by surprise, was floundering. Silas had moved his forearm directly over the man’s windpipe, holding any objections or struggles to a minimum.

The Agent’s attempts to free himself from his precarious predicament were greatly subdued by such actions.

“If anyone’s loyalties are in question here,” Silas’ tone was soft and menacing, the ice blue eyes darkening to a dangerous hue, “it would be yours.”

Moore’s fingers gripped frantically at the tight hold against his throat.

“You’ve done nothing but add stress and dissension to this operation the entire time you’ve been involved in it.” Silas jerked his free arm from Elizabeth’s constant attempts to dislodge his hold on Moore.

He leaned closer to his flailing victim, “I’ve taken enough of your shit and that’s why,” he smiled pleasantly, “I’m going to really enjoy tossing your ass out that fucking window.”

Liz’s mouth set stubbornly. She latched on to the burly man’s arm yet again.

“This is not the way.” Samar’s tight tone warned the guard, the dark eyes beseeching Silas.

“Red wants to speak with you.” Joe stepped forward, phone held out between the two sparring participants.

Silas glared at it angrily turning that stare to his counterpart.

Joe shrugged aimlessly holding the cell diligently, weathering the storm of his friend and superiors ire.
“I don’t know what the hell is going on.” Red’s clipped words permeated the suddenly silent room.

Ressler sat back, arms folded, merely watching the scene play out, seemingly content to do so without interference or objections on his part.

Liz threw frantic glances the guy’s way from time to time but it was clear she would get no help from that source.

“But I want it halted immediately.” Red’s words put a damper on the situation at hand.

Silas glanced at the phone, his expression benign now but he had not moved one iota from his intended purpose, Liz noted.

She held fast to her guard’s arm. She and Samar exchanged fretful glances from time to time.

“What the hell kind of situation do you think you’ve put Elizabeth into?” Red’s tone was frigid. “What consequences of your actions will she be left to clear up?”

Silas’ expression altered visibly.

“Why do you think I didn’t toss the bastard out the planes doors?” Red was beyond furious. “Is it really like me to not handle a nuisance in such a manner?”

Silas straightened a tad. Liz felt the tension ease in the man’s body.

“There was a reason I didn’t take care of the issue, personally.”

Silas’ eyes sought out Elizabeth’s stricken face.

“The FBI has cut us a lot of slack.” Red continued. “Throwing one of its representatives out a window will be looked upon dimly, I should imagine. And who will get the flack for such an action?”

“He deserves it!” Silas barked, his arm once again reestablishing its hold against Moore’s throat.

“Does Elizabeth?” Red grated.

Silas closed his eyes, a hard decision having been made.

He eased off Moore in a quick, efficient move.

The guy dropped to the ground, gasping for air.

Silas stood over his foe, his expression not exactly a friendly one.

“I hate this bastard.” he spat his disdain.

“...Yeah, we all get that.” Red let out a controlled breath, sensing the worst had passed. He straightened himself slowly easing the tension from his body. “I believe you have conveyed your feelings on the matter quite succinctly.”

Ressler grinned at nothing in particular. Elizabeth saw the man in a new light, not certain of her feelings on the matter in truth.

Donald went back to his paperwork.
Moore crawled a safe distance away, taking time to regain his lost equilibrium.

Silas’ eyes followed the man with a detached brooding.

“He’s been spewing his filth the entire morning. I’m sick of it!” Silas snapped, his temper, once aroused, difficult to dismiss. “If he opens his mouth one more time...”

“Close it with your fist.” Red suggested tightly. “And that is the extent of how you will manage the matter, do you understand me?”

“Or what?” Silas disdained.

Liz was crushed, having hoped Red could defuse the situation.

“You’ll fire my ass?” Silas scoffed his disgust.

“You know that will never come to pass.” Red shared the truth. “But you also know... if you cross me, there will be consequences.”

Silas’ eyes narrowed, “Are you threatening me?” the idea seemed ludicrous. Silas even managed a choked laugh of disbelief.

“I believe I am, yes.” Red warmed to his mission. “How does an unexpected and distinctly extended visit from your dear Aunt Gertrude sound to you?”

Silas’ face went blank.

Elizabeth sensed a change in the guy. Silas had clearly forgotten all about Richard Moore.

He sought an affiliation with one of his own kind. Joe shrugged helplessly, frantically waving his hands about, his eyes suddenly panicked.

The beefy guard grimaced his discord, dismissing Joe’s concerns gruffly.

Silas demanded details on this latest development, “What the hell are you talking abou–”

“Dear, precious, Gertie.” Red lifted his head, smirking wistfully, “I haven’t thought of her in years! Yes... yes, it’s high time I extended a heartfelt invitation to our... your... beloved, benevolent Aunt, don’t you think?”

Silas’ face was kind of chalky, Liz noted. Her heart thumped heavily in her chest. What the hell was going on between the most important men in her life.

“Wouldn’t it be wonderful to see her angelic face again.” Red nodded amiably, knowing he had the guards undivided attention. He sat his tumbler aside, straightening the back of his vest.

“After so long an absence. I’m sure you miss her terribly.” the rolling timber of Red’s voice sent shivers down even Liz’s spine. If she didn’t know any better, she would believe Red was threatening her guard.

“...Look, Red,” Silas sing-singed his head, “maybe I was a little out of line with that ‘throw his ass out the window’ thing...”

Ressler jerked his head about, his interest immediately fixed and forthcoming.

“Besides, Aunt Gertie... she doesn’t travel so well these days, remember.” Silas reminded helpfully.
“Nonsense, she was the picture of health and vitality the last time we visited.” Red dismissed. “I’m sure she would welcome a change of scenery... of course, I will spare no expense to ensure she travels in the very lap of luxury.”

Red rubbed his hands together. Was he enjoying this a little too much?

“We owe her a great deal after all. She was so considerate and attentive to all our needs when we needed her most, I might add.” Red cheerfully recalled.

Silas’ complexion had gone from pale to ashen.

“She didn’t care to help out... it’s just her way.” Joe thought he better help out a floundering workmate.

“Yeah, she wouldn’t expect any type of repayment.” Silas was quick to add.

“All the more reason to offer it.” Red shrugged. “It is long overdue if you ask me.”

Silas wasn’t sure if that ‘long overdue’ thing referenced to himself needing an attitude adjustment... or Red really just wanted to repay his Aunt.

He kinda thought it was the former.

“What fun it was...” Red shuddered himself having to relive the couple of days... my God, had it only been forty-eight hours that he and his men had been forced to hole-up on Gertie’s estate?

“It was the Russians that time, right?” he checked his facts. “They were very determined to locate us, as I recall. And do they ever hold grudges...”

Silas’ head fell back, a pained expression crossing his face.

“It wasn’t fun, Red.” Joe cringed each and every time those days were called to mind. “I love your Aunt, Silas but... good Lord,” he grimaced accordingly, “by the time she finished with us, I was seriously considering giving myself over to certain painful death after even one day with that woman.”

Silas offered a disparaging glare, “She ain’t that bad.”

“Oh, I beg to differ.” Joe was pretty sure she was. “Those two old ladies in Arsenic and Old Lace got nothing on her, let me tell ya.”

Silas grumbled aside, “She’s just concerned for... people. She don’t mean anything by it.”

“She drove you crazy.” Joe argued. “You got so bad, Red took all your weapons, man.”

Silas shuddered visibly. He crooked his neck, “She harps on... things, that’s all. I should have better control.”

“She pushes your buttons.” Joe nodded sagely. “And you let her.”

“She’s my Aunt!” Silas snapped.

Joe held up the universal sign of peace.

“She is merely eccentric in her ways.” Red disagreed. “Capricious, as it were. Delightful character traits.”
Elizabeth noted Moore had managed to stumble to a nearby chair. The man nursed his bruises, having fallen silent.

“Yeah well, Aunt Abby and Aunt Martha murdered twelve lonely old men in the movie.” Joe stated. “And one could call them, eccentric I guess.”

“And don’t you think it odd,” Red made mention, “your Aunt Gertie kept foisting her homemade apricot wine on us... reminiscent of Aunt Abby and Martha’s ‘elderberry wine’ in the movie.”

Red laughed at the coincidence, “How utterly charming.”

“I was seriously thinking about accepting a glass or two there towards the end.” Joe said.

“That ain’t funny, dammit!” Silas barked.

“Did anyone think to check dear, angelic Gertie’s cellar for bodies?” Red quipped freely. “Just an after thought.”

“You guys are hilarious.” Silas’ temper was coming to the fore. “Ain’t nothing wrong with my Aunt.”

“Perish the thought, God no.” Red quickly diffused any ruffled feelings. “I still cherish the doilies she crocheted me... to this day. I dare anyone to say or even think a disparaging word about the woman.”

Silas’ expression said it all.

Elizabeth wanted to go over and console the man in reality. He looked so forlorn.

“So you agree then.” Red was happy and content once more. “We should definitely extend our invitation?”

“Maybe we can talk about it later, Red.” Liz stepped in, leaning to the cell Joe still held placed strategically on speaker phone. “It’s certainly a lovely thought though.” she sought a grateful Silas. “Can we call you a little later on the matter?”

“Of course, Elizabeth.” Red could afford to be magnanimous now. He had proven his point well, after all.

He was still top dog.

“Whatever you say but I think it’s a marvelous idea!” he finished enthusiastically.

The silence which met the last statement felt rather ominous to Liz’s way of thinking.

“Eh,” she smiled brightly, bolstering the troops, “it’s very kind of you to think of such a lovely gift for Silas.”

Silas cast her a dark, surly glance. Apparently, he saw the gesture in another light.

“Hey, boss,” Joe piped up, a thought occurring which tickled him, “don’t you think it’s funny? How Silas here is so much like that Jonathan Brewster guy.”

Silas whipped his head about, his expression incredulous.
“Well, you are.” Joe continued. “The maniacal killer nephew who is really bothered by the fact his spinster Aunts out did him in the body count for the family.”

Silas spread his hands curtly, his face allowed the disbelief he was experiencing.

Red chuckled his amusement, “Well you know how competitive Silas can be.”

“You are a little over the top on that subject.” Joe felt a little bad for the needless reminder now, having seen Silas’ reaction to his observation.

“I’m gonna throw your ass out the window.” Silas promised.

Joe scowled slightly, “You are in a mood today.” he observed again, before brightening. “And no you won’t, because I am the only one to take night shift tonight.”

Silas scowled, popping his neck irritably, disliking the truth when he heard it.

“Is the charming Agent Navabi preset?” Red asked as if he didn’t know better. He had another point to make to those listening in.

All eyes turned towards the charming woman. Navabi stepped up to the cell.

“Yes, I’m here.” her pretty brow showed her confusion to be the sudden center of attention.

“Francis tells me that your special qualifications might be required on this outing, my dear.” Red’s tone was more business like.

Samar’s shoulders lost some of their rigidity, “And what might those be?”

“Seems our old pal Lawford’s depravity exceeds even our expectations,” Red continued, propping his feet to a comfortable perch. “He’s been playing in the cesspool with our old adversaries, Al-Qaeda.” he allowed all to digest the news. “You are more than acquainted with their methods and ideology, as I recall.”

Samar lifted her chin a little higher, listening intently.

“You have viable contacts in Mossad who will be able to coordinate and advise us on the latest Intel, I hope?” Red put another nail in Moore’s coffin. It gave him great pleasure to do so. “What an invaluable asset you are turning out to be.”

Samar was grateful someone appreciated her input and expertise, “I don’t know how valuable I can be but I will certainly try my best to help out.”

Silas gave a sullen Moore a cryptic sneer, “Which is more than you’ve ever done.”

Moore chose to ignore the taunt completely.

“Silas...” Red intoned.

“I don’t like the douche bag.”

“So you’ve said.” Red nodded gingerly.

Liz glanced nervously at her guard. She wondered secretly if Silas would have made good on his threat before.
He was in the process of dragging Moore to the patio doors which opened onto a rather spacious deck overlooking the street below... when Red’s timely phone call materialized.

It was all she and Samar could do to place themselves between the area and the two combatants, hoping somewhere along the way Silas’ common sense would kick in.

Of course that common sense would have kicked in, she was almost one hundred percent certain... almost.

Moore sat dejectedly, staring morosely at a spot in the carpet. It was the only evidence the man was still present and accounted for.

She shuddered to think of the repercussions had Silas actually followed through on his intent in a room full of witnesses... all members of a very official... unofficial... Federal Government organization.

“Take me off speaker and hand the phone to the moron.” Red advised shortly.

Joe hesitated, checking with Elizabeth who looked between the man himself, Silas and Moore before shrugging her confusion.

Joe screwed up his face in a jeering sneer when Liz had included him in the mix, “Which moron?”

Silas’ mouth tightened as he grasp the phone, “Her moron... you moron!” he had indicated Elizabeth. “What?!”

“She’s got enough shit going on right now,” Red’s tone matched the guard’s, “without you fucking with her too.”

Silas’ eyes scanned Liz’s worried expression.

“Stop babying her. She’s a big girl and can well defend herself against the likes of me.” Silas retorted. “I’ve trained her just for such an eventuality.”

“She shouldn’t have to!” Red grated.

Silas fell silent for a beat, “...I’ll make it right.” he advised tightly.

“See that you do.” Red snapped.

“She’s nothing but a little tattle tail!” Silas hissed irritably, making a face at the woman knowing instinctively what would make Liz feel better.

“He did it!” she pointed out Joe, then hesitated. “No, Moore did it.”

She grimaced accordingly, looking at Joe worriedly, not having meant to rat him out.

Chuckling, Joe hooked a beefy arm about her shoulders, dragging her into a brusque hold, patting her arm comfortingly.

“Don’t worry ’bout it. I’ve been called worse...” Joe philosophized, “mostly by him.” he indicated Silas. “It’s not like he can kill you or anything.” he cheered her spirits.

“I know...” she whined to the man, “it’s just... now he’s going to be grumpy all damn day.”

“How many times have I told you to obey Elizabeth’s orders?” Red sighed woefully.
“She didn’t order me to do anything.” Silas countered. “What’s that got to do with what went down? It was a momentary lapse in judgement, that’s all. And it was clearly her fault.”

Liz gaped at the man, instinctively swinging for Silas but Joe caught her fist in mid-flight. His actions drew soft rumbling laughter from Silas as well as Joe.

“I know you are attempting damage control.” Red knew Lizzy felt better now because of Silas’ response.

Silas grumbled imperceptibly, alerting Red they were on the same wave length.

“I know your girlfriends honor was at stake but–” Red lifted resigned brows. Joe had quickly assessed the developing situation for him.

“She’s not my girlfriend.” Silas grumbled into the line.

Liz’s head jerked back, a frown curving her mouth, “Who are you walking about?” she was more than interested about the one-sided conversation.

Silas lifted a negligent hand, “Not you, so go cry in your pillow.”

“Yeah,” Liz rolled her eyes expressively, “I am heart-broken.”

“We have to be more circumvent in our actions for a while.” Red continued. “Our normal mode of operation has to be curbed in relation to... certain circumstances if we are to be involved with the FBI.” he warned.

“I wasn’t really gonna toss the guy.”

“Yeah, Silas,” Red snapped, “you were.”

Silas smirked slowly, “Nah, just dangle him for a little while.”

“Don’t put Lizzy in that spot again!” Red stated. “Do you understand me.”

“Not used to suffering idiots gladly.” Silas half-heartedly defended himself.

“Look,” Red nodded curtly, “I hate the restrictions as well but for the time being, that’s how we roll.”

Silas sighed, glancing at the woman who stood by pensively biting her thumb nail, “I’m sorry.” he stated, his tone rather lackluster.

Joe chuckled quietly when the woman’s face fell further, misunderstanding the man’s intent. Had the talk gone awry? Was Silas leaving?

“He’s apologizing.” Joe soothed quickly. “In his own twisted way, granted.”

Red knew Silas was going to fuck with Lizzy no matter what. It was their thing. How they were bonding. But there had to be limits set.

Silas did feel bad for his part in the melodrama that went down here today. He stressed last night that he would be there for Liz... then willfully disregarded that promise a moment ago because his anger colored his judgement.

_He wasn’t about to admit the fact to Red Reddington._

Silas’ eyes softened on Liz’s face.

He reached, hooking the woman’s neck, dragging her closer, attempting to give her a noogie.

Joe shook his head, rubbing his eyes wearily at the less than suave attempt at affection but... it was just their way.

Liz screwed up her face like a kitten trying to get away from a overbearing mamma licking its face clean... but took the ‘cleaning’ grudgingly.

She rubbed her head gingerly, the spot raw from Silas’ less than gentle affection. She primly patted her hair back in place, glaring daggers at the man.

“Don’t you dare hang up before I talk to him.” Liz indicated the cell held so precariously in capable hands.

Silas grimaced a face, “Whatever.” he snapped right back.

Red relaxed. Things were back to normal.

“Oh...” the guard’s mind flitted forward to more interesting matters. “Tom showed up here, out of the blue.”

Red sat up, his brow furrowed.

Pinching her lips stubbornly, Liz elbowed her guard roughly, “I wanted to tell him that!” she hissed.

“Well I told him, what are you gonna do about it?” Silas wanted to know.

“Punch your lights out... that’s what!” Liz countered.

Red phased out the two bickering in the background, controlling the rush of trepidation he felt.

Francis tapped on the door of the private section of the jet, breaking his concentration, “Red, we’re landing in a few minutes.”

“Thank you,” he acknowledged the man, glancing down at his watch, “Dammit.” he sighed. “Who knew the little bastard watched CNN?”

He should have known Tom would hear of Lawford’s arrest and put two and two together.

“We got it covered.” Silas murmured, already knowing Red’s train of thought. “You know that.”

Red knew the hotel was swarming with security and FBI. Francis and Antonio’s men were also in surrounding properties... but still... he should be there.

“What do you think you could do, I won’t?” Silas purposely questioned. “You just gave me a promotion, let me earn it.”

“Besides,” the guard continued, giving the woman a stern look, for Liz had stepped on his toe, a look of proud defiance on her pretty face, “she’s really not going to be gallivanting off across Hell’s half acre.”
He lunged for the woman to retaliate, but she gleefully side-stepped the half-hearted attempt. Silas allowed her to triumph momentarily sensing she need the upper hand in this instance. He fumed at her smug features, pretending to be pissed.

Red knew all that could be done was being done. He also knew Lizzy was going to be confined to the hotel for the duration of their stay due to her physical status and that Silas would keep his word.

Liz’s attention was caught when Samar called her name, distracting Liz from the Tom-foolery with her guard. With a stern look of reprimand for Silas, Liz crossed to Samar eyeing the man belligerently the entire time.

Samar shared a confidence no one else was privy to.

“And you coming back,” Silas muttered for Red’s ears alone, watching the two women converse from his vantage point from across the room, “is what she wants, yes.” Red couldn’t help the smile. “But it’s not what she needs.”

Red knew that. As much as he wanted to be with Lizzy twenty-four/seven... he couldn’t be.

Logistically speaking, it was an impossibility. They both had work obligations that needed their attention.

As much as they both hated it, a little separation here and there was good for any relationship, in reality.

Individually speaking... Red couldn’t and shouldn’t step between Lizzy and Tom all the time. To do so would give her the impression he didn’t think she could handle the asshole on her own.

While Silas would protect Lizzy with his life, he would also give her the opportunity to confront Tom if she needed.

Red... didn’t think he could do that yet. Not that he didn’t think she was capable. It wasn’t that at all.

While he knew Lizzy’s relationship had changed, Tom could still push her buttons.

If Red’s father taught him one thing, it was to defend his lady. It was so ingrained in Red, especially when it came to Lizzy, to protect her... he couldn’t stand there and watch her be hurt in any way, shape or form and not try to put a stop to it.

He was trying to curb his natural tendency but... it was proving to be a grueling task.

He hired Silas to do a job and that was to keep her safe... without making her go stir crazy.

Red needed to allow Silas to do that job.

“Let me talk to her.” Red said.

He heard the line switching hands, his mouth pulled at the corner, listening to her bitching.

“He better still be on the line” Liz hissed at her guard.

“Well, he’s not,” Silas grumbled tauntingly, “I hung up.”

Red heard Lizzy’s indignant intake of breath before he heard her light breathing.

“Red...?” she questioned, her tone tight with annoyance for her guard.
Red smiled at the vexation before sobering, “You want me to come back?”

His heart thumped in his chest when she hesitated to answer. A couple months ago, there would have been an instant negative response.

Now...

“Just a second...” she whispered.

Red took his seat, belting himself in at Dembe’s incessant urging. The man had been trying to get Red’s full attention for some few minutes. They really must be close to landing.

He eavesdropped openly. Lizzy was telling Samar she was stepping out a moment. Red was in flight and had to hear, she explained the reason.

She was getting as adept at lying as he was.

A door closed behind her, followed by blessed silence.

“I do want you to come back.” she confessed. “But not because of Tom.”

Red’s eyes softened, his heart constricting, “I can be there whenever you need me.”

Liz smiled, gingerly running her finger along the bead board which ran the length of the hallway she now stood in.

Silas rolled his eyes at the girlish gesture. Red must have said something that had her stomach flipping somersaults. She might as well have curled her hair about her finger.

“I know...” she ducked her head, toeing the intricate carpet at her feet.

Joe grinned at Silas over his shoulder, both men shaking their respective heads at how quickly the FBI agent could fade away to be replaced by a woman... in love.

Joe snapped a picture of the moment, shooting it off to Dembe. Red would get a kick out of seeing his woman all flush cheeked over a simple phone call.

“Red, you didn’t fire Silas, did you?” she gripped her phone tighter.

“Wanted to.” he quipped. “I wouldn’t do that. I know he means a great deal to you, baby.”

“Well, he was justified in his actions.” she stated earnestly.

“Throwing someone out a window...” Red nodded slowly.

“He wouldn’t have done that.” she dismissed airily.

“Okay...” Red chuckled easily.

“Well, he wouldn’t have, not really.” she insisted. Her lips quivered slightly listening to Red scoff.

“But from the scuttle-butt going around,” Liz changed the tone of the conversation, wanting Red to forget about Silas’ follies, “I have nothing to worry about while I’m here.”

“Is that so?” Red’s eyes lit with amusement, wondering what form of gossip she had been supplied and by whom.
“Yes,” she nodded, “don’t need your paltry protection.” she teased, warming to her task. “I have a better source. A more powerful one.”

“Oh, really.” he clearly doubted any such person existed.

“Yeah, I got me a new sugar daddy.” Liz smiled, hearing Red’s throaty chuckle reverberate through the line.

The man leaned, for Dembe had motioned him forward.

Dembe turned the phone in his hand, handing it over for view. Red beamed, perusing the photo Joe sent. He so wished to be there to see Lizzy in person.

“You look beautiful today. Have I told you?” he asked gently, his eyes scanning the photo still.

“Well, how sweet.” she was delighted by the unexpected compliment, self-consciously touching the hair Silas had messed up.

“Does it bother you?” Red got back on track.

“Does what bother me?” she was confused.

“What is being said about Antonio and your budding relationship.”

“I’m more concerned about what his wife might be thinking.” she quipped.

“Maria would take to you just as quickly as Antonio.” Red assured. “I’m positive.”

“You think?” Liz was genuinely curious and for some odd reason, the thought warmed her, “I’ll be fine.” she suddenly felt as much, returning to the subject at hand.

Red ran a finger along the rim of his tumbler, “I know.” he encouraged, his tone dropping to a low caress. “Be careful, baby.”

Red had arrived at his destination and needed to depart the plane so they reluctantly ended their call.

Thankfully, Red’s intervention had eased tempers, for the most part and things had gotten underway after a rocky transition period. Though, after Moore’s departure, tensions had eased considerably.

Liz stared out over the street, drinking her coffee, having needed a short break. She waited for Samar and company to get to the next agenda on the list.

The cataloging of inventory was winding down, thank God. At least, on this particular site.

She glanced at the guards walking the perimeter of the hotel below. She noted they kept a belligerent eye on Tom.

The man sat on a low wall, eating what looked to be a donut, casually drinking a cup of coffee.

She realized suddenly she didn’t feel as suffocated, or even as annoyed by his presence, as she once did.

She had complete faith in herself and her guys to not let Tom hinder her movements.
She scowled slightly. Something about Tom’s body language changed. He started, his quiet moment disturbed.

The man leaned, removing a cell from his pocket, lifting it to his ear.

“I should have directed the team to tap into his calls,” Silas murmured as he came alongside her.

“I’m surprised you haven’t.” Liz was indeed surprised.

“I have at the house,” Silas replied, “I meant here... but he’s aware he’s being bugged.”

“So he’s careful about what he says.” she nodded her understanding. “What a snake.”

“He’s mainly been taking side jobs for quick cash.” he shrugged. “A couple calls coincide with him leaving the vicinity of the house, however. We haven’t been able to trace them which mildly concerns me.”

“Why do you think he’s wasting his time? He knows the house is secure.” she was dumbfounded over Tom’s actions.

“Unknown,” Silas replied. “He has an agenda, of course. Sooner or later, he will make a move.”

Tom slid off his perch, tossing his trash as he nodded amiably at a passing police officer.

The local police had stationed an officer about because they sensed Red’s people were not simply there for a carefree vacation but had no ‘probable cause’ to approach.

Red’s people... meaning the obvious military types who constantly walked the perimeter of the hotel. And who didn’t know Antonio Crocetti’s association with this hotel? The man was a legend. Cops knew and monitored his movements like hawks.

“He makes my skin crawl.” Liz disgusted, having watched the show. “Where do you think he’s going?” she frowned as Tom walked down the street then unexpectedly hailed a passing cab.

“Probably one of his side jobs.”

Liz sighed, Tom forgotten the second she turned back to the increased activity inside the hotel room.

Ressler was beckoning her over.

Joe slid through traffic like the other cars weren’t there as Silas scanned their surroundings.

“Some of Lawford’s men are in the wind so,” Silas looked back at the woman behind him, “you stay beside us.”

Joe pulled the car to a smooth halt outside a large warehouse. Several more such buildings filled a very spacious lot on either side as this was the industrial side of town.

Liz had sighed her dismay having arrived on site.

Several nondescript vehicles were parked inconspicuously about the area. It would be so much easier if someone slapped decals that read FBI on the side of the cars... but it would be a dead giveaway who they were.
“You think they’ll cause trouble with all the agents on site?” Liz questioned seriously.

“Depends what’s in that warehouse.” Joe shrugged.

While not pleased with their present situation, Silas had understood the need for it.

Samar’s team had secured the site a short time ago. Already she had uncovered damning evidence of Al-Qaeda involvement within Lawford’s organization.

All agencies had long since been aware than any average Joe could listen in on unsecured air-wave broadcasts, of course.

Samar had adamantly conveyed the ‘package’ was contained and the Intel discovered was time-sensitive and urgent.

With Ressler side-lined and Aram hopelessly inept out in the field, it left only one option on the table to get the information to the needed sources.

Elizabeth had graciously volunteered her services before Ressler could come up with a way to ask.

It was clear the guy was staying off his pain meds. And even though Elizabeth’s foot was in a boot, it was abundantly clear, she would be a better choice to act the part of courier than the red-headed Agent.

Liz was more than trained and capable of such an assignment, after all.

Red assumed she would stay safely on-site but she never actually promised as such.

It didn’t mean she would forget to mention she had two highly trained ex-soldiers on her flank, when Red called her on the decision later.

Samar had been excited, almost gleeful about the teams find.

Liz was anxious to do her part.

After Samar obtained copies of the information on encrypted flash drives Aram had supplied her, Liz was to meet an Agent on-site and secure the hard-drives into her custody.

Ergo, here they sat, both men staring hard up to the surrounding buildings.

“Are we actually going to get out of the car at some point?” Liz asked the needed question.

“Too many vantage points from which to take aim.” Silas muttered his concern.

“Any good marksman would have all ready riddled the car with enough fire to ensure anyone inside was–”

“Do you mind.” Silas halted the graphic observation if only for Elizabeth’s sake.

“They don’t know if the car is bullet proof.” she reasoned. “Better to save the ammo and select your shot.” she shrugged. Was she beginning to think like Red? She hoped so.

“...Besides a hail of bullets would have the Agents on site swarming this place like ants.” she said in a matter-of-fact tone. “A couple well placed shots might draw a little attention but it gives some leeway for a smooth getaway, hopefully.”
Both men swiveled in the front seat, one face impressed, Silas’... annoyed. “You realize just who the target of your little scenario is, right?”

“Me... but you guys wouldn’t be forgotten either,” she smiled sweetly.

Joe chuckled appreciatively. Silas... did not.

“You best start taking this shit more seriously,” he suggested strongly.

“I do take it seriously but I can’t let it paralyze me either, right?” she lifted enquiring brows. “You said so.”

Silas’ mood was no better, “I can run in and–”

“You aren’t an Agent. You aren’t on the official list.” Liz vetoed that route.

“Hey,” Joe had noted another entrance on the side of the building, his face breaking into a grin, “let me actively mediate here.” He eased the car alongside the side doors, turning the key off. “This is a little closer.”

Silas was out of the car, his hand on the handle of the back door. He leaned his bulk in having scanned the area meticulously once again.

“We get in, we get out.” his tone was no-nonsense. “Stay extra close to our cover.”

She nodded agreeably, “I’m starving. I want this to go as smoothly as you do.”

Silas sighed mentally.

Liz made a hasty exit ducking for the cover of her two guards bulk.

In seconds she was secured inside the unlocked door.

She glanced back urgently for she had felt the absence of those two men acutely once safely inside.

Silas and Joe had their weapons out. They stood, silently scanning and re-scanning the outside areas.

The very definition of ‘perfect targets’, in Liz’s humble opinion, “Get in here!” she whispered harshly, gesturing even more curtly.

“Too fucking quiet,” Silas muttered ignoring the frantic pleas.

Joe nodded solemnly but finally both men entered and Liz released the breath she had been holding.

“What the hell are you two standing out there like turkeys in the rain?” she was upset. “I thought we were going to get-in, get-out.”

Silas put his hand to his lips to shush the distraught whisperer.

Liz rolled her eyes but shut-up.

They stood for a long beat simply listening to the sounds of the expansive warehouse, getting their bearings.

“Why was this door not secured?” Silas shifted Joe a knowledgeable look.

Liz hadn’t even thought of it, she had been too worried about her guys safety.
Silas motioned her into a space between himself and Joe, who took point.

They moved silently through the stocked aisles of stolen merchandise.

Where was the Agent who were supposed to meet her?

The quiet was eerie.

Down at the end of a row of smaller, more elongated boxes, a door was wide open. The interior of an office was apparent.

Light from a sky-light slightly illuminated the area.

At first, Liz thought it was a fire but no smell of smoke or shimmer of red light shown from within the dark alcove.

Silas held out his hand, halting any further movement. About ten meters down, the outline of a man was sprawled out directly in front of the office.

Silas waved Joe to the left, while he himself, merged to the right of the office. He waved Elizabeth back into a safe niche.

Liz had to admire both men’s efficiency.

She waited on tenterhooks as they crept closer to their objective.

Out of nowhere, taking her completely by surprise, two corded arms came about her body, their strength pulling her back hard and swift against a rock solid surface.

Both Silas and Joe heard the sharp intake of the woman’s breath, each swirling about, weapons aimed with deadly intent.

Elizabeth stayed perfectly still, silently weighing her options. How many times had Silas run her through this very scenario?

But, somehow, in this instance, the tight hold across her throat was chillingly real.

She knew that scent.

Her assailant had said not a word and yet... yes, she knew that scent. She knew his touch. She knew the feel of his breath on her nape.

She swallowed the bile that rose in her throat with difficulty.

Her eyes locked with Silas’. She saw no sign of panic or indecision in that steady stare.

“Move carefully, boys.” Tom Keen’s tone was tight and edgy. “Let’s don’t do anything stupid here.”

“That boat has sailed.” Silas was moving steadily, widening the space between Joe and himself to divide Tom’s time between two possible enemies.

“When you made the choice to approach... her,” Silas inclined his head slowly, his eyes flashing something Elizabeth instinctively reacted to.

The woman elbowed hard into Tom’s ribs, bending forward hastily fighting with everything she had against his attempts to pull her back as a human shield.
Silas’ weapon discharged. He took a wide shot because of Elizabeth’s proximity but even so, the bullet embedded itself into a crate’s edge... splintering wood shards into Tom’s face.

He instinctively lifted a hand to protect his eyes, momentarily losing his hold on Elizabeth.

Joe fired two rounds simultaneously, one entering Tom’s upper thigh, the other hitting very close to the guy’s neckline as it too, sank deep into a nearby crate.

Liz stomped down hard with her foot into Tom’s instep, enjoying the man’s grunt of pain. Unfortunately, shifting her weight so rapidly to her injured foot, proved a mistake.

She went down hard. The woman scrambled rapidly for the weapon she had secured to her ankle. She could sense Joe coming up on her right. She managed to get one clean shot off before her friend was in harms way.

The bullet ricocheted off an exposed pipe sending a vaulting spray of steam directly into Tom’s face. The bastard ducked, shaking the pain off, continuing on his serpentine trek through the surrounding maze.

Silas was moving fast, covering the space separating him from the woman.

In seconds he was by her side, shielding her body with his own.

Joe pursued a fleeing Tom Keen.

The guy moved remarkably agile for someone who had just been shot with a large caliber weapon and the rows and stacks of crates and boxes were aiding Tom’s escape plan.

Silas ascertained Elizabeth’s condition, a concerned scowl on his face.

“Damned foot gave out.” she apologized, disappointed and upset with herself.

“You did fine.” the man’s tone was calming. “Just lay still.”

Elizabeth lay her head back onto the cool of the floor, obeying.

She could hear footsteps fading rapidly as Joe’s efforts escalated, “Go... I’m good.”

Silas shook his head negatively, “We’re not doing that at all.”

She sighed heavily, resuming the wait. Silently cataloging her injuries, if any existed.

Somewhere in the expansive warehouse, doors slammed open and shut.

“...I should have–”

“We don’t do ‘should-haves’,” Silas silenced any second thoughts, “but you ‘should have’ seen that bastard’s face when you did what you did.” he chuckled lowly. “He thought it was all over but the fat lady kept on singing. You showed him, woman and I’m damned proud of you.”

Elizabeth felt tears prick at her eyes for the lob-sided compliment but coming from Silas? Her heart swelled two-fold.

She stubbornly refused to allow such a feminine display, swallowing hard.

She took time for herself. When her voice was strong enough again, she spoke, “He’s a jerk and I... don’t do jerks anymore.”

“Yeah, you don’t.” Silas’ grin said it all.

Liz crooked her head back, “Is he dead?” she indicated the Agent by the office.

“Nah, just conked on the head.” Silas allayed her fears.

To their left, a door far down the side of the building burst open.

Silas’ grin vanished post-haste as his weapon came around to the sound. He bodily lifted Elizabeth, placing her more snugly secure behind an alcove of stacked heat and air units... or at least, that was what the labels read.

His concern was for naught, however.

Samar’s pretty head popped briefly around a convenient hiding spot.

Recognition was instant and complete. She rushed forward, several Agents following close behind.

“We were lured away, should have suspected something,” she too, being affected by the should haves. She holstered her weapon, kneeling beside Elizabeth. “What happened?” she scanned the other woman for signs of wounds or trouble.

“...She’s good.” Silas motioned to Elizabeth but Samar noted the man was still very much on ‘high-alert’ status. “Called away?” he scowled.

Silas’ eyes scanned the area meticulously watching for any sigh of renewed problems.

“I’m good.” Liz pushed herself into a seated position. “Damned leg went out from under me again. I hate this useless thing.” she hit her thigh angrily.

“Whoever called us had access to our official operation code.” Samar continued her version of Intel. “We thought the other unit was about to be under fire... it was a diversion.”

Moore approached cautiously having seen Silas’ weapon, “... Someone did a number on the room.” he jerked his head to the office behind him. “Agent Adams is okay, we got medical en route.”

Samar held up the flash drive, smiling happily, “Don’t worry, I took what they really wanted with me.”

Liz breathed easier sitting back against the crate, smiling as well.

Agents swarmed the place, Liz noted.

“Whatever they used burned like acid though the hard drives.” Moore’s face was grim. “There isn’t one computer left intact in there.”

“It’s fortunate we found what we needed before their attempts then,” Samar’s profile was turned to the guy, “which doesn’t mean they won’t try again.”

Silas’ eyes softened on the woman, Liz noted.

“We have to get this,” she held the valuable information aloft yet again, “to a secure holding area.”

“What do you need?” Wilson had come alongside his contemporary.
“Let’s try a diversion as well,” Samar arose, “take three units, separate routes... head back to the Bureau. I will stay behind with the Intel until we are certain no tails are out there.”

“That leaves you vulnerable.” Moore disliked the plan but his tone was almost respectful.

Samar sought Silas out, “I can’t officially ask you to risk your–”

“We’ll get you home, little lady.” Silas followed her plan easily.

“Call me that again, I’ll shoot you.” Samar smiled sweetly.

Silas was intrigued as he watched her gaze hesitate over certain areas of his body, “Just make sure you don’t hit anything vital.”

“Be serious!” Liz hit at her guard, offering him an almost pout.

“But thank you,” Samar finally continued, “we need the edge.”

Joe came sauntering up, a disgruntled look on his face, “Do you believe that little rat got away?” he grimaced, “…Had some driver waiting for him out back by the fence. I got a partial.”

Liz’s head fell back against the crate, “I really loathe that freak.”

“I tagged his ass.” Joe stated optimistically. “He lost a hell of a lot of blood.”

“He’s down one at least.” Liz grinned wryly. “How many more of his nine lives do we have to take?” she asked pseudo-seriously.

Joe calculated, silently ticking off the possibilities.

“The plates will be stolen or fakes.” Silas allowed his weapon to swing down to his side. “Keen’s good at what he does... don’t knock yourself out. We’ll get the asshole. Only a matter of time.”

“Tom?” Samar was flabbergasted. “What is he doing involved in this or... is he? Is it about you,
Liz?”

“Red can sort it out.” Liz waved a dismissive hand. “Someone help me up. I’m beyond starved here.
And my butt’s going to sleep.”

Silas chuckled, offering over a hand.

He righted her effortlessly.

“The sooner we get the package to its destination, the sooner I can go back to the hotel and my fully stocked fridge and room service.”

“My question is, why did Stalker Boy head straight for this location, one...” Silas questioned, “and B, how did he even know of its existence.”

“We know he worked for Lawford in the past.” Joe reminded. “So something they did was important enough for someone to get rid of the evidence.”

“Tom gets a phone call,” Silas nodded, “and all of a sudden, but for Agent Navabi’s quick thinking... that important enough thing would have been destroyed along with God knows what, in that room.”
he jerked his head to the office.
“I hate puzzles.” Joe groused.

“Red is very good at solving difficult equations.” Liz smiled at nothing in particular. “Why don’t we turn it over to him?”

“Let’s get this show on the road.” Samar agreed. She assigned drivers to units. “We’ll know when it’s clear to head out. Be careful... we don’t know how many we are up against or how powerful a force they are as yet.”

A short time later both women were safely ensconced in the back seat of the car.

Joe pulled out at an unhurried pace as if they had all the time in the world.

“If we make it to the freeway without incident, we’re home free.” Silas was alert and functioning perfectly. “If they’re gonna hit us, it will be on this lonely stretch just ahead. It’s what I would do.”

“Do you have criminal inclinations as a general rule?” Samar pulled her attention from her perusal of their surroundings.

“Occasionally.” Silas held his smile.

Joe threw him a look but concentrated on the road after a second.

“Good to know.” Samar murmured, a smile playing about her lips.

Liz looked from one to the other, sensing some sort of excitement in the air.

“Anything else you want to know about me,” Silas spared the woman a glance in the mirror clipped to his sun visor, “just ask.”

Liz cut her own eyes to Samar’s pretty profile. Silas’ tone held a definite challenge to her way of thinking. She waited with baited breath.

But Samar took time to reply because that’s just how she rolled, “...How do you feel about commitment?”

Joe expelled a masculine groan, “And the lady goes straight for the throat.” he laughed good-naturedly.

Liz gasped her shock, grinning widely at a rather somber Samar Navabi.

It was Silas’ turn to take time out. He ignored Joe’s knowledgeable glance of camaraderie.

“Yeah, Silas,” his friend needled deliberately for Joe knew the answer, “where do you stand on that issue?”

“Depends on who I’m committing to,” Silas replied so quietly, Liz had to strain to hear the reply.

Samar’s lovely brow furrowed thoughtfully. She stared at Silas’ handsome profile holding those thoughts privately.

Liz shifted wide eyes from the back of Silas’ head to a suddenly introverted woman to her right.

The ride was finished in relative silence and with no further incidents.

The tension in the vehicle was palpable, however. Liz was never so glad when Joe pulled the car into an unloading spot outside the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Silas glanced over, “You got her,” he jerked his head towards Liz, “for a minute?”

Joe’s face showed his shock for a split second, “Of course.” he kept his tone professional but even he was wondering at Silas’ unconventional behavior. It was not like the man to leave Liz’s side for one second.

Silas slid his frame out of the car, watching the traffic as he made his way to Samar’s door. The man gallantly accompanied Samar, both alert to their surroundings.

Liz watched the striking couple cross to the stairs leading to the tall skyscraper.

“What the hell was that?” Joe turned about, his mouth slack-jawed.

Liz sat up hastily, gripping the back of the head rest, eager to discuss the issue looming large in the now vacated car, “What do you mean?” she feigned innocence. “I mean, it’s only right that he accompanies her because she’s got Intel on Al-Qaeda... that’s all it is, right?”

“Yeah, okay.” the guy looked at her like she was crazy. “What I’m thinking is going on can’t be going on, because we guys... we have a rule.” Joe nodded scooting closer, lowering his voice. “Silas would never, ever overstep that rule. I know the guy. I’ve known him for decades and not once has he broken the rule.”

“What’s the rule?” Liz demanded to know.

“There are certain types of women you just don’t,” Joe thought hard how to put it delicately, “fuck then go on your merry way.”

Liz sat back appalled... for all of two seconds, “And Samar is one of those women of course.” she scooted back up.

“Yeah, but Silas... it’s all he’s ever done. ”Joe shrugged. “Well, I mean... after Anya.”

Both Liz and Joe considered the implications.

“Something is amiss.” Joe decided, nodding sagely.

Liz nodded sagely too but she wasn’t sure exactly why.

Both individuals sat back, each ruminating on the ‘something’, each in their own unique way.

They were still ruminating upon Silas’ return.

The man buckled his seat belt, sensing a change in the atmosphere around him.

“What?” he demanded.

“Nothing.” Liz was too quick to answer.

Silas scowled darkly at her, crooking his head about. He checked with Joe.

“Nothing.” the guy was totally too nonchalant.

Silas sighed heavily, shaking his head, “Whatever, let’s get back. I need a break from you two loons.”
He sat back, deflating into his seat, remembering he had to check in with Red, “From one loon to another...”

“You’re talking about Tom, right?” Liz leaned to the guys profile.

“Yeah, sure,” Silas muttered absently, “okay.”
As promised, I started ripping the following chapters apart and piecing scenes together to move the story along plot wise.

So you might start seeing time jumps over the next couple chapters. I’ve tried to keep the Red and Liz scenes that were important though. :)

This one was a little harder to piece together because I had to condense chapters to explain a little of what is coming up. I hope it came together okay and isn’t too cruddy :) I promise to do a better job in the next one though. :D

Silas watched his men do their jobs, content in the fact they were doing so, competently and most efficiently.

He wanted to make sure the grounds of the hotel were doubly secure. His thoughts were more concentrated on the previous hours events, however.

He stood slightly apart having exited the vehicle, a fixed scowl on the handsome face.

Silas had insisted Elizabeth take a breather to assess any and all damages their previous encounter with Tom Keen had caused. She was now safely secure in the back of the SUV.

The trip to the hotel had given her time to regroup.

Silas glanced at the sour little face staring back at him from the car window.

She had picked up Red Reddington’s propensity for impatience.

Tom Keen was first and foremost in Silas’ thoughts this moment. The last person he expected to encounter inside that warehouse today was the little creep of a man.

What Keen was up to in there, besides the obvious, was of upmost interest. The guard was certain Red Reddington would feel the same on the matter.

Stalker Boy had deliberately went out of his way to destroy something in that place which undoubtedly was a primary clue to exactly why or who was behind the greater conspiracy which was being orchestrated.

A conspiracy against who was anyone’s guess. If Keen was involved, Silas highly suspected Elizabeth was involved as well.

But how?

His scowl darkened, and he moved forward absently.
“What are you doing?” he prevented the woman in question from exiting the car, his expression a stern one.

“What am I... under house arrest?” Elizabeth pushed against the hold he had on the door facing. “I want to take a bath!”

“When I say the perimeter is secure,” Silas motioned Justin over, “and not one second before.”

“We’ve been sitting here over two hours,” Liz exaggerated, “how secure does it have to be to satisfy your morbid sense of—”

“As secure as I say!” the man interrupted, “so you... stay put.”

“I’ve got a good mind to tell Red to send for Aunt Gertie!” Liz snapped.

Justin, who stood idly by waiting on his orders... blatantly listening in on the exchange... suddenly stiffened, his face masking into what could only be described as abject terror.

“What does she mean?” Justin snapped the rapid fire question. “Did she say... Aunt Gertie?”

“Calm the hell down.” Silas snapped. “You’re a damned professional! Act the part!”

“Yeah but...” Justin swallowed hard, his eyes wide, his expression panicked, “but I heard... Aunt Gerti–”

“Never mind!” Silas’ voice raised. “Secure the scene here!” he groused, piqued that just the mention of his beloved Aunt’s name could instill such a reaction from his seasoned, hardened crew. “You and Joe... damned pussies!”

Justin’s fears were not allayed, the insult rolling off the guy’s sturdy shoulders, “She’s one scary broad.”

“Excuse the hell out of me?” Silas dared the guy to repeat the words.

“What I meant to say,” Justin backtracked hastily, “is that while your Aunt is a very nice lady, I’m sure. Deep down, man...” he shook his head grimacing slightly, “I think she’s a little bit psycho.”

“What!” Silas started around the car, his expression thunderous.

Justin ran the opposite way, keeping the length of the vehicle between them, “Not psycho, no! Did I say psycho?” the younger man waved his hands frantically about, “No, no, no.”

“Silas!” Liz’s mouth tightened irritably. “Will you stop fooling around. Leave Justin alone!”

Silas spared her a jerky glare. He cast Justin a look but settled down eventually.

“You’re in a mood today.” Justin murmured.

“Shut up.” Silas exasperated. He took a moment to compose himself before continuing.

“We don’t know what went down here today or why...” Silas hated explaining his actions, his tone conveying as much. “My instincts are telling me something it off-kilter.” he glanced back at his men milling around. “I’m just double checking.”

The man’s grey eyes traveled the countless windows and rooftops surrounding them. He noted several of his men were doing the same. Something was in the wind, they could feel it too.
“Why are they wasting their time?” Liz grumbled belligerently. “You’re just showing off now, admit it.”

Elizabeth glanced at the windows absently as she had seen the others do, a slight tingling traversing her neck. She rubbed the area, wiping the sensation away.

“Am I?” Silas noticed Liz’s subtle tell. “Just ride it out.” he grumbled and not so surprisingly, the woman fell silent for a goodly beat.

“Well, I feel stupid just sitting here waiting for some weirdo to make his move.”

“Red’s gonna have my ass as is.” Silas motioned and Joe, who was still sitting inside the driver’s seat... locked Liz’s door.

The woman’s mouth fell open for the audacity. She unlocked the handle instantly, sending Silas a death glare for he had shut the door in her face.

Joe re-locked the door smiling amiably back at her as the sound of the locks engaging sounded.

Liz gasped, “Stop locking that!” she pinched her lips, rolling the window down triumphantly. “I’m not a child.”

“Then stop acting the part.” Silas dismissed airily. “She needs medical attention.” he changed the subject, nodding to Justin curtly.

The younger man was off and running to the unspoken command.

“What?” Liz was astounded. “You call him back right now! You know very well there is nothing wrong with me what-so-ever.”

“There are a myriad of things wrong with you.” Silas scoffed. “But in this instance, if you sit back like a good little girl, and stop making my life miserable, you’ll have that boot off.”

Elizabeth’s mouth snapped shut for a blink of an eye, “My boot?” she sat up anxiously, her interest caught. “I can take it off?”

“The doctor has to look and confirm,” Silas shrugged, his eyes constantly surveying their surroundings, a worried scowl on his face, “but I watched you fall. It was a natural progression... your momentum took you down. Not your ankle.”

Liz glanced down at her ankle, “It doesn’t hurt at all.”

“We will alert the doctor.” Silas sweetened the pot. “Stalker Boy’s action made your body go off-kilter. But the fall you took,” he shrugged aimlessly, “anybody would have gone down.”

Liz smiled brightly. The thought of losing the cumbersome attachment sent joyous anticipation throughout her brain.

“Now, sit back and... shut up.” Silas’ scowl deepened considerably. “I have to think.”

Elizabeth scooted back, wriggling happily in her seat, “And we all know how taxing that process can be for you.” she mused.

Joe chuckled his appreciation for her wit then straightened slightly at Silas’ sour glare.

Liz sat silently, her thoughts happy ones. She hated this damned boot and wanted it gone.
“I’ll call, Red.” she decided to share her state of well-being. She reached for the phone, bubbling with excitement.

“Don’t do that.” Silas advised. “He’ll be all pissy over the... incident.”

Liz’s hand hesitated, poised over the object she sought.

“Better to let him vent with me.” her guard stated. “Tuning him out is second nature for me now.”

Liz pulled her hand back, leaving the phone in her lap, “Yeah, let him vent on you.”

Silas scowled down at her. He took one last sweep of the buildings.

It would be so ridiculously easy to take a kill shot from any of the hundred vantage points.

Some days he hated his job.

Receiving an ‘all clear’ nod from the head of security to proceed, Silas blocked the entire space between the door facing and the inside of the car.

“This is how it’s gonna go down–”

“Then it must be gospel,” Liz chided, “the word according to–”

“You talk too much,” Silas grated, “anyone ever tell you?”

“Nobody but you.” Liz stated sweetly.

“I’m going to shield your body with mine... why is anyone’s guess,” Silas crooked his brow meaningfully, “once inside the hotel, go directly to the elevators.”

“I wanted to get you something at the gift shop.” Liz batted her blue eyes up at the guy.

Silas’ mouth tightened, “If either Joe or I go down,” he continued undaunted, “you’re on your own.”

Liz laughed at the rather droll tone, “I’ll make sure Aunt Gertie has the suite... right next to yours.”

Silas’ eyes closed wearily, “Once in our room, I will close the drapes in the suite. Do not reopen them.”

“It’s such a pretty day.” she wrinkled her nose.

“You better take this seriously.” he snapped.

“You’re serious enough for the both of us.” she relented. “But okay, Guardian of the Galaxy... whatever you say.”

Silas was mollified.

“I’m going to talk to Red after my bath,” she prepared herself, holding her purse protectively as she slid over the leather seat, “so you had better get him in a good mood by the time we talk.”

“When is he not in a good mood with you?” Silas wanted to know.

“Jealous?” Liz cooed, a warm feeling settling in her tummy for Silas’ observation, however.

“Of all that lovey dovey talk?” the guard grimaced, guiding the woman swiftly into the protection of the building. “Please, after that chili I had for lunch... it would make me puke.”

“You’re such a romantic.” Liz giggled as they made for the elevators. She noted an older man and woman passing, giving her and her guards peculiar looks. “God only knows why you are still single.”

“Because deep down,” Silas jabbed the button, “God likes me.”

She smiled pleasantly at the couple, straightening her hair primly before stepping into the open elevator.

Silas lifted a stilling arm, blocking the couples intended entrance into their ride, “Take the next one.”

Liz grimaced apologetically as the door slid closed on the couple’s astonished faces.

“He’s sorry!” she yelled through the closing panels.

The woman’s muscles loosened in the quiet, solitary space, however. She peered through the minuscule crack between the mammoth shoulders of her guards who stepped to the front, acting as a shield.

“You are so rude.” she tsked up at the taller man.

“Be glad I didn’t tell them you get frisky in elevators.” Silas countered as they lifted quickly to their floor.

“I do not!” she snapped. She gave the man a good shove. He barely moved an inch, much to his amusement. “You guys are so paranoid.” she attempted to move them aside to no avail.

“What is with you two?” she grumbled as they came to a gliding stop. “Did you not get enough bran today or something?”

Both men had their weapons concealed beneath their light over-shirts she knew, ready-at-hand.

Entering the suite, she felt a rush of release of tension but it returned instantly a minute later as a knock on the door sent both men moving with stealth like grace across the room. They were so quiet, if she hadn’t watched, she would have never known they moved.

Joe moved swiftly, taking position along the oppose side of the door, weapon up and ready.

Silas stood with his back to the other side of the portal, same manner.

“Blue.” he barked out threateningly.

“Vase.” came the cheerful rejoinder from outside the locked door. “I got the... sawbones.”

Silas cracked the door before opening it wide, content with what he observed. Justin ushered the on-site doctor in with a grand sweep of his arm.

The doctor stared at the men quizzically.

Liz couldn’t blame him, she was as stumped as he was.

“It’s just their way.” Liz emerged from behind her barrier. “Where should I sit?” she welcomed him with a smile to put the man at ease.
A short time later, as promised, she traipsed cheerfully off to enjoy a long, leisurely soak. Minus the irritating weight she had been lugging around for what seemed ages.

The doctor okayed she lose the boot just as Silas promised.

It was a good day after all. She was sad Red had left and couldn’t enjoy it with her.

Silas took his usual shift, allowing Joe to take a much-needed rest period. Both men had been on high alert all damned day not that Silas was letting his guard down.

But the eerie feeling had abated. Things were calming down.

Silas plopped carelessly onto the lounge, rolling the phone absently in his hand.

He hated making these calls to Red... especially when the man was almost three-thousand miles away.

No matter that all turned out well in the end, Red would invariably bitch and moan, his mood would turn black. Silas suspected the guy was border-line manic anal retentive. But then, who wasn’t in this outfit?

They were all perfectionists. Though, when it came to Elizabeth, Red took it to a whole new level.

Sighing, Silas flipped the phone open. He cricked his neck, easing his rising tension. Red answered on the first ring.

Of course he did. Other people allowed three, four rings, giving a person time to gather their thoughts.

But no, not Reddington.

“You alone?” Silas got to it. No need to beat around the bush.

“Hang on.” came the immediate reply.

Silas listened as Red stood without hesitation, making his apologies to whomever was present.

Elizabeth always took top priority, Silas knew.

“Francis could you?” Red asked, excusing himself from the meeting. “Only a moment, gentlemen. My fiancé.” he explained, easing any undue tension.

A phone call in their line of business wasn’t just a simple call. Sure, it could be family who remained unaware of their spouses real business. It was just proper etiquette to not out the guy to his family, so all talk came to an abrupt halt.

Though, the majority of the time the interruption was simply a confirmation a delivery was en route or... worse case scenario, a warning sign to vacate the premises due to a wholesale massacre heading their way.

One could never tell.

As Red left the room, Silas could vaguely hear Francis instantly wax poetic about Red’s woman, further easing any remaining doubt those left behind might be experiencing.

“What’s wrong?” Red stressed as the door shut behind him.
“Liz is fine, so,” Silas assured, “...relax.”

Quickly relating the events that had taken place in Red’s absence, Silas was surprised the man held off any questions as long as he did.

“She’s all right though?” Red asked of Lizzy’s tumble.

“Yeah,” Silas nodded, “she’s taking a bath and gonna ice her ankle later as a precaution.”

He said nothing about the now missing boot. Liz would want to surprise Red, herself.

Red fell silent, so long in fact, Silas moved the phone away checking the screen, assuring himself the time stamp was still ticking away.

“I should be there.” Red sighed.

“We’ve had this discussion.” Silas disagreed. “You coming back without her asking for it implies you think she can’t handle this.” he stressed.

Red’s shoulders slumped dejectedly. He understood what the guard was saying, but it didn’t lessen the urge to be there with the woman.

“Besides,” Silas continued, “I don’t think the prick was there for her specifically.”

Red hesitated, thinking back over what Silas had told him, “I’m listening.”

“At the time, I only saw one objective,” the guard confessed, “and that was securing Liz’s safety and getting her back within my custody.”

Red nodded, listening intently.

“It wasn’t until the drive back I thought, Tom used Liz how we expected him to,” Silas said, “as a convenient shield.”

“A diversion to distract from what he was really doing.” Red was following along. “Could he have followed you from the hotel?”

“Tom left before we did.” Silas shook his head negatively. “He had to have arrived long before we did to do the damage he caused.”

“He had already known of the warehouse’s existence.” Red agreed.

Even with the underground at Tom’s disposal to feed him information, the odds of the guy happening upon that particular destination in a city of millions was astronomical.

“So either Lawford tipped him, alerting Tom he needed to destroy the damning evidence... that those two were in cahoots together,” Red thought the problem through, “or there’s a leak somewhere.”

“It can’t be Lawford,” Silas vetoed that avenue, “Samar said he’s still in solitary.”

Red nodded his understanding. “Lawford’s man in New York is still in the wind though,” he said, “it’s not inconceivable that he’s calling all associates to assist in burning the operation.”

“That’s a possibility.” Silas shrugged. “I can tell you, it’s not on our end.” he said. “Aside from me and Joe, no one knew of our destination, except Samar.”
“The thought never once crossed my mind.” Red told the truth. “Lizzy’s team?”

“If they did, they used some sort of telepathy.” Silas sighed. “Joe and I were on them all damn day.”

“Even for piss breaks?” Red prodded the guard.

“Moore did relay the West warehouse location as their next stop.” Silas remembered. “But he did not give out the full address. Even he isn’t that stupid.” he regretfully conceded.

“And where was Tom while Samar and her team were gallivanting about the city?”

“Tom was stationed outside the hotel the entire time so... I doubt he got the info from them.”

Red pushed the heel of his palm across his forehead, easing the growing tightness, “Nothing could be salvaged from the office?”

“No,” Silas said, “not that they know, anyway. But Samar saved the day on that end, saving that shit before they had been diverted.”

“What the hell could he have been destroying?” Red thought out loud. “I seriously doubt Tom is so loyal he would burn files just to save Lawford. Did Samar relate any info about what was on the flash drives?”

“No mistake about it.” Silas grinned. “She could have easily shot him in the leg. The trajectory was better.” the man recalled the woman’s position at the time. “She aimed high, on purpose.”

Red blinked, repeating the words in his head, “At who? Tom?”

He didn’t know if he had voiced that as a statement, question or what? All he knew for certain was, disbelief etched his tone.

“No mistake about it.” Silas grinned. “She could have easily shot him in the leg. The trajectory was better.” the man recalled the woman’s position at the time. “She aimed high, on purpose.”

Red scratched absently at his head, honestly at a loss.

In all the time he had wanted Tom dead, it never once occurred to him that Lizzy would be the one to take the kill shot.

He always assumed...hoped... he would have the honor.
He chuckled inwardly as he realized his other foremost thought was... “What the hell kind of person have I become?” he pondered.

“What d’you mean?” Silas asked.

“I was upset that someone else might take Tom out... should it matter?”

What a strange and unique couple they were... possibly arguing over who got to kill her fake ex-husband.

“If you two are going to come to blows about this,” Silas obviously had read Red’s mind, “I’m gonna have to choose sides. I’m warning you now, I’m Team Liz.”

Red’s lips reluctantly tugged at the corner, “What the hell?” he feigned discord. “Do you know the definition of loyalty?”

“Yeah...vaguely.” Silas shrugged, “Tom’s death to you is a notch on your gun grip.”

Red brows lifted, his expression blasé, not arguing the fact.

“It would mean more to her... she can find absolute closure.”

“And that is the extent of your involvement?” Red scoffed, the reactionary expulsion a real one. “Your loyalty to her extends beyond a damn paycheck, and you know it.”

“Maybe,” Silas didn’t exactly deny it, “but don’t tell her that. She might think she’s special or something...” the man twisted his mouth distastefully, “she’ll get uppity.”

Red chuckled quietly, “Yes, because being at the top of your list is of great importance to her.”

Silas could live with the pseudo-insult, he decided.

Red never thought he would see the day Silas offered affection to a woman he had no intention of bedding. But there it was... Silas held an affinity for Lizzy, and the sentiment was more than returned in kind, Red knew.

Red got things back on track. “Well, I must inform our little firecracker there, I called dibs on Tom’s demise a long time ago.”

“Things change,” Silas countered. “Liz deserves the kill shot. Tom fucked her--”

A most disgruntled snarl interrupted Silas’ train of thought.

“Let me rephrase that,” the guard backtracked, “Tom fucked with her more than he did you. You should at least give her the option.” he stood up for the woman in question.

“If it comes down to it then,” Red grumbled, “maybe we’ll draw straws.”

“Actually,” Silas shrugged after a moment’s consideration, “that would be fair.”

“You aren’t helping.” it was pointed out. “You are supposed to dissuade me from abnormal behavior where Lizzy is concerned.” Red rubbed his forehead roughly. “I can’t believe we’re having this conversation.”

“Why?” Silas brought it out. “We are not normal people. None of us... why bother acting as if we are?”
Truer words were never spoken.

“I will keep that under advisement.” Red said, a thought occurring. “Even, Lizzy?”

“Proudly... yes.” Silas turned his head as the sound of Liz’s singing drifted down the hall.

“Are there any plans for this evening of which I should be made aware?”

“No.” Silas said. “From what I understood, the Agents will be looking over files they collected and cataloging the inventory from earlier.” the man held his smile. “Don’t be surprised if they report seeing some of Francis’ manifest on those lists.”

“What did that fool do?”

“Remember back in 2012 when his guys got the warehouses mixed up in Canada...”

“You mean the mix-up in communications which led his men to mistakenly heist not the proposed shipment of munitions we ordered but instead.” Red rolled his eyes heavenward, vividly remembering the fiasco, “.... fifteen thousand barrels of syrup?”

Silas’ deep throaty laughter rumbled through the line.

“That little mishap?” Red finished curtly.

“Your memory is sharp as a tack.” Silas nodded knowingly. “Still haven’t forgiven that one, huh?” he grinned. “Hey, that shit was worth over thirty million dollars.”

“It was fifteen... thousand... barrels,” Red barked, “of syrup!”

It boggled the mind.

The snafu was so out of character for Francis’ men, Red had truly been at a loss when it came time for him to comment on the matter.

After they secured the proper shipment, and the dust settled, all he could do when he opened his mouth to reply was... laugh out loud at the boy’s predicament.

His amusement only grew the next morning as news anchors stoically related that not only had roughly a quarter of the national reserve of maple syrup been absconded with, but authorities feared it would be sold on the black market.

They had been wrong on that count. Francis couldn’t give that shit away.

He unloaded what he could as gifts on any given occasion. Birthdays, anniversaries, christenings... funerals. And still, it barely made a dent in the ample supply.

To this day, Red’s associates still offered snarky remarks about Francis’ ‘sticky situation’.

But now it seemed, through a chain of rather bizarre events, Francis managed to turn the tables about.

Suddenly most of those fifteen thousand barrels of contraband was ‘stuck’ on Lawford.

How Francis pulled such an astonishing feat off, not only amused Red, it mystified the man.

“How much did he unload?” Red asked.
“Looked to be all of it to me.” Silas laughed throatily.

“How the hell did they move all that so quickly?” Red was amazed.

“Well, Francis’ warehouse is just a couple doors down from Lawford’s.” Silas reminded. “A couple forklifts and...”

“It was over fifteen thousand barrels.” Red reminded in kind.

“Where there’s a will, there’s a way.” Silas shrugged. “Bright side for us, we won’t get that shit at Christmas anymore.”

Red shook his head, a small smile twitching at his mouth. Francis had the worst luck but also the most optimistic attitude when faced with adversity.

Red admired that trait in any individual but knowing of Francis’ background, it was even more remarkable the young man was so resilient.

“What do you want me to do when Tom shows back up?” Silas took the conversation full loop. “Because we all know he will.”

“I know what I’d like to do.” Red stated the obvious. “Thoughts?”

“We can’t allow him to sit out front, laughing at us.” Silas dipped a toe in the water, feeling things out with his boss. “It would be an affront to our sensibilities.”

“Your sensibilities,” Red countered, “you mean.”

“The collective, our.” Silas granted that he wasn’t the most sensitive guy in the world. “It’s bad for moral.” he continued. “The guys get restless, they want him gone.” he stated. “I understand the sentiment.”

“Agreed.” Red had come to the same conclusion but... he was too close to keep a clear perspective.

“Are the men running out of ideas on how to make Tom’s life miserable?” Red knew how to muster the troops. “Besides, the way I see it, you guys are one up. Joe’s mark hit the spot, didn’t it?”

Silas smiled happily at the reminder, “Just doesn’t seem enough where Stalker Boy is concerned.”

“The truth is, with Tom across the street, it works out better for us.” Red had to continuously remind himself of that fact. “He’s good at what he does, regardless of our feelings towards the little...”

“Cockroach?” Silas supplied. “The want to squish him under my boot is a growing need.”

“I like the way you think.” Red relented. “But for the time being, we return to standard operating procedures.”

Silas sighed heavily but accepted his lot in life.

“If there are any weaknesses in our defenses, he will find them, agreed?”

“Yeah.” the guard reluctantly did so.

“We’ve always known Tom was tangled up in something that involves Lizzy,” Red said. “We’ve been waiting for movement on that end... now we have it.”
“Have I mentioned patience in not my strongest virtue?” Silas mentioned.

“Oh, I don’t know about that.” Red recalled an incident. “Need I remind you,” he began, “you lay in your own filth for two days waiting to take a sniper shot at that drug lord down in Ecuador a few years back?”

The fucker had taken an associate’s little girl in retaliation for late shipment, of all fucking things. Silas tracked the bastard for two hellish weeks in scorching heat and humidity until he found the estate where they kept the child. The wait had been well worth it.

“You got her back.” Red couldn’t keep the pride from his voice.

“That’s my job.” Silas stated quietly.

“Too bad you missed your shot.” Red provoked the man. “And you call yourself a professional.”

“Like I said, the wind shifted at the last second.” Silas’ face turned bleak. He was not proud his professionalism had lapsed.

“You only winged the guy in the throat.” Red commiserated. “Bastard drowned in his own blood, as I recall.”

“Yeah, that was a sad thing.” Silas stared at the opposite wall. “I should have had better control.”

The silence came for a beat as each man pondered the reasons behind such actions.

“Don’t tell me there’s not a part of you that wouldn’t enjoy hunting that prick, Tom.” Silas broke the silence, his irritation coming to a head. “Terrorize him like he has her.”

“You’re being awfully dramatic.” Red sighed, knowing very well where this melancholy was coming from. “Stop feeling guilty. You can protect Elizabeth only so much. You know that. I know that.”

The sound of discontent rumbled over the line. “You make choices in life.” Silas brooded. “I wish I could revisit some.”

“You told Lizzy you would give her a fighting chance,” Red recalled discussing this very topic with Lizzy, “you gave her that earlier.” he stressed. “It’s your support and training that allowed her to act as she did today.”

“Is Francis spiking your drinks again?” Silas questioned seriously. “You should be reaming my ass but—”

“Trust me, if I had my way, I’d string Tom up and let the asshole hang until he rotted.” Red let the threat roll from his tongue easily, the sentiment behind the statement a heartfelt one. “Don’t ever think I’m not with you on that one.”

Silas crossed his thick arms over his chest, his mind calming over the imagery provided.

“I’m fucking livid knowing that scum even dared to touch her.” Red seethed. “I patiently await the day I can put him down, for good.”

Silas sat straighter in his seat, hearing the quiet rage seething inside Red Reddington. It made Silas’ heart happy to know the man he had known for years was still there somewhere, just waiting for the opportunity to strike.
“Until that time,” Red continued, controlling his rising temper, “I intend to keep my wits about me, find out what Tom is up to... and stop the threat so none of it will ever touch Elizabeth.”

“I prefer when you think with your dick.” Silas muttered his approval. “You tend to be more vicious.”

Red dropped his face into his palm, sighing lightly, “I do so enjoy these boorish, not to mention, uncivilized discussions with you.”

“I’m here for you, Red.” Silas held his amusement.

Red wasn’t necessarily thinking with his dick, as it was so vulgarly stated, but more so, his heart.

At least, he hoped that was the gist of it. Sometimes lines blurred. But he was also aware of the fact that his love for the woman was a guiding force.

It was his love for her that demanded he protect her at all cost. Even if it meant killing for her.

“You are crude,” Red confirmed the man’s hypothesis, “...but accurate.”

Red truly did understand Silas’ restlessness. Neither was known for their patience. Especially with a man like, Tom Keen.

Tapping a rhythm less beat on the tabletop, Red lost himself in his thoughts. There had to be a way to provoke Tom... and amuse his men. Restless security led to itchy trigger fingers.

“Tom won’t back down under interrogation but there’s no reason that theory can’t be tested to its limits.” Red thought out loud. “There’s no way the Cabal would associate itself with a lowlife like Lawford unless it somehow lead them to the Fulcrum.”

“Lawford isn’t that intelligent.” Silas shook his head. “Five will get ya ten, he has no clue that such a thing even exists.”

“No, but whoever is pulling Tom’s strings is higher up on the food chain.” Red surmised. “That person is our end goal... it’s a stroke of good fortune we stumbled onto this connection.”

Silas grunted a noncommittal sound.

“Tell the men to step up their efforts to annoy and dissuade.” Red made an executive decision.

Silas perked up.

Red sat back, lacing his fingers over his stomach, “You tell the men I’ll allow them to hunt Tom, but they are ordered to not kill him as yet.”

Silas groaned his discontent.

“Chase him through the streets of New York.” Red laid out a game plan. “A grown-up version of hide and seek, if you will.”

Silas had to admit, the idea was an intriguing one, “I have been on the men about perfecting their tailing techniques.” he felt better. “The young ones don’t use all their senses as they should.”

“Well, there you go.”

“And if one of the boys should,” Silas hedged, questioning the rules of the game, “tag Tom?”
Red’s mouth pulled into a reluctant smile, the guard warming more to the prospect, “They may rough him up... a bit.” he allowed. “But they must also allow him the chance to escape.”

“Oh, what the fuck!” Silas snapped. “That’s not fair play!”

“It is, if the hunt continues on, you imbecile.” Red grumbled. “Tail the son-of-a-bitch. See where he goes to ground, who he meets...”

“All right...” Silas calmed, agreeing to the negotiated terms, “but if he comes at Liz aga–”

“Your orders in that regard, have not altered.” Red’s tone chilled. “You have the shot, you take it.”

Silas’ shoulders relaxed from their tense position... finally.

“When we reconvene in D.C.,” Red said, “we will revisit the discussion we had before your little... accident. Maybe something will come of it.”

Silas frowned, suddenly recalling the reference. “The letters?”

Red sat his tumbler down, a finality to the movement. “Yes, the letters.”

June 9

Liz sighed as she sat her bag on the bureau, watching the clock roll past midnight. It seemed a nightly ritual these days.

She listened to the sounds of the hotel room. Familiar sounds now but oddly different from when she was in her own home.

How did Red... or anyone for that matter, stand the constant strain of travel? Was it even a strain?

Was that what she was experiencing? No... not strain. That wasn’t it.

Something was off-balance. Uneven. Things were not... symmetrical. Not like at home.

Home.

She missed her home. It hadn’t been that long an absence, surely.

Then it dawned on the woman.

She hadn’t felt any of the strangeness when Red was here.

It wasn’t her home she missed.

It was Red Reddington.

Four days now. She hadn’t seen him in four days time.

His business dealings turned out more complicated than expected.

And on her end, Lawford’s holdings were more extensive and time consuming to catalog and inventory than anyone anticipated.
Liz found herself resentful of the intrusions into their life. She knew it was petty and childish even to resent such things. Four days had changed her perspective entirely.

Life interruptus...

Who didn’t face such challenges?

While she had appreciated the work and even being reconnected with her team, it was two days past the expected reunion with Red.

To celebrate another case closed, Silas had suggested a night out for dinner and drinks, her team included.

Relishing the idea of leaving the confines of the hotel and glare of computer screens... she had quickly invited her team to join them.

Only Moore had declined the invitation. The man was much more inclined to spend time with Agents from the field office.

No one seemed particularly upset by his refusal. Samar actually did a little happy dance when informed.

They had a wonderful, relaxed dinner. Followed by drinks and entertainment at a bar down the way.

The night ended in everyone gathering around the piano guy singing Billy Joel’s infamous song of the same name.

She had fun making bets, most of which she lost. She could never pick a winning horse. She played darts and pool with her team... it was a good time.

But she missed Red.

The first night of his absence had been... okay. His scent in the sheets and cuddling with his shirt had lulled her easily to sleep.

Of course, she and Red kept in contact by phone but nothing could replace the reality of him being there.

They connected nightly, sharing their day, their stress, complaints and commiserations.

It was wonderful just to hear his voice. She hoped he felt the same.

His laughter would make or break her day. She was slowly beginning to realize; she was constantly searching for some tidbit of interest to relay which might amuse or distract him.

She thought she had hit upon an item which everyone at work had found rather bemusing.

She wished she had waited to see his expression when describing the bizarre inventory found in Lawford’s last warehouse. She had been in the middle of relating the oddity when Red broke, laughing with abandon.

“Oh, Lizzy,” the sound of amusement, automatically bringing a smile to her face, “if you could only hear the baffled and confused tone of your voice.” he continued the infectious chuckle which delighted her.

Red provided the true back story on how Francis came to be in possession of Canada’s stockpile of maple syrup reserves.

“You’ve been waiting all day for me to bring up this subject haven’t you?” Liz joined in his good-natured laughter.

He told the tale in such an amusing way, his embellishments adding to the rather whimsical occurrence.

Her expression had run the gauntlet from startled disbelief to resigned amusement.

A time or two during the unfolding of the story, she found herself covering her face, totally embarrassed to be found an associate of a loon like Francis Holbrook.

But another part of her reveled in the fact, she could list the man among her very dearest friends, if not, the most cherished.

“Only Francis could carry off something that weird and have it turn out in his favor...” Liz realized.

It was in spite of his antics most times but sometimes... because of them, she loved his so dearly.

“...It also explains why we have a case of syrup in the pantry.” she continued, a reluctant smile pulling at her mouth upon hearing Red’s scoffed groan of despair.

“How the hell did such a mistake happen?” she was befuddled. “They were supposed to pick up crates of ammunition... but went ahead and carted thousands of barrels of what clearly was liquid out of the warehouse.”

“Bizarre is synonymous with Francis,” Red nodded he understood her confusion and dismay. “Either way, they managed in record time from all accounts.... I think, correct me if I’m wrong. Security at a syrup factory is rather on the nonexistent side.”

“Well, not anymore.” she started laughing again.

Red relaxed back in his chair, having found his happy place. “This is much better than last night’s chat, isn’t it?”

She flushed a little, “Weren’t we silly, snipping at each other like that.” she had thought about it all day.

“I have unearthed a theory about what happened.” he confided.

“You Googled it...” she teased.

“Elizabeth,” Red exasperated, “how many times do I have to tell you and Francis, Google does not hold the answers to all humankinds woes?”

Liz grinned at his honest vexation.

“I didn’t Google it,” Red, having his say, settled admirably. “I went to a source reliable and infallible... I asked Dembe.”

She giggled, “He reads Reader’s Digest, so then it must be true.”

“Damn right.” Red agreed. “And while I am sure psychologists have any number of superior sounding words which might apply to why we were at odds with each other last evening,” he stopped for a much needed breath, “Dembe put it into laymen’s terms. Something with which we both can identify, I’m sure.”

“What did he say?” Liz was genuinely interested. “I was looking forward to your call all day but when we connected, we both became very surly in a remarkably short period of time.”

“We did.” he nodded succinctly. “Dembe reminded me that human’s often display one emotion when it is actually another they are experiencing.”

“Not following.” she admitted. “We weren’t upset?”

“We were, but for totally opposite reasons than we believed.”

“Well, I thought,” Liz had, “that your tone put me off a little. It felt as if you didn’t really want to be on the phone with–”

“Which was exactly the opposite of what I wanted.” he stated emphatically. “I too, had wished to speak to you all day and it was a long, taxing day... for both of us, correct?”

Liz thought back over the previous day, “I was grumpy all day.” she recalled. “I thought it was working in close proximity to Moore. It had nothing to do with you.”

“And I,” Red shared, “had to deal with similar people in the organization. But, all I could think... this will be worth it when finally, I hear Lizzy’s voice.”

“Oh...” she was sincerely touched, “... did you really think that?”

“I did.” he confessed. “Were you aware, the entire time I was speaking to you, Francis was in the back ground feeding me Intel concerning the meetings I purposely left to be with you.”

“Well...” Liz sat up from her slouched position on her pillows, flushing, “my phone kept constantly dinging with text messages from the team...well, Samar and Ress, anyway.”

“I highly suspected.” Red nodded. “We weren’t angry with each other... we were angry because the outside world kept intruding on our time.”

The silence was completely comfortable on both sides.

“Is that what it was?” Liz was astonished because it made perfect sense... now.

“We resented the hell out of them.”

“Why did we take it out on each other?” she wasn’t clear on that one as yet.

“Human nature.” Red shrugged. “According to Dembe we weren’t even aware we were transferring those emotions.”

“Until it was too late.” Liz sighed.

“A guy comes home from a bad day at work. He’s so glad to be home but inwardly,” Red explained, “he and his significant other will have an argument because he neglected to vent those negative emotions elsewhere.”

Liz pondered the concept.

“Instead of expressing genuine anger at those who pissed us off. I, for one,” Red had time to analyze Dembe’s hypothesis, “ignored them completely, dismissing the irritation in the hope that it would all be over as soon as I could speak to you.”

“Red...” Liz’s heart was touched.

“They affected us more than we liked to admit,” he sighed heavily. “Of course we are going to end up resenting it.”

Liz nodded silently, her fingers twirling the ends of one of his ties absently. She kept it hanging on the head of the bed. It was one she liked tremendously when he wore it.

“...There is a bright side to what happened,” Red smiled.

Liz’s brows lifted high, “Arguing with you isn’t high on my list.”

“There is, when you take into account,” his eyes softened, “we felt comfortable enough to do so, without repercussion.”

She did have to admit, even with the tension, she had felt at ease unloading on Red. She supposed, he felt the same way.

She harbored no ill will towards him today at all. In fact, she was anticipating his call.

“Thank you for calling and making it all better.” she needed to say the words. “I was miserable the whole time... were you?”

“You know I was, baby.” he rubbed his eyes, kinking his neck. “I hate being at odds with you... for any reason.”

“Same here.” her voice softened. “I wanted to call.” she confessed. “And I would have, really.”

He chuckled, “I caved first, huh?”

“I don’t think so.” she wrinkled her nose. “I was going to call before you but Samar actually got to me first.”

“You kinda like me.” Red’s ego inflated, her words enchanting him.

“Not as much as I like Dembe, but yeah,” she teased, “you’re somewhere on the list.”

“Liar.” Red’s tone washed over her like a seductive sweep of his hand. She missed his touch so much.

“Every woman falls under Dembe’s spell.” she defended herself, trying to shake the very pleasant sensation that tone had caused. “You know that. We can’t help ourselves.”

“I think he releases some kind of hormone.” was Red’s theory. “Which explains Dembe... Silas defies scientific logic.”

Liz chuckled, “It’s pure animal attraction. He’s explained it in minute detail, several times.”

“You actually asked him?” Red’s brows rose.

“No.” Liz stated flatly. “He gifts me with those daily gems of wisdom so if the opportunity presents itself, I’ll be better prepared for Jeopardy.” her droll tone made him smile.

Red chuckled quietly, “After my discussion with Dembe, I realized I had not informed Francis or anyone else of my new rules.” she inclined her head, knowing he was referencing the chat he had with security. “I will correct that error as soon as possible.”

“I don’t mind Francis calling.” Liz was quick to ease the man’s ire.

“I do.” Red grumbled. “Unless he’d dying,” his rubbed aching eyes, “he can wait until morning.”

“Can’t handle it after a long day?” Liz snickered.

“I can barely handle him during the day.” Red quipped. “Probably because he has awakened me from a sound sleep to engage in some of the most inane conversation I’ve had in my entire life.”

Liz tittered, rather enjoying that the two most important men in her life got on so well.

“Listen, are you in for the night?” she glanced at the clock on the beside table, her hopes sinking. It was only a little past nine his time.

“There is a gala or some such frivolity going on in a couple hours.” he waved a dismissive hand. “I’m supposed to show up and mingle.” he ran his hand along the back of his neck. “It’s where the real business of the day is accomplished. I suppose I should attend.”

“When do you people sleep?”

“We... people?” was he being lumped into that category.

“You know what I would absolutely love?” she confided.

“Tell me.” he encouraged.

“To fall asleep in your arms.” her tone softened to a gentle caress.

“I know this is hard, baby.” he ached poignantly to be with her. “I want you in my arms” he concurred, “so damned badly.”

“It did feel kinda normal though,” she commented, having settled down, hugging a pillow to her slender frame, “when we were bickering... like a couple who are comfortable enough to express themselves with each other... didn’t it?”

“Let’s get back to, I want you in my arms.” he suggested.

“I mean, we were grumpy with each other and that was okay, right?”

“We will have disagreements,” he sighed. “It’s how we address the issues between us that will make or break us... you know that, baby.”

“Do I?” she wondered. “With Tom, I always just gave in. It seemed easier.”

“Tom was a master manipulator.” Red reminded. “You give in enough and you start to lose your own identity.” he knew the feeling well.

She nodded, thinking over all the lost years of her life, “I wish my aim had been better at that warehouse. I know Silas ratted me out.” she took for granted. “And don’t act like you don’t know what I’m talking about.”

“You don’t mean that.” Red scolded superficially.
Liz’s brow furrowed, “Afraid of a little competition?”

“Are we going to argue about this?” Red queried lightly, allowing her the knowledge... he too wished her aim had been more on the mark. “If so, Silas is on your side.”

“Rightfully so.” Liz lifted her chin snootily. “Silas is my...” she searched for a proper description.

“Partner in crime.” Red shook his head woefully.

“I thought that was you?” she held her amusement, before forging on. “I will not argue about this.” she staunchly replied.

Liz was not the least bit put out about the subject they discussed. While most of it was said in jest... a sick truth to it crept around the edges.

“May the best man... or woman, win.”

“I agree to those terms.” Red’s lips curved into a shark like grin. “Though, just for the record... I am not Tom, I like a spirited partner who doesn’t back down from a fight without just cause.”

“You do, huh?”

“You know I love challenges.” Red smiled when he heard the challenge all ready in her tone. “And you, are the best challenge I’ve had in my life to date.”

Lizzy was quiet for so long, he thought his words had troubled her, “Elizabeth?” he sat up.

“I miss you so much.” her voice broke.

Red closed his eyes to the pain within, “Don’t, baby. It tears me up inside when you are unhappy, for any reason.”

She smiled gently, blinking back tears.

They missed each other terribly and being unable to relax together at the end of the day as they had become accustom... was a weight they carried between them.

It felt nice to be missed. Even more so, to be Red’s outlet. To be that which made him forget his day. Liz’s soul was a little lighter for the fact.

“Guess that’s why I love you so much, do you think?”

Red’s mouth pulled into a reluctant smile, “Do you, Lizzy?”

“With everything that I am.” she confessed openly.

“If I were there right now,” he mused, “I would make sure you would never want to leave my arms.”

The woman thrilled to the confidence exuded.

“Do you believe those words, Elizabeth.”

“I believe you can make me believe them.” she smiled secretly.

“I would like to think I can.” Red wished. He hoped that was the case at this point in their relationship.
“You know...” Liz was more than hesitant, feeling her way, “I have a rather silly confession to make.”

“Let me be your priest.” he quipped.

“Red!” she was shocked, sitting half way up for a beat.

“Don’t tell me women don’t fantasize about that scenario.” he scoffed. “Want me to bring a white collar and Nehru jacket home?”

Liz shook her head, giggling, sitting back into the bed, “Do you men fantasize about nuns?”

“Absolutely not.” he stated emphatically. “We’re too afraid to do so.”

She chuckled, “Hell and damnation?”

“No... the sisters themselves put the fear of God into us quite efficiently all on their own. A sturdy ruler and agile wrist go a long way.” he confided. “They don’t need any help from the Big Guy.”

“Dembe?”

“God.” Red practically snapped. “I see I’m going to have to start watching that man more closely.” he made himself more comfortable. “Maybe I can pick up a few tips on how to mesmerize women.”

“It’s almost mystical, isn’t it?” Liz teased.

“If you say so. Now...” he got things back on track, “let’s discuss the confession, shall we?”

Liz had forgotten her train of thought.

“Does it involve lace panties and whip cream?”

Liz laughed outright, “That makes my real confession seem pointless by comparison.”

“A man has his dreams...” he sighed, then sobered. “Seriously,” he quietened, “tell me.”

The woman quietened as well, “It’s just that,” she hoped he wouldn’t think it sounded trite, “when you’re away... I have pillows.” she blurted before she lost the nerve.

“What?” Red half-chuckled.

“I...” she flushed, “I lay them beside me.” it was explained. “I... pretend.” she trailed off, embarrassed.

The man was quiet so long, she started to squirm. “I take one of your t-shirts.” it was his turn to confess.

The man had been fingering the ultra soft material the entire time they spoke.

“It retains your scent.” he finished, his voice soft and gentle for her.

Liz was taken aback, “What?”

“The one you lounge around in...” he explained, “I always take something of yours with me.”

Her heart was touched, “I couldn’t find it. I searched all over the hotel. I thought housekeeping or the laundry service misplaced it.” It didn’t once occur to her that Red might have been the one to take the sea-green shirt she so cherished.

“Turn the lights out. Lay down and get comfortable.” he suggested low and soothing. “Close your eyes.”

“Is it going to be one of those nights?”

“No.” he half-smiled. “No, tonight, I just want to be close to you. I need that, don’t you?”

Tears pricked her eyes. The man sounded so forlorn, so affected, “I... I feel exactly the same.”

Red side glanced the pillows beside him, shaking his head. Nothing would ever be a good enough substitute for Lizzy’s soft curves molding to his.

“I’ll be home soon, baby.” Red vowed. “I promise you that. But right now...let’s pretend for a while, huh?”

Liz nodded her agreement, her throat tight with emotion.

“Are you nodding?” his eyes softened.

“Oh!” the woman shook free of the moment. “Yes... yes, I would like that, very much.”

Red situated himself more comfortably, “Tell me about your day.”

Elizabeth cuddled to her pillows, happy to hear his hypnotic voice in her ear.

They spoke of inconsequential things in hushed tones, just as when they lay side by side together at night when at home.

And the silences were just as comforting. Red realized just how deeply he was becoming attached to the woman and their routine.

He reveled in the fact, the mere sound of her breathing could put him in such a mellow, wondrous mood.

He pulled a pillow into his arms, resting his chin where the crown of Lizzy’s head would be.

He closed his eyes as both desperately tried to grasp hold of the illusion they sought to create.

Red knew the hour was drifting by far too quickly for his liking. Soon he would be called away.

He was hoping, at least the woman might drift off before that eventuality.

“Did you fall asleep, sweetheart?”

“No,” she mumbled sleepily, “I was listening to you.”

“Why don’t you put me on speaker and let me lull you to sleep.” he replied quietly.

Lizzy had fallen asleep on the phone with him before. Once after her Brownstone had been breached, then later after she experienced a panic attack.

Red stayed on the line, wide awake... listening for any hint of danger or offering a soothing tone, easing any further panic.

To do the opposite of that now... to succumb to more pleasant circumstances... to take comfort in each others presence was exceedingly nice for a change.

“The phone bill will be excruciating.” she murmured in her half dream state.

Red stilled in his movements a moment, before chuckling at the off-hand remark, “What year are you in?” he teased.

He couldn’t remember the last time they had to pay for minutes? Not that it would have mattered in any case. He’d pay any damn price more than happily, if the last sounds he heard tonight was the soft breathing of Lizzy beside him.

“Like we can’t afford it.” he teased quietly.

Red shared some juicy gossip floating among the elite of his associates that amused Lizzy.

He related some antics Francis and Ben perpetrated over the past few days. They could always be counted on to liven up any meeting. No matter how staid and mundane the premise.

Lizzy’s breathy laughter fell gentle on the man’s ears.

He reached for her, his disappointment acute when he realized his faux pas. His hand fell on the empty space beside him, the coldness of the sheets piercing his warm hand.

The moment was achingly poignant for the man.

“Is something wrong?” she sensed a subtle change.

He didn’t answer, unable to shake the disquieting sensation so quickly.

“I love you.” she murmured softly, instinctively wanting to ease the sudden strain he was emitting although, silently. “Have I told you today?”

Red chuckled involuntarily, “I love you too, baby.” his darkness dissipating as quickly as it came.

Liz shook the cobwebs, sharing tidbits as well. She sensed he needed the mundane himself for a while.

An hour later, both individuals found themselves surrendering to the heavy weight of sleep which pulled at them.

Dembe found Red slumbering away, his phone propped on his pillow.

The sound of Elizabeth’s deep, evened breathing filled the restful silence of the room.

Dembe smiled warmly down at his friend, flicking off the bathroom light, bathing the room in darkness.

He would inform Francis and Ben to mingle in Raymond’s stead, as he was in tense negotiations and unable to get away.

Taking one last look at his friend, Dembe closed the door, shutting out the world that made so many demands of them.
Come Monday...

Chapter Notes

The ink is still wet on this one, we literally just finished adding in some things a few minutes ago. I would be surprised if there weren't any typos. If there are any, point them out :)

I added a couple reader suggestions again but one in particular has been in the works over a couple chapters... we finally bring it full circle in this one. I hope she enjoys it. :)

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

JUNE 9 -

Elizabeth Keen was restless.

Yes, that was the word. Restless and bored.

She fidgeted the entire elevator ride. Her guards were stoically quiet, about their jobs. She hated when they were in that mode.

She felt disconnected with them. She was no longer ‘Liz’... she become the person they were paid to watch over. To risk their lives for.

While intellectually, she totally understood the need to separate the two realities, emotionally the fact irritated her.

She had even hit Silas’ broad shoulder as she passed in the hall, giving him an annoyed glare.

The man halted his steps instantly, sparing her a ‘what the hell’ look, his hands spreading wide.

She studiously ignored the unasked question that look implied, waiting impatiently for him to unlock the hotel suite’s entrance.

Liz sighed, laying her laptop bag on the counter as Silas closed and secured the door behind them.

Normally, she loved her time spent in New York but today; she was relieved this jaunt was almost over.

With her team in the final stages of closing out their side of things, Liz was in a sort of limbo of her own making.

Red had left the jet here for her use and she could leave anytime she wished.

However, it felt tacky to strand her team, leaving them to find their own way home. Since she was going in that direction herself, she offered them a lift.

Now, there wasn’t much for her to do but wait for their return.

Considering she, herself, was here in an unofficial capacity, Ressler suggested she make herself scarce to avoid censure.
Liz shrugged off the thought but then did as suggested, if only for Ressler’s sake. He too, could face disciplinary action should it come to light she worked before being cleared by the Bureau.

She could probably skirt the rule because Red required her presence, but for Ressler’s sake... she took a back seat.

Besides, she just didn’t feel like bothering with the tedious formalities.

While her team dealt with the last of the red tape, securing pertinent files with the local field office, that would allow them to prosecute Samuel Lawford... she returned to the hotel.

Lawford would get jail time for the usual crimes the mob dabbled in. Racketeering, tax evasion, extortion... possession of stolen goods.

Liz glanced around the spacious suite, looking for something positive to do.

She plopped a pod in the coffeemaker, going through the second nature motions on automatic pilot, her mind recalling her earlier conversation with Samar.

It didn’t matter how long Samar had done the job, it still twisted her gut when men like Lawford, while listening to all the charges laid against them, murder included... remained aloof and blasé.

As if someone were simply reading a newspaper aloud to them.

The Agent confided, the display, or rather, lack of one disturbed her.

What was even more bothersome, when the man finally showed emotion, it had been completely out of the blue and for the oddest reason.

Lawford had gone completely ballistic when his possession of vast quantities of syrup had been called into question.

If it wasn’t so utterly disturbing, Liz would have laughed.

Either way, she made mental note to inform Red, Lawford knew he was being labeled the fall guy. Francis should watch his back for a while just on the off chance Lawford had any faithful followers who might enact revenge for their boss.

The team would handle the rest of the documents at the Blacksite, particularly those pertaining to Lawford’s involvement with certain terrorist factions.

The Bureau had enough with the minor infractions alone to get life in prison. Only when Lawford came up for parole, would the rest of the information come to light, if the need arose.

It seemed like an injustice to not nail Lawford with everything they could.

After speaking to Silas about it though, Liz changed her tune.

Her guard reminded her, if they kept the Intel on hand under wraps, it would allow the Special Op’s teams handling the situation the element of surprise when they moved in on the terrorists to take them into custody.

Considering the men on her security detail, men she knew and loved like family, were all ex-military who had performed such operations in the past... Liz was more than supportive of them having the upper hand when it came to such dangerous missions.
Grasping her laptop, she fell heavily onto the sofa, gratefully enjoying the silence afforded her.

Silas had gone about his routine, securing the massive rooms they occupied.

Justin breezed past her having opened the door, entering without preamble. Liz noted a guard just outside that door.

Justin spared her a wave, heading to the back rooms, a spring in his step, a grin on his face. Silas emerged from the same area, saving the young man a trip.

“You need me?” Justin bounced excitedly in place.

“No,” Silas waved the guy off, “go... play.”

Justin clapped his hands together excitedly, bolting for the door with a backwards wave goodbye before disappearing from view.

“What d’you do?” Liz chuckled as Silas approached. “Get him laid?”

“Even I am not that good.” Silas snarked.

Rolling her eyes, Liz pulled her laptop closer. “No, seriously. What’s up with the guys?” she frowned at the coffee stain on her lid, wiping it clean. “They were all grumpy bastards, now they’re like the Stepford Wives... with their creepy smiles.”

Silas glanced up, shrugging, “They’re just enjoying their new assignment.”

Liz scowled, her cup held aloft in mid-air, “Since when?”

“I encouraged them to hone their skills while here,” Silas murmured, marking a couple items off his daily checklist, “for the next few days, they will be employing concealment and camouflage techniques to evade pursuing enemies.”

Liz listened to the man, a frown furrowing her brow the more he prattled on, “You told them in essence...to go play hide and seek?”

Silas lifted expressionless grey eyes, “In laymen’s terms.”

His full lips pulled into a disgruntled resentment for such a jejune phraseology.

She tittered softly at the man’s seriousness, “You did tell them not to play in the street?”

“They have to be aware of all forms of danger.” Silas grinned wickedly.

“And they’re doing this... why?” she questioned the purpose of the activity.

Silas leaned forward, intent on informing the woman of the game, then hesitated.

While he personally had no issue informing Liz of the impromptu war game security was implementing with Tom... Red might.

Not that Silas believed Red would hide their activities from Liz, but he knew well enough, the man would rather discuss it with Liz himself should she have questions... or objection.

Liz narrowed her eyes at the man, “Is Red hiding something from me?”
“No.” Silas answered without hesitation. “I think he would prefer to discuss this with you himself.”

Liz nodded slowly. “You don’t think it’s your place to elaborate?”

“No, I don’t.” the man nodded in return. “I don’t think he would mind if I told you, I just think...”

“No,” Liz lifted a staying hand, “I respect what you’re saying.” she did. “Just so I know... he’s not in any danger or—”

“No, no...” Silas assured quickly, “has nothing to do with Red.” he sat forward, linking his fingers between parted knees. “I would inform you if there were issues with his security.”

Liz studied the man’s face, finding truth in the slate eyes.

“Nor is he hiding this from you either,” Silas clarified. “He doesn’t do that, Elizabeth.”

Liz felt slightly rebuked. Silas so rarely called her by name, after all.

She was reading between the lines well enough. Red and Silas had discussed the events that took place and security measures... then Red wanted to hear for himself that she was okay with whatever tactics arrived at, straight from the source.

In the midst of reconnecting with her, he simply forgotten to bring up the subject. She couldn’t really fault the man either. She too, had forgotten to mention key points of her day to Red last night... in between all they discussed.

“The subject of letting me in the loop wasn’t brought up.” Liz clarified.

“Exactly.” Silas confirmed.

“Okay...” she inclined her head gracefully. She would talk to Red soon enough and would broach the subject then.

“It’s all right, Silas.” she smiled kindly at her now brooding guard. “It was a simple communication error,” she shrugged. “I believe, if it were truly important, you would tell me.”

And Liz did. Silas, himself, assisted her in finding personal security for Red, so if Red were in danger, she believed her guard would inform her of any issues.

So whatever security was involved with, Red would explain things in finer detail when he could.

When they could discuss those finer details... would remain to be seen. There were so many things for them to talk about, and not all were work related.

Liz mused on the gradual development in her and Red’s relationship.

They discussed so many aspects of their lives now on a daily, oft times, hourly basis.

She no longer felt an outsider in any sense of the word.

She was ashamed to admit, she never looked at Red as a colleague, let alone a friend until he saw to her well-being after her run-in with Carver.

Even then, it had taken a couple weeks to warm up to the man. Let alone, see him as a human being.

Her thoughts drifted to an instance where she began looking at Red in a different light.
It happened days before her birthday. It was such an innocuous little thing, but his actions had endeared the man to her psyche.

Before he hired on Nora, Red had secured a cook to handle breakfast in case he was called away.

By chance, Red’s meeting ended earlier than planned. He returned home just as the cook was setting plates of standard breakfast fare, along with... pancakes, before her.

Red stepped in before anyone could blink, removing the offending plate. He apologized for the grievous error, explaining he had neglected to inform the cook of her aversion to pancakes, then promptly requested French Toast be prepared instead, just how she liked it.

At first, the woman had felt rather silly for such an insignificant mistake. She would have simply made a pretense of tasting the food then lie to cover the tiny oversight.

And then it occurred to her... Red knew her preferences almost as well, if not more so... than she.

It was at that moment, Liz realized she had never taken the time to know him on a personal level.

It wasn’t until recently that she learned how Red Reddington liked his coffee or that he had a weakness for jelly biscuits in the morning.

On the other hand, if asked of her teammates, she could have told you that Ressler liked sausage biscuits with coffee. Samar enjoyed a hard-boiled egg, English muffin and chamomile tea. And Aram, pancakes with milk.

She grimaced remembering one morning when Red handed her a cup of coffee prepared how she liked from her favorite coffee shop. She had snapped at him, demanding if he was having her followed.

She had felt rather embarrassed when the man gestured to the coffee mug from the previous day emblazoned with the shop’s name along with the ingredients listed on the side, in plain view.

He had simply observed a preference, just as she had with her own team.

It saddened her that Red knew so much about her likes and dislikes, and she knew very little of his.

Slowly but surely, she was correcting that. But finding time to squeeze twenty questions in between the other issues of the day, was sometimes difficult.

In hindsight, aside from the fact Red did need more sleep, she was glad Red demanded they be given uninterrupted time alone.

She was determined to adopt the same attitude. When they were alone, the phone and laptop would be turned off.

Everyone else had off-time... a romantic life. So could they, dammit. And it was something she desperately needed, wanted... right now with Red.

“What’s wrong with you?” Silas’ deep baritone jarred the woman from her musings.

Liz looked up, finding her guard frowning in her direction.

“You’ve been,” he gave her a once over, “sullen, all day.”

Liz broke the intense gaze, fiddling with the buttons on her keyboard, just then realizing she was pouting. Not frowning, but pouting.

“No, I haven’t.” the pout deepened much to her vexation.

“Yes,” he disagreed, “you have.”

“I just...” she sighed, “I miss, Red.”

“Uh huh...” Silas grunted the response, knowing better.

Liz tsked, huffing, “You know...” she pinched her lips irritably, “not everything is your business.”

“I have my secrets,” the man’s droll tone drawled, “you have yours.”

“You tell me yours,” Liz lifted meaningful brows, “I’ll tell you mine.”

“I can guess most of yours.” Silas dismissed. “You want to go see the guy.”

Liz instantly brightened at the suggestion. Four days apart was weighing on her nerves, she admitted it only to herself.

“How... could I do that?” then sanity prevailed, “No... no wait,” her mood dropped, “that would be pushing it, right?”

Silas wisely let her work it out in her own way.

“I mean... it’s not like I’m stuck in the boondocks, for goodness sake,” she reminded herself, “there are a billion and three things to do in this city. I should find a few thousand and go for it, right?”

Silas cocked his head to the right, listening politely for once.

“I could go shopping!” she brightened but even then, the thought held no real interest. “Is there something you guys want to do?” she grasped at straws. “A strip joint or something?”

“Our tastes run to museums and galleries.” Silas quipped.

Liz had a good laugh over that one, “Yeah, for the nudes.” she arched a knowing brow. “No, seriously though...” she waited hopefully.

“Red doesn’t want a new fedora or tie,” the guard assisted, “he wants to know that you are missing him as much as he is you.”

“You think?” she turned to a gooey mush inside.

“There’s no accounting for taste.” Silas didn’t want things to get maudlin. “Let’s just get on the damn jet and go.”

Liz sat the laptop aside absently, “I think something like that might be a little... too much too soon in our...” she trailed off, “don’t you? Me showing up out of the blue, unannounced?”

Silas stared at her moodily, nothing more.

“He has meetings to worry about.” she fidgeted. “I would be an intrusion to his work.”

Still, her ‘mentor’ remained silent.

“Silas, help me out.” she pleaded. “I’m floundering here. I don’t know him as well as you do yet.”
“You know him, Elizabeth.” it was sternly corrected. “He’s allowed you in deeper than anyone before. Trust your instinct.”

Still, the woman’s indecision stifled those instincts, he could see.

“If it were me...” it was hard for the man to be open with any emotion let alone, personal ones. But he made the effort. “A man wants tangible evidence that someone gives a damn.”

Elizabeth waited anxiously for the narrative to continue, unaware she was holding her breath.

“Being able to touch that evidence, to hold it in your arms,” Silas’ brow furrowed darkly, forced to consider his own needs and desires, “shuts out all the shit the day has brought.”

Those slate eyes lifted, staring intensely, “I know the shit Red is dealing with. I’ve seen it firsthand.” he shifted those all-knowing eyes. “...He wants you there. So... go.”

Liz’s heart leapt with joy.

“Do you think?” she rubbed her hands together nervously.

“What did I just say?” Silas snapped, unhappy with the fact he allowed too much emotion to cloud his judgement.

Liz opened her mouth just as her phone rang, saving her from replying.

“Oh, hi,” the woman grinned infectiously, “I didn’t expect you to call so early.”

“I had a few moments between meetings.” Red sighed. “If I had to spend one more second with those idiots without a break,” he told the truth, “I would have pulled my weapon.”

“Are you talking about Francis?” Liz took exception for her friend.

“Believe it or not, Francis and Ben are the only ones keeping me sane and if you repeat those words...” Red felt better already despite his mood.

“You’ll pull your weapon on me?” Liz quipped.

Silas sat straighter, a little more interested now that guns were involved.

“No,” Red drawled. “But if we don’t have some time together, I may snap and kill everyone.”

“I should warn you,” The woman waved the guard’s sudden interest aside, “Silas is in the room, so you better watch it fella, my guard doesn’t take kindly to veiled threats.”

“Yeah, whatever. He’ll try and fail.” Red grumbled. “...Talk.”

Liz couldn’t help it, she giggled at the brusque demand, “is there anything in particular you wished for me to say, oh Great One?” she questioned, smiling at her guard who pulled a disgusted grimace.

Silas made himself comfortable, his arm draping along the back of the divan. He crossed his ankle over his knee, grasping the area.

“And let’s keep it clean,” she suggested, exchanging a playful glance with Silas, “big ears are listening.”

“When the hell did he start giving a damn about propriety?” Red stated peevishly.
When the hell did I start giving a damn about propriety?” Silas stated just as peevishly.

Liz’s mouth fell slightly agape. The two men had no idea just how in sync they were. Their thought patterns often overlapped, she had come to realize.

“Tell Dumbo to take a hike.” Red had other plans.

Red enjoyed the quiet of the room he had slipped into which had been booked for several of the meetings he would be holding this session.

“I needed to hear your voice…”

The man propped his bottom on a convenient table, the highly glossed mahogany allowing his thigh to slide effortlessly along the smooth, rich grain.

“I want you to talk to dirty to me,” he clarified, “without that jackass listening in.”

“You’re in a grumpy mood.” Liz’s eyes softened more so when the man huffed... grumpily.

“Not exactly the dirty talk I anticipated.” Red frowned his discontent, his tone betraying his light-hearted words.

Taking pity on the man, Liz settled more comfortably on the couch, tucking her legs under her.

“I miss you…” she pouted, a coyness entering her voice.

“That’s better.” Red drawled after a moment’s consideration, his temper warming to her persuasive charm. “…Keep doing that.”

“Do you miss me?” Liz played her role, sticking her tongue out at her guard for he had made a gagging face.

“Of course I do,” Red grumbled, feeling the effect of her presence even over the line, “you know I do.”

Oh, he was in a dour mood today. Liz’s tummy flipped in response. She liked when he was like this because... she was the only one who could really get him perked up.

“I’m so lonely in that big old bed,” she held the pout, “I’m cold without you there, sharing it with me.”

Silas tilted his head, his expression not exactly an impressed one. Liz tried harder.

“The sheets don’t warm against me like they do when you’re here.” she ventured boldly

“Maybe if you weren’t naked…” Silas muttered his belief.

Liz clamped her mouth shut, staving off a fit of laughter. She took a deep breath hoping to compose herself.

“I’ll warm you when I get home.” Red husked.

She suddenly wanted to prolong this conversation. She loved his voice and the way he ‘sold’ a paragraph he read.

“That...” Red nodded, “among other things.”

The deep sensual tone filled her with all sorts of pleasant emotions.

“Other things?” Liz whispered hopefully.

“Well, if you don’t know...” Silas remarked sotto voce, his brow crooking with his growing amusement.

“Oh...” she ignored her guard, sending him an annoyed glance focusing on Red instead, “... you mean like, cuddling?” she asked innocently.

Red grunted, admittedly enjoying the innocent image painted in his head.

“Do you like to do that?” Liz questioned anxiously, feeling her inadequacies. She was just learning this new form of foreplay. She sensed she needed improvement.

“I like cuddling you.” Red admitted. To be honest, he rarely, if ever, had the chance with other lovers to pursue such an intimate level.

Sex was sex. But the man could not say if he had ever taken the time to promote deeper emotions with others. Surely, he would not have been so remiss.

“And I like when you lay against me,” Liz hedged purposely, “and settle your weight between my legs and your chest presses against my breasts.”

Red blinked, his mind shifting to an unexpected place.

“That warms me right up...” Liz purred, whispering for Red alone. She threw Silas a ‘go away’ glare.

Silas sat back comfortably, his brows raised at the unexpected turn of events. He gave her a thumbs up for her effort.

“Do you like that as well?” she asked tightly, sharply shooing the other man away.

Silas’ mouth pulled into a grin as he leisurely pushed off the couch, benignly heading for a snack... allowing them a moment’s privacy.

Red’s shoulders eased from their tense perch. He closed his eyes, allowing the pleasant images to come.

“...Yes.” he admitted anxiously, another type of tension forming in his body.

Clothed or not, he savored the visions of him surrounding Lizzy’s warm, soft body with his thicker bulk.

He adored when the woman wriggled beneath him, as his weight bore down on her.

At first, he thought his weight too heavy for her but quickly learned... she would exhale her contentment once he settled in place, burrowing closer into his hold.

He had chuckled the first time she had done that, amused by such eager acceptance. Lizzy nuzzled her nose into his chest and neckline, softly purring her contentment.
Lizzy was a snuggler... which was more than fine with him. Though, he would have never expected it in a million years by her everyday demeanor.

But then, that was Lizzy. The gift that kept on giving.

Liz shifted gears sensing phone sex was not behind the reason Red called today. That was not what would ease his mood. Their discussion last night consisted of subject matter deeper in nature.

“When you surround me in your warmth,” she sighed airily, sharing her own emotions freely, “your love... that’s where I find the most peace.”

Liz listened to the man’s breathing and could tell his tension was diminishing by degrees.

“What do you enjoy, Red?” she murmured. “What brings you peace?”

“Being with you.” the man replied without hesitation. “...Speaking to you... with you.”

Her cheeks plumped with delight.

“I enjoy our dinner conversations, just talking about... nothing.” he cricked his neck, relieved when it finally loosened enough to pop. “When we read together, that gives me a certain... calmness of soul.”

She had not known that.

She always assumed he might be a little annoyed by her sudden conversations when they read in the evenings. She was constantly interrupting him, discussing an interesting subject his words brought to mind.

“I...” his eye ticked at the juvenile thought but what the hell, “...I even like holding your hand.”

The smile on her face widened to extreme proportions, her heart skipping a beat, “...I like that too.”

And she did. There was something about his large hand dwarfing hers that excited, yet calmed her.

“There is a... connection.” Liz felt it each and every time. “Something passes between us.”

Red’s eyes softened when the woman sighed happily, “At night, when we’re in bed,” his voice lowered intimately, “laying against one another,” why they were sharing seemingly frivolous things, he didn’t know, but it was making him feel whole again, “content in each other’s presence...” he exhaled slowly, “it’s as if everything is right in the world.”

Liz’s eyes pricked suddenly with wet heat, “... I love you,” she choked around the knot in her throat, “you know that.”

“I’m beginning to.” he murmured, a peace settling into his soul, “...I love you, Elizabeth... you must know that.”

She inhaled shakily, gripping the phone in her hand, listening to the man breathe.

“Now...what’s wrong.” Red asked softly. “And don’t say nothing... I know you by now.”

“I wish I could say the same about you.” her lip quivered, realizing she didn’t know hardly anything that mattered.

The statement threw Red. He sensed this had nothing to do with their normal routine of him ‘keeping things from her’.
This was entirely personal.

He waited for a sign of what to say... how to respond.

“How do I like my eggs?” Liz asked. “My favorite cheese?”

Of all the gourmet choices he brought home for her to try... the woman was still addicted to Velveeta cheese.

“What’s this about?” he asked.

“Are there things about me you don’t know,” Liz asked, “but would like to?” she put it badly.

“There are a great many things I would like to know, yes.” Red admitted, wondering where it all would lead.

“I guess I’m saying, you know so much about me. You know the littlest things,” she frowned hard at her clumsy attempt to explain, “like how I prefer my coffee and that clowns annoy me.”

Red held his amusement, knowing such a reaction wouldn’t be appreciated at this time. Lizzy seemed truly despondent about this issue that had arisen. He couldn’t help the warm smile that curved his lips, however.

“I know so little about you... which is by no means, your fault.” she murmured.

Red hadn’t expected this... at all. It was a delightful turn of events.

“How do you like your eggs? It’s a small thing, I know... but I don’t know the answer.” she was frustrated with herself. “Do you like sweet over unsweetened tea?” she questioned. “Hell, I don’t even know how you prefer your steak cooked!”

Red lifted his head, digesting the moment. She was finally wishing details about his personal preferences. He waited forever to get to this point.

“Over medium,” the man answered readily, his mood suddenly high, “sweet tea and I like my steaks... medium.”

Liz lay back into the couch, her entire body relaxing. She hugged a throw pillow, falling into the spirit of the moment, happy now. “What’s your favorite season?”

“I prefer the fall.” he said. “Winter can be beautiful in the mountains. Spring is lovely because it renews the spirit. And summer at the beaches are superb.”

That was her favorite as well.

“Though,” Red grinned, “Summer may take precedence with your little ass traipsing around in a bathing suit.”

Liz snickered quietly all the while making note to go shopping for some new, more daring bathing suits this year.

“Do you prefer making love with the lights on or off?” she checked on Silas’ whereabouts. The man vacated, when... she hadn’t noticed to be honest.
“With you,” the man’s rumbling timber lowered, “...on.”

Liz’s cheeks flushed, a heat pooling between her legs. She took a deep breath, controlling her urge to ease the sudden ache.

“A-And in general?” she cleared her throat, needing to continue this fact finding mission. “Before me?”

“Nothing matters before you.” Red replied honestly. After his reactionary confession, he thought about it a moment.

For the life of him, he couldn’t remember making note of the atmosphere he had created with the other women in his life.

“...Red,” Liz tsked.

“Lizzy, I truly can’t recall if it ever came to mind.” he confessed. “I’m sure I provided the proper ambiance, I’m not a complete cad,” he said, “I romanced my partners if given the opportunity.”

Few required it though. He remembered that. There was one goal in mind on both parts and that was the sexual release.

Red had explained a little of how his world worked.

One-night stands were the norm. One could ‘sleep’ with an associate but it was wholeheartedly unadvisable to actually close one’s eyes around them.

There could be no real formed attachments because loyalties shifted, changed... in the blink of an eye.

So she assumed that a romantic setting wasn’t a must-have.

“Before us, I had no real preference that I can recall.” he didn’t lie.

Elizabeth eclipsed them all, making the memories fuzzy, “With you... I prefer the lights on.”

Images of their time together flashed in his mind’s eye of Lizzy’s pink skin glowing under the soft light of the bedside lamp. The warm illumination highlighting the woman in a dusky hue that was most alluring.

“Which isn’t to say... there aren’t benefits to the opposite situation as well.” the man mused.

Liz frowned. What the hell did that mean? If anyone else had said it, she would have taken it as an insult. Did she look better in the dark?

“Your silence is telling, sweetheart.” Red’s eyes twinkled, knowing by second nature what the woman was thinking. “How can a man chose between watching or feeling you climax.” his tone deepened. “Both are my most prized and cherished rewards.”

“Oh...” she gasped her understanding, the flush of her skin covered her chest in a rosy tint.

With the lights on, Red could watch as the pleasure he gave her encompassed her body. With the lights off, he only had the sensation of her coming around his shaft to alert him of a job well done.

“And your preference?” Red enquired, although he already suspected.
“...Both.” she confessed. She too loved watching the man lose himself in her body. But it was equally addictive, the heightened state her flesh achieved by the simple touch of his hand. Or the sudden rush of heat which filled her as he climaxed in the quiet darkness of the room.

This was unproductive. It was bad enough she had been without Red’s company for four days. It wouldn’t do either of them any good should they become aroused when no form of outlet was available.

She squared her shoulders, determined to change the path of this conversation to a safer subject.

“Jam or Jelly?” her blatant attempt amused Red. He laughed softly.

Red’s eyes sparkled at her sudden veiled attempt, understanding the reasons. He missed her as well.

“Jam.” he replied. “I’m partial to blackberry, as you know.” he reminded her, she did in fact, know something about him.

Red released a heavy sigh of exasperation, indicating their time was over... for now. Liz sensed someone had intruded into his world on the other end of the line.

She was disappointed their time had ended so soon, hundreds of probing questions popping into her mind.

“Dammit...” he cursed under his breath. “Baby, I–”

“I know...” she smiled warmly, riding the tide of disappointment. “You’ll call me later?”

“I will.” he promised himself another episode of Elizabeth Keen, if nothing else.

He watched the men approach.

Dressed in a variety of expensive suits, the group could pass for everyday businessmen going about their daily fare.

The dour expressions only hinted at a pressing problem to which they must attend.

Red geared himself up. Pressing problems in his line of business meant much more trouble on the horizon than most.

Something came to mind which staved off his rising depression. He grasped hold of the lifeline, his tone almost mellow when he spoke.

“...Come Monday, Lizzy.”

The woman’s stylish brows furrowed, “...What?”

“...Come Monday.” he stressed tightly. “I’ll call you soon. I love you, Lizzy.”

“I love you...” she replied hastily, though knew Red would wait for her to hang up first. He loathed severing the connection, always allowing her to do so in her own time.

Knowing he had urgent business, Liz quickly severed the connection. She stared at the phone, her puzzlement growing more as the seconds ticked by.

What had he been trying to tell her? She sensed no danger, on the contrary, a rather sweet melancholy was in Red’s tone. Left to her last resort, she booted her computer and brought up Red’s nemesis... Google.

In this instance, it’s all she had. She studied the subjects which her search garnered, even more disenchanted.

Silas came out from the back rooms, apple in hand. Considering the direction her call with Red was heading when he departed, he expected to find the woman flushed and slightly disheveled.

All women should be flushed and slightly disheveled in his humble opinion, on a regular basis.

Not confused.

“Something wrong?” Silas asked, sitting across from her, biting into the crispness of the fruit.

“If someone were to say to you,” Liz lifted her eyes above the computer screen, her brow etched attractively, “come Monday... what would that phrase imply to y–”

“Jimmy Buffett, “Come Monday?” Silas took another bite of the apple he held. “Red likes that song.”

Another thing she knew nothing about. In the grand scheme, it was such a minuscule thing but Red always said; it was the small details which truly mattered.

Shrugging, Liz searched for the song. Finding it, she hit play. And in just a few notes, she felt closer to Red. She always liked it... who didn’t like Jimmy Buffett? Now, she liked the song more, knowing she and Red shared a common enjoyment of it.

She vaguely listened, wondering if he meant that he wouldn’t be home until next Monday.

“You better not be gone seven days.” she grumbled irritably.

Her fingers hovered over the keyboard, her mind wandering. She pulled up the lyrics, peering over the lines inquisitively.

Silas shook his head, watching the woman slip into profiler mode. Her focus intent and determined to unlock the mysterious puzzle.

Perhaps that was why Red had been so cryptic? He knew the woman enjoyed the hunt, the piecing together of all the puzzle pieces.

Liz scanned the words, studying them carefully. If Red was trying to remain on the down-low, maybe he was hinting a secret clue was hidden within the seemingly transparent words that sat before her so enigmatically.

Moving the cursor, she took the song back to the beginning, listening attentively for any sort of hint.

Was he headed to San Francisco? What was there of any real interest? Labor Day? No, that was months away.

Tapping her foot along with the melodic tune, she lay her head back into the sofa only to snap upright moments later, a thought surfacing.

Red had been in California four days, just as the singer mentioned. Was this a message about...

“Oh...” Liz turned up the volume. “Ohh...”
Was he telling her... he missed her? That he wanted her by his side?

Raising a hand to her mouth, she cast watery eyes to Silas.

The man sat, a wry grin overtaking his handsome face, “Houston, we have contact.”

“Did he... is he...?” Liz gestured to the laptop. “Does he mean...”

“Red does love Jimmy Buffett.” Silas repeated, as though that was all the answer she needed. “Not as much as he loves you... but damn near close.”

The song continued, its message taking on an entirely new meaning. Tears dotted Liz’s lashes, chuckling at what Red must have been thinking when he passed his words on to her.

It had indeed been an eventful spring, especially as they moved into summer, she had to agree with him on that. The song reminded her so many wonderful things had happened.

They had traveled extensively, spent a wonderful holiday together... they found themselves falling in love.

She startled when the melodic lyrics mentioned Montana.

She vividly recalled her conversation with Red in Montana about growing old together. Red said he harbored no doubt it would happen.

Liz looked out the windows of the high-rise, taking in the spectacular scenery. It was pretty... up here. But something was lacking. The magnificent scenery left her empty without Red beside her.

Goosebumps covered her arms in response, leaving her very melancholy and aching to see the man. Was this how he felt without her?

While she loved the idea that Red missed her, Liz also couldn’t help but wonder... was he being worn thin by what was going on out there? Was he telling her, in a roundabout way he needed her?

An urgency over-took the woman. She turned from New York’s fabulous skyline; her face animated, a thought having struck her fancy.

“Silas...” she hesitated, logistics boggling her over sensitized system, “I mean... would it be possible to...”

The guard was up and moving before Liz said his name, “I already called the private service.”

Silas sensed the situation long before the woman. Especially after their earlier conversation. He had simply been waiting for her to catch up.

“Oh, no! It’s too expensive. We couldn’t.” Liz wrung her hands, “Could we?” she bit her nail pensively.

“He left it here for you.” Silas said.

“To return to D.C, not fly willy-nilly across the damn country on a flight of fancy—”

“He won’t mind.” Silas grinned, already dialing the number needed to confirm the flight time. “Trust me.”

“This is insane.” she muttered, dashing about, quickly gathering her laptop and other items scattered about. “I shouldn’t do th–”

She rushed for the hall, pulling up short, “What about...”

“I will handle your team.” Silas waved her off, phone to his ear. “This isn’t my first rodeo, you know.”

Liz nodded shortly, continuing onto her rooms.

Rapidly pulling clothes off the rack, she threw her things haphazardly into a bag. It took less than ten minutes to gather the last of their things which she stuffed into larger luggage.

Hitting replay on the song, she darted off to the bathroom, her excitement mounting. Rinsing quickly off in the shower, she dressed in fresh clothing. She’d worry about her hair and makeup later. She had time, once in flight.

Silas knocked on the door, “Liz, we can head out in forty-five minutes. Can you do it?”

“I’ll be out in ten!” Liz yelled back, excitedly.

“This time...” she could hear Silas chuckling as he walked away, “you might actually be on time.”

~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~♥~

The first flight had been quick, but long. But only due to Liz’s eagerness to see Red.

After their arrival at the airport, Silas had cheekily waved their goodbyes to Tom before shutting the door to the jet.

At least they would be without Tom’s presence, as he would assume they were all headed back to DC.

As Liz and her team settled into their seats, everyone seemed in good spirits and ready to be on their way.

A collective groan filled the cabin when she was overheard quietly asking Silas about what to expect on Red’s end of things before her arrival in California.

Liz quickly explained that due to her role in Red’s life, he required her presence and she had to meet him after dropping them off.

It was only after assuring the team their services definitely were not required, did all really begin to... relax.

She couldn’t blame Ressler for being the most vocal. The man looked haggard. She fretted when the agent graciously accepted the offered drink the flight attendant, Laura, provided.

Should he be partaking, was he on pain meds? Ressler had reassured her, however.

All had happily accepted a refreshment, aside from Moore. Liz grinned when the svelte woman Laura, turned away from the moody Agent, downing the drink herself.

Flight attendants were people too, apparently, affected by surly individuals like anyone else.

Laura grimaced, pulling up short. Two sets of eyes rested on her.
The flight attendant breathed a sigh of relief, finding Elizabeth giggling quietly behind her hand. The head guard, on the other hand, remained expressionless.

Laura was grateful when the young woman hit the guard’s thigh playfully, sending him a ‘loosen up’ look.

Liz waved Silas off, smiling her sympathy at Laura. Letting her know without doubt, neither would say a cross word about her actions to Red.

Shortly after, they offloaded Liz’s team, much to the relief of her guards... and herself, if she were honest. Goodbyes were said. She watched the SUV’s drive off, eager to be on her way.

All breathed a collective sigh when the plane became airborne once again.

Listening to her guards bitch about her team sucking the atmosphere from the plane... though Samar was never once lumped into the fray, Liz shook her head at the antics. Other than that note of dissension they had a relatively decent flight.

She rested the first leg of the journey, but as they grew closer to their destination, she started putting herself to rights.

Red had once commented that he would find her just as attractive in a burlap sack, sans makeup... but that did not stop Liz from applying the warm shades, striving for a natural look that looked fresh and glowing.

She also took time to work curls into the heavy strands of her hair, giving the dark beauty shine, volume and bounce.

She looked herself over in the mirror, her confidence fairly radiating back at her.

Alerted to their approaching descent, Liz packed her battle gear before returning to her seat.

Silas gave her a once over, giving the woman an appreciative nod, “You’re passable.”

“And you are a god.” she muttered, stowing her bag, taking a seat.

“Don’t I know it.” Silas was happy with the response.

After their arrival, the guys had quickly loaded the car. They set off towards their destination. Liz’s spirits rising one second, sinking the next.

She stared vacantly at the passing scenery, her thoughts bouncing from problem to problem.

“What?” Silas glowered, searching instantly over his shoulders for the little prick.

“No,” Liz waved aside the man’s attempts, “the guys. They’re playing hide and seek with Tom... that’s what’s going on.”

“Very astute reasoning.” Silas grinned, settling back in his seat. “You should be like, a profiler, or something.”

Liz rolled her eyes expressively, “And when they catch him?”

Silas explained the rules of engagement to a point, concluding, “They must allow him the chance to escape.” he ended sourly.

“What the hell?” Liz grumbled. “They have him, why not–”

“Kill him?” Silas filled in sardonically, his brows lifting innocently.

“Well, yeah. It’s only fair play.” Liz shrugged, then questioned the easily stated words.

“If you kill it,” Joe explained helpfully, “you catch, you skin it and mount it on your wall.”

Liz piped up eagerly pointing excitedly at her comrade in arms, “Yeah, yeah... exactly!”

“You’ve become bloodthirsty.” Silas stated. “It's a good look for you.”

Liz found herself nodding her head graciously, accepting the praise, before catching herself yet again.

“Surely this conversation is wrong... on so many levels.” she shrugged after a moment, getting lost in her thoughts once more.

They entered heavier traffic, but Joe expertly navigated his way through it, throwing out an occasional curse at drivers as he passed.

“Am I doing the right thing?” Liz asked herself, so confused and befuddled suddenly. She thought seriously of turning around and heading back to the airport.

“I think you are.” Silas replied from the front, his tone mellow and confident

“I said that out loud?” Liz said, looking about her surroundings totally bemused.

“He will be very pleased to see you.” Silas assured. “If I thought otherwise...”

Liz took a cleansing breath to settle her nerves, “He doesn’t know I’m here though, right?” she still had a chance to bolt.

“I assumed you wanted it to be a surprise.”

She nodded, “Okay. Yeah... I guess. Wait, we don’t even know where he’s stay...” she stopped when Silas glanced over his shoulder, his expression saying it all. “Right. Of course you do.”

“We’ll be there in a few minutes.” he looked out his window, taking in the neighboring vehicles. “Just relax.”

Settling back into the leather, she tried to follow that suggestion.

Pulling up to the hotel, Liz couldn’t help but be impressed. Each new place they visited left her in awe, some more than others. But still awed, none the less. When would she become blasé about the magnificent structures, she wondered?

Silas walked to the front desk, as were per custom, leaving her in Joe’s company. She stood, looking around the plush setting.

It was rather, homey. Something she did not expect from the outside exterior.

The entire length of the large lobby was aglow with warm light reflecting from simple, yet intricate chandeliers. Rich earth tones and raw stone made her feel instantly at ease.
It charmed her to see comfortable sitting areas unobtrusively placed strategically throughout the large room.

The soothing atmosphere had nice flow but was also extremely functional.

Silas walked back to her a few minutes later, carrying a set of key cards. He handed one to Joe as he gestured to the elevator banks.

“How did you get his room key?” Liz asked accepting the card he handed her.

“This is my key.” he said, flipping the plastic about in nimble fingers. “He always leaves one in case of emergencies, no matter if we’re traveling together or not.” they stepped into the available lift.

“You gonna call him?”

“No, I don’t think he’s there.”

“How did you get his room key?” she asked, the woman was instantly concerned for a moment that Silas might be warning her it might not be wise to simply appear on scene unannounced.

What did he think they might happen upon? A business meeting? A party? Another woman...

“I think he will enjoy the surprise more if you don’t.” the guard’s words took her by surprise.

So Silas didn’t think there was anything to worry about. She felt her stomach flip. If she only felt the same way.

The elevator stopped its climb at the top floor. Again with the penthouse. Red loved his high rise.

He often said, in the past, money is for spending. Purchasing the good things in life, otherwise... what was it good for?

Silas walked down the hallway, Joe at his back. The large guard proceeded Liz, knocking on the door in a rather peculiar rhythm.

The guy exchanged glances with his side-kick before venturing boldly forth. He swiped the card as he opened the door very slowly.

“Knock, knock...” he called out cautiously peering about the door facing.

This seemed to be taking an inordinate amount of time. And now, knocking on Red’s door as if she were a stranger visiting.

“I didn’t want my head to get blown off.” Silas muttered, reading her expression well. He pushed the door open, proceeding her as a precaution. Though, they were met by silence. “He must still be in the meeting.”

She should not have come. Suddenly the excitement of her decision in New York faded, melting into indecision and regret.

Silas grabbed their bags, ushering her through the luxurious rooms. They arrived at the master suite in no time.

“If you want to settle in...” he sat her bag on the large king bed, heading for the door, “I’m going to stow my bag.” he studied her for a long beat. “Give Joe a chance to get his bearings.”

She stood in the middle of the room, glancing about aimlessly.

“You all have rooms here?” she gestured to the rest of the unseen suite.
“No, Joe and the other guards have their own quarters on this floor.” Silas informed. “It’s specifically for security.” he said. “I’m down the hall here, beside Dembe.” he jerked his thumb. “You okay?”

Liz closed her mouth, forcing a smile, “I’m great!”

“Uh huh...” Silas hesitated knowing something was amiss, but then took his leave, allowing her to adapt to her surroundings in private.

Liz stood, taking in the quiet of the room. Which was meticulously clean.

Red was not a normal kind of guy in any respect. He said it was his years of Naval training... and his ex-wife. And Liz assumed, in case he had to leave on a whim, no trace of himself would be left behind.

He picked up after himself.

There were no signs of his clothing or luggage anywhere.

He would have ‘stowed’ it all ready.

She made a mental note to ask.

A tie clip lay on the side table by the bed.

Red’s side.

Change lay neatly in a silver tray next to the clip.

Red never carried change on his person. He said it spoiled the cut of his suit to have change in his pockets.

Liz smiled.

Realizing she was just standing, she absently crossed to her luggage, opening the valise more to have something with which to occupy her troubled mind.

Maybe this was a bad idea.

She wanted desperately to see Red. But what if he thought of this time apart as a welcomed respite?

Maybe she had misread the cryptic, “Come Monday”, message.

Maybe he needed a small break from...

Liz sighed heavily, chastising herself. She was being silly. Of course Red would want to see her. Her surprise visit would delight him.

She shook free of such annoying thoughts.

She pulled her things free, stowing them in their proper place. She never bothered unpacking before. Living out of a suitcase was unsettling however.

Red always made a home where ever he lay his head.

Since she picked up on the habit, Liz realized, she felt more attuned to her surroundings. Which is why Red adopted the practice himself, she supposed?

She took several blouses, heading for the walk-in closet. She stopped slowly, her mouth pulling into a soft smile. Red’s things were lined neatly on one side.

His side.

The wash basin had been the same. Red’s articles placed fastidiously on one side.

It was as if he were waiting for her.

She felt infinitely better, a definite spring back in her step finally as she moved on.

After getting her things situated, Liz did a once over, applying fresh make-up and giving a quick bounce to her hair when she heard movement in the front. She halted, comb lifted when a distinctive click alerted her to someone entering the suite.

Red was here!

She scurried to the hall, her excitement barely contained. Her steps halted abruptly when a woman’s voice filtered down the corridor in which she now stood.

She inhaled sharply, before catching the sound physically with a hand over her mouth.

Tentatively peeking around the corner, she watched Red being trailed slowly by a gorgeous blonde traipsing the outer room.

He glanced around aimlessly, sighing his discontent. “Where the hell did that idiot...” he grumbled, “ah, here it is.” he picked up a folder off a nearby table. “Francis had it earlier, it’s a wonder I found it at all.”

Liz fell silent, easing back into the dark shadows, uncertain of her next move. She fluctuated in her decision making. This was not at all how she envisioned their reunion.

“Look over the terms and conditions,” Red said, holding out the manila folder to the woman, “and if it works for you, we’ll discuss a price we can hopefully agree upon.”

The blonde smiled, tapping the stiff paper against her palm before laying it aside.

“Better yet...” Liz could not resist a peak. The curvaceous woman walk seductively towards Red, smiling, “why don’t we cut to the chase here.” she was saying. “I’ll agree to the terms, you ship for me, then we can spend the rest of the evening negotiating a set of terms that works best for both of us... in the bedroom.”

She reached out, pulling at the knot of his tie... Liz’s mouth fell agape for such audacity.

Red reached, halting her intent.

Unnoticed by Liz, her guard had suddenly emerged from his room.

Silas read the scene immediately, instinct telling him to hang back until he assessed the situation.

His little brunette charge stared nervously out at whatever was taking place. He could hear voices quiet clearly, deciding to wait it out.

He could discern from the conversation taking place that the female was making a move on Reddington... not an unheard of occurrence.

“I’m very flattered by the generous offer, but I will have to decline.” Red’s tone was both respectful yet firm.

“If you think there is an issue with stepping on Luca’s toes,” the blonde said, “don’t worry, we are over...gone our separate ways, as it were.”

“I’m sorry to hear that,” Red replied genuinely, “but my refusal is of a personal nature.” he stepped back, heading for the bar. “Would you like a drink while you look over the contract?”

The woman laughed quietly, following slowly after him. Liz narrowed her eyes as the woman stealthily stalked Red, her curves swaying suggestively in the skintight dress.

“I never thought I’d see the day Red Reddington would play hard to get.” She smirked, leaning her shapely hip against the bar. “It’s unexpectedly... charming.”

Silas hoped Red kept his head about him. That his boss would make him proud. Because... in similar situations pre-Liz... Red would fuck the blonde, no questions asked.

Red poured their drinks, sliding one across the granite to the woman.

“You flatter me.” Red was determined to be polite. “But no, that is not the case at all. I’m engaged, you see. To a most lovely, ador–”

“If you’re worried about my being discrete...” the woman cut the explanation short, “Honey, I’m not interested in anything long term. You should know me better than that by now.”

Red shifted noncommittal eyes.

Silas was pretty sure Red was going to get a couple good whacks out of this one if Liz’s expression was any criteria by which to judge.

“I’m happy for you and your little... plaything, truly, I am.” blondie sounded sincere, but her eyes were measuring the man in a most interested manner. “We are both seasoned individuals, surely.” she shrugged. “...My interests lie more in all the sordid tales of that amazing cock I’ve heard so much about.”

“All of which are greatly exaggerated, I’m sure.” Red hefted his glass, sipping a small drink. “Greatly...I emphasize.” he modestly added.

“And while you and I may be... seasoned about such things. My fiancée is delightfully... not.” he sat the drink aside. “She would see any breach of trust as just that... a breach... of trust.”

“How utterly... quaint.” the woman sensed the man’s decision was final. “Can’t blame a girl for trying.” she shrugged carelessly.

“You are a beautiful, desirable woman and in the past...” Red shrugged as well. “I’ve found something... unique. I have every intention of keeping it intact.”

The woman studied him for a long beat, “I had that once.” she scoffed. “Or thought I did.” she lifted her glass. “Here’s to hoping your Camelot never loses its shiny exterior... but if it ever does,” she laughed hollowly, “you know where to find me.”

Red nodded minutely, “And your King Arthur... Luca?”
“Hardly.” she chuckled, appreciating good wit when she heard it. “It was a lifetime ago and trust me, Salvador could never be mistaken for the great King, although....” she turned melancholy for a brief second, “... to me... he was.”

Red felt her sadness acutely, but business was business.

“My cock and its fucking activities have been reserved for my Guinevere.” Red tipped his glass, emptying it before sitting it on the bar. “Sad, but true.” he said in a droll tone, a smile tugging at his mouth.

The woman laughed, “From what I hear, she’s a lucky girl.”

Red shook his head, “I am the fortunate one.”

“No.” the woman sat her drink aside. “Believe me... she is.” she tapped the folder with well-manicured nails. “I’ll look this over and have an answer by tomorrow.”

Red smiled pleasantly, “Nothing is written in stone. I’m flexible on my terms.” he could be magnanimous.

The woman had taken the rejection with a modicum of grace and style which he admired.

“That rejection alone should net me another...” she mused, “five percent?”

Red mused, “...Two percent.”

She chuckled, “Better than nothing. I’ll take it.”

Liz stood hard against the coolness of the wall, her eyes blinking back tears of joy.

The blonde lady was beautiful and built like a work of art. She had amazing breasts, a fantastic ass... and she had laid her charms on thick. Most men would have fallen hook, line and sinker.

Three months ago, he might have. But tonight, Red wasn’t biting.

Silas emerged out of nowhere, startling the girl. She blinked wide eyes his way.

How long had he been standing there?

She flushed, embarrassed.

He offered a shit-eating grin but let her off the hook, turning his attention to the occupants of the massive living area.

The woman was walking to the door, Red trailing behind.

Liz blotted her eyes hastily, wondering if her carefully made-up face was still half-way presentable.

Silas watched Red guide his associate out the door, exchanging inane pleasantry.

The large guard spared Elizabeth a glance.

She was more composed now, taking in deep breaths.

Red headed back to the bar, grasping the heavy tumbler in his hand, tapping it idly on the thick granite.
He sighed heavily, pouring another drink, downing it quickly.

He leaned into his arms, hanging his head dejectedly.

Snagging the remote in hand, he pointed it out into the room, rolling his tense shoulders as the sound of Jimmy Buffett filled the room.

Liz shared a bright smile with her guard as the sound of the music drifted down the hall. She sniffled quietly, a rush of relief washing over her.

Peeking around the corner, she wavered a bit in her stance. She was unsure what Red’s mood might be at this point.

Had he been tempted by the seductress? Had he been aroused?

Silas urged her out, gesturing curtly... twice.

Liz reluctantly moved out into the brightness of the room.

“Hey...” she called out softly.

Red jerked his head to the right, watching the woman step down into the living room.

“Lizzy?” his expression was incredulous. “...What the...

“I hope you don’t mind, but...” she smiled warmly at the man who sat his drink down quickly, “I couldn’t wait until Monday.”

Red beamed happily, the tension in his frame vanishing in the blink of an eye, “God no, I don’t mind.”

Stepping out from behind the bar, he made a beeline for her.

Liz chuckled quietly as the man swept her up in a crushing bear hug, squeezing the air from her body.

“My God... I can’t believe you’re here!” he whispered, his eyes drinking in the sight seconds before he kissed her... deeply...ardently.

Liz returned the kiss passionately.

Finally, allowing the woman a breath, Red opened his eyes, staring contentedly at her upturned face, waiting patiently now.

Liz guessed the rhetorical question on his mind, wincing slightly having to confront her literal flight of fancy, “I guess you’re wondering–”

“We took the jet.” Silas saved her from answering, sauntering into the area, hands in proverbial pockets.

“Did you have a good flight?” Red asked, guiding her to the bar, helping her hop up on the stool. “Was the crew accommodating?” he held up a beer, offering it to Silas, then pulled down a wine glass.

“Yes, it was very smooth, fast...” she smiled. “Everyone was fantastic.”
Red’s eyes swept her frame, taking her in. He was incredibly pleased she was here.

“Where’s your boot?” he frowned, pointing to the bare leg.

“The doctor at the hotel gave me the go ahead to remove it.” she smiled happily, lifting her leg high to prove all was well.

Red instantly shifted questioning eyes to Silas, needing the guard’s input.

Silas chuckled quietly when Liz gasped indignantly at the slight, “Everything checked out fine.” he assured his boss and friend. “Don’t be such a nudge.”

“Dembe and the others are playing poker, if you’re interested.” Red jerked his head, gesturing to the guards’ quarters’ next door.

Silas looked between the two, catching a hint when he heard one. “And on that subtle note....” he gulped his beer, headed to the nearest exit, a swing to his step.

Red smiled, his mood very much improved now that Lizzy was here. “We’re staying in.” he chose to ignore the guard.

“Wow... what a shocker of a statement.” Silas muttered sarcastically.

“I’m starving.” Liz shrugged apologetically. Odd, her appetite had been nonexistent all morning. Now, she was famished.

“Room service?” Red offered, pleased when she nodded eagerly.

Sliding her a menu, “Not that I’m not inordinately pleased that you are here...” Red stepped between Lizzy’s open legs, the outside world falling away, “but I didn’t think you’d fly a couple thousand miles for–”

“It sounded like you needed to see a friendly face.” she looked pointedly at the radio and the song it was playing.

“I missed you,” he pulled her close, dipping his nose into her neckline, breathing in her fragrance, “...so very much.”

Liz smiled into his shoulder hugging him dearly. They swayed gently, and she wondered if the man was even aware he was doing so.

The song came to an end, leaving the couple in comfortable silence.

The moment stretched into infinity before Red gathered his wits. “I’m sorry, sweetheart.” he pulled back, looking down at her apologetically. “You said you were hungry, didn’t you?”

He hung up the phone, both having made their selections from the menu.

“It’ll be here in about fifteen... twenty minutes.” he said, lifting his hand, stroking her cheek line.

She smiled up at the man, before snuggling into him again. “It’s really okay...” she questioned quietly, “that I’m here?”

“Of course. I’ve never been so...” Red sighed, leaning his forehead into hers, “I’m thrilled you’re here, Lizzy.”
“Is something wrong, Red?” she frowned a little, the man’s tired demeanor worrying her a tad.

“It’s just been a long couple days. Negotiations have been complicated,” he murmured, “and as I’m sure you witnessed,” he quirked his brow meaningfully, “…tedious.”

Liz shrugged slightly, “I didn’t mean to..” she didn’t realize he had guessed she had listened to his chat with the blonde, “I was just...”

“Making sure I kept it in my pants?” Red assumed.

“Aside from being proud of you for resisting her... charms.” Liz allowed his assumption. “It’s difficult not knowing what I’m allowed to do at such a moment.”

“What did you want to do?” he teased.

Liz sighed heavily, falling back into her chair, “...She is an associate.” she scowled. “A jealousy display is not exactly a mature, rational response.” she lifted honest eyes. “I don’t want to embarrass you.”

“And were you,” he probed, “jealous?”

She scowled at him, “Tell me what I should have done.”

Red scowled right back, “Protect yourself, at any and all costs.”

“And you?” she questioned. “When do I protect your virtue?” a smile played at her lips.

“I had no interest in that woman, what-so-ever.” Red reminded honestly.

“I wasn’t implying you did.” Liz said. “I just wondered, if I stepped out and made my presence known, would it cause problems in your work?”

“I told you,” Red connected eyes with her, “you are my main priority. Nothing else.”

Liz took in the man’s posture and the words, looking for the truth in them.

“You do whatever you feel you need to, Lizzy.” Red reasserted his feelings on the matter. “I will support you.”

After a few seconds, Liz inclined her head in silent assent.

“You look exhausted.” she changed the subject.

“Sleeping has been sporadic.” he smiled.

“Long meetings?” she questioned.

“That...” he nodded, “but mainly, I missed my security blanket.” he rubbed his nose along hers, drawing a smile from the woman.

She had missed him too, and had to admit, it had been hell going to sleep without him.

“That cryptic farewell remark...” she grinned up at him, a playful lilt in her voice, “did you essentially dedicate a song to me?”

Red chuckled after a second, nodding. “Yes, I guess I did.” he fully admitted. “In my own way.”
A soft knock on the door broke the two apart.

“Do you have your weapon?” Red asked quietly, quickly directing her to safety.

Liz shook her head, grimacing for her oversight, “It’s in the bedroom.”

Red pulled his extra piece, shoving it in her hand before gesturing her to the darkened hall. She did as asked, scurrying across the room as he approached the door.

Standing to the side, he stretched, tapping out another distinct rap on the facing. He received a reply in kind.

She witnessed the man’s tenseness fade. He stepped, opening the door having hidden his weapon beforehand.

It was only their dinner arriving but a fully armed guard accompanied even that, Liz noted.

Red tipped the waiter, nodding his gratitude to that guard.

And once again, the room was quiet and secure.

“Come and eat, sweetheart.” Red said, setting the covered dishes and iced tea on the long dining table.

Liz emerged from the darkened hallway, a fixed smile on her face.

A short time later, appetites having been satisfied, the couple sat, enjoying coffee and what remained of their scrumptious meal.

Twinkling lights of the city spread out below their windows like small diamonds scattered about haphazardly by a powerful sweep of an unseen hand.

Red was not usually as talkative as he was proving tonight. He often deferred to her, allowing Liz to take the lead in which way the conversation would flow.

Four days spent apart was a long time. There was so much to catch up on.

Liz was a good listener and enjoyed when the man opened up so freely in her presence.

Tonight, she found her thoughts wandering here and there several times having lost the topic of the man’s words.

“Am I boring you?” Red chuckled, having picked up on the fact.

Liz’s face softened, “One thing you never are, Red Reddington... is boring.” she pulled herself back into the fray.

“Are you tired?” his expression took on a concerned slant.

“Not at all.” she shook her head. “It’s just a silly woman thing.” she managed a smile.

“So share this ‘silly woman thing’,;” Red suggested, placing his fork aside, his attention focused, “with a man who gives a damn.”

“I know you do,” the lovely mouth pulled into a gentle smile, “and I love you for it but it’s really not that import—”
“It’s important,” Red corrected, “to me.”

Liz sat back, realizing what an incredible man she had found, “You’ll laugh at me.”

“I’m not Silas.” his eyes were steady, fixed. His finger tapped idly against the tabletop, waiting for her to confide in him.

She chuckled easily, “Thank the Lord.” the woman shifted about wondering how to put what had been troubling her into words.

“...I got my period.” she blurted, realizing suddenly just how inappropriate a subject this was over a dinner table of all things.

Red’s eyes shifted to the deep grain of the table... processing the unexpected information, “...Okay.”

He wasn’t certain how to proceed or how to even respond just yet.

“No, I mean,” Liz stressed, “...I’m not pregnant.”

Red’s hand stilled, his wine glass inches from his mouth. He slowly set it aside, nodding minutely, his brow furrowing.

“I was under the impression Mr. Kaplan had settled this issue.” he sought her out. “Are you saying, you think she could have been wrong in her–”

“I know what she said,” Liz pushed her fork through her mashed potatoes, “...I just thought,” she fidgeted aimlessly in her seat, “it was a little early, to...I mean, wasn’t it?”

Red felt a shift in the space between them, something that told him... tread carefully here.

The woman had been harboring this ‘secret’ with her for days, obviously. She had not been able to fully accept Kaplan’s results.

Red took the time needed, studying the woman across from him intently.

What had brought this on?

Liz sat, worrying her napkin with unsteady fingers. She refused, as yet, to seek out his eyes.

A realization dawned on the man.

“You know what I think,” he ventured forth his theory, the silence surrounding them like a warm blanket suddenly.

Liz’s eyes shot to his, “...No.”

There was hope and expectation in those eyes that touched him.

“...Unlike other couples who have gone through the... anticipation,” he felt his way, “trepidation, and, in some cases,” he teased with his look, “relief, in whatever form, staring at that pregnancy test takes...”

Liz lifted resigned brows.

“...A moment, a very private and intimate one... was taken away from us.”
He idly tapped the table, his mind calculating, swirling about to solve the problem presented.

“I would give anything to have that moment back, Lizzy.” he sought her out. “What about you?”

Liz was confounded by the question, “Well, it can’t be brought back.”

“Can’t it?”

“Well... no.” Liz was pretty sure that ship had sailed.

Maybe there was a way.

“This bleeding you mentioned,” he questioned, “are you certain it’s your period?”

Liz questioned the question with a look.

“My ex-wife experienced breakthrough bleeding when she was pregnant with Jennifer.”

“I... it feels pretty normal?” Liz frowned slightly. She had heard of that breakthrough bleeding thing before, but didn’t know much about it.

“I’ll tell you what.” Red leaned into the table on his forearms. “I’ll run down, get a pregnancy test and we’ll just make sure, all right?”

He pushed back his seat, gathering their plates as he went. “I’m sure you’re right, Lizzy.” he soothed the woman. She had fallen silent and he could not read her mood or stress level.

“I just want to double check.” Red braced his arms on the table. “Doesn’t hurt to get a second opinion,” he leaned, kissing her lips, “does it?”

“I think this is just... normal.” Liz hesitated.

She didn’t feel any different, anyway? She felt like she always did during her period. Some days were okay, some days she felt like one of the walking dead.

“Maybe we shouldn’t fuss.” she blinked those huge eyes up at him. “And Mr. Kaplan said... I wasn’t.”

“Kate is not infallible.” Red’s eyes held hers easily. “Sit tight.”

She pushed her chair back, watching the man take his leave. He smiled brightly at the guard in passing, waving the man off when he went to follow.

“You’re being silly.” Liz told herself after the door closed, blocking sight of Red.

Walking back to the master, she went about her earlier activities.

Setting out her toiletries and what not, appreciating the busy work, her mind too hectic, her thoughts uneven. She paced the room restlessly.

She noticeably startled when she heard the door close to the penthouse. She had not heard it open, so deep in her reverie was she.

Red entered the master, pharmacy bag in hand.

“Calm down.” the man smiled gently, having seen her state of nerves. “It’s just so we are sure.”
“I know.” she nodded quickly. “I don’t know why I’m so jumpy.”

He could think of a few reasons, but now wasn’t the time to dump them on her. He handed her the box, leaning back into the counter folding his arms over his chest.

Liz opened the box, pulling a test free. Red watched as she tried to tear the package open but her hands were shaking so badly, it brought a scowl of concern to the man’s face.

“Are you all right?” He placed his hand over hers, taking the wrapped stick.

“Yeah, sorry.” she reddened with embarrassment. “I’ve done these so many times, I guess it’s an ingrained nervousness... with Tom, I mean.” she hastened.

“Did you want a child, Lizzy?”

“I don’t think I did, upon reflection.” the reality troubled her. “I think, even before we started the adoption process, I sensed... something wasn’t exactly right.”

Once or twice when they settled in the brownstone, she remembered a subdued excitement, though. When things were good. There had been good times, or what she perceived as ‘good’.

But the let-down she expected, when the test was negative, never really materialized.

“Whatever the outcome, we’re in this together, Lizzy.” Red stressed.

She took a deep breath and smiled before turning to the private toilet. She came out a minute later, sitting the test on the counter.

She stood, staring at it, without blinking...her mind chaotic with possibilities.

Red stepped in behind her, wrapping his arms about her waist, softly kissing the nape of her neck, sensing her state.

“Did you enjoy some off-time with your team before you left?” the man distracted her.

“Huh?” Liz looked up into the mirror, looking at his reflection, her thoughts miles away. “Oh...oh, yes. Last night.” she confirmed.

“We went to that hole in the wall joint you recommended.” she smiled at him, “and it was great. Everything was amazing. The food, the service....” she hesitated, “then the bar you said to check out.”

Red grinned. “A fun place, yes?”

“Very!” she giggled. “Aram about got a dart stuck in his neck.” she narrowed her eyes at the man, though playfully. “Was that part of your diabolical plan for us?”

“I did so want your time in New York to be memorable.” he chuckled, falling into the stressed lightness.

“Silas didn’t throw that dart... did he?” Red questioned Silas’ wicked sense of humor.

“No...” she laughed. “Why would you ask that?”

“Silas has unique ways of warding off potential competition.” Red knew the guy’s modus operandi.
“What are you talking about?” Red fully caught her attention.

“Silas is interested in,” Red searched for an acceptable way to phrase it, “...Samar’s feminine charms.”

Liz gasped, shocked and slightly alarmed, “Are you saying,” she shook her head fretfully, “...Silas wants to bang Samar?!”

“So much for subtlety.” he chuckled then glanced at his watch. Five minutes had passed. More than enough time. He dropped his eyes meaningfully to the test.

Red lifted the stick eye level, getting her attention. She snapped her mouth shut, squinting at the results, but her eyes simply refused to focus.

“What does it say?” she looked up at him again.

Red laughed quietly, showing her the results right beside his thumb. “One line, not pregnant. Two lines, pregnant.”

She stared at it again, while he waited for her to comprehend what her senses were telling her.

Red chuckled, dropping a kiss in her fragrant hair. “You’re not pregnant, baby.”

“You’re sure?” she lifted wide clear eyes.

“I’m positive.”

“It could be a false negative.” was she grasping at straws and if so... why?

He roughly figured the time passed since her ovulation days, reminding himself if nothing else, to pay better attention to that detail from now on, “If you were pregnant, this thing would light up like a Christmas tree.”

His ex-wife began testing the day after they made love. Each day it showed up with a single pink line. A couple days before her scheduled period, all that changed when both lines glowed a neon pink. Alerting them Jennifer was on her way.

“Okay.” Liz nodded, processing the information.

Red dropped the test, gathering her in his arms, “How do you feel about all this?”

“I...” she hesitated, laying her head against his shoulder, “I don’t know.”

“Are you...” he drawled, “upset or relieved.”

“I’m not sure, exactly.” she replied honestly. “Maybe a little of both.”

Red understood. He felt the same way. It just wasn’t time for the woman. He knew as much.

“Are you...” she hesitated, “upset or relieved?”

Red pondered a moment on how to answer that question. He never lied to her but then, how to say the words correctly...

“I was perfectly fine with either outcome,” he confessed. “I embrace the idea of more alone time with you.” he admitted. “But I am more than prepared to start our life together in earnest. A child is part of that equation... at least, for me, Elizabeth.”

Liz released the breath she’d been holding, nodding her understanding. “You really would have been okay with–”

“Absolutely.” Red replied quickly.

He refrained from returning the question. Elizabeth was unsure of her feelings on the matter. But then, she was in a different stage of her life than he.

He was at that age where he felt secure and ready for anything thrown his way. He knew what he wanted in life.

Lizzy was still trying to find her footing.

They had ample time to explore that avenue.

“I confess, there is a part of me that is... disappointed.” he confessed, realizing the truth was best for them.

Liz’s eyes blinked, shocked by his answer, “Really?”

Red framed her face with his hands.

“Yes.” he lay a gentle kiss on her lips.

Gathering her in his arms, he hugged the woman, giving them both a moment of quiet introspection... just like they should have been allowed to experience in the first place.

He was shocked to realize; it was a moment he had desperately needed.

Liz inched closer, snuggling into his embrace, sensing Red needed this... as much as she did.

A hospital setting... and the dire circumstances of the day had not been a proper place in which to immerse themselves in the emotions both were experiencing.

Liz was a whirlwind of confusion. She was at once relieved, sad, elated, crestfallen... but here in Red’s hold, she just felt loved and incredibly safe.

Red was glad he listened to his heart. Even if he sensed the outcome would remain the same... he at least gave them a semblance of what was stolen away.

Closure.

A closure that secured a connection... a reality between them that wasn’t there before.

“We can try again...” Liz murmured quietly, “sometime.”

Red pulled back at the unexpected statement, smiling softly, finding the same uncertainty in her eyes.

“Now, whatever shall we do to pass the time for the rest of the evening?” he changed the subject, muttering into the woman’s neckline, making her giggle.

She turned in his arms, kissing him. “I can think of a few things...”

“Yeah?” he asked with great interest. “What do you suggest we do?”
“A rousing game of Chinese checkers?” she lifted innocent eyes.

He had been without Lizzy for four damn days. Four long days. “While I find the suggestion very difficult to refuse...” he managed tongue-in-cheek, his arms tightening about her small waist, “...I have another activity in mind.”

“Whatever could it be?” she feigned ignorance.

“Let’s just say...” Red’s eyes fell to the full, pouty mouth, “it doesn’t involve using a condom... does it?”

Liz liked that Red gave the choice over to her.

The man waited patiently, the look he gave heating her blood quite nicely.

He was asking something more, however. He needed to know her future thoughts on the matter.

“I had my heart set on checkers but...” Liz sighed evenly, easing her thighs closer to his straining bulge, “gosh... what you said sounds fun too.”

“Doesn’t it?” Red’s tone deepened erotically.

She crinkled her nose adorably, “That condom thing...” distaste tinged her statement, “they are just so time consuming, don’t you think?”

“Oh, hell yeah.” Red was quick to agree. “And to be honest, I don’t even think there are any in the room.”

“You’d have to go back down to the pharmacy,” she commiserated, her hand easing over the prominent bulge in his trousers, “which might break the mood.”

“God knows.” Red’s eyes closed, his breathing a little more taxed suddenly. He savored the familiar touch. His Lizzy had become quite the expert when it came to handling him. “Knowing you, I’d return to a completely set-up checker board.”

“Not completely...” she gently squeezed the hardening flesh. “You know, I just get so flighty and distracted, keeping a handle on those balls.”

Red’s brows rose exponentially. His gaze lowered to Elizabeth’s activities as she artfully demonstrated her ability at handling things.

She tiptoed, her lips caressing his with more than a hint of passion present. “You’ll forgive me... won’t you?”

“Baby, I would forgive you anything,” he stated so simplistically, the woman was a little taken aback, the flirting put aside for a moment.

“Anything?” her brow quirked quizzically.

Red’s eyes willfully held hers, “Anything, Elizabeth.”

Elizabeth’s heart swelled because the man made her believe him.

She tightened her slender arms about his neckline, leaning fully to his aroused state. Her mouth parted sensually for his provocative kiss, her insides melting.
Liz started visibly, the ring tone of Red’s phone jarring the moment.

She pulled back, the mood tempered.

Red’s head fell back, growling his disbelief, “What the hell,” he lamented, “don’t they understand about–”

“It’s okay, honey...” Liz soothed hastily, “I’m the intruder this time.” she reminded herself.

“You could never be–”

“Just see what’s going on,” she urged, “it might be Silas. If he’s lost all his cash, you’ll have to bail him out.”

Red flipped the phone open angrily, “I’ll bail his ass out,” he barked into the phone, “right after I cut his dick off and feed it to the gold fish in the hotel’s pond.”

“The hotel has a pond?” Francis’ wry amusement was the immediate response.

“What the hell do you want, Francis?” Red snapped.

“World peace.” the young man chuckled for the other man’s mood. “For you to get laid...” he commiserated. “Where are you?”

“My room,” Red barked, “why?” he asked but was met with silence. The young man had hung up.

Red hung his head dejectedly. Why had the boy even calle–

“I should have known,” Francis said as he sauntered without a care into the sanctuary of their room, “Lizzy had something to do with your sour mood.”

Liz’s head was swimming with the speed it had taken the man to intrude into their domain. She stared at the phone dangling in Red’s hand, awestruck.

“When I informed you of my location,” Red’s ire was barely contained, “it was not meant as an invitation to join us.”

“...Red,” Liz pouted pseudo-seriously, softening the man’s vexation.

Francis winked in her direction, moving about Red’s bulk to kiss her cheeks. He shoved experimentally on Red’s hold about the woman but Red shoved right back, his look incredulous.

Liz’s lips trembled, barely controlling her amusement.

Francis chuckled quietly ignoring the man all together, “When did you get in?” he questioned the woman.

“What the hell do you want?!” Red interrupted the conversation before it could start.

Francis sighed, giving Liz a look, “He has issues...”

“She was fixing those issues when you interrupted!” Red grated.

Liz snuggled closer to the man, rubbing her nose gently into his nape. She smiled when the Red’s frame relaxed, his breathing lowering to a controlled level.
“Family can’t interrupt.” Francis seemed slightly confused by the accusation.

Liz tsked when Red’s head snapped threateningly towards her friend, “Francis is not privy to the new rule.” she reminded.

“What new rule?” Francis enquired.

Francis beamed happily, but sobered, finally giving over the true reason for the call, “You’re wanted downstairs.”

Red sighed more than heavily, his fate sealed, he realized.

“Duty calls...” Liz commiserated with the man, her eyes softening.

“They are ready to sign the agreement.” Francis relayed. “But a few odds and ends are dangling.”

“So... handle it.” Red drawled his annoyance.

“They want your input.” Francis broke the bad news.

Red’s eyes searched out Elizabeth Keen’s, the disappointment clearly visible.

“It’s fine.” she told the truth. “I’m just happy to be here... really.” she felt a thousand times better in his presence.

“Go away...” Red murmured to the man beside them, needing a few private moments.

“I’ll get a drink,” Francis took the hint for a refreshing change, “I feel suddenly parched... don’t I?” he glanced between the two, waiting patiently for a reply.

Red’s arms snapped up with a velocity that actually made a whooshing sound, his index finger pointing decidedly to the exit.

Francis followed the trajectory obediently, “I’ll take that as a yes.”

Liz watched the man gingerly walk away, shaking her head minutely for his antics.

Red cupped the back of her head, pulling her gently into his sphere, his mouth claiming hers in a bold display of unrequited lust.

“I’m mildly content as well... that you are here,” he responded to Liz’s previous remark, his tone a husky mix of lascivious restraint and pent-up frustration. “I hate my fucking job right now.”

Liz grinned at his mood, “Your fucking job let’s you stay at a hotel that has fish in its pond.”

“I made that up.” he grumbled.

“I know,” she soothed.

Red was grateful for her attempt to make their parting less stressful, “They’re in the hotel beside us.”

Liz smiled, handing him his jacket and fedora, “The sooner you go, the sooner you can be back.”

Red looked at the articles morosely.
“Don’t worry about me.” she offered one last dig, happy to cheer him up a bit. “If you’re too long, I’ll just start... without you.”

She batted innocent eyes his way, brushing a gentle hand over his shoulder, straightening the jacket.

The man offered a sardonic look, setting his hat in place, “You think I would be heartbroken to walk in on something like that taking place?”

Liz’s mouth fell askew, “Oh...”

She allotted him the ‘win’ on that one, “A mark for you.”

Red grinned wolfishly, pleased he had gained ground in the round.

Liz rolled her eyes slightly before seeing the hint of challenge in his, “Don’t think I won’t.”

“Oh, I hope you will.” the man grinned confidently, sauntering to the door. Turning about, the smirk still on his handsome face. “Snap a few pictures along the way for me, will ya?”

Liz gave him a chastising glare, “I’ll post them to your Twitter page.”

“I don’t have Twitter.” he wasn’t going to be out-done apparently. “You keep them in your phone... just for me to bask in later on.”

The woman cocked her head, “Go bask with the little blonde that has the hots for you.” she suggested.

“The only woman I’ll be basking with,” Red confided in a cocky manner, “... is you, in about an hours time, right here in this big, welcoming bed.” he indicated the structure with a passing glance.

“If I say.” Liz reminded, attempting to keep him in his place.

“I’ll persuade you easily enough,” Red lifted noble brows, “of that I am confident.”

Liz could not keep the amusement from quirking her lips, as she walked the hall with Red hand in hand, joining Francis in the main room.

Red took the offered tumbler, taking a fortifying drink. The liquor warmed his throat, “Where’s Silas, Joe?”

“I’m not going anywhere.” Liz squeezed Red’s hand. “They’re just next door if I need anything.”

“Right...” Francis pointed, remembering something, “I met Joe when I got here, he said they were swapping shifts so...” he jerked his thumb to the door.

A distinct rapping interrupted the conversation.

Red’s hand instinctively sought out his weapon, as he patiently waited for the ‘rapping’ to sound out the needed code. Elizabeth moved closer to the man unaware she did so, waiting right alongside him.

They both watched in mock horror as Francis blithely crossed the space, throwing wide the door.

Outside the portal a gangly looking waiter stood, patiently waiting for just such an occurrence. He smiled politely and Red’s hair lifted straight up on the back of his neck. Red drew his weapon.
“Lawford says hello.” the man leaned cordially forward before producing a deadly looking Colt .45, silencer snugly in place.

In the back of Red’s mind, he was vaguely aware of the sound of doors opening at either end of the hall. He hoped it meant what he needed it to.

The man instinctively sought out Elizabeth Keen.

“Shit!” Francis jerked away, slamming the door shut in the guy’s face. “Down!” he suggested... politely.

Hooking Lizzy’s waist, Red yanked the woman to the only refuge available, ducking her safely behind the bar. The door splintered with several well positioned shots.

The ornate lock broke free, clanging loudly to the marble floor. Another shot followed immediately, but it was oddly directed outside the penthouse.

A volley of muffled gunfire erupted in a rapid exchange.

An unseen battle ensued.

“Francis!” Liz yelped, surreptitiously glancing around the edge of the bar to locate her friend.

“Lizzy...” Red’s stern tone quickly drew her attention. She took the pre-offered weapon, ducking her head just as the door gave way.

“Where are you, you moron!” Red grated raspingly, seeking out Francis as well.

“Here...” Francis whispered coming around behind a couch, just to their left. He waved jauntily with his weapon, sitting against the back of the sofa comfortably.

Silas and his men were on scene, Red sensed it.

He could also hear that the room had been breached. At least two men had gotten past the outside security.

Pulling Lizzy back, Red took her place. He listened carefully as the men meticulously searched the great room.

A shadow to his left directed his line of sight, shifting towards the threat.

Red gained Francis’ wayward attention, alerting the kid to the reflection in the French doors.

They now had a perfect view of their enemies location.

Locking eyes with the woman beside him, Red motioned their intent, his expression hardening.

“Stay here.” he whispered tightly.

With the men gaining on their position, Red turned back to Francis, immediate communication passing between them.

Liz gripped her weapon, readying herself, as Red gave a three count.

In one simultaneous movement, both men raised to their full height, fire bursting from their barrels in rapid succession.
The sudden quiet was unnerving.

Liz checked both men’s stoic profiles, waiting on pins and needles, her weapon poised and steady. The woman was never so glad to hear her gruff guard’s voice bellowing from the hall...

“Clear!”

“Clear...” Red answered in kind, his glance falling on Elizabeth’s face.

Lowering his hand, he gallantly helped the woman to her feet as Silas and another guard came into the room. They immediately began a sweep of the suite.

“...You stayed.” Red was not only amazed, he was immensely pleased.

“I’ve got your back...” Liz smiled warmly, “you’ve got mine.”

Turning the hand in his, Red placed a gentle kiss on her fingers.

“We’ll have this mess cleaned up in a few seconds.” Silas reported back in, holstering his weapon as he spoke. “Dembe is on the floor below, doing damage control.”

“Get Kaplan’s team over here.” Red nodded his gratitude, glancing around the broken debris of the foyer.

“This is right up her alley.” Francis jumped on the bandwagon. “They’ll have this to rights in no time.”

Liz relaxed when all the men holstered their side arms. She glanced at her own weapon, realizing she had no where to put it. Red took it from her fingers with a chuckle.

“What the hell is Lawford’s problem?” Francis bitched, kicking the wounded leg of the man he himself had downed moments before. He leaned menacingly over the man’s form.

“I forgot to tell you,” Liz winced, whispering to Red, “Lawford went ballistic when he found out about the syrup.”

“Oh, for heaven’s sake.” Red rolled his eyes heavenward. “Francis!” he sought out the kid. “Lawford knows you rolled on him.”

“What the hell did I do?” Francis half nodded, “that.” he scoffed disgustedly. “That dude seriously needs to get a sense of humor.”

Red wearily rubbed his eyes before sharing a knowing look with Dembe who had just arrived.

Liz dropped her face, the soft sound of distress muffled in her hands as she relived the proceeding moments in her mind.

Red frowned, instinctively reaching for the woman, “Lizzy?”

She lifted her reddened face, snorting, “He closed the door...” she wiped the tears of amusement from her face, “like that would stop a b-bullet.” she clutched her middle, doubling over.
“I acted on instinct, okay!” Francis defended his actions. “It worked, didn’t it!”

“You’re an idiot!” Liz cackled.

Red shrugged helplessly because... it had been an idiotic thing to do. “You know that we never answer a door unless the code is given.”

“What code?” Francis was immediately interested. “Were we issued decoder rings?”

Red threw up his hands in resigned resignation. He turned away unable to stomach another second.

Silas helpfully thumped out a rhythmic ‘code’ on the boy’s head, “Remember this?”

“Ohh!” Francis rubbed his head gingerly. “Right! Yes, I do remember that now!”

All seemed to relax, the problem evidently cleared up.

“We should get downstairs.” Francis looked at his watch. “They’re waiting.”

Red checked, not at all surprised to find Elizabeth nodding her agreement.

“They’ll get it fixed in no time.” she waved the man’s worry aside. “Really, we’ll be okay here.”

“Am I the only sane one here?” Red questioned no one in particular.

“If you are,” Francis pointed out, “it ain’t saying much.”

Red had as much as he could take. He pulled roughly on Silas’ shirt sleeve, directing him aside, “I want this mess cleaned up before I return.”

The head guard waved off the veiled threat, knowing exactly why Red wanted the premises cleared.

“I’m doing the best I can here!” Silas made mention.

“Go...” Liz inched closer to Red, “I have a bath waiting,” leaning, she brushed soft lips against his, “and photos to take.”

Red groaned meaningfully as visions of a very naked, very wet Lizzy floated in his mind’s eye.

“We’ll see who persuades whom, Red Reddington.” Liz said as she sauntered past the man.

Red tilted his head, watching her little ass swish away.

His cock twitched accordingly but he staunchly reprimanded it.

Challenges were issued and one had decisions to make.

In this instance, Red believed that he couldn’t lose either way.

Lizzy was back in her rightful place... right by his side.

Red began humming his favorite Jimmy Buffet song, the lyrics vividly alive in his memory. A smile graced his face, his entire demeanor totally relaxed and stress free.

Francis Holbrook followed after the man, a bewildered expression on his face. He checked with Dembe but found nothing amiss on the black man’s handsome face, which was good enough for him.
He instantly started harmonizing with Red’s efforts.

Red grinned over, appreciating the gesture.

Both men’s voices raised effectively as the elevator doors closed on the impromptu performance.

Chapter End Notes

Song referenced: "Come Monday" by Jimmy Buffet.
The quiet of the room filtered into Elizabeth’s mind.

She stood, looking over the preparations she made for her long-awaited bath.

It may seem odd to some people... okay, most people, she was calmly preparing a bath after all that transpired a short time ago.

Maybe she should be upset, traumatized even. The truth was, she simply couldn’t find it in herself to expend the energy.

She, in reality, wasn’t phased a bit.

Liz told herself, she was an FBI Agent. Being put into dangerous situations came with the territory.

What did the locale matter? In a warehouse or a penthouse... bullets flying around were considered an occupational hazard.

At least with these people outside those doors, she trusted they wouldn’t freeze up or make a run to save their own hides, leaving her high and dry with no back-up.

The day Red, Dembe or Silas froze during a gunfight, would be the day she’d pack it in and call it quits.

The funny part, she couldn’t even call this the new norm.

It seemed her whole life had been pre-destined to be surrounded with crime and intrigue.

Look on the bright side, Red always said. At least she had a criminal mastermind in her corner to soothe any worry that may crop up.

It didn’t hurt the man was warming her bed, either.

A man she loved very dearly. More so it seemed, with each passing day.

Given her position in life, she probably shouldn’t visualize Red as a Robin Hood type.

She learned overtime, Red gained his greatest pleasure... he was at his happiest, when giving of himself. Whether monetary assistance or his own time and energies to people he admired and respected.

Could she really fault that type of mentality?

Red was a good and decent man who, contrary to popular belief, had the patience of a saint... even if Francis were in the vicinity.

The man accepted her from the get go, warts and all. She literally cringed when she thought back on those earlier times.

She had been terrible to him in all aspects before having gotten to know the man better, though Liz often wondered if Red secretively enjoyed the opposition just a little?

Even still, it must have been a terrible drain emotionally for Red.

With that in mind, Liz set a plan in motion to erase bits of their past a little at a time while opening herself to this new facet of their relationship.

She was determined to share herself with him, to drop preconceived notions... to expand on an exciting and wondrous new adventure and in doing so... hopefully open an entirely new avenue for she and Red to explore... together.

Not that she would make it easy for the man. Red loved a challenge. She planned to make him work for any further information.

She hadn’t realized how much she appreciated unraveling the mystery that was Red Reddington until the prospect presented itself.

Her parents, the Cabal... the Fulcrum; all were mysteries that had been her driving force for the better part of two years. She was left drained by the effort most days but...

This was entirely on a personal level.

For certain things; like knowing Red’s favorite liquor or guilty pleasure treat... she would just ask. But other things, Liz realized she would have to discover herself by use of trial and error.

She listed the things she found out about the man on one hand... Red liked his nipples played with and when she scratched her nails against his head, she could make the man almost purr in contentment.

She even knew he liked to take part in minor bondage. All well and good, but it wasn’t enough, not nearly so.

What else?

What relaxed him? What made him uncomfortable? What turned him on? What turned him off?

Was there something sexual he enjoyed that he had not brought to her attention as yet? Was he into sex play she wasn’t even aware existed?

She fancied herself mature and educated about such matters but... was she? Her partners to date had been rather... vanilla in nature. They had one goal in mind and focused on that alone. She was just a tool used to achieve that goal.

Red surely possessed much more knowledge. He was much more experienced.
If there proved to be idiosyncrasies which the man enjoyed, would they be on the same page? Would she find his tastes titillating? Or would there be issues?

All Liz knew for certain was, she was excited by the prospect of exploring with a partner, a lover... she could finally trust.

Excitement welled in her chest suddenly as the sound of activity in the front area increased. Red and the guys had returned from their meeting. Though... all had not gone well from the sound of all the bitching rising above the normal conversational level expected.

Liz scurried across the room, making for the closed bedroom door, wings on her feet. Her heart thudded thunderously in her chest, anticipating the very sight of Red Reddington.

Would it always be this way? She hoped on some level, it would be. That they would find a way to keep the thrill alive.

Red was very inventive at such things. She appreciated his efforts.

Liz gasped, pulling up short. Red barreled through the door, his solid frame appearing out of nowhere.

The woman blinked her surprise as a pungent stench assailed her unsuspecting nostrils. “Whoa!” she backed away hastily, wafting the heavy perfume in an effort to clear the air of the overpowering floral concoction.

“Tell me about it!” Red slapped his phone into her palm. “Shut that damned thing off, will ya, baby?”

He held up a warning hand, “Stand back... it will seep into your pours and cut off your air supply.”

She grinned as his serious expression.

“What is it that makes a woman douse herself from head to toe with this malodorous, fetid... toxin.” he griped, roughly pulling at his jacket.

Liz covered her lips, hiding her smile as the man continued on his tirade.

“The air in that room was noxious!” he grumbled. “I think Francis may have died... I don’t know, I left as soon as possible. Every man for himself, I say.”

Liz switched his phone to vibrate, helping the man pull free of his vest.

She held his jacket tentatively between two fingers, grimacing. The astringent odor swirled about her senses, leaving her rather nauseated.

“I made a motion to open a window.” he turned, spreading his hands wide, the light eyes seeking her out. “As if one window could have obliterated that foul smell.”

“It wasn’t the pretty blonde?” Liz stuffed his clothes into a laundry bag, following Red as he went.

“Greta Vanderbluff.... Vinnie Vanderbluff’s very conspicuous but very cordial wife.” Red called over his shoulder.

“Really, she’s a lovely woman in temperament,” he held his tie aloft, eyeing it regretfully, “but I highly suspect her sense of smell failed her years back.”

“No one had the courage to inform the woman... less is more.” Liz nodded knowingly.

“As I said, a lovely, gracious woman.” Red nodded succinctly. “No, I chickened out as well. Honey, don’t worry about those things... we’ll just burn them. Unless, they combust on their own.”

Liz grinned, “They are perfectly good clothes.”

“It would embarrass me to send them to the cleaner.” Red scowled. “You do not understand,” he stressed, “just how much I missed you... especially that amazing... soft, clean scent you wear.”

Liz chuckled happily, “A couple hours in this stuff probably gave everyone a horrendous headache.” she noted the redness of the man’s eyes.

She sat the laundry bag out on the balcony, closing the door soundly.

“My head is throbbing,” he admitted, shaking it woefully. “I’ll take a few pills and be right as rain in a few–”

“You most certainly will not.” the woman’s brows furrowed. “You need some downtime, I think.”

“No, no,” he objected quickly, “I’ll shower, careful to use copious amounts of soap, mind you and then we will celebrate your–”

“I have an idea,” she mused moving closer to him only to retreat rapidly, “...why don’t we share a long, hot bath in that monstrous tub?” she pointed to the structure.

“You didn’t take your–”

“Something came up.” she crinkled her nose. “But I can have that tub up and running in a few seconds.”

“What came up?” Red scowled instantly.

“I handled it just fine.” she smiled brightly. “Get out of the rest of those clothes,” she motioned, walking to the tub then hesitated, “unless you would rather take a shower?”

Red halted all activity, a thoughtfully musing expression gracing his face.

“Let me see,” he pondered, “would I rather take a shower, all by myself mind you,” his brow furrowed even more so, “...or relax in a luxurious bath with a beautiful, exciting, naked woman beside me?” he sought her out. “That’s a tough one, Lizzy. Let me take a few moments to–”

“Oh, shut up.” she chuckled, enjoying his mood which seemed to be swinging to a better place.

“Although,” he added cryptically, “it might be wise for me to shower before the bath.” he nodded his decision. “That’s what I should do.”

Liz watched him entering the extravagant shower, her chuckle a genuine one.

“I’ll only be a moment though so...” he stuck his head back out, “don’t lose the momentum, okay?”
Liz shook her head, “You’re spending too much time with Francis.” she stated her belief. “You’re getting as crazy as he is.”

“No need for insults.” the water sprang to life inside the shower.

Liz sat back against the sink basin, content to wait out the moment but something came to mind. She sighed mentally, realizing she would have to tackle the issue sooner rather than later.

“Red... I think I better talk to you about something.”

She hated to be the one to break his mood though.

Red halted his soapy hands at the serious tone, his brow crinkling, “....What is it?”

He waited tentatively, wondering if he should cut the shower short.

“It’s not really anything,” Liz grimaced, “or at least, I hope all is well. I... I may have overstepped boundaries earlier... with Mr. Kaplan.”

Red was totally shocked not having expected anything of this nature when Lizzy first announced there might be a problem on the horizon.

“Kate? She was here?”

“No.” Liz was quick to reassure. “I... I had Silas call her.”

Red stepped to the opened walk-in for the shower, “Lizzy... what’s going on?”

The woman pulled a face, “Oh, I probably should have kept my big mouth shut, I know that now.” she lamented. “But I couldn’t stand how that woman was speaking to Silas!”

“Kate?”

“No, not Mr. Kaplan.” Liz was becoming frustrated. “That other woman, the one Mr. Kaplan sent.”

Red digested, “The Cleaner?”

“Yes.” Liz relaxed. “Red, she is just a horrible woman! If I had to choose between Moore and her... I’d pick Moore.”

Red was taken aback.

“Please, go on with your shower.” she motioned. “I’ll tell the sordid tale but I’d rather you not be standing there looking at me when I do.”

Red shook his head for such a foolish outlook, as if he wouldn’t accept anything the woman thought to do or say. He slowly returned to the hot, steamy spray, albeit reluctantly.

“So I hear Silas, right?” Liz began anew stepping closer to the stylishly tiled area in which the man resided. “He was highly pissed, and I mean... highly.” she recalled the incident clearly in her mind.

“So I go out to see if there was a problem, right and they’re at each other’s throats. I mean, I have never heard Silas speak to a woman in such a manner.”

Red washed his body clean of the stench of the day, in more ways than one, listening intently.
“But that woman... that... that...” Liz couldn’t find a word ladylike enough, “she kinda deserved it, if you ask me! She treated not just Silas, but all my guys out there like...” she sought a feasible word.

“Pig slime?” Red repeated carefully, relaxing, sensing this momentous problem wasn’t all that horrendous after all.

“Worse... the things she was saying and the tone?!” Liz’s tempered resurfaced. “Like she was Queen of the Nile and my guys were her little minions... less than minions! And I just wasn’t going to stand for it, Red!”

“Well, I’m sorry but I called her on it, right then and there!” Liz related. “And I said, in no uncertain terms, that no one spoke to my guys in such a manner and I didn’t care who the hell she thought she was... I wanted her gone! Immediately!”

Red nodded slowly, adjusting the temperature, “...You did.”

“I most certainly did.” Liz stood her ground. “But she said Mr. Kaplan was her employer, not me and she had no intention of leaving her post until Mr. Kaplan advised as much.”

“...And Silas had nothing to say to all this?”

“Oh, he said plenty.” Liz sing-songed her head, her expression a worried one, “but I can’t repeat any of it in mixed company.”

Red grinned.

“But I didn’t need Silas!” Liz objected strenuously. “Really, I told him to get Mr. Kaplan on the phone and he did.”

Red’s smile lingered, “...And?”

“I explained the matter calmly and asked the woman be,” Liz swallowed hard, “... well...”

“Dismissed?”

Liz couldn’t read the man’s tone.

“I know it wasn’t my call or my place but,” she exasperated, “who the hell did she think she was talking to, Red? My guys know their business! They are not second-class citizens to anyone!” she lifted her chin stubbornly. “At least, not while I’m around!”

The silence was strained for Liz. She wrung her hands unconsciously.

“What did Kate do?”

Lizzy’s story surprised Red. Kaplan’s employees were always efficient. They learned how to fade into the background, to become faceless spectators in a crowd.

“She... spoke to the woman, and she left.” Liz winced. “I don’t think Mr. Kaplan was very pleased with my interference.”

“Why do you say that?”

“She was very... silent on the phone. She spoke just three words to me.” Liz recalled. “Put her on.”

Red would be interested to see Kate’s reaction to this new development.
“So, I gave the phone over to the beastly ogre and they talked for a while and,” Liz shrugged, “...the woman left.”

“Did another Cleaner arrive?”

“Silas said yes, in a remarkably short time actually, but,” Liz shook her head, “I guess there are bad feelings all around now because I didn’t handle the situation as I should have.”

Liz sighed heavily, “I was afraid I would blow it, if push came to shove. I’m not like you... with people or situations.”

“Oh, I don’t know about that.” he muttered sotto voce, a smile playing at his mouth.

“What?” Liz hadn’t caught the mumbled statement.

“So what is the problem you are talking about?” he raised his voice.

“...Well... I just told you the problem.” Liz was mystified. “Mr. Kaplan is probably upset with me for interfering in her affairs.”

“Let her figure it out.” Red turned the spray off, accepting the towel Lizzy held out for him as he exited the stall.

“Lizzy,” he absently tucked the towel about his waist, seeking her out, the worried little expression endearing her to him, “do you really think I would have stood by and casually allowed someone... anyone, to berate my people without saying a few choice words on the matter?”

“Well, that’s you,” she reminded, “I’m not... you. I’m just–”

“You are an extension of me and the sooner everyone realizes that fact, the better off we will all be.” he stated the facts as he saw them.

The words stunned and delighted the woman. She stared at Red, the large blue eyes seeing him in an entirely different light.

“You mean that!” she realized.

Liz stepped hastily, her arms lifting about the man. “I thought...” she swallowed the sudden lump in her throat, “I had butted in where I shouldn’t have.”

“We discussed this,” he reminded.

“But... the business stuff. I shouldn’t be involved–”

“You are my partner,” he made it clear, “in every aspect of my life. I want and expect you to be involved. If that is what you want, of course.”
Liz took a moment to grasp such an implication, “... But Mr. Kaplan–”

“Is a dear and trusted friend,” Red nodded minutely, “And she can take care of herself but you... Lizzy,” his eyes softened, “my priority is and will always be... with you.”

Liz’s eyes shone her love for the man. He really did support her... trusted her.

“Are we clear on the matter?”

She hugged him tightly, planting a kiss on the leathery sunburnt flesh of his neckline, “I think I love you Red Reddington.”

“When will you know for sure?” he leaned, a scolding look on his face.

She smiled secretively, “I’m gonna run that bath now.”

“You do that.” he approved wholeheartedly, knowing that gesture alone said it all.

Propping his head comfortably on the soft pillow behind him, Red idly drummed his fingers on the island beside him.

Lazily pushing a hidden inset, the water stirred to life. Pulsing jets pelted his tired muscles, numbing the stress of the day.

The large black marble surrounding the tub held candles here and there, the soft glow and scent setting a tranquil scene.

Overhead a modern, stylish chandelier gently flickered an ambiance Red could appreciate.

An oblong fireplace crackled its elegance, the heat warming the space to perfection.

Red watched the dancing flames hypnotically.

He was glad Lizzy had suggested a hot soak. In just this few minutes, his headache was easing considerably. The horrendous stench he had not only smelled, but tasted... was a thing of the past thankfully. The scented waters swirling about his body were a very pleasant substitute.

This pampering Lizzy had initiated was something to which the man could rapidly become accustomed.

Moments after submerging himself in the steaming water, the sound of Lizzy’s presence flicked his eyes open.

She stood before him, her expression a contented one. The white fluffy robe encased her body. She fiddled indecisively with the tie.

“Something wrong?” he himself, could find nothing what-so-ever wrong, but her hesitation alerted him to a possible problem.

“No, no...” she waved him to remain seated and relaxed. “I’ll be right back.” tightening the tie back around her waist, she held up a hand to signify there would be a short delay before disappearing from sight.
Flicking the stream his way, Red groaned his relief as the pulsing water massaged the tension in his body.

The sound of the outer door closing and bare feet on the marble floor brought a small smile to his face.

“Lock that door.” he tried to soften the request, but it still sounded irritated to his ears.

Lizzy seemed to forgive his gruff demeanor however, chuckling quietly as she, thankfully, did as requested.

“Afraid Francis and his rubber ducky will wish to join?” she asked.

“Hell yes.” he slit his eyes as the lights overhead lowered to an even more comfortable level, allowing him to take in the vision nearing him.

Never in his life had he seen anything more adorable, yet incredibly sensual.

A few loose soft tendrils fell from the messy bun atop her head, skirting the shoulders of the oversized robe engulfing her slight frame. A robe he was certain was stolen from the other hotel. It had the monogram after all.

The thought tickled him. She had warned him she would abscond with it.

As she neared the low flickering flames, her cheeks glowed a healthy pink, her eyes sparkled with a hidden mischief he found very appealing.

Red’s heart softened when the woman’s pretty mouth fell into the most alluring pout, wincing sympathetically for his suffering.

“You poor baby. You’ve had quite a day, haven’t you?” she produced an unexpected gift to ease his suffering.

“Normally,” she sat the heavy tumbler and expensive scotch on the island beside him, “I would advise against this, since you’ve taken your pills...”

Red’s brows rose, watching the dark amber liquid fill the heavy crystal halfway.

“We’ll share...” she read his thoughts. “That way, I won’t feel so guilty.”

Taking the pre-offered drink, “And you can lie comfortably with a straight face when the paramedics show up after I’ve had a heart attack.”

“Well... yeah.” she shrugged innocently, a smile tugging at her mouth.

He lifted it to his parched mouth, inhaling the rich aroma. He held the warm liquor on his tongue a moment, savoring the heady taste.

“But... you’re a manly man.” her eyes traveled his exposed torso appreciatively. “You can take it.”

Red’s eyes shifted when the woman slowly pulled at the ties at her waist, her look more than inviting.

“I am a man...” he agreed.

He rather enjoyed the unexpected burn coursing through his body as he unintentionally swallowed the stout liquor in one gulp when sight of her pert breasts came into view.

“But... will I have to take it?” he teased.

Liz slid her robe slowly from her shoulders, baring herself to his rapt gaze, “I’ll let you know.” she mused, bringing a smile to Red’s lips.

“Do you need anything?” she asked, hanging the expensive robe on an available hook.

“...You.” he gestured her closer, his eyes following her movements as she stepped unto the ledge surrounding the luxurious bath.

She toed the swirling depths, withdrawing hastily.

“Is it too hot?” he questioned, instinctively reaching for the faucet.

“No, it tickled.” she giggled before taking his offered hand. She eased into the fragrant, bubbling water finally laying back into Red’s chest.

Sharing the glass between them, both basked in the quiet for long moments... both enjoying the amazing feel of the bath and each other’s presence.

The heat leeched into their skin, loosening tight muscles and soothing their souls.

“This is nice...” Liz hummed her contentment, squirming luxuriously against his frame, loving the feel.

“Yes,” he kissed her temple tenderly, “it is.”

And it was. Lizzy was here with him. They were alone....

He couldn’t be happier.

Losing himself in the sensation of her soft curves laying intimately against his, Red could not recall one troubling incident occurring the entire day.

The woman unexpectedly pushed away from him, shaking him from his reverie.

He frowned his discontent watching as Lizzy turned, making a space between his open legs. She reached for the soap.

“How’s your head?” she murmured, rolling the soap between her palms, her eyes caressing him softly.

“...Easing,” he said. “Between the pills, liquor...and you... here with me,” he told the truth as he saw it, “I’m floating,” he closed his eyes to savor.

His heavy lids flickered open when he felt the sensation of Lizzy’s soapy hands caressing his torso.

“Just relax.” she soothed.

Not one to look a gift horse in the mouth, Red’s body instantly conformed to the gentle slope of the tub as he luxuriated in Lizzy’s attention and touch.

With each swipe of her little hands, he felt he was being cleansed of the sins of the day.
And maybe he was?

He was the sinner... and she the saint. His salvation.

Liz skimmed her soapy hands along the plains of Red’s body, smiling her own pleasure.

“We’re going to have to do this more often...” Red groaned appreciatively for her actions.

To see Red in the bath, so uninhibited and openly fixated on her touch felt as intimate as when they made love. Performing oral sex on the man could not have been more personal. She was astonished at how close she felt to the man at this moment.

She rather liked that only she was allowed to see him in these unguarded moments. Like Red’s orgasms, this private time was hers and hers alone.

“Feeling better?” Liz murmured softly, rubbing soothing soapy circles against the man’s forearms.

She repeatedly rinsed with the hot, steamy water until she sensed his body relaxing into the moment.

“Much better,” he sighed, shifting thankful eyes her way.

“You were just what I needed.” the man mumbled.

The woman’s brow arched knowingly when the man’s erect penis caught her attention. The heavy shaft bobbed in the water, the thick head almost breaking the water line.

Red wouldn’t deny her touch aroused him. He felt a stirring in his groin that had not been present earlier, every time her wet body brushed against his shaft or her hands caressed him.

He had often fantasized about taking a bath with Lizzy. As he masturbated when showering in the morning, the visions were both vivid and erotic.

This was a fantasy come true, having her naked flesh sliding against his in such an intimate venue.

But making love to her was not all he intended his statement to convey.

Reaching, Red lifted the delicate chin, directing her attention to his expressive features, “Thank you for coming to be with me.” he clarified. “Your presence...calms me.”

Liz’s eyes softened, understanding the sentiment all too well.

“I needed to come.” her soft reply filled him with an urgent anticipation.

‘Antsy’ was an apt description as his gaze swept her wet frame. His groin stirred at the stunning vision sitting so innocently before him in the steamy waters.

Lizzy’s flushed skin radiated under the soft glow of the low light. His tongue itched to catch the beads of water trickling down her curvy frame.

“Come here.” his voice was raspy, lower than he could account for.

“You up for that game of checkers?” Liz asked coyly.

“I’m up for something...” he murmured, the evidence stiff and aching between his legs.

Taking the soap from unresisting fingers, he worked up a frothy lather, gently caressing the woman’s torso, more than happily returning the favor she had bestowed upon him.

Leaning, Liz captured his lips in a slow, gentle kiss. The man wrapped his arm about her waist, pulling her flush with his body.

He smiled warmly when her slick skin conformed to his as she lay against him comfortably.

Lazily hitting the surge to a new position brought unbidden sighs when the forceful water tickled their skin. The swirling jets hit his back and feet... and it felt wonderful.

“Red?” Liz ventured on, something on her mind. She drew in a blissful breath as the man continued stroking his hands along her back.

“Uh hmm?” he lost himself in the soft silk of her skin. Feeling the satin against his soap covered palms, the rough calloused area a contrast both noted.

“Did you get anything for your last birthday?”

Red’s mouth curved upward slowly at the unexpected turn of her mind. Still asking her questions, was she?

“Dembe gave me a book I had been wanting and a new satchel.” Red replied. “Silas got me a bottle of scotch.” he remembered. “Which he has greatly depleted, mind you.”

Liz rubbed her cheek against his pectoral... waiting. Silence fell between them for a brief interval.

“That’s it?” she frowned. It sounded so... sad.

“You... gave me a bottle of wine.” he smiled at the happy memory, gently squeezing her middle.

She flushed, remembering how she agonized over her purchase. But... he had not picked up on her true meaning.

Red knew hundreds of people. Only two had remembered his birthday? Well... three.

Liz thought back on that time, her mind floating like the bubbles in the bath.

She and Red had been getting on well enough, just a few spats now and then. That week though, Red had been particularly pleased, no arguments or disagreements having ensued.

The cases had been light; she had been well fed and rested... and it showed in her mood. She had even taken the man up on his offer for a bite at a local deli down from the Blacksite.

Their relationship had hit a happy medium.

So when she happened upon that bottle, he instantly came to mind. And since his birthday was on the horizon...

She impulsively bought the gift.

Once in the quiet of her house though, she second guessed the purchase.

It was bad enough when the Secret Santa gift exchange happened at work. It was impossible trying to find a gift for someone you barely knew but to do so with a twenty dollar budget?

Her anxiety raised exponentially when faced with the prospect of buying Red something. He was her partner. Her CI.

All good points of contention...

But more importantly, she was not a wine connoisseur. What if her choice sucked?

By chance, Red dropped by that day to provide her a vital piece of information needed to close out their last case file... when he noticed the gaily wrapped gift.

During their lunch, she mentioned an old colleague was going on maternity leave. He naturally assumed it was a baby gift, wondering over her purchase. A natural enough assumption.

She blushed deeply, but held the offering out to him, correcting his mistake.

He had been so delighted by the unexpected gift... that she gave him, he eagerly pulled the tissue paper from its package

If it had been half-rate, Red hadn’t let her know it by his reaction.

As Red stood there, staring down at the bottle in his hands, a silence fell between them that was neither awkward nor comfortable.

Liz waited for the verdict on tenterhooks as she tried to read his indescribable expression.

Ready to wallow in her misery, she about buckled under the pressure of the moment when he quietly suggested... sharing a toast.

Knowing the man now and some of his tells... it hurt, remembering his face as he readied himself for her inevitable rejection.

The good part of that memory was, however... she had accepted.

Liz led him to the kitchen, offering him a corkscrew while she set about pulling down her cheap wine glasses.

Red had either not noticed or been too gentlemanly to remark on her rather boring fare.

Or maybe, because she hadn’t made an excuse for him to leave...it stunned him silent.

It had been their usual method of communication, after all.

Hugging herself to the man now, she was pleased as the memory unfolded further.

She wished Red a happy birthday and clinked his glass, breathing a sigh of relief the wine wasn’t horrible. In fact, it had been quite good... at least to her unpracticed palate.

Red, himself, said as much. Whether he was being kind, she didn’t know. But it helped her relax.

They sat opposite of one another at the bar, sharing not a glass, but the entire bottle.

Tale after interesting tale erupted from the man’s lips as the time passed quickly.

They had been nearing the end of their second glass and yet another amusing story... when her stomach had growled... loudly.

Red glanced down at the sound, a smile tugging at his lips. He offered her an apologetic grimace, having realized he overstayed his welcome.

Liz waved him off, asking he finish the story. She pulled containers of Chinese food from the fridge. She didn’t know what possessed her, but asked him to share in the meager repast.

Red grinned, sliding off his stool, rolling up his sleeves. Brushing her aside, he made himself at home in her kitchen.

As he continued on with the story, he intently scoured her cupboard, mixing unseen treasures he found, along with the leftover ingredients producing something... incredibly mouth-watering.

Having finished their feast, Red had sighed quietly knowing the unexpected celebration was at an end.

After demanding his rights as a guest, he assisted with the clean-up.

Red was gathering his jacket and hat, a wistful smile on his face. Dembe was a little over half hour away, Liz had heard the conversation having taken place on Red’s check-in call between the two men. Red waved the issue aside saying he would wait out front.

Charmed by the easy conversation, the relaxed atmosphere and comfortable companionship... Liz gestured him to sit back down.

He could await Dembe’s arrival in the warm house.

A thought struck her as she watched Red lay aside his jacket and fedora, easing back onto the stool he had just vacated.

“Stay there.” she indicated when the man had retaken his seat in the kitchen nook. “Don’t move.”

She hastened quickly to the fridge having noted a forgotten treat when she pulled the earlier meal from the shelves.

She felt a little silly but giggly as she rummaged her kitchen drawers searching for a long-forgotten item.

Her hand secured the tiny object, and she chuckled gleefully.

Red watched with half-suspicious eyes.

Liz turned motioning, “Close your eyes.”

A definite scowl met the suggestion and Liz realized exactly what she was asking.

Looking back now, she realized again, what trust it took when he actually accomplished her bidding.

He waited patiently, head cocked.

Lowering the lights, she slid the chocolate éclair, replete with one lone, half-used candle before him.

The man, hearing the sounds, opened his eyes immediately chuckling that low, sensual laugh as he realized the ‘surprise’ she intended.

Liz broke into a slightly off-key rendition of ‘the birthday song’.

Red’s laughter was contagious. She had a hard time finishing the tribute, they were both enjoying the little ‘joke’ so much...

It was a very special memory.

They floated, parts of their bodies weightless in the soothing liquid surrounding their very private world.

Lifting soft eyes, she smiled at the man who also looked lost in his own thoughts. Reaching, she lifted the tumbler, sipping the rich liquor before offering it to Red.

Red took the glass, raking a wet hand against his face and scalp, enjoying the cool burst prickling his skin.

A thought occurred to the woman, “I offered you a stupid éclair.” she sought him out for a reaction, she realized.

Red chuckled genuinely, instantly picking up on her meaning, “The quirks of your mind, woman...” he shook his head in amazement. “Yes... and it wasn’t stupid at all.” he had seen the gesture in an entirely different light.

“You blew out the candle,” she continued to her point.

“A time-honored tradition.” he nodded he was following along so far.

“I always wondered, do those wishes come true?” Liz half-teased. “Did you get what you wished for?”

Red became pensive for a long beat, “...I did actually.” it was as though he had just realized the fact.

Liz lifted amused brows, “Really!”

Red’s hands fell to her hips when the woman abruptly sat up, her bottom settling on his groin. He followed a bead of water run trickling over the slope of her breast before disappearing into the swirling waters tickling her belly button.

“And what was that?” she was enraptured.

The man’s eyes shifted almost contemplatively, “...You.” the deep resonant tone moved her.

“You’re...” she swallowed the rise of emotions, “...you’re just saying that.”

Red’s eyes held hers effortlessly, “No,” he stated simplistically, “even then... I knew what I wanted.”

Liz was speechless at the turn of the conversation, “...You... took that empty bottle.” she had the vision still of him sliding into the back seat of the car Dembe had driven to pick him up. “Why did you do that?”

Red looked at her oddly, “It was the first gift you ever gave me. Why wouldn’t I take it?” it seemed clear enough to the man, “I still have it.”

He reached, idly tracing the swooping slope of her breast, letting the weight settle on his fingers. Red’s mouth pulled at the corner when the woman unconsciously moved into his touch.

“...You do not.”

“For an FBI Agent, you’re not very observant.” he chortled lowly. “It’s on the bar at home, right front and center by the crystal decanter...” he jogged the woman’s memory, “...it has a bow on it.”

Liz blinked.

“It means a great deal to me, Lizzy,” a slight frown graced his brow as he continued to watch her reaction, “why would it not?”

“It cost twenty bucks!” she blurted then flushed slightly for the faux pas.

He laughed fully, “...Okay.” her manner and confusion enchanted the man.

“I meant,” she faltered, “... you must have received hundreds of gifts, expensive ones that made mine pale in comparison.”

“Do you equate the value of a gift with its price?” he debated artfully.

“Well, of course not!” she was quick to deny the accusation but upon second thought, “...Oh, my gosh... do I?”

His hands skimmed Lizzy’s sides, memorizing the weight of her breasts on his hands before inching downward to the slight tapering at her waist and flare of her hips.

“No,” he replied confidently, “you just assume I do.”

Liz processed, “But you don’t.” she suddenly ‘got it’.

“No.” Red’s tone gentled.

“You really don’t.” Liz was flabbergasted which made the man chuckle again.

“The gesture touched me deeply, especially seeing how,” Red explained, “our relationship, for lack of a better term, was a fledgling one.”

Red swallowed the warm mouthful of which he had just partaken, sitting the glass aside, his eyes aligning with hers.

His eyes dropped to the turbulent waters when the woman shifted on his lap, her thighs tightening about his hips. The fleeting glimpse of the dark triangle covering her sex settled against his own lighter pelt, was hypnotizing.

“I made a wish too... that night at my birthday dinner.” Liz settled comfortably on his form.

“Is it permitted to ask... what it was?” he mellowed further, enraptured by the sight of his large hand dwarfing the small indentation of her waist, his fingertips came to rest on the sloping curve of her bottom.

“A new Ferrari.” she stated instantly.

The man’s laughter delighted her.

“A red one.”

“Of course,” he played along. “You look good in red.”

“I know.” she quietened, “A couple weeks down the road though.. I would have changed that.”
He nodded amiably, “To a blue one?”

“I would have wished,” she shook her head, the soft tendrils swishing hypnotically about the beautiful face, “that our relationship, for lack of a better term, continue to grow.”

“And it took so long to make this wish... why?” he teased gently.

Finding the outline of her legs braced beside his hips, Red slowly inched his hands up her silky thighs, his fingers curving around the toned muscle tugging her gently. His eyes closed when her mound pushed against the curvature of his penis.

“I had to mold you a bit... make you more perfect,” her expression asked, “isn’t it obvious?”

Red held his amusement, “You have succeeded admirably in your efforts.”

It was Liz’s turn to chuckle. She leaned, catching his mouth in a warm kiss, the taste of delicious scotch on his lips heightened the feeling.

“Did you really wish,” she flushed, “... for me?” she couldn’t believe the man harbored such thoughts where she was concerned, even then. He hid them so well.

Reaching, Red slowly pulled the pins holding her hair, sitting them aside one by one.

Her vision swam for a moment, the movement just as erotic as if the man were undressing her layer by layer.

Red thread his fingers through the dark locks, easing the ache left behind.

“That... and to kiss this amazing little mouth just once before I died, yes.” he said, his eyes holding hers effortlessly, a fire burning deep inside the blue orbs.

Liz exhaled shakily, her heart beating hard in her breast, “...And now you have”

Cupping her small head, Red drew the woman closer, his eyes locked firmly on hers.

“Not nearly enough.” he whispered his belief.

A natural instinct to strain towards the man was held in check by his controlled movements, which heightened her anticipation.

“Humans are such stupid creatures.” his brow crinkled in thought, his gaze restlessly searching her face. “How often do we allow our pride and misconceptions to rule our judgements and decisions?”

“What do you mean?” Liz was held spellbound by the low, hypnotic voice.

“We lost so much time.” his thumb traced the pout of her mouth. “I should have just told you what I was feeling at the time I was experiencing it.”

The desire to kiss the woman surged when Lizzy’s small nipple grazed intimately against his chest, easing his emotional state to another level entirely.

She inhaled sharply as his warm breath brushed tantalizingly against her eager flesh, her tongue darting to sensually flick against her tingling lips.

The man’s wet mouth brushed teasingly against hers, a whimsical shadow of things to come. His nose nudged hers gently. Catching her bottom lip, Red gentled the pink skin erotically, their breaths mingling heatedly.

When the woman’s breathing and heart rate accelerated, her body molding comfortably to his, the man felt his entire system go on high alert.

Wrapping his arms securely about her small frame, he stroked her warmed skin possessively, his palms sure and confident wherever he chanced to touch. He lifted her into his attention, determined to further his hold on her psyche.

A carnal grunt hummed low in his chest when her little tongue flicked wantonly against his mouth, demanding entrance.

He found her lack of patience, charming as hell. He loved her eagerness, in all its magnificent form. It meant he was reaching her on some primal level.

Her bottom bowed, arching against his groin in added temptation, persuading him to give into her desires.

She was doing so well in her endeavors... he almost complied...

Almost.

How the hell a man on his back exerted so much control, Liz would never know, but every second that passed she knew she was falling deeper under his spell. She would allow his every whim. A part of her determined to fight the good fight but...

Carding his fingers through her thick hair, Red deepened the sultry connection.

His tongue slid easily past her lips, any resistance she may have thought to give... vanishing before it even materialized.

So much for the good fight...

Liz arched upward, mewling in the man’s mouth, her tongue gently mirrored his sensual probing.

Red skimmed his soapy hands along her sides. The sensation of her plump breasts and tiny waist imprinted itself on his mind. The urge to retrace his steps and savor the soft curves over and over, called to him.

He continued on his agonizing path however, a certain destination in mind. He curled his fingers about her buttocks. Soapy bubbles tickled his calloused palms as cupped the rounded flesh.

Leaning over the man, Liz’s mouth latched hungrily to his. She wriggled about anxiously, demanding his attention.

Tenderly squeezing the handful of the luscious flesh, Red’s fingers slid along the small crevice he had discovered, skimming the tiny puckering of her anus.

Unlike the first time he had explored that area, Liz didn’t startle from the touch, but lifted against it, welcoming his actions.

The man’s knuckles brushed against the small hole in no set pattern, his attention focused on her response.

Her sex throbbed anxiously, a waving pulse of desire tugging at her vulva. The pink lips swelled, tingling with anticipation.
Her tunnel clenched, surging with a swift, searing heat as it readied itself for Red. The cream of her arousal thickened in response... suddenly hotter than the water surrounding them.

Pleased with her reaction, Red concentrated his index finger against the small hole, rubbing it in a lazy, circular motion.

She gasped sharply against his mouth, her bottom pressing into his touch.

Quickly recapturing her mouth, Red’s lips silenced any protest the woman might think to utter.

Directing his touch, Red massaged her with determined strokes. Blindly grasping for the soap, he worked a healthy amount of suds in hand, working the slippery substance where he needed it most.

“...Trust me,” he rasped thickly as the woman’s labored breathing crested. His fingers moved gently against the tender flesh, the small puckering flexing under his every stroke.

Liz’s senses were in overload mode. Red’s mouth demanded she comply with his ardent display as the man’s middle finger slid alongside the one already in motion.

The thick fingers rubbed her methodically, establishing a definite rhythm to his madness.

The sultry and passionate slide of his mouth against hers was erotic, stimulating the woman to new heights of passion.

As was the rigid shaft which rubbed unobtrusively against her thigh from time to time, beckoning her ardent, tempting it... persuading it to unfold.

Trailing her hand down his chest and rib cage, she inched further towards her goal... to take the man in hand, so to speak.

Red’s hand grasp hers, stopping her intent, gently twisting the stealthy arm behind her back.

Liz gasped against his mouth as a strong fountain of water hit her nipple. The pressure concave the pliant flesh, beating steadily against the hardening nub in a maddening slow caress.

“...Does that feel good?” Red husk deeply, watching the woman unconsciously move closer to the force. His thumb joined the tantalizing caress, rubbing the pink tip in an equally maddening slow motion.

Any other time, it might have embarrassed her, to be forced to admit a weakness. At this particular moment, other priorities surfaced.

She closed her eyes, her pouty mouth desperately searching for his, her arms pulling him closer.

She sighed blissfully, murmuring a reply, arching towards the source.

Slowly rolling the woman, Red took a dominate position, grasping the edge of the tub to keep them afloat and his lover above water.

The tub was ridiculously spacious and deep, the swishing waters obscured by millions of tiny white bubbles.

Wrapping his arm about Lizzy’s waist, he lifted her small frame against his. Her head now lay comfortably against the small pillow Red had abandoned.

Her open legs naturally cradling the man’s body, the slick skin brushing along his firm thighs at every vantage point.

Lowering his head, Red caught her full mouth, hungrily capturing her mewl of contentment on his tongue.

He angled the cascading water to hit her breast, drawing a sharp gasp of appreciation from her throat.

“I missed you…” he murmured softly against her mouth, “so very much, Lizzy.”

Wrapping her legs about him, she lifted into his frame, hugging the man happily.

Cupping her bottom, Red returned the sweet gesture. They floated about in the water, once again twisting with the direction of the swirling force.

Planting his foot against the textured bath stopped their movement just as the pelts pulsed unexpectedly against Lizzy’s bottom.

In lifting her form, Liz was pleasantly and unexpectedly inundated by a forceful expulsion of water which cascaded along her backside, the hot rivets running between the slit of her ass cheeks.

The sensation was ever so pleasant. She had never felt anything like it before.

A soft grunt escaped her throat. She squirmed her bottom about experimentally, unaware of having done so.

Red picked up on the fact, his eyes hooding with a sensual stare. He reached, his fingers parting the velvet slit judicially.

“Red!” Liz flustered, squirming immediately from his touch.

“Don’t even pretend that doesn’t feel good.” he murmured erotically, holding her in place, directing the spray back to its former position.

“S-Stop it.” she pushed at his hands hold.

Red caught one puffy nub in his mouth, suckling hungrily hardening the tiny nipple, refusing to allow the woman any sort of reprieve.

Between the constant rush of lascivious spray and the urgent antics of the man’s mouth, a losing battle ensued.

Liz gave in, her eyes closing to the wondrous surge of eroticism washing over her.

Red’s mouth felt so good... the torrent spray so sinfully forbidden.

She relaxed into the moment, mindless of her modest upbringing.

“Have you never masturbated like this?” the man’s voice was husky, his middle finger probing about the tight flesh of her anus.

Liz felt open and totally vulnerable, her center flaming to vivid life, an ache trailing up into her most private of places.

The question had secretively shocked the woman. Red was so open about such things. He spoke freely, even that holding a measure of the forbidden which attracted Liz like a moth to a flame.
She shook her head negatively, encouraged by his open, frank manner.

The man’s hand stroked idly along her thigh, his free arm encompassing her form, holding the lithe body close.

“I... guess it,” she allowed him to guide her clitoris to the titillating experience, gasping her amazement, “n-never came up.”

“Well, it has now.” Red decided, sliding his middle finger inside her molten cavern.

His thumb pulled incessantly at each side of her anus as he alternated the force from one sensitive spot to the other.

He knew, by the woman’s disgruntled gasps, that his mission was unfolding nicely.

Liz required more than his fingers to alleviate the pangs of arousal, however. He also knew that.

He had planned for it, in fact.

“I love to see you like this...” Red maneuvered her closer to the pulsating burst, most intent upon observing her reaction.

Liz groaned her awe, the sensation of Red’s fingers and the hot water pelting her ass was... amazing.

As Red moved her back against the teasing vibration, which unexpectedly splashed his sack.

“Damn...” he breathed his own growing need, “that does feel good.”

Liz nodded slowly, her attention concentrated elsewhere.

Grinning knowingly, Red lifted her full breast, suckling the woman’s puffy nipple into his mouth.

Liz’s fingers instantly curved about the man’s head, holding him to his pastime. The hot tug of his mouth sent jolts of awareness to her clit, causing the creamy heat to build in her core.

Spreading her legs wider, Red directed more pressure to hit her in the new hot spot he had unearthed. His rough tongue scraping against the crinkling swirl of her nipple.

Tightening her hold on the man, Liz hooked her leg over Red’s hip which allowed his shaft to shift between her legs.

Red’s vision blurred as the unexpected and electrifying sensation of the strong current beat against his sensitive cock head.

“Oh, shit...” he hissed his shock, his fingers tightening about the tubs frame and Lizzy’s bottom.

Raking gentle teeth against the man’s lip, Liz’s dark blue eyes lit with amusement, “...Does that feel good, Red?” she echoed his own sentiment back at him.

“...You tell me,” Red’s gravely voice left her reeling, the lust so clearly defined within.

Red jerked his hips, pushing into the intensity, the crown of his shaft slipping between her rounded cheeks.

She was dismayed to feel her bottom wriggle closer, her mouth falling agape as his rigid flesh dragged along the sensitive tissue of her anus.
“Jesus...” she forced her eyes open. Intense pleasure pulsed erratically through her nerve endings.

“I believe the correct term is...” Red concurred with her assessment, grunting a soft lived expression of his own pent-up desire, “… Touché.”

Liz rolled her hips, jerking against Red’s erection, increasing the pressure of the vivid strokes.

Her ass skimmed the rippled texture, the slick heat of Red’s cock slid between her legs. She worked harder for her release, her breaths coming in short, whispery gasps.

“Son of a bitch...” Red breathed his appreciation, the sounds and frantic movement igniting an untamed passion.

Readjusting his hold, he trapped his length between her cheeks, pressing the thick head against the puckering hole of her backside.

Securing the woman’s mouth, he caught her shaky exhalations as they grew in intensity; her panted breaths... giving him life.

He had never enjoyed a ‘dry’ hump more in his fucking life. Lizzy’s little hips rolled expertly, rubbing her little ass greedily against his cock.

“Oh, God...” she mewled, rocking faster against the man’s unyielding shaft as the pleasure rose to a fevered pitch.

Unable to withstand the temptation, Red joined in her efforts, shoving up and against her frenetic pace.

The water sloshed erratically around them with their frantic movement. The soapy water lapped over the sides, wetting the island surrounding them.

He damned his fingers as they slipped from their tight hold on the edge. Quickly readjusting his grip, he gratefully grasped a washcloth in his haste, securing their position.

His fat cock slid heavily against her hypersensitive flesh, the ridges rubbed incessantly where she needed it most.

Leaning, he caught her mouth in a passionate, frenzied kiss. The woman involuntarily cried out in his mouth as she neared the pinnacle.

“Oh, God...” she drawled her awe, “I’m gonna come...” her shaky breath grew in pitch, “fuck... I’m gonna...”

“Fucking hell...” he rasp against her parted mouth, flicking his tongue sensually along hers. He fought the convulsing contractions, his own need rearing its ugly head.

Curling her fingers into his back, Liz rode the cock harder... faster. Her breasts shifted against Red’s chest, the hair scrapping along her sensitive nipples sending a searing jolt to her clit as it slapped repeatedly against Red’s groin.

Squeezing his eyes shut, Red held tight to his world... his fingers numbed as they tightened painfully around the top of the tub as he valiantly fought the urge to come right then and there on her little ass.

“Dammit, baby;” Red growled through clenched teeth, “fucking come!”
He was not happy with his own lack of control. Not happy at all. His plans were going remarkably awry.

But then... Lizzy had never rubbed her ass against his cock with relentless determination, eager to come.

Red secured his stronghold as the woman seized in his arms, releasing a sharp, startling cry of release.

Her shouted exclamation echoed back off the water as the woman clawed frantically at the man, edging even closer to his solid frame.

Ducking her nose into the man’s neckline, Liz shook with the tremendous rush of endorphins assailing her senses.

The sensation of her body pulsing against his and the woman’s muffled cries of ecstasy tore through Red’s psyche.

Four fucking days he had been without her...

He had never wanted anyone so badly in his life.

The urge to fuck her until she was a quivering mess of tortured delight, was intense.

But the need to love her...

Nudging his nose against her neckline and jaw, he encouraged her to come back to him from the exquisite journey she had just taken.

Liz eagerly lifted, snuggling into Red’s embrace, nuzzling at his neck, mewing her contentment

Red’s heart hammered in his chest when her little face came into view. Those blue eyes were serene with bliss. Lizzy’s mouth searched instinctively for his kiss.

Shushing her soft whimpering, Red tenderly peppered that little mouth with gentle kisses as she calmed from the high he had just gifted.

Grasping her leg, he edged his way between her thighs as he rolled her beneath him. Her body naturally floated, conforming to his as he continued loving the woman. His mouth slid effortlessly along her neck and shoulders before returning to the lips he so loved.

Liz lethargically bent to his will, opening herself to his exploration. She hummed melodically as he wrapped an arm about her waist, lifting her breasts free of the water.

Red breathed his excitement as her tiny nipples broke the water line before the rest of the ample mounds followed. An overwhelming desire to taste the glistening skin left him on edge and restless.

His mouth trailed a searing path over the rounded flesh, tasting the light fragrant bubbles. He suckled her sharp peaks into his warm mouth.

The delectable tug of his mouth stirred a reawakening between her legs. Her clit tingled with awareness, a heaviness settling in her core.

Liz could not believe he could arouse her so quickly. She marveled at the man’s abilities, basking in them.
A low growl rumbled in Red’s chest as his engorged erection slid along Lizzy’s slit, the thick head slipping easily between the aroused flesh.

The woman arched into his touch, breathing euphorically as his weight settled against her slim body.

Curving his arm about her waist, Red cradled her small head in his palm, reverently kissing the mouth he desperately missed the last few days.

His cocked jerked hard against her center when the woman’s crystalline blue eyes fluttered open, staring hazily up at him.

Sliding his hand over the swell of her abdomen, Red’s fingers danced lightly over Lizzy’s mound, gently parting the lips of her vagina.

The rough imprint of his finger smoothed over her clitoris, rubbing leisurely circles against the swollen hood.

His eyes darkened when her legs fell apart in open invitation, further beckoning him to take what he wanted.

Lizzy was insatiable during her period. All that blood flowing to her genitals made her a frisky little thing. Like a kitten that couldn’t get enough playtime.

Once he got her over that first hump, as it were, she allowed herself to satisfy her needs.

It felt amazing for them both. Her senses were heightened and sensitive to the most simplistic of touch. Her orgasms were intense and frequent. She often came in rapid succession, much to her delight... and his own.

Even through the condom that first time, he had never enjoyed a better fuck in his life.

She was stunningly beautiful, all wet and swollen. She felt amazing. Feeling her engorged lips and clit dragging against his cock was more than mind altering.

He had every intention of making love to the woman but the minute he spread that hot hole open, shoving that snug cushion apart with his cock head... all his good intentions often flew out the proverbial window.

Lizzy never seemed to mind. Red himself was more than eager to give her the fucking she so richly deserved.

He took great pride in allowing the woman multiple orgasms. It was how he judged his merit these days.

She seemed more than pleased with his efforts and content to comply with his rather intense manhandling.

A heady warmth spread through his body upon the realization, he would be afforded that overpowering sensation again. Only this time, he was extremely privileged to feel her as God intended. A man and a woman... here, alone in their own private Garden of Eden.

Bracing an arm, Red pushed upright, startling Elizabeth with his departure.

Liz lay, a little dazed, watching the water sluicing down Red’s torso.

Her mouth watered as she followed the line of soapy trails gliding sensually through the hair. covering his chest and stomach down to the light curls at his groin.

Her core tightened in response to the stimulating sight of his heavy erection. She stared covetously at the thick, length straining for her undivided attention.

Red’s muscled thighs bunched as he raised to his knees, the thick shaft bobbing with his movement.

“...I need you,” he rasped, the yearning for an intimate connection with the woman very apparent inside his fevered body.

Liz’s brows furrowed with confusion. What part was she supposed to...

“On your knees.” he demanded roughly. He jerked his head to the ebony island running about the bathtub. She would use the surface to brace herself for what was to come.

Her heart quickened at the man’s deep, thready demand. The liquid heat inside churned, tugging pleasantly at her abdomen and groin. She purposely hesitated, wanting to be persuaded.

“...Now, Elizabeth,” he urged brusquely, grasping a thick towel, throwing it for a cushion to lay her arms against.

Red watched the woman turn about under the water. Glancing back over her shoulder, she ever so slowly inched her bottom towards the surface.

The glorious sight of her bare backside breaking the waterline like a seductive Siren arising from a frothy sea, held his rapt attention.

Red unconsciously licked his lips as the water ran in a steady bead between the ample swell of her bottom.

The suds sheered off the rosy flesh, cascading over her rounded cheeks and labia. The rush of water parted the delicate folds, opening her to his heated gaze.

He reached, his fingertips grazing her naked hip as her body naturally curved towards him, willingly readying itself for his intrusion.

Inching forward, his palms slid along her wet flesh, curling into Lizzy’s shapely hips. The woman relaxed into the position she had assumed.

Reaching blindly for a hand towel, Red shoved it under the hot waters between her legs, lifting one knee then the other, settling them on the makeshift cushion.

Liz flushed a deep red, one part pleased the man was so considerate at such a time. The other part, understanding the deeper meaning. He wanted her stationary... for their activities.

Red’s breathing shallowed as he took in the sight of the bubbles strategically spotting her pink flesh.

The tantalizing peak of a nipple, the fleeting glimpse of the curvature of her glistening wet spine, teased him mercilessly.

He licked his lips hungrily watching one certain line of suds trail deliciously between her ass cheeks only to curve about her full lips before dripping from her clit.

He blew out a steadying breath as visions of his cum following the same path fluttered about in his very active imagination.
Liz squirmed about restlessly, her core aching to feel the man.

Red’s eyes raked the little bare ass boldly, his palm running over the firm slope possessively... he took the moment to run gentle fingers between her legs, slowly caressing the sweet clit several strokes.

He nudged her forward.

Following the silent directive, Liz rested her forearms more comfortably on the edge of the tub rim, willing to allow the man’s every whim at this stage.

Resting his legs beside her closed ones, he curved her hips giving him a front seat view of the luscious pink pussy and erotically sensual backside.

He had lost the advantage of the water jet but Red Reddington was nothing but resourceful.

He ran his palms over the satin cheeks, tilting her bottom for a better hold... and view. His thumbs slid teasingly between the plump cheeks, enjoying her soft moan of pleasure.

Leaning he placed his lips on either side of the voluptuous slopes suckling tenderly, marking the flesh with subtle marks wherever his travels took him.

Liz grunted her dismay but did not once think to chastise such behavior even when the man’s experienced tongue darted fleetingly between her cheeks, flicking the tightly puckered skin of her anus, a few light, teasing strokes.

Red grinned, having expected the woman’s startled outcry. She moved from his touch.

Reaffirming his hold, he brought that delectable treat back, nuzzling the sweet flesh lovingly.

Liz returned to her earlier thought... to open herself to exploration... to experience Red’s predilections, but she could not have anticipated what they would entail.

Certainly not this.

In truth, the sensation was so fucking phenomenal, she could not find the courage to fight the overpowering stimuli invading her senses.

“...You shouldn’t,” she was more than relatively certain of the fact, her tone a scolding one.

A predatory smile curved Red’s mouth. Spreading her cheeks wider, he allowed her to feel his full tongue rub along the crinkled flesh.

He chuckled softly when the woman gasped sharply and unconsciously bowed her back, opening herself to the man’s exploration.

“Why shouldn’t I?” he husked, his hot breath teasing her intimate alcove.

Her world shifted, her objections turning to a jumbled mess as the man’s wide tongue pressed firmly against her backside, rubbing against the tight hole incessantly.

“...I,” she swallowed hard, her brow furrowing as a wave of arousal surged through her, “... it’s um...” she faltered, her mouth falling open with her panted breaths.

“I’m waiting.” his eyes traveled the expanse of her back, enjoying the view provided.

He knew what she objected to, determined to change her views to a standard... conventional outlook.

Holding her in place, he regretfully lifted from his pastime, “Stop worrying,” he soothed, “I cleansed you myself.” he reminded.

She remembered, he had soaped her bottom, most likely with the view of this activity in mind... easing any concern she may harbor.

“If you want the God’s honest truth...” he kissed the curvaceous slope, “I had my heart set on teasing your tiny clit tonight as well.”

“You c-can’t!” Liz wriggled in his touch, totally dismayed.

“I don’t like to limit our horizons...” he whispered sacredly.

“Red...” her cheeks flamed with embarrassment, “...no.”

“I assumed you’d say as much,” he disgruntled.

“...I’m,” she frowned her dismay, “...Red, my period is–”

“I will very reluctantly accept this... for now,” he eased her tension, “but soon, I reserve the right to show you just how possible any obstacle is to overcome if one is truly determined.”

She moved forward, intent on ending the face off only to feel the man tighten his hold. She moved from his touch, her decision a firm one.

“It’s either let me taste your clit,” the man rasped, “or allow me to return to my... previous activity.” he negotiated. “Choose, Elizabeth.”

Liz held firm objections to what the man was implying. Her intellect dictating one thing but her ripe, aching body more than willing to compromise.

She couldn’t fathom how the hell Red would give her oral when she was on her period? Perhaps she had misunderstood his intentions, she knew, deep down however... she had not.

All she knew with absolute certainty was her core was aching badly for release.

Her senses too inflamed to confront the issue at present, she would accept the fact, what he had attempted was the lesser of two evils.

Readjusting her stance, she slid back into her previous position, opening herself to Red.

Red’s eyes darkened watching that tiny ass tilt for him. A soft grunt worked in his throat as he lowered back to the offering, wasting no time in rubbing his tongue briskly over the sensitive flesh.

Liz’s breath was suddenly stolen from her as the man nuzzled his face into her cheeks.

His tongue worked diligently against her aroused flesh, quickly bringing her earlier passion back into focus within seconds.

He grunted approvingly when Lizzy rocked against his face, pushing into his touch. Increasing the pressure, Red felt the little hole flutter in response to his efforts.

Tightening his tongue, he alternated between licking and poking the tight orifice repeatedly, imitating the movement of lovemaking.
Liz’s body tensed with exquisite pleasure as the man stabbed at her opening, the sensation a foreign... yet undeniably erotic one. She felt her abdomen tighten in response, her vulva tingling with heightened arousal.

“...God,” she breathed her awe, “...G-God!”

Grasping her own cheek, she pulled at it, opening herself more to the intense sensation.

Red exhaled sharply, waiting for such an occurrence. The sweet tang of her arousal flooded his senses. His cock hardened further, shifting heavily between his stocky thighs.

He tenderly slid a thick finger into her core.

Red centered his attention on the swollen nub inside, petting it in a steady, titillating pace.

The tightening of her anus clenched under his tongue alerted him she was close to orgasm.

Doubling his efforts, Red tongued that beautiful ass until she cried out. Her back arched sharply, shoving the round flesh against his face... the little hole fluttering wildly under his ministrations.

Slowing, he gentled his touch, flickering the tip against her quivering flesh.

“That wasn’t so bad,” he pushed upward, inching forward, “... now was it?”

Lethargically shaking her head, Liz’s senses were still reeling when the man’s fat cock head parted her swollen vulva.

He pushed past the tight resistance of her vaginal lips, smoothly gliding inside.

“...Jesus...” Red hissed his contentment and gratitude to a benevolent deity when the tight hold grasped him, massaging his crown.

“I’ve missed this little pussy so much, can you tell?” he groaned his delight.

Liz’s fluttering walls tugged at his cock, drawing him deeper into the abyss. Rolling his hips slowly, he eased his cock into the tight sheath inch by agonizing inch.

Settling his hands at her waist, he lowered his eyes avidly watching his cock vanish into the rippling hole until his sack was snug against her clit.

She whimpered despondently, moving suggestively when his sack nudged her. She lifted into the touch, encouraging his actions.

His mouth curved, “...I’ll take that as a, yes.”

Red’s body trembled visibly when her tunnel fluttered helplessly around him before conforming to the large shaft, squeezing the fuck out of him.

“Finally,” he breathed a raspy whisper, “it felt like a damned eon since I last touched you.”

Quickly falling into a steady rhythm, Red watched the show unfolding before his very eyes.

The rounded cheeks of Lizzy’s ass jiggled with each gentle thrust of his cock. The tiny hole clenched tightly each time he completed their connection.

He rather enjoyed the unhurried tempo he found. He could feel every nuance of Lizzy as he glided evenly into her warm hold.

The way she conformed to him, the mind bending tug on his cock head when she clench... he had missed this private, intimacy with her and was really in no hurry for it to end.

Wetting his thumb, he rubbed gently against the small pucker of her ass, enjoying her soft groan of approval.

He smiled warmly after a few moments as he felt her ease under his touch. Working his index finger against the small hole, he eased the tip into the totally relaxed anus.

“Stop...” the woman tensed against his intentions, stopping the foreplay dead in its tracks. “What are you... doing?” she questioned hesitantly.

“Just... relax.” he soothed her worry, careful to not push his good fortune any further.

Liz bit nervously at her lip, unsure, “I’m not–”

“I swear to God, I won’t hurt you, baby,” Red stressed, “I promise.”

Red would never hurt her... intentionally, of course he wouldn’t... she reminded herself. He may not be out to hurt her but... she had never done anything like this before.

She was... a little more than apprehensive, “...But-”

“Do you trust me.” he slowed to a standstill, waiting to see what she wanted to do.

“Just... try it.” he encouraged. “If you don’t like it...”

His heart warmed when he felt the woman try to lessen the tension in her body.

Dropping her chin, Liz breathed through her anxiety determined to open herself to his needs.

“Take a deep breath,” Red instructed quietly, once again rubbing the small hole persuasively, “let it out...”

Liz did as told and kept doing so as his finger inched further into her body until he suddenly stopped the momentum.

“Did it hurt?” he enquired softly as his knuckle settled in place.

It hadn’t hurt... at all; to her great shock.

To be honest, she hadn’t expected it to end that suddenly or smoothly.

“...No,” she told the truth, “it’s... it’s all right.”

“Now, just keep breathing,” he gently eased his finger back and forth, allowing her to become accustomed to the foreign object.

“Good?” he asked, stroking the steamy hold with ease now.

“Y-Yes...” she moaned melodiously, “yes it’s...” nothing like she expected, not at all.

This was beyond titillating.

Red’s eyes gentled on the woman, pleased beyond measure she was enjoying the added incentive.
“I’m going to move now,” he warned before swiveling his hips, driving his cock deep inside the woman’s warmth.

He slowly worked back to his earlier tempo, watching the very stimulating sight of his cock and finger sliding in tandem until his sack pulled tight against his groin.

He grinned happily as the woman pouted at the loss as he eased his finger free of its confinement.

She whimpered as the man’s hand cupped her, the large hand encompassing her lower abdomen and mound easily.

“I can feel myself,” he hissed, pressing against the movement, “…inside you.”

Liz’s hand fluttered to his, her slim fingers laying against her abdomen. Red placed his hand over hers, pressing against her taut stomach.

Her mouth gaped as she felt the large cock slide past her mound into the very depths of her core. The thick head jabbed inside her, pushing at her belly. The pressure against her hand was... intense.

Red snarled when he felt the movement of his cock through her hand. He couldn’t believe how well they could feel it... nor how deep inside her body he really was.

He knew she was tiny compared to his bulk, but to feel such a sensation... never had he experienced anything so exquisite.

Never had he been inundated by such varying emotions.

To feel himself within her body in such a way, brought on such a surge of dominance... he fought the urge to fuck her until she submitted to his every whim.

The overwhelming impulse to protect her was intense. Even now, his body sheltered hers. Palming her breast, he pulled her into the safety his body afforded. He braced his other hand alongside hers, effectively blocking sight of the woman from possible intruders.

He was almost positive Lizzy felt the change within him. Her center flooded with heat as she bared her neck to the man... a very symbolic gesture to the Alpha male inside.

“Do you feel me?” his panted breaths tickled her neckline. “How deep you’re taking me....”

“Yes...” she opened herself to his affection, mewling breathlessly with each deep thrust of his cock.

Liz lifted into his shallow thrust, her mouth parting sensually for a host of reasons.

“No one is allowed to touch you like this,” he growled, asserting his rights to the territory, “love you... like I do.”

Liz moved into his body, the enticing sensation of his chest hair against her back and her bottom, robbing her of any coherent thought.

“Do you understand me?” he husked, the implication more than apparent.

She nodded jerkily, fully accepting his terms. The thought of anyone other than Red touching her, disturbed her. Only Red had the right... ever again.

“Good girl...” Red circled her clit, shallowing his thrusts. The desire to stay deeply encased in her heat... to feel connected to her was suddenly overpowering.
She gently bounced off his fat cock, clenching tight around him.

“Yes...” he hissed, “that’s my good baby...” he increased the pressure where she needed, “tighten that pussy for me.”

Her core clamped about the man’s shaft, her head swimming as the hard-textured cock pushed against her tightening core, demanding entrance.

“Shit...” he continued his steady rhythm, “keep doing that.”

She moaned, desperately trying to push back against him, wanting him so badly to fuck her little hole.

“Do you have any idea,” the man’s head fell against her shoulder, rubbing the swollen peak of her clit harder, “just how much pleasure you give me?”

She instinctively raised her bottom, gasping with joy as his hard sack pressed intimately against her.

Wrapping her in his embrace, he pumped his hips slowly, “Not only this...” he cupped her breast, thumbing the tiny peak, “there is so much more, Elizabeth.”

He shook his head for the depth of emotions inundating his heart, “How do I make you understand?”

Liz lost herself in Red’s voice and the evocative impact of their bodies coming together.

“My adoration of you grows with each passing day.” he needed to share a part of what he was feeling.

Liz whimpered as his large hand curved about her waist, pulling her back into his gentle thrust.

“I have never felt such contentment... until you.” he stated.

Securing her pelvis in his hold, he lifted her bottom into his shallow thrusts, which pushed the woman over the edge.

Her core pulled at his shaft, squeezing the thick muscle in the warm, loving embrace of her body.

His head fell back, his eyes closing rapturously as the hot cushion convulsed around his cock head.

The excruciatingly pleasurable contractions of her body desperately massaged the large bulb, determined to extract what he freely and willingly would give Lizzy anytime she required.

“God, yes...” he sighed euphorically, “you’re such a sweet little fuck...”

Adjusting his hand on her abdomen, he lost himself in the sensation of his cock sliding deep past the recesses of the snug heat before the heavy weight of his cock pushed against his hand.

Lizzy’s thready moans and breathless pleas delighted his senses, drawing him closer to what he knew would be a profoundly gratifying release not only in body, but soul.

“...You feel so good,” Liz mewed.

She felt a delicious tug in her clit, the cresting wave of orgasm edging closer once more, stunning her.

“Shit,” he grated the fact, realization dawning, “I can’t wait any longer.”
Red’s eyes softened as Lizzy babbled breathlessly, professing her love and lust for him in rapid succession.

“Help me...” he coaxed, increasing the pressure on her clitoris, “baby... come with me.”

A low, gravelly groan rolled through Red’s chest and parted mouth as he neared the apex, sending sharp jolts to her clit.

Just as his cock head throbbed, the intensely satisfying tug of Lizzy’s pussy enveloping his shaft in liquid heat consumed him.

His vision blackened as his cum pulsed thick jets from his sensitive slit.

Liz cried out as Red’s fingers curved about her hips, gently pulling her back into his deep rutted thrusts. She lifted her bottom as his substantial load pooled deep within her core.

Red groaned brokenly as Lizzy’s pussy fluttered relentlessly around his throbbing shaft, extracting the hot fluid in mind-altering waves.

“...I missed you...” the woman gasped a shaky breath as his thick cream filled her, “...so much.”

The ache in her center subsided with each pulse of his shaft. The heat of Red’s cum spread through her pelvis and thighs, leaving her weak and sated.

“...This is what my baby wanted,” he husked, “...isn’t it?”

Her heavy lids shut as Red pulled her snug against his groin.

“...Oh, my God,” Liz gaped as the overflow of fluid pushed around the man’s shaft, trickling over her lips and clitoris.

Red dropped his hips, pushing her down below the water. He felt the hot liquid rush in around him, as he pushed back inside, swirling their arousal out around him and their bodies.

“Ohh....” she flushed.

He frowned slightly, not understanding her embarrassment, then saw the pink tinted water.

“Baby, it’s all right.” he chuckled softly, regretfully sliding free of her warmth.

He reached around, pulling the plug, arising.

“Let’s have a quick rinse off.” he gestured to the shower, offering his hand.

Liz nodded, stepping over the tub with Red’s help, “We’re going to look like prunes.”

“What time are you leaving tomorrow?” Liz asked, rubbing lotion into her arms after their quick shower and dry down.

She frowned after a moment when the man didn’t reply instantly. “...Red?” she stepped from the bathroom, finding him unfurling a towel over their sheets.

“Hoping to get lucky again?” she grinned.

“Always,” Red replied without hesitation, “but in this case, I was aiming for your comfort.”
Liz’s eyes softened on the man as she slipped into the luxurious bed.

After the man shut down the lights and situated himself, she rolled towards him.

He sighed, when she snuggled up to him, stifling a yawn.

“What time are you leaving in the morning?” she repeated.

“Are you on Eastern or Pacific time?” he smiled.

“That’s why I’m asking.” Liz rolled her eyes towards the man.

“I suppose I’ll be leaving around eight,” Red hid his smile when Lizzy gasped indignantly, “... Pacific time.”

He chuckled, kissing her temple when Elizabeth visibly relaxed.

“Are we old, Red?” she asked after a moment silence.

Red chortled quietly, “Well...I’m not, but why do you ask?”

“Well, we’re in LA and it’s well before midnight.” she realized. “Shouldn’t we be out enjoying the nightlife, or something?”

“I am enjoying the nightlife.” Red turned, snuggling the woman closer. He dipped his nose into her neckline, drawing a soft giggle from Lizzy.

“I meant, it’s barely ten o’clock and we’re in bed.”

“If it makes you feel any better,” he murmured against her soft flesh, “it is two our time.”

“Oh... right,” she remembered, “no wonder I’m so sleepy.”

“Exhausted, perhaps?” Red rephrased. He had quickly become accustom to bouncing between time zones. He adapted to each he visited with little issue any longer.

“To be honest,” Liz began, “being away from you was more taxing than anything else.”

Red’s heart warmed, hearing the words, “Then we’re on the same page.”

Liz smiled, leaning to kiss the man before turning on her side, wiggling back into Red’s body.

Red eyes softened, his arm held aloft allowing her to get comfortable. Once she settled, he pulled the blankets up around them.

Only after a few moments had passed before he felt the pull of sleep. In the preceding days, he found every excuse not to visit this empty bed.

It was not empty now, however.

“Lizzy?” he pressed his lips into her soft hair. The woman hummed sleepily in response. “I’m glad you joined me.”

“You know what I’m glad for,” she murmured sleepily, “Jacuzzi tubs.”

His sensual chuckle filled the silence of the room, “Especially those with adjustable jets.”
Chapter End Notes

We wanted to title this one... Rub a Dub-Dub Let's Make Love in the Tub.... but it wouldn't fit. :D

If there are any typos, point them out. We had a heck of a time with this chapter.
June 10

Dembe’s timely assistance afforded Red the opportunity to enjoy a leisurely morning with Elizabeth. His friend had interceded on Red’s behalf, asking a favor of Francis Holbrook and Ben Gilchrist.

Both men took Red’s place in the intricate dealings with the association who had gathered for the important meetings taking place almost on an hourly basis.

It was not, by any means, a long period of time allotted Red and Elizabeth but any amount these days was greatly appreciated by both parties.

Just to have the woman literally by his side as they passed a languid morning, left Red feeling centered once more.

Fortunately, Lizzy seemed more intent upon discussing the merits of the elaborate shower the penthouse offered rather than catching up on the things they missed during their forced days apart.

Tom Keen did come up at one point, the guy was a thorn in Red’s side. A sore spot.

Red expected the little ‘game’ the men were executing would upset Lizzy, but she dismissed the fact all too easily.

It gave Red pause for thought but those thoughts dissipated quickly enough by Lizzy’s look from the shower stall... which spoke volumes indeed.

With a rambunctious brunette awaiting his pleasure, all other matters faded into oblivion.

Besides, Red hoped he was steps closer to unraveling whatever sordid plot Tom Keen had involved himself in.

He could see no further use or reason for the insect of a man after that. Red was looking forward to ending Tom Keen’s pathetic existence, truth told.

He tried to dredge up some emotional regret, reluctance... anything to suggest he still held a modicum of humanity where Keen was concerned, but obviously that ship seemed to have sailed years past.

Perhaps that made him no better than Tom Keen.

God would have to sort it out in the end. Too much water had flowed under the proverbial bridge between the two men.

Red dismissed the interruption to his thoughts instantly, crossing the room to attend to a much more pleasant individual... and most favorite distraction.

After some creative wrangling on his part having applied several different techniques learned through the years.... and Lizzy’s newly acquired appreciation for pulsating water.... that sultry look which enraptured him so, morphed into one of pure contentment and bliss on the beautiful face.

At breakfast, a quiet even mood settled between them.

Red found his appetite a hearty one after so many days taking in bland unappealing food just to survive.

His mood, too, was much lighter and carefree, there was a new spring to his steps.

Red did not note such things.

His mouth curved into a smile as Lizzy pattered past him in nothing more than her panties, bra... and heated hair curlers she had been rather excited to find the hotel supplied.

“That better be an afterglow smile,” she warned in passing, “and nothing more.”

“What else would I be smiling for?” Red asked, hanging his robe on the provided hook.

Liz glanced at her reflection in a nearby mirror on the wall, her nose crinkling adorably, “It’s hard work... producing the end product you know.”

Red's mouth quirked irresistibly, “Is it?”

“Damned right,” she stood up for her species, “walk a mile in our heels before you judge, fella.”

His smile broke through, “May I ask an impertinent question?” he murmured, stepping decidedly closer to the alluring little figure.

“Can I stop you?” she held her smile.

“... Did you wear such... telling garments,” he ran a finger about the lace of her panties gracing her hip bone, “before I came into the picture?”

She arched a brow, “What is that supposed to mean?” she queried.

He offered another look-over, his interest clearly on the vision before him.

He blew out a controlled breath, “It’s just that...” he confessed a weakness, “had I known what was beneath your staid suits, I might not have been able to control my... inclinations.”

Liz sat a finger under his chin, “My eyes are up here.” she motioned.

The confident stare lifted, albeit slowly, taking in the curves and delectable skin allowed by the scant covering.

“Did you wear them... for him?” Red managed to keep his ire from his voice.

“You want the truth?” Liz mused.

“You want the truth?” Liz mused.

“I don’t want a lie.” his brow furrowed darkly. “Do you think you have to–”

“Not at all.” she cut him short. “I only meant,” she amended, “it’s a rather sad state I was in, I suppose.” she shrugged. “I didn’t feel the need to...”

The silence came for a long beat as the woman confronted some of her past, “I feel... pretty in these.” she glanced down. “I feel like I can wear them now.”

Red’s mind flitted about critically at such a statement.

Liz lifted soft eyes, “You make me feel that way,” a well of warmth filled her heart. “Before, I had moments when I had a good hair day or,” she forced a chuckle, “a certain dress made me feel
She sought him out, “You make me feel that way every day.”

“You should feel it because,” his scowl deepened by the second, “you are beautiful, sexy and incredibly desirable, Elizabeth. Don’t ever...ever doubt your appeal.”

“I didn’t know I had any appeal,” she hugged him tightly whispering the fact, “before you.”

“I can not believe that.” he refused the belief. Had Tom damaged her psyche to such an extent?

Liz pulled back, a thoughtful expression on the lovely face, “When you hired Hannah and Katie that time....”

She reminded him of her favored beauticians.

“They not only rid me of the filth of Carver,” she wanted to say it for a very long time now, “but they... taught me,” she floundered for a beat, “well, I guess they erased the damage Tom inflicted as well.” she remembered how clean and fresh and... different she felt.

“Elizabeth,” Red was touched, “it was such a small thing. I only thought you–”

“No, it was a very big thing,” she admonished, “at least, to me. It was... a new beginning or sorts, I think. It sounds kind of stupid, I guess.”

“No, it’s not stupid,” Red almost snapped.

“It was the ego boost I needed to set me back on track. I felt light and optimistic.” she smiled for him. “A silly female moment that just... changed my outlook on so many things in my life.” she sighed blissfully. “I sincerely thank you for what you did for me.”

Red closed his eyes, lifting her hand in his, his mouth planting a gentle kiss on her fingers, “...Don’t.”

“I want to,” she tightened her fingers on his. “Tom crushed my self esteem.” she could admit it now. “He took my confidence away and even though it was all a sham, I felt had I been ‘good enough’, he would have been able to change his ways.”

“You don’t fucking believe that?”

“I did then,” she whispered, “but no, not now. Not now, Red.”

He nodded his approval, his stare a quiet one.

“Hannah and Katie reminded me, I had a few good assets,” she teased. “Add you to the pot and overtime, well... I know I’m worthy of good things in my life.”

The man brooded, not happy with the ‘truth’ Elizabeth related. That she felt those bad things, and he had been unaware.

“I have a man I can trust,” she kissed his thumb, the one worrying her knuckles, “one I can rely on... that has faith in me even when I doubt myself. What more could a gal ask?”

She tip-toed, her lips brushing his.

“It shouldn’t matter what the hell I think, only what you–”
“It’s nice to be reminded every once in a while though,” she reminded, “which you go out of your way to do... constantly. Don’t think I haven’t noticed because, I have.”

Red inclined his head minutely, “If that is how you feel, I’m more than pleased.”

“Then why the scowl,” she traced his brow playfully.

“Because I hate knowing you felt the other shit.” he snapped.

“Haven’t you ever felt,” she sought the word, “less than what you could be?”

She seriously doubted he had. Such a man? No, Red Reddington had an inborn pride. Confidence verging on arrogance at times.

She envied the man.

“I know my weakness,” he had a few, “I know my strengths.” he shrugged. “I will say...” he hesitated.

Should he? To bare one’s soul so easily could be a major weakness.

Red was careful to reveal such things, even to this woman. Or perhaps, especially to this woman because Elizabeth had the ability to hurt him deeply.

“Sexually speaking,” he altered his intended truth, “...I take certain pride knowing that a woman of your caliber finds me... acceptable in such a capacity.”

He shifted a curious stare. “You do find me acceptable... right?”

“Mildly,” Liz held her grin, running a teasing finger down his biceps.

Red had never given his body much thought... until recently.

He sensed Lizzy found his arms attractive, if only by her reaction to them and bared them at every given opportunity these days.

It shocked Dembe and Silas when he joined their daily regimen of exercises but they held their opinions, for once, when he claimed his health as the reason for his participation.

They knew why he was out there. They had gone out of their way to assist him in his endeavor.

While both men approved of his affair with Elizabeth, they approached the task with differing goals. Silas wanted to help his boss get laid. Dembe wanted to improve the man’s health.

It was a win/win situation.

He hadn’t felt this sexy in years. He had forgotten the sensation.

The sexual connection of a look shared. The rush of endorphins when a woman’s mere touch ignited one’s passion.

Sex was all well and good but it was different, what passed between him and Elizabeth.

It was just... not the same.

They shared a deep, powerful... achingly poignant thing.
His cock and balls knew that difference, they felt it to their core.

How did one explain such a thing?

And Lizzy had become the essence of every woman he desired.

The woman of his dreams. Witty, intelligent, amusing, caring, loving, kind and incredibly beautiful and sensual.

And the best part? It was as if someone had designed that hot, tight little pussy just for his pleasure.

Had he searched for her his whole life? He hadn’t been aware he was searching but the minute he looked into those deep blue eyes... something stirred to life.

“Have I lost you?”

Red blinked, stirred in another way.

“...So you didn’t and don’t wear these for me?” he attempted to lighten the moment, his fingers flicking the bows at the sides of her panties.

“Of course, I wear them for you,” she confessed freely, “I just didn’t want your head to swell any bigger than it already is.”

“Which head?”

“Don’t you even think about it.” she moved slightly away. “I haven’t even packed yet and you know what a stickler Dembe is when it comes to flight-time.”

Liz’s hand caught the action, trying to prevent it. She giggled infectiously, “He doesn’t have to... so many women are in line for that privilege.”

“Are you one of them?” Red’s hands eased the silky blue material down those shapely hips determinedly.

“I have my hands full enough dealing with you,” she squirmed uselessly about. “If we’re late, you’ll have to explain yourself to Dembe.”

Red lifted the slight frame, effortlessly throwing the squealing woman bodily into the air.

Liz landed into the cushy mattress, laughing her delight, “My hair is in curlers!” she fingered the rolls dancing about her shoulders, feeling for lost items.

“It isn’t your hair which interests me at this particular moment,” Red removed the offending panties, climbing onto the bed, shoving Lizzy’s legs apart.

His eyes fell to the delectable pink lips of her center.

“You’re gonna get in trouble.” she prophesied. “Dembe will be irritated with the delay.”

“He will thank me for teaching him patience.” Red unzipped his trousers, extracting his painfully enlarged cock.
“You won’t always get your way, you know.” she welcomed the man’s weight, squirming into the warmth enveloping her body.

“I will,” it was Red’s turn to prophesy, “... today.”

“Well can’t you be on time?” Silas grumbled.

Liz glanced at the guy, “And why haven’t you had your coffee yet?”

Silas lifted disgruntled eyes, “Which implies?”

Liz clamped her mouth shut, looking around innocently, sidling closer to Red.

Red didn’t, “It means you are a veritable asshole before... and oft times after, your daily caffeine fix.”

Dembe checked his watch, a critical look on the handsome face.

“We can’t leave anyway,” Red reminded peevishly ignoring Lizzy’s stifled giggle for Dembe’s mood. “Francis informed me there is a hitch holding up the contractual agreements... I have to smooth it out.”

Dembe sighed heavily, not happy with the news. But he also knew, the delay wouldn’t take long.

Red’s constituents were expecting the same old grumpy, out-of-sorts man they had contended with these last few days.

That was not the man they would see in their midst this day.

Red had a new lease on life. His patience was back. His mood mellow. His outlook clear.

The proceedings would not last long.

“What time frame are we talking about?” Liz was itching to browse a few high-end shops the hotel offered. “I need gifts for everyone.”

“My God,” Silas snapped, “everyone is here... with us. Why do you need to get them gifts?”

“Not everyone,” Liz defended herself, “Nora is home, the guys.... Samar.” she checked the guard’s reaction.

Silas fell uncharacteristically still.

Liz frowned at the man for the fact. After what Red said about the man’s infatuation, she expected something different.

“What’s going on?” Francis asked as he and Ben took a seat, dragging their plates closer.

“I believe Silas wants to go home.” Dembe intoned.

“Yeah? Why?” Francis cut his pancakes, smothering them in syrup. “And who’s this Samar?”

“A woman.” Dembe raised a knowing brow.

Red hid his smile behind his coffee cup. It was so rare Dembe needled the guard, and with so little effort.
“You want to see a chick?” Francis scowled at Ben, smacking the man’s hand away from his bacon. “When the hell did you get soft? Are you gonna eat those pancakes—”

“Shut up, Francis or I’ll stuff these pancakes up your ass!” Silas tersely advised.

“Kinky...” Francis seemed titillated by the threat, his expression saying as much.

“Why do you want to go home?” Liz asked seriously.

“I don’t want to go home.” Silas’ glare was a threat for Francis to drop the matter. “So shut the hell up about the subject, Francis.”

“She’s the one who asked?” Francis seemed confused.

“Sounds like he wants to go home to me.” Ben murmured under his breath.

“What?!” Silas demanded having heard the murmured statement.

“Nothing.” Ben returned to his toast, his expression totally neutral.

“No need to be pissy about,” Francis doused his bacon in syrup. “missing... Samar.” he mooned dreamily.

Liz’s mouth fell open.

Red halted his coffee mid-sip, shaking his head.

Ben chuckled quietly but did not once think to attempt any sort of interference, Red noted. Such was Silas’ reputation it preceded the man.

All knew to avoid confrontation if at all possible... except of course, Francis Holbrook.

Maybe the boy did have a death wish.

Silas was up and around the table in record time, his bulk lifting Francis Holbrook bodily.

Ben backed up, practically falling out of his chair to get out of the way of the guard’s wrath.

Francis instinctively grasped the fingers gripping his throat, his voice unnaturally strained as he asked the obvious.

“What the hell is wrong with you today?” he rasped roughly, not the least bit disturbed by the display. “Have you not have your coffee yet?”

The veins in the man’s neck bulged as Silas tightened his hold, intent on strangling the life from the twit.

“Silas,” Red sighed, “put him down, people are looking our way.”

Silas huffed irritably, slamming the boy back in his seat.

Francis coughed dramatically then returned to his pancakes, “You got issues, man.”

“Yeah,” Ben agreed, “issues.”

Silas stalked off in a black rage.
Liz watched him go.

Ben turned about, ensuring the man’s exit, “Women issues.” he nudged Francis knowingly.

“Who the hell is Samar?” Francis asked around his fork.

“A woman can mess with a guy’s mind...even his,” Francis rubbed his reddened neck, “that’s all I’m saying.”

Red resumed his coffee.

Liz worried after her guard, “I should talk to him, right?”

“He has a gun.” Dembe’s mouth twitched slightly for his own wit.

Ben’s good mood was back, “A big one according to him.”

“That’s his problem,” Red joined in, in high spirits after his morning with Lizzy, “he can’t use it.”

“But it’s cocked and ready.” Francis joined in the frivolity, laughing at the good line he had come up with.

Red chuckled his appreciation. Even Dembe smiled. Ben was in stitches for Silas’ dilemma.

“Oh, oh,” Francis raised his hand as if asking permission to speak, another good dig coming to mind, “but will it fire when ready?”

“You better not let Silas hear you question his virility,” Red warned. “He will kill you then.”

“You guys are horrible.” Liz threw down her napkin. “No wonder he’s in such a bad mood.” she glared at Red in particular. “You are no help at all.”

“....Baby,” Red soothed, “we’re only teasing him.”

He chuckled when the woman full on pouted and stalked off, taking the same route Silas had minutes past.

“What did we do?” Ben wanted to know.

Red smiled warmly, when she gave him one last look before turning away with a flourish, her adorable nose in the air. His eyes trailed after the woman until she met up with her guard down the way.

“If I pay for that later,” Red warned, “I’ll kill you myself.”

“Oh, Silas... that is so beautiful!” Liz had found her guard in an odd place.

She could not miss the man’s bulk, especially inside the quaint, eclectic shop he wandered into.

He stood, hands in proverbial pockets, staring moodily at one particularly lovely rendition of a female depicted in a striking pose.

The nude figure, surrounded in a moody swirl of iridescent purples was accentuated perfectly against an opaque background, the dark hair wildly disarranged and flowing.

The gorgeous profile was all she offered but the curvaceous body was both seductive and sensual.

Even Liz sensed the allure of the stained glass beauty.

“I always loved stained glass.” Liz could feel the tension in the man’s frame. She continued on, searching for a way to reach him. “I always wanted to incorporate it into the Brownstone but, there just wasn’t a perfect spot.”

She glanced at the rows and rows of different variations offered in the shop.

There were colorful butterflies, overflowing garden scenes, waterfalls which took her breath away; all gloriously imprinted into the stately lead-lined treasures.

“Oh, look...” she pointed out an interesting design, “she looks like the mermaid Red has tattooed on his arm.”

Silas stopped to glance the panel over. He merely stared at it.

“...Silas,” Liz broached the elephant in the room, “is there something I can do to help?”

Silas glanced down to the earnest eyes, returning to the mermaid at length.

Liz wracked her brain for something else to say... more effective than the feeble attempt she had just offered.

“I think Samar is... interested, if that helps.” she winced for the badly stated introduction to a sensitive subject. “What I mean to say is--”

“That one.” Silas pointed.

Liz followed the direction needed, surprised by the misdirection.

Silas had found a tall sailing ship surrounded by different hues of chipped glass in blues, greens, purple and even shades of grey; all melded together to surround the impressive ship in a turbulent and stormy sea.

“Are you... sure?” the large, startling panel took Liz by surprise. “I mean, where?” she couldn’t think of a place and then, “Oh! Red’s study!”

“When did it become his study,” Silas questioned the new development, “it’s your house.”

Liz ignored the veiled insinuation, “The window with all the sun!” she beamed happily.

Silas nodded, “He’ll see it every time his sits back in his chair.”

The more she looked at the turbulent waters, the more mesmerized she became.

“It’s almost transient... like it transports you back to another time... another era.”

“Are we redecorating?”

Both Liz and Silas gave over their attention to the new group who had arrived.

“How did you find us?” Liz greeted Red with a genuine smile.
“He’s hard to miss,” Red crooked his head to her guard. “What do we have here?”

Liz allowed Red to peruse the selection at his own time and pace.

Her selections were quite beautiful, full of color... vibrant, like their soon to be owner. Red nodded his approval.

“The meeting went well, I take it?” she hadn’t expected Red so soon.

“You should have seen it.” Francis was turning a knick-knack this way and that, upsetting the delicate structure.

“Red goes in, tosses his hat on the table, right,” Ben was excited to relate the tale, obviously.

“I’m telling this!” Francis slammed the statue down, not happy with the interruption.

“Then tell it, you idiot.” Ben urged.

Francis was happy again, “They expected they would have worn Red down after all the haggling—”

“But he wasn’t, see!” Ben couldn’t help himself.

“Hey!” Francis objected strenuously to the other man’s interference.

“Both of you two, shut the hell up.” Red rolled his eyes.

“Five percent hike across the board.” Francis beamed his pride.

“Take it or leave it, he says.” Ben was even more impressed.

“You could have heard a pin drop!” Francis took his turn.

“They want me to be civil,” Red pulled at his vest, “then they should have waited until the Santa Ana winds came through before dragging me here.” he grumbled. “I’m tired of the smog.”

“There are a hundred suppliers waiting in line for my product.” Ben practically giggled for Red’s audacity. “Maybe some new blood in the business might be just the thing.”

“It was a bluff.” Red lied but couldn’t help but enjoy Lizzy’s look of admiration.

“The man knows how to wheel and deal.” Ben stated jovially. “I’m just saying.”

“Line butter!” Francis accused.

“Get over it.” Ben scolded. “You take too long to get to the good stuff.”

“It’s not as bad as last year,” Francis reminded everybody.

“Last year?” Liz asked genuinely interested.

“There was bloodshed...” Francis painted a vivid picture of his own.

“...Mayhem..” Ben nodded knowingly.

“Tears flowed.” Francis stated emphatically.

“And you started it all.” Ben remembered as well.
“It was all a misunderstanding.” Francis defended himself.

“People got undercut.” Red told the truth of the matter. “It’s the nature of the business.”

“Except that crying jag Francis went on.” Ben shook his head. “That was so embarrassing.”

“It got me Lucinda’s number, sucker.” Francis offered a victorious smirk.

“Why are you asking?” Red enquired of Lizzy. “Are you interested in starting your own business or wondering how much profit Sugar Daddy made today?”

Liz’s answer was to bat her eyes playfully, snuggle up to the man and purse her lips suggestively. The guys got a good laugh out of her actions.

“At least she’s honest.” Francis shrugged.

“What would you know about honesty?” Ben was amazed. “You took ten bucks out of the churches collection plate.”

“I needed change dammit.” Francis reminded.

“What were you two doing in church?” Liz was mystified.

“We’ve set up a money laundering operation out of St. Peter’s over on Church Street.” Ben advised. “He left a fake ten and replaced it with real ones.”

Francis scoffed openly. “After all the money I’ve given that church, I figured they owed me.”

Red shifted Lizzy a stare, “I’ve listened to this shit for the past hour. Can’t we find a good psyche ward to place them in?” he glanced at the two, shaking his head. “You break it you buy it, Francis.”

Francis was holding up a glass panel to the light, “You know who this is?” He showed the men his find.

Liz took in the lovely honey colored hair, and full sided view of an ample breast.

The opened pose was daring, in your face kind of sexuality that was at once appealing and yet... not. At least to Liz’s way of thinking.

She mused over the fact. Was she being too critical?

“Madeline.” Ben nodded knowingly, having taken his time in the appraisal.

Silas rubbed his finger down his chiseled nose line, “The legs aren’t spread wide enough.”

“Silas!” Liz gasped her shock then found herself hard pressed to hold back a giggle. “You shouldn’t say mean things like that.”

She was absolutely shocked to see Dembe nodding thoughtfully as if he were in complete agreement with her guard’s assessment of the glass art.

“Dembe!” she truly was shocked now.

“I want this.” Red’s tone made her seek him out.

“You already have it.” Silas grumbled going off down the way.
Liz glanced after him fretfully. She needed more time with the man but the others had interrupted.

Silas was still in a pissy mood.

She didn’t like to think the man was hurting... pining after Samar.

But when did Silas ever pine after any woman?

Maybe it was something more.

“What do you think, baby?” Red held his find up for inspection.

Elizabeth dutifully examined the piece.

The nude alabaster backside of a woman with a slender build greeted Liz’s stare. Turned sensually, the woman’s wild, windswept hair allowed only a teasing glimpse of her breast and lithe frame. When held up to the light, the ethereal perception gave way to seduction.

A temptress in disguise.

It was just enchanting. Red’s taste was impeccable, as always.

Red could not stop staring at the alluring image.

“You’re not going to get that?” she whispered in a rush, checking on the other men’s positions. They all seemed suitably preoccupied, thank goodness.

“I am definitely going to get this.” Red confirmed. “It’s stunning and provocative.”

“Well yes, I know.” she agreed, her cheeks flushing with color. “Which is why I’m questioning your purchase, but...”

Did he find nothing in this female that was lacking? A tiny hint of jealousy reared its ugly head. Liz squelched it determinedly.

“This is you, Elizabeth.” he pointed a finger at it.

“It is not!” she hissed quietly, her flush increasing. “Put it down, this instant!” she tried to force the man’s arm to drop.

He looked at her, amused for her sudden awkwardness.

“The likeness is uncanny, Elizabeth.” Dembe smiled warmly at the woman. “It’s very beautiful.” he nodded his approval to Red. “A remarkable find.”

Liz gaped at the man, her embarrassment complete. Where had the man come from?

Dembe had a knack for disappearing into the woodwork at times. She thought she and Red were alone... safely ensconced from prying eyes ogling what Red found.

Red lowered his arms, quirking his brow pointedly. “Told you so.”

“Of course, he would say me!” she whispered harshly.

Dembe must have overheard the conversation.

Red shook his head, lifting another nude for Dembe’s inspection. “Who is this?”
Francis was instantly there, sensing he was needed. He screwed up his face, his eyes rolling dramatically. “That woman in Rio de Janeiro.” he grumbled.

Ben pointed assuredly, “The one on the beach that night.”

Liz looked at it again, squinting her eyes. What woman? Who were they all seeing?

“Yeah...” Silas called from across the aisle, having chimed in his opinion. “She had a set.” he seemed to approve of the fact.

Liz gasped quietly as Dembe scowled, “She was a good woman.”

“Good and ready.” Ben chuckled but all the men turned a dark scowl his way. “I just mean... she was a good sport.”

Red shrugged indifferent shoulders, placing the frame back in its place without a second thought.

“Her name,” he reminded one and all, “is and was... Renata.” was he the only one to remember what exactly happened on the beach that fateful night? How invaluable she had been.

“Well, I didn’t see the attraction.” Francis sulked.

“Francis, the reason she didn’t,” he sought out Liz, softening the tale, “seek you out is because,” he stressed, “you actually were the only one she found acceptable.”

“Thanks...” Ben disliked the implication, then second guessed his assumption. He pointed again, “Are you lying to him to placate, because I get that.”

Red ignored the man, continuing, “Renata was searching for something in us that she knew she could never find.” he placed his hand on the boys shoulder. “With you, she wasn’t so sure and she wasn’t going to take the chance.”

“Yeah,” Ben agreed readily, winking at Red, “that’s exactly what went down, Francis.”

The boy was mollified.

“Baby, how are you going to get these home?” Red questioned seriously, holding his smile when the woman looked at him in a sudden panic.

“He’s fucking with you.” Silas sighed at the woman’s face, shaking his head for gullible she could be. “You have your own plane, twirp.”

Liz lay a stilling hand to her chest, the other smacking her guard across the arm for calling her a name, “Don’t do that.” she scolded Red.

Red chuckled quietly, kissing her sad lips, “We’ll have them delivered to the airport.”

Dembe stepped forward, providing all the information needed to insure Elizabeth’s happiness remained intact.

“They must arrive without fail.” Red held his card aloft, bypassing an impatient Elizabeth, who was attempting to find her own card in the voluminous purse attached to her arm.

“I can buy my own things, you know.” she grumbled as Red signed the slip, having been faster in his efforts.
“There are other necessities,” his eyes swept her form heatedly, “upon which your money could be spent.”

She valiantly attempted to keep her stern expression in place, but knew she was failing spectacularly. She enjoyed the subtle innuendo the man suggested, and he knew as much.

Only she and Red knew of the intimate secret shared between them.

She truly appreciated the varied challenges he presented, along with his heated ‘look’.

That one remark had her thinking of all sorts of wicked things which she might purchase to... stir his interest.

She rather liked the frivolity of it all.

And Red knew that as well. The man’s mouth pursed imperceptibly, his eyes lighting, his interest piqued.

Remembering Silas’ words of wisdom, she slowly lifted her eyes to the waiting blue-green orbs watching so intently.

She sought him out, remembering each and every moment the man had touched her intimately, holding his stare stubbornly.

Red focused on the dark blue eyes, his stomach pitching pleasantly. One could never be certain what Elizabeth was thinking... but in this instance, he thought he had an inkling.

He fancied she was recalling every moment he flicked his tongue over her lithe body... but she could just as easily be vexed with him still.

Both scenarios appealed to him greatly, in truth.

His sack pooled with heat. Knowingly or not, the mysterious aura Lizzy exuded intrigued him. And he so enjoyed the woman when she was in a temper.

Though neither had outwardly emoted any sort of response... it was there. The silence spoke volumes.

Liz’s sex prickled with awareness, sensing the change in atmosphere where no one else did.

It was an empowering sensation, knowing she affected Red so much. Never in her life had she felt so sexually provocative.

Mysterious, even.

It surprised her to realize, as arousing as it was, it was equally comforting. Sharing this private moment with a partner who loved her as much as she did him.

Red stepped, slowly lowering his mouth to hers. She lifted into the affection, meeting him halfway. A sense of contentment blanketing them.

“Am I forgiven?” he murmured against her soft mouth.

Liz’s mouth pursed into a small smile, her fingers playing with the knot of his tie, “I’ll let you know... after you feed me.”
“Wouldn’t that be considered bribery?” Red countered. “Buying your,” the man’s eyes swept the body inching closer to his, “...favors.”

“Isn’t that how we happened upon this stalemate?” Liz’s eyes lit with merriment. She slid her hands under his jacket, encircling his waist as the man pulled her into his embrace.

“No,” Red’s tongue flicked about his mouth, “I only suggested you spend your money on... essentials.” the man slid his finger under her waistband, skimming the delicate lace of her panties.

Liz’s brows rose in feigned surprise, “Is that what they are?”

“They are to me...” Red husked.

“I would have thought you preferred me in nothing at all.”

“Is that an option?”

Images flooded his mind. The memory of seeing the outline of her tear-shaped breasts under his shirt and pert bottom snuggled into her tight jeans made his dick throb.

But visions of her prancing around in those cute little panties was equally captivating.

“It could be if I’m given the right incentive.” she shrugged. “Never say never.”

“You drive a hard bargain.” Red mused, enjoying the play.

“All right you two,” Silas grumbled, “let’s get this show on the fucking road already.” he bitched. “You can make eyes at one another and God knows what else... in the car.”

Red chuckled in spite of himself. Two birds with but one stone. “We’ll get you home.” Silas was assured.

Red could feel Lizzy up in the back of the car, hopefully presenting the proper incentive to lose those pesky panties they had been discussing before being rudely interrupted.

They could also get Silas to a point where the man could get himself in a better mood.

If Samar would stay as receptive as Red sensed she might be, anyway.

The day was looking brighter.
Liz felt the old familiar tinge, hiding a grimace of pain.

Damn!

_Damn and double damn_!

She knew this feeling well. She knew the signs.

Well, there was just no damned way anything was going to spoil such a happy reunion with Red. No way in hell, not when things had been going so well.

She made certain the man in question was occupied before searching out what was needed in her handbag.

“What are those?”

Liz started, recovering quickly, “Aspirin,” she frowned the lie, “being around you and Ben tends to give one a headache.”

Francis frowned right back, “Maybe it’s Silas’ constant bitching that’s doing it.” the man pointed to the front seat.

“Just drive over the bastards!” the man in question was gesturing for Dembe to make a path in the congested traffic patterns. “They’d do it to you!”

Red looked up from the papers he had been attempting to read the past few minutes, “Will you guys knock it off! I’m trying to concentrate here!” he held the papers aloft, rattling them to any and all.

Elizabeth swallowed the pills, downing them with water.

“What the hell is wrong with these people?” Silas wanted to know. “Who the hell taught them to drive?”

“Grandma Moses?” Francis smirked.

“We will arrive on time.” Dembe’s calming tone stopped the chaos... for all of two seconds.

“There’s no stopping here, you fuckwit!”

Liz looked out the window at the slowly passing scenery.
Palm trees lined the freeway they drove, their tops towering above the concrete jungle below. A local In-N-Out burger joint caught her eye.

Damn!

Well, there was one thing she couldn’t check off her bucket list this go round. It had been a goal to sample one of the famous concoctions before they left.

But then, she didn’t feel like food, anyway. Her stomach cramped and gnawed at her insides. She hoped the pills took effect quickly.

She decided not to think about it, returning her interest to the cars and buildings outside her window, absently humming “Big Yellow Taxi”.

Red grinned, hearing the tune even above Francis’ constant diatribe.

“Next time we should hold the meeting in a cool place.” he suggested.

“With a beach and cabana girls.” Ben readily agreed.

“Then Silas won’t be so upset.” Francis pointed out.

“You couldn’t get closer to Van Nuys?” Silas grumbled at Red.

“Since this was the West coast contingency,” Red spread his hands, “it seemed only logical to meet... on the West coast.” he explained to Francis and Ben.

He turned narrowed eyes to Elizabeth’s guard, “And if you wanted to leave out of Van Nuys so damn much,” he reminded in a peevish tone, “you should have landed at Van Nuys... not LAX.”

“Shit...” the guard hissed.

“So why didn’t you and save us all this bitching?” Red questioned.

“There was an emergency on the runway...” Silas remembered now, “I didn’t want to wait.”

“Which upsets Silas.” it was Francis’ turn to spread his hands.

“I’m upset all right!” Silas called from the front seat. “Colossal stupidity has that effect on me!”

The traffic crawled along at a snail’s pace beside them. The gaps between the cars non-existent. Dembe studiously watched for an opening between the cramped lanes for they needed the rapidly upcoming exit which would lead them to the waiting jet.

“These sons-of-bitches aren’t going to let us over!” Silas sensed as much. “Stop the fucking car!”

Dembe glanced over at the man even as Silas was shouldering out of the SUV’s door.

Liz’s mouth fell agape at his behavior, “Silas! What are you...”

Even Red put his papers aside to check on the guard’s intent.

The large man walked, well... okay, stormed into the next lane, stationing himself in front of the upcoming car.

Dembe took the opportunity presented, easing into the allotted slot.
The car horn blared for Silas had barred its path.

Silas slammed both hands down hard on the hood of the stylish BMW convertible he had waylaid.

Dembe, having found his space in the exit lane, now waited for their passenger to return to the car.

“Oh my God!” Liz was up, gripping the front seat as she witnessed the BMW lurch menacingly toward her guard.

Horns blared for the totally uncalled for intrusion into the established drive patterns of an L.A freeway system.

“Oh, no you don’t.” Red grasped the small waist as the woman reached for the door handle. “You’re not going out there.”

“A twenty says he hits someone before he gets back in the car.” Ben was already digging in his wallet.

“That’s a given.” Francis disdained. “I’m saying he’ll hit them more than once.”

Ben nodded agreeably to the terms.

“Stop it! He could get hurt out there!” Liz wailed. “I can calm him, Red. Let go!”

Red held steady but nodded to Francis that he agreed with the bet. He held up one finger to signify he was ‘in’ the pot.

Silas’ fury was greater than a mere one shot, he was certain.

Dembe continued to wait patiently, offering a very... very dark scowl to one particularly bothersome woman in the vehicle next to them.

She immediately backed off her horn, gulping her new found fear. She settled instantly preferring to stare straight ahead and now... patiently wait for whatever Dembe’s decision might be where the traffic snarl was concerned.

Silas kicked out a booted foot, smashing the expensive headlight of the BMW’s front.

Francis and Ben were enjoying the show tremendously if their rowdy reactions were any criteria by which to judge.

Liz cast them an annoyed glare, “Get out there and help him.”

Her words fell on deaf ears.

“Another twenty he takes out the side mirror on his way back to the car.” Francis saw opportunities abounding to make a fast buck.

Ben greedily shook the out-stretched hand offered.

“Forty.” Red knew his guard.

Liz gasped her dismay for his involvement.

Ben hesitated, “What the hell... okay, you’re on.”
“This is so exciting.” Francis could barely contain his glee.

The driver of the BMW unfolded himself out of his car, a thunderously black look of fury on his face.

The guy must have had forty pounds on Silas and stood over six feet tall.

Liz’s mouth widened further, her eyes bulging with alarm as the driver approached a now patiently waiting Silas.

He waved the fuming driver forward with mocking fingers waving aloft.

“Red! Do something...” she pleaded.

“He’ll be fine.” Red patted her shoulder lovingly, holding up two fingers to Francis, upping his wager considerably.

Liz smacked at his hand, “You are no better than those two.”

Ben and Francis were beyond censure, falling all over themselves with glee for Silas’ new-found position.

“Guy’s gonna pound his ass into the asphalt.” Ben happily predicted.

Red smirked his disbelief, “Put your money where your mouth is.”

Ben obliged more than exuberantly, “I wouldn’t have missed this for the world!”

Francis pushed him out of the way to get a better view.

“Silas!” Liz scolded. “Get back in this car, right now!”

“Hush, woman!” Francis squawked his dismay.

Silas and the BMW guy exchanged obscenities, the words filtering over sounds of planes passing overhead and the continual blaring of impatient drivers wanting to know what the hold-up could be.

The driver belligerently gestured to his smashed headlight.

Silas kicked out the other side.

Ben pointed excitedly out the window just as the driver took a swing at Silas.

“We have got to stop bringing him here to L.A.” Red nodded thoughtfully.

Francis opened the door for a better view of the proceedings just as Silas shoved hard on his nemesis’ chest, the force slamming the guy back into his own car hood.

Silas wasted no time or effort, his meaty fist coming out of nowhere to pummel the antagonist’s face with two quick, efficient punches.

The man was left dazed and confused, bloodied and more than subdued.

Silas kicked out with a swipe of his leg, taking the victim’s legs out from under him.

The BMW driver slid slowly to the pavement, doubling over in front of his once sparkling, impeccable vehicle.
Silas offered a rather vulgar departing oath, stalking back to his own waiting car. On the way, he ripped off the side mirror closest to him... and snapped the radio antenna in half.

“Yes...” Liz cheered victoriously.

Red gave her a ‘look’.

“I didn’t expect him to do that.” she confessed sheepishly.

Silas flipped off several of the honking people as he approached each individual vehicle.

The horns stopped immediately... at least the ones close enough to have witnessed the previous mishap.

“Little fucking prick.” Silas slid back into his seat, grumbling audibly. He slammed the door, rocking the car. “No damn manners in this God forsaken hell-hole.”

Ben and Francis discretely settled their wagers, big smiles on their face.

Red wiggled his fingers, wanting his fair share.

Liz’s lips tighten irritably for their behavior, “Silas, I seriously hate when you forget your afternoon coffee!”

“He’s always like this when we come here.” Francis commiserated, stuffing his winnings into his jacket pocket.

“I’m not always like this!” Silas griped. “This particular day I just happen to detest–”

“You are.” Dembe moved ahead slowly with but one glance to the once impatiently honking woman to his left.

Liz settled back, her nerves frayed, her stomach pitching sickeningly. “Silas, that man could have hurt you. Please think before you react. That’s what you’re always telling me.”

“Do as I tell you... not as I do.” he scowled. “The day some little preppy hipster like that hurts me is the day I hang up my credentials.” he promised.

“He wasn’t little.” Liz argued. “He towered over you!”

“The bigger they are... the more sound they make when they fall.” Ben quipped. “Say, are we going to get food before we board the flight? I’m starved.”

“There was an In-N-Out burger place back there.” Francis remembered.

“Yes, Francis that’s what we’ll do.” Red looked at the man oddly. “Fight this traffic to go back to a burger place.”

“It’s In-N-Out.” Ben reminded.

“There’s food in the private lounge and on the plane.” Red snapped. “Shut up, both of you. You’re getting on my nerves.”

A sharp pain pierced Liz’s abdomen, she winced retroactively.

“We’re not doing this.” she reminded herself sotto voce but... Red had heard and misinterpreted,
“I know baby but... Jesus,” he snipped, “I’ve been with these two idiots all morning. Cut me some slack, huh?” he adopted a pout.

She forced a smile, “I thought more people were joining us.” she hastily changed the subject. “Didn’t Dembe say that Michael guy was coming back with us?” she glanced at the occupants. “And for that matter... where is Joe?”

Why hadn’t she noted his absence before this? Oh yeah, right. The period from hell was sucking the life energy from her. She hated this time of the month, always had. This one more than others.

“Will they meet us at the airport?”

“Michael wanted to meet you formally... but had to leave out directly after the negotiations ended.” Red apologized. “He offered Joe a flight so he could get back to the house for security measures... make certain everything was in place for our arrival.”

Dembe pulled alongside the waiting jet before he and Silas disembarked the vehicle, both vigilant of the surrounding area before opening the back doors.

Francis and Ben poured from the vehicle, both rushing for the private concourse in search of vending machines and other foodstuffs, leaving Dembe and Silas to direct the porters handling their luggage.

“So Hunter and David caught the same ride?” she assumed. “With Michael, I mean.”

“Mark has taken Hunter on as his head of security.” Red relayed. “Same as Silas, only not on so grand a scale.”

“No one is quite the same as me.” Silas reminded everyone present.

Dembe rolled his eyes expressively for the statement as Red escorted Lizzy up the stairs, his hand protectively on her back.

She pulled up short a few steps up, stifling a gasp as pain shot through her frame, her fingers tightening on the guardrail.

“...What is it?” Red was instantly solicitous. His eyes searched her face for any telltale signs of distress but Lizzy hid it well.

“I almost twisted my ankle,” she frowned at the proceeding step. “I hate these shoes.”

“Kick them off when you get inside.” he smiled down at her. “You can relax.”

She nodded, “That sounds... really great.”

They proceeded, both taking their customary seats once situated on the plane.

Red grinned when the woman pulled her laptop free of its satchel.

He knew Lizzy was hoping to take her mind off the lift-off which still scared the shit out of her were she honest with herself.

Noticing his interest, she tried to pass it off, saying she had to catch up on her work... but he knew
She studiously studied the screen even now, blocking out all else.

How anyone could block out the ruckus Ben and Francis were causing, was anyone’s guess.

Red sent them an annoyed glare but they ignored him as was their way. He couldn’t be too cross with them, they gifted Lizzy with her favorite snacks upon their return.

“Those are mine.” Ben pointed to a bag of Cheeto’s, Francis placed in his pile of goodies on the surface between the seats.

“I bought some too, loser!” Francis bitched.

Ben searched about, “Oh, yeah,” his smile returned having found the wayward bag, “here they are. The red Kool-Aid is mine, freak.”

Francis wasn’t happy, but he reluctantly settled for the blue Kool-Aid.

Red grimaced at all the junk food. He didn’t mind an occasional Twinkie, who did... but all that stuff constituted a sugar rush from hell in his opinion.

Those two were hyper enough without added assistance.

And why?

“You had a plethora of gourmet cuisine to choose from in the private longue,” Red waved over their bounty, “and you pick this?”

“We grabbed a couple sliders,” Francis protested, “we’re not completely gauche, you know.”

“Oh, yeah...” Ben dug around in his bag, coming up with treats for Dembe and Silas before tossing Red a bag of chips and a Twinkie.

Red caught the unexpected projectile, shrugging.

Liz’s mouth pursed, holding her smile as Red kicked back in his seat and popped open the bag as both finally enjoyed the blessed silence which fell as the plane started to taxi down the runway.

Once they were airborne... Red chuckled, patting the hand squeezing the ever living hell out of his.

“You did better this time.” Red praised, as he peeled the woman’s fingers from his forearm.

“Yeah, you didn’t draw blood.” Francis cackled from across the aisle, stuffing a Tootsie Pop in his mouth. Ben shared the good-natured joke at Liz’s expense.

Liz shook the blood back into her fingers, grimacing apologetically at Red... and for the fact she left crescent shaped nail marks on the man.

Sighing for the unnecessary crack, Red rolled his eyes towards Francis and Ben, “Is everything moving?”

He had noted both men had instantly picked up their phones the minute they were airborne, falling into ‘business mode’.

Francis lifted the phone away from his mouth, “I’m on with Warsaw now.” he pulled a face. “Why do they talk so funny?”

Ben covered his mouthpiece, “Caracas is moving but...” the man took a quick sip of his drink, “you may want to have a little chat with that bitch, Alessio.” he uncovered the phone, reading off the manifest he had been supplying to the other end.

Red scowled at the man and Francis, “Genoa, Alessio?”

Francis nodded, half-listening to his end of things, “He wants to wait ‘til morning to deliver,” he cocked his brow, “... has a hangover.”

Red’s jaw worked irritably, shaking his head, “Excuse me, sweetheart.” he apologized, pulling his own phone free.

Liz smiled wanly, going back to her laptop. This part? She was used to.

It took only minutes to establish contact with Alessio.

The man was obviously still drunk, his slurred responses to Red’s clipped statements pissing Red off royally.

Red snapped the phone shut, gathering his cool before putting through another call. It took only minutes to work his own particular brand of magic.

With one short phone call, he aligned himself with Alessio’s competition, which ensured the Genoa shipments were en route to their various destinations.

To further provoke the drunken imbecile who could not handle the task assigned him, Red also secured Alessio’s crew employment... with Gian.

Red and Dembe checked off one shipment after another, confirming their quantity and payments received. Even working in tandem, it took quite a while to accomplish the deed.

Red groaned, stretching his back and neck to work the kinks free, surprised to find almost two hours had passed. While it had taken longer than he wanted, it was done, meaning the rest of the day was free to spend with Elizabeth.

“I’m assuming Gian was pleased with the unexpected windfall to come his way?” Francis grinned, setting his own phone aside.

“He seemed to appreciate the opportunity presented.” Red sighed wistfully as he drank the last of his rich liquor. “I’ve warned Alessio before to curb his... extracurricular activities, or there would be consequences.”

Red pushed from his seat, heading to the bar for a refill just as Silas emerged from the private bathroom near the back of the plane.

“This incident,” Red murmured, stilling the guard in his tracks, taking an opportunity himself, “with Lizzy and the Cleaner–”

“It was handled.” Silas snapped quietly.

“Oh?” Red smiled pleasantly, never a good sign. “Now tell me the gory details.”

“If you’re thinking Liz was in the wrong–”
“I’m not thinking anything,” Red clarified, “until... I get the details.”

“That bitch had it coming, talking to Liz like she did.” Silas lifted his chin defiantly.

Red’s brow furrowed, “I thought Lizzy was defending you?”

Silas settled a tad, sighing lightly, “Yeah, well...” he sing-songed his head, “my contention is with the bitch Cleaner who didn’t even bother to hide her contempt for Liz.”

“Why the hell would this woman take such a stand?” Red wanted to know. “Who the hell does she think she is?”

“The Cleaner believed she and Kaplan had a ‘thing’,,” Silas air quoted, “and could get away with talking to Liz like any of us other lower life forms.”

“What the hell was said exactly?” Red’s temper flared.

“Talked to Liz like she was your...” Silas searched for a proper term, “mistress...and not much more.”

“To which you replied.” Red demanded.

“I didn’t have a chance.” Silas grinned slowly, recalling the incident clearly in his mind, “Liz ripped her a new ass.”

“That’s when Kate came into the picture, I assume?”

“Not much was said there.” Silas was disgruntled over that fact. “Kaplan assumed the rest, I’m sure. She’s very intuitive. Liz stuck to her guns though. She didn’t back down.”

“So...” Red studied the man’s body language, “you approve? How Lizzy handled–”

“Damn right I do.” Silas defended the woman’s actions, before clarifying his thought on the matter. “So whatever Kaplan said–”

“I haven’t spoken with Kate.”

Silas’ brow furrowed.

“You don’t have to defend Elizabeth’s actions to me.” Red said. “She is aware of my unwavering support.”

Silas frowned, “Then what’s the problem, ‘cause I sense one.”

“That is what I am trying to ascertain.” Red tilted his head questioningly. “Is there a problem?”

Silas’ frown deepened, then realization dawned, “Liz is right,” he grumbled, “this talking in riddles shit is fucking annoying.”

Red huffed his amusement as he took a sip from his tumbler.

“I had no issue with her taking charge, if that’s what you’re asking.” Silas deduced. “She handled it better than I was going to, if you want the truth.”

“Lizzy views you as her,” Red thought how to phrase it, “... confidant.”
“We’ve hit a rhythm,” Silas nodded that he was following along.

“So there are no problems of which I should be made aware?” Red schooled his expression, “Do you have any issues with Elizabeth that need to be addressed.”

The large guard scowled, “What the hell is that supposed to mean?”

“Most men in your position, with your experience... and ego,” Red rolled his tongue, “wouldn’t appreciate being... subordinate to a female Elizabeth’s age.”

“Ah, that’s fucking bullshit.” Silas narrowed his eyes expressively. “And I am not subordinate with Liz... it’s not like that!”

Red shrugged, “With some women—”

“She ain’t like that.” Silas reiterated... strongly.

Red breathed easier when the guard snapped to Liz’s defense so quickly. While he supported Elizabeth without question, he needed to know where Silas stood.

“I’ve got her back, she’s got mine...” Silas jerked a thumb towards the woman. “Liz has proven herself. She doesn’t need you interceding on her behalf. If she has a problem with me... she’ll let me know in no uncertain terms.”

Red held up a stilling hand, easing the man’s quick temper, “That’s all I needed to know.”

Silas’ jaw pulsed with agitation, but he nodded sharply after a moment, “Are you gonna call, Kaplan?”

“Why should I?”

“I think Kate got the hint.” Silas confirmed he agreed with the assessment. “Liz was... terse.”

“Then, no,” Red shook his head, “Lizzy handled it just fine.”

Saving her work files, Liz vaguely listened to Francis and Ben bitching about everything under the sun before closing down her laptop.

Grimacing painfully, she shoved the computer aside, curling up in her seat.

“Lizzy?” Francis’ smile fell away, a frown pulling at his mouth. He had noted her quietness. “You okay?”

Red looked away from his conversation with Silas, instantly focusing on the woman.

Nodding silently, Liz curled further into the seat, tightening her forearms about her stomach.

This was going to be a bad one. She readied herself for the onslaught as best she could.

Red watched her lean heavily into the wall, laying her forehead against the cool window.

“Elizabeth,” Red walked the few feet, leaning over the woman, “what’s wrong?”

Red’s scowl tightened, watching the woman tense with each passing second. Her lovely face suddenly contorted with pain.
“The damn pills aren’t working.” her clipped tone spoke of her discomfort.

Grabbing his bag, Red rifled through the contents for his pain pills, cursing under his breath. He reached for Lizzy’s carry-on which yielded the same results, though more caustic language followed.

“I didn’t think to bring the others you gave me at home.” she cursed her own stupidity.

“Baby,” he approached the now trembling woman, “is this a bad one?”

“I’ll be okay.” she grimaced. “Maybe if I just... lay here and die.” she tried to smile and failed.

She was very embarrassed to sense five pairs of male eyes fixated on her.

“It’s okay, guys.” she strived for brightness. “It’s just a ‘woman’ thing... go back to your gambling, cussing and—” a pain caught her words, taking the breath from her body, “debauchery, I’ll be fine.”

Red’s eyes closed, empathizing with such bravado.

“I’ve got Vicodin.” Silas volunteered.

Ben shrugged helplessly, “I have some muscle relaxers.”

“Would some gummy bears help?” Francis’ expression was so genuine, Elizabeth couldn’t bear to disappoint him.

“Yes, Francis,” her smile was gentle, “you know I can’t resist gummy bears.”

“Get them.” Red snapped.

All three men headed for their respective bags to gather the required items.

Her expression altered with the men’s departure, “Red...” Liz whispered painfully, halting the man in his steps, “do we have a heating pad... or something of that nature lying around somewhere?”

Red shot Dembe a questioning look. He had no idea what equipment was on the plane.

“Raymond...” Dembe stepped up, holding a heating pad they kept on board. Normally it was used to ease the ache of injuries... now, Red hoped it would ease Lizzy’s suffering.

Plugging it into the nearest outlet, his eye ticked irritably when it wouldn’t reach the woman.

Understanding the man’s dilemma, Francis vacated the couch, giving over the space readily.

“...Be useful,” Red snapped, gesturing to an overhead compartment.

Francis held his smile. Only Lizzy could get the man so riled up in such a short amount of time. It was rare to see this caring... loving side of Red Reddington. It felt like eons since he had seen a glimpse of this Red. And never to this extent.

Opening the needed portal, Francis hesitated in his movements. Well, these were new.

The blankets and pillows Red always kept on hand were of the upmost quality, but different designs catering to the masculine side.

These however, were incredibly plush and lilac with the most luxurious satin trim Francis had ever felt.
If it hadn’t been for the large size, he would have assumed they were baby blankets. The fabric was so cozy. He shook away the trivial thought, unfurling blankets to make a comfortable space for Lizzy.

Silas tossed the pills Red’s way, the man catching the bottle mid-air. He was relieved to hear the rattle of several pills. More than enough to get Lizzy comfortable.

His stress level dropped considerably knowing her relief was on the horizon.

Red headed back for Lizzy but Silas pulled him up short, “You should cut those in half.”

“She’s in pain.” Red gritted.

Dembe’s eyes softened on his friend, understanding Raymond’s distress, “They will take down an elephant, Raymond. Listen to reason.”

The large man took the pills, “I will half these, you help get Elizabeth situated.”

Red nodded sharply, doing as suggested, glad to have something with which to busy himself. He felt so damned useless.

“Come on, baby.” Red soothed, offering his hands to aid the woman to rise.

Liz turned slowly, taking a controlling breath, “...I’m sorry.” she repeated, taking in all the men standing about. “This is so stupid...”

Red shook his head, waving off the unwarranted apology. His heart ached for the woman staring so forlornly up at him as she slowly eased from her seat.

Taking her hand, Red steadied the woman as she stood upright. Liz instantly knew she had made a huge mistake, the motion convulsing her system sickeningly. Liz gripped his hand tightly.

He scowled, canting his head, looking worriedly at the small woman.

She swallowed convulsively, “...R-Red...” closing her eyes to the sinking feeling overtaking her.

“Shit...” Red grasped her in his hold sensing the problem. He rushed her towards the back, just getting Lizzy over the toilet when the woman lost the battle.

Smoothing her hair back, Red glanced over his shoulder, stretching for a washcloth. He cursed vehemently, unable to reach it or the sink from his present position.

“I got it.” Ben bypassed Red, running cool water over the needed item before handing it over.

Silas stepped in the doorway, holding a bottle of water, “...I’ll get the nausea pills.”

“Yes, quickly” Red snapped, taking the items handed him before placing the cool cloth on Lizzy’s neck as she heaved helplessly.

Blotting Lizzy with a cold cloth, he searched the men’s faces, “Where the hell did Dembe–”

“...I’m sorry.” Liz cried. She gripped the bowl once more, overtaken by the horrific urge to vomit.

“Shh, baby...” Red soothed, taking the new cloth Ben handed him.
“We are two hours out.” Dembe relayed, he and Silas holding down the aisle outside the bathroom door.

“Dammit...” Red sighed his discontent. “Tell Edward to find a suitable place. We’ll be landing—”

“...No,” Liz moaned miserably, laying her forehead against her arm, “it’s fine... just go home.”

“Lizzy,” Francis chided, “we can stop for the night. It’s not a problem.”

“It’s only a couple hours.” Liz shook her head wearily. “I need to be... home.”

Silas stepped up, handing over the required medication to Red.

Red crouched beside the woman, tenderly brushing her hair back. The soft strands stuck to her flush face. He noted small beads of perspiration tracked down her temples.

“Take these, baby.” he gently wiped her face, his own expression pained for what was reflected back in her beautiful eyes. “They will help.”

Liz had her doubts they would stay down, but she took the pills in hand.

“You might feel a little drowsy.” he warned, steadying the water bottle in her clammy palms.

She shrugged carelessly, gratefully popping the medicine into her mouth, “Its gotta be better than this shit.”

“Lizzy,” his jaw tightened, “let’s stop for the night.” he agreed with Francis’ evaluation of the problem.

“We’re not that far out...” she smiled tremulously. “The pills will kick in soon.”

Liz braced her hand on the wall as the others vacated the area, allowing the couple room to maneuver. Red eased her slowly off the floor.

Red flushed the toilet while Liz gratefully rinsed her mouth of the acidic taste.

She took two steps, leaning heavily into the wall as a stabbing sensation ripped through her body. Painful jolts shot down her legs into her toes as a molten lava settled in her ovaries.

“I hate this shit.” she snapped her frustration. “I hate it!”

She sighed blissfully when Red’s large palm lay over the menace, his heat permeating her body.

“Come, lay down.” he gestured to the prepared bed.

Any other time, she might have balked over Red’s hovering but right now... he was a wonderful distraction and... she admittedly enjoyed him babying her a little.

It was a stark contrast to how Tom avoided her like she had the plague at this time of the month.

Red situated the woman in the comfortable spot provided. Liz felt a little better already.

Dembe slid the partition closed, allowing them a modicum of privacy. Red made certain she was comfortable.

“I think the worst has passed, Red.” Liz said. “You don’t have to stay with me.” she knew he probably had more business dealings to complete.

“No.” Red shook his head once, dimming the lights.

“You are so stubborn.” she sighed.

“...Yes.” he agreed, laying down beside her. “...Rest.” he leaned, kissing her temple.

“Have I told you guys,” Liz yawned, “how much I love you?”

Red’s mouth tugged at the corner, “Just relax, let the pills take effect. You’ll feel better soon.”

She snuggled into his embrace, getting lost in the large hand soothingly rubbing her back.

“You’re an okay guy Red Reddington.” she murmured sleepily. “And I appreciate the hell out of you.”

A light drizzling rain greeted their arrival at the airport. A rain which increased to epic proportions as they neared the house.

Red cursed as the already torrential downpour and wind rocked the car as Dembe eased the SUV into alignment with the front door.

Removing his jacket, Red wrapped it about Lizzy’s shoulders. Nora and Joe waited at the front door, ready.

The bulky guard carelessly stepped into the driving rain, holding an enormous umbrella for their exit.

Red craned his neck, his eyes meeting Joe’s as he approached the door.

The hairs on the back of his neck stood straight up, a sixth sense kicking in.

Something wasn’t right.

Outside the rain sheeted window, Joe stopped fully in his tracks, his eyes scanning the stormy skies.

Silas hauled his bulk hastily from the front seat, fluidly reaching to open the back door. His body blocked any unseen threats.

Hooking Lizzy’s legs, Red eased her into his lap, as he turned in the seat. His arms lifted her effortlessly.

“No,” the woman pushed weakly on his chest, “I can walk.”

He could not take the time to explain the unexplainable. He sensed the danger. He sensed how to prevent any calamity befalling the woman.

Bundling her within the confines of his own body would shield her from the cross-hairs he felt trained on their position.

“Please let me walk.” she sighed, sensing a losing battle, however.

“Hush...” he kissed her brow.

Silas signaled with his hand that everyone was in position and ready.
Joe offered the umbrella as a shelter from the elements, and as a deterrent from any would be snipers trajectory. As added caution, his own body also shielded the two emerging occupants.

Readjusting his hold, Red was surprised when the woman offered no further resistance what-so-ever. That Lizzy remained silent and snuggled into his embrace... bespoke of how horrible she felt.

Stepping out, Red quickly made his way alongside the guards. He faltered in his steps, a chill running up his back.

Shaking off the sensation quickly, he tightened his hold on Lizzy stepping into the foyer within seconds.

And out of sight of the eyes that trailed after them.
