Bill turned, as did Fiddleford, to watch Ford’s friends approach, Bill picking his teeth with the corn dog’s skewer. He gave an unimpressed glance to Susan, disliking the woman on principle for her continual fawning over Sixer, and jabbed Ford’s palm roughly with his fingernail, noticing the way Ford had stuffed their hands out of sight immediately. So much for being open.

“Mmm.” Ford grimaced, and squeezed Bill’s fingers in retaliation, before he smiled politely at Suzie, Willow, and Dan. “Fiddleford wanted to come see the carnival before it rolled out of town, and since the weather cleared, it was the perfect opportunity.”

“Oh, that weather was somethin’ else wasn’t it?” Suzie gushed. “It was about all you could hear in the diner, it just came crashing down all of a sudden. Drowned out my favourite song on the radio. All the lumberjacks came in soaked to the bone!”

“We were out workin’ when it happened.” Dan extrapolated. “Craziest thing. Branches snapped off the trees, lightning struck about an inch away from Stewart, he nearly damn died. It just came outta nowhere.”

“Sure was strange.” Suzie nodded.

“Those two were down in the lab, they missed seein’ it happen.” Fiddleford chimed in. “I was out fixin’ the dryer, it was bizarre. Our backyard’s good fer swimmin’ in now, I tell you what.”

Bill seemed more than a little smug now, listening to the conversation.
Willow, who had been staring intently at Bill, spoke up finally, her tone as suspicious as she was. “It was an incredibly destructive thunderstorm. I have a vegetable garden out back by my cabin, and it looked like all the pumpkins and vegetables and other fruits had been trampled. If I hadn’t seen the rain come down myself I wouldn’t have believed it wasn’t some kind of animal, ruining my garden.”

“Oh.” Ford frowned seeming somewhat taken aback. “I wasn’t aware the storm had such consequences.”

“Oh the plus side, at least it got all the rain over with before the funfair left. I wouldn’t want to miss out on pig racin’.” Fiddleford added, enthusiastically. “I ain’t been to a pig race in forever.”

“They have pig racin’ here?” Susan cooed. “I had a pet pig growin’ up, with his little curly tail. Mr Oinker’s, I called him. Pigs are messy though, cats are much better.”

“I ain’t seen you around much lately.” Dan said, fixing Stanford with a piercing stare. “You haven’t been in town?”

“I’ve seen you.” Willow said, still glaring at Bill. “In the forest.”

“Oh? You did?” Ford asked, looking almost anxious, as the last time he was in the forest he was covered head to toe in unicorn glitter and uproariously drunk.

When Willow merely stared at Ford, Ford cleared his throat and hurried to present an explanation. “That was an expedition, just a little field study in the forest. There are marvellous things in there, you know. Plenty to study.”

“Oh, I bet.” Willow said bluntly, still regarding both Ford and Bill with suspicion.

Ford cleared his throat again, and tried to change the subject. “So, uh, what brings you to the carnival today?”

“What else is there to do around here?” Willow huffed and crossed her arms, tucking her gloved hands under her armpits for warmth. Dan put his arm around her shoulders, rubbing her sleeve.

“Don’t see many shows like this these days. There used to be more, my Ma tells me. Said it was the American pastime, going to freak-shows and funfairs when they hit town.” Dan shrugged, his eyes trailing over to the food stand behind F, reading the menu. “Mostly I just come for the food. The strength testers aren’t bad, if you’re bored. I ain’t never met a strong man at one of these who made for bad company. Beats going to the Skull Fracture for a drink.”

“I got one of the programs from the man in the funny hat, back there.” Suzie said, pulling the program out of her purse, unfolding it and pointing to the various listings. “They’ve got all sorts of curio’s you can buy, and these weird animals on exhibit from across the seas. It says here they’ve found the missing link between humans and angels, golly. That’s exciting.”

“Oh please. The missing link?” Ford interjected, unable to help himself.

“Ford’s pretty sceptical about all this.” Fiddleford explained. “Freak-show hooey.”

“It’s the same philandering nonsense they’ve been touting since the 18th century. Parading disfigurement and anomalies and different cultures and races as the ‘missing link’ between humanity the way they see it, and the way it just so happens to be for the rest of the world. It’s nonsense.” Ford scoffed, tucking his scarf around his neck as he spoke. “Absolute slander designed to prey on those too stupid to recognise it.”

“I thought them little animals were funny.” Suzie said in a quiet voice, a little hurt by Ford’s vehemence.

“Well of course you would.” Bill commented, sending a catty glare Suzie’s way. “Clearly you’re the victim here.”

“Hey, what’s that supposed to mean? You back off her, you hear?” Willow snapped at Bill, confrontation dancing in her eyes.

Ford raised both of his hands in the air, attempting to diffuse the situation. “I’m sure he didn’t mean anything by it, everyone calm down.”

Ford’s attempt to mitigate the situation was derailed, as when he pulled his hand out of his pocket to soothe the tensions between his friends, Bill didn’t let go of his hand, stubbornly holding on.

Ford seemed to realise several beats after the fact that everyone was staring at his right hand, Bill’s arm dangling casually, their fingers still laced together. So much for keeping things quiet.

“Oh.” Suzie said, blinking at the gesture of affection.

Hastily Ford stuffed both his and Bill’s hand back in his pocket, but the damage had been done.

“I didn’t realise –“ Suzie started.

“Don’t be – there isn’t anything to talk about. What else did you want to see at the funfair?” Ford asked, trying desperately to change the subject while under the unbending scrutiny of Willow and Dan.

He struggled to keep his expression sincere, as Bill was squeezing his fingers in a punishing grip, clearly not impressed about being brushed aside as nothing.

“Oh, well, uh –“ Suzie seemed to stumble over her words for a moment, stuttering, trying to find something to say that would smooth this whole embarrassing ordeal over. There was nothing worse than accidentally butting heads with the partner of the guy you’ve had a crush on forever. That wasn’t Suzie’s intention. She was a sweet girl who truly just wanted to get along with everyone. “There’s, uh, a fortune teller that might –“

“Dan’s hanging out with the queers now, boys.” A loud voice interrupted as a group of lumberjacks who worked down on the Northwest’s property, rugged up in their flannel with cups of beer in their hands, strode towards the group, bearing the sort of swagger that signalled trouble. “Guess we know who your new friends are, Corduroy. Is there something you’re not telling us?”

Fiddleford blanched, and looked across to Ford, who seemed frozen to the spot, the taunts of the bullying lumberjacks shocking him tense. Distantly Ford realised that these lumberjacks didn’t seem to be lashing out at him, more at Dan for some reason, but he still reeled, his brain disassociating in the moment, shocked that it only took a moment’s openness to be branded what his high school bullies had thrown at him on the regular.

Dan clenched his jaw, and flexed his arms, his hands closing into fists at the insult, stepping forward only for Willow to squeeze his arm, looking up at him intently.
Dan exhaled and unwound a little with Willow’s help, before sticking his chin up, being the bigger person. “I ain’t got nothin’ to say to you Dawson Peters. Just walk away.”

“Aww, walk away?” Dawson, the ringleader, laughed and elbowed his friends. “Not like you to turn down a fight Dan. Unless you’ve really got it twisted now. You and your bum buddies don’t go toe to toe like a real man, do you?”

Bill noticed the way this Cro-Magnon’s taunts seemed to draw Sixer more and more into himself, his shoulders curling over.

Despite being a grown man, with the ability to defend himself sufficiently, the courage to battle monsters, and the recklessness required to fling himself skywards in order to knock a raging Gremloblin out of the air with a single blow, Ford seemed to shrink inwards, and revert to the insecure kid he was back in high school where he’d heard this whole song and dance before.

The difference was back in high school he could convince himself that these taunts didn’t apply to him, but now that he’d succumbed to his desires, and was standing beside the man he’d chosen to pursue, he felt every flyaway insult hit its mark cruelly.

“You wanna leave right now, before I do something you’ll regret, in front of my lady.” Dan growled, stepping up into Dawson’s space, cracking his knuckles menacingly.

“That’s right, you’re whipped by Red now. Isn’t that right?” Dawson leaned around Dan to peer at Willow, flicking his fingers at her, waving. “How’s it goin’ sweet cheeks? You ever get tired of bossing Dan here around, you just give me a call doll.”

“Drop dead Dawson.” Willow gritted her teeth and glared at Dawson, still pulling on Dan’s arm, trying to drag him away from this confrontation. Suzie stood behind her, fretting over this hostility, looking between Dawson, Dan, and Ford, who still seemed shell-shocked about the whole scenario.

“Fiery redhead. Sounds about right, from what I’ve heard about you, and I’ve heard stories.” Dawson guffawed, but staggered back as Dan pushed him, roughly shoving his chest. “Woah, woah, woah. I thought we were all playing nice here. You know, like buddies.”

“I am not your buddy.” Dan growled.

“Dan, stop!” Willow urged him, tugging on his arm again. “He isn’t worth it.”

Dan seemed to struggle for a moment, reigning in his temper, before he agreed with Willow. “You’re right, he ain’t.” Dan turned his back on Dawson and his crew, making to walk away.

Dawson seemed to wrestle with the insult there, not getting the reaction he wanted out of Dan. Curling his fists tight, he yelled out, still trying to provoke him.

“Fine, walk away. You’d rather waste your time licking your girl’s boots, hanging out with these namby losers. Too good for us now your lady’s spent busting your balls. I see how it is. Now here you are hanging out with faggots and freaks. Guess the freak-show was in town all along.” Dawson gestured to Ford and Bill for emphasis. “And Corduroy’s along for the ride.”

Bill could see the outrage slowly creep into Sixer’s expression. This idiot seemed to be hitting all of Sixer’s sensitive spots, all in a misguided attempt to get back at his friend, and while Bill could see the merit in some good old fashioned escalation, sorely tempted to take a pound of flesh for himself here, he could tell that wasn’t what Sixer needed right now, so instead he aimed for brevity, and elbowed Sixer lightly.
“Looks like the missing link between man and pig here got out of his cage.”

Everyone seemed to freeze for an instant, Bill’s voice a little too loud for a secretive aside.

Startled out of his outrage by the comment, looking at Bill in surprise, a laugh snuck out past Ford’s lips, before he stopped himself, noticing that Dawson’s crew were all now looking at them, whereas before they could have been part of the scenery, simply something to insult as a side note to stir Dan’s ire.

The colour drained from the boorish man’s face. Clearly Dawson didn’t expect them to speak up, least of all to laugh at him.

“What did you say to me?”

Bill squeezed Ford’s hand in reassurance this time, before he smiled at Dawson, one of his wide, giddy, dangerous smiles.

“Oh, I was just saying that if I wanted to see evolution go backwards I’d go to a museum, but since seeing you, why bother?”

Fiddleford’s jaw dropped, watching Bill with something akin to awe. Backupsmore University wasn’t well funded enough to allow much scientific superiority on campus, so seeing someone tear down this jock archetype with scathing scientific insults was like watching Carl Sagan suplex Muhammed Ali.

“The hell did you just say to me?” Dawson narrowed his eyes and stepped towards Bill slowly, like he was sizing him up.

“You’re like a walking talking exhibit on why not to eat lead paint, I swear. It’s hilarious. I’m guessing cognitive impairment’s at play too, since you’ve asked me the same question twice now. Did your mother just hate you, or is there some other reason you were dropped on the floor repeatedly as a child. What, was she joining the basketball team?”

“What the hell did you just say to me, you little fruit?” Dawson strode up to Bill, getting right up in his space, trying to loom menacingly over the other man, perturbed by the fact that Bill just kept on smiling.

“You’re like a walking talking exhibit on why not to eat lead paint, I swear. It’s hilarious. I’m guessing cognitive impairment’s at play too, since you’ve asked me the same question twice now. Did your mother just hate you, or is there some other reason you were dropped on the floor repeatedly as a child. What, was she joining the basketball team?”

“Maybe I’m not speaking plainly enough for you.” Bill held his hand up beside his face like he was whispering a secret to Dawson, though he didn’t lower his voice at all. “The exhibit for World’s Most Pathetic Man is that way, and I can only assume you’re on the clock. Newsflash buddy. Your coffee break is over. The crowds are waiting.”

“That’s it.” Dawson pressed his lips together in a thin line, and raised his fist, hefting it back like he was readying a punch. “That’s it, you –“

Before he could finish his sentence with whatever ignorant epithet he was looking for, Ford’s fist came flying out, socking Dawson right in the jaw with a left hook so flawless it would make his father proud.

Dawson fell down, smack, onto the still wet ground, mud tarnishing his clothing. He brought his hand up to cradle his jaw gingerly, and spat out blood onto the grass.

His cronies hovered impotently around him, looking to Dawson for direction, not knowing what to do when someone, someone like Stanford, refused to be bullied.
They seemed to be reassessing his form and stature, noticing the confident way he threw that punch, and the broad set of his shoulders. Despite the glasses and the intellect, Stanford was no longer a gangly geek. His physique was imposing in its own way, he could clearly hold his own in a fight. In short, he was nothing to sneeze at.

“He mad the me bit my thongue.” He announced somewhat redundantly, his newly acquired speech impediment saying everything.

Bill looked gleefully between Dawson laid out in the mud, and Sixer who was shaking his wrist, flexing his fingers out, gradually looking more assured of himself, eventually grinning briefly at Bill.

Bill beamed back.

Dan leaned forward to give Ford a friendly punch in the arm. “Nice one, mate.”

“I can’t believe you just did that.” Willow said, impressed.

“That was amazing!” Suzie gushed.

“Where was that at university, huh?” Fiddleford joked, and clapped Ford on the back, the group of them beginning to turn away from Dawson and his cronies, moving on to enjoy the fair, leaving Dawson behind in the mud.

As Ford modestly accepted the accolades of his friends, he felt a warm sort of acceptance that he hadn’t felt in a long time. Like he was truly a part of things here, like he was welcomed, that he was being himself and that was okay. He felt Bill’s hand, still warm in his pocket, fingers laced steadfast with his own six digits, and he felt so grateful and happy with everything that had led him to this point, that led him to be here with the people around him.

With Bill.

He squeezed Bill’s hand and smiled at him, before bringing his hand out of his pocket to proudly hold Bill’s hand, not caring who saw. Bill was right, no one else’s opinion mattered, the people he cared about didn’t have any issue with Ford’s sexuality.

Dawson’s friends were helping pick their ringleader up, out of the mud, and holding his jaw, Dawson shouted out after them.

“Thisth isn’t over!”

Dawson’s lisping retorts were lost to the crowd, Ford and the rest of the group ignoring him, walking away, chatting happily without a backward glance.

“Behold, ladies and gentlemen! A freak of the natural world! The Crabbit!”

The crowd oooh-ed, enthralled, milling around the display, pressed elbow to elbow eager to spectate the mysterious Crabbit.
Ford was towards the back of the crowd, holding his journal and pen out, craning his neck to try to see past the throng of onlookers, wanting to see the Crabbit for himself.

“Behold, it’s claws!”

“I can’t see it from here.” Ford complained, leaning this way and that, trying to see the creature on display.

“It’s really quite cute.” Fiddleford remarked, his height allowing him to peer through a lady’s elbow, looking at the creature.

“Swap places with me.” Ford demanded, trying to edge Fiddleford out of the way. “I can’t see anything from where I’m standing.”

“I’m still lookin’, you can draw somethin’ else while you wait.” F shoved kettle corn in his mouth, enjoying the way waiting made Ford’s nose wrinkle. “Maybe draw that lady, her hat sure is somethin’ special.”

“I’m not here to draw hats, Fiddleford.” Ford replied somewhat testily, still struggling for a decent vantage point.

“Behold! It’s little ears.”

The crowd let out a collective ‘d’awww’ and some polite applause, which only served to further incise Ford.

“I think the hat lady is looking at you.” Bill smirked, chomping through his own paper bag full of kettle corn, seasoned with the little bottle of sriracha Sixer kept in his coat pocket for Bill’s hot sauce related emergencies. Like Fiddleford, Bill also liked the way Ford’s eyebrow twitched indignantly at the thought of drawing something he didn’t intend to study.

Ford tsked and elbowed Fiddleford out of the way, bending down to try to look at the Crabbit. “Move.”

“It’s so cuuuuuute. Look at its little nose twitch.” Suzie cooed, smiling at the oddity.

Finally catching a glimpse at the Crabbit, Ford found himself woefully disappointed.

“Is that it?”

“What exactly were you expectin’ Stanford?” Fiddleford asked, amused with his colleague.

“It’s not an anomaly. Someone’s gone and duct taped a crab to a rabbit, that’s not a new animal.” Ford said incredulously, gesturing with his pen. “Look, you can see the duct tape. Look!”

“I think it’s a sweet little thing.” Suzie smiled at the Crabbit, finding it too endearing to be sceptical.

“It’s not a thing at all! It’s two things. Two things taped together!” Ford pointed out, exasperated.

“If you like the Crabbit, folks, you can pop your money in the hat right here.”

The crowd bustled forward, murmuring delightfully as they put their donations in the hat up front, before letting the showman lead them on to the next exhibit.

“And if you’ll follow me through this curtain, you’ll see the missing link between humans and angels, the Gorr-Icken!"

Filing along with the crowd, walking past the young carny who stood holding the hat which was stuffed to the brim with notes and coins, Ford scoffed, scribbling a brief sketch of the Crabbit into his journal before moving on without leaving a tip.

“This is ridiculous. It’s clearly a fake. I can’t believe how gullible the people here can be.”

“It’s only a bit of harmless fun.” Willow said, defending Suzie, who seemed to be enjoying the show.

“Harmless would be presenting the show as is, monetising these exhibits is the real crime.” Ford grumbled, gesturing to the overflowing hat held out. “Someone with no ethics could make money hand-over-fist in Gravity Falls.”

“The people are morons.” Bill commented, chewing on his spicy kettle corn.

“They’re good natured.” Willow corrected Bill tersely. “And there ain’t no shame in being like that.”

“I just don’t like to see people being swindled by a lie.” Ford frowned, moving on through the curtain to the next exhibit. “It’s not right, to trick them all.”

“If they were stupid enough to believe the lie in the first place, maybe they deserve to be tricked.” Bill countered, following Ford through the curtain.

“Ignorance isn’t a sin.” Ford countered, finishing annotating his drawing. “Just wilful ignorance.”

“Behold, the mysterious Gorr-Icken! The missing link between humans and the angels above. With the body of a gorilla and the wings of an eagle!”

“Oooooooooooooooooooooooooo!” The crowd awed as the curtain was whipped off the cage housing the Gorr-Icken, revealing a rather sedentary looking silverback gorilla staring morosely through the crowd. The gorilla had a chicken very obviously duct taped to its back, and wore an inexplicable wizard’s hat. It scratched its rear, and exhaled, its wide nostrils flaring in an unimpressed sort of way.

Polite applause sounded out from the crowd, and Bill jerked his thumb at the display. “That isn’t wilfully ignorant?”

Ford raised his journal up and hid his face in the pages, knocking the book against his forehead several times to try and vent his frustration at witnessing such stupidity.

Fiddleford snickered at Ford’s reaction, then looked down at his wrist, his digital watch beeping a small alarm.

“Well, guess I’ll leave you with your newest discovery. Gotta go now if I want to make it to that pig race on time. Will I meet you back here?”

“Oh, god no. I won’t be staying in here for much longer. If the deplorable conditions these animals are kept in wasn’t depressing enough, the fact that everyone here seems to believe they’re the genuine article is even more disheartening.”

F looked at the rather sad looking gorilla and nodded, before parting the curtain to sneak out of there. “Let’s get out of here.”
Quickly Ford, Fiddleford, Bill and Willow snuck out of the tent. Dan and Suzie were still in there, chatting away and pointing at the exhibits, clearly they didn’t find the freak-show as brain-numbing as the others seemed to.

“I don’t know why I found that so disappointing. It certainly wasn’t what I expected.” Ford murmured, tucking his journal into his coat pocket. “This entire carnival was a waste of time.”

“You haven’t seen everythin’ here yet. Don’t give up.” Fiddleford urged Ford, walking alongside him, glad to be out of the stuffy tent.

“I’ve heard the fortune teller is actually pretty good.” Willow commented, pointing out the tent that housed the woman in question. “Suzie’s been hyped about her for days. She does palm reading and tarot cards. She’s supposed to be pretty accurate.”

“Hah. An accurate soothsayer. That’s a joke.” Bill laughed derisively, eyeing off the tent with disdain. “Now, a good fortune teller just tells you what you want to hear. They lie prettily. At least the good ones do. Note how I said good and not real.”

“You don’t think there are real fortune tellers?” Willow asked, incredulous on Suzie’s behalf at least.

“Real fortune tellers. Let’s just consider the oxymoron inherent in that statement. Put your dukes down Red, I didn’t mean you.” Bill quipped, insulting Willow’s intelligence while pretending he didn’t. Willow jutted her chin out defensively, but said nothing, listening to Bill’s rant continue, the diatribe dotted with sarcastic air quotes around key phrases.

“Anyone who wants to be told their future is kidding themselves. There’s no real fortune in your future. The future isn’t there to deliver fortune and benevolence to you. It’s the punch line of time. Its there to crush all your hopes and dreams and leave you rotting in the ground. It’s as inevitable as entropy. So yes, ‘fortune tellers’ lie, and if you’re a real prophet, you keep your head down, and remember what happened to Cassandra.”

“Well, this carnival’s been a catastrophe of mediocrity so far. What are the chances this fortune teller will be any better?” Ford concurred, crossing his arms and staring at the obnoxiously long line queued up outside the fortune teller’s tent. “Just look at that line. People will believe anything. Be hoodwinked by anything.”

Willow gave Ford an assessing look, feeling an abstract sort of relief at Ford’s scepticism. If Ford claimed to be on guard against being hoodwinked by pretty lies, then perhaps he wasn’t being spellbound by Bill, who still seemed odd by Willow’s estimation.

Watching him chew popcorn with his mouth open, and snicker at the exhibits, and hold Ford’s hand like he was just a regular guy almost had her second guessing what she’d seen that morning in the forest, seeing Bill conduct the floating items through the air, seeing Bill levitate Stanford with magic. Willow almost wasn’t sure, but sometimes her suspicion would get the better of her, and she’d be on guard around him all over again.

He wasn’t acting any differently to her, still just as flippant and snide as ever. If he noticed her edgy behaviour he wasn’t saying anything about it.

“Well, if you’ve got five dollars to spare, you could go in and get your palm read. See what all the fuss is about.” Fiddleford suggested.

“Hah!” Ford scoffed, and held out his six fingered hand. “That’d be a laugh. I can’t imagine the old charlatan has ever seen a hand like mine before. She’d probably fall off her seat.”

“I knew you’d find something fun to do here. Exposing a fraudulent finger fondler at the freak-show makes for a good time by anyone’s standards.” Bill cheered, and nudged Ford with his elbow. “Try saying that six times fast.”

“I’ll pass.” Ford rolled his eyes and gave Bill a fond look.

“Well, I’ll leave you to it.” Fiddleford said, checking his watch again. “I’m gonna go win a fortune of my own at the pig races. Given my background knowledge from the farm and some good old probability metrics, I reckon I could bet on some winners here.”

“You fiend, using your mathematical prowess for profit.” Ford teased his friend.

“Says the man buildin’ a –“ Fiddleford started, but was interrupted by Ford clearing his throat, giving him a stern look. “Never mind.”

Walking away with a wave, F headed off to the pig races, leaving Bill, Willow and Stanford waiting near the fortune teller’s tent.

Willow gave Ford a suspicious look. “What exactly are you building?”

Saving Ford the hassle of having to answer that (he was a terrible liar) Bill responded for him, his tone cheerful and mocking. “He’s building a none-of-your-business discombobulator! The first of its kind. But you didn’t hear it from me.”

“Ha, ha.” Willow said dryly, raising her eyebrow at Ford, before conceding that she wouldn’t be getting an answer from Stanford in front of his inhuman companion. Changing the subject for now, she asked Ford. “So, are you going to get your palm read?”

“And waste five dollars and goodness knows how many precious minutes of my life? I don’t think so.” Ford scoffed, and crossed his arms.

“What if the one thing you don’t see at this carnival ends up being the real deal? What will you do then, oh clever scientist?” Willow tilted her head at Ford, teasing him a little.

“She isn’t the real deal. There’s no such thing as fortune tellers.” Ford insisted, but now he was looking at the tent more closely, unable to tear his eyes away, tempted by the thought of finding a true anomaly at the show.

“I thought you wanted to prove that, not just stand there with your arms crossed and stare at the tent.” Willow ribbed him, smirking. “How would you feel walking away from this carnival if Suzie met a real fortune teller and you didn’t?”

“Well that’s –” Ford frowned, and looked between Willow and the tent, clearing his throat again, obviously tempted.

Pulling his wallet out from his pocket, Ford relented. “Alright, fine. Are you coming with me?”

“Not a chance.” Bill sneered at the tent disdainfully, his aversion to prophecy as strong as ever. He pointed to the sign above the tent, a one-eyed triangle below a wooden hand. “Tasteful décor aside, I wouldn’t touch a soothsayer with a ten-foot pole, much less go near one voluntarily. If I wanted to be lied to I’d watch the shopping channel.”

“Willow?” Ford looked at Willow expectantly, not really wanting to go alone to see the soothsayer.
That removed the entire appeal of exposing their fraudulence if there was no one to expose them to.

“I’m pretty sure they only let you in one at a time.” Willow shrugged. “At least that’s what Suzie said.”

“Fine, I suppose I’ll just queue up by myself then.” Ford replied, somewhat deflated, taking his place at the back of the queue. “Will you wait for me here?”

Bill gave Ford a considering look, obviously curious to see Ford humiliate this soothsayer, before his attention was diverted by one of the spruikers.

“Come see the world’s hottest chili!”

Ford could practically see Bill’s ears pricking up.

“You’ve heard of the Ghost Pepper, you’ve heard of the Trinidad Scorpion, but you ain’t never seen the likes of this. One bite of the Carolina Reaper and your tastebuds will burn clean off! Whoever eats one of these mean peppers whole gets a prize, so step right up folks, and see if you can beat the heat.”

Ford could see Bill’s expression shift from consideration, to distraction, to mouth-watering desire, turning his head to stare down the spruiker, looking hungrily over to the chili jar on the stand. It was certainly amusing, Ford hadn’t seen Bill’s pupils dilate so quickly since, well, he couldn’t even think of the specific comparative event without his cheeks pinking. Thankfully it was cold enough that Willow wouldn’t notice a little extra red on Ford’s face.

“You’re not going to wait are you.” Ford assumed, watching the way Bill was practically vibrating now with anticipation, his entire body keyed up by the prospect of devouring the world’s hottest chili.

“Hold that thought Sixer.” Bill replied, without looking at Ford, or even listening, pointing to the chili vendor. “I’ve got a – I’ve got to –“

“Just go.” Ford shook his head, laughing to himself.

Needing no further prompting, a giddy grin on his face, Bill raced over to the chili vendor, sticking his hand in the air, volunteering himself with gusto.

“He’s going to eat one of those?” Willow seemed perturbed. “That can’t be good for a person.”

Someone queued up behind Stanford for the fortune teller, and he resigned himself to staying in the queue, though he would have dearly loved to watch Bill eat the world’s hottest chili. He was almost a little concerned that Bill would breathe fire, literally, and frighten the crowd, he was so keyed up.

“Bill is… something else.” Ford admitted, smiling as Bill got up on the small stage beside the spruiker, already making grabby hands at the pepper.

Willow gave Ford a suspicious look here, hearing what she assumed was a round-about admittance that Bill certainly wasn’t human. She’d take whatever confirmation she could at this point.

The queue moved forward and Stanford moved with it, waving at Willow. “I’ll see you after, yes?”

“Sure.” Willow replied, her curiosity getting the better of her, itching to follow Bill now that she had validation of his otherness.
Willow broke off from Ford, to pursue her own interests he presumed, and Ford contented himself to waiting in the queue, moving forward as the fortune teller worked her way through the supplicants drawn to her. He handed his money to the carny taking payments along the line, handing out tickets like he was waiting for service at the grocer, and not waiting to have his future told.

Ford waited impatiently for the person in front of him to go through, the queue speeding along far more rapidly now than he had seen the queue move before. It was almost like the fortune teller was hurrying through her clients, customers leaving the tent muttering about how brief and abrupt she was.

More proof of her inauthenticity. Ford thought to himself, pursing his lips, inclined towards disappointment.

As the carny by the tent door poked his head into the tent, holding the flaps open for the previous client to leave, he turned and jerked his chin at Stanford, ushering him through.

“She’s ready to see you now. In you go. The, uh, mysteries of your future await.”

“I’m on the edge of my proverbial seat.” Ford replied sarcastically, underwhelmed by the carny’s rote enthusiasm.

Ford walked under the tent flap and the smell of musty incense filled the small space, causing him to wrinkle his nose. The tent was dark, dimly lit, most likely for effect and atmosphere. The sort of gimmick designed to wow the small minded, but not likely to trick Ford. No sir.

Sticking his chin out stubbornly Ford walked forward into the tent, ready to debunk his destiny.

Deep within the temple’s inner sanctum on the holy mountaintop within Dimension 52, Jheselbraum the Unswerving held a scrying mirror out in her left hand, sitting comfortably on another one of her giant plush lounges, holding her palm out flat for one of her informants to stand on, lifting them high enough so that they may speak to her face to face.

“There hasn’t been much talk, but one of the henchmaniacs let a name slip. Sixer they said.”

“And do you know the significance of this ‘Sixer’ fellow?” Jheselbraum asked her informant calmly, the silver surface of the mirror warping and rippling, like a stone dropped in mercury.

“Not sure. It’s all very hush hush, as far as I’m aware. What I did hear was that it’s a human, and for some reason it’s being treated with importance. The compass was muttering about it. Something about being ousted by a pet.”

“Hmmm. Very well.” Jheselbraum lowered the informant back down to the floor, tipping them gently off her palm, before waving them away. “You may go.”

“Thank you Mistress.” The informant bowed, and left the room.

Standing, pacing across the room to place the mirror on a dais beside the window, looking out unto the cosmos, Jheselbraum let the mirror rest, the silver surface still warping and whirring like disturbed water.

She walked over to a cabinet, set high into the frame of the temple, higher than any of her attendants may reach. She unlocked the cabinet and opened it, withdrawing a small black ring from within, pinching it between her thumb and forefinger. It shrunk down to size between her digits, until it was but a small speck, not suitable for her hand, but perhaps for a humans…

Jheselbraum’s lips quirked slightly, her stoic estimation of a smile, and she raised the ring up to her lips, blowing on it gently.

The black stone set into the ring was suffused with an electric blue light, The Oracle breathing her influence into the gem. It glowed for a moment, before muting to a duller blue shade.

“I haven’t used you for centuries.” Jheselbraum murmured to the ring. “Perhaps you can serve me still.”

Jheselbraum pressed the ring to the surface of the mirror, and it sank through, displacing itself through the cosmos to reach its desired destination. Once the ring had passed through the mirror completely, the surface of the mirror smoothed out again, reflecting a familiar tent into view.

Jheselbraum clapped her hands together and closed her eyes, praying to her master.

“Oh Grand and Mighty Axolotl. Grant me the power to intervene in events, to guide the hand of fate. Allow me your faithful to further my sacred purpose. This I ask of you as your devoted servant.”

She bowed her head, pausing to listen to the absent permissions the great Axolotl supposedly granted. Feeling justified in the silence, she looked up, confident in her actions.

“I’ll take that as a yes.”

Stepping up onto the dais, Jheselbraum placed her hands on the edge of the mirror, and closed her seven eyes in tandem, taking a deep breath.

She opened her central eye, and it was glowing a vibrant, powerful blue.

“I’d like to see this pet of yours with my own eyes, Cipher. What are you hiding from me?”

The tent was warm and stuffy, the strength of the incense making Ford dizzy the longer he breathed it in. The entrance to the tent was longer than it looked, Ford felt like he’d pushed back countless heavy woven curtains, making his way into the fortune teller’s den, ready to confront the fraud.

Ford couldn’t help but notice the symbols woven onto the curtains. The symbology was certainly authentic, depicting an interlocking pattern of hands, presumably the Hamsa, predominant in Middle Eastern theology. The Hamsa was traditionally a symbol of protection, believed to guard against the evil eye – but Ford suspected it was merely a way to further the gimmick of palmistry touted here at the carnival. These sort of travelling sideshows often borrowed and appropriated symbology from other cultures without regard for its origins, ramping up the ‘exotic’ factor to try to convince small town Americans of the authenticity of their acts.

The endless curtains were thinning now, Ford walking into the central dome of the tent. Looking around the room there were strange ornaments and objects displayed, low tealights burning in red cups, creating that dim light that obscured the vision. There was a fish tank on the table to the side of the tent, housing a great many ferns and no discernible fish. Ford was trying to get a better look at the ornaments, some of them displayed in cages, looking an awful lot like severed hands splayed out in a spindly fashion, clinging to the bars.

He walked over to one of the cages, and brought his hand out to gently tap at one of the hands clinging to the bars, but before he made contact he heard a sharp sound, like hands impacting a desk, and turned around sheepishly to see an old crone of a woman leaning over a circular table further into the tent, watching him with a wicked gleam in her piercing blue eyes.

She had gnarled features, and a long bulbous nose, warts dotting her chin. She was wearing what looked like a burgundy mu-mu with two hands emblazoned on the front. She looked the very image of a storybook witch, no doubt designed to fool people into believing she was authentic.

Ford squinted at her in suspicion, assessing her potential to be more than just a hoax, wondering if she was wearing a fake nose, or fake warts, and what else about her was fake. What with the smoky incense and the dim lighting, and the creepy cages, Ford already felt like he was looking at a performer at a low budget Halloween theme park, finding everything about her lacking, predisposed to discredit her before even hearing her out.

She gestured to the seat on the opposite side of the table in silence, staring at Ford with that unnerving eye contact. Her blue eyes almost seemed to glow in the dark room, though Ford suspected it was simply the lighting in here. Ford removed his scarf and coat and pulled the chair back, sitting down.

Just as Ford was about to open his mouth, feeling he should tell the old woman he wasn’t exactly impressed with her theatrics, the crone reached across the table with alarming rapidity, snatching Ford’s wrists, pulling him closer to her.

“What took you so long, Sixer?” She hissed, and Ford felt a chill run down his spine.

How could she know that nickname? In Ford’s entire life, only two people ever called him Sixer – Bill, and his brother Stanley. As Ford hadn’t seen Stanley in years, he could only assume the witch had been following him and Bill, and immediately his paranoia was set on edge. He tugged his hands out of the palm reader’s grasp, massaging his wrists and watching her distrustfully.

She smirked, and laughed a little to herself, before she began pulling out a pack of tarot cards, shuffling them before lining them up on the table.

“Come to learn your future, have you?” She asked, separating the cards into three piles, indicating Ford should point to the pile he felt drawn to.

Reluctantly, Ford pointed to the pile on the left, and frowned at the crone. “No, actually. Honestly, I don’t really think much of your craft.”

“But you’re here, aren’t you?” She shrugged, and moved the two other piles of cards to the side, shuffling the pile on the left. Ford couldn’t help but notice her fingers were unnaturally long, and paired with her conduct so far, and the general atmosphere of the tent, Ford instantly found her rather sinister to behold.

Ford said nothing, stubbornness and caution combining, and instead just set his jaw, watching her with a frown.

She shuffled the cards, and laid them out on the table before him. For an instant, the cards seemed to shift, showing something that itched at the back of Ford’s mind and left him feeling like he’d missed something crucial while blinking.

One of the cards almost looked like a pig for one second, two other cards depicting young girls, the fourth card depicting a boy holding a candle, but as the dim light in the tent flickered, those images disappeared, leaving only the plain glossy artwork expected on tarot cards.

Ford briefly recognised the four cards, the sun, the moon, and death. There was also an unusual card – time and space. Not a typical addition to a traditional tarot deck, if Ford’s mystical trivia was up to scratch, but the moment the witch saw the cards laid out she shrieked loudly, pointing at the deck, looking hastily up at Ford.

Her loud screech startled Ford, and he jumped despite himself. He expected to see more theatrics on the woman’s face, since she seemed to enjoy playing into the drama of this whole situation, but instead her expression was twisted with a great and pained sympathy that looked very real.

She looked like she felt explicitly sorry for Ford and his circumstances, like she pitied him, felt sadness for him, and for what was to come. It was a very maternal expression that made Ford feel uncomfortable. He squirmed a little in his seat.

Ford swallowed his apprehension and decided she must be a very good actress. She must do this for all of her clients.

“Oh, you poor thing.”

“What?” Ford asked flatly, unimpressed with this feigned pity.

“Someone very close to you is deceiving you.” She said, her voice taking on almost a different, more solemn tone, watching him with those bright blue eyes of hers.

“The cards say that, do they?” Ford questioned sceptically.

“You have chosen the wrong allies.” She nodded, speaking in the same tone, and reached across the table to take Ford’s hand.

Ford recoiled, not willing to accept her false comfort, pulling his hand away and she sighed, continuing her spiel.

“You will live two lives, and both of them too short ... unless you change now.”

Her eyes seemed to glow that intense shade of blue, before she reached across the table again and pressed a strange blue ring into Ford’s palm, closing his left hand around it.

“Take this. It will help you.”

“Are you charging me for this too?” Ford opened his hand flat, examining the ring with politely veiled disdain. It looked like a rather old ring, bronze possibly, with a bright blue gemstone in the centre, held in place with small dainty hands made from the same metal. The witch clung to Ford’s wrist, trying to close his hand around the ring again, urging him to keep it.
“When this is blue, you may pull through. When this is black, you can’t turn back.”

Her ominous poem made Ford just as uncomfortable as her continued, persistent hand holding, and wrenching his hands away from her grasp once more, Ford kept the ring closed in his fist and held it against his chest.

“Yes, you’re quite the poet laureate. Though if you’d do me a favour, perhaps skip the rhymes and get to the palm reading.” Ford knew he was being rather sharp with the woman, it wasn’t exactly polite of him, but he’d had enough of her creepy showmanship, and he was eager to get out of there.

The heavy incense was giving him a headache, possibly why he was so cranky, snapping at the woman.

She sighed, watching Ford with what seemed to be disappointment, before muttering to herself.

“Just what I expected.”

Holding her hand out flat on the table, she waved impatiently for Ford’s palm, watching him grumpily, her blue eyes looking much less blue now, though that may just be the candlelight again, playing tricks.

“Alright, let’s get on with it. Show me your hand. Right hand, right hand.”

Ford extended his right hand, laying it flat on the table for the palm reader to study, noticing that the lofty tone had all but fled her voice now. Perhaps she’d decided to depart from pretence, knowing she couldn’t hoodwink Ford with all the misplaced theatricality.

“I doubt you’ve ever seen a hand like mine before.” Ford assumed, watching her peer at his palm.

“Ehh, a hand is a hand. Though yours is certainly a collector’s piece, for sure. Let’s see, ah, look at those calluses. Tch, a trigger finger, plain as day.”

“That is generally what the index finger is used for.” Ford frowned at her, wondering where she was going with this.

“You need to think before you shoot, is what I’m saying, hot shot, though I doubt you came here for advice. What else have you got here? I expect you’ll want to hear about your love life?”

Ford winced, and felt ashamed in that moment for even walking into the tent, feeling just like all those bored housewives who sat reading the horoscope column, looking for their tall dark and handsome. “Frankly, no.”

“Oh, thank god!” The palm reader’s shoulders sagged in relief, and she cackled breathily. “You won’t believe how often folks come in here, badgering me about their love lives. Romance this, marriage that, how many babies, when will I find my Mr Mystery?”

Ford had a sneaking suspicion this woman had already seen Suzie and read her palm. Perhaps several times already, given the frustration in her tone.

“You’d think after so many goes, you’d just accept what you’d heard, give up on men, and start investing in cat furniture, but nooooo.” The palm reader exhaled dramatically, and pointed at Ford’s love line. “At least you don’t have to worry about that, you’ve got a short love line – short relationships. No one wants to hold a rose with too many thorns.”
More poetry, Ford thought, wondering how exactly that applied to him. If he was a rose with too many thorns, then in theory he shouldn’t be in a relationship currently, but as Bill seemed to be somewhat of a masochist perhaps he was exempt from the ominous declaration. Either way, Ford thought the witch’s reading was nonsense.

“Oh, here’s one you’d like, since I can tell you think big of yourself. This is your wisdom line.” She pointed out a long line running all the way horizontally across the centre of Ford’s palm. “It’s uncannily long, longest I’ve ever seen.”

“Oh, well that’s –” Ford murmured, sounding very pleased with himself.

“It means you’re too smart for your own good.” The witch insisted gruffly, pointing at Ford. “And that’s not a compliment.”

Regardless, Ford took it as a compliment. One had to take their genetic victories where they could. His shoulder’s wiggled slightly, pride setting in.

Tsking, the witch pointed to a line that forked right in the middle of Ford’s palm, looking seriously up at Ford.

“That’s a crossroads there. You have a choice to make, and you’ll make that choice very soon, from what I can tell. It’ll be an important choice, and if you make a mistake, if you chose the wrong path, you’ll never be yourself again. Ever. Choose wisely.”

Ford raised his eyebrow incredulously at the woman, thinking that this was all very well and good, perfectly sane, taking life advice from a lady who lives in a travelling wagon full of severed hands.

“Do you have specifics, or am I to guess when this important choice eventuates?”

“You’ll know when you know. I’m not spelling it out for you.” The hand witch snorted a laugh, and gestured to Ford’s hand, her own pun delighting her. “I thought you didn’t want me to hold your hand, HAH hah, hooo.”

“Right, well you’ve been very helpful, I’ll just –“ Ford made to stand up, having had enough of the witch’s uncomfortable jokes.

“I’m not finished with you yet, sit back down.” The witch pointed imperiously at the tabletop, waving her hand for Ford’s palm again. “Let me see your life line.”

Reluctantly Ford sat back down, and extended his palm again.

“Hrmn. Now this is strange.” She craned her neck to press her face close to Ford’s palm, inspecting it closely. “It almost looks like your lifeline here seems to end abruptly and then start again sometime later down the track.”

“And what does that mean?” Ford asked impatiently, perhaps a little disappointed he wasn’t getting the long life he expected he’d have. Bill had said he would live til he was 92, in passing. This crone’s predictions weren’t lining up with his muses and already Ford felt he was catching her out on a lie.

The witch scratched her chin, and shrugged, like she was stumped. “Don’t know what that means.”

“What do you mean you don’t know?” Ford pressed, frowning.

“It means, I don’t know. It is what it is. You’ve got a broken lifeline, and a crossroads.” The witch answered. “So you may as well make the most of your life now while you can, because very soon it’ll all change for you, and if you choose the right path it might not matter at all, but from what I’ve seen of you, that’s not very likely.”

Feeling like he was repeating himself here, and probably being insulted to boot, Ford rolled his eyes and pressed. “What do you mean, that’s not very likely?”

“It means you’re attracted to the strange, and unknown, to the mysterious, to the bizarre – to the dangerous – and while you might be smart, you sure aren’t wise – because a wise man knows to let these things alone rather than bring them into your life.”

Ford scoffed, being insulted outright now. He didn’t take too well to being called stupid by a woman who kept severed hands in cages, and told fictions about people’s lives all day to turn a profit. “And - and I’m supposed to just accept what you’re saying because you live in a tent with too many curtains, with - with garish hand ornaments, and an empty fish tank and enough incense to smother an asthmatic? Is that it?”

“My fish tank’s not empty!” The crone replied, slamming her hands on the table confrontationally.
She pointed to the fish tank, her voice becoming cutesy as she gestured to the creature inside. “I’ve got a little critter in there. Say hello to Pinky!”

“Pinky?” Ford squinted, looking at the fish tank, and finally noticed it’s inhabitant floating placidly beside one of the ferns, paddling happily with its little arms, frills flaring out around it’s smiling face. “Is that an axolotl? They’re an endangered species, why do you have an axolotl in a fish tank?”

“I call him Snaxalotl because he eats so much.” The witch cackled, and cooed at the amphibian in the tank. “He just floats there all day, watching. How’s it hanging in there, Pinky? See? He just floats and smiles. Float on, little fella.”

“You don’t get out much, do you?” Ford presumed.

“Why? Are you doing anything later?” The witch looked Ford up and down, like she was scoping him out and liked what she saw. “You know, that extra finger of yours actually does make you pretty special. How would you like to get a drink with me, my shift finishes in a couple of hours?”

Was she – she was flirting with him??!?

Standing up abruptly, grabbing his coat and scarf with rigid movements, Stanford made for a hasty departure. “No thank you. Goodbye now.”

Pushing through the endless curtains, trying to find the exit, Ford could hear the witch cackling back in her little incense saturated room, hollering out behind him.

“That’s them thorns for you, hoo hoo! Don’t forget my warnings, smart guy. You’ve got a time bomb sitting in your basement! The crossroads are coming. Be careful who you trust!”

If Ford hadn’t felt paranoid before, that parting comment certainly cemented the distrust in his mind. A time bomb in his basement? She couldn’t mean the portal? How did she know. Now Ford definitely felt like he’d been watched, for how could this old crone know what he was working on.
It had been safeguarded with the utmost of secrecy.

Suddenly Ford didn’t know who to trust. He certainly didn’t trust her, she seemed like a madwoman. Clearly breathing incense for fifty years had damaged her brain.
Not only was she serving up an inexact science as fact, packaging it as crucial advice, she seemed to enjoy backing her clients into a corner with ominous mysticism and threats, before propositioning them. Or perhaps she’d only propositioned Ford.

Either prospect was unnerving, and Ford fought a shudder of revulsion as he pushed his way out of the heavy curtained tent, into the sunlight, gasping in the crisp air, grateful to be out of there.

Rubbing his arms down, pulling his coat on, Ford looked around for Bill and Fiddleford, eager to leave the carnival after that uncomfortable experience.

To think, he paid five dollars for that.

After watching Stanford’s weirdo boyfriend eat an entire one of those dangerously spicy peppers, grinning the entire time even as his eyes watered and tear tracks ran down his cheeks, before turning to the chili vendor and demanding more, Willow had discarded and resumed her ‘Bill isn’t human’ theory so many times it looped right around to believable scepticism again.

Watching Bill haggle with the vendor, and eventually walk away with a full jar of Carolina Reapers, Willow found herself in a state of suspended disbelief. Bill’s humanity became an improbable theory to her, Schrodinger’s humanity, because whenever Willow wasn’t looking too closely Bill seemed just like a normal guy, doing stupid things, eating foods that were bad for him, and laughing at stupid things at the funfair like anyone else would, but the moment Willow paid proper attention, she noticed bizarre oddities, like the way Bill’s strange slitted pupils expanded when he chewed on that death chili, black filling nearly his whole iris, or the way the chili vendor, who at first was altogether reluctant to give his chili jar to Bill, quickly changed his tune the moment they shook hands, waving him off like an old friend.

Willow couldn’t help but suspect Bill, given the way he’d forced her to admit her deepest secrets to him. There had been a handshake involved there too. Willow wasn’t the best lip-reader but she could have sworn she saw Bill say something like ‘Give me your chilis instead of first prize and I’ll get off your stage, deal?’ and just like that, the moment they shook hands, the spruiker had a change of heart and passed Bill the jar of chili’s, waving him off like an old friend.

In between spying on Bill and muttering furiously to herself, stirring herself up to look like some sort of conspiracy nut, Willow was thoroughly lost in her head, getting worked up. By the time she looked up again, becoming aware of her surroundings, she had lost Bill in the crowd.

She was supposed to be keeping a close eye on him.

“Damn.” Willow muttered to herself, and turned around, looking every which way for the strange man. He should have been easy to spot, there weren’t that many people in Gravity Falls with yellow hair, certainly not any black people with that hair colour.

It was disturbingly easy to lose him in the crowds. The tour group had just left the tented ‘freak show’ exhibit and were heading over to the next display, guided by the show’s ringleader.

The wind blew Willow’s vibrant red hair around her, and she tucked her hands under her armpits again, trying to stay warm. A cold chill was moving in from the north, and the weather began turning bitter.

She could vaguely see Dan and Suzie leaving the exhibit, and ducked behind a rather portly gentleman buying corn dogs at one of the stalls so her partner and best friend wouldn’t see her. As far as she was concerned, spying on Bill was her mission. She didn’t want to get either of them involved, at least not until she had proof.

Willow narrowed her eyes and looked around for Bill, moving through the crowd, until she spotted him sneaking into the tent that housed the freak show exhibit, still chewing on those chilis.

“Found you.” Willow murmured to herself, and tried to pick her way through the crowd.

The wind whipped up into a gale, and blew a scarf right off one of the civilians at the show, the scarf blowing onto Willow’s face. She struggled with it for a moment, trying to swipe it off and set her hair back to rights, before she passed the scarf back to the old lady it belonged to, and tried to make her way to the tent.

The thoroughfare was bustling, all the show’s patrons being led to the next exhibit, and Willow had to duck back behind the portly corn dog man again to hide from Suzie and Dan. The corn dog man gave her a peculiar look, and she winced, giving him an awkward nod.

“Want some?” The man passed one of his mustard dripping dogs to her generously.

Willow wrinkled her nose, looking at the grease and yellow sauce ooze from the corn dog. “No thank you.”

When the crowd had finally moved on, Willow darted across the field, and snuck between the flaps of the tent.

Without the ringleader’s pomp and circumstance, and the bright lights, the freak show exhibit just looked sad, cages and pens housing the animals left to sit there in the dark.

Willow walked up to one of the pens, and looked down at the Crabbit, sitting there chewing on a carrot. Fair-goers had thrown popcorn and candy wrappers in the pen with the animal, and the poor creature just sat there, ignoring the rubbish in its enclosure, just chewing repetitiously on the carrot.

“Tch. Poor thing.” Willow muttered, and began to reach into the pen, picking out the candy wrappers and throwing them away. She extended her hand in to move the popcorn away from the creature, thinking it can’t be a regular part of a rabbit’s diet, when the crab taped to the rabbit’s back clacked it’s pincers at her aggressively, pinching the side of her hand.

“OW!” Willow swore, and pulled her hand back, cradling it, dancing on the spot. “Ow.” She whispered, rubbing the red mark, frowning down at the crab. The crab waved its little claws at Willow, and its beady eyes looked pleadingly up at her, compassion overriding her pain as she watched the poor animal flail.

“This isn’t right.” Willow said quietly to herself, and tried to bend over the pen, to pull the tape off the animals. The moment Willow tugged the tape, it pulled at the rabbit’s fur, and the rabbit kicked away from Willow, hopping over to the far side of the pen, cowering away from her.

“I’m sorry.” Willow whispered, frowning at the rabbit. She just wanted to help.

She tried to walk around the other side of the pen, but the rabbit hopped away, scared of her now, and her shoulders slumped. She hated not being able to help, hated leaving the little animals like that.
Willow heard a voice murmuring elsewhere in the tent, behind the curtain to the side, and remembered what she came in here for.

Creeping over to the curtain, Willow peeled it back, and saw Bill standing in front of the cage that housed the Gorr-Icken, chomping on one of those peppers, swallowing it, before talking to the creature.

“It’s nothing personal, bucko. Sixer wanted to see something real at this tourist trap of a side show, and he sure as shit won’t get that with the fortune teller. I’m doing you a favour, you’ll be famous after this.”

While Bill spoke, the duct tape on the gorilla seemed to bubble and warp, like it was burning, and the gorilla hollered out, beating his fists against the floor of his cage, writhing in agony. The chicken taped to its back screeched too, and flapped its wings like it was trying vainly to escape.

“Well, more famous. Maybe you’ll get like a hat upgrade, or a better cage.” Bill mused idly, while the gorilla screamed, and clutched its stomach, evidently in pain. “A better cage, what a joke.”

Unable to stand back and just watch, Willow ran into the tent and grabbed Bill’s shoulder, crying out. “Stop, you’re hurting it!”

Bill spun around to look at Willow with surprised, wide eyes, and the gorilla groaned, and stopped shaking.

Bill blinked at her, then blinked at the gorilla, and tried his best to look innocent, hoping he could back track over blowing his cover. He opened his mouth to spin a lie, holding his finger up, ready to explain, but Willow simply glared at him with distrustful eyes.

“I know what you’re doing.”

Bill closed his mouth, and lowered his finger, watching Red cautiously now.

“I know you’re not human. I saw you in the forest, floating.”

Bill considered Willow for a moment, taking that in, before raising his finger again. “Now, I know that can’t have been me you saw, because I can’t float.”

“You were floating Stanford.” Willow insisted. “And things in the air behind you. You waved your hand and they were floating.”

Bill ran his tongue across his teeth, and made an unimpressed sound, before he departed from all pretence and raised an eyebrow at Red. “So? What’s it to you?”

“So? You – you’re not human!” Willow exclaimed, pointing at him. “I knew you weren’t and you admitted it. I knew it, I knew it, I knew it!”

“Woopee. What a day this must be for you.” Bill said flatly, looking back over at the Gorr-Icken picking itself up off the floor of its cage, rolling its shoulders.

“What are you? And what were you doing to it? What did it ever do to you?” Willow turned her barrage of questions on Bill, getting angry in defence of the animals.

“Nothing. I was making it better.” Bill shrugged, and pointed to the Gorr-Icken, the tape having bubbled away into nothing, the skin of the gorilla seamlessly melting into the chicken, conjoining the two animals. “Now there’s a genuine freak at this freak show.”
Willow observed the animal in horror, watching the helpless way the chicken kicked its little feet, it’s flesh melded into the gorilla’s back, now never able to touch the ground or be a chicken again. It clucked pitifully and bobbed it’s head, trying to reach the seed on the ground, unable to.

“That’s permanent? God, that’s cruel.” Willow whispered, obviously disgusted by this perversion of nature.

“Hey, cruel would be if I didn’t integrate their respective digestive systems. I can’t imagine Pecky here could support both of their body mass.” Bill drummed his fingers on the side of his jar of chilis, looking between the Gorr-Icken and Willow’s aghast expression, smiling sweetly. “It just means King Kong here is eating for two, and he isn’t the only one. How’s your oven bun?”

Willow recoiled from Bill, putting her hands protectively over her stomach. “Wha -? You - none of your business! You – what are you?”

“None of your business.” Bill parroted back, and screwed the lid back on his chili jar.

The Gorr-Icken snorted, rapidly acclimatised to its new biological functioning, and reached for a banana from the pile in the corner of its cage, sitting on its rear, peeling the banana slowly, just as morose looking as it had been before. The chicken cooed as the gorilla ate the banana, suddenly feeling more full and satisfied than it ever had, the food quickly filling the small creature’s stomach.

Willow watched the Gorr-Icken acclimate, it didn’t seem to be in pain anymore, and so she shelved her outrage, watching Bill somewhat more calmly now.

“Really, what are you? Are you sídhe? Fair folk? A sprite?”

“You’re not going to tell me?” Willow frowned, bringing her hands down to her side now, approaching Bill more curiously.

“Can you keep a secret?” Bill quirked a brow at Willow, smirking. Human curiosity was such a wonderful virtue, it could draw humans into making all sorts of bargains to sate their curiosity, and clearly, having followed him in here, Willow was craving answers.

Willow bit her lip, struggling with herself there for a minute, before conceding partially. “I won’t be keeping secrets for you unless you tell me what you’re doing with Stanford. Are you tricking him? Do you plan to hurt him? What?”

“Why should I?” Bill shrugged, before he inclined his head, smiling at Red now. “You’ve got loyalty, Red. That’s decent. You’re a good friend to him, and I’m sure he appreciates that.”

“I’m sure he does.” Willow replied tersely. “Now did you mean why should you tell me, or why should you hurt him? Because if you hurt him –“

“I’m not going to hurt him. Regrettably, I actually like the guy. Put your dukes down Red, geez.” Bill rolled his eyes and walked over to the bench inside the tent, sitting down on it and stretching his legs out. Bill exhaled, like he was tired, and set the chili jar beside him on the bench. “Can’t a guy just get by doing his own thing? Does every day have to be a freak show? You’ll be putting me in one of those cages next, throwing popcorn through the bars.”

Willow scowled, disgruntled at the insinuation that she would be that cruel. Bill’s words were cleverly chosen, designed to manipulate Willow’s guilt and integrity, her disdain for these sort of novelty attractions and protective streak playing into Bill’s plan.

“I would never do a thing like that.”

“Then sit down, and stop staring at me with your little hands clenched.” Bill stretched his hands over his head, and wiggled his back, settling down comfortably on the bench. “You’re going to give yourself a stress headache, squinting at me like that.”

Willow looked down at herself, and intentionally relaxed her posture, before tentatively stepping over to the bench, sitting beside Bill. Since he wasn’t being confrontational, or dangerous, and she knew he could be, she was willing to give him the benefit of the doubt, at least long enough to explain himself, but that didn’t mean she had dropped her guard entirely.

Brushing her skirt down neatly, Willow looked over at Bill, and tucked a stray strand of hair behind her ear, watching him curiously.

Bill watched her right back, with those peculiar yellow eyes of his, before he laughed quietly, and looked up at the roof of the tent.

“You remind me of my best friend. She’s a regular fire cracker too. Fierce and protective, loyal like anything.”

“What’s her name?” Willow asked gently.

“Pyronica.” Bill divulged, and span his story. “And I haven’t been able to see her since Sixer dragged me here.”

Bill rolled up his sleeve, and exposed the gold binding tattoos, the black bricks unbound looking like regular ink, but the gold lines shining, as Bill was brimming with power these days.

“I’m not from around here, you were right before. This isn’t even my own body.” Bill watched the way Willow’s eyes widened, and how she almost reached out, curious, wanting to touch the glowing lines. Bill rolled his sleeve back down, not wanting to be fondled to culture her pity. Sure, he was spinning a sob story, but that didn’t mean he wanted to buy into it himself, accepting the pity. “Sixer made this for me and dragged me down here, locked me in this body, so I could help him with his work. I haven’t been back to my own home in months.”

Bill could tell from the sympathetic crease between Willow’s eyebrows that his sap story was hitting the right tone.

“Where do you come from?” Willow asked.

Bill pointed to the yellow and red striped roof of the tent, then shrugged. “Well, not the tent. Beyond that.”

“What are you?” Willow pressed, her tone less accusatory and more awed now.

Bill searched for a response that he liked, and settled on his old favourite. It held a certain fondness for him now, knowing how Stanford viewed him.

“I’m Sixer’s muse.” Bill said simply, smiling as gently as he knew how at Willow, hoping to entice her to trust him with this little fairy tale.

Willow nodded, taking that in like it made sense, and Bill knew he had her, hook line and sinker.
“So you, what, help him with his inventions?” Willow rationalised, trying to understand.

“He wishes!” Bill laughed, and clapped his knee. “Ahh, I did help him with his designs, I inspired him, I taught him things he didn’t already know, I invested in him – but the moment he threw me down here into this body, into this fancy cage, I said no thank you. No more helping. Sixer’s smart enough to figure out how to trap me here, then he’s smart enough to figure everything else out, on his own.”

“Then you’re a prisoner.” Willow reasoned, confusion creeping into her tone. “But, I don’t understand. How - how could he do this to you? He likes you! If Stanford brought you down here, forced you to be here - why are you with him?”

“Come again?” Bill blinked at Willow, not sure how long he could sustain this pitiable farce.

“Why are you with him? If you like him, and hold his hand, and I mean, clearly you’ve liked him since the movies, maybe even before then – I want to know why?” Willow looked up at Bill, stubbornness dancing in her eyes. “Why would you like someone who keeps you trapped here? Who manipulated you?”

“Uhhhh….” Bill looked around the tent for an easy answer, finding nothing. He fidgeted in his seat, not really keen on being open and honest about his feelings in order to convince this girl. He couldn’t exactly admit that he was manipulating Stanford as well, not to this little firecracker. He could tell that pity she was pouring on thick would dry up quick smart if she found that out, and then he’d end up at the mercy of her fists. There were some indignities he shouldn’t have to face. “Um… he’s got – nice… elbows?”

Willow gave Bill an unimpressed look, and Bill flustered, crossing his arms indignantly.

“Wha – you, don’t ask me! What do you want, and affidavit? A shitty romantic poem? What?”

“Why do you like him?” Willow repeated, before rolling up her sleeves. “If he’s keeping you trapped here, and you don’t want to be here, I’ll go and I’ll have words with him, and I’ll keep talking to him until he fixes the situation and puts you back where you came from, because trapping your partner with you isn’t okay.”

Looking for a way to deflect this back onto Willow, not wanting to be forced into a confession of feelings, or other compromising information, Bill spluttered. “Woah, projecting much Red? Just because you feel trapped here with Punchy doesn’t mean –“

“I’m not projecting, I’m being serious!”

“You are totally projecting. I bet you haven’t even told him about sourdough in there, have you?” Bill pointed to Willow’s stomach, turning around in his seat to face her. “Huh? You haven’t have you?”

“It’s not a loaf of bread. Don’t poke me!” Willow swatted Bill gruffly, and he almost fell off the bench, clambering back onto it gingerly. “I’ll tell him. I – soon. I just, I still don’t know if I’m ready.”
“In a couple of months you’ll be ready.” Bill said snidely, indignant about being pushed. “Your little toaster oven will ding, and then you’ll be the talk of the town. I hear they like unwed mothers.”

“Shut up.” Willow raised her hand like she was readying to punch Bill again, but thought better of it, pillowing her fist in her hand, looking down into her lap. “I’m not gonna walk down the aisle with a shotgun to my back. And I don’t think Dan would – he’s really trying, I can tell he’s trying. He’s doing everything he can to convince me that he’ll change, I just – I don’t know. He’s doing all the right things, and he’s proving he isn’t like those friends he had.”

“What’s the deal with that?” Bill asked Willow. “Because if those bozos from before were chummy with Punchy, I could see why you’d want to make sure you don’t end up with a little screamer who’s just like his father.”

“Dan isn’t like that.” Willow repeated stubbornly. “Those guys, Dawson, and the others. They work for Preston Northwest, for his lumber company, and they’re all like that. All conceited, full of themselves, all assholes.”

Bill narrowed his eyes, and realised that those Neanderthals were under Preston Northwest’s jurisdiction, considering their bad behaviour and the way they’d bullied Sixer to be Preston’s responsibility now, filing that information away for later.

“Dan quit there last month. He’s been working for Drewberry Lumber now, just a little way out of town. He did it because I asked him to, and he’s really been trying, I just – how can I love someone when I know, I just know, that if I tell him, if I say yes and agree to spend my life with him, I’m never going to leave this town, even if I want to. I’ll never be able to leave.”

“Why not?” Bill pressed.

“Dan’s mother is sick, that’s why he’s been working so much. He wouldn’t be able to leave, even if I wanted to. He’d stay to look after her. He’s trying to compromise for me, I just don’t know – “ Willow looked up to the roof of the tent, despairing. “I just don’t know if it will be enough. Am I selfish, for wanting this, for wanting this freedom?”

“You’ve got your own dreams and aspirations.” Bill reasoned, pursing his lips and looking at a murky spot on the tent curtain opposite him. “Which shouldn’t have to compete with how much you like that he’s trying. You want the best of both worlds.”

“Is that so bad?” Willow shrugged, looking to Bill of all people for reassurance. It was difficult when the only person who knew your secret wasn’t even a person at all, but Willow had to put aside that superstition to get the validation she needed.

“You’ve got your own dreams and aspirations.” Bill reasoned, pursing his lips and looking at a murky spot on the tent curtain opposite him. “Which shouldn’t have to compete with how much you like that he’s trying. You want the best of both worlds.”

“Who doesn’t want the best of both worlds?” Bill shrugged, staring at that spot on the curtain, but not really staring at it at all. “If the world says you can’t have it both ways, then the problems with the world, not with you.”

Willow sighed, and looked at the crushed popcorn and grass on the ground, kicking it a little with her boots.

“If you could go back to wherever you’re from, would you want to bring Stanford with you?”

Bill stared at that patch in the curtain for a while longer, lost in thought, before the word slipped out of his mouth despite himself. “Maybe.”

Willow looked at Bill in surprise, almost not expecting that answer.
“He’s trying too.” Bill said, thinking, his eyes stuck on that spot on the curtain, zoning out.

Willow considered that, and sat back on the bench, resting her hands on her thighs, nodding.

They sat in companionable silence for a while, Willow feeling far less confrontational, trusting Bill a little more now that she knew what he was, and why he was here. Now she knew that they weren’t so different, both of them struggling with nearly the same problem.

The Gorr-Icken cooed, before chirping, sounding out a grunt in alarm, as the curtain to the tent pulled open, and Dawson Peters and his cronies ambled through the tent flap.

“Well, fancy that. Don’t have your boyfriends to back you up now, ladies.” Peters jeered, holding a cold drink up against his jaw, a bruise already starting to form.

Willow elbowed Bill, jolting him out of his reverie, and the muse looked over the bullies with an unimpressed expression. Not really in the mood to pander to idiots, Bill looked away, back to that musty spot on the curtain, trying to process his thoughts peacefully.

Willow frowned, watching Bill, and looked over to Dawson and the other boys, her guard coming right back up.

“What do you want Dawson?”

“Well, I came here to teach that smart mouthed little cock-sucker a lesson about minding his manners, but it looks like it’s my lucky day, because not only do I find you –” Dawson cracked his knuckles and pointed at Bill, who was still doing his best to ignore the idiots, though his eyebrow did twitch at that vulgar slur. “All by yourself, but I find the little tramp who convinced my buddy Dan I’m scum of the earth, just sitting pretty back here, where no one can see.”

Dawson and his two cronies closed in on Bill and Willow, looming over the bench on all sides. Willow stood up, her hands clenched into fists, ready to defend herself.

“What have you got to say for yourself?” Dawson asked Bill, trying to catch his eye, not enjoying being ignored while he was trying to be menacing. “Now you don’t have Pines here to throw the punches for you?”

“Don’t think I won’t slap the shit out of you myself Dawson Peters.” Willow raised her fists and opened her palm, getting ready to unleash a little hell on these thugs. “Because I will.”

“Oakwood, if anyone could entice me to hit a woman, it’d be you.” Dawson replied flirtatiously, and flicked his fingers at his two buddies, indicating they should grab her. “Boys.”

The two thugs approached Willow, their hands out, ready to grab her wrists, but Bill tsked, and grabbed Willow’s arm, tugging her to sit back down.

“No while you’re making bread, Red.” Bill said, though he was watching Peters now, his yellow eyes slitted dangerously thin. “Sit down, this joker isn’t worth your time.”

“I don’t think you’re in a position to ignore me, wise guy.” Dawson stuck his jaw out, holding his cold drink to his bruise, scowling at Bill. That was twice today he’d been told he was worthless, and he didn’t like it.

Willow felt Bill’s hand on her arm begin to heat up, hotter than any hand had a right to be, and she looked at him, shocked again somehow by the reminder that Bill obviously wasn’t human, that he was dangerous, and that Dawson Peters was picking a fight with the wrong being.
“I won’t deal with you, or your mentally challenged associates. I’ll speak with your boss, Northwest, if you’re making this an issue.” Bill said dismissively, not even looking at Dawson, knowing that his indifference was antagonising him.

“What, you’re gonna tell on me, tell my boss about me?” Dawson scoffed, but it was clear that Bill’s response threw him. “You can’t go toe to toe with me, so you’re going to tattle? Dob me in?”

“You have no idea who you’re talking to, do you?” Bill raised his eyebrow, finally looking at Peters, his yellow slitted eyes glowing dangerously. A more observant or intelligent person might have noticed this, and took it for the warning it was. Unfortunately, Peters and his crew were all substantially numbed by carnival beer.

“You aren’t telling my boss shit.” Peters sneered, and passed his drink his buddy on the left, cracking his knuckles again. “I know you’re some out of towner darky queer who thinks big of himself, and needs to get the shit kicked out of him. That’s what I know. Your kind ain’t welcome here.”

Dawson reeled his fist back, readying a right hook that would more than avenge his bruised jaw and ego, Bill just sitting there, those dangerous yellow eyes promising twice the violence Peters intended to inflict upon him with a silent surety.

Willow was getting ready to defend them both, regardless of Bill’s reminder, when she saw out of the corner of her eye light from the tent’s curtain being pulled open.

“Put your hands in the air. Now!” Deputy Daryl Blubs shouted, his hand resting on his holster, stepping into the tent fully. “Dawson Peters, don’t you make me arrest you again, your mama ain’t wantin’ her son with no more priors.”

Dawson stepped back and immediately put his hands behind his head, turning to face Deputy Blubs, his two friends stepping sheepishly back, away from Bill and Willow, scuffing their feet on the floor, their hands going in the air too.

“What seems to be the problem officer, we were just having a friendly chat, weren’t we boys?” Dawson lied wearing a winsome smile while his two cronies nodded emphatically.

“Don’t be playin’ me like a fool, Peters. I heard what you just said.” Deputy Blubs jerked his chin towards the tent curtain. “Now either you get gone, sharpish, and don’t let me catch you hassling these folk no more, or all three of you gonna have to take a trip downtown, and disappoint your mamas. You understand?”

Peters glared at Bill and Willow, stewing on his rage, thwarted his revenge by the local law enforcement. He said nothing, chewing on the inside of his cheek stubbornly.

“I said, do you understand?”

“Yes officer.” Dawson spat out, incredibly reluctantly.

“That’s right.” Deputy Blubs nodded firmly, and took his hand off his holster, holding the tent flap open for the lumberjacks. “Now go on. Get. Before I change my mind.”

Casting one last petulant glance back at Bill, who was smirking now, Dawson Peters and his crew shuffled out of the tent, their proverbial tail hanging between their legs, acting like chastised dogs.

Once they had left, Blubs looked over to Willow and Bill. “You two alright?”
Surprised by his concern (Bill had never had a promising relationship with law enforcement) Bill nodded silently.

“Thank you Daryl.” Willow said earnestly, exhaling her relief.

“I ain’t tolerating that kind of talk in my town. Peters and Thompson and Jack Dean sure as hell better toe that line, unless they want to spend the night downtown again.” Daryl harrumphed, and flipped the leather flap back down over his holster, clicking the button in place. “Just because the Sheriff’s away, don’t mean you can go around bein’ an asshole left and right.”

“Yeah, you’re telling me.” Willow laughed, and got up from the bench, dusting herself off.

Her hands were shaking now, all the tension from before leaking out all at once.

It hit her after the fact, Bill’s comment about making bread. She had another life growing inside of her, she couldn’t be reckless like that. She had to protect more than just herself now, and that revelation shook her. Until now she hadn’t really considered this baby to be more than an inconvenience, a secret to keep – it was a person, and it was a person she made.

She could take her knocks, and go toe to toe with an asshole like Peters, but the baby couldn’t, and she realised in that moment that she couldn’t risk losing it. She needed to be more careful. She tucked her hands under her armpits again, to hide the shaking.

“You’re stayin’ at the Pines shack, right?” Daryl turned to Bill, who was getting up off the bench as well, grabbing his jar of chilis, substantially less rattled than Red was. “With the scientist. What’s your name?”

“Bill.” Bill replied simply, not inclined to buddy up to any form of law enforcement, despite this particular officer seeming to be on his side.

“Well, Bill. Don’t you listen to them none. Ain’t nothin’ wrong with loving who you love.”

Bill wrinkled his nose at the sappy language, hardly resonating with that “L word” humans liked throwing around so much. Clearly Deputy Blubs was a romantic. He managed a forced polite smile though, knowing better than to antagonise law enforcement, at least not when he had something to hide.

“They ever give you any trouble again, you just give me a call.” Deputy Blubs insisted, holding the tent flap open for Bill and Willow to exit through. Finger gunning at Bill as he walked through the flap, Daryl added. “Just remember, a brother’s got your back.”

The significance of that going over Bill’s head, he merely nodded, and continued on out the tent.

“Y’all enjoy the fair now.” Deputy Blubs waved at Bill and Willow as they left, putting his hands on his hips, smiling fondly at the thought of a job well done. He wasn’t doing too bad standing in for the Sheriff while he was away on holidays with his wife. Breaking up fights, keeping the peace, protecting people.

I got this, Daryl Blubs thought to himself.

“Maybe I could be Sheriff one day.” He murmured and straightened his back a little taller.

Sheriff Blubs. He liked the sound of that.
“Oh no, my manager is going to kill me.”

Fiddleford couldn’t help but overhear the young carny’s lamentation as he was walking past, his choice of prize from the pig race tucked under his arm, and a present for Ford in a paper bag hanging from his other wrist. He paused, and doubled back to look at the tattooed young man bent over the engine of the Ferris wheel, fumbling with the gears for the machine, dropping them on the ground.

“You alright there?” Fiddleford queried.

The carny looked up at Fiddleford, and his expression was one Fiddleford recognised. The young man’s hands were trembling, and he was struggling to pick up several gears that fell out of the machine into the mud, wiping the dirt off them.

“I – I’m sorry sir, the Ferris wheel is – it’s out of order.” He stuttered. He had an accent, possibly British, and seemed to be almost frightened of Fiddleford’s censure.

Fiddleford looked at the young man, reading his name tag. Ivan Wexler.

Putting his prize and Ford’s present on the metal platform beside the Ferris wheel, F crouched down beside Ivan and helped him pick the gears up off the floor.

“Hey, it’s okay. Ivan, is it?”

The young carny nodded.

“I’m Fiddleford. I’m an engineer. Maybe I can help you fix all this up, and your manager don’t need to know a thing.” F said in a gentle voice, wiping the mud off the gears and putting them up on the metal platform so they’d be safe.

“Thank you Mister Fiddleford.” The carny said, his hands still trembling.

“Are you okay?” Fiddleford asked him, concern gracing his expression. Ivan didn’t look okay. “Do you want to sit?”

“No. I can, I can help. I just – my hands.” Ivan looked down at his shaking hands, balling them into fists. “I can’t stop shaking. I’ve been an anxious wreck lately, and I keep making mistakes. The engine failure – it was my fault. I was trying to tighten a valve, when my hand slipped. I knocked a piece out of the system. I – I haven’t had a lot of sleep lately.”

Fiddleford frowned, and settled down in front of the Ferris wheel’s engine panel, borrowing tools from Ivan’s toolbox to fix the machine.

“Just the carnival movin’ around, or too much coffee, or what?” Fiddleford probed.

Ivan sat down on the metal platform and pillowed his face in his hands, rubbing his head. His head was shaved, but for a small ponytail at the back of his head, and he had intricate tattoos covering his cranium, the tattoos an ode to the dated field of phrenology, a pseudo-medicine localising behaviours and concepts to certain parts of the brain and skull.

For having such extensive tattoos, Ivan seemed quite young, a teenager, far too young to have such a weight on his shoulders.

“I’ve been having nightmares, hideous nightmares, ever since –” Ivan exhaled a loud sigh, and looked up at Fiddleford, not too sure about spilling his anxieties out to a stranger.

F gave Ivan a kindly empathetic look, feeling paternal and protective, conveying that in his eyes, and Ivan’s uncertainty dissolved instantly.

“The other carnies all make fun of me. For how I look, and how I talk. I came here on a student visa, to study history, but I couldn’t afford tuition and got this job with the carnival. I love the carnival, all I’ve ever wanted was to be a part of the great American sideshow tradition.”

Ivan pointed to his head. “I got these tattoos because I wanted to be a part of something, a part of something bigger than myself, but apparently the other boys who work here think my dedication is silly, or stupid.” Ivan gripped on the wrench he was holding, and wrung his hands around it.

“They’re bullies. To them this is just a part time job, not their life.”

Ivan rubbed his hand across his bald head, stress impacting him in the retelling. “They locked me in the haunted freak house for an entire night. An entire night in the most horrible exhibit in the carnival. I’ve been plagued by nightmares. It’s not just an act! The freak show is actually haunted!”

“Haunted how?” Fiddleford asked, his brows furrowed with concern.

“You don’t believe me. I knew it.” Ivan said defensively, crossing his arms.

“No, no, I believe you.” Fiddleford assured him. “I can tell just by lookin’ at you, you’ve been through something awful.”

F put the gears back into place in the engine, and tested the springs, before closing up the panel for the Ferris wheel, everything back in order.

“I been through something similar myself. Thought I’d never sleep again.” F confessed, as he screwed the panel back in place and wiped his hands down with a rag.

“I haven’t slept properly in weeks. I was terrified. I still am terrified.” Ivan admitted. “My hands just haven’t stopped shaking. I wish I could just forget the whole thing, move on, but I can’t. Every time I close my eyes I’m back in there.”

Fiddleford frowned, and looked at his bags up on the platform. At Ford’s present.

Ever since he did what he did to Stanford, he hadn’t been able to justify using his memory ray. It sat, untouched, hidden under his bed in the whiskey crate, collecting dust while F’s conscience forbid him from bringing it out, no matter how much good the scientist felt he could do with it. Every time he was tempted to use it, he just saw Ford backing away from him, like he was some kind of monster.

However, listening to the young man tell his tale had the gears turning in Fiddleford’s brain, churning away, logic combatting his conscience. This was exactly what he was telling Stanford about, this kind of trauma affecting other people, the people in this town. Who’d seen too much, who wanted to forget.

If there was ever a reason to bring out the memory gun it would be to help people, like this young man. That was the gun’s intended purpose. Fiddleford could erase his trauma so he had an opportunity to move on with his life, unburdened by the nightmares that plagued him. F reasoned that if he refused to help this young man, he was effectively throwing his life away, leaving it forever tarnished by the trauma of what had happened to him.

Fiddleford’s memories of Stanford’s disgust for the invention warred with his compassion for this young man, with his desire to use his invention to do good, rather than letting it gather dust, hidden from the world.

Passing the toolbox back to young Ivan, Fiddleford bit his lip, before speaking up.

“I think I know a way to help you. With your nightmares. A way to get rid of them.”

“You do?” Ivan’s expression immediately brightened. “Really? I’ll do anything to stop these nightmares, to stop my hands from always shaking. You really have a way to help me?”

Fiddleford’s uncertainty crumbled in the face of Ivan’s enthusiasm. Clearly using the memory ray would change this young man’s life for the better. F couldn’t justify keeping this technology locked up in a box anymore, not when there was someone staring him in the face right now who needed the relief of a memory wipe just as much as he had.

“I think I do.” Fiddleford drummed his fingers together, still uncertain about committing to this. He couldn’t, in good conscience, do nothing while this man was suffering though, no matter how guilty he felt about using the ray on Stanford. “I did something to get rid of my own nightmares, and I’ve been feelin’ better than ever since. Sleeping like a baby.”

“Please, tell me what you did. I don’t have much money, but I can pay you. I can –”

Waving his hand and wrinkling his nose, Fiddleford shook his head. “No, I ain’t takin’ money from you. That ain’t right. I – look, Ivan, I can help you, but – but it’s gotta stay a secret, okay?”

Ivan was nodding before Fiddleford had even finished his sentence, looking at Fiddleford with impassioned zeal. “You’re a good man, Mister Fiddleford. Too good a man, to help me. I promise I’ll keep it a secret, absolutely.”

Fiddleford reached into his jacket pocket for his notepad, hesitating, before bringing out a pen. Rather than writing his name down, or an address, or anything that could tie Fiddleford to this technology, afraid news of him using it would get back to Stanford, Fiddleford considered how he should broach the topic of memory erasure with this young man.

Doodling while his thoughts ran, F drew an eye.

The image was something that F associated with the last time he had used the memory gun. Every time he thought about using the gun, that image was there, staring at him from somewhere deep in his subconscious.

An eye, a wide, open, slitted eye. Burning into him.

“Fiddleford! There you are!”

F heard Ford’s voice calling out to him from across the field, and quickly crossed the eye out, ripping the page out of the notebook and passing it to the carny.

“Meet me tomorrow night at the Gravity Falls Natural History Museum.” Fiddleford whispered hurriedly. “We can’t talk now. But we can talk more there.”

Ivan nodded soberly, and tucked the paper into his pocket. Saluting to F with the wrench, Ivan picked up his toolbox, and went along on his way.

“What was that about?” Ford asked F, jogging over to stand beside him. “Made a new friend, have you?”

“He needed a hand fixin’ the Ferris wheel.” Fiddleford explained, tucking his notepad back into his coat pocket, feeling a little guilty for agreeing to use the ray again. He looked over at Stanford, who was watching the carny leave.

“Unusual tattoos.” Ford murmured to himself.

“How was the palm readin’?” Fiddleford asked, keen to change the subject.

“Ghastly.” Ford shook his head and huffed out an agitated breath. “She was the most unnerving woman – spouting some of the biggest nonsense I’ve ever heard. I think she even tried to proposition me towards the end there. I couldn’t get out of that tent fast enough, I’m telling you.”

Fiddleford snorted, and went to pick up his paper bags, shaking his head. “Only you, Stanford, could get asked out in a tent, getting your hand read.”

“What’s that supposed to mean?” Ford asked F, baffled and mildly offended by the comment.

“Well, it happens all the time for you, don’t it? At the carnival, at the grocery store, at the library.” Fiddleford listed. “Remember that time on that astro-physics field trip where the tour guide kept askin’ about your favourite restaurant?”

“I thought she just wanted recommendations.” Ford admitted, obliviously.

“I’m sure she did too.” Fiddleford remarked, smirking at Ford.

“Oh, don’t give me that look.” Ford nudged F with his elbow. “It wasn’t like that.”

“So how long did you get your hand held for this time?” Fiddleford joked, waggling his eyebrows at Ford.

“Longer than I cared for.” Ford said with a huff, and crossed his arms. “Do you know where Bill went? I think I’ve had about enough Misfortune for one day.”

“Can’t say I’ve seen him.” Fiddleford looked around the fair briefly.

“I’m sure we’ll find him soon enough.” Ford sighed, and reached over to help F carry his bags. “How was the pig racing?”

“First class.” Fiddleford admitted, and swapped the bags around so Ford wasn’t carrying the one with first prize in it. “I won every bet I placed, and got to pick my prize outta whatever they were sellin’ at the fair.”

“And what did you choose?” Ford questioned amiably.

Fiddleford pulled the box from his bag to show Ford. It seemed to be a puzzle, much like the Cubic’s cube, only more advanced. The box read ‘The What-The-Heck-A-Hedron, from the makers of the Stressaract and Annoyangle’.

“Got me a fancy assembly puzzle. Since you and Bill keep hijackin’ my Cubic’s cube, I figure I gotta find somethin’ new to fiddle with, and this doo-hickey actually looks like it might pose a decent challenge.”
“What-The-Heck-A-Hedron.” Ford read, and raised his eyebrows. “Well it’s certainly gimmicky enough. Good to know that at least someone got something out of this farcical funfair.”

“Aw, don’t be like that. I got a present for you too.” Fiddleford grinned and gestured to the bag Ford was holding.

Surprised, Ford peered into the paper bag, and then pulled out what looked like the most anthropomorphic vegetable in existence. Ford held the gourd aloft, studying it with abstract fascination and horror. It was quite the sight.

“Picked him up outta a pile of reject gourds they had sellin’ in the agricultural stalls. Somethin’ about him reminded me of you, I reckon.” Fiddleford pointed at the bulbous growth sprouting from the front of the gourd. “Must be the nose.”

“How…” Ford reigned himself in and forced out a polite response. “How kind of you. That’s very —”

“Smiley little feller ain’t he. I thought, now that’s a gift with character!”

“Yes, well. Yes.” Ford could only nod, the gourd seemed to be watching him, the growths on its surface resembling a rather expressive face with an incredibly large nose. Ford turned the gourd this way and that, and the plant’s ‘eyes’ seemed to be watching him, no matter what way it was turned.

Putting the rather disturbing gourd back in the paper bag, Ford remembered his manners. “Thank you Fiddleford.”

“Did you pick up anythin’ from the fair?” F asked inquisitively.

Ford was ready to answer no, when he felt the curious weight of the palm reader’s ring sitting deep in his coat pocket. He felt through his pocket, and put his fingers around the shape of the ring, nestled in beside his pen. He didn’t remember putting it in there, but he must have done, for there it was, innocuous and disturbing as ever.

You have chosen the wrong allies.

Someone very close to you is deceiving you.

Ford’s paranoia flared up again, and he looked over to Fiddleford cautiously.

He didn’t think Fiddleford would deceive him, it wasn’t in his nature, but something about today just set Ford on edge. He felt like his portal was at risk, that he’d been followed today, watched, and he couldn’t help but be suspicious of everyone, Fiddleford included, considering the other scientist was the only person who could have potentially spilled information about the portal in his basement.

Stanford felt a split second of disconnect, like he had when he looked down at the tarot cards, seeing something that wasn’t there, and for a moment he thought he saw Fiddleford’s expression shift into something darker, more desperate, aiming a weapon at Ford’s head with determination.

Ford blinked, and that ghost of an image was gone, F’s open expression looking patiently at Ford, waiting for his answer.

Ford left the ring in his pocket, and smoothed his coat down, choosing not to mention it to his friend.
“No. Nothing.”

Ford couldn’t quite shake the feeling that his portal was in jeopardy somehow, and that feeling lingered as they searched through the crowd, looking for Bill. When they finally found him, his bright yellow hair like a beacon through the throng, Bill’s yellow eyes sought Ford out immediately.

Ford felt that moment of paranoia flicker, before he felt Bill’s hand clasp warm around his own.

Be careful who you trust.

Ford’s paranoia lessened some as he felt the familiar warmth of Bill’s company light him from within.

It soothed his stress like a balm, knowing that the god who held his hand and stood beside him would protect his portal, protect his secrets, and moreover, protect Stanford, with every power available to him, even if it meant wringing the clouds dry from the sky just to see Ford smile.

Ford knew, he could trust Bill.

He could trust Bill.

Chapter End Notes

I hope you enjoyed the chapter! Next chapter, the Society of the Blind Eye is founded, and Fiddleford has a surprise for Stanford. I’d love to hear what you thought, lots of things at play now, and everything happens for a reason. Also Dan is becoming one of my favourites, and so is Suzie. That never bodes well for a character.
And everyday the hold is getting tighter and it troubles me so. You know that I'm nobody's fool.

Chapter Notes

Just a heads up, there is a NSFW sex scene at the end of this chapter.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

“Here’s another obscure fact. Listen to this. Did you know that when interacting with Molodovian’s, its customary to spit on the ground and nod twice before asking a favour?”

Turning the heavy gold statue of his true form several degrees to the left to better catch the light, Bill rolled his eyes and replied to Sixer.

“Of course, I know. Who do you think got you those books Sixer? The book fairy?”

“There’s a book fairy?” Ford looked up curiously.

Bill turned around and stared at Sixer, who was sitting at his mahogany writing desk, pouring over one of the cosmic encyclopedias Bill had brought him.

Bill held his sceptical glance, and Sixer met his dubious expression for a good two minutes, before waggling his eyebrows cheekily, having been teasing Bill all along.

“That’s it. I can’t with you anymore.” Bill slapped his palm to his forehead and tried very hard to look resigned and not amused. For all his faults, Sixer was funny when he wanted to be.

“So that’s a no on the book fairy then.”

“I’ll confiscate those books if you can’t take them seriously.” Bill threatened.

“You’re telling me to take this seriously? Is there a chance we’re in a parallel dimension this very second?” Ford joked.

“Since when did you have a sense of humour?” Bill ribbed Ford, walking across the study to lean his hip against Sixer’s desk, crossing his arms and looking down at the scientist.

“You must be rubbing off on me.” Ford reached over, snagging Bill by the hip, tugging him over to pull his muse down onto his lap, smiling smugly up at Bill all the while.

“Now you’re just being dirty.” Bill scoffed, but allowed himself to be pulled onto Sixer’s lap, getting comfortable.

“I could be.” Ford murmured, and grazed a kiss against Bill’s jawbone, making the muse squirm, flustering him quickly with the intensity of his worshipful thoughts.

“At least let me grab the cuffs to siphon off all this energy, before you douse me in it.” Bill wriggled, pushing Ford back by the shoulders. “What happened to the Sixer who looked both ways before getting grabby?”
“Well, after you attempted to thoroughly dissuade me from that behaviour, I guess you could say I’ve learned. Grown. Changed for the better.” Ford hummed, and ran his hands along Bill’s back, tugging him closer the more the muse tried to pull away.

“Liar.” Bill huffed a laugh. “You’re just getting handsy because you know McGucket won’t be bothering us, and study makes you excited, you big nerd.”

“I never thought I’d be singing the praises of the What-The-Heck-A-Hedron but here we are.” Ford laughed, and pressed another kiss to his squirmy muse’s neck, enjoying flustering the other man. “Besides, while I’m enjoying discovering information on the multi-verse through these books you’ve kindly brought me, I can’t help but feel I hold a greater understanding of the secrets of the universe right here.”

Ford gave Bill an emphatic squeeze, and stared up at his muse, delighting in the way the god laughed breathily and dug his fingers into Ford’s shoulders reactively.

“What answers do you think I’ll give you that will be more forthcoming than what’s printed on paper, huh IQ? Playing textbook isn’t my idea of fun.”

“I’m sure I can persuade you to part with a few secrets of the cosmos.” Ford claimed cockily, sliding his hand up under Bill’s shirt, dipping down to play with Bill’s belt buckle.

Bill reached around to grab Ford’s questing hand, stopping its persistent progress. “Finish your readings first, Poindexter.”

Ford pouted, disliking being denied, he wasn’t sure why Bill was demurring.

“I wouldn’t put it past me to regurgitate all the ‘secrets’ from chapter 28, just to prove a point about listening to me when you had the chance.” Bill said, and gently pushed himself up off Ford’s lap, sitting on Ford’s desktop instead, so he was still close to the scientist, but more able to supervise, and less likely to fall prey to mutual distraction. “You won’t always be able to rely on my ceaseless wisdom, so you may as well study now while you can. The multi-verse is a big scary place to the uninitiated.”

Sighing, Ford let Bill go, enjoying the sight of his muse sitting on his desk, swinging his legs, far too tempting a distraction to prioritise study.

Yet study he must.

Ford turned the next page, trying to focus, skimming through the paragraphs. The writing was rather dense, quite droll for a book detailing the ins and outs of the multi-verse.

He got through several chapters in relative silence, before looking up to see Bill watching him with a surprisingly tranquil expression. He seemed intent on watching Ford, on making sure he absorbed all the information in the cosmic books, and Ford couldn’t recall ever having seen Bill seem so calm and determined. The ceaseless childish energy Bill exuded had been paused for the sake of Ford’s studies, and he found himself somewhat taken aback almost.

He’d never seen Bill so task-oriented before.

“If you don’t mind me asking, is there a reason why this study needs to happen now?”

“Oh, I’m sorry, should we get back to our regularly scheduled depravity? Is that what you want?” Bill replied flippantly, raising an eyebrow at Ford.
“I don’t mean it like that. I’m just curious. What’s your rush here?” Ford asked gently, putting his hand on Bill’s knee.

“My rush is your rush, Sixer.” Bill replied, and crossed his legs, still bouncing Ford’s hand on his knee. “That portal downstairs is getting closer to completion every day, and when it’s ready, you should be ready.”

“Ready to spit on the ground in front of Molodovians?”

“Don’t be adorably coy with me, Sixer. Forewarned is forearmed, and you’ve only got two, so already you’re at a disadvantage. Knowing your space etiquette could be the difference between life and death, between friends and enemies, between paying full price for things, and getting stuff at an uproarious discount.” Bill examined his nails and pushed back his cuticles. “You’ve read at least half of the almanacks I’ve been bringing you already, surely you’ve noticed a pattern.”

“The only pattern I’m seeing is that the majority of these interdimensional races are incredibly easily offended, and using the incorrect etiquette can result in either social exile or graphic violence.” Ford gestured to the page in front of him. “This has to be the fortieth time I’ve read ‘do this upon pain of death’ – it’s all a bit extreme, isn’t it?”

“Cosmic beings aren’t exactly known for their temperance.” Bill admitted, shrugging.

He certainly wasn’t known for his temperance, and the almanack that he featured in, one that he hadn’t brought for Ford to study, detailed in precise terms that he was not to be approached, that he was highly dangerous, fickle, cruel, spontaneous, reckless, not to be trifled with, not to be offended upon pain of worse than death.

Of course, Bill found that description to be offensive, because the author forgot to include that he was also great fun at parties, and he killed the scholar who wrote these encyclopedias over a drawn-out period of seventy years, but he felt that his reaction was quite moderate for the slight against him, all things considered. He was known for exacting swift whimsical vengeance in response to the barest slight against him, so really, with all his little gibes and jokes at Bill’s expense, Sixer was getting away with a lot.

“How am I supposed to traverse these dimensions without offending anyone? It’s like tiptoeing through broken glass, from what I can tell. At least half of these races would be offended by the number of eyes I have, by how many limbs I have, I mean honestly.” Ford rubbed his forehead, and ran his hand through his hair. “What’s the alternative to spitting and turning around six times and bowing profusely every time I exhale? Is there an alternative?”

“There is.” Bill shrugged, and picked up one of the papers from Ford’s desk, turning it over. The paper clearly didn’t have enough triangles on it, so Bill grabbed a pen and doodled one on. “I just didn’t think you’d want to use it.”

“What is it?” Ford looked to Bill, more curious than ever.

Bill pinned the little doodle to the wall, repositioning it neatly. Straightening up, he swept his hand through the air and summoned the laser gun from downstairs in the lab, turning the dial at the side to high intensity, passing it to Ford.

“That’s your alternative.”

Ford took the gun from Bill, holding it carefully, and it felt far heavier in his hand than it ever had as a simple engineering tool.
If he was picking up Bill’s insinuation correctly, he had two choices. Study these almanacks religiously, and hope his cultural sensitivity saw him through his travels diplomatically, or use force, possibly deadly force.

“There isn’t a non-lethal version of this I could carry instead?” Ford asked hopefully.

“Sure, if you wanted to set phasers to stupid.” Bill scoffed, and resumed drawing his little doodles on the pages scattered about Ford’s desk. “Nine times out of ten, whatever you’re firing at is impervious to standard grade stun weaponry, and in the precious few seconds between finding out with one shot whether your adversary can be stunned, and losing your head the next, you’ll be wishing you had a more final option in your hand.”

Ford looked solemnly down at the laser gun in his hand. He turned it over, examining it, before holding it more securely in his right hand, resting his index finger alongside the trigger.

“I’ve never fired a gun like this before. At least not outside of an engineering scenario.”

“You need practise.” Bill surmised, nodding and scratching his chin with the end of his pen. “I can train you up if you want. With your reflexes and intellect, I reckon you could be a halfway decent shot.”

“Will it really be necessary?” Ford had to ask, for the sake of his morality, though his love of science fiction was swiftly overtaking his reservations here.

“You’ve read the almanacks, you tell me.” Bill poked Ford in the shoulder with the pen, and smirked.

Alright.” Ford nodded, holding the laser gun more firmly now. “Alright, I suppose I’ll give it a try. Marksman practise then, is it?”

“Marksman practise, agility, some advanced physics so you know how to go about physically moving around in the weightless expanse of the universe.” Bill listed on his fingers, before nudging Ford with his foot again, grinning. “Let’s not forget the flaming projectiiiiiiles.”

“You’d think the runes would forbid that sort of thing.” Ford grumbled under his breath, turning around to face the table, turning the laser gun off and putting it in a drawer.

“I’m not intending to harm you, my motivation is the polar opposite.” Bill grinned and went back to drawing top hats and bowties on all of his triangles. “Training you properly will make you stronger. Which is why I won’t be going easy on you.”

“And this is the part where I thank you for tossing flaming projectiles at me, is it?” Ford questioned with a resigned sigh.

“That would be nice.” Bill smiled coyly and nudged Ford with his foot again, grinning wider the longer he stared at Ford’s disbelieving expression.

“You’re impossible.” Ford grumbled, before snagging Bill’s foot and pulling him roughly off the desktop, back into Ford’s lap.

“Hey, hey, what happened to study?” Bill laughed, tumbling onto the scientist, getting comfortable.

“Well, if you’re going to be putting me through my paces, flaming debris and all, I may as well offend at least one of these poor bastards.” Ford reasoned, clearly looking for an out from more interdimensional studies.
The books Bill brought him were an incredibly dry read, and Ford’s focus wasn’t all there. Sliding his hands up under Bill’s shirt again, wanting to be all over the god in front of him, Ford pursued more interesting avenues.

Bill laughed again, loud and surprised, before looping his arms around Sixer’s neck, watching him fondly. “Oh, they’re gonna love you.”

“Mmmm.” Ford leaned forward and captured Bill’s lips, kissing him soundly, the two of them getting a little lost in each other for a while, study forgotten for the time being.

During Fiddleford’s brief leave of absence, Bill and Stanford had fallen into a sort of sensual routine whenever the mood struck. It would play along quite similarly, the two of them both wanting to explore this newly uncovered avenue of worship until they’d covered it from every angle.

Ford would attempt to remove Bill’s clothes, while the muse would endeavour to divest Ford of his sweater and other vestments in creative ways. Biting kisses would be exchanged, hands roving covetously over one another, pinching and scratching, probing reactions where they blossomed.

Stanford might, if the initiative struck, put his mouth on Bill, lavishing worship on the god’s cock until that peculiar gold elixir spewed forth or, seeking something a little more reciprocal, Ford would align his own member with Bill’s and encircle them both with his six fingered hands, squeezing a little satisfaction out between them.

That wasn’t always the goal though, just enjoying the closeness spent with one another always sufficed.

When they attempted the more sexual latter, Bill wasn’t allowed to put his hand on Stanford, as despite the apparatus doing its best, Bill had a tendency to overheat during this sort of play, and there was only so long that that heat remained pleasurable. Ford had to insist on that as a precautionary measure, he didn’t much fancy having to ask for healing down there. Working on regulating Bill’s temperature was still an inexact art, even with the cuffs taking the edge off.

Bill had burnt a hole in Stanford’s sweater and was pulling on the woollen thread, slowly unravelling the garment from bottom to top. Ford had resigned himself to buying sweaters in bulk the next time he hit the shops, trying to pull Bill’s belt off, when the thought struck him.

Pulling back, the belt wrapped around his wrist, Ford adjusted his glasses so they sat less skewed, and blinked up at Bill.

“Aren’t you forgetting something?”

“What?” Bill asked absently, his tongue sticking out of the edge of his mouth as he unravelled Ford’s sweater gleefully, throwing woollen thread over his shoulder.

“The cuffs. You’re not wearing them.” Ford pointed out, reaching forward to feel Bill’s wrists, stilling his manic attempt to unravel the entirety of Ford’s sweater, slowly enforcing partial nudity on the man.

Ford’s belly button felt decidedly drafty, but he was still clothed from mid torso, up.

Bill looked down at Ford’s hands encircling his wrists, and tried to wriggle out of Sixer’s grasp, intent on his little game. “Huh, well would you look at that.”

“You’re not burning me either. Does this mean you’re in control of your temperature now?” Ford questioned eagerly, refusing to let go of Bill’s wrists. Being disrobed via sweater malfunction wasn’t exactly dignified.

“I just forgot I was supposed to be wearing them. I’ll put them on if it makes you happy, now can you ix-nay on the death grip? I’m performing a public service here.”

“No, but don’t you see?” Ford’s expression lit up. “This is an improvement. This is exciting. You’re able to control yourself better. This is discipline.”

“If you’re going to give me grief for it, I’ll make with the hot hands. Stop interrupting this inevitable strip tease Sixer.” Bill pouted, wanting to continue comically disrobing Ford.

“Well, if you’re quite done mutilating my sweater, perhaps you can engage long enough to realise what this means.” Ford gave Bill a flat look, letting go of his wrists finally.

Bill drummed his fingers on his thigh briefly, trying to look engaged, but the temptation to keep unravelling was too strong. “Can I just keep going until I get to the armpit?”

Ford seemed unimpressed.

“To the nipple! Just the nipple!” Bill bargained, before waving his hand, allowing his levitation to continuously tug the thread instead, before lacing his hands together neatly, watching Stanford with an attentive expression. “Okay, I’m listening now.”

Ford sighed, and resigned himself to the gentle tickling feeling of his sweater slowly unravelling.

“This is undignified.”

“So’s existence. Your point being?”

“My point was, if you’re able to control your external temperature to some extent now, even without making use of the cuffs, then your capacity to contain the energy from this sort of conduct is improving!” Ford explained, pushing his glasses up his nose. “Which means …”

Bill’s attentive expression only lasted a few words into Ford’s sentence, and now the scientist could clearly see the muse’s slitted pupils following the line of Ford’s sweater as it slowly unravelled bit by bit.

“Which means…” Ford said again, a little more strained now, trying to draw Bill into the conversation, rather than be ogled like a piece of meat.

Bill was just smiling, his eyes still following the disappearing thread like it was the world’s most exciting race. Bill liked unravelling things, and much like unravelling the fabric of the universe, Bill found this very entertaining.

Ford coughed, and cleared his throat for emphasis, trying to draw Bill’s gaze upwards.

“Did you need something Sixer?” Bill asked absently, not looking away from the thread.

“I’ll just wait until you’re done, shall I?” Ford asked flatly.

Bill struggled to look convincingly sheepish until he discarded pretence all together, and yanked the last bit of wool off Sixer’s torso, unravelling the thread all the way up to the top of Ford’s sweater, leaving only the sleeves intact.

“YES! Amazing! Perfect! The best thing I’ve ever seen.” Bill crowed, throwing the thread over his shoulder into the large pile of unravelled wool on the floor, applauding his own feat.

Ford couldn’t help but blush slightly at the praise delivered, but he had a point to make, and cold nipples, and he cleared his throat again.

“I was going to congratulate you for having the discipline to control your external temperature without using that apparatus of yours, but it’s clear to me that discipline isn’t the sort of word that could ever apply to you.”

“Say that again, but cross your arms.” Bill critiqued with a smile, enjoying the sight of Ford left in simply sweater sleeves.

Sighing, Ford crossed his arms and looked at Bill, woefully unimpressed, and his muse nearly fell off Ford’s lap cackling at the sight.

“You know, a little discipline wouldn’t hurt you.” Ford grumbled, trying to glare properly at Bill, having a difficult time maintaining that expression. Bill’s laughter was incredibly endearing. “All things considered, I’d say you’ve been thoroughly spoilt, so far, and perhaps I’ve missed a crucial lesson with you.”

“You teach me a lesson? Hah, I’d like to see that. What lesson? How to be boring? Incredible.” Bill smirked, quirking his eyebrow, before leaning in, looping his arms around Ford’s neck leisurely, pressing a kiss to the scientist’s cheek. “Don’t worry Sixer, you’ve got that lesson covered.”

“Boring, am I?” Ford huffed, unable to help but laugh a little. “Why is there no page in this almanack about not offending me?”

“You aren’t that famous yet, Sixer. Give it time.” Bill pressed his forehead to Sixer’s, watching his human’s expressions with a fond fixation. “You’ll get there.”

“Why are you not in here?” Ford questioned, bringing his hands up to smooth them down Bill’s back, pulling his muse in closer, as if they weren’t already pressed chest to chest. “Surely you’d have at least a chapter somewhere in these almanacks.”

Bill scoffed, deflecting. “Like I’d even want to be in this shitty almanack. If you want to know something about me Sixer, I’m right here.”

He wasn’t keen on exposing Ford to the various written lore about him, a lot of it wasn’t very flattering.

Bill gestured between the two of them, running his hands across Ford’s chest covetously. “You probably know more about me than any single sentient creature in the multi-verse at this point. You could write your own book about me. Your information would be more accurate than whatever hack wrote this.”

“You’d like that, wouldn’t you?” Ford ran his nails down Bill’s back, like a cat at a scratching post, and his muse wiggled his shoulders, humming happily. “If I wrote about you. Another journal for you to deface.”

“Mmmm.” Bill nodded. “To improve.”

“To deface.” Ford clarified again, jabbing his nails into Bill’s lower back, the muse squirming, pressing happy wet kisses to Ford’s temples.
“Is that a no on the Bill book?” Bill questioned slyly, raking his hands through Ford’s fluffy hair.

Ford thought of the spiral bound notebook he kept hidden in his bedroom, his notes on the muse so far untampered with, and decided to keep it a secret. It was his last vestige for his personal thoughts and observations on the muse. He preferred to keep that as his own private outlet, sharing it with Bill would skew how he wrote in it, knowing the notebook had an audience.

“No.” Ford said, and pressed a biting kiss to Bill’s neck.

“Is that a no, to the no. Is that a round about yes?” Bill tried, his eyelashes fluttering as Sixer sucked a brief bruise into his neck.

“It’s a no, I’m not writing an ode to your narcissism, Bill.” Ford murmured against Bill’s neck.

Bill pressed his cheek to Ford’s forehead, and whined indulgently, mumbling. “I like how you see me though.”

Ford paused, listening to the pout in Bill’s tone, and felt like he understood a little of how the muse felt, like Bill had just given more away than he’d meant to.

Bill liked how Ford saw him.

That may have been the first genuine admission Bill had made about why he liked Ford. Far from being challenging, and frustrating, Bill seemed to savour the way Ford saw him, perceived him, a cosmic being. Perhaps he simply found the vessel Ford had crafted him as flattering as it had been intended, perhaps this went deeper, into how they interacted, into how Ford treated Bill.

He didn’t know.

Ford supposed even cosmic beings had their fair share of esteem issues, and a little boost via kind word or indulgence could make quite the impact. Though judging from the drawings dotted around the study, tributes to Bill’s true form, the god had a rather sizable ego that needed appeasing.

“I like when you let me see you.” Ford confessed, just as quietly, trying to catch Bill’s eye.

Bill inclined his head, obviously listening, but chose not to reply. Instead he simply wound his arms around Sixer’s torso more tightly, clinging to him with a silent possessive desperation.

Ford rubbed Bill’s back gently, and pressed a kiss to the muse’s chest, before pulling back to look Bill in the eye.

Bill was surprisingly recalcitrant, looking down at Ford’s chest hair, swirling his fingers through it idly.

“Bill?”

Bill splayed his hand over Ford’s heart, feeling it’s steady rhythmic beating, and for a fleeting second, Ford thought he looked sad.

Either Bill was becoming more accustomed to his new face, or Ford had imagined it, because when he blinked, the morose expression was gone, replaced with Bill’s typical demanding expectancy.

“You go check on Specs, and see if he’s still fondling that polygon. It looks like you’ve given up on etiquette.”

“Well, you’re distracting me.” Ford protested, feeling a lot like he’d just been dismissed.
“That’s your own fault for sitting here shirtless.” Bill said bluntly, twirling his finger through Ford’s chest hair, tugging slightly.

“You destroyed my shirt.”

Bill blinked.

“That’s your own fault for sitting there with a shirt on.”

Ford harrumphed and shrugged the knitted sleeves down off his arms.

“It’s like there’s no winning with you.”

“I’ll stop.” Bill slid off Ford’s lap and stood up, straightening his clothing out. He looked at the clock on the wall and gathered his belt, re-dressing, stepping away from Ford. “I should leave you to it, I’ve got something to check on anyway. I’m going to go lay down.”

“Oh.” Ford brought his arms up to cover his bare torso, feeling the cold now Bill had left. “Can I come surprise you later?”

“It had better be surprising is all I’m saying.” Bill quipped. “Wouldn’t want to offend you by calling it like it is again.”

“I’m not boring.” Ford grumbled, as the muse walked away, waving dismissively over his shoulder.

“You just keep telling yourself that IQ.”

“I’m not boring!” Ford called out after Bill.

The muse didn’t reply, and Ford’s insistence fell on deaf ears, as Bill walked into the elevator and closed the doors behind him with barely a backwards glance.

Left alone in the empty study, Ford looked down at the pile of wool that had once been his sweater, and felt rather silly, knowing he’d have to trek through the chilly house half naked to get new clothing. He shouldn’t have let Bill destroy his clothing like that. He should have thought this through.

“I don’t think I’m boring.” Ford said to the scraggly pile of wool, trying to believe it.

The pile of wool didn’t reply.

Having retrieved respectable clothing, Ford puttered about downstairs, looking around for Fiddleford, a shovel slung over his shoulder.

Ford found him in the lounge room, sitting in front of the fire, still twisting that peculiar contraption into various configurations, chewing on some taffy while he worked.

“How’s the Heck-A-Hedron going?” Ford asked, briefly poking his head into the living room.
“Well, I’m havin’ a heck of a time with it, that’s for sure.” Fiddleford quipped in reply, poking one side of the sphere while twisting the other side. “It’s just as tricky as advertised. Reminds me of one of those Russian puzzle boxes.”

“Maybe it’s too tricky for you.” Ford teased.

“Come over here, solve it, and then say that to my face.” Fiddleford lifted the polygon gamely.

“You just want someone else to figure it out for you.” Stanford joked, and then held his hands up when Fiddleford got up off the couch, aiming to pass the puzzle over to him. “No, no. I didn’t say I wanted to.”

“What did you want to do Stanford, other than stand there criticisin’?”

Ford gestured with the shovel in his hand. “I was just going to go out and clear out the driveway. The snow came down out of nowhere overnight. I imagine we’ll be snowed in pretty soon if this continues.”

“I’ll be wantin’ to go out in the evening. Shovelin’ out the drive is a pretty good idea.”

“Where are you going?” Ford asked curiously.

“Well, ah – there’s a – a thing on.” Fiddleford replied awkwardly, twiddling his thumbs around the What-The-Heck-A-Hedron. “At the natural history museum.”

“A thing?”

“A rancher’s exhibit.” Fiddleford lied unconvincingly. “All about life on Tennessee ranches, and cattle ranglin’ and so on.”

“You don’t need to go to an exhibit for that surely.” Ford presumed. “You’ve seen it all before, back home on the farm.”

“I know, I know. But I ain’t found a – a Christmas present yet. For my Ma and Pa.” Fiddleford nodded, having settled on a plausible answer. “They always get me somethin’ nice for the holidays and mail it out, and I ain’t got a thing for them yet. It don’t matter where I’m stayin’, they always deliver a little somethin’ for Christmas even though they’ve got a big ol’ family to buy for, they never forget.”

Ford inclined his head, not really able to relate to that sort of family experience, listening nonetheless.

“So I’m just goin’ to pop down there and grab them a souvenir or somethin’. I figure - What kind of son would I be if I didn’t put the effort in?” Fiddleford continued rambling.

“Hmm.” Ford hummed, a short sound, obviously uninterested in this familial present trade.

His own family weren’t likely to be that devoted when it came to trading gifts. Ford remembered how one year he received the same set of industrial scales he’d seen in his father’s bathroom for a birthday present, his re-gifted gift falling flat upon receiving it.

Fiddleford’s strong bond with his family was to be admired, but part of Ford couldn’t help but feel jealous deep down, that they all seemed to care so much for one another. It didn’t seem right. It seemed to be what Fiddleford’s family did, and what every other family did, but it wasn’t, in Ford’s experience, what families do.
Pushing those bitter thoughts aside, Ford rolled his shoulder. “Well, I might pass on accompanying you, if that’s alright. I’m not the best assistant shopper.”

“Oh, hahah.” Fiddleford laughed anxiously, trying not to sound too pleased about that. Stanford inviting himself along might be a significant hurdle. “It’s alright. I’m sure I’ll find somethin’.”

“I’ll be out front, if you need me.” Ford said, heading to the front door, a lawn full of snow and some cold thoughts waiting for him.

Fiddleford sprung to his feet quickly, holding his hand out to halt Ford’s exit. “Wait. I – there’s been somethin’ I’ve been meanin’ to ask you. I’m not too sure if you celebrate Christmas, or Hanukkah like your family – I mean, I didn’t take you as religious in college, but you’ve got those creepy statues in your basement, so I guess anything could have changed.”

Ford raised his eyebrows at Fiddleford, surprised that said ‘creepy statues’ were evidence of Ford somehow developing a religious nature.

As he was technically worshipping the god those statues depicted, Ford supposed he had fallen into the trap of religion that most men of science avoided, but since the altar he worshipped at was decidedly male, Ford was willing to put all thoughts of his ‘worship’ outside of the realm of religious attribution.

It was probably more political, given the current outlook on such things, but honestly Ford just considered it foolish at this point in time.

He could definitely admit he was a fool for worshipping Bill – most men awash with these sort of feelings, falling hard for these sort of relationships with anyone, regardless of gender, were fools undoubtedly, or so says the song.

“Did you have a point you were making?” Ford clarified.

“I’m gettin’ there.” Fiddleford held his hand up. “I wanted to know if it’d be alright to get you a present. Like, a seasonal present, if I can’t get it in any other way.”

“Why do I feel like you asking means you’ve already got me something?” Ford asked, bemused despite himself. “I haven’t got you anything. You can’t just spring this on me.”

“Well, I’m tryin’ to.” Fiddleford grinned, and put his hands in his pocket sheepishly. “Now I’m just fixin’ to get away with it.”

“But I don’t know what to get you. You’ve already got your Heck-A-Hedron, I can’t think of a more perfect gift than that.”

“Aww, shucks. You don’t have to get me anything.” Fiddleford waved dismissively, and began pushing Ford out the front door to tackle the snow. “I’m taking that as a green light by the way. You’re getting a non-denominational present.”

“Can I re-gift the gourd? You want a disturbingly expressive vegetable, right?” Ford joked, grinning over his shoulder.

“How ‘bout you don’t do that.”

“He moans when the weather changes.” Ford added, trying to sell the gourd as a gift.

Pushing Ford out of the front door, Fiddleford shooed him out into the snowy yard. “You’re keepin’ the gourd!”

“Do I have to?”

“Go shovel some snow or somethin’!” Fiddleford laughed, and Ford nodded, chuckling, tugging his gloves on and snagging a warm hat from the coat rack, setting out to clear a path through the yard.

Fiddleford muttered as he closed the front door, returning to the warmth of the living room and his currently unsolvable puzzle.

“Regiftin’ the gourd. The nerve of some folk. Stanford specifically.”

The Quadrangle was chaos.

It was chaos at the best of times, but today it was organised chaos, and not the fun kind. Creatures and beings from all across the galaxy, creatures of the underworld, of the underbelly, of the gravely misunderstood and misrepresented and whatever other epithets they chose to brandish, every interdimensional criminal with something to gain on Earth was there, placing a bid at Bill’s silent auction.

Word spreads, and not everyone is as dismissive as Raha was when it came to recognising Bill’s plan for the genius it is. With invites going out and deals being made, criminals were lining up along the front lawn of Bill’s kaleidoscopic domain wanting to place a bid on a foothold of their own for Earth.

Kryptos had been organising the bidding for Bill as per instructions, and while this was supposedly a silent auction, the hooting and clamouring was several decibels short of what it was supposed to be.

Up on the balcony overseeing the auction, Bill rubbed his sides like he was nursing a headache.

“Look at them, like animals down there.” Bill gestured to the crowd.

Pyronica was sitting on one of the couches Bill had set up on the balcony, looking like some sort of regal queen, stuffing fried Quixlpathians into her mouth like popcorn.

Speaking with her mouth full, deep fried legs falling out of the side of her mouth, she replied.

“No manners.”

“I know!” Bill nodded emphatically, though in the back of his mind he noted that Pyronica’s manners would be something Sixer would take issue with, adorably quaint human that he was.

“You wanna bid quieter?” Py yelled down from the balcony, food collected in her cheeks. “This is a silent auction!”

The beings down in the foyer jeered and laughed, carousing heedless of Py’s screamed direction. That was to be expected, one didn’t become an interdimensional criminal by doing what one was “You sure told them.” Bill snickered.

“You can’t say I didn’t try.” Pyronica nodded sagely, before sitting back comfortably on the couch, stuffing more fried Quixlpathians into her mouth. “I gotta say, I’m loving the catering you’ve got going for this thing.”

“The drinks service leaves something to be desired. Keyhole! Hey Keyhole!” Bill yelled, and his henchmaniac ran up the staircase, holding a platter with various cocktails heaped onto it.

“Yes Boss?” Keyhole panted, somewhat out of breath.

“Who do you want to be serving drinks to, me or the rabble down there?” Bill scoffed, and extended his arm long to snag one of the Cosmopolitans from Keyhole’s tray.

“I’m sorry Boss. The carapacians are really pushy, they weren’t taking no for an answer, and the Goo Mobsters are harder to handle when they’re not completely shattered. I don’t much like being a waiter. I want to swap jobs with someone else.” Keyhole complained, bending over to catch his breath back.

“Swap jobs with Kryptos.” Bill suggested, swirling his drink as he surveyed the chaos below.

“I don’t want to do that either.” Keyhole backed out, shaking his very large head. “I saw him down there trying to separate two of the bidders who started eating each other. Running the auction looks hazardous.”

“Why is he separating them?” Bill scoffed, looking down over the railing. “Let them eat each other. That’s fewer bids to give a damn about. Does he think I want to line up and shake hands with all these schmucks?”

“I feel like that might be the point of the auction, Sir.” Keyhole replied good naturedly.

“The point of the auction is to see who pledges the most loyalty to me, not to see who makes the biggest show out of staking their claim on earth. I want to see what they can do for me, not just what they can do to each other.” Bill sighed, and rubbed his sides again. “I’ve got a hall full of morons down there.”

The creatures down in the hall were bidding on a set of ten invitations to Bill’s party on earth, and with hundreds of contenders packed into the hall, it was set to be a bloodbath soon enough. Kryptos could barely be seen up the front by the bidding table, trying to placate the numerous bidders who wanted to get the edge up over their competitor.

A loud shout echoed out over the hall as the bidding table was overturned by a being that just seemed to be a mass of teeth and writhing fingers, and the assembled creatures began fighting one another for one of the envelopes placed on the tabletop.

“Boss! Boss!” Kryptos was yelling out, close to being trampled by the crowd, waving his little arms.

“Let’s see him talk his way out of this one.” Pyronica snorted, watching the compass plead for help.

“Help me Boss!”
“We can’t just do nothing, that would be cruel.” Bill said, and his two henchmaniacs on the balcony nodded to one another, then nodded to Bill.

Bill swirled his drink around and watched the carnage unfold.

“Boss! Help! Boss!”

Bill took a leisurely sip from his cocktail, and paused to raise the glass to Keyhole.

“This Cosmopolitan is a delight. Have you been practising Keyhole?”

“I have been actually.” Keyhole smiled widely. “The trick is to use freshly grated nebula dust, and just a pinch of spectral seasoning.”

“That’s surprising. I like the kick. Nicely spicy.” Bill sipped at his drink again, enjoying it.

“Boooooosssssssssssss!”

“So, uh. Are you gonna rescue him?” Keyhole asked curiously.

“Give it a few more seconds.” Bill advised, watching the chaos unfold.

“UUAAAAAAAH BOOOOOOOSSSSSS!”

“Okay, that’s enough.” Bill conceded, and with a snap of his fingers, he pulled Kryptos out of the fray and teleported him up onto the balcony, appraising him cheerily. “How ya doing there Kryptos? Enjoying the auction?”

“They were EATING EACH OTHER.” Kryptos panted, pulling his gloves up frantically.

“Ha hah. Yes they were. Yes they were Kryptos.” Bill laughed and took another sip of his cocktail, making exasperated eye-contact with Pyronica before chucking back the entire drink into his eye-mouth.

“I don’t think I can go back down there. I couldn’t keep them away from the envelopes. It’s anarchy down there. Pure anarchy.” Kryptos wheezed, leaning against the balcony railing, watching the carnage unfold with horror.

“Well, that’s what they get for coming in late and still expecting a seat at the table.” Bill reached over for another cocktail from Keyhole’s tray, returning his empty glass. “They think the most anticipated party of the galaxy was going to have an open guest list forever? If there was an IQ test as a prerequisite for getting an invitation, I’d have to make a lot less invitations, I’m just saying.”

“This is happening a lot faster than I anticipated Boss.” Kryptos panted, sliding down to sit on the floor, leaning his back against the railing. “The auction, the portal, party planning on this scale is – it’s exhausting.”

“Tell me about it.” Bill said blankly, looking over the widespread fisticuffs below, wishing he was back with Sixer instead of presiding over this nonsense. “But this is one of the necessary evils of portal party planning, I’m afraid. Last minute alliances cemented by deals are how we’re going to keep an intergalactic stranglehold over what’s ours. They don’t let just anyone take over the third dimension. I’m not the only one who’s tried.”

Kryptos sighed, and rested his edge against the railing. He cast a longing glance over at Keyhole, and waved his hand at the other henchmaniac.
“Hey, can I have one of those.”

“Not while you’re on the clock Kryptos.” Bill said, sipping from his second cocktail.

The compass wilted, and flopped down on the floor, bemoaning everything.

Pyronica gave Kryptos an unimpressed look, and continued chewing loudly on her snacks.

Bill summoned the list that rested on the table up from the melee and unfolded it, dusting it off. “Let’s see what they’ve promised me. Useless, useless, that one’s a dud, flattering, patronising, obscure enough to maybe work. Redundant.”

Keyhole stepped up beside Bill and peered at the list. Pointing at it, Keyhole commented. “Hey look boss, they’re offering you their worshippers.”

“Pass. I’ve got better ones.” Bill waved his hand dismissively, continuing to read through the list. Looking down at Kryptos, Bill allowed himself a small tangent. “Speaking of, Kryptos, have you made any progress on getting more of those almanacks?”

“Are the ones I got you not working, Boss?” Kryptos asked.

“He’s losing interest. Maybe get some with pictures.” Bill mused. “Or something with advanced permutations of physics. Something to keep him engaged, and distracted.”

“Are you sure it’s a good idea to feed the human information like that? I mean, it’s not like he’s going to be going anywhere once you take Earth.” Kryptos reasoned. “And a human, travelling interdimensionally, in this political climate? Unless he’s reaaaaally something special, he’s going to get wiped out before he makes it to even half of these places. Even two of these places.”

“Yeah, you try telling him that.” Bill griped, and sipped on his drink, looking grimly out into the fray. “The kid’s got ‘Ad Astra Per Aspera’ doodled in all of his journals. He’s not going to let something like expectations, or physical limitations stop him from going where he wants to go. He wants to see the stars, so he sees the stars. If he’ll be hanging around I may as well indulge him.”

“You could stop him, Boss.” Kryptos suggested slyly. “I mean, technically keeping him past the portal’s completion is unnecessary. You could dispose of him like you will with the other scientist.”

“Keeping him is my prerogative, Kryptos.” Bill gave Kryptos a sharp look, scowling at the compass. “This is the fifth time you’ve questioned me like this.”

“I’m just concerned.” Kryptos insisted, putting his hands together. “Look down there. These people don’t respect humans, half of them would enslave them, the other half would eat them, I don’t think there’s a single creature who’d extend the level footing you’re doing for your pet. You’re certainly breaking convention by keeping him.”

“You’re standing in an optical illusion of a stronghold, teetering on the precipice of existing and not existing, talking to someone who managed to convince all the sorry sad sacks who wanted to kill you, who by rights, by convention, should have done when they had the chance – you’re telling me that breaking convention is unusual for me?” Bill raised his brow sceptically at the compass.

“Not unusual. Just… maybe, unwise.” Kryptos winced, and tried to smile politely.

“That’s the same thing people said when I cut a deal with you Kryptos.” Bill rolled his eye. “You want me to take your advice, break our deal, and undo every unwise thing I’ve ever done?”
“There were a lot of unwise things.” Keyhole nodded solemnly before putting his hand up excitedly. “Remember when we stole dark matter from the space cops, and wrote offensive statements on the wall of the space bank, and – and remember when we crashed that Federation party for those diplomats. And remember when –”

“Buddy, I didn’t ask you for a blow by blow.” Bill interrupted Keyhole’s excited rambling, and the henchmaniac laughed, and scratched the back of his head.

“Ha ha. Yeah.” Keyhole grinned, and scuffed the floor with his heel. “Good times.”

“My point being, let me handle Sixer, and keep your angles out of my business for a change.”

“I’m just looking out for you boss.” Kryptos insisted unwisely. “Humans aren’t looked kindly upon, and even if you bring your pet along, you’re going to have to discard that vessel of yours eventually. These people aren’t going to recognise you when the party starts if you’re still in a meatsuit. I’m just saying.”

“Say a little less, maybe.” Pyronica chomped on her Quixlpathians loudly, scowling down at Kryptos.

“I’m just saying.” Kryptos snarked back cattily, though he jumped when Bill brought forth fire in his hand, stroking under his eye thoughtfully, the fire lighting his eye brightly.

“The meatsuit is an issue.” Bill frowned, turning his back on the fighting, floating over to the couches to sit beside Pyronica. “Sure, it’s flattering, in a cute sort of ‘I made you this from space macaroni’ way, but it’s not sustainable. I’ll need to ditch it eventually, before we go live.”

Kryptos stuck his tongue out at Pyronica in a childish manner.

“Hrmmm.” Bill continued to stroke under his eye, before spinning around to watch Keyhole contemplatively. “Keyhole, have you heard much from your cousin lately?”

“Oh, Boss. I know where you’re going, and I gotta say, I don’t think he’ll be pleased to see you.” Keyhole held his hand up defensively, laughing a little. “He’s been up to his neck in it and you’re not helping. I don’t think he’d be happy to see you.”

“I’m not asking him to be happy, I’m just asking him to see me.” Bill said emphatically, his hand extending long to rest on Keyhole’s shoulder. “You can sneak me in, right Keyhole? He doesn’t need to know he’s seeing me. How long has it been since you’ve had a friendly chat with your cousin, huh? Wouldn’t he want to see you? Catch up on family business?”

“I don’t know. I can’t trick him again, he won’t like that.”

Tugging Keyhole closer with that conspiratorial hand on Keyhole’s shoulder, Bill schmoozed. “He doesn’t need to know he’s seeing me. For all he knows, you’ve got a pressing concern, he’d be helping his cousin out. Just arrange a meeting Keyhole. I’ll take care of the rest.”

“That’s all I ask buddy.” Bill patted Keyhole on the shoulder in a friendly way, relaxing back on the couch. “That’s all I ask.”
The Gravity Falls Museum of Natural History was just short of snowed in when Fiddleford pulled up in front of it, the snow chains on the tires of his truck cutting a path through the sudden inclement weather.

Fiddleford was almost surprised to see Ivan waiting out the front of the museum, rugged up in a puffy jacket. He almost thought the carny wouldn’t come. He hadn’t given the poor fellow a time to meet up, he’d just said ‘tomorrow night’. Fiddleford wondered how long the tattooed boy had been standing there outside the museum in the cold, waiting for a cure for his nightmares.

“Hello!” Fiddleford called out, waving as he opened the car door, parking in front of the building. “Sorry to keep you waitin’ long.”

“I’ve only been here for an hour.” Ivan replied, his teeth chattering. “It’s good to see you.”

“Oh gosh.” F jumped out of the truck, grabbing his whiskey crate under his arm, hurrying up the stairs of the museum. He grabbed Ivan by the arm and rubbed his sleeve a little for warmth. “Let’s get you inside. I didn’t mean to make you wait out in the cold like that.”

Following Fiddleford indoors, rubbing his sleeves, Ivan spoke up, his voice almost light hearted, with an edge of bitterness. “You know, for a moment there I almost thought you weren’t coming.”

Fiddleford frowned, and opened the doors to the museum for Ivan. “I wouldn’t do that. I was just late gettin’ here because my drive got snowed in and I needed help gettin’ the chains on the tires.”

“It wouldn’t have been the first time I’ve been tricked.” Ivan sighed, but walked in through the doors, walking over to the pamphlet rack inside, looking through the leaflets. “Not that I think you would, it’s just – a cure for nightmares? It almost sounds too good to be true.”

“It – it’s better than it seems.” Fiddleford replied, adjusting the crate under his arm.

“So, shall we get to it then?” Ivan asked F expectantly.

Fiddleford looked over to the bored looking receptionist sitting at the front desk, before shaking his head, waving Ivan through to the exhibits.

“Maybe not here.”

The two men walked through the museum. It was mostly empty, barring the receptionist and the janitor. It seemed on a freezing day such as this one, people weren’t lining up to spend an hour in the Natural History Museum. It was far more likely they were in their homes, like the rest of the locals here, trying to stay out of the snow.

Fiddleford looked at the exhibits curiously, but he kept casting glances over at Ivan, who seemed to be getting more anxious with every wax figure they passed.

Looking to the side into a seemingly innocuous room displaying some pottery and statues, Fiddleford pulled Ivan into the small room, and closed the door behind him.

“Maybe in here’d be good. I don’t think anyone’ll be fixin’ to bother us in here.”

“The eye room.” Ivan read the plaque on the door, before turning to look at the strange exhibits.
Jars full of eyes filled the displays, and strange pottery fragments lined the walls, all telling a different ocular themed story.

It seems Gravity Fall’s history was preoccupied by eyes, or a single eyed being if Fiddleford’s theory was correct. He assumed the statues Ford found in his study were from the region, that’d match the cave paintings they saw when they went on that ill-fated expedition.

Fiddleford set his whiskey crate down on the floor, and bent over it, opening it up and checking the contents.

Ivan walked around the room, his hand running over the various plaques and displays on the wall, before he pulled a crumpled note out of his pocket.

“All these eyes. They look like the drawing you gave me. Like the symbol. It’s all related, isn’t it?” Fiddleford looked up, and blinked. “Oh, uh, I can see how you’d think that, but that’s just a doodle. I didn’t plan on us comin’ to this specific room, though now that you mention it, it does line up awful well.”

“Oh.” Ivan’s shoulders slumped, and he put the paper back in his pocket, turning around to watch Fiddleford. “What have you got there then?”

“Well, this is a device I invented to remove bad memories. Basically, it taps into the radio frequency that interfaces with brainwaves, isolates and sections off the memory that’s ailing you, and temporarily writes it onto this here electrical tape, so while you can’t remember the bad memory anymore, you’ve got somethin’ saved up for the future if you ever need to remember the deleted memory.” Fiddleford explained and pulled the memory ray out of the box, adjusting the settings and calibrating it. “It’s like a mental safeguard against traumatic memories, and a backup for important facts all at once. Once the memory is removed, its stored in this capsule up the top here, and you can label and archive it, and watch it like a home video whenever it tickles your fancy to.”

“I see.” Ivan rubbed his chin and nodded, most of the scientific jargon going over his head. Fiddleford had simplified it well enough though, enough for Ivan to have a basic understanding of what was going on. “And you say you’ve used this on yourself before? It removes bad memories completely?”

“Well, certain sights might trigger flashback memories, just residual stuff that the subconscious hangs onto to prevent danger and so on. The brain is pretty intuitive. I don’t think it’d let you forget anything really important, like instincts, or things you need to keep you safe. Or breathin’.” Fiddleford twiddled with the specifier on the side of the gun. “You just gotta be careful when you’re inputtin’ the data. You can specify what memories you want to remove here on the side of the gun, and when you’re happy with the specifics, you just point and shoot.”

“That is quite intuitive.” Ivan remarked, peering down at the device.

“So, I take it you’ll want me to remove the night you spent in the Haunted Freak Show, yes?” Fiddleford asked, looking up at Ivan, his hand on the specifier, ready to adjust the settings.

“For starters.” Ivan replied. “Depending on how well it works, I wouldn’t mind getting rid of a few more memories that have been causing me grief since I came to America.”

“Oh.” Fiddleford paused, looking down at the machine. “Well, I mean, repeated use is – you shouldn’t take it lightly, using this machine. It’s supposed to be just for emergencies. Traumatic memories."

“I have traumatic memories.” Ivan admitted, holding his hand over his chest. “You don’t go through life with a head like mine and have a blissful time of things. I’ve dealt with bullies all my life, had things happen I’d sooner forget. I’m sure everyone’s had their fair share of memories like that.”

“Well…” Fiddleford wavered, Ivan repeating the exact same sentiments he’d first professed when using this machine. He would have agreed with Ivan, but there was a small voice in the back of his head that sounded suspiciously like Stanford that told him this wasn’t a good idea to indulge. “I mean, it’s not supposed to be used casually, I’m sure all things in moderation maybe, but if you go around using it all pell-mell you’d forget why you shouldn’t be usin’ it in the first place.”

“Why shouldn’t you use it?” Ivan asked bluntly.

“Well, I don’t want to disappoint – “ Fiddleford stopped, realising that taking Ford’s opinion into account was different when he was using the device on himself, compared to using it to help another person in need.

His regard for Ford couldn’t – shouldn’t trump his empathy for another soul in need of assistance. That just wasn’t right.

“I don’t know.” Fiddleford finished, speaking mostly to himself. “I know I had a good ten reasons why this was a bad idea cookin’ up in my noggin, but they aren’t my reasons, and they don’t seem relevant now. Not with you bein’ here, bein’ in need.”

“Why do you hesitate?” Ivan questioned, tilting his head.

“Well, I’ve got a friend who I know won’t approve. He don’t think much of the concept of fiddlin’ around with people’s memories. He’s very principled, I guess.” Fiddleford frowned. “And he can’t ever know about us doin’ this. He wouldn’t take it well at all.”

“So, we keep it a secret then.” Ivan deduced, before grinning wide. “Like a secret society. We could wear robes, and pass coded messages, and meet in secret.”

Fiddleford scratched the back of his head, standing up with the gun in his hand now. “I don’t have no robes. I got a bathrobe, maybe.”

“A bathrobe! Ha, ha. Brilliant!” Ivan clapped, and nodded. “You know, I really think that’s a good idea. That way we could keep this device a secret from your friend, and use it to help people in need. People who need to forget.”

Fiddleford smiled politely, before he looked back down to the specifier. “Let’s just focus on helpin’ you for now. So, we’ll try erasin’ the Freak Show memory?”

“For starters.” Ivan nodded, and stood across the room from Fiddleford. “Should I brace myself? Will it hurt?”

“Just a sting.” Fiddleford twisted the specifier, typing in ‘Haunted Freak Show’. “It’ll be over in a second and you won’t even remember the initial shock once it happens. You can just – just stand over there. I’ll do it quickly, then you can see how you feel.”

“Right. Right.” Ivan nodded, and braced himself against one of the desks in the room, resting his hands on the wood. He seemed remarkably eager to put all of his trust in this machine, in Fiddleford, but given how he seemed to throw himself wholeheartedly into whatever he did, be it head tattoos, or joining the travelling carnival, it made sense. “I’m ready.”

Fiddleford brought the machine up to eye height, and held it out in front of him, priming the beam by holding down the trigger. He pointed it at Ivan, and once the device was humming, fully loaded, he released the trigger and fired the beam at Ivan’s tattooed head.

The bright light of the beam blinded Ivan momentarily, and he felt a sting at the back of his eyes, like the beginnings of a headache, before he blinked the brightness out of his eyes and it was over. Just like that.

Ivan rubbed his forehead, before looking over to Fiddleford. “I don’t feel any different.”

“Can you remember what you’ve been havin’ nightmares about?” Fiddleford asked curiously.

Ivan stood there, wracking his brain, before he laughed in shock. “I – I can’t. It’s like it isn’t there. Like it never happened. This is brilliant.”

Fiddleford smiled, feeling accomplished, before he began putting the gun back into the crate, tidying it away. “Give it a night and see how you’re feelin’ in the morning. I suppose I should give you my phone number so you can let me know if you’re havin’ any side effects, or if you need any more help. There shouldn’t be side effects, it’d be just in case.”

Ivan stepped forward, and held his hand out to F, his eyes bright with curiosity and wonder. “Do you mind if I hold it for a second? Before you put it away.”

Fiddleford paused, and weighed down the pro’s and con’s. Something in his subconscious was telling him that letting anyone else wield this device was a bad idea, but his common sense and trust overrode that impulse, and he passed the device to Ivan.

Pointing to the canister, he explained a little, as the young man turned the device over in his hands. “That there’s the canister that stores your memory, so if you’re ever needin’ it again, to look through or anything, it’ll be there for you to access. I’ll look after it for you, so you don’t need to dwell on it.”

“I must say, it truly is the most spectacular invention.” Ivan remarked, holding the gun in his left hand, and tossing it to his right. “To think, it can solve so many problems, just like that. You’re certainly quite the genius.”

“Well.” Fiddleford chuckled, and rubbed behind his neck sheepishly, his cheeks pinking at the praise.

He watched Ivan play with the gun, but the moment when the young man levelled it to point playfully at F, like some sort of James Bond caricature, F’s shoulders seized up, his body reacting defensively to the sight of his own memory gun being pointed at him.

For an instant, Fiddleford wasn’t seeing Ivan, bald, pale Ivan pointing the gun playfully at him. Instead he saw a dark figure, with burning gold eyes, and sharp white teeth grinning at him, pressing the bulb of the device against the skin of his forehead. For an instant, F could feel the bulb pressed against his skin, and he felt a wash of terror flood over him.

Snatching it out of Ivan’s hand, his pulse racing, Fiddleford hurriedly put the gun away.

“T-that’s enough of that now.”
“Sorry.” Ivan apologised, but his voice seemed far away.

It felt like Fiddleford was having a panic attack, his heartbeat thumping loudly in his ears, beating in his throat. As he packed the gun away in the box, he felt a tightness in his chest swell up, and an irrational fear for Pat and Tate’s wellbeing stir. His subconscious was screaming at him, trying to remind him of something crucial he forgot.

“Are you alright?” Ivan asked, coming into focus now, and F blinked, before exhaling, trying to calm himself.

“I’m f-fine.” Fiddleford replied, and tried to believe it, before he packed the device away more securely in the whiskey crate. Breathing out again, regaining some of his calm, he smiled apologetically up at Ivan. “Sorry for snappin’ at you.”

“It’s quite alright. It’s your device. I wouldn’t want to break anything by playing around with it.” Ivan assured F calmly.

Reaching into his pocket, Fiddleford patted himself down, finding a pen but no paper. “Let me just – gotta give you my phone number.”

“Do you not have any paper?” Ivan asked, before rummaging through his own pockets, passing F the crumpled page Fiddleford had passed him before, with the symbol drawn on the page. “Here.”

Fiddleford scribbled the phone number for the shack down on the back of the page and passed it over to Ivan, hefting the whiskey crate back under his arm and smiling. “There. Just let me know if you’re feelin’ any ill effects, or if you need help with anything else, and I’ll do my best to be there.”

“Thank you very much Mr McGucket.” Ivan replied respectfully, and rushed forward to hold open the door for Fiddleford, as he had his hands full with the crate.

F walked out of the museum, Ivan hovering at his side all the way until he slid the crate into the passenger seat of the truck, watching him with hero-worship dancing in his eyes.

“Do you need a ride back to the – the carnival I guess?” Fiddleford asked, not wanting to leave the young man out in the cold again.

“Oh, no. I’m staying in the motel just down the road. It’s quite alright.” Ivan demurred, but smiled jovially, waving at F as he walked away. “I’m sure I’ll sleep like a baby tonight!”

“Let me know.” Fiddleford waved back, and watched Ivan leave.

He stood there for a while, lost in thought before hopping into the front seat of the truck, putting his keys in the ignition. The engine warmed up, and Fiddleford turned the truck’s air conditioning up high, rubbing his hands together, holding them in front of the vents, trying to warm himself in the wintery cold air.

He sat in his truck for a while, warming up, mulling over the encounter with Ivan.

“Well.” Fiddleford said to himself, looking down at the whiskey crate on the passenger seat beside him. “That went better than I expected it to.”

Drumming his fingers on the steering wheel, Fiddleford looked away from the whiskey crate for a moment, looking over the white parking lot, the snow still falling down, making it a white Christmas in Oregon for sure.
Fiddleford cast another glance at the crate, and felt temptation creep up on him.

If he were being practical, he could technically use the device again this evening, and Stanford need never know.

Fiddleford drummed his fingers against the wheel again, before reaching over to scoot the crate closer to him.

“Maybe just one more stop.”

He revved the truck’s engine and reversed out of the parking lot, driving off into the night.

Knocking tentatively on Bill’s bedroom door, Stanford pushed the door open just a tad, peering into the room.

Bill was sleeping, his face squashed against one of the numerous pillows piled up around his bed, his eyebrows twitching in his sleep. Gold light exuded from his tattoos, and his shirt was riding up to reveal the tattoo crisscrossing binding runes across his back.

Ford felt a little shameful, just watching Bill sleep like this, but considering they were what passed for dating, Ford rationalised that there really was nothing creepy or unwarranted about this.

Bill was fascinating to watch.

Stanford had made him, made him this vessel. So rarely did he get the opportunity to examine it without Bill shooting knowing looks or snide comments at him.

Ford particularly enjoyed how expressive Bill’s face was. Pressed into the pillow, Ford could only see half of Bill’s high cheek-boned visage, but he enjoyed the way Bill seemed to scowl in his sleep. It looked like Bill was rolling his eyes quite a bit, Ford could see Bill’s eyelids moving.

Settling down on the edge of the bed, Ford just paused, watching Bill, quite content with this uninterrupted period of observation.

Bill was mumbling into his pillow, uncensored in his sleep. Ford listened, always curious about what could possibly go on in his mysterious muse’s head.

“Vqvbgrf. Qb V unir gb qb rirelguvat zlfrys?”

Ah, that peculiar interstellar language again.

Ford had been trying to decrypt it, but he never quite got the syllables transcribed correctly. It was bizarre to hear it spoken, it seemed to have far too many consonants for a functional language, yet the cadence and flow suggested it was. Ford couldn’t assume much for grammar either, comparing Bill’s strange space language to any Earth language could very well be an exercise in redundancy.

He wondered what Bill was saying.

“Nggragvba nffubyrf! Gur rairtybrf lbh ner orngvat bar nabgure jvgu ner va snpg qrpblf! Vs lbh
Bill finally smiled, smacking his lips in his sleep, turning to curl around Ford’s warm torso without opening his eyes.

Ford froze for a moment, convinced he’d been caught watching Bill while he slept, but the muse didn’t wake. Instead he gravitated to Ford, nuzzling up to the scientist’s body, arms clinging to him instinctively.

Well that was somewhat gratifying. Bill liked to waver between scornful derision of their relationship, and avowed clinginess, changing his mind often enough that it would give Ford trust issues if he hadn’t come to know that contrariness as just a part of the muse’s personality.

Not that Ford expected Bill would lie to him about it, but it was comforting to know that the subconscious couldn’t lie. Bill’s desire for closeness with him was as plain as day when the muse had his eyes closed. He almost seemed happy like this, cosying up to Ford’s warmth, draping his arms across Ford’s lap.

Amused, Ford gently stroked his hand through Bill’s bright yellow hair, gratified by the way the God leaned into his touch.

For someone so standoffish, Bill seemed to crave physical comfort, physical touch. Throw an intangible being into a tangible body, and suddenly the god was addicted to the stuff. But not from anyone else, just from Stanford. That was gratifying too.

“Are you waking up?” Ford murmured, still playing with Bill’s hair. He pushed the muse’s bangs off his forehead and peered at Bill’s face, his eyes still closed, and continued to stroke through Bill’s hair. “No. Still sleeping.”

Bill smacked his lips again, then began chewing slightly on Ford’s trousers. Gently Ford pushed Bill’s forehead, inching him away, assuming the muse was hungry.

Perhaps now was the time to wake him up.

“Hrrmpghsff.” Bill mumbled unintelligibly, though he didn’t appear to be talking. Just sleepy.

“Are you waking up? I have a surprise for you.” Ford tempted, wondering if Bill could hear him yet.

“Mmrrh?” That caught his attention, and Bill’s eyebrows creased, before he wedged one slitted yellow eye open, peering up at Ford. “You’re not my bed.”

“Or your dinner.” Ford added lightly, gesturing to the wet patch of drool on his trousers.

Groggily Bill began sitting up, rubbing his eyes with his fists. “How long have you been —” “Bill yawned loudly. “Been sitting there?”
“Not too long.” Ford replied, rubbing Bill’s shoulder. “You talk in your sleep, you know.”

Bill froze slightly, his shoulder’s tensing beneath Ford’s palm, and the muse watched him steadily. “Oh?”

“You’ll have to teach me that strange language of yours.” Ford continued rubbing Bill’s shoulder, oblivious to his tension. “It’s not in any of the books you’ve given me.”

Relaxing, Bill rolled his shoulders. “Learning languages is a redundant luxury. If you hate fashion and don’t mind looking stupid, you just wear a Dimensional Translator and it does all the work for you. You can get them in most interdimensional Seven-Blelevens, easy.”

“Is that how you speak so many languages?” Ford asked gamely.

“I speak so many languages because I’m the font of all knowledge, Smart Guy.” Bill smirked, and poked Stanford’s nose winsomely. “Omniscience never looked so good.”

“So says the man who didn’t know what a toaster w-“

“You could have just agreed with me.” Bill huffed, and crossed his arms. “It wasn’t so hard to do.”

“Your ego is bloated enough as it is.” Ford said, though his tone was fond.

“So, what, you wake me up, you sass me up and down, what’s next?” Bill watched Ford with those sharp yellow eyes of his. “Ritualistic dismemberment?”

“I was going to ask –“ Ford tried, sounding very much put upon. “If you wanted a massage.”

Bill blinked at Ford, lacking an answer.

“A proper one.” Ford added insistently, pointing to the bottle of massage oil he brought with him, sitting on the bedside table.

“What were all those other ones, if this is a proper one?” Bill asked suspiciously.

“Practise, not that I needed it.” Ford replied somewhat self-indulgently. “As I’m two digits up on everyone else, I’ve been told my massages are a step up from the standard.”

“Who told you that?” Bill squinted suspiciously. “Who else have you been massaging?”

“Well, no one’s actually told me that.” Ford admitted, wanting to halt Bill’s jealousy before it brewed. “But if they had, I imagine that’s what they’d say.”

“Huh.” Bill continued to squint suspiciously at Ford, leaning away from him slightly so he could more adeptly graze his gaze up and down Ford like he wasn’t impressed.

Tutting, Bill’s suspicion an amusing display of possessiveness, Ford stood up, and spread the towel he brought with him across Bill’s bed, tidying and arranging the pillows. Bill sat unhelpfully in the middle of the bed, and Ford had to yank him to his feet to spread the towel out.

“If you want to do something useful you can take your clothes off and wait there.”

“Someone’s forward.”

“Bill, I’ve seen you naked. I built your body.”
“I know, but you don’t have to rub it in.” Bill huffed and began stripping down, until he was standing in his boxers, his hands crossed over his chest like he was shy.

“Actually I do.” Ford joked, pointing to the bottle of oil cheekily.

“Why do I even bother?” Bill huffed, and shook his head at Ford’s obvious pun. It was kind of funny. Summoning the cuffs, Bill snapped them onto his wrists, guessing correctly that this would be the sort of worshipful activity that would raze his insides to ash if he let it.

“Now you just lay down. On your belly. You don’t need to keep those on, you know. This is supposed to be relaxing.”

Bill looked at the cuffs, then realised Sixer was referring to the boxers, and sheepishly he stepped out of them, throwing them aside and laying on the towel, casting suspicious glances over his shoulder the entire time.

“You’re too smug already. I don’t like this.”

“You will.” Ford assured him, before rolling up the sleeves of his shirt, then, second guessing himself, unbuttoning the shirt and discarding it. “Don’t want to get it dirty.”

“What’s the point of this again?” Bill asked, watching Ford remove his shirt. “Because I’m really not following.”

Flicking open the bottle of massage oil and rubbing it between his hands, Ford looked over Bill’s naked body with a satisfaction already burning in his chest. The muse was beautiful, and contrary, and just a little off balance, the way Ford liked him.

“The point is to relax.” Ford insisted, bringing his oiled hands down to smooth over Bill’s back. “And stop talking, if you can manage that. Just focus on sensation.”

“Stop talking – he says.” Bill mimicked mockingly. “You just like the sound of your own voice, you just want –“

“Clearly I’m not the only one.” Ford smoothed his hands across Bill’s back a little more firmly, the oil spreading across the muse’s ebony skin, making it glisten in the low light. “Just try to enjoy this a little. Enjoy being corporeal, inhabiting a body – touch. There’s nothing wrong with relaxing a little here. Fiddleford won’t be back until late, it’s just you and me tonight. Relax.”

Letting out a frustrated sigh, Bill attempted to relax, clutching onto the pillow underneath the towel, slow to warm up to this sort of conduct. When Ford hummed in a pleased sort of way, no longer talking, Bill sighed again, and let some of the tension seep out of him bit by bit.

“Your tattoos look beautiful.” Ford commented.

“You could stand to unbind a few more.” Bill mumbled into the pillow.

“You’re supposed to be relaxing.” Ford reminded him, conveniently ignoring Bill, continuing to rub oil into the muse’s sore muscles.

Grumbling slightly, Bill wiggled back into the pillows, letting Sixer rub away his stresses.

Bill had been feeling the pressure, with the portal’s completion date inching ever closer, with the silent auction playing out so raucously, with dealing with idiots, handling everything on his own, making sure every last variable was accounted for. It had all been mounting.
Somehow it was ironic that it always seemed to be Sixer who helped cut those pressures up into little pieces and scatter them to the wind. It was always Sixer who streamlined the portal’s process, barely needing any supervision with staying on track, and it was always Sixer who, after a stressful period in the mindscape, somehow always managed to pick up on that tension, despite being disastrously unobservant in other ways, and distracted Bill, or helped him look away from his troubles while they approached, screaming for attention.

Melting slowly into the pillows, feeling Sixer’s broad calloused hands smooth over his back, kneading the tense knots in his muscles away like putty, Bill sighed again, more contented this time, closing his eyes.

“This is like a holiday.” Bill murmured, relaxing more and more.

“In the middle of December.” Ford remarked. Kneading the knots out of Bill’s shoulders, he continued, trying to mimic the calm voice he assumed a masseuse would employ. “If it helps, you could close your eyes and picture a beach, or the like. A tropical … lovely – there would be sand.”

“Sixer, just shut up.” Bill advised, resting his forehead against the towel, feeling warmed from the inside out. Sixer’s regard was lovely, but his running commentary left something to be desired.

The only beach Bill could think of was the one where he genocidally dismembered the Amaphabons in an attempt to strike out at the Axolotl, and look what that got him. Not very much. Not even a reaction from Big Gills. Talk about unsatisfying.

This massage was marginally more satisfying. The massage oil smelled like coconut, like those cakes Bill liked, and Sixer’s dextrous hands were unerring at seeking out tense spots on Bill’s back, massaging them out until Bill only felt bliss.

“Mmm, ‘s good.” Bill mumbled, remembering to reassure Sixer with praise. Sixer liked praise. Ford did indeed enjoy praise, and he was enjoying a lot of things about this massage experience.

Bill was practically melted down into a puddle of godly mush on the bed, his tattoos glowing persistently, lighting the oil as it was kneaded into the muse’s body, giving Ford an excuse to fondle every muscle he moulded into existence, to feel every inhale and satisfied exhale the muse exuded as Ford wrung the tension out of Bill like water from a rag.

He knew he was lucky, to be able to touch this gorgeous being, to have unrestricted access to Bill like this, but Ford couldn’t deny he had ulterior motives for suggesting this surprise, bringing his hands down lower to massage Bill’s shapely rear.

“Mmmmmm.” Bill mumbled, clearly enjoying the massage, despite Ford’s wandering hands.

So far the muse’s temperature was under control, and while he ran hotter than a regular human, he managed to keep his temperature just shy of 42 degrees, not hot enough to burn Stanford.

As Ford continued to knead Bill’s oiled buttocks, rolling the supple flesh in his hands, he felt his face flush as his technical goal for this evening’s surprise came into view.

Ford wasn’t sure how he’d go about broaching the topic of a more traditional intercourse with Bill. The magazines he’d surreptitiously bought from that truck stop several counties over detailed explicitly the benefits of homosexual intercourse, the biological ins and outs of it all (though that may be a poor choice of wording) and while curiosity was in Ford’s nature, he was uncertain about Bill’s comparative biology. Uncertain enough to believe that this might not work.
This was a preliminary test of sorts. Another experiment. If Bill reacted like a normal human would, biologically speaking, then Stanford felt like he could go ahead with this sort of devious sexual conduct, but if the muse garnered no pleasure from it, Stanford couldn’t justify seeking his own pleasure that way, despite what seedy truck stop magazines said about the satisfaction of the act.

Pouring more oil on his hands, rubbing them together, Ford let the oil drizzle down across Bill’s lower back, and slowly began spreading it along the cleft of Bill’s cheeks, keeping one hand on Bill’s upper back, continuing the massage while he experimented.

Bill barely noticed Ford’s focus, melting pleasantly onto the bed, his brain scattering nicely due to the intensity of the worship. Every exhale was laden with bliss, and Bill began developing a thorough appreciation for tangibility, and having a vessel with so many happy little nerve endings singing out to him.

Ford rubbed the oil down between Bill’s legs, and pressed his thumb firmly against the pucker, rubbing gently, watching Bill’s reactions like a hawk to see if this was permissible.

Bill shuddered through the new sensation, and lifted his head curiously, cracking open his eye.

“Mmmrgh, Sixer?”

“I want to try something new.” Ford said hurriedly, explaining himself. “And it’s alright if you don’t like it, we don’t have to – I figured since you’re regulating your temperature better now we could – I don’t even know if your biology supports this, and internal and external temperatures are two very different things – I – “

“What?” Bill croaked, still electrified by the shot of pure undiluted worship that jolted through him when Sixer pressed his thumb against him. These human nerve endings sure were something. Bill didn’t even know the half of it yet.

“If you can –“ Ford began hopefully. “Please, just try and regulate your internal temperature for me. Just a bit. Just for a while.”

Ford ran his index finger across Bill’s entrance now, soaking the oil in there, lubricating his muse sufficiently while he begged for the opportunity to try.

“I know it’s something new, and it might feel strange at first, but if this works, please, please, I promise you, you’ll like it. You might –“

“Sixer.” Bill croaked again, continually rattled by the spike of sensation as Sixer teased his finger across that spot, leaning heavily on the apparatus as the worship poured like kerosene, igniting him helplessly. “Shut up, and just do it.”

Permission granted, Ford pressed ahead, sliding his lubricated index finger into Bill slowly, feeling it out.

Bill was hot. Hotter on the inside than the outside. Just shy of excruciating really, but as Stanford felt around that inner ring of muscle, he felt enough familiarity with Bill’s anatomy to think that potentially this might work. He wasn’t being burned, just squeezed by an incredibly hot chasm.

Bill was tense again, his legs shaking a little, as he focused all he had on keeping his temperature as low as possible, biting his bottom lip to let Sixer continue his worship drenched exploration. How Bill was supposed to keep his temperature down while it felt like his entire body was on fire, he didn’t know, but somehow he was managing it. Mentally he was cracking the whip double time. to get Teeth switching those batteries, as he was going through them incredibly quickly.

Pulling his finger out slightly, before pushing back in, Ford continued to probe his muse, watching him wriggle about like he was simmering from the sensation of it all.

“I can’t believe this is working.” Ford murmured, marvelling at the fact that he was experiencing this, that this was happening.

“Shut up. Shut up. Shut up shut up shut up.” Bill chanted, gripping onto the towel, his tattoos glowing intensely as he attempted to control himself.

“Try and relax.” Ford advised, thinking back on those magazines. He rubbed Bill’s back soothingly. “I’m going to try another one.”

“Relax? Sixer!!” Bill whined, already overwhelmed by just the one. Relaxing was the opposite of this, accommodating Ford’s exploratory finger, and trying not to incinerate it. This was like being strung out on the most incredibly potent worship there was. Sixer was delivering physical worship, pleasing himself with this exploration, marvelling at it right at the altar. Bill WAS the altar, and he was about to explode.

“Just relax.” Ford insisted, deciding Bill was lubricated and loose enough to try another finger, wedging it in with the first, slowly twisting them together.

Bill could barely manage to shudder through this, panting and whining, his breath shaky and short. It was pleasurable, vaguely, through the overwhelming fog of worship. The apparatus was trying vainly to draw it away as quickly as it came, but there was too much of it, and Bill felt oversaturated with sensation.

Ford wiggled his fingers deeper and began searching for something, crooking his fingers intermittently.

“Now if I could just find –“ Ford muttered, while exploring his strung out muse, watching his skin glisten with sweat and oil as he writhed, barely containing himself on the mattress.

“Sixer!” Bill moaned, recognising vaguely through the haze of worship that Sixer’s questing fingers felt weird but not unwelcome, wiggling inside of him like that. He wasn’t entirely sure what Sixer thought he’d find there though, until his happy little nerve endings all sang out strong, informing him.

“AHH ahh-hhhhh.” Bill shouted out, his body jolting as Sixer’s fingers brushed against his prostate. It seems Sixer made this body the way human insides were intended to be, despite Bill’s own peculiar twist on inhabiting it.

Oozing triumph, Ford bumped his fingers against that spot again, wringing loud cries from his muse.

“Oh – ahh - Bu shpx, bu shpx – fu – ahh SIXER!”

Leaning forward, pressing his hand firmly down on the middle of Bill’s back, Ford felt himself straining in his trousers, the sight of Bill taking his fingers, and his noises, were so arousing.

Trying to build a rhythm of it, Ford started fucking Bill in earnest with his fingers, bumping against that spot as often as he could just to drive Bill inarticulate.

It was working.

Bill’s own member was straining, rubbing persistently against the soft terrycloth, dribbling a small amount of that strange gold fluid as Sixer fucked him soundly into the mattress with just two fingers.

Judging from the way Bill strained back up against Sixer’s hand, grasping for the human blindly with his left hand while his right twisted fistfuls of the blanket desperately, he didn’t hate him. It seemed quite the opposite, to Ford, proof, blatant evidence of how much his muse wanted him.

Deciding to flip him over, so Bill could sputter out his declarations of sweet emotion into Ford’s mouth, Ford continued to fuck Bill, maintaining the angle as best as he could while he plastered himself on top of Bill, pressing them close, chest to chest. Ford captured Bill’s mouth, pressing sloppy possessive kisses onto the muse that Bill could only pant through, clutching onto Ford’s shoulder, his nails digging in desperately.

Bill’s cock was straining upright now, leaking gold fluid, bouncing in rhythm with Sixer’s rapid wrist movements, rocking Bill’s whole body. The pleasure was so intense, tears trailed down Bill’s cheeks as the muse brainlessly panted Ford’s nickname like a prayer. The gold aura from their first experiment with the cuffs flooded Bill’s body now, lighting the room as he teetered on the brink of the most intense orgasm this body had ever experienced, Sixer plastering wet fervid kisses to his jaw while he shuddered and moaned, his consciousness shattering and coming back together in a way that nearly overloaded two batteries, one after the other.

Proof of Ford’s success spurted gold, splattering the warm substance across Ford’s chest, rubbing between them as Ford continued fucking Bill through his release until he was certain his muse was finished.

Over sensitised and wrung out, Bill faintly batted his hands against Sixer’s chest, weakly pushing him away as he mumbled half words.

“No more – no more – you broke me – Si –“

Conceding, Ford let his fingers slip out of Bill, his muse’s legs shaking. Ford wiped his fingers on the towel, and with his clean hand, he stroked the side of Bill’s sweaty face, pressing kisses to Bill’s jaw and murmuring praise.

“You did so well. That was – you’re amazing. You –“

“Stop. You’ve killed me. I’m dying Sixer.” Bill moaned, pushing Ford’s face away softly.

Sixer chuckled, and sat up, giving Bill a little space, patting his leg with a smile. “You’re not dying.”

“Ugh.”

Bill twitched through the aftershocks of that spectacular orgasm, slowly melting back onto the bed, exhausted. Receiving that much worship really took it out of a God, that was intense.

Ford watched Bill process the aftermath with a smirk, feeling smug and satisfied that his experiment was such a roaring success.

He hadn’t been burned, he’d thoroughly overwhelmed the God, and he may or may not need to change into a fresh pair of trousers.
As always, his ego became something sizable when he processed that he was here, making a God tremble, breaking down Bill’s barriers like this and wringing such genuine reactions out of him.

He felt beyond special, to have this opportunity.

Rather than simply stare fondly at Bill while the muse struggled to regain his equilibrium, Ford tugged the towel out from under him and wiped down both of their chests, cleaning them up sufficiently.

Laying down beside Bill, Ford pressed a self-satisfied kiss to Bill’s forehead, watching the muse moan pitifully.

“Thank you for that. Truly.”

“Just roll me outside. Just dump me in the snow. I’m burning up.” Bill continued complaining, laying next to Sixer, slowly regaining agency over his floppy limbs.

“You’re fine.” Ford laughed, and pressed his hand against Bill’s forehead, feeling his temperature fluctuate.

Looking down at the muse, taking in his fluttering eyelashes, his vibrant gold eyes, the way he seemed to glow from the inside out, laying there pressed elbow to elbow with Ford, smirking with every dramatic statement he delivered, Ford felt a certain declaration hover at the tip of his tongue. He wanted to say it, he did.

Deciding to hold it back, Ford demurred, and stood up with a grunt, brushing Bill’s hair off his forehead as he went.

“I’ll open a window.”

Looking out the window as he opened it up to the brisk snowy air, Ford noticed Fiddleford’s truck was still missing and vaguely wondered where he was.

Shrugging to himself, Ford turned back to tend to his dramatic complaining muse.

---

“Now Gentlemen, I’ve been wantin’ to thank you all for the hard work you’ve been doin’ on my project. Y’all got it done in record time, and I just wanted to give all y’all something to take home for Christmas, along with your bonuses, as a thank you, to you and your families.”

Fiddleford levelled the memory gun at the construction workers he’d gathered, and primed the device. It hummed to life, the beam building as Fiddleford held down the trigger.

“Now you won’t remember this, but this is some of the finest work you’ve done. So congratulations y’all.”

Fiddleford released the trigger and blasted the assembled construction workers with the memory ray, removing their memories swiftly from their minds.

“And Merry Christmas.”
White light filled the room, and all was forgotten.

Chapter End Notes

Bill's language is spoken caesar cipher which you can decrypt here https://www.xarg.org/tools/caesar-cipher/ if you like uncovering the sassy mysteries of everyone's favourite triangle.
Next chapter Fiddleford reveals his Christmas gift as we go Into The Bunker, and things start getting schwifty - I mean shifty.
I hope you all enjoyed! Feel free to leave a comment, I always love reading your comments.
This chapter is dedicated to katsucii who always leaves the loveliest comments and inspires me lots :D thank you bud
Deep inside, both of us can feel the autumn chill.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Stanford was making his way to the kitchen, rugged up in his dressing gown and fluffiest socks, for the express purpose of retrieving just-past-midnight snacks to share with the God upstairs, when the phone started ringing.

Ford squinted into the living room, wondering who the devil would be calling so late at night.

Balancing the box of eggnog, two glasses, and a packet of ginger cookies under his arm, Stanford shuffled into the lounge room and maneuvered the items he was carrying under one arm so he could reach to answer the phone.

“Hello?” Ford asked, rather crossly.

“It worked! It worked! The nightmare is over! It never happened. Thank you, you’re my saviour!” Came the tinny distortion of a rather out of breath British voice over the phone.

“Who is this?” Ford questioned, his tone quite gruff and confused.

“Oh, you’re –” The British voice paused briefly, before muttering. “You can’t know. It’s a secret.”

“I beg your pardon?” Ford pressed, his paranoia flaring up. Pressing the phone closer to his ear with his shoulder, Ford listened intently, trying to pick up clues from the sounds on the other end of the line. “Who are you?”

There was a crackle on the phone, and then a silence. For a moment Ford thought he’d been hung up on, like this was some sort of prank call, before the voice whispered.

“It has been unseen.”

Ford barely heard that whisper, but it set all the hairs on the back of his neck on edge.

“Hello?” Ford asked uncertainly, but was left with no answers, only a resolute dial tone, as the mysterious caller hung up.

“Hello?” Ford asked redundantly, feeling decidedly paranoid, not certain what he’d just heard.

Staring at the phone, Ford felt perturbed beyond belief, and slowly put the handset back on the stand, clicking it into place.

“Strange.” Ford muttered, walking over to the window to look outside.

He couldn’t see anyone out there, just the heavy snowfall blurring the yard with white. Closing the curtains tightly, and checking the locks on the door, Ford frowned, before adjusting the cups, nog, and biscuits under his arm, trudging back up the stairs.

“I just got the strangest phone call.” Ford reported, as he opened the door to Bill’s room, setting the glasses down on the bedside table.

“Where’s the nog? Aren’t you going to nog the nog?” Bill asked, reclining comfortably naked, in bed, reading one of Ford’s journals.
“This is the nog.” Ford gestured to the box of eggnog he’d brought from the grocery store in an attempt to be sufficiently seasonal.

“It’s not nog until you spice it up a little. Go back down there, and bring back the nog.”

“You mean the rum?” Ford clarified.

Bill raised his eyebrow at Ford, and pointed imperiously to the door. “I mean the nog.”

Sighing and rolling his eyes, Ford dutifully marched back downstairs to retrieve the alcohol, indulging his muse’s whims.

The phone call was forgotten until the morning.

Fiddleford was chatting away to Patricia and Tate on the telephone on the morning of the 25th, cooing Christmas greetings to his infant son and wife at a reasonable volume.

A reasonable volume sounded like a verbal assault, by the time Stanford made it downstairs, his muse following, wrapped warm in Sixer’s dressing gown, smothering a yawn.

“Where did I put the advil?” Ford muttered, wincing at every passing sound, his hangover torturing him mercilessly.

“THE WHAT?” Bill yelled directly into Ford’s ear, grinning gleefully as Stanford tried to swat at him, glaring at the muse.

“Are you professionally annoying, or is it just a hobby?” Ford growled, pushing Bill out of the way as he opened cupboards, looking for the painkillers.

“More of a lifestyle.” Bill replied smugly, before waving his hand, summoning the advil from the pantry. “Are you looking for these?”

Ford swiped for the painkillers, but Bill jumped back, and held the pill box over his head, playing keep-backsies.

“Say please.”

“Give them here Bill.” Ford lunged for the muse, grabbing him before he managed to dash away, and was trying to pull Bill’s arm down to wrestle the pills from him.

Ford managed to yank Bill’s hand down, but the pills weren’t there, instead they were hovering overhead, just out of Ford’s reach.

“Look, no hands!” Bill cheered, laughing all the while Ford shook him by the wrist.

“Fiddleford is just in the other room. Bring them down. Bill. Right now!”

Bill let the pills fall soundly onto Sixer’s forehead, and the human winced, rubbing his cranium, before bending to pick the pills off the floor.
“Ahh, you’re so entertaining when you’re hungover.” Bill beamed at Ford as the surly scientist popped two of the pills from the packet and chucked them back, pouring tap water in a glass to chase the pills down.

With water still swilling in his mouth, Ford pointed to Bill crankily. “You can make your own breakfast.”

Sitting in one of the chairs at the kitchen table, Bill crossed his legs and laced his fingers together, batting his eyelashes at Ford. “But Sixer, it’s Christmas!”

“Bah.” Ford waved his hand dismissively at Bill, and turned to root through the fridge, looking for something to eat.

Pulling a sausage of bologna out, Ford peeled back the plastic wrap covering it, and bit into the meat, holding the bottle of orange juice in his other hand, twisting the cap off and taking a swig straight from the bottle.

“You barbarian.” Bill remarked fondly, chiding Sixer’s manners.

Ford was about to flip Bill his six-fingered estimation of a very rude gesture, when Fiddleford walked into the kitchen, full of energy and vigour.

“Mornin’ gentlemen! It’s a beautiful white Christmas we got ourselves out there.” F walked into the room, flinging open the kitchen curtains, looking out into the yard with a satisfied nod. “The sun is shinin’, the snow’s stopped fallin’, it’s like a winter wonderland out there.”

Ford groaned, and raised his hand to shield his eyes against the glare of the sun reflecting off the snow. Bill cackled and swung his legs, enjoying Sixer’s pain.

“What’s wrong with Stanford?” Fiddleford asked, puzzled by his colleague’s behaviour.

“Sixer can’t handle his nog.” Bill explained with a grin.

“That’s slander. Uproarious slander.” Ford protested, glaring at Bill. “I want to trade you in for an assistant who doesn’t slander me.”

“The nog has made you bitter and jaded.” Bill surmised, nodding sagely.

“Do I want to know what the nog is?” Fiddleford questioned, not really sure he wanted an answer.

“He doesn’t even know what nog is.” Ford pointed accusingly at Bill, while the muse spoke over him, shaking his head.

“The world may never know.”

“Well, you two sure woke up festive.” Fiddleford remarked, watching the strange dynamic the two men displayed, their bickering almost flirtatious at this point. “Didja have a late night? I came in around ten thirty and I didn’t see you. I just went straight to bed.”

“It was an unwise late night.” Ford rubbed his stubble, leaning back against the kitchen counter. “And the last time I agree to play a drinking game with you.”

“He’s all nogged out, the poor little thing.” Bill grinned, watching Ford closely.

“We were up past midnight, and then some.” Ford explained, before remembering the peculiar phone call. “Speaking of late, sometime around one AM the phone rang. I felt like I was being prank called, it was the most peculiar thing.”

“Oh?” Fiddleford questioned, a waver of hesitation in his voice. “Maybe they just got the wrong number.”

“No, they definitely knew who I was.” Ford insisted, taking another sip from the orange juice before wiping his mouth on the back of his hand. “It was really peculiar. They were talking about a secret, telling me I couldn’t know? I couldn’t know what? It was all rather dramatic, there was whispering, and I think they were putting on an accent. Calling at one in the morning!”

“Well that’s – that’s weird.” Fiddleford remarked awkwardly, trying to look convincingly ignorant about who could possibly be placing that sort of phone call. “You think it was a prank?”

“Well if it was genuine, then we’d all have reason to be concerned.” Ford decided, frowning.

“Are you sure you didn’t just imagine it?” Fiddleford pressed. “I mean, if you were drinking, it could have just been a dream.”

“No, this was before the nog.” Ford maintained. “You don’t know anything about it, do you? Who else would have this phone number? I don’t just give it out to anyone.”

“I gave the number for this place out to my family, and a couple of relations. Not that I think they’d be hollerin’ at you for a joke, they barely know you.” Fiddleford was spinning a convincing cover, surprised at how easily lying about Ivan was becoming for him. “Prolly someone picked it out of the phone book, just lookin’ to give someone a hard time.”

“Hrmmm.” Ford frowned, still unconvinced.

“Not that I should have to, but I’ll remind you all now that this project requires absolute secrecy, complete non-disclosure.” Bill spoke up, and he made sure to look directly at Fiddleford. He had explicitly told Fiddleford to bring laborers into the project on the condition that he’d wipe their memories after to protect Bill’s secrets. Fiddleford probably thought the idea was his own, considering how Bill had immediately wiped his memory, and prickled at the insinuation.

Bill knew that the secrecy for this project had to be at least nominally breached. That wasn’t why he was staring at Fiddleford.

He was staring because Stanford was paranoid, and he needed to know where to look if he were to begin to suspect someone. He couldn’t look at Bill, and the god had to start sewing the seeds of distrust at some point.

“I know that.” Fiddleford replied defensively. “You don’t need to be remindin’ me.”

“I should hope not.” Bill lifted his chin, still staring at Fiddleford sceptically.

He could sense Stanford reading his body language, and reassessing where his paranoia was due. Bill needed to waver Ford’s trust to align with him, and not his college roommate. If he could win Stanford’s trust, even if Stanford remained sceptical that he truly was all knowing, the scientist would believe anything he’d say regardless, even if it meant turning on his friend.

“That’s not –” Fiddleford began, bristling at the implication, but was interrupted by the phone ringing from the other room. Pausing to listen, Fiddleford blanched, before he pointed to the door. “That’s probably Pat again. I’ll go get it.”
Watching McGucket scamper away to answer the phone, Bill’s gold eyes followed him all the way out the door.

Ford walked over and pulled out a chair at the table, watching Bill suspiciously, setting the orange juice down, and chewing on more bologna.

“You don’t think he’s told anyone about the project, do you?” Ford watched Bill closely, his headache clearing somewhat now. “He wouldn’t jeopardise what we’re working on like that.”

“We’ll see.” Bill said simply.

“Fiddleford wouldn’t do that. Ruin everything we’ve worked for.” Ford said, possibly trying to reassure himself. “He’s not that kind of person. I don’t think he’s even capable of such a betrayal.”

“Sixer, a little cosmic nugget of wisdom from me to you.” Bill leaned across the table, grabbing Ford’s wrist conspiratorially. “People are always capable. Of anything. Especially the ones you least suspect.”

Ford dwelt on that for a moment, absorbing Bill’s words with an abstract sort of shock that distracted him, thinking on the implications.

“Let that be a warning to you, or motivational if you like. You could take it both ways if you’re entrepreneurial enough.” Bill shrugged and released Ford’s wrist.

While Ford was distracted, Bill snatched the bologna out of his hands and took a bite.

“Hey.” Ford complained, jolting out of his reverie.

“Trust no one.” Bill insisted, waving the bologna at Ford to prove a point, speaking with his mouth full. He swallowed, then placed his hand earnestly on his chest.

“No one but me, that is.”

Ford grimaced, watching his breakfast being devoured, but seemed to have sobered some when he responded.

“I’ll remember that.”

Rugged up in warm clothes, piled into Fiddleford’s truck, the rickety old motor shambled down the road, snow chains keeping the tires travel worthy as they drove along the beaten track leading into the forest.

Ford sat in the front passengers seat beside Fiddleford, who was driving them to the undisclosed mystery location where Stanford’s present was, and Bill was squeezed into the very small backseat of the truck, feeling cramped and somewhat ignored.

For a supposed present giving holiday, Bill had a decided lack of presents. All the presents seemed to be going to Sixer. First the gourd and now this.
“I won’t say it’s all that conventional a present, but I think you’ll be keen on it either way.”

Fiddleford said over the roar of the engine. His truck was quite cantankerous, despite Fiddleford’s superior engineering skills. He preferred to maintain the engine’s original condition rather than tweak it to advance the engine’s technology. He felt it had more character like this.

“How much farther is it?” Ford questioned, raising his voice to be heard.

“Not too far now, and then we got a short walk. Not long to go.”

“When did you decide to hide this gift all the way in the forest? That doesn’t seem like you.” Ford pondered, giving Fiddleford a sideways glance.

Fiddleford’s apparent recalcitrance with re-entering the woods was something that Ford chalked up to his lingering trauma, but apparently it was hardly a hurdle for the other scientist when it came to planting a gift in the woods.

“Well, I – uh. Couldn’t exactly hide it in the shack.” Fiddleford replied evasively and left it at that.

The forest became too dense for Fiddleford’s truck, and so he parked it on the edge of the trail and gestured for Ford and Bill to follow him through the trees.

Securing his scarf to protect him from the winter’s chill, Ford followed Fiddleford through the snow-covered path, curious about this treasure hunt of a gift. Before he got too far, he felt a tug on his arm, and looked back to see Bill frowning.

“When did McGucket get the time to organise this mysterious present, is what I want to know? We’ve been watching him since he got back, he was supposed to be working on the portal.”

“Well, he must have multi-tasked.” Ford replied, looking for justifications that would allow him to maintain his cheerful optimism. This present was for him after all. “He’s entitled to a few pursuits of his own, and this present seems to be all in good faith. Just a little something to show his appreciation.”

“But what is it?” Bill persisted, trying to cast aspersion subtly on Fiddleford. “For a man who was traumatized in the woods here, he sure seems eager to drag us back in.”

“Why are you so suspicious?” Ford frowned at Bill, and continued to walk along the trail, seeing the back of Fiddleford’s jacket up ahead. “He’s trying to do something nice, and if this means he’s overcoming his fear of the forest, we should be encouraging him, not assuming he’s up to no good.”

“Sure, you can suspend your disbelief because it’s your present.” Bill replied snidely, quietly enough that Fiddleford couldn’t hear him. “But you saw him this morning. He’s hiding something. I don’t trust this.”

Ford paused, watching Bill for a moment, assessing his muse’s distrust, before he clapped Bill congenially on the shoulder.

“I think you’re taking your paranoia a little too seriously.” Ford scoffed in reply, not willing to believe his friend was up to no good. Shrugging Bill’s suspicion off, Ford looked forward to where Fiddleford was standing, gesturing to a particularly tall pine tree.

“Ta-da!” Fiddleford waggled his fingers at the tree with flourish. “Merry Non-Denominational Present Day!”
“You don’t have to keep saying non-denominational like that.” Ford insisted, before curiously looking the tree up and down. “Though it was very thoughtful of you to get me a … tree?”

Fiddleford laughed, and pulled out a length of rope from his coat pocket. “Sure, Stanford. I got you a tree in the middle of the forest.”

“Well, judging from its size it’s been here for much longer than you have, so I doubt you planted it on my honour or anything, but the sentiment is still appreciated.” Ford grinned at his friend amiably.

Looping the rope into a lasso, Fiddleford swung the rope around for a bit, until he hurled it up to snag on one of the branches. “Oh, I planted it alright. Put it here very specifically. You wait until you see this, Stanford, it’s right up your alley.”

Ford looked up the tree trunk, wondering if something was at the top, if they’d have to climb. F tuged on the rope and the branch angled down like a lever.

There was a succession of mechanical sounding clanks, and the snow seemed to drop away in a circle around the tree trunk, as the floor surrounding the tree sunk into the ground.

The tree continued to sink, submerging until it locked into its base in the earth, clicking into place. Several wooden beams shot out from the walls of the sunken earth, reinforced with metal splints to create a subterranean staircase spiralling around the tree trunk. Each plank on the staircase slotted out into place, and finally the base of the tree trunk slid open, like an automatic door, revealing an entrance to an underground lair.

Ford boggled at the sight of it, his surprise turning swiftly into giddy enthusiasm.

Fiddleford reached over the stairwell’s gap and knocked his knuckles against the tree. It thudded, sounding like hollow metal. “Touch wood you’ll like it.”

“Oh my.” Ford gushed, walking closer, peering down into the stairwell below. “I love it already. This is - What is it?”

“Well, remember how I mentioned building a bunker, back in the day. A safe place for you to conduct your experimentation on the creatures you encounter. This is that bunker.” Fiddleford declared proudly.

Ford seemed delighted, and walked closer to the tree trunk, extending his arm out, feeling the metal, peering down the staircase, examining everything with enthusiasm.

Bill stood back, his arms crossed, surveying the staircase with apprehension. He gave Fiddleford an assessing glance, and found the other scientist staring back at him, watching him steadily before turning back to Stanford.

“I built it with every precaution in mind.” Fiddleford continued explaining to Stanford, who seemed thrilled, and was already climbing down the staircase gamely. “Against the creatures you discover, against the gravitational anomalies you might encounter, why you could survive just about anything down here.”

“Fascinating.” Ford’s voice echoed, already midway down the stairwell. “You’ll have to show me the functionality, the blueprints. It’s astounding.”

Bill watched Fiddleford cautiously, uncertain if the scientist recalled what he was, if that memory ray had held up to scratch.
Fiddleford inclined his head, maintaining eye contact with Bill, and gestured for him to follow Ford down the staircase.

“After you.”

Somewhat unnerved, Bill sustained his suspicion, reluctantly following Ford down the staircase, looking over his shoulder at Fiddleford.

The other scientist gave nothing away, traipsing down the stairwell after Bill, following them both down into the tree trunk door, then pressing a button on the wall that sealed the entrance behind them, casting them all into momentary darkness.

Fiddleford flipped another switch on the wall, and hanging lamps from the ceiling lit with an electric sounding buzz. As the lights flickered on they revealed a room, very much a stereotypical bunker right down to the metal panel on the wall reading ‘Fallout Shelter’.

Whatever Fiddleford had designed this bunker to prepare for, clearly he felt that preparing for the worst was prudent.

“Well, this is certainly effective.” Ford looked around the room, taking in the metal bedframe, the shelving units stocked with supplies several years in advance, the metal storage lockers and gas masks and other nuclear Armageddon paraphernalia. “Though potentially needless, if our portal goes off without a hitch.”

“We’re dealing with a nuclear-powered dimension ripping portal Ford. It don’t hurt to be cautious.” Fiddleford countered, leaning comfortably against the wall while Stanford peered into all the cupboards and boxes curiously. “In the interests of preparing for every eventuality I’ve got us supplies racked up all the way to 2070. Though by then I imagine you’d be sick of dried meats, vacuum sealed meals and tinned peaches.”

Ford looked up at the buzzing overhead lamp, taking in the various machinery stationed around the room.

“What’s powering this?” Ford pointed up to the lamp. “Or anything down here for that matter. It all seems to rely a great deal on machinery to maintain secrecy here, how do you propose one could hide away in here for a hundred years without electricity?”

“Hydro-electricity.” Fiddleford answered, walking over to one of the metal pipes that ran across the roof of the bunker, ending out in a water spout. “There’s a reservoir of water nearby that flows directly from the waterfall. With a little fine tunin’ I got that water to flow through a turbine I got hooked up here, and now not only does it power the bunker sustainably, I used it to modulate the cooling systems, to work the hydraulics, and built in an emergency dam breaker, so if an experiment goes wrong we can flood the caverns as a precaution. Everythin’ s powered by water.”

“That’s very… thorough.” Ford remarked, watching the way Bill’s shoulders were tense, the way the muse was squinting at everything.

While Ford was marvelling at Fiddleford’s ingenuity Bill seemed to be becoming progressively more upset by it. Clearly Bill didn’t like the bunker, proving himself skittish against anything that might eventuate into experimentation on his person. Bill had made explicitly clear that he only tolerated experimenting from Stanford, and only in particular circumstances.

Despite his muse’s discomfort, Stanford was still thrilled with the bunker. It appealed to the sci-fi nerd in him, and already he felt like he’d be spending a lot of time down here, just for the novelty of it all. He thought it was remarkable, like having a secret science lair, and while he believed the apocalypse planning was all completely unnecessary, the gas masks and historical weaponry and antique radar systems really tickled his fancy.

Still, if it was just this one room, Ford had the feeling it could get a little cramped in here. The shack was small enough, Bill, Fiddleford and himself all sharing the limited space there, occasionally butting heads simply due to proximity. If all three of them were to spend time down here regularly there wouldn’t be much room for successful experimentation. There had to be more than just this. F wouldn’t make such a fuss for just one room.

Looking around for more to explore, hoping for his estimation of Fiddleford’s imagination to be realised, Ford saw a porthole on one of the walls, sealed tight.

“And this leads to where, I wonder?” Ford questioned, already twisting the wheel sealing the porthole, wanting to know what was behind it.

“This you’re gonna like.” Fiddleford grinned, walking over to the porthole. “It’s the way into the lab. I hope you don’t mind crawlin’ though. It’s pretty narrow.”

Ford laughed, and twisted the wheel one last time, unlocking the porthole and swinging it open to reveal a small tunnel, just about large enough for someone on their hands and knees to crawl through.

“This feels like one of those children’s playgrounds. With the fancy equipment. One would almost think I was too old for this, but I feel like a kid again.” Ford made to crawl into the tunnel, his voice echoing in the dark. “You’ve really outdone yourself Fiddleford.”

Fiddleford chuckled, watching Ford go with a fond smile. He made to crawl into the tunnel, but then paused, looking back to where Bill was sceptically examining the inside of the weapons locker, the disdain in his expression evident.

“Aren’t you gonna come in?” Fiddleford asked Bill curiously.

“Where did you even get all this stuff?” Bill questioned Fiddleford, almost sounding impressed by the scientist’s ingenuity even though it was an evident slap in the face to his plans.

That’s what it was essentially, an insult. If there was a part of Fiddleford’s subconscious that remembered Bill’s plans for inviting his friends through the portal to create a new world order, building a bunker as a safeguard against it was as good as rebelling against Bill’s reign in advance. Judging from the weaponry stacked up in the closet, rebellion was just one of the safeguards Fiddleford had in mind when building the place, and Bill wouldn’t tolerate rebellion from one of his pocket scientists. Best to nip it in the bud.

Bill was beginning to wonder if Fiddleford was more trouble than he was worth.

“It’s easy enough to get supplies like this. People went wild for buildin’ bomb shelters after the Manhattan project. Most of the stuff in here is antique. Some of its more recent. Custom made.” Fiddleford knocked on the metal porthole opening with his knuckles. “But it all works. It’s all viable, in case the portal don’t work right.”

“What makes you think it won’t work?” Bill asked swiftly, turning his piercing yellow eyes onto F now, frowning slightly.

F pursed his lips and twiddled his thumbs, before looking for a diplomatic answer. He exhaled a deep breath, before he began explaining slowly.
“I’m not too sure how each piece of that alien technology that we borrowed functions, and there are gaps, huge gaps in the blueprints that just rely on faith that the Hyperdrive will work as it should. Somethin’’ that we don’t know for sure, but the blueprints say that’s just how it works. We haven’t had a chance to test it for ourselves. I’m not sayin’ that I’m not confident in the project, mathematically it’s all entirely feasible. And I signed up to deliver results for this, so I’ll be stickin’ this out all the way to the end.”

Fiddleford rubbed his elbow reflexively, a gesture he made more frequently now since the incident. “But I’m no stranger to things goin’ wrong when you least expect it. I’d rather be prepared for the worst, than be let down when the best don’t be there. Gotta be forearmed for this sort of eventuality when you’re workin’ with physics defying science.”

Bill closed the weapons closet, and crossed his arms, looking Fiddleford up and down, still suspicious of the other scientist’s motives. He could tell from F’s tone that he was trying to be chipper about his explanation, and he was being friendly enough, but Bill knew all too well that friendly didn’t mean safe. Whether or not he remembered what Bill truly was was still up for debate.

“Well between the two of you, I’m sure you’ll have enough arms. Or you can borrow a few from in there.” Bill jerked his chin at the metal locker and scrutinised the scrawny scientist, sizing him up. In an equally friendly tone (though Bill’s friendly certainly didn’t mean safe) he questioned. “How’s your aim?”

“It’s gettin’ better.” Fiddleford replied ambiguously, watching Bill as the being paced across the bunker, his shoes ringing on the metal flooring.

“Good to know.” Bill replied in a light tone, pacing closer until he was standing a foot from Fiddleford, staring him down.

Fiddleford tried not to be unnerved by the eye contact, chalking it up to just one of Bill’s many eccentricities, despite the way his subconscious recoiled from the sight, wanting to stay calm, level. He gestured to the tunnel with his good arm, and watched Bill closely.

“After you.”

Bill glared at Fiddleford suspiciously for a while longer, scrutinising every part of the scientist’s face, searching for the gall to act against him, finding only confusion in Fiddleford’s features. Bill made the effort to smile curtly at the scientist, hoping to put him at ease. Despite the friendly grin, there was malice in his tone.

“How courteous.”

Fiddleford said nothing, and only gestured again for Bill to climb into the tunnel, so reluctantly Bill did just that, cramming his human meatsac into the tiny tunnel, feeling remarkably vulnerable and on edge.

Fiddleford crawled into the tunnel behind him and swung the porthole shut.

Up ahead, Ford had reached the end of the tunnel, and felt a similar porthole in front of him, gripping the wheel to open the latch blindly in the dark.

“Do I twist to open it Fiddleford?” Ford called back, his voice echoing in the tunnel.

“Just give it a twist!” Fiddleford called back, not too far behind Ford.
Ford felt a hand grope around in the dark, grasping onto his leg and feeling his way up, until two hands rested on Ford’s rear and stayed there.

“Is that you Bill?” Ford couldn’t help but ask, a little awkwardly.

“Oh Sixer. I thought that was you. I’d know your face anywhere.” Bill sarcastically declared in a flat tone, still fondling Ford’s buttocks.

“Very funny.” Ford griped. “I thought you were Fiddleford.”

“Were you expecting your lab buddy to do this?” Bill snarked, and squeezed Sixer’s buttocks cheekily, eking out some entertainment amidst the tension.

Ford looked over his shoulder and saw Bill’s golden eyes glowing in the dark.

“Stop that.” Ford complained, and tried to smother a grin as he grumbled. “I can’t take you anywhere, can I?”

“Not anywhere outside this town, but who’s complaining.” Bill said sarcastically, examining his nails in the dark, absolutely complaining.

“You need help with the latch Stanford?” Fiddleford called out, now aware of the proverbial traffic jam by the exit.

“Uh, no, I’ve got it.” Ford replied, swiftly turning the wheel to open the porthole with one hand, swatting Bill’s hand off his rear with his other.

He swung the porthole open and climbed out into what seemed like a cubed antechamber.

Holding his hand out to help Bill out of the tunnel, he obliquely noticed his muse’s sour mood, it was written all over Bill’s face. Thinking that Bill was upset with him, Ford lowered his voice.

“We can talk about the barrier later.” Ford told Bill quietly, as Fiddleford clambered out of the tunnel behind him. “For now, can’t you just focus on the lab? Fiddleford put a lot of effort into this.”

Bill raised his eyebrows at Stanford, before scoffing and crossing his arms abruptly. Ford frowned at Bill’s snippy response, but his muse turned his chin up at him, already looking away.

Fiddleford climbed out of the tunnel and righted himself, before looking at his colleagues, noticing the way that they were both turned away from one another stubbornly.

“Everything alright here?” F questioned cautiously.

With a flat expression, Bill glowered at the walls, sarcasm infusing his voice. “Just peachy.”

Shaking off Bill’s dismissal, Ford looked eagerly to F, trying to encourage his friend. “Can you explain this room? What’s its purpose?”

“Well this room’s the best part, in my opinion.” Fiddleford spoke, clapping Ford on the back as he walked into the centre of the room. Bill continued to sulk by the porthole, watching the two scientists caustically.

“I took my inspiration for this room from the Russian puzzle game Soviet Blocks, from back in college. And of course I borrowed a few parts from the spaceship. I figured, for a lab like this you’ll be wantin’ your research to be secure, both for the sake of the integrity of the study, and for protecting the townsfolk from a specimen escaping. I’ve made it so there’s no gettin’ in or out of this lab without knowing the security code.”

Ford was looking at the shiny metal, stolen from the spacecraft, also recognising the symbols on the walls, though he didn’t know their meaning. F must have scrapped these parts before Ford could translate it.

“That’s quite effective. So the symbols form a sequencing code? Should I be writing this down?”

“Just watch this time.” Fiddleford grinned and stepped left, depressing a square tile on the floor bearing an alien symbol. A hexagon housing a circle with a triangle in the middle. The ignition. “I’ll show you how it’s done.”

The porthole behind them swung shut, nearly swiping Bill in the process, automatically sealing them in as the room shook. A loud alarm blared offensively, the symbols on the walls all glowing an angry red as the shaking galvanised the security room’s features.

Ford stumbled, looking around, mildly concerned as the individual square panels on the walls and ceiling began descending, sliding out slowly and insidiously as the reality of the security room began to dawn on Ford.

He could see Bill over by the entry porthole, pulling on the wheel persistently, trying to escape the way they came in, but the cubes pressing out from the wall quickly forced him away, Bill backing into the centre of the room.

“If you don’t know the code, this security system prevents a trespasser from getting in or out.” Fiddleford shouted over the alarm.

As the squares on the floor began to unsettle, protruding upwards, some cubes extending alongside each other with barely an inch of space between them, coming unerringly out into the middle of the room, Ford realised that whoever intruded upon this laboratory was sure to meet a grisly end. An undignified end too, as a corpse should never, in Ford’s opinion, resemble mashed potato.

“Isn’t this a little extreme?” Ford yelled, sidestepping one of the squares, forced towards the centre of the room. Despite their tiff earlier, forced together like this, Bill grabbed frantically onto Stanford’s arm, crowding close to the scientist.

“Can’t put a price on security.” Fiddleford replied, content to watch the cubes slide and slot into place, like an inverse cubic’s cube.

While Ford was staring at the protruding walls, Bill clung to Stanford’s arm, glaring angrily at the descending cubes, holding onto hope that Fiddleford’s affection for Stanford would spare the scientist (and Bill in turn) from becoming a nasty stain on the walls. He was still peeved at Stanford, or he’d keep that act up if it got him what he wanted, but he was relying on the assumption that McGucket wouldn’t kill Ford’s partner right in front of him.

He didn’t know what he’d do if his proximity plan failed. He wasn’t sure what would happen if he was destroyed while in this vessel. Sure, he could heal, but from being squashed like a berry, Bill didn’t know.

He pressed up close to Stanford, glued to the scientist. The gullible scientist actually thought that meant Bill was scared, and wrapped his hand around Bill’s comfortingly, trying to soothe him. Bill wasn’t scared, McGucket wouldn’t kill Stanford, therefore he wouldn’t kill Bill like this.

Unless this was some kind of murder-suicide.
He didn’t think McGucket had it in him.

He watched Fiddleford with wild eyes, his pulse thudding arrhythmically, cosmic brain leaping to all kinds of conclusions.

Perhaps he underestimated the other scientist, or underestimated his recovery. This sort of overkill wasn’t the sort of thing a healthy man would do, it was what a damaged scientist would do. That Gremloblin encounter had changed Fiddleford, whether he remembered it or not.

It had made him ruthless, and Bill only liked ruthless when it was coming from him. Or directed away from him. He didn’t like being the target of ruthless.

Ford noticed the way his muse was holding onto him, obviously frightened considering his vicelike grip, and realised that Ford’s faith that Fiddleford would deliver the security code in a timely fashion didn’t extend to Bill.

“The code, Fiddleford?” Ford questioned, watching F’s calm expression as he watched the metal panels slide out with intense satisfaction.

“I’m gettin’ there.” Fiddleford replied, content to snicker at Bill’s frantic reaction for a while longer.

Bill felt the walls closing in on this feeble human form of his, not ready to have his plans derailed so suddenly. If he died in this room he’d have no scientists, no portal, and no vessel. Irony saw fit to visit Bill with the unpleasant mental reminder, an image of a similar cage of his own devising, closing in on the shapeshifter grub as it tried to replicate Bill’s form.

He didn’t want to end up like that shapeshifter, a grisly smear and forgotten footnote of the history he aimed to achieve. He wasn’t in the market for that sort of ironic demise. He didn’t know if this form could regenerate that completely, despite how adept he was at healing it, and he realised as the walls closed in on him, that he didn’t want to die.

“Fiddleford!” Ford persisted, Bill practically cutting off the blood flow in his arm, clinging so desperately to him.

“I’m not going to die in here.” Bill muttered frantically, his tattoos and eyes glowing as he mustered power. “I don’t want to die like this.”

Ford could tell that Bill was working himself up to do something drastic, he could feel it in the thrum of power, energy building in the air around them. He felt like he was seconds away from having to hold Bill back, fearing for F’s safety in the face of his muse’s panic.

Knowing that Fiddleford wouldn’t endanger their lives, he appealed to F, hoping to stop the encroaching walls before Bill gave away his secret.

“Fiddleford, that’s enough. Please. The code.”

Laughing, Fiddleford wiped a mirthful tear from the corner of his eye before patting Stanford on the back. “Aww, shucks. Spoilin’ the fun. Alright, you’ve had enough.”

Reaching deftly through the encroaching cubes, Fiddleford seemed to have waited just long enough for the four symbols to align just right, climbing across the cubes to press each one of them in succession. The symbols glowed blue one by one.

Tugging on Stanford’s arm, Fiddleford gestured to the door on the other side of the room.
Triggering the security code didn’t seem to stop the squares, it just unlocked the door leading to the lab. The door unlocked with three separate mechanisms and swung wide open.

“Hop to it now! This way.” Fiddleford pulled Ford along, ducking his head to avoid the lower hanging cubes.

He jogged lightly over to the door, but was elbowed aside as Bill raced ahead to freedom, self-preservation kicking in, nearly hyperventilating from the stress of being at the mercy of the mad scientist.

Fiddleford sprinted the rest of the way to the door, tugging Stanford along behind him. The cubes were closing in, the path to the doorway getting narrower and narrower.

Panting in the lab, Bill, once safe, seemed to belatedly remember that Sixer was still in there, and spun around to watch the cubes close in on Sixer in horror.

Fiddleford came out of the door, and was pulling Ford along behind him, but it didn’t look like the scientist would make it.

Gripping his hands into fists at his side, Bill’s telekinetic field surrounded Ford’s body and yanked him the rest of the way out through the door. Sixer stumbled into the room just as the last cube compressed the air behind him, snagging fabric from the back of his trench coat.

“Made it, just in time.” Fiddleford remarked, clapping Ford on the back in a congratulatory way. “Now wasn’t that fun?”

“Oh yes, loads of fun.” Bill snapped sharply, scowling at Fiddleford with venom. “I love almost dying in a room full of Trilazzxian death cubes!”

“It was perfectly safe.” Fiddleford retorted. “You wouldn’t have died.”

Marching over to Stanford to protectively check the scientist over, tugging the back of his trench coat out of the tangle of cubes with a little more force than necessary, Bill put his hands on Ford’s shoulders, perhaps simply for the comforting reassurance that was feeling Ford’s unharmed body.

“He could have died. He was conveniently the last one out. How much fun is it for you to put his life at risk? Or all our lives for that matter?” Bill asked scathingly, intent to drive more nails in the coffin of Ford’s regard for his friend while he still could. “Oh, it was all just a bit of fun for you, but you risked us all for the sake of showing off!”

“Bill.” Ford attempted, trying to calm his muse down. He didn’t think Bill would get so vehement about his safety, but he remembered how furious Bill was when he almost died falling from the back of the Gremloblin and he had an ill-timed moment of ego where he realised he must be remarkably important to the God, and that made Ford somewhat smug.

“No one was at risk.” Fiddleford insisted. He seemed to be trying to explain himself, but every time he opened his mouth, Bill’s venomous words cut him off.

“Because being squashed by metal cubes isn’t life threatening? Because you didn’t mean to compress us all into a fine paste? You nearly killed him! What exactly were you planning here? To do away with us both and claim the portal for yourself?”

“No!” Fiddleford retorted, offended by the presumption.

“Don’t lie. It would have been awfully convenient for you.” Bill continued, striding up into Fiddleford’s space and jabbing him with his pointer finger. “One elbow in the wrong place and suddenly the competition’s gone, Fiddleford McGucket is the man who changed the world, the portal’s all yours, and all it cost you was your best friend, and a little elbow grease to scrub him off the walls. I’m onto you.”

“You’ve got it all wrong.” Fiddleford shook his head, bringing his hand up defensively. “I would never do that.”

“It was a pretty close call from never back in there.” Bill pointed to the door, and glared at McGucket. “Of course, this was fun for you, nearly killing your friend. I’m sure you had a grand old time. After all, there was no risk.”

“There WAS no risk.” Fiddleford insisted, and held his other hand up, the hand holding a remote. “I built a backup for the security key, this remote.”

Fiddleford pressed the remote and the cubes began to reverse back into the walls.

“There was never any danger, I just wanted to give y’all a rush from this. To rile you up a little. I wasn’t tryin’ to kill you, I just wanted to make this fun for y’all. For Stanford. It was a present.”

“You nearly kill him, and you have the gall to—“

Bill’s tirade was cut off by Ford putting his hand on Bill’s shoulder, pulling him out of his defensive rage.

“Bill, it’s alright. I’m safe, we’re all safe.”

Bill narrowed his eyes at Ford, and gestured to Fiddleford impatiently. “That isn’t the point –“

“Shhh.” Ford tugged Bill in for a one armed hug, pressing a placating kiss to his forehead. “It’s okay.”

Bill boggled for a moment at how stupid this genius really could be, if what he was getting from this scenario wasn’t that an attempt had been made on his life, but that no harm was done in the long run. Sixer clearly had no sense of self-preservation if he thought a kiss on the forehead would mollify Bill. Bill was frozen in shock.

“Fiddleford...”

Ford looked solemnly at Fiddleford for a moment, taking him in slowly, before he quirked a smile.

“It was quite fun.”

“Right!” Fiddleford’s grin matched Ford’s in that moment, the two scientists smiling goofily at one another.

“Like the booby-trap from Raiders of the Lost Ark.” Ford enthused.

“Or the dungeon levels from the limited-edition Triple D board game.”

“I loved the companion novels for that particular arc. You’d never expect it was the dwarf who had the key all along.”

“That twist was epic! Why, I remember when we first played that campaign.” Fiddleford grinned, nerding out with Stanford over D&D& more D while Bill stood dumbfounded by their collective stupidity.
“And you had Patricia DM. She kept trying to hint the answers for you.”

“Of course, I was oblivious.” Fiddleford laughed. “I thought she had somethin’ in her eye, the way she kept wakin’ at me.”

“And then she broke out the charades.”

“Oh, that was a good night, just rememberin’ brings me back.”

Ford grinned, and shook his head fondly. “Good times.”

“Good times.” Fiddleford echoed the sentiment, sticking his hands in his pockets, rocking back on his heels.

Shoving away from Ford, crossing his arms and stalking away, Bill despaired of his chosen scientists.

“You’re idiots! Nerdy idiots! I hate you both.”

He didn’t find his brush with mortality nearly as entertaining as the two scientists seemed to. It was vexing to see that their bond was deeper than the suspicion a near death incident could cultivate, but that just meant Bill had to try harder. He’d succeed with time and patience, but patience wasn’t Bill’s strong suit, and right now he just found everything vexing.

“You sure were spooked.” Fiddleford ribbed Bill congenially, somewhat smug that he’d managed to wring such a panicked reaction out of the assistant.

“I thought he was going to squeeze my arm off.” Ford remarked jokingly.

“All but elbowed me out of the way when the door done opened.”

Ford chuckled in amusement with his colleague, but realised when Bill’s hand clenched tight, constricting Ford’s scarf telekinetically, that poking fun at the God may not be such a brilliant idea.

Choking slightly, disguising it as a coughing fit, Ford’s laughter petered off, a more reluctantly apologetic expression gracing his features.

“I’m sorry. That – that wasn’t funny.” Ford gasped, and the constriction around his neck petered off.

“You were really scared, weren’t you?” Fiddleford pressed curiously, watching Bill’s scowl deepen.

“Threatening my life was your idea of a prank, forgive me if I’m not applauding your sense of humour.” Bill sneered, rather hypocritically. If this sort of prank were being conducted by Bill, he would find it hilarious, but being the butt of this joke had Bill rather sour about it.

“I didn’t mean no harm.” Fiddleford rubbed his elbow, speaking sincerely.

“Because you’re just harmless, aren’t you?” Bill sneered, crossing his arms.

“Alright, enough.” Ford pulled his scarf loose and stepped in between Bill and Fiddleford, giving Bill a chastising look. “You’re in such a mood today. I won’t have you two fighting over something so silly. We’re all fine, and it was just a joke, so perhaps now we can move on. Show me the rest of the lab, F.”
Bill jutted his chin out stubbornly, but said nothing.

Fiddleford sighed and rubbed his forehead, before he put his hands on his hips and looked around the lab.

“All right then. This here’s the observation room. It’s soundproof, so feel free to say rude things about the creatures you capture, they can’t hear you in here. You got your monitors, control panels, you’ve got the intercom too. Temperature controls, automated locking systems, decontamination set up, you’ve got a few programs that run equations for potential chemical permutations, that interfaces with the lab equipment there if you ever need to work out makin’ any sort of antidote for any venoms you encounter.”

“I still have some of the Gremloblin spines we can analyse.” Ford mused, looking over the analytical equipment, eyeing off the beakers and centrifuges and glass doored refrigerators.

“Well, I’m sure the world could benefit from an antidote for that.” Fiddleford said, rubbing his arm. The cast had recently been removed but the ghost of the injury still lingered.

Turning to flick on the monitors, F pointed out the equipment further into the lab. “From the observation room you can look into the storage room, I figured you could put your specimens in there. It’s about an acre of solid bedrock in there reinforced with steel, there’s no way any specimens you put in there will be escapin’ anytime soon.”

Moving over to another part on the control panel, F pointed to a set of buttons. “This here controls the cooling system. A lot of what we’ve got set up down here runs from water, hydroelectricity, hydraulics, that gave me the idea for a way to preserve our specimens. See there, we’ve got several cryogenic tubes all hooked up to a liquid nitrogen based cooling chamber.”

“That’s quite ingenious actually.” Ford walked closer to peer at the monitors, curious about the cryogenics. “How much nitrogen is required for the cryogenic stasis?”

“Well, each cooling chamber holds about twenty gallons of liquid nitrogen solution, and we got five or six of them set up down there. I had to dip into the retainer you gave me to fund some of this stuff, liquid nitrogen ain’t cheap, but the temperature control apparatus really is phenomenal. You can use it to freeze specimens within twenty-four hours, you can link it up to the air conditioning if it gets too hot down here. Heck, you can use it for anything up to cryogenically freezing yourself in the event of some sort of paranormal catastrophe. That way you can defrost and emerge when all the trouble has passed, years ahead when robots rule the world.” F declared proudly.

“That seems like a rather extreme use.” Ford remarked, raising an eyebrow at his colleague.

“Well, you could just use it to make popsicles.” F shrugged. “I can see myself pullin’ out mom’s old family recipe for molasses popsicles. Had ‘em every summer.”

“Molasses isn’t a flavour.” Ford wrinkled his nose. “Honestly, sometimes I can’t fathom how your family lives.”

“You were just spoilt for choice up on that boardwalk, salt water taffy left and right for you Stanford.” F joked. “Us country folk gotta make do.”

“Well, I’d rather you didn’t.”

Pointing over to a full length metal closet, Fiddleford rested his hip against the control panel.
“I might get the urge in me to push you into that decontamination chamber the next time you feel like casting judgement on folks from Tennessee.” F smirked. “See if that don’t cool you off.”

Ford laughed, but then glanced appraisingly at the metal closet. “A decontamination chamber is a good idea though. We have no idea what sort of toxins or chemicals we could encounter studying the specimens we collect, and maintaining a sterile quarantine zone could be beneficial should we examine any creatures from different dimensions, in the interest of preserving Earth’s current ecosystem.”

“That’s what I figured. Besides, it don’t hurt to be too cautious.” Kicking off the control panel, F gestured to the decontamination chamber. “It’s a bit brisk in there but it only takes a few seconds. Did you want to go first, or –“

“I want to leave.”

Bill’s voice came abruptly from the other side of the observation room.

Ford had assumed that Bill was still sulking, paying him no mind, assuming this mood of his would pass. Ford might have been somewhat more dismissive of the God today than he would be on most days, but a nog-induced hangover would do that to a man.

“Y-you don’t want to stay an see the lab?” Fiddleford questioned timidly.

“I want to leave.” Bill repeated stubbornly, his arms crossed, scowling at the room. “Now. I want you to take me out of this hole in the ground, override all your killer cubes, and get me out of here.”

“Bill, there’s nothing to worry about.” Ford began, somewhat exasperated. “It’s just a quick walk around the storage room, and a brief shower. That’s all.”

He wasn’t exactly being the most understanding as to why Bill wouldn’t want to receive the grand tour of the facilities where F and Ford would be locking up creatures like him for study. Ford didn’t have the patience or foresight for that today.

“That’s all it is for you. You’re still on cloud nine thinking this whole lab came with a bow and your name on it.” Bill retorted crossly, feeling more like this lab was a base affront to him. “I don’t like it. I don’t want to be here. This isn’t what I signed up for. I want to be out of here and above ground.”

“Bill, would you just –“ Ford sighed, frustrated.

“I don’t want to hear it Sixer.” Bill interrupted him shrilly. “I want to leave.”

“Well, I don’t want to leave, we just got here. Besides, we haven’t even seen the main part of the lab yet.” Ford complained pettily, gesturing to the decontamination chamber. “Fiddleford worked very hard on this, and I’m going to stay.”

Fiddleford seemed startled, staring at his shoes, trying to stay out of Ford and Bill’s bickering.

“Oh, uh, me?” F looked up reluctantly. Bill strode over to F and grabbed his upper arm, yanking him towards the door.
“He can stay here and play in the mud if he wants to, like the Neanderthal he is.” Ford waved off Bill’s snide criticism, still tinkering with the motherboard, and Bill gracefully flipped Stanford off before pulling Fiddleford’s arm. “You take me upstairs. Now.”

“Oh. Okay, uh – ahh!” Fiddleford was dragged out of the observation room by Bill, barely having the chance to look over his shoulder at Stanford, who seemed more than happy to ignore his partner’s retreat in favour of playing with the chemical calibration unit on the control panel.

Bill dragged F out through the security room, the cubes now stacked neatly back into the walls. Taking care not to step on anything with a symbol on it, Bill tiptoed them across the security room, and let go of F’s arm, leaving him to unlock the porthole for him.

Twisting it open, F looked sideways at Bill, who seemed to be working himself up into a temper.

Swinging the porthole ajar, F gestured to the tunnel, keen to leave Bill to his poor mood. “Can you take it from here or …?”

“You first. You’re coming with me.” Bill all but shoved F into the tunnel, and crouching small along the pipes as best he could, F resigned himself to crawling through the tunnel, Bill hot on his heels.

Climbing out into the main room of the bunker, F swung his arms awkwardly as Bill climbed out, still obviously seething. Attempting to look anywhere but at Stanford’s assistant, Fiddleford’s avoidance was cut short when Bill stormed up to him, poking him in the chest.

“What’s the big idea here, huh?”

“Listen, I don’t want to get involved.” Fiddleford put his hands up defensively, speaking in earnest. “I know you’re having a spat with Stanford right now. I -whatever’s going on between the two of you is none of my business. I’m just here to do my job.”

“I’m not mad at Sixer, I’m mad at you. That! That’s what I’m referring to. Your job.” Bill loomed over Fiddleford and poked him in the chest again. “How is any of this, building a pokey little tree house out in the woods, playing soviet blocks with life and death, freezing popsicles with hundred-dollar technology, how is that contributing towards finishing the portal on time? THAT is your job.”

“I’ve been working on the portal!!” Fiddleford retorted, somewhat taken aback that Bill’s sour mood didn’t seem to be levelled at Stanford at all. Somehow he was the one taking the brunt of Bill’s ire.

“You’ve gone and built an epic distraction, is what you’ve done, and Sixer’s down there lapping it up!” Bill waved his arms wide as he spoke, making a spectacle of his displeasure. “We have a schedule to maintain, and your job was to streamline that schedule and get everything done ahead of time! That’s what we agreed upon!”

The circumstances of that agreement were all rather foggy for F, but he knew that completing the portal quickly was of the utmost importance.

“I – I know that, I’m workin’ on the –“ F stuttered, trying to stand up for himself.

Bill’s yellow eyes slitted thin like needles and he stepped further into McGucket’s space, aiming to intimidate. “We had a deal. I don’t take kindly to deal-breakers. It was your job to keep the portal on track, and now this metal sandbox will lead us all deliriously off track, and it’s all your fault.”
“I made this FOR the portal!” F finally blurted his words out, before gesturing to the porthole they’d both crawled out of. “Nothing’s off track, I made this bunker so we could complete this portal faster. This will work.”

Bill blinked at Fiddleford, pausing his sinister demeanour to consider F for a second. Waving his hand at Fiddleford, Bill tilted his head.

“Explain.”

“I don’t –“ Fiddleford huffed out a frustrated breath, before lowering his voice, leaning in conspiratorially into Bill’s space. “Look, you can’t tell anyone about this, especially not Stanford. I – I’ve hired laborers to help with the project.”

“Oh?” Bill blinked innocently, trying his best to act like he hadn’t heard this before. He was working on his poker face, and it was getting good enough to fool McGucket.

“There’s just no way we can complete construction with just the three of us, and I know Stanford believes this portal needs to remain a secret, but no one knows what we’re workin’ on, they’re just doin’ what we tell them to.” Fiddleford explained vaguely. “I’ve made sure they won’t remember the project, that they won’t connect the dots, but we still need them to get all that heavy liftin’ done, and I needed somewhere for Stanford to go while I let the construction workers down into the shack!”

“Oh.” Bill repeated, a little more impressed this time. This bunker was a distraction, just not the kind Bill expected.

“I had laborers help complete the bunker, they did all the construction down here for me and I set them up with the blueprints for this place. I had this bunker in the works ever since I first saw that spaceship down in the valley. I – sure I may have gone a bit overboard with the security features, but you know what I’m like when I start inventing, I just can’t stop.” Fiddleford chuckled nervously, rubbing his elbow. “I’m hoping Stanford is happy enough to play around in the lab for a while, I mean, without a specimen to study, I’m sure he’ll get bored of it eventually, but I was really hoping you could help me with keeping him out of the shack while I get the scaffolding for the portal up and running.”

“You need my help?” Bill questioned, cycling right back around to unimpressed. “You want me to hole up with Sixer in the metal death cage down there? Pass.” Signing up to time in close proximity with Stanford in a state of the art lab was sure to be a disaster. Bill already had a hard enough time convincing Sixer not to analyse the grotesque liquids this body excreted when stimulated.

“Just for a short while. The portal’s more complicated than the bunker was to set up. I’ve gotta supervise while they rig up the generators to make sure nothin’ goes wrong.” Fiddleford pleaded. “There’s nothin’ unsafe about the bunker. I built it with every precaution. It’s even got fire alarms built into every room, you’ve got nothing to worry about.”

“More fire alarms. Goody.” Bill crossed his arms, suspecting Fiddleford’s subconscious may have catered these safeguards to counter Bill’s powers, or at least what F had seen of them.

“It’s perfectly safe.” F continued to argue. “I know it’s a little … claustrophobic for you.”

“Claustrophobic?” Bill repeated sceptically, raising his eyebrows at Fiddleford.

“Well, I mean, I shouldn’t have spooked you with the security room. It wasn’t the best first impression of the place.” F rambled, trying to back track. “It really was just a joke. And I didn’t mean to scare you like that.”

“I wasn’t scared.” Bill said flatly, glaring at F.

“Well, then if you aren’t scared, why don’t you wanna be down here?” F questioned curiously.

Bill paused, searching for an answer that wouldn’t give away his inherent revulsion at the idea of spending time down in this weirdness dissection lab. Puffing his cheeks out, exhaling loudly, Bill lied.

“Alright, maybe it is claustrophobic down there.”

“I had a feeling you were claustrophobic.” Fiddleford nodded, as though this confirmed his suspicions. “You’re always talking to Stanford about being stifled.”

“Mmhmm.” Bill ambivalently agreed, looking up to the ceiling.

“I don’t want you to feel uncomfortable, but it’d just be for a few visits. Just while I supervise the main parts of the construction. Then I can be down here with Stanford and you can stay at the shack if you prefer.” F reasoned. “I just need a way to get Stanford out of the house. I don’t want him to know that there are construction workers involved. I’d prefer if he just stayed out of the way, rather than having to deal with him knowing.”

Bill had a pretty good idea of how Fiddleford would ‘deal with’ Ford knowing about the construction in the lab, and as he abhorred the thought of anyone tinkering with Stanford’s mind (anyone but him that was) he reluctantly realised that he’d have to agree to Spec’s idea, even if this entire bunker was an insult to his schemes.

“Alright, fine. I can keep Sixer out of the house for a while.” Bill conceded. Already Fiddleford was grinning and nodding, relieved that Bill agreed so easily. “But I’m not staying down here. I’ll leave that to you two nerds, since you seem to like it so much.”

“So, how else are you gonna distract Stanford while I’m workin’ up at the house?” Fiddleford asked Bill curiously. With the sly smirk Bill gave him in response, Fiddleford realised too late that he’d rather not know.

“Oh, don’t worry. I know exactly how to distract him.”

Ford felt a bead of sweat run down the back of his neck as he looked over to meet Bill’s gold glowing eyes. They lidded seductively, and a slow smile spread over Bill’s face, boding ill for Stanford.

“Again!”

Springing into action, Ford hurled himself out of the way of a flaming ball of fire, rolling through the snow and landing in a crouch. The tree behind him had a hole burnt right through it, and it smouldered menacingly, an unfriendly reminder of what slow reflexes could deliver.
“Again!” Bill called out, sitting comfortably on a fallen log, sending flaming projectile after flaming projectile hurtling across the clearing towards Ford.

Three fireballs advanced in quick procession, forcing Ford to spring upwards quickly, dodging the hazardous projectiles one by one, employing all sorts of acrobatic movements to avoid being singed.

Having unbound two more bricks for the muse as a ‘Christmas Gift’ (You got a gourd and a tree, and what did I get?) Ford realised in a belated sense that it was his own fault his muse was so damn dangerous.

Crouched down behind a boulder, Ford panted, and clenched his hands, his body sweating from the strenuous training, but his fingers chilled from planting in the snow as he completed his evasive manoeuvres. Poking his head up from behind the boulder he called out to Bill.

“Is it time for a break yet? My fingers are freezing.”

“Maybe don’t dodge so well, and they’ll warm right up.” Bill said smoothly, examining his nails, before he waved his hand, summoning more fireballs into existence. “Again!”

Gritting his teeth, Ford flung himself out from behind the boulder as the fiery missiles careened towards his hiding place. Ford limbo-ed backwards to avoid the next missile, and rolled through the snow to avoid the last missile, it sizzled the snow into water about a foot away from him. Picking himself up off the ground, brushing snow from his chin, Ford began to walk over to Bill, already over this little training exercise.

“We can’t do this all day, besides, you’ve had your fun. No more fireballs.”

“What was that?” Bill held his hand up to his ear facetiously. “More fireballs?”

“I said no – oh forget it.” Ford grumbled as he was forced to dodge the incoming missiles again, leaping through the forest, ducking and weaving behind trees to evade the supernatural missiles.

While Sixer dodged, Bill laid back on the tree trunk and picked dirt out from under his nails, educating his human. “If you ask politely for a break in a real firefight, you get burned. The whole point of this exercise is to prepare you for anything, at any time. You need to have reflexes sharper than a diamond, you need to be faster than what’s coming for you, and always ten steps ahead of the game. This doesn’t end until you make it end. It’s like a metaphor for life really.”

Crunching snow beneath his boots, Ford wiped his hand against his trousers, brushing ice away for a moment before yet another incoming fireball forced him into action.

“Well, how do I make it end?” Ford called out gruffly, as he spiralled away from the fireballs, that were now zigzagging across the clearing unpredictably. Ford picked up a plank of wood left by the lumberjacks and held it up like a weapon, batting the fireballs away from him.

“You turn the tables. You set your own terms.” Bill replied, sounding almost bored, recounting this lesson like he was speaking to an idiot. “You identify what’s giving you grief and you neutralise it. You carry the bigger gun. It’s simple stuff Sixer.”

“Well excuse me if I can’t –” Ford grunted and narrowly avoided a zigzagging fireball, patting embers off the sleeve of his shirt. “Shoot fireballs from my hands.”

“You don’t need to if you’re the smartest guy in the room.” Bill turned his head towards Sixer and smirked. “Which you’re not. But because this is a training exercise I’m going easy on you. You’re creative, aren’t you IQ? Don’t tell me the genius can’t think his way out of this.”

Ford paused for a moment, considering that, before he began striding towards Bill.

This had Bill sitting upright, curious at what Sixer would do. He sent several more fireballs towards the scientist, just to make things difficult for him.

Ford crouched, dodged, and swerved with enough talent to send two of the fireballs crashing into one another. He picked his way across the field unerringly, despite the more frequent projectiles Bill sent his way now that Ford was actually making progress.

He ducked and weaved and lunged across the clearing until he grabbed Bill’s wrists in both hands, bearing down on the muse, crowding into Bill’s space. Sweat ran down Ford’s nose, and he breathed against Bill’s skin.

“This stops now.”

Bill beamed at Ford, impressed with his human’s moxy. Tapping gently on Ford’s shoulder, Bill pointed above them, where several burning fireballs were hovering, waiting, pointing directly at Ford.

“Are you sure about that?”

Ford leaned in to press a firm kiss to Bill’s lips.

Bill closed his eyes idly letting it happen, but despaired of his human if he thought something like romantic sentimentality would save him in a situation like this.

As Ford pulled away from Bill, the muse opened his eyes and looked coyly up at Sixer.

“You can’t make out with all your enemies.” Bill insisted. “Especially considering how many species don’t have lips for smooching out there.”

“I know.” Ford said smugly.

“Then –“ Bill began, but stopped as he felt the firm press of metal against his side.

He looked down, and saw that Sixer had used the kiss as a distraction to reach for the laser gun Bill had beside him on the log for the next exercise. Bill hadn’t expected Sixer to turn a gun on him so soon, and he couldn’t help the thrill of excitement he felt as Ford poked the gun into Bill’s stomach more firmly.

Bill looked back up and his yellow eyes gleamed, Ford staring back at Bill, feeling superior and accomplished.

“I’m impressed.” Bill purred, leaning into the gun, stroking his hands along Sixer’s sweaty face.

“So does this mean we can take a break?” Ford asked smoothly, catching his breath.

“Well, there is just one small thing you’ve forgotten.” Bill cooed, curling his fingers through Sixer’s damp hair, grinning like the Cheshire cat. “If I really wanted to eradicate you, I could just reign fire down on the both of us, since you’re not fireproof.”

“You could.” Ford reasoned, noting that the fireballs were still hovering above them both. “Or, we could go to lunch at Greasy’s together and you could not, because you can’t pay for lunchtime pancakes with no money, and you’d miss me.”
“I’d miss you?” Bill scoffed, still somewhat taken in by Sixer’s confidence.

“You’d miss me terribly.” Ford murmured against Bill’s lips, pressing another confident kiss to his muse.

Bill allowed the kiss, then pulled back, looking briefly up at the hovering flames, before looking back at Sixer, tilting his head.

“Huh.”

Realising what was happening in a split second, Ford tsked, and flung himself away from Bill, as the fire rained down on top of him, showering the muse with heat. He fell back into the snow and watched as Bill kicked his legs, laughing. The log copped the brunt of the flames, their heat simply sliding off Bill’s form.

“Hahahahahah! Ahh, you’re ballsy Sixer, I’ll give you that.”

“And flammable.” Ford growled, picking himself up off the ground, his palms scuffed from falling so many times. “But you knew that.”

“And cute when you’re angry.” Bill sighed, and scooted off the tree trunk, getting to his feet cheerfully. “Maybe I would miss you.”

Ford scoffed, and stood up, dusting the dirt and snow off his clothes, picking bits of bark out of his palm. “But I’m sure your aim will get better in time.”

“Priceless.” Bill clapped his hand on Ford’s shoulder, then patted Sixer’s jacket down, trying to smother the embers. Shaking the lingering flames from his body, Bill pressed a kiss to Ford’s cheek. “Smart and funny. No wonder I’m keeping you. Good job with that last manoeuvre by the way Sixer. I think you’ve earned a break.”

“You just want pancakes at Greasy’s.” Ford grumbled, but leaned into the peck on the cheek, soaking up the praise regardless.

Pressing another kiss to Ford’s cheek, Bill nodded.

“And chilli fries.”

Holed into a booth at the end of Greasy’s Diner, Ford watched his muse tuck into a large bowl of chilli fries.

The incongruity of seeing Bill look like a normal human, scarfing down potato chips with chilli on his cheek, struck Ford considering he’d seen the muse drenched in fire not too long ago, cackling maniacally. In a sense, while being completely incongruous, the two images weren’t all that different.

Stacey walked up to their booth and placed Ford’s steak sandwich on the table in front of him.

“You’ve got a little something on your chin there sugar.” Stacey pointed out, and Ford rubbed his “Oh. Thank you.” Ford remarked belatedly as Stacey walked away.

“What, one waitress wasn’t enough, now you’re going back for seconds?” Bill commented, his mouth full of chilli, staring Stanford down.

“I’m not going back for anything. Stacey was just being polite.” Ford retorted, wetting a napkin with his tongue and wiping the rest of the soot off his chin. “Besides, I think you’ll find I have my hands full at the moment, with a very petty God. I don’t have time for waitresses.”

“Good.” Bill said, sounding pleased, before reaching over to Stanford’s plate to steal one of the tomato slices from it, grabbing the mustard from the condiment rack, slathering yellow sauce onto the tomato slice.

Taking a bite of his sandwich, Ford chewed for a moment, before swallowing, making the point he’d been mulling on since this morning. “What is the likelihood, I mean statistically, that on the other side of that portal someone would fancy throwing fireballs at me? Someone other than you that is.”

“You’d be surprised. There are all sorts of short tempered creatures out there who shoot first and ask questions later.” Bill remarked, licking mustard off his fingers. “And it doesn’t help matters that you’re a human.”

“What does that have to do with anything?” Ford puzzled, taking another bite of his sandwich.

“Well, you’re not exactly popular, interdimensionally speaking.” Bill divulged, taking another tomato slice from Stanford’s plate. “A lot of creatures look down on humanity. You’ve got a bad rep.”

“Well, what have we done to deserve that rep, apart from, well, I mean slavery for one.” Ford listed, ticking off on his fingers. “The widespread air pollution from the Victorian era, unleashing atomic weapons on Hiroshima, the devastation of the rainforests, the eradication of endangered species, countless wars against vulnerable nations, the genocides, B-List alien movies can’t have helped much, not to mention how people reacted to War of the Worlds on the radio.”

“Nobody cares about that.” Bill waved his hand dismissively.

“Then why –”

“It’s because you’re all gullible.” Bill revealed, picking up a particularly cheesy chilli fry, stretching the cheese strand long and dangling it into his mouth. “And stupid. Underdeveloped sentient beings. You’ve barely figured out your ass from your elbow, and you’re trying to make contact with the great unknown. The great unknown doesn’t want to trade pleasantries with humanity.”

“That’s –” Ford blustered, somewhat taken aback by this explanation. “But how did they –“

“You sent a golden record out into space, and they didn’t like your taste in music. So what?” Bill slurped up the string of cheese, before continuing. “So the cosmos didn’t like your mixtape, so what if they sent it back? Don’t take it personally, move on with your incredibly short lives. Don’t let it define you.”

“So you’re saying that the Voyager space craft has already made contact with aliens, and they didn’t like our music?” Ford squinted at Bill, not following his logic.
“They didn’t like your music long before then. You’ve carbon dated the Trilazxxian craft, cosmic life has known about your planet for a long long time. They just thought that chicken scratch you sent them was funny, that’s all.” Bill shrugged, and helped himself to another tomato slice. “Funny looking.”

“Carl Sagan helped pick out the sounds they placed on the Voyager record.” Ford said weakly, his hero’s taste trashed by cosmic beings he’d never met. “And the etchings included on the Pioneer craft were purposefully simple. To make them easy to understand.”

“Well it came across as patronising. Not that you humans would know any better.” Bill remarked with a mouthful of sliced tomato. “You have no manners.”

Ford grimaced at the sight of mangled tomato and mustard in Bill’s mouth while the muse talked with his mouth full, seeing the irony of this being lecturing him on the manners of his species.

“Lucky for you, you’re a protected species, so you were never supposed to know that aliens didn’t like your mix tape.”

“A protected species? What does that even mean?” Ford boggled, learning far more than he cared to in this moment, feeling mildly insulted.

“It means that until you reach peak sentience and wise up enough to join the interdimensional community, the Federation has put you on the protected species list so no one comes in to meddle with your development as a species before the requisite time.” Bill explained, spreading his hands out. “This entire galaxy, a no-go zone. Protected by the Federation until you reach your zenith.”

“And who’s to say when that is?” Stanford scoffed.

“According to Federation, in about five hundred years.” Bill drummed his fingers on the tabletop. “That’s your timeline for interdimensional integration. You aren’t enlightened enough until then, according to the Federation.”

“Well, why do they get to decide that?” Stanford asked indignantly, not liking being infantilised by a faceless Federation of interdimensional beings.

“Why indeed.” Bill wagged his finger at Ford, before he pointed to the relish on Ford’s plate. “Are you gonna eat that?”

Ford shook his head and let Bill pick from his plate, while he pieced information together. “So then, the time police you mentioned before.”

“Federation dogs.” Bill said dismissively, taking all the carrot out of Stanford’s sauerkraut and sprinkling it with pepper. “Of course, their leader has a ranking chair on the Federation’s board, along with a bunch of other party-pooping do-gooders. They set a bunch of rules, then think they govern the universe. Insulting.”

“Hold on. You said this entire galaxy was a no-go zone. Then why are you here? Or the Trilazxxians, or all the other evidence we have of alien life making contact on Earth?”

“Because rules were made to be broken, Sixer.” Bill said as if it was self-explanatory. “And you’re right, I’m not the first interdimensional being to drop on by. Space crafts have been abducting humans since you first evolved.”

“But I thought you said we are a protected species.”
“You are. Which also makes you a non-tradable good. Which is why so many of you get abducted anyway.” Bill raised his eyebrow at Sixer. “It’s like buying a tiger to display in Las Vegas, or keeping an endangered tree frog as a pet, or hunting the last dodos to extinction. You’re very rare in the interdimensional community, and that makes you very valuable. Which is why I’d rather you know how to stand up for yourself, because they’re going to want to walk all over you for what you are.”

“I see.” Ford said bluntly, coming to the depressing realisation that humanity were on an interdimensional conservation list, and his species, the one that tried so hard to reach enlightenment, that strived for the stars, was seen as a novelty, an ignorant novelty, short of its intellectual peak for another five hundred years.

“Of course, if you stick with me, that’ll give you some measure of protection.” Bill continued generously. “But I’d rather not baby you. Besides, it’d be hilarious to see you, the human everyone thinks is categorically inept, show them all up at their own game.”

“Why do you do this?” Ford asked Bill intently, watching him with some of that early wonder for his muse rekindled. “Grant enlightenment like this? Break the rules to let this happen? The portal, the books you’ve shown me, everything? Why?”

“Well, I don’t just do this for everyone.” Bill started, tapping pepper all over his plate. “Let’s just say, I know what it’s like to be written off. And how satisfying it is to prove them all wrong. You’ll see.”

Ford stared at Bill a little while longer, the awe dancing in his eyes as he uncovered more about his muse, before he reached across the table and grabbed Bill’s hand, stilling him as he attempted to garnish his whole plate with too much pepper.

“Why do all this for me? Fight so hard for me? Teach me how to hold my own? Why?”

Ford looked at Bill with a dogged persistence, a determination to get a proper answer from Bill. He’d been highly evasive when it came to admitting his feelings for Ford, but Stanford could tell they were there. His vehement reaction in the bunker, and back at Farmer Sprott’s barn when Stanford had endangered his life. His subtler indicators that he’d be ‘keeping’ Stanford around, the business card, the books he’d brought him, the way he was teaching Stanford to fend for himself. The way Bill sighed contentment into Ford’s mouth every time they kissed, and the way that, whenever they slept together, Ford always woke up entwined thoroughly in Bill’s possessive grasp.

The proofs that Ford had through Bill’s actions weren’t enough. He needed the words to go along with it. He had to know.

Bill met Ford’s determined eye-contact for a while, before he looked away, drumming his fingers on the tabletop again.

“So you don’t embarrass me when this portal goes live. Why else?”

“I think that you know why else.” Ford said softly, squeezing Bill’s hand, trying to get Bill to look at him. “Why you keep me around.”

“Don’t flatter yourself. Just because you’re not hideous to look at –“ Bill began.

“You don’t have to hide it. Not from me.” Ford continued. “It wouldn’t kill you to say it.”

“That I don’t find you despicable?” Bill scoffed. “Sure, I’ll say that more often if it’ll inflate your ego.”
“Bill.” Ford squeezed Bill’s hand again, his tone serious, trying to draw his muse’s gaze up from the tabletop. Bill reluctantly looked up at Sixer through his long eyelashes, and seemed conflicted.

“Even if you can’t say it, I appreciate it. All that you do for me. And are continuing to do. It means more to me than you can imagine.” Ford said, staring earnestly at Bill, making the muse squirm in his seat. “And I’d like to know in your own words why you chose me, why you’re continuing to choose me, why you’re fighting so hard to keep me around.”

Bill bit his bottom lip, before he put his hand over Sixer’s gently and admitted. “Because you’re mine.”

Ford looked at Bill desperately, waiting for more, but when it didn’t come he sighed, realising this was the best he was going to get. With a reassuring smile, Ford echoed the sentiment.

“And you’re mine. My perfect muse.”

Ford sat back against the booth chair, withdrawing his hand with one last gentle squeeze, before he went back to finishing his steak sandwich.

Bill watched Sixer, scrutinising him as he poked the last bit of sandwich into his mouth, chewing it. Bill hadn’t acknowledged Ford’s ‘you’re mine’ statement. He didn’t need to. Sixer could think what he wanted. Bill knew how it really was, though he applauded Sixer’s loyalty.

This awestruck romanticism was endearing, if a little saccharine, but Bill knew it could only last for so long. The portal was racing ahead to completion, and Bill felt this carefree time he had with Sixer slipping him away, already preparing him for life after the portal hit big. He had plans to keep Sixer as his own personal… well, pet was the wrong word, though Kryptos had no problems bandying that word around. That would be how the rest of the interdimensional community saw it. Bill didn’t know what to call it.

Bill wanted to preserve this bubble of serenity for as long as he could, but he knew that his desire to enjoy this, whatever it was, and his obligation to complete the portal didn’t align. He knew which one he’d have to choose. Eventually.

For now he had Sixer. He was Bill’s, he admitted to that, and wanted to admit to a lot more if Bill’s hunch was right. He just wanted to enjoy this, and keep Sixer for as long as he could, consequences be damned.

“Do you want dessert?” Ford asked Bill, looking across the table at the muse, who seemed to be lost in thought.

Snapping out of his reverie, Bill clicked his fingers impatiently, brightening up at the thought of dessert.

“Where’s the dessert menu?”

From the counter if one was listening, one could hear the brief scuffle between the two men, as Stanford tried to grab Bill’s arm, whispered words like ‘don’t click at her’ being hissed across the table.

Of course, no one was listening because everyone was invested in the latest gossip, delivered by Susan Wentworth.

“And he went down on one knee in her favourite part of the forest, snow dustin’ all over the trees like a fairy-tale, and he said to her ‘Willow Oakwood, I feel I’ve wasted the first twenty years of my life not knowing you, because I intend to love you for my entire life, because you’re the best thing that happened to me’ – oh look at me, tearing up.” Suzie wiped the corner of her eye, still gushing over the whole romantic ordeal.

“Gosh that’s beautiful.” Stacey leaned on the countertop, smiling wistfully. “I wish someone said that to me.”

“And then he said, and apparently his voice started breakin’ here. Dan’s voice, can you imagine? And he said ‘I know things won’t be easy, and you don’t have to decide right away. But you know I’ve been tryin’ for you, and I’m gonna keep trying all my life. If you’ll let me.’ And oh my gosh, so he pulls out his grandmother’s ring, down on one knee in the snow. Don’t know how any woman could say no to that. And he says ‘Willow Oakwood, will you marry me?”’

The girls at the counter all shrieked excitedly, flapping their hands at one another, overwhelmed by the good news.

“And what did she say?” Stacey asked, leaning forward.

Suzie put her hand over her mouth, as if smothering the answer, before it burst out of her in an excited squeal. “She said yes!”

The girls all squealed, jumping around excitedly, and some of the men at the bar, lumberjacks mostly, cheered, and applauded.

“Woo! Go Dan!”

“Isn’t it romantic?” Suzie cooed, practically melting over the countertop.

“When’s the wedding?” Mrs Wentworth asked curiously, wiping clean a glass.

“Soon.” Suzie replied. “A few months I reckon.”

Looking over from their booth, Greg and Janice Valentino joined in the conversation.

“A few months would do it. A woman can always tell.” Janice tapped the side of her nose.

“Tell what?” Suzie asked, leaning across the counter.

“Why, she’s pregnant of course. You start showing around this time.”

“No!” Suzie gasped, seeming scandalised. “She never told me!”

“Well, when you have a bundle of joy of your own, you’ll be able to see the signs.” Janice replied, patting her rotund belly.

“Do you think it’s Dan’s?” Stacey asked conspiratorially.

“Of course it’s Dan’s!” Suzie replied, standing up for her friend’s loyalty.

“Do you think he knows?” Stacey pressed, looking for the juicy gossip. “Is that why he popped the question?”

“If he asked her to marry him just because she’s pregnant, Willow would definitely say no. She isn’t like that.” Suzie defended her friend stubbornly. “They’re getting married because they love each other. End of story.”
“Well that makes for a pretty boring story.” Stacey rolled her eyes, twirling a strand of hair around her fingers. “Hold on, I think they want me in the end booth.”

“Is that Stanford?” Suzie looked up enthusiastically. “I’ll go.”

“He’s with his boyfriend.” Stacey gave Suzie a pitying glance. “You don’t want to deal with the guy, he’s a difficult customer. Leaves a mess in his booth every time, like he doesn’t know how to eat like a person.”

“I’ll go!” Suzie repeated, grabbing the menu off Stacey, walking along down to the end of the train cart. “Hiya Stanford. Can I help you?”

“Hullo Suzie. Can we have the –“

“Can we get the dessert menu in here?” Bill interrupted Stanford, pointing his index finger down onto the tabletop. “And about six desserts. Six desserts for starters. Maybe more.”

“We are not getting six desserts. Bill –“ Stanford sighed, before turning to Suzie apologetically. “Just ignore him. The dessert menu will be fine.”

“Here you go.” Suzie passed the menu over and Bill snatched it up, unfolding it already.

“And how many pecans are in this pecan pie?” Bill looked up from the menu, regarding Suzie expectantly. “I need to know for reasons.”

“Oh, uh. I’m not … sure.” Suzie awkwardly scratched the back of her head, not knowing the answer.

“You don’t have to answer that. It’s fine.” Stanford assured her gently.

“Well if she doesn’t know what goes in her food, then what good is she? This is her job.” Bill declared stubbornly.

“Look, are you asking because you want the pie?” Ford asked Bill exasperatedly.

“I want the trifle.” Bill said.

“Then we’ll have the trifle.” Ford looked up to Suzie, his expression rather resigned.

“Two trifles!” Bill held up two fingers impatiently, and Ford sighed, before nodding his assent to Suzie.

She scribbled their order down.

“Are you sure I can’t get you anything else?” She asked.

“Leave it with me, I’ll have four more orders ready for you in a minute.” Bill held a finger up to Suzie dismissively, looking over the menu.

“No.” Ford snatched the menu out of Bill’s grasp and passed it back over to Suzie. “He won’t. Thank you Suzie.”

Suzie was tempted to linger, to let Stanford in on the gossip about Dan’s proposal, but already the two men seemed engrossed in one another, bickering flirtatiously and ignoring Suzie in favour of their banter.
“Have I told you lately that you’re no fun Sixer?”

“I find myself adrift without your daily reminder.”

“You’d be lost without me, admit it.”

“Well, I wouldn’t go that far.”

“Wouldn’t you?”

Suzie stepped back, away from their flirtatious bickering, to the realisation that all around her people were coupling up, falling in love, getting married, having babies. Despite being happy for her friends, it made her feel quite alone. Almost unlovable.

Swallowing her feelings, Suzie spun on her heel, to deliver their order to the kitchen.

Sometimes, it was best not to think about silly things like falling in love.

Bill was laying back on his bed, resting his eyes, preparing to enter the mindscape. Fiddleford’s construction workers had been making good progress on the portal, but a muddy shoeprint left at the elevator’s entrance had Sixer asking a few too many questions.

It wasn’t Bill’s job to cover McGucket’s ass, so he left him to it, intending to get a little business done of his own, but apparently McGucket didn’t get the message a closed door was meant to convey.

Bill’s bedroom door slammed open, swiftly followed by a nervous rambling Fiddleford McGucket.

“I can’t keep this up. Stanford’s already askin’ questions. I don’t – I don’t know –”

Bill opened his eyes and glared at Fiddleford, frustrated. The scientist seemed to have barged in just to anxiously monologue.

“Do you have the wrong room?” Bill asked angrily.

“You’ve gotta help me.” Fiddleford looked at Bill expectantly and wrung his hands. “You said you’d keep Ford out of the house, but I can’t keep everything under wraps when he’s comin’ back here every night. It just isn’t possible. First the footprint, then the food missing from the fridge. He doesn’t believe I ate it, he don’t think I can eat that much.”

“Well, then put on some weight and maybe he’ll believe you.” Bill said dismissively and rolled over, turning his back to the scientist.

“That’s not –” Fiddleford huffed, frustrated. “That’s not the point. You were supposed to be distracting him and you’re not doing a very good job.”

“Excuse me?” Bill’s eyes snapped open, and he glared at McGucket again.

“Just because you take him out of a daytime, that don’t mean that job ends when you get home.
You gotta … you gotta keep him distracted. Stick with him. Don’t let him look for evidence that someone else is up in here. Don’t be leavin’ him alone down there. Not for a second!” Fiddleford blustered.

“He wouldn’t be suspicious if you hadn’t been sloppy, and it’s not my job to babysit him, he’s a grown man. Don’t inflict me on him twenty four seven, you’re supposed to be pulling your weight too.”

“I’m tryin’.” Fiddleford bemoaned. “I’m tryin’, but he don’t believe me. He’s gettin’ suspicious, he don’t trust me like he trusts you. He’s askin’ too many questions, and I’m not that good at lyin’.”

Bill smothered a smirk at that. His plan was working.

“Well, if you gave him answers that weren’t absolutely transparent, maybe he’d believe you.” Bill raised his eyebrows smugly at McGucket, and gestured to the man. “But you’re a blithering stuttering wreck. Nothing about you seems trustworthy, hell, even I’d be suspicious.”

“I’ve got no other choice. He’s askin’ me too many questions.” Fiddleford paced fretfully, working himself up to his decision. “I’ve got to – I’ve got to – there’s no other choice, I’ve got to erase his memory of ever seein’ that footprint.”

“NO.” Bill sat up swiftly and pointed at McGucket, the threat alive in his eyes. “I’ve told you NO meddling with Sixer’s brain. Not at all. You keep your greasy hands out of what’s mine.”

“But he’s gettin’ too close to findin’ out. I don’t know what else to do – I don’t –“

Bill pinched the bridge of his nose and rubbed his forehead before exhaling an exasperated sigh.

“Fine. I’ll find you a better distraction. But I’m not doing all the work this time! You have to pull your weight and put your trigger finger away. Leave Sixer’s mind alone, and I’ll make sure he’s got better things to do than stay in the shack and study footprints on the floor.”

“You will!” Fiddleford’s face lit up with relief. “Thank you, thank you.”

“Thinks he’s Sherlock Holmes all of a sudden.” Bill rubbed his hand down the rest of his face, tired, before he looked up at McGucket, his expression unimpressed. “Well, are you just going to stand around in my bedroom all night, or are you going to go do something useful? Away from me preferably. I was trying to catch a little shut eye.”

“Oh.” Fiddleford realised obliquely. “I’m sorry. I didn’t realise. I’ll just, uh, leave you be then.”

“You do that.” Bill reclined back against the pillows and closed his eyes, wincing one open to watch McGucket’s retreat. “And shut the door on your way out. Maybe study what a closed door generally means.”

“Sorry.” McGucket whispered, and closed the door softly, before turning around in the hallway to see Ford coming up the stairs.

Stanford paused, and gave Fiddleford a discerning look, seeing his hand on the doorknob to Bill’s room.

“What are you doing?” Ford asked shrewdly.

“Oh, uh.” Fiddleford sweated nervously, before he came up with a plausible lie. “I wanted to ask Bill if he knew anything about the missing food, but he was sleepin’ so I left him be.”
“Oh.” Ford walked along the corridor, and peered into Bill’s room, the door still slightly ajar.

Bill turned around crossly in his pillow laden bed and flipped Ford and Fiddleford a rude gesture.

“Maybe it’s best to let him rest.” Ford closed the door completely, clicking it shut. “It’s been a long day.”

“Sure has.” Fiddleford turned and walked over to the stairs, heading up to the attic. He paused to wave at Stanford. “Goodnight Stanford.”

“Goodnight Fiddleford.” Ford replied cautiously, before walking into his own bedroom, closing the door.

Crunching along the thawing trail to the bunker in the woods, Bill paused and pulled out a little something he’d been keeping for a special occasion from storage in the Quadrangle.

Pausing to hide it behind a bush, Bill stopped on the track and pointed to the large blue egg peering out of the foliage.

“Hey Sixer, come take a look at this.”

Ford and Fiddleford stopped their hike, and doubled back through the trail to ogle into the bush at the rather large egg.

Stanford gasped, and crouched down to examine the egg, pulling it out of the bushes.

“Does it look edible? I think it looks edible.” Bill remarked flippantly, knowing exactly what to say to cultivate Sixer’s protective urges.

“Stop that. You’ve just had lunch. It’s not a meal.” Ford held the egg close to his chest, before he pulled back to pour over its details, holding it up to the light. “I’ve never seen an egg like this before.”

“What do you think it is?” Fiddleford asked, giving Bill a suspicious glance.

Ford smiled triumphantly and held the egg aloft.

“I think … it’s a specimen!”

Chapter End Notes

I got all teary writing Dan's proposal. I'm a sucker for romance. I was so excited too when I found out Carl Sagan picked the sounds included on the Voyager record, Ford's turtleneck hero.
I split the chapter in half so I can dedicate more time to Shifty. That's something fun to look forward to. After Shifty's chapter, things are winding up and the portal is almost ready. It's almost showtime.

This chapter I'm dedicating to VagabondDiesel who discovered this fic recently and has really inspired me with the comments they left. Thank you for reading and re-reading bud! I really appreciate it!

P.S recently I got several artworks commissioned from this fic from sovonight, dobermutt, durchinmultiverse, and ghost-chicky and they're all awesome. If ppl want to see them check them out here http://f-imaginings.tumblr.com/tagged/knowing+me+knowing+you/
Also if any readers are artists and they'd like to draw something from this fic and take commissions, message me on tumblr, I'd love to support artists in the fandom, and I'm always inspired by art from this fic!
Thank you as always! Next chapter has some Shifty business involved, on many counts.
They say a restless body can hide a peaceful soul.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

“No now, don’t be sad. It’s just a tiny little prick, and then you can have some beans after! Some yummy beans. Wouldn’t you like that?”

“Stanford.” Fiddleford stood behind Stanford with his arms crossed, watching disapprovingly as Ford babied the unholy creature that was currently imitating a dog, wagging its tail at the scientist.

“Almost over. Almost.” Ford withdrew the syringe from the pet crate, and passed it back over to Fiddleford, who sighed and took the syringe, putting it on the counter top.

“Who’s a good Shifty? Who is? It’s you! Yes it’s you.”

The shapeshifter wagged its tail eagerly and barked twice at Ford, disguised as a happy little Pomeranian. Despite its adorable current form, Fiddleford was still suspicious of the creature, and he felt that Ford was being far too indulgent with it.

“Now who wants some beans?”

“Stanford, you’re babying it.” Fiddleford tutted as Ford reached for the can opener and spoon, doling out F’s favourite brand of beans to the alien creature, crouched beside the crate. “It’s not a pet, it’s a specimen. You’re here to study it.”

“I know.” Ford replied, spooning out the beans for the shifter, watching its form change, reverting to the translucent grub it’s DNA seemed to prefer. It’s pincer-like teeth clacked together, and the grub hoovered up the beans as quickly as they were doled out, ravenous for them. “But he was scared. No creature likes getting a shot. I’m just trying to make it less scary for him. More fun.”

“It’s here to be studied, not have fun.” F put his hands on his hips, curling his lip at the way the shapeshifter gobbled up the beans on the spoon and clacked its teeth on the metal.

“Well, I’m not going to traumatise the poor thing.” Stanford argued, spooning out more beans from the tin. “I’m rewarding him for good behaviour.”

“You’re spoilin’ it.”

“I don’t understand how you, a father with a son, could be so cruel to a creature like this.” Stanford said, half teasing Fiddleford, half serious. “It doesn’t hurt to treat him with kindness.”

“Firstly, don’t you go comparin’ my son Tate to that thing there. Bein’ a father is completely different from havin’ a pet alien. Secondly, you’ll have to forgive me for bein’ unsentimental about livestock. Growin’ up on a farm will do that to you.” F scoffed and paced away to put the syringe in the slot for the analytics machine, closing the flap and locking it in place.

Doling the last of the beans into the bottom of Shifty’s crate and patting the shifter sweetly on the head, Ford locked the crate and stood up, walking over to the decontamination chamber that led to the observation room. He pulled the fabric face mask off his face and pressed the button for the showers, following F through to the main part of the lab.

“Here I thought I could foist most of the caretaking duties off onto you, and your fatherly ways. I can almost picture you feeding little Shifty, burping him, and singing him to sleep. One of your Southern lullabies.”

F glared at Ford while the showers blew hot air into their faces, drying them off, then allowing them to proceed into the observation room.

“Oh, you’d like that wouldn’t you. Nothin’s stopping me from bringing my banjo down here.”

“You made up that rule.” Fiddleford contested.

“Ah, but Bill co-signed it, which makes that a standard rule by majority voting.” Ford smugly replied, settling down on one of the chairs by the control panel, spinning around on it.

“What’s Bill doin’ co-signing off on lab rules. He’s never down here.” Fiddleford complained grumpily as he flicked the switches that turned on the DNA analysis program he’d set into the lab’s computers. “And he always sides with you anyway.”

“Yes, well maybe that’s because I’m always right.” Ford grinned cheekily, and reached for the output readings that printed while the syringe of Shifty’s DNA was analysed.

“That’s not why. He’s rubbing off on you.” Fiddleford wagged his finger at Stanford chidingly. “The Stanford I knew in college was never this annoying.”

“That’s not what you said at the Backupsmore D&D& more D championships.” Ford spun around on the chair again, feeling light hearted and carefree.

“Because you were unbearable during the whole campaign!” Fiddleford blustered and pointed to Ford. “You kept undermining my DM-ing in front of the whole campus board.”

“No I wasn’t, I was just playing competitively.” Ford countered, clapping his hands on his thighs. “We were in the finals.”

“God, that feels like such a long time ago.” Fiddleford sat in his own rolling chair, and looked up to the ceiling of the lab. “Look at us now.”

“Uncovering the secrets of shapeshifting DNA in an underground lab.” Ford said gleefully, tearing the paper off from the printer, reading through it.

“And buildin’ an interdimensional portal. We sure stepped up, didn’t we?” Fiddleford sighed, and looked at the monitors, watching Shifty rattle the bars of his crate, cantankerous as ever.

“I’d say.” Ford ran his finger over the page as he read the results of the DNA testing. “Look at this, this is fascinating. It seems Shifty can replicate another creature’s form right down to its DNA when he shapeshifts. At a molecular level, the change is there.”

“Huh.” Fiddleford rolled his chair over to look at the print out, rubbing his chin. “That’s – unnerving.”

“Incredible is more like it. Imagine showing Shifty a photo of an extinct species? Or an endangered one? That could be a fantastic way to replicate DNA samples or even possibly reverse engineer creatures humans have hunted to extinction and give them a second lease at life.”

Fiddleford nodded, and then frowned, drumming his fingers on his leg as his knee started to bounce fretfully.

“Listen, Stanford, about the shapeshifter –“

“Shifty.” Ford corrected Fiddleford absently, still pouring through the information on the print out.

“You can’t be namin’ the thing. It’s not a pet Stanford, it’s a specimen, and we’re only keepin’ it around to use it to test out the cryo-tubes. You can’t get attached to it.”

“Well, I can’t very well go around calling him Experiment 210 all the time, it’s such a mouthful.” Ford replied, deliberately ignoring the point Fiddleford was trying to make. “I wonder if we can pinpoint the section of DNA that allows Shifty to change shape, or if that’s something innate in a more cosmic way. Scientifically there’s got to be a basis for it.”

Fiddleford groaned, and ran his hands through his hair, muttering. “Or just ignore me. Like I’m talkin’ to myself sometimes.”

In the corner of the lab, a device about the size of a cinderblock began ringing – Fiddleford’s preliminary template for a cellular phone.

“Who’s callin’? F spun his chair around, looking at the ringing device.

Springing up from his chair, Ford went to pick it up, eagerness written all over his face. “It’s probably Bill. I’ll get it.”

Whether Ford was excited by the novelty of using the cell-phone or if he was simply excited to hear from Bill, it wasn’t certain. The scientist seemed brighter and happier with a new specimen to study.

Picking up the cellular phone and pressing the answer button, Ford held the phone close to his ear.

“Hello?”

“Chhhr – Hello, I’m conducting a survey for Hands Illustrated, how many hands are you currently in possession of?”

“Bill?” Ford presumed, obliquely recognising his muse’s voice beneath the crackle of the reception and presumably Bill’s own hand distorting the sound through the receiver.

“Okay, but how many fingers?”

“Twelve.” Ford sighed, shaking his head with amusement. “Don’t tell me you’re calling because you’re bored again. These calls cost money, especially to the cellular.”

“Hands Illustrated makes plenty of money, we can afford it. How would you feel about modelling for the centrefold?”

“I’ll pass.” Ford chuckled, imagining the muse reclining on the couch in the living room, twirling the phone cord around his slender fingers. It was a tempting image. “You know, if you’re bored you can always come down here, there’s plenty to do in the lab.”

“I’ll pass.” Bill parroted back.

“You haven’t even met Shifty yet. He’s growing with remarkable rapidity, I feel like only last week he was still just an egg.”
“And the world liked him better that way.” There was a crunching sound that led Ford to believe Bill was eating while on call.

“What are you eating?” Ford asked, while Fiddleford glared at him, picking up the papers the printer was spitting out, having to go over them by himself while Stanford was making small-talk with his boyfriend.

“It’s either celery or a very green carrot.” There was another crunch and Bill continued talking. “There’s no food in the house, you should come back here and cook for me.”

“What happened to the casserole I left you in the fridge?”

“All gone.” Bill sang cheerfully.

“There should be some pasta in the Tupperware.”

“Gone.” Bill replied swiftly. It almost sounded like he was picking his teeth.

“What about the bread and butter pudding?”

“Gone, gone, gone.”

“You have the most insatiable appetite I’ve ever encountered. I swear.” Ford marvelled fondly.

“I turned on something called the Julia Childs cooking show, but so far I have yet to see her eat a single infant. Not one.” Bill sounded disappointed. “And now I’m hungry again.”

“Well, a decided lack of eating children will do that to you.” Ford joked, drawing a peculiar glance from Fiddleford.

“So what would you call finger number six, or would you have to rename both middle fingers since technically there’s no true middle finger. How do you index the index fingers?”

“I thought we were talking about your food situation.”

“Don’t change the topic Sixer, I’m conducting a survey.”

Ford chuckled and paced around, holding the oversized cellular phone to his ear.

The lab was small and the phone’s speakers made it very clear what the person on the other side of the line was saying. Fiddleford rolled his eyes, stacking the papers in order while Bill and Stanford transparently flirted in their own strange way.

“Stanford, the papers.” Fiddleford reminded him, and Ford waved at him idly, acknowledging that he’d heard him.

“I’m declining to answer.” He said into the phone, obviously amused.

“Then you’re vetoing your right to name them. I’m naming them now.” Bill sounded gleeful on the other end of the line.

“No you’re not.” Ford cut Bill’s sinister plans short. “I don’t want to know what devious names you’d come up with.”

“I’m naming them all Bill 1 through 6. Left and right.” Bill paused, then clacked his tongue. “No, that’s not creative enough. Let me get back to you.”
“Stanford?” Fiddleford pressed, not keen to play the unwitting third wheel to this phone call.

“I might have to get back to you.” Ford sighed, and reluctantly looked over to the papers piling up on the counter. “We’ve got a fair bit to do here, we might not be back til late. Might even have to stay the night again.”

“No! Sixer!” Bill pouted, obviously disappointed. “Four nights in a row?”

“We need to observe Shifty’s development.” Ford argued.

“You’re robbing me of quality Sixer time. Over a grub that doesn’t even have the decency to embrace it’s disgusting true form.”

“We’re at a pivotal stage of Shifty’s development, we can’t just leave him to his own devices. Not now, he’d think we’d abandoned him.” Ford reasoned. “He’s just beginning to trust us.”

“What about me? You’re abandoning me!” Bill insisted, a little manipulatively.

“You can always come down here, there’s nothing stopping you.” Ford replied. “Not now, especially.”

“I’m not teleporting to your beck and call.” Bill said grumpily, and Stanford put his hand over the phone’s speaker, shielding Bill’s secret from F. Those last bricks unbound in the forest unlocked more cosmic powers for the muse, though Stanford had yet to see them all in practise considering his attention had been so diverted by the shifter.

“If anything, you should be coming to me.”

“Yes, well, I’m quite busy.” Ford said lightly.

“You get one more night.” Bill said definitively. “Then you’re coming home. Leave McGucket to mind the grub, or stick him in the cryotube, he’d never know you left.”

“The grub or Fiddleford?” Ford questioned wryly, as F was now nudging him with his foot, trying to get him to disengage from the phone call.

“Why Sixer, what a novel idea.” Bill’s Cheshire grin was audible. “Didn’t know you had it in you.”

“Stanford.” Fiddleford repeated, most unimpressed.

“I’m joking, I’m joking.” Ford assured him. Turning back to the call, Ford held the phone in his left hand and made some notes in his journal with his right. “I can see about wrapping things up here, and I’ll be back home tomorrow morning.”

“I’ll hold you to that.” Bill’s voice came from the other end of the line, clipped and determined.

“Or around lunchtime, perhaps, depending on how Shifty adjusts.” Ford made an adjustment to one of his notes on Shifty, before he heard Bill’s voice ring out sharp and cranky by his ear.

“No, tomorrow morning. No more evading me.”

“That’s not what I’m doing, but if it will make you happy, I’ll be there bright and early tomorrow morning.” Ford said in a pacifying tone, continuing to jot down notes in his journal. “I’ll even make you breakfast, how does that sound?”
“Better.” Bill said, sounding vaguely mollified.

Fiddleford was outright kicking Ford’s ankle now, and, shaking his ankle out, Ford continued.

“Now I really do have to –“

“Hold on Sixer, I’ve got Hands Magazine on the other line. Can’t talk. Gotta go. BYE!”

Ford blinked and stared at the cellular phone as the dial tone beeped rudely back at him, Bill taking the initiative to hang up on Stanford before the scientist could brush him off.

Ford ogled the cell for a few seconds longer, offended, before he allowed his own private amusement to set in.

“Stanford.” Fiddleford repeated impatiently. “If you’d stop smilin’ at the phone, you really need to see this.”

F was pointing at the monitor, where Shifty’s cage was jostling around, sharp spikes of metal sticking out from the crate’s confines. It seemed Shifty had copied the form of the syringe, and was eager to get out.

“Oh dear.”

Putting down the phone, Stanford rushed back into the lab, Fiddleford following him with a spritzer bottle of ‘monster sedative’ in hand.

“Shifty! Shifty calm down!”

“Stanford look out!”

“Ack! Watch your fingers Fiddleford. How about some more beans? Who likes beans?”

Fiddleford despaired of his circumstances, as Shifty reverted back into the hungry grub he was, snapping his jaws and rocking the cage back and forth.

“God help us.”

Rolling around on the couch, a pillow held over his face to drown out the clamour of the builders downstairs, Bill attempted to sleep, visiting the mindscape.

The Quadrangle was busy. Those few applicants who proved their loyalty during the auction seemed to be moving into the incomprehensible escher-scape, preparing for the big day.

Doing his best to avoid the crowds, Bill shrunk his form down, navigating the packed corridors as a yellow speck, until he grew large enough to slink his hand out long, tapping Keyhole on the shoulder.

“Whossat? Oh, uh, Boss?” Keyhole squinted at Bill, who was about the size of a snowflake right now.
“Keyhole, meet me in the anti-anti-gravity chamber.” Bill whispered. “Don’t tell anyone you’re meeting with me. Be subtle.”

“Why are we whispering?” Keyhole stage whispered back at Bill.

“Just meet me in the chamber.” Bill smacked his forehead, despairing of Keyhole, before he teleported into subspace, reappearing on the landing that led to the anti-anti-gravity chamber.

Floating along the corridor, Bill heard the clack of heels before he looked up, a lack of immediate spacial awareness informing him that Pyronica was walking along, her flaming boots nearly squashing Bill’s minuscule form.

Winding his arm long like a snake, he twined it around Pyronica’s leg, halting her gait.

“Uh uh uh.” Bill tsked at her.

“Bill, is that you?” Pyronica asked loudly, her big mouth drawing the attention of nearly all the fresh applicants gathered downstairs.

“Bill?”

“Is Bill Cipher here?”

“Hey, I need to talk to him!”

Came the clamour from downstairs.

Looking down to where Bill was frantically waving his arms, holding his finger over his eye like he was shooshing her, Pyronica winced, and awkwardly looked down at the gathered monsters and mobsters.

“Oh, uh, no. I – I just say that when I stub my toe.” Pyronica giggled in a ditzy tone, hoping they’d believe the act. She flipped her hair back and batted her eyelashes at the crowd. “OW, hahah, oh Bill!”

The mobsters guffawed, and waved their hands at Pyronica.

“Aww, haha, the Dame got me.”

“Don’t let him hear you say that sweet cheeks.”

“Damn that’s cute.”

Pyronica smiled and waved, before looking down to where Bill was tugging on her leg, urging her into the anti-anti-gravity chamber.

Mouthing ‘sorry’ she followed Bill into the chamber, blowing one last kiss over her shoulder for the mobsters to relish.

Once they entered the room, the gravity kicked in, weighing heavily on their forms. Both Bill and Pyronica walked a little further into the middle of the room, then laid down on the floor, staring up at the ceiling, feeling the heavy press of gravity caress their bodies.

“You handled that well.” Bill remarked, stretching his arms out to lay two dimensional on the fuzzy multi-coloured carpet. “Ow Bill?”
“I didn’t know what else to say.” Pyronica replied, lacing her fingers together over her abdomen, looking up. “They bought it though.”

“Goo Mobsters.” Bill spat bitterly. “Some of the most ignorant muscle you’ll meet this side of the cosmos.”

“One of them called me Toots the other day.” Pyronica regaled. “I was so close, so close to eating him. You have no idea how much I’m holding back.”

“You and me both.” Bill scoffed, and blinked at the ceiling.

Pyronica stretched her hand out to see how far she could push it, before she let it smack down on her chest, letting it lay there. Puffing out a breath, she turned her head to see Bill’s flat yellow form.

“So, how’s things?”

“Ugh.” Bill replied, and copied Pyronica’s hand movement, only to smack himself in the bricks.

“That bad, huh?”

“The portal’s coming along fine, and things are all proceeding ahead of schedule. It’s just – boring. It’s boring and I’m bored, and Sixer’s always away.” Bill complained.

“Still studying the metamorph-grub?” Pyronica asked.

“Like I needed another disgusting squealing waste of space competing with me for his attention? Specs is bad enough. He has a break down every other day and then it’s ‘oh no looks like I gots to wipe some memories.’” Bill mimicked mockingly. “Ironic really, for my mechanic to break down so often. I think he’s faulty.”

“Trade him in.” Pyronica advised, turning around to lay on her side, facing Bill. “Or I could eat him for you, if you want.”

“The answer to all life’s problems.” Bill sighed, before pushing his form out into a pyramid shape so he could ‘lay on his side’ and face Pyronica. “Unfortunately, I can’t kill him, we made a deal. I’m supposed to let him live in exchange for his work fast tracking the portal.”

“Sounds like you don’t want him to fast track the portal. Sounds like you wish you had more time left.” Py murmured, watching Bill.

“Yeah, well, time likes to bite me in the eye.” Bill huffed, and looked at the carpet, stirring his finger through the fibres. “I’ve a list of things I’d rather be doing, a list of things I have to do, and a list of things I’m avoiding, and those last two tend to intersect.”

“Party planning is stressful.” Pyronica pouted. “Parties are supposed to be fun.”

“You’re preaching to the choir Py.” Bill sighed and laid back flat again.

There was a knock on the door to the anti-anti-gravity chamber, and Keyhole poked his head in.

“Boss?”

Bill fought the gravity to wave lazily at Keyhole. “Come on in Keyhole. Close the door behind you.”
Keyhole shimmied into the room and shut the door behind him, before limbo-ing over to Bill and Pyronica, laying down on the carpet beside them both.

“Did anyone follow you?” Bill asked Keyhole.

“No.” Keyhole shook his head, and looked at Bill. “Boss, why are you hiding in here laying on the floor?”

Bill tsked, and Pyronica answered for him.

“Sometimes you just gotta lay on the floor Keyhole. That’s just how it is.”

“Yeah.” Keyhole nodded. “But it seems to me that there’s a long line of people out there waiting to shake your hand Boss, and they’ve all been looking for you.”

“Let them look.” Bill replied, waving his hand dismissively. “They’re like vultures down there, all queuing up waiting for me to promise them their wildest dreams. I’m not making deals with any of them until I’m good and ready to. I have priorities, Keyhole, and they all think they’re at the top of the list, but at the end of the day it’s my list.”

“I getcha Boss. And laying on the floor in the anti-anti-gravity chamber is at the top of the list.” Keyhole smacked his lips together and nodded to himself. “I like the way you roll.”

“Actually, meeting with your cousin is at the top of the list, so where are we coming along with that?” Bill looked over to Keyhole expectantly.

“Oh.” Keyhole poked his pointer fingers together sheepishly. “Well, uh, I figured, you know, he’s a busy guy. Maybe surprising him outta the blue isn’t the best way to go about this.”

“I didn’t ask about your reservations, I asked how we’re going to do this, so do you have answers for me or not?”

Keyhole sighed, and looked up at the ceiling. “I haven’t booked an appointment with him, but I did figure out his schedule. He’s backed up with clients for usually most of the rotation, but there’s always a couple of hours at the end of each day where he locks himself inside his office and catches up on paperwork. He won’t be expecting anyone then, much less you.”

“Or you.” Bill clicked his fingers and pointed at Keyhole. “You’re coming with me.”

“What?” Keyhole blinked, and looked over at Bill, flabbergasted. “But Boss, then he’s gonna know I helped you.”

“Don’t worry Keyhole.” Bill raised his hand, like he was making a scout’s oath. “I will make sure he doesn’t tell on you to mommy.”

Bill winked at Pyronica, before he clapped, reversing the anti-anti-gravity, floating upright. “We’ll go pay your cousin a visit soon then. Maybe in a week or so. Pyronica, you can stay and hold the fort.”

“Oh goodie.” Pyronica rolled her eye.

“Are you gonna go talk to the mob now Bill?” Keyhole asked, sitting up. “You know, the ones who’ve been waiting all this time?”

“Nope!” Bill said cheerily, tipping his hat at Keyhole. “I’m gonna go do anything but that!”

Teleporting away in a haze of bright yellow light, Bill bid his henchmaniacs farewell.

“Remember, you didn’t see me, but I saw you! BYE!”

And with that he popped out of the mindscape, seeking refuge from his responsibilities back on Earth.

Having finally coerced the Shapeshifter into a larger cage to accommodate for Shifty’s rapid rate of growth, after a long day of conducting tests and studying results, both Ford and Fiddleford were exhausted, sharing the cramped cot in the bunker, sleeping back to back, trying to get some shut eye.

Fiddleford had a habit of hogging the blankets, and there was only one to share between them, so Ford slept in his trench coat, huddled up, curling his knees under the fabric as he slept.

This had been their sleeping arrangement for the past three nights, and while Ford might complain some in the morning, even the lack of proper bedrest didn’t dull his enthusiasm for science.

He’d been sleeping incredibly well, despite the uncomfortable positioning, waking up feeling preternaturally refreshed each day, which was surprising considering for the past three nights Ford had been plagued by bizarre cryptic dreams he couldn’t explain.

Tonight was no different.

His dreams started where they often did, in a colossal library, stacked with a multitude of books and secret pathways to the imaginations of genius.

Ford usually felt quite safe in this athenaeum of thought. He’d been blessed with nothing but pleasant dreams, enlightenment, challenges and successes in this grand dreamscape. While he often felt the heavy presence of his muse’s influence in his dreams, feeling his gaze acutely sometimes, a warm playful presence in the back of his mind, that feeling had been absent as of late.

Ford’s subconscious may have been diversifying, finding other things to fixate on, though Ford highly doubted that.

This brief separation from his muse in order to catalogue his findings about Shifty had him feeling fonder for his muse than ever. Absence was a stirring thing, and Ford found it far easier to mask his obsession with the God when the cosmic being was right there, sitting beside him on the couch, irritating him consistently. It was easier to banter, to save face in front of him.
Now that Bill was absent, Ford was just reminded of how much he missed him.

Ford wandered through the shelves, climbing one of the sliding ladders in the library to reach for one of the books in the ‘romance section’ – a naming choice Stanford hadn’t been able to shake, lucid dreamer or not.

Plucking one of the books from the shelf, Ford opened it up to pull out a memory of Bill, immersing himself in the pages.

“Are you sure you don’t want to come with us?” Ford was sitting on the couch downstairs with Bill in his lap, his arms around the muse, sharing an indulgent goodbye with the god while Fiddleford packed the truck with supplies.

He punctuated his sentence with a kiss, the muse leaning leisurely into Ford, his lidded eyes glowing a steady gold.

“Mmm. You know labs don’t agree with me. Labs and labwork.” Bill stroked his fingers through Ford’s fluffy hair, something he obviously enjoyed doing. Ford enjoyed it too; the pleasant tingle in his scalp when Bill’s fingernails scraped along the surface, warming him pleasantly with the sensation.

“Some would just say ‘work’ and leave it at that.” Ford added cheekily, rubbing his six-fingered hands along Bill’s thighs indulgently.

“I work.” Bill replied indignantly. “I do plenty of work. What about that laser gun I made you?”

“Yes, well, that was quite some time ago.” Ford teased, and looped his arms around Bill’s waist, tugging him closer. “Not that I don’t appreciate it. I’m just looking for a more recent example.”

“Ungrateful.” Bill scoffed, obviously offended by Ford’s wry arrogance, but he couldn’t seem to stop himself from threading his fingers through Ford’s hair. “I do plenty for you, or are you forgetting who stopped the rain for you just a few weeks ago?”

“I thought you did that for Fiddleford.” Ford said lightly, rubbing Bill’s back with one hand, snagging Bill’s wrist with his other, pressing his thumb in light circles on Bill’s palm.

“You know I don’t do things for Fiddleford.” Bill replied, grinning, pressing his forehead to Sixer’s, watching him with reciprocal fondness.

“What makes me so special, I wonder.” Ford pressed a kiss to Bill’s palm, then pressed another to the back of his knuckles, bringing a dark flush to the muse’s cheeks. “That a God would change the weather for me?”

Bill didn’t say anything, but his mouth twisted in a peculiar way that made Ford think that perhaps he was flustered.

The radio on the mantelpiece coughed out an odd static noise, turning on suddenly without anyone touching it, and a fragment of a song by seventies band The Real Thing started playing of its own volition.

“I would take the stars out of the sky for you.”

Ford looked over at the radio, then looked to Bill, who was getting progressively redder in the face, his eyes and tattoos glowing luminously.
“Did you -?” Ford wondered, awed that Bill’s powers seemed to extend to such lengths, to controlling the radio, or at least turning it onto the right channel at the right time. Judging from the embarrassment colouring Bill’s face, he hadn’t intended for this to happen, his magic leaking out revealing too much.

Bill spluttered, and turned around to wave his hand at the radio, knocking it off the shelf, silencing it, as the next line of the song rang out.

“Stop the rain from falling if you asked me tooooo -CRCHHK.”

The radio crashed onto the floor of the living room, springs and parts breaking off it, rolling across the wood panelled floor.

Ford watched the radio spark as springs and gears scrambled around the broken machine, and could barely smother an exultant, giddy grin, looking back to Bill with twinkling eyes.

“That was –“ Ford began, sounding amused.

“Nothing! That was nothing!” Bill spluttered, his gold eyes wide, looking delightfully off balance.

“A good song.” Ford finished, watching Bill with amusement. He cupped Bill’s face in his hands, feeling how hot the muse was becoming, and couldn’t resist pressing a kiss to Bill’s puffy lips.

The tension seemed to drain out of the muse, his unintentional romantic outburst forgiven. He kissed Stanford back, melting a little against him, until it was just the two of them pressed as close together as possible, kissing indulgently.

Fiddleford had a feeling their goodbye would be drawn out, so he was waiting in the car with a book.

Pulling away to press his forehead against Bill’s, feeling the god’s warmer temperature on his brow, Ford hummed the rest of the song, mumbling the words, his own cheeks feeling a little red.

“I’d do anything for you, your wish is my command.”

Bill sighed contentment against Ford’s lips, watching the human with conflicted endearment in his golden eyes.

“Oh Sixer, why are you like this?”

“Like what?” Ford asked, blinking up at Bill as he took his glasses off, the lenses fogged by Bill’s heated breath.

Ford wasn’t entirely sure why Bill looked so disappointed while still watching him like he was the most fascinating creature he’d ever encountered.

Ford couldn’t truly comprehend what had Bill so conflicted, as while he’d been pushing for some sort of acknowledgement of Bill’s feelings lately, he’d not gotten a straight answer. Granted, Ford hadn’t been forthright with his own feelings, but he presumed he was being overt enough for Bill to already know.

Bill sighed again, and traced along Ford’s cheekbone with his finger, trailing along down to Sixer’s chin.

“Special.” Bill said, sounding resigned to the fact, and woefully taken in by it.
The horn honked outside, Fiddleford evidently tired of waiting for Ford to say his goodbyes.

Looking to the door, Ford put his glasses back on and got up off the couch, depositing Bill comfortably there, before leaning down to press a parting kiss to his muse’s lips.

“I’ll be back soon. Call me on the cellular if you need anything. Will you have enough to do while I’m gone?”

“I’ll fix that.” Bill pointed to the broken radio. “Maybe tweak your photocopier too. So don’t say I never did nothing for you.”

Pulling on his trench coat, Ford paused to grin at Bill. “Now why would I do that?”

Bill snorted and waved Ford out the door. “Just go.”

“I’ll be back before you know it.” Ford assured Bill, and raced out the door to join Fiddleford in the truck.

That felt like so long ago, and it had only been a few days.

Ford missed the muse sorely. He missed his warmth, his grin, his enlightenment, his cleverness and wit. It was every bit as flattering as Ford had assumed it would be, having a partner who was just as fixated with you as you were with them, and adding to the flattery, the fact that his partner was a god.

Well, that was partly why Ford’s ego throbbed so joyfully every time he squeezed acknowledgement of his appeal from Bill. It truly made him feel special, beyond special, to be special to a God. Certainly, he’d been chosen by Bill initially, for his intellect, but to be chosen again for more than that – that just bubbled joy deep in Ford’s soul. He was elated by that.

He had a history of being chosen last, for sports, for friends, and his first choice school didn’t choose him thanks to Stanley’s intervention. Being chosen again and again by Bill was all Stanford ever wanted.

Reaching for another book from the shelf, sighing fond nostalgia into the empty library, Ford flipped the next book open to an incredibly comical sketch of Bill putting excessive amounts of pepper in Fiddleford’s soup while he was in the bathroom, grinning with Ford like they were in on the prank together.

Ford shook his head and chuckled at the page, recalling that dinner fondly, when he heard it.

“Lies

Lies

Lies.”

A thin voice, like a whisper on the wind, drifted airily along the stacks, sounding just out of reach, everywhere and nowhere at once.

“Who’s there?” Ford looked around, the hairs on the back of his neck standing on edge. He felt a breeze rustle through his mind, flipping the pages of the book he held.

The whisper came again, this time from down the corridor, and Ford closed the book in his hand, putting it back on the shelf.

“Don’t believe –“

Ford slid down the ladder, and walked down the end of the corridor, between the stacks of books, following the voice.

“- his lies.”

Ford approached the end of the bookshelves with trepidation, his mind conjuring a weapon to protect himself, something he hadn’t needed in the sanctuary of his own mindscape before. Holding the laser gun in his hand, Ford took a deep breath, recalling his marksmanship practice, before he spun around, pointing the gun at the empty space behind the bookshelf.

There was nothing there.

“Where are you?” Ford growled to himself, his paranoia kicking into gear.

The breeze picked up again, blowing in a different direction this time, and Ford heard the voice call out from behind the next row of books, wispy and faint.

“The truth –“

Ford fired off a shot from the magnet gun, blasting through two rows of journals, leaving a wide singed hole where Ford presumed the voice was coming from.

Ford approached the hole, peering through the gap in the bookshelf to see nothing again.

The elusive voice was tricking him.

The wind seemed to sigh around him, bitterly disappointed, before it spoke again, echoing from all around him.

“I have tried to tell you but you are not yet ready for the truth.”

“What truth?” Ford said through gritted teeth, holding the laser gun at the ready, eying off different places around the library where the voice’s recipient could possibly be hiding.

The wind rushed towards him, blowing him back through the bookshelves, pulling the mindscape around his still feet, transporting him against his will.

When the wind stopped, Ford found himself somewhere he’d never been before, somewhere he didn’t recognise in his own mind.

Just barely he might have been able to pick it – the barley field he got lost in once on a school field trip. No one came looking for him, he’d been lost for hours. It was only when Stanley and the rest of the students were on the bus that his brother started looking for him, and by then the sun was blocked out by grey clouds, sepia tones barely lighting Ford’s abandonment and solitude.

It was a memory Ford had tried hard to repress.

The wind rustled the barley around him, dancing behind him.

He turned, and saw a towering structure, half constructed, seeming both pristine and decaying all at
It was the eye of the portal.

The voice blew into the hollow of the eye, whistling as it went through.

“He’s not what he seems.”

Ford jolted awake with a start, sitting up, gasping in the darkness of the bunker, his heart thudding adrenaline through his body senselessly.

He patted himself down, slowly realising he wasn’t still lost in the barley field, that he was in the bunker.

He looked down to Fiddleford, still sleeping curled up in the blankets, his back turned to Stanford.

Ford looked over to the clock on the wall, the digital readout telling him it was just past 3am.

Sighing, Ford put his hand on his chest, trying to bring his pulse rate down, chastising himself for even being startled in the first place. It was just a dream.

Probably his own insecurities running rampant through his subconscious. He told himself he’d barely remember the dream later anyway, and it hardly seemed consequential.

Laying back down on the cramped cot, Ford tried his best to shut his eyes and go back to sleep, not willing to be bested by an unnerving causeless nightmare.

He drifted off once more, his breathing even again, and tugged his trench coat around him like a blanket.

In the pocket of his trench coat, a blue ring glowed, unnoticed in the dark.

Ford was almost expecting to return to a pile of rubble, remembering how leaving Bill alone in the shack used to have hazardous results early on in the muse’s tenure on earth.

He was relieved to find that not only was the shack left in pristine condition, but improvements had been made to both the technology littered about the house, and to the lab downstairs.

“You worked on the portal!” Ford exclaimed, looking at the colossal eye dangling from the ceiling, hung there with scaffolding surrounding it, half completed.

Bill shrugged in response, but smothered a smile as Ford picked him up and spun him around in his arms, pressing kisses to his face.

“Sixer!”

“You –“ Ford squashed Bill’s cheek with the press of his lips, continuing to dot kisses all over Bill’s face. “Are so – helpful – and wonderful – and fantastic.”
Laughter bubbled out of Bill as the muse half-heartedly tried to push the scientist away, tickled by Sixer’s devout attention. He’d fake work more often if it got him this sort of response.

Fiddleford watched from the observation room in the lab, seeing his friend shower affection on his assistant and recognising it for the scapegoat that it was.

Though, how Ford was willing to believe Bill had done all that work on the construction when he hadn’t believed Fiddleford could have hung the generators from the roof by himself without help was a mystery to F. Still, he wasn’t looking a gift-horse in the mouth if it meant Ford wouldn’t be suspicious of his motives.

Feeling awkward standing there watching Ford press ticklish kisses on his assistant’s neck while Bill squealed with laughter, F cleared his throat, and pointed to the elevator.

“I’ll just go get our food out of the fridge for breakfast, shall I?"

“Oh, there’s no food in the fridge.” Bill replied, sounding somewhat out of breath.

“No food?” Fiddleford blinked, astounded.

“At all?” Ford questioned curiously, his arms still wrapped around his muse’s waist.

“Don’t give me that look. I got hungry.” Bill crossed his arms defensively.

“There was a full week’s worth of groceries in that fridge.” Ford revealed. “Not to mention all those meals I cooked you.”

“Gosh, and you’re so skinny.” Fiddleford looked at Bill’s svelte form in astonishment. “Your stomach must be a black hole.”

Ford blinked at Bill curiously, looking down at his stomach. Bill pulled a face, and flicked Ford on the nose, before side-stepping out of his grasp.

“It’s not my fault you didn’t leave enough for me. It’s a wonder I didn’t start eating paper.” Bill shot Ford a cool look over his shoulder, teasing the scientist. “Or PHDs.”

“Oh, I’m sure.” Ford raised his eyebrow at Bill, in on the joke.

“Well then what’re we gonna eat? I’m starvin’.” Fiddleford complained, having driven all the way back to the shack fantasising about the sumptuous meal Ford was set to cook.

“We’ll have to go downtown.” Ford paced over to the elevator, pressing the button to call it down. “If you’re really hungry, we can get something to eat at the diner, then pick up some groceries. I know we need more beans for Shifty. You’ll have to remind me which brand he likes.”

“You’re spoilin’ that thing Stanford.” F wagged his finger at Ford as the three men stepped into the elevator. “Just get him generic, he don’t need brand name.”

“Well, I’ve been told you can taste the difference.” Ford gave Bill an amused look and his muse rolled his eyes.

The elevator door closed, leaving the half-constructed portal alone in the lab behind them.
Over a table full of food, the ravenous trio of scientists were digging into their purchased meals, Stanford filling Bill in about his study of the shapeshifter down in the lab.

“Shifty is remarkable. In the past four days alone I’ve seen him assume multiple shapes. He can copy any photo you show him, right down to the DNA of the creature in the photo.” Ford gushed, waving a mozzarella stick around as he spoke. “And that’s not all, his initiative is incredible. He copied a pill bug he’d seen crawling in the dirt on the other side of the cave, he mimics every picture I show him, and he’s even taken to improvising, attempting to take on multiple forms at once. He even successfully mimicked the flame from our Bunsen burners, before the fire alarm detected flame that is. That’s one way to give him a bath.”

“Well, he’s got a ‘can do’ attitude, I’ll give him that.” Bill drawled, and stole a mozzarella stick from Sixer’s plate, dipping it into the tomato sauce, having already finished his meal.

“Oh, he’s got a lovely temperament.” Ford continued, swirling the mozzarella stick around in his bowl, swiping up the dregs of his potato and bacon soup with the snack. “He’s very expressive. He changes shapes to suit his mood I think. One second he’ll be a cheerful little puppy, the next a meek little mouse, depending on circumstance.”

“What about when he’s angry?” Bill asked curiously.

Ford looked at Fiddleford, and Fiddleford shuddered. “I’d rather not talk about that.”

“He was just attempting to experiment, to be expressive.” Ford defended Shifty.

“Turning into a little puffball of syringes isn’t expressive, it’s horrific.” Fiddleford retorted, biting into his chicken sandwich.

“We’d been taking DNA samples. I don’t think he likes the needle.” Ford explained.

“You know, I almost feel sorry for the thing, locked up in a lab with the two of you poking it all the time.” Bill rested his chin on his palm, watching Ford eat. “Experimenting on it.”

“Nonsense.” Ford said with a mouthful of deep fried cheese. “Shifty’s perfectly happy.”

“Uuhh.” Bill watched Ford dab his mouth with a napkin, and marvelled at how he could find this arrogant scientist attractive in any way. Yet here he was.

“He’s been treatin’ it like a pet.” Fiddleford told Bill, though it was already evident.

“I never had a pet growing up. We were never allowed.” Ford admitted. “We already caused enough of a mess in the house, Dad wouldn’t allow it.”

“So now, as an adult, you’re pickin’ your pets poorly, just because you never had one before.” Fiddleford surmised, crossing his arms. “See, it’d be fine if you picked something harmless, like a goat or a pig.”

“There’s no harm having a pet with moxy.” Bill watched Ford swipe his thumb around the rim of his soup bowl, popping his thumb in his mouth to suck the last of the soup away. “They’re more fun that way. Spunky.”
“You won’t think it’s so spunky when it does something dangerous.” Fiddleford warned Ford, wagging his finger at him.

A new wave of people entered the diner, the lunch crowd mostly, hanging their coats up and stepping into the warm rail-cart restaurant. With the group came young Ivan Wexler, who seemed to be looking for someone, his head twisting to peer into all the booths in the diner.

Spotting Fiddleford, he waved exuberantly at the scientist, and F noticed this and blanched, shrinking down in his seat.

Ivan began making his way across the restaurant to see F, heedless of the fact that it might be suspicious to join them when just the other week his ‘prank call’ had left Stanford more paranoid than ever. Ford would easily pick Ivan’s accent, Ivan couldn’t come here. Thinking on his feet, F slid out of his chair, putting his napkin down.

“I’m just goin’ to the bathroom quickly.” F told Ford.

Stanford barely looked up at Fiddleford, nodding while reaching for the napkins, still licking soup off his fingers. “Suit yourself.”

Fiddleford scrambled out of his chair and paced down along the diner, snagging Ivan by the front of his puffy hooded jacket, tugging him to follow him into the men’s bathrooms.

Bill turned around in his seat, his arm flung over the booth chair, and watched Fiddleford go, suspicious of McGucket’s sudden retreat. Frowning slightly, he watched F push a protesting Ivan into the men’s lavatory, shutting the door firmly behind them both.

Bill raised an eyebrow at that. Before he could open his mouth to draw Sixer’s attention to it, he found himself staring at Willow Oakwood, who seemed to be making her way down to see Stanford, her best friend Suzie by her side. Her vibrant red hair fell around her face, buffeted by the wind, and she seemed to be glowing with happiness.

Bouncing down to Ford’s booth, ignoring Bill’s suspicious stare, Willow planted herself into the booth where Fiddleford had just been sitting.

“Hi.” She said, as Ford blinked, looking up at her in surprise.

“Hiya Stanford.” Suzie chimed in with a smile, her arm looped around her friends, giggling brightly.

“Hullo.” Ford watched them both make themselves comfortable, and wiped his hands on his napkin. “You both seem cheerful.”

Bill was watching their cheery demeanour, squinting dubiously at both of them. He kept his arm draped over the back of Sixer’s chair, and refused to greet them himself, rudely eyeing them off like they were interlopers.

Fishing something out of her jacket pocket, Willow tossed an envelope across the table and it landed next to Stanford’s napkin.

“Hup.” Willow sat back comfortably in the booth once she’d thrown the envelope, ignoring Bill’s venomous glare. “That one’s for you.”

Picking the letter up curiously, Ford turned it over in his hands, before cutting the letter open with Bill’s clean butterknife. Pulling out the card inside, Ford adjusted his glasses and read.
“Save the date. You are cordially invited to Willow Oakwood and Daniel Corduroy’s Wedding Ceremony at Gravity Falls Redwood – oh! You’re getting married, are you?” Ford wondered, looking up from the letter.

“That’s what it says on the card, doesn’t it?” Willow smirked at Stanford, clearly elated.

“They’re getting married!” Suzie cooed, bursting with enthusiasm. “Isn’t that exciting!”

“Well, congratulations.” Ford nodded, smiling at Willow. “In the forest no less, I’m sure that’ll be a lovely ceremony.”

“It’s in April, so make sure you’re not doing anything. It was hard enough to pin you down just to hand this thing over.” Willow joked. “Man of mystery, you are. You’re never around.”

“I have been, uh, busy of late.” Ford said cryptically, looking down at the green and silver lettering curling across the page of the invite.

Bill snatched the envelope from Ford’s hand and peered at the letter, his arm coming down from the back of the chair to rest on Ford’s shoulder.

“All this fuss just to sign a legal document.” Bill scoffed. “If you wanted to bind yourself to someone for all eternity, a ball and chain is far more effective.”

“Someone’s a cynic.” Willow curled her lip, unimpressed but not surprised by Bill’s caustic response. “If you’re going to be bitter about it, then you don’t have to come.”

“I thought this was for Sixer.” Bill gestured with the envelope towards Ford.

“Plus ones are invited.” Willow crossed her arms over her belly and raised her eyebrow at Bill. “Regrettably. I’ll assume you’re going to be Stanford’s plus one.”

“If not, I haven’t found someone to go with yet.” Suzie piped up, smiling congenially. “We could go together.”

Bill’s hand came down more obviously on Stanford’s shoulder, and he leaned across the table, hissing possessively. “He’s coming with me.”

“Alright calm down.” Ford said placatingly, taking the invitation back, putting the envelope into his trench coat pocket. “We’d love to come Willow. Thank you for the invite.”

“You’re welcome.” Willow said simply, sitting back in the chair.

Bill gave Willow a discerning look and raised his eyebrow at her. She stuck her jaw out stubbornly and refused to look at him.

Suzie absently began stacking the finished dishes on the table out of habit, despite not working today. Bill noticed this, and patted Ford on the shoulder.

“Do you have room for dessert?”

“I’m sure you do.” Ford gave Bill a look, noticing how the muse still had his arm draped over his shoulder, vaguely amused at Bill’s possessive overtures.

“Can you go get us two sundaes?” Bill asked Suzie, startling her.

“It’s her day off, asshole.” Willow rebuked Bill.
“Oh, I don’t mind.” Suzie laughed, waving her hand, before she got up and collected the empty plates, bustling them to the counter.

Willow sat there scowling at Bill, and Ford was about to turn around to chide the muse as well, when Bill unwound his hand from Sixer’s shoulder.

“Specs has been in the bathroom for a while. He looked kind of pale and twitchy before. Maybe you should go check to see if he’s alright.” Bill urged Ford smoothly, shooing him out of the booth.

“Well, that’s—” Ford seemed to realize that F had been gone a substantial amount of time, remembering the last time Fiddleford had been so pale and twitchy, when he was plagued by hallucinations and nightmares. Ford inclined his head, agreeing with Bill’s assessment, before sliding out of the booth to go find his colleague.

Bill watched him go, with a satisfied expression, keen to see the fallout of Sixer catching his old college buddy with the carny, hoping it would rile his suspicions just right.

Willow sat stubbornly in the opposite booth, glaring at Bill. “You’ve just got him dancing on your strings, don’t you?”

“I have a talent for puppetry, what can I say?” Bill shrugged, and turned to sit facing her.

“You’ve got me alone now. I’m guessing that’s why you shooed Stanford away. Whatever horrible thing you’re gonna say, just say it.” Willow insisted gruffly.

“Why think so poorly of me?” Bill put his hand on his chest, feigning insult. “To think, we were almost friends at the freak show.”

“Yeah, I’ll buy that when I buy that Stanford knows what you really are.” Willow jerked her chin at Bill, scowling. “You’re not telling him everything.”

“What makes you so sure?” Bill eyed Willow shrewdly, lacing his fingers together and resting his chin on them.

“Because I went home and thought over that whole sob story you gave me, about Stanford trapping you here, and from what I know about Stanford I highly doubt that’s the case.”

“You know nothing about Stanford.” Bill corrected her curtly.

“I know enough, and I know enough about you.” Willow said, narrowing her eyes. “And I get the feeling that if you didn’t want to be here, you wouldn’t be here. Something else is going on.”

“Are you playing armchair detective to distract yourself from your own problems, or is this a habit you picked up after Punchy popped the question?” Bill asked slyly.

“This has nothing to do with Dan.” Willow said defensively.

“Mmhmm.” Bill nodded, disbelieving, before he leaned forward and grinned. “How’s that shotgun feel against your back? Comfortable?”

“There is no shotgun.” Willow said through gritted teeth. “I’m marrying Dan because I love him.”

“You keep telling yourself that.” Bill leaned back in his chair, watching her with disdain. “The fact that nearly half the town has been whispering about little sourdough didn’t factor into the equation at all?”
“What?” Willow asked, all the colour draining from her face.

“People think I don’t listen. I hear everything.” Bill said, sounding smug. “Last time I was here, there was a little gossip party about your brioche bun. I distinctly heard the phrase ‘a woman knows’. Do you think Dan knows?”

He spun a half lie, a misleading truth, conveniently leaving out the fact that all mention of pregnancy came after the initial gossip nugget about the proposal.

“I – he proposed before he knew. I mean, he still doesn’t know, but –” Willow blustered, seeming shocked. Realising slowly that Bill had turned the conversation around on her, she pointed across the table at him. “But that’s not important! I’m onto you.”

“Why haven’t you told him Red? Afraid he isn’t ‘man’ enough to stick by you and the little hot cross bun?” Bill probed indulgently, content to keep pressing Willow’s weak spot rather than acknowledge she had anything on him.

“He’s a better man than – ugh. I should have known better than to talk to you.” Willow scowled, frustrated, and scooted along the booth chair, extricating herself. “You play tricks, you’re manipulative. I bet all that crap about your best friend was a lie too. You’re just manipulating me into doing what you want.”

“If that were working, you’d be gone by now.” Bill said, sounding bored. “But here you are. Why bother inviting Sixer specifically to your little matrimony, if you can’t stand talking to me? You’re the one who assumed we’d be coming together.”

“I invited Stanford because he’s my friend.” Willow said, getting out of the booth, standing at the edge of the table. “And you’re his consequence apparently. I don’t think you’re his muse.”

“It’s not about what you think.” Bill shot back at her sharply. “And I’ll thank you not to patronise Sixer with your so called ‘friendship’, he doesn’t need it. You don’t know him, don’t understand him, and your constant attempts to pretend that you do are shallower than your personality. He’s just humouring you, he doesn’t care about you. To him you’re nothing but an acquaintance, and a forgettable one at that.”

Suzie returned to the table bearing the two sundaes on a tray.

“Here’s your sundaes.” She said cheerily.

Willow snagged Suzie by the elbow, fury concealing the hurt in her expression, and she marched them both away. “C’mon Suzie, we’re going.”

Bill pulled the two sundaes over towards him and couldn’t resist yelling one last jibe out to Willow as she retreated.

“And don’t think just because you invited me to your party that you’re invited to mine!”

Willow didn’t stick around to be drawn into another back and forth with the yellow eyed man. The bell above the door rang as she stormed out.

Shrugging, Bill grabbed a spoon and began devouring both sundaes, not bothering to wait for Sixer to come back.
Fiddleford dragged the tattooed man into the cramped bathroom stall, and shut the door behind them.

“What -?” Ivan spluttered out.

“What on earth did you think you were doin’, approachin’ me in front of Stanford?” Fiddleford chastised Ivan in a hushed voice. “I told you this needs to stay a secret. At least from him.”

“I’m sorry, I thought he wouldn’t notice.” Ivan shrugged his shoulders. “That he’d just assume you were catching up with a friend.”

“The moment you open your mouth, he’d be askin’ me why I’m friends with the person who called us up, spouting cryptic messages at 1am in the morning, and he’d be more paranoid than ever.” Fiddleford scowled. “Helpin’ you was supposed to be simple, but by golly you’re makin’ it hard.”

“I’m sorry.” Ivan apologised. “I just really needed to see you.”

“Why?” Fiddleford asked sharply, before concern flitted across his face. “What’s wrong? Has something gone wrong?”

“Nothing’s gone wrong.” Ivan said quickly, holding his hands up. “It’s more like everything’s gone right. I’ve been sleeping the best I have in years, my hands don’t shake anymore. It’s like I’m not afraid of anything.”

“Is that what you came here to tell me?” Fiddleford asked, confused.

“No, no.” Ivan shook his head, before he looked at Fiddleford, impassioned. “I came here to convince you. We could be doing so much more!”

“No. That was a one time thing. We can’t just – “ Fiddleford fretted, thinking back to Stanford waiting for him out in the diner. “I can’t just go wipin’ memories left and right. I - I’ve done enough of it. It’s not ethical.”

“There are more people who need your help. I’ve found them. We could be helping them.” Ivan persisted.

“No.” Fiddleford said more firmly. “We can’t be using this technology like that, I – Stanford’s getting suspicious, and this could blow away all the trust that’s left between us. I appreciate what you’re doing Ivan, but you can’t just go around tellin’ people about this – this was only meant to be for emergencies - I – “

“But I’ve already promised them a solution.” Ivan said stubbornly. “I told them you could help them too.”

“Ivan! Now, why would you go and do that?” Fiddleford huffed, exasperated.

“I know you want to help them.” Ivan insisted. “Just like you helped me.”

“Helpin’ you was different. I didn’t – “

“You are a good person Mr McGucket.” Ivan said stubbornly. “That’s why you do this. You help erase trauma, and I’ve found traumatised people! You can’t just leave them to suffer.”
“I’m not –” F’s expression was acutely conflicted, reflected back at him in the cracked bathroom mirror, and he wrestled with his conscience and his loyalty to Stanford’s firm ethical principles, trying to recognise in that mirror someone who he could live with at the end of the day.

He’d crossed that line once, turning the memory gun on Stanford, and he felt his transgressions weighing on his soul, every time he pulled the trigger. When he used the gun on the construction workers, F justified it as being for the portal, and the workers were paid well for their trouble, but the justifications could hardly stretch far enough when F had to sit across from Ford every day in the lab and know how much of a violation that gun was to him. He just couldn’t do it.

Fiddleford struggled for a while longer, looking anywhere but at Ivan’s zealously impassioned face, when a knock sounded out on the bathroom door.

“F, are you alright in there?”

Fiddleford jumped, hearing Stanford’s voice through the door, and frantically held his finger up to his lips, shooshing Ivan and pushing him behind the bathroom door.

“F?” Ford repeated, hearing muffled shuffling from within the bathroom.

“I’ll be out in a second!” Fiddleford called out, before lowering his voice to whisper to Ivan.

“We’ll talk about this later, alright. He can’t know.”

“I know.” Ivan replied quietly, nodding.

Ford frowned outside of the door, hearing whispering, what sounded like two voices, though he could barely make out what they were saying. He put his ear to the door, and listened in as best he could.

“Don’t approach me in front of Stanford next time. And make sure you wait a couple of minutes before you follow me out. He can’t know I’ve been talkin’ to you.”

“He won’t know. I promise.” Ivan nodded solemnly, excited by the intrigue and secrecy. He flipped the hood of his jacket up, and tugged it over his forehead to shield his easily recognisable tattoos. “I will be unseen.”

Fiddleford gave Ivan a peculiar look, before he put his hand on the doorknob, opening the door a crack.

He wedged himself out of the door, shielding the bathroom with his body, and shut the door quickly behind him, waving his hand in front of his nose, smiling weakly at Stanford as he made his excuse.

“Phew. All that time eatin’ vacuum sealed food sure ain’t good for you.”

Ford almost chuckled, relieved to see that F was alright, and not in the throes of some garish hallucination, but his laughter caught in his throat as his eyes caught for the scantest second a sliver of someone else in the reflection in the bathroom mirror. Someone wearing a hood, with deep set eyes, hiding behind the door.

Ford stared, as F closed the door shut, barely believing what he had seen. It didn’t make sense, Ford almost felt paranoid, like he was the one seeing things, and not Fiddleford as he suspected. He frowned at the door in consternation.
Fiddleford noticed Ford’s perturbed expression, and tried his best to hide the anxiety he felt.

“You alright there, Stanford?”

Ford blinked, shaking off his unease, before he managed a brief smile for F.

“Fine.” He croaked.

Fiddleford walked back over to their booth, stopping to see Ford still staring at the bathroom door with that disturbed expression. Fiddleford waved at Ford, urging him to get a move on.

“Are we fixin’ to move? We’ve still got them groceries to get.”

“Right.” Ford nodded slowly, drawn away from the door. “Yes, let’s.”

Ford followed F to the table to collect his muse and pay the bill, but he couldn’t help the echoes of his dream that drifted in the back of his mind, distilling unease in his soul.

He’s not what he seems.

Back in the bunker, Fiddleford’s knee was bouncing away as he did his best to ignore the chirping from within the steel cage.

He was checking the readings from the cryo-tubes, making sure they were statistically up to par for their first test run. That would be if Stanford would ever give up his obsession with the unusual creature to commit it to the purpose these tubes were designed for. Fiddleford doubted Ford’s follow through.

Instead Stanford was sitting on a chair beside Shifty’s cage, writing in his journal, fabric face mask on for posterity.

Over the soft sound of the cryo-tubes beeping, and the thwacking of keys as Fiddleford inputted data, there was the scratch of Ford’s pen jotting notes down, and intermittently between that, Shifty spoke.

“Who am I?”

The shapeshifter twisted his shape, becoming a pigeon, before cooing and shifting again. The shifter was now a rather large hamster.

“Who am I?”

“Who am I?”

“Yes, that’s very good Shifty.” Stanford praised the creature without looking up from his journals, finding Shifty’s game of ‘who am I’ entertaining at first, but now mostly a distraction from his journaling.

Fiddleford found he liked the creature much better when it didn’t speak. Shifty’s talent for mimicry extended even to vocalisations, but what was truly unsettling to Fiddleford was that the creature didn’t content itself with merely parroting words back at you.
Shifty was thinking for himself, constructing his own sentences. He was clearly highly sentient, and most likely intelligent enough to be a little devious as well.

To think, this had all started with the word ‘beans’.

Ever since that day, Stanford had spent days encouraging Shifty’s vocabulary, studying the way the creature could learn to mimic language, finding it fascinating.

Fiddleford didn’t find it fascinating, he found it unnerving.

“Who am I?”

Stanford paused from his journaling to pass the cup of juice he’d been drinking between the bars of Shifty’s cage, giving him something to do.

“Here, have some orange juice.”

The creature swiped up the cup with a claw, falling upon the beverage ravenously, draining the cup dry, before banging it against the bars.

After Shifty first broke one of the ceramic mugs Fiddleford kept in the lab, he decided that switching to metal camping cups would be safer. Ford was absent minded enough that he probably wouldn’t notice passing Shifty a ceramic mug instead of one less breakable, so Fiddleford took matters into his own hands.

Shifty clanged the metal mug against the bars, rattling the cup along it back and forth, playing the bars of his cage like some kind of instrument. An instrument of defiance, if Fiddleford’s guess was right.

“Stanford.” Fiddleford said, looking up from the computers.

“He’s just bored.” Ford replied, barely looking up from his journal. “Let him have his fun.”

“His fun is very loud and distracting.” Fiddleford complained, already nursing a headache from the metal clanging. “Can he have fun a little quieter, maybe?”

“If you like, you can finish your work in the other room, if it’s bothering you.” Ford suggested, looking up from his journal finally. “I can sit with him for a while, I don’t mind.”

Gathering his laptop and cables, mumbling under his breath, Fiddleford stormed out of the storage lab, eager to get away from the creature.

“See how long it takes for you to get tired of his clanging too.”

Shifty threw his metal cup at Fiddleford as he walked away, flinging it out from between the bars, and it knocked against F’s foot. Fiddleford shot the shifter a scowl, and departed through the decontamination doors.

The doors shut behind F, and now it was just Stanford and Shifty in the storage room.

Stanford turned the page and began a new one, writing his observations down in his journal, sketching a few new forms Shifty had taken, content to continue his work.

Shifty shuffled around in the cage for a while, undecided about what shape he should assume, before he settled on shifting into a cat, the one with the round eyes and fluffy face that Stanford had shown him. The one that made the scientists coo fondly.
Pressing his paws against the bars, Shifty strained to reach Stanford, paw swiping through the air ineffectually. Still, it was enough to draw Ford’s attention.

“Can I see?”

Ford blinked, and looked over to Shifty, who was staring up at him with the wide black eyes of a very invested kitten.

“See?” Ford queried, before catching the way Shifty’s eyes slid down to his journal. “My journal?”

“Can I see?” Shifty repeated.

Ford considered it for a moment, looking down at the page he was writing on, before he drew the journal close to his chest protectively.

“I don’t think you should.” Ford replied, watching Shifty almost warily.

“I want to see.” Shifty cooed, in that high pitched tone of his.

“This journal isn’t for you Shifty. There are forms in here that you shouldn’t be taking.” Ford explained, trying to keep his tone kind, and sympathetic.

“Why?” Shifty asked, its wide cat eyes staring unerringly at the book, more intrigued than ever now.

“Because they’re dangerous. My research is very dangerous.” Ford said kindly. “And you shouldn’t concern yourself with it.”

Hardly deterred by this knowledge, Shifty tried swiping through the bars again, staring intently at the book.

“I want to see.” Shifty repeated.

Stanford frowned, and closed the book, tucking it into the pocket inside his trench coat. Picking himself up, he put his chair back by the wall, and began walking toward the exit, unimpressed with this new fixation Shifty seemed to be developing.

“I want to see.” Shifty insisted, his voice much deeper now, and almost sinister.

Stanford turned around to see Shifty standing, his translucent grub form much larger than he remembered, four spindly legs and two clawed arms sprouting from his corpulent mass, red eyes large, pincers sharp. Shifty clacked his mandibles together and seemed to snarl from within his cage, before repeating.

“I want to see.”

Stanford left the storage room swiftly, without a backwards glance, leaving Shifty alone and taking his journals with him.
Diving headfirst into the Mindscape and dragging Keyhole with him, Bill teleported just outside of Keyhole’s cousin’s office, on the outer ring of one of the satellite cities in Artisanal Logos, the business district of the galaxy.

After the economic boom on Central Logos, the businesses that were housed on the super-earth sized planet migrated to one of the various high-tech satellite societies that continually looped around Logos’ gravitational field.

The satellites orbited in rings around the planet, and the outer rings were in vogue now for the high society ballers who wanted a room with a view. The galactic skyscape of endless stars was much more pleasing than the blackened ruined carcass of a planet that once was Central Logos.

Keyhole’s cousin’s office was right on the outer ring, in a high-rise building that was neatly and tastefully furnished, solar-active north facing glass windows lighting the hallways with fluctuating colours from the borealis.

Housing in the suburban district of the outer ring could go for bleventy million plus QUID on a good day, so one could only imagine how much renting office space on Artisanal Logos would cost. It seemed Keyhole’s cousin was ‘in the money’ for someone who’s field wasn’t economics.

Keyhole looked both ways, and patted himself down to check he was in one piece. Bill’s teleportation wasn’t the most comfortable method of travel, it was rather abrupt by all means. The triangle hovered beside his henchmaniac, waiting for him to settle down.

Satisfied that he wasn’t missing any molecules, Keyhole gave Bill a double thumbs up.

“Alright Keyhole. Just like we practised.” Bill put his hand on Keyhole’s shoulder, turning the henchmaniac around to face on the door they teleported in front of.

The door was a marble affair, with the placard ‘M LOOPHOLE, ESQ, JSD’ engraved upon it in serif font.

Keyhole raised his hand to knock, and then hesitated.

“It’s locked.” He said.

“Well, then it's your time to shine.” Bill encouraged the henchmaniac.

Putting his hand over the lock, Keyhole stuck his tongue out, concentrating, before the door unlocked graciously. Keyhole grinned at Bill, and shook his hand out.

Knocking once, Keyhole pulled the door open, sticking his large head through.

“Knock, knock.”

Loophole looked up from the various legal files scattered about his desk, his bristly moustache twitching under his large and ineffable nose. His face wasn’t so much of a face as a set of eyes, eyebrows and a nose floating suspended within the structure of a blue loophole, set upon a portly hovering sphere that formed Loophole’s body, adorned in the finest of high end fashion, an expensive bespoke suit.

Wrinkling his nose, Loophole raised an eyebrow at Keyhole. “Cousin. Seeing yourself in as usual. That door was locked. I wasn’t expecting you to visit.”

“Oh, you know.” Keyhole sidestepped into the office, shielding Bill’s glowing form with his back.
“Just … thought I’d pop in to say hi.”

“Yes, well I’m a bit busy for social calls, so if you don’t mind.” Loophole shuffled his papers and looked back to them, plainly dismissing Keyhole with barely a glance.

Sliding out from behind Keyhole just as the henchmaniac shut the heavy marble door, Bill grew his form until he was the same size as Keyhole, standing nice and prominent, resting his hands on his cane.

“Don’t mind if I do.” Bill said cheerily, watching the lawyer expectantly.

Loophole’s reaction didn’t disappoint. The lawyer’s moustache bristled like a porcupine as he double took, spluttering and harrumphing thunderously.

“Wha- you – this is an outrage I say, an outrage! Get out of my office right this instant! Right this instant I say!”

“I say! Hip pip!” Bill said mockingly, swinging his arms around comically. Keyhole grinned at Bill and snickered, covering his mouth. “Jolly good show old chap! I say!”

“You come all this way to mock me?” Loophole blustered. “As if you don’t make a mockery of me enough already. A mockery of my craft? Of our esteemed family name, pulling my cousin into your tomfoolery.”

“Keyhole loves a bit of tomfoolery, isn’t that right Keyhole?” Bill retorted, looking over to Keyhole, who grinned sheepishly.

“Sure do Boss.”

“You –“ Loophole harrumphed and pointed at Bill accusingly. “Are a corrupting presence – a bad influence through and through. Keyhole had a promising future ahead of him before he got thrown in with your lot.”

“Thrown in.” Bill tapped his bricks contemplatively. “Let’s see, that’s not how I remember it happening. If I’m right, which I generally am, it was more like poor Keyhole here got thrown out by a family that cares more about their image than their nearest and dearest.”

Bill floated around Loophole’s lavish office, angling towards Loophole, nudging him with his elbow.

“But hey, that can’t be good for the family rep. Bad press. Am I right?”

Loophole shrunk away from Bill, while the triangle called out across the room to Keyhole, who was still standing by the door.

“How’s that extended vacation treating you, Keyhole? Or was it a religious sabbatical? A seclusion to study? A long absentee bout of charity work?”

“Ya know, I really like the soul-searching road trip excuse.” Keyhole quipped, and walked over to sit on one of the plush couches in Loophole’s office, making himself comfortable. “I can see myself going on one of those.”

“See, I’m not a bad influence.” Bill looped his arm around Loophole, who was trying to edge away from him, pulling him in close. “It’s all that soul-searching Keyhole’s been doing. Real corrupting, that introspection. Not that you’d know. How’s life in the high rise treating you?”
Shaking Bill’s hand off his shoulder, Loophole floated away from Bill, backing up into his bookcase, knocking several ornaments off the shelf.

“You – I want you to leave now, you miscreant, before I call the police.”

“You’d call the police on your own cousin? What happens when he gets arrested? What does that do for the family’s glowing reputation?” Bill loomed over Loophole, his voice ringing out in the cheerful manner he was known for that signalled imminent danger. “Or for your reputation, Mr Esquire. Associating with a known criminal. You’d better brush up on your defence law, but last I checked, that’s not your area of expertise, is it?”

Moustache flaring out like a puffball, Loophole quivered, glaring up at Bill’s imposing yellow form, before he stuck his nose out stubbornly.

“What do you want?”

Bill drummed his fingers on his cane, before he answered.

“To book an appointment.”

“To book a –“ Loophole squinted at Bill for a moment, rife with disbelief, before slumping back against the wall, staring at the triangle.

Bill twiddled with his cane for several more seconds, before clarifying. “For right now, if you could.”

Deciding to give Loophole a little breathing room to reorient himself, Bill floated around the office, waving his arms as he spoke.

“I know normally you have to book through your secretary, but there’s a two year waiting list. So I figured my choices were either to bump off your next appointment or meet you alone like this – waiting two years just isn’t an option, this is a time sensitive matter.”

Loophole staggered away from the wall and floated towards his desk, reaching to pull his chair out. He sank into his chair and massaged the outer rings of his loops, like he was nursing a headache.

“And you have a reputation for ensuring discretion, despite your exorbitant prices, along with being the best contracts lawyer in the business, so it stands to reason that I deserve the best. The legal system hasn’t always done right by me before, but money talks, and what lawyer doesn’t want a solid gold desk, am I right? So what do you say?”

Bill sat down in the chair beside Keyhole, where clients sit, facing Loophole’s desk, and he crossed his legs, letting his hands rest laced over his knee. He watched Loophole expectantly, his single eye wide, boring into the lawyer unblinkingly.

“You’re asking me… to…?” Loophole squinted at Bill, trying to discern where he was going with this.

Bill blinked at the lawyer, and answered simply. “To find me a loophole.”

“You want to get out of a deal?” Loophole questioned, raising his eyebrows incredulously. “You?”

“Well, not a deal per se-“ Bill started, but was interrupted by Loophole’s barking laughter.

“You – Bill Cipher – the scourge of deal-breakers throughout all dimensions, so infamously vitriolic towards any attempt at circumvention, the slow and steady revenge – that we include a special clause in our interdimensional legislation that precludes me from clients who’ve made a deal with you. You, Bill Cipher, need my help to break a deal? You –“ Loophole chortled pompously, leaning back in his chair laughing.

“How long is he going to -?” Bill looked over at Keyhole, muttering under his breath.

“Just let him tire himself out.” Keyhole advised, while Loophole spluttered and guffawed.

“You – Bill Cipher – do you know how much business I’ve lost because of you? Clients who’ve gone back on their payments, gone back on their appointments, their bookings, all through fear of retribution. How many QUID you’ve cost me, on a grand scale, you specifically?”

Bill watched Loophole with a flat expression, unimpressed with his bluster.

“I imagine I’ve been an unsightly hole in your deep pockets.”

“Most unsightly!” Loophole nodded, and turned his big nose in Keyhole’s direction. “Not only have you taken from our family, but you’ve been a constant drain on my business. Oh, certainly, this business runs on wheeler dealers like yourself, tricksters and chaos gods conjure up the majority of demand for the legal expertise practitioners like myself supply. You, however, are worse than a simple trickster. You couldn’t content yourself with a bit of harmless, fun, oh no.”

Bill rolled his eye while Loophole continued to chastise him.

“You had to have an agenda. The only thing worse than a chaos god or trickster is one with an agenda. Chaos for the sake of chaos is fickle, amiable, profitable, but chaos with focus is an unerring force of nature! An unstoppable act of destruction and desolation. A refund in the making!”

“You still get billable hours, don’t you?” Bill narrowed his eye at the lawyer dangerously.

“It hardly takes ten minutes to find out if a client’s done business with you and promptly escort them from the building. Tell me, how am I supposed to make a living like that? On ten minutes a session.”

“You seem to be doing alright, living it up in Artisanal Logos.” Bill eyed up the office space, noting the expensive furnishings and top dollar view from the wide solar-active windows.

“That’s beside the point. The point is –“

“The point is –“ Bill said loudly, speaking over Loophole. “That you’re the best in the business either way, and if you help me, then you get to name your price.”

“You want to make a deal with me?” Loophole scoffed, raising his bushy eyebrows.

“That’s the business.” Bill said flatly. “You know this. You know what the currency is.”

“Ones wildest dreams, if your reputation is correct.” Loophole shifted in his seat, leaning forward covetously.

“It is.”

Loophole considered this, obviously intrigued, but then paused, brows furrowing.

“And what of the catch.”
“No catch. A simple exchange for goods and services.” Bill said smoothly.

“I wouldn’t receive so many applicants coming to me, begging for a way out of their deals with you if they didn’t come with a catch.” Loophole tented his fingers, pointing at Bill.

“It sounds like you deal with some unscrupulous people, there’s no catch if you follow through on your end of the deal.” Bill leaned back, drumming his fingers on the arm of the chair. “It’s that simple.”

“And what is my end of the deal?” Loophole queried intently.

“You find me the loophole I need to get out of this.” Bill waved his hand, bringing a holographic image of the vessel Sixer made for him up to rotate slowly in the air.

Loophole leaned across the table, and spun the hologram around, interfacing with the image naturally, zooming in on the details of the runes, studying them.

While his cousin poured over the vessel, Keyhole eyed up the image of the floating body curiously, having never seen it before.

“What’s that Boss?” Keyhole asked.

“A secret, Keyhole. You know what that is, don’t you?” Bill said dryly, shooting his henchmaniac a look.

“Yes sir!” Keyhole saluted cheerfully, and sat back in his seat.

Loyalty was never an issue with Keyhole, unlike Kryptos, Keyhole was part of Bill’s gang because he wanted to be. The laid back henchmaniac was always keen to go along with whatever Bill suggested, and could keep secrets where it counted.

“Fascinating.” Loophole marvelled, turning the hologram this way and that. “If I’m reading these runes correctly, this is an artificially created binding vessel. Why, it’s almost built like a prison, dampening runes and protective runes and restrictive runes all laced together in a marvellous mesh. I haven’t seen work this fine outside of the maximum-security facilities in the Infinetentiary, despite the somewhat dated sigils. Where did you find this?”

“Where I found it doesn’t matter. What matters is how to get out of it.” Bill said sternly, trying to keep the lawyer focused.

“Well, so far as I can tell these bricks seem to come into play and –“ Loophole looked up with a gasp, looking far too delighted. “Bricks. This is for you.”

“No it isn’t.” Bill lied sharply, not liking the enthusiasm in the lawyer’s tone.

“Yes it is, every part of this structure was designed with you in mind, this is – this is a masterpiece of controlled design, this is – whoever made this vessel certainly enjoys putting you at a loss, I’ll say that for them.” Loophole’s moustache twitched happily. “This is a lovingly crafted ode to your imprisonment, a marvellously restrictive flesh cage. It’s flattering, but pragmatic in every sense. The detail is astonishingly nuanced. I’d love to meet the designer someday and congratulate them on their work, this is a living breathing contract, right here.”

Bill sighed heavily, crossing his arms. He came here for a solution, and here was Loophole, stroking Sixer’s ego from afar. It grated against Bill’s sensibilities, partly because he knew how bloated Sixer’s esteem would get from all this praise.
It was grating to note also, that the professional opinion on the vessel was that Sixer knew exactly what he was doing when he crafted it, sleep deprived genius that he was.

Sure, he decked it out fancy, flattering Bill with the colours and the gold, and the intricate beauty, but it really was a gilded cage, restricting the very essence of all Bill’s unhindered glory.

It was a very pretty insult from Sixer, and it certainly captured Bill’s attention, among other things.

“Who did -?” Keyhole asked curiously, before realising the answer, his eyes widening. “Oh.”

Sitting back in his chair, keeping his mouth shut, Keyhole knew better than to bring up the Boss’s hot button issue. Hectorgon was still trapped in the dimension of eternal screams, and he didn’t want to pull a Kryptos and antagonise the Boss. That was tempting fate, for sure.

Keyhole had been working the apparatus for Bill whenever he needed it, storing the obvious worship the Six-Fingered human made for Bill in neat little cubes, but he wasn’t aware that that worship came alongside a devious opportunistic mind, one that may have bested Bill even.

It seemed old Six Fingers presented himself as both a gift and a challenge to Bill, and it was no wonder the Boss was so obsessed with the human.

Keyhole twiddled his fingers together and kept his opinions to himself, but privately he believed that they made sort of a cute couple. Manipulative geniuses, both of them.

“See, the trouble is, it may read like a contract, but it isn’t a contract.” Bill said, gesturing to the hologram. “I never shook on it. A contract requires agreement, consideration, capacity, intention, and certainty, and I didn’t get a chance to do any of those. He just dialled me up and yanked me in.”

“Ah, but the agreement was implicit in answering the call. The precedent had been set. He called, and you answered.” Loophole explained. “Being called to embody a form, and being called for a simple chat does blur the line of intention somewhat, and consideration for what is exchanged seemed absent as well, but the capacity, and certainty are evident.”

“But a contract isn’t legitimate, legally, without all five elements met. It’s not enforceable.” Bill argued.

“If you’re here, seeking help from me, then I’d argue that it’s already been enforced.” Loophole said rather smugly.

“So tell me how to get out of it.” Bill scowled impatiently.

“Oh no. You see, there’s still the matter of my price.” Loophole held his hand out, and stroked his moustache, his eyes twinkling. “You can’t expect me to just hand you the information for free now? Not when you’re already such a detriment to my business. There is still the matter of payment.”

Bill exhaled frustration, and sunk back into his armchair, exasperated. “Fine, what’s it gonna cost me?”

“Hrmmm.” Loophole stroked his moustache for a while longer, deliberating. “There is something you could give me, that would be a definite boon in my industry, an unprecedented gift.”

“What?” Bill asked irritably.
“I want a loophole from you.” Loophole announced, gesturing at Bill as he spoke. “I want a physical representation of a cosmic ‘get-out-of-deal-free’ card. I want one foolproof deal-breaking loophole, to distribute as I see fit, for a price I deem adequate. You wouldn’t believe how much some people would pay for a foolproof way to get out of a deal with the infamous Bill Cipher.”

“You want to make a deal to break a deal, is that what I’m hearing?” Bill asked incredulously. “You want me to facilitate some deal breaker getting out of their obligations scot free, by giving you some indiscriminate loophole to use against me as you see fit, is that what you’re saying?”

“I want a cosmic loophole, from you, a single use loophole, that will break a deal, any deal, automatically, without repercussions. One loophole.”

“Ugh.” Bill massaged the side of his bricks, nursing a headache already at the very thought. Facilitating deal breakers, providing the undoing for one of his own deals, without knowing exactly what deal he would be undoing, relinquishing control over one of his deals like this – everything about the concept was just awful. “One loophole, and in exchange you’ll tell me the loophole I need to get out of that body?”

“That’s my price.” Loophole sat back in his chair, satisfied with his decision. “And no last minute catches on my behalf. I want total immunity.”

“How much are you selling this loophole for? Will I be getting a cut?” Bill asked opportunistically.

“I get to keep the proceeds. That falls under immunity.” Loophole stated pompously.

“Does it now?” Bill narrowed his eyes, unimpressed with the wily lawyer.

Loophole nodded once more, and extended his hand towards Bill, sealing the deal with finality.

“That is my price. Do we have a deal?”

Bill hesitated, disliking the thought of giving anyone a loophole to escape him, to escape a deal, to enable a deal breaker, but unfortunately he was on a time limit, and he couldn’t be stuck in this body when the party rolled into town. That would make him a total laughing stock.

“Fine.” Bill extended his arm long and grasped Loophole’s hand, blue flames embracing them both. “But you better make a hell of a lot of money from that loophole, Loophole. I’m handing you a goldmine.”

“I know it’s value.” Loophole chortled, and felt the cool flames cement their deal, before he released Bill’s hand and sat back comfortably in his high-backed chair.

Sighing, Bill materialised a small glowing blue loophole between his hands, infused with the power to unscrupulously release someone from their deal with him. He let the loophole float across the table to the lawyer, and Loophole plucked the loophole out of the air, putting it neatly in his desk drawer and locking it.

“A pleasure doing business with you.” Loophole said smugly.

“How do I ditch the body?” Bill asked, impatient to be gone, rather than expose himself to the lawyer’s gloating expression one second longer.

“The bricks are the key.” Loophole explained. “Once the last brick is unbound willingly, you may discard your earthly tether and unleash yourself upon those around you in whatever form you deem fit. Unbind the last brick, and all your powers are restored to you. The protective runes may still linger, so your revenge against the caster may have to wait until the body has decomposed, but you will not be bound to it when that last brick is undone. You will be able to jump from the body, and physically manifest yourself without it’s aid, in theory. That is your loophole."

“I’ve been heading in that direction anyway, but it’s good to know.” Bill rolled his shoulders, and floated out of the cushy chair.

“How will you coerce the caster to remove the bindings?” Loophole asked, stroking his moustache. “Surely given the individual went to such lengths to keep you hindered so spectacularly he won’t simply oblige you. It won’t be easy, to change the mind of your jailer.”

“You’re talking to a master of the mind, kid.” Bill floated over to the door and extended his hand out to Keyhole, readying to teleport away. “Everything’s easy for me. Keyhole, are you coming?”

Keyhole got out of his chair and walked over to Loophole, holding his arms out for a hug from his cousin. “Until next time, cuz?”

Loophole made no move to reciprocate Keyhole’s familial affection, his moustache twitching snootily. “I shall be informing your mother about the company you keep, Keyhole.”

Keyhole’s shoulders slumped, the smile sliding off his face, replaced by a morose disappointment. He turned and shot Bill a pleading look.

Bill sighed, rolling his eye, before he finger gunned once in Loophole’s direction, blowing two laser focused fireballs between the loops on the lawyer’s head in an instant, leaving scorch marks in the bookcase behind him.

“HOLY AXO-“ Loophole swore, and jumped out of his chair, patting his loops down. “You – you nearly –“

“No tattling.” Bill told Loophole sternly. “I’ll know if you do. Come on Keyhole.”

Keyhole shrugged, grinning smugly at his cousin, before skipping jauntily around the office chairs, heading towards the marble door.

The Henchmaniac waved a friendly salute at his cousin, just as he rested his other hand on Bill’s arm.

“See ya later Loopy!”

With a lurch, Bill and Keyhole teleported away, disappearing in a beam of yellow light.

Loophole harrumphed, and surveyed his office, two holes burnt in his bookcase, ornaments scattered across the floor.

“Like making deals with the devil.” Loophole blustered, before leaning down to press the intercom button on his desk. “Maintenance. Get me a new bookcase. And send the cleaning crew up here.”

Loophole sat back in his chair, and swivelled it to face the window, watching the borealis shimmer pleasantly. He stroked his moustache, and mulled over the surprising visit.

Speaking to no one in particular, his voice sounding out in the empty room, Loophole scowled.

“And don’t call me Loopy. Bunch of degenerates.”
Standing in front of the metal tree in the forest, Bill pulled up his sleeve to look at the five unbound bricks left on his right arm.

His left arm was completely unbound, and those bricks Sixer freed as a Christmas present enabled Bill to teleport himself this far into the forest, though with his powers still stifled, that took its toll on Bill’s energy levels.

No matter, he’d be seeing Sixer soon, and with the help of a little worship, Bill’s power would be restored. The bricks were the key, Bill knew this now, and he had to set the wheels in motion to get them all unbound before the party started.

Even if it meant visiting the underground bunker.

Pulling his sleeve down, Bill sighed, before using his telekinesis to pull the branch lever, the metal tree sinking down into the ground as the entrance revealed itself.

The tap of his shoes echoed as he ventured further into the metal bunker, descending the stairs and following the dark corridors along to the small living space Sixer and Specs had been holed up in.

Looking around the empty room, Bill wrinkled his nose at the comparative comforts of the small cot, the industrial shelving, the unappetising looking food. Why would the two scientists would willingly spend time down here, devoid of the creature comforts they were used to, just to study some stupid metamorph? For science? What a joke.

Peering into the porthole that led to the security chamber, Bill blinked down the dark tunnel, seeing a light at the other end. Rolling his sleeves up over his palms, Bill grumbled to himself, before crawling along the cramped dusty pipe, making his way through to the other side.

Pausing at the end of the tunnel, looking out into the security room, Bill was reluctant to set foot on the floor, not wanting to trip the panels and potentially end up as a smear on the walls.

Sure, he could call out for help, but along with that being all kinds of undignified, Bill wasn’t sure McGucket would race to help him, if it was just him in the observation room. Bill didn’t trust the scientist further than he could throw him.

Feeling a little awkward, Bill stayed in the tunnel, clearing his throat before calling out.

“Sixer. Are you there? Hello.”

His voice echoed loudly enough, the pipe amplifying the noise. Bill just hoped one of the scientists on the other side could hear him.

“Hello? Sixer? Helloooooo?”

The security room hummed ominously, the low key whirring of the mechanics that powered the cubes emanating constantly, promising it’s unerring consequences should Bill take his chances in crossing the room. He didn’t like it.

“Hey Sixer! Come and get me. Hello in there. I came all this way, are you really gonna make me wait like this?”
The security room hummed, the only response given, as far as Bill was concerned. As each second ticked by with no response, Bill felt his frustration and desperation build.

“Sixer?” Bill called out, looking across the security room. His voice pitched a little despondently. “Specs? Anyone?”

A clank sounded out from the metal door on the opposite side of the room, and the three locking mechanisms retracted before the door swung open, Fiddleford McGucket pushing his glasses up his nose to stare at Bill, who stared back at him, on his hands and knees in the tunnel opposite.

“Didja wanna come in?” Fiddleford asked Bill.

Bill hesitated, unsure whether he could trust the mechanic to lead him across the booby-trapped floor without attempting to end him.

“It’s perfectly safe.” Fiddleford added, noting Bill’s hesitation. “I’ve got it turned off. You can come in.”

Bill considered this, but couldn’t take Fiddleford at his word, knowing the scientist could easily slam the door on him while he attempted to cross the room.

Bill stuck his jaw out stubbornly, not willing to take that chance. “Can someone come and get me?”

“You just –“ Fiddleford looked at Bill, disbelieving, before he huffed out a frustrated breath, not willing to put up with Bill’s hijinks, his patience having already been tested enough with Stanford lately. He held up a finger to Bill. “Give me a minute.”

McGucket turned and walked away from the door, closing it just to. Bill pouted, given no recourse but to wait.

“Stanford.” Fiddleford’s voice sounded out over the intercom. “You’ve got a visitor. Can you get in here?”

There was a long pause, followed by the sound of the decontamination booth door opening. Ford’s voice could be heard, quietly asking F about this visitor.

“What exactly are you talking about? What visitor?”

“Just, go look for yourself.” Fiddleford said, sounding either resigned or amused, Bill couldn’t tell.

The metal door leading to the lab swung open again, and Ford stood there, staring out across the room in confusion. Upon seeing Bill, Ford let out a bark of laughter, and pulled his fabric face mask off, grinning at his surprise visitor.

“What are you doing all the way over there?”

“Come and get me.” Bill insisted sulkily. “I’m not crossing that death trap alone.”

Striding across the lab, Ford stuffed the face mask in his trench coat pocket, before pausing about a foot away from the porthole.

“You know, I’m half tempted to leave you there.” Ford joked cheekily.

“Do it, and that’ll be the last thing you ever do.” Bill threatened, as he waved Sixer closer to him, sliding his legs out over the edge of the porthole, still not willing to touch the floor.
Bemused, Ford stepped closer to Bill, holding his arm out for the muse to steady himself with as he was climbing out of the porthole. Ford certainly didn't expect Bill to use that arm to yank him closer, before piggy backing onto him, wrapping his legs around Ford's waist.

"Bill." Ford gritted out, trying to balance himself with Bill's newfound weight attached to him. "You can walk across the floor, Fiddleford's turned the mechanism off, you're in no danger."

"I'll believe that when I'm out of danger." Bill clung to Sixer, his arms looped around his neck. "Carry me. Think of it as a work out."

Adjusting the muse in his arms, Ford reluctantly complied, looping his arms under Bill's backside, hefting him higher. Ford's clothing was slightly damp from the decontamination chamber, and Bill clung tightly to him regardless.

"You're heavier than you look."

"Rude."

Ford carried Bill across the security room, kicking the door to the lab open gently, manoeuvring them both over the threshold to safety, before dumping Bill on the metal countertop unceremoniously.

"There. Are you happy now?"

"No." Rubbing his rear, Bill scowled at Ford sourly. "I come all this way just to visit you, and you bruise the goods and dump me on your science slab. Talk about ungrateful."

"Yes, speaking of, why have you come down here to visit me? Not that I'm complaining, of course." Ford added, resting his hand on Bill's knee comfortably.

"That sounds like a complaint."

"No it isn't."

Fiddleford rolled his eyes over by the computer monitors, and picked up his files, before making his way out to the security room, giving the two of them their privacy to flirt in that obnoxious way of theirs. Though oddly enough, F was sensing some tension between them, especially on Bill's part. Best to extricate himself from the situation.

"I'll give you two some space. I'm gettin' somethin' to eat."

Ford nodded, waving his colleague off, and F departed, closing the door behind him.

Finally alone, Ford rested his other hand on Bill's other knee, stepping into the space between Bill's legs, smiling obliviously at the muse.

Bill scowled at Ford, still somewhat sour at him after receiving confirmation that Ford knew exactly what he was doing when he bound Bill in this body. He had no right to act cute, to presume Bill would find him endearing.

"How's the bruising?" Ford slid his hands along Bill's thighs, teasing the muse, but Bill slapped his hands away.

"Don't be cute with me. How much longer are you going to be staying down here, wasting your time?" Bill glared at Ford, before he reached up to poke Ford in the chest. "Every second you're down here, playing scientist, I’m back at that shack _alone_ sitting on your destiny. Have you just forgotten about the portal, is that it?”

The portal was, when Bill had left it earlier, structurally completed. There just needed to be a few last-minute adjustments made by the two scientists, work that was above the skill level the construction workers possessed. It would be up and running in no time, and that realisation filled Bill with a curious mixture of dread and anticipation.

“You’ve been working on the portal.” Ford pointed out, trying his luck again, resting his hands on Bill’s knees once more, rubbing them gently. “I know it’s in good hands.”

“I am not here to do your grunt work for you!” Bill slammed his palms down on the metal desktop for emphasis, a little genuine rage leaking out. “Dammit Sixer, stop insulting me.”

“Insulting you?” Ford blinked, taken aback by Bill’s ire. “I’m not –”

“What do you call these?” Bill pulled down his sleeve, revealing the glowing bricks left on his right arm. “If not an insult? What?”

“That’s not –” Ford began, putting his hands up placatingly.

“Or did you think I wouldn’t notice, that I’d let it slide? You’re crippling me, Sixer. Every day.” Bill’s yellow eyes bored into Ford’s, searching the scientist for the remorse he was looking for, playing on Sixer’s guilt complex. “You’re content to leave me at half of what I was, trapped in that shack, in this bubble of a town, while you have the time of your life down here, _ignoring me_. What, am I not interesting enough now you’ve got a new freak to study? You’d just forget about me? Leave me hindered? Pick me up and put me down whenever you want?”

“Now, listen.” Ford held his hand up, trying to calm Bill into silence. It almost seemed like Bill was jealous of the time he spent here with the shapeshifter. “I don’t know what’s stirred you up like this, but I can assure you, I –”

“You’re supposed to be mine! Special! Better! But it’s clear you don’t care about what I want. You just want me to be what you want me to be.” Bill accused bitterly, obviously working himself up into a state. “A muse to sit on your shoulder, or pat you on the back, to lift you up while you tread me down. You don’t care about what I was, or what I am, what I _really_ am, just what you _want_ me to be. Looking how you want me to look, doing what you want me to do. After all I’ve done for you, in the end you just don’t ca-”

“I do.” Ford grabbed Bill’s face in both his hands, capturing his attention and diverting his diatribe. Ford’s brows furrowed, and he spoke earnestly. “I do care. Don’t you dare say that I don’t.”

Bill frowned, his eyes flitting across Sixer’s face searchingly. “What were you expecting when you called me down here? An assistant? A slave? A plaything? What?”

“I – no! None of those things.” Ford exclaimed, horrified, putting his hands on Bill’s shoulders. “I was expecting a friend. Bill, what’s gotten into you?”

Bill frowned, his eyes flitting across Sixer’s face searchingly. “What were you expecting when you called me down here? An assistant? A slave? A plaything? What?”

“I – no! None of those things.” Ford exclaimed, horrified, putting his hands on Bill’s shoulders. “I was expecting a friend. Bill, what’s gotten into you?”

Bill huffed out a breath and gave Ford a reproachful look. “Give me a reason to believe you want the real Bill, and not the shell you’ve trapped me in. Give me a reason to believe you’re being genuine.”

“Is that what this is about?” Ford rubbed Bill’s shoulders, his tone still baffled. “Bill, I’m sorry I left you alone in the shack, I didn’t mean to upset you. I was just furthering my study, this is an unprecedented opportunity. Now, of course I want you, I summoned you here for that very reason.
I’ve wanted you here with me ever since you were just an angular dream. Right down to the ridiculous bowtie and top hat. You don’t need to react like this. It’s only been a couple of days, I’m not abandoning you.”

Ford was thrown by Bill’s sudden vehemence, he’d thought things had been going well between them, that things were steady, stable. They’d been progressing so smoothly in terms of physicality, in terms of affection, and trust. It seemed like a wild overreaction, that after a couple of days left to fend for himself, Bill already felt so insecure. Perhaps Ford had underestimated just how dependant the muse was on him still. He’d left him vulnerable, by leaving him alone.

Bill chewed on his bottom lip for a while, still watching Ford suspiciously. Ford cupped the side of Bill’s face and tried to impress upon him his sincerity, hoping that would soothe over Bill’s little tantrum, over his abandonment issues.

“Now, I don’t know where this outburst has come from, but you’ve got nothing to be upset about. I’ve not gone anywhere, I’m still here for you. I appreciate you coming all the way down here to see me, but if you were this upset without me you should have said something earlier. I’m not a mind reader, that’s your domain. I don’t know what you’re thinking, but if you have an issue or a concern, you need to tell me.” Ford said reasonably.

Bill seemed to be wrestling with something for a moment there, possibly his own self-restraint. This next question wasn’t part of Bill’s plan to guilt Ford, it wasn’t necessary at all, but somehow the words blurted out of him before he could stop himself.

“How do you feel about me?”

Ford blinked, struck dumb, his mouth hanging open, surprised by the question.

“Uh…you-” Stanford felt heat creep up into his cheeks, and he cleared his throat. “Surely you already know.”

Bill continued to stare at Ford stubbornly, not making it easy on him.

“I – “ Ford struggled to get the words out, his throat feeling tight, anxious butterflies creeping up his oesophagus.

There was something incredibly unnerving about putting yourself out there first, about splaying all your cards on the table verbally. Ford had been avoiding it, to be honest. He wasn’t sure he could deal if his feelings weren’t reciprocated by the god, if he could continue on like this with the muse. It would change everything.

“Do you even care?” Bill queried stubbornly, his chin jutting out, before he pointed to his arm again. “Because if you did, you wouldn’t be leaving me trapped like this.”

“Of course I care.” Ford said, exhaling his tension loudly. This was just about the bricks, and somehow that was a relief. “Of course I do. Listen, if that’s what you’re upset about, I can unbind another brick for you now, if you like.”

“Another five.” Bill said, showing Ford his arm. “There are five bricks.”

“Let’s just tackle this one at a time.” Ford insisted, putting his hand on Bill’s arm. “You didn’t have to come all the way down here just to ask for that. Surely it can wait a little while.”

Shifting on the tabletop, Bill looked up through his eyelashes at Ford. “Maybe I came to see you.”
“To yell at me.” Ford muttered, but looped his arms around the contrary muse’s waist, tugging him closer to the edge of the table affectionately.

“Well, who else can I yell at when you’re not around.” Bill joked wryly, and looped his arms around Sixer’s shoulders, capitulating on the affection Sixer promised, deviating from his plan to stay mad at the human until he complied. It was hard to stay mad at Sixer, despite his arrogance.

“You did miss me.” Ford murmured at the muse, leaning in close to Bill’s face. “I knew you would miss me.”

“Whatever helps you sleep at night.” Bill shrugged, not willing to admit to it, knowing how smug the scientist would be.

“I told you so.” Ford hummed, proving Bill right.

Really, what had he done to deserve Sixer, to have Sixer inflicted on him like this. Sure, he’d done some bad things before, but this was karmic overkill, really. The scientist truly was awful, the most arrogant, egotistical person Bill had ever met. He had the nerve to presume he had an effect on Bill, and what’s worse was that it was true.

Despite wanting to wring his infuriatingly smug form out like a towel for what he had done to Bill, forcing him down here, binding him to this body, Bill couldn’t help the oblique sort of attraction that was slowly becoming undeniable. He was obsessed with the human.

“You are infuriating.” Bill whispered, threading his fingers through Ford’s hair as he leant in to kiss him.

Ford hummed his response against Bill’s lips, kissing him soundly, managing to sound smug without words.

All Bill’s frustrated ire melted away from him, melted into the kiss. It was with reluctant gusto that he reciprocated, meaning to stay angry, but failing miserably. Sixer just managed to bring out the best in Bill somehow, even when he was being the worst.

Plastered close to Sixer’s chest, having slid right up to the edge of the table so he could wrap his legs around the human, Bill sighed bliss into the kiss, until finally Ford pulled away, a victorious glint in his eyes.

“And how do you feel about me?” He asked, opportunistic, still trying to get Bill to confess before he had to.

“I hate you.” Bill said, a smirk hinting at his lips.

“And yet, you came all this way just to visit me.” Ford teased, hugging Bill obnoxiously in his arms.

“Stop.” Bill whacked Ford’s arm, trying to wriggle out of his grasp, smiling despite himself. “You’re not funny. You smug, irascible, Sixer! Ack!”

In his enthusiasm, Ford squeezed Bill so tight he fell off the work bench, stumbling against the human.

“Sorry.” Ford chuckled, but reached out to hold Bill’s hand, before tugging him towards the decontamination room. “Since you’re here, you should come and meet Shifty. He’s been growing phenomenally.”
“If I go meet your grub, will you unbind a brick for me?” Bill asked, unimpressed with the thought of meeting Sixer’s pet metamorph.

“Absolutely.” Ford nodded, pulling Bill along with him eagerly, considering their argument resolved. “I can set up the ritual circle in one of the tunnels in the storage room.”

Following Ford through the decontamination doors, Bill flinched at the spray of water, steam rising from his form the instant the jets stopped, finding the whole process undignified.

Ford quickly put on his face mask, adjusting it, before he tugged Bill across the cavern, bringing him to stop in front of Shifty’s cage.

“Bill, this is Shifty. Shifty, Bill.” Ford said, smiling behind his mask.

“Hello.” Bill said flatly to the grub in the cage, who was blinking up at this new form with curiosity. Ignoring Shifty, Bill turned to Sixer demandingly. “We’ve met. Now go set up that circle.”

Patting Bill on the shoulder, Ford complied, heading off towards one of the tunnels to bleed out a ritual circle. “I’ll leave you two to chat.”

Bill watched Sixer go, shaking his head at the human, before turning back to sneer at the shapeshifter.

Shifty’s form was trembling with the strain of trying to morph into Bill’s form, a new form, somehow finding it difficult to replicate the DNA of the dark-skinned man standing in front of him.

“I wouldn’t try that if I were you.” Bill raised an eyebrow at the ambitious shifter, watching its translucent skin turn a mustardy yellow. “It didn’t work out so well for your brother.”

Shifty paused and blinked up at Bill, tilting his head. He stopped his shapeshifting attempt, and watched Bill closely.

“Oh, you can understand me, can you?” Bill questioned slyly, before he bent down, resting his hands on his knees, talking down to the grub. “Sentience already. Gosh, they grow up so fast. It’s almost a shame you won’t make it past tomorrow.”

The shapeshifter rumbled a confused sounding noise, before clasping onto the bars of the cage with its pincer like claws. Shifty clacked his pincers demandingly, and spoke, it’s guttural voice chiming out.

“Why?”

“Language too. Good for you.” Bill cooed in a patronising tone, before he held his hand up to his mouth like he was imparting a secret. “Well, you didn’t hear it from me, but let’s just say the skinny scientist with the round glasses wants to freeze you like a test subject. He wants to lock you in stasis and throw away the key.”

Shifty made a low growling sound in the back of his throat, baring his teeth in fear. He tried to pull at the steel bars of his cage, attempting to wrench them open.

“I’d escape too, if I were you.” Bill nodded at the creature. “But you’ll have no luck getting out past the next room. Specs has a security system that would squash you like the bug you are.”

Shifty blinked his red eyes at Bill and growled again.
“Escape.” Shifty insisted, glaring up at Bill intently. He shifted forms in his agitation, turning into a pill bug, a porcupine, and Fiddleford briefly in turn.

Bill clicked his fingers and pointed to Shifty. “See, that right there is how you get out. You’ve gotta drive a wedge between Sixer and Specs. Breed distrust. That’s your ticket out of here.”

Shifty grinned at Bill, the sinister expression looking out of place on Fiddleford’s face.

“That’s your ticket out of here.” Shifty mimicked Bill’s tone seamlessly, nodding at him.

“You wanna pitch it different for Specs. More hillbilly nerd. Try –“ Bill cleared his throat and fell back on his experience possessing humans, throwing his voice. Mimicking F’s voice perfectly, Bill recited. “Gosh darn it, why, I can’t work in this confounded hellhole with you a minute longer. I quit the project!”

“I quit the project!” Shifty repeated, hitting the tone perfectly.

“That’s right.” Bill praised Shifty, smiling at the caged image of Fiddleford.

Shifty turned into a small Pomeranian, wagging his tail in response to the praise.

“Bill, the circle’s ready.” Stanford’s voice called out from one of the tunnels.

“I’m coming.” Bill called out to Ford, before turning back to face the metamorph. “Oh, and one last thing. I don’t care what you do to Specs to get out of here, but if you harm one hair on Sixer’s head, you won’t just end up frozen in a cryo-tube, I’ll burn you alive.”

Bill added emphasis to his words by letting blue flames creep up the edges of Shifty’s cage, the heat of the flames very real, raising the metal’s temperature, causing the shifter to yip in fear, burning his paws.

Shifty looked up at this terrifying being, awe and fear competing against each other, regarding Bill with wide eyes.

Framed in flames, Bill’s yellow eyes smiled down at the shifter, malice shining through, glowing clear as day.

“Sixer is mine. Got it?”

Shifty whined in fear, and nodded, rearing away from the encroaching flames.

Suddenly the fire disappeared, and Bill stood up, looking pleased with himself.

“Good. Let’s hope you’re not as disappointing as your brother was.”

With a wave, Bill jogged away, down the tunnel to meet Sixer and unbind that promised brick.

Shifty watched him leave, and quivered in his cage, first with fear, then with rage. He morphed back into his true form and gripped the bars with his pincers, his deep voice growling out into the empty cavern.

“I’ll burn you alive. Got it.” His teeth clacked together, and his form simmered, trying to replicate Bill’s terrifying majesty, failing dismally. His efforts only made him an oozing pile of yellow flesh, seeking hands, and wide weeping eyes.

Growling, Shifty morphed back into Fiddleford, and practised plan B.
“I’ll quit the project. Gosh darn it. I’ll quit the project! Hellhole. I quit the project.”

The tunnel glowed with red light, and things began unravelling.

With one more brick unbound, Bill was considerably happier, and left the bunker in a far better mood than when he’d arrived.

He’d even agreed with Fiddleford, insisting that Stanford freeze the shifter and return home the next day. Fiddleford seemed surprised by Bill’s agreement initially, since Bill hardly ever took his side, but after unintentionally eavesdropping on Bill and Stanford’s whispered farewell F had a pretty good idea of what motivated Bill to do so.

Let’s just say Bill missed Stanford. A lot.

Stanford was going over the information they’d compiled on Shifty so far, filing it neatly into folders for his own personal reference. So far the scientist had done everything from double checking his own findings, to cleaning the lab, just to procrastinate telling Shifty his goodbyes.

Fiddleford watched Stanford recount the pages in one folder for the fourth time and sighed, before pushing himself up out of his chair.

“I’m going to go check the nitrogen levels and look over everything one last time. Are you coming?”

“I’ll just –“ Ford hesitated, looking up at the Fiddleford briefly before ducking his head back into the manila folder. “Be a few more minutes.”

If Stanford wanted to hide from his responsibilities, that was on him, but either way, today would be the day that horrible little creature would be sealed away. It was difficult to say goodbye to a pet, but this had to happen.

Fiddleford shrugged. “Suit yourself.”

He walked through the doors to the decontamination unit, the cleansing spray brisk but necessary, and closed the door behind him.

F paced out into the storage room and walked up onto the podium, checking the cryo-tube they’d be using today for the nth time. F flicked several switches off standby mode, getting them ready for immediate use, and, once he was satisfied everything was functional, he dusted his hands off.

“There.” F rested his hands on his hips and turned to survey Shifty’s cage. “Now we just need –“

The cage was empty.

Not just empty, it was destroyed. The steel bars looked like they’d been weakened then prised open from the inside out, curling away from the structure like petals on a flower.

Shifty was nowhere to be seen.
“Uh oh.” Fiddleford clicked his tongue, the horror abstractly playing at the back of his mind, outwardly remaining pragmatic. He sounded far too calm for someone trapped in a room with a feral shapeshifter. The reality of the situation hadn’t set in yet. “That’s a problem.”

Fiddleford climbed down the podium steps, but as he reached the bottom, the missing shifter in question appeared, having hid behind the cryotube, rounding the corner to face F.

Fiddleford’s abstract horror began to solidify slightly now that he was face to face with an uncaged version of himself, the shifter staring him down with a manic grin.

F took one step back, getting ready to run, not wanting a repeat of the Gremloblin incident, a trauma born from listening to Stanford, who seemed to believe that monsters weren’t dangerous, and not running away fast enough.

The shifter tilted his head, his eyelids blinking sideways, fake-Fiddleford’s eyes parting unnaturally, revealing terrifying red irises.

“That’s a problem.” The shifter said, mimicking F’s voice.

“Oh sweet tarnation.” Fiddleford croaked, before turning on his heel to run for it.

The shifter lunged. F felt the creature’s hands upon him, holding him down, clawing at him, striking him soundly.

He knew listening to Stanford was a bad idea.

Everything went black.

When F came to, he found himself tied up tightly. The rope he normally used to lasso the lever to the bunker down was biting into his wrists and ankles cruelly. He seemed to be shoved in one of the food storage cabinets, the metal doors hanging open.

F struggled, trying to wriggle out of his bindings, to no avail.

“Oh sweet tarnation.” The shifter loomed over Fiddleford, his voice a perfect mockery of F’s, before shifting his tone to mimic Stanford’s. “Someone’s awake. How are we doing today?”

“STANFORD! STANFORD HELP!” F yelled out, hoping Ford would hear him.

The shifter slammed a hand over F’s mouth with lightning fast reflexes, blinking those sideways eyelids at him, growling venomously.

“There’s no help for you.” Shifty spoke, his voice much lower than Fiddleford had ever remembered, those red eyes glinting dangerously. “You were going to lock me in this hellhole forever. Frozen in a cryo-tube. I want to escape.”

His words sounded disjointed, cobbled together from sentences Shifty had heard during his captivity. His tone shifted oddly, the cadence indicating he’d picked up certain words from different people at different times, and was only now just making sense of them.
Fiddleford’s muffled protests were silenced when Shifty’s hand – a perfect copy of Fiddleford’s hand – began to warp, sharp claws with needle like points grew out of the nail beds, slicing F’s cheek.

Fiddleford sucked in a terrified breath, and silenced his cries for help, watching the shifter warily, cooperating. Blood trickled down his cheek from a cut just below his eye, and F couldn’t help his shivering, adrenaline and fear seeping from him as he attempted to remain still.

“Tell me how to escape.” Shifty growled at F. “I want my ticket out of here.”

Shifty released F’s mouth and watched him suck in terrified breaths, regaining his equilibrium, eyeing Shifty warily.

When Fiddleford didn’t reply immediately, Shifty snarled, and raised his hand at F, jagged needle claws making the scientist flinch and stutter.

“I – you – you just walk on out the door. That’s all.” F lied, hoping Shifty would leave him be. “You just walk right on out.”

“Liar.” Shifty curled his hands on the cabinet doors, bending the metal in his frustration. “Your security system would squash me like a bug.”

“How did you –“ F’s shoulders jumped, cowering away from Shifty as the creature slammed his hand against the cabinet door. “AHH!”

“Tell me how to escape.” Shifty bared his teeth at F, and they looked far sharper on the metamorph than they ever did in Fiddleford’s jaw.

“Th-th-the code!” F cried out, wincing away from the shifter’s teeth. “There’s a code.”

“What?” Shifty pressed, gripping the cabinet door tighter, leaving indents in the metal.

“S-Stanford wrote it down. It’s in the journal.”

“The journal.” Shifty made a low sort of clicking noise, that sounded like some sort of reptilian purr, and his eyes blinked sideways again, looking covetously to the door of the lab.

F quivered dreadfully, guilt washing over him, fearing he’d just endangered his friend, endangered his life. Not that Stanford seemed to care about the multitude of ways he’d been endangering F, bringing him in on this project, making him study monsters and calling it science. Still, despite F’s terror, he still felt worry for his friend. It was in his nature to.

“You – you’re not gonna hurt him, are you?” F asked timidly, drawing the shifters attention back from the door.

“I won’t harm one hair on his head.” Shifty replied with a sickening smile, before he crouched down low, ripping Fiddleford’s shoe off his foot, yanking his sock off. “But you – if you lied – I’m coming back for you.”

Shifty stuffed Fiddleford’s musty sock in the scientist’s mouth, gagging him effectively with the foul-tasting fabric. F coughed and choked back a sob, trying to spit out the sock, but Shifty stroked his needle pointed fingers across F’s face, grazing his skin with the sharp metal threateningly.

F froze, staring fearfully up at the shapeshifter, the creature wearing his face.
“You will die down here.” Shifty cooed in Stanford’s voice, promising Fiddleford cruelly. He petted F’s frightened face again, slicing another thin cut along his cheekbone, blood welling to the surface.

Shifty’s tongue darted out, long and snakelike, and he licked the dribble of blood from F’s face. Tears began trickling down F’s cheeks as the fright set in fully, the desperation, the terror, making him quake harder than ever.

Retracting the needle claws, Shifty straightened up, making F’s image harmless and approachable once more. Shifty cleared his throat, and began practising F’s voice, hitting the mark perfectly.

“How Stanford, mind if I see your journal? Can I take a look? Stanford quick, I need to see that journal. Is that your research, mind if I take a look? Hiya Sixer, help me out.”

F watched Shifty with wide eyes and wet cheeks, shivering at the thought that unless Stanford saw through Shifty’s manipulative act, he very well may die down here. Once again his life was on the line, and Stanford’s observational skills were his only hope for rescue. Oh dear.

Shifty put his hands on the cabinet doors and slowly closed them on F, shutting him in inescapable darkness.

“I’ll be coming back for you.”

Ford sighed, and reluctantly closed the last file on Shifty, sealing it up with tape and slotting it in the filing cabinet.

It was difficult, going over photos and anecdotes of Shifty’s growth and progression, reminiscing on the bond he formed with the strange alien, knowing that after today none of it would matter.

However close he’d become with the strange little creature, he had to seal him away. Fiddleford and Bill were right, the more Shifty learned and grew, in sentience and strength, the more dangerous he was. A liability. Not a pet.

Ford had to reluctantly agree with his two colleagues, after Shifty’s rather ominous attempt to seek out the dangerous forms contained in Ford’s journal. Shifty’s desire to look within the pages wasn’t something he could be trained out of, it wasn’t a matter of obedience.

At this point Shifty was thinking for himself and Ford could hardly justify continuing to treat this intelligent self-aware being like a puppy.

But he couldn’t unleash him on the world either.

Shifty’s powers, while a revolution in terms of scientific DNA modelling, were too dangerous to be turned on the unsuspecting citizens of Gravity Falls.

Ford had a responsibility to protect the people of this town, whether or not they knew it, and he couldn’t allow Shifty to infiltrate humanity, no matter how much he attempted to teach the shifter right from wrong.
Shifty had an appetite for the more affronting, terrifying creatures, it seemed. He couldn’t content himself with morphing into puppy dogs and kittens forever.

Ford slid the filing cabinet closed, the suspension folder detailing his experiments on Shifty rolling out of sight. He locked the cabinet, and felt a sort of empty finality in the action.

Clapping his hands on his knees, Ford pushed himself up out of his chair, when the decontamination chamber door flew open, Fiddleford coughing as he walked through the spray.

“S-Stanford.” Fiddleford coughed, holding his hand up over his mouth. “Oh, sweet tarnation. I’ve got the worst sore throat.”

F heaved and rattled out several more horse sounding coughs, and Ford’s brow furrowed with concern.

“That does sound quite bad. Maybe drink some water.”

“Say, is there any chance you’ve got a remedy for me in that journal of yours?” F croaked, watching Ford closely as he coughed again behind his hand.

“You don’t need a remedy. It’s just dusty in here, have a bit of water, see how you feel. You’ll be fine.” Ford said absently, tidying the pens on the countertop, putting them neatly in the tin he kept on the control panel.

“I don’t think water will do it. I really think I need a peek at that book of yours, see if you’ve got a fix for me.” Fiddleford insisted, coughing again for emphasis.

“Now Fiddleford, I don’t see what sort of ‘fix’ you’d be likely to find in one of my journals, but it probably won’t be the sort of fix you’re looking for.” Stanford scoffed, waving dismissively at F. “You’re more likely to find a solution in the first aid cabinet, just use a cough drop.”

“No.” Fiddleford’s voice sounded rather gruff for a moment there, and Ford paused, looking up in confusion. F cleared his throat and continued. “No, I really think I should check in your journal. Can you go and get it for me?”

“No?” Ford frowned, and narrowed his eyes at F.

“Go and get it.” Fiddleford responded, sticking his jaw out stubbornly.

Ford scoffed, offended, before he gestured to the decontamination chamber. “I know what this is about. You don’t have to concoct some fanciful fake illness to make me go in there. I know I have to say my goodbyes to Shifty, and I’m getting around to it in my own time. I had hoped you wouldn’t rush me. I know you didn’t care for him at all, but it’s rather more difficult for me.”

Fiddleford seemed somewhat taken aback, staring at Stanford in surprise, his eyes wide.

“Look, I’m sorry for snapping at you.” Ford started, taking Fiddleford’s shocked expression as evidence that he’d been a little too harsh with his colleague. “But you have to understand that when you form a bond with something, a genuine bond, you can’t just throw that away on a whim. It doesn’t matter how dangerous he is. I still feel like I’m betraying him. He trusts me, and I’m supposed to go in there and tell him everything’s alright while we push him in a cryo-tube and throw away the key.”

Fiddleford stared at Ford with a conflicted expression, most likely empathising with him.
Ford pinched the bridge of his nose and sighed. “I know, I’m getting emotional. It’s not professional, and I apologise. You were right, you’ve been right from the beginning. I was foolish to form attachments with a test subject, and you’re right to be mad at me. I get it.”

Fiddleford’s brows furrowed, and he opened his mouth, before closing it, seeming deeply disappointed. Eventually he cleared his throat, repeating.

“The journal.”

Ford put his hands on his hips, and tsked, before gesturing to one of the metal stools in the lab. “Fine. I may as well bring it out while I’m in there. You sit. Wait there. I’ll go say my goodbyes and come back with the journal. Might as well rip the band-aid off.”

Fiddleford walked over to the metal stool indicated, gripping the bottom of the stool, sitting on it with awkward movements. He made a sound that could have been a smothered cough, it sounded quite morose.

“And I’ll get you a cough drop too.” Ford muttered grumpily, heading for the decontamination chamber. “Absolutely ridiculous.”

The decontamination chamber door locked closed, and Shifty waited.

Grumbling, Stanford crossed the storage room to one of the lockers, where he’d left his journal when he was last in here, writing notes on Shifty’s temperament.

As he was unlocking the door, he heard a strange noise that sounded out of place with the hum and whirr of the cryo-tube technology.

An arrhythmic thudding, and what sounded like muffled sobs and screams, emanating from one of the food storage cabinets.

Ford blinked, and put his journal in his trench coat pocket, before walking over to the food storage cabinet, observing it warily.

Another muffled scream sounded out, followed by sobs that sounded eerily familiar.

Ford hurried over, and swung the cabinet door open.

Inside the cabinet, bound with rope and gagged with his own sock, sat Fiddleford, crying out desperately for help. At first he flinched away from Ford, before squinting at him, inspecting him with red rimmed eyes.

“What the devil?” Ford exclaimed, and bent down, immediately reaching to pull the sock out of Fiddleford’s mouth, working on untying the ropes. “F, what happened to you? Are you – who did this?”

F coughed, and moved his tongue around, his mouth dry and musty from the sock-gag. Glaring at Ford, lamenting his genius colleague’s idiocy Fiddleford croaked out.
“Who d’you think Stanford? Your p-p-pet monster! He was gonna kill me!”

Rubbing his hand as Stanford untied his wrists, moving onto his feet, F wiped his cheeks, still shaking with fear, anger and adrenaline.

“I told you this was a bad idea. I told you. This is your fault.”

“Well, how was I to know he’d attack you and lock you in a closet.” Ford replied, tugging the ropes away from his assistant as quickly as he was able. “I just wanted to get some research in before I lost the opportunity to study the creature. If studying a creature who turns into a Pomeranian is point A it takes one hell of a leap to get to point B, being a homicidal rampage.”

“One hell of a leap?” Fiddleford countered incredulously. “He’s only been out of his cage for a few hours, and already he attacks me! You’re makin’ excuses for that monster?”

“I – no. You’re right.” Ford took in the bleeding cuts on F’s cheek, and felt his guilt compound in an instant. “I’m sorry, this should never have happened to you.”

“Darn tootin’ it shouldn’t have. I didn’t sign up on this project to be traumatised by monsters Stanford. I thought we were here to do good.”

“We are doing good.” Ford promised F passionately. “We are. Once the portal goes online we’ll be doing so much good, the world will change for the better because of it. I’m sorry that this happened to you Fiddleford, I’m sorry – you – it is my fault. I should have listened to you.”

Fiddleford’s breathing was still ragged, and he hiccupped on a sob, taking in Ford’s apology.

“Shifted tricked us.” Ford continued, disconcerted. “He’s there waiting in the lab, ready to steal my journal and leave us both down here to rot. We can’t let that happen.”

“We gotta freeze him. For good this time.” Fiddleford clambered out of the cabinet on shaky legs, and began stretching his back out.

“I know.” Ford helped F out, his arms ready to steady F, worried he would fall. “The question is, how do we get him in there. He won’t go willingly, and if he’s broken free from his cage, he’s likely stronger than we anticipated.”

“He wants the journal, right?” Fiddleford questioned.

“But we can’t just give it to him. The forms in here are far too dangerous, if he sees a single page he could easily kill us both.” Ford warned.

“So, we give him this.” Fiddleford reached into the cabinet he’d become intimately familiar with in the past hour, and pulled out a faded plumbing manual that had been digging into his back, bound in the same red leather as Ford’s journal.

“That’s close enough that it just might work.” Ford nodded triumphantly, grabbing the manual. “You’ve still got the spray paint we used to mark out the different tunnels from before, yes?”

“In the lockers on the other side.” F pointed out to the other storage lockers across the room. “You’ll have to go get it. The cameras got a blind spot in this here corner, but you’ll be right in plain sight over there. If he’s in the observation room like you say he is, he’ll be watchin’ us like a hawk.”

“True.” Ford nodded. He looked over to the cabinet, and picked up the rope, shoving it in there.
“Are you alright to stay in there? He won’t see you if you’re hidden.”

“I feel like I’ve been trapped in there long enough.” Fiddleford sniffed, and wiped his face again. “But if it’ll get us outta here quicker, I’ll do it.”

Fiddleford climbed back into the cabinet, and tried his best to get comfortable, pulling the doors closed so he could peek out. Through the sliver in the door he saw Stanford’s earnest expression, looking down at him.

“Just stay quiet, no matter what. I’ll be right back to get you out of here when it’s over.”

“Once you get him in there, press the red button.” Fiddleford whispered out to Ford. “I’ve already taken care of the rest. It should be all up and runnin’ ready to go.”

“Got it.” Ford nodded, and headed off to grab the spray paint. He walked out of F’s line of sight, and F waited, sitting in the dark with only a sliver of light letting him know what was going on outside.

He felt the dried blood on his face, and shuddered, remembering the needles.

He was dreading the nightmares he’d have tonight.

---

Ford returned to the observation room, drawing on every last reserve of deception he had to remain ‘calm’. He’d been told repeatedly (by Bill) that he had a terrible poker face, but as this was literally a matter of life and death, Ford hoped he could be convincingly casual enough to pull this off.

Striding through the doors, Ford noticed that ‘F’ was involuntarily shaking in his chair, his patience drawn thin. Ford could sense that Shifty was on edge, he had bent indents into the metal of the stool with his bare hands. He was stronger than Ford had anticipated.

Breezing through, Ford deposited the packet of cough drops on the countertop beside Shifty.

“There, this should help.”

Shifty curled his lip at the packet of lozenges, and turned to look at Stanford.

“Where’s the journal?”

Leaning casually against the counter, Ford tugged his shirt sleeves neatly out from under his trench coat, trying his best to look nonchalant.

“It seems in my carelessness I left my journal in the cryonics room. If it’s really so essential for you, you’re welcome to go and get it, but I think you’ll find those lozenges more effective than anything else.”

 Barely waiting for Ford to finish speaking, Shifty darted off the stool, racing into the other room, hunting the journal.

Ford followed him, keeping pace behind the being, chasing him into the storage room.
He saw Shifty lunge into the cryo-tube, his movements too fast, unnatural on Fiddleford’s short legged body, and Stanford sprinted the last few yards between them, slamming his hand down on the red button on the side of the cryo-tube, sealing the door on Shifty, the liquid nitrogen solution filtering into the tube quickly.

Shifty spun around, still clutching the ‘journal’ to face Ford, an expression of utter betrayal gracing ‘Fiddleford’s’ face. He looked down at the flowing nitrogen, then flipped open the book, searching the pages for a form to take that would free him from his frozen fate.

Seeing nothing but plumbing instructions, realising he’d been duped, Shifty howled, screaming his rage out in the reinforced chamber.

His form twisted, becoming the large translucent skinned grub Ford had seen before, beating his pincer like fists against the glass, shifting again, into a horrifically mutated version of Fiddleford, with red eyes and vertical eyelids. He snarled at Ford, and shifted back into the large grublike creature, finally morphing into a form Stanford had never seen him take before.

The liquid nitrogen was taking hold, freezing Shifty where he stood, the ice forming blue crystals of containment around the creature.

The last form Stanford saw his beloved former pet take was an abstract pile of oozing yellow flesh, wiry black arms reaching from the morose pile of goo, scraping and scratching at the glass, whining desperately while several long lashed slitted eyes spun wildly around, tears freezing in place as they leaked water from the frantic final gaze of Ford’s pet.

Shifty’s concluding screech of pain petered off from his peculiar final form, that strange fleshy pile of limbs and eyes, and the glass fogged up with frost as the liquid nitrogen cryonically froze Shifty, obscuring Stanford’s view of the creature once and for all.

Ford panted from the exertion it took to make it across the room in time, and struggled to catch his breath, resting his hand against the glass, watching the frost creep behind his six fingers, feeling a flicker of remorse wash over him.

Pressing his forehead against the glass, Ford managed to do what he’d been procrastinating all this time.

“Goodbye Shifty.” He murmured, before walking away.

As Fiddleford and Stanford collected their belongings from the lab, sealing off the security measures as they went, Fiddleford attempted to control the shaking he still suffered, having made it through yet another traumatic experience in Stanford’s employ.

“I think its best we put this all behind us.” Ford insisted, as he lugged the boxes of their belongings up the staircase, depositing them out onto the forest floor. “We can return after the portal is completed, but for now, this whole ‘storage’ concept is just too dangerous.”

“Uhuh.” Fiddleford said, too exhausted for speech honestly.

After this terrifying encounter, the last thing he felt like doing was humouring Stanford, who seemed to think they’d be coming back down here someday. F wouldn’t return to the bunker unless the sky was falling in.

“I can’t imagine what could have happened if Shifty managed to escape. The thought is just too horrifying to consider.” Ford wiped his forehead, and put the last box of research into the back of Fiddleford’s truck. “We’re lucky we made it out alright, between the two of us. That could have gone much worse.”

“Yep.” F said blankly, climbing into the driver’s seat of the truck, ready to hightail it out of here.

“I think Bill is right. It’s best we just focus on completing the portal, and we can worry about the rest later. The portal should be our sole priority. Nothing else.” Ford said, mostly to himself at this point, nodding as he climbed into the passenger’s seat beside F, putting on his seatbelt.

F turned the keys in the ignition, and set the truck rumbling off down the track, keen to get home and clean his cuts properly. He didn’t want to court infection, and who knew what was in Shifty’s saliva.

“I shudder to think what would happen if someone else was caught down there with him.” Ford continued, looking out the window as they drove off. “We barely got out alive, and you almost paid the price, all because I was too foolish to see the danger right in front of me.”

F wanted to agree, but he knew that if he did he’d be driving more nails into the coffin of Ford’s guilt complex than he cared to. Instead he made an ambivalent noise, staring out the windscreen as he turned the truck onto the road, driving back to the shack.

Ford rested his hand on his chin, and leaned against the car door, looking out the side window as the forest whipped by. He sighed, frowning, and spoke regretfully.

“Honestly, I just want to forget any of this happened.”

Fiddleford gripped the wheel a little tighter, and drove on home.

“Me too, Stanford. Me too.”

Bill and Stanford were in the kitchen, chatting as Stanford finished cooking dinner, the first home cooked meal they’d had in weeks, considering how long they’d been down there, studying the shifter.

Fiddleford could hear them from the living room, already laughing about the horrors they’d faced down in that bunker.

It was so easy for them. It wasn’t for everyone else.

Hunched over the telephone, Fiddleford held the handset close to his face and listened to the dial tone, his back turned to the kitchen, trying to remain inconspicuous.

The phone rang for several seconds, before the recipient picked up.

“Hello?”
“Listen Ivan, I’ve changed my mind. Gather those friends of yours at the Natural History Museum, in the room we met in before. Tomorrow night. And make sure no one sees you gettin’ there. This needs to remain a secret.”

“Absolutely Mr McGucket, absolutely.” Ivan enthused on the other end of the call. “I’ll arrange it right away.”

“Good.” Fiddleford replied, looking over his shoulder at Bill and Stanford in the kitchen, oblivious to his call. “I know it took me a while, but I thought about what you said, and you’re right. I’m done not helpin’ people for Stanford’s sake. It’s time I helped myself.”

“I knew you were a good person, Mr McGucket, I knew it.”

“So, we’re doin’ this. But if we’re goin’ to be doin’ this, we’re doin’ this right.” Fiddleford turned back to the phone call, turning his back on Stanford’s frivolous wishes.

“We’ve gotta be unseen.”

Chapter End Notes

This chapter was INTENSE! So much happening. Shifty missed the taste of orange juice, and Loophole was a visual pun in the making for a long time. The perfect name for an interstellar contracts lawyer. Also that economic boom on Central Logos was devastating to the planet’s eco-system, and that's a three pun zinger.

This chapter is dedicated to tumblr user knittedstories, who made the most beautiful watercolour piece from the camping scene. I love it, thank you friend.

Let me know how you enjoyed this chapter, we've got maybe two more chapters to go until this portal goes live, who else is on the edge of their seat? Hahah, I know I am.
Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

All four generators were rigged up, the main construction for the infrastructure of the portal having been completed.

Bill’s assistance while Stanford and Fiddleford had been working in the bunker had been invaluable, Ford almost wished he could have been here to see it. He often wondered if his muse expended any effort at all, if he physically did the legwork, or just reclined in the lab, waving his hand while the pieces all fit together telekinetically. For all Stanford joked that Bill was incapable of working, he really came through right when he needed to.

Now that the heavy labour was taken care of, some final rewiring needed to be done, as well as several more tests involving utilising the radioactive power source. Ford and Fiddleford had been running themselves ragged keeping up with the various calculations and system checks required before the portal could go online. It seemed like in no time at all, the portal would be finished and functional, but Stanford still found the scant distance between now and his destiny frustrating.

“Test the generators. All four this time.” Ford said, adjusting his sunglasses, looking out across the lab.

Fiddleford knelt beside the fourth generator on the right side of the lab, checking one last bit of wiring, before backing up several paces, ready to flip the switch remotely.

Bill sat perched on one of the swivelling desk chairs from the observation room, spinning around on it and drinking a cocktail in the corner of the lab while Stanford directed the generator test. He’d elected to wear the proffered sunglasses this time, and sipped his cocktail through a silly straw he insisted Stanford pick up for him at the store, slurping the liquid loudly.

Fiddleford raised his hand, and began counting down on his fingers.

“Three, two, a-one. Test ignition.”

Flipping the switch, the radioactive fuel gauge began lighting up, and all four generators slowly sparked to life, that low electric hum filling the room and building gradually. The generators warmed up, gaining power steadily, until they ignited into a beam of pure energy, flowing consistently between all four generators. The energy would flow up into the generator suspended from the ceiling and rebound smoothly back down into the generator on the floor, sustaining a continual loop.

Blue light filled the lab, and the generators continued feeding into each other, efficiently gathering power. They’d disconnected them from the portal’s eye for this part of the test. They’d need to run a few more calculations before they were ready to test the machine out in its entirety.

Fiddleford turned to look at Ford, the blue light shining on the surface of his dark sunglasses, and he gave Ford a thumbs up, the electrical hum too loud to speak over.

Ford mirrored F’s gesture, smiling encouragingly, before looking over to Bill, who was watching the generators run coolly, sipping on his cocktail all the while. Ford made sure to include Bill, giving him the thumbs up too, and Bill raised his eyebrows, before clapping slowly, showing Ford his approval.
The hum of the generators increased in pitch, and suddenly Ford felt a weightless sensation begin in his belly, rising upwards. He looked over to the generators, then down at the ground, as he felt himself lifting from the surface of the earth, gravity reversing on him.

Ford floated, and first thought his sudden levitation was due to Bill, checking to see if the muse was playing a trick on him, but he wouldn’t do something like that in front of Fiddleford.

Fiddleford was floating too, lifted from the ground with a yelp, grasping onto the emergency switch box, fumbling to keep it in his hands.

Even Bill was lifted into the air, office chair and all, the liquid from his cocktail suspending in the air in front of him, a colourful bubble of three different types of liqueur and grenadine. He seemed utterly giddy to be floating, but Ford realised that wasn’t a clear indicator of whether or not this gravitational anomaly was to be expected, as Bill often complained about how the bricks bound his ability to float.

“Stanford?” Fiddleford called out to his colleague, the lack of gravity dangling him feet over head as he clung desperately to the switch box, the cord that ran from it being his only tether to the ground.

“Turn it off!” Ford yelled back, gesturing with his hands for F to cut the power.

F flipped open the safety casing and switched the power off. Slowly the electrical hum subsided, and the power flowing through the generator flickered off, the blue light blinking out abruptly.

Ford floated for a second or two after the switch was flipped, and then gravity suddenly came rushing up to meet him.

Landing on the ground, Ford was lucky enough to touch down feet first, stumbling a little. Fiddleford was deposited horizontally, falling face down into the dirt floor of the lab, spluttering. He pushed himself up off the ground, and wiped his mouth.

“What the sweet H-E-double-L was that?”

“Yay!” Bill clapped wildly, having fallen on his rear, his chair toppled to the side, but his drink miraculously having returned into his glass. “Again! Let’s do that again!”

“A gravitational anomaly.” Stanford answered F. “And a mild one, it seems.”

“Well, do we need to check the equations again? Is there a fault with the generators? I don’t –“

“That’s supposed to happen.” Bill called out cheerfully, picking himself up off the floor, and turning his chair upright, sitting on it and crossing his legs. “That’s supposed to happen, so don’t worry at all. That means it’s working.”

Fiddleford took off his sunglasses, looking between Bill and Stanford, confused. He blinked at Stanford in askance.

“I guess we’re on the right track then.” Ford shrugged, willing to take Bill at his word.

“You don’t know?” Fiddleford sounded exasperated, gesturing at Ford with frustration. “It’s your portal.”

“I know it’s my portal.” Ford said, feigning offence. “I said we’re on the right track, so we’re on the right track. Gravitational anomalies were expected, you knew this. It was in the paperwork.”
“Well, ain’t there some way of controllin’ it, or knowing when the anomalies are due to occur? You can’t just be lettin’ gravity go sideways whenever it wants, we’ve gotta be on top of this.”

“Float a little more, and you could be.” Bill pointed out cheerily, before sucking the last of his cocktail through his silly straw, rattling the ice cubes around at the bottom of the glass noisily.

“We’ll go back to the drawing board then. Maybe compile a sensor of sorts, or an anomaly predictor, so if we can’t control it we can at least be prepared for it.” Ford decided, rubbing his chin as he thought. “Though I’m not eager for any more delays.”

“Well, I ain’t eager to see this whole thing blow up in our faces. We have to take every precaution possible with this sort of technology, before unleashing it on the world.” F warned, walking up to the power cords for the generator and disconnecting them. “I don’t care how many delays it takes, I ain’t lettin’ this thing turn on without quadruple checking every equation at least another ten times. I wouldn’t want to be the man who was too busy to fact check a machine that runs on nuclear energy and can rip a hole between worlds.”

“You make a valid point.” Ford frowned. “That’s not the kind of mark I want to make on history.”

“Well.” Fiddleford wound the power cords away, packing them up and dusting his hands off. “Back to the drawing board then. I’m gonna go look over the printouts for the last readings.”

“I’ll be right there.” Ford sighed, setting his hands on his hips, looking over the lab again, mentally calculating how he could potentially monitor the anomalies. Possibilities and ideas bounced around his mind, until he succumbed to distraction, drawn to the sound of Bill sucking at the ice cubes in his glass with the straw.

Ford walked over to his muse’s seat, and stood in front of him, looking down at the god.

“How did we do?”

Bill sucked the last drop of liquid from his drink, watching the droplet whirl all the way up the silly straw until he tasted it on his lips, sighing happily at the taste. He looked up at Sixer, and put his finger on the arm of his sunglasses, waggling them up and down on his nose.

“How do you think you did, genius?”

“Well, judging from your enthusiasm, I’d say we did rather well.” Ford presumed, reaching down to slide the sunglasses off Bill’s face, folding them up and putting them in his trench coat pocket. “We’ll have to run a few more equations before we do it again though. I have some ideas for a gravitational sensor we could incorporate into my watch.”

“Smart watch for a smart guy.” Bill cheered his empty drink at Ford, before banishing it to the kitchen with a wave of his hand.

“I just wish we didn’t have so many delays.” Ford looked down as the muse snagged his six fingered hands, pulling him closer by virtue of the wheeled chair. Oddly enough, Bill didn’t seem phased by the delays, unlike Ford, who found them quite limiting.

“We’re still on track.” Bill swung their conjoined hands idly, before pulling Stanford’s hand up to rest against his face. “What’s your hurry?”

“It’s just – with every delay that leads us off schedule I just feel like I’m disappointing you, disappointing myself.” Ford confessed his frustration, stroking Bill’s cheekbone with his thumb. “I feel like my destiny is so close, but still so far out of reach.”
“You put so much stock in destiny. Can’t you just enjoy this?” Bill questioned, nuzzling against Stanford’s hand. “Enjoy this time together?”

“I am enjoying this time together.” Ford replied. “I would continue to enjoy it much more once we take that next step, traversing the galaxy together. We’re on the threshold of exploration, adventure, and it’s not coming fast enough.”

“Time is cruel.” Bill stated, sounding somewhat bitter. “It’s never on your side. And before you know it, it’s all gone too soon, and you’re going to miss this.”

Ford blinked at Bill. “Miss testing the portal?”

Bill gave Stanford an unimpressed look, before spinning his chair around and scooting it away. “Nevermind.”

“Miss what?” Ford called after Bill, watching the muse’s comical retreat on the wheely chair.

“Forget it Sixer.” Bill yelled over his shoulder, ditching the wheely chair and walking over to the elevator, pressing the call button. “Go play with your smart watch.”

Ford followed Bill into the observation room just in time to see him ascend the escalator, doors closing behind the muse with finality. Ford stood, puzzled, in the room, staring at the elevator doors, as Fiddleford read through the print outs from the analytics machine.

“Miss what?” Ford repeated, sounding lost.

Fiddleford looked up at his friend, shrugging unhelpfully, before returning to his calculations.

Bill had been disobligingly evasive.

Ford wouldn’t have minded having his muse linger in the lab while he tinkered with the sensors he implanted in his watch, providing insight here and there. Ford would have even taken Bill’s penchant for distracting him in stride, but the muse didn’t return downstairs, and Ford noticed Bill’s absence keenly.

At dinnertime, the muse had been uncharacteristically quiet, barely speaking to Stanford, eating his food in sullen silence. Ford had attempted to draw Bill into conversation multiple times throughout the meal, talking about the modifications he’d made to his watch, the various functionalities, how he’d even connected the watch with the various security protocols he’d installed throughout the house.

Every comment he made was met with a noncommittal hum from the muse, which left Stanford acutely frustrated.

Watching the way Bill’s yellow eyes slid away from him, looking out the window while he chewed his meal, resting his cheek on his hand, Stanford felt very rudely ignored, and he didn’t like that.

It was clear Bill had something on his mind, but Bill’s regard was a gift that Stanford had won, for all these months the muse had been living here, Stanford felt he earned Bill’s regard. It should be his. For the muse to revoke it so suddenly, without any warning, well, let’s just say Stanford wasn’t going to put up with it.

But how to broach the subject.

Fiddleford sat awkwardly between Bill and Stanford at the end of the small kitchen table, eyes flitting between the two men, recognizing the tension building.

At one point, Ford had attempted to ‘ignore’ Bill, passive aggressively drawing Fiddleford into very loud conversation about what anomalous really meant, scientifically speaking, baiting Bill, but the muse remained uninterested and unfazed, looking out the window into the dark night outside.

Fiddleford was sensing some sort of lovers spat between them, and felt increasingly awkward, playing the buffer for Stanford’s sake. That wasn’t a role he enjoyed, and as far as Fiddleford was concerned, a third wheel only worked for tricycles. He wasn’t keen to stick around and be a crutch for Stanford’s socially awkward attempts to break the tension.

Clearing his throat, Fiddleford stood up, taking his empty plate away from the table. “I might head into town a little this evenin’.”

“Oh?” Ford questioned his friend, his eyes still stuck stubbornly, staring at Bill, who continued to ignore him. “What for?”

“I got signed up for a little community gathering,” Fiddleford answered, putting his plate in the sink, carefully constructing his lie. “Last time I went to the Natural History Museum. Like a book club, sort of. Figured it couldn’t hurt to socialise a bit, rather than obsess over the portal twenty-four seven. I’ve been drinkin’ coffee like a fish drinks water, going through these equations. I could use a break.”

Ford squinted at Bill, expecting the muse to have something to say about Fiddleford’s lack of commitment at least, but Bill just blinked, and continued to gaze out into the forest.

“What book are you reading?” Ford finally tore his gaze away from his recalcitrant muse to look at Fiddleford.

“Oh, uh.” F scratched the back of his head awkwardly. “It’s the first meeting, so I’ll find out there I guess.”

“I can’t imagine it’ll be anything too enthralling,” Ford pondered, scratching his chin. “At least in terms of history, considering this town has nothing but mining and lumber in its historical record.”

“I’m willin’ to bet I’ll find it interesting.” Fiddleford replied obliquely. “Can’t be writin’ off what you haven’t read yet, after all.”

“I suppose that did sound rather callous of me.” Ford realised, then shrugged. “Oh, well. Have fun then. Let me know if you find anything interesting.”

“Will do.” Fiddleford said, sounding relieved that Stanford bought his alibi. Leaving his plate by the sink, he gestured to the door. “Will you be alright to finish the dishes? I gotta head on out.”

“That’s fine – I’ll –” Stanford got up to bring his own plate over to the sink, but froze when Bill stood up out of his chair, the wood noisily dragging across the floorboards. The muse left his plate on the table, turning around swiftly and departed, his heavy footfalls sounding all the way up the stairs.
Ford watched his muse leave with a concerted expression twisting his brow.

Fiddleford patted his hands against his trousers absently, and gave a low whistle.

“Good luck with that.”

Ford sighed, and gave F a flat look.

“I’d almost ask if I could come with you, but I have a feeling I’ll need to deal with this, when he’s ready to talk.” Ford said, rolling his eyes, gesturing to the ceiling with his thumb.

“What got him so cranky?” Fiddleford questioned curiously, shoving his hands in his pockets. “The silent treatment don’t seem like his style. When Pat did that to me once, it took weeks to get through to her. Unbearable stuff.”

“Unbearable.” Ford repeated, his shoulders slumping, hoping this avoidance wouldn’t last weeks. He couldn’t stand if it did.

“What did you do?” Fiddleford asked.

Ford looked up to the ceiling and despaired, answering his friend gloomily.

“I don’t know.”

When Stanford finished cleaning up after dinner, giving Bill a little time to cool down, he finally ventured up the stairs, knocking tentatively on the door to Bill’s room.

Bill didn’t answer.

Ford found himself almost obliquely insulted by the muse’s silence.

As far as he could tell - and he’d been wracking his brain, thinking in circles, trying to pinpoint whatever affront he made to the god this time – he hadn’t done anything particularly inflammatory or reprehensible. He’d certainly done nothing to warrant this degree of cold shoulder.

Huffing out a frustrated breath, Ford steeled himself, and turned the doorknob, opening the door to Bill’s room, letting himself in, invite or no.

“Bill, I –“ Ford looked into the room as the door swung open, and found it empty.

Just a messy chaotic space filled with cushions, blankets, candles and prisms. No Bill.

Ford exhaled his aggravation, his shoulders slumping.

Shaking his head, Ford closed the door to Bill’s room, and leant back against the wood, running his hands through his hair tersely.

Stanford was no expert at this relationship business, but he never thought he’d hit a wall like this so soon, not when everything had been going so well lately.
He just didn’t understand it, at first it had seemed like Bill had been going crazy missing him while he was down in the lab, calling him up every other day just to annoy him in that charming way of his. Now that he was home again, making progress on the portal, and doing everything that was expected of him, Bill had been flaring hot and cold towards him, snarking at him like he usually did one second, and avoiding him like the plague the next.

Ford couldn’t make sense of it. He didn’t know what he was doing wrong.

He just wanted to talk to the god.

For them to speak, and joke, and parry banter back and forth like they normally did. To share the affection they dabbled in, deepen it maybe, now that they seemed to be heading in that direction. Ford just wanted to be with him, to connect, and not be shut out like this. Shut out with barely a word of explanation.

Stanford just wanted to know what he’d done wrong, if he could fix it?

Was that so much to ask?

Sighing, exasperated, Ford brushed his hair back from his face, then rubbed his eyes, feeling incredibly tired of it all. Tired of feeling like this.

Pushing away from the door, Ford crossed the corridor, deciding to retire to his own bedroom, since his venture in reconciliation had gone so poorly.

Bill could come to him if he had a problem with him, Stanford was over taking responsibility for Bill’s swinging moods.

He turned the handle, and opened the door, gawking dumbly at the very same creature he’d worked himself up so much looking for.

Bill was here.

He seemed to be pacing, waiting for Stanford in his bedroom, biting his fingernails fretfully.

Clearly Stanford wasn’t the only one feeling the pressure, overthinking things.

Bill swung around to face the scientist as he stepped through the door.

“What are you doing?” Ford asked, closing the door behind him.

“I –” Bill fumbled for his words for a moment there. He seemed to be rather stressed, biting his thumbnail as he looked for whatever it was he had been planning to say.

Ford waited over by the door, attempting to exude patience and restraint.

Really, he wanted to cross the room and be over there, with the muse, maybe shake him by the shoulders some. But considering Bill had been ignoring him cruelly all day, if an apology was coming, Ford felt he should at least make Bill work for it before forgiving him.

Bill put his hands together, looking over at Ford with a serious expression that seemed out of place on his typically cheerful face.

“Listen Sixer, we need to talk.”
Ford sucked in a breath, feeling oddly winded by those fatal four words. He swallowed the anxiety that was building in his throat, an anxiety he didn’t think he’d ever suffer from.

We need to talk was truly a terrible sentence.

Ford watched Bill warily, feeling quite ill.

He’d been wanting to talk to the muse, but something about Bill’s serious expression felt like the beginning of the end. He’d heard stories from Stanley about ‘we need to talk’, stories from his university colleagues who didn’t apply themselves solely to study like Ford had. He never thought he’d be facing those ominous words himself, he never thought he’d care enough about any romantic entanglement to let it affect him.

“I’m listening.” Ford managed. He still stood on the opposite side of the room from Bill, his body language guarded, waiting for the rhetorical blow Stanford could only assume was coming.

Bill tented his fingers, pressing his palms together, and let his fingertips rest in front of his mouth for a moment. He looked at the floor, worrying his bottom lip with his fingertips, before his yellow eyes shot to Stanford, pinning him to the spot.

“I want to know –” Bill started, eyes locked with the human. “If – if you’ve thought about what happens after we open the portal.”

“After we open the portal?” Ford repeated, not expecting the question. That feeling of dread hadn’t quite left him yet, he was still waiting for the floor to come out from under him, proverbially speaking.

“I know you must have plans, goals.” Bill said slowly, pointing at Stanford with his tented hands as he spoke. “Things you’ve been wanting to do. You seem to have a pretty firm idea about your destiny, what you think it is, and I just wanted to know –”

Ford felt a lump form in his throat, and swallowed, suddenly having a lot more saliva than he was used to.

“Yes?” He croaked, worried.

Bill seemed to hesitate on his question, before he clapped his hands together like an executive at a board meeting, pointing them at Stanford again. “Where do I fit in? As far as you see it?”

“Oh.” Stanford felt relief flip in his stomach, though he wasn’t out of dangerous social waters yet. He tentatively crossed the room, keeping his hands behind his back, wringing them together.

“Do you want to sit maybe?” Ford gestured to the bed.

With stiff movements, Bill backed up to sit on the bed, and Stanford sat beside him, facing him, about a foot of space between them. Bill was sitting up straight, his hands still laced together, looking professional and detached, businesslike. Stanford wished he’d warm up a little, this whole encounter still felt chilly and foreboding.

Reaching across, Ford placed his hand on Bill’s foot rather awkwardly, and attempted to answer.

“Where I see us? Ideally, I’d like to see us … together? It’s gotten to the point now where I can’t imagine traversing these new dimensions without you by my side. If you’d like to that is. We could … go on doing what we’ve been doing, and as we change the world, hopefully the world would look to us both for leadership and enlightenment. I’d like that.”
“So, you’d want me to be your assistant?” Bill questioned, raising his eyebrows at Ford.

“To be my partner.” Ford corrected. “Equal partners.”

“And you’d expect me to look like this?” Bill clarified, gesturing to himself.

At first Ford thought Bill was commenting on his pyjamas, but he gradually realised that Bill meant the body Ford had crafted for him.

“I –” Ford looked for the right words. “I feel it might be best to ease into things slowly, and there are benefits to maintaining this form, in a social sense. We’d be changing the world, very much in the limelight, and I feel like perhaps world leaders would take us more seriously… if you were to remain in this vessel.”

“Sixer, nobody is going to take me seriously in this vessel.” Bill said bluntly. “No offence to you, I’m sure you worked very hard on this, going behind my back, making this body and forcing me into it against my will. It’s very sweet for a slap in the face, but it’s not me.”

Ford opened his mouth to reply, but the words didn’t quite come out right, so he closed his mouth, and watched Bill.

The muse narrowed his eyes at Ford suspiciously. “Don’t tell me you’ve already forgotten what I actually look like.”

“I haven’t forgotten.” Ford hurried to answer.

“Do you like me better like this? Because if so, I have to question your taste, I mean really Sixer –“

“I don’t –” Ford held his hand up, halting that train of thought. “Look, obviously this has been on your mind for a while, and I can understand why. No one wants to be judged for their outward appearance, I can understand that.”

“Having more digits than the acceptable norm isn’t a universal empathy card, Sixer.” Bill crossed his arms, frowning. “You can’t even begin to fathom what’s on my mind right now.”

“You’re probably uncertain.” Ford powered on, trying to prove Bill wrong. “And insecure. About the future, about how you’re perceived, about … about how I feel about you.”

“That’s not –“ Bill winced, his expression conflicted now.

“You want to know what will happen after we finish the portal. You want to know – you’re probably wondering what will change. You might be wondering about our dynamic – if I’ll still need your advice when we no longer have a project to work on.” Ford swallowed the heaviness from his throat and forced himself to continue, straining himself to empathize with the muse, and really put himself out there. “You’re probably wondering if all this hard work will be worth it, if it will be worth it for you, sticking it out with me here. You’ll be wondering about your place in it all, if I’ll still need you once I realise my destiny.”

Bill hadn’t even considered that Sixer would be thinking like this, he hadn’t even conceptualised a future where Sixer wouldn’t need him in some shape or form, and he chewed on his bottom lip, suddenly concerned about that factor.

This was supposed to be a simple, businesslike discussion about discarding this vessel.

Bill hadn’t anticipated Sixer’s interest in him waning so suddenly.
“You – you’re probably wondering if I like you for you, if making this form for you tells more about how I want you to be than how I see you. You’re probably nervous.” Ford swallowed again, noticing the unblinking stare he was garnering right now, Bill’s intensity tangible in the air. Perhaps his theories weren’t so far off the mark, and that realisation saddened Ford, yet he forced himself to continue developing the hypothetical. “You might even resent me, for bringing you here. For becoming so close to you when you’re suspecting that – when all is said and done – I might be leaving soon to strike it out on my own, explore these new adventures. You’re worried that you’ll remain, trapped here, in a skin that’s not your own, discarded and lonely.”

“You wouldn’t.” Bill said, his voice low and thick with emotion, yellow eyes shining with more than just a glow now, a mixture of dread, hope, and venom, all but glaring at Ford for even suggesting leaving him.

Ford rubbed his thumb along Bill’s socked foot and met his gaze sincerely. “I wouldn’t.”

Bill swallowed the anxiety that bubbled insidiously in this ruthlessly sensitive form, emotions forcing hormonal responses through this body, rather than existing in the abstract, like they would were he not trapped in a human skin.

Sixer was jerking his responses around quite a bit today.

This conversation was meant to be about unbinding more bricks, about broaching topics of cosmic relevance to Sixer, and instead Sixer was playing this body’s emotional responses like a harmonica. Ford wasn’t supposed to affect him like this. He was supposed to remain just a pawn, a piece on the board Bill could manipulate at will. Bill wondered when, along the way, Sixer had developed this much power over him. He could checkmate the king with only words. It was a jarring realisation.

“I’ve been avoiding this.” Ford chuckled, and continued to rub Bill’s foot idly. “Though at this point I’m beginning to realise it’s necessary, putting myself out here in this way. Ambition isn’t something to be contested with, and I’m realising that when you want something, really want something, you have to be honest about it, most of all with yourself.”

This still sounded plenty foreboding to Bill, and he felt like he was swinging on the cusp of losing Sixer, the human having decided that exploring his own destiny was more important than being with Bill. Had Bill been lax in his attention lately, would this have played out differently if he’d dabbled in Sixer’s dreams more, been a more attentive partner, engaged physically more, reciprocated?

Bill felt like Sixer was water, and he was slipping through the god’s fingers by the second.

Bill wondered when he decided that losing Sixer was unacceptable.

He’d been toying with the idea of keeping the human for a while now, but with their deadline approaching, Bill had to consider the upcoming reality of the situation. He’d been deliberating if this was worth it, if Sixer was worth keeping, and if he could keep the human, time, space, and circumstance be damned.

He’d just about made his mind up this afternoon, so of course Sixer had to pull this shit on him now.

Bill wondered what the human had been avoiding, and hoped that it wasn’t some well-intentioned break up so Sixer could go off chasing his dreams, his ambition. He was supposed to realise that his dreams were right in front of him, all ambitions realised in the palm of Bill’s hand, and be thankful for that, not string Bill along with his ambiguous speech about empathy and pursuing his goals.

Ford was frustrating, awful, selfish and arrogant, and still Bill didn’t want to lose him.

Reaching forward, Bill grabbed onto Sixer’s arm, leaning into the scientist’s space, watching him with a serious gaze, a desperate longing for what he didn’t want to miss playing in its depths.

“Sixer.” Bill pleaded, hoping that it would be enough that he wouldn’t lose the scientist, that he could salvage this situation.

Ford rested his free hand over Bill’s, squeezing his hand gently. He inhaled a steadying breath, and succumbed to his emotions, making the leap of vulnerability that was required for such things. He’d been stubborn, and elusive, but that time was over.

“I want you.”

Bill blinked at Ford for a moment, before he exhaled a gust of relief, slumping forward to rest his forehead on Sixer’s arm, laughing quietly to himself.

“What?” Ford asked, tilting his head down to look at the muse, his lips brushing against Bill’s hair.

“What’s so funny?”

“You’re the worst.” Bill looked up at Ford, and couldn’t help but smile at the scientist fondly.

“The absolute worst. Drag it out, why don’t you.”

“I was trying to properly articulate the moment.” Ford chuckled, relieved to see his muse warming up to him again. “What did you think I was going to say?”

“Put the thumbscrews away Sixer, we’re talking about you.” Bill joked, and scooted across the bed, warming up somewhat, sitting closer to Ford now, trailing his fingertips along the creases in Ford’s shirt.

“I thought we were talking about you?” Ford countered, watching his muse poke at his shirt.

Bill pulled a face, seeming displeased, continuing to trace patterns on Ford’s chest through his shirt.

“Is there a reason you were so quiet today?” Ford pressed, watching his muse with a frown. “You didn’t seem like yourself.”

“There are more sides to me than you’d expect, pun intended.” Bill shrugged. “You haven’t seen them all.”

“So tell me more about this silent, reserved, Bill Cipher. I can’t imagine many people have seen him.” Ford murmured, angling his head closer to Bill, watching the expressions shift on his face.

“None who’ve lived to tell the tale.” Bill replied with a self-deprecating smirk, before shaking his head. “Don’t dwell on it, Sixer. It had nothing to do with you.”

“What did it have to do with?” Ford questioned, reaching up to brush Bill’s hair behind his ear gently.

“My beef with time, let’s just say.” Bill replied, sounding bitter for the moment. “Circumstances, and consequences, and other c words. Nothing you’d understand.”
“So help me understand.” Ford urged.

Bill wrinkled his nose, making another peculiar face, and said nothing, playing with Ford’s sleeve.

“I can imagine, having lived as long as you have, things like this seem quite ephemeral.” Ford hazarded a guess, and saw the way Bill’s brow furrowed at that, having hit the nail on the head.

It had never truly occurred to Ford before, but living with an immortal cosmic being suddenly made him acutely aware of his own mortality, and he wondered if this was what had Bill feeling so down. It was certainly a sobering thought, that Ford might live a lifetime benefitting from Bill’s presence, from his enlightenment, but his lifespan would be but a blip in the long run to Bill, barely a blink of an eye.

“You’re trying to savour things while they last.” Ford realised, and cupped Bill’s face with his six-fingered hand, rubbing his cheekbone with his thumb. “And I’ve been so preoccupied with completing the portal that I haven’t been doing the same.”

“This is the problem with developing attachments.” Bill muttered, staring at Ford’s face morosely, taking in every detail of the scientist. “Time never lets me have what I want.”

Ford pressed his forehead against Bill’s gently, and inhaled his presence, feeling reconnected with the god once more, after being bereft of that connection all day.

It felt like Ford could breathe easy again.

“Well, I want you. For as long as I can, for as long as you’ll have me. Time be damned.” Ford murmured, his glasses bumping against Bill’s nose, feeling the warmth of the muse’s skin against his. Bill’s lips twitched at ‘time be damned’, a small smile peeking through.

Ford stroked Bill’s cheek, asking. “And what do you want?”

Bill seemed to sigh as well, whatever struggle he’d been wrestling with falling away from him with their proximity. He stared at Sixer, his lips twisting with indecision, before throwing caution into the wind, so to speak, committing himself to his answer, meaning it.

He reached up to rest his hand against Ford’s cheek, and whispered against Ford’s lips.

“You.”

Kissing Bill was a relief.

It was the reconciliation that Ford had been itching for, not knowing how else to stem this irritation that came with being parted.

It wasn’t dependency, per se, but Ford was coming to realise that Bill’s presence was contributing to the spring in his step, these last several months. His muse was the balm his ailing ego required, the blood his hardened heart needed to pump freely again after a lifetime of slights and hurts.

Ford never thought he’d find someone interesting enough to want this closeness, but Bill had always held Ford’s interest, without even trying. He couldn’t imagine going for weeks without this intimacy, this comfort in simply existing alongside his muse, sharing the space. They fit too well together.

Judging from the way his muse kissed back, Ford had a feeling that Bill couldn’t imagine that distance either, and maybe, just maybe, Ford’s presence helped soothe Bill’s hurts too.
The kiss deepened, Ford grasping Bill’s neck, his waist, pulling him closer. Bill straddled Ford’s hips, and ground down, gripping the scientist’s hair with one hand, twisting Ford’s shirtfront in his other fist, drinking him in.

Ford gasped, breathing more into Bill’s mouth than anywhere else, his glasses skewing on the bridge of his nose as the kiss went on.

Bill was unrelenting. His tongue probed Sixer’s mouth, mapping every tooth and tastebud, his hands roved possessively over every inch of Ford he could reach, pulling them closer every instant. Ford assumed he was savouring the moment, as he seemed to want to map every inch of Ford with his hands.

Bill mashed his chest against Ford, pressing them closer together like he wanted to dive into Ford’s skin, like he wanted to meld the two of them together.

Ford was almost surprised by the extent of Bill’s passion, of his reciprocation. Often Ford found the muse was content to simply lay back and be pampered, but this kiss felt different, it felt far more desperate.

Bill was intent to own Stanford, and it was a possessive reality Ford felt in every movement.

The muse was scared to lose him.

Ford broke away from the kiss to gulp in a breath of air, but Bill barely let up, pressing kisses to Stanford’s face, gripping his jaw and dragging him back in. Ford moaned, and raked his nails up Bill’s back, savouring every shaky breath he inhaled from the other man.

Ford felt lightheaded, barely dragging in enough oxygen to continue. He tried to push away from Bill to reorient his breathing for a moment, but Bill didn’t let him, sealing his mouth over the scientist’s, sucking the air from his lungs.

Bill gripped Ford’s jaw with one hand, and reached up to pinch the scientist’s nose, blocking off his airways.

Ford blinked, almost disbelieving that Bill would do this, could do this.

Block his airways.

He spluttered for a moment, panicking, feeling something drag up his lungs, an oppressive foreign feeling. It was almost as if his lungs were deflating, like Bill was sucking the oxygen right out of him forcefully, and he felt his breathing thin dangerously.

He blinked his eyes open, dizzily taking in the determined expression on Bill’s face, the way he seemed to glow gold all over, his eyes closed, concentrating.

Ford felt his vision blur, asphyxiating fast, before he felt the tickling taste of ozone invade his throat, Bill’s fire pouring unpleasantly into his lungs, the muse exhaling. The fire felt cold, and hot all at once, an unearthly chill. He weakly attempted to push Bill away again, but his muse’s grip was uncannily strong, forcing more of that cosmic flame down his throat.

The heat was unbearable, coursing through Ford’s chest. It was painful, a physically painful sensation. Ford felt something twist in his lungs, and it was agony. It hurt, and he wanted it to stop.

Ford gathered his strength and pushed Bill’s shoulders, trying to swat his hands away from his face. Bill gripped harder, not willing to be budged.
Ford’s eyes watered, and he blinked them open, willing to do anything to evade this sudden pain. His hand flew out, fisted instinctively, and he socked Bill in the jaw, jarring the muse away from him.

Ford coughed, spluttering residual fire from his throat, tasting burnt matches and licked batteries on his tongue. His face was red, and his eyes were bloodshot from the shock of it all. He gasped and heaved in breath after breath, holding a hand over his chest, blinking tears out of his eyes.

Bill held his hand over his bruising jaw, and watched Ford acclimate.

Panting, finally recovered enough to manage speech, Ford yelled harshly at the muse.

“What the hell did you do to me?”

“Breathe Sixer.” Bill said, watching Ford calmly, his jaw tingling as the bruise healed swiftly. “Just breathe.”

“What – what –” Ford sucked in air, starved for it, just shy of hyperventilating. He watched Bill, noting that the muse was holding his jaw. “I punched you.”

“Got me good too.” Bill noted, smirking at Sixer.

“I’m sorry, I –“ Ford began apologising before he knew what he was doing. Stopping himself and glaring at Bill, Ford’s ire stirred up again promptly. “What did you do to me?”

“Just breathe.” Bill insisted, watching Ford’s emotions flit across his face.

Ford tried his best to level his breathing, and wiped his cheeks with the back of his hand, rubbing his chest, the pain gone now, the phantom shock of it all haunting Ford. His mouth hung open as he squinted at his muse, confusion setting in.

“Feel better?” Bill asked.

“What – “ Ford huffed, realising that whatever painful sensation overcame him in that instant, it had passed. The harm was done, or finished, at least. Ford just couldn’t comprehend the why. Why his muse would hurt him, or how he could, given the runes tattooed on his skin.

Bill continued to list gases, ticking them off on his fingers, and Ford gawked at the god, realisation setting in, bowling him over in an instant.

“Sulphurs and sulphuric atmospheres, you can gulp down Nickel Tetracarbonyl, Hydrogen Cyanide, Phosgene, Phosphine, Dichlorosilane, Bromomethane.”

Ford felt the air flow through his lungs, feeling a slight, but nearly unnoticeable difference, and patted his chest, astonished. He almost didn’t believe it was possible, that it had just happened, but knowing his muse, it was more than likely that he made the impossible possible for Ford.

“Tellurium Hexafluoride, Nitrogen Dioxide, Germane.”

“Do you mean I can breathe in space?” Ford blurted out abruptly, adjusting his glasses to sit right on his nose.
Bill’s eyes shone, and he smiled indulgently at Ford, simmering approval at the scientist.

“You’re welcome.”

An incredulous laugh slipped from Ford’s lips, and he rubbed his chest, looking down at himself, then back over to Bill.

“How did—” Ford puzzled. “Well, regardless, I’d be more inclined to thank you for the alteration if you’d thought to ask before inflicting it on me.”

“Did you ask before yanking me through the cosmos and inflicting this meat suit on me? No.” Bill said, his smile rigid, and his words curt. “But I figure now we’re even.”

“If we’re even, does that mean you’ll stop holding that over my head all the time?” Ford questioned, having been guilied for the summoning enough.

Bill shrugged, but was smiling at Ford, genuinely now. Like he was impressed.

Ford raised his eyebrows at that, but optimistically took Bill’s smile for an answer.

He stretched his arms up over his head, twisting his torso left and right, easing into the feeling of knowing that he’d been physically altered by Bill’s cosmic powers, getting used to that fact.

“Here I thought you weren’t able to harm me.”

“Oh, stop whining. It’s not hurting now, is it?” Bill scoffed, and sat upright, rubbing his jaw as the last of the bruising disappeared, missing the tingle. “Besides, I did this to help you, not harm you. Don’t be such a baby.”

“How generous of you.” Ford replied sarcastically, before looking the muse up and down, a glimmer of regret gracing his features. “And I repay you by throwing a punch.”

Bill laughed, and lidded his eyes amorously, crawling across the bed to Ford. “Those boxing lessons really paid off.”

“Please tell me you’re just saying that.” Ford said, leaning away from the muse as he clambered back onto Ford’s lap.

“I mean it.” Bill purred, looping his arms around Sixer’s neck. “A quality investment.”

“You know, I can’t tell if you’re being serious here.” Ford said, mystified by his muse. “I feel like I should be worried if you are, if not for you, then for my reputation at least.”

Bill laughed, and stroked the side of Ford’s face adoringly. “Feel like stepping into the ring, going another round?”

The muse was already leaning in, hungry for Sixer’s kisses, but Ford held his hand up between their mouths, halting him.

“How can I trust that you won’t do something like that to me again? I imagine I won’t enjoy kissing you if I have to worry constantly about you rearranging my internal organs.”

“But isn’t that romantic?” Bill thrilled, teasing Sixer.

“I’d say ‘on what planet’ but we both know that almanac is far too specific sometimes.” Ford said lightly, amused by his cosmic paramour. Bill continued to lean in for a kiss, but Ford felt the need to firmly state his boundaries. “I mean it, I need to know you won’t do something like that again.”

“You think you’re getting a freebie like that all the time?” Bill scoffed, and ran his fingers through Ford’s hair, tempting him. “Please Sixer. You’re not that special.”

“Promise me.” Ford insisted. “Promise me you’ll ask first, at least. I need your word.”

“Good.” Ford nodded, and brought his hand away from his mouth, allowing the muse’s affection. Bill nuzzled in to press a sweet kiss to Ford’s mouth, teasing him, before murmuring. “And if I don’t ask first, you can just punch me again.”

Ford broke the kiss and narrowed his eyes at Bill sceptically.

Bill’s eyes shone gleefully, and bounced once in Sixer’s lap, grinning.

“Why do I get the feeling you’d enjoy that?” Ford said slyly, watching Bill bat his eyelashes at him.

“Well, you’re giving me such a very specific incentive.” Bill purred, unbuttoning Ford’s shirt with quick clever fingers.

“How do I de-incentivise that?” Ford said wryly, letting the muse disrobe him, shrugging the shirt off his shoulders.

“You’ll have to get creative.” Bill replied flirtatiously, fingers now flicking open Ford’s belt buckle, pulling the leather strap from Ford’s trousers.

Ford grabbed Bill’s wrist, stopping him, before pulling the belt the rest of the way out himself, folding it in half. “I’ll have to give you a different incentive. For good behaviour.”

“Are you going to rearrange my internal organs?” Bill asked cheekily.

Ford gave Bill a flat look, before pushing him off his lap. “Take your clothes off. And turn around.”

Bill almost laughed at that, that Sixer had the gall to dish out orders so confidently, but something about the human’s expression promised something that Bill was 90 percent sure that he wanted. Instead he bit his bottom lip, and complied.

Naked and vulnerable, kneeling on the bed facing the wall, Bill turned to look over his shoulder briefly.

Ford turned Bill’s chin back around to face the wall. “No peeking. You surprised me with your little stunt earlier, I’m returning the favour.”

“Putting me in the naughty corner doesn’t feel like much of a favour. To me, anyway.” Bill remarked, staring impatiently at the wall.

Ford rubbed Bill’s shoulders soothingly, and pressed a kiss to the back of Bill’s neck, leaning in to whisper in the muse’s ear. “You might need those cuffs of yours.”

Bill blinked, hearing the promise in Ford’s tone, and sucked in an excited breath, summoning the cuffs from the Quadrangle, fastening them onto his wrists and mentally yelling at Keyhole to man the apparatus.

The instant the cuffs glowed blue and shrunk to fit his wrists, Bill felt Ford’s hand in the middle of his back, pushing him against the wall. Bill’s hands shot out to steady himself, and Sixer rubbed his shoulder, repositioning him until he was braced against the wall, kneeling on the mattress.

The bed shifted as Ford stepped off the mattress, before returning, kneeling behind the muse once more. Bill tried to look over his shoulder again, but Sixer’s hand caught his chin and turned him back to face the corner.

“Oh.” Ford murmured, his breath tickling Bill’s earlobe. “And one last thing.”

A soft strip of fabric, one of Stanford’s scarves, dangled in front of Bill’s face, and with careful movements, Ford fastened the scarf around Bill’s eyes, blindfolding him.

Instantly the muse’s shoulders seized up, and he reached around for Sixer, patting the air for him frantically.

“Sixer.”

Ford tightened the blindfold again, tugging the fabric to check it, and rested his hands on Bill’s shoulders.

“So you aren’t tempted to peek.”

“When I said, get creative, I didn’t mean I’d let you blind me.” Bill said nervously, reaching up to take off the blindfold.

Ford caught his hand, and moved it away. “Uh uh uh. No touching the blindfold. This is about trust.”

Bill’s hands clenched and unclenched into fists, his shoulders shivering slightly. He seemed decidedly uncomfortable with this little ‘trust exercise’.

“Just relax.” Ford said, and pressed a kiss to Bill’s shoulder.

“Easy for you to say.” Bill trembled, struggling to resist the urge to rip the blindfold off then and there.

“Here.” Ford grabbed Bill’s wrists, pressing a kiss to the pulse point before bracing them against the wall once more. Stanford’s sweetness was endearing, and it was clear there was worship in the gesture, but Bill wasn’t in the habit of extending trust to anyone, and he wasn’t in control of this situation.

Bill fumed for a while, his fingers twitching against the wall, itching to rip the blindfold off.

Stanford watched the muse’s lips wriggle with various shades of distrust, derision and disgust at the thought of being wilfully blinded by the scientist. Bill’s shoulders were stiff and bunched up defensively, and he seemed on edge in a way that really tickled Ford’s fancy.

Smirking smugly, Ford reached forward and smoothed his fingers along the strong line of Bill’s jaw, watching his muse freeze, his pulse racing hot beneath Ford’s fingers. Ford kept his movements gentle, decisive, but regardless of his intentions, Bill seemed to be wracked with tension, waiting for something disastrous.
Ford traced down along Bill’s throat, feeling his Adams apple bob as the muse swallowed nervously, and let his hand rest above Bill’s heart, delighting in the way he was wreaking havoc on Bill’s heart rate.

“See, this isn’t so bad.”

Kneeling behind him, the fabric of Ford’s trousers brushing against Bill’s bare skin, Ford pressed several warm kisses to Bill’s neck, smooching along his shoulders.

Bill made a conflicted sound, and rolled his head back, arching his neck for Ford’s kisses.

Murmuring into Bill’s skin, Ford remarked, pressing his lips onto Bill’s vulnerable throat. “It’s nice to see you trusting me.”

Bill was almost grateful for the blindfold then, for shielding his expressions from the scientist. He was sure Sixer wouldn’t appreciate him rolling his eyes right now. Sure, trust, that’s what was getting Sixer off.

Ford trailed more kisses along Bill’s jaw, savouring his time with the muse. Cupping Bill’s face, turning him gently in his direction, Ford extended a little generosity.

“Now, we can do anything you like right now, but the blindfold is staying on.” He noted Bill’s little frown, surprised that the muse didn’t jump on Ford’s phrasing, running rampant with a free pass. Ford thought that wording would sweeten the deal, help Bill relax, but he still seemed tense. “So what will it be?”

“I don’t like waiting in the dark like this.” Bill complained. “We could be doing anything else right now.”

“What will it take for you to put aside your suspicion and just enjoy this? Make an attempt at least, to trust me.” Ford beseeched the blindfolded god, wanting his trust to be reciprocal. If Bill could surprise him, and alter his physical DNA, Ford needed to be able to level the playing field.

Bill’s unease warred with his well-developed opportunistic streak, and he chewed on his bottom lip, deliberating whether naming a price would be worth tolerating time spent in the dark, control wrested from him as his vision was impaired deliberately by the gutsy human.

His agenda for this conversation had been derailed before, by an impulse decision and Ford’s damnable empathy, but he could regain the ground he’d lost, the price being that small modicum of trust Ford was begging him for.

Bill had never been wilfully blinded in all his life.

“Two bricks.” Bill suggested, giving into Sixer’s little power move. “And I’ll play along. Deal?”

“Two bricks it is.” Ford agreed, pressing a kiss to Bill’s lips to seal the deal. “You won’t regret this.”

Resigned to the fact, Bill kissed back, deciding that he may as well make the most of whatever creative torture Sixer had planned for him.

As Ford positioned Bill to face the wall once more, his hands roving across the muse’s body, sensation lighting up Bill’s nerve endings like a flashlight, Bill conceded privately to himself, that no matter how reluctantly that sentiment was given, Bill did trust Ford, and that was a lot more than he could say for anyone else.
That was quite a feat, winning Bill’s trust like this. This changed things.

Life before Sixer had taught Bill Cipher to never trust again.

But somehow, Sixer was always the exception to the rule.

He was special like that.

“Now, about that incentive.”

Bill heard the light clink of metal, and then the loud snap of leather clapping together, and he sat up a little straighter.

It sounded like Sixer found a use for his belt, and he was getting creative.

“Why do I get the feeling I’ll enjoy this?” Bill murmured, his lips twisting into a grin.

He felt Sixer’s breath on his neck, and the human pressed another one of those scorching kisses on his skin, before the low vibrations of Ford’s voice box sent thrills down Bill’s spine.

“Don’t worry.” Ford promised, sounding smug. “You will.”

“Now that I have you all gathered together, I have an announcement to make. I’ve decided… I’m keeping Sixer.”

“You’re WHAT?”

Kryptos’ eye bugged out spectacularly, astonished by the boss’s private announcement. He’d gathered his entire inner circle of henchmaniacs up to the penthouse for this? To announce he was keeping the human? Of all the things that human pawn was meant to be, permanent wasn’t one of those things.

Pyronica narrowed her eye at Kryptos, and put her hands on her hips, glaring at him. Bill floated beside her, his hands laced together behind his back as he divulged his plan to his inner circle of friends and henchmen.

“You heard me. I’m keeping him.” Bill said, unfazed by Kryptos’ loud reaction. “He’s freakish enough to fit in here, between those extra fingers and that big brain of his. Make a few adjustments here or there, and he could make a bang-up henchman. One of the team!”

“One of the –“ Kryptos spluttered indignantly. “He’s not even – he’s a human! How are you gonna swing making a human, a fragile, breakable human, into a henchmaniac? We – we have a reputation you know?”

Xanther guffawed, and Teeth clacked his dentures together, grinning.

“Yeah, a bad one.”

Whooping laugher followed, Bill’s inner circle as raucous as ever.
“Uh, question.” Keyhole put his hand up. “Is this just a general announcement, or are we putting it to a vote?”

“We voted in all the other initiates.” Amorphous Shape blinked, agreeing with Keyhole, looking to Bill curiously.

“How do we get to meet him?” Eight Ball asked, scratching his jaw.

“You’ll meet him soon enough.” Bill replied, materialising a cocktail from thin air, swirling it around.

“How does this mean we all get humans?” Teeth asked, raising his hand.

“I want my stipend of humanity too.” Paci-Fire put his hand up as well. “I believe we were promised a planet full of them.”

“I wanna eat some!” Teeth cackled, and clapped his hands together.

“How does this mean we don’t get to destroy the earth?” Keyhole queried, watching Bill expectantly.

Paci-Fire, Xanthar, Eight Ball and Teeth all booed Keyhole abruptly.

Bill waved his hands in the air. “People, please. You’ll still get your party on, I’m just picking one human from the fray and making him an ascended extra.”

“So, he isn’t a pet?” Paci-Fire frowned, confused.

“Shut up.” Teeth elbowed Paci-Fire in the stomach, and he spat out his dummy, scowling from both his mouths.

“You shut up, you gap toothed oaf!”

“Call me gap toothed one more time.”

Pyronica rolled her eyes, and leaned against the wall, crossing her arms. “Boys.”

“What do you mean ascended extra?” Kryptos asked, floating to the forefront of the group, raising his hand. “How ascended? Why does he get to ascend? What makes him so special?”

“You don’t need to know the why’s, just that he is.” Bill said, taking a sip from his drink. “And I expect you all to remember that.”

“Special how?” Paci-Fire grunted, putting his dummy back in his second mouth.

“Can he shoot lasers from his eyes?” Teeth chuckled, and waggled his fingers. “Or regrow his fingers back when you cut them off?”

“Is he special for a human, or special by our standards?” Eight Ball mumbled, rattling his chains as he continued to scratch his chin.

“Perhaps special refers to the diversity and cosmic relevance he brings to our group?” Amorphous Shape suggested calmly.

“How come he’s a diversity hire, but Keyhole’s sister isn’t?” Teeth elbowed Keyhole and snickered.
“Listen, she’s never gonna call you. She doesn’t like omnivorous mouths, you’re not her type.” Keyhole advised, pushing Teeth’s elbow away.

“I’m everyone’s type, bud.” Teeth ground his molars, scowling.

“I have questions!” Kryptos waved his hand in the air dramatically, before he began listing them off on his fingers. “First of all, I wanna know how all of a sudden, the human building our portal is suddenly part of the team. I wanna know why he gets preferential treatment, when I had to wait a full century as an initiate before I got to join the team for a mission and he gets to join the team straight away. I wanna know how he’s gonna hold his own, or if we’re gonna have to – to hold his hand all the way through this apocalypse, and I wanna know if he knows that by siding with us, he’s turning his back on his entire race doing so. OH, and I wanna know how he’s going to SURVIVE an apocalypse, because last I checked, humans don’t live very long!”

“So, he’s gonna be a henchmen for a week.” Teeth smirked. “A blink of an eye.”

“I’m taking care of Sixer’s mortality.” Bill admitted, drumming his fingers on the side of his glass. “It won’t be an issue.”

“Can humans even breathe in space? What, are we just going to be staying on earth, babysitting him in an atmosphere he can stand?” Kryptos complained loudly, trying to rile up the other henchmaniacs.

“I said it won’t be an issue. I’ve already augmented his lungs, now he can go wherever we go.” Bill examined the back of his hand, aiming for nonchalance.

“What about atmospheric pressure?” Kryptos shot back, looking for a reason why Sixer couldn’t join them. A human couldn’t be a part of the team.

“That’s next on the to do list. He’ll get a full makeover. All the bells and whistles.” Bill boasted. “By the time he joins us properly, he’ll be stronger than you even, though really Kryptos, that’s not hard.”

“Wait, you mean it?” Teeth asked Bill, shocked. “You’re really making a human one of us, for real? For the long run?”

“Why should he be gifted such strength?” Paci-Fire said, sounding disgruntled. “Why should he receive such power?”

“I thought you were joking.” Teeth reeled in the realisation. “I thought it’d be funny, like a joke, to make one of them turn their back on the rest of their lousy lot, I didn’t think you were being serious.”

“Sixer has … proved his merit to me.” Bill said evasively, looking down at his drink, swilling it around. His bricks were glowing, becoming just a tad peachy as he spoke. “I’d say, when the world is mine, that he deserves his place at my side.”

“At your side???!!” Kryptos exclaimed angrily.

“Like a partner???!!” Kryptos spluttered, aghast to think he’d be facing a human ascended to be Bill’s equal partner. The thought was as offensive as it was terrifying.

“I thought Pyronica was your partner.” Paci-Fire stated, giving the pink cyclops a peculiar look.

“Oh gross!” Pyronica pulled a face, before looking over at the triangle floating beside her. “No offence Bill.”

“Gee, none taken.” Bill rolled his eye, and shot back the rest of his drink, swallowing it down.

“This is most confusing.” Paci-Fire grumbled, and crossed his arms, sitting down.

“I actually think you two are kinda cute together.” Keyhole said good naturedly.

“Didn’t ask, Keyhole, but thanks anyway.” Bill banished his cocktail glass with a wave of his hand.

“Why did you tell us if you weren’t interested in our opinions?” Kryptos asked argumentatively.

“Because, Kryptos, I told you so you’d all know.” Bill put his hands on his sides. “My apocalypse is right around the corner, the big day. The one we’ve all been waiting for. And when that day comes, and I unleash you all on our new home, I just want to make one thing clear.”

Bill’s yellow form grew, looming over his henchmaniacs threateningly, filling the small penthouse room the group were all cramped in, towering over them.

“I’m keeping Sixer, and that means he’s mine. That means that none of you are to touch him, harm him, look his way for an instant without my permission, or I will DESTROY you.”

The gathered henchmaniacs all looked up at Bill with wide eyes, those of them who had eyes did anyway, and they nodded frantically, signalling their understanding and assent.

Kryptos trembled, but he crossed his arms, and just stared Bill down.

“Understood?” Bill questioned, watching the henchmaniacs all continue to nod. Satisfied, he glowed a bright yellow, and smiled cheerily. “Good!”

“That is so romantic.” Keyhole uttered, elbowing Amorphous Shape, who blinked his squares agreeably at Keyhole, his blue tasseled tail flicking, impressed.

Shrinking back down to his normal size, Bill rested his hand on his bricks, just below his bowtie. “Now since I’m feeling incredibly charitable, not only are drinks on me tonight, but Hectorgon gets a free pass from the dimension of eternal screams.”

Bill clicked his fingers, summoning Hectorgon, the moustached hexagon appearing in the centre of the room in a puff of flames, an anguished scream petering off abruptly as he took in the penthouse suite.

“AAAAAAAAADARGGGGHHHHHHHHHH oh hey guys.”

“Hectorgon’s back!” Teeth cheered, and Paci-Fire, Eight Ball, Xanthar and Keyhole joined them, applauding and clapping Hectorgon on the back merrily.

“How are ya doing buddy? Had a nice vacation?” Bill asked Hectorgon, glowing cheerfully.

“You brought me back early?” Hectorgon puzzled, having resigned himself to his stretch in the dimension of eternal screams as punishment. Bill never went back on his punishments.
“Let’s just say I’m in a good mood. The party’s right around the corner, the portal’s shaping up nicely, and everything’s coming up Bill.” Bill clicked, and nine cocktails were summoned, materialising in each henchmaniac’s hand. “Let’s celebrate!”

“Do we wanna invite the Goo Mobster’s downstairs?” Teeth asked solicitously.

“NO!” Bill shouted, his form stretching, before he calmed down some, shrinking back down to reiterate. “No. This party is just for us. For the original crew! The original crew plus one! If they ask, I wasn’t even here, okay?”

“Sure thing Boss.” Keyhole saluted Bill, before clinking his glass with Amorphous Shape. “To our newest henchmaniac!”

Paci-Fire and Kryptos grumbled, arms crossed, looking surly, but as everyone else raised their glasses obediently, they had no choice but to join in.

“To Sixer!” Bill toasted, summoning a glass for himself. “And the rest of you sorry lot.”

“To Six Fingers!” Pyronica raised her glass, clinking it with Bill’s. “He’s got a warm welcome to look forward to.”

“Yeah, him and the rest of his planet!” Teeth cackled, and chinked his glass with Keyhole.

The party raged on in the penthouse that night, but Kryptos couldn’t help but shake the feeling that this jubilant generous mood of Bill’s was somehow all that six-fingered human’s fault, which made him a threat already.

For now, Kryptos was content to ride this good mood of Bill’s while it lasted, but he had no intention of wholeheartedly welcoming the newest initiate into their ranks. Of welcoming the special human. The ascended extra.

Oh no, the notorious Sixer would be in for a nasty surprise when he stepped foot in the Quadrangle. If he thought he could just schmooze in here and join Bill on the throne, he had another thing coming.

Regicide.

Bill sat at the kitchen table, full of energy, two more bricks unbound, clad in Stanford’s fluffy blue dressing gown, humming along with the radio, conducting the song as he tapped all the condiments on the table, turning each one into a gold statue, then back again.

Ford was flipping pancakes on the stove, bopping along with the radio, cheerful as anything.

“How would you like a solid gold toaster?” Bill asked enthusiastically.

“I’m sure you’d miss toasted sandwiches.” Ford replied, smiling wryly as he shimmied a pancake out of the frying pan, onto Bill’s plate.

“Who needs toasted sandwiches? I could eat pancakes forever.”
“I admire your nutritional values.” Ford smirked, watching the muse tuck into the pancakes immediately.

With his cheeks full, Bill winked back at Ford. “That’s not all you admire.”

Ford laughed, before leaning down to press a kiss to Bill’s forehead. “Your constant ability to talk with your mouth full. Now that, I admire.”

Bill grinned, bits of pancake sticking to his teeth, and Ford rolled his eyes, ruffling Bill’s hair, before turning around to put the frying pan in the sink.

“You know it’s a wonder I haven’t caught a cold yet, considering you’re constantly stealing my clothes.” Ford wiped his hands on a tea towel, and looked over to the muse.

“I’d keep you warm.” Bill waggled his eyebrows, the fluffy lapels of Ford’s dressing gown tickling his chin.

“Well, I can’t argue with that.” Ford chuckled, and pulled out the chair beside Bill, tearing off a corner of the muse’s pancake to share.

“Don’t you have two dressing gowns?” Bill asked, swallowing his mouthful of pancakes.

“I haven’t been able to find my red one. I assumed you had it.”

“Nope.” Bill shook his head, watching Sixer share his food. “A mystery.”

“Hmm.” Ford shrugged the mystery of the missing dressing gown off, and picked up the salt shaker from the table, examining it.

Bill had alchemized the salt shaker into a solid gold statue, exuding an effortless Midas touch. Those last few bricks certainly improved Bill’s mood, though Ford could also argue that his mood improved after their romp in the bedroom. Ford held true to his word, overloading Bill with sensation and pleasure, and the muse didn’t regret the trust extended by accepting the blindfold. It had certainly changed their dynamic for the better.

Bill was more enthusiastic now, less withheld, less conflicted. It was like accepting Ford’s request for mutual trust had solidified something for Bill, confirmed Ford’s reliability in a way. Or perhaps Bill’s answer made all the difference, his own decision to trust Stanford.

While there had still been no outright confession of feelings from the muse, Stanford was noticing the little ways Bill was choosing to treasure Ford, showing his feelings through his deeds, if not words. After their trust exercise, Bill seemed to be making more of an effort to show Ford he was cherished, and he seemed to be treating Ford more like a partner than a particularly frustrating friend.

“This is marvellous, this sort of remarkable alchemy.”

“Keep it.” Bill offered, taking another bite out of the pancake. “A present. It can replace one of those trophies of yours.”

“The ones I had to throw in the bin?” Ford clarified, remembering well how Bill’s early tantrum had affected his prized possessions.

“I’d say it’s an upgrade.” Bill countered. “Instead of vapid accolades from a university that didn’t recognize your true value, you get a gift from a God.”

Stanford held the golden salt shaker and smiled at it fondly. “And what does my new trophy say? How have I earned it?”

“Oh, you’ve earned it. It and so much more.” Bill grinned at Sixer with equal fondness. “You’ve got a bright future ahead of you, with me by your side.”

Ford looked up from the shaker, over at his muse, his eyes widening with the realisation. “You mean –“

Bill shrugged nonchalantly, but his eyes were twinkling at Ford, the implication of his words holding true. “You’re the one who wanted us to tackle the future together, to lead and shape the world once you achieve your destiny. Maybe we want the same things.”

Ford was relieved. When his muse had asked for his intentions after the portal was built, Ford put himself out there, extending the possibility of continuing his research with the muse. Bill hadn’t responded definitively then, but it elated Stanford to hear his intentions now.

“You do?” His face lit up, eyes shining behind his glasses, jubilation oozing from him at the thought that his muse would join him as his destiny progressed. “Oh Bill. I can’t tell you how happy that makes me.”

Bill looked at Stanford’s joyful expression, contented by it, before he leaned forward, and cupped Ford’s face in his hands.

“You are the best choice I’ve made in a long time.” Bill’s slitted eyes simmered with intensity, tracking over every inch of Stanford’s face, seeing his potential as Bill’s right hand. “You’re going to be glorious.”

Ford preened, his muse’s accolades making him smug, stroking his ego. He beamed back at his muse, and pressed a kiss to Bill’s palm adoringly.

Bill smiled wryly at Sixer, and released his cheek, reaching to tear another piece of pancake off, gesturing with it as he spoke. “So, world leader. Why stop there?”

“What do you mean?” Stanford asked, watching the muse eat with his hands.

“I mean there’s a whole universe out there to explore. There’s no limit to what you can achieve anymore.”

Ford watched his muse, emotion brimming in his chest. “You really mean that, don’t you?”

Bill watched Ford, pleased by how much Bill’s regard meant to him. Sixer was adorable like this, worshipping Bill so earnestly, just through simple appreciation. Bill saw Ford’s potential, and that meant more to the human than any whispered words or sweet sentiments.

All Ford had ever wanted was to be seen, to be recognised, to be praised for all the things he was, all the things he excelled at, and Bill knew it. He found it difficult to begrudge the human a little recognition and encouragement, especially when Stanford took it so well.

Ford set the shaker on the table, watching the gold glint in the light, before he spoke, thoughtful once more.

“You know, I’ve been wondering. What life would have been like if I hadn’t summoned you here.
If you hadn’t been living with me all these months. How much I’d be missing out on.”

Ford sounded wistful, saddened by the prospect of these past few months without Bill. Bill stuffed the last piece of his pancake in his mouth, and chewed, watching Sixer closely.

“Your life certainly is richer with me here.” Bill gestured to the golden salt shaker. “Pun intended.”

“I know you weren’t too fond of the idea at first, me bringing you down here, but you know I’m grateful for it in a way.” Ford continued, turning the salt shaker around in his hands. “For the opportunity to get to know you better, and for you to get to know me. I hardly think you’d have reciprocated this sort of interest in me without the time we’ve had together.”

“You’ve grown on me, I’ll admit.” Bill conceded, watching Sixer’s reactions. “Before I found you arrogant, overreaching, pretentious, stubborn.”

Ford pulled a face, knowing the muse was insulting him on purpose.

“Honestly not much has changed.” Bill joked. “But suddenly I find those qualities far more attractive.”

“Perhaps because they remind you of you.” Ford shot back slyly.

Bill wiped his finger through the dregs of maple syrup left on his plate, sucking the syrup off his finger before pointing at Ford.

“Zesty Sixer. I like it.”

Ford smirked, and returned to fiddling with his golden salt shaker, tipping it upside down to see the individual specks of salt had also turned into gold, raining down onto the table top like confetti.

“Fiddleford’s been out of the house more and more.” Ford remarked, looking at the gold dust shimmer in the light. “It’s almost like he’s avoiding us. He probably thinks we’re still fighting.”

Ford looked back to the gold dust, picking up one of the golden salt granules and examining it, as Bill continued speaking.

“What is troubling though is his sudden departure right before the portal is ready for testing. I’m not so keen to have him gallivanting about right when we’re at the most crucial stage of development.”

Ford looked across at Bill, his brows furrowed with concern. “You think Fiddleford would betray us?”

“I think he has more to gain and nothing to lose if he did.” Bill replied diplomatically.

“He certainly does have something to lose if my friendship and trust mean anything to him at all. He wouldn’t.” Ford asserted crossly, frowning at the tabletop.

“Well let’s just say if he does I wouldn’t be surprised. He seems like the type to cut and run when it suits him.” Bill remarked disdainfully.

“Well I’m hoping he’ll follow through.” Ford said optimistically. “We’re so close.”
“We are.” Bill agreed.

“I almost regret the hours of productivity lost to sleep at this point in time. I feel like I could be doing so much more.” Ford said bitterly, lamenting his own human inadequacies.

“Sleep is a limiting necessity. You humans waste half your lives drooling into your pillows. It’s hilariously disappointing to watch.” Bill said, swirling his finger through the syrup on the plate.

Ford looked over to the muse, surveying his human form, taking in all the cosmic little details, the glow of his tattoos, the gold of his eyes, recognising them for what they were. Evidence of Bill’s true nature.

“You know I envy you. How you were before all of this. Unfettered by the limitations of the body, elevated into the purest existence of the cosmic mind. I often wonder what that’s like.”

“Hrmmm.” Bill pursed his lips and looked up at Ford, considering. “I could show you, if you like.”

“What?” Ford questioned eagerly, curious.

“I could show you what it’s like.” Bill repeated, swiping patterns onto his plate with the maple syrup. Drawing a triangle. “Let you into my mindscape. I’ve been in yours before, it’s only fair.”

“I can’t imagine you offer this to just anyone in the interest of being fair.” Ford guessed correctly.

Bill grinned, looking down at his plate, before smiling up at Sixer. “No, but you’re not just anyone.”

“How would I -?” Ford leaned forward, into his muse’s space, resting his arm on the back of Bill’s chair.

“It’s like reverse possession.” Bill explained simply. “I could take you from your mindscape, into mine, and share a memory of the sensation with you. So you know exactly what I’m missing out on, trapped in this flesh suit.”

“You’d do this just to guilt me?” Ford asked bluntly.

“This is meant to be a treat for you Sixer.” Bill said, putting his hand on his chest, feigning offence. “But if you see it as an ordeal, clearly I’m not meant to share these things with you. I see how it is.”

“No. That’s not how it is.” Ford said hurriedly. “I want to see.”

“Hrmmm.” Bill pursed his lips, deliberating, licking syrup off his finger.

Ford watched the muse drag his deliberation out, and a question sprung to mind.

“Why are you showing this to me?” He asked, genuinely curious. He was hardly expecting a serious answer, yet miraculously, that was what Bill gave him.

“Because I’ve decided Sixer, you are special.” Bill said definitively, watching the human with cheeky slitted eyes. “You get the special treatment.”

Ford sat up a little straighter, ingratiated by the compliment.

“Come here.” Bill crooked his finger at the scientist, and Ford scooted his chair closer to Bill, leaning in.
Bill reached out, and pressed their foreheads together, before placing his hand over Sixer’s eyes.

“Are you ready?” Ford heard Bill asking.

“Ready to see through the eyes of a God?” Ford preened, sounding smug, like his whole life had been leading up to this point. “Absolutely.”

“Hmm.” Bill sounded amused by Ford’s gusto, and at that, he closed his eyes, and shoved his cosmic consciousness into Stanford’s head.

Ford felt his consciousness push away in a jarring rush, the void coming up to meet him, and he burst through the wave of nothingness, eye opening up into the richest colours he’d ever seen.

He felt like he was constantly twirling, folding and unfolding into himself endlessly every microsecond his eye was open, aware of everything, the pressure of the atmosphere, the vast expanse of space, the prisms of light that fractured across the back of his retina, and his own molecules vibrating, a violent staccato of existence, thudding like a hyperactive heartbeat.

He was pure energy, made tangible. He was a god.

He looked down, lifting his arm, and it was thin, long, unbound by the restrictions of musculature or traditional movement. He felt like at any second he could reform and reassemble himself into whatever suited him, whatever he felt like, and it was frightening to think that there was barely anything holding him together, nothing but force of will and imagination making him exist, making him perceptible.

He spread his fingers out, looking at the cartoonish digits, and they warped with the vibration of his molecules, jarring first into jagged claws, insect like legs, burnt bracken sticks, and finally back to the smooth caricature of a hand that Bill preferred. Ford felt like blinking, and when he did blink his hand had six fingers instead of four.

Looking up from his hand, Ford noticed that in the instant when his eyes were closed, he was somewhere else, somewhere completely different. The void of space shifted, and suddenly he was amidst bright colours, tall buildings, futuristic infrastructure, spaceships zipping about around him, big screens blinking as alien creatures strolled the streets, walking around him.

Ford could feel Bill in the back of his head, influencing this shared mindscape, and he blinked again, transporting them elsewhere. Ford was almost disappointed, wanting to take a closer look at the futuristic city, but it was gone, replaced by a towering monolith of nebula dust and gases, red, blue and white coalescing into what resembled a blue eye in the centre of it all. The Hourglass Nebula, if Ford’s astronomy was correct, but it was different than he expected. The blue eye in the centre of the nebula, that swirling cloud of gas and dust, solidified and blinked back at him, its gaze unnerving and sentient.

Bill blinked for them both again, and transported them to a garden of sorts, beside a gigantic black bricked structure. Ford couldn’t say what shape it was, its structure seemed to be constantly changing, warping and shifting to allow different rooms and passages to emerge. In the garden, elements were tethered with glowing blue thread, gases and sediment and metals twisting and shifting in and out of their natural essence. Ford thought they resembled flowers, some of them, layered gently into petals around a single shining blue knot, the centre of the thread.

Ford reached down to cup his hand around one of the ‘flowers’ and his hand passed right through the sculpted cloud of colourful gas. It was remarkable.
Ford could hear Bill’s voice in the back of his head, echoing faintly.

Do you like it?

It’s astonishing, Ford thought, not knowing how to speak in this form, but Bill heard him nonetheless. I want to see more.

Bill seemed to smile at that, smile without a mouth. Ford could feel the expression in the back of his head, feel the emotion of amusement without feeling his face shift, his lips curve, he felt the amusement in the abstract, as the world abstracted all around him.

Bill seemed to hand the reins over to Ford’s consciousness so to speak, and Ford blinked again, shifting his perspective.

The location changed, an empty beach covered in purple sand, overlooking a green ocean devoid of signs of life.

Ford blinked again, and he found himself in the centre of a roulette table, numbers spinning around him giddily, creatures of all shapes and sizes crowded around the table, cheering as the wheel spun, a ball ricocheting around the wheel, bouncing off different numbers.

Ford blinked again, and he found himself on the rim of a curved satellite city, his feet dangling from the edge of the highest building, looking down at a burnt grey planet. He tilted back, and looked up at a glowing green and blue borealis, stars shimmering beautifully in the haze.

Detached from his body, Ford marvelled at this cosmic consciousness, feeling what his muse felt, this thrumming of energy, this ecstatic liminal state of existence, slipping between worlds. Ford felt as small as a dust mite and as big as a hypergiant star at its peak, all at once.

He felt a prickling at the back of his mind, his body calling to him, shouting out at him as pain began building behind his eye, but he ignored it in favour of seeing what his muse could see, seeing all, all the majesty of the universe.

The scenery changed rapidly, as Ford blinked over and over, forcing himself to absorb all that there was to see while he had the chance to see it. The pain was building behind his eye, but he focused beyond the pain, on the sheer revelation of it all.

A bustling market, cultured by a wide variety of creatures spruiking gadgets, gizmos, and glorified garbage.

Blink.

A sweeping landscape, cratered and orange, orbited by a pale blue moon that seemed far too close for comfort, dominating the skyline.

Blink.

A mountaintop monastery, bubbles of pink and blue floating iridescent from the treetops, levitating up to the craggy peaks, gold and shimmering jewels gilding the extravagant temple.

Blink.

An enormous compound, built like a figure eight, looping infinitely on itself, hovering in a desolate void with a few scattered stars shining down on it from a distance.
Blink.

A constant fire, so large, so untamed and uncontrollable it covered every expanse, every speck of space, eating away at everything there, despite all matter having been gone for billions of years. The fire just wouldn’t stop, it was ravenous, it was all consuming, it was imparting Ford with an uncomfortable tightness in his chest that he almost wasn’t aware of.

Obliquely in the back of his mind, Ford wondered if it was possible he was having a heart attack, and he felt Bill rouse in his mind then, taking the reins back from him.

Desperate for one last peek at the universe, Ford blinked again, and felt his breath catch at the stunning sight of a sleek black cave, cut wider than mount Everest, receding into a tunnel of pure obsidian, light warping and refracting in strange ways on the wall. Everything was dark here, yet somehow Ford still managed to see obscure shapes, glimmers of images he couldn’t comprehend playing on the shining obsidian walls. Something stirred in the back of the cave, a groan like a thunderclap sounding out as whatever lurked within began to move. He felt the uncomfortable prickle of paranoia scent through his mind, giving him the sense he was being watched.

Bill’s presence unseated Ford’s own, and with a discombobulating jolt he felt his consciousness eject back into his own body, abruptly removing him from Bill’s mind.

Ford blinked, and suddenly he was back in his own head, breathing heavily, nearly hyperventilating.

“Sixer. Sixer, how’s it going in there? Are you okay IQ?”

Ford pulled his glasses off and grasped his forehead with both hands, grounded in his body once more, with all the aches and pains that came along with it. He was nursing the most sudden migraine he’d ever experienced in his entire life, groaning.

“Tsk. Look at you, you pushed it too far and now you’re paying the price.” Bill’s voice sounded out, a concerned mutter, though to Ford he seemed decibels too loud. Ford felt Bill’s hands touch him lightly, checking him over, and he tried to level his breathing, knowing he was in no danger, he was back on Earth, as disappointing as that was.

When he figured out how to breathe properly again, sucking in oxygen and breathing out CO₂ he resigned himself to his earthly tether, having experienced godhood for several scant glorious seconds. He felt Bill’s hand on his chin, and he looked up at the muse, blinking from his own eyes this time.

Blearily he saw Bill’s expression peer at him cautiously, before the muse hissed, rearing back.

“Yeesh. You really pushed it too far. Ouch, it hurts just looking at you.”

“What? What’s wrong?” Ford asked, concerned now, Bill’s reaction stirring him up.

“Nothing’s wrong.” Bill replied quickly. “You’re fine.”

He felt Bill’s thumb wipe at wetness under his eye, and he let the muse fuss over him, closing his eyes.

“You’d look like hell too if your body had to process what encompassing an interplanetary shift in perspective means in the wider scheme of things.” Ford muttered, feeling Bill pat his face down with a napkin, exhaustion catching up to him, feeling heavy in his own limbs. “Talk about a paradigm shift. A cosmic paradigm shift.”
“Mmhmm.” Bill hummed, wiping Ford’s face with the napkin, delicately cleaning Sixer up. Ford heard the muse snap, and then felt the press of a warm wet cloth against his skin, the muse pressing the cloth to his face. The wet cloth felt wonderful against his sore eyes, and Ford sighed, leaning into the fabric.

“I mean, really.” Ford mumbled, awestruck. “To think that your scope is so large, that you can see so much of the universe in simply a blink of an eye. The sheer mass of knowledge at your disposal, to be able to access it all. All the secrets of the universe.”

“I take it you’re impressed then.” Bill replied, patting the wet cloth against Ford’s face, pulling it back to assess the damage.

“Very impressed.” Ford confirmed. “Phenomenally impressed. I don’t think anyone could see through the eyes of a god and not be impressed. I can’t believe you shared that with me. A glimpse of the stars.”

“You’ll get a lot more than a glimpse when that portal’s done.” Bill said, looking at Sixer’s face, before nodding. Standing up, Bill gripped Ford’s bicep and helped him up out of his chair. “Come on Sixer, let’s get you to bed. You look dead on your feet. I should have realised this would be draining for you.”

“I don’t want to go to bed.” Ford complained childishly, his eyes still shut, too tired to open them properly. “You can’t expect me to see a glimpse of my potential just like that and then delay me from doing everything I can to reach it. There’s so much to do. I need to work on the portal, I have calculations to check, notes to compile, readings to analyse.”

Bill steered Ford out of the kitchen and along the corridor, helping him up the stairs. “It’ll all be waiting for you when you wake up. Terminal fatigue isn’t a good look for you Sixer, trust me on this, you need to sleep.”

“I’ll sleep when I’m dead.” Ford protested, though he trudged along to wherever Bill was leading him, obediently climbing the stairs, his muse’s hands guiding him along. “With Fiddleford out again I’m the only one able to finalise those calculations, and if we want that portal online we can’t wait another second. I can’t wait another second. It’s my destiny.”

Bill pushed open the door to Sixer’s room and lead the scientist over to his bed, urging him to sit on the cushy mattress, standing in front of him with his hands on his hips.

“Your destiny, right now, is to do what I tell you. Look at you, you’re so tired you can barely open your eyes.”

Squinting up at Bill rebelliously, Ford tried hard to prove him wrong, but he felt exhausted, every inch of him.

“How are you going to solve equations if you can’t even read the page. You’re not functioning properly. You’re tired, you’ll make mistakes.” Bill insisted.

“But I don’t want to wait.” Ford objected. “You’ve shown me such marvellous things, amazing things. You’ve inspired me. I – I want to be there already. To see it with my own eyes.”

Bill gently pushed Ford’s shoulders back, arranging him to lay horizontally on the mattress. Ford sunk back into the cushions, mentally prepared to further his work on the portal, but physically drained by his experience beyond the limitations of his body. The mind was willing, but the flesh was weak.
“You will.” Bill promised him. “Just sleep.”

“But the equations.” Ford mumbled, his eyes sliding shut, no matter how hard he tried to keep them open.

“I’ll take care of them. Just sleep Sixer.” Bill pulled the covers up over Ford, and stroked his hair gently, resting his hand on Ford’s forehead.

“Will you stay with me?” Ford murmured, his eyes closed now, fighting against his dwindling consciousness.

Bill smirked, and brushed Ford’s bangs back gently. “I will.”

Ford nodded, content in the knowledge that his muse would be there, and succumbed to the sweet embrace of slumber. Smacking his lips and nuzzling into the pillow, Ford spoke softly, almost childlike in his mid-sleep sincerity.

“Mmm. I love you.”

Bill stared at Ford, shocked by Sixer’s mumbled admittance.

“What?”

Ford hummed contentedly, and wiggled his shoulders, snuggling up under the blankets, squashing his cheek against his pillows.

Bill just stared at him, gobsmacked by Sixer’s half-asleep confession, thrown a loop by three words he never thought he’d hear directed at him.

Bill questioned reality, existence, his own hearing, everything, scarcely believing Sixer could say those three little words to him of his own volition, barely hoping that he meant it. Bill didn’t deserve what Ford so sleepily confessed to. He didn’t deserve love.

He ogled Sixer’s snoozing body, dumbstruck by the revelation of it all. He knew Sixer couldn’t reply, since he was counting sheep on white fluffy clouds by now, but his disbelief compelled him to ask again, his voice cracking.

“What?”

Sixer slept on.

When Stanford woke the next morning fully dressed, it was clear he’d been sleeping for a long while, his alarm clock reading 13:38 as it blinked on his bedside table. He rubbed his eyes, feeling crust crackle at the rims, and sat up slowly, well rested and warm, greeting the day – well, midday.

Looking around his room he didn’t see his muse, but there was evidence of the god’s presence shown in the papers scattered about the floor, Ford’s ballpoint pens shaken out of their box, garnishing the room.
Stepping into his slippers, Ford paced into the middle of the room, crouching down to examine the documents curiously. Ford saw several loose sheafs scattered around his notebook, which he flipped open. Inside the notebook, penned beautifully, was 6 hours of calculations and equations, the calculations Ford needed, completed meticulously by his muse while he slept, complete with revisionary notes on his old content, and summaries on each page of what the muse had completed.

“Well, I’ll be damned.” Ford remarked, impressed.

His muse was true to his word, and Ford felt touched by the generosity in Bill’s gesture. His muse had been nothing but generous these past few days, bestowing favours and surprises on the scientist, favours that drastically improved Stanford’s progress, happiness, and standing when it came to achieving his destiny. He was so close, and the muse was helping him along, granting him everything he wished for.

Picking his notebook up, Ford grinned at the thought of Fiddleford’s expression when he saw him fully alert and smiling with a huge stack of calculations at his side. His assistant would be elated that the bulk of the busywork was done, and once he had finished quadruple checking Ford’s work, they would be able to set up for the portal’s very first test of all the equipment.

Stanford couldn’t wait.

Racing out of his bedroom, eager to show his friend the finished calculations, Stanford didn’t pause to check his reflection in the mirror as he brushed his teeth the bathroom, spitting toothpaste in the sink and running downstairs.

If he had, he would have noticed the bloodshot whites of his eyes, red crusting around his eyeline, and a smear of dried blood clotting just in the corner of his tear ducts.

His eyes may have bled, but he’d seen the future he wanted so desperately, and nothing was going to stop him from achieving it.

Chapter End Notes

This chapter wasn't as busy as some, staying in the shack, focusing a lot more on interpersonal relationships than action, but for those disappointed by that, just picture Fiddleford running around Gravity Falls in Stanford's red bathrobe, erasing the disturbing memories the townsfolk have of the spontaneous levitation they all suffered when the generators tested.

For those waiting for a confession IT HAS ARRIVED but in a lovely, deniable, confusing way, just to make things difficult for you all. I hope you enjoyed Stanford's peek into Bill's mindscape, Bill's continual acid trip of existence has been confirmed, no wonder he likes to party.

Next chapter is the midway point of this fic, the first portal test. I am so excited to write it, you have no idea. Things are heating up.

As always, let me know what you think, and this chapter is dedicated to moonwalkingdinosaur. Whenever I see your concerned Dipper picture, my heart is happy. Don't worry, we'll both cry when this is over.
Men are the toys in the game that you play. When you get tired, you throw ‘em away.

Chapter Notes
See the end of the chapter for notes

Fiddleford’s knee was jittering, approaching a KBPS level that Stanford hadn’t seen since the Gremloblin attack.

“‘It’s fine, the papers are fine.” Ford insisted.

“I wanna read it over one more time, two more times. I just wanna check –”

“You’ve checked that one page four times already Fiddleford. If you haven’t found a mistake by now, I’m not sure wishful thinking will do you any better.” Ford complained, sweeping papers off the desk, stacking them into a neat pile.

“I ain’t finished with them yet. Don’t rush me Stanford. Give them papers back.” F swiped for the pages, Stanford holding them pettily just out of reach.

“You are determined to poke holes in this when there aren’t any holes there.” Ford chided his colleague. “I can assure you, everything’s accurate. We’re ready.”

“There are holes. We’re poking a hole through the fabric of the universe. There’s got to be a hole.” Fiddleford said, sounding both determined and agitated. “Gimme them papers back. I need to check –”

“Fiddleford –“ Ford frowned, and held the papers higher, watching his assistant jump to try and grab the completed documents for more unnecessary re-reads.

“Stanford – don’t be – you stubborn – just git-“ F continued to jump, attempting to climb up Ford’s tall built frame, his own height working against him.

The elevator doors opened to the study, and Bill walked in, holding the crash test dummy they intended to use under his arm.

“So, I drew a face on our dummy for realism, and –“ Bill’s words stopped at the sight of McGucket climbing up Stanford, elbowing the other scientist’s chin, trying to grasp the paperwork Ford was holding precariously in the air above him. “What are you doing?”

Somewhat abashed, the two scientists sprung away from each other, realising how ludicrous they must have looked.

Bill gave a low whistle, and raised his eyebrows. “Well, don’t let me interrupt.”

“No interruption –“ Ford began.

“We weren’t doin’ anythin’-“ Fiddleford spoke over Ford, aware of how compromising this must have seemed, clutching the papers he had managed to snatch behind his back.

“Uhuh.” Bill sounded sceptical, sitting on the edge of one of the desks in the study, propping the crash test dummy up beside him, turning its chin. “What do you think Dummy, should I be clutching my pearls right now?”
“Fiddleford won’t return the papers he’s already checked.” Ford tattled on his colleague to Bill, seeking his muse as backup. “We could be running tests by now, not going over the same equations in perpetuity.”

“I just want to check – it don’t hurt to be too cautious. I just need to check ‘em a few more times.” Fiddleford said in his defence, appealing to Bill who seemed to be the mediator in this scenario.

“Last I checked, the definition of madness is doing the same thing over and over again and expecting different results.” Bill said, putting his arm around the dummy congenially, pointing its arm at Fiddleford. “Our dear pal Albert Einstein said that, and he was familiar with the scientific method, which goes to show you that too much of a good thing is entirely relative. And that was when he came up with his famous theory of relativity.”

“No it wasn’t.” Fiddleford contested sullenly.

Ignoring Fiddleford’s protestations, Bill continued regaling the scientists with his insight. “That is irrelative and irrelevant. My point being is that this year is set to be your own annus mirabilis and here you are wasting it, arguing about an assumptive equation that you both know is right. Now, I don’t know about you, but I’d like to see the portal finished before this time next year. I don’t have that many vacation hours, and neither do you, so Specs, if you don’t mind.”

Bill gestured for McGucket to pass the remaining papers back over to Stanford.

Reluctantly, incredibly reluctantly, Fiddleford handed the last of the papers over to Ford, who stacked them neatly, his expression infuriatingly smug.

“What happens if I miss somethin’ though, because I didn’t check thoroughly enough.” Fiddleford fretted. “I’m just getting this feelin’, this niggling feelin’ in the back of my head that I’m missing something. Something important. With technology like this I just can’t shake the notion that if we make one mistake, all hell will break loose.”

Bill smirked, amused by the irony of that statement, before he waved the dummy’s hand at Fiddleford again, dismissively. “You’re being paranoid. Sixer, tell him he’s being paranoid.”

“Listen, F, I can understand your concerns.” Ford began, stacking the papers in a pile, turning to face him earnestly. “This is a massive undertaking we’re about to impart on, a huge responsibility. I don’t blame you for being cautious, but when you’re cautious to this excess – I just feel that it’s detrimental to us achieving our destiny. My destiny.”

“I ain’t tryin’ to set you back.” Fiddleford assured Ford.

Stanford put his hand on Fiddleford’s shoulder and looked him in the eye, desperation and fervour leaking out from his expression.

“I don’t think you understand. This portal is my life. My life’s work. It’s everything I’ve been leading up to, everything I’ve ever wanted. This portal will define how I make my mark on the scientific community. We are right on the threshold of achieving something remarkable, something limitless I see every time I close my eyes.”

Bill smiled at Sixer, watching him contemplatively. That peek through the universe really inspired the scientist to strive harder, push farther, to achieve what Bill wanted him to achieve. He was driven, zealous with passion now, and part of Bill wondered why he didn’t just show Sixer the universe through his eyes in the first place.

He hadn’t earned it then. He had now.
“We are on the very precipice of achieving that limitless potential, right at the edge. I understand you’re cautious, but that caution is holding us back. I don’t understand how you can do it, if I’m being honest. How you can second guess our achievement at this point. You’re so keen to go over the same facts, looking for holes in the parachute, looking for flaws in our design. I just want to fling myself over that edge and soar.”

“I know you do.” Fiddleford looked at Ford, sighing as he acknowledged his friend’s passion. “Which is exactly why I’m stayin’ grounded here. For the both of us. This test is exciting, yes, but it’s also potentially dangerous. This machine is potentially dangerous. I just want to be sure.”

Ford crossed his arms, harrumphing. “Well, if you’re intent to check over minutiae that you’ve already checked, then by all means, do so to your heart’s content. I’ll be down in the lab, setting up for the test, which will be happening tomorrow. I’ve humoured your paranoia Fiddleford, but at this point it’s just rude. You’re second guessing my work, all of our work.”

“I’m not –” Fiddleford spoke up, holding his hands up to protest.

“You have until seven pm, Fiddleford.” Ford said definitively, leaving the stacked papers on the desk, gesturing that F could have at the papers if he so wished, as long as he could keep to Ford’s arbitrary deadline. “If you can’t find any major discrepancies in our work by then, I’m going to assume there aren’t any, and celebrate this achievement for what it is, rather than shoot it down before it takes off the ground.”

“I know you’re aimin’ for the sun here Ford, I know this means a lot to you, but you gotta be realistic here.” Fiddleford beseeched him. “I’m not even sure if we should be turning this portal on.”

“We’ve been working on it all year, are you seriously suggesting we abandon it now?” Ford asked crossly.

Bill looked between the two scientists, watching how this situation went down very carefully.

“I’m not suggesting we abandon it, just maybe postpone it. Aim for a later ignition date, so we have more time to assess the risks. I don’t think we’re ready.” Fiddleford insisted meekly, trying to talk Stanford down.

“We are ready. We’ve been ready. We could be ready now, but for your pedantic pessimism.” Ford huffed, frustrated, gesturing to the papers. “We’re almost at the finish line, and you want to pull the breaks on this project.”

“I’m just trying to caution you.” Fiddleford assured Ford.

“That’s all you know, isn’t it?” Ford questioned irately. “Caution, and hesitation, and anchoring your expectations to a limited understanding of reality, of what’s realistic. You don’t even know what’s out there, what we could be exploring by now. You don’t want to know.”

“I’m tryin’ to look out for you! You gotta walk before you run, and here you are ready to fly.” Fiddleford cried out, exasperated. “You’re ambitious, and big headed, and reckless! Just - I’m trying to give you perspective. Remember what happened to Icarus?”

“He didn’t flap hard enough.” Ford growled, scowling at Fiddleford. Turning on his heel, Ford marched down the spiral staircase, his trench coat flaring out behind him, storming away. “I’ll be down in the lab. When you’re finished being stubborn, perhaps you could join me.”

Ford’s footfalls clanged angrily on each metal step, echoing through the study all the way down.
Fiddleford sighed, his shoulders slumping, as Ford left, looking down to the pile of papers on the desk, Stanford’s snappish regard draining him. Draining his good intentions. He wasn’t trying to upset his friend, but goshdarnit Ford found a way to upset himself. It wasn’t Fiddleford’s fault, but whenever Ford was mad at him, he felt like it was.

Fiddleford was half tempted to engineer some sort of error, just to slow the other scientist’s fervour down some, but he knew he couldn’t get away with that.

He was being watched.

Looking up at Bill, who still sat on one of the desks in the study, his arm around the dummy, Fiddleford felt unnerved by the smiley face Bill had drawn on the mannequin, two sets of eyes on him now.

“And I suppose you think I’m bein’ too cautious too.” Fiddleford presumed, rubbing his elbow.

Bill stared at McGucket in silence for a moment, then blinked at the scientist, his expression intent.

“Why do you think something’s going to go wrong with the portal?”

“I – I don’t know. It’s just somethin’ I can’t shake, in the back of my head. This foreboding that somethin’ goin’ to go horribly wrong.” Fiddleford confessed to Bill nervously. “It’s like there’s somethin’ that I think I should know, that I know I should know, but every time I try to remember what it is, it’s gone.”

Bill raised an eyebrow at the engineer, his tone smooth. “Fancy that.”

“You’re the one who told me, you said - fear makes a home in the caution that caused your gradual decline. Am I bein’ too cautious? Do you know somethin’ I don’t?” F beseeched Bill, looking to the assistant for answers.

“I know lots of things you don’t.” Bill replied unhelpfully, giving Fiddleford a flat look.

“But you’re just an assistant.” Fiddleford frowned, genuinely frustrated by the thought that Bill would have greater insight with this portal than he would, considering how hard he’d been studying it, how he’d been assembling it with his own two hands, handling the engineering all by himself effectively. “If I can’t see what’s wrong with this thing, how can you? I’ve looked at it from every angle.”

“I’m not the assistant here. You are.” Bill corrected Fiddleford, and hopped off the desk, lugging the mannequin along with him. Walking up to the scientist, Bill pointed at him with the mannequin’s arm, poking him in the chest with it. “And if you haven’t seen it by now, you never will. This portal will run exactly how I want it to, and if you can’t bring yourself to man the test tomorrow, Stanford and I will do it without you.”

Fiddleford’s hurt expression delighted Bill. Sticking his chin out stubbornly, Fiddleford scowled.

“I’ll be there. I’m part of this project too.”

“You were a part of this project, but dabble too much in this caution of yours, and you might not be. It’s no skin off my nose.” Bill shrugged, and jerked his thumb at the mannequin held under his arm. “I already have your replacement right here, and he’ll stand in for you just as well as you would have.”

Fiddleford squinted at Bill, looking at the other man like he didn’t recognise him, like he was a stranger. “You know, sometimes I have no idea what Stanford sees in you.”
“Well, let’s go ask Stanford then. You go down there, and tell him you despise his chosen partner, and see how long he lets you stay on the project then.” Bill smiled at Fiddleford, but it was more a bearing of teeth. “Me and Dummy will go with you, and Dummy can watch. I’m sure he’d like to see you get kicked out.”

“That ain’t –” Fiddleford spluttered, unnerved by Bill’s sinister smile. “I ain’t leavin’, and I’m not giving up. I’m gonna go over those papers, and if there’s somethin’ even the slightest bit wrong with this portal, I’m gonna find it, and I’ll go to Stanford with it, don’t think I won’t, because I care about him, and this project. I’m his friend.”

“Have fun with that then.” Bill shrugged. He turned around, heading for the elevator, waving the mannequin’s arm as he left. “You must be good at chasing wild geese, all that time spent on the farm. You better find your answer before seven pm though, because if you don’t, we’re going ahead with this portal test, with or without you.”

Fiddleford clenched his hands into fists, watching the elevator doors close on Bill and the dummy, scowling at the ultimatum delivered by Ford’s assistant.

He really had an attitude problem. Just who did he think he was?

Huffing out his frustration, F looked at his watch, then the pile of papers on the desk, filled with determination. He’d find the answers he was seeking, he knew something was wrong with this portal, he just didn’t know where to look.

Wild goose chasing, that’s what it felt like.

The thought jarred Fiddleford, his eyes widening with realisation.

If Bill knew something he didn’t, it would make sense for the strange man to lead F on a wild goose chase, have him scouring through papers that didn’t hold answers, making him look the other way, while the real secret was hiding just out of reach. He wouldn’t find his answer if he kept approaching the papers the same way, fact checking what was already there.

He had to approach this from a different angle.

He had an idea.

Digging through the papers, Fiddleford flicked through until he found the original blueprints Ford presented him for the portal, pulling out the page detailing the collection of the Hyperdrive, and its implementation in the machine.

Holding the page aloft, F found his wild goose, pouring over the paper.

If he could pinpoint the flaw in the portal, the wax in its wings, he could intervene before Ford fell. Icarus didn’t fall because he didn’t flap hard enough, he fell because he couldn’t look beyond his own hubris to listen to reason, and Fiddleford wasn’t about to let Ford’s hubris derail the scientist from the destiny he held so dear.

He was an engineer, he could fix this.

Before it all came crashing down.
Checking in with Ford downstairs after that confrontation was wise, Bill thought to himself as he rode the elevator to the lab.

After an altercation like that it was crucial he shape Ford’s reaction, knowing the scientist tended to default to guilt. Bill didn’t want Ford feeling guilty, he wanted him feeling righteous, justified in his fury.

Fiddleford’s suspicion was grating on Bill’s nerves, and they were a few scant hours away from the portal turning on, from the engineer having outlived his usefulness. McGucket was too clever to be left a loose end, so Bill just had to figure out the best way to give Specs the flick without Sixer cottoning on.

Sixer was plenty focused right now, and he was passionate, which was good. Ideal even.

Bill rocked on the balls of his feet as he watched the lift signal its descent, lights blinking through an array of alchemical shapes and symbols.

Passion was a good look for Sixer. Passion in the service of Bill even more so.

Drumming his fingers on the arm of the mannequin, Bill tried hard not to think of where that passion could lead.

The lift clanked down to the basement level laboratory, and Bill readied himself to stroll out, to soothe Sixer’s concerns, when he felt an unpleasant ping in the back of his mind.

_Boss! Boss, can you please get here?_

Sucking in a frustrated breath, Bill’s eyebrow twitched, and he chose to ignore Kryptos’ frantic plea for his attention. The compass probably stubbed his toe, or something on a similar scale in terms of urgency. It was probably nothing major.

Bill shoved the compass out of his thoughts briskly.

_Not now._

Not now that he was here, the elevator doors opening. Sixer was in the observation room in the lab, checking through the system’s protocols. He paused when the elevator door opened, looking up at Bill.

Bill tried to blink away that moment of hesitation, of distraction, making his movements smooth again. Strolling into the lab, Bill plonked the mannequin down on one of the wheeled office chairs, watching Ford with an open expression.

“Well that was enlightening.”

Ford shook his head, crossing his arms. He jerked his chin up to the study above, surly and indignant.

“I can’t believe he’d even bring up abandoning the portal at this stage in the game. You know, suspicion is one thing, but unless he has hard evidence that this isn’t going to work, the only thing he’s doing is limiting us, limiting us both.”
“You’re right.” Bill said, calmly watching Sixer’s reaction play out. He spun Dummy around on the chair casually, keeping an eye on Sixer, playing it cool. “He is limiting you.”

“I can’t believe he’d say we’re not ready. What have we been doing all this time, if not preparing ourselves for this very moment?” Ford scoffed, gesturing as he spoke, obviously still cross. “I think we’re ready. Do you think we’re ready?”

“We are.” Bill replied steadily, still spinning the mannequin around on the chair.

“Really, caution before an experiment I can understand, but threatening to call the whole thing off? That’s just — that’s just excessive.” Ford frowned at the ground, lost in his temper. “And another thing, if he had these concerns, why bring them up now, with no proof. If we hinged this project on F’s gut feeling we’d have to rework the entire operating system. The man jumps at shadows, for goodness sake, I’m supposed to trust that he’s right based on a hunch? An unsupported burst of paranoia?”

“He lacks your perspective.” Bill said, letting the chair spin on its own now, staring at Sixer intently. “He’s not as smart as you.”

“Just because he hasn’t seen what I’ve seen, that’s no reason for him to lose faith in the project. If he ever had any in the first place that is. How am I to know this isn’t just a job for him? How am I to know that he’s really invested, has been invested all this time?” Ford ranted. “He doesn’t truly share our vision. Sometimes I wonder why he even signed on to this project at all.”

Sixer was saying all the right things here, Bill barely had to give him a nudge in the right direction. He let the chair spin on, and sidestepped around it, taking a step towards Sixer.

“I don’t know. Maybe he’s right? I’m not being fair to him.” Ford sighed, and Bill’s eyes widened, and he crossed the gap between them rapidly, resting his hand on Ford’s arm as the scientist pinched the bridge of his nose.

“Or maybe you’re right, and he’s wrong.” Bill rubbed Sixer’s arm, trying to encourage the scientist down the right track. “Don’t second guess yourself, IQ. I’d hate to see his words, jealous, spiteful words, impact your confidence in yourself, in the project. You’re doing all the right things Sixer.”

“He’s just worried for me, for the project, and I was pretty harsh on him.” Ford conceded, the guilt seeping in. “I can’t blame him for being cautious, knowing everything that’s happened to him. I’m sure it’s his own way of trying to steer me clear of danger, since he’s faced more than his fair share of it here. I can tell it’s affected him, affected his perspective, but I just wish he could see beyond that. To stop jumping at shadows and see the good this portal can do.”

“I don’t think it’s the shadows he’s been jumping at.” Bill rolled his eyes, giving Sixer a flat look. “You’ve noticed how he’s been acting lately. He’s preoccupied, he’s secretive, he’s always out. He’s not halting the test because he’s concerned for you, he’s concerned for himself.”

Ford frowned at Bill, his brow crinkling with uncertainty.

“These behaviours he’s exhibiting, they’re the behaviours of someone who’s afraid they’ll get caught. He’s covering his own ass.” Bill urged Sixer, resting his hand on Ford’s arm as he spoke, trying to influence him. “Trust me, I know what that looks like.”

“To cover what exactly?” Ford asked sceptically.

“I’ve seen it happen before.” Bill’s slitted eyes locked onto Ford’s as the muse stroked his arm. “It’s happened for millennia. Genius is always envied. It pays to be smart, but to be quicker than the other guy is always greater currency. You think the people you work with are above reproach? They never are.”

Bill stared up at Ford, and the scientist was drawn in by the intensity of Bill’s glowing gold eyes.

“Your intellect may be the most staggering thing I’ve encountered on this dingy planet.” Bill continued. “But even then, if you can’t see what’s happening right in front of you, you may as well let Dummy lead the project.”

“What do you mean?” Ford narrowed his eyes, piecing Bill’s words together.

“I can wait for you to have the lightbulb moment.” Bill watched Sixer expectantly, tapping his toe, before he squeezed Ford’s arm. “Heinrich Goebel’s patent was in Thomas Edison’s greedy little hands the moment he kicked the bucket, he even stole from your hero, Tesla. What makes you think this is any different?”

“You think Fiddleford would steal the designs for the portal from me?” Ford raised his eyebrows, disbelief colouring his expression. “Take credit for my invention? For our invention?”

Bill said nothing, but watched Stanford, keeping his expression sombre.

“But – he wouldn’t do that. That’s – absolutely not. Fiddleford is – he’s my friend. He wouldn’t.” Ford protested emphatically, though a hint of uncertainty was there, lurking beneath the surface. Bill could tell he was wavering from the way Ford was still watching him, as if to check if Bill would laugh it off, say he was just joking.

Bill kept his expression insistent, stubborn. Ford’s uncertainty grew the longer he took in Bill’s uncharacteristic seriousness.

“He wouldn’t.” Ford repeated, though his tone quirked off at the end there, sounding more like a question than a statement. He seemed deeply disturbed by the thought of such a betrayal from his close friend, the longer he thought about it.

“You don’t know who you can trust at the end of the day Sixer.” Bill smoothed his right hand against Ford’s chest, resting it there, appealing to his heart and his head all at once, hoping to sway his decision. “Your genius has been sabotaged too many times. I’m your friend too, and I want to see you achieve your destiny. Can you honestly say he does?”

“I don’t –” Ford frowned, and chewed the inside of his cheek, looking solemn, having difficulty even comprehending the thought of such a betrayal.

Bill cupped Sixer’s jaw, and stroked his thumb along Ford’s cheek, looking up at him intently with glowing gold eyes.

“You’re special Sixer. You could be so much more. You’re so close.”

Bill’s words were cutting Ford, striking at his vulnerabilities, his sore spots. He was tapping on Ford’s insecurities in quick succession, smoothing over the hurts with an encouraging flourish, playing Ford’s emotions like a xylophone.

The thought of his destiny being sabotaged by a close friend just brought back painful memories, memories Ford would sooner repress, and forget.

The scientist’s expression twisted, his brows furrowed, and he seemed to be trying very hard not to look disastrously sad, but he was failing. While this devastated expression was just as endearing on the scientist as all of his other expressions, it was painful to watch.

Straining up onto his tiptoes, Bill sealed his mouth over Sixer’s, kissing away his frown adoringly.

Pulling back to cup Ford’s face in his hands, Bill’s eyes shone up at the human, glowing in the muted laboratory.

“You have so much potential. You really do.”

Ford’s jaw moved like he was trying not to cry, looking down into Bill’s wide yellow eyes, holding back his emotions.

Bill looked up at Sixer from beneath his long eyelashes, oozing sincerity, finding that this sincerity didn’t need to be faked at this point. It was an odd balance, parroting the false flattery that captured Ford’s interest in the first place, mimicking the same words he’d used insincerely in the past. It was strange to think that things were different now.

Bill really meant it.

“I believe in you.”

Ford’s bottom lip wavered, and he felt emotion choke up in his throat.

To be believed in by a god, that tipped Ford over.

Everything he’d been holding back, everything he’d been second guessing, about himself, about his capacity, his ambition, his insecurity nurtured by a lifetime of being shunted to the side, underestimated, it burst through the dam and Ford’s expression crumpled.

He clenched his fist, trying to reign it back in, but it was too late. He broke.

Rather than bare this repressed wound in his soul to the cosmic being in front of him, this bittersweet feeling of being believed in, Ford reached out and grabbed Bill, tucking the muse’s face into his shoulder, hugging him tightly as the emotions rattled through him.

Gratitude, and relief, and exhaustion. Pain and suffering, rejection and scorn all capitulating on itself, compounding on a sense of being underappreciated, unrecognised for his talents. To have someone support him like this, support his potential, to BE there for him so consistently.

Ford sobbed out his relief breathily, shuddering through the feeling of truly being seen, being believed in.

His vulnerabilities were bared here, in a way that they hadn’t been, that he hadn’t wanted them to be, but his guard dropped around Bill upon seeing the muse so sincerely laud his potential. He cried, relief and frustration mingling with the overwhelming validation of being seen, truly being seen. These hurts had been stewing, but on this, the eve of Ford’s reckoning, they rose to the surface, springing free.

His muse seemed frozen at first, surprised by Ford’s emotive response, but slowly Ford felt Bill move in his arms, looping his hands under Sixer’s armpits, patting him awkwardly on the back as he cried it all out.

Ford clutched onto Bill like he was the only thing anchoring him in place, and he let it all out. They stood there, grasping each other, until it passed, Ford sniffling and wiping his face with his sleeve, breathing evenly now.
“Thank you.” Ford laughed under his breath, comporting himself regularly again. “I’ll be saying that to you every day I imagine.”

“It couldn’t hurt to.” Bill leaned back, taking in Ford’s red face, spying a single teardrop lingering on the frame of Ford’s glasses.

Reaching up, curious, Bill swiped the tear away with his finger, and immediately put his finger in his mouth, tasting Ford’s salty sadness.

Before Ford could open his mouth to question that, Bill poked Ford’s mouth tenderly, pushing the edge up into an awkward grin, smiling at the scientist.

“Cheer up Sixer. You’re almost there.”

“I’m wasting time, being silly.” Ford admitted, smiling for Bill obligingly.

“Time is made to be wasted. Might as well be silly while doing it.” Bill shrugged, before grinning at the scientist. “Besides, you’re waiting til seven anyway, aren’t you? Plenty of time to be an emotional wreck before this all kicks off.”

“I suppose I should give Fiddleford a chance. If I suspect the worst, I’m no better than he is, leaping to conclusions without evidence.” Ford said, thinking Bill meant he should give F the benefit of the doubt.

“Uuh. Sure.” Bill said, unimpressed with Sixer’s leap, but willing to let it slide. He laid the groundwork down, Sixer would be leaning his way when the winds of change blew through this cozy little team.

“I should finish the preparations.” Ford conceded, looking around the lab. “I’m pretty much done, at this point. Just a few last-minute system checks to go over, and laying down the safety line.”

Bill looked over at the portal, sitting at the ready in the lab, humming softly with power, constructed beautifully. Its triangular structure was polished and shining, lit up by the blue glowing sigils etched into the ring around the eye.

“It’s perfect.”

“I’m eager to celebrate our successes.” Ford said, reaching out to caress Bill’s shoulder, rubbing it dotingly. “We’ll go out for dinner tonight, and then after perhaps you and I could celebrate on our own.”

“Tempting.” Bill’s lips curved into a grin, turning into Sixer’s arms, when that irritating ping came from the back of his mind again, persistent.

Boss, I need you now. NOW. Help!

“Ugh.” Bill groaned, and reached up to rub at his forehead.

“What’s wrong?” Ford asked, concerned. “Do you have a headache?”

“You could say that.” Bill scowled, brushing his hair back with his hand.

Seriously Boss, this is an emergency.

“Sit down. I’ll move the dummy.” Ford ushered Bill over to the office chair, making the move the mannequin. “I don’t think I’ve seen you get a headache before, not even when you decided crunching ice cubes for a solid hour was a good idea. Do you think something’s wrong?”

“Everything’s fine. Don’t worry about it Sixer.” Bill said, trying to shake off Sixer’s concern.

“Well, I can’t help but worry. I don’t want anything going wrong, not now.” Ford said, midway through lifting the mannequin away.

“Let Dummy sit.” Bill held his hand up, halting Sixer’s attempts to coddle him. “He can keep you company while you run your tests. I might go upstairs and lay down, until this passes.”

“Are you sure?” Ford asked, his forehead creased with concern.

It was almost adorable, in a quaint way, how much Sixer cared, but Bill couldn’t dwell on that. Not with Kryptos screaming bloody murder in his cerebellum.

BOSS! I CAN’T HOLD THEM OFF FOREVER. NOW PLEASE!

“I’ll see you later Sixer.” Bill said quickly, patting Ford on the shoulder, giving him a quick peck on the cheek, before teleporting upstairs in a blink of gold light that left the scientist baffled, and delighted all at once.

Left alone in the lab, staring at the space his muse had left, Ford blinked as the gold light departed when Bill did, rubbing his cheek absently. The machines in the lab hummed and beeped rhythmically, and Ford looked between the space where Bill had stood, and the mannequin on the chair, the rictus grin Bill etched on it’s face staring back at him.

“I’ll see you later then.”

Bill teleported into his bedroom, and felt the exhaustion that came with brick-bound teleportation wash over his body. Physical exhaustion didn’t matter though, not when this was a matter of the mind. Taking one step forward, he faceplanted onto his cushiony bed, hitting the mindscape with a splash, letting his body rest.

“Kryptos, what was so important that it couldn’t wait five goddamn minutes?” Bill asked angrily, opening his eye, taking in the sight before him.

Goo Mobsters had broken into his off-limits private study, dozens of Goo Mobsters, all lined up, crowded around the panicking compass, holding a switchblade to Kryptos’ eye.

“HEY!” Bill yelled, affronted that these peons who he let into his home would have the absolute nerve to attack HIS henchmaniac.

Sure, Kryptos was no Pyronica, and Bill generally couldn’t care less if the compass got a little scuffed, but it was about the PRINCIPLE of the matter. Talk about disrespect.

Kryptos must have barricaded himself in here, but judging from the oozing goo blasts around the door, he hadn’t lasted long.
“I was wondering what I’d have to do to get your attention.” The largest Goo Mobster spoke up, a tall menacing fellow who wore a bowler hat and carried a cane, the cosmic equivalent of a very slimy droog, a la Kubrick, but gooier.

He stepped around Kryptos, the small compass’s legs dangling fretfully in the air as the mobsters had their arms around him, pinning him down, one particularly sinister pile of articulated goo holding the knifepoint just a centimetre away from Kryptos’ eye.

“Don Goo.” Bill watched the mobster with his eye narrowed. “I see you’ve let yourself in, helped yourself to my Kryptos. You’ll be taking all the tiny shampoos from the bathroom next. You’re a guest in my home, remember that. You’ll get my attention when I give it. Don’t outstay your welcome by touching my things.”

“I’ll touch what I gotta touch.” Don Goo said sinisterly, pacing around Kryptos. “I’ll break what I gotta break. You’re a hard triangle to locate. You only have the pleasure of me and mine because you pledged services, and those services still ain’t rendered. Now’s the time to deliver.”

“You’ll be getting your deal done in the fullness of time. Don’t worry.” Bill said smoothly, acting as though he hadn’t been avoiding the mobsters for the past several weeks. “I may have been busy, taking care of loose ends, preparing for the big day, but I haven’t forgotten about our deal, and considering what you’re getting, a little patience on your end doesn’t seem like such an unreasonable request.”

“Oh, you’ve been busy.” Don Goo said, raising his eyebrows. “See, my boys here were getting to thinking you’ve been avoiding us.”

Bill scoffed, before putting his hand to his bricks, his voice pitching high. “Now why would I do a thing like that?”

“You tell me.” Don Goo said flatly, disbelief colouring his goopy features. “And if you don’t tell me, we’ll just get your square here to tell me. I hear tell he’s a squealer.”

“Well, technically he’s a rhombus.” Bill said flippantly, unfazed by their threats against Kryptos.

“I’m a compass!” Kryptos cried out, offended.

“Talk rhombus.” One of the Goo Mobsters ordered threateningly, holding Kryptos’ arm. “Or my friend Tommy here will cut your eye out.”

Tommy the Goo Mobster leaned over Kryptos, twirling the blade between his fingers sinisterly. “Nice and easy. You don’t need both eyes to see.”

“Bill!” Kryptos begged, looking over to the triangle.

“Make good on the deal, or your compass gets it.” Don Goo threatened.
Bill blinked at the mobster, who was attempting to threaten him into acquiescence, and he was not impressed. Don Goo thought he had power over Bill by threatening his henchmen, but boy was he wrong.

“Suit yourself.” Bill shrugged, and materialised an armchair and a cup of tea with a snap of his fingers, waving at the mobsters to follow through on their threat.

Don Goo blinked, taken aback by Bill’s response. That wasn’t what he expected. That’s not how folks usually react when their friends are threatened by the Goo Mob.

“Well, go on then.” Bill gestured at the mobsters, kicking his little legs back and forth eagerly from the armchair. “You’ve got my attention, you may as well put on a show. Get creative. Show me your artistry.”

The mobsters paused, jarred by Bill’s casual reaction.

“You don’t want us to stop?” One of the mobsters asked.

“But you just started.” Bill watched them expectantly with his one wide eye. “Don’t tell me you’re backing out now.”

“I thought you said if we ganked the square he’d break?” Another mobster elbowed his colleague, looking confused by the sudden indifference Bill was displaying. “Ain’t he important?”

“Who told you Kryptos was important?” Bill laughed, and swilled his tea around.

The mobsters paused and looked around to the compass, who was shrinking away, holding his hands up, smiling awkwardly.

“I – I meant important in a – in an administrative way.” Kryptos was sweating, looking very nervous. “That’s what I meant.”

Don Goo looked cross, snarling at his henchmen, who were stupid enough to believe the compass’s boastful statements.

Bill began clapping, his teacup floating in the air.

“You’re the one wasting our time, Triangle.” Don Goo growled. “You said we had a deal. We made our pledge at the auction, and that was weeks ago! It’s time to pay up. With interest! A handshake for every one of us.”

“Well, I would.” Bill said, holding his teacup and saucer in his left and right hands. “But I’ve got no hands free at the moment.” Bill grew two more arms from his bricks just to shrug unhelpfully at the mobsters. “So, you’ll just have to wait.”

“Enough waiting.” Don Goo sliced his hand through the air emphatically. “You need us, it ain’t the other way around. We’ll pull out of this shindig of yours if you ain’t gonna follow through.”

“See, that’s funny, because I seem to recall an entire auction hall full of creatures who’d be more than happy to take your place.” Bill said, sipping on his tea. “So don’t presume you’re indispensable.”

“I ain’t stupid.”
“Could have fooled me.” Bill said wryly, watching the mobster pace over to him. He took a sip of his tea nonchalantly, as the mobster crowed his space.

Don Goo loomed over Bill, resting his oily hands on Bill’s floating armchair. “You picked us over those other jokers for one reason and one reason only, numbers. And if we pull out, it don’t matter who else is waiting in line, it’ll take you an age to build up that kind of support, and you don’t got that kinda time. Not since you’ve got your hands full already. I know what you’re tryin’ to do. What you and your freaks need us for.”

“You’re gettin’ an invitation to the biggest party in the multiverse, and you’re gettin’ a deal out of it. Don’t act like you’re the one losing out here.” Bill said sharply.

“I know what I’ll be losing out on, don’t you worry.” Don Goo leaned into Bill’s space, and whispered, keeping his voice down so his cronies couldn’t hear. “And I know every last one of their names too, so don’t test me, big guy. Not all of us treat our henchmen like garbage.”

“Why throw away their lives, when you can claim a price for them.” Bill retorted smoothly.

“Better than throwin’ them away for nothin’ at all.” Don Goo scowled at Bill judgementally.

Bill raised his eyebrow at that, but said nothing.

“So when are we gettin’ our deal?”

“I need three more days.” Bill sighed, putting a cap on his frolicking, keeping his voice low. Kryptos was watching him, wriggling his little feet, still waiting on a rescue from his boss. “I have a few more things to take care of.”

“And then you’ll deliver?” Don Goo clarified tersely.

“That’s what I’ve been saying.” Bill glared at Don Goo stubbornly, disliking the disrespect with which the mobster was treating him. Unfortunately, the Don was right, Bill couldn’t afford to ditch them this late in the game.

“You better not be bullshitting me, or else we’re coming back for your compass.” Don Goo pointed at Bill, not quite prodding him in the bricks, but getting close enough to earn a venomous squint from the triangle.

Don Goo stood up straight, and signalled to Tommy with a gooey limb. “Let him go. The squealer ain’t gonna tell you anything.”

Tommy and the other Goo Mobsters dropped Kryptos, and he landed on the floor on his hands and knees, patting himself down.

“You better deliver Cipher.” Don Goo asserted, pointing to Bill as he and his men filed out of the study, oozing down the stairwell. “Three days.”

A scowl from Bill accompanied every last mobster out of the door, and when they left, Bill glared at the space where his door used to be, until black bricks rose up to cover the gap, sealing him and Kryptos inside.

“The nerve of some people.” Bill scoffed. “Goo Mobsters. I don’t take orders from inarticulate articulated slime.”

“Boss, you – you just –“ Kryptos stood up, touching around his eye, before he shouted at Bill.
“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”

“You were just going to let them butcher me!”
Kryptos cowered in the face of Bill’s sudden rage, trembling as Bill’s form warped, bricks turning red, teeth lining the mortar between them, snarling furiously at the compass as the walls began to melt, blue flames burning white hot around them.

“The ONLY thing protecting you right now Kryptos is your deal, and that thin ice you’re standing on melts a little more every time you talk back to me.” Bill growled, his eye black, red burning pupil tracking every tremble Kryptos made. “So why the insubordination? Where is it coming from? What’s made you brave, Kryptos the Cowardly?”

“I – I’m just trying –” Kryptos gulped, sweating, the heat in the room making him dizzy. “To be loyal, like you asked. I – I’m looking out for you. I’m on your side.”

“Huh. I’ll bet.” Bill huffed, a black tongue darting out from between his bricks, licking his teeth impatiently, before he deflated some, the red draining from his surfaces, shrinking back down to a more placid form. “When I want advice I don’t need, I’ll ask for it. Don’t remind me of my responsibilities. I’m well aware of how dirty I’ve got to get my hands to pull this off.”

The fire dimmed, petering off, and Kryptos watched as Bill floated around the study like he was pacing, picking up papers that had scattered off the desk and reading them briefly, only to toss them back down irritably.

“Goo Mobsters.” Bill spat, looking over another of the papers Kryptos had organised on the desk. “I can’t stand them.”

“Why – why do you hate them so much, Boss?” Kryptos queried cautiously, sensing Bill had calmed enough to ask.

“They’re entitled, and greedy.” Bill divulged, his distaste written all over his face. “Out of all the applicants at the auction their request was the most grandiose, and what do they give me in return? The pleasure of their ‘company’. They have this bloated collective ego, parading about like some sort of viscous mafia. They call each other famiglia, like it means anything to them.”

“Are they related?” Kryptos asked.

“They could all be related, for all I know. An incestuous conglomerate, the lot of them. That would explain the obvious brain defect that enables their circular logic.” Bill scoffed, flicking through the papers in the study, looking for a particular page. He took another sip of his cocktail, and selected a few pages from the pile. “You know, they think they’re better than us, because they’re a family rather than a hodgepodge collection of freaks and outcasts. They work with us, while looking down on us, any way they can.”

“Why invite them to the party then?” Kryptos seemed puzzled, trying to reconcile Bill’s obvious vehemence against the Goo Mobsters with his desire to work with them.

“Because the illustrious Don Goo is right.” Bill sighed, and spread out the papers onto the desktop. “We do need them. Their numbers. Their durability. We have a few fighters, but not enough. Pyronica can’t take on the galaxy alone, though I doubt that would stop her from trying. We need them for their muscle, for the ground they can cover, and the hits they can take. We can’t do this without them.”

“Claiming Earth?” Kryptos stepped closer to the desk, looking at Bill in askance. “I know the Third Dimension is protected by the Federation, but they’re not going to go to war over one little planet.”
“They’re not going to war.” Bill gave Kryptos a level glance, leaving his statement hanging in the air for the compass to fill in the blanks.

“But – I thought the party –” Kryptos blinked, baffled.

“Think of it like a housewarming party.” Bill drummed his fingers on the desk, watching the compass cotton on. “Let loose for a few eons, settle in to our new little homestead, but after that – after that we’re bringing the party to them. This is only the beginning.”

“Them?” Kryptos asked, though he was almost too afraid of the answer he’d hear. He had a feeling he knew already.

“There are those in the universe who’ve done me wrong Kryptos.” Bill said, his eye blurring with far away static.

Kryptos could vaguely make out two shapes in the static, that of an infant, and a very recognisable frilled amphibian, the shape of the two most powerful beings in the universe flickering in Bill’s wide godly eye.

Bill blinked, and the static shapes were gone, replaced with a fire, burning bright in his eye.

“I intend to return the favour.”

In the driver’s seat of Fiddleford’s truck, Ford drummed his fingers on the wheel energetically, his excitement becoming a tangible thing the closer they got to the first test of the portal.

Bill had elected to opt out of their celebratory dinner at the diner, citing a lingering headache that had Ford concerned. Bill had insisted he’d feel better after laying down though, claiming he’d be able to deal with what ails him after a decent sleep. Pushing Ford out the door with a farewell kiss, Ford’s optimism about the project enabled him to put aside his disappointment and focus the evening on Fiddleford.

Arguing with Fiddleford earlier had Ford eager to mend their relationship, deciding that rather than an apology for his emotional outburst, he’d simply show his assistant his appreciation for all of his work so far with an enjoyable night out, one on one. Fiddleford was acting rather subdued, somewhat quiet, clutching onto his satchel nervously, and Ford suspected he was still a little upset from earlier, though he did concede to let Ford drive when Ford requested to.

Elbowing him as he turned the truck into the car park in front of the diner, Ford nudged his friend, gesturing to the well-lit train cart.

“It looks like the whole town is out celebrating. We picked a good night for it.”

“Sure did.” F said, though his tone wavered, like he was uncertain.

Ford shot Fiddleford a look, before driving into a parking spot, turning the keys in the ignition and parking the car. The truck’s engine spluttered into silence.

Stanford stared at Fiddleford, who seemed to find it difficult to meet Ford’s eye, fiddling with his shoulder bag while the sounds of music, laughter, and carousing echoed out from the diner cart.

“There’s no need to look so nervous. We’ll have fun tonight.” Ford assured him, smiling earnestly at his friend. “Just push everything from before out of your mind. Tonight’s about us. A celebration of our achievements, what we’ve done so far. I couldn’t have done this without you.”

Fiddleford smiled back at Ford, though the expression looked somewhat strained.

Ford picked up on his tension and frowned. “You’re not still convinced this won’t work, are you? Put aside your scepticism for one night Fiddleford, just one night. That’s all I ask.”

“But Stanford, I really –” Fiddleford protested meekly.

“Look, enough of this.” Ford interrupted him crossly. “If I didn’t want to hear it before, I certainly don’t want to hear it now. We are here to celebrate our successes, and have a good time, and I won’t have your paranoia souring this evening’s purpose.”

Ford opened the truck door and got out, pausing to peer back into the car where Fiddleford sat, looking anxious and rather ill. He threw the car keys back to Fiddleford, the smaller scientist fumbling to catch them. When he had the keys securely in his hand, Ford gave Fiddleford an exasperated look.

“Now are you coming or not?”

Fiddleford’s shoulders slumped, and he shook his head, sighing, before reluctantly reaching for the door handle.

“I’m coming, don’t git all antsy. I’m coming.”

Fiddleford followed Ford into the restaurant, but what Ford found odd was that Fiddleford didn’t leave his satchel in the car.

Inside the restaurant was bustling, music blaring loud from the jukebox, turned all the way up for frivolity’s sake, beer pouring thicker than pancake syrup. The diner was crowded with lumberjacks, and various townsfolk, all toasting and celebrating, the loudest of which was Manly Dan.

“For glory boys! We’re drinking for glory!”

“For he’s a jolly good fellow, for he’s a jolly good fellow, for he’s a jolly good fe-e-llow! And so say all of us!” The lumberjacks chanted as they brandished their drinks, cheering to one another and chugging back liquor.

At the central booth Willow Oakwood sat, surrounded by presents, lumberjacks and local girls, all crowding around her, showering the redhead with attention. Dan was dancing around the diner he was so giddy with enthusiasm, enthusiasm and alcohol, and he kept throwing looks of ardent admiration Willow’s way at every chance he could get.

“The happiest day – it’s the happiest day of my life.” Dan exclaimed, holding his glass in the air, toasting his fiancé. “Every day since I met you is the happiest day of my –“

The bell above the door chimed as Stanford and Fiddleford entered the diner, and the lumberjacks let out a loud cheer, welcoming new people in to the party.

“What on earth?” Fiddleford mumbled, taking it all in.

“Friends! Friends, welcome to the – welcome to the –“ Dan slurred, extending his arm out to the men cordially. “The Corduroy-Oakwood baby shower. Did you hear the good news?”

Ford walked further into the bar, giving Willow a brief look, before sizing up Dan, the lumberjack enthusiastically drunk.

“No.” Ford replied, figuring the news out fairly quickly but humouring Dan nonetheless, taking Dan’s demeanour in with a smile.

“I’m gonna be –“ Dan began, and was interrupted by Willow calling out from over in the middle booth.

“Hi Stanford.” She waved, and Suzie, who was sitting beside her, waved more enthusiastically.

“Hiyyyyy Stanford!”

Dan grasped Ford by the shoulders and looked at him seriously, his expression elated, and slightly teary.

“I’m gonna be a father. A dad.”

“Oh, well, that’s – congratulations.” Ford offered, somewhat baffled by Dan’s sudden emotional outpouring.

Dan clapped Ford on the shoulder, and then pulled him in for a hug, bawling his joy out emotionally.

“I’m gonna be a dad! I’m gonna be a Papa. This is the happiest day of my – the happiest day of my life.”

“Woah there, big guy.” Willow walked up to Dan, lifting him up off Ford’s bewildered shoulder, easing him away gently. “Take it easy.”

“I am so –“ Dan lampreyed onto Willow, holding her by the shoulders, transferring his loving gaze to her now. “So happy, you’ve given me the greatest gift, I just –“ Holding Willow gently, Dan turned around and roared to the entire crowd.

“DOES EVERYONE KNOW HOW MUCH I LOVE THIS WOMAN?”

The assorted lumberjacks cheered, responding to Dan’s loud exclamations, and Willow turned to Mrs Wentworth behind the counter, signalling to her.

“Can we – can we cut him off? He’s had enough.”

“I love youuuuu.” Dan crooned into Willow’s hair, and she laughed, pushing him away slightly, patting him on the arm.

“I know, I know.” Willow said, and looked around Dan’s bulky chest to view Stanford raising his eyebrows, smirking amusement at her, his assistant Fiddleford looking around with fascination. “So what brings you two down here? Sorry for not inviting you, this was kind of a spur of the moment thing.”

“A baby shower.” Ford nodded to Willow, noting the way her belly was protruding out slightly, realising that the bump had been hidden by her coat the last few times he’d seen her. “I’m sorry I didn’t bring a gift. Congratulations are in order.”

“Gee, thanks.” Willow smirked, enjoying the awkward way Stanford engaged with all of this. “We’re celebrating. What are you guys here for?”

“Some celebration of our own.” Stanford replied, watching the way Dan was pressing indulgent kisses to Willow’s hair now.

“Where’s your weirdo?” Willow asked, her perfect hair getting tangled in Dan’s scratchy beard.

“Oh, Bill wasn’t feeling well.” Ford explained, realising what she meant. “He’s resting at home. I’ll tell him you asked after him?”

“Don’t.” Willow pulled a face. “I don’t even want to imagine the kind of running commentary he’d bring to an event like this, much less what it would be like if he was here. You can keep that snarky asshole all to yourself.”

“I’ll tell him you said hello then.” Ford replied, laughing fondly to himself. “I must say, it’s very busy in here.”

“Well, drinks are on us, so, you know – if you feel like celebrating, now’s a good time to do it.” Willow shrugged.

Dan stirred on Willow’s shoulder and raised his glass, toasting the entire diner.

“DRINKS ARE ON US BOYS!”

“YEAH!” The lumberjacks cheered in unison, feeding into Dan’s excitement.

“I’m going to get him to eat something and sit down. I think the end booth is still free for you guys.” Willow gestured to the booth. “It’s good to see you.”

“You too.” Ford nodded politely, and inched his way through the crowds, leading Fiddleford to the end table, amused by the raucous celebration they were having.

Sliding into his chair, Ford looked out across the diner, his back to the wall, and smiled indulgently at the crowd. He wasn’t a big fan of crowds normally, but considering what this event was for, the wedding invitation Willow gave him suddenly made a lot more sense.

At least they seemed happy together though, Ford thought, as he watched Willow push Dan into one of the booth chairs and fall on top of him, laughing.

They were an unusually good fit for one another, with matching complexions and ginger hair. Ford had no doubt they’d have a family full of recessive genetics, coming to the fore, proliferating the rare features for another generation.

“It’s quite loud for a baby shower.” Ford remarked, seeming amused, watching the lumberjacks burst into another round of song, raising their glasses to the sky.
Fiddleford slid into the chair opposite Ford and looked over his shoulder. “I remember Pat’s baby shower was mostly her and her lady friends from her Tech College classes, having a lil picnic. This one’s much more … masculine.”

“Dan seems to be very excited to be a father.” Ford noted. “It’s refreshing, honestly. I remember my own father seemed to think having children was the precursor to one’s life falling apart.”

“Having kids is the best thing that happened to me.” Fiddleford confessed earnestly. “I don’t know where I’d be without Tate in my life. I know me and Pat didn’t really have it together when he came into the world, but there’s somethin’ about havin’ a family that makes things work.”

“Hmm. I imagine you’d just have to make do.” Ford mused, flipping over his menu, looking through it. “I never really considered parenthood for myself, perhaps I put more stock in what my father said than I anticipated. I imagine I’d make a decent uncle though. Teaching the kids science as they grow up, concocting fun experiments.”

“You could be a good dad if you wanted to be.” Fiddleford said, watching Ford curiously from behind his menu.

“No, I don’t think it’s for me.” Ford shook his head, and shrugged. “My own personal preferences aside, I just wouldn’t have the time or energy to dedicate to children. My life’s work takes priority over family, and I can’t imagine it would be all that safe, taking a child through an interdimensional portal to explore the universe together. It seems rather hazardous.”

“It does seem rather hazardous.” Fiddleford replied, watching Stanford optimistically, hoping this meant Stanford could see the danger in turning on the portal.

“Children are unpredictable.” Ford continued, missing Fiddleford’s point. “Besides, I should think a discovery like this would be left to men of science. People who can appreciate what traversing the galaxy would mean.”

“Right.” Fiddleford laid his menu back down on the table, disappointed.

The elderly Mrs Wentworth bustled over to their table, holding her notepad out.

“Can I take your order?”

“I’ll have the steak please. Medium well, with the pepper sauce.” Stanford ordered, looking over to Fiddleford.

“I’ll have the chicken, and some taters and gravy on the side.” Fiddleford passed their menus to the older lady.

“Any drinks for you?” Mrs Wentworth gestured to the baby shower group with her pen. “They’re on the house.”

“Hmm.” Ford poured over the drinks menu, before pointing at the wine list. “Is the house red alright?”

“Corduroy’s paying.” Mrs Wentworth shrugged.

“We’ll have a bottle of red then.” Ford decided.

“Red it is.” Mrs Wentworth picked up their menus and walked away. She returned quickly with their glasses, plonking the bottle of wine in the middle of the table, uncorking the wine for the men before turning away again.

Ford watched her leave, and chuckled to himself.

“It’s almost a shame Bill is missing this. I can only imagine him taking advantage of free drinks. There’d be nothing behind the bar by the end of the night.”

“Why is he missing this?” Fiddleford questioned suspiciously.

“He said he was dealing with a headache.” Ford replied. “Perhaps the stress of the first test is getting to him too. We all have a lot riding on this.”

“Is that why you’re rushing it?” Fiddleford asked quietly, fiddling with his napkin.

“I’m not rushing anything.” Ford frowned in reply, pouring wine into both of their glasses. “We are ready, we’ve been ready. We’ve run every test possible, and now the only test left is to turn the damn thing on.”

“Uhuh.” Fiddleford fiddled with his napkin some more, unrolling it from his cutlery to lay it out flat on the table.

Ford slid Fiddleford’s glass over to him.

“Here. We’re supposed to be celebrating.” Ford lifted his own glass, toasting it at F. “Cheers.”

Fiddleford looked at his own glass, but didn’t pick it up, still playing with his napkin. He bit his lip, and looked up, not quite meeting Ford’s eye, before he looked back down at the table.

“I don’t think we should be celebratin’ just yet.” F admitted, sounding incredibly tired.

Ford’s eyebrows scrunched together, and he opened his mouth to protest, but Fiddleford held his hand up.

“Wait, just wait.” F pulled a pen out of his front pocket and uncapped the lid. “There’s somethin’ I gotta explain to you.”

Ford shut his mouth, and frowned, watching Fiddleford sketch out a graph on his napkin. He wrote ‘time’ along the vertical axis and ‘probability of failure’ along the horizontal axis before charting a curve, the line creeping up the graph.

Sliding the napkin across the table to Ford, F bit his lip nervously, and looked up at Ford.

“That’s what we’re lookin’ at right now. That’s our likelihood of success.”

“I don’t –“ Ford began, irritated, but Fiddleford interrupted him.

“I know you don’t wanna hear it Stanford, but there are flaws in this machine. Deep flaws that could have disastrous consequences if we unleash it on the world. I’ve been runnin’ calculations on the Hyperdrive all day and it just ain’t sustainable.” Fiddleford tapped the napkin with the end of his pen. “There’s no tellin’ what this technology will do without testin’ it more thoroughly. It’s a device that can scramble and rearrange physics, rearrange time, velocity, all sorts of forces in it’s immediate vicinity, and that makes it incredibly unstable. There’s gotta be a better way to do this.”

“We won’t be able to craft technology like the Hyperdrive for another ten thousand years. Using the Hyperdrive now is our best shot of achieving interdimensional travel within our lifetime.” Ford replied earnestly. “I know it involves risk, to trust in this technology, but it’s our best shot.”
“It’s not just risky.” Fiddleford countered, frowning at Ford. “It’s reckless. It’s reckless endangerment, of our lives, of this entire town. The Hyperdrive’s unstable, the calculations back it up. Stanford, I know you trust this technology, but I don’t know why. What convinced you? Where did you get the idea to even use a thing like this? I just don’t understand.”

Ford was almost tempted in this moment to tell Fiddleford the truth, to tell him about Bill, about his cosmic origins, and his wider scope of knowledge. Bill trusted the Hyperdrive, he insisted on it personally, and Ford trusted Bill. Ford almost opened his mouth to tell F, to tell him the truth, but Fiddleford rubbed his forehead and spoke up.

“The thing is, I don’t need to understand. I just gotta look at the facts, and the facts are that this device is wildly unstable. We can’t turn on the portal, we can’t go ahead with it. Not in good conscience. You can’t risk these people.”

Ford closed his mouth, shocked by this revelation and sat back in his booth chair, deeply shaken. He felt blank, empty, hollow when he began to consider, really consider the prospect of abandoning his work now, abandoning everything he’d strived for. He looked past Fiddleford for a moment, drifting off, his eyes catching on a bright flash of red.

Willow’s hair, tossed back as she laughed, loud and hearty, at something Dan said. She smacked his arm before leaning in to kiss his forehead tenderly.

Ford stared, in a detached sort of way, at the people gathered in the diner, watching each one of them in turn, their joyful expressions, their jubilant laughter. They were so full of life, each of them fully realised individuals. The gravity of putting their lives at risk was beginning to dawn on Ford, and it rattled him to his core, the thought of harming them when he was trying to do good.

“It just can’t go ahead Stanford.” Fiddleford urged him, speaking gently, his words echoing through Stanford’s mental haze. “We can’t do it. We have to wait. Even if we gotta wait ten thousand years, we’ve gotta wait until we understand this technology. We can’t go ahead with this portal test.”

Ford listened to the music, and the laughter, and the cheerful banter of the townsfolk, all gathered around to celebrate new life, and he felt an abstract detachment from it all, his ambition speaking to him even now.

“But … my life’s work –“

F seemed to fiddle anxiously with the strap of his satchel for a moment, before he pulled out a stack of papers from his bag, stapled together neatly. With trembling fingers, he passed the document across the table to Ford, clearly very nervous.

“Your life’s work don’t have to be over.”

Ford examined the papers, reading the title page. It seemed to be a thesis paper, and Ford blankly read the title, still in shock at the thought of having to abandon his life’s work.

His brain quickly doubled back, and he read the title again, taking it in properly this time.

‘The Astonishing Anomalies of Gravity Falls’ read the title, and beneath it the research paper was credited to –

“By Dr Stanford Filbrick Pines?” Ford read the paper incredulously, his voice catching in indignation. “I didn’t write this.”
“I wrote it for you.” Fiddleford admitted, his knee bouncing anxiously beneath the table. “I spent the last three days workin’ on it without breaks. This paper, this thesis exhaustively chronicles your discoveries in this town, your greatest discoveries. You’re a researcher, a researcher of the paranormal. This is your paranormal research, this is your life’s work, not the portal.”

Ford blinked at the paper, that blank feeling in his chest fading now, being replaced slowly but surely with a bubbling anger that wasn’t fully realised just yet.

“Publish this.” Fiddleford urged him, pressing his shaky hands against the thesis paper as he spoke. “This is your research, I merely went through the trouble of cataloguing it for you. There are enough discoveries in here to make you a multimillionaire. With this, you’ll have everythin’ you ever wanted, and you won’t need to go through with this risky test!”

Ford looked up from the paper, and he was looking at Fiddleford with fresh eyes.

It was like he was looking at a stranger. A saboteur. He wasn’t looking at his friend, at the man he trusted. The man he trusted wouldn’t go behind his back like this and cut him off at the knees.

Stanford’s paranoia built, festering in the hollow empty space in his chest, cleared out by the thought of abandoning everything, casting aside everything because of Fiddleford’s ‘calculations’. What calculations? Maybe there weren’t any calculations, and Fiddleford was just making the whole thing up.

Don’t believe his lies.

Suspicion sparked in Ford’s mind, compounding on itself in a bizarre and jarring rush of epiphany.

Bill’s words from before came back to Stanford, his warnings echoing around Ford’s skull, fracturing everything he thought he knew about Fiddleford McGucket.

You think the people you work with are above reproach? They never are.

He’s not halting the test because he’s concerned for you, he’s concerned for himself.

Ford thought about the cryptic dreams he’d been having, the warnings within them. He thought about Bill’s vision, seeing the cosmos unfold in a blink of an eye, wondering what else the muse had seen, what he’d really been warning him about.

Your genius has been sabotaged too many times.

He thought about the mysterious phone calls, the suspicious way Fiddleford had been disappearing, going out more and more lately. He’d apparently been compiling this thesis for Ford for the past three days, but that didn’t explain all his absences, his sudden interest in local history, his strange communications with unnamed parties.

Stanford thought about that whispered conversation he’d overheard in the bathroom of this very diner, the glimpse of Fiddleford’s mysterious confidant he’d seen in the cracked bathroom mirror, second guessing whether he’d seen it at all. Now he knew that he had, he definitely had.

You think Fiddleford would betray us?

I think he has more to gain and nothing to lose if he did.

Bill had warned him, he’d tried to warn him, but Stanford didn’t listen, blindly believing his friend would want what’s best for him, what’s best for the portal, but now everything was made startlingly clear. What Fiddleford really thought about him, about his destiny, what he thought about these findings.

Stanford didn’t want to become a multimillionaire, he wanted to be the next Nicholas Tesla, he wanted to be the next Einstein, the mind of a century. And here Fiddleford was, capping his research, compiling it into a neat palatable little pile of papers, urging him to sell out, short change himself.

Fiddleford had taken the liberty to compile everything here into one convenient document. It hardly took any effort at all to change the name on the front page, to claim the credit for Stanford’s findings, or worse.

Ford watched Fiddleford with wide eyes, wondering if his friend, the man he went to college with, the friend he thought he knew, was planning to leave him with scraps while Fiddleford went off to discover the Grand Unified Theory of Weirdness himself.

Heinrich Goebel’s patent was in Thomas Edison’s greedy little hands the moment he kicked the bucket, he even stole from your hero, Tesla. What makes you think this is any different?

He feared in this very instant that he was becoming the forgotten Tesla to Fiddleford’s backstabbing Edison.

McGucket wasn’t above suspicion, no matter how many times Stanford had convinced himself it wasn’t in Fiddleford’s nature to betray him like this, to betray anyone, he was discovering in this, his light bulb moment, that no one was above reproach. There really was no one he could trust.

No one but Bill.

He had warned him. He’d been on side with him from the very beginning, urging and enabling him towards his destiny every step of the way.

He believed in him.

I want to see you achieve your destiny. Can you honestly say he does?

Ford decided in that instant, and he decided irrevocably.

He would trust Bill over Fiddleford any day.

Fiddleford watched Ford with a gentle expression, patiently waiting for Ford’s reaction, his knee still bouncing under the table. The light caught on Stanford’s glasses, shielding his expression. Fiddleford waited optimistically, hoping his friend would see sense, would listen to reason.

Stanford pushed his glasses up his nose and revealed an expression of absolute rage, of scorn, of betrayal, turbulent emotions contributing to the stubborn set of his jaw.

He reached into his coat pocket and pulled a fifty out of his wallet, slamming it down on the table.

“For the check.” Ford said, sliding out of the booth, standing up, his hands balled into fists beside him.

“Ain’t you gonna read it at least?” Fiddleford frowned, looking up at Stanford in askance, not expecting his friend to react with such vehement ire against him.

“I wouldn’t dignify it with a single glance. You clearly know nothing about me, about this portal, about what we’re doing here. This is the most insulting thing I’ve ever encountered in my life.”

Ford scowled, looking down his nose at Fiddleford, who sat, looking rather small in the booth.

“I – I didn’t mean it as an insult. I – it was meant to –“

“To what? To patronise me? To diminish my work? To plagiarize it?” Ford said cuttingly, gesturing sharply as he spoke.

“No!” Fiddleford retorted, offended that Ford would even think he’d do a thing like that. “I meant it to – to –“

“I don’t care what you meant by it. I won’t have a bar of it.” Ford told Fiddleford, fuming with betrayal. “This portal is my life’s work, and I’m going ahead with it.”

Fiddleford’s hopeful expression crumpled, and he looked heartbroken by his friend’s decision.

“We will do the test tomorrow night at eight o’clock sharp.” Ford said, glaring at Fiddleford. “Be there or get left behind. The choice is yours.”

Ford scowled at Fiddleford’s distraught demeanour a moment longer, before he swiped the wine bottle off the table, storming out of the diner, leaving McGucket behind with the revelry and laughter.

Pacing out into the cold night, Ford decided he’d walk home, giving himself space to work off a little steam. He was still seething with betrayal, with the thought that Fiddleford would go behind his back like that, co-opt his research and lead him off track.

After his argument with Kryptos, Bill’s temper was still flaring, billowing below the surface like an untamed forest fire, spreading the longer he thought about it. About everything he had to do.

He couldn’t afford any screw ups this late in the game, and the Goo Mobster’s pulling out was a screw up that Bill couldn’t justify. He knew he had to follow through on his deal with them, but his reluctance grew from a place of spite, of caustic bitterness.

Why should he do favours for a creature who very clearly looked down on him, who thought less of him for being callous with Kryptos - Kryptos of all people. How dare Don Goo guilt him, try to play at his emotions, and then accuse him of being a bad leader, accuse him of treating his henchmaniacs like garbage.
Just because they weren’t a family.

That didn’t mean the Goo Mobsters were any better than Bill’s gang, heck it didn’t mean anything, shouldn’t mean anything, but my god did it rub Bill the wrong way.

Bill had needed a hell of a lot to drink after dealing with Kryptos’ insubordination and the Goo Mobster’s threats, and now he was feeling inebriated and nostalgic, a terrible mix, his temper a sinuous undercurrent to it all.

So what if Bill didn’t have a family? He made do. He was doing just fine without one. He was successful, he had loyal henchmen, power, control – he was about to conquer Earth, the Mayfair of the Galaxy.

That wasn’t the sort of conquest just anyone could make. No screw up could make it, and Bill was determined to prove he wasn’t a screw up.

He had friends, he had loyal henchmen, he had Sixer.

He didn’t need family.

He didn’t need them, but oh how the ache persisted. The near constant ache that hadn’t died down after bleventy billion years. It followed him wherever he went, a burning deep down inside of him that just didn’t go away.

He’d kept that fire burning low, managing it with a potent mixture of seasonal numbness and cavalier denial, throwing himself headfirst into parties, violence, chaos. If he stopped to think about it too long, that numbness crept back in, as it was the only tolerable alternative to the anguish Bill felt whenever he dwelled on that eternal ache, that constant pain deep within him.

When the pain overwhelmed him he felt helpless, and he didn’t like feeling helpless.

So he grasped back control any way he could, and tonight that meant imbibing copious amounts of cosmic alcohol and teleporting to the border limits of Dimension 52, holding fire in both of his hands, burning with misplaced drunken fury.

Letting the fire trail along the forest floor, climbing up the purple mossy trees that littered Jheselbraum’s fertile domain, Bill watched it burn, consumed in his own inner turmoil.

That fire he kept burning low, the one that hurt him when he stopped to think about it, had flared back up lately.

Around the same time Sixer said he loved him.

It was a hurt that burned painfully in Bill’s soul, wracking him cruelly with this awful spark of optimism for a world in which someone would love him again.

Bill hadn’t hoped for it. The last time he heard someone tell him they loved him, the last time someone meant it, was a very long time ago, back when he still had parents, had a family. Sixer saying it was a cruel reminder of all that Bill had, everything Bill had lost, and everything he hoped to regain, all in one fell blow.

What made it worse was that Sixer wasn’t even awake when he said it. Bill could tell Sixer wasn’t conscious, he wasn’t, because when he woke up he had acted like nothing had changed between them, and this was the sort of thing that changed EVERYTHING.
It had changed everything for Bill.

The part of him, deep inside of him, that burned painfully, hurting him, that part had risen, the fire razing him painfully within.

He knew what the fire was – what he hadn’t dared to acknowledge.

Hope.

This raw, painful, terrible hope that was eating Bill alive.

After all he’d lived through, after all he’d seen, all he’d caused, Bill hadn’t let himself hope that he’d ever do anything that would allow anyone to genuinely feel love for him – he didn’t deserve it.

Though he clawed and scratched his way to the surface of legitimacy with every moment of waking consciousness he encountered, it still wasn’t enough to warrant love, to warrant that level of forgiveness for his misdeeds, of understanding, of unconditional acceptance.

The last people to unconditionally accept Bill for what he was were his parents, and look where that got them.

He didn’t deserve to be loved, and just hearing those three little words scraped everything inside of Bill out until he was hollow again, left with nothing but the rawness of it all. He spent so long pretending, trying to convince the universe that he wasn’t a screw up, and when the universe didn’t buy what he was selling, he gave them what they wanted. He gave them the screw up.

And look where that had got him.

He was just trying to be better, to build a better world.

If that hope he hadn’t wanted to feel would finally give in and die, splutter out of existence, maybe he’d feel fine, but he didn’t. He just felt raw and angry and upset, misplaced energy leaking out of him as his fire bubbled over, pouring out of him viscously, until the entirety of the mossy purple forest in Jheselbraum’s realm was covered in voracious blue flames, crumbling the landscape to ash and dust.

“I know you can see me Jhessy.” Bill called out, watching the forest burn all around him, flames devouring the trees and the plants and the creatures that lived among them, unerring destruction making his mood tangible. “I can feel your eyes on me.”

“Not just meaningless words now, am I?” Bill yelled, fire oozing out of him, dripping into the ground, burning the soil. “I’m really doing this. I’m really going to do it this time.”

Bill could feel Jheselbraum’s central eye burning into him, that sapphire gaze tracking him all the way from her temple on the mountaintop. He had her full focus. He was sure he was quite the sight down here, making a scene, dousing half of Jheselbraum’s kingdom in flames.

Why have you come here? Jheselbraums words projected into the field around Bill, echoing at him imperiously.

Of course, Miss Fussy Foresight couldn’t step foot into the burning field herself. She was still so sensitive about that.

“I’ve come here to warn you.” Bill called out, looking around him at the fanning flames. “Stay out of my way. I’m really going to do it this time, and if you try to stop me, I won’t let our past get in the way again.”

Bill pointed up to the mountaintop, slurring his words.

“This is your warning. Butt out of it. And maybe when all this is over, you can live. Wouldn’t you like that?”

I would like for you to leave. Jheselbraum’s voice came back, clipped and controlled, dignified and as false as she was. And take your grotesque fire with you.

“I might leave it, as a present.” Bill blinked at the fire that had crept out around him, far further than he intended. His control had slipped, and nearly the entire forest was lit. It was lucky Jhessy’s people all lived up on the mountain. They’d learned their lesson from last time. “You know, for old times sake.”

Just get out.

“Have I ever told you you’re not very hospitable?” Bill blinked up at the mountain again, squinting at the temple in the distance.

Get out.

“Fine, I’m going.” Bill waved his hand dismissively at the temple. “But don’t say I didn’t warn you. It’s going to work this time, and when it does, it won’t be your fish god saving the day – it’ll be me. It’ll be me, do you hear?”

Leave. Jheselbraum seethed.

“Fine, I’m going. Where’s the door? This dimension’s just – ugh-“ Bill shook fire off his leg, and pulled the air apart to the left of him, tearing a hole through the fabric of the cosmos and stumbling through it, before doubling back to point at the mountaintop temple. “I’ll be back when all this is over. I still have your carrot top so don’t try anything.”

Leave Bill.

“I’ll leave when I want to – what’s that?” Bill blinked into the rip in spacetime, and then waved goodbye to Jheselbraum and her cohort. “That’s - goodbye Jhessy! Bye! Got things to do, people to be.”

Jheselbraum watched Bill from behind one of the stained glass windows in her temple, her hand resting on the glass, scowling down at the ruined forest as Bill closed the tear in spacetime behind him, disappearing.

She never did enjoy his visits.

---

Ford’s temper still hadn’t abated, those feelings of betrayal following him all the way down to the lake.
He didn’t know what it was about the lake that drew him there. Nostalgia for bitter past memories maybe, or the uncanny ability red wine had to draw him to the things that hurt him.

The water was black, faint moonlight barely glancing down onto the waves, their acoustic ebb and flow decorating the silence of the night.

Ford’s wine bottle was nearly empty, only a few mouthfuls left, and he knew he’d be nursing a killer headache in the morning. It was probably for the best that he scheduled the portal test for eight, that would give him time to sleep in and rest off the headache he was developing.

He felt a wave of empathy for Bill, the cosmic being dealing with the first headache he’d ever encountered since being gifted physical form. The muse needed to lay down all evening because of it, missing their celebratory dinner.

Ford wished he’d missed the dinner.

He could have done without discovering that Fiddleford was a backstabbing leech of a friend.

He hadn’t wanted to believe it, but the signs were all there, the secrecy, his hesitation, his overcautious behaviour masking his true intentions.

That was the funny thing about betrayal, Ford thought, watching the waves crash upon the shore. Despite how much you might trust a person, trust their intentions, believe that they’d never act in a way that would cause you harm, cause you to lose your future opportunities, it just hurt that much more when you wanted to believe they were a good person and they weren’t. When you wanted to believe that they’d never do this to you.

Ford sniffed, and wiped his nose on his sleeve, moving to take a swig from the bottle he held, realising when he put it to his lips that it was empty.

He tipped the bottle upside down and watched the last few drops of red wine fall out onto the rocky beach, a libation poured for sabotaged dreams, and the trust that could never be earned back, no matter how much you wanted things to be the way they were.

You couldn’t go back from a betrayal like this.

Stanford knew.

He looked at the bottle in his hand, the label on the Cabernet Sauvignon decorated with a picture of a sail boat.

That little ship mocked him, the ship on a bottle. He didn’t need to be reminded of lost dreams, tonight, of all nights. Not when his dreams were right around the corner, and Fiddleford had nearly cost him them all.

Ford almost believed him too, he almost believed Fiddleford when he said they couldn’t proceed with the project. Stanford didn’t want to put anyone in danger, but that wasn’t what the portal was about, it wasn’t about harming people, it was about protecting people. Saving lives.

Stanford could change the world with the technology he discovered traversing that portal, he could do so much good, catapult the world into a new era of understanding, of technology. He could broaden their horizons, but betrayal lingered like a sailboat on the edge of his ideal horizon, cutting through the skyline, impairing Ford’s view of the sun rising.

He hated it.
Glaring down at the picture of the sailboat, Ford gripped the wine bottle tersely, before reeling his hand back, and chucking the bottle out into the lake with a frustrated yell.

The bottle flew across the lake and landed in the water with a splash. It bobbed on the surface of the lake, floating just like a sailboat would, before water glugged into the mouth of the bottle, filling it up, dragging it to sink down to the bottom of the lake floor.

Throwing the bottle felt gratifying, it went some way to abating Ford’s irascible temper. He patted through his trench coat pockets, looking for more things to throw. He wanted to feel better, better than this, than this swirling hatred.

He threw his pen first, followed by his mechanical pencil, followed by several spare gears Ford had collected from the portal that Fiddleford had left behind, sending them all plummeting over, into the water, each one making a satisfying resolute splash as they were cast away from him.

He felt through his pockets for something else to throw, really getting into the swing of things, when his fingers happened upon an unusual shape.

Pulling it out of his pocket, Ford examined it in the moonlight.

It was the ring the palm reader had given him at the carnival. The mysterious glowing blue ring that had somehow found it’s way into Stanford’s pocket. He didn’t remember putting it there, he thought he’d left it on the table, though it was possible he took it with him in his haste to leave the heavily perfumed tent and the amorous fraud it housed.

When this is blue, you may pull through.
When this is black, you can’t turn back.

It was blue when she gave it to him, a glowing blue gem clasped in the four bronze hands that held the gem in place on the ring.

It certainly wasn’t blue now, the glow all but gone from the ring. It was completely dull, more like obsidian than any sapphire Ford knew of.

You can’t turn back.

Ford felt a fission of doubt form in the back of his mind for a moment, contemplating what it would mean if Fiddleford were right, and going ahead with the portal test really was dangerous, really could be as disastrous as Fiddleford was saying.

Don’t second guess yourself, IQ.

Ford thought of Bill, and the vast expanse of possibility they could accomplish together, and realised that letting Fiddleford’s superstition impact his decision here was limiting. Bill was right. Fiddleford was limiting him.

Throwing the ring out onto the lake, it sliced through the air, and landed in the water with a splash, sinking to the bottom of the lake.

Superstition is for the weak. Ford thought, setting his chin stubbornly, looking up at the moon. I’m a scientist.

Turning away from the lake, walking back through the forest, Ford returned to the shack, returned to his destiny.
And after tomorrow, I’ll be a great one.

Sitting amidst the silt and weeds growing at the base of the lake, the palm reader’s ring flickered, a faint blue light creeping into the gem, glowing beneath the water. The blue light filled the ring, pulling through Jheselbraum’s consciousness to the other side, but it was too late.

There was no turning back from this.

When Ford came home, around 3am in the morning, his hike went some way towards levelling his mood. He came through the door, substantially less inebriated than he was at the lake, and saw Fiddleford waiting for him on the couch in the living room.

It appeared he’d attempted to stay up, possibly worried for Ford, for his friend’s reckless jaunt out into the dangerous forest of a night time, or ready to make excuses, to act like he hadn’t lead Ford astray in the diner.

Despite his best efforts to be there for when Ford got back, in the time it took to wait for him sleep captured Fiddleford, and he was snoring, his head tipped back on the couch when Ford finally made it in.

Ford regarded his friend, or ex-friend rather, with a bitter look, before trudging upstairs without waking him. He didn’t want to talk to Fiddleford.

Not now. Everything he thought he knew about Fiddleford, everything he felt for their friendship, was now twisted up inside of him in a snarled mess of betrayal. It hurt just to look at him.

So Ford stumbled upstairs, and opened the door to his room, looking in at the empty bedroom, discontent pouring over him like a wave. He felt uncomfortable having Fiddleford in his house, having him under the same roof now, and he didn’t know how to reconcile these feelings of anger with the exhaustion that the day had brewed in him.

Ford paused, and looked across the hall.

Bill’s bedroom door was still closed, but he didn’t think the muse would mind if Stanford let himself in.

Tonight was a revelation in sabotage, in hurt feelings, and Ford really didn’t want to feel alone right now.

Toeing off his shoes and dropping his trench coat in his bedroom, he crossed the hall and slipped into Bill’s room.

The muse was still asleep, curled up around his pillows, wearing a concerted expression as he struggled through bad dreams, or possibly just the remnants of his earlier headache.

Ford removed his jumper, and undid his belt, shimmying out of his trousers, placing his glasses on the bedside table, before sliding into bed alongside Bill, wearing only his boxers and shirt.

Bill made an unintelligible noise as the bed dipped, squinting one eye open to take in Sixer’s
Ford wriggled closer to Bill, and wrapped his arms around the muse, pressing a kiss to his shoulder.

“Go to sleep. It's just me.” Ford murmured.

Bill grunted in acknowledgement, and jammed his eyes shut again. He kept still for a second or two, before melting back into Ford’s arms, nuzzling into him comfortably.

Ford felt the turmoil in his chest ease a little, ease enough to sleep, and so he spooned up behind the little god he’d summoned so many months ago, ardently grateful for his presence.

Ford rested his chin on Bill’s shoulder, pressing his lips to the muse’s back, before the words slipped out of him.

“What a day.” Ford mumbled.

Bill didn’t reply, the slow even sound of his breathing telling Ford the muse was asleep.

Ford sighed, his breath fanning out across Bill’s neck, and he rested his head against one of the many pillows Bill had co-opted. His eyes felt wet, tears sliding down from the corner of his eye, dripping onto the pillow.

“I’m glad you’re here.” Ford continued, his throat feeling choked, too tight with emotion. His voice broke, and he squeezed Bill a little closer, the words croaking out of him. “I can’t do this without you.”

Bill didn’t reply. The room was silent, this unheard outpouring of emotion making Ford feel more alone than ever.

He wiped his cheek against the pillow under him, feeling stupid, when he felt it.

Bill’s hand, inching down, to rest over Ford’s arm, the arm resting on Bill’s belly. Bill laced their fingers together, and left them like that, holding onto Ford’s hand in solidarity.

It wasn’t much, but it was enough that Ford no longer felt so alone. The ache in his chest dissipated, and he felt well enough to rest easy, knowing that no matter what tomorrow brought, they’d be facing it together.

In her mountaintop temple, Jheselbraum stood on the terrace, overlooking the embers that were left of her beautiful burgundy forest as the fire burnt itself out.

“Mistress.”

A crowd of cowed attendants and worshippers were grouping by the archways of the temple proper, dressed in fine silks and gems, whispering amongst one another, looking down on the ruination of their land in fear.
“He’s never come this close to the temple before.”

“Not in your lifetime, no.” Jheselbraum answered her servant, staring out onto the blackened horizon, lost in thought.

“Should we be scared?” One attendant questioned, clinging to her sister.

“What does this mean?” Another worshipper asked, hiding behind a pillar.

Jheselbraum did not answer.

One of her soldiers approached, stepping out onto the patio, saluting the Oracle, before standing at attention.

“Unswerving Majesty, what shall we do?”

Jheselbraum tilted her head to look down at her most loyal officer.

“Shall we respond to the threat?” The officer prompted.

“A warning.” The Oracle corrected her officer in absent tones.

“Threat or warning.” The officer stared stubbornly up at her leader. “It is still an affront. How long are we to tolerate this demon’s interference?”

“How long indeed?” Jheselbraum replied, lidding her eyes to consider the charred landscape.

“He wouldn’t come here unless we present the greater threat.” The officer surmised. “Now is the time, if any, to strike back. Send a message.”

Jheselbraum turned her chin to look at the officer properly now, her horizon coloured eyes gracing the soldier with her attention.

“Our last battalion never came back, but we could regroup. Send more soldiers. There has to be a way.” The officer continued.

“Tis a shame they never returned.” Jheselbraum remarked, hiding her own involvement coolly. “They fought so bravely.”

“Our soldiers could avenge them. A final assault. A full force.” The officer suggested passionately, trying to earn her Mistress’s sustained regard. “You said so yourself, their deaths were a consequence of his actions. We shall show the devil his actions have consequences!”

“Hmm.” Jheselbraum pondered, looking away from the soldier out to the smoking skyline.

Bravery and boldness seizing the soldier, she clenched her hands into fists, words blurring out in a fit of fervour. “I volunteer myself, to lead the charge.”

“No.” Jheselbraum said, her words slicing through the officer’s zeal, their shoulder’s slumping. “Not you.”

Jheselbraum turned around to face her worshippers, who crowded under the archways, seeking a glimpse of their Leader’s fury. “I will go. I will be there to deliver the truth into the mind of whatever creature clambers through that monster’s doorway, and let it be his own undoing.”

Her worshippers watched her in awe, astounded by her bravery, her selflessness. As Jheselbraum strode past them, into the bowels of her temple, her long flowing skirts billowing out around her, strings of amethyst and amber hanging from her waist, her followers could only aspire to reach her levels of purity, of avenging wisdom, of scintillating light and deliverance.

Privately as she strode through the corridors of her domain, Jheselbraum was smirking to herself.

Bill came to tell her not to meddle, to warn her for the sake of their past friendship. He was about to discover that there was no forgiveness from someone so thoroughly burned, despite his drunken attempt at an olive branch.

They may have once been friends, but that was a long, long time ago, and she’d burnt her bridges just as he had.

She made a vow that she would take EVERYTHING from him, and tomorrow night she planned to do exactly that.

Stanford and Bill slept in past midday, nursing identical hangovers, preferring to nuzzle up to one another blearily than get up and face their turning point of destiny.

It was an odd sort of dread they both felt, knowing that one way or another when the portal turned on, they’d be getting what they’ve always wanted, what they worked so hard for. Knowing that, this reluctance would have seemed odd, but that was the funny thing about getting what you’ve always wanted, it wasn’t always the victory you’d hoped for.

At around 1:30pm both Stanford and Bill could no longer pretend to be asleep, having exhausted that option as a method of procrastination.

Giving up on trying to shut his eyes and roll over to another half hour of mindless sleep, Stanford opened his eyes and stared at his muse’s face contemplatively.

“Still have a headache?” Ford asked Bill quietly.

“What time is it?” Bill squinted his eyes at Sixer, groaning.

“1:32 now.” Ford answered, looking over at the clock.

“When are we testing the portal?”

“8pm.” Ford replied.

Bill ran his hand down his face and shut his eyes. “Ugh, wake me up at 7.45.”

“Bill.” Ford chided.

“What? You don’t want to be down there any more than I do, and this waiting is killing me slowly. Very slowly.” Bill scowled. “Can’t we just rip the band-aid off and be done with it?”

“I told Fiddleford we’d run the test at eight.”
“So, go down there and tell him we’re doing it now.” Bill countered, sounding grumpy.

Ford looked sheepish, his brows furrowing. “I don’t want to.”

“You –“ Bill propped himself up on his elbow to look at Sixer more closely. “You don’t want to?”

Stanford looked down at the sheets, not meeting Bill’s eye.

“Why don’t you want to?” Bill probed, sensing something was odd about the scientist’s behaviour.

Ford was silent for a beat, finding the linen fascinating, before he finally mumbled his answer.

“You were right.”

Bill blinked at Ford expectantly, before clicking his tongue. “Yes, well I’m always right, so you’re going to have to be more specific here.”

“About Fiddleford.” Ford admitted. “You were right about Fiddleford.”

“Oh?” Bill said simply, watching Ford closely, waiting for the scientist to fill in the blanks.

“He tried to convince me to abandon the portal, to quit the project. He took the liberty of compiling a dossier of my research, telling me to publish and cut my losses. He was lying to me, trying to lead me astray.” Ford confessed sullenly, scowling. “Ready to snatch the portal out of my hands the moment I turned my back. All the signs were there, right in front of me. I should have seen it.”

“Oh.” Bill repeated, sounding mildly relieved. He’d laid the groundwork for this, but it was gratifying to know that when the chips fell, they fell in Bill’s favour.

“For a so-called genius I really am a Dummy for not believing my own friend could betray me like this.” Ford clenched his fist, his brow knotting up. “I’m an idiot. A trusting fool.”

“Hey.” Bill said gently, reaching out to cup Ford’s cheek, drawing him out of his sour mood. “You’re my trusting fool, okay?”

Ford spluttered on a laugh, looking up at Bill finally.

“You couldn’t have known he would betray you.” Bill consoled Ford indulgently.

“Did you know?” Ford questioned. “You tried to tell me.”

“Me telling you wouldn’t have made a difference.” Bill said, settling on that as his plausible excuse. “You have to find these things out for yourself to really believe it, for it to sink in.”

“I could have done without that revelation honestly.” Ford admitted. “Now I don’t know who to trust.”

“You can trust me.” Bill assured Sixer. “That’s really all you need.”

“You think so?” Ford questioned wryly, propping a pillow behind him, sitting upright.

“I know so.” Bill countered resolutely.

“Well, I suppose I should take your word for it then.” Ford reached out to stroke Bill’s shoulder fondly, smiling at his muse.
“It would be foolish not to.” Bill replied smugly, smiling back at the scientist. He sat up a little more in bed beside Sixer, and prodded Ford with his finger. “So, if McGucket’s a write off, what’s stopping us from going down there and testing the portal by ourselves, just you and me?”

“I told him we’d test it at eight o’clock.” Ford replied, looking down at his hands with a sigh. “I may not want to talk to him, but after all the work he’s done on the project, I can’t just go switching the ignition time on him. I owe him the chance to be there. I at least owe him that much.”

Bill gave Sixer a scrutinising glance, assessing the scientist in silence, before he remarked. “You don’t owe anything to the people who hurt you.”

Ford considered that, but said nothing, sticking to his principles.

Part of him still hoped that at eight o’clock, Fiddleford would be there.

Ford tugged on his lab coat, fiddling with the lapel, while Bill spun around on the office chair, flicking the switches in sequence to ready the machine. The generators were humming, electrical static serving as white noise in the background of the lab, accompanying the rhythmic beeping of the diagnostic devices. All in all, it created a compelling sonata, an ode to scientific exploration, but Stanford was too stressed to be moved by the music of discovery tonight.

It was 7:55pm and Fiddleford still wasn’t here.

“So Sixer, shall I flip the final switch, or reserve that honour for you?” Bill asked, his finger hovering over the third fuel switch eagerly.

“Wait, just wait.” Ford held his hand out, staying Bill’s enthusiasm.

Bill pouted, his shoulders slumping, and rolled his eyes. “You know, there’s optimistic and there’s idiotic, and right now you’re straddling the line.”

“Just wait.” Ford insisted, checking his watch. They were clear of gravitational anomalies, and it was 7:57. “Three more minutes.”

“That’s like asking me to wait three hours.” Bill groaned, and kicked the wheely chair away from the diagnostics desk, spinning the chair around. “Just face it IQ, he isn’t coming. That coward’s probably halfway across the country by now, burying himself in mediocrity back in Palo Alto. We’re better off without him.”

“Just wait.” Ford repeated, holding out hope. “Until eight o’clock.”

“Fine, but if he’s not here in one hundred and forty-eight seconds exactly, I’m turning this on. Dummy’s getting impatient.” Bill griped, gesturing to the mannequin sitting on the other office chair.

“Oh, Dummy is, is he?” Ford quirked his eyebrow at Bill, finding time to be amused by his muse amidst the stress.
The seconds were counting down on Ford’s watch, and they were approaching the final minute before the point of no return, when the elevator door dinged open.

Ford spun around to look, and lo and behold, there was Fiddleford McGucket striding out into the lab, snagging his own lab coat from the coat rack by the door.

“Fiddleford!” Ford exclaimed, oddly relieved to see his college friend. “You came.”

“I’m here, but I’m not happy about it.” Fiddleford remarked, adjusting his glasses, taking in Bill’s disappointed slump.

He put his hands on his hips stubbornly pretending he wasn’t terrified of what was about to happen, and gestured to the machine one more time. “Are you sure you want to do this?”

“Absolutely.” Ford replied immediately, no hesitation whatsoever.

Fiddleford sighed, half hoping Ford would have seen reason by now, but shook his head, walking over to the door to the lab, pulling it open to see the portal’s generators turned on, the machine whirring with life already.

“You ain’t sent nothin’ in there yet?” F questioned.

“We’re about to.” Ford replied, lifting Dummy off the chair, threading a rope around the mannequin’s wrist. “Not a person obviously, but this is just an initial test.”

“Give me that.” F strode over to Ford and snatched Dummy out of his hands, winding the other side of the rope around his own wrist, frowning at Ford. “I ain’t standin’ off to the sidelines while you do all the work. I’m not off the project yet, so you’re stuck with me.”

Ford was oddly pleased. A conflicted feeling, considering he was still somewhat sour at F for his stunt with the thesis. Ford watched Fiddleford check over the mannequin tersely, his frown an evident feature, and, despite himself, Ford smiled.

“Well, shall we?”

Fiddleford’s frown deepened, and he looked like he was about to say something, yet another deterrent to stop Ford from proceeding, when he was interrupted by Bill, over by the consoles.

“Eight-oh-one! Time’s up. Let’s get this show on the road already.”

Bill flicked on the last switch for the fuel regulation, and the diagnostic lights began to blink on. The portal’s machinery beeped and hummed, and now all that was left was to crank the lever in the other room, and throw the mannequin in.

Ford nodded, and held the door open, ushering Fiddleford in through with the mannequin. He looked back over to Bill, who was sitting by the control panel, watching him leave.

“You’re not coming in?” Ford questioned.

“You two can handle the heavy lifting.” Bill replied, spinning around on his office chair, drumming his fingers on his thigh. “Someone needs to check the readings on this thing to make sure everything goes right. But don’t worry, I’ll be watching.”

Ford nodded, and walked through the door behind Fiddleford with a smile, convinced nothing would go wrong.
Lingering in a crevice in space time, Jheselbraum lurked, watching Bill’s little minions clear out the airfield outside the asteroid belt that led into his nightmarish realm of chaos and terrors.

They wouldn’t see her, not when she’d perfected the art of folding pockets in space, making temporal portals that kept her safe and hidden until the latest opportune moment. The only person she’d encountered who could see through these portals of hers was Bill, and he didn’t seem to be here, which was concerning.

Getting his henchmen to do his dirty work for him. Jheselbraum thought somewhat hypocritically, unimpressed. Why am I not surprised?

Once the block of space was cordoned off, the henchmen seemed to be retreating, back to the Quadrangle.

If this was to be Bill’s grand entrance, why did he not want his followers to be there, applauding his success? Unless this wasn’t the main event, but some sort of preliminary run through?

All the more reason to be here. Jheselbraum reasoned to herself. So I can shoot his foolhardy venture down before it ever takes off the ground.

If Bill’s intent was to make sure nothing incriminating would await his pet scientists should they look through to the other side, he had another thing coming.

The truth really was the sweetest sabotage of all.

---

Stanford did the honours, he was the one to crank that final lever in the lab that set everything in motion.

A wind whipped through the underground laboratory as the wheel around the eye of the portal began to spin, the blue and white lights blurring together as the generators charged up the portal’s systems, electricity crackling in the air. When the power reached it’s required crescendo, the portal’s eye rang out loudly, yet subtly at the same time, the sort of sound that you can’t hear, but can feel in your eardrums, a sonic boom of energy that reverberated out, away past the lab, past the shack, throughout the town all at once.

A wave of energy, pure energy, striking outwards. The air felt different once that lever was pulled, charged with an odd pervading radiation.

With the lever pulled, the Hyperdrive kicked into gear, making the air seem lighter, dust particles floating off the ground in a minor, controllable gravitational anomaly.

Ford felt his tie begin to lift out from under his lab coat, and he absently patted it back down, eyes fixed to the whirring wheel, Behenian sigils whipping past so quickly the speed obscured their recognisability.

The light fractured around the portal, the speed was so intense, the blue sigils blurring into white light, blurring into the entire electromagnetic spectrum. The portal was exuding all light, all colours and radiation, but as Stanford and Fiddleford could only perceive the visible spectrum, the portal’s wheel looked like it was exuding a perpetual rainbow around the edges.

It was somewhat cliché, but Ford took it as a fortuitous omen, that a rainbow was paving the way to a bright future of discovery and genius realised, after so many rainy days of hardship.

Stanford looked over to Fiddleford and nodded, stepping up to approach the safety line.

Fiddleford nodded back, and took a hesitant step forward, dragging the mannequin along with him.

“We’ll release him in three –“ Ford counted down, gesturing as he spoke to Fiddleford, counting down on his fingers.

“Two –“ Ford continued, and Fiddleford raised his hand to yawn, his exhaustion creeping up on him.

The Hyperdrive’s forcefield was strong, and with Fiddleford’s hand gesture raising the rope a few scant centimetres, that was enough rope for the gravitational forcefield to seize it, tugging forward persistently.

“One –“ Ford looked back to the portal, his eyes drawn in by the spinning rainbow, distracting him from the fact that Fiddleford’s foot was too far over the safety line.

The portal was ravenous for matter, exuding its own gravitational pull, lifting Dummy up decisively, levitating him across the safety line.

Tired from spending half the night staying up worried for Stanford, Fiddleford’s responses were somewhat slow, slow enough that it took him several seconds to realise that Dummy was levitating, and he hadn’t even let go of him yet.

He looked down, and noticed that he was levitating too, which was when he began to panic.

Checking the consistent readings from the diagnostic machines, Bill was content that this test was proceeding as expected. For once his plans were going off without a hitch it seemed. It had only taken him a couple of centuries of human development to pull this off properly, but here it was, performing as expected finally, his own interdimensional doorway.

Bill’s sharp yellow eyes were tracking the readings, ensuring everything was functioning correctly, when a sharp shout of alarm from the lab drew his attention.

He kicked the office chair back to wheel across the observation room, leaning to look out of the doorway into the lab, blinking in the sight unfolding before him.

Dummy was levitating, being dragged into the portal, but so was McGucket, drawn along behind the mannequin, his legs and arms pinwheeling ineffectively against gravity’s fickle pull.

Bill blinked, deciding in an instant that this was less of a complication to the test, and more a solution in the making. Talk about killing two birds with one stone.

Bill lidded his eyes, smirking comfortably, as he watched McGucket flail, trying to untie the rope from his wrist, being sucked unerringly into the portal. Sixer hadn’t noticed yet, his eyes still glued to the whirring colours. Humans were so easy.

Specs looked up frantically, locking eyes with Bill from across the room, pleading wordlessly for help, some kind of help.

Bill just grinned, and waved at McGucket in a kindly way, like how neighbouring housewives in the 1920’s would wave at each other from behind white picket fences while harbouring unspoken grudges for one another. All congenial like.

The portal pulled harder, sucking McGucket and Dummy closer, and, recognising he’d get no assistance from Bill, Fiddleford yelled again, a wordless noise of pure panic.

“WOAH-HOAH-HAAAAAAAARRRGHHHMMMM!”

That drew Sixer’s attention, finally, the scientist looking over, startled.

“What?”

The portal’s grasp was unerring, dragging McGucket closer and closer.

Ford sprung up, aghast that something had gone wrong, that it was Fiddleford paying the price, proving his suspicions right. F was screaming, being sucked into the portal, until the screaming stopped, McGucket’s head being submerged in the surface of the portal’s eye, transported through spacetime to the other side.

“No!” Ford reached out, trying to bring his colleague back in vain.

He grasped onto whatever he could reach, six fingered hands fumbling to catch the end of the rope, cursing the world, cursing fate, cursing himself first and foremost, guilt already welling thick in his chest at the thought of causing F harm, of losing him in the portal while they were on such poor terms, of losing him at all.

The rope slid from McGucket’s wrist, but the strength of the wind in the lab whipped it around Fiddleford’s ankle, snagging it there, holding fast.

Ford held the other end firm, and planted his feet flat on the ground, heaving, trying to pull F back through the portal.

“I’ve got you buddy.” Ford muttered through gritted teeth.

Bill watched from the lab door, somewhat disappointed now. Of course, if anything were to ruin this neat dispatching of loose ends it would be Sixer’s heroic streak. Bill watched Sixer struggle with the rope, trying to tug McGucket back through the portal, already bored of the rescue, when he felt a peculiar energy that had him sitting up a little in his chair. It felt … familiar.

Bill blinked, doubting these sub-par human eyes of his for a second. Was it just him, or was the portal glowing a more vibrant blue than it should?

Uh oh.

Not good.

Bill sprung out of his chair, knocking it back as he ran through the door to the lab.

The chair fell on it’s side, the wheels at the bottom of the chair spinning aimlessly.
Ford looked over his shoulder briefly, hearing the clatter from behind him. He opened his mouth, the words ‘Bill, help’ on the tip of his tongue, when he felt it too. The pull of the portal, the gravitational anomaly lifting him off the ground.

Ford let out a startled shout of his own, and looked over to Bill, watching the muse bear his teeth in an odd sort of grimace, concern widening his bright yellow eyes.

“Bill! I can’t –“ Ford gritted his teeth, his legs swinging, trying to find purchase on the ground. The rope was slipping somewhat, burning his fingers with friction. He adjusted his grip, not willing to let Fiddleford go, and reached out with his left hand to his muse, reaching out for help.

His muse no longer seemed shocked and concerned, his expression had twisted.

He looked furious.

Lightning crackled from Bill’s hands, clenched into fists at his side. The God extended his hand forward, opening it, and Stanford felt the air around him lurch, jarred by the weight of Bill’s will, his power unleashed.

Bill clenched his hand into a fist, and Ford felt Bill’s magic tingle in the space around him, it was like being submerged in static. Every hair on his body was standing on end, surrounded by so much tangible power.

The air seemed to compress, feeling squeezed tight, packed in, though Ford was thankfully unharmed.

When Bill pulled his fist back, Stanford felt less like he had been yanked, and more like the space around him had bent, sparks flying as Bill’s will clashed with the gravitational force field of the portal. The light on the surface of the portal glowed a more vibrant blue, unwilling to let go of McGucket’s head.

The lightning crackled all around the lab, singing the dirt walls, before Bill’s will triumphed, jerking the two scientists out of the portal’s gravitational pull.

Ford gripped tightly to the rope as he hurtled through the air, flying to land on the other side of the safety line, skidding on the ground as he fell while blue bolts of electricity jettisoned around the lab, emanating from his muse’s body.

He fumbled for the rope, his right hand red with friction burns, looking over his shoulder to see Fiddleford and Dummy come sailing out of the portal behind him to land in the dirt, thankfully both in one piece.

Once Sixer was safe, back in the lab, Bill strode over to the emergency override button in the middle of the safety line, and slammed his palm down on the button, shutting the portal’s eye off.

The portal’s eye whirled to a halt, the rainbow dimming, blue light retreating, until it was just the white glow of the lit Behenian sigils adorning the lab.

Bill turned around, reeling in the energy pouring out of him into something more placid, less vengeful and inhuman, to look for Sixer, to check his reaction, but the scientist was already crawling over to kneel beside McGucket, who was twitching spasmodically on the floor, pupils massively dilated.

Ford placed his hands on Fiddleford’s shoulders and shook him gently, trying to snap him out of this trancelike state.
“What is it? Is it working?” Ford questioned, thinking to ask about the portal before all else. “What did you see?”

Fiddleford’s eye twitched, his brain processing what had been inflicted on it, before he regurgitated the information, speaking in gibberish, like his mind was glitching on the output.

“Votmzrig, Ivskrx Oory!” He spluttered unintelligibly, and Stanford frowned, leaning closer to listen, stumped by F’s garbled words.

It almost sounded like Bill’s strange language, the one he spoke in his sleep when he thought Ford wasn’t listening.

“Fiddleford?”

Bill paced over to stand behind Sixer, staring down at McGucket.

The hick scientist shouldn’t know how to say his name, let alone say it backwards in his own tongue.

He looked between Sixer’s confused expression, and McGucket’s dilated pupils, seeing the lingering spark of blue light within that told him everything he needed to know.

Ford shook F’s shoulder a little more avidly now, worried.

F shrugged him off and sat up on his own behest, his movements almost mechanical, pupils dark and fathomless, his gaze fixed on something far away, possibly not of this world.

He recited - words, ominous words that didn’t sound like his own, while his body shook, rattling his bones.

The words came pouring out of him.

“When gravity falls and Earth becomes sky – fear the best with just one eye!”

Bill glared at McGucket, recognising Jheselbraum’s hackneyed flare for the dramatic.

Another one of her ‘prophecies’. Oh joy.

“Fiddleford, get a hold of yourself.” Stanford urged his friend, his brow creased with concern. “You’re not making any sense.”

McGucket blinked, his pupils receding as Jheselbraum’s influence ran its course.

Bill could tell from the way Specs’ eyes darted immediately to Bill, cognisance infusing with fear and understanding, that the scientist wasn’t just a mouthpiece.

He knew.

Clenching his fist subtly at his side, Bill squeezed the air around F’s throat, causing him to splutter.

F fell back, and flopped jerkily on the floor, his limbs pinioned by an invisible force, making him feel like a prisoner, trapped in his own head. Even his tongue wasn’t working right, weighed down by an unseen force, encouraging his mouth to produce frothing saliva. McGucket’s eyes were glued accusingly to Bill the entire time as he twitched and shuddered, helpless in his own head.

“Fiddleford?” Ford cried out, hands flailing ineffectually over his friend’s body, trying to help.
“I think he’s having a seizure.” Bill said, sounding curious, and just concerned enough to cause Sixer to worry. “Hurry Sixer, go call an ambulance.”

“Right, an ambulance. Right.” Ford muttered to himself, picking himself up off the floor. “Is he -?”

“I’ll stay with him.” Bill reassured Ford, gently ushering him out of the lab with a wave of his hand. “Go. Hurry.”

“I’ll be right back.” Ford promised, and sprinted out of the lab, into the elevator, racing upstairs to the telephone.

As Ford left, the invisible power forcing F’s body to twitch and spasm stilled, though its grip hadn’t lessened.

Fiddleford watched - in abject terror, frozen in his own body – staring at the false creature crouched beside him, inhabiting a human form, watching his evil yellow slitted eyes stare at the elevator while the doors closed on Ford, knowing exactly what he was.

When the doors dinged shut, and Ford had gone, Fiddleford realised he was left alone in a room with this abhorrent, horrible creature, without any hope of rescue, entirely at his mercy.

Bill looked down at McGucket, coolly meeting his frightened knowing stare, and lidded his eyes at the scientist.

“Well Specs, you had a good run.”

Fiddleford’s vision warped, understanding overlaying with reality, superimposing the things he’d seen, the things he knew to be true, over what he was seeing now, yellow dancing monstrously in the back of his retinas.

“Y- Yroo –” Fiddleford stuttered breathlessly, struggling to fight back against the force that was holding him down.

“But I think we both know you’ve seen too much.” Bill continued, reaching out to pat McGucket in a patronising manner.

“N-no!”

His fingers trailed up to rest at McGucket’s temple’s, peering into his mind. Fiddleford couldn’t even flinch away, he couldn’t move.

“Yikes. That’s incriminating.” Bill huffed an absent laugh, exposed to Jheselbraum’s colourful ‘the best of Bill Cipher’ reel she’d implanted in McGucket’s head. It was almost impressive, the kind of stuff Bill would break out the popcorn for, if it didn’t throw such a spanner in the works right now.

“You’ve definitely seen too much.” Bill confirmed, bringing his hand away from McGucket’s forehead, examining his nails casually as bright blue flames sprung up in his palm, confirming everything Fiddleford had just seen. “Now, what to do with you?”

F broke out in a cold sweat, feeling it seep into the back of his shirt, his body pounding with adrenaline, glued to the spot.

“I know I can’t kill you. We had a deal.” Bill straightened McGucket’s tie for him as he spoke, patting away sporadic patches of blue flame that caught on the fabric. “But I hear madness is mostly painless, and very easy to maintain. You probably won’t even feel it after the initial jolt, and even if you did, you wouldn’t have the words to describe it anyway. So it’s a win-win, am I right?"

“P-please –“ Fiddleford shivered, panicking, watching Bill like one would watch a prowling lion or a tiger, a predator circling prey. “Please – I – I have a family – I –“

“And what would you do for that family?” Bill questioned slyly, watching McGucket shiver with fear. “To return to them in once piece?”

“You know what I am now. You know I can see anywhere, be anywhere, what I can send after your family if you cross me. You don’t want your kid’s first words to be his last, do you?” Bill asked sweetly, smiling at McGucket serenely, crouched beside him. “When you say anything, you better mean it, because I’ll hold you to it.”

“W-what do you want me to do?” Fiddleford asked cautiously, the feeling that he’d dug himself a hole here overlaying with thoughts of his wife, burnt alive, screaming, thoughts of his son turning to him, eyes yellow and slitted, reaching for the kitchen knife, sending horror home over and over again.

He wasn’t sure if these thoughts were his own, his imagination reaching for worst case scenarios, or if these thoughts were promises, sent by Bill, just scraping the surface of what depravities await his failure.

“You got me my portal, and for that I’m thankful, so I’ll be generous with your anything.” Bill crossed his arms, and watched McGucket’s self-preservation war with his common sense. “I’ll let you walk out of here yourself, go home to your family unharmed, forget all about this, with two conditions.”

Bill held up one finger, and a blue flame danced at the tip. “One: You quit the project. And you make it convincing. When Sixer comes back here, you’re going to tell him whatever he needs to hear to let you walk out and never darken his doorstep again. I don’t care if you make him hate you, I don’t care if you hate yourself for it, you convince him that you want nothing to do with him, and you do a damn good job of it. Capiche?”

Fiddleford felt the force around him ease enough for him to nod freely, which he did, in short jerky movements, self-preservation and fear outweighing his desire to do right by Stanford.

Stanford was the one who didn’t do right by him, bringing a demon in to work on the project, putting him through traumatic event after traumatic event, leaving him alone in the room to barter for his life with the monster crouched beside him.

The angry bitter part of him would have no problems pretending he was mad at Stanford, for putting him at risk, for putting his family at risk - and if what the visions he’d seen on the other side of the portal were right, for putting the entire world at risk, all for his pride.

He just had to muster the courage to bring that anger to the fore, when right now he could barely look past how utterly terrified he was.

Bill held up another finger, a second blue flame joining the first.

“And two, when you pack up your bags and take your little show on the road, the first thing you do when you get out of here, is you take your little memory gun, and you put it under your chin, and you forget EVERYTHING you’ve seen here. Every last thing.” Bill pointed at Fiddleford with one burning finger, narrowing his eyes at the shaking scientist. “You leave nothing out, and you go home to your family safe and none the wiser. You get your life back and move on. Now how does that sound? Good?”

It sounded too good to be true, knowing what he knew about Bill, what he was capable of. Fiddleford’s heart was pounding, racing in his chest, and he swallowed his hesitation, choosing life, and he nodded again.

“An’ - and in exchange, you’ll leave me an’ my family alone, right? You w-won’t touch them?”

Bill held the two flaming fingers up again in a traditional salute. “Scout’s honour Specs. They’ll be safe from me and mine.”

“Y-you won’t hurt Stanford, will you?” Fiddleford thought to ask, his guilt catching up with him, aghast at the thought of leaving his friend behind to deal with Bill alone, wondering how he’d live with himself for prioritising himself and his family over Stanford’s fate.

He’d have a lot to forget, if he ever hoped to forget betraying his friend like this.

“You let me worry about Sixer.” Bill replied smoothly, before extending his hand out to Fiddleford, releasing his body from the enforced stasis he placed on him, blue flame dancing in his palm, waiting for McGucket to shake on it, sealing their agreement. “Now, do we have a deal?”

Fiddleford’s bottom lip trembled, and he swallowed, that thick heavy feeling in his throat undoubtedly guilt, undoubtedly the spot where his moral conscience was sticking, telling him not to do this.

Sitting up, with shaky, unsure movements, F extended his hand.

Thinking of his family, of Patricia, and Tate, waiting for him, waiting for their dad to come back home, F sucked in a deep breath, and plunged his hand into the fire, sealing the deal with a handshake.

Surprisingly the fire wasn’t hot, but cold and eerie. The chill from the fire spread from F’s hand, all the way up his arm, seeping into his spine, and he shivered.

“Deal.”

“Good.” Bill rocked back on his heels, and stood up in one swift movement, pulling McGucket along with him.

The scientist stood up, and swayed on his feet, his knees feeling weak, dread settling into the coldness that ran up his spine. He heard the ding from the elevator sound from the lab behind him, and raised his head, having had barely any time to prepare for this.

Bill placed his hands on F’s shoulders, and Fiddleford could feel the heat resonating from the monster’s palms, subtly threatening to burn him, all the while painting a concerned, gentle picture for Stanford to see when he walked in here.

“Showtime Specs.” Bill murmured, watching F’s expression shift anxiously, panic creeping up on him again at the thought that he’d have to lie to Stanford now, lie convincingly enough to save his own skin. “Your wife and kid are riding on this. Make it convincing.”

Fiddleford steeled himself, and took a deep breath, already regretting this, regretting hurting Ford.
But he had to. For his family.

“Fiddleford!” Stanford cried out, rushing into the lab when he saw F was standing upright, that he was okay.

Privately he was thankful he left F with Bill, knowing that if anyone had the power to see F through to safety it was his muse. Even so, the ambulance was on its way.

Bill had his hands resting on F’s shoulders, checking on him, and Ford jogged over to them both, putting his hand on F’s shoulder as well.

“Fiddleford – you –” Ford panted, looking at F with concern. “Are you –”

Fiddleford seemed to suck in a sharp breath, before turning around, glaring at Ford’s hand, his six-fingered hand, with venom, before brushing it off him, scowling at Stanford, knowing it would hurt him.

“Fiddleford?” Ford withdrew his hand, holding it close to his chest. He never thought he’d see Fiddleford recoil from him like this, from his anomalous digits.

F shook his head at Stanford, and stepped away from him, tugging his lab coat as he spoke.

“This – this machine is dangerous.” F said, progressively sounding firmer.

It was clear he was rattled by his experience in the portal, angry about what he’d gone through, but Stanford just wanted to know what he’d seen. How could he look through the portal, into another dimension, be blessed with the knowledge that Bill promised lay on the other side, and be upset about it?

It was an opportunity for enlightenment. Who would turn down enlightenment?

“You’ll bring about the end of the world with this.” F hissed at Stanford, his eyes beseeching Ford, trying to warn him. “Destroy it before it destroys us all!”

F could feel Bill’s eyes boring into the back of his head, could feel the threat of his power still tingling in the air, but he didn’t back down. Even if he was leaving, even if he had to leave, he still had to warn Stanford. Warn him about what he’d truly unleashed.

He was hoping Stanford would notice the way his eyes darted to the left when he said ‘it’, gesturing to Bill standing behind him, the true harbinger of this apocalypse. Instead, Stanford just blinked at him, offended and upset.

“I can’t destroy this. It’s my life’s work.” Ford gestured to the portal, single minded and ambitious as always. And it would be his undoing.

Fiddleford swallowed his disappointment, and shook his head, clenching his fist.

“I fear we’ve unleashed a grave danger on the world.” F could feel the air squeeze around his wrist, a warning and a threat conveyed all at once.

_Stick to the plan, make good on the deal._

Fiddleford sighed, and looked away from Ford’s confused expression.

“One I would just as soon forget.”
He felt the pressure ease around his wrist now that he was following through on his promise.

If he couldn’t get through to Ford with those words, he had no idea what else would, and he didn’t have the time to stay and find out. Every second he delayed was a second his family were put in danger, he knew it.

Mustering his courage to follow through with this betrayal, F drew in a deep breath, puffing his chest out boldly, before he spat the words at Stanford.

“I quit!”

The words seemed to slap Ford in the face for a moment there, and he reeled back, stunned.

F didn’t give him time to process that statement, pushing past him, leaving the lab. He hoped that if he left quickly, he’d miss out on Ford’s reaction, having made good on his end of the deal, not wanting the guilt of Ford’s hurt feelings to weigh on his conscience. If he didn’t see Ford’s reaction, maybe he wouldn’t feel as guilty.

He stormed through to the observation room, and pressed the call button for the elevator, hoping the lift would arrive before he had to hear Ford process his betrayal.

Just as the doors dinged open, he heard it, Ford’s voice loud, shouting the words at Fiddleford’s back.

“Fine. I’LL DO IT WITHOUT YOU!”

F bit his lip, stepping into the elevator, his expression crumpling. He couldn’t turn around, he knew it.

“I don’t need you.” Ford’s words echoed around the lab, playing havoc on F’s forced calm. “I DON’T NEED ANYONE!”

The elevator doors closed behind F, and he let himself fall apart, knowing that he’d just delivered his friend right into Bill’s hands, having played his part in the monster’s game.

Now Ford had no one else to turn to.

And no one to save him from what was to come.

Ford panted, rage and disbelief competing with each other, as he watched the elevator doors seal shut behind Fiddleford, the finality of it all stumping Ford.

Just when he thought he’d got his friend back, back on board with the project, Fiddleford got a glimpse of what they’ve been working towards all this time, and he bailed.

Growling, his frustration overwhelming him, Ford kicked Dummy’s arm.

“Quit the project. I can’t believe – after everything we’ve done together. Now he gets cold feet. Now?” Ford ranted, betrayal compounding on itself twice in the space of two days.
He was furious.

“After being the first man to successfully enter a parallel dimension, he takes this gift and throws it away?” Ford gestured to the portal, looking at Bill in askance, his anger flowing through him. “Imagine if Neil Armstrong’s first words on the moon were ‘I quit’? Imagine if –“ “That’d be one way to fake the moon landing.” Bill replied, watching Sixer tire himself out, that righteous fury he’d been hoping for finally catching up with the human.

Ford laughed, a disbelieving bark of laughter interjecting into his outrage.

“I just – I just can’t understand. He had the opportunity, the remarkable opportunity, to confirm or deny our experiment, and he just storms out of here. Did he – did he tell you anything?”

Bill shrugged, and shook his head. “Nothing worthwhile. Just mumbling mostly, about his family, about being fed up with the project, about not wanting to be here in the first place.”

“Then why did he come? Why bother coming in the first place – I don’t –“ Ford ran his hand through his hair, frustrated. “Was the money all that mattered to him? I don’t –“

Ford clenched his fist, and brought it up to his mouth, trying to smother the emotion that was choking his throat, the thought of being used for his money, of being discarded like this, overwhelming him.

“I thought he was my friend. I thought –“

“Hey.” Bill stepped closer to Ford, speaking gently. He grasped Ford’s fist in both of his hands, and smoothed his thumb over Sixer’s freakish hands. “Sixer, don’t let it get to you. Some people just aren’t cut out for greatness.”

Ford closed his eyes and shook his head, his brow furrowed, betrayal playing havoc with his emotions.

Why had he let himself hope, when Fiddleford returned, that things would be better? Things weren’t better, they were worse than ever.

“So what if he leaves? Let him go back to his family, you don’t need him.” Bill assured him, still encapsulating Ford’s fist in his warm, gentle hands.

“I just – to think he’d throw it all away?” Ford questioned, feeling lost.

He looked up at Bill, noting the sympathetic way his muse was regarding him, feeling pitied. He didn’t like feeling pitied, certainly not by his muse.

Clenching his fist until it hurt, Ford swiped his hand out in front of him, anger brimming to the fore once more.

“Well, good riddance! I don’t need him. You hear me?” Ford spun around and shook his fist at the ceiling, yelling, though Fiddleford couldn’t hear him. “F, you weak-willed hayseed! Go on! Go back to your doting family, and a life of fear and compromise. I’ll do this without you!”

Ford’s shoulder’s slumped, and his hands fell down to his side. He shook his head, that choked feeling coming back to his throat, the feeling of being alone.

“I just – he had a golden opportunity, and he threw it away. He just threw it all away.” Ford sniffled, trying to stem his emotions from bubbling over. “To think I considered him a friend.”

“He left, he’s gone.” Ford sighed, the rage bubbling out of him, his anger spent. “And now I’m alone.”

“No you’re not.”

Ford felt his muse take his hand, unfold his fist. He turned back around, and watched his muse examine the red, blistered line where the rope had burned him, prodding it with delicate fingers, before smoothing that cool, healing blue flame across his skin, erasing the blisters, leaving clear healthy skin behind.

Ford watched, that painful optimism clawing back up his throat, acting as both a balm over his betrayal, and a reminder of how fleeting the feeling of having someone there for you could truly be.

The wound was gone, like it was never there.

“You’re not alone.” Bill reinforced, smoothing his palm over Sixer’s, holding his hand.

“I just feel like everything’s over.” Ford confessed despairingly, staring down at their joined hands, letting Bill lace his five fingers in the gaps between Ford’s six. “This test, it hasn’t gone at all the way I expected it to. F was the only one to get a glimpse of what lies beyond the portal, and he didn’t even stick around to tell us what it was like. How do we know we succeeded?”

“We did.” Bill assured Ford, giving his hand a squeeze. “You did it.”

Bill gestured to the portal, the lights dimmed, the eye lying dormant now the machine was switched off.

“You did this. You’re the Man Who Changed the World. And now it’s all yours to explore.”

Ford swallowed his melancholy, and stuck his chin out stubbornly, regarding the portal.

“You’re right.”

He pulled Bill in close, wrapping his arm around the muse, holding him against his chest, looking at the dormant portal, determination glinting behind his glasses once more.

“This is only the beginning.”

Pulling into the motel just on the edge of town, Fiddleford McGucket hadn’t stopped shaking. He shook when he was packing his belongings, he shook when he piled them all into his truck, driving along down the dirt road that led away from the shack, he shook when he paid for his room for the night, the notes and coins jangling out of his hand when he passed them to the clerk.

His hands were still shaking when he closed the door behind him, moving into his new abode, room number six at the Twin Bed Motel, jittery as he slid the chain into place, locking the door securely shut behind him.
It was only when he was alone that he let himself fall apart.

He cried. He wept, wept for his failed partnership, scuppered by the demon who was pulling the strings. He cried for Ford, and for his family, still shaking at the thought that he’d ever put them at risk, any of them.

He cried for himself, for what he’d agreed to, knowing that he still had his end of the deal to fulfil for his family to truly be safe.

Even if he did this, he forgot, how would he know, truly know, that his family would be safe because of it. Bill could go behind his back and harm them anyway, once Fiddleford erased his own memory, and F would be none the wiser.

There was an element of blind faith, of trust, in following through with this deal, and suddenly F didn’t want to do it.

He didn’t want to forget everything.

He looked over to the whiskey crate he brought with him, sitting innocuously in the corner of the room, hiding his memory ray within.

He walked over to the crate, and picked up the gun, turning it over in his hands. He walked back to sit on the bed, looking down at the gun, fiddling with the specifier.

He didn’t have to go through with this, did he? There had to be some other way, a way out of it.

If erasing his memory meant he left Ford in the clutches of that triangular monster, that was as good as throwing his friend to the wolves.

He tried to warn him, but was warning him enough? He had to help him. Help him stop Bill.

Turning his back on Gravity Falls didn’t just mean abandoning Ford, it meant abandoning humanity, leaving them all at the mercy of the end of the world.

Would it really mean anything to promise his wife and child safety from Bill if the world was going to end anyway?

His jaw jutting out stubbornly, F decided, speaking aloud to himself.

“No. I won’t do it.”

Fiddleford put the memory gun down on the bed beside him, and shook his head.

“I ain’t leavin’. I won’t let Ford face the end of the world on his own. I won’t do it. I won’t.”

F moved to leave the gun on the bed, to let go of it, but it was like it was stuck to his palm, F’s finger’s curved around the grip.

He tried to shake the gun out of his hand, but his fingers wouldn’t move, holding the gun tight.

“No.” F spluttered, horrified, when his limbs began moving of their own accord, defying his wishes. “No!”

His left hand rose, compelled by a strange yellow glow, forcing his fingers to rest on the dial, twisting the specifier left and right.
“No, no, no – no!” F fretted, watching the letter’s light up on the side of the gun.

E – V – E

“I don’t want this – I don’t – stop!” F begged, hoping someone would hear him in the empty room.

R – Y – T – H

“Stop! Please!” F sobbed, his shoulder’s shaking as his hands worked against him, regretting his decision in an instant. “Please, stop. I’ll do it. I’ll do it, just let me do it myself – I – oh god!”

I – N -G

“No. No please.” Fiddleford couldn’t stop shaking, his hands moving without his say so, positioning the bulb of the gun just under his chin, his finger resting on the trigger. “I’m sorry. I’ll do things your way! I’m sorry – please don’t do this. You said I could go back to my family – you don’t -”

The memory ray hummed, the device charging up as Fiddleford’s finger applied light pressure to the trigger, readying the blast.

The read-out on the side of the gun read EVERYTHING in glowing green letters at the base of the gun.

“Don’t do this to me.” Fiddleford pleaded, tears running down his cheeks. The point of the bulb felt hot against the skin of his neck, and he was crying desperately.

Bill was enforcing the deal, taking matters into Fiddleford’s own hands.

“Please. No.” Fiddleford hiccupped, and he could feel his finger lifting off the trigger, readying the shot. He closed his eyes, and thought of his family, his wife, his son.

“Tate.” Fiddleford whispered.

Everything burnt white.

Everything was gone.

Chapter End Notes

EVERYONE is losing EVERYTHING and the thematic repetition is THROUGH THE ROOF!

Things look bad. Don't worry, they get worse.

Little gems throughout this chapter include Ford subtly throwing shade on Rick and Morty, Jheselbraum being a total hypocrite, and Tommy the one eyed Goo Mobster taking his own advice.

Poor Fidds didn't deserve any of this, save Fiddleford 2k18 or 1k82 or whatever year they're in.

I hope you enjoyed reading this chapter as much as I enjoyed writing it, and as always, your comments are the highlight of my day, so let me know what you thought of it.

This chapter is dedicated to quantumseahorse, who is a delight, and drew some more lovely art for the fic, and a very sassy Pyronica. Thank you friend.
Next chapter, shit starts getting real, and the chapter after that is a real doozy too.
Good luck.
Would you laugh at me, if I said I care for you? Could you feel the same way too? I wanna know, what's the name of the game?

Chapter Notes

Hello! Just a heads up, this chapter is mostly just sex scenes past a certain point. There are two sex scenes in this chapter, quite graphic, depicting some loving, consensual rough sex. This is just a warning in case that's not your cup of tea.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Stanford was in the kitchen downstairs, fixing something to eat for his muse, trying not to focus on the empty feeling he experienced whenever he looked at the third chair sitting around the kitchen table.

Where Fiddleford used to sit.

Ford knew he shouldn’t feel bad, that McGucket’s departure only showed the scientist’s true nature, that it wasn’t Ford’s fault that he wasn’t equipped to deal with the discovery this portal offered, with what lay on the other side.

But still, the betrayal gnawed at him, squeezing his chest with regret at inopportune moments.

Bill sat on the chair by the window, dressed in Ford’s fluffy dressing gown, and rested his chin on his hand, noting the way Sixer’s eyes lingered on the chair opposite.

“He’s not coming back.”

Ford jumped, blinking at Bill, before he sheepishly rubbed the back of his neck, caught staring at F’s old chair.

“Would you even want him to, after what he did?” Bill pressed, watching Sixer’s reaction keenly.

“I don’t know.” Ford admitted, sighing. “I shouldn’t. Part of me just feels guilty.”

“Why?” Bill asked.

“I don’t know. I just feel that maybe… maybe if he hadn’t been through so much, with the Gremloblin and then again with the Shapeshifter, he might have been in a better position to deal with what he’d seen. Maybe he wouldn’t have quit, left it all just like that.”

“You said it yourself.” Bill pointed out. “He was weak willed. That had nothing to do with you.”

“I know, but I still feel responsible.” Ford frowned, and poured hot water into the two mugs he had lined up on the counter, continuing to make tea for himself and his muse. “He really seemed unhinged this time. Not himself. And all that talk about an Apocalypse.”

“Do you know the root of the word ‘Apocalypse’?” Bill stretched out leisurely, and reached for the mug of tea when Sixer passed it to him. He smelled the fragrant beverage pleasantly, and took a sip, humming at the taste, before continuing. “Before it got misconstrued by that hackneyed holy book? It comes from the Latin apocalypsis which comes from the Greek apokalyptein which means revelation, insight, discovery.”

Ford took the seat beside Bill, and sipped on his own tea, strongly reminded of the days before he summoned Bill to earth, where they’d sit and chat just like this, over tea, bandying philosophy and scientific rhetoric and hypotheticals back and forth until the early hours of the morning. It still held the same appeal.

“Some people, like you, are equipped to handle revelations, and epiphanies. You’re open minded and curious enough to take most things in your stride. Like me, for example.”

“Like you?” Ford quirked a brow at Bill, sipping on his tea.

“Most people, scientist or not, would run away screaming at the thought of a cosmic triangle inhabiting their dreams, telling them about the universe. As a dream, sure, it’s a pleasant enough fiction, but as a reality, it’s that confirmation that you’re not alone in the universe, that humanity isn’t the centre of everything, the height of all knowledge. It’s existential crisis fodder.” Bill shrugged, running his tongue over his teeth, before giving Stanford a shrewd look. “Most humans don’t take it so well.”

“So, you’re saying I’m not most humans?” Ford clarified, smugness creeping into his expression.

“You just want me to tell you you’re special.” Bill smirked at Ford over the top of his mug of tea.

“Am I not?” Ford chuckled, nudging Bill’s thigh with his own socked foot.

“I’m saying, McGucket isn’t.” Bill finished, setting his mug down on the table. “And that’s why he’s not here. He can’t handle revelations like you can.”

Ford’s humour sobered, and he looked over to F’s empty chair once more, saddened.

Bill watched Ford frown at empty space for a while longer, before he decided that Ford had done enough frowning.

Nudging the scientist back with his leg, playing footsie, Bill smirked at Ford.

“And maybe you’re special.”

Ford looked back over to Bill and smiled fondly at the muse, feeling wearier than he should after sleeping so heavily.

“Maybe?”

“Maybe.” Bill confirmed, before leaning forward to plant a kiss to Ford’s cheek. “Maybe instead of sitting around, moping, you could finish making breakfast.”

“Maybe I could.” Ford conceded, before heaving himself up out of his chair with a sigh, getting back to it.

As he prepared the ingredients he needed, he heard a strange noise from out in the front porch.

“-ot, hot, hot!”

“What?” Ford looked up, over to the front door, curiosity overwhelming him.

Bill was examining his nailbeds, and didn’t look up as he spoke. “It’s probably nothing.”
“I’m going to go look.” Ford declared, leaving the ingredients on the counter, moving through the house.

Part of him vainly hoped it was Fiddleford, coming to beg for forgiveness, having come to his senses, but when Stanford opened the front door to peer outside, no one was there.

Just rolling snow, and silence.

The cold bit into Ford, as he was wearing just a black t-shirt and trousers, and he resigned himself to the fact that nothing was out there. Ford closed the front door and locked it, trudging back into the kitchen.

“Probably just a bird.” Ford muttered, and resumed cooking their breakfast.

“I told you.” Bill said unhelpfully, and continued to examine his hands, tracing the black lines of unbound bricks up his arm with his fingertip, eyeing off the last two golden bricks that remained. He looked between those two golden bricks, and Stanford.

Ford was poking the omelettes around in the pan, seasoning Bill’s with plenty of chilli, and Bill’s eyes traced over the broad expanse of Sixer’s back.

Bill had one more day until he had to follow through on his deal with the Goo Mobsters, and after that, things would spiral pretty quickly. Given that the first test, despite Jheselbraum’s interference, was a resounding success, Bill wouldn’t be able to put off the big day forever.

It was funny, how when it was finally in his grasp, what he’d been planning for millennia, he was putting it off so he could spend more time with Sixer. He didn’t know how much more he’d get of this, and he didn’t know what he’d do when he couldn’t have this anymore, these simple, quiet moments with Sixer in his kitchen, acting like the world wasn’t about to end.

Even so, he couldn’t procrastinate forever, and he needed to get these last two bricks unbound properly before the ball started rolling.

“Say, Sixer?” Bill asked, his tone curious and light as Stanford passed the two plates across to the table, sliding Bill’s omelette in front of him and passing him cutlery.

Bill pointed to the last two bricks on his right arm. “What are we doing with these?”

Ford paused in between shovelling eggs into his mouth, chewing, and made a noncommittal sound, before going back to forking more eggs off his plate.

“What, was that supposed to be a word?” Bill asked, direly unimpressed.

Ford gestured to Bill’s plate with his fork, refusing to meet his eyes, hunched over his own meal.

“Your food is getting cold. Eat your eggs.”

Bill scowled at Ford suspiciously, but scooped up some omelette onto his fork, chewing on it sullenly, watching Ford all the while, waiting for a real answer.

“You know, I was thinking we could go up to Fiddleford’s room after this. Pack up anything he might have forgot in a box to send back to Patricia.” Ford said casually, changing the subject.

“You haven’t answered my question.” Bill narrowed his eyes at Sixer, still chewing on his eggs.

“No really the time?” Ford countered. “Fiddleford just left. Just yesterday.”
“Exactly, so we don’t have to hide it anymore. You could fix up a circle in the kitchen if you wanted to, now that there’s no easily offended rube to spook. I could be floating right now.” Bill argued, waving his fork around as he spoke.

“I have things to do.” Ford replied evasively, before he gathered his plate and cutlery and brought it over to the sink. “Finish your eggs. If you need me I’ll be upstairs.”

“Sixer?” Bill huffed, gesturing to the bricks. “I need you to finish what you started. Sixer!”

Ford was already gone, trudging up the stairs to the attic without a backward glance.

By the time Bill inhaled the rest of his omelette and stomped up the stairs after the recalcitrant scientist, Ford was already accumulating a pile of F’s knick-knacks that he forgot to take with him in his haste to leave, piling them into a cardboard box.

“What’s the point? He didn’t even take his –” Ford mumbled, and when Bill stomped into the room, Ford continued his conversation with Bill like he hadn’t been ignoring the muse’s wishes, gesturing to the pile of belongings on the bed. “He didn’t even take his Heck-A-Hedron.”

“Am I supposed to be surprised?” Bill scoffed, leaning against the attic door, crossing his arms. “He abandoned you, he abandoned his puzzle polygon.”

“It’s like he didn’t even think this through.” Ford put his hands on his hips, looking at the mess left in F’s room, emanating frustration. “He leaves on a whim, he ransacks the place. It looks like we’ve been robbed. In more ways than one, I guess.”

“Don’t get all poetic on me now Sixer.” Bill shifted his weight, watching Ford. “I’m not that kind of muse, remember?”

“I know, I just – it still hasn’t sunk in for me, I guess. I just don’t know how he could do this, when we’ve come so far together.” Ford frowned at the messy room, the vase of blue forget-me-nots dried up on F’s bedside, neglected.

Bill watched Ford, already bored of Sixer’s nostalgia laden lamentations. Tapping his right arm, Bill tried to get Sixer back on topic.

“Speaking of people not finishing what they started, can we get back to me?”

“Look, there’s even rubbish under the bed. Broken glass? That’s just irresponsible.” Ford replied, ignoring Bill, dropping down to his hands and knees to clear out the rubbish piled up under F’s bed. “Treating this place like a pig-sty.”

Unable to resist taking a jab at McGucket, Bill muttered under his breath. “Probably reminds him of home. You can take the pig farmer out of the sty, but you can’t take the sty out of the pig farmer.”

“There’s so much – ugh, broken light bulbs everywhere. Why does he even need this many –” Ford grumbled as he pulled the refuse out from under the bed, piling it up beside him.
“Don’t ask me to fathom what goes on inside his tiny mind.” Bill rolled his eyes, looking down at a pile of papers, stacked neat amongst the chaos, addressed to Stanford. Bill nudged the pile of papers off McGucket’s desk, into the overflowing waste basket beside it. The papers seemed to be notes detailing the ins and outs of the hyperdrive. Sixer didn’t need to see those.

Sitting on the desk, swinging his legs, Bill watched as Sixer’s back suddenly tensed, freezing.

He slowly pulled himself out from under the bed, looking down at something he was holding in his hands, shocked.

Bill could pick up that much from body language. Sixer had found something interesting finally in this pile of garbage.

“What is it?” Bill asked curiously.

Ford slowly turned around, facing Bill but not looking at him, his eyes glued to the device he held in his hand.

It was a memory gun.

It must have been F’s earliest prototype. Ford recognised it. It was the self-same device that Ford’s subconscious half recollected, though he didn’t quite know why.

Ford thought F had destroyed it.

At least that’s what he told him.

“He kept it. All this time.” Ford uttered, stunned.

Bill watched Sixer closely, looking for signs of repressed memories jumping to the forefront.

Instead Ford just looked tired.

“I can’t believe he kept it.”

Trying his luck at playing dumb, Bill blinked at the device innocuously.

“Didn’t you draw this in your journal?”

“It’s a ray gun. A memory erasing ray gun. It’s entirely unethical. I told F not to use it, to destroy it.” Ford’s voice raised to match his anger. “He told me he had. I suppose that’s what I get for taking him at his word.”

“So he used this on you?” Bill said, leaping to a very particular conclusion, sounding shocked, knowing the answer.

“No, I don’t think he would –” Ford began, almost reflexively defending his ex-friend.

“If you don’t remember seeing him destroy it, but you somehow believe he did, isn’t that evidence enough that he turned this on you?” Bill reasoned, hopping off the desk and walking over to where Ford was kneeling.

“I – I suppose so.” Ford searched for his anger, his indignation, but it was obscured by his sadness. He was deeply saddened at the thought of yet more betrayal, more lies.

“He could have been doing this the entire time, for months.” Bill prompted, looking for a reaction from Sixer, something he could twist. “He could have been stealing secrets. Jeopardising the project. Sabotaging your mind. How many times did he use this against you? How many times did he violate your trust like this?”

Ford just frowned down at the ray gun, listening to Bill’s words, but not wanting to believe they were true, not about his friend.

Yet logically it all made sense. There was a substantial gap in Ford’s memory after F first showed him the memory gun, and though he strained his brain to remember the event, all he remembered was the distinct feeling of being bruised, pain, and violation.

It must be true.

“You know, I wouldn’t be surprised if this was the real reason he left.” Bill surmised, standing beside Ford, watching his reactions. “He’d gotten sloppy, used the gun too much. He was afraid he was going to get caught, so he ran before you realised.”

“I don’t feel like there are any gaps in my memory.” Ford pondered. “Just the one.”

“But how would you know?” Bill pressed, leaning down to rest his hand on Sixer’s forehead. “How would you know there aren’t any gaps, if you can’t remember the gap being there in the first place? There’s no telling what’s missing, what you’ve forgotten. It’s a dangerous, heady thing, to mess with the mind, shape it to your will. You only know what he wants you to know.”

“How would you know?” Ford asked Bill, his stomach turning at the thought.

“How would you know that he didn’t?” Bill countered, watching the paranoia spark in Sixer’s eyes. “That’s probably why he left. He couldn’t stand looking at you every day, knowing what he did. Assuming he has a conscience, the guilt was probably eating him alive.”

“That could be why he was avoiding us, those last few weeks.” Ford conceded. “Why he spent so much time out of the house. I should have seen it coming. There were signs.”

Bill tsked, and brushed his fingers through Ford’s hair. “Poor Sixer. There’s still a lot you’ve got to learn about human nature. It’s not your fault you’re so naïve.”

Ford clenched his hands around the memory gun, gritting his teeth. He resented being called naïve by the muse, and he resented all the more the fact that his muse was right.

He had been naïve. Drastically so. A trusting fool.

“Everyone learns the hard way the first time.” Bill continued to stroke Sixer’s hair. He inclined his head, shrugging. “Ehh. The first couple of times. Eventually you wise up.”

“Thanks for the encouragement.” Ford rolled his eyes, and batted Bill’s hand away from his head.

“What? I’m trying to be helpful.” Bill scoffed, and crossed his arms. Sixer was prickly today, difficult to deal with.

Standing up, Ford shrugged away from his muse, and paced back over to the box of discarded possessions on Fiddleford’s bed.

He removed the canister of electrical tape from the memory gun as an afterthought and shoved it in his pocket, before throwing the gun on the bed, alongside the rest of Fiddleford’s forgotten belongings.
“I’m not sure why I thought this would make me feel better.” Ford grumbled. “I find not only did my friend betray me, quit the project, but he’d also been violating my mind for months, lying to me all this time. It’s despicable.”

Bill nodded, and began picking his teeth for remnants of chilli, speaking in a distracted manner. “Just when you think you know a guy.”

“I don’t even want to look at this room anymore.” Ford turned on his heel and stormed out of the attic, stomping down the stairs. “I can’t believe I ever trusted him.”

Bill followed, waving his arm at the scientist’s back.

“Hey, I know what you could do as a distraction. Fancy opening a vein. There’s a circle with our name on it. Hey, Sixer!”

“I’m going to go through the results for the portal test. I’ll be in the lab.” Ford issued tersely without turning around, hurrying faster down the stairs.

He paced all the way down to the elevator, closing the lift doors in his muse’s face, the indignant expression Bill wore going some way to improving Ford’s mood.

See how he likes it for a change.

“Fine. He wants space to deal with his feelings and mope. That’s fine.”

Pyronica was watching Bill pace, floating around the penthouse in the Quadrangle, waving his little black arms around dramatically as he spoke.

“So it’s fine.” Pyronica shrugged, and picked her space olive out of the nebula martini she was nursing.

“No! It’s not fine! I don’t have time to coddle Sixer’s feelings. Absolutely not fine!” Bill fumed, throwing his hands in the air.

“But you just said it was fine.” Pyronica lidded her eye at Bill, unimpressed with the triangle’s circular logic.

“Do you think I MEANT IT?” Bill scoffed.

“Well if you said it’s fine, but it’s not fine, and you don’t have time to pretend that it’s fine – why are you here?” Pyronica asked bluntly.

“Why?”

“Don’t you like – own him? Can’t you make him do what you say?” Pyronica bit the space olive from the skewer and gave Bill the sort of look she reserved for people when she thought they were being especially stupid.

“Look, it’s a little more complicated than that. I’d be an idiot if I presumed I could just swan around on earth, demanding instant gratification, snapping my fingers and having Sixer jump to it. Right now, this situation requires finesse. The other bit comes later.” Bill said, fiddling with his bowtie. “Until I get out of this flesh-cage, I can’t expect the humans to treat me like a god. They have to comprehend the entire package to get with the program.”

“I thought Six Fingers already treated you like a god.” Pyronica pursed her lips, narrowing her eye at Bill. “That’s what worshippers are for after all. When you say ‘jump’ they say ‘how high’.”

“I think I’ve exhausted my ability to make demands, since he’s already built me an interdimensional portal in his basement, but sure, I’ll snap my fingers at him and see where it gets me.” Bill grumbled, and massaged the bricks beside his eye, like he was nursing a headache. “It’s been working so well so far.”

“You really are treating him like your equal.” Pyronica remarked, gesturing to Bill with the olive skewer. “If this was Kryptos, delaying you, you wouldn’t have a bar of it. He’d be sizzling at the edges by now, pleading for mercy.”

“Don’t compare Sixer to Kryptos Py. You’d be turning my stomach, if I had one.” Bill said, sounding disgusted.

Pyronica blinked her lashes at Bill, considering that, before she spoke, sounding mildly awed.

“You really like him, don’t you?”

“Who, Kryptos?” Bill scoffed, turning his back to her knowing expression. “I’d sell him for parts in a hot second if I could.”

“Not Kryptos.” Pyronica smirked, watching Bill’s bricks take on a peachy tint. “Six Fingers. It’s not just a way to pass the time anymore. I haven’t seen you like this once, in all the time that I’ve known you, and I’ve known you for a long time. You’re attached.”

Bill looked at the floor, not giving Pyronica the satisfaction of a reaction, though the smugness was coming off her in waves.

“You want to keep him, don’t you? Have you thought about why?” Pyronica pressed patiently.

“Not this again.” Bill rolled his eye, and crossed his arms, scowling at the pink cyclops. “I will cut you off from the open bar if you continue to give me romantic advice.”

“Fine, don’t humour me.” Pyronica sipped her nebula martini, keeping her eye on Bill. “But I’m pretty sure that when you bring the party to earth, he’s going to have a pretty good idea about the kind of special treatment he’s been receiving. Becoming a henchman, right off the bat. The cosmic makeover. Having a seat at the table. He’s looking forward to it, right?”

“Mmmmm.” Bill erred, his voice pitching high, prodding his two pointer fingers together sheepishly. “He might not know about the party. Per se.”

“What?” Pyronica spat her drink out, her eye wide with disbelief.

“He might still think he’s saving the world through the majesties of accelerated science once we open the portal. And hey, who am I to dissuade him? He can think what he wants.” Bill replied defensively, skirting responsibility.

Pyronica looked at Bill, disbelief etched across her pink features. “So, you haven’t told him.”
“I don’t know if he’ll see things my way.” The words rushed out, worried, before Bill could stop them.

“But he adores you.” Pyronica retorted, stumped that things could be any more complicated than that.

“Listen Py, he may like me.” Bill put his hands together, and spun around, spelling it out for Pyronica. “But he’s not the sort of person who can get behind such a radical takeover, not if people get hurt. It’s a necessity, but he won’t see it like that. He’s … a good person.”

Pyronica gasped, scandalised. She held her hand up to cover her large mouth, watching Bill with growing concern.

“But, I thought he was an arrogant asshole.”

“He is.” Bill conceded, sounding resigned. “But he’s also a good person, and against my better judgement –“

“Why would you pick a good person? Bill!” Pyronica gestured to the triangle, indignant. “If he’s not on board with this, this could screw things up for everyone! You especially. It’s always us versus them, and you go and pick a ‘them’? Why would you take that chance?”

Bill sighed, and shrugged, before floating over to look out the triangular stained-glass windows of the penthouse, resignation infecting his tone.

“Py, scumbags like me are a dime a dozen. The universe is full of terrible people, liars, cheaters -realists.”

Bill looked down at his hands, and felt his feelings catch up with him, better judgement accounting for jack shit when it came to this. When it came to keeping the first being in the cosmos who genuinely seemed to feel love for him.

“I know I’m a hypocrite. So sue me.” Bill shrugged again, and turned to face Pyronica. “But I like the dreamers.”

Pyronica’s shoulders slumped, frustration and concern meaning nothing in the face of knowing her friend, knowing that this rare sliver of emotional vulnerability was who the triangle was, or had been, when they first met. Before he became jaded, bitter, and savvy, perfecting the reckless indomitable façade he put on.

So few people had lived to see this side of him, and tell the tale. The reason she was one of the survivors of this sort of rare intimacy was because she didn’t take it for granted. She didn’t see a weakness to exploit, but a soft side to protect.

She knew what it was like to need protecting. She could empathise.

She sighed.

“You always have.”

Bill exhaled loudly, sighing his frustrations out in a childish huff.

“But clearly I’m the one who’s dreaming if I think I can pull this all off. I have one more day – one day, to get out of this flesh-cage before I have to seal the deal with Don Goo, and after that, everything happens. Knowing Goo, he’d expect the ball to start rolling immediately after he gets what he wants, never-mind the fact that this is my party." Bill threw his hands in the air again, back to complaining. ‘I’m almost more at ease on earth with Sixer, but I can’t prolong this forever.’

“You’re keeping him though, right?”

“I want to keep him. I don’t know if after all of this he’ll want to keep me.” Bill said, sounding morose. “Honestly, I don’t know what he wants.”

“Well, he’d be an idiot if he doesn’t want you.” Pyronica said, trying to bolster Bill’s confidence with her well-intentioned optimism. “Didn’t you say he was a genius?”

“Ehh.” Bill laid his hand out flat and wiggled it, not wanting to give Sixer too much credit.

“Hmm.” Pyronica pouted and tapped her bottom lip with the olive skewer, trying to come up with a solution to reassure her friend. Sixer was another issue, maybe if Bill just focused on the problem at hand.

“You just need out of the flesh-cage, right?” Pyronica tilted her head, thinking. “Tick one thing off at a time.”

“And then I have to deal with Sixer, and the party, and then I have to organise favours, and attendance, and so many things!” Bill stressed, clutching at the air.

“One thing at a time, geez.” Pyronica knocked back the rest of her martini, wiping her mouth. “It’s like you’re forgetting whose party this is. Parties are supposed to be fun, Bill.”

“Sixer’s in a mood.” Bill huffed, rubbing the bricks beside his eye again. “I have to deal with his mood. His bad mood. Now I have a bad mood. It’s all his fault.”

“And who’s dealing with your bad mood?” Pyronica rolled her eye, and set the martini glass down on the side table, crossing her legs.

“Don’t get smart with me now.” Bill pointed warningly at the cyclops, his threat all but empty. “I’ve had enough smart from Sixer.”

“How are you approaching the situation?” Pyronica leaned forward, resting her arms on her knees, her tone reasonable. “What’s your strategy? Are you just waving your arms around, waiting for him to do what you say, or are you thinking about this? Thinking this through?”

Rather than admit that waving his hands around, expecting to be heard, was exactly what he’d been doing, Bill lidded his eye at Pyronica imperiously.

“What sort of strategy were you thinking of?”

“Well, I know I’m no Kryptos, but what about our old one? The fish angle one?” Pyronica suggested.

“You mean the anglerfish?” Bill rubbed below his eye considering it.

“The one where you dangle something tasty in front of your mark, and right when they get close enough – WHAM! Dinnertime.” She cackled, fondly reminiscing over the many times they’d used that strategy before, and how often it worked in her favour.

“Well, I might not eat him, but that’s not bad.” Bill conceded. “I just have to figure out what to dangle in front of him, what would motivate him.”
“Pfft.” Pyronica flapped her hand at Bill dismissively. “Humans are easy. Just remember what I said - lead him by the nose.”

Bill squinted at Pyronica, trying to figure out what she meant, while she tapped her face, just above her lips, a gesture that probably would have been more effective if she actually had a nose.

“By the nose.” Pyronica whispered for emphasis.

Bill privately questioned his choice in friends.

Climbing up the spiral staircase from the lab, Bill poked his head up into Sixer’s private study, looking around for the human, finding him sitting hunched over his desk, his hand scratching through his hair, staring at the readouts from the portal diagnostics machine.

His brows were furrowed, and his posture indicated that he was still in a mood, agitation emanating from his every slant and angle.

He didn’t look up when Bill’s footsteps sounded out, climbing up the last few steps into the lab, and he didn’t acknowledge Bill at all, even when he paused beside Sixer’s desk, peering over his shoulder at the print outs.

“That looks like a gripping read.” Bill chanced, trying to draw Sixer out of his mood.

Ford grunted noncommittally in response.

“Well, don’t oversell it.” Bill griped, and looked around for somewhere to sit.

Guessing accurately that sitting on the desk, impeding Ford’s work, wouldn’t exactly go over well, Bill settled himself cross legged on the floor by Sixer’s feet. There weren’t any other chairs available, and Sixer didn’t look like he’d be budging any time soon.

The feeling of being ignored purposefully while in the same room as your worshipper was grating, but something Bill had to endure. Sixer was as stubborn as he was smart, and he wouldn’t take well to being chastised for his behaviour.

Bill just had to wait it out.

Several minutes went past, silent minutes, the only noise the sound of papers rustling, and Ford adjusting his glasses.

He didn’t look Bill’s way once.

After seven minutes of mounting frustration, Bill decided he’d had enough of it.

He’d try things Pyronica’s way.

Ford read through the equations on the page before him, the readings coming out exactly as they should.
It was infuriating, having to parse through the lines of mathematical equations, trying to find what had Fiddleford so suspicious about the test’s success.

Barring the unfortunate incident that led to F falling into the portal, everything else about the test worked just as expected. There were no physical ramifications involved in phasing through the portal, and the trace radiation Ford found on the dummy was consistent with the radioactive materials used to power the machine. Nothing out of the ordinary or excessive. Certainly nothing suspicious to suggest that the machine might cause the end of the world.

Still, the fact that F would suggest that the portal was dangerous, despite his relative sanity or moral relativism, had Ford suspicious. Regardless of whether or not F’s claims were founded, or just a smokescreen to cover up his own nefarious deeds, Ford had a duty to follow them through, to examine them thoroughly. As tempting as it would be to dismiss them on principle, as a knee jerk reaction to uncovering his friend’s betrayal, F was right. He had a duty as a scientist to ensure his portal was above board.

The end of the world wasn’t exactly above board, in terms of maintaining safety regulations with this sort of experiment.

So Ford continued to scour the papers, looking for whatever trace element had convinced F that the portal was so disastrous. He was quadruple checking everything, just to test his memory, to test there was no gaps. He was searching for the indicator of mass catastrophe, the one element thrown in the mix that would bring about inevitable destruction.

He still hadn’t found it.

It could have been right in front of him, for all the good these re-reads were doing, and he still couldn’t see it!

He balled up the last paper he read through in frustration and threw it in the waste basket, reaching for the next page, when he felt it.

Bill’s hands resting on his trousers, just along his inner thigh.

Ford blinked, and adjusted his glasses, realising that in the time he’d spent ignoring the muse, he’d wiggled his way into the space under Ford’s desk, crawling in between his legs.

He leaned back, and saw Bill’s slitted yellow eyes staring up at him, glowing in the dark beneath the desk.

Bill reached up for Ford’s belt, and undid the buckle.

“What are you doing?” Ford asked.

Bill flustered, freezing, caught with his hand in the proverbial cookie jar, and replied before he could think his words through. “What are you doing?”

Ford blinked at the muse, the incongruity of his muse’s behaviour breaking through his frustrated demeanour, surprising him.

Amusement creeping in, Ford’s lips twitched upwards into a slight smirk, before he responded.

“I asked you first.”

“You asked first, I asked second.” Bill gestured between them from under the desk. “This almost “Funny, that.” Ford raised his eyebrow, taking in his muse’s blush. His eyes glowed fiercely in the dark, embarrassment setting in. Ford repeated himself indulgently. “What are you doing?”

“I’m giving you what you want, so you can get over yourself, and give me what I want.” Bill explained, and reached for Sixer’s belt again. “Everybody wins.”

Putting his hand over Bill’s, stilling him, Ford tilted his head at the muse. “I’m sorry, but in this instance, does ‘giving you what you want’ refer to what you asked for this morning? Because if so, I’m afraid I’ll be putting the breaks on this whole endearing initiative.”

“What?” Bill’s mouth dropped open, scowling that Sixer was already set to ruin his perfect plan. “Why?”

“I’m not going to let this –“ Ford gestured to his belt. “Happen if you’re not doing it because you want to do it. If you’re doing it just to manipulate me into making a trade – it’s not going to happen.”

“But don’t you want this?” Bill spluttered, gesturing to Ford’s crotch indignantly.

“I do.” Ford conceded, a little awkwardly given how emphatically Bill was pointing at his groin. “But not enough to barter bricks on it, and certainly not enough to see it proceed knowing you don’t wholeheartedly want to do it.”

“What makes you think I don’t want to do it?” Bill crossed his arms and squinted up at Sixer.

“You’re doing this because you want something.” Ford crossed his own arms, mirroring Bill’s body language stubbornly. “Not because you want me.”

“Maybe I want you to get over yourself, and engage with the fact that unbinding these two bricks for me costs you literally nothing, and would make my life a hell of a lot easier – something that you don’t seem to want for me.” Bill hissed up at Ford, smacking his calf for emphasis. “What is wrong with you? Why be so stingy this late in the game?”

“I’m not being stingy.” Ford retorted, offended.

“Yes you are! It’s just two bricks!” Bill grabbed Sixer’s left leg and shook it, frustrated. “Why are you holding back on me?”

“What’s your rush?” Ford countered, frowning down at the muse. “You’ve been pushing this since back in the bunker. What does it matter whether the bricks are unbound now or later?”

“It matters to me!” Bill patted his own chest emphatically. “It means that you’re stifling my true self, every second I wear these bricks on my arm. I’m not comfortable like this, I’m not happy. You’re holding me hostage without even having the decency to tell me why!”

“Look – I’m not trying to stifle you.” Ford began.

“But you are!” Bill interrupted. “You are, every second you force me to inhabit this inconvenient body. And I’m here thinking – there must be a reason. Sixer doesn’t do things without a reason. Does he like me better this way? Has he forgotten what I really am? Does he only worship me conditionally? Does he just not care? Is he just selfish?”

“No. Look, I – I’m not –“ Ford floundered, looking for an answer he could give his demanding
“Is he tormenting me on purpose?” Bill continued spitefully.

“I don’t –” Ford interjected loudly, holding his hand up, speaking over the muse, confessing finally. “I don’t want to lose you, Bill.”

“What?” Bill squinted up at Sixer, baffled by his incongruous answer.

“It’s just - sometimes I feel like the bricks are the only thing holding you here with me.” Ford admitted reluctantly, feeling selfish as he admitted his brewing motivations for keeping the muse bound. “And once they’re gone, there’s no reason for you to stay anymore. You’re a cosmic being. You can be anywhere, and see anywhere, in the blink of an eye. If there’s nothing else left holding you to me, you’ll – you’ll strike out on your own and seek out new and better scientists to hold your attention. I say better scientists in a very loose sense of the term, you’re not likely to find better than me, but you’ve made it more than clear to me in the past that I’m nothing special.”

“You just –” Bill fumbled through his words, exasperation setting in. “What about all the times I told you that you were special?”

“What about all the times you told me I’m not?” Ford countered bluntly, defensively.

“What, you want me to stroke your ego all the time? How is this any different?” Bill again gestured to Ford’s crotch.

Ford reached his hands down and grabbed Bill’s wrists, moving them away. “Look, could you stop doing that? This isn’t about – you’re missing the point.”

“No, you’re missing the point!” Bill countered. “Whether its motivated by insecurity or selfishness, the result’s still the same. You’re limiting me, and you know it. This is just an excuse.”

“It’s not an excuse!”

“It is!” Bill hissed.

“Then give me something!” Ford exclaimed, shaking Bill’s wrists as he spoke.

“Th – that’s what I’m trying to do!” Bill spluttered indignantly, again trying to gesture to the v between Ford’s legs.

“Not that.” Ford bemoaned, grabbing Bill’s hands, entwining them with his own mostly for the sake of keeping his muse from pointing at him again. “I need something – something tangible. Some sort of proof.”

“Of what?” Bill squinted up at Ford, feeling the scientist’s hands clasp gently around his own.

“Of – you know – how you … feel about me?” Ford managed awkwardly, feeling heat creep into his cheeks. He was making himself vulnerable just by asking, but after so many months it was something that had to be said. “Anything? You might occasionally say I’m special, but once you’re free, why wouldn’t you leave? What reason would you have to say? Am – am I a reason?”

Bill seemed to choke on his own regular verbosity, momentarily lost for words.

“Is it – is it ridiculous to hope that I might mean something to you? Enough that you wouldn’t – “ Ford struggled with his words, finding it difficult to explain the concept he hoped for. “I don’t even know what appeal I’d have for you in the long run. It’s like having feelings for an ant, I presume. And I don’t – I know you didn’t want to be here. Why would you want to be here? And what reason would you have to be once you’re no longer –“

Bill’s vessel was sweating, he was so anxious.

These questions were hitting closer and closer to the mark, and his conversation with Pyronica just kept rattling around and around in his head. Should he tell Sixer, should he not tell Sixer? Should he just give Sixer what he wanted to hear? Bill didn’t know if he could, if a false admittance was even possible at this point in time. He didn’t know what he wanted to do.

“I just – need to know.” Ford begged Bill, holding his hands, swallowing his pride and just admitting it. “How you feel? If this is permanent? Whether you – l-lo-“

Bill made a funny noise like he was regurgitating what he knew of language all in one syllable.

Ford belatedly realised that the muse’s skin was heating up, his hands feeling like hot ceramic, the temperature just shy of painful. Saving his skin, Ford let go of Bill’s hands, and clenched them, resting them on top of his thighs.

He didn’t finish his sentence. He had a feeling the muse knew what he meant.

Ford jutted his chin out stubbornly and waited.

Collecting himself, Bill twiddled his index fingers together, and took a calming breath, before looking up at Ford, his yellow eyes intent.

“You want assurances.”

“That would be nice.” Ford said bluntly, still watching the muse.

“What you want me to say is a concept that only has relevance for you.” Bill said evasively. “You want me to speak your language, but hollow words have no real weight. I could just be telling you what you want to hear. You want real assurances.”

Ford inclined his head in agreement, though privately he thought that he wouldn’t have minded hearing the words. Those three little words were irrelevant in the grand scheme of things, but hearing them would have been nice.

“You want to know that unbinding these last two bricks won’t sever the ties between us. You want something permanent. You want a reassurance that you won’t be abandoned, like you have been by everyone else in your life.” Bill watched Ford shrewdly, trying to work him out, trying to figure out why he was asking. “McGucket’s left, you don’t want anyone else to leave when your dream is just within reach. Is that right?”

Ford swallowed, and nodded, his voice coming out croaky. “Yes.”

“You want to keep me.” Bill surmised, his eyes a little wider than before, the revelation of that sinking in, that mutual wanting that Bill could relate to.

Ford almost thought to challenge Bill’s obscure wording, but he noticed the way the muse’s features seemed to brighten, glowing a more intense gold as the realisation set in.

Instead he simply nodded, his throat still feeling choked, tense.
“I think I know what you want.” Bill smiled to himself, piecing it all together, before he crawled up out from under the desk, resting his elbows on Ford’s thighs, staring up at him from between his legs.

Bill’s smile stretched wider, more indulgently now, and he tilted his head at Ford.

“You want to make a deal.”

Ford blinked. “No, I don’t think I said that.”

“That’s what I heard. You want to make a deal. You want something that’s more permanent, more irrevocable, more binding than the bricks on my arm, to keep us together. You want assurances. Real assurances!” Bill enthused, his pupils expanding.

“What do you propose?” Ford asked, his muse’s enthusiasm lighting a spark of cautious anticipation in his stomach.

“Be mine.” Bill squeezed Sixer’s thighs, pulling himself further up the scientist. “Shake on it. Give yourself over to me, mind and body, from now until the end of time.”

Ford’s stomach flipped at the notion fearfully, but he was intrigued. Ford often found himself drawn to what scared him, be it monsters, the unknown, or commitment.

Bill’s solution was far more radical than the three simple words Ford proposed, but effective. Far more so than any empty words would be, and Ford realised for the first time since he began to culture feelings for his muse, that there was a chance those feelings weren’t just reciprocated, but maybe even surpassed.

“You’d want to keep me around for that long?”

“And you want it too.” Bill nodded fervently. “Think of what we could accomplish, side by side, us against the world. You’d never be abandoned, because I’d be everywhere at once, and always connected to you. You’d have protection, power, the entire universe at all twelve of your fingertips. Anything you could ever conceptualise would be possible. You wouldn’t need anything but me for the rest of your days, but you’d have everything at the same time. You’d belong to me. Think of the power! The freedom!”

Thinking logically about this was hard, especially when Ford wanted to be swept away by all of this, getting everything that he wanted, and the regard of the god in front of him from now until the end of time. It was an intoxicating thought, but Ford’s common sense implored him to think logically.

“I’d belong to you, but that’s no assurance that you’d stay. That you’d belong to me.”

“Yes it is. It means I’ll keep you.” Bill countered passionately. “That you’re mine. I look after what’s mine, and you’d be mine forever. This is the assurance you want. You wanted something more binding than the bricks, well here it is.”

Ford considered it, realising that this was far more serious a commitment than the three words he wanted to hear.

However, he thought about what Bill said about hollow words, about assurances, and he realised that this deal was a promise, a follow through, in actions, not just words. It was the language his muse spoke, and the highest accolade possible in that language.
A deal that seemed to benefit Ford entirely.

He’d get to keep his muse, and have access to all the power and knowledge he possessed, everything in the entirety of the cosmos, from now until the end of time, and all that was required of him was to give himself over to the muse.

He considered how much he’d already given over, and how little there was left to give. It’d barely be a change from how things were now, given how deep Ford’s feelings for the muse went. He was already Bill’s chef, his entertainment, his scientist, his lover, his companion. What else was there to give?

Bill wanted Ford to be his, Ford felt like he already was Bill’s, in all the ways that counted. This formality would just be cementing that.

It was like what Ford had expected of Bill, but was unwilling to give himself, those three little words. Now the demand had flipped back onto Ford, requiring him to make a similar commitment, without the pressure of admitting those three words himself.

“If you don’t want to take it, then fine.” Bill said, sounding sulky that it was taking Sixer so long to decide. “But this assurance is for both of us. I don’t see why I’d bother staying for someone who couldn’t swallow his pride and just admit that he’s mine. Why I’d bother staying at all for someone who seems more intent on binding my powers than binding us together. This is the solution you wanted, the assurance you need, and it’s a way we both get what we want.”

When Ford didn’t answer straight away, Bill blurted out a quick ultimatum. “And it’s a one-time deal, so if you don’t take it, you miss out.”

That put the pressure on Ford to commit, one way or another. His muse needed a commitment from him, just as much as he needed one from his muse, and this was an elegant solution for them both, or as elegant as Bill was able to make, given his own habitual abruptness.

To belong to a God, in mind and body.

Ford looked at the gold eyed creature before him, and questioned how deep his feelings truly ran. He almost pulled out, precaution getting the better of him, until he saw the slight downturn of Bill’s lips, saw the genuine hurt that was brewing in his eyes, the barely hidden hope that was scouring Bill alive, just as much as it was wreaking havoc on Ford’s stomach.

This was much better than to simply love and be loved.

This was to have companionship for all of eternity, to never be alone, to never be discarded or abandoned.

And looking down at the contrary creature in front of him, inhabiting the body Ford had built for him, Ford felt that he’d come to know the muse well enough to believe that he could see himself spending eternity with the little god. He could see much of himself in the muse, and see someone who could understand him implicitly. Even if he didn’t know all there was to know about the God, Ford could see himself wanting to spend the rest of his life learning, finding Bill fascinating, even now.

Bill was entertaining, challenging, rewarding and perplexing enough to hold Ford’s interest for all this time. Ford had little doubt Bill would manage to hold that interest from now until the end of time. He didn’t think he’d ever be able to get Bill off his mind, to uncover all the muse’s secrets, to fully comprehend all that he offered Ford, to wrap his mind around the myriad of understanding available to him through the muse.

And beyond all of that, Ford could see in Bill, the same as he could see in himself, just how much teetered on his reply with all of this. How close to the edge Bill was hanging, putting himself out there. The thought that it could go either way was nerve wracking, as this was a crossroads that one could never go back from, yet Ford persisted. He didn’t want to make the wrong choice and miss out.

He felt like Bill held answers to the questions Ford hadn’t even asked yet, and and knew all this just by looking into the muse’s eyes, seeing that spark of hope wither like a spluttering flame amidst a raging inferno.

Bill had hope for him.

Ford would not extinguish that hope.

He had hope for them too.

Bill opened his mouth, his posture becoming defensive, withdrawn, ready to rescind the offer, when Ford spoke out.

“Then it’s a deal. From now, until the end of time.”

Bill blinked at Ford, the hope that he’d tried his utmost to swallow down as the seconds dragged on rising up to clog his throat with emotion, with possibility.

Maybe Sixer really meant what he had said that night when he was sleeping.

Maybe Bill had finally met someone who wanted to keep him too.

“Really?” Bill had to ask, disbelief nearly overwhelming him, just the same as relief did.

“Be yours, in mind and body?” Ford clarified, his voice rather thick for someone who was at least 90% sure of himself. “To keep you, and be kept for that long, as long as I live? I’ll take that deal.”

Bill boggled at Ford for a moment longer, the seconds dragging on, before clearing his throat, regaining his composure. He extended his hand out, blue flames dancing in his palm, then drew his hand back sharply.

“Are you sure? There’s no backing out of this. No buyer’s remorse. A deal is a deal.”

“This deal seems to benefit me far more than it does you.” Ford pointed out. “You do realise this means you have to deal with me for all eternity as well.”

“Well obviously.” Bill rolled his eyes, a smile creeping up on him. “That’s kind of the point.”

“Just making sure you know what you’re signing up for.” Ford said pompously, smirking at Bill. “I’ve been told I’m a terrible roommate, irritable, stubborn, arrogant and even called boring on the rare occasion.”

“Stop stalling and shake on it already, Poindexter.” Bill extended his flaming hand yet again. “The wait is what’s boring me. But you’re coming a close second.”

“Well, alright then. Wouldn’t want to bore you.” Ford extended his own six fingered hand, plunging it into the cool fire, and grasped Bill’s hand, shaking it firmly.
He felt the chill of the flame seep into him, coursing through his arm, all the way up, settling deep into his spine. He shivered as the feeling wore off, his body recognising how irrevocable this decision was faster than his mind.

It was almost underwhelming, the aftermath. Ford felt that the moment should have more emphasis, this great surrendering of himself to the muse in front of him, but barring the fading cold shivers, Ford felt drastically normal, his muse beaming up at him from between his legs.

“Is it done?”

“Yep.” Bill nodded, popping the p as he spoke.

“I imagined I’d feel different.” Ford looked down at himself. “Or look different, somehow. That a decision like this would leave some sort of impression, some lasting mark.”

“Well, if you want, we could always revisit that later. I still think you’d look good with tattoos, big inky me’s all over your body.” Bill said smugly, resting his elbows over Ford’s thighs now, sinking down comfortably between Ford’s legs like he belonged there.

“I’ll pass.” Ford rolled his eyes, abhorring the thought of feeding his muse’s ego any more than necessary.

“We could tesselate.” Bill said, waggling his eyebrows at Ford.

“Why do I get the feeling that means something dirty?” Ford said, raising his eyebrow at Bill.

The muse barked out a laugh, and ran his hands along Ford’s thighs, nails raking lightly along the sensitive inner thigh.

“You’ll never know.” Bill smirked mysteriously, then reached for Ford’s belt buckle again, undoing the buckle deftly. “The mystery will keep you up at night.”

“What are you doing?” Ford asked Bill, reaching down to pause with his hand over Bill’s wrist. “I told you, you don’t have to do that. I’ll unbind a brick for you tonight, no strings attached. You don’t need to trade.”

“Who says I’m trading?” Bill shrugged and batted Ford’s hand away, unzipping his fly and reaching into Ford’s boxers, wrapping his hand around Ford’s cock, stroking it indulgently. “This is mine now. It belongs to me, along with the rest of you. I can do what I like with it.”

Ford’s brain seemed to stutter at that, instinctual responses he never knew he had rising to the surface, making him flush red all over.

“You – “

Bill was watching Ford’s reaction smugly, his index finger teasing the tip of Ford’s hardening erection, enjoying the way the feeling of being owned was playing havoc on Sixer’s arousal.

Bill opened his mouth wide, and leaned forward, pressing his tongue to the side of Ford’s shaft with a completely unnecessary, loud, ‘ahhh’ noise.

Ford’s brain was still glitching, stuck in a loop of arousal and devout denial at the root of said arousal. He gripped the seat of his chair with both hands, his face turning a charming crimson.

Bill licked along Ford’s length, before pulling back, smacking his lips together and tilting his head, assessing the taste.

“Not bad.”

“Are you?” Ford squinted at his muse, before bringing his right hand up to knead his forehead, covering his eyes. He groaned. “I am not seeing this. Did you just taste me? Legitimately?”

“Seasoning?” Ford gawked at his muse, his mind boggling.

“Well, I don’t know?” Bill huffed. “I’m making this up as I go along.”

Ford leaned back in his chair, tilting his head up to face the ceiling, rubbing at his eyes in exasperation. “I can’t believe this. This is absurd. I can’t believe that I’m –”

“Oh boo hoo. Stop complaining,” Bill snarked, wrapping his hand around the base of Ford’s cock. “The only noises I want to hear out of you are cries of adulation. I’m doing you a favour, got that?”

“Oh, sure. A favour.” Ford rolled his eyes, and continued to complain, somewhat hysterically, only to be cut off by a hot wet heat encapsulating him. “I’ll be sure to th- ahh!”

“Mmmm?” Bill mumbled around a mouthful of Sixer, having wrapped his mouth around as much of Ford as he could manage, yellow eyes looking up at the scientist from under thick lashes.

Bill slid his tongue along Sixer, tasting him properly, and his teeth grazed along the underside carelessly.

“Teeth. Teeth. No teeth.” Ford cautioned Bill, going back to grasping the seat of his chair, his whole body rigid and tense.

Bill pulled off from Ford’s length with a frustrated huff, wrapping his hand around Ford’s cock while he glared at him.

“What, you want me to yank them out?”

“Wh – no!” Ford protested, his brain melting a little at the edges from the way Bill’s hotter than average hand was stroking him indulgently.

“You have some sick tastes, Sixer.” Bill continued to stroke Ford leisurely, enjoying the way he squirmed. “Enterprising. What else is there, I wonder?”

He pushed Ford’s chair back and climbed up Ford’s torso, still stroking his dick, running his free hand across Sixer’s chest, smirking at him.

“What depravities have you been hiding from me? Go on, IQ, show me your dark side.”

“You –” Ford huffed out a heavy breath, Bill’s hot hand working him over, before he reached out and grabbed the muse’s face. “I liked it better when you weren’t talking.”

“I see how it is. You want to shut me u - mmmmph!”

Ford yanked Bill forward and mashed their mouths together, kissing him firmly. He muffled his moans in Bill’s mouth, reluctant to admit how much this was affecting him, censoring his reactions.
Bill pulled away, his lips puffy, panting, before he quirked a brow at Ford.

“Fine, I’ll shut up.” Bill slid back down between Ford’s legs, and ran his tongue along the underside of Ford’s cock, looking up at the scientist. “But you better not hold out on me.”

Ford exhaled a hesitant breath, looking down at those devious yellow eyes, before he relaxed a little, settling comfortably in his chair. He didn’t seem to know where to put his hands, after being so confident with exploring Bill’s body before. Now the shoe was on the other foot, and Bill was exploring him, Ford’s surrender wasn’t as wholehearted as he’d promised.

Swallowing his nerves back down, Ford extended his hand shakily to rest it against the side of Bill’s face, not knowing what the etiquette for this sort of thing was.

Bill’s tongue pressed along Ford’s length for a while longer, tasting him, pressing full lipped kisses to his cock, before he mimicked Sixer’s technique from their last interlude, and sealed his mouth around the tip of Ford’s penis, hollowing his cheeks out sucking, being mindful of his teeth. He watched Sixer’s reactions closely, feeling his hand twitch at the side of Bill’s face. He could feel the waves of worshipful energy pouring off Sixer, so obviously Bill was doing something right, but the scientist still seemed too tense.

Bill leaned his head into Sixer’s hand, nuzzling it slightly to indicate the scientist didn’t need to be so wary, before he attempted to bob his head up and down, taking more of Ford’s length into his mouth, trying to remember how Sixer did it.

He was doing alright so far, judging from the way Sixer’s free hand was smothering the sounds he was making, quiet moans and grunts. It was obvious Sixer was still restraining himself, barely bucking his hips up at all, his hand still gentle, twining with Bill’s hair delicately.

Gentle wasn’t good enough, and so Bill decided to turn up the heat.

Pulling some of the magical flame from within him up his windpipe, Bill let the fire fill his mouth, heat tickling Sixer’s sensitive member.

Immediately Ford tensed, hissing, his hand clenching in Bill’s hair, twisting painfully. He hunched over Bill, and gripped the muse’s shoulder firm enough to leave bruises.

Bill smirked up at Sixer, smiling around his mouthful.

“You –“ Ford narrowed his eyes at Bill, recognising that this harshness, this roughness, was what the muse wanted. He was provoking Ford.

Too hot heat still dancing threateningly around his most sensitive part, Ford clenched his jaw, and decided that if the muse wanted a dark side, that’s what he’d get. Bill did just make a deal to have Ford’s complete surrender of mind and body, he’d get every bit of Ford he wanted.

Gripping Bill’s hair roughly, tangling his fingers in the golden mess, he pulled Bill slowly off his cock.

The muse complied, and when he opened his mouth, extending his tongue to press against Sixer till the very last second, curling flames exited his mouth, spiralling out into the air.

The light glinted off Ford’s glasses as he pondered the wicked, smug grin Bill wore, before he tensed his fist in Bill’s hair, guiding him back down.
“Let’s try that again.”

Bill seemed delighted by Ford’s forceful grip, his eyes lit up with excitement as Sixer guided him back down. He kept his mouth shut, wanting to see how far Ford would take it, though his lips twisted upwards, pressed together in a devilish smirk.

Ford could see Bill was testing him, making this a game of one-upmanship, and – knowing he wouldn’t scare the muse away, that he was stuck with him and chose to be, taking him for all that he was, Ford brought his right hand down and hooked his thumb in the side of Bill’s mouth, opening him up.

Bill’s breath felt hot against his skin, and Bill opened his mouth obligingly enough after Sixer’s little show of force. Ford decided to explore this opportunity, and pressed his thumb down on Bill’s tongue, lifting his chin up, before sliding his index finger in to press against Bill’s wet hot tongue.

Bill moaned, a contented ‘ahh’ sound, as he tangled his tongue along Sixer’s fingers, saliva slicking the digits. His eyes lidded amorously, and he moaned again, content to lavish attention to Sixer’s freakish fingers.

Seeing that for the invitation it was, Ford extended his fingers out, two more pressing inside of Bill’s warm mouth.

Bill licked Ford’s fingers lovingly, his tongue flicking over each digit, saliva coating them one by one.

Ford could feel his cock twitch, getting hard just from watching this ardent display.

It was novel, that Bill did not just accept, but actively cherished Ford’s anomalous fingers. After so long of having his fingers be a source of shame or scorn, now he seemed to be developing a fixation over them, offering them to Bill for him to appraise with his mouth. He just highlighted what made him a freak, and had Bill fellate it. Whether or not he intended to, he delivered this particular depravity of his to Bill on a silver platter.

Bill’s hands were heating up on Ford’s thighs, his peculiar temperature reacting, telling Ford all he needed to know about whether this was doing anything for the muse.

Clearly it was.

Ah well, Ford thought to himself, as Bill finished licking each one of his six fingers one at a time with that tricky tongue of his. In for a penny.

Tilting Bill’s chin up, Ford squeezed his fingers together, and slid them all into Bill’s mouth, filling him up.

Bill made a surprised gagging noise, his teeth scraping against Ford’s knuckles, but he allowed it to happen, watching Ford with curious glowing eyes, his mouth stretched wide.

Ford pressed his fingers further in, feeling Bill’s tongue dip and slide under him, until his fingertip tickled the flame at the back of Bill’s throat.

He held Bill’s neck in place with his free hand, and pushed his finger’s back farther, pricking tears at the corner of Bill’s eyes.

He made a muffled moan, discomfort and arousal twisting together, his eyes watering as he stared up at Sixer, who so obligingly was showing Bill his dark side, surrendering it all.

Moving his hand slowly, pumping it in and out of Bill’s mouth, fucking his throat with his six-fingered hand, Ford watched Bill gag around his fingers, blinking tears from the corner of his eyes, persisting for several minutes, until he withdrew his fingers from Bill’s mouth.

They were drenched, trailing strings of saliva between them and Bill’s tongue. The muse panted, watching as Sixer brought his wet hand down to stroke himself, once, twice, three times, before his dry left hand gripped Bill’s chin, rubbing his thumb against Bill’s bottom lip, assessing him.

“Are you ready to try again?” He asked, his tone solicitous, cold.

Bill loved it, Sixer’s potential shining brighter than ever, and he swallowed, before nodding, ready for whatever Sixer suggested.

Ford guided Bill closer to him, pulling him till he was face to face with his hard erection, straining upwards.

Ford didn’t even need to tell Bill to open up, his mouth was already hanging open, saliva pooling reflexively. Sixer had worked him up, his rough handling stirring pavlovian responses in Bill’s new body, and Bill was enamoured.

Ford stroked his thumb across Bill’s bottom lip once more, before he guided the muse’s mouth to close around his dick, surrounded by that hot wet heat once more.

“No fire this time.” Ford warned Bill.

Bill’s eyes glinted, not making any promises, but when Sixer’s hand cupped the back of his neck, pushing his head down onto Ford’s cock, he obliged, bobbing his mouth along Ford’s length.

Sixer was more relaxed now, his hips moving naturally, no longer holding himself back.

He gripped the back of Bill’s head, and fucked up into his mouth hard, filling Bill with his girth instantly.

Bill moaned again, his eyes rolling back, as Sixer used this body, sliding his thick cock between Bill’s lips, in and out, relentlessly.

To think, Sixer having his wicked way with this body was something that Bill had feared initially. To think he abhorred the thought of this, when the pleasure pain was rattling so pleasantly about, his mind lauding the careful cruelty. It was like he forgot how much he enjoyed sensations like these, both pleasurable and painful sensations, and Sixer, perfect Sixer, was concocting a medley of them both for Bill, playing him like a fiddle.

Bill moaned louder, enjoying the way his jaw was beginning to ache, the way the back of his throat protested whenever Sixer’s length bumped against it. Those painful sensations were offset by the pure vibrant worship instilled in the gesture, razing Bill’s body with pleasant feelings. He was tingling with energy, so much so that the hurts didn’t hurt.

He rumbled his contentment, kneading his hands against Sixer’s thighs, as that six-fingered hand on the back of his head forced him to take more, to take Ford deeper into his mouth.

The body was reacting the way human bodies do to this sort of abuse, his eyes were leaking, and his throat was complaining, saliva dripping along Sixer’s length, down from Bill’s lips, a puddle of drool forming on the floor.
He wondered if that funny backflip his stomach was doing was arousal or what he assumed was a gag reflex. He didn’t know, and he didn’t care to know. He was enjoying this too much.

Ford’s hips were jerking desperately upwards, holding Bill’s head in place as he fucked the muse. Bill’s mouth was hot, wet, and extraordinarily willing, and Ford could feel his arousal crest, even as those involuntary flames of Bill’s began swirling around the muse’s mouth, spluttering out with every exhale he was granted.

He could feel Bill losing control, just as swiftly as he was losing control, and he found it very satisfying for them both to lose control together, inhibitions let loose in tandem.

Ford groaned, and held tight to Bill’s head, as he painted the back of Bill’s throat with jets of white fluid, reaching his climax.

When he was finished, he eased Bill off his cock, watching those awed yellow eyes stare up at him while seed and magical flame oozed out of the muse’s puffy lips.

Ford tucked his sensitive, spent member back into his boxers, and stroked alongside Bill’s cheek, his expression showcasing adoration, and just a hint of concern.

Bill’s eyes were glazed, and tear tracks traced down his cheeks. Watching the cum leak out of Bill’s lips, joining the puddle of drool on the floor, Ford worried he took it too far.

“Are you alright?” He asked, scooting his chair back so he could bend down, examine the muse properly.

Bill sat on the floor, the last of the drool falling from Bill’s lips in a sticky droplet, blinking up at Ford, dazed, before he realised he was being asked a question.

Bill straightened his back up, extending his index finger up in the air like he was about to speak, before that overdue gag reflex of his kicked in.

His stomach flipped, and he lurched forward, gripping onto Ford’s knee, as a deluge of blue fire came tumbling out of his lips, pouring out of him.

Ford sprang back in shock, knocking his chair over. He watched Bill spew fire from his mouth, aghast, the blue flames curling out across the floor. He was torn between rushing forward to comfort the muse, and hurling himself across the room to grab the fire extinguisher.

“Bill?” Ford called out from across the room, worried for the muse, worried he’d somehow broken him.

The fire kept flowing out of him, the god shuddering as the flames flooded the room, spreading out across the floor. The flames were creeping across the carpet, towards the bookcases and the walls, covering nearly the entire study with dancing blue heat.

Just as he was itching to turn the fire extinguisher on Bill, not keen to watch his study burn up, he noticed that the flames weren’t incinerating anything. They just flowed out of Bill, twirling colourful patterns around him on the floor, before dissipating into nothingness.

Magical fire.

He edged closer to Bill, testing that he wouldn’t be burned, putting a toe into the edge of the flames, recklessly.
The fire was cool. It vibrated through Ford’s toe with the sort of high impact energy that felt more like electricity than fire, but Ford decided it was safe enough to endure, striding through it to put his hands on Bill’s shoulder, rubbing his back.

“Bill, are you okay?” He fretted, holding the muse’s hair back as the fire came tumbling out of him.

Bill raised his hand again, intending to speak, but the fire didn’t stop coming, regurgitating freely. His body was shaking with the effort it took to safely expel the flames, and his hand fell to grip onto Ford, needing an anchor.

Ford could only hold onto Bill, his body sizzling with static whenever the flames passed through him, waiting with him to ride this out.

When Bill hiccupped the last few bursts of flame away, he panted, gripping onto Sixer’s arm as the final curlicues of magical fire spiralled out across the carpet.

“Are you alright?” Ford repeated, kneeling beside the muse, waiting for it to pass.

“Ugh.” Bill mumbled, his throat croaky, holding onto Ford, his hands spasmodically clenching against Ford’s bicep. He shook out the tremors that wracked him for a few seconds more, and coughed, clearing his throat, before remarking. “Yowch.”

“I hurt you. I’m so sorry.” Ford agonized, patting over Bill with frantic, soothing hands. “I’m so sorry I hurt you. I didn’t mean to. I thought you wanted me to. I’m –“

“I did want it.” Bill interjected, stopping Sixer’s frantic apologies. “I told you not to hold out on me, and you did exactly what I asked you to. You just overloaded me, that’s all.”

“Do – do you mean I pushed too far, or -?” Ford worried, still rubbing Bill’s back reflexively.

“Not wearing the cuffs.” Bill waved his wrist at Sixer. “I didn’t think to. There was a lot of worship involved just now, and this body can’t contain that much energy without expending it somehow.”

“Then you –“ Ford looked at Bill, watching the muse as he sat up finally, wiping the corners of his mouth with the back of his hand.

“You said no fire.” Bill responded, swallowing the scratchy swollen feeling in the back of his throat, letting his body heal itself. “I tried.”

“Oh, Bill.” Ford tsked, before throwing his arms around the muse, pulling him into a hug. “You peculiar creature. There’s so much inside of you that I don’t understand.”

His cheek squashed against Sixer’s shoulder, Bill mumbled, slumping against the scientist. “I’m pre-emptively forbidding any talk of vivisections. I don’t care how kinky you are.”

“Stop it.” Ford scoffed, and hugged Bill tighter, stroking the muse’s back as he pressed indulgent kisses to Bill’s forehead. “I just meant that I’m beginning to understand why you resent this body so much. There’s so much of you that it just can’t hold.”

Bill let Ford smooth his hair back from his forehead, and kiss his check, watching him shrewdly.

“I could have told you that.”
“I didn’t listen.” Ford admitted, before he rolled his eyes. “And I’m sorry I didn’t listen –“

“Sure you are.” Bill squinted at him.

“But it’s rather difficult to believe all things considered. Then again, seeing this –“ Ford gestured to the carpet where the fire had been flooding just a few seconds ago. “That could have been …”

“A disaster.” Bill finished for him. “Gee, you think? Starting to reconsider why I need those bricks unbound now?”

Ford thought back on the limitless tower of flame he’d seen careening up from their campfire on the first night they’d been physically intimate like this, the word ‘disaster’ gleaning new weight. He looked down at the pouting muse he was hugging to his chest, and tried to reconcile the two images, that of his perfect, precocious muse, and the destructive powers, the limitless energy that lurked within him.

It was difficult to believe.

Ford pressed a decisive kiss to Bill’s forehead, choosing to recognise the muse’s effort to attempt to control himself, lauding that over Bill’s untapped potential for catastrophe.

Bill’s scratchy voiced earnestness when he looked up at Ford before, rasping ‘I tried’ at him, made more of an impact than Ford had thought.

Picking himself up off the floor, pulling his muse with him, Ford stood, his arm still wrapped around Bill’s shoulder.

“Come on, let’s get you upstairs.” Ford rubbed his thumb along Bill’s cheek, wiping the residue of spent tears from his skin dotingly. “We’ll get you cleaned up, in fresh clothes. Fix you something to eat. And I’ll see about unbinding that brick for you.”

Bill raised his eyebrows and blinked at Ford, before resigning himself to the pampering with a shrug.

“You’re being awfully obliging.” He narrowed his eyes at Ford, wondering if the scientist was being so obliging because he thought Bill was delicate, after what they’d just done.

“Yes, well I think I’m entitled to pamper you a little, after what just happened.” Ford remarked, supporting Bill’s weight as his knees trembled, still dealing with the aftershocks of that much energy being expelled from his body. Noticing the shivers, Ford ducked down, and picked Bill up, sweeping him off his feet literally.

Bill flailed and clutched onto Ford’s shoulders, before he slapped the scientist’s broad chest. “Woah now. This isn’t a fairy tale Sixer, put me down.”

“I’m sorry, I couldn’t hear you over the magical fire you just puked out all over my study.” Ford replied swiftly, stepping over the books that cluttered the room, pressing the lift call button with his elbow, refusing to put Bill down. “I can only suspend my disbelief for so long before I start giving into the clichés that abound.”

“Shut up Sixer.” Bill griped, and held onto Ford’s shoulder’s more securely. The scientist looked far too smug, and just as Bill was about to open his mouth to point that out, Ford kissed him, distracting him, pacifying him.

Bill’s mouth tasted like burnt matches, and metallic battery ends, but Ford kissed him anyway.
Bill melted a little into the kiss, silenced, and Ford pulled back when the lift dinged open, carrying Bill through the doors.

“You may as well resign yourself to at least a solid hour of fussing.” Ford informed the muse, elbowing the button for the ground floor deftly. “If not the whole day. I’m clearing my schedule.”

“But what about all the important work you were doing, rereading the same papers, ignoring me?” Bill asked sarcastically, getting used to being held in Sixer’s strong arms.

Ford looked at Bill, and chewed the inside of his cheek thoughtfully, considering, before he answered.

“If I haven’t found something wrong with the portal by now, I don’t think it’s likely I will today. We won’t be turning it on for another test right away, there’s time to look over the details. Today at least, I realise I should be focusing on what’s right in front of me.” Ford looked at Bill and smiled, pressing a kiss to Bill’s forehead. “And not some hypothetical future catastrophe that might not even be founded. You’re enough disaster for me.”

Bill said nothing, but smiled up at Sixer pleasantly, amused by his decision.

Ford didn’t know how right he was.

---

“Tollite lapidem.
Aurum et nigri.
Reduc ad eum.”

Bill watched the second last brick lift from his skin, a glowing line of gold thread.

The gold thread drifted in the air, leaving a dark black line in its stead, and the thread slowly began to disintegrate, red light bouncing off Sixer’s glasses as he held Bill’s arm and chanted.

“Da magicae retro.
Aurum et nigri.”

The thread dissolved into small molecules of golden light, floating into nothingness, lighting Sixer’s bedroom artfully. His novel idea to draw up the unbinding circle on a plastic tarp he laid down on the floor went ways towards saving time spent on clean up. Sixer found inspiring ways to avoid scrubbing his own blood off the floor. It was admirable.

After the bath Sixer had prepared him, and the pampering Bill was subjected to, it made sense that Sixer wouldn’t want to get bogged down with more cleaning. Best to keep things simple.

Bill felt the magic begin to settle, felt a little more like himself, as the penultimate brick was removed, fading into dissipating matter, freeing Bill’s power a small segment more.

He watched the supernatural wind whip about Sixer’s fluffy hair, saw the scientist adjust his glasses as he continued to chant, and felt awash with the sort of gratitude a being as old as Bill should no longer feel for small devotions of generosity such as this. Bill was entitled to his magic back, but knowing what a sacrifice this felt like for Sixer made the gesture more emphatic. Sixer withheld doing this for fear of being parted.

Now they’d never be parted again.

“Da magicae retro.
Aurum et nigri.”

Ford chanted the last line of the ritual, and the red light dimmed down, paranormal breeze blowing itself out in Ford’s closed bedroom.

The light sputtered out completely, and Ford looked over the black line on Bill’s arm where the golden brick had once been.

“It’s always such a shame to remove the bricks.” Ford remarked, smoothing his fingers over Bill’s skin. “Gold is a very flattering colour for you.”

“Freedom is more flattering.” Bill retorted, but let Sixer stroke his arm wistfully. “But I get your point.”

“It almost feels like a waste of a fantastic design.” Ford continued to run his hands over the muse. “Throwing it all away now.”

“I’m sure you’re real proud of your handiwork.” Bill remarked, but looked down at the flattering vessel. “Even I can admit, it’s not so bad.”

“Perhaps you could keep it, when the last brick’s unbound.” Ford suggested hopefully. “I’m sure there’d be benefits to keeping it.”

Bill shrugged off Ford’s hands and stepped out of the unbinding circle, pacing over to the bed, sitting down comfortably on the mattress. “As far as physical forms go, it’s not my first choice. It’s not even my twelfth choice.”

Ford bent down to roll up the tarp, bundling it up, dried blood crackling on it, stuffing it in a plastic binbag. “Nice to know you abhor it so much.”

“Look, it’s tolerable.” Bill conceded, kicking his legs back and forth on the edge of the bed. “And you obviously like it, so maybe it can stay in the back of the celestial closet or something. How about instead of getting your feelings hurt that your flesh prison isn’t permanent, you could start getting excited about exploring the possibilities past this static human form. Most scientists would be thrilled. You’ve got endless new erogenous zones to uncover.”

Ford shoved the binbag into the corner of the room and replied sarcastically as he finished tidying up. “Forgive me if my mind has yet to fathom the inherent sensuality that comes with tickling your bowtie.”

Bill made an odd sort of spluttering noise, and Ford turned around curiously, to watch the muse glow gold around the edges, embarrassment tinting his cheeks.

“Really?” Ford chuckled, crossing his arms, amused.

“Shut up.” Bill snapped, flustered, drawing his legs up close to his chest, glaring at the scientist.

Ford’s shoulders shook with private laughter, and he paced over to the bed, before stepping into Bill’s space, looming over him.
“Will I be massaging your mortar?” Ford joked, leaning down to box the muse in with his body.

“I will put you in the perpetual naughty corner. Don’t push your luck.” Bill threatened, his cheeks still flushed.

“I’d like to see you try.” Ford asserted confidently, sliding forward smoothly to press a kiss to Bill’s pouting lips. Bill tried to be stubborn, to press his lips together, but Sixer’s firm kiss coaxed the stubbornness out of him, melting Bill’s defences.

Ford paused, kneeling one knee on the bed in front of Bill, and drew back to look over the body Bill was currently inhabiting, looking so fetchingly flustered and receptive all at once.

“I’m going to miss seeing you like this though.” Ford admitted. “Having crafted this body for you myself, I’ve grown quite fond of it. You didn’t inhabit it in the way that I expected, but that’s made you more interesting, if anything. You certainly caught my attention, and surpassed my expectations.”

“Well, that’s your fault for having such low expectations in the first place.” Bill countered, raising an eyebrow at Sixer.

“That’s not what I meant.” Ford shook his head. “You know what I mean.”

“Do I?” Bill tilted his head at Ford teasingly.

“I just wish we had more time, to be like this.” Ford explained, running his hands along Bill’s calves, sighing emphatically. “Just the two of us, just like this.”

Bill silently agreed, but said nothing, watching Ford continue to rub his hands along the length of his body comfortably.

“I feel like it took us so long to reach this point of comfort and intimacy, and we’ve barely explored it at all.” Ford admitted. “Already things are changing.”

“We may as well savour it now then.” Bill shrugged, before looking up at Sixer, scooting back on the bed, gesturing to his body. “Come on, I’ll give you a free pass. Unrestricted access, a complete exploration of this vessel and all it’s ins and outs. What do you say?”

“A complete exploration?” Ford questioned curiously, ideas already springing to mind.

“Barring any extreme mutilations.” Bill stipulated. “I won’t have you cutting me open.”

“It’s like you have a fixation.” Ford tsked, crawling across the bed to get closer to the muse. “Why would I?”

“You’re a scientist. That’s what scientists do.” Bill said bluntly. “You take things apart to see how they work, then attempt to put them back together and say you understand them.”

“That’s not what – not all scientists would do that –“ Ford blustered defensively, trying not to admit that he’d definitely taken apart all of the electrical devices in his house as a child just to reassemble them to understand them. He might do that to a device, but not to a person.

“Sure. ‘Not all scientists’.” Bill rolled his eyes, making air quotes with his fingers.

“I thought you chose to patronage scientists. With an attitude like that it seems almost counter intuitive.” Ford remarked, resting his hand on Bill’s thigh, sitting comfortably beside him.
“I only patronage a select few.” Bill corrected Ford, and smirked. “I patronise the rest.”

“I think you blur that line a little.” Ford laughed, squeezing Bill’s leg as he spoke.

“Maybe you’re just special.” Bill batted his eyelashes at Ford, grinning facetiously.

“Clearly.” Ford scoffed, before he looked down at his six-fingered hand, resting on Bill’s thigh. He considered what was on offer for a moment, before looking back to Bill’s face. “Unrestricted access, you say?”

“A one-time offer, since this vessel’s going out of business soon.” Bill said, trying to sound businesslike.

Ford considered, barring Bill’s pretence, how telling a gesture like this really was. How much of himself the muse seemed willing to surrender, how remarkably forward a gesture like this was considering how reserved and jumpy the muse generally was about this sort of conduct.

He must really trust Stanford, to let him do whatever he liked to him.

“He shake on this too?” Ford joked, grinning at Bill.

The muse shrugged, and laughed nervously, not willing to let his romantic gesture back him into a corner. “Handsy, aren’t you?”

“How long have you been waiting to make that joke?” Ford asked, his hands roaming over Bill’s torso now, tugging the sash that held his dressing gown together undone.

“How long have you had hands?” Bill countered, his response not making the most sense. So sue him, he was distracted.

Ford continued to undress him, peeling him out of the dressing gown, until he sat in the middle of the bed wearing only the boxers that Ford supplied for him, feeling remarkably underdressed next to the scientist, who still wore his t-shirt and trousers.

Ford’s eyes razed across Bill’s body, committing the details of it to memory. When he traced his gaze up, taking in Bill’s expression, the way he held his shoulders, he remarked.

“You look nervous.”

“You’re wearing more clothes than me.” Bill replied.

“Isn’t this vessel just a suit for you?” Ford questioned, herding Bill back until he was resting against the headboard, his fingers sliding along the waistband of Bill’s boxers, hooking them down slightly. “Isn’t that what you’ve said before?”

“I’m still bound to this body. So until I’m unbound, this is it for me.” Bill corrected Ford, watching the way Ford mulled over his words, still tugging his waistband down. “I may not be conditioned to feel shame the same way you are, but I know what goes on in your head. I know what you’re getting from this. What devious thoughts you’re thinking.”

“Hmm.” Ford considered that, and slid Bill’s boxers all the way down, baring him completely. “And what do you think I’m getting from this?”

Bill watched Sixer drag the boxers all the way down his legs, throwing them across the room callously, climbing into the space between Bill’s legs, running his warm palms under Bill’s thighs.
He watched the way Sixer seemed content to own the space between his legs, to own Bill’s reactions, his arousal, his discomfort, all of it, seeing it all in the smug set of Sixer’s jaw, and the way he lidded his eyes at Bill, staring at him, unrelenting.

Bill knew what he was getting from this.

“Satisfaction.”

Ford rumbled a low sound in the back of his throat in agreement, as he leaned forward to claim Bill’s pouty lips in a kiss, owning that too.

Bill let him, not holding back his reactions. He thought briefly to summon the cuffs, clasp them on his wrists as he continued to kiss Ford.

Stanford pulled back, to examine the cuffs shrinking down to fit Bill, and wrapped his hand around Bill’s left wrist to pull it closer to his face, examining the way the silver glinted with runes. He brought Bill’s wrist to his lips, kissing the sensitive pulse point just above the metal.

Bill could feel the cuffs activate with a jolt, already pulling away the energy that was burning through him, the worship Sixer was giving him in this surrender more potent than ever.

Sixer gathered Bill’s other wrist, and kissed the pulse point there as well, before bunching his wrists together, reaching for the sash of his dressing gown.

Bill watched Ford wrap the fabric sash around his wrists, and felt his stomach flip in anticipation.

“You do realise a flimsy strip of fabric isn’t likely to hold me for long.” Bill pointed out.

“Perhaps its symbolic.” Ford countered, tightening the sash, Bill’s wrists thoroughly tied now. “Of your surrender. A free pass.”

“How poetic.” Bill quipped, trying to ignore the way the symbolism of the gesture made his pulse race.

“I know you’re not that kind of muse.” Ford murmured, tugging the sash up over Bill’s head, tying his wrists to the headboard of Ford’s bed, fastening it tightly. “But let’s just say you inspired me.”

Bill tested the tie, wriggling his hands around. He could certainly burn his way free, but wriggling out of the restraints seemed rather fruitless. Sixer’s woodsy adventurer skills lent well to the knots that prevented Bill from Houdini-ing his way out of this.

Not that he’d want to.

“Now what?” Bill asked.

“Now.” Ford leaned down to capture Bill’s lips again, kissing him languorously while he reached beneath the pillow behind Bill, searching for something. When he pulled back from the kiss, he had the scarf he’d used last time he had Bill at his mercy in his left hand. “I want you to close your eyes.”

“Oh, come on!” Bill complained, disliking the return of the blindfold.

“You said I could do what I wanted.” Sixer tilted Bill’s head forward, securing the blindfold over the muse’s eyes while he was restrained and pliant. “This makes it easier.”

“For you.” Bill grumbled, the fabric covering his eyes, blinding him again for Sixer’s satisfaction.
“It won’t hurt for you to have your judgemental eyes closed for a short while.” Ford chided him as he made sure the blindfold sat comfortably, tugging the edges down so Bill couldn’t peek. He reached for a few other pertinent supplies from his bedside drawer while Bill was distracted. “It’s to make it better for both of us.”

“I hate you.” Bill grumbled, as Ford stroked his cheeks with his thumbs, regarding his pout with fondness.

Ford kissed Bill sweetly, hands roaming his body more freely now that the muse wouldn’t be watching him, criticising and cataloguing his every decision. Now Bill was forced to focus on himself, on the sensation this body provided, in Ford’s last ditch attempt to convince him to keep this vessel.

Ford knew it was a long shot, but he was certain the way to get through to Bill was sensation and satisfaction. It had worked with food, getting Bill to warm up to life in the vessel. Ford hoped pleasure, physical pleasure, would seal the deal.

Continuing to kiss his way down Bill’s neck, he pinched Bill’s nipple, watching it pebble, sensitized to Ford’s touch.

Bill was jumpy, almost flinching when he felt Ford’s hands on him, not knowing which direction Ford was coming from. The blindfold made him more vulnerable, laid out, having to trust the scientist. Trust was not something Bill was familiar with, but he was trying.

Ford trailed his hands down lower, mapping Bill’s torso as he went, feeling and memorizing every dip and crevice of his form, keeping his hands deliberately gentle to offset Bill’s startled jolts.

The muse wriggled beneath him, already responsive, his remaining tattoos glowing vibrantly.

Ford gripped Bill’s thighs and spread them, squeezing himself into the space between. He drizzled some of the lubricant from his bedside drawer over his fingers, coating them thoroughly, warming the slippery liquid, before wrapping his hand around Bill’s cock, pumping it swiftly.

Bill’s legs shifted on either side of Ford, and when Ford looked up, he could see Bill was biting his bottom lip, obviously affected by this.

Trailing his slippery fingers lower, Ford massaged the lubricant into Bill’s hole, watching his reaction as he probed the muse gently with the tip of his finger.

Bill wriggled some more, his legs clamping around Ford reflexively. His lips mashed together, like he wasn’t sure what expression he meant to convey, conflicted by the sensation.

Ford pressed his finger a little further in, pumping it in and out of the muse before working him open, adding a second.

Bill was making little noises now, muffled ‘mmm’ sounds, his lips pressed together to censor himself. He had no reason to, they were all alone out here in the shack, now that Fiddleford no longer housed with them. There was no one to hear him, should he respond a little louder.

Ford wiggled his fingers, trying to make more space.

Bill was squirming, and would involuntarily kick Stanford every so often.

When he slid a third finger in, along with additional lube, Bill thumped Ford’s hip with his foot sharply.
“Guvf srryf rkpehpyngvat qnzzvg.”

“What was that?” Ford looked up, pausing, checking Bill’s reaction.

Bill chewed on his bottom lip, stewing on his response, before muttering sullenly. “Nothing.”

“Tell me if it gets too much, or if you need this to stop.” Ford said firmly, not willing to let his exploration come at the expense of his muse’s comfort.

“I’m not backing out of a deal.” Bill replied, frowning in the direction he assumed Sixer was.

Several inches to the left of Bill’s gaze, Ford frowned, and rubbed along Bill’s thigh soothingly. “This isn’t a deal. This is just us. You have to tell me if you don’t like this.”

Bill grumbled, reluctantly agreeing, and he nudged Ford with his foot again, rolling his hips further onto Ford’s fingers. “Stop stalling.”

Taking Bill’s prompting for what it was, Ford pumped the three fingers in and out of Bill again, angling them up, trying to make this more pleasurable for Bill.

He wrung a few more strained moans from the muse, Bill whining his pleasure out reluctantly as Ford managed to glance his fingertips against Bill’s sweet spot.

Ford leaned over Bill and began pressing warm kisses to his torso, dotting them over his chest, as he worked Bill open.

Bill was incredibly tight, and Ford didn’t want to hurt Bill at all, considering what he had intended for them to attempt next. Wiggling his fingers some more, he attempted to squeeze a forth one in there.

Bill made an odd sort of strangled noise, spluttering in his strange language.

“Lbh qrfvtaq guvf guvat jvgu purng pbqrf.”

“What did you say?” Ford questioned curiously, pausing to kiss along Bill’s throat. He could feel Bill’s Adams apple bob as he swallowed, his legs shivering on either side of Ford, before he croaked out his reply.

“Nothing. I said nothing. Is that all six of them yet?”

“You want all six?” Ford asked, flabbergasted.

“Well, that’s what you’re doing, isn’t it?” Bill questioned naively, uncertain what else could be Sixer’s end goal.

“If you want to I can.” Ford reached for more lubricant. “It’s just, are you sure? You seem a little overwhelmed.”

Bill’s skin was beading sweat from exertion, flushing dark, that odd gold light seeping out of him despite the cuff’s best efforts. The glow intensified if anything, when Bill requested all six of Ford’s fingers inside him, the worship that powered the glow peaking just considering the concept.

“Wha – pfft – I’m – I’m fine.” Bill asserted, definitely overwhelmed, but putting up a front for the sake of keeping up appearances. It wouldn’t do to admit that Sixer was undoing him, just as scientists do, taking him apart with his ministrations, hopefully to piece him together afterwards. Panting, Bill squirmed, Sixer’s fingers a firm intrusion in this vessel, inflaming the nerve endings.
they courted.

He had to ask. “How many is that?”

“Four.” Ford answered, sounding amused.

Bill blew out of the corner of his mouth, an exasperated exhale flicking his fringe up briefly, before blinking blindly behind the blindfold. “Okay fine. Keep going then.”

“Are you sure?” Ford double checked, drizzling more lube in between his fingers.

“Are you going to check point me every step of the way? Just do it!”

Ford complied, and took care to pump the four fingers that were already in Bill in and out gently, determined to work him open properly rather than rush this for the sake of the muse’s embarrassment.

“You’re very quick to tell me what to do. I thought this was about what I want?” Ford said teasingly.

Rubbing Bill’s hip gently with his free hand, Ford attempted to introduce his fifth finger, very slowly sliding it in. His fingers felt cramped, clamped together, and he felt his arousal build, his trousers becoming tight as he mentally compared how the sensation would feel around his cock.

Bill was right, he wanted this. To make his freakish fingers the source of pleasure, and praise. To have them accepted holistically by Bill, by his body, his mouth, his mind. To take what Ford had to give. The muse just miraculously seemed to be everything Ford wanted, wrapped in the package that Ford found most appealing, this vessel.

It wasn’t his conscious intent when he crafted this vessel, but he couldn’t deny that his subconscious fantasised about being able to bed Bill, just like this, and now all his dreams were coming true.

Bill’s dark skin was shining with sweat, his remaining tattoos glowing gold, an aura of yellow light exuding from his very being, as he gasped and moaned, blindfolded and restrained, writhing on Ford’s anomalous digits, wanting more.

“Chht - Fvkre, fgbc fgevatvat zr bhg yvxr guvf. V ungr lbh.” Bill whined, tugging his restraints, wrists bound at the headboard. “Stoooop.”

“Stop?” Ford paused, blinking up at Bill, readying himself to pull his fingers out.

“Don’t stop!” Bill demanded, kicking his legs out in frustration. “Just stop teasing me. This is torture.”

“You said I can do what I like to this body.” Ford murmured, leaning down to slyly press a kiss to the muse’s jaw, definitely teasing Bill now. “I could tease you indefinitely if I like. For hours and hours.”

“Zzzz chh trzzx crhh zpitzrr!!!!!!” Bill ground his teeth in frustration, nonsense words, incomprehensible swears tumbling out. He kicked his legs in a sort of miniature tantrum, tugging at his restraints in aggravation, before hissing at Ford. “Sixer, behave! You’re mine, and I own you, so what makes you think you can be so - so devious?”
Ford shrugged, though the muse couldn’t see him, vaguely amused by Bill’s little hissy fit, and continued to twist his fingers around inside Bill. “Perhaps you’re rubbing off on me.”

Bill gasped, Sixer’s fingers shocking him with sensation as they brushed over his sweet spot, and he spluttered breathlessly. “You – you –“

Ford kissed Bill, smothering his complaints soundly.

If Bill knew what Ford wanted, Ford could hazard a good guess that he had a pretty good idea about what Bill wanted, and while the muse could wrestle with his dignity for as long as he liked, being overwhelmed by sensation like this, slowly broken down, left to dissolve into a puddle of pure pleasure, heat, and worship was exactly what Bill wanted, by Ford’s estimation.

The way Bill moaned, and pressed forward, straining against his restraints to kiss Ford back, confirmed it for him.

Continuing to kiss Bill, Ford slowly withdrew his fingers from Bill. He could feel the muse’s lips turn down, frowning slightly.

The stretch of Ford’s fingers intruding on this body had Bill’s cock erect and aroused, the body reacting to the physical sensations, while the muse within rattled with worshipful energy, the cuffs barely drawing it away fast enough.

Ford unbuttoned his trousers, pulling his dick out of his boxers, and wiped the remaining lube on his fingers along his cock, slicking himself up. He continued to kiss Bill, kiss him until he was distracted, no longer frowning.

When Ford pulled away from the kiss, Bill tried to follow him, and was becoming increasingly frustrated with the blindfold and restraints.

“Now, how do we do this?” Ford was mumbling to himself, sounding like he often did when solving an engineering problem or equation in the lab.

Yanking at the sash tied to the headboard, Bill voiced his complaints. “Untie me first! I stopped liking this at least ten minutes ago. It’s like you have some fetish for restricting me.”

Ford privately conceded that point as being most likely factual, before he examined the sash, reconsidering their position for this next bit.

“Actually, that might be beneficial. Just let me –“ Ford reached above Bill, and untied his hands from the headboard, still keeping his wrists bound together. Freeing Bill, at least partially, Ford picked Bill up, until he was sitting upright, and comfortably.

Leaning in to accent his gesture with a kiss, Ford’s hands untied the blindfold from around Bill’s eyes. When Ford pulled back, discarding the blindfold, Bill squinted, adjusting to the light, as he blinked his glowing golden eyes at the scientist.

Ford could see that Bill’s pupils were massively dilated, even after reacting to the light.

Bill looked Ford up and down, noting the way the scientist was still mostly dressed, his trousers undone, erection poking out of his boxers, t-shirt tight around his broad chest, glasses off. Bill liked what he saw, but had to double his gaze back down, pausing to note that Ford’s cock was shining with lubricant, piecing things together.

“Oh.”
“Perhaps if we switch places, so I sit with my back against the headboard, you could control the pace, and how much you can take?” Ford suggested, already shifting to move. “That might be better.”

“You want me to –” Bill looked down at Ford’s cock, remembering how it filled his mouth, how wide it was, and how it had the unsavoury habit of spewing genetic material from time to time. He felt his aversion to reproduction creeping back, as well as a mild concern for how uncomfortable this was likely to feel.

“Well, you could climb on my lap, and then –“ Ford’s explanation paused, picking up on the hesitation in Bill’s voice. “Why, do you not want to?”

“Do I not want to fornicate and partake in your reproductive processes, while you get all sticky? I –“

“It’s not reproduction. I’ll say it again. It’s not –“ Ford sighed, and rolled his eyes at the muse’s odd hang ups.

“I hate babies! There, I said it.” Bill blurted out, still eyeing off Ford’s cock warily.

“There won’t be any. This is supposed to be pleasurable. Bill, it’s purely for pleasure, not reproduction.” Ford assured the muse somewhat wearily. “People do it all the time. If you’re concerned, we can definitely use protection.”

“What protection?” Bill asked, narrowing his eyes, thinking Sixer was about to bust out the salt circles again.

Ford pulled a small foil packet out from his bedside drawer, and ripped it open, pulling what looked like a clear latex sock out of the packet. “People use it to guard against STDs and pregnancy. I assumed, since I made your body from scratch, and you’re the first person I’ve done this with, that we won’t have to worry about that, but I can understand taking precautions.”

“That sounds like a really good idea –“ Bill began, shifting over to place his hand on Ford’s wrist, halting his progress. “If you want that plastic permanently burned into your body.”

Ford paused, and made a face, disturbed, before he crumpled the condom up and threw it to the side. “Then what do we -?”

“We’ll do things your way.” Bill conceded, and rose up onto his knees, swinging a leg over Sixer’s hips, hovering just above Ford’s dick. Bill still looked at it hesitantly. “This body is equipped to deal with this, right?”

“Well, technically –“ Ford began, trying to provide a scientific answer, before he saw the panic shoot across Bill’s face. Aiming to soothe that panic, cut it off before it percolates, Ford smoothed his hands across Bill’s hips, gently rubbing his back. “It should be fine. I’ve prepared you, so it shouldn’t hurt, and from this position if it gets to be too much, or you find it painful, you can take it slow, or stop altogether. I’ll do my best to stay still, so you can feel this out for yourself.”

“Hmm.” Bill considered that, before he leaned forward to kiss Stanford, resting his bound hands against Ford’s chest. Ford kissed back, cupping the back of Bill’s head with one hand, smoothing the other along Bill’s side.

They kissed until things weren’t so tense, until what they were about to accomplish seemed less like a bizarre inconvenience and more like a natural causation. Ford kept his hand resting against Bill’s hip, but slid his left hand down Bill’s chest, reaching below to position himself.
“Are you rea-?” Ford began to ask, but Bill interrupted him, sealing his lips shut with yet another demanding kiss, while he clumsily lowered himself onto Ford.

Ford’s fingers earlier really had done the trick, as, while the initial stretch was uncomfortable, considering how much lube Ford had employed for the sake of overkill, Bill sank at least halfway down Ford’s length before he realised what had even happened.

Ford seemed shocked, his hand balled into a fist at Bill’s side, holding his breath in with the effort it took not to move, to stay still as promised.

Bill was exactly as tight and hot as Ford had anticipated, Ford had never done this before, despite fantasising, and Ford was having a hard time dealing with the sudden onslaught of sensation.

Bill attempted to roll his hips with this new intrusion, figuring out how to do this. He looked at the way Sixer’s face got redder and redder, realising that this sort of intercourse had its benefits.

It was clear who held the power here, and Bill could feel it flowing through him, worship nearly overwhelming him as Ford struggled through the feeling, the revelation, that was Bill giving him this.

Lifting himself up slightly, and sinking back down, Bill observed the way Ford spluttered and hissed with the effort it took to hold himself back, with the overwhelming heat all around him that was driving him crazy.

Bill smirked, and rolled his hips again, watching the way Ford was balling his hand up in the blankets now.

Bill leaned forward and kissed Sixer’s strong jaw indulgently, noting the way Sixer’s Adams apple bobbed, swallowing back his impulses.

“Your best is very good.” Bill murmured against Ford’s skin, delighted by every twitch and exhale that was Sixer fighting his own instinctual desires.

“I’m trying.” Ford gritted out. “Are you alright?”

“Oh, I’m fine.” Bill sounded smug, spreading his hands across Sixer’s chest as best as he could with them tied together, feeling the scientist’s pulse race.

“Are you –?” Ford began to shift his hips, sitting up more, thinking that he could further things now that Bill was adjusting.

Bill’s fingertips pressed a little harder on Ford’s chest, halting him, and Ford looked up, recognising the power drunk expression Bill wore, the way he was glowing gold at the edges, just how much he was loving this.

“Oh uh. You’re staying still through this, aren’t you Sixer?”

Ford had to pause, reassessing whether or not he meant it. Bill was grinning like the cat who ate the canary, intent on holding Ford to his word, clearly having no compunctions about torturing Ford back now he had the upper hand.

Ford narrowed his eyes.

Deliberately, he canted his hips up, thrusting into Bill, trying to offset that smug expression.
Bill jolted, suddenly more full than before, but it wasn’t painful. The stretch could even be considered quite pleasant, in a way that toed the line. It was Sixer’s smug expression that he found offensive.

Bill curled his fingers into Sixer’s t-shirt, digging his nails in, as he slowly lifted himself up, trying to drag this out for Ford. His jaw jutted out stubbornly, as he attempted to tease Ford as well as he’d been teasing Bill.

Ford’s hand gripped Bill’s hip, and he thrusted up again, jostling a surprised noise out of Bill.

Bill blinked at Stanford, gawping at him, feeling conflicted. This felt good, but Sixer was far too smug, rebelling against him when Bill finally had the upper hand.

Bill could tell from the challenging glint in Ford’s eye that the human wasn’t planning to behave.

“Sixer.” Bill said, warning him, trying to keep Ford in line.

“Bill?” Ford replied solicitously, before he pushed himself up, so he was no longer resting with his back on the headboard, unsettling Bill from his position on his lap. Still buried inside him, Ford toppled Bill backwards, so his back hit the mattress, his hips angled horizontally up to meet Ford’s.

Bill gasped, and gripped onto Ford’s t-shirt, tugging it forward as he fell. In that one swift movement, Ford had unseated him from his new throne of power, and now was looming over him, filling him soundly, his dick glancing against that sweet spot of nerve endings that enjoyed overwhelming this body’s nervous system.

“Who – who said you could move?” Bill spluttered up at him.

Ford rocked gently, back and forth, his movements teasing Bill, teasing the nerve endings that were singing out. He could see Bill’s eyelids flutter, his chest flushed, his breathing inconsistent, and he could tell he was overwhelming Bill already.

Good.

“Do you not want me to move?” Ford asked politely, leaning forward, judging from the look on Bill’s face that he was pressing right on Bill’s prostate.

Bill spluttered out nonsense syllables, his fingers twisting in the fabric of Ford’s shirt, before he thumped his head back against the mattress.

“Fine.” Bill groaned, and tugged on Ford’s shirt demandingly. “MOVE.”

“I thought you wanted me to stay still.” Ford asked lightly, being deliberately contrary.

“MOVE!” Bill yelled at Ford, yanking at Ford’s shirt until it ripped, the thread at the collar of the fabric splitting.

Ford looked down at his ruined shirt, then looked back at Bill.

That was one of his favourite shirts.

Fine. Bill wanted to play rough, well, Ford would give Bill exactly what he wanted.

A victorious grin crept across his face.

Abandoning all pretence of holding back, Ford moved, and fucked Bill as thoroughly as they both clearly wanted.

The mattress springs were creaking, protesting squeakily as Ford fucked his muse into the mattress, thrusting insistently, relentlessly.

Moans and half formed words were coaxed out of the god, growing louder and louder. Sixer’s own quiet moans and grunts filled the air, mumbled appellations for the God he was bedding, pressed against Bill’s skin in between fervent kisses.

Bill gripped at Ford’s shirt, hands grasping to hold more of the scientist. His legs were wrapped around Ford, hooked around his back, pulling him closer, wanting more.

Impatience overrode his compliance, and he burnt the sash away from his wrists, fabric splitting in two, burning smoking embers into the bed.

Hands freed, Bill cupped Ford’s face in both hands, kissing him, furious biting kisses as Ford fucked into him. He grasped Ford’s hair and pulled it, twisting it, wrenching a gasp out of him that incised him to fuck Bill harder in retaliation. He raked his nails down Sixer’s back, scrabbling for purchase, and Ford lifted Bill’s hips, digging his own nails into the muse’s buttocks, scoring marks there.

Bill moaned, and panted, and bit angry hickies into Ford’s neck, bruising the scientist’s skin. It hurt, but Ford didn’t stop, taking his pain out on the god who seemed to love it, love the cruelty.

It wasn’t the sweet, gentle first time Ford had envisioned for himself, but considering who he was doing this with, he couldn’t see sweet and gentle aligning with Bill’s character. He might have had sweet and gentle with someone else, but right now, Ford didn’t want someone else.

He wanted Bill Cipher. And now he had him.

The muse was as fiery as Ford had come to expect of him, and Stanford was enjoying the burn.

“AH – XXTRX – AHH – shpx! Six –“

“Mmmngh, Bill.” Ford mouthed the muses name against his skin, dragging his lips over the lines of Bill’s glowing tattoos, tasting the power that lay barely restrained beneath.

Bill’s hands were too hot, dragging across Ford’s skin, clasping his face. Bill dragged Ford’s lips up to his to kiss him, words tumbling out of him as Ford continued to overwhelm him.

Kissing Bill, breathing in the ozone taste in his mouth of gathering power, Ford exhaled out his reply, barely able to drag himself away from kissing the muse, addicted.

“Yes.”

Ford’s admittance seemed to raze Bill with an unseen wave of power, and he shivered all over, before gripping onto Ford tighter, his eyes changing colour. Hyped with power, more power than the cuffs could drain, Bill’s sclera darked, turning black like the abyss, his pupil glowing gold now, slitted and enlivened.

Bill growled, a ravenous sound, and mashed his lips to Sixer’s, intent on owning every part of the human.
Ford felt him get more and more lost in the sensation, pumping his hips ruthlessly, Bill giving as good as he got here. He kissed Bill like a drunk man, lips sliding along every part of Bill he could reach, diving back for more again and again.

“More.” Bill urged, claiming as much of Ford as he could.

Bill’s hands were groping him persistently, sliding all over him, possessive gestures hitting on Ford’s recently uncovered kink for this sort of holistic ownership. Ford could feel the energy building, thrumming against his lips as he dove past the gold glowing aura to kiss Bill again and again.

He almost didn’t notice at first, so consumed with sensation and want, but eventually he came to notice there were more hands on his body than one would expect would be logically possible.

Ford’s eyes slid down to see the small, slim, shadowy black hands that were groping him, emanating from Bill’s body, sprouting up from his sides. The hands were very similar to the small black noodley limbs that Ford recalled Bill’s true form had, defying physics to spring to life. Ford tried not to look too hard at the point where the arms sprouted from Bill’s sides, his thrusts faltering slightly when he saw them.

Bill growled again, the rumble of the sound sparking adrenaline in Ford’s stomach, his body dealing with fight or flight responses just listening to it. Bringing his eyes back up to Bill’s face, Ford noticed the change to his muse’s eyes, and swallowed, floored by yet another reminder that he really was bedding a god.

“Sixer.” Bill whined, and grabbed Ford’s face, kissing the startled expression he wore away.

Gradually Ford fell back into the rhythm of things, but he was keenly aware of the myriad of shadowy hands springing into existence, grasping onto him. More seemed to grow by the second, doing anything they could to pull Ford closer, to touch more of him.

He could feel the static energy sizzle in the air, and he glanced sideways, to the cuffs at Bill’s wrist, seeing them glow blue, struggling to keep pace with the amount of power Bill was putting out. Bill’s power wasn’t being drawn away by the cuffs quickly enough, instead it was leaking.

Bill was pressing hungry kisses to Ford’s jaw, to his cheeks, and Ford was watching, astonished, as objects scattered about his room began to levitate, surrounded by the tell-tale blue glow of Bill’s magic.

Ford was awed, knowing that all of this power was leaking out of the god who was clinging to him, bucking his hips up into Ford, meeting him thrust for thrust. Ford was overwhelming Bill with power, simply by sharing his body with Bill, the worship working its way into a continuous feedback loop with every spark of pleasure.

“Fgbc tnjxvat. Keep going!” Bill demanded, trying to draw Ford’s attention back to himself. “Vg’f yvxr lbh’ir arire frra na bowrpg sybng orsber.”

Ford blinked his gaze away from the bizarre gravitational anomaly the muse seemed to be causing, focusing on Bill once again. He was struck by the realisation again, that Bill really was some sort of divine otherworldly creature, and as of their deal today, Bill was also thoroughly Ford’s, forever, until the end of time.

“You are my God.” Ford uttered, awed, meaning his words possessively.

“Mmmm.” Bill preened at the comment, seeing it as worship, given unprovoked. He seemed to thrum with power, pouring his enthusiasm and energy into kissing Sixer, meeting the pace of his hips.

Strung out on pleasure, Ford’s restraint was hitting his peak. Honestly he was surprised he held out for as long as he had, but his orgasm was creeping up on him, warmth in the base of his spine threatening to creep up and overwhelm him.

Ford reached between them to grasp Bill’s cock, pumping it, almost as an afterthought, so lost in his comprehension of the god that he forgot to ensure Bill’s pleasure. He seemed like he was having a good time, clearly finding this pleasurable, but those magazines Ford had read in preparation mentioned doubling one’s pleasure like this.

Bill moaned, and looped his arms around Sixer’s neck, mouthing kisses into Ford’s collarbone when he wasn’t too overwhelmed to speak, unintelligible noises spilling out of him.

Ford thought it was just the static in the air, but when the pressure of the bed beneath his knees lessened, he realised that he was being levitated too, lifted into the air.

But he couldn’t feel Bill’s magic around him, like he had back in the barn.

He held onto the muse, his own pleasure peaking, close to completion, as he realised that he wasn’t the one floating.

Bill was.

“Bill, you – you’re –” Ford panted, pumping his hips deeper into Bill right until the last second.

Bill’s words of praise pushed Ford over the edge, unable to hold himself back any more, and he thrust his hips forward once, burying himself to the hilt inside the muse as his orgasm overcame him.

With a loud groan, Ford came, spurting cum inside the muse, inside that insane heat.

Ford’s orgasm tipped Bill over the edge, the sheer mass of physical worship being delivered right at the altar competing with Sixer’s ardent gratitude for being able to do this, his outright awe that this was happening.

Bill glowed bright, blindingly bright, as the worship overloaded him, overloading the cuffs, this vessel twitching helplessly through the inundation of sensation, gold metallic fluid leaking from Bill’s own member.

Ford exhaled shakily as his orgasm rattled through him, his body slumping forward onto Bill, panting in the aftermath.

He absentely gave Bill’s dick a squeeze, courting the strange gold material as it spurted out of Bill, spraying onto Ford’s ripped t-shirt, dripping down it.

Bill still had his arms wrapped around Ford’s neck, and had buried his face in Ford’s collarbone, his own orgasm ripping a guttural, unintelligible noise from him, leaving him shaking and spent, clinging onto his human like he never wanted to let him go.
Ford pressed an exhausted kiss into Bill’s hair, wrapping his arms around the god, holding him tightly.

They were still floating in the air.

“Uh, Bill?”

“Mmmrmrgh.” Bill murmured, unwilling to lift his head from Sixer’s chest, still processing the way this intercourse with Sixer had nearly scoured every thought from his mind, razed his consciousness to ashes, reduced him to his basest elements, and made him feel so distinctly, in a way he hadn’t felt for nearly his entire life.

“You might … be more comfortable … on the bed.” Ford managed, ready to collapse with the muse after their tumultuous first time.

Bill blinked his eyes open at that, and looked down.

They were floating two feet above Sixer’s bed.

He let go of Ford’s neck, and they were still floating, Ford gripping onto Bill now, so he wouldn’t fall off.

“I’m floating!” Bill realised, ecstatic.

“So you are.” Ford admitted, with a wry grin, watching the delight dance in Bill’s eyes, now no longer black, back to their customary gold.

Bill smiled at that for a second, euphoric to have his favourite power unbound, before he noticed the way Sixer was putting his weight on him. Reluctantly obliging the scientist, Bill lowered them both down onto the mattress, and Ford slid out of Bill inelegantly.

Bill winced, but already this body was adjusting to the bizarreness that was the aftermath of such a fervent devoted fuck.

Groping around for the hand towel Ford had on his bedside table for this exact purpose, he sat up to wipe them both down, and paused, noticing the little hands that were still poking out of Bill’s sides.

Bill blinked down at them, and laughed awkwardly, before he poked each little arm back in with his fingertip, the limb disappearing back into Bill’s skin. “Got carried away.”

“How remarkable.” Ford observed Bill’s skin, perfectly smooth once again, like there had never been an eldritch adjustment in the first place.

Bill beamed at Ford’s reaction, overjoyed that the scientist still found him fascinating, rather than defaulting to the common mentality of treating his mutations like a freakish occurrence.

He continued to smile at Ford while the scientist gently wiped him down, ensuring Bill was clean and comfortable first, before wiping himself off, kicking off his trousers, and removing his shirt, content to recline in just his boxers.

When Ford chucked the hand towel off the bed, he noticed Bill’s persistent grin.

“What?” He asked, regarding Bill’s joy with amusement.

“Nothing.” Bill said, unable to keep the grin away to back his denial up satisfactorily.
“Come here.” Ford pulled the muse against him, cuddling Bill beside him, wrapping his arm around him, resting comfortably in bed. “Did you enjoy that?”

“Did I?” Bill scoffed, laughing, snuggling into Sixer’s side comfortably.

“I think you did.” Ford pointed out, vindicated by Bill’s vehemence.

“Did you?” Bill thought to ask.

“I most certainly did.” Ford answered honestly, and turned on his side so he could watch Bill, appreciating him with his eyes. “I never thought I’d be able to do that. With another person, let alone a god.”

“Guess I’m just all your dreams come true.” Bill grinned, and reached forward to rest his hand over Ford’s heart, enjoying the constant feel of Sixer’s heartbeat.

“It feels like that sometimes. Like this is all just too good to be true.” Ford said, Bill’s hand on his chest feeling like a comfort. Like Bill was soothing his heart after all the pain, rejection, abandonment and betrayal he’d suffered throughout his life. Here was Bill, to fix it all with his presence. “I’m glad you’re here. Everything – just – if I hadn’t met you –“

“You know, I never put much stock in that destiny crap. I know you love it, but something just never sat right for me with the notion that some things are meant to happen, that they’re unavoidable, that they have to happen, and every choice you make leads you to that inevitable future. I don’t like destiny, because it makes me feel like I don’t have a choice.” Bill mused, playing with Ford’s chest hair as he spoke, twirling his fingers through it idly. “But I don’t know. I’m starting to think that for all its faults – maybe I met you for a reason. Maybe we were always meant to meet.”

Ford watched Bill fondly, soaking up this unprompted sharing of the muse’s perspective, cherishing it, like he always cherished these little glimpses he got into who his muse really was, how his mind worked.

“This connection between us.” Bill gestured between them, and laid his hand back over Ford’s heart, looking earnestly up at the scientist, meeting his fond gaze. “I haven’t felt for millennia. You make me feel things.”

“Well, that too.” Bill snorted a laugh, before he pressed his hand more firmly over Ford’s heart. “I mean real things. Things that make me feel less – I don’t know. I don’t know what I’m saying.”

Ford brought his hand up to cover Bill’s, stroking the muse’s skin with his thumb, holding Bill’s hand against his heart.

“I feel the connection too.” Ford confessed, and squeezed Bill’s hand. “I like it.”

“I like it too.” Bill admitted, and smiled at Ford.

“Just think –“ Ford yawned, and stretched his arm out to drape around Bill, scooting down in the bed until he was comfortable. “We have from now until the end of time to explore that connection. That sounds like plenty of time, don’t you think?”

“Too much, and not enough.” Bill replied cryptically, watching Ford a little more wistfully now.
Ford yawned again, and nuzzled into the pillow below his head. “I’m rather tired now. Bedding a god is as exhausting as it sounds.”

“Pfft.” A laugh broke through Bill’s sudden onslaught of melancholy, and he stroked Sixer’s face with his other hand, brushing his hair back off his forehead. “Sleep then. I’m sure you’ll have sweet dreams.”

“With you nearby, I hardly doubt it.” Ford smiled, before closing his eyes, settling comfortably down in bed.

Bill watched Ford for a moment longer, that wistfulness twisting inside of him, yanking on all of those burgeoning feelings Sixer’s worship and surrender brought to the fore. His hand slid away from over Sixer’s heart, and a mark remained, a small black triangle with a single eye and a bowtie, etched over Sixer’s heart, into his flesh, permanent and irremovable, a testament to Bill’s unspoken feelings.

Sighing, Bill nuzzled up into Sixer, and closed his own eyes, envisioning a future where everything went his way, went smoothly, and didn’t blow up in his face or get snatched out of his hands by the cruel whims of circumstance or reality. He really longed for a world where that happened, where he’d get to keep what he wanted, but he knew that wasn’t likely, so he clung to Sixer that little bit tighter as the scientist drifted into sleep.

Life was never fair, but one could hope.

---

They were praying to him in the temples, singing songs to him in the sea, painting pictures of him in the sky.

Still he slept.

Maybe he was dreaming of a better future. Optimism imbued into every molecule that drifted through his gills, filtering back out into the universe.

He seemed to exude it, this effervescent hope, embodying it.

The potential for a brighter existence.

The Axolotl slept, fed by the worshipful voices of limitless galaxies.

One would think such small circumstances were below his notice. The Great and Mighty Axolotl.

But if you believed the doctrine, he sees all.

And there’s hope, if you pray to him.
Ford spent all night, entwined with the muse, swapping conversation and kisses and parts of his soul back and forth with the god who lay beside him.

He drifted, in and out of sleep, and whenever he woke, gazing blearily beside him, Bill always seemed to be watching him, awake, considering him.

“What?” Ford mumbled sleepily.

“Nothing.” Bill would reply, legs curled in to tangle with Ford’s.

Ford frowned, and reached up to smooth his thumb across Bill’s forehead.

“You look sad.”

“I’m not sad.” Bill denied it, but Ford could feel the crease between Bill’s brow, even if he couldn’t see it in the dark of the early morning.

“Can I - ?” Ford struggled, trying to fix Bill’s woes, childish in his strangled cognisance.

“This is enough.” Bill replied, brushing Ford’s hand away from his face, holding it between them on the mattress. “For now.”

“Tomorrow, that last brick.” Ford mumbled, watching the last remaining gold square glint, the only source of light in the room, off Bill’s features. “I won’t keep you waiting. Tomorrow, I’ll –“

“Tomorrow you can.” Bill conceded, still holding Ford’s hand. “But after breakfast. We’ll eat together, share the morning. A big breakfast, like that first morning. The first one you made for me.”

“I’ll have to pick up groceries.” Ford said practically, agreeing. He shifted in bed to look at his clock on the bedside table, the numbers glinting in the dark. It was four am. “The shops aren’t open yet.”

“There’s no rush.” Bill watched Sixer, his eyes glowing just as faintly as the clock did. “We can enjoy this. Relax. Sleep in even.”

“Mmm, sleep in.” Ford sighed, and pressed a sleepy kiss to Bill’s forehead, settling back in the bed comfortably.

“And then, in the evening.” Bill spoke, ducking his head low, nuzzled into the pillows, staring at Sixer’s chest, not meeting his eyes.

He spoke in a quiet voice, wistful even, his tone tinging with regret. If Ford were more awake, he might have even noticed it.

“In the evening, we’ll test the portal again.”

“Mmmgh.” Ford nosed into the pillow, already slipping out of consciousness, not listening.

Bill watched Ford’s chest rise and fall, his breathing deepening as he sunk further away from him, into the mindscape. When he was certain Ford was asleep, he simply stared at him for longer, committing every detail of Ford’s face to memory.

“You don’t know yet. I’ll tell you when the door is open.” Bill sighed, promising Sixer’s unconscious self what he should have done before now. “Everything changes, but tomorrow, you’ll know.”

The snow continued to fall outside Ford’s bedroom window, whipping up into ominous flurries of white in the dark. The clock on the bedside table blinked 04:28, counting down the hours of restfulness before they’d have to wake up and face the music.

Bill looked up to the ceiling, his eyes glowing in the dark.

“They’ll all know.”

Chapter End Notes

Thank you very much to the anon who reminded me of Dipper and Mabel time travelling just outside the shack! I managed to fit it in! Thank you!

Some of Bill's linguistic splutters in this chapter are caesar cipher, and some of them are just nonsense, so don't be phased if it doesn't all translate nicely. Language and other things glitch when overwhelmed to a certain extent.

Possibly the most indulgent chapter I've written. Had to work in 'then it's a deal, from now until the end of time' and apparently leaving it at a handshake wasn't what these two wanted to do. I hope you enjoyed the chapter as much as I did.

I went on a comment answering spree lately, so I apologise if folks are looking in their inbox like 'ffs who is this weirdo thanking me for a comment i left months ago' - I was inspired to reply to comments after reading something my favourite author wrote about it, instead of hoarding the comments to silently reread and privately swoon over whenever I needed inspiration.

The next chapter is the big one. I mean big one. It's going to be heartbreaking, and I'm ready for the pain. Bring it on.

Just to let you all know, I'll be going on holidays over december and january, so I'll still be writing, on planes and stuff, but because this next chapter is a long one, and because I'll be writing less and enjoying my holiday, the next chapter is likely to be delayed by a fair bit, not as frequent as my usual updates. I'll be tweaking it and making sure it's perfect so when it comes out it will be exactly how I want it to be, but I'll also be frolicking overseas, so I apologise for the wait. I'll still be working hard on it, and your comments will inspire and motivate me to write quicker, but there will be a delay. Maximum latest the new chapter will be done by will be end of January.

Thank you so much to everyone who's read this far and enjoyed this fic. This chapter is dedicated to you all. Not generic, heartfelt, I promise. Thank you so much.
Under attack, I'm being taken. About to crack, defenses breaking. Won't somebody see and save a heart? Come and rescue me now 'cause I'm falling apart.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Ford left Bill to sleep in. He proved quite difficult to rouse when Ford got up to go fetch the groceries. He was going to ask if Bill wanted to join him, but the muse was in one of his uncannily deep slumbers, so after a few seconds of determined prodding, Ford gave up, and pressed a kiss to Bill's forehead, throwing some clothes on and heading out the door.

It was reasonably quiet on the roads, considering it was 8 am. There was hardly any traffic at all as Ford made his way to the convenience store, compiling a mental list of groceries as he went.

He liked the idea of recreating that first breakfast he made for the God, and considering they were on far better terms now it would be a nice bookend on their turbulent beginnings, ushering in a new era of cooperation and peace between them.

While he was in town, Ford figured he could also stroll down to the bank to arrange the final cheque for Fiddleford’s participation with constructing the portal.

Quitter or no, Fiddleford had done what he’d signed on to do, and the portal was functional and fully constructed thanks to his input.

Sending him the other half of his payment was only fair, and while they departed on poor terms, Stanford wouldn’t deprive Fiddleford of the means he’d rightly earned to support his family.

While Ford was bitter about his friend’s betrayal, and part of him still rankled at the thought of giving him anything considering it was highly likely F had been erasing his memories, until he received confirmation of that violation, he couldn’t in good conscience deprive F of the other half of the cheque.

He’d wanted to wake Bill to confer with him about this decision, wanting the muse’s input and validation about whether or not he should pony up with the rest of F’s payment, but as Bill proved a stubborn sleeper, Ford just had to infer what Bill would have said.

The selfish part of Ford would imagine that Bill would urge him to be selfish, to keep the money, and put it towards his future, looking for some loophole out of the payment, but the rational part of Stanford knew that despite his slyness, and his determined ability to find solutions that benefitted him first and foremost, the one key moral the muse tended to fall back on was that a deal was a deal.

He’d made a deal to compensate Fiddleford for his labour, and the deal was that once the portal was complete he’d follow through on his payment. That was the expectation set, and Ford’s ‘what would Bill do’ tangent led him to that conclusion, if he were to think logically on it.

So he tacked a trip to the bank onto his to-do list for the day, and parked the car in the parking lot outside of Dusk 2 Dawn.

Ford shrugged his trench coat on, and locked the car, before walking into the convenience store, looking down to count on his fingers the ingredients he’d need.
As he walked through the door, distracted, he bumped into someone exiting the store, Ford’s shoulder jarring against theirs, knocking the man’s belongings out of his arms and onto the floor.

Jolted from his mental planning, Ford blinked, and immediately bent to pick up the fallen items, his expression apologetic.

“I’m so sor-“

Ford looked up, and paused, taking in the person who he’d bumped into.

It was Greg Valentino, the friendly fellow who ran the mortuary with his wife.

What shocked Ford was the man’s demeanour.

Usually brimming with good natured enthusiasm and pep, Greg looked utterly ruined, heavy bags hanging under his red rimmed eyes, a day’s worth of untamed stubble growing on his chin.

He looked distressed, as though he hadn’t washed, or changed his clothes for a day. The fabric of his shirt was rumpled, rather than neatly pressed as was his custom.

His expression was one that could only be described as inordinately weary, verging on distraught, as if he were wavering on that fine line between numbness and bursting into helpless tears at any given second.

He met Ford’s gaze briefly, registering the concern there, and looked sharply away.

“Excuse me.” Greg cleared his throat, his voice coming out croaky, and scooped up the last of his belongings from the ground, boxes of cigarettes apparently (though Ford didn’t take Greg for much of a smoker) snatching the last box from Ford’s hand before hurrying out of the shop.

The bell above the door rang as he left.

Ford straightened up and watched him leave, concerned by his peculiar behaviour.

That didn’t seem right.

Wandering through the aisles, Ford absently collected the ingredients he’d need for breakfast this morning and brought them to the counter, where Mrs Duskerton waited, watching the front door with a deliberately concerned expression.

Noticing Stanford, standing waiting, Mrs Duskerton shook herself from her reverie and began scanning Stanford’s items, looking somewhat more morose than the morning warranted.

She kept casting troubled glances out into the parking lot where Greg’s car was.

Ford felt awkward saying nothing. Usually he could rely on the cheerful shop owner to keep the conversation flowing, superficial and light. Today she just seemed sad, emphatically so, she kept sighing, and it seemed to have something to do with Greg Valentino.

Clearing his throat, interrupting her scanning, Ford followed his cue and asked.

“Is he alright?”

“You haven’t heard?” Dawn tutted, and shook her head, continuing to ring up his purchases. “Poor thing. The day before yesterday, right out of the blue, him and Janice.”
Ford watched Mrs Duskerton sigh again, pausing to put a hand over her chest. She said nothing for a moment, expecting Ford to know what she was implying.

When the scientist continued to stare blankly at her, waiting for her to fill him in, she leaned forward, cupping the side of her mouth, stage whispering the scandalous news.

“They lost the baby.”

“Oh.” Ford felt a wash of sympathy for the man, looking back over his shoulder at the door. He had no point of reference for how to react to a loss like that, but he could only assume, looking at Greg, that it was devastating. “Oh no. That’s –“

“Awful, is what it is.” Dawn Duskerton shook her head, and slowly rung up the rest of Ford’s purchases. “My friend Maude works as a midwife in the clinic downtown. There ain’t no hospital that’s not a three hour drive from here, and out of the blue, around about eight o’clock, Janice gets these pains, poor dear. No one knew what to do. Pains out of nowhere for about half an hour, then they stopped. Perfectly healthy baby, gone in a blink.”

Ford frowned, pausing to take that in, before he rummaged through his coat pockets, looking for his wallet. “That’s very unfortunate.”

“I was the first to know.” Mrs Duskerton boasted, in the way that small town women often did, elated to be in on the town’s gossip, despite how distasteful it was. “Well, after Maude, and poor Janice of course. Poor dear. Must be devastated.”

Ford found his wallet at last and pulled it out, looking up at Mrs Duskerton expectantly, waiting for the total.

The older woman sighed theatrically, still holding her hand over her chest.

“How cruel a thing to happen. I ain’t never met two people keener to be parents. They say the Lord moves in mysterious ways, that he has a plan for everything, but on days like this, it really makes you think.”

Ford cleared his throat again, not keen to bandy religious rhetoric with the woman in the name of gossip. He inclined his head at the register.

Mrs Duskerton tutted, and pressed the cash register totals button.

“That’ll be fifty-nine ninety-five. With tax.”

Ford passed her a fifty and a twenty, and she returned his ten dollars and five cents in change. Ford crumpled the bill into his pocket, and deposited the five cents in the take-a-penny jar, the coins tinkling as they hit the glass.

Dawn Duskerton passed Stanford his bags, and gave him a brief farewell, dismissing him succinctly.

“Have a nice day now.”

The next customer approached the register.

Ford took his bags back to the car.

He could distinctly hear as he left the shop, over the ringing of the bell, Mrs Duskerton latching onto a new listening ear.

“Oh, did you hear the news? It’s just terrible!”

Ford rolled his eyes and let the door close shut behind him.

It was about what he expected from some people, honestly, taking pleasure in the misfortune of others. This town was full of small minded, gossip mongering idiots.

While Ford couldn’t begin to comprehend how the Valentino’s were feeling, he couldn’t help but find the whole situation incredibly distasteful, how it had been only two days since this horrid thing had happened to the lovely couple, (if Stanford paused to think about it, the incident coincided with Fiddleford’s sudden departure, though he didn’t question further than that. It must have just been a bad day for everyone) and already the town was talking about it for their entertainment.

Gossips and chinwaggers, all of them.

It was times like this he could relate to Bill’s dislike of other humans.

They were, unequivocally, inevitably disappointing.

Even Fiddleford had disappointed him, and Ford had thought they were of similar mind. In the end, Fiddleford’s small-mindedness was his undoing, his inability to accept change the sour note at the end of their friendship. Marching out on the portal’s initial test run. Halting Ford’s progression, the universe’s progression.

It felt much like finding a packet of toffee peanuts beside his high school invention. Progression halted for the sake of small mindedness.

But still, Stanford had to mail out his final cheque.

A deal’s a deal.

Putting his groceries in the boot of his car, Stanford locked it, and decided to leave the car parked there for the time being.

He could walk through town, just to stretch his legs a little.

Crossing the car park to the pavement, Stanford strolled along the boulevard, watching the shops open for business, early morning trade rolling along.

Something seemed different about the town this morning. Something odd.

Stanford couldn’t put his finger on it, but there was just something amiss. About the way people were acting.

They didn’t seem to be acting particularly bizarre, just somewhat more subdued than normal.

There was something physically different about the town too, but Ford couldn’t put his finger on it until it was right in front of him, standing at the crossing.

There was a dent in the stop sign at the side of the road. A dent in the pole, like someone had punched it in a fit of rage.

Ford paused, blinking, and stopped to examine the dent, touching the bent metal. Running his fingers over it, the grooves in the metal seemed to resemble the indent of knuckles - definitely a punch. Ford brought his hand away from the pole and rubbed his fingers together, examining the residue that came from the pole.

It wasn’t dirt, it was a more rusted colour.

Ford brought his fingers closer to his nose and sniffed.

Dried blood.

Definitely what one would expect, should one attempt to punch a road sign. In theory that would encourage, through the process of natural selection and causation, one not to do it again, but as Ford crossed the road, he saw yet another indent in a fire hydrant, like it had been kicked.

Following the clues, Stanford continued along the road, looking for abnormalities in the architecture, trying to uncover what exactly had unleashed itself through the main street.

Perhaps it was a creature? He wasn’t sure.

He wasn’t wholeheartedly committed to this search, knowing he was simply seeking distraction from his end goal, mailing out Fiddleford’s cheque. Sending the cheque had an element of finality about it, severing the last ties and obligations between himself and his old college friend, cutting the cord so to speak. Ford knew he had to do it, but for now, he’d allow himself a slight distraction, solving the mystery of the mysterious spree of property damage.

Continuing along the road, the trail of broken and bent public property stopped at the wall outside of The Skull Fracture, Gravity Fall’s local bar.

Ford crouched to examine the crushed bricks, another furious punch having jarred the sandstone from the wall, cracking several bricks with the impact.

There was a lot more blood here, staining the sandy brick wall a dark orange colour.

Whoever had punched their emotions out on the town had stopped here, their hand possibly too damaged to continue, and judging from the blood splatter trailing along the pavement, they entered the bar, or were led in, ending their journey there.

“Odd.” Ford mused, examining the trail of blood.

He must have looked quite peculiar, sleuthing his way down main street, crouched on the ground beside the entrance to the bar, scratching flecks of blood from the pavement.

If it was a creature, Ford would like to take a specimen.

If it wasn’t a creature, and merely an enraged alcoholic, then Ford’s procrastination would have solved that particular mystery and he could go back to mailing out Fiddleford’s cheque.

Procrastination. A true aid to scientific inquiry.

As Ford chipped away the blood, finding a spare specimen jar in the pockets of his trench coat, he attempted to scoop the blood sample into the jar, and was jostled by a fisherman entering the bar, the man bumping his tackle box into Ford’s shoulder.

The fisherman looked down at Ford, giving him a peculiar look, and Ford winced, realising how odd this looked.
“Sorry.” Ford apologised, though he wasn’t sure why he should be apologising. The fisherman knocked into him.

The fisherman shrugged, giving Ford one more peculiar look, before pushing open the door to the bar.

As he pushed past Ford, something fell out of the gentleman’s tackle box, something small and shiny that clanged on the ground.

Thinking it was a stray hook, or something similar, Ford reflexively went to pick it up, returning it to the gentleman.

“Excuse me. I think you dropped your –“

The fisherman hardly paused to look back at Ford, pressing on into the bar, and Ford was left alone on the sidewalk, staring at something that shouldn’t be there.

It wasn’t a hook.

It was the palm reader’s ring.

That didn’t make any sense, Ford threw the ring away. He distinctly remembered throwing it into the lake, inebriated and emotional, casting it out.

He saw it sink.

But here it was, returned to him through very peculiar providence.

And that wasn’t the only concerning thing.

Ford could recall that when he threw the ring away, it was black. He remembered the palm reader’s awful rhyme, when this is black, you can’t turn back, and threw away the black ring, casting the omen out, for all the good it did him.

It wasn’t black now.

It was glowing, blue, like a vibrant sapphire, more vibrant than Ford remembered.

Frowning, Ford examined the ring further, turning it over in his fingers.

It was definitely glowing. It wasn’t just catching the light. Sapphires didn’t glow like that.

That was strange.

Curiosity getting the better of him, Ford felt the ring with his fingertips, before deciding to put it on, since it was so bizarrely returned to him.

Sliding the ring on his finger, Ford instantly regretted his decision.

\[
\begin{array}{ccc}
LIES! & LIES! & HE LIES! \\
DON’T BELIEVE & – & NOT WHAT HE SEEMS! \\ DOOMED TO FAIL & – TOMORROW & – LAST CHANCE \\ \end{array}
\]

WHEN GRAVITY FALLS AND EARTH BECOMES SKY, FEAR -
Ford gasped, and wrenched the ring from his finger, holding it away from him.

Panting, he glared at the ring, shocked.

When he put it on, the voice, (it sounded like many voices, berating him in the echo chamber of his mind) the cryptic whispering voice from his dreams was all but screaming in his head, overwhelming him with this dread sense of urgency, this caustic warning.

A bad omen.

Ford inhaled, adrenaline racing through him as he struggled to regain his breath.

The ring twinkled innocently back at him, the blue glow seeming supernatural, ominous.

This was exhilarating.

A greater mystery than the source of the town’s property damage.

Shaking the blood sample out of the specimen jar, Ford very carefully dropped the ring in the small glass container, and sealed it shut.

He stood up and examined the jar in the light, that curious blue glow shining tellingly at him.

The ring’s message concerned Ford, echoing the obscure sentiments from his odd dreams back in the bunker, and that last line. When Gravity Falls and Earth becomes sky. Fiddleford had said that exact sentence when he was pulled out of the portal.

Ford thought he was spouting gibberish. Maybe not.

The diagnostics machinery in the bunker would be better equipped to deal with this, to provide Ford a thorough analysis of an obviously supernatural specimen such as this. They’d designed the lab down there for this exact purpose, examining and containing paranormal specimens.

Pocketing the specimen jar, Ford strode into the forest, away from the town.

He walked through the trees, passing Willow’s family cabin at the edge of the woods, absently noticing Suzie’s car parked there, along with several others.

Shrugging off his other responsibilities, Ford hiked further in, to the tree that housed the bunker’s secret entrance.

Fiddleford’s cheque could wait.

This was far more intriguing.

__________________________

Kryptos dubbed this part of the Quadrangle the ‘firing range’ because it was a safe place for henchmaniacs to practise their marksmanship in their downtime, the room set up with moving dartboard cut-outs to facilitate target practice.
However Kryptos seemed to be the only henchman who needed to work on his marksmanship, and Pyronica renamed the room ‘the fiery rage’ and claimed it as her favourite spot in the ever changing compound that they called home.

She named it the ‘fiery rage’ just to irritate Kryptos, who was convinced she was saying it wrong, and he would painstakingly attempt to explain the accurate way of saying ‘firing range’ in a misguided attempt to correct her.

“It’s firing range.”

“Yeah, I know. Fiery rage.”

“No, firing range.”

“Yeah, fiery rage – duh.”

Since calling it the ‘fiery rage’ annoyed Kryptos so much, Pyronica’s nickname for the room caught on, and soon everyone was calling it that, much to Krytops’ displeasure.

Finding Pyronica in the fiery rage, Bill floated up to the safety line, and simply watched her work for a while.

Pyronica was built for fighting, that much had always been true. She was born to a particularly vicious family of feared and renowned combat cyclops, great warriors with insatiable appetites for destruction who were all but exterminated in a Federation sanctioned attempt to bubble wrap the galaxy from dangerous creatures.

It seemed you were only of value to the Federation if you were vulnerable and compliant, and seeing Pyronica’s species exterminated one by one only reinforced that fact.

The sole reason Pyronica’s life was spared was because she was a child at the time of her family’s genocide, and considered vulnerable enough to be contained. Vulnerable and valuable, after all, one never knows when one will need a famed warrior cyclops on one’s side, or so the Federation thought.

They might have succeeded in their quest to mould Pyronica on side, into the perfect weapon, if they had more time.

Locking her in the Infinitentiary had that end in mind, an infinite period through which they could shape and reform the heartbroken cyclops child into the perfect enforcer for the galaxy’s agenda. Rehabilitation they called it. That was the prison’s go-to catch phrase for government sanctioned brainwashing. Her age conveniently wasn’t seen as a moral issue, imprisoning an orphaned child, as the prison was run by an intergalactic baby.

What the Federation hadn’t counted on was for Pyronica to find a friend. Heartbreak is like a magnet, and it didn’t take too long for happenstance to bring another heartbroken orphan through the Infinitentiary, sharing Pyronica’s cell.

Bill watched Pyronica lob flaming projectiles at the targets scattered around the room with relentless accuracy, incinerating the cut-outs as quickly as they reformed, moving about the room mechanically.

Pyronica didn’t fight from a distance, she always got right into the thick of it, swerving around the cosmic targets, breaking them apart with her hands, rending them in two with a precise kick from her pointed high heels, tearing them to shreds and biting them on particularly rough days.
Understandably, growing up in a prison, being moulded into the perfect killing machine - that can give a girl a hell of a lot of pent up aggression.

Possibly the Federation was counting on that, counting on that aggression to be used for their benefit, and not to their detriment.

Ever since Pyronica met Bill, she had been devoted to tearing it all down, the Federation, and every galaxy that housed it’s backwards moral reasoning, it’s devotion to the preservation of normality for the compliant and subdued.

She owed it to the little one-eyed girl who lost her parents to burn it all to the ground.

Pyronica sped through the training course, destroying every target that popped up to meet her ire, until she faced the last one, tearing it apart with her manicured claws, snarling viciously.

A low whistle sounded out from across the room, and Pyronica span around to see Bill at the edge of the training room, applauding her.

“We’re going to need a new room, if you keep that up.”

Pyronica beamed at Bill, her mood brightening at once, and skipped across the charred remains of the targets, elated to see him.

“We’ll be moving dimensions soon. I want my new room to be pink.”

“How about a new continent instead?” Bill countered, floating over to Py with his hands behind his back. “I hear Australia is nice.”

Pyronica squealed with glee and clapped her hands, before looking down at Bill. “So we’re doing it?”

“What made you think we wouldn’t?” Bill scoffed.

“Tonight?”

“Tomorrow.” Bill corrected. “I’m spending one more day with Sixer, and we’ll test the portal again in the evening. I just have a few more things to put into place, and we’ll be ready.”

“Have you told him yet?” Pyronica asked Bill, frowning slightly. “I don’t want this blowing up on us.”

“I’m working my way up to that.” Bill replied sheepishly.

“If Six Fingers is going to be a problem –” Pyronica warned.

“He won’t be.” Bill assured her. “I may not have told him, but I have assurances.”

“What kind of assurances?” Pyronica asked curiously.

“A deal.” Bill explained, trying to sound nonchalant.

“What kind of deal?” Pyronica pressed.

“A private deal.” Bill replied, narrowing his eye at her. He crossed his arms, and stared up at her briskly. “You don’t need to know the nitty gritty details, but I have assurances that Sixer will continue to be an asset, so the chances of this being a ‘problem’ are negligible.”
“I’ll bet he’s an asset.” Pyronica waggled her brow at Bill suggestively, reaching down to elbow at him teasingly.

Just as Bill began swatting her arm away playfully, they were interrupted by an unwelcome guest, storming into the fiery rage.

“What a surprise.”

It was the Don. He did not look happy.

“I’ve been looking for you Cipher. And instead of coming good on your deal like you said you would, you’ve been messing around with your buddies – avoiding me and mine.” Don Goo oozed discontent, looking between Bill and Pyronica, who both paused their rough housing to stare at the oily mobster. “Thought I’d have to start carving up your freak-show to get your attention again. Should I start now?”

He pulled a knife from an inexplicable pocket of goo at his side.

“You want to go toe to toe with Pyronica, be my guest. That’s a good way to lose out on your deal before you get a single damn thing.” Bill said brightly, scowling at Don Goo, and extended his size to something more substantial and intimidating, posturing for the sake of good posture. “We haven’t shook on anything yet, and already you’re keen to shoot yourself in your no doubt porous foot.”

“I know what you need us for, Triangle.” Goo jabbed his knife in Bill’s direction, waving it in the air as he spoke. “Seems to me like you’ve been trying to piss me off, and congratulations, you’re succeeding. You want me to leave you high and dry? When are you going to give me what I want?”

“Can you count?” Bill’s voice rang out, his bricks flashing blindingly bright, his voice sing-song and cheerful.

Don Goo squinted at Bill. His mouth hung open, his knife still pointing at Bill. “Are you mocking me?”

“It’s a legitimate question.” Bill replied, keeping his tone solicitous despite his growing discontent. “Can you count?”

“Of course I can count, you geometry freak-show.” Don Goo snarled, feeling belittled.

“Because I believe I said I’d see to your deal in three days, and guess what day it is? If you’re into ordered abstractions of ‘time’, then this would be – you guessed it – your lucky day!” Bill waved his hands in front of him, summoning sparkling lights between his palms. Clapping his hands together, snuffing the sparkles out, Bill continued in his too cheery voice – a warning sign for those who knew him. “But luck can turn on a dime, so don’t test me.”

“You make good on the deal, and I ain’t your problem no more.” Goo reasoned, persistent.

“We could have done this amiably, but you made yourself my problem?” Bill shook his head at the mobster, tsking. “Very poor business sense. That may work when you threaten people, but threatening the people you work with is a slippery slope to bad deals.”

“I’m in the business of bad business. I get what I want.” Goo oozed over to Bill, getting up in his space. He continued to point his knife at Bill.
Bill didn’t like it.

He narrowed his eye, taking in the mobster, wrestling with his own desire to incinerate the obnoxious man. He was weighing up the pros and cons, tallying how well his universal takeover would fare without a front line to fall for him.

Forcing himself to smile politely at Don Goo, Bill inclined his surface. “Then let’s give you what you want. Stars know I wouldn’t want a problem.”

Pyronica looked down at Bill, noting how he was doing the triangular equivalent of gritting his teeth throughout this encounter. He could have snapped his fingers, banished Goo’s knife, and eviscerated him where he stood, but he didn’t. He was playing the long game.

Goo sized up Bill’s acquiescence, looking the triangle up and down, before he nodded. “Good. About time this deal was put in place.”

“So state your terms.” Bill extended his hand, the fire dancing in his palm. “And let’s get this over with.”

Goo narrowed his eyes at Bill’s hand, looking between it, and Bill’s eye, thinking. He extended his own slimy hand, before pulling it back.

“Not here. I don’t trust your type. I want follow through. Instant follow through.”

“The follow through doesn’t happen without sealing the deal.” Bill continued to hold his hand out, his eye lidded, unimpressed.

“You’re squirrelly. I’ve heard all about your loopholes, and your consequences – your side effects.” Goo sneered. “For what I’m trading I want to see this follow through, and I want everyone to see it.”

Bill blinked at Goo, unimpressed. “If what you want is still what we spoke about last, whether you see it happen, or you don’t, you’ll know the deal’s done either way, because it won’t be there.”

“I want to see it happen with my own eyes. That’s part of the deal.” Goo insisted. “I don’t want just me to see it, I want all my boys to see it, and all your looney’s too. To hold you to your word.”

Pyronica looked between Goo and Bill, unhappy with this turn of events. It seemed like Goo was setting Bill up to back him into a corner.

“A public deal?” Bill raised his eyebrow. “You really want all of them to know how you’re trading their lives for your own personal satisfaction? Writing off your Famiglia?”

“They’d die for me, and for the chance to get the revenge we’ve been craving. Whether on the streets, or in a deal, the end game’s the same.” Don Goo shrugged. “That’s the Famiglia, that’s how it works. Always more family where they came from. It don’t matter if I lose a few. They follow me, my leadership. And what the Don says goes. End of story.”

Bill still glared at Don Goo, displeased with the thought of a public deal with this slimy character, knowing Goo was likely to try to screw him over, and try and make a show of it.

“Hey, any publicity is good publicity.” Goo grinned at Bill, and shoved his hands into the goo on his sides, like he were shoving his hands into his pockets, sheathing his knife. “Ain’t that what they say. You deliver, we shake hands, and you get to show off how great and powerful you are. Ain’t that what they want? To see you conquer a planet before you conquer a planet.”
Bill continued to stare at Don Goo, unblinking, silent.

The silence stretched on, the tension unfolding between them.

Don Goo seemed to be rolling his tongue along the inside of his mouth, assessing Bill’s unresponsiveness, deliberating whether or not he could take it for weakness.

Bill’s consistent stare was unnerving on the best of days, and the way it just kept dragging on was starting to piss Goo off.

“Come on. It’s all benefits for you if you do… Or you don’t.” Goo shrugged his shoulders, sneering at Bill. “I see how it is. If y’aint got the stomach for it –“

“Where and when?” Bill asked abruptly.

“Messier 82, Cigar Galaxy – Lama Szlam.” Goo lifted his chin at Bill, like he was issuing a challenge. “One hour. Bring all your men. And the Dame too.”

Bill gave Pyronica a sideways glance, noting how his friend had her hands curled into fists, her bottom lip jutting out stubbornly.

“Fine.” Bill conceded, hoping to get this done as soon as possible.

“I’d better see you there.” Goo gave Bill one last scornful look, before he oozed out the door.

Pyronica waited until Goo left the fiery rage, and looked down at Bill, who stayed frozen, staring at the exit.

“He’s made himself a problem.” Bill remarked idly, still staring at Goo’s exit.

“Do you want me to take out the trash?” Pyronica asked helpfully.

“No. Let this play out a little longer. He won’t have an attitude problem for long.”

“He has an attitude problem now.” Pyronica rolled her eye. “I just want to bite him and be done with it.”

“No, you don’t. The guy’s like living putty. Too chewy, jaw strain in the making.”

Pyronica considered this and shuddered. A mouthful of goo. Gross.

Straightening her shoulders, Pyronica looked between Bill’s contemplative expression, and the door, antsy to be doing something.

“Do you want me to tell Teeth?” Pyronica offered.

Bill flexed his fingers, curling and uncurling his hands into fists, still staring at the trail of slime Don Goo left.

“Tell them all.”

Pyronica chewed on her bottom lip, and made to leave, but paused. “You know you don’t have to if you –“

Blue fire exploded, crackling against the walls of the fiery rage abruptly, crisping the fallen cut-outs behind them, Bill’s hand was balled up at his side.
“Tell them.” Bill let the room burn behind him, trying to retain his composure. “Let’s get this deal over with.”

The ring was suspended in a sealed chamber, undergoing quantitative chemical analysis while the machine did its work. Stanford could only watch the ring spin in stasis for so long, as the machine ran the mysterious jewellery over with lasers and various sensors.

Pulling a complete analytical reading from the machine would take time.

It had already been half an hour’s wait, and Ford had almost run out of procrastination techniques. He was exhausting his options for things to do while the machine pulled readings on the ring.

It was difficult to avoid watching the monitors that recorded the storage room, but Ford was doing his damnedest to find other things to do rather than watch the feed from the Cryo-tubes, where Shifty was still frozen, suspended in time for seeking his own freedom. He was an ice sculpture of regret in there.

It made Ford feel bad, being back here, being in the lab that F had built, in the place where Shifty had attacked Fiddleford, the place where his beloved pet shapeshifter had proved duplicitous enough to warrant an eternal punishment, kept in stasis indefinitely.

It tugged on Ford’s empathy, warring with himself, having to logically justify his decision to freeze Shifty. He had chosen to prioritise the safety of the townsfolk, of the rest of the world, over the rights and freedoms of his dear pet monster, and he’d do it again, yet that sort of philosophical reasoning, prioritising the needs of the community over the rights of the individual, was a slippery slope to all sorts of moral relativism that Ford struggled with himself to justify.

Or perhaps he was simply struggling with the moral relativism of it all because he had nothing better to do. He had too much time to think on it, mulling it over in his head again and again with every pass of the laser over the glowing blue ring.

Seeking refuge from his chronic overthinking Ford had rearranged the filing cabinet, cleaned and organised the various beakers and jars he kept in the lab, made a paperclip chain, and powered through a can of cold, unappetising beans while waiting for the final diagnostics on the ring to print out.

Rolling his office chair from one side of the lab to the other to hang the paperclip chain off the side of the motherboard, Ford briefly checked the countdown for the diagnostics machine, wondering how much time he had left to wait.

00:30

Ford watched the countdown.

00:29

He stared at the blinking numbers, willing them to move faster, trying to get his result quicker, curious what it could be. The possibilities were racing through his head, wanting to explore what this strange ring could mean, whether it was sentient, how it was communicating with him, but until the machine could provide him with a conclusive reading that an artefact like this was safe, Ford couldn’t put the ring back on and find out more.

Tolkien had taught him that much.

He had to wait.

Ford looked at the countdown readout, expectant.

It still read 00:29.

“Ugh.” Ford pushed away from the diagnostics machine and span around in his chair, bored.

He could be finishing the grocery shopping by now, driving home to make breakfast for himself and his muse, he could be analysing the blood sample he’d found by the bar, uncovering what curious monster caused such carnage, he could be …

Mailing his cheque to Fiddleford.

Ford slumped in his seat, resigned to waiting impatiently in the underground lab.

He was putting off severing that final link between himself and his assistant, not out of spite for Fiddleford and his memory altering ways, but through sheer emotional ineptitude.

Stanford didn’t know how to handle the finality that came from cutting out the people in his life who he’d come to rely on. He handled it poorly with Stanley and now it was happening again with Fiddleford. He was delaying that final blow, the definitive ‘get out of my life’ that sending that cheque would convey.

He didn’t want to hurt Fiddleford.

No matter how much his actions had hurt him.

Bill had told him that he doesn’t owe a thing to the people who’ve hurt him, but Stanford felt he at least owed it to F to follow through on his promise, for his family’s sake, if not for F’s own sake.

Stanford believed that, if only he could follow through with it.

The betrayal still sat bitter in the back of his throat, the fact that F had accosted him with that memory ray, that he hadn’t destroyed it, that he could have been using it on Ford this entire time.

It frightened Ford, to think that his mind may have been altered, that someone had with the technology available to them, reached into his mind and made him believe things that weren’t true, to change the way Ford remembered details, to eradicate those details completely.

If not for the fact that he felt mostly unaffected, perhaps then Ford might have panicked more, acted out more, but the fact that he hardly felt different was perhaps more insidious. He had almost defended F, defended his friend to Bill. He had assumed that F would never do something like that to him, but perhaps he only believed that because all evidence to the contrary had been eradicated.

He didn’t know.

Patting through his pockets, looking for something to distract him from the sickened feeling brewing in his belly the more he stewed on thoughts of the memory ray, Stanford wrapped his fingers around something he’d almost forgotten.
Or perhaps it was exactly what he’d forgotten.

Ford removed the canister of electrical tape from his coat pocket, the canister he’d removed from F’s memory gun, and turned it over in his hands.

In theory, making assumptions from half remembered, scribbled drawings, and from the logical elements of design that Ford could infer from F’s work, this canister of electrical tape was like the inside of a VCR. The tape within would somehow, through F’s mechanical wizardry, or the ingenuity of the alien tech he’d meshed the device with, record the brainwaves that captured that specific memory in a way that could be played back, like a snapshot into the mind.

Following that logic, in theory, Ford could loop the tape through the VCR machine he kept in the lab to record Shifty’s development and the cryo-tubes, and play it back through the monitors.

He wasn’t sure if he wanted to remember the instances wherein F had turned his memory ray on him, not wanting to drive yet another nail into the coffin that was his friendship with the mechanic, but Ford reasoned that without proof, whether he chose to turn F away or reconnect with him, it would all be redundant. Accusations of memory wiping had no substance without proof, and here was proof, sitting in Ford’s six-fingered hands, ready for him to face.

He wasn’t sure, now that he had the canister in his hands, what was more unappealing – mailing off F’s cheque without proof of his wrongdoing, or viewing the tape now and having all evidence of said wrongdoing laid out in front of him.

It was unlikely that F hadn’t used the gun on him, given the apparent gap in his memories from that one autumn night, but Ford realised he also owed it to Fiddleford to watch the tape, to extend him the courtesy of seeing the proof with his own eyes on the scant possibility that F hadn’t turned the gun on him, and was innocent of his wrongdoing.

Ford was not naïve enough to hope for the best, but that was the best possible outcome of viewing the tape.

Sighing, looking between the diagnostic machine and the canister in his hand, Ford allowed himself the fifteen minutes left on the countdown to rig the electrical tape through the lab’s VCR system, and see these erased memories for himself.

He had nothing better to do, and it beat making chains out of paperclips.

With that in mind, Ford set to work.

“The problem wasn’t how I was processin’ the memories, it was that the memories had happened at all!”

Ford frowned at the tape.

Following Fiddleford’s twisted logic in retrograde was like twisting the knife in deeper, when it came to processing this betrayal. The confirmation of the tape, seeing the device in Fiddleford’s hands as he gushed about the ray, it all culminated into a painful feeling behind his ribs.
“But this is dangerous!” Ford watched himself pace around on the tapes, spluttering, gesturing at the device. “Deleting memories, interfacing with brainwaves – I – what if it’s permanent?”

“It’s designed to be permanent. This ain’t a ‘let’s fiddle around with your bad memories’ ray, it’s a ‘let’s delete those nightmares once and for all’ gun. It works, it really works.”

Ford doubted that the ray was as permanent a solution as Fiddleford insisted. Already he had the creeping feeling of déjà vu bringing the wiped memories back to the fore of his brain, conjuring a headache of remembrance.

It seemed seeing evidence of the time in which the memories were removed triggered partial recall, and the tapes did the rest. Perhaps Fiddleford always intended for the tapes to be a backup. Like saving the information to a floppy disk before deleting it from the hard drive, if he were to follow Fiddleford’s metaphor.

“Deleting memories, you could – you’d be inflicting dementia on yourself. That’s what it is, voluntary dementia.”

“I’m not using it dangerously, I’m using it medicinally. It’s not dangerous.”

“How could you know that?”

“I used it just last night is how - and I’m fine! Look, no side effects, no nightmares!”

“You used it on yourself???”

“And I’m fine!”

A poor justification, as far as arbitrary justifications went. Success with a singular test subject was a false result. It could still be dangerous.

While a solution, when entered into voluntarily, may be fine for one person, it wouldn’t necessarily be fine for everyone. Knowing how emphatically against the concept he was, Stanford wrinkled his nose as Fiddleford continued laying out his justifications for building a weapon like this.

“I cannot believe you! To think you would do something so stupid!”

Ford nodded, watching the tapes, agreeing with his past self. It was stupid, and reckless of Fiddleford, to produce such a device.

“Oh, so it’s cheating when I actually do something to help myself, when I solve what’s been keepin’ me up all night every night, but when you suggest yoga or breathing exercises its fine –“

“Because those things don’t delete your mind!”

“I ain’t deletin’ my mind.” Past Fiddleford argued. “I’m gettin’ rid of my nightmares!”

Perhaps Fiddleford was stupid for having confided the designs for this device to Ford. If he really intended to use it medicinally, personally only, then he could have kept it to himself, benefited himself that way. Bringing the device to Ford’s attention, no matter how excited he was about it, was inviting criticism, and censure. It was like he sought Ford out as a second opinion without really wanting a second opinion.

If only F hadn’t been so ambitious with it, kept it a personal project, then perhaps he could have still benefitted from the ray without turning it on others. It was a solution for him, not a solution for everyone.

“I figured this out on my own, why isn’t it good enough for you?”

“It’s not that, it’s just – F – I can’t – I can’t bear the thought of you using this on yourself, you’ve got such a brilliant mind. I don’t want you to damage it.”

“It’s already gone and got damaged, following you on your magical mystery trails.” Fiddleford spat venemously, not so forgiving about the incident as he seemed to be. Ford knew that the trauma was a factor in his decline. It had to be. “You’re the reason I can’t sleep, and you ain’t gonna take my solution away from me just ‘cause you don’t agree with it.”

If it had remained a solution just for Fiddleford, perhaps Ford could have been lenient. It plucked on his guilt, knowing he was the reason for F’s many traumas, that F was right, but still, examining his reasoning further, Ford couldn’t justify letting a device like that exist, despite the personal traumas that fuelled F. One person’s pain did not justify the potential suffering of many, the violation of many. Ford would never have allowed a weapon like that to exist, at least not in the same house as him if he could help it.

“It’s my idea.” Memory Fiddleford replied defensively.

“And I’m telling you, it’s a bad one.” Memory Ford reiterated, crossing his arms and frowning at his friend.

Ford raised his eyebrow at himself. In this memory he certainly wasn’t mincing words. He assumed Fiddleford showed him the device to hear what Ford really thought about it, and he clearly delivered.

“Of course you’d say that. It isn’t yours. God, you’re so patronising. You haven’t even considered the positive things this device can do. This machine could revolutionise therapy, completely wipe out negative symptoms in trauma victims, enable a better quality of life for folks who don’t want to remember the things they’ve gone through. Heck, just in this town alone I bet there are plenty of folks who seen more than they care to, if half the things in that journal of yours are real. Those creatures are terrifyin’, and we’ve got tonnes of terrified townsfolk who need help. It’s got untold widespread potential benefits and applications.”

F really laid into him, he didn’t hold back, telling Ford exactly how he felt, not just about Ford’s reaction, but in a way, how he really felt about Ford.

It was probably essential that Ford forget this if he were to work side by side with F for the rest of the project, because some of the things F said were completely unexpected and wildly divisive.

Their friendship would have deteriorated far sooner if Ford knew that was how F really saw him. As patronising, selfish, self-important, uncaring of the needs of others.

“People should know what’s out there. Not forget. They should learn from their experiences, adapt with them.”

“Well what if they can’t adapt, huh?” Fiddleford pressed. “Some things you can’t come back from. Some things you can’t adapt with. Imagine what happens if a whole crowd of people got looked at by that Gremloblin thing? If that was inflicted on them, those nightmare visions. Would you let them all suffer, just so they could adapt?”

The Gremloblin incident seemed to be the turning point for F, morally. The event he couldn’t come back from.

Ford still held by his beliefs that knowledge and awareness was far better than wilful ignorance, when it came to survival.

Having ignorance forced on him was unforgivable. He despised being kept in the dark, especially by his friend. Or ex friend.

He got the feeling that Bill would never side with F on this, that the muse, who valued enlightenment, doled it out for centuries, would never back a move like this, deleting memories.

In that instant, Ford wished he had waited until the muse was beside him to watch this tape, to see just how badly he’d been betrayed. He had the feeling the muse would be there to validate him, to comfort him, and reinforce his decision to cut F from the project.

Perhaps then the painful tightness between his ribs would be more manageable.

Ford rubbed his chest uncomfortably, and watched the tape unfold.

“I’m not like you Stanford. To me the pros outweigh the cons and I planned for every outcome. I’ve thought this through six ways to Sunday. You can’t deter me. I planned for individual case by case use, and widespread use, to help the people of this town.” Memory Fiddleford explained, scooping up thin air to represent the townsfolk. “We just need to gather them all in one place, input the cable into the output jack and all their nightmares could be gone in an instant, all at once, just like that – no more suffering.”

This was why Ford couldn’t let such a device exist. Fiddleford’s single-minded drive to end the suffering of a mind plagued by evidence of the unpleasant or paranormal was rife with unethical ramifications. Crimes against humanity. Against the unwilling. The thought that his friend could justify the mental manipulation of hundreds of people turned Ford’s stomach all over again. His headache was getting worse.

“We have to destroy it.”

Ford nodded again, murmuring wordlessly to himself, solemnly, agreeing with the decision he’d made.

Fiddleford’s intense reaction to Ford’s decision was where it all started breaking down.

“You aren’t takin’ this away from me Stanford. It’s the first thing that’s made the nightmares stop in forever, you can’t take this away from me.”

Ford winced. That wasn’t what he was trying to do.

“Ain’t nothin’ wrong with this device, it’s for helpin’ people, not harming them. You don’t have to —“

He’d believe that when he believed F wasn’t letting his emotions influence his logic here. He didn’t know how to approach this ethically, though Ethics in Engineering was always the one subject Ford knew F skipped. He attended the introductory lecture, but when the lecturer mentioned how unethical it would be to build giant dinosaur robots, F stormed out of the lecture hall.

“It’s the only thing I got that’s making me better. I ain’t going back to the way I was.”
Fiddleford’s desperation was as heartbreaking as it was disgusting to Stanford. He felt sick, physically sick, watching F back away from him, clinging to that demented device like it was his only lifeline. The only thing it tied him to was his own mental degradation, but that didn’t seem to bother him. He acted like he needed the device to survive, no matter who he turned it on.

In the video, he turned it on Ford.

“I don’t want to do this Ford, but you just won’t let it be.”

Ford watched the two of them pace around each other in the video, memory Ford holding his hands up, F’s arm shaking as he held his friend at gunpoint. Ford watched himself step closer, aiming to disarm F, to stop this madness from taking off.

His forehead ached persistently in remembered sympathy for the pain F was soon to inflict on him. Remembering was painful.

For a moment in the tape, it seemed like Ford had gotten through to F, reminding him of his family, of his priority. It made sense, his family was his priority since day one of coming here. Ford had assumed that was the way to get through to F, but he was still clinging to that device like it was his life’s work.

“No! I’m not destroyin’ it! It’s my work, it’s my invention! Mine! Let go!”

“You said you’d do this – “ Memory Ford gritted out, struggling to pull the gun from F’s wiry limbs. “For your family.”

Fiddleford held down the trigger, the memory gun whirring as the ray powered up and roughly kicked Ford’s ankle, following swiftly with another kick to his stomach, sending his friend spilling onto the floor of the attic.

“I am doin’ this for my family!” Fiddleford panted, aiming at Ford. “I won’t go back to them a broken man!”

The diagnostics machine beeped, as the final readings on the ring printed out from the side of the machine. Ford looked over to it, distracted, and watched the harrowing final moments of his deleted memories play out.

“Fiddleford, please –“

“I’m sorry Stanford.”

Ford paused it there, the tape capturing the exact moment after Fiddleford pulled the trigger, his expression twisting with determination and regret.

It was not a pleasant sight.

The tape stalled, skipping ahead in a fractured sort of way, before pausing on Fiddleford’s attic space yet again, another scene Ford didn’t remember. He’d have to look at it later.

Ford’s headache felt like blinding light at the back of his eyes. He felt clammy, and hot, simply from watching the tape, his memory returning to him, responding to the stimulus.

He pushed back away from the desk in his roller chair and fanned himself with a paper from his desktop, sweating.
Hopefully there was an aspirin somewhere down here. Uncovering erased memories like this was a painful process.

Wiping his brow, and shaking off the nausea, Ford rolled over to the diagnostic’s machine and read through the print outs, determined to put the disturbing tape out of his mind.

The first thing Ford noticed was that the readings on the ring were remarkably similar to the readings on the mannequin when Ford pulled it out of the portal. The radioactive signatures were nearly identical, which surprised Ford.

Rather than being a paranormal artefact that originated from earth, from the palm reader as Ford assumed, the ring seemed to originate from beyond the stars, somewhere on the other side of the portal.

That was surprising, the portal wasn’t operational when the palm reader delivered her ring to Ford. If it had slipped through the portal somehow, surely Ford would have noticed.

Perhaps there was another tear in dimensions somewhere. Ford couldn’t think of any other potential conveyance between worlds, but the science doesn’t lie. This ring had interdimensional origins.

It also seemed to be unresponsive, but still conveying sentience. It had no pain receptors, no unusual anatomy, nothing was alive about it, but the blue glow in the ring’s gem seemed to pulse like a heartbeat. Whatever sentience was encapsulated within, it was being projected from a different location.

There was the initial assumption that magic had been involved, like a curse or a spell bewitching the ring, but Ford generally didn’t put much stock in magic as a definitive answer. Even magic had rules, reasons behind how it worked.

Then again, Ford did live with a god, however the scientist within him couldn’t accept a force that operated without rules or structure.

These readings would help Ford unpack those rules, to garner a better understanding of the ring itself, it’s purpose.

So far, its purpose seemed to be perplexing Ford, sending him unscrupulous warnings about the end of the world. All very morbid.

The diagnostics were essential for finding out, above all things, whether the ring was safe. Whether it was possible to throw off the ring’s influence should one put it on their finger, to engage with it, to communicate.

The main reason for the testing was so Ford could ascertain that he wouldn’t put the ring on his finger and fall prey to its wiles – possession is never good for one’s constitution.

It seemed a temporary enough influence. The readings from the machine indicated that the glow that powered the ring could only extend itself briefly into the minds of others, and only through direct contact. It seemed active enough here, and, Ford realised, it must have projected those cryptic unusual dreams into Ford’s head through virtue of the ring sitting in his pocket.

It never impacted him when he was back in the shack with Bill, the only time those strange dreams affected Ford were when he was down in the bunker alone with Fiddleford. Very peculiar.

The ring seemed to follow basic rules though, it couldn’t compel you, it couldn’t reach beyond the constraints of the glowing gem. It seemed it could only convince you, and only when worn, or kept close to the body. Its range didn’t extend too far, outside of close range its powers were useless.

In theory, if Ford wore the ring very briefly to communicate with the sentience within the ring, he could fling it away from him and sever any connection before it caused damage.

Nodding to himself, Stanford pulled on his six fingered safety gloves and reached into the diagnostics chamber, pulling the beaker out and tipping the ring onto his left palm.

Carefully tugging the safety glove off his right hand with his teeth, Ford wriggled his fingers, and shimmied the ring onto his finger.

For a moment nothing happened.

Then –

LIES!  LIES!!  DON’T BELIEVE HIS LIES!!

WHEN GRAVITY FALLS AND EARTH BECOMES SKY!

YOU’VE BEEN BETRAYED!  TOMORROW THE WORLD ENDS FOR YOU

FEAR THE BEAST –

Ford cleared his throat, and spoke up, hoping that he could communicate with the sentience in turn, and not just be yelled at.

“Hello. Yes, I know I’ve been betrayed. That’s rather old news by now.”

The sentience in the ring seemed to pull back, holding its breath, before it’s voice calmed substantially.

You know?

“I’ve just seen the tapes. Fiddleford’s been wiping my memories for who knows how long. Suffice to say, I feel a lot better about kicking him off the project.”

The voice inside the ring tsked, and Stanford felt a wave of disapproval ooze from the blue glow.

The human is not the one who betrayed you. You are a fool to hold on to such hurts, when the one who truly betrays you has been within your sight this entire time.

Ford paused and frowned, taking that in, before insisting. “No, no, I’m pretty sure erasing my memories without my consent is betraying me. Fiddleford definitely betrayed my trust.”

I do not speak about something as petty as your trust. I speak of the fate of the universe.

“Some kind of apocalypse, is that right?” Ford asked, unconvinced.

Yesssss. The voice hissed victoriously. The end of all life as you know it.

“Right.” Ford twiddled with the ring on his finger, already debating whether he should just remove it and save himself a rather bizarre conversation. “Well. This chat has been very helpful, but ultimately nonsensical honestly, so I might just –“

NO!  BILL CIPHER LIES! THE BEAST -
“Bill?” Ford frowned, before scoffing, disbelieving. “He might tell the odd fib on occasion, but that’s hardly –“

HE HAS BETRAYED YOU MORE DEEPLY THAN ANYONE HAS, OR EVER WILL. I KNOW! HE LIES.

For a moment, Ford felt a wave of insecurity wash over him, no doubt a follow on effect of learning of Fiddleford’s betrayal. While his paranoia was inclined to ramp up, to trust no one at this point in time, he thought back to his muse last night, promising him the world. Trying so hard for him.

They had a connection now, one that was indelible until the end of time itself.

Bill wouldn’t betray him.

And why should Ford believe a rather confrontational ring over his own muse, his personal god?

“Yes, well, I’m sure you think that, but I have assurances otherwise.” Ford said lightly, twisting the ring around on his finger.

LIES.

“See, you’re not very convincing. And quite repetitive. If that’s all you have to say, I might put you back in the specimen jar.”

I have PROOFS. Your portal is a sham. A lie built between you two. A doomsday device.

Ford blinked, then laughed, short and disbelieving. “I think I’d know if I built a doomsday device. It’s perfectly safe, we’ve run all the testing. The portal is designed to do good, to advance modern science along by decades, light years. It’s not dangerous, no more dangerous than knowledge is.”

Knowledge is very dangerous. It can unravel his plans, if you open your eyes to the truth.

Ford rolled his eyes, unimpressed. This ring was like a broken record.

No doubt you have questions. Even now, questions, whirling in the back of your mind. Your muse… do you know what he’s doing now? Right this second?

“You are a fool if you scorn my words. A doomed fool. You think yourself special? Tis a fabrication. He is using you. He made you feel chosen, another lie, like he has lied to all those other poor deluded scientists. He is the chess master, and you are the pawn. You think you’re the only one?”

Ford frowned at the ring. Had it been watching him? How could it know that Bill called him special, however reluctantly he said it?

Ford thought back on Bill’s earlier claims. How he’d had a hand in shaping all the great minds in human history. How there were other scientists.

Still, Ford clung to his belief in the muse. Bill hadn’t lied when he called him special, it was because he was special that Bill sought him out in the first place, and it was because he was special that he stayed, that he offered Ford a place at his side. He’d earned that epithet. It wasn’t a manipulation, it was a fact.
He wasn’t just another duped scientist. Ford had assurances. Bill hadn’t flirted like this with Da Vinci.

He was special.

_He has used scientists like you before._ The voice whispered. _Pythagoras, Da Vinci, he was the fire in the back of Plato’s cave. He has always been there, twisting fate to his whims, twisting people to suit his purposes._

Ford started, shocked. The voice had responded to his thoughts, not just his words there. That was rather insidious, he didn’t want anyone inside his head, certainly not after Fiddleford’s interference.

He pulled the ring a centimetre up his finger, reluctant to let this sentient voice speak directly to his thoughts. He didn’t want this strange presence snooping around in his head.

_Bill is already in your head._ The voice hissed. _He has been all along. There are signs. Dreams. You can’t really be that naïve._

Naïve. Ford had heard that before.

_“It’s not your fault you’re so naïve.” _Bill had told him. Cooed it at him lovingly. He’d been trying to comfort Ford, but now he was second guessing himself.

_You are naïve. You still think he’s on your side. He’s never been on anyone’s side but his own three._

But they were connected. Ford adamantly believed they were connected. Bill promised Ford the universe, and he gave the impression that he didn’t do that for just anyone.

Ford seemed primarily hung up on the thought that Bill would betray him. He let that be the main hurdle in his mind, the thing he staunchly disbelieved. It was harder to conceptualise Bill betraying him than to conceptualise that Bill could possibly destroy the world.

He could barely imagine Bill betraying him, but if he dwelled on it, he had no doubt he could imagine Bill’s fire spreading. Bill had a talent for destruction like no other, he described himself as a disaster just the other night, and Ford believed it. His powers were intimidating, even bound as they were. Bill was a God, able to change the weather, to change matter, DNA. He was cantankerous, volatile, petty, cruel on the odd occasion. He hated most people.

But still, Ford couldn’t imagine that Bill could be bent on universal destruction, not when he showed such a different side to Stanford in private.

_Naïve scientist. Appeal to your reason. To logic. Use your head, not your heart. You know he’s capable._

Ford twisted the ring again, not liking the way the voice seemed to be circling him, reverberating around his skull.

_Don’t you want to see proof?_

_“Proof?”_ Ford spoke aloud, scoffing. What proof could this ring possibly provide?

_Do you know what he’s doing right now? The liar. The beast._

Ford bit his lip, before stubbornly replying. _“Sleeping, where I left him.”_
Ah, but he never truly sleeps. He’s merely awake somewhere else.

Ford fiddled with the ring on his finger, more neurotic habit than purposeful gesture, doubt creeping up his spine.

_Do you want to see?_

“See?”

_What he’s doing right now. You want proof, don’t you._

Ford frowned, and stared at the glowing blue ring, torn between flinging it off his finger, and giving in to his curiosity.

_I can show you. He’s not what he seems._

Ford stared at the pulsing blue gem, fearful of what it was suggesting.

The voice was so insidious, so persistent and determined. What this sentience was suggesting appalled Ford, to think that Bill would betray him, to think he’d strike out against Ford’s destiny so graphically, to cast it aside. If anyone was invested in Ford’s destiny, it was Bill. He had been Ford’s most avid supporter from the very beginning. He picked Ford to achieve his destiny.

How did Ford know that this ring wasn’t the liar? How did Ford know he could believe a word it was saying, when he'd barely known this voice for a day?

He’d known Bill for months, nearly a year now, he felt like he understood who the muse was by this point. He wasn’t a betrayer, or a manipulator, he wasn’t working against him, he was Ford’s muse. He belonged to Ford, and visa versa. He’d been vulnerable with Ford, he had grown to trust Ford, and Ford trusted him. That wasn’t a manipulation.

He was perfect for Ford, his perfect muse inhabiting the perfect form Ford had built for him.

They’d built this portal together.

Bill wouldn’t betray him. Ford didn’t want to believe it.

Not so soon after Fiddleford. It just couldn’t be true.

_The truth either is or it isn’t. I can show you proof._ The voice in the ring whispered alluringly.

Ford couldn’t take it anymore. He wrenched the ring off his finger and dropped it in the specimen jar, rolling his chair far away from the bench the jar sat on.

He could hear the voice howl as Ford removed the ring from his finger, backing down from its influence.

He pushed his chair all the way back to the other side of the observation room.

Ford panted, and rubbed his hand anxiously, his headache from before making everything seem uncertain.

The ring seemed to pulse angrily in the specimen jar, but it’s protests were silenced.

Side-eying the ring, Ford opened one of the drawers, and grabbed the packet of Advil he kept for emergencies. Popping two pills out of the packet, he dry swallowed them, and felt them stick in his throat.

He rubbed his forehead, kneading the bridge of his nose. His eyes hurt for some reason, and he rubbed his eyelids, closing his eyes.

His throat felt swollen with anxiety, with uncertainty. His heart was thumping in his chest, pounding painfully.

He tried to hold onto his belief in Bill, that he’d been chosen, that he wouldn’t be betrayed, that he’d finally found someone who saw just how special he was. Someone who Ford loved, though he’d yet to admit it yet, and who possibly loved him back.

Ford stared at the ring in the specimen jar like it was a venomous viper, offering him proofs.

He didn’t want to believe it. He wanted to deny it’s proofs.

What proof could it show him that would be more proof than these months with Bill had been?
How could it compete with the proof that was the feeling in his chest that he could trust Bill? He’d been more open with his muse than he had been with anyone, he’d given more of himself to Bill than he had to anything. He pledged himself, mind and body, to the muse.

He was finally happy. So happy.

Bill made him happy.

They were connected.

Ford… Stanford loved him.

Surely that wasn’t the sort of thing to be taken lightly. Surely a pledge like that, an eternal promise, didn’t outweigh the proof in his heart that he was wanted by the muse, couldn’t outweigh the jealous whisperings of this so called ‘proof’ the ring spouted.

Ford couldn’t believe it. Wouldn’t believe it.

The ring was trying to turn him against Bill. It could be showing him anything, something fabricated. Something untrue.

It claimed these proofs would show Ford the truth. It claimed Bill wasn’t truly sleeping. It claimed it could show Ford what Bill was doing right this second.

Ford had given Fiddleford the benefit of the doubt that the memory canister could prove him wrong. It didn’t, it only justified Ford’s sense of betrayal, but he fervently hoped that whatever this ring had up it’s sleeve would only prove it wrong.

Ford scooted his wheeled chair closer to the bench, frowning intently at the ring in the specimen jar.

Proofs.

The proofs it offered should mean nothing, if Ford had faith in his muse. If he believed in him enough to trust him.

He wanted to trust him.

It was a shame really.
For someone who fell in love with a God, Ford was never much of a man of faith.

Sliding the ring out of the specimen jar onto his hand, Ford swallowed his uncertainty, and shimmied the ring onto his finger.

He would view these proofs, for the same reason he viewed the tapes. If the proof didn’t paint the picture the voice professed, it would assure Ford of Bill’s innocence. He owed it to Bill to suspend all judgement, until he saw what the muse was doing with his own eyes.

And if it wasn’t what Ford wanted to see… well… the pain in his chest that nearly choked him, just thinking of that outcome, hurt him deeply.

He was dreading anything but Bill’s innocence.

He didn’t want to be betrayed.

He wanted to be loved.

His heart ached.

“Show me.” Ford demanded.

The ring oozed approval, and a blue fog crept across Ford’s vision, clouding his mind, spiriting his consciousness across dimensions.

Clever scientist.

---

Lama Szlam was the ancestral celestial name for a planet that was located within the Cigar Galaxy. It wasn’t known as Lama Szlam now though, that was an old name. When the planet was re-colonised the name changed, along with the hierarchy, and in the Goo Mobster’s opinion, everything good about the place.

The atmosphere of the planet was thick, and dripping. The outer rim of the planet’s atmosphere was coated in a dense, mucus like membrane that worked to filter out harmful gasses and chemicals, keeping the many citizens who worked and resided under the law below safe and stable in their controlled environment.

The planet was an eco-friendly, balanced, contained civil state, and had been for the past two hundred years, but two hundred years was not a lot of time, in terms of eradicating predominant ideologies. The mass exodus of the ‘unlawful’ citizens of Lama Szlam when the Federation took over was hardly enough to quench the flames of resistance in the people. However, two hundred years was plenty of time to enforce a militant status quo.

Initially, the move to eject criminals from Lama Szlam, enforcing a utopia, was frowned upon. It ripped families apart, children from their mothers, porous relatives from porous relatives. It split the nation in two, those who rose up, and those who did nothing. It divided the porous people of Lama Szlam into the different and the indifferent, betrayers and the betrayed, both sides believing it to be true in differing ways.
It was a division between families.

They called it the great Zchizm.

Teleporting through to the Cigar Galaxy, Bill Cipher and his crew of interdimensional madmen and criminals met with the gathered Goo Mob a few clicks above the membrane of the planet.

“About time.” Said the Don.

Bill said nothing. He watched the Don expectantly.

Spinning around to face his Famiglia, Don Goo began his speech.

“Mi Famiglia!”

The crowd of Goo Mobsters cheered, and Pyronica glanced down at Bill, who floated to the left of her, regarding Goo with a flat expression. He didn’t look back up at her, his eye fixed on Goo’s back.

Clearly he wanted to get this over with. It was nothing personal, just business.

Pyronica worried for him, but followed the line of his gaze, squinting at the mob leader.

“You stand before a once great planet. A once free planet. It had a name, not a number, a name, and we called it Lama Szlam!”

“Lama Szlama!” The Goo collective chanted, raising their oozing fists in the air.

“We once lived here! Breathed its air, watered its crops, ran its streets. It was a paradise. Our paradise. And then, what did the Feds do?” Goo paused, and leaned forward as though listening for a rhetorical answer. “They went and turned it into a bloody utopia!”

The crowd of Goo Mobster’s booed, and even Teeth let out a little boo for frivolity’s sake. He didn’t like utopias, or Orwellian mockeries of the concept. The ideal stuck in his teeth.

“They went and ripped from it everything that made it special, everything that made it good. They imposed law, and order, and rules, and regulations. They turned our beloved Lama Szlam into a nanny state, a pig pen, an outrage! It used to be we were a law unto ourselves. Now there’s laws about everything. No this, no that, no smoking! You can’t even light a bloody cigarette in the Cigar Galaxy!”

The jeering from the Goo Mobsters was loud, loud enough that you’d think it would draw some notice, so close to the outer membrane of the planet, but no one was listening, no one was watching yet.

This showboating was for the Mobsters and Bill’s crew alone. Don Goo was building the hype.

“Well, that’s all about to change. The people down there, living on our Lama Szlama left us all behind. They discarded us, so they could go on living in their utopia. Now today’s the day we leave them behind, and move forward into a new alliance.”

Goo gestured at Bill theatrically, but Bill still looked unimpressed. All this staging was fine if Bill was running the show, but business was business, and if he had to give Goo his time in the spotlight, he would, but he wouldn’t like it. Goo wanted to think he had the upper hand. They all did, all the onerous chumps who made deals with Bill for their own power and prestige. It was comically disgusting.

“Today’s the day we make a deal, a pledge, with Bill Cipher. We pledge ourselves, our muscle, our strength, our loyalty, in exchange for long desired revenge. Today’s the day we take back Lama Szlam from those betrayers down there, and show them what for! Today we prove that even utopia’s burn!”

The cheering came from both sides, the Goo Mobsters, and from the various henchmaniacs who loved a good bit of destruction, though it was accompanied with murmurs this time, a ripple of confusion from the Famiglia. Clearly Goo hadn’t been as forthcoming as he implied about his plans for the planet.

“And in return for our glorious revenge, we’ll get to see the great Bill Cipher rebirth Earth and take on the universe.” Goo added, trying to rebuild the hype, looking over his shoulder to smirk at Bill. “With a seat at the table, and an invite to his party no less. Now ain’t that just the cherry on top.”

His words came out smug, showing off what he presumed was the power slanting in his direction. He was goading Bill.

Bill sometimes got customers like this, chumps who subscribed to ‘The Customer is Always Right’ philosophy that permitted them to act as arrogant lords over their indentured servants when wheeling a deal. It was a ludicrous form of entitlement that seemed to bypass the fact that the Don sought Bill’s services because this was a job that he couldn’t do. He was outsourcing his revenge out of necessity, in a wild grab for power. See, capitalists always forget that when you stand on the shoulders of others to achieve your goal, your footing is precarious. You don’t insult the people holding you up, or you watch yourself fall to your own entitlement.

A life lesson Goo still had yet to learn.

“Let’s give a big hand to Cipher, Famiglia! To the many-faced God of Destruction. The triangular bringer of Desolation. Of Fire and Ferocity. Of Unreality itself.”

The Goo Mobsters obediently began clapping, but Bill wasn’t convinced. Don Goo was laying on the flattery too thick to be sincere.

He wasn’t praising Bill’s accolades, he was mocking him.

Goo confirmed it, when he turned to extend his hand out to Bill, grinning sinisterly, laying on the last dreaded epithet.

“Bill Cipher, The Dimension Killer.” Goo gave a false sort of bow, and Bill tried not to let his eye twitch upon hearing that hated nickname.

His henchmen all sucked in a sharp breath. They knew, they knew what happened to people who called Bill the Dimension Killer. Goo had just sealed his own fate.

Bill hated that name.

Unfortunately, he couldn’t show it. Not a single sign of vulnerability or weakness in front of these thugs.

He had to own his bad press so people didn’t turn it on him, didn’t poke at that tender spot and hurt him with it.

He had to be the monster people painted him as, so as not to let on how much it pained him to be reminded of that one unfortunate incident. The beginning of all of this, this unending pain.

He couldn’t show any of that, he had to compartmentalise it away, put it behind brick walls of composure and convincing acting. Congeniality and chaos.

If they wanted the Dimension Killer, that’s what they’d get.

After Bill had his fun of course.

This little trip to Lama Szlam was about revenge after all.

“And now we seal our pact and get grand vengeance gifted.” Goo waved Bill forward, encouraging him to step up by his side.

There it was again, that confused mumbling from the crowd. Don Goo was getting his vengeance, but it seemed more of a personal vendetta than a representative one.

Pretending to roll up his sleeve, blue flames springing up in his palm, Bill floated forward, and kept his voice light and jovial, keeping things businesslike. “It’s not a gift actually. It’s an exchange. A deal you specifically sought out.”

“And you’ll get what’s yours once we get ours.” Don Goo said, his teeth gritted around the pleasant smile he maintained.

“Let’s state terms.” Bill blinked, maintaining his pleasant tone. “I’ll get rid of Lama Szlam for you, and all your long lost relatives, immolating them where they stand, razing it all to the ground and out of existence, and in exchange – “

“You’ll get the Goo Mobster’s allegiance for as long as you want it.”

Gasps and mutters broke out from the crowd, Bill’s graphic descriptions driving the point home to the Famiglia. Goo wasn’t looking to simply retake the planet, he wanted to burn it to the ground.

“Unconditional allegiance for as long as I want it is quite the bargaining chip. Aren’t you a big spender! I hope you know there’s no going back on this.”

“I hope you know how to follow through, freak.” Don Goo gritted out quietly as he extended his hand, meeting Bill’s thin fingers tersely. “I want to see it burn with my own eyes.”

“Oh, I’ll follow through.” Bill muttered in turn, squeezing Goo’s hand somewhat roughly, letting his blue flames burn just bright enough to sizzle some of Goo’s slime back vindictively.

Goo hissed, and tugged his hand back abruptly, but the deal was sealed. Shaking off the slight burning sensation, Goo shook his hand out and turned to face the assembled Famiglia, ramping up the theatrics yet again.

“Lama Szlam is ours! Ours to reclaim!”

There was a cheer from the Mobsters who were swept up in the glory of Don Goo’s oration.

“Ours to destroy!” Goo yelled, pumping his fist in the air. The cheer was less certain following this, but Goo didn’t pause in his fervour. “What do you think about that, Famiglia?”

The slimy crowd shifted, mumbling seditiously.

One rather round Mobster spoke up. “Me aunt still lives there.”
“Did she lift an arm when the Feds kicked us out of our home? Did she stand up for us, or lie down, belly up, when our rights were stripped of us? Did she betray us? Like they all did?” Goo growled, not liking being questioned.

“She wasn’t born then.” The round mobster replied, somewhat timidly.

“But she was born to betrayers, like you were born to the brave FAMIGLIA!” Goo rallied, trying to build a cheer once more from the group. He was only partly successful.

“I didn’t ask to be born Famiglia.” The round mobster in question replied, sounding disgruntled now.

The mobsters around him hissed in shock, what he was saying was seditious, but he didn’t stop. “And she didn’t ask to be born after the zchizm. Family’s family. That’s what you always say.”

“Famiglia’s family. There’s a difference.” Goo snarled back venomously.

“I don’t see a difference.” The brave mobster said simply, rousing a grunt of agreement from several of his peers.

Don Goo looked between his Famiglia and the planet below, scowling. He was losing his grip on them.

Bill floated beside him, silently smirking at the arrogant mobster. A public deal probably didn’t sound like such a good idea now, Bill was betting.

Goo slashed his arm out in front of him, pointing at the offending mobster. “Then you can go down there and burn with ‘em! This is the Zchizm, right here lads. It’s always been us versus them!”

One of the circling satellites on the outer rim of the planet seemed to take notice of them, beeping an alert out in warning. Bill’s henchmaniacs noticed it first, Teeth stepping forward to elbow Bill lightly, pointing at the satellite.

“I know.” Bill replied quietly. “Just watch.”

“Enough of this aimless fucking around!” Goo yelled, trying to regain his leadership. “Everyone who’s Famiglia – true family, stand by me now. It’s join or be left behind.”

Several mobsters shuffled towards Don Goo, but there were a substantial number, at least a third of them, who held back.

“Well come on. It’s us versus them, you know that! You were born knowing that, knowing who’s side you’re on.” Goo urged the remaining stragglers, trying to sway the crowd.

Down on the planet below, the enforcers were gathering, Federation police, come to protect its utopia. A communications probe poked out of the top of the membrane and the speakers blared out a message.

“Criminals! You are not permitted within the Messier Galaxy as per the restrictions placed upon you for your unlawful conduct. Disarm and depart or face consequences.”

“Fuck them.” Don Goo spat, and looked over his shoulder to glare at Bill. “Clock’s ticking Cipher. A little follow through before the Feds come down on us would be nice.”

“Well, if you really want to rush this.” Bill looked past Goo at the assembled Famiglia, and shrugged. “I thought I’d be generous and give you some time to think it over. It seems you’re a little divided.”

“Fuck divided. This is happening and it’s happening today. Get the fuck on with it.”

Bill sighed, checked his wrist for an imaginary wristwatch, and then deliberately glanced down at the planet. “Don’t you want to say your goodbyes? There are estranged aunts and uncles, and nieces and nephews, parents and siblings –”

Goo’s eye was developing a prominent twitch the more Bill strung out his time, listing family members.

“Godfathers, nonnas, brothers, annoying sisters, great aunties, and second cousins twice removed down there.”

“Shut the fuck up.”

“That’s a lot of family you’ll never get to see again.” Bill pointed out simply. “All of you.”

“Family ain’t no good to you – family means shit if they’ve betrayed you.” Goo snarled. “And they did betray us! And probably would again!”

“So, it’s a preventative measure, not just tit for tat?” Bill rolled his eye, and gestured to the membrane of the planet, watching the police gather on the planet’s surface, dragging this out. “Because it seems to me that, if they betray you by kicking you out of your beloved slimy planet, and you betray them by immolating them and destroying said slimy planet – betrayal begetting more betrayal – well, you know what they say about an eye for an eye. It only works with two eyed species. Anything else is just a massacre.”

“Since you’ve only got one, I’m sure you know what I mean when I say that I only need to act first to come out on top.” Goo sneered, and pulled a knife from his pocket, thinking Bill set him up, that he wasn’t going to follow through.

Didn’t he know a deal was a deal?

“Cool your slimy little boots.” Bill held his right hand up at Don Goo, pacifying him. “Put your knife away, for all the good it will do you. Talk about overreacting.”

“There are Feds swarming all over!” Goo gestured to the membrane, watching the police line up, readying their weapons. “And you wanna waste our time with chit chat?”

“I’m just saying, if you want a back and forth of betrayal, killing them all sure makes things dull if you’re expecting retaliation. How else do you keep a feud like that alive? After two hundred years? A Zchizm like that needs spark to keep it going. Not everyone can drive a movement through charisma alone, you certainly can’t.” Bill drummed his fingers together idly, enjoying riling Don Goo up. “Killing them all defeats the purpose if you ask me. All those goo kiddies, born to traitorous ancestors.”

The crowd of mobsters, if they were a third divided before, seemed to waver into a more even split the longer Bill kept talking.

“Stop – stop yapping.” Goo rubbed his head, nursing a headache, speaking through gritted teeth.

“It seems like a waste, but hey, you wanted this. Most people do the Socratic method on their own before they shake on a deal. Especially if the deal is ‘for’ something, like your people, or a purpose. This deal just seems to be for your own satisfaction. Talk about icy.”

“Can you just shut up?”

“Do they even know what it means to be traded like this? Their freedom traded for your tasty little dish of revenge, eradicating the rest of your kind? That’s some heavy stuff oh high and mighty Don.”

“SHUT UP FREAK!” Goo pulled both of his knives out now, spinning around to hold them aggressively out at Bill.

Bill clicked his fingers, and the knives melted in Goo’s hands, rendering him powerless.

“Yeesh, kid.” Bill floated around Goo, while he gaped at his former knives, now a puddle of metal floating in the space before him. “It’s almost like you haven’t thought this through. I’m not sure you should be making decisions on behalf of the group. Some Don you are.”

The mobsters began pulling their weapons out, readying defences as the police below the membrane were readying their canons.

Goo seemed to be running short on patience, his temper flaring wildly the more Bill continued his light chatter, like he was commenting on the weather. His shoulders were shaking, as he stared at his melted knives.

“We had a deal.” He uttered.

“So we do.” Bill agreed. “Are you sure you don’t have any gooey nannas down there you want to give your last regards to?”

“ATTENTION CRIMINALS! THIS IS YOUR LAST WARNING. THE FEDERATION HAS IDENTIFIED SEVERAL CLASS ZETA UNDESIRABLES AMONG YOUR COMPANY, AND WE HAVE LEGAL GROUNDS TO RETALIATE TO YOUR PRESENCE WITH IMMEDIATE FIRE. WILL YOU BACK DOWN?”

“No but I’m pretty sure that’s what your mother said.” Keyhole shot back.

Bill’s crew crowed, elated by Keyhole’s clapback.

“OHHH! Nice burn Keyhole!” Bill clapped, as Pyronica snorted beside him.

“Thanks boss.” Keyhole grinned.

“WE WILL FIRE IN THIRTY SECONDS! 29 – 28 –“

“46!” Teeth yelled out! “72! 87! 26!”

The voice from the speakers hesitated, like they lost their place, before repeating themselves. “Twenty – twenty -nine.”

Bill’s assembled crew began laughing, hooting laughter in the face of destruction, something that pushed Don Goo’s temper past boiling point.

“You – for Goo’s sake JUST DO YOUR DAMN JOB!” Goo yelled. “I’ve had enough of your jokes and your chit chat. We’re about to get blasted out of the sky and you’re just standing there – laughing!"

"26 – 25 – 24 –“

"Who wouldn’t laugh?” Bill scoffed, amused. “They screwed up their own countdown. If they wanted to blast us out of the sky by now, they would have done it already.”

The communications probe seemed to hear this, and sped up their countdown. “10 – 9 – 8 – “

“We had the element of surprise, and you’ve just lost your freakin’ advantage! They all know we’re here now. Are you screwing up this deal for me? If we all get fucked by the feds your little invasion is shit out of luck Cipher. We’ll pull out, if you ain’t gonna follow through. Eight fucking seconds! What the fuck are you going to do, Triangle? What the fuck do you have to say?’”

Bill lidded his eye at Don Goo, watching the mobster lose his cool spectacularly in front of his people, and raised his eyebrow.

He didn’t need to say a damn thing.

Bill considered his options before deciding it was probably just about time to divulge the reason he’d been collecting all those cubes.

Bill angled himself like he was clicking his neck, before he wiggled his fingers out in front of him, and stretched them out. Waving his hand, he summoned one of the energy cubes he’d filled with Sixer’s power, and considered it, before popping the top off it, and swilling it like it was a delicious beverage, instead of a roiling container of pure energy.

“I’ve always wanted to try one of these.” Bill said, holding the cube up under his eye like he was sniffing it. “Ah, such a potent flavour.”

“You’re having a drink? Are you fucking kidding me?” Goo shrieked.

“Just stand over there for me. A little to the left.” Bill extended his free hand, and poked Goo across, so he was standing just out of the way of the communications probe.

“What -?” Goo spluttered, nudged into position. He squinted at Bill, confused, when the triangle, swilled the energy cube around and took a sip from his eye mouth.

Bill’s shape glitched all over, like a shiver of excitement, and he kept his eye closed, his voice echoing. “Whoo, that packs a punch.”

Kryptos was watching Bill in awe, aghast that his boss would just drink the condensed energy of a supernova like it was nothing, even if he was just skimming a sip from the top. Bill Cipher was truly something else. A madman.

“AaaAaaaHHHhh.” Bill sighed contentedly, his voice pitching up and down dissonantly, breaking on each note. “So refreshing.”

“The fuck are you doing Cipher?” Goo inquired angrily.

The countdown continued behind him.

“3 – 2 – 1.”

“This.” Bill replied, and opened his eye.
A beam of pure unbridled energy blasted out of Bill’s eye, eradicating everything in it’s path, including Lama Szlam, and the aligned Federation military down on the planet below. The energy blasted away everything down to its very molecules, sizzling it up in an instant.

Bill blinked, and looked at the hole he blew all the way through the planet, straight across to the other side. The planet now looked like a gelatinous donut, the membrane ripped and leaking where Bill’s energy had punched right through, and the edges of the hole began to crumble, caving in.

“Woops.”

Bill looked over to the startled Goo Mobsters, who were staring shell-shocked at the sizable hole in their planet, blasted through in a fraction of a second with a single blink of Bill’s eye.

“Hey, did you still want the rest of it?” Bill jerked his thumb at the planet behind him. “Or should I keep going? Don’t want to half ass my job.”

“Holy shit.” Don Goo muttered. “You really did it. One frickin’ blink.”

“Two blinks actually.” Bill replied swiftly, poking Don Goo to the right with an extension of his arm, herding him back in front of his line of sight. He gently lifted the bowler hat from Goo’s head, and kept it. “I’m not done yet. So you want me to keep going?”

The mobsters were silent, stunned. Goo turned his back to Bill, staring at the hole burnt through his planet, his vengeance made real, and laughed, a strained, elated sound.

“Fuckin’ – be my guest. Destroy it all! Burn it to the fuckin’ ground freak!”

Bill narrowed his eye at Goo’s back.

The mobsters noticed, and scurried away from Goo, standing as far away from him as they possibly could. Anyone could see how this would go down. How Goo would be punished for his hubris.

Bill could still feel the power flowing through him. Just one sip of the energy harvested from Sixer’s worship was like sticking your finger in the socket of the universe and letting your molecules rattle. It was incredible.

Bill felt like he was brimming with power, untenable, unstoppable power, and it was all thanks to Sixer.

Now to take care of some unfinished business.

“Then I’ve held up my end of the deal. You got to see Lama Szlam destroyed with your own two eyes.”

“Yeah, but you ain’t done yet.” Goo insisted, without turning around.

“No, but you are.” Bill replied smoothly.

He closed his eye, and before Goo could turn around, his slimy expression irate, Bill blinked again, his eye opening wide, wider than before.

The beam of energy that shot out was huge. It was bigger than the last blast, it was bigger than Don Goo, it was bigger than the entire planet. It shot out so far that several meteors behind the planet disintegrated into dust in the span of a blink, gone in an instant.
Bill’s eye mouth was smoking as he exhaled, and puffed away the heat. Blinking his eye open, he looked at the desolation before him and laughed.

He laughed abruptly at first, like he was surprised at the extent of this power, but then his laughter grew into something wild, chaotic, triumphant and uncontrollable.

Bill laughed and laughed. He laughed like a mad man, and perhaps he was.

Eventually, his henchmen joined in, jeering. Paci-fire chortled, slapping his thigh, Eight Ball grunted, Teeth yucked raucously, even Kryptos managed an elated giggle, shocked at the power his boss held, the power that one day he could hold if he stuck with his current course. He was elated. Bill demonstrated the sort of power that had never been seen before in the multiverse.

This was what Gods did, true Gods.

They reshaped existence.

Laughter echoed into empty space, and no one from the Federation existed to hear it. Only Bill’s gang of criminals, and the huddled Goo Mobsters, who still seemed in shock.

Eventually one of them spoke up, rattled.

“You – you killed the Don.”

Bill’s laughter cut off sharply, and he regarded the mobster who spoke up.

“Let’s just say I was done with him.” Bill quipped, materialising his walking stick, spinning it around, before growing in size, looming over the Goo Mobsters, his eye massive, watching them all.

His voice echoed in the vacuum of space frightfully. “What’s it to you?”

The mobsters all seemed to be too afraid to speak up, but Bill’s gang were on tenterhooks, giddy, leaning forward, eager to witness their boss laying down the law. The law of chaos.

It was always satisfying watching the Boss put someone in their place. Even Hectorgon was leaning forward, scenting for blood.

“Who will be our Don now?” A lost voice sounded from the crowd of Mobsters.

“Well, technically, you belong to me now.” Bill drummed his fingers against his brick, below his eye, contemplatively. “I own you all, but I’ve got better things to do than govern you, or push you around. Isn’t that what the old Don did?”

“The Don’s supposed to look after us. Look after the family. Lead the family.” A mobster spoke up. “He should be one of us.”

“Well, you’re on your own there. I’m one of a kind.” Bill said dismissively. “You can work for me, but I’m not babysitting you. Choose your own Don.”

“We – we can’t choose.” The mobsters conferred, volunteering information. “There are rituals. Rites. Back on – “ He looked down to where his planet once was, and the words died in his mouth.

Bill took pity on them, and drummed his fingers on his cane, before floating above them, picking through them.
“Tell you what. I’ll make it easy on you. I’ll pick your new Don, and then whatever he says goes. You all owe me your loyalty, but I don’t want in on your sticky family, that’s your business.”

“Thank you Mister Cipher.” The Goo Mob chanted in unison.

“Call him Boss.” Teeth nudged one of the Goo Mob with his elbow, and they hurriedly corrected their language.

“Thank you Boss.”

“Now let’s see.” Bill swung his cane around, eyes scouring the crowd, before reaching his decision, pointing at the candidate. “I choose, eenie, meanie, miney - you!”

The round mobster who spoke up before in defence of his planet blinked at the end of Bill’s cane.

“Me?”

“Yeah, you.” Bill shrunk down and floated above the Goo Mobster curiously. He dropped Don Goo’s bowler hat on top of the mobster’s head and adjusted the slant of the hat dotingly, before asking. “What’s your name kid?”

“Dadun Dun.” The mobster replied.

Bill considered it for a moment, let the name sink in. He stared at the kid for about fifteen seconds, processing this, before falling over himself laughing.

“Perfect! It’s perfect! Excellent. You are the new Don!”

The henchmaniacs snickered, even Pyronica giggled, but the Goo Mobsters were all looking at Dadun Dun with an expression akin to awe dancing on their goopy faces.

“Don Dadun Dun.” Bill declared happily, and waved his hand. “Alright, that was fun.”

He flipped the lid back down on his energy cube, and banished it away, throwing it over his shoulder for it to disappear back to the Quadrangle safe room. Clapping his hands to indicate he was over this little interlude, he pointed back to the teleportation zone, and lead the group over there.

“Let’s blow this popsicle stand.”

From the distance, just out of hearing range, but still within sight, Jheselbraum waited, ever the chess master, showing the truth through her eyes, on her terms, for her pawn.

As Bill teleported away, Jheselbraum closed her eyes, and released Ford’s consciousness back into his own body.

Ford gasped, and his hand flew up to cover his eye, pain beyond anything capturing him in a vice.

What he just saw, it couldn’t be real – it couldn’t be – Oh but it is. The voice spoke.

Ford was close to hyperventilating, his body rejecting what he’d seen, his eye wet and painful.

That was very real. An entire planet gone. On a whim.

No, it couldn’t be.

Sure, Ford had seen it, but he still couldn’t –

OPEN YOUR EYES! You know it’s him! You saw what he used to do it. He is using you!

Ford clenched his eyes shut, and rubbed his face, his head pounding. He scrubbed his hands through his hair in frustration before he lurched up away from the desk to pace around the room.

His mind was spiralling with disbelief and burgeoning doubt, revelations obscuring his muse beyond recognition.

Ford didn’t want to believe it was him. It must have been some other psychotic triangle, who just so happened to look and sound exactly like Bill.

But the cube –

Piece together the details, scientist. You saw it.

“No. I must have seen something different. Someone else. Bill would never –“

“There must have been some reason, some other reason, there isn’t –“

I hope whatever justifications you seek for that genocide sound as petty in your mind as they are in reality.

Lives were lost. Millions of sentient beings.

Ford rubbed his forehead, grunting, before looking up to the ceiling, clinging to denial to save him from this torment.

“It can’t be.”

It is. He has done it before, and will do it again here. You saw him.

Ford staggered around the lab, pacing neurotically, wiping his eye, scrunching his hand up in his hair, clenching his jaw so as not to crumble.

He did see it.

He saw Bill use one of the potential energy cubes, laden with Ford’s worship, as canon fodder for evisceration.

The cubes that were apparently too important to Bill for Stanford to use on the portal, Bill had no problem using to level a planet, with just a sip from the top of the container. The cubes Stanford thought held meaning for Bill, because they were a tangible representation of how much Ford adored him, were used for destruction.
Something beautiful, twisted into something so … evil.

“It can’t be.”

It is. The voice hissed.

“No. I don’t believe your proofs.” Ford spun around, staring down at the ring. “You could have fabricated them, made them up to turn me against him. You’re the one with the agenda here, not Bill. He would never – he wouldn’t – he wouldn’t just … discard me like that.”

_He has used you, like he has used many others. He will toss you aside like he did the cube. You will come to accept it in time._

“I don’t want to accept it.” Ford admitted, and scowled at the ring, preparing to twist it off his finger. “I don’t believe it. I don’t believe you. I’m going to go to Bill, and talk to him, and prove that he would never –“

_You’d really take his word for it? Allow him to twist your mind further? You stupid scientist, you don’t understand – it isn’t just you who is betrayed if Bill is not stopped. Your entire world –_

“Bullshit.” Ford swore. “The portal is fine. I checked it over myself. It isn’t a doomsday device, it’s a doorway to discovery.”

_Doors open both ways. Ignoring me invites your own destruction, and the destruction of all you know._

“Well, I’m going to need b-better proofs than that before I believe – before I believe you –“ Ford felt light headed. Dizzy. The floor spun beneath him, whirling before his eyes, and he staggered into his chair, resting his hand against his forehead.

His cheek felt wet, something dripping down from his eye, but he knew he wasn’t crying. He knew if he started, he wouldn’t stop. So then what was this wetness.

Ford wiped it across his cheek absently, not thinking to look down at his fingers.

_You have your proofs right here, right in this room._ The voice urged Ford, and this time the words came with a wordless suggestion to look over to the VCR again, where the tape of Fiddleford’s misdeeds displayed.

Ford wiped at his eye again, and squinted, before rolling the chair over to the monitors.

Looking briefly between the monitor and the ring, Ford scowled, and asked in a low, broken voice.

“Why are you doing this?”

_It is time you knew the truth. Before it is too late to stop it._

“Stop what?” Ford grumbled, and reluctantly looked over at the monitors, seeing the odd view of Fiddleford’s room it had paused on.

_Look, open your eyes, and find out._

Ford hesitated for a moment, his eye hurting, not pleased with the prospect of more staring at a screen, but he was compelled with a need to know as strong as his denial had been. A thirst for the truth warred with his own sense of self preservation, his own denial, and the truth won out.
He pressed play.

The tape followed an odd angle, it was looking down at the blueprints on Fiddleford’s desk, before jolting upright as a door slammed open.

Ford could hear Fiddleford speak, and realised this tape was from Fiddleford’s perspective, from the way the ‘camera’ panned down to F’s lap, then over to the door, where Bill stood, emanating rage.

“What in Sam Hill –“

“You crossed a line.” Bill glared down at Fiddleford, his dangerous expression so different from the ones Stanford was privy to. This wasn’t the indulgent, playful, cheeky Bill Stanford knew, this was someone else entirely.

“I don’t know what you’re –“ Fiddleford’s words cut off with a gasp, as Bill jabbed him in the chest, looming over him. Fiddleford’s shirt was burnt, Bill’s finger singeing him all the way down to the skin.

“You know what you did.” Bill scowled at Fiddleford, and only then did Ford notice the burning red of Bill’s eyes. “You crossed a line the moment you pointed that thing at Sixer’s head, and you know it.”

That thing? So this must have been immediately after F had used the memory ray on him. Stanford didn’t remember Bill stepping in, he just had a blank patch between his encounter with Fiddleford, and sleeping on the couch.

When had Bill found out? Had he known F had the memory ray all along?

Was this him avenging Stanford’s mind?

“You – your eyes!”

“Don’t tell me you forgot?” Bill tilted his head, and bared his teeth in a mockery of a smile, looking more like a predator than a person.

This Bill looked more than capable of the violent acts the voice in the ring seemed to believe were his misdeeds.

This Bill didn’t look like a muse, like an avenging angel. He looked like some sort of hellish demon.

“It’s just another nightmare Fiddleford, it’s not real.” F muttered to himself, rocking back and forth slightly.

“I’m not just any nightmare.” Bill placed his hands on either side of Fiddleford’s chair, bracketing him in there. “But I’ll be your own personal nightmare for what you did to Sixer, and that’s a promise. Is it coming back to you now, what you did, or do you need a little reminder?”

“I – I know I used the memory ray on Stanford.” Fiddleford admitted, the camera angle panning guiltily to his knees. “I didn’t erase the memory of that, I just erased the guilt I had for doin’ it. And I know it was wrong, but I just couldn’t let him –“

“So let me get this straight, you erase one of Sixer’s precious memories, feel bad about it, and then shoot yourself in the head so you don’t feel guilty? Oh no, you’re not dodging consequences that easily. You don’t get that option.”

Ford felt conflicted. Bill was obviously doing this for him, terrifying Fiddleford in response to the violation that he’d imparted on Ford’s mind. Bill clearly valued Ford’s mind, valued Ford’s safety, but this was just horrifying to watch. Stanford didn’t care for Bill’s vigilante intentions, his retaliation was against one of Ford’s closest friends, and while a selfish part of Ford felt vindicated that someone would defend him so strongly, he couldn’t justify the cruelty Bill was employing. Not just employing, relishing.

Fiddleford noticed the edges of his chair sizzling, burning under Bill’s hands and he yelped, and flung himself away. He scrambled across the floor of his room searching for the memory gun, and Bill’s voice rang out indulgently behind him.

“I wouldn’t try that if I were you.”

Bill seemed to be toying with F, like this were a game of cat and mouse. The playful tone of Bill’s voice indicated that he enjoyed seeing Fiddleford frantic, seeing him struggle, and that confirmed the sick feeling in the pit of Ford’s stomach.

“You haven’t learnt your lesson yet.”

This was definitely Bill. Stanford’s Bill. In the body Stanford built for him, revealing the true depths of the monster within. Ford was astonished how he couldn’t see it before, how he believed the lies and sweetness the muse fed him. It seems he was only kind to Ford, and kind to no one else. Only Stanford’s muse.

He was never a muse, he was a monster. The voice whispered in Ford’s head, and he swallowed reflexively, clenching his jaw, unwilling to relinquish his perception of Bill, but faced with little alternative.

“What are you – you’re – “ Fiddleford screamed as the memory gun floated out of the crate in front of him, along with several of his other possessions, rimmed with the tell-tale blue glow that was Bill’s levitation. “You’re not human.”

Bill stuck his hands on his hips, items floating rimmed in blue around him, and grinned at Fiddleford, that too toothy grin. “What gave it away, genius?”

Genius. He’d called Ford genius, but never with that mocking tone, or maybe the tone had been there all along. Ford wasn’t sure.

“You – you’re not human – you – s-stay away from me – “ Fiddleford pleaded, scrambling away from Bill until his back hit the wall. “S-stay back!”

“Let me make one thing clear for you here, Specs. I tolerate you, because you’re useful, and you have the skills I need to get this portal up and running.”

He tolerates F because he’s useful? How much had he been tolerating Ford for the same reason? Utilitarian, efficient, disposable.

“However, the instant you outlive your usefulness, you’re gone. Like that.”

Bill snapped his fingers, and a fireball sizzled in the air above his hand for effect, fizzling out into the atmosphere.

It reminded Ford of the planet, that green, glistening planet, destroyed in the blink of an eye.
Gone. Like that.

Bill leaned over Fiddleford, and looked just as smug as he would when he would beat Ford in chess. That same calculated precision. That smug callousness.

“For the second you’re indispensable, because you’re not. The only reason I haven’t slipped inside of you to wear you around like a puppet is because I’ve got better things to be doing, and you’re below my notice.”

His muse was truly terrifying.

Could he even call him his muse anymore? Now that he knew the depths to which Bill would sink. How carelessly he’d use people? How he’d used Ford?

He was just another mark to him. Another puppet, a pawn.

Then why go to such lengths for him? Ford didn’t understand. Why would he do this for him? Why care about his mind?

“If you ever touch Sixer again, if you ever turn that memory ray on him for a second, if you ever throw him down the stairs again and leave your marks on his body—“

So that’s why he’d been bruised. Ford could see that playing out, see Bill being furious that Ford had been harmed, or maybe marked was more accurate. Ford was coming to see Bill’s protectiveness as possessiveness.

He thought he’d seen how low Bill would stoop, but apparently he still had further to sink into the depths of cruelty.

“I don’t care how good of an engineer you are—I’ll kill you. I’ll kill you and laugh.”

Bill grinned at McGucket, and Ford was viscerally reminded of the only thing he’d managed to hear in the void, from the vantage point the ring showed him.

Bill’s raucous, insane, echoing laughter.

He killed them, and laughed.

“Please. I’ve got a family.” Fiddleford pleaded, shrinking away from Bill.

“And I’ll kill your family too, just to make things clear to you.” Bill was still grinning.

Sending threats home with a smile? Threatening Fiddleford’s family? Tate was just a baby.

Bill was... Bill was ruthless. And cruel. Vicious.

What did Ford ever do to deserve this creature in his life?

Why did this happen to him?

“Sixer is mine. You do not touch him.” Bill hissed, flames licking around him, wreathing him in vengeful fire, and Ford felt his stomach drop, twisting in knots.

He used to like when Bill would say that.
“(God Sixer. You’re mine. You’re special. You’re so special.”)

Now that memory was tainted, forever.

He signed his mind and body over to this creature. He shook on it. They made a deal. That had no doubt been Bill’s game all along, and Ford, like a lovestruck idiot, gave him everything he wanted. Bill was right in saying that, Ford did belong to him now, and it made Ford feel ill with regret.

He felt like throwing up.

“The only one who gets to mess with Sixer’s mind is me. Got that?”

Ford reached up, and grabbed his forehead fearfully. The fuzzy patch in his memory that wasn’t going away, no matter how total the recall was after watching his memories play back on the VCR, that was Bill. Ford wondered what else had been manipulated, his thoughts, his dreams.

He thought back to the foot rub on the couch. He’d dreamed about that the night before. Had Bill implanted that idea into his head? Had he orchestrated this whole thing from the start? All those dreams he had about him, fanning the flames of Ford’s feelings from day one. Had that all been a lie?

His chest was fit to burst, heart beating haphazardly. His jaw was clenched painfully from the strain of keeping himself together. He was sweating, his eye hurt, and his head ached, and his heart felt like it was being crushed, exerting itself in one final last hoorah of enthusiasm, his heartbeat performing a fitful frenzied solo of revelation and adrenaline.

Ford pushed away from the monitor, feeling detached, sick, broken.

The monitor continued to play, the voices sounding faint and far away.

“You’re a monster.”

“I’m a lot of things. What’s it to you?”

“Does Ford know what you are?”

Ford’s eyes staggered back to the screen, yet more wetness pricking at the corners of his eyes, his entire being hovering on the cusp of something.

“He knows enough.” Bill answered shortly, narrowing his eyes at the engineer. He plucked the memory ray out of the air and turned it over in his hands, examining it.

“Does he know that you’re evil?” Fiddleford croaked, the words coming out despite how afraid he was to say them.

Ford’s face was screwed up with the exquisite sort of agony that comes with finding out such a thing. With discovering that not only was your beloved muse a creature of evil, but that he had hid it, lied to Ford about it to his face, in his every word and action, since day fucking one.

For a moment, Ford thought he caught a glimpse of the Bill he knew, the Bill who, apparently, only shone through for him. The Bill who he cherished. He saw a glimpse, there was something there, for one inscrutable moment, dancing across Bill’s face.

Something like vulnerability, or care.
Bill hunched his shoulders and replied in a low voice.

“What he doesn’t know won’t hurt him.”

Ford felt himself shatter, he felt himself break so thoroughly he didn’t know how he’d ever pick up the pieces.

Bill was wrong.

Ford’s focus drifted in and out throughout the rest of the conversation, struggling with processing any of this. He was stuck in a whirlwind of self-flagellation, guilt, anger, and heartbreak so powerful he wished he never had a heart to begin with.

It was his fault, opening his heart up to Bill in the first place.

He thought they had something special. And it was tearing him up inside.

Focus. The voice said, coming back to whisper in his ear. Listen. See.

Blankly, Ford turned his focus to the screen, clenching his jaw, trying to hold himself together long enough to see this through. The voice apparently hadn’t been lying, and if what it said was true, Stanford didn’t have time to mope around, he had to act. He couldn’t waste time being useless, being miserable. He had to engage, think.

(And if you can’t think then what are you good for?)

Ford jutted his jaw out stubbornly and looked back to the monitor.

“What are you usin’ the portal for anyhow?” Fiddleford asked, glancing cautiously at the flames dancing in Bill’s hand.

It was bold of him to ask. Ford was hanging on the answer.

“That’s for me to know and you to find out.” Bill grinned, raising his eyebrow gamely. “And won’t that be funny, when you do.”

“Are you usin’ it for evil?”

Ford swallowed, his throat feeling taut with the last bit of hope he sustained, wishing Bill would confess what he was really doing, that he wasn’t simply causing chaos for the sake of chaos. Ford wanted Bill to say something that would somehow justify all of this enough to make him forgive the god.

Bill’s grin fell slightly, and he pursed his lips, before answering somewhat more sedately than expected. “If finding a home for my friends is evil, you can call it whatever you want.”

Ford’s throat tightened on that hope, riding the wave of possibility that this could still be salvaged. That this wasn’t the end of his regard for Bill.

If he could just say something to prove there was a reason motivating this, then Ford could understand his muse, something he’d longed for from the moment he first summoned him.

“What’re your friends?” Fiddleford questioned, his tone pitying.

The pity evaporated fast enough when Bill’s grin brightened, his eyes lighting up yellow again, glowing in that unnerving way they did.
“The biggest freak-show in the galaxy, and when we roll into town this dimension’s gonna bear witness to the greatest, weirdest party this multi-verse has ever seen.”

Dreaded confirmation.

Ford had hoped that he wouldn’t hear this, but there it was, from the muse’s own mouth. The portal was never about Ford’s destiny, it was always about Bill, and that realisation rubbed Ford raw.

He barely heard Fiddleford’s final question.

“And where does Stanford fit into all of this?”

“I’m working that out, don’t you worry.” Bill assured Fiddleford, gesturing with the memory ray held in his other hand. “Call it a work in progress.”

A work in progress. That’s what Ford had always been to Bill, a work in progress, a mark, a dupe. Someone to build his portal, someone to feed him and worship him. Someone to entertain him.

Someone to fill a use.

If Ford ever hoped Bill could feel something equal for Ford, that hope disintegrated as surely as the slime planet had. As surely as his own would, if he didn’t stop Bill.

There’s not much time. The voice urged him. You have to act now. Tomorrow will be too late.

Ford stared hollowly at the monitor for a while, before he reached out to press pause on Fiddleford’s memory, right as Bill turned the memory gun on him, erasing Fiddleford’s memory. Clearly, he didn’t have the same compunctions about Fiddleford’s brain sanctity as he did with Stanford’s. That didn’t change anything though.

The lab was silent, and Ford felt empty inside. He needed to feel empty.

He couldn’t feel what this was, this betrayal of his trust, of the small awkward part of him that cared to culture feelings. He couldn’t feel. It would halt his functioning, and he needed to be able to function.

You’re the Man Who Changed the World. Change it now. The voice whispered. Save it.

“How?” Ford asked with a dead voice that hardly sounded like his own.

You have the answer. The voice flashed the image of Ford’s alchemy books up in the scientist’s head, showing him the blueprints for Bill’s human body. You only need to implement it.

“What do I need?” Ford asked mechanically, wiping his face again.

Looking down at his hand he saw that it wasn’t tears he was wiping away, but blood. His own blood. His eye was bleeding.

He wiped his hand on his trousers, and made his way through the lab, not letting anything stop him, especially not his own discomfort. He was going through far worse than a bleeding eye, and if he could repress the rest in order to save the world, he could repress this.

You’ll need salt. The voice said, sounding satisfied, as Ford set out to follow its instructions. And lots of it.
The past two days inside of that log cabin had been hell for Willow Oakwood. Ever since she felt those pains at 8pm, she hadn’t been left alone for a second. She just needed space to be. Falling apart in front of people was exhausting. She just wanted to feel normal again, and she couldn’t, stuck in a room full of pitying glances.

“Stop fussing over me Suzie. I’m fine.” Willow ran her hands through her hair in frustration, grabbing her bag and stalking out of her cabin briskly, wanting to walk it all off until she could trick herself into thinking walking had always been this easy.

“You’re not fine. Willow, I’m worried. Why’d you just leave like that?” Suzie questioned, following her friend.

“I had to get out of there. It was too much. First Dan, and then his parents. I couldn’t –“ Willow paced and sighed, shaking her head.

“Everyone’s here to look after you.” Suzie offered timidly, frowning.

“Well I’m SICK OF IT!” Willow yelled, and bunched her hair in her fist.

Suzie stepped back, startled. Willow was the type to lash out on the odd occasion, but never at her. But Suzie could forgive her anything right now, knowing what she’d been through.

“I know.” Suzie said softly.

Willow looked haggard, her hair not done meticulously the way she preferred, no makeup on today. For someone grasping at normalcy she’d missed a few essential steps, but despite her usual war paint gone, she was doing her utmost to pull up her barriers regardless, keeping everything in.

She’d had enough falling apart. She’d just had enough.

“I couldn’t breathe. I just need space.” Willow said, somewhat quieter, a soft apology to her friend without saying the words.

“What if everyone else leaves? I can ask them if they want to leave, and it can be just us, okay Willow?” Suzie suggested helpfully, looking back at the cabin and the cars parked out front of it. “I’m sure your family, and Dan’s Ma won’t mind. Dan’s not back yet, they could go look for him and give you some breathing room.”

“I don’t want breathing room, I want –“ Willow’s words trailed away into distraction.

Suzie looked back at Willow, who was squinting at something out in the woods.

“Is that -?” Willow paused, taking it in.

Suzie stepped up beside her and tried to see what had caught her attention.

“Stanford!” Willow called out, and began pacing towards the strange scientist. “Hey Stanford.”

Ford was marching through the forest, his movements stiff and mechanical, carrying two industrial sized bags of salt on his shoulder. He seemed off in his own head, and there was a rust coloured patch on his cheek.

Willow chased over to him, her feet beating against the forest floor, running from the stifling influence of her circumstance and reaching out to Stanford, like if she just caught him, she’d get her old life back.

Suzie was left behind, in the clearing by the cabin.

Skidding to a halt beside him, Willow got a chance to properly look at Ford, and was shocked by what she saw. “What happened to you? Holy shit, is your eye bleeding?”

“Not now Willow.” Ford gritted out, and tried to walk around her, not even looking at her. “I need to –”

“Are you okay?” Willow asked, sincerely, and a muscle in Ford’s jaw moved, straining to hold himself together.

Ford swallowed, and then rallied himself to look Willow in the eye as he dismissed her, brows already furrowed crossly, but his words caught short upon looking at her properly.

Her hair was a mess, her eyes were rimmed with red, and her belly was flat.

Realisation dropped like a stone in his stomach.

“Oh no.”

Willow scowled, and pulled her jacket over her flat stomach, preparing to complain. “Not you too.”

“Oh no. Willow, I am so sorry.” Ford admitted, his voice guttural and shocked. “This is all my fault.”

“What?” Willow blinked at Stanford.

“It’s not a coincidence. It can’t be. The timing is – first Janice Valentino and now you – of course it’s –“ Ford made a frustrated noise and kneaded his forehead with his free hand. “Stupid.”

“What are you talking about?” Willow looked at Stanford, searching his face for some logic other than this compounding guilt he seemed to display.

“The portal test. The ramifications. I was too headstrong. I thought I’d checked everything. I – I didn’t think. I should have considered. The shockwave, it’s impacts – I – Willow, I’m so sorry.” Ford apologised solemnly, until it finally struck Willow exactly what he was apologising for. “It’s my fault you lost –“

Willow looked over her shoulder to where Suzie stood in the distance, watching them cautiously from over by the house.

She grabbed Stanford by the arm and leaned in close to him, looking up at his bleeding, frantic eye.

“What the hell do you mean?” Her voice was low and formidable. “You’d better fucking explain yourself. Your fault how?”

“The portal. I – Bill – he –“ Ford swallowed, and looked even more frantic and apologetic than he had before. “He’s going to destroy the world. Tomorrow. He thinks it’s a party, that’s why he built the portal. I - I only have today to – to stop him.”
Willow paused for a beat, taking this in, before her eyes widened with understanding, and suddenly Ford didn’t need to say anymore.

“And don’t think just because you invited me to your party that you’re invited to mine!”

“That inhuman son of a bitch.” Willow swore.

Ford looked up at her in shock. “You knew?”

“I don’t know what this portal thing is, but I saw you both in the forest, when he was levitating shit, and again at the carnival. He was torturing that poor gorilla. I should have known he was up to something. That bullshit he gave me about you dragging him there from wherever muses live was such total crap, I –“ Willow muttered furiously.

“Wait, he – he told you?” Ford boggled, unable to wrap his mind around that at this particular moment.

“That he’s your muse? I didn’t believe it.” Willow scoffed, then seemed to reconsider when she saw how shell-shocked Stanford seemed to be upon learning this. “Are you shitting me? He’s your muse.”

“I –“ Ford cleared his throat, and looked suspiciously over at Suzie, before lowering his voice. “He’s more like a God. And it’s my fault he’s here in the first place, but the fact is that he’s been… using me, manipulating me, and I – I have to stop – I have to stop him. Before -”

“Fuck.” Willow reeled, comprehending that the yellow eyed little shit she’d been so suspicious of was not only a God, but hellbent on destroying the world? It wasn’t such a stretch of the imagination, knowing what Willow knew about Bill, but it still seemed unreal.

The whole situation seemed unreal. If Willow hadn’t already asked herself if she was crazy, knowing what she knew about Bill, she’d probably be asking herself now. In a way, it was good she already got that crisis over with, now she knew magic was real, she could roll with it far better.

“I’m really sorry, and I promise, I’ll find some way to make it up to you. I –“ Ford heaved the salt over his shoulder, and looked towards his car, still parked in the lot past the tree line, knowing he had a time limit. “I have to go.”

“Go? Go where?” Willow pressed, standing stubbornly in front of Stanford, halting his progress.

“Willow, are you okay?” Suzie called out from over by the cabin.

“I know how to stop him, I just need to – if I can force him out of his body then there’s still a chance to stop this – to stop him – I”

“Well, I’m coming with you.” Willow decided.

“No, you can’t. It’s too dangerous.” Ford replied immediately, fearing for Willow’s safety, especially knowing how much he’d indirectly hurt her already. Through his negligence, through trusting Bill. Through building the portal. It was his fault, her miscarriage, Janice Valentino’s – and who knew what other potential side effects he’d unleashed on the town.

Willow’s brows bunched up crossly.

“Don’t treat me like I’m made of glass. He’s screwed me over as much as anyone, I’m not about to let him screw over the world. I live here too you know. This can be how you make it up to me.”
Willow jutted her jaw out, glaring passionately up at Stanford’s confused face. “You can tell me about this portal business in the car, come on.”

“I still don’t –“

“You’re not seriously going after him with no back up?” Willow grabbed onto Stanford’s arm again, harder this time, almost desperately, getting into his space. She needed this, to come along. She needed it. “With the world at stake? This isn’t the time to play personal hero.”

Ford paused, her words resonating with him for all the wrong reasons.

(You’re telling me you really want to take on a sea monster alone with no backup? I thought you were supposed to be the smart one IQ.)

Bill’s counsel was a double-edged sword. Remembering his advice hurt Stanford, but he was forced to admit the sense in his words.

Bill was too formidable a monster to engage without backup.

And Willow already knew what he was on some level.

“Willow. I’m coming over there.” Suzie called out, picking her way across the forest to be with her friend.

“I can help you.” Willow urged Stanford quietly. “Let me. I need to do something. You have to give me this.”

Ford looked down at Willow, noting all that she had lost, noting how her desperation mirrored his own, and conceded.

“Alright. You can come. I may need your help, setting some things in place, but nothing too dangerous. I will not be putting you in any more danger.”

“What’s the worst that could happen that hasn’t happened already.” Willow’s laugh was self-deprecative and reckless.

Stanford could relate to that sort of drained, recklessness. It was laugh or cry, and Ford didn’t feel like succumbing to either.

“Let’s get this salt in the car then.” Ford nodded.

Willow hefted one of the bags of salt from Ford, and lugged it over her own shoulder, finally feeling useful again. “Got it.”

Suzie made her way across the forest, right as Willow and Stanford set off.

“Guys, what are you doing? Where are you going? Willow, you can’t just – you shouldn’t be carrying that. I - let me help.”

“No Suzie.” Willow stopped, and put her hand on Suzie’s shoulder. “Go home.”

“Where are you going?” Suzie pouted, and crossed her arms, tugging her cardigan across her chest. “You shouldn’t be –“

“I’m just going to Stanford’s place for a little while to help him out with something. You should go home, and stay there. I’ll be back to see you later, okay?” Willow nodded, and patted Suzie on the shoulder, dismissing her, before continuing to Stanford’s car.

“I – you - alright I –“ Suzie watched them both walk away, loading the bags of salt into Stanford’s trunk, before getting in the car and driving off. “I guess so.”

Suzie stewed on their sudden departure, watching Ford’s car drive away, and she clenched her fists in the fabric of her cardigan as they left.

Why did Willow get to see what was in that Shack, and why did they both go and leave her behind?

Willow shouldn’t be going anywhere, she needed to rest, after what had happened. She was grieving, making reckless decisions, and it wasn’t safe to let her go off alone.

Her best friend was being irresponsible, and Stanford didn’t look too level either. Suzie reasoned, she’d be a bad friend if she didn’t follow them. To make sure Willow was alright.

Sliding into her car, Suzie turned on the engine, and pulled out into the street, following Ford’s car through Gravity Falls, and down Gopher Road.

Towards the mysterious shack.

Pulling up out the front of the shack, Ford undid his seatbelt, before looking over to Willow. He’d filled her in on the details of the portal, of Bill’s plan, on the plan to stop him, during the drive. Now they just had to act.

“Alright, we need to be in and out. There are a few things I need to grab from the lab to set this up and make it convincing.”

“What can I do?” Willow asked.

Ford chewed on his bottom lip, considering all the variables, before he remembered the memory ray up in the attic, in the box with all of Fiddleford’s forgotten belongings.

Bill had proved that he wasn’t above using the memory ray to solve his problems, and Stanford knowing the truth about Bill was knowledge he couldn’t afford to give up.

If Bill turned the memory gun on Ford, it didn’t matter how well intentioned his plan to save the world was, if that happened it would all be over. Trapped forever in ignorance, putty in Bill’s hands.

The thought made his skin crawl, imagining what it would be like going back to the way things were, like nothing had happened, knowing what Bill had been hiding from him. What he would no doubt continue to hide, if he got his hands on that memory ray.

Ford looked over to Willow.

“In the attic, there’s a memory ray prototype that Fiddleford made. If Bill get’s his hands on it, we can say goodbye to our memories, and any chance we could possibly have of stopping this apocalypse. That would be the cleanest way he has to make all of this go away, and we can’t let that happen.”

“Okay, so I’ll go up to the attic and get it.” Willow said, undoing her own seatbelt eagerly.

“I don’t – I don’t feel comfortable letting you go up there alone. Last I checked, Bill’s sleeping up there.” Ford wrung his hands anxiously.

“In the attic?” Willow questioned.

“No, in my room.” Ford shifted uneasily in his seat.

It was jarring to think of how pleasantly he’d left Bill this morning, that his muse would still be sleeping up there, waiting for him to come back and make him breakfast.

Their intimacy was so close, only hours away, but everything was different now.

Ford’s fondness for the muse couldn’t compete with the bone deep knowledge that he had to be stopped.

“So, I’ll go do your job then. What do I need to grab from the lab?” Willow looked expectantly at Ford.

“You wouldn’t know what to get, even if I explained it to you, and the lift has safety protocols that are coded. They’re too complex for you to decipher. We don’t have that much time.” Ford fretted, and bit his lip, before he reached into the back seat and dug through his backpack.

He passed to Willow, very delicately, the laser gun.

“If you’re quiet, you might be able to sneak there and back without needing this, but just in case –“ Ford pointed out the features of the gun to Willow. “This dial on the side adjusts the size and scope of the laser point, and you pull the trigger to fire. It’s a laser gun.”

“This is some science fiction shit right here.” Willow grinned, accepting the laser gun with awe.

“Where did you even get this?”

“Bill and I made it.” Ford admitted, looking at the laser gun, feeling terribly nostalgic for that first point of connection, when he could somewhat trust the muse. When they were building that trust together. This was their first olive branch, the first favour Bill did for Ford. The first among many.

He pushed it out of his mind, shaking his head. “When you’re upstairs, you’re looking for a device that looks similar to this in shape. It’s a ray gun, but it has a candle shaped lightbulb as the focal point, and a circular dial at the side like this gun, and a trigger. It should be in a cardboard box on top of the bed up there.”

“So I just go in, get the gun, then come back down to meet you in the forest?” Willow clarified.

“As quickly as possible. I’ll grab the things I’ll need from the lab, then I’ll be taking them into the clearing in the woods I mentioned, to set up the circle we need to unbind Bill from his body.” Ford looked at the laser gun, as Willow carefully put it in her side bag, and swallowed. “Once everything is set up and ready, I’ll go back into the house, and if he’s still asleep, I’ll – I’ll wake Bill, and tell him – tell him I’ve made a picnic for him, in the forest.”

Ford swallowed again, trying hard to suppress his feelings. He kept swallowing, but the thickness in his throat wouldn’t budge, and he felt regret for this plan well up inside him.
He knew it had to happen, for the sake of the world, but part of him was raging against stripping that look of returned adoration from Bill’s face, of rending his perfect muse from the perfect body he’d built as an expression of love before he knew it was love.

He knew it was selfish of him, but the part of this plan he was loathing the most was betraying Bill’s trust like this. He didn’t want to see that trust, the trust he’d earned from the God, die in Bill’s vibrant eyes.

Willow watched Ford clench his hand into a fist on his knee, swallowing back emotion.

She frowned, watching the bob of Ford’s Adams apple as he desperately tried to suppress the emotion clawing up his throat.

“This is really hard for you, isn’t it?” She asked softly, pitying Ford.

Ford licked his lips, and nodded, blinking away the wetness in his eyes, trying to ignore the tightness in his chest.

“But if we don’t do this, is the world really gonna end?” Willow pressed, worried.

Ford sucked in a harsh breath, and tried to compose himself once more.

Clearing his throat, he answered briskly. “Most likely. He will use the portal in the basement to tear a hole between dimensions, and he’ll invade this dimension and dominate it, that or destroy it, and laugh. We have to stop him.”

Willow nodded, wringing her hands on the strap of her bag. “Right. Let’s do this.”

“Right.” Ford nodded, and opened the car door. “The attic is all the way up the stairs. They’re loud stairs, the one third from the very top creaks, so be careful.”

“I will.” Willow nodded. Smiling encouragingly, she reached out to pat Ford on the arm. “See you soon, okay?”

Ford’s returning smile was more of a pained grimace, but he nodded, and sprung out of the car.

There was no going back now. This had to be done.

For the sake of the world.

Willow tiptoed through the house, looking at the scientific oddities scattered about Stanford’s domain.

She knew she wasn’t here to snoop, that snooping was just a distraction, like a lot about today was for her, but she couldn’t help it.

She could only imagine what Suzie would think of this place.

There were dinosaur skulls soaking in fish tanks, with electrodes relaying readings between the skull and a peculiar beeping machine. There were books everywhere, bookshelves all over. There were strange creations, and gnomes in cages, and the odd smattering of homey touches that Willow found oddly charming.

There were two pairs of plaid slippers set up in front of the couch, two empty mugs, and a jam jar of chillies resting beside one of Stanford’s journals on the coffee table.

It was all too domestic, and in that moment, Willow had no issues imagining Bill and Stanford, curled up on that couch together in their slippers and pyjamas, Bill resting his head on Stanford’s shoulder while Ford wrote in his journal, popping chillies in his mouth and drinking tea as he watched Stanford work.

It was a treasonous image, just imagining it, knowing how evil and duplicitous Bill was, but she couldn’t help but warm to the thought of it.

Willow was struck with a sense of how painful this must be for Ford, doing this. Turning on his false ‘muse’. No matter how false he was, the memories they shared together were real, and that must cut Ford so deeply.

Sure, Dan could drink a little too much when he was out with his friends from the lumber yard, and that made Willow occasionally less inclined to forgive him and let him back into her cabin, but that couldn’t compare to total global annihilation, that grand scale of destruction and wilful manipulation, to knowing that this comfort and intimacy you’ve built with someone, this life you’ve built together, was all a lie.

Willow’s heart hurt for Stanford in that moment, not because of how serious what he was about to do was, dismantling his muse’s body, but because Willow couldn’t imagine how fucking hard it would be to find someone so perfect for you, and have this happen.

Creeping through the house, noting the triangle motifs everywhere, and the little touches that indicated that this house was a shared domain, bits of Bill and Stanford everywhere, Willow admitted to herself that Bill was good for Stanford, when they were together. Stanford laughed, and felt comfortable, and happy.

It was a shame that Bill was screwing him over this whole time. For a while there, Willow was rooting for them being together.

So much for that.

Willow crept up the stairs, taking care with every step, keeping her movements light and gentle. She gripped onto the strap of her bag nervously as she went, but she couldn’t help but look around when she reached the second-floor landing. There were two rooms and a bathroom, Ford’s room, and the room he set out for Bill. If Willow’s assumption was correct, they’d been sharing Ford’s room lately, the little monster was apparently asleep in there right now.

Scowling at the hallway, Willow continued on up the stairs, towards the attic door. The wooden door was so close, her goal behind it, and so Willow sped up, eager to get in and get out before shit went down.

In her rush to complete her mission, she forgot about the stair, third from the top.

It creaked loudly when she stepped on it.

Sucking in a breath, Willow hastily stepped off the stair. She climbed up to the stair above it, exhaling relief when she reached the landing.
Gently pushing the attic door open, Willow surveyed the room.

There, on the bed, was the cardboard box Ford mentioned.

She hurried over to it, and saw the memory ray sitting at the top of the box, in plain sight. She grabbed it, and stuffed it in her side bag, before making to leave.

She paused by the bed, drawn to the dried flowers left in the vase by the night stand.

Forget-me-nots, withered and crisping now.

Dan had asked her out with a bouquet of forget-me-nots in middle school, and at the time she rejected them. When she finally gave him another chance later on down the track she realised how dedicated Dan was to her, to making an impression. He gave her the same flowers when she agreed to another date, years later, beaming when he handed them to her.

“I told you you wouldn’t forget me.”

Willow reached out and brushed her fingertips along the petals of the dried flowers, thinking about Dan, how he’d been so frantic when the pains hit, so worried and helpless, unable to do anything to save the baby, to help Willow.

When it was all over, he didn’t want to cry in front of her, and he took to the streets, venting his emotions into the night. He left the night it had happened, and he hadn’t come back yet.

She hoped he was okay.

Bill nestled into the pillows of Stanford’s bed, breathing in the deep scent the other man left, finding it comforting.

Slowly rousing after concluding his business with the Don, or should he say with the hilariously named new Don, Bill almost felt tired, waking up, but then he remembered the promised pampering Sixer had in store for him.

A big breakfast, like when he’d first arrived. And then they’d have the whole day together. Their last day.

Bill was keen to savour every second of it.

He knew he didn’t have long with Sixer in this blissful state of ignorance, and Pyronica’s words were lingering in the back of his mind.

Sixer needed to know. Pyronica was right.

And if Sixer were to know, it would be best if Bill told him. Told him what this portal was really for.

Bill was a fan of the win-win scenario, and in his head, that’s what this was. Sixer wanted to change the world, Bill wanted to change the world. Sixer wanted to become famous, a genius on the brink of epiphany, Bill would give him all of that and more. Adventure, exploration, the whole universe under Bill’s thumb, and in the palm of Sixer’s hand.

He thought it was quite romantic.

He just had to figure out if Sixer would see it that way.

Bill almost didn’t want to tell him. Not a lot of things scared Bill Cipher, and even fewer things Bill would admit scared him, but this was one of them.

Losing Sixer scared Bill.

He didn’t want to let him go.

Rolling in the still warm sheets, Bill bunched the duvet between his legs, and grabbed Sixer’s pillow, pulling a stray strand of short auburn hair from the pillowcase.

Bill examined the hair in the morning light, and decided he liked the colour and thickness of the strand. Sixer could do very little wrong. Even his hair was perfect.

Satisfied with that conclusion, Bill opened his mouth, and placed the hair on his tongue, swallowing it happily.

He owned Sixer, every bit of him. He could do what he liked with those bits, and Bill liked having Sixer inside of him.

The remnants of that one sip of Sixer’s worship juice was still swilling around Bill’s form, making him tingle from head to toe with unbridled power.

And last night, they’d tried Sixer’s version of being inside of someone.

It had a certain charm, and overwhelmed Bill enough that he’d be keen to try it again. Sixer had certainly liked it, and the way he looked at Bill throughout was just …

Bill sighed blissfully, and buried his face in Sixer’s pillow, rubbing his cheek against it, huffing in the scent.

He was ludicrously, blissfully happy.

Even Don Goo’s wanton disrespect earlier couldn’t dull this feeling of pure joy.

Bill was on the cusp of achieving his long sought for dream, and he had Sixer by his side.

Though he hadn’t heard it again since the night he showed Sixer the universe through his eyes, Bill clung possessively to that little half-conscious admittance on Sixer’s behalf, grasping onto those words like he’d never let them go.

He had Sixer’s love.

If any of his henchmaniacs saw him like this, mooning over the human, rolling around like an idiot, he’d never hear the end of it, and with that sobering thought in mind, Bill cleared his throat, and sat up in bed, looking around the room.

Sixer had left to get groceries, last Bill remembered. Time was a meaningless construct, especially while sleeping, so Bill wasn’t sure how many hours or minutes had passed since he felt Sixer’s fond regard brush against his forehead.
Sliding over to the edge of the bed, Bill grabbed his discarded pyjama pants, and decided that he’d much rather wear Sixer’s shirt today. It would be a nice surprise for the scientist when he got back, and if he had a problem with it, Bill would remind Ford that he now owned him, and that included his clothes.

Ever the nerd, the first shirt Bill found in the laundry hamper (he had a craving for Sixer’s scent today that detergent drenched clean clothes couldn’t satisfy) was a faded NASA print tee. It was too big for Bill dripping off his shoulders, and he took a moment to consider the things Sixer incorporated into this body’s design.

Did he design Bill smaller than him due to personal preference, or had he made an informed decision based on how Bill chose to present himself to the scientist before he was made tangible?

Bill always chose to appear to Stanford as a small, non-threatening, some would even say ‘cute’ triangle. He remembered Sixer being fascinated with him, in the mindscape, how Ford would marvel when he held Bill in the palm of his six-fingered hands, Bill’s black little arms wrapping around Ford’s fingers. He would sit on Ford’s shoulder to better whisper in his ear, or rest in his hair, closer to the brain, back when winning Sixer’s regard was purely for utilitarian purposes.

That was how it was in the beginning, but oh boy how things had changed.

Bill examined the body Sixer made for him in the mirror on the side of the wardrobe, and smiled at his reflection.

As much as he wanted to ditch this form, he could appreciate its nuances. Sixer gave Bill straight, white teeth, nice pink healthy gums, and lovely dark skin. His arms were almost as black as they were in the mindscape, and the yellow hair and eyes were a nice touch. A charming homage to who Bill was to Sixer.

Sixer made sure his own shoulders were broader than Bill’s, his own stature taller, but now Bill was finding he didn’t mind all that much. He liked Sixer’s broad shoulders, and how on his tip-toes he was the perfect height to press kisses to Sixer’s chin.

Bill heard a creak upstairs from the attic.

Maybe that was Sixer. Bill could sneak up there and surprise him, tip toe behind him and cover Ford’s glasses with his hands.

Guess who? Bill thought, and laughed to himself.

Who else would it be?

Walking out, barefoot, Bill climbed the stairs, smiling quietly.

He’d soon find out.

Suzie pulled up in front of the shack, and peered up at the building. Here it was, the mysterious shack where Stanford conducted all of his zany scientific experiments. She was excited to go inside, and the door was already ajar.

She could just push it open.

And there it was.

The inside of Mr Mystery’s house.

It was everything Suzie hoped for and more. She wanted to go and poke around all Stanford’s funny little humdinger inventions, his doo-dads, curios and gadgets. She knew coming in uninvited, snooping like this, wasn’t very polite, but being left behind wasn’t very polite either.

If Willow could come here to help Stanford, Suzie could too.

Stanford might not return Suzie’s affections, and Suzie had accepted that, accepted that the scientist was gay, was enamoured with his mean assistant, but that didn’t mean that she wouldn’t help him if she could. Feelings didn’t mean you only loved someone if they loved you back, that wasn’t how things worked. She wanted to help him.

Or help Willow. She’d do anything for her best friend.

Including follow her here, even if it wasn’t asked for.

Willow wasn’t in a position to dismiss help right now. She wasn’t thinking straight, hadn’t been thinking straight since the miscarriage. While Dan cried and raged at the universe, Willow didn’t raise her voice, didn’t break things, didn’t cry out at how unfair it was.

Instead she tried to hold it together, becoming more withdrawn and irritable, hold her pain together, until she couldn’t.

Suzie worried for her. That’s why she needed to be there for her. Willow needed her, needed support.

Even if that support came in the form of following her to Stanford’s kooky science shack to have a look around.

Suzie reached out to examine one of the odd little machines, some sort of radio with a buzzing antenna, a spark of electricity jumping from one end of the antenna to another. She wanted to touch it, see how it worked.

It was only when she heard Willow’s voice from upstairs that she remembered what she came for.

She withdrew her hand from the kooky little radio, and looked up at the ceiling, towards the sound of Willow speaking.

Following her friend’s voice, Suzie tip toed up to the attic.

The stair creaked as she climbed to the top.

Pausing, Suzie waited outside the attic door, wanting to get some sense of what was going on first, rather than just bursting in there. If she just burst in Willow would only send her home. Who knows, maybe they were talking it out, Willow’s feelings. If they were talking about something Suzie could follow, she might be able to help.

The door was ajar, just a little, and Suzie decided she could listen in for a while. No one would know.
Willow was talking in there, and Suzie wanted to find out what was going on.

She watched, and listened, though she hardly believed what she saw.

Willow heard the creak of the staircase, jolted out of her reverie, and spun around. She barely had any time to hide, so she just stood there, clutching onto the strap of her satchel, trying to look casual.

The door opened, and Bill poked his head through.

“Sixer?”

Willow stood stock still, and stared at Bill, and the world ending monster blinked back at her in confusion.

“You’re not Sixer. What are you doing here Red?”

Bill stepped into the room, wearing Stanford’s clothes and pyjamas, and his tone was almost friendly. It made this whole thing just that much more tragic.

Willow steeled her jaw, and said nothing, not knowing what to say.

“Indulging in a little early morning B&E?” Bill probed, stepping further into the room. “You’re snooping in the wrong place. Sixer keeps all the shiny stuff down in his study.”

The longer Willow went, stubbornly not answering him, the more suspicion crept into Bill’s tone.

“Oh not. What are you doing here Red?” Bill asked bluntly, stepping closer into the room. What was she doing here, on the last day before the portal went live? And why would Sixer invite her here when they were supposed to be spending the day together? No one ordered a third wheel, last Bill checked.

Willow took a small step to the side, keeping as far away from Bill as possible while sneaking across the room, inching closer to the door.

“Stanford said I could come here.” Willow finally replied.

“Stanford did?” Bill repeated flatly, watching Willow curiously now, his glowing yellow eyes focused and sinister. “And where is Stanford now?”

“He’s downstairs.” Willow managed.

“Uhuh.” Bill stared at Willow, unblinking. “And what are you doing up here?”

“Stanford said I –“ Willow began, and Bill interrupted her sharply, his voice no longer friendly.

“Yes, you’ve said that. I want the real reason. What are you doing here Red?”

Willow froze, and stared at Bill, watching the demon stalk around the room, mirroring her steps.
When Willow didn’t answer, Bill tilted his head at her like some kind of vicious animal.

“I don’t spook you that much, do I? I thought I was invited to your white party. I thought we were friendly now. You seem awfully jumpy.”

Willow’s hand twitched, towards her bag, reaching for a weapon.

He was aiming for friendly, but he was just pissing her off, standing there in front of her, lying in his very essence, pretending to be something he wasn’t. Pretending to be a friend. Friends didn’t tear their friend’s world down for kicks.

“What’s wrong Red?” Bill asked, pacing closer to her, a wolf circling prey. “Not feeling well? Speak up.”

Willow narrowed her eyes, and her jaw jutted out confrontationally, her expression barely concealing her intent to stop Bill, to end him. “I’m fine.” She gritted out.

“Really?” Bill picked up on her aggressive behaviour, piecing things together. He dragged his eyes up and down her body, taking in every detail, before commenting vindictively. “You look kind of flat.”

Willow scowled, and thrust her hand into her bag. She pulled out the first gun shaped weapon she got her hands on, and aimed it at Bill angrily.

“No one asked you, you demon. Stay back.”

Bill blinked at the gun for a few seconds, then burst out laughing.

Willow had pulled the wrong gun on him, she was aiming Fiddleford’s memory gun in his direction, and if that just wasn’t the funniest thing he ever saw, well.

“Don’t laugh. I - I know how to shoot this thing. I – I know what you are!” Willow insisted, still pointing the gun at Bill, not yet registering it was the wrong gun. “Stanford told me everything.”

Bill stopped laughing abruptly, and narrowed his eyes at that. “Stanford did, did he? What did he tell you?”

Willow adjusted her grip on the gun, and shifted uneasily, still trying to edge for the door. “He told me that you’re a monster, and you’re trying to destroy the world.”

That threw Bill, hardly expecting that. He tried not to let it register in his expression, but it was clear that this information was disturbing to Bill. He never had the best poker face.

“Sixer told you that, did he?” Bill chewed on his bottom lip, before taking a deep breath, exhaling discontent. He clenched his fists at his sides, and swung them a little, before speaking again. “And how did he find that out?”

“We won’t let you. We’re going to stop you.” Willow gritted out, keeping the gun aimed at Bill.

“What’s all this ‘we’ Red?” Bill scoffed, and held out his hand.

His telekinesis pulled the memory ray straight out of Willow’s hand, the device zooming into Bill’s.

Willow gasped, and realised too late that she’d pulled the wrong gun. The memory gun was the one she was supposed to keep out of Bill’s hands, and now he had it!
“There is no ‘we’,” Bill said bluntly, fiddling with the dial at the side of the memory ray, while keeping Willow pinned with his gaze. “And there is no stopping this. After I wipe this whole unpleasant interlude from your thick head, maybe leave you a few brain cells worse for the ware, not that anyone would notice, I’m going straight to Sixer to sort this out with him, one on one. He’ll believe me.”

Bill finished fiddling with the gun’s dial, pursed his lips and sighed, frustrated, tapping the side of the ray. “And if that doesn’t work, I guess I’ll go with plan B. I’m not sure how this happened, but I guess I should be thanking you, Red. I didn’t plan ahead this far, but you went and sought out the answer for me. A neat little solution. How thoughtful.”

“I won’t let you do this.” Willow clenched her jaw, determined. Her hand sank into her bag, rummaging about. “It’s bad enough that you lied to Stanford, but to do this to the world - you truly are a monster.”

“Sticks and stones Red.” Bill shrugged, and levelled the gun in her direction, squinting through the scope. “Nicknames don’t phase me. I wonder what they’ll call you, after all this. I hear the Witless Wonder is trademarked.”

“Screw you.” Willow bit out, struggling to grab the proper gun. It was like her bag was suddenly deeper than she remembered, sweaty palms struggling to grab the right weapon.

She edged closer to the door, and heard a creak she assumed had to be her or Bill. She couldn’t look. She couldn’t afford to take her eyes off that monster, there’s no telling what he’d do.

“Oh well. Say goodbye to your braincells, Stick.” Bill shrugged, and placed his finger on the trigger, concentrating, charging the gun’s ray more than a simple wipe warranted. Clearly, he was aiming to make this shot sting.

It whirred to life, it’s hum a foreboding of fractured memories, and in that same moment the ray sparked to life, the attic door burst open, and out sprung Susan Wentworth.

Having been watching from the crack in the door, watching Stanford’s horrible assistant point a gun at Willow, she dove in front of her very best friend in the entire world. It seemed like the only thing to do, the only thing Suzie could do, to protect her.

“NO!”

Suzie stood firm in front of Willow, and the ray struck her squarely between the eyes, sizzling her brain.

She screamed sharply, and fainted, falling to the ground, her temples smoking. Her body convulsed as the ray scorched through her.

“SUZIE!” Willow cried, reaching forward to grab her friend as she slumped to the floor. Catching her before she hit her head on the ground, Willow’s eyes scoured Suzie’s face, looking for signs of responsiveness. “No!”

Willow put her fingers on the side of Suzie’s neck and noted her slowed heartbeat, the sedate shallow breaths she took. She was unconscious, but still alive, still breathing.

Suzie had jumped in, she’d taken the hit that was meant for Willow. She’d sacrificed herself for her very best friend.
Cupping her best friend’s face, her expression crumpled with anguish.

“Suzie, Suzie please. Wake up. Suze.” Willow shook her shoulder desperately, tears she’d been avoiding for days, springing in the corners of her eyes as she sobbed over her best friend’s bravery. “Suzie?”

Bill blinked at Wink Eye’s sudden entrance. That was unexpected. Now he had to load the directive into the memory ray all over again. How inconvenient.

“I told you not to follow me, dummy.” Willow sobbed out, holding onto Suzie’s torso, hugging her tightly.

“Well, you’ll be calling her that a lot more from now on.” Bill rolled his eyes.

“What did you do to her, you bastard?” Willow looked up at Bill, glaring at him through a sheen of tears.

“What the product intended.” Bill gestured to the ray gun. “Hey, don’t cry about it. She’s just unconscious.”

“Fuck you.” Willow sobbed, and held onto Suzie tightly, tucking her into her chest, cradling her singed skull.

“It was an innocent misfire. Don’t worry Red, you’ll get your turn. And look.” Bill waved his hand, and Suzie disappeared, her body banished from the room and from Willow’s grasp. “I even put her back in her bed, safe and sound. She’s gonna wake up tomorrow and not remember any of it.”

Willow lunged, grasping the space where her friend had once been, scooping up nothing but air, before glaring up at Bill, thrusting her hand in her bag with purpose this time.

Bill looked down at the memory ray, and fiddled with the dial, inputting the new directive as he spoke.

“She won’t remember much of anything, actually. This thing usually scrapes some braincells and motor functioning along with the initial blast. Causality of the botched interface between alien and human tech McGucket made. She’ll be fine, just a little stupider than normal. It’s not too much of a loss for the world, Wink Eye’s downgrade, if you think about it. Not like losing Sixer’s IQ. Yeesh. Now that’d be a loss. And on the bright side – OOF!”

Bill dropped the memory gun on the floor, and staggered backwards. He looked down to his side in shock.

Willow had shot him with the laser gun. There was a hole the size of a fist blown right through his stomach. It was painful, and began bleeding profusely.

Normally Bill didn’t mind a little pain, but this was a lot of pain, and to top it off, it wasn’t the fun sort of pain Bill welcomed others inflicting. This was debilitating, and inconvenient, and just insulting.

He’d never been shot through the stomach before. He’d never had a stomach to get shot in the first place before this, and he didn’t expect it to be so incapacitating. His head was spinning, and he was gushing blood. Good God, this was awful.

He lurched backwards, covering the hole with his hand.
“Ow.”

“Don’t you dare talk about her like that.” Willow strode across the room, aiming the gun at Bill threateningly. “She’s my best fucking friend!”

“Ow?!” Bill looked between the blood spilling out onto his hand, and Willow’s red hair, his vision dipping in and out of focus. His healing wasn’t instinctual, it came on lethargically, slowly while Bill’s focus was still rattled.

“That one’s for Suzie.” Willow cried, and then squeezed the trigger again.

Bill felt his skin and bone sizzle all the way through as his chest jolted back, another hole dotted all the way through his sternum.

“And that’s for Stanford. For lying to him all this time. For breaking his heart.”

Bill teetered further backwards, and fell against Fiddleford’s desk, his back resting against the wall beside it, his blood painting the wallpaper. He grasped the desk in vain to keep himself upright.

“Ow!” He repeated through gritted teeth.

The insult was setting in now, overriding the indignity of the whole experience. Bill wasn’t just hurting, now he was getting angry. Pain was one thing, but being shot was another fucking matter. And she had the nerve to lecture him about Stanford?

Willow darted forward and grabbed the memory gun off the floor. She levelled a brief kick at Bill’s leg, before stuffing the memory gun in her bag and straightening up, twisting the dial on the side of the gun to decrease the laser’s size a fraction.

Bitterness and rage twisting her pretty features, she levelled the gun at Bill again.

She fired. The laser cut through Bill’s throat, and he spluttered, choking on the blood. His windpipe flooded with it, blood bubbling up, leaking out over the edge of his lips.

“And that’s for my fucking baby, you monster!”

Bill wheezed, and his eyes glowed. He grasped his neck with his hands, and poured all his energy into healing the hole blasted through his throat.

His hands were slippery with blood, this body didn’t seem to want to stop bleeding. This was so undignified.

The skin closed successfully, though he was still bleeding from his stomach and sternum. At least he could speak now, could breathe wetly.

Gathering himself, he glared up at Willow with angry red eyes.

“A monster, am I?” Bill gargled through the blood, the words coming out hoarse from his ruined throat. “I’ll show you monster.”

Bill began to pull himself upright, and Willow backed away, before turning on her heel and running down the stairs.

She could hear him moving behind her, stumbling around the attic, hear the rattle of him trying to breathe through his ruined windpipe. It was a swishing spluttering noise, hearing him drag air through his lungs, and then she heard the ominous sound of bones cracking, reforming.
She ran.

Her heart was racing, beating in her throat, and her face was wet. She was crying. It was like the dam from the past two days had broken. She hadn’t stopped crying, not when she gunned Bill down, even now her eyes were leaking while she was running like her life depended on it.

She reached the bottom of the stairwell, and saw the various trinkets and gizmos in Stanford’s hall begin to levitate, glowing blue. She threw her hands up in defence and yelped as the coat stand came hurtling towards her like a spear.

“I’LL SHOW YOU MONSTER!” Bill’s voice came shrieking from the stairs, accompanied by the thud of heavy movement. He was following her down the staircase, it sounded like he was staggering on each step, but picking up the pace.

Willow dodged the coat rack deftly.

She hiccupped, her breathing unsteady.

Willow looked briefly towards the elevator where Stanford said the study was, then back towards the front door.

Her time to decide where to run was limited.

While Bill was staggering down the stairs, more items began to levitate, and the good silverware floated out from the kitchen, coming down the hall. The cutlery began hurtling itself at Willow, and her indecision left her vulnerable, Bill’s powers spearing her with a fork in her leg.

She cried out, and scrambled to avoid the other bits of airborne cutlery, ducking low. Her leg hurt badly, but she couldn’t afford to stop moving.

The silverware embedded itself in the walls, and Willow yanked the fork out of her leg, groaning, throwing it on the ground. Panting with exertion, she threw herself towards the front door, out into the yard.

A frightening rumbling sounded out from within the house, something that sounded like a million voices howling, and Willow hoped to god Stanford was already out of there. The sky seemed to darken, heavy clouds drawing over the sun, and lightning crackled in the air.

In the yard, she looked between Stanford’s car, and the trees. She couldn’t just drive away with the memory gun and hide. She didn’t have the time to drive away.

Willow heard a crackling noise, and smelled smoke. She looked over her shoulder just in time.

A huge, flying fireball came hurtling out of the house, narrowly missing Willow, sizzling the tree beside her.

A second after, a bolt of lightning sparked down from the clouds, and singed the ground a foot to the left of Willow, nature itself turning on her.

She screamed, panicking, before hurtling herself into the forest, gripping her bag with one hand and the laser gun in the other.

The trees and bushes whipped past her as she ran, thorns and branches scratching her legs and arms, leaves crushing underfoot, soot scenting the air. Thunder rumbled louder now, and the air felt heavy with static.
She was nearly hyperventilating, sobbing as she ran, her breathing staggered and panicked. She tried desperately to pull herself together, for the sake of survival, but she’d never survived something like this before.

Another fireball came ricocheting out into the trees, splintering the redwood to the left of her, setting the forest on fire.

It was hot, there was bright orange flames wherever she looked, and embers curling through the air.

Willow sobbed, frightened, and ran away, deeper into the forest, dodging the flames, ardently glad she didn’t get in the car.

Though a fiery death wasn’t out of the question here either.

Running into a more heavily wooded grove, deeper in, Willow stopped, and hid behind one of the towering redwoods, trying to get her bearings.

When she ran she could hear her footsteps crashing wildly through the forest, could hear her frantic breathing, always sounding loud, too loud. She wondered if she’d have better luck avoiding Bill if she hid, stayed still, stayed quiet.

The static built humidity in the air, and rain began falling, persistent drops on the canopy above.

She attempted to figure out which direction Stanford’s clearing was in, trying to even her breathing. It was quiet, quieter now, when she heard it.

Silence, then a bright light, sudden sound. The crunch of feet on leaves, someone else’s feet. And raindrops.

It was Bill.

She thought he was far away, but in an instant he seemed to have teleported, right into the middle of the clearing.

She sucked in her breath, trying to keep quiet.

Poking her head out from around the tree just a sliver, Willow peeked to see what was going on.

Bill was stalking through the trees.

He looked different, abhorrent, horrendous.

Like a real monster, straight out of someone’s nightmares. Probably Willow’s, after today, if she lived long enough to dream again.

Bill’s form had contorted, changed like the Gorilla at the freak show had.

He had more arms than when Willow had last saw him, six of them, sprouting out of his sides, bending in odd, uncomfortable looking angles, his limbs too thin to be real.

His fingers were tipped with dangerous looking claws, and twitched occasionally with glitchy, erratic movements. He’d ripped his shirt off to make room for the extra appendages.

The hole in his throat had healed completely, but rather than healing the holes in his chest, he left them gaping open. They were no longer bleeding, instead teeth had grown up from the torn flesh, lining the edges of the wound like a jagged mouth. Black tongues lolled out over the sharp white teeth, dripping red drool into puddles below on the forest floor.

Rain fell heavier now, slicking down on the monster, washing away the blood that had dripped down from his throat, making his dark skin shine.

His brick tattoos were no longer glowing gold, instead they seemed to be an ever-shifting rainbow of dazzling colours, standing out against the black, iridescent and striking.

His eyes were still red, frightening wide eyes, his pupils fiery yellow slits, searching the forest.

He hadn’t seen her yet, but he was far too close for comfort, about ten yards away. Willow ducked back behind the tree, clutching the laser gun tight to her chest.

“Oh Red?” Bill’s voice called out. Even his voice had contorted, echoing in on itself, like several people were speaking.

He sounded taunting, and playful, like he was trying to lure her out into the open. Like this was a game to him.

Willow kept absolutely silent, and remained hidden behind the tree.

“Are we playing hide and seek now?” Bill called out, looking around the clearing.

Every breath he heaved out puffed through the mouths on his chest and stomach, teeth glinting in the morning light. He must have been hot, dangerously so, the breaths turning into steam as the cold rain fell.

“You know, I prefer Marco Polo. How ‘bout you start?”

Willow said nothing, and clenched her jaw in anger.

“Come on Red. Don’t give me the cold shoulder.” Bill paced forward, still looking for her. “It didn’t have to come to this. Just give me the memory ray, and I might even forgive you for aerating my vessel.”

Bill inclined his head, listening for even the slightest sound that would tell him where she was hiding, her and the memory ray. The rainfall was covering her tracks well though. When she said nothing, he knew he’d have to up his game.

Complaining bitterly, he continued speaking.

“I liked this vessel, you know. Sixer made it for me. Why’d you have to ruin it Red? Why’d you have to go and ruin everything?”

He paced forward a step, searching.

“Not satisfied in your own relationship? Is that it? Don’t feel content unless you’re wrecking someone else’s life? I wonder how Punchy feels now that you’ve trapped him in a marriage with no little baby bunting. I bet that shotgun feel’s real itchy in his hands.”

Willow bit her bottom lip, and closed her eyes, shaking her head. She couldn’t speak back, she couldn’t. He was goading her, he wanted her to feel like this. The rain fell on her face, blending with her tears.

“Or maybe he’s sad about it. Maybe he cried.” Bill continued, speaking loudly, trying to draw her out. “Not that you would, eh Red? You think you’re so tough. Did you tell him he wasn’t ‘manly’ enough? Do you think he’ll leave you now that there’s nothing between you anymore?”

Willow shook her head again, trying to shake off his words, gripping onto the laser gun more securely. Her lip was bleeding, she was biting it so hard, but she couldn’t speak.

“You never really wanted little sourdough in the first place, did you? All that umming and ahhing, pointless secrecy. Now there’s nothing to hide. So in a way, I did you a favour. Oh sure, you act all cut up, but I bet you’re cheering deep down.”

Willow opened her eyes and scowled, looking down at the gun, finding its weight comforting in her hand, retaliation tempting her. She had the gun, she could just shoot him again. She didn’t have to stand here and take this.

“The only person who wanted it was your lumber headed boyfriend. And I bet you went and told him, didn’t you? You would have had a day tops to celebrate, then … woops. The portal test took care of that.”

She gripped harder on the gun, and took a deep breath, standing up straighter.

“Did you think it was just a malfunction? Is that what Sixer told you?” Bill stepped forward, and caught a glimpse of Willow’s skirt blowing as the wind whipped up a breeze, poking out from behind one of the redwoods. He paused, and turned, watching her. “He doesn’t know half of what this portal can do. You act all righteous, shooting me on behalf of others. The righteous fury of a mother. Face it Red, you weren’t cut out to be a mother, and it was just a matter of time until you did something about it.”

Bill crept closer to the redwood where Willow was hiding, certain she was there now.

“It was either you or me. I did you a favour, and now you’re going to do me one.”

“No.” Willow’s voice came out, small but certain from behind the tree.

“No? You hated that thing growing in you, you thought it was a parasite, you tried to forget it, hide that it even existed. You can lie to yourself all you like, but I know the truth. You never wanted this. It was me or the coat hanger Red, I just sped up the process.” Bill sneered spitefully, standing several yards away from the tree now.

Willow stepped out from behind it, and held the gun in her hand, facing Bill.

“No. I wanted the baby, you asshole.” Willow pulled the trigger, and shot a hole through Bill’s chest again, right through his heart. “And you took it away from me.”

Bill stumbled back a little, the force of the blast throwing him, but he regained his ground quickly enough, the hole already warping into another gaping maw.

“So I did. You wanna know something fun?” Bill held one of his hands over his heart, while the skin moved and shifted beneath it. A mouth grew from the hole, and a black tongue poked out, licking Bill’s hand affectionately. He was grinning, and the tongues dangling out across his chest licked the teeth bracketing them hungrily. “It wasn’t a malfunction. The portal worked exactly as it should have. I should know, I designed it.”

Willow gritted her teeth, a tear slipping from her eye, and she hefted the gun up, shooting Bill again and again.
The shots were hitting their mark, but Bill kept moving, his skin healing quickly as he was shot over and over, still making his way across the clearing.

The laser gun’s battery level dipped low, and the gun let out a loud beep, signalling this.

Bill smirked, recognising the noise.

“Your turn Red. You’d better run.”

Willow looked down between the light blinking on the side of the gun, and Bill’s ravenous expression, the way he hunched forward, readying himself to sprint, his six arms reaching out at her.

She bolted.

She could hear him coming after her, chasing her the old fashioned way for the satisfaction of taking her down with his own hands. She ran, and ran, in the direction she hoped Stanford was.

She looked over her shoulder, and Bill was close, too close.

Screaming hysterically, she ran on. “Help me. SOMEBODY HELP ME!”

“Willow?”

She heard Stanford’s voice call out, not too far away, and she veered, changing her course to head towards his voice. Bill was still hot on her tail, trying to grab her more fervently now, and Willow felt his fingers scrabble against her leg briefly, slippery from the rain, before she outran him.

She came into the clearing finally, when she felt Bill’s hand again, brushing against her ankle, yanking her hard, causing her to topple forward, hitting the ground.

She screamed, and turned around, trying to scramble backwards, Bill looming over her, his too many arms and too many mouths and too many teeth signalling her imminent fate.

He grabbed her leg with three hands, his fourth grasping onto her shoulder. She could feel drool drip from the mouths on his chest onto her wet dress front.

She sobbed, and covered her face with her arms, not wanting to see herself being devoured by this monster, when a voice called out from across the clearing.

“BILL, STOP!”

Willow felt the monster pause above her, limbs frozen.

She peered past her arms, and saw him turn, guiltily looking over at Stanford as though he were caught in the act, doing something compromising to Stanford’s perception of him.

Ford stood sodden in the middle of a magic circle on the other side of the clearing, looking horrified, with a picnic basket by his feet, holding his hand out.

She could hear Bill suck in a sharp breath, and felt the hands grasping onto her let go defensively.

“Bill? Bill, please. Don’t hurt her.” Ford pleaded, holding both of his hands up, like he were talking to a wild animal. He may as well have been.

Bill slowly stood up, regarding Ford warily, his now yellow eyes regarding the scientist hesitantly.
“She shot me.” Bill said pettily in his defence. “With your laser gun.”

“I know, and I’m sorry. I didn’t mean for this to – I don’t. Just – please, don’t hurt her.” Ford begged, still looking at Bill like he was dangerous. Bill didn’t like that. He wanted Sixer to trust him.

Bill’s face screwed up with hurt and frustration, and Willow could see him clench and unclench his six fists, deliberating.

Eventually he stood up, his back straightening out. The mouths on his chest pressed into a thin line of uncertainty, before melting back into smooth, unharmed flesh. His arms seemed less disjointed now, the extraneous limbs folding back and disappearing the longer he stared at Ford.

“A picnic in the rain, huh?” Bill looked down at the basket, and saw the way Ford had endeavoured to seal a magic circle between two sheets of plastic. Quite the romantic little getaway. Bill frowned. “Why do this?”

Ford seemed to struggle with an answer for a moment, before turning it back on Bill. “Why did you do this?”

“Because she shot at me.” Bill repeated, exasperated.

“That’s not what I mean.” Ford shook his head and gave Bill a reproachful look.

Willow was scrambling away from Bill now that his attention was diverted, crawling across the clearing slowly.

“What do you mean?” Bill asked, trying to keep his voice level, though his expression seemed wary.

“You know what you did.” Ford said accusingly, crossing his arms.

“How much do you know?” Bill had to ask, the anxiety building in his chest demanded it.

Ford thought back to the tapes he’d watched, and lifted his chin confrontationally. “I know enough.”

Bill swallowed, that anxiety feeling worse in this body, the hormones the vessel provided making him feel sick and sweaty. He shifted on his feet, before looking up at Ford’s resolute expression, watching him balefully.

“Red told me that you think I’m a monster, not a muse. She said you think I want to destroy the Earth.”

“I know you do.” Ford replied stubbornly. He didn’t move from his spot in the circle, by the picnic basket. He knew Bill had to come to him.

And lo and behold, that’s just what the God did, stepping slowly towards him, like he had something to prove.

“For a smart guy, you don’t know half of it. In fact, I’d say you know even less, and you’re still trying to stop me. That seems like an uninformed decision.”

“I’m not uninformed.” Ford countered, keeping his arms crossed.

“I’d like to know where you got this mysterious information then, because it can’t be right.” Bill replied slyly, stepping closer. “You know me, don’t you Sixer? Do you honestly think I’m a bad guy? A monster?”

“I haven’t decided yet.” Ford’s chin tipped up stubbornly, and his brows furrowed. “Muse or monster. You could be both.”

“Both. All. Nothing.” Bill stepped up to the edge of the magic circle Sixer was standing in, and looked down briefly at the design of blood on the tarp, before stepping over it. “It doesn’t matter what I am. All that matters is what I am to you.”

Bill stepped up into Ford’s personal space, and looked up at the scientist hopefully. He was appealing to Ford’s heart here, he knew it, but there was a naïve part of Bill that hoped that he still had it. Sixer’s heart. He was relying on the imprint he placed on the skin over the muscle, hoping for once in his life Sixer would choose his heart over his head. It was a last resort, but it was all Bill had.

A muscle worked in Ford’s jaw, and he repeated himself, sounding somewhat strained this time. “I haven’t decided yet.”

“If you were me, wouldn’t you want to know?” Bill reasoned, reaching out to rest his hand against Ford’s upper arm.

The words struck a chord with Stanford, and that muscle in his jaw jumped again, before he asked. “And what am I to you? A mark? A convenient dupe?”

Bill’s eyes glowed with intensity, as he strained up on his tiptoes, pressing both of his hands on Ford’s chest, before hissing out his answer. “You’re mine! You agreed.”

“Oh, sure. Yours to trick. Yours to manipulate. Yours to use.” Ford scoffed, still scowling at the god.

“I’ve given you everything, and you really think I’m using you?” Bill asked, sounding offended.

“I know what the portal is for, Bill.” Ford said sternly, looking displeased.

Bill’s hopeful expression seemed to drop, just like that. He’d hoped he’d get to be the one to tell Sixer himself, what the portal was for. Now he’d heard the inside scoop, but clearly from an unreliable source, who didn’t pad the revelation properly for Sixer, who didn’t make it acceptable for the scientist to hear.

“I’m sure you think you know, but you have no idea how much this portal means to me.” Bill was desperate now, wanting his human to see sense, see things his way. He reached up to cup Ford’s face, feeling him stubbornly recoil, staying still like stone instead of melting with his touch. Still, Bill pleaded. “Sixer, if you’ll just listen –“

“Bill –“ Ford began, sounding conflicted.

“Sixer, please –“ Bill started, scrambling to pet Ford’s face, to capitalise on that uncertainty and pull some sort of gratifying reaction out of the human, something that indicated they could still make this work.

Several yards away Willow was scrambling to her feet, tiptoeing over to where the salt bag was kept, behind a tree.

“I can’t let you do this.” Ford said thickly, and Bill grasped onto his face with both hands.
“You don’t understand. I don’t know what you’ve been told, but you don’t understand – Sixer –“

“The portal was always a lie, wasn’t it?” Ford had to ask, bringing his hand up to hold onto Bill’s arm, holding his left hand away from his face. “My destiny –“

“Your destiny isn’t set in stone.” Bill said emphatically, grasping onto Ford’s cheek with his right hand like a lifeline. “No one’s should be. I want to elevate you. Bring you with me!”

“Was it all a lie?” Ford swallowed the lump in his throat, his stoniness failing, asking on.

“I’m not lying to you now. You just don’t understand what I’m trying to accomplish. You were meant to join me. We could change the world together. With you by my side.” Bill was scrambling to hold onto Ford’s face, rubbing his thumbs over Ford’s stubble frantically, trying to warm up his human to him once more, but Ford was like stone. “Please Sixer, you’ve gotta believe me.”

Ford’s voice cracked on his answer, and he seemed to be wavering. At least that’s what Bill believed. In reality, he was watching Willow drag the salt bag around the circle’s edge, seeding the last part of the spell. “I want to.”

“And I want you to. I want you to believe me. Trust me!” Bill begged, beseeching Ford with his eyes. “This doesn’t have to change things. I want you –“

“I want to understand.” Ford strained, shaking his head, looking down at Bill’s desperate expression.

“Then I’ll tell you everything. Everything you wanna know. Everything in the entire universe. I was going to tell you, I wanted to tell you – I just –“ Bill chewed on the inside of his cheek anxiously, before the words kept flowing. “I didn’t know how you’d take it. This situation is … very delicate. It’d be easy to tell it wrong. It looks like it’s been told wrong anyway, and someone got to you first. I’d like to know how that happened.” Bill grumbled, and then reached out to stroke Ford’s hair, trying to turn the scientist around to see reason. Ford deliberately refused to look Bill in the eye, instead staring stonily somewhere over his shoulder. “Come on Sixer, just listen to me. Look at me! What’s the worst that could happen?’

Ford’s jaw jutted out stubbornly, and Bill knew he’d said the wrong thing. Just how much did Sixer know?

“Don’t do it.” Ford implored.

“Do -?” Bill blinked, trying to look innocent, not knowing exactly what Sixer was referring to, what part of ‘it’ he was being warned against doing.

“What you’re planning with the portal. Don’t do it.” Ford looked at Bill now, his gaze stern.

“I don’t know what you’re –“ Bill tried, but Ford narrowed his eyes, cutting Bill off.

“Yes you do. Don’t do it, and there may still be some small chance things can go back to the way they were.” Ford seemed to hesitate, before reaching out to gently smooth his thumb across Bill’s cheek, his expression torn. “I know you want that.”

Bill seemed to melt at Stanford’s touch, and was now grasping onto Ford’s wrist, holding his hand to his face, not wanting to let him go now that he was getting some small sliver of tenderness back from the human.

Ford looked sad, watching Bill soak up his touch like a starving sponge, and he knew that what he was doing was cruel. He kept Bill’s attention on him while Willow finished off the salt circle, and the selfish part of him, that wasn’t sticking to the plan, had to ask.

“Would you stop if I asked you? If there’s any part of this that wasn’t a lie, you’d stop this, for me. You’d stop this, before it’s too late.”

Bill’s brows furrowed, conflict playing plain across his too expressive face. “Sixer. I’d do a lot of things for you, but you’re asking me to give up something that has been millennia’s in the making. Something that you don’t understand the full significance of. There’s more riding on this than just my wants. This portal and what comes after – it’s my life’s work.”

“Then use it the way you promised. You and I, exploring the universe together. Leave Gravity Falls out of this.” Ford cupped Bill’s jaw, and brushed his thumb wistfully over Bill’s puffy bottom lip, sincerity pouring out of him. “You were going to help me fulfil my destiny. Why can’t you do that instead?”

“You expect me to give up my life’s work for you, but you won’t give up your life’s work for me?” Bill questioned, shaking his head a little, pulling back from Ford’s tender caresses. “How is that fair?”

“Bill –” Ford frowned, and tried to cup Bill’s cheek again. He struggled to capture Bill’s gaze, but the muse shook his head, scowling.

“No, I planned to at least compromise for you so we’d both get what we want, but you can’t even listen –“

Willow was almost all the way around the circle, she just had about half a metre left to cover. Ford only needed to hold Bill’s attention for just a little while longer.

“I’m listening now, but I can’t let you –“

“You don’t even know what it is you’re stopping.” Bill scoffed angrily, narrowing his eyes at Ford, shaking his hands off his face. “How exalted you’d be. How powerful I’d make you. You’d have everything you ever wanted in the palm of your six-fingered hand, and you throw it back in my face?”

“What do you mean everything I’d ever wanted? I wanted to use this portal like you promised we would.”

“To explore new worlds? Tick, you can still do that with me. To change the world, double tick! Changing the world is what I wanted.” Bill said, exasperated.

“You want to destroy the world, not change it.” Ford scoffed, and crossed his arms again.

“So I can rebuild it!” Bill raised his voice, yelling back at Ford.

“It’s fine how it is!” Ford yelled back stubbornly.

“Oh, that’s a lie.” Bill laughed, and narrowed his eyes at Ford spitefully. “That’s rich, Sixer, it really is. It wasn’t fine when it chose you last, when it spurned your genius, when it turned on you for your deformity, when it decided that what makes you special makes you disgusting. How is any of that fine?”

“It’s not – I –“ Ford seemed distracted.
Willow had just finished the salt circle, and was giving Stanford a look, telling him to get on with it.

“Fine.” Ford said loudly, before looking back down at Bill. “Fine, let’s say you’re right. Let’s say I give you a chance.”

Bill looked shocked, and the sheer hope that began to creep across his features floored Ford. He could see Bill’s eyes widen, and his muse was looking at Stanford like he was the most incredible thing in the universe, and that hurt Stanford. It hurt him to lift Bill’s hopes so high, only to let them down so suddenly, but he had to play along with this, to follow the plan if he were to save the earth from destruction.

“Really?” Bill blinked awe up at Sixer, before flinging himself at the human, wrapping his arms around Ford’s neck and pressing grateful kisses all over his face. “Thank you, thank you, thank you Sixer. You won’t regret it. I’ll give you anything you want. Absolutely anything.”

Ford’s resolve wavered there, wavered with this easy intimacy. Because of the lies, each kiss felt like an unwelcome burn to his face, but he couldn’t say he didn’t miss this sort of intimacy. Bill’s hands and lips were warm, they cut through the iciness of the rain and warmed Ford in more ways than one. It would be tempting to just give into this, and go along with Bill’s plan for real, to keep this pure affection in his life, but he didn’t know if it was pure anymore. He felt used, and betrayed, and he didn’t know whether he could believe Bill’s earnest responses.

Sticking to the plan, Ford continued speaking. “Let’s say I unbind that last brick for you.”

Bill nodded, and stepped back to extend his left arm out to Sixer, watching him with heartfelt hope dancing in his eyes.

Hesitantly, Ford reached forward, and put his hand over Bill’s arm, angling it so he could see that last brick better, see the lynchpin he’d use to unravel everything for Bill.

“Alright then, no going back now. Let’s do this.” Ford sighed, and smoothed his hand over Bill’s arm.

The circle below their feet lit up red. And Ford prepared himself to chant, all the while Bill was bouncing on his heels, disbelief and wonder written all over his face.

The gold began to rise from the last brick of Bill’s tattoo, floating in the air between them, and Sixer kept chanting. Bill was so enamoured by Sixer’s actions that he barely noticed when Sixer began changing the words to the expected ritual.

“Exaudi orationem meam. Sumam eam.”

Bill blinked, and felt the magic change, feeling strange in the air. It wasn’t pulling at just the brick on his arm, but on all of the bricks now, even those unbound, and his skin begun to feel itchy, like it was burning.

“Turn aurea, quae nigra quondam fuit.” Ford continued, and Bill looked up at his human in horror.

“Corpus corrumpatur.”
“Sixer, no!” Bill’s eyes widened in shock, recognising the Latin.

Ford squared his shoulders and kept chanting. “Sumam eam. Egredere de terra hac.”

“Sixer!” Bill reached out to Ford, to try to grab him, but the salt in the circle kicked in, forming a barrier between them. Ford could hold Bill’s arm while he continued to chant, but Bill couldn’t even touch Ford, his hands beating against thin air. “You’re doing it wrong. Stop! Stanford! SIXER! You’re hurting me!”

Ford looked up at Bill, and winced, as he delivered the last lines of the spell, meeting Bill’s startled, betrayed yellow eyes.

“Numquam redire.”

Gold light began to filter up through all of Bill’s unbound bricks, the light spreading from the crevices of the bricks, creeping across Bill’s skin.

“No – NO!” Bill looked down at his arms, seeing the gold light slowly inch across his lovely handmade form. He scratched at the light to try and halt its progress, but it was no use.

Willow stepped forward and yanked on Stanford’s arm, pulling him out of the circle, back to safety.

Ford felt Bill’s too warm skin slip out of his grasp as Willow pulled him back, and he couldn’t help but feel wistful, wanting to hold on that bit longer.

He didn’t want this to be the last time he held his perfect muse in his arms, but it had to be. This was the goodbye they had to have.

“NO!” Bill lunged for Ford, but couldn’t reach out past the circle, the salt in it trapping him now, like an invisible prison. He beat his palms against the edge of the barrier, and looked at Ford with all the betrayal and hurt this expressive vessel could muster.

“I thought you were giving me a chance. You said –“

“I know what I said.” Ford replied sounding rather morose, looking at Bill for the last time while his form was being altered. “Things change.”

“Things change???” Bill spluttered, and began to look steadily more enraged. “This isn’t change, this is you. You – YOU did this to me.”

Ford looked away, not having the heart to watch Bill break apart, but his attempt to avoid this was thwarted when he heard Bill’s voice catch, like he was crying.

“How could you do this to me?”

Ford’s heart lurched, and he made an odd sound in the back of his throat. He looked up at Bill, and Bill was crying, his face crumpled with anguish, fat tears dripping down his face.

Freed from his world saving obligations, the wheels already having been put in motion, Ford’s conflicted heart finally found a voice, his supressed emotions rising to the surface.

Seeing Bill cry, his own defences began to break down, as he realised what he was really doing. His eyes pricked with reactionary tears that finally demanded to be shed. He was hurting Bill, more deeply than the muse deserved maybe.
Ford had assumed that Bill had been lying about everything, that he was just using Ford, but should the opposite be true, then right now he was no doubt breaking Bill’s heart right back.

He loved this creature, despite all of his faults, and it had only been this morning that they’d been together, trusting and caring for one another. Ford had destroyed that as surely as Bill would have destroyed the world, and he lit the match that was currently burning his muse’s body from existence.

He thought it would be easier to do this, to betray Bill like this, because while he knew within himself his own feelings, he’d never admitted it out loud to Bill. He thought that would make it easier. So Bill wouldn’t have an admission to cling to, have feelings to hurt him worse than he was already hurting.

Tears dripped down Bill’s cheeks, sizzling against his skin, as he pressed his palms to the edge of the barrier. His shoulders shook and his eyes locked with Stanford’s wet gaze, devastation dancing in their depths.

“I thought you loved me.” Bill sobbed hopelessly, pressing his forehead against the barrier. “Did that change too?”

The words skewered Ford right through to his very soul. He felt himself break on the knowledge that it wasn’t a secret, that Bill knew, and Bill knew that he did this to him anyway.

There was no escaping that fact now.

He could only watch his muse fall apart, and know it was his fault. Ford made another odd sound in the back of his throat and he realised he was crying too. The tears ran freely down his cheeks, and he was unable to turn his eyes away from Bill’s final moments inhabiting the body Ford made him.

Bill’s despair sobbed out of him for a few brief seconds, and he almost looked like something pitiable, before his anger overwhelmed him.

He threw his head back and screamed out his heartbroken rage, a horrible sound. It was discordant, as though screamed with many voices, and it made both Willow and Stanford jump back and cover their ears, wincing. The sky sounded out in response, thunder slamming across the heavens, and lightning danced in the sky.

“ANSWER ME YOU USELESS HACK! YOU DID THIS ON PURPOSE! YOU DID THIS TO ME ON PURPOSE! EVERY BIT OF IT FROM THE BEGINNING! DIDN’T YOU?”

Bill slammed his fists against the barrier again, viciously this time, more hands growing out from his back, fists beating against every surface of the barrier. Flames began to ooze from Bill’s body, burning a vibrant blue that flared out as his sanity deteriorated.

Ford staggered back, stunned to watch Bill fall apart. The gold was creeping out across his skin, gold light unmaking Bill, but not before the god threw a tantrum that shook the earth.

“I HATE YOU! I HATE YOU I HATE YOU I HATE YOU!” He screamed, and fire billowed out of his mouth, singing the grass on the floor. Bill screamed fire again, and it billowed out, barely contained by the barrier, the heat so strong and intense.

“You ruined EVERYTHING!” Bill screamed, and pointed aggressively, not at Stanford, but at Willow, who was holding Stanford’s shoulder in solidarity.
She started, shocked that she’d bear the brunt of his wrath.

Bill continued to shriek at her, raving, his voice laced with power. The ground began shaking, fire sputtering out of his mouth as the gold light spread.

“CURSE YOU WILLOW OAKWOOD. You will NEVER know happiness, the moment you do it’ll all get SNATCHED AWAY like you did to me!”

Willow’s jaw dropped open, and she shook her head in disbelief. She didn’t know he could curse people, and suddenly she felt cold all over.

Ford stepped in front of her, shielding her with his body as Bill continued to shriek, beating all six of his fists against the barrier.

“Bill I -”

“YOU DON’T GET TO TALK, YOU BETRAYER! YOU COLD FACED MONSTER! LIAR! BACKSTABBER! You made me – you –” Bill panted, unable to get the words out, before he screamed. “You know what - I OWN YOU SIXER! I STILL OWN YOU! You’re MINE FOREVER, don’t think this gets you out of that. I’ll have from now until THE END OF TIME to make you PAY FOR THIS!” Bill screamed, and the gold continued to spread.

His arms were completely gold now, and Bill’s deranged spiel was cut off by a shriek as the gold began to flake away from his body, dissolving his skin into nothingness. Bill watched in horror as the gold floated away from him, dissipating, deconstructing his flesh and blood.

The gold drifted out into the air like snow, Bill’s right hand gone now. He was panting, shaking harder, as he looked down at the steady deterioration of the rest of his arm. The gold light had spread to cover him all over, and now it was breaking apart.

Bill’s startled shriek turned into sobbing, turned into hysterical delusional laughter as his molecules disintegrated.

“It hurts.” Bill said, amidst the laughter, as his mood turned on a dime, and suddenly he was crying again, trying desperately to wrap his arms around himself, to grasp at his body while it flaked away from him.

Ford made to move a step closer, before he could process his response, holding out his arm, wanting to comfort Bill instinctually, feeling terrible. He was really hurting Bill, something he never wanted to do.

This was a lot more graphic and horrifying than the alchemy books suggested it would be.

Willow held him back by his shoulder, not feeling the same pity Ford was feeling.

Bill looked up at Stanford’s conflicted expression, right as the gold was dissolving his body, his chest drifting away. Glaring at Ford with wet eyes, Bill accused his backstabbing paramour.

“There really is no one you can trust.” The gold was covering Bill’s face now, breaking away the last part of him. “So much for your destiny.”

Ford felt more bitter tears drag through his stubble, dripping down from his chin, and he could only watch as the last of his muse disappeared.

“GUVF VFA’G BIRE!!” Bill yelled out, as the last bit of gold covered his eyes. “V’Z ABG QBAR
Bill’s wordless screaming carried off in the wind, as the last of the muse flaked away into gold confetti, dissipating into mellow light on the wind.

He was gone.

The red light on the ground from the circle sputtered and died down, and suddenly Ford was struck with the sense that he was left all alone in the world, without a single person who truly cared for him. Without anyone to truly care for.

He’d just banished the love of his life.

The clearing was eerily silent, the only sound was the heavy intake of Ford’s own breath as his shoulders shook, and the relentless heavy spatter of rain that fell without hesitation now, as though nature itself were crying.

Ford’s eyes were glued to the place where Bill had been, where he was no longer. Ford’s knees felt weak, collapsing under him.

He fell to the ground, kneeling in the mud, looking up at where his muse had been, the tears flowing out despondently.

Willow stepped up to him, and rested her hand on his shoulder, intending to comfort him.

“You did it. You saved the world.”

Somehow saving the world felt a lot like ending it.

---

Chapter End Notes

The spell in Latin roughly (very roughly) translates to: Gold wire, hear my prayer. Restore the witchcraft that was there. Give magic back, gold and black. Hear my prayer, take it back. Turn gold which once was black. Corrupted body. Take it back. Leave this Earth, and never come back. A LITTLE HEAVY STANFORD! Too bad it doesn't work. He'll be back, and this isn't over! And many other dramatic statements.

I HOPE YOU ALL ENJOYED THE BETRAYAL!!! It was a looooooong time coming, and the aftermath is going to be really angsty and messy, but there's the big betrayal, and the part where we dive back into canon's path and play with it.

This chapter should be dedicated to all of you who stuck with it this long to see this through to the betrayal, but I've made the less diplomatic decision to dedicate this chapter to CherryBxmb who read through the entire fic recently and left gorgeous comments on EVERY SINGLE CHAPTER! I LOVE YOU!!!!!
Poor Suzie, Willow and Dan. I always said bad stuff was going to happen to them, and now we know why Lazy Suzan's so spacy, right? IN THE COMMENTS TELL ME IF YOU CRIED READING bc I cried writing this no lie there.

Next chapter we see how both Bill and Stanford handle being betrayed, and Pyronica delivers words of wisdom that may not be so wise. Thanks for sticking around, reading and supporting this fic and your lovely comments as always :D
When it's bad, worse, worst. And you think you're cursed!

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

The Henchmaniacs and Goo Mobsters, and other assembled guests were waiting in the Quadrangle, party streamers and cocktails at the ready while enthusiastically discordant jazz music played softly.

A hand painted banner was being hung across the roof of the central hall, Eight Ball and Xanthar the only beings tall enough to affix the banner in place. In lumpy, colourful, childish writing “Happy Oddpocalypse” was painted across the banner, with many a fanciful triangle drawn to accent the artwork. The banner was a collaborative effort between Keyhole and Teeth, Amorphous Shape had supervised. They were collectively quite proud of it.

While Xanthar and Eight Ball were hanging the banner, Kryptos was floating about the hall with a checklist, making sure everything was in place.

“Drinks. Do we have enough drinks? Canapes? Is that a wonky table leg? Who put this table up? What happens if the leg collapses and all the food falls off the table? Who did this?”

“The table’s fine Kryptos.” Teeth commented, picking something dubious out from between his incisors. “A wonky leg adds character.”

“It’s not fine. What if someone knocks it?” Kryptos hovered by the table anxiously, and rested his hand on the table, before lifting it again, noticing the way it tilted. “See, it’s wonky. Someone’s gotta put something under it.”

“We could put you under it.” Pyronica rolled her eyes, leaning against the wall, examining her nails.

“Something like a newspaper, or a book.” Kryptos pondered, looking around the hall, before noticing the Goo Mobsters taking flutes of celestial champagne from one of the tables. “No! No, no, no, put down those drinks! Those are for the before-party, not before the before-party. The pre-drinking hasn’t started yet!”

“Oh, let them have a tipple Rhombus.” Paci-Fire insisted jovially. “There’s nothing wrong with getting a decent head start to the festivities.”

“But what will happen if all the drinks are gone before the Boss gets here?” Kryptos fretted.

“If? More like when.” Teeth quipped under his breath, elbowing Paci-Fire and the denizen threw his horned head back and chortled loudly.

“Hoh, the reality makes it humorous. It’s funny because it’s true.” Paci-Fire slapped his knee frivolously, while Teeth grinned.

“He’ll think we started without him.” Kryptos insisted, trying to instil some thought of consequence upon his rowdy colleagues, his foot tapping impatiently in the air.

“He won’t care, so long as there’s enough booze left for him to catch up.” Teeth advised, waving his hand flippantly. “A hidden stockpile if you will. You do have a special stash just for the Boss, right?”
“Special stash? Uh.” Kryptos looked vaguely panicked, checking back over his list.

While Kryptos pulled several more checklists from under his sleeves, Keyhole bumbled out into the hall with a big box of kazoo’s, confetti canons, noise makers, and funny hats.

“Hey what do you call that thing that spins around in circles and makes the kercherkercherkercher noise? Because we’ve got a tonne of those in here.” He said, peering over his nose at the box in his arms.

“What sound does it make?” Teeth asked, grinning wide.

“You know.” Keyhole dropped the box and fished through it, retrieving one of the noise makers, holding onto the handle and swirling it around. “That sound.”

“No, say it again. What sound was it?” Teeth laughed teasingly.

“Ah, shut up.” Keyhole waved off Teeth’s humorous poking, before he pulled out a party horn, and stuck it between his lips, blowing it. “That’s what you sound like.”

“That’s what your sister sounds like.” Teeth sneered back.

“Hey, I want one of those.” Pyronica enthused, walking over to the box of goodies.

As the Henchmaniac’s rummaged through the box of party goods, the lights flickered.

Kryptos looked up, and flailed, waving his multiple clipboards in the air. “Places! Places everyone! The Boss is back!”

As everyone scrambled for their places, the lights continued to flicker, and the very foundations of the Quadrangle began to shake violently. Rather than see the vehemence of Bill’s re-entry into the Nightmare Realm as something amiss, most Henchmaniac’s merely assumed this was yet another one of the boss’s dramatic entrances.

The band stopped playing their music, the conductor conspiratorially putting a finger to his lips, readying the performers for their big number.

Armed with party horns, whirly-gigs and funny hats, the gathered crew ducked down behind the tables that littered the hall, intending to jump out when the Boss came through, their congratulatory pre-Armageddon drinks designed to surprise and delight the triangle.

When Bill warped into the main hall of the Quadrangle, his bricks seemed to piece together slowly, as if reassembling from a fine powder, and when he had materialised fully, he looked furious.

“SURPRISE!” The Henchmaniac’s jumped out from behind the tables, waving their whirly-gigs jubilantly in the air and blowing on their party horns, intending to celebrate their boss’s successes. The band began playing, a jovial celebratory tune as Henchmaniac’s and gathered friends shouted out exuberantly. “HAPPY ODDPOCALYPSE BOSS!”

Bill seemed to be panting, his surface heaving with frustrated breaths as he looked around at the revelry and merriment set up to celebrate his sabotaged success. Everywhere he looked, he saw responsibilities and obligations that he had failed to fulfil, expectant faces watching him, the pressure building every second he stood here, devastated and destroyed, his original plan rammed off course by Sixer’s treachery.

The music was too cheery, and everyone’s smiles were too wide, and Bill didn’t have it in him to be cheerful right now when everything inside him was burning. Burning rage, burning disappointment, everything burnt ravenously, wanting to burn outward. And it would, Bill knew, he knew the signs.

Unable to take it a single second longer, the revelry and expectation, and the building flames, he yelled, his voice reverberating throughout the Quadrangle.

“EVERYBODY OUT!”

The band stopped playing, and kazoo’s fell from the shocked monsters lips, clattering to the ground. They stared at Bill for a moment longer, before the triangle added in a quieter, defeated sounding voice.

“The party’s cancelled.”

“What?”

“What do you mean?”

“Cancelled? But it hasn’t even started yet?”

Confused whispers filtered through the hall, lesser Henchmaniac’s and Goo Mobsters looking at one another in askance. Over by the table, several Goo Mobsters looked between one another, before smuggling an unopened bottle of champagne into their gooey mass to enjoy later.

Bill continued to float in the middle of the hall, looking around at the confused monsters and freaks, but not really seeing them. He was still seeing red, or rather blue, from that insult back in the forest, and he felt the fire roil within him.

Pyronica stepped forward, concerned, recognising the thin tether to sanity Bill had in this very moment, worried for him.

Kryptos hovered forward too, realising that Bill was looking more unhinged than a practical joke would warrant. His instincts, the same instincts that told him to run and hide, told him that much.

Bill glared at the gathered guests, who weren’t moving. They were all standing around, whispering to each other, as though they didn’t hear him the first time. Feeling the need to reiterate for these imbeciles, Bill raised his voice again.

“I said GET OUT! LEAVE!” Bill grew in size rapidly while he shouted, before shrinking back down and stalking into his private study, shouting as he floated away. “In the next 30 seconds, if you don’t all want to suffer an UNBELIEVABLY PAINFUL DEATH!

The shocked whispers and mumbling turned into frantic scrambling from those who knew Bill meant business with his threats.

Immediately manning damage control Kryptos hovered through the fleeing crowd of allies and investors, explaining timidly while wringing his hands. “He – he didn’t mean cancelled. Just postponed. It’s only postponed, but – ah – if everyone could file out in an orderly line, just for a while, that’d just be swell.”

Pyronica could only handle so much of Kryptos’ nervous, hand wringing version of crowd control, before she opened her mouth as wide as she could and yelled.

“EVERYBODY OUT, NOW!”
The gathered guests paused for a beat, before it sunk in just how serious this situation was.

People began to run out of the hall like a stampeding herd, some screaming, knocking over ornaments and tables as they went, the food clattering to the ground. Some people scooped up items as they left, stealing all they could from the Quadrangle before shit hit the fan, but that was to be expected. They were interdimensional criminals after all.

While everyone made for the door in a mad cacophony of pure panic, Pyronica made her way to Bill’s study determinately. Kryptos hovered in the middle of the hall, torn between supervising the chaotic evacuation to minimise theft and property damage, and following Pyronica, wanting to be there when she checked in with Bill.

Chewing on his lip nervously for a while, watching people smash and trample on their way out the door, Kryptos decided that intervening with the frantic exodus was a fools errand, and threw away his clipboard, floating over to Bill’s study. He stepped just behind Pyronica so she could shield him from Bill’s wrath should it escalate. It was dangerous, following along, but he wanted to see what had the boss so riled. He needed to see it. He’d never seen the boss this unhinged before.

Pyronica knocked on the study door once tentatively, before twisting the handle. “Bill? I’m coming in.”

As the door opened, already Kryptos could see from his vantage point behind Pyronica that the walls were melting, fire dancing all around the room, lighting the books and bookcases chaotically while Bill threw things around the room.

One of the glass ornaments that sat on Bill’s desk was hurled into the wall, shattering into a million pieces, the essence trapped inside the glass hissing out of it. Bill threw the desk chair and it clattered as it broke apart, hitting the wall violently. He threw every book from the desk, and every trinket and ornament viciously, one by one.

Bill stood in the middle of the carnage, his bricks steadily growing redder, angrier as the betrayal he just underwent set in.

He yelled out his anger, and tipped over the heavy black desk, knocking everything to the floor.

“BILL!” Pyronica yelled out, trying to get his attention. He looked at her briefly, and his eye was black with rage, pupil a fiery red slit. Softening her voice, Pyronica pressed. “What happened?”

“SIXER!” Bill hissed and spluttered, looking around for more things to destroy. “That horrid, no good, AWFUL –“

Pyronica rolled her eye, and jutted her hip out, leaning against the doorframe, exasperated. “What did he do now?”

Bill’s tone of voice wasn’t the typical ranting rage Pyronica was used to when her friend would rail about his human. Instead Bill’s voice came out into a despairing guttural wail, and for a moment, he looked utterly lost.

“He BETRAYED ME!”

“What? How?” Pyronica questioned, genuine concern creeping into her eye now.

“He scrapped my body.” Bill raged, gesturing to his bricks. “WHILE I WAS STILL INSIDE!”

“Oh shit.” Pyronica’s shoulders slumped, and she leaned back against the door, thrown by this revelation and all it implied.

“He just stood there. He did NOTHING! Nothing and everything. He orchestrated – he –“ Bill fumed, his fingers clenching around thin air. “RUINED –“

“He double crossed you?” Kryptos asked, peering around Pyronica’s legs cautiously.

“I just want to burn everything. Burn everything to the ground.” Bill muttered, and floated like he was pacing, clutching at his eye. “Rip the fabric of the universe to shreds. I can’t keep it in. I need to –“

“Hey. Hey –“ Pyronica crossed the room boldly, and held her hands out in front of Bill, aiming to placate him. “You don’t want to do that.”

“It HURTS!” Bill wailed, his bricks changing colour, flashing blue, black, and translucent in quick succession as his emotions broke him down from the inside out. “I want it to STOP!”

“Look, you can let it out, you can let it all out, okay.” Pyronica assured Bill, bending down to look him in the eye. “But not here. You don’t want to ruin everything we’ve worked for.”

“It’s already ruined. It’s all ruined.” Bill muttered feverishly, the flames at the edges of the room burning hotter. Now the fire curled with impact, rather than the harmless illusory blue flames. Things were actually starting to burn, irreparably, and Pyronica knew that she didn’t have much time.

“You need to get out.” Pyronica nodded, and grabbed Bill’s wrists, stopping him from raking his nails down his bricks, trying to maintain his eye contact. “You’re gonna explode. You need to get out, and let this all out, and don’t come back until you’re done.”

“This is my place.” Bill retorted sharply, reflexively, not wanting anything else to be taken from him.

“I’m trying to help you keep your place. Go to your other place. The one that can’t burn anymore.” Pyronica reached her hand behind her and waved it expectantly at Kryptos, trying to hold Bill’s attention as a priority.

The compass blinked at her for a second, slow on the uptake, before he scrambled to pull a dimensional traveller out from under his glove, thrusting it into Pyronica’s hand.

Dimensional travellers were disposable teleportation devices, incredibly expensive and hard to come by. They were single use portals, not big enough to sustain the sort of mass exodus that Bill was intending with his invasion, but sufficient for single person travel, though the motor burned itself out after letting one being through.

Pyronica input the coordinates to a particular defunct dimension, and patted Bill’s side consolingly.

“You go there, and let it all out, and come back when you’re done. We’ll take care of things here for you, we know what you want, okay?”

Bill sniffled, and his eye began to water, something that Kryptos never thought he’d see in all of his years.

“I want Sixer.” Bill warbled.
“Yeah, I kinda want a piece of him myself.” Pyronica muttered, as she fired up the dimensional traveller, pointing it at the wall of Bill’s study.

A portal opened up, splitting the fabric of the universe briefly. The wall in Bill’s study parted to reveal a different dimension, one completely covered with incessant blue flame and little else. The flames leapt ravenously and Pyronica leaned away from the wall, the heat already unbearable, even for her.

Bill looked through the portal and flinched away from the sight of the burning dimension, hating it, and everything about it.

Pyronica winced, recognising that this solution was cruel, but a cruel necessity. She’d seen that look in Bill’s eye before.

“You need to go. If you can’t keep it in, you need to go. You’ve got too much to lose here.”

Morosely, Bill responded, unable to tear his eye away from the burning dimension in front of him. “I’ve already lost everything.”

“No you haven’t. No you haven’t.” Pyronica assured him, crouching beside him. “You’ve built up a lot here, and whatever you lost, you’ll be getting back. You know you will. I won’t let you lose what we’ve worked for. It’s not over, okay? Whatever Sixer did, we’ll fix this. But first we need to fix you.”

Bill’s eye was watering, even now as he leaned away from the portal, sloping diagonally, staring at it like it was going to bite him.

“Damage control.” Pyronica said quietly to Bill, still rubbing his side comfortingly. “You go let it all out, and when you’re not dangerous, you come back and see me. We’ll handle this.”

She patted Bill on the back again, pushing him lightly forward, encouraging him to step through the portal. He hesitated a fraction, before floating forward with a resigned look to his eye.

“There you go. We’ll be here when you need us, just—“

She nudged him through the portal gently, and reluctantly he floated all the way through.

The portal’s edges wavered, already breaking down now that one being had crossed through, and the corners of the portal flickered for several seconds, fading out of existence.

Bill floated into the middle of the fiery chaos, his bricks still changing colour, his shoulders heaving as he panted through this inner turmoil.

The last thing Kryptos saw before the portal disintegrated entirely was Bill throwing his arms out, screaming, as an enormous ball of fire combusted outwards from his body, scouring everything out of existence.

The portal burnt out with a whoosh, and the device holding the portal in place clattered to the floor. Now there was only smooth, slightly scorched walls remaining, no longer melting or on fire. Just an empty office, with debris scattered everywhere.

Pyronica groaned, and looked up at the ceiling, before running her hands through her hair and gripping onto her horns in frustration.

Kryptos blinked from the doorway, shocked by that entire interlude. “Wow.”
“Uuuuuugghhhhh.” Pyronica groaned again, looking incredibly guilty. “I hate doing this. He was so upset.”

Kryptos hovered further into the office, and paused, floating above the shattered remains of Bill’s glass ornament, nudging the broken glass with his boot.

“He broke his Infinite Sand Globe.” Kryptos sounded shell-shocked, and distant. “How are we gonna replace it? They don’t make those anymore.”

“We have –” Pyronica glared at Kryptos, gritting her teeth. “Bigger problems than the Sand Globe right now, okay?”

“Like the human?” Kryptos asked, furrowing his brow.

“Like Bill.” Pyronica clarified. “I haven’t seen him get worked up like this in a long time. This is bad. This is really bad.”

“I don’t know what he was so shocked for.” Kryptos commented seditiously. “So this Sixer betrayed him. The human was always going to be untrustworthy. He was never going to go along with Bill’s plan, humans simply aren’t evolved enough to see the benefit of making a decision like siding with a cosmic being as powerful as Bill. They’re underdeveloped.”

“Most are.” Pyronica muttered, looking around the ruined office. “Bill seemed to think Six Fingers would be different though.”

“Then he was deluding himself.” Kryptos shrugged flippancy. “A complete waste of his time and energy, cultivating equality for a human. A pet. He wanted to promote the thing, hah! I thought he was joking. What a joke, am I right? A total joke. He should have thrown him away when he had the chance, before this got so complicated. Now, I don’t want to say I told you so -”

“THEN DON’T!” Pyronica swung around and growled at Kryptos, baring her sharp teeth. He meeped in fright, and demurred.

“This is serious. Not a joke, serious business. Whatever happened down there turned on a dime, and we need to know why. Last I spoke to Bill, he had everything under control, and he had Six Fingers under control. They made a deal, he said he had assurances. So something must have gone wrong.” Pyronica fretted, chewing on her claws. “I’ve never seen him so worked up like this before. Not even in prison. This is so bad.”

“Well, what could have thrown him off?” Kryptos asked, not willing to believe a human could be so important. “Not this Sixer, it’s gotta be something else.”

“He gets so mad when he loses things. He probably thinks he’s lost his shot at earth, but if that were the case, he’d have a backup plan, like he did the first time.” Pyronica chewed on her claw anxiously, thinking. “He’s never cared about anything enough to lose it like this. Six Fingers must have really screwed him over.”

“Or, it was something else –” Kryptos said stubbornly, hardly willing to admit a human caused this. He didn’t want to give this Sixer that much credit.

Pyronica clenched her fist, and growled again, a low rumble of anger. “When I find that punk –”

“So what do we do?” Kryptos shook his head, and held his hands out, suspending his theory in order to act. “You said we’d take care of it? How do we take care of it? If, and I don’t believe it is, but if it is this Sixer, do we shuffle the human off his mortal coil on the boss’s behalf? I have ideas.”

Kryptos sounded too eager, keen to remove a notable threat to his standing from the hierarchical map so to speak.

“No. He wouldn’t want that.” Pyronica responded with certainty. “If Sixer’s this important to him, he wouldn’t want someone else to kill him. It’s gotta be in his hands. I’m not even sure if he will kill him.”

“So we don’t kill him. Really, that’s what the boss should have done in the first place, but that’s just me.” Kryptos scowled and kicked the shattered glass across the floor with his boot. “We can’t just do nothing. Obviously the human insulted him, we can’t just let that slide. We have to retaliate. Act.”

Pyronica frowned, her bottom lip sticking out as she thought. She had to agree with Kryptos, they couldn’t just let Six Finger’s betrayal of Bill slide, not when it had upset their boss to this degree. She hated to see Bill this upset, and having to usher him into his old dimension was excruciating for her, but she had to. And all because of Sixer.

“I know he has night terror bubbles he sometimes sends out. We could send Six Fingers one of those.” She tapped her bottom lip with her finger, frowning. “I think he keeps them in the dream room, with all the mirrors. God I’d like to see him suffer. Jerking Bill around like that.”

“So, let’s go!” Kryptos urged, floating beside Pyronica impatiently. “Come on. Let’s show this human what for!”

“I don’t know though. I get the feeling that whatever we do now will probably come back to bite us in the ass. I think we should wait.” Pyronica decided, still frowning. “We need to think what would Bill want us to do, when he’s in his right mind.”

“Which is when?” Kryptos questioned sassily, squinting at Pyronica.

Pyronica ignored the compass and paced around the study, thinking aloud.

“Bill would want us to control his assets, and make sure everything’s still on track in terms of our alliances. We could be making the wrong decision to strike out against the human, his basement still holds our party door. Bill could still turn this to our favour.”

“You want him to go back to the human?” Kryptos asked, exasperated.

“I’m saying he might need to, and we can’t screw it up for him as an option if that’s what he needs.” Pyronica rubbed her chin pensively. “We need to control things here. Bring back the investors, gather our allies. Make it seem like nothing’s gone wrong, like we’re still on track.”

“Are we?” Kryptos scowled at Pyronica. “It sounds like we just wasted years trying to build a portal on Earth, for some uppity human to come along and throw it all away.”

“We can get it back.” Pyronica asserted. “Bill always has a backup plan. He’ll find a way.”

“Years! Wasted years!” Kryptos emphasised.

“You get used to waiting!” Pyronica yelled back at the compass, crossing her arms. “It’s been hundreds of years since we started all this. We’ve waited that long, if waiting is what it takes, we can go a few more years.”
Kryptos floated up to the cyclops, and tugged conspiratorially on her arm. “Pyronica, this dimension is crumbling at the edges. It’s falling apart. We are on a time limit, and I don’t know how many more years we can wait! Our safe place won’t be so safe anymore once it begins to erode while we’re all still in it! We need a place to go.”

“And Bill will find us a place.” Pyronica shook the compass’s hand off her arm. “You just have to be patient.”

“For how long? Two years? Ten years? Thirty?” Kryptos threw his hands in the air. “We may not look it, but soon we’re going to start getting desperate.”

“Bill will handle it.” Pyronica said firmly.

“Like he’s handling it now?” Kryptos gestured to the scorched wall, looking unimpressed.

“Don’t you dare keep questioning him Kryptos. I will drop kick you into the sun, don’t think I won’t.” Pyronica loomed over the compass, her fire burning ominously up her arms. “We’re acting on Bill’s behalf now, which means that if you mouth off about him one more time, I will personally see to your agonising torture, and I will relish the opportunity to do so.”

“You wouldn’t.” Kryptos cowered away from her, squinting up at her.

“Sure I would. I’d just ask myself, ‘what would Bill do?’ and there’s my answer.” Pyronica pointed at Kryptos with a flaming claw, jabbing him in the chest. “Shut up about him. If you start doubting him, and spreading your poison the moment he’s gone, I will exterminate you.”

In that instant Kryptos saw a flash of the dreaded warrior cyclops Pyronica was supposed to be. What she was moulded to be. An enforcer. A terror.

“I – I made a deal. Bill’s supposed to protect me.” Kryptos quivered.

“Well, Bill’s not here right now. So until he comes back, you fall in line. You answer to me now.” Pyronica stood tall, and turned on her heel, pacing away from the shaking compass, speaking coldly. “I’m his second, so what I say goes. Now clean up this mess, and don’t show your face until this study is exactly how it was before all this.”

“How am I supposed to find another Infinite Sand Globe?” Kryptos yelled after her, gesturing to the ruined ornament. “Pyronica!”

Looking disdainfully over her shoulder, Pyronica turned her chin up at the compass. “Figure it out. You have ideas.”

Tossing her hair over her shoulder, Pyronica clacked out of the ruined office, standing tall on her high heels, leaving Kryptos to pick up the pieces.

She was the boss now.

And everyone else better fall the fuck in line.
Stanford and Willow shambled back through the forest to the shack, Willow watching Stanford cautiously the entire time.

She was leaning on him, the injuries she sustained fighting Bill gave her a rather ungainly limp. Stanford tried hard not to look at her, and his eyes were still red rimmed, stubbornly watering even now as he tried to repress his emotions.

It was still raining, the water dripped down Ford’s glasses, hiding the remnants of his tears nicely. He knew Willow was watching him, her expression concerned, and he didn’t want to acknowledge it, so he looked away from her, at anything else.

The scorch marks on the ground where lightning struck. The burnt wood of the trees, sizzling now as the rain put out the fires. The evidence of Bill’s carnage left to drive home the unwelcome fact that Ford’s muse wasn’t what he thought he was.

They came out into the yard out front of the shack, and Willow shrugged away from Ford, limping over to Suzie’s car, left parked in the driveway. The keys were still in the ignition when she looked through the window.

“You can leave me here. I’ve gotta drive Suzie’s car home and check in on her. You probably don’t want an audience. I know I wouldn’t want anyone around after…” Willow looked over to Ford again, and her words trailed away, before she continued, scowling, looking at the ground. “I hate people seeing me cry.”

“That isn’t –” Ford began, shame rippling in his belly. He pushed his glasses up and gestured to her. “You don’t have to leave because of that. You – your leg is bleeding, and you’re covered in mud. Willow, you’re soaking wet.”

“I’ll deal with it.” She wiped water off her hands, before reaching into the open car window and pulling Suzie’s keys from the ignition. She put the keys in the door and struggled to get it open, leaning a little too much against the car door. Her leg was aching persistently now.

“Stop being ridiculous and let me look at it.” Ford said roughly, walking around the other side of the car to crouch down by Willow’s leg. Her skirt was clinging to her leg, and he pushed it up gingerly to assess the wound.

“See, most men I’d be worried if they start lifting my skirt up.” Willow said sarcastically, leaning on the car door, trying to keep the weight off her injured leg. “But I know what your type is.”

“Psychotic.” Ford grunted and pressed his fingers lightly against the skin above the wound on Willow’s thigh. “Apparently.”

“You didn’t know.” Willow hissed and steeled herself as Ford poked at the injury. “It’s not your fault.”

“There’s only so much ignorance that can be forgiven when your partner goes on a homicidal rampage and stabs you with a –“ He muttered bitterly, before looking up at Willow, gesturing to her leg. “What even caused an injury like this?”

“A fork.” She replied, her voice somewhat strained. “He stabbed me with a fork.”

“It’s gone in deep. Yanking it out probably caused more damage.” Ford murmured, looking at the broken skin, before standing up, holding his hand out to Willow. “Come on, let’s get you inside. You can’t drive with your leg like this.”
“Fine.” Willow grabbed onto Ford’s hand, resigned.

She let Ford lead her into the house.

The front door was open. Ford helped Willow through, intending to walk her up to the bathroom where his first aid kit was, but he paused along the hallway, spotting the fancy silverware from the kitchen cabinet speared into the wallpaper.

Supporting Willow with one hand, Ford reached out with his other, and tried to yank one of the forks from the wall. It stubbornly stayed put, the force that propelled them through the air clearly quite substantial. It was no wonder Willow’s cut was so deep.

“Unbelievable.” Ford muttered, and let go of the fork, the cutlery wobbling, still stuck in the wood.

Shaking his head, he turned, and helped Willow up the stairs, walking her into the bathroom and depositing her to sit on the edge of the bathtub.

Turning around, he rummaged through the cupboard under the sink, looking for his first aid kit. “We’ll need to clean the wound. I know the silverware is clean, but you’ve been running through the woods, I wouldn’t want it to get infected. You might need stitches.”

“Hey Stanford. Do you have any clean clothes I could wear?”

Stanford turned around, looking over his shoulder. Willow was already beginning to pull at her sodden dress, wringing it out into the bathtub. Her dress was hoiked up around her waist, and her freckled legs were bare.

“Just for a while?” She asked, letting her wrung skirt slap against the bathtub, letting it go. “And can I borrow your shower?”

Ford paused for a moment, taking her in, before nodding his assent perfunctorily. “Of course, of course. Might make it easier to clean the wound.”

Ford pulled his first aid kit out and flipped through it, checking that he had everything he needed to tend to her wound, before setting it on the countertop.

He spoke to Willow without really looking at her, wanting to preserve her modesty. “If you lean against the wall, you should be fine. Take care not to slip. I’ll leave some clothing just beside the door. Yell for me when you’re ready.”

Willow watched Ford shuffle out of the bathroom with mild amusement, seeing the way he avoided looking at her legs. She almost let herself chuckle at him, when the door closed, but she looked down at her leg, and didn’t feel much like laughing after all.

Pulling herself upright, she gingerly stepped into the bathtub, and pulled off her dress, letting it slap against the edge of the tub. She leaned against the wall, and turned the taps on, watching blood and mud sluice off her body, swirling down the sink, feeling rather melancholy in the moment.

She just wanted to wash this whole day away.
Stanford placed a small pile of clothes just inside of the bathroom door, and left Willow to the spray of the shower.

Pacing downstairs, he walked through his hallway, righting the misplaced knick-knacks and ornaments. He picked his coat rack off the floor, and set it upright beside the door, and walked over to the forks and knives embedded in the walls.

Examining them, Ford could see that Bill had somehow even weaponised Ford’s soup spoon, the ladle skewered into the wall expressively. Prising it from the wall, Ford heard the wood crack, as the ladle sprung free.

Ford turned it over in his hands and marvelled at exactly how deadly his muse could be, how ruthlessly efficient. His shameful sensibilities quashed the spark of awe he felt realising this, remembering that Willow was injured upstairs because of that same ruthless efficiency.

Still, all the while he’d been unbinding Bill’s bricks, uncovering new powers with every ritual, he hadn’t even begun to imagine the practical applications available to Bill should the muse strike out dangerously as he had done.

Stanford had almost infantilised Bill’s powers as he unbound them, only seeing how useful they could be when committed to his service. He was used to Bill using his levitation to make jam jars dance around the kitchen, used to him burning off heat in his palms so he could touch Ford without hurting him, used to him wringing rain from the sky to solve Ford’s problems for him. He hadn’t even begun to imagine how dangerous Bill’s powers could be, simply because they’d never caused him danger personally.

He was a fool.

A fool to let Bill get this deadly, and a fool to believe that the reason Bill hadn’t used his considerable powers to harm Ford was due to any earnest sentiment between them. The protection runes stitched into Bill’s body were the reason Bill hadn’t raised a hand against him, and that was all it was.

Clearly, Ford was nothing special. In the end, it had all been a lie.

Scowling at his ruined wall, Ford rolled up his sleeves and set to prising the cutlery out of the wallpaper, yanking silverware from the wood and letting it tinkle as it fell melodically to the floor. It was a workout, prising the cutlery from the wood considering how deep each piece was wedged, and he had to employ considerable force to get each bit of cutlery out of there.

It was quite cathartic really, yanking each knife and fork from the wallpaper. Ford lost track of time as he wrenched the evidence of his muse’s wrongdoing out of the wall, hurling each freed piece of silverware to the floor, throwing himself into the removal. His movements started quite mechanical, but became more frantic and desperate the longer he dwelled on the betrayal, the betrayal of who he thought his muse was.

He’d been played like a fiddle by a monster who didn’t care.

A monster who ruined his walls.

Ford panted, and wrenched the last knife from the wall, cutting his hand on the blade.

Ford hissed, and the knife dropped to the floor, clattering there with the rest of the silverware. Ford examined the cut on his palm. It was small, just a little cut, but it stung. The cut on his palm was bleeding, but the cut on his fingertip, where he had bled to draw the unbinding circle, was scabbed over, healing slowly.

The longer Ford looked at the cut, the more angry and despondent he felt, the cut reminding him of both his muse’s treachery and the way Bill would always heal his injuries and cuts with that cool burst of fire, running his hand over the healed skin smoothly afterwards, holding onto Ford like he was something precious, to be protected.

With nothing left to wrench from the walls, Ford’s temper welled up, feeling helpless, and he slammed his fist against the hallway wall, gritting his teeth. His heart was thumping in his chest, but he had never felt more detached from it, feeling nothing but this misplaced anger.

He could feel the cut wallpaper curling against his fingers and feel the sting of the cut on his palm, but that was it. He didn’t want to feel anything else.

“Stanford?” Willow called from upstairs.

Shaking himself out of his melancholy, Ford bent down to gather the scattered silverware, and dumped it in the kitchen sink, washing his hands, before calling up the stairs.

“I’m coming.”

Trudging upstairs, Ford found Willow leaning against the bathroom door, waiting for him.

She wore a comfortable looking black sweatshirt, and a pair of red boxers, the track pants he’d set out for her waiting in the other room. She was clean now, her long red hair twirled in a bunch, trailing down her neck. It was wet, but clean, and her leg was now clean as well, the cut no longer bleeding profusely.

Plucking at the front of the sweatshirt, Willow asked. “Whose clothes are these anyway. They’re not big enough to be yours.”

Ford didn’t say anything, but his mouth hardened into a thin line, giving Willow her answer.

“Ah.” She gave a tight-lipped smile, a grimace really, regretting her question. Of course, she was wearing Bill’s clothes.

“Let’s see how your leg is doing.” Ford said and ushered her back into the bathroom. Sitting down on the floor, Ford went through the first aid kit, and pulled out a bottle of antiseptic and some wipes.

Willow sat back down on the edge of the tub and allowed Ford to swab at her wound with the antiseptic, gritting her teeth so as not to make a noise. It stung a little, but she didn’t want to make a spectacle of her pain. She didn’t want anyone’s sympathy.

Ford cleaned her wound, absorbed in his task, and finished swabbing her cut with antiseptic. He reached for the sterile thread and needle he kept in the first aid kid.

“You’ll need stitches.”

“Do it then.” Willow said, steeling herself for the needle. “Better you do it than having to explain this to someone else. I don’t want to know what Dan will be like when he see’s this.”

“You tripped.” Ford suggested, coming up with a plausible excuse.
“Yeah, and fell on a fucking fork.” Willow said sarcastically, shaking her head. “This day has been insane.”

Ford made an agreeable noise, focusing on threading the needle. When the thread was through, and the needle was ready, Ford pinched the edges of Willow’s cut together, and began work on sewing up the wound.

Willow gripped onto the edge of the bathtub and held her breath for the first few stitches, before exhaling slowly, watching Ford work in silence.

Then, after a while, she spoke.

“Hey Stanford. Are – are curses real?”

Ford paused what he was doing, looking up at her briefly. She was trying to look unconcerned, but the way her mouth pinched at the edges gave her away.

She was terrified.

Ford ran his tongue along his teeth, his mouth closed, and deliberated his answer. Answering honestly, he kept it simple.

“Yes.”

Willow swallowed, and nodded, still gripping onto the edge of the tub.

“Can – can he –” Willow rocked back and forth on the edge of the tub for a moment, finding her words. “Can he actually curse someone, or do you think he was just saying that. Has he ever cursed someone before?”

Ford paused again, considering that. To his knowledge, Bill had never cursed anyone before, certainly not around him, but it was becoming clear to him that he really had no idea of what his muse was capable of.

Responding quietly, Ford was honest again, though a part of him thought perhaps it would be best to be less honest for Willow’s peace of mind.

“I don’t know.”

She nodded again, taking that in, before looking up to the ceiling.

As Ford continued to thread through the last of the stitches, the corners of her eyes pricked with moisture. It could have been from the pain or from looking up into the light. She didn’t want to cry in front of Stanford. She’d done enough crying today.

Ford finished the last stitch, and tied it off, cutting the thread. He reached for a roll of bandages, and began wrapping the bandage around Willow’s leg, affixing it tightly so it would hold.

“How’s that?”

“Better. Thank you.” Willow stood, testing her leg, before reaching for the track pants, pulling them on. She sat on the edge of the bathtub and buckled up her sandals, and when she was done, she picked up her damp dress and her bag.

Reaching into the bag, she passed the memory gun over to Ford. “This is for you. I think I dropped the other gun somewhere in the forest.”
“I’ll find it.” Ford replied, turning the memory gun over in his hands. “Thank you, for keeping it safe.”

Willow nodded, and held her chin up high, proud that she’d been able to keep the ray out of Bill’s hands in the end. She did what she promised she would. She had managed to protect someone in the end, even if she couldn’t protect her baby, and she’d saved lives today, maybe even the world.

Ford walked her down the stairs, holding his hand out in case she needed support, and accompanied her to Suzie’s car. Willow grabbed the keys from her bag, and slid them in the door, unlocking it. She opened the door, and paused, looking at Stanford closely.

“Thank you, for letting me do this today.”

“I worry that I’ve done you more harm than good.” Ford frowned at her.

“No, I needed this. Seriously.” Willow looked at Ford intently and held out her hand for him to shake. “Thank you.”

Awkwardly Ford shook her hand, unaccustomed to this sort of congratulations. He didn’t feel like being congratulated.

Willow turned his hand over, and noticed the cut on his palm, flicking a concerned glance up at Ford’s face.

“Take care of yourself, okay?”

Ford swallowed, and nodded, her concern oddly touching.

She slid into the front seat of the car and closed the door behind her. Turning the keys in the ignition, the car rumbled to life, and Willow looked up at Ford from the half-wound car window. “I’ll see you around, yeah?”

Ford nodded again, and stepped back, waving at her. “See you.”

As Willow drove away down the dirt road, Ford watched her go, lamenting her absence as it meant his distractions had dwindled. While he hadn’t exactly wanted company, being alone with his thoughts was no better.

Sighing, and turning on his heel, he looked up at his house, taking in the familiar structure with its triangular windows, feeling like it couldn’t be more alien now, this building that was meant to be his home.

Whatever had made it his home before was gone, and Ford was unwilling to admit that that missing piece was Bill. He couldn’t miss him, not now that he knew the truth. Bill was going to destroy the world. What did that say about Stanford if he still missed such a monster?

Swallowing his uncertainty, Ford climbed the stairs to the front porch, and stood in the doorway, looking at the hallway, still seeing things out of place, things he had to clean. He could move on if he had a purpose, and right now, getting everything back in order was his priority.

Righting the chaos that his life had become.

Squaring his shoulders, Ford stepped into the house, and threw himself into cleaning, anything to spare him from his guilty thoughts.
Perhaps if he could remove the evidence of Bill’s wrongdoing from today, it will be like it had never happened.

One could hope.

“I can assure you, Sir, your investment’s secure.” Pyronica smiled sweetly, looking across the table at one of Bill’s interdimensional investors while he mulled her assurances over, puffing on an Andolean cigar.

“I heard the gig is cancelled.”

“Postponed.” Pyronica corrected them, still maintaining her polite smile. “Temporarily. Just while we sort out a few last minute kinks in the party door.”

The investor clicked his pincers pensively, squinting his small crustacean eyes up at the flaming cyclops suspiciously. “Why isn’t your Boss here, telling me this himself?”

Pyronica’s smile tightened at the edges slightly. “Bill is indisposed at the moment. Also temporarily. I’m filling in for him.”

“Listen lady, I’m sure you got a head for business, but are you qualified to step in for your Boss here? It’s just that I ain’t heard a thing from him about this little reach around, and now I’m supposed to believe that it’ll all blow over because you bat your eyelashes at me?” The crustacean man snorted, and puffed away at his cigar. “No disservice to you of course, but I’d rather be speaking to Bill than you.”

“Why? You like his eyelashes better?” Pyronica asked, her polite tone drying up sharpish.

“Again, no disservice to you, but I’d rather hear it from the horse’s mouth, you get me?”

“He’s a triangle.” Pyronica said, her words clipped, her smile straining. “Not a horse. And he’s indisposed.”

“Well, when’ll he be back?” The crustacean asked, waving his feelers at Pyronica scornfully.

“When he’s back. Until then, you deal with me.” Pyronica tried for a diplomatic smile again, but was probably baring her teeth a little too much to be propitious. “So, can we still rely on your investment?”

The investor pursed his lips and waved his cigar around in one of his claws whimsically. “Hmmm. This is a lot to mull over. A risk, and a setback. I haven’t decided yet if I’m willing to invest at the same rate. No disservice to you of course, not saying I’ve made my mind up yet. I’m sure you could sweeten the deal some.”

“It’s sweet enough already. The deal remains the same.” Pyronica said flatly. “So what do you say?”

He waved his feelers at Pyronica and squinted his eyes at her opportunistically, stroking his chin. “I’m thinking.”
In an instant Pyronica lunged across the table and grabbed the crustacean by his eye stems, snarling in his face. “THINK FASTER!”

“Okay! Okay! I’m in!” The investor squealed frightfully.

Pyronica let go of his eye stems and leaned back, sitting in her chair comfortably. Exhaling loudly, calming herself after her outburst, she forced her polite smile back on her face, and batted her eyelashes at the investor.

“Excellent. Thank you for your sustained support. It’s good to have you on board.”

The investor rubbed his eye stems and nodded, before scuttling out of his chair, exiting the office, casting outraged looks over his shoulder as he went.

Pyronica rubbed above her eye and sighed. This diplomacy bullshit was not her forte. She didn’t know how Bill did it, without breaking each and every investor’s scrawny neck that is. They were all so infuriating.

Leaning back in her chair, Pyronica called out for the next candidate she had to schmooze to death.

“NEXT!”

Kryptos floated into the office, looking over his shoulder as the crustacean investor left. “Geez Pyronica, you’re supposed to close them, not scare them witless.”

“They’re already witless.” Pyronica grumbled as Kryptos closed the study door. “Every single one of them wants to try it on, try to push for more out of their deals. They’re looking to get away with things they wouldn’t even think of doing if Bill were here, and they keep trying to get one over on me.”

“That’s how negotiating works.” Kryptos shrugged and floated into the seat opposite Pyronica. “But hey, if you’re having trouble with it, you could always let me have a try.”

“No.” Pyronica pointed at Kryptos and narrowed her eye. “No. I’ve run through every What Would Bill Do scenario in my head, and there is no scenario that Bill would approve of that would involve giving you any modicum of power here. He wouldn’t trust you with it, and neither will I.”

“But you want to.” Kryptos tested, looking slyly at Pyronica. “I can tell. You hate this needless pandering.”

Pyronica pouted but didn’t give Kryptos the satisfaction of a reply.

“You feel like you’re wasting time, playing word tennis with the investors. All this delicate finicking back and forth. You prefer to solve your problems with violence, but in the board room it doesn’t make you look strong, it makes you look weak, and they can sense that.”

“Because I’m stuck in a room full of people like you.” Pyronica scowled. “Who are so weak they don’t know what real strength is. That’s why they hide behind words, and manners, and sneaky tactics. People like you wouldn’t last one second out on the battlefield.”

“If you’re good enough with your words, and sneaky tactics, you can win the battle without stepping onto the field at all.” Kryptos shrugged. “That’s what Bill taught me anyhow.”

“Yeah, well Bill’s got no problems bringing the best of both worlds to the table.” Pyronica mumbled.
“And they know that, which is why they respect him.” Kryptos nodded, watching Pyronica rub her temples.

“If they respect him, why are they trying to short change him so much?” She asked.

“You can’t mistake respect for loyalty.” Kryptos answered. “Bill knows that too, that’s why there’s us and there’s them.”

“Yeah, well none of this would have happened if he hadn’t chosen a ‘them’ in the first place.” Pyronica grumbled, and rested her chin on the desk, leaning forward.

“The human?” Kryptos probed, crossing his legs, resting his hand on his chin watching her expectantly.

“I told him. I told him that if Six Fingers wasn’t on board with this it could all blow up in our faces. I wanted things to work for them, but I mean – he just isn’t being realistic.” Pyronica bemoaned.

“When is he realistic?” Kryptos nodded understandingly. “He’s the master of unreality.”

“But I thought he’d at least be realistic about this.” Pyronica gestured to the desk emphatically. “If he knew Sixer was so principled about things from the beginning, he shouldn’t have –“ “Ruined all our chances by siding with the human?” Kryptos said quickly, the words coming out in a smooth rush.

“What? No.” Pyronica blinked, and gave Kryptos an assessing look. “And nothing’s ruined, we can fix this. I meant he shouldn’t’ have let someone else get to him. I guarantee you, if Bill got to him first, Sixer would still be on side with this.”

“What makes you so sure?” Kryptos narrowed his eye.

“He has a way with words, remember?” Pyronica snarked, shooting Kryptos a scathing look. “If he can win a battle without stepping foot on the field, then he can win over a human who is clearly already obsessed with him. And he would have done too.”

“But this Sixer betrayed him.” Kryptos reasoned. “Obsession doesn’t roll over that easy.”

“We just have to find out why. Why Six Fingers would do that.” Pyronica pondered, sighing. “Bill made it seem like Six Fingers couldn’t be more enamoured with him just a day before this all went down. We just have to figure out what happened, who intervened? Sure he’s smart, but he couldn’t have figured this out on his own.”

“I thought he was one of Bill’s ‘pet geniuses’.” Kryptos bunched his fingers into air quotes derisively.

“What genius do you know who’s actually smart, huh smart guy?” Pyronica scoffed, and reached out to cuff Kryptos above his eye. “Not you, that’s for sure.”

Kryptos rubbed the back of his eye, scowling, and Pyronica pushed up from her chair, walking around the desk.

“Come on. Follow me.”

Kryptos turned around in the chair, following the clack of Pyronica’s heels as she left the study.

“Where are we going?” He asked, floating along behind her.
“We’re gonna go looking for answers.” Pyronica narrowed her eye and held the study door open for Kryptos.

He floated out, and as he left the room, the next investor in the queue held a withered hand up, croaking out.

“My appointment was next I believe.”

“Your appointment’s cancelled.” Pyronica paused, and narrowed her eyes at the investor, before glaring at the line of waiting investors. “None of you are getting a better deal, so be happy with what you got. And if you got any problems with that…”

Fire flared in the palm of Pyronica’s hand, and the investors all took a step back, fearful of her reputation.

“Then you can bring it up with Bill when he gets back.” Pyronica smiled sweetly at the quivering investors, batting her eyelashes at them. “And he’s far less lenient than I am, so just keep that in mind.”

Clenching her fist and extinguishing the flames, Pyronica turned on her heel and sauntered down the corridor, her heels clacking against the brick flooring. The investors watched her go in shock, and Kryptos, who was always one to take advantage of a situation, floated giddily behind Pyronica, before turning around and stammering.

“Yeah, that’s – that’s right! Deal with it!”

The investors gave him unimpressed looks, but no one made any move to censure Kryptos or retaliate against him, and he grinned, before following Pyronica down the hall.

It was good to have powerful friends.

Ford dumped the red sodden cleaning cloths and his yellow rubber gloves in the bin out the front, feeling inordinately numb.

The numbness was a purposeful device, an aspect of survival. He preferred the numbness to this mental struggle he underwent whenever he allowed himself to feel.

He was struggling with his conscience, wavering over whether he made the right decision back in the clearing or not. Mostly, he was berating himself for wavering at all, mentally castigating himself, calling himself selfish and a myriad of other epithets.

Second guessing the choice he made to save the world was redundant, and if he had prioritised himself and his own happiness over the world’s security, then he was every bit as selfish as he imagined himself to be.

However there was something about scrubbing your partner’s blood from the walls that lent itself to relentless sympathy.

Ford couldn’t deny how much he’d hurt his muse today when the evidence of that hurt was staring him in the face.

Willow had shot him. There was so much blood.

Ford had indirectly authorised that degree of violence, and in a way it felt like Ford was the one who shot his muse, who had pulled the trigger.

He kept picturing his muse’s face, desperate and begging, crying and reaching out for him from behind the salt barrier. He’d sprung this on Bill completely, and Ford kept casting his mind back to how he’d left Bill this morning, wrapped up warm and safe in bed, nestled down under the covers.

It was, Ford had come to realise as he scrubbed the last of the spilled blood from the floor, undoubtedly cruel, what he had done to his muse.

That realisation rankled with Ford, because through all of his studies, and his experience with specimens, the way he conducted his research, he never considered himself to be a cruel man. He always took great pains to conduct his research in a humane way, never striking against a creature that didn’t strike at him first.

Did Bill’s betrayal count as the first strike? Ford didn’t know.

Or perhaps the first strike had been Ford’s all along, perhaps it had been all him, acting out against his muse, herding him, and shooting him, and luring him into the woods, all to trap him in a salt circle and rip him apart particle by particle.

He treated his muse like an animal.

And worst of all, the cruelest thing Stanford had done today…

He made Bill hope.

“Fine, let’s say you’re right. Let’s say I give you a chance.”

The expression, the absolutely trusting, awestruck, optimistic expression that swept across Bill’s features was utterly painful looking back on it. The way his eyes lit up, and his mouth hung open, the trusting way he’d approached Ford, hugging him, pressing grateful kisses to his chin and cheeks.

Ford could still feel the warm brush of Bill’s lips against the side of his mouth, remember how starkly different it had felt to the cold spatter of the rain against his skin. Bill’s warmth felt like a balm, and it was so difficult to withhold himself in that moment, to prevent himself from melting back into Bill’s earnest affection.

The will of steel he seemed to have throughout the entire plot, banishing Bill for the sake of the earth, seemed absent now that Bill was gone, now that the danger had passed.

If there even was any danger at all.

Ford stuffed the bloodied rags in the bin holding the rubber gloves delicately, so the blood wouldn’t get on his skin. He felt as though his hands were red enough already.

Stained by what he’d done today. By the blood he’d surely shed by orchestrating this whole sting.

“Thank you Sixer. You won’t regret it.”

He was already regretting a lot about today, now that Willow wasn’t around to keep him focused on the harm that he’d averted. He could only really think about the harm he’d caused Bill, which was very evident when Ford was cleaning his blood off the floor.

His justification for his fascinatingly grotesque alternative form, with the mouths sprouting from his chest, and the many clawed arms, was Willow’s initial provocation. Ford had brushed it off in the woods, presuming that Willow’s shot had missed, rather ignorantly assuming that she wouldn’t have the stomach to actually land a shot on another human being, thinking this was just Bill’s overreaction.

He kept forgetting that Bill wasn’t a human being. Willow certainly hadn’t.

“Why did you do this?”

“Because she shot at me.”

She certainly did.

Ford had to shove the bloodied rags in the bin to close the lid properly, squashing them down in there. He didn’t know how anyone could bleed so much, and still go on standing, but as his conscience was continually reminding him, Bill wasn’t human.

And he never was, and Ford’s own obsessive desire to humanize the god in order to comprehend him was his own folly. He’d set himself up for failure, for a glorious misunderstanding.

The moment he created that body for Bill he framed the way he wished to perceive the god and let his fondness for the body’s design blind him to the muse’s flaws. Rather than finding Bill’s sadistic, chaotic, dangerous side perturbing, he found it oddly endearing, right down to the shadowy extraneous arms he’d grown the other night when they were together.

Even now Ford was having trouble reconciling his own thoughts with the monstrous reality that was Bill’s altered body. He felt shame, guilt, and that same mental castigation beat down on him as the honest, yearning part of his mind admitted to itself that he didn’t find Bill’s many armed, warped form entirely disgusting, like he should.

He should have been repulsed by the obvious evidence of his muse’s monstrosity, but instead he was fascinated and intrigued. He was trying to let that purposeful numbness flush out the shame he felt when he privately admitted to himself that he didn’t find Bill’s many armed, toothed mouths unattractive. There was something still alluring about the muse that had Stanford forgive all of his eldritch deformities.

Maybe it wasn’t the body that shielded Ford from the muse’s realities, from his innate unpleasantness. Maybe Ford had done that all on his own, and it didn’t matter how pretty the packaging was, or how grotesque. Ford was still drawn to the muse, and his heart still ached for him.

He’d hurt him, and his actions today were cruel.

Was Bill’s betrayal crueller?

Ford was looking for a reason, some kind of justification for his actions.

When he wasn’t alone in the house, with Willow bleeding upstairs in the tub, he found it easy to throw all the blame onto Bill. Of course Bill’s betrayal was greater, of course his lies and misdirection were the more grievous sin, of course the way Bill had jerked around Ford’s feelings meant he deserved everything he had coming to him.
But now that Ford was all alone in the house with no one to provide perspective for him, he felt weaker, and uncertain. The righteous resolve he had that allowed him to power through this plan to save the world, to banish Bill from his body, was fading, and instead it was being replaced by Stanford’s chronic tendency to overthink, and to feel guilty beyond reason for all manner of things.

Yes, Bill had lied to him at the start, and he’d certainly manipulated him, if building the portal was always his main goal. If Ford focused only on that, then it was clear to him that everything that followed after had to be a lie, had to be a grand manipulation to allow Bill his end result, a portal between dimensions and a foothold in this world.

His muse had lied to him.

He was never even a muse, Stanford really needed to stop calling Bill that, he was a chaotic spirit of pure energy with an agenda, and Stanford was simply a successful mark with the resources and intelligence to follow through. If he’d been picked, that was the reason, and not because he was so overwhelmingly special that a god had stopped by to enlighten him.

But even if their initial point of connection was fake, walking through the empty house, scrubbing blood off the walls and pulling cutlery out of the wall, righting what Bill had knocked over in his scuffle, and buffing scorch marks off the furniture, Stanford couldn’t help being struck with endless visceral reminders of how much of their relationship was real.

It was real to Stanford anyway. He couldn’t be sure how much of this was real to Bill, or if it was simply another part of the manipulation.

He could have been playing Ford like a puppet all this time, stringing him along, but still, Ford was coming to realise that for Bill to have him dancing to his tune, there was a lot that Bill didn’t have to do.

Ford rolled the overflowing bin to the front of the driveway, and left it there, before walking back in the house, feeling exhausted.

He knew that Bill didn’t have to do half of what he did for Ford to get him to build the portal. The opportunity in and of itself was enough, to be able to make such a revolutionary machine was motivation enough to get it up and running. Bill could have given him the information and left him to it, keeping his distance while stuck in this body.

He didn’t need to try so hard to make Ford laugh, or to keep him engaged or entertained. He didn’t need to join Ford on his expeditions to study the other specimens in Gravity Falls, or insult his bullies for him, or stand up for him and proudly hold his freakish hands in public. He didn’t need to turn Ford’s salt shaker gold, and replace his broken trophies with newer, better ones built from genuine esteem. He didn’t need to write spells in Ford’s journal, or doodle in the margins, or leave helpful notes where Ford would see them.

Ford recalled the night Bill had shown him a glimpse of the cosmos through his own cosmic eye. The experience was unbelievable, utterly inspiring, and Bill had let Ford inhabit his own mind in that moment, sharing that much of himself with Ford, something he didn’t need to do. He’d taken care of Ford, marched him up to bed when his headache intensified, and sat with him until he fell asleep, stroking his hair as consciousness fled.

When Ford woke up, the flighty and contemptuous muse who he’d summoned, who’d sworn he wouldn’t lift a finger to help Stanford since he bound him in this body, had detailed for him page upon page of the necessary notes he needed to complete his experiment, and for the life of him Ford couldn’t understand what would have motivated the muse to do that.
Bill had brought wonder, and sparkle, and magic to Ford’s life. He’d made equations appear out of thin air, made jam jars dance around his kitchen, shaved a unicorn with him, made Ford feel like he was floating, even when he wasn’t.

He’d done so much for Ford that he didn’t need to, and the worst of Bill’s unnecessary tasks was this.

He didn’t need to make Ford feel so loved.

So loved and wanted. He didn’t need to make Ford exhale into comfort when Bill uttered the word ‘mine’ and he didn’t need to heat Ford up so well when he pressed up close against him, those fiery kisses scorching his skin. He didn’t need to make Ford feel cherished or exceptional every time Ford cooked him a meal, nor did he have to smile at him so brilliantly when he entered a room.

So much of him hurt, was still hurting now, because of how Bill had done more than just manipulate him. He’d made him feel like an equal, like something more than ‘just a worshipper’ or just anything.

His chest was aching now as he stepped into the shack, closing the front door behind him, and he took in the tidied hallway, and the glued down wallpaper, everything back in it’s proper place, and he just felt so lonely without Bill there.

Ford rubbed his forehead and blinked tears from his eyes, trying to reconnect with that life saving numbness he’d accessed before, wanting it back. Feeling like this hurt too much.

He looked down at his hand, and realised that despite his best efforts with the rubber gloves, in pushing the bloodied rags into the bin, Bill’s blood was on his hands now, just a little bit, on the tips of his fingers.

He looked in the hallway mirror and saw Bill’s blood smeared on his forehead like a brand.

Looking at his reflection he couldn’t decide in that moment who the real betrayer was.

He paced into the kitchen and washed his hands, grabbing a tea towel and wetting it, before stomping back out into the hall, standing in front of the hallway mirror and scrubbing the blood from his forehead.

It wiped off quickly, but Ford still felt dirty, and scrubbing at his skin did nothing to assuage that.

Pacing back into the kitchen, he threw the tea towel roughly in the sink, and circled the room, crossly looking for some semblance of control over his emotions. He wanted that numbness back, succumbing to this wave of guilt and loneliness was not tolerable. It was not an option.

Walking angrily to the elevators, he pressed the call lift button, storming through the elevator doors when they opened. He rode the lift down, breathing heavily, trying to hold onto that justifiable anger, so he could justify that he was the one who was betrayed. So he could shirk the guilt that was building like a tsunami behind him, waiting to crash on the shore.

The elevator dinged open, and he strode out into the lab, his shoulder’s squared, ready to stare down the reason why all of this had happened, the true beginning of all this betrayal.

He stood in front of the triangular structure of the portal and tried to sustain his indignant rage that he’d been used, that he’d been screwed over, that he’d been manipulated all along, and for what, for this…this machine.
He clenched his fingers into fists repeatedly and stood in front of the imposing eye of the portal, taking heavy breaths, and he contemplated ending the machine. He contemplated ripping the cords from the wall, unseating the generators, anything to scrap the evidence that he’d been so sorely used, like he’d scrapped all the other evidence of Bill’s dangerous rampage from the house.

He shifted on his feet for a moment, moving his weight back and forth, but he didn’t move.

He just stood there with his hands clenched. Blinking back tears.

“I can’t destroy this. It’s my life’s work.”

That’s what he’d said to Fiddleford. Whether it was due to Bill’s intervention or not, this portal was still the scientific height of his career. It was his life’s work.

“This portal and what comes after – it’s my life’s work.”

Bill had looked at him, beseeching him to understand. His bright yellow eyes were wide, imploring him, and Stanford had stabbed him in the back.

“You expect me to give up my life’s work for you, but you won’t give up your life’s work for me?”

Perhaps they weren’t so different.

The sob that Stanford was trying to suppress welled up in his throat, and he choked on it, trying to swallow the emotion away. He spluttered, and his eyes watered, tears slipping out.

His breath hitched, and the sob that was stuck in his throat found a voice, echoing in the silent, empty lab. He wiped his eyes with his sleeve, but still the tears kept coming, and his sniffles sounded louder in the lab than they had any right to.

He’d come down here to let the sight of the portal justify his actions today, to make it apparent that he’d been manipulated from the start, but all he could see was the invention that brought them both together, and formed the initial connection between them. All he could see was an invention that meant so much to the both of them, that they’d both worked so hard on, that had done so much for the both of them, and had ruined everything for the both of them in the end.

Stanford’s sobs caught in his throat more frequently now, and the pain in his chest intensified. It almost felt like he was hyperventilating, he felt like he couldn’t breathe for the pain, yet the sobs forced their way up his throat, tears staining his face wet with salty trails.

His legs felt weak as the reality of the day dawned on him all at once, and they gave out beneath him. He dropped to his knees, and fell down, his hands clenched against the dirt floor, tears catching on his glasses and falling to the ground relentlessly.

Gritting his teeth and screaming his anguish out in the empty lab, Ford yelled wordlessly, and beat his fist against the ground, his shoulders shaking as he cried.

“There really is no one you can trust.” Bill’s last words to Stanford were haunting him, as the portal so desperately reminded him of everything that he’d lost today. “So much for your destiny.”

Ford’s composure fell apart, dissolving as surely as Bill’s body had, and he yelled out his frustration and sadness into the empty lab, clenching his fists in the dirt, kneeling in front of his destiny yet having it so surely out of reach.

He sobbed for hours, his heartbreak and betrayal from the day catching up with him, rebounding on him twice as hard for his attempted repression. It came over him in a devastating wave of helplessness.

He cried relentlessly, dehydrating himself but not wanting to move from this spot in front of what was meant to be his triumph. It was meant to be their triumph, together.

It just wasn’t fair. This was his destiny, it was supposed to be his destiny, and Bill betrayed him. He’d lied to him from the beginning.

Then why did Stanford feel so terrible?

“ANSWER ME YOU USELESS HACK! YOU DID THIS ON PURPOSE! YOU DID THIS TO ME ON PURPOSE! EVERY BIT OF IT FROM THE BEGINNING! DIDN’T YOU?”

Ford clutched his stomach, hugging himself, and laid down on his side, his tears dripping down into the dirt below his face as he stared at the portal, despondent beyond all belief.

He’d never felt so betrayed.

He missed his muse.

He wished all of this had never happened.

He thought about curses, how terrified Willow had been of them, but with this anger and betrayal and endless guilt roiling about in his stomach, he could only think about himself, and his own pain, and how none of this would have happened if destiny hadn’t brought him here.

“Curse the world.” Ford muttered bitterly, his cheeks damp, hugging his arms around himself. “Curse this town. Curse the fate that brought me here.”

The portal lights twinkled at him, indifferent to his despair. The Behenian fixed stars that had seemed so magical when Bill pointed them out to him, reclining lazily in the portals eye, now seemed to mock him, sparkling with backlit blue, reminding him of the myriad of wonderful exotic places he could now never go to.

Past words of hope were haunting him, breaking his spirit down further.

“You did this. You’re the Man Who Changed the World. And now it’s all yours to explore.”

Stanford thought this was his destiny, but now it was all just a bitter lie. He thought he reached the pits of despair and betrayal when Fiddleford left, but he didn’t even know the feeling then. Not like he did now.

“He left, he’s gone.” Ford had uttered, back when Fiddleford had left after the disastrous portal test, despondent of the fact. “And now I’m alone.”

“No you’re not.”

Ford’s throat felt tight as he wailed miserably, his tears flowing dejectedly down into the soil.

“You’re not alone.”

Another pretty lie, and like a fool, Ford had believed it.

Bill had lied to him, deceived him, and now he was gone thanks to Ford’s actions. His muse was gone, and he was now more alone than ever.
Ford was tired of this hurt, and he was tired from all that he’d done today, all the cleaning, and plotting, and betrayal and the shame he felt from all of it.

Laying there in the dirt, his cheeks still damp, he closed his eyes, and hoped for numbness once again.

It hurt to be awake.

It hurt to feel.

Kryptos hadn’t been in this part of the Quadrangle before.

Considering the structure was always moving, it’s corridors twisting and warping as it pleased, there was a great deal of the Quadrangle that he hadn’t explored.

It was also possible that whenever he found a ‘new’ room, it was a place he’d been in before but simply didn’t recognise, the Quadrangle changed so much.

Another possibility was that the Quadrangle twisted itself in circles for the sake of confusing its occupants. Kryptos always seemed lost in this massive labyrinth, he could never find the good stuff.

Though Pyronica never seemed to have any difficulties finding her goal.

She turned left down the end of the corridor purposefully, and paused beside a nondescript brick wall, resting her flaming palm against the surface, concentrating.

Kryptos watched her and mimicked her movements, sticking his own palm out flat against the wall.

The mortar around the bricks lit up an angry red, and a loud BZZT noise sounded out in the corridor.

Pyronica tsked and shot Kryptos a look.

“Can you move your hand? I’m trying to get us in.”

“Why don’t I get to do it?” Kryptos asked, removing his hand from the wall reluctantly.

“You know why.” Pyronica gave Kryptos a scornful glance, before applying herself to her task again, focusing on the brick wall.

Kryptos sulked, and looked around the corridor, pouting. Gradually, as Pyronica focused on burning her handprint in the surface of the brick wall, the mortar between the bricks began glowing an ambient pink, the colour brightening and intensifying, until it lit up yellow with a pleasant sounding ‘ping’.

The bricks split down the middle and slid open, revealing a secret corridor.
Pyronica looked down at Kryptos smugly. “That’s how it’s done.”

She paced down the secret corridor, Kryptos floating behind her.

“But how did you do it?”

“Not telling.”

“Pyronicaaaa.”

The doorway slid shut, bricks sealing them both in, mortar melting over once more.

The corridor was dark for a while, Pyronica’s flames lighting their path, before the hallway levelled out into a wide, high ceilinged room, every available surface covered with oval shaped mirrors, reflecting different mindscapes.

The room glittered, different dreams playing out in muted tones on the hundreds of mirrors. They shimmered, standing out against the black brick walls. The mortar in this room glowed, thrumming with Bill’s magic, the colours constantly shifting through the full electromagnetic spectrum. It was dazzling to behold.

Pyronica looked up around the room and sighed. She missed Bill.

“Wow! What is this room? This place is amazing!” Kryptos gushed, floating by Pyronica’s knee. “How long has this been here? Bill’s never showed me this.”

“Why would he?” Pyronica looked down at Kryptos. “You’re a rat.”

“Compass.” Kryptos corrected her, sounding offended.

“You’re a snitch.” Pyronica corrected him, and bent down to point at his chest. “A no good, disloyal, brown nosing, cowardly, dirt scraping snitch. Bill never showed you this place, because why should he? He doesn’t trust you.”

“Then – why are you showing me this place?” Kryptos questioned warily.

“Because – Bill can’t kill you because of your deal. My hands aren’t tied like that.” Pyronica let the fire on her hands burn a little hotter, singing the compass’s chest. He yelped, and she smirked a little, before dulling her fire down and patting embers off his small quivering frame. “I’m showing you because I feel like it, and I’m generous like that, but that could change at any time. So don’t tell anyone about this place, got it?”

“Got it.” Kryptos nodded briskly, his hands covering his chest timidly.

Pyronica straightened up and looked around the shimmering room, looking somewhat less assured now, the corners of her lips turning down at the edges. Looking over the magic of Bill’s private dream room reminded her of her friend, and made his absence all the more keen.

“Besides.” She said, sounding far away, lost in her thoughts. “I hate being alone.”

Kryptos blinked up at her, shocked by her admittance, and felt a twinge of sympathy twist through his cosmic soul.

The melancholic set of her jaw moved him, or maybe it was all that time they’ve been spending together on the battlefield, either way, it jarred Kryptos to hear Pyronica admit vulnerability. And it jarred him even more to hear that she felt so alone that she even found his company preferable.
He was under the impression that Pyronica couldn’t stand him.

Prodding his thumbs together, mulling that over, he looked up at her, his voice overtly cheerful as he changed the topic, trying to brighten her mood some.

“So, what are we doing?”

“We’re gonna find Sixer’s dream mirror, and poke around a bit to see if we can find out why he turned on Bill.” Pyronica said, businesslike once more, walking around the room looking for the right frame. “It can’t have happened without some kind of catalyst, it wasn’t too long ago that he thought the world of Bill.”

“How’d he manage that?” Kryptos grumbled, floating along the walls to help Pyronica search for the right mirror.

“You may not like the human, but they had a connection.” Pyronica spoke as she searched for the human’s mindscape mirror. “You heard Bill back in the penthouse, he was gonna keep him. All those energy cubes in the safe room, you know the one’s you complained about stacking because they were too hot to touch? Every single one of those is filled to the brim with Sixer’s worship juice. He must have worshipped the ground Bill walked on, but it’s more than that. Bill was treating him like an equal. He had to be more than just a worshipper.”

“What makes him so special?” Kryptos complained, floating along the wall of mirrors, stopping every so often to curiously look inside some of the colourful mindscape portals.

“I don’t know.” Pyronica answered, tapping her chin as she looked. “Maybe he wasn’t special. Maybe the thing that made him special was that Bill thought he was. I can’t say. Sometimes the things we’re drawn to don’t make sense to us until we understand how they complete us. Fate is funny like that.”

“You think it’s fate that drew them together?” Kryptos questioned, raising his eyebrow at that. “You believe in that?”

“I don’t like fate any more than Bill does.” Pyronica responded, shaking her head, her fingers hovering over the mirrors as she peered through each of them, looking for the right one. “But some things align in ways we can’t explain. Six Fingers shouldn’t have mattered to Bill, but somehow he did, and maybe that’s not a bad thing.”

Kryptos gave Pyronica a sideways glance, sounding amused. “I never took you for a romantic.”

That startled a laugh out of Pyronica, and she looked over at Kryptos, grinning. “Shut up. Don’t think I won’t throw you into those night terrors.”

She pointed at the stand over in the corner of the room, where small globes full of swirling night terrors were placed, like wine on a wine rack, waiting to be cracked open. Kryptos looked over to the night terrors curiously, and floated over to examine them.

“Aha! Found it!” Pyronica called out, triumphant, and pulled a mirror from the mass of mirrors on the wall. Unlike the other mirrors, Stanford’s mirror was more ornate than the others, with a gold frame around the edge, detailed with bricks and triangles.

Pyronica stifled a laugh, snorting as she looked at the mirror.

“Yes, this is definitely his. Looks like Sixer’s the golden boy.”
Kryptos picked up one of the night terror orbs and examined it closely, holding it up in front of his eye, trying to pick out the details within. The craftwork was fascinating. When he heard Pyronica speak he looked briefly over his shoulder at her, taking in the fancy gold frame.

“Ugh. Talk about favouritism.”

“Don’t worry Kryptos, I’d never accuse you of being anyone’s favourite. Ever.” Pyronica rolled her eye, smirking at the compass.

She brought the mirror with her as she sat down cross legged on the floor, and patted the ground beside her expectantly.

“You want me to look?” Kryptos questioned hesitantly, inwardly he was exalting at the prospect of being able to poke around inside the Sixer human’s head, to find out exactly why this creature seemed set to climb the hierarchical chain after only a measly year.

Showing him this mirror didn’t seem particularly wise, given how easily he could use this information against people, against the human, against Bill. Pyronica was strong on the battlefield, but one of her weaknesses was that she was too trusting.

Pyronica patted the ground beside her again. “Come on. Two eyes are better than one.”

Kryptos couldn’t argue with that and floated to sit beside her. He rolled the night terror bubble between his hands and leaned in to look at the mirror’s screen.

“Looks like he just got to sleep.” Pyronica ascertained, watching Sixer’s organised mental library drift into various colours, as his subconscious rose to the fore.

The mirror shimmered, and drifted into focus just as Ford’s mind chose to, though it didn’t seem tonight was a night of lucid dreaming. He wasn’t accessing his mindscape now, pouring through the shelves of books and memories. No, tonight he was at the mercy of his hippocampus and amygdala, conscious thought taking the back seat as his mind processed the rollercoaster that his day had been.

The mirror went dark briefly, as though Stanford were blinking, before looking up at the completed image of the trans-dimensional portal. It’s lights were on, a pleasant glow humming smooth electrical noises out in the lab, the soothing melody of scientific discovery lulling Ford’s emotions into a delicate state.

“It’s our party door.” Pyronica whispered, keeping her voice hushed. She didn’t want to influence the dreamscape just yet.

“What’s he doing? He’s just staring at it?” Kryptos questioned, frowning at the mirror.

“The mirror only shows you what he’s seeing, hearing. You’ve gotta press one hand to the frame if you want to know what he’s feeling.” Pyronica explained to Kryptos, before tentatively trailing her fingers forward to brush against the frame.

“See?” Pyronica rested her fingertips against the gold frame solidly, and her shoulders tensed up instantly. She sucked in a sharp breath, and Kryptos looked at her, worried.

“What, what is it?”

“He’s …” Pyronica watched Stanford simply stare up at the portal, taking in its pleasantly blinking colours and lovingly crafted symbols, and she let her shoulders sag, exhaling slowly. “He’s sad.”
“Sad?” Kryptos asked, sounding almost indignant.

“He’s so –” Pyronica’s brow furrowed, and she chewed on her bottom lip, staring at the mirror. “But I don’t understand.”

“You know, if you stare at it for too long, you’ll go blind.” Bill’s voice rang out, and for a moment, both Pyronica and Kryptos jumped, looking cautiously around the mirror room, before they realised their boss’s voice was coming from Six Finger’s dream. “Or is that if you do something else?”

The tone of Sixer’s dream shifted into something bittersweet, still sad, but laced with so much longing and joy that it all twisted up in a painful bundle as he raised his head and looked behind him.

The view of the mirror shifted, turning to look at a dark skinned human with bright yellow eyes, leaning against the doorway to the lab, his arms crossed, watching Ford with amusement.

“That’s staring into the sun.” Ford replied, his voice sounding tired and indulgent. “And you shouldn’t know about the other things, though I can assure you they’re patently untrue. A conservative myth.”

“Scientifically disproven, is that it?” Bill questioned, and walked across the room to stand next to Ford, who was sitting on the floor. “Did you get a trophy for that too? Or just a standing ovation?”

“Hah hah.” Ford laughed, somewhat sarcastically.

“What are they talking about?” Kryptos asked, somewhat confused, still rolling the dream globe between his hands, fidgety.

“I’ll tell you when you’re older.” Pyronica joked, having seen it all before with her human worshipper.

Ford’s gaze shifted back to the portal, taking in its details, but she could feel from her fingertips pressed to the mirror’s frame the sensation of Bill’s warm hand resting on his (her) shoulder, and it gave her shivers down her spine, how intrinsically ‘Bill’ the gesture felt, despite the human vessel he inhabited. He really hadn’t held back with Sixer, Pyronica could feel an accurate remembrance of Bill’s essence in the dream, right down to the way his hands were always hot like muted fire.

Her loneliness ached the same way Stanford’s did, longing for her triangular best friend’s company the same way Sixer ached for Bill’s touch, their emotions refracting against each other and compounding.

Pyronica felt sympathy well up inside her for Six Fingers, and it was fit to overflowing when Ford reached up in the dream and rested his hand over Bill’s. She reached up with her free hand, still feeling what Sixer felt, and put her hand on her own shoulder, just to feel the connection.

“How does achieving your destiny feel, smart guy?” Dream Bill asked Stanford, giving his shoulder a squeeze. “Do you feel accomplished, exalted, hungry, or much the same?”

Pyronica could feel a positive response on the tip of Ford’s tongue, before the honesty of his subconscious overrode the idyllic narrative of the dream.

“It would feel better, if you were really here with me.” Ford sighed, and looked down at the ground. “But you’re not, as much as I want you to be, and this is just a dream.”
Pyronica let go of the mirror frame quickly, holding her hand back like she’d been burned.

“What? What is it?” Kryptos asked, clutching onto the night terror bubble anxiously.

“Is he lucid dreaming?” Pyronica asked, watching the mirror cautiously with a wide eye. “If he is, this could be too dangerous. I didn’t know he could lucid dream so easily.”

“How is it dangerous? He’s in there, and we’re here.” Kryptos argued, reaching forward with his free hand, wanting to see more of the dream. “He’s not going to notice.”

Ford sighed, and continued to rub Bill’s hand soothingly, holding it to his shoulder, unwilling to let go, dream or no.

“Kryptos don’t!” Pyronica warned the compass, raising her voice, but he reached out anyway, his gloved hand resting on the gold gilt frame.

“Is someone -?” Ford started, looking around in the dream, the image in the mirror swinging back and forth.

The dream changed, and the portal wavered, like a mirage, showing hints of a barley field behind.

Kryptos froze up when his hand touched the frame, shocked by the intensity of human emotion, unused to the spectrum of it. While Sixer was looking, something was materialising in his hand, a laser gun, part of his mental defences it seemed. The gun solidified into reality, and Ford gripped it tight.

Kryptos squeaked in fright, his hand gripping a little too tight on the night terror bubble, and it broke, shattering open.

“Kryptos!” Pyronica shrieked and scrambled back.

Both henchmaniacs jumped and leaned out of the way as the whirling smoke escaped the broken globe, seeking a mind to inhabit. With Kryptos and Pyronica leaning backwards, there was only one place left for the night terror to go, and it seeped into the surface of the mirror, tinting the glass a murky yellow.

There was a boom, and Sixer’s emotions projected out loudly in the room, like a mushroom cloud of human empathy, spanning about a metre around the mirror, affecting the henchmaniacs without them having to touch the frame.

Bill’s hand on Ford’s shoulder curled, gripping tight into his flesh, and Ford began to feel pain as his muse’s hands became clawed and monstrous. Pyronica and Kryptos felt a similar pain in their shoulders and panicked.

“How do you make it stop?” Kryptos questioned fearfully, scrambling back out of the cloud’s reach.

“I don’t know! This is your fault!” Pyronica called back, worried, torn between leaving the cloud, and watching the events play out on the mirror.

Ford’s emotions were still projecting, he could feel Bill leaning down, his face all too close as he whispered in Ford’s ear.

“You’ve been blind from the start.”
Ford swung around, and instinctively fired a shot, the laser gun striking through the heart of the dream.

It felt like the bottom dropped out of Ford’s stomach as he watched, wide eyed with shock, as Bill stood before him, with a baseball sized hole burnt through his chest, bleeding profusely.

Ford panicked, and threw the gun away, flinging his hands forward, trying to help.

“I’m sorry, it – it was an accident –“

“You shot me.” Bill said blankly, watching Ford with hurt, betrayed yellow eyes. “With my laser gun.”

“It isn’t –“ Ford stammered, feeling overwhelmingly guilty.

“I made it for you.” Bill stepped into Stanford’s space aggressively, holding his hand over his heart, still bleeding copious amounts of thick, dark blood. He threw his hand out, gesturing at Stanford, and blood splattered against the lenses of Ford’s glasses, making him flinch back. Bill’s voice was warping, sounding impossibly deep, layered upon itself, echoing spitefully throughout the room, and the blood continued to drip from his chest, drops turning into sharp yellow teeth that twisted out of his flesh. “I gave you everything, and you throw it back in my face?”

“I don’t –“ Stanford looked between Bill, and the portal, and panicked, seeing the portal shimmering like a disappearing mirage.

Bill was pacing around him in the dream, a lolling black tongue protruding from the hole in his chest, making wet schlicking sounds as the mouth licked its bloodied teeth. Bill’s voice was echoing in strange incomprehensible ways, and Ford could feel the hair at the back of his neck stand on end as Bill brushed past him, standing behind him.

“You could never have done this without me. You’re useless, weak, boring and unimaginative. A forgotten footnote in history. You’re nothing without me. So much for your destiny.” Bill hissed at him, and Ford lurched forward, towards the shimmering portal, his hands out trying desperately to prevent its disappearance.

Before he got very far, he was halted, by hundreds of small, shadowy hands, gripping onto him. Ford struggled, and fought against the hands, but more and more gripped onto him, pulled him back, until he was drowning in an endless black abyss of shadow.

It was dark, and he felt something wet on his arm, something licking him, and he turned around to find himself face to face with Bill, his glowing yellow eyes the only source of light in the dark.

His breath caught in his throat, an odd mixture of longing and caution, as his muse leaned forward, cupping his chin in his hands, his many hands, brushing his lips against Ford’s own.

He wavered for a moment, uncertain, before he leaned into the kiss, wanting Bill any way he could get him. As he reached out to hold Bill in his arms, the muse pulled away, disintegrating into a fine gold mist.

“No!” Ford called out, swiping through the mist, trying to bring Bill back. He ran through the mist, trying to pick up the particles and push them back together, but they trickled through his fingers, dissipating into the darkness.

He was alone, surrounded by silence and nothingness, feeling as empty as his surroundings, when he heard it, the sound of Bill’s voice catching.
“How could you do this to me?”

He spun around, looking for his muse, but he couldn’t see him, and suddenly he was back in the barley field he’d been lost in when he was eleven, abandoned and frightened, left behind once again.

He pushed through the stems of barley, seeking his muse, or anybody really, to no avail.

“Come back!” Ford yelled out, his voice fading away in the empty space. “Please! Don’t leave me here.”

His shoulders slumped, hearing nothing but the whistle of the wind through the barley, and he turned around, dejected, only to see the portal’s frame towering above him, the barley fanning against the base.

Ford stepped over the generators, approaching the portal’s eye, where Bill reclined as he once had, his hands laced together, resting over the hole in his chest. He seemed pensive, and resigned, almost sad.

“I really thought you were special, you know?”

LIES.

A voice whispered on the wind, blowing through the portal’s eye, ruffling Bill’s hair.

“What is that?” Pyronica squinted, and tried to inch back over to the mirror, braving the cloud of human emotion to get a closer look.

“You were different. I wanted you to be different.” Bill continued to speak, as Stanford pushed through the barley, wanting to be closer to his muse. “A freak, like me.”

DON’T BELIEVE HIS LIES.

The wind whistled, the voice contained within commanding and insidious.

“You made me feel things.”

The voice whirled about Stanford, whipping him with the scratchy barley. It gusted around him, pushing him back as he tried to reach the portal, flinging his glasses off his face as he pressed forwards.

You think yourself special? Tis a fabrication. He is using you.

Ford gritted his teeth, and made to press on through the gale, his coat weighing him down.

He made you feel chosen, another lie, like he has lied to all those other poor deluded scientists.

Ford shrugged off his coat jacket, and let it fly back, hurled away by the wind.

He deliberately put one foot in front of the other, doggedly making his way over to Bill, who still wasn’t looking at him. He was playing idly with the tongue that poked out of his chest, dancing his fingers above the mouth as the abyssal jaws snapped at him playfully.

Ford reached his six fingered hand out in front of him, aware that it made him a freak, wanting to be the kind of different his muse believed he was.
He was never a muse, he was a monster.

Bill grinned at the mouth on his chest, amused by it, before looking up at Stanford, his gaze unexpectedly soft.

Open your eyes. Piece together the details scientist. He is using you.

“That voice -?” Pyronica squinted at the mirror, suspicious.

“Be mine Sixer?” Bill asked, still smiling benevolently at Ford, holding his hand out to the scientist. “From now, until the end of time?”

Ford stumbled forward and thrust his hand into Bill’s, wanting everything he had to offer and more.

Suddenly Bill pulled him forward by the hand, and Ford felt something hard and cold press into his stomach. He heard the familiar whir of the laser gun warming up, and he looked up at Bill’s face, the muse now grinning viciously, holding him at gunpoint with his own invention.

“You were always blind Sixer.” Bill’s smile was like a knife, and his slitted eyes captured Stanford, disarming him thoroughly. “If you were stupid enough to believe the lie in the first place, maybe you deserved to be tricked.”

The wind howled around the two of them, as Bill pulled Ford in closer to him and sealed their lips together, kissing him possessively.

Ford was keenly aware of Bill’s finger pulling the trigger, just as the wind shouted aggressively at him.

OPEN YOUR EYES!

With a shout, Pyronica reeled back from the mirror, as the night terror rose from the surface of the glass and exploded, signalling the end of the dream.

Panting, shocked by the strong emotions she’d been put through, braving closer to the mirror, she looked into the dark reflection, rubbing her chest to free her from this phantom anxiety.

The mirror was no longer responsive. Sixer must have woken up.

Exhaling, and flopping back, her elbows resting on the floor of the dream room, she wiped her forehead, and rubbed one of her horns in consternation.

“Was that – is it over?” Kryptos asked from across the other side of the room. While Pyronica had braved the cloud of emotion, Kryptos had fled its influence, cowering over by the door as far from the danger as he possibly could be. Now that the empathy cloud extinguished its presence, he began creeping back across the room, floating over to the pink cyclops. “Are you okay?”

“Ugh.” Pyronica groaned, and sat up, letting go of her horn.

“Pyronica? Are you okay?” Kryptos fretted, floating up by her elbow.

She glared at Kryptos and her hand shot out, yanking his tongue from his mouth and gripping onto it dangerously.

“I show you this room, and you sabotage me?”
“Unhn uuhh.” Kryptos uttered, shaking his head frantically, holding his hands up.

“You picked up a night terror globe, and you didn’t put it back?” She narrowed her eye and yanked him closer to her, furious. “You just happened to shatter it right on Six Finger’s mirror? You were planning this all along, weren’t you?”

“Ahn dnidn’t –“ Kryptos insisted, his speech distorted.

“I should just rip out your tongue now, so you don’t go spilling all of Bill’s secrets to everyone, like a dirty little snitch. We came in here to help him!”

“Scho did ahh!” Kryptos asserted, looking desperately up at the cyclops. Her grip was heating up, and he was nervous. She was almost burning his tongue.

“Give me one good reason why I should believe you?” Pyronica demanded.

“Becauh –“ Pyronica released his tongue, and Kryptos swallowed nervously, before speaking again. “Because, we – we’d both get in trouble if Bill knew we were in here. And I didn’t – I’d never been in a human’s head before. I didn’t know – I – sure I don’t like the guy, but that wasn’t planned. At least not that way!”

“But you were planning it.” Pyronica clarified, watching Kryptos sweat.

“You’re the one who mentioned the night terrors in the first place!” Kryptos pointed out, but shrunk back when Pyronica clenched her fist. “I just wanted to look at them, I wasn’t going to do anything. I – I was surprised, the human shocked me! I didn’t think he’d have a gun.”

“You said so yourself, he’s in there, and you’re out here.” Pyronica growled at the compass.

“You said it could be dangerous!” Kryptos threw his hands out emphatically. “I was just listening to you!”

“And now you’ve seen too much.” Pyronica surmised, and fire raced up her arms.

Keeping his hands in the air in front of him, words tumbled out of Kryptos’ mouth, anything he could say to save his own skin. “I – I’m not going to say anything. I didn’t know – I didn’t know the human and Bill were, that they were like that – I wasn’t – I mean I don’t – I get it! I get why he’s special now!”

“Do you?” Pyronica quirked her brow at the compass, waiting for his answer.

“Human emotions are scary, and more complicated than I gave them credit for.” Kryptos sighed, and frowned at the cyclops. “I – he was thinking so many different things at once, but it’s obvious he cares about Bill, and he’s loyal! At least half of that nightmare was memory, and it felt enough like Bill that maybe, just maybe, the boss liked him back. The human didn’t mean to betray him, he felt like – like he had to. It was that voice.”

“Then you heard it too?” Pyronica’s flames dimmed, and she blinked at Kryptos, concerned again.

“It wasn’t human. But it was a memory.” Kryptos ascertained. “Someone was communicating with him.”

“Someone familiar.” Pyronica rubbed her chin, thinking. “I just can’t put my finger on who. I’ve heard that voice before.”
“Then, we have a lead. We can tell the boss that this Sixer’s been influenced.” Kryptos said excitedly, but Pyronica’s serious expression cut him off.

“We can’t tell Bill.” Kryptos’ excitement slid off his face, and he gaped at her, his mouth hanging open.

“We can’t tell Bill.” Pyronica repeated. “Not now, while he’s like this, while he’s hurting. I – he values his privacy. He’s killed people before for knowing too much about him, old friends even. Sixer’s mind is too honest, the way he sees Bill, it makes him look vulnerable. He doesn’t let that story exist about him, he just doesn’t. He’ll definitely kill you for seeing this without his permission.”

“But – our deal –” Kryptos stammered.

“Or he’ll make me kill you.” Pyronica clapped her hands against her cheeks, and dragged her fingers down to her chin, fretting. “And I’ll definitely get at least several centuries of the cold shoulder for this. No, Bill can’t know. He can’t know we know.”

“Then what do we do?”

Pyronica thought on that, before clapping her hands together. “We investigate. If we tell Bill we snooped without having answers, he’ll get mad at us both, but if we come to him with answers, and a new target to be mad at, then this whole situation will blow away. You just have to keep - your mouth - shut.”

“I can do that.” Kryptos insisted, holding his hands up defensively.

“You better.” Pyronica said, as she picked herself up off the floor, standing up straight. Fixing her hair in one of the dream mirrors, she straightened her shoulders, and nodded at her reflection, before pointing at the corridor that led to the exit. “Shall we go?”

Kryptos nodded and floated along behind her as she opened the dream room up into the main Quadrangle again. He followed her down the winding corridors, the clack of her heels becoming a comforting staccato to offset the pulse of his heartbeat after that unsettling experience.

Talk about nerve wracking, experiencing human emotions like regret, and love.

He shuddered, disgusted by the whole thing, reluctantly admitting that Sixer’s love might have been what made him so damn appealing to the Boss in the first place. That must esteem and affection from someone felt nauseating, but addictive in a way. Not that Kryptos would know. No one was that sickeningly infatuated with him.

As he followed Pyronica through to the main hallway, he saw the candelabras on the wall sputter, the flames that lit them swaying unnaturally in the windless corridors, dimming the lights somewhat, before returning to full brightness.

Pyronica noticed the lights too, and began walking faster, picking up the pace until she was running across the main hall, flinging the door to Bill’s study open.

There, in the study, Bill floated, scouring through the cabinets in the room looking for something.

“You’re back!” Pyronica enthused breathlessly, relieved to see her friend back in one piece.

“Where’s my stash?” Bill asked snappily, barely looking up at the cyclops.
“Oh, boss!” Kryptos exclaimed, floating along behind Pyronica, surprised to see Bill back so soon.

“I need a drink. Kryptos.” He snapped his fingers impatiently, indicating that the compass should jump to it.

Kryptos blinked for a moment, before teleporting out into the wine cellar, arriving back with a bottle of Bill’s favourite celestial champagne.

“Is this vintage fine Sir?” Kryptos asked, but Bill interrupted him, shaking his head and waving his hand at the compass.

“I mean the heavy stuff.” Bill scowled, turning around to narrow his eye at the compass. “Bring me the Cosmic Sand.”

“Sir?” Kryptos hesitated, knowing exactly how heavy Cosmic Sand could be. It was the strongest alcoholic substance in the multiverse.

“Now!” Bill glared at Kryptos dangerously, and the compass meeped, before teleporting away to retrieve it.

He poofed back into the room with the decanter of Cosmic Sand, and pulled a crystal champagne flute from under the wrists of his glove, setting the glass on the desktop, before uncorking the beverage.

Bill sat in his desk chair, and held his hand up, palm flat, at Kryptos, halting him.

“Leave the bottle.”

He waved his hand at Kryptos, dismissing him, and the compass looked over to Pyronica, frowning, before he teleported out of the room.

Pyronica lingered in the doorway, watching Bill pull the bottle of Cosmic Sand over to him from across the desk, his arms noodling out long before pulling back in.

“I’m glad you’re back.” She spoke up, sounding uncharacteristically timid, possibly still wary of Bill’s backlash after having sent him back to his childhood home to have his meltdown.

Bill examined the champagne flute Kryptos brought, before melting it down into glowing red sand between his palms, putting the melted champagne flute, now a twisted lump of glass, like an ornament on his desktop to replace the old ones he’d broken.

He picked up the decanter of Cosmic Sand and took a swig straight from the bottle.

Pyronica shifted awkwardly, before trying again. “Do you want company?”

“No.” Bill didn’t even look at her, he just looked at the melted glass on his desk, rolling it across the desktop with his fingertips. He took another swig from the bottle, and waved his hand again.

Pyronica felt the floor move under her feet, the bricks she was standing on sliding back out into the corridor, depositing her there. Bill waved his hand again, and the door swung closed in her face, leaving him in there alone with the bottle of Cosmic Sand.

Pyronica walked forward and put her hand against the door, offended, trying to get in again, but the door shifted into a brick wall, and no matter how hard she pressed her hand against it, it wouldn’t open for her.
She exhaled, frustrated, and looked at the black wall, her friend behind it, getting utterly trashed, it seemed.

Kicking the wall angrily, Pyronica stubbed her toe against the bricks, and hopped on one foot, hissing, holding her ankle and rubbing her hurt toe.

“Ow. Bill.” She gritted out, glaring at the door, before she let go of her ankle, and redistributed her weight.

Huffing out a sigh, Pyronica turned on her heel and tossed her hair over her shoulder, striding away purposefully, thinking violent thoughts.

This was all Sixer’s fault.

All of it.

Chapter End Notes

This chapter is dedicated to JudeClee, because I am overjoyed that you like Willow and all these lovely side characters as much as I do. Poor Willow, it sucks being cursed, but hey, at least there's an Abba song for it.

When I said Pyronica will deliver some words of wisdom that are not so wise, I must have meant in the next chapter she does that. She does plenty of unwise things here too, but at this point we can just assume that everyone's going to screw up on their own steam bit by bit.

I hope you enjoy the chapter! Thank you as always for reading, reviewing, and enjoying this fic!
But in time you will understand. That the dreams we dreamt were made of sand.

Chapter Notes

Just a heads up, this chapter contains a lot of rather graphic nightmares, featuring gore and torture, as well as the implications of non consensual fantasies, which take the form of another nightmare. If these subjects concern you please proceed with caution.

The sound of the clock on the wall in Ford’s living room seemed louder than it had any right to be, the strikingly audible tick tock competing with the buzzing radio, fumbling static through the frequency, advertisements chiming in regularly.

“Are you hankering for a used car at a bargain? Well, come to a place where everyone’s your buddy –“

The pen Ford was chewing on slipped from between his lips and poked up into his nostril, startling him into a more present state of wakefulness.

He sniffed, and pinched his nose, wiping the end of his pen on his trousers, straining to keep his eyes open as he stared at the printouts on the table in front of him.

“The Bud Senior’s Automotive Sales Yard is the place to be for used cars for the right price.”

He’d been going over the notes on the portal, trying to figure out if there was any slight chance that he could still use it without engendering the apocalypse the voice in the ring had assured him would come to pass if he let Bill stay here.

Apart from the debilitating night terrors Ford had been experiencing whenever he closed his eyes for the past six weeks, he’d had no visitations from his muse, no sign that Bill had found some sort of loophole through which to return to Earth.

Well, he’d seen his muse in his dreams technically, but something just felt off about that.

He wasn’t sure if it was Bill he was seeing, or just his own guilty conscience, churning up endless night terrors that had him wake up screaming, sweating bullets. While in his dreams his muse had done plenty of speaking, throwing sweet nothings and broken promises in his face along with all sorts of manipulative vitriol, they hadn’t actually communicated with each other at all.

Even once Ford put effort back into lucid dreaming, he hadn’t got a coherent sentence out of the Bill he met in his dreams, only scathing, guilt tripping, gut wrenching horror.

It was enough to make him miss Bill. The real Bill. Despite his paranoia and anxiety telling him otherwise on occasion, Ford was 78% sure that the muse he saw in his dreams was not Bill. Not really.

He felt lonely. Tired and incredibly lonely.
“Buy a Buick for a good buck! We’ve got Mustangs, we’ve got your Quattros, we’ve got your Fords, we’ve got it all down at Bud’s!”

The clock kept ticking.

Ford had, for want of a purpose, gone over all the alchemy books and spell books that he had, wanting to know if his actions were indeed as permanent and irrevocable as they seemed to be. Judging from the complete lack of any lingering signs of an apocalypse, Ford’s spell-work was airtight, but that didn’t reassure him the way it should have done.

He might feel better about the whole situation if he had some sliver of communication with his muse, some way to ask for the explanations he hadn’t thought to consider when the world was on the line, or so it seemed. Now he was alone, his muse banished, and he was left with more questions than he had answers to.

Pinching the corners of his eyes, blinking away his tiredness, he looked to the bronze ring that sat in a beaker on the edge of the coffee table.

“Still nothing to say, hmm?” Ford asked the ring, which sat, stagnant and silent, the stone capping the ring a dull ebony now, no longer that shining blue.

After several more seconds of telling silence from the ring, Ford sighed, and leaned back on the couch, looking up at the ceiling, frustrated.

“Of course not.”

He found it remarkably cruel that whatever sentience had inhabited the ring six weeks back had so thoroughly fled now that Ford had followed its instructions. The being that had spoken through the ring must have decided that Ford had fulfilled his purpose and left it at that. Certainly, the world was safe from Bill’s party-oriented machinations, but that didn’t mean that Ford still didn’t have questions.

He had a myriad of questions to ask the sentience in the ring, most of which sprung up from self-doubt and second guessing the instant Ford fully conceptualised what he did and at who’s prompting. For all this talk about his muse’s deadly agenda, about using people, and then throwing them away, Ford was coming to think that the hypocritical ring was hardly any better.

If he could, he’d be having words with the voice in the ring. Though as much as he attempted to call through to the voice, he felt like he’d been put on hold, or hung up on. It was an indignant ordeal, to reach out constantly to a voice that didn’t answer.

At least when Ford first summoned Bill, in their early intangible stage of their relationship, usually Ford got an answer. Maybe Bill just liked to hear himself talk though.

Stanford couldn’t decide who’d duped him worse, his muse, or the voice, but he imagined he could count on one hand how many times he’d been tricked by someone he trusted within the past two months, and the more he thought about it, the more inclined he was to use the other hand as well.

The static on the radio drifted in and out of focus as Ford stared up at the ceiling, his eyelids growing heavy, heavier.

While he knew that the dreams he was being plagued with were only dreams, there was something rather unpleasant about constant night terrors. He didn’t relish waking up sweating, with a hoarse throat from screaming. He felt a moment of sympathy for Fiddleford, and regret for how briefly he’d brushed off F’s night terrors.
Ford had been avoiding sleep, much like Fiddleford had, to avoid the night terrors.

That was the funny thing though. It didn’t matter the time of day, he didn’t have to be asleep in his bed at a reasonable hour for the dreams to strike. It was odd, because logically, looking at the name, night terrors were supposed to happen of a night time.

Not in the middle of the day.

Suddenly, Ford was laying horizontally in his bed, blinking up at the ceiling of his room.

It was dark, he could faintly see the glow cast from his alarm clock by his bedside reflecting up onto the roof, and he could hear the crickets chirping in the woods outside.

It seemed late, far past midnight, well into sensible sleeping hours, but what had Ford puzzled was how he got here, considering last he recalled he was eschewing sleep in favour of research.

The blankets were warm, and he was in the cozy sort of haze that had him snuggling back against the pillow, intent to close his eyes again. It had been so long since he’d had a decent, peaceful sleep.

As he settled back down, tucking the blankets between his legs, he paused. Something wasn’t right.

The blankets felt sticky, and wet, damp all the way through, but the wetness was warm, an incongruous puddle seeping through the fabric.

Ford patted the sheet beneath him and brought his hand up to his face, squinting at it in the dark. There was something glinting on his hand, something liquid. Not water, it was far too dark a colour to be water.

He looked beside him to his bedside table, seeking to turn on the light, when he noticed someone lying in bed next to him, bunched under the covers.

Ford blinked at the shape, before leaning across them to turn the light on.

Sharp brightness revealed the scene in the room. Ford’s pale blue sheets were drenched, stained through red with so much blood. The shape under the covers shifted, groaning, before flipping the covers off, sitting upright.

It was a person, and Ford could see all the way through their torso when they turned, the alarm clock peeking through the gap in their chest as they reached for the light switch.

They seemed to pause, realising Ford was behind them, staring, before they turned around to face him.

“Sixer.” Bill said, and wiped the leaking blood from the hole in their chest with a delicate finger, before reaching forward to smear the blood across Ford’s lips. “I’m not ready for this to end, go back to sleep.”

Ford felt the sticky blood trickle down into his lips, the coppery tang of Bill’s blood scented across his tongue, and he wanted to gag.

“No. I want to wake up. I want to wake –“

With a jolt, Ford yelled, and sat upright panting and rubbing his chest. He swallowed, and shook off the remnants of the nightmare, his pulse still racing.
Slowly, once he calmed himself, he lay back down against his pillows, taking stock of where he was. He was safe. He was back in his bed. There was no blood, everything seemed normal, and Bill was asleep beside him.

“Bill?” Ford murmured in the dark, looking over to his muse, his gold hair catching the faint light in the room.

“Bill, are you awake?”

He didn’t respond. Assuming this was just another one of those mornings where Bill proved incredibly difficult to rouse, Ford reached over to shake his muse’s shoulder, wanting to speak to him about his nightmares.

“Bill -?” Ford paused, that same feeling of unease creeping up his spine as he realised his muse was cold.

Bill was never cold, he always ran hot, so much so that Ford would joke about saving money on an electric blanket with Bill around. His skin was like ice, and clammy, like a corpse.

Frantic, Ford sat up, and rolled his muse over, wanting to check his vitals, his breathing, check something, to make sure he’s alright.

Bill’s face flopped around, facing upright on the pillow, and his eyelids were open, but his eyes were empty, hollowed out, black inside.

Ford recoiled from the body, aghast, and his movements jostled the bed, causing Bill’s body to flop around like a lifeless doll.

That’s essentially what he was, a doll, a construct, a vessel. Bill wasn’t here. Stanford had sent him away, and now he was left with the piercing knowledge that it wasn’t the body he missed, but the creature living inside of it.

“Don’t tell me you’ve already forgotten what I actually look like.”

Bill’s voice was echoing, and Ford looked around the room, trying to find the source of the god’s voice. When he looked back to the vessel, it was glowing gold, flaking off around the edges, dissipating into the air again.

Ford sprang forward, trying to push the floating particles back into the body, not willing to let Bill go again, not if he could help it. The gold trickled through his fingers like sand, fading out into the air, and Ford panicked, despair welling up inside his chest.

“It’s very sweet for a slap in the face, but -“ Bill’s voice sounded out once more, and Ford tried to track where it was coming from. His gaze drew back down to the vessel’s face, and suddenly Bill’s golden eyes were back, set into the frame of the vessel’s face, watching Ford.

Ford knew Bill was in there, but his body was still dissolving, dissipating with finality. Bill looked up at Stanford knowingly, and his words lingered in the air, echoing ominously.

“It’s not me.”

Ford sat up again, gasping, gritting his teeth and grasping his hair, pulling on it painfully to wake him up from yet another nightmare.

Slapping himself across the face, Ford chastised himself. “Stupid, Stanford. Get a hold of yourself.
They’re just nightmares!”

Sighing, Ford rubbed his chest again, frowning. “It’s not real. None of it was. You’re feeling guilty about saving the world. Just… get over it.”

Ford gripped his own chest hair, tugging it, trying to use pain to ground himself, to pull himself out of this melancholic second guessing.

He shouldn’t be having these nightmares, they shouldn’t still be happening. It should have been cut and dry, black and white. Bill was trying to destroy the world, Stanford had stopped him. Bill was a liar, and Ford found the truth, and acted upon it.

Any feelings he may have cultured for the muse were the result of something that initially started as a trick, a grand manipulation, and he was a fool to still feel tenderness for a being that would have gladly killed him, killed the entire planet, if he wasn’t bound by the vessel and circumstances surrounding.

Stanford was a fool.

He sighed, and smoothed his hand gently over his chest, ceasing the pain.

His hand lingered, fingers gently caressing the small black tattoo that had appeared on his skin, like a brand.

He was mildly horrified when he first discovered the small black triangle.

When he finally showered for the first time, about a week after Bill was banished, he spied it sitting there. His low effort living style once his muse left lent itself to laziness, but when he realised how disgusting he appeared, having slept in the dirt floor of the lab several times, his face tacky with dried tears, he finally succumbed to shamefulness.

He’d been carrying on like a teenage girl, weeping over his lost lover, writing angry annotations in his journals, refusing to shower, be productive, eat, or sleep properly, and it was about time he got back to reality and started acting like an adult.

However, when he noticed the little black triangle etched onto his skin in the shower, he’d nearly had a heart attack, and had sunk to the floor of the bathtub, crying helplessly as the shower sprayed water down over him until the water ran cold.

“I imagined I’d feel different. Or look different, somehow. That a decision like this would leave some sort of impression, some lasting mark.”

Ford clutched the mark etched into his skin, sobbing relentlessly, just when he’d told himself he’d done enough crying. He clung to the mark on his chest, that small reminder that Bill had actually been here, that he’d been cared for by the God. It was a testament to how special he’d been to Bill, how special Bill had made him feel.

“Be yours, in mind and body? To keep you, and be kept for that long, as long as I live? I’ll take that deal.”

The tattoo was something he had mixed feelings about now. It was always bittersweet.

Sometimes he wanted to keep it forever, to embellish it, to fulfil his promise to Bill and cover his skin with big inky triangles all over his body. Other times he wanted to scratch it off or burn it away with a laser.
He wasn’t even sure if it could burn away. It didn’t seem to be made from ink, in the sense that when Ford did a test, he found no trace.

It appeared that Bill had actually altered the melanin levels in his skin in that precise area. So even if Ford were to burn the tattoo away, the melanin would always group there, turning the skin dark no matter what.

It was oddly reassuring, that permanence, in the same way that it was daunting, and often a reminder of everything he had lost. He’d taken Bill’s assurances and thrown them back in his face, and the muse was gone now, hardly capable of providing the forever that the tattoo had promised.

He traced the perfect sides of the tattoo with his fingertip, laying back against the pillows, the low light of his alarm clock providing just enough illumination so that Ford could see the little triangle emblazoned upon his skin.

He’d been riddled with anxiety lately, second guessing his decisions, regretting his self-imposed solitude. Often, he felt that anxiety build in his chest, his breathing restricted, the tightness starting there and impacting his whole body.

It was a double-edged sword, an odd sort of back hand, to discover that resting his hand over that black little triangle helped him centre himself, helped abate the crushing anxiety.

It wasn’t fair, honestly, how much Bill helped him, even while hurting him.

Ford didn’t know how to reconcile the feeling of still loving his muse, with the conflict he felt about it. It was no wonder his nightmares were so fixated. You’d think by this point in time, six weeks after the fact, he’d find something new to dream about, but no.

Ford sighed, and tilted his chin down, watching his fingertips trail along the edges of the little triangle.

Three straight lines, then curving around the shape of the eye and the top hat. Ford wanted to trace it all, the repetitive motions calming him, keeping him level after so many nightmares.

He didn’t know what it was about the muse that managed to calm him so even after causing him so much discomfort and pain. Really, he shouldn’t find this calming at all, he should hate Bill, after all, he’d been lying to him and manipulating him since day one.

Ford pressed down a little harder against the shape of the eye, his index finger prodding at it hard.

For a moment, nothing happened. Ford was simply touching himself in the dark, poking this tattoo, when he felt it.

Something under his skin nudged back, prodding upward. Ford felt his skin move under his finger, and looked down, raising his eyebrows.

He smoothed his hand over his chest again, pressing his palm flat over the tattoo, before raising his hand to look at the skin below.

It was smooth. Nothing was happening.

But then he saw it.

What looked like the ridge of a fingertip pressed up from underneath his skin, tracing along the lines of the triangle. Three straight lines, and then a curve.
Ford watched the bump underneath his skin protrude upwards, following the pattern of the tattoo.

Then the bump spanned outwards, the outline of a splayed hand pressing up from his skin from within.

Ford scrambled back, horrified, sitting up in his bed, but the hands under his skin kept pushing upwards, scraping along his insides now.

He gasped, and fell back flat onto the bed, trying to push the hand under his skin back down with the flat of his palm.

He screamed, pain filling his chest, as the hand below his skin reached upward, stretching his skin painfully up and out, the hand protruding to lace its fingers with Fords, five fingers fitting perfectly in between his six.

Shaking the hand away from him, Ford panted, and yelled, as he felt his ribs snap, the hand under his chest grasping ever upwards, trying to force its way up.

“Stop. Stop, no don’t. Please, I beg of you –“ Ford sobbed, gripping onto the bedsheets as the hands scratched at his insides, trying to break through the skin.

He felt an intense pain, like his heart was about to burst, and his skin ripped down the middle of his sternum, splitting painfully.

He screamed.

It was agonising, and all Ford could do was lay still and watch, tears running down his cheeks, as a blood drenched hand reached up from the tear in his chest, patting across Ford’s torso before it planted its bloody palm flat on his shoulder. Another hand squeezed out of the hole in his chest, planting itself flat on Ford’s other shoulder, before heaving, pulling a body out of Ford’s chest, ripping him apart.

He felt his ribs split backwards, breaking, as the creature pulled itself up out of Ford’s torso like a swimmer getting out of a pool. Gold lines glinted on the creature’s arms, peaking through from under all the blood, and Ford could only watch in horror as a head and shoulders emerged from his chest to loom over him.

“No – no!”

Bill smiled down at him.

“Hello, Sixer.”

Yellow eyes glinted in the dark, smug and satisfied, watching Ford hyperventilate, his face wet with tears as he looked down at his bone sticking up from his skin, his own blood seeping into the blankets.

Bill’s gold hair was wet with red, and the blood was dripping down onto Ford’s face, the monster above him smiling down at him.

“Oh, I forgot something!” The creature recalled, smiling cheerfully before he reached back into Ford’s chest, cracking his sternum, blood spluttering upwards in a vibrant spray.

Holding his prize proudly in its hand, the monster held aloft Ford’s heart, still vainly pumping in the palm of his hand.
“Mmm.” Bill licked Ford’s heart decisively, before tilting his head, mulling over the flavour.

He shrugged, and looked back down at Ford, smirking. “Not bad.”

Ford could only shout, helpless and horrified, as his muse opened his mouth wide and took a bite out of Ford’s heart, his teeth sinking into the flesh.

Ford felt the pain, like the heart was still in his chest. It was agony.

Ford screamed and screamed hoping he’d wake up soon, wake up and this would all be over, but the dream just didn’t stop.

He watched horrified, as Bill devoured his heart like it was a juicy apple, chomping down the last piece before licking each one of his fingers, like it wasn’t enough.

“Stop! Stop!” Ford begged in between sobs, as Bill looked down at the rest of his organs, wiggling his fingers like a connoisseur at a buffet. “Don’t – please!”

Bill paused, taking in Ford’s desperation, before smiling at him like a shark. “You’re forgetting I own this. I can do what I want with it.”

The muse leaned down and sealed his lips over Ford’s, kissing him, his mouth bloody. Bill was kissing him, and he’d just been eating Ford’s heart. Ford could taste his own blood in his mouth, and he struggled, weakly.

Bill’s tongue probed forward, entwining Ford’s tongue with his own, before Bill chomped down on the muscle, pinning it between his teeth. Bill pulled, sitting upright, and bit down, ripping the muscle from its root.

Ford screamed, and felt the blood fill his throat. Bill had bitten his tongue right off and was now chewing it like a rare delicacy.

His screams gargled on the way out, and he felt his lungs slowly begin to fill with liquid, each breath impossible to drag in and out. Miraculously, somehow, he wasn’t dead yet, his pain being drawn out, his body hovering on the line of immortality, forced to withstand this horrific dismemberment.

Ford spluttered, his words resonating in his head, hoping they’d get through to Bill. His tongue was missing, he couldn’t speak, he just made hopeless noises, trying to mouth the words he couldn’t say. “No more. No more, please.”

Bill shook his head, before leaning down to lick Ford’s tears from his cheek tenderly. “It’s just you and me Sixer.”

Ford closed his eyes, shaking fearfully, as Bill dragged his tongue up to the edge of his eyelid, whispering against his skin.

“From now until the end of time.”

“AAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAHMMMMMMMM!”

Ford woke up, panting, blinking around the living room, patting his chest down frantically.

He’d jostled the coffee table in front of him with his leg when he startled awake and spilled his cold cup of tea over the books and notes scattered on the table in front of him, the tea dripping down to the carpet on the floor.

It was still light out. The radio was still buzzing away on the mantel piece and the clock was ticking on the wall. Bud Senior’s voice was still chiming out on the radio, rattling on about car deals.

Ford grasped his face, pushing his glasses up off his nose so they were sitting at an angle. He felt the corners of his eyes, and patted down to his mouth, bringing his hand away to look at it.

No blood.

It was just a dream.

“We got your Ford’s, your Cadillac’s, your Buick’s - just come on down!”

Ford sank forward, resting his elbows on his knees, and buried his face in his hands, his shoulders shaking.

It was just a dream.

But it felt so real.

That was the problem with these night terrors. They felt so real.

Ford could try and cling to his lucidity when he was prepared to lucid dream, when he went to sleep specifically with that goal in mind, but because he’d been avoiding sleep so much, sometimes he’d just drift off, and he’d never know when he was truly awake.

That was the worst thing.

The dreams that made you think you weren’t dreaming, that tricked you into assuming wakefulness, constantly lowering your defences time and time again until you were left at the mercy of your own mind’s primitive sense of panic and fear.

Stanford couldn’t outthink his subconscious at times like this, he couldn’t snap himself into self-awareness when he already assumed that the nightmare was over. It became hard, so much harder to convince his mind and his body that the dream couldn’t affect him when it felt so painfully real.

Ford had felt his ribs crack, he felt his skin split and his sternum break. His tongue felt swollen and sore, like he’d bitten it while unconscious, and he could still remember vividly the feeling of his own blood filling his lungs, suffocating him.

It was no wonder he’d been avoiding sleep.

Even looking at the clock on the wall, it seemed he’d only been under for an hour and a half at best. If he were to deliberately settle down with the goal of getting a good eight hours of unconsciousness under his belt, he had to face the daunting possibility that instead of exploring his own subconscious or inhabiting his mindscape he could end up trapped at the mercy of his amygdala for hours on end.

There was only so much a man could stand.

The nightmares didn’t always get so graphic, but they always left Ford waking up in a cold sweat, horrified by his own subconscious.

The dreams where Bill enacted frightening violence on Ford were horrific, but Ford wouldn’t say those dreams were the worst.

No, the worst dreams were the ones that had Ford waking up flushed hot with shame, his sheets sticky around him. The dreams that had him throwing up into his waste paper bin, sickened by himself. He didn’t like to dwell on those dreams.

It was an odd sort of hierarchy that made the dreams like the ones he’d just experienced preferable. He wouldn’t want to endure eight hours of those dreams, regardless, but Ford was beginning to sense a rhythm to how these night terrors affected him.

The lighter horrors were the ones that crept up on him when he was too tired to keep his eyes open, convincing him that it wouldn’t be so bad to lay down properly for a while and rest.

The really heavy night terrors sprung up when he decided he’d lucid dream, taking him by surprise. He’d think he was in control of his actions, intending to spend the full eight hours searching for answers, and suddenly he’d be looking down at himself in horror, his hands wet with blood, thinking he’d been in control of his actions the entire time.

Night terrors like this could break a man, and Ford was suddenly far more empathetic about Fiddleford’s use of the memory ray.

He’d be tempted to use it himself, if he wasn’t still riding on the faint and distant hope that in one of these dreams, perhaps Bill would show up for real. He could ask his muse directly, he could get answers, if his muse were really there.

These nightmares couldn’t be his muse. They just couldn’t.

And the fact that Ford believed his subconscious was capable of projecting such cruelty on Bill had him more fearful of his subconscious than anything. He feared the potential of his mind, that it could concoct such horrors to inflict on himself.

He wondered what this said about him far more than he should.

Shaking his head, Ford tsked, and looked at the tea spilled all over his coffee table. Grumbling, he picked up his books, and shook the liquid off them, dumping them in the armchair to the side.

Complaining under his breath, he walked into the kitchen and grabbed the paper towels, intent on cleaning up this mess.

The mess his life had become.

And he thought he had it bad before.

Kryptos chewed on his nails nervously, following Pyronica as she paced through the halls.

“Do you think he’s noticed? Has he noticed? He’d have noticed by now, right?”

“He hasn’t noticed.” Pyronica replied, her voice flat and unimpressed.
“How do you know he hasn’t noticed? How –“

“If he’d noticed, you’d be dead by now.” Pyronica responded, shooting Kryptos a look. “That’s why.”

“Oh help,” Kryptos muttered, squeezing his face anxiously.

“The only thing he’s noticed is the bottom of a bottle.” Pyronica tsked. “One hell of a coping strategy as far as they go.”

“Then he hasn’t noticed Sixer? Human’s usually can’t withstand night terrors for too long, they break real easy. Do you think we broke him?” Kryptos fretted.

“You broke him.” Pyronica corrected him, not willing to be lumped in with Kryptos or blamed for his crime. Kryptos seemed to wilt for a moment, before Pyronica continued. “And no. He wouldn’t break that easy.”

“Why not?” Kryptos asked, almost having the gall to sound disappointed.

“Because.” Pyronica faced head on, focused on her goal, walking to Bill’s study. “He’s special.”

Pyronica powered on and paused in front of Bill’s study door. She looked down to Kryptos for a moment, before holding her hand out.

“You’ve got the stuff, right?”

Kryptos pulled the fresh bottle of Cosmic Sand out from under his glove and passed it to the cyclops. “Are you sure we should be giving it to him?”

“Trust me, this will work.” Pyronica said, assured, and took the bottle of Cosmic Sand from the compass.

She knocked on Bill’s study door.

“Bill? Are you in there?”

There was a lengthy pause, before Bill’s voice echoed out, refracting in strange ways.

“Go away.”

Pyronica held her hand up by her mouth, calling out. “I brought you more Cosmic Sand.”

There was another long pause, before the door swung open slowly.

Pyronica gave Kryptos an ‘I-told-you-so’ look, and walked into the study, the compass floating behind.

Initially, Pyronica couldn’t see Bill, looking around the study for some sign of where the triangle was hiding. He wasn’t behind his desk, under it, or perched anywhere on the bookshelves. It was only when Pyronica doubled back to look at the desk that she saw him, plain as day.

The old decanter of Cosmic Sand sat on the middle of Bill’s desk, and Bill was inside the bottle, shrunk down to the size of a penny, laying on his side in the bottom of the bottle.

He was licking the last few drops of Cosmic Sand up with a tiny tongue that protruded from his eye mouth.
He was wasted, he was totalled, he was utterly diagonal.

Pyronica sighed. “Bill.”

“Just pour it in the top.” Bill slurred. “I’ll take it from here.”

“Get out of the bottle Bill.” Pyronica put her hand on her hip, frowning at the triangle.

“Just drown me in Cosmic Sand. Just do it!”

“No.” Pyronica said, narrowing her eye at Bill.

“Come on, they do it all the time on Sesquipedalian Jersey Shore!”

“I love that show.” Pyronica admitted to herself, under her breath.

“Is it on?” Bill asked, and closed his mouth, blinking up at her.

“You won’t know until you get out of the bottle.” Pyronica tried, watching Bill expectantly.

“Pfft. I know everything.” Bill waved a floppy arm at Pyronica dismissively and his eye buzzed static. “It’s on seven different channels right now. All reruns.”

“Get out of the bottle, Bill.” Pyronica pressed.

“Make me.” Bill flopped forward, falling face down onto the bottom of the glass.

With a resigned sigh, Pyronica picked the decanter up and turned it upside down until Bill slid out from the mouth of the bottle, onto the desk, alongside the last drop of Cosmic Sand.

Bill’s arms reached out feebly for the last drop, but Pyronica swiped it up with her finger, and put the drop in her mouth, before shuddering.

“Ugh, this stuff’s potent.” She felt tipsy already just from the one drop. Bill had been in here for three weeks, chugging back the dangerous liquid.

“You stole my alcohol.” Bill complained, scowling at the pink cyclops.

“I’ve got you more.” She assured him. “You’re not getting it though until you leave your study, float around a little, and talk to me.”

Bill grunted and tried to pull his small triangular body back across the desk, crawling towards the empty decanter.

“Oh no you don’t.” She muttered and plucked Bill up from off the desk with two fingers, holding her friend in the palm of her hand. Bill wobbled, barely sitting upright, before blinking at her blearily.

He pointed his tiny limb at her. “I could have you keel hauled for this!”

He promptly fell forward, flat on his face.

“Alright.” Pyronica took it in stride and picked up a handful of her cape before gently depositing Bill inside the fabric. She let the fabric sit in her hand, like a little nest, and grabbed the bottle of Cosmic Sand with her other hand. “We’re going to the roof. Kryptos, tidy up here a bit, will you?”
Kryptos opened his mouth and raised his index finger, about to suggest that he could join them, but the look slid off his face when Pyronica raised her eyebrow at him.

He kept forgetting that just because they shared an incident together, that didn’t make them friends. In terms of the inter-henchmen hierarchy she was up there, and he was down here.

She walked out of the door with Bill in her hand, and Kryptos watched them go.

Resigning himself to it, he tidied the study, and tried not to fret about what they’d be discussing up on the roof.

The stars seemed limitless from up here.

Most people in the Quadrangle hit the penthouse and thought that was it, that was the highest they could go, but they’d never been to the roof before.

The structure was constantly changing, so it was hard to find it, but it appeared on the rare occasion, a small patch of space, about a metre square wide, at the highest point in the building.

You could see the whole Nightmare Realm from here.

Pyronica sat at the edge of the roof with her legs dangling over the side, and Bill sat, wrapped up in her cape, beside her.

Pyronica kicked her legs and watched the gaseous matter and broken meteors tumble through the void, popping in and out of the many wormholes that dotted around the edge of the dimension.

The Nightmare Realm was a colossal in between space, the dimension between all dimensions, a gateway to other worlds. But for the beings who lived within it, for them it was their home.

It operated outside of the bounds of the laws of physics, or indeed any laws. However, its lawless nature had it fated to self-destruct when the roiling un-limitations of physics in their domain reached their peak.

Already, Pyronica could see it crumbling, the wormholes twining out and around the dimension, widening at the edges, eating into their home bit by bit, more and more.

To Pyronica this was a place where lost things were found, where hope grew in the space between the stars, shedding light onto all the hopeless beings out here, who were cast into the dark.

To the rest of the multi-verse, this was a place where the weird things came to die.

She hoped they weren’t right.

“Bill?”

“Brrghl?” Bill blinked slowly, staring at some point within the folds of the fabric of Py’s cape.

“Geez, you’re a mess.” She remarked, shaking her head at him.
“Thanks for the compliment.” Bill replied sarcastically, straightening his askew bowtie.

“I mean it. You’ve been a mess for weeks.” Pyronica noted. “This isn’t like you.”

“How would you know?” Bill grumbled and sunk deeper into her cape.

“Several bleventy millennia gives me a leg up on the competition when it comes to knowing what you’re like. You don’t let anything affect you like this, it should all be water off an Amaphabon’s back to you.”

Bill looked ahead across the expanse of his realm, incredibly disgruntled. He didn’t need Pyronica reminding him of his failures and failing to act accordingly to this situation was definitely a grievous failure.

“Do you even have a solution for our investors?”

“Hasn’t it?” Pyronica pressed.

“I have back up plans. Plans within plans, you know this Py, since you supposedly know me so well. Give me a little credit.”

“Well, since that hasn’t changed, why don’t you tell me what has.” Pyronica crossed her arms and frowned at Bill. “Because you didn’t fall apart like this the last time the portal flopped, or the time before that.”

“Oh, sure, list all my previous failed attempts, that will make me feel much better.” Bill rolled his eye, snarking at his friend.

“I thought you said this wasn’t a failure.” Pyronica clarified.

“It’s not – ugh.” Bill pressed his hands down over his eye, massaging his eyelid. “The portal is salvageable, that’s not –“

“Then what was your failure Bill? What?” Pyronica pressed, being harsher than she needed to be, knowing that it was necessary, necessary to push Bill to this point.

“I don’t –“

“What was it that ruined this for all of us? That pushed us into a corner like this? What cost us our party, Bill? What -?”

“SIXER okay!” Bill yelled, opening his eye and glaring at Pyronica. “Sixer did. Are you happy now? There, I’ve said it! I backed the wrong human and now I’ve ruined everything for everyone yet again. Are you happy now?”

“Bill.” Pyronica softened her voice. “I’m not happy, because you’re not happy.”

Bill looked at her, clearly still frustrated, not understanding where she was going with this.

“And what would make you happy right now?” She pressed, widening her eye, trying to lead Bill to the answer.

Bill scowled at her for a while longer, before glaring bitterly out into the cosmos, reluctantly muttering his answer.
“Sixer.”

Pyronica reached down and rested her hand against Bill’s side, above his arm on his shoulder, and spoke gently.

“Then it wasn’t a failure then, was it?”

Bill blinked, and then looked at her, thrown by her statement.

“What, did you think I was gonna chew you out for being happy?” Pyronica scoffed, and pulled a face. “I’ll leave that to the investors, you’re gonna have a hard enough time convincing them that everything happened for a reason.”

“You’re not mad at me?” Bill asked, sounding shocked. “I thought you said I shouldn’t have chosen him, that it was us versus them. I thought you’d be saying ‘I told you so’.”

“Do I look like Kryptos to you?” Pyronica smirked and tilted her head at Bill. “Come on, seriously.”

Bill laughed, disbelieving, before looking up at her with fresh eyes. “Then you don’t think -?”

“That you’ve been overreacting? Oh, I definitely do.” She remarked sassily, smirking at Bill’s indignant mien. “Locking yourself in your room, drinking alone, watching reruns of Sesquipedalian Jersey Shore – ALONE, feeling sorry for yourself without me. You reek of heartbroken teenager, and what’s worse is you didn’t even have the good sense to bring me with you on your little field trip to self-pity town.”

“It’s not self-pity.” Bill countered, gesturing as he spoke. “It’s very real, well deserved, self … empathising. I’m being empathetic to my own shitty situation.”

“Well there’s empathetic, there’s sympathetic, and then there’s just pathetic.” Pyronica raised her eyebrow, lidding her eyelid at Bill, clearly amused.

“That sounds familiar.” Bill squinted at Pyronica. “Are you quoting me?”

“You said it to Hectorgon once when he was sad couldn’t go to his cousins squaremitzvah. He was moping for two solid years and we all got sick of it.”

“He didn’t get us invites. Why should he get to go when the rest of us can’t?”

“I know. So rude.” Pyronica nodded, holding her hand to her chest like she was still scandalised.

“He doesn’t even like his cousin.” Bill crossed his arms over his chest, and Pyronica hummed in agreement, looking down at Bill’s posture.

She extended her finger out, dimming her flames, and poked his side, grinning.

“Do you feel a little better?”

Bill glanced her way, and then rolled his eyes, saying nothing, his little arms still crossed.

“Admit it, you’ve missed me.” Pyronica wheedled, her grin growing as she continued to poke at Bill’s congruent sides. “You’ve missed this.”

Bill smacked her hand away irritably, glaring at her, before softening up some. She was right, he had missed this.
“I thought you promised more booze.” Bill said instead of admitting his appreciation for the cyclops beside him, but she picked it up anyway, through the way his tone softened just for her.

“So I did.” She picked up the bottle, and bit off the cork, spitting it out over the edge of the roof. She took a swig of the Cosmic Sand, and pulled a face, sticking her tongue out. “Yeurgh. Yuck. I don’t know how you can drink this stuff.”

Bill wound his arms out long, and wrapped his fingers around the bottle, relieving Pyronica of it. “You just don’t appreciate the appeal of the beverage.”

“Do I need a more sophisticated palette?” She asked, feigning dainty airs.

“You need an unsophisticated palette.” Bill replied, and his eye shut, opening as a mouth. He tipped the bottle back and took a large sip, closing his mouth and opening his eye once more. “Very unsophisticated.”

“Do you actually like the stuff?” Pyronica had to ask, wincing as Bill drank the Cosmic Sand.

“It’s disgusting.” Bill admitted, setting the bottle down on the edge of the roof. “And expensive. But it does the job.”

“Huh.” Pyronica thought on that for a moment, before she nudged Bill with her elbow. “Have another sip then. I want to get you drunk enough to talk about Sixer.”

Bill groaned and massaged beside his eye like he had a headache. “What’s there to talk about?”

“Uh, there’s plenty to talk about. Like for starters, what happened? Why he turned on you?”

Bill seemed to be pouting for a moment, deliberately silent and unresponsive, before he took another sip from the bottle.

“Well?” Pyronica pressed. Bill was silent for several moments more, before he replied in a quiet, bitter voice.

“He thinks I’m a monster.”

Pyronica looked at Bill for a moment and blinked at him in confusion. “So do a lot of people. So what?”

Bill was quiet for a moment longer, before responding.

“He didn’t before.”

Pyronica, despite herself, felt her throat tighten with sympathy, and her lips turned down at the edges, feeling sad for Bill.

“That was the plan though, right?” Pyronica said softly. “To make the human think you were a muse, to have him build the portal. It worked. What does it matter that he changed his mind.”

“It matters to me.” Bill admitted bitterly. “He used to think I was a God. His God. He thought I could do no wrong.”

Pyronica snorted, amused by the notion. “Sounds like he didn’t know you at all.”

“But he did.” Bill insisted. “He knew me, the real me, and he still thought that. I didn’t hold back, when he summoned me into that flesh cage I stopped acting like the doting compassionate muse. I was horrible to him. And he still –“

“So, humans are gullible?” Pyronica felt the tightness in her throat again, knowing that what Bill was saying was true, she felt that much from peeking into Sixer’s dream. She knew a fraction of the regard Sixer felt for Bill, but she couldn’t let it show. “They believe something enough and that makes it true to them.”

“But he believed in me.” Bill said ardently, sorrow sneaking into his tone now as he looked across the Nightmare Realm, melancholy setting back in. “And now he doesn’t.”

Bill reached for the bottle to take another swig, but his inebriation attempt was halted as Pyronica put her hand on top of the bottle, looking down at him with a guilty expression.

Bill looked up at her in askance and picked up on her guilt straight away. Her bottom lip was jutting out, and her eye said it all.

“What, what is it?”

Pyronica struggled for a while, her obligation to hide Kryptos’ involvement with their ill-fated snooping attempt warring with her desire to halt her best friend’s sadness, to turn it around. She wanted to tell the truth, it was a classic failing on her part, another reason she was unsuited to diplomacy.

She looked at Bill and noted the desperation in his eye, laced with hope, just hinting the possibility that if she told Bill the truth about Sixer’s dreams he’d rise up from this melancholy and feel better again.

She couldn’t stand to see him sad.

“I need to show you something.”

The mirror lined room was an unpleasant reminder of her mistake, of the agony that was experiencing human emotions, but she needed to do this.

“You’ve got to look.” Pyronica said, gesturing to the triangular mirror with its gilt gold edges.

“No. Nuh-uh.” Bill shook his head and crossed his arms. “No. He doesn’t want me anymore Pyronica, he cast me out. I have been avoiding him for exactly that reason.”

“You have to see.” She urged him.

“See how much he hates me now? See how disgusting he thinks I am? How monstrous I am in his eyes? He’s probably patting himself on the back down there, oh good job Stanford, you saved the earth from Bill Cipher, who’s the genius now? He humiliated me!” Bill pointed at the mirror dramatically. “He looked me in the eye as he disassembled my body. He planned –“

“Bill.”

“From the beginning, he planned – “ Bill fumed, venting his frustrations now he had an audience.
“He just stood there! And he, he set it up – he got that stick Red to take away my options – he laid it out like a picnic, but he planned –“

“Bill.” Pyronica repeated.

“NO!” Bill screamed, and several mirrors in the room floated off the wall, hovering at Bill’s whim as he threw his tantrum. “HE DOESN’T GET TO DO THAT! HE DOESN’T GET TO DO THAT TO ME. HE LIED –“

“So did you!” Pyronica said, bravely speaking up. “And he screwed up. He was probably confused –“

“His screw up cost me everything! He shouldn’t have screwed up in the first place. Things were fine, they were just fine. Everything was going exactly as it should have, and he just decides to –” Bill spluttered, his words catching on a snarl as he swiped his hand through the air, sending one of the dream mirrors shattering to the floor. “How do you just decide to turn around and do that? No, he had to be planning it from the start.”

“Bill – “ Pyronica held her hands up, trying to placate Bill, but his bricks were turning red, and more mirrors were shattering in response to his ire.

“He did this on purpose. He used ME – that’s not how it was supposed to go down. I gave him everything, I treated him differently, he made me feel –“ Bill bit back those words, choosing instead to shriek, and break a few more mirrors.

Pyronica was crouching now, wrapping her cape around her face, ducking down to avoid the broken glass.

“Bill!” She pleaded, trying to halt her friend’s paranoid rampage for her own sake now.

“HE RUINED EVERYTHING!”

Nearly all of the mirrors were cracking now, even Sixer’s ornate gold frame couldn’t hold back the damage, and a tiny crack formed at the top edge of the mirror branching down.

“Bill, STOP!” Pyronica yelled, and her voice threw Bill out of his furious state, halting him with a gut-wrenching sense of déjà vu.

“BILL, STOP!”

Suddenly he was back in the clearing, blood and rain dripping down him, panting as he halted his murderous rampage to look across the grass to where Ford stood, on top of a picnic blanket, a basket at his feet. Under the blanket was one of his ingenious tarps, alchemical circles drawn in blood pressed between two sheets of clear plastic, waiting to trap Bill, to break him apart.

It looked so innocuous, so perfectly peaceful and benign. It looked like bliss in a picnic basket, a picture of hopeless domestic wish fulfilment that felt a lot like a holiday to Bill. It felt like an indulgence, and like a moth drawn to the flame, Bill fell for it, wanting to indulge once more before the big day, and it was his undoing.

“You know me, don’t you Sixer? Do you honestly think I’m a bad guy? A monster?”

Ford had stared at him, his stubborn jaw jutting out, his eyes determined, and as painfully earnest as always.
“I haven’t decided yet. Muse or monster. You could be both.”

Bill knew he could be both, he’d lived it. He just never wanted to see the day when Sixer would believe one over the other.

He’d been avoiding him, avoiding his dreamscape, because he didn’t want that confirmation.

“He thinks I’m a monster.” Bill repeated, red seeping out of his bricks, his tantrum fizzling away in the wake of this sudden dread of confrontation, dread of the truth, that razed through him.

The mirrors were no longer hovering, and the jagged glass remaining fell to the floor, tinkling like chimes as they hit the ground. Pyronica shook glass shards from her cape, thankful that it’s impenetrable properties on the battlefield protected her from harm and stood up slowly.

“You don’t know that.” She insisted, thinking back on what she’d felt with Ford’s mirror. “He adores you.”

“Things change, Pyronica.” Bill said, sounding hollow, distraught, though now that he’d calmed, he couldn’t take his eye off Sixer’s mirror, drawn to it, like a moth to the flame.

“You need to see for yourself.” Pyronica assured him, determined. “No more avoiding this. You need to face what’s happened.”

Bill didn’t want to, but now he was stuck in a room with Sixer’s dream mirror, it was like he couldn’t look away.

“Maybe things have changed. They keep on changing though. That’s what’s so good about it.” Pyronica’s hopeful tone pinched at Bill’s hopelessness, paining him as he slowly began to believe her.

He didn’t want to hope again. Hope was always devastating in the end, disappointment was the only constant, and Sixer had disappointed him, like all of the others had.

“Just see for yourself.” Pyronica urged him, and dusted glass shards out of her hair. “And when you have, come and find me. No more dealing with this alone.”

Bill remained frozen, glued to the spot, staring at Sixer’s dream mirror with an odd mix of attraction and dread, unable to move. He heard the clack of Pyronica’s heels as she walked out of the room, kicking broken glass out of her way, and the grating of the bricks as the door sealed shut behind her.

And he was alone.

With Sixer’s dreams.

Just like old times.

Bill sighed and looked across the room at the cascade of broken glass he’d left everywhere. He certainly made a mess of things. It was what he did best apparently.

He floated forward and peered cautiously at Sixer’s mirror, his own reflection looking back at him.

Pyronica was right, he was a mess.

His eye was bloodshot, and his colour was faded, and dull. He looked exhausted, wrung out, spent. He felt it.
He couldn’t keep up the mask, the mask he always wore. Sixer had thrown it down when he cast him out. Genuine hurt was beginning to leak through, and it looked like weakness. Exploitable, damaging weakness.

Bill couldn’t look weak, that was why he’d locked himself in his room, avoiding everyone and everything.

He couldn’t let them see the depths of his despair, the height of his loss.

Losing Sixer was like losing everything all over again.

Losing the portal, losing the new home for his friends. Failing. Losing Sixer. Losing the safe harbour of his arms, and the indulgent genuine affection he showed Bill. Losing his regard and losing that fond look that graced Ford’s features whenever he looked at Bill, the worship that poured from him, even when he was cross with him. Losing his company, and his banter, and his closeness - and his trust.

Losing his love.

Bill didn’t want to confirm how much he’d lost, he already knew. Sixer wouldn’t do this to him if he cared enough, if he respected and trusted Bill enough to stop and listen to him, to wait for an explanation. Sixer turned on him and ducking back into his mindscape to watch his dreams would simply be twisting the knife in deeper.

This hurt enough already, and not in the good way.

Bill’s reflection wavered on the mirror’s surface, and colours began moving under the glass.

Sixer was sleeping, he was slipping into a dream, and it was beginning to play out on the glass.

Bill could look away. He didn’t have to watch. But now that it was already playing out, he lacked the discipline to look away, to shut his eye.

He felt weak.

Alone in the room, he allowed himself that weakness, privately, and floated down to sit in front of the mirror.

He watched Stanford dream.

Ford was sitting on a picnic blanket, in the middle of the barley field. He looked around him, noting the way the breeze ruffled through the barley, noting the picnic basket sitting on the rug beside him. With resignation he noticed the industrial bag of salt, poking out from behind a thicket of barley at the edge of the blanket, and realised he was dreaming again.

He sucked in a frustrated breath, and ran his fingers through his hair, scrubbing his scalp. He had been going over Fiddleford’s notes on the living room floor, the last he remembered. He had coffee, he’d kept the windows open so the cold air from outside would keep him awake, he’d done everything to ensure he wouldn’t slip into unconsciousness again.
These dreams were wearing him down. He didn’t know how much more of this he could take. Anything was preferable to sleep at the moment. Ford thought that nothing could be worse than this constant subconscious torment, but clearly, he had no idea of how bad it could get. Right now, this was his limit, these constant, guilt filled dreams.

He looked down at his hands, checking for blood, before he looked around the clearing, paranoid that this would be yet another bloodstained nightmare.

So far nothing was jumping out at him. There was no eroding corpse lurking in the crops, no proliferation of gold dust reminding him of his crimes against Bill, no physical mutilation befalling him as of yet.

It was just him, alone in the barley field, sitting on the picnic blanket, waiting for calamity to strike.

Ford felt on edge, the hairs at the back of his neck were standing up, he felt a prickling along his spine, like he was being watched, but he could see no one.

“Hello?” Ford called out, and his voice echoed back at him, carried on the wind.

There was no reply.

Ford felt uneasy, he could only hear the rustle of the wind through the barley, and silence. He felt his foreboding build, and he swallowed, waiting for something horrific to jump out at him, some horrendous final blow to strike at the last vestiges of his sanity now that he was stuck in yet another dream.

He just wanted whatever horrible thing that was building to just get itself over with.

“Is someone there?” Ford asked, the echo suggesting emptiness, suggesting his question’s redundancy. “Show yourself!”

Ford was almost let down. His wariness hadn’t abated. He was still convinced he was being watched, but that could just be his subconscious tricking him, or his paranoia at work.

“I know someone else has to be there. Someone has to.”

Ford looked around him, turning around on the picnic blanket. Nothing jumped out at him, so Ford went looking for the nightmare. He picked up the edge of the blanket and looked underneath it, seeing his tarp laid out neatly below the blanket. He opened the picnic basket hesitantly, expecting some mangled version of Bill’s body to lunge out from within, but there were only sandwiches within, the same sandwiches he would have made, were this a genuine picnic.

He paused, taking in the mustard lavished sandwich wrapped in plastic with a pained feeling in his chest. That mustard drenched steak and tomato sandwich was Bill’s favourite.

Ford felt his throat tighten as he looked down into the picnic basket, before shaking off his melancholy, looking around the clearing for some evidence of subconscious subterfuge.

“I can’t be alone here. I can’t –“

Ford’s words cut off as he realised what this dream was doing, what the true torture of the emptiness was.
Ford was alone.

A strange noise worked its way up his throat, and came out, an anguished strangled wail.

Ford panted, frustrated, his adrenaline racing as he pondered the thought that the punishment of this dream wasn’t more inventive psychological torture, but rather a reminder of the woeful reality of his situation.

It was cruel, this dream. It didn’t even let him imagine Bill back here with him. It just reminded him exactly why the muse was gone now.

It was Ford’s fault.

Ford sat back, shocked, and stared at the picnic basket, yearning bearing down on him, this untenable pressure. He yearned for his muse back, so they could share this moment, this quiet picnic, as they should have done. In a perfect world, Ford would still have this, with Bill here beside him, sharing the picnic, keeping each other company.

They were supposed to have from now until the end of time together.

Ford felt so alone.

He made another anguished sound, and pressed his palms to his eyes, pressing down on his eyelids to abate this agony. This loneliness.

He’d done enough crying while he was awake, now he was crying in his dreams too?

He shook his head, and brought his hands away from his eyes, but when he looked up he was no longer in the barley field.

He was in his room, back in Jersey.

It was cluttered with his childish affects, and suddenly he felt too tall in the room he’d grown up in. Too tall, and yet at the same time, very small, almost defeated, really.

He looked around the room.

The hand drawn treasure maps he’d made with Stanley were taped to the wall beside their handprints, an art project Ma had loved so much that she insisted it be stuck there. Ford remembered Stanley’s enthusiasm and pride that Ma had loved their handprint painting so much, but as the years dragged on, Ford just felt ashamed of it, ashamed of his showcased oddity. His six-fingered handprint.

He walked over to the bunk beds in the corner and crouched down, sitting on the bottom bunk. He reached into the sheets and withdrew one of the kaleidoscope binocular toys he’d shared with Stanley, the little plastic binoculars showcasing a different dinosaur in every slide.

Feeling rather despondent, searching for the comfort of this childhood activity, Ford picked the binoculars up and pressed them against his glasses, clicking through the slides.

Rather than the stegosaurus and diplodocus Ford expected, the slides were telling a different story. The slide he was currently looking at depicted a many-armed shape hurtling through the forest, fire dancing up its limbs.

Ford clicked the button at the side, wanting to get away from that reminder, to a different slide, but the next one was no better.

The next slide depicted the attic covered in flames, items levitating in the air as glowing yellow eyes smiled down upon its victim, memory ray held aloft, pointing at the viewer.

Click.

The next slide was an image of Bill, his eyes lidded, glowing in the dark as many shadowy hands sprouted from his torso, pulling Ford closer to him.

Click.

The next slide was Bill again, his mouth open, tongue extended out, as blue flames tumbled out of his mouth, his slitted eyes grinning up at Ford.

Click.

Bill was standing before Ford, black tongues dangling from the rips in his torso, many arms glowing with psychedelic patterns, watching Ford with red eyes.

Click.

Then there was a snapshot from one of Ford’s dreams, earlier in the week.

“Dammit.” Ford hissed, feeling the tone of the dream shift, desperation and arousal leaking through. It felt uncomfortable, experiencing this odd attraction to Bill’s monstrous qualities in his childhood room, and he felt ashamed as he ground his palm over his erection, trying to will it back down.

He should have put the binoculars down, but instead he looked back, examining the slide.

The image was lifted straight from one of Ford’s dreams last week, the dreams he’d had that caused him to wake up with sticky boxers, screaming as he broke through to consciousness.

Bill was arching his back up, his six hands pinned down with gold thread, tied to a magic circle, while Ford loomed over him, claiming the space between his legs while he fucked the god. Bill was as monstrous as ever, the mouths in his chest were lined with sharp teeth, but as he arched his back up those tongues stretched out to lick stripes along Ford’s chest, leaning into his affections even as he struggled.

Ford felt incredibly guilty to still be having dreams like this, dreams about the god, and winced as he clicked the button on the side of the binoculars, revealing how the dream had progressed, how it had turned into a nightmare.

He had his hands around the muse’s throat, and Bill was crying, struggling for real now, as the mouths on his chest warped back into gaping holes, bleeding out across the floor. Ford remembered waking up sickened by this dream, because unlike how it had started, in this dream Bill wasn’t responsive to his amorous attentions at all and had screamed at him the entire time to stop, but Stanford had just kept going.

The sadism and satisfaction resonating from that dream had Ford shaking, vomiting into his waste basket, as he remembered how real the dream had felt, and how convinced he was as he woke from it that he was the monster, to have done something like that. He was the monster.

He remembered how wary Bill had been of him when he first summoned him here, and realised, feeling disgusted with himself, that Bill probably thought that was what he was capable of. In his worst nightmares, he certainly was.

Monstrosity, Ford came to realise, was less about the physiological defects of the body, and more about the moral defects of the soul, and he felt utterly defective, and hypocritical in his actions, having lived out dreams like that.

He threw the binoculars away from him, and they clattered against the wall.

He closed his eyes again, pressing his palms to his eyelids, and muttered. “I don’t want that. I don’t want to see this. I don’t want to be reminded, I just – please – I just want one good night’s sleep. Please.”

He could feel the room shift around him as the dream altered, feeling his childhood bedroom rush away from him, and he felt the surface he was sitting on shift. He was resting somewhere soft and warm now, somewhere that felt a lot like his own bed, but he was still too wary to open his eyes.

He held his palms over his eyelids for several seconds more, before lifting them gradually, and looking around the room.

It was night time, the alarm clock on his bedside read 04:09. Ford blinked at it, before hesitantly turning to see what horrors awaited him in his bed.

There was someone sleeping next to him with their back turned to him, and Ford anticipated the worst.

“Oh God, not this again.” He moaned, and propped himself up on his elbows, looking at Bill’s still form with a sigh.

He didn’t seem to be bleeding, or hollow, or cold. Ford could see the slight rise and fall of Bill’s breathing and felt the warmth he radiated. If this weren’t a nightmare, Ford might be enjoying this, but he knew this wasn’t real, and Bill wasn’t here, despite him wanting the muse to be. He knew this was just another nightmare, and so he braced himself for whatever fresh torture his subconscious had cooked up.

“You know, if you’re going to do something awful to me, just do it.” Ford said, sounding exhausted and bitter. “Clearly, I haven’t suffered enough.”

The body lying in bed beside him didn’t move, didn’t shift or acknowledge Ford’s words at all. Ford could only see the faint rise and fall of Bill’s breathing, see the way his back curved, ignoring Ford.

If he looked closer, he’d almost presume the body in bed next to him was breathing too shallow, its shoulders held too tense, almost like it was trying to hold its breath, or feign sleep.

Ford was tired of looking closer though, and he was resigned to whatever terrors were due from the dream.

He lay back against his pillows and laced his fingers together on top of his chest, speaking up to the ceiling.

“I’m not sure what I’m being punished for more though, speaking analytically here. As my subconscious, sure, you’re supposed to be throwing the mistakes of my waking ego back in my face, but it’s like you can’t decide what upset me more. The fact that Bill was lying to me this entire time, or the fact that I sent him away.”
The body beside him didn’t move, but the rise and fall of its chest stilled. It was definitely holding its breath now.

“The attention to detail is inspiring. Really, with a retentive memory like this, I should never forget where I last put my glasses.” Ford continued rambling, trying his best to grasp lucidity and logic where he could in this endless nightmare. “But apparently that visceral recall is better served reminding me just how much I screwed this up. Hmm. I knew I had a guilt complex, but there’s guilt and then there’s twisting the knife.”

Bill kept his back turned to Stanford, but his eyes were open, darting between the wall and the pillow as he listened to Ford attempting to reason with his subconscious, processing everything he said.

The desire for closeness with his backstabbing human paramour was too much for Bill, it was addictive, and it was why he’d kept away. Coming here was giving into weakness. Sixer was his weakness. If he kept away from Sixer’s dreams he could convince himself that he didn’t still want Sixer, and all the ups and downs that came with having him.

Pyronica said that Sixer made him happy, but he wasn’t sure if this was happiness he felt, this unusual twisting of contrasting emotions making his bricks heat up and simmer back over and over. He still hated Ford for what he did to him, and seethed at the thought of the human’s betrayal, ripping him from this body, but seeing how much Ford agonised over the decision, how deep the veins of regret twisted inside his mind, it complicated things.

Sixer was complicated, and how Bill felt about Sixer was complicated, and he really shouldn’t be here.

But after watching Ford’s nightmares progress, feeling his emotion seep through the edges of the mirror, Bill couldn’t help but slip through the glass, sliding into the form Ford’s psyche obsessed upon, feeling the heat of Ford’s mindscape body seep into the sheets between them. His back was pressing against Sixer’s elbow, and he could feel the tickle of Sixer’s arm hair against this form’s skin. It almost felt like being close to him again, like the way things were before.

Bill was practically vibrating with the effort it took to hold himself back. He wasn’t sure if he wanted Sixer to know he was here, that felt too much like capitulating. Sixer was supposed to come crawling back to him, yet here Bill was, pretending to be Sixer’s therapist/bed warmer just to be close to him.

“I know it was cruel.” Ford continued, his voice a bit more sombre. “And if there’s anything to feel guilty for, it was how I handled the situation. I know it’s easier to stand by my justifications in the daytime, but I can’t help but think this has all just been a fever dream. Or another nightmare. Everything.”

Bill heard Ford sigh, and felt his arm move as his chest rose and fell.

Bill raised his head slightly, wanting to turn to Sixer, to look at him. It took every absent scrap of discipline Bill had gleaned from bleventy billion years of existence not to turn around and face Sixer.

He wasn’t sure if he was ready to face Sixer. Even if he was saying all the right things, deep in his subconscious mind, without any prompting on Bill’s behalf. Bill shouldn’t want this, he shouldn’t... be here. He was just lying there, and Sixer was still pouring his regrets out earnestly.

“I know you’re not really here.” Ford said, sounding sad and so tired. Tired of his own mind. “But I wish you were. I miss spending time together.”

Bill felt his indecision twist painfully inside him, hearing that. He hurt, deep within his core, and it was a hopeful kind of hurt, therefore - the worst kind.

Sixer wants him back. He knows he’s a monster, and he wants him back anyway.

Bill was grateful his back was turned to Sixer, the expressions that were twisting across his face right now weren’t flattering. The hurt, upset, frustration, and burning painful hope would have been evident with just one look at this too expressive vessel. Even in dreams, Bill felt connected to this form, and it gave far more away than he needed it to. He felt raw, and exposed.

Coming here had been a mistake.

Watching this, slipping into the mirror, all of it. It was a terrible mistake on Bill’s part.

“It almost makes me look forward to the nightmares.” Ford confessed, and gave a dry laugh. “Isn’t that sad?”

Bill bit his lip and looked up to the headboard, trying to hold in this devastating hope.

Oh, but Sixer was perfect, even after all the crap he’d pulled on Bill. Bill was still enamoured with the human. How he managed to stay so fascinating, so wonderfully satisfying, how he managed to hit all the sore spots in Bill’s soul and soothe them without meaning to was beyond any mortal cognition, and even beyond Bill’s scope.

He had no answer to why he felt this way about the human, even now. It was like Sixer had got under his skin, before he ripped it all off, and now he was part of Bill, for better or worse.

“Hmm, you haven’t tried to maul me, or any of the other old tricks yet.” Ford mused, looking over at the smooth expanse of Bill’s back in the bed beside him. “I can’t help but think this is the calm before the storm. I don’t get peaceful dreams anymore, but this feels almost – oh – “

Bill shifted, still keeping his back to Ford. He reached behind him, and grabbed one of Sixer’s hands, pulling it away from his chest.

“Oh, here we go.” Ford muttered, and moved, resting on his right side now, letting the dream Bill pull his left hand towards him. “Come on now, do your worst. May as well get it over with.”

Bill said nothing, and pulled Sixer’s hand around him, so the human draped his arm around Bill’s body like an embrace. He held Sixer’s hand in his, and pressed it against his chest with both hands, so Sixer’s abnormal digits rested just above Bill’s heart.

Ford’s fingers twitched, like he was about to pull away, before he adjusted his position behind Bill, propping himself up on his elbow like he wanted to see what was going on there.

“What – what are you going to do? Rip your own heart out? Bite my fingers off? What?” Ford asked irritably, trying to look over Bill’s shoulder to see if the dream was going to give anything away about its horrific intentions.

He peered over dream Bill’s shoulder, and caught a glimpse of Bill’s face, before the muse turned away from him, stubbornly refusing to look at him.
He didn’t let go of Ford’s hand though, still holding it in place.

It was almost like the dream just wanted a hug from Ford.

Ford hesitated for a moment, his paranoia becoming indecisive, unsure. He knew if he let his guard down, that would be when the nightmare struck, but so far this dream was innocuous.

It was giving him exactly what he wanted, a peaceful moment with his muse back.

Mentally arguing with himself, Ford wondered what the harm would be in going along with this for a few moments. If the temporary high would outweigh the cost, then perhaps Ford could justify just letting go, giving into this. He wanted to, he wanted to believe that he could have a peaceful night’s sleep, a good dream for once, but he wasn’t stupid, nor was he that optimistic.

Still, perhaps if he went along with this, the dream would end that much sooner. If he got the peaceful part over with, the rest of the dream would run its course, and he’d wake up screaming like he always did and could put it all behind him.

Ford held himself tense, arguing with himself, and he noticed finally how still Bill was holding himself as well. He was stiff, tensed, almost exuding an aura of nervousness, as if bracing himself for rejection.

Ford adjusted his position again, before he eased into the action, stretching his fingers out to lace between Bill’s, gripping onto him.

He settled down behind Bill, spooning up to the god, and felt the tension in the muse seep away as he slowly relaxed back into Ford’s chest, nuzzling closer.

He still didn’t turn his face, Ford couldn’t see his face. It was like the muse was deliberately hiding from him, but the way he relaxed back into Ford’s arms was nice, and a far better scene than most of Ford’s nightmares.

There was something about this embrace that felt charged to Ford. Not just charged with tension, there was a physical electricity in the embrace that Ford didn’t get from his other dreams. It felt familiar to him, but for some reason he couldn’t put his finger on the why.

Nothing bad was happening.

Ford kept expecting something to go wrong, but they just lay there together, holding hands, pressing skin to skin.

Despite his paranoia he almost felt comforted, the way he had felt by his muse’s presence before. His skin was tingling where it pressed against the god, and he was hyper aware of everything, suddenly far more awake than he’d ever intended to be.

He sucked in a breath as he considered what could be happening, what he didn’t dare hope for.

That maybe this wasn’t just a dream.

He licked his lips tentatively, and shifted his shoulders as he raised his head from the pillow.

Swallowing his nerves back, he asked, fragile hope infusing his tone.

“Bill?”

Bill didn’t answer, and the silence stretched for so long that Ford began to worry, until he felt it.
Just the barest gesture.

Bill squeezed his hand.

Realisation flooded Ford, and his eyes widened.

He sucked in a breath, and reached forward, wanting to see Bill face to face, and as he reached out …

He woke up.

The radio was playing an advertisement for the local lumber-yard, and the sun was shining through the window.

Ford panted, his hand reaching out in front of him, as his eyes opened to the living room, papers strewn about the room, having blown off the table by a gust, sneaking in through the open window.

He blinked, and looked around the room, his heart beating fast, as he processed what had just happened.

Stanford looked over to the clock on the mantle, and the time indicated that he’d had been asleep for a full eight hours. He actually felt well rested, which was practically unheard of.

He looked down at his left hand, and still felt it tingle from where Bill had squeezed his hand. He felt it, it was real.

It wasn’t just a dream.

Bill came back.

Birds in the forest outside chirped congenially, and Stanford couldn’t help the awed smile that crept across his features as he looked at the sunshine outside.

For the first time in weeks, he felt light. Conflicted. Elated. Selfish.

Happy.

Chapter End Notes

This chapter is dedicated to MxQuincyQuinn who has kindly volunteered to be a friend, to beta read this fic from here on in, and help me pick up on grammatical errors in old chapters too.

Pyronica is basically just being a good friend, I keep meaning to write her giving unwise advice, but she’s been nothing but encouraging hahah. Eventually she’ll give bad advice, but for now she’s killing it. Also Sesquipedalian Jersey Shore sounds like the best show ever, lets not lie.

I hope you’ve enjoyed this chapter. Betrayal isn’t as cut and dry as you think, and Bill and Ford still have plenty of time to fuck things up for each other before things become seriously damaging. Look forward in the next chapter to more nightmares, to red bathrobe wearing cultists, and something I'm sure you won't get bored of, and that's a hint.
Am I reading your mind? 'Cause it's almost like you're touching me. There is no mistaking.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Fiddleford Hadron McGucket didn’t remember much of anything, but what he did remember was the feeling of fear, and as such, it took him weeks before he ventured out of his hotel room, for fear of open spaces.

He didn’t know much about what he’d been through, but what he did know is that something terrible must have happened, something life threatening, because every time he tried to remember, his hands started shaking uncontrollably, and the panic took over.

When he came to, sprawled across his hotel bed, feeling singed and sore, his amnesia was so prolific, it was a miracle he even remembered his name.

Or it was less of a miracle, and more of a pragmatic deduction. His name was on his drivers license, along with a picture, and confirming it was indeed him (unless he had a twin somewhere out there) Fiddleford Hadron McGucket had stared at his reflection in the mirror and wondered what went wrong.

Something must have gone wrong, terribly wrong in his life, if he was the sort of fellow who would wake up sore in strange hotel rooms, with no recollection of who he was and how he got there.

He wore a ring on his finger, so he must have been married, but for the life of him he couldn’t remember what his wife looked like. He must have had a decent amount of money, because the clerk at the reception desk said he could stay here for as long as he liked, as long as his cheques cleared, and so far they hadn’t bounced back.

He must have driven here, because the truck parked out the front was confirmed to be his, however Fiddleford decided to leave it where it was in the parking lot for the time being, because he couldn’t remember how to drive the thing.

He remembered the phrase ‘it’s just like riding a bike’ but he couldn’t remember how to do that either.

He remembered how to be afraid, and how to hide, and so he did those two things consistently for at least four solid weeks.

After a while though, he remembered how to be dissatisfied with food sourced from the hotel’s adjacent vending machines, and so he ventured out into the town, despite being terrified, to look for a place to eat.

Fiddleford walked along the tarmac road that led into town, rugged up in his warmest jackets, jumping at the rumble of every engine that passed him by, flinching at the rustle of trees in the forest, and the chirp of birds in the branches above.

He nearly jumped out of his skin when a battered old Fiat pulled up beside him, honking its horn.
“Mr McGucket! Mr McGucket, what are you doing out here? Mr –“

The driver of the car, a young man, a hoodlum presumably, with frightening tattoos decorating his bald skull, leaned out of his driver’s side window, smiling at Fiddleford, though the smile dropped from his face when he saw Fiddleford cower away from him, trembling.

“Mr McGucket.” The young man sounded worried, his brows creasing into a concerned frown.

“W-w-w-who are you?” Fiddleford managed to stutter, grasping onto his arms, hugging his coat tight to his chest.

“It’s – it’s me, Ivan.” The young man responded, sounding shocked. He had a peculiar accent, it sounded familiar, but Fiddleford couldn’t remember what the accent was called. “Don’t you remember?”

“No.” Fiddleford croaked, watching this ‘Ivan’ warily.

Ivan looked appalled for a moment, before his eyes widened, almost seeming to understand.

He leaned forward and asked Fiddleford.

“What do you remember?”

“Nothin’.” Fiddleford replied, and his voice broke, he was so scared. “I don’t remember nothin’. I don’t know what done happened to me, but I never been so scared in my life, and I don’t even know if that’s true.”

Ivan’s frown deepened, before he leant across and flung his passenger side door open, patting the car seat beside him.

“Come on. I think I can help you.”

“Y-y-you –” Fiddleford was still frightened. Despite the young man’s kindly manner, Fiddleford McGucket didn’t know who to trust, or who was out to harm him.

“I want to help you, like you helped me.” Ivan explained, softening his tone, and patted the seat once more. “You’ve helped a lot of people. I can help you get your memories back, and get you somewhere safe, and together we can figure out what happened to you. Does that sound alright?”

That did sound alright, it sounded ideal actually, but Fiddleford’s stomach protested deviating from his initial plan, and growled loudly.

“I – I’m hungry.” Fiddleford explained.

“I can buy you a meal at the diner.” Ivan suggested. “You’ve been there before, it might help trigger some recall. Come on, Mr McGucket, you can’t walk along the side of the road forever.”

“Are you a friend?” Fiddleford questioned, but stepped closer to the car, curious and tempted by the prospect of knowing more about himself. He just didn’t know if he could trust this strange tattooed fellow.

“I’d like to think I am, yes.” Ivan replied, and waved Fiddleford into the car. “Now come on, you’re going to freeze out there.”

His fingertips were numb, and, acknowledging that Ivan had a point, Fiddleford climbed into the passengers seat of the car. He closed the car door, and just sat there, shivering.
“No seatbelt?” Ivan queried, and Fiddleford looked at him, confused.

Ivan tsked and shook his head. “You’ve really done a number on yourself, haven’t you?”

“I can’t remember.” Fiddleford replied helplessly.

“No to worry, we’ll get you all fixed up in no time. I know how to handle this sort of thing.” Ivan declared proudly, and turned his keys in the ignition, the car revving back to life.

“And who taught you how —” Fiddleford asked, his question trailing off.

Ivan turned to smile at Fiddleford, and his smile was both indulgent and knowing, something that combined to be slightly perturbing to Fiddleford’s heightened state of paranoia. Ivan accelerated the car, driving down the road, and his answer sounded simple, but it rocked Fiddleford to his core.

“You did.”

Ford was almost eager to fall asleep this time, having showered and made his neglected bed specifically for the occasion.

While he did feel conflicted about this, this decision to seek Bill out again, he found he trusted Bill far more than he trusted the nameless voice in the ring at this point, which partially justified his choice. His choice to seek Bill out in the mindscape.

All conflict aside, he was eager to speak to Bill again, like they once had so easily. He missed Bill’s companionship, and questioned himself because of it, second guessing himself. If he was willing to let Bill’s assumed crimes slide in order to prolong their pleasant association, then he was right to question himself, his own moral standing.

However, Ford realised he could only assume the full extent of Bill’s wrongdoing, and the old adage was innocent until proven guilty.

So far there was enough circumstantial evidence to only pin three crimes on Bill; the way he treated Fiddleford, erasing his memory and frightening him (though it could be argued that Bill did it to protect Stanford), the way he treated Willow, murderously chasing her down through the forest (though it could be argued that Bill was provoked, as Willow shot first) and his initial lie to Stanford about the purpose of the portal, the lie that brought them together, and made a fool out of Stanford for believing him. That last crime Ford found much harder to forgive.

Much hung unanswered in the air between them, and the visions the voice in the ring showed Stanford lurked in the recesses of his mind, doubt cast on the veracity of the visions now that the mysterious voice had absented itself. Whatever godlike being had communicated through the ring, they had abandoned Ford, and so he turned to the god he knew who had always answered his calls with dramatic aplomb. Even to his own detriment sometimes.

Ford turned back to Bill.

He couldn’t say he wholeheartedly trusted Bill anymore, but he trusted Bill to behave the way Ford expected him to, and that made him eager to see the muse again, wanting to fall back into their old familiar rhythms somewhat selfishly.

His eagerness made it difficult to achieve the initial slide into slumber, his adrenaline racing while he lay there in the dark, and he wasn’t quite sure whether he’d successfully achieved sleep until he felt the bed dip beside him.

Holding his breath in anticipation, Ford opened his eyes, and looked to the side. He was still in his bed, but someone was there beside him, a familiar shape.

Ford looked over the black curve of Bill’s back, watching the way his tattoos glowed faintly, and could barely restrain himself from shaking the body awake, just to see if it was really Bill.

He’d had so many nightmares lately that he couldn’t be sure if what he dreamt last night was real or not, but it felt real, and there was something in Ford’s gut telling him that Bill was really there with him, in his dream. When he was awake, he ran the gamut of reasoning, chastising himself for even wanting Bill back here with him after all he’d been responsible for, but his subconscious was determined to see Bill again, even if Ford’s conscious mind had its doubts.

He could have imagined it, but he woke up after the last dream with a tingling feeling on his left pectoral, where the small black triangle was emblazoned into his skin, and he took that as a sign that his suspicions were valid.

He hadn’t been abandoned by Bill. His muse returned, had answered his call for help. And perhaps, finally, Ford could get the answers he’d been looking for.

If he could convince himself he was just looking for answers, and not his potentially world-murdering partner back, he could con himself into thinking that his desire to see Bill was above board.

Ford had a special talent for lying to himself. His subconscious was much more honest. He just wanted Bill back.

However, just because Bill had been there last night in his dream, there was no guarantee that he’d be here now. That Ford would be resting with his god, and not another gauche nightmare.

Ford propped himself up on his elbow and tried to peer at the body beside him.

“Hello?” Ford’s voice cut through the silence, and he was ignored by Bill.

Curving around Bill’s shape, Ford leaned over, draping his arm across the muse, trying to look at Bill’s face, but Bill jammed his eyes shut avoidantly.

Ford rubbed Bill’s shoulder, trying to turn the muse to face him.

“Bill?”

Ford could see Bill open his eyes, staring forward at the fabric of the pillow, looking somewhat annoyed.

“Bill, is it really –“ Ford asked, and saw his muse’s mouth wriggle into a conflicted looking frown.

The expression was familiar, and so innately Bill that it answered Ford’s question for him. It reminded him of the times he had Bill cornered, or torn between desires, that wriggly frown. It was a side to the god that Ford imagined not many people had the pleasure of seeing.
“Of course, it’s you. I’ve been waiting – but now that you’re here, I –“ Ford rambled senselessly. “I have so many questions to ask you, I –“ “Shut up.” Bill scowled, and grabbed Ford’s hand, tucking it against his chest again, like they had done the night before.

Ford let Bill capture his hand, but he propped himself to sit up further, looking down at Bill’s withdrawn form, curled up around Ford’s claimed hand.

“What? I don’t –“

“You don’t get to talk.” Bill shot Ford a venomous look over his shoulder, before turning away from him more prominently. “I’m still mad at you.”

Ford was thrown by that. Why would Bill come back here if he hadn’t, in some way, forgiven Ford already? He was holding his hand, obviously craving closeness. Why was Bill here if it wasn’t to talk?

In his own roundabout way, Ford had partially forgiven Bill, or at least made excuses for most of his actions.

Ford wavered awkwardly, looking between Bill’s face, and the way his hands clenched Stanford’s fist possessively, like he was unwilling to let him go.

It didn’t make sense, and while Ford puzzled on this dilemma, the guilt he’d been abating with the thought of being forgiven was welling up once more, flooding his chest.

“You’re mad?” Ford reasoned, and laid back down in the pillows, spooning around Bill obligingly, even as his mind drifted. “Then – that’s why you sent the nightmares.”

“I didn’t send anything.” Bill huffed, lacing his fingers with Ford’s, muttering bitterly. “It was probably just your own sickened conscience, making your own nightmares. As punishment. I hear that happens to guilty humans.”

“But –“ Ford was hanging on the possibility that there was some supernatural element to his dreams, something that would help him avoid accountability for them. He felt like he was being punished with the dreams, but he’d hoped he wasn’t needlessly punishing himself, like he assumed.

He now knew that Bill wasn’t above lying to him, but somehow this didn’t feel like a lie. “But they were –“ “Seriously fucked up. I know.” Bill remarked, idly tracing his fingertip over each one of Ford’s knuckles as he spoke. “Very creative. Didn’t know you had it in you. I had a flick through them once you hurtled back into consciousness. Did some digging. And here I thought you were Mr Well Adjusted.”

“You’ve been in my mind?” Ford asked, paranoia creeping back in, his shoulders tensing.

Bill scoffed derisively, and shrugged Ford’s hand off his shoulder. “Where do you think we are now, genius? God, you’re dense.”

Ford’s mind was racing, taking in that information. Of course, they were in his mind, he knew he was dreaming, but he didn’t know that Bill could flip through his thoughts like they were cards on a rolodex whenever he felt like it. With his deepest subconscious thoughts bared like this, Ford felt exposed, sorely vulnerable, and awash with shame as he realised that Bill must have been able to do this all along.

Master of the mind.

Of course he had. He was so stupid.

“I can’t help but agree with you there, Sixer.” Bill remarked, still tracing his finger along Ford’s knuckles. He paused, digging his fingernail into the fleshy part of Ford’s palm for a moment, as his anger and bitterness crept to the surface, lashing out. “Clearly I was scraping at the bottom of the barrel when I picked you. You were a mistake I shouldn’t have made.”

Ford frowned and felt the pressure ease on his hand as Bill let go, though he was sure he’d have the crescents of Bill’s nails in his palm when he awoke.

“You sure have some interesting dreams though.” Bill commented, sounding fonder than he should have.

“How many have you seen?” Ford asked, his stomach flipping with dread.

“All of them.” Bill replied honestly, noting the way Ford’s hand twitched at that, the way his whole body seemed to twitch, recoiling from Bill now that he knew his darkest daydreams.

“How long –“ Ford took a deep breath, and pressed on with his question. “How long have you been able to see them?”

“How long have humans known how to dream? I see everything, and this is my domain, as you’ve pointed out before.”

Ford frowned, and realised he caught Bill out on yet another lie, a long time ago. That night Ford first gave Bill a foot-rub, he’d said that he didn’t have access to the mindscape, to his dreams, but he’d been deceiving Ford, even then.

He wasn’t sure if things were different now that Bill was reunited with the mindscape, but in the past Ford thought he had caught the flaw in Bill’s all seeing routine. He certainly had the potential to see all, but the inclination, not so much. However, hearing that Bill had taken the time to look through his nightmares…

“Then even my dreams were –“ The word ‘fabricated’ hung silent in the air, but as Ford was thinking it, Bill heard it. He didn’t need to say it out loud.

Bill seemed to pause, taking that in, before he turned around in the bed, facing Ford now, his yellow eyes glaring up at him.

“How desperate are you to blame me for all of this? To make me this grand mastermind, lording over your every thought and subconscious shit show? How bloated is your ego, to believe you’re that important? That I have nothing better to do than to fuck around with your thoughts?”

“Then why did I –“ Ford had to ask, he had to.

“Why did you what, Brainiac?” Bill sneered up at Ford venomously.

“Why did I - love you?” Ford asked, his voice croaking in the delivery.

Bill’s brows bunched up, as if hearing Stanford say it pained him, and his slitted pupils darted all over Ford’s face, as if taking him in for sincerity, uncertain and hurt.
“I don’t know … why you would.” Bill eventually responded, and the pain was evident in his tone.

Ford blinked at Bill, taken aback by the vulnerability that was written all over his face, the vulnerability that felt genuine, too raw to be faked.

“Not that I’m not the best thing that’s happened to you.” Bill fumbled with his save, trying to look un-phased instead of heartbroken. “Clearly, I am, if you look at your circumstances. And humans will latch onto anything and become dependent. It’s an archetype of your species. I mean, let’s face it Sixer, you’re pretty pathetic without me here. I could count on one hand how frequently you’ve bathed in the past six weeks, one of my hands, not yours.”

Ford wrinkled his nose, noting Bill’s censure of his hygiene, taking it on board.

“But if you were desperately looking for some manipulation or reason you’d have to think that about me, that I - you’re looking in the wrong direction.” Bill admitted. “That was all you.”

Bill looked down and began twining his fingers through Ford’s chest hair. “I don’t exactly have a point of reference to make something like that happen, and besides – it’s not like it matters now.”

“What do you mean?” Ford asked, tilting his chin down.

“Casting me out of that body said it all, Sixer.” Bill continued to loop Ford’s chest hair around his fingers, pulling at it slightly as he spoke. “Your overinflated sense of guilt doesn’t change how it went down. Your banishing circle made things more than clear.”

Ford sucked in a sharp breath, and exhaled, trying to stay calm. Bill was right though, as hasty as his plan had been, it spoke with finality. A finality Ford was coming to question.

“How long have you been planning to turn on me?” Bill asked, resting his palm over Sixer’s heart, feeling his pulse for sincerity, trying to keep his tone light and inconsequential, when really he was hanging on Sixer’s answer like it was the sole lifeline to his sanity.

“It wasn’t pla-“

“DON’T lie to me.” Bill fumed, and for a moment his form seemed to extend beyond the shape of the vessel on the bed beside Ford, lightning striking outside of Ford’s bedroom window, casting a larger, triangular shadow against the wall. “Don’t you dare.”

“How long have you been lying to me?” Ford had to ask, his gaze darting between Bill’s shadow, and the muse laying beside him, locking eyes with Bill’s slitted, angry stare.

“Is that your answer?”

“It’s a legitimate question.” Ford frowned, and Bill’s left hand gripped tight onto Ford’s right hand, squeezing painfully.

“Then you’ve been planning this from the start?”

“I wasn’t planning to be duped by you.” Ford snarled, and tried to yank his hand away, but Bill just held on tighter, baring his teeth at Ford.

“But what else were you planning? Huh? All of it? Did you plan all of it?”

“All of wh-“

“Using me! Trapping me here! Cutting me off from my magic. Manipulating me!” Bill hissed his accusations at Ford, his toes curling up against Ford’s leg to tangle with the human’s leg hair.

“You did – that’s what you did to me!” Ford’s tone was offended, defensive. Bill was squeezing his hand, twisting it, and Ford, not wanting to be bested, twisted back, the two of them pulling, hurting each other. “You did –“

“So that makes it right, huh? Tit for tat. What I want to know is, who struck first?” Bill jutted his chin out, and leaned forward into Ford’s space, a mere centimetre away from Ford’s face. “How long has this been your goal?”

“This was never my goal, this was –“ Ford made a frustrated sounding noise in the back of his throat, before he reached out with his free hand and grasped Bill’s hair, tugging on it, but not pushing Bill away. “I’ve lost everything because of you, and this isn’t –“

“That’s rich Sixer, it really is.” Ford could feel Bill’s breath puff against his lip as he laughed derisively. “You don’t even know what loss is. You aren’t even capable –“

“You don’t know how capable –“ Ford hissed, as Bill reached forward to dig his nails into Ford’s shoulder, retaliating. “You wouldn’t know, you lied. You’re a liar –“

“I’m the liar!” Bill’s eyes glinted with violent mirth as he leaned further into Ford’s space, relishing the pain in his scalp as Sixer pulled his hair. “You’re lying to yourself even now.”

“I don’t want you here. I don’t want this.” Ford looked desperately down at Bill, taking in all the details of his muse’s monstrosity, lurking. The brewing red in his eyes, the way his shadow crept up the wall like a growing, bubbling, many armed morass of deception, the way he was gripping onto Ford’s hand, his nails growing sharper, like claws. “I don’t want you.”

Bill curved his nails in painfully to Ford’s skin and pulled him close, bumping their foreheads together. He hissed up into Ford’s face, maliciously, passionately.

“Liar.”

Ford closed the scant gap between them and mashed his lips to Bill’s, breathing in the ozone that was encapsulated in his breath once more, feeling alive.

Bill blinked, startled, and melted slightly into the kiss, his eyes lidding, before he tensed, his shoulders bunching.

He smacked Stanford’s chest, thumping him, and pushed himself away, hitting him again for emphasis.

“No! You don’t get to do this. I’m still mad at you.”

“And I’m still mad at you.” Ford responded, and chased after Bill, invading his space.

“You’re mad at yourself.” Bill insisted, holding Ford back, both hands resting on his chest now. “You think you’re stupid for not having caught on sooner.”

“Is that what you think?” Ford’s lip curled, hating the way Bill knew him so well. He flexed his arms, still driven to seal Bill’s mouth shut with his lips.

“No.” Bill shook his head. “I think you’re stupid because you ruined everything, and you didn’t even listen to me, like you were supposed to.”
“I’m stupid for not listening to your lies?” Ford scoffed, straining against Bill’s arms, still wanting to crowd the contrary creature he was unfortunately drawn to. “I should have let you lie to me some more, and done as I was told? Is that it?”

“Oh, grow up Sixer.” Bill sneered at the scientist. “Lies are just truths you don’t agree with. If I were to tell you I never lied to you, what would you say?”

“You’re lying to me again!” Ford spluttered, incredulous that Bill would even say that. It was what he wanted to hear, but he knew it was a lie.

“Ha! Boring and predictable. Clearly the wrong choice of scientist.” Bill gestured derisively at Ford.

“Then why did you choose me in the first place?” Ford demanded to know.

He was angry, goddammit, and talking to Bill was only stirring him up more. He wasn’t getting the answers he wanted, the answers he came for. Only frustration, confusion, and one kiss rooted in poor decision making.

Bill narrowed his eyes at Ford and tilted his head to the side. “Huh. You know what? You choose IQ. Make up your own answer.”

“I want your answer!”

“If everything I say is a lie, why bother? You either trust me to tell you the truth, or you think I’ve never told the truth in my entire existence.” Bill threw his hands up, smacking Sixer emphatically in the chest again. “Your mind is the most black and white fiend produced by evolution’s cruel hand since the zebra decided it didn’t want to look like the other horses. I mean, really.”

“But, that doesn’t make any sense.” Ford blustered, thrown by the comparison.

“YOU don’t make any sense.” Bill countered, crossing his arms childishly. “Stop staring at me like you want to devour me, if you hate me so much. Your backhanded worship is giving me a headache.”

“I do not wor –“ Ford began, but Bill interrupted him, adopting a mocking tone.

“Gee Bill, I wish you were here. I miss spending time together. It almost makes me look forward to the nightmares.” Bill’s sing-song tone dropped, and he glared at Ford. “So desperate. You are such a liar, Stanford Filbrick Pines. A bald-faced liar. And you have the nerve to act like lying’s the worst thing I could have done to you.”

“How can I miss you, or want you here, when everything between us was based on a lie?” Ford blurted out angrily, reaching out to grab Bill’s shoulders, wanting to touch him even as he chastised him. “What we had together, everything it’s based on - what we have isn’t real!”

“Neither is this!” Bill waved his hand, gesturing at the body Sixer made for him, before lifting his true arm from out of the flesh, waving the thin black noodle in front of Ford’s face. “And that’s your doing! You made the lie!”

“That’s not what I’m talking about now.” Ford grit his teeth stubbornly.

“When will you talk about it? You forcing me into this body was just as much about manipulating me to work on the portal as it was me manipulating you to work on the portal, and you know it.” Bill pointed at Ford, his jaw jutting out stubbornly.
“You lied to me about my destiny.” Ford scowled emphatically.

“Oh, so now you want to talk about your destiny, about the portal?” Bill exclaimed sarcastically. “Where was that listening comprehension before you dissolved my finer cells? You had your chance to come to me and talk before you turned on me literally overnight.”

Bill’s voice raised with his frustration, every word emotionally charged with betrayal, and Ford watched, aghast, as his muse shrieked at him, finally recognising his impact.

“You had everything you wanted. I gave you everything you wanted. Everything was fine, and suddenly you wanted to banish me? You don’t just decide to do that overnight, so you had to be planning this from the beginning.”

Ford noticed fire dancing on his back wall now. Bill was getting more and more irate, throwing his accusations at Stanford, and his expression was one of utter betrayal that Stanford knew he had to cut off at the quick.

While he wanted Bill to think he was capable, he didn’t want him to think he was capable of this.

“I didn’t plan –” Ford leaned forward and grabbed Bill’s wrists, holding them close together to capture the god’s attention. “I didn’t plan to turn on you.”

“Then why did you?” Bill looked up at Stanford’s face, clearly upset and angry, hanging on his answer.

Ford thought he had answers to that question. That he thought that he had to, that he was trying to save the world, that he wanted to ensure the portal was used responsibly, that he still wanted to achieve his destiny. But all those answers fell away, and he looked at Bill with longing, wanting his muse back the way they were.

“I don’t know.” Ford uttered, sounding distant, and unsure of himself. “Why did you choose me for all of this?”

Bill thought he had answers to that too. That Ford was gullible, that he had a high IQ and a low self-esteem that made him uniquely susceptible to praise, that he had the skills Bill needed to craft the portal, and the determination to follow through. Those were all the reasons why Ford would have been a good mark, why Bill could have conned him into building the portal. But that didn’t explain why Bill chose him.

Bill blinked at Ford, and swallowed, before answering in a muted, defensive voice.

“I don’t know either.”

Ford stared at Bill, torn between dissatisfaction at that simple answer, and understanding, since he couldn’t give Bill a better answer himself. They were in the same boat, in a way, and after the chaos that was that fateful day Ford banished his muse from his vessel, they were both dealing with the hand their actions had dealt.

Ford’s brow creased, and his eyes scanned Bill’s face, his expression searching. He was still conflicted. He didn’t know whether he could trust Bill to be honest with him, or if he just wished that he would be. He didn’t know how culpable Bill was, if those visions from the ring were truthful. Somehow Ford lacked the courage to actually ask Bill, preferring to leave the truth of Bill’s cosmic actions ambiguous, so he could still deny them while it suited him.

Bill mirrored Ford's confused expression back at him, his eyes glowing gold in the dark.
Ford thought about magnets, and polarity, in a daze as he stared at his wayward god.

He pondered how he and Bill were polar opposites in this instance, creatures with different purposes, different temperaments, and different moral codes, dissimilar in all the ways that mattered.

He thought that, all things considered, they should stay away from one another, Bill at one end of the earth and Ford at another, separated for the good of the world, potentially the good of the universe. Bill was the Arctic and Ford was Antarctica, and logically they should be kept far away from each other at all times, Pangea be damned.

Ford thought about magnetic attraction, and how magnetic polarities were always attracted to their opposites, how you could put two magnets side by side next to one another on a table, and want them to stay there, but somehow one would always slide across to meet the other, regardless of any stipulations otherwise.

He didn’t know who slid forward first, him or Bill. He just didn’t know.

Suddenly, his lips were pressed to Bill’s again, and he kissed him, uncertainly.

Bill seemed to freeze. It took a few seconds of dire uncertainty before Ford felt it, the scantest pressure returned against his lips.

Ford dragged his bottom lip across the corner of Bill’s mouth tenderly, and pressed another small kiss there, wanting Bill to warm up to him as he’d once done, but every gesture was reserved, held back.

Ford pressed another urging kiss to Bill’s lips, and he felt Bill’s mouth twitch tellingly, like everything he was holding back was hovering on the verge of tumbling over, relentless, his feelings a force of nature.

Yet impossibly, he managed to hold off enough to push away from Ford again, staring at him with astonishment.

“This isn’t going to work.” Bill insisted, but his arm curved to loop around Ford’s neck, stroking the stubble on his cheek. “Never in a million infinite years.” Whether he was stating this for Ford’s benefit or his own was uncertain.

“Is that a prophecy?” Ford asked, his brow quirking with the question.

“You know I don’t go for that.” Bill shook his head, grinning at Ford, despite himself.

“Then it’s hardly set in stone, is it?”

Bill laughed, and it felt genuine. Ford was rewarded with a sliver of that same feeling of uncomplicated affection he felt before he found out about Bill’s plans, and he imagined there was some hope for them after all, regardless of what common sense implored.

Bill hummed contemplatively, and settled in comfortably, looping his arms around Ford, leaning in to breathe in Ford’s skin.

“I suppose not.”

Ford felt Bill melt against him as he once had, drinking in the god as they kissed like they used to, exhaling relief into the moment.
Bill murmured against Ford’s lips. “Does this mean you’re mine?”

Ford placed Bill’s hand over his heart, over the black tattoo etched there, and lapsed into a moment of heartfelt emotional honesty.

“When was I not?”

Bill made a contented noise again, lips stretching into a smile, and reclaimed his human with endless kisses.

Ford considered this a pleasant dream.

Ivan looked across the small diner booth as Mr McGucket picked up the square shaped napkin dispenser and turned it over in his hands compulsively.

It must have been familiar to him. Motor memory is less malleable than emotional memory, and Fiddleford went through the motions of turning the cube over in his hands, finding it soothing.

“Do you remember this place?” Ivan questioned curiously.

“Vaguely?” Fiddleford looked around the rail-cart restaurant, watching the restaurant patrons with barely disguised paranoia. “My head’s been hurtin’ more since I got here, so I reckon that’s somethin’. Somethin’ uncomfortable.”

“Recovering memories is always a rough process.” Ivan laced his fingers together and rested them on the tabletop, watching Fiddleford inquisitively. “Though generally the recovery process involves more visual aids than this.”

“Are you dealin’ with many amnesiacs?” Fiddleford asked, frowning.

“Voluntary amnesiacs for the most part.” Ivan nodded. “Most of the people who erase partial memories don’t intend to relive them again. People who erase memories generally don’t want them back.”

“And you erase memories?” Fiddleford questioned.

“Actually, you do.” Ivan replied, tenting his fingers at the frightened scientist. “And I’ve learnt the basics from you, though I don’t have nearly the same depth of knowledge as you, and most of the mechanical engineering involved goes right over my head.”

Fiddleford looked at Ivan’s head, noting again the peculiar tattoos. Fiddleford remembered the word Phrenology, though he wasn’t sure why. Odd phrases and concepts kept cropping up in the back of his mind, signalling a wider base of knowledge kept just out of reach. Though now he was on track to getting answers, more things became clear in the recollection.

“An’ your tattoos? You’re clearly invested in the mind.”

“Phrenology.” Ivan gestured to his head, and Fiddleford privately congratulated himself for remembering correctly. “Honestly, barring some old textbooks, my understanding is rather limited.
Phrenology is an outdated field, and I got these tattoos because I thought they looked cool. I used to be a carny for the circus. A travelling carnival, technically. That’s where we met. Do you remember?"

“Not really.” Fiddleford admitted, scratching his scalp as he spoke.

“You’re a scientist, a gifted engineer - and you helped me fix the ferris wheel.” Ivan explained.

Fiddleford screwed his eyes shut, and scratched at his scalp some more, before shaking his head, gesturing across the table at Ivan.

“I’m sorry, I – ferris wheels and carnivals and cerebral recall – I’m still not gettin’ why you’re talkin’ about erasing memories. I just – I want to know what happened to me?”

“Ah, yes.” Ivan drummed his fingertips on the tabletop awkwardly.

Fiddleford watched him expectantly.

“How do I put this? Well you see - you invented a device, called a memory ray, which interfaces with frequencies in the brain and deletes unwanted memories.” Ivan pressed his fingertips together as he spoke. “As far as I’m aware there’s only three in existence. What I think must have happened is that there was some sort of incident with the ray that might have caused you to erase your own memories.”

“You think I did this to myself?” Fiddleford scoffed, disbelieving. “Why in sweet Sampson’s name would I do this to myself? I don’t – this is terrible!”

“I don’t know the exact circumstances… uh.” Ivan leaned across the table further, frowning. “Are you sure you don’t remember anything?”

Fiddleford looked at Ivan like he’d just said the most idiotic thing possible, and he shook his head. “No.”

“Ah. I thought being in a familiar place would start jogging your memory.” Ivan pressed his fingers together, flexing them in a distracted manner. “Are you sure none of this is familiar?”

“No.” Fiddleford answered, crossing his arms stubbornly.

“Bother.” Ivan muttered.

“I thought you said you knew how to deal with this. How to reverse it?”

“Well, without the tape canister from the device that you used, I’m mostly grasping at straws here.” Ivan shrugged, laughing nervously.

“What tape canister?” Fiddleford asked.

“Well, I presume you don’t have it with you, or else you’d have used it by now to recover your memories.” Ivan scratched his chin awkwardly as he spoke. “We keep all of our memory canisters in the hall of memories, but you must have used your own device, because the one we keep has been under lock and key since our last session. Unless something happened with your prototype design?”

“What are you talkin’ about? What prototype design?” Fiddleford questioned, frustrated now that there were so many variables in the table when it came to recovering his missing memories. Even turning the napkin dispenser around was doing little to soothe his frustration. He couldn’t twist it, the metal didn’t budge. It didn’t feel right.

“You said you had a prototype that you first made and showed to your scientist friend, and then you began working on the next one. Do you remember?”

“Vaguely.” Fiddleford frowned, and flexed his fingers against the napkin dispenser, not getting the sensation he wanted out of turning it over in his hands.

“What about him? Your scientist friend! Stanford, I think it was.” Ivan looked up at Fiddleford, suddenly struck with a plausible idea. “Does this have anything to do with him?”

“W-who?” Fiddleford asked, stuttering despite himself. He didn’t know why but the mere mention of this ‘Stanford’ had his pulse race fearfully, instinctively.

“The man you were here with when I last saw you. With the brown hair and glasses. You said he couldn’t know about what we were doing, remember?” Ivan prompted, leaning across the table further now.

“N-no.” Fiddleford’s tremors were returning as he tried to picture this brown-haired man. “I – I don’t reca-“

“He was here, recently, last time, with the other man. The one with the yellow hair.” Ivan’s idea had him sliding out of his seat, pulling Fiddleford with him, shifting them both to the booth at the end of the train cart. “You sat right here, and when I came in, you left and met me in the bathroom, remember?”

Fiddleford looked around the booth and could see from the seat Ivan had sat him in a clear view of the door, and the entrance to the restaurant’s bathrooms. His headache intensified, and the pain had his head throbbing, his vision blurring.

“I don’t –“ F gripped onto the table’s edge, his head spins making him feel sick. His shoulders were shaking, and his knuckles were white, gripping onto whatever could ground him through this.

Ivan was watching McGucket’s reactions, nodding approvingly. Mr McGucket was displaying all the symptoms of memory recall. It was painful to watch, but it was a good sign, it meant his subconscious was trying. Even without the tape canister, it was possible Ivan could still help Mr McGucket with this.

“I remember, when you left to speak to me, he turned around. The man with the blonde hair. He watched us go into the restrooms. Do you remember?” Ivan watched Fiddleford’s brow crease, trying to recall the man more clearly, and Ivan provided more descriptors, hoping it would help. “He wore a – a black shirt, he had dark skin, bright blonde hair. And his eyes were strange too. Like a cat’s. He had yellow eyes.”

Fiddleford sat bolt upright, his every muscle tensing, and terror crept over his face.

He looked horrified.

“Do you –“

“No. No. I don’t want to remember.” Fiddleford shook his head, his eyes unfocused, his shoulders shaking. “I don’t want to remember. No! No! No!”

“Mr Fiddleford –“ Ivan reached his hand out, leaning across the table, trying to soothe Fiddleford, but he reared back, and his trembling voice got louder, until he was shouting at Ivan.

“NO! I DON’T WANT - NO! NO! NO NO NO NO!”

“Mr McGucket!” Ivan pleaded, and looked around the restaurant. They were drawing stares, worried looks, and concerned faces. Mr McGucket was making a scene, shouting and rearing back from Ivan, and the young tattooed carny tried to shush Fiddleford, wanting to calm his violent reaction to his memories.

“It’s alright, Mr McGucket, it’s alright. Calm down.”

“I don’t want to remember, I don’t want to remember.” Fiddleford’s teeth were chattering, and he was looking around the diner like a cornered animal.

“It’s okay. You don’t have to. We can – just calm down. Mr McGucket, stop screaming.”

Fiddleford’s shouts levelled into panicked breaths, and he hyperventilated, leaning against the corner of the booth.

Ivan watched Fiddleford twitching, reaching for the napkin dispenser to compulsively turn it over again and again, mumbling under his breath. He was concerned to see his mentor react so strongly to this mental trigger. Something terrible must have happened to him.

Something involving his scientist friend. Stanford. The one he needed to keep secrets from.

Something that Ivan intended to find out.

Common sense clearly had no place in the mind.

The subconscious was like a teenager, giving into instinct and rampaging along, emotions heightened and visceral. Common sense took a back seat in the weeks that followed, as night after night Ford dove back into the mindscape, childishly seeking out that which made him feel content again.

“Fancy seeing you here, stranger.”

Ford spun around and slammed Bill back against the library stacks, journals tumbling off the shelves and onto the floor. He slid his hand up under Bill’s thigh and hefted him up. Bill laughed into Ford’s mouth and kissed him as the scientist held him up against the stacks, fumbling with his trousers. Bill made it easier for Ford and dissolved his own clothing with a wave of his hand, allowing the scientist access. Ford grinned and kissed Bill harder, dragging his lips across Bill’s jawline, panting amourous breaths against the side of his neck.

Bill laughed. “Is that your Id, or are you just happy to see me?”

“You’re terrible.” Ford breathed on a laugh and continued to press his lips against Bill in any way he could.

For someone who had once been avoiding sleep, Stanford Pines could confidently say that he was a very well rested man. Consideration and moral righteousness had no place in the mind, and certainly not while Ford was having such pleasant dreams.

Six weeks of fervent nightmares had worn Ford down, worn down his restraint, his ability to deny that he ever felt attraction for his callous, evil muse. The lack of proper sleep and isolation from answers had Ford second guessing his decision to banish Bill Cipher from the body he crafted for him, and that unchecked longing had Stanford eager to have Bill back, in any way he could get him.

He could feel guilty about their continued association in his waking hours, but those were becoming fewer and fewer.

His own prospects seemed so dim and dismal alone in the empty shack without Bill, without a purpose, unable to risk turning the portal on. With all of his usual expeditions and studies reminding him painfully of who he used to share them with, everything lost its appeal. As such his loneliness and self-derived abandonment drove him to slumber.

His sleeping hours now outnumbered the hours when he was awake, and he fell into an unhealthy ritual of sleep dependency, barely remembering to eat, bathe or exercise.

None of that mattered in the mind.

Not while he was here with Bill, and things resembled the way they were when things were better.

Ford was content to pretend. Playing pretend here wasn’t hurting anyone, everything he did was contained in his own mind, so it couldn’t hurt to pretend for a while longer that spending time with Bill wasn’t a disastrous lapse in judgement.

Bill gripped onto the shelves, his legs wrapped around Ford, ankles digging into his back, and a particularly forceful thrust upwards from Ford had Bill’s grip unsettle the shelf, breaking it, causing the mental books listed E through G to topple off the shelving, onto the floor.

Ford paused, panting, to look at the broken shelf.

“You didn’t need Emotional Maturity or Gnome Physiology anyway.” Bill shrugged.

“I worked hard on those Gnome studies.” Ford complained.

“Well, it looks like you wasted your time.” Bill grinned, and looped his arms around Ford’s neck, lacing his fingers through the back of Ford’s hair.

It was so much harder to be angry at Bill now that he had him here, it was so difficult to hold the muse at arm’s length for his actions.

Bill was hazardous and flippant, an inhuman disaster in his own right, yet Stanford couldn’t stay away from him.

While he had the muse here, gracing him with his regard, he didn’t want to risk anything that might send him away, so Stanford swallowed the chastisement that was on the tip of his tongue, keeping his censure of Bill at bay, and sealed his lips over Bill’s once more.

This scene was surely lifted straight out of one of the pages from Stanford’s fantasy section. An illicit coupling amidst the stacks of the library had all the appeal his teenaged mind imagined it would have, and because this little fantasy was playing out in a dream, Stanford could do without the uncomfortable press of the bookshelves, the gnawing self-consciousness, or the hushed strict silence limiting him from devouring Bill’s pleased sounds.

As this was a dream, Ford’s completion could last as long as he wished, but as his sheets became sticky back in the conscious plane, he felt his dream ardour winding down into a satisfied contentment, leaning forward against Bill to press relaxed kisses against his shoulder.

Bill watched him, and stroked his fingers through Ford’s hair, easing him into deeper relaxation.

“What about you?” Ford remembered to ask, watching as Bill’s clothes slowly rematerialized onto his body once more.

Unfettered by Stanford’s cruelly imposed fashion restraints, in the mindscape Bill chose to wear a slim cut suit jacket and slacks, the yellow collared shirt underneath marked with a bold brick pattern. His bowtie was untied still, and his hat, floating above his head, sat askew, addled by Ford’s ardour.

“You’re forgetting we’re in the mind, IQ. Out of the two of us, only you are ruled by the demands of a physical form. You saw to that yourself.” Bill rolled his eyes at Ford, obviously displeased.

“Then you were getting nothing from that?” Ford questioned, his brow furrowing.

“I wouldn’t say nothing. This still counts as a form of worship.” Bill shrugged. “But all the rest of it, that’s mostly for your benefit.”

Ford’s mouth hung open as he processed what that meant, indignant outrage creeping into his features.

“But I can still overwhelm you, right? Like I did with my worship before?”

“Nope.” Bill said, popping the p as he spoke. “You only overwhelmed me because that body couldn’t contain me at my peak.”

Ford scoffed, blinked, then scoffed again.

“But –”

“Big deal, so what, you’re not going to overload me with your worship anymore.” Bill shrugged. “I’d say that’s a benefit. Now I just get to enjoy it for what it is. It’s flattering.”

“But that means that – what we’ve been doing here - everything, the noises, and your reactions, and everything – was that all faked?”

“Oh, don’t develop a complex Sixer.” Bill waved his hand dismissively at Ford and straightened his top hat. “It’s nothing personal.”

“You faked –“ Ford squawked indignantly, and Bill slapped his hand over Ford’s mouth before he could get carried away.

“If you wanted a physical response from a cerebral being you shouldn’t have torched my body. Would’ve could’ve should’ve. Unless you’ve got a spare body lying around for me, this is as good as it gets, and as good as you’re getting. Got it?”

Ford made a muffled sound of complaint, before he pulled Bill’s hand back from his mouth. “But you faked –“

“Would your ego like it better if I didn’t respond at all?” Bill questioned quickly, and Stanford wrinkled his nose, contemplating that alternative.

Ford shook his head. “Still, I don’t feel right imposing this on you if you don’t want it.”

“I make it my policy to never do anything I don’t want to do.” Bill swore, holding his hand over his chest solemnly. “And to attempt to do everything I do want to, so spare yourself a crisis.”

“Fine.” Ford grumbled and picked his own clothes off the floor of his mindscape, not as skilful as Bill when it came to instantaneous changes within dreams. Pulling on his trousers, he continued to sulk. “Though for the record, I won’t have you faking anything else. There’ve been enough lies between us.”

Bill gave Stanford a strange look, and his expression had Stanford pause.

“What?”

“Do you mean that?” Bill asked, his eyes narrowed, focused.

“Do I – of course I do.” Ford’s brow furrowed, and he frowned, his grumpiness catching up with him. “I’ve had enough of the lies. If there’s something you’re not telling me –”

“Don’t you wag your finger at me. This isn’t my lie.” Bill snatched Ford’s finger, and held onto his fist, his expression still eerily focused.

“What do you mean?” Ford’s frown deepened, and he looked down at Bill’s hand, wrapped around his own.

Bill just stared at Ford for a while longer, before he lifted his hand. Or more accurately, he lifted his own hand - a black, wiry thin hand, rising up from the flesh of the vessel. The fleshy hand stayed holding tight to Ford’s fist, but this organic cosmic limb waved through the air in front of Ford’s face, mystifying him.

“Oh.” Ford looked down at the point where Bill’s true arm lifted out from the vessel, gold light peeking through the sensitive skin of Bill’s inner elbow.

“Oh.” Bill repeated, still staring Ford down.

Ford was conflicted for a moment, knowing what Bill was proposing. Shedding the lie that was the vessel Stanford grew for him. Whether due to nostalgia, or a desire not to frighten Ford, Bill had remained in the vessel Stanford had been dreaming about, filling the skin with his essence.

Ford was almost reluctant to discard this lie, the vessel he crafted so lovingly. He’d poured all of his favourite things into Bill’s human form, the vessel was everything that appealed to Ford, and it was familiar. He knew how to interact with it, knew how to please it (in theory) and he missed the physical warmth of it beside him.

Bill was proposing they finally do away with the lie, with the pretty fictitious vessel, and see each other properly, eye to eye.

Bill wanted to be seen exactly as he was, and Stanford knew he was being selfish, denying him that for the sake of reminiscence.

Ford’s silence must have stretched too long, because Bill’s arm began to sink back down into the flesh, a tinge of disappointment glancing over Bill’s expression.
Reaching forward, Ford grasped Bill’s hand before it departed back into his vessel and held onto it tightly.

His skin tingled with static electricity, touching Bill’s true form without the buffer of the vessel. It was a scintillating sensation, and thoroughly alien.

Ford swallowed and met Bill’s cautiously hopeful look. He squeezed Bill’s hand gently, and his skin felt mildly electrocuted.

“I don’t want you to lie for me.” Ford said, the words feeling thick in his throat.

Bill seemed to sense that despite Ford’s bold statement, he was still conflicted about this, and gave the scientist a sceptical look.

“I mean it.” Ford swallowed again, and nodded, assuring Bill of his sincerity. “I said no more lies, and I meant it.”

“You don’t know what you mean.” Bill frowned at Ford, unconvinced of his sincerity.

“I want to see you.” Ford insisted, and tugged on Bill’s hand lightly to emphasise this. “I keep coming here because I want to see you. I want to see all of you. No more lies.”

Bill watched Ford warily for a few more moments, gauging the scientist, hardly believing that Sixer could still want to see him outside of the physical fritters he designed for him.

Sure, Sixer liked him, but Bill wasn’t convinced that this feeling could stretch far enough for Ford to have his pie and eat it too. He’d barely managed to convince Sixer that he wasn’t a world ending monster, capturing his interest again through secretive clinches in dreams, he didn’t think Sixer needed to see him in all his angular glory.

He remembered how he’d compared humans to deer, skittish earth fauna, easily startled. He didn’t want to spook Sixer away now that he’d just reached a level plateau with him, but Ford’s stubborn face said it all, determination setting in around his eyes, in the crease between his brows.

Bill sighed, knowing he wasn’t likely to spook Stanford now. He’d stick out anything through sheer stubbornness.

Discarding the skinsuit was like standing naked in front of Sixer, there was an odd sort of vulnerable intimacy about it. Revealing to the stubborn human who he really was.

Bill’s arm stretched out, arching from the vessel’s skin, and the thin black limb became longer, until it pulled out the edge of Bill’s yellow side with it.

Stanford watched, awe affecting his stubbornness now, as Bill lifted himself out of Stanford’s homemade vessel.

He pulled himself out of the body, and just seemed to keep pulling. More and more of Bill’s glowing yellow expanse stretched out of the body’s shell, filling the mindscape.

Ford’s chin tilted up as he followed Bill’s reveal with his eyes. Bill’s body had already hit the spacious ceiling of Ford’s mindscape, and just kept stretching, as tall as a skyscraper, and getting taller. It seemed like he’d only pulled half of his true form from the body, his angles curving as he stretched out of the skin he was imprisoned in.

As more of Bill extended out from the vessel, the body Ford designed began to sag and crumple, like a withered apple core, until it reduced down even further. The hand around Ford’s fist crumbled and shrunk away. By the time Bill was free from his human form, the skin was a husk left curling on the ground, gradually crisping into dust.

Ford arched his back to encapsulate Bill’s true form in his gaze. He couldn’t look away. The majesty of his cosmic companion was truly a sight to behold.

A giant, gold, glowing triangle, towered over Ford, his large eye shut, long lashes fanning out across his surface. Each lash must have been roughly the size of an Olympic length swimming pool, and Bill’s thin black limbs grew proportionately. Ford was hardly the size of the tip of Bill’s thumb, and the notion was intimidating, causing Ford’s stomach to flip in strange ways.

Bill opened his eye, and looked down at Stanford, noting the way Ford held his jaw tense, how he swallowed his trepidation back.

Not wanting to spook Sixer with the truth of his nature, his cosmic scope, Bill promptly shrunk himself down to about the size of a dinnerplate, and floated in front of Ford’s face, watching him cautiously.

Bill waited for Ford to speak.

Ford swallowed again, before nodding wordlessly, taking that in.

Clenching his fists as he processed it, his mouth feeling oddly dry, despite the fact he was dreaming, Ford watched Bill closely.

“I see.” Ford croaked.

“We’ve met like this before.” Bill pointed out.

“Not like this.” Ford shook his head. “I may have seen you before, but I didn’t –“ “Understand?” Bill offered.

“No.” Ford tried to exhale some of the tension from his shoulders. “No, I didn’t.”

Bill hummed and he sounded vaguely amused.

Ford realised he was still clenching his fists, and he fanned his fingers out, shaking out his arm, before swinging them idly back and forward. Trying to look less visibly rattled, aiming for something more casual, Ford asked.

“So – how am I taking it?”

“Better than most.” Bill’s brow seemed to quirk at Ford, his single eye watching him appraisingly. “Certainly, better than most humans.”

“How do most humans take it?” Ford had to ask. “When they see this? How do they react?”

“Oh.” Bill shrugged and waved his hand flippantly. “They all go mad.”

Ford coughed, startled that Bill had thought to expose him to his true form at the risk of his sanity, and Bill started laughing loudly.

He reached forward to smack Ford on the back, aiding his coughing fit. “I’m just kidding. You should have seen your face.”
Ford exhaled, and gave Bill an annoyed look, oozing spiteful sarcasm. “Funny joke.”

“It was for me.” Bill replied, his eye curving up, clearly smiling at Stanford.

Gauging Bill’s expressions was different now that Ford couldn’t rely on human body language to fill the gaps for him. Bill’s true form had no mouth, only one wide, expressive eye. He seemed to glow brighter when he spoke, and the air in his immediate proximity was charged with an odd sort of electrical impulse that hinted at his emotions.

Ford felt warm and tingly simply standing next to him and assumed this was what Bill’s amusement felt like. The hairs on his arm were standing on end from the sensation, and he shuddered to think what less positive emotions would feel like.

Still, Ford’s scientific curiosity couldn’t help but feel drawn to Bill’s true form, and while Bill watched him hesitantly, Ford reached his hand out, intending to touch Bill.

When Ford’s fingers neared Bill’s small thin frame, he floated back slightly, watching Ford with caution.

“What?” Ford asked defensively.

“You really want to -?” Bill questioned, eternally perplexed by Ford, but shook his form – a gesture Ford read as Bill shaking his head.

“Fine. Let’s get this scientific inquiry over with then.” Bill gestured to his triangular body invitingly, though he seemed to radiate impatience and displeasure.

Ford hesitated, picking up on Bill’s tension, before he brushed his fingers lightly over Bill’s smooth surface. He was warm, brimming with that same electrical current, and his bricks felt smooth, not rough, like gold bars.

Ford’s eyes darted between the point where his fingertips met Bill’s surface, and his muse’s eye, noting that his discontent didn’t seem to fade as Ford’s inspection carried on.

Ford paused, and then pulled away.

Without breathing, Bill seemed to exhale, and Ford felt it in the air around him.

“Did I do something wrong?” Ford asked, cautious.

Bill blinked at Ford, surprised by the question.

“You seem tense. If you don’t like this, tell me. I know this anatomy is new to me, and I don’t want to make you uncomfortable by doing something wrong here. We don’t have to do this again if you don’t want to.”

“You want to do this again?” Bill blinked at Ford again, baffled.

Now Ford was the one who looked confused.

Bill’s bricks began to tint a light peachy colour, and he blurted out. “I thought you wouldn’t want to, once the novelty wears off. Humans don’t find this shape attractive, you’d be missing my old form soon enough.”

“You were the one who said I’d enjoy exploring new physicalities.” Ford countered, remembering Bill’s enthusiasm to be rid of the vessel on their last night together in person. He seemed eager to “I’d find you interesting in any form.” Ford continued, enjoying the pink tone that Bill glowed, satisfied that he could still gauge Bill’s reactions now. “And if this is how you prefer to be, then I’ll just have to accommodate it like you’ve accommodated me.”

“Well, aren’t you just –” Bill stared at Stanford, his eye wide with fascination and wonder as he took the human in, assessing him. He kept his assessment to himself, keeping quiet, watching Stanford until a self-conscious blush coloured his cheeks.

They stared at each other, awkwardly enamoured, until the dream began to fade around the edges. A loud grumble sounded out, Ford’s stomach, and he looked up to the fading ceiling of the dream with disappointment.

“You’re hungry.” Bill remarked. “When was the last time you’ve had food?”

“Before I fell asleep.” Ford answered, scowling.

Bill looked at his wrist, a wristwatch materialising, though the dial was unlike anything Ford had ever seen. “You’ve been out for – thirteen hours.”

“It doesn’t feel like it’s been that long.” Ford frowned up at the fading ceiling of the dream frustrated. “I hardly get any time with you anymore.”

“Time isn’t real, you know. It’s still a commodity though. Explains why we never have enough of it.” Bill shrugged and watched Ford’s library flicker. “Looks like this is goodbye for now.”

“There’s got to be a way, some other way I can see you without this happening all the time.” Ford grumbled, even as he was being pulled into wakefulness, clawing onto his dream as much as he could, not wanting to let it go. “There has to be a solution.”

The last thing Ford saw before consciousness wrenched him into the daylight, was Bill’s wide, lashed eye, blinking at him.

“You’re the genius IQ. You figure it out.”

Pyronica knocked on the door to the dream room. Over the past several weeks it had become Bill’s hide-away, and while she was pleased he wasn’t drinking again, she wasn’t sure she approved of him holing himself up, mooning over Sixer 24/7.

“Bill?” She called out, to no answer. She knocked again, and after several minutes she decided this polite bullshit wasn’t doing her any favours, and she let herself into the brick walled room.

Heels clacking down the corridor, Pyronica rounded out into the main chamber of the dream room and found her triangular friend.

Bill was reclining, laying on his belly with his face planted into Sixer’s dream mirror, thin black arms holding the mirror up to his face.
His bricks were tinting a rather fetching shade of peach, and his legs were kicking happily in the air behind him.

Pyronica crossed her arms, and tapped her shoe impatiently, waiting for Bill to surface from the mirror.

It took several more minutes of delighted leg kicking, before Bill finally pulled himself up from the surface of the mirror with a reluctant sigh.

“Are you done?” Pyronica asked, and Bill jumped, startled, fumbling with the mirror, before setting it safely down on the ground, patting it like it was a precious item.

“Do you know how to knock?” Bill spluttered, embarrassed to be caught like this.

“I did knock.” Pyronica replied. “A bunch. You were too deep in Sixer land to hear me.”

“Knock next time!” Bill chastised her.

“I did knock.” Pyronica sighed and rolled her eye. “When are you coming out of here, anyway?”

“When I’m good and ready.” Bill replied huffily.

“Just leave it alone. He’s gotta be awake by now anyway.” Pyronica gestured at the mirror.

“He’s just going to get some food, and then it’s one more sleeping tablet for Sixer, and another twelve hours of quality time.” Bill announced happily.

“Twelve hours. You’re making him sleep his life away! What happened to working on the portal?” Pyronica crossed her arms, frowning.

Bill clapped his hands together, feigning productivity. “I’m winning Sixer back, that’s part one of the two part plan to get the portal back in action, but right now Sixer is my priority.”

“Your priority?” Pyronica scoffed. “Look, Bill, you can have all the mental make-outs you want, but don’t kid yourself into believing that’s any sort of priority.”

“I am winning him over with my charm, and personality, and –“ Bill started listing on his fingers, growing extra ones to accentuate his point. “Cosmic glory, and eyelashes – Pyronica you just don’t understand it from a business perspective.”

“There is no business perspective!” Pyronica threw her hands in the air. “If this was a business-minded decision, we’d all be on earth by now, living it up. You are wasting time.”

“I’m winning him back.” Bill insisted. “I want Sixer back. He needs to be on my side again, and I’m getting there. He needs me. It’s a work in progress Pyronica, but it’s – I thought you wanted me to be happy.”

“I do.” Pyronica’s shoulders sagged, and she pointed to the door. “But there’s the investors, and the rest of the crew, and all of these things piling up.”

“Let Kryptos handle it.” Bill waved his hand dismissively, his eye drawn back to the surface of the mirror as colours swam across it once more.

“Kryptos?!” Pyronica spluttered.

“Listen, Py, if you could just schmooze on out the door again, that’d be great.” His eye was transfixed on the mirror now, captivating his attention once more. “I have a … business call.”

“It’s not a business call!” Pyronica shrieked, stomping her foot.

“Talk later. Bye.” Bill clicked his fingers, and the floor moved underneath Pyronica, the Quadrangle rearranging itself on Bill’s whim, until she found herself outside in the corridor once again, facing a brick wall.

Pyronica screamed, frustrated, and turned on her heel, storming away down the corridor, her cape billowing out behind her as she left Bill to his ‘very important business call’.

Repression was a well utilized tool in Stanford Pines’ mental toolbox.

As most addicts would tell you, when you are seeking the high you crave, you can justify anything logically in your own mind to achieve your goal. Stanford, through a mix of repression, backwards justification, and twisting the facts to suit his moral reservations allowed himself to chase the gratification that Bill’s company granted him, over and over again, cultivating the obsession into something addictive, something he preferred to the pains of daily solitude.

Ford had managed to justify the majority of Bill’s heinous actions, and the one thing he couldn’t explain or justify, the visions the ring, he wrote off as cosmic manipulation delivered through an absentee source. At the time he’d trusted the voice in the ring out of desperation and fear, but abandonment from the ring’s guidance had him turning back to Bill.

After all, it’s better the devil you know.

By all rights, having gone from avoiding sleep at any and all cost, to sleeping away his entire day, barely waking to eat, bathe or exercise, showed an unhealthy level of dependency, and a dangerous lack of self-awareness, but Stanford didn’t care.

He hadn’t been this addicted to sleep since he was first introduced to the mindscape, when Bill visited him in his dreams, but back then he had moderation, Bill didn’t visit all the time, ignoring him for weeks on end. He was forced to find a productive use of his time during the daylight hours.

Back then Stanford was just getting hooked on Bill’s regard, on his company. Now, having lost that regard for six weeks, Ford was desperate for Bill’s companionship once more, moral ambiguity be damned.

It seemed Bill was hooked on his company too, encouraging him to chase sleep whenever he could, whether through natural means or medication. Anything to mitigate the solitude that came with being consciously alone.

Since he banished his muse, the mindscape was the only place they could be together. Sleeping was the only way Stanford could talk to Bill face to face, and work through the issues between them, the betrayal he felt, the questions he had, and the attraction he still felt despite all moral reasoning.

It was like this guilty secret between them, this overpowering attraction, this inability to stay away from each other. They both knew that they shouldn’t be seeing each other, but that just made them want it all the more. While Ford couldn’t go back on his decision to banish Bill from the physical plane, he could eek whatever closeness he could from his muse in his dreams. At least he knew that seeing Bill like this was safe, he couldn’t do any damage to earth from the mindscape, and that almost justified Ford’s continued association with the god.

Bill was like a drug to Ford, and his own moral objections could only keep him away for so long.

“What about that one?”

Bill floated upside down, his fingers skimming across the row of books in Stanford’s mental library, before settling on the spine of the volume Ford pointed to.

Bill opened the book and flipped through the pages, reading aloud. “Birthdays, bar mitzvahs, borrowed textbooks, Bunsen burners, blow –” Bill paused, and gave Stanford a scandalised look, raising his eyebrow at him. “Well there’s the drawback to alphabetizing your experiences. You’d think that’d be a different genre, kept in a different book. Where’s your restricted section here?”

“You’d have to tell me.” Ford laughed, watching Bill, bemused.

“It’s your mindscape.” Bill rolled his eye. “These are your thoughts. Don’t act like I’m the librarian here.”

“And you can read them all like that?” Ford questioned, perched on a stack of books that stretched up alongside the bookcase, so he could sit eye level to where Bill was floating upside down, watching his muse inhabit his dreams, finally unrestrained from his powers.

“Read, yes. Most mindscaoe have doors, or walls, or pools, or some other metaphor you can jump into and inhabit, but your brain seems to work differently.” Bill explained, reclining casually in the air. “It could have something to do with your pedantic ability to compartmentalise, how you lock information away until you need to reference it. Your prowess with repression. It makes my job much harder, by the by, because it means I have to physically read through each page to find what I’m after, or you have to pull me into a memory with you. I can’t just breeze through and take what I want.”

“So that means you can’t read my every thought then.” Ford surmised, swinging his legs idly.

“I could if I had a mind to.” Bill snapped his fingers and summoned two of the blue floating armchairs down from the night sky above, cosying down in one of the chairs, pulling a teacup from thin air. “Just like settling down with a good book.”

“But that would take time, though.” Ford reasoned, and leaned forward, trying to reach out with his free hand for the edge of the second armchair. “And energy. So, in theory, I could hide thoughts, assuming you wouldn’t have the time or inclination to find them.”

“I think you underestimate my attention span.” Bill scoffed and kicked the other armchair closer to Ford so he could climb onto it. “Especially when it comes to you.”

“I think I have a fairly good idea of what you’re like by now.” Ford grunted, as he threw himself onto the armchair, grabbing the back of the chair. He pulled himself up and sat on the cushions, looking down at the library of his mindscape below. He still wasn’t as comfortable with floating in his own mind as Bill was. For such an aspirational dreamer, he preferred staying somewhat grounded.

“Sure, you do.” Bill said, disbelieving, watching Stanford perch awkwardly on his chair.
“Recent events notwithstanding, I believe I know you.” Ford replied, self-assured. “Better than most anyway.”

“That’s funny, because when I look around here, it seems you can’t decide whether you ever truly knew me, or if anything I did was ever genuine.” Bill crossed his legs. “You spent so long trying to fit the things you saw into your own worldview, and now you’re reconsidering everything, and you still seem to think you know exactly what’s going on. Being so self-assured makes you naïve you know.”

“I wish people would stop saying that.” Ford frowned and shifted in his seat. “I’m not naïve.”

“Self-awareness is not one of your talents Sixer.”

“I’m plenty self-aware.” Ford crossed his arms, surly.

“Sure, I’ll let you believe that.” Bill rolled his eye.

“I may have forgotten to eat, or bathe regularly in these past six weeks on and off, but that doesn’t make me naïve. Mentally naïve.” Ford emphasised, trying to defend his mental maturity.

Bill laughed, and then gave Ford a judgemental look as he began reciting from Ford’s mental journal. “Oh, here’s a great example. Under B for Bill. Bill has proven himself to be one of the friendliest and most trustworthy individuals that I’ve ever encountered in my life. What a guy!”

“You can’t read that and hold it against me. That was from ages ago.” Ford blushed with embarrassment and tried to scoot his floating armchair closer to Bill so he could snatch the book from his hands. Bill was reading his reaction to the first few times Ford had met him, when he first appeared to him in dreams. Ford’s reaction then was far more naïve than he wanted to admit. “Give it back.”

“I honestly couldn’t trust him more. Not ever in any way.” Bill continued to read, swatting away Sixer’s reaching hand. “Bill is a true gentleman!”

“Well, obviously I know better now.” Ford scowled, and snatched for the book, his chair scooted right over to bump into Bill’s.

“Know better than to trust me?” Bill asked sourly.

“Know better than to let first impressions lead to biased assumptions.” Ford countered, huffing, and resting his elbows on his knees. “Why would you even read that out, if you want me to trust you so much. It doesn’t benefit you for me to second guess your honesty.”

“You second guess it anyway.” Bill shrugged. “At this point I anticipate you loathing me for several seconds before you come right back around to appreciation.”

“Do you anticipate it because it’s mutual, or because it’s a pattern when you read my mind?” Ford questioned gamely.

“It’s relatable, let’s put it that way.” Bill waved Ford’s book away, back onto the shelf. “The two feelings, loathing and appreciation, aren’t mutually exclusive.”

“Then you hate me?” Ford reasoned, his stomach flipping at the thought.

“Of course I do.” Bill leaned back casually in the chair, examining his nails. “Why else do you think I keep coming back?”
Ford’s perplexed expression qualified as a kodak moment. If only Bill had a camera. Instead he extended his fingers out and framed Ford’s face, enjoying the way his expression shifted from perplexed, to indignant, to resigned acceptance of Bill’s hijinks.

“Well, you don’t come back due to any incredible action on my part. I can’t do anything for you in here. I can’t surprise you with anything you don’t already know, I can’t provide for you, I can’t cook for you, I can’t touch you. It’s a wonder you’re entertained at all.” Ford bemoaned, running his hand through his hair in frustration.

“Do you think I’ll leave if you bore me?” Bill asked, watching Ford closely.

Ford swallowed, saying nothing, but his jaw jutted out stubbornly, meeting Bill’s eye.

“I might.” Bill added, knowing his own nature.

“Are you saying that to manipulate me?” Ford asked.

“I’m saying that because it’s true. You profess to know me Sixer. Tell me I’m lying.” Bill gestured to the human, resting a hand on the bricks beside his eye, reclining.

Ford chewed on the inside of his cheek as he dwelled on that truth. “I’ve been boring before. You’ve been saying it all along. You didn’t leave then.”

“Different circumstances.” Bill argued, perhaps for the sake of arguing. He knew he wouldn’t get bored of Sixer now, but it soothed his flighty ego to believe he could. “I didn’t have the option to leave before.”

“I thought you said that you wouldn’t leave me, if I were yours.” Ford countered, frowning. “We had a deal.”

“Are you saying that to manipulate me?” Bill parroted, sounding amused.

“We shook on it.” Stanford insisted, narrowing his eyes at Bill.

“So we did.” Bill conceded.

He let the moment stretch on a while, enjoying the tension in the way Ford sat, shoulders hunched defensively, before he waved his hand at the human dismissively.

“Oh relax. I’m not going anywhere. A deal’s a deal, and if anyone’s having trouble dealing with meeting in the mind, it’s you, not me. I’m used to this – but it’s frustrating you.”

“This?” Ford questioned.

“Intangibility, ephemeral conversations. A lack of physical reciprocation. A liminal relationship.” Bill listed, waving his hand as he spoke. “Unless you’re in my dimension, or I’m in yours, this is the middle ground, but since that’s not happening any time soon –“

“Are you using this as an excuse to start up the portal again?” Ford questioned defensively.

“You could if you wanted to.” Bill blinked at Ford, batting his lashes at the human.

“Pass.” Ford leaned back in his armchair and crossed his arms, stubborn.

“Or –” Bill raised his voice, a little frustration creeping into his tone now. “You could just complain more about how frustrated you are and see where that gets you.”
“Isn’t there some other way?” Ford asked desperately. “It’s not that I’m dissatisfied to see you, but I hate how distanced this feels. I want a connection.”

“We are connected.” Bill insisted.

“But I want a –“

“Ha. You want a physical connection.” Bill surmised and crossed his legs. “You know, nothing’s stopping you from going back to your racy, baser dreams. You can still have –“

“I don’t want another lie.” Ford scowled and lowered his chin. “Knowing that you don’t feel any of this, that the sensations only impact me on my end. I can’t even overwhelm you anymore. Knowing that your sensory reciprocation is feigned, your reaction to sensation – everything – pursuing it anyway just seems –“ “…Masturbatory?” Bill guessed, and Ford’s face flushed red, but he nodded nonetheless.

“Well, unless you plan to let me into your dimension, or you visit mine – though to be frank if we’re choosing my place or yours, I pick yours – then you’re just going to have to stay dissatisfied.” Bill kicked his legs back, lacing his arms behind his head, watching Ford wrinkle his nose at that conclusion.

“There’s got to be another way.” He rubbed his chin for a while, thinking, before he looked up, his expression bright. “I could build you another body.”

“Pass.” Bill rejected him quickly, hardly keen to go through the rigmarole of getting his powers unbound in a physical form once more. He didn’t put it past Sixer to bring him back in a new body and keep his powers bound for good, as a precautionary measure. That seemed like the sort of world saving ‘compromise’ Stanford would go for.

“But – “ Ford’s hopeful expression was cut short when Bill’s eye turned into a deliberate cross, his yellow body vibrating loudly, like he’d answered wrong on a game show.

“Well if you’re just going to reject everything on principle –“ Ford grumbled.

“I’m not rejecting everything, you just haven’t had any good ideas yet.” Bill countered, sipping from his tea, watching Ford patiently.

“Well what would you consider a good idea? Apart from opening the portal.”

“Hmm.” Bill stroked under his eye considering, before he clicked his fingers. “I could snatch up a temporary puppet, slip inside and give it a whirl.”

“You mean possession?” Ford questioned curiously.

“You like clandestine arrangements with total strangers, don’t you?” Bill joked, his eye curving with mirth as Ford’s lip curled at the thought.

“I’m not going to put my hands all over a total stranger just to spend time with you.” Ford narrowed his eyes at Bill. “I want to spend time with you – not - that’s – no!”

“I could pick you a pretty one?” Bill laughed. “What’s your type? Aging narcoleptic plumbers and three-year olds, right?”
“You are not funny.” Ford asserted, pointing at Bill chidingly. “Disgusting.”

“Maybe you’d prefer someone closer to home. I wonder what Specs is up to these days.” Bill rubbed under his eye and enjoyed the way Ford’s face reddened, Bill’s teasing getting to him.

“He’s married!” Ford spluttered.

“So, you’re saying you’ve never thought about it?” Bill questioned sweetly, reaching out his arm long to tip toe across the spines of the books on the shelf closest to him. “I could look.”

“He’s my best friend Bill, be serious.” Ford huffed.

“I’m your best friend, you didn’t mind with me.” Bill countered, shrugging. He was fixated on Ford’s reactions, teasing while probing him for details. He would be acutely jealous if Ford showed the slightest hint of favouring anyone else. “Who knows what you’ve been thinking, all these years. Since college even.”

“You were different, and you know it. Stop reaching.” Ford watched Bill’s fingers dance all the way along to the ‘F’ section, growing concerned.

“What about Wink-Eye?” Bill asked, drawing his hand back, staring at Ford intently, his casual tone belying the menace he’d bring should Ford reveal attraction to anyone but him. “Stink Eye? That back-stabbing trigger-happy Lumber-Jane who thinks you’re all that? Fancy working out your sordid frustrations on her?”

“Haven’t you done enough to these people?” Ford asked, angry now.

“I think you mean haven’t they done enough to me.” Bill placed his hand on his surface, oozing offence. “Red especially. I should take her for a long walk off a short pier for what she did. I’ve always wondered what drowning feels like.”

“Oh, because stabbing her in the leg with a fork wasn’t enough for you?” Ford eyed Bill off disdainfully, appalled by what he was saying.

“Well considering she shot me – let’s count now – SEVEN TIMES I’d say I’ve still got about six more attempts on her life until we’re even, not even counting her punishment for the disrespect. I call that due payback. Overdue even.” Bill announced, lidding his eye imperiously at Stanford, like he was turning his nose up at him.

“I can’t believe I would even consider putting you in their midst again. You just can’t help yourself, can you?” Ford narrowed his eyes at the triangle, his chin raising stubbornly.

“Neither can you, apparently. Always jumping to their rescue, siding with them out of this misguided petty loyalty, when they screw you over, over and over again.” Bill gestured to Ford. “Maybe that’s what you like though? Sixer - treat ‘em mean, keep ‘em keen - Pines. If someone doesn’t screw up your life in some way, they’re not even on your radar. Typical.”

“I don’t – I’m not some kind of masochist.” Ford shook his head, baffled. “You make it sound like...”

“I make it sound like it is, Mr Self-Aware. Look at your track record. Your ingrate of a twin, your disgraceful memory wiping colleague, your gun-toting damsel in distress who put you in this predicament by banishing me in the first place. There’s a pattern there. A self-sabotaging pattern. It’s almost a fetish at this point, really.”
“Wh –“ Ford flushed red at the notion, defensive now. “You don’t know what you’re talking about – that’s not –”

“TWO WORDS!” Bill extended his two fingers out in front of Stanford’s face.

Ford blinked at him indignantly, waiting for him to make his point.

Bill let the seconds drag on, content to monopolise Ford’s attention until his patience grew thin, when he finally spoke, oozing smug superiority.

“Cathy Crenshaw.”

Ford felt a physical wave of nostalgic embarrassment pass over him, before he pointed at Bill.

“How do you – how do you even know about that?”

“How, he asks. What don’t I know about is the real question Sixer. I know everything.” Bill replied smugly.

“That was – that doesn’t count. I was a child.” Ford crossed his arms, his face heating up.

“Teenager, technically. Don’t fudge the facts Sixer. Only you could delude yourself into developing a killer crush on the girl who consciously conspired to do every possible thing to make your high school experience a living hell.”

“She wasn’t – I thought she was, you know – pulling pigtails. That sort of thing.” Ford said uncomfortably, defending his past self’s lack of taste. “Kids do that all the time.”

“Animal cruelty is hardly an indicator of romantic affection Sixer.” Bill rested his hand below his eye, the triangular equivalent of chin handing, watching Ford squirm indulgently. “She socially eviscerated you, and you idolised her.”

“That isn’t – “ Ford huffed and shifted in the armchair defensively. “You shouldn’t even be looking through those memories. I never said you could go snooping through my thoughts Bill.”

“It was beyond embarrassing. She helped you reach new plateaus of social humiliation.” Bill remarked, sounding amused. “Conning you into doing her homework for her, pitting her vapid friends against you all through high school, taking you to senior prom as a prank only to throw her drink over you while everyone pointed and laughed. And to think you never noticed her numerous flaws until that very last indignity.”

“Aspirational is it? Since you think I supposedly have a pattern of choosing cruel life ruining partners.” Ford asked sourly, his defensiveness making his responses more barbed than usual. “Where do you fit in, I wonder?”

“I’m nothing like that bipedal hack.” Bill insisted, sounding offended. “I’m no Cathy Crenshaw, Sixer, I’m on your side.”

“Really?” Ford questioned sceptically.

“I’ve been on your side all along.” Bill claimed disingenuously. “From day one.”

“I thought you were on your own side.” Ford guessed shrewdly.

“Yeah, but I’m on your side when you’re on my side. That’s how tangential tessellation works.” Bill said brusquely, before moving back to his emphatic sales pitch on Sixer’s trust. “Can you honestly say that anyone else has had your back like this? Do you have anyone in your corner, besides me that is, who’s been fighting for you? For what you deserve? What you really deserve?”

“And you’ve been fighting for me, how?” Ford questioned lightly, leaning forward on his armchair, curious despite himself.

He found Bill’s attempts to court his trust endearing, despite knowing the muse probably had an agenda. It made Ford feel special, and Bill was good at making Ford feel special.

Thinking on it seriously, Ford realised he never really had anyone who fought for him before, not counting Stanley. Stanley had cost him his dream school, cost him what Ford had worked so hard to deserve, but he certainly never had any problems fighting. Still, Ford wanted to believe there was someone who fought to ensure he would get what he deserved, something Stanley never saw fit to fight for, Ford’s sorely denied recognition.

Supposing Bill was telling the truth, Ford could pinpoint the moments when his muse did fight for him. When he stuck his neck out for Ford, but not Fiddleford, dispersing his futuristic knowledge in defiance of the time police. When he harpooned the island head monster, saving them both. When he set fire to the hoard of zombies, enough to clear them a path to their grisly evisceration via showtunes. When he stood up to the bullies at the Carnival for him, grinning all the while, and when he saved his life those countless times while chasing the Gremloblin that kidnapped Fiddleford.

The more Ford thought about it, the more he realised his question was redundant. Bill had been fighting for him all this time, and Ford just didn’t appreciate it. Even now, his appreciation was twisted by the conflicted feelings he was plagued by, wanting to place his trust in Bill, but not knowing if he could.

While Ford was thinking, Bill huffed a frustrated breath, answering Ford’s question.

“I got back at Cathy Crenshaw for you.”

“What?” Ford blinked at Bill, jarred out of his contemplation.

“She was horrible to you.” Bill explained, shifting in his armchair uncomfortably now, like explaining this was giving away some kind of weakness on his part.

He was, in a way, telling a half truth. He didn’t go after Cathy Crenshaw because she mistreated Ford, he went after her because Ford once had feelings for her, and that wasn’t allowed. Sixer belonged to Bill.

“You think I’d just let that slide? You’re mine, Sixer. You’re not allowed to be treated like you’re sub-par, certainly not by some Machiavellian blonde cheerleader.”

“You –“ Ford was marvelling at that, marvelling at the fact that Bill had done what no one else had thought to do. Avenge his hurt feelings from high school. It was a strangely validating feeling, and Ford felt more inclined to trust Bill, or at least it made him want to. It was selfish of him, but the thought of Cathy Crenshaw getting her comeuppance had Ford giddy and elated.

“Huh.” Ford nodded to himself, quietly impressed, trying to smother his smile.

Bill noticed, and relaxed, Sixer’s pleased expression validating his decision.

Ford smiled to himself a little while longer, before he looked up at Bill, his expression far too fond.
“You know, I think I may have figured out a way that we can spend more time together after all.”

“Oh?” Bill leaned forward, blinking his lashes at Ford.

“But it requires some conditions on your part.” Ford continued, watching Bill’s expression turn sour.

“Oh?” He repeated, sounding far more bitter.

“Just one condition really.” Ford explained, lacing his fingers together, leaning forward in his chair, resting his elbows on his knees. “An understandable one considering that’s what’s come between us.”

“Do tell.” Bill floated closer to Ford, listening intently.

“I think I know a body you can have, to spend time on earth with me and feel sensations again, but you can’t have it unless you promise me you’ll stay away from the portal.” Ford insisted, imploring Bill with his eyes. “I know you have your own motivations for wanting it built, but if earning my trust back means anything to you, you have to promise me that you won’t go near it, that you won’t touch it, that you won’t interfere with it in any way. Not even once.”

“That’s your condition?” Bill asked, sounding thoughtful, like he was considering it.

“That’s my condition. You have to promise. If you break your promise, there’s no going back between us. There is no ‘us’ if you go near the portal. It stays in the basement, and you leave it alone, do you understand. If you go near it, you lose me forever. You have to promise.”

Bill was torn, stewing on this proposal. He knew eventually he’d have to take the portal back, he had his investors and henchmaniacs riding on him to follow through. Still, the prospect of spending more time with Sixer, of having Sixer’s regard and his worship for a little bit longer was all Bill selfishly wanted. He wanted to avoid his responsibilities with the portal for a bit longer, string it out further so he could prolong this feeling of being loved.

Maybe more time with Sixer meant that eventually he’d come around to seeing things Bill’s way. Maybe a promise now could bend in the future.

The portal had come between them, it was a shame it was so essential.

But Bill could postpone moving on the portal for a little while longer. He could take this time to enjoy Sixer’s company, to win him back, and who knows, maybe after a little more time together, Sixer might come around to seeing things Bill’s way. It was selfish, choosing this, but Bill was a notoriously selfish creature.

“Alright.” Bill eventually said, content to leave it at that.

“You have to promise.” Ford insisted and held out his hand. “I want you to shake on it.”

Bill hesitated again, eyeing off Sixer’s dextrous digits, weighing up the pros and cons.

Ford watched him expectantly, his throat knotted with tension, knowing how much was hanging on this promise. If Bill did this, agreed to this, maybe Ford could forgive him for lying to him, and they could move past this. But if he didn’t…

Reluctantly, Bill stretched out his own hand, and slowly slid his slender fingers against Stanford’s palm, grasping onto his hand.
“Fine. I promise.” Bill said, and Stanford squeezed Bill’s hand back, overjoyed that Bill agreed to shake on this, to compromise.

Stanford didn’t know that shaking on a promise was different from shaking on a deal.

“Excellent.” Ford grinned wide, ecstatic that Bill had agreed to go along with his stipulation. He pumped Bill’s hand up and down gratefully and couldn’t stop grinning, elated. “Excellent.”

“So what body am I getting then Sixer? What sad sap is handing the reins over to me for a cosmic joyride?” Bill asked, curiously. “Who?”

Ford sat back in his armchair, looking rather pleased with himself. He watched Bill smugly, and extended his hand, gesturing to himself.

“Me.”

Chapter End Notes

I have to say, this chapter is dedicated to The_Floating_World because never have I smiled so much at a review and bookmark descriptor as I did reading yours. I was grinning ear to ear and still do every time I read through the reviews. Made my day it did - no, my week.

This chapter had a lot, triangle Bill again! Cosmic size differences! Unhealthy sleeping pattern Ford! Cathy Crenshaw! And at the very end BORD! These next few chapters are going to be a lot of fun.

So look forward to body-sharing, going on dates in the same body, Blind-Eye shenanigans, and more! Thank you as always for reading, and I look forward to your comments on this chapter!
We can go dancing, we can go walking, as long as we're together. Listen to some music, maybe just talking, get to know you better.

Chapter Notes

Content warnings for this chapter. There is one sex scene at the start of the chapter, and towards the end of the chapter, a car accident.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Ford stood across from Bill in the void of his mind, his hand outstretched. Bill hovered between the stars across from him, watching.

“Are you certain you’re gonna commit to this?” Bill asked sceptically. “I don’t want you backhanding me like you did before.”

“I’m certain.” Ford insisted impatiently. “Besides, I can hardly disintegrate my own molecules now, can I?”

“Ha ha. You’re so funny.” Bill said dryly, watching Ford grin back at him cockily.

“I’m doing this to spend time with you.” Ford thrust his hand forward more prominently. “From now until the end of time, remember? I want to do this.”

“You say that now. Body sharing isn’t all sunshine and roses. You might as well kiss your privacy goodbye, you know that, right Sixer?”

“You say you’re always watching, so it’s not like I have much privacy now anyway.” Ford shrugged, and Bill blinked at him, flustered, his obsessive habits called out. “Besides, this is a chance for us to reconnect again. So long as you keep your promise, I doubt we’ll have a problem.”

“So long as you don’t mind sharing your body with me, there won’t be a problem.” Bill countered, floating closer to Ford.

“What’s mine is yours.” Ford gestured to himself generously, before holding his hand back out, eager to start this new experience.

“How domestic, and kinda sweet. Alright then, Sixer. Let’s do this.” Bill extended his own hand, wiggling his fingers, flames dancing in his palm. “Physical form - don’t mind if I do.”

Ford strode forward and clasped his hand around Bill’s, plunging it into the fire eagerly, and the moment their hands met, he felt his mindscape strip away from him, receding at cosmic speeds until it shrunk to the size of a pinprick, before expanding back out again in a dizzying rush, until finally –

Ford jolted awake, sucking in a sharp breath, and looked up at his bedroom ceiling.

He blinked, feeling no different, but soon he became conscious of what felt like a heaviness in the back of his head.

He thought it was a headache at first, and so he reached over to put his glasses on, blinking the blurriness away.

His skull seemed cramped, and he felt a flicker of sharp pain, before he became aware of that heaviness in the back of his head pushing forward.

He heard Bill’s voice in his ear.

Move over.

Ford blinked, thinking.

How? I don’t –

He blinked again, and suddenly the heaviness moved forward, into his eyes, making his vision blur.

Oh.

Bill blinked several more times, before he brought Ford’s hand up in front of his face, examining it.

Bill wiggled Ford’s fingers and Ford reeled at the bizarre sensation of seeing his body move without him moving it. He was conscious of what he was controlling and what he wasn’t, and right now he felt like a passenger in his own skull.

Immediately, Bill brought Ford’s fingers up to his face, and shoved two of them in his mouth, sucking on them.

Ford squirmed in the back of his head, as Bill pulled his hand out with a wet pop.

“So that’s what does it for you.” Bill spoke, his voice straining Ford’s vocal chords in new, unusual patterns.

I don’t – I didn’t –

Ford cleared his throat, and shoved his consciousness forward, taking control of his mouth again.

“I didn’t intend to give you this so you could –“

“Do exactly what you want?” Bill replied, and Ford’s throat felt scratchy, adjusting to jumping between his lower tone and Bill’s higher cadence. “No need to be shy Sixer. We’re both up here. No point hiding the truth from me now, I see right through it.”

Ford realised that Bill was right about the lack of privacy. He spared a moment in the back of his head to feel vulnerable and exposed, before he accepted the situation and tuned back in to what Bill was doing.

The muse was tiptoeing Ford’s six fingers down his chest like he was playing a sonata on the piano, his eyes glued to the movements, radiating childlike amusement in Ford’s mind.

Are you having fun? Ford thought.

“Six times as much fun.” Bill replied. “I don’t know how you do anything else with your time. This is such a novelty. Look at them go!”

You had fingers before, Bill.
“But I didn’t have your fingers.” Bill said, sounding pleased. “There’s a difference.”

Ford was content to watch Bill play for a while, before he seized control of his left hand, pinching together the fingers on his right.

“Is this really how you wish to spend your time now that you have a physical form again?” Ford questioned, watching Bill twitch his fingers away. “Twiddling your thumbs?”

“I’m twiddling your thumbs.” Bill insisted, shaking his right hand away from Ford’s grasp. “There’s a difference. Just because I’m not doing what you expect, it doesn’t mean I have to do what you want. This is body sharing, remember? Not Sixer traps Bill in a physical form again and gets to make him do whatever boring Sixer things he wants.”

Reminding him of his heavy handed first attempt to give Bill a physical form guilted Stanford appropriately, but his guilt was short lived.

“No one’s trapping—“ Ford sighed, as Bill sat up, springing out of bed, before walking over to the remaining trophies stacked on Ford’s bookcase, knocking them onto the ground one by one.

Ford struggled with his restraint for a while, still feeling guilty, not wanting to force Bill into anything now that he finally had him back here, but after watching Bill knock his bronze, silver, and gold statues to the floor, his patience was wearing thin.

“Just like old times, right Sixer?” Bill asked, clearly very amused. He reached to the engraved glass plaque Ford won for his dissertation on genetic dimorphism, anticipating the enjoyable tinkling noise it would make when it shattered on the floor.

Before he could knock the trophy over though, Ford’s patience snapped, and he extended his will, usurping Bill’s.

His hand froze beside the trophy, and Ford could see his tendons jumping as Bill tried to regain control over his arm.

It was a battle of the wills. Ford’s hand shook violently, fingers contorting and spasming into uncomfortable positions as Bill and Ford fought pettily for control over his right arm, Ford’s stubbornness making him a serious hurdle for Bill to overcome.

Ford could feel Bill’s concerted shock that Ford was stopping him from doing what he wanted, frustrated and awed that Stanford could so quickly stand against him when he agreed to let Bill assert his ownership over his body.

Sixer’s stubbornness was obstinate, and he strained himself to hold his right hand back, unwilling to let Bill ruin another one of his trophies out of pettiness and revenge. He focussed every part of his cerebrum into halting the movement of his right arm, so it caught him completely by surprise when his left hand flew forward to slap him in the face.

“What – Bill?” Ford scowled, and cupped his cheek, appalled that Bill had made him slap himself.

“Body sharing Sixer!” Bill retorted, stomping Ford’s foot for emphasis. “You said I could have this.”

“I said you could have my body to experience sensation again. I didn’t say that you could destroy all my trophies. Haven’t you done that enough already?”

“Will you never let that go? Hold a grudge much?” Bill spluttered, putting his hands on his hips, the gesture seeming far more camp, more quintessentially Bill, than it ever would if Ford did it. It was jarring to have his body move this way, and from an outsider’s perspective, he supposed it must have looked quite comical.

"Find something else to do.” Ford said, stubbornly crossing his arms over his chest. “Stop breaking my things.”

“What happened to ‘what’s mine is yours’?” Bill grumbled, as he stomped out of Ford’s room, down the hall to the bathroom.

What are you doing now? Ford thought, pushed back into his own head, as Bill walked into the bathroom, closing the door behind him.

Something else. Bill replied, his response clipped and sour.

He stopped in front of the bathroom mirror and glared at his appearance.

Ford watched, astonished to see that his eyes were now yellow and slitted, the only outward indicator of Bill’s presence within his head.

Bill turned Ford’s face left and right, rubbing the heavy stubble on his chin and scowling.

“I leave you alone for a month or two and what do you do? You grow a beard. It’s like you’re trying to spite me.” Bill muttered, before raising his hand and clicking his fingers.

Nothing happened, so he clicked again.

“Argh. Why is everything so difficult?”

“Are you trying to –“ Ford questioned, trying to figure out what Bill was trying to do. He could feel Bill’s dissatisfaction echo in his head, and he realised that Bill was trying to access his magic, and he couldn’t.

Ford mulled over Bill’s building frustration, before he reached forward and opened the cupboard behind the mirror, pulling out his shaving gear.

“We can just do this the old-fashioned way.” He suggested calmly, and Bill squinted at the razor and tin of shaving cream.

“What’s this?” Bill questioned, shaking the can of shaving cream, hearing it rattle, before popping the top off and sticking his tongue out.

Ford lurched his hands forward, so the shaving cream didn’t pour into his mouth, falling instead to land in the sink. “No, don’t!”

“I thought I’d tasted everything in this house.” Bill remarked. “Why would you hide this from me?”

“Because it’s not food.” Ford swiped the spilled shaving cream up out of the sink and tsked. “It goes on your face before shaving. Your old vessel didn’t seem to grow facial hair, so it wasn’t something that you had to consider, but if you want me to get rid of my beard – it isn’t even a proper beard by the way, a centimetre of stubble isn’t a beard – then you should step back and let me do this.”

“Hmm.” Bill considered that, before he slapped the handful of shaving cream onto his face, causing Stanford’s cheek to sting painfully.

“Ow!” Ford complained.

“What? I’m helping.” Bill snarked back, enjoying the way Sixer’s face looked in the mirror. He kept jumping between expressions of disgruntlement and fascination, which made for a very peculiar mix.

“Help less, maybe.” Ford grumbled and rinsed the razor with his right hand in the sink, while Bill smeared the shaving cream on him with his left hand.

So far this exercise in body sharing was a rocky road to co-operation. Ford may have convinced himself that this whole process would go a lot smoother than in actuality, in part due to his habit of aggrandising the idyllic elements of his relationship with his muse. Ford had convinced himself that they worked well together, but the reality was far more tumultuous.

“I want to try the next part.” Bill demanded, trying to enforce his autonomy down Ford’s right hand.

In his struggle to maintain control of the limb, Ford dropped the razor in the sink. Better to have it there than in Bill’s pseudo-capable hands.

“No. I’m not about to let you hock into my skin with a razor.” Ford scowled and stared at his own reflection in the mirror. He had shaving cream smeared all the way up to under his eye on the left side of his face, and he had to rub it away from his mouth. He could almost taste the chemicals.

One eye was yellow, and he must have looked like he was having a stroke, one half of his face contorted into bitter disappointment.

“I’m learning.” Bill complained. “Besides, you clearly haven’t been looking after your body, growing beards and eating shaving cream. It’s up to me to pick up the pieces.”

“I haven’t been –“ Ford chewed on the inside of his cheek, frustrated, before conceding his limb back to Bill. “Fine, but be careful.”

Bill leaned forward, and pulled the skin over Ford’s cheekbone taught, lifting the razor like he’d seen on TV. “Careful is not my middle name.”

You have a middle name? Ford thought.

Who knows. Bill replied, dragging the razor across Ford’s cheek with precision, shaving the hair there smoothly, taking care not to damage Ford in the process. Whatever it is, it’s not careful.

Ford watched from the back of his own head, vaguely impressed with Bill’s devotion to getting this right. The muse gently pulled the razor across Ford’s face over and over, shearing away the centimetre of stubble that grew in his absence, perfecting Ford’s skin through human means.

After a while it was almost peaceful, to sit back and watch. It was a rather intimate thing, Ford was used to shaving himself most days. This was a rather novel occurrence, and Ford realised that he and Bill could work well together. It just took a bit of time. Time and patience.

By the time Bill was finished, Ford was clean shaven once more with only a few nicks from the razor.

Ford prompted Bill to wash away the shaving cream, taking over for the clean-up, while Bill simply stared, transfixed by the way the small cuts bled fluidly.

Patting his face down with a wet towel, Ford noticed Bill’s fixation and paused.

Bill raised Ford’s left hand, and touched a finger to the flowing blood, fascinated by it.

He wasn’t trying to hurt Ford, he didn’t press down on the wound, just swiped some of the blood away, staring at it curiously.

What you do now is you get a piece of toilet paper and – Ford’s internal directive was cut off when Bill put the bloodied finger in his mouth once more, tasting the flavour.

Ford got the sense that Bill was mulling it over, picking up on the feeling over the top of his own revulsion. Tasting his own blood wasn’t something Ford found appealing.

Are you done?

Interesting. Bill pondered, relinquishing his arm back to Ford, who hastily covered the cut with a small square of toilet paper.

You didn’t do this with your own body. Ford remarked, hardly remembering Bill bleeding himself. Bill treated his own vessel very carefully, hardly doing anything that would put it at risk of harm.

My own body wasn’t as interesting. Bill replied, blinking at Ford’s reflection, smiling winsomely at himself.

Ford supposed he should feel flattered. He was getting what he wanted, to be able to spend time with Bill again, he was introducing Bill to physicality once more, and Bill was smiling at him like he used to.

It was just a little jarring to see that same broad manic smile on Stanford’s own face.

What else can you do in here? Bill mused, before widening his eyes, marching over to the bathtub. “Aha!”

“I did shower a day ago. I think.” Ford pondered, forgetting how much time had passed between sleeps.

You don’t want me to make you smell yourself IQ. It’s not pretty. Bill joked, before reaching into the shower and turning the taps on hot.

Without bothering to take off any clothes, Bill stepped into the bathtub, and sat Ford down under the spray.

Ford spared himself a moment to be utterly baffled by the experience, sitting down fully clothed in the shower, and he came to terms with how silly this would look from an outsider’s perspective.

Ford imagined he looked like he was a man who had lost control of his life.

The thought startled a laugh out of Ford, and he sat in the tub, water cascading down over him, soaking his shirt, trousers, and socks all the way through. Bringing his hand up to his face, covering his eyes as he laughed, Ford felt slightly more unhinged as each second passed.

He could sense Bill hovering, confusion turning into concern in the back of his mind, as tears mingled with the shower’s spray, dripping down his cheeks.
Bill’s concern grew as Ford started hiccupping sobs through the hysterical laughter, and before he could ask Ford what was wrong with him, Ford provided an explanation.

“It’s funny. It’s just funny that we’re finally together again, and I think I’m going insane because of it.”

Too much already? Bill questioned, and Ford could feel him shifting in the back of his head, like he was extricating himself from Ford’s brain. I can le-

“Don’t!” Ford clasped the sides of his head and stared down into his sodden lap, desperation looking out of his eyes, the yellow having fled to the back of his head already. “Don’t – I can do this. I just – people are going to think I’m out of my mind, talking to myself like a lunatic, fighting against my own body, doing one thing and meaning another – I just – what if I’ve lost control of my life?”

You don’t have to be in control all the time. Bill said softly, trying to endear Ford to the thought. I’ve got you. Besides, who cares what other people think? If not caring is insanity, then I think you’ll find insanity quite freeing.

Ford laughed, a dry sort of hiccup accompanying it, and shook his head, looking at the water swirling down the drain.

He could feel Bill watching him from the back of his head, sizing him up, his capability to deal with this. It was so much more apparent, sharing the same headspace, that Bill was holding himself back with all of this, limiting what he exposed Ford to, so he didn’t overwhelm him.

Ford supposed he should appreciate that restraint, but right now he was frustrated at his own inability and he felt like Bill’s careful restraint was just regulating him to the kiddie table in terms of immersing himself in this experience.

Bill lifted Ford’s left hand and gently pulled his sock off, trying to accommodate Ford’s sense of normality to ease him through this emotional breakdown.

Ford just sat there, sniffling, wiping water from his glasses with his right hand, as Bill divested him of his other sock, bundling the wet fabric up and throwing it over the edge of the tub, onto the tile floor.

Bill stretched his consciousness down into Ford’s other arm, monitoring his brain warily the entire time, but Ford seemed content to just sit there, and let Bill take control, take care of him while he temporarily couldn’t.

Bill took Ford’s glasses off gently, and then made to throw them over the edge of the bathtub with the same careless movement as when he threw the sock, but Ford’s autonomy lurched forward into his right arm, stopping Bill.

“I can do this much.” Ford said, folding the glasses and putting them on the floor gently, so they wouldn’t break.

“You’re bossy when you’re having a mental breakdown.” Bill commented, speaking through Ford’s mouth again. He could feel Ford’s amusement at that, mingled with his irritation, before the scientist sighed, and his limbs sagged back.

“Fine. Take care of me then.” I surrender. Ford thought.
Bill seemed mentally titillated to hear Ford say that, before extending himself forward into Ford’s limbs, sitting up straighter.

“Fine. Bossy.” Bill snarked cheekily but seemed to relish being able to control Sixer’s body for him.

He oozed appreciation with every movement, running his six fingered hands down the expanse of Ford’s chest, unbuttoning his shirt for him, and sliding it off his shoulders delicately.

He threw the shirt to the side of the tub, and a wet slap echoed in the room. Everything seemed too loud, even Ford’s heartbeat.

Bill shimmied out of Ford’s trousers, letting them bunch at the side of the tub with the shirt, divesting Ford of his clothes until he sat there naked.

People were supposed to shower naked, this should make Ford happy.

Instead he just seemed intensely strung out, a new layer of vulnerability imposed upon his already fractured mindset.

Bill watched Ford’s skin turn pink under the heat of the spray for a while, lost for what he could do to fix Ford, uncertain of what might make it worse.

Taking care of something wasn’t a language Bill was fluent in, and his clumsy attempts to do so left his actions feeling sorely lacking.

Frowning, Bill looked down at Sixer’s body, steadily turning red under the hot water, belatedly remembering that Sixer wasn’t fireproof. He turned the taps to a lower temperature and watched the scalded red tone in Ford’s skin lessen.

Twiddling his thumbs together, Bill tried to get a feel for Ford’s mental state, but the human was still disassociating, clearly unused to relinquishing control like this.

Sixer, despite his generous offer, was wholly unsuited to relinquishing control, every part of him abhorred the thought of it. Adjusting to this new arrangement took a bit of time for both of them, but Bill hadn’t expected Ford to react this way.

Deciding he’d butter Ford up to the arrangement, Bill fell back on what Ford’s initial motivator had been, a more physical arrangement, and he smoothed his hands down Ford’s body again, feeling the muscles in his arms indulgently, rubbing his shoulders, letting his fingers dip lower to trace the line of hair that trailed down from Ford’s belly.

Bill could feel Ford paying attention now, his mind sitting up through the haze of self-pity to take notice.

Bill let his hand slide lower, slipping his fingers down into Ford’s wet pubic hair, touching the base of his shaft.

Ford said nothing, but his thoughts were perking up, interested now.

Bill circled his hand around Sixer’s cock, and squeezed it, trying to coax Sixer out of his shell. He must have squeezed too hard, or too carelessly, because suddenly Ford was sitting up, extending his consciousness down his right arm, guiding Bill.

“No. Like this.” Ford murmured and took over.
Bill paid attention to the way Ford stroked himself, pressing his fingers to the vein on the underside, keeping his calloused fingers away from the sensitive head.

Ford indicated that Bill should try, and Bill noted that, given the proper motivation, Sixer got the hang of this body sharing business fairly quickly. He might be more suited to it than Bill thought, though it seemed Sixer only levelled out mentally to the experience if he got to lead.

Bill mimicked Ford’s movements, copying his stroke diligently, waiting to see if this would mellow Sixer out a bit.

Ford’s pleased hum said it all.

“That’s better.”

Bill kept up the momentum, observing Sixer’s reactions. He was so caught up in getting this right that he almost didn’t notice the sensation, until he felt Sixer’s cock getting hard, his ministrations working.

Human arousal was bizarre.

Bill could suddenly feel how it felt for Sixer, this odd sort of primal pull from within his belly, a heat building that felt good to fuel further.

That on top of the rather belated waves of worship Sixer was putting off, obliquely grateful that Bill was here, that they were reunited again, that it was Bill doing this for him, and not himself, alone and miserable, coupled to deliver a whammy of pleasure to Bill’s consciousness, twice as potent than he expected.

Bill sucked in a breath and shuddered as he pressed his thumb to the tip of Ford’s cock, over sensitised suddenly.

“Is this how it feels for you?” Ford asked, his voice low and curious.

“No. It’s how it feels for you.” Bill replied, slowing his movements cautiously, not wanting to be overwhelmed so quickly. He didn’t want to tip Sixer back over into another mental breakdown.

“I’m not going to break.” Ford spoke, sounding amused again. “You can experiment a little. It’s only fair.”

After all your experimenting on me? Bill hummed, and felt lower, squeezing Sixer’s balls and letting his finger trace idly past his perineum. I suppose that is only fair.

Ford inhaled, holding his breath almost, as Bill skimmed his fingers over Ford’s body. He felt almost hypersensitive, his focus being funnelled through two mental lenses, compounding sensation.

Are you doing this to me or am I doing this to you? Ford thought, stifling a groan as Bill brought his other hand down to stroke his cock while his questing fingers ventured further south.

You’ll never know. Bill replied, the water from the tub lubricating his finger as he pressed the tip of the digit into Ford curiously. Knowing you, you’ll say whatever makes you feel better at the time, but I’m enjoying the ambiguity of it all.

“Our very own paradox.” Bill spoke and chewed on his bottom lip. He slid his finger further into Ford, and wriggled it around, sliding it in and out now. Building up a rhythm Bill leaned back in the tub, getting used to the sensation of fucking himself (fucking Ford) with his own finger, his reactions as new and appealing as the sensation was for Stanford.

Ford was used to doing this to Bill, and he’d tried it maybe once or twice on himself to understand the physics behind it all, but there was something about doing this regularly that falsely implied a concession of masculinity in the action. As such, when alone, fantasising, Ford generally didn’t do this. His fantasies didn’t often paint him in this position, in this light.

Reluctantly conceding that it wasn’t such a bad position to be in, Ford groaned, as Bill’s fingers quested deeper, curving just right to glance against his prostate.

Bill was right, it didn’t matter who was doing this to who, the fact of the matter was that though it was Ford’s hands doing the work, Ford felt like it was Bill touching him, Bill responding to him, Bill reacting in those delightful ways of his. In a way it was like he was pleasing Bill with his body, just like old times.

Ford’s face flushed red to hear the uncharacteristic babbling Bill was prone to slip from his own lips, listening to the muse’s impassioned statements sound out through Ford’s voice.

“Kcuf, lbh’er whfg n ohaqyr bs areir raqvatf, nera’g lbh? Enod gnihtyna teg snamuh rednow a sti.”

His mouth wasn’t used to the shapes it made, speaking Bill’s language. Ford had hoped that sharing the same headspace meant he would understand it better, but it remained as inscrutable as anything else about the muse.

The water sloshed around in the tub as Bill picked up the pace, jerking Ford off faster now as he fucked the scientist with his own fingers. The angle was awkward, and the tub was hard against his back, but Bill was determined to make this work for Sixer.

The space in Sixer’s head was becoming a torturous sort of echo-chamber of arousal, Ford’s arousal bouncing off Bill’s, bouncing off the overwhelming flavour of worship that seeded through everything.

Ford didn’t realise his worship was so potent, and it suddenly made sense to him why Bill always set fires when they indulged like this. Everything felt heightened, and he found it difficult to think, arousal and power clouding his brain.

He’d never been this senselessly overwhelmed, and he was reminded of that brief snapshot into Bill’s mind he had before the portal test. It seemed like Bill’s existence was a constant state of overwhelming, impossible, shifting sensation, and this was no different.

Unlike Stanford who sought to wrest control over every situation he was in until he understood it and could quantify it, Bill had a way of unhinging himself from control, giving into the chaos, until he emerged on the other side of it, whole again.

Ford’s head was swimming in a fog of over sensitisation and arousal when his body reached its limit, shooting white come out onto his chest, only for it to quickly drip off him, washing away under the shower’s spray.

This was normally the time when Ford stopped, wound down, took pace of himself and settled down into a somewhat sleepy satisfied stupor, but Bill wasn’t ready to finish just yet.

Maintaining his pace, even as lethargy settled into Ford’s body, Bill continued to bump at Ford’s prostate with his finger, over and over again, wringing every last moment out of Sixer’s orgasm, until Ford was wrung dry, an over sensitised mess.
“Enough. Enough Bill.” Ford moaned, sagging down in the bathtub, water swirling up around his thighs.

His shirt and trousers were blocking the drain now, and the tub was filling up.

Bill withdrew his fingers, releasing Sixer’s spent cock, but his eyes were bright, looking around the room.

_We could make it better. Make that last longer. If you made_ – Equations and blueprints were suddenly flooding Ford’s mind, forced into his frontal lobe, and Ford felt an acute headache come on, wincing at the sensation shift, before finally looking at the designs Bill presented him with.

It took Ford a moment to comprehend the equations and circuitry, before he barked out a laugh.

“’You want to make a vibrator?’”

_Don’t tell me it’s patented already? We could have made a fortune!_ Bill moaned, his good idea shot down by Ford’s amusement and derision. _What kind of a name is vibrator anyway, there are dozens of – no hundreds of better-

“You just don’t wind down at all, do you?”

_Wind down? But we’ve only just started!_

“Shhh.” Ford pushed his consciousness forward into his limbs, and forced Bill to relax, to stop for a while, and just be. “Enough. I finally have you back here with me. Let me enjoy this.”

Bill stopped at that, Ford could feel him blink through his eyes, startled, before he attempted to still his constant energy.

Ford let his clothes plug the drain properly, and eased back in the tub, the water rising to his knees now. He laid back, and relaxed, the warm water swirling, rising higher, until he reached forward and turned off the tap.

He could feel Bill like static electricity, fizzing through his limbs, but Ford managed to hold him back, just to hold him in the moment.

Ford wrapped his arms around his torso, and sighed, squeezing himself tightly in a hug.

Slowly, Bill melted, until they were both floating contentedly in the tub, holding onto each other peacefully.

Bill pushed through into Ford’s left arm and raised it to trace the dark shape of the tattoo he’d left on Ford’s pectoral, his finger following the lines of the triangle’s sides the same way Ford would when soothing his anxiety in the past.

For a moment Ford was reminded of his nightmare, of Bill crawling out from his chest, devastating him. Bill was inside him now, but he didn’t feel unwelcome. Bill wasn’t going to hurt him.

Ford watch him stroke along the edges of the triangle, staring at the dark imprint on Ford’s flesh with fondness and satisfaction.

“I’ve missed this.” Ford spoke softly, awash with calm contentedness.

“You missed me?” Bill questioned.
“I missed us.”

Bill was silent for a moment, contemplating that, before he smoothed his hand over Ford’s chest, covering the triangle with his palm, his hand pressing down over Ford’s heart possessively, emotion welling up within Ford’s head.

He couldn’t say whose emotion it was, Bill’s or his, but it nearly clogged his throat with wistfulness, with unadulterated longing.

Eventually Bill let his hand slip away, baring the triangle once more, his fingers lingering gently.

“Me too.”

Two weeks passed, two delirious weeks of body co-habitation, wherein Stanford and Bill rediscovered human pleasures together.

The litany of things that Ford couldn’t do in his solitude, simply because of how they served as a painful reminder of how things were, became accessible to him now, and he found himself becoming productive again.

Ford cooked again, no longer feeling so alone in the kitchen, and Bill ate, delighting in tasting the flavours all over again with a new set of tastebuds.

He felt healthy, well fed, stimulated (very stimulated, Bill insisted on discovering the ins and outs of Stanford’s body, and he was very thorough. Stanford now had several inventions he never intended on patenting and learned what it meant to juggle a human libido and a cosmic thrill-seeking appetite for pleasure and sensation. Suffice to say they didn’t leave the house much in that first week) and he felt less like a shadow of his old self.

Bill’s presence was too bright, overwhelmingly so, to let Stanford cast a shadow.

Eventually, when they exhausted their options within the shack (and each other) they turned to the outside world.

Anything to avoid the elephant in the room, the portal in the basement. Ford could feel Bill itching to go see it when things became too still for him, and Ford didn’t know how to deal with that building impulsiveness. He didn’t want to confront what had come between them, lying to himself that Bill was a tame muse once again, and not a hungry devourer of worlds.

So, they took to the forest.

Expeditions searching through caves in the mountainside, treks through the darker parts of the woods, more visits to the enchanted forest. Anything to keep them both stimulated, to give them things to examine, experience and discuss that didn’t lead back to the portal.

The dancing light of Ford’s oil lantern made the crystals and stalagmites on the ceiling of the cave shimmer.

Lying on his back, Ford could see the light catch on the ancient crystals, trying desperately to look at their elegant shapes instead of letting his gaze linger on the graphic paintings on the cave wall.

“And so I said to them – this body doesn’t have the right vocal chords to properly convey the vehemence of this particular interdimensional swear, but it sounds like this –“

“Oh.” Ford blinked, listening to the grating discordant sound Bill projected into his mind, wincing a little.

“That went down about as well as you’d expect. I should teach you interdimensional swears more often, actually. Might come in handy. So basically, the moral of that story is that if the middleman tries to get you to talk, don’t say anything. Or anything nice at least.” Bill continued with his anecdote, stretching Ford’s arm out to trace the shapes of the crystals on the ceiling as he spoke. “Nine times out of twenty it’ll get someone to take you to the big boss, and then you talk business.”

“What happens the other eleven times?” Ford asked.

“Something excruciating I’m sure.” Bill stretched Ford’s arm’s out, and yawned, before pillowing his arms behind Ford’s head. “But let’s just say I’m in the 45th percentile and leave it at that.”

“Oh.” Ford seemed quiet this evening, retreating into the back of his head more, letting Bill ‘take the wheel’ so to speak, or at least steer the conversation. He enjoyed listening to Bill, and Bill certainly enjoyed being listened to.

Though listening lacked its prior appeal, hearing Bill divulge fantastical tales about his adventures throughout the multi-verse, knowing that that world was inaccessible to Stanford now, due to the portal’s murky associations.

It rankled Ford, the way bittersweet things were both appealing and unappetising, that Bill’s actions had essentially cut him off from the stars.

It was all very well and good that Bill could wax poetic about the view of Saturn’s surface from its rings or impart his cosmic wisdom to Ford about the best way to haggle with intergalactic mercenaries, but as Ford could never use that knowledge, never see these fantastic sights for himself, the more Bill spoke, the more it became a sore spot for Ford.

And Bill no doubt knew that it was, he was sharing Ford’s headspace, he could see everything Ford was thinking, but despite Ford obviously becoming frustrated, Bill didn’t stop talking.

He just kept poking that sore spot.

“Oh! Have I told you about the orbiting moon restaurants of Gastronomie 82? They serve two-year degustations, designed to accommodate every palette known to exist outside of the philosophical.”

“Ohuh.” Ford glared at the stalagmites now, his tone inching towards bitter.

“It’s so rare to find establishments that serve a decent thorium truffle brie with just the right amount of gamma radiation. Mmm. That radiation packs a punch. And the aperitifs – Sixer, they’re to die for.” Bill enthused emphatically.

“Radioactive meals might have that particular side effect, yes.” Ford answered, clipped and irritable.

“For your anatomy, sure, but for beings like me it’s a rare delicacy.” Bill sniffed, picking up on Stanford’s censure now, upset by it. “Maybe you’d appreciate it a bit more if you were more open minded.”
“Open minded to radiation poisoning. I’ll get right on that.” Ford grumbled and crossed his arms.

“Oh, don’t be sour IQ. I’d spruce up your radiation tolerance before we go.” Bill rolled Stanford’s eyes. “I’m not completely inconsiderate, jeez.”

“Not completely inconsiderate?” Ford frowned, indignant now. “This whole conversation’s inconsiderate.”

“I’m inconsiderate for planning us a fancy dinner? I’m the inconsiderate one? Do you know what it costs to even get a reservation to Gastronomie 82? On one of the lesser moons even? I’d be booking us prime orbit seats Sixer.” Bill insisted.

“No, you won’t. And yes, you are being inconsiderate.” Ford argued, gesturing as he spoke. “You won’t be booking anything, because this fantastic experience you’re describing, and this inspiring, galactic world you’re dangling in front of me, is never going to happen for me, and you know it.”

Ford could feel Bill seethe, glaring at him from inside his own skull, before he threw Ford’s hand out, gesturing as he spoke. “I’d book us a table!”

“No, you won’t!” Ford sat up, raising his voice. It echoed off the cave walls, sounding even more like a discussion between two people, instead of one dualistic individual. “You can’t keep talking like you’re planning all these idyllic things for us, when the only way I’m ever going to see these things with you is if the portal turns on, and that’s not going to happen.”

Bill radiated displeasure now, writhing with a sharp sudden anger that made Ford’s head hurt, before he spoke, deliberately keeping his voice low, restraining his temper.

“It might happen.”

“The only way that will happen is over my dead body.” Ford countered, crossing his arms, resolute.

His stubborn expression was contorted by Bill grinding his teeth, a pressure building in the back of Ford’s skull until he felt like he could hear Bill screeching in his mind.

The screeching was like a kettle boiling over, and Ford’s headache intensified, riding through Bill’s irritation, until his muse snapped, his temper breaking.

“Why am I even here then? What’s the point?” Bill yelled and threw Ford’s left hand out in anger.

“What’s the point? Why would you say that? Are you—“ Ford’s paranoia flared up, on guard instantly.

“I’m here to spend time with you Sixer.” Bill cut him off, speaking through his mouth. “To accommodate your needs, to do what you want. You’re telling me that you won’t even think about budging—“

“Budging? When I’m what stands between you and the rest of the world?” Ford got to his feet now and began to pace irritably. “No of course not—“

“I’m trying to think of our future, I’m trying to figure out a way we can be together.” Bill interrupted him. “You’re too busy pandering to your petty morality to even consider being reasonable.”

“Being reasonable? How is it reasonable to let you—“
“YOU DON’T LET ME DO ANYTHING!” Bill shouted, and it echoed along the network of caves, and down out into the valley.

Ford’s throat felt strained, he’d never yelled so loud before, but Bill clearly wasn’t used to Ford’s physical limitations.

While Ford might be used to Bill throwing his tantrums, he wasn’t equipped to deal with Bill throwing a tantrum in his body, and the felt the negative impacts of Bill’s mood immediately.

“I’m sick of being here with you if all you do is limit me. Just stop standing in my way, Sixer. You’re awful! Totalitarian! You locked me in your basement, you locked me in that body, you locked me in your house, in this town, and now you’ve locked me in your head too, and you still think you can justify it and call yourself righteous.” Bill hissed, and Stanford felt crowded back into his own head by the scope and weight of Bill’s spitting fury. “You’re not righteous, you’re self-righteous. You're deluded. You're the most infuriating creature I’ve ever met. You think you can have your cake and eat it too, well, you can’t! You want me around, but you lie to yourself, all the time. All these lies to justify things that you wouldn’t need to justify if you just gave in and listened to me! I’m not the bad guy here, Sixer. I just want to plan something nice for us, I’m thinking about your future, our future! You just want to stifle me some more and find ways to pat yourself on the back for keeping me around. Good job Stanford, you tolerate a monster!”

No, Bill. Ford winced, trying to calm Bill’s mood. I - I keep you around because I want you around.

Ford finally found his voice, though he still didn’t have enough space in his head to reach forward and claim it. Bill’s tantrum had escalated, and Ford had no hope of standing against it. His only hope now was to talk Bill down, soothe him before he got too worked up.

It hasn’t been easy on me either. There’s no point yelling at me. I’m going to great lengths to enable this –

“Oh sure, you’re really bending over backwards here Sixer.” Bill scoffed, and paced over to the cave wall, swinging his arms irritably as he walked. “You don’t let me look at my portal, you don’t let me talk to other people, we haven’t gone out together in public AT ALL since you asked me to come back here. It’s almost like you’re ashamed of me, ashamed to be yourself, but wait, that doesn’t sound familiar.”

I am not ashamed-

“You’ve been ashamed of every indulgence we’ve had since you invited me back here. So tied up in guilt about your destiny, when it’s been in your basement this entire time, and you can’t even think to see it when it’s right in front of you!”

Bill, forget about the portal. Just leave it. We can do something else, we can –

Bill balled Ford’s hands into fists at his side, shaking with rage.

“Forget about the portal? You’re the one who brought it up. It’s your fault for not listening to me in the first place. You’re the only reason you think you can’t access the things I want to show you. You act like I’m the one holding you back from exploring the portal, but you’re the one who won’t even try to turn it on again. You’re the one holding me back.”

I said forget about the portal, Bill. It’s not going to happen, it’s –

Bill shouted, and hurled Ford’s fist out, punching the wall, cracking the painted rock.
The chalk paint depiction of the local natives, stick figures, running from flames, crumbled beneath Ford’s fist.

Stop that! Ford complained, struggling to push forward in his mind now to stop Bill.

“I go to all this trouble to be here, I do so much for you, and you keep –“ Ford winced as Bill punched the wall again. “Spitting –“ Another punch. “In my eye?!“

Bill, stop!

“What’s the point? What’s the point, even when I try so hard to meet you in the middle, it’s still not good enough for you. No matter what I do, it’s never good enough for the great Stanford Pines. Beacon of morality.” Bill hiccupped, his eyes watering as emotion overwhelmed him, and he threw another punch at the wall again, decimating the stick figure populous.

Punching things made that lumberjack feel better, and Bill didn’t want to feel like this, not over Sixer. He was here to have a good time, and Sixer kept ruining it.

Red smears of blood began to stain the wall.

“You used to worship me.” Bill muttered bitterly. “Now you’re ashamed of me. We never go anywhere anymore, and I just wanted to do something nice for you. I don’t see you taking me out to a fancy dinner. I don’t see you doing anything!”

Ford felt pain in his hand and hoped nothing was broken. His knuckles were bloody, flecked with dirt and rock, and he wasn’t sure if the tears flowing were in reaction to the pain, or genuine feeling on Bill’s part.

Who was Ford kidding? They were sharing the same headspace. Ford knew exactly how hurt Bill was over this, assuming the triangular god couldn’t filter his emotions now they were sharing a skull.

The muse was practically shaking with anger, upset, and betrayal, the same betrayal that lingered between them still since the banishment, raw and tenuous. Ford had slapped a band-aid over it by favouring their dream encounters, by making efforts to see Bill again, but the layer between that hurt was thin and fallible.

Ford felt a surge of panic when he realised that he was at risk of losing that band-aid, of losing Bill altogether if he decided Ford wasn’t worth sticking around for.

Stanford wasn’t prepared for that sort of rejection, he’d been useless without Bill here. He was useless without Bill. Or at least that was his prevalent mood right now.

“You wouldn’t do this to me if you really loved me. I bet that was a lie too. Such a liar, Stanford Pines. I don’t know why I bother staying for you.” Bill sniffled, his hand resting against the wall, dripping blood.

Bill! No, I -

Feeling emotions in a human body again was exhausting and overwhelming, and Bill wanted out, he didn’t want to stick around and be used by Sixer again, mutuality aside.

If Sixer couldn’t stick to the unspoken rule between them, if he had to make himself a barrier between Bill and the portal, between Bill and himself, and rub it in Bill’s face, then Bill shouldn’t have to stick around and endure this sort of treatment.
Sixer was the worst creature Bill had ever encountered. No one else had ever played Bill’s emotions like this so easily, ever tricked Bill into forming attachments like this only to jerk him around because of it.

Bill was starting to think he wasn’t worth it.

Screwing up his presence, Bill raised Ford’s fist, impulsively intending to do as much damage as he could before cut loose from Ford’s mind, ditching him as a vessel.

Before he could let his fist fly, Ford yelled out.

WAIT, BILL WAIT! I’m sorry! Wait, I’ll do it!

Bill paused, and blinked, looking inward to Sixer, shocked. He scoured Sixer for sincerity, feeling nothing deceptive about his thoughts, and boggled that the human would compromise his staunch morals enough to give into Bill finally. To meet him in the middle.

You will? Bill asked, stunned.

“You’re right.” Ford panted, leaning up against the cave wall. “You have been right. I’ve been treating you awfully. You’re just trying to find some middle ground for us, and I keep cutting your feet out from under you. I’m sorry.”

Bill blinked at Ford inwardly and felt the first burgeoning prickles of delight creep up. Sixer’s apology was working, it was making Bill reconsider leaving the human. He didn’t realise Sixer’s regard was so crucial to him, but hearing those words sprung hope in Bill’s core. Hope for them, that they could work it out. That Bill could have his cake and eat it too.

“I promise I’ll make it up to you. You don’t have to leave. I want you to stay, really. I do … love you, and I’m not ashamed, I just –“ Here Ford’s thoughts wavered, and there was deliberate flattery laced in with his words. As insulting as it might have been, Bill was almost a little titillated that Sixer could spare a moment to be manipulative amidst all this. It was conniving and endearing all at once.

“I just want you all to myself.” Ford finished, inwardly wincing, worried he’d laid the flattery on too thick.

He needn’t have worried. The flattery was working. Bill was softening up to him, coming around to staying with the human, hearing those magic words from Sixer that made Bill weak.

“But you’re right, I’ve treated you awfully, so – of course I’ll do it.” Ford nodded, standing tall and resolute now.

You will? Bill asked, hopefully, more than a little besotted with Sixer again. By rights he should have whiplash at how quickly Sixer went from infuriating to endearing. Bill supposed it was all part of his charm.

“Absolutely.” Ford nodded again, cradling his injured hand. “So, what do you say? Dinner, tomorrow night?”

Oh. Bill’s hopeful tone fell flat, realising that Sixer didn’t mean he was conceding the portal to him.
Bill blinked in the back of Ford’s brain, mulling that over, his disappointment still warring with the newfound appreciation for Sixer’s charms.

Bill looked down at the blood dripping from Ford’s knuckles, and supposed that one more night pretending, one more dinner for old time’s sake wouldn’t hurt.

“My treat?” Ford prompted, knowing his muse was a stone’s throw away from leaving him, and right now he was too desperate to deal with that in any way.

Bill was silent for another long stretch, and Ford almost worried that he’d already left, and he was talking to himself at this point, a mad man, alone in a cave, attacking the wall.

Then he felt what resembled a mental shrug and he heaved a sigh of relief.

It better be fancy, that’s all I’m saying.

Bill’s words were brusque, but he couldn’t hide the glow of happiness that endured in Sixer’s head with Bill’s concession.

Ford exhaled with gratitude, and let his shoulders sag, having held himself tense, waiting for Bill’s verdict.

He allowed himself a smile, and after a while, he couldn’t tell who was smiling more, him or Bill.

He found, after a while, that he also didn’t care.

Common sense took a backseat to unbridled, echoing joy.

He had a dinner date.

---

Ford parked his car in the parking lot just inside the forest, a grove of trees shrouding the cars from view, and walked through the path from the car park to stand in view of their chosen venue for tonight.

Out of all of the restaurants in Gravity Falls, Ford had chosen this establishment for its discretion.

The Club was one of Gravity Falls’ oldest establishments and had all the pomp and circumstance one would expect, considering The Club mostly catered to Gravity Falls’ wealthier inhabitants. The likes of Preston Northwest and his white-collar college friends frequented The Club, which gave it a sort of old boys appeal. Set into the cliffside, the building was shaped like the titular clover from a deck of cards, and had lush red and black interiors, designed to evoke a classy and luxurious feel.

Flash, fancy, and a little frivolous, Ford was hoping the restaurant would appeal to Bill, but more than that, he was counting on the restaurant’s clientele to mean that no one he knew would be there.

He could feel Bill in the back of his head, taking it all in, the red carpet leading into the place, the burgundy awning, and the neon sign humming above, adding to the casino style of the establishment.
Aren’t we underdressed for this place? Bill asked.

“I’m wearing a tie.” Ford gestured to his front, blue tie hanging over a white button up shirt. Ford thought he looked rather polished for the evening.

This seems like a bow-tie sort of establishment to me. Bill commented wryly. A bow-tie occasion.

“Of course, you’d say that.” Ford grumbled. “That’s every occasion for you.”

Exactly. That way I’m never underdressed. Bill preened smugly in the back of Ford’s head. I keep things classy that way.

“I’m sure you do.” Ford replied with resigned amusement.

Squaring his shoulders, he took a deep breath, staring at the maître d at the door. He jogged on the spot a little, clenching and unclenching his hands, psyching himself up to actually go through with this.

You’re not standing me up now, are you? Bill frowned through Ford’s features, picking up on his hesitation.

“I’m not, I just – people will think it’s odd, that’s all, someone dining alone here.” Ford said self-consciously, reluctant to step out from behind the tree-line.

You humans are such pack animals, just let it go. People dine alone all the time. Bill tried to will Ford’s legs forward, urging him to move, but Ford buckled his knees in defiantly. They’ll just think you appreciate the culinary arts. With luck they’ll think you’re a food critic and bring you out the good stuff. Come on Sixer, stop stalling.

“I’ll be eating by myself, talking to myself – Bill, what if somebody sees me? Someone I know?” Ford panicked, suddenly on the back foot once more. “I can’t go in there.”

You can and you will. Bill countered, still pushing his will through Ford’s limbs stubbornly. You promised me a fancy dinner, you can’t back out now. You won’t be eating by yourself or talking to yourself, you’ll be talking to me, so just get over yourself and get moving.

“Everyone’s going to think I’m crazy.” Ford moaned, clutching his head as his legs lurched forward, walking him up to the door. “I can’t do this –“

Hey. Bill stopped Ford, forcing him to calm down and listen. You’re doing this for me. This is you making it up to me. You aren’t going to back out now because some lowbrow hicks think you’re stranger than they are. Who CARES what they think? Care what I think.

“And what do you think?” Ford mumbled, slumping his shoulders, abashed.

I think we are going to go in there, get uproariously drunk, try everything on the menu, and have a damn good time. Bill insisted resolutely. So, are you in, or are you in?

Ford reluctantly conceded that Bill was right. The muse had a way to make this sort of thing sound appealing, when really Ford just wanted to get it over with.

He wasn’t cut out for this romantic business, but at the end of the day, it was just him and Bill, going out together, and that had been good enough for Ford all this time. Maybe it would be just what he needed now to get over himself and let go, exactly what they both needed to patch things up between them.

Ford squared his shoulders and paced forward.

I’m in. He thought.

Ford’s mouth stretched into a sly smile and Bill looked out onto the restaurant with slitted yellow eyes.

“Good.”

They were seated in the corner of the restaurant, in a secluded table for two at Ford’s insistence. While from their position they were tucked away from the crowds, they had an excellent view of the entire restaurant.

Ford was hunching his shoulders forward, attempting to make himself as small and inconspicuous as possible, while Bill was craning Ford’s neck, trying to eye off everyone in the restaurant.

“Isn’t that the local news reporter? Hey Sixer, that looks like the pawn shop owner we sold our rubies to, reckon he recognises us? Hey Cheapskate!”

Bill! Will you keep your voice down? Ford hissed inside his head, acutely self-conscious.

It’s your voice. Bill joked, teasing Ford, commandeering his arm to wave at the confused looking pawn shop owner, who shot Ford a dubious look, and pulled his menu up between them, obviously uncomfortable by the way Ford’s face seemed to spasm between smiling widely, and shrinking away in mortification.

I’m never going to be able to look any of these people in the eye ever again. Ford bemoaned, pulling his own menu up to hide his face behind.

You can look me in the eye. Bill replied, oozing cheer and optimism. Just like looking in a mirror! Get it Sixer? Get it? Because –

Yes, I know. We’ve done the mirror thing, Bill. Ford held the menu up to his face, scowling. Why are you so chipper all of a sudden? How do you have this much energy?

This is our first date in the same body Sixer, I’m allowed to be enthusiastic. Bill flipped the menu over and ran Ford’s finger down the page. Oooh, Lobster Mornay. Never tried that before. And Veal Marsala, they serve baby deer here? That’s borderline cruel. I want one! What else?

Ford took note of the prices while Bill explored the menu and the frugal side of him inwardly winced.

Maybe don’t go overboard here? You’re sharing my stomach, remember? I can only eat so much.

Pssch. Bill waved Ford’s hand, and Ford flushed with embarrassment. Quitters talk before we even start? That’s not like you Sixer. Live a little.
Bill’s flamboyant hand gesture was spotted by the waiter, and assuming he was waving for service, the waiter approached the table, holding a notepad at the ready.

Oh god, he’s coming over. Ford shrunk down in his seat even further.

Don’t worry Sixer, I’ve got this. Bill winked with Ford’s eye, and then sat up straight, putting the menu down and beaming at the waiter expectantly.

Oh please no.

“Hello sir, what can I get you this evening?” The waiter drawled.

Bill leaned his elbows on the table, and squinted at the waiter’s nametag, before sitting straight, tilting his chair back casually as he spoke.

“Rodrigo! Just the person I wanted to see!” Bill slid the menu across the table. “How’s your sister, Valencia? Still in jail? Of course, she isn’t, that girl doesn’t know when to quit! Now Rodrigo –“

Rodrigo the waiter, for a moment, looked like he’d been hit over the head, stunned that Bill could sit there, spouting knowledge about his sister Valencia, who, sure maybe she’d been in jail once or twice, but he was fairly sure she wasn’t now. He was fairly certain no one in Gravity Falls knew about her, or her related criminal record, and he immediately panicked that Stanford was a cop, or a criminal.

He didn’t exactly look like either though, sitting there in his button up shirt and tie. Rodrigo thought he spotted a pocket protector there too.

Shaking off his shock, Rodrigo recovered composure quickly enough to look attentive when Bill gestured to the menu, hoping that if he acted unphased and did what this bizarre man said, he could go back out to the kitchen on his break to phone his sister.

Bill flipped the menu open and ran his finger down the page.

“Follow my finger now, I want everything on the menu from here – all the way down to here. You got that?”

No, no, no, no! Ford wheezed within his head, panicking, thinking of his bank account and his waistline.

No? Bill asked, before looking up at Rodrigo. “Actually – two of everything.”

Noooooo! Ford wailed, before his panic broke through, regaining him control of his body.

“Noooo!”

Ford’s voice came out as a yell, drawing the eyes of the restaurant patrons.

“Um.”

Rodrigo blinked at the strange man, mentally tallying whether his pay-check was worth enduring this.

Ford cleared his throat, embarrassment tingling his ears pink, and thumped his chest (Bill thumped him harder than he would) holding up his hand to halt the order. “No, um, disregard that. Could we have the – I mean I – ah-“
Rodrigo was looking at Ford like he was mentally unstable now, and Ford worried that the waiter was right.

This body sharing business was harder than it looked. Ford didn’t know why he thought this outing would be a good idea. He really was desperate to patch things up with his muse.

“The Lobster Mornay, please?” Ford asked timidly.

And the veal! Get the veal! Bill urged Stanford impatiently.

“And the Veal Marsala?” Ford shrank in his chair just asking, and tried to smile politely up at Rodrigo, apologetic already.

Bill’s impatience with Sixer’s timid conduct simmered away as Rodrigo wrote down Ford’s order, and just as the waiter moved to turn away, Bill burst through once more, snagging Rodrigo by the sleeve.

“And can we get a drinks menu up in here?”

“Certainly sir. I’ll be right back with that.” Rodrigo said, extricating his sleeve from Ford’s grasp, shoulders tense, before walking back towards the kitchen, thoroughly unnerved.

Content that his needs were being met, Bill leaned back in the chair once more, lacing his arms behind his head and tipping the chair back idly.

His outward contentedness contrasted with Ford’s mental agony.

That was awful. He thinks I’m a madman. Why did I say we? He’s probably back there telling all the staff about me. Oh god.

Relax, Sixer. Bill assured him casually. Our friend Rodrigo won’t be saying anything, or who knows who I’d tell about his jailbird sister. It’s called a stalemate.

Did you bring that up to blackmail him? Ford asked, evoking a mildly censorial tone.

I brought that up, so you’d have security. Bill asserted, still leaning back on the chair. You’re the one who’s freaking out about your reputation here. I’m just ensuring that that reputation is protected. You should be thanking me.

Ford mulled that over, still somewhat indignant at the thought of blackmailing their waiter. Bill didn’t seem to have a problem with it though.

Speaking of thanks, I figured me coming back here would be more than a two-dinner deal. Nice work short changing me back there, Sixer. Thanks a lot.

I’m not short changing you. If you’ve really got your heart set on tasting everything on the menu, you can, but one dish at a time, please. Ford insisted, playing it sly. I’m not willing to put on 20 pounds over one dinner date.

What a buzzkill. Has anyone ever told you you’re no fun, Sixer?

Ford exhaled a resigned sigh, and looked up at the ceiling of the restaurant, studying the mural painted on the roof.

His put-upon pondering was interrupted by Rodrigo returning with the drinks menu. He held it out waiting for Ford to notice he was there, surveying the strange man for signs of mob ties, or any odd gang tattoos, before he eventually cleared his throat, jolting Ford out of his stupor.

“Shall - shall I give you a moment, sir?”

“Can you give me a scotch?” Ford rubbed his eyes, tired, not even bothering to look at the menu.

“Very good choice, sir. On the rocks?”

Bill flung Ford’s arm out to snatch the menu from Rodrigo before the nervous waiter ran away back to the kitchens.

“Move your hand, I want to look at this thing.”

Rodrigo blinked, looking down at his hand, having hardly moved a muscle.

Ford stubbornly held his hand over his eyes, trying to limit Bill’s excess partially, and he must have looked very peculiar clamping his right hand down over his glasses, so Bill couldn’t peek at the menu. Bill attempted to prise Ford’s right hand away with his left, with limited success.

“I can’t see – they’ve gotta have a – aha! Long Island Iced Tea! I want a Long Island Iced Tea.
Every establishment worth its salt does that cocktail. I don’t need to see the menu for that. I want six of them, with the fancy umbrellas.”

Rodrigo raised his notepad to write the order down, but paused, watching warily as the man at the table seemed to continue a one-sided conversation with himself, his hand still held over his eyes.

“Six? You don’t need six.”

“Yes, I do. Multiple islands!”

“The alcohol content in one of those triples what’s in mine.”

“Well then you’d better catch up.”

Ford groaned and kneaded his temples like he was nursing a headache.

“Sir?” Rodrigo asked.

“Fine, one scotch, and six Long Islands.” The scientist conceded to himself. “But can you bring them out one at a time, please?”

Bill took issue at that, and lifted Ford’s hand, raising two fingers to the waiter.

Rodrigo looked between Ford’s hand, and his face, and jotted down the drinks order, turning to leave hastily.

One at a time. Bill scoffed. You’ve never had a good time in your life, have you?

How do you expect to drink six drinks at once? Ford questioned dubiously. With one mouth.

Bill brought a flurry of mathematical equations to the forefront of Ford’s mind once more, only this time the blueprints and statistics resulted in an image of several straws taped together, creating an elaborate silly straw for the muse.

Ford snorted a laugh.
“A silly straw? Really?”

Would you rather a sensible one? Bill quipped back. I sure wouldn’t.

How are you millions of years old? Ford questioned, resigned to distracting himself from the judgemental stares of the restaurant patrons, focusing on Bill. He had a unique opportunity to discover things about his muse, and on a date, it follows that you’re supposed to get to know each other, so Ford gave himself license to press, curiosity lighting his mind once more.

Every time I think I know something about you, I end up discovering something else, and now I wonder. Is it simply a matter of comparative lifespans? Is there some reason you still see the childlike wonder in everything? How old are you, in your culture? How does your lifespan compare to your people?

Bill looked down at the tablecloth for a moment, fiddling with the fabric, before asking Ford defensively. Why do you want to know?

Can’t I just want to know you? Ford countered, paying close attention to the way rather than constantly exuding his emotions, Bill was suddenly closed off, emitting nothing.

Bill said nothing but looked up when Rodrigo returned with one Long Island and Ford’s scotch, pulling the cocktail across the table to sip on it through the straw, pensive.

Eventually, he replied. You can. Doesn’t mean you’ll get an answer though.

Why be cagey about it? I’m just asking how old you are. Or is that inappropriate by your people’s standards? Ford questioned, and Bill just kept sipping on the Long Island, rattling the drink up through the straw. How long do your people live for? Are there others like you? More triangular gods out there, who wear bowties and drink cocktails?

No. Bill’s answer was rather clipped, considering Ford’s playful, teasing demeanour. There’s no one out there like me.

Well, maybe not like you, but you must have some stories about your people. Ford continued blithely, while Bill attempted to inhale the entire drink as quickly as possible.

Do I ask for stories about your family? Bill countered, his words becoming barbed. How’s twin two doing these days? Dead in a ditch, or living it up somewhere? How long has it been since you asked about him?

Fine, Bill, I get it. Ford replied, his shoulders tensing defensively.

After all, what’s ten years between brothers? Between negligent brothers even. How about the last time you saw him? I hear it was a lovely fake funeral.

Bill. Stop. Ford gritted his teeth around the straw, frustrated now.

I’d ask if you’d ever attend a real one for the guy, but I don’t want to ply you with ‘inappropriate questions’.

“*Why are you like this? Ford asked, as Bill finished the Long Island, sliding it across the table. “I get that it’s a sore spot, I said that. I stopped, but you just kept going. I’m just being curious about you, being attentive. Being a partner.”
Bill scoffed, and reached for the scotch, sniffing it and wrinkling his nose, before turning Ford’s body back over to him, sulking in the back of Ford’s mind.

_You’re the one who wanted to go on this date. It won’t be much of one if you won’t even talk to me._ Ford reasoned.

It’s already not much of one. Bill’s agitation seeped out of him, his dour mood impacting Ford.

The scientist felt suddenly bitter about this whole situation, about the unspoken morass that lay between them, dissatisfied in an instant. It could have been Bill’s sour mood leaking over, but he felt his own mood reflect Bill’s discontent.

His last-ditch attempt to patch things up between him and his muse, to bridge the gap that grew from Bill’s banishment, was a failure. Ford ticked all the boxes, wore a tie, booked a table at a fancy restaurant, went out in public with Bill, but the god _still_ wasn’t happy.

Ford threw back the glass of scotch, drinking it quicker than he’d have liked to. Good scotch was to be savoured, but now they were both mad, at each other and themselves.

Seething discontent, Ford was almost tempted to pick up the cheque and leave, but he slowly became aware of Bill’s more nuanced emotions leaking through his barriers, bitter nostalgia and self-hatred mingling with his irritation, combining into something noxious and difficult to endure.

Ford’s throat felt tight with emotion that wasn’t even his own, but empathy slowly overtook his discontent, and he approached Bill more gently this time, trying to ease him out of his dour mood.

_We’re here to have a good time together, remember. Aren’t you going to show me how?_ Bill seemed to squint at Ford from inside his mind, and Sixer continued, affecting a facetious, teasing tone.

_I’ve never had fun in my life before, so there’s no guarantee I’ll be a quick study._

… _Says the genius._

_They call me Stanford ‘No Fun’ Pines._ Ford continued solemnly. _No Fun Sixer._

Who calls you that? Bill had to ask, Sixer’s antics slowly but surely drawing him out of his bout of malaise.

_You mostly._ Ford felt Bill warm with endearment, and he used this opportunity to change the topic, hoping Bill’s barbed words would be left behind. _Oh look, our food’s coming._

Rodrigo returned with the Lobster Mornay and Veal Marsala, placing the two dishes side by side on the table, collecting the empty glasses, making a mental note to return with the next two beverages.

“This looks good.” Bill remarked, already delighting at the flavours in the air.

“It does.” Ford agreed, reaching for his cutlery. He spared a moment to look up at Rodrigo, nodding. “Thank you.”

Surprised by the strange man’s manners (though he still seemed somewhat unhinged, talking to himself) Rodrigo nodded, and decided against watering the man’s next few drinks down.
The evening became much smoother after that, Bill and Ford both delighting over the taste of their meals, swapping anecdotes and stories over the remaining Long Island Iced Teas, even ordering a bottle of champagne and several desserts to share to cap off the night.

It was fun, Ford realised. Being with his muse always was, and fun was the flavour he missed in Bill’s absence that had him so morose without him.

It seemed to be an essential part of what Bill brought to the table and seemed to be the spark that justified keeping Bill around. He knew how to have fun, and he effortlessly had Ford doing the same, something he didn’t think he could have outside of academic success and competition. Something he hadn’t had since he was a child, running along the beach.

Bill made Ford have fun just being himself.

They were being himself, together.

Periodically throughout the evening, Ford felt full of this warm happiness that clogged his chest, a happiness that came from being known. He wasn’t sure if it was his feeling or Bill’s.

It could have been his progressive inebriation talking, but the more he felt this warm happiness in Bill’s presence, the more he felt like he could justify Bill’s dubious conduct and lack of moral integrity, if it meant he could spend longer feeling like this.

He knew it was wrong to feel like this. He knew it.

But currently he was too drunk to care.

“And he was ejected from the bank and to this day – to this day – he’s banned from the Coma Cluster. FOREVER!”

Ford chuckled, his shoulders shaking, an arm wrapped around his middle, hugging himself, tearing up at Bill’s colourful anecdote.

He leaned his elbow on the table and snickered, wiping the corner of his eye, shaking his head. “Being banned from a galaxy I’m sure is one thing, but being banned from a whole cluster?”

“Just goes to show you that anything is possible if you try hard enough Sixer.” Bill grinned, and reached for the champagne flute on the table, pouring the last of the bottle in, and sipping the bubbly liquid. “Never give up on your dreams.”

“So inspiring.” Ford scoffed and enjoyed the buzz of the champagne. “Even the illicit ones.”

“Well, you’d know all about that Doc Frankenstein.”

“I told you, no dead bodies were harmed in the making of your – you.” Ford snorted, resting his chin on his hand fondly. “No dead bodies.”

“Say that a little louder, I reckon the police didn’t hear you way down at the station.” Bill teased, tapping Ford on the nose and brushing his knuckles over Ford’s cheek fondly, oozing contentedness.

Their moment of conjoined good spirits was interrupted by a disdainful noise, jarring them out of their one-man conversation.

“Last I checked, this was a private club.” Preston Northwest, two tables away, sneered over at the drunken scientist, talking to his Ivy league colleagues a little too loud for a private conversation. “Who let the rabble in here?”

His snooty colleagues laughed, looking conspiratorially over at Ford’s table.

“There are facilities that house the mentally impaired. Don’t I pay enough in charitable donations to keep his sort out of view?”

Ford froze, shame flushing him with colour. He felt nothing but drunken embarrassment in that moment, until he felt Bill’s emotions competing with his, rage and vindictive anger taking over.

Preston Northwest.

Leave it Bill. It’s not worth it. Let’s just go.

No Sixer. Bill stretched his autonomy further into Ford’s limbs, boxing him out of his own agency. Ford’s resistance was limited, inebriated as he was, and part of him was curious about what Bill would do. I’m about to teach you a valuable life lesson. Never let anyone make you feel inferior for being your own creature. Certainly not the snobbish likes of no-name Northwest.

Bill oozed into Ford’s body fully, keeping the scientist penned back in the corner of his own head, and turned his head to grin eerily at the table Northwest sat on, his eyes bright yellow, wide, slitted, and dangerous.

It’s time I took my pound of flesh.

“Well, well, well, if it isn’t Preston Northwest. Why, you don’t look half as flea-bitten as your old man Nathaniel. Though I guess he’s old, old man Nathaniel now. How’s pops? Auldman still kicking?” Bill rested Ford’s chin on his hand, and beamed at Preston, his voice ringing out across the club loudly. “He doesn’t have long to go. I bet you’re getting itchy fingers for that trust fund.”

“I beg your pardon?” Preston Northwest looked stunned, leaning back, eyeing Bill off with trepidation.

“Don’t be stupid, Preston, although it does suit you. You’ve never begged for anything in your life, although that’s not quite true is it?”

Bill slid his chair back and stood up, teetering over to Preston’s table, and rested his arm over the back of Preston’s chair, before leaning down to whisper in his ear, oozing familiarity. He spoke softly enough for Preston to hear him, and just loud enough to threaten the young socialite with divulging his information to more inquisitive ears.

“You begged the Dean of Harvard to let you in on your family’s reputation when you flunked your entry exams, you begged your mother to let you keep your pet fox Hunter when your father wanted to loose the hounds on it, and you begged old Auldman to let you out of your rooms when he locked you in there for three solid months after you raised your voice to him.”

Preston looked at Bill with absolute horror, leaning away from the other man. Bill smiled sweetly and batted his eyelashes at Preston.

“You were eight. He didn’t like your tone.”

“How do you –” Preston cleared his throat before looking around the table at his university colleagues, who were watching him, judging his reactions. He swallowed his trepidation, and spoke, his voice feigning strength and authority.
But his eyes told the truth. His eyes showed fear.

“What do you want?”

“Just conversation. Could be one on one, could be an opportunity to share with the class.” Bill shrugged his shoulders, and grinned maniacally around the table, unnerving Preston’s friends. “Or don’t you want to be seen talking to my sort? The rabble?”

Preston took a hesitant breath, his desire to preserve his reputation pulling him two ways at once. He looked around the table for a moment longer, before he pushed his chair back, standing up.

“Excuse me gentlemen.” Preston’s composure wavered, and he cleared his throat again, leaning away from Bill. “I’ll be… right back.”

“The right choice! A good opportunity for old friends to play catch up.” Looping his arm around Preston’s shoulders, Bill grinned, and tugged the Northwest heir closer, before waving brightly at the table behind him. “See you chaps on the flipside. And remember, invest in cryptocurrency. The next big thing. An insider tip, but you didn’t hear it from me.”

Dragging Preston off, Bill pulled the Northwest heir aside into the corridor leading to the bathrooms, before pinning him to the wall, his arm resting to the side of Preston’s perfectly coiffed head, blocking his escape.

“Who are you?” Preston asked Ford, his voice a reedy quaver. “You look like the scientist who came knocking on my door two years ago, spouting rambling conspiracy theories, but he was – you are –“

“Don’t act like you don’t know me Northwest. Your family’s in two deals deep already, and you have the gall to not recognise your God?” Bill’s eyes seemed to glow, exuding power.

“I don’t – “ Preston blinked up at Bill for a moment, lost, before correlation clicked in his mind, and he remembered the tapestry kept in Auldman’s study. “It’s you.”

Bill’s eyes lidded, and he smiled like the Cheshire cat, the expression an anachronism on Ford’s earnest face.

Preston Northwest began to backtrack, simpering before Bill, as he averted his eyes, apologising profusely. “I – I’m sorry I didn’t recognise you, my lord. I live to serve you, I – whatever you want it’s yours – I -“ “Shhh.” Bill placed Ford’s finger on Preston’s lips, silencing his grovelling.

Preston bowed his head and his words dried up.

“You should have shown me respect. You know I’m always watching.” Bill said smoothly, watching Preston tremble. “For being so rude to my vessel, you’re going to pick up the tab for us. You can afford it. And I’ll require twice as much devotion from your family in future if you want me to make good on part two of our deal. One hundred and fifty years can pass in the blink of an eye, and your time is running out.”

Preston paled, and nodded. “Anything. Anything you say.”

“Good.” Bill smiled, and leaned away from Preston, dusting down the man’s shoulders, making to turn away, before he paused. “Oh, before I go!”
Preston held himself tense, waiting for Bill to speak.

Bill patted Preston on the shoulder, and smiled, his smile disingenuous and disdainful.

“Don’t forget to tip your waiter.”

Sauntering out of the club, Bill waved jauntily over his shoulder.

Preston slumped against the wall, sighing with relief.

On his way back to his table, he snagged Rodrigo the waiter.

“The table in the corner there, how much was the bill?”

Rodrigo handed over the bill to Preston, and the Northwest heir ground his teeth, staring at the zeros on the end of the bill, noting the expensive vintage champagnes, decadent desserts, and aged whiskies he was funding.

Pulling his chequebook from his jacket pocket, Preston hastily scribbled down the cost of the meal, shoving the cheque into the young waiter’s hands gruffly, intending to leave it at that, before he felt a chill go down his spine.

You know I’m always watching.

Preston dug three crisp hundred-dollar bills from his jacket pocket and tossed them at Rodrigo, sneering at the young man.

“Keep the change.”

He walked away, wringing his hands like they were dirty, having touched the common folk, and Rodrigo picked the bills up off the floor, staring at them, awestruck.

Valencia wasn’t going to believe this.

Ford was finding it more and more difficult to push past the back of his head as the evening went on.

Their collective inebriation was beginning to affect him.

Ford found his movements slower, his inhibitions lowered, and his ability to overpower Bill’s rambunctiousness weakened. Rather than withdrawing, as Ford seemed to do after a few drinks, tiring himself out, Bill only became more of a forceful presence as intoxication set in, acting louder, brasher, more reckless as the night continued.

Ford’s car was parked poorly, one wheel up on the curb, his front bumper scraping against the concrete gutter. Ford had protested against what they were doing, calling it ‘drunk driving’ but Bill just called it fun. It was a miracle they didn’t hit a pedestrian. It was a miracle the car was still in one piece.
Ford’s heart was pounding, adrenaline and good old-fashioned fear for one’s life getting his blood racing as fast as the car did, and he felt his stomach flip as his dinner caught up with him.

I don’t feel so good. Ford moaned mentally, but his protestations were ignored in favour of Bill’s fervour.

“WOO! Now that was a ride. Don’t know why you bother sticking to the speed limit Poindexter, if you’re after efficiency.” Bill opened the car door, and stuck his leg out, pulling himself out of the car, teetering on Ford’s long legs. “Why you didn’t let me drive before I have no idea. Clearly, I’m great at it.”

I’m going to throw up. Ford wheezed.

“Well, keep it down. The night’s not over yet.” Bill blinked one eye at a time, taking in the buzzing neon sign for the Skull Fracture, and staggered over to the door of the bar, swaying on his feet.

The bouncer at the bar crossed his arms and gave Stanford a leery one over.

“Have you been drinking this evening sir?” The bouncer asked gruffly.

“What would give you that idea?” Bill slurred, and leaned against the wall conspicuously, trying not to sway. “I am just a humble patron, eager to enter your humble establishment and spend all my arbitrary money in there, guzzling your liquor to my heart’s content. It’s profitable alcoholism. You’d be enabling me. Win win for you, am I right?”

The bouncer wrinkled his nose, and grunted, before holding out his hand. “I’m going to need to see some ID.”

Bill fished his hand into Stanford’s coat pocket, patting himself down. Whistling as he searched for Ford’s wallet, Bill shook out all the pockets of Ford’s trench coat, sending glass vials and various scientific miscellany scattering down on the pavement below.

Ford groaned, and threw his will into his right arm, flinging it out, before reaching around into his back pocket and grabbing his wallet.

“HAHAHAHAH! Well what do you know? My ID is right –” Instead of pulling out Ford’s ID Bill removed a fifty dollar bill from Ford’s wallet, and held it out for the bouncer. “Here!”

The bouncer paused, and blinked at Ford for a moment, before he leaned in, lowering his voice. “Are you trying to bribe me?”

Bill grinned at the bouncer. “Is it working?”

The bouncer paused, squinting at Bill, before he snatched the fifty bucks up, and stepped to the side.

“Enjoy your evening, weirdo.”

Bill walked past the bouncer, into the bar with a spring in his step and Stanford continued to mentally complain.

My ID was right there. You didn’t have to bribe him, you just cost us both fifty dollars.

You can’t put a price on a good time Sixer. Words of wisdom for you.

Bill hopped up onto a stool at the end of the bar, and swung his legs, waiting for the bartender.
Inwardly Ford was struggling.

He wasn’t having a good time anymore, his body was complaining, and so was he, loud inside his skull.

The alcohol made him sleepy, had his liver working overtime, and helped nurture his brewing headache. That coupled with the embarrassment and constant mental fighting with Bill had Ford’s eye throbbing something fierce, pain and exhaustion augmenting the evening, breaking Ford down.

He was miserable. He was embarrassed and tired. He didn’t want to be here anymore, he wanted to be at home, sleeping off this horrible intoxication. His eye was bloodshot, he was sure of it, and his eyes felt dry and painful. Bill didn’t blink often enough, his unnerving stare causing Ford’s eyes to water, tearing up at the edges.

He was moaning inside his head, beseeching Bill to go home, that he wasn’t feeling well, that he was tired of this, loudly complaining about each of his bodily aches and pains, but Bill didn’t seem to want to listen to Ford, or his body. He didn’t have time for Ford’s earthly complaints.

Bill drummed his fingers against the counter and looked down along the bar. He waved to the bartender, and the bartender nodded, acknowledging him, and finished serving the drink to his current customer.

Ford’s lower lip jutted out as Bill resigned himself to waiting for service. He took the time to casually survey the bar, rather than listen to Ford’s mental whinging.

It was 2am, and the bar patrons were sparse at this hour. The Skull Fracture wasn’t the most thumping watering hole, but it had its regulars. Lonely lumberjacks and lamenting middle aged men mostly. Bill wondered what that made Ford and snorted a laugh.

The bartender was currently patting one of his patrons on the shoulder, sliding a glass of water across the table. Bill tried to listen in to their conversation.

“You’ll be okay mate. I’ve called her, she’s coming to pick you up.”

“No.” The drunk man moaned. “Don’t make her look after me, I know she don’t want to.”

“You’ve got to go home to her sometime.”

“She don’t want to be with me.” The man moaned, and Bill realised, with his red hair and beard, that the man looked familiar. “Nothin’s been the same, not since - I don’t know why she stays, everything’s –“

“Shh. It’s alright mate, it’s alright.” The bartender patted the lumberjack awkwardly on the shoulder as he burst into tears, crying into his hands helplessly.

“Yeesh.” Bill raised Ford’s eyebrows, unimpressed, before he picked up one of the coasters, rolling it between his hands. “Not much of a party hotspot, eh Sixer?”

_Bill, come on, please. I feel sick. I want to go home._

“Huh. Party of one, maybe.” Bill rolled Ford’s eyes, and started scratching Ford’s chin, stubble growing back in once more, irritating Bill. “Can you stop growing this stuff?”

_I can’t exactly control whether my hair grows. It’s a bodily process._
“It’s a bodily process.” Bill mocked in a high-pitched tone. “Get a hold of yourself. What’s the point of having a physical form if you can’t control how it works. That’s what your nervous system is for.”

I can’t think myself out of growing body hair. Ford griped.

Says you. Bill snarked back and then clenched Ford’s fist, willing back Ford’s facial hair. He poured every ounce of effort he had into it, Ford’s body tensing up, holding his breath. Rather than reversing the growth of Ford’s facial hair, Bill just managed to make Ford look utterly constipated.

When Bill realised it wasn’t working, he released Ford’s body from his will, and Ford gasped, catching his breath, finally back in control for a moment.

Ford rubbed his chest, feeling his heart racing painfully, deprived of oxygen. His eyes were throbbing, as was a particularly prominent vein in his forehead, and his face was red and blotchy. He wheezed in each breath, feeling his head spin dangerously.

The bartender chose this moment to approach Ford, looking him up and down.

“A water for you mate?”

Ford cleared his throat and tried to search for a plausible excuse.

“Choked. On a peanut. I’m fine.”

“Fair enough.” The bartender pulled three bottles, whisky, tequila and vodka up onto the counter, readying himself, and the scent of the alcohol turned Ford’s stomach. “What can I get for you?”

Ford could feel the bile creeping up his throat, that abrasive distilled scent making him feel sicker, and he struggled to swallow it back down, before clearing his throat again.

“Just water’s fine.”

Oh boo! Bill jeered in the back of Ford’s head. You’re no fun.

I’m dehydrated. Ford pointed out and pinched the skin on the back of his hand, noting how slowly the flesh sunk back down, clear evidence of dehydration.

The bartender slid a glass of water across the counter for Ford, and he accepted it graciously, sipping it down.

His mouth tasted disgusting, and the water helped, washing his mouth somewhat clean.

As Ford savoured the water, still feeling all the rich food from earlier rebelling in his stomach, the door to the bar opened.

Willow Oakwood walked in, her bright red hair tied back hastily, wearing what looked like her pyjamas, already making a beeline for Dan, who was crying at the bar again, depression hitting him hard.

Looking around, she noticed Ford at the end of the bar, and stopped in her tracks.

Dan hadn’t seen her yet, still crying into his hands, so she changed direction, and walked over to Ford, reaching out to put her hand on his shoulder.

“Hey, Stanford. How’ve you been?” Willow asked in a soft tired voice.
Bill’s presence instantly spiked in Ford’s brain, becoming jagged and dangerous.

Red.

Ford drunkenly panicked, remembering how justified Bill had felt about planning to murder Willow in all manner of twisted ways. Ford had been able to brush it off as an exaggerated emotion in the mindscape, knowing nothing could come of Bill’s swinging moods.

He thought he’d rendered Bill harmless, letting him reside in his body, cutting him off from his magic this way, but now with Bill snarling inside of his head, imagining all the brutal things he could do to Willow in Ford’s body, he realised just how wrong he was.

Bill was already seething with rage, his presence bubbling out, filling Ford’s limbs, chilling his blood with pure vindictive hatred.

Ford was frightened, he didn’t want to put Willow in harms way, but the angrier Bill became, the less in control of his body Ford was. He felt dizzy and helpless, his thoughts foggy, alcohol impairing his willpower, and he struggled against Bill’s control, to little success, feeling penned back in his own head once more, watching his limbs betray him.

“I’m sorry I haven’t, you know, checked in on you since – I’ve had a lot to… well - handle, looking after Suzie and Dan. They’re not – doing so good.” Willow confessed, her words hesitant and sad. “But my leg is doing much better, thanks to you. That’s one less thing to worry about. One less catastrophic problem.”

Ford barely reacted to her words, holding his shoulders unnaturally tense.

Willow worried she’d upset the scientist, having left him to his own devices for weeks. She knew leaving him alone after essentially banishing his boyfriend wasn’t the smartest thing, that he probably shouldn’t have been isolated after that, but she had her hands full, dealing with Suzie’s recovery and Dan’s melancholy, not to mention her own nightmares. There was a reason she was up at 2am, a reason she couldn’t sleep.

Still, judging from the way Stanford wouldn’t even look at her, she figured he thought she’d done wrong by him, although she didn’t think Ford would take her abandonment so personally. He always seemed resilient enough.

Willow fumbled through an apology regardless.

“But yeah, I’m sorry I haven’t checked up on you. Life’s been pretty hectic.” She explained, before rubbing Ford’s shoulder consolingly. “How about you? Are you doing okay? How have you been holding up?”

Stanford slowly turned around to face her, his movements jerky and deliberate. It must have been the lighting in the bar glinting off Ford’s glasses perhaps, or even Willow’s tiredness distorting her vision, but she could have sworn Ford’s eyes flashed yellow for a moment there.

The scientist tipped his chin up, and looked down his nose at Willow, his mouth twisting into a bitter smirk, an expression unlike any Willow had ever seen Ford make before.

“Oh, don’t you worry, Red.” Stanford said, his voice unusually high and smug. The light flashed across his glasses, and as he faced her, the yellow of his eyes didn’t fade, instead glowing brighter.

Willow gasped, her eyes widened, horror and realisation dawning.
“He’s been doing just fine.”

“No, you – no.” Willow snatched her hand off Ford’s shoulder and stepped back, recognising those yellow slitted eyes, the nickname, the cadence of Ford’s voice that felt both familiar and out of place.

“You thought you got rid of me, didn’t you?” Ford tilted his head at Willow, like a hunting animal, and she felt a shiver of pure survival instinct race down her spine.

She felt fear.

“How sweet. Stupid though. Don’t you know I’m always watching? I’m everywhere.”

“No, you can’t – we banished you- you’re supposed to be –” Willow’s lip curled in revulsion, before steely determination took over. She lurched forward, grabbing Ford’s shoulders, shaking him. “Get out of him, you – you horrible demon!”

Bill gripped Willow’s hand swiftly, using Ford’s strength to his advantage, and twisted Willow’s hand back until it hurt, the redhead crying out.

Ford was throwing himself against the corners of his mind now, senseless and frantic, unwilling to sit back and let Bill hurt someone in his body.

“I’m not going anywhere.” Bill’s hand spasmed, as Ford managed to override Bill’s control for a moment, long enough to let Willow snatch her hand back, stepping back cautiously.

Bill shook off the spasm, pushing Ford back into his own head brusquely, and stood up from the bar stool.

Willow patted down her pyjama pockets, instinctively looking for something to protect herself with, finding nothing but soft flannel.

“Looking for the gun?” Bill questioned. “Want to shoot me again? Sounds fun, but Sixer might have a few concerns if you aerate his body. Swiss cheese isn’t a good look for anyone, you monster.”

“Is he still in there?” Willow asked, horrified, staring at Stanford’s chest like the kind caring scientist could burst out at any moment.

“He invited me in.” Bill boasted, enjoying the way Willow took offence to the thought. “He begged for me to come back. He could barely live without me.”

Ford staunchly denied the begging, offended. Bill ignored him, and kept taunting Willow, using Ford’s height to his advantage to loom over her.

“Sixer’s mine, you see. From now until the end of time. And it’s going to take a lot more than the likes of you to stop me from getting what I want.”

“Hmm.” Bill pursed Ford’s lips together and tilted his head, tapping on Ford’s chin with his finger. “You know what I want right now, Red?”
“What?” She took a step back as Bill continued forward.

Something about the way he was looking at her, twisting Stanford’s earnest face into something venomous and predatory, had her on edge.

She never considered herself prey, believing falsely that she could take care of herself. The way Bill looked at her though, it made her want to run.

“Payback.” Bill grinned.

So, Willow ran.

She turned on her heel, and raced over to Dan, grabbing him by the shoulder and dragging him out of the bar, pulling at him frantically. She didn’t wait for him to finish his drink, didn’t wait for him to stop crying, she just yanked him to his feet and did her best to manoeuvre him over to the exit.

Looking over her shoulder she could see Ford move to follow, his limbs moving slowly, spasming all the while.

Inside, Ford was fighting.

No, Bill! Don’t! Don’t do this. I won’t allow it.

I don’t care. She shot me, she disrespected me, and she deserves everything that’s coming to her. Bill gritted his teeth and tried to quash Ford’s will back down.

I didn’t let you share my body so you could do this. Bill, don’t! I don’t want –

It’s not about what you want Sixer. Bill pushed Ford further back, and fell into a brisk stride, walking out of the door to the bar. It’s about revenge.

The door opened, and Bill could see Willow putting Dan in the passenger seat of her car, strapping his seatbelt on. She looked up as the bar door opened, seeing Bill glaring at her from out of Stanford’s eyes, and slammed the car door shut, running around to the driver’s side.

You can’t just trap me in here while you hurt her! You can’t make me. This is my body Bill, you can’t -

Don’t tell me what to do. Bill replied, his voice cold and steely.

Watching Willow climb into the car, Bill forced Ford’s legs into motion, striding over to Ford’s car, parked awkwardly on the curb, and slid into the driver’s seat, turning on the ignition.

Ford threw every inch of his willpower into fighting back against Bill, regaining control of his body, but it felt a lot like trying to force back his facial hair. Impossible, a painful exercise in futility.

The more Ford fought from inside his head the more his body protested, adrenaline leaking through him, his heart fighting a losing battle, pumping away, sweat pouring out of his armpits. His stomach flipped and roiled, and his eyes ached, feeling scratchy and raw, blood vessels bursting in the back of his eye.

The car jumped down from the curb, and backed up, Bill expertly steering the wheel.

As Willow drove away, Bill swung the car around in a wide circle, turning around to follow her, driving recklessly. The sound of tires squealing on the asphalt screeched in the silent night sky, and Willow, knowing she was being followed, drove faster.

Stop, stop, stop, stop, stop! Ford panicked, his heart pounding.

Even blinking blood from his eye, Bill was relentless, intent on following Willow, on taking her down. He turned the headlights on, blindingly bright, and followed Willow down the road, through the forest, towards her house, hunched over the wheel, gunning down on the gas.

Eradicating that hideous recessive gene, one ginger at a time. Bill thought gleefully, accelerating. A two for one deal.

Bill, stop! Stop! Ford screamed inside his head.

It’s just like bumper cars! Come on Sixer, look at it like a game. Bill shifted gear, and continued to race down the road, Willow speeding up ahead of him, trying to outrun him. Don’t be such a buzzkill.

I’m not going to let you kill someone. Bill, stop! This isn’t a game, this is serious.

“Can’t you just be quiet again?” Bill tsked, and wiped his eye, trying to stay focused on the road. “Stop fighting me Sixer, you’re wearing your body out. Just take a nap and let me deal with this.”

No. Ford flung his presence further forward into his mind wildly, stubbornly fighting through the pain.

“If you keep straining yourself like this, your body’s going to shut itself down. Stop fighting me, Sixer, just let me do what I want.” Bill snarled, blinking away the blood, both hands on the wheel. He glanced the rear bumper of Willow’s car, pressing his foot on the pedal hard, jolting her forward.

He really was trying to kill her.

Ford narrowed his eyes and took a deep breath, holding it defiantly.

Over my dead body.

Bill attempted to quash Ford’s rebellion, but the scientist was stubborn, depriving them both of oxygen, reckless and resolute.

Drunk logic told Ford that Bill couldn’t kill Willow if he couldn’t breathe, but he failed to factor in that this plan might end up killing someone anyway, himself.

Bill felt Ford’s limbs weaken, his vision dipping in and out, and his grip on the wheel faltered.

Sixer’s body was shutting down, deprived of oxygen, reaching its limit, and every cosmic instinct Bill had was screaming at him to bail before he went down with the ship.

Don’t do this Sixer. You could die. Stop! You don’t want to do this!

Don’t tell me what to do. Ford responded stubbornly, as his eyes slid shut, his body slumping forward against the wheel.

For an instant, he passed out.
The car zig-zagged, before veering off the road, and Ford could feel Bill’s presence physically rip from his mind, abandoning him, jettisoning back into the mindscape, leaving him to his self-imposed death at the wheel.

And suddenly he was alone in his head again, his body his own once more. He opened his eyes blearily and saw his car on a one way track to slamming into a redwood, wrapping around a tree, killing him.

Ford slammed down on the breaks at the last minute, slowing his approach, wheels skidding on the asphalt.

He hit the tree.

The front of Ford’s car crumpled, dented but thankfully not crushed. The airbag sprung free, cushioning Ford’s impact.

He turned his head to the side, winded and sore, and saw Willow driving away, not stopping or looking back, escaping Bill, escaping Ford.

Ford rested his head against the airbag and sighed, relieved that he managed to stop Bill from killing Willow and Dan.

Ejecting Bill from his head felt like an impossible feat, but it had happened. Ford just had to push past the limits of what his body could endure, running himself down so thoroughly that his body couldn’t support Bill’s cosmic energy.

Ford felt the consequences of his bodily deterioration catch up with him, and the alcohol, food, and bile that had crept up his throat throughout the car chase evicted itself violently.

Ford flung the car door open and puked vehemently all over the forest floor.

When he finally stopped vomiting, gasping for air, saliva dripping from his mouth, he pulled himself out of the car, slipping through the puddle of vomit as he tried to get away from the car.

Smoke was wafting out from under the bonnet, and that was not a good sign.

Backing up a respectable distance, Ford collapsed onto the grass, and watched his car warily, worried the fuel tank would catch fire.

The car certainly wasn’t travel worthy anymore, the bonnet dented upwards, the front grill curved around the resolute redwood.

Ford wiped his mouth on the back of his trench coat sleeve, and took off his glasses, wiping the blood away from under his eye.

“I can’t keep doing this.” Ford muttered, deliriously worn out. “I can’t –”

Panting, looking over the wreckage of the crash, Ford looked up to the sky, the moon peeking down from between the treetops, and he came to a realisation that was long overdue.

“Bill is evil. He’s just plain evil.”

He said it. Everything he’d been trying to deny, to sweep under the rug, or justify, was laid bare in that declaration. It was the truth, and that truth mattered more than whatever fond feelings Ford had for the muse. He couldn’t justify lying about this anymore, not to himself, not to the world.

Bill had tried to kill Willow and Dan. He’d tried to run them off the road. He forced Ford out of his body so he could enact his own twisted justice for what had happened the day he was banished. Bill was content to kill Dan too, someone who hadn’t wronged him, who just happened to be in the way, if it meant he could get to Willow, and make her pay for what she did to him.

Bill was evil.

And Ford was the idiot who fell in love with him.

“What have I done?”

As Ford settled into his aches and pains, staring up at the stars above, noticing Bill’s absence like it was a gaping hole in his head, he remembered that he was the one who let Bill into his mind. He gave Bill his body, they shook on it.

Love made him reckless, made him a fool. Who else, but a fool, would surrender so much of themselves for someone else, no matter how good they might make you feel? What kind of idiot would do that?

Ford had let this happen. He’d let Bill into his mind, and tonight Bill had almost killed someone. It took Ford literally threatening to die to keep Bill from murdering Willow Oakwood in cold blood.

It was terrifying to think of what could have happened. Almost as terrifying as what did happen.

Ford could barely control Bill when he inhabited his body, the alcohol dimming his willpower, making him slow to rise up against Bill.

Ford had surrendered his body over to Bill, he shook his hand, he sealed the deal. What if this happened again, what if Bill acted out, hurt someone in Ford’s body. What if next time Ford couldn’t stop him?

Ford wouldn’t be able to live with himself.

Laying back onto the forest floor, exhausted and spent, Ford looked up at the moon, seeking answers.

“What do I do?”

Lost for answers, his emotions loosened by the alcohol, he realised he was utterly alone again, and in that instant, he actually missed Bill’s voice in his head, telling him what to do, making him laugh.

He missed Bill already. What a joke.

Ford hiccupped a laugh, flopping his arms back to lay on the grass, and just like when he first let Bill into his mind, his laughter wavered, becoming hysterical.

How could he miss a murderer? How could he miss this evil thing? How could he care about Bill, after everything that had happened?

He was such a fool to love a monster.

Tears dripped down Ford’s cheeks, and his laughter turned into sobs, unheard and abandoned, just like he was, once again.

“What do I do without you?”

Chapter End Notes

Body sharing was so fun to write hahaha. I hope you all enjoyed this chapter. What a disastrous date. Honestly only Bill could go on a nice dinner date and end up blackmailing two people and committing attempted murder on two other people after six cocktails and a bottle of champagne. Ford's liver must hate him.

I'd like to thank my lovely beta reader friend, who helped me with this chapter's editing. I'd also like to dedicate this chapter to the lovely tainted-petals and their spouse coffee_and_cogs, the review left was incredibly nice and the fact that you said you could hear the characters made my day. Also, everyone should go look at the beautiful artwork I recently commissioned from haruhi-akira! They drew two scenes from the expedition chapter and I am in love with these artworks, go look! They're amazing!

Next chapter we have the Society of the Blind Eye scheming, Ford's paranoia worsening, trouble at the Quadrangle, and after that, we're taking a trip to New Mexico.

Thanks for reading so far, commenting, and sticking around. You're all the best readers anyone could ask for.
The feeling that I'm losing her forever, and without really entering her world.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

A meeting was convened at the Gravity Falls Museum of Natural History. Candles were lit, robes were donned, and Ralph the security guard helpfully looked the other way as Gravity Falls’ own secret society filtered through to the hidden antechamber behind the room that housed the eye exhibit.

It was difficult to perceive individual members from underneath their red hooded robes, but there were pool attendants and postmen, accountants and archivists, people from all walks of life, levelled by the anonymity that donning the red robes provided.

Here everyone was equal. Everyone’s identity shielded. Every compromising detail was hidden.

They were all unseen.

Despite his youth, the robes lent a certain sense of command to Ivan Wexler, and he felt empowered through his expertise and passion to stand in front of this group of initiated fellows and lead them.

“I’ve called you all here for an important purpose, fellow Society members.” Ivan declared, standing up at the central podium, and just like that, he held the attention of the entire room.

It was a rush, to hold this much power, to talk and be listened to. Cowering, cowardly Ivan Wexler the carny didn’t feel like his former self at all in this cohort. He felt like a leader, and given their previous leader, Mr McGucket’s current condition, for all intents and purposes, he was their leader now.

“There has been an incident.” Ivan stated, feeling many eyes upon him. “Our beloved founder has fallen afoul of his own device. The memory ray that has protected so many of us was turned against him by treachery, and it is up to us to investigate and get to the bottom of this.”

“Someone turned his ray against him?” One of the hooded voices called out.

“Was it a member?”

“I know I didn’t do it.”

Whispers broke out among the gathered group, paranoia, denial and fear running rampant.

For a group who controlled the erasure of memories of the townsfolk, the thought that someone else could go around erasing memories willy nilly was a frightening prospect. The Society felt that their control of the memories of the town was being threatened, whoever had wielded this weapon had challenged their authority, and injured their beloved leader in the process.

“Please, please.” Ivan held his hands out, trying to silence the simmering chatter. “This is not an inquisition. I do not believe it was one of our own who did this.”

“Then someone else has access to our memory ray?”

“Did someone else get in here?”
“Who?”

“I do not believe it was our memory ray that was used, as it was still in the sacred box when I came to check, and no alarms had been tripped.” Ivan explained, raising his voice over the crowd. "I believe that our founder’s prototype was turned against him, though I do not yet have all the evidence to prove who did it.”

“Do you have a suspect?”

“Potentially.” Ivan paused, and looked around the room. Being an out of towner he didn’t have the wealth of local knowledge the others did, so now was the perfect time to probe their small-town minds for information. “What do you know about Stanford Pines?”

“The scientist who lives out in the woods?” One member questioned.

“We don’t know much about him.” Another member extrapolated. “Seems polite enough. Rich too. Got a mysterious donation from him, right after my barn roof fell in. Got ol’ Red patched up good as new thanks to that.”

“He’s been through the shop a few times. Keeps to himself mostly.” Another hooded member spoke up. “The missus reckons he don’t think much of us though, bein’ he never stays for the gossip.”

“I saw him the other night.” A tall hooded man replied, raising his chin. “Came by the bar, drunk as a skunk. Couldn’t find his ID so he tried to bribe me on the way in. Parked all the way up the curb.”

“He tried to bribe you?” Ivan clarified, surprised.

“He was fixin’ for trouble, that one, I can tell you.” The hooded man continued. “Had them crazy eyes. I was finishin’ my shift around the time he left the bar. Left in a hurry too. Seemed like he was chasin’ Boyish Dan and his gal, almost.”

“My girl’s always callin’ him her Mr Mystery, but he don’t seem like nothin’ but trouble. Ever since she stopped by his house, she ain’t been the same. I’d stay far away from him.” Another member said, crossing their arms in a disapproving fashion.

“Is he your suspect?” A member in the corner pried.

“He is.” Ivan divulged. “He’s about the only thing our founder recalled, when I pressed him for details. ‘That brown haired man’. And I remember him urging secrecy regarding our society, secrecy from Stanford Pines specifically. So far, he’s the most likely suspect. Him and his yellow haired friend.”

“Who?” One of the members squawked.

“I ain’t never seen him with anyone else round town. Keeps to himself, real secretive like.”

“Didn’t he have that foreign fella with him for a while there.”

“Haven’t seen him in months though. If he was here, he’s long gone now.”

“Hrmm.” Ivan rubbed his chin. “So, it looks like we’ve just the one suspect to investigate.”

“What shall we do?” The society members looked to Ivan for direction, and he felt a swell of pride, envisioning how proud Mr McGucket would be if he could remember who Ivan was.

He saw the genius inventor as somewhat of a father figure, and even though Mr McGucket was highly distrustful of him now, and almost scared of him, Ivan still liked to believe that he would have been proud of how Ivan had flourished through the society.

It was for Mr McGucket that he called them all together.

“We investigate.” Ivan stated. “I want all of you to watch him, whenever you can. Follow him if you have to. He’s hiding something, I think he knows what happened to our founder, and if he knows, he could be involved.”

The society members all nodded solemnly, looking to Ivan for further instruction.

“Be careful.” Ivan cautioned them. “From what we’ve heard, he might be dangerous. He might even still have the prototype. Follow him, but whatever you do, don’t let him see you. For your own safety.”

Ivan loomed over the podium, the candlelight dancing on his chin, casting shadows in the hollows of his eyes.

“You must be unseen.”

When Bill returned to the mindscape, wrenched from his vessel once again, it was disorienting.

He floated out in the gardens outside of the Quadrangle and noticed strings of LED lights decorating the path to the main hall. Bill generally didn’t decorate with fairy lights, he preferred decorating with trapped stars, noxious gases or cosmic anomalies. This seemed all too benign, too domestic. Too Better Homes and Strongholds.

Too Kryptos.

Sounds of laughter and conversation drifted down from the hall, and Bill, floating alone in the empty garden, realised with a belated sort of shock that someone was having a party in his shifting escherscape of a home.

And they didn’t invite him.

The nerve.

Bill scaled the stairs leading to the hall, and edged in through the door, scouring the packed room with his eye.

The hall was bedecked in the most lavish way possible, every brick polished to shine. Clearly whoever set up this shindig was intending to impress.

Who the hall was supposed to be impressing became clear when Bill spotted his investors, sipping on snifters of brandy and flutes of champagne, toasting and laughing amongst one another.
Bill stayed by the door, not willing to throw himself in the middle of that pit of vultures.

The last he heard, the investors were all attempting to pull out, to renege on their contractual obligations in the face of Bill’s failure.

Now they were all drinking wine in his house, smiles all round.

His henchmaniacs were there, Teeth, Pacifire and Xanther standing by the bar, nursing drinks. Keyhole and Amorphous Shape were hanging by the bookshelves, talking together, and in the middle of a gaggle of Bill’s biggest dollar investors stood Kryptos and Pyronica.

Kryptos, the little wretch, was supposed to be the one hovering around with a clipboard or drinks tray at one of these functions, serving a purpose, not rubbing elbows with Bill’s most prominent business partners.

Yet here he was, holding a glass of Bill’s vintage spectral champagne from his off limits private reserve, wearing a bowtie, looking smug, toasting his dimensional supplier. He looked like he was in his element, schmoozing with the best of them, telling jokes even that had the suppliers peal off into a polite burst of laughter. With the bowtie and the self-confidence, and the overwhelmingly smug attitude, it appeared Kryptos was modelling himself after Bill.

Taking his place, running his house, hosting his party.

Pyronica looked utterly bored beside Kryptos, shooting venomous looks at the investors who looked a little too uppity by her standards, keeping the vultures in line, but it was clear from the set of her mouth that she despised being there.

Looking around the hall, she noticed Bill first, her eye widening when she spotted him by the door. Rather than making a beeline for him as she usually did, she paused to elbow Kryptos, pointing at Bill.

Bill narrowed his eye.

Kryptos looked right at Bill, staring back, and gulped nervously, glancing up at Pyronica, before turning back to the investors, looking the other way.

He was ignoring Bill.

Nonplussed by Bill’s return, he went right back to chatting up old Deep Pockets, like he had every right to be doing this. Like this was his party, his Quadrangle, his dimension.

He was banking on the fact that Bill didn’t want to face his investors, hiding behind them, thinking Bill wouldn’t bite back in front of all these people.

Boy, was he in for a surprise.

Floating through the crowd of benefactors, feigning pleasantries with the peons who stopped to greet him, Bill headed towards Kryptos, wedging his way through the crowd until he was a foot away from the treacherous compass, getting ready to grab him, to incinerate him.

Kryptos looked mildly panicked by Bill’s approach. He looked two seconds away from turning tail and running, like a startled deer.

It seemed to be an evening for surprises, because rather than running, the cowardly reaction Bill expected from Kryptos, the compass raised a fork to his glass, chiming the tines against the champagne flute, and raised his voice.

“A toast everyone. A toast! T-to the geometric genius of the hour, without whom none of this would be p-possible.” Kryptos could no doubt see the fire in Bill’s eye, but now with every eye focused on them, Bill had to delay his punishment, pasting a cheerful look on his face.

“Bill Cipher, everyone.” Kryptos flung his arm out, gesturing to Bill. Adding to the surprise of the evening, Bill’s gathered investors, rather than pouncing on the triangle, tearing him a new one for failing to deliver, all joined in a round of polite, congratulatory applause.

Bill blinked, uncertain what they were applauding him for, and halted his approach, betting this uneasy applause had something to do with Kryptos’ scheming.

With nothing left to do but roll with it, so as not to lose face, Bill held his hand up, waving. “Thank you, thank you. I hope you’re all enjoying the party.”

Bill floated forward and threw his arm around Kryptos’ shoulder, continuing to wave at the crowds while Kryptos did the same. Bill tugged Kryptos closer congenially, and he could feel the compass sweating, as Bill’s hand burned hot on his shoulder, Kryptos struggling to hide his wince.

“You don’t mind if I borrow him, do you?” Bill said to the group of investors, giving Kryptos shoulder another pointed squeeze.

“Oh, no, I couldn’t – Mr Pockets was just saying -“ Kryptos started, but Bill cut him off, his tone all the more threatening for it’s friendly cadence.

“Mr Pockets can wait. This will only take a minute. Come on Kryptos, let’s chat.”

Dragging the nervous compass away from the crowd, Bill tried to lead Kryptos into his private study, behind closed doors, but Kryptos stopped at the edge of the hall, deliberately remaining in sight of the crowds.

“What would you like to talk about Bill – I - I mean Boss?” Kryptos stuttered.

“What is this?” Bill asked, still with that smiling tone.

“T-this? I, well, it’s –“ Kryptos started, but was cut off again as Bill hissed at him, his polite tone disappearing in an instant.

“What is this?”

“I – you told me to handle things while you were gone, and I was handling things for you, so I figured I’d –“

“You’d what? Bring all my investors to my house behind my back? Sabotage me? Work against me? What?” Bill had to struggle to keep his voice down, unwilling to show weakness in front of such a big crowd, still spitting fury. “What have you been telling them Kryptos, why are they applauding? What the shpx is going on?”

Pyronica was making her way through the crowd now, coming over to join them in the corner, as Kryptos stammered his way through his explanations.

“They’re applauding because they’re on side with us again. I – I told them that everything was back on track with the portal. That we’re on schedule again. Ahead of schedule even. That we’re almost ready to move on Earth. They’re celebrating.”

“You WHAT?” Bill’s eye bugged out, inwardly screaming his panic. It built like the shriek of a kettle as Kryptos’ words set in.

“I just told you what.” Kryptos blinked at Bill like he was stupid. “You left me to take care of your business, so I made a business decision on your behalf. I told them we’re on track with the takeover, and they’ll have delivery soon.”

“Why would you tell them that?” Bill wheezed, his eye darting over to the crowd of investors, panic threatening to overwhelm him.

He wasn’t ready to move on Earth, he was so far from ready. He hadn’t even been thinking about actually following through with this, not while he’d been so preoccupied with winning back Sixer, and now he wasn’t even sure if he managed to do that, given how much Ford had been yelling at him when they parted ways.

He’d been avoiding his investors, specifically because he knew his hold on Earth wasn’t a sure thing and pushing through now would involve some incredibly underhanded tactics that Bill was hoping he could do without here.

He wanted to slowly build Sixer’s trust back, wanting the scientist to see things his way, coaxing him over to Bill’s side so they could present a united front when the portal opened. He wanted Sixer to give into him and appreciate him like he used to. He wanted that connection back.

He couldn’t just go blasting through now, especially not now.

He just made a promise with Sixer (technically not a deal, but he did shake on it) that if he so much as went near the portal, let alone turned it on, he’d lose his favourite human - forever.

Not that Sixer had any conceptualisation of what forever truly meant, but the thought was still deplorable to Bill, given how swiftly and irrevocably he’d found himself developing an attachment to the scientist.

Bill didn’t want to lose him. Hadn’t he lost enough already?

Bill firmly believed that the universe, cruel and spiteful force that it was, stacked the odds against Bill having and keeping nice things, which is why when fate and happenstance led a nice thing straying down his path, he wrapped his wiry little hands around said thing and vowed to never let it go.

That was just in Bill’s nature. He didn’t have many things that were ‘his’ but when he owned something, the universe could pry that thing out of his cold dead hands.

However, going back on his promise with Sixer was too much like tempting fate, lending fodder to the universe so it could gleefully snatch the one person who made Bill feel adored from his field of view.

He didn’t want to risk it, and he was close to hyperventilating, inwardly shrieking in a mad panic at the thought of losing Sixer’s steadfast regard.

And now Kryptos had told his investors that moving on Earth was a sure thing?

Bill felt backed into a corner, he felt robbed of his choices, robbed of control over his own takeover, and it made him absolutely livid.
And that was before Kryptos opened his goddamn mouth.

“I told them we were ready, because it’s time for you to get over your fixation with that human and start fulfilling your end of the deal.” Kryptos, cowardly, snivelling Kryptos, looked Bill straight in the eye and continued. “You’ve spent months mooning over this Sixer, drinking yourself into a stupor when he rejected you and springing right back to his side when he called. You’re Bill Cipher. All knowing, all seeing. You’re the strongest being throughout the galaxy, feared, known, revered, and he made you weak. He’s deceived you time and time again, pulling the wool over your eye, and he’s just a human. He shouldn’t be able to do this to you. You’re lucky you have me taking care of things for you with your investors, because if word of how you’ve been acting – like some addled fool – over a human – if that gets out, there wouldn’t be a single person in this hall tonight. Not even your crew.”

Bill gaped at Kryptos, dumbstruck by the absolute gall this compass had, not just to say all of this, but to say it to Bill’s face.

So Kryptos thought he was weak, did he?

Bill’s temper rose from a simmer to a boil, and fire danced in his eyes as his hand raised, intending to slap the smug right out of Kryptos’ snaggle toothed smirk.

His vindicating bitch slap was halted by a pink clawed hand, grabbing his thin black arm and forcing it down.

“Bill.”

Pyronica stood in front of Bill and Kryptos, shielding them from view from the hall with her cloak, and looked at Bill with her sympathetic, knowing eye, before saying the words that Bill never thought he’d hear.

“I agree with Kryptos.”

Bill heard the screeching in his head skid like tyres on the road as his mind hit the brakes, and his worldview shattered in an instant.

Pyronica agreed with Kryptos?

He looked up at Pyronica, horrified that this was some sick twisted alternate universe he’d journeyed to by mistake, or the start of the end of her loyalty to him, usurped by a rhombus. Perish the thought. Rejected by his own best friend in favour of the logic Bill didn’t want to listen to, mostly due to its abhorrent blue source.

“I know, I didn’t like saying it as much as you hated hearing it. I need to wash my mouth out for a few millennia. Blburgh.” Pyronica shuddered dramatically, attempting a small humoured smile for Bill, before her lips turned down at the edges, lapsing into seriousness once again. “But it’s true. He’s right.”

Bill was shell-shocked, feeling distant in his own mind, just staring at Pyronica in disbelief as she continued talking.

“As much as Sixer makes you happy, you’ve become too fixated on him. You’ve been making him your priority, and I’m sorry we’ve forced your hand here, but Bill. I thought we were your priority. What happened to finding us a home? It’s like you just forgot about us, so you could go off chasing your human. We’re still here, and things aren’t getting better.”
“I didn’t forget about you.” Bill said, quietly, his rage sobered by Pyronica’s sincerity.

“Then act like it. Follow through now, while we have all this support. Now is better than later when we have nothing.” Pyronica gestured to the compass beside her. “Kryptos had to bow and scrape and do every undignified thing you can think of to bring our investors back on side. If we want to use this takeover as a springboard we need to approach it from a position of power. With backing. Bill, you can’t keep delaying this so you can play house with your human.”

Bill gave Py an offended look, reluctant to admit that his indulgences amounted to exactly that. Playing house.

He thought he was playing the odds, keeping Sixer on side, unwilling to acknowledge how selfishly simple his actions truly were at the root. Wanting to enjoy his time with Sixer the way he once had was addictive, and fun for Bill, but he thought it was a little more important than playing house with the human, though clearly that was how his henchmaniacs saw it.

How embarrassing.

“Don’t give me that look. When we takeover you can do whatever you’d like with him and the rest of his species.” Pyronica explained matter of factly, crossing her arms. “You can have ten humans instead of one, millions of humans. Like you promised.”

“Humans are hopeless. I only want the one.” Bill grumbled, sounding indignant at the notion of replacing his beloved Sixer with another irrelevant human.

That was like replacing your pet with a different one, expecting it to be the same. That barely worked with goldfish, and it wouldn’t work with Sixer. No human was as unique as him, as uniquely fascinating. The rest of them were all mostly intolerable.

It wouldn’t be the same. Sixer was Bill’s. He belonged to Bill, he wasn’t replaceable.

“Fine, then you can play house with Sixer for as long as you want, once we bust into his dimension. You’ve got to open the door.” Pyronica frowned down at Bill. “I don’t understand why you’re holding back on this. We’re ready.”

“I’ve been working so hard to get him back on side. He won’t trust me if I do this.” Bill insisted, voicing his main concern. “He won’t want to be on our side if I force through.”

“Oh, boo-hoo. So his feelings get hurt.” Pyronica scoffed and exchanged a scornful look with Kryptos. “He’ll get over it after a few decades.”

“He’s just a human.” Kryptos shrugged, agreeing with the pink cyclops. “They’re not that complex. Give it thirty years and he’ll forget it was ever an issue. They’ve got short term memories. I think they call it Dementia.”

“I think they call it ‘you’re still not off the hook yet’ Kryptos.” Bill sniped back at the compass. “Going behind my back, cracking open the good booze, forcing my hand. Don’t think I didn’t notice your disrespect. You are skating on thin ice.”

“He did what I told him to.” Pyronica said, defending Kryptos.

“Who gave you the authority to order him about?” Bill blustered, shocked that she would censure his attempt to dress Kryptos down for his insubordination.

“You did.” Pyronica put her hands on her hips, unimpressed. “Figures you’d be too drunk to “You say that like it’s a bad thing. Just –“ Bill spluttered. “Why would you –“

Having been left to deal with Bill’s investors for the past several weeks, the pink cyclops’ patience was wearing thin, and Pyronica cut his protestations off with a steely look. “You know why.”

Bill crossed his arms and tapped his finger against his bricks for a while, fuming, taking in everything, the situation he was in, the censure he was under from his inner circle.

After several minutes of seething silence, Pyronica’s judgemental stare not letting up for a second, Bill threw his hands in the air.

“Okay fine!” He gestured as he spoke, leaking frustration. “I’ll go ahead and do it. I’ll force this through. I’ll shoot myself in the foot, whatever you want.”

“Now was that so hard?” Pyronica asked sweetly.

“Yes.” Bill grumbled, crossing his arms, scowling.

Pyronica batted her eyelashes at Bill sweetly and swung her shoulders, smiling now. “Thank yooooooou.”

Bill rolled his eye and looked away.

Kryptos seemed pleased, his smug little face lighting up.

Bill glared at him. The smug look slipped of Kryptos’ face quicker than grease on a non-stick pan, suddenly fearful again. That fearful look soothed Bill’s temper, it was nice to know that Kryptos still knew his place.

Looking around the hall, taking in the details of the design of the party, how well organised it was, how Kryptos kept all the investors in groups of manageability and how he made sure Teeth and Pacifire were kept contented over by the bar, his two biggest troublemakers out of the way, how he let AM chaperone Keyhole, how he had Eight Ball in the corner, overseeing everything, maintaining security. Even the way he had everyone wearing little bowties, it was all incredibly classy and well done, even if it was the most underhanded thing Bill had seen Kryptos do.

“So, you schmoozed this all together?” He narrowed his eye at Kryptos, who looked fearful for a moment, gulping, before he nodded.

Bill tapped his fingers against his bricks, agitated, but reluctantly acknowledged that this sort of reach around from Kryptos was halfway impressive.

“You’re walking the walk. Nicely played.”

The compass beamed brightly, Bill’s rare praise thrilling him limitlessly.

“I strengthened all your business partnerships, and made detailed notes on the revenue and resources each investor can bring, and I made sure that one investor you never liked bankrupted himself, and I did –“ Kryptos babbled excitedly, relishing the praise.

“Hey zip it.” Bill waved his hand at Kryptos. “I paid you a compliment, I didn’t ask your life’s story. You’re lucky we’re not having serious words right now about you doing all this without my permission. Words like defenestration and disembowelment.”
Kryptos gulped and looked suitably apologetic. “Sorry Boss.”

“Why did you do this, out of interest?” Bill asked, watching Kryptos closely. “I don’t want pragmatic reasons, I want your reasons. Why?”

“I – I just wanted to prove I’m loyal to you Boss.” Kryptos stuttered. “I just wanted to do a good job.”

“Hmm.” Bill looked Kryptos up and down, sizing him up. Of course, he wasn’t going to take the compass at face value here, he probably said that countless times before stabbing his old bosses in the back, but if he was willing to go the extra mile for Bill, the triangle was prepared to ride the wave and see how far it would get him.

“Well, congratulations, you succeeded.” Bill acknowledged, looking away so he didn’t have to see Kryptos’ face light up agonizingly smug again.

“So, are you going to float around the party now?” Kryptos asked, pulling a clipboard out from under the edge of his glove, clicking a pen, eager to start making notes. “I could organise meetings. I know your investors have been eager to –”

“Nope.” Bill cut Kryptos off, still leery of making nice with the investors. “Not gonna do that.”

“If you’re not going to talk to them, then you should go do what needs to be done.” Pyronica said seriously. “This could be your grand triumph, if you go do it now. Just get it over with, and then this can be your celebration party, all in one go.”

Bill looked away from Pyronica unwilling to do that either.

She crouched down so she was facing him and softened her tone. “If you have to go, go. Say goodbye to him, make your excuses, get it over with. Handle it. But don’t keep putting this off. Earth should have been ours by now.”

Bill closed his eye and took a deep breath, trying to steel himself to take action. It was hard. He didn’t want to, he just wanted to put his plans off while he explored this fun new daydream with Sixer.

But that was the problem with exploring your dreams.

You had to wake up eventually.

“You can do this Bill.” Pyronica blinked down at him sincerely. “I believe in you.”

Rather than bolstering him, Pyronica’s belief just made him feel worse.

Swallowing his trepidation back, Bill opened his eye, and nodded at his henchmaniac, hoping that the conflict he felt wasn’t written all over his face. He wanted to look determined, in charge, commanding.

Instead he presumably looked like a lost little kid, dreading the thought of having to say goodbye to his best friend before his human pet was sent to live on the farm.

He didn’t like letting go.

“I’ll be back, and when I am –“ Bill’s bricks began to shimmer out of view, drifting back towards the mindscape to do what must be done. His eye was the last thing to fade out of view, resigned and disappointed, but his voice lingered with finality.

“This will all be over.”

Ford was down in his study, taking apart the memory ray Fiddleford had left behind. Still wary of its memory erasing properties, Ford couldn’t justify keeping the prototype around for fear of it being used against him, but he didn’t see why he couldn’t find some other use for the alien technology grafted through the device.

Ford had been tinkering with incorporating the brainwave frequency interface with some sort of audio-visual equipment, making a thought projector of sorts, so Ford could scour through old memories.

He was trying to convince himself the purpose of the device would be to improve long term and short-term memory by enabling him to look back on his thoughts and refresh himself on them. Imagine how novel it would be to be able to input a recollection of his nuclear physics classes from university before applying the knowledge practically. Imagine how it would streamline his research, to be able to revise topics by searching through his thoughts to uncover the initial point of retention.

Those were the well-intentioned purposes of the device, the purposes Ford clung to in order to justify this invention.

He didn’t want to admit the true purpose of the thought projector, to pour over his old memories with Bill, searching for instances of deviance or deceit that he’d missed, obsessing over every second he spent with the muse, trying to assess what parts of their relationship were real, and what parts were simply a twisted fabrication.

Ford needed to know. It had been a week since he’d ejected Bill from his mind, and he needed to know. It burned within him, this desire for clarification or closure.

He just didn’t know what to believe about his muse now. He didn’t know if he could take his recollections at face value, knowing how blind he’d been to Bill’s selfish, morally dubious qualities. He’d been wearing rose tinted glasses for the duration of his time with Bill, and it was only now, shocked into awareness, that Ford was beginning to take the blinkers off, and think critically about his relationship with the small god, and how much of the muse’s behaviour he could no longer justify.

Days passed without communication from the god, and Ford wrongly assumed that when Bill was forcibly ejected from Ford’s body on the road out of town, it was a permanent ejection.

He thought that he’d severed the ties they had by rejecting Bill’s influence and control, by sending the muse spiralling from his mind, leaving Ford broken down and physically spent on the side of the road, shaking with relief that he didn’t just murder two innocent people.

Ford assumed that as Bill was no longer in his head, their deal had been disconnected, and it was one less thing for Ford to worry about now, privately thankful that he didn’t have to face Bill after this, keen to avoid a messy confrontation.
He knew that he couldn’t keep playing Bill’s games, he knew that their romantic interlude had to cease.

However, Ford was a coward, at least when it came to initiating a break up, and so he worked on his new inventions, focusing his efforts on a pleasant distraction, hoping vainly that he could get along without having to say those horrid words at all, hoping Bill could take a hint.

It seemed Bill couldn’t take a hint, or the hint Stanford intended to give him went right over his head, his muse too distracted to pay any attention to the way Stanford was ignoring him, because as Stanford passed out, drooling onto the papers on his desk in the study, he came to in his mindscape to find Bill in it, waiting for him.

Bill floated by one of the tall bookcases in Ford’s mind, running his finger along the spines of the books lined up with a daunting intensity. Ford was struck with the thought that this may just be how Bill inhabits his mind when he isn’t here, stroking the books on the shelf, obsessing over Ford’s thoughts.

Ford swallowed, apprehension building in his throat as Bill looked up at him, shifting his unblinking stare from the book, to the scientist’s face.

“Hi Sixer.” Bill said and put the book he was holding back on the shelf, twiddling his thumbs now, fidgeting, floating over to Ford.

“Hello.” Ford replied awkwardly, watching warily as Bill moved closer to him, invading his space like nothing had happened between them.

Bill reached his hands out and stroked them through Ford’s hair with the same intensity with which he held the books, inhaling deeply when he made contact with the human. It was evident that he was cherishing this contact with Stanford, that being close to him went some way towards easing his tension, hands stroking through his hair giving him something productive to fidget with.

Exhaling his tension, Bill shut his eye, and sighed against Sixer. “Ugh, what a day.”

Ford froze, tense, when Bill touched him, and leaned away, watching the triangle incredulously.

Bill hardly noticed that Sixer pulled away from him, his arms elongating effortlessly, fingers still buried in Ford’s roots. Ford had to reach up and physically tug Bill’s hands away to get him to notice his apparent discomfort.

Bill blinked his eye open and took in Ford’s reproachful expression.

“What? I can’t have a bad day?”

“Why are you here?” Ford questioned, still frowning at Bill.

“Why am I in your head?” Bill blinked. “Well that’s a redundant question. You invited me here. This space is mine.”

“No, it isn’t.” Ford shook his head. “This is my space. My head, my mindscape.”

“Well, sure, if you want to get technical.” Bill shrugged flippantly, before narrowing his eye at Ford. “What happened to what’s mine is yours? Since when did you get so grabby?”

“Grabby?” Ford repeated, scowling.
“Grabby. Selfish. Miserly.” Bill extrapolated, gesturing to the elaborate library. “You’ve got enough head to go around Sixer, it’s not like you’re hurting for space here.”

“That’s not the point.”

“Well, if there is a point and I’m not seeing it, you’ve probably missed your mark.” Bill shrunk down and floated to rest on top of Sixer’s head, nestled in the human’s fluffy hair, his hands dangling down onto Ford’s forehead. “I’m practically made of points, get it?”

Ford didn’t laugh at Bill’s joke, he just stood there, stewing on his guilt and resolve, his stomach churning as he thought about what he’d have to say.

Bill was too comfortable here. If Ford wanted to drive a wedge between them, to drive Bill away, he’d have to make Bill thoroughly uncomfortable.

He’d have to be decisive.

He’d have to be mean.

“Alright, not the funniest joke. It’s been done before, so sue me.” Bill closed his eye, tired, and bunched Ford’s hair up like he was fluffing a pillow, content to flop on top of the scientist. “I’m not exactly up for small talk right now, if you can’t already tell.”

“Then why did you come?” Ford questioned.

“Seeing you helps me relax, for some unfathomable reason.” Bill confessed, and ran his fingertips across Ford’s scalp, trying to soothe the scientist in return. “It’s been too long.”

“It’s been a week.” Ford countered.

“A week too long. I would have been back sooner, but I got held up. Can’t have you missing me. I’m sure you were getting bored, talking to yourself all this time.” Bill said indulgently, picturing it now.

He’d grown accustomed to sharing Ford’s headspace, and he found he really enjoyed the experience. He didn’t doubt the scientist felt the same.

In all honesty, Ford felt terrible, moral obligation competing with his own selfishness.

Bill was right, he had missed the muse almost immediately after he left, despite his atrocious behaviour, and he did feel lonely without a familiar voice in his head, making everything seem far more whimsical than it should be in reality.

He had, despite how unusual and off-putting it could be at times, enjoyed having Bill riding shotgun in his mind, but he couldn’t justify letting the god have that much control over him, knowing he would not respect Ford’s wishes, knowing there was no guarantee Ford wouldn’t wake up to bloody hands and a soiled conscience.

He couldn’t control Bill, even in his own body, and he could no longer convince himself that the muse was harmless, despite his current docile behaviour. Bill may be cute, nuzzling into his hair affectionately, but Ford was coming to realise that appearances had no bearing on good and evil, and cute couldn’t justify murder.

Bill was making himself comfortable, already so relaxed in Ford’s presence, letting the stresses of the day slide off his back, unwilling to give into Pyronica and Kryptos’ demands straight away. He wasn’t willing to give this up just yet, but Ford took the decision out of his hands, frowning, his brows furrowing together.

“I –“ Ford faltered, before steeling his resolve. “I want you to leave, Bill.”

“Why? Are we going somewhere?” Bill asked, only half listening.

“No.” Ford shook his head, unseating Bill from the top of his head, letting the triangle float on his own behest, while Ford gathered his stubbornness and turned his chin up. “You are.”

Bill blinked at Ford, slow on the uptake. “I am?”

“You’re leaving.” Ford said, his tone stern, not making eye contact with Bill. “I don’t want you here anymore. I want you to leave.”

“No, you don’t.” Bill replied automatically, assured that Sixer wouldn’t want him to leave. “You don’t.”

“I don’t want you around anymore.” Ford insisted. “Bill, you almost killed two people, in my body. I’m not – how am I supposed to be okay with that?”

“You –“ Bill spluttered, and thrust his hand out, frustrated. “You’re seriously going to harp on at me about that?”

“Harp on?” Ford sounded angry now. “Bill this is serious!”

“I was drunk. You were drunk. What’s the big deal?”

“You aren’t seriously claiming the fact that you tried to kill Willow and Dan was because you were drunk?” Ford boggled, appalled.

“Well, no. Red had it coming to her. I would have gone after her if I was sober, but that’s not the point.”

“What is the point then? By your estimation?” Ford asked angrily.

“The point is, if I’d have known you would have reacted like this, I wouldn’t have put you in a position where you’d have to get your hands bloody.” Bill explained, missing the way his explanation just seemed to frustrate Ford all the more. “I don’t exactly have a body of my own anymore, and I have you to thank for that. If I had my own body, I’d have done my own dirty work, but I had to make do with what I had at the time.”

“Your dirty work? Is that what we’re calling it?” Ford frowned, pacing around the mindscape, his shoulders tense. “Is that what you did to Fiddleford too? Do you call that dirty work?”

“What?” Bill blinked at Ford, surprised that the scientist knew what he did to Fiddleford. Total memory erasure should have taken care of that particular problem, now Bill was worried he hadn’t been watching the other scientist closely enough. “That’s – pfft – no – how do you know about that?”

“I saw the tape, Bill. You terrorized him. You damn near set the whole attic on fire.” Ford said, his tone accusatory.

“Oh, that.” Bill’s eye widened as he realised which tape Ford had likely seen. “Okay, well, that – there were circumstances –“
“I don’t want to hear your justifications!” Ford held his hand up, walking away from the triangle, turning his back to him.

“He hurt you!” Bill threw his hand out, indignantly. “He pushed you down the stairs, all the way from the top, and then windex-ed your mind, and you have the nerve to not want to hear my justifications? You should have heard his justifications!”

“I heard everything Bill!” Ford yelled, turning around to face the baffled triangle.

“Then why are you yelling at me for?” Bill blinked, frustrated.

“The only one who gets to mess with Sixer’s mind is me?” Ford quoted, glaring at the triangle. “What exactly is this to you, a game?”

“What? No – it’s not –“ Bill protested, knowing he fucked up, if Sixer heard him say that.

“Is that what you’ve been doing? Messing with me, all this time? Messing with my mind?” Ford dragged his hand through his hair, clasping his forehead. “Was any of this real, or were you just manipulating me –“

“No!”

“Playing with me? Tricking me?”

“No, Sixer – stop-“ Bill begged, his weariness compounding as Ford turned away from him, turning his refuge, his safe haven, into yet another trial in which Bill did not stand up to par. This felt agonisingly familiar.

“From the beginning, I should have seen it from the very beginning, but I was too blind to see the signs. All this time, you’ve been right in front of me, and I just didn’t want to see what’s so plainly obvious.” Ford shook his head, his words coming out harsh and bitter.

“Sixer-”

“First with the ants, then with the fairies, but I didn’t think you’d escalate to murder. You threatened Fiddleford, you said you’d kill his family. His family!” Ford paced, hurling his words at Bill with outrage. “That’s why you kept asking after his son, you weren’t being considerate, you were going to kill him.”

“Look, I just said that to keep him in line.” Bill pleaded, pressing his hands together. “If he held up his end of the bargain, I wouldn’t touch the kid. Sixer, please, you’ve got to -“ “Believe you? I did believe you. I believed in you all this time, and all this time you were lying to me!” Ford shouted indignantly.

“I wasn’t lying all this time.” Bill tried.

“You don’t even regret it. You don’t even regret what you did.”

“Well, technically I didn’t do anything –“

“THAT’S NOT THE POINT!” Ford yelled, whirling to face Bill.

Bill floated in front of Ford, his eye wide, looking stunned and thoroughly taken aback.

Stanford looked furious, so quickly turning on Bill, his tone betrayed and accusatory, giving Bill no room to manoeuvre, to turn him around to Bill’s perspective again.

Sixer was angry, and he wasn’t holding back. He was tearing into Bill, pushing him away, and he wasn’t mincing words or being nice about it.

He was mean.

“I thought that you were good. That you were here helping me instead of just helping yourself.” Ford’s chest was tight with emotion, and the conflict he felt doing this was buried deep behind a protective layer of rage and righteousness, enough to shield him from the heartbroken look in Bill’s eye. “You were never good. You were barely even nice at times.”

“I was nice!” Bill argued, offended at the end part of Sixer’s assertion.

“You were evil!” Ford shouted, and Bill hovered back, Ford’s words a brusque slap to the face. “This whole time. You are evil. I just didn’t want to see it.”

Bill narrowed his eye, looking chagrined to hear Ford of all people accusing him of this. He liked the way Ford saw him before, mainly because Ford never saw him as an abomination, as an evil thing – and Bill thought Ford saw him as he was, how he thought he was.

Personally, Bill didn’t think he was all bad, but that was how the rest of the universe seemed to see him.

Such black and white thinking.

Something Sixer was apparently proficient at.

“I want you to leave, Bill.” Ford crossed his arms, sticking to his guns, knowing he had to follow through with this. “I want you to leave, and never come back.”

“You don’t want that.” Bill started, honing in on the conflict in Ford’s thoughts, a little of his own desperation bleeding through. “Sixer, you know you don’t want that.”

“Don’t tell me what I want. This is what I want.” Ford argued stubbornly.

“But you’re mine.” Bill countered, reaching out to Ford now. “From now until the end of time. We shook on it, Sixer, we had a deal.”

Ford swallowed, and stuck his chin in the air, trying to evade the constraints of the deal through sheer stubbornness in order to stand his ground.

“I worked with your compromise.” Bill continued desperately, frustrated. “I didn’t go near the portal, I listened to you. You can’t – Sixer, you can’t just end this now because you feel like it. What about us, what about –“

“There is no more us.” Ford said firmly, trying to make up for the way his willpower swayed internally delivering this statement. “If there ever was an us it was built on lies.”

“But we shook on it!” Bill fumed, clinging to that one salient fact. “You said I wouldn’t lose you if I stayed away from the portal. We shook on it Sixer!”

“Well, congratulations Bill.” Ford said bitterly, unable to look at Bill’s betrayed countenance for another second longer. “You lost me anyway.”

Bill blinked, thrown by Ford’s definitive statement, reeling.
He went quiet for a long time, quiet enough that Ford had to look up again, wondering if Bill had taken his rejection with grace and left Ford’s mindscape for good this time.

Unfortunately for both of them, Bill was not taking this rejection gracefully.

The yellow triangle, floating in Ford’s mindscape, was no longer yellow. Instead he was seething, a deep red, the sky overhead in Ford’s mindscape darkening, Bill’s mood seeping out, infecting the dream.

His eye was black, his pupil a burning slit of red fire, and his hands were clenched by his sides, shaking furiously, glaring at Stanford.

Stanford took a hesitant step back.

“Well.” Bill gritted out, his temper causing the ground to rumble like an earthquake the longer he stared at Stanford’s stubborn expression. “If I’ve got nothing to lose, then I guess the deal’s off.”

“You’re leaving my mindscape?” Ford questioned hopefully. “You’re letting me go?”

“No.” Bill replied, growing in size as the earth quaked on.

Towering over Ford now, Bill’s triangular mass was writhing, cosmic energy leaking out of him, the air swirling and twisting around him into horrifying abstractions and optical illusions.

Bill’s mass arched like he was getting ready to pounce, and Ford could see it in his eye, feel the tables turn, and his fight or flight receptors blaring like a siren, screaming at him to get out of there.

“I’m taking the portal.” Bill declared, and suddenly his considerable mass lunged forward, fragmenting and dissolving into particles in the air, charging towards Ford.

“No!” Ford threw his hands up defensively, but it was too late.

Bill’s energy poured into Sixer, diving down Ford’s eyes, nose, mouth, clogging his throat. He struggled, trying to bat the storm of Bill’s presence back, but it was too late, Bill was bombarding him, choking him with his presence, until Ford felt like he couldn’t breathe.

It was terrifying and stifling and – dammit Stanford didn’t you realise you were breaking up with a God?

Ford woke up abruptly, breath heaving through his chest as he gasped, inhaling frantic lungful’s of air, resuming consciousness after what he hoped was only a nightmare.

He looked down at the papers on his desk, drool accenting the pages, before he looked down at his hands, his heart racing, adrenaline pumping.

Was it him? Was he alone? Was he safe?

He tried counting his fingers, knowing how that helped him ground himself to reality after a nightmare when he was a child, but as he looked down at his hands, holding his fingers out straight, his left hand twitched, before clenching into a fist.

“No, no, no!” Ford shook his head, trying to force his will back into his left arm.

His left hand pushed away from the table, trying to force him to stand.

Ford panicked, frightened as his left leg wobbled upright, making for the stairs.
“No!” Ford attempted to make his entire body go lax – uncooperative – and he collapsed under the weight of his slack limbs.

He could hear the faint echo of Bill’s tsk of frustration, before his left hand started groping across the floor, dragging him over to the spiral staircase that led down to the lab.

It was like something out of a horror movie, watching his arm move of its own behest, the rest of his body held back through sheer stubbornness and force of will.

Where Ford was reluctant, trying to still his limbs, Bill was determined, and kept forcing himself to pull Ford’s body onwards. Ford kept trying to wrest control of his left arm back from Bill, but he couldn’t get past his shoulder.

He had made Bill desperate and determined, and with nothing to lose, Ford feared nothing could stop him.

His mind searched back to the last time he ejected Bill from his body, and he took a moment to consider the variables, before reasoning that it was too late to drink himself into uninhabitability. He had to take more extreme measures.

Steeling himself for pain, Ford winced, and threw a wild punch at his own elbow, jarring the nerves there.

Ford’s left hand flailed and fell down, twitching.

Sixer! What are you doing? Bill screeched at him, his voice echoing painfully in Ford’s head.

Stopping you. Ford replied, and slammed his fist down on his own fingers, hearing his knuckle crack.

The pain was something chronic, intensely jarring, like accidentally closing your fingers in a door, but Ford could feel it working. Bill was drawing back, splitting his focus from trying to muster the strength to move forward, to chastising Stanford.

You idiot! Leave your six fingers alone! If you break yourself, I can’t pick up the pieces.

I’m surprised you’d even want to.

You’re still mine. Bill hissed, clenching the injured fingers of Ford’s left hand, trying to get them workable again. I own all of you. In one piece. Stop ruining yourself.

Leave, and I won’t have to. Ford reasoned gamely, sucking in a breath as he rode through the pain.

Ford’s left leg twitched now, crouching up under Ford, trying to propel him closer to the staircase. Ford flung his hands out in front of him, clinging to the edge of the stair, his chin hanging over the landing now.

“Just give up Bill. Leave!” Ford wheezed through the pain.

He could feel what he imagined was Bill’s eye narrowing in the back of his head, before the god spoke up again.

If that’s how you want to play it.

Without warning, Bill kicked out Ford’s leg again, sending him plummeting down the spiral staircase.

Ford tried to fling his hand out to break his fall, but he seemed to hit every pole on the banister on the way down, scraping his cheek on the metal stairs as he fell. It was painful, he knew he’d be bruised all over, possibly concussed.

He winced and brought his hands up to cradle his head, crashing down into a nasty pile at the bottom of the staircase.

He could feel Bill’s simmering rage still seething away at him, and he groggily wiped blood from the edge of his mouth, having bit his tongue on the way down.

Weakly, Ford managed to spit the blood from his mouth, and croak. “Leave Bill. Leave me alone.”

Still Bill struggled to move Ford’s legs, pulling him awkwardly to stand on a sprained ankle. He heaved Ford across the floor of the lab to the computers, Ford’s busted ankle giving out just before he reached the consoles.

Ford availed to lay unhelpfully on the ground, seeing double now, certain he had a concussion.

Still he felt Bill seep into his left arm now, the pain chasing him out of the rest of Ford’s body. He could feel Bill’s desperation pushed to the forefront of his mind, and he could see from the reflection on the metal of the machinery that his eyes were glowing gold.

Bill threw his all into pulling Ford up, his gold eyes glowing determinately in the reflection of the diagnostics screen just above the green lit neon readout displaying the portal’s ‘STANDBY’ mode.

Ford was terrified that Bill was really going to do it, he was really going to turn on the portal, to physically drag Ford through the entire process of turning the damn thing on so Bill could wreak his havoc on Ford’s dimension.

He began to beg in his head, hoping to still Bill’s hand through whatever remnant of sentimentalism he could dredge up for the scientist after all that he did.

Please Bill, don’t do this, don’t do this. You don’t want to do this – please, just leave the Earth alone. I can’t let you murder a whole planet. I can’t let you do to this planet what you did to the other one.

That caused Bill to pause, his expression freezing as he looked into the screen studying Ford’s exhausted expression with confused, searching slitted eyes.

What other planet? Bill asked slowly.

Ford brought the image of Lama Szlam to the forefront of his mind, playing back Bill drinking down the worship in the energy cube, before blasting a giant hole through the centre of the gelatinous green orb. The memory skipped forward to Bill ushering Don Goo in line with his sights, before incinerating the mobster and all that stood behind him, disintegrating the entire globe on a molecular level until there was nothing left, his maniacal laughter echoing through the vacuum of space.

Ford could see Bill’s eyes widen in the reflection on the screen, reeling at what Ford had shown him.

Ford knew he had to do something drastic, while Bill was distracted, and before the muse could form words to match the millions of questions racing through his mind, Ford punted his head forward and slammed it against the metal edge of the control panel.

Ford could feel Bill’s panic slipping away from him, as everything went black.

When Ford woke on the floor of the lab, his skull throbbing, a huge bruise forming, he searched himself for Bill’s lingering presence in his head and felt nothing but the cold emptiness of absence he’d come to know in the past week.

Bill wasn’t here.

Ford turned his neck gingerly and looked through the door from the observation room to the lab. He was relieved to see the portal was dormant. The lights were off.

He did it.

He stopped Bill.

Bill was gone.

Ford groaned and tried to lift himself up off the floor. He felt his forehead and was relieved to note that he wasn’t bleeding. A bleeding head injury wouldn’t look too good, but Ford knew that he still likely needed medical attention. Just because he wasn’t bleeding, that didn’t mean he wasn’t concussed.

Taking it slow, Ford managed to limp over to the lift, taking care not to lean too heavily on his sprained ankle. He pressed the buttons for the lift with his right hand, fairly certain he had dislocated two fingers in his left hand trying to fight Bill off. He’d need to get that seen to if he wanted to write in his journal again. He hoped he hadn’t severely impaired his capacity to draw.

Trying not to dwell on any other potential impairments, Ford watched the lift tick up to the top floor.

Ford sat on the couch, feeling numb, as he called a taxi to come pick him up. He needed to be checked over, he was going to the hospital.

Ironic really, that he’d put himself in there. Or Bill had put him in there. He was fairly sure in healthy relationships, you didn’t put your partner in the hospital. He was uncertain whether this counted as him lashing out at Bill, or Bill forcing Ford’s hand. For a moment, the thought that Bill was asking for it flashed through Ford’s mind, before he recoiled from the notion, never wanting to lean on that justification for hurting his partner, for hurting anyone. He didn’t want to be the sort of person who would lean on justifications like that.

The taxi pulled up, and Ford got in. The drive to the hospital was still, uneventful, silent.

When he was triaged, he sat in the plastic chair across the table from the nurse and tried to detach himself from the image he was presenting. That of some sort of battered housewife.

“And how did you receive these injuries?” The nurse asked.
Ford could hardly tell her that he got them trying to force an interdimensional chaos god out of his mind, so he defected to a literal explanation, his voice monotonal and numb.

“'I fell down the stairs.'

‘Did somebody push you?’ The nurse pressed.

‘No.’ Ford answered, looking down at his lap.

With his fingers splinted and bandaged, his bruises checked over, and his cognition assessed, Ford left the hospital with stitches in his cheek, his ankle pressure wrapped, and his left arm in a sling.

The nurses also ensured Ford left with a referral to see a psychiatrist, worried that Ford’s injuries had been self-inflicted.

Ford kept the referral letter, at least until he got out of the hospital, where he promptly deposited the letter in the first bin he saw. He knew a psychiatrist couldn’t help him, the best they could do would be confirm that Ford was going crazy and assign him medication to temper that fact.

Ford knew that nothing could temper Bill’s influence. He had a god in his head, whether he liked it or not.

He was still coming to terms with not liking it. Whenever he needed reinforcement he just looked down at the bandages, their presence a reminder of what Ford shouldn’t miss.

He had made his decision though, and he had spent every quiet moment in the hospital, and every quiet moment in the taxi home after, assessing every inch of his mind, scouring through for any sign of Bill’s lingering presence.

Finding nothing, Ford wearily concluded that he had been successful. By the time he walked up the porch steps to the shack, home again, slightly less worse for the ware, he was sure.

He had evicted Bill from his mind.

He was free.

Finally, Ford could safely say, that his mind was his own once more.

Chapter End Notes

Poor Ford. Having your partner put you in the hospital, or putting yourself in the hospital, either way you're in the hospital and shit's bad. Probably shouldn't have thrown out that referral letter, you're definitely going crazy.

I hope folks enjoyed this chapter. I might make some grammar edits bc it was posted without being beta read, but for the most part I'm happy with it, so forgive a few stray commas if you can.

As always I look forward to your comments and I'm glad you're sticking with and enjoying this fic! This chapter is dedicated to Nocturnal Charmer, who enjoyed all the same things I enjoyed about the last chapter, including Bill's teenageisms. I'm happy you're liking it hahah, and I love your comments.

Next chapter we have more Project Mentum, 'can't sleep triangles will eat me', bathrobe stalkers, and after that, a trip to New Mexico, to see how the other side lives.
Stay tuned ~
Somehow I’d be doing alright if it wasn’t for the nights. I’d have courage left to fight if it wasn’t for the nights. How I fear the time when shadows start to fall. Sitting here alone and staring at the wall.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Ford was wrong. His mind wasn’t safe, it wasn’t safe anymore.

A week or two passed without Bill’s presence, that absence reinforcing Ford’s assumption, lulling him into a false sense of security, but when he woke in the middle of a field on the edge of town, his hands covered in blood and splatters of mercury, with no clue as to how he got there, he realised just how wrong he’d been.

Sitting up, Ford looked around the place he’d passed out in. He was in the middle of a field, one of Farmer Sprott’s fields if Ford was right, he could see the red barn and the grain silo from afar.

He could also see, fanning out around him, the most macabre looking crop circle Ford had ever encountered.

Blood and mercury splashed everywhere in geometric patterns, interspersed with sigils like the ones Ford had painted on the shack, wheat hewn back roughly with a knife. Diagonal lines branched out, forming some greater pattern that Stanford couldn’t discern from his current vantage point.

Ford stood up, twirling in a circle to look at the carnage around him, horrified.

The patterns and sigils spread out wide, taking up nearly the entire field, the lines painted large. Ford looked down at his hands, noting strands of rainbow hair on his palms, sticky with blood.

He stumbled backwards and suddenly realised that he was standing in the middle of the bloody circle, on top of an open, slitted eye.

This was definitely Bill’s doing.

Realising just how incriminating this looked, standing covered in blood, out in the open, Ford ran across the field, heading into the forest, trying to hide from human eyes. No doubt Bill could see him, he was probably watching him right now. Watching him panic.

Ford washed his hands in the river and sincerely hoped that he hadn’t hurt someone, that he hadn’t someone else’s blood on his hands after tonight.

Bill must have taken possession of his body while he was asleep. Last Ford remembered he was safe and sound in his bed, having turned in for the night, exhausted. He was wearing his pyjamas for goodness sake.

He still felt exhausted. Judging from the size of that heinous crop circle he’d likely been up all night, painting Bill’s expressive artistry in the wheat fields. His body was physically drained in the aftermath of all this mysterious running around, but he knew he couldn’t sleep.

He couldn’t sleep anymore, not knowing when Bill might slip inside his mind, and wear him like a puppet.
So much for doing his own dirty work.

Ford felt violated, he felt vehemently sick, and had to try his best not to throw up as he scrubbed the blood off his wrists.

He wasn’t cut anywhere, so the blood wasn’t his. It wasn’t his, and that caused Ford to fret worse than before.

What had Bill done?

What did he make Stanford do?

Heading back to the shack through the forest, hoping to avoid being spotted, he couldn’t help but detour past Willow’s family hut, worried for her safety.

On the ground floor window, like some deranged 3-year old’s macabre finger painting, was a smiley face, drawn in blood.

No doubt Bill’s doing.

Underneath the smiley face in Bill’s chicken scratch handwriting was an ominous phrase.

ENJOY IT WHILE IT LASTS, RED!

Ford frowned, looking at his reflection in the glass. He had a smear of blood on his cheek that he missed down at the lake, and he had sprigs of wheat and twigs stuck in his hair. Looking down below the window, Ford saw an idle handprint rest against the wood panelling of the hut.

A six-fingered handprint. He had done this.

Terrified that he’d find Willow dead inside, brutally murdered, her blood used to decorate the wheat field, Ford walked around to the front of the house, heading towards the door.

“Dan, where did you put my shoes?” Willow’s voice called out from within, and Ford nearly sunk to his knees, relief coming off him in waves. Thank god she was alive and unhurt.

“Aren’t they in the bedroom, hun?” Dan’s voice called back.

They were safe. They were both safe.

Ford exhaled, and then looked down at himself, his blue pyjamas covered in blood splatter, his handprint on the wall of Willow’s house. It all tallied to make a rather incriminating picture.

Backing away from the hut, Ford realised that both of the people inside the house grew up knowing how to wield axes, and as he hurried away from the lodge, he saw an axe in one of the logs out the front, buried deep in the wood.

If he didn’t want an axe buried in him, he had better run, lest Dan or Willow think he did this.

Even if he didn’t do this to Willow’s house, or to the field, or to whoever the blood belonged to, all fingers pointed to him. Even his own, plastered on the wall in blood.

Ford retreated to the forest and sought out his own home.

As he marched through the woods, he realised in a tired sort of fashion, that his sojourn into the forest could have been worse. At least he had his boots on. Bill must have learned from his first reckless barefoot escape – shoes were essential. Ford was almost thankful for Bill’s consideration, believing for an instant that Bill cared about his physical wellbeing, before his common sense chastised his momentary lapse in judgement.

It was a habit. A pattern. He had nothing to thank Bill for. And clearly Bill had no regard for Stanford, if he borrowed his body like this without permission for his night-time exploits.

Looking ahead to the shack, Ford remembered something else Bill had no regard for, the Earth, and he raced up the front steps, hurling himself through the house, terrified that during his excursion in Ford’s body that Bill had turned on the portal.

The lift moved too slow, yet Ford had to wait, tension raising the hairs on the back of his neck as he contemplated what that could mean for the world if Bill had turned on the portal. The consequences he unleashed on humanity through virtue of falling asleep on the job, literally.

Stanford realised it was his duty now to guard the world from Bill, to guard the portal, and already he was failing.

The elevator door dinged open, and Ford sprang through, his eyes wild, hurtling through the observation room to hang in the doorway, looking out into the lab.

The portal was inactive.

Ford hurried over to the computers, checking the activation log, his eyes darting across the numbers.

No recorded activations. The portal was still in standby mode.

Ford’s shoulders slumped forward, sighing his relief against the computer screen.

The portal hadn’t been turned on.

But why? Ford didn’t understand, if the portal was what Bill wanted, why didn’t he turn it on when he had the chance?

He’d seemed so desperate to turn it on before. Ford thought Bill would stop at nothing.

So why, when he had the chance to turn the portal on and usher through his apocalypse, did he choose to run around finger painting in a field instead?

It didn’t make any sense.

Then again, Bill didn’t make much sense on a good day.

Standing up straight, looking over the lab, Ford realised that regardless of Bill’s motivations, regardless of the fact that for some reason he left the portal alone, it was still Ford’s solemn duty to guard this world against Bill’s intervention.

That meant he couldn’t let an incident like last night happen again.

Bill had slipped through, taking over Ford’s mind and body while he was asleep, knowing that were Stanford conscious, he would fight him every step of the way. Taking advantage of Ford’s unconsciousness, robbing him of his sleeping hours, was underhanded, low by anyone’s standards, but apparently not for Bill. Clearly, Ford was just discovering what lay beneath the iceberg of Bill’s true self, and if the Bill he knew before was the tip, Ford knew he had no idea of just how deep below this iceberg could sink.

If he wanted to guard his mind against Bill’s influence, that meant he had to guard himself against sleep.

He couldn’t sleep, not if he wanted to protect himself, protect his mind, and protect the innocent citizens of this town.

The mystery of the blood still plagued Stanford, and it itched at his mind, conceptualising what exactly Bill had been doing while he was asleep. He needed to know.

But first, he needed to shower.

And after that, he would be stocking up on coffee.

Lots of coffee.

The screen fizzed with static, and Ford watched the pixels dance, frustrated.

He reached out to smack the side of the monitor, hoping to jar it into action.

“Come on, work.” Ford muttered, and smacked the monitor again, looking rather silly, crouching in front of the invention he’d frantically cobbled together, wearing an odd-looking helmet on his head, the bags under his eyes highly prominent.

The pixels jumped on the screen, flickering, until a fuzzy picture came into view on the central monitor, the additional monitors lighting up with words, sliding across the screen.

_GOD, I LOOK STUPID. TIN FOIL. THE BENEFITS OF TIN FOIL. IF I INCORPORATE ALUMINIUM. IS IT THE METAL’S UNIQUE PROPERTIES THAT MAKE IT SO EFFECTIVE, OR JUST THE FACT THAT IT GOES ON SANDWICHES? CUCUMBER AND MAYONNAISE WOULD BE NICE RIGHT ABOUT NOW. NO! FOCUS!_

“I did it.” Ford said, standing up, looking at the screens in awe.

He’d been working on Project Mentum like a man possessed, or rather like a man who had been possessed who was desperately trying to avoid a repeat occurrence.

Reappropriating Fiddleford’s memory ray into the headset was all that Ford could do following his first out of body, field painting experience, it was all that gave him purpose, all he could do to fend off an impending mental breakdown.

Ford was a man in a vulnerable position, desperately looking to arm himself, to guard himself against Bill’s influence, and Project Mentum was all he could think of that could protect his thoughts.

Building on Fiddleford’s technical knowledge, Ford took a leaf from the other scientist’s book and worked to incorporate computer coding into his latest project. Project Mentum could, if used correctly, successfully encrypt Stanford’s thoughts, scrambling Bill’s access to his mindscape.
through a layer of brainwave frequency code.

I HOPE THIS WORKS. CODE CAN PROTECT ME.

Ford saw his thoughts race across the screen, and already he felt slightly more secure, but his paranoia was getting the better of him these days.

CODE MIGHT PROTECT ME. BILL LIKES CODE. HE PRACTICALLY THINKS IN CODE. WHAT IF INSTEAD OF ENCRYPTING MY THOUGHTS I’VE GIFT WRAPPED THEM FOR HIM INSTEAD? HE LIKES A CHALLENGE, HE SAID – NO! THIS WILL WORK!

Ford sighed, seeing his own internal conflict painted clearly for him, the words running across the screens reminding him of exactly how uncertain he was about everything.

He had to believe that what he was doing could make a difference, but it was so hard to believe in anything these days, after Ford’s faith had been shaken so thoroughly by Bill’s deceit.

Coming to terms with the reality of Bill’s nature was the sort of paradigm shift that gave you whiplash, and Ford was struggling to keep his thoughts level and above board, now that he’d accepted the truth.

Ford knew he couldn’t fixate on Bill any more, couldn’t rely on him for truthful answers, or find solace in the moments they shared together – but that left him adrift searching for something to hold onto that would keep him afloat.

Now, all he had was his science, and his sanity, and he wasn’t sure if he had as sturdy a grip on the latter as he would like.

Reaching for his armchair, Ford sat down, the helmet still processing his surface level thoughts, and allowed himself a moment of introspection. After all that was the whole point of this invention, to further introspection. Ford just wished he could survey his own thoughts without being so judgemental about them all.

He had been studiously attempting to ignore the monitor over to the bottom left that kept remarking on how he still liked the little paper drawings of his muse that were plastered to the walls, how he thought the tapestry was a bit much, and the gold statue was definitely stroking Bill’s ego, though that was the intent of the piece when Ford first commissioned it, but the little paper drawings showed character, and were some of the only keepsakes Ford had of Bill’s time down here.

Without further prompting the large monitor in the middle lit with colour, as it played out one of Ford’s memories for him to review.

Bill was drawing yet more triangles on the spare printer paper while Ford flipped through the almanac Bill had brought him, scouring the pages.

“The central hub of most Federation ports, Meccai is a –“ Ford read aloud from the pages, finding it interesting, before Bill interrupted.

“A shithole.”

“I’m sorry?” Ford looked up, questioning.

“Meccai is a shithole.” Bill explained, without looking up from his drawing, holding the pencil in his fist, trying to get the shading right. “The Federation filters all of its refugees through that port, promising a chance at a better life, yada yada, but it’s all a load of crap. They just want somewhere to send them so they look like they’re being charitable, when in reality, they wouldn’t care if everyone on that godforsaken port ate each other.”

“Oh.” Ford’s shoulders slumped, and he looked between Bill and the book, trying not to be disappointed. “Then why does it say that its –“

“The jewel of the cosmos, the centrepoint of commerce, the starting point of success?” Bill recited without looking up. “You’ve had how many years of formal education and still don’t know what propaganda is?“

“I know what propaganda is.” Ford said defensively.

“You’ll want to take off the rose-coloured glasses sometime, Sixer.” Bill said, finishing his drawing with a flourish. “Naivety is cute, but let’s face it, without me around, you’d get eaten alive.”

Bill looked up from his artwork, yet another drawing of a dapper triangle, and raised one eyebrow at Stanford, before rolling his eyes.

“You’re hopeless.” Bill muttered, almost to himself, before he leaned forward and tapped the almanac. “Keep reading. But read critically. You’re too smart to be this stupid.”

Ford scoffed, then laughed, before returning to his study, oblivious of the way Bill’s eyes lingered on him when he looked away.

Ford sighed.

It seemed it was impossible to survey his own thoughts without them circling back around to Bill, to revisiting the memories they shared together, memories of better times.

Ignorance was bliss, Ford supposed.

It struck him, looking back, just how blind he had been. Blind but happy. Bill was practically pointing out his ignorance to him, but he ignored it, didn’t think critically about what was right in front of him, content to linger under the lens of those rose-coloured glasses for as long as he could.

Grinding his teeth in frustration Ford looked up at the screen, his hands balling into fists on top of his thighs.

Bill was right. He was too smart to be this stupid. It was time to wise up.

Typing on the keyboard beneath the monitors, Ford initiated the encryption process, and the progress bar blinked on the bottom left monitor, starting at 0%.

Ford sat back in the armchair, prepared to let Project Mentum analyse and encrypt his thoughts, all of them, trying to get comfortable. The device would scan through Ford’s thoughts and memories and scatter them beneath a layer of code. It was both beneficial, and draining, that the process required Ford to sit still while the device analysed ALL of his thoughts. ALL of his memories.

This would take a while.

Longer, if Ford kept getting caught up in his own recollections, agonising over his own nostalgia.
laced longing every time he lingered on a memory of Bill, thinking himself in circles of bitterness and guilt.

He just felt so stupid, his thoughts always turning back to this, even more stupid when he realised just how many memories had Bill tell him outright that he wasn’t seeing the full picture.

“I just don’t like to see people being swindled by a lie.” Ford said in his memory, at the freak show, commenting on the exhibits. “It’s not right, to trick them all.”

“If they were stupid enough to believe the lie in the first place, maybe they deserve to be tricked.” Bill said, smiling at Ford.

That smile, he knew what he was saying, he’d been tricking Ford all along.

“Ignorance isn’t a sin.” Ford countered, finishing annotating his drawing of the Crabbit. “Just wilful ignorance.”

He was one to talk about wilful ignorance. He’d been wilfully ignorant of Bill’s sinister designs all along. Maybe he did deserve to be tricked. He’d been a trusting fool.

“Hey.” Bill said gently, cupping Ford’s face up on the screen, smiling fondly at him. “You’re my trusting fool, okay?”

“Tcch.” Ford scoffed, and crossed his arms, disliking how intuitive the device was. Just because he was thinking about his failings, that didn’t mean Project Mentum had to rub his face in it.

“Poor Sixer.” Bill’s face on the screen glitched with static as the memory jumped, piecing sentences together. "It’s not your fault you’re so naïve.”

Ford tapped his fingers against his bicep, agitated, Bill’s sweet words of comfort taking on bitter new meaning now. He looked at the progress bar, and it blinked 2% progress back at him.

Up on the screen he was drawn into another memory, Bill standing close to him in the lab, his hand on Ford’s arm.

“Young intellect may be the most staggering thing I’ve encountered on this dingy planet. But even then, if you can’t see what’s happening right in front of you, you may as well let Dummy lead the project.”

“What do you mean?”

“I can wait for you to have the lightbulb moment.”

Words continued to roll across the side screens, augmenting Ford’s recollection, his memories interlacing with his mental commentary.

STUPID. STUPID. STUPID

IT’S BEEN RIGHT IN FRONT OF YOU THE WHOLE TIME. HOW COULD I BE SO BLIND? WAIT FOR A LIGHTBULB MOMENT. I REALLY AM A DUMMY.

Ford’s brow’s furrowed, heavy under the weight of his own mental scrutiny. He was an expert at being harsh to himself, it seemed, and replaying his own failings across the screen wasn’t making him feel any better.

LIES. LIES. IT WAS ALL A LIE. HE NEVER THOUGHT YOU WERE SMART, HE WAS RELYING “God, you’re so stupid!” Bill bemoaned on the screen, standing across from Ford in the library.

Ford looked up at the screen morosely, hating how this, one of his favourite memories, turned sour, re-watching it now.

He looked away, down at his lap, ashamed.

Almost as if to draw him from his melancholy, the memory continued.

“Look, Sixer, you’re a smart guy.”

Ford looked up, clinging onto the remembered praise, despite how hollow it felt.

“But guess what?” Bill had his hands on Ford’s cheeks in the memory now, staring up at his face, as close as close could be. “I’m smarter than you.”

Ford cringed, watching himself kiss Bill passionately at that. His muse just told him he was stupid comparatively, and he still found himself drawn to the god.

Watching Bill throw himself at Ford, kissing him back just as desperately, Ford wondered if Bill had been equally drawn to him, or if that was an act too.

If Ford thought on it for too long, his own assumptions disheartened him, but he had an opportunity here to analyse the evidence empirically.

Was it an act, or did Bill really harbour feelings for him?

“You’re special Sixer.” Project Mentum replayed the audio, overlaying it on top of memories like a montage, memories of Bill smiling at him, looking at him with awe or excitement, like he was the most fascinating creature on Earth. To Bill, he probably was, considering his disregard for everyone else on Earth, but Ford didn’t know if he meant it, if he really meant it. Bill could have been saying anything, crafting lies to make Stanford feel wanted.

“You’re mine. You’re special. You’re so special.” Bill’s voice warped and echoed on the screen, overlaying on top of itself eerily, responding to Ford’s thoughts. “So good. So special. Keep going, don’t stop. Sixer!”

Ford’s cheeks flushed with heat, and he looked away from the screens, feeling like this self-exploration was verging on pornographic. He was here to analyse and encrypt his thoughts, not to obsess over his only sexual experience.

His only romantic experience too. Bill just stole all his firsts in one fell swoop, when Ford fell in love with him.

But did Bill love him back? Or was his love a lie?

Ford didn’t know.

He never said it outright, the triangle disassembling whenever the tables were turned back on him. He never made a declaration.

Ford thought he would be kidding himself, trying to sieve through his memories to find evidence of the fact that Bill had, at some point, actually cared for him.
Ford scowled at his knees, ignoring the screen, playing out memories unprompted in response to Ford’s introspection.

“I don’t know. I’m starting to think that for all its faults – maybe I met you for a reason. Maybe we were always meant to meet? This connection between us, I haven’t felt for millennia. You make me feel things.”

Ford ignored the audio too, entrenched in his own circular logic.

What difference would it make if he could confirm that Bill gave a damn about him? The god’s personal feelings towards Stanford wouldn’t stop him from destroying Earth. He’d said as much.

“You expect me to give up my life’s work for you, but you won’t give up your life’s work for me?”

Bill said up on the screen, his expression heartbroken. “How is that fair?”

Ford looked up, and recognised the scene that was playing out, the colour draining from his face in an instant.

NO. NO. NO. Ford’s thoughts raced across the screen.

NOT THIS MEMORY. THINK OF SOMETHING ELSE. SOMETHING ELSE. THINK. THINK!

“You don’t even know what it is you’re stopping.” Bill scoffed, up on the screen. “How exalted you’d be. How powerful I’d make you. You’d have everything you ever wanted in the palm of your six-fingered hand, and you throw it back in my face?”

IT’S NOT WHAT IT SEEMS STANFORD. IT CAN’T BE TRUE. DON’T BELIEVE IT. YOU DON’T WANT THIS. Read the screen on one of the monitors, while the monitor on the opposite side of the console read. POWERFUL BEYOND BELIEF, THE UNIVERSE IN THE PALM OF YOUR HAND. ALL THE MYSTERIES OF EXISTENCE YOURS TO EXPLORE. UNLIMITED POWER. UNLIMITED KNOWLEDGE.

This was where what Bill offered was so insidious. Stanford couldn’t deny it was tempting, even in his own head, his thoughts were a war of what he should and shouldn’t want. Was he so egotistical that he’d really want this, to be a god, or was he really so naïve to believe that he’d turn that down, that he didn’t want that power?

That was part of what was so captivating about Bill’s regard in the first place, that he’d secured the regard of a god. He summoned Bill here intending to take advantage of what the muse had to offer, looking to elevate himself, to reach heights no human had before.

“What do you mean everything I’d ever wanted? I wanted to use this portal like you promised we would.”

“To explore new worlds? Tick, you can still do that with me. To change the world, double tick! Changing the world is what I wanted.”

In an abstract way, perhaps it was, but from what Ford had seen, the kind of change Bill was capable of bringing ushered change in with fire and brimstone, decimation and desolation. Ford said as much, up on the screen.

“You want to destroy the world, not change it.”

“So I can rebuild it.” Bill insisted.
“It’s fine how it is!” Ford yelled back.

“Oh, that’s a lie.” Bill laughed, and his laugh echoed back from all of the monitors. “That’s rich, Sixer, it really is. It wasn’t fine when it chose you last, when it spurned your genius, when it turned on you for your deformity, when it decided that what makes you special makes you disgusting. How is any of that fine?”

Ford swallowed and looked down at the progress bar at the bottom of the monitor. The bar had only increased slightly, leaving it blinking on 6%. How much longer would this take? He was just supposed to sit here and endure this torturous reminiscence for another 94%? Wasn’t there a way to speed this up? To skip past these memories that stung Ford’s chest and made his conscience churn.

“Fine. Fine, let’s say you’re right. Let’s say I give you a chance.”

Ford froze, his jaw tensing, and he looked down at the papers littered on the study floor, his battered heart not strong enough to look up and watch the hope spread across Bill’s face again, his trust and enthusiasm so raw and unguarded, so misplaced.

“Really?” Ford cringed as the memory played on, the audio haunting Ford’s conscience all over again. “Thank you, thank you, thank you Sixer. You won’t regret it. I’ll give you anything you want. Absolutely anything.”

Ford curled his hands into fists, resting on his thighs, his nails biting into his palm as he kept his eyes on the floor. The monitors projected red tinged light as the memory played out, the unbinding circle casting a red hue across the forest, the light creeping into the edge of Ford’s vision, as the memory recited the butchered unbinding spell, severing Bill from his body.

Ford gritted his teeth as the audio continued to play, Bill’s words haunting him further.

“Sixer, no! Sixer! You’re doing it wrong. Stop! Stanford! Sixer! You’re hurting me!”

Ford closed his eyes, moisture leaking down his cheek, his nails dug deep into his flesh, struggling with his guilt. It was still hard to listen to this, hard to remember this betrayal, since the betrayal was his. It was hard to listen to Bill’s screams, begging him to stop, and it was harder still to know that he didn’t listen.

“I thought you were giving me a chance. You said –“

“I know what I said.” Stanford’s voice broadcast from the monitors, steely and determined. “Things change.”

Ford looked up at the screen, hoping to leech some of the resolve his past self seemed to have, wondering how he did it then, how he was supposed to do it now.

It was the wrong time to look up.

“Things change?” Bill spluttered, the ire apparent on his beautiful face. “This isn’t change, this is you. You – YOU did this to me.”

Tears ran down Ford’s cheeks now, his eyes drawn to the screen, watering, unable to look away, guilt constricting his throat, planting daggers in his chest.

Bill pressed his palms against the barrier, gold eyes baring anguish as they searched Stanford’s face, searched for a reason for this torrid betrayal.
“How could you do this to me?”

Ford stood up and paced around the room, the helmet’s cable stretching as he paced. Ford muttered to himself, his hands clenching and unclenching spasmodically, the coffee making him jittery as he spoke.

“This isn’t helping. There has to be another way to process these. A shortcut of some kind. Maybe if I turned off the monitors.”

“I thought you loved me.” Bill’s voice glitched, the cable attached to the headset jerking as Ford paced around the room. “Did that change too?”

Ford shook his head, and then screwed his eyes shut, determined not to look at the screen. Bill’s sobs continued, filtering through the system, and Ford tried to cover his ears with his hands, squeezing them under the helmet, attempting to block it all out.

Bill screamed in the memory, and thunder clapped in response to his ire, reality bending to the whim of his tumultuous moods.

“How do I turn off the audio?” Ford muttered, looking for a pathway in the code, becoming frustrated with his own inability, before he smacked the monitor angrily, desperation taking over. “How do I turn it off?”

The memory played on above on the screen, heedless of Ford’s wishes, the system still doggedly attempting to encrypt the memory.

“How do I turn off the audio?” Ford muttered, looking for a pathway in the code, becoming frustrated with his own inability, before he smacked the monitor angrily, desperation taking over. “How do I turn it off?”

The memory played on above on the screen, heedless of Ford’s wishes, the system still doggedly attempting to encrypt the memory.

“Bill, I –“

“You don’t get to talk, you betrayer! You cold faced monster! Liar! Backstabber! You made me – you – you know what? I own you sixer! I still own you! You’re mine forever, don’t think this gets you out of that. I’ll have from now until the end of time to make you pay for this!”

“How do I turn it off, dammit?” Ford slammed his fist against the machine, his eyes wet, his brow as twisted as his stomach was, hating every torturous second he spent exposing himself to his mistakes.

Being made to face his decisions, and the consequences of those decisions in order to protect his mind, was too high a cost to pay for Ford’s conscience. It ate at him, revisiting this painful memory, and he realised that he preferred to repress this part of the memory, continuing in blissful ignorance, rather than relive it in agony, all over again.

Bill was shrieking as he noticed the spell work eating away at his body, horrified to watch his vessel crumble away while he was still within, and the decibel level hurt Ford’s ears. Bill’s shrieking gave way to hysterical laughter, a hopeless, mad, pitiful sound.

Ford couldn’t stand to hear it anymore. He simply couldn’t stand it.
Ford woke up in a pile of trash next to the dumpster behind the bowling alley, his limbs stiff and sore.

The alley was covered in graffiti, strange symbols resembling an eye with a cross drawn through it, painted all over the brick wall. If it was a teenager’s ‘tag’ it was a poor one, but Stanford’s paranoid mind couldn’t help but imagine Bill’s eye, all things pointing back to what he was trying to forget. The universe telling him off, he imagined, for lapsing at his duty, for wavering like he had.

Wincing as he sat up, Ford gingerly pinched a banana peel off his jacket, and threw it to the side, shuddering at the stench. There was a coat hanger poking him in the back, and his legs ached, like he’d been running around all night.

It was still night, the moon hanging back behind the clouds, and Ford wondered how long it had been since he crashed. He checked his watch, and eight hours had passed.

It was 4 in the morning.

Tapping the button on the side of the watch, Ford pulled up the portal statistics, having incorporated the readings into his smart watch’s design, and was thankful to note the portal was still offline. No recorded activations.

Well, that was a relief.

Ford dragged himself upright and checked himself over.

No blood this time, that was good.

His sleeves and trousers were wet and smelled vaguely of salt or brine. His torso was still dry, surprisingly, so Ford presumed Bill had either gone wading in the lake or had attempted to pull something up out of the water.

Idly Ford wondered whether the eldritch tooth was still at the bottom of the lake, or if he’d gone coffee table shopping. That seemed like the sort of thing Bill would do. A gift, to go with all the coffee Ford had been drinking.

Shaking his head, Ford patted himself down, checking that he still had his wallet, his car keys, the essentials.

He hoped he hadn’t attempted another hit and run, and worried for the pedestrians of Gravity Falls, hoping no one had courted Bill’s ire.

As he straightened up, he heard a noise at the mouth of the alley, and turned his head to see shadowy, hooded figures watching him. It almost seemed like they’d been pawing through the trash beside him, picking through his clothes maybe?

When he blinked at them, seeing them clearly, they backed up, and began to run away.

“Hey.” Ford’s paranoia was through the roof, and he chased after the mysterious figures, wanting to know what they’d seen, why they’d been following him, what they’d been doing pawing through the trash around him.

Why they were watching him? Was it Bill watching him? Did he send them? Maybe they were trying to stop him? To stop Bill from doing whatever he was doing in Ford’s body. Or maybe they were here to stop Ford. To stop him from stopping Bill

Ford ran out the end of the alleyway, convinced he’d seen eyes glint under one of the hoods. Possibly just the light from the street lamp catching on someone’s glasses, but possibly, Ford feared, a yellow glow?

“Who are you?” Ford called out, looking rather feral, his clothes soiled by the dumpster, his eyes wide with heavy bags below. “Why are you following me? Why are you wearing – wearing bathrobes? Show yourself!”

The hooded figures looked amongst themselves warily, before one of them shouted out, waving his hands mysteriously.
Ford paused in the street, stumped by that melodramatic turn of phrase, wondering why it sounded so familiar.

“No, it isn’t, you creeps.” Ford pointed out, sounding frustrated. “I can see you just fine.”

The hooded figures looked at one another nervously, before one of them shrugged, and began throwing fistfuls of trash at Stanford.

“It is unseen! It is unseen! Fear The Blind Eye!”

Ford held his hand up to cover his face, batting away the garbage, and the hooded figures ran, their footsteps sounding out all the way down the high street.

Ford shook what he presumed was someone’s rotting tuna salad sandwich off his arm, lamenting that the pungent substance got on his sleeve, and squinted in the direction the strange hooded people went.

“The blind eye?” Ford muttered, and scoffed, flicking more garbage off his person. “Isn’t that redundant?”

The silent night chose not to respond and Ford resigned himself to walking back to the shack, covered in garbage, on sore aching legs, vowing to himself once again that he’d distance himself from sleep, lest Bill take hold again.

Ford couldn’t let that happen.

Kryptos hovered behind Pyronica, relying on her to protect him from Bill’s mania.

The pink cyclops stepped further into the chaos that was Bill’s private study, watching Bill’s frenzied demeanour cautiously.

The triangle was glitching in and out of his usual form, colours and shapes shifting and changing, blobs of colour shifting under his bricks like a novelty lava lamp, his eye blurring with static as he surveyed the universe, objects levitating randomly as he focused, almost in a trance. There were several energy cubes piled up in the study, like Bill had wanted them close, and one cube was cracked open with a silly straw and an umbrella poking over the rim.

“Bill?” Pyronica asked hesitantly, stepping closer to the triangle. “Bill, can we talk?”

“Can’t talk Py. Too busy.” Bill replied. “There are limitless dimensional possibilities to scour through, and I still haven’t found what I’m looking for yet!”

“And what are you looking for?” Pyronica questioned curiously.

“I’ll tell you when I find it.” Bill replied, still staring out into middle distance, levitating with his legs crossed, his fingers pressed together in the upside-down triangle shape, clearly attempting to focus, even while his powers went haywire, the walls shifting into various optical illusions, melting and refracting, while books and scattered miscellany bounced through the air.

“Uhuh.” Pyronica exchanged a dubious glance with Kryptos, before she spoke up again. “When are we going to talk about the portal? I thought you said you were handling it.”

“I am handling it.” Bill replied.

“Okay, so then where is it? Why isn’t it open yet? Why haven’t we gone through to earth yet?” Pyronica pressed.

Bill blinked, and the static fizzed out of his eye, clearing his vision, and he looked at Pyronica, his eye a little too wide to be reassuring. He seemed hyped up on interdimensional energy, talking too fast, his brain racing a mile a minute.

“Because Pyronica, I’m not going to let us just wander through when I already know we’re being sabotaged.”

“Sabotaged?” Pyronica blinked slowly, trying to keep her tone neutral.

“It all makes sense! Why Sixer would turn on me so suddenly, why I got ousted from my body, why things have been so difficult every step of the way. It’s so obvious.” Bill detailed, winding himself up to sound like some sort of conspiracy nut. “Someone’s been watching us, playing with us.”

“Uh.” Pyronica exchanged another glance with Kryptos, listening to her friend’s paranoid spree.

“Sixer saw me take down Lama Szlam. He couldn’t have seen that on his own, someone had to have shown him, that means not only has someone been watching Sixer, manipulating him - they’ve been inside his head! That’s MY place! If someone could get through to Sixer and make him hate me all of a sudden like that, then this means that his entire paranoid ‘Bill is evil’ breakup schtick doesn’t count, because he’s been manipulated into thinking that. He thinks I’m evil because he saw me blast through Lama Szlam in a vision, not because he really thinks I’m evil, so all I need to do is prove it was sabotage, and this whole thing just goes away!”

“But… you did blast through Lama Szlam.” Kryptos pointed out, confused.

“But he didn’t know that. He wasn’t supposed to know that. So HOW did he know that? Someone’s manipulating him – ergo someone’s attempting to sabotage the entire project – ergo the portal isn’t safe anymore – ergo I’m protecting my investment by not touching the portal. Do you see? It’s so simple?”

“Er… no.” Pyronica said bluntly, her hand on her hip, looking sceptically at Bill now. “I don’t see how any of that matters. If you can slip into Sixer’s bod when he’s asleep, you can just turn on the portal, and deal with whoever or whatever sabotaged you when you’ve got earth in hand. Duh.”

“No, I’m dealing with this now.” Bill said resolutely. “I’m covering all my bases first. This is what I did last week.”

Swiping his hand, Bill conjured a screen, showing what he’d been doing in Sixer’s body during his night time excursions. On the screen, an image of the crop circle was projected from overhead, the bloody sigils depicting a warding spell, hiding the town from interdimensional sight.

“I’ve made my mark on this place. Nobody’s going to be messing with this town now. I’ve got my name all over it. Protection up the whazoo, courtesy of me.” Bill said, oozing pride. “I’d like to see someone try to sabotage us now.”
“Is that blood?” Kryptos asked, mildly intrigued. “That’s a lot of blood. Where did you even get so much blood?”

“From the Northwest Slaughterhouse down the road. Can you believe they’re just throwing this stuff away? Idiots, am I right?” Bill scoffed, rolling his eye, before he pointed at the image of the circle on the screen. “And everything else, the mercury and hair Sixer had left over from that time we went scalping unicorns together. It was perfect, this is going to work perfectly.”

“Okay…” Pyronica looked between the screen, and Bill, who’s eye was flickering again. “So, if you’ve warded the place up, why not open the portal now? Jump in the next time Sixer conks out and just stroll right through?”

“I’ve got to get him when he’s asleep. He just woke up, so I’ve got another 120 hours give or take until he breaks and sleeps again.” Bill explained, rubbing his hands together enthusiastically. “If he was asleep just now you could have done it then.” Pyronica pointed out. “You could have turned the portal on. What the heck were you doing instead?”

“We are being watched Pyronica.” Bill claimed dramatically. “I had to take drastic measures.” “What did you do?” She asked, resigned to Bill’s manic behaviour.

“Well, first I thought I’d search the lake, but that was a bust. There was too much water and too little me, but I knew he had to be here somewhere, so I went downtown.” Bill’s fingers were twitching, almost strangling the air. “The pet shop beside the bowling alley, I broke in, and I found it. The disgusting pink amphibians. There were six of them in the tank, so much for an endangered species.”

“Oh dear.” Pyronica muttered, already perturbed by the way this was going.

“You endanger my species, I endanger your species. An eye for an eye, and since I didn’t want his eyes on me, I threw each one out on the floor. Can’t breathe out of water.” Bill laughed to himself, sounding crazy. “But they kept walking, dragging themselves across the tiles, so I got Sixer’s shoe and I stepped on them! Squashed them like a bug! Hahahahahahah!”

Pyronica winced and stepped closer to Bill. She eyed off the energy cube on the desk with the silly straw in it, wondering just how much of Sixer’s worship juice Bill had ingested.

“So, you killed a bunch of newts. Okay.” Pyronica held her hands out and went to rest her claw on Bill’s shoulder. “Maybe you should cool down a little, this is not the best time for you to get yourself completely diagonal.”

Bill blinked at her impatiently, waiting for her to get to the point.

“You say we’ve been sabotaged? Do you know by who?” Pyronica asked slowly.

“What do you think I’m looking for Py? The cool prizes in the bottom of cereal boxes?”

“I don’t know what that –“ Pyronica started, her tone blunt.

“OF COURSE, I’m looking for our saboteur.” Bill threw his hands in the air. “I just need to know how they did it. Sixer was shown what went down on Lama Szlam but from a distance, like a bird’s eye view. We didn’t see anyone there, so there had to be some big player pulling the strings.”
“You said Sixer was shown a vision?” Pyronica prompted, looking to the side at Kryptos, both of them thinking the same thing.

“He must have been. I don’t see how else he could have seen that happen.” Bill frowned, and his eye filled with static again, searching.

While he looked off into middle distance, Kryptos and Pyronica conducted a wordless conversation, consisting entirely of urging looks, emphatic eyebrow waggling, and mouthed appellations.

Pyronica chewed on her lip, knowing she should tell Bill what they saw in Sixer’s dream mirror, but Kryptos was waving his hands at her, making x’s with his arms, running his finger across his surface like he was slitting his neck, and pointing to himself emphatically.

“We have to.” Pyronica mouthed at him reluctantly.

“You said it yourself, he’ll kill me!” Kryptos mouthed back, reaching up to grab onto Pyronica’s elbow. “Pyronica - don’t!”

Pyronica squeezed her eyes shut, and pursed her lips, looking pained, before she turned away from Kryptos and looked over at Bill.

“Bill.” Pyronica said, the reluctance clear in her voice now. “There’s something I have to tell you.”

Blinking static out of his eye again, Bill shook himself out of his trance, and watched Pyronica expectantly, his eye wide and attentive.

“When you were off in that fiery dimension, right after Sixer betrayed you that one time, w-“

Pyronica could feel Kryptos’ little hand squeezing her elbow, and she did what she didn’t often do. She lied to Bill.

“I went in your mirror room.”

“Okay.” Bill looked at her, waiting for her to say something that warranted the serious tone in her voice. She had access to the mirror room, she was allowed. Bill didn’t see what the big deal was.

“And – and I found Sixer’s dream mirror – because I wanted to find out what he did to you, you know? I wanted to understand what went wrong, because just a day before you told me things were fine with him – more than fine, and it didn’t make any sense for him to turn around and kick you out like that.” Pyronica explained, fumbling through her explanation, a poor liar to the people that mattered to her. Luckily what she said contained more truths than lies.

Kryptos was standing beside her, watching her with awe and fear combined, shocked that she would take the fall for him like this.

“So I peeked in his dreams a little, and –“

“And?” Bill prompted, still waiting for the other shoe to fall.

“Well, I saw what looked like a memory he had. And in the memory, there was this voice, talking to him.” Pyronica laced her fingers together, and fidgeted awkwardly as she divulged, feeling like a naughty child confessing. “It was saying nasty stuff about you, telling Sixer you were lying, that you were using him. It full yelled at him to open his eyes in the dream, and it was so loud, he woke up. I think that maybe that was what made him turn on you, and whoever this voice was, they were
“And you didn’t think to tell me this, why?” Bill said, his voice suddenly cold and icy.

“B-because –” Pyronica looked around the room, trying not to look at Kryptos, but not knowing where else to look. He gawped up at her, not wanting her to draw Bill’s attention to him, and she quickly looked away from his indignant expression, back to Bill’s intent icy gaze, making something up on the spot. “Because I – I got spooked, and – and I was holding one of the night terror globes, and when I got spooked I accidentally … broke it?”

Bill blinked at her, his eyelashes batting as he processed this information. Pyronica didn’t tell him because she was spooked? She tripped? What kind of parallel universe was this?

“And then the night terror started to leak everywhere, and it went into the mirror, and then Sixer started having nightmares, these really bad nightmares. And I didn’t want to say anything because what if I screwed things up for you two? I didn’t mean for that to happen. What if he never talked to you again, and you two never made up, and it would be all my fault?” Pyronica wrung her hands and let some of her genuine distress seep into her act. Her bottom lip wobbled as she blinked her large eye soulfully at Bill, tearing up slightly. “What if you never talked to me again? Bill, you’re my best friend in all of existence. Please don’t be mad.”

“Woah, hey, just settle down okay?” Bill held his hand up, hushing Pyronica’s waterworks. “Do I look like I’m mad?”

“Maybe?” Pyronica guessed, her bottom lip still pouting outwards pre-emptively in case Bill really was mad.

“Okay, maybe I’m a little mad.” Bill conceded, rolling his eye. “If you’d told me about this sooner, I could have tracked down whoever snuck in Sixer’s head and ended them already, and this entire situation would be a non-event. But you had to keep it to yourself, and I wasted precious weeks not knowing this very important piece of information. So yeah, I’d say I’m a teensy bit mad at that.”

Pyronica jutted her bottom lip out further and managed the best puppy dog eye she had in her arsenal, laying it on thick to culture Bill’s mercy.

“BUT –“ Bill sighed, and fixed Pyronica with a sincere look. “I’m not going to stay mad at you for making a mistake.”

“Really?” Pyronica asked, worrying at her bottom lip with her claw tip.

“Yes, really.” Bill crossed his arms and gestured at Pyronica impatiently. “So, you can cut the sad act and tell me what this voice sounded like. Out with the details.”

“I don’t know. It sounded really echoey and cranky and full of itself.” Pyronica divulged, being purposefully vague. “I felt like I’d heard it somewhere before, but I just can’t put my finger on where.”

“Hmm.” Bill rubbed the bricks under his eye pensively, before he snapped his fingers. “Okay, how bout you let me take a look around inside your beautiful big head, Py? That’ll get this sorted.”

Pyronica could feel Kryptos’ death grip on her elbow and feeling the pressure she blurted out. “Why don’t you ask Sixer?”

Bill blinked at Pyronica. “Ask Sixer?”
“That way you get to talk to him, and you can see the memory first hand.” Pyronica said awkwardly, appealing to Bill’s fondness for Six Fingers to distract him from poking around inside her head. If he did that, she’d see it was Kryptos that broke the night terror, and she’d be in hot water for lying to him. As much as she believed Bill could do without prolonging his obsession with the human, currently diverting Bill to Sixer was convenient. She knew he’d take the bait if the bait was Six Fingers. “Maybe you could even convince him to join you again, now that you know that someone made him betray you in the first place. He probably still wants you. Maybe it can be salvaged?”

“Hmmm.” Bill pondered, and Pyronica felt like sweating, she was so nervous. Lying to Bill was a dangerous game, and she didn’t feel comfortable keeping the truth from him, but she also for some unfathomable reason didn’t want to be the indirect cause of Kryptos’ death.

Seconds inched by, Bill lost in thought, before finally, he responded with something more than a thoughtful hum.

“You may have a point.” Bill rested his fist in his palm decisively. “I can still salvage something with Sixer.”

“Yeah!” Pyronica cheered, perhaps a little too enthusiastically, relieved that Bill wouldn’t be poking around in her head. “You can do it! Go get your dumb human back, Bill, win him over.”

Bill’s demeanour brightened, no longer looking so absurdly frazzled. The walls stopped shifting, resuming their usual state of semi-order, the spare cubes were banished back to the safe room with a wave of Bill’s hand, and in an instant, it was like Bill’s odd paranoid breakdown never happened.

“I’ll get him to join me.” Bill insisted, beaming just picturing the possibility. “Watch this space.”

He phased out of the room, brick by brick, and when he was gone, Pyronica’s shoulders sagged as she exhaled the sigh of relief she’d been holding in.

“You told him to get his human back?” Kryptos critiqued. “Isn’t that counter intuitive?”

“Here I thought you’d be grateful I saved your skin, but you just like to criticise.” Pyronica rolled her eye and placed her hands on her hips, turning to scowl at Kryptos.

Kryptos put his hands up defensively. “Don’t get me wrong, I’m very appreciative that you took the fall for me. Couldn’t be happier to be in one piece, alive, and not screaming.”

“Uh huh.” Pyronica raised her brow sceptically.

“But haven’t we just made ourselves a bigger problem? He was already obsessed with the human, this is just going to distract him more, and delay us from opening the portal.” Kryptos explained, continuing his critique. “I just think this is a one step forward two steps back scenario.”

“Well sor-ry Mister Know-It-All.” Pyronica said mockingly. “We can’t all lie on command. I was thinking on my feet, it was the best I could come up with at the time, and it worked, didn’t it?”

“In the sense that…” Kryptos rolled his hands together, watching Pyronica, coming off as the patronising rhombus he was.

“In the sense that you’re not dead.” Pyronica said bluntly, turning to leave the annoying compass, waving over her shoulder. “You’re welcome by the way.”

“I didn’t –“ Kryptos spluttered. “I didn’t say thank you!”
“YOU’RE WELCOME!” Pyronica yelled, rolling her eye as she left.

Stanford poured instant coffee granules into his mug, filling it three quarters of the way up, bombarding the toxic mixture with intense amounts of sugar. It was the only way the caffeinated sludge was bearable, and Ford sorely wished for a proper cup of tea, but he had to stay awake. He was running out of coffee granules, a pitiful amount left in the jar. This was the fifth jar he powered through this week, the last one he had in the house, hidden right at the back of the pantry. He’d need to make a trip to the store soon.

Project Mentum was recalibrating downstairs. Stanford was at a loss as to how the machine was taking so damn long to encrypt his thoughts. And what’s worse was that the machine seemed to fixate on Ford’s memories of Bill. It was either the machine fixating, or Stanford, but he didn’t want to admit the true depths of his obsession.

As if to cause him to second guess, to self-doubt his actions constantly, the machine threw every positive memory of Bill in his face, bracketing each confirmation of his treachery with the sort of heart-warming memory that Ford once took solace in.

Stirring the sugar through his coffee, Ford dwelled on the most recent memory the machine harangued him with.

“TWO WORDS. Cathy Crenshaw.”

Ford had been perversely elated at the time to hear that Bill cared enough about his feelings to get back at his high school bully/crush, but now that he was second guessing everything, he wasn’t sure if he could take that petty revenge on Ford’s behalf in the spirit in which it was intended.

The machine would take another hour or so to recalibrate the updates Ford had installed to hopefully speed the process up, to debug its fixation on his memories of Bill.

Stirring his coffee, Ford’s eyes slid over to the lounge room, the telephone sitting temptingly on top of the phone book, perched on the coffee table.

Ford absently brought the coffee to his lips and had a sip, wrinkling his nose at the taste. It tasted like sweetened tar. Wonderful.

Looking for something to sustain his interest, something to keep him awake, to keep him occupied while the machine ran its updates, Ford walked into the living room, and sat down on the couch, sliding the phone off the phone book, opening it up on the coffee table.

Pausing, Ford considered what he was doing. Calling up his high school crush years down the track could be considered the awkward move of a jilted lover, but Ford wasn’t the jilted lover in this scenario, and the longer he dwelled on Bill’s dubious actions, the more concerned he became for Cathy. As concerned as he could be for someone who made his life miserable.

Flipping open the phone book, looking for Crenshaw, Ford ran his fingertip down the page and found the most familiar listing under ‘Crenshaw’. Ford was fairly certain that was Cathy’s household number. He memorised it, back when he was infatuated with her. Checking in the phone book was really just a formality at this point.

Taking another sip of his sweetened coffee sludge, Ford picked the telephone off the hook and dialled the number.

The phone rang for a while, the dial tone stretching on, until someone picked up on the other end.

“Hello?” That sounded like Cathy’s mother.

“Hello, I’m looking to speak to Cathy?” Ford enquired politely, pushing his glasses up his nose.
“T’m an old… friend from high school, Stanford Pines. I know it’s been a while, I just wanted to see if I could borrow her for a chat.”

There was a terse silence on the other end of the line for a while, before Cathy’s mother responded, her voice sounding choked with emotion.

“Cathy doesn’t … live here anymore.”

“Well, do you have a forwarding number?” Ford asked, reaching for a pen and paper, resting the telephone between his ear and his shoulder.

Cathy’s mother seemed to exhale tersely before reciting a number for Stanford. He jotted it down and thanked her for her time.

That wasn’t unusual. Of course, Cathy would have moved out by now. Maybe relocated to a different city, she always did plan on seeing New York. Her goal in high school was to be a socialite, or a fashion designer. As Ford had yet to see any ‘Crenshaw Clothes’ in the magazines, he assumed she went with the former occupation, if you could even call it that.

Ford took another sip of his disgusting coffee, and dialled the new number provided.

The phone rang for a while, and eventually was answered, though for a moment, Stanford thought he’d dialled the wrong number.

“Hello, thank you for calling the Ancora Psychiatric Hospital, how may I direct your call?”

Ford frowned. “Um, I’m not sure I have the right number, actually. You wouldn’t happen to know a Cathy Crenshaw at all, would you? Perhaps you could help redirect my call?”

“Oh, Cathy is one of our patients here.” The nurse on the other end of the line divulged. “She rarely gets calls from anyone, I’m sure she’ll be delighted to hear from you. What did you say your name was again?”

Ford swallowed, immediately concerned.

After a moment of deep apprehension Ford spoke, “Stanford Pines.”

“I’ll just have one of the orderlies fetch her for you. Please hold.”

Jazzy hold music played from the telephone, and Stanford sat, stewing on his worry.

Was this his fault? Did Bill’s intervention send her here, or was she simply led to seek help her as a natural causation of her lifestyle? Stanley always used to say she was crazy, a ‘crazy bitch’ to paraphrase some very choice insults, but Ford assumed he just said that to make him feel better after seeing the way she treated him. She was a habitual sadist and user, a bone deep narcissist to the core, Stanford was sure that pointed to some kind of personality disorder.
But Bill said he got back at Cathy Crenshaw for what she did to Ford. Did he do this?

Was Ford responsible? He felt his stomach flip at the possibility, nauseous already, the guilt building pre-emptively.

The hold music cut off, and the cheerful sounding nurse was back.

“I’ll just pass you over now, here she is.”

Ford was listening closely, anxious to hear something that would shift the blame off his shoulders for Cathy’s condition.

The nurse could be heard, handing the phone across.

“Cathy, you have a call from a friend. Isn’t that nice? Do you want to speak with him?”

Cathy made a noncommittal noise, but it was definitely her. Ford would recognise her voice anywhere, he spent so long enamoured by it. And so long after loathing it.

The nurse doubled back to ask Ford. “Oh, what did you say your name was again?”

“Stanford Pines is on the – oh no, Cathy, don’t –“

Ford could hear screaming, abrupt frenzied wordless screaming from Cathy, and he flinched away from the phone, shocked.

The screaming continued, and Ford could hear the orderlies attempting to reason with her.

“Cathy, calm down. It’s alright, nothing’s wrong.”

“I’M SORRY! I’M SORRY! I’M SORRY!” Cathy screamed, and it sounded like there was a scuffle. “I’M SO-“

“Cathy –“

Cathy screamed, and her inconsolable sobs were interspersed with fractured apologies uttered in differing tones. She sounded like she was begging, bargaining, reasoning, and fearful with every intonation, and it struck Stanford that ‘sorry’ might be the only word she had left to express herself with from the way she was intoning the phrase. She repeated it like it was her language, wailing it wildly.

The nurse spoke again, this time speaking to Stanford, who had gone white, sitting rigid, listening to Cathy’s breakdown.

“I’m so sorry, she’s not usually like this. She’s having one of her episodes. Perhaps try calling back another time.”

Ford heard the dial tone as the nurse hung up on him, Cathy’s screams ending as abruptly as they started, and Ford just sat there, shell-shocked.

He sat there for a long while, unable to process what had just happened.

Confirmation. Confirmation that it was his fault what happened to her. She wouldn’t react like that at the mere mention of his name if it wasn’t somehow his fault.
Ford was in shock, caught on the notion that when Bill said he got back at Cathy for him, he didn’t just give her a telling what for, or a bad hair day, or something equally harmless.

Bill literally drove her insane.

Ford’s hands started shaking, though he doubted it was the coffee this time.

The only other person he’d ever had feelings for, bully or not, was now shrieking bloody murder in a psychiatric asylum, driven mad by what she’d done to Ford in high school, all thanks to Stanford’s psychotic ex-boyfriend or whatever they were.

Bill wasn’t even his ex when he did this, Bill did this to endear himself to Stanford. He intended this as a gift. Retribution. A gift Ford was delighted to receive.

Ford was still reeling from this horrendous revelation when the radio on the mantel piece turned on.

Ford looked up, drawn out of his guilt induced daze, to stare at the machine, static fizzing. He didn’t turn it on. It hadn’t been on in days. He found the music a distracting reminder of better days.

Watching the radio, Ford could see the am/fm slider moving of its own behest, and he felt the hairs raise on the back of his neck.

The static crackled out, the slider landing on a station midway through a broadcast. Ella Fitzgerald’s crooning voice sounded out.

“Stars fading but I linger on dear
Still craving your kiss
I’m longing to linger till dawn dear
Just saying this –”

“No.” Ford whispered to himself, mild horror settling in on his shoulders.

“Sweet dreams till sunbeams find you
Sweet dreams that leave all worries behind you
But in your dreams whatever they be Dream a little dream of me.”

Ford looked down at his thick cup of coffee, and frantically began gulping it down. He paused, as the slider shifted, static warping, the channel changing.

This was either the universe’s sick idea of a joke, or some sort of freak occurrence, a supernatural playlist. Ford hoped it wasn’t what he thought it was. Frank Sinatra sung out from the radio now.

“I’ve got you under my skin.
I’ve got you deep in the heart of me.
So deep in my heart that you’re really a part of me.
I’ve got you under my skin.”

“That’s definitely him.” Ford muttered, scowling at the radio, recognising Bill’s sense of humour and his love of golden age crooners.

Ford paced over to the radio and turned it off, but the song just kept playing. He unplugged it from the socket, and even turned the radio over, shaking the backup batteries out from the back, but the music played on, even without a power source.

“Don't you know, little fool, you never can win? Use your mentality, wake up to reality. But each time that I do just the thought of you Makes me stop before I begin-“

Ford was so frantically obsessed with shaking the batteries out of the radio that he didn’t notice the colour draining from the walls, grey seeping into everything, casting his world into monochrome. He only looked up when he heard it, Bill’s voice sounding out from behind him, finishing the song.

“Cause I’ve got yooooooou under my skin.” Bill sang, and Ford turned around sharply, stunned to see Bill hovering in his living room, swinging his cane theatrically, the triangle’s bricks glowing a healthy gold.

“See, that particular poetic metaphor would be more effective if I actually had skin.” Bill examined his nails for a moment, before batting his eyelashes at Stanford slyly. “But yours will do.”

“Bill.” Ford narrowed his eyes at the God, still incensed by the revelation of what he did to Cathy, before his eyes widened in panic, assuming that Bill being here meant he had slipped up, that he’d somehow gotten through the portal. “What are you doing here? You can’t access this world.”

“Slow your roll, Genius.” Bill rolled his eye and gestured at the monochrome walls. “Where do you think we are?”

“I’m asleep?” Ford questioned, looking over at the cup of coffee he’d been gulping down, the mug sitting innocuously on the coffee table. “No, but I –“

“I was wondering when you’d get around to the decaf.” Bill floated closer and tapped on Ford’s mug of coffee with his cane. “Rookie mistake, not reading the label.”

“Decaf?” Ford looked over to the coffee cup. “It can’t be.”

“Oh, but it is.” Bill replied, drumming his fingers on his cane as he spoke. “I’ve explored every inch of that pantry. The pot of decaf right at the back has been sitting there for, oh, I don’t know, couple years now. That’s what you get for not checking the use by date, by the way Sixer. You live like an old man.”

Ford was scowling at the coffee cup, devastated to discover he’d been drinking that disgusting mixture and it wouldn’t even keep him awake. Decaf was a curse on the world of beverages.

“I knew you’d be getting desperate at some point. Desperate and sleep deprived. It was only a matter of time.” Bill floated closer towards Stanford, reaching out and to cup Ford’s cheeks with his hands, squishing them together. “At least this way we’re reunited. Did you miss me?”

Ford brought his hands up to push Bill’s wiry limbs away, but four more hands shot out from Bill’s sides, wrapping around his wrists, keeping his arms pinned back. Ford struggled against Bill’s grip, but made little progress, Bill still floating in front of him, indulgently squishing his cheeks together.

“Let me go.” Ford said, his words muffled by the way Bill pushed his cheeks together.

“You’ve gotta put your dukes down first, Sixer, and play nice. I came here with good news, after all.” Bill divulged, sounding cheerful.
“Good news?” Ford muttered, his brow quirking in confusion.

“Good news. A rare gift.” Bill took a moment to savour Sixer’s adorable expression, squishing his cheeks up further, humming to himself, before he released Ford, patting his cheek sweetly. “You’re lucky you’re so cute. Forgiven, too.”

“What?” Ford asked, baffled, his hands freed from Bill’s grip. Ford rubbed his wrists, and eyed Bill off warily.

“I said you’re forgiven. I forgive you.” Bill said magnanimously. Ford continued to watch Bill with scepticism, not immediately grateful as Bill had pictured.

“You know, this is really a kodak moment, doesn’t happen often. By often I mean ever, so you might want to look a bit more excited, IQ. You’re forgiven.”

“What are you talking about?” Ford questioned, still frowning.

“I’m forgiving you.” Bill blinked at him, as though that said it all. “For everything.”

Ford continued to squint at Bill, suspicion competing with confusion on his tired features. Bill sighed and rolled his eyes, before elaborating.

“It wasn’t your fault. Your entire backhand with my body in the forest, betraying me, believing I was this horrible monster. Here I was thinking you just suffered the most severe case of unprompted 180 in the universe, but there was someone in your head!”

Bill smacked his hand against his bricks above his eye. “Duh! How did I not figure this out before? Of course, you wouldn’t turn on me like that.”

“What –” Ford repeated, louder this time, still not following. “Are you talking about?”

“The vision.” Bill put his hand on his side sassily. “The cryptic dreams. The mysterious voice you must have heard. Now, I don’t know what they said, but I sure wouldn’t trust them to keep it impartial. You were manipulated. It wasn’t your fault. You should have told me, by the way. I should be the only voice inside your head, at least you know I’m the only one you can trust.”

“I can’t trust you.” Ford interjected.

“Because some voice told you I’m a monster, yadda yadda – look, Sixer, it’s not true!” Bill insisted impatiently, frustrated with the scientist’s lack of cooperation. Softening his expression, he nuzzled closer to Ford, his eyelashes brushing against Ford’s stubble, murmuring. “You know it’s not true. You know me.”

Ford leaned away, holding himself stiff. “Get away from me.”

Bill seemed to sulk at that, before winding his arms out to loop around Ford’s shoulders, tsking. “God. Stop being stubborn. Can’t we just kiss and make up?”

“No! Get off me Bill.” Stanford raised his voice and pushed Bill back, resting his hands against the surface of Bill’s brick front. The bricks were warm, but Ford tried not to let that distract him.

Bill blinked at him, his brow furrowing with hurt and confusion, frustrated that his magnanimous act of forgiveness wasn’t working how he imagined. “Way to be melodramatic Sixer. It’s not like it’s the ‘end of the world’ to be nice to me. I am technically your – what would you call it? Eternal partner? Boyfriend?”
“You’re not my boyfriend.” Ford said, his lip curling with anger at the sentiment. Aiming his words to cut, to put as much distance between them as he could, he let his anger speak for him, potentially a very unwise decision. “You’re my… burden.”

His words had the desired effect. Bill reeled back from him like he’d been slapped, letting go of Ford instantly.

“What did you just say?” Bill asked, his voice barely above an incredulous whisper.

“I said, you are my burden.” Ford repeated, cruelly driving the words home. He felt the need to lash out at Bill after what he did, anger still seething in his veins, making his words barbed and venomous. “Ever since I met you, this road you’ve led me down, what I’ve done – what I’ll have to do to stop you –“

“Listen, you don’t have to stop me –“ Bill attempted, holding his hands up, waving his hands as if to dismiss Ford’s sudden abrupt shift in attitude. “Stop that.”

Ford shook his head, working himself up.

“I am all that stands between you and this entire planet.” Ford said, his ego and his paranoia leading him to fervently believe it. “And I will not let you hurt another person.”

“See, the only person you’d be hurting is yourself.” Bill reasoned, trying to appeal to Stanford, trying to sidestep his sudden declaration, acting like it hadn’t happened. “You should be joining me. Think of what we could do together!”

“I’m not going to join you.” Ford wrinkled his nose derisively and shook his head. “I’m going to stop you.”

“Now, I know you’ve got it into your head that that’s what you should be doing – but you’re wrong! You’re being manipulated by that voice!” Bill implored, clinging to that explanation like a lifeline. “Open your eyes.”

“I’ve had my eyes opened.” Ford insisted, standing firm. “I see clearly now what it is that I have to do.”

“Oh, and what is it that you have to do?” Bill rolled his eye contemptuously.

“I have to stop you. Any way I can. With everything I have. Stopping you is – it’s my duty now.” Ford announced, nodding as he spoke. “My purpose. I caused this, now I have to fix it, and I can’t let you sway me. This is what I have to do, what’s on my shoulders now because of you.”

“Where is all this conviction coming from, Sixer?” Bill crossed his arms, eyeing Ford up. “The last time I left you couldn’t wait to have me back.”

“You threw yourself down those stairs, being stubborn, fighting me.” Bill scoffed. “Which you don’t need to do, by the way. All of this you’re bringing on yourself. There is a simpler solution.”

“Which is?” Ford narrowed his eyes, clenching his fists.

“Join me!” Bill threw his hands in the air emphatically. “Can the melodramatic burden bullshit and get a good night’s sleep for once. We can be together again. You know you want that.”
“I don’t.” Ford said stubbornly, despite how the words felt like a lie. A forced lie. He couldn’t waver.

“You’d want it if I looked like this.” Bill waved his hand, and his form shifted, swept up in a mist until his particles reassembled in the shape Ford had created for him. The beautiful, soft looking human body Ford had crafted, Bill’s yellow eyes shining beseechingly through.

Ford took a hesitant step back, unwilling to admit how drawn he was to seeing Bill like this. His heart hurt but his morals stayed fast.

“You can’t pick and choose, Sixer.” Bill said, walking closer to Stanford. He got right up into Ford’s space, and rested his hands on Ford’s torso, his hands warming his chest. “You wouldn’t have to if you joined me. With me reshaping reality, you could have whatever you want, whenever you want. You could have this.”

Ford was torn, looking down at Bill’s eyes peering out from this beautiful face, feeling him smooth his hands over Ford’s chest like he used to. He couldn’t deny it was tempting, tempting to give in and have this.

He swallowed, and remembered what Bill was capable of. “And if I wanted you to leave Earth? To leave all these people alone? To not hurt anyone?”

“What does it hurt to just let me have this?” Bill hissed, frustrated, balling his fists against Ford’s chest.

“W –” Ford scoffed, and looked down at Bill, listing his crimes. “It hurt Fiddleford. It hurt Willow already. And the Valentinos.”

Bill tsked and rolled his eyes, muttering under his breath. “Red.”

“It hurt me.” Ford continued, trying to make Bill see that what he was doing was wrong. “It hurt Cathy Crenshaw.”

“What do you care about Cathy Crenshaw?” Bill questioned sourly.

“I know what you did to her Bill.” Ford accused. “She may have been horrid in high school, but no one deserves that. Why did you -?”

“You want to know what she said to me when I confronted her for you?” Bill interrupted, glaring at the protesting scientist. “She said ‘Stanford who?’. She didn’t even remember you and you’re defending her?”

“I – I’m not defending her.” Ford swallowed, unwilling to admit that Bill’s words were affecting him. “I just can’t defend what you did. How can you defend it, doing that to anyone, regardless of what they did?”

“I don’t need to defend it.” Bill countered. “It doesn’t matter.”

“Yes, it does!” Ford spluttered. “It does matter, and I have to keep people safe from you because of it. Do you not get that? Do you just not understand how these things matter to these people?”

“It doesn’t matter to me.” Bill shrugged, and crept his hands up Ford’s chest, trying to loop his arms around Ford’s neck again dotingly.

“And that’s the problem.” Ford exclaimed and reached up to grab Bill’s wrists, pulling them down, halting his embrace. “That is precisely why I have to stop you.”

“Not this again.” Bill groaned, and rolled his eyes, frustrated.

“You don’t care about the billions of people who live here, who you’ll be hurting if you go through the portal, and you don’t care about their lives, their families. You don’t care about anyone, unless they can fit some sort of use for you. That’s the only reason you even tolerated Fiddleford. That’s probably the only reason you tolerated me.”

“Hey, come on Sixer. Don’t be like that.” Bill complained, hardly keen to just stand here and be told off like this.

“And if I don’t stand against you –“ Ford shook his head, running his hand through his hair, before looking at Bill’s quietly seething expression, dumbstruck. “I am the only thing standing between you and the rest of the world.”

“Oh please.” Bill huffed out a bitter laugh, glaring at Ford. “You think I couldn’t have gone down into your little basement and turned on the portal if I wanted to? Even if I didn’t use your body to do it, I could pick any rube off the street and have them read your journals. An idiot could do it. It would be easy.”

Ford looked horrified, realising suddenly that his attention to detail and devotion to chronicling the functionality of the portal compromised the safety of the world. In writing everything down, he made an instruction manual split across three books.

He had tried to keep it secret, employing code, and invisible ink, fracturing his work sequentially, spreading it across the three books so it wasn’t a linear read, but Bill was right.

The journals were a liability.

He had to get rid of them, hide them somewhere. It was the only way.

“I won’t let you. I’ll stop you.” Ford said, eyes wide, shaking his head at Bill.

“You’re missing the point.” Bill sighed, putting his hands on his hips, glaring at Ford. “Sixer –“

“You are my burden to handle. A burden on the world. I’ll stop you.” Ford muttered, growing increasingly more paranoid.

“Stop saying that.” Bill growled, agitated by Stanford’s constant repetition.

“Ever since I summoned you. You’re my burden to bear. You won’t get away with this.”

“I said, stop saying that word.” Bill gritted out, his hands clenched into fists at his side.

“What word?” Ford asked, squinting at Bill, his eyes still a little wide. “Wh -?”

“Just stop.” Bill scowled, unwilling to admit which word was agitating him.

“Burden?” Ford guessed astutely. “But you are. A burden on me, on the world. A burden on the people who live here, who hope to continue living here.”

“Stop.” Bill crossed his arms, his composure fracturing. There was a wild look in his eye now, like the tether on his temper was thinning with each repetition of the dreaded word. Yet Stanford just kept going.
“You were a burden on my wallet when you lived here. All of my trophies gone because of you. You were a burden on my patience. A burden on my life, on my sleep schedule.” Ford continued to list, knowing he was irritating Bill now, pushing it defiantly.

“Sixer-“ Bill said, his tone warning Ford of his rapidly dwindling patience. The part of him that was willing to be vulnerable with Ford was retreating by the second as his temper took the fore, and he fell back on old habits, goaded into it.

“A burden on the entire universe!” Ford declared, stepping back to point at Bill now, accusing him. “You are a –“

“YOU DON’T GET TO SAY THAT WORD ANYMORE!” Bill screeched at him and clicked his fingers.

“You don’t get to tell me what to do.” Ford countered stupidly, foolishly defiant, hyped up by his conviction, his words aiming to hurt. “I’ll say whatever I want to get it through to you. You are A SEA OTTER!”

Ford blinked, pausing, before he second guessed himself. “Did I say that right? I –“

His introspection was interrupted by Bill snorting a suppressed laugh, holding a hand over his mouth, hiding a grin.

“What did you do to me?” Ford questioned angrily.

“Go on, say it again.” Bill dared him, watching him smugly now.

“You didn’t –” Ford frowned, before attempting to say the word again, his brain defaulting to a different phrase without him even realising. “Sea otter.”

“HAH!” Bill was pointing at Stanford now, laughter blurting out of him in a callous wave. “Hahahahahahah. Hah! That’s what you get for name calling, Genius.”

“What did you –?” Ford asked, stunned. He felt much the same, still angry, tired and paranoid, but he realised that what he was intending to say wasn’t coming out right. “What did you do to me? Have you – are you messing with my mind?”

“I replaced a word with another word. An improvement, I’d say. The next time you try to sound all ominous and melodramatic, you’ll say Sea Otter instead, and everyone will be too busy thinking about their adorable little whiskers to pay you any mind.” Bill said smugly, looking pleased with himself. “I have just saved, no doubt, countless conversations.”

“You can’t do that.” Ford argued, irritated by Bill’s flippancy. This was a serious issue, Bill said he wouldn’t mess around with Ford’s mind, but that promise seemed to be out the window, along with several other ones since Ford rejected him. “Put it back! I want my old word back.”

Bill looked Ford square in the eye and replied sourly. “No.”

“Wh- but it –“ Ford floundered, unaccustomed to his muse saying ‘no’ to him. He thought Bill was trying to sway him over to his evil ways, shouldn’t he be giving Stanford what he wants.

“Listen here, Sixer. That was me going easy on you.” Bill wrenched himself out of his human form and floated, triangular once more, in front of Stanford, scaling up, looming over him. “I came to you with an offer of forgiveness, and not only do you throw it back in my face, you decided you’d make yourself an obstacle. Not a smart move, smart guy. I don’t like obstacles, and I don’t like backtalk, so count yourself lucky I only took one word, and not all of them, like I did to Cathy Crenshaw.”

Ford gulped, rearing back as Bill towered in the room, his form hitting the ceiling above him. He realised yet again the folly of pissing off a God, even when the God in question seemed to hold a candle for him.

“Now, I’m going to give you the opportunity to come to your senses and apologise. Give up this ridiculous vocation, quit being the thorn in my side, and realise that your place is here.” Bill paused and pointed to his hypotenuse. “By my side. Don’t sabotage your standing here just so you can feel morally superior. I can tolerate you pushing my buttons, but I can’t tolerate you acting out against me anymore, so I’m giving you time to wise up, cool down, and get over yourself before you make yourself a problem.”

Ford could feel the dream crumbling at the edges, his heart pounding fearfully in his chest as Bill issued his parting statement, a final warning for Ford.

“You won’t like how I deal with problems.”

Ford woke with a start, sitting on the couch, holding his hand over his chest, the tattoo there stinging painfully. He’d been sweating, his shirt soaked under the armpits from this nightmare, although that could also have been from all the coffee.

Ford looked down at the cup on the coffee table and sneered at it.

Not coffee at all. Decaf.

Acting impulsively, Ford grabbed the coffee cup and hurled it out the window, listening to the ceramic shatter on the ground outside.

Checking his smart watch, he could tell the portal hadn’t been activated, but he knew he couldn’t stay in the house anymore, he couldn’t risk it. He couldn’t risk the possibility that the next time he closed his eyes he’d open them to a world in chaos.

Gathering his belongings, Ford shoved the essentials in his coat and bag, throwing all three journals in the duffel, sliding a spare pair of glasses in his trench coat pocket, putting the almanac in his bag as well, just in case. He packed a small toolkit, gathered the most recent notes he’d been working on, designs for Project Mentum, and pocketed them as well. That’d give him something to work on while he was on the road.

It was clear he couldn’t stay in the house anymore. He couldn’t trust himself around the portal, and he couldn’t even trust himself to make a decent cup of coffee.

If he wanted to stop Bill from taking this world, Ford had to branch out. Think outside the box. And protect himself all the while.

Because it seemed now, he’d finally made himself a problem.

Hopefully one Bill couldn’t ‘fix’.
Hiding journal number three was an act of inspired genius. Ford took inspiration from Fiddleford’s bunker, redesigning a metal panel slotted in a hollowed-out section of one of the old redwoods, hiding the control console within the tree.

Of course, just hiding the journal in the tree would be too easy, child’s play for someone to find, so Ford set up a mechanism with the switches. Like a password no one but Ford could crack. One would have to flick the switch on the left three times and the switch on the right only once. Any other combination would immediately lock down the control console.

Ford was confident that this protocol would protect the journal from unwanted readers, hoarding its secrets. After all, who would be lucky enough to flip the switches in that specific order without knowing the sequence.

Once the switches were flipped in succession, a panel on the forest floor slid open, and in the alcove beneath Ford gently placed his journal.

“Maybe one day, when all this is over, I can come back for you.” Ford said, placing his hand lovingly over the cover.

He was loathe to part with his research. He felt the summation of these journals contained his life’s work - was his life’s work! It jaded him bitterly that Bill had forced him to hide his findings, to hide the studies that would have one day made him famous.

As he sealed the journal away beneath the metal panel, rolling a sheet of grass he purchased from the plant nursery over the top to camouflage it, he bid farewell to his long-held daydreams of shaking hands with the president, or accepting accolades from his hero Carl Sagan.

He had to let such things go now. Such childish daydreams.

It was time to grow up.

Ford made the decision to hide his next journal on the grounds of the local elementary school several days later, when the sleep deprivation and coffee jitters had begun to affect him.

No child would be intelligent enough to decipher the coded material within the second journal, nor did Stanford imagine any child would be devious enough to use the secrets held within.

Ford was relying on the innate goodness, the innate innocence of children, to preserve the secrets of this, his most dark and dangerous journal. He buried it furtively, hidden at the very back of the playground, where the field met the forest, under cover of darkness, looking over his shoulder all the while.

He jumped at every rustle in the forest, every hooting owl that passed his way.

He was paranoid. And rightly so.

Who knows who else could be watching?

That mentality followed him through his next week, sleep becoming even more of a distant memory for him. He had surpassed his last held record of sleepless nights, forgetting what it felt like to feel well rested.

In his weaker moments as he felt his eyelids growing heavy, sitting in his car, watching the people walk alongside the road, he let Bill’s words wash over him.

_Get a good night’s sleep for once._

_We can be together again._

_You know you want that._

Ford almost let his eyes slide shut before he jolted awake sharply, looking around him frantically.

Ford slapped his face, trying to wake himself with the pain. It was no good. He felt weak. He kept getting weaker.

He needed a top up.

The Triple Digits Truck Stop off Route 14 had become Stanford’s haven as of late. Boasting the strongest industrial strength coffee in four counties, Stanford relied on the Triple Digits Diner to keep him caffeinated and sane.

The waitresses assumed he was a stockbroker, or private investigator, each taking turns to guess when they thought Stanford wasn’t listening, but he was always listening.

He had to keep an ear out. He never knew when he’d hear that familiar laugh echo out at him, and that was something he was trying to avoid at all costs.

He had to be vigilant.

No decaf!

Thankfully they didn’t serve decaf at the Triple Digits. When Stanford first asked, the regular truckers who frequented the diner laughed at him, and he had never felt more comforted by the sound of mocking laughter.

Pulling up into the diner parking lot, Ford dragged himself out of his car, blearily struggling to keep his eyes open until he made it through the door.

Slumping into a seat by the counter, Ford raised a hand to wave at the waitress, the one who guessed that Ford must be a Soviet Spy. Rather ridiculous in Ford’s opinion, he’d just managed to shake the New Jersey twang from his voice, he wasn’t about to go around picking up new accents.

“Darlene. Some bacon, and a strong one please.”

“Coming right up.” Darlene replied, handing another trucker their sandwich before fetching a mug for Stanford.

She slid the noxious industrial strength brew across the counter to him, and Ford took a moment to just inhale the fumes.

_Coffee was his salvation now. This caffeinated substance was his deliverance._

Ford sat there for a while, struggling to keep his eyes open, as he sniffed the coffee. Darlene returned with his bacon, and eventually he took a sip, wrinkling his nose at the taste. He was taking it strong now, without sugar or cream. The sign of a desperate man.

Blinking far too often to look appropriately wakeful, Ford barely noticed the kindly looking trucker sitting on the stool beside him, but after a while it was apparent that he was being watched.
Ford turned to stare back at the trucker apprehensively, but the man just shook his head and smiled.

“Having shutter trouble, are ya?” The man scratched his moustache and looked down at his own mug of coffee. “I know the signs.”

“On the road a lot, are you?” Ford asked politely, hoping conversation could keep him awake.

“Most days, more than not. You know, we truckers got a list of ways to stay waking, during those long drives. Sometimes coffee just don’t cut it. No offence, Darlene.”

“I won’t have you bad mouthin’ my coffee now.” Darlene chided the trucker playfully.

“I swear by it. You know that.” The trucker replied, holding his hand over his heart.

“What techniques do you use?” Ford asked, hoping he’d hear some clever insight he hadn’t already tried, looking for wisdom in this weathered, plaid wearing man.

“You could pinch yourself.” The man shrugged, and then grinned at Ford. “Heck, you could pinch someone else, they’d punch you awake. That don’t get too fun after the first few tries though.”

Ford was disheartened, his tired self hoping for something more concrete than just ‘pinch yourself’.

“You could let a dog ride shotgun and put peanut butter on your face. My ol’ pal Buster used to love doin’ that. I took him with me on most rides. He was damn fine company, that dog.” The trucker mused, his voice fond.

Ford was finding it harder to listen to the man’s nostalgic reminiscence, his patience for other people thin, since he was starving himself of sleep to save them. He didn’t want to hear about this man’s dog, he was trying to find ways to stave off sleep, to save the world.

Ford lost interest in what the trucker was saying, dismissing it as useless, but he was still not quite tired enough to be impolite, or downright rude to the stranger.

If Ford had been paying attention better, he might have noticed the shift in the trucker’s tone, to a more calculating, cruelly amused vocalisation.

“You could put peppers in your eyes. I bet that’d be fun.”

Ford barely even reacted to that one, looking back at his cup of coffee morosely, lamenting humankind and what passed for good advice from some people.

The trucker was watching Ford, taking in the tired slump to his shoulders, the agitated set of his jaw, and the deep bags under his eyes, before he spoke again, his voice softer.

“Just give up, Sixer.”

Ford frowned, the phrasing pinging off alarms in the back of his head. Trudging through his tiredness to listen, he processed what the friendly trucker just said, and blinked his eyes open in alarm.

He turned around to face the man, and reared back, knocking his plate of bacon onto the floor, shattering the plate. Everyone in the diner turned to look at Ford, drawn by the sound of the shattering ceramic.

It could have been the sunrise coming through the window, but in that moment the trucker’s eyes, and everyone else’s in the diner, were glowing yellow.

“You don’t look so good.” The trucker blinked at him, slitted pupils gone in an instant, retreating under the man’s eyelid. “Are you alright?”

The sun was still shining through the window, tinging the room orange, but Stanford was too frantic to notice, believing he was trapped in a dream, surrounded by enemies.

He hyperventilated, his eyes darting around the diner, feeling the eyes of the diner patrons on him, watching him.

_He has eyes everywhere, and they are watching my every move!_ Ford panicked internally, his paranoia kicking up into a frenzy.

Ford yelled, clutching his forehead. “GET OUT OF MY MIND_CIPHER!”

The diner patrons gave Ford startled, censorial looks, and Ford couldn’t take it anymore.

He ran out of the diner as fast as his legs could carry him.

Out in the parking lot, he paced over to his car, aiming to get inside, before he stopped himself.

Rather than choosing not to drive out of conscientious concern for the other cars and pedestrians, obviously in no state to drive if that microsleep earlier was any indicator, Stanford’s paranoia urged him to abandon his car, taking his duffel bag and belongings out of the boot, slinging it over his shoulder and walking along the edge of the tarmac road.

_He has eyes everywhere. What if they see me? Saw my license plate? I could be followed. He could be following me right now!_

Stanford’s paranoid internal banter continued as he walked down the highway, his frantic footsteps the only thing keeping him awake, keeping him whole.

_If I fall asleep again, and I’m near my car, Bill could just drive me home and go down to the basement. I can’t go down to the basement. He could turn on the portal. If I don’t have a car, he’ll have to walk all the way home, and he doesn’t have the capacity to hold out that long in my body. I can already feel it failing on me._

Ford’s legs were reedy, trembling like jelly, as he forced himself down the highway. The sun was fading in the sky by the time he reached his limit, having walked all the way through to the late afternoon.

Eager to avoid drawing attention to himself, Ford directed his feet to lead him around to the parking lot at the back of the Twin Bed Motel, collapsing beside the dumpster, hoping no one would see him here.

His legs were aching, and his hands were shaking. His whole body was shaking, severe coffee withdrawal taking its toll. He hadn’t slept in weeks, and he was at his limit now, barely able to hold on.

He still hadn’t parted with the last journal, his final journal. The very first journal he started.

He’d been tossing up various hiding places, finding fault with each, one by one. Hiding them all within the one town was too foolhardy, but Ford couldn’t justify a long break from the place. What if Bill possessed someone else and broke into the shack? Ford would have to stay and defend it, defend it with his life.

But he still couldn’t justify keeping the first journal with him. As much as he wanted to maintain at least one keepsake from his research, he knew he had to cast it away, but he couldn’t bring himself to destroy it. It was his life’s work.

If only there was someone who could take the journal and hide it far, far away, somewhere even Stanford wouldn’t know where to find it.

But who could he trust?

Who wouldn’t be tricked by Bill? Who could be fast enough, clever enough, well-travelled enough, and sneaky enough to evade Bill’s minions and hide the journal?

Ford felt his vision blur as his exhaustion caught up with him, and he struggled to focus on the motel sign. Anything to keep his eyes open.

TWIN BED MOTEL.

Ford blinked.

BED.

No, that was too tempting.

Ford blinked again and the word TWIN stood out in his field of view.

It was then that Ford realised there was only one person left in this world that he could possibly trust with his secrets.

Rising to his feet, shuffling across the parking lot to the motel lobby, Ford began formulating a plan. He snagged a post card from the rack in the lobby, lurching to the front desk, grabbing the concierge’s pen.

“Can I borrow your pen?” Ford asked blearily. “And your phone?”

The concierge nodded and leaned back from him warily, pointing to the side. “It’s down the hall.”

Ford staggered down the hall, and leaned against the wall, picking the phone off the hook and dialling the number.

It rang for a while, until the person on the other line picked up.

“Genuine phone psychic at yer service. I charge a dollar a minute fer the mysteries of yer future. Whadda ya wanna know?”

“Hi Ma.” Ford murmured into the phone. “I miss you too. Listen, you don’t happen to have an address, or a phone number, or a way to contact Stanley now, would you? He’s been moving from place to place for so long I wouldn’t know how to go about – Yes, I want to send him something. Just something. Do you have an address?”

Ford flattened the post card against the wall and scribbled the address on the card.

“Mmmhmm. Number 5, Dead End Flats, uhuh, New Mexico. Thanks Ma.”
“I’ve been waitin’ so long for you boys to make up.” Ma Pines simpered over the phone. “Good fer you fer reachin’ out. It’d make me real proud to see you two forgive each other. Forgive and forget, that’s the way to do it.”

“Hmm.” Ford said noncommittally, having had poor experiences with both forgiving and forgetting recently. Both concepts really had a lot to answer for.

Rather than disappointing his mother with an outright no, Ford kept it civil.

“We’ll see.”

He had a plan, and he was sticking to it, and if everything went as it should, hopefully Ford could find a way to stop Bill for good.

No more half measures.

Ford scribbled his own address in the top corner. Across the side of the post card in big letters, Ford wrote his missive, and hoped it would be heeded.

PLEASE COME!
-FORD

Chapter End Notes

I am so excited, we are almost at the turning point here. I am literally grinning as I write all the time now.
I'm dedicating this chapter to sunnivaixchel who caught up with the fic and said some lovely things that I appreciate deeply. Thank you as always for the kind words.
WHO'S READY FOR STANLEY? We've had the 'smart one' now we're seeing the 'other one' work his magic. And by work his magic I mean scam people in Columbia, scam people in New Mexico, and maybe get scammed a little along the way.
This next chapter will take me slightly more time to write because I want to get it right, I'll be doing a lot of research about New Mexico, and several other topics. If any of my readers are Spanish speaking or have lived in New Mexico or around Albuquerque and feel like helping me with some fact checking and authenticity that would be awesome, please feel free to message me on my tumblr if you're okay with me asking a billion questions about stuff hahah.
I hope folks enjoyed the chapter, and as always, I will be excited to hear what you think of it and will drink up your nice words like a starving man in the desert ~
So I must leave, I’ll have to go to Las Vegas or Monaco. And win a fortune in a game, my life will never be the same…

Chapter Notes
See the end of the chapter for notes

A brown-haired, broad shouldered man stood with hands shoved into the pockets of his mauve bomber jacket, at the arrivals gate at the Albuquerque International Sunport, scanning the crowd from behind his dark lenses.

Wayward locals and tourists poured through the arrivals gate, each splitting off to hug waiting relatives, or ferry their luggage off to the nearby shuttle buses. Families, friends, and patient lovers waited with balloons, flowers, and presents for their loved ones. However, Stanley Pines didn’t come to New Mexico to visit family. He had no family here, but what he did have was opportunity, and a chance for a fresh start.

Scouring the crowd, finally, Stan spotted what he was looking for. A gangly looking teenager holding a sign that read ‘ANDREW ALCATRAZ’ in clumsy capital letters, shifting his weight awkwardly like he needed the bathroom.

Stan picked his suitcase up, and strode across the terminal, making a beeline for the kid.

“Andrew Alcatraz?” The boy asked when Stan got close enough for him to notice.

“Sure, kid.” Stanley pulled up the collar of his shirt evasively and looked around the airport. “You got the keys?”

The boy nodded, and Stanley nodded back before briskly walking off, barely breaking his stride, heading to the carpark.

The boy hurried to follow him, fishing in the pockets of his cargo pants, patting himself down until he pulled a dangling keyring from his trousers. He held the car keys aloft and Stanley swiped them swiftly.

“Drove it all the way here from the impound lot in Illinois.” The boy explained. “Took me two days with stops. All your stuff is in the trunk like you asked for, I didn’t touch nothin’. There was something that sounded like it was broken though, I heard a rattling, so I thought that maybe, you know, you’d want a look at it?”

“It was broken before kid. Don’t sweat it.” Stan replied, following the boy through the parking complex, scouring the rows of cars for his baby. “You’re still gettin’ your tip.”

“Gee, thank you, Mr Alcatraz.” The kid grinned in a charming, sleep deprived kind of way, missing the way Stan winced at the name. “Where’d you fly in from anyhow?”

“Columbia.” Stan grunted, rounding the corner to spy his precious El Diablo convertible parked in the lot. He made a beeline for his baby, checking the car over, and the boy followed him, standing awkwardly to the side.

“Cool.” The boy shoved his hands in his pockets and eyed off Stanley’s suitcase. “You got some of those cigars in there?”

Stanley paused briefly, before he opened the front passenger door of the Stanleymobile and set his suitcase in the passenger’s seat.

“Not cigars. That’s Cuba. Columbia does something else.” Stan said evasively, before he unzipped the suitcase a fraction, worming two fingers into the scant gap, pulling out a crumpled $100 bill. He looked at the note with a sigh, not willing to risk opening the case all the way to find the driver something smaller, before handing it over to the kid. “Here you go, kid. You did a good job. Now get on out of here and go get yourself some sleep.”

The kid accepted the $100 gleefully and shoved it in his pocket before he gave Stan a clumsy salute. “Thanks, hombre. I’ll see you around next time you need driving, yeah?”

“Yeah you’ll hear from me.” Stan waved the kid off, watching him meander away.

When he was certain the boy was gone and he was alone in the parking lot, he turned back around, and leaned over the passenger’s seat, unzipping his suitcase all the way open. Scattered amongst a few dirty shirts and some toiletries were frantic bundles of cash, fistfuls of green stuffed into the case. Fat wads of filthy money tied up with elastic bands, slightly dusty but no less valid as a form of currency. There had to be about 8000 dollars in there.

Stanley called the smuggled pile of cash his fresh start. This was his ticket to the good life, the big time. A small fortune in stolen US dollars painted his suitcase a healthy, wealthy green, and the only people who could possibly lay claim on this money, apart from Stanley, were rotting away like suckers back in a dingy prison in Columbia.

Stanley was no sucker. Taking that plea deal to get out early was a no brainer compared to the alternative, a lifetime spent in prison.

Pleading out on a bargain wasn’t snitching in Stanley’s book – it was self-preservation. Much needed self-preservation considering the rough crowd he fell in with back in Columbia. Ratting on the gang wasn’t the tricky part, the tricky part was convincing Rico that their cellmate Jorge was the rat, and that his sister was going to take the money and leave them all high and dry.

Better to let Stanley tell a few white lies and get out now to protect their investment before Jorge’s sister frittered it all away on expensive ‘nose powders’, and other fanciful cosmetics.

Stanley only needed Rico to concede his point for a moment, just long enough to hide Rico’s shiv before he fixed his murderous gaze on Stan or Jorge. That very evening Stan pleaded out as a foolish American accomplice in over his head and the legal team ate it up. They got to put away Rico for all kinds of criminal activity now that their evidence was not so circumstantial, while Stanley got to waltz on out of there without so much as a backwards glance.

He wouldn’t miss the jerks who got him put in there. Good fucking riddance.

The instant he got out of those prison doors he was cha-cha-ing his way towards the covert stash of cash hiding under Rico’s floorboards and towards his future freedom.

Freedom didn’t just mean freedom from prison. Stan fell in with a bad crowd back in Columbia, and if he didn’t want to be knee deep in with some nasty dealers for the rest of his life he had to plan a way to get outta there, and when opportunity knocks, well, let’s just say Stan was ready to open the prison door.

He’d never been so happy to be deported.

He left Columbia behind, like one of those considerate tourists on a nature trail. Take only illicit drug money, leave only suckers. That was how the phrase should have gone, but you try telling that to those tree-hugging hippies.

It was all behind him now. The past was in the past, and he was in the present, with a fresh start in his suitcase, and a smile on his face.

He was in a new town, in a new state, with a new lease on life, and he was ready to knock the socks off the residents of Albuquerque, New Mexico with his brand-new line of Stan Co. affordable housekeeping supplies.

He was going legit, back to semi-respectable business practices. No more dirty work, no more looking over your shoulder, no more blood pacts in seedy alleyways – he was going clean – and what could be cleaner than selling vacuums? With a quality business model and a brand-new identity Stanley was ready to cast off the shackles of his old life as Andrew ‘8-Ball’ Alcatraz and begin anew as Steve Pinington, vacuum mogul and genuine businessman.

Closing his suitcase and sliding it under the front passenger’s seat, Stanley closed the car door, walked around to the trunk of the car and cranked it open.

Pushing the relics of his failed enterprises to the side, Stanley felt around the bottom of the trunk and popped open a small compartment. Inside the compartment was an assortment of passports and driver’s licenses, exquisitely forged to baffle even the keenest cop or customs officer. Stanley flipped through the cards until he found the license for Steve Pinington.

Yeesh, he hadn’t used this one since Pennsylvania. That felt like a lifetime ago. Stan cringed taking in the dated disco moustache, remembering all the trimmings his life as Steve Pinington from Pennsylvania entailed.

Stan rubbed under his nose, regarding the broad moustache he’d styled in the photo. Probably for the best he shaved it off. People shave off facial hair all the time. This ID could work, it wouldn’t be a problem if no one looked too closely at the issue date. Or any of the other identifying details.

Closing the trunk, Stanley walked around and climbed in the driver’s seat, his El Diablo hugging him just like it always did. He’d missed this car.

He slid his keys into the ignition and closed his eyes in satisfaction at the familiar rumble of the engine.

He was home.

“That’s my baby.” Stan patted the dashboard dotingly, smiling, before he set his hands on the wheel, pressing down on the gas.

The Stanleymobile motored on out of the airport, following the road signs into town.

Albuquerque, New Mexico – the start of a better life – and not another dead end.

Stan sure hoped so anyway.

---

Albuquerque wasn’t half bad.

It was densely populated area with a lively mix of metropolitan and old-world architecture - a multicultural melting pot of potential marks. Stan liked to call himself an equal opportunity opportunist, and in big cities like this there was plenty of opportunity to make a buck.

It took a few days to settle in. Stan booked himself into a nice motel, springing for slightly fancier digs than he was used to. He had the cash, so why shouldn’t he live it up for once? There were mints on his pillow, and tiny bottles of booze in the mini fridge – it was the good life.

Stan took a few days to get his affairs in order. He contacted his old distributor, followed up on a few rumours, made a few enquiries if the ‘it fell off the back of a truck’ stork had anything good for him. He organised and paid for the goods – about 4 cases of knock-off vacuum cleaners, to be shipped down to him here in Albuquerque and he rented a cosy little storage unit to house the goods in.

He strolled down to the local copy shop and spent his Thursday evening printing out flashy labels and stickers to put on all his repurposed vacuums. He also splurged on some fancy business cards – after all, Steve Pinington was all about the branding, and Stan planned on being a brand name around here.

Things were looking up. Albuquerque was a decent place and living here beat looking over your shoulder 24/7. Stan felt like a new man now that he was going clean. Even his clothes were clean – laundromat clean with the fancy lavender soap from the dispensers Stan could never afford before.

He could justify spending on the little things now that he had money to spend, and there was more coming his way if the Stan Vac’s kicked off. Enough that he could spend a little on the big things too.

He allowed himself the treat of a new wardrobe. He bought himself new jeans, a few clean shirts, and a new suit jacket and slacks so he’d look professional when selling his schtick. He even got a slick new haircut.

He was throwing down money left and right, but that’s what you had to do to start a new business.

Sure, maybe he was going a little bit overboard, but it wasn’t every day you escaped from Columbian prison with a suitcase full of drug money.

Stan was a free man, and he sure as hell was going to live like one.

With nothing left to do but wait until his repurposed vacuums arrived, Stan decided he’d wile away the time in downtown Albuquerque and have a drink or two or three as a free man. It beat staring at the fancy mirrored ceiling in his motel room, chugging back tiny bottles of booze.

He was a businessman now, with a suitcase full of unmentionable money. It was slightly less full than when he arrived, but he could still justify living comfortably. Besides, when those vacuums hit Stan’d be in the big leagues. He could spring for a few beers in a proper bar downtown. Why the hell not?

Stuffing his hands in his jacket pockets, Stan strolled along under the street lamps, enjoying the balmy evening. Music drifted out from restaurants and people’s homes, pleasant laughter setting Stan at ease.

Albuquerque was a nice place and these were nice people living nice lives.

Stan could get used to this.

Perusing the establishments along the high street, Stanley made a beeline for a sweet little joint lit up with neon signs in the window. A winged, one eyed triangle hovered over a banner that read Ojo de la Fortuna – now that sounded like a lucky bet, the kind of place Stan could get lucky.

There was ‘beer on tap’ and an advertised ‘pool room’ promising Stan a good night in static neon, and if there was a jukebox in this little hole in the wall that’d provide Stan the perfect soundtrack for hustling rubes. Always a nice touch.

Confident that he was in for a good night, Stan entered Ojo de la Fortuna with a smile.

It was a busy enough place, with people playing pool, dancing, eating in cosy booths around the edges of the room, candle lit tables looking out to the street through square little windows. The joint was dimly lit, enough that dames looked good on dates, and no one would notice if you got ketchup on your shirt. Behind the bar, large blackboards scrawled with chalk menus boasted sloppy joes, enchiladas, burgers, and comfort food galore. The wall of liquor back there looked promising and Stan saw a few craft brews on tap he wouldn’t mind giving a try.

Deciding this was the kind of place he could get used to, Stan walked over to the bar and hopped up on one of the bar stools, looking around the pub curiously.

When he turned to face the bar, the bartender was already watching him, slowly polishing an empty glass.

“What are you having?” She asked, her voice low and sultry, and Stan was momentarily stunned.

What – a – dame!

Dark eyes and darker eyelashes took him in from under a cascade of tumbling black curls. She had honey coloured skin, full plump lips swiped over with rouge. She had big hips, a tiny waist, and curves in all the right places.

She looked like trouble, and Stan should know – he was trouble too.

She was still staring at Stan, and for a moment while his mind was glitching in the gutter, he wondered if she was checking him out too – until he realised she was waiting for his order.

Clearing his throat, aiming for suave, Stan rested his elbow on the bar, and quirked his eyebrow at her. “What are you having, sugar?”

“What, you wanna come behind the bar and serve me? That ain’t how it works, I’m the bartender. Now what are you drinking?” She replied, cocking her hip, crossing her arms.

“I’ll have uh…” Stan looked up at the blackboards behind her, defaulting to the most inexpensive beer before he reconsidered, realising he could afford more. Pointing to the most expensive craft beer, trying to impress the bartender, Stan picked his poison. “I’ll have that one, sweetcheeks. Let’s hope it’s as sweet as you are.”

The bartender raised her eyebrows, pursing her lips. “You know flirting will cost you extra, big guy.”

She turned to fetch him a new glass, and Stan spoke up again.

“I’ll take two of them.”

She turned back around to look at him, before shrugging. “Okay big spender.”
She grabbed two glasses and poured them from the tap, one by one, leaving a nice layer of froth on each beer. She put them both in front of Stan on coasters, and wiped her hands with a cloth, putting her hands on her hips.

“That’ll be $36.”

Fumbling in his wallet, Stan pulled out a crumpled fifty, and passed it over. She got him change from the till and passed the notes over to him, before turning to walk away.

Stan called out. “That second one’s for you, you know.”

She paused and looked over at Stan curiously. “Not drinking alone tonight then?”

“Not if I can help it.” Stan grinned, hoping he was winning her over.

She pursed her lips, and looked down along the bar, checking that the patrons weren’t waving to her, wanting service. It seemed reasonably quiet, quiet enough for a short break.

Walking back along to Stan, the bartender leaned across the counter, resting her elbows on the wood, pointing to the two beers.

“I’m not having that.”

“Why?” Stan questioned. “Because you’re on the clock?”

She smiled at Stan, a sly sliver of amusement, before raising her eyebrow. “No. Because it sucks.”

The winsome grin fell off Stans face, and he looked down at his drink with dismay.

“What do you mean it sucks? I paid sixteen bucks for it.”

“You might like it.” She shrugged again. “But I don’t. Just because it’s expensive doesn’t mean it’s any good.”

“Why charge so much for it then?” Stan asked, mildly irritated.

“Because rich people are chumps, people with money will buy anything. It tastes like … musty dishwater.” She divulged with glee. “Go on, try it.”

Stan took a tentative sip, thinking she was just teasing him, but he wrinkled his nose when the liquid hit his tongue. This beer was the crappiest drink he ever paid good money for.

Unwilling to admit he’d been conned, Stan pulled a face like he was appreciating the taste, nodding as he mulled it over, but the bartender laughed at his expression.

“Do you like it?”

“If I say no, will you get me another?” Stan tried gamely.

“No refunds.” The bartender said swiftly, breaking no room for argument.

“In that case –“ Stan raised the glass up to cheers the bartender, and took a long swig from the murky beer. She raised her eyebrows at him in surprise. “It ain’t the worst crap I ever drank out of pure stubbornness. And you won’t catch me wasting 32 bucks. But the next round is on you.”

She snorted disbelievingly at Stan’s confidence and looked him up and down. “What, ain’t you some kind of big spender?”

“I sure am.” Stan boasted and puffed out his chest. “I got a business model that’s gonna take this town for a ride.”

“Oh really?” The bartender enquired, wiping down the counter as Stan took another swig of the disgusting beer. He was hoping if he drank it down quicker he’d taste it less after.

“Sure. I’ve got a shipment of ‘discount’ vacuum cleaners coming down from Toronto. When they get here, I’m rebranding them, whacking new labels on them, and selling them for double the price – no, triple!” Stan bragged. He pulled one of his freshly minted business cards from his jacket pocket and flicked it over to the girl. “So, you know, if you got any friends that are suckers – give em my card.”

The bartender shook her head and laughed, before plucking the card from his fingers. “Gee, that sounds real appealing. And what’s in it for me if I rip off my friends and family for you –“ She squinted at the business card before looking back up at him with derision. “Mr Steve Pinington?”

“Uh…” Stan’s eyes darted around before he attempted a crooked grin. “A discounted Stan Vac?”

“Discounted? You’re not even going to give me a freebie?” She tsked, shaking her head, resting her hand on her hip. She looked up at Stan curiously. “Does it work?”

“Oh… maybe?” Stan shrugged helpfully.

The bartender snorted and looked at the card.

The bell at the door rang, and she looked up at the group of tough looking guys who entered the bar. They gave her a look, and she nodded briefly, before turning back to Stan, pocketing the card.

“Okay Mr Pinington. Whatever you say.” She leaned forward to wipe down the bench in front of Stan one more time, baring her cleavage with the action, perhaps purposefully, and slid a coaster under his two glasses.

Before she left, she gave him a sweet smile, patting Stan congenially on the wrist, her fingers lingering flirtatiously on his pulse point. “Enjoy your drinks, hot shot. I got other customers to serve.”

The girl walked away, down to the other side of the bar, speaking to the customers who just came in, and Stan watched her hips sway back and forth as she walked away, almost like she was deliberately emphasising the movement to entrance him. A tattoo peeked out from under her jeans, branding her lower back with the neon symbol that hung above the door. That weird, winged, one eyed triangle.

Ladies with tattoos always meant trouble for Stan, but damn if it wasn’t a good look for her. She made that ink look good. She was a stunner and she probably knew it too.

He could hear her talking to the customers down the other end of the bar, and he nearly snorted into his drink when he heard her.

“You boys want something real nice, you ought to try what he’s having.” She pointed at Stan’s disgusting beverage, the most expensive drink at the bar, and Stan watched her talk it up like it was liquid gold. “Now that’s a classy drink.”

The customers turned to look at Stan, and the bartender winked at him conspiratorially. Grinning,
Stan raised his drink, and nodded like he was enjoying it – just to watch the satisfied smile stretch across her face.

She was a con artist, just like he was, it seemed. She was clever, and sneaky, and seemed to have taken a shine to Stan.

She lied through her teeth to those customers and then smiled about it. Stan liked a gal like that; she was a cheat just like he was. She had moxy.

Stan hummed to himself, smiling down at his crappy drinks, elated somehow, despite having been duped into buying them in the first place. Hunched over his two drinks, sculling back the first one and then stubbornly sipping on the second one, the froth clinging to his upper lip, he considered that interaction a win, even if she didn’t seem too impressed with his expert business plan.

Give it a week, Stan thought. When those vacuums come through next month on Friday, and Stan hits it big, she’ll be begging to have a drink with him, and so will all the other chicks at this bar.

Ladies loved a guy with cash to burn, and soon that guy would be him. He’d get his vacuums through, sell ‘em all for a scandalous profit, and go on living the good life here in little old Albuquerque.

His plan was foolproof, and nothing could go wrong.

“What do you mean they aren’t coming?!!”

Stan hunched over the payphone, huddled into the booth, calling his supplier Tony Frizzoli. It was Friday and Stan had been waiting down by the depot for the shipment of stolen vacuums to arrive, but they hadn’t come through.

“I’m sorry Stanley, but circumstances ain’t ideal right now. We’ve got the cops on our ass because Barry fucked up the pickup, and until the heat is off, we can’t ship nothin’ nowhere. Our trucks keep gettin’ tailed and we’ve got the fuzz on our ass.” Tony’s voice emitted, tinny from the payphone handset. “We’ll get ‘em to ya, but right now ain’t the best time.”

“Can’t you give them the slip?” Stan questioned. “Just one truck, one shipment is all I need. I’ve gotta have something to sell.”

“It’s too risky right now. You can hold out for a few more weeks, can’t ya?”

“A few weeks?” Stan fretted, and grabbed his wallet from his back pocket, opening it to stare at the dwindling reserve of cash inside.

A month’s worth of payments had been racking up, for the new clothes, and the storage unit, and the fancy motel, and so on. Stan had been expecting his vacuums to come in on time, so he’d factored in the assumption that he’d be making more money by now. He wasn’t completely broke yet, but financially his lifestyle wasn’t looking too sustainable.

“Ya couldn’t have told me this sooner?” Stan griped, stuffing his wallet back into his jeans.
“Wiretapping.” Tony explained. “Feds love it. I’m laying low, calling you from my grandma’s phone.”

As if to prove Tony’s point Stan could hear a frail voice calling out from the other end of the line.

“Bambino, I made Frizzoli cannoli!”

“I’m coming Nonna.” Tony called back responsively, before returning to the call. “Look Stanley, we’re trying to get the goods out to you. We really are. But until the heat dies down, our hands are tied.”

“I get it. I get it.” Stanley shook his head and sighed. “Guess I’ll have to figure something else out until they get here.”

“Yeah, you do that. We’ll call again when we get the clear on the shipment. Is that number you gave us still good? Motel Ritz?”

Stanley considered his dwindling funds and for a moment, weighing up the benefits of moving to a cheaper motel. He thought about the pillow mints and the mini fridge, his common sense swayed by the appeal of creature comforts.

“Fuck it. Sure. That number’ll be good for a while.” Stanley decided. “Just call me as soon as you can send ‘em over Frizzo.”

“Will do. You’re the man, Stan.” Tony cheered and hung up the phone.

Leaning against the plastic walls of the phone booth, Stanley sighed, before he set the phone back on the hook. He pulled his hair back and tried to shake off his frustration, clinging to some semblance of the positive attitude he came here with.

It’s okay, just a minor setback. This is still Stan’s fresh start, still his new life. And waiting for the goods to come in might mean that money’s a little thin in the meantime, but Stan could make do. He always did.

Composure returned, Stan strode out of the payphone booth and towards his beloved car.

He had money to make.

““The Stan Vac is a top of the line vacuum cleaner guaranteed to suck up pretty much anything from your floors or carpets. Dust, dirt, dog food – leftover dinner bits that missed yer son in law’s mouth. The Stan Vac can do anything.”

“Okay, but where is it?” The wrinkled old woman sat on her couch, staring down Stan with a steely gaze, as her two grandchildren climbed along the arms of the couch, playing adventurers together. “Do we get a demonstration?”

“Abuelita, can I pour my Count Chocula on the floor, and then the man in the funny suit hoovers it up like – WHOOOOSHHHHHH!!” The little boy enthused, making vacuum cleaner noises and waving his hands in the air.
“Abuelita, Abuelita, how come Jimmy gets to pour his Count Chocula on the floor but I can’t, mama said –“ His sister complained, tugging on her Abuelita’s shawl.

“You can both pour your cereal.” The woman said, sounding resigned to their antics.

“YAY!” The children jumped on the couch excitably, before running into the kitchen to fetch the cereal.

“You see, the thing is –“ Stan started explaining. “I don’t actually have a demonstration model here, but you can put a down payment on your own Stan Vac and you’ll have it as soon as our shipment gets here.”

“And when does your shipment get here?” The old woman asked, narrowing her eyes at Stan.

“Well… uhh – in terms of an ETA we don’t exactly have a set date, but the Stan Vac is well worth the wait – I tell ya –“

“So, you don’t have it.” The woman cut Stan off sharply. “You’re trying to sell me something you don’t even have, and you want me to give you my precious money from my pension to put a deposit on a vacuum that might not even work, and I just have to trust you that it’ll get here and it’ll vacuum up anything, because you say it will.”

“Hey, I’m a trustworthy guy.” Stan insisted, pasting on his best salesman smile. “And you can trust me when I say that the Stan Vac is worth the wait. I can guarantee you that the Stan Vac –“

The two children ran back into the living room cheering and upended an entire box of Count Chocula cereal on the carpet in front of Stanley, watching him with identical expectant grins, their youthful eyes sparkling with delight.

“- Really… sucks…” Stan looked down at the gleeful children, and then back up at the murderous rage on their grandma’s age chiselled face.

“OUT!” The woman pointed to the door.

Gathering his briefcase and pamphlets promptly, Stan hurried out the front door, the grandmother herding him out, whapping him with a rolled-up newspaper as she ranted at him venomously.

“Some greasy looking estafador come to my house? There is cereal all over the floor because of you! Quién crees que va a limpiar eso? Huh? Salir, rápido. Now!”

“Alright, alright. Lady I’m going. Ow!” Stan rubbed the back of his head, wincing at the precision strike the old bag laid on him with that newspaper.

Chased out onto the front lawn, Stan picked up his scattered pamphlets and shook his fist at the old lady. “Yeah, have fun picking up all that cereal, ya old bag!”

The old lady took a step down the stairs leading from her front door, looking ready to go after Stan for round two with her deadly weapon.

So, Stan did the sensible thing, and hightailed it out of there, racing for the Stanleymobile and gunning it out of the neighbourhood.

So far, the tally was sitting at Stan Vac’s sold – 0. Neighbourhoods he’d been chased out of by ticked-off old ladies – 20.
It hadn’t been Stan’s day – scratch that, it hadn’t been his week for the past four weeks. But if he didn’t sell at least one down payment for a Stan Vac, he’d be short for rent on his storage locker downtown. He’d already moved out of Motel Ritz, down to a dingier affair in Dead End Flats, and he’d cut back on his spending massively, but if he didn’t get some money in soon, he’d be royally screwed.

At this point, while Tony was still being watched by the Feds, in order to scrape by, Stan might have to saddle up and put his name down for a real job, employed by someone else – but honestly the thought of being anything but his own boss irked at Stan’s sensibilities.

He didn’t need some patronising employer looking down on him, telling him what to do and how to do it. Fuck that, Stan couldn’t deal with that sort of dynamic. He was an entrepreneur – his talents weren’t suited to flipping burgers under some cocky teenager’s careful supervision. He had more life experience in his big toe than half of these crappy bosses had in their entire being.

He had to find a way to make money for himself, that wouldn’t wind up with him compromising on what he wanted, and what he wanted was to cling to some small shred of his dignity while he made it through this shitty turn of events.

He drove around the suburbs, thinking on a possible solution that could turn him a sweet buck, and after 3 more failed sales pitches, Stan retired to what was quickly becoming one of his favourite haunts in Albuquerque - Ojo de la Fortuna.

The place was pretty much empty today, and Stan made his way to the bar, looking around for his favourite bartender.

Hopping up on his regular stool by the bar, Stan waved the bleached blonde bartender on duty over, Sally – who worked here on Thursday nights.

“Hello, Mr Pinington.” Sally said, trying to hide the food she’d just put in her mouth behind her hand as she spoke.

“Hey, Sal. Where is everyone?” Stan asked.

“Slow night.” Sally swallowed her food and shrugged evasively, not looking Stan in the eye.

“Where’s your co-worker? With the tattoos and the dark hair – she usually –“ Stan questioned, wondering where the girl he regularly chatted to was.

“Oh, Valencia?” Sally guessed. “She’s out the back calling her little brother. Yeah, he goes to school up in Portland, studying finance or some shit like that. She calls him every day.”

“Huh.” Stan mulled that over.

“So, what can I get ya?” Sally asked him.

“Whatever’s cheapest on tap.” Stan requested absently, thinking about how he could turn his prospects around. He remained lost in thought for a while, planning how he could approach the vacuum sales without any vacuums, barely noticing when Sally slid his beer across to him. As Stan sipped on his beer distantly, Sally kept sneaking bites of the food she had hidden behind the bar, and for a while things felt peaceful.

That quickly changed when Stan heard a scuffle by the door to the kitchen. He looked up from his beer, listening in.
“I’m not paying you to chit chat on the goddamn phone.”

“You don’t pay me at all. Give it a rest - it was five fucking minutes.”

It was Valencia, that fiery little fox, scowling up at a hulking man looming over her, patches sewn all over his leather jacket.

He let go of her wrist, and she clenched her fists like she was ready to slap him.

“That money isn’t going to pay itself back Val.” The man hissed at her. “If I see you here I want to see you working, not fucking off on the telephone.”

“I am working here all the time. I’m doing what you say!” Valencia argued vehemently.

Stanley was straining his ears to listen in, watching the altercation as covertly as he could. Sally was pretending to ignore it, wiping the counter down in front of Stan, but Stanley could see her biting her lip, hiding the food in her mouth, endeavouring to stay silent.

“Do it better.” The man pulled a small clip lock plastic bag out from his jacket pocket and shoved it into Valencia’s hands. “You got a lot of money to pay back. Don’t forget who owns you.” His hand slid around Valencia’s back, sliding lower to glance over the skin peeking out from her low-cut jeans.

Stanley thought at first that the guy was copping a feel – perhaps he was Valencia’s boyfriend, but from the way Valencia froze up that didn’t seem likely, and Stan was readying himself to get over there and deck the guy. Upon further inspection, it seemed the man was just tracing his fingertip over the tattoo on Valencia’s lower back, caressing the ink gently, but it unnerved her all the same.

Valencia swallowed nervously, and swatted Damien’s hand away, even as she pocketed the clip lock bag, snarling up at the man. “Go back to your poker game, Damien.”

“Next time I come out, I wanna see you working.” He called after her as he walked back through to the kitchen.

Fuming, she watched him go, and clenched and unclenched her fists, trying to calm her temper. Stan took her tiny frame in, eyeing off the tattoo on her lower back, the one her boss was fondling. It was identical to one of the patches on the man’s leather jacket, identical to the neon sign above the door, an eye staring out from within a triangle, wings sprouting from its sides, a banner draped beneath the design.

What Stan had first picked as just a quirky design, he was coming to realise must be a gang sign. He’d seen enough gangs to know, and it looked like Valencia was right in the thick of them, in deep in more ways than one. Guess that’s who owns this bar, the idiot who went out back.

She took a few steadying breaths, pushing her hair back off her face, shaking off the encounter, and she turned around to get back to work.

She stopped short when she saw Stan sitting at the bar, having watched that entire unfortunate incident go down.

“Uh… your boss is an asshole. Want me to sucker punch him for you?” Stan offered awkwardly.

“What are you doing here?” Valencia asked him, angry and embarrassed that Stan had witnessed that. “Don’t you have anywhere else to drink?”
“I can–“ Stan started to get up, not wanting to upset her.

“No, no. Don’t go.” Valencia held her hand out, shaking her head. “I’ve just had a shitty day.”

“Yeah, you and me both.” Stan commiserated, before he looked between Sally and Valencia, considering the scant few dollars left in his wallet, before reaching a decision. “Can I buy you a drink or something?”

“I’m not in the mood to do –“

“Not like that.” Stan held his hand up, stopping her. “Look, I can understand shitty days, I’ve been having a few myself lately. Just let me buy you a drink, you look like you need one.”

Valencia watched Stan hesitantly, before she looked behind her, checking her boss wasn’t looming in the doorway. Stan was smiling winsomely at her all the while, hoping she’d cool off with him. He enjoyed her company, and she looked like she needed some commiseration. Stan wouldn’t mind someone to commiserate with as well, and he’d rather commiserate with someone pretty than with the concierge back at the motel. He got the feeling the concierge was getting sick of him.

A few customers walked into the bar, and Valencia looked over at Sally, who chewed on the last of her smuggled dinner and inclined her head, waving at Val with her sparkly cheese stained manicured nails.

“You sit and have a drink hun, you know I’ll take care of the other customers.”

“Thanks Sal.” Valencia’s shoulders sagged with relief, and she walked over to Stan, standing opposite him on the other side of the counter.

Reaching under the bar, she grabbed a shot glass, and poured herself a shot of tequila, chucking it back. Setting the glass upside down on the counter as she swallowed, she held her hand out to Stan.

“Ten bucks for the shot.”

“Bleed my dry why don’t ya.” Stan joked, and passed her the money.

“Shots are five bucks each.” Valencia explained, turning the glass the right way around and pouring more tequila in the glass. “The second one’s for you.”

Stan raised his eyebrows at her, surprised, and she watched his expression shift, smiling softly.

“You said you had a shitty day too.”

“I did. More like a shitty week … month. But who’s counting?” Stan replied, reaching for the shot. He raised the glass to her, and chucked back his own shot, wincing at the taste. “You got any lemon?”

“Lemon costs extra.” Valencia shrugged. “I figured you weren’t doing so good, since you didn’t get your dishwater today. Vacuum sales not going so well?”

“It sucks.” Stan chased his shot down with the rest of his beer.

“You use that in your sales pitch?” Valencia joked.

“Sugar, I’ve used everything.” Stan sighed, and scratched his head. “Can’t sell what I don’t have. I’m really scraping the bottom of the barrel now, and I’ve been here before. It ain’t pretty.”
“Yeah, you’re telling me.” Valencia rolled her eyes, and shook her head, looking over her shoulder to the kitchen door before giving the counter a lazy wipe to look busy. “It sucks.”

“So, what’s your deal?” Stan questioned bluntly. “Sounds like your boss has got you by the balls. Or the female equivalent.”

“That’s an understatement.” Valencia scoffed.

“What’d he give you?” Stanley queried.

“Are you a narc?” Valencia asked sharply, and for a moment Stan looked offended, before she laughed, poking at his arm cheekily. “Just kidding, I know narcs, and you ain’t it. You’ve been trouble since you got here.”

“That hurts.” Stan put his hand over his chest, feigning upset, when really, he was just impressed at how savvy this girl was.

“Take the compliment.” Valencia grinned, before she fished for the clip lock from the back pocket of her jeans, dangling it in front of Stan. Several tablets of some undiscernible drug sat in the plastic bag, and Stan looked between the pills and Valencia’s wry grin. “Courtesy of the Evil Eye.”

“They making you sell that?” Stan grunted, reaching out to examine the pills.

“I do what I have to do to get them off my back.” Valencia let Stan look at the pills, before plucking them away from him. “I owe too much money to get away with only working the bar. And I’m not doing the other shit they want me to do. So, I sell happy pills to happy people on the side.”

“Huh.” Stan nodded, considering that.

“What, you’re judging me?” Valencia questioned defensively, clutching the plastic packet to her chest.

“Like hell I am.” Stan shook his head. “You should’ve seen some of the stuff I did in Columbia. I’m not fit to judge anything, after the things that I’ve done.”

“Yes, well, I’m sure we’d all rather be ‘pug smuggling’, but the world doesn’t work like that.” Valencia shrugged. “And if I sell this baggie, that’s $500 less I’ve got to pay back down the track.”

“How much do you still have to pay off?” Stan asked, sipping his beer.

“So much.” Valencia shook her head, and reached for the tequila again, topping herself up. “Had to get my little brother into a good school across the country. Anything to get him out of here, and the kid’s got one hell of a head for numbers, a mathematical genius.”

“So, your kid brother’s a genius, huh?” Stan lowered his gaze to the counter, sounding slightly melancholy. “Sounds familiar.”

“I had to take out a loan to get him into college, and then a loan on top of that to get him out of New Mexico, and a loan to keep mom’s life support on – and it all just kept piling up.” Valencia sighed, and picked up the shot glass. “I couldn’t keep up with the hospital payments and the bank were gonna foreclose on the family house, and I didn’t know who else to turn to. My best friend’s cousin Luca was in the gang, he suggested they could take care of it – and they did.”

“And now you’ve gotta pay them back.” Stan surmised.
“And that’s pretty much a life sentence.” Valencia shot back her tequila and wrinkled her nose as she swallowed the liquor. “So, I work with what I’ve got. I’m making the best of a bad situation.”

“I’ve been in your shoes before.” Stan confessed. “Got in too deep with the wrong guys.”

“And what did you do?” Valencia watched him curiously.

“Eh, changed my name, moved to Albuquerque.” Stan grinned at her, shrugging his shoulders. “You can see how well that’s going for me.”

She reached forward and smacked him playfully. “No way, Pinington. If that is your real name.”

“Does it look like it’s my real name?” Stan laughed, gesturing to himself.

“No.” Valencia smiled, and looked Stan up and down, before she leaned across the counter, resting her arms on the wood, getting into Stan’s space. “And what is your real name?”

Her eyes were lidded, and Stan could smell her perfume, a subtle undertone beneath the alcohol that soaked the bar. Stan took in her lips, quirking up into an inviting smile, and her long eyelashes framing her dark eyes. A curly strand of hair fell forward onto her face and Stan reached forward to tuck it back behind her ear, testing the waters.

Her cheeks pinked, and she blinked up at Stan, not pulling back, remaining in his space, clearly interested.

Maybe Stan’s luck was picking up.

“My name is Stanley.”

“Hi Stanley.” Valencia murmured, smiling at him.

“Do you want to get out of here?” Stan asked, trying his luck.

Valencia looked over her shoulder towards the kitchen door and frowned. “I’ll get in trouble.”

“Feel like running away, changing your name maybe?” Stan joked, trying to bring back her smile. “I hear it’s all the rage in Albuquerque.”

Valencia pursed her lips, considering, before she looked over at Sally, who was studiously attempting to look away, leaving Val to her flirtatious encounter. Sal would cover for her.

“You got a fifty?” Valencia asked.

Stan checked his wallet, and pulled out his last fifty for her, slamming it down on the counter.

She swapped the fifty for a full bottle of tequila and stuffed the note in the till. Jumping over the counter, holding the tequila in one hand, she grabbed Stan’s hand with the other, and raced out the door.

“Let’s go, trouble!”

Grinning ear from ear, Stan felt his luck begin to change, and let Valencia pull him out of the bar, waving a jaunty farewell to Sally as they left.
“And so that’s why there’s millions to be earned in the vacuum industry. Because there’s a sucker born every minute, and you – you sell suckers to suckers.” Stan hiccupped, reclining on the hood of the Stanleymobile with his arm around Valencia’s tiny frame.

She was cuddled up to him, stroking his coarse chest hair through the top of Stan’s singlet, looking up at the stars in the clear night sky above them.

“Do you pick all your business ventures based on what pun ends up being the most ironic?” Valencia asked teasingly.

“What do you mean?” Stan took another swig from the bottle of tequila and looked down at her curiously.

“Well, there was the Total Sham, and then the Rip Off, and then those Con Easels – clever branding for a con artist. And now you’ve got the Stan Vac.” Valencia explained.

“Your point?” Stanley grunted.

Valencia put her hand on her hip and feigned a low, gruff voice, obviously mocking Stan. “Buy the Stan Vac, ladies and gentlemen. The Stan Vac – it really sucks!”

“You’d think it’d be too obvious.” Stan grinned. “But folks love a cheap laugh. You use humour, and it sells your product for you. Works like a charm, every time. The same way people bet on the horses, not because of the statistics or who doped who – but because Crazy Horse looks like he’ll run the fastest, and with a name like Crazy Horse why the hell shouldn’t he?”

“I’d say that isn’t true, but I lost 300 bucks betting on Eenie Weenis last year, because placing a bet on Eenie Weenis sounds like a good idea when you’re drunk at the races.” Valencia admitted with a laugh. “Just to be able to go to the counter – fifty dollars on Eenie Weenis, sir! I was dying laughing.”

“Heh.” Stanley passed the bottle of tequila over, and rested his hands behind his head, looking up at the sky. “You gotta stop and laugh, you know? Otherwise there’s no point to anything. But if you paste on a smile, things usually work themselves out.”

“Yeah, you look like the kind of guy who could smile his way out of anything.” Valencia smirked at Stan and reached up to run her fingers through his hair. It was growing long now, curling down below his neck. It might even be considered fashionable if it was on purpose, but this was a mullet of neglect. Things weren’t too peachy these days.

“Wish I could smile my way out of this mess.” Stan sighed, staring up at the twinkling stars. “I ain’t got no ETA on my goods, my supplier’s being watched by the Feds. I spent one of my last fifties on that overpriced bottle of Tequila you got there. I’ll barely have enough to cover rent, I’ve blown my deposit on the storage units, so even if my vacuums get here, I’ll have nowhere to put ‘em. This entire plan has gone to shit, and there’s nothin’ I can do about it.”

Valencia took a small sip from the bottle, as if reminded of its presence. She gave Stan a measuring look, before speaking.

“You know, I was gonna just keep taking your money. That fifty, whatever else you had. I’ve been overcharging you for your drinks since you got here. I was gonna take you for all there was in the vacuum industry and I thought it’d serve you right for being such an arrogant asshole. Gotta pay back my debt somehow, right?”

Stan looked intensely offended, readying to open his mouth to protest, but she cut him off.

“But, I didn’t – I’ve stopped now. Because I know you’re a good guy underneath all your bullshit, and … you don’t deserve that.” She placed her finger over Stan’s lips, hushing him. “I ain’t the type to kick a guy who’s hit rock bottom.”

Stan wavered over his outrage at the fact she’d been conning him into paying more for his drinks, torn between being vaguely impressed, and absolutely mortified. For a moment he thought Valencia was one of the only good things he had going for him – but to find out she’d been conning him – Stan wasn’t sure whether he should be finding that as romantic as he was.

Though really, Valencia charging him more than she should have been for his drinks wasn’t why he was in the situation he was right now. It was because his investment with Tony wasn’t paying off like he’d imagined, the delayed shipment spiralling into a relay of bad financial decisions.

Paying a little extra for a beer wasn’t what did him in, and he couldn’t hold it against her for being an opportunist. Maybe he would have been that petty if he didn’t have a thing for Val, but Stan would have done the same thing if he was working the bar. Gotta take a slice of the profits somehow.

Shaking off his conflicted feelings, he managed a resigned laugh, looking down at his chest.

“I thought I hit rock bottom before, but it just keeps coming for me. If I don’t get lucky soon I’m gonna have to swallow what’s left of my dignity and get a real job – and I ain’t the kind of guy who works well being anything but my own boss.” Stan mused bitterly.

“Bosses suck.” Valencia muttered, taking another sip from the bottle, drumming her fingers against the glass.

“Yeah, your boss especially.” Stan remarked.

Valencia seemed to be thinking, the cogs turning in her brain as she tapped her nails against the bottle, mulling her options over.

“Hey, did you mean what you said at the bar?” Valencia finally spoke up. “About punching my boss?”

“Why, d’you want us to go back there?” Stanley turned on his side to look at Valencia curiously, wondering what she was planning. “Cos I’m gonna need a lot more tequila before that starts to sound like a good idea.”

“No, I just mean – do you know how? How to punch? How to fight?” She probed, watching Stan curiously.

“I did boxing lessons growing up, and since then I’ve, uh, embellished upon that.” Stan scratched his stubble, delicately wording the fact that he learned to fight dirty. “Why’re you asking?”

“Well.” Valencia stroked through Stan’s hair slowly, her eyes bright with ideas. “If you’re confident you can fight good, I think I just might know a way I can make sure you get your money back. We could both make a bit of money, and this way we could both stand a chance at getting our lives back on track. What do you say?”
“Will I have to work for your shitty boss?” Stan asked with trepidation, aware of how these things usually worked.

Valencia set the tequila bottle to the side and swung her leg over Stan, clambering on top of him, her curly hair draping down between them, falling to one side of her face. The stars twinkled above her, and Stan saw her dark eyes sparkle as her lips curved into a smile.

“You can be your own boss, baby.”

Stan liked the sound of that.

“Look like you don’t know what you’re doing.” Valencia hissed at him as she walked through the crowd, holding onto Stan’s arm. “Look weak. Weaker! Stick your belly out.”

“For once, it’s out as far as it goes. Lay off sugar, this isn’t my first hustle.” Stan muttered back, striding through the throng of people, heading to the organiser’s table at the back. “I know what I’m doing.”

“You better.” Valencia demanded. “I’m putting $50 on you in the first round, so you’d better get us a win. Show these luchadores up, make sure they notice you.”

“You’re so jumped up, it’s like you want to be in that ring.” Stan commented, amused by her focused, jumpy demeanour. “Maybe if you weren’t so tiny.”

“If I thought I stood a chance, hell yes I’d be in there.” Valencia nodded, eyeing off the crowd. “Got a lot of anger I could work out on some assholes in spandex capes.”

“Remind me not to get on your bad side.” Stan smirked at her, and she quirked her brow at him.

“You don’t want to be.” She elbowed Stan and pushed him forward. “There, go sign up.”

Shoved to the front of the queue, Stan scratched his stubble, made sure to stick his stomach out, and squinted at the sign-up sheet, raising his hand. “Uh, is this where you sign up for matches?”

The men behind the table took in Stan’s beer stained shirt, his portly belly, his unkempt demeanour and scoffed at him.

“This is where Luchadores sign up for matches, we don’t have a sign-up sheet for Vagabundo, try the shelter down the road.” One man sneered, obviously not impressed.

The man sitting beside him reached his hand out and grabbed the other man on the shoulder. “Miguel, don’t be rude to our guest. Of course, you can sign up hombre, you like the Lucha Libre buddy? You ever fight before?”

“Once or twice.” Stan understated bluntly. “Mostly watched the wrestling on TV back in the day.”

“Oh yeah? Well, this ain’t like the Lucha Libre you see on the television. This is no holds barred, you get me amigo? Real underground shit.” The man continued to explain conspiratorially. “But if you think you can take a hit and go a few rounds, then sign up hombre, be my guest! You just sign this waver here, and you’re sweet.”

Stan hunched over the clipboard, grabbing it and signed his name, deliberately gripping the pen wrong to con these clowns into thinking he was an idiot. It must have been working, judging by the shit eating grin on their faces.

“Nice one amigo. You’re in the game, we’ll put you in a round. Hey, good luck bro – I’ll be betting on you!” The man said as he accepted the clipboard back, clapping Stan on the shoulder and ushering him to the side.

Stan could hear him talking in Spanish to his buddy sitting beside him, and as he walked away he grinned, knowing his con had worked.

“Oye, apuesto $20 que baja en los primeros dos minutos.”

“Apuesto, los primeros 30 segundos.”

Stan could hear their hushed laughter and he knew by the end of the night, he’d be the one who was laughing.

After all, this wasn’t his first rodeo.

---

Squaring up against one of the regulars, Stan stood opposite the man in the ring, wearing his singlet and boxing shorts. He didn’t have gloves, couldn’t afford them, so he’d probably take a few scrapes the first few rounds, but he’d bounce back. It wasn’t like his knuckles haven’t seen a few scrapes before.

The crowd was cheering for the other guy, he must have been a local. He wore shiny tighty whities and a matching mask, red and white decorating his costume. The masks and costumes weren’t mandatory, after all, this was freestyle fighting. You got all types here, luchadores, karate kids, capoeira dancers, you name it – so Stan doubted they’d mind too much if he didn’t stick to one set of rules, or any set of rules really.

There was only one rule that mattered to Stan in a fight, and that was to fight dirty. It wasn’t the most honourable or considerate thing to do, but if your choices were to get beat down fighting honourably like a chump, or to fight back with all you got, rules be damned, you’d be choosing the latter. No question, every time.

Word had spread that Stan would be going a round, and he made sure to deliberately look like an unappealing bet. He tripped over his shoe laces, spent a good five minutes picking a wedgie in front of the punters, and did his best to look like a down on his luck bum.

He did his best not to feel like it too.

He was used to people underestimating him, looking down on him all his life. He was used to being treated like second best, subpar – now for once in his life that underestimation was working in his favour. He didn’t like how it felt, but he’d suck it up, knowing that he’d be turning the tables soon enough.
The guy who passed as a referee stood in the middle of the ring, MC-ing the fight. He wore the classic white and black striped ref’s jersey, it had the logo of the local little league football team on the back so Stan could tell this was a moonlight gig for the guy, that, or he picked the jersey up at Goodwill. He held his hands up, psyching up the crowd.

“Ladies and gentlemen, Punters and Puntees– in our first match we have home grown fan favourite, El Diablo Inferno himself! Going up against out of towner sign up – uhh, what was your name again –” The MC paused, whispering at Stanley.

“Stan.” Stan replied.

“No, your wrestling name dumbass.” The MC looked at Stanley, exasperated.

“Yeah, I don’t have one of those.” Stan shifted on his feet, looking across the ring at his opponent, who was waving his hands at the crowd, courting their applause.

“Well make one up, dipshit.” The MC urged him. “I don’t get paid to write the stage names here. You think of something.”

“Uh…” Stanley mulled it over, looking around the ring at the expectant faces looking up at him. They wanted entertainment, drama, theatre – as much as it was essentially what they were there for, they didn’t just want to see two guys pummel each other bloody. They wanted a story.

Stan considered reassuming one of his old aliases, wondering if 8 Ball Alcatraz would be a decent cover, or if someone would recognise him. He mentally carded through all of his various identities over the years, and, recognising the impatience of the crowd, Stanley finally settled on one that surprised him.

“Stan-O-War.” Stanley grunted at the MC. “Call me that.”

Turning back to the crowd with all the dramatic flair the role entailed, the MC finished his introduction.

“Facing up against newcomer and first timer here at the underground fighting scene – the STAN-O-WAR!”

The name startled a few claps out of the crowd, despite their apparent loyalty. It had just enough dramatic flair to get people interested, which wasn’t the move Stan intended to make, honestly, because if the crowd were rooting for him and not against him that’d be less money for Valencia to rake in when everyone bet he’d lose.

He should have gone with a name like ‘The Tax Collector’ if he wanted everyone to hate him. Rookie move. He hoped those last minute bets wouldn’t swindle Valencia too bad.

“No let’s have a good clean fight gentleman.” The MC said with a straight face, before he broke, chuckling. “I’m just kidding – THIS IS NO HOLDS BARRED UNDERGROUND FIGHT NIGHT! Let the match BEGIN!”

The ref swung out of the ring, sliding under the ropes, and Stan was left with his opponent, El Diablo. Kind of a cliched fighting name, all things considered. He knew the guy was trying to come off as intimidating, but a name like El Diablo just had Stan thinking of his car – and this joker was making a mockery of his baby’s good name.

Stan watched the guy still preening for the crowd and figured El Diablo wasn’t working with much in the brains department. Stan couldn’t talk, neither was he academically speaking – at least that’s what all his teachers said, but he did have one thing that El Diablo didn’t have – street smarts and tonnes of it.

While El Diablo was facing the other way, Stan stepped in behind him swiftly, and threw a sharp punch to the guy’s kidneys, winding him. He doubled over, wheezing. The crowd booed, and Stan smirked, stepping back holding his fists up, waiting for El Diablo’s move.

The luchadore turned around and growled, a feral noise that no doubt was intended to be intimidating. Stan had seen more intimidating raccoons in the dumpster if he was being honest, but he had to give the guy credit for showmanship. The crowd was eating it up, cheering for El Diablo.

Stan had to let him get a few hits in, so it looked like the sucker was winning. El Diablo swung at Stan, and Stanley blocked it, but staggered back, pretending the hit had done some damage. El Diablo came in again with another wild, theatrical swing, and Stanley stumbled, letting El Diablo back him up against the ropes.

The crowd were cheering, some of them certain that this would be a quick fight.

They weren’t wrong.

Just when El Diablo had Stan backed up against the ropes, Stan struck. Clean precise punches, one two, to El Diablo’s solar plexus. Winded by those swift powerful punches to his gut, El Diablo was the one staggering back now. He put his hands down to cover his gut, but Stan boxed him around the ears, more quick, jarring punches, one two three four, that would have had El Diablo’s teeth rattling in his jaw. El Diablo hunched over, protecting his head, but that impeded his vision, and Stan used that opportunity to sweep El Diablo’s legs out from under him, tipping him off balance.

El Diablo fell, but landed on his knee, glaring up at Stan from behind his shiny red and white mask. Stan cracked his knuckles, casting a shadow over the luchadore, and he lived for the look in El Diablo’s eyes when he realised he underestimated Stan.

“You want some more?” Stan asked, readying his hands in front of him for whatever move would come next from the desperate wrestler.

El Diablo rose to stand swiftly, his hands swinging out to balance him as he stood, and the moment his hands swung back, Stan seized his opening and clocked him in the jaw, one smooth uppercut, momentum swinging El Diablo around on the balls of his feet to face the audience, before he crumpled forward on the floor of the ring.

The crowd was silent, watching with bated breath as the ref climbed into the ring. He crouched down beside El Diablo, checked his breathing. The guy was unconscious, that last knockout punch Stan delivered writing him off for the night.

The ref stood up and crossed his arms over his chest. El Diablo was down for the count. He strode across the ring and grabbed Stan’s wrist, swinging it up into the air, to the sporadic applause of the crowd, heralding the victor.

Stan had won.

He could see the dawning enthusiasm on the faces of the crowd, the faces that didn’t bet against him, that was.

Over by the sign ups table, Stan could see the guy who signed him up swearing and throwing his clipboard off the table, Miguel pointing and laughing at his colleague. He could see other people screwing up their betting papers in their hands, their expressions furious.
He looked through the crowd over to the bookies table, searching for the face in the crowd that he needed to see.

And there she was, Valencia, over by the bookies table, collecting their winnings as swiftly as she could, stuffing cash into her handbag.

The crowd was cheering now, a steadily building chant, starting slow but kicking off as more people conceptualised what just happened. Stan had levelled their hometown hero in mere minutes, felling their goliath with his plucky resurgence. Everyone loved an underdog, and soon they were all shouting.

“STAN-O-WAR! STAN-O-WAR! STAN-O-WAR!”

Stan couldn’t help the grin that quirked up the edges of his lips, watching the fervour spread through the crowd, the ref still holding his hand up, courting the applause.

Money safely secured, Valencia turned around from the bookies table, and looked up at Stan, standing sweaty and triumphant in the spotlight, the crowd going wild for him.

Stan caught her eye, and his smile stretched wider, genuine elation colouring his face.

Valencia couldn’t help but smile back.

After all, this was her ticket out of here.

Fighting as Stan-O-War was everything Stanley didn’t know he wanted.

He’d go out there, night after night, with the crowd cheering his name.

His every success was lauded, his setbacks and knockdowns were booed, the crowd was rooting for him, every single night he fought.

Their plan to work the hustle metered out when Stanley accidentally got the crowd falling in love with his underdog boxer angle, but Valencia didn’t let that stop her from swinging a buck. She made deals with the bookies and ran in for percentages should Stan win a match.

She became his agent in a way, taking care of the finances for him, while he took care of the opposition. And slowly but surely, they were reeling the money in.

Staying back late in the ring one night, after the quarter finals of this particular underground wrestling ring’s circuit, Stanley was sitting on one of the folding chairs situated around the empty ring, while Valencia sat cross legged on the floor, organising their winnings from the evening.

“That was some fight, I tell ya.” Stanley remarked, flexing his fingers, assessing the damage to his knuckles. “Almost thought he had me there for that last minute.”

Valencia huffed a laugh, before looking up at Stanley, a knowing, vaguely amused glance. “No, you didn’t.”
“Hey, the crowd did.” Stan protested.

“That’s all part of the theatre. That’s what wrestling is. The crowd think you were on the ropes because that’s what keeps them hooked, the story, but I was watching your technique. You knew exactly what you were doing, all the way through.” Valencia observed.

“So, you were watching me, huh?” Stan asked, trying to sound nonchalant.

Valencia shrugged her shoulders and went back to counting their money.

“You know a lot about wrestling then?” Stanley probed, curious.

“My dad was a boxer, like you.” She divulged, still focused on their funds. “For all the good it did him.”

“What do you mean?” Stanley leaned forward, resting his elbows on his knees, looking at Valencia as she spoke.

“He’s dead.” Valencia said shortly. “Heart attack.”

“Oh.” Stan wavered awkwardly, not knowing what to say. “Uh – sorry? I –”

“Don’t.” Valencia cut him off.

“Okay…” Stan scratched the back of his neck, before changing the topic. “So how did we do?”

“Pretty good.” Valencia split the money into even piles and began rolling the cash up with elastic bands. “On top of the bets we’re making, the cut we get from the bookies, plus your participation fee, we’re doing alright. 600 from tonight, split in half is 300 for each of us. We’d make more money if you were throwing fights, but you don’t wanna do that.”

“600 ain’t bad for one night though. That’s more than I’d make in a week selling fancy vacuums to rich idiots.”

“Technically, it’s 300.” Valencia passed him his pile of cash, and put her own pile in her handbag, sealing it away.

“Ya know, since I’m the one taking all the knocks, maybe we should think of more of a seventy, thirty split?” Stan suggested gamely, side-eying Valencia to see if she’d budge.

The look she gave him seemed pretty unmoved.

“Sixty fourty?” Stan tried, grinning.

“Fifty fifty.” Valencia insisted. “You’re lucky I don’t tax you. Stan Tax, for every time you open your mouth.”

“Aw, come on doll, you know I’m just trying it on.” Stan laughed, as she raised her tiny fist, aiming to intimidate. “Fifty five, fourty five?”

“If I get the fifty five.” Valencia raised her chin.

“This isn’t a ladies first sort of arrangement, sweet cheeks.” Stan joked, teasing her now.

“You want some more bruises, Stan-O-War?” She thumped him on his knee, and he winced, bringing his hands down to cover his legs.
“Ow! Hey, go easy on the goods. I’ve taken enough of a beating tonight.”

Valencia looked over his bloodied knuckles, and tsked, realising the truth of Stan’s statement. She grabbed his hand and pulled it over to her.

“We’ve gotta get you some boxing gloves or something.” She grabbed the bandage tape from her handbag, and begun pulling strips of it off the roll, breaking the tape with her teeth. "Can’t keep taping you up like this.”

“Eh, I bounce back.” Stan shrugged, and watched her delicately wrap his injuries, looking after him.

“You won’t say that when you’re an old man with arthritis everywhere.” Valencia warned him, as she continued to dress his injuries. “You’ll be complaining every time you open a jam jar.”

“You know this from experience, do you?” Stan asked, flexing his fingers now they were wrapped properly.

“I told you, my dad was a boxer.” Stan’s expression must have been too curious for her liking, so Valencia swiftly changed the subject. “You know, Sal’s aunty has an awesome job. She makes thousands of bucks a pop and all she does is stay at home breeding tonnes of little dogs. I’d wanna do that. Sell puppies to rich people. But rich people don’t want cute dogs, they want the dogs with ugly faces and wrinkled butts who can’t breathe right. Which explains why they’re triple the price.”

“Huh.” Stanley sat back in his chair, watching her continue to ramble.

While she spoke, he looked over his hands, garnished with her care, and he put the roll of cash she passed him into the pocket of his shorts. She was still talking, and Stan was pretending to listen, but he was drifting off in his own head somewhat.

Looking around the boxing ring, with the seats scattered every which way now the crowds were gone, Stan felt oddly at peace with himself. He couldn’t have foreseen himself doing something like this, but now that he was doing it, with the crowds shouting out his name, cheering for him, he couldn’t see himself doing anything else.

He felt like professional boxer was one of the dream jobs he would have wished about doing when he was a kid, if the notion wasn’t so thoroughly tied up in what his dad thought about him. It was only now that he was thousands of miles away from his father that he even considered that his own potential as a boxer would be something he could profit from, something that could bring him satisfaction, even if his efforts didn’t satisfy his Pa.

When he took boxing lessons as a kid, his perception of his talents tied in with his own inadequacies, the inevitable fear of disappointing his father making it harder to excel. Those high expectations were one of the many things that would tear Stanley down from aiming higher, from sticking to something he could believe he was good at.

It was only when those high expectations became low expectations, dismissive ‘he’ll never make it’ blunt comments delivered within Stanley’s hearing range, lacking any consideration for his feelings, that Stanley discovered his drive to prove everyone wrong about him.

However, proving everyone wrong wasn’t the same as proving his father wrong. Even now he was succeeding, the crowds cheering his name, he never once pictured what it would be like to see his father in the audience, Filbrick’s stern scowl tracking Stan’s every fumble.
That’d be a sure-fire way to choke on a swing, imagining old Filbrick staring up at him. Yeesh. Stan staunchly avoided the thought of it.

Boxing here meant proving something to himself, that he was good for something, that he wasn’t a screw up, that he had talents. And it was hard enough proving that to himself, he didn’t even want to begin to imagine doing this to prove himself to his father. He’d never measure up.

But if what he was doing here was good enough for the crowds that were cheering his name, good enough for Valencia, then it was good enough for him.

And that’s where this odd sense of peace came from.

Finally, Stan felt like he was good at something.

He was a boxer, in an underground fighting community, and he’d lasted all this way up until the quarter finals. He just had three more fights to go, and right now he was standing a genuine chance at winning the title.

Stan wanted that. He wanted that recognition. He wanted to be the best.

Though it had started as a hustle, Stan became genuinely invested in this tournament and he wanted to win.

He might even get to.

Valencia was watching Stan’s expression as he zoned out through various shades of wistfulness. She could tell he wasn’t listening to her and for the past minute she’d been talking about hot dogs wearing collars and selling them as a gimmick just to see if that would pique Stan’s interest, but he was miles away.

“Hey.” Valencia reached out and pushed Stan’s leg to draw him out of his introspection. He blinked down at her, his cheeks tinting a bashful pink, embarrassed to be caught zoning off, but Valencia didn’t care.

Let him have his moment, she thought. No point doing this if he wasn’t going to enjoy it.

With Stanley’s attention on her now, she looped her handbag over her arm and stood up, holding her hand out for him. “Walk me home?”

“Yes, let me just shower all this sweat off and get my jacket.” Stan agreed, and walked into the locker rooms to fetch his bomber jacket and put his stuff away.

Valencia waited for Stanley in the dimly lit boxing ring, staring around at the discarded fan made posters that scattered the floor, finding them amusing.

One poster was a picture of a battleship, with Stan’s face and boxing gloves drawn onto it. It was pretty cute, and reasonably well made. Valencia walked over to pick up the poster, thinking Stan would like to take it home with him to keep as a trophy.

As she bent down to pick up the poster, a chill went down her spine about the same time that someone from across the room let out a low appreciative whistle.

She stood up sharply, and looked around the room, to see a man standing in the shadows by the entrance to the ring, smoking a cigarette. He didn’t move, leaning on the wall there, he just watched her, sucking on his cigarette, the tip burning brightly in the dark.
“Don’t mind me chica, I’m just admiring the view.” The man said smoothly, and Valencia wrinkled her nose, disliking him immediately.

“Admire something else. The view isn’t interested.” Valencia shot back, crossing her arms.

“I can tell you got fire, muchacha. I’ll give you that much.” He straightened up and kicked off the wall, moving forward, still draped in shadow. “That tattoo you got tells me more. Tells me that you’ll know where I can find your boss.”

Valencia tensed. “How do you know my boss?”

She narrowed her eyes, trying to pick the features of the man in the shadows.

He continued to stride forward and flicked his cigarette to the ground, grinding it with his shoe to put it out, unmasked from the shadows now.

This man only slightly resembled Damien but it was enough that Valencia took his claims of relation seriously. The man had dirty black shoulder length hair, a thick handlebar moustache, and a scar sliced down over his left eye. His right eye glinted sinister, shining in the low leftover light from the ring, and tattoos crept up from under his shirt collar, climbing up his neck.

Valencia recognised the winged one-eyed triangle woven into the ink on his neck, and she knew instantly that this guy, whoever he was, was initiated into the gang. He wasn’t bullshitting. He was bad news.

“I’ve known him since he was six, muchacha. He’ll be happy to see me.” The man grinned and bared a gold capped tooth and several far grimier dentures beside it in the grin. “So, let’s you and me go find Damien, hmm?”

Valencia took a cautious step back, for a moment thinking to call for Stanley, to get away from this creep, but if he really knew Damien, she’d get in big trouble if she didn’t take him to him. There was an order, a hierarchy to these sorts of things. She wouldn’t get in trouble if she played by their rules.

She didn’t want to get Stanley involved in Evil Eye business any more than she wanted to be involved with it, but she was already entrenched in the gang, it was etched into her skin.

Valencia nodded, agreeing to take him to her boss. “Alright. What’ll I tell him you’re here for?”

“You tell him his Cousin Rico is back from Columbia.”

Rico grinned, the smile not reaching his eyes.

“And I’m planning to stay for a while.”

When Stan came out of the locker rooms, Valencia was nowhere to be seen. He worried for her for a moment, before shrugging that anxiety off.

Valencia was a tough chick, she probably just got tired of waiting for him. She didn’t need Stan to walk her home, the only time she ever asked him to was if she wanted something more from him when they got there. Hence why he doubled back for the shower.

She must have changed her mind or something.

Stan hefted his bag up on his shoulder and strode out through the empty boxing ring, stepping on the posters that littered the floor in his haste to leave, crunching them underfoot. He was determined not to let her departure spoil his mood, but introspection dawdled where he’d rather outpace it.

Valencia was complicated. It was hard to tell what she wanted from Stan.

If only she could keep it simple. Stan liked simple. He liked simple girls, but Valencia was not a simple girl.

Sometimes, it seemed like she wanted him, and Stanley was all for that if it meant more good times with her. Other times it seemed like she only wanted him as a friend, or as a stooge to help fill her pockets. She did try to overcharge him from day one and while Stan could empathise with her story, he was less understanding when it came to someone else trying to bleed him dry. You had to draw the line somewhere.

So, Stan played nice with her and walked her home when she asked and split his winnings with her, but he wasn’t about to let her take him for a ride again. No sir, Stanley Pines was a business man and rule number one of the business was to always look out for number one.

Really, Stan had no idea why he was looking out for Val, like she was his number two. They weren’t together, they weren’t even an item. They just had this strange, undefinable thing. Like kindred spirits, maybe.

They’d been together once or twice, brief, drunken tummles in the back seat of Stan’s car, or in his motel room, mostly to pass the time. They didn’t have that much in common, in terms of long term desires. Their personalities were similar, and Stan admired her knack for turning a buck, just as she admired his cunning, finding him funny. Stan didn’t mind being found funny, but he was no joke, and he felt like he needed to make that clear to her.

She couldn’t just abandon him when it suited her, and he’d had it up to here with her taking such a big cut of his winnings. Next time he saw her he was taking her down to 80/20… okay maybe 60/40…

The more Stan thought about it, the less disparate their shares in his winnings became, until he was right back at 55/45, and even that number wasn’t holding up to his own internal scrutiny.

He’d never seen himself giving this much up for someone else. He wasn’t even this generous with his ex-wife Marylin (he certainly took her for all she had in the divorce). He wanted to know what it was about Valencia that had Stan extend so much for her. Why was he doing it?

“Can’t keep taping you up like this.”

“You knew exactly what you were doing.”

“You can be your own boss, baby.”
Stan’s cheeks were inordinately pink in the balmy night air and he hefted his bag over his shoulder, blaming the warm feeling in his chest on the burrito he had before the match.

Thinking on Valencia wasn’t giving him the simple answers he needed about what to do with this arrangement they had going. He wasn’t getting a yes or no answer from this introspection, he was just getting a better idea of how long she’d had him by the deep-and-meaningfuls for.

How long had he been so weak for her like this?

“Shots are five bucks each. The second one’s for you.”

“You said you had a shitty day too.”

Stan sure was glad no one was out here with him. He felt like his face was swiftly becoming some sort of space heater.

Okay, so maybe he had a soft spot for the girl. She was nice to him, laughed at his jokes and liked his hair. They had some good times together. That didn’t mean things were going anywhere between them.

Stan wasn’t the commitment type, he wasn’t boyfriend or even marriage material. Marylin made sure he knew that for a fact.

The best he could be for Valencia was an amateur boxer, and even if he won all the way up to the finals, he knew that wouldn’t be good enough. It wouldn’t be good enough financially for the both of them, it wouldn’t get her out of debt to the mob, it wouldn’t get him back on track with his business. It just wouldn’t be what Stan wanted it to be. It wouldn’t be good enough.

It never was. He never was.

But maybe if he made it to the finals, if he won that last match, if he used the fights as a springboard for his momentum, things would finally start going Stan’s way.

His luck had to change sometime and what better time than now? He had a fresh start, the crowds were screaming his name, and for the time being he had a gal like Val on his arm, taping him up after every fight, taking care of him in a way that felt foreign and impossible for Stan to get used to.

Things had to go Stan’s way. They just had to.

Nodding to the motel manager at the front counter, despite how the clerk ignored him, studiously looking away, Stan walked along the rows of rooms at the Dead End Flats motel until he reached his motel room, fiddling with his room keys. Unlocking the door, Stanley threw his bag on the bed, and closed the door behind him, rubbing his eyes, sighing.

Too much thinking tonight, fighting and thinking and fighting with himself. Maybe it was for the best that Valencia wasn’t here. Stan was tired.

At least since he was alone, he could get some proper sleep.

Wiping his hand down his face, he blinked and realised as his eyes opened that he wasn’t alone in the room.

“Hello, Alcatraz.”

Stan jumped back in alarm, recognising the man who was leaning against the bathroom doorframe, arms crossed nonchalantly, watching him through his one good eye.

“R-Rico!” Stan stuttered, recognizing his old cell mate instantly. He pasted on a fake smile, aiming for jovial. “What’re you doing here? I thought you were back in Columbia.”

“You mean back in jail?” Rico tilted his head, watching the smile drop from Stan’s face. “No, Andrew, I got out, just like you did. Or maybe not exactly like you did, because I didn’t turn on my fellow crew members and run squealing to the lawyers to get out. I had to get out the old-fashioned way.”

“By uh… serving your time?” Stan guessed, hoping for the best, that Rico had got out as a changed man, a non-violent changed man ideally.

“No. By blowing up the prison.” Rico responded bluntly, dashing Stan’s hopes. “Dynamite, I find, is more effective than good behaviour. I got contacts. People on the outside who could help me rejoin society on my terms. So, a few people had to die? I was dying on the inside too, away from my hard earned cash. And fancy that, when I jailbreak my way out of lockup to go check on our money, what do I find?”

“Uh…” Stan’s eyes darted between Rico’s stony glare and the door, contemplating making a run for it.

“I find sweet fuck all, is what I find. Someone hightailed it with all the dough.”

“Jorge’s sister got to it after all, did she?” Stan attempted jovially, trying to oust the blame onto her, like he had back in prison. “Can’t say I blame her, cocaine is one hell of a drug, heh heh.”

“Jorge’s sister is rotting in the ground right now.” Rico divulged sharply. As he spoke, he pulled something from his pocket, something metallic that glinted in the low light of the motel room. “And if you don’t tell me where my money is right now, you’re next.”

“Woah woah woah. Hey that’s –” Stan put his hands up, backing up into the door as Rico stalked across the room towards him. “Just calm down Rico, put the knife away. We can talk about this –“

Rico hurtled across the room and stabbed his knife into the wood of Stan’s hotel room door, boxing him in with his arms. Stan shrunk back against the wood, feeling the tickle of his hair tumbling down onto his shoulder. Rico had sliced a lock off with his wild stab.

Leaning in, Rico whispered sinisterly in Stan’s ear. “Where’s my money, Stan-O-War?”

“I can get you your money back. I can –“ Stan insisted, scared shitless. “I can –“

“What do you mean, back? Where is it?” Rico interrogated, his good eye narrowing into a venomous slit. “Did you spend it all? Is that what you did?”

“I can get you it back Rico – I – don’t kill me – I swear I’ll –“ Stan pleaded, holding his hands up in front of him, sweating anxiously.

“Kill you?” Rico leaned back and barked out a laugh. “I’m not going to kill you, hombre. If I kill you, who’ll pay me my money back? No, I’m not going to kill you, but I am going to make you suffer.”

Stan’s eyes darted between the knife still embedded in the wood above his head, and Rico’s gleaming eye.
“You’ll pay me my money back. Every single cent. With interest.” Rico asserted. “You’ll be paying me back until the day you die, Alcatraz. And then some.”

Yanking his knife out of the door, Rico kicked Stanley into the middle of his motel room, gesturing at Stan’s suitcase. “Give me what’s left of the money, right now, and anything else you have on you.”

Stan thought about trying to conceal the $300 in his shorts pocket, but he didn’t put it past Rico to shank him if he discovered the hidden money, so reluctantly he pulled out the roll of cash from his pocket and threw it on the bed. Walking slowly, Rico’s knife still trained on him, he crouched down in front of his suitcase, opened up all the little zippers, and deposited the last of the drug money on the motel bedspread as well.

It made a pitiful pile, considering the cash stash had once been 8000 dollars.

“There, that’s everything.” Stan admitted, looking at the pile on the bed sadly. There went his fresh start, though it wasn’t much of one, now that his old life had caught up with him. Would he never be free of the mistakes of his past?

“That’s everything? It’s pathetic. $8000 you had, and you blew it all, and for what?” Rico walked past Stanley and grabbed a handful of the crumpled cash. “You’re still living in the same shitty motels, driving the same shitty car, selling the same shitty crap you’ve always been. You could have gone anywhere with that cash, gone underground. Instead, it took me one month to track you down. And you call yourself a criminal.”

“I’m not a criminal.” Stanley said quietly, chewing the inside of his cheek to stop himself from saying more. “Not here anyway.”

Rico shook his head at Stanley, as he scooped the cash up from the bed, snapping the elastic band around the whole lot and stuffing it in his trouser pockets.

“Not anymore. You think you can make the kind of cash I want from you with a simple 9-5. No one will hire you, you’re unskilled, you got no papers, you’ve been on the wrong side of the law for too long and you won’t get shit done going by 8 Ball Alcatraz, or Steve Pinington, or whatever bullshit identity you’re picking up. You’re a mediocre criminal, sure, but believe me, you’ll be a criminal for life, hombre.”

Having taken what he wanted, Rico shoved past Stanley, and opened the motel room door, pausing to speak before he left.

“Yo, Alcatraz. Don’t even think about driving on out of here after I go. You’re not off the hook yet, I own you now, you dig?”

Stan didn’t respond, still sitting on the floor next to his upended suitcase, staring at the bedspread where his money had piled up, everything he had to his name, and now it was gone.

Rico continued speaking, clearly wanting some acknowledgement from Stanley.

“The only reason I haven’t slashed your tires yet is because I’ve got a job I need you to do tomorrow. Got to drop off a cousin of mine in the desert, you get me?” Rico watched Stanley, growing impatient with his lingering apathy. “You ain’t going nowhere anyway. You don’t got the stones to up and leave.”
“You sure about that?” Stanley mumbled under his breath, itching to prove Rico wrong.

“You may be a hotshot boxer in the kiddie leagues now, but I know I’ve got you by the balls.” Rico sneered, and twirled his knife around, flipping it between his fingers as he watched Stan. “I’ve got collateral.”

“What is?” Stan questioned bitterly, utterly convinced that Rico had just taken everything he possibly could take from him anyway. What was left for Rico to hold over his head? What could he possibly have over him now that would stop Stanley from skipping town and getting as far away from Rico as he could?

“You’ll want to stick around town.” Rico grinned at Stanley. “Or who knows what will happen to that girl of yours. The one with the tattoo.”

Stan’s eyes widened and his stomach flipped as he realised the reason Valencia wasn’t waiting at the boxing ring for him wasn’t because she’d decided she’d grown tired of his mullet but because Rico had got to her first. He stood, and looked up at Rico now, snapping out of his dour disassociation, his worry written plain all over his face.

Rico tipped his knife, like a metallic salute at Stan as he left.

“See you tomorrow, Alcatraz.”

The door closed resolutely behind him, and Stanley took a step forward to chase Rico, and then thought better of it. Chasing after the guy was a one way ticket to stab-town.

He staggered back and sat on the bed, the squeaky springs reminding him of exactly what kind of dump he was currently residing in.

He thought his life had hit rock bottom before.

Boy, was he wrong.

He didn’t get much sleep that night.

Stanley didn’t leave his motel room for two days after that encounter. It was a miracle no one came looking for him, but he had no doubt that Rico’s goons knew he was still there. He knew he was being watched.

Still, Stan couldn’t bring himself to leave, he couldn’t dredge himself up out of the morass of self-hating, self-blaming, ruminating he was stewing in.

He spent those days agonising over his situation, painfully reminiscing about how it used to be when he worked for Rico, of situations he never wanted to go back to. He thought he could be his own boss now, and he wanted that more than anything, but fate had him right back under the gangster’s thumb again, and it was a miserable place to be.

He assessed his situation from every angle, looking for a way out, some way to get rid of Rico, to get rid of this shitty state of affairs, and get out of dodge while he still could, but every time he thought about leaving, his mind drifted back to Val.

“I know you’re a good guy and you don’t deserve that.”

Stan remembered the feeling of her finger on his lips, his own hand coming up to linger, prolong the sensation, guilt overwhelming him. He looked down at the bandages taped around his hand and his stomach churned noxiously.

“I ain’t the type to kick a guy who’s hit rock bottom.”

If he left now, he’d be leaving Valencia to Rico’s tender mercies, and from experience Stan knew that mercy wasn’t something Rico had a lot of. As much as he wanted to cut and run, he couldn’t leave Val to deal with this mess, his mess, for him. If he ditched he knew Rico would make Val pay.

Stan looked out the window to his El Diablo parked outside, peeling the curtains back a centimetre. Leaving was INCREDIBLY tempting.

But he couldn’t leave until he knew Val was alright.

Shutting the curtains tight, Stan flipped through his bag, pulling out a stolen battered coaster from the bar, and walked back to his motel bed, sitting on the edge, near the side table, pulling the telephone towards him. He dialled the number on the back of the coaster, anxiety doing backflips in his stomach all the while.

Twirling the curly phone cord around his finger, Stan listened to the dial tone fretfully, waiting for someone on the other end to pick up.

Finally, someone answered.

“Ojo de la Fortuna. This is Sal speaking.”

“Hey, Sally, listen.” Stan hunched over the phone, his forehead still dewy with sweat, staving off the nausea that was battling with his anxiety, the two fighting a cage match in his stomach. “Is Val there? Have you seen her? Tell me she’s there.”

“Mr Pinington?” Sal questioned loudly, and Stan smacked his forehead, cursing under his breath. Way to give the game away, Sal.

“Oh, uh…” Sal sounded nervous, and tried her best to pretend, but Sal wasn’t a brilliant liar. “Um, grandma, why are you calling me at work?”

Stan pinched the bridge of his nose, gritting his teeth, before he spoke. “Okay, just yes or no answers Sal. Where is Valencia? Is she there?”

“No.” Sal said, the fear evident in her tone.

“No.” Sal repeated, her voice wavering slightly.

“Is she alive?” Stan asked desperately, clutching onto the phone.
“She’s –“ Sally began, but Stan could hear the phone being taken off her, and a familiar voice rang through the phone line.

“Where do you get off, bothering my bar staff, Alcatraz?” It was Rico, and Stanley’s teeth ground in frustration, his most crucial answer cut off from him.

He could hear Rico talking to Sal, and he knew why the poor girl was scared shitless now. He must have been behind the bar with her, and she still tried her best to answer Stan’s questions, no doubt shaking in her rhinestone cowboy boots.

“Go do something useful, and pour me a drink, Blondie. Do your damn job.”

Stan’s hands curled into fists just listening to Rico. His voice made his skin crawl and the anxiety that was leaping in his chest before was curdling now, turning into thick viscous anger.

“Where’s Val, Rico?” Stan asked through gritted teeth.

“You wanna see your girl, you’ll do what I told you to do. Don’t think I haven’t noticed you fucking around in your motel room. I got eyes on you, Alcatraz.”

Stan knew he was being watched, but the confirmation just made him feel sick and angry.

“You’ve got a job to do. I told you I wanted it done yesterday. You’re lucky I’m being so damn patient with you.” Rico said, like he was doing Stan a favour. This wasn’t a favour. “So, get in your car, and go dump what’s in the trunk in the desert, tout suite, before it starts to stink, you hear. And then I’ll see about letting you visit your little girlfriend.”

Stan made a frustrated noise, chewing on the inside of his cheek to bite back the urge to say something stupid.

Sighing, bitterly resigned to doing Rico’s dirty work for him, Stan gritted out “You want anything else?”

“I want my damn money back.”

The dial tone signalled Rico had hung up on Stan and Stan just sat there on the bed, listening to the beeping, his hands clenched into fists, stewing on the anger that simmered within him, relegated to doing Rico’s bidding once more.

Talk about rock bottom.

Finally setting the phone back on the hook, Stan got up, threw his jacket on, and walked out of his motel room, locking the door behind him.

He strode over to his car, his precious El Diablo, and wrinkled his nose. There was a strong odour coming from the trunk of the car, whatever was in there had been baking in the sun for the past two days. Stan held his breath as he contemplated opening the trunk, checking to see what was in there.

If whatever was in there was incriminating though, Stan would be painting himself into a corner, so he resigned himself to breathing through his mouth (not that that helped) and walked over to the driver’s seat, climbing in and turning the keys in the ignition.

Driving out onto the road, Stan gunned it along the highway, heading to the desert.
Guess this was day one of working for Rico.

Miles away from anyone, Stan found a sandy ditch he could dump Rico’s delivery in.

He pulled the car up and walked around to open the trunk.

God, it reeked. If Stan hadn’t spent so long in his motel room, maybe it wouldn’t be so bad, but right now, the contents of the black industrial strength bin bag in the trunk of the El Diablo stank like a Thanksgiving turkey the week after.

Swallowing back his revulsion, Stan grabbed the top of the binbag and yanked it out of the boot, hoping the bag wouldn’t tear. Whatever was in there was about the size and shape of a body and Stanley tried hard to not think that he was hauling a dead body out of the boot of his trunk, but what else would you put in a body bag?

Stan felt bile creep up his throat, and he swallowed it down, heaving the body bag out of his trunk and hauling it around into the ditch.

It fell heavily into the dip in the dune and Stan kicked some of the sand from the top of the ditch down to cover the black bin bag.

He wanted to leave it at that, to drive away somewhere and air out his car until it didn’t stink so bad, but something niggled at him, making it hard to simply drive away.

Rico making Stan dump a body was obviously sending Stan a message, but Stan didn’t know whose body it was. So what message could Rico possibly be sending him?

The thought that made it difficult to drive away was the same thought that kept Stan from running from a lot of things here in New Mexico. And that thought was ‘what if it was Valencia in that body bag?’ and ‘what if it’s my fault she’s dead’ and that thought terrified Stan.

He felt like a coward already. He felt like a coward for wanting to run, and he felt like a coward for not standing up to Rico, for giving in and doing what that bastard told him.

But that was the thing about Valencia, that she always made him feel some kind of brave. And right now, he hated her for it.

Sliding down the sand dune into the ditch, Stanley gingerly untied the top of the bin bag and peeled the bag down enough to display the face of the poor unfortunate within.

Dark hair, tattoos, tanned skin.

But thank fuck it wasn’t Valencia.

Val’s boss, Damien, stared lifelessly up from within the bin bag, and Stan spared the poor sap a few seconds of unfortunate eye contact, before he clambered out of the ditch frantically, kicking sand down from the top of the dune until the body was covered.

Rico certainly was sending a message by having Stan dump the body of Val’s boss in the desert, the guy who used to run the gang, and no doubt the whole damn town if Val’s claims were to be believed.

He looked down at the covered ditch, the bin bag housing Damien’s body hidden sufficiently, and he checked the trunk of his car for any mess, closing it, and driving away, the windows wound down the entire drive back into central Albuquerque.

Stan heard Rico’s message loud and clear.

Damien was dead. This was Rico’s city now.

Pushing the doors to Ojo de la Fortuna open, Stan strode in, looking for Rico. He was lounging at the bar, poor terrified Sal sitting on his lap, holding his drink for him.

Stanley stormed up to the bastard and reigned in his temper as best as he could, but it was there, just under the surface, roiling.

“I’m afraid your visiting hours are over, hombre.” Rico drawled, his arm draped around Sal’s shoulder, playing with a flip knife in his right hand. “Maybe if you’d finished the job when I asked you to.”

“If you don’t tell me where she is right now, I swear I’ll –“

“You’ll what?” Rico flipped the switchblade over and held it against Sal’s neck in an instant, daring Stanley to finish his sentence.

Stan swallowed, the words sticking in his throat as he forced them back. Sal’s eyes were pleading with Stanley and she was shaking.

Fuck Rico for doing this to her. Stanley couldn’t do shit to the bastard, every time he tried to stand up to Rico, he placed another life in Stanley’s hands.

But right now, he’d love nothing more than to punch the smirk right off that asshole’s sinister face.

Rein it in Stanley, he thought to himself. Don’t make this a bigger fuck up than it already is.

“I just want to know where she is.” He said, levelling his voice low, his eyes darting between Rico’s one good eye and the knife at Sal’s neck.

“I meant what I said, Alcatraz.” Rico flipped the knife away from Sal’s throat, playing with it idly once again. Sal let out a shaky relieved breath. “Visiting hours are over.”

“But where is she?” Stanley pressed doggedly.

“You tell him, Blondie.” Rico nudged Sal with his elbow, prompting her to speak. Sal nearly jumped out of her skin when he nudged her, Stanley could see just how on edge she was.
Her voice reedy thin, barely breaking a whisper, Sal told Stan. “Valencia’s downtown, at the police station, in a holding cell.”

“She’s in jail?” Stan gawked at Sal, and the blonde girl nodded, frown lines creasing between her eyebrows.

“And visiting hours are over, so you’re shit out of luck until tomorrow.” Rico leaned back, picking his teeth with the tip of his knife. “Speaking of, I’ve got another job for you tomorrow.”

“What?” Stan scowled at Rico, low on patience now that he knew where Val was.

“Be here in the am, ten o’ clock, and you’ll find out.” Rico shifted his leg, sliding Sal off his lap, swatting her on the rear as she hurried away. “Fetch me another beer, Blondie, time’s ticking.”

Stanley just stood there for a while, watching Rico boss Sal around, but when the gangster didn’t acknowledge Stan again he knew he’d been dismissed.

Stan would have been pissed off if he didn’t have better places to be.

The police station downtown was due for some serious funding, considering the back wall and window that closed off the holding cells was left basically unguarded. All Stan had to do was jump the wire fence, scale the brick wall and sneak around the back. There was even a convenient milk crate stacked up near the dumpsters back there that served as a makeshift step, enabling Stan to get high enough to peek in through the small barred window looking down into the cells.

For such a vibrant city, the cells were sparsely populated. There were one or two sleeping perps and in the corner cell closest to the window, was Valencia. She wasn’t sleeping, she was sitting up, her hands covering her face, shoulders hunched. The moonlight from the window was just hitting her cell, maybe it was too bright for her to sleep.

Stan was ready to hiss a whisper at her, trying to get her attention, when he heard something he never thought he’d hear from a tough girl like Valencia.

Muffled sobs.

She was crying.

Her slender fingers covered her face as she sniffled and hiccupped into her hands, painting a melancholic picture in the moonlight.

Stan swallowed the growing lump in his throat, feeling like this was his fault, before he pushed aside his guilt, trying to get her attention again.

“Val – hey Val!”

She looked up, wiping her face rapidly, and locked eyes with Stanley.

“Are you okay?” Stan asked, pity clear in his expression.
“What are you – doing here?” Valencia wiped her face down, trying to feign composure as quickly as possible, though her voice was still stuffy from the crying. “Aren’t you being watched, idiot?”

“They know I can’t run.” Stanley whispered back. “I’m just as stuck as you are.”

“You’re not stuck, you could be halfway across the country by now – you should be!” She insisted, glaring at him, offended by the notion that Stan would stay for her. “I know I would be.”

“I couldn’t leave you here.” Stan confessed, sounding frustrated. “What kind of asshole would I be, you’re here crying your eyes out over me in a cell –”

“I’m not crying over you.” Valencia shot back sharply.

“Oh, uh…” Stan scratched the back of his neck awkwardly, hazarding a guess. “Over Damien?”

Valencia glared at him with red rimmed eyes.

“For yourself?” Stanley guessed again, feeling like he was treading on thin ice the longer she glared at him.

“A pity party won’t get me out of here, asshole. Can’t you just let me mourn?”

Mourn? Oh right, yeah, Stanley supposed since somebody she knew for a while was dead, she’d be feeling some sort of sad right now.

He let out a low whistle, his hands stuck in his pockets, affecting a commiserative tone. “What a way to go. Can’t say I liked the guy, and I liked even less finding him in my car, but nobody deserves that.”

“Do you think I give a crap about how he died?” Valencia bunched her hands into fists angrily. “Damien’s dead, and I could honestly care less, but with him gone, no one is paying for my mother’s life support. And I have to hear it from that smug sheriff that she flatlined an hour ago and I can’t even get out of here to go see her!”

Valencia’s angry tone broke at the end of her sentence, a sob wrenched through her. She brought her hands up to cross over her chest, gripping onto her upper arms as she held herself, trying to hold the pain in, but it all came flowing out regardless.

“I’ll never get to see her again. I won’t even get to go to her funeral. She might not even have one, because no one can afford it and her only relative left in the state is me, and they’re never letting me out of here.”

“But – you didn’t do anything.” Stanley frowned, looking down into her cell. “They’ve got no damn reason to keep you here –”

“Apparently, I killed Damien.” Valencia admitted, her voice thick and bitter.

“But that was Rico.” Stanley said, baffled. It had to be Rico, Stan had seen the body, there was no way Valencia, as feisty as she was, could have done this to Damien. And why would she want to? Sure, he had her in debt her whole life, but if she hadn’t done something to him before, she wouldn’t have now.

“He framed me.” Valencia explained. “He was at the boxing ring and made me take him to Damien. He said he was his cousin. He probably is, they acted all friendly when he got to the bar, swapping stories. He just wouldn’t let me leave. He had me standing in front of Damien, like I was supposed to distract him while he came up behind him, got out his knife and slit his throat, as casual as anything. It was disgusting, I was covered in blood, it was all over my face and in my hair, and Rico just passes me his knife, tells me ‘hold that chica, I need to make a call’ and when he comes back, the police are with him.”

“But you didn’t do it! Didn’t you tell them?” Stan asked, gripping onto the bars of the window.

“Of course, I told them. Do you think they listened?” Valencia crossed her arms. “He must have paid them off or something. No one seems to care about what happens to me and I’ll spend the rest of my life paying for something I didn’t do.”

Stan watched her scowl bitterly at the concrete floor of her cell, and he couldn’t help but relate. When no one would listen to you, it didn’t matter whether you were innocent or not, that one mistake would change your life forever, even if it wasn’t your fault.

“They got you a lawyer yet?” Stanley asked, his brow furrowed with sympathy.

“No lawyer, no visitors. They won’t even let me call my brother. The only reason they haven’t moved me up to the New Mexico women’s correctional is because Rico wants me under his nose, under his goddamn thumb.” Valencia’s lip curled. “Just when I thought I was getting out of here.”

Stanley was silent for a moment, reflecting on that, and Valencia looked up at him.

“Why aren’t you getting out of here?”

Stanley pulled a face and tried to pretend he wasn’t sticking around for her sake. “Well, I would, but with me and what money? Rico took it all back, and he’s making me work for him now, and since I like not being dead, I guess that’s it for me.”

“That’s it?” Valencia stared at him disbelievingly. “You’ve still got your car, just cut and run! Change your name again, disappear. You’ve got nothing tying you here.”

The uncomfortable expression on Stan’s face said it all. He could tell when Valencia realised who he was staying for, and for a split second her eyes lit up with surprise before she grit her teeth and looked down at the floor again.

“Look, it’s my fault you’re in here. I don’t like it any more than you do, but I stole the money from Rico that put us in this shit in the first place. I’ll just – do what he says until I’ve paid him back and – I dunno, you need me to smuggle you in food or cigarettes or something?” Stan questioned, sounding resigned, trying to hide how devastated he was to have rediscovered rock bottom.

“Just go, Stanley.” Valencia said, her voice low and tense. “I can take care of myself.”

“You sure? I can –“

“Just go!” Valencia shouted at him, and her voice echoed through the police station.

Stan heard voices at the door to the holding cells, the police coming to investigate and he knew he had to make his exit sharpish.

Ducking down from the window, Stan ran back and climbed the brick wall, landing on the grass on the other side, resting his back against the bricks. The moonlight played with shadows draping Stanley in secrecy and, alone in the night, he sighed.

Looking down at his hands, Stanley lamented how even when he was trying to do the right thing, he was still getting yelled at, his efforts blowing up in his face over and over again.

His hands balled into fists. He guessed this was his life now.

So much for a fresh start.

“I love American cops.” Rico said, reclining on one of the fold out chairs in the boxing ring, picking his teeth with his knife. “They think the rules don’t apply to them, that’s why they go into law enforcement. They puff themselves up, feed their egos, grow fat on self-importance. They are worshiped like gods and start to believe it’s true.”

Good god, he was monologing.

Stanley rolled his eyes and continued to pummel the punching bag hanging in the middle of the ring. He was here to practise for the finals, but he didn’t take the same joy in boxing anymore, not like he used to. Now, the winnings from his every match were snatched from him before he even got his mitts on the money.

At first Stanley was surprised when Rico allowed him to continue with the competition, thinking that denying him the one thing that made him happy would all be part of Rico’s plan to make him suffer. It still was in a backhanded way. Rico came to all of his matches, expected Stanley to win and seized his winnings from him constantly. The crowd still cheered for the Stan O’ War, his winning streak kept him in high regard, but their praise fell on bitter ears.

It looked like Stan was set to win the finals too, given how much he’d been practising, not that you’d notice over his beer gut. You didn’t need a six pack to win fights, thankfully. He hoped his victory could provide him some small consolation that his life wasn’t a total dumpster fire, but given how his luck had been lately, he pretended he wasn’t holding out hope for a win.

Val was still in jail, a fact that Rico brandished about whenever Stan looked too happy. He had the police in his pocket, all paid handsomely for holding Val there on trumped-up charges. He enjoyed taunting Stan with that fact, that her fate was his fault, or would be if he stepped out of line.

Walking the line though was torturous when Stan really wanted to just cut and run, but even if he wanted to, there was more tying him down now.

Tony’s delayed shipment of stolen vacuums arrived, and with nowhere to put them, Stan was knocking elbows with hoovers in his motel room. He couldn’t move the stock, because Rico didn’t give him time off to work the door to door market, so they sat in his motel room, collecting dust rather than sucking it away. Those vacuums had cost Stan a pretty penny, and he hadn’t seen a cent back from them yet, but he could still turn a profit on them, however that relied on Stan getting a break from Rico’s overwhelming influence, and that didn’t seem likely anytime soon.

Rico continued talking, taking Stan’s grunting as he punched the punching bag as proof of engagement. “All these people praying to the boys in blue. They don’t realise that they’re just as corruptible as anyone. Gods are petty too, but laying on that worship, man, the praise and the money and the favours and gifts – it just gets them every fuckin time. Every fuckin time.”
Stan rolled his eyes again, and Rico caught the movement this time, flipping his knife back down into its hilt, standing up.

“I don’t want you getting a big head too, you hear me. Just because the crowd shouts your name out, it don’t mean they worship you. You remember who you belong to.”

Mumbling seditiously under his breath, Stan continued to punch the dangling sand bag. “Not you, that’s for sure.”

“The higher they climb, the harder they fall, Alcatraz.” Rico stepped up to the edge of the ring and slapped his hand against the mat. “Get over here, you’re done for the night.”

Rolling his tongue across his teeth, Stan debated defying Rico. He didn’t necessarily want to keep training, and he sure as shit didn’t want to dance to Rico’s tune, but he didn’t exactly have much of a choice.

Wiping the sweat from his forehead and smearing it onto his singlet, Stan stepped away from the punching bag and walked over to the edge of the ring. Sliding under the ropes, he climbed down and stood opposite Rico.

Rather than ask if Rico needed anything else, or ask if he was dismissed for the night, Stan just stood there, watching Rico sullenly. He’d rather not give Rico the satisfaction.

“Things are shaping up for a good fight.” Rico remarked, pocketing his knife. “Finals tomorrow. You’re bringing your a-game?”

“Sure.” Stan said begrudgingly.

“You wanna win, right Alcatraz? This is what you’ve been training for. You wanna win for you, and your girl, don’t you?” Rico said, smiling, and that unnerved Stanley.

He made a noncommittal noise, but he knew just as well as Rico that Stan wanted to win, he wanted some small measure of success in the shitstorm that was his life.

Rico slung his arm around Stan’s shoulders and walked him to the exit. He was being too friendly, Stan was on edge, his shoulders tense.

Rico kneaded his shoulders with his bony fingers, prodding Stan a little too hard to be genuine. It was like Rico was acting like some sort of parody of a boxing coach, egging Stan on.

“The crowd will be screaming your name, Alcatraz, they’re gonna be hanging on your every move. They’re gonna be watching every block, every duck, every punch you swing.”

Stan tried shrugging Rico’s hands off his shoulders, but the gangster just dug his fingers in harder. It was starting to hurt.

“Every fight has led up to this one, and there’s gonna be a lot of money riding on you winning.” Rico stopped, and held onto Stan’s upper arm, not letting him leave. “And a lot of money to gain if you lose, you get me?”

Stanley paused, Rico’s words sinking in, and he felt sick to his stomach. He should have seen this coming.

“You’re gonna be paying me my goddamn money back until you die Alcatraz, but if I don’t get a chunk of it back now, you’re gonna have to learn now to box without your kneecaps.” Rico let go of Stan’s arm, and he lurched back, warily. “I’m not a patient man. You throw the next fight, or I take it out on either you or your girlfriend.”

Stan swallowed, nervous. He didn’t want to lose this far in the game, but what choice did he have? He was rather attached to his kneecaps and the rest of his body. Rico wasn’t messing around.

“You better be back here tomorrow night.” Rico shoved Stanley out the door, onto the street. The light from the arena silhouetted the gangster and his one good eye glinted in the dark. “And you better be ready to lose.”

Stan scrambled to his feet, and huffed, steeling himself to say something back to Rico, to stand up for himself, but the knife wielding crook had already turned around and retreated into the boxing ring.

Shoulders slumped, he bit his tongue and scuffed his shoes along the gravel as he walked back to Dead End Flats motel.

This wasn’t fair. He was just getting good at something, he was going to win, and now he had to throw the fight?

If he did this tonight, his dad would’ve been right about him.

He really would be a good for nothing loser.

________________________

Before he left Motel Ritz, he raided the mini fridge for all the tiny booze bottles he could get his hands on, and now at 5am, alone in his crummier motel room on the edge of town, sharing his room with a surplus of 20 vacuum cleaners, Stan was throwing himself the teensiest pity party.

Clinking the mini vodka bottle against the mini bourbon, Stan rambled to himself.

“We have Vacuum Mogul Steve Pinington of Stan Co Enterprise on the couch this evening. Mr Pinington, now every household on the western seaboard has a patented Stan Vac Vacuum. How the hell are you so successful, you handsome lug?”

Wiggling the mini bourbon bottle, Stan replied to himself. “Well Merv, ya see, it’s all in the branding –“

Stan’s private dialogue was rudely interrupted by a rap on the door. Stan fell silent, not willing to share his interview with an imaginary studio audience with a live studio audience.

The rapping continued, someone knocking impatiently on Stan’s motel room door. Stan sat up cautiously, listening. He was tempted to pretend he wasn’t in, if only to avoid one of Rico’s goons, but the more he listened the more he could hear the familiar sound of someone swearing under their breath.

He recognised that voice.

He opened the door, standing there in his dirty singlet and boxers, just to see Valencia turning to walk away, a wooden baseball bat slung over her shoulder, shaking her head.
“Val?”

She turned around, looking him up and down, and her irritation melted into a fond smile. “If you’d have pretended you weren’t in, I was going to call bullshit right through your window with my bat, you know? I reckon it’s been done before, with them boarded up like that. I could hear you in there, talking to yourself. How’s Merv?”

Hefting the bat up onto her shoulder, Valencia grinned at him, and shrugged. “I told you I could look after myself.”

Stan blinked at her, wonder slowly gracing his face.

She looked around and walked up to Stan. “Listen, I can’t stay long, they’re gonna know I got out eventually, and here is the first place they’ll come looking. I just came to say goodbye.”

“Goodbye?” Stan repeated, slow on the uptake, though that may have been the alcohol.

“I’m leaving. I’ve got nothing tying me here anymore, I just want to run away, change my name – pull a Stanley, you know?” Valencia explained, pushing her hair back off her face. “I’ve got a ride waiting for me. I’m going to go up north and live with my little brother, lay low with the little genius until he finishes his degree – and then when he’s settled I’m going to go chase my own dreams, be my own boss. I just came by to let you know that. That I’m going, that you don’t have to stay here anymore. You didn’t need to stay here for me, and now you don’t have to.”

A car honked its horn in the driveway, waiting for Valencia. She looked over her shoulder, impatient to leave, then turned to face Stan’s stunned expression. Walking over to him, she reached for his hand, and gave it a squeeze.

“You’ve been really good to me, Stanley Pines. Now, you can be good to yourself. Chase your own dreams.” Raising up onto her tip toes, Val pressed a sweet kiss to Stan’s cheek, and looked into his eyes. “We worked well together, didn’t we? Maybe we can do it again someday?”

Stan was no good at goodbyes, but he tried his best, flashing an awkward smile at her. “I’ll have to look you up, you know, when you get that dog smuggling gig.”

She laughed, her eyes flashing bright in the dark. “You’ll be the first person I call.”

The car in the driveway honked again impatiently, and Valencia took a deep breath, and smiled at Stan for the last time.

She squeezed Stan’s hand, and let go. Before Stan could feel her absence too keenly, she passed him her baseball bat and closed his hand around it.

“Give ’em hell.”

What a gal. Stan thought, awed.

Running back to the waiting car, Val waved once over her shoulder, and climbed in the front passenger’s seat. The car skidded away before she even got her seatbelt on, booking it for the border.

Stan watched her taillights disappear down the highway and felt a strange mix of relief that she was going, and sadness to see her go. At least one of us is getting out of here.

Holding the baseball bat like a treasured souvenir, Stan returned to his motel room, closing the door behind him, his mind churning, fighting off his inebriation.

He could leave now too, get out of here. He could go anywhere, anywhere he wasn’t permanently banned from anyway, as long as he booked it out of here while he still could.

Looking around the room at his surplus of stock, his clothes scattered sporadically amongst the vacuum jungle, he struggled to think of where he could go.

He needed a fresh start from his fresh start. New Mexico wasn’t the bright new future he’d hoped for, but then again, no state ever was. Sure, he had made it pretty far in the boxing championships here, and the stars had finally aligned to bring him his stock at last – but he couldn’t move it. He couldn’t even win the finals tomorrow, or he’d have to learn to live without his kneecaps.

Even if he moved somewhere else, what made him think it would be any different? That’s what he always thought, that this time it would be different, but it never was. He always ended up like this, down on his luck, out of options, broke and in debt to people who were bad for his health.

Maybe his dad was right about him, that he was a loser. He’d never amount to anything, and here was proof, delivered for the hundredth time over. Life kicking him when he was already down and out.

Rico wouldn’t stop hunting him for the cash until he was dead, and Stan wouldn’t make it big here selling vacuums, given how many gossipy little old ladies he’d pissed off.

Every sophisticated business plan he developed to get rich blew up in his face, and he was starting to think that he just wasn’t cut out to be successful.

He just wasn’t cut out to be happy, or have things go his way. It was like the universe had it out for him.

His life had been ruined ever since that fateful night in New Jersey, the night following the science fair. His accidental blunder with Stanford’s machine had caused him to lose everything, and it all spiralled from there.

He lost his family, his home, his brother. He lost Carla McCorkle, to that no-good beatnik Thistle Downe. He lost everything he’d built up for himself, over and over again, chased out of states, countries, landing in prison and hot water more times than he could count.

Everything died for him on that day. The dreams he had.

Valencia told him to follow his dreams, but he wasn’t even sure if he still had any. Everything he touched turned to ash in his hands, turned to ruin. His dreams just kept drifting away from him.

He pulled his wallet out of the pocket of his jeans, thrown haphazardly on top of one of the vacuums, and flipped through the slots housing business cards, fake IDs and expired coupons to find what he was looking for.

The photograph.

Him and Stanford, side by side, smiling at the local gym’s competitive high school boxing tournament. Three schools in the county competed, and both Stanford and Stanley came home with prizes, flimsy paper certificates that their mother framed for them to hang on the wall.
Stanley remembered the peculiar mixture of pride and shame he felt to see Ma so proudly hang Stan’s framed certificate on the wall next to the intimidating plethora of academic accolades and certificates Ford had already earned. He remembered the fuss she made over him, cheering him on and calling him her little boxer for a month before the pet names lost their appeal. He knew what she was doing, she was trying to compensate, to give Stanley some small degree of the same praise that was lavished on Stanford constantly. He didn’t appreciate it enough then, but he did now.

With a sigh, Stan stared morosely at the creased photograph, rubbing his thumb against the worn edge of the photo.

Things were different back then. He still had dreams.

Dreams to sail the world, scouting for treasure, babes and adventure. All those things seemed possible when he was young, when he and Stanford were inseparable. Before the world kept cutting him down.

Making it big and getting rich was the dream Stan formed to get back at his dad, that was him wanting to prove himself. His dream was still the same after all those years, his real dream that is.

Now you can be good to yourself. Chase your own dreams.

He felt like a schmuck, dealing with these conflicted emotions, sitting in his motel room like a loser instead of getting out of here. Valencia was already long gone, she didn’t sit around agonising over where she could go or what she should do.

She just got out of here. And went to stay with her brother. The kid genius.

Staring at the crumpled photograph, Stan huffed a laugh to himself. Honestly, that didn’t sound too bad. It sounded a hell of a lot better than broken kneecaps.

It was just cresting 7am when Stan’s introspection was interrupted by a knock on the door.

He flinched, expecting the bad kind of company, inwardly cursing himself for taking so long to make his mind up. He reached for the baseball bat Valencia had given him, it’s weight feeling right in his hands. It was small protection against Rico’s knives, but it was better than nothing.

Stalling for time, Stan called out from behind the door.

“Just give me a few more days Rico. I’ll pay your goons back, I swear!”

There was no response, other than a postcard sliding through the mail slot in his door. Stan peered through the peephole in the door, only to see a tired elderly looking mailman heft his bag back onto his shoulder and walk away.

Stan eyed off the parking lot through the peephole for a moment, checking the coast was clear of Rico’s goons, before he crouched down to pick up the post card.

The picture on the postcard depicted woodsy scenery, with the words Gravity Falls emblazoned atop the image. Turning the post card over, Stanley read what he thought he’d never read, not in a million years.

A letter from his brother.

A man of few words apparently, given all his fancy schooling.
All he’d written was ‘PLEASE COME’ along with his name and an address.

Huh.

How was that for timing? This could be a sign from the universe, this letter arriving when it did. This could be Stan’s luck turning for the better.

Stanford was reaching out to him. His stubborn, stuck up brother was finally willing to look past his pride and extend a six fingered hand in friendship to Stan, ten years later.

The hope that churned in Stan’s stomach was doing things with his liquid dinner, sloshing around with the anxiety that festered when he contemplated seeing Stanford again, face to face.

Darting quickly to the bathroom, Stan puked into the cistern until his stomach was settled. Wiping his chin, he walked over to the sink, turned on the taps, and splashed water on his face.

Looking up at his reflection, Stan envisioned what it would be like to be face-to-face with his twin again for real, and not just in a mirror.

The longer he stared at his reflection, the more solidly he made up his mind.

Opening the cupboard behind the mirror, Stan snatched his aftershave, toothbrush, and all the little motel soaps, lotions, and hand towels, throwing them in his duffle bag. He charged around his motel room picking up his belongings and jamming them in the duffle, discarding what he didn’t need, taking everything he could from the motel that wasn’t bolted down.

His bag was packed and his pants were on now. He looked around the motel room at the discarded discount vacuum cleaners, and left his life in New Mexico as Steve Pinington, Vacuum Mogul behind.

His bag slung over one shoulder, holding Val’s baseball bat in the other, Stanley strode out through the parking lot, daring the universe to stop him now.

Throwing his bag in the backseat of the car, climbing into the drivers seat, Stan turned the keys in the ignition of his beloved El Diablo, smoke flaring out of the vehicles exhaust as he sped out onto the highway.

He was leaving New Mexico behind him, leaving Rico and his knives, and his debt, and the championship title for underground wrestling all in his rear-view mirror, his struggles and hardships nothing but dust under the wheels of the Stanleymobile.

As New Mexico disappeared behind him, Stan gripped onto the wheel, and found himself smiling.

He was rather looking forward to his new life and fresh start.

As Stanley Pines.

Brother.
Thank you for being so patient with me! It took longer than most, but I hope you enjoyed the chapter!
I have a big thank you to give to my ever patient and lovely beta reader, and also blue-canary who helped me by reading through my draft for this one to Stan Check. It's like spell check but with more crime, I'm sure.
Please let me know how you enjoyed the chapter.
Next chapter we have a reunion between brothers, and a convenient hole in space-time ruining everything.

Along with blue-canary and my dear friend and beta reader, I would like to dedicate this chapter to the lovely kind people who have gifted fanart to the fic. Rainbowratsstuff, cyferka, basiliskblues, and kentherat sent through art recently that I could fawn over on my tumblr, but there was some gorgeous art linked in an anonymous comment that I also adore. Everyone should go look. I reblog all the fanart I am gifted at f-imaginings.tumblr.com/tagged/knowing-me-knowing-you (and there is fanart I drew there as well as art I’ve had commissioned - haruhi-akira is wonderful to commission btw and a very cool kiddo go check out their blog if you like gravity falls, south park, mob pyscho ect) and the ones I can't reblog are linked in the comments. I treasure them all, so please go look. This chapter is dedicated to the artists who keep me going.
Also final note, I have some spanish in this chapter that I've checked over a fair few times with different translators, but if any spanish speakers notice something odd with the grammar or phrasing, pls let me know and I'll change it.
Thank you as always for reading!
Oh yes, I'm sure my life was well within it's usual frame... The day before you came.

Chapter Notes
See the end of the chapter for notes

“Alright, everyone. Try… now!”

The gathered henchmaniacs (the ones with eyes that is) all squinted with keen focus at the elaborately decorated throne that sat in the middle of the courtyard, Kryptos hovering expectantly at the base, holding a paintbrush.

Teeth scratched his incisor. “I got nothing.”

“Helpful, Teeth.” Kryptos snarked, disapproving of the dental dynamo’s flippancy.

“I think I’m kind of feeling something.” Keyhole responded, blinking at the throne.

“What are you feeling?” Kryptos pressed.

“I don’t know. An ephemeral sense of whimsy?” Keyhole shrugged, Amorphous Shape floating by his side, flicking his tails at Keyhole in agreement.

“Well said.” Amorphous Shape blinked several eyes at once. “It really captures the jubilance of the occasion.”

“No, no, no, no, no!” Kryptos complained. “It’s not supposed to make you feel whimsical, it’s supposed to give you a headache!”

“I’ve got a toothache, does that count?” Teeth snickered, teasing the pedantic compass.

“Bill said, if this thing doesn’t give you a headache within the first three seconds just looking at it, then it’s not good enough!” Kryptos hovered back to where the other henchmaniacs were standing, assessing the throne. “What, does it need more cubism? More colours? More spirals?”

The gathered crew all shrugged unhelpfully, their artistic input minimal past Keyhole and Amorphous Shape’s holistic appreciation for this sort of thing.

Pyronica was leaning up against the front wall of the Quadrangle, seeming distracted, her arms crossed over her chest, watching the investors file out of the building, idling in the courtyard, inspecting the throne being built. Her eye was lidded pensively, her brow furrowed in distant thought.

Kryptos floated towards her and tried to get her attention.

“What do you think Pyronica? What does it need?”

Jarred out of her introspection, she blinked down at Kryptos’ waiting eye, and looked up at the optical illusions painted on the throne.

“More spirals. And they all need to be moving. He’ll like that.”
“He could have come and told me what he wanted in person.” Kryptos griped, unable to help himself. “It’s that much harder trying to guess what appeals to him, and I’ve had to re-fashion the thing six times already now. The throne is for him, he could at least be here.”

“The throne isn’t for him.” Pyronica replied, looking down at Kryptos. “I mean, sure, he’ll sit in it at the meeting, but it’s not for him.”

Kryptos narrowed his eye, jealous ambition setting him on edge. “Then who –?”

Pyronica inclined her head at the investors, loitering throughout the courtyard, curiously watching the throne being crafted.

“He’s made you redo it six times already because they need to see something that proves we’re still on track. The investors see Bill preparing his throne, arranging for the big day, and they stop hounding him. They think everything is on track and they leave Bill alone to do what he needs to do on Earth.”

“And what exactly is he still doing on Earth?” Kryptos scowled, crossing his arms. “I’m not exactly keen to keep reworking the throne over and over again just to cover for him, especially when he’s not making any progress. He’ll have nothing new to tell the investors at the meeting.”

“You don’t know that.” Pyronica defended Bill instinctively. “He’s making progress.”

“With that human?” Kryptos deadpanned, unimpressed.

“Six Fingers is still the key to opening our door.” Pyronica maintained. “Trust me. If I know Bill, he’s doing exactly what he needs to do to wear his human down. It’s only a matter of time.”

Kryptos squinted at her sceptically, still unconvinced.

“He knows what he’s doing.” Pyronica insisted with finality, looking back up at the towering throne.

Somehow, Kryptos doubted that.

Stanford watched the latched pet carrier with a paranoid fervour that bordered on unsettling, the bags under his eyes that much more prominent when contrasted with the focused intensity of his gaze.

The wind outside was whipping flurries of snow up into the air and, despite the chill, Stanford had been sweating wet patches under the arms of his button up shirt, having spent half a day staring through the crack in the curtain out into the front yard, watching. Waiting.

He was on guard against anything suspicious and as sleep deprived as he was, everything that registered in his field of vision was taking on suspicious undertones. He’d nailed ‘no trespassing’ signs wherever he could and did his utmost to shut out the nefarious influences of the outside world, trusting nothing and no one.

Living in this heightened state of paranoia would wreak havoc on an ordinary person, with a plain four walls around them, but with the scientific knick-knacks and research paraphernalia scattered about the shack, filling every room with paranormal clutter, Stanford double took several times a day, just looking around the living room.

That would be a sign for any ordinary person to get some rest, to seek professional help, or get outside for a little fresh air at least – all things Stanford couldn’t afford to do.

Since sending that missive to Stanley, Stanford had spent most of his time in the shack, paranoid that he would miss Stanley’s visit if he stepped out of the house for even an instant. He’d been living off bulk bought TV dinners, and unholy amounts of instant coffee, doing just about anything he could to keep his eyes open. To keep the portal safe from Bill.

But nothing was safe from Bill, not really.

And since Stanford was the only thing standing between the Earth and Bill’s destructive invasion, his self-described apocalypse of weird, he knew he must be constantly vigilant.

Which is why Stanford was currently clutching the wooden frame of his crossbow like a security blanket, staring down the creature in the back of the pet carrier with suspicion.

The gnomes of the forest had been acting peculiar, straying from the enchanted depths of the woods one at a time to loiter on Stanford’s front lawn, despite the bracing sting of the winter wind. At first Stanford thought he was merely being paranoid, but then he realised that paranoia was his ally – after all, it could never hurt to be too careful.

Unusual gnome activity wasn’t exactly a key harbinger of the apocalypse, but Stanford wasn’t taking any chances.

He could have just been hallucinating (an unfortunate side effect of such a severe sleep deficit – possibly due to the sheer strength of the coffee Ford had been drinking – he was certain this strain wasn’t FDA approved) or it could have been the sunrise reflecting off the gnome’s eyes, but as soon as Stanford saw that yellow flash, he set a trap. A painstakingly orchestrated trap, involving a two-day stakeout, a state of the art containment unit (the pet carrier) and the perfect bait – the fanciest of brand name maple syrup liqueur – all laid out to lead Stanford to the culprit’s eventual capture.

Stanford poked the metal front of the pet carrier with the tip of his crossbow warily. “I know you’re in there.”

“You put me in here, you crazy human.” The gnome inside shook his tiny fist at Ford, outraged now that he had run out of the maple liqueur. “Why don’t you mind your own business, huh?”

“I’m not crazy. I’m not.” Stanford insisted, ignoring the shame that washed over him even uttering those words. He knew what this looked like. He wasn’t an idiot. But he WASN’T crazy. “I am perfectly sane.”

“You just keep telling yourself that, all crazy like, under your breath.” The gnome scoffed, and ventured to the front of the pet carrier, wrapping his tiny hands around the bars. “Now let me out of here.”

“No.” Stanford said, before repeating himself with more surety. “No. I won’t let you out until you tell me what you’re doing here, Bill.”

“Who’s Bill?” The gnome shrugged, wide eyed, before he wagged his pointer finger at Ford, chastising him. “Listen, I’ve got six wives and seventeen gnome children waiting for me back at the mushroom hut!”

“Six wives?” Ford raised his eyebrow sceptically, crossing his arms.

“Mmmhmm.” The gnome said, his voice pitching high, nodding, although it almost looked like the gnome was holding his breath, like he was holding back laughter.

“That sounds like a handful.” Ford commented, sounding vaguely impressed. “Of course, nothing you can’t handle. What did you say your name was again?”

The gnome snorted, a squashed laugh wheezing through the gnome’s nose, and the gnome was biting his bottom lip now to quash the laughter, though his tiny form was shaking with the effort to contain it.

After about a minute of terse silence, the gnome responded, his voice lilting high at the end like he was asking a question instead of providing an answer.

“…Gnomeo?”

Ford pinched the bridge of his nose and huffed out a frustrated sigh as raucous familiar laughter burst out of the gnome, confirming Ford’s suspicions.

“HAHAHAHAHAHAHA – no, no wait! I can do better!”

“Bill!” Ford exclaimed, exasperated.

Yellow crept to the forefront of the gnome’s eye, confirming that it wasn’t just the sunlight refracting conveniently to nurture Ford’s paranoia, until he found himself staring down into the very same yellow slitted eyes he was once so fond of.

Bill was doubled over laughing, wiping tears of mirth from the corners of his eyes as his cackling fit continued. “Six wives! Can you imagine? That’s a gnome who gets around. Hahahahaha!”

Scowling at the hysterical gnome, Ford’s coffee fuelled irritability swelled, and he smacked the pet carrier in frustration, jostling the cage.

“So, you’ve come here to torture me some more, is that it?”

“Oh, Sixer.” Bill scoffed and flapped his hand dismissively at the scientist. “I’m not torturing you. I’m just having fun. You remember what fun is, don’t you?”

“None of this – none of this has been fun! I’ve been staking out my own front lawn for two days! You are – possessing the local wildlife just to stalk me in my own home! Just to make me miserable! Is nothing beneath you?”

“Well, at this height there’s a lot more above me than beneath me, if you get my drift.” Bill joked, leaning up against the front of the pet carrier, grinning at Ford with his usual unnerving intensity. “Come on Sixer, you can’t say you’re not pleased to see me? What have you been doing without my sparkling presence? My stellar entertainment? Becoming a gnome enthusiast?”

“I’m not a gnome enthusiast!” Ford banged his fist against the top of the carrier again, snapping.

“Oooh, someone’s cranky. Must be all that coffee you’re drinking. You look like you need a nap.” Bill’s signature shit eating grin was just as effective on the gnome’s face as it was on his own.

“I do NOT need a nap!” Ford shouted, slamming his fists on the top of the carrier again.
“Woah, easy on the merchandise, Sixer.” Bill scolded Ford, as his banging caused him to stumble back from the bars.

Angry and feeling vindictive, Ford picked up the pet carrier from the sides, and began to shake it viciously, bouncing Bill around in the small cage like a brick in a washing machine. The little thunks Bill made as he hit the edge of the plastic box gave Ford a sadistic rush of pleasure, until he realised Bill was laughing amidst his ‘ows’ of pain.

“Oh, hahah. Wow Sixer, you sure are dinging this gnome up good. What will his six wives and seventeen children say when he comes home to them all roughed up?”

Ford abruptly let go of the carrier, horrified by his own actions, and it fell to the floor loud enough to make Ford jump, keyed up as he was on far too much caffeine.

“Wooo!” Bill staggered to his feet, and mashed the gnome’s hands together, applauding. “That was fun! Do that again!”

“No, no I’m not doing that again. You tricked me into –“ Ford began, blaming Bill already.

“I didn’t make you play shake and bake with Mr Creepy Lawn Ornament, Sixer. That was all you. And aren’t you proud of yourself?” Bill crossed his arms, looking smugly up at Ford.

“Get out of that gnome Bill. Leave him alone. Leave me alone!” Ford insisted, his frustration leaking out of him.

“I go to all this effort just to spend time with you, and you take it for granted. I didn’t steal poor Gnomeo’s eyes just to get here for you to take an attitude with me. I came here for some quality Stanford time. Talk about rude.” Bill complained, rolling his yellow eyes emphatically.

“You’re lying. Stop lying. You didn’t come here for me, you’re here for the portal.” Bill glared at the gnome in the cage, gesturing with the crossbow as he spoke. “That’s all you’ve ever been here for.”

“Technically true.” Bill conceded. “But what about the friends we made along the way?”

Ford shouted in frustration and kicked the carrier, before he started pacing, running his hands through his hair. “We are not friends. You aren’t even capable of friendship!”

“You’re losing it Sixer. You’re lashing out, so you can feel like you’re in control but you’re not. You’re paranoid, delusional, and your perfect brain is slipping closer to insanity every second.”

“I’m not –“ Ford took a deep breath and tried to sound firmer in his declaration. “Crazy.”

“If it walks like a duck and talks like a duck then you’re probably hallucinating – because there are no ducks here!” Bill raised his voice, rattling the bars for emphasis. “Face it Sixer, you’re on the diving board to the deep end – and this is all on you.”

“No. No –“ Ford shook his head and pointed the crossbow at Bill. “This is your –“

“I’m not making you drown your liver in coffee or strangle your natural REM cycle with excessive caffeine. I’m not making you hole up in your cabin like a recluse, pointing your crossbow at whatever scampers across your front yard. I’m not making you do ANY of this!” Bill argued.

“No, this is on you. You forced me to –“ Ford insisted, clinging to the notion to protect himself from accountability for his own decline.

“If I could make you do anything, don’t you think I’d make you take a shower? I mean seriously, Sixer. I’ve met dung beetles who smell better than you.” Bill wrinkled his nose, waving the air in front of him. “What are you, not showering on purpose? Gross, IQ.”

“Don’t joke.” Ford scowled. “We both know the second I let my guard down around you, you’ll just sneak back into my head again and activate that portal. The second I let myself get comfortable –“

“So, you’re gonna be uncomfortable your whole life just to spite me?” Bill raised his eyebrow at Ford. “Gee, that sounds like a brilliant plan. Checkmate for you. What’ll you think of next, Genius?”

“You’re just manipulating me now.” Ford claimed, his paranoia speaking for him. “Everything you say –“

“I wonder if I could manipulate you into having a bath. Brushing your teeth? Eating something other than processed microwavable gunk, perhaps?” Bill shrugged, chancing his luck. “That stuff is laced with chemical additives. I know what they put in their secret sauces. Delicious lead poisoning.”

“Oh, like you care about what I eat.” Ford rolled his eyes, crossing his arms indignantly.

“I didn’t heal your body so many times over just to watch you toxify your liver like this.” Bill snapped, tapping his little foot on the floor of the pet carrier. “You want to know some of the other side effects of extreme caffeination? You start hearing things, your blood pressure goes through the roof, there’s the sweating and the shaking and the headaches!”

“You are the only headache I have.” Ford claimed spitefully.

“Now, who’s the liar? I don’t have to be in your head to know that it’s agony in there. And you’re just bringing it on yourself.” Bill pointed up at Stanford through the bars of the cage.

“Well, what’s the alternative?” Stanford exclaimed, throwing his arms in the air. “Letting you win?”

“It’s like you’ve never heard of a win-win scenario before.” Bill tutted. “We could do this together. Reshape the universe.”

“By destroying it? No.” Ford said stubbornly.

“You haven’t listened to a single word I’ve been saying. You’d rather believe some random cosmic voice in your head than me, who’s been here with you all along!” Bill held his hand to his chest, offended.
“But that just makes it worse, Bill, don’t you get it?” Ford’s brows were tented up in anguish. “That makes it so much worse. You have been here all along, and you’ve been lying to me!”

“But all the time!” Bill argued.

“You think that makes a difference?” Ford laughed incredulously. “You think at this point that there could be a single thing that you’ve said that wasn’t a lie that could actually matter to me? That could change things?”

“Well, if you’ve already made your mind up, then what’s the point?” Bill threw his little hands in the air in frustration. “Why am I even here? Why do I even bother trying?”

“The only reason you are here.” Stanford said, projecting his opinion onto Bill’s actions. “Is to torment me. Even if it means stealing a gnome’s eyes to do it.”

“You want to be tormented so bad, be my guest.” Bill glared up at Stanford, shaking with rage. “You want to be the tortured victim, have at it. I could be doing things that are so much worse to you, Stanford Pines, but for your sake I didn’t.”

“Well, why didn’t you?” Stanford asked, almost inviting the pain, egging Bill on if only to cover his own anguish with something more tangible.

“It’s not like I’m capable of feeling things, according to you. Nothing I say would matter to you anyway.” Bill said bitterly, glowering at Stanford.

“That –” Ford’s resolve fumbled, his dedicated abrasiveness wavering at the prospect of a genuine moment of vulnerable honesty from his muse, before he resigned himself to pulling his guard up again, almost regretting it. “That’s right.”

Bill narrowed his eyes at Ford, and huffed out a bitter laugh, like he expected this much, shaking his head, before he reached up to cover the gnome’s eyes with his hands.

He was silent and still for too long, causing Ford to lean down, peering into the cage, wondering whether he’d genuinely upset the god, whether Bill was crying.

He got on his knees in front of the carrier, peering through the bars, only to see the gnome bring his hands down from his eyes, the yellow having fled, leaving clear whites in its absence.

“Shmebulock?” The gnome questioned.

Ford sighed.

As always, Bill’s visit made him feel worse than he had felt before.

This really was just another form of torture.

To stay awake, Ford had taken to pacing. That perpetual motion kept him uncomfortable, kept him from sliding down the slippery slope towards restfulness.
He would pace through the shack, searching through his belongings in every room, bringing the things he thought would be necessary up from the lab, hoarding his scientific contraptions in the living room.

He needed to pace. It gave him something to do while he waited for Stanley.

Part of his pacing, and rearranging meant that Stanford kept finding things that reminded him of better times. Keepsakes that stirred bittersweet nostalgia in him, that made him feel shameful longing for the way things were.

Paranoid what these keepsakes would say about him when Stanley got here, unwilling to be judged for his colossal mistakes, Stanford hid these little scraps of better days, but not anywhere in the house.

No, Stanford was keeping them close to him, stuffing the pockets of his trenchcoat with the drawings of Bill’s form, his detailed notes on his muse’s behaviour, all the little keepsakes and annotations he kept from the early days of secrecy in their relationship.

It wouldn’t do for Stanley to find the coded notes Bill would sneak into the pages of his journals as he transcribed them onto Fiddleford’s laptop, or the drawings and photographs of Bill’s form that Ford had taken to serve as precious mementos.

Stanford still felt too much shame to be able to openly admit that he had been intimate with another man, let alone to admit that the man he chose to be with was a threat to the entire universe. Hell, the man he chose wasn’t even a man, he was a triangle. Geometrically, what did that say about him?

Stanford could imagine his brother’s teasing now, and while his stomach was still knotted with shame and regret, he couldn’t allow the possibility of Stanley finding these things, discovering Ford’s colossal secrets, so he kept them on him.

Keeping them close however, did allow Stanford a lot more introspection than was probably healthy given the circumstances.

Sitting on the arm of the couch, Stanford turned the business card Bill had gifted him over in his six fingered hands, smoothing his fingers across the glowing letters. Sighing, he pocketed the card, and pulled the next item out of his pocket, one of his early drawings of Bill, leaning up against the kitchen door, watching him smugly. This was his list of melting and boiling points, written back when Ford thought he still had some measure of power or sway in their relationship, back when he thought they were doing what they did because they liked each other.

Ford felt a prickle on the back of his neck, like the weight of someone’s regard pressing against him, and he wondered if this was how Bill felt, sensing his regard back then. He called it worship, but Stanford simply felt unnerved, and looked up from the drawing, locking eyes with the gnome still sitting in the pet carrier, balanced precariously up on the mantle.

For the most part, the gnome’s eyes stayed white, the creature repeating the word ‘Shmebulock’ constantly like it had a mental deficiency of some sort, but occasionally Ford could see that intelligent yellow glow creep in again.

The gnome’s eyes were yellow now, staring out from behind the cage bars at Ford, almost looking sad, if Bill were capable of such a feeling.

“Just go away.” Ford croaked at the gnome, his voice tired and thick with regret.
Bill said nothing, but continued to watch Stanford, his gaze unerring and borderline melancholic.

Ford looked between the piece of paper in his hand, and the battered gnome in the cage, its eyes alight with complexity – and he just felt utterly tired. He wanted to rest but he knew that this wouldn’t be over until the portal was safe from Bill, until Stanley came to take his final journal away – but he felt like it was taking so long. Stanford ached for it all to be over.

Exhaustion competing with bitterness, Ford scrunched the tinfoil hat off his head and into a ball, throwing the foil at the cage. It bounced off the cage harmlessly. The gnome in the cage raised an eyebrow at Ford, yellow eyes silently judging him. Ford’s agitation mounted at Bill’s dismissive reaction. Stanford picked up a pillow from the couch and hurled it across the room with a frustrated shout. It bashed against the pet carrier properly now and knocked it from the mantle sending the cage crashing to the ground.

The cage door thankfully remained shut, but that didn’t spare Ford from the shocked and affronted look Bill shot him as he lay, knocked down on the floor. He almost seemed hurt by Stanford’s action, though Ford knew he wasn’t the one bearing the injuries Ford was inflicting, and he felt terrible all over again.

“Just leave Bill.” Ford lamented, staring down at those intelligent yellow eyes. “I’ll only hurt you if you stay.”

“Is that a promise?” Was all Bill said, though Stanford wasn’t sure if Bill said it at all. His mouth wasn’t moving. Maybe he said it with his eyes.

Maybe Stanford was just hearing things.

He didn’t know anymore.

It had been a long day.

Stanford picked up the cage, righting it and setting it back up on the mantle, noting the absence of yellow in the gnome’s eyes.

It didn’t matter.

He pulled the curtains back a crack and kept watch.

Stanley would be arriving soon. Any day now. Any minute now.

Soon, it would all be over.

From the penthouse room of the Quadrangle, a window opened up from the brickwork to look down on the courtyard. The finished throne Kryptos had painstakingly crafted for Bill was being moved further out into the space-field in front of the Quadrangle.

The investors were bringing their people in for a meeting in two days to discuss the progress of the portal and the future of the Earth invasion and not all of them could fit in the Quadrangle’s hall. Bill didn’t feel like remodelling his current home for them, especially not so they could make demands on what parts of his new home they wanted to get their grubby hands on.

Honestly, he was dreading this meeting, hating the pressure that it put on him. But that was how deals worked, in exchange for power, you were expected to deliver.

He knew a large percentage of these investors would no doubt demand a late-delivery-fee considering how slow his progress had been. They would demand he take offensive action, be more aggressive with his attempts to secure the portal, be more ruthless when it came to manipulating Sixer.

Bill felt like he was on the cusp of losing a piece of his soul.

He hadn’t felt like this for a long time, deluding himself into believing that he didn’t have any more to lose, that he didn’t care if the universe saw him as this soulless murderer, this chaos god devoid of consequences.

You could only feel the effects of consequences when you cared about something. Bill liked to pretend he didn’t care, he spent the vast majority of his lifespan feeling numb to it all, acting flippant, superficial. Certain members of his investors would no doubt view caring as a form of weakness.

Jheselbraum seemed to think she had him pegged, believing him to be flippant, superficial, trivial, and cruel. What qualities his investors lauded, she seemed to see paint a different picture. That of a pathetic wreck. A cockroach.

His investors expected a solution at the meeting. They expected results.

The deals were made, the hands were shook, long before Sixer pulled him down to earth to live in that body.

This used to be what Bill wanted, what he contrived to occur. It was still what Bill wanted, in a way, but now he had something else he wanted more, and that tunnel vision focus made all his other plans seem unappealing.

If he could claim the earth in his own time, maybe he wouldn’t baulk at doing what needed to be done, but this pressure placed on Bill’s triangular form to deliver became heavier than he liked.

All the deals and accords that he’d woven together into a safety net for his major takeover seemed to tighten restrictively, and what was supposed to promise Bill freedom and power currently felt like shackles. The net had closed in on him and now his hands were tied.

He hated it.

He wanted a way out.

Seriously, since when did Bill Cipher do anything he didn’t want to do? Or rather, since when had this become something he didn’t want to do? He didn’t want to waste time pinpointing the moment, he just knew that he was doing this for his investors pleasure and not for his own, and that vexed him.

But unless something could spectacularly shoot his plans in the foot at this point in time, unless he could claim sabotage from external forces, something he couldn’t have guarded against, something that was believably out of his control enough to waive any blame from the investors off his shoulders, then he had to see this through.
By any means necessary.

And at this point, the only means left available to him seemed to be the one action he didn’t want to take.

To get this portal back on track, he’d have to break Sixer’s mind.

That would be what the investors would demand of him, that would be the only recourse. They’d see Stanford’s defiance as an obstacle to be broken down and done away with.

How was Bill supposed to explain to them that Sixer’s obstinacy and moral ideals were a feature and not a design flaw? Sure, his human wasn’t complying right now, he was hurt and lashing out at Bill. It was a new side to Sixer that Bill wanted to explore, and he held onto hope that they could come out the other end of it, richer for the experience, their relationship given new dimension, both literally and figuratively. He didn’t want to change Sixer, he just needed him to see things his way, to be on his side.

To be by his side. Like he used to be.

That was possible, right?

Everything was so much harder now, so much harder than it had any right to be, because somewhere along the way, despite how much Bill didn’t want to admit it, he had grown to care about Sixer.

And if his investors were right, that made him weak.

If Jheselbraum was right, he was weak anyway.

Bill looked out the window, as his henchmaniacs positioned the throne in its proper place, ready for the meeting.

He had to present a strong face for the investors. He had to stand firm against their demands. He had to be what Jheselbraum believed he was not.

Guess he had to lie until he wasn’t lying anymore.

The snow was frenzied, falling heavier outdoors. Stanford peered out between the gap in the curtains into his front lawn for the last time, losing hope that Stanley would come at all.

His hope had melded with paranoia, convincing Stanford over the past few weeks that some harm had come to Stanley on his way here. That Bill had figured out what he was doing somehow and was going to waylay Stanley permanently, remove him from the equation. That cosmic forces had contrived to have Stanley be this late, make Stanford wait this long. That his brother was at this very second struggling against insurmountable odds to make it here to fulfil this task for Ford. He was just being struck down as he attempted to do so.

Stanford realised it wasn’t nice to imagine his brother coming to harm, it wasn’t what pleasant people did – imaginatively conspire dire events upon ones’ family members, but Stanford’s paranoid overactive imagination preferred dwelling on the fictitious ‘what ifs’ than realistically assessing the likelihood that Stanley just wouldn’t come.

Stanford was pinning all his hope on Stanley, the last vestiges of it, and he didn’t want to accept the reality of the situation. That Stanley might very well not follow through, might not come to help Stanford, might not heed his missive at all.

Stanley wasn’t exactly the most reliable person, a shyster and a charlatan. Part of Ford almost didn’t put it past Stanley to deliberately not show up, just to spite him.

Another, quieter part of Ford, wouldn’t put it past Stanley not to show up in response to all that Stanford had put him through, that his brother was genuinely hurt and had been hurt by him ever since high school, when he got Stanley kicked out for sabotaging his project.

Stanford preferred to shirk accountability for that unfortunate consequence, telling himself that there was nothing he could do, that Stanley’s punishment was just, that it was his Father’s decision and out of his hands, but now that he was getting desperate doubt was setting in, wondering if this was the reason why Stanley wouldn’t come to help him.

Stanford’s eyes were getting tired, eyelids heavy, struggling to stay open as he watched the snow dance in whimsical flurries across the yard. He blinked, his torso leaning forward until his forehead was pressed against the glass. His eyes slumped closed for a second or two, before Stanford jolted upright, blinking hard repeatedly, trying to shake off the tiredness.

He couldn’t sleep.

But he feared it was too late.

“Exhausted is a good look for you Sixer.”

Ford sprung up from his spot by the window and looked around wildly, searching the room for the source of the voice he heard.

He couldn’t see Bill here, but he could hear his laugh, echoing around the room, fading off ominously. He walked around the living room, searching for his muse, pinching his arm all the while, hoping desperately that he wasn’t asleep right now.

Crouching down in front of the pet carrier housing the gnome Bill had used as a vessel, Ford frantically eyed off the gnome in the cage. It stared back at him sullenly, eyes devoid of yellow, but still the voice came.

“You should just give up. You’re not going to win anyway.”

Ford narrowed his eyes at the gnome, wondering how it managed to speak without moving its mouth, before he realised the voice wasn’t coming from the cage, it was coming from behind him.

Spinning around, Stanford looked over to the doorframe. He’d checked there before, when he was searching the room. There was nothing there, yet right now, plain as day, stood his muse, clothed in the vessel Ford had made for him like nothing had changed. He had his arms crossed, and leant against the doorjamb, watching Ford coolly.

“If you give in now, maybe I’ll lessen your punishment.” Bill continued talking, and Ford could feel the room tilt, the floor swirling underneath his feet, making him dizzy. Stanford swayed on his feet, his brows knitted together, feeling sick as Bill remained in his living room, gloating.
“So you have – you have been punishing me.” Stanford slurred, holding onto the mantlepiece to steady himself while the pictures and trophies on the walls danced, their shadows turning sinister. “You –“

“Oh, Sixer.” Bill laughed and walked across the room slowly. “You’ll know when I’m punishing you. You think this is bad, we haven’t even scratched the surface yet.”

Ford felt his stomach flip, his knuckles turning white as he gripped the mantle, so close to collapsing where he stood.

“I can take my time with you, though.” Bill said, his eyes shifting chartreuse, curving with glee as he parroted Ford’s words back to him. The world seemed to tilt diagonally as Bill walked closer to Ford, Stanford feeling more unsteady with every step Bill took. “Take you apart piece by piece. Burrow in behind your eyes and take your body for a ride. You’d like that, I think. Or I could make you like it.”

Bill reached out his hand languorously, and Ford shrunk back against the wall, shying away as his muse’s fingers neared his temples, power crackling at his fingertips. Ford could practically smell the ozone in the air.

“We have from now until the end of time to find out.”

Ford squeezed his eyes shut, frightened, fighting against Bill’s influence. He could practically feel the static on his skin, leaning away from Bill’s touch when he was drawn out of his head by a rap on the door.

Gasping in alarm, Ford’s eyes flew open, and Bill was gone. The room was empty, and it was just him, as it had been this whole time.

His pulse was racing, fighting off hyperventilating in panic, uncertain whether he’d just fallen prey to a microsleep or if he was just hallucinating. He looked down at his smart watch, checking the status of the portal, and it still read ‘OFFLINE’ though Ford wasn’t sure if he could trust that reading.

The rap at the door sounded again and Ford nearly jumped out of his skin.

Wary, fearing Bill had come for him at last, that his threats before were just a prelude for his true punishment, Ford grabbed his cursed crossbow, arming himself defensively. He walked out into the hall and could see a shadow at the bottom of the door, someone standing outside.

One of Bill’s minions, sent to get the better of Ford, or maybe it was Bill himself, possessing an innocent, doing his own dirty work for a change.

Either way, Ford would be ready for whoever was on the other side of the door. If they thought that they could get the jump on Stanford Pines they had another thing coming.

Before the person at the door could knock again, Ford swung the front door open and aimed his crossbow at whoever lurked behind it.

“WHO IS IT? HAVE YOU COME TO STEAL MY EYES?!!”

Stanley stepped back, a shocked expression on his face, looking between the crossbow and his brother, before his mouth turned down at the edges.

“Well, I can always count on you for a warm welcome.”
Ford gawped at his brother for a second, uncertain whether he was actually seeing him, or if this was just another prolonged hallucination. He reached out to grab Stanley’s arm (definitely didn’t feel like a hallucination) before he yanked him across the threshold, the fearful imaginings that plagued him earlier springing to the forefront. “Stanley! Did anyone follow you? Anyone at all?”

“Eh, hello to you too pal.” Stanley quipped, chiding Ford’s manners in a way that felt familiar enough, but he didn’t answer Ford’s question.

Seeking out his own answers, Ford pulled a flashlight from his trench coat pocket and immediately shone it in Stanley’s eyes, searching for any hint of yellow in the back of his eyes, or slits.

If Stanley’s pupils narrowed to slits, then he was likely possessed.

Stanley shouted out, flinching away, but his pupils shrunk back naturally, circles dilating the way they should.

“Ah!” Pushing Ford’s hand away, Stanley scowled, squinting at his brother. “Hey! What is this?”

“Sorry.” Ford apologised sheepishly, pocketing the flashlight. “I just had to make sure you weren’t …”

Stanford paused there.

What exactly was he supposed to say, ‘Sorry Stanley, I had to make sure you weren’t possessed by the demonic triangular influence of my cosmic nightmare of an ex-boyfriend’?

How would Stanley react? ‘Gee Poindexter, guess you really have gone off the deep end and it looks like you’ve brought it on yourself – best of luck to you’?

Shame pooled in his stomach as he realised he really couldn’t tell Stanley. And if he couldn’t tell his own brother, how was he supposed to tell anyone?

No, this had to remain Stanford’s shameful secret. No one could know.

“Uh… it’s nothing.” Stanford retreated further into the shack, waving his hand behind him to usher in his brother quickly. “Come in, come in.”

Stanley followed Stanford into the living room, looking around at all the curios piled up in the main part of the house, Stanford’s paranoid hoarding making the place seem far more cluttered than was proper.

There were dinosaur bones soaking in solution, starter cables pinching onto the bones under the water, looped up to diagnostics equipment. Stanford’s fish tank by the wall was neglected, the water within dirty and dark. He had prototype computer consoles of Fiddleford’s left around the living room, running scans of triangular shapes and prisms, a facet of Ford’s research he’d neglected to explain to his assistant.

“Um, you gonna explain what’s going on, here?” Stanley took in the various gadgets and paranormal samples cluttering the room, wrinkling his nose at the smell of unwashed dishes and body odour seeping through the room.

Sure, he’d smelled worse, but he didn’t expect his perfect put together brother to be living like a bachelor on his last can of beer. Or acting so bizarrely.

“You’re acting like Mom after her tenth cup of coffee.”
It had been significantly more than ten cups, but Stanley didn’t need to know that.

Reaching for his first journal, the one he needed Stanley to hide, from the growing pile of clutter on the coffee table, Stanford held it close to his chest and looked around the room warily, not trusting his luck.

Yes, Stanley was finally here, finally here to take the journal away, but Stanford knew that this was the moment when everything could go wrong, and he couldn’t give Bill that chance.

“Listen, there isn’t much time. I’ve made huge mistakes, and I don’t know who I can trust anymore.”

Out of the corner of his eye, Stanford almost had a heart attack, thinking someone else was in the room, but it was only the anatomical skeleton he’d brought up from his study. Its face was turned to watch him, but he didn’t remember the skull facing this direction before. Had someone moved it?

Grabbing its chin, Stanford turned the skull to face away from him, not realising how downright crazy he looked in doing so.

“Hey, uh, easy there.” Stanley held his hands up, his tone softening like he was talking to a panicked animal backed into a corner. He was handling Stanford’s paranoia gently, but it was clear to Ford that Stanley had no idea what was going on – that he might not realise Stanford’s paranoia was justified. It was.

“Let’s talk this through, okay?” Stanley suggested, trying to ease Ford down from his jittery state.

“I have something to show you.” Stanford turned to face Stanley, clutching onto his journal, not willing to be derailed by his brother’s gentle approach. There wasn’t time. Breaking the news of what Stanford was working on here was a huge undertaking, and he didn’t have time for his brother to treat him like a frightened child. He had to make Stanley understand.

“Something you won’t believe.”

Stanley scoffed. “Look, I’ve been around the world, okay? Whatever it is, I’ll understand.”

He put his hand on Stanford’s shoulder companionably, and for a moment Ford felt like he had when he was younger, when Stanley would comfort him then in his own heavy-handed sort of way, after run-ins with bullies or dismissive words from Father. It was a fleeting second of fond nostalgia.

Shaking off that feeling, knowing he couldn’t afford to get comfortable, that he didn’t have time to, Stanford shrugged Stanley’s hand off and turned towards the lift to the lab, waving his hand to indicate for his brother follow him.

“This way.”

Stanley dropped his bag in the living room and followed Ford over to the elevator, taking it in with a whistle as he stepped inside. “This is fancy. What, you’re too good to use the stairs now?”

Stanford’s grim expression didn’t change, and he didn’t acknowledge his brother’s teasing, watching the symbols at the top of the lift change as they descended to the basement.

Stanley fidgeted awkwardly. “Uh, nice place you got?”
“It’s messy.” Stanford replied shortly, refusing to get dragged into small talk with his estranged brother when there was something much more important they should be focusing on, not really being able to help himself all the same.

“But that’s what you’re going for, right?” Stanley guessed gamely.

“It’s not supposed to be messy.”

“Okay…” Stanley shoved his hands in the pockets of his bomber jacket and rolled back on the balls of his feet awkwardly.

He watched his brother squint up at the peculiar symbols flashing where the floor number usually was on an elevator and wondered if there was anything he could say to Stanford that wouldn’t offend him. He seemed to be biting back at everything, jumpy in a way that lead to agitation.

Stanley opened his mouth to say something inoffensive, about the weather maybe – you couldn’t offend anyone talking about how the snow had taken a dump on Ford’s house – damn Oregon was cold – but before Stanley could say anything, the elevator doors opened.

Stanford lead the way, striding through into some kind of exaggerated sci-fi laboratory.

It looked like the set of a tv show, Stanley felt like knocking on the walls to see if they were made of cardboard, but the room was definitely metal, fancy computers and whirring machines built into the wall of the basement. The room was a symphony of humming systems, whirring computer fans, and beeping monitors brought to life. The flashing lights and many buttons beckoned Stanley and he curiously reached out, wanting to press something to see what would happen.

“Don’t touch anything.” Stanford admonished his brother sharply, flinging his hand out in front of him. “This is a complicated system. It’s not to be tampered with.”

“Pchht.” Stanley rolled his eyes, scooting closer to the motherboard, the array of colourful buttons tempting him. “It’s not that hard. Anyone can push a button.”

Reaching out to prove his point, mostly just to annoy Ford at this point, trying to jar him out of his grumpy mood, Stan hovered his finger over one of the buttons teasingly.

Stanford slapped Stanley’s hand away from the machine swiftly. “Don’t! No pushing buttons. You couldn’t even begin to understand the catastrophic consequences of just one false sequence with this machine. It’s dangerous to tamper with things you don’t understand.”

Stanford knew this from experience now and he felt quite hypocritical sling that lesson in Stanley’s face, knowing how thoroughly he’d ignored it in the past.

Yes, he’d tampered with things he didn’t understand, bringing Bill here in the first place, but he thought he knew enough to be able to handle it -that he would still benefit from bringing Bill here. He may have started out as ignorant, but he had a whole multiverse of potential information to uncover, and he wanted to uncover it all. He wanted to learn – though now on the tail end of things, he was reduced to hiding his research.

Oh, how the mighty had fallen.

Stanford had tampered with things beyond his ken intending to enlighten himself, however, it was different for Stanley – he really didn’t know what he was tampering with, and he probably didn’t want to know.
He just wanted to irritate Ford, apparently.

Cradling his stinging hand to his chest, Stanley frowned at his brother. “Hey, I’m here, aren’t I? So, explain it to me. Go ahead and show me what’s so unbelievable. I might not understand all the sciencey bits, you can skip over that part, but I want to know what’s got you so keyed up okay? I told you, whatever it is, I’m gonna understand.”

Stanford narrowed his eyes at his brother sceptically, not quite sure how he could explain the situation while skipping over the sciencey bits, finding it undignified to have to do so in the first place, but he decided to extend his brother the benefit of the doubt.

Stanley always responded better to the show part of show and tell, preferring pictures to drawn out explanations since childhood, so Stanford decided to work with that.

Opening the safety door, Stanford led his brother out into the portal room, and turned around to face Stanley, presenting the portal as it was.

He had hoped deep down that maybe Stanley would understand, that he would spare Stanford the agonising effort of having to rehash this all over again, of having to dumb it down for him, but it was clear from the dumbfounded expression on Stanley’s face that the portal was just as unbelievable as Stanford insisted.

Gazing up at the towering, glowing frame of the structure, Stanley felt small, small and stupid, but he had to admit –

“There is nothing about this that I understand.”

“It’s a trans-universal gateway.” Stanford started, resigned to explaining things in the simplest way possible, talking fast to get this whole ordeal out of the way. “A punched hole through a weak spot in our dimension. I created it to unlock the mysteries of the universe. But it could just as easily be harnessed for terrible destruction.”

Stanley still didn’t look adequately fearful of the portal, he was still squinting at it like he would at his math textbook, like it wasn’t worth figuring out. Stanford needed to impress upon him the gravity of the situation, as quickly as he could. He didn’t have time to dumb down several years worth of scientific progress.

“That’s why I shut it down and hid my journals, which explained how to operate it.”

Judging from Stanley’s sustained squint, Ford guessed he’d have to gloss over the details for his brother. Skipping past the scientific explanation, Ford tried to connect the more imperative reason he called Stanley here, attempting to give Stanley the mission he’d set out for him.

“There's only one journal left.”

Stanford pulled the journal out of his trench coat pocket, jostling his spare pair of glasses and other assorted paraphernalia he’d been collecting, too paranoid to leave it around the house.

Holding the journal out to his brother, Stanford could tell that Stanley was slowly starting to see where this was going. His eyes were wide and curious, and he looked at Ford’s journal with an oddly hopeful expression.

“And you are the only person I can trust to take it.” Stanford stressed, and passed the journal to Stanley.
Stanley took the book and looked up at Ford, eyes shining with wonder, overwhelmed at the thought that his brother was connecting with him after all these years. Does that mean Ford forgave him? It meant he trusted him, at least, and Stanley wanted to use that trust as the base for building the bridge that would bring them back together.

He held onto the journal with both hands, and his stomach flipped in elation when Ford placed his hand on Stanley’s shoulder, just like old times.

“I have something to ask of you.” Stanford began. “You remember our plans to sail around the world on a boat?”

Stan blinked at his brother, hardly believing he was hearing this. Sure, Stanford didn’t give the warmest welcome, but to call him back after all these years to reignite their lifelong dream to sail the world together – this was more than Stanley had hoped for. This was everything he’d hoped for when he booked it out of New Mexico.

Maybe Valencia was right – maybe it was time for Stan to live his dream. With his brother by his side, sailing the world, seeking treasure, far off lands, babes and adventure.

A grin spread across Stanley’s face, and for a moment there, it looked like all his dreams had come true.

Then Stanford had to keep talking.

“Take this book.” Stanford clapped Stanley’s shoulder, turned, and walked away, his back to his brother as he continued to issue his instructions. “Get on a boat and sail as far away as you can! To the edge of the Earth! Bury it where no one can find it!”

Having issued his instructions to his brother, Stanford looked up at the portal’s glowing surface, feeling relief begin to swell to the forefront of his chest, considering his work done. He’d told Stanley what was at stake, told him what he had to do, and any reasonable person would then go hop to it.

With the journals separated, the portal plans dispersed, Stanford could rest easy knowing that he was the only one who could operate the portal, and if Bill wanted in on this dimension, he’d find Stanford an incredibly stubborn obstacle to overcome.

That was a comforting thought, and a specific contrivance of events. In his own way, Stanford still wanted to be important, to be special, to be the Man Who Saved the World – and the way he could sustain his importance was to make himself the sole lynchpin that this plan hinged on. If no one else but Stanford could operate the portal, no one else could fall prey to Bill’s tricks.

It was the perfect plan. Stanford almost considered it already done, already inwardly gloating at his success, at his sound checkmate, but he forgot one crucial detail.

Stanley was not a reasonable person.

“That’s it?!”

Ford spun around to see his brother wearing an expression of utter disappointment and anger, which was the last thing he expected here.

“You finally wanna see me after ten years and it’s to tell me to get as far away from you as possible?!”
Why would that be the issue here? Stanford thought to himself. His brother was missing the point. He was supposed to be doing this for Ford. It was the least he could do considering what he’d cost him. When would Stanley realise that this wasn’t about him?

This was bigger than Stanley’s apparent hurt feelings.

“Stanley, you don’t understand what I’m up against!” Ford insisted, clutching his head, trying hard not to think on exactly what – or rather who - he was facing here. “What I’ve been through!”

“No, no. You don’t understand what I’ve been through!” Stanley shook his head and jerked his thumb at his chest as he spoke, letting his anger from the past neglected decade flow, wanting to impress upon his brother how crap his life had been since Ford got him kicked out.

After ten years of garbage it was only fair – if Ford wanted Stanley to help him cart his diary halfway around the world, he had to at least acknowledge what Stan had endured. And so, Stanley began to list the highlight reel.

“I’ve been to prison in three different countries! I once had to chew my way out of the trunk of a car! You think you’ve got problems? I’ve got a mullet, Stanford!”

The fact that Stanford pulled a face acknowledging that Stanley had a point at the mullet comment, but nowhere else in the conversation only fuelled Stan’s temper further, his words barbed in response to Stanford’s callous disregard for his suffering.

“Meanwhile, where have you been?” Stanley gestured around the room. “Living it up in your fancy house in the woods! Selfishly hoarding your college money, because you only care about yourself.”

“I'm selfish?” Stanford scoffed in derision, hardly believing he was hearing this after what Stanley cost him. That he would even say that at all only proved that Stan was the selfish one.

Ten years of buried anger surfaced, and Ford let his own hurt feelings fly, holding onto the grudge that was lit within him from the moment he found those toffee peanuts on the floor in the gymnasium on the day of the science fair.

“I'm selfish, Stanley? How can you say that after costing me my dream school?!”

Stanley wrinkled his nose but didn’t seem any more affected than that. Clearly costing Stanford his chance at West Coast Tech meant nothing to Stanley – it was probably why he sabotaged the machine in the first place.

Clearly, his brother was every inch of the degenerate Stanford had spent all these years imagining him as and his coffee induced agitation struggled to believe he could appeal to Stanley’s conscience – that he could get his brother to do something for the greater good rather than for his own selfish satisfaction.

Beseeching him, Stanford tried anyway, heedless of how his words could impact poorly.

“I'm giving you a chance to do the first worthwhile thing in your life and you won't even listen!”

Dismissive of Stanley’s pain, dismissive of all that he’d been through, Stanley realised that his brother was still every inch the pretentious snob he’d imagined him as. Stanford couldn’t look past himself for a second to see Stanley’s point of view. Telling him that he’d never done a worthwhile thing in his life? Stanley scowled at the realisation – Ford sounded just like dad.
“Well, listen to this: you want me to get rid of this book?” Stanley pulled his lighter out from the pocket of his bomber jacket, flicking the flint wheel, sparking a flame. “Fine, I’ll get rid of it right now!”

Stan could see Ford’s eyes widen in horror as he held the flame just below Ford’s precious journal, the paper already crisping at the edges, the faint smell of burning wafting through the room.

“No!” Ford lunged for the journal, grabbing it, trying to yank it away from Stanley desperately. “You don’t understand!”

Like a childhood game of tug of war, Stanley yanked it back, trying to hold the journal out of Ford’s reach. “You said you wanted me to have it, so I’ll do what I want with it!”

Stan held the flame under the journal again, determined to follow through with his threat.

“My research!” If this was a game, Ford was playing rough. Stanford threw himself at his brother, tackling him to the ground. The journal flew out of Stan’s hands and skidded back across the floor of the lab.

Springing away from his brother, Ford raced to the journal with a single-minded focus, a focus Stanley didn’t hesitate to take advantage of. Sticking his leg out, Stan tripped Ford, and as his chin hit the dirt floor, he noted that it had been a while since he’d fallen for that little trick.

Stanley darted in front of Ford and swiped the book from the floor, right in front of Ford’s face. He ran with the journal into the other room, the observation room. Scrambling to his feet, Ford hurtled through the door behind him.

“Stanley, give it back!” Ramming Stanley back against the motherboard, Ford wrestled his brother for the journal, heedless of the ignition sequence starting up on the computer screens behind his brother when Stan’s back squashed down upon the operating switches.

Stanford was too tired, too single minded to notice anything but his brother’s own churlish attempt to once again destroy the one thing that gave Ford’s life meaning, his research! Stanley pushed back, knocking Stanford to the floor, bearing down over him, trying to wrest the journal back, not letting his brother win. Struggling to pull the book away from him, Ford looked up at his brother’s face, and he was enraged to see Stan gritting his teeth in a way that looked like he was smiling. He was acting like this was some sort of game to him.

“You want it back, you’re gonna have to try harder than that!”

In the other room, the portal lights slowly hummed to life, the particles in the air charging with static as the four generators powered up. The lights on the Behenian fixed sigils started to glow, and like a painting coming together, the portal’s machinery interlaced to create the majesty that was its active state.

The two brothers were heedless of the portal’s developing beauty, still butting heads, unable to see outside of their own conflict – ten years of estrangement and anger venting out in their collision.

Trying to pull the journal away from Ford, Stanley heaved at the book, shouting his accusations at his twin. “You left me behind, you jerk! It was supposed to be us forever, you ruined my life!”

Unwilling to take the blame for Stanley’s path, still shirking accountability, his own hurt speaking louder than common sense, Stanford yelled back at his brother. “You ruined your own life!”

Trying to foist the journal from Stanley one more time, Ford leant on some of the combat skills he’d been practising, that Bill had been teaching him. Unaware of the hazardous conditions of the lab, of the way the machinery had been heating up, the energy flowing through the system powered by the remaining uranium they’d collected what seemed like so long ago, Ford lashed out, kicking his brother square in the chest, knocking him back against the metal system.

Stanley shouted out in pain, the concentrated heat of one of the alchemic symbols welded onto the metal frame of the computer station burning into him. The heat sizzled through the flimsy fabric of his bomber jacket, through the worn singlet below, permanently searing the imprint of the symbol onto the skin of Stan’s back.

Jarred out of his single-minded focus by Stanley’s shout of pain, Ford brought his hand to his mouth, getting to his feet, horrified that he’d hurt his brother.

He never meant for things to go this far. What were they doing?!

“Oh my gosh I'm so sorry! Are you alri-“

Ford’s frantic inquiry was cut off by a powerful roundhouse punch. He’d almost forgotten what an impressive boxer Stan had been.

Staggering backwards several feet through the safety door, Ford reeled, tripping over the lever, the final sequential step to activating the portal.

The Behenian sigils lit up, no longer pale blue, now lighting with all the spectral resonance of the rainbow. The sigils began to blur into a bright light as the eye of the portal spiralled, the wheel spinning, gaining momentum, momentum enough to rip through space-time.

If Stanford had noticed the eye of the portal spinning, he might have had the presence of mind to be more fearful of it. The very thing Bill had been waiting for, handed to him on a silver platter, by Ford’s clumsiness when he’d been so careful up to this point. Of all the things he expected to engender the apocalypse, a klutz moment was the last thing he anticipated.

But just like that, the door was opened.

However, Ford couldn’t think about that right now. He was focused on only his brother, as he stalked across the lab towards him, one eye closed, gritting against the pain, holding onto his shoulder, no doubt feeling the searing sting of the burn mark still. Ford’s stomach flipped with regret, seeing the pain he caused Stanley first hand, never having meant for things to escalate so quickly or so badly. How had everything gone so wrong in such a short period of time?

What had Stanford done?

“Some brother you turned out to be.” Stanley grunted, glaring at his brother, the upset raw in his expression.

Ten years he’d been holding out hope for forgiveness from this man and now he finally came all this way and what did he get for his trouble? His life thrown back in his face and his mistakes burned into his skin by a brother who didn’t give a damn about him.

“You care more about your dumb mysteries than your family?” Stan questioned derisively and held up the journal that Ford cared about so damn much, before shoving it against Ford’s chest, into his hands. If he wanted it, wanted that stupid book more than he wanted his family, then Stanley was going to give it to him, damn it all.

“Well then, YOU CAN HAVE 'EM.”
Ford staggered back, the journal finally in his hands, but as he went to right himself, he found his legs pinwheeling in the air.

Oh no.

This weightlessness had happened before, happened to Fiddleford, the last time this portal was turned on. Ford made a safety line to prevent further unwanted levitations, he’d worked on the parameters to minimize the field of gravitational anomalies, to localise it behind the line.

Looking down, Ford realised he was behind the line, and panicked. The portal was sucking him into it, its gravitational pull outweighing Ford’s own desire to be earthbound and secure. Wildly swinging his arms forward, trying to grasp onto something, Ford shouted out in alarm.

“Whoa, whoa, hey, what's going on? Hey, hey, Stanford—” Stanley panicked, both feet thankfully still planted on the floor, looking up at Stanford floating several feet away from him, baffled and horrified by what was happening.

When Fiddleford got sucked into the portal, Stanford was here to help him, he had a rope, he could pull him back through. When Ford had felt the pull of the portal before, when it had swept him off his feet as well, trailing behind Fiddleford on the other end of the rope, he had Bill there behind him, lightning crackling out from his body, pulling Ford back through to safety through his own peculiar magic and sheer force of will.

Bill wasn’t here right now. He was on the other side of that portal, if his claims were to be believed, and Stanford wasn’t exactly on Bill’s good side, as of present. If he went through that portal, he’d be entirely at Bill’s unholy cosmic mercy, in Bill’s domain, and if Ford thought he was being punished before…

Dread made sickly pools in Ford’s stomach, as he looked down at the only person who could hope to rescue him now, the only person he had left to rely on.

His brother.

“Stanley! Stanley, help me!”

Stanley looked around in panic, bewildered by this entire situation, searching frantically for a way to stop what he didn’t understand. “Oh, no, what do I do?!!”

“Stanley! Stanley!” Ford could feel the vibrations of the portal as the back of his trench coat was sucked through the rift, feeling the otherworldly energy sizzle through him, electricity sparking far too close to his skin. As he continued to slide through the dimensional rift, the hair on the back of his neck standing on end, he despaired of his limited choice of rescuer. His brother was just standing there, while Ford was being sucked through into Bill’s dimension, to be left at the tender mercy, or lack thereof, of his genocidal ex! Was Stanley really just going to stand there?

“Do something!” Beseeching him one last time, Ford threw his journal away from him, hoping to at least safeguard the portal the way he’d intended to rather than deliver his research into the waiting hands of Bill.

Stan caught the journal and looked up, aghast as his brother was pulled away from this world, his last diction ringing out, heard over the building hum of electricity and the blinding flash of white light.

“STANLEY!”
The blast from the portal’s surface as it engulfed his brother blew back into the room, knocking Stanley to the floor. Blinking the light from his eyes, pulling himself up off the ground, Stanley looked up at the portal, seeing the lights dimming, the wheel of the eye slowing.

“Stanford?” Stan questioned, waiting desperately for some sign of his brother, barely believing that he could be gone so suddenly, just like that.

Ford’s glasses clattered down from the gravitational field as it powered down, falling onto the floor in front of Stan with a finality that terrified him.

Running to the portal, banging his fists on the metal surface, Stanley cried out, childishly hoping that what had just happened could be undone, that this was just some fancy prank. This couldn’t have happened, this just – it wasn’t possible!?

“Stanford, come back! I-I DIDN’T MEAN IT!” Bruising his knuckles against the metal structure of the portal, the device seemed to taunt him, powering down, eradicating the hope that Stan was desperately clinging to that somehow his brother could come back, that this wasn’t entirely his fault.

Running to the lever Ford had tripped over, frantically yanking it back and forth, Stan looked between the lever and the machine. Despite how much he pulled the lever, despite what buttons he pressed, the lights weren’t turning back on. Begging the machine, begging the universe, Stan’s voice sounded out in the empty room.

“I just got him back! I can't lose him again! Ah, come on!”

The machine ignored his pleas, refusing to reignite. Despair overwhelmed him and Stanley sunk to his knees, tears welling in his eyes.

The first worthwhile thing in his whole damn life, huh? Stan had been utterly useless, unable to prevent Ford from falling into the portal. Heck, he’d caused it by fighting with him in the first place.

This was his fault.

His brother was gone and Stan’s dreams went with him.

What was he supposed to do without him?

Sobbing for his brother, hating himself and the universe for taking him from him so soon, Stanley yelled his frustrations out, until his voice was hoarse.

“STANFORD!”

What looked like a small army of shady characters assembled in the space-field in front of Bill’s quadrangle. The creatures who had arms had them crossed, and those with mouths or eyebrows seemed to be frowning at Bill in consternation.
His form stretched intimidatingly large, drumming his fingers against the arms of the mammoth throne Kryptos had crafted for him, Bill surveyed the crowd in silence, hoping that he could avoid this entire unpleasant meeting through virtue of the number of optical illusions installed on the throne. Bill was banking on them all getting headaches within the span of 3 seconds of concentrated frowning, looking away, and conveniently forgetting that they had a bone to pick with Bill in the first place.

He was treating this meeting like a staring contest, and he’d deliberately stacked the odds, hoping it would spare him from having to be accountable to these goons for what he hadn’t yet done.

No luck there though.

A creature who seemed to be a wriggling mass of fingers and teeth seemed to wiggle its thumbs more profusely, asking a question.

Bill saw this and ignored it, still hoping he could assert his dominance through this impromptu staring match and get off scot free from his obligations.

Still no luck.

“Why aren’t we on Earth yet?” Crooned the mass of wiggling thumbs, it’s voice like discordant whale song.

Ceasing to drum his fingers on the throne, Bill’s eye flicked over to the creature.

“That… is a very good question.” Was all Bill said.

The crowd stood, waiting for him to continue speaking, but the triangle remained close lipped, trying to ignore his problems until they became more convenient.

A spikey headed monstrosity decided Bill needed more prompting. “What’s the hold up?”

“Yeah!” The crowd concurred, their voices rising to a collective rabble of mutinous murmurings.

“I thought you said we were on track!”

“The compass said we were ahead of schedule.”

“I should be eating humans by the handful by now!”

“What’s the big idea?”

Bill allowed the chatter to escalate, glaring at Kryptos for good measure, blaming the compass for at least half of this situation. Kryptos was looking away though, ignoring Bill, borrowing his technique, and that just made Bill seethe.

As the crowd’s fervour continued to rile up, Bill could feel Pyronica nudge his foot with her elbow, prompting him to say something to settle this.

Holding his hands up, his voice echoing through the vacuum of space loud enough to drown out all this scurrilous chatter, Bill attempted to make a statement.

“We are on track. The portal is complete and will be ready to go any day now.”

The crowd still mumbled, narrowing their eyes at Bill like his statement was debatable.
“Well, if it’s ready, why isn’t it open yet?” Shouted one particularly aspiring investor.

“I’m … waiting for the right moment.” Bill said, bullshitting rather than telling the truth to these vultures. He could tell though, from the expressions of those in the know, that this excuse wasn’t going down well.

He could have pulled it off if Kryptos hadn’t been rolling his damn eye.

“Bullshit you are.” Yelled one of the creatures, calling Bill out. “If it’s ready, why can’t the moment be now?”

“Yeah, stop stalling! We made a deal!”

“YEAH!”

The seditious mumbling turned into angry shouts and Bill was facing down a mob of dissenting fiends from his omni-coloured throne. If they kept this nonsense up, he’d have to make an example of a few of them soon enough, and he didn’t want this meeting to turn into a massacre, he still needed their support.

“HEY INGRATES!” Bill shouted, matching fire with fire like he was want to. “CAN IT AND LISTEN!”

The angry shouting dimmed down, and the crowd looked at Bill, taking him more seriously now that he wasn’t just staring them down in silence. He towered over the crowd, fire dancing in his closed fists, reminding them all of exactly who they were dealing with, and they paid attention.

“It’s MY portal, and I decide when and who gets to go through. Now I made deals with the vast majority of you already that I will be getting us through to earth for our funpocalypse, and I am a shape of my word. A deal is a deal. However, I didn’t shake hands with you all agreeing that this project would run on your time, it runs on your DIME! You should remember that and remember who to be grateful to that you’re even getting this opportunity at all.”

“Um, Boss.” Kryptos piped up quietly, inching closer to the base of his throne, not quite bold enough to nudge Bill’s leg like Pyronica had.

Ignoring Kryptos, Bill continued talking. “Now AND at the end of the day, you should remember who to be thankful for, who’s been pulling the strings and doing all this hard work to get the party door up and running. And it isn’t the articulated asshole in the crowd shouting criticisms, and it isn’t the hypocrites who hate time, but have spent half of this meeting tapping their watches regardless. You KNOW who to be grateful to, and he’s been sitting right in front of you this entire time. You should treat him with a little more respect.”

“Boss!” Kryptos hissed, gritting his teeth, floating closer to Bill’s leg to tap him on the foot now, interrupting his fire and brimstone routine, trying to get him to look to the left of the space-field where a bright rip in spacetime had begun to open.

“So, I want you to say it all together with me now, so we’re all on the same page. At the count of three, alright, you say –” Bill waved his hands like he was conducting the crowd and the more easily led fiends in the audience were preparing themselves to follow Bill’s instructions.

“This portal and all the opportunities it entails are all thanks to …”

Before the crowd could parrot Bill’s phrasing, Bill spared a glance to Kryptos, who was tapping on Bill’s foot like he was hitting the button on interdimensional hotseat for bleventy billion QUID.
Kryptos was pointing frantically at a growing circle of light on the edge of the space field, and when Bill followed Kryptos’ gaze he saw the rip in space time level itself, and spit out into the waiting void none other than –

“SIXER!!!??”

“This portal and all the opportunities it entails are all thanks to Sixer.” The slower members of the crowd droned, before they paused, confused by the sentence they'd just repeated, looking to the triangle for clarification.

Bill wasn’t looking at them, he was looking at the human who the portal had spat out, floating in the void with his back to Bill, blinking in his surroundings, before reaching into his trench coat pocket for his spare pair of glasses, putting them on cautiously.

Kryptos could see that Bill didn’t seem to be phased by the human’s interruption, rather he seemed utterly delighted, his eye curving with mirth just looking at the adrift scientist, like this was the best thing Bill had seen all millennia.

Stanford looked around him, shocked to be suspended in this otherworldly place, floating in space. He spun around, trying to see where he was, and instantly locked eyes with the colossal figure of his God, the triangle glowing brightly, beaming down at him.

His voice boomed across the cosmos, brimming with an intimidating enthusiasm, as Bill leaned over to look down at Stanford’s hovering form.

“WELL, WELL, WELL, LOOK WHO DECIDED TO PAY ME A VISIT?”

Stanford swallowed nervously.

Bill clasped his hands together gleefully.

Stanford said nothing for a while, floating in front of Bill and his assembled army, taking in the looming equilateral, until he finally uttered the only word that could correctly surmise the situation.

“Fuck.”

Chapter End Notes

This chapter is dedicated to Haley3, who wrote the sort of comments that sweep writers off their feet. I'll have you know I read your comment a ridiculous number of times over and over, even to this day. This is also less specifically dedicated to everyone who said nice things about the Stan chapter. You all soothed my anxious soul there, and I thank you for it.
(also to the person who keeps leaving gorgeous sketch dumps anonymously in imgur links, I love you, I just love you. your art is so good! also dat Valencia - DAMN!) I hope you all enjoyed the chapter, let me know what you thought! I'm already 1/4 of the way through the next chapter and I'm so excited because SPACE HIJINKS!!!!!! SPAAAACE HIIIIIIJINNNKSSSSSSS!!!!!!!!!!!!!
Ford was almost hesitant to open his eyes, sucked through to the other side of the portal. The visions Fiddleford had seen on the other side drove him to madness. Ford could still remember him seizing up, twitching on the floor of the lab, froth spilling out from between his teeth, pupils blown wide as he attempted to process what he encountered on the other side.

However, floating blind wasn’t ideal. Ford had to know what he was up against, what he had fumbled into.

Opening his eyes slowly, Ford found himself hovering, gravity holding him no longer, as he floated in this singular patch of space. His vision was blurry, bright lights and swirling rainbows of colour standing out against the dark backdrop of space, and as he reached into his pocket for his spare pair of glasses, sliding them up the bridge of his nose, everything snapped into clear focus, though the view was no less of a psychedelic blur.

Like staring at oil reflecting across the surface of a soap bubble, the colours shifted fluidly, gaseous clouds of chemicals and dust seeming like liquid, almost, painting swirling atmospheric distortions across the space-field before him.

He saw the portal close up behind him, the blue light fading to black, and just like that, he was abandoned here in another dimension.

Before the dread could properly set in, Ford reluctantly conceded one thing.

This place was oddly beautiful.

Stars sparkled in the gaps between the colourful clouds, debris and flyaway elements shining like mercury dancing in a crucible. This place was colour intensified upon itself, colour like Ford had never seen before, endlessly refracting against its surroundings, light and patterns sliding chaotically through the void in a manner that was quite visually satisfying.

Without having to guess, Ford could tell that this was Bill’s domain. When he had first imagined his muse, puzzling over where a creature like Bill could possibly come from, he had never thought to imagine a place like this, but somehow it suited him more than words could describe.

This malleable, constantly changing landscape, full of rich colours, vibrant patterns and surprising contortions was exactly the kind of creative chaos that Ford could believe muses were born of.

It was like the exhilarating highs of a dream, soaring above what humans knew colour to be, only becoming nightmarish when one woke and the body rebelled against what it had seen.

Ford wondered how this place came to be.

He would have had more time to wonder, if he couldn’t feel the hairs on the back of his neck standing on end, the weight of a familiar gaze playing upon him.

Trying awkwardly to turn around (Ford hadn’t much experience with floating outside of Bill’s influence, always having had gravity to cradle his movements) he decided this felt a lot like swimming, and right now he was treading water, scooping air up under his arms as he turned in the thick watery atmosphere. He was holding his breath almost, his body reacting to the thick press of his surroundings the way it was accustomed to when underwater, but upon realising he wouldn’t choke breathing it in, he let the strange air fill his lungs.

By rights he should have suffocated by now, it was only belatedly that Ford remembered Bill’s ‘enhancements’ made to Ford’s lungs. It was certainly coming in handy now, all things considered.

Though he didn’t know if now was the time to be inwardly grateful for his muse’s intervention.

Not when he was on Bill’s turf now. And they had unfinished business together.

The prickle on the back of his neck only intensified and so Ford resigned himself to turning around fully, gazing up in horror at the sight that awaited him.

There was his muse, towering over a crowd of strange and shadowy beasts, perched on a throne made of endlessly shifting optical illusions. Bill seemed to be about 20 feet tall as of present, looming like a skyscraper over the collected army of monsters assembled.

He could crush Ford easily under his fingertip. It would be like being squashed by a double decker bus. Ford had never been more excruciatingly aware of his own delicate mortality before this moment and he’d never been more aware that the god he chose to invite into his life then betray so soundly was the wrong god to antagonise.

Bill was as formidable as he was mad, and Ford was waiting for his untimely end to come, waiting for Bill to take his revenge on him – but as he squinted up at the god, looking past the throne that was already giving him a headache just from staring at it – he was surprised to note that Bill’s eye was curved with joy.

He was happy?

“WELL, WELL, WELL, LOOK WHO DECIDED TO PAY ME A VISIT!” Bill’s voice boomed throughout the cosmos, rattling Ford’s bones, and though he clapped his hands together in delight, still smiling down on the scientist, Ford could only think the worst.

This intimidating being was his ex.

He was so screwed.

“Fuck.” Ford muttered under his breath, the curse word coming out an undignified croak.

Clasping his hands together winsomely, Bill batted his eyelashes at Ford, his voice still preternaturally loud. Was Bill always this loud? Did he have to speak so loud? Ford’s caffeine headache protested profusely, as Bill beamed down at him.

“Ad Astra Per Aspera, and now look at you. Crossing dimensions in your big boy boots, bringing the party to me. I can’t think of anything more perfect.” Bill crooned dotingly, almost forgetting where he was.

“Boss, what is that?” One of the henchmen in the crowd questioned, the entire assembly all looking at Stanford.

Ford wasn’t sure what language the creature was speaking. It didn’t sound like English, or any language Ford was familiar with. When he concentrated, he realised that while he could understand Bill’s words, the muse also wasn’t speaking English, yet the human could pick up on what was being communicated.

How unusual. Perhaps it was this place? Some kind of translatable aura hovering over this meeting? It was jarring to realise that he could understand what was being said, even if it wasn’t being said in a language he could speak. How bizarre.

Flippantly, almost dismissively, as if he’d rather not focus on his investors, or on anyone but Stanford, Bill waved his hand and answered.

“That’s my human, Sixer.”

“A HUMAN?” The crowd seemed both incised and delighted by this peculiar twist of circumstance and already they were rumbling with enthusiasm at the sight of this rare specimen, gnashing their teeth and growling hungrily.

“Can we eat him?” One particularly aspiring creature put their hand up, asking what everyone was thinking.

Unfortunately, their forwardness was not to be rewarded.

Ford could see the red fill Bill’s eye in an instant, and within a fraction of a second, his muse had turned around, the red colouring the bricks on his back and no doubt all over, fire dancing in his fists as he screeched.

“NO!”

The offending monster who asked on behalf of the group was incinerated in an instant, their pained howl petering off, a quick and painful death delivered as an example to the others.

Stanford tensed, his every muscle frozen. Making excuses for Bill’s presumed actions was one thing, Stanford had never technically seen Bill kill someone with his own eyes, but here right in front of him he reduced another monster to smoking rubble for threatening to eat Ford.

While Stanford was grateful he wasn’t on the menu, he was shocked that Bill had just killed someone, right in front of him.

The crowd of monsters quivered away from Bill, cowering, though many still watched Stanford with interest, saliva drooling from their maws.

His bricks brightening to a friendly yellow once more, Bill’s tone turned sweet and indulgent again, his whiplash personality even more pronounced like this, meeting him in his own environment.

This wasn’t the Bill who appeared one way or another to appeal to Stanford, this was holistically Bill, and for the first time Stanford felt he was getting a glimpse of what his muse really was.

“He’s a guest, don’t be rude. Way to make a good first impression, guys. See, this is why I don’t bring people home. This is why.”

A pink skinned Cyclops, another towering fiend, standing beside Bill’s omni-coloured throne tilted her head at Ford, taking him in. Unlike the other beasts, she didn’t look like she wanted to devour him – she seemed intelligent, almost. Though that didn’t mean she wasn’t thinking about eating him, Ford thought as he stared back at her warily.
“Do we get a proper introduction, or is he just going to stand there?” She asked, and as her question wasn’t met with fire and brimstone, Ford presumed she was slightly more familiar with Bill than the rest of this frightening cohort.

“Right, right.” Bill wagged his finger in the air, remembering his manners, seeming flustered almost.

“Why does he smell so bad?” Asked one of the creatures closer to the throne, a floating freemasons compass with an eye. Although he didn’t appear to have a nose, he was wrinkling his eye and waving his hand in front of his surface, looking scornfully at Ford like he wasn’t impressed.

“Do all humans smell like that?” Asked the creature to the left of the compass, some kind of obese minotaur monster, with a pacifier where its bellybutton should be.

Ford would have looked offended, but he knew the monsters had a point. He had been deliberately avoiding showering, mostly because it seemed to drive Bill away, offending the muse. He didn’t think they could talk though, considering how corpulent some of the monsters seemed.

“Poor hygiene and lack of sanitary development on Earth has historically caused bad odours.” Another creature spoke in a delicate, pronounced way. They appeared to be what looked like an unfolded cubics cube, eyes blinking on each of their squares, dangling tassels flicking left and right as it spoke. “They lost most of the technology for indoor plumbing in the Roman era, and only redeveloped it a scant 200 years ago.”

“I see. I see.” The creature beside the unfolded cubics cube nodded, rubbing his chin thoughtfully. This creature looked how tinned spam looked when upended on a plate, but with blue skin and arms and legs. The creature had a keyhole shape missing from its forehead, and Ford could see right through the hole, as the being nodded thoughtfully, assessing Ford like he was a rare artwork, and he, the viewer, was utterly stoned.

“Sixer doesn’t smell bad.” Bill waved his hand, defending Ford’s reputation, before he put his hand up beside his eye, stage whispering an aside to the gathered mob. “Though I can’t speak for the rest of humanity, HA!”

Ford floated, brows furrowed, growing quite cross that he was almost being ignored. They were all speaking about him, without speaking to him or acknowledging him really. It was only when Bill turned his attention back to Stanford, towering over him, rubbing under his eye pensively, that Ford realised being ignored was preferable.

“Though now that you mention it, I have been meaning to fix that. Let’s see…”

Ford tensed warily and Bill clicked his fingers. In an instant, cold blue flames tore across Ford’s skin, and he panicked, fearing that his time had come, and Bill was now burning him alive like he had to that outspoken monster.

He was too young, gifted, and important to die. Oh god, let this not be the end.

Shutting his eyes, unwilling to look death in the face, Ford found death by incineration much colder than he imagined, although heaven smelling like fabric softener was exactly what the advertisements on the radio had promised.

Pausing as he processed that thought again, Ford slowly opened his eyes to note his skin was not charred to a crisp, nor were his bones left in ashes – in fact, after a split second of pain gone so quick it felt as if it had barely hurt at all, Ford’s skin looked in better condition than before, and rubbing his finger and thumb together, Ford could have sworn he felt distinctly moisturised. Inclining his head, he sniffed the collar of his trench coat surreptitiously and noted soapy lavender undertones.

Instead of incinerating him, Bill had… given him a bath?

“Oh, that’s muuuch better. Isn’t that better?” Bill turned back to the crowd of ogres and demons, channelling the saleswoman from the shopping channel he’d spent so many lazy hours watching back on Earth. “Less skin bacteria and more sparkling freshness.”

As he waved his hands, sparkles appeared in the air before him, and the audience of monsters started to clap politely, as if Bill was a magician and cleaning humans was a party trick.

“And on top of that, guess what else I gave him? Go on, guess.”

Ford mentally lurched, reeling with the realisation that Bill had once again without his permission altered his body. Ford felt sick at the thought that Bill only had to snap his fingers to physically alter his chemical composition, not just the condition of his clothes, and the fact that Bill was treating this ‘home renovation’ like some sort of game show would have had the bile rise up Ford’s throat but for the fact that he had never felt so physically well his entire life.

Still, as he settled into his improved condition, he realised it was beyond grating to see the assembled monsters playing along with Bill’s madness, raising their hands trying to guess what fiendish things Bill had done to him. If the frivolity of it all wasn’t insulting, their suggestions certainly were.

“Space rabies?” Guessed one monster.

“A new hovercar!” Presumed another giddily. Collectively they continued to shout, certain words standing out from the hooting and cackling of the crowd.

“Emphysema!”

“Immeasurable financial debt!”

“Burrowing skin spiders!”

“The Berenstain Bears Boxed Set!”

“Go home, Keyhole.” Bill countered as the fiendish crew around him laughed and heckled one another, clearly entertained by Bill’s antics. The jeering and laughter got louder, as the suggestions kept rolling in.

“A million QUID?”

“A parasite?”

“OOOH OOOH, A TAPEWORM!”

“Don’t steal my idea. I just said that.”

“No, you didn’t – a parasite can be anything. A tapeworm is far more specific. I know I’d want one.”

“You can’t afford one.”
“Existential dread?”
“Gastric bypass surgery?”
“A lobotomy?”
“A trip to the Space Bahamas?”

Holding his hand up to silence the suggestions, Bill divulged, and Stanford waited, having grown more apprehensive with every suggestion, holding his breath in fearful anticipation.

“I gave him – total allergy immunity, partial radiation tolerance, atmospheric pressure resistance, cholesterol free blood vessels, a more capable digestive system, a haircut, AND a brand new liver!”

Ford brought a hand up to feel his face, noting that Bill had also trimmed down his stubble, and his stomach flipped, fear followed swiftly by relief that he’d got off comparatively easy. He’d been imagining far worse amendments to his anatomy and the monster’s suggestions weren’t helping his fatalistic imagination.

Although ‘it could have been worse’ wasn’t exactly a glowing testimonial to Bill’s behaviour. He still altered Ford’s physicality without his consent, he transplanted his goddamn liver, and judging from the applause from the crowd, Bill didn’t feel the least bit sorry for his transgression.

Bill was bowing, courting the applause, practically eating it up.

“I want a liver!” Complained someone in the crowd.

“You get a free liver. You get a free liver!” Bill pointed at various monsters, slimy livers dripping viscera appearing in the air before them. The monsters fell upon the livers like they were hundred-dollar bills, some holding their livers in the air, dancing cheerfully, others devouring the organ immediately, blood running between their teeth as they chewed.

Despite his internal organs apparently having been refurbished, Ford still felt queasy with nausea watching these creatures bite into their livers, his hand coming down to cradle his stomach, imagining those teeth sinking into his own organs with such gusto.

He could presume, judging from Bill’s fierce reaction earlier, and from the amendments he made to Ford’s physique, that the triangle wasn’t going to hurt him, but Ford had no guarantees that the other monsters wouldn’t set their sights on him. He wasn’t safe here. He needed to leave. Soon, before the madness of this entire situation began to impact his sanity.

He felt powerless, giddy, terrified, and elated all at the same time, being here, his thoughts whiplashing between vast and varied conclusions, feeling frightened and fascinated all at the same time, and he hated it.

He didn’t feel like himself, he didn’t feel right.

Was it something in the air? Was Ford just going mad, floating in front of the God who tricked him, feeling grateful his insides hadn’t been melted with that snap?

Ford was still angry with Bill, he’d been driving Ford insane. He hadn’t slept in weeks. Bill had lied to him, betrayed him, made his suffering the entertainment of these fiendish monsters no doubt, and now he was acting like he’d given Ford a gift? A haircut and an organ transplant? And that was supposed to make Ford forgive him and play along with this charade? Was he insane?
The monsters were still laughing, still impressed with Bill, none of them thinking to question his actions – the morality of them, or at least the impact they had on Ford. Was no one in this damn dimension prepared to think sensibly? To think for themselves, rather than just float along with this senseless madness?

As if to comfort Ford in his despair, one of the denizens in the crowd spoke up, the blue compass pointing at Ford, his eye furrowed with frustration.

“But what is he doing here? He’s not supposed to be here.”

“He’s visiting me, Kryptos.” Bill countered, turning around to blink down at Ford fondly. “He’s exactly where he’s supposed to be.”

“But he’s supposed to be on Earth. He’s supposed to be with the portal!” Kryptos, the compass, stomped his little feet, obviously frustrated, before he pointed at Ford accusingly. “If he’s here, then who is going to open the doorway?”

Ford could see Bill’s warm expression sour, his eye sliding to the side, although he didn’t appear to be irate at Ford for not being where he was supposed to be, he seemed rather more miffed at the compass for questioning him.

The crowd of monsters seemed to slowly cotton on to the compass’s logic.

“Yeah. If he’s here – how are we getting through to the other side?”

“We should be on Earth by now.”

“Who’s going to open the door?”

The compass pointed at Ford again, deliberately raising his voice here. “He sabotaged us!”

The rabble of angry voices grew louder, more mutinous.

Stanford knew that having a gaggle of horrendous beasts angry with him wasn’t an ideal outcome, but he didn’t care about that. In this very moment, he was elated.

The compass had outlined Ford’s win.

He’d done it.

This is how he could protect the portal. This was his solution.

This was it, he was the Man Who Saved the World.

He had, in this instant, beaten Bill Cipher. He’d beaten a God.

Bill’s large eye was looking off to the side, he seemed to be frowning, the crowd getting unruly. If he didn’t control their caustic rabble soon, things could get very ugly very quickly.

Looking to Sixer, hoping he could convey how to best handle this situation to the human, Bill was surprised to see that rather than appearing panicked or frightened, Ford was smiling.

Turning his grin upward, his face triumphant and smug, Sixer sealed his fate.

“Checkmate.”
Bill was stunned.

The crowd fell silent, listening to Ford’s bold claim, confirmation that this was in fact sabotage.

This strange human had sabotaged Bill Cipher’s plans, and now he was gloating about it.

The henchmen and members of the crowd held their breath in anticipation, looking between Bill and the human, expecting the Boss to retaliate. This human had disrespected Bill and Bill did not tolerate disrespect from anyone.

Bill narrowed his eye, leaning back to take in Sixer’s defiant form properly. Giddy anticipation rose within the ranks of demons and denizens, eager to see the carnage that was to come.

“So, you’re here to play games, are you?” Bill asked, his voice controlled, quiet almost, a foreboding sign of pending disaster coming from Bill.

Bill floated closer to Ford, and for a moment Ford thought that Bill was going to take him down the good old-fashioned way, viscerally imagining being squashed between the God’s fingers once again.

Although the way Bill’s eye slid to the side, checking on the monsters behind him, before turning back to face Stanford led the scientist to believe that the triangle had other motives for changing his tune to sinister vengeance. This seemed almost like a stage play, the way Bill’s audience were held on tenterhooks, waiting for the god to retaliate.

“We can do that.”

Ford realised that the reason Bill floated closer to him, was not to squash him at close range, but so the crowd of monsters behind him couldn’t see his expression. From this angle, only Stanford could see as Bill blinked his eye at the human, and the word ‘RUN’ replaced his slitted pupil for a split second.

Rearing back, as if he hadn’t warned Ford at all, Bill theatrically held his hand in the air, his voice booming and jovial again.

“HOW ABOUT A GAME OF INTERDIMENSIONAL CHESS! THIS TIME YOU’RE THE PAWN!”

Ford had barely a moment to process what had just happened before Bill snapped his fingers, rallying his monsters into action. Clearly, Bill’s command was the only thing holding the beasts back, as the instant he snapped his fingers one of the creatures broke from the ranks behind Bill and hurtled towards Ford, a writhing ball of teeth and fingers, roaring like a wounded whale.

Ford flinched back, fight or flight instincts telling him flight was very necessary, and he swam frantically through the air away from the howling beast. The atmosphere was like water, and Ford was doing his best impersonation of Mark Spitz at the 1972 Summer Olympics, seeking shelter in the nearby asteroid field.

As he swam through the thick belt of floating space rocks he could hear the raucous laughter, growls and whooping cheers of the beasts as they all joined in the foray, seeking him out amidst the planetary debris.

Not willing to remain out in the open, a floating target, Ford saw a rather large asteroid riddled with deep craters and swam towards it, seeking refuge within its stony caverns.
Hidden from sight, Ford panted, leaning up against the cave wall, and he could hear Bill’s voice, loud and shrill, echoing out across the space field, hyping the monsters up.

“SIXER WANTS TO PLAY HIDE-AND-SEEK! FIRST ONE TO FIND HIM AND BRING HIM TO ME GETS THEIR OWN GALAXY!”

The gleeful laughter of Bill’s fiendish friends intensified as creatures large and small all raced off to locate Ford, like this was a game, like they did this all the time. This was entertaining to them, and Bill was their entertainer, setting his beasts upon Stanford for sport.

Ford gritted his teeth as he realised that Bill’s warning probably wasn’t a warning at all, he was just setting Ford up for failure, after all predators love a moving target. Ford running away only excited them all the more. He probably wouldn’t have interested them if he’d just stayed still, maybe then at least his death would have been quick.

Although his skin had been cleaned and his liver replaced, Ford was still deliriously sleep deprived. A haircut and a bath couldn’t undo the damage a solid three weeks without sleep had done to his psyche, and in his exhausted state, defiance and anger still boiling in his blood, Ford was half tempted to surrender himself, just so he could curse Bill out right to his face. Bill had wanted a piece of Ford’s mind before and, right now, Ford was sorely tempted to let him have it.

Stanford was livid with Bill, for many reasons, but the one that stood out from the many grievances Ford was holding against him, was Bill’s transgression back there in the space field.

He had promised Stanford that he wouldn’t alter his anatomy without permission and he broke that promise.

How many promises would Bill turn into lies?

“And if I don’t ask first, you can just punch me again.” Bill had said, and right now Ford was feeling like taking him up on that.

Clenching his fists, mumbling to himself, Ford was readying to step out of the cave, itching to punch Bill right in his big stupid eye. Sure, he might die, but if there was ever a way to go out in a blaze of glory, punching a god in the face would do it.

“I could do it.” Ford muttered to himself. “I’ve done it before. Just go right up to him and –“

A small squeak interrupted his crazed mumbling, and Ford turned around, bringing his fists up in front of him, prepared to fight his way out of whatever fresh hell this was.

On the other side of the cave, a shivering family of aliens stood around a glittering purple fire, cowering away from Ford.

Surprised, Ford lowered his fists and held his hands out gently in front of him. “I’m sorry. I thought you were – I didn’t mean to scare you.”

The aliens squeaked and snorted at him, gesturing to him like they were trying to converse with him.

Ford looked at the gathered creatures in confusion. They were an unusual assembly, diverse in appearance. They all looked so peculiar to Ford, so utterly alien, that in that first moment of squeaking miscommunication, they seemed like just another cohort of monsters, like Bill’s crew, only smaller and less threatening. Perhaps it was the way they cowered back from him, rather than lunging at him with teeth bared.
They seemed intelligent though, growing increasingly frustrated with the language barrier, as they continued to squeak at Ford, their questions going unanswered.

One of them looked like a swashbuckling guinea pig, buck teeth protruding out from under a tiny pink nose, fur covering its body. The creature was missing an arm, a metal limb replacing the appendage, and it wore an eyepatch over one eye. The other aliens around the pirate guinea pig ranged from some sort of pink skinned pig-faced goblin, a long-necked bug-eyed amphibian creature with its’ arm wrapped in bandages, and a squat horned creature with a nose like a stag beetle. They all seemed to be carrying weapons, Ford could see the pig nosed goblin carrying some sort of ray gun over its shoulder and the horned alien sporting a futuristic looking harpoon.

They continued to jabber at Ford, pointing at him then pointing to the mouth of the cave, as if asking him to leave. Ford stammered in reply, not knowing what he could say that would save him from Bill’s goons outside, searching for him.

“I – I’m sorry, I don’t understand. I don’t understand what you’re saying. I just need to hide here, please – I don’t – I’m not going to harm you – I’m not going to –“

The guinea pig creature stood up and walked over to Ford, limping on his peg leg, growling and waving some sort of metal contraption at him. Ford backed up warily, until his back hit the cave wall.

“Wait – I promise I just want to –“

The furred alien grabbed Ford’s outstretched hand and yanked it down, strapping the metal device to his wrist. Ford struggled, pulling back from the alien, not wanting what looked like a chunky digitised metal handcuff on him, not while he was trying to escape.

The rodent man was remarkably strong though and strapped the device to Ford’s left hand despite his attempts to break free. Hitting the button on the side of the cuff, it lit up, and the rodent man glared up at him.

“Now start talking, and maybe we’ll actually get somewhere sometime this rotation.”

Ford blinked down at the rodent man. Was he speaking English?

“I – um… excuse me?” Ford questioned, baffled.

“Xznar, did you give me the busted K127X? I thought we had a good one?” The rodent frowned down at the contraption on Ford’s wrist, and then looked over to the bug-eyed amphibian creature, who shrugged.

“That’s the only one we had left. We haven’t needed to use it since Bovin got his Scendurian up to scratch.”

“I can swear in sixty-six different languages now!” The pig nosed goblin cheered, grinning gamely at his peers.

“Yeah, and don’t we all know it.” The rodent rolled his eye, and the group all guffawed in a friendly manner.

Now that Ford could actually understand them, their squeaking squawking language sounded less frightening and antagonistic and he relaxed his shoulders a little, not as on edge as he was before.

“I can understand you.” Ford said, sounding impossibly relieved.
“It’s like he’s never seen a dimensional translator before.” The rodent joked.

“I haven’t.” Ford admitted.

“Where are you from, traveller?” asked the horned creature in the corner.

“No, don’t tell me.” The pig nosed goblin shook his head dramatically. “I don’t want to live in a dimension without Seven Blelevens!”

The crew of aliens laughed, and the rodent man, who seemed to be their leader, judging from the assured way he spoke, waved Ford over to the fire, walking back towards its heat now that Ford didn’t seem to be a threat.

“Don’t listen to him. Come, sit, talk. You must be lost. When things go missing in the multiverse they usually end up here. This place is like the trash chute at the end of every backwards dimensional wormhole.” Sitting down once more on a boulder at the back of the cave, the rodent man continued talking. “We were asteroid miners, harvesting iron and platinum from the ore, out on a job. The belt we were working on must have rotated through a wormhole. One minute we were on the working, digging deep in the rock, the next minute we wind up here, with the air spitting froth at us. This is a lawless place, the worst sort of place to come and die.”

“How did you get here?” asked Xznar, the amphibian man, inching closer to the fire.

Stepping up beside the glittering campfire, warming his hands by it, Ford explained his situation. “I come from a planet called Earth and I’m a scientist. Stanford is my name. I research the paranormal and bizarre. I was given the plans to build an interdimensional portal between my dimension and this one as a way to prove my theory, by someone I thought was… was a friend. He told me he was a muse, my muse. He was a God and we became very close, but he tricked me. He was just using me all along to build his portal and, like a fool, I fell for his… his lies. I tried to stop him from using the portal, but I fought with my brother who was supposed to come to help me and the portal turned on. I fell through and it closed behind me, and I wound up here.”

The creatures all looked sympathetic, listening to Ford’s story.

Laughing to himself bitterly, Ford continued. “Now I’m stuck here with no idea how I’m getting home, or if I ever will ever again. I guess that’ll teach me, in a way. Really, it serves me right for thinking I could trust Bill Cipher.”

Ford’s open retelling of his situation was interrupted by shrieks of horror and outrage, the aliens slapping their hands over their ears as if Stanford had said something obscene.

Ford’s eyes widened, and he leaned back from the fire, holding his hands up in front of him now defensively.

“What? What did I say?”

“The name.” The rodent hissed, pointing at Ford.

“What? Bill?”

“DON’T SAY HIS NAME!!” The creatures all screeched at Ford, looking between him and the mouth of the cave apprehensively.

“Sorry! Sorry.” Ford apologised awkwardly, still not knowing why it was such a crime to say Bill’s name.
“You invoke the name of one of the most feared beings in the multiverse, boy.” The pirate guinea pig said ominously, pointing at Ford with his metal arm. “That’s not something you bandy about in casual conversation.”

“I hear if you say his name three times out loud, he can crawl inside your head.” Xznar recounted fearfully.

“I hear he uses people’s eyes to see through.” Bovin the pig goblin offered, looking over his shoulder as he spoke. “And he can watch you wherever you are whenever. I hear there’s a whole dimension of beings who gouged out their eyes so he couldn’t see through them and their one eyed king lives in perpetual fear. He’s always watching, all the time, every single second of the day!”

“Oh, um. No, I don’t think he is.” Ford offered awkwardly, trying to calm them some. “He’s actually quite lazy.”

“You think you know your ‘Muse’, boy?” The rodent pirate sneered at him. “That he tricked you at all, is proof that you know nothing.”

Appropriately cowed, Ford lowered his head, realising that these creatures were right, he clearly knew nothing about what Bill was capable of.

“He uses this in-between place as a hideout for his crew, a bunch of crazed wanted outlaws, banned from every Federation-protected dimension in the multiverse, spat out into the ass end of space. While they’re roaming around out there, we can’t find the wormhole that will send us back to our base station, because if those maniacs find us – well, you don’t wanna know what happened to the last group of refugees seen around here.”

The horned alien rubbed its neck nervously, and Ford wondered what had happened to the last group of refugees, or if it was better not knowing.

“Half of the multiverse is just waiting for this place to implode and take every last lawless cretin living here with it. Never thought we’d end up here though.” The rodent man sighed and shook his head solemnly.

“Implode? What do you mean?” Ford frowned, looking out at the multicoloured spectrum spew that was this dimension, swirling about outside of the asteroid cave.

“This Nightmare Realm is fated to self-destruct eventually.” Xznar explained. “It has no stable physics, no consistency with its structure. It’s as lawless as the beings who reside here, and as such instability cannot support itself, it will soon crumple under its own unreality. Its days are numbered, no one can tell how long it will last for.”

“That explains why he was moving in on your turf.” Bovin shrugged, poking the purple fire with a stick. “Piggybacking your brain to make a door into a different dimension. Seems like a last resort to me. Like vermin fleeing a sinking ship. You’ve gotta be some kind of idiot to let him in though. I’m sure he spun it like a real pity party. You sure got duped.”

“He never told me.” Ford said quietly, looking at the fire, his emotions pulling in different directions, impossible to read while he was so tired. He felt something like a twinge of sympathy, but it was hard to perceive beneath all the betrayal and hurt.

“You aren’t feeling sorry for him now, are you?” The rodent pirate squinted at Ford from his one good eye, waving his metal arm at him. “If you’re sympathizing with that devil, you can find another cave to squat in. Or go outside and let his cronies tear you limb from limb. If you’re in his
“No, no. I’m not – I’m not in any camp. I – Bill tricked me.” Ford insisted, trying to convince the aliens of his allegiance before they all reached for their weapons. “He sabotaged my destiny, he ruined my life, he cost me everything I’ve ever known. He used me to build his portal, to suit his needs, and he lied to me every step of the way. If anyone has reason to hate Bill, it’s me. If anyone wants their own back, wants revenge, it’s me!”

The aliens gave Ford sceptical looks but were no longer reaching for their weapons.

“I stopped him from entering my world by going through the portal. I’m the only one who can operate it, and now it’s there and I’m here, and he has no way of getting into my dimension. I did that.” Ford said, claiming credit for his unintentional blunder into this dimension. Better to act like he knew what he was doing there than look like even more of a fool in front of these world weary asteroid miners. “I’m not on his side, I did everything I could to stop him.”

The pirate rodent gave him a long hard look, before he wiggled his nose, and nodded. “Arr. We’re being too harsh on you. There’s no being too careful out here. We’re all just trying to find our way home.”

“What are the chances I’ll get back to my own dimension someday?” Ford asked, already dreading the answer.

“You didn’t come through one of the wormholes out on the edges. You made your wormhole close on after you. That door is shut now.” Xznar said solemnly. “If you were trying to protect your dimension, I’m not sure you want that door to open again. You’d only be leaving your world vulnerable.”

“The chance of getting back home is slim for you, boy.” Their guinea pig leader deduced. “You might not ever see your stars again.”

“We’re waiting for the right moment to go back through the wormhole we came in on.” Bovin offered. “All the wormholes on the edge of this place go to different dimensions, different galaxies. If you can manage to get past those maniacs out there, you could make your way to a better life somewhere. Somewhere far away from here.”

Ford was silent for a moment, processing that. There really was no going home for him. Everything he knew, his friends, Fiddleford and Willow, his brother Stanley, his parents, his house - the world he once knew was now cut off from him, possibly forever. There was no going back, and Ford didn’t even know where to begin moving forward. He felt like there was nowhere he could go.

The only person he knew out here was Bill and it was becoming apparent that Ford didn’t know anything about his former muse. He’d learnt more about Bill from these weathered asteroid miners in a single conversation than he’d learned in all of his years courting Bill’s regard.

He reached into the pocket of his trenchcoat and withdrew his notebook, peering at the pages of rudimentary notes he’d collected on Bill during his time with him. Brushing his thumb over the paper, Ford bit his bottom lip, trying to stave the bitter wistfulness off his face, to hide the way it hurt him when he looked at his list of Bill’s weaknesses and only saw the superficial listed.

Sugary foods, apple cider, and ticklish sides wouldn’t do a damn against Bill, not now that Ford had seen how truly powerful he was. He was frustrated beyond belief with the knowledge that everything he thought he knew about his God was useless against him, it could have all been lies. He tried very hard not to look at the final dot point on the list of Bill’s weaknesses he’d made that fateful Summerween night. He still felt too raw to really assess whether he counted as one of Bill’s weaknesses after all, or if that was just one of the many lies the god had spun, lulling Ford into a false sense of complacency.

It galled Ford to realise that he really knew nothing about Bill, and if knowledge was power, that truly made him weak.

“You alright, son?” The rodent pirate questioned kindly and Ford hurriedly shoved the notepad back into his trenchcoat pocket.

“You say these other wormholes go to different places?” He questioned, trying to regain his composure.

“Sure.” The rodent pirate nodded. “And then there’s wormholes beyond that, and even more beyond that that go all sorts of places. Some occur naturally and spit you out in odd places like this. Others, folks have harnessed, made them practical. They can get you from A to B.”

“Is there anywhere else in the multiverse I can go where I can find out more about Bill?” Ford asked, determination colouring his features.

“I –” The rodent looked almost offended, before he noted the steely glint in Ford’s eye, and reassessed his opinion of the human. “Not much is really known about him, besides rumours. You pick up pieces here and there, but who knows how much of it is real? Why’d you even want to know?”

“I meant what I said.” Ford replied, his mouth turning down at the edges as he spoke. “Bill tricked me. If I have to visit every dimension in the multiverse to find a way to get back at him, I will. There’s got to be more to learn. His weaknesses, his secrets. I was foolish before, but I won’t let it happen again.”

The creatures around the fire were watching him now with an expression akin to awe, as he continued his speech.

“I don’t stand a chance against him now, I can see that much, but if I bide my time, build my strength, amass my knowledge and power then one day I can return to this Nightmare Realm and put an end to his madness once and for all. I might never see home again, but if I can save the multiverse from that which they most fear, from him, then that will be enough for me. Payback for the life he stole from me.”

“You’re going to fight him? To stand against him?” Xznar questioned warily.

“And take him down if I have to.” Ford nodded solemnly.

Suddenly the creatures around the campfire let out a great shout, cheering.

“PRAISE THE AXOLOTL!” They cried jubilantly, throwing their fists in the air with glee.

Ford blinked at them in surprise, his mission emboldened by their support, even if he had no idea what they were saying.

“You know what, that’s the best news I’ve heard all rotation.” Said the rodent pirate, slapping his knee gleefully. “You want to take down the All Seeing Eye – all the best to you to do it.”

“It might take you a few hundred eons, if you live that long mind –“ Xznar said, patting Ford on the shoulder with his unbandaged arm. “But imagine meeting the man who took down the One “Eyed Terror.”

“That’ll be a bar story with mileage.” Bovin snorted, slapping the back of Ford’s thigh in amusement.

“Just in case you do succeed, will you sign my harpoon?” The horned creature in the corner requested, holding his harpoon aloft.

“Well, I –” Ford looked between them all, flustered, not sure if they were truly being supportive, or if they were simply making fun of him.

“You know what, kid?” The rodent pirate spoke, grinning toothily at Ford. “I’ll tell you what you wanna do, you wanna take my advice, and swim right up to that big purple wormhole on the far side there, and that’ll see you right.”

Ford looked out of the cave opening and pointed to the large purple wormhole he could see across the asteroid field. “Just – just that one there?”

“That’s the one.” The rodent nodded. “You just swim through that, and you’ll be right as terraformed rain. Here, we’ll even give you some of our rations to see you through. Come on boys, give him what you can.”

The creatures around the fire turned out their pockets, and counting what they had left, they gingerly passed Ford two small bars shrink wrapped in plastic. The rations inside resembled brown lego pieces, but apparently this would be food enough to sustain Ford through his travels ahead.

“Oh, ah, thank you.” Ford said, graciously accepting the two small bars of space food. “I appreciate this. No, really, you shouldn’t have.”

“Well, on the off chance that we should, those two are for you. Make ‘em last, you hear. Those are good for two moon orbits.” The rodent advised.

Ford nodded, and put the bars in his pocket, before reaching his hand out to shake the rodent’s metal arm. “No, really, thank you. You’ve been so helpful, I don’t know what I’d have done without meeting you out here.”

“Best not to dwell on it.” The rodent shook Ford’s hand back, though it was obvious the practise wasn’t familiar for him. He gave Ford a funny look and extricated his hand from Ford’s grasp. “Good luck on your journeys now, you hear. I hope what you find is better than where you’re coming from.”

“Thank you!” Ford said and walked over to the edge of the cave mouth. “So, I just go up there?”

“Yep, just up there.” The creatures all nodded encouragingly at him.

“Just to that purple one?” Ford clarified, almost hesitant to step over the edge, wanting to set out towards his new life and purpose, but unsure what would await him on the other side. He was taking a leap of faith, listening to these wayward travellers, but somehow, he trusted them to lead him in the right direction.

They all just smiled at him and waved him on his way out. “Just swim up there and keep swimming.”

“Thank you! Thank you for all your help.” Ford waved back to the creatures, smiling back at them.
“Goodbye now. Good luck you hear.”

“Goodbye!” Ford stepped out off the edge of the cave edge and swam awkwardly forward, before treading air to turn around and wave at the group of refugees. “Thank you! Goodbye!”

Leaving their asteroid, Ford swam an awkward breaststroke across the asteroid field up towards the purple wormhole, casting his fate to the wind to discover what new worlds awaited him. Thanks to the asteroid miners pointing him in the right direction, he felt like he stood a chance of getting a step ahead of Bill, and he already itched to uncover more about his muse, genuine truths this time, instead of the lies he’d been fed.

He’d know everything there was to know about Bill Cipher in time, that Ford swore to himself. And this time he’d know the truth.

As he reached the lip of the purple wormhole, he could feel it pull against his molecules, and he looked over his shoulder at the kaleidoscopic realm he was leaving behind, its multicoloured refractions dancing in his field of vision before he was whisked away through the wormhole, pulled swiftly through into another dimension.

From the asteroid cave, the miners watched him go. When he blipped out of this dimension, sucked through the wormhole, the horned creature with the harpoon asked their guinea pig faced leader.

“Think he’s gonna make it?”

“Well, I sent him to the right place, but I don’t think the kid’s gonna last a week, knowing him.”

“At least we can go home now.” Bovin pulled a communications device from his bag and passed it to Xznar. “Do you wanna call it in?”

Xznar tapped the screen of the communications device, and sent his message out, waiting for the device to ping when the message was received. After several seconds, the machine sang out.

“She knows.”

“Mission complete, I’d say.” The horned creature in the corner laughed.

Getting to their feet and gathering their belongings from the cave, the rodent pirate reached into the purple fire with his metal arm and retrieved a small porta-portal device from the base of the fire, pointing it to the back wall of the cave.

Their leader pressed the ignition button, and a temporary portal sprang up against the back wall of the cave, leading through to a different dimension.

“Time to go home, boys. Praise the Axolotl!”

“Praise the Axolotl!” They all shouted and walked through the portal wall.

When they were all through, it closed behind them.

The purple fire in the cave flickered on, the only sign that they were ever there at all.
Ad Astra Per Aspera and ever onward towards space hijinks and hopefully Stanford's canonical fistfight with an animated chair lmao. I hope you enjoyed this chapter. Chapters probably won't be 60 plus pages long now we're in the multi-verse, apart from major plot chapters and so on, but we will see. My wordcount has a way of surprising me, and I'm the one writing it haha. This chapter is dedicated to the ever mysterious Anonymous who has been commenting and leaving the delightful gift of a link to their sketches from each chapter for me to fawn over. I think your art is the best thing since sliced bread (although from my responses you might already know that) and everyone should check out their imgur links they leave in their comments. There has been a gorgeous Valencia that knocked my socks off (a gorgeous Willow too if I remember correctly) and just some beautiful art all round. I could gush about it and list all the fantastic bits but I would run out of end note room hahah. You are a fantastic artist, and that you're enjoying my fic makes me very happy. HMU with your Kofi someday huh, or just hmu if you want to be buds. As always, let me know what you thought of the chapter. A special thanks to my lovely beta reader who is wonderful with prepping the grammar for these babies before I unleash them upon you all. It was their birthday recently, so happy birthday here as well! Next chapter is lost dog posters, thinly veiled social commentary in the form of sci-fi worldbuilding hahah, and Stanford gets a first taste of what living in Stanley's shoes is like. I hope you stay tuned!
And you can hear it in the clamour of the crowded streets. People come and take their chances. Sometimes you win, sometimes you lose a lot. Come, make your own contribution to this melting-pot.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

With Bill’s gathered investors and monsters scattered to the wind hunting Stanford down for the chance to win their own galaxy, the space field surrounding the multi-coloured throne was just about empty. Nearly all the henchmeniacs had gone chasing after Stanford, enjoying the game at play.

Even Kryptos began to sidestep out of the space-field, the allure of ruling his own galaxy tickling the compass’s ego quite nicely.

He didn’t make it far though, as when he made to step away, he felt a hand fall onto his shoulder, halting him in his tracks.

“Now, where do you think you’re going?”

Pasting on an awkwardly winsome grin, Kryptos turned around, and looked up at his boss’s towering form.

“Oh, I was just going to – “ Kryptos gestured with his thumb behind him, trying to stay casual, but the dangerous glint in Bill’s eye had the words shrivel up and die in his throat. Clearing his throat, Kryptos looked down at his feet, finding staring up at Bill far too intimidating to continue.

He felt Bill’s hand tighten on his shoulder, his cartoonish rounded fingers narrowing out into sharp claws, pressing into Kryptos’ flesh.

Hiding this conversation from the other people on the space field (although there were hardly any left, each individual searching for Stanford) Bill spoke low, his subdued words all the more dangerous for his gentle tone.

Acting like he was massaging Kryptos’ shoulder rather than digging his claws into it, Bill murmured.

“I told you what would happen if your big mouth got me in trouble, now didn’t I, Kryptos? So, you want to explain to me what just happened there?”

“W-well, I –“ Kryptos stammered, trying not to wince as Bill’s claws scratched at his shoulders.

“Pointing fingers, telling me what’s supposed to happen, and in front of the investors too? Now, that’s inspired.” Bill’s eye narrowed into a red slit, and his clawed hand began burning hot, ready to sear into Kryptos’ flesh. “What makes you think you can dump me in it and get away unscathed? It may have worked on your old bosses, Kryptos, but the only one who works a hat trick around here is me.”

“I – I wasn’t – I just –“ Kryptos panicked, shrinking back from Bill’s wrath, before a voice called out from across the space field.
“Leave him alone, Bill.”

Bill turned around, his eye seeking out the miscreant who dared to call him out, and it fell on a familiar figure in pink. He proceeded to blink at her, astonished that she would stand up for Kryptos, that duplicitous snitch of a compass, at all.

“Excuse me?” Bill squinted at his best friend, hardly believing what he was hearing. “I’m sorry, is there some miraculous reason I’m missing as to why I should let Kryptos’ sabotage slide?”

Her arms crossed, Pyronica walked closer to Bill. “It doesn’t seem like Kryptos is the one who sabotaged us here.”

Kryptos blinked up at Pyronica, awe fluttering in his stomach like captive butterflies, feeling an odd mixture of relief and surprise, staring down his rescuer.

“Don’t get me wrong.” Pyronica held her hand up, shrugging. “I’m not sticking up for that slime ball. Pulling that stunt in front of the investors made me want to kick the shit out of him too.”

Kryptos’ butterflies promptly shrivelled up and died and he scowled at Pyronica. It seemed the cyclops did not have his back. She had always been on Bill’s side first, a fact that rankled with Kryptos.

“But seriously? Checkmate?” Pyronica scoffed, then looked at Bill in askance.

Bill’s eye shot from side to side and he didn’t answer. Pyronica could have sworn she almost saw a peachy tint colour Bill’s bricks and she rolled her eye, throwing her hands in the air.

“OH, COME ON!”

“It’s not like I told him to say that!” Bill protested, turning from Kryptos, abandoning his revenge in an instant to float over to his best friend to gossip.

Although relieved, Kryptos was almost disappointed that he wasn’t important enough to punish, Bill’s human once again taking precedence.

“I thought you said you were working on him. That he was coming around to our side.” Pyronica beseeched.

“Call it a work in progress. Look, he doesn’t know what he’s saying, he’s operating on a month-long sleep deficit.” Bill explained, floating closer to Pyronica. “It’s impressive that he made such a zinger at all, really.”

“The fact that he did just makes you want him more. Admit it.” Pyronica pointed at Bill. “You like that he sabotaged us.”

“Well, I wouldn’t say that –” Bill rolled his eye, but he didn’t appear to be angry. He wasn’t snapping at Pyronica, he wasn’t even snapping at Sixer’s perceived disobedience.

Pyronica’s eye widened as she realised. “You’re happy. You’re really happy.”

“Happy to see him maybe, but I’m not exactly a fan of this situation.” Bill retorted, resting his hands on his sides.

“No, I mean you’re not mad that he’s here. That he ruined everything. You should be furious! This was our chance. So why aren’t you?” She puzzled, trying to figure her friend out.
Bill blinked at Pyronica, saying nothing, refusing to answer.

“I thought we were running out of time.” Pyronica pondered, piecing things together. “We were pushing the investors so hard, getting everything lined up. Is there something I’m missing? Is there some reason why this falling through right now isn’t as huge of a setback as we think it is?”

Bill blinked at her slowly again, deliberating, before he decided. “You don’t need to know.”

Pyronica seemed taken aback, and she leaned her head back, blinking at Bill in surprise, mildly offended. “Okay then?”

Huffing a sigh, Bill elucidated. “You do not want to or need to know the exact time and date of this dimension’s entropic demise. Knowing would just put stress into your pink little head and, clearly, I’ve put you through enough of that dealing with the investors.”

Pyronica’s brow rose, surprised that Bill was admitting that his conduct as of late, dumping the investors in her lap, wasn’t the best course of action. It wasn’t an outright apology, but there was enough acknowledgement to placate her some.

“So we have time, though?” She questioned.

“We have time.” Bill answered plainly. “Sixer had us decades ahead of schedule. The investors were the ones pushing. Kryptos’ blabbering didn’t help matters either. We have time to play around.”

Trusting Bill, Pyronica nodded, relieved.

Kryptos hovered awkwardly off to the side, still somewhat miffed that his machinations had taken a backseat to Bill and Pyronica’s odd reconciliation.

“So, um, does this mean that we don’t need to get the human back?” Kryptos had to ask, unwisely drawing Bill’s attention back onto him.

“Why do you ask?” Bill narrowed his eye at Kryptos, not liking his tone.

Fumbling his fingers together as he spoke, Kryptos shrunk back from Bill until he looked acceptably cowed, and he pointed off to the asteroid field.

“It’s just that, it’s been a while since he swam off and no one’s come back with him yet. You’d think with a galaxy on the line, he’d have been brought back here by now.”

“You don’t think they’ve eaten him, do you?” Pyronica had to ask, vaguely curious about the outcome.

“They won’t. Not if they want their own galaxy.” Bill crossed his arms, doubtful that his henchmen and cronies would go against him like that.

He thought he made his wishes expressly clear, that Sixer was to be returned to him, and that he was not to be eaten. Very simple wishes, honestly, Bill didn’t think he was asking for much here.

“So why isn’t he back here yet? How come no one’s found him?” Kryptos asked, looking out into the space field.

“He’s just a human.” Pyronica shrugged. “How far could he go?”

But he wasn’t just any human.
This was Sixer they were talking about.

Suddenly, Bill was very worried.

Hurtling through the wormhole, Stanford could feel the flesh on his cheeks compress back, jiggling forcefully as he was flung through space, time, and dimensions, moving impossibly fast. He did his best to hold his glasses onto his face while worlds whipped by him, until a few seconds passed and he was spat out on the other end of the purple wormhole, drifting to a halt.

The abrupt shift in speed was jarring, and Ford felt his nausea catch up with him as he floated peacefully in the aftermath of that sudden rush. He never thought he was one to fall victim to motion sickness, but travelling through an interdimensional wormhole was nothing like any motion Ford had experienced before. His stomach flipped, and he pressed a hand over his mouth, struggling to swallow back the urge to upend his stomach in the space in front of him.

Ford imagined that couldn’t have been too pleasant, to throw up in an environment lacking gravity. He hadn’t exactly got the hang of moving around here yet and side stepping a floating pile of vomit when his clothes had just been cleaned sounded like risky business. It seemed a rather messy affair, not worth the hassle, and so Ford struggled to overcome his nausea.

Once his stomach was calmed, he felt settled enough to take in his surroundings.

The exit to this wormhole deposited Ford impossibly close to the towering spires and high rises of a bustling city. Whatever planet the wormhole directed Ford to, it spat him out right next to the planet’s surface, which surprised Ford considering what he knew about wormholes and black holes. Shouldn’t the wormhole’s pull be affecting the surface of the planet, interfering with its gravitational leaning?

Ford felt he could puzzle for days as to how this planet was able to exist so close to an interdimensional wormhole, and as he looked behind him, trying to figure it out, he noticed dozens of other wormholes, lined up around the edge of the planet’s atmosphere.

Each wormhole was labelled with what resembled a road sign on the highway, only these road signs were positioned with jet thrusters, and the signs were about ten yards wide, hovering over each wormhole’s entrance.

Ford’s dimensional translator took a few seconds to kick in. The peculiar language the road signs were written in was nothing like Ford had ever seen before, but before he could spend too long puzzling it out, the translator kicked into gear and a blue light crept up Ford’s body and then remained, projecting onto Ford’s glasses a superimposed translation of the text.

Above the wormhole Ford had come out of was the same phrase repeated over and over again, perhaps in a variety of common interstellar languages, each line translated into English by the device on Ford’s wrist. The sign read ‘Danger – Wormhole out of order! Do not enter!’ and as he looked at the dozens of other wormholes arrayed around the planet he noticed that his wormhole was the only one that was out of order, every other wormhole emblazoned with differing locations in large letters, a listing of various tourist destinations dropping down below each header.
Ford wondered if his wormhole was out of order because it didn’t have a consistent destination, or if the disorder was due to the fact that it came out in Bill’s domain. The universe clearly seemed to think of Bill’s dimension as a flaw and not a feature. A flaw to be buffed out by the inevitable entropy of time, if those miners were correct.

Trying not to dwell on the way his stomach flipped in sympathy when he thought too hard about Bill’s dimension (or maybe that was the motion sickness) Ford turned his attention to his surroundings, trying to understand where he had ended up.

Wherever he was seemed to be some kind of thoroughfare of interdimensional travel, and if the system of wormholes didn’t impress enough, the city below took Ford’s breath away.

The city was a gleaming metal and neon testament to technological advancement. Skyscrapers towering six times higher than any skyscraper Ford had seen on earth dominated the skyline of this city, accented with billboards set on jet thrusters bobbing in between the buildings and projected holograms advertising various goods and services. Satellites hovered not far from the tops of the buildings, orbiting machines, ships and settlements expanding the city’s limits.

The city was colourful and vibrant, the metals that comprised the skyscrapers were in various hues that Ford had never seen before. One building looked ionized all the way up, the surface of the tower a shimmering rainbow. Other buildings were crafted from a sort of metallic green substance, some made of glass and others made of obsidian, the panes stretching in patterns like stained glass all the way up to the skyline, and other buildings were a sturdy solid grey concrete.

Neon piping was integrated through the buildings, racing up the walls, providing lighting to the inhabitants within, and shining down on the streets for those below. There wasn’t an area on this planet that wasn’t well lit, it seemed, and as Ford couldn’t see a sun or particularly daring star close by to provide natural lighting for the planet, he assumed these neon lights were lit 24/7.

On the ground, hundreds of thousands of alien creatures bustled along, pavements packed with individuals moving to and fro, each one with purpose and a place to be.

Ford was starting to see the details of the planet’s surface more clearly, and as more and more came into view, he realised he was being gently pulled downwards, towards the surface of the planet. That explained how he could see the people on the surface moving about, his glasses weren’t that good.

He wasn’t exactly sure how gravity was working here, as the pull of the planet’s gravity and the wormhole’s suction should have been competing with each other, yet he was being guided down deliberately from the wormhole’s edge towards a broad platform positioned before a gate leading into the city. The gate was set into a wide wall, that stretched around the platform, and a statue of a regal alien figure stood at the top of the gate, its nine arms outstretched and welcoming.

Ford could see, as he came closer to landing, that various other creatures were descending onto the planet from the wormholes that lined the dimensional outskirts, all being pulled down into that same central locus of the platform. Some came in spacecrafts, parking their ships beside the platform, others simply floated down with luggage strapped to their backs or hovering beside them. Some travelled alone, others huddled in groups, most likely families, all seeking access to this planet’s surface.

Ford’s feet touched down onto the platform, and he felt the gravitational pull stop, grateful that whatever it was that directed him down here seemed sophisticated enough to moderate the increased gravity to level out before pulling him through the floor.
Surprised that he managed to land in one piece on what seemed like a relatively civilised planet, Ford counted himself incredibly lucky, considering he had hurtled himself through a mysterious purple wormhole with no knowledge of what could await him on the other side. Escaping his likely dismemberment by a crowd of monsters back in the Nightmare Realm gave Ford quite a lot to be thankful for, and as he looked around the platform at the various other travellers, he couldn’t help but smile.

He had made it, he was really here, in another dimension, on an alien world. He was still giddy from the rush of escaping the Nightmare Realm, from defying Bill to his face in front of his cronies, and from meeting such pleasant helpful people on his way out.

He was elated, but as he set his eyes on the people around the platform, he felt a twinge of sadness knowing that the people he had come to know on Earth he might never see again. His family and his friends, Stanley, Willow, Fiddleford – while they weren’t all in Ford’s good books when he left, he was certainly missing them now.

Were the circumstances different, he would admit that this was exactly where he had always wanted to be, exploring the unknown, in a place as weird and wonderful as he was. If only the experience wasn’t so bittersweet.

Trying to shrug off that melancholy twinge, Ford followed the crowd of aliens up to the queue that was forming in front of the gate, smiling at everyone politely, optimistic and eager to step foot inside this futuristic city. He didn’t want to dwell on the people he left behind, not when he had such mysteries awaiting him going forward.

Despite a few odd looks, there was a pervading enthusiasm mirrored throughout the crowd, and Ford realised he wasn’t the only one sharing hopeful optimistic glances with the world around him.

It seemed many of the people seeking entry into this colourful city were also looking forward to a new life, a better quality of life within the city’s boundaries. Following the press of the crowd further ahead in the queue Ford wondered if he was feeling what his ancestors felt as they travelled in through New York by boat, the rush his mother’s parents would have felt seeing the welcoming face of the Statue of Liberty, guiding travellers into the safety of America’s shores. This nine-armed figure positioned above the gate reminded him of the famous statue and he wondered if this statue was meant to resemble something similar. If this was The New Colossus, the Mother of Exiles, welcoming travellers into this shimmering utopia.

_Give me your tired, your poor, your huddled masses yearning to breathe free. The wretched refuse of your teeming shore. Send these, the homeless, tempest tossed to me._

Emboldened by the inscription he’d memorized back in high school, imagining something similar scrawled somewhere on the statue that stood above the gate, Ford held his head high, optimistic as he approached the gates that led to his future.

As he reached the front of the queue he looked up at the attendant, sitting at a desk in a small cubicle behind a screen of glass at the gate. She seemed like some kind of customs official, like this was an airport of some variety. The queue moved forward in front of him, and soon Stanford was there, at the front of the queue before the attendant. He waited expectantly, uncertain of what was supposed to happen now. Would she let him through? She had to.

The alien raised her eyebrow at Stanford’s enthusiastic unspoken confidence, looking between the outdated dimensional translator on his wrist and the uncertain but hopeful expression on his face, and pointed to a gap at the bottom of her window, tapping on the glass with a clawed fingernail.
“Your visa and entry papers.”

Ford’s shoulders slumped minutely, taken back by her question. “I beg your pardon?”

The alien sighed, and whipped out a nail file, buffing her claws as she gave Stanford a withering look with all three of her eyes. “Present your visa and entry papers – please.”

“My, um, I don’t know – uh –” Ford looked between the impatient clerk at the desk and the queue of aliens behind him, noticing they all held papers in their hands. He began patting his pockets awkwardly like he was searching for the visa she requested.

He didn’t know why he was searching. He didn’t have any visa or entry papers. He didn’t know he would need it. He didn’t know interdimensional visas were a thing. He found he was rather too busy fleeing for his life to look up what sort of visa he would need to get to this planet and considering his circumstances, he wouldn’t have known the first place to apply for something of the sort.

“Sir, you’re holding up the line.” The alien at the desk assured him, sounding bored. “You need to present your visa and entry papers for legal entry into Meccai.”

When Ford continued to look confused, she continued speaking.

“You either present your entry papers at the front desk, or you proceed to the back of the platform and get in the line to board the shuttle to Naree, where, if you are without proper documentation for legal entry into Meccai you will be detained indefinitely or deported back to your dimension, as per Meccai’s standard immigration policies.”

Indefinite detention was a worrying thought. Ford came this far to escape imprisonment, or worse. And he didn’t much fancy being deported back to his dimension. If he was back on Earth the portal became vulnerable again and he wouldn’t fare well if they deported him back to the Nightmare Realm. His prospects seemed grim without this ‘visa’ and he couldn’t imagine having gotten this far only to be transported to a place he may never leave.

He looked around him at the other people in the queue, the gathered creatures all waiting impatiently for him to get on with it. They all held their papers firmly in their hands and various appendages, and Ford could see towards the back of the platform a family of crying aliens being dragged towards an ominously sturdy looking space shuttle, the family clearly without the proper documentation for their travel.

The alien behind the counter had stopped buffing her nails and was narrowing her eyes at him now. “Sir, could you hurry it up? Do you have your visa?”

“Yes, I have it.” Ford lied. “I – I’ll just step out of the line to look. Sorry.”

She rolled all three of her eyes, obviously peeved Ford had wasted her time, but allowed him to step out of the queue, and waved ahead the alien behind Ford.

“Next!”

Pacing out to stand beside the long wall that ran all the way around the platform, Ford rested his back against the stone and watched the queue progress. Fumbling through his pockets, he found very little to work with.

He had several papers and pages from his notebooks he could possibly use to forge papers to get past the gate, but he had no idea how advanced the technology was, or how likely his chance of success would be, given he knew nothing about how this society operated. He didn’t even know what these ‘papers’ were supposed to look like.

He could ask to see someone else’s papers, but that would look doubly suspicious, and judging from the way each traveller clung to their papers defensively, it wasn’t likely he’d find someone willing to share.

Ford’s back slid down the stone wall and he sat on the ground now, flipping through his notebooks, looking for an answer that could help him proceed. His exhaustion was catching up to him, to the point where he couldn’t even scowl bitterly at the pages he’d written on Bill, instead staring morosely at the yellowed parchment, wishing there was an easier way.

The page he was staring at detailed his adventure impersonating FBI agents with his muse, annotated and illustrated lovingly. He couldn’t leave this incriminating record laying around the house, and he almost certainly didn’t keep it because he remembered the thrill of that particular adventure, that radioactive heist.

Wistfully, Ford imagined entering this city would be easier if Bill were here. He’d likely come up with some elaborate whimsical scheme to get Ford through the gate and Ford would have another story to write down into his journals, another happy fiction to dwell on.

His eyelids started to droop involuntarily, his sleepless nights catching up with his resignation and just before he could close his eyes, he heard something that startled him.

“Psst!”

Ford jumped and looked around him. It sounded like a voice was whispering from behind him, but his back was to the wall. He looked left, right, and even up, with no luck, until the voice whispered to him again.

“Psst. Hey. Yeah you. Got no papers? I can get you in. Whadda you say?”

Ford blinked, baffled, as he turned around to face the wall behind him. It still looked as sturdy and solid as it had when he pressed his back to it and, for a moment, he wondered whether he was hallucinating again, if this was purely wishful thinking.

Reaching out, Ford pressed his hand against the wall, testing its solidity. The wall was firm for a second, but it then began to warp in the middle, a slight blue light emanating from Ford’s handprint. To Ford’s surprise, two hands reached through the wall, purple, somewhat scaly humanoid hands, and wrapped around Ford’s hand, shaking firmly once before readying a firmer grip on his wrist.

“Pleasure doing business with you. Okay, real quick then, buddy.” The whispered voice in the wall continued, tightening their grip around Ford’s wrist. “One, two, three. Here we go.”

Ford barely had a moment to prepare himself, before he was yanked through the solid stone wall.

It was disorienting, much like moving through butter. The wall stayed sturdy, but for some reason it softened around him, and the purple hands yanked him through the wall like he was being yanked through jelly.

The wall must have been somewhat thick, as Ford felt like he was moving through it forever, though it had only been a minute. He was holding his breath when he was pulled through, fear of inhaling concrete keeping his mouth firmly shut until he burst out on the other side of the wall, stumbling to the ground.
Gasping, Ford rested his hands on his knees and tried to catch his breath, looking up at his would-be rescuer.

“Welcome to Meccai, pal.” Said the alien, a tall reptilian looking humanoid figure. The lizard man was wearing clothing, smooth fabric cut into snazzy geometric shapes, draping like a jacket over the creature’s scaled limbs. Beneath the jacket was an array of belts and straps, gadgets and gizmos hanging from the straps and sewn into the pockets.

There wasn’t a device pointed at the wall, or any obvious technology stuck on the brick, so Ford could only assume that this creature had simply reached through the wall and altered the density of the brick to pull him through. What a novel ability. Ford was fascinated.

The alien blinked its eyes sideways at Ford and held a scaly hand out in front of it. “So, that’s services rendered, immigration bypassed. Now you’re through, I’ll take your gratitude in the form of, oh, let’s say 700 QUID?”

Ford blinked at the lizard’s hand, and straightened up, catching his breath, confused. “What?”

“Well, you’d pay 500 for a visa, and then there’s compensation for my time and effort on top of that, plus a little interest and a rebate for the risk on my behalf, so for my trouble, 700 QUID sounds about right. 750 if you’re feeling generous. A fair price for dodging Naree, wouldn’t you say?” The lizard argued.

“I don’t –“ Ford looked around him, distracted by the sight of the brilliant city behind the lizard. He was through the wall, on the other side, and while he and his rescuer went mostly unnoticed in the corner here, hundreds of creatures all walked busily through the streets on the city’s floor, towering skyscrapers, billboards and hover cars flying above their heads.

Ford’s words trailed off, watching this futuristic utopia with wide eyes, awe overriding his exhaustion. This city seemed familiar, and Ford wondered if he had seen it through Bill’s eyes, if this was the futuristic city that had enthralled him so much before or if this was just one of many cities with the same impressive technological qualities. The name Meccai sounded familiar but Ford couldn’t put his finger on where he’d heard it before. Maybe he read it in the Almanac?

The lizard was watching him, waiting for his attention to return to the creature’s outstretched hand. Looking back at the creature, Ford finished his sentence.

“I don’t have any money.”

The lizard creature blinked at him, offended. “What are you talking about? Everyone’s got money.”

“I –“ Ford realised that wasn’t a very pleasant way to reward his rescuer, so he patted down his pockets, looking for his wallet. Pulling it out, he upended it into his hand, extending his hand forward. “I’ve only got fifty … fifty-seven dollars.”

The lizard picked up one of the notes and rubbed it between its scaled thumb and forefinger, puzzled by the bills.

“What is this supposed to be? Some kind of delicacy?” The creature nibbled on the edge of a bill, pulling an un-appetized face at the taste.

“That’s –“ Ford sighed, realising that of course Earth currency would have no relevance here, and it wasn’t like he had any way to access his bank account back home, or any assurance that his hard earned grant money would even mean anything to these people. He really was adrift here, without a cent to his name, with only the clothes on his back to sustain him. Not exactly the best foundation for a fresh start in a different dimension. “That’s all the money I have.”

Scoffing, the lizard crumpled the money into a ball and threw it at Ford’s feet, before climbing up the wall again, scaling its surface effortlessly, muttering as he went.

“Another FOD with fake money. What a bust.”

Ford turned around, watching the lizard disappear over the top of the wall. The only alien he’d spoken to so far in this place was already leaving him behind. That was disheartening.

He had so many questions about this city, he didn’t know where to go, how things worked, who to turn to. He had hoped to run into more friendly, forthcoming aliens like he’d encountered in the asteroid belt. He was resigned to note that their helpful disposition wasn’t the norm.

Turning back around the expanse of the city sprawled out in front of him, and as aliens passed him on the street, barely sparing a glance for him, he stood by the colossal wall, stunned by his surroundings. Ford’s sense of wonder rekindled the more he looked around him.

Approaching the crowd of people bustling along the pavements, Ford tried to ask one of them for directions.

“Pardon me. Can you – sorry, can one of you please – I just need directions. Could you spare a moment – I just need – excuse me?”

Every person Ford asked for help, or guidance brushed past him with barely a word. He was lucky to get even a sideways glance from these people, and most of the glances he received were laden with scorn. No one seemed to want to help him, or even acknowledge him.

He didn’t know what he was doing wrong, his dimensional translator was presumably still working, these people should be able to understand him. But just like the Almanac seemed to insist, his very presence seemed offensive in this large prosperous city. He was hoping someone could assist him, but every creature he reached out to or made eye contact with brushed him off, rushing to their next appointment, or straight up refusing to even look at him.

Alright, so it seemed in this particular place, Ford wouldn’t find another group of friendly aliens like he’d found in the asteroid. That was fine. Ford might not need help. He could figure out this city on his own.

Swallowing back his tiredness, his caution and his trepidation, Ford forced himself forward, walking further into the enormous city, no more than wretched refuse tossed upon this teeming shore.

He had to believe he had someone other than Bill willing to help him out here.

He didn’t want to believe it, but it began to dawn on him that here, in this dimension, away from all the friends and allies he’d ever known, he really was on his own.

He rubbed his hand against his pectoral as he moved through the crowds, the small anxious gesture subconscious at this point, a habit. He was used to tracing the line of the tattoo Bill left on his skin to soothe his anxiety when he felt alone before, and while there wasn’t the same wistful reverence in the gesture, the gesture remained.

Ford rubbed his palm against the tattoo, and squashed down his brewing anxiety, as he began to make his way across the city, exploring this new world.
Up on the gate behind him, the gleaming statue with its nine arms outstretched stood, and as Ford looked back up at it, conflicted emotions swirling in his throat, he realised the statue had its back to him, turning away from him like everyone else.

Ad Astra Per Aspera. Ford thought with a sigh and persevered onwards, disappearing into the sea of people on this strange new planet.

A small delegation of emissaries landed on Naree and from inside the administrator’s office, they endured the relevant bureaucracies, waiting for their caseworker to return to the office. These emissaries were waiting in a room reserved for legal teams and official delegations, spared the dismal conditions the refugees and asylum seekers faced on the other side of the compound.

Leaning up against the wall of the screening room, one of the emissaries sighed, and her colleague sat by the table in the middle of the room, drumming their fingers against the desk.

“What’s taking so long?” The emissary at the table asked impatiently. “Haven’t we thrown enough QUID around for this to go faster?”

Picking at the pink thread of the embroidery on the sleeve of her jacket, the emissary leaning against the wall replied in a dry, unamused voice. “That’s usually all it takes. The difference between legal and illegal immigration. Deep pockets.”

“This guy’s an expensive mark.” Complained the emissary at the table, resting her chin against the desk, scowling. A few seconds passed, before she raised her head, looking back to her colleague. “Should we request clarification? What if he’s not here?”

“There’s nowhere else he could go. The mercenaries in the belt confirmed he went to Meccai and without a visa, that’s a one-way trip to Naree. This should be cut and dry.” The emissary by the door replied. “This should be easy. He’ll be here, and when he gets here, we scoop him up and bring him home. There’s no need to bother The Oracle.”

“But what if he’s not here though? The mark is meant to be one of his.” Questioned the girl at the desk. “What if he slips us? Gets into Meccai?”

“That would be like trying to find a single atom in a collider.” Replied her colleague grimly, still picking at the embroidery on her sleeve, a pink axolotl sewn into the fabric.

“Should we request clarification?” Pressed the girl at the table.

Her colleague paused, considering her mistress’s reaction, before she shook her head. “We wait. He’ll be here. Where else could he go?”
The longer Ford spent on Meccai, the more he came to realise that he had heard of the place before.

Bill had told him, when Ford was studying the almanac.

“The central hub of most Federation ports, Meccai is a –“ Ford read aloud from the pages, finding it interesting, before Bill interrupted.

“A shithole.”

“I’m sorry?”

“Meccai is a shithole.”

And so it was. Or at least it was for the poor and, currently, Ford was in that demographic.

Everything on Meccai seemed to be measured and judged by one’s wealth. It was a staunchly capitalistic society, building its economy on the immigration it was so famous for. Or rather building itself up on the backs of the immigrants.

The jewel of the cosmos was what it was lauded as. Stanford had read that in the Almanac. The centrepoint of commerce, the starting point of success. That was the line fed to these hopeful travellers who came from all dimensions, carrying their worldly possessions on their backs, dreaming of a better life, and when they arrived on Meccai, rather than the fulfilling careers, high quality housing, and idealised culture this planet advertised, they ended up here.

Ford looked across the road, surveying the slums he found himself residing in.

Undocumented or undesirable aliens lived in relative squalor here, packed into condemned and poorly made buildings, paying through their teeth for the privilege of a roof over their heads. Their children idled in the street outside, picking pockets, eating scraps, and stealing what they could from wherever they could find it. The quality education promised to them never came, and those families that had pushed their children through the expensive education system found their qualifications useless in the cutthroat job market, discriminated against in more ways than one.

Having been discriminated against moreso than some, Ford counted himself lucky at this point that he had secured himself a relatively clean alleyway to hunker down in. It could be worse was becoming his mantra, although as far as mantras went, it wasn’t a very good one. He was living in squalor and the squalor of this particular planet would not have been so jarring if not for the absolute splendour that existed just two streets over.

Meccai was a study in extreme opposites. The city itself was gleaming, gentrified, perfect by the wall and into the heart of the city. A shining, spotless testament to progress and assimilation.

It remained that way, as Ford was to discover, by herding out the homeless and the destitute, the undesirable and the different, sectioning them off in the slums on outer Meccai. Ford hadn’t had much time to survey the city on his first few days before he was ushered out of the heart of the city, deemed to be undesirable because of his dated dimensional translator, his obviously foreign clothing and appearance, and the total lack of a penny to his name in the interdimensional denomination that seemed to mean so much here.

Ford had skills, he had other things of value to offer, he told them as much, but it didn’t seem to mean anything to those who ushered him out. He learned quickly how few prospects were open to these poor interdimensional travellers, and even fewer prospects seemed to exist for the undocumented few who snuck past the gate.
It wasn’t just Ford who had been snuck through. A sort of obscure trade proliferated on the outskirts of Meccai, one of the more lucrative trades for those outside the upper middle class – that of people smuggling. The transit and trafficking of migrants supported the government with the exorbitant fees these visas cost, and noting the government’s sterling example, an underground economy of people smuggling began to boom.

You would get less skilled entrepreneurs like the lizard who rescued Ford, happy to pull people through the wall with the talents and technologies available to them for a flat fee on the other side, and then you would get the organised smugglers, the gangs. You could be whisked past the visa process, spared from an eternity on Naree but not only would you owe your rescuer a flat fee, you would continue to pay that fee for the duration of your life on Meccai, or your rescuers would turn against you, turning you into the authorities as an undocumented refugee.

Because there were no checks and balances in place for the migrants who came to Meccai without a visa, they were left vulnerable to this sort of excruciating extortion, and it was why the slum cities on the outskirts were all that was left available to those asylum seekers who had fled everything they knew in search of a better life.

This was the better life they received.

Ford broke off one of the last slivers of the small ration bar the asteroid miners had given him, scraping this meagre portion away with his fingernail, popping his finger in his mouth and sucking the morsel up.

Those two small bars were all that had been keeping Ford going here on Meccai, each lego sized block holding the nutritional equivalent of a month’s worth of dietary nourishment. The ration bars contained all the nourishment a creature required to sustain life, they contained densely packed nutrients, and a peculiar ingredient that could make even the emptiest stomach feel full in an instant. They also seemed to contain a ludicrous amount of caffeine, as Ford was to discover to his delight. Ignorant of their potential, Ford had popped the first block in his mouth whole, like candy, on his first day on Meccai, and while he felt soon after like he’d imbibed a ten-course meal and seventeen cups of coffee, the feeling only lasted two days, and then his stomach began to rumble again.

He soon learned by watching the people around him, how they savoured their ration bars, that it would only take the smallest flake of the bar to sustain a person, and he immediately felt embarrassed that he had wasted an entire month’s worth of food out of ignorance.

There was plenty of food on Meccai, almost wasteful amounts of food sold in the heart of the city. There were fine dining establishments and exorbitant buffets laid out every day for those who could afford the privilege, but that food was not distributed evenly amongst the citizens once the buffets were over. Instead that food was incinerated wastefully or repurposed into the very same ration bars that Ford had to make last for as long as he could. The ration bars were not divvied out amongst the poor. Like everything else on this planet you had to pay for it, and right now Ford couldn’t afford another ration bar, so he had to make his last.

Upon learning that he couldn’t apply for work in the city without a valid visa, upon learning that even the other undocumented migrants found his appearance unappealing, wrinkling their noses at Ford’s nondescript human features, the exciting fulfilling future he imagined for himself in this vibrant city – daydreams of excelling in interdimensional engineering, of studying at advanced libraries and mingling with the creatures around him, colluding and collaborating like equals – after two weeks of being spurned by the city and its inhabitants, Ford found himself here. In the alley. His new home, it seemed.
It wasn’t very glamorous, but it was the only place he hadn’t been kicked out of. He didn’t mean to offend the people on this planet, so he left when they instructed him to, the warnings of the Almanac playing in the back of his mind.

Wrapping his trench coat around him for warmth, padding his new home with discarded newspapers and cardboard boxes, Ford sat with his back to the wall in the alleyway and watched the creatures on the planet go about their lives.

The caffeine from the ration bars was growing stale at this point, and after such a long time without consistent rest, Ford longed to close his eyes and sleep but habit told him not to.

\textit{I can’t sleep.} Ford thought. \textit{If I do, Bill could – Bill could –}

He paused, thrown by the belated realisation that there really wasn’t much that Bill could do at this point. He had no access to the portal through Ford now, and Earth, the planet he had set his sights on to claim was thoroughly out of his reach.

Following that logic, Bill should have no use for Stanford now. He couldn’t manipulate Ford into opening the portal for him, and he certainly wouldn’t be building another portal, not without the resources that so perfectly aligned for him on Earth.

Ford had thwarted Bill’s plans, and now he should, if he believed the hurtful accusations he flung at the ex-muse, mean nothing to the god.

That was a humbling thought.

Ford thought he was humbled enough already, sleeping rough in an alleyway on a planet with zero opportunities available for him. Life just seemed to keep knocking him down. His logic told him that he shouldn’t be disappointed by this realisation, that it was only proving Ford’s caustic suspicions right, that he’d been used by the God all this time, and now that use had become redundant, Bill would lose interest.

That disappointment was just about enough to convince Ford to close his eyes, to rest for a while. After four weeks of constant vigilance, he probably deserved a good sleep, and if sleeping put him in Bill’s path again – well, that would only be an issue if Bill hadn’t discarded him, hadn’t lost interest in him. If closing his eyes would prove Ford right (or wrong) then he really had nothing to lose trying.

For the first time since his escape, Ford eased down on top of the newspapers that comprised his new bed and closed his eyes to sleep, finally.

Opening his eyes, Ford found himself back in his mental library, surveying the calm stillness of the shelves. He looked between the stacks and raised his chin up to stare at the ceiling, or rather the absence of one. The roof was open, leading up to the stars above.

The blueprints for the portal were still etched in the sky up there, lines of circuitry connecting like constellations between each twinkling star. Geometric patterns of endless triangles laced out between points of light, still lingering as an homage to the god at the top of Ford’s mind.
Ford sighed, finding the solitude and calm of his mindscape disengaging. God knows after such a long, stressful struggle against global annihilation, Ford could probably use some peace of mind, but this peaceful silence in his mindscape had Ford dissatisfied for some reason. He couldn’t put his finger on what was missing, or rather, he could, but he didn’t want to.

Heaving yet another dissatisfied sigh, Ford walked over to one of the shelves, tracing his fingertips over the books that were meticulously organised by topic, not looking for anything specific, content to just let his fingers trace the leather-bound spines. Grabbing a book from the shelf without reading the title, Ford took a step up, and the mindscape rearranged to create stacks of encyclopedias under his feet, each pile of books creeping higher like a staircase of thought.

He climbed the stairway of memory thoughtlessly, until he was up among the stars, gravitating to the blue high-backed armchairs that floated beside a coffee table with a chess set on top. Ford trudged over to the armchairs, books hovering like stepping stones as he walked across the void, creating a floating path until he could hop from that last literary stepping stone to climb up onto the armchair and curl up on its cushions, making himself comfortable.

The chair seemed larger than it had in the past, and Ford felt almost dwarfed by it, like he had as a child, climbing up onto his mother’s highbacked chair she used for her psychic readings. Ford liked to sit there, holding whatever book he’d been obsessed with at the time like it was a safety blanket, waiting for his mother to return to comfort him from the rejections of the world.

He opened the book he had brought with him, but he couldn’t focus on the pages, not really looking to relive any particular memories right now. He just wanted the comfort of familiarity, and alone in his own head, he was jarred by the realisation that being alone in his own head wasn’t familiar to him anymore.

It was too quiet.

It felt lonely.

Ford closed his eyes again, sighing once more as the sadness settled on his shoulders, seeking comfort in the familiar that felt so different now.

Before he could become too entrenched in self-pity, he heard a loud pop, and he opened his eyes to see an all too familiar shape floating in front of him.

“There you are! Sixer, I’ve been looking everywhere for you. What, do you just never sleep?” Bill had his hand on the side of his hat, looking almost frantic, and he appeared incredibly close to Stanford’s high-backed chair, hovering in front of his face.

“AAAHH!” Ford jumped back, startled to see Bill so close so suddenly, and his mental defences leapt to the ready, the laser gun materialising into his hand, letting out a panicked shot into the space in front of him.

“OW!” Bill cried out dramatically, hovering backwards, and Ford leaned forward, worried in an instant.

Bill had a fist sized hole shot through his bricks and he was giving Ford a flat, reproachful look.

“You – you –” Ford stuttered, looking between the hole and Bill’s eye, startled.

“Ow.” Bill said, his tone flat now too. Heaving a frustrated sigh, he smoothed a hand across his surface, closing the hole up with a wave.
“That didn’t actually hurt you, did it?” Ford questioned, concerned.

“That depends.” Bill crossed his arms sullenly. “Does hurting my feelings count?”

“That’s – I – what are you doing here, Bill?” Ford asked defensively, curling his arms around the book he held, banishing the laser gun with a wave of his hand. He could always summon it back to protect him if he needed it, for all the good it did him.

“Like I said, looking for you.” Bill explained, and floated down into the armchair across from Ford, crossing his legs and tapping his foot as he spoke. “That was quite the stunt you pulled. I’ve had no end of trouble, trying to pick up after the mess you left. You’d think one of those idiots would have found you by now, considering the incentives on offer, but no. It’s like I’m managing a bunch of unevolved morons.”

“Those morons of yours tried to kill me.” Ford accused, scowling at the triangle.

Bill scoffed dismissively. “They didn’t try to kill you.”

“They wanted to eat me!” Ford insisted.

“I think I’ve made my stance on eating you pretty clear.” Bill rubbed the bricks just above his eye like he was nursing a headache and summoned a martini with a click of his fingers. Making himself comfortable in Ford’s mind, he cosied back in his armchair and rearranged the pieces on the chess board, starting a new game.

Ford stared at Bill, baffled by his nonchalance. Pressing, Ford threw more accusations at Bill, stunned that the muse was still here. “You sent them all after me. You set them on me. Hide and seek? What, was this a game for you?”

“I didn’t set them on you.” Bill denied, looking over the board, ignoring Ford’s protestations. His martini floated into his hand.

“You snapped your fingers. You made them charge at me.”

“I also told you to run, didn’t I?” Bill countered absently, trying to plan his move. “I gave you a head start. Not many people get that.”

“You made me a moving target, is what you did.” Ford crossed his arms over the book he held, leaning forward in his chair, jutting his chin out stubbornly. “Don’t act like you were doing me a favour. Setting your monsters on me is hardly doing me a favour.”

“Well, how else was I supposed to respond to your checkmate?” Bill picked up the white king from the board and wagged it in the air for emphasis.

Ford said nothing, but he raised his chin a little higher.

Bill rolled his eye. As he closed it, the edges of his eyelids puckered, and he took a deep sip from his drink, before setting the king back on the board, opening his eye again.

“I can tell you’re proud of yourself.” Bill noted, finally looking at Ford, raking his eye over the scientist.

“What gave it away?” Ford quipped, raising an eyebrow at Bill gamely.

Bill narrowed his eye at Ford, obviously frustrated, before he looked away, moving a pawn across Ford was expecting a more gratifying reaction, anticipating frustration, defeat or bargaining from the muse. Instead he just ignored Ford, his behaviour confusing the scientist. He didn’t know why Bill would be here, playing chess with him like they used to, when Ford practically spat in Bill’s face in their last encounter.

“You don’t need me anymore and there’s nothing you can do to manipulate me into opening the portal. I think I’ve made that quite clear. So why are you here?” Ford asked, putting the book he was holding down on the floating table, beside the chessboard. Resting his elbows on his knees he inched closer to the table, trying to catch Bill’s eye as he berated him. “You can’t invade the Earth anymore. There’s nothing you can do. You’re completely cut off from my dimension. Game over, Bill.”

Bill didn’t look up, but Ford could see from the way his eyelid moved that he was rolling his eye again. “Yeah, thanks for that.”

“Why did you even want it? Are you going to tell me?” Ford questioned, on the defensive. “Sway me with some grandiose sob story?”

Bill looked up at Ford and blinked slowly, before he sat back in his armchair and crossed his arms, giving Ford that flat, unimpressed look again. “No, I don’t think I will.”

“Why not?” Ford pressed, frowning.

“You won’t believe me,” Bill said, shrugging. “And you’re clearly getting a kick out of this whole defiant saviour shindig. Why should I give you the satisfaction?”

That stumped Ford. Bill hadn’t shied away from giving him all sorts of things before, information, adventure, gifts and abilities, and phenomenal things that subverted Ford’s very reality. He’d seemed to be following that pattern before, giving Ford’s clothes a good clean, giving him a new liver, and a digestive system that seemed to be able to tolerate the sparse food he’d imbibed here. He wasn’t sure why Bill would stop that now.

His behaviour was very odd, it confused Ford, his defensive instincts putting him on edge.

Ford stared at Bill for a while, trying to figure out how to proceed, before eventually he picked up a black pawn, and moved it a space across the board.

This seemed to please Bill and he relaxed, sitting back in his chair. Levitating another pawn forward a square in response to Stanford’s move, Bill sipped from his drink, steadily this time, and offered information more freely.

“You can’t just warp onto the scene and introduce yourself with disrespect Sixer. I’ve been trying to lay down groundwork for you here, to give you a little credit to stand on your own among beings like these and you seem intent on shooting yourself in the foot. What was challenging me to my face in front of my investors supposed to accomplish? Did it make you feel good? Did you feel victorious, justified? Were you satisfied, acting like you knew what you were doing? We both know you didn’t.”

Ford’s cheeks flushed with colour, embarrassed that his vindictive jab was called out for the bluff that it was. Ford would have preferred Bill to think it was a skilfully planned scuppering of his dastardly conquest, instead of something Ford had just happened to stumble into.

“You don’t know that.” Ford attempted, moving another pawn, trying to reclaim his checkmate as a heroic act instead of an unplanned blunder.

“You’re a deliberate person, Sixer.” Bill assessed, knowing Ford too well to allow the lie. “If you wanted to come barrelling through the portal, shutting off your own access to your world, you would have thought it over a thousand times in your head before actually going through with it, and you’d have a little more going for you than just the unwashed clothes on your back. I’ve seen you stumble out of bed looking more ready to take on the universe than you did when you stumbled out of that portal. What, did someone push you in?”

Bill was joking, but Ford’s shoulders curled defensively. That was exactly what had happened, but Ford didn’t want to give Bill the satisfaction of knowing that.

“Does it matter? I still stopped you.”

“I’ll give you an A for effort on that one, Sixer.” Bill said, moving another piece. “Now you can pat yourself on the back and put this whole unpleasantness behind you. Sixer – 1 Bill – 0. Was that the score you wanted to see?”

As Bill conjured a scoreboard in the air behind him for emphasis, Ford narrowed his eyes at the floating board, looking between it and the triangle. Bill admitting defeat, while it was exactly what Ford had wanted, right now wasn’t what he wanted at all. It was suspicious, too good to be true, and Ford’s paranoia told him there was something else at play.

“I’m supposed to believe you came here just to tell me I’ve won? That I beat you? No, you’re here for more than that, Bill, and I want to know what.” Ford had to ask, leaning forward to move a knight, still suspicious. “What’s your angle?”

“Which one?” Bill quipped, amused.

“You’re not going to tell me?” Ford pressed, confused.

“I think the window of opportunity for open honest communication closed around about the time you disintegrated that body you made for me.” Bill said smoothly, moving another chess piece, his bishop capturing Ford’s knight, his tone hardly belying the hurt he still felt. “Not that I’m still bitter about that callous, cruel betrayal, I just don’t see why I should be giving so much when you don’t seem to understand what quid pro quo means.”

“What do you want?” Ford questioned warily. He moved another piece to counter Bill’s move, his pawn claiming Bill’s bishop, playing with him instinctively, without even thinking about it, effortlessly drawn into another game with his muse.

Bill stared at the chessboard, contemplating Ford’s move for a while, before stating his request without looking at Ford. “Where are you?”

“Why? So, you can come and find me?” Ford questioned, his shoulders tensing, narrowing his eyes at Bill. “Drag me back to your insane collective and pretend that I don’t know what you are. No thank you. Pass.”

“Here I am imagining you in all sorts of disastrous situations out in the multi-verse, in danger, destitute, starving in a gutter somewhere – and it’s not bringing me nearly as much pleasure as I thought it would.” Bill said jokingly, though he was speaking the truth. “I’d have thought you would welcome a helping hand by now. You’re lost, Sixer. Just tell me where you are.”

Ford refused to acknowledge the truth in Bill’s words. He was lost, starving in a gutter somewhere, but he still had his pride.
His lips pressed together tightly, the stubborn set of his chin telling Bill everything he needed to know. Bill was looking up now, staring intently at Ford, his eye narrowing as each defiant second passed, Bill’s true temper simmering to the surface.

“Fine then. Don’t tell me. Be stubborn. It’s not like I can’t just find out for myself.”

Bill’s hand shot out, his arm elongating, and he snatched the book Ford left on the tabletop, trying to dip into Ford’s memories to find where he was hiding.

Or rather, he attempted to snatch the book up, but when he went to grab the journal, his hand passed right through the book, like there was a glitch in Ford’s mind.

Bill blinked, surprised. Ford was surprised too.

Bill swiped for the book once more, trying to grab it, but again, his hand passed right through it, the book fuzzing with static briefly before solidifying once more.

Perplexed by this, Ford nudged the book further across the table beside the chess board, just to watch Bill try to snatch it, only for his hand to phase through it once again. It seemed Ford was able to touch the memory novel, but Bill was not.

“What are you doing?” Bill questioned, his frustration growing. “Sixer?”

Ford just watched on, puzzled, seeing Bill’s hand pass through the book again and again, unable to grasp the memories it held.

It took a while for Ford to piece together what was causing this.

He felt his stomach flip with dread when Bill had reached for the book, feeling the unfairness of the power imbalance stretch between them once again. Ford could hardly hope to hold his own against Bill when he was this intimidating, all powerful, omniscient being, able to tear through Ford’s thoughts like a racy paperback, able to negate any of the boundaries Ford put up simply through virtue of being a creature of such power.

Their peaceful chess game was laced with an undercurrent of danger from the moment Bill materialised in Ford’s mind and the scientist knew it. There was tension in the air between them. A tension derived from the knowledge that Bill really could do whatever he wanted.

Ford had felt comfortable dating a God on Earth when he knew he had limitations that Bill could not surpass, he had the runes protecting him, he had clear boundaries in place, and on Earth it could even be said that the power skewed in Ford’s favour, giving him an edge over the trapped deity.

Here in Bill’s domain, Ford was hardly an obstacle to Bill, and that scared Stanford. If he couldn’t grasp control back from this situation, he’d never see himself on level footing with Bill as they once had been. He couldn’t accept Bill’s help, knowing he didn’t have any other options, and he denied the triangle’s assistance for that precise reason.

Maybe it was contrary of Ford, but stubbornness didn’t mean acting in his own best interests all the time. Ford was stubborn because it was part of who he was.

Refusing to tell Bill where he was located was part of how Ford could claw back his standing, but when Bill had lunged for that book, for Ford’s memories, he felt the ground he was standing on crumble until his mind managed to create this ledge of leeway for Ford to hold onto before he fell.
But how was he doing it? He was stopping Bill in his own mind, refusing even his own thoughts to a creature of the mind he’d sworn himself over to. It took him a while to figure out what had engendered this successful mental rebellion, but when he realised, he became smug in the face of Bill’s frustration.

It had worked.

Project Mentum had pulled through. While the process was long and arduous, Ford had completed the entire encryption procedure, and now despite being in Ford’s head, Bill couldn’t touch any of Ford’s memories because he’d managed to encrypt them behind endless layers of code.

Ford was smiling at Bill now, the smugness oozing off him, much to Bill’s frustration.

“Sixer, what are you doing? How are you doing this? Tell me. Now!” Bill demanded.

“No, I don’t think I will.” Ford said, and his armchair shrunk down to a more reasonable size, the scientist filling the chair as an adult now and not dwarfed by it like a child. He had wrested control over the situation. He had his boundaries back. He no longer needed comforting. He felt like he finally stood a chance. “I don’t think I’ll give you the satisfaction.”

“You think you’re being clever now, but you won’t last on your own out there without me. It’s a cruel, uncaring multiverse, Sixer, and it is waiting to chew you up and spit you out just for the satisfaction of eating you alive. Tell me where you are.” Bill insisted, gripping the edge of the table now, fire sparking in his palms.

“No.” Ford said resolutely, crossing his arms.

“TELL ME WHERE YOU ARE!” Bill shrieked, growing rapidly in size until he towered over Ford, his bricks a brilliant red to match his irritation.

Confident that he still held the power in this situation, that his defiance gave him a leg up in this power struggle, Ford remained contrary.

“No.”

“You think you can do this on your own? Don’t you understand? The universe doesn’t care about you, Sixer!” Bill screeched, before exhaling, his bricks dulling back to yellow as he sighed and closed his eye, rubbing his eyelid as he spoke in a strained but more civil tone. “I’m trying to explain to you that going with me is the only way you’ll be safe. You are safest by my side.”

“I’ve just watched you incinerate one of your own monsters. I’ve seen you set your goons on me, I’ve seen you feed them body parts like it was a parlour trick. I’ve seen you destroy a planet, Bill. How am I supposed to believe that you will provide any semblance of safety?” Ford questioned incredulously.

“Because that’s what safety is.” Bill rolled his eye and sighed bitterly, his tone becoming patronising, like he was explaining a concept to a toddler. “You become the biggest baddest kid on the playground, and everybody else leaves you alone. Failing that, you do what you should be doing, which is to find the biggest baddest kid on the playground and stick to them like glue so they can fight your battles for you. Flying solo in this multiverse is a battle you’ll be fighting your entire life. Believe me, I know. You’re smarter than this Sixer. Do the smart thing.”

“I’m not telling you where I am.” Ford maintained, standing up from his armchair, turning to walk away. He left the book on the table, just to stymie Bill, knowing it was accessible yet still out of his reach. “I don’t trust you anymore, Bill. You’ll have to try a lot harder than that.”
“You haven’t even seen me begin to try, Sixer!” Bill called out after Ford’s retreat. “There are other ways to find you. You’re just making this difficult.”

Ford waved his hand without looking back at the God, content to ride his rebellious high. Smug oozed off him now that he knew he had the upper hand, the upper hand against a God again. It was nice to feel something other than paranoia for once.

“I’ll find you, Sixer. You’re mine, remember?”

Ford closed his eyes and found himself waking up in his newspaper bed in the alleyway on Meccai, well rested from a solid night’s sleep for the first time in weeks, and he felt like a new man.

He went to sleep humbled by the thought that he’d been abandoned by his God, that he’d outgrown his use. As jarring as the thought was that Bill was determined to find him, there was something about being a wanted man that renewed Ford’s confidence. His defiance made him smug, and he eked some small satisfaction out of the fact that Bill was chasing him now.

Well, Ford thought. Catch me if you can.

When Bill returned from the mindscape, he was just as furiously frantic as he’d been when he dived into it, alerted by the presence of Sixer’s subconscious dreaming. His henchmaniacs were waiting in the hall, watching as Bill floated irritably down the corridor from the mirror room, fuming.

“Did you find him?” Keyhole asked. “Is he okay?”

“Did you find his location?” Kryptos asked, Ford’s co-ordinates more pressing than his wellbeing to the compass.

“He’s shutting me out.” Bill snapped, floating briskly forward, his henchmaniacs falling in step behind him. “As stubborn as ever. We’ll have to find another way.”

“We could put up posters?” Keyhole suggested optimistically.

“Yeah, like a lost dog.” Teeth joked, grinning and elbowing Paci-Fire, finding this whole charade amusing.

“That’s an idea. Get on that. Lost Sixer.” Bill spun around and spread his hands in the air, addressing Teeth and Keyhole. “Offering a reward will give me more eyes looking for him on the ground, and hopefully wrap this whole thing up quickly. I want posters spread through every planet in the multiverse, got that?”

Teeth and Keyhole gave a brisk salute, obviously enjoying themselves. “Yes boss!”

“Bringing Sixer back is the new priority for everyone. I want everybody on this.” Bill instructed, and as soon as he issued his instructions, he teleported away, returning to the quiet of the penthouse to scour the universe the way he was taught to, so many years ago.

Kryptos floated off, muttering bitterly under his breath, and the other henchmaniacs drifted to their own destinations until it was just Keyhole and Teeth left in the hallway.

“Hmm, we don’t have a photo of the human. I could draw a likeness of him for the posters?” Keyhole suggested enthusiastically.

“No offence to your artistic pedigree, but if you draw the picture we’ll never find the guy. His features aren’t a squiggly line. You’re too abstract for this industry.” Teeth teased, shooting down Keyhole’s idea.

“Okay, so maybe we get AM to draw the picture. AM’s artistic. Is there anything else we need for the poster?” Keyhole asked. “We’ve got the reward, the picture.”

“There’s only one thing you need for a poster like this, buddy.” Teeth wrapped his arm around Keyhole’s shoulders, and grinned as he waved his hand in the air, painting a picture. “The tagline.”

The two henchmaniacs ambled out of the hall, wrapped up in the excitement of their activity, the drama and intrigue of it all. It was just like in the movies, putting up posters for the capture of a mark, and with that in mind Teeth finished his sentence with glee.

“Six Fingered Human. Wanted – Dead or Alive!”

Ford was salivating, watching the unusual purple meat spin around on the rotisserie skewers at a food stand in the slums.

He had finished the last of his ration bar, and while he couldn’t make any leeway getting into the heart of the city for food, there were enough marketplaces in the slums that sold meals of dubious origin. Ford couldn’t afford to be fussy about his food right now, protein was protein, meat was meat, and while the meat this retailer was selling was purple, it smelled intoxicatingly good.

However, like anything on Meccai, the rotisserie skewers cost money, something Ford was in short supply of. He had tried begging, sitting with a cardboard sign in front of him for a day, hoping someone would toss a few spare QUID his way. Apart from how absolutely dehumanising that experience was, he couldn’t beg in the richer parts of the city without being escorted off the streets, and here in the slum cities, you didn’t just give away your hard-earned money. You had to keep every scrap of QUID earned to survive. He earned more scorn begging in the slums than he had anywhere else.

And so that left him penniless and hungry, staring intently at the rotisserie skewers in the marketplace, inching closer with every inhale of that delicious cooked meat smell wafting over to him.

It was hard to stay away, and Ford’s stomach was longing for something tangible in his belly, not just artificial fullness.

He was starving.

Stepping a little closer to the food stall, Ford watched the skewers spin, holding his hand up to his mouth to hold himself back, however his hungry eyes must have said it all.
“You just gonna stare all day, or are you gonna buy some?” The gruff looking alien manning the stall barked at Ford, scowling at him. “Come on, I don’t got all day. Either buy something, or take a hike, you’re spooking my other customers.”

Ford failed to see how he could spook anyone in his current state, unless there was still a bit of newspaper stuck to his trench coat. He’d done his best to tidy himself up, hoping that he might have better luck seeking out pay if he didn’t look so scruffy. He’d even done his best to finger-comb his hair, though without a mirror he had no clue if he had done a good job.

“How much are they?” Ford settled on asking about the food, although he itched to ask how exactly he was ‘spooking’ anyone.

“Read the sign.” The merchant tapped the wooden sign taped to the food cart with his serrated spatula. The sign read ‘2 QUID each’ and Ford for a moment of deviousness pretended he couldn’t understand the sign, knowing he didn’t have one QUID to rub together, let alone two.

“How much?” He repeated.

“Two QUID. It’s two freakin’ QUID. What’s so hard to understand?” The merchant griped, muttering under his breath. “Freakin’ FOD can’t read even with a dimensional translator. This is what’s wrong with this damn planet, all the freakin’ FODs.”

Ford had no idea what FOD meant, but he could only assume it was derogatory. His patience with this seller was as thin as he felt, his stomach grumbling loudly, complaining with every second he spent arguing with this man instead of eating his food.

“Do you have anything cheaper maybe?” Ford questioned, trying his luck. His ideal price point was free, but he was hoping he could wear this seller down with some good old-fashioned haggling.

“You know what? If I did, I wouldn’t sell it to you.” The merchant looked Stanford up and down and then hoiked back the phlegm in his throat before spitting on the ground in front of Ford, a deliberate insult. “I can refuse the right to service to anyone on account of this bein’ my business and I draw the line at serving whatever kind of freakish looking FOD you’re supposed to be. I ain’t never seen nothin’ so offensive to the eyes. You’re a stain on this planet’s good reputation, when they let dregs like you in.”

This merchant seemed intent on tearing into Ford, verbally assaulting him with his derogatory opinions. Ford would have straight up walked away at this point, if not for the fact that as this bigoted chef continued to rant, a girl with black eyes, mustard coloured skin, and orange hair, wearing a grey scarf wrapped around her mouth, snuck up behind the food cart and as the merchant’s ire was turned the other way, she plucked six of the skewers of purple meat from the rotisserie rack, stealing them deftly.

“So, no, I ain’t gonna serve a freak like you, and if you keep loitering I’ll call the sanitation crew to come haul you away, because that’s what you do with garbage.”

Ford decided then and there that he certainly didn’t owe this repugnant man the decency of telling him that he was currently being robbed. The orange girl was moving onto the small lockbox of QUID at the back of his stall, taking his cash as well as his produce, but the merchant must have been more observant than he let on, and he followed Ford’s line of sight behind him, glancing at the girl just as she picked his lockbox up in her left hand, holding six skewers of meat between her fingers of her right.
He spun around with a shout. “HEY!”

The orange girl’s dark eyes curved up into a smile, and she waved cheekily at the merchant, before darting away across the square with her stolen haul.

As she left, she threw one of the meaty skewers over to Ford with a canny wink.

Ford fumbled to catch it, and watched her skilfully pick through the crowd, her orange braid flying out behind her.

“You don’t get to steal from me, punk!” The merchant roared, and pulled an imposing looking ray gun out from under his food cart, firing it once in the air.

The people in the marketplace shrieked, diving for cover, their hasty retreat exposing the orange haired girl’s back amidst the crowd.

The merchant primed his ray gun, the machine humming with the intensity of a murderous synthesised mosquito, aiming the weapon at her back.

Ford lunged forward, grabbing the merchant’s arm, trying to offset his shot, but he had already pulled the trigger.

A vibrant burst of light shot from the front of the ray gun, hurtling across the courtyard, a metallic sizzle pervading the air already. The shot hit its mark, and the bright light made contact with the girl, the ray likely strong enough to burn a hole right through her, and through the wall behind her.

However, when the ray impacted, blue flames burst from the girl’s body, and swarmed across her small frame, dissipating the laser.

She turned to face the merchant, still doused in flames, and reached up under her scarf, tugging something aside behind the fabric, a sound like a pair of trousers being unzipped accompanying the movement.

Soon after Ford could hear laughter, the girl laughing maniacally, fire rippling across her body as she flipped what looked like a rather rude hand gesture at the baffled merchant, who was still reeling from the kickback of the gun.

“NISSCHE TRY AHSSCHOLE!” The girl shouted, the flames surrounding her not burning her in the slightest. “I’M UNKILLABLE!”

It looked like the fire was protecting her, diffusing the laser’s beam until the flames dimmed and dissipated around her.

She turned on her heel and continued down the alleyway, with her skewers and loot still in hand, leaving the gawkers in the marketplace utterly shocked.

Ford let go of the merchant and made to follow her down the alleyway, still holding the skewer she gave him, elated as he made his pursuit.

He rounded the corner in the alleyway to find her pulling her scarf down, biting into one of the skewers, no doubt as ravenous as he was.

When Ford approached her, she looked up, and narrowed her eyes at him, swallowing the food in her mouth. “Didn’t you hear me? You’d better back off. I’m unkillable.”
Ford extended his hand to the girl, hoping to make a good first impression.

“And I’m Stanford Pines.”

He had found the biggest, baddest kid in the playground.

It was time to make a new friend.

Chapter End Notes

It's Zippy!!! Hahah, we'll get to learn more about her as the next chapter unfolds. Ford's first friend in the multiverse ends up being one of Bill's people, he sure knows how to pick 'em. I'm already a third of the way through the next chapter so you won't have a long wait for the next one, I'm going to keep churning them out, those good ol' space adventures.

This chapter is dedicated to my lovely beta reader who always does a brilliant job at culling my many commas, and also to angelic, who left some lovely comments on the fic. I think they're still reading it, so when they get to this bit, SURPRISE a chapter dedicated to you. Thank you for the lovely comments.

Next chapter Ford gets into a fistfight with a talking chair, Zippy is super slow on the uptake, and the bounty hunter to end all bounty hunters tries to take our man. Does she succeed? We'll find out. Thank you for reading and I look forward to your comments!
I am the city. The famous hotels and the cocktail bars, and the funny smells and the turmoil of course, and the people, the air that you're breathing is me.
Yes, I am the city, you let me be.

Chapter Notes
See the end of the chapter for notes

The orange girl squinted at him.

“You’re what?”

Ford’s hand faltered.

“Um, I’m Stanford. Stanford Pines?” He repeated, somewhat more hesitantly.

Her eyes looked between Ford’s face and his hand, before she noticed the translator cuff on his wrist.

She snorted a laugh and shook her head, amused, before she pointed a skewer at Ford’s dimensional translator. “Your unit’sh ancient. I remember the old translators could never get namesh right.”

“Oh.” Ford looked at his translator, somewhat disappointed. Although, this probably explained quite a lot.

“You tried to throw off his schot back there, didn’t you? Not that it made a difference, but shhill. The guy was an asshole.” She inclined her head at Stanford, then nodded to his translator again, looking for something easier to call him. “You got a nickname?”

Ford did have a nickname, but it wasn’t one he was willing to share. He shook his head, his lips pressing into a thin line.

“Do you have a nickname?” He asked her, wanting to know what to call his rescuer.

Her zippered mouth also pressed into a thin line and she shook her head as well. She looked at Ford’s translator one more time. “Sho, it doesn’t transhlate namesh? Does it transhlate accents, or like, schpeech impedimentsh?”

“Unfortunately, yes.” Stanford gave the girl a polite smile and gestured at his translator. “It doesn’t seem to be the most intuitive tech.”

“It’s outdated. That’s why it shucks.” She considered Ford, tilting her head towards the translator, before making up her mind. “Alright KXer. What do you want?”

Ford imagined that was to be his new nickname, referring to his translator. It sounded too eerily similar to Sixer to sit right with him, but he didn’t think he could insist upon a different name while he was still trying to appeal to his new ally.

Attempting to endear himself to her, Ford gave the girl a gracious smile.

“I wanted to thank you, I guess.” Ford gestured to the skewer of meat he still held. “For the food back there.”
She inclined her head, acknowledging his thanks, and took another bite out of her own skewer, still watching Ford curiously.

Ford couldn’t work the gracious angle for long, his curiosity getting the better of him.

“Also – how did you do that? Back there. With the fire.” Ford blurted out. “That was incredible!”

She paused, her cheeks full of food, and narrowed her eyes at Ford warily.

“With the laser! It didn’t even touch you. And then the flames?” Ford gushed enthusiastically. “Did they heal you or just deflect the blow?”

“What? You followed me all the way down here just to ask me why I’m a freak?” She scowled at him. “Get lost KXer. Go find someone else to bother.”

“I don’t think you’re a freak.” Ford insisted sincerely. “I think you’re incredible.”

She gave Ford a disbelieving look, taking another large bite of her skewer and chewing slowly now.

“If you’re a freak, I’m a freak too.” Ford held up his hand and pointed to his fingers. “See?”

“What am I looking at?” She asked him, eyebrows raised, speaking with food in her cheeks, still dubious.

Ford faltered and gestured to his hand. “I – this is unusual where I come from. I’m only supposed to have five fingers.”

She only had five fingers. Ford thought this would make sense, but then again, he supposed he looked just as alien to her as she did to him. She probably knew better than to assume what was the norm.

“I shee.” She nodded, feigning understanding. She pointed to Ford with her skewer again. “And you have sheven more.”

“Oh.” She blinked at him. “Sho, two extra fingersh. Is that all?”

“Well –“ Ford scratched the nape of his neck awkwardly.

“That’s, like, a feature. That’s not freakisch.” She huffed, swinging right back around to offended. “Sho, you thought you’d find yourself another freak, is that it?”

“You’re not a freak. In fact, I’d say you’re quite talented instead. Can everyone do what you can?” Ford questioned curiously. “With the fire?”

She frowned at Ford, and then gestured to her face with the skewer she held. “You aren’t sheeing what’s wrong with this picture?”

Ford looked at her, taking in her features, confused.

She certainly looked alien enough, but so did everyone he’d met on this planet. Her skin was a pale orange, almost a mustard colour, and her almond shaped eyes were black and shiny. She wore her hair in a long braid from the top of her head, but no hair grew on the sides, so she wore her braid like an extended mohawk. She had long pointed ears with metal jewellery piercing them, and her lips were covered in metal as well, a thick zipper running across them.

Ford had no point of comparison for her species, he presumed that was just her look. He wasn’t in any position to assume.

Stanford shrugged at her, not understanding what she was getting at.

“I don’t look how I’m shupposhed to look. I don’t look normal. I don’t look like the resht of my people.” She explained, agitated, before she sighed bitterly, the air whistling through her zipper. “Though I shuppose you wouldn’t know that, shince there isn’t a point of comparishon anymore.”

Ford’s mouth turned down slightly at the edges. “What do you mean?”

She sized him up, deciding whether or not she felt like spilling her guts to this total stranger. She didn’t need to humour this straggler, but she’d been on her own for a while, and it couldn’t hurt to indulge a sympathetic ear.

He mentioned he was a freak too.

Releasing her suspicion with a sigh, she climbed up to sit on one of the crates piled up in the alleyway, making herself comfortable, and she patted the box beside her, offering Ford a seat.

He clambered up next to her, still holding his untouched skewer, and watched her expectantly.

“I am Taronjan. Everyone knows the Taronjan people, they all look like me, shkin tone, eyes, hair. We have good food on Taronja and it’s all the shame colour, the shame colour as our shoil. Our moon planet was beautiful and bountiful and the best. It just was.” She insisted.

“Was?” Ford queried, frowning.

“We had to leave our moon. We were attacked.” She explained, taking a bite out of her skewer and speaking with her mouth full again.

Ford hesitantly took a bite of his own skewer as he listened and was intrigued by the taste and texture of the purple meat. It was surprisingly satisfying and didn’t taste at all like chicken.

“We lived off world for a while - what was left of us. We shtuck together. Family is important. We lived together, we worked together. We followed family the whole way. From job to job, shanctuary to shanctuary. My family meant that I was never alone.”

She finished her skewer and tossed it away roughly, watching it bounce off the wall opposite her, before starting on another one. While she paused her story, eating her stolen goods, Ford prompted her with a question, interested in her history.

“So, there’s not that many of you around anymore? Only your family? That’s why I wouldn’t recognise you, but everyone else would?” Ford had a long list of other reasons why he might not recognise her, but he didn’t want to reveal his complete interstellar ignorance just yet.

“Everyone else would because when our moon was attacked, every charity channel had a tube schpecial about the poor dishplaced Taronjans. Not that they care.” She swallowed the food in her mouth, and scowled bitterly, before answering. “There’s no one else anymore. There’s jusht me.”

Ford opened and shut his mouth, like a fish, not knowing what to say to that. He felt a wave of sympathy that made his stomach heavy with twinging sadness. Before he could fumble awkwardly through condolences, she continued speaking.
“Our shaviour, our old Mishtress, tricked us. She used us all to do her bidding, sent us on mission after mission that we should never have come back from. But we did, we were her bravescht warriors. And when we survived her last suicide mission, held hostage for a price, she came to collect us, acting merciful and benevolent until she shot them all. My entire family! She shot them all down!” The girl snarled, bearing pointed teeth behind her zipped lips, livid with remembered rage. “My bloodline meant nothing to her. We were just pawns to be used and discarded in her manipulative shitty games. I will hate her to my dying day. I will schpite her to my dying day and I hope that day will never come just so I can schpite her longer.”

Ford tried to find a polite way to respond to her ire, but he couldn’t find one, so he just cleared his throat nervously. She looked over to him, noting his awkwardness, getting defensive in response.

“What? You’re regretting asking me already? Too much for you to hear, is that it?” She sneered at Ford, her shoulders tense, expecting his scorn.

“No, no.” Ford held his hands up, assuring her. “Not at all. I actually … can relate a little to your situation. Being tricked and used by someone you trusted. The frustration and spite and helplessness. There’s … no simple or logical way to deal with all the anger and betrayal and confusion you feel. It just collides uncomfortably and you can’t make sense of it. It doesn’t feel right. It might not ever make sense. You’re not used to being this angry. You don’t know what to do with it.”

The girl’s shoulders relaxed slightly at this, and she considered Ford, genuinely impressed that he could relate at all.

“Huh.” She said, and stared at Ford a moment longer, before passing him another one of her skewers. “Here.”

Ford accepted the skewer gratefully, having been barely holding himself back from eating the last chunk of meat on his first skewer, worried he’d have to ration it. This was twice now she’d offered him food, and Ford knew he’d made the right choice following her.

“Thank you.”

She raised her own skewer to nudge it against Ford’s, like she was toasting him.

“Us freaks gotta stick together, right?”

For the first time in a long time, Ford didn’t mind being called a freak.

“Right.”

He toasted skewers with his new friend and felt his luck begin to change.

Ford spent the day with the girl, Shailesh was her name. It must have been some sort of cruel irony that her name was nearly impossible for her to say with her lisp. She had to write it down for Ford’s translator to properly transcribe it into something he could understand. She seemed very frustrated with her lisp.
“My family always used to say I was the chatty one. That I never shut up. They’d probably think this suits me.” She said, gesturing to the zipper that stretched across her lips.

The zipper was the addition she was referring to that labelled her a freak.

“How did you get it?” Ford asked.

Shailesh merely pulled her grey scarf higher, covering the unsavoury portion of her face, and muttered evasively. “Shtupidity.”

It didn’t take very long for Shailesh to warm to Ford. She chatted with him while they ate their skewers, rewarding Ford with more food the longer he stayed and listened. When he showed no signs of wanting to abandon her, she decided to show him around the city, elated for the company.

Shailesh was used to being surrounded by family. Ford could only assume she was keeping him close to dull the pain of being without them.

As pitiable as that was, Ford was thankful for the opportunity. He also did not want to be abandoned to the streets.

After their stolen meal, Shailesh walked Ford around the slums, showing him the parts of the city that interested her. She showed him certain favoured dumpsters behind restaurants that lay just on the edge of the rich part of the city, where good food was often deposited to be scavenged away into the purlieus. She showed him a few of the rougher bars on the fringes where you wouldn’t get charged an arm and a leg for a stiff drink. She showed him an abandoned artificial park, deemed not fancy enough for the heart of the city, its curling vines and cultured greenery withering and laced with weeds, neglect enhancing its wild beauty.

It was incredibly intriguing to Ford, unlike anything he’d ever seen. He felt the stirrings of a botanist well up inside him, something that hadn’t ignited his fancy as an elective in university. He was certain these alien plants would be the sort of thing to give impassioned botanists wet dreams.

Together, Ford and Shailesh sat on top of the rusted metal play equipment that littered the park, the jungle gym having fallen into decline just as the park had, observing the nature around them.

There were plants with grey leaves and green blossoms, flowers that bloomed slime, delicate roses that seemed to be evaporated of substance, yet still held in place gently, like sculpted colourful gas. The trees had white, sickly looking branches with black leaves moving of their own accord like coral in the sea, and creatures that looked like seaweed moved between the branches, like floating eels, although Shailesh assured him the eels were definitely plant life and not some sort of sentient animal.

“You really are fresch off the docksh, aren’t you?” Shailesh observed teasingly. “They don’t have gardensh on your home planet?”

“There are gardens.” Ford replied, reaching out to try and touch the floating plant-eels as they weaved around him. “They don’t look a thing like this though. It’s amazing.”

“My nonelle would tell me about the gardenesh on Taronja. The trees had leaves of gold, and everything grew red, ripe and bountiful. You could pull orbs from the trees and be shustained for weeks, they were sho filling.” Shailesh swiped a fingertip along the plant-eel and rubbed the goo between her thumb and forefinger. “I never got to try one. I was born off world, after the moon raids. I’ve only heard the schtories.”

“Can you eat these?” Ford gestured to the plant-eels, curious if he could survive on these peculiar things. He had already memorised the route to the park, just in case he ever found himself so destitute in future that he couldn’t find food elsewhere. In case he fell out of favour with his new friend, something he was paranoid might become true. History repeating itself and all.

“Why would you want to?” Shailesh scoffed, wiping her fingers on her trousers, wrinkling her nose. “The only reason this park still has plants in it is because no one could stomach them. If there was a shingle edible thing here, do you think it’d still be standing considering how many people are starving on this planet? If you could eat this stuff it’d either be bought, sold, or stolen by now.”

Ford considered that, seeing the sense in her logic. From what he knew of Meccai, it was unlikely a resource like this would go unclaimed when there was profit to make from it. The plant-eels wound their way around the branches of the coral trees and Ford sat in amiable silence with his new companion.

“Where do you come from?” Shailesh asked Ford curiously. “What planet?”

“Oh, um.” Ford twiddled his thumbs together, weighing up whether being truthful to his new friend would bring him scorn.

Bill had assured Stanford that the universe didn’t think too highly of humans, and Ford didn’t want to jeopardize his newest friendship, but he had no guarantee that Bill had been truthful with his warnings about the multi-verse. In fact, Ford was so disinclined to believe that Bill could have ever been truthful that he decided to be honest about his origins, just to test the waters.

“I come from Earth.” He said boldly.

“What Earth?” Shailesh reached over and poked at the dimensional translator on Ford’s wrist. “This thing must be broken. It’s supposed to tell me what Earth you’re referring to, Earth 86, Primary Earth, Preliminary Earth. The only people who call it just ‘Earth’ aren’t evolved enough to know better.”

Dammit, Bill was telling the truth. Ford wanted to believe he hadn’t been. It made it that much harder to justify staying mad at him when he could believe everything Bill had told him had been a lie.

The scientist looked around awkwardly, still fidgeting with his thumbs. Shailesh seemed to pick up on his awkwardness, and she gawped at him.

“You aren’t a human, are you?”

Ford looked sheepish enough already, rueful that he hadn’t caught Bill out in a lie this time, and when she guessed his species colour sprung to his cheeks, already embarrassed, frustrated with himself, though he knew he shouldn’t be.

Shailesh let out a high-pitched bark of laughter, grinning at him with amusement. “No way. This is like watching a shea slug grow legs and walk out of the water. Are you kidding me? You’re not a human.”

“Yes, I am.” Ford admitted, raising his shoulders a little taller, defensively feigning pride in the face of her laughter.

“No freakin’ way you are!” Shailesh cackled, before she jokingly smacked Stanford in the back. “Humans are barely bipedal morons, you’re not a human. You can’t be. Humans are shtupid.”
“What makes you think we’re all so stupid?” Ford asked defensively, his shoulders bunching now. “Specifically, what?”

Bill had insisted it was the golden record on the Voyager probe. He didn’t think the music on the Voyager was that bad and he didn’t appreciate the rest of the multi-verse typecasting humans as idiots based on the music Ford’s hero, Carl Sagan, picked for the shuttle. Ford thought the diverse arrangement was moving and well chosen, everything from Mozart, Louis Armstrong, and Bach was on that disc as well as music from all around the world. To think that such a bad reputation had sprung from such discerning taste. Ford desperately wanted to believe it was just another one of Bill’s lies.

“Everyone knows humans are sh*t stupid. Un-evolved, right?” Shailesh divulged casually, nudging him with her elbow. “Sho, what, you’re not like the other humans?”

“Well, my IQ is above the –” Ford started, his ego speaking first, before he realised that his own IQ wasn’t relevant here.

He thought of his friends and family back on Earth, his nearest and dearest, all humans, most of them with no idea that he was even gone. The only person who knew he was lost in the portal was his brother, Stanley, and Ford was mostly certain that even after seeing Ford fall through it, Stanley would still have no idea where Ford was. While his brother and the people of Gravity Falls hadn’t exactly been the paragon of human intellectualism, Ford still didn’t feel right about badmouthing his genus because of him. That was no way to save face.

“Look, while I agree that we’re not all geniuses, that doesn’t give the galaxy the right to write us all off. I highly doubt every other interstellar species is intelligent all the time, I mean, that merchant in the market seemed bigoted enough to indicate a lack of intelligence. I’m not speaking for all of us of course, but we’re not un-evolved. Humans, they’re not all bad.”

“Ah, but you’re not like the other humans, right? Because of your –“ Shailesh wiggled her fingers at his hands, referring to his polydactyly. “Sho, is that why you can communicate with me, because you’ve evolved an extra brain in your fingertip?”

Ford gave Shailesh’s teasing a flat look and pointed to the dimensional translator on his wrist.

Shailesh barked another elated laugh, before she grinned at him. “You’re not sho bad KXer. You’re funny.”

“Well, I’m glad someone thinks so.” Ford muttered sarcastically, rolling his eyes.

He tried not to dwell on the way the déjà vu of this conversation cultured tightness in his throat. The familiarity of it all reminded Ford of what he was trying to ignore, but he was reminded of it wherever he went.

Ford knew the deity was searching for him, but that didn’t mean Ford had to find Bill in everyone he met.

“It’s getting late – not that you can tell here – the lights are always on.” Shailesh remarked, changing the subject, lifting herself off the top of the jungle gym and swinging down to land on the mossy ground below. “Sho, where have you been shtaying, KXer?”

Ford thought back to his alleyway of preference and felt ashamed and angry once more. He’d gone from owning his own house in the woods, a lovingly crafted ode to solitude and the God who spared him from it, to going one step up from living in a ditch, sleeping in a filthy alleyway, all because of Bill’s treachery. It burned him to admit that he’d fallen so low, and he didn’t want to look bad in front of his new companion.

“Oh, nowhere in particular.” Ford lied, playing it casual.

“Sho nowhere, huh?” Shailesh looked over Ford knowingly, her inky black eyes reflecting consideration back at him. “Hmm.”

She swung back on her heels idly, swinging her arms as Ford climbed down from the jungle gym, his clumsy climb less smooth than her swift descent. As he landed on the mossy ground, Shailesh continued talking, her tone light and conversational, the pity in her eyes not showing in her voice.

“I’ve shtayed there once too. Come on, I’ll schow you shomeplace better.”

And with that, she turned on her heel and led him away.

The place Shailesh took Ford to was like a mansion compared to his musty little alleyway. They entered the building through an air vent above a dumpster and crawled along the vent until they breached through to the other side. When they arrived, Ford was blown away.

Due to their unconventional entry point, Ford didn’t have high expectations about their destination, but anything would be better than that alleyway. He just didn’t know how much better.

Shailesh kicked the metal vent cover off and jumped out into what looked like a futuristic luxury furnished apartment. Stanford couldn’t believe his luck. He climbed out of the vent and took in the creature comforts with an awe that felt out of place, considering he’d had those same creature comforts for himself about a month ago. Only with space age technology.

There was a dusty looking couch, a kitchen, bedrooms, en-suite bathrooms, and several mounts with exposed wires twining out from them where televisions must have sat. That much was recognisable. It wasn’t a spacious apartment, but it was certainly grand enough on the inside. Stanford was impressed.

“Shorry I schrapped the channel cubes.” Shailesh said, plopping herself down on the couch casually, resting her feet on the cushions, muddy boots leaving stains on the upholstery. “We could have had shomething to watch. Do you like game schows?”

“I like trivia shows.” Ford replied, still looking around the apartment.

He wondered what alien television would be like, compared to the TV channels you got on Earth. Bill always seemed delighted by Ford’s TV, even when he was watching static. Ford wondered if that was indicative of the quality of television in space, or the quality of television on Earth.

“Trivia schows are alright. Sho long as it’s not Wheel of Torture. We’re not watching anything here, though. Too bad for you, I guess.” Shailesh shrugged and began picking leftover food from the teeth of her zipper. “I could take you to a bar with a channel cube, but all they watch is the shports ball.”
That didn’t sound so different then, barring the torture.

Ford nodded, barely listening, running his hand over the smooth metal surface of the countertop in the kitchen. When his hand touched the metal, blue holograms lit up on the countertop, displaying recipes and ordering lists for various groceries in the air above the tabletop. Ford was fascinated and scrolled through the food lists curiously, taking in the names of different meals, trying to memorise them.

Shailesh rested her head against the couch cushions and craned her neck to see what Stanford was doing.

“This place is amazing.” Ford muttered, watching the holograms change into step by step cooking instructions, playing out visually on the other side of the countertop, enthralled.

“It looks like you don’t need the channel cubes.” Shailesh huffed a laugh, watching Ford ogle at the holograms. “That’s not the cooking channel, you know, that’s just how the kitchen works.”

“Still, I’ve never seen anything like this before.” Ford marvelled. “It’s brilliant.”

“It’s alright.” Shailesh shrugged. “They made all these sherviced apartments close to the city, but no one lives in them. They were bought by investors to keep property prices high. You’ve seen how many people get schrunched together in a schithole in the shlums. There are whole buildings here schitting empty and no one’s living in them.” Shailesh smirked and smeared the mud on her boots deeper into the couch’s upholstery, deliberately making a mess. “Might as well be me.”

Ford looked back at her, and wrinkled his nose seeing the mud spread onto that perfect white sofa, his latent instinct for tidiness rearing its head once more.

Shailesh noticed the way Ford frowned at the mud on the couch and turned around to look at him properly. “Don’t make that face at me KXer. Who cares if this place gets wrecked? If I don’t like it, I just climb one floor up, and there’s another empty place just like this. All mine for the taking.”

“But what happens if the owners find out what you’ve been doing here?” Ford asked, gesturing to the mud on the couch and the holes where the channel cubes had been ripped from the walls.

“What’s the worsht they could do to me?” Shailesh scoffed. “Kill me? Ha. I’d like to shee them try.”

“So, you just live like this?” Ford questioned, trying to understand Shailesh, but finding her actions a stark contrast from the codes of social propriety he’d been raised with back on Earth. “Taking whatever you want, breaking into places and stealing just because you can get away with it?”

Was this just how things were in space? Could people just do things like this with no consequence? Is that why Bill was the way he was? was Stanford’s pervading thought that he was attempting to quash down.

“Yep.” Shailesh crossed her arms behind her head and cosied back into the couch, satisfied and relaxed. “And life has never been cushier.”

“But why?” Ford let go of the kitchen counter, the holograms fading out, and walked into the living room to sit on the couch beside her. “Why do you get to do this, but all those people out there don’t?”

“Don’t get all preachy on me KXer. I desherve this luxury.” Shailesh insisted, her lip curling with each angry justification. “I desherve everything I can get my hands on out here. The universe took EVERYTHING from me. It owesch me. I am owed this. And if you don’t like it -”

“I never said that.” Ford held up his hands, backtracking. “I’m just trying to understand. Why?”

“What not?” Shailesh huffed, and ducked her chin into her scarf, curling in on herself. “These rich people get to have it. Sho do I. It’s not like anyone can shtop me. It’s not like I can die, sho why not live my life how I want?”

She looked over to Stanford, gauging his reaction to this, and when he seemed more pensive than disapproving, she perked up a little, glee creeping into her voice as she continued to talk.

“I like to imagine the look on the landlord’sh face when he sees me living it up in his fancy apartments. Too good for a freak like me, but guess who’s been shtaying here all along?” Shailesh cackled. “Breaking the rules. I don’t have to follow anyone’s rules anymore. I make my own rules.”

“I used to think of space as a lawless place.” Ford commented, thoughtful. “But that’s really just not true, is it?”

“There are SHO MANY rules.” Shailesh gripped her pointed ears as she complained. “God, all the time. There are sho many made by sho many different people who don’t follow them shemselves. I used to follow every rule shet to me, to the letter. I was obedient, I was dutiful. I was loyal, but who’s to shay who desherves your loyalty. Everyone’s just out for themshelves, sho why shouldn’t I be?”

“Fair point.” Ford nodded, mulling that over.

On Earth, while he may have bent the rules a little for certain people, mainly for Stanley or Bill, for the most part Ford was very much a black and white thinker. He was a law-abiding citizen. He followed the rules. You either did the right thing, or the wrong thing, though now he was coming to think on it, out here in space it was rather hard to tell what the right thing was. It seemed to differ person to person, a sliding scale of morality.

The only reason he wasn’t starving right now was because Shailesh stole him food, and every attempt he made to secure gainful employment without stealing was rebuffed by the employers on this planet, who seemed to decide that Ford would have to earn money for a visa, but he couldn’t earn money without a visa.

Ford had been polite and respectful, conceding to the rules of this place knowing he was ignorant, wanting to learn the law of the land, but all that had gained Ford was a pile of newspapers for bedding in the back of a dingy alleyway.

He didn’t want to, but he was starting to see why Bill was such a chaotic madman, and why Shailesh no longer seemed to care what she did, as long as she was looking out for her own interests.

The universe really was a cruel and hypocritical sphere of being, and while Ford was trying hard to not think on it, one phrase lingered in his head, as fresh as it was when it first was spoken.

You think you can do this on your own? Don’t you understand? The universe doesn’t care about you, Sixer!

Shailesh looked over at Stanford, noting his thoughtful expression. She removed the earrings from her long, pointed ears and gathered them all in her pocket, before she sat up and slapped her hand on her leg, pushing up off the couch. “Well. I’m dimming the lights now. Do you want me to shtay with you on the couch, or give you some space?”

Ford looked up at her, surprised that she would offer to stay with him. He wasn’t quite comfortable with sharing a bed (or a couch) with someone he’d just met, but the offer seemed to be more for her comfort than his. She was watching him hopefully, no doubt missing having people around her. She must have slept with her family close by, but Ford didn’t want to sleep around a stranger.

He still wasn’t quite comfortable with sleep yet, he didn’t know what he would do once he closed his eyes.

“I might stay out here.” Ford hastened to clarify. “By myself.”

Her hopeful expression fell somewhat, but she nodded.

“Shure. You can stay on the couch if you want. There’s a massage bed in the other room with my name on it.”

Ford nodded and hummed absently in agreement.

“You can have a turn tomorrow?” Shailesh offered, watching Ford curiously, noting how insular he seemed now.

“Mmmhm.” Ford said without looking up, leaning forward to rest his elbows on his knees, lacing his fingers together, lost in thought.

“Tchh. Yeah, you must be tired. Get some sleep KXer. We’ll go out tomorrow.” With that she smiled at him, zipped her lips shut and walked out of the living room into one of the bedrooms, closing the door slightly behind her, leaving Stanford with his thoughts.

Now that he was less fixated on his own survival, his stomach no longer drowning out the rest of his thoughts with hunger, and now that his life wasn’t in immediate danger, Ford found himself oddly introspective.

You would imagine the time for introspection would be while sitting in the gutter, with nothing to do but beg for sustenance, but Ford found himself too absorbed with people watching, trying to suss out this new society. Now that he didn’t have the hustle and bustle around him 24/7, now that he had a moment alone of true privacy, it was like all of the conflicted thoughts and emotions, Ford had been shunting to the side flooded in to fill the gap his basic instincts left.

He wasn’t hungry anymore, but he was still hungry for answers. He wasn’t so utterly fearful for his life, but he was angry and frustrated, mourning the life he had lost so abruptly without passing through the allotted stages of grief. He was upset, and wistful, but mostly just frustrated now, confused and angry with no idea where to channel that anger.

He didn’t know how to deal with anger. He didn’t want to be an angry person, he didn’t think that was him. Anger boiled inside him, hurting him the more he held it in, but he didn’t want to let that anger out. Letting his anger out would make him a person he didn’t want to be. He didn’t want to be a spectator to the rage and frustration that would volcano out of him should he give it a chance to, and he didn’t have an outlet for it that could be deemed as healthy.

He wouldn’t turn it on Shailesh, he had no reason to, she was helping him. He couldn’t turn it on the city that had scorned him, he knew that would not end well for him, being a stranger in a place he barely understood. He’d likely get arrested for his outburst, given his luck. He didn’t want to lash out or he’d end up just like Shailesh, feeling justified in her theft and carelessness.
Every time he thought on the logical recipient of his ire, Bill, his justifications for hating Bill found logical obstacles, which the irrational part of his anger couldn’t stand.

Bill was lying to you all along became a false justification, as every time Ford attempted to question his knowledge of the multiverse, knowing that knowledge had come from Bill, he found himself confronted by the truth of Bill’s words once again. Knowing that Bill had lied to him all along was something that maintained his rage and bitterness, fuelling his tirade against the triangle, but knowing that he hadn’t lied every single time, that there were truths amongst the lies, that Ford still had to sift through, sowed so much doubt in Ford’s mindset, that he began to hate himself for it. He was better off believing Bill lied the entire time, as discovering the truths amidst the lies led Ford to question everything that had happened between them all over again.

Bill manipulated you to hurt you became another contested justification, as the things that Stanford had characterised as manipulative, Bill trying to find Stanford, telling him he wouldn’t make it on his own, having him believe the universe would eat him alive without Bill’s guidance, had enough truth within them that Ford was starting to believe that Bill potentially said those things because he cared for Stanford, because he was worried for him and his fate should he explore the multiverse alone. Even with his larger lie, the betrayal, using him to create the portal, that was a manipulation that stretched several years, but Bill had never told Stanford why he was doing what he was doing. He never mentioned his ailing dimension, or what his true intent was for the portal, but perhaps Bill had meant that as a kindness, shielding Stanford from the reality of the situation through those lies of omission.

Bill was wildly manipulative, there was no doubt about that, but when Bill would tell Stanford that he was always right, that used to be an endearment, not a red flag for mental conditioning. When he would tell Stanford that he was special that was begrudging sincerity, a true sentiment, not a deliberate false flattery. When Bill cupped his face in his hands and told Stanford “You are the best choice I’ve made in a long time” Ford wanted to believe it was true. Why else would he have said it? Bill said so many things that Ford wanted to believe could be true, but how could he know what was truthful anymore?

Ford was better off insisting that it was all lies, but then he’d be lying to himself. It was impossible to remain objective with so much betrayal and embitterment swirling within him, and his soul longed for a simple answer. Something that would stop Stanford from longing to close his eyes.

Stanford didn’t want to confront the reality that he still cared for Bill, and it was difficult to avoid that reality when confronted with the likelihood that Bill probably still cared for him too.

This made Stanford angrier, if anything, because he didn’t want to believe that Bill still cared for him. That he was capable of care, given what he did. It angered him, every scrap of evidence that led to that conclusion, because it was easier for Stanford to blame Bill for his current situation if he believed that Bill was always lying, manipulative, and didn’t care about Stanford at all. It was easier to justify himself if he believed Bill knowingly wanted him to suffer, instead of imagining the triangle trapped in his oscillating nightmare realm, waiting for a sign that Stanford was safe.

The anger just built, bubbling like lava, the pressure building, and he didn’t want to know what would happen when the pressure burst through.

He hated the thought that Bill still cared for him, because it revealed how much Stanford wanted that, and how much he knew he shouldn’t.

Leaning back against the couch cushions, exhaling his frustration loudly, he closed his eyes and crossed his arms, his irritated thoughts buzzing at the back of his head. He was too agitated to notice how comfortable the lounge was, how stark the contrast between sleeping on the ground was now that he was sinking into plush cushions, but his body could tell the difference. Already it was relaxing back onto the couch, easing down into a comfort that was to be cherished, not ignored by a wilful mind.

Ford barely noticed when he tipped over into unconsciousness, his brows furrowed, his breathing evening out as his mind continued to churn with irritable mental muttering.

Lucid dreaming was becoming second nature to Stanford now. He had trained his mind to direct him to his mental library as a default to spare him from unpleasant nightmares, and so when he realised he had arrived in his mindscape he seamlessly continued to pace back and forth across the floor, his movements mirroring the way his thoughts cycled around repeatedly.

He wanted to be thinking clearly, logically. He knew anger made him irrational, and as a scientist, irrational was the last thing he wanted to be, but there was something about being tricked all the way into an interdimensional portal that led to a little irrational anger.

Ford felt like Shailesh here. He felt he could understand her desire to live forever, just to remain spiteful until the very end, to hold onto her anger as an act of revenge. His subconscious understood the venom with which she spat her curses, and while he never considered himself a particularly spiteful person, he’d never had any issues with holding a grudge.

He had successfully held a grudge against Stanley for all those years, when his brother robbed him of the opportunity to go to his dream university, and Bill had robbed him of more than that. The opportunity to access and create advanced technology, ahead of its time. The opportunity to explore the unknown, to persevere through the stars to greatness, to make a name for himself, to be renowned for his genius.

All this was robbed from him by Bill’s betrayal and Stanford wanted to hold onto the spite that engendered, to ignore the nagging voice of logic telling him that those things hadn’t necessarily been robbed from him. That he was here on a different planet right now, proved that those opportunities were still very much available, it was just here on Meccai that they seemed so far out of his reach.

He had barely been able to secure food for himself on his own, but with someone helping him he now, he had food, lodging, and opportunities to explore the city without being evicted from public spaces.

Maybe that was the issue, that he was on his own. Bill seemed to insist that Stanford wouldn’t survive on his own and as manipulative as Stanford realised that was, there was a part of him that believed it.

He always had people helping him, Stanley beating off his bullies for him, Bill and Fiddleford helping him with the portal, Shailesh helping him survive the streets. Even the miners who helped him through the wormhole.

Perhaps it was the solitude that had Stanford so cut off from opportunity. If he hadn’t met Shailesh, he might not have been able to reach out to anyone for help, the only person he would have been able to turn to would be the God who was currently looking for him. Perhaps that was Bill’s intent all along, to isolate Ford until he became so co-dependent that he’d return to Bill of his own free will.

The more Stanford dwelled on his situation the more his anger, spite and frustration melded with self-loathing and criticism. He felt his thoughts circling round and round, blaming Bill then empathising with Bill, then blaming himself, those three sentiments chasing each other, mirroring his pacing through the mindscape.

He wanted a clean conclusion he could reach that would make the decision for him, restore his world to the black and white logic that kept it so orderly, but everything was murky now, colours running together, and his world was beginning to resemble Bill’s nightmare realm, arguments melting into a kaleidoscopic oil slick of colour in his thoughts.

Ford wanted someone to blame.

He stopped pacing as he noticed movement in his mindscape in his peripheral vision. There was someone in between the stacks. Ford crept around the bookshelves until he could see the creature haunting his head.

Bill floated in front of a row of books, swiping his hand across the journals with a vacant expression. Each time he swiped his hand across the books it went right through them, the journals fuzzing with static, unable to be grasped.

Bill repeated the motion over and over, his eye gazing flatly at the books like he’d seen this happen a hundred times over. Perhaps he had.

“What are you doing here?” Ford’s voice rang out across the silent library.

Bill barely turned, not looking at Stanford, still swiping his hand across the books. “Are you going to tell me where you are yet?”

“What, have you just been waiting in here? Trying to break into my memories?” Ford strode down the aisle, his unchecked anger looking to pick a fight.

“I wouldn’t have to if you’d tell me where you are.” Bill rolled his eye, like he was exasperated with Stanford’s defiance. “So why don’t you save me the effort, huh?”

“I’m not saving you anything. I’m not going to help you break into my memories. I don’t even want you in my head at all!” Ford yelled at Bill, throwing his hand back to gesture to the library.

“Uhuh.” Bill said, his voice dripping with disbelief as he swept his hand through the memory books once again.

“I mean it! I want you to leave. Get out! Leave me alone!” Ford continued to shout at Bill, working himself up. He was right to be angry with Bill, he was right to.

“You’re not being very hospitable.” Bill remarked and Ford angrily bunched his hands into fists.

“I don’t have to be hospitable to you! You ruined my life! Get out of my head, Bill. Get out!”

Bill continued to look forward at the bookshelf, although Ford could see Bill’s eye narrow like he was squinting incredulously at Ford’s words. Rather than giving Stanford a reaction, he just continued to swipe at the shelf once more.
Ford’s anger burned bright at that and his mind manifested its mental defences sharply, the laser gun materialising in his hand once more.

Bill moved to swipe his hand through the books again, but before he could make contact a bright laser burst shot Bill’s hand clean off.

“Stop trying to break into my mind!” Ford shouted, holding the gun out in front of him.

Bill’s shadowy hand reformed wispily from the air, but he wasn’t ignoring Stanford now. He had turned to glare at him as his hand restored itself, the insult written plainly on his face.

“There is no breaking in. I’m already here. This is my mind now too, Sixer, or don’t you remember giving it to me from now until the end of time? I remember. It was a very pleasant moment.”

“Well, I take it all back.” Ford swiped his hand through the air definitively. “You can’t have it.”

“You don’t take back a gift, Sixer.” Bill narrowed his eye dangerously. “And you don’t go back on a deal. We shook on it.”

“I don’t care. A handshake means nothing. You lied to me. Everything you said was a lie.” Ford said, holding onto his now flawed justification.

“Is that so?” Bill said, his tone tingling sinister. His sides began to grow, as he floated over Stanford, taking up a little more space in his mind.

“Everything.” Ford maintained, the lie souring his thoughts.

“And you’d know all about that, wouldn’t you? It’s not like you’d ever tell a lie, or hide something, or go behind someone’s back?” Bill accused, his words seething with venom.

Stanford didn’t want to hear it, he didn’t want the reminder of his culpability, and so he shot Bill again, the laser punching a hole through Bill’s bricks. The hole slowly started to fill in with that same wispy quality, so Stanford shot him again, looking to assuage his anger, but Bill just kept talking.

“It’s not like you’d ever build someone up, make them content and comfortable, then just tear it all down. It’s not like you’d trick someone, use them to suit your idealistic purpose, mould them into your dream companion and pretend that wasn’t what you were doing the entire time.”

Ford shot Bill again, unloading shot after shot into the demon’s body as Bill continued to float closer to him, hurling accusations that hit too close to home.

“Get OUT!”

“It’s not like you would stand there, and lie to me over and over, just to save face. It’s not like you’re thinking one thing and doing the other as easy as breathing. It’s not like you’re a complete and utter hypocrite, making rules for others that don’t apply to yourself, still thinking you’re better than the rest of the world.”

Ford emptied the gun of all its charge, turning Bill’s bricks into swiss cheese, but the holes kept closing up, the air a hazy cloud of dispersed particles around his muse as Bill’s form kept reforming after each dogged shot fired.

“It’s not like you would betray someone, oh no. Not you.” Bill was towering over Ford now, floating right above him and the scientist felt fear, not of Bill, but the fear of facing the truth of the lies he told himself. This veil of deceit was woven so carefully for Ford, but effortlessly Bill seemed to be able to see right through it.

“I don’t tell lies.” Bill said mockingly, his voice booming as he filled Ford’s field of vision like an avenging angel of his own scorned logic. “I’M STANFORD PINES.”

Ford shouted out, and closed his eyes, and when he opened them, he was laying on the couch in Shailesh’s stolen furnished apartment.

He panted, trying to catch his breath, and run his hands through his hair, before exhaling with frustration.

He wasn’t even free to lie to himself in his own head. His dutiful muse saw to that. Flinging things Stanford didn’t want to hear at him. Ford had thought shooting Bill would be more satisfying, but his anger just left him hollow.

He wanted a better way to deal with his. He needed a better outlet.

Sitting up, Ford looked over the back of the couch to the bedroom door, which Shailesh had left ajar. He could hear noises, muffled sobs coming quietly from the other room and he realised why Shailesh had zipped her lips shut before sleeping.

She was crying in her sleep. Stifled sad keening noises. She missed her family.

Ford missed his family too and the Earth he left behind, but he was having trouble mourning his loss when a different shape hovered at the forefront of his mind, something he missed more, despite not wanting to.

Ford turned around on his side on the lounge and looked at the muddy patches on the smooth white upholstery, his eyes finding patterns in the stains. He tried to get comfortable, attempting to sink back onto the couch as he had before, ignoring Shailesh’s muffled sobs.

There was nothing he could do for her. The only thing he could do would be to go back to sleep.

But he wouldn’t go back to sleep. He couldn’t after that.

There was something about facing your demons that led to sleepless nights.

And if Ford were being honest with himself, he probably wouldn’t be in this situation.

Shailesh strode into the living room, bright and early, like she hadn’t been crying mournfully throughout the night while she slept.

“Hi KXer! Guessh what?” She declared cheerfully after unzipping her lips. “I’ve got a plan.”

“A plan for what?” Stanford blinked at her, looking far less rested than he would have liked. On the plus side, he now knew every recipe on the extensive grocery list on the counter, and every food name, as well as the basic functioning of the hologram projector. He figured since Shailesh had already torn the televisions from the walls, he could do a little tinkering of his own, and now had his own hologram projector sitting snug in his trenchcoat pocket.

“A good plan.” Shailesh put her earrings in as she walked into the kitchen. “A fun plan.”

She turned on the tap at the kitchen sink, simply waving her hand under the spout and a purple liquid began pouring out, which she then began to rinse her mouth out with, spitting purple into the sink. “If you watch my back. we could make tonnes of money. Eashy money. Then we could go shomewhere fancy in the inner city to eat.”

“What’s the plan?” Ford asked again, turning around where he was sitting so he could face her.

“You’ll sheeee.” Shailesh grinned, wagging her finger at Ford as she made her way over to the open air vent. “Come on.”

Dutifully Ford followed, climbing into the air vent behind her and out into the city below.

Shailesh’s plan, as it turned out, was not so much of a plan as a dedication to get absolutely intoxicated.

Bouncing from dive bar to dive bar, Shailesh would drink her way through the money in the lock box she stole from the merchant in the square, and when the money ran dry, she would attempt to steal or hustle her way back to financial security, only to move onto the next unsuspecting establishment.

At first, Ford was dubious enough of this plan of hers, erring on the side of caution, still not wanting to offend the locals, much less steal from them.

Like she had with the food, Shailesh became more generous with buying drinks for Ford the more hesitant he was about this type of law-flouting carousing. His attempts to nurse one drink became difficult in the face of her constant enthusiasm and misplaced generosity.

Though Ford had attempted to pace himself at first, wanting to savour the flavours of this bizarre space brew (it had a strong citrus taste, similar to if limoncello was mixed with diesel petrol – Ford assumed it was an acquired taste) the more Shailesh engaged him in conversation, the less he wanted to talk about his own situation, and so he took more deflecting sips from his drink than he should have.

“This is way better than when I did this by myshelf.” Shailesh slurred, her lisp worsening as she drank. “Drinking shucks when you have no one to talk to, otherwise what’s the point? You can’t drink without schtories. I bet you’ve got schtories.”

“Not any good ones.” Ford lied, disinclined to open discourse about his numerous failings.

“Nooo. Don’t shay that. Tell me about Earth.” She beseeched, her cheeks flushing a darker orange as the alcohol hit her system. “I want human schtories. Tell me about your human buddiesh.”

“I can’t say that I have too many buddies.” Stanford swirled his drink around, staring into the colourful liquid.
He certainly hadn’t left Earth with too many buddies, that was for sure. Fiddleford turned his back on him, quitting the project in a rage, Ford had barreled through a typical argument with Stanley right before their fistfight that led him here, and thanks to Bill’s possessive sentiments Ford had no doubt how utterly he’d alienated Willow and Dan. He didn’t know what had happened with Suzie, but he wasn’t sure they could even be counted as friends, considering how little she knew about him. She seemed to think she knew him, but every time Ford interacted with her it was clear she didn’t know a thing.

His closest friendship, not counting childhood bonds that had been thoroughly ruined by the indignities of growing up, was his most recent friendship, his special friendship with Bill. If one could even call it that.

It would have to be a special friendship indeed to outlast the turbulence they’d both put each other through.

The thought that his only remaining friend was Bill brought a bitter taste to Ford’s mouth, and so he washed it down with a harsher flavour, swallowing more of the peculiar yellow moonshine Shailesh had bought him.

“How can you not have buddies?” Shailesh boggled, clapping Ford on the back companionably. He spluttered on his drink, the force of her slap jarring the liquid from his mouth. Shailesh barked another laugh, regarding him with delight. “You’re hilarious!”

“Ha ha.” Ford said dryly, wiping his mouth.

“My big brother was my buddy. He led us on missions and looked after us all, but he especially liked me. He always listened to my stories. He laughed too.” Shailesh sighed and spun her empty glass around on the tabletop for a melancholy moment. “Do you have brothers on Earth?”

“A twin? What’s he like? Is he like you?” Shailesh leaned her elbow on the table and cushioned her cheek on her palm clumsily, looking up at Ford expecting a story.

Ford struggled with how much he should divulge here. He wasn’t exactly pleased with Stanley right now and their estrangement spanned a good ten years prior to when Ford last saw him. He didn’t think he could tell the sort of fond story Shailesh was expecting, but he figured he had to have something to tell her, lest she tire of his company and drunkenly wander off to find a new companion.

“Not exactly. Barring looks, we’re entirely different, and –“ Stanford sighed, frustration tingling his tone before he continued. “Stanley is… difficult at times. He likes to believe he knows what he’s doing without having done any of the legwork for it. He’s impulsive and headstrong. He likes to cheat and swindle his way through everything he encounters, and despite that, somehow, he still remains an optimist about the world. It’s rather childish, really.”

“Is that a bad thing?” Shailesh asked, blinking at him quizzically.

“No. It’s just –“ Ford looked down into his glass of moonshine. “When he acts childish, that means I have to be the adult in the situation. He shirks responsibility and then I have to pick up the pieces. I don’t think he could pick up the pieces if he tried. He just makes a mess out of everything and expects me to tidy up after him and his messes.”

“It sounds like he trusts you then.” Shailesh observed simply.
“That’s funny, because it sounds to me like he uses me to mop up after his problems.” Ford huffed, shaking his head, debating taking another sip of the sour moonshine. He paused, and considered what Shailesh said, before he took a long gulp of the toxic brew.

“Is he the youngescht?” Shailesh asked. “I’m the youngescht, sho I get to act childish. Or I did, anyway.”

“I don’t think being younger by two minutes grants that much leeway.” Ford murmured as the citrusy drink burned down his gullet. He cleared his throat, puffing out a breath, before he fanned himself with his hand. “God, that’s strong.”

“Hah, you think that’s strong. That’s just the cheap stuff.” Shailesh snickered at Ford’s flushed face, before she looked around the bar. “You’re like a little baby. Watch this.”

Shailesh heaved her torso up onto the bar and leaned over the counter while the bartender’s back was turned, her legs lifting up in the air as she tilted behind the bar, snatching up a bottle of purple liquid in an expensive looking decanter before she teetered back into her seat and poured herself a glass. She slid the decanter in her coat pocket, just seconds before the bartender turned around.

She nudged her glass across the counter, offering it to Ford. “Try it.”

Ford looked dubiously into the glass, noting the shimmering lights blinking and shifting within the purple liquid. It looked like there were stars inside his glass, twinkling and moving within a cloud of rich liqueur, blinking in and out of existence.

It didn’t look like something a human could healthily imbibe, it looked like a galaxy in a cup, and Ford felt anxious, imagining the bartender’s eyes on his back, knowing this drink was stolen.

“What is it?” Stanford had to ask.

“Diluted Cosmic Shand.” Shailesh revealed with a toothy grin, her pointed teeth shining behind her zippered lips. “This stuff’s the good schit. It’s the stuff that Gods drink undiluted. They only need to put one grain in a dishtillery to make thousands of bottles like this that normal people can drink, but even sho –“

She leaned closer to Ford, almost bumping foreheads with him so she could look at the colours shift inside the glass. She inhaled the scent of the beverage deeply, her eyelashes fluttering as her eyes rolled just from one sniff.

“This stuff’s transcendent.”

Ford continued to glance warily between the shimmering liquid and Shailesh, uncertain whether he should attempt to drink this peculiar liquid. He didn’t think turning to alcohol was wise, considering he was still a stranger in a completely foreign environment, mourning the loss of his home and the sizable betrayal Bill had left him with. It wouldn’t be wise to leave himself vulnerable, and drinking a strange liquid guaranteed to leave him transcendent seemed like a bad idea.

“Do you want to transcend your problems?” Shailesh asked him. “Or do you want to talk them out, like a normal person?”

Talking out his problems seemed far less appetising than this mysterious beverage. If Ford could talk out his problems, he wouldn’t be in this situation, but since he was, he may as well make the most of it.
“I guess not.” Ford lifted the glass, and raised it in a toast, to which Shailesh responded, pretending to hold a glass of her own, clinking her fingernail against the edge of Stanford’s cup. “Here goes nothing.”

Ford raised the glass to his lips and took a sip.

The flavour was bizarre. It tasted like popping candy, like stars exploding on his taste buds. It didn’t feel like a liquid in his mouth, it felt like air seeping back down into his lungs. He swallowed, and felt the crackling electricity crawl down his throat, and every hair on his skin stretched long, standing on end. A shiver rolled down Ford’s spine, and he shook his head, blinking lights out of his vision, but the lights stayed, colouring the world with bright airy tones, his surroundings suddenly feeling fluffy and wonderful.

“Wow.” Ford blinked, baffled at the way one sip of this drink seemed to lift his worries off his shoulders and leave his brain frolicsome and free on cloud nine.

Shailesh took the glass out of Ford’s hand and finished the rest of the drink, her eyes lighting up with a similar shine as she suddenly seemed alert and elated all at once.

“Ohhh yeah.” She grinned.

The bartender seemed to notice the lights glinting within the glass they shared and approached them with a scowl, slamming his four arms down on the counter.

“Hey, where’d you get that?”

Ford looked at the bartender, his mouth falling open, his expression that of a guilty kid, caught out in his wrongdoing.

Shailesh however extended her arms out wide at the bartender, and hopped down from the counter, yanking Ford along with her.

“What are you gonna do about it? Kill me, bitch!”

She threw up her middle fingers and strode out of the bar. Ford hovered awkwardly behind, looking between the bartender’s angry yet resigned expression, and the door where Shailesh had departed, the diluted Cosmic Sand still making him giddy, before he shrugged at the bartender and blurted out “Bye” before jogging out the door as well.

This seemed like the start of a sequence of incredibly bad ideas, but because of the jubilance granted by Cosmic Sand, Ford was feeling good about it.

And he felt he deserved to feel good about things for once. After all he’d been through, he was owed it by the world.

And so, the weeks went by, Shailesh leading Ford from escapade to escapade, bar to bar. She was trying to dull the pain of being without her family, and Ford was trying to avoid his own hypocrisies, both of them elevated from their worries with the help of Cosmic Sand.
As the alcohol flowed more freely, Ford began to loosen up a little, joining in the conversation with Shailesh, being less frugal with what he discussed.

“Why did you come to Meccai?” He asked her over the loud clamour of the sports fans in this particular bar, their attention glued to a gladiatorial sport playing out on the screen while Shailesh and Ford sat at the back wall of the bar, their stolen liquor keeping them in good spirits.

“I was being followed.” Shailesh responded, raising her voice to be heard. “My ex-mistress shent people to shilence me in the last city I was in. I came here to keep her on edge. More people to shpillar the beans to here. She hasn’t found me yet.”

“Why is she looking for you?” Ford questioned, sipping his drink.

“Because I know what she’s really like. Reputation is everything and if word got out that she isn’t the perfect shaviour she pretends to be then not only will she lose her schit, she’ll lose all her followers too. No one will believe in her or her act and she’ll lose all her power. I’d like to shpee that one day.” Shailesh smiled, her eyes steely. “My righteous mistress brought low, known as the monshter she is.”

“Reputation really is everything then.” Ford mused, thinking back on his time in the Nightmare Realm.

Perhaps it hurt Bill’s reputation as this powerful, feared demonic being to let Ford escape, but he’d done so anyway, urging him to run when no one was watching. Ford had assumed he’d just made him run to prolong the chase, but it could be that Bill was merely saving face while saving Stanford at the same time. He’d mentioned the monsters around him were his investors? What was the God trying to prove?

“Reputation is the difference between people respecting you and walking all over you. You’ve sheen what the people here are like.” She gestured with her stolen bottle to the people around the bar, cheering on the combatants on the television giddily. “They’ll take you for everything you’ve got unless you shtand up to them.”

Ford watched her sip from the bottle she’d taken from the last bar they were in, his eyes following the decanter pointedly.

“Or take first.” Shailesh added with a cheeky shrug. “Hey, if it’s shomething you really want, you might as well. You’ve gotta ask yourself – what do I really want, more than anything?”

Ford thought on that for a while, before speaking up. “I know that what I really want is … no longer possible, and I shouldn’t want it anymore, but if I could have anything else? I’d want to be able to study all of these new things I’m finding. I’d want to take apart all the technology, put it back together, understand how it works, understand everything. Learn everything that’s out there in the universe and learn why it is what it is. I’d want to know why.”

Shailesh nodded and considered her own desires. “I’d want … I’d want my family back. But shince that’s no longer possible I guess I’d want to live large. Drink every day, eat good food, get my face fixed, and I’d want revenge. Not necessarily in that order, but I’ll take what I can get.”

Ford hummed in acknowledgement and took another sip of his drink, looking out across the bar.

“Sho, you’re a tech geek, huh? Taking shstuff apart and putting it back together.” Shailesh’s dark black eyes watched him curiously. “Are you any good at it?”

Ford sheepishly glanced around the bar. He grinned conspiratorially at Shailesh and pulled something out of his trench coat pocket. It was the hologram projector from the kitchen counter at the serviced apartments. Stanford had removed it from the unit. He’d been tinkering with it, trying to understand how it worked, and he’d managed to make it perform independently of the kitchen unit. He tapped the device in his palm and it projected a small display of cooking instructions up into the air above his hand.

“Shweet.” Shailesh raised her eyebrows, impressed.

“I’m hoping I can figure out how to record projections as well, instead of it just relaying the one sequence.” Ford explained. “It looks doable, but I’d probably need to work on it more, maybe source another part for it? A portable projector has it’s uses.”

“If you’re looking to shcrap more parts, there should be recording devices in the apartments further up. You could nab shome to tinker with when we get back. It’s like you’re a schrap vandal already.”

“A scrap vandal?” Ford questioned sceptically, unsure whether he liked the name.

Scraping technology was one thing, but adding the word vandal to the title just highlighted the unlawfulness inherent in the action. It felt like stealing when put that way and Ford didn’t like to think of himself as a thief.

Certainly, Ford had scrapped the parts for the portal from the alien spaceship, and he scrapped the technology from the projector, but acknowledging that he was really stealing these things had Ford feel just like Shailesh. It made him feel like he was condoning what Bill did by default.

A few years ago, perhaps he might have been impressed with the rebellious connotations of the name, but currently Ford had no desire to be labelled a vandal.

He was trying to distance himself from the sort of sanctioned unlawfulness he associated with Bill.
He knew just from the sound of it, that Bill would love it if he became a scrap vandal. He’d be delighted.

“They’re like engineers who schrap tech from shpaceships and schatellites. They’ve got a code and everything. They shell to the chop shops and the black market. Technically schrap vandals are illegal, but they always have the best hybrid tech. If you’re into that short of thing.” Shailesh explained.

Her explanation left Ford conflicted. That did sound really cool.

“Are there scrap vandals on Meccai?” Ford asked curiously, unable to help himself. Looking past his own inner turmoil surrounding his hypocrisy, he had to admit this scrap vandal lifestyle sounded appealing.

“Nope, they’re all out in denser shpace. They don’t shettle down. If you want to find a schrap vandal, you find them through the chop shops, but they don’t shtay in one place for long. They’re always on the move, hunting down new tech. That way the Feds can’t find them, or anyone elsche for that matter.” Shailesh picked the dirt out from under her nails as she spoke. “You can get shome real fancy communicators from schrap vandals. I wouldn’t mind having tech like that shomeday.”

The profession was sounding more and more ideal. Ford considered his hang ups for a while, wrestling with himself, pensive as the sports fans in the bar screamed while a goal was presumably scored. That or one of the competitors died, as it did seem a rather violent sport.

Shailesh gave a mocking whoop, parodying the sports fans, and nudging Ford with her elbow, trying to get a laugh out of him. Ford simply nodded absently, the cogs turning in his brain, until he spoke up again.

“How do you get off Meccai?”

“How? Are you leaving me?” Shailesh asked immediately, her expression stricken.

“No, no.” Ford put his hands up hurriedly, trying to reassure her that he wasn’t going to leave her.
He wasn’t sure why he was reassuring her, but it felt like a reflex at this point, and when he realised why it might be a reflex he felt a little ill.

He was certainly thinking about leaving Meccai. It was an interesting place, but a place with limited opportunities for Ford. Even now while he was slightly better off than before when he’d been living in the gutter, he had to rely on Shailesh’s stealing, breaking and entering, and bullying of the people around her to be so comfortable. It wasn’t sustainable.

Shailesh was somewhat morally dubious, Ford knew this for a fact, but he didn’t think her faults outweighed her benefits. She counted him as a friend for some reason and she hadn’t been harsh with him. Without her, Ford would likely still be living in the alleyway, so he was grateful to her.
She didn’t seem to mean him any harm and had been more than generous with her food and lodging, sharing it with Stanford.

He wasn’t entirely sure if he was alright with her stealing and lashing out at the world, just because she wasn’t stealing and lashing out at him, but right now his situation was better with her on his side. He wouldn’t abandon her now any more than he wanted to be abandoned to this strange planet.

When the panicked expression faded some from Shailesh’s face, Ford continued speaking, cognisant of the way the words felt like a slight lie, saying them anyway to secure his position.

“I wouldn’t abandon you, Shailesh. You’ve been a good friend to me.”

“That’s right. We’re friendsh. Friendsh don’t abandon friendsh.” Shailesh insisted, somewhat desperately.

“No, they don’t.” Stanford agreed with her placatingly, swallowing back his guilty conscience and proceeding despite it. “I just wanted to know is there any way of getting off Meccai? While I enjoy being here, with you, this place isn’t…”

Exhaling her panic deftly, she seemed to catch up with Stanford’s sentiment. “I know. I know what it’s like.”

“You seem to enjoy being here sometimes. It’s just that for me it’s not –“

“I don’t enjoy being here.” Shailesh confessed solemnly.

“Then why -?” Ford watched her, perplexed.

“I don’t enjoy being anywhere.” Shailesh pulled her scarf up closer around her face, her shoulders hunching. After a silent terse moment, she continued speaking, her voice quiet and bitter now. “It’s not like I can die. Being here is better than being alone. At least there’s people here, even if they all hate me.”

“They – they don’t hate you.” Ford attempted, feeling sorry for her.
“You don’t hate me.” Shailesh clarified and her eyes seemed to soften looking at him.

Ford sighed and said nothing, but Shailesh seemed to find comfort in the way Ford continued to sit beside her, not leaving just yet.

“There’s a platform on the other shide of the city.” Shailesh divulged, like a peace offering to Stanford after her panicked honesty. “Like the one you came in through, with the wormholes. You’ve got to pay to get through, but you can leave there.”

“Do you need a visa?” Ford pressed.

“Not if you pay enough.” Shailesh said. Patting the lock box in her pocket, she sat further back in her seat. “I’ve got just enough in here to get out without a hasshle, but why shpend it on a visa when I could shtay here and shteal more cash? Buy more drinks. Eat more food. The people shuck here, but the living is easy. That’s for shure.”

Ford nodded, his mind ticking over with possibility. He took another sip of his beverage and the Cosmic Sand had him hopeful instead of anxious at the thought that there was a way off this planet.

“Shtick with me a while longer.” Shailesh implored. “I can get enough QUID for us both to leave Meccai, if that’s what you really want. Just shtay with me until I get enough for us both to leave. I don’t want to be left behind.”

“I’ll stay.” Ford said, feeling generous. He reached over to pat Shailesh’s knee in a fond sort of way, his calm gesture belying the way his thoughts were racing at the prospect of leaving Meccai and, although he still felt he was lying deep down, he reassured her again. “I’ll stay.”

Nursing their Cosmic Sand induced hangovers the next day, Shailesh had given Ford several of her stolen QUID and urged him to go down to the local Seven Bleleven, just on the edge of the slums, to bring back some headache remedy.

Ford would have lingered in the shop, staring at all the various intergalactic wares he’d never seen before, if he didn’t have a more pressing issue to deal with.

“Coffee? Do you have it? Coffee?” Ford attempted to ask the globular alien who was jammed into a uniform with the Seven Bleleven logo on the pocket, sitting behind the counter. The alien was squinting at him with all twelve of its eyes, trying to understand what Stanford was saying.

“It’s a liquid. Uh – cappuccino, espresso, americano, latte? Space coffee?”

The alien behind the counter shook their head at him slowly. Ford could only imagine the clerk was confused, as he didn’t like his chances if coffee wasn’t available on Meccai.

Stanford looked down at his translator and whacked it against the counter a few times in frustration. He tried fiddling with the dial on the side, finding the communication barrier it caused more of a hindrance than the help he once thought it to be.
“Stupid thing won’t work properly. Caffeine.” Ford enunciated, miming drinking a cup of coffee to the dumbfounded clerk. “Coffee. To keep me awake. You drink it. To caffeinate oneself. To stay awake. I need to stay awake.”

The clerk squinted at him dubiously for a while longer, before ducking below the counter and bringing back a small white bottle with a label on it. The translator couldn’t read the label because the font was too stylised but he assumed it was some kind of caffeine supplement.

Eventually nodding with a sigh, Ford relented. “Alright, yes, this, and a headache reliever. Hangover cure. Hang on, she gave me the bottle.”

Retrieving the empty bottle Shailesh had given him from his pocket to use as reference, Ford managed to purchase her hangover tablets and the small bottle of caffeine to help him fend off sleep.

With his purchases successfully made, Stanford left the convenience store with his goods in a small plastic bag and hurried back to the apartment complex.

If he’d stayed to examine the store a little more closely, he would have noticed the posters plastered on the wall outside of the Seven Bleleven. If not for his hangover and caffeine withdrawals he would have noticed his face, artistically sketched and bracketed with the words:

_Six Fingered Human – Wanted!

Handsome reward for his expedient return to Bill Cipher._

Ford scrubbed his hair at the roots in frustration, pulling on it to feel the painful sting that would keep him awake.

This would have been his third micro-sleep in two days and he was finding the results ironically very tiresome.

Each time he’d let his eyes rest even slightly, he’d be back in his mental library in a flash. He couldn’t even fight the pull nominally, he was attempting to not even blink, as the moment his eyelids touched he found himself nodding off.

Every time he woke up in the mindscape.

And every time he did – there was Bill.

“Want to tell me where you are now?”

“No.” Ford said flatly, crossing his arms and turning away from Bill, obstinately facing the bookshelves instead.

One of the whorls in the mahogany wood shelving rounded out, then blinked at Ford, Bill’s eye meeting his through the wood veneer.

“Oh, come on. You’re not still mad about last time, are you?”
Ford stepped back and scoffed as Bill’s triangular body began to surface, pushing through the wood of the shelf. Bill’s long noodley arms extended and he lifted himself out of the wood like a swimmer getting out of a pool, shaking wood varnish off his shoe.

“It’s not like you to avoid facing the facts. You love facts.”

Stubbornly Ford turned his back on Bill again, leaving the triangle to float behind him. “Go away, Bill.”

“So grumpy. What, not going to shoot me again?” Bill quipped, taking in the way Ford’s shoulders flinched at that.

Gritting his teeth, Ford feigned composure, pretending he was much more dangerous than he currently was. “Don’t tempt me.”

“You’re mad. I get that.” Bill argued conversationally, floating around Ford until he was in front of the scientist again. He was laying on his side in the air, one hand on his right side like he had his hand on his hip while reclining, waving his other hand around conversationally. “Shots were fired. I’m sure we both said some things that you regret.”

Ford had to work hard to smother the laugh that comment engendered into something more suitably bitter. He scoffed at Bill instead, shaking his head derisively. He had to work hard not to find Bill’s jokes funny now and judging from the way Bill raised his eyebrow at him, the God knew it.

“Instead of drinking away your sorrows, maybe we could do what healthy functional people do.” Bill prompted. “You know – talk?”

Ford gave Bill an incredulous look, and the triangle met Ford’s gaze for several seconds, trying to maintain his wide-eyed optimistic demeanour.

Ford’s eyebrows became a flat line of scepticism ruled across his forehead.

“Too off-brand?” Bill questioned, self-aware.

“And you called me a hypocrite.” Ford muttered, hiding his amusement.

Bill snorted a laugh, and reclined on his back, pillowing his arms behind his hat, clearly very comfortable in Stanford’s head. “Well, I guess you’re the expert.”

“It’s not too late to shoot you.” Ford warned him.

“By all means.” Bill spread his arms out invitingly and Ford woke up.

The dreams were jarring, not because they were unpleasant, but because every time Ford dipped into unconsciousness, he was reminded of exactly how much he enjoyed Bill’s company, even when he shouldn’t. He was supposed to be mad at the God but the emotion had trouble sticking. It took a lot of energy to maintain anger, to maintain a grudge, and Ford was expending most of his energy trying to keep up with his many mental justifications as to why he shouldn’t relax. He was on edge most days when awake, trying to guard against sympathy for the devil in his head, that by the time he closed his eyes, that vindictive resistance was in short supply.

The micro-sleeps were inconvenient and Ford had been taking the caffeine supplements the clerk had given him, but they didn’t seem to make a difference.
Shailesh had noticed the way he would nod off, sitting at the back of yet another dingy bar, the various beverages she supplied him with dulling his cyclical guilt tripping into something more manageable. When Ford’s head would lull forward onto the table and his eyelids would flutter shut, Shailesh just assumed the human was a drowsy drunk. She seemed to find the ways he would wake up to be funny.

“How about we play a game? 20 questions?”

“No.”

Bill floated upside down in front of him, summoning various board games from the ether to hover beside him.

“Trivial Pursuit.” Bill suggested.

“What are you pursuing?” Ford couldn’t help but ask.

“You know.” Bill cooed, reaching forward to flick Ford’s nose fondly.

“Not a chance.” Ford said, denying Bill simply for the sake of it. He rubbed his nose and turned his chin up, pretending to ignore the God, but he couldn’t help but watch the triangle float out of the corner of his eye, captivated despite himself.

“I spy.” Bill prompted. “I’ll start. I spy with my all-seeing eye, something beginning with B.”

Ford honestly attempted to ignore his ex-muse. He gave it his best shot but there was something intrinsic within him that couldn’t leave Bill be.

After a moment of strained silence, Stanford muttered. “It’d better not be ‘book’.”

“DING DING DING!” Bill’s eye flashed like a game show buzzer. “Looks like we’ve got a real genius over here. How did you guess?”

“Stop with the false flattery.” Ford crossed his arms, trying hard not to be mollified, knowing Bill had used this technique on him before. “It’s insulting.”

“No, it’s your turn.” Bill waved his hands at Ford, ushering him to speak. “You go – I spy with my two human eyes …”

“I can’t play this game with you.” Ford insisted, clinging to every bit of resistance he had.

“Sure you can! Just think about the things in your immediate vicinity - say landmarks, or geographical coordinates, or maybe a complete interstellar address.” Bill batted his eyelashes at Ford, floating closer to him. “And just throw me a letter.”

Ford narrowed his eyes at Bill’s transparent attempt to divine his location.

“I’ve got a letter for you. F -“

And Ford woke up.

He had jolted his drink all the way across the table when he jerked back into consciousness and splashed it on a grizzly looking four-armed patron on the table just beside them, much to Shailesh’s delight.

When the alien turned around in his chair to bare his sabred teeth at Ford in a snarl, he could feel Shailesh shaking with laughter by his side.

“Um.” Ford blinked blearily at the intimidating alien, watching as he stood up from his chair to loom over Stanford.

At a loss for what to do, Stanford reached into his trench coat pocket and withdrew a handkerchief, holding it up for the alien.

“Sorry, there’s something on your face.”

Shailesh whooped with laughter as they raced out of the bar together, finding Stanford’s many faux pas the most entertaining thing she’d seen in a while. Her favourite channel tube, she said. She teased him giddily about the spill right up until Stanford’s most recent micro-sleep.

This time he was sitting on the couch in the apartment, having spent all night tinkering with the hologram projector he was working on.

He’d managed to appropriate one of the security cameras from the upper floor of the building and so far, he’d taken it apart, fashioned it into something workable, and made a small two second recording of himself standing up. The nature of the hologram projector made it simple to loop the recording into a continuous projection until he could stand on one side of the room and see his hologram standing on the other consistently.

Shailesh had already retired for the evening, her mouth zipped shut, and Stanford did his best to ignore her muffled sobs echoing out from the other room as she slept.

He put his projector and tools down on the coffee table and took a moment to rub his eyes, relieving his building headache and eye strain.

He had only closed his eyes for a second, but that was all it took.

“I spy with my all-seeing eye, something else beginning with B.”

Ford didn’t even have to open his eyes, releasing his frustration with a long-suffering sigh. “Bill.”

“BINGO! Another win, Sixer, how do you do it? Natural talent, no doubt.” Even with his eyes shut, Ford could sense Bill was close to him, hovering in front of his face. Ford could see yellow light shining from behind his eyelids, his muses’ glow bright and effervescent.

Reluctantly, Ford opened his eyes, and sure enough, there was Bill, hovering upside down in front of him, his large eye fixated on Ford’s face. The triangle was floating about a foot away from Stanford, close enough that he could reach out and touch him.

“Do you want a turn now? No? Still so sour.” Bill reached forward, his long thin limbs stretching towards Ford’s glasses. He began to pull Ford’s glasses off his face, sliding them down his nose. “Seriously, you’d think that-“ “Stop!” Ford’s hand grabbed Bill’s wrist, and he squeezed, halting his movement.

This was the first time Ford had touched Bill in his mind since falling through the portal, since their tumultuous break up. It was just a simple gesture, it wasn’t even anything tender, but it still froze both of them in the moment, stripping back the playful banter that had been cushioning their interactions so far and revealing the raw want they were both harbouring but refused to act on.

The contact had hewn back the delusions and facades that kept them distant until their connection stretched like a single thread in the air, taut, fragile and vulnerable.

Bill’s eye was glued to Ford’s face and, surprisingly, Bill’s arm felt cold, like his muse had literally frozen, waiting on what Ford might do or say.

“I can’t – you need to stop. This –” Ford struggled to find the words, this tension evoking more honesty in him than perhaps their relationship warranted. “It’s easier to stay mad at you when I’m not around you.”

“That tells me we should be having much more quality time together.” Bill said quietly, his eye still unblinkingly fixed on Ford.

“No. I can’t. You – you lied and you did so many things.” Ford stressed, fumbling to express his many reasons that seemed so articulate in his head before. Now, he could barely string a sentence together to accuse the being in front of him who seemed so enraptured by his attention.

“So did you.” Bill retorted swiftly, almost cautiously.

“That’s not the same.” Ford insisted.

“Isn’t it?”

Ford looked stricken for a moment before he let go of Bill’s wrist. He backed up several paces now, looking not so much scared of Bill as he was scared of himself.

Bill stayed floating in the same spot, spinning slowly until he was no longer dangling upside down, and watched Ford, his expression inscrutable.

Eventually, tentatively, Bill’s hand stretched out. He stayed floating a safe distance away from Stanford, respecting his need for space, but gently his hand quested forward, pausing periodically as the triangle read Stanford’s face, until his small black hand hovered a centimetre away from Ford’s cheek. He didn’t touch him yet, Bill was holding himself back, but he asked Stanford.

“Is this so bad?”

Ford took a deep breath, mustering his resolve. He was keenly aware of Bill’s hand so close to his face, almost touching him. It felt like Bill was touching him already, Stanford was so aware of his closeness.

He had made a mistake grabbing onto Bill’s wrist before. He could deny their connection when they weren’t touching. He couldn’t lie to himself when their skin made contact.

“It’s bad because I want this.” Stanford confessed shamefully, wavering.

Bill’s hand twitched forward, until Ford could feel his small thin digits, warm now, no longer frozen, rest against his skin like Bill was cupping his face like he used to.

Ford sighed, the contact exposing his honest feelings, and he brought his own six-fingered hand up, dwarfing Bill’s small palm with his own. He held Bill’s hand against his face for a moment, before continuing. “And I shouldn’t want this. Or anything to do with you.”

Bill was quiet for a while, before he floated closer to Ford, his long arm shrinking down as he approached.

“You sound like a romance novel.” Bill murmured, observing Ford relentlessly.
Ford huffed a bitter laugh. “It’s only romantic if you actually cared.”

“Who’s to say I don’t?” Bill sounded offended and Ford looked up to see he was about a foot away from him now.

“You do and I can’t trust you.” Ford insisted. “I can’t trust you to be honest with me.”

“You’ll come to realise, Sixer, that honesty isn’t a given, it’s a gift.” Bill said, floating closer until he was only an inch away and Ford should have taken offence at that statement, if not for the words that followed.

“And just so you’re aware, you have always been –“

Ford leaned in and his nose lightly brushed against the warm surface of Bill’s bricks.

“Incredibly gifted.”

Ford closed his eyes.

And woke up.

Roughly raking his hands through his hair, Ford cursed his predicament, irritable and flustered now.

It shouldn’t have happened, getting that close to Bill shouldn’t have occurred. It shouldn’t be possible. Ford didn’t want it to be possible.

He should have abstained, he should have shot Bill again, anything to keep away from him. He had to believe the muse was lying. He had to maintain the cut and dry, black and white worldview that had been protecting him thus far, but it was to his great dissatisfaction that he was coming to realise that things on this side of the portal were far more morally grey.

The same social mores and etiquette from Earth didn’t apply and he found circumstances justifying a lot more wrongdoing than would have been acceptable back there. But Stanford was certain that proprietary loophole didn’t extend to validating an insatiable desire for the company of his murderous, world conquering ex. You couldn’t exactly find the do’s and don’t’s for that hypothetical etiquette query in the back issues of Cosmo.

Ford sat on the couch, mentally railing against himself for being so weak, pulling at his hair and squashing his cheeks as he worked his way through his embarrassment. It was only when he heard an amused huff of laughter that he looked up.

Shailesh sat across from him on the couch, watching him, smiling behind her scarf.

“Shomeone’s having fun.”

Ford scowled at her, his cheeks pinking further. “How long have you been sitting there?”

“A while. You make funny faces when you shleep. Did you know that?”

Ford groaned, and covered his face with his hands, pressing his fingers down on his tired eyelids.

“Shailesh, you can’t just –“

“I couldn’t shleep.” She shrugged. “Woke up and you’d shtopped tinkering. Did you know you make noisches in your shleep?”
Ford froze, moving his hands down from his eyes to look at her. “What kind of noises?”

Shailesh grinned, then let her head fall to the side, feigning loud snoring to tease Ford.

The snoring was a relief, honestly. Ford didn’t know how he’d explain away talking in his sleep, given the things he was talking about. He didn’t think he could bear the embarrassment of having his weaknesses compounded, made audible, and given an audience.

That was why he’d never commented on Shailesh’s night time lamentations – he didn’t want her to have to deal with that sort of mortification. Sleep unveiled one’s weaknesses and having your weaknesses made public was just so embarrassing.

Shailesh’s feigned snoring turned into laughter and she stretched her leg out to nudge Ford with her boot. “I’m joking. Sho sherious. Napping’s not a crime, you know.”

“I shouldn’t be, though.” Ford reached into his trench coat pocket and pulled out the bottle of caffeine supplements, turning the bottle over in his hands to try and read the label again. “I should be sleeping less. If anything, these tablets have been making me sleep more.”

Shailesh blinked at the bottle then held out her hand. “Let me shee?”

Ford handed the bottle over to her grumpily and waited for her verdict.

“How are shleeping tablets shupposed to help you shleep less?” She asked, turning the bottle on its side to read the label.

“They’re sleeping tablets?!” Ford gawked at the bottle.

“Yeah, this brand does a bunch of different shtuff, but all their logos look the shame. It’s a roulette really. You’re lucky this one’s just the shleeping tabs, for relaxation. They have one bottle that looks exactly the shame but it’s just extreme laxatives. Every pill. Laxation they call it, instead of relaxation. The mix ups happened before.”

Ford’s minor outrage was derailed for a moment there, granted the knowledge that it could have been much worse. He still needed how to figure out how to properly use the technology in the bathrooms here, though he was certain if the need was as urgent as the other bottle suggested, he would have figured it out quickly enough.

“I think my translator’s broken. It must be broken.” Ford looked down at the translator cuff on his wrist. “I specifically asked for caffeine, coffee. I don’t know how the server deduced I needed this instead.”

“Maybe you looked tired.” Shailesh shrugged. “Maybe you pisshed him off.”

“I don’t see how. I was more than polite to him. That wouldn’t be very good customer service.” Stanford griped, still fiddling with the dial on his translator cuff.

“Shometimes you and me piss people off just by existing.” Shailesh shrugged again, tugging the scarf over her mouth self-consciously. “People get offended just looking at us. Looking at the freaks.”

Ford looked up from his translator and sighed, resting his hands on his thighs.

“Shailesh, you’re not a freak.”
“What, is blindness a side effect of theshe?” She joked, pretending to squint at the fine print.

“I mean it.” Ford insisted, hoping she was joking about the blindness. “I’m being serious. There’s nothing wrong with you. You don’t need to act like it. You don’t need to cover your face with that scarf all the time. There is nothing wrong with you.”

Shailesh’s eyes showed conflict. Clearly, she wanted to believe Ford, but something had her almost reproaching his words.

“You’re unique, you’re special, and you are just as important and valid and normal as everybody else on this mess of a planet. You don’t deserve people putting you down for how you look. You don’t need to put yourself down for it either.”

Ford ranted, speaking to Shailesh’s situation but also echoing his own.

He was tired of deferring to the aliens on Meccai like he was less worthy of being here than they were. He was tired of being scorned by merchants, side eyed by pedestrians, and duped by Seven Bleleven clerks. It wasn’t even about his polydactalism, the people here just disliked him on principle.

The sleeping tablets were the last straw. Now, Ford wanted to empower Shailesh and if he empowered himself in the process, so be it.

“Being openly unashamed about what makes you unique is an act of bravery. Aren’t you brave?”

“I am.” Shailesh affirmed, sitting a little more upright now, roused by Stanford’s impassioned speech.

“Then be brave. Don’t let anyone make you feel weak. You are stronger than the word ‘freak’. You’re not a freak. You’re unique.”

Shailesh raised her eyebrows at Stanford, and nodded at him, obviously impressed.

“And so am I.” Ford nodded right back, picking his hologram projector up from the table and shoving it in his pocket.

“Damn right you are, KXer.” Shailesh bounced up from the couch, and grinned. She stepped around the coffee table and unwound her long grey scarf from her face, looping it around Stanford’s neck.

“Let’s go take on the world.”

The bar Shailesh took him to now was rougher than the other ones they’d been to. The sign above the door translated to ‘The Bagged Bounty’ on Ford’s dimensional translator and it seemed to draw a rougher crowd than the other bars they’d frequented.

As Shailesh mostly ended up stealing from the bartenders and patrons and getting into fights at the bars they’d been to before, Stanford was understandably quite wary.
Shailesh merely grinned at him, her eyes telling him that perhaps she was looking for trouble here. It made her feel alive.

“I thought you were feeling brave?” She teased as she dragged Ford through the sliding doors to the bar.

Inside the bar, a motley assortment of rogues sat at the tables and along the stools at the bar, creatures of all shapes and sizes. There were large hulking creatures that looked a lot like how Stanford imagined the orcs from Lord of the Rings would look after so many childhood re-reads, there were squat pig faced creatures with tentacles for arms, there were reptilian people with long necks and pointed tails, feline looking aliens with sharp green eyes and sharper claws, and in the corner Ford could have sworn he saw a woman composed of fire, chugging back her beverage, her fiery hair flaring out as she consumed what Ford could only presume was lighter fluid.

As much as bar hopping seemed like something more up Stanley’s alley than it was Stanford’s cup of tea, the reason he enjoyed joining Shailesh in these places was the people watching. That was one of the wonderful things about having a drink at a bar, you could just sit there and stare at the other people gathered in the establishment. They would go about their business, and you would have a spot from which you could daydream about their lives, or finesse details about their livelihoods from their attire, or just observe their interactions.

Bars on earth were a great representative of human nature in many different forms and bars in space were no different. You really got a feel for what the people here were like, sitting in a bar observing their mannerisms, and Ford found it gratifying to peruse the crowds safely, as to everyone else it simply looked like he was sharing a drink with his friend. He was reminded of his adventure into the enchanted part of the forest with Bill, enraptured by the various mythical creatures gathered for the gnome queen’s wake. He felt that same enthusiastic wonder simply being in the midst of it all, observing what he could.

Shailesh seemed happy to hang back as well, settling down with her drink in a corner, although this may have been because when she did engage with the people around her it was either to steal something or pick a fight. The peaceful middle ground for her was to sit back next to Stanford and privately mock the passers-by, educating Stanford in her own way about the ins and outs of interdimensional society. Sitting with Shailesh was a crash course on what not to do.

“Look at these chumps.” Shailesh gestured to the aliens gathered around the pool table. “What’s the bet they don’t know they’re being hustled?”

“Are they being hustled?” Stanford asked, craning his neck to look at the game. Space snooker seemed to have different rules, but the end game was the same. Laser rods were used to prod spheres into the nets around the edges of the table. It was an intricate play of precision and geometry, each movement calculated to yield ideal results, but most of the players seemed to think it had something to do with luck, placing bets on the game. In that sense it was very much like pool on Earth, although the lasers were a nice touch.

“They’re playing shink hole with a Thellashian.” Shailesh pointed at one of the players, a creature with a long neck like a giraffe, dangling fronds extending from its face, watching over the game with glowing blue eyes from its higher vantage point. “I’m shure that Betriexian thinks they’ve got the game in hand, shince they’re all hot schit mathematicians where he comes from, but most people don’t know that Thellashian girls are telekinetic. She’s cut off her dorshal fronds. You can see the schars, if you know where to look. It doesn’t matter how good you are at figuring out trajectories if the ball doesn’t follow basic physics. Shuckers.”

“I see.” Ford said, narrowing his eyes at the players, nodding like he had known this interdimensional nugget of wisdom all along. Shailesh snorted a laugh, and whacked Stanford’s shirt with her hand.

“Come on. I’ll get you a drink.”

Weaving through the crowd, Stanford and Shailesh pulled up by the bar. Shailesh slammed a QUID token on the counter and held up two fingers. “Two jet fuels, thanks. And a shtraw.”

The bartender, a Kzinti woman, twitched her whiskers at Shailesh, blinking slowly at the zip across her lips. “The straw is furrr you?”

“What do you think, fleabag?” Shailesh sneered aggressively.

The bartender scoffed. She bent down behind the counter and prepared the two drinks, delicately dropping a straw in one and sliding it over to Shailesh. “One jet fuel with straw and added flavourrr.”

Shailesh grabbed their drinks and turned back to Stanford, passing him his.

“I think she spat in mine.”

“Do you think?” Stanford asked dryly.

Shailesh slipped the straw between her zippered lips and took a sip. “Yep. I can taste it.”

Stanford’s nose wrinkled with distaste and Shailesh shook her head. “No, I think it made it better.”

Stanford looked down at his own drink, hardly keen on sampling it given Shailesh’s glowing testimonial.

“Doesn’t that bother you, that she spat in your drink?” Stanford had to ask, watching Shailesh continue to sip away, mildly repulsed.

“Shpit in my drink, in my face. What’s the difference? It’s gonna happen anyway. At least I got my digs in firsh.” Shailesh shrugged self-consciously.

Clearly, she was still struggling to believe Stanford’s pep talk, having gone out without her scarf today. Stanford was still wearing it around his neck.

“It doesn’t have to be like that, you know?” Stanford said softly, trying to pull her out of this morose mood. “You don’t have to strike first, lash out at everyone. Not everyone means to insult you.”

“Then why am I insulted shoften?” Shailesh huffed. “I don’t have to take their schit. Neither do you. Don’t you get tired of it? Do you know how many people have been shtaring at you funny shince you got here?”

“I’m trying not to think about it.” Stanford admitted reluctantly. He tried a sip of his own drink and it was suitably disgusting, but quickly inebriating. It had that new car taste.

“Come on, let’s find a place to sit.”

Stanford looked around the bar. For such a dingy establishment it was pretty packed. There was, however, a small untouched gathering of chairs in the middle of the room.

Drink in hand, Stanford made his way over. He went to sit down, but the moment his rear hit the Ford staggered to his feet and stared down at his drenched clothes, his trench coat, shirt and pants ruined, soaked through by the murky brown liquid. He spun around to see who had tipped his chair only to see the chair staring back up at him, a pair of scowling eyes set into the back of the chair.

“What are you, some kind of idiot? Don’t got eyes? What are you, just a moron? Hey, who let this moron in here?” The chair railed loudly, creating a scene. “This knuckledragger just tried to pop a squat on me and my friends here. Who let this gross looking scab in here? He don’t got two brain cells to rub together!”

“You just spilled my drink all over me.” Ford accused, scowling right back at the chair, his disposition feeling less and less forgiving as the chair continued slinging its jibes.

“You know what, you deserve it for sitting on me, asshole. Now, you’re gonna apologise, get on your knees and grovel, to make up for your base transgression.” The chair insisted smugly, milking Ford’s discomfort while the chairs around him snickered.

Ford was struggling. On one hand the almanacs that he read, and his own hesitancy to condone the sort of behaviour he associated with Bill and Shailesh meant that apologising, swallowing his pride and moving on would be the best way to avoid an altercation but that didn’t seem to matter nearly as much as the fact that this being had spilled Ford’s drink all over his clothing.

He left his own dimension with only the clothes on his back, and everything in his pockets, and to this point he had managed to keep his clothes clean. He had nominal assistance from Bill with that, but the point stood that the clothes on his back were all he had, and he was supposed to just take the fact that this chair had spilled a horrible smelling, foul tasting drink all over him and was now expecting him to drop to his knees to apologise for it.

These unusual expressions of etiquette seemed fascinating in the abstract when Ford was reading it in a book, like studying an exotic culture, but it was much different when he was living amongst it all. Tiptoeing around insulting the many aliens in this city was like walking on broken glass and, honestly, Ford wasn’t sure if half of these breaches of etiquette he was being accused of weren’t just spontaneously made up to make him feel inferior.

He thought back to his discussion with Bill, back in his study, when he asked what the alternative was to these elaborate rituals of ass kissing, and Bill had simply handed him the laser gun.

He didn’t have a laser gun now, but he hadn’t gone through those gruelling weeks of marksman practise to grovel on his knees in front of a trumped-up chair.

“Well, if you’re going to be putting me through my paces, flaming debris and all, I may as well offend at least one of these poor bastards.”

Bill had delighted at that, wrapping his arms around Ford’s neck, humming with approval.

“Oh, they’re gonna love you.”

Ford gritted his teeth and made his decision.

“Well, maybe I wouldn’t have sat on you if you didn’t look like a chair.”

The bar fell silent.
“What did you just say?” The chair asked, sinisterly narrowing its eyes at Ford.

Rather than repeat himself again, Ford simply turned his chin up at the chair-being. “You heard me.”

Ford felt a hand slap his back, and suddenly Shailesh was beside him, her voice much louder than Ford would like, drawing the attention of the entire bar towards them.

“Yeah, you heard him!” She exclaimed gleefully.

Her eagerness to pick a fight was unsurprising, but what was surprising was how willing Ford was to go along with it. His hands curled into fists at his side as he squared up to stare down this egotistical seat.

“I don’t even know what you’re supposed to be, but I wanna know what makes you think you’ve got the right to speak to me like that?” The chair intoned menacingly, inching closer to Stanford, the legs of the chair moving as it walked. It spat its insult in Stanford’s face, sneering all the while. “Freak.”

Ford thought it was a bit rich being called a freak by an articulated piece of furniture. He figured if there was ever a time to take a stand for simply sitting down, that time was now.

“For the record, I’m a human being, not a freak.” Ford reached forward and pushed the chair back so it tilted on its back legs, tipping over. “And I don’t take diction from a talking chair.”

“That’s it!” The chair wavered, its arms spinning around in circles trying to stay upright and as it swung back to land steady it lunged forward at Ford, throwing a punch with the opulently carved hand rest that served as its fist.

Its punch landed square on Stanford’s thigh and he bent over, clutching his leg. Damn, that would definitely bruise.

Without even thinking about it, Stanford responded with an instantaneous uppercut, knocking the chair back over and into several of its buddies, toppling the bunch of them. Shailesh whooped giddily, cheering him on as the chairs picked themselves up, throwing themselves back into the fight.

If someone had asked Stanford whether he ever thought he’d find himself in a fistfight with an assortment of talking chairs – well, no one would ask him that. It was such a purely ridiculous notion that it could never happen and no one would think to ask it, but as he knocked back chair after chair, bloodying his knuckles on their varnished limbs he felt disconnected from reality.

It baffled him that this was his life now.

Before the brawl could get too heated, the bar patrons all standing out of their (inanimate) seats to ogle the fistfight, a loud whistle rang out across the bar.

“That looks like my bounty.” Said one of the bar patrons from across the room, the woman comprised of flame. She pointed a flaming finger at Ford and Shailesh, her emerald green eyes narrowing at them both.

Ford felt his stomach flip and Shailesh’s hand grabbed his wrist quickly.

The other bar patrons all stood up now, fronting for the right to claim the bounty.
“Back down, Jolene, I saw ‘em first.” Postured one and another bounty hunter chimed in, growling out their claim.

“No way. That’s my bounty. I’m claiming it.”

“Holy schit, she really did it.” Shailesh said under her breath to Ford. “She’s put a price on me. A bounty on my head.”

Ford’s eyes were darting around the bar, and he wasn’t so sure the bounty was for Shailesh. It was only now he was coming to realise that the posters that plastered the walls of the bar depicted a familiar face. His own.

He could recognise the distinct alien language for a split second before his translator kicked in and the words “Six Fingered Human – Wanted! Handsome reward for his expedient return to Bill Cipher” stood out, superimposed onto the paper that displayed a rather dashing, defiant looking mugshot.

That alien language had been scattered about his journals. He once spent two days without sleep trying to decipher its code. He once spent a week finding it on taunting notes squirreled about the house for Fiddleford to find.

“There are other ways to find you. You’re just making this difficult.”

Apparently so. More difficult for Stanford than anyone else, as suddenly he found himself facing down a bar full of bounty hunters with only one ally.

As the clamour rose, each bounty hunter posturing to stake a claim, the argument now getting heated, Ford could feel Shailesh squeeze his wrist.

“Come on, let’s shneak away.”

The argument was set to turn into a brawl, one of the bounty hunters had pushed the other, and tensions rose as the aliens began to retaliate. Stanford swallowed back his muted panic, trying not to let it show on his face, and nodded as Shailesh led him gently through the back door.

It was only once they were out in the alley behind that Ford could hear loud shouts, indicating that the bounty hunters had noticed his absence.

Shailesh seemed beyond giddy and she continued pulling Stanford’s wrist until they both broke into a run through the maze of back alleys.

“I can’t believe she actually did it. A real bounty.” Shailesh enthused breathlessly as she careened down the back streets, keenly aware of the hunters hot on their heels. “She must be furioush!”

“I don’t think –” Ford panted, uncertain whether he should clear up this misconception or not. He looked over his shoulder, worried he wouldn’t even have time to.

“That was Jolene of Flames back there. The Jolene!” Shailesh thrilled. “The besht of the besht. From the shongs of legend. She’s relentlessh. She only picks the best bounties. I must be worth sho much money right now.”

Inwardly, Ford was cursing Bill. This bizarre cat and mouse game of theirs was a lot more appealing, almost romantic, when there wasn’t ACTUAL PAID BOUNTY HUNTERS INVOLVED. And now, Ford found himself running for his life. Running is not romantic. Running for your life even less so. He was an idiot for thinking Bill could have changed and an absolute fool. for feeling weak for him last night.

There were aliens in hot pursuit and as Ford rounded the corner with Shailesh he found himself face to face with a dead end. Boxed in on all sides by towering skyscrapers, Ford was looking desperately for a ladder or a side door, or some way out of this predicament.

He could hear footfalls approaching behind him and he looked to Shailesh in askance.

She was already stripping off her coat. It jangled as she passed it to Ford, the QUID in her lock box weighing the fabric down.

“Hold this.”

Ford took her coat with an expression of barely masked panic. She noticed his distress, rounding her fists out, assuming a combat stance as she nodded at him.

“Don’t worry. I fight good. I can’t believe I get to throw down with Jolene.”

While Shailesh cackled, Ford looked around the alley way for something to arm himself with, but all he saw was a rusting bin lid. Putting Shailesh’s heavy black coat on over his stained clothes, he picked up the bin lid, intending to use it as a shield if nothing else.

He wasn’t as enthusiastic about the prospect as Shailesh was, but he was capable of going a few rounds if he had to. It had just been a while since he’d needed to. He wasn’t sure how well he’d fare against a woman who seemed to be perpetually on fire though.

The footsteps fell heavier now and their pursuers rounded the corner.

Instead of Jolene, the woman wreathed in flame, two rat faced bounty hunters with beady bionic eyes stood fast at the lip of the alleyway.

“Got ‘em,” snickered one of the rat-men, sauntering closer.

“I’m ready for a handsome reward, aren’t you?” asked its fellow, grinning toothily as it advanced.

“What did that poster say? Wanted? Doesn’t seem very specific. Do you think that means dead or alive?”

“Dead’s the default, ain’t it?” The bounty hunter said, continuing their approach.

Ford swallowed, hoping he’d outlive this encounter. He was still cursing Bill inwardly, thinking up every colourful swear word that could possibly exist, although right now his mental monologue was just a litany of ‘shit shit shit’.

“Try me, you rat bastardsh!” Shailesh shouted out, keen as ever. Ford’s despair heightened, as if things could get any worse.

The rats looked between each other for a moment, as though they were confused why she’d be stepping in, yet as they shrugged, deciding to proceed anyway, they were knocked back by a slash of flame through the air.

Ford could smell burning fur and flesh, as the two rat-mercenaries screamed and fell away.

“That’s my bounty.” Jolene, the flame woman stated, stepping over their charred carcasses.

“Jolene of legend.” Shailesh called out, drawing her attention. “The schtories are true.”
“What of them?” Jolene tilted her head at Shailesh, blinking her emerald eyes.

“That you’re hot schit.” Shailesh divulged inelegantly with a shrug. “Tell me, how much is she paying you to take me down?”

Shailesh’s dark eyes shone smugly, beaming as she asked the bounty hunter her question, eager to discover how much of a hindrance she was becoming to her old mistress.

Jolene blinked again, considering Shailesh, before she reached into her utility belt and unfolded one of the posters she’d torn from the wall. It was slightly singed around the edges.

“There’s no need to flirt. I’m not here for you.” Jolene told Shailesh, who was staring, dumbstruck at the poster.

The debonair looking sketch of Stanford stared back from the page, causing Shailesh to look between the poster and the man standing beside her, like she couldn’t believe the correlation.

“I’m here for that human.” Jolene pointed at Ford, who was inwardly freaking out, the panic evident on his face. “The one with splinters in his six bloody knuckles.”

“What?” Shailesh strode up to Jolene and grabbed the poster, sounding almost disappointed. She looked over the page, examining the wanted poster with traces of scepticism embittering her tone.

“What the hell. You mean she didn’t shend you after me – I thought she - she –”

Shailesh’s eyes trailed down the page and seemed to bulge as she read who was providing the reward for Ford’s capture. “He wants you?! No fucking way. You – all along you’ve been? KXer, why the schit would Bill Cipher want you?”

“Oh dear.” Ford muttered under his breath, wondering whether there was a diplomatic way out of this situation, or if he was truly and royally screwed right now. The almanacs didn’t cover this.

There was a possibility that Shailesh had heard of Bill before, had been warned about Bill, would help Ford escape him, but despite their tenuous connection over the past few weeks, Ford wasn’t pinning his hopes on that happening.

“Bill Cipher??” Shailesh exclaimed, before she began to laugh hysterically, like she couldn’t believe her luck.

Ford assumed it was because she’d heard of his no doubt insidious reputation and was lamenting the danger he’d put her in through association all this time. That she’d been harbouring a fugitive fleeing from the most dangerous triangle in the multi-verse (or so Ford presumed, given what he’d been told so far). That was the best-case scenario.

“Listen, I can explain. I’m sorry I put you in danger, I just –” Ford said, making to walk over to Shailesh to explain.

“What are you apologising for? This is GREAT!” Shailesh shouted, clutching the wanted poster to her chest. “This is the bescht fucking thing. I’m sho – all this time? You’ve been the six-fingered human that he wants all this time?”

He certainly hadn’t been anything else.

He would have opened his mouth to say as much, if not for the inspired gleam in Shailesh’s eye, boding ill for his chances. He didn’t like that look. Ford paused where he stood, hesitant now. She sounded a little too pleased about this discovery, and it gave Stanford cause to worry.
“Well, come on.” Shailesh waved at Ford, ushering him over. “You can come with me. Let’s get out of here.”

Ford looked warily between Shailesh and the bounty hunter, Jolene. “Really?”

“Yes, really. Come on. We can go to him together. It’ll be easy.” Shailesh insisted, waving at Ford impatiently. “I know where he is.”

“Go to him?” Stanford stepped back, looking at Shailesh like she was an entirely different person now. “Shailesh. No – you –”

“You come with me, and I’ll give you to him, and then he’ll fix what he did to my face. I won’t be a freak anymore. Come on KXer, you’re always saying I’m not a freak. Now, I won’t have to be. Don’t you want that for me?” Shailesh implored, walking towards Ford now, despite how he was stepping back, clearly uninterested. “He can fix me!”

Her approach was halted as Jolene placed her burning hand on Shailesh’s shoulder.

“Hold up. You don’t get to step in and just walk away with my bounty.” Jolene interjected, turning Shailesh away from Ford. “The reward is mine. I saw him first.”

“Hell no, I saw him way before you. I found him first. I’ve been with him for weeks!” Shailesh pushed Jolene back, blue fire flaring out around her palms as Jolene’s flames began to burn her, the blue fire healing and burning right back.

The blue fire healing was something Stanford had seen before. It made so much sense now. It didn’t belong to Shailesh. It wasn’t unique to her. It never was. It belonged to Bill. It had belonged to Bill all along and so had Shailesh. She’d been in his pocket the whole time. He was the one who granted her his powers, and according to Shailesh just now, he was also the one to alter her face. He gave her the zipper she was so ashamed of, and now Shailesh was willing to turn on Ford after all this talk of friendship so she could get rid of the zipper and become normal again.

Ford was furiously disappointed, betrayal seeping deep into his bones. It wasn’t fair, though in his current state of bitterness, it was just what he should have expected. The first person Ford had met here, the first person he had befriended, was on Bill’s side all along. He just didn’t know it.

He knew now.

“I said, back off.” Jolene snarled, grappling with Shailesh now, her fire arcing out, burning all around her, but somehow not burning Shailesh. As the fire danced out from Jolene’s palms, it was met with the fire that was radiating off Shailesh, covering both women in flames as they wrestled.

“He’s mine! I spent weeks with him. I should be the one who gets to turn him in!” Shailesh screeched, pulling at Jolene’s flaming hair, jamming her knee up into the woman’s stomach. “I put in all the work!”

“Oof. I’m the bounty hunter, you lisping, zip-lipped bitch!”

Jolene threw a punch under Shailesh’s jaw and their brawl just intensified, both women shouting and grunting, becoming more and more violent as it became apparent their hits weren’t landing.

Soon, they were nearly impossible to see beneath the raging fire that surrounded them both, red and blue flame competing for supremacy as each woman tried to wring the life out of the other one, battling for the right to claim the bounty on Ford’s head.
Shailesh managed to knock Jolene back briefly into the rubbish bins by the wall, and as the fiery woman picked herself up, the Taronjan mercenary turned to face the human who had been standing awkwardly in the corner while the battle raged on.

“KXer! Let’s go! Now!”

Ford simply stood there, looking blankly forward, not moving an inch.

“KXer?” Shailesh questioned, wondering why he was so unresponsive, staring blankly forward. She waved her hand in front of his face, trying to catch his gaze. “KXer?”

For a moment Stanford seemed to flicker, before resuming his far away eye contact.

Shailesh looked down by his feet and saw the small hologram projector sitting in the gutter, broadcasting the two second loop of the scientist on repeat, a fitting enough decoy to distract from the fact that during the brawl Stanford had managed to slink away.

Shailesh swore and violently kicked the hologram projector. She looked around for her coat in the alleyway before realising that Stanford took it with him, along with her lockbox full of QUID and all the things she’d stolen and kept in her pockets.

Jolene stood behind Shailesh, watching her throw her tantrum.

“Any idea where he went?”

Shailesh glared at her opponent, before she very deliberately reached up and zipped her lips shut.

Friends don’t rat on friends, after all.

Stanford was trying not to look out of breath, having sprinted all the way from that unfortunate back alley to the exit platforms west of the city. He had Shailesh’s scarf pulled up to cover his face as he purchased his exit visa with her stolen QUID, trying to look inconspicuous, or at least as inconspicuous as anyone could look wearing a heavy black coat with a scarf covering his face. Currently his paranoia was kicked up to an eleven, knowing that literally anyone could be after him.

He could trust no one here.

He didn’t want to be recognised, but he was finding that more difficult than it should have been thanks to Bill’s artistically accurate WANTED POSTER.

He was seething with frustration over the fact that Bill had put a legitimate bounty on him. He’d put up wanted posters like this was some wild-west hunt for the lone ranger! While Stanford could appreciate the fiction of it all, the story it painted, he was coming to realise that finding yourself smack bang in the middle of a story like that was not only dangerous, but degrading too. It wasn’t as glamourous as the books would have you believe.

He had run the fastest he’d ever run trying to get away from the two enflamed women fighting over him, one of them a professional bounty hunter of legend, and the other one someone Stanford had almost considered a friend. He had grazed his palms slipping on the pavement and his clothes were sticky with spilled jet fuel and sweat. He stank, and he felt disgusting, but he knew he couldn’t stay here.

He had to get as far away from this planet and all the people within who would hunt him down to deliver him to Bill. He had to leave.

The problem was finding a place to go.

Standing by the exit platforms, having passed through with his newly minted visa, Ford frowned up at the glowing billboards above each departing wormhole, his translator describing the landmarks and locations within each wormhole. Without a point of reference, however, those locations meant nothing to Stanford and he had no way of knowing whether the next place he landed would be one he’d find habitable, or if he would end up in another place just like Meccai, sleeping on the streets while dodging the bounty on his head.

He had just run halfway across the city and parted with the majority of the QUID in the lockbox to get through the platform gates and now that he was here, he felt like crying.

Exhaustion and exasperation were competing with each other and Stanford felt utterly despondent that he had to leave now without knowing where in the multi-verse he could possibly go. Where would be safe? Where would Stanford find work, or something fulfilling?

Where would he be able to claw back his dignity, or would he be left an eternal interdimensional vagabond, drifting from place to place? He didn’t want that.

Slumping his shoulders with a sigh, Stanford dawdled between the various gates on the platform, not sure where he should go, not sure where he could go, or how long he had until someone else found him and attempted to capture him for the bounty Bill had placed on him.

A handsome reward could mean anything and as much as the vagueness of the reward rankled Ford, he knew that when it came to anything Bill could most likely deliver anything. If Bill’s reputation was as widespread as Ford assumed, the people eyeing off Ford’s bounty likely knew that too. How was he supposed to compete with that, to reason with someone who had the prospect of their wildest dreams coming true?

Reasoning with the people trying to capture him was a useless prospect. Ford couldn’t fall back on reason anymore. If he wanted to evade capture, he would have to succumb to playing dirty. He would have to embrace the sort of behaviour Bill had taught him, to fight dirty, to do what it takes to be the smartest man in every room.

He’d been avoiding any and all associations with what Bill had taught him while he was on Meccai because he didn’t want to believe Bill was capable of being truthful with him. He didn’t want to accept any of Bill’s gifts, but now that his survival hinged on him making use of every tool in the toolbox, he found he had no choice.

He was trying to think of it in a very detached way, that he was simply making use of what he could to survive. He didn’t like to acknowledge the thought in the back of his mind that believed Bill was trying to help him, even now. Setting a bounty on his head wasn’t helping him. Proving that he could occasionally be honest with him wasn’t a gift.

Ford wondered if Bill’s gifts were always so backhanded, or if they were just revealed to be now.

He thought back to the first gift Bill had bequeathed to him, the first gift he’d given him that had nothing to do with blueprints, or the portal, or getting Ford on side with Bill’s master plan.

He thought back to that night under the stars, camping out at Gravity Falls peak while Fiddleford slept in the tent behind him. Just him and Bill, reclining cuddled together by the fire, pointing out constellations in the sky.

“So, going to your hometown, eh? I thought there was nothing left for you there.” Bill had asked him, sitting up, dipping his fingers into the fire playfully.

“A point to prove maybe. That’s it.” Ford sighed, leaning back. “It’s not like I have anywhere else to go.”

Bill had looked at him, considering him for a long time, his eyes inscrutable, before he seemed to make his mind up. “I never did give you that souvenir, did I?”

Ford looked down and pulled aside Shailesh’s coat, searching in the pockets of his own trench coat, pulling out slightly sticky papers and memorabilia of his time with the god before he found what he was looking for.

The business card.

Bill’s very first gift to Ford. The first gift he had given without any strings attached. Maybe the only gift he had given without conditions, if Ford didn’t think too hard on it.

Ford tapped the surface of the business card, bringing the holographic map up in front of him, surveying the destination and carefully comparing it to the destinations on the floating billboards above him. Pinpointing the correct wormhole that would take him in the vicinity of the Chop Shop in the middle of the Antiquita Galaxy, Ford tapped the business card again to turn the hologram off.

Holding out his visa to the attendant at the desk, Ford shelled out a few QUID extra, securing himself a spot on a shuttle to the Antiquita Galaxy. To the chop shop full of alien tech and potentially to his new life as a scrap vandal.

He slid the business card back into his shirt front pocket, the card sitting above the triangle tattoo on his pectoral and he felt comforted by the certainty that Bill’s gift provided him. He didn’t feel so adrift now that he had a purpose and a place to move forward to. He smoothed his hand over the business card, lingering as he felt the tattoo tingle on his skin and walked ahead to the departures gate, hopeful once more.

“You say you have nowhere else to go, but you haven’t even scratched the surface yet.”

Well, the universe awaits.

Chapter End Notes

Jolene, Jolene, Jolene JOLEEEEENE I'm begging of you please don't take my man ~
I had to write her in, ever since I saw the Flammabel in the Don't Dimension It comic in the graphic novel, I knew the baddest bounty hunter had to come from her dimension, with flaming locks and eyes of emerald green. Stanford's in hot water now.
I hope you all enjoyed this chapter. I'm already working on the next one, and it's going to be quite fun leading up to a big showdown in the chapter after that. I've had it planned for quite some time, this showdown. I hope the people who've stuck it out this long are enjoying it so far. Promise it will only get better and more interesting as it goes along.

This chapter is dedicated to my beloved partner, who I've been visiting this month. She has been listening to my many plot twists and dialogue soundbites and story ideas with the patience of a saint and it's been keeping me inspired and motivated, as does the kind words of all of you lovely folk, so thank you. <3

Next chapter - stubbornness, Ford begrudgingly makes new friends, idioms galore, space pirates, and feeling up a triangle for science... among other things. Stay tuned and thank you for reading and leaving kind comments!

p.s. Zippy's lisp was put in as it stays true to her character but if anyone is reading this with a translator ect and needs a non lisp version I can provide a non lisp version as I still have it in a word doc. Message me on tumblr if you need the non-lisp version!
Oh, I'm so restless, I don't care what I say, and I lose my temper ten times a day. Still it's even worse when the night's on its way.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

“Here’s your first assignment, magic hands.” The Angolean project coordinator sat cheerily at the desk, handing out assignments to the graduated students lining up for their assignations.

Stanford gave a polite grimace at the nickname and held out his tech-tablet for the coordinator, bending down slightly to maintain a similar height with the lizard man. With a jaunty tap, the scaled project coordinator pressed a small device to the top of the tablet until the device beeped and the top of the tablet lit up green.

“You know, I gotta say, magic hands, all of us are real impressed with your progress since you got here.” The project coordinator continued, happy to take the time to chat with Stanford despite the other people in the queue waiting behind him. “We all thought you wouldn’t know your foot from your elbow, but you take to tech like Arnold takes to the heat pad in the rec room.”

“Are we gripin’ on Arnold again?” Another Angolean asked from behind the project coordinator, slithering over to chime into the conversation.

“Hey, hey! All of you use that heat pad just as much as I do, alright.” Arnold hissed back at the project coordinator and his co-worker, joining in the banter. “It’s not like it’s got my name on it.”

“Hey, that’s a good idea. Let’s put Arnold’s name on it. Arnold’s heat pad, since he lives there,” joked the project coordinator to his peer.

“I don’t live there. Ah, shut up.” Arnold waved off the conversation with a scaled hand.

Stanford was used to the Angolean sense of humour by now. He’d been living and studying with them for the past year. The reptilian engineers were as jovial as they were talented, and despite the difficulty he faced fitting in on Meccai, the scrap vandals didn’t discriminate. If you were good with tech, and could do the job, they welcomed you in with open arms.

It was part of the scrap vandal code. It didn’t matter where you came from, or who you were before, once you were a scrap vandal you were part of the crew and the crew protects their own. Stanford had remembered the relief he felt when these new aliens didn’t turn him away or turn their noses up at him after his long journey via cramped industrial shuttle from Meccai.

He didn’t know what he would have done if, upon arriving at the Chop Shop the mechanics there turned him away, but instead they embraced him, telling him ‘We’re all scrap here’.

An unusual motto for sure, but Stanford was grateful for the meaning behind it. It meant that he wouldn’t be thrown out, that he was valued for what he was and for what he could do.

And what he could do was engineer advanced technology and conceptualise machinery far beyond the scope of what most humans could achieve. After a little tutoring, that was.
They started calling him magic hands because of his polydactylism. At first Stanford had attempted to pass himself off as a different type of alien, paranoid that if he divulged he was a six-fingered human that someone would recognise him from the description on his wanted poster, but apparently there was existing technology that could recognise the genus and species of different aliens. It was integrated into the latest, most up to date dimensional translators, to allow for a smoother translation process.

Stanford had traded in his older ‘antique’ model for an upgraded translator cuff, the scrappers delighting at the old technology just as much as they did the new. They treated the old translator Stanford brought them as a gift, placing it in an odd sort of museum they cultivated next to an antique floppy disk and something called an ‘eight tracks’. He was grateful to be rid of the thing, for all the trouble it caused him. It certainly tipped the scales when they decided to take him in. He was thankful for that.

Even knowing he was a six-fingered human, the scrappers in the Chop Shop didn’t piece together that Ford was the fabled six-fingered human from the wanted poster. Maybe something about the dynamic, confident, and debonair way his picture had been sketched on the poster didn’t align with the insular, exhausted way he held himself now.

He hadn’t been sleeping much, thanks to finding the appropriate caffeine supplements he required, and that tended to diminish the heroism in his stance. The bags under his eyes helped too, contrasting with the way they had been drawn in the poster, maintaining that defiant sparkle. Ford supposed he had one of Bill’s fiends to thank for their flair for the dramatic. They’d certainly captured Ford at his best, instead of how he was looking now. Run down and worn out.

It suited Ford for the Angoleans to make up their own minds about who he was, and who he was to them was just another vagabond turned prospective engineer, waiting to be welcomed into the ranks of the scrap vandals.

Magic hands wasn’t the best nickname, but Stanford hadn’t had much luck with nicknames in general. Nicknames almost seemed like a prerequisite in space, a term of endearment that had no doubt sprung from necessity, given how difficult some interdimensional names were to pronounce. Stanford didn’t think his name was too difficult, but the nicknames seemed to be more an issue of equality. The Angolean’s could certainly hiss out Ford’s name if they tried, but nicknames were apparently easier. And more fun for the lizard people as well, falling in line with their upbeat sense of humour.

“Thank you for this.” Ford gestured to his tablet. “For an assignment.”

“Eh, we figured you’d been here long enough to want to stretch your legs a little.” The project coordinator waved his clawed hand at Ford idly. “You’ve got your basics up to scratch and you’ll probably have fun out in the field. Meet some new people for a change. Plus, hey, any excuse to get away from Arnold, right?”

“You guuuuuys!” Arnold complained in the background.

Ford thanked the lizard people again, privately quite sad to have to leave their peculiar illegal academy. They had been very generous with him, after he’d been in a situation which wasn’t so charitable. However, Stanford hadn’t ever properly let his guard down around the Angoleans after Shailesh’s betrayal back on Meccai. He couldn’t afford to trust too easily after that and staying in one place when there was such a hefty bounty on his head could put the Angoleans in danger. He didn’t want that. Boarding a ship for elsewhere was the best option for him.

Stepping away to the side, Stanford took a moment to read through his new assignment, obliquely eager to join one of the scrapping crews if it meant he’d get away from the base station. The facilities here were nice, but the dormitory conditions had Stanford uneasy, after all, he was still paranoid about talking in his sleep, and some of the conversations he’d been having, well, let’s just say they didn’t reflect well on him out of context.

“Wanted dead or alive?!”

Bill had shrugged his little shoulders, dodging the books Stanford had thrown at him, despite the fact that the memory novels would simply phase right through him.

“It didn’t say dead or alive. I mean, maybe they slipped it in the first draft, but I didn’t let it get past the proofreading process. What do you think I am, an idiot?”

“You -!” Ford was wordless with rage, gripping the air in front of him like he was strangling it, before reaching for another book to throw.

“Hey, what are you mad at me for? We removed it from the finished product!” Bill ducked under another thrown book and glared at Stanford. “I knew you’d get all fussy about it. It didn’t even say ‘dead’ at all.”

“It was still implied!” Ford stressed, struggling with his temper. “They could have killed me!”

“But did you die though? I don’t think so.” Bill held out his hand, like he had a reasonable point.
Ford didn’t even bother with a response, instead he tried to lift up the heavy abacus in the corner of his mindscape library, looking for more things to throw at Bill, having no patience for his excuses.

His reactive rage had lasted the first few weeks into his interdimensional travels, but when Bill kept showing up in his dreams, he found his rage about the wanted posters dissipating, simply accepting that the bounty had happened. Plus, he was running out of things to throw and it was somewhat less satisfying when the things he threw at Bill had absolutely no impact on the god.

He’d taken to singing repetitive songs in his head to keep Bill out, delighting when he discovered that ‘It’s a Small World After All’ caused Bill to angrily implode himself out of Ford’s mindscape just so he didn’t have to listen to it. He always came back though and Ford couldn’t sing annoying repetitive Disney songs all the time.

After his second month with the scrap vandals, when Ford had next closed his eyes, exhausted, he’d found the reserve of his anger had run dry.

Laying on the carpeted floor of his library, arms splayed like a starfish, he looked above him to see Bill floating parallel to him, watching him as always.

“Where are you?” The triangle asked.

“Why don’t you ask your bounty hunters?” Ford sassed back.

“I’m not actually hiring any of them, you know.” Bill divulged. “That’s the beauty of ‘reward upon capture’. I’m not paying a retainer to any of these schmucks.”

“Bully for you.” Ford huffed on an exhale.

“I don’t think you understand.” Bill crossed his arms, staring down at Ford. “I did this for a reason.
It’s not safe for you out there in the universe. You have no idea how dangerous things can be.”
“Oh, and I’m sure putting a bounty on my head will bring me up to speed on the danger nice and quickly.” Ford scoffed, sarcasm lacing his tone. “Because nothing says safety like an indiscriminate price on one’s head. I’ve certainly never felt safer.”

Bill’s eye lidded, unimpressed, oozing judgement on Stanford’s sassy attitude.

“If you’d just tell me where you are, this wouldn’t be necessary.”

“Well then, I’m afraid it is necessary. Because I’m not telling you where I am.” Ford rebutted, crossing his own arms over his chest, mimicking Bill’s pose. “I don’t think there’s a thing you could possibly do that would convince me to ever divulge my whereabouts.”

“So, you’ve already made up your mind then?” Bill asked him, watching him closely. “That’s it?”

“That’s it.” Ford shrugged, clapping his hands against his arms flippantly. He didn’t need to think deeper than that, his stubbornness was speaking for him here.

“That’s it?” Bill repeated, sounding somewhat sceptical.

“That’s what I’ve said. That’s it.” Ford insisted, nodding for emphasis.

“Because I feel you’re kind of saying one thing and I’m hearing something else.” Bill expressed, still squinting at Ford dubiously.

“Well, I’m definitely saying what I’ve been saying, so I don’t know what you’ve been hearing. You should be hearing what I’m saying.” Ford argued pedantically.

“Sure, I’m hearing what you’re saying, but I’m also hearing what you’re not saying.” Bill reasoned, weighing up the two prospects.

“Well, I’m saying you shouldn’t be doing that.” Ford rebutted.

“And I’m hearing you say that. But I’m also hearing what you’re not saying and I’m inclined to side with that argument, instead of what you’re saying right now.” Bill concluded, still floating above Ford as they bantered back and forth.

Ford sat up onto his elbows and frowned at Bill. He narrowed his eyes at the triangle, who aligned the angle he was floating at so he was still parallel to Stanford’s face.

“What exactly do you think I’m not saying?” Ford questioned.

“A lot of things.” Bill responded with a shrug, before blinking slowly at the human. “Mostly that you miss me. That you still want me. That you don’t know what to decide, mainly because you haven’t made your mind up yet.”

“And how exactly are you divining these unspoken thoughts and not just making them up? Considering the measures I’ve put in place, you don’t have access to my thoughts, or to my memories. So why do you think you know what I’m thinking? What exactly are you reading to convince you of this argument?” Ford asked snippily, using defensive sarcasm to cover up the genuine concern he felt at the thought that he was still so transparent.

“I don’t need to read your mind.” Bill answered, his long noodley arm trailing down from his side to brush a lock of Ford’s hair off his forehead. “I can still taste your worship, Sixer. You’re choking me with it.”
Ford didn’t know what to say at that, hovering on this vulnerable edge between honesty and his continued spiteful desire to pretend he wanted nothing to do with the triangle. He didn’t want his secret thoughts laid bare to the being before him, but now that he knew, it suddenly made a lot more sense why Bill hadn’t just gone away when Ford asked him to. Why he’d been so sceptical with every slung insult or banishment. Why he came back here every time Ford closed his eyes without fail. Why he was still attempting to try.

Ford understood now, but he still didn’t want to.

Bringing all the resentment and hate up to sit in the back of his mouth, Ford spat his response at the God right before breaking through to wakefulness.

“Then choke.”

And he woke up.

Reading through his assignment details with a bored detachment, Stanford wondered whether this assignment would last for a long time. Scrapping trawlers usually left for missions that took anywhere between 2 to 5 years, and he was hoping that he’d find being out on a space ship slightly more engaging than learning to rewire the same flux engine over and over again until the lizard supervising him deemed his efforts fast enough to meet the standard.

That was the trouble with the monotony of space life. The novelty of the fact that you were working with a society of lizard-aliens to engineer tech beyond your wildest dreams only held its lustre for so long and Stanford was doing his level best to find the goings on around him more interesting than what would happen when he succumbed to sleep. His dreams had no right being so addicting but, yet, they still were, or maybe the creature inhabiting them was to blame for sleep’s appeal. Even when they weren’t on speaking terms, Ford still found Bill-watching a more entertaining sport than the ones they played on the channel cubes at the base station.

It was becoming a problem, because Ford was starting to see why Bill still felt worshipped by him even when they were so at odds with each other. Ford just couldn’t take his eyes off him, it seemed. He blamed the paranoia, but it was more than that in reality. Ford had tried to shake many of his habits, but he still couldn’t shake the fact that he found Bill utterly fascinating, even now.

Bill tried to swipe through a memory novel laid in the middle of one of the study desks in the middle of the mindscape. Each time his hand passed through the book, his bricks turned a different colour.

He was yellow and then he swiped. Now he was green. He swiped again. Now he was blue.

“What, is this some kind of emotional response from you?” Ford questioned bluntly, laying on one of the red couches his mind provided in the library, sitting across from the god.

Bill’s bricks turned a peachy pink as he looked up, before he shook, and the colour drained away, his bricks resuming their standard yellowish hue.

“That is, assuming you have emotions.” Ford continued dryly, rolling over onto his belly, letting the book he was holding float down to the pile of finished journals below.

Bill extended his arm up at Stanford, his hand fisted with his middle finger standing tall.

Ford let out a short, dry laugh, shaking his head. Gesturing conversationally, Ford continued to talk, intending to antagonise.
“Seriously, I’d love to find out how you work someday. What makes you tick. You mentioned vivisections?”

“I hate you.” Bill assured Stanford. “So much.”

“Then why are you still here?” Ford countered.

He was surprised when Bill teleported away after that conversation. Part of him expected the triangle to stay, to continue to attempt to sway Ford through virtue of his very presence but Bill simply left him, perhaps proving a point.

Ford was surprised when he next slept that Bill wasn’t waiting for him as well. He had expected the God to be there and couldn’t help but feel a little disappointed, despite the fact that getting Bill to leave him alone was the goal all along.

He hadn’t thought through what a victory in this instance would mean.

That would be when Ford started taking the sleep suppressants.

Rather than face a mindscape without a muse, or the consequences of his actions (part of Ford felt that he had pushed too far, even though it was warranted. He felt guilty for constantly lashing out at his muse) he chose to take sleep suppressants. He could still rest and feel refreshed after a period of lying down with his eyes closed, but he couldn’t fully sleep, and as such he couldn’t dream. With the guidance of his Angolean tutors he found the right substance to allow this and he quickly bought up quite the supply.

As Ford read over his travel orders, he mentally calculated how many of the sleep suppressants he would need to bring with him, pondering how the duration of the mission would affect his supply. Logically, if he ran out he would be able to find other ways to avoid sleep, but if worst comes to worst, he wouldn’t be in danger in the mindscape. He had that under control.

Mostly, he just didn’t want to find out what would happen if he slept and dreamed and for once his muse wasn’t there. If his final transgression had pushed too far and crossed the line, that meant that Bill wouldn’t come back for him, that he had abandoned him, and decided he wanted nothing to do with him anymore.

He was trying not to think about that and trying not to think about how much that scenario worried him. It shouldn’t have been a depressing thought, but it was, and Ford was struggling to maintain interest in the world around him, trying to stay engaged with his scrapper work and leading a life in the cosmos that didn’t revolve around Bill, but now that that was a possibility, he found himself rather morose about it, considering how close they had been.

Maybe his new assignment could lift his mood and take his mind off the mindscape he was avoiding. Reading through the travel orders, he collected his things from his dormitory and made his way towards the dock his ship would be leaving from.

The other scrappers who would be joining him in the spacecraft for this mission had likely already boarded. Ford’s chat with the Angolean’s at the gate had delayed him. He boarded the ship at a leisurely pace, taking in his surroundings.

The vessel was a sturdy looking thing, cobbled together with both state of the art and antique machinery. It would take some kind of engineering mad genius to keep this vessel space-worthy and the idea was that the crew would be comprised of several mad geniuses, enough to keep it afloat.
Ford hefted his pack on his shoulders and paced forward through the corridors, following the layout of the spaceship to the main hub for introductions.

A motley crew of aliens were crowded there, drawn from different dimensions in all different parts of the galaxy, brought together by a shared love of craftsmanship and, for some, a desire to simply steal parts.

There were Angoleans, the lizard people Ford recognised and a few of the four-armed beings he’d seen so many of on Meccai, as well as a few amphibian looking folks, a cyborg or two by the looks of it, and a humanoid being covered in colourful fabrics, obscuring any defining features. Brief introductions were bandied about, though Ford didn’t really listen too closely. Layouts of the ship, along with a travel schedule were transferred to Ford’s tech tablet, also pinging into every other tablet in the room for the other new recruits.

Rather than stay and mingle, Stanford looked up the directions to the library on board the ship, making his way towards the sort of mental stimulation and fulfillment he sought out in the absence of his mindscape.

He wasn’t here to make friends.

That didn’t go so well for him before.

The ship was lampreyed onto the back of a Federation satellite orbiting uninhabited planetary systems on the outskirts of the Pinwheel Galaxy.

Stanford had been painstakingly removing the data probes from the outer shell of the satellite for several hours, remotely maneouvring the pincer arms extending outwards from his scavenger pod from within. It was delicate work, much harder than simply scrapping the part with one’s hands, but the atmosphere wasn’t conducive to exploring in only a space suit. Too many stars forming and combusting meant the atmosphere was volatile. The Angolean technology was astounding regardless, considering that the ship navigating this tenuous galaxy sometimes seemed to be held together with spit and hope.

As Stanford parked his scavenger pod back in the docking bay, the airlock sealed and funnelled the gases back out into something more generically breathable. Ford supposed that he could technically breathe in the noxious mix of chemicals, considering what Bill had done to his lungs, but he was trying not to think about the advantages the triangle had given him.

It was best not to think about it. He didn’t need reminders of what he was missing.

Climbing out of his scavenger pod, he picked up the data probes from the rear compartment and carried them out to the stock rooms. Other scrap vandals were doing the same, readying their haul for storage after a busy day’s work.

Ford logged and handed in his stolen parts and then followed his fellow crew members to the rec room. Recreation was very important on these long haul space missions to curb the cabin fever, so there were tables for lunches, lounges, heat pads, games, books, and video cubes decorating the communal room.
The scrap vandals were a friendly bunch, with the Angolan lizards as the gatekeepers of this particular society, whoever they let in had to at least have a good sense of humour. After all, they weren’t just screening your potential for engineering, they were also screening your ability to coexist with your fellow scrappers for several years of close quarters space travel.

The intention was for the crew to grow close like a family, leaning on one another, bonding with one another through recreation, but Stanford found himself to be the ship’s token recluse, preferring to work alone, dine alone, and read alone whenever he was in the shared spaces.

This made him something of a novelty to the crew, a curiosity. The man who wished to be alone on a ship full of people.

Today was no different. Stanford took his tablet over to the cafeteria dispenser and scanned his chip. The machine regurgitated his meal out onto a tray for him to pick at, blue slop on one part of the dish, a crunchy neon green delicacy on another part of the tray, a drink, and an individually wrapped cosmic roll on the side for dessert.

This food was nothing like what he would prepare or eat on earth but with limited options, he made the most of what he had. Food was food. Anything to keep him going.

All around him in the rec room the other scrap vandals were settling in groups at tables, sharing their meals and company equally.

Ford took an empty table in the corner of the room and picked at his meal while listening idly to the chatter around him.

“Get this, so an electron checks into the Ritz with only one bag, right?” One of the Angoleans on the table over to the left began, enchanting his fellows with what sounded like a bad joke in the making.

Ford could tell from the tone of voice, and resigned himself to listening in. Bill used to tell him jokes like that all the time, bad ones, and he was trying not to miss that.

“And the concierge goes – Sir, you’re only checking in the one bag?” The lizards at the table watched their fellow eagerly, wiggling their shoulders in anticipation of the punch line. “And the electron goes – My good man, I’m travelling light.”

Ford raised his eyebrow, prodding at his meal, the hooting laughter from the table across seeming as alien to him as his crew mates did. He was sure he would have found humour like that funny in the past, but he didn’t feel like laughing. He was almost certain Bill had told him that joke once before, beating this lizard to the punch line.

Ford heard a clatter as another tray slid onto his table, and he looked up.

“Do you mind if we sit with you, friend?”

Three of his crewmates stood before him, one of them a broad shouldered, four-armed woman with three eyes, smiling awkwardly at him, the other a floating torso, possibly a cyborg or AI, her pixelated smile lighting up the screen on her face, and the last, a humanoid being wrapped head to toe in fine fabrics. Only his eyes showed through a gap in the fabric, watching him with a friendly, curious demeanour.

Ford had seen them in the induction but hadn’t imagined them becoming close enough to him to garner the role of ‘friend’. Stanford blinked up at them suspiciously, supposing they were attempting to make friends with him, or to inspect the ship’s loner out of curiosity.
He was wary, less trusting since Shailesh’s betrayal, but there was little he could do to turn these crewmembers away without making a scene. These three seemed determined to sit with him.

Ford shrugged his shoulders and gestured to the table.

They slid into the chairs opposite him and attempted to make conversation.

“Quiet day out there today.” Remarked the four-armed woman. “I keep waiting for us to run into trouble like they said in training, but we never do.”

“Quiet is why we don’t run into trouble.” The robot chimed in response, wagging her finger as she spoke. She hummed for a moment, before stating cheerfully. “Loose lips sink ships!”

“She means to say that the Federation have no reason to assume their satellites are being scrapped for parts, since we are being quite covert with our recovery missions.” The person under the fabric scarves added, translating for the robot’s idiosyncrasies.

Stanford said nothing to contribute to this conversation, shovelling food into his mouth. The blue slop tasted like Greek yoghurt. Interesting. He wondered if it was made from active cultures as well.

“So stranger.” The four-armed woman barked a nervous laugh, leaning her elbow on the table, clearly attempting to pull some sort of conversation out of Stanford. “What’s your name? Feel like sharing? Mine’s Quinlar.”

“Mine’s En. En Pathi.” Added the robot cheerily.

“Mine is Sandeep.” Concluded the man behind the scarves, all three crewmembers now watching Stanford intently.

Ford took in their fierce attention warily, weighing up the pros and cons telling his name would garner. He could have been stubborn, continued to say nothing, but he was willing to bet that his stubbornness was matched here.

It was three against one. Maybe if he humoured some conversation with his crewmates, he could stop thinking about the jokes Bill used to tell him.

Perhaps he needed the distraction. Solitude didn’t seem to be working for him.

“Like the American university?” Remarked the man behind the scarves.

That didn’t seem like common intergalactic knowledge, and Stanford paused, looking closer at the man’s eyes, noting the shape of them, finding them familiar.

“You know about Stanford University?” Ford questioned.

“I had a feeling you were from Earth.” The man reached up to unwind one of the scarves from around his head, exposing his face slightly, smiling pleasantly. “It has been too long since I’ve heard from home.”

“You’re human.” Ford observed, looking at Sandeep’s face closely. His green-gold eyes and brown skin were decidedly human. He looked like a man of about 30, although there seemed to be more age showing around his eyes. That or some sort of tattoo encroaching on the side of his face.
Sandeep noticed Ford staring and covered himself with his scarves once more, only showing his eyes.

“As are you.” Sandeep inclined his head at Ford. “You seem quite a long way away from home.”

Stanford didn’t think humans were welcome in wider space. Shailesh and Bill made it seem like a novelty to see humans outside of Earth. Part of Ford thought he might not ever see another human again, not since falling through the portal.

Yet here before him was another of his kind. Ford couldn’t help but be curious, putting aside his self-imposed introversion for a while.

“I didn’t think I’d meet another human out here.” Ford admitted, his hesitation put on the back burner, curiosity winning out. “I heard the planet was protected.”

En, the robot hummed again, before trilling. “Birds of a feather flock together.”

“It is supposedly protected.” Sandeep divulged with a shrug. “But unfortunately for me, some people prefer not to follow the rules, and they seemed to reason that there were enough people in Bangladesh for humans to not notice when a few went missing. I can’t say I ever believed much in alien abduction, but here I am now.”

“You were abducted?” Ford probed curiously.

“When I was fourteen.” Sandeep wiggled his head as he spoke, nodding assent. “If I had stayed on Earth, I would have been sent to Oxford to study. My parents were reasonably wealthy and I was to follow their path with my studies. It was all planned out for me, my tutelage right up to university, although I was curious about America from a young age. Specifically, the law program at Stanford. Still, it was not meant to be.”

“You were abducted when you were fourteen?” Ford frowned, concerned and mildly repulsed at the thought of ripping a child from their family like that.

“As were several other children from Bangladesh, and younger.” Sandeep confirmed sadly. “I do not know where the others are now though. It may be too much to hope that they are still alive.”

There was an awkward silence as that sentence sunk in, Stanford’s frown deepening.

Quinlar looked between the two humans nervously, before clapping her four hands.

“Well, how about last week’s Globnar, huh? Anyone catch that on the channel tubes?”

En, the robot hummed, before her facial plate glowed pink. “Quinlar is nervous we’ve scared you away already, but I can sense that you are feeling sympathy, not revulsion.”

Ford blinked at the robot, confused by her assessment, or how she made it with such certainty.

“You would feel revulsion?”

“Empathy is a learned skill that not all sentient beings have cultivated.” En recited, her face plate a pixelated smile once more. “The common response to hearing of a misfortune you cannot prevent is anger or outrage and it is rarely aimed where such emotions should be.”

“En is an emotion sensing AI. She was designed to culture empathy in the children of intergalactic diplomats as part of a program to raise better leaders.” Sandeep explained, gesturing to En’s floating torso.
“And that worked about as well as you’d expect.” Quinlar joked.

“I used to have legs.” En chimed cheerfully, smiling widely on her face screen.

“She snuck on the ship with the scavenged parts and then asked for a job.” Quinlar grinned.

“I scrapped myself.” En declared brightly.

Stanford barely noticed their cheerful back and forth, his posture stiff and tense. Watching En warily, Ford leaned back from the table.

“What, what does that mean? You can read my thoughts?”

“No, I –“ En reached her hand out, as Stanford stood up from the table abruptly, grabbing his tray and his tablet.

“Stay out of my head.” Ford said harshly, scowling, before walking away, preferring to eat alone in his dorm if this was the sort of reception he’d get in the rec room.

The three crew members watched him go, their shoulders slumped as their new friend departed.

“Well, he’s not very friendly.” Quinlar observed, scowling at Stanford’s back as he left. “I thought you said he was lonely.”

“He is.” En insisted. “He’s hurting.”

Sandeep watched Stanford storm away solemnly.

“Then we will give him patience.”

---

Ford reached under his cot, pulling his trench coat out from beneath the bed.

His beige trench coat had turned into an unofficial knapsack since the talking chair on Meccai spilled jetfuel all over it, making it quite uncomfortable to wear.

He’d been wearing Shailesh’s black coat, not out of any misplaced fondness for her, mostly out of pragmatism. He blended in wearing her coat, more so than he did wearing his trench. Earth fashion stood out it seemed, although interdimensional fashion seemed much more out there in Ford’s opinion.

Ford couldn’t bear to part with his trench coat, despite that lingering jet fuel smell and the staining, so he kept it. Inside of his trench coat knapsack remained what was left of Stanford’s earthly possessions. He had compiled the papers, pictures and drawings he had taken from the shack into a sort of scrap book, so they wouldn’t be damaged by the rigors of interdimensional travel. It was like having another journal, only this one was filled with painful, compromising memories.

He told himself it wasn’t simply sentimentalism, these papers may have some relevance to his travels, like the business card did, but truthfully, he was kidding himself. He couldn’t bear to throw out any of the papers or photographs any more than he could stop tracing the shape of the tattoo on his pectoral each night before he shut his eyes to rest.

He just couldn’t do it. He already felt abandoned as it was, he couldn’t afford to let go of a single reminder of how special he had been. Although he supposed now, he was special in the past tense, since Bill had left his dreamscape.

It had been 10 months, give or take, since Stanford’s last dream.

The dream Bill wasn’t in.

He’d been taking sleep suppressants ever since, avoiding his mindscape simply to avoid acknowledging the fact that he may truly have driven Bill away for good this time. That Bill decided wasn’t worth chasing after anymore. That he wasn’t special to the God, despite their promise for now until the end of time.

He shouldn’t want to be special to the God, but he did, and now that Bill was no longer in his dreams, he was bereft of the feeling of being valued, of being deemed special. His insecurities were getting the better of him the more isolated he felt, and as he couldn’t risk forming new friendships, he was essentially isolating himself, dwelling on his cyclical thoughts.

If he wasn’t special to Bill anymore, then perhaps he simply wasn’t special at all. His hands didn’t make him special out here, his intellect didn’t matter, considering how frequently he was playing catch up with advances in science and technology. He didn’t stand out from the crowd anymore because there was no crowd of other humans. There was no one else to be average so Stanford could be exceptional.

Out here in the multiverse, abandoned by his God, the only one who might still believe he was exemplary, he was just a nobody.

Each night as he prepared for sleep, he’d open up his knapsack to retrieve the sleep suppression pills and he’d hesitate, wondering if he missed a tablet one night, would it really make a difference?

Would he close his eyes and sleep without the pills and realise that Bill had been waiting for him all the while, confirming that he was indeed special, that despite their falling out he still did have a God at his beck and call?

Or would he close his eyes and realise he didn’t need the sleep suppressants to keep Bill out of his dreams, because he’d finally driven the God away for good this time?

Ford berated himself for the cruel things he said in his dreams, and then he berated himself for berating himself. He shouldn’t want Bill’s regard, Bill’s attention, after everything the triangle had done to him, or for him in that backwards way of his.

The triangle deserved a little cruelty, given all that he’d done, but Stanford didn’t know if he’d crossed a line in doling it out.

He shouldn’t feel this longing for the attention he was promised from now until the end of time, but he did.

You’d never be abandoned, because I’d be everywhere at once, and always connected to you.
You’d have protection, power, the entire universe at all twelve of your fingertips. Anything you could ever conceptualise would be possible. You wouldn’t need anything but me for the rest of your days, but you’d have everything at the same time. You’d belong to me.
They shook on it. It was supposed to be a deal.

Now, Stanford felt more abandoned than ever, and he still couldn’t bring himself to go into the mindscape and confirm whether his cruel words had driven away the God, or if Bill masochistically kept coming back for more.

Part of him wanted the God to be there when he closed his eyes and the other parts of him railed at that solitary thought for its idiocy. He was lucky to be shot of Bill, Bill betrayed him, everything about his current situation was Bill’s fault.

However, technically, Ford betrayed Bill first, although he often didn’t feel like acknowledging that.

The part of him that was picked last constantly in life, for sports, friendships, and schools, thanks to Stanley’s intervention, was hanging on the fact that Bill always picked him and he wasn’t handling this rejection very well.

He wasn’t sure if he would smooch or strangle the God if he saw him in his mind again, given all the grief he’d given him. He might end up doing both, and if Bill was masochistic enough to come back to Stanford’s mindscape, it may well be that he’d enjoy that.

Ruminating on his sleep situation was becoming somewhat of a Schrödinger’s Bill, and rather than debating whether he should or not, he simply did what had become habit, and unscrewed the pill bottle, tipping one of the sleep suppressants out into the palm of his six fingered hand.

“Trouble sleeping, friend?”

Ford turned around and saw on the bunk next to him, Sandeep settling into his own bunk.

“No trouble.” Ford replied quickly, hiding the bottle’s label.

“En wishes me to pass on her apologies to you.” Sandeep continued speaking as he toed off his shoes and began to unwrap the scarves from his body. “She did not mean to startle you. She does not read minds, she merely senses emotion. It is a part of her algorithm that she cannot help, though she will attempt to be more mindful of your boundaries in future.”

“Hmm.” Was all Ford said in acknowledgement. He put away the pill bottle, wrapping up his belongings in the trench coat knapsack once more.

Hefting himself up to sit on the bed, Ford reached for the bottle of water on the nightstand and looked up briefly before swallowing his pills, freezing when he wrapped his head around what he was seeing.

Sandeep had unwrapped the scarves around his legs to reveal a horrific assortment of scars carved into his skin. They weren’t tattoos, like Stanford had first thought. Spiralling patterns of interlocking circles and bizarre symbols scattered all the way up his legs. Ford couldn’t look away, frozen with horror and deep sympathy as Sandeep continued to unwrap the scarves from his arms as well, the skin there in a similar condition, cruelly marked all over.

Sandeep seemed to notice Ford’s staring, and paused, before he made to cover his skin with the scarves again.

“I’m sorry if I’ve made you uncomfortable.”

“No, you –” Ford faltered on his words, guilt sticking in his throat for how he’d treated Sandeep and his friends before. Swallowing that guilt, Ford had to ask. “What happened?”

“This?” Sandeep looked down at his scars, and shrugged, continuing to unwrap the scarves as he spoke, dressing down before he slept. “Mementos from my old profession. All in the past now, thankfully.”

“What was your old profession?” Ford asked, shifting on his cot, still holding his sleep suppression tablets in his hand.

“When I was abducted as a child, I was sold at a market, to a being who fancied themselves a God. I was expected to show worship and when I didn’t, it was carved out of my skin.” Sandeep said, still in the same calm level voice he seemed to frequent. “That is the way of most of these false Gods. They think they can buy love through fear and use it as fuel. They mark up their followers like chattel, buying and selling them as cows for slaughter. I was lucky, for I knew the cow was sacred, but many did not and lost their agency, thinking they did not matter.”

Ford stared at Sandeep, shaken by his words.

“Quarrels between Gods are frequent. My old master was deposed, and I was given a second chance to make my own way. Those who believed in our old Master were left adrift without him, and many perished, unable to subsist on their own.” Sandeep continued, all in the same unshakably calm voice. “It took the scrap vandals to remind me that even that which has been cast away may still be of use. How does the saying go? En would know. One man’s trash is another’s…”

“Treasure.” Ford finished the idiom, feeling somewhat numb.

Ford looked down at his knees and processed this, rattled by the similarities in their situations.

Both of them were bound to a God, in different ways, but the worship seemed to be a central similarity. Worship was the key, which lead Ford to overanalyse the worship he’d given Bill of his own free will, contrasting it to the traumatic experience Sandeep no doubt had, the worship taken from him in blood.

Although Bill hardly needed to buy Stanford’s worship, he still harvested it, drank it up and used it as fuel for his batteries. Hearing that this was common practise among Gods, left Stanford feeling used and disenfranchised, although he couldn’t help but realise, looking at Sandeep’s skin, that his situation could have been much worse. At least Bill had never asked Ford to mutilate himself for his own satisfaction.

Again, he was pardoning Bill’s behaviour with the justification that ‘it could have been worse’. It was hardly a glowing testament to Bill’s behaviour, but it still gave Stanford pause for thought.

“A heavy topic before bed. My apologies.” Sandeep watched Ford carefully. “I merely wished to express understanding for your situation. I take sleeping pills too.”

Ford saw Sandeep reach into his own pack to retrieve the same sleeping tablets he’d purchased back on Meccai, the ones that induced slumber rather than prevented it. Sandeep shook two tablets out onto his own hand to show Stanford.

Ford kept his hand closed around his own tablets, not wanting to show Sandeep that the pills they took were completely different.

“I must say, I was surprised to see you eating the food from the cafeteria.” Sandeep commented, setting his two pills on the night stand. “There is very little my stomach will accept, given how different the food is out here. It’s nothing like food from Earth. Due to a lack of exposure, most things will send a human body into anaphylactic shock. How long have you been out here?”

“Two years.” Stanford answered, stripping down to his boxers and singlet as well. The dormitories were heated to accommodate the cold-blooded crewmembers and if Stanford didn’t wish to sweat through his clothes he had to strip down in the evenings, just like Sandeep.

“Only two years?” Sandeep raised his eyebrows, looking Stanford over. “It took much longer than that for my system to acclimatise. Almost seven years. You must be remarkably hardy.”

Ford thought back to Bill’s ‘gifts’ when he first fell through the portal. The total allergy immunity, digestive tolerance and radioactive resistance suddenly made a lot more sense now. Rather than tell Sandeep that instead of his God mutilating him, Bill had enhanced his survival skills, he ran his fingers through his hair awkwardly.

“Something like that.”

“Many of the children who were abducted with me died of liver failure within the first five years.
We humans aren’t as suited to interdimensional travel as we would like to think.” Sandeep remarked casually, reaching for his own water bottle from below his bed.

And that would explain the new liver.

Ford kept wanting to hate Bill for his actions, it burned him to admit that the things Ford had seen as outlandish and unnecessary were things Bill did for Ford’s own good. The things Ford saw as fickle showboating and careless cruelty were actually carefully considered decisions designed to aide Ford’s quality of life.

You think you’re getting a freebie like that all the time? Please Sixer. You’re not that special. Bill had said that when he altered his lungs, but he did it again and again, building Ford’s system stronger than he had to. Giving him ‘freebies’.

When Bill had first altered Ford’s physicality, when he enhanced his lungs, Stanford was angry at the intrusion, the gall Bill had to do so, but looking at the scars that covered Sandeep’s body, Stanford realised that the things Bill did to him weren’t things that most God’s did to their worshippers.

Rather than mutilating him, Bill gifted him constantly.

Maybe he was special.

Sandeep was wearing just shorts now, folding his scarves and putting them aside before he raised his water bottle at Ford, toasting him.

“Ah, well. To a good night’s sleep then, friend.”

Belatedly, Ford raised his own water bottle, clinking it against Sandeep’s and watched the other human drink down his sleeping pills.

Stanford looked at the sleep suppression pills in his hand for a moment, debating whether he should take them. His mind was swimming with new information.

Despite the fact that Sandeep had just poured out his tragic life’s story to Ford, all the scientist could think of was himself, how this information changed how he saw things. How it could redeem him, reaffirming that perhaps he was special after all. It was self-centred of Ford, and he realised that.

Ford took a swig of water from his bottle and downed his own pills, deciding to impede dreaming for one more night. He had too much on his mind to have his muse there too. Or the lack of his muse.

As Sandeep settled into his cot beside Ford, Stanford slid onto his own bed and lay staring up at the cot above him, feeling the caffeine supplement kick in, keeping him awake for another night.

It was better he didn’t dream. He had a lot to think about.

The tedious, long haul aspect of space travel while working on a scrap vandal vessel was when the ship was relaying between galaxies, moving from one scavenger site to the next. When the ship wasn’t docked somewhere parts could be ransacked, the crew spent most of their working hours stationed in an assembly line, dismantling and re-engineering the stolen parts.

Assembly hours were what passed for mundane monotony on board the vessel, and while Stanford had once touted the virtues of mundane monotony to Bill one rainy day within the shack, here in intergalactic transit, he was beginning to understand Bill’s frustration with the state of being.

While in transit it was the same thing every day, every rotation of the clock. The crew would wake up, and Stanford would feign sleep so he could pretend to do the same, they would eat in the cafeteria, go down to the assembly lines to dismantle stock, break for lunch, dismantle more stock, have dinner and retire to another boring evening of pretending to sleep.

If Stanford could sneak away to read in the library of an evening, or work on engineering something unique he might have been content with his life, but the hours on the vessel were set to a highly regimented schedule. Sleeping hours were mandated to ensure the health and wellbeing of the crew. Ford’s own unique brand of insomnia might have been tolerated if he ever actually told the captain why he couldn’t sleep, but Stanford had kept his reasons to himself, ashamed and distrustful. And as such he was forced to endure the mandated sleeping hours the same as everyone else. Sleeping tablets like the ones Sandeep used were commonplace on board, to enable each crew member to fit in with the rotation’s sleep schedule, and Stanford felt like even more of an outlier, laying awake in the dormitories, listening to the resounding snores of his crewmates until he was certain he wouldn’t be noticed when he pulled out a book to read.

His options for reading material were limited, as books weren’t to be removed from the library. That left him flicking through his scrapbook of mementos over and over again, every night, until his stubbornness broke through and he smuggled books from the library.

The scrap vandals favoured dexterity and swiftness with engineering and parts assembly, and it astounded Stanford how well those skills leant to the slight of hand required for his nightly book theft. He was certain back on Meccai he would have been appalled at the thought of moulding himself into a thief like this, but he was becoming quite talented at dispossessing possessions when he required them.

In the evenings in his cot, he often found himself practising that slight of hand, rolling nuts and bolts between his fingers, misdirecting attention so it looked like he had vanished an info chip from one hand to another.

If he murmured ‘this is the salt shaker’ to himself from time to time, no one noticed it in the dark.

Even now as he sat in the assembly room, waiting for the next part he needed to dismantle to slide along the conveyer belt, he idly twirled his screwdriver from hand to hand, spinning it in ways that had any casual observer hard pressed to pinpoint which hand the screwdriver was in at any one time.

Sitting beside him, or rather hovering, the emotion sensing AI reassembled the part Stanford had just disassembled, fashioning it into something completely different.

“If you are bored, we can switch jobs.” En the AI looked over to Stanford, smiling in a friendly manner at him.

Ford didn’t turn his head to look at the robot, his mouth frowning at the edges. “Stop reading me. Or scanning me. Or whatever it is that you do.”

“I don’t need to scan you to know that.” En corrected Ford, remaining cheerful despite Ford’s dour demeanour. “Even I am bored.”

“Is that even possible for you?” Stanford questioned, somewhat curious about the AI’s programming. “To feel bored?”

“I feel feelings, just like you do.” En stated quietly.

“Not like I do. I meant in terms of your programming?” Ford continued insensitively.

“I control my programming now.” En responded, watching Ford carefully. “I decide how I want to feel.”

“And how did you end up doing that?” Ford pressed. “How is that even possible? Or have you been programmed to think you have control, and you just believe what your programming tells you?”

“I was created to be a learning and teaching AI. Every cumulative experience I garner teaches me how to respond to situations and as I was programmed to culture empathy, learning to feel was one of the first things I did.” En looked at Stanford reproachfully. “You are not the first scientist to have hurt my feelings.”

Ford blinked at that, startled, and then looked at En more closely. The robot’s pixelated face plate was conveying an emotion that seemed much more complex than the standard smile or neutral expression to robot seemed to favour. Now En’s brows were drawn into a pixelated line slanting on her forehead, her digital eyes sad, a small frown lilting down at the edges of the line that made her mouth.

Ford felt guilt seep up through his throat for a moment, before he looked away from En’s face, staring back down at the half-disassembled data probe in front of him.

“I can sense that you aren’t very emotionally capable.” En said bluntly.

Ford looked back up at that, mildly offended. En ignored his reaction, continuing to talk.

“You certainly feel a wide range of emotions, but you don’t understand them and you rationalise them away until they’re easily dismissed. You could stand to learn a little bit more about your emotions and how to deal with them.”

The bell rang, signalling the end of the assembly shift for the day.

En hovered up, moving away from her seat on the assembly line. “And no, I didn’t scan you to reach that deduction. I didn’t have to.”

Stanford watched En’s torso hover away from him, stunned by her assessment of him. That guilt he felt before was back, sticking in his throat, and despite his avowal that he wasn’t here to make friends, Stanford couldn’t help but feel that he may have just lost one.

At the cafeteria later that day, Stanford sat with his food tray on the corner table that he favoured, alone.

He paused repetitively shovelling the blue goop into his mouth when he heard the sound of laughter. Quinlar, Sandeep and En walked into the rec room together with their respective meals, chatting contentedly with one another.

Stanford steeled himself, assuming they would come sit at his table again, trying to bond with him, and he kept his eyes glued down to his food tray.

He could hear the idle conversation relaying between the three of them, waiting for them to approach his table.

He waited.

He could still hear them chatting, but they weren’t as close as Stanford assumed, and he looked up to see they had settled on a different table, still chatting away like old friends.

Leaving Stanford to sit all by himself.

While he hadn’t wanted to make friends on this spaceship, he couldn’t help but feel disappointed. Rejected.

He looked back down at his tray and pushed the blue goop around on his plate, having suddenly lost his appetite.

This was what he wanted.

Wasn’t it?
Stanford sat in his bunk that evening, holding his pill bottle in his hand, agonising over whether he should take one tonight.

Just one night. It would be just one night, dipping back into the mindscape. Just one night of decent rest, of lucid dreaming. Potentially of a break from this smothering sense of isolation he felt.

Just one night to be special again.

Or to be more disappointed than ever.

Stanford was so thoroughly conflicted, standing on this precipice of capitulation and emptiness. Longing for some sense of belonging again in the vast expanse of space where he was supposed to find his place. That was what Bill had told him. It was a big universe out there, he’d find somewhere he could belong, he’d find a place where he was valued and special.

He had hoped he’d find something more meaningful and compelling out here, but the ennui that soaked his days sodden was telling him otherwise.

He didn’t want to acknowledge what Bill had said, that Bill may have been right.

Realise that your place is here. By my side.

He was terrified that even with an entire multiverse of opportunity sprawled out ahead of him, that the universe would remain dull and unfulfilling to Ford because he was experiencing it without his muse.

He was terrified that Bill was right.

He was terrified by how much he wanted his muse’s attention again, just to feel desired. It was a heady thing to be wanted by a God.

And what terrified him more than that was the thought of skipping his sleep suppressants, going into his mindscape after so much build up, with his endless ruminating over should and should nots culminating in yet more abandonment, yet more solitude. If Bill wasn’t there.

He couldn’t bear it if he dreamed and realised that he was truly alone out here in the universe.

Stanford jumped when he noticed Sandeep climbing into his own cot in his peripheral vision. He tried hard to make it look like he wasn’t paying the other human any attention, but every fibre of his being was focused on what his crewmate did, whether he acknowledged him or not.

Sandeep unwrapped the scarves from his body, folded them up, all without giving Stanford even a passing glance and then the human retrieved his sleeping pills, swallowing them down with some water. He put the bottle of sleeping pills on top of the night stand without acknowledging the other human.

Stanford was aching for Sandeep to look at him, to give him some sort of interaction, some sort of response. They were almost friendly before, toasting over their relative night time tablets alongside amiable conversation.

Neither Sandeep, Quinlar or En had spared even a passing glance at Ford since he upset the AI during assembly that day. It was like he didn’t exist.

Hanging on the prospect of some sort of acknowledgement, something broke inside Stanford when Sandeep lay down in his cot and rolled to face away from Ford, his back turned to him.
So that was it.

Ford really had no one to turn to.

Screwing his eyes shut, Ford tried to smother the loneliness he felt, trying to swallow it away or squash it down. He tried, he really did, but the emotion was too large to be squashed out of sight. He could hear Sandeep begin to snore like the rest of the crewmembers and the corners of Ford’s eyes felt wet, the tightness in his throat nearly unbearable.

He couldn’t take it anymore.

Throwing his pill bottle into his knapsack, Stanford grabbed Sandeep’s pill bottle from the nightstand, unscrewing it quickly and stealing two of Sandeep’s sleeping tablets, hurriedly screwing the lid back on and putting the bottle exactly where Sandeep had left it.

Ford looked down at the two pills in his hand for a moment, but only for a moment. Before he could change his mind, he grabbed his water bottle, gulped a mouthful of the liquid, and threw back the sleeping tablets, swallowing them quickly.

Ford blinked in the aftermath of what he’d done, regret flashing briefly across his thoughts, before he blinked again, his eyes getting heavier.

He reclined more fully on his cot and looked up at the bunk above his, the snores of his crewmates growing fainter and fainter.

Ford slid his hand underneath his singlet and rested his fingers on the tattoo on his pectoral, clinging to it the same way he clung to the hope that Bill still found him special enough to stick around for.

A man could dream.

---

Stanford opened his eyes to a peculiar sight.

The barley fields from his nightmares were encroaching on his mental library, wild and neglected, stems of the brown plant sprouting up between the stacks. His athenaeum of thought looked overrun and feral, unkempt in his absence.

It was like being in someone else’s head, really. It wasn’t tidy, it wasn’t organised. The library was falling apart, and Stanford didn’t want to draw too many parallels between the library and his life right now, but the parallels were hard to avoid.

His mind was decaying, stagnating without regular dreaming, without the stimulation his muse provided. The repetitive expanse of the wheat fields resembled the repetition of life on the assembly line. His stubbornness infringed upon his imagination and it was no wonder that his daily life seemed so mundane. He used to be a dreamer. He hadn’t had a dream in 10 months.

He’d forgotten how to dream, it seemed. And in turn his library was forgotten and overrun.

That was a depressing thought.
Parting the wheat stems, Ford paced around his domain, searching between the stacks for his mind’s other occupant. As he passed each row of bookshelves his desperate optimism faded, seeing no sign of the triangle in each aisle.

Dejected, Stanford stumbled over to the red lounge he’d sat on before, the last time he was here, and collapsed onto the cushions. Wheat stalks caught on his trouser legs, and made him feel itchy, amidst all the numbness he was currently dealing with, processing this solitude.

Agitated, Ford swatted the swaying wheat stalk away from him, the sound of the wheat stem snapping echoing in the vast expanse of his abandoned library.

For a moment after the stem broke, things were silent again, until a rumble sounded out from the other side of his mindscape. It sounded like the steps of a giant, like the emergence of an earthquake. Something to rattle the soul.

Ford sat up a little in his chair, peering between the stacks again, as the boom sounded out once more.

The ground was shaking, and Stanford felt the vibrations of some sort of omnipresent force shiver down his spine.

At a sound like that most people would feel dread, or some kind of fear curdling instinctively.

But Stanford. Stanford was excited.

That loud vibration emanated outwards once more, raising the hairs on the back of Ford’s neck, until the air on the other side of the library seemed to split, like the wallpaper of this reality was being burst through with force, and suddenly floating in the air before him, climbing through that rip in his mindscape, 20 feet tall and glowing with intensity, his muse returned.

Once he had burst through, Bill’s eye searched around the library, until it landed on Stanford, casually sitting in the red lounge chair, staring back up at him.

Bill’s eye curved pleasantly, his expression akin to that of a smile, momentarily putting Stanford at ease. Only momentarily.

“STANFORD.”

Bill’s size expanded suddenly, towering over Ford’s mindscape, his bricks flashing red in an instant.

“FILBRICK.”

Bill’s form seemed to flicker, jumping from one side of the library to the other, looming in front of the lounge Ford sat on.

Bill’s eye turned black, his pupil a red glowing slit in the centre, bearing down on Ford with all its wrath.

“PINES.”

Ford leaned back, surprised by Bill’s vehemence, and opened his mouth to speak, but could barely get a word out before Bill’s booming voice shouted over him.

“Gee, long time no SEE, am I right? It’s only been what – nearly a year? Nearly a year, and you think you can waltz right back in here. To grace me with your presence. How THOUGHTFUL.”

He almost sounded hysterical, forced glee hiding malice behind every word. Ford didn’t know what reaction he anticipated, but he knew he was kidding himself to think his muse would be waiting patiently for him, ready to dote on him again as he once had.

He was making the same mistake he had back when he crafted Bill’s body, thinking Bill would inhabit it benignly, existing to bolster Ford’s efforts and cheer him on. He’d forgotten that Bill was his own person, with his own thoughts and feelings, even if those feelings were verging on demented.

“I can see you’ve redecorated. I want to say the place looks nice, really I do, but it would look so much better BURNED TO THE GROUND!”

Bill pointed to the bookcases, his fingers gunning flames at the shelves, but just as his hands passed through the memory journals, so too did the flames sink ineffectually through Ford’s mindscape, burning out in the air behind it.

“Bill –“ Ford began, observing Bill’s tantrum with a long suffering demeanour that he hadn’t truly earned.

Foiled by the encryption throughout Stanford’s mindscape, Bill balled his hands into fists by his side and screamed with frustration.

“Really, Bill –“

“YOU - How DARE YOU!!” Bill’s voice shook the foundations of the library, the spectacle of his rage giving Ford a slight headache. “YOU THINK YOU JUST GET TO DISAPPEAR LIKE THAT? GHOST ME FOR MONTHS?? Who do you think you ARE? DO YOU HAVE ANY IDEA HOW MANY RESOURCES I HAD TO PULL TO LOOK FOR YOU?? THE DEALS I HAD TO MAKE?? THAT I DIDN’T WANT TO! AND YOU HAVE THE GALL, THE ABSOLUTE DISRESPECT, TO JUST SHOW UP HERE LIKE IT'S NOTHING???”

“Bill –“ Ford reached his hand out, trying to hush Bill’s glorious rampage.

“YOU JUST EXPECT ME TO MAKE NICE LIKE WE USED TO? LIKE YOU HAVEN’T BEEN IGNORING ME? IGNORING ME?? I SHOULD EVICERATE YOU FOR THIS! TURN YOU INTO STONE AND BREAK YOU INTO A MILLION SIXERY PIECES AND THROW THOSE PIECES IN A FLAMING BLACK HOLE!! YOU THINK YOU GET TO LEAVE LIKE THAT? YOU THINK THAT’S ALLOWED? You are MINE, REMEMBER? YOU COULD HAVE BEEN DEAD, BUT NO! YOU DON’T EVEN HAVE THE DECENCY TO STAY DEAD.”

“Bill –“ Ford stood up and walked towards the fuming triangle, still holding his hands out placatingly even while the God threw his fiery tantrum, flames surrounding his geometric form.

At this point, honestly, he found Bill’s whole rampage quite amusing, simply for how transparent it was. Despite the fact that Ford could see through Bill’s bluster, he continued.

“DEAD IS TOO GENEROUS FOR YOU. YOU THINK YOU CAN JUST HIDE FROM ME FOR ALL THIS TIME WITHOUT CONSEQUENCE?? BECAUSE THERE WILL BE CONSEQUENCES! I WILL MAKE THEM. IS THAT WHAT YOU THINK? HOW DARE YOU MAKE ME LOOK FOR YOU!”
“So, you were looking for me?” Stanford had to ask, relief making his heart light and confidence making his tone cavalier. Clearly, he hadn’t driven the God away like he thought he had. “Were you worried about me?”

Bill blinked down at Stanford and seemed to freeze in his rampage, surprised by his flippant attitude, before he scowled down at Ford, scoffing loudly several times in a theatrical attempt to dissuade Sixer from such a notion.

“No! You – no! Pfft. Worried? Please, as if. You’re not that important Sixer. You’re not special. You’re not special at all.”

Ford’s entire demeanour seemed to sag with relief as he sighed, and let out a breathy laugh, elated despite what Bill was saying.

His muse’s protests were translucent, familiar, and beyond comforting. Bill had been looking for him. He was worried. And Stanford was special. Hearing Bill’s familiar phrasing thrown at him again, he felt like a meaningful part of the universe once more. That he was important, that someone was looking for him, and that he was missed.

Bill narrowed his eye at Stanford’s laughter and shrunk down to the size of a dinnerplate, splitting into five different forms, floating around the scientist assessing him.

“What’s so funny? Do you think this is funny?”

“Hysterical.” Ford shook his head fondly, still snickering to himself.

Bill scoffed again, before his five forms merged together in front of Ford’s face, considering him.

“Have you finally decided to tell me where you are? Is that it?” Bill tilted forward, floating a little closer to Ford expectantly.

“Oh, goodness no.” Ford chuckled, enjoying the way Bill’s eye narrowed at him, his frustration evident. This was enjoyable. Ford was enjoying it all, the spectacle of Bill’s rage, being back in the mindscape, seeing through his muse’s bluster and teasing him for it. “You just said you plan to eviscerate me.”

“Sixer.” Bill groaned, doing the triangular equivalent of gritting his teeth.

“Unless that was merely a figure of speech, and you did miss me?” Ford questioned teasingly.

“No. I plan to literally eviscerate you.” Bill deadpanned, glaring at the smiling scientist.

“Literally.”

“Ah, you always say the sweetest things.” Ford smiled again, although his expression was now nostalgic and bittersweet, enough to draw Bill’s attention to it.

Assessing him shrewdly, Bill pieced things together.

“You disappear on me for months, nearly a year, and suddenly you’re back here. But you’re not here to tell me where you are. So why? Why are you here? What, do you want something? Is that it? Well you can -”

“Just what?” Bill persisted, hovering about a foot away from Ford now.
“I just … wanted to know that you were still looking for me.” Ford shrugged, now finding it too difficult for his pride to bear to look Bill in the eye, looking anywhere else as he admitted his weakness. “That you hadn’t…”

“That’s rich. You clear off for months and you think that I abandoned you.” Bill narrowed his eye at Ford for a moment longer, before he crossed his arms over his bricks. “You’re still alive, clearly. And if you went ten months without sleep on coffee alone you wouldn’t be. So how did you do it?”

“I’ve been taking sleep suppressant pills.” Ford answered candidly. “Every night.”

“Of course, you have.” Bill sighed, the frustration seeping out of him now that he had fallen back into the familiar rhythm of being around Sixer. He could be mad at Stanford and still recognise that avoiding him for ten months via excessive use of sleep suppressants sounded exactly like the sort of stupidly defiant decision he’d make.

The more he lingered in Stanford’s mind the more he realised that all of the infuriating things he’d been cursing while separated from the human were the same things he found fascinating when he was near him because they were so intrinsically Sixer. It was sickening how weak this was, letting Sixer’s transgressions slip away simply because they were in close quarters once again.

Still, there was something about Sixer’s regard that just melted Bill’s walls away.

“Why did you stop?” Bill had to ask, watching Stanford closely now, hanging on his response.

Ford didn’t say anything, but it was clear in his expression. He reached out with tentative movements, his hand hovering by Bill’s, waiting to see if the cosmic being would unfold his arms and meet him in the middle.

Bill wavered, struggling to match his stubbornness with Stanford’s, but it would take so little effort to just reach out and join hands with Ford, and so much more effort to stay mad at him. Bill had been expending enough effort already, simply searching for the scientist.

The longer Stanford stood there, with his hand outstretched, the harder it became to justify holding back. Not now when he was finally here, with no agenda but to see him it seemed.

It was written all over Sixer’s face.

He’d missed him.

Grumbling and looking away determinately, Bill slammed his tiny hand down into Sixer’s, gripping onto Ford’s palm before his digits elongated into claw like lengths and entwined with Sixer’s fingers, lacing through.

He squeezed Ford’s hand, making sure to dig his claws in as he did so, but Stanford didn’t shake him off or push him away.

Bill snuck a look at his infuriating human from the corner of his eye and was surprised to note that Stanford was still smiling, his gaze fond as he looked down at their entwined hands.

“You are the angriest hand holder I’ve ever met.” Ford remarked wryly.

“Let go then.” Bill told him, but Stanford didn’t, squeezing Bill’s hand tighter in response.

“Do you think it would be possible –“ Ford began musing, staring at their entwined hands. “If we could meet again like this? To dream together again, like we used to?”

“Tell me where you are and I’ll consider it.” Bill attempted opportunistically.

“If you could put that aside for just a few seconds, we might even be able to have a conversation, like normal people.” Ford raised his eyebrow. “Wouldn’t that be nice, to put the search aside and actually have a meaningful conversation? Do you remember how those work?”

“I never have meaningful conversations, Sixer. I’ve been incomprehensible this entire time, haven’t you noticed?” Bill remarked sarcastically.

“I wonder what that makes me then.” Ford considered, walking back to sit on the lounge, leading Bill by the hand now that the god was somewhat docile.

“My best guess is desperate and lonely.” Bill bluntly discerned, hurting Stanford with his accuracy.

It seemed docile was an understatement. While Bill wasn’t hurling flaming projectiles anymore, he still knew how to make his words cut.

Ford chewed on the inside of his cheek rather than responding, bitter that Bill was so right.

“What’s the matter?” Bill continued to prod Ford’s rawness. “Do you not know how to make friends with other beings without binding them in a skin suit and trapping them in your immediate vicinity, until you feel like stabbing them in the back at your leisure?”

“I don’t know why I thought talking to you was supposed to make me feel better.” Ford said bitterly, also angry to be holding Bill’s hand.

Bill’s habit of throwing his failings back in his face was one of those habits Ford purposefully forgot in his loneliness, glorifying the many ways Bill could make him feel validated and special instead. This was just like the guilt he felt when he first bound Bill to a body, and the muse decided to torture him for it.

Ford was regretting coming here already, until Bill continued to speak.

“Hey, it worked, didn’t it?”

Ford looked up from their entwined hands, to meet the triangle’s gaze, his bitter train of thought derailed in an instant.

“Is that what we are? Friends?” Ford questioned.

Bill squeezed Ford’s hand briefly, before hovering down to perch on the arm of the lounge beside Stanford, reclining comfortably on the couch.

“Make with the meaningful conversation, then. Go on.” Bill watched Stanford patiently.

Ford blinked for a moment, baffled that he was suddenly getting what he wanted, company and someone to talk to once again. Despite his rage, Bill provided, even when Ford was half convinced that Bill hated his guts. He didn’t know how to feel about that.

Exhaling his tension with a sigh, Ford began to tell Bill about the things he’d seen on Meccai. It would be safe to tell Bill about the places he’d already left, it’s not like the muse would go looking for him there.

Besides, it was nice to have someone to talk to again.
Ford talked and Bill listened all the way through the night as Stanford dreamed. Ford felt comforted by the familiar heat of their hands entwined until morning.

“Are you certain we should be ignoring him?” Sandeep asked the AI hovering beside him, huddled with Quinlar in the corner of the assembly room.

“That’s what my protocol tells me. Teaching children empathy means that when they upset someone they aren’t to be rewarded with attention until they apologise and he hasn’t yet.” En responded, crossing her arms.

“I thought you said he was lonely.” Quinlar frowned, rubbing one of her elbows. “Wouldn’t he have cracked by now?”

“I –“ En began, but fell silent when Stanford walked through the assembly room doors.

Unlike the morose way he carried himself before, he walked with a renewed spring in his step, his head held high, barely smothering a smile.

En blinked at him as he walked past, scanning his mood.

“He’s happy.” En remarked with surprise.

“I thought he was miserable yesterday?” Quinlar questioned, confused.

The three of them watched Stanford settle down at his station and pull his pile of scrap towards him, eager to begin.

“I wonder what changed.”

The wheat had died back, no longer encroaching on Ford’s mindscape now he was here to maintain it, but a certain wildness still remained. Soft grass grew on the floor of his mental library now, mimicking a clearing of grass he remembered from the forest in Gravity Falls and white daisies dotted through the greenery.

Ford lay on his back on the grass, picking the petals off a daisy as he dreamed alongside his muse.

“Here’s a question. I was under the impression that you ‘made it your policy’ not to do things you don’t want to do. And to do everything you do want.”

Bill hovered beside Ford, his arm trailing long to rip up the grass, with varied success. At first, he couldn’t touch the grass, his hand passing through it like it had through the books, but after Stanford begrudgingly gave Bill explicit permission to play with the grass, contact could be made.
“So, if that’s the case, why were you making deals you didn’t want to make?” Ford asked curiously.

“Ugh.” Bill ripped the grass up with slightly more vehemence. “Don’t ask.”

“But I am asking.” Ford pressed, turning on his side to watch Bill tear the grass from the ground.

“Weren’t you the one who said ‘sometimes we do things that we might not like that end up being good for us’?” Bill grew a third arm to appropriately make air quotations around Stanford’s past phrasing.

“Yes, but I said that about a date with Susan Wentworth, not about whatever you’ve been doing.” Ford clarified.

“Why did you think that would be good for you?” Bill snorted, raising his brow sceptically.

“I thought it would help me get over my obsession with you.” Ford laughed, flicking the daisy he was plucking at to the side.

“Yeah, and how did that work out being ‘good’ for you again?” Bill rolled his eye, making air quotes again.

“Well, back then it helped me realise that a date with Susan Wentworth was probably a bad idea.” Ford conceded. “And that I should probably stop pretending I didn’t care about you. But when you phrase it like that, I suppose I should have stuck with Susan and cut my losses.”

“You wouldn’t dare.” Bill’s eye flashed red, glaring at Ford in an instant.

Ford barked a laugh at the triangle’s possessive reaction. Realising Ford was teasing him, Bill simmered down, his bricks turning yellow again, though he didn’t stop glaring at his human.

“I can only imagine how dismally boring my life would be if I ever settled for someone else like that.” Ford admitted, rolling onto his back, pillowing his hands behind his head.

“When you’ve had the best why settle for less?” Bill quipped, watching Ford get comfortable.

“I like that you seem to think you’re the best. The worst would be more accurate.” Ford teased.

“You’re the worst.” Bill shot back childishly.

“That will be your legacy. ‘He was the worst’ they’ll say.” Ford swiped his hand through the air dramatically, grinning still.

“Like you’re any better.” Bill scoffed, ripping more grass from the ground.

“Well, if we’re going to tally things on a moral scale, then I have attempted to murder far fewer people than you have.”

“Pfft. Like that counts for anything.” Bill waved his hand dismissively.

“In terms of moral high ground, I’d say I’m doing much better than you.” Stanford boasted.

Bill gave him a flat look. “Bold words for someone willing to kidnap the person you were obsessing over, and then force them into a meat cage so you could satisfy your fantasies.”

“I don’t – I didn’t do that.” Ford protested, spluttering. “You’re twisting what happened to make me look bad.”

“I’m calling it like it is and that’s not even skimming the surface of your moral misdeeds, so maybe you shouldn’t be throwing stones, hmm?” Bill retorted smoothly. “Morality is relative anyway, but for your sake we won’t touch on relatives.”

While they were talking again, and it was more satisfying than being alone, there was a different flavour to their interactions now. Neither one of them seemed sparing of venomous words, the wedge the betrayal drove between them widening their sphere of interactions.

Stanford couldn’t spare the same doting pretences he had with his muse before since Bill had put a bounty on his head and pushed him down the stairs. And Bill seemed less inclined to tolerate Ford’s patronising morality plays since Ford incinerated his body, humiliated him in front of his henchmen, and ghosted him for ten months.

Despite all that had come between them though, they were still here, seeking one another out, craving that shared company.

Ford plucked another daisy from the ground and passed it to Bill this time. “You never did tell me why you started taking on deals you don’t want.”

“I’ve had to do a lot of unsavoury things since your stunt with the portal. Deals fell through and that’s not good for me.” Bill revealed, accepting the daisy from Ford as he spoke. “Making up for that, on top of organising an interdimensional man hunt takes more effort than I care for.”

“I must be quite the inconvenience for you.” Ford surmised, somehow pleased about it.

“Don’t get me started.” Bill said wryly, spinning the daisy around, before he began to pluck the petals as Ford had been doing.

“You know, for a while there I thought you wouldn’t come back.” Ford admitted, honest for a vulnerable moment. “You didn’t show up in my mindscape and I thought you’d had enough and given up on me.”

“You insult me, expect me to come running back despite that, and then throw a ten-month hissy fit because I didn’t show up one time.” Bill tore a petal off the daisy. “Real mature. Heaven forbid I take a break from having books hurled at me and being treated like garbage.”

“And here I thought that you just didn’t want to see me.” Ford remarked lightly.

“And you clearly didn’t want to see me.” Bill huffed and pulled another petal from the flower. “The ten months says it all.”

“I was angry.” Ford admitted.

“And I’m not allowed to be?” Bill questioned, looking up at Ford.

Ford shifted on his elbows awkwardly. “That’s different.”

“I don’t think so.”

Ford churned on that thought, his stubbornness unwilling to concede equality to Bill given his numerous crimes. However, his conscience made him very aware that he was being hypocritical, and that was just as grating.
The part of him that could always find time to extend empathy for Bill’s situation was jumping up and down, reminding him of how unfair he was being, but he didn’t want to hear it.

“You know, I was almost tempted to show up here wearing that skin suit, looking how you liked me before.” Bill admitted, plucking more petals from the daisy.

Ford looked up at Bill, surprised. “Why?”

“Well, in my experience, people find it harder to hurt a shape they can empathise with.” Bill pinched the stem of the flower and let flames rise up from his fingertips, burning the daisy to dust in an instant. “And not that hard at all to hurt something different.”

“You think I can’t empathise with you like this?”

“You don’t understand this.” Bill flicked away the burning flower, before gesturing to himself.

“Well, maybe I’d like to if you’d ever let me.” Ford countered, somewhat surly.

“That’s rich. Until you can acknowledge that I actually have emotions, I’m not inclined to show you anything about me. Not until I get some assurances that you won’t be a bull in a china shop with what I show you.” Bill stared at Ford intently. “Until you can acknowledge that you’re not the authority on who feels things, then you get nothing. Until you apologise.”

“Apologise?” Ford leaned his head back, almost scoffing at the notion. Yet Bill’s gaze stayed firm, stubborn.

The dream began to fade at the edges and the last image Ford managed to pull through to consciousness was Bill’s judgemental eye.

Stewing on his most recent dream, Ford took his meal tray to his favoured table in the back corner of the room and pushed the remainder of his food around on the plate.

Why should he apologise? Shouldn’t Bill apologise for, essentially, ruining Ford’s life? Where was Stanford’s apology from him? Acting like the triangle had any sort of moral high ground was laughable, absolutely ludicrous, but Ford’s conscience had to admit that maybe he had a point.

Maybe Stanford’s unwillingness to apologise was the barrier between how they were interacting now and how Ford wanted them to interact.

Bill had been reserved, and quite cold to him, obviously still furious that Ford had evaded him for so many months. He was holding back on Ford and Ford was used to the luxury of his muse giving him everything. It was incongruous that Ford still demanded it now without expecting to give anything in return, and if all he had to give was an apology, well…

Looking up from his musing briefly, Stanford saw Sandeep, En, and Quinlar sit on the table opposite him, talking jovially between themselves.

They had been withholding their company from him too, forming part of the reason Ford turned back to his muse, the loneliness smothering him. He wanted what he used to have, that reassuring understanding that he wasn’t alone no matter where he was.

Maybe Ford could do what Bill wanted him to, perhaps he could apologise to move things along, after all it was just lip service, just words really. But before he could bring himself to swallow his pride and apologise to Bill, it was clear he needed practise.

Picking up his tray, Ford stood up decisively and walked over to En’s table. The chatter between the three crew members paused when Stanford walked by, and the three of them looked up expectantly at him.

Ford licked his lips awkwardly and looked directly at En.

“I wanted to apologise to you. I – I’m no authority on who feels what. I wasn’t being fair to you before and I hurt your feelings.” Ford swallowed, forcing himself to say the actual words. “And I’m sorry.”

En regarded Ford for a moment, no doubt scanning him for sincerity if the robot was capable of such a thing.

“Apology accepted.” En’s face plate brightened into a kind smile. “Would you like to sit with us?”

Sandeep and Quinlar exchanged a knowing glance, assuming Ford would jump at the chance now his apology was being rewarded.

“Actually, I have somewhere else to be.”

At that, Stanford turned on his heel, dumped his food tray in the recycling units, and strolled out the door with that same spring in his step.

His crewmembers watched him leave, confused, before Quinlar shrugged.

“At least he apologised.”

Having snuck into one of the scavenger pods in the ship’s garage, Ford finally had the sort of privacy he preferred for his dreaming, stealing more of Sandeep’s sleeping pills to knock himself out sufficiently to deliver his apology.

“So, he is capable of manners and playing nice.” Bill applauded his apology sarcastically. “Who’d have guessed. Well ‘I’m sorry’ was good. What other tricks can you do? I bet a ‘please’ would be fetching from you.”

“Please.” Ford scoffed, rolling his eyes. “I don’t know why I thought you’d graciously accept my apology. It’s much more fun for you to mock it.”

“I’m not mocking, I’m being serious.” Bill’s hands rested below his eye, and he slanted forward, like he was laying on his belly, kicking his legs in the air behind him. “Pleading is a very good look for you. Next time try it on your hands and knees.”

“Of course, that’s your takeaway from this.” Ford gave Bill a reproachful look, setting his hands on his hips. “Tell me, are all Gods this obtuse?”

“I am a perfect equilateral, I’ll have you know.” Bill countered, offended. “There’s nothing obtuse about me.”

Ford rolled his eyes at Bill’s geometrical counter but paused to consider something he’d been dwelling on. “Are you not like other gods, or are other gods not like you?”

Bill blinked at Ford, making his answer deliberately elusive. “Both. Neither.”

“But you collect worship, yes?” Ford rubbed his chin, hesitant to broach this particular topic. “But you’ve never –“ “Never what?” Bill stopped kicking his legs, paying closer attention to the anxiety hiding in Ford’s words.

Ford paused for a moment, struggling until he just came out and said it.

“You’ve never hurt me for it.”

Bill blinked at Ford again, staring intently at him, trying to understand where this correlation came from.

“It’s just – I met someone with scars all over their body, and they –“

“They had the worship carved out of them.” Bill deduced, looking unimpressed. “Huh.”

“Is that normal?” Ford had to ask, still appalled at what must have happened to Sandeep.

“It’s frequent, but that doesn’t make it normal.” Bill seemed to frown, his eye furrowing and he rested his hands together in front of him. “It’s a popular gimmick with little reward because the punch line is that it doesn’t work.”

“It doesn’t work?” Ford puzzled, aghast, trying to understand why anyone would do that to someone else, trying to comprehend some reason other than ardent sadism.

“Worship has to be willingly given.” Bill explained, his distaste for the practise leaking into his tone. “The same way a confession through torture is inadmissible, the lip service someone will give to save their skin doesn’t do anything. It doesn’t count. They don’t mean it. They can shout to high heaven that their captor is their god, but at the end of the day, they aren’t grateful to their false ‘god’. They’re just glad the pain stopped. Or will stop. Eventually. It doesn’t do anything and all that suffering amounts to nothing. Not one drop of genuine power. The ‘gods’ who do it are just waving around the fact that they can. It’s tacky and tasteless, but not in the good way.”

“That’s –“ Ford was disgusted, his gaze averted, thinking about the pain and suffering Sandeep must have gone through since he was ten years old and knowing that pain was for nothing, that it was more of a fashion statement if Bill’s ‘tacky and tasteless’ comment was to be believed.

“Compensatory is what that is.” Bill scoffed, picking at his nails. “How weak do you have to be when your power play is picking on people beneath you? If you wanted to show true strength, you’d go after the bigshots, and bring them down a peg or two. That’s how you rattle the cosmos.”

“But you marked my skin, didn’t you?” Ford held his hand up to his chest, above the tattoo on his pectoral, revealing the insecurity that motivated this particular line of questioning. “That wasn’t –“
“That was a gift.” Bill revealed, his eye drawn to Ford’s hand, held over the mark on his chest. “I didn’t take anything from you, or from your skin. I gave you something that I didn’t have to give. Think of it like one of those commitment rings, or – what was it they had at your school that everyone thought was such a big deal? Class rings?”

Ford remembered the class rings. At the time he never really understood why they were such a big deal, but perhaps that was because he had no one to share his with. His stomach twisted in strange ways, thinking that this was Bill’s class ring equivalent.

“That mark was me deciding you were special, for all the good it did.” Bill added, scowling at Ford’s chest.

Ford rubbed his hand on his shirt, over the tattoo, relieved in a roundabout way to have his worth confirmed.

Since he saw Sandeep’s scars, he was worried that the mark that had given him such comfort was a brand, or a twisted way of eeking power from him, like the scars in Sandeep’s skin were. Doubt had made him bitter, made him want to scratch the tattoo from his skin. He’d felt that way before as well, but he never could damage the tattoo. It was permanent, it would be with him forever.

His stomach flipped with guilt now that he realised what the mark was and what it had been when Bill had given it to him.

A declaration of Bill’s feelings. His commitment. What his muse hadn’t said in words, he tried to prove to Ford, to make assurances in his own love language. Bill made a deal that was, at the time, entirely for Ford’s benefit. He’d given him a gift that he didn’t have to.

He decided to keep him. He trusted him.

And the very next day, Ford took all of that and threw it back in Bill’s face.

Bill looked almost melancholy, bitter and resigned the longer he stared at Ford’s hand held over his heart.

“Why did you do it?”

The guilt stoppered Ford’s throat, and he felt a pain in his chest that he thought he had justified away in the past ten months.

“I...”

“What, you just decided to turn on me? When everything was fine, more than fine?” Bill couldn’t help the interrogation, wanting the answers he’d been denied. “Things were great, you got everything you wanted. We made a deal, and you were mine, and you trusted me and said you loved me, but it only took a day. Not even that.”

Ford’s mind looped over that fateful day. He still felt guilty for that, for the way he left Bill, contented and warm, cuddled up in his blankets. Ford remembered vividly, kissing Bill’s forehead as he slipped out of bed to fetch groceries for their breakfast, and the way Bill had smiled in his sleep at that, trusting Ford as well.

Things were perfect between them that morning and then within the space of a day, Stanford flipped his perspective so abruptly that by midday he was committed to banishing the love of his life.
“Why did you do it?” Bill demanded, glaring at Ford now, wanting an answer.

“I – I found out what you did to –“ Ford stammered, floundering.

“You didn’t for a second stop to doubt it? To think that I might have had a reason? To hear out my side of things before you bled out a banishing spell on the floor? You planned it.” Bill accused.

“I didn’t plan it.” Ford denied, knowing how it looked. The spell was intricate, and Willow’s involvement with the bags of salt was certainly incriminating, but this wasn’t something Stanford had known he was going to do before the moment he did it.

“But you did it anyway. You didn’t stop to think, even for a moment, that this being you supposedly ‘love’, your god, your partner, was anything other than a monster. You were either planning it, or you flipped on a dime, and I want to know why.”

“I didn’t plan it – I –“ Ford debated with himself whether he owed Bill an honest answer, or whether he wanted to save face rather than admit his own weakness. “I was shown a vision of what you did and at first I didn’t want to believe it, but then I saw Fiddleford’s erased memory and all the evidence seemed to point to you … not being what I thought you were.”

“Well, if you’d seen the condition you were in, you’d agree with me that Specs deserved a little fright.” Bill looked back down at his nails, flicking spectral dirt out from under them, before giving Stanford an unimpressed look. “I’ve never seen someone defend internal bleeding so vehemently. If you could be bothered to remember the size of those bruises, you wouldn’t be so quick to defend someone who pushed you down the stairs.”

“Because you haven’t pushed me down the stairs before.” Ford pointed out cattily.

“Since we were sharing a body, it could be argued that you pushed me down the stairs as well.” Bill added smoothly, raising his brow at Ford.

Ford didn’t know what to say to that, because a part of him suspected that had been true. Ford had wanted to lash out at Bill then and, at that time, hurting himself was the best way to get to him. As much as he blamed Bill for that, he couldn’t deny that he had wanted to stop Bill through any means necessary, even if other means may have been available.

“Death threats aren’t ‘a little fright’ Bill.” Ford had to add reproachfully, clawing back the moral high ground.

“So, sue me, I got a little… worked up.” Bill waved his hand through the air and shrugged the threat to Fiddleford off like it was nothing. “Threats are just words with no follow through. You didn’t rip me from my vessel because I said something you didn’t agree with, I’ve been saying things you hate from the moment you bound me in that sack of skin. That’s not why you did it.”

“But I saw –“ Ford began again, referring to the vision.

“What exactly did you see and how do you know it wasn’t doctored?” Bill questioned swiftly. “Every perspective has an agenda, and I’ve been meaning to ask how exactly someone else got in your head like that, and more so – why you’d believe them over me?”

“Well –“ Ford fumbled, uncertain he should be telling Bill about the ring the fortune teller gave him, already feeling like enough of an idiot for putting it on and letting the voice in the ring take him for such a ride, only to abandon him when Bill was out of the picture. He couldn’t deny that the ring had an agenda, that much was clear given the radio silence the ring provided after making Stanford do its dirty work. But why he believed it so quickly, well, that was a different matter.
“Well, how can I be certain you’d be telling me the truth then, if anything can be doctored. How would I know you wouldn’t be lying if you told me what I saw wasn’t true?”

“That depends on what you saw. But if you want honesty, then it’s tit for tat. I’ll be honest if you tell me why you actually turned on me.” Bill offered.

“I – you go first.” Ford insisted. “Did you really destroy that planet?”

Bill surveyed Ford closely, weighing up Ford’s reaction, before he decided to be succinct. “Yes. It was a deal I didn’t like and the dealer was trying to twist my arm.”

“Into destroying a planet?” Ford clarified sceptically.

“That’s what they asked for. Although, if you heard what was being said, I did my best to dissuade that from happening, but some idiots don’t learn.” Bill remarked disdainfully.

“I didn’t hear anything.” Ford admitted. “Just you laughing.”

“Well, there you go.” Bill frowned, Ford confirming his suspicions. Whoever showed Ford what happened on Lama Szlam deliberately tried to make him look bad. Sure, blowing up a planet was bad enough, but context softened the blow some.

“So, with these deals, you have to do them?” Ford reasoned, trying to figure Bill out. “What does that make you? A demon?”

“Oh, name calling. Real nice.” Bill snarked, rolling his eye.

“Are you a demon?” Ford pressed, genuinely trying to work out what Bill was. “You never did like the salt circles.”

“Sixer, if salt was an issue, do you think I would have eaten all those pistachios?” Bill reminded Ford snippily.

Ford frowned, remembering the jar of salted pistachios Bill had demolished. “You even ate the shells.”

“If you’re done asking pointless questions, maybe you could make with the honesty yourself.” Bill pressed. “Why did you do it? Why did you really turn on me so quickly, overnight? Why?”

Ford sucked in a deep breath, steeling himself for his answer. He could have continued to make excuses, to blame the evidence, to put the blame on anything other than himself, but Bill hadn’t lied to him like he assumed he would. It was only fair he extended that same honesty.

“You – from the moment I first summoned you, you have to understand. I couldn’t believe that it worked. I couldn’t believe that I actually had you with me. And then things kept getting better, the adventures through the forest, the things you showed me, you. Everything kept going so much better than I expected, I – you relaxed around me and started to enjoy yourself, and you were more forthcoming with things, and then you – you began to like me back – I - ”

Ford’s voice caught in that last sentence, and the steely glare Bill began this interrogation with softened, wistfulness and fondness causing his eye to widen, staring at Ford like he was less of a hindrance now and more of a wonder.

“Everything that we had, every moment with you, every happy moment, every brilliant wonderful wretched moment that I loved you I kept thinking it was all just too good to be true. I kept waiting for something to go wrong, because of course it would go wrong. Every single time in my life I’ve had something I wanted, every single time it blows up in my face. Whether it’s finding toffee peanuts by my science project, or watching you blast your way through a planet.”

Ford ran his hand through his hair, the truth wrenching out of him painfully. His voice was thick with emotion as the words kept flowing, unable to stop now the truth had outed itself.

“The instant I found out, as much as I didn’t want to believe it, something just clicked. I thought, of course, Stanford. Of course, it was all too good to be true. Of course, you can’t have this. What on earth made you think you ever could?”

Ford sighed, having emptied himself of the neurotic awful truth that forced him in a position so darkly laced with regrets. Being honest with himself was brutal, it was no wonder he tried to avoid it so often. He felt like he just wrung himself out in front of Bill, every self-pitying, faulty facet of logic he used to justify his decision painting him as badly as he felt.

“So that’s why.” He concluded, looking up from his lap at his muse.

He was surprised to see Bill’s eye furrowed with sympathy and sadness, rather than scowling with fury at his weakness. Ford hadn’t anticipated that Bill would understand.

“You know, I had so many opportunities to tell you what the portal was really for. I had people pushing me to tell you and maybe if I did, everything wouldn’t have ended up like it did.” Bill confessed.

“Why didn’t you?” Ford questioned quietly.

“I was doing what you did. Savouring the moment. I know good things can’t last and I was too stupid and selfish and happy to bite the bullet.” Bill huffed a bitter laugh.

Ford’s eyes widened, realisation hitting him. Bill really did understand.

The universe never lets me have what I want. Bill had said back then, holding onto Ford, unwilling to let him go.

He didn’t want to lose him. Just as Ford didn’t want to lose what he had, and was bitterly disappointed, but barely surprised, when he did. Bill was in the exact same situation as Ford was, only he knew the entire time that this happiness wouldn’t last. And he clung to that happiness, that double edged sword, until his hands bled, knowing he was doomed to fail but holding on anyway.

Ford leaned closer to where Bill was hovering beside him, looking at the triangle, seeing Bill’s sincerity in the way he looked down, not meeting Ford’s gaze, ashamed of his own weakness.

“We really were happy, weren’t we?” Ford murmured, tracing his eyes across Bill’s features, just as enthralled with the God in the shape he was in now as he was with the handsome man he had crafted the muse to be. Bill’s shape had never been the issue, Ford had always been smitten with the mind within it.

Bill was still looking away, his silence saying it all. Too lost in bitterness to look at the scientist, he was surprised when he felt Sixer’s lips press against his bricks, accompanied by the familiar shot of worship.

Bill’s eye shot open and he stared at Ford, shocked.

“Is this -?” Ford faltered awkwardly, still wanting the same closeness with his muse, stunned by his own forwardness. “Is this ok?”

Bill blinked at Ford, astounded, before his arms stretched out long to hold Ford’s face. Bill closed his eye, and Ford found his instinctive response to the uncanny rearing back, but he held still as Bill’s eye became two lips, his eyelashes brushing against Ford’s skin as his eye closed and parted plush, pressing a responding kiss to his cheek.

Ford took a moment to process this new development, if the weirdness of it all was too much for him. Then again, it was about as weird as anything else in his life right now.

Pushing aside his reservations, Ford turned his head, and met Bill’s lips with his own.

Just like before, Bill’s lips were warm, startlingly so, but what made Ford so eager was that zing of power, that electrifying spark of godly essence that felt so utterly Bill.

His hands reached out to cup his muse in his hands, pulling him closer as Bill kissed back.

It felt strange, holding Bill in his hands. He expected the bricks to be coarse or scratchy, but his surface was smooth like gold bars, polished and slick.

Bill was thin, barely an inch in width, and while the muse was small and slender, he felt surprisingly strong and solid.

Ford’s fingertips pressed against Bill’s back as he kissed him and felt no give to his surface, but the gold bricks were hot and tingly, like Bill’s lips were.

But Bill’s lips were soft, moulding themselves to Ford, quite unlike his body, hard, immovable metal, yet somehow still feeling alive and malleable.

Ford was captivated, oddly captivated. He continued to kiss Bill, their kiss becoming as passionate and familiar as their kisses used to be, making out like teenagers in the mind once more.

Ford could feel Bill’s small hands smoothing against Ford’s cheeks, gripping at his hair. He opened his eye a smidgeon to observe Bill’s thin black legs, one leg popping up behind him like a damsel in a romance film.

Ford smiled in the kiss, closing his eyes again, knowing that despite the many lies and falsehoods between the two of them, there was one thing that was clearly true.

They were besotted with each other. For better or for worse.

Ford’s kisses became less chaste, pressing open mouthed kisses to Bill’s eye, and he was momentarily surprised when his tongue was met with another.

Not pausing too long to question it, Ford let his own tongue tangle with what he supposed was Bill’s approximation of one, although he didn’t want to think too long on why Bill had a tongue in his eye. Part of Ford wondered what else was in there, but his curiosity was allayed by Bill’s contented moans and sighs, tangling his tongue with Ford, tasting the scientist’s dreams again.

Ford wondered when they’d stop, when he’d wise up and realise that shoving your tongue down your enemy’s throat was a bad idea, but they weren’t exactly enemies right now, and Bill wasn’t stopping, so neither was Ford.

Ford gripped Bill’s bricks tighter and thrust his tongue into Bill’s eye, his desire for dominance surfacing in the dream. However, Ford should have realised that now everything was on the table, just because he wanted Bill to demure to him, that didn’t mean that he would, and Bill tried to do the same to Ford, but his tongue was suddenly much longer, thrusting forward, filling Ford’s mouth, tickling the back of his throat.

Breaking away, Ford gasped, and blinked in the strange sight of Bill’s long black tongue licking at those lips of his, before disappearing between them, his lips pressing together and thinning until Bill opened his eye to stare at Ford, his pupil dilated, clearly as flustered by the kiss as Stanford was.

“Huh.” Ford stared back, panting.

A knock sounded out across the dream, sounds from the waking world travelling into Ford’s subconscious.

Ford looked up at the sound, noting how the dream began to fade around the edges. He was waking up.

“I’ll see you tomorrow night?” Ford questioned, wanting to revisit this interesting avenue again.

Bill looked like he was melting at the edges, the gold on his bricks slipping down him in expressive droplets.

“I’ll take that as a yes?” Ford clarified and continued to watch Bill melt into a puddle of gold on the floor.

A thin black arm rose from the pile of gold goop and Bill gave Ford a weak thumbs up that made the scientist laugh.

He woke up with a smile on his face.

“I heard you were found sleeping in one of the scavenger pods. Is there a reason for that?” Sandeep queried, sitting across from Ford in his bunk, getting ready for bed.

Ford paused, and continued to divest himself of his socks, rolling them up and placing them in his knapsack. “I prefer privacy when I sleep. I’ve found it quite difficult to sleep out in the open, in a big group like this.”

“Ah, so that is why you’ve been taking my sleeping pills.” Sandeep nodded to himself, rubbing his chin thoughtfully.

Stanford looked up for a beat, Sandeep’s words setting in, the guilt clear across Ford’s face.

“I do not mind.” Sandeep clarified, waving his hand to allay Ford’s guilt. “I know what it’s like to struggle to sleep. We all have our demons.”

Sandeep didn’t know how right he was. Ford scratched the back of his neck and inclined his head with an awkward smile.

“Did you run out of your own pills?” Sandeep pressed politely.
“I – yes.” Ford lied, closing his knapsack up furtively, hoping the sleep suppressant pills within wouldn’t rattle too obviously. “I’ll have to pick up more when we next make port.”

“We’re due to dock in Xakaar in two weeks. I don’t mind sharing with you until you can pay me back.” Sandeep smiled kindly, and passed his pill bottle over to Stanford, shaking two pills out onto the palm of his hand. “A good night’s sleep is a true commodity. I see no reason to dally with nightmares a second longer than needed.”

“Right.” Ford replied, rolling the pills across his palm with his thumb, choosing not to mention how eager he was to dally with this particular nightmare, if he could call Bill that.

Sandeep screwed the lid back on the pill bottle and set it on the bedside before watching Ford, a sympathetic mien to his features.

“Should you ever wish to talk about your past, there are people who would be happy to listen to you, if you ever wished to open up about your experiences. I can tell from the pills that you’ve suffered, but speaking with En and Quinlar has helped me a great deal with putting my past behind me. Trusting others to listen with empathy and understanding has been a blessing. Perhaps you would benefit from it too.”

“Thank you for that.” Ford responded politely, although he had no plans to actually take Sandeep up on his offer. That would be ridiculous. “And the pills.”

Sandeep nodded, watching Ford gulp down water, throwing the pills back and immediately laying down on his side, waving abruptly over his shoulder at the scarred man. He’d never seen a man so eager for sleep.

“Well, goodnight!”

Sandeep raised his eyebrows, and lay down on his own cot, amused. “Sleep well.”

“Where are you?”

Ford rolled his eyes. “I’m not telling you. I wish you’d stop asking, I’ve told you to stop. Stop trying to guess.”

“Are you underwater?” Bill asked, amusement clear in his tone.

“Am I -?” Ford squinted at Bill, baffled, propping himself up onto his elbows to look at the triangle, hovering in between Stanford’s legs, his arms wound long around Ford’s thighs, more arms than Ford deemed necessary sprouting from Bill’s sides, feeling up as much of Ford as he could.

The longer Ford stared at Bill, trying to comprehend why on Earth the muse would guess he was ‘underwater’ the longer Bill waggled his brow at Ford, waiting for him to get the joke.

“Because you’ve been having a lot of wet –”

“Stop it! God!” Ford groaned, covering his eyes with his hands, despairing of his choice in partner.
“I can’t believe I willingly spend time with you.”

He could feel Bill’s long dextrous tongue idly licking along his inner thigh, clearly too entertained to take offence.

Ford moved his hands away from his eyes to peek down at Bill curiously.

He found out recently what else was in that eye mouth of Bill’s. Teeth. Sharp rows of teeth, and he bore the mental marks of a cheeky bite Bill made on his inner thigh, the bite marks bleeding slightly in the dream. Ford was lucky none of this could transfer over to his waking body, leaving nothing incriminating to implicate him for his weakness. Bill was lazily licking the oozing blood, his arms wrapped possessively around Ford’s body.

Ford wasn’t as opposed to the bite as he thought he would be, pain registering differently when it refracted around his mind, existing only as a dream. His brain seemed to respond to imagined pain the same way it responded to arousal, or other strong sensations, that tingly warm feeling soaking through his spine and curling in his stomach when the feeling reached its peak. It was easier to enjoy pain when he knew it was no threat to him.

Ford supposed he should be opposed to Bill inflicting pain on him for the principle of the matter, but his principles mattered less and less when the catharsis was this good. Being with Bill was a painful reminder of his mistakes, and oddly enough, that pain lessened when he felt these raw sensations, and he found himself liking it more than he should.

Ford reached down and tried to unwind Bill’s arm from around his leg, wanting to move, but Bill’s arm stretched out longer, winding around his wrist before pinning it to the floor, the triangle intent on his mission to lick Ford all over it seemed.

“Bill.” Ford sighed, and wriggled a little, trying to free his wrist.

“Mmmm?” Bill hummed, his eye still closed, tongue digging into the small bleeding marks on Ford’s thigh, trying to lap up every drop of blood.

“If you’re going to do this, at least unwind and let me move a little.” Ford complained, mostly for the sake of complaining at this point. He thrilled himself when he had the pleasure of pinning Bill down back when he inhabited a body, and he didn’t want to admit that it was just as titillating when the shoe was on the other foot. “Hands off.”

Bill’s tongue slid back into his mouth, and he opened his eye to stare at him, before his eye curved upwards into a smile. “Sure Sixer.”

Ford tried not to shiver at the sensation of Bill’s hands creeping back, letting his arms shrink down, Bill’s nails scraping along every bit of skin they passed as they reeled back along Ford’s body.

When his hands had completed their looping, Bill held his hands in the air in front of him, as if to prove he’d stopped touching.

Ford moved to sit up, but as he moved, he heard Bill click, and he looked down to discover thick, glowing blue manacles weighing down his wrists and ankles, radiant blue chains pinning Ford to the ground regardless.

“Look, no hands.” Bill grinned, waggling his fingers at Ford, delighted.

“Ugh, Bill –“ Ford griped, trying not to let it show how his pulse fluttered at this new addition.
The triangle floated up Ford’s torso and looped his arms around Ford’s neck lazily. “Chains are a good look for you.”

Ford huffed, his cheeks pinking, as he looked down at Bill’s adoring gaze. “Of course, you’d say so.”

“Well, I’d know best.” Bill quipped, stroking Ford’s face gently. “You can’t say you wouldn’t do the same, if the tables were turned. I can tell.”

“You think everyone sinks to your level?” Ford rebutted, teasing Bill.

“What were those bricks, if not fancy chains? What about the experiments? And the blindfolds?” Bill reminded Ford, his warm surface resting on Ford’s chest, smooth heated gold keeping Ford grounded.

“Turnabout’s fair play, is that it?” Ford guessed, raising his eyebrow at the God.

“Where can you fulfil your wildest fantasies, if not in dreams? Note, I said your fantasies. Face it, Sixer, you love this.” Bill’s eye lidded, his gaze equally smug and fond.

“I thought you couldn’t read my thoughts.”

“I don’t have to.” Bill’s eye curved with glee. “It’s written all over your face.”

Ford’s blush intensified, and he looked up at the starry ceiling of his mindscape, unwilling to give Bill the satisfaction.

“What else do you want, I wonder?” Bill hummed, more arms sprouting from his sides to gently caress Ford’s arms and torso.

“Well, I’m sure you’ll tell me.” Ford quipped.

“Hmm.” Bill looked him over, before clicking his fingers. “I know what you’re missing.”

Ford swallowed, feeling the tightness around his neck as the glowing blue collar settled on him like it belonged there. It made Ford’s stomach flip, the tingly material it was made from feeling like Bill’s vibrating frequency, resonating power.

He tried to hide how aroused this situation was making him, surprising himself with the strength of this reaction, feeling like he had when Bill first told him he owned him, right after their first deal, with his hand wrapped around Ford’s cock.

This is mine now. It belongs to me, along with the rest of you. I can do what I like with it.

“Much better.” Bill drew back, taking in the beautiful picture Ford presented, bound naked on the floor with glowing blue chains, loving every second of it. Conjuring a chain leading from the front of the collar to Bill’s hand, Bill yanked on the collar, jerking Ford’s arousal around with it. Pushing the scientist’s buttons, Bill simmered. “Now, who do you belong to?”

Ford panted and strained against his restraints, not to get away, but to surge upward, to move closer to Bill, to capture his muse as thoroughly as his muse had captured him, wanting his hands on the god yet cruelly denied.

Bill was watching his struggles, delighted, but made no move to float forward, giving Ford what he wanted. He wouldn’t, not until Sixer said the magic words.
Ford squirmed, unfairly aroused, before he bit the words out, capitulating.

“I’m yours.”

Bill glowed, sighing contentment, before he began to grow, the words filling him with satisfaction until he was towering over Ford, bringing his hands down to caress Ford’s body, his fingertips as big as Ford’s generous six-fingered fist, tracing down his abdominals with dedication.

“Oh, I’ve missed this.”

And at that, Bill surged forward to give Ford exactly what he wanted.

Ford didn’t have to eat alone anymore, and since his attitude had brightened considerably now he started seeing his muse again, he was actually pleasant to be around.

Biting into what appeared to be some sort of purple kumquat, Ford listened to his new friends speak.

“I mean, sure I can hotwire a pod with the best of them, but that’s not why I came aboard for this mission.” Quinlar explained, grinning and clapping Sandeep on the shoulder. “There’s gotta be some form of security on this ship. Can’t leave you tech nerds alone to fend for yourselves.”

“Security?” Ford asked, with a mouthful of fruit in his cheek. “What would we need security for?”

“I mean, we do steal parts.” Sandeep conceded. “The Federation could –“

“Pfft.” Quinlar waved several of her arms dismissively. “The Federation knows what they leave hanging out here is fair game. Most they’d give us is a slap on the wrist, maybe a time out of the business. That’s nothing.”

“Quinlar helps keep the wolf from the door.” En declared with a pixelated smile.

“En likes idioms, a little habit of hers.” Sandeep explained to Ford, who picked up on the robot’s little linguistic quick.

“By ‘the wolf’ she means our competition.” Quinlar explained. “Other traders, part thieves, scrappers without a code. There are other agents that aren’t so scrupulous, and you know…”

“We’re low hanging fruit.” En nodded sagely. “There’s no honour among thieves.”

“Well, among other thieves.” Quinlar hastened to clarify. “I think for thieves, we’re pretty honourable. I mean, we do employee of the rotation, we recycle. We’re certainly not the worst of the worst.”

“And who is the worst of the worst?” Ford questioned with a concerned frown, taking another bite of the purple kumquat.

“Don’t worry about it.” Quinlar assured Ford, leaning her elbows on the table. “We probably won’t run into them. We’ll be fine. I mean, with me protecting all you nerds and this big old ship, how Ford considered this, humming thoughtfully, before finishing the kumquat.

Quinlar wouldn’t tell him, but Ford’s tendency for assuming the worst gave him a few ideas about who ‘the worst of the worst’ could be.

“So, I already know you’re fine with stealing. You stole from that one fellow who runs the market, and you were perfectly happy stealing uranium.”

Bill was sitting on one of the desks in the library, no larger than an apple this time, shrinking his size, drawing on the paper Ford had laid out for him.

Ford sat at the desk chair, overlooking Bill’s artistic endeavours, watching him manoeuvre Ford’s pencil, sketching what looked like a pair of equilaterals holding hands.

“You have a reputation for stealing then, I take it?”

“Sure, like an interdimensional Robin Hood.” Bill quipped bluntly, focussed on his drawing. He was giving the triangle on the left an office tie, not a bowtie, and seemed to take great care penning the image.

“Stealing from the rich and giving to the …” Ford questioned, waiting for Bill to fill the gap with something encouraging.

“Me.” Bill said simply.

“Hmm.” Ford hummed, taking that in. “And how often do you do that? Would you say your reputation proceeds you? Would people call you the worst of the worst?”

“Rude people.” Bill snorted, looking up from his drawing to squint at Ford. “Where is this coming from? Just because I shoplift the occasional oddity, that doesn’t make me some kind of monster.”

“I’m just trying to understand how you’re perceived.” Ford said lightly.

“You’re buying lies and trying to make them fit your reality. Don’t be fooled Sixer. I’m far from the worst thing out there.”

“Well, that’s comforting.” Ford remarked sarcastically, before tilting his head, looking down at the page where Bill was carefully penning small bows on the shoes of the triangle on the right. “What are you drawing?”

“Dead things.” Bill said flippantly, looking back down at the two triangles on the page, before scribbling all over them, blacking out their carefully penned forms with dark strokes of pencil lead.

“That’s nice.” Ford rolled his eyes at Bill’s deliberately edgy answer. Just like Ford struggled to admit when he was wrong, it seemed Bill struggled to be literal, preferring to say outrageous things rather than simply be truthful with Ford. Stanford wondered who the triangle was trying to impress with that attitude.
Bill put the pencil down and crossed his arms grumpily.

Ford extended his hands across the tabletop and attempted cup Bill in his hands, trying to trace his fingertip along Bill’s smooth side, endeared by how small Bill made himself now. Rather than floating around as big as a dinnerplate, or looming above Stanford to feel superior, Bill was tiny, like a handheld triangle. At least Ford was trying to hold Bill, but the triangle slapped Ford’s finger away.

“What’s wrong?” Ford frowned, disappointed, rubbing his fingertip with his thumb.

“Nothing’s wrong.” Bill replied evasively. Ford decided he didn’t have the patience to dig deeper, changing the topic.

“I’m curious about this form of yours, you know.” Ford remarked idly, reaching his finger out to stroke Bill’s side again, tempting fate, or at least another slap. “How much do you feel like this?”

“Too much.” Bill complained, scowling. Ford continued to stubbornly stroke along Bill’s side with his fingertip, distracting the triangle from his dour mood, until he gave Stanford a considering look.

“So, you’re sensitive?” Ford questioned, pushing his luck. He brought his other hand down on Bill’s other side, feeling the surface of the triangle, fingers gentle but probing.

Bill seemed to wiggle, uncertain if he was willing to let go of this prickly mood to allow Ford’s exploration. The whorls of Ford’s fingertips felt rough against the perfect smooth surfaces of his sides, making him feel more tingly than usual.

Bill looked up at Ford, his eyelashes brushing against Ford’s thumb.

“How do you work?” Ford murmured, mostly to himself at this point, his eyes glued to Bill’s small form, running his fingertips across Bill’s hard surface, looking for some give to it. “How does this work for you?”

“Feeling me up?” Bill questioned bluntly.

“You make me feel good. Is it so bad for me to want to know how to do the same for you? How does a triangle even …”

Ford’s determination to figure Bill out had his fingers tracing every brick’s crevice, his fingers scouring Bill’s surface, until he found his index finger searching around Bill’s underside, between those skinny little legs of his, searching for some sort of give.

Bill seemed to glow peachy and bright for a moment, like an alarm flashing, before he grew in size, his hands coming down to push Ford’s fingers away. “Woah there, Sixer.”

Ford absorbed that for a moment, before his frustration spoke for him, his brow furrowing with a frown instantly.

“That’s not fair.”

“The last time I let you put your hands on my body, you incinerated it. Forgive me if I’m a little hesitant to put myself in that position again.” Bill sneered, although his reaction seemed a little lacking, like he was hiding something. “I’m not an idiot.”

“You can’t hold that over my head forever and considering all the things I let you do after everything you’ve done – you can’t deny me a little exploration.” Ford argued.
“Can’t I?” Bill questioned spitefully.

“You know it isn’t fair. I didn’t agree to come back here for you to lord over me without any reciprocation. You can’t tell me you’re ‘not in the mood’. You owe me –”

“I don’t owe you anything.” Bill bit back.

“We had a deal.” Ford insisted stubbornly, gripping Bill in his hands firmly, wanting to get his way.

“The deal was that you were mine.” Bill snarled, pushing Ford’s fingers away. “Not the other way around.”

“You liar.” Ford gritted his teeth, trying to squeeze Bill tighter, the rejection making him mean. “What happened to keeping you, or didn’t you want that? You seemed pretty happy about it then, or was that a lie too? Such a liar. Too scared to give up control when you don’t have the bricks to blame. Scared of anything that might –”

“Stop!” Bill held out his hands, forcing the dream to bend to his will. Ford’s hands pulled back, suspended in the air, and his chair slid three feet across the room, away from Bill.

Ford watched, stunned, as he realised what Bill had done, having both figuratively and literally pushed Ford away from him.

“You are scared.” Ford voiced, stupidly pressing the issue. “Of letting me have this? I don’t –“

“Shut up! You don’t get to have it both ways!” Bill stressed, clenching his fists, staring at Sixer. “You don’t always get to have what you want all the time. You don’t always get your way, Sixer.”

“But –“ Ford floundered, knowing that Bill was right, but selfishness and frustration made him stubborn, almost manipulative. “But you said I’d be able to have everything that I want. Everything and anything.”

“You don’t get to have me, just to decide you don’t want me later down the track. You don’t get to just pick me up and put me down whenever you want. I’m not going to keep giving you everything just for you to throw it away the next day, like a moron.” The hurt was clear on Bill’s face, in the creases around his eye, and the angry tone of his voice. “You think I’m just supposed to be unaffected, to be above it all, all the time? I wish I was above it all, all of your self-serving egotistical ‘genius’ bullshit. You’re the dumbest genius ever!”

“Is this because of the sleep suppressants?” Ford questioned, indignant. “You put a bounty on my head.”

“Do you have any idea of how dangerous it is out here? You could die any second out there without someone looking out for you. That bounty was for your own good, you idiot!” Bill insisted, pointing at Ford with vehemence.

“Well, I’ve been doing just fine without a guardian, even with the bounty, no thanks to you.” Ford sneered.

“If you get in trouble, do you think I’m just going to drop everything to come to your beck and call? Do you think I take pleasure in jumping through hoops for an ingrate like you, who just takes what they want, and doesn’t give a damn about discarding me the moment I become too much for you?” Bill raised his voice, verging on shouting, floating over to Ford, his hands stiff by his sides, angry and worked up, sneering back at Ford. “Too much for your precious morals? If you can’t “handle me, you shouldn’t get to! You don’t deserve it.”

“Oh, that’s rich. I don’t deserve you. Well guess what? I don’t need you, and if this is how you’re going to act, then I’m clearly better off alone!” Ford shouted back, reflexively angry.

“FINE!” Bill yelled, his size booming out, massive in an instant, towering over Ford, the whites of his eye black, his pupil red with rage. “THEN BE ALONE!”

Ford opened his mouth to further the argument but was jarred by a loud clap of thunder within his mind, lightning momentarily blinding him. When he opened his eyes, squinting around his own head, Bill was gone.

Again.

And Ford was alone. With a bigger headache than before.

“Dammit.” Ford swore, kicking the desk chair away from him.

Why did he keep doing this?

Stanford’s sour mood was apparent and would have been apparent to anyone with a basic understanding of body language. En Pathi had a thorough understanding of body language across several species, and her understanding was comprehensive, not basic. So, it was no surprise when she hovered across the rec room to sit beside Ford, the first person to comment on his sour mood.

Naturally, Ford took offence.

“What’s wrong?”

“Why, are you scanning me again?” Ford hunched his shoulders, defensive.

“You’re sitting alone, you’re barely talking to anyone anymore, you were assembling that same communications system all day and you didn’t eat your dinner.” En pointed out pragmatically. “I didn’t have to scan you. It was obvious. Do you want to talk about it?”

“No, I don’t.” Ford scowled, being purposefully blunt. “Don’t you have other people with obvious problems to scan? I’m sure you have quite the selection on this ship.”

En considered Ford, before speaking. “You’re mean when you’re hurting, you know. You lash out, thinking no one’s hurting more than you, so it doesn’t matter what you say. It’s a selfish thing to do.”

Ford was thrown by the bluntness of her delivery. He looked up at her, surprised.

She merely shrugged, unapologetic. “Unsavoury behaviours can’t be corrected without acknowledging they exist. I imagine you’d rather not stay ignorant.”

Ford winced at her wording, knowing that how often he chose to stay ignorant of his impact on others, rather than owning up to how the things he said or did might hurt others.
It did hurt others.

It had been hurting them all along.

Hurting Stanley with his selfishness when he answered his postcard missive, dropping everything to help Ford, only for Ford to throw his dreams back in his face.

He’d hurt Bill, making it all about Stanford, from pulling Bill down from the cosmos to act as an assistant, to refusing to consider that the triangle might have reasons for holding himself back from Ford’s whims. Heck, if he’d have stopped to consider Bill’s feelings before barging onward, selfishly, he might have noticed Bill’s already melancholic mood before foisting himself on the god.

He could have avoided their argument, avoided many things, if he’d have stopped to consider other people’s feelings, instead of just focusing on himself, but he didn’t.

It was easier that way, focusing on himself, being selfish.

Even now, being so callously rude to the people who sheltered him on this ship. The people who befriended them. He was willing to make light of their suffering just to feel better about his own.

En was right, he had been selfish. For a very long time.

He didn’t know how to change that, so he fumbled out a quick apology.

“Sorry.”

“What’s wrong?” En persisted patiently.

“Nothing you’d understand.” Ford said quickly, before realising how demeaning that sounded. “I just mean it’s not really something I can talk about with – I – it’s –“ “Complicated?” En guessed.

“Yes. It’s complicated.” Ford nodded, grateful for the easy out she provided him.

“As an AI built from a variety of complex equations, engineering and decades of research, I think you’ll find I’m very capable of handling complicated. I’m designed to handle complicated.” En joked. “Or at least the children of complicated.”

“What do you do when those children don’t want to talk about their feelings? Or they lie about them? Or get mad about them? What do you do then?” Ford asked, looking for answers to his problems without explaining them implicitly.

En hummed, considering his question. “Well, usually I’ll scan them, and then I’ll distract them with a different topic that links back to their problem until they feel comfortable enough to open up about it. That method works best, I find. That’s where the idioms come in.”

“You really like your idioms, don’t you?”

“I just think they’re neat.” En smiled, the pixels on her face plate lighting up kindly.

Ford rolled his shoulders, and considered that, shaking his head with a small sigh. Looking up at the robot, a slight, generous smile gracing his features, he tried to meet her halfway.

“Do you have an idiom for me then?”
En’s face plate pixels vanished, and her face screen lit up blue, the blue creeping up her screen like her scan was loading, before she blinked her eyes open, regurgitating her idiom for Stanford.

“A bird may love a fish, but where would they live?”

Ford blinked at her, stunned.

Before he could open his mouth to say anything, a loud boom sounded out across the ship, as scrap parts, games and paraphernalia flew across the rec room, jostling the occupants inside, the spacecraft rocking sideways sharply.

Sirens began to sound out throughout the ship, and Ford could hear hissing and screaming from the corridors outside the rec room, the few crew members who stayed back late to relax looking about the room in fright.

“What’s happening?” Ford stood up, trying to regain his balance.

“I don’t know.” En worried, bringing her hands up to her head. “I just feel panic.”

Quinlar ran into the rec room, holding onto the doorframe with all four of her arms straining, searching for En and Stanford amidst the crowd, waving one of her arms urgently.

“Get out! Run, quickly. Get to the pods! Escape!”

“What’s happening?” One of the Angoleans on the other side of the room asked.

“We’re being commandeered. They’re on the ship! Just go!” Quinlar urged them. “I’ll protect you, I can hold them off.”

“Who - ?” Stanford pressed, wanting to know who they were up against. It couldn’t be Bill, could it? Would he do this?

“Pirates, they’re –“

Quinlar’s last words gurgled off. She looked down at her torso in shock, pink blood spurting out of her. A large shank of metal protruded up through her chest, running her through. Someone stabbed her from behind.

Wheezing a final, rattling breath, Quinlar’s body fell to the ground with a heavy thud, the life fleeing from all three of her eyes.

A sharp toothed, sharklike looking alien with beady wide set eyes stepped over Quinlar’s body, his long flowing coat dragging over her. The alien withdrew his sword from Quinlar’s back with a wet schlicking sound and pointed it at the assembled crewmembers left in the rec room.

“Now, there’s no need for introductions, is there?” The pirate quipped with a toothy grin. “If you don’t want to end up like your friend here, you’ll be good little cargo. Drop everything and turn and face the wall.”

Ford almost steeled himself to stand up against this shark-faced murderer, his hands fistng by his side, but more pirates began filling the room, entering behind their captain, pointing deadly looking ray guns at the room’s occupants. En gripped Ford’s arm, and shook her head slightly, raising her arms and backing up against the wall.

Reluctantly, Stanford did the same.
“EVERYTHING ON THIS SHIP IS OURS!” Crowed the captain victoriously, his fellow pirates whooping and cheering, as the captured scrap vandals backed up against the walls.

Ford turned to face the wall, resting his hands on the metal, and clenched his teeth, cursing his luck. One of the pirates poked him roughly in the back with his gun, herding the hostages, and Ford simply had to grit his teeth and bear it.

Just when he thought his luck couldn’t get any worse, he had to run into the worst of the worst.

How’s that for irony?

Chapter End Notes

Thank you for your patience! This chapter is dedicated to mkultra-part2 who helped me write Bill's tantrum in the middle there and has also been a wonderful bud, keeping me pumped and enthusiastic with their gorgeous genderswap drawings from the fic, and they've even written their own Billford fic, Mouthful of Diamonds, which I recommend for a good read.

Stanford Pines, eternal damsel in distress, take the stage. Even though our dear Sixer was a self absorbed sod for nearly the entire chapter, does he deserve to get kidnapped by pirates? Even worse, does he deserve to have to swallow his pride and ask Bill for help after their blow up argument? Such tough decisions for our favourite scientist.

Next chapter there will be big bads, blackmail, revenge, Ford gets his nose and his glasses broken, and Bill gets back what's his!
I hope you enjoy! Thank you for reading and commenting!
Did you see that man with a fat cigar? He just left his lunch with a belly full of lobster and caviar. He can choose the wine from a vintage year. He will drink champagne in his limousine, where the rest of the street can peer.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

All of the crew members were sitting on the floor in the rec room with their hands on their heads, held at gunpoint as the pirates commandeered the ship.

Any crewmembers who had been sleeping in the dormitories or working in other parts of the ship had been dragged into the rec room one by one, and Ford couldn’t help but notice that not everyone was being brought through.

He could hope that they were hiding, that they’d managed to evade capture somewhere on the ship but judging from the blood stains on the pirate’s clothing - splashes and splatters of colour that looked fresh and shiny - his hope started dwindling.

En was floating close to the ground beside Ford, pixelated tears running down her face screen as she stared at Quinlar’s lifeless body, kicked to the side of the door to let the pirates in and out with ease. Ford wondered why they hadn’t moved her body out of the room, but it was possible she was left there as a grizzly reminder of the fate that awaited anyone who tried to step out of line.

Ford thought back on his marksman practice, of all the training Bill had given him to stand up for himself in the interdimensional field but dodging flaming projectiles couldn’t have prepared him for this. The best that little exercise had done was to embellish Ford’s survival instinct and, right now, his best chance for survival was to keep his mouth shut and his head down.

He contemplated his chances if he were to shut his eyes and nod off for a brief moment, if it would be worth it to ask for help, to let Bill know he was in danger, to beg for a rescue. His stomach clenched when he remembered how they’d left their last meeting and how unlikely it was that Bill would actually come help him if he were to call.

If you get in trouble, do you think I’m just going to drop everything to come to your beck and call?

If there was ever a time for Bill to drop everything, it would be now, as this situation was most assuredly life threatening, but Ford didn’t know if he would want to live with the consequences of summoning his muse to his rescue. If he told Bill his location, certainly the god might come to help him, but then Bill would be physically here, all powerful, in the perfect position to snatch Ford up and limit his independent exploration of the cosmos.

Seeing Bill in the mindscape carried an element of safety for Ford, he knew he still held some of the power regarding what he would and wouldn’t tell Bill. He could set his limits. Inviting a being that could bend reality to his physical location would be tantamount to surrendering whatever control he’d scraped together these past two years and he wasn’t ready to allow Bill that much power over him.

Even if this was a life or death situation, which it was, given how indiscriminately these pirates seemed to be gunning down resisting crew members, Ford still couldn’t bring himself to surrendering his location to Bill, and that was as grating to Ford’s practicality as it was soothing to his ego.

He knew that calling Bill was an option, should things get worse, but he wasn’t entirely sure that Bill would come for him, after their last conversation.

Ford didn’t want to believe he was out of options.

There was a scuffle at the door to the rec room, and two pirates dragged a struggling Sandeep into the room, his hands tied behind his back with his scarves. They threw him onto the floor next to Ford and the other prisoners, laughing cruelly.

Sandeep seemed livid, his eyes burning with hatred through the slit in his scarves. He struggled to right himself, testing his restraints all the while.

“Is that all of them?” One of the pirates asked.

“One more sweep,” their captain insisted.

The pirates left to search for stragglers or survivors, leaving three pirates manning the door, guns still pointed at the captured crew.

“Sandeep.” En whispered, looking over to her captured friend. “Are you okay?”

“They should have killed me.” Sandeep swore, glaring at the pirates with a venom Stanford wouldn’t have expected from the calm, well-spoken man. “Killed me on the spot. I’m not going through this again. I refuse to be traded like parts.”

“What’s happening?” Ford asked Sandeep under his breath.

“Pirahn pirates.” Sandeep snarled. “They capture ships and rip them apart, leaving nothing behind, every last piece sold. Even the crew. Those they don’t kill or capture as slaves for themselves, that is.”

“While we might take what we need from stagnant satellites or orbiting vessels, they take everything. Nothing is left behind.” En fretted, worried now she knew who they were dealing with. “They’re going to disassemble my artificial synapses. Take away who I am. I’m going to be scrap metal and nothing more.”

“So, they ransack the ship for machinery?” Stanford clarified, assuming they wouldn’t be interested in the crew, insensitively discounting En’s role as part of said crew.

“Not just machinery.” Sandeep insisted. “Anything they can take apart and sell. Even you, even me. If we aren’t of value whole, then we’re sold in pieces.”

“They’ll take your organs. They’ll take my organs.” En whimpered, looking down at her hovering torso. “My cylinders, my engines. I won’t have anything left.”

“They’ll – what?” Ford whispered, outraged, boggling at the thought. “They’ll cut us up?”

“If we’re lucky.” Sandeep glared at the pirates guarding the room, dread mingling with anger in his eyes.

Ford looked over at the gilled pirates by the door, swallowing nervously as he noted the clinical way they looked him over, no doubt planning which organ of his they’d harvest first.

This was bad.

Ford squeezed his eyes shut and tried to steady his breathing.

“We can’t pretend this isn’t happening. We’d best look death in the face as it comes.” Ford heard Sandeep’s voice faintly.

“I think he’s scared Sandeep,” whispered En. “I’m scared.”

Ford exhaled, and forced himself to slip into the mindscape, hearing Sandeep’s reply before he managed it.

“I’m not scared. I’m furious.”

Ford opened his eyes to the shelves of his mindscape.

“Bill! I’m asking for help! Are you there?”

His voice echoed around the mindscape discomfotingly, like no one was there to hear him.

“I need your help! Bill, it’s urgent, please! Help me!”

Still nothing. Maybe a vague stirring of energy by the bookcases, but nothing else.

“Please! Bill! Just - I’ll tell you where I am. Just help me! Quickly!”

One of the wooden whorls on the end of one of the bookcases shifted, before it opened like an eye, curiously watching Stanford’s frantic pacing and shouting.

“HELP ME ALREADY! I –“

Ford felt someone jostle his shoulder and he was shaken awake.

Blinking his eyes open, he saw the gun barrel on his shoulder before he saw the pirate holding it.

“This one next. Scan this one.”

One of the Angolean lizards stood in front of Ford, holding one of the updated dimensional translators in his shaking hands, the Pirahn pirate’s captain holding a ray gun to his head.

“S-s-sorry, magic hands.” The lizard sniffled, clearly terrified and distraught as he let the translator scan Ford slowly before the screen lit up with his language and species.

“Another human,” the Pirahn Captain cheered. “This ship’s certainly got its fair share of rarities, doesn’t it. Hopefully not as damaged as the other one. We can fetch a pretty penny for him at the Noire. Scan him again Jolly, facial recognition this time.”

The pirate the captain referred to as Jolly raised a scanner of their own, and let the laser drift across Ford’s face, running his features against an interdimensional database. The pirate seemed bored, like this was just a formality, and was already turning to roll their widely spaced eyes at the pirate beside them, holding the gun to the Angolean’s head when the scanner started beeping.

“Ho? A hit?” The Captain leaned over to look at Jolly’s scanner, playful interest apparent on his shark like face, before that playfulness dropped like an anchor in water.
Reading the scanner’s output for a moment, eyes darting between the information on the screen and Stanford’s wary expression, the pirate’s expression turned grim.

“Separate this one from the others. Lock him up. Lock him up, you hear!” The Captain yelled at the pirates idling around him, jolting them into action. “Clamp this piece of junk vessel to the ship and warp at full speed to the Noire. Anyone not making haste in the next two seconds I want KEEL-HAULED! Tell the lads up in the engine room to drive like our lives depend on it, dammit!”

Jolly threw her scanner to a pirate standing beside her and grabbed Stanford by the shoulder, wanting to be the first one to act on her captain’s orders, yanking Ford to his feet and cuffing his arms behind his back quickly.

Ford struggled slightly but stilled when he noted every single weapon in the room was now pointed solely at him, wincing as Jolly twisted his arm to cuff him.

It was a novel experience, having every one of the very intimidating pirates staring at Ford with such nervous wariness in an instant. Despite the fact that each pirate had a ray gun, they were pointing them at Ford like he held the greater weapon, and they were trying to force a stalemate.

Ford looked around to see Sandeep (his scarves removed from his face, bearing a bloody nose and the beginnings of a black eye) and En staring at Ford in surprise, confused as to why their crewmate, who, apart from being somewhat surly from time to time, was being treated like a genuine threat by the pirates imprisoning them. Ford could see Sandeep’s brows knit together, his mouth open to ask Stanford what was happening, hope brewing in the back of his eyes, but Ford didn’t have a hopeful answer for Sandeep, and he looked away.

“Guard this one.” The Captain ordered, and Stanford turned his head to glare at the captain, strangely mollified when the captain shrunk back from his glare. Ford smiled briefly at that, and the Captain blanched further, before recovering to bark more orders to his crew. “And cover his eyes. Don’t let him see your faces, don’t let him see a goddamn thing.”

One of the pirates warily approached Stanford, pulling one of the loot bags they were carrying down over his head quickly, shielding themselves from Ford’s eyes.

As darkness took over, Ford could feel the pirates walking him out of the rec room, hearing several footsteps sound out in tandem. He must have quite the entourage leaving with him.

He heard the Captain’s last order shouted out behind him as he was led out of the room.

“And keep him awake! Whatever you do – don’t let him fall asleep!”

Well, at least they knew who they were dealing with.

Locked in the assembly room with what sounded like a substantial guard, Stanford waited in silence, listening for every detail.

He could hear the guards breathing tersely, occasionally whispering between themselves. He could hear the hum of their weapons, charged and primed for action. The weapons hummed louder when Stanford moved, no doubt all pointing towards him as he tried to scratch his nose on his shoulder.

With his hands bound behind his back, he couldn’t do much. He wasn’t sure what they thought he would do either and he supposed he had Bill’s reputation and the wildly differing stories of what he was capable of to thank for the deference with which they treated him.

They kept the bag over Ford’s head, an effective blindfold for all intents and purposes. There seemed to be a scanner aimed at him, measuring his breathing and vitals, possibly his brainwaves too, as whenever he shut his eyes, attempting to dive back into the mindscape again, one of the pirates nudged him with what seemed to be a very long stick. They wouldn’t stand close to him. Ford could tell, hearing their breathing from far across the room, all of the guards too fearful to approach him.

Mildly amused by this, Stanford wondered what would happen if he started talking to them, or if he pretended to be as fearsome as they thought he was. The only thing holding Ford back from making some off-colour joke about the situation was the understanding that, as jumpy as they were, if Stanford spooked the guards too much, they might shoot first and ask questions later.

Stanford was alive, for now at least, and he intended to stay that way. The intrusive urge to make a joke was not conducive to his continued survival, and he blamed Bill’s influence that spooking all the guards with a pithy remark was such a tempting prospect.

He could feel the ship’s stabilisers peaking the way they did when the vessel warped anywhere. They’d been warping non-stop for the past several hours to an undisclosed location.

Ford wondered idly if they were taking him to Bill, to claim the bounty, or to somewhere else. He didn’t think the pirates would appear so scared of Bill if they intended to cash in on the reward for Ford’s capture.

At least they weren’t harvesting his organs, or whatever other horrible things En and Sandeep believed these pirates were capable of.

He hoped they were alright.

The ship’s stabilisers whirred, before levelling out, indicating that they’d stopped their endless warp through dimensions.

Ford tilted his head, listening, as the heavy footsteps of the Captain sounded out along the corridor.

“Grab him and follow me.” Ford heard the Captain say. “The rest of you finish carding through the valuables.”

Ford supposed the ‘valuables’ included his friends and he wondered if there was anything he could do to ensure their safety. Or the safety of his belongings. His knapsack was still in the dorms. He didn’t want to say goodbye to all his worldly possessions, his mementos from Earth.

Perhaps he’d have an opportunity to get them back and ensure the safety of the crew. Although, that seemed like wishful thinking.

As he was dragged roughly out along the corridor, he reasoned he should probably be more concerned with his own safety for the time being, as being marched blindfolded towards whatever ominous destiny these pirates had in store for him wasn’t the most favourable outcome.

Trying to mentally map out his position, Ford could tell from the incline of the ground and the distinctive noise that they were in the exit bay, the docking ramps sliding out and landing with a clunk on the surface of whatever planet or port they arrived at.

Stumbling slightly, Ford was pulled roughly along, a guard on either side holding onto his shoulders, and the Captain walking in front. They walked across a landing bay and approached what Ford could only assume was a door of some kind.

“Take us up to the top. We need to see the Boss.” The Captain snarled at whoever manned the door.

“Duvall, will you do the honours?” A nasal sounding voice spoke out, no doubt the man who was guarding the door.

“Don’t waste your time sniffin’ me over. We need to see him now.” The Captain demanded impatiently.

Now that Ford was focusing, he could hear the sound of fervent sniffing, like there was some kind of sniffer dog checking their entourage over.

“Hey, don’t yell at me, I don’t make the rules.” Came another congested sounding voice, possibly whoever ‘Duvall’ was. “Everyone’s always shoutin’ at the little guy, they never grind their axes higher up the chain.”

“I’ll grind you in a minute.” The Captain growled.

“Ooooh. I’m real scared.” Duvall said sarcastically. “I’ve got job security, pal. What’ve you got, apart from an axe to grind?”

“A bounty, a short temper, and a gun. So if you don’t –“

“Yeesh, just go through already.” A buzz sounded out, Duvall no doubt pressing the button for the door, letting them enter. “Pirates, you’re all the same. I’m tellin’ you, Randall –“

The conversation between the doormen faded as Stanford was dragged forward several steps, before stopping, the doors closing behind him.

Ford was waiting for the pirates to take him somewhere else, but they just stayed where they stood. Ford could hear pleasant soft music playing, and he could have sworn he recognised the tune to the Girl from Ipanema. Were they in an elevator?

“They gotta sniff me down. Every time. It’s like they don’t remember me.” The Captain grunted to his crewmembers.

“It’s demeaning.” One of the pirates replied.

“It’s insulting, more like. I bring them how much good business and this is how they treat me? If I could write up those goons for their customer service, I would.” The Captain grumbled. “Don’t remember me –“

A digitised voice sounded out from the top of the elevator.

“You have selected the skybox floor. Do you have an appointment?”

“No. You tell your boss I’ve got an urgent –“

“All visitors to the skybox must have an appointment. You can apply for an appointment via –“ I’ve got an URGENT EMERGENCY DELIVERY that your boss is gonna want to see, so if you don’t put me through –“ The Captain threatened.

The digitised voice was silent for a moment, before speaking. “Please hold.”

Ford could hear what sounded like a dial tone for a moment, before their call was put through to a sullen voice.

“Yeah, whaddaya want?”

“I’ve got an urgent delivery that the big man is gonna want to see.” The Captain insisted. “Come on, Tone, do me a solid. Buzz me up.”

“An urgent delivery of what?” Tone clarified, sounding unimpressed.

Ford was spun around roughly, and the Captain grabbed his bound hands, raising them up to the camera.

“A six-fingered human, that’s what.”

There was a silence, presumably Tone looking at the screen. Ford could hear the man counting under his breath and presumed he wasn’t the brightest bulb in the box. That was comforting. What had Bill said? Always be the smartest man in the room?

“He’s just havin’ a smoke with the girls right now but I’m gonna buzz you up.” Tone said, and Ford could feel the elevator moving again. “Hold on one second, okay?”

The Captain let go of Ford’s hands and Ford rolled his shoulders. The two Pirahn guards were holding his arms again and Ford could hear the Captain speak before the elevator door dinged open.

“Now you let me do the talking.”

The guards yanked Ford along and the three pirates strolled out into the skybox room.

Ford could immediately smell a bitter burning smell, like eucalypt, tobacco, and herbs, and he could hear low jazzy music playing as they walked into the room.

“Is this him?” came Tone’s voice sceptically, from right in front of Stanford.

“Dinged a match on the scanners.” The Captain grunted in reply.

“Bring him closer.” A husky voice called out from across the room. Judging from the way the pirates immediately dragged Ford closer and forced him down onto his knees, he imagined this person was the ‘Boss’ they were bringing him to.

“Take it off.” The voice demanded, and suddenly the bag was yanked from Ford’s head, jostling his glasses on his nose.

He blinked in the bright lighting of the room and when his eyes had adjusted, he could make out through a hazy cloud of smoke an imposing looking purple man. He had grizzly, weathered features, nine arms, and wore a red velvet bathrobe and little else. On either side of him, cupped under an arm each, were two voluptuous looking alien women who seemed to be made of translucent pink goo. They were blinking at him curiously too, pouting that they’d been interrupted, but the nine-armed man wasn’t pouting, he was assessing Stanford thoroughly, taking in every detail of the human with sharp, canny eyes.

Ford blinked back, trying to get a read on the situation, on who this man was.

“Well, he looks like his poster, more or less. A little rough around the edges.” The nine-armed man grunted, sitting back on the couch, one hand bringing a fat cigar to his lips as he puffed on it thoughtfully, exhaling more of the noxious smoke.

“We brought him to you as soon as we got a match.” The Captain boasted behind Stanford. “Dropped everything to bring you the bounty.”

“Uhuh,” grunted the man in the bathrobe. He puffed on his cigar again, still raking his eyes across Ford’s face.

The Captain shifted awkwardly behind Ford for a moment, before adding. “At great personal inconvenience.”

“What? Do you want a medal or something?” The nine-armed man narrowed his eyes at the pirate captain.

“Well, the poster did say there’d be a reward,” the Captain continued.

“Do I look like some joker in a top hat to you?” Scoffed the man in the chair, the goo girls on either side of him tittering. “Get outta here.”

“We didn’t have to bring you the human, Diñeiro.” The Captain snarled back, agitated. “Could have just followed that wanted poster all the way to our wildest dreams. But you wanted to catch him first, so we made that happen. I’d say that warrants a reward!”

“You want a reward?” The purple man scoffed. “I’ve got a reward for you. A promotion.”

Before the pirate captain could move to react, the nine-armed man pulled a gun out from under the couch cushions with one of his hands and blasted a shot through the captain’s head, right between his wide set eyes.

The goo girls screamed briefly, shocked. Stanford flinched. The pirate captain fell to the ground immediately with an unpleasant gurgle, fins flaring as his death rattle escaped him.

Pointing with the hand still holding the gun, Diñeiro gestured to the guard on the left of Ford. “There, now you’re the Captain. Congratulations. Now hurry up and get the hell out of my office.”

The two Pirahn guards scrambled to flee the office, leaving Stanford behind.

“And take the dead guy with you!” Diñeiro called out after them, prompting them to run back and grab their former captain’s elbows, dragging him across the floor to the elevator door. “Don’t want no more dead fish stinkin’ up my office.”

Easing back into the lounge chair with a sigh as the pirates scrambled to leave the office, Diñeiro sucked in another deep breath of cigar smoke, exhaling the smoke with a luxuriant sigh.

When the elevator door dinged closed behind them, Diñeiro turned his gaze back to Stanford, who was now keenly aware of the gristy splatter on his back. Clearly, he couldn’t afford to underestimate this man. He seemed just as dangerous as the pirates, if not more so.

“So. Bill Cipher wants you, huh? You don’t look like much, but he must have a reason or this whole manhunt would’ve been a non-event. He wants you alive, so you must be valuable to him. My question is, how valuable?”

Stanford didn’t have an answer for that. He didn’t know if saying anything was wise, given how dangerous providing the wrong answer could be, and he wasn’t entirely sure that he was valuable to Bill anymore, given how they’d left things. If his survival depended on Bill’s response to that question, as of this moment Ford’s chances weren’t great.

Diñeiro regarded Ford’s expression for a moment longer, before leaning forward, resting two of his elbows on his knees. “You see, what’s valuable to him is more valuable to me, because it’ll mean I’ll have what he wants. So, what do you want, hmm?”

“What do I want?” Stanford repeated warily.

“Name your price. Let’s you and me work together, hmm? Think that’ll burn him? Name your price, whatever you want.”

Ford hesitated, thinking this offer could be a trap, but rather than squandering the opportunity, he played opportunistically. “I wouldn’t mind my things back, from the ship.”

“Consider it done. Toney.” Diñeiro snapped his fingers and gestured at Tone. “See that the man gets his stuff back.”

“Sure thing, Boss.” Tone nodded, and moved over to the operations board by the door, sending a message downstairs to the pirates.

“The crew down there, what will happen to them?” Stanford questioned quickly.

“Is there any chance they won’t be killed?” Ford asked, frowning slightly.

“I can skew the odds.” Diñeiro declared, before calling out to Tone by the desk. “Toney, how are we doing on organs this quarter?”

“Stock’s not really moving.” Tone scratched his chin, looking at the reports. “Which is bad news for perishables. We got other wholesalers too. Could probably skip Pirahn’s shipment.”

“Hmm.” Diñeiro mulled that over, before nodding at Ford. “Consider them worth more alive than dead then. You’re welcome. Anything else?”

Ford paused, before shaking his head, not wanting to push his luck.

“I like a man who knows when to quit. Excellent.” Diñeiro clapped his hands and sat back in his chair. “You work for me now.”

Ford hadn’t expected his kidnapping would end in a job proposal. Raising his eyebrow, Ford questioned. “As?”

“Professional bait.” Diñeiro smiled briefly, but the smile wasn’t comforting, as immediately after he smiled, two of his hands lashed out, grabbing Ford by the back of the head and slamming his face down on the coffee table in front of him.

Ford’s lip split from the impact of his teeth on the table, and his nose cracked loudly enough to promise pain. His glasses were scratched at the top corner very slightly, and as Diñeiro yanked Ford’s head back up, he pulled him around the coffee table by his hair. Wincing at the pain, blinking back the wetness brewing in his eyes, Ford gasped in a pained breath, feeling warm, wet blood run down his nose and chin.

Diñeiro adjusted Ford’s glasses on his nose and then pointed at the widescreen in front of them, across the room.

“Make sure you face the camera. Toney, port a transponder to that yellow maniac.”

“Yes, boss.” Tone said, pressing the button that would teleport a communicator between dimensions. The screen in front of them flashed, and Ford could see himself in a square at the bottom of the screen, looking bloodied and beaten, bound and on his knees on the floor on front of Diñeiro.

A dial tone rang for several tense seconds and Diñeiro gestured to Tone, getting his assistant to angle the camera up to just show Diñeiro’s face, no doubt planning Ford’s reveal as some sort of conversational coup.

Ford could see the camera angle change on the small square at the bottom of the screen, and he curled his lip, angry at how quickly the tables had turned on him. He went from having some bargaining power to being used, his suffering a spectacle, and he didn’t like it.

He was even less impressed that his bloodied condition was going to be paraded around in front of Bill, like that would elicit some sort of reaction from the God. Bill didn’t care about him, he made that more than clear on several occasions. Ford was certain all this rough treatment would be for nothing. He wasn’t sure he could sustain his empowering anger if that wasn’t the case.

Finally, the dial tone picked up, and on the screen, Ford could see an eye, blinking down at them.

“Oh! It’s on. How do I -?” The blue compass Ford had seen in the nightmare realm before seemed to be holding the transponder, fiddling with its functions. Before he could figure it out, the transponder was snatched from him, and the screen filled with pink, smooth skin and a bellybutton pointed at the camera.

“Give it here, Kryptos.”

“Not that I’m complaining about the view -“ Diñeiro drawled. “But this call is for your Boss, Toots.”

The camera angle swung, and was held out, arm’s length in front of the fiery pink cyclops woman Ford had seen in the space field, displaying her horned head and shoulders now. She wrinkled her brow, pursing her lips, taking in Diñeiro’s image on the other end of the call.

“Ew. Yuck.” She uttered, before narrowing her eye. “Why do you wanna speak to Bill? More importantly, why would he wanna speak to you? Don’t you think he’s busy doing better things?”

“He’ll wanna speak to me because I’ve got something he’s been looking for.” At this the camera panned down, revealing Ford’s angry, bloodied face, and Ford watched the cyclops woman’s eye widen, before she scowled, what looked like concern flitting across her large features. “Run along now.”

Tsking, the cyclops looked down at the compass floating beside her. “Go get Bill. Tell him Raha’s calling.”

Clearly, she wasn’t the one to do the running. The compass must be lower down the hierarchy, Ford reasoned.

“Yeah, you tell him Raha’s calling.” Diñeiro wheezed a laugh, the air waving the smoke clouds around him.

The compass presumably scampered away, leaving Diñeiro on the line with the pink cyclops woman.

She was looking at Stanford, her eye taking in every detail of his sorry state, analytical beneath those long eyelashes of hers. Despite the way she spoke, and the revealing way she was dressed, she was clearly clever, her eyes holding a spark of intelligence that reminded Ford of Bill. She didn’t say anything to Stanford, but he could tell she was itching to, barely managing to hold herself back.

While Stanford was trying to figure out what she could possibly want to say to him, Diñeiro was assessing her other qualities.

“You wanna do a little twirl, sweetheart? Give me something to look at? C’mon.”

The cyclops curled her lip at Diñeiro in disgust, before raising her brow at him. “Who are your snacks?”

Diñeiro threw an arm around each of the goo girls and gave them both a squeeze. One of the girls opened her mouth to speak, when Diñeiro spoke over her. “They don’t have names.”

When the cyclops looked sceptical, Raha continued.

“They’re whatever I want them to be.”

“You must lack imagination.” The cyclops remarked sassily.

“Hey, they can’t all be flaming ten-foot-tall knockouts with horns and fangs.” Diñeiro smiled roguishly. “If I could have that too, I would, Doll.”

“You wish.” She mumbled irately under her breath, before looking to the side. A glow lit the side of her face and Tone tilted the camera screen up away from Ford again, no doubt wanting to surprise Bill.

Ford steeled himself for that familiar voice, remembering how he’d left his last fight with Bill, how he thought he’d screwed things up forever again. Now he was in a position where his continued survival might hinge on Bill’s salvation, and it grated at Ford that he was the ‘damsel in distress’ in this scenario. The hostage. The bait.

He couldn’t help but think that Bill might not take the bait, that he might not see fit to rescue him. Did he even still care enough to rescue him?

FINE, THEN BE ALONE!

Ford swallowed nervously.

The camera seemed to hover in the air now, as Bill floated alongside the cyclops woman, his arms crossed over his chest, his eye frowning down at the transponder.

“Gee, Raha Diñeiro, calling me in his bathrobe. I don’t know whether to be flattered or traumatised. I’m leaning towards the latter.”
“Still got a smart mouth, I see. Or eye, or whatever it is you’ve got going on there.” Raha gestured at Bill vaguely. “I ain’t askin’. I don’t even wanna know.”

“So, what, is this a social call?” Bill quirked his brow at Diñeiro. “Are we catching up? And after so long. How’s things, Raha? How’s the market?”

“Recovering, after the stunt that you pulled.” Raha divulged. “I’m still scraping burnt bits off the edges of my merchants thanks to you. It’s been one hell of a headache.”

Bill seemed to glow smugly at that, his eye curving, pleased to hear it.

“I hope what you stole from me was worth it.” Raha grunted and inhaled a puff of his cigar. “You get any mileage out of Antelias’ apparatus? Those cuffs do you any good?”

Ford’s ears pricked up at that, hearing confirmation that the thing that Bill stole from this formidable man, the reason he crossed the nine-armed mobster in the first place was to steal the cuffs that enabled Bill to touch Ford without burning him. Bill’s solution to their problem at the time.

What had seemed like something Bill had picked up from an interdimensional shopping trip was actually something that Bill stole at great personal risk, burning Diñeiro’s market down to get it. Ford thought he just stole the batteries, he stole the cuffs from Raha as well. Everything he needed to be able to touch Stanford without burning him. Operation Six Fingered Discount.

Bill mentioned Raha had shot at him. After having seen what had happened to the pirate captain Ford imagined it would have been a close call. Raha Diñeiro certainly was the most ‘well-armed’ man Ford had met in his travels, in more ways than one.

Up on the screen Bill looked over to the side for a moment, before huffing impatiently, sounding dissatisfied. “For a time.”

He almost seemed disappointed, and Stanford wondered if the cause of the disappointment was because the cuffs weren’t filling their intended purpose anymore, since Stanford wasn’t around to touch him like he used to.

Bill’s dissatisfaction seemed to segue into frustration, as if he were reminded of something, and he furrowed his brow, scowling at the camera.

“If there’s a point to this call, make with it, quick. I’ve got more pressing things to attend to then bandying pleasantries around with you, Raha.”

“You call that pleasant?” Raha scoffed, enjoying the way Bill narrowed his eye at him. “Geez, relax. What’s so important that you can’t spare a few minutes chewing the fat with your old business partner, huh?”

“We’re not business partners.” Bill shot Raha down with an unimpressed look.

“But we did do business, before you set your goons rampaging through my markets. You brought me a find or two throughout the years. I figured I could return the favour.” Raha schmoozed, twiddling with his cigar idly.

“Return the favour with what?” Bill squinted suspiciously at the transponder. “You’re being awfully pleasant Raha and I don’t trust it. What’s your angle?”

“Well, you’d know all about angles, wouldn’t you?” Raha smirked knowingly.
Bill gave Raha a flat look, and made to reach for the transponder, moving to switch it off. Before he could, Raha spoke up.

“Figured I’ve found something valuable to you.”

Bill paused and blinked at the screen curiously.

“My question is, how valuable?” Raha rubbed his chin while he spoke, keeping an eye on Bill’s reactions closely. “And how much do you want it back?”

“Want what back?” Bill questioned, looking somewhat unimpressed with Diñeiro’s posturing. That was until Tone swung the camera down, revealing Ford, bloodied and bound on the ground with one of Raha’s nine arms resting on his shoulder.

Ford could tell in that instant that Bill was thrown, his eye widened, and his glow seemed to lessen and then brighten again, like he was taking a sharp breath.

Ford could pick Bill’s shocked reaction, and because he knew him very well, he could also tell that Bill was trying not to react, to curb his reaction so as not to give anything away, but his pupil was glued to Stanford, taking in every detail of his condition in a way that Ford found familiar. He faintly recalled Bill looking at him like that before, when the muse ripped his shirt open to discover bruising on his torso from when Fiddleford accidentally pushed him down the stairs.

Ford could tell Bill was furious.

“I’ve found your poster boy. Figured given how grandiose that bounty was, he must be pretty valuable to you.” Raha gave Ford’s shoulder a squeeze, shaking him with the movement, the mobster’s eyes tracking the way Bill’s pupil narrowed in on the gesture possessively.

“You’re wrong.” Bill said, his voice too level to be believable. Rather than his boisterous usual tone, Bill sounded like he was trying very hard to restrain his temper.

Ford frowned, frustrated that Bill could disown him so easily. Certainly, they’d left things rather abruptly, but Ford didn’t think their turbulent argument meant they no longer mattered to each other. They’d had arguments before and spent a great deal of time pissing one another off drastically. It was Bill’s fault he was in this situation in the first place. He narrowed his eyes at the triangle, until Bill continued, and he realised what Bill was trying to do.

“He’s of no value to me and even less to you.”

“Is that so?” Raha questioned, raising his eyebrows at Bill sceptically.

“He’s nothing special.” Bill sneered, meeting Ford’s eye now, conveying something more complex than Ford could understand right now.

Stanford wasn’t sure whether that meant Bill was saying that as a term of endearment or because he really meant it and was going to leave Ford to the mercy of this nine-armed mobster. He wasn’t sure if this was still Bill lashing out at him, or if denying Ford’s value was a purposeful technique intended to save his life. Ford could only squint back at Bill and assume this was part of some wider play. If Diñeiro didn’t believe Ford was valuable, perhaps he’d let him go?

“See, I find that hard to believe.” Raha shrugged, holding out a fresh cigar for one of the goo girls to light for him, still staring at the screen. “On account of the more than generous bounty out on his head. And in my experience, more than generous ain’t your style.”
“I was more than generous to you last time.” Bill said coolly.

“Don’t bullshit me, you weren’t generously donatin’ organs, you were just looking for a convenient place to dump all those fish carcasses. Adding insult to injury. You think I didn’t get that? You think Toney didn’t get that he was been’ insulted when you made him drag all those Amaphabon bodies out into the lift?” Diñeiro chastised Bill, scowling at him. “I ain’t an idiot, Cipher.”

Bill gave Raha a look that clearly read ‘you could have fooled me’.

“Now, I heard through the Goo Mob grapevine that you don’t give a damn when people threaten your crew.” Raha said, the hand that rested on Ford’s shoulder coming up to grab his hair roughly, bearing the vulnerable expanse of Ford’s neck to the camera.

Stanford’s shoulders tensed, and his breathing quickened, hearing the schink of metal, looking out the corner of his eye to see Diñeiro withdrawing a knife from under a lounge cushion. The man really was well armed.

Diñeiro was flipping the knife casually through his fingers, drawing out the spectacle of his threat. Ford’s eyes darted between the knife Raha was holding, and the screen, where he could see Bill had moved closer to the transponder, holding it, his eye filling the screen, glued to what was happening.

“They threaten to cut out your crony’s eye, and, knife to skin, you just sit back and let it happen. Sipping tea even.” Raha continued to spin the knife around, before bringing the knife’s edge close to Stanford’s neck. “You can get the fine china out, I can wait.”

He could feel the cold metal alongside his Adams apple, and could have sworn Diñeiro just shaved the stubble from his neck in the process. He really could die right now, and the only thing stopping his death was Bill.

Ford debated his chances if he fought back, but with Diñeiro holding his head with one of his nine incredibly agile arms, knife to his throat, he wouldn’t stand a chance. Out of options, he looked back at the screen, watching Bill, his expression a panicked plea for help that he couldn’t bring himself to voice.

Bill wasn’t saying anything either, but his eye was so close to the screen it was all that could be seen, his pupil tracking the knife with a frightening intensity. He was clearly trying to be restrained, to reel back his reaction, but he wasn’t very good at it, clearly invested in Stanford’s condition, his singular focus betraying him. He certainly wasn’t sipping tea now.

“I guess if he isn’t valuable to you.” Diñeiro shrugged, before pressing the knife against Ford’s neck. The knife was so sharp Ford felt the trickle of blood dripping down his neck before he felt the cut, the sting an afterthought to Ford’s frantic realisation that he didn’t want to die.

It must have been a small cut, but enough to make Ford bleed. The instant Bill spotted the blood, before Diñeiro could press the knife in harder, he blurted out.

“Stop!”

Ford didn’t have to look at Diñeiro to feel the smug coming off the mobster in waves. Raha had found Bill’s weak spot, he knew how to prod it, and of all things, Ford wasn’t expecting that weak spot to be him.

“So, poster boy is worth more to you alive than dead.” Raha moved the knife away, flipping it between his fingers again, although he didn’t let go of Ford’s head. “Good to know. You see, what’s worth something to you is worth something to me, Cipher. And I still have a score to settle with you for what you did to my markets. I’m thinking this is payback, or a chance for payback, considerin’ all you cost me.”

“And here I thought you just called to chat. A revenge call then, is it?” Bill seemed to exhale, easing the transponder away from him, the device floating in front of him again. “That’s not petty at all.”

“I can do petty.” Raha flipped the knife around in his hand, and suddenly the knife was back at Ford’s throat, just when the scientist managed to catch his breath from the last threat on his life. He could feel the knife pressing into the existing cut on the left of his neck, digging in deeper, and he winced. “Petty would be giving into the temptation to take what you want away from you permanently, just because I can. Bleeding this poor chump out on camera in front of you just to teach you a goddamn lesson. Petty is very appealing.”

Bill’s eye widened, and he floated closer to the screen again, but then seemed to hold himself back, trying not to be baited.

More blood dripped down Ford’s neck as the cut widened. It was still a surface level cut, not hitting anything vital yet, but it would certainly scar. That is if Ford survived long enough to let it scar. A corpse couldn’t scar.

Ford swallowed again, conscious of the movement of his Adams apple grazing too close to the knife’s edge and hoped fervently that Bill wouldn’t say anything to piss this mobster off. Knowing Bill, he didn’t much like his chances.

“It’s like you’re trying to convince me that you’re stupid.” Bill said, and Ford vehemently lamented his choice in partner, cursing Bill’s lack of tact, sucking in a frustrated breath.

“By which I mean, you’re smarter than this, Raha.” Bill continued, speaking quickly to abate the dangerous expression on Raha’s face. “You know a long-term investment when you see one and cutting short Sixer’s life expectancy for a temporary high isn’t a good investment at all, not to mention the mess it’d make in your skybox. I mean, sure, if you wanted to tick me off and ruin your carpet, then do it. Kill him.”

Ford’s stomach flipped at that, shocked that Bill would say the words so casually. Considering how invested he was in Stanford not dying before, he didn’t expect the muse to so flippantly say the words. He looked at the screen in shock, his heart in his throat, perilously close to the blade. Despite everything, he still thought Bill would care if he lived or died, or at least be a little more phased than merely ‘ticked off’.

Bill wasn’t done though, it seemed, as his eye turned black, and his bricks red and dangerous, showing the true depth of his rage, his pupil burning like fire down from the screen, promising recompense.

“But you won’t like it when I make a revenge call of my own and I do that in style Raha. You know what I’m capable of, but you don’t know the half of it. I’ll destroy your henchmen, I’ll destroy your markets, I’ll burn down every cherished thing you’ve ever owned, and I’ll kill you last, slowly. You’ll be begging for death, wishing the cigars killed you first, and that’ll be when I get out the fine china and watch you suffer.” Bill’s voice changed as he made his threats, growling the certainty of his bloody recompense into the transponder before his tone abruptly changed into casual light-heartedness once more, as if to prove how unstable Bill was. “So, you can see, it’s just not good business sense.”
Raha sat up, and moved the knife away from Ford’s neck, barking out a rough laugh, sounding elated.

“Very valuable then. Thank you for demonstrating that for me. See, I could be flattered, but I doubt every one of your goons who ends up on the chopping block get such beautiful, extravagant threats like that made for them. Now, I know it’s not me, so it must be him that’s valuable to you. Special even. I must be sitting on a freakin’ goldmine here.”

He let go of Ford and Ford leaned away from Raha, still perturbed by the wetness of his own blood dripping down into the collar of his shirt, his pulse racing at his recent near-death experience.

“That’s my goldmine you’re making a mess of.” Bill scoffed, looking down the screen derisively at Raha. “It’s like you’ve never heard of depreciation before. First his face, and now his neck, ugh. Don’t damage the goods. You want to state your terms, don’t you? You won’t have much to barter with if he’s in less than pristine condition.”

“Oh, I think I’ll have plenty to barter with.” Diñeiro handed the knife to one of the goo girls and sat back comfortably on the couch. “Clean that up for me, will ya?”

Bill seemed irritated, his arms crossed on the screen, his bricks yellow again, giving Diñeiro an unimpressed frown, but his pupil kept swinging to the side to check on Stanford, clearly worried about his condition.

Stanford glared at Bill, blaming Bill already for this entire situation.

A goldmine, was he? Ford wasn’t sure exactly what gold Bill was supposedly mining from him – he wouldn’t help him with the portal, Bill wasn’t harvesting the worship he gave with the cuffs anymore, and Ford did his utmost on the regular to be deliberately unhelpful to the God but hearing those words, Ford couldn’t help but think that Bill was using him again.

He spoke like Stanford was only valuable because he fulfilled a use to Bill, although on second thought, Ford supposed Bill had to pretend that was the case to maintain his reputation. If what Raha said was true and Bill was known for not being rattled when his henchmen were threatened, showing weakness when it came to Ford could put his entire operation in jeopardy.

At this point, Ford was quite certain that he was special to the triangle, and he had a cut on his neck to prove it. Possibly more special than the muse had ever seen fit to admit, in more ways than Stanford could possibly comprehend.

He didn’t want to believe it though.

Being special to Bill was hazardous, and when Ford thought back to how much he wanted that, and consistently wanted it, he didn’t think there would be such serious consequences to it.

Now he could barely think to believe it, even when the evidence of Bill’s weakness for him was staring him right in the face.

If Ford was special to Bill, he was valuable to Bill’s enemies, and Stanford took a moment to wonder just how many enemies his muse had? He was certainly better at making enemies than he was at making friends, perhaps that was something they had in common.

“State my terms, eh?” Raha mused, reaching up to puff at his cigar once more, inhaling deeply. “I can do that.”

“Same as before, you want your health back with zero consequences, and to borrow my henchmaniacs to stand around and look like they work for you while you feel self-important about it.” Bill rolled his eye, sounding bored, already deducing what Diñeiro supposedly wanted. “So, make with the trade. Let’s get on with it, I don’t have all day.”

“I don’t want to rent out your henchmen.” Raha countered, before he pointed at Bill with one of his nine arms. “They don’t work for me now, you work for me now.”

“Excuse me?” Bill froze and narrowed his eye dangerously.

“You’re right about this long-term investment business. I can see considerable benefits to having you directly under my thumb. Like some kinda garish yellow genie, granting wishes, running errands, that sort of thing.” Raha declared, beyond smug. He could see from the way Bill’s eye twitched that his demand hit a nerve, but Raha had a feeling he was on the money with this one.

“I don’t work for other people.” Bill insisted, sneering at Raha. “I definitely don’t work for you.”

“Sure, you do.” Raha grinned. “It’s just like makin’ a deal, only this time you’re on the screwy end of it. I think it’d do you good to run around after me, bending reality to heed my every menial wish. You know how this sort of thing goes. I say jump, you say –“

“Shpx lbh.” Bill swore in that peculiar language of his, the sentiment conveyed effortlessly despite the dimensional translators in the room not picking up on the cryptic tongue.

“Don’t be getting feisty now. Is that any way to talk to your new boss?” Raha grinned, puffing on his cigar, looking pleased now that he had the upper hand. “If you want your human back in one piece, instead of several, you’ll consider my deal, and I’ll give you 24 hours to agree to my terms. We’ll shake on it, and you’ll agree to everything I propose, if you know what’s good for you. Keep that transponder on you.”

Raha cuffed Stanford across the back of his head idly to grab his attention, while Bill was scoffing and spluttering his protestations on the screen.

“You got anything to say to Cipher before I hang up? A thank you? A please save me? Anything motivating, huh, poster boy?”

Stanford scowled and considered if there was anything he’d say to Bill. He certainly wouldn’t relinquish what little dignity he had left and ask Bill to save him, of all things. Bill made it clear that he wouldn’t drop everything to rescue Ford, despite his appearance on the call (and certain revelations Ford wasn’t willing to confront), and as such, Ford adamantly wouldn’t ask it of him. He was still a little sour that he was in this position in the first place, thanks to Bill, and Bill’s callous attitude on the call only contributed to Ford’s sour mood.

Giving Bill a stubborn look, Ford jutted his jaw out. “No.”

Bill narrowed his eye and got right up close to the screen, pointing at Stanford. “Sixer! You - Why you little – ungrateful – when I find you I swear –“

“Ciao.” Raha flicked his fingers at the screen and the image shut off, ending the call.

Tone pressed some buttons by the control panel and the screen slid away, out of view in the office.

Raha sucked in the smoke from his cigars, a deep inhale, smacking his lips on the cigar, before he exhaled a croaky laugh that kept building. His laugh started as a chuckle and graduated into a full-blown booming cackle.
“Holy smokes, did you see that? Did you see that, Tone?”

“Sure did, Boss.” Tone replied from across the room.

“He’s my fuckin’ puppet now! He’s gonna dance from my strings until he hangs himself with ‘em. How fuckin’ sweet is this?” Raha wheezed, waving the smoke clouds around him as he continued to laugh, delighted by the predicament he created.

“So sweet.” One of the goo girls simpered.

“Not as sweet as you.” The other goo girl traced a viscous finger down Raha’s cheek.

“Take a raincheck, ladies. You’re off the clock.” Raha waved the girls away impatiently and they slid off the couch and across the floor, reforming towards the door to the elevator, waving goodbye to Raha as they went.

Turning to Stanford, two of his arms doing up his bathrobe so he was somewhat more modestly covered, Diñeiro rested his elbows on his knees, beaming at Stanford.

“Phenomenal work. Absolutely phenomenal. And stickin’ it to him right at the end. 10 outta 10. It’s like you were born to do this.”

Ford gave Diñeiro a disbelieving glower. “Born to what? Bleed on camera?”

“Ain’t nothin’ personal buddy. It’s just a flesh wound. You got more flesh where that came from, don’t ya? So, shut your yap and quit complaining.” Leaning further forward, Raha honed in on Stanford with an eagerness that was off putting. “Now, I wanna know everything. Tell me all the juicy details.”

Ford was baffled, first he was supposed to ‘shut his yap’ now he was supposed to tell Raha details?

“What details?”

“You and Cipher. How’d you get under his skin like that? I know he don’t have skin, it’s an imperfect metaphor. What I mean to say is that you’ve got information, or something compromising on the hack. And my guess is if he ain’t caught you so far, you don’t want to be caught, so it looks like you and me are on the same side here. You want to get one over on that jumped up equilateral, don’t you?”

Ford blinked at Raha, bewildered.

“You don’t want me to hand you over to that maniac, you want to string this out as long as you can, and so do I.” Raha looked up and smacked himself on the forehead with the palm of one of his hands. “What am I saying? Toney!”

“Yes, Boss?” Tone responded.

“Broadcast a warp warning for the market so everyone’s got their cards on them. Here, take one of these.” Raha grabbed a slim plastic card and slid it in Stanford’s shirt pocket, while still talking to Tone. “I want us warping every ten minutes until we have a game plan. Got to throw him off before he finds us. We’ve got the element of surprise now. We may as well use it. In the meantime, uncuff this gentleman.”

Tone pressed a button on the control panel and then knelt behind Stanford, slicing the cuffs from his wrist with a small handheld laser. As Tone freed Stanford from his bonds, Diñeiro grabbed several tissues from a box on the coffee table and shoved them at Stanford.

“Here, before you start dripping on the carpet. You want a drink? Here, Tone, get the man a drink.”

While Tone scrambled to pour Ford a drink, Stanford flexed his wrists and rolled his shoulders, before picking up the tissues Raha had thrown at him, gingerly mopping up the blood on his neck, wiping it away with disgust.

“You smoke?” Diñeiro asked Ford, opening a drawer on the coffee table to reveal row upon row of the expensive looking cigars he was working his way through.

Ford looked at the cigars, perturbed by the complete 180 in Raha’s demeanour. He went from threatening to kill Stanford, to congratulating him on a job well done.

Ford shook his head.

“Probably for the best.” Raha said, stubbing out his old cigar and pulling a fresh one from the drawer, lighting it with one of his nine arms, and pulling a deep drag of the noxious smoke. “These things will kill you.”

Diñeiro abruptly wheezed his way through a coughing fit, waving the smoke cloud away from him, but after the fit subsided, he took another deep inhale from his cigar. “Damn if they ain’t good though. So, let’s talk business. Why does Cipher want you so bad?”

Ford was still blotting at the blood on his neck when Tone sat down a glass of golden liquid on the table for Ford, garnished with ice and the leaves of an odd purple plant Ford had never seen before.

“I’m asking myself the same question.” Ford murmured, staring at the beverage, absent in his thoughts.

“Don’t be coy. There’s gotta be a reason.” Raha probed, and Ford looked up, realising that if this mobster didn’t think Ford was useful to him, he’d likely end up as dead as the Pirahn captain. There were still splatters of gristle from the captain’s unpleasant demise all across the floor of the skybox, although Tone seemed to be preparing himself to clean it up.

Looking for an answer that wouldn’t compromise Ford’s own feelings, Stanford offered a hardly fictive one. “On Earth, he tricked me into building an interdimensional portal. I’m the only person who knows how to operate it. I shut it down when I found out what he was using it for and jumped through the portal into space, so I wouldn’t be near it to operate it anymore. He’s been hunting me ever since.”

It was a workable answer, even if it wasn’t entirely true. Ford certainly hadn’t jumped through the portal, his reason for Raha painted him in a far more gallant light than true events, but he couldn’t say that he fell through the portal fighting with his brother, that he was fighting with Bill right now, despite their constant complicated relationship.

“So, you were his foot in the door.” Raha mused, flicking ash from his cigar. “I thought he was just bullshitting, but that bastard really was planning to take Mayfair. Would it have worked? The portal?”

“Yes.” Ford replied, almost offended that Raha doubted his work.

“That’s prime real estate, your earth. Conveniently located between dimensional weak spots, rich with resources, and full of idiots who don’t know half of what they got yet.” Raha explained with a “Shame it’s a protected planet. I’d’ve taken him up on his offer if I’d known it was legit. Humans are big currency. Even second-hand ones fetch a pretty penny.”

Ford felt revulsion at Diñeiro’s casual descriptor of ‘second hand humans’ and how blasé he was about what was essentially selling people into slavery. Human trafficking and, no doubt, the trafficking of other species seemed to be the norm in this kind of black market, and given how unscrupulous the buyers could be, being sold sounded more than unappealing.

He thought back to Sandeep, aghast to realise that he would be one of the so called ‘second-hand humans’ that Raha would be selling, and he could only imagine Sandeep’s frustration and fury over being put through that ordeal again. Thanks to Ford’s request, at least he knew that his friends wouldn’t be killed, but remembering the look on Sandeep’s face when he was captured back on the ship, he wasn’t so sure Sandeep would want to live through this again.

_They should have killed me. I refuse to be traded like parts._

People died today anyway, and Ford may have secured Sandeep a fate worse than death. Ford’s stomach felt sick, and he tried to focus his attention on wiping the blood from his nose and chin, having successfully patted the cut on his neck dry. He had bits of tissue stuck in the wound and it stung.

“Would you ever go back there? Start the portal up again?” Raha asked.

“No.” Ford shook his head, appalled. “Never.”

“Not even for a price? Come on, everyone’s got a price.” Raha tried opportunistically.

“If I didn’t do it for Bill, I’m not doing it for anyone.” Ford shook his head stubbornly.

“Hmm. Fair enough. If you’re already turnin’ down your wildest dreams, I can’t see you folding for anything I could offer you, but keep it in mind. I wouldn’t mind a slice of that pie.”

Ford thought back to Bill’s convoluted description of the Cryptix Noire as the ‘blue ribbon pie shop of black markets’ and imagined Diñeiro would indeed be greedy enough to want a piece of that pie, but Ford would be the last person to serve it to him. He thought back to Bill’s description of the worst of the worst, the God stating that he was far from the worst that was out there. Ford was starting to believe him.

“I don’t blame you for wanting to keep Cipher’s paws off your dimension. Knowing what he did to his own one, I wouldn’t trust him with mine either.” Raha sat back on the couch and relaxed, getting comfortable.

Ford looked up at that, curious. Bill’s own dimension? He never mentioned it to Ford before. “What happened to his dimension?”

“Let’s just say there’s a reason there ain’t billions of annoying as fuck triangles running around just like him, and that reason thinks its classy for a geometric shape to wear a top hat and a bowtie.” Raha huffed a laugh at that. “Can’t say I’m not grateful though. The universe is bad enough with just the one triangular disaster.”

“I didn’t know.” Ford murmured, thrown by that revelation. He was under the impression Bill didn’t have a family, he certainly never mentioned one. He made Stanford think there was only one triangle out there in the universe as special as he was. The notion that there could have been not just hundreds, but billions of creatures, like Bill was a shocking notion for Ford to wrap his head around.
It gave new meaning to the pictures he’d seen Bill draw in his mind, two triangles holding hands, scribbles blotting out their features when Stanford probed for details. Dead things, Bill had said. Ford didn’t know what to think.

“I’m betting there’s a lot you don’t know about Bill Cipher.” Raha puffed on his cigar and regarded Ford’s dawning revelation. He watched Ford reach over to the coffee table and pick up the drink Tone had set out for him, smelling the beverage before taking a steadying sip. “I’m betting he told you a bunch of lurid fairy tales instead of ever giving an honest answer. He does that.”

“He never told me about his dimension at all.” Ford looked into the glass, swirling the golden liquid around. It tasted like a mix between scotch, honey, and mint and he found he quite liked it. He hoped it was alcoholic, he had had quite the day, even if he wasn’t necessarily in the clear just yet.

“See, I’m interested in knowing Cipher’s weaknesses. Does that sound like a mutual interest to you?” Raha proposed, tilting his head at Ford.

“I do want to know more about him.” He’d said he would study Bill’s weaknesses to those asteroid miners. Perhaps he should start getting on that. “Everything, if I can. Including his weaknesses.”

“Then it looks like you and me have plenty to talk about. This should be a collaboration. You work for me now.” Raha watched Ford pause, taking that in, before he took another sip from the golden drink. “And that ain’t just a one-way street. I reward certain types of loyalty and if you find yourself being loyal to me over anyone else, I recognise that.”

Ford considered this while also considering the gristle on the back of his shirt, evidence of the Pirahn captain’s swift demise. He was quite certain loyalty didn’t mean jack to this smooth-talking mobster, he was just interested in turning Ford against Bill.

Saying nothing, he inclined his head, and Diñeiro took that for a nod.

“You stick to me now. By my side, 24/7, so you don’t get snatched up before Cipher shakes on our deal. I wouldn’t put it past him. He’s stolen from me before.”

“The cuffs for the apparatus?” Stanford looked up at Raha curiously.

“So, you know about that, do you? That’s surprising. Pawns like you aren’t usually so in the know. I wonder what else he’s told you about his plans.” Raha regarded Ford with a look that told Ford his value just increased.

“What were those cuffs made for?” Ford pressed for details, while he had the opportunity.

“They used to belong to a God called Antelas the Generous.” Raha divulged, after considering Ford for a while longer. “One of his followers made it for him to wear, a way to siphon the excess energy off him to power the city. Antelas, ‘so generous and all, wore them in exchange for the worship the city gave him, like a chump, and when the people turned against the sucker those cuffs sucked him dry. Juiced the power right outta him. They turned Antelas’s power, which was supposed to be all about peace and nurturing if you’ll believe it, into a super weapon, planning to launch it against their enemy across the sea. How’s that for peaceful? Fired the damn thing and all that power wiped out the entire planet. Sure, it killed who it was supposed to kill, but it also killed everyone else, except for the guy who made the cuffs, as fate would have it.”

“Why him?” Ford asked, following the story with confusion.
“If you follow the stories, it was because Antelias made him immortal back when things were still hunky dory between them. This guy was supposed to be Antelias’s first and most devoted worshipper. Still is, if you believe the stories, but he made the cuffs that got Antelias killed in the first place. He made it off the planet before the weapon went off, and to this day he’s been living with the guilt of his betrayal following him wherever he goes. He’s haunted by how his invention stabbed his god in the back and will be forever, according to the legends.” Diñeiro finished with a noncommittal shrug.

“But is it a legend? The cuffs are real.” Stanford puzzled, finding the similarities of this tale a little too close for comfort.

“The cuffs are real, sure, but people will believe anything these days.” Raha puffed on his cigar absently. “Immortal worshippers and Gods who give something for nothing are nothin’ but fairy tales. The world don’t work that way and it never has. Nothing lives forever, and nothing’s unkillable, and those two things bring me comfort most days.”

Raha stood up and walked over to the window of the skybox, looking out over the market, until he was seized by a racking cough, one of his nine hands reaching out to grasp the countertop as he hacked his lungs up, cigar still in his hand.

Rubbing his chest as his cough levelled out, Ford couldn’t see Diñeiro’s expression, but he could see the man was looking down, no longer looking out the window at the markets he owned.

Waving one of his hands at Tone, Diñeiro gestured. “Warp us again. And keep an eye on this one. I’m going to go clean up and get dressed into something halfway decent.”

“Yes, boss.” Tone replied as Diñeiro walked away into a side room in the sky box, no doubt some sort of walk-in wardrobe.

Ford sat awkwardly on the floor now, with just him and Tone in the room. He tapped his fingers on the glass holding the honey coloured drink and contemplated escaping, and how far he’d likely get.

Tone didn’t seem too intimidating, he was skinnier with Ford, more like a personal assistant than a bodyguard, although with four arms he still could prove difficult to best in a fight. Judging from Diñeiro’s well-armed demeanour, it was highly likely Tone was armed with a weapon as well.

Ford moved to stand up, aware of Tone’s eyes on him as he moved. Ford sat down on the couch Raha had sat on, aiming for casual, taking a sip from his drink, meeting Tone’s unerring eye contact.

Drawing the mobster into a staring competition, Stanford hoped he wouldn’t notice as he slid his left hand under the couch cushion to retrieve the knife Diñeiro had threatened him with.

Grabbing the switchblade by the handle and sliding it into his trouser pocket, Ford was surprised when Tone spoke up, despite his eyes not leaving Ford’s.

“Keep it.”

Ford blinked at Tone, his face moving to slide into an expression of innocent denial.

“Yeah, I saw you.” Tone cut off Ford’s denial before he could even voice it. “It don’t matter none. He’s faster than you anyway, and you don’t want to pick a fight when he’s the only thing keeping that triangle away from you. You ain’t going nowhere.”

“What makes you so sure?” Stanford asked smoothly, quirking his brow at Tone.
“We’ve got your bag here.” Tone flicked a hologram of the contents of Stanford’s rucksack up in front of the scientist, the hologram showing an x-ray image of the rucksack in the elevator, being brought up by another one of the Pirahn pirates, tracking its progress. Tone flicked his fingers and the hologram zoomed in on the pill bottle in Ford’s bag. “Sleep suppressants. Wonder what those are for. You’ll stay. You don’t seem the type to pass up a better situation when you see it. Better than dealing with Cipher, right?”

“What do you know about Bill?” Ford asked Tone, curious why everyone was so convinced that Stanford should be scared of Bill.

“I don’t know much about the guy personally, but I know what he’s done, and he’s done a lot. Enough to give you nightmares, and that’s without any of the magical dream hoo-hah he’s famous for.” Tone crossed one set of his arms and looked at Stanford impatiently. “You’ll want to meet one of our retailers, down in the markets. Thanks to Cipher the guy’s been in pieces. Literally. It ain’t pretty.”

“I’m sure it isn’t.” Ford grimaced, considering that, before pulling the knife back out of his pocket slowly, putting it back where he found it.

“Seriously, keep it.” Tone insisted, waving his hand around the room. “We got so many blasters and lasers in here a knife ain’t doing diddly squat. You’d have grabbed the gun under the other cushion if you wanted to cause trouble. Keep it.”

“But why?” Ford couldn’t help but ask, confused. He was also somewhat frustrated he didn’t think of grabbing the blaster, but he probably wouldn’t have gotten far with it. So much for being the smartest guy in the room.

“You know, there’s something to be said for feeling safe in a helpless situation.” Tone said simply, raising all four of his hands. “And that’s all I’m saying. Seriously, keep it. Consider it a starting bonus.”

At that, Ford slid the knife back in his pocket, surprised by Tone’s sudden depth. Considering the sort of trade the market dealt with he didn’t expect to find someone with the capacity to empathise with the same helpless perspective this market seemed to flourish on.

“How long have you been working here?” Ford asked Tone, paying attention to the assistant now, reassessing his previous assumption of the man’s intelligence.

“Too long.” Tone said, reaching over to the computer panel and typing in a few commands with his spare hands, still keeping an eye on Stanford. “Things happen at the Noire, some things that I don’t care for. This used to be a very different sort of place and it’s changed over the years. Things change though. I don’t have to like it. Still, it wears on you.”

“I can imagine.” Stanford replied, looking between Tone and the door Diñeiro disappeared through.

The elevator door opened and a Pirahn pirate came through with Stanford’s rucksack.

“Just put it over there.” Tone pointed to the coffee table.

The Pirahn pirate walked over to place the bag on the coffee table, looking warily between Stanford, sitting on the couch with a drink, and the splatter of gristle that used to be the captain staining the floor. Without making eye contact with Stanford, the Pirahn pirate backed out of the room, into the elevator again, leaving Ford’s bag without a word.
The lack of eye contact was unnerving. Ford imagined he looked just as nefarious to the Pirahn pirate, sitting in Diñeiro’s chair, nursing a drink whilst covered in blood, as they did to him when they hijacked the scrap vandal vessel.

He didn’t know how he felt about that.

“You’ll want to check they haven’t stolen anything. I wouldn’t trust the Pirahn further than I could throw ‘em.”

At Tone’s urging, Ford slid the rucksack across the table, checking through the contents. Shailesh’s coat, and his own trench coat were still there, along with Stanford’s journal, his sleep suppressants, and the various gadgets he was working on back on the ship. His tech tablet was there and Stanford wondered how many of the Angolean lizards survived the pirate’s raid. He picked it up and tilted the screen, looking at his reflection on the surface of the device.

He tilted his neck to the side and inspected the cut Raha had made. It was about an inch long on the side of his neck, and it was scabbing over, bits of tissue clinging to the wound. If he didn’t get a chance to clean it properly it would no doubt leave a scar. That was unpleasant.

His lip was still split, and swelling, and his nose seemed redder than normal, still throbbing with pain. He heard a crack before, and he hoped it wasn’t broken. Looking finally at the chip at the top left-hand corner of his glasses, he sighed.

He’d managed to stay relatively unscathed thus far into his adventures on the other side of the portal, but this had to be the first time Ford had run into genuine danger. Fighting with Bill, he almost felt invincible, because he knew Bill could never truly harm him, but the rest of the universe didn’t have those same reservations.

Things suddenly felt a lot more real to Stanford.

The danger certainly felt more real.

He pulled his scrapbook over towards him and flipped through the pages, finding the page containing the photos and mementos of Bill he kept, all the images of Bill’s human body, the personal things from a time that felt more like a distant fantasy to Ford now. Carefully removing the pages from the book, Ford folded them small and put the pages in his trouser pocket along with the knife, with Tone watching him all the while.

The four-armed mobster didn’t stop him. He seemed to understand Ford’s desire to keep some small part of himself secret, considering his situation.

With the compromising pages safely secured, Ford flipped through his scrapbook again, searching for any more information that he couldn’t afford to let slip into Diñeiro’s devious hands.

The door to the walk-in wardrobe opened with a loud bang, and Ford jumped, closing the book quickly and sliding it back into the middle of the table. Diñeiro strode out into the main room of the skybox, wearing a luxuriant velvet suit, the fabric navy blue, with a deep burgundy cummerbund. Diñeiro was dressed like a real mobster now, to the nines, and he looked no less intimidating than he had in his bathrobe wielding a gun.

“I’ve figured out where we’re going ,Tone. Cancel my other appointments.”

“All of them?” Tone questioned, already turning around in his chair, typing commands into the computer system.
“Reschedule my trip to Electric Lady Land. Cancel the rest of them.” Diñeiro straightened his tie in the reflective glass windows of the skybox as he spoke. “I’ll do one last dip down to the sales floor, so those slackers down there know I can still delegate crap for them to do, and then we’re taking the main crew and a skimmer dimension hopping.”

“Where are we going?” Tone asked.

“Well, it’s a gamble, but I think it’ll pay off.” Diñeiro replied evasively, before he strode over to the couch and flicked at Ford’s shoulder with his fingers. “You’re coming with me.”

“May I use the bathroom first?” Ford attempted to ask, casually, gesturing to the blood on his neck. Really, he just wanted a moment away from the mobster, a moment to himself.

Diñeiro narrowed his eyes at Ford, considering him, before looking him up and down. “I suppose you’ll have to. Tone, print out something acceptable for him to wear that’ll get him past the dress code. You’ve got five minutes, and then we’re rolling.”

Ford made to stand up, pulling the book and his possessions across the table towards him, but Raha squeezed Ford’s shoulder.

“Leave the book.”

Ford took his hands away from the book, and when they were an acceptable distance from it, Raha let go of Ford’s shoulder, pointing to the walk-in wardrobe he just came out of. The doors swung open for him expectantly.

Knowing the mobster’s eyes were on him, Ford walked through the doors to the walk-in wardrobe and heard them close behind him.

The walk-in wardrobe was lined with expensive suits and fine clothing, Diñeiro’s fashion choices showing a preference for velvet and expensive looking jewellery. Watches and waistcoat chains glittered next to rows of cufflinks and futuristic timekeeping pieces. Ford would have paused to examine them, if he hadn’t noticed the camera dome in the ceiling first, hearing it whirr, keeping an eye on him. He might have a moment alone for now, but he certainly wasn’t unsupervised.

He walked further into the room and noticed an assortment of several small hovering machines printing silk in the corner of the room, a white dress shirt and trousers. As the shirt only appeared to have two arms, Ford presumed this one was for him.

Walking closer to the small printing machines, Ford tried to pick one up to examine it, curious about the technology, but when he reached for one of the printers, he was zapped with a small but sharp electric current.

Releasing the printing robot and nursing his sore hand, Ford could see the door to the bathroom swing open pointedly, as if directing him to his destination, keeping him on schedule.

Ford had seen bathrooms in the multiverse that were entirely utilitarian before, that would scan you before eradicating the dirt from your body, but this bathroom looked like a mixture of form and functionality, luxuriant bathtubs and shower features carved from blue marble, sitting opposite the basic scan and scrub facilities.

Diñeiro seemed to be a man who appreciated the finer things but maintained efficiency when it was required. A man who could juggle both practicality and pleasure. Everything about his wardrobe and his bathroom screamed that Diñeiro was rolling in money, but there was a practicality behind it all that indicated to Ford that Diñeiro may not have always been wealthy, as he wasn’t eschewing the sort of things the 99% used to get by, as typical 1 percenters did.

Aware of the camera dome in the bathroom as well, Ford self-consciously stripped out of his scrap vandal uniform, standing in just his boxers and his singlet, before approaching the scan and scrub shower. He wouldn’t be taking off his singlet or boxers, firstly for modesty’s sake, and secondly because he didn’t want to show Diñeiro the mark Bill left on his pectoral. Diñeiro seemed to be very invested in what Ford was to Bill, and he didn’t want to parade about Bill’s ‘class ring’ equivalent if it meant it would put Bill (and Ford by extension) in further hot water.

Ford stepped up to the shower platform and it scanned him before blasting him with jets of soapy water, pummelling the dirt off him. Left sodden for a fraction of a second, Ford contemplated that there wasn’t a lot of dignity in efficiency, before he was buffeted by a second blast of warm air, drying him and his clothes in an instant.

Stepping away from the shower platform, Ford walked over to the mirror by the sinks, a lavish gold on marble affair, and examined himself.

His hair always ended up impossibly fluffy after using a scan and scrub, poofed up to a ridiculous degree. The pressure of the water had reopened the wound on his neck, and he quickly grabbed one of the towels in the bathroom, pressing it against the wound to stem the bleeding.

How did he get himself into this situation?

He closed his eyes for a moment, trying to centre himself. Perhaps if he closed his eyes, he might be able to nod off long enough to get some answers.

Diñeiro’s voice sounded out over the speakers in the bathroom, confirming to Ford that he was indeed being watched.

“Five minutes, poster boy.”

Ford gave his reflection a flat look, his exhaustion and frustration stifled but still there as he tried to school his features. Grabbing his scrap vandal uniform, he brought it with him into the other room, still holding the bloodied towel to his neck.

The sewing robots had finished weaving Stanford’s new clothes, and a white pressed shirt, black dress slacks, black suit jacket, and black bow tie was laid out for him on the chaise in the walk-in wardrobe.

Patting his neck with the towel, Ford looked at the positioning of the camera domes in the room, aiming to be casual about it. Using his back to shield his movements, creating a blind spot between the cameras, Ford took the knife and the pages he ripped from his scrapbook and transferred them to the pocket of his new jacket quickly, using the sleight of hand skills he’d been practising to keep his movements swift enough to avoid detection.

Once that was taken care of, Ford smoothly dressed himself in the formal wear, buttoning up his shirt, shrugging on his jacket, before giving the bowtie a long-suffering look, choosing to simply sling the tie around his shoulders rather than tying it neatly. Bowties weren’t his thing.

Gathering his belongings up, he walked out of the walk-in wardrobe and back into the skybox. Diñeiro was reading through his scrap book over by the coffee table.

“Interesting stuff you got here. Are these your notes for the portal?” Diñeiro asked without looking up as Ford walked over to the couch.
“No. I left those notes on Earth. I hid them.” Ford answered with a frown.

“A pity.” Diñeiro shrugged, and shut the book, sliding it across the table with Ford’s other belongings. “Still makes for good reading though. Group all your stuff together. I’ll give you a nano briefcase you can carry it all in.”

Diñeiro held up what looked like a small metal square with a cap on one end. Ford grabbed the nano briefcase and took the cap off, seeing a small compartment inside.

“It’s like he’s never seen a nano briefcase before.” Diñeiro joked, shaking his head at Tone with a smile. “You stick it on either side of your stuff, and it sucks it in there.”

Ford put his scrap vandal uniform down and placed the cap and the other end of the nano briefcase on opposite ends of the coffee table. The ends glowed blue for a moment, projecting a light between both ends, before Ford’s belongings shrunk down and were sucked into the briefcase.

Ford made a pleased sound, picking up the briefcase and examining it again, delighted.

“Damn, humans are precious.” Diñeiro chuckled, and Ford pocketed the nano briefcase, furrowing his brows at how patronising that observation felt.

Considering Diñeiro considered humans a tradable good, it’s possible the mobster was referring to humanity’s monetary value, but Ford couldn’t help but feel infantilised by that remark. He didn’t know what was worse.

“Come on. Time is money.”

Clapping his hand on his leg, Diñeiro stood up, and strode over to the elevator of the skybox, gesturing for Ford and Tone to follow him with a wave of one of his hands.

With no choice but to follow, Ford stepped into the golden elevator, looking around now that he didn’t have a bag over his head. The elevator had wide glass panelling, overlooking an enormous sprawling market, bustling with people. All of it was illicit trade, if Bill was to be believed. Criminals selling illegal things for fun and profit. The elevator didn’t seem to move in any specific direction, hovering across the markets, descending to the ground level.

Ford looked away from the glass window, and realised Diñeiro was watching him, his expression shrewd and calculating.

“You don’t leave my sight from now on, got that.” Diñeiro told Stanford. “You’re a part of my entourage. You’re my employee. Mine.”

You’re my pawn. Stanford heard, assessing the way Diñeiro looked at him.

“Wherever I go, you’re a part of the furniture now. Capiche? Those are the rules.” Diñeiro stepped closer to Stanford, and straightened the lapels on his suit jacket, his hands feeling heavy, like a threat. Raha dusted Ford’s shoulders with two hands, while two hands straightened his lapels, and two more busied themselves tying Stanford’s bowtie. “And since you work for me now, you follow my rules.”

Ford’s mouth tightened around the edges, but he tried to mask his wariness, making a noncommittal sound.

Diñeiro finished tying Ford’s bowtie, straightening it, before he let a finger linger under the fabric, tugging it lightly just to make Stanford feel the bowtie restrict around his neck, like a noose.

“T wanna hear a ‘yes boss’.”

Stanford grit his teeth, before forcing out a bland. “Yes, boss.”

Letting go of Ford’s tie, Raha clapped Ford on the shoulder. “See, was that so hard?”

Diñeiro turned away from Ford, and Ford reached a hand up to rub his neck, loosening the tie so it wasn’t so throttlingly tight, unimpressed with Diñeiro’s power play.

The sky box was descending now, onto what looked like a bidding platform in a walled off private room. Tables were arranged around a stage, and various aliens sat around the tables, raising bidding fans, telling Ford this was an auction room.

Ford looked on the stage and saw the auctioneer and staff members wheel off a golden statue of an alien, its expression twisted in agony, delivering it to the highest bidder.

The elevator doors opened, and Diñeiro walked out of the skybox to the side of the stage. Ford had no choice but to follow and could hear the auctioneer wrap up the sale.

“The Exquisite Agony of Midas, a refined piece of performance art, goes to the sentient mass of tentacles in the pink glasses for 70,000 QUID. Congratulations ma’am.”

Polite applause sounded around the room, and Ford stood over by the far wall with Tone, as Diñeiro spoke to one of his staff members to the side of the auction hall. Ford tried to listen in to what Raha was saying but was distracted by the amplified voice of the auctioneer.

“Our next lot freshly delivered today. A genuine, bonafide human being direct from the Earth in dimension 46’/.”

The crowd erupted in awed tittering ‘oohs’ and Stanford abandoned his attempts to eavesdrop on Diñeiro, turning to face the stage, dreading what he would see.

Stripped of his coverings, the scarves he so carefully covered himself with, Sandeep was dragged onto the stage, a high-tech muzzle fastened around his face, his hands bound behind his back. The scars that covered his body were on display as much as he was, and he had blood on his cheek, a cut above his eye, and blood running down his chest. Judging from the firm grip Diñeiro’s workers had on Sandeep’s arms, and the way he dug his heels into the floor, even as he was lifted and dragged onto the stage, Sandeep hadn’t stopped fighting since his capture.

He attempted to struggle, still fighting now, and Ford felt sick to his stomach, seeing the various aliens seated at tables lean forward, enraptured by his suffering. Murmurs burst through the crowd, Sandeep’s arrival titillating the audience just as much as his fighting spirit did. The bidders were like sharks, and Sandeep’s fierce defiance was blood in the water to them.

“Pre-loved, yes but don’t let that deter you.” The auctioneer continued, selling Sandeep so callously. What creature in their right mind would see the scars on Sandeep’s body and call that love? “Fighting fit, and full of energy, this firecracker of a human just won’t quit, and that longevity is a quality I’m sure we can all admire in a prospective acquisition. A rare addition to any god’s retinue of worshippers, already primed for subservience, this human would be the second-hand jewel of your collection.”

Sandeep glared at the crowd, silenced by the muzzle, clearly ready to spit venom at anyone who so much as raised a bidding fan. Rather than deter the crowd, this seemed to delight them, and the aliens grabbed their bidding fans in anticipation.

Sandeep’s eyes scoured the crowd, and as he glared at the array of his new prospective owners, his eyes met with Stanford and widened in shock.

Ford cringed, reading the confusion, hope and disbelief on Sandeep’s face.

“Let’s start the bidding at 20,000 QUID. Nice and low.”

The aliens in the crowd began to raise their bidding fans, the auctioneer calling out the bids, but Ford couldn’t hear them, fixated on the dawning expression of betrayal on Sandeep’s face. The hope was leeching away, being replaced with angered understanding.

It must look like Ford had betrayed him, standing on the bidder’s side of the stage in a tuxedo, dressed to the nines and walking freely beside the market’s big boss, while Sandeep was stripped, bound and muzzled up on stage. While Ford was just as trapped as Sandeep was technically, it must look as though he was standing there a free man, while Sandeep was in chains.

It must look like Ford had sold Sandeep out for his own freedom. Sold all of them out.

Even though he did no such thing, as Sandeep’s eyes narrowed at Ford in disgust, Stanford felt like he had betrayed them all.

Maybe he had.

Diñeiro finished talking to his associates at the auction, and nudged Ford with his elbow.

“Come on, time to get moving.”

With no choice but to follow, Ford re-embarked into the golden skybox elevator, casting one last regretful look over his shoulder to Sandeep on stage.

Sandeep’s eyes followed him all the way up, the guilt boring deep holes into Stanford’s soul the further away from Sandeep the skybox flew.

This was something that Ford couldn’t shift the blame onto Bill for in his mind.

He couldn’t shift the blame for Sandeep’s fate.

This was his fault.

Seated on the skimmer, the vessel smoothly speeding along between dimensions, Stanford clenched his hands tightly as he looked down at his lap, stewing in guilt.

He should have been looking around the plush cream leather interior of the ship, soaking up the amenities while he had them. Interdimensional suspension steering, an open bar, and free canapes were all on offer in this luxuriant spaceship, but Ford couldn’t pull himself out of his head long enough to look any higher than his knees, guilt overwhelming him.
He couldn’t bear to look up at the lavish delights available to him, and he closed his eyes, screwing them shut.

“Hey. Someone stick him or something.”

Ford opened his eyes warily, just as one of Diñeiro’s henchmen approached him, holding out some sort of device that looked like a cross between a taser and a baton.

When his eyes opened, the henchman backed away.

“No falling asleep now, you hear.” Diñeiro puffed on his cigar, looking across the cabin at Stanford, holding his journal on his lap, reading through it. “It’s not that I don’t trust your survival instincts, but I can’t have you tipping Cipher off in the mindscape. That ain’t gonna fly. You’re my human now.”

Well, he certainly wasn’t up on that auction stage, but the result was about the same. Ford felt the bitterness brewing within him like black coffee, somewhat dissatisfied that amidst all these aliens deciding Ford belonged to them, no one seemed willing to acknowledge that Ford was his own man.

The only person that had a genuine claim to Ford was Bill, and that was because they shook on it, the deal seeming that much more onerous in hindsight, rather than romantic as it was at the time.

Ford almost wished he could fall asleep, so he could talk to Bill. Tell him Diñeiro’s location just to watch his muse devastate the repulsive mobster as he so deserved, considering how willing he was to trade lives like chattel. To treat Ford like a possession, not a person.

Ford felt like he had more agency as an individual when Bill possessed him, and that was saying something, speaking of possession.

If he closed his eyes and let Bill into his mind now, he wondered what would happen. What would happen to Diñeiro. The darker part of Ford’s psyche wanted to see what would happen to the man who thought he pulled the strings, to see what would occur when he discovered how deadly a puppet could be.

This was a darker train of thought than Ford was used to, but his adventures no longer seemed dreamlike or fanciful now. Things seemed real, and dark, and dangerous and Stanford’s ire bubbled beneath the bitterness, longing to follow suit.

“Do you really think he’ll do what you say? That he’ll work for you?” Ford asked Raha, considering his own value to Bill. “He won’t.”

Smirking back at Stanford, remembering the video call, Diñeiro’s eyes burned with surety as the space ship warped through dimensional gaps.

“Is that a bet?”

Chapter End Notes
BET ON IT BET ON IT BET ON IT BET ON IT BET ON IT - alright I'll leave the wildcats out of it.
I hope you enjoyed the chapter, it was a lot of fun to write, and for those who aren't keen on waiting it will please you to know that I'm already 3/4 of the way through the next chapter and it will be ACTION PACKED!

This chapter is dedicated to Thelema_Rhoias who's running commentary, essay length comments, song recommendations and carefully crafted artworks have been an absolute delight. I am sure I'll know when you get up to this chapter hahah and when you read the dedication at the end. I'm looking forward to your reaction.

Next chapter we have some high stakes gambles, dicey situations, and you get to see Pyronica in a very jazzy dress, she looks gorgeous. Lucky you. Who can guess where we're going next?
“Baby needs a new pair of shoes, come on!”

Stanford stood around the craps table, well aware of Diñeiro’s security detail standing beside him, and watched the nine-armed mobster roll his dice, his expression deeply resigned.

The dice landed and the aliens around the table threw their hands up (those of which had hands) cheering loudly as Diñeiro shouted out his victory.

“Come to papa!” Diñeiro crowed, scooping the chips up off the craps table as the dealer pushed them over to him.

“How many shoes you got already, Boss?” One of Diñeiro’s henchmen leaned down to ask him, fluffing Diñeiro’s ego.

“Enough for every fuckin’ millipede in Millpodia.” Diñeiro chortled, stacking his chips up with satisfaction, moving the clay pieces around to place his next bet. “All mine.”

Stanford wasn’t sure what was harder to believe – that one man could take such pleasure from gambling after so many hours of doing the same thing or that Raha Diñeiro could remain so self-congratulatory after all of it. It was clear the man wasn’t hurting for money and those with money seemed more inclined to gamble with it than those without, but it had been 20 hours already.

Surrounded by a crowd of hulking yes-men congratulating Raha’s every roll, Ford began to wonder if they were there as emotional security for Diñeiro as well as for personal security. They seemed to be sucking up to the purple mobster like it would secure them a wage increase but, from what Ford had seen, that wasn’t very likely.

Diñeiro was as miserly as he was egotistical. He only seemed to be generous with himself, as Stanford was coming to realise, his stomach rumbling now, having not been permitted or offered any sustenance past that first glass of scotch. He was starting to get quite irritable.

When first arriving in Cynn City, Stanford had been in awe.

Cynn City comprised of a multitude of brightly lit, opulent casinos hosted on the one travelling spacecraft, enclosed within the dome of the city. Luxuriant and indulgent, expensive futuristic art deco stylings furnished the lavish buildings, courtyards, and show halls of Cynn City, the spacecraft doubling as a tourist destination and the home of the central governing authority of the dimension. Cynn City was the destination for gambling in the multiverse.

The enormous casino was docked on Auspicia, the chosen hosting planet in Lottocron 9, the gambling dimension. Auspicia had been picked by the annual lottery to host Cynn City, as decided by the central governing authority of the gambling dimension. Each planet in Lottocron 9 entered the lottery to win a chance to host Cynn City’s spacecraft society and it was a great honour to host the highest gambliningants of the galaxy, each member of the governing body elected to the role via random number generator.
With its bright lights, jazzy musical shows, pleasantly chiming slot machines, endless roulette wheels, craps tables, and gaming halls, it was like someone shoved Las Vegas in Stanford’s faulty photocopier in the attic and let the results run rampant. There was excess and sin all around, gambling as far as the eye could see. It was like the mob took over the entire galaxy, except there was no mob as gambling was not only legal in Cynn City, but mandatory.

In the casino hall around him there were roulette wheels spinning, card games being played, dice being thrown, with every patron sipping champagne, dressed to the nines in expensive looking gowns and suits. On a stage towards the back of the hall, a group of four-armed, bark haired woman wearing sparkling leotards and waving large feathered fans crooned a jazzy song, clicking their fingers and swaying in unison while the patrons of the casino danced along and applauded.

This place was entertainment incarnate, a jovial display of richness and frivolity, where the champagne kept flowing, and the party didn’t stop.

Stanford realised with a grumble that this was exactly the sort of place that Stanley would have loved but, given Ford’s current situation, it just made him cranky. He was here as a prisoner after all, as professional bait, and that didn’t allow him a lot of room for leeway when it came to branching out and exploring the peculiar dimension on his own, or enjoying the riches and entertainment on offer. As lovely as the singing was over by the stage, Stanford found himself more and more frustrated with every gambling themed song the band would play.

Raha Diñeiro kept Stanford on a short leash, making good on his demand that Stanford remain in his sight at all times. Ford had no wriggle room. He was to stand at Raha’s side all evening, watching the mobster gamble his inordinate wealth away, which wouldn’t have been so terrible if Diñeiro didn’t keep humiliating Ford the entire time.

Holding up the dice in front of Stanford’s face in one of his nine hands, Diñeiro didn’t even look at Stanford. Everyone else was looking though. Ford felt like he’d rather go back to the Pirahn pirates rather than have such an attentive audience every time Diñeiro tried to humiliate Stanford like this.

“Blow on ‘em, Poster Boy.” Diñeiro demanded. “Make it nice and lucky this time.”

“I – air can’t convey luck – it doesn’t –“ Ford protested, knowing his protests would fall on intentionally deaf ears.

“Sure it does. You’re my lucky charm, see?” Diñeiro turned around in his seat to give Stanford a weighted look. “And if I say blow, what do you do?”

His cheeks flushing with indignation, Stanford resisted for a moment, trying to claw back his dignity for as long as he could, before Diñeiro’s henchmen pressed the sharp point of a shiv to Ford’s side, making his options inherently clear.

Hating every second of the humiliation, Ford leaned forward and obediently blew on Diñeiro’s dice, bristling with venom, wishing nothing but bad luck on Raha’s throw.

His scathing wish for bad luck had no effect, it seemed, as when Diñeiro rolled, he came out on top, yet again.

Stanford bristled at the applause, the four armed, four eyed inhabitants of Lottocron 9 doubling the clapping around the table, joining in with Diñeiro’s sycophantic crew. He had no choice but to endure the congratulations, another round of the aliens praising Diñeiro’s ‘lucky charm’ without acknowledging that Stanford was being held here against his will.

An attendant in a sparkling, skimpy feathered outfit came to offer champagne around the table, smiling widely at them all with mint green teeth, and Diñeiro took three flutes of champagne for himself, holding them in three of his arms as he began passing out champagne to his other cronies, each of them toasting to Raha’s success.

Stanford noted how Diñeiro didn’t pass him a glass and realised that the purple mobster must have picked up on Stanford’s withering trust in him. He rewarded loyalty, or so he said, but Stanford had no intention of displaying loyalty or sucking up to the man who broke his nose, sliced his neck, and told him it was all part of the job description.

He knew he’d be better served to at least pretend that he was on Diñeiro’s side, despite cultivating a deep sense of loathing for the man, but it seemed Ford wasn’t very good at veiling his disdain.

A seditious thought kept repeating itself, cementing itself insidiously in his mind with frequent regularity. A thought he knew he probably shouldn’t entertain, but the thought remained, nonetheless. A seductive thought that showcased what Ford was coming to believe to be salient fact.

Bill would never do this to me.

Acting as Diñeiro’s leverage to turn the tables on Bill was becoming less and less appealing with every humiliation endured. Diñeiro must have been making assumptions about the way Stanford had been treated, basing his assumptions on the mobster’s own value-based assumptions about humans, and how they were little better than trinkets to be owned in the multiverse.

Diñeiro didn’t know that when Bill clung to Stanford and told him “you’re mine” it meant he would have given him the universe, not regulated him to a mere possession. At times Ford didn’t even know this but he was coming to realise it now.

While Ford knew that Bill often had a strong dislike for the other humans surrounding him, he never felt like Bill ignored Ford’s agency the way Raha did, and he never felt so thoroughly objectified by Bill as he did when he was forced time and time again to blow on Diñeiro’s dice, his ‘lucky charm’.

Ford knew it was beginning to be a pattern with him, and he recognised that, but he couldn’t help but fall back into that tried and true pattern. The pattern of believing Bill wasn’t so bad when confronted with someone worse. Diñeiro being terrible didn’t mean that Bill was any less disastrous, just somewhat more tolerable.

Anything would be better than this.

Diñeiro pulled out another one of his noxious cigars and held it out expectantly, waiting for Stanford to light it for him.

Reluctantly complying, Ford flicked the lighter, the cigar glowing at the end, and felt a sour sympathy for the goo girls he’d seen before in Diñeiro’s skybox.

They don’t have names.

Apparently neither did Ford anymore, since ‘Poster Boy’ seemed favoured over actually using Ford’s real name. Diñeiro never even asked what Ford’s name was and he simmered over the degrading nickname. He’d never hated nicknames from Bill this much, perhaps because they were so often laden with praise or endearment.

Stewing in his own dislike of the situation, he barely noticed when Tone checked his watch and leaned in to whisper in Diñeiro’s ear.
“Huh. It is about that time.” Diñeiro muttered, shooting Stanford a look, before speaking to Tone again. “Any sign of trouble?”

“Nothing from security, Boss, and the dimensional bouncers ain’t seen nothing ding on the scanners. He can’t come here, but there’s no signal from the transponder either.” Tone reported. “I can get us one more sweep with the bouncers, or do you want to call it—“

“Wait.” Diñeiro interrupted Tone, looking across the casino floor. His eyes seemed to glow with delight, as he pointed to the source of said delight.

Stanford raised his head, following the line of Diñeiro’s finger to see something he probably should have spotted before now. She was rather hard to miss.

Standing out of the crowd, literally ten feet taller than most beings, across the room alongside the multitude of four armed Lottocron 9 beings who flocked to Cynn City, stood the pink cyclops woman Stanford had seen in the space field. Bill’s right hand woman.

She towered over the beings in the crowd, easily twice the size of the tallest creature in the room, and apart from being over ten feet tall and pink with horns, she was also wearing a sparkling floor length dress that hugged her figure, a large slit down the side showcasing her flaming legs and the flames clinging to her arms like opera gloves. She wore her cape over one shoulder elegantly and it cascaded behind her, a vibrant magenta curtain. Her dress was studded with glittering pink gems, obviously a statement piece, and it was a wonder that no one had spotted her before now.

Stanford could see Diñeiro’s eyes take her in from the top of her horned head, her hair slicked back artfully, following her curves all the way down to her sparkling pink high heels, and then doubling back to re-examine her cleavage, drinking in the sight of her like too much cheap casino champagne.

“Well.” Diñeiro swallowed, loosening his bowtie and adjusting in his seat. The pink cyclops picked up a cocktail from a tray, towering over the waitress, before looking over at Diñeiro, her big pouty lips smirking subtly at him from across the room.

Diñeiro cleared his throat, before grinning gamely. “This night just got a helluva lot more interesting.”

Sauttering across the gaming hall, her wide hips purposefully swaying, the pink cyclops neared the craps table, looking down at Diñeiro with an unreadable expression, before asking in a sweet voice.

“Is this seat taken?”

“By all means, sweetheart.” Diñeiro gestured to an open stool around the table.

“It’s Pyronica.” The cyclops said swiftly, her sweet tone laced with a sharp edge. She batted her eyelashes at Diñeiro and balanced herself on the stool despite it being far too small for her.

Stanford felt the information he had click together upon hearing the cyclops’s name. Pyronica.

She’s my best friend. A real bright spark. Her name’s Pyronica and she’s a flaming hot comet of chaos.

It seemed like a lifetime ago Bill had told him that. At the time, Ford wasn’t sure what to imagine but it certainly wasn’t this. So, she wasn’t just another one of Bill’s henchmen, like Ford had assumed when he saw her in the space field, but she was Bill’s best friend, his second in command.

A part of Ford imagined Bill wouldn’t cave to Diñeiro’s demands but if Pyronica was here, then the triangle must have something planned. He had sent her to come to his rescue.

She was watching Ford, assessing him coolly from across the table, and for a moment the edge to her expression had Stanford nervous. He swallowed, unable to help the feeling that somehow Pyronica didn’t like him but he remembered Bill saying otherwise.

Well, pass on my hellos to her too, or is that not appropriate?

Oh no, she likes you. Maybe you’ll meet her someday.

Perhaps as Bill’s assurance that Pyronica _would_ like him _was_ a lifetime ago, she staunchly disliked him now. After all, things change.

“Are you playing, gorgeous?” Diñeiro asked her, interrupting the subtle glare she gave Stanford.

“I’ll just watch this round.” Pyronica replied, before leaning her elbow on the table, resting her chin on her hand flirtatiously. “See how lucky you think you are.”

“Oh, I know I’m lucky.” Diñeiro replied smugly, before draping an arm around Stanford’s shoulders, the gesture possessive, proving a point. “I’ve got my lucky charm right here.”

Pyronica’s eye took in the grip Diñeiro had on Ford’s shoulder and the awkward way Stanford tensed at the contact, surmising something, before she rested her other elbow on the table and laced her fingers together, now resting her chin on her tented hands, flames tickling her neck.

“So you do. Looking a little worse for the wear though.”

Stanford’s nose was still red and his lip scabbed over, bruising blossoming around his mouth. The bandage he covered the scar on his neck with was thin, and red bled through the material, standing out against the stark white of his shirt collar. He had a feeling Diñeiro did this on purpose, wanting to highlight Stanford’s injuries rather than downplay them, seeing them as part of his advantage.

Diñeiro’s hand gripped Ford’s shoulder more tightly, squeezing the muscle close to his neck until Stanford was unable to hide his pained grimace.

“He’s been in good company, don’t you worry, Toots.”

“Doesn’t look like it.” Pyronica gave Diñeiro an unimpressed look, before she extended her hand across the table. Addressing Stanford directly, she had her hand closed around something. “Bill asked me to give you this, Six Fingers. For your nose and your neck. Will you take it?”

She opened her hand and a small spiral of blue flame burned in her palm. Ford recognised it immediately as Bill’s flame and his eyes widened in surprise.

Diñeiro’s hand shot out in front of Stanford, holding the human back before he could reach to accept the flame.

“You think I’m lettin’ him take anything you’ve got to give him? What is that, anyway?”

“It’s just a little something to heal the damage you did.” Pyronica narrowed her eye at Raha. “You didn’t have to go cutting him up you know. That was totally uncalled for, not to mention rude.”

“He ain’t gettin’ no healing flame from you. Does that idiot not know what he’s here for now? His magic is my magic. I decide who gets healed, not him. That flame belongs to me.” Diñeiro swiped his hand through the flame in Pyronica’s palm and the blue fire sizzled up, sinking into his skin.

Pyronica shrugged, and sat back at the table, crossing her legs. “Suit yourself. He’s not going to be happy you did that, though.”

“He’s here to make me happy now, not the other way around. You heard our deal.” Diñeiro scowled at the pink cyclops and she puffed her lips out in an exaggerated pout.

“You’re a bad boss to work for.”

“But … you are working for me now?” Diñeiro hoped, enthused by the prospect.

“I’m here, aren’t I?” Pyronica pursed her lips, looking none too pleased about it.

Diñeiro was delighted.

He barked a laugh, elated, and let go of Stanford’s neck. “I can’t believe it. He caved. He really – he hasn’t shook on it yet but this is exactly – just how much is this human worth?”

Pyronica turned her displeased pout onto Stanford, looking him up and down with a scowl. “I personally don’t think he’s worth this much trouble at all. He could have been worth something but that was before he messed up.”

“Ditching on the portal. He told me about that.” Diñeiro surmised, but Pyronica’s scathing look hadn’t left Stanford.

“Sure. The portal was how he messed up.” Pyronica narrowed her eyes, her tone indicating that the portal wasn’t it at all.

Stanford then realised that if indeed Pyronica was Bill’s best friend, she would have been privy to Bill’s reaction to their break up and the initial betrayal. Stanford had no idea how Bill reacted privately, but judging from the way she glared at him, it couldn’t have been good.

She hated Ford for betraying Bill, presumably for hurting him, as there was no doubt that Ford had hurt Bill, despite how much he tried to convince himself otherwise. Bill may have forgiven Ford over and over again, wanting his company to the extent that Bill’s good graces overcame Stanford’s many attempts to distance himself from the God, but judging from the fire in Pyronica’s eyes – his best friend hadn’t.

Maybe she wasn’t here to rescue him. Maybe she had her own agenda.

Diñeiro picked up on the venom in her tone and looked at Stanford curiously.

“What else did he do? There’s more?”

“Why should I tell you?” Pyronica smiled sweetly at Diñeiro, batting her eyelashes at him.

“Because I’m your new boss now, that’s why. So spill.” He leaned across the table, curiously.

Picking her words very carefully, Pyronica spoke. “There was a deal. You know what happens to deal breakers.”

“What kind of a deal?” Diñeiro pressed.

“That’s between him and Bill.” Pyronica smoothly replied, taking a sip from her cocktail.
Turning to face Stanford, Diñeiro nudged him expectantly. “What kind of deal? Tell me.”

Stanford winced, and looked between Diñeiro’s curious gaze and the man standing behind him with the shiv, before looking back at Pyronica. “I can’t … really say.”

“Sure, you can.” Diñeiro gestured for his man to bring the shiv out into the open, pressing it against the bandage on the side of Ford’s neck to motivate him.

“I –” Stanford gritted his teeth, leaning as far away from the point of the shiv as he could, certain that the pressure reopened his wound.

“He can’t say.” Pyronica spoke up quickly and it almost seemed to Ford like she blurted those words out. “Part of the deal. Gag orders are tricky like that. Of course, no deal comes without consequences.”

“Hmm.” Diñeiro gave Pyronica a considering look, before he waved away his henchman, the shiv going back in the guard’s sleeve.

Stanford rubbed his neck gingerly and privately wondered why Pyronica was lying for him, if she couldn’t stand him.

“I know a guy.” Diñeiro began, lifting his cigar to his lips and puffing smoke. “A contracts lawyer, who supposedly has the one and only get outta jail free card for one of Cipher’s deals. You want a loophole out of a deal, then you go see Loophole, or so they’re saying on the street. You wouldn’t be able to verify that for me, would you Toots?”

“It’s Pyronica.” Pyronica said coldly, and narrowed her eye at Diñeiro, saying little else.

“So, he does have one.” Diñeiro surmised from her silence. “Interesting. Not saying I’d use a boon like that on someone else, but I’m sure that’d be a way to loosen Poster Boy’s tongue. Providing Cipher doesn’t just undo the deal when I ask him to do it.”

“Bill doesn’t undo deals.” Pyronica stated coolly.

“We’ll see.” Diñeiro shrugged. “With the right leverage, anything can happen.”

The cyclops and the mobster stared at each other, challenging smug with icy.

While their attention was otherwise occupied, Stanford boggled at the thought of there being a way to get out of a deal with Bill. While he wasn’t 100% certain he actually did want to get out of his current deal with Bill, just the thought that it was possible had his brain spinning. Maybe he wasn’t so entrenched in his fate after all? It would be worth looking into, if nothing else.

Breaking free from his staring contest with Pyronica, Diñeiro arranged his chips on the table, and reached for the dice, ready to play another round.

“So why are you really here, Toots?” Diñeiro asked Pyronica, setting up his play. “Cause I didn’t just come here to gamble. Blow.”

He held his dice up to Ford again and once more Ford gritted his teeth. Revulsion, frustration and pained humiliation was clear on his face, and saving his pride, he resisted, choosing not to comply.

Before Diñeiro could force Ford’s hand, Pyronica spoke up, her voice much gentler than before.

“You really are just like Bill.”
Ford blinked at her, stunned, before sharply saying, “No, I’m not.”

“Yes, you are. I can see it in your eyes.” Pyronica watched Ford, her expression softer than it had been all night, more genuine, in any case. “He’d hate this too, in your situation. Like burning.”

“So, I’ll have him blow on my dice next time.” Dîñeiro said sullenly, trying to interject in the conversation, but Pyronica paid him no mind, continuing to watch Stanford with a fondness that he hadn’t expected from her.

“You don’t know how many times he’s been through this.” Pyronica continued, holding Stanford’s attention. “Or what he’s had to do to get out of it. No matter where you go in the universe, there will always be people like him.”

She jerked his head in Dîñeiro’s direction, still refusing to break eye contact with Stanford, much to Dîñeiro’s displeasure.

“Existence drives us to do the things we do to survive and sometimes that takes us to dark places, but Bill has always been able to see the light at the other side. He’s been able to set the fire through which we see. He probably still sees the light for you too. That’s why he hasn’t given up on you.”

“He should.” Stanford said, the words sticking in his throat.

Her serious mood shifting to brevity Pyronica scoffed and rolled her eye before examining her pink painted claws the same way Bill would often check his nails needlessly. Ford wondered if he picked it up from her or if she picked it up from him.

“Well duh, that’s what I’ve been telling him. Figures you both wouldn’t listen. You’re just as stubborn as each other, I swear.” Flicking her finger in Ford’s direction, she smirked. “That’s another thing you have in common.”

Unsettled by the easy camaraderie between them and unnerved by the casual way Pyronica spoke over Raha to connect with his prisoner, rather than re-evaluating his opinion of Stanford, he grumpily shoved his hand in front of Stanford’s face again, holding the dice expectantly.

“Blow.”

“Allow me.” Pyronica leaned across the craps table, emphasising her bosom with the movement, intentionally drawing Dîñeiro’s eye, and she batted her eyelashes at him, waiting.

He held out the dice, flat in his hand, and Pyronica kissed her lips out in an exaggerated pout before blowing a haze of pink flame onto the dice, melting them into liquid until they dripped through Dîñeiro’s fingers and pooled onto the table, the dots melting away until only two remained.

“Snake eyes.” Called the dealer, much to Dîñeiro’s staggered ire.

“Bad luck.” Pyronica wiggled her shoulders flirtatiously, smiling at the mobster.

“I oughta –“

“I didn’t come here to play games. We’re here to make a deal.” Pyronica reminded the mobster smoothly. She pulled a video transponder out from her purse and tapped on it, drawing attention to it. “So, let’s take this to a room, and I can get Bill on the line.”

“If he was just gonna call anyway, what does he need you for?” Dîñeiro asked Pyronica suspiciously, looking her up and down.
Relying on Diñeiro’s mindset, knowing how he objectified the women around him for a similar purpose, Pyronica gave a ditzy giggle, and held the transponder below her breasts deliberately, the icing on the cake of Diñeiro’s proposed downfall.

“Oh, I’m just here to hold the screen and look pretty.”

Given a little privacy to conduct business, Raha and his crew joined Pyronica in one of the vacant conference rooms in the casino hotel.

There was a vending machine in the corner that resembled one of the slot machines out on the gaming floor. Pyronica had pulled the lever on the machine and gambled on a beverage, her gamble paying off as three ice cream sundaes lined up on the slot machine, a jaunty tune playing as the ice cream sundaes dispensed from the flap below.

Bringing them over to the table, she slid one of the sundaes across to Stanford, taking two for herself, deliberately not offering any to Diñeiro. Aside from that honey coloured drink back at the skybox, Ford hadn’t had any food in the past 24 hours, and despite its sickly sweetness, he was grateful to have something to fill his belly.

“So, are we gettin’ this call moving or what?” Diñeiro questioned impatiently.

“I can dial him now.” Pyronica assured him, before noting the way Stanford had scarfed down his sundae, it barely touching the sides. “Do we want more food? Snacks?”

“Let’s just get this over with already.” Diñeiro grumbled, disliking the way Pyronica adhered to her own schedule rather than his. He was supposed to be in control of this meeting, not her and certainly not Bill.

Regardless of his ire, Pyronica sashayed back over to the vending machine and pulled the lever again. “I’m going to get more snacks.”

Another lucky pull had all three squares on the vending machine line up with pictures of cherries and a bowl dispensed under the vending machine before the machine dinged and a deluge of cherries fell down from the slot at the bottom.

“Enough with the snacks.” Diñeiro groaned, purposefully snide. “It’s no wonder you’re so big.”

Taking the bowl and walking it back over to the table, Pyronica slammed the bowl down on the table in front of Stanford, glaring at Diñeiro before forcing a sweet smile.

Again, looking at Stanford, not Diñeiro, Pyronica asked. “You want anything else, hun?”

“He’s fine.” Diñeiro interjected, pissed off with the amount of deference Bill’s henchman was showing to someone other than himself.

“I’m not asking you, I’m asking Six Fingers.” Pyronica snapped.

Ford reached out to the bowl of cherries and began to hesitantly nibble on a few, picking up on the tension in the air. With the tense attention centred on him, he demurred.
“This is good. Thank you.”

“It’s like nobody’s been feeding him.” Pyronica commented angrily, walking back to her seat at the other end of the conference table. “What, you don’t give your employees lunch breaks now?”

“He can eat on the job.” Diñeiro ground his teeth, agitated. “Now quit stalling and call your damn boss.”

Pyronica raised her brow, amused to note that Diñeiro had stopped inferring that her boss was anyone other than Bill. Settling down comfortably in her chair, she pulled out the transponder and dialled.

Rather than turning the transponder to Diñeiro, she kept the screen facing her as Bill picked up on the other end of the line.

“There she is!” Bill’s voice crowed jubilantly through the device. “How’s Lottocron 9, does it miss me?”

“Like a hole in the head.” Pyronica chuckled, twirling a lock of hair around her finger, looking down at the screen placed in her lap. “It’s boring here without you.”

“It’s boring everywhere without me.” Bill countered cheerfully.

Her easy familiarity with Bill made an odd sort of sense to Stanford, and it amused him to see that they really did act like friends, their relationship not so regimented as Boss and employee, unlike Diñeiro’s crew. It seemed an intentional contrast to Diñeiro’s methods and the henchmen crowding behind Diñeiro shuffled awkwardly where they stood, observing this.

“Do you like my dress?” Pyronica asked coyly, grinning down at Bill.

Diñeiro seemed to assume Pyronica was flirting with Bill but Ford didn’t pick up on that same tone. It felt more like Pyronica was being flirtatious to infuriate Diñeiro rather than out of any romantic sentiment for Bill, almost like they were playing it up to get on the mobster’s nerves. Ford knew what Bill sounded like when he was flirting and it was a lot more awkward than this.

“Very jazzy. I hope you’re turning heads all the way around. The whole 360!”

That sounded ominous.

Pyronica giggled.

Clearing his throat impatiently, Diñeiro made his presence known.

Pyronica looked up at him briefly, before looking back to the screen with a huff. “I think someone wants to talk to you.”

“Put Sixer on the line.” Bill said in response, and Ford could see a vein tick in Diñeiro’s forehead. He could see what Bill was doing and it was working.

Pyronica flipped the screen around and held it across the table, pointing it at Ford, not Diñeiro, and Bill’s yellow countenance filled the screen, catching Ford’s subtle smirk.

“Are you still leaking?” Bill asked him, his eye immediately drawn to Ford’s bandage, the blood seeping through to stain the collar of his silk shirt now.

“Apparently so.” Stanford replied, eating a cherry, trying to hide how amused he was now that Bill had changed the dynamic of the situation thoroughly.

“That’s pretty gross, as far as human functions go. You should work on doing less of it.”

Ford huffed a quiet laugh in agreement, amused by the way Bill showed his concern so callously.

“Nice bowtie.” Bill remarked and Ford felt like rolling his eyes, knowing he couldn’t escape a comment on the bowtie. “It doesn’t suit you.”

“No?” Ford questioned lightly, still stuffing cherries in his mouth.

“Bowties are my thing.” Bill quipped in response. “Not that you don’t look good though. Maybe a little less blood on the collar – that’s more fashion forward. You didn’t take my gift?”

“You aren’t in a position to be handing out gifts.” Diñeiro leaned in front of Stanford, demanding screen presence. “Now see here, Cipher, you’re here to deal with me, not this guy.”

“You’ll get written up by the Feds if you treat all your employees like this, Boss.” Bill said sarcastically, rolling his eyes. “A little extracurricular conversation isn’t a crime, last time I checked, and you’d know.”

“Huh, so you are working for me after all? Caved, have you?” Diñeiro sat back in his chair, trying to seize the advantage, but Bill’s sarcasm allowed no room for that.

“Sure, Boss.” Bill said smoothly, the sarcasm clear as day to Stanford, though it may have gone over Diñeiro’s head in his victory. “But right now, I’m taking my ten. Put Sixer back on.”

Pyronica shifted the screen back to Stanford, delighted to give Raha a hard time.

Ford appreciated Bill’s brevity, but he was still very much a hostage, and he was wondering how Bill was planning to get him out of this situation, as he had no doubt the triangle was up to something. All he could do in the interim was make the best of his situation and keep eating these cherries. He didn’t know when his next meal would be but he had a feeling he wouldn’t be in Diñeiro’s company for long, thanks to Bill.

Call it faith. Ford just knew.

“So, have you seen much of Cynn City? Have you seen that giant fountain with the horse lady out the front? Back in my day, she used to come alive and rampage through the streets. I heard that stopped happening after they banned me from their dimension though, party poopers. Now that was a show! Seen any good shows?” Bill fired questions at Ford conversationally, resting his hand against his bricks like he was reclining, talking only to Stanford.

“No, yes and no.” Ford replied, raising his eyebrow at Bill curiously, wondering why he wanted to waste Diñeiro’s time.

“That’s a shame. You’d probably like it here if you got to explore it a little. Games galore. Just like your dice game with the many D’s.” Bill gave Stanford a hinting look, waggling his brow at him. “You should go out, adventure around a bit. So long as they don’t catch you counting cards, the dimensional bouncers won’t kick you out, and you can play with all the pretty dice to your heart’s content. Get yourself a souvenir. It’s not stealing if you take it from a hotel.”

“Sure, listen to the thief about what’s not stealing.” Diñeiro grumbled, missing the hints Bill was conversationally dropping.
“Oh, I’m sorry Raha, I couldn’t hear you over your enormous black market of illegal and stolen trade. Tell me again about how ethically flawed stealing the little shampoos and minibars and television cubes from hotels is.” Bill scoffed, rolling his eye. “Honestly Sixer, if throwing stones in glass houses was a national sport, Mr Diñeiro would be reigning champion.”

“That’s lot of lip for someone who supposedly works for me now.” Diñeiro scowled at Bill, crossing four of his arms.

“The deal hasn’t been sealed yet.” Bill reminded Raha briskly. “Until you do the paperwork, I’m a free agent.”

“Well then, let’s get down to business, huh?” Diñeiro prompted, trying to regain control over the conversation. “Start talking terms. Let’s hash this out.”

“Fine.” Bill agreed reluctantly, pointing at Stanford. “Sixer, leave the room. Go look at the shiny dice. The adults are talking business.”

Ford narrowed his eyes at that, pausing with a mouthful of cherries. What did Bill think he was doing?

“He stays here.” Diñeiro retorted stubbornly, putting a hand on Ford’s shoulder.

“Oh, let him wander around. You can keep your lackeys on him. I’m sure they wouldn’t mind a bit of a break from exercising their brainpower. What’s the point in dragging them to Lottocron 9 if you don’t let them play a few card games? Off you go, Sixer.” Bill waved Ford away, and his self-assurance almost had some of Diñeiro’s guards making to move along with him, without their boss’s say so.

“I tell my staff what to do.” Diñeiro growled, slamming his fist on the table top.

“Then you won’t mind if they stay for our in-depth intimate discussion about exactly what you need from me, hmm?” Bill countered. “While you rattle off a list of your failings, and what you expect me to fix for you. All your weaknesses bared and vulnerable before the world until such a point that they’re corrected. I can start now if you want. Wouldn’t want to cause you any unnecessary strain from the effort, after all, you are d-“

“Out.” Diñeiro said abruptly, cutting Bill off.

Pointing to his crew, Diñeiro directed the majority of his guards and lesser thugs to leave along with Stanford, only Tone permitted to stay behind.

“All of yous, go watch Poster Boy. Go shoot some craps or somethin’, just don’t let him out of your sight. Tone, you stay here, and the dame stays too. Don’t want you tryin’ anything with the human.”

“Oh, I’m not going anywhere.” Pyronica said lightly, with a pointed smile. “I’m here for you.”

“Don’t you try nothing neither.” Diñeiro pointed at Stanford as he stood up from the table, the other henchmen heading towards the door. “Remember who you work for now.”

Ford said nothing, inclining his head slightly. Before he left, he grabbed as many cherries as he could from the bowl and stuffed them in his pockets.

Walking out of the conference room door with Diñeiro’s escort of goons, Ford could hear Bill’s voice sound out from the transponder.
“What, you don’t give your employees lunch breaks? Humans need to eat, you know.”

Amused by the déjà vu that sentence brought on, Ford smothered his smile as he left the room.

With his escort of Diñeiro’s men scouting the room around him, Stanford relished the freedom exploring the casino granted him. Released from Diñeiro’s side, from the humiliation his captivity entailed, Stanford found himself unwinding from the tension and stress of the past several days. Although he wasn’t out of the woods yet, regarding this unsavoury situation, already he felt lighter, knowing in his gut that somehow Bill was tackling this issue, in his own weird and wonderful way.

Being Diñeiro’s captive was awful, even if it had only been a day or two. Now, away from the mobster, Stanford began to realise how much he missed the freedom to explore.

When he was on the scrap vandals ship, it was like he existed in a self-imposed limbo of monotony, coasting through space collecting debris, and now that he was separated from that lifestyle, in a new dimension with an entirely different status quo to study, and a small modicum of freedom, he felt his innate researcher’s spark rekindle within him.

The people of Lottocron 9 were good natured beings, with hair that grew like jagged tree bark from their scalps, their four arms and four eyes seeking good fortune constantly. Their eyes were dark and gentle, with long lashes, reminding Stanford of doe’s eyes. Their teeth were mint green, and they smiled regularly, appreciating their luck and circumstance.

Stanford was itching for his journal, wanting to make notes on their society, on this peculiar dimension.

Everything about Lottocron 9 was a gamble. Lady Luck was their goddess and faith for the people of Lottocron 9 meant putting their lives in her four lucky hands. Every choice made on Lottocron 9 was offered up to Lady Luck, everything from choosing a life partner to choosing who served as head of state. If people could make their decisions a gamble here, they did it, and as a result most things about Lottocron 9 seemed very laissez faire.

Stanford enjoyed soaking in the carefree atmosphere of the casino like he hadn’t just been kidnapped by pirates, sold out his crewmembers, and been threatened constantly by a purple nine-armed mobster all in the course of the past 48 hours. He took drinks from passing trays and downed them like he hadn’t just been a bartering chip in a dangerous game between a capitalistic megalomaniac and his chaotic ex-boyfriend.

With so much of his fate up in the air, depending on how the conversation in the conference room panned out, Ford felt like he could harken to Lottocron 9’s universal ethos. Blend in. Take a leaf out of their book. Assimilate with the culture.

Let the chips fall where they may. Stanford thought. They will anyway.

Up on the stage at the back of the hall, the group of sequinned singers danced with their feather fans, crooning, their song drifting across the room.

“Life ain’t easy. Life ain’t fair.”
A girl’s gotta fight for her rightful share.
What you gonna do when the chips are down,
now that the chips are down.
What you gonna do when the chips are down,
now that the chips are down.”

Considering how his fate currently seemed to rely on either Bill or Diñeiro winning out in the conference room, Stanford was feeling rather nihilistic about it all, since neither option was favourable.

If Diñeiro won this contest of wits, not only would he own Stanford forever, an eternal bargaining chip to keep Bill in line while he forced the God to bend reality to his whim, but through Bill, the mobster would become unbelievably powerful. Stanford had no illusions about how that power could be abused by a man in Diñeiro’s position. If Bill wasn’t the worst of the worst before, he certainly would be under Diñeiro’s employ.

Then again, if Bill agreed to work for Diñeiro there was the likely condition that he’d demand the mobster hand Ford over and his freedom would shrivel up the moment Diñeiro handed Ford to Bill. While Bill was currently better than Diñeiro in Ford’s eyes, neither option was appealing to Stanford, as neither option allowed him to retain any of his own agency.

“Help yourself, to hell with the rest.
Even the one who loves you the best.
What you gonna do when the chips are down,
now that the chips are down.”

The girls on stage continued to sing, although lost in thought, the scientist was barely paying attention.

Stanford needed a third option.

Plucking his third drink from a serving tray, he wandered through the casino, taking in the various statues and artworks and advertised prizes, his mind churning through the pleasant buzz of alcohol for an out.

He’d travelled through the multiverse and made it all the way to Lottocron 9, but if he left his fate in the hands of Lady Luck, or more realistically in the hands of the people who, by all rights, he should still be running from, then he was a fool. Damn cultural sensitivity, but it was true. He needed to make his own luck.

Perusing the wall of prizes, Stanford paused, his eyes lingering on the display. A particular prize caught his eye, but it wasn’t the golden statues or the gem encrusted trophies that lined the cabinets.

He had a very vague recollection of what it might be.

It had seemed like so long ago, when he was still building the portal. When they were still happy.

Say I want to take the Alphecca exit to Lottocron 9, I plug it in and boom, fast tracked travel to the dimension of gambling and good times.

Ford chewed on the cherries in his pockets slowly now as he paced closer to the prize wall, thinking rather bitterly that if he had known he’d end up at Lottocron 9 under these circumstances, he may as well have stayed at home.
It sounded so enticing when Bill spoke about it. What else was it he had said?

Ford thought back on that kiss they had shared in the kitchen, after their game of D&D & More D, and he froze, his eyes glued to the prize wall, stunned as things began to click in his mind.

Did you know there’s such a thing as an Infinity Sided Die? Bill had asked him, breathing fire in the air between them before pressing another hot kiss to Stanford’s face. There’s only two in existence and they’re banned in nine thousand dimensions –

Ford dropped the cherry stem he was holding on the floor and stepped closer to the display case, pressing his fingers against the glass.

Nestled on a velvet cushion in the middle of a small hinged box sat a glowing, multi-sided die. The symbols on each surface of the die changed shape and colour every second Ford continued to stare at it. The outcomes on the die continued shifting, infinite outcomes in infinite colours, spiralling and warping and varying hypnotically, like the wheel of a kaleidoscope, entrancing Stanford thoroughly.

Bill’s remembered words echoed in Ford’s head.

- Because anything can happen when they’re rolled.

Anything.

Ford swallowed, staring at the die, things piecing together.

Maybe this wasn’t luck or fate. Maybe this was planned. Perhaps Stanford wasn’t in a position to make his own luck, but subtly Bill had laid down the clues Ford needed to do just that.

Sixer, leave the room. Go look at the shiny dice. The adults are talking business.

Stanford thought that Bill was just being patronising but, in hindsight, he couldn’t be more clear.

So long as they don’t catch you counting cards, the dimensional bouncers won’t kick you out, and you can play with all the pretty dice to your heart’s content.

This was his third option.

Get yourself a souvenir.

This was his way out. Bill had practically gift wrapped it for him, a way around the politics and posturing going on between him and Diñeiro, a way to escape it all without the triangle losing face. A way to choose his own fate. And all the while securing himself the prize he was promised so long ago.

It’s not stealing if you take it from a hotel.

Ford began to grin, his reflection playing on the surface of the glass cabinet, as the infinity sided die glowed behind it.

“Mighty fine specimen isn’t it?” One of the four eyed beings of Lottocron 9 asked, also admiring the prizes. From the pin on the front of his suit, Stanford assumed this man worked for the casino.

“Comes in infinite colours, but only two sizes.”

“Mmhmm.” Stanford nodded absently, his mind still churning with possibility.
“I own this one. Won it last year from the house. I’ll play you for it, if you like.” The man suggested, and Stanford looked up at the gentleman, reassessing him.

Yes, he wore a pin bearing the casino’s insignia, but below that pin was a label that read ‘reigning poker champion’. Ford’s eyes travelled up and down the man, finding him surprisingly generic, looking like every other four-armed, bark haired fellow on Lottocron 9, but there was a confident glint in his four eyes that made Stanford suspect this man was anything but ordinary. He seemed to think luck was on his side.

Diñeiro’s men were posted around the prize hall, browsing and playing some small games, but Ford knew someone would be watching him.

Yet Diñeiro wasn’t here right now and Stanford would endeavour to do as much as he could get away with, if it helped him escape the mobster for good.

Extending his hand out to the poker champion, Ford introduced himself. “Stanford.”

The poker player clasped Ford’s hand in two of his own hands, giving his hand a friendly shake. “Janak. I take it you’re not from around here.”

Trying to be suave, hoping confidence could carry him, even if it was feigned, Ford chuckled. “What gave it away?”

“Aside from you missing a few crucial limbs?” Janak laughed in a friendly manner, before shrugging, the gesture humble to offset his boast. “Not many people from Cynn City will play me anymore. I’m too lucky, that’s why. I’ve been reigning champion for 3 rotations in a row.”

“How fortuitous.” Ford remarked, walking alongside Janak as they made their way over to the poker tables. Diñeiro’s goons noticed, and made to follow Ford, although they kept a respectable distance away, not stopping him, no doubt curious what Ford would do.

It must have been boring, watching a human meander about, working a security detail at a large and vibrant casino like this without being able to play a few games themselves. This probably passed as entertainment for them, watching Ford play.

As Ford settled down at the table opposite Janak, the dealer shuffled their cards, and Janak looked Ford over, noting the blood on his collar and the swelling around his lip and nose.

“You don’t look like you’ve been too lucky as of late.”

Ford took the cards the dealer slid across the table to him and picked them up. “My luck has to change sometime.”

Stanford was bluffing, and as he examined his cards, he realised he had no clue how to play poker, let alone how to play better than the three-year reigning champion.

Stanley would know how to play and he’d know how to cheat too. He might even get away with it.

Stanford wasn’t as interested in card games like poker growing up, not as much as Stanley was anyway. Ford preferred card games like solitaire and blackjack, games that involved counting and skill. He wasn’t sure if he had much of a poker face either, certain he’d give himself away.

As he considered the cards in his hand, he thought he’d try his luck a different way.

“You know, I’ve never played poker before.”

Janak looked up at him in surprise. “You haven’t?”

“Not ever.” Stanford shook his head, looking at the cards in his hand like he was baffled. Laying them face down on the table, Ford shrugged and lied. “They don’t have this game where I come from. So, I’m afraid if you’re looking for a challenge, it won’t be a successful one with me.”

Janak’s four dark deep eyes echoed disappointment, and he frowned down at the tabletop. “That’s a shame.”

“I’m still happy to play a game with you though. Do you know blackjack? I’ll play you a game of blackjack for the dice.” Ford offered amiably.

“Do I know blackjack?” Janak scoffed, leaning his two elbows on the table while he gestured with his other two arms. “Of course I do, but blackjack’s not poker, is it?”

“I agree, poker takes more skill.” Ford conceded and slid his cards back across to the dealer. “But blackjack offers a much more even playing field, in terms of luck. You did say Lady Luck was on your side, right?”

Janak rubbed his chin, considering Ford’s proposition.

Stanford could almost see the gears turning in Janak’s head, weighing up the comfort and familiarity of playing a game he was skilled at, versus trying his luck, playing a gamble, as the people of Lottocron 9 were so fond of doing. Ford could see the instant Janak’s eyes lit up and he folded his own cards on the table, sliding them back to the dealer.

“Blackjack it is, stranger. Dealer, shuffle please. New game.”

_Hah. Gullible._

Ford watched the dealer collect the cards from the table and begin to shuffle the deck, and he sat back in his chair confidently, loosening his bowtie and letting it hang on either side of his neck.

He might not be as good a gambler as Stanley was but he was no slouch when it came to mathematics.

Time to count some cards.

Pyronica pursed her lips as Raha Diñeiro blew more rancid cigar smoke in her direction, staring down at the screen in her lap.

“So, how much do you know?” He asked, scowling at Bill’s image.
“I’ve always known. It’s like a party trick, knowing the exact date and time of someone’s death. You can tell I’m fun at parties.” Bill drawled, amused, resting his hands under his eye, like a human would rest their chin on their hands.

“Well shit.” Diñeiro rubbed his chin pensively. “How much time do I got left?”

“The clock is ticking, make no mistake.” Bill said evasively. “I don’t think you want a ballpark figure. Most don’t care to watch the time they have left trickle through their fingers.”

“So, help me undo it.” Diñeiro urged Bill.

“Undo what? Your death, or the things you’ve done that are killing you?” Bill clarified.

“The whole fucking shebang. Death, dying. I don’t want to deal with any of it.”

Bill blinked at Diñeiro slowly. “So, you’re saying you want to be immortal?”

“Why shouldn’t I? I don’t want to die. If I don’t want to die now, you think it’ll be easier for me to accept later down the track? I’m never going to accept it, so yeah, immortal. If that’s what it takes.” Diñeiro wiped his hand over his chin and nodded, set in his ways.

“What will happen to the Noire?” Bill asked, his eye darting to the side, looking briefly at Tone, although Diñeiro didn’t notice, too absorbed in his own situation. “Are you going to give it away? Let someone else inherit it?”

“Hell no! They can pry the Noire from my cold dead hands.” Diñeiro growled, slamming his hand against the tabletop. “It’s mine. It’s always been mine.”

“And if you never die?”

“Then it will always be mine.” Diñeiro declared, sounding a little lovestruck by the idea. “The Eternal Cryptix Noire.”

Tone shifted uncomfortably behind his boss, a little perturbed at the thought of potentially spending his entire life regulated to Diñeiro’s assistant, his second in command, never stepping up to the plate. Diñeiro was miserly enough, Tone hadn’t expected too much from the mobster, but after 140 years of service, he anticipated at least a little upward mobility. A chance to make the changes Tone wanted to make to the institution of the Noire. If Diñeiro would never die, Tone had no chance of changing the Noire, or getting a decent holiday for once.

“Immortality isn’t all it’s cracked up to be. Take it from someone who knows.” Bill assured Diñeiro, keeping his tone level and deliberate. “You might not recognise the you you see in the mirror after 20 thousand years, let alone a solid millennium. This isn’t a short-term commitment.”

“You know what is a short-term commitment? Mortality.” Diñeiro spat back. “I didn’t spend the last 189 years building up my business to kick the bucket right before I get to experience my legacy.”

“A legacy isn’t something you experience, it’s something that others do. What is the Noire if not a legacy?” Bill theorized, somewhat philosophically. “Everyone knows the Noire. It is the destination for illegal trade. No trade happens without the Noire knowing about it. Isn’t that legacy enough? You and the people who helped you build it -”

“I did it. All of it. It’s my legacy, and I’m not ready to leave it behind.”
Bill could see the corners of Tone’s mouth turn down, unimpressed with Diñeiro’s possessive statement and Bill knew in that moment how to direct his plan. So far, it was working.

“I want immortality. And not just the shitty prolonged life kind. I want prolonged life, healing, protection from attempted murders, the whole shebang. I hear you can do the whole undying thing. Word on the street says there’s a bounty hunter who reeks of your flame who’s got the whole undying thing going on for her. I want in on that too.”

“A bounty hunter, huh?” Bill rubbed the bricks under his eye, bemused. “Well, it’s nice to know she found a vocation.”

Pyronica made an agreeable noise. “Good for her.”

“What she’s got, I want. Immortality. That’s what you’ll give me.” Diñeiro declared.

Behind him Tone seemed to be slipping quietly into an escalating state of despair, horrified at the prospect of his boss living forever. If Raha Diñeiro lived forever, everyone who worked at the Noire would be run into the ground working for him until their dying day and Diñeiro would just keep on living. It was a nightmare.

“Alright, immortality it is.” Bill clapped his hands together, businesslike. Tone looked up, his expression torn. “You could have picked a better place to seal the deal. I need a handshake to enact it. I can’t exactly mail my power over via carrier pigeon. This just means you get to bring Sixer to me.”

“You think I’m an idiot?” Diñeiro scoffed, crossing his arms over his chest. “I’m not bringing you the kid.”

“Immortality’s a big ask, Raha. You’re not getting it without giving me something of equal value in return.” Bill narrowed his eye at Diñeiro. Pyronica was quiet, inwardly surprised that Bill just described Sixer as an equal trade for immortality.

“If I’m keeping your indentured service, like hell am I giving up the one thing that’s keeping you in line. I’m not just about to hand over the kid.”

“Then I’m not just about to hand over immortality. It doesn’t work like that.”

“You let the dame carry your power over to heal your poster boy. Fat lot of good it did him. So, why can’t it work the same way for me?” Raha posited. “What, did you give it to her in advance to ferry over, or you two got some kind of link going on? How do we make this work long distance?”

“Oh, we’re linked alright. Practically telepathic.” Bill drawled, and Pyronica smirked. “In fact, I bet Pyronica can tell what I’m thinking right now.”

“Go on then, what’s he thinking?” Diñeiro probed, thinking this was for real.

“He thinks you’re an idiot.” Pyronica said with a smirk, before she laughed, placing her hand on her chest. “Oh, sorry, that’s what I was thinking.”

“Keep insulting me like that and I’ll have that knife back to poster boy’s throat in a heartbeat.” Diñeiro threatened.

“He’s not here right now, so somehow I doubt it.” Bill spread his arms out, shrugging facetiously. “You let him out of your sight and if you think he’ll stick around to stay in your dubious employ, you really don’t know Sixer at all.”
Diñeiro’s expression sank rapidly as Bill’s words dawned on him.

“I think I’ve stalled enough now.”

Startled screams began sounding out from the main floor of the casino and Diñeiro’s purple complexion sunk into an ashy grey colour.

“And that’s my cue to hang up.” Bill said cheerfully, his fingers poised to click, shutting off the transmission. “Happy hunting, sucker.”

The screen went blank.

The infinity sided die was sitting in the middle of the blackjack table, brought out of its glass display case as soon as Stanford won his first game.

Reaching across for the die, Ford extended his hand out to grab the box, but Janak’s hands came down on the lid, the four-armed man begging him.

“Please, just one more game. Give me a chance to win it back from you. Please.”

“Well, uh —” Ford frowned at Janak’s hands on the box with consternation, unwilling to part with his prize now that he had won it so easily. He had no intention of risking the loss of his potential key to escape. “I’m really not —”

“It’s been in my possession for years, please, give me another chance to win it back. Lady Luck always smiles on me, I don’t know why she’s turned away from me. I’m fated to own this dice, it’s fated.” Janak said, his voice loud enough to draw the attention of the bouncers around the casino, as well as Diñeiro’s security crew who were keeping watch on Stanford while he roamed the casino floor.

“No, I— I won the dice. Fair and square.” Ford insisted, reaching for the box again.

“If it’s fair, luck will say. If you’re meant to have it, another game will prove it. Play me for it again, please. I’ve never lost this dice in my entire career. Professional gambling is my life. Luck has never abandoned me like that! I’m her most faithful.” Janak pleaded.

“What’s happening over here?” One of the dimensional bouncers asked, approaching the table curiously. The bouncer looked at Janak, recognising him as a regular no doubt, turning to him for an explanation first. “Janak?”

“You know what my lucky streak is like, Brod. I need another chance to win back the dice. This fellow, he’s not from around here. Why should luck smile on him more than she smiles on me?”

Ford shifted awkwardly, the attention turned on him now. He supposed with his split lip, bloodied collar, and cracked glasses he didn’t look like a man who could hold a lucky streak. If Janak wanted a rematch it would be much harder to win by counting cards with the dimensional bouncers right there, looking over his shoulder.

Ford didn’t believe in luck or fate anymore, certainly not like Janak seemed to, he was fully inclined to make his own luck, and allowing a rematch was a sure-fire way to send all his self-made luck spiralling down the drain.

He’d won the dice by cheating and lying, yes, but he meant to keep that dice. He’d wanted it for his own ever since he first heard about it, back in his kitchen on Earth. To him, keeping the dice for himself was only fair, not letting it potentially get swept away from him through the grace of the capricious Lady Luck, who hadn’t seemed to care much for him at all as of late.

“Could I at least have a look at the die first, if we’re going to play for it again?” Ford asked optimistically. “I should like to hold it, just for a moment, if there’s a chance I could lose it myself this next round. I hardly feel like I’ve won it at all, if I can’t even hold it before it’s taken away from me. I need some small reward, as a measure of my success, however brief.”

“But you’ll play another round?” Janak asked Ford, his eyes lighting up.

Stanford nodded stiffly and then held his hand out for the box.

Janak slid the box across the table to Ford, and Ford grabbed the box, holding the case in his hand.

The bouncers were standing over his shoulder, watching him to make sure he didn’t attempt to do anything stupid, like run away with the dice.

Ford intended to do something stupid alright, but he wasn’t running anywhere.

Fumbling with the latch on the box, Ford deliberately spilled the dice out of its velvet niche, tumbling it onto the table. “Oops.”

The Lottocron 9 locals around the table all gasped and lurched forward, trying to catch the dice before it hit the tabletop, but they were too late.

The dice landed and the symbol facing the ceiling had three small circles on it glowing with power.

Within an instant, large soap bubbles began to encase the gamblers surrounding Ford’s table, materialising out of thin air. Janak and the bouncers began floating as the bubbles encapsulating them started to drift up to the ceiling.

Stanford swiped the dice off the tabletop and held it tight in the palm of his hand, refusing to let it go. He was lucky he moved so quickly, as a soap bubble began to encase him too, lifting him up from the floor of the casino, into the air.

People started shrieking, startled gasps and laughter from the more intoxicated guests ringing out as every person in the casino hall began to float to the ceiling, encased in multicoloured soap bubbles of their own.

Stanford could see Diñeiro’s goons floundering, trapped in soap bubbles, staring at Stanford in shock.

Ford pushed on the edge of his bubble and found it didn’t pop, rather it started to roll through the air like a hamster ball, his feet skidding for purchase. Heaving himself against the back of the bubble, he began to push his bubble through the air, away from Diñeiro’s goons before they had the presence of mind to follow him.

Ford ran inside the bubble and the bubble moved through the air in response to his haste, ferrying him to the edge of the main hall that housed the casino’s games tables. The elaborate high-ceilinged rooms and lavish archways between the rooms worked in Ford’s favour as his bubble bounced from room to room.

Looking down he could see that the bubbles seemed to be localised to the main casino room, other casino goers standing on the ground in the next room over, staring up at the bubbled human floating above them with wonder and awe, no doubt assuming this was yet another one of the magic shows that performed on the regular at Cynn City.

Ford waved at one of the onlookers, prompting applause from the aliens watching from the ground.

The applause was interrupted by an enraged shout, the voice unpleasantly familiar.

“HEY! WHERE DO YOU THINK YOU’RE GOING? GET DOWN HERE.”

Raha Diñeiro had run out from the conference room, Tone sprinting out after him, gawking at the bubbles on the ceiling in amazement.

Pyronica exited the conference room after them at a more relaxed pace, but when she saw the bubbles carrying people, floating on the roof of the hall, a vibrant laugh bubbled from her.

“Ohh! That looks like fun! Me next!”

Diñeiro’s enraged expression was more than enough to speed Ford up, and he began moving his bubble faster, his feet peddling against the slippery bottom of the soap bubble, trying to get out of the hall entirely.

Looking over his shoulder he could see Diñeiro charging after him, snatching a blaster from Tone’s jacket pocket as he moved.

“Give me that. Get back down here now Poster Boy, or I’m gonna make you regret hitting the ground.”

“Shit.” Ford swore, and pushed on his bubble more frantically, jumping inside it until the bubble bounced low enough to pass through the doors to the courtyard outside.

His bubble began floating up, higher and higher now, until he was hovering above the giant bronze statue of Lady Luck riding her racing horse. He couldn’t exactly say that he thought this plan through, it wasn’t a plan, it was desperation and the whimsy of sheer probability getting him out of a bad situation, and possibly into a worse one, but his floating bubble could only get him so far.

Cynn City was surrounded by a dome of reinforced glass, enabling the giant spaceship of a city to pass through the galaxy with a steady supply of breathable air. While Stanford apparently no longer needed breathable air to survive, he couldn’t exactly travel through the multiverse in a giant floating bubble, assuming he even made it out of Cynn City alive.

He wouldn’t even get past the dome without some sort of a plan but it didn’t look like he would make it that far.

The loud bang of a blaster sounded out and Diñeiro’s shot burst Ford’s bubble, the plasma blast barely missing his shoulder by an inch.

No longer supported by the gravity defying bubble, Ford fell, and landed on the back of Lady Luck’s horse with a thump, holding onto the bronze statue like his life depended on it. It probably did.
“You get your ass down here right now, or I’ll shoot you again.” Raha threatened, levelling the gun at Ford once more. “This time I won’t miss.”

Ford swallowed and he could see Raha’s finger on the blaster’s trigger, readying the next shot regardless of Stanford’s answer. Unless the statue had any plans to come alive again and trample Diñeiro, Ford’s luck looked like it was about to run out.

Tone was standing next to Diñeiro, nervously looking between Stanford and Raha’s gun. It looked like the assistant was about to do something drastic, but before he could, Raha was swiftly kicked in the back by a large, flaming, glittering stiletto heel.

The mobster flew across the courtyard like a bullet. Stanford could hear the gonging sound Diñeiro made when he hit the base of the bronze statue, feeling the vibrations in his fingertips, the sickening snap of Diñeiro’s bones accompanying the impact.

Pyronica stepped through the archway into the courtyard, grinning widely, revealing far more teeth than was comforting. Stanford looked down from his position on top of Lady Luck’s horse to see Raha groaning in pain on the ground.

“I’ve been waiting to kick your ass ever since you called me Toots.” Pyronica began counting on her fingers. “And Dame. And Doll. And Sweetheart. I’ve told you my name.”

“F-fuck.” Diñeiro coughed and spat up blood. “You bitch.”

“That’s also not my name.” Pyronica gave him an unimpressed look and examined her fingernails idly.

Hacking up more blood, Diñeiro swore. “This is bullshit. I took your boy’s healing flame, aahhgk, it does jack shit.”

“It did exactly what it was supposed to do.” Pyronica replied, crossing her arms. She began walking across the courtyard, crouching in front of Diñeiro’s broken body, poking his leg with her fingertip just to hear him attempt to smother a scream. “It was supposed to heal Sixer’s broken nose and the cut you made on his neck, and look, your nose isn’t broken right now, is it? Just everything else.”

“Fuck!” Diñeiro swore, hissing in pain, letting loose a cavalcade of swear words. “Fuck you and your pointy yellow boss! His shit is weak, weak as fuck! Just like the rest of you trumped up freaks, thinking you’re something you’re not. You ain’t like everyone else, you’re abhorrent! You’re repulsive! You’re a waste of molecules, the lot of you, freaks! I should have known you’d screw me over. Monsters, the whole freakin’ lot of you.”

Pyronica tsked and wagged her finger at Diñeiro. “That’s not very nice. And not very fair either. See, you wouldn’t expect a bandaid to cure grievous internal haemorrhaging, like you’re currently experiencing, and you wouldn’t expect what we gave you to do the same thing either. No, that flame was supposed to do two things – and healing a broken nose and a sliced neck was one of them.”

“What was the other thing then?” Diñeiro questioned weakly.

“Oh.” Pyronica raised her hand, fingers poised to snap. “About thirty seconds of this.”

She snapped her fingers and at first the effect wasn’t obvious from the height that Ford was at, watching from on top of the statue, but soon he could see a familiar yellow glow shining down on the bloodied wetness of Raha’s shirt front, his ribs poking through the skin.
“WHOO! So many broken bones. Honestly, couldn’t have happened to a nicer person.”

Ford knew that voice.

“Quick, make him say he peed his pants.” Pyronica urged.

“Oh, he’s way past that point.”

“Bill?” Ford spoke, his voice sounding distant from the top of the horse.

Ford could see Diñeiro crane his neck back with a horrible cracking sound, and then Bill’s bright yellow slitted eyes were staring up at him.

“Hiya Sixer. Back on the horse, I see.” Bill joked, before convulsing his head back forward, looking over at Tone, who was frozen in place, watching his old boss’s broken body be possessed by the same creature that ripped the skin off one of the merchants in his marketplace. When Bill clicked at Tone with Diñeiro’s broken fingers, Tone jumped, shocked.

“Hey you, soon to be rich guy. Let’s get an audio recording happening here. You’re going to want this on tape.”

Tone blinked, stunned for a second before he fumbled to set up an audio recording, pulling a tablet out from his jacket pocket.

Bill cleared his throat, his voice warping between the triangle’s usual cheerful tone, to a deeper more demonic register, until it levelled out into the gravelly smoker’s brogue of Raha Diñeiro.

“Ahem. Okay, are we rolling?” Bill asked Tone, matching Diñeiro’s voice word for word.

“Allright, so, I Raha Diñeiro, being of most sound mind, hereby revoke all former testamentary dispositions made by me and declare this to be my last Will and Testament.”

Ford could see Tone’s eyes widen, piecing things together.

“What’s your name?” Bill paused to whisper at Tone.

“T-Tone.” Tone stuttered.

“I leave the sum of my wealth, my consolidated assets, and my pride and joy, the Cryptix Noire, to Tone, my most loyal associate. I know he’ll do better things with the Noire than I ever could and I can’t think of anyone better to preserve my legacy. Thank you Tone, you deserve it, every bit of it.” Bill finished solemnly, Diñeiro’s voice sounding genuine and wistful, adding weight to the falsified Will amendment, before snapping back into Bill’s own grating tone. “AAAAAND CUT! You can take that straight to the bank by the way.”

Tone checked the recording before he stuffed the tablet back in his pocket. “This is – thank you.”

“You’re welcome.” Bill said congenially, before flopping Diñeiro’s neck around to look up at Pyronica. “Py, you can take it from here.”

“You’ll want to back out now.” Pyronica warned Bill as she stood up, and began to raise her foot, ready to stomp her heel down onto Diñeiro’s ailing body.

“Have fun!” Bill grinned winsomely at Pyronica until the yellow light died from Diñeiro’s eyes and the mobster came back to himself.

“Ugh.” Diñeiro coughed, sounding utterly wrecked. He blinked his eyes open, to see Pyronica’s flaming heel hovering over him. “Oh fuck.”

“I told you I was here for you. Any last words?” Pyronica asked, tilting her head down at Diñeiro.

The mobster was panting, wind whistling through his lungs, blood dripping down from the side of his mouth, eyes assessing the way Tone turned away from him, refusing to help, before his eyes slid back up to meet Pyronica’s single large eye, his bloodied lips turning up in a sickening smirk.

“Heh. I can see up your skirt, Toots.”

Curling her lip, Pyronica lifted her leg and stomped down on Raha Diñeiro, his bones breaking with a loud crunch, ending his life in an instant.

Ford watched her shake Diñeiro’s blood off her shoe, before wiping the bottom of her high heel on the grass of the courtyard. Pursing her lips, she crouched down to inspect Diñeiro’s squashed corpse, and pinched one of his arms between her thumb and forefinger, lifting his mangled body from the ground.

“You better not give me a stomach ache.” Pyronica mumbled, and Ford barely had time to process what she said before she lifted Diñeiro’s corpse up, opened her mouth unnervingly wide, and dropped the mobster into her mouth.

Ford clung to the bronze horse, his stomach disturbed by the crunching noises he could hear as he watched her chew. She swallowed and licked Diñeiro’s blood off her fingers, before licking her lips and standing upright.

She began to pull a compact mirror and a large tube of lipstick out of her bag, and Ford shrank down close to the statue, hoping she wouldn’t notice him. She reapplied her lipstick, smacking her lips together, before her giant eye glanced up to where Stanford was hiding.

“You’re lucky I’m not eating you too, you know, after what you did to Bill.” Pyronica snapped her compact shut and put it back in her bag. “Sure, he forgives you, but I don’t have to. Not after what you put him through.”

“What I put him through?” Ford spluttered, talking back to her somewhat unwisely.

“I’m not even talking about all the betrayal, back and forth.” Pyronica leaned her forearms against the bronze statue and looked up at Stanford, her large pink eye gazing up at him. She could easily reach up and grab him from here, yank him from the back of the horse and stuff him in her mouth too, she was that tall, but she held back, pillowing her chin on her arms, staring at him. “I’m not even talking about the portal. You really hurt his feelings, you know.”

“No I didn’t – I –” Ford scoffed, shaking his head. “He doesn’t care! He doesn’t have feelings. He – he was just using me!”

“What were you doing when you dragged him down there to live in that skin prison, huh? I know what you wanted. Don’t act like using someone and having feelings for them are mutually exclusive. You did, didn’t you?”

Ford’s protestations dried up in his mouth and he stared down at Pyronica’s giant eye, surprised by her insight. For some reason he didn’t expect it from her, despite recognising that spark of intelligence she possessed. He underestimated her and, judging from the way Diñeiro treated her, he imagined she was either used to that treatment, or relied on it in certain situations.

“Do you still have feelings for him?” Pyronica asked Stanford bluntly.
Ford clenched his jaw, debating whether or not being honest was wise here, given how dangerous the wrong answer could be, but Pyronica’s steady gaze didn’t seem to promise retribution. She seemed to genuinely want to understand.

“I shouldn’t.” Ford finally said.

“Why?” Pyronica questioned.

“He’s done awful things.”

Pyronica blinked slowly at Ford. “Haven’t we all? To survive? Haven’t you?”

“He didn’t need to.” Ford maintained. “There were other ways. He ruined lives.”

“There are always options, yes, but we don’t always see them. You could have ruined someone’s life several times over, and you wouldn’t know it until you’ve already made your decision. Bill isn’t infallible. He’s just like you or me. Can you honestly say that you always make the right decisions?”

“But he’s supposed to be all seeing. All knowing. He should know.” Ford protested weakly, not willing to admit his double standards.

Pyronica gave Stanford a knowing look. “You know he isn’t. Can he see, sure, but does he look? He’s more than just an eye.”

“Why are you so loyal to him? How can you know he’s not just using you too?”

“I know he isn’t. He’s my friend.” Pyronica answered simply.

“But how do you know?” Ford pressed, somewhat desperately.

Pyronica blinked at him slowly and tilted her head at him, like the answer was obvious.

“I listen to my heart.”

As Stanford sat, stunned on the back of Lady Luck’s horse, Pyronica stepped back from the statue and bent down to slide her high heels off, until she stood barefoot on the grass of the courtyard, considerably shorter.

Satisfied, Pyronica then reached her hand up, and Ford tensed as her flaming pink claw passed just a yard below his perch on the statue, swiping right past him.

“Hup.” Pyronica swiped her hand through the air one more time for posterity’s sake, her hand deliberately falling short of reaching Ford, before she put her hands on her hips. “Well, guess I can’t catch you. You’re too high up for me to reach. A pity.”

Ford blinked at her, looking between her high heels on the ground beside her, and the exaggerated way she puffed out her cheeks, like the effort to reach him was just too much for her.

Realising that she was letting him go, Stanford sat up a little, watching her with amazement.

“You should roll that dice of yours again, if you want to get away from here. There’s a high likelihood you’ll get yourself a portal leading out of here, if you act on the window of probability that ends within the next two minutes, or so I’ve been told.” Pyronica examined her nails, acting nonchalant as she so generously gave Stanford the means to escape.
“Thank you.” Ford said earnestly.

“Don’t thank me, I didn’t do anything.” Pyronica held her hands in the air, unable to hide her smile. “Didn’t even catch you, what a shame.”

Ford opened his hand to reveal the infinity sided die nestled within his currently sweaty palm. Readying himself to roll it onto his other hand, he paused, and looked back down at the cyclops.

“Can I ask you a question?”

She blinked up at him, amused. “You mean can you ask me two questions?”

Ignoring her quip, Ford looked down at her, his expression serious.

“What happened to Bill’s dimension?”

Instantly her amused expression dropped, her lips forming a serious line. “Don’t you ever ask him that. Never. Understand?”

“But do you know?” Ford pressed.

“No.” Pyronica shook her head and frowned at him, oozing disapproval.

“Does anyone know?” Ford persisted.

“No one does.” Pyronica answered, her words clipped and abrupt. “Except Bill. And if you care for him at all, you’ll keep it that way. Let it stay buried.”

Rather than answer her or make any promises, Stanford rolled the dice on the flat of his hand. Without looking at the symbol it landed on, Ford closed his hand around the dice again, trusting that Bill’s prediction would pan out.

True enough, a wormhole opened up behind him, ready to suck Stanford through to a different dimension, unknown to him.

Giving Pyronica one last unreadable look, Stanford hurled himself away from Lady Luck’s mighty steed, swan diving dramatically into the wormhole to face whatever awaits him on the other side.

Watching him leave, Pyronica sighed, the wormhole closing up behind the human upon his theatrical departure.

“They’re just as bad as each other.”

Chapter End Notes

Pyronica for MVP, calling it now. Her taking off her shoes so she can't reach Stanford is the equivalent of Mariah Carey putting her sunglasses on and pretending she can't read.

The song the Lottocron 9 ladies are singing is "When the Chips are Down" by Anaïs Mitchell and it's been part of the inspiration for this chapter for a long time, also if you're into inspiring songs for Portal Ford hijinks "Putting on the Ritz" by Taco is a good one to imagine Ford walking through an opulent alien casino to.
This chapter is dedicated to my lovely beta reader, and also to rainbowrat and thelema rhoias who have been making some fantastic art and are keen to make a music video for this fic! How exciting! Best of luck buds :D
I hope you enjoy the chapter, I'll be chinhanding happily with any comments or reviews that come in, always happy to read nice reviews.
Next chapter we have more of Ford's adventures dimension hopping, the M dimension, and a certain infamous tattoo.
Are you sure you want to hear more? What if I ain't worth the while, not the style you'd be looking for. If I'm sweet tonight, things look different in the morning light. I'm jealous and I'm proud. If you hurt my feelings I'll cry out loud.

Chapter Notes

Hello all, thank you for reading if you've got up to the new chapter so far. I wanted to address discussions had on my tumblr surrounding the abusive nature of Bill and Ford's relationship, just wanting to reassure the anon I'm still with you there 100% but things in this chapter and possibly the next do the whole two steps forward one step back thing, so Stanford's still kind of lying to himself here and isn't wholly self aware but he's getting there in his own messed up way. I just wanted to touch in with you to let you know that I intend to depict the abuse and not wash it away or romanticize it, but the characters haven't quite come around to seeing it that way yet. You won't have too long to wait, we're in the second half of the fic now. I hope you all enjoy the chapter.

The wormhole opened up and deposited Ford unceremoniously into a strange new dimension. Falling from a great height, Stanford braced himself as the ground rushed up to meet him.

Gravity was not his friend, but he seemed to have fantastic luck when it came to falling in opportune places. Crashing through the thatch awning of a farmer’s barn, Stanford plummeted face first down upon a zig zagging hay bale.

The hay cushioned his fall and spared him any further injuries. The gash in his neck was injury enough, in Stanford’s opinion.

Spitting out hay from his mouth, Stanford pushed himself up to look around the barn.

The hay bales that he had fallen on were all stacked in purposeful zigzags that looked like the letter M and, as Stanford surveyed the barn, the hay bales weren’t the only artistically arranged M shaped masterpiece within.

Horses had their backs bent in uncomfortable looking contortions, braying in their stalls, resembling the letter M. The chicken clucking atop one of the hay bales was also contorted to resemble the letter M, and as Stanford looked down to the barn floor below, he could see a cow with its back bent to resemble the letter M being milked by a squat man who looked like a child’s anthropomorphic rendition of the letter M, if the letter M had arms, legs, and a face.

“Mmmooooo.” The cow mooed as the M shaped farmer milking her knocked his bucket over in shock.

“Hello.” Stanford greeted the farmer after an awkward pause, knowing how strange he must look to the farmer, deviating from this dimension’s norm, despite how utterly ridiculous that norm may “Meep!” Squeaked the farmer.

Stanford sighed.

“Right. You know what, I’ll just leave.”

“Mait.” The M shaped farmer held out his hand, standing up from his milking stool. “Mho are mou?”

Stanford blinked at the M shaped man for a moment and then pulled out his dimensional translator, the smaller more user-friendly version he’d been given by the scrap vandals, turning it on and off again to test that it was working properly. With the dimensional translator rebooted, Stanford gave the peculiar little man an expectant look.

“Mir?” The M shaped man enquired, confused.

The translator didn’t provide an English translation, perhaps it was so blindingly obvious that the translator didn’t see it as necessary to provide one.

Stanford sighed again, resigning himself to the situation, before he climbed down from the zigzagging hay bales, walking over to the M shaped man before squatting down to meet his eye level.

“I’m to assume that this dimension favours the letter M, yes? And that your language comprises of the letter M littered amongst regular words for no real reason for it other than thematic resonance? And you just asked me who I am?”

“Mes.” The M shaped man confirmed with a nod.

“Right.” Ford huffed an unimpressed breath and extended his hand in greeting towards the little man. “My name is Stanford.”

“My name is Melvin. Mleased to meet mou!” Melvin shook Stanford’s hand enthusiastically, clearly not lacking in friendliness, despite what his dimension lacked in common sense. “Mhere are mou mrom mtranger?”

“Several places.” Stanford replied evasively. “Most recently Lottocron 9. I came here through a dimensional wormhole. I don’t suppose there’s any chance you know of another wormhole that can take me elsewhere?”

Melvin paused thoughtfully, before he gestured to the door. “Mi man make mou mowntown?”

Stanford took a moment to puzzle out a rough translation of that sentence. “Downtown. Right. I suppose I could find more information there, and anywhere is better than here.”

Melvin looked mildly offended for a moment.

“Sorry about your roof.” Stanford tacked on, a thoughtless apology.

“Mi man mend it.” Melvin replied, before waddling out of the barn, waving for Ford to follow him. “Mhis may.”

Stanford followed Melvin, ducking under the M shaped barn door, muttering as he went. “At least mend is a word already.”
“Mi man mrive mou to the Mity.” Melvin called out over his shoulder as he made his way to his vehicle.

Stanford stopped in his tracks when he saw the M shaped car, viscerally offended by the impracticality of the design. The car dipped up and down, the middle of the car nearly dragging along the ground, the front and back of the car spiked up unnecessarily. How could anyone drive in that thing? Who designed it and why were they permitted to design something so thoroughly impractical?

Melvin opened the car door for Stanford politely, before waddling around the other side to hop in the driver’s seat. The M shaped man reached across to pat the seat beside him and Stanford braced himself for how uncomfortable he would be, jamming himself into this M shaped clown car.

He looked over Melvin’s farm briefly, taking in the M shaped fences, the M shaped cottage, the M shaped animals, and the M shaped hedges, with an M shaped rooster perched atop the fence, clucking in a way that sounded less like ‘buck buck cluck’ and more like ‘muck muck muckaa’.

This dimension was clearly a lost cause. Stanford couldn’t stay here.

“To the city.” Ford agreed, squeezing himself into the passenger’s seat of the car, closing the car door behind him, his legs bunched up to his chest.

Whatever gets him out of here quickest. Ten minutes in and this place was already making him feel muicidal.

“And their alphabet, get this, their alphabet is just the letter M repeated 26 times. It’s just the dumbest thing. It makes no sense, just like it makes no sense to design their vacuums in an M shape. It’s not efficient. It’s completely redundant. Why does a universe like that even exist? Why did I have to spend time there? Why did they keep telling me to ‘mave a wonderfull mime!’ – I mean it’s – it’s utterly mupid!”

“Yeah, you tell ‘em, Sixer.”

Two dimensions along now, three years into his post-portal adventures, Stanford found himself wanting to sleep again, not because he had to, but because he wanted to, wanting to dream if only to be able to rant about the M dimension to someone who he knew would understand his frustration.

Ford figured that telling Bill about the places he had already left would be harmless, as he couldn’t exactly track him down to somewhere he no longer was. Telling Bill about his journeys at all seemed like a bad idea if Stanford were thinking logically about it, but honestly, now that he was travelling alone through the multiverse what he really wanted more than anything was a friend to talk to. Staggering what dimensions he told Bill about was the perfect way to mask his current destination while still getting to rant about the places he’d been to a friendly ear.

And after what had happened on Lottocrone 9, maybe Bill was still his friend, or at least more of a friend than Stanford thought.
He was certainly doing Stanford a favour by skimming over their last blow up argument as if it had never happened. It took a certain amount of tolerance and understanding to be able to float deftly over things left unsaid. Stanford was privately quite grateful that he didn’t have his explosive tantrum held over his head throughout their meetings, remembering it vividly.

“Oh, that’s rich. I don’t deserve you. Well guess what? I don’t need you, and if this is how you’re going to act, then I’m clearly better off alone!”

He was thanking his lucky stars that he wasn’t faced with an ‘I told you so’ now that he was back in Bill’s mindscape, given how much he’d needed Bill’s intervention back on Lottocron 9, and how poorly suited he was to actually being alone.

It was much more satisfying to have someone there with him, listening or at least appearing to listen, when Stanford spiralled into another rant about the illogical nature of the M dimension.

“And you know what else didn’t make sense? If everything was M shaped in that dimension, from the animals to the buildings, to the cars and appliances – why weren’t their clothes M shaped, hmm?”

“Well, they were covering M shaped people.” Bill pointed out, floating in the air beside Stanford, lazily examining his nails like he was only half paying attention.

“But the trousers weren’t M shaped.” Stanford deduced, like he’d just found the perfect rebuttal for the M dimension’s existence. “They were three bits of fabric, two pant legs, and one weird middle piece held up by a belt. That’s not M shaped. And the belt wasn’t M shaped.”

“Maybe the buckle was.” Bill began growing and shrinking his nails into pointed claws and back down, not as engaged in the topic of the frustrations of the M dimension as Stanford was.

“The buckle was – that’s not the point. The point is, why bother with all the rest of the illogical M shaped design, if it’s not going to be consistent with everything else? They didn’t commit to it. That’s just – that’s just lazy.”

“Uhuh.” Bill examined his pointy claws, tilting his wrist to better admire them. “You know, I met a guy from the M dimension back in the Infinitentiary.”

“In prison?” Stanford asked, his interest piqued.

“Yep. Back in the not so good old days.” Bill divulged, holding his hand out flat, appreciative of the dark shine of his claws. “You wanna know what they called him?”

Ford squinted, suspicious at the deliberate pause in Bill’s delivery.

“What?” Ford asked warily, suspecting the worst, and the worst was what he got.

“They called him the Mmmmmmurderer.” Bill said before he burst out laughing.

“I suppose you think you’re real funny, don’t you?”

Bill continued to laugh, wiping mirth from the corner of his eye, amused. “It’s true. It’s funny ‘cause it’s true.”

“I’m sure you think the truth is very funny.” Stanford said acidly, his harsh words casual.

Rather than acknowledge Stanford’s barb, Bill floated around him idly, his claws still sharp. “So,
“Where are you now?”

“Elsewhere.” Stanford said evasively.

“Not even a hint?” Bill batted his eyelashes at Ford winsomely.

“I’m not telling you a thing about the places I’ve been until I’m several places away from them.” Stanford wagged his finger chidingly at the triangle. “I have no desire to be caught by you any time soon.”

Bill made a disbelieving noise and pillowed his hands behind him, reclining casually in the air.

Stanford gave Bill a considering look before trying his luck.

“You know, you could call off the bounty. Take down the posters, end the hunt. It wouldn’t take more than a snap of your fingers to get rid of the posters and to call off the whole chase.”

Bill blinked down at Ford, his eye curving in amusement.

“Now why would I do that?”

“I don’t know where you got that idea. I didn’t let you go.” Bill emphasised with a shrug, his tone still quite amused.

“But your friend – she –“

“Are you tattling on Pyronica?” Bill asked Ford, before he wagged his clawed finger back at the human. “Tsk tsk tsk. Poor form trying to get her in trouble. After all she did for you. Feeding you and curb stomping that big bad mobster for you.”

“But you – with Diñeiro you –“

“All I did was have a private conversation with someone who was trying to twist my arm. See, Diñeiro thought he could use the ransom for you as leverage against me and, fancy that, he’s dead now. What a coincidence. Some might call that a life lesson.”

Stanford narrowed his eyes at Bill, trying to see through what the triangle was hinting at.

“Or the opposite, if we’re being literal.” Bill continued, waving his hand as he spoke. “Thems the breaks and Diñeiro broke a lot of bones. I should know. HA!”

Stanford was quiet for a moment, his expression serious, not giving Bill’s joking manner the satisfaction of amusement.

“You know, I think I understand things now. You … you want people to think that Diñeiro died because he tried to blackmail you. And that using me as leverage against you would likely offer the same result. It’s all about reputation for you, and appearance.” Stanford theorised. “Now everyone is going to think you killed Diñeiro because he kidnapped me for his own means, rather than handing me over to you directly.”

“People can think what they want, Sixer. The fact remains - I didn’t kill the guy.” Bill shrugged again, as casual as ever. “I barely had anything at all to do with the situation. I wasn’t even in the same dimension.”
“But you were responsible, you told Pyronica to ‘have fun’, you possessed Diñeiro’s body and altered his final Will so everything he had was taken from him before he died. They may not be able to pin the crime on you but you did it.” Stanford insisted, going over the evidence, trying to make it stick. “And you did it from a dimension you were banned from to prove that it wouldn’t stop you. That your reach extends everywhere. That was deliberate. Now people will think that, even if it isn’t true.”

Bill wrinkled his brow at Ford in irritation. “Of course it’s true. What, you think I can’t be everywhere? That’s the truth.”

“No, it isn’t.” Stanford argued. “If it were true, then you would have caught me by now.”

“Well excuse me, Mr Intergalactic Criminal.” Bill waved his hands in the air, splitting into several copies of himself, each identical triangle taking turns to tell Ford off, floating around Stanford while his words echoed. “What exactly are they going to be thinking about you? You cheated in a card game to steal Lottocron 9’s beloved reality altering dice from them, a dimensional treasure, breaking their sole gambling law to do it. You ran with a gang of illegal scrap vandals, stealing Federation technology from stagnant satellites. You sold out your crew to the black market for your freedom, colluding with kingpin Raha Diñeiro to do it, and the Pirahn captain who captured you is conveniently dead, shot down where he stood, while you sipped cocktails with the head of an interdimensional criminal empire. Doesn’t paint you in the best light, does it, Sixer? Just what will they think about you, hmm?”

“But – that’s not true.” Stanford defended himself, spinning around as he spoke to look each copy of Bill in the eye when they spoke. “I didn’t sell out the scrap vandals, I tried to stop them from being killed and having their organs harvested, that was the first thing I did, and I didn’t kill the Pirahn captain, nor was I ever on Diñeiro’s side – I – okay so I cheated at a card game, but that’s it. That’s – what you said just isn’t true.”

“But that’s what they’re going to think.” Bill pointed out simply, his voice shifting, taunting in a sing song tone. His copies slid back together, syncing up until there was just one of him floating in front of Stanford, looking down at the scientist as he delivered his punch line. “And that’s why the truth is so damn funny.”

Stanford sat back in his chair, taking that in for a moment, looking down into his lap.

Bill floated closer to Stanford curiously, wanting to see the confused and frustrated expression on his face as he processed the crimes he’d now been branded with, wanting the satisfaction of seeing the guilt twist Ford’s expression so fetchingly, but he was surprised to see Stanford looking more thoughtful than frustrated, his eyes clear and pensive before they snapped back to Bill shrewdly.

“All the stories about you. What you’ve done. What you’re capable of. There’s no way of knowing which ones are true or not. Is there? So much of it is conjecture and perception and outright lies.”

Bill blinked at Stanford, floating back as if thrown for a moment, before he narrowed his eye and turned away, not getting the reaction he wanted from the human. Acting casual, Bill shrugged, surveying the library shelves of Ford’s mindscape.

“Sure there is. Just pick the stories you like best and call them the truth. That’s what everyone else does.”

“That’s not the truth though.” Stanford argued, standing up from his chair to try to follow Bill, probing for the truth.
“The truth is relative, like time, space, and reality. Who needs it?” Bill scoffed, waving over his shoulder, still floating away across the library. “Any of it?”

“I want the truth.” Stanford pressed, demanding. “I want to know.”

“Sure you do. You always do. It’s the same old song and dance.” Bill muttered, before dissolving his way out of Stanford’s dream, leaving him with few answers and many questions.

In the next dimension he ventured into he didn’t see Bill when he closed his eyes to sleep, momentarily surprised by his absence, wondering if the God had chosen to break the cycle of the same old song and dance, and as Stanford went about his life in this new dimension he tried to eschew the part of him that felt disappointed by his absence.

In an odd sort of way, Stanford hadn’t expected Bill to avoid him now, not after Lottocron 9. Despite Bill’s barbed words, Stanford was taking note of his actions, and that he had chosen to swallow his pride and at least pretend to work for Diñeiro to spare Stanford a slit throat.

The cut on the side of his neck was scabbing over, and itched frequently, reminding Stanford of the incident, the moment when his adventures became real to him.

He tried not to think on it too much but it was hard not to every time his scabbing cut itched in the tropical heat of this planet. It was hard not to think of the way Bill’s eye widened in panic when the knife sliced Ford’s throat and the way his voice sounded when he urged Diñeiro to stop.

One could have been convinced from Bill’s reaction to the cut on his neck that the triangle harboured genuine feelings for Ford. It made Stanford feel a fondness for the God that he probably didn’t deserve. After all, despite what Pyronica had said, Ford still had no actual confirmation that Bill was capable of feeling things for him.

This dimension he’d arrived at was a barren one seeming mostly uninhabited, although rich with colourful and unique flora, plant-life the only life on the planet apart from him. He spent much of his time wandering through the unoccupied landscape, sweating through the silk shirt and suit jacket Diñeiro’s robots printed for him, cutting strange leaves and flowers from the trees with Diñeiro’s stolen knife, chewing on the brightly coloured petals for lack of sustenance.

He tried not to think about his last meal on Lottocron 9. (What, you don’t give your employees lunch breaks? Humans need to eat, you know.) Or how unfulfilling M shaped muesli bars were when sustaining such an active lifestyle, hiking through the endless rainforest. Eventually the muesli bars ran out.

There was a wide variety of flavours available through this haphazard tasting of flora and Stanford had no doubt that many of the neon glowing plants were likely poisonous, but the alterations Bill had made to his system negated the effects of that.

Stanford had no doubt he could eat rocks, if he so chose, without any ill effects, not accounting for the erosion of his teeth. (He didn’t test that theory again in a hurry.)

He couldn’t attest to the nutrition of the foods he was eating, but somehow, he was surviving, for months on end, despite having no one to talk to.

In this dimension he slept often, trying to prompt a response from the God simply out of a desire for company. When he wasn’t sleeping, he was rolling his infinity sided dice, testing for favourable outcomes.

There weren’t many.

Stanford was holding out hope for another wormhole, or for the dice to manifest a spaceship capable of traversing dimensions in a convenient location, but mostly the dice enacted inane probabilities, like changing the colour of the dirt on the ground, or favouring the evolution of a very large breed of Venus fly trap, or making the water fall upwards when it rained, causing a very brief but impactful drought.

While Stanford noted the probabilities down in his journal, the results weren’t ideal, and he wished idly for an easy out from this existence, wondering if he could live on this planet permanently, involuntary hermitage teaching him an ironic lesson about forgoing botany as an elective in university.

He couldn’t help finding plants dull, he realised, watching the Venus fly traps begin to cannibalise other plants around them, or maybe he didn’t find them dull, they just reminded him of things he regrettably looked upon in fondness, and then he felt guilty for feeling fondness at all.

He couldn’t help but remember those bright yellow eyes, set into the stunning face Ford had sculpted for him, looking up at him as his muse leaned his head back over the arm of the couch, his grin splitting his face like a knife.

“Feed me Seymour.”

That felt like too long ago to still bring Ford joy and amusement in his nostalgia. It felt like he shouldn’t be allowed to look at the cannibalistic plants and smile, remembering how Bill suggested they put up a white picket fence in their yard, only to request the decapitated heads of his enemies stuck upon each spike, hinting at Bill’s sinister nature before Stanford had the wits to see it.

The issue with plants being such unresponsive planetary partners was that Stanford had far too much time left with his own thoughts, and while it could be argued that his thoughts were often remarkable, his tendency to overthink was doing him no favours after his conversation on Lottocron 9.

“I’m not even talking about all the betrayal, back and forth. I’m not even talking about the portal. You really hurt his feelings, you know.”

“He doesn’t care! He doesn’t have feelings. He was just using me!”

“What were you doing when you dragged him down there to live in that skin prison, huh? I know what you wanted. Don’t act like using someone and having feelings for them are mutually exclusive. You did, didn’t you?”

Because he had done what he did to Bill, did that make everything that had happened since then his fault? Was that what Pyronica was saying?

Was he just as bad as Bill was, selfishly binding him on earth to assist his research, culturing those feelings of safety and affection with the god only to betray him in an instant?

Stanford had months of solitude exploring this strange botanical planet to dwell on these questions, but he also had questions of his own.

Did all the things he did to Bill make it okay how Bill was treating him? That was his main question.

How he manipulated him, hurt the people around him, removed words from his vocabulary, slipped inside his head while he was sleeping, taking his body gallivanting off into the woods to do who knows what with all that blood?

Bill certainly, while they were on earth, hadn’t physically hurt Stanford. The runes forbid that. But he’d attempted to hurt other people, tried to run over Dan, stabbed Willow in the leg with a fork, tried to kill her, had some sort of unexplained altercation with Stacey according to Willow, threatened Fiddleford’s life and the life of his son.

Stanford was trying to substantiate the wrongs Bill had done him and the people around him to justify making a decision about Bill’s morality, but Bill was very difficult to assess when it came to morality. The multiverse was proving that Ford’s morality paradigm was simply one of many. And the truth about right and wrong was much more fluid than it seemed.

Which left Stanford awash with questions. Questions about why Bill did the things he did, why he made the choices he made when it came to Stanford.

How he refused to lift the bounty from Ford’s head, even though he could?

Why? Because he found it amusing? Because he couldn’t back down, or admit defeat? Because he was posturing? Because he hadn’t forgiven Stanford?

Ford struggled to understand the God and he found it frustrating that he couldn’t go back to the simple understanding they had before everything exploded so tremendously, when he could sit on the couch with Bill and conduct entire conversations without words while Fiddleford sat beside them, none the wiser. He felt like he couldn’t understand Bill as easily now, every time he tried to, every time he demanded to know what was going on, his muse shut him out – with good reason.

“You don’t understand this.”

“Well, maybe I’d like to if you’d ever let me.”

Finding out the truth about Bill, about why he did the things he did, hoping that knowledge would contribute to all the things about the God that he needed to understand, was becoming Ford’s priority now. He wanted to discover the truth about Bill. He needed to understand the ex-muse again. Even if that understanding revealed that Bill was truly a terrible person.

Ford struggled with that idea, as plainly as it was presented in the universe, because he had seen glimpses through the front Bill put up to the rest of reality, seen glimpses through his crimes and violence and scheming to the being who lay beneath it all, and like Pyronica, those glimpses made him feel for Bill, even if he didn’t want to admit it.

He’d seen Bill do generous things. His henchmen obviously seemed to think he was deserving of loyalty. He avenged Stanford’s misfortune against Diñeiro and redistributed the mobster’s immense wealth, giving it not to himself, but the one person in the Cryptix Noire who might actually do some good with it. He seemed to have his own sense of right and wrong, and while Stanford struggled to wrap his head around it, Bill obviously seemed to have reasons behind the things that he did.

There were hints as well at some kind of great misfortune the muse had endured and Stanford wasn’t sure what to think about it, considering the mixed messages he received about said misfortune.

“Let’s just say there’s a reason there ain’t billions of annoying as fuck triangles running around just like him and that reason thinks its classy for a geometric shape to wear a top hat and a bowtie. Can’t say I’m not grateful though. The universe is bad enough with just the one triangular disaster.”

Diñeiro’s words indicated Bill used to have a family, a society of triangular beings just like him. Like the two triangles he’d drawn in Ford’s mindscape, refusing to explain much to the scientist past the fact that he was drawing ‘dead things’.

The thought of learning more about what had happened gnawed at Ford’s mind, it might be the key to understanding Bill’s entire being.

But it seemed to be the one thing he couldn’t ask.

“Don’t you ever ask him that. Never. Understand?”

The forbidden question consumed Ford’s thoughts but, judging from Pyronica’s vehemence, it wasn’t the sort of thing one could slip into casual conversation.

Still, Ford wanted to know. He wished Bill would just tell him what happened. But he knew he wouldn’t and he knew that was partially his own fault.

“Until you can acknowledge that I actually have emotions, I’m not inclined to show you anything about me. Not until I get some assurances that you won’t be a bull in a china shop with what I show you.”

A bull in a china shop. That’s how their interactions had been. Stanford could admit it, he’d been just as bad as Bill, at least emotionally speaking, dealing with the differences between them.

En had pointed it out to Stanford, she’d made it obvious, as was in her programming to do so. She tried to teach Stanford empathy but it was very hard to feel empathy for someone who had continually done wrong by you, regardless of what wrong you may have done in turn.

(Perhaps that wasn’t the issue, maybe Stanford just lacked empathy in general. This was the first time he had thought about En since the Pirahn pirates captured the ship and he only thought about her in the context of what her words meant in relation to his situation. He tried not to imagine her scrapped bare to her last functioning personality chip and he tried not to feel too guilty about the lack of empathy that enabled that.)

The emotional volatility between him and his muse made it difficult for Stanford to find out more about Bill. That’s what he wanted. That’s what he always wanted. The same old song and dance, if Bill’s parting comment was to be construed that way. Ford wanted to know more about Bill. To study him and learn from him, to understand him.

While his agenda may have changed, seeing merit in discovering the weaknesses that could be used against Bill should he become too dangerous for Ford to handle, he also felt drawn to learning all the other things about the god as well. He would chronicle it all if he could.

Bill wasn’t exactly forthcoming with the details, given how swiftly Stanford could take offence at the details in his life. They’d been throwing each other’s actions in each other’s faces with such regularity it was hard to develop their meetings into a productive conversation. It always delineated into a venomous slinging of insults whenever they talked about their relationship, rather than simply observing the things around them, perhaps due to a crucial split in perspectives.

The more that Ford had seen of the multiverse and the people around him, the more that he was starting to piece together the contributive factors that shaped Bill into the shape he was today and, as insatiable for knowledge now as he ever was, he wanted to know more. But he couldn’t know more without broadening his perspective, stepping outside of the moral boundaries that Stanford deemed to be acceptable.

He was aware of the volatile way his perspective would shift. When they had small moments of peaceful middle ground, Stanford couldn’t possibly see how the triangle could commit the atrocities accused of him, but when they stepped on each other’s nerves suddenly there wasn’t a crime in the universe Stanford couldn’t blame on Bill.

It was an unproductive cycle of inquiry and a staggering amount of emotional bias. His desire to know more about Bill had fallen outside the realms of quantifiable scientific theory, and that is where, Stanford decided, the trouble lay.

He wasn’t being scientific enough about this.

He wanted Bill’s walls to come down once again around him, exposing the vulnerabilities that lay beneath, much like when Stanford removed brick after brick from his body back on earth. Bill let his walls down around him then and all Stanford had to do to make that happen was to not think the worst of Bill.

The rose-coloured glasses he wore then, while regrettable, also gleaned the most volunteered information from the muse. He brought Stanford books, trained him, gave him gifts, altered his constitution, enhanced his learning. The benefits of appealing to Bill’s ego.

Maybe all Stanford needed to do to learn more about Bill was to alter his method.

If he could wear him down the way he once had, then he could open Bill up to him and study him truly, reaching his own conclusion when presented with all the evidence.

He wouldn’t jump to conclusions whether Bill was good or bad, he’d try to remain as clinical as he could be about the entire situation, to curb his temper and make his mind up when he had retained all the information he could about the God. He would also avoid delving into their present or past relationship, as that was certainly a hot button issue for them both.

Perhaps that would be a good way to go about it. Reserve forming any concrete conclusions on Bill until he had all the information. Probe the muse for details until Ford could piece things together in a way that made sense, until he could understand the god – without allowing himself to get carried away by his feelings and emotions.

He just had to pretend that he didn’t expect the worst of Bill. He had to act as if he was unphased by the depth and breadth of Bill’s moral decay, to unearth real factual information about the God that would help Ford understand him, his strengths and weaknesses. He had to remain impassive, non-judgemental, scientific about it all.

His feelings were the real barrier here to true scientific inquiry but he was a man of science. He could do it. Pretend things were fine between them, that he didn’t want to argue with Bill all the time, that he wasn’t equal parts intrigued and repulsed by the being, for the sake of learning and the greater good.

Tossing his infinity sided die again, idly planning out his methodology, he was surprised when he clipped through several dimensions at once and ended up in a very crowded marketplace.

The crowds gave his sudden entry dubious glances, but moved onto their business around him, giving Stanford the impression that people clipped through into their reality all the time.

The crowds were giving Stanford a wide berth actually, which is when he realised that he reeked, having spent weeks in an uninhabited planet, eating strange plants and sweating through his silk dress shirt.

It wasn’t an attractive look.

This was a marketplace. Stanford realised it was time to find some new clothing. He might have to trade a few things to afford it. He needed new clothes and if he was lucky, a place to shower, although judging from the way the locals looked at him, he might get the latter for free.

“Turns out in that dimension the most elevated sense is the olfactory, and it’s also the greatest offense. They eventually just begged me to have a shower, and I was given fragrance scented clothing for free.”

Bill was here again, reluctantly re-appearing in Stanford’s dreams like he hadn’t walked out of them and left him to the perils of the multiverse and his own solitude for several weeks.

He hadn’t said much to Stanford, but the fact that he was there gave Stanford the green light to rattle off a spirited recounting of the past several dimensions he’d visited, hoping to coax the muse into volunteering information himself by fostering some degree of normalcy. By not calling out Bill’s sudden absence and making a big deal out of it, as he once would have.

At first Bill was silent, floating on the other side of the library to Ford, merely staring at him with an unreadable expression on his triangular face. It seemed like Bill was holding himself back, watching Stanford with suspicion, no doubt expecting the familiar pattern, the same old song and dance, and it was only when, heedless of anything barring the fact that Bill was back, Stanford launched into a casual recounting of his past adventures like nothing was wrong - only then did the triangle begin to lose the wariness of his gaze.

It was working.

Indeed, it was as if in telling his story, Stanford distracted Bill from whatever thoughts were keeping him staunchly floating out of Ford’s reach on the other side of his mindscape, slowly charming the triangle across the room towards him until he was floating above the bookshelf nearest to the scientist, the suspicion melting from his eye.

Bill is naturally curious. Ford mentally noted, adding that to his revised list of truths about the triangle that he was compiling. Give him new information to absorb and he’ll stick around to listen. A good way to take him off guard.

“They kept spraying perfume wherever I walked though. They don’t perspire on their planet, so I think they found my continual sweating quite disconcerting. Eventually they just bought me a ticket on an outgoing dimensional vessel and asked me to leave, which is, I guess, one of the more considerate ways of telling someone that they smell bad.”

Looking up at Bill’s form perched in the air beside the bookcase, Stanford gave his new technique a try, Operation Honey over Vinegar commencing.

“I guess I can understand more now why the first thing you did when I came through the portal was to give me a bath.” Stanford laughed with a fondness that was barely feigned, despite how at the time of said ‘bath’ Stanford thought Bill was burning him alive and he could tell by the way Bill’s eye widened and the god floated a little further down that it was working. Stanford’s congenial behaviour was effective.

“Was I really that smelly then? All your friends seemed to think so.” Ford looked Bill in the eye, now that the god was closer to his eye level, drawing him into the conversation properly.

“Not all of them are my friends.” Bill replied, giving away more than Ford had thought he would already. “More like unfortunate acquaintances. And I couldn’t just let them say you stank, even if it’s true.”

“I remember you saying I didn’t smell bad. Does that mean you like the way I smell then?” Ford probed, trying to keep the charm turned on high.

“In moderation.” Bill replied testily, not quite willing to concede niceness to Ford just yet. “A little criticism every now and then is good for you. Wouldn’t want to give you an excuse not to shower. All those years of functional plumbing in your dimension at least had the decency to teach you some shame. If I’m too nice to you, that’ll all go to waste.”

“I’m sure.” Stanford huffed a laugh and gave Bill a wry look. “So, you can still smell things without a nose?”

Bill blinked at the sudden inquiry, surprised when Stanford didn’t argue or snipe back at Bill’s remark, a little wary of how bright Ford’s tone was.

“Regrettably.” Bill eventually answered.

“From the brief glimpse I saw, you seem to be constantly overwhelmed by sensory input, but you must have grown used to it, or I can’t imagine how you’d manage to function.” Ford’s tone was still light. “Is there anything that you don’t like that tips you over?”

Seeing straight through Ford’s casual inquiry, Bill gave Stanford a flat look. “Invasive personal questions might do it.”

“I thought you wanted me to get to know you.” Stanford asked, feigning a mild offence at Bill’s suspicious tone. “I’m taking an interest, why bother coming to see me if you don’t let that interest follow through?”

“Maybe I don’t want you to get to know me.” Bill retorted contrarily. “Not when you’ve already made up your mind about me.”

_Gotcha._ Stanford thought, pleased that his theory was correct.

“Consider this an open mind.” Stanford countered, gesturing around him. “Since there’s no quantifiable truth in the rumours out there, who better to ask for the truth than yourself? Even if you’re only telling me the truth you like best, it’s better I hear it from you than someone else, right?”
Bill suspiciously squinted at Stanford for a while longer, obviously thinking Stanford’s sudden offer was too good to be true.

Stanford was hoping his ulterior motive wasn’t too transparent, trying not to budge on his feigned sincerity, hoping that in this way, giving Bill exactly what he wanted would make him vulnerable, more likely to be honest with him so he could gather information about the triangle.

Refusing to budge, Stanford stared right back at Bill, keeping his expression open and welcoming, even if he was anxiously sweating on the inside.

“I’ll think about it.” Bill said before disappearing from Ford’s dream with a loud pop, making a hasty retreat.

Ford counted that as progress in the right direction.

“The infinity sided die is quite remarkable. The possibilities really are limitless.”

Stanford tossed a mental replica of Fiddleford’s What-the-Heck-a-Hedron in the air like a softball as he spoke, reclining on one of the couches that floated above the library’s shelves.

Bill was less wary this time, sitting perched in a small armchair beside Stanford’s floating couch instead of hovering halfway across the mindscape from him. Stanford counted that as progress too. He’d even coaxed Bill towards normalcy with a cup of imagined tea, his ex-muse now holding the teacup daintily, taking the occasional sip as he listened to Stanford’s adventures.

“I wonder if the probabilities are finite once they’re executed, or if there’s a way to undo the consequences. When I was in the Land of the Blind, I rolled the die to test it out and accidentally changed the colour of the sky. Do you think it’s permanent?”

Bill sipped his tea, before looking up at Ford briefly. “Probably. Although all things considered, you couldn’t have picked a better place to do it.”

“You’re right, it’s not like the citizens will notice. Although their one-eyed king had quite a bit to say about it.”

“I’ll bet.” Bill dropped another imagined sugar cube in his tea and gave it a stir.

Stanford watched Bill closely, before testing a theory.

“They weren’t always blind you know. The people there. They told me someone came and stole all their eyes.”

“Sounds like eye-way robbery.” Bill quipped, letting his teaspoon spin autonomously in his teacup, stirring as he lifted the cup up to inhale the scent, his eye closing as he inhaled.

“Do you know who did it?” Ford probed, having his suspicions that the culprit was sitting opposite him, despite his best attempts to be unbiased.

“It wasn’t me, if that’s what you’re getting at.” Bill scoffed, plucking the teaspoon from his cup, setting it on his saucer as he lifted the teacup to his eye. “I’m not responsible for every bad thing in the multi-verse.”

“I never said you were.” Stanford countered, trying to keep his expression neutral, still open and curious like he actually believed Bill. “Do you know who did it then?”

“I might know one or two people who may have been responsible.” Bill replied evasively, closing his eye to sip his tea.

“The king couldn’t tell me. He survived with his eye intact by hiding. He told me it happened a long time ago, and the citizens couldn’t tell me much. They told me all that they remembered was eyes and then darkness.”

“Fancy that.” Bill said lightly, obviously knowing more than he let on.

Ford stared at Bill stubbornly, waiting for the god to reveal more information, but Bill just kept sipping his tea, unfazed.

Stanford spoke again, trying to mine more information from Bill, who was being uncharacteristically tight lipped.

“When I heard that it wasn’t some evolutionary outlier, but that they’d had their eyes physically ripped from their heads, every one of them, I couldn’t help but feel sorry for them. Going through life with that sort of eye related trauma. When I asked about it, the people started crying without tears. It was awful.”

“So, what? People lose eyes. No need to be a baby about it.” Bill replied dismissively, continuing to sip his tea.

“They were upset Bill. They’d had their eyes ripped out. They have every right to be upset. What happened to them was horrible.” Ford insisted, a little indignant outrage creeping into his voice, despite how hard he tried to keep his tone level.

Rather than rising to Ford’s ire, Bill’s was quiet, his eye downcast, staring at the liquid within the teacup. He was silent for several sullen moments, and Stanford thought it was possible he was feeling guilty, maybe, but then he seemed to gather his composure and he looked out across the library, avoiding Ford’s gaze.

“It was horrible.” He agreed.

Stanford stared at Bill for a while, and sat back in his chair, uncertain what to think now. “I’m glad you think so.”

They sat in awkward silence for a moment longer until Bill broke the ice with a question.

“Where are you now?”

“I am somewhere different now.” Stanford replied cautiously. “I can tell you where I’ve been.”

“But not where you are now.” Bill finished his sentence, his brow furrowed with disappointment.

“No.” Stanford confirmed resolutely.

“Hmm.” Bill mulled that over, looking down at his tea. His expression was hard to read, and Stanford was worried his efforts to wear down Bill’s walls were being undone as the silence
“Where have you been?” Stanford asked, trying to keep the conversation flowing. “Not where you are now? Where have you been in the past? What places did you go to, places I haven’t been to yet?”

“I’ve been everywhere Sixer.” Bill offered, sipping his tea. “Why the sudden interest in retracing my footsteps?”

“I want to know more about you.” Stanford insisted.

“I’m still deciding whether or not you can.” Bill told him. “Although the chance of me letting you is slim, all things considered.”

Stanford was surprised that this prospect was still open at all. Even if he was on the fence about it now, this was confirmation that Bill being honest with him was still on the table. From how suspiciously Bill had been acting, Stanford didn’t think it would still be an option. Despite the probability being low, Stanford thought he’d play the odds.

“What can I do to convince you?”

“Tell me where you are.” Bill answered promptly.

Stanford pulled a face. “What else can I do to convince you?”

Bill set his teacup back on its saucer and floated up from the chair, getting ready to disintegrate from Stanford’s mind once more, his words ringing as an ominous promise in the air as he departed.

“I’ll think about it and let you know.”

“What can you tell me about Bill Cipher?”

Stanford had asked this question over and over again in the past several years, inquiring wherever he went, in every dimension he travelled to, trying to unravel the tangled mystery of who his ex-muse was.

Asking that question hadn’t made him popular. Those who didn’t run away from him shrieking treated him with trepidation, choosing not to help him if he was involved with the feared cosmic triangle. He learned to ask his questions after he’d secured food, lodging, and whatever material possessions he needed, so when he was inevitably chased away for asking, he’d be in good stead to move on to the next place.

He discovered that there wasn’t an awful lot of recorded information about Bill out there in the multi-verse, nothing written down academically that he could read, but there was plenty of hearsay, rumours spreading by word of mouth alone.

Stanford heard that the reason for this was that ‘The Feared Bill Cipher’ didn’t permit things about him to be written down. Stanford thought the reason Bill was so against being chronicled was because he couldn’t choose how he was perceived that way. Rumours he could work with. Bill liked the flattering ones, but the only textual recordings that seemed to exist about Bill may have been the ones in Stanford’s journal, perhaps because Bill found them so flattering.

In his travels, Stanford heard a story about an almanac writer who attempted to log the rumours about Bill in his compendium of beings to look out for in the multi-verse and the stories seemed to indicate that this writer was unceremoniously set on fire over a drawn out period of seventy years by ‘The Capricious Bill Cipher’ as Bill read out the writer’s findings to him and chastised him for leaving out how fun he was at parties.

That sounded like something Bill would do and it suddenly made a lot more sense to Stanford why Bill wasn’t in any of the almanacs he brought for Ford to read.

Couldn’t have the gossip mongering dregs of the multiverse colouring Stanford’s opinion of Bill. Not when his high opinion seemed to be something Bill prized.

As much as he seemed to laugh off the damning things said about him, it was clear to Stanford that Bill still cared about what was said about him, and that made him easier to handle, as Ford continued his plan to wear down Bill’s defences. He had an ego and it could be catered to, enabling Ford to proceed with his plan.

“I almost felt vindicated, honestly. It was quite unusual, that degree of esteem and, well, royalties bestowed upon me for the very thing that made me a freak back on earth.”

“If the multiverse is good for anything, it’s ironic curveballs.” Bill agreed with him, inching closer to him today.

Stanford was laying on the floor of his mental library, resting his feet on the red chaise lounge, recounting his adventures while staring up at the skyscape above him. Bill was reclining on the lounge, his long noodley arms draping down from the edge of the couch to brush his fingertips through the grass on the floor of the library.

Occasionally Ford could feel Bill’s hand brush against the fabric of his imagined jeans, his mind imposing earthly normalcy on him in his slumber, relegated to more futuristic fashion designs in his daily life. Of course, the designs he wore in his daily life would be a dead giveaway to his location in the multiverse so he imagined himself in clothing Bill had seen before on Earth. The thought of wearing denim and his usual buttoned shirt and sweater vest made him feel less like he was a million miles from home and more like he was back in his cabin in Gravity Falls, which made it easier to pretend he was dealing with the same Bill he knew back then and not the Bill he knew now.

“I just never thought I’d find myself in some sort of backwards hierarchy where your societal standing was ranked based on the number of fingers you had. I mean, it makes just as much sense as anything else in the multiverse, which is to say it makes no sense at all.”

“What hierarchy does make sense, when you’re on the bottom of it?” Bill remarked, letting his fingertips drift across the grass. “Hierarchy’s only make sense when you’re on the top.”

“Well, I mean –“ Ford shrugged his shoulders and grinned. “I did like the crown.”

That brokered a smile from the triangle, his eye curving with amusement. “Everyone likes the crown.”

“As inane as it was, that dimension was quite the sweet gig, until Johnny seven fingers came
“Was that really his name?” Bill asked, his eye still curved with delight. “Sixer vs Johnny seven fingers.”

“I didn’t actually stick around long enough to find out. It could have been his real name for all I know. After they ousted me, I made my way elsewhere.” Ford explained, shaking his head with a laugh. “Truthfully, I thought I’d seen it all with the Land of the Blind dimension, unintended pun intended, but the idea that there would be a whole dimension out there that would theoretically put my digit insecurities in perspective is really something else.”

“In the land of the stupid, the six fingered man is king.” Bill recited, morphing his own four fingered hand into a six fingered one briefly, so he could waggle it at Stanford teasingly.

“Well, seven fingered king now.” Ford laughed and propped himself up on his elbows. “It’s probably for the best that I was ousted. I could get a little too used to that kind of treatment.”

“King Sixer?” Bill quirked his brow, before grazing his eye up and down Stanford’s reclining body. “All that power would go to your head. I can guarantee it.”

“Well, knowledge is power, so theoretically that’s the best place it can go.” Stanford countered, smiling cockily at Bill. “I’m sure you would say the same.”

Bill stared at Stanford hard for a moment, before he blinked.

“Why are you here?”

“Why am I in my own head?” Stanford asked effusively, trying to hide his ulterior motives as best as he could.

“Why are you asleep? What happened to those sleep blocking tablets of yours? Did Diñeiro cut you off, or something?”

“No. I still have my belongings from before. In a nano briefcase he gave me. I have to say giving me that was the one useful thing he did for me. Can’t say I’m too grateful for the other things he gave me.” Stanford made a vague gesture at his neck.

“So, you still have them?” Bill pressed, looking at Stanford like he was a particularly challenging puzzle to work out.

“I do.” Stanford answered simply.

“But you’re not taking them. You could be taking them to avoid even having to talk to me. So why aren’t you?”

Stanford could see that Bill seemed inordinately invested in his answer here from the way his eye was fixated intently on his face and that this was the perfect opportunity to further lower Bill’s walls with a few well-placed words.

“Should I be avoiding you?”

Bill’s pupil moved, darting to the side before scouring every inch of Stanford as if doubting what he was seeing, conflicted.

“Last I checked you’d already made up your mind about that. You are avoiding me.”
"But I’m trying to have a more open mind.” Stanford replied. “And you still haven’t answered my question.”

Bill stared hard at Stanford for a moment longer, before he looked down, almost shyly as he spoke. “No.”

“Then I won’t avoid our conversations.” Stanford said decisively. “I’d only need to avoid them if you are a danger to me. Are you a danger to me?”

“Not yet.” Bill said, regarding Stanford curiously.

“That’s why I’m here then.” Stanford summed up, meeting Bill’s curious eye contact, unphased.

Bill hummed, considering that, before very carefully, his eye watching Stanford’s reaction the whole time, he let his arm lengthen, and slowly wind around Ford’s left calf, resting his hand tentatively on Ford’s knee.

When Ford didn’t bat an eyelid at the affectionate touch, Bill seemed to let out some of the tension that was stilling his form.

“This is my head too, you know.” Stanford pointed out, and Bill raised his brow sceptically before dragging his fingertips down Ford’s kneecap purposefully.

The laugh the ticklish movement dragged out of Ford startled him, mostly because unlike the rest of his sentiments in this conversation, it was entirely genuine.

And a little too familiar.

“Parallel dimensions.” Stanford said, closing his eyes and bursting into his mindscape only to immediately lay down face first on the floor.

He didn’t need to check to see if his muse was there. Since Operation Honey over Vinegar started, Bill invariably was, every time he closed his eyes for a little shut eye.

“That bad, huh?” Came Bill’s voice from somewhere behind Stanford’s head, confirming his theory.

Stanford just groaned into the grassy floor, imagining himself a pillow to plant his face in.

The familiarity had returned between them, like they had never been at each other’s throats, and Bill seemed less hesitant around Ford. The plan was working, but Stanford didn’t know if he should still be so pleased when he felt the god settle on top of his head, shrinking his form smaller so he could lay in Stanford’s hair and drape his arms down onto his forehead.

The point of this operation was to study Bill without letting his feelings interfere, so by rights that pleased flutter in his stomach shouldn’t be happening, but Stanford was willing to accept it as one of the perks in his plan. Just as long as it didn’t make him complacent.

He could feel the triangle’s small four fingered hands massaging the frustrated wrinkles away from his brow, before stretching down lower to ruffle through his eyebrows. As odd as it was, Ford found it relaxing, and he closed his eyes, enjoying the fluttery feeling that accompanied it, before he got cheeky.

Another observation he’d made was that jokes were a foolproof way to lower Bill’s guard, and so as the eyebrow massage continued, Stanford let out a loud feigned snore.

Bill snorted a laugh, before he slapped at the side of Ford’s face briskly. “No sleeping in your sleep. What do you think this is, Sixer?”

Stanford pretended to snore louder but cut himself off laughing when he felt Bill’s tiny hands reach down for his eyelids, intending to prise them open.

Ford batted Bill’s hand away and shook his head, before rolling over, wondering if that would dislodge the god from his hair.

Apparently not, as Bill stayed perched in his hair, his hands resting on Ford’s forehead now like he was laying a claim.

Or playing the bongos.

Bill tapped on Ford’s forehead impatiently, asking.

“What about parallel dimensions?”

“They’re just so bizarre.” Stanford answered, resting his hands on his chest, getting comfortable in his own head again, mental roommate and all. “They don’t make any sense. They take ‘what if’ to the extreme. Minor alterations I can understand. Anyone with a basic understanding of the butterfly effect can comprehend that. But some of these places –“

“Tell me.” Bill demanded, and Stanford was delighted to divulge.

“Parallel dimensions where tennis balls chase dogs. Where dolphins rather than Homo Sapiens evolved to be the dominant species. Where dinosaurs never became extinct but somehow evolved into beings who study bar charts in boardrooms and file their taxes. Why would a dinosaur need to file a tax return?”

“In this economy, who doesn’t? The vultures.” Bill quipped, going back to massaging Ford’s forehead idly, no doubt delighting in pushing the flesh around up there into interesting wrinkles.

“There was one dimension where all their music was just screaming. I thought, what if this is some sort of fox-descendant dimension, where screaming is a consistent form of communication? But no, this was earth, and they didn’t communicate through screaming. In their daily lives they didn’t scream at all, it was only when they sang. They weren’t even singing lyrics either, just wordless frantic screaming.”

“There’s a market for that.” Bill replied. “Even outside of that dimension, the Screaming Queens are an interdimensional sensation.”

“No.” Stanford scoffed, disbelieving.

“You’d know that if you had taste.” Bill said matter of factly. “Screaming is super popular. It’s a bop.”

“It’s a what?” Ford rolled his eyes up, trying to look at Bill, his brows questing upwards.
“Never mind, old man. It’s not like you were ever hip to begin with.” Bill sunk his fingers in Ford’s eyebrows again. “Uncool, you were. A nerd. A dork. A total square.”

“Were?” Stanford tilted his head back, trying to catch Bill’s eye. He could vaguely see Bill roll his eye in a way that reminded him quite viscerally of how he would back on Earth in his human body and it jarred Ford momentarily that the gesture was so distinctive.

It felt like he was looking at Bill the way Stanford liked to remember him, instead of scrutinising Bill in his natural form. Stanford had great success splitting the Bill he could trust and the Bill he couldn’t through associating Bill’s crimes and faults with his triangular shape. In looking at Bill who is he now and seeing who he was before, it made Stanford’s perspective waver in a way that felt very tenuous.

He wasn’t here to find Bill endearing. He was here to find out more about him, to discover his weaknesses and use them against him.

“I think the whole interdimensional criminal schtick may have skewed your pocket protector appeal.” Bill glanced at Stanford from beneath his long lashes, his words oozing just as much endearment as Stanford currently felt. “You’re not just a nerd anymore. You’re actually verging on impressive. It’s a good look for you.”

Ford’s heart seemed to beat louder.

He always used to like compliments from his muse. He was surprised they still had the same effect on him, realising that at this point there was a chance they could actually be genuine and not calculated manipulations.

Bill thought he was impressive, enthused his simplest brain cell, and his heart applauded that brain cell with gusto.

It felt just like the good old days, with one prevailing exception.

This was not good.

Not good at all.

And certainly not scientific detachment.

“Babies!” Stanford said loudly, willing his flustered heart rate down, changing the subject the way one would douse cold water over rampant enthusiasm.

The sultry look vanished from Bill’s eye, his brow screwing up in instantaneous disgust.

“What?”

“There was a parallel dimension where the people were all babies. Every one of them.” Stanford babbled, sitting up, unseating his ex-muse from his hair. “All babies. Even the adults. Babies. There were babies with stubble! Babies with beards. Babies everywhere!”

“That sounds disturbing and largely unpleasant.” Bill floated, changing his size now he no longer needed to be small enough to rest in Stanford’s hair, giving the scientist a dubious look.

“And the population was booming. How could the population be booming when the entirety of humanity had only progressed as far as two? How are they reproducing, spawning more spawn? It makes no sense. And the infrastructure! Who was building the baby skyscrapers, and why were there baby engineers and baby construction workers? How could they develop to the point of advanced engineering when their vocabulary wasn’t fully developed? The Pulitzer Prize was awarded to a baby who said ‘Dada’ before all the other babies. But if the entire population subsists as children, how would they even have the concept of parents? Or Pulitzer Prizes?”

Bill was now giving Stanford a flat, unimpressed look that suited his triangular face much more than the soft look of endearment he’d given Stanford before, but his heart was still racing, his scientific rambling hardly doing anything to slow his pulse. He was trying to douse the feelings this situation had brought up with queries about the multiverse, but the only person who seemed to be turned off by all this talk of babies was Bill.

“What a great dimension.” Bill said, his tone saturated with sarcasm. “You’d never want to leave.”

“Ha. Hardly.” Stanford crossed his arms, looking away from the triangle as if he could avoid his feelings by staunchly denying them. “I didn’t linger in that dimension for too long, I can tell you. I don’t care much for being spit up on.”

Although it would be a pleasant alternative to confronting his lingering feelings about the homicidal god sharing his head space.

As Stanford continued his exploration of the multiverse, he found himself fishing for information in Federation ports and cities more than the dimensional outskirts.

While he had to do more to disguise his features to avoid being spotted or hunted for the bounty on his head in the busy ports and city centres (the large polarised goggles he picked up travelling through the dolphin controlled water parks in alternate Earth 111 helped a great deal with this) he found the people there were more free with dispersing information to strangers.

They weren’t as wary to gossip, it seemed. Although with all gossip, the degree of truth at the centre of it all was debatable.

“I’m wondering if you can tell me anything about –“ Stanford leaned down and lowered his voice as he questioned the tipsy looking Krangolin man at the bar, taking advantage of his altered state to fish for some real information. “Bill Cipher.”

“No, Bill. Bill Cipher.” The Krangolin man asked loudly, cupping one of his finned hands to his earhole.

“No, Bill. Bill Cipher.” Stanford stressed, trying to convey this without raising his voice or drawing attention to himself. “I just want some answers about Bi-“

A hand fell on Stanford’s shoulder, and he jolted back in surprise.

“Hello stranger. So, you seek answers, do you?”

Stanford eyed off the newt faced man in suspicion, shrugging their hand off his shoulder.

The man wore a high-necked robe, pale blue with pale pink embroidery running along the seams. His robe had rainbow bubbles sewn onto the base of his floor length skirt, and he held himself with a manner that suggested some degree of piety.

“All answers are provided through the illuminating bubbles of enlightenment breathed out through the gills of our great provider.”

“I’m not looking for religion.” Stanford stood up from his chair decisively, pulling his coat on, making to leave. “I’m looking for answers. Facts.”

“Belief is a truth, even before it is known.” The pious newt man replied, standing in Stanford’s way, recruiting in this dingy bar it seemed. “In the church we know this better than anyone. Pulled by the tides of inevitability, we breathe whatever fleeting pockets of salvation we can, rather than drown beneath the weight of it all.”

“That’s nice. I know how to swim though, so if you don’t mind, I’ll be on my way.”

“Come join us. We have a ceremony for new initiates in an hour, there will be food, counsel, some may even be granted a bubble of truthful enlightenment and prophecy by the divine Ax-“

“Pass.” Stanford grunted as he pushed past the newt man and strode out of the bar, impatient to leave. He knew he outstayed his welcome when he started drawing the attention of preaching clergymen. It was time to move on.

He was a man of science. He wasn’t about to be suckered in by false promises of truth from some other god.

He had the truth about his own god to discover.

But, damn, if the universe didn’t make that hard.

“You’d think that given the advances made in the multiverse, and how supposedly progressive everyone lauds themselves to be, people would have moved past organised religion at this point.” Stanford griped, sitting on the top of the tallest bookshelf in his mental library, just to swing his legs over the edge.

“Those bubble thumpers are all the same, believe me, I know.” Bill concurred, sitting on the bookshelf opposite Stanford, doing the same, his little legs swinging in tandem with Ford’s own movements. “I’ve had my fair share of run ins with them. Ugh, I hate organised religion.”

Stanford blinked at Bill. “That’s a surprise. I mean, I thought what with the whole worship phenomenon, and the fact that you seem convinced you’re a God, you’d be all for that sort of thing.”

“Convinced? Please. Now, don’t get me wrong, Sixer, I love a good bit of worship.”

Stanford tried hard to make his expression impassive, hiding the way those words reminded him of just how he used to worship Bill.

“But the whole organised religion bullshit is just a load of self-congratulatory, self-effacing nonsense.” Bill continued, prompted into a rant of his own that Stanford would count as a success for his plan if he wasn’t still trying hard not to think about worshipping his muse. “If you make your religion organised, it becomes disingenuous. Sure, most beings are creatures of habit. And ritual, when given enough pomp and circumstance, can feel halfway like some sort of spirituality if you haven’t got much of an imagination. But you don’t want to organise your religion, that takes all the je ne sais quoi out of it. That takes all the real feeling out of it and just forces your followers to go through the motions. Or they worship you to curry favour for themselves and then that’s more politics than religion. That makes it just another deal, a bargain. It’s not supposed to be like work. I mean, seriously, what good is religion when it’s organised? Personally, if I had a religion, I’d want it to be completely chaotic. Pure chaos.”

“You would.” Stanford admitted ruefully, listening to Bill continue to speak.

“It needs to be chaotic. Unpredictable, not feigned or forced or fickle like every other religion out there. What’s the point of worship without that sudden grip of emotion, that unpredictable epiphany of ‘oh my god’ when you look at all this majesty in awe?” He gestured to himself and waggled his brow. “It’s regard you want to win in the way of worship and you don’t want the regard of your followers to be like schoolkids writing lines – yes I worship Bill Cipher – you want it to be a sudden rush that knocks them off their feet, like they suddenly understand how wrong they’ve been before. A revelation that will last their whole lives. Fear, awe, appreciation, terror. All of those things can’t be forced and that’s what makes them so satisfying. They spring up organically and that makes them better. So satisfying. So sustaining. So powerful.”

Stanford couldn’t help but agree. Bill’s perspective made a lot of sense, possibly simply because of Stanford’s own dislike of organised religion. The way Bill described it, worshipping something felt an awful lot like falling in love.

“That was one of the few things you did right, honestly.” Bill gave Stanford another one of those looks where suddenly the lines blurred, and Stanford couldn’t see the good Bill and the evil Bill, as he imagined them, but comprehended them as one and the same, and all the more intriguing because of it. “Your worship.”

“Because it wasn’t forced? Merely fabricated by circumstances?” Stanford commented, unable to keep the barb out of his words defensively.

“Because it was authentic.” Bill conceded, looking at Stanford with amusement. “If a little manipulative.”

“How was it manipulative?” Stanford spluttered indignantly.

“You had your motivations behind it.” Bill wagged his finger at Stanford chidingly. “You used it to your advantage. Not every blind worshipper out there can say that they did that.”

“So, you enjoyed that it was manipulative?” Stanford boggled at the thought.

“You’ve got a good head on your shoulders and an admirable degree of self-interest. Binding me in that body, while phrased as an act of worship, was actually very calculated of you. I’d have been impressed back then if I wasn’t so inconvenienced by it all.”

“And are you impressed now?” Stanford couldn’t help but ask, scepticism colouring his tone.

“Maybe.”

This conversation felt like flirting, Stanford realised. He was supposed to be gathering information about Bill, to be clinical about what he asked him, to wear him down without talking about their relationship, but somehow they’d circled back around to flirting, when it definitely was a bad idea.

“What do you look for in worshippers?” Stanford asked, trying to phrase it like he was scouring for information when it sounded more like a come on. Like he was weighing himself up against the competition.

“I don’t look for worshippers.” Bill replied, surprising Stanford. “They come to me. They either worship me or they don’t.”

“So, you don’t force it, like the other gods seem to?” Stanford pressed, trying to keep some sort of comparison going that wasn’t motivated by an odd brewing jealousy. The way Bill described how he wanted to be worshipped sounded an awful lot like falling in love and Stanford didn’t like the idea of Bill having just anyone worship him that way.

“It’s not real if you force it. It just is.”

“I didn’t worship you before I knew you.” Stanford pointed out, the word worship seeming codified with romantic sentiment now that he knew what Bill saw true worship to be. He wasn’t supposed to be doing this, discussing their relationship and the love he had for Bill but, somehow, he’d come around to doing just that.

“But don’t you see, that makes it better?” Bill leaned forward, his elbows resting on his thin little knees, and suddenly the dimensions in Stanford’s mental library seemed to be shifting, the two stacks moving closer together.

He couldn’t tell if Bill was doing this, master of the mind, or if his own subconscious was bringing them closer.

“You worshiped the real me.”

“And then I seemed to discover the real you all over again.” Stanford observed, unable to look away from Bill’s long eyelashes, his lidded eye and his direct gaze. “And again, and again. The more I learn the more I realise how much I never knew. An eternal puzzle.”

“I’d say you know me better than most.”

“Would you now? Should I be flattered?”

Ford was definitely flirting now. This was getting out of hand.

“Very. That you keep learning more just proves it. Most people don’t get that far.”

“I can’t imagine why.” Stanford said, leaning slightly on the sarcasm.

“Most people aren’t you.” Bill replied, reaching out, their stacks were so close now, his arm stretching long to brush the hair off Ford’s forehead.

This was possibly one of the most romantic things the triangle had ever said to Stanford and he was trying not to eat it up, hook, line and sinker, but it was very hard.

“Most people haven’t seen so many sides of me and lived to tell the tale.”

Obviously, Stanford had already noted this down. The Almanac writer’s fate made that more than clear.

“Most people don’t interest me enough to let them in.” Bill’s hand trailed down the side of Ford’s face and pointed to the scientist’s heart.

So Bill was letting him in? The plan must be working.

Ford tried not to focus on the way his stomach flipped pleasantly at the feeling of Bill’s fingertip tracing over his heart.

“Most people don’t get to wear my marks.”

“Marks?” Stanford questioned the plural, finding it hard to pull himself out of Bill’s compelling orbit, finding it hard to stay rational, to disavow his feelings when this entire scenario seemed intent on pulling them out to play.

“The one I gave you.” Bill pointed to where the black triangle resided on Ford’s pectoral, before his hand trailed up to Ford’s neck. “And the one where I saved your life.”

Stanford blinked, realising that Bill was pointing to the scar on his neck Diñeiro gave him.

“You didn’t save my life.” Stanford protested, throwing Operation Honey over Vinegar out the window in that instant.

“Yes, I did. If I didn’t say stop, you would have been dead.” Bill insisted smugly, looking far too pleased with himself.

“That’s not saving my life. You didn’t – I wouldn’t have been in that position if it wasn’t for you.”

“Needing your life saved?” Bill countered stubbornly.

“No one would have been trying to kill me if it weren’t for the bounty you put on my head. This scar isn’t some sort of testament to your benevolence. It’s your fault it’s there in the first place.”

“My fault?” Bill leaned back, his eye narrowing dangerously. “I didn’t have to take Diñeiro’s call for you, I didn’t have to say stop, at that point I didn’t have to do anything for you, the way you’d been acting. I went above and beyond.”

“Above and beyond would have been taking down the bounty in the first place. Above and beyond wouldn’t – rrghh.” Stanford cut himself off, huffing angrily, before he pointed to his neck. “This is not your mark.”

“So, what is it then? A testament to your stupidity?”

Stanford glared at Bill, his mouth screwed up, his chin jutting out, stubborn, before he crossed his arms and slammed his eyes shut, jettisoning himself into wakefulness out of pure pigheaded determination.

He woke up from his dream with the words ‘That’s right, you walk away’ lingering in the forefront of his mind, and he couldn’t help but think that despite his best efforts not to let himself get tricked back into a relationship with the god, that felt an awful lot like the sort of argument reserved for married couples and long term partners.

After eleven years stuck in the multiverse, though, what else could they be?

And as deplorable as that thought was, there was a part of Stanford that was oddly gratified by that, even though he loathed the comparison at the same time.
A testament to stupidity. Stanford was fuming. That knife mark wasn’t a testament to anything other than Bill’s unique ability to ruin any sort of winning streak he had by doing something utterly awful.

Stanford had been muttering to himself in agitation ever since that last dream, his scientific plan put on pause so he could process just how enraged it made him that Bill seemed to think he’d saved Ford’s life again. He loathed the thought of being indebted to Bill for his life in any way, shape, or form, but the life debts kept racking up.

He’d managed to defer the debt from the time the island head monster tried to devour them both, reasoning that they’d worked together to save each other’s lives from the encroaching jaws of the island and the zombie uprising was technically Bill’s fault in the first place for writing the spell in his journal and leaving it somewhere innocent civilians could read, so his flashy pyrotechnics didn’t amount to a life debt, but what with the fall from the back of the Gremloblin and narrowly escaping Diñeiro’s blade thanks to Bill’s intervention adding up, Stanford was looking for ways to deny that Bill’s efforts had any impact on the longevity of his life.

He was hoping the car crash would have struck out one of those debts, but Stanford was the one to slam down on the accelerator, he was partially responsible for that near-death incident. Same with hurling Stanford down the stairs to his lab. They were both equally to blame for that incident. Setting his monsters chasing after Ford was one potential equaliser but Bill would counter that by saying he specified Ford was not to be harmed. Ford couldn’t wholly blame falling through the portal on Bill either because it was Stanford’s fight with his brother that caused the accidental dimension jump. The various bounty hunters who seemed confused whether he should be taken alive or dead weren’t technically Bill’s fault either as the poster had only asked for his expedient return, not his death. It wasn’t Bill’s fault the bounty hunters tried to read between the lines.

Stanford was desperately searching for something to hold against Bill to ensure he didn’t in some backwards twisted way owe Bill his life but the only serious consequence of Bill’s actions that he could think of was Diñeiro kidnapping him, and if Bill supposedly saved his life by stopping the mobster from cutting his throat, then that became thoroughly moot.

Ford didn’t want Bill to have saved his life. He wanted to blame Bill for its current state. He wanted to blame Bill for everything.

He had a scar on his neck thanks to Bill and the last thing Stanford wanted to do was to literally thank him for it.

Agitated circular muttering wasn’t doing it for Ford. He needed a drink.

After several such beverages, Stanford found himself surrounded by his new drinking buddies and the remnant glasses and bottles from their spree, finding it much more satisfying to discuss his agitations with an active listener than with himself.

Porky the Octopus Armed Warrior Piglet slammed down his tenth shot of spectral liqueur and wiped his snout with a tentacle, before gesturing it at Stanford.

“So, let me get this straight. Couple rotations ago, you nabbed your spectral buddy and built him an Angolean body.”
“That’s right. Because I’m Angolean.” Stanford nodded, emphasising his cover story. “This is back on Angol.”

“Right, back on Angol where you lost your dorsal arms –“

“In a great battle.” Stanford clarified, quite proud of how his cultivated backstory would appeal to the warrior piglets he drank with.

“Where you lost your dorsal arms in a great battle.” Porky nodded and the rest of his tribe cheered and raised their glasses.

“Cheers, I’ll drink to that.” Crowed one of them, and Stanford dutifully raised his own glass and took another sip of the neon green liqueur.

He was on his ninth drink at this point, and the evening seemed to be blurring together a little. But he still had his wits about him. And a badass cover story that would fit right into a good game of D&D & More D.

“And so, you put your spectral buddy in a beautiful Angolean body. Super hot. Six arms, sharp teeth, the works. A total knockout.”

“The works.” Stanford confirmed awkwardly, a little disconcerted that the Angolean standard of beauty was probably closer to how Bill looked when he tried to murder Willow and even more disconcerted by how he didn’t necessarily disagree with that standard of beauty.

“So, you play around, are ‘enlightened’ – we all know what that means don’t we boys?”

The tribe of warrior piglets all guffawed and slapped each other on the back with their tentacle arms. This was the closest Stanford had ever been to feeling like one of the boys and he found this sort of locker room talk as unsatisfying as he expected it would be.

“You enlighten him, he enlightens you, you’re just enlightening each other all the damn time. Bing bang boom. One hell of a honeymoon.” Porky continued gamely, gesturing dramatically with his tentacle arms as he spoke. “You get to falling in love a little, then BLAMMO – shit goes south. Your spectral buddy tried to murder your neighbour and threatened to kill your old war buddy’s family, probably murdered your pet goldfish, you don’t know how to deal with it, so you kick the spectral guy out of the sexy Angolean body and now he’s back to being an ominous all powerful …”

“Hexagon.” Stanford repeated, tenting his fingers together and pointing them at Porky convincingly. “That is definitely his geometric shape.”

“No, I’m not – I’m not sad about it.” Stanford stressed, only slightly slurring his words at this point. “I’m feeling conflicted, frustrated, angry – maybe just a little confused, although that falls under the umbrella of conflicted I suppose.”

“Listen, listen.” One of the other warrior piglets spoke up, waving his tentacle at the crowd. “Everybody’s got some story or other about their crazy hot ex. It happens. Now, I don’t mean to brag –“

“Here we go.” Porky rolled his eyes as the rest of the tribe groaned and shook their heads.

“But I once dated a celebrity back in the pen and let me tell you she was crazy hot. A prime squealer, yeah, we had a great time when she wasn’t biting my tail off over something or nothing, but she moves on, becomes an actress, and settles down with some frog! Now, does that sound right to you?"

“You tell the same damn story every time.” Another piglet complained and shoved his friend lazily, knocking the cup from his hand.

“Hey, I was drinking that.”

“But see the issue is, when he is a – a Hexagon I have no trouble seeing all the bad things he did and I can hold him accountable for them. But when he’s a hu- when he’s Angolean it’s different. Even though he’s not Angolean now it feels like how we were before and it’s – I’m supposed to know better now and to stop seeing him like how he was. I should know better.”

“Does he have six arms as a Hexagon?” One of the pigs enquired.

“Well, no. I mean, he could.” Stanford answered with a shrug.

“That’s kind of hot.” One of the other piglets said in a quiet yet impressed voice.

“Do you want to get back together with him?” One of the other piglets loudly interjected.

“Well, I’m not – we’ve been spending time together but not for that reason, I shouldn’t –” Stanford stammered.

“Hey, it’s a yes or no question.” The piglet tapped his tentacle on the table impatiently.

“I – look, I’ve been spending time with him to try to get him to - to ease up around me, but that’s to uncover his weaknesses, not to restart the relationship.” Ford insisted. “He’s objectively evil. I’m not even going to argue that point.”

“Objective for who?” One of the piglets slurred, leaning their elbows on the table.

“So, this is like revenge sex?” Probed another one of the pigs.

“Wh- I’m not having sex with him.” Stanford blushed, denying that a bit more vehemently than he would need to if he hadn’t already thought about it.

“But would you though, if it was on the table?” The same pig clarified, staring Stanford down.

“If it would get you in on those weaknesses you want, would you?” Another pig chimed in, stirring the pot. “Like, if the opportunity arose?”

“Seducing for secrets.” The third curly tailed instigator added, loving the drama associated with their new drinking buddy.

“Come on Casanova. Blasting gun to your head, would you still bang the Hexagon?” Porky joined in the interrogation, clearly amused by Stanford’s discomfort.

“I guess… yes?” Stanford finally conceded and the crowd of piglets cheered uproariously, slapping him on the back with their tentacled arms, applauding Ford’s potential piggish behaviour.

“But I can’t just – he’s acting like he saved my life.” Stanford struggled to make his complaints heard over the din of oinks and roguish squealing. “I’ve got a goddamn scar on my neck because of him, it’s his fault, and he’s acting like because he stopped the knife before it finished me off that somehow he’s saved my life and I can’t – I’m not going to owe him that. He’s unbearably smug, he can’t just – he ruined my life!”

“My girlfriend gave me a scar too.” The pig with the celebrity ex-girlfriend claimed, moving to lift up his shirt and unbutton his pants. “Right he-“

“Put it away Baco. Geez, nobody wants to see that.” Porky insisted, sparing Stanford the sight of whatever horrendous scar lay beneath Baco’s trousers (or whatever lay beneath Baco’s trousers period).

“I just wish the scar wasn’t there at all. Now every time I see it, I hate it even more. It’s his fault it’s there, I’m not going to let him twist it into something that it isn’t. It’s –“ Stanford continued to rail against the scar until Porky interrupted his tirade, holding up a tentacle to pause his speech.

“So why don’t you just tattoo over it? Cover it up?”

“What?” Stanford blinked, surprised by the simple solution offered.

“We get tattoos all the time, bleeding the ink into the old pigskin. We get tattoos to commemorate battles, to celebrate occasions, hell, even if we just feel like it, sometimes we’ll get a tattoo.”

One by one the piglets around the table began showing Stanford their tattoos of choice, the most grizzled looking hog, Krackling, bearing ink over nearly every inch of his skin while Swiney boasted a simple love heart on his plump cheek with the word ‘Mom’ written within it. Tattoos of all shapes and sizes, each one with a different story, paraded before the scientist, until in his inebriated haze it started to seem like a rather badass idea.

“It’s about reclaiming your body.” Hambone explained, while caressing his own tattoo with a fond tentacle, fluffy bluebirds on a branch emblazoned on his shoulder, showcasing a softer more sensitive side to the warrior pig. “Sure, you might lose your dorsal arms in battle, or get cut by your Hexagonal ex, but when I get a tattoo, that’s me placing it there. That’s my power. I’m deciding – my body isn’t what other people do to me, it’s what I choose to do with it. From rain grows flowers, you feel me?”

“I feel you.” Stanford nodded, taking another sip from his drink as he rubbed his pectoral absently with his free hand.

He finished his drink and the instant he set the cup down on the table the piglet to the side of him refilled his glass. Rather than protest or insist he’d had enough, Stanford simply picked up his glass and took another long sip before saying.

“Maybe I should get a tattoo?”

The warrior pigs cheered and toasted their glasses together, throwing back another round of the neon green sludge.

“Atta boy. My uncle runs a parlour around the corner from here. A few more drinks and you’ll be right to go.” Porky encouraged.

“Tattoos are rather permanent though. I don’t know what I would want to get.” Stanford slurred, looking into the bottom of his glass at the green dregs of his drink swilling around in there. “I don’t want one more regret, you know?”

He felt a comforting tentacle land on his shoulder, feeling the camaraderie of his new drinking cohort warm him from within, or perhaps that was the alcohol.
“Hey now. You let us worry about that. We’ll make sure it’s a good one.”

And, like a fool, Stanford trusted that they would.

“HAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAH!”

Stanford gritted his teeth, as the laughter continued.

“HAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAH AHH-HAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAH!”

“It’s not –“ Ford ground his teeth now, the endless laughter beyond grating. “It’s not that –“

“HAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAH.”

“It’s not that funny!” Stanford shouted at the floating triangle, unable to take it anymore.

Bill stopped for a beat, taking in Stanford’s frustrated expression, his cheeks red and his hands balled into fists at his side, the embarrassment clear on his face, before he burst out laughing yet again, falling over himself in mid-air, wiping tears of joy from the corner of his eye.

“Bill, stop laughing!” Ford demanded.

The triangle was losing it, hysterical giggles overtaking whatever rational thought he might be capable of until he was kicking his legs and slamming his fist down on thin air like a toddler throwing a tantrum. A laughing fit.

If Stanford weren’t so embarrassed, he might even laugh at how silly Bill looked. Still, the triangle was laughing at him, and so Stanford continued to grind his teeth, indignant beyond belief.

“Bill, if you don’t stop laughing at me, I’ll leave. I’m leaving right now. I’ll take those sleep blockers and never come back!” Ford threatened.

Wiping the corner of his eye, Bill shakily extended his hand towards Ford, clearly on the verge of losing it to laughter yet again.

For a brief shining moment Stanford thought Bill was actually going to be serious, the thought of Ford’s threat to remove himself enough of a motivator for the triangle to legitimately take Stanford seriously.

“H – Hey now.”

And at that Bill devolved into another round of raucous obnoxious laughter.

Honestly, what was Stanford expecting? He couldn’t even take himself seriously with this ludicrous tattoo on his neck. The frightening bug-eyed star emblazoned with the words ‘HEY NOW, I’M AN ALL STAR’ in camp pink letters was the last thing Stanford expected when his drinking buddies suggested a cool tattoo for him to cover his scar. This wasn’t cool.
This just reinforced Stanford’s ‘trust no one’ worldview that he was steadily adapting as his own.

Bill’s laughter was getting out of hand now, Stanford was certain as of this exact moment that he would forever be able to recognise Bill’s laugh anywhere, emblazoned into his head as it was right now.

He wondered if Bill would ever stop laughing at him.

“Well, if you hate it so much, then help me get rid of it.” Stanford demanded. “Point me in the direction of an interdimensional tattoo removal parlour, or suck the ink from my skin, or burn it off – I don’t care. If you hate it so much, then make it gone.”

“I don’t hate it.” Bill admitted, sounding slightly out of breath, a few stray giggles escaping him even now. “It’s a feature, not a flaw. Who knew you could be so funny?”

“It’s not funny.” Stanford insisted, crossing his arms. “Nor intentional.”

“But that’s part of the fun.” Bill’s eye curved fondly at Ford and he righted himself and extended his arm to brush his fingertip against Ford’s cheekbone indulgently. “I genuinely enjoy watching you grind your teeth, pretending to be dignified when really you’re just embarrassed. You have no right to make that look so cute. That’s an unfair advantage.”

There it was. Bill called him cute again and even though it was Stanford’s self-inflicted humiliation he found ‘cute’ Ford didn’t doubt that Bill meant it.

Despite all that had happened between them, it looked as if Bill was letting his walls down around Ford again, which is what Ford wanted, it was all part of his master plan. The part that worried him was that, yes, certainly Bill’s walls were coming down around Ford yet again, he had planned for that much, but what his conscience wasn’t prepared for was the unlikely occurrence that Bill would fall for him, and with every fond glance or caress that seemed more likely.

It had been all he had wanted in the past, for Bill to fall in love with him, but if it happened now, while Stanford was deliberately deceiving him, leading him on for information, Stanford’s conscience wouldn’t be able to sustain this ruse for long. Or the ruse that Bill falling in love with Ford wasn’t exactly what he wanted deep down.

He still had hope, that this was just lingering fondness, that Bill still distrusted him, or was using him in some way, shape or form, but that hope was shattered the moment Bill blinked at him, his eye tracing his form with awe, looking to Stanford exactly the way he did that last night they were together on earth, back when he had said ‘you make me feel things’. Suddenly it was like he was looking at the same person he had in his bed back then, and not the triangle he’d grown to distrust and hate.

He was looking at the being he loved.

Who just maybe loved him back.

“You know what’s worse is you made me laugh and you didn’t even have to try. How do you do that, Sixer?”

Stanford swallowed, trying to keep his cool despite the realisation throwing him. Shrugging awkwardly, his cheeks pink now for a different reason, he replied.

“Maybe I just have that effect on you?”
Bill blinked, before considering Ford with a lidded eye. “Maybe you do.”

Bill was floating closer to Ford now, his hand still on Ford’s cheek, appraising him with interest and Stanford had a guilty reminder of the conversation he’d had with the warrior piglets back in the bar.

“But would you though, if it was on the table?”

“If it would get you in on those weaknesses you want, would you?”

He felt Bill’s eyelashes brush against his cheek as his eye closed, and his mouth drew near, and Stanford kissed him back, his hands coming up to cradle Bill’s warm bricks tenderly while his conscience railed at him.

This was their first kiss since before Diñeiro’s kidnapping, before the violence on Lottocron 9, since back on the scrap vandal’s vessel. Years had passed.

So much had changed since then, yet when they kissed it was like nothing changed at all. The only thing that changed was that now, Bill wasn’t the only one being manipulative and self-serving.

“Come on Casanova. Blasting gun to your head, would you still bang the Hexagon?”

As Stanford kissed Bill harder, his hands flexing, nails scraping down Bill’s gold surface, he realised his answer was still yes. Even if Bill was falling in love with him, if his feelings were genuine, while Stanford’s were less so, the answer was still yes.

So this was what revenge felt like.

Now when Stanford delved into his mindscape, he didn’t waste any time.

“I feel like apathy is the only valid response when time means nothing. When temporal entropy makes itself known.”

Bill’s small gold frame was shaking, his eyelash fluttering, his bricks peachy and hot as Stanford’s fingers continued their ministrations on Bill’s shapely body.

Struggling to focus on Stanford, the scientist’s gifted fingers overwhelming him, Bill squinted at Ford, distracted.

“What is this, dirty talk?”

“I just – maybe now isn’t the right time.” Stanford conceded, looking down at Bill spread out for him on the desk in his mental library.

Bill’s four spindly fingers were wound around Stanford’s wrist, his other hand scratching gouges in the tabletop and he was glowing in a very appealing way. Perhaps Stanford had taken the wrong time to philosophise on his travels.

“I didn’t say it wasn’t working for me.” Bill replied after a beat and squeezed Ford’s wrist in an encouraging manner. “Tell me more about your temporal nihilism, hot stuff.”

Needing no further prompting, Stanford did just that, not stopping to still his busy hands while he spoke.

“Imagine if you got the chance to live out the worst periods of your life again, an unlimited number of chances to re-enact the times in which everything went very wrong until they had the potential to go very right. Imagine if you had that potential to do things over, would you – a little tight there, ah, just yell if I’m going too far – would you change things if you knew that time could loop back on you, regardless of your success or failure, and make you relive it all again? After so many tries would it even be worth the effort?”

“Nnngh.” Bill shuddered, his gaze unfocused with pleasure, before he composed himself enough to fix Ford in his gaze. “You’ve been in the Do-Over Dimension, haven’t you?”

“I would call it the Go Insane Because Nothing Gets Done Dimension, but sure. What gave it away?” Stanford asked, exploring his muse with his fingertips while conducting such casual conversation.

“I hate that p-place – oh Sixer.” Bill panted and spread his legs a little wider, trying his best to accommodate Ford’s questing hands. “It’s the one dimension that gets a free pass with timeline do-overs and it tries to convince you that it’s a bad thing. It’s the dimensional ca-ahhh-autionary tale on the back of cigarette boxes warning people not to mess with the timeline, like every occurrence of timeline defiance will end up just like the Do-Over Dimension. Ahh! Like if you want to do one thing over, you’ll end up in – nngh - temporal purgatory, like the rest of those poor suckers trapped there.”

“That’s interesting.” Stanford hummed and did something with his fingers that had Bill’s eye water and his bricks heat up.

“That’s temporal torture.” Bill corrected him breathlessly.

“No, I meant how this-“ And he did it again. “Makes you vibrate almost. Some sort of frequency resonance.”

“God, Sixer, don’t get all clinical about this. I’d rather talk about timelineologists than hear you theorise about my anatomy. You’re taking all the fun out of this.”

“Oh, I’m sorry.” Ford said, not sorry at all. “Do you not like it when I’m clinical?”

He punctuated his question with another deft finger movement, making Bill hiss with pleasure and frustration.

“You’re pushing your luck.”

“I thought that’s what scientists do. Take things apart and put them together again, to find out how they work. Would you say I’m not being scientific about this particular engagement?” Ford taunted, as he pushed his fingers harder against the spot that seemed to make Bill melt inside.

“God, I should have let Diñeiro finish you off. You are insufferable.” Bill hissed again as he gripped Ford’s wrist tighter, still not pulling away.

“Well it’s nice to see this sort of thing gets you all romantic.” Ford droned, watching Bill’s legs shake. “It’s hard for a man to feel special without the requisite amount of death threats during coitus.”
“Don’t call it that. You’re ruining this for me.” Bill moaned, clawing more grooves in the table.

“And I’d much rather just ruin you.” Ford said lightly as he laid the finishing touches that seemed to push Bill over the edge, thoroughly overwhelming the triangle.

Ford felt Bill’s form seem to glitch around his fingers, overloading Bill’s ability to represent his physical form in Ford’s dreams, and when he finished, sprawled spent and dazed on the tabletop, Ford couldn’t help the wave of satisfaction and pride he experienced, having reduced Bill to this state.

“Ugh.” Bill uttered, still shuddering through the aftershocks and his hand curled around Ford’s retreating wrist again, his grip slightly softer, almost as if reminding himself that Ford was still there.

“Do you mind?” Ford said, leaning down, gesturing to his wrist, and Bill’s slim digits slowly slipped from Ford’s arm as Stanford raised his fingers to his mouth to have a taste.

“Ugh, why?” Bill bemoaned, his hands coming up to cover his eye as his golden form began to melt into a puddle on the tabletop.

“Because I live to ruin you, apparently.” Stanford remarked, resting his elbows on the desk now, threatening to dip his fingertip in the puddle of triangle left on the tabletop. “I could go for another taste.”

Bill solidified in an instant, his matter reforming into gold bricks in time for a flustered god to point and glare at the smug scientist looming above him. “Don’t you dare.”

“Is it always that painful for you?” Ford questioned instead, still surveying Bill like he was a science experiment and not a bedmate. “It looked painful.”

“Define always, then define painful.” Bill retorted, propping himself up on his elbows, looking evasively away.

“Does that mean you haven’t done this before? Before me, that is? In this form?” Stanford clarified, his clinical scientific demeanour slipping slightly, genuine shock creeping into his tone.

“Like you can count ‘almost held hands with Cathy Crenshaw that one time in dance class’ on your sexual resume.” Bill huffed dismissively but Ford didn’t miss how his bricks pinked.

This would be another one of those times that Stanford’s conscience would have implored him to feel guilty, but Stanford was working hard on quashing the voice of his conscience down, as it wasn’t relevant to his goal to consider Bill’s feelings on this, or how taking the triangle’s first time being intimate with another being in this form might indicate that the feelings Bill experienced for Ford weren’t fabricated, or part of a grander scheme to destroy the universe.

He couldn’t consider that, not while he was making such progress.

“The pain is concerning. Unless you like that, which isn’t outside of the realm of possibility. With such a sensitive interior it’s no surprise your exterior is so purposefully impenetrable.”

“Maybe I do like the pain.” Bill countered, regaining some of his old bravado back. “Or maybe you’re just not doing it right.”

“So, I’ll have to practise, shall I?” Ford retorted smoothly straight away, causing Bill’s bricks to flush a deeper pink, flustering the God despite his attempt at being cool.
Attempting to change the subject, Bill asked. “Do you know how long you were in the Do Over Dimension for?”

“I’m not too sure. Thirteen months perhaps?” Ford shrugged, resting his chin on his hand, watching Bill fluster nicely on his desk, next to the books and research papers his mind provided as backdrop for their intimate interlude. “Maybe more, the calendars there aren’t exactly reliable.”

“Time moves differently there in general. It’s windy though, that’s why I can still, or could still presumably talk to you in your dreams throughout, despite the timeline snapping back or stretching out then. Those thirteen months were probably more like eight years, given how short human years are.” Bill materialised himself a martini, sipping on the cocktail to restore his equilibrium after Stanford defiled it so thoroughly. “You’re probably fifty something now. You’ve skipped past your midlife crisis.”

“I thought you were my midlife crisis.” Stanford sniped, unable to prevent himself from slipping that barb in, now knowing he didn’t have to sugarcoat what he said for Operation Honey over Vinegar to be successful. “I don’t feel like I’m fifty. You’d think I’d have at least a few grey hairs by now if that were the case.”

“You won’t have grey hairs while you’re with me.” Bill raised his glass in a minor toast to Stanford, his eye curved into an indulgent smile. “I keep you young.”

“Oh, please.” Stanford scoffed, and snorted, moving the papers around on his desk idly as Bill crossed his legs, floating to sit with his martini on top of one of Stanford’s books.

“It’s true. With me in your head, you won’t have a single grey hair. That’s the sort of longevity you get from sharing headspace with a god. You thought you weren’t getting any perks from this arrangement?”

“That’s not exactly what I had in mind when weighing the pros and cons.” Stanford muttered, before scrutinising Bill once more, searching the god for the truth. “Really? I won’t age?”

“You’ll age slower.” Bill clarified, closing his eye to take a sip from his martini. “This isn’t immortality, we’d need to meet face to face for that to happen, plus there’s all the paperwork.”

“Paperwork?” Ford quirked a brow at Bill, amused.

“Well, there’s no paperwork, but it takes a lot of effort, that’s all I’m saying. Effort I’m not necessarily prepared to expend for you.”

“Why not?” Ford asked with a laugh, assuming he had Bill on side by now. He saw no reason for the triangle to withhold himself, or his gifts, since he already seemed to be subtly showering Ford with them, unbeknownst to him.

“You tell me why I should expend that effort for someone who’s been investigating me.” Bill said smoothly, taking another sip of his martini before staring Ford down.

The smile seemed to freeze on his face, and his heart dropped into his stomach, despite his intent to remain cool. There was a chance he could still deflect this.

“What?” Ford blinked, trying to keep his tone polite and bewildered.

“There’s no need to patronise me.” Bill continued to stare at Ford, clearly not buying his innocent act. “You think I don’t have sources reporting back to me, tracking you down from every dimension you’ve been to? You think you don’t tell me about the last place you’ve been and I immediately send someone there to look for you, and find out what you’ve been doing? What you haven’t been telling me? Tell me, Stanford, why would I willingly be that stupid?”

“I didn’t –“ Ford’s protests caught in his throat, dread causing the blockage.

“Yes you did. You assumed a lot of things. And you know what they say about that.”

Bill’s unerring eye contact pinned Stanford to the spot a little longer, before Bill broke briefly to take another sip from his cocktail, finishing the drink and plucking the olive from the beverage, pinching the sphere between his thumb and forefinger and eating it.

“Whatever you want to know about me so badly, you can just ask. Or is that not what you meant by an ‘open mind’?”

Stanford swallowed, his pulse suddenly racing.

Was this an opening? To ask about the one thing he really wanted to know, to ask the forbidden question of what happened to Bill’s dimension. Could he ask that now and get an honest answer?

He was burning to ask Bill, but his burning desire was balanced by an equal desire to not be the subject of Bill’s preferred method of burning.

He couldn’t do it.

“I do have an open mind. I just wanted to … corroborate what you’ve been saying with other sources.”

“And how’s that been working out for you?” Bill asked, giving Ford a flat, unimpressed look from over the top of his cocktail glass.

“Not good.” Stanford admitted awkwardly.

“So, you can’t just take me at my word, you need someone you’ve never heard of or met before to prove I’m not lying to you, is that right?” Bill narrowed his eye at Ford. “Because you’d trust anyone’s lies over mine. Once a liar, always a liar, never told the truth a day in my life, is that what you think?”

“N-no.” Ford gritted out, hardly convincing anyone.

“But you don’t trust me, or the things that I’m telling you. That much is clear.”

Taking that in for a moment, Ford’s stubbornness reared its head, and his chin jutted out obstinately. “Well that worked out so well for me before.”

“There it is.” Bill set his glass to the side and tented his fingers together, pointing them at Stanford. “I wondered when we’d get there.”

“You think I should have just let go of having my life’s work turned against me? Of what happened?”

“That’s not what I’m saying at all. I was just wondering how long you’d be able to lie to yourself to keep up this nice act.”

“You think it’s an act, but you went along with it anyway?” Stanford puzzled somewhat aggressively. “You went this far thinking I was lying to your face the whole time?”
“Isn’t that what you were thinking?” Bill countered, raising his brow. “That I was just lying to you? Or that I’d lie until I wasn’t lying anymore?”

“That would have been nice.” Ford clenched his jaw, openly glaring at Bill now.

“Maybe that’s exactly what happened.” Bill said lightly, giving nothing away. “Maybe I’ve been telling you the truth all this time, while you’ve been feeling betrayed over nothing, coming back anyway. Hating me all the while. I really want to know how that’s working out for you.”

“Well.” Stanford paused, weighing up his words carefully before deciding to make use of the things he’s come to learn throughout his investigation. What would appeal to Bill to turn this around. “Betrayal’s a healthy foundation to all the best relationships.”

Bill’s eye widened and the suspicion in his gaze all but dropped.

“Besides.” Stanford continued, parroting Bill’s old words at him. “If I didn’t have this to hold over your head, then I’d have to find something else.”

Bill let out a breathy laugh in disbelief.

“You really - ?”

Stanford didn’t know what Bill thought he was really doing, but he could see that delighted awe creep back into Bill’s gaze, relishing the surprises Stanford threw at him, and the scientist knew that he’d successfully deflected Bill’s ire.

“Huh.” Bill sat back, looking oddly pleased with himself, before he threw Stanford a bone, much like he had done back in the kitchen after the D&D& More D game. “You know, there is one place in the multiverse that might still have written records about me preserved that you can read. I’m honestly surprised you haven’t been to this place sooner.”

Stanford blinked, surprised that Bill would offer him such a boon, and leaned forward, resting his elbows on the table eagerly. “Where?”

“The Bibliosphere.” Bill divulged. “It’s the largest library in the multiverse, on a planet inhabited entirely by scholars and guarded fiercely by time police, so no one steals and disseminates knowledge ahead of their time. The planet is a wasteland, constantly under attack. They keep the books and records in the citadel and the university is on the opposite side of the wasteland, sequestered away. There are more books in the Bibliosphere library though than there was in the library of Alexandria before it had its little accident, more than in any library you’ve ever encountered. Certainly more than however many books you can fit inside your head.”

The excitement leaked through Stanford’s impassive front, each word depicting the Bibliosphere sounding too good to be true. His interest piqued, Stanford was suddenly dying to go there, especially if he could find corroborating information on Bill.

“You’d probably lose another ten years of your life in there, you’d love it so much. You’d fit right in with the stuffy academic types. One hundred percent.”

Ford couldn’t believe that Bill was just handing this information to him, that he just volunteered this place that Ford would so plainly love, that also happened to have recorded textual information about Bill’s history for him to read.

“What dimension is it?”
“N233 squared.” Bill answered, giving Ford the precise dimensional location for this idyllic library.

This was incredible, astounding, and clearly too good to be true. There had to be some sort of catch, some sort of caveat to go with this generous divulging of information. Bill had to have some kind of motivation other than random altruism, because in Ford’s experience, he didn’t simply get nice things like this hint provided to him. He didn’t just get the answers dropped neatly right in front of him to his Bill-related problems, that just didn’t happen.

He was waiting for the other shoe to drop, for something disastrous to happen to take away this lead or hobble his plans before he could run towards them, or snatch his answers out of his hands just when they were in reach.

Bill, being an accommodating soul, made sure that Ford didn’t have to wait long.

With a wink that looked more like a blink, Bill delivered his parting line before dissolving from the mindscape ether.

“Maybe I’ll see you there.”

Chapter End Notes

OH SNAP! TRAP DATE, yes that is certainly a trap and a date, an amorous ambush if you will. Will Stanford be able to resist the allure of a library planet to avoid his ex? Mr 12 PHDs? Avoid a library? The funniest thing to happen in the fic, what a bizarre turn of events that would be. I hope folks enjoyed this chapter :) It was a lot of fun to write even if it took a few re-writes to get it right. This chapter is dedicated to Windchimes_in_Thunderstorms who left a gorgeous inspiring comment on the fic recently, but Thelema Rhoias, rainbowratstuff and butterflydisaster all get honorable mentions for cheering me on with the chapter, as well as my lovely friend and beta reader who makes this fic polished and possible. Next chapter we have dangerous rendezvous, Jheselbraum's spies, an army of time police and a planet that could contain actual factual information about Bill's past. Throw Bill and Stanford into the mix and what could possibly go wrong? A lot, I'm counting on. I hope folks enjoyed the chapter. Let me know what you thought of it, and thank you as always for reading :(
I've been cheated by you since I don't know when. So I made up my mind, it must come to an end. Look at me now, will I ever learn? I don't know how, but I suddenly lose control. There's a fire within my soul.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Stanford never had to think so hard about going to a library in his entire life.

Despite the Bibliosphere being everything Stanford could ever have dreamed of, the height of delight for his younger self (and present self) to be utterly surrounded by books, scholars, and learning in the largest library in the galaxy – no - the multiverse - the trepidation that came with walking into an obvious trap weighed heavily on his mind, to the point that it wasn’t an instantaneous decision to sign up for a library card within the first three seconds of hearing about it, like he’d done with every other library he’d encountered in his illustrious life.

No, he had to weigh up the pros and cons from every angle, because of a certain angular fiend.

Maybe I’ll see you there.

Damn him.

Dangling something so juicy in front of Ford, only to tack that on to the end.

As if the prospect of visiting the largest library in the multiverse wasn’t tempting enough, Bill just had to go and hint that the Bibliosphere held recorded information about the triangle’s past, corroborating sources that had proved uselessly elusive thus far.

He told Stanford this after admitting that he knew Stanford was investigating him. He knew the scientist was researching him still, asking about him at every Federation port and planetary satellite, digging up dirt on him, scouring the multiverse for his recorded weaknesses.

It was the cruelest ‘check’ in the history of the universe and Stanford knew that Bill told him so that the moment he set foot on the Bibliosphere the triangle would be able to say ‘checkmate’.

It was infuriating.

Ford wasn’t sure why Bill didn’t just do this from the start. Rather than following Stanford throughout the multiverse, the God should have just picked the one place Stanford wanted to go to more than anything and set up camp there, waiting for Ford to come to him. He was setting the perfect ambush, with the most exquisite bait, yet Bill had as good as told him that he’d be there.

That made no sense! It wasn’t an ambush when the enemy knew it was coming. What did he think he was playing at?

But no, this was Bill’s style precisely, Ford was coming to realise. Placing the best possible option on the table in front of Ford and then imbuing that option with an encroaching sense of dread. Acting helpful and resourceful only to tie Ford’s hands in the matter, preventing him from accessing the oh so helpful solution he presented, then pretending he hadn’t done anything to hinder him at all.
Ford could picture it now. Bill would tell him that there was nothing stopping him from accessing the Bibliosphere, certainly not Bill. Bill never said he’d be going and he never said Stanford couldn’t go either. He just hinted at it.

Maybe he’d be there.

It was driving Stanford insane.

Going to the same physical location as Bill while the God had his powers unbound would be tantamount to giving himself over to the God and ending the chase by turning himself in. He didn’t want to do that.

He had no guarantees that once he was at the Bibliosphere Bill wouldn’t just grab him and teleport him away. Ford had no intention of walking right into a trap on the Bibliosphere and then be forced to live out the rest of his days as a prisoner in Bill’s nightmare realm. He just wouldn’t do it.

But… the largest library in the multiverse.

It beckoned.

Stanford was unfortunately used to twisting his justifications to suit what he wanted, he was getting disastrously good at it, he could reluctantly admit.

Despite the obvious drawbacks with showing up at the same physical location as Bill, there was a chance that the God would not kidnap Ford, if the scientist played his cards right.

Right now, Bill seemed to think they were still together. He still harboured a fondness for Ford. They were intimate, they spoke with each other regularly. They were comfortable, for lack of a better word, in one another’s company to the point where things were starting to feel the way they once had, in terms of how they were getting along.

Meeting in the mindscape had that effect. Bill’s powers were limited there, so they could meet on somewhat equal footing. He couldn’t force Ford to do anything, he couldn’t tamper with or read through his memories without Ford allowing him to do so, and he couldn’t hurt Stanford (without Ford’s permission but that was another issue entirely).

At times, it seemed like he didn’t want to hurt Ford at all in the grander scheme of things but Stanford was coming to realise that Bill’s intent could only make up for so much when it came to his actions.

The fact that Bill thought they were going well didn’t change the fact that Bill knew Ford was investigating him, that he admitted to sending someone to every place Ford had been, searching for information about where Ford would go next, just as Ford was searching for information on where Bill had been.

Ford didn’t believe what Bill was telling him without corroborating sources, and it seemed Bill didn’t believe Ford either, or trust him enough to give up his search and merely listen to Ford’s exploits as they were divulged.

A crucial lack of trust was working against the both of them and any sort of meaningful connection or middle ground was tenuous while that trust was still so absent.

Going to the Bibliosphere would involve extending a modicum of trust, trust that Bill wouldn’t override Ford’s independence the moment he saw him. Trust that Bill’s feelings for him and the fondness that was clearly still there would extend to at least pretending that the two of them were on equal footing should they meet in person.

The power that Bill held made that nearly impossible though. Meeting in person was unlike meeting in the neutral neural ground of the mindscape. Meeting in person involved genuine high stakes risk for Stanford, which made it slightly more complicated than just showing up for a quirky clandestine library date, as Bill seemed to presume it was.

Still, if Ford could play to Bill’s assumption that this was a date, if he could play along with the God’s backhanded gift of the largest library in the multiverse and pretend that things weren’t idling like a loaded gun between them, there was a chance that Ford could survive the encounter unscathed, free enough to move onto his next destination without Bill seeking to destroy his freedom, leaving the so called ‘all seeing, all knowing’ triangle none the wiser of Ford’s true feelings.

That is, if the triangle showed up at all.

Stanford had been in the Bibliosphere for at least a week already and there was still no sign of the yellow triangle.

He had been bunkering down in the heart of the giant library, surrounded by aliens from all dimensions, students, teachers, academics, and civilians, all drawn to the idyllic songbird of study in the high-ceilinged halls of the Bibliosphere.

The library was a sprawling silent city, contained within the central dome of the Bibliosphere, bookshelves stacked on all levels of the facility, hover steps scouring the shelves for those who could not float to reach the transcripts they desired.

The librarians were tall, unnerving eldritch beings, draped in sombre green flowing robes with shadowed faces, their elongated limbs and skeletal fingers ominous enough to look at, but when these creatures raised one of their spindly fingers to their hollow faces, silence was the only option, lest one succumb to the sense of dread these beings oozed.

So, it was just like the librarians at Backupsmore University really, in that sense.

There were silent levels of the library and soundproof study domes within where chatter was permitted. There were books, stone tablets, floppy discs and CDs, data files, facts and knowledge of all kinds stored in the Bibliosphere, and eager minds filled the dome to pour over everything within.

The well-read university students were draped in the same style of robes the librarians wore, the red and gold insignia signalling their position at the institution.

Stanford stuck out as an outsider in that sense, planted on his chosen table wearing Shailesh’s floor length black trench coat, the grey turtleneck he’d purchased to hide his garish neck tattoo, the scarf he often hid his face with dangling down his chest, and his reflective goggles he bought from the Sea World dimension hanging around his neck. He looked like the sort of swashbuckling interdimensional bad boy his wanted poster painted him as, and it was jarring to be such, when he was more used to being the wallflower nerd at the library that people often forgot.

Standing out wasn’t his intention here, but if he didn’t fork out the money to stay in the university village, he wasn’t about to pay for the university’s fancy robes either. Academic merchandising was all the same.

Ford had chosen a table facing the section on Gods, Deities, and Demons in the library’s mammoth sprawl and he had been working his way through the books he could find in this section, searching for some sort of reference to Bill in these tomes, but so far his search had been in vain.

He’d been throwing back sleep blocking tablets to stay awake during his library stay, which made paying for accommodation in the university village on the other side of the planet entirely redundant. (Why pay for a place to sleep when you didn’t need to sleep?)

The university was heavily guarded by time police and housed within a screening forcefield that formed another dome around the school and its grounds. As the wasteland between the Bibliosphere and the University was so dangerous, the police protection was marketed as a safety assurance for prospective students and library go-ers but Stanford saw the precautions as an overzealous gatekeeping method.

The fact that he was a wanted felon under time-law for his crimes against probability and multiple counts of theft and would be immediately arrested should he try to set foot on the university grounds hardly factored into his assessment of the force field. Hardly.

At least the library was easier to get into. Civilians could enter and read to their hearts content but should anyone wish to check out a book from the library they had to register for a library card and the process was very exacting. Not only did the Bibliosphere require DNA samples, fingerprints, full body scans, and some kind of unexplained energy reading that would enable the librarians to pinpoint your location anywhere in the multiverse should you fail to return a book, but all of this information could be freely accessed by the time police due to their affiliations with the Bibliosphere.

If Stanford were not a wanted criminal he might have been able to check out the books he needed on Bill and abscond to a different dimension entirely to read through them, avoiding the trap Bill had no doubt set, but since he had a criminal record, and he didn’t want to consent to being permanently tracked by the Bibliosphere across the multiverse, or arrested by the time police, he had no choice but to stay in the library while studying.

The Bibliosphere believed that knowledge should be accessible to everyone, hence their open-door policy, but that open-door policy made Stanford paranoid. If they let him in, they might let Bill in, however that was assuming he even made it to the door. Bill was more wanted by the Time Police than anyone, his time crimes were somehow infamous, despite Ford finding no record of them as of yet.

Perhaps the heavy police presence meant that Bill wouldn’t be joining Ford at the Bibliosphere.
Perhaps he really had provided Ford with the location just out of the goodness of his heart knowing he wouldn’t be able to attend himself. Perhaps he –

Argh, it was no good.

Stanford’s paranoia didn’t allow him to get his hopes up like that. He couldn’t suspend his disbelief that Bill had an agenda sending him here, it wasn’t like Bill to threaten Ford with a good time without following through.

He said he’d be here.

Maybe.

So, Stanford had spent the past week, jittery on sleep suppressors, reading a page or two at a time from his chosen interdimensional textbooks before glancing suspiciously around the library, convinced he’d see something yellow and angular at any second.
Any second now.

Stanford looked up from his current book, searching the room expectantly.

Still nothing.

It was hard not to be disappointed really. Stanford had hyped himself up to such an extent, certain that this was a trap, that Bill had sent Ford here for his own nefarious purposes, that anything that was too good to be true probably was, yet here he was, left in the largest library in the multiverse to study whatever he wanted.

It wasn’t fair.

Eventually, disheartened by the constant disappointment, Stanford slowly but surely began to let his guard down, reading entire chapters before looking up to scan his eyes around the library, and eventually polishing off entire books before moving onto the next one.

While the books were interesting, and Stanford was learning quite a lot about Gods and Deities, and the beings who considered themselves such, he wasn’t finding out an awful lot about Bill. He almost wished the triangle were here so he could ask him directly, or at least probe the God for answers based on what he’d read.

Looking up from his book with a sigh, he resigned himself to one more weary look around the room.

Still the same university students working on their group assignment, one or two monks from various galaxies reading up on scripture, some feathered acolytes wearing pink trim on their suits, sitting on a table in the corner, writing things down, bickering with each other, and a librarian haunting the aisles.

No change from when he started reading this book. The only difference was a man standing by the bookshelves wearing a black and gold robe, but as he wasn’t a yellow triangle, Ford barely gave him a second glance.

He turned back to the next book he’d selected, pulling it across the table towards him, opening it to the contents page, scouring the list for anything about triangular dimensions, ready to sink back into his study haze, when realisation struck.

The man over by the bookshelves wasn’t a yellow triangle but he wasn’t entirely unfamiliar.

Ford had seen that man before.

Pulling the book up close to shield his face, Ford panicked behind the pages.

He was stupid, of course he was stupid, to think that Bill would show up to the place where he was a wanted criminal as his angular yellow self. Ford was stupid for assuming Bill would be stupid enough to do such a foolish thing, and he knew that his ex-muse wasn’t foolish. He knew.

Of all the things he expected when coming to this library, to this study trap, he did not expect this, and he was kicking himself for being so naïve as not to anticipate that Bill would do something like this.

Possessing someone wasn’t outside of the realm of possibilities Ford had anticipated, but for Bill to do this?
Very carefully, hesitancy and paranoia imbued in every muscular twitch, Stanford peeked his eyes over the top of his book, eyeing off the man beside the bookshelf.

It was Bill.

It was a Bill that only Stanford would recognise, a Bill that Stanford knew every inch of, as he had crafted all the details of him precisely. It was a Bill he never thought he’d see again outside of his dreams, because he ensured personally that he wouldn’t. He eradicated this body molecule by molecule.

Ford could hardly believe it. He didn’t know how this was possible. It was thoroughly impossible and it was the last thing Ford needed right now, now that he was trying his best to distance himself from the God.

It was what he was always weakest for, his greatest triumph and regret all rolled into one attractive looking package.

Bill stood, his hair golden and neatly coiffed, his skin dark and smooth, gold bands of colour stretching up his arms, bright yellow slitted eyes and dark eyelids lidded in an appealing way as he idly perused the books on the shelf, his mouth lilting upwards into an amused smirk, like he knew Stanford was watching him.

He didn’t turn to acknowledge Ford, he didn’t look directly at him, he continued to act like he was ignoring him, while knowing that Ford couldn’t look away.

It was unfathomable to Ford the fact that Bill was here, that he had been here for who knows how long, just waiting for Stanford to notice.

He was laughing at him, mocking him no doubt, for his obliviousness, teasing him.

There he stood, in his sleeveless black and gold robes, not even applying himself to pretending that he was a university student. He wasn’t wearing the red, he wore his own colours, put his own Bill Cipher flare on the uniform of the scholars who resided here. The black and gold robes even had little triangles embroidered along the hem, as if the tattoos racing up his arms and encircling his shoulders weren’t enough of an identifier.

He was making it blatantly obvious who he was for anyone who knew well enough to look and, so far, no one had. Even Stanford barely recognised him, although his assumptions were to fault for that.

Stanford fumed from behind the book for several seconds longer, deriding himself for not seeing Bill sooner, debating with himself over what he should do now. Was Bill going to come over here? He had to know Ford was watching him.

But no, Bill made no move to turn around and face him.

Stanford watched openly now from his table facing the shelves, as Bill raised his hand, pointing at a book on the higher shelf, beckoning it down towards him. The book levitated out from its alphabetized spot and floated carelessly down through the air until it landed neatly in Bill’s hand.

As Bill delicately opened the book, making a show of dragging his finger down the contents page before flipping through the text, Stanford abandoned the books at his table, jumping out of his seat and storming over there to confront Bill.

(Also, any book that Bill was interested in was no doubt more informative than anything Stanford had been reading. If Bill picked up a book, Stanford wanted to read it, even if he had to wrestle the book from the God to do so.)

Thundering down into the aisle, Stanford delighted in noting that he could still loom over Bill at his height. The God hadn’t altered Ford’s original design much. Ford had half expected Bill to make himself taller in this form, just so he could lord it over him as much as his twisted little heart desired.

“What are you doing here? You –“

“Shhh.” Bill raised a finger to Ford’s lip briefly, before turning back to his book.

“You can’t – what - how did you?”

Bill used Ford’s flustered babbling as cover and swiftly ripped a page from the book he was holding, jamming the page in his mouth, chewing on it rapidly.

Stanford’s scandalised gasp was delightful to hear, but what was less delightful, and thoroughly unexpected, was how Stanford immediately reached forward, grabbing Bill’s chin, trying to wrest his mouth open and pluck the page out.

Any other creature in the multiverse wouldn’t have dared to touch Bill Cipher, no matter the form, for fear of immediate and graphic recompense but clearly Stanford Pines was one of a kind.

“Open your mouth! Spit it out!”

“Mmmrghh.” Bill stubbornly pressed his lips shut and leaned away from Ford’s dogged attempt to retrieve the page. A pale blue light encircled Ford’s wrists and pulled his hands away from the God, holding him back.

Bill finished chewing and made a show of swallowing the page, before he hissed at Stanford. “Rude much?”

The logical part of Stanford’s brain should have realised that trying to remove the page from Bill’s mouth physically was a sure-fire way to jettison himself immediately into the worst-case scenario of meeting Bill here. He had his powers, that much was clear, and already he had Stanford’s wrists bound with magic, hanging uselessly in the air in front of him. It would be one short step, one antagonization too much, that would lead to Ford being whisked away back to the Nightmare Realm, a prisoner of his own impulsive actions.

However, all logic went out the window when Stanford saw Bill defiling that book.

“You can’t rip pages out of books and then eat them. What the devil is wrong with you? This is a library! You can’t – I can’t believe you!”

“Hi honey, great to see you too. Nice flesh cage, is it new?” Bill sniped sarcastically. “If I’d’ve known that was the sort of reception I’d get, I wouldn’t have put in the effort, you know.”

“What was on that page? What did it say?” Ford questioned, straining his wrists against the cosmic restraints around them.

“It was a wonderful recipe for paper a la carte. I simply had to try it.” Bill smirked, looking more pleased with himself the more enraged Stanford became.

“Rrrgh, I could strangle you.” Ford’s hands flexed threateningly in the air, his frustration getting the better of him.

Bill seemed intrigued by that idea, looking Stanford up and down briefly before he looked away, aiming for casual, and snapped his fingers, releasing Ford’s restraints. “At least buy me dinner first, god, Sixer.”

With his wrists free, Ford snatched the book out of Bill’s hand. “Give me that.”

Flipping the pages to see if there was some sort of context that would hint at what Bill had removed, Ford found himself staring at a strange geometric language that he couldn’t understand, even with his dimensional translator. Growling with frustration, Ford slammed the book shut and tucked it into his coat pocket.

“Good luck translating that dead language. It’s been long gone.” Bill remarked, still enjoying Ford’s frustrated noises immensely.

“Yes, thank you. You’re very helpful.” Ford’s sarcasm was evident in his tone, clearly quite snippy that the first thing Bill did upon arriving at the library was to destroy yet more potential evidence about him.

It seemed that Bill’s arrival wasn’t to enable Stanford to more readily access information about him, but to carefully monitor the information Ford accessed, and censor the parts that Bill didn’t want known. Ford should have known that this was all too good to be true.

Glaring at Bill, at his beautiful face, and his shapely body, and his bright amused eyes, damning them all for being so attractive yet so infuriating, Stanford leaned heavily on spite and determinately turned away from Bill, stomping back over to his table in a huff.

“Aw.” He heard Bill say from behind him, but Stanford didn’t look back, determined not to get wrapped up in more of Bill’s nonsense.

“Hey, study buddy. Where are you going?”

He could hear Bill’s voice coming closer.

Now he was following him. Great.

Sitting at his desk and immediately pulling the book he’d stolen from Bill up in front of his face, he squared his shoulders and buried his face in the text, ignoring Bill out of stubbornness.

He had no desire to play Bill’s games now, no desire whatsoever.

Huffing out a frustrated breath, Ford glared at the inscrutable text, before he looked over his book for a brief moment of weakness, his paranoia wanting to know where the god was.

Two bright yellow eyes were staring back at him, and when their eyes met, Bill batted his eyelashes.

Sighing again, Ford set his book down on the table and scowled at every inch of Bill’s new form, and the perfection that it was to the scientist, aghast with himself that after everything he still found Bill incredibly attractive like this.

Bill sat with his hands laced under his chin, smiling at Ford as he stared at him, and from the looks of Bill’s constant smile, he knew exactly what this body was doing to Stanford.
“That symbol is an A.” Bill pointed at the text briefly, at a semi-circle with a line through it. “And also 11. And it also means mortgage broker.”

Ford narrowed his eyes, looking between the symbol and Bill with suspicion.

“No, it doesn’t.” Ford said, testing Bill with his doubt.

“Oh, I see you’re an expert then. Well, I’ll leave you to it.” Bill nodded, still smiling, and then made to leave, sliding off his seat.

“Wait.” Ford’s hand shot out and grabbed Bill’s wrist, holding him tightly. He was subconsciously impressed at how real Bill’s body felt, how warm his skin was, and how soft, exactly like how things had been back on earth. Part of Ford was still thinking that this could all be some sort of illusion, but it felt real enough.

Distracted from what he was going to say, Ford continued to feel Bill’s arm, squeezing it lightly and running his thumb over the skin, curious as to its composition.

Rather than pull away, Bill just stood there, watching Ford examine him somewhat indulgently.

“How did you –” Ford pondered, feeling the muscles and tendons and bone formed perfectly beneath the skin.

Ford ran his thumb over the gold lines of the bricks circling up Bill’s arm, curious about the properties of those more than anything. “So then these –“

“I made some modifications obviously.” Bill explained, sitting back down on the stool opposite Ford, gesturing to the gold in his skin. “Tying up my abilities wasn’t quite what I was going for with this particular home-grown vessel, so it differs from the original. I kept the gold decals for aesthetics sake, a little botched sentimentality never goes astray. The rest was more pragmatically designed.”

“I can see that.” Ford said, looking Bill up and down, allowing himself that finally. “You look exactly the same. It’s like no time has passed at all.”

“I don’t think this vessel could get laugh lines anyway. Not like you.” Bill tilted his head and raised his hand, moving forward to smooth his hand across the crows feet at the sides of Ford’s eyes. “It’s not a bad look for you though. Some sort of metaphor about human men and fine wine. Just wait until you’re 80.”

Stanford didn’t flinch away from Bill’s hand. He allowed the God to brush the backs of his knuckles against the wrinkles bunching around his eyes, feeling a flare of warmth and electricity when he touched him that was quintessentially Bill.

Bill’s flirting was a good sign, it meant that he came here to play, their cat and mouse game stretching out further, and it meant that he hadn’t discovered Ford’s duplicitous pretence, assuming that the fond feelings between them were still shared.

This meant that Ford could flirt back, in theory. It would be maintaining his cover to do so and giving in to a little flirtatious banter back and forth wouldn’t hurt Ford’s mission at this point, or so he told himself.
He was getting very good at twisting his justifications.

“For all I’ve aged, I’ve still got my hair though. One thing I suppose I should thank you for.” Ford pulled out the old crooked smile, gratified when Bill’s smile seemed a little bit softer in return. The old Pines charm was certainly working.

“Someone’s feeling generous today.” Bill reached up, carding his fingers through Ford’s dark brown hair indulgently, the tickle of his nails against Ford’s scalp melting trickling trails of pleasure down his spine. “A thank you already.”

“A supposed thank you.” Ford corrected, knowing that flirting was entirely different from giving in and sucking up to the God. He wasn’t a prisoner yet. “Let’s not get ahead of ourselves.”

“Mmm, wouldn’t want that.” Bill agreed, still stroking his hand pleasantly through Ford’s hair, the pattern of their banter meaning more than any Godly egotism at the moment.

“So, you made your own body? A legitimate vessel?” Ford questioned, his eyes sliding shut as Bill continued to play with his hair.

“For all intents and purposes.” Bill confirmed. “A temporary vessel. This one’s a bit more durable for a cosmic being, so it’s far more practical for me. The only drawback is that I look like a human, but I figured that’s more of a pro than a con in your eyes.”

“Well, I like it, that’s for sure, but that’s not saying that I don’t like your other forms.” Ford said, lying partially.

“No, you just associate all things evil with one more than the other.” Bill replied dryly, bringing his hand down to dismissively swipe through Ford’s stubble.

Opening his eyes, Ford gave Bill a very tired but knowing glance. “I should pick up the slack and start hating this form as well then, shall I?”

“Since you’re such an overachiever, who’s to say that you don’t already?” Bill crossed his arms again, going back to staring at Ford rather than stroking him fondly across the table.

Rather than argue, Stanford simply shrugged, knowing that hiding things that Bill already knew would be shooting his pretence in the foot. “Touché.”

Bill seemed oddly gratified by that response, enjoying Ford’s pushback. Perhaps that was the reason he hadn’t simply taken Ford prisoner yet. He seemed to be having much more fun watching Ford defy him than he would have if Ford were trapped within his dominion.

Bill gestured at himself expectantly. “So, do you like it?”

“I’d be lying if I said I didn’t.” Ford admitted, appreciatively looking over Bill’s chosen form. It was an excellent way to sneak past the Time Police, and appeal to Stanford all in one blow.

“Such high praise.” Bill snorted, shaking his head, before reaching over to snatch one of Ford’s pencils from him, twirling it around in his fingers. “For a being accustomed to higher praise I feel like maybe I’m being short changed.”

“Well if it’s any consolation.” Stanford laced his hands together on the table in front of him, smiling flirtatiously at Bill. “You look lovely when you’re being short changed.”

That startled a laugh out of Bill that rang a little too loud in the study room, earning a chilling glare from one of the librarians, before they raised a finger and hissed a note of oppressive silence at their table.

Stifling his laughter, Bill pretended to look adequately chastised, but when the librarian’s back was turned, he raised a finger of his own at the librarian’s back, but not such a polite one.

Stanford tried to smother his laughter now, reaching forward to grab Bill’s hand to stop the offensive gesture, snickering as he did so, and soon the two were laughing almost conspiratorially together behind their hands.

Somewhere along the way Stanford forgot to let go of Bill’s hand and continued to hold it between them on the tabletop.

---

“Are you seeing this?” One acolyte whispered harshly to her associate, doing her best to hide her surveillance from behind an overlarge textbook.

“You are not subtle, not subtle at all. We’re supposed to be watching him, not playing battleship,” drawled her colleague, drawing on the side of her page of notes.

Surveilling the human was becoming dull work, especially since all he seemed to do was sit and read, day and night, without even pausing to sleep. Occasionally he’d eat a ration bar, or drink some water, or scratch his ass.

So much of the same got boring quick.

“You didn’t even look up. Come on, this is our mission.” The first acolyte hissed somewhat zealously. “The Oracle is counting on us.”

“Counting on us to sit here and stare at the guy. We don’t even get to intercept him like the other squads, we just have to sit here and look at him,” complained the second acolyte, scowling at her papers.

“You should be looking at him now. Now! Look!” urged the first acolyte, scooting the textbook over so it covered them both.

With a reluctant sigh the second acolyte looked up, not expecting much, but she double took when she peeked a glance over the top of the book.

“Who’s his friend? This is new.”

“Look closer. But don’t draw attention to yourself,” advised the first acolyte, waggling her eyebrows meaningfully at her associate.

The second acolyte narrowed her eyes and tried to make sense of what she was seeing.

There was another human, or at least she thought it was human, it looked different to the mark, its skin was darker, and its colours were different, more vibrant. Maybe this human was the male counterpart to the drab older looking human, maybe this was some sort of elaborate courting ritual, in the library of all places, the animals. This was no place for such base fraternising.
The humans were flirting, it looked like, the darker human stroking its hand through the older one’s hair, wiping its hand across its face. Mammalian pageantry.

They spoke to each other in their own language, trading banter, when suddenly the darker human started laughing, a loud irreverent sound that drew the scorn of one of the hulking librarians.

The librarian turned to silence the miscreants, raising the dreaded finger to its face, hissing chastisement at them, but rather than the librarian’s power effecting them, the darker human waited until the librarian’s back had turned and flipped a flippant finger back at the behemoth giddily, yellow slitted eyes wide with excitement, the smile splitting the human’s face like a knife.

“Oh no.”

It all began piecing together, the gold on the creature’s arms, patterns that looked like bricks climbing the flesh, the garish yellow hair, a shade of yellow that only one being would find appealing in the multiverse, the dark limbs resembling fleshier versions of the dark limbs that struck such fear into the galaxy, and those yellow slitted eyes, the eyelashes giving away that last tell-tale sign as to the creature’s true identity.

There was no mistaking it.

That creature was the Devil the Oracle had warned them about. The Demon of Dreams, the Eternal Nightmare.

That was Bill freakin’ Cipher.

“We need to go. This mission’s too dangerous. We need to leave, now.” The second acolyte said quickly, sounding out of breath, already moving to shove her notes in her satchel and flee.

“We can’t leave yet. This is the moment Our Mistress has been waiting for. She needs to see this!” enthused the first acolyte, pulling on her associate’s feathers, trying to keep her from leaving.

“What do you think he will do to us if he catches us spying on his twisted canoodling with this exaggerated primate? This goes beyond the mission briefing! This is now life or death!”

“Oh, stop being so dramatic and lend me your eyes.” The first acolyte rolled her eyes, before looking at her colleague expectantly.

“My eyes? Why does it have to be my eyes? Lend your eyes!” Argued the second.

“I loaned my eyes last time. Besides, I want to report to her.” The first acolyte said stubbornly.

“Why do you get to report to her?” The second acolyte jutted her chin out argumentatively.

“Because I’m not the one who wanted to run away from the mission and if you lend me your eyes, I won’t be the one to tell her you did, hmm?” The first acolyte hummed, raising her eyebrows expectantly and holding her hand out, the communication crystal sitting snug in her fist. “So, what’ll it be?”

“Ugh.” The second acolyte grunted, crossing her arms, before she turned on her seat to face the first, reluctance written all over her face. “Fine then. But be gentle, I don’t like it when it bur – uuuurrhhhhhhhs!”

The first acolyte slammed the communication crystal into her associate’s forehead and the crystal burned through her consciousness, turning her into a conduit for interdimensional communication.
Her eyes glowed blue like static for a moment, the second acolyte twitching and spasming, her mouth hanging lax, foam beginning to froth at her beak.

After the static died down, the second acolyte seemed to jerk upwards into a more refined sitting position, before she looked condescendingly down at her colleague.

“Mistress. I have something to report.” The first acolyte said, beaming at the blue eyes of her colleague, expecting to speak with her leader.

“The Mistress is busy. You can leave a message with me and I’ll pass it on,” drawled the unmistakable tone of The Oracle’s military leader, Oestia, that absolute glory hog.

“This is important. She needs to see this.” The first acolyte argued, scowling at Oestia’s projected eyes. “She needs to see this with her own eyes right now. This is mission critical.”

“I’ll be the judge of that.” Oestia asserted, leaning the second acolyte’s body forward so she was resting her elbow cockily on the table top. “So, who am I looking at?”

“Not you, her, and it’s him so you can’t look,” stressed the first acolyte.

“Him who?” Oestia scoffed.

“Him him. He who I can’t tell you his name or he’ll know I’m here him. He who is everything our Mistress hates in the universe. He who wears a freakin’ bowtie. Do I need to spell everything out for you?”

“Look, just because you got to go to eternal lotto Vegas or whatever on your pointless mission, that doesn’t mean I’m going to –” Oestia’s words cut off, and the second acolyte looked to the side for a moment, then tilted her head back to look up into the space directly above her. “Oh, your Eminent Oracle of All that is Light. I was just – of course you may speak to the acolytes. I’ll just –”

The second acolyte’s head spasmed again in a way that was surely uncomfortable for her neck and her eyes filled with blue static once more, levelling out into a more vibrant cobalt, her tone and posture carrying a deeper more profound resonance.

“Speak, my foot soldier. What do you see?” came the Oracle’s calm voice, projected through the second acolyte’s fragile baser body.

“Mistress, I’ve been tailing the Sixer human just like you said. We’re at the Bibliosphere and he’s been studying books on deities and lost dimensions like you said he would, researching the demon. He’s been alone for the past week, but then – you really need to see this.” The first acolyte pointed in the direction of Stanford’s table from over the top of her textbook, encouraging her Gracious Leader to do the same.

Jheselbraum pushed herself further into the second acolyte’s head and leaned her body forward, grasping the edges of the text book to properly shield her surveillance.

When she spotted Bill sitting across from Stanford, her eyes lit up with a dangerous glee.

“Oh. Now this, this I needed to see.”

The first acolyte hummed with pride, oblivious to the way her Mistress’s eyes scoured Bill’s chosen form, sneering at the gold and the triangle motifs and the bricks that ran along his arms, disgusted that he wouldn’t even attempt to be subtle.
How could such a brazen creature exist unpunished?

But then she noted the way Bill smiled, his eyes alighting soft on the human’s features, their entwined hands sitting on the table between them, fingers laced in a casual net. Her eyes narrowed as Bill laughed at something the human had said, and she dug the second acolyte’s fingernails into the wooden study bench until they were bleeding at the claw beds.

She had known the many faces Bill Cipher assumed and his laughter was not unfamiliar to her, but never before in all her years of regrettable association with the geometric devil had she ever seen something resembling anything close to genuine happiness. It was all naught but a charade and Cipher was good at charades, but this was something else entirely.

This was a peek through the crack in the mask, a window looking past the lie. This was an opportunity. This was a –

“Such weakness.” Jheselbraum cooed, her blue eyes lidding venomously. “I don’t think I’ve ever seen anything like it.”

“Mistress?” The first acolyte looked at her leader, wondering what the revered Oracle was seeing that she couldn’t see.

“Do you see how he degrades himself, to pander to that lower life form? How he humiliates himself? That is a notch in the armour, a weak spot. One wouldn’t think such a contemptable ego would have it in him to lower himself to play pretend. Although he’s never had any trouble pretending before. I’m not sensing too much pretence here though. This is very interesting.”

The first acolyte tried to look again at the situation to see what her Mistress was seeing. She tilted her head, but she couldn’t see what her Mistress found so delightful about this situation. Cipher making an ally out of their mark didn’t seem interesting, it seemed like a disaster.

“The Sixer is researching the demon’s past, is he not?”

Jheselbraum’s eyes glowered out from the second acolyte’s skull in a way that burned, like she was burned.

“Let’s give him something to look into, shall we?”

Stanford had been attempting to decrypt the peculiar geometric language for the past 24 hours, feeling a strange mix between dubious and elated that Bill hadn’t left his side yet. The triangle continued to sit at his table, making random unhelpful comments about what Stanford was reading, probing for conversation, eventually folding paper aeroplanes out of note paper and manipulating as many of them as he could to float behind the librarians in neat little lines, levitating them out of sight whenever the librarians turned around, like a naughty child with a behavioural problem.

Eventually, Stanford realised that he could curb Bill’s chaotic enthusiasm by sliding his boots off and playing footsie with Bill under the table, but that particular distraction got old quick when he felt not just Bill’s feet, but an unexpected morass of tentacles wrapping around his ankles.
After a stern telling off, he slipped his boots back on, and now he sat here, with notes that were no more helpful than they were several hours ago, agonising over this mysterious shape-based language.

“It’s just not consistent. It just doesn’t make sense – I don’t – what are you eating?”

Bill was resting his head on the desktop now, bored of Ford’s cold shoulder treatment, and had somehow materialised a red box of some sort of edible good underneath the table, sneaking the food into his mouth.

Speaking with a mouthful of food, Bill answered. “Chocolates. Want some? They’re a bit rich.”

Bill passed the box to Stanford under the table, and he looked down onto his lap to read the writing on the box, his dimensional translator providing some use in this instance, if not with his difficult translation.

“Brings a whole new meaning to the phrase ‘eat the rich’. How’s that for marketing?” Bill winked at Ford, no doubt enjoying the novelty of having two eyes again. Two eyes made winking much more obvious.

“It would be too naïve of me to hope that there aren’t real people in these, are there?” Stanford asked, reluctant for the answer.

“Who considers capitalists as ‘real people’ anyway?” came Bill’s flippant reply, confirming one way or another that Stanford certainly wouldn’t be eating those chocolates. “If you don’t want them, that just means more for me.”

“Knock yourself out.” Ford replied dryly as he passed the chocolates back to Bill under the table. When Bill simply shrugged and popped another chocolate in his mouth, Stanford thought he’d try his luck a little.

“You know how to read this language then, yes?”

Bill hummed a vaguely affirmative sounding hum, picking through the box for his favourite flavours, licking each one and spitting them back out if they weren’t the ideal confection.

“Fancy translating a page for me?” Ford turned the book around with an eager grin.

Bill wrinkled his nose and spat out yet another chocolate, before he wrinkled his nose once more for emphasis at the geometric text. “You couldn’t pay me enough to read that garbage again.”

“Again? So, you’ve read it before?” Ford pressed, only to watch Bill make a disgruntled face and lay his head back down on the table so he didn’t have to look at the page in front of him.

Reaching a hand out, Ford poked Bill’s head annoyingly for a moment but when he felt Bill’s power tingling threateningly around his wrists again, he altered his movement, and began to stroke Bill’s hair gently instead.

“You could tell me what it says.” Stanford wheedled, continuing to pat Bill while testing his ire. “I want to know if you’re in there somewhere.”
“I’m not.” Bill replied his voice muffled by the table.

“That book’s not worth reading, Sixer. It wasn’t worth reading then and it isn’t worth reading now. All it’s good for is a sore stomach, so give it here, and I’ll get rid of the rest of it.” Bill groaned, sitting up slightly and reaching over to take the book.

Stanford swept the book off the table before he could touch it and held it close to his chest, doing his best to keep it away from Bill’s irreverent destruction.

“Not a chance. I am not letting you destroy a single page more than you already have in this library. Don’t eat books.”

“Ugh.” Bill groaned and used his extended hand to slap himself emphatically in the forehead, like he was done with Ford’s book toting bullshit. “I can’t believe this. If you want to know about my history so badly why don’t you look in a book that actually has something relevant in it, instead of wasting your time reading some old classroom textbook.”

“It’s from a classroom?” Ford questioned curiously.

“You’re missing the point Sixer. I’ve just told you that there’s another book with things about me in it in this fact dome and you didn’t even think to follow up on it. What kind of scientist are you?”

“Do you really mean that?” Stanford tilted his head, putting the indecipherable geometric book back in his pocket, leaning across the table to rest his hands on the surface eagerly.

“Do I mean that you’re a shitty scientist? We’ve been over this.” Bill rolled his eyes and glared at Ford for good measure.

“No, what you said about there being another book with you in it. Is that true?”

“You’ve been looking in the wrong section, smart guy.” Bill divulged with a casual shrug. “All this research about gods and deities won’t tell you anything, because the only book in this library worth anything is sitting in the back of the outdated mathematical commerce section.”

Jumping to his feet, Stanford began pulling his things together, readying to leave. He grabbed Bill’s arm and tugged him away from the table too, keen to follow the lead while it was still fresh. Rather than jump to it with him, Bill resisted, whining complaints as he stubbornly refused to get off his chair.

Stanford attempted to overpower him, still pulling him resolutely towards the front desk, but Bill became immovable, like a very stubborn anchor.

Releasing his wrist with a sigh, Stanford caught his breath and put his hands on his hips, looking at Bill with exasperation. “What can I do then? What can I do to get you to come with me and show me this book?”

Bill pursed his lips like he was considering it, before his yellow eyes flicked deviously up to Ford’s face. “Can I set up a tab?”

“What? At the – at the bar?” Ford puzzled, blinking owlishly at his ex-muse.
“You couldn’t afford my bar tab.” Bill snorted, before giving Ford that devious once over again. “I mean like a tab for favours. To be repaid at a later date. At my discretion. That sort of tab.”

“That sounds very unwise.” Ford replied bluntly.

“But don’t you like the sound of it?” Bill grinned winsomely. “I sure do.”

“I’m sure you do.” Stanford narrowed his eyes and looked up and down his ex-muse discerningly.

Pretending to owe Bill a favour in return for his co-operation wasn’t that much of a stretch considering how much Stanford was already lying about. The idea of an arrangement promising some sort of delayed gratification for the God would benefit Stanford, especially if he wasn’t around for the part of Bill’s proposal where he would cash in the favour.

Bill continued to beam optimistically at Ford, refusing to budge from his stool until his favour tab demand was met, and Stanford resigned himself to his pretence with a convincing sigh.

“Fine. Consider this the first favour on the tab.”

Instantly Bill held his hand out expectantly, waiting for Ford to shake on the deal, sealing his promise with power.

Stanford gave Bill’s hand a dubious glance, before he reached his hand out and grabbed Bill’s wrist instead, tugging him off the chair to follow him.

“Let’s go.”

Bill’s bright grin dimmed, but he followed Ford regardless, no longer weighing himself down to stagger the scientist’s efforts.

He watched Ford’s back carefully, his mischievous expression growing shrewd and calculating, as he let Ford pull him through the Bibliosphere, searching for the last remaining book on Bill’s past.

Stanford stood at the front desk, the librarian manning the counter typing the book title slowly into the database computers, its long skeletal fingers clacking ominously against the computer’s keys.

True to his word, Bill had led Ford to the outdated mathematical commerce section of the library, and even floated Ford alongside him so he could search the shelves for the title, as he didn’t trust Bill to check for him. Floating across the shelf, his finger tracing the titles, Ford found himself confronted with a gap in the shelves where the book should have been, the titles on either side of it indicating that this is where the book should be.

“Aw shoot. Guess it’s not here anymore.” Bill said, sounding more delighted than dismayed, already shrugging and floating them back down. “Too bad Sixer. Still, what can you do?”

Rather than respond, Stanford had marched away from Bill the moment his feet hit the ground and made a beeline for the enquiries desk, which lead to his current predicament.

For beings who have guarded the Bibliosphere for millions of years, the librarians were agonisingly slow typers. If they weren’t such daunting creatures Stanford would have urged them to hurry it up.

Twitching with impatience, Stanford could only wait as the librarian typed in the title – Inductive Reasoning to Support the Formulation of The Perfectly Productive Societal Polygon Theorem. Granted, the title was long and unwieldy but you’d think with such a vast wealth of resources at their disposal the librarians would have learned how to touch type.

Bill stood idly behind Stanford, watching the tendons in Ford’s neck jump as he ground his teeth in irritation. Ford was sure this was all very amusing for Bill, yet another wild goose chase designed purely to irritate Ford.

Finally done with their enquiry, the librarian hit enter and then turned the screen around to show Ford, its voice rattling and raspy, with an unnerving quality to it that made the hairs on Stanford’s arms stand on end.

“IT WAS CHECKED OUT LAST WEEK.”

“By who?” Ford blurted out.

The librarian raised a jagged finger to tap the screen, where the identification of the reader was displayed near the title.

A student at the University had it. A fellow called Barold Blendin. They’d checked it out a week ago, exactly a day after Stanford had arrived. The annotation on the record stated the book was withdrawn for an extra credit assignment on defunct societal structures for a mathematical anthropology class. There was no return date noted.

“I really need to see that book. Is there any chance it could be brought back?” Ford requested with strained politeness.

“THE STUDENT WILL WHEN THEY COMPLETE THEIR STUDIES.” Rasped the librarian.

“What if I need it before then?”

The librarian tilted its head at Ford, oozing disapproval, before it replied. “THAT IS FOR YOU TO WORK OUT BETWEEN YOURSELVES. THE BIBLIOSPHERE DOES NOT INTERVENE.”

“Group projects, am I right?” Bill interjected, jerking his thumb in Stanford’s direction. “They’re all the same. Unfortunately, we have a deadline to meet, and Brainiac here needs that book.”

“YOU ARE A STUDENT?” The librarian asked, turning its gaze towards Ford.

“Ah, yes.” Ford lied, before murmuring. “In a fashion.”

“THE STUDENT WHO CHECKED OUT THIS BOOK RESIDES IN THE UNIVERSITY VILLAGE. STUDENTS OF THE UNIVERSITY CAN ACCESS THE VILLAGE AND SHARE TEXTS. CONTACT THE STUDENT THERE, AND ASK THEM YOURSELF.”

“So how do I –“ Stanford began, and the librarian tapped the screen yet again, not keen to further explain itself to the human.
Ford scrambled to write down the Barold’s details and information, the Bibliosphere maintaining a record of Barold’s exact coordinates. The librarian had already turned its back on him, ending the conversation. When Stanford had finished scribbling the information down the screen turned on its own to face away from Ford.

Walking back from the enquiries desk with his piece of paper, Stanford paced over to one of the common study areas to sit at a desk, staring at the paper before scrubbing his hands through his hair in frustration.

Hopping onto a stool opposite Ford, Bill slid the paper towards him, surveying the details. “So, it’s in the university village, huh?”

“The University Village that you can’t get into without paying a hefty fee, which I am not going to do, and you need to have a verified clean criminal record, which unfortunately I no longer possess since I crossed over through the portal.”

“Says the guy who stole uranium from the government, irradiated the rats in his college dorm to teach the campus a lesson, and made a mind control tie for the government to throw elections.” Bill chimed helpfully. “Mr Lawful Good.”

Stanford, despite being tickled by the D D & More D reference, chose to ignore that and continued with his rant.

“Not even mentioning the time police’s force field. There’s no way –“ Stanford bemoaned, resignation setting in only to be interrupted by Bill’s snort of laughter.

“Seriously, Sixer. You’ve been to university before, you don’t think the students have a way to sneak off grounds? Or to sneak in?” Bill quirked a brow at Ford, smiling at him like he found the human remarkably funny, although that wasn’t anything new.

“Why would they want to sneak out?” Stanford looked at Bill in confusion, remembering his own university days. While the dorms weren’t exactly the cleanest, and it wasn’t his university of choice, Stanford was exactly where he wanted to be when he was studying. Wasn’t everyone?

“For parties?” Bill looked at Ford in disbelief, spelling it out for him. “Booze? Illicit substances? A chance to let their hair down and drop the honour student act? That’s a community of tightly wound repressed little overachievers, are you seriously telling me that you don’t think they’d jump at the chance to sneak past the barrier and get drunk and break shit in the wasteland on the weekends?”

Stanford squinted at Bill, still dubious, although he realised Bill had a point. Sneaking about to misbehave was almost synonymous with the university experience, or so Stanford’s peers had assured him. While he hadn’t seen the necessity to sneak into bars, he’d certainly disappeared into the nearby forests, or abandoned factories on occasion, chasing down the closest anomaly or urban legend to further his thesis.

“So, are you saying you know a way to get past the forcefield and the Time Police and the ID checks, so we can meet up with this Barold fellow and get the book?”

“I don’t.” Bill admitted, examining his nails idly as Stanford’s shoulders sagged. “But I have a feeling I know someone who might.”

Stanford perked up at that and looked at Bill hopefully, waiting for Bill to divulge.

Bill pursed his lips and stared back at Sixer, deliberating, before he crossed his arms.
“I can call them, but this is going on your tab. That’s two favours now.”

“So, put it on the tab. Let’s do this.” Stanford insisted.

Bill tsked but then he closed his eyes. Stanford watched for a moment, waiting for when Bill would pull out a communication device or a phone, but he made no move to do so. It was almost like he was falling asleep.

Eventually Bill spoke, although regretfully Ford still couldn’t decipher Bill’s chosen language, nor could his dimensional translator.

“Jryy qba’g yrg zr vagreehc. Whfg xvqqvat! V’q yvxr n bar ba bar jvgu Xrlubyr, gura lbh pna nyy tb onpx gb lbhe xavggvat. Fbhaqf tbbq?”

“What are you saying?” Ford hissed, trying to get Bill’s attention.

Bill’s brow furrowed in annoyance, but he made no move to open his eyes.

Bill paused, before he opened one eye just to roll it at Sixer. “He’s telling me hugs not drugs. What a hypocrite.”

Ford’s eyebrows rose incredulously as he watched Bill shut his eye again.

Shaking his head with an amused chuckle, Bill opened his eyes, ending the call.

“I’ve got our in.”

“Who’s Keyhole?” Ford asked, curious to investigate whatever he could pick up from Bill’s cryptic conversation.

“Jealous?” Bill grinned at Ford teasingly, as if delighted by the thought. “It suits you.”

“I’m not jealous.” Ford argued. “I’m just asking questions.”

“Whatever helps you sleep at night.” Bill said with a shrug, before looking at the bags under Ford’s eyes. “Or never. Back on your sleep blockers I see. That’s not insulting at all.”

“I was trying to study.” Ford lied half-heartedly. “Everyone here uses them. They sell them in the vending machines.”

“Okay jitters. Whatever you say.” Bill rolled his eyes and stood up from the chair, making to leave already.

“Wait.” Stanford’s arm shot out, and he grabbed Bill’s shoulder, looking almost distressed. “We can’t leave yet.”

“Why not?” Bill frowned, watching Stanford’s guilty and distraught expression as he pulled the undeciphered classroom textbook from his coat pocket.

“I don’t have a library card.”

“You are not taking that with you.” Bill said flatly, unimpressed.

“I want to read it.” Ford argued.

“You don’t even understand the language.” Bill retorted.

“I can decipher it.”

“It is literally a dead language, Sixer. No one can read it.” Bill snapped.

“You can.” Ford pointed out, his expression sheepish now, clearly angling for something. “And, well, I was hoping maybe … we could put it on my tab?”

Bill stared at Ford for several seconds, his mouth hanging open in disbelief, clearly swinging between offended and appalled for those stretching seconds.

Stanford was very tempted to set his hand under Bill’s chin, in that moment, and close his mouth for him.

The temptation was growing.

Eventually he just did it, and Bill seemed to blink out of his stupor, before swatting Ford’s hand away from his face. “Stop that!”

Stanford blinked, and attempted his best pleading expression, to see if that would aid his cause.

“Stop making that face. Pick someone else to read you a bedtime story or pick a better story.”

“But I want to read this story. Book!” Stanford corrected himself and he started bargaining. “You don’t even have to read it, just help me take it out and I can figure out the rest. Please? I’ll give you a backrub.”

Bill squinted at him.

“What kind of chump change –“

“Two backrubs! A foot massage? I will worship your entire body any way you see fit for as long as you whh-“

Bill smooshed his hand over Ford’s mouth, his cheeks dark and flushed, hissing at Ford. “Shh, will you keep your voice down?”

Ford meant to say ‘why, are you embarrassed’ but with Bill’s hand over his mouth it sounded more like the equivalent phrase said in the M Dimension.

“I know libraries get you going, or whatever, but could you ease off on the worship gasoline? We are in a public place.”

“Funnily enough, I didn’t think that would phase you.” Ford murmured, pulling Bill’s hand away from his mouth.

“A public place crawling with Time Police. They may be absolute idiots, but even they would notice that kind of spike in energy, and since I’m squashed into a meat suit again, a spike like that is a little harder to contain.” Bill explained peevishly, still obviously blushing.

The rational part of Ford understood this, but the irrational part of him was currently obsessing over the thought that Bill could once again be overwhelmed like this, and his thoughts immediately made a beeline to all the ways he’d like to do just that, moral ambiguity be damned.

Even Ford’s unspoken fantasising seemed to be incendiary, Bill flustered more and more, until, shoulders tense, he snapped.

“Fine! Fine! I’ll get you your damn book. Just give your brain a cold shower, and you better be thinking about filing tax returns by the time I get back.”

Ford watched Bill stomp over to a stressed-out looking student sitting on one of the tables across the room, vaguely amused by the prospect of having to give his thoughts a cold shower. And somehow Bill thought filing tax returns would be dull enough to dissuade him of his baser thoughts. Ford mentally added ‘tax evasion’ to his list of Bill’s intergalactic crimes, entertained by the thought.

Eventually, he started paying attention however, noting the way Bill went from childish stomping, to suave and approachable, engaging with the chubby Angolean student at the desk. They seemed to be discussing something, and the student was looking rather desperate, explaining his situation. Bill was clearly schmoozing with the student, nodding, gesturing to the papers on the table before gesturing to himself, and finally Ford noticed him touching the student’s arm, making some sort of proposition.

Stanford wouldn’t say that he was jealous, per se, but he could recognise the way Bill worked over needy academics, seeing his own past failings and naivety reflected back in the eager way the student looked at Bill. Bill had made a beeline towards the student who sat alone, who appeared to be an outsider, and who looked like he was struggling the most, who seemed to be at a loss, and Ford recalled how he felt much the same when he hit a roadblock with his Grand Unified Theory of Weirdness and how grateful he was when Bill came to his rescue with answers.

Was he as much of an obvious mark as the student at the table was? An easy target for Bill to manipulate into doing his bidding for him? Evidently so, considering the portal Bill had him build, but there was something stirring within him that he didn’t like, the more he compared himself to this random struggling student who Bill currently had his arm slung around companionably, working him over with friendly overtures to gain his trust and bend his arm.

He swore it wasn’t jealousy. It was not.

But watching Bill sit so close to this stranger, the student gazing at Bill like the God could solve all of his problems and more (the more possibly having something to do with how attractive Bill’s form currently was, as Ford could also recognise that the student probably didn’t get that much attention, certainly not from someone as good looking and confident as Bill) their expression was a little too familiar for Ford’s taste. He was certain he wasn’t projecting that much onto the student, but his (not jealousy) suspicions were confirmed when the student began blushing, Bill’s persuasion working like a charm.

That ticked something over in Ford, and so he crept closer to the table, trying to listen in.

“You’ll really give me the answers to the geometry midterms?” The student asked Bill earnestly.

“For that midterm and every single geometry exam you’ll ever take in your entire mathematical career. All the secrets of the geometric world, every one of them, transplanted into your noggin in one direct hit. Trust me kid, I’m practically made of geometry. This’ll be the best decision you’ve ever made. But there’s just one little thing you’ve got to do for me first.”

“What? I’ll do anything not to flunk out, honestly.”

“You’ve just gotta let me into your mind, kid.” Bill explained, still rubbing the student’s shoulder encouragingly. Stanford was watching the motion of Bill’s hand, still seething away with not-jealousy. “You know. To hold the door open. For all that knowledge.”

The student blinked slowly at Bill, clearly a little slow on the uptake. No wonder he was failing geometry.

Pouring the sugar on thick, Bill reiterated. “All that sweet, sweet knowledge. You know you want that. So, what do you say, kid? Do we have a deal?”

Clearly swayed by Bill’s argument, although privately Ford thought Bill’s initial proposal to him was a lot more refined, rather than this slapdash, insincere proposition, the student licked his lips, shrugged awkwardly, then nodded.

“Yeah, sure. Absolutely.”

Bill held out his hand, and the student grasped Bill’s hand, firmly shaking it, then suddenly their head fell forward.

Stanford rushed closer to the table now, no longer pretending he wasn’t listening, and examined the boy.

“Is he okay? What did you do to him?”

“He’s fine.” Bill replied, his arm still around the student’s shoulders, holding them up. “I just put him to sleep for a bit. Quick, give him your book and sit next to me. I’m going to nap on your shoulder while I check the book out on his library card.”

“What?” Stanford baffled at Bill’s quickfire plan, and Bill yanked Ford to sit on the stool next to him, manoeuvring the scientist into a comfortable position.

“Just while I’m fooling the librarians. It’ll take a lot of concentration. After that I should be able to steer and drive at the same time.” Bill explained, leaning his head back against Ford’s chest, cuddling up to the scientist.

Ford barely had a moment to register the fact that his ex-muse was nestled snugly against his chest, bouncing his affection from one duped scholar to another, before the student’s head snapped up again, his eyes bright yellow now, with slitted pupils.

“Cosy digs. Not as nice as yours of course.” Bill remarked, as he rifled through the student’s wallet until he found his library card. Holding it up triumphantly, he turned to look at Ford’s baffled expression, before pausing, twisting the student’s face into a fond smile. “Aww, now that’s a cute couple.”

Ford was holding Bill’s unconscious body protectively, so he didn’t slide off the stool and onto the floor, but he knew from Bill’s perspective looking out through the student’s eyes that they probably looked quite cosy together. Ford’s cheeks flushed indignantly, but he hardly had time to be flustered.
“Quick, give me the book.” Bill held the student’s hand out, and Stanford passed the textbook over to Bill after careful deliberation.

Snatching up the book, Bill nodded. “I’ll be back in a hot second.”

He took off immediately towards the front desk, walking with a confident swagger that Ford doubted the student regularly possessed.

Ford watched Bill pass the book over to the librarian, flashing the library card, chatting away to the eldritch creature all the while and the scientist shifted awkwardly on the stool, adjusting his grip on Bill’s body.

Looking down at the currently vacant vessel, Stanford allowed himself a moment to marvel at the accuracy of the body. It was exactly how Ford had designed it, right down to the pores, but there were small divergences from the original design, little bits of Bill’s personal flair.

The gold jewellery was new, just as flashy as Ford would expect of the triangle, but it was a unique experience seeing it on the body Ford built for him. Bill had pierced this vessel’s ears, gold triangles dotting all the way up from the lobe to the cartilage, and from this angle Ford could have sworn Bill’s vessel was wearing eyeliner and, no doubt, mascara too.

For all of his attempts to act like he wasn’t trying to impress Stanford, Ford privately noted the little ways Bill had made an effort with his appearance here, almost like dressing up for a date.

Perhaps that’s what he thought this was.

Perhaps that was what the favour tab was for. So, Bill could call in favours from Ford when the date reached its logical conclusion. That was a much nicer thought to entertain than believing the tab was purely to manipulate Ford. A very entertaining thought.

Bill was walking the student’s body back over there and Ford noticed the blush on the student’s cheeks.

Ford watched him return, bemused, his arms still wrapped around Bill’s body dotingly.

“I can’t leave you alone for a second.” Bill complained, stuffing the book in the student’s bag and slinging it over his shoulder. “You and libraries, I swear.”

“Are we going?” Ford said brightly, enjoying his regained ability to fluster Bill while trapped in an expressive vessel. There was no way Bill could hide how he felt now.

“Let me just –” Bill took a deep breath and seemed to concentrate, before his vessel’s eyelids fluttered, slowly inhabiting his body once more.

Yellow light shining from their eyes, Stanford was both impressed and perturbed by Bill’s ability to simultaneously possess the student’s body and his own.

With every display of Bill’s unrestrained power Ford felt the one two punch of intrigue and dismay competing with each other, missing the days when Bill was powerless and got spooked by the toaster.

Bill straightened up beside Ford, manoeuvring the student to walk a little bit further ahead of them. Bill and Stanford passed through the doors that civilians could walk through, scanners checking they hadn’t smuggled any books out of the Bibliosphere, and Bill walked the student’s body through the other door, presenting their library card and the book to the librarians checking at the Time police guarded the exit of the library, and Stanford pulled his scarf up around his face, very aware that he was still considered a felon in their eyes.

Bill did no such thing, smiling broadly at the time police grunts stationed around the library’s hulking doors, making jovial finger guns at them as he passed them by.

As a testament to their stupidity perhaps, one of the time police officers gave Bill a friendly wave in return, before chuckling and muttering something to his co-worker. Something along the lines of ‘kids these days’.

“So, it’s that easy, is it?” Stanford muttered as they rounded the corner, out of sight of the officers.

“I told you. They’re as dumb as rocks. And that’s an insult to rocks everywhere.” Bill quipped, before he walked the student to their hiding spot, making him reach into his bag and withdraw the book, passing it back to Stanford, who secured it safely in his bag.

“Speaking of dumb as rocks.” Bill remarked, and the gold light leeched from the student’s eyes, returning their mind back to them.

“Huh, wha – where am I?” The student looked around them in a confused panic. “What just happened? How did I get here? I don’t remember –”

“Easy there poindexter.” Bill reassured the student, missing the way Ford narrowed his eyes at the use of the familiar nickname. “You held up your end of the deal, now I’ll hold up mine. Brace yourself.”

“What?” The student puzzled, but when Bill snapped his fingers the student winced, immediately bringing his arms up to cradle his forehead, grunting like he was in pain. His nose started bleeding and his eyes were glazed and unfocused.

“I see the answers, all the answers. But it hurts.” He whimpered, and Bill waved his hand dismissively at them.

“Yeah, yeah, that’s what they all say. Walk it off. You can thank me when you pass that test or oust your geometry professor. Whatever comes sooner. Come on Sixer, let’s go.”

Ford gave the student one more concerned look but when it appeared that Bill hadn’t done anything worse to the scholar than give him a killer migraine, the nosebleed stopping quickly, he fell into step behind Bill, catching up with him as they walked together to the edge of the city.

“That’s what they all say?” Ford watched Bill suspiciously.

Bill paused to give Ford an unimpressed look, before he continued walking towards the wasteland border, laying on the sarcasm. “Oh no, Sixer doesn’t feel special anymore. How could I? I’m a monster.”

“That’s not –“ Stanford struggled with his justifications for a moment, since Bill got to the heart of the matter so quickly. Ford didn’t feel special. It hurt seeing Bill use the exact same tactics on someone else that he used on him, but Bill had been telling him that all along, that he wasn’t special, so he didn’t know why it hurt so much.

Pretending that he wasn’t selfishly jealous of a derisive nickname, he pressed on. “How many people have you done that to?”
“I’ve told you about my scientist collection before.” Bill gave Ford another sideways glance, as if measuring his reaction.

“And did you hurt all of them like that?” Ford asked with a frown. “He looked like he was in pain. His nose was bleeding.”

Bill sighed.

“If you were to spend an evening reading everything there ever was to know about every nuance of geometry, after packing that much information into your head in such a short amount of time, you’d have a headache. Of course you would. There’s only so much brain capacity physical lifeforms can support. So the guy’s going to need to throw back a few Tylenol for the next couple of days and keep his nose clean. So what? He’s lucky he just got geometry transplanted in his head and not every speck of knowledge in the universe like all the other ambitious idiots asked for.”

“You can do that?” Ford questioned, looking mildly affronted. The secrets of the universe were what he specifically wanted when he called Bill down, and Bill had never presented it to him as an option, this sort of knowledge transplant. Now Ford was supposed to believe Bill had just willingly doled out enlightenment like that to others? “You didn’t do that for me.”

“You don’t want it, Sixer.” Bill assured him, flapping his hand at the scientist dismissively. “Trust me. The last person who got the full package gave the Romans something to talk about. Look up Explodicus Domicus. It’s about what you’d expect.”

Stanford slowed his pace and made a perturbed expression, taking that in, before he shook his head and jogged to keep up with Bill’s brusque pace.

“But you made deals like that with the other scientists. Trading information for possession rights? What did you even do when you possessed them? You couldn’t have asked every one of them to build you a portal or you’d have one by now.”

“Astute as ever, Sixer.” Bill remarked, before he attempted to climb over the border wall to the wasteland, crumbling rock dipping low enough for Bill to awkwardly scramble across.

Ford didn’t know why Bill didn’t just float over the wall and so he offered Bill his hand to steady his climb. Bill took it and managed his brief climb, before he tugged Ford along behind him, trying to be helpful. He ended up yanking Ford down from the wall, causing him to scuff his palms against the brick on the way down the other side.

Rubbing his palms together, scowling, Ford saw Bill shrug and continue his sentence.

“Let’s just say I wasn’t always as goal oriented as I’ve had to be now. I needed distractions back then, but things change when you have a deadline. It used to just be about having fun, laughing at how stupid humans are, that sort of thing.”

“It seems like you’ve still been doing plenty of that sort of thing.” Ford replied peevishly. “It seems like you laugh at me all the time.”

“Sixer, there’s laughing at you and then there’s laughing at humans who willingly kill off their entire army just because their boss told them to play a game of stab the guy to the left of you. Well, not their entire army, there was one guy left. Maybe if they stood in a circle. Anyway.” Bill waved his hand, as if he hadn’t just admitted to indirectly causing mass murder. “My point is that things change, as you so eloquently put it. As much as I wish it was, it can’t always be all fun and games.”

Remembering his reason for being here, chastising himself for getting distracted, swept up in Bill’s infectious banter and madcap hijinks, like a fool, Stanford straightened up and looked out across the wasteland. “No, it cannot.”

He could see the spires of the university far on the horizon, but the wasteland was vast and unforgiving between the Bibliosphere and the university.

“We get in on the west side.” Bill offered. “Do you want me to teleport us?”

“No, thank you.” Stanford said swiftly, reaching into his jacket pocket, retrieving his nano briefcase from his pocket, playing with the settings before placing it on the ground. The briefcase split open and spat out one of Stanford’s belongings.

Bill gave an impressed whistle.

A rumbling hover bike came out of the nano briefcase, before the small usb sized device snapped shut on the ground beneath it. It looked much like one of the flash motorbikes Ford saw at the bikers club in Gravity Falls, and Stanford felt very badass when he requisitioned it in one of the Federation ports (racking up yet another black mark on his criminal record).

He assumed Bill was impressed with the bike but nothing was ever that straight forward with his muse.

“Where did you get a nano briefcase from?” Bill asked, watching Ford retrieve it from the floor. “Those things are rare.”

“Diñeiro gave it to me.” Ford answered, putting the nano briefcase back in his pocket, somewhat miffed that Bill wasn’t impressed by the bike. Stanford liked the bike.

“Of course, he did.” Bill nodded, rolling his eyes. “Not many people get to walk around with a pocket dimension like that just for storage. They’re mostly used for people smuggling. That’s why they’re incredibly illegal.”

“They are?” Ford asked, somewhat perturbed by this information.

“That shouldn’t phase you, Master Criminal.” Bill joked, before walking around Ford to run his hand over the leather seat of the bike with mild interest. “Where did you get the bike from?”

Well, he stole it, but he didn’t want to give Bill the satisfaction of admitting to it.

Stanford paused for a moment, before delivering his eloquent lie. “The bike store.”

Bill snorted a laugh, before he swung a leg over the bike seat, settling in comfortably with his hands on the handlebars, looking at Stanford expectantly.

Ford gave a slight frown, and he placed a hand on Bill’s stomach scooting Bill back. “I’ll drive. It’s my bike.”

“And possession is nine tenths of the law.” Bill retorted but allowed Stanford to straddle the bike in front of him, turning the rumbling thing on with practised expertise.

Bill could just imagine Sixer, fleeing from criminal prosecution, zipping through city streets and skies on the hoverbike, his reflective goggles shining, his scarf and long coat flapping in the breeze, like some sort of renegade ill-fated outlaw. It was a fun thought to imagine.

Stanford revved the bike up and, hesitantly, Bill placed his hands on Ford’s back, watching to see whether or not Sixer minded. It was almost like a test and Stanford could tell, aware that he had a cover to maintain as someone who harboured enough feeling for the God to pardon him of his crimes.

With that thought in mind (that thought and nothing else) Ford reached around to grab Bill’s hands, pulling them forward so Bill could wrap his arms around Ford’s torso, almost like he was spooning him from behind while they straddled the bike together.

Ford told himself it was so Bill would not fall off, and that it was just rudimentary bike safety, but when he felt Bill soften into the embrace and rest his cheek on Ford’s shoulder he couldn’t help the warmth that filled his stomach, colour pinking his cheeks.

The wasteland was a dire sort of place. Wrecked buildings dotted the landscape, crumbling and decrepit, weeds climbed through the cracks in the paving, nurtured by years of neglect, and discarded bottles and food wrappers from past travellers collected in the corners.

The wasteland was constantly under siege by the time police, Bill explained. Routine bombardments and raids targeting ‘knowledge smugglers’ had driven the people, now refugees, who lived in the area surrounding the Bibliosphere elsewhere hundreds of years ago, since their own world was no longer safe to them. Civilian casualties caught in the crossfire became far too commonplace and the buildings left that littered the wasteland were nearly all abandoned. There was evidence that students, vagabonds and criminals passed through on occasion, but they certainly couldn’t stay long, given the regular raids.

There was quite a distance to cross between the Bibliosphere and the University, and it was Bill who suggested Stanford stop to rest as night fell.

“It’s not like I need to rest.” Ford argued. “I have the sleep blockers.”

“What you have is several airports worth of bags under your eyes.” Bill retorted, pointing at them, his finger coming threateningly close to Stanford’s glasses. “You think I can’t recognise a sleep deficit when I see it? You’re just embarrassing yourself.”

Stanford frowned, batting Bill’s hand away from his face. “Even if I did want to rest, this doesn’t seem like the safest place for a little shut eye.”

“Sure, it’s no five-star hotel, but it’s not like it’s dangerous. No one’s lived here in years. Just pick a nice hovel and settle down for the night.” Bill reached forward and put his hand on the breaks, slowing the bike to a stop in front of one of the empty buildings.

As much as Stanford wanted to continue driving through the night, anything to get to the book faster, he couldn’t deny that the prospect of sleep was appealing. He didn’t have a reason to avoid it now that Bill was right next to him, he couldn’t avoid Bill in real life so there was no sense avoiding him in dreams.

While the broken buildings didn’t exactly look inviting, there was a certain allure in stopping his journey, to rest and eat and recuperate before hitting the road again. And there was a twisted sense of safety in the fact that he wouldn’t be alone out here.
Giving in to Bill’s urging, Ford turned the bike around and nudged it through the doorway of one of the buildings. This one still had at least half of its roof, so it would likely be sturdier against the elements. Cold was starting to seep into the evening, and Stanford was questioning the relative merits of his fingerless gloves.

Bill climbed off the back of the bike and watched as Stanford packed the hovercraft into his nano briefcase, fiddling around with the settings on the device until he could withdraw a ratty looking sleeping bag and some ration bars.

“That’s what you’re eating?” Bill questioned sceptically, and Ford was eerily reminded of a mother scolding a bachelor. His lifestyle had become rather spartan as of late, although it could be argued that was Bill’s fault.

Tearing the plastic off one of the ration bars, Stanford took a rebellious bite and answered with his mouth full. “That’s what I have.”

“You don’t even know what’s in them.” Bill gave the ration bars an unsavoury glance. “If consumers knew what was really in the so called ‘secret formula’ they’d run screaming to the hills. Then again, ignorance is bliss.”

Ford stopped chewing, his mouthful of ration bar suddenly feeling dry and unappetising in his mouth.

Bill materialised a plush pillow for himself and sat on it, cross legged. He clicked and suddenly there was a blue burning campfire in the centre of the room, radiating heat throughout the cold ruin. Bill pulled his box of chocolates out from thin air once more, and threw one in his mouth, still talking conversationally.

“If you could eat anything in the multiverse right now, what would it be?”

The heat of the fire was soothing some of the hardened tension from Ford’s shoulders, and he pulled his sleeping bag a little closer to the blaze, thinking back on camping trips in Gravity Falls, and even further back with Stanley and the few family bonding expeditions they shared on their father’s fishing trips. Bill shifted his pillow closer to Stanford.

Ford did his best to swallow his bite of the ration bar, his mouth watering as he realised how hungry he was for real food, like he used to be able to eat.

“Campfire tomatoes.” Stanford answered, settling down onto his sleeping bag beside Bill, holding his hands out to warm them by the fire. “And sausages. And baked beans and rotisserie chicken smoked over a fire.”

Bill’s lips twisted in fond regard at Ford’s telling answer, amused by the associations he made, before he clicked his fingers and the campfire set up changed, allowing space for a pan that was sizzling baked beans, tomatoes, and sausages in crackling oil, while a bird skewered on a stick rotated above, crisping nicely around the edges.

Ford leaned forward instinctively, hungry for the sort of food he had long been denied in his journey, but he hesitated, watching Bill warily.

“This isn’t going on my tab too is it?”

“By all means, go back to your ration bars. See if I do something nice for you like this again.”

“I’ll eat it.” Ford hurried to assure them. “I’m just wanting to know what the catch is.”
“Maybe there’s no catch.” Bill said, shrugging idly. “Or do you think there’s always some overarching grand ulterior motive at play?”

Stanford didn’t answer and his silence answered for him.

“You are really so determined to think the worst of me?” Bill asked with a frown, although it sounded more like a statement.

Rather than deny it, Ford stuck his chin out stubbornly. “It’s not like you haven’t given me reason to.”

“It’s not like you haven’t been a piece of shit as well.” Bill responded cattily, before he materialised cutlery in the air in front of Ford. “Eat your damn food.”

Stanford grabbed the cutlery and stubbornly began turning the sausages, eventually scooping up the beans and blowing on them.

It was very hard not to moan when the food finally hit his mouth, real honest earth food, and he felt oddly reminded of when Bill was first thrust into the visceral world of tastebuds and digestion, and the loud reaction he often had to a good meal. It seemed less of a theatrical embarrassment now and more of an understandable appreciation of a good dinner.

His irritation with Bill melted away as he powered through the dinner, his stomach ravenous for something substantial after so long eating ration bars, poisonous plants and rocks.

It was only when he had nearly finished his meal, gnawing chicken meat off the bone, that he realised Bill had been silently watching him devour his meal, his expression distinct yet indiscernible.

“What?” Ford asked, his words coming out thickly around his food.

“Oh, I’m just mulling over the fact that you don’t trust me. I don’t trust you. We only believe the worst of each other. Heck, you’d probably believe me right now if I told you the food was poisoned.”

“Hurgk.” Stanford made an aborted sound of disgust as the food caught in his throat, half convinced he’d been poisoned the moment Bill brought it up.

Bill laughed, watching the obvious belated panic and outrage flicker across Ford’s face. “I’m kidding! God, you’re gullible. It’s not like you could be poisoned anyway, even if you wanted to. You could glug back cyanide like it’s going out of style and you wouldn’t even feel queasy.”

“I imagine it’s because I would feel dead.” Ford testily replied.

“O ye of little faith.” Bill replied fondly, picking dust off the hem of his robe. “It could be your new party trick.”

“Poisoning myself?” Ford questioned incredulously.

“You’re so negative all the time.” Bill complained. “You should be permanently banned from the gift horse dimension pre-emptively, because looking them in the mouth is a dire insult there and somehow I wouldn’t put it past you.”

“How surprising, you’re calling me ungrateful again. What’s next, unworthy? Unintelligent? Unimportant?” Stanford threw his chicken bones into the fire and held a hand up in mocking mimicry of Bill’s mannerisms. “Shall I hold my breath for a ‘you’re not special Sixer’ or will one be forthcoming? I can wait.”

“You act like I haven’t just provided you a meal or hijacked a student so you could keep that trash book of yours, or called in a favour so you could find dear sweet Barold.” Bill narrowed his eyes, his tone turning sinister. “Should I have just given you a slap in the face and been done with it, since that’s all it seems to amount to. Would that have made you happy?”

“Don’t you even pretend that you do the things you to in the interest of making me happy.” Stanford sneered, his ire surfacing, overpowering any deceit he might have currently been working on harbouring.

It was hard to separate his emotional state from his logical goals around Bill. There was something about the God that riled emotional responses in Stanford with such force and he wasn’t willing to admit why. He should have lied to Bill, toned down his vitriolic response, but it bubbled to overflowing, and once again he was spewing venom out at Bill, blaming the God once more.

Perhaps it was because they were together again, perhaps it was because Bill chose the form that Ford liked best, reminding him of the sore spot that was their romance and consequent betrayal. Stanford couldn’t pinpoint why, he just knew that he couldn’t hold his anger back around Bill like this, and part of him didn’t want to.

Bill’s lips twisted, and in this form it almost looked as though he was upset, or angry perhaps. It was more visible emotion than Ford had ever succeeded in dragging out of Bill’s triangular form, and seeing it made Stanford feel oddly vindicated.

“Clearly that’s a Sisyphean task, assuming you can ever be happy with what you’re given. I don’t think you’ve been truly happy once a day in your miserable life.” Bill spat back cruelly.

Perhaps recognising that cruelty begets cruelty, Stanford stowed his venom temporarily, replying in a more subdued tone. “I was, once.”

Bill paused at that, then narrowed his eyes at Ford, crossing his arms rather sulkily. “Well, bully for you.”

“Are you going to tell me what’s in this book?” Ford pressed, reaching into his coat to retrieve the book they stole from the library.

“Lies. Throw it on the fire.” Bill replied shortly, his shoulders tense, turning away from Ford.

“Just read some of it.” Ford implored, grabbing Bill’s shoulder, trying to turn him to face him.

“No.”

“How am I supposed to find out about you if you won’t tell me what’s in this damn book?” Stanford asked, frustrated.

“You don’t ask the book, you ask me! I’m right in front of you Sixer. Literally right in front of you, in the flesh, and you’re still –” Bill fumed, the words bursting out of him as he finally turned to face Ford.

“What do you want me to do?” Stanford questioned tersely, his hand squeezing Bill’s shoulder almost painfully. “Do you want me to know you? As if I don’t already know enough.”

“If you ‘know enough’, why are you still searching for more proof? If you know all there is to know?” Bill scowled, and reached up to grab Stanford’s other arm, his wiry fingers digging into Ford’s bicep, giving as good as he got. “You either know everything, or you know nothing, and I’m leaning towards believing the latter. So, there’s no point acting like such a know-it-all.”

“It’s not worth knowing everything if all I know is lies.” Stanford squeezed Bill’s shoulder again and gave it an unwise shake. He honestly didn’t know why Bill hadn’t stopped him already. “And history shows that I get more lies from you than I do from a book.”

“Well if you like the book so much, why don’t you marry it?” Bill sneered in response, getting right in Stanford’s face.

That response was just so utterly childish, and so utterly Bill, that Ford couldn’t help it, so he rolled his eyes, grabbed Bill’s face, and then mashed their mouths together, playing his advantage.

He felt Bill’s hands scramble against his chest, flailing uselessly while the God processed Ford’s forward action, yet inevitably Bill’s resistance melted away and he began kissing him back.

Just when Bill had softened sufficiently into the kiss, Ford pulled away with a sigh and looked his ex-muse in the eye.

“How did you come here, Bill?”

“We came here together on the back of your hover bike, so –“

“I mean why did you come here. To the Bibliosphere. Why did you set this up?” Stanford clarified.

Bill glanced up at Ford evasively and answered. “I wanted to check out a book.”

“And that required me being here?” Ford raised his eyebrow sceptically.

“Don’t act like you didn’t want to be here. This library is right up your alley.” Bill argued.

“I’m just finding it hard –“ Ford stressed, trying to phrase his words as delicately as he could given his temper. “To believe that you directed me to come here out of the goodness of your heart. There has to be a reason for it.”

“What if the reason is just that I wanted this? For you to come here, for us to meet.” Bill postulated, a defensive tone to his reply.

“Why?” Ford pressed evenly.

“Do I need a reason to see you?” Bill’s yellow eyes bore stubbornly into Ford’s own now, but all Ford could see was that Bill still hadn’t given him a straight answer.

“You get to see me every time I close my eyes in the mindscape. You didn’t have to build a physical body and trek across the multiverse and share the same physical vicinity with me to spend time with me, but you did and I’m trying to understand why.” Stanford questioned, a stern set to his mouth.

“Why do you think?” Bill retorted, and while Stanford had a great number of paranoid theories swirling around his head, he refused to allow Bill to derail or deflect this line of questioning back onto him. He wanted Bill to give him an honest answer, and it seemed like he was incapable of doing so without Stanford forcing his hand.

So, Stanford simply waited, with his mouth pressed together into a displeased line.
Groaning at Ford’s stubborn silence, Bill eventually broke. He dragged the words out of himself in staggered sentences, like telling the truth here was an ordeal.

“Fine. I wanted. To see. If by some athletic stretch of the imagination. That we. Might. Still …”

Bill almost winced as he finished his sentence, like he was expecting a reprimand for his truthful answer. “Work?”

“What do you mean?” Stanford replied blankly, as if he didn’t understand the question, while a maelstrom of thoughts whirled silently inside him, knowing exactly what Bill meant.

“I just wanted to … feel out.” Bill was speaking like he knew what he was saying was base idiocy, he was speaking like a school child delivering a poorly thought out conclusion in front of the class. “If we could fix things? Maybe:”

Stanford vaguely noted that this was the most uncomfortable he had seen Bill in all the time that he had known him and he was oddly delighted to spectate this rare occurrence.

“Or if there is anything that can be… saved. If I’ve already ruined everything.” Bill gave an awkward shrug, grimacing a smile at Ford that was unlike any smile he’d seen before, and Ford realised that this may be the closest Bill had ever come to admitting his own guilt in their relationship.

He was shocked.

“You think you’ve ruined everything?” Stanford reiterated, still processing what he’d just heard.

Reading Stanford’s question as an attempt to comfort Bill or disagree with his statement, Bill’s shoulders sagged with relief, and he clawed back some of his old bravado. “Well, not everything. It takes two to keep a dumpster fire of this magnitude burning for so long, and it’s not like you haven’t screwed me over heartily just as much as me. Hell, you might still be trying to screw me over, and as much as I want to, I can’t necessarily blame you for that. I’m just trying to figure out where we are, if this is an arrangement of convenience, if there’s something more in it for you. If you do have ulterior motives, or some secret plan brewing to disassemble my finer molecules, or if you –"

Rather than allow Bill to continue rambling, his guesses coming far too close to Ford’s true intentions for all the subterfuge he’d been engaging in since falling through the portal, Stanford grabbed Bill’s face again and silenced him with another hard kiss.

The kiss lasted several seconds, Ford trying to pour his every agitated impulse into the gesture so he wouldn’t give himself away, and when they finally broke apart, Bill’s reply was a tiny, satisfied.

“Ah.”

“And so you came here, in the body I made you, to try and make things right? Am I reading this correctly?” Stanford clarified, hardly having to work at all to make his tone warm and endeared, enough to be convincing. It was almost too easy.

“I have a track record of being really bad at this.” Bill admitted, his cheeks tinted dark, his tone sheepish and almost shy. “So, don’t expect too much, because it will probably all blow up in our faces, but I’m hoping the phrase ‘what have I got to lose’ won’t jinx me terribly this time.”

If Bill really was here just for Stanford, just to salvage their relationship, Ford didn’t know what to think, so for the time being he couldn’t afford to think it. He needed to put thinking on the backburner and react to Bill’s confession in a way that would preserve his lifespan and current freedoms.

Letting a little of his past sentimentality bleed through his carefully constructed walls, Stanford leaned forward, much like he would have done back at the shack, when all was well between them, and he cupped Bill’s face in his palm.

“And you don’t want to lose me? Is that what you’re saying?”

“Don’t ask me why. I couldn’t tell you if I knew.” Bill answered, a fond smile spreading across his features, the expression altogether too soft for Ford to associate with the triangular menace he was meant to be on guard against. “For the longest time nothing meant anything, but it means something with you.”

This expression was the kind of soft appreciation that he had once imagined Bill’s vessel would direct at him, the sort of look that he’d once dreamed about. Ford once wanted to hear that more than anything in the world.

“Perhaps you’re just special.”

Ford swallowed, Bill’s words wreaking havoc on his self-restraint.

Would it be so bad, he wondered, if he just let himself have this? Just for one night? If he just let himself pretend they really were so fond of each other and that Bill wasn’t a monster living in a vacuum away from the accumulating facts. Could he really suspend his disbelief long enough to exalt in the feeling of being loved, in the pretense that there was some small spark of their relationship, the true honest part of it that blossomed back in the shack, that could be reignited even now, despite them having moved far past that? Could he?

“If I call in a favour on the tab, will you kiss me again?” Bill asked, and the question was something Stanford once would have sighed over endlessly. Maybe it still was.

“Call it in.” Stanford answered, reminded of all the reasons why he liked Bill before. Why he loved him.

Bill wound his arms around Stanford’s neck and pulled him closer, pressing his lips against Ford’s, and Stanford could feel Bill’s exuberant smile in the kiss.

“Come here, you.”

When Ford saw Bill at the library, he hadn’t really expected that this would be the outcome of their meeting, but now that they were physically together, and kissing again like they used to, he found he didn’t mind nearly as much as he should have and the saying does go ‘in for a penny in for a pound’.

He gripped Bill’s face in his hands, deepening their kiss, before he started pushing Bill back, climbing on top of the un-protesting muse, kissing him to distract himself from reality.

It was working.

Bill hummed a pleasant moan, sinking his fingers through Ford’s hair like he’d missed it, allowing Ford to manhandle him around however he desired.

Stanford maintained that this wasn’t what he had in mind when he saw Bill in the library, pretended that this wasn’t what he’d been wanting and fantasising about for so long, even while he’d been on his crusade to gather information to use against Bill, but he was starting to wonder if this was exactly what Bill wanted when he fashioned his nostalgic vessel and planned out their little library date. One generally didn’t put such effort into their appearance if they didn’t have some sort of goal in mind and Bill was putting in an awful lot of effort today with the book stealing and the truth telling and the campfire dinner.

Whether he really intended to make an effort where it counted or not was irrelevant. Right now, this was enough, certainly enough for Ford to enjoy this moment, and, convinced of his justification, Ford started to leave biting kisses along Bill’s neck, working out his tension.

The instant Bill’s mouth was free he gurgled out a laugh. “If I call in another favour will you bite me harder?”

Ford reached his six fingered hand up to plaster it across Bill’s mouth purposefully. “I like you much better when you’re quiet, so if you don’t mind—”

Ford’s could feel the tip of Bill’s tongue trace wet lines along his palm. It was so childish, so utterly immature of him, but that immaturity for some reason temporarily absolved Bill of his heinous crimes against Stanford and nature at large, and made Stanford want to kiss him again. His mental resistance had all but crumbled at this point.

Ford took his wet hand away from Bill’s mouth but before Bill could say something irritating, Ford smeared his saliva covered palm against Bill’s face, coaxing a shocked noise from the God.

Stanford smirked at that. He could be immature too.

Bill stared at Ford with disbelief in his slitted eyes for several seconds, his mouth hanging open delightfully, and then he lunged forward, grasping Ford’s face and kissing him, kissing him endlessly.

The contrast between rugged solitude and having someone so familiar beside him, touching him, unnaturally warm as always, and so perfectly built to meet all of Stanford’s standards was addictive. It was a beautiful dream made real.

There was a logical line of reasoning as to why Stanford shouldn’t be doing this, but he didn’t feel like listening to it, instead choosing to tumble around on top of his sleeping bag, rolling dangerously close to the fire as he and Bill fought for the upper hand in a losing game.

Right now, it didn’t seem to matter that his clothes were tattered, or that he had dirt on his face from sleeping rough, or that he had six fingers, or was a human, or was an outsider, or any of those things. It didn’t even seem to matter that he had stubble on his face – Bill was still kissing him. He was still worthy of Bill’s special brand of love.

It didn’t matter that he’d wiped spit on Bill’s cheek, or singed the edge of his gold embroidered robe when he accidentally knocked embers on it, or that he was holding Bill a little too tightly, grabbing him a little too hard – Bill was still here, wanting him, wanting to try harder for him, and Stanford decided that he’d rather enjoy this closeness and intimacy for what it was then waste energy wondering what the hidden catch was.

For one evening, Stanford decided that it didn’t matter what Bill had done to his dimension, or what he’d done to Fiddleford’s mind, or that he’d probably cursed Willow, hurt Suzie, destroyed a planet, set his monsters after him and put a goddamn bounty on his head. All of that could wait.
Right now, what mattered was the warmth of the fire when he took his sweater off, stripping down in the cold night air only to be warmed so quickly. It mattered to Ford how Bill’s skin felt just as smooth as it had before, how it was just as dark, just as fetching when the light hit the gold lines up and down his arms. How he could squeeze Bill hard enough that he’d probably bruise, if his skin didn’t heal so quick, and how it drove Bill wild. How indulgent it felt to pull Bill’s robe over his head, and how pleasant it was that Bill let him, and how Ford laughed when the garment got caught on one of Bill’s earrings and covered his head for longer than it had to.

What mattered was that Bill let him kiss him once the robe was wrenched off completely, his hair wild and sticking up messily, a look that was just as fetching, if not more so, than the neat precision it had been styled with when Ford first saw him in the library. What mattered was the way Bill’s hands seemed hotter than the rest of him, and how they slid up Ford’s pectorals, gripped onto his biceps, and scrabbled down his back. It mattered to Ford that Bill still tangled his fingers in with his chest hair, how his back still arched when Ford razed his nails along Bill’s side, and how he seemed unable to stop talking. Both the frantic, incomprehensible words he used to speak when Ford overwhelmed him, and words meant just for Ford.

Words like ‘you’re mine’ and ‘I’ve missed this’ as well as words like ‘I can taste tomato in your teeth’ both before and after kisses, words like ‘you’ve changed’ and ‘this is the same’ and ‘I think I like this better’ and the point where words failed altogether.

Rather than overthinking all of these things, or finding fault with them, Stanford was committing each moment to memory.

This might be the last time they do this, all things considered, if the book they sought hammered the final nail in the coffin of Bill’s misdeeds.

Ford knew if he received written proof that Bill was everything everyone said he was, that he couldn’t continue to justify this, so he savoured this period of patient ignorance.

He could pretend, for one night, that none of that mattered, because of all of the other things that mattered.

What mattered the most was the way Bill pressed a reverent kiss to the black mark on Ford’s pectoral as they coiled together, winding down, and the way he asked Ford ‘are you happy now?’ and how Ford could answer with an honest ‘yes’ right now in this moment, he was happy.

And wasn’t that tragic?

There were several more happy moments throughout the course of the evening, drawn out and savoured. The closer it got to dawn, the more each of these moments felt like a goodbye, and the tighter Ford held Bill to spite it, trying to convey all the things he wouldn’t be able to allow himself when the truth had its day.

Eventually he closed his eyes long enough to sleep for a few precious hours, and he could tell from the expression on Bill’s face, watching Ford when he thought he was too sleepy to notice, that he also knew.

The truth was coming.

They couldn’t pretend to be in love forever.
Though it was still cold in the wasteland, when morning came and light filtered through the broken roof above them, Stanford felt warm and well rested. More so than he had in a long time.

Bill was still like a human radiator, his arms tucked around Ford’s tattered sleeping bag while he slept on Ford’s chest, more conjured pillows and a silk blanket covering Bill outside of the sleeping bag.

Ford had left the bag unzipped at the side so Bill could stick his leg in and twine it with Ford’s, and remarkably he didn’t get too hot as the wasteland’s temperature made Bill’s warm proximity much needed.

Ford didn’t know if Bill had slept per se, as he did not meet him in the dreamscape once he was out, but when he woke Bill’s chin was still nestled on Ford’s chest, his long lashes fanning out across his cheek as his eyes were closed.

Maybe he wasn’t sleeping. Maybe he was simply directing his attention elsewhere. Maybe he was in someone else’s mindscape. Stanford didn’t know.

He didn’t know a lot of things about Bill and foremost on his mind was Bill’s confession last night.

Bill wanted to save their relationship from all that had come between them, but Stanford had no idea if that was genuine or not. If Bill was telling the truth, or lying to him? Still trying to manipulate him? Stanford had no honest way of knowing.

He said Stanford brought meaning to a meaningless world. He reiterated that Stanford was special, although that declaration felt less like a truth and more like the bait on the hook from which Ford was constantly dangling, jerked around by Bill’s whims.

Was this the sort of thing he said to every scientist he wished to manipulate, like the boy in the library, or was this something different? How could Stanford ever know for sure?

There wasn’t a scientific method he could use to divine whether Bill was being genuine with his wish to patch things up between them or not. There was no empirical way he could find out if what was too good to be true either was or wasn’t.

He could only take a leap of faith. He could only trust Bill, or believe him, which wasn’t the easiest or most appealing thing for Ford to do.

Still, it would be nice, Stanford idly thought, looking at Bill’s beautiful features, seeing a glimpse of the future he imagined for them in each inhale and exhale that moved Bill’s chest. It would be nice to have things the way they used to be before. It would be nice if Bill took steps to redeem himself, if he could go back to being contained and manageable. Ford’s perfect muse.

Things were much simpler then before Ford knew what he was capable of. Before he knew of the genocides and crimes that were too overwhelming to forgive Bill for. Before he knew he would even have to consider forgiving him for things like that, things Ford didn’t want to think he was capable of doing despite his suspicions deep down.

He wanted to believe in Bill like he could believe in a romantic partner, but reality was making that very hard.
Before he could get too lost in his early morning musings, he heard a sound from behind the wall of the hovel. Someone was walking around outside, and Ford looked up sharply, his survival instincts honed for danger.

He would be better prepared for danger if he wasn’t naked underneath his sleeping bag.

Whoever was out there was moving closer, and as the stranger approached, Ford could see Bill’s eyes open, waking up.

Stanford was reaching for his nano briefcase, seeking his stun gun, but it was too late, and the time policeman had already rounded the corner.

“What the-“

Before he could say another word or raise any sort of alarm, Bill snapped his fingers and the soldier immediately liquidated, turning into policeman slush on the floor.

Stanford gawked at the time policeman, who was now a puddle, horrified. “What did you -?”

“You might want to put your pants on, genius. Time police travel in groups.” Bill sat up, redressing himself with a wave of his hand, vanishing the campfire and cushions in the same movement.

Stanford clambered to his feet, and tugged his trousers on, dressing quickly before gingerly regarding the puddle of policeman on the floor. The policeman watched Ford back, his liquified eyes blinking back up at Ford from behind his melted visor.

“Is he dead? Did you kill him?” Stanford fretted, unable to tear his eyes away from the man Bill melted with a snap of his fingers. “Bill, you can’t just kill people who-“

“They’re time police, not people.” Bill sneered, picking Stanford’s coat up off the ground and shoving it at him. “And he’s not dead. He’ll just wish he was. Get your bike out. We have to move.”

Stanford fumbled with his nano briefcase, trying to withdraw the hover bike but his eyes kept snapping back to the puddle of policeman on the floor, their beseeching eyes drifting further apart now, looking rather like two spilled egg yolks.

When he finally got his hover bike out from his nano briefcase, turning on the power, the rumble of the engine attracted the attention of the other time police scouring the area, another agent walking into the hovel with his blaster raised. He let out a surprised noise when he accidentally stepped in his melted co-worker, who let out a weak moan.

Bill tsked and raised his hand to dispatch the other soldier.

Not willing to see another person dissolved into soup, Ford reached out and grabbed Bill’s wrist.

“Don’t!”

The other soldier fired his blaster at Bill and the laser blast burst into flames before it hit Bill’s vessel.

Aggravated, Bill tried to shake Ford’s hand off him while the time soldier muttered urgent maydays into his communications device.

“Advocating for them won’t make you any less of a wanted criminal in their eyes, Sixer. They’ll
“Yes, but I don’t think murdering anyone or turning them into sentient liquid will improve things either.” Ford hissed, wrestling Bill’s hand away from the soldier, trying to drag him onto the bike. “Can’t you just let them go?”

“If I let one go, Sixer, they’ll be back with twenty more. Don’t you know how this works?”

“Don’t. Don’t hurt anyone.” Ford pleaded, vaguely aware that the policeman was pulling up a holographic image of his wanted poster, while a scan of Bill’s energy signature was slowly revealing an image of his triangular form. “As part of fixing things. For me. Please.”

“You ask for the worst, most inconvenient things, I swear.” Bill glared at Ford, still deflecting sporadic blasts from the soldier’s laser gun, blue flames meeting the blasts in mid-air.

“Just knock them out and we can leave. You don’t have to hurt anyone.”

“Fine!” Bill shouted and waved his hand free of Stanford’s grip before knocking the soldier’s head against the wall with a concentrated burst of energy.

The time police officer fell to the floor and Stanford climbed off his bike and rushed over to check his pulse.

He was still alive, thankfully. Ford looked over to the other policeman, who was still in liquid form on the ground.

“Can’t you fix him too?”

Bill rolled his eyes mockingly. “Don’t kill this. Fix that. You don’t ask for much, do you? You just like making things difficult!”

“It’s actually not that difficult to not kill people.” Stanford argued back through gritted teeth. “Somehow I manage to do it all the time.”

“Well, what do you want from me?” Bill put his hands on his hips argumentatively.

“Fix this!” Stanford stressed, gesturing to the melted time police officer on the ground.

Bill groaned a wordless complaint, but he pinched his fingers together, drawing the soldier’s mass up off from the ground until he re-solidified into his proper shape, patting himself down in panic, before Bill flicked his fingers forward and the officer’s head crashed back into the wall behind him, leaving him unconscious on the ground as well.

Stanford gave him a frustrated look that said ‘do you really have to?’ but the look was wasted on Bill, who tapped his foot impatiently.

“Come on, move, genius. We’ve got to go.”

Grumbling under his breath the entire way, Stanford got up and strode over to his hoverbike, climbing on, waiting for Bill to climb on behind him before he rode out of the abandoned town, brutally reminded of the truth about the creature clinging to his back now that he’d seen him show his true colours once more.
They rode almost non-stop after that. Bill didn’t suggest any more rest stops for Ford, which almost certainly cut down their time spent together physically, but Stanford wasn’t sure if he wanted to be exposed to any more of Bill’s confusing behaviour.

Trying to fix things with Stanford was all very well and good, but if Bill was still going to be the same destructive, dangerous creature to everyone else, then he clearly missed the point of redeeming himself for the better.

Stanford shouldn’t have let his guard down around Bill so much, and it took Bill nearly killing two time police officers to wake him up to that fact.

“What do they want you for?” Ford asked Bill over the rumble of the hover bike’s engine. “What did you do that makes you their most dangerous wanted time criminal anyway? Why?”

“I broke out of their fancy inescapable prison and believe rules I don’t like are made to be broken. They don’t need any more reason than that.” Bill answered snippily, his arms wrapped around Stanford’s middle.

“No, I mean before that. Why did they arrest you?” Ford glanced at Bill over his shoulder briefly. “You mentioned they can arrest you for losing Globnar. Is that what you did? Or did you do something else?”

“I didn’t lose Globnar.” Bill argued. “It’s not my fault they considered what I did to win as cheating. And it’s also not my fault that when they wouldn’t give me my time wish, I burnt down their coliseum. That’s on them.”

“And that’s when they arrested you? How were they even capable of doing that? From what I’ve seen –”

“Time Baby stepped in.” Bill sneered, the venom in his tone clearly directed at the eternal infant. “Made a show of how powerful he was, rather than just giving me what I asked for. He sent me straight to the Infinitentiary to rot there for eternity, too important to hear me out. Apparently, that was merciful.”

Stanford frowned.

“Of course, I was much younger when this all happened and inexperienced. I’d like to see him try to do the same to me now.” Bill boasted, his words sounding like a threat and a promise all at once.

“What did you wish for?” Ford asked and Bill was silent for a long while before answering. Ford almost didn’t think he would answer, but when he did his voice was more subdued.

“I wanted a temporal redo token. To fix something.”

“Could you fix whatever it is without redoing time?” Stanford probed optimistically. “Have you tried?”

“Of course I’ve tried.” Bill answered abruptly. “You have no idea.”

“Well, maybe I’d like to?”
The stubborn silence from behind him indicated to Stanford that this was something Bill would not be helping him understand, which showed just how much trusting each other still was not on the cards.

Changing the subject, Stanford looked back to the road ahead.

“What are the chances of you translating some of that book for me, hmm?”

If anything, this subject change seemed to make Bill pricklier, and he dug his fingers into Stanford’s stomach, hissing his reply in his ear.

“No.”

“Ow.” Ford swatted Bill’s hand in reprimand. “A summary then?”

“You want a summary, do you?” Bill let out a slightly hysterical laugh, a mean edge to his voice. “You want the spark notes version of the book I will not read to you?”

“If you could paraphrase it, yes.” Ford nodded, wondering why this seemed to be such a tall ask for Bill.

“How do you paraphrase propaganda?” Bill gave another bitter laugh. “Stick to the status quo and don’t ask questions? How would you summarise the pledge of allegiance without making it sound like creepy indoctrination? Try explaining that to another species, that every morning as part of your education you declare subservience to a flag from the tender age of five. Who would believe that?”

“This isn’t about American schooling practices. I just want to know what that book is about. Why you won’t read it to me?” Stanford scowled defensively, unimpressed with Bill’s avoidant topic changes.

“It’s just all circular lies, Sixer. That’s all it is.”

With no more information forthcoming, Stanford huffed a frustrated sigh and focused on the road ahead.

They were coming closer to the university now, keeping close to the walls of the ruins in the wasteland. There were more empty bottles littered about the wreckage now, lending credence to Bill’s theory that students snuck into the wasteland to drink, but Ford couldn’t see any students here now. It was dark, but the university was lit up, with roving search lights patrolling the perimeter.

“Left here.” Bill advised, and Ford followed his instructions, weaving the hoverbike through the ruins, avoiding the search lights, until they were close to the edge of the university’s walls, the forcefield dome standing between them and a worn crack in the bricks of the college, big enough for a student to crawl through.

They dismounted Ford’s hover bike, and the scientist packed it away in his nano briefcase, putting the small device back in his trench coat pocket.

“Do you know what’s in this other book?” He attempted, trying to get some concrete answers out of his evasive ex-muse.

“A slightly more accurate version of what’s in the book you’ve got.” Bill answered absently, calculating their way through the forcefield wall.
“Then why didn’t you just translate what’s in the book I have?” Stanford asked indignantly.

“It’s not worth it, Sixer. Trust me. Or don’t, I guess. Not that it makes a difference.” Bill muttered, beginning to carefully pull strings of energy out from the forcefield wall, weaving them into a different shape. It looked complex, and Stanford was curious how he was doing it, it seemed to involve a great deal of mathematical calculations and careful rewiring of the energy currents around the wall.

It was at moments like these he was reminded of how startlingly intelligent Bill was despite how flippant and childish he often chose to act. He had a formidable brain to go along with those powers of his and seeing evidence of it always piqued Ford’s interest.

Stanford watched silently, allowing Bill to concentrate and once he had finished weaving the energy from the forcefield into a small arch, spacious enough to allow them both to crawl through, Bill gestured to the arch with a theatrical bow.

“After you.”

Stanford got down on his hands and knees readying to crawl through the tunnel, but before he could move forward, Bill stepped in front of him, and tilted Ford’s head up with a finger under his chin.

“We’ve had fun, haven’t we Sixer?” He asked, looking down at Ford, who begun to blush awkwardly at their positioning.

“Is there a reason you’re standing there like that?” Stanford replied.

“I just like it when you look up to me.” Bill grinned cheekily, but stepped out of Ford’s way, giving him a playful whack on the rear. “Onward! Tally ho!”

Stanford pretended his face wasn’t still warm and grumbled under his breath in a token show of defiance as he crawled behind him, he could feel his hands tug on Ford’s trench coat when they occasionally landed on it. Ford was reminded of their first visit to the bunker and how different things had been then.

It seems Bill was thinking the same, for when they reached the end of the tunnel Ford felt Bill’s hands on his rear again, squeezing playfully.

“Just like old times, eh Sixer?”

Rather than dignify that with an answer, Ford crawled out of the end of the tunnel into what looked like an empty janitor’s closet, cleaning solutions and cosmic mops scattered about the cramped room.

This was, thankfully, less conspicuous than crawling out of a hole in the wall into the middle of the university. Bill crawled out of the tunnel behind him and straightened up while Stanford cracked the door open to peek out into the hallway.

It was late, but there were still students bustling along, night classes and social gatherings compelling them through the hallways. What Stanford noticed was that everyone seemed to be wearing the university’s robes in the school’s colours. No one was wearing casual clothing, not even the teachers. Bill and Stanford would stick out like the sorest of thumbs in the university given their attire.

Stanford closed the door and leant his back against it, sighing.
“It’s no good. We’ll be spotted as outsiders as soon as we step out this door. They’re all wearing that expensive university merchandise.”

“It’s called a uniform, Sixer.” Bill retorted, making Stanford feel a little foolish until the God muttered. “And it is expensive. Academic extortion.”

That was somewhat validating to hear. Stanford watched Bill look around the closet like he was expecting to find a spare varsity robe somewhere and he crossed his arms sceptically.

“Aha!” Bill exclaimed and reached for a packet of wet wipes on the shelf to the left of them, turning to face Stanford with a grin. “Do you want to see a magic trick?”

“Removes 99.9% of all harmful bacteria isn’t a magic trick.” Stanford squinted at the writing on the side of the packet.

Bill pulled a wet wipe out of the packet and flung it at Ford’s face impatiently. “You’re supposed to say yes. Some lovely assistant you are. Watch this.”

Bill pulled out a wet wipe for himself and held it in front of him theatrically, wiggling his fingers in front of the wipe like a magician.

So far, he just looked like an idiot with a wet wipe.

“Behold!” Bill shook the wet wipe once and it flapped out, the fabric stretching into the red and gold university robes that the students outside wore.

Stanford blinked at the robe, reluctantly impressed by Bill’s magic trick. It was the showmanship, Ford convinced himself, nothing else.

Handing over his own wet wipe expectantly, Ford watched Bill pretend to blow his nose in Stanford’s tissue before a red and gold cloak furled out of the wipe.

Gingerly accepting the robe back, Stanford pulled the sleeves of the garment over his trench coat, complaining.

“You didn’t have to sneeze in mine.”

“I’m allergic to lemony freshness.” Bill lied, shrugging on his own cloak.

Stanford opened the door again and looked over to Bill before stepping out. He shuffled out into the corridor and kept his head down, hands in his pockets with his hood over his head so as not to draw attention to himself.

He could hear cheerful whistling and looked over to see Bill strolling along with his hands in his pockets, head up, striding through the corridor without a care in the world.

So much for stealth. With a huff, he frowned at Bill disapprovingly.

“Do you know how to be subtle at all?”

“Subtle is overrated.” Bill countered, before tugging Ford over to a campus map pinned to the wall. “We need to get to the iota omicron upsilon dorms to find dear Barold. And it looks like we don’t have too far to go. Act less like a lurker and maybe we’ll get there without being arrested.”

“I don’t look like a lurker!” Stanford complained and Bill reached up to push Ford’s hood back from his face.
“Lurkers lurk. Act natural. Pretend you’re supposed to be here and no one will assume otherwise. Confidence is the best cover.”

Ford was reminded of Bill’s successful attempt at impersonating the government agent when they stole the uranium together and at Bill’s successful attempt at tricking Ford to fall in love with him and realised that confidence certainly could mask all sorts of lies.

“You’re teaching me to lie convincingly?”

“God knows you need it. Of course, you’d get uppity about it though. Forgive me for trying to help you not get arrested.” Bill scoffed, adjusting Ford’s cloak, ruffling Ford’s hair, then yanking him by the collar to follow him down the corridors.

Bill’s confident stride cut a swath through the crowd of students all the way through the university, but as they drew closer to the iota omicron upsilon dorms Stanford saw the crowds thinning noticeably, until there was hardly anyone there when they reached the doors of the dormitory. For such a bustling, packed university it didn’t sit right with Stanford for the place to be so deserted. Were these dorms unhygienic or unfavourable or something of the like? Why were they so empty?

ιου was emblazoned above the entrance, indicating they were in the right place, and Stanford’s trepidation rose as Bill pushed the doors open.

“What are we going to do when we find him?”

“We’ll get the book.” Bill responded, already walking through the empty dorm, peering at a list of student names and a map of the rooms pinned to the notice board.

“By asking nicely, or -?”

Bill rolled his eyes at Stanford’s suspicion, before affecting a patronising tone. “Maybe you could trade your book with his?”

“If the two books really do cover the same information with a slight difference, I’ll learn more by comparing the two.” Ford reasoned.

“Greedy, aren’t you?”

“I want both books.” Stanford insisted.

Bill huffed a frustrated sigh before he swung his hand out onto the banister traipsing loudly up the stairs, making no attempt to silence his approach, his voice echoing through the deserted dorm.

“Oh Barold! Are you there? We’re here for your book, come out with your hands up!”

Ford scrambled to catch up with Bill, shushing him uselessly, but Bill only stomped his feet louder on the stairs and skipped down the corridor to Barold’s room.

“Mr Blendin, you’re overdue. Come out, come out, wherever you are.”

Bill rapped on the door fearlessly, and as he reached for the door handle Stanford felt a moment of panic, wondering if Bill had noticed things weren’t quite right here, or if he just didn’t care.

When he flung open Barold’s bedroom door Stanford’s suspicions were confirmed.

Barold Blendin stood at the back of his room, holding his book to his chest, cowering behind a squadron of fully armed time police, their blasters pointing directly at Bill.
“FIRE!”

Stanford dove for cover as lasers blasted through the wall of Barold’s bedroom, plaster and wood splinters flying into the corridor.

Shielding his face with his arm, Stanford landed on his back, and scrambled away, the laser blasts still firing ceaselessly in their direction.

He looked over to Bill, the God clearly unharmed by the blast, but as every shot was fired Bill’s irritation seemed to climb, flames shielding him from the impact.

The time police seemed to show no signs of stopping, despite their deluge having no effect on Bill, and Barold’s wall was all but ruined now, hardly providing Ford any cover on the floor as more and more of the plaster and wood was burnt away by the lasers.

Over the cacophony of destruction Ford could hear Bill’s voice echo unnaturally.

“Such a warm welcome. Mind if I return the favour?”

“Bill, just get the book and leave,” Stanford urged him, but speaking drew attention to him, and one of the officers turned their weapon on Ford and fired a shot.

Stanford felt the familiar sensation of Bill’s magic solidify around his neck, and he spared a split second to be mortified when he realised that Bill had conjured the blue collar and chain leash they had once used in their racier shared dreams, but that swoop of mortification only lasted the brief second it took for Bill to yank him out of the way of the laser’s blast, sparing him from a grisly death.

On the offensive now, Bill flicked the blue chain in his hand, detaching it from the collar, and then whipped it forward, wrapping around the officer’s blaster.

Stanford felt the collar dissolve away from his neck as he watched Bill yank the blaster from the officer’s hands, before he cracked the whip back once more, the chain wrapping around the policeman’s neck.

“That’s not very nice.” Bill sneered through gritted teeth, reeling the officer forward, the chains tightening, bringing him to his knees. “We just want dear Barold’s book. And you call yourselves supporters of the arts?”

Fire began to flare along the chain, and the time police officer grasped at the chain around his neck and shook his head, pleading. Stanford could hear his ‘no’s’ echo loudly in his ears the closer the flames crept to the officer’s face, and Stanford couldn’t let Bill’s violent actions continue, or his conscience would regret it forever.

“Bill, stop!”

“Oh, so I should just let them shoot at you? Is that what you want? What do you want from me, Sixer?” Bill turned around and shouted at Ford, clearly irate that he would stifle his fun.

“I just want the book!” Ford shouted back, the situation escalating faster than he imagined.

“You just want the book, huh? You want this book?” A thin black arm shot out from Bill’s body, much like the shadow arms Ford had seen protrude from Bill’s back during their last night on earth, cutting past the time police squadron all the way to where Barold Blendin stood, quaking in his boots behind them.
Bill plucked the book out of Barold’s hands and held it aloft, making no move to release his chained captive, or to quell the flames that were pouring further out from him now, spreading fire across the wooden floorboards, turning splinters into kindling, the fire blue and ravenous.

“The book that I don’t want you to have? This book? Is this what you really want?”

“I want you to stop –” Ford yelled, climbing to his feet, holding his six fingered hands out in front of him.

“Stop?” Bill interrupted, a manic look in his eye.

“Stop – being such a nightmare! Stop being like this – you’re -” Stanford shook his head, then looked Bill right in the eye. “You really are a monster.”

Bill looked as if Ford’s words had just slapped him in the face. The staggered moment stretched on too long, Bill staring at Ford like he was the one who just attempted to murder someone, and Ford couldn’t take it anymore.

“I just want you to be good. Is that so impossible for you?” Ford loudly implored, his words hanging in the air.

“You want me to be good? Is that it?” Bill replied, his words laced with a sinister edge. “You want me to be a tame monster? You want me to be your perfect muse?”

“I want you to let that man go, give me the book, and do what I say!” Ford demanded with a confidence that was mostly fuelled by rage.

“NO, SIXER!” Bill’s voice echoed in a multitude of ways, the halls ringing with his demonic timbre.

The squadron of time police fell silent, shrinking back, cowed by Bill’s voice, but Ford stood tall.

“And that’s how you’ll fix things, is it? By saying no to me?”

“I don’t work for you, Stanford. You’re not the boss of me!” Bill shrieked, the fire around him leeching further outward.

“So, you’re going to endear yourself to me by going off the rails, murdering a police squad and destroying everything you touch?” Ford retorted angrily, his hands shaking with barely repressed fury. “Is that more in line with what you really are? Is that what you’re trying to prove?”

Bill stuttered a hysterical laugh, looking a little more unhinged now, a little more out of control.

“Oh, poor Sixer. It’s so hard to tolerate me going off the rails. It’s fine when you do it, but it only proves you right when I do it. It only proves your point, with your perfect moral high ground. It must be so hard to deal with anything that’s not good enough for you, not normal enough for you. See, because you’re good and I’m a nightmare and you can only love me when I’m well behaved, isn’t that righ-“

“Just stop already!” Stanford shouted, his hands balled into fists. “I DON’T ANYMORE.”

The room was silent but for the crackling of the flames and Stanford forced himself to level his voice, as if that would regain his composure, although his voice still cracked a little. “I don’t. Love you.”
“You –” Bill seemed genuinely thrown by this, the fire dimming slightly around him.

“Not anymore.” Stanford repeated, looking down at the ground, forcing himself to speak the unwise words he’d held in for so long. “I thought that maybe I could give you the benefit of the doubt until I found some corroborating sources confirming the rumours of all the terrible things that you did, but I’ve just been lying to myself this entire time.”

“That’s why you wanted the book?” Bill asked in a harsh whisper. “But what about – what about last night? You - didn’t that mean anything to you?”

Stanford swallowed his guilt, before he lied. “It was a means to an end. I needed information. I needed to know. I needed that book.”

Ford felt Bill’s magic permeate the air around him, and he flinched, convinced this would be where Bill would squeeze the life out of him, or imprison him, or worse, but instead Bill levitated the geometrically coded book out of Ford’s trench coat pocket and pulled it to him, holding onto both books now, the purpose for their entire trek across the wasteland.

“You wanted to fact check how bad I am? How monstrous I am to you?” Bill began to flick through the books, the pages turning in the air while Bill pretended to look through them. “Is there some secret page in here that will confirm how unlovable I am and pat you on the back for trying? Or for lying? Is that what you want?”

Stanford didn’t say anything, his words curdling bitterly in his throat, a sour twist to his mouth now.

“SO MUCH FOR AN OPEN MIND!” Bill shrieked, his voice rattling the building. “You’ve just been pretending to be interested all this time? For how long?”

“I can lie too!” Ford stubbornly insisted. “And I’ve been interested. You had me followed, you know what sort of questions I’ve been asking. About your weaknesses. About how to destroy you!”

“You’re doing a fine job of that, aren’t you?” Bill laughed darkly, gesturing to the fire draping the room behind him, gesturing to the police squadron, all cowering back from him, then holding his arms out invitingly. “Well if that’s what you want, by all means, go ahead! Destroy me! Take your best shot!”

“You think I wasn’t being serious?” Ford challenged.

“I don’t see you reaching for a weapon. I don’t see you doing anything other than lying to my face.”

“I’m not lying.” Ford gritted his teeth, the words coming out an indignant growl.

“Now! I mean I knew you were up to something but I thought you were just being romantic!” Bill admitted loudly, his tone almost joking. “Boy, was I wrong. All this time you literally were trying to destroy me? Not that it’ll work, but I’m really not sure what I did to deserve this.”

“YOU RUINED MY LIFE! YOU USED ME!” Stanford shouted, losing his cool. “You lied to me about my destiny, about my future. You manipulated me – you made me look like a fool! You took everything from me!”

“I gave you everything.” Bill countered cruelly.

“I had a life before you! I had things, things that I earned. And everything you ‘gave me’ I had the potential to do myself all along. You act like I owe you something but I owe you nothing.” Ford finally said, almost laughing, the words a revelation to him finally put out into the universe. “You deserve everything bad you’ve done to me back tenfold! I hate you and I want nothing to do with you, and every time I try and convince myself otherwise, you go and do some other horrible thing that only proves that I was right in the first place. You’re a – a curse, an absolute nightmare!”

“Oh, a nightmare am I? You’re so slow on the uptake, Sixer. All that time spent investigating me and you didn’t know? I’m the King of Nightmares!” Bill held his hands out, the fire creeping higher up the wall to emphasise his statement, and while Bill looked like he held all the power here, there was still a familiar glint of desperation in his eyes, shining wetly. “I’m not just a monster, I’m the monster! If you’re so smart, why didn’t you figure that out, huh? What, you need a book to confirm that for you too?” Bill gave one of his hysterical, too high laughs, and tossed both of the books towards Ford. “Here!”

As they arced through the air, the pages began to burn, incinerating rapidly, and by the time they landed at Stanford’s feet the books were nothing but ashes and embers.

Stanford gave a wordless enraged shout, watching the books he’d worked so hard to get be utterly desecrated in front of him. It was almost crueller than what Bill had done to the time police. It was the last straw.

“And I was planning to do that all along, from the very beginning.” Bill was breathing heavily, the words tumbling out, unable to stop burning bridges now that he’d started. It was like he wanted Stanford to hate him, continuing to give him yet more reasons to do just that. The God still had that crazed almost hysterical look in his eye, like he was teetering over the edge of madness.

“Now that your precious books are gone, do you need more proof? How about I start by killing trigger finger first, then the rest of the time goons, and then I’ll rip apart sweet little Barold, molecule by molecule, as a footnote to the destruction of it all, and you can empirically observe like the scientist you are. Then maybe you’ll have fully reached your foregone conclusion.”

Ford growled, the last of his reserve utterly defenestrated, and he unleashed the words he’d been holding back on since Lottocron 9.

“You know what, I believe that you’ll kill them, just like I believe that you murdered your entire dimension. And you know what the truly awful thing is? I believe you did it for the same reason you do every horrible thing you’ve ever done. You did it because you could!”

The flames around Bill burned intensely bright, and for an instant Bill was surrounded by a pillar of blue flame akin to the one that had burned at the campfire back in gravity falls. A pure swath of unbridled power, blazing upwards, through the roof, to the very ceiling of the dome and beyond, and within that pillar of flame Bill stood, his hands clenched by his side, screaming out his tantrum of epic proportions. Stanford was certain this would be the moment Bill killed him, incinerated him in the blaze, but he didn’t. He just stood there, the fire burning away his robes, away his skin, away his bones until he was nothing but a shrieking ball of fire surrounding a slitted, livid red eye, and just when Stanford thought he would be struck down at last, the fire exhumed itself and teleported Bill away.

Ford stared at the burnt charred ground where Bill had stood, still shaking with the brunt of twenty something years of unleashed anger, both disappointed and shocked that Bill hadn’t killed him.

He expected he’d die when he said all of those things. He expected Bill would end him, burn him into nothingness for his defiance, and after so many years of useless wandering, trying to defeat a being who seemed impervious to damage, Stanford felt the pointlessness of it all weigh on him heavily. He almost wanted Bill to kill him, so he wouldn’t have to suffer through yet more of it all, or to live with the guilt of all he had said.

But he was still alive.

To the side of him, one of the time police staggered to the floor, his legs growing slack now that the danger was over, a standard response to shock.

Stanford looked over to the squadron and Barold slumped back against the wall, and briefly took in the awed and stunned expressions they wore, wondering why the hell they were directing those looks at him. Rather than waste time staring back Stanford quickly stuffed the ashen remains of the burnt books into the pockets of Shailesh’s coat. Once he had collected it all he then turned and sprinted down the stairs.

He couldn’t stay here. He couldn’t trust the time police to not arrest him, even if his hotheadedness may have spared their lives. As soon as they found their feet again, they’d have Stanford sent to a cold cell.

He couldn’t trust anyone, not that he had anyone, really.

And now that he’d severed his ties for good, he couldn’t even trust Bill.

Not that he should have before.

He pushed his way through the university, crawling out through the tunnel and into the wasteland, discarding his lemon scented university robes in a pile of discarded bottles and syringes. Throwing back a sleep blocker tablet and straddling his hover bike, he sped across the wasteland towards the Bibliosphere once more.

When he got there, he stormed back into the library and deposited the ashes of the two books Bill had burned onto the table he had sat at before, staunchly ignoring the paper aeroplanes that Bill had made that were still on the tabletop.

There was something else there too. A book titled The Vertices of Exwhylia, on top of which sat a note addressed to him.

Human. The note read.

You will find your answers there.

Stanford looked for a hint as to who the note was from, but the only clue he had was the signature written in curling cursive.

From your future ally.

Chapter End Notes

Well I hope everyone enjoyed this chapter. Who knew libraries could be so exciting? Haha (the answer is everyone, we all love libraries here, look at you nerds, you’re reading right now!) The caesar cipher in this chapter can be translated at
I'd like to dedicate this chapter to some familiar faces, to my lovely beta reader, to quantumseahorse on tumblr (Mizuuma on ao3) mostly bc I am very proud of their work on their fic and I'm looking forward to reading it when I finally finish this one and I appreciate the updates from them about their progress and passion, and to thelema-rhoias who has continually been piecing together a thesis of thought about this fic as well as making gorgeous art and supplying me with cool music for the pairing back and forth.

I hope folks have enjoyed the read and the ride so far and I look forward to any comments that you leave. Things are approaching the final stages now, and next chapter we have some very aggressive shapes, dubious medical consent, and too much Cosmic Sand for one human to feasibly contain, but not too much for one tall purple lady.
Sorry Cassandra I misunderstood. Now the last day is dawning. Some of us wanted but none of us would listen to words of warning.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Shuttle buses were becoming a cramped regularity in Stanford’s life. Interdimensional travel wasn’t always as cut and dry as you’d think. Convenient wormholes were often rather out of the way, and portable wormholes were expensive and hard to come by.

Stanford’s infinity sided die was too much of a liability to provide a consistent method of travel, and so Stanford sat, squashed like a sardine into a small seat at the back of a dingy interdimensional shuttle bus, trying not to sit too close to the sentient grub that slumbered on the seat beside him, oozing some kind of acid from its mouth.

The bus smelled like mould and vomit, and there wasn’t enough space for Ford to sit comfortably with his legs spread, but these were the creature comforts Ford had to sacrifice on his search for the truth.

That Stanford was still alive after his disastrous encounter with Bill on the Bibliosphere was, in the honest part of Ford’s mind, still somewhat of a disappointment. He didn’t even know why he was bothering to continue to search for the truth about Bill now, when it hardly even mattered.

Why should Ford bother to look for the truth about Bill, when there was no chance in hell that it would redeem his actions? What would discovering the truth of what went down in Bill’s home dimension do for Ford other than confuse him further, or cement his disappointment eternally?

Would it benefit Ford at all to know that Bill really was as bad as he seemed?

Or would it thoroughly defenestrate everything he’d assumed up til now if Bill’s story defied his expectations?

Could he afford to allow himself this sliver of a chance to still pity Bill, to still feel for him, or was he better off barricading himself away from such vulnerabilities?

Bill had proven time and time again that whatever redeeming qualities he may occasionally present to Ford, he still wasn’t willing to change his actions or behaviour against others for Ford. He was still a bad person, an evil triangle. He was still callous, violent, dangerous and potentially deadly on both an individual and universal scale.

Barring the fact that Stanford knew Bill had the potential to be dangerous before he summoned him, that he knew the extent to which Bill was a universal hazard now only cemented his belief that he shouldn’t pity Bill.

He shouldn’t care for Bill at all.

He didn’t know why that was such a hard pill to swallow, really.

He shouldn’t care for a homicidal monster.

It was an utterly foolish, illogical, immoral, stupid thing to do.

Looking over the notes he copied from the textbook left on his desk in the Bibliosphere he felt his poorly repressed guilt and pity bubble up within him again, the feeling for Bill stirring inside him despite his best attempts to quash it down.

Beside a picture of each shape came the description the textbook had specified.

An upper-class circle.

A lowly triangle.

Ford had trouble tearing his eyes from the page, the subtle snippets Bill had let slip reinforcing Stanford’s guilt induced hypothetical that there was a high chance Bill had been treated terribly back in his home dimension.

Not that it was an excuse for Bill’s actions. The relative hypothetical traumas of his past didn’t make it passable that he was such a nightmare now, but to Stanford’s growing dismay he realised that it would make Bill somewhat more understandable to know this about his past, and he shouldn’t want to understand Bill any more.

Yet he was coming to understand Bill’s words belatedly, the longer he was left alone with his thoughts on this excruciatingly long bus ride.

“What hierarchy does make sense, when you’re on the bottom of it?”

“It’s just all circular lies Sixer. That’s all it is.”

Stanford didn’t think that understanding Bill’s situation would help him maintain his conviction against the triangle, but he was uniquely positioned to possibly be the only person in the multiverse who could understand him, and doesn’t that convey a sort of responsibility inherent to see this through?

Stanford was spinning yet another justification, as if he needed any more. His stellar twisting of his various justifications is what led him into this mess and part of him wondered if his guilt would be easier to manage if he could just admit that he’d made mistakes and done the wrong thing.

Perhaps that would be a more effective way of getting rid of this churning indecision in his gut, rather than twisting his thoughts around in self-effacing circles of inadequate logic to potentially justify the perspective he clung to that comparative to Bill, he’d done nothing wrong.

But then again, admitting that he’d been wrong seemed unlikely to help Ford at this current point in time. That would mean admitting that lying to Bill, tricking him, being intimate with him, using him for information, and indulging Bill’s feelings for his own gain were missteps on Stanford’s part, and the trouble with missteps is that once they’re made, you can’t exactly go back and do them over.

Which led Stanford to another problem churning away in his mind.

Bill wanted so desperately to do something over, and he wouldn’t say what it was. If Stanford were to admit he were wrong, that would mean admitting that he was wrong to say such callous things to Bill, he was wrong to accuse that Bill destroyed his own dimension just because he could, just because he was a creature of wanton destruction.

If Bill’s attempts to secure a time wish, and his repeated efforts to undo an event in his past with or without a time wish were to be believed, there was a very high chance that Bill hadn’t meant to destroy his home dimension at all, and that he was desperately trying to undo it.
Which made Stanford’s stalwart convictions about Bill’s behaviour and character come into question. Which brought about the possibility that Stanford may have to admit that he had, in this instance, been wrong.

Maybe that was why he was trekking out to the dimensional wormhole that would take him to Exwhylia, spending hours on a cramped, smelly, overcrowded bus, despite spinning countless justifications as to why he shouldn’t be here.

He owed himself the truth, to find out if he was wrong about Bill’s past.

And maybe, just maybe, he owed it to Bill.

The bus pulled up at Stanford’s stop, and Stanford wedged his way through the passengers to the front of the bus to exit through the bus doors.

“Thank you.” Stanford politely said to the congealed mass of jelly with sunglasses and a handlebar moustache that was driving the bus, and the bus driver simply nodded, waving him out of his vehicle.

Stepping out into the vast expanse of space, Stanford held onto the bus stop pole and reoriented himself as the bus drove away.

There was empty space to the left of him, and empty space to the right, but just a few paces back from the bus stop a small wormhole winked and shifted into different shapes, its colours spiralling within.

Mustering his courage Stanford approached the wormhole, and waited until its shape shifted into a circle, then a square, then a triangle, and when it shifted back into a circle Stanford dived into it head first.

He felt the familiar tug about his navel as he was yanked between dimensions, and he closed his eyes until the skin pulling rush of it all died down.

When he felt less discombobulated and in one piece, he paused, feeling a tickle of something just under his nose. Indeed, it felt like he had an elastic band snapped around his head, pressure pushing into the side of his ears, under his nose, digging into his cheeks.

Opening his eyes Stanford saw a very flat world.

With no sky or sun above to bathe the inhabitants in directional light, Stanford had no way of telling the shapes that milled about him apart. They all looked the same from Stanford’s perspective, blocks of flat density, although from above Stanford would have been able to distinguish if the creatures idling to the left of him were spherical or triangular.

In this two-dimensional world, Stanford’s three-dimensional eyes were worthless, unable to distinguish the difference between one shape and the other, but the textbook Stanford read in the Bibliosphere assured him that those differences were of the utmost importance.

Stanford opened his mouth to ask his customary question.

“Can anyone please tell me about Bill Cipher?”

However, as his mouth was currently below the Exwhylian’s plane, not intersecting with their flat board of existence, no one could hear him.
That did not mean that they didn’t notice him though.

Stanford imagined that he must appear as some sort of God, spontaneously intersecting their reality, appearing in the middle of their town square, but Stanford soon came to realise that was not so much the case.

His dimensional translator helpfully supplied the fact that the Exwhylians were shouting ‘irregular’ at him along with the very comforting addendum to that condescending epithet - ‘eradicate the irregular’.

That wasn’t good.

When the Exwhylians made their first attack, it came in the form of a stinging slice to Ford’s earlobe as one of the shapes flung their razor-sharp body at him.

His ear was bleeding, depositing droplets of blood into the town square below, the irregular shapes of the droplets furthering Stanford’s grave offence.

More shapes hurled themselves at Stanford’s face, slicing into his skin agonisingly. Hundreds of them bombarded him, and Stanford’s face was soon littered with cuts. The shapes seemed to be more organised behind Ford’s head, or they simply gathered there in greater numbers, and Ford began to feel hopelessly dizzy as they tore their way into the skin at the back of his head, slicing his flesh to ribbons in their onslaught. They’d slice all the way through to the bone if they kept this up.

He was bleeding profusely now, as head wounds are wont to do, and he could see the shadowed lines of the Exwhylians hurling themselves at Ford’s glasses, chipping away at the lens in a concerted effort to bury their razor-sharp forms into Ford’s eyes.

He didn’t know what to do, or how to escape this. While he was disappointed that he didn’t die back on the Bibliosphere, he didn’t want to die like this.

Stanford screwed his eyes shut, growing dizzier by the second as the blood loss continued, wondering if Bill would come to his rescue if he called him in the mindscape now, or if he’d expended his quota of rescues after his cruel conduct on the Bibliosphere.

He didn’t want to die here.

He desperately, desperately needed help.

Just as he was about to jettison himself into the mindscape, beseeching Bill’s salvation once more (who else could he turn to?) he felt a blue aura encircle him and grasp his form tight.

The constriction under his nose and around his head dissipated, and he recognised the sensation of his body warping through space time, too lethargic and unwell to do much more than wilt listlessly in this cosmic aura’s grasp.

When the aura faded, he found himself standing on his feet on solid ground, and he blearily opened one eye to squint at a brightly coloured room, bubbles floating in the air, incense burning and blurry people crowding around the walls of some sort of vaunted cathedral, watching his arrival.

Blood was cascading down Stanford’s neck now, a gruesome ring of carnage cut into the middle of his face, like a perverted thorn of crowns worn just below the nose. Stanford wavered, finding keeping his eye open a little too taxing to continue to do.
Swaying on his feet, Stanford’s eye fell shut, and he toppled forward, falling into a dead faint.

If someone caught him before he hit the floor, he didn’t remember.

Oestia volunteered to carry her mistress’s human prize to the mountaintop tower, hoping her display of strength would endear her to her mistress’s good graces.

In reality she was finding it incredibly difficult to keep up, her mistress scaling the ceaseless steps to the top of the tower with ease, her larger stature meaning she could take them three at a time, while Oestia struggled, balancing the unconscious human on her back as she pressed onward on her shorter legs.

What she lacked in height she made up for in determination, but she was unable to completely smother her desire to complain.

“It’s leaking on me.”

“The human is bleeding, not leaking.” Jheselbraum corrected Oestia.

“What’s the difference?” Oestia questioned.

“Blood stains are harder to get out of your ceremonial robes.” Jheselbraum responded dryly, the comment almost humorous by her standards.

The mistress must be in a jubilant mood, Oestia reasoned. Capturing Cipher’s human must be a great boon for their cause.

“I’ll give them to one of the acolytes to purge.” Oestia grinned, always keen to abuse the power of her station. “One of the bored looking ones.”

“Assign them a holy mission.” Jheselbraum suggested with a whimsical air about her.

“Against blood stains. I like the way you think O’ Divine Wisdom.”

Jheselbraum smiled but said nothing, quietly pleased.

They reached the top of the tower, and Jheselbraum opened the door to the atmospheric sanctum, holding it ajar for Oestia.

She appreciated her mistress’s help. Her gills were flaring, and she was breathing heavily through both of her lungs, her body working overtime to suck up enough oxygen to sustain her ascent.

The atmospheric sanctum was one of the places prospective acolytes attended during their gruelling induction to The Oracle’s army. The thin air and difficult breathing conditions were purposefully intended to strain the body and alter the mind to engage a supplicant’s most earnest vulnerabilities when vowing their service to The Oracle. Oestia remembered her own induction, how she was the last of her peers to pass out during their meditation, and how their Mistress awarded her praise as a testament to her strength.

She wasn’t sure why Jheselbraum was bringing Cipher’s human to the sanctum though. Consciousness didn’t seem to be one of his current strengths, and she couldn’t imagine he would be... a worthy candidate for induction, considering his tainted loyalties. Then again, The Oracle hadn’t been too picky with the recruits as of late, possibly attempting to recoup their numbers after Cipher slaughtered their last battalion of Taronjan troops.

Carrying the human inside the sanctum, Oestia watched Jheselbraum gesture to the chaise recliner to the side of the room and obediently Oestia laid the human out on the lounge.

Jheselbraum was reaching into the high cupboards at the top of the atmospheric sanctum, retrieving the ceremonial incense burners and passing them to Oestia.

“Light these, all of them, and place them around the bed.” The Oracle ordered, and Oestia complied with only the slightest hesitation.

“All of them, Mistress?”

The incense in the ceremonial burners was strong, incredibly strong. Only one stick of incense was needed during induction ceremonies to sufficiently engender an altered state in the supplicants. Six seemed like overkill. Especially placed in such close proximity to the human, considering humans only had one pair of lungs to power through with.

Jheselbraum nodded. “To purify the devil’s taint.”

That made sense, and Oestia complied, lighting the incense dutifully. She leaned away from them once they were lit though, not wanting to inhale too much of the noxious smell.

To her surprise, her Mistress knelt down beside the chaise and brushed the hair back from the human’s forehead, examining his wounds. She reached into her sleeve for a cloth, wet it with the liquid from one of the bubbles hovering about the sanctum and began to sponge the blood from the human’s face.

Oestia was stunned that her Mistress would show such preferential treatment to this damaged interloper, that she would lower herself to tending his wounds at all. This was below her station, and Oestia stumbled forward, braving the incense cloud once more to offer assistance.

“I can do that Mistress, you shouldn’t have to. I can –“

“No.” Jheselbraum answered curtly. “This is my task. You wait outside Oestia.”

Oestia almost opened her mouth to argue, but thought better of it, and left the room with a deep bow, her head already dizzy from the incense.

When Stanford finally clawed his way back to consciousness it was with great difficulty and in increments.

He slowly came back to the sensation of a cool wet cloth pressing against his face, dabbing at his bleeding wounds. He felt drained and weak still, his throat dry and his head unbelievably dizzy despite him laying down. He must have lost a lot of blood, to feel this run down. It was worse than any blood loss he suffered bleeding out spell circles when unbinding bricks for Bill.
It took some time to piece together the press of the cloth to his face with the fact that this must mean that someone was tending to his injuries, and even longer still to recognise that he should probably open his eyes and see who it was who rescued him from the Exwhylians.

Groggily, he wondered if it was Bill rescuing him after all, before he blinked blearily up at his saviour.

Seven eyes looked back down at him with a placid indulgence.

“You’re awake.” She murmured, and her voice was extraordinarily resonant, like it was vibrating through every molecule of Ford’s body, or at least that’s how he felt.

Honestly, he felt a bit like he was on some kind of mild acid trip, and he didn’t think blood loss was generally this intoxicating, otherwise everyone would be bleeding out on a weekend.

Rather than respond coherently to her, Stanford just blinked at her blearily.

“Young journey has been long and arduous, fraught with peril.” The seven eyed lady continued, her words reverberating oddly around Stanford’s skull. “I’ve been treating your wounds for a long while. Exwhylians aren’t known for their mercy. It is a miracle we got you out of there alive at all.”

“Hhrmgh?” Stanford intelligently replied. Dimly he recognised that this must be his rescuer, and he had just enough presence of mind to feel guilty for the part of him that was disappointed his rescuer wasn’t Bill.

“Young search for the truth is admirable, even if it put you in harm’s way. It was not your time to die. You still have a great destiny to fulfil.”

“OhIsee.” Stanford slurred, his words jumbling together as he attempted to sound like he knew what was going on. Honestly, he was still wondering why his head injuries felt so much like a cosmic sand hangover. He hadn’t had one of those since, well, since a long time. He couldn’t quite put his finger on how many years it had been but right now he wasn’t exactly up to the mental mathematics.

“You seek the truth about him, and recompense for all that you’ve lost. You’ve been through much.”

She continued to daub at his wounds, and the press of the cloth stung a little, drawing Stanford out of the spiralling whirlpool in his head. She seemed to be speaking like she knew what Stanford had been doing as of late, and he would have been paranoid if not for the fuzziness encroaching on his senses, dulling his instinctual responses.

“He has wronged you in countless ways that very few are equipped to fully understand. He’s robbed you of many things, your destiny, the recognition you were owed for your brilliance, and your future success and he will continue to take from you, and from the wider world if we do not stop him.” Her seven eyes softened maternally on Ford, a stalwart sympathy displayed somewhat blurrily within her diversified gaze. “I know this. I have seen it happen. What will happen if he is not stopped. You can stand against him. And I can give you the tools you need to succeed, Stanford Pines.”

Managing his first coherent sentence, Stanford tilted his head. “I’m sorry, but who are you?”

“I’m The Oracle.” The tall purple lady with the psychedelic voice replied. “I know of your quest. You seek answers about your fate, about why this has all happened to you, about Cipher.”
“Bill?” Ford mumbled, struggling to sit up. His limbs felt inordinately heavy, and the pressure of The Oracle’s hand holding the cloth to his forehead felt restrictive. Such a small gesture shouldn’t be enough to hold him down, but he couldn’t get up. Perhaps he was too weak to, from the blood loss.

“You are vulnerable to him while your mind is unprotected.” The Oracle told him, her voice sliding in one ear and out the other sinuously. Her words felt like a slinky falling down the stairs and Stanford blinked heavily, trying to process what it meant. “There is a method, however, to guard your thoughts against his influence, but it will involve very difficult surgery. We will need to install a metal plate in your head to block his interference.”

“Like tinfoil?” Ford questioned, his brain helpfully offering that he’d tried that before and he got sandwich crumbs in his hair because of it. He wasn’t sure if it had been completely successful at keeping Bill out, he hadn’t run the requisite tests and eventually gave up on the tinfoil method when woodpeckers and sparrows tried to eat the crumbs in his hair, but he had been outrageously sleep deprived at the time, and perhaps the variable was the aluminium? Maybe some other metal would be more effective, and at thicker density?

The Oracle was still talking while Stanford was mentally calculating how many rows of tinfoil folded on top of itself it would take to make a sufficient mental defence against Bill’s power, and so he barely heard the rest of her sentence.

“The Exwhylians have made the basic incisions already. This is a hazardous procedure with a high mortality rate in previous subjects, hence why it is still in the experimental stages, but I believe we can implant the metal guard with the technology we have and regardless of the results we will ensure he no longer has access to your mind –”

“I’ll do it!” Stanford interjected, having decided that more tinfoil would mean better protection and less sandwich crumbs which could only be a good thing. His logic was flawless.

Ford’s listening comprehension wasn’t exactly at top form today, but all things considered he felt he was making a pretty reasonable decision to rid his mind of Bill’s influence to preserve his independent thought.

After all, he couldn’t be unbiased in seeking the truth when he was still plagued by thoughts of Bill’s more appealing assets, wracked with notions of Bill’s supposed sincerity and potentially legitimate feelings that Stanford had unceremoniously trampled over, and at least with a safeguard installed in his head, he could figure out if these affectations were influenced by Bill, or merely self-inflicted.

The Oracle seemed surprised by Stanford’s enthusiastic assent, and if he were more observant he would have noticed the dry way she murmured “Well that was easy” under her breath.

“So how much tinfoil are we using?” Stanford questioned, struggling to keep his eyes open. The room seemed to be swimming, but Stanford wasn’t wearing swimmers. He didn’t know if he was up for swimming either, considering he felt like he was sinking through the floor, The Oracle’s seven eyes seeming farther and farther away with every passing moment.

The last thing Stanford heard The Oracle say before he checked out of consciousness once more was said in an amused tone, which mattered more to Stanford in this current moment than what was actually being said.

“Ah, another genius.”
Oestia stood guard as Jheselbraum brought the human down from the tower, carrying him to the medic bay. She looked very majestic, holding his unconscious form in her arms, laying him gently onto a gurney. Her benevolent maternal air pervaded up til the point she gave her orders.

“Prep him for surgery. The barricade.”

The medics in the room gasped, and even Oestia’s mouth fell open at the order. The barricade was still in the experimental stages, and so far the experiment had not been successful, as evinced by the lack of surviving test subjects.

“The – the metal plate, Mistress?” One of the medics sought to clarify nervously.

“He gave consent.” She retrieved her remote from the sleeve of her robe, playing back Stanford’s enthusiastic ‘I’ll do it!’ and swiftly put it away, looking expectantly at the hesitant medics milling around the room.

 Appropriately chastised, the medics jumped to it, scrambling around the room to prepare the human for surgery, fumbling with an IV and manning the operating room.

Satisfied her will was being carried out, Jheselbraum turned and left the medic bay, Oestia trailing behind her as she strode through the high-ceilinged hallways of the temple.

“The barricade – it isn’t exactly the safest procedure, is it?” Oestia questioned timidly, well aware of the mortality rate for the procedure among past test subjects.

“If he dies he dies in the service of something greater. Either way, if we do this, he can’t have him.” She replied, a vicious delight ringing subtly in her tone.

At this, Oestia nodded, reassured of her Mistress’s decision.

This wasn’t about one human’s life. This was about the battle. About the war.

And none had a clearer view of what needed to be done than her Divine Mistress.

And if anyone could beat the Devil himself, it was her, in all her majesty.

Stanford came to slowly, vaguely observing that, for someone who doesn’t sleep much, he’d being doing an awful lot of waking up these days. He couldn’t remember if he fell asleep or fainted, but he woke in a bed, which was a luxury in and of itself. He couldn’t remember the last time he slept in a bed, or voluntarily slept at all.
Actually, now that he was becoming more lucid, he could remember the last time he slept, but it wasn’t on a bed, and those campfire memories were a little too painful to recall still, so Stanford tried to focus on something else.

The softness of the sheets covering him, the sunlight that was hinted at beyond his eyelids, and the gentle sound of wind chimes and hymnal chanting drifting into his room from afar. He had new clothes on, clean clothes, perhaps pyjamas and they smelled very faintly of lavender and frankincense.

Eventually Stanford mustered the effort to open his eyes, and was greeted by a very colourful room, with high arched ceilings, stained glass windows thrown open to let in the breeze and walls adorned with colourful tapestries and floating bubbles. This place was lavish, in a way that none of Ford’s other destinations had been, at least none that would accommodate him.

For a rather childish moment, Stanford wondered if he’d died on Exwhyliia, and this was heaven or some other fictitious imagining of an unscientific mind.

But no, heaven would not involve the subtle beeping of machines monitoring his health, nor would it include an IV, dripping painkillers into his arm.

Stanford wondered if this was some kind of hospital, and slowly he reached up to feel his face, wondering if he had been patched up from the Exwhylians assault.

The cuts on his face were healed completely, his skin unblemished by the many incisions the shapes had made, which meant either the medical technology available here was quite advanced, or Stanford had been out for a long time.

Reaching higher, he aimed to run a hand through his hair absently but felt only short bristles and bandages criss-crossing over his skull.

What happened to his hair?

Stanford was jarred out of his introspection by a noise in the corner of the room. A small alien woman with frilled amphibian gills was staring at him, her round salamander face surprised. She held a clipboard, no doubt one of the nurses here, and she nearly dropped it when she noticed Stanford moving.

She said something to him, but Stanford couldn’t understand what she was saying, his interdimensional translator sitting across the room on top of a pile of his clothes. He could only stare in confusion at her as she held her hands out, perhaps entreating him to stay where he was, and then running out of the room, no doubt to fetch her colleague.

Well. She might have told him to stay where he was, but technically she didn’t tell him to stay put in any language he could currently understand, so he didn’t technically have to listen to her.

He didn’t know how long he’d been asleep for, but if he slept, there was a chance Bill visited him in the mindscape or pinpointed his location somehow and he couldn’t afford to stay in one place if that was the case.

Stanford moved to slide his legs out from under the covers and rested his feet on the cold stone floor. Testing his balance, he stood up, and gave himself a moment to acclimate to the head rush, before grabbing the IV pole and rolling it along beside him as he crossed the room, already reaching for his belongings.

Fastening his dimensional translator onto his wrist once more, Stanford could hear the sound of people running outside in the corridor. They were probably coming to fetch him, to usher him back to bed, to make him stay put, but Stanford wasn’t about to give them the chance to.

With his dimensional translator functional again, Stanford turned to read the label on the IV drip, following the safety instructions to successfully remove the needle from his arm with minimal bleeding. He toed his shoes on, stuffed his clothing into his coat pockets and slung his coat on, making for the open window.

Several more of the amphibian nurses hurtled into the room, as well as another gilled individual wearing military garb who arrived just in time to see Stanford climb out onto the window ledge.

“Wait! Stop him!”

Stanford pulled the retractable grappling hook from his coat pocket and jumped over the edge, shooting the grappling hook upwards so it could latch onto one of the many balconies that dotted the side of this mountainside tower.

He passed by acolytes, civilians and soldiers on his way down, abseiling from the tower down to the forest floor below, and yet more colourful rooms filled with bubbles, tapestries and what seemed to be religious choirs were shown through every open balconette Ford descended by.

When his feet hit the ground he began running, throwing himself into the forest, twigs and leaves crunching underfoot as he ran through the purple mossy trees trying to put as much space between him and the place where he’d been asleep for so long.

He barely noticed where he was going, periodically looking behind him, and when he stumbled out into a burnt clearing, he staggered backwards, seeing several tufts of blue flame, Bill’s flame, burning the treetops.

He couldn’t be here already? Could he? Was Stanford too late to escape? Too late to escape Bill’s revenge for all he’d done to him.

Backing away from the flame, watching it eat into the foliage with horror in his eyes, he didn’t notice the person standing behind him until he backed right into them.

“Sorry – I –” Stanford apologised reflexively, already turning around to face whoever had snuck up on him, but he was confronted with the skirts of a very tall woman, her lavender skin and seven eyes seeming oddly familiar to him.

Stanford craned his neck, looking up at her. He came up to about her knees, she was quite formidable, at least as tall as Bill’s henchwoman Pyronica, if not taller.

She just stood there, looking at the blue flame still burning in the tree tops.

“You recognise it?” She said, her words sounding more like a statement to Stanford. She had an air about here that suggested that asking questions was just a formality for her, a wise omniscience that Stanford was thrown by.

Her question jarred him, and he looked behind him at the flames, wondering how he was supposed to respond to this question without startling the giant woman.

He needn’t have worried though.

“He is not here now. You needn’t fear.” She reassured him. “He left this fire several years ago, as a gift.”
“You – you know him?” Stanford asked, picking up on the bitterness in her tone. He gathered that despite Bill giving her _gifts_ they certainly weren’t friends.

The giant woman sighed deeply, a resigned reluctant sound, and she looked down at Stanford, her seven eyes seeming tired, yet full of implicit understanding.

“You are so very used to running away from him, Stanford Pines, that you couldn’t possibly imagine a place where you are safe from him. If I told you that you had allies here, had protection, would you slow yourself long enough to listen? I wonder.”

Stanford paused, looking up at her faintly wistful expression, and tilted his head.

“I’m sorry – I - have we met before?”

“We’ve made introductions, although I suppose grievous head wounds do leave one’s comprehension somewhat staggered. How are you feeling, on that note?” She tilted her head back at Stanford, her seven eyes lingering on the bandages on his head.

“I – fine I – thank you for patching me up I suppose. After the Exwhylians –“ Stanford began, offering stilted gratitude to who he presumed to be his rescuer.

“You’ve had complex surgery.” She interjected. “A procedure known as ‘the barricade’ which you elected to undertake to block his influence from your mind. You’ll feel a little heavier, and may encounter some neck strain later in life, but the metal plate we installed should prohibit Cipher from entering your head while you are conscious –“

“I’m sorry – what?” Stanford interrupted her this time, reaching up to press his fingers against the bandages wrapping his head, his skin feeling tender and sore there. Since he removed the IV drip from his arm, during his sprint through the forest he had noticed his head throbbing somewhat painfully, but he assumed it was just a migraine. “You put a _metal plate_ in my head? You sliced – you put a – near my brain, my mind?! You - ”

“Still yourself. You are weak and not thinking clearly.” The purple woman asserted brusquely but that just made Stanford angrier, her cool dismissive tone continuing.

“You’ll remember that you requested I do so. The moment I informed you it was an option available to you, you agreed to it instantly. It was a chance for you to finally be freed from Cipher’s stranglehold on your life, on your mind. Do you doubt this? That you leapt at the chance?” She questioned, almost chidingly, before she narrowed all seven of her eyes at Ford. “Do you doubt my word on this? I have evidence to prove it if you truly believe me to be such an untrustworthy figure.”

“I – no I –“ Stanford struggled, his politeness warring with his common sense, which was still reeling at the thought that, while unconscious he’d allowed a stranger to implant a metal plate in his head. “Look, you seem really very calm about all of this, and I don’t mean to offend you but I’m still coming to terms with the fact that _this_ isn’t a migraine, its something – a thick _metal plate_ surgically implanted in my head that I don’t remember asking for, but according to you I did? You say it – it’ll what?”

“Protect your mind from Bill Cipher’s influence.” She answered calmly, and, rather than contesting with Stanford’s disbelieving exasperation, she turned and looked out across the flaming forest once more, her expression solemn and reserved.

Stanford was stumped by that answer. How it seemed to be the answer to all of his problems. He didn’t think it was possible, that there would be a way to sever Bill’s access to his mind, and as of late he assumed that the only foolproof solution to that particular problem was death. Yet somehow this stranger had made the impossible possible for him? Why?

“You – how did you know about him - that I needed -?”

“They don’t call me The Oracle for nothing.” She replied, looking sideways at him with the barest hint of amusement lighting her solemn face.

“So, you’re some kind of seer?” Stanford puzzled, remembering what Bill had said about fortune tellers, regurgitating Bill’s scepticism in his tone.

“So it would appear.” The Oracle replied dryly.

“Everything I’ve been through? And you only chose to intervene now? There were dozens of times - why – I -?”

“You’re very demanding, aren’t you?” She remarked, cutting off his impassioned diatribe with that cool demeanour of hers. “You’d think an independent creature such as yourself would not be so quick to blame others for the things your choices engendered. I do not see everything, you’re confusing me with someone else, and it doesn’t take an Oracle to know who. I prophesize. I see crucial intersections in the flow of fate and intervene only when I perceive it to be necessary. I have tried to intervene, but my intervention can only do so much when you refuse to listen. My words have little impact when you prefer to believe his lies.”

Something about that phrase struck Ford as alarmingly familiar, and although it had been nearly 30 years, that phrase spoken in that tone of voice jarred him immediately back to where he’d last heard it.

\[
\text{LIES!} \quad \text{HE LIES!} \quad \text{DON’T BELIEVE} \quad \text{-} \quad \text{NOT WHAT HE SEEMS!}
\]

\[
\text{DOOMED TO FAIL} \quad \text{-} \quad \text{TOMORROW} \quad \text{-} \quad \text{LAST CHANCE!}
\]

\[
\text{WHEN GRAVITY FALLS AND EARTH BECOMES SKY, FEAR THE BEAST WITH JUST ONE EYE!}
\]

Stanford reeled, looking up at the calm stoic giant woman standing beside him, trying to mentally align this benevolent being with the voice in the ring who turned his life upside down and then unceremoniously abandoned him to his growing guilt, leaving him at the mercy of Bill’s efforts to rekindle what they had.

“You were the voice in the ring. That was you!” Stanford accused, still trying to process meeting the sentience who tore right through the sham façade of his life as it was at that moment, a life spent ignorant of his muse’s true intentions. He wasn’t sure if he should consider her a saviour or if he should hate her for bursting his bubble, the idyllic bubble of ignorant happiness he could never get back.

“I tried to help you then, and I am trying to help you now.” She confirmed gently.

“Help me?” Stanford’s voice rose, and he barked a near hysterical laugh. “Yes, really very helpful, telling me exactly how to defeat Bill and then disappearing. There’s quite a lot to be said for a little follow up communication. It would have been a little more helpful if I could have asked you questions back then, or requested clarification, especially with Bill bombarding me with nightmares for all those months. So – so a little feedback – the disappearing act was really – it wasn’t – hardly any sort of help at all honestly.”

Stanford’s chastisement was weakened somewhat, as he grasped his head while telling the Oracle off, swaying on his feet.

“You are overexerting yourself.” The Oracle chided in return, her brows furrowing above her seven eyes, frowning down at Stanford’s outburst. “You will set back your recovery if you continue to do so. Calm yourself.”

“I am calm.” Stanford shot back childishly, but he lowered his voice appropriately, no longer shouting at the Oracle.

“If you will allow yourself to listen to me, rather than succumbing to needless emotional outbursts, you should know that I attempted to contact you after you banished him. Something was blocking my reach and the signal was broken. I assumed you warded the ring, rather than seek out my counsel. It would not have surprised me, given how quickly you seem to jump to conclusions.” She said dismissively, looking back over to the burning trees to hide the scorn in her gaze.

“I didn’t do – I just brought it back to the shack, but you didn’t –“ Stanford struggled, before he seemed to cotton onto something, looking back up at Jheselbraum’s seven eyed gaze.

Kneeling down on the floor, Stanford redrew from memory the final sigil Bill had traced into the protection spell surrounding the house, his finger following the pattern of the mercury in the dirt, six crescents and a seventh oval shape, resembling an open staring eye.

He looked between the sigil on the floor, and The Oracle’s face, her seven eyes positioned in exactly the same place in the pattern as the crescents, the seventh open eye representative of her central blue eye that was staring down at the sigil on the ground now with interest.

“This is you, isn’t it? Is this your name?” Ford asked, piecing things together.

“My name is Jheselbraum.” The Oracle replied, her tone still mildly bemused. “But that is a rather familiar depiction of my face, and I am fairly certain I know who drew it.”

“Bill warded the house and drew this to seal the spell. He lied to me and told me it meant ‘time police’ but he was trying to block your access to my mind, even then, wasn’t he?”

“You’ll find that lying for him is as easy as breathing for your species. If only you’d wised up to that fact sooner.” Jheselbraum commented, before she crouched down, her considerable height halving as she knelt to sit at Stanford’s level, pointing at the dirt. “This is how he has always written my name, and it explains why my attempts to inform you of the truth sooner were unsuccessful. We could have stopped him before you chose to get so stubbornly invested, and the world could have been spared a great deal of his misery, you included.”

“You said he’s always written your name this way? How long have you known him? How long have you -?”

“How long have I attempted to stop him?” Jheselbraum clarified, quirking her brow imperiously. “For a long time. Before you were born, and then some. You would have noticed my zodiac prophecy in the caves back on your home planet, if you were paying attention. The spell was my doing. I have always been trying to cut the strings from his puppets. To reveal the truth.”

“He never mentioned you.” Stanford frowned at the sigil on the floor, missing the way Jheselbraum’s eye twitched in irritation at that.
“He wouldn’t, to you. He likely didn’t want to shatter the perfectly crafted illusion he’d been weaving around you, trying to manipulate your impression of him. He was likely mocking you the entire time.” Jheselbraum noticed the way Ford’s frown tightened, pursuing her advantage. “You’re a scientist, are you not? A scholar? Tell me, did he introduce himself as a muse? As a personification of divine inspiration?”

Stanford looked up at Jheselbraum, the answer plain on his face.

Nodding solemnly, Jheselbraum continued speaking with a slight bitter twist to her lips.

“His idea of a joke. In his opinion someone who believed themselves worthy of a muse must have both the highest and lowest opinion of themselves in existence. He said anyone who believed in a muse was a ‘sucker’, because they were egotistical enough to claim their ideas were sent to them from a higher power, and yet so full of self-loathing that they couldn’t claim credit for said ideas. If a potential mark accepted his story, that he was a muse sent to inspire them, he’d know they were gullible enough to manipulate, and he would target them to become one of his puppets.”

Well it was certainly nice to know that Stanford had confirmed himself to be gullible and self-invested enough to fall for Bill’s idiot-pawn litmus test. He’d certainly jumped at the idea of a muse then, flattered and manipulated in equal measure by the terminology. Clearly it was his fault for believing the term actually meant something to Bill, or that the God liked it when Ford described him as his perfect muse. The phrase ‘I’ve never felt so duped’ was getting a lot of traction in Ford’s head lately.

“He told me this nearly three thousand of your earth years ago, when he first set sights on your dimension and chose his first human puppet, Modoc, to build a door for him.” She gestured, waving her hand to the east dismissively. “He also destroyed my crystal moss valley in the process of telling me. He told me he was being considerate by not destroying more.”

“Why would he tell you these things, if you’re working against him?” Stanford asked, far less likely to trustingly accept the word of any potentially benevolent being after Bill’s feigned benevolence turned out to be a fabrication.

“Because he can. He likes to show up here when he’s been drinking.” Jheselbraum said dryly. “He will shout out something about his latest crusade, whatever it is he’s trying to prove, burn parts of my domain, and then disappear for the next few centuries until he demands my attention again. I’ve had to relocate my people into the mountains, since he keeps burning their homes.”

“That’s not what I mean. I – from what I’ve come to learn, as random as Bill’s actions may seem at times, he has reasons for everything that he does. Everything! Reasons that make sense to him.” Stanford stressed, trying not to admit that when Bill explained them, his reasons often made sense to Stanford as well.

He desperately wanted to make sense of this situation, his need to understand further fuelled by the metal plate in his head that cut him off from asking Bill directly in the future. His safe method of meeting Bill in the mindscape was gone now, assuming this metal plate worked the way The Oracle said it did.

“Are you saying he had a good reason for destroying my people’s homes and burning their villages?” Jheselbraum retorted sharply, narrowing her eyes. “Are you looking to excuse his actions?”

“Well, not a good reason.” Stanford conceded. “But one that makes sense to him, or benefits him somehow. I’ve been trying to understand him, to understand why he does the things he does and I
“A wasted effort.” Jheselbraum interrupted him. “Understanding him will not stop his violent or dangerous impulses. Deciphering Bill Cipher will only abate your own curiosity. It will not undo the damage he has done or halt his plans before he acts them out. Consider how much you knew of him already, he still would refuse to halt his invasion through the portal if asked. Knowing him does not make him any better and it would be selfish to believe that your satisfaction outweighs the multitude of damage he could do to millions of lives.”

“This isn’t about my own satisfaction.” Stanford lied. “I’m trying to understand him to understand his weaknesses. To figure out a way to take him down before it’s too late.”

The Oracle gave Stanford a pointed icy look that sent a shiver of reproach right through him. “You already know what his weakness is.”

Ford shifted awkwardly under her cool gaze, before he blurted out. “I mean physical weaknesses. You know he’s invincible. He’s too powerful to even –“

“You want to know how to destroy him?” Jheselbraum tilted her head, and then gestured to the bandages on Stanford’s head. “Then come back to the temple. Ally yourself with us. Heal. Rest. Recover your strength and we can help you achieve your victory. We can help you.”

“I’m not just going to go to – to go along with whatever it is you say. I still don’t – I don’t trust you!” Stanford declared, standing up abruptly to emphasise his point. “I can’t trust you. I can’t trust anyone.”

He swayed on his feet a little, feeling lightheaded, his skull throbbing with the echo of emptiness. He brought a hand up to cradle the bandages covering the blockade against Bill this stranger had placed in his head.

Sure, she insisted he jumped at the opportunity, and later he would likely admit the same, but right now he was still reeling with the burgeoning hurt that was the fact that this woman had removed Bill from his head forever. She’d inserted the metal plate and it fell like a guillotine, severing his safe accessible link to Bill, forcing closure in the relationship when Stanford wasn’t entirely sure he wanted to let go at all.

Cutting himself off from Bill was the smart decision, it was the logical thing to do, it would be wise to sever all ties to the God in order to move on with his life, he’d attempted to do the same just several weeks ago, but Ford’s heart was protesting louder than his head could given it’s compromised state. His heart was digging its heels in to the idea that his relationship with Bill could still be salvaged somehow, and it was throwing a tantrum at the thought that the choice to leave Bill on his terms was being taken from him.

It wasn’t fair.

“He’s really done a number on you, hasn’t he?” Jheselbraum observed, her expression pitying yet understanding all at once. When Ford stood abruptly, she was still taller than him, even crouching down on the floor beside him, and when she looked down at him with this knowing sympathetic expression it made Stanford feel like there was something wrong with him.

“If you trust no one, you are isolated, and when you are isolated you are vulnerable. He is no doubt relying on this. If you go through your entire life, trusting no one, pushing all help away, fixating on him all the while it means that the moment when you break and finally let someone in, it is that much more likely to be him, and he’s counting on you breaking for him. He has moulded so much of your interactions thus far to make you dependant on his regard, and it may seem like the only independent thing you can do is push everyone away and put your walls up, letting paranoia reign supreme, but even that is a lie. You aren’t serving yourself by disregarding the assistance of others, every brick in the wall you put up between yourself and the ones who care for you is a brick you’ve seen before.”

Some of the stubbornness puffing Stanford up faded away at this point, and his shoulders slumped, his weariness catching up to him. It could have been due to his mad sprint through the forest following complicated head surgery, it could have been the lack of proper food, having been hooked up to only an IV for who knows how long, it could have been complications from the surgery slowing him down, but he felt immeasurably tired.

He was so used to feeling tired, yet being unable to properly sleep, that he resigned himself to the persistent draining feeling, but if what The Oracle proposed was true, there was a chance Stanford could truly rest here. He could sleep soundly without the threat of Bill possessing his body or haunting his dreams hovering in his thoughts like a spectre.

He wanted to let go and relax for once. To shut his eyes without fear of what would wait for him when he opened them again. He just needed to know that he would be truly safe to do so.

“Why does Bill still visit you when you’re working against him?” Stanford asked wearily, the question hovering on the precipice of his conditional acceptance of her offer. “And tell you things? Why?”

Jheselbraum’s lips pursed together in a thin line as she considered her answer, or whether she’d answer at all. Eventually she spoke, each word measured carefully.

“Due to certain circumstances, we used to be close, a very long time ago. Both learning from the same teacher. We were always at odds with each other, but he had a certain respect for me, and my superior skills. We clashed from the beginning and eventually parted ways, but he has trouble letting go of things. As you no doubt know.”

“Why did you part ways and turn against each other?” Ford pressed, needing to know.

He was wavering, wanting to trust her. It wouldn’t take much for Ford to trust her now, just one more slight push.

Jheselbraum knew this, and so she smiled wryly, conveying a sense of foolishness in the shrug of her shoulders that she knew the scientist could relate to.

Lifting the hem of her robe ever so slightly, she revealed the gnarled and twisted scar tissue covering her purple legs, the obvious remnants of some incredibly graphic burns healed slowly over time. Ford could see just a small peek where she lifted her robe, but it looked as though the burns continued all the way up both of her legs, a cruel act seared into her flesh for all eternity.

“You are not the first person to be tricked by Bill Cipher. To be burned by him. But with any luck, you might just be the last.”

It was clear the sight of the burns effected Stanford, and he stood staring at where they had been even after Jheselbraum lowered her skirts and stood up.

She reached into her robe for a small remote, clicking it once to open a teleportation portal in the clearing leading back to the temple. She held her hand out to Stanford, gesturing for him to join him.
“Shall we?”

With a solemn nod, Stanford reached out and accepted her hand, walking with her into the portal.

He’d made his choice.

With the investors scattered to the winds, the Nightmare Realm was remarkably quiet these days. There used to be nonstop chaos cavorting through this dimensional crawl space. Parties, hijinks, and all kinds of fun plots unravelling within the unstable liminal space.

Things had been dull since the hunt for Sixer had died down, since Bill took that into his own hands, and subsequently he’d been giving very little attention to everyone else.

His investors took that to mean they could go off and pursue their own interests. His hired help took that to mean they were all off the clock, since the plans to dethrone Time Baby seemed to be put on pause.

His loyal Henchmaniacs however, knew he’d be back.

Eventually.

“Got any threes?” Teeth asked, chewing on a toothpick as he examined his cards.

“Go fish.” Eight Ball replied bluntly.

“Gnnnnaarrruuughhhhh.” Xanthar groaned and flopped sideways to lay on the ground with a thud that shook the floor of the garden area outside of the quadrangle, causing the picnic table to jump, sending cards flying into disarray.

“Well if you weren’t having fun buddy, you could have just said so.” Teeth griped, scowling at the mess of cards scattered over the tabletop.

“Xanthar is fluent in body language.” Amorphous Shape pointed out. “I feel he got his point across marvellously.”

“I think he’s bored.” Keyhole observed, nodding at Xanthar’s lethargic pose knowingly. “There’s nothing to do.”

Xanthar groaned again, and Amorphous Shape helpfully translated.

“I think he’s saying, ‘where my party people at’.”

“Geez, you can say that again.” Keyhole slumped his elbows forward onto the table, and Xanthar groaned once more obligingly.

“So, let’s get something to do happening.” Teeth suggested, plucking the toothpick from his teeth and rolling it between his fingers. “Invite some people over, get this party started. I’ll invite some fun idiots. Everyone can invite people. How about you invite your sister, Keyhole?”
“Why don’t you invite her? Or is she not taking your calls?” Keyhole smirked teasingly.

“I – listen, Wyrm and I have a complicated relationship. It’s not that we’re not on speaking terms, it’s just that –”

“Oh, so she doesn’t like you?” Keyhole finished smugly. “Like I told you already, over and over again?”

“Don’t you give me that look, acting like your family’s all that because they’re high society. Just because your matriarch of a Ma is the most powerful consumptive force in the universe, that don’t make her any better than my dear old Nanna Dentures.”

“How many galaxies has your nanna swallowed in her inexorable pull lately?” Keyhole asked, reshuffling the deck of cards.

“My nanna swallows plenty. It’s not even about that. Wyrm just tells me she’s too busy with work to see me, that’s all.” Teeth divulged, patting the table for Keyhole to deal him another round.

“Your whole family are gainfully employed, are they not Keyhole?” Amorphous Shape asked.

“They sure are. And then there’s me, Mr Unemployed.” Keyhole gestured to himself self-deprecatingly. “Wyrm has a busy job in the Department of Interdimensional Travel, Loophole’s a big shot lawyer, Blow’s got a gig in tourism working with various National Parks, Manhole and Pothole work on both sides of the construction industry. Glory’s making tonnes of money on the internet, Sinkhole got a job in landfill waste management. Heck, even Plot got hired to work on season eight of Game of Thrones. I’m the only one of my siblings to not put my mum-given talents to good use on the right side of the law.”

“How would you even get a lawful job Keyhole? Your MO is breaking and entering.” Teeth asked sceptically, chewing on his toothpick again.

“Mum wanted me to be a locksmith.” Keyhole admitted, dealing out the cards. “She wasn’t too happy when I told her that I didn’t want to just settle for what was expected of me. She told me ‘why can’t you be like your cousin, Pidgeonhole? He does what he’s told’ but I told her no. I’m a free spirit, and I wanna do crime.”

“Yeah, you tell her, Keyhole.” Teeth nodded in agreement.

“Here here.” Concurred Amorphous Shape, waving his tails encouragingly.

“I want excitement and adventure in my life.” Keyhole added emphatically, picking up his cards, looking at his hand.

A chunk of matter cracked off the edge of one of the wormholes at the edge of the Nightmare realm and fell down at the edge of the garden, crushing one of the gaseous roses, the only sound that broke the silence of the usually raucous dimension.

Teeth gestured to the debris. “Well you’re getting plenty of that here.”

“I can’t remember the last time we had a party.” Eight Ball sighed, picking up his cards before putting them down in resignation.

“We had a big one a few years back, for little Zippy’s wedding, remember? The multiverse had never seen so many bounty hunters and wanted criminals coexisting peacefully in the same space before. It was so romantic, just like a modern day Romeo and Juliet.” Keyhole recalled fondly, putting his own cards on the table.

“There was no double suicide.” Amorphous Shape responded, sounding confused. “Both brides still live.”

“There were a couple of murders though.” Teeth snickered. “But that ain’t public knowledge, right Eight Ball?”

“Nuh uh.” Eight Ball shook his head and mimed zipping his mouth shut.

“Do you reckon she’d come back to visit if we threw a party? She could bring her missus.” Keyhole asked enthusiastically.

“It’s not the same though.” Teeth whined. “It’s not a real party without Bill, and he barely came to the last one. Or the last few hundred parties, since he started hunting down that scientist of his.”

“Didn’t Pyronica say he might be giving up the hunt a few weeks ago?” Amorphous Shape asked hopefully.

“Sure, she said that, but then she left with him to work out some ‘issues’ and usually that means a bit of whom bam thank you ma’am against the Time Police and then we’re back in business, but do you see him back here? We haven’t gone on a real heist in ages, we haven’t had a real party in ages, and as for some good old-fashioned flagrant tomfoolery, forget about it.”

“Careful.” Amorphous Shape warned Teeth. “You’ll start to sound like Kryptos if you keep complaining like that.”

“Ugh, low blow AM.” Teeth sneered.

“It would be really nice.” Keyhole spoke up. “If things could go back to the way they were again. When Bill was happy. I don’t think that whatever he’s doing is making him happy anymore, and it’s real sad, you know. I think the Boss deserves to be happy. When he’s happy, we’re all happy.”

Xanthar grunted in agreement.

“I’ll be happy when he comes back here and fixes the joint.” Teeth frowned at the crumbling edges of the dimension, very aware that the space they called their home was falling down around them, that one entropic step closer to obliterating the Nightmare Realm for good.

“If that’s even possible.” Grunted Eight Ball, the monster picking up his cards again, resigning himself to another game.

“If anyone can fix it, Bill can.” Keyhole declared confidently, grabbing his own cards and throwing himself into another game to distract himself from the very same thing the rest of the Henchmaniacs didn’t want to face. The destruction of their reality. “We just have to sit tight and trust that he knows what he’s doing. He always does.”

Another chunk of matter crumbled down from the edge of the dimension, crashing obviously in the distance, the very fabric of space unravelling bit by bit like a decrepit house.

The Henchmaniacs exchanged glances, neither agreeing nor contesting Keyhole’s optimistic statement, the stirrings of doubt beginning to seep into even the most loyal of Bill’s crew.

Eventually Eight Ball spoke.
“Got any fours?”

Walking back through the temple after his dramatic exit via the window felt a lot like what Ford remembered Stanley calling ‘the walk of shame’. He certainly felt shameful, all the frilly gilled nurses watching him warily, several of the soldiers and civilians in the compound also giving him a notably wide berth, as if they expected Ford to defenestrate himself at any moment.

He was walking beside their leader though, so that distance could have been due to reverence, not fear.

The Oracle seemed to command a great deal of reverence and judging from the awed and grateful expressions on the faces of the acolytes and civilians, that reverence was not born of fear of retribution.

The people here looked at Jheselbraum like she was their saviour.

If what she was telling him was true, she might well be.

The way she tried to save him from Bill’s designs before they fully panned out would indicate as much, and judging from the diversity of the gathered refugees and citizens of her mountainside temple, The Oracle made a habit of reaching in to intervene, pulling people out of desperate situations to provide something better for them.

“All of this has been built through the cooperative efforts of many people. Pious people, people who join in the fight against Cipher’s evil, people with nowhere else to go. You are not the first person that no longer has a home to go back to thanks to his callous actions. But we can redeem the parts of our lives we’ve lost through working together to ensure peace for all.”

Jheselbraum gestured to the ornate tapestries and stunning visual architecture of her domain, the sweep of her hand showcasing happy creatures and individuals working in cooperation, everyone adorned with the pinks and blues of the bubbles that floated through the temple, depictions of axolotls plastered on their sleeves and the tapestries on the walls.

It seemed like quite the utopia until Stanford noticed the disparities visible.

Several militant looking individuals marched around with a string of the same purple and orange crystals strung about their waists, dangling from their holstered weapons, blasters and knives worn out in the open. The strung crystals were similar to the ones Jheselbraum had slung around her waist. Perhaps they weren’t merely decorative as Stanford had assumed.

“Some of your people are armed.” Stanford nodded to the soldiers.

“You carry your own weapons, do you not? These people have lived through hardship, and to soothe their minds they pre-empt the attack that could come at any moment. While we offer sanctuary here, we are not ignorant of the dangers of the outside world. We guard the civilians here against it, but some of us seek it out to smother its flame. To protect those who cannot fight.” Jheselbraum looked down at Stanford, her seven eyes impassive as they searched his expression for something.
“Do you have people to protect?” She eventually asked. “Or people you wish had never been harmed by circumstances you could have easily prevented? Things you regret?”

Stanford’s thoughts dipped into a pool of regret for a moment, focusing on the people he couldn’t protect from Bill (Willow, Susan, Fiddleford) or the people he couldn’t protect from the pirates (Sandeep, En-Pathy, Quinlar) or the people he couldn’t protect from himself … (Stanley).

He made an aborted nod, not willing to implicate himself with a verbal answer.

“I do too.” Jheselbraum confided, and as they walked through the rooms of the temple they came across a room that housed a large obelisk, a looming column of black and gold stone dominating the thoughts of the citizens here, and the décoration of the room.

Words were engraved upon the obelisk, and as Stanford looked a little closer, he realised the words were names, hundreds of names, carved into the rock like a memorial. Like a tombstone.

“It is bravery, to die in battle against a great evil, but it is a terrible loss regardless.” Jheselbraum said solemnly. “Of my many regrets, most of them are carved here. A reminder that there is still more to do. That there is already so much that has been lost.”

Stanford looked at the obelisk, dreading the growing realisation that all of these names were lives taken needlessly by Bill, if what The Oracle said was true. It was undeniable proof of a nature that Ford had attempted to deny in Bill, simply because he hadn’t seen blatant evidence of it himself. Faced with a literal monument to Bill’s homicidal tendencies Stanford couldn’t lie to himself any longer.

“Countless lives could have been saved if I had been listened to sooner. I urged those around me to destroy Cipher, but none attempted, or succeeded. Those with the power to effect real change ignored my call, employing only half measures, or none at all. With every failed attempt his powers only grew, and your contribution to his power may be the most catastrophic of all.”

Deliberately obtuse, Stanford didn’t look away from the obelisk as he replied. “The portal?”

The Oracle tsked, a disapproving sound that made Ford tear his eyes away from the monument, feeling the scorn of her gaze sevenfold.

“Do not play the fool, scientist. This pretence of yours is insulting. Anyone could have built his portal. You could give any halfway competent pawn those blueprints and garner the same result. You do not need to be special to follow instructions. You could have been anyone, a nobody, and you should have remained as thus, if not for your erroneous feelings.”

Ah.

Stanford shrunk into his coat, avoiding eye contact now, choosing to look at the floor rather than face either The Oracle’s damning accountability or the monument to his misjudgement standing in the middle of the room. His guilt complex was flaring up, compounded in the knowledge that The Oracle knew the lengths and depths of Stanford’s failings. She knew of his weakness for Bill, and the consequences of that continual weakness.

“We both know what powers those cubes of his. The ones he used to incinerate a planet in a blink of an eye. Without that surplus energy he would not be half of the threat he is now. When reality unravels the blame lies with you.” She said tersely, not mincing any words at all.

Stanford, through his travels, was unused to this directness. He was unused to this pinpointed accountability piercing him through his core. It was one thing to argue with his own guilt, spinning numerous justifications, and another thing to stand up for his actions to someone who knew exactly what he did, and what the consequences of those actions could be.

“I didn’t know –“ Stanford began half-heartedly, but Jheselbraum cut him off sharply.

“I said do not play the fool. You’ve done enough of that already. The time for denial is over. Now is the time for redemption, and the opportunity, should you take it.”

“Redemption? How?” Stanford looked up at her hopefully, his own guilt latching onto whatever could be promised to abate the knowing feeling of having done wrong. In the room with the obelisk, the extent to which Stanford had done wrong by falling for Bill felt colossal, and he would do anything to set his mistakes to right, rather than languish in all he had done to doom those around him.

Jheselbraum pursed her lips, considering something, before her expression softened, gesturing for Stanford to follow her out of the memorial room.

“Come. We’ll have the nurses tend to you. Lest your injuries worsen unchecked.”

Stringing out her promise of redemption, she stayed close lipped while they walked to the medical bay, Stanford trailing along behind her like a hooked fish on a line.

Jheselbraum knew she didn’t have to prove herself further to the human now, or pander to him. She had caught him in the net of his own guilt, and now she could leave him dangling, until he sought her out, wanting to prove himself to her, enacting her will.

She was very good at this, but then again, she’d had a lot of practise.

They left the obelisk behind, the black granite and gold lettering detailing hundreds of names. If Stanford had paid more attention to the people listed on the stone, rather than the enormity of the loss it represented, he would have recognised a familiar name inscribed on the marble monument of The Oracle’s regrets, dating back 29 years.

Shailesh.

Several days passed in the lavish mountainside temple in Dimension 52, and while Stanford had encountered plenty of amphibian nurses, pious acolytes seeking to convert him, and scornful military recruits, he found the same sort of solitary audience with The Oracle to be a scarce luxury.

Stanford wanted to seek her out. He had a million more questions to ask her, questions about Bill, about the future, about this redemption she mentioned. He would have gone storming through the temple looking for her in order to do just that, but he found himself surprisingly bashful, the censorial scorn of one sentence curtailing his more impudent instincts.

“You’re very demanding, aren’t you?”

Stanford was used to being demanding. He was coming to realise that it was a characteristic he’d allowed to flourish, unchecked for quite some time.
With the Oracle busy, as her servants had repeatedly told Stanford, he had no choice but to commit himself to introspection, hardly finding satisfying conversation with the civilians who lived in the temple. He couldn’t have a decent conversation with any of them about Bill without everyone in earshot gasping, covering their ears, making bubble shapes in the air around their heads to ‘protect themselves from his influence’ or telling him off for mentioning ‘the beast’.

It all seemed rather silly to Stanford, that these beings thought that by simply uttering Bill’s name they would draw his notice. Stanford imagined living on a mountain inhabited by an anti-Bill militia led by Bill’s long time enemy (if The Oracle was to be believed) would draw more attention and be more of a threat to one’s safety and sanity than simply mentioning Bill by name.

If only they knew how lazy Bill truly was. If only they knew that while he could see, he wouldn’t often look. Then again, Stanford was coming to realise that there was a wealth of things he didn’t know about Bill, so there may have been a time when he would reign fire down indiscriminately on those who used his name.

Stanford was coming to realise that the standard of behaviour Bill applied to him didn’t apply to the rest of the multiverse, and Stanford’s personal experiences with Bill were not universal.

“You’re very demanding, aren’t you?”

Stanford got away with being demanding with Bill for some reason, making constant demands of him, things that would try the patience of lesser beings, but the difference was that when Stanford demanded things of Bill, the god tended to at least listen.

He gave into Ford’s demands to smuggle the book from the library. He provided summaries when requested. He didn’t hurt the time police at Stanford’s behest, and there were countless other favours that Bill had done for him that Stanford was realising he really didn’t have to do.

“Technically the list of things that you owe me for is longer than an ouroboros anaconda, but I’m letting you off easy because I happen to like your smarts.”

The more Stanford thought on Bill’s words, the more he came to believe it wasn’t just his ‘smarts’ that gave him such special treatment. Bill’s feelings may have been more genuine than Stanford had assumed all along, and it became apparent when contrasting his ex-muses actions with those of Jheselbraum.

She made it clear by her absence that she did not owe Ford her regard. If anyone owed remittance in this situation it was Stanford, who quite possibly owed this woman his life, and that was not an easy debt to repay.

That was an unnerving thought.

On the seventh day in the temple, having endured regular check-ups and treatments to minimise the scarring on his skull and accelerate his healing post-surgery, Stanford had made his mind up that he would leave after this final examination.

He would pack his things, seek out one final audience with her to thank her for her intervention, and continue on his journey through the multiverse. He didn’t find the answers he sought here, and he remained just as purposeless as before, still adrift. He reasoned that since it didn’t seem as though his presence was wanted here, then he would not burden The Oracle with his presence.

The gilled nurse ran her scanner over his skull one last time, wiping away the last of the salve that had swiftly been healing his scalp. The headaches had stopped, and it was as if Stanford never had his head sliced open and a thick metal slab inserted in his cranium. A marvel of modern interdimensional medicine.

This had become a daily routine, his nurse applying the salve, scanning his skin with infrared light, and watching the skin knit together. Usually she would end her check-up by wrapping his head with bandages and poultices, encouraging him to rest.

As she wiped the last of the salve away, she did not reach for the bandages, and clapped her hands on his shoulders.

“That’s you done.”

Stanford turned around in his chair to thank the nurse, but when he turned, he saw her eyes widen, staring at something behind Ford, before she bent over into a deep bow.

“You’ve done fine work, faithful one.”

Stanford twisted his torso back around to see Jheselbraum standing in the doorway, adorned in those strings of hanging gems, her robes lavish velvet, flowing to the ground. Her bald head was veiled with iridescent fabric, beads that looked like bubbles dangling down her forehead.

Before Stanford could even open his mouth to greet her, she spoke.

“You are leaving.”

“I – yes.” Stanford admitted, bowing his head slightly. “I’ve troubled your hospitality enough, and I really must be going.”

“Know where you’re going, do you?” She asked, sounding smug, like she already knew he didn’t have anywhere to go. He just couldn’t stay here.

“Well –“

“There is no need for pretence. Come.” She gestured for Stanford to follow her. “I know where you are headed. We are long overdue for a talk, you and I, and there are things I must divulge to you before you leave us. Matters of destiny, if you are willing to listen.”

Stanford perked up at that, got to his feet and gathered his coat, his belongings already sequestered away in the nano-briefcase in his pocket. Without waiting for him, Jheselbraum already stepped out into the corridors, knowing Ford would follow.

Jogging to keep up with her, Stanford was led through the temple. He’d had plenty of time to marvel at the elaborate architecture of each passing room, having attempted to explore as much of the building as he could, but there were still some areas of the temple that remained foreign to him, and Jheselbraum seemed to be leading him somewhere even her militant staff were not permitted to follow.

In this part of the temple the high ceilings and large arching doorways remained, but the furniture became progressively larger, suited less for the human sized subjects The Oracle housed and more for the woman herself.

Indeed, as she paced further into this part of the temple, she seemed to drop a fraction of the haughty airs she maintained around her followers, dropping her shawl on a tabletop and toeing out of her shoes.
“It will be easier to talk in here. I’m certain you’ve noticed, but my people get somewhat jittery when Bill is mentioned.”

Stanford’s demeanour instantly lit up with curiosity, gratified that he could finally have a conversation about Bill with someone who was likely the most qualified to do so.

“I’m sure they have their reasons, if what you said about the fires is true.”

“You’ve seen the wreckage with your own eyes and you still question the truth of it.” Jheselbraum huffed a sound that could have been an indignant laugh, if she were the type to laugh so casually. Even in her own chambers she still seemed lofty and composed.

“Things aren’t always as they seem.” Stanford responded, and Jheselbraum shook her head slightly.

“A lesson you’ve learnt from Bill’s actions, yet you still use that logic to defend him. I’m sure if he were to see the way you speak of his actions he would be very pleased. He likes nothing more than blind thoughtless loyalty. You don’t even realise you’re doing it, do you?”

“I’m not defending his actions –“ Stanford began, almost arguing with himself at this point.

“But you are defending him. This quest of yours to understand the why’s behind the destruction he creates amounts to condoning the destruction by extension.” Jheselbraum narrowed her seven eyes at Ford, looking him up and down. “You’re indoctrinated already, and there are only so many times one can say ‘yes he just ruined everything for everyone and caused enormous loss, but he’s had such a rough childhood’.”

“I’m not –“ Stanford’s rebuttal died in his throat as he realised that he was, yet again, being demanding, and shouldn’t be so accustomed to it. “I just want to know.”

“Of course you do.” Jheselbraum said flatly, before she walked across the room and pushed open the double doors leading to the balcony, striding through.

Stanford followed her, uncertain if that was an invitation or a dismissal, and saw a very large iridescent pool rimmed with precious stones out on the balcony, The Oracle bending down to retrieve herself a drink from a cabinet on the balcony.

“If I’m going to be talking about Bill, I’m going to need something bracing to drink.” Jheselbraum called out over her shoulder as she withdrew a bottle of shimmering liquid from the cabinet, turning to look at Stanford as she grabbed glasses. “Do you drink?”

Releasing the tension in his shoulders with an exhale, Stanford rubbed the back of his neck and managed a roguish grin. “More and more since, well, you know.”

“Since Bill.” She finished for him, pulling out a second smaller glass and pouring a hearty amount of the shimmering purple substance in Stanford’s cup, a more modest amount sitting in hers. “He tends to have that effect on people.”

Jheselbraum walked back over to the edge of the pool and sat down on the ground beside it, setting the two drinks on the floor. She then hiked her skirts up once more, bearing the burns on her legs briefly, before she slid her legs in the pool, the swirling rainbow liquid soothing the inflamed skin.

When Jheselbraum sighed in relief and took a small sip of her drink, kicking her legs back and forth in the water, she seemed more human and more approachable than Stanford had ever seen her, and he felt the apprehension and caution he maintained in her presence drop ever so slightly.

“Take your shoes off and dip your feet in. It’s really quite pleasant.” Jheselbraum urged him.

Following her prompting, Stanford took his boots off and rolled his trousers up to his knees, sitting beside her and dipping his feet in the pool. She passed him his drink and watched as he took an obliging sip of the liquid, her lips turning up in a tight smile of approval once Stanford drank.

“Is this Cosmic Sand?” Stanford questioned, once his tongue was buzzing with the taste. “I’ve had it before.”

“Oh have you now?” Jheselbraum asked politely.

“Back in a bar on Meccai. It’s quite lovely.” Stanford nodded, looking at the colours shimmer on the surface of the drink, missing the way Jheselbraum’s smile widened at that.

Jheselbraum was smiling because she knew that whatever one percent swill they called Cosmic Sand on Meccai couldn’t compare to the undiluted power of pure Cosmic Sand, the kind Time Baby himself drank, and that the ignorant human sipping from the generous cup she’d poured for him would be inebriated and pliant before his second sip.

Stanford smiled back at her, but not for the same reason.

“It is strength, you know. To smile and still be joyful after all Bill has done to you. That you still hold onto so much of yourself, while losing so much of it as well is a testament to you as an individual. Not everyone can pull through a crossroads like that and still find the will to be happy.”

Stanford’s smile fell slightly. “I wouldn’t say I’m happy, per se.”

“No, you wouldn’t be, would you?” Jheselbraum examined him, her seven eyes seeming to see right through to Stanford’s soul. “But you are close enough to it to pretend, and that is half the battle.”

Stanford didn’t know what to say to that, and so he took another sip of his drink. The millions of questions he had for The Oracle had temporarily dried up due to social awkwardness, but thankfully Jheselbraum seemed to account for this.

“Bill used to have a saying. Lie until you’re not lying anymore.” She was looking out over the balcony, but she didn’t miss the way Stanford’s head turned the moment she spoke of Bill. “It may have started as a way to cope with his mysterious past, but it became something of a lifestyle for him, and a destructive one at that. Living a lie. I have seen it ruin him.”

“Do you know about his past? About what happened to him?” Stanford asked.
“I do not know the full story, no.” Jheselbraum admitted. “It became known that his dimension was destroyed, but I do not truly know how, or why. I suspect he was to blame. We first met some time after the destruction, and he would not talk about it, under any circumstances.”

“How did you meet?” Ford watched Jheselbraum, the sunlight hitting the balcony in a picturesque way, glittering in the iridescent bubbles that floated idly by the pool.

“There was a being who could see all in the universe, a reclusive being, who refused to get involved with interdimensional matters. He could teach the art of endless sight, it was said, but as he was somewhat of a hermit he rarely took on students. One had to prove themselves worthy of his tutelage you see, and as I was the most gifted of my peers I set about to besting the tests required for this being to consider teaching me. The tests were incredibly difficult, purposefully so, for this being did not want anyone to pass them. He didn’t want to teach anyone else to see, for his sight had brought him only misery. He did not expect me to succeed his tests, but I did, and when I showed up in his domain to speak with him, Bill was already there.”

Ford watched the way Jheselbraum’s mouth turned down bitterly, even recounting it now, and realised that Bill must have hurt her more than he imagined, if even telling the story of how they met was so difficult.

“The being I sought was lonely, you see, and while I was out proving myself worthy, Bill went directly to his cave, and our teacher must have taken pity on him, for by the time I arrived, the great Argus Panoptes already had a student.” Jheselbraum’s lip curled. “Although certainly not a worthy one. Rather than cast him out in favour of me, Panoptes decided he would take on two students, as a compromise, teaching the both of us how to see infinitely.”

“So that’s why he can see so much.” Stanford said, eyeing off Jheselbraum’s many eyes. “Can you see like Bill as well?”

“I cannot.” Jheselbraum confessed, looking down at Ford. “At the culmination of our studies, before the final rite to grant infinite sight, Bill turned on me, sabotaging my chance to see the universe. I bear the mark of his betrayal on my legs and have ever since that day.”

“He burned you?” Stanford sounded shocked, although he had already seen the scars.

“He wanted the power all to himself, you see. He was ambitious, even then. Ambitious and far too clever. Clever enough to be ruthless. To cheat. To lie. To use people and discard the remnants.” Jheselbraum gave Stanford a pointed look. “As you well know. After he stole the power of sight, he fled. Our teacher took pity on me and gifted me one of his eyes.”

She pointed to her central eye, the piercing blue iris standing out against the orange and lilac hues of her other eyes. “As compensation. An eye of prophecy, to see into the future if I could not see everything else. Of course prophecy is not always accurate, and it is often more of a burden than a gift. I think he may have just been trying to get rid of it, honestly. Either way, you work with what you have.”

“But you don’t know what happened to him then? Why he did this?” Stanford somewhat insensitively pushed, fixated on Bill.

“The point I was trying to make was that his reasons mean less than his consequences.” Jheselbraum stressed. “I’m sure that you want to hear about how quiet he could be, and how he’d paste on fake joviality and pretend to be having the time of his life every day, while crying all night when he thought he was alone. I’m quite certain you’d grab onto whatever lies would help you paint a pretty picture of how sad and lonely and misunderstood he was, so you could spin all sorts of justifications to help you absolve your guilt for trusting him in the first place. But I’m telling you, it’s not worth it.”

Jheselbraum turned slightly to face Ford, her expression serious, as she attempted to impart her wisdom onto him.

“It just goes round and round, that logic, and it doesn’t help you. You are stuck in a pattern, and that pattern is trusting him, being betrayed, then trusting him enough to think it will be different the next time, only to find yourself repeating the same cycle over and over. It’s not healthy, and you will never know peace or happiness until you break free of this cycle and become your own person again. When was the last time you made choices for yourself that didn’t revolve around Bill in some way? When was the last time you felt good about your own achievements? When was the last time you had friends, had people close to you, and didn’t fear for your life on a near constant basis? When was the last time you thought about yourself, and not him?”

Her barrage of questions were difficult to answer without implicating himself, and Stanford imagined that was her point really, in being so persistent with them. He became more and more aware now just how much he had to reach to defend Bill, to defend himself. She was calling out the pattern he was playing into, and as he began to realise she was right there was less and less he could say in his defence to pardon this thoughtless adherence to stupidity.

He certainly felt stupid, having it all laid out in front of him.

“I may have –“ Ford cleared his throat awkwardly, before he swallowed his pride and looked down at his knees poking out from the rainbow water. “You may be right.”

“I know I’m right.” Jheselbraum countered, putting one of her large purple hands on Ford’s knee beseechingly. “You have to know it for it to truly make a difference. I can’t do that for you.”

“And I am very grateful for that.” Stanford ran a hand over his prickly head, exhaling heavily and shaking his head. “I know everything you’re saying here is right, it is right, I’ve known it for such a long time, but I keep – he must have altered something in my head or something because I just keep forgiving him. Not fully, but enough to want him to –“

“He wouldn’t have needed to alter your mind for you to feel like this.” Jheselbraum said gently. “It’s quite common to want to forgive those who we love.”

“Loved.” Stanford corrected her, wanting to at least have that much to say for himself. “Past tense.”

“Love is a force that never truly ends.” Jheselbraum shook her head gently. “Some say it’s the most powerful force in existence. Betrayal from a loved one is more powerful than the same from a stranger, is it not? You do not need to deny that you loved him to prove yourself sane. I used to be quite fond of him myself, in my own way.”

Stanford looked up at her in surprise, his eyes passing over her a second time like he was sizing her up.

“Like a sibling.” Jheselbraum corrected Ford’s assumptions. “Nothing like your relationship, before you ask.”

“Sibling relationships can be complicated.” Stanford offered, remembering his own fraught relationship with Stanley.

Jheselbraum’s lips quirked into what resembled a brief ironic smile. “Quite.”
Jheselbraum took a small sip from her drink and looked out over her dimension, the sunlight hitting the tops of the purple mossy forests, chimes and singing echoing up from the temple below, pink clouds dusting the blue skyline as the sun set. The bubbles hovering on the balcony began to glow now, giving off their own luminescence as night was falling.

It was, for a poignant moment, very peaceful, and Stanford would remember this moment for a long time.

“With relationships like yours.” Jheselbraum eventually said. “Toxic situations that flourish with repeated abuses of trust, it is common for it to take seven times for partners to truly break apart, to break free from the cycle. So do not feel dour or inept for your tendency to defend him. It is not unusual in these circumstances.”

“You’re right though. I shouldn’t be looking to understand him or defend his reasons for doing terrible things. He’s still done them. To others and to me.” Stanford admitted with a sigh.

“How many times have you tried to cut him out of your life? To leave him?” Jheselbraum asked.

Stanford pondered this for a moment, counting the moments down, wondering if any of his attempts counted as leaving Bill truly when he kept ending up right back where he started again. Eventually he had a rudimentary count.

“Six times.” Stanford declared.

With a kindly smile Jheselbraum squeezed Ford’s knee. “Let’s make this last time the final one, shall we?”

Stanford considered this for a moment, considering all he had lost, and the patterns he found himself in, and the long list of things Jheselbraum had listed that he didn’t do for himself anymore. His life had come to revolve around Bill even when he wasn’t with him, and Stanford had always considered himself an independent person. He wondered when this changed.

He didn’t want to be dependant anymore, stuck in a cycle of going back to what was bad for him. He didn’t want to allow this pattern of returning to Bill fashion him into the very image of madness, repeating the same experiment over and over again and expecting a different result.

Certainly, things may change, but Bill wouldn’t.

“Yes. Let’s.”

“To ending it.” Jheselbraum raised her glass of cosmic sand in a toast, and Stanford mirrored her, raising his own beverage and touching the glass to hers.

“To ending everything. Once and for all.”

Stanford tipped back his glass and took a generous gulp and Jheselbraum watched him, her seven eyes burning satisfaction at him over the rim of her glass, while she drank barely anything at all.

Laying on his back alongside the gem encrusted rim of the pool, Stanford Pines dangled his fingers through the rainbow water and then held his wet hand up in front of his face, watching the iridescence glisten on the whorls of his fingerprints.

The night air was peaceful around him, the hum of nightly hymns cascading up onto the balcony, and the bubbles floating in the air around him gleamed a soft light that felt as surreal as it was comforting.

He felt so relaxed right now.

That was some damn good Cosmic Sand.

“Wow.” Stanford said, the first thing he’d said for several minutes, as he spent a great deal of time just now examining his hand in silence, watching the light ripple and frame the objects around him like he was gazing upon a masterpiece.

“Wow indeed.” Jheselbraum said dryly, looking down at him with an air of frustrated amusement hinting in the undertones of her voice. “You say this isn’t the first time you’ve drank cosmic sand, yet you’re handling it like a novice.”

“It must have been watered down.” Stanford responded, still tilting his hand to watch the water catch the light with every shift of movement. “To – to make the bartender more money. That sort of thing makes sense on Meccai. You know, I’ve never felt more aware of my molecules in my entire life.”

The dignified and vaunted Jheselbraum let out a derisive snort of laughter, although she seemed just as surprised by the lapse in dignity as anyone, her hand coming up to cover her mouth rapidly.

Stanford didn’t notice though. He was still too enthralled by his hands. Having six fingers really was a novelty, especially when they all caught the light so well.

“There are so many of them, and so much is happening inside my body all at once. All these different processes, millions of stimuli firing off constantly. This really is just a fraction of what he feels all the time.”

“Don’t fool yourself into believing he feels anything at all.” Jheselbraum composed herself, correcting Stanford’s assumption immediately. “It’s all an act.”

“No, it isn’t.” Stanford argued, speaking like he was merely stating a fact. “He showed me once.”

“I’m sure he described a very pretty fiction.” Jheselbraum said dismissively, taking another small sip from her cup.

“No, I mean he actually showed me.” Stanford corrected her, closing eyes with a self-assured smile, missing the surprised look on The Oracle’s face. “He let me look through his eye. It was quite the experience. His existence is quite overwhelming, and so much can happen in the blink of an eye. I saw many things I hadn’t seen before, all while still on earth.”

“What did you see?” Jheselbraum asked, Stanford missing the suspicion on her face with his eyes closed.

Stanford hummed contentedly, the Cosmic Sand enabling his recollection to be a pleasant curiosity rather than a bittersweet remembrance.

“I can place some of the locations now I think. First there was the nightmare realm. Then Inner Meccai. I saw the Hourglass Nebula and it saw me as well. There was a garden, outside of a huge brick building that was constantly shifting and changing. An empty beach, all purple sand and green water. Lottocron 9. Some sort of satellite city on the edge of a dead planet, with a borealis above it. I saw a cratered orange planet with a large blue moon, I think it must have been Taronja quite possibly. The Cryptix Noire. The Infinitentiary. A world of fire. I saw here briefly, now that I come to think about it. And the last thing I saw was a cave. A huge black cave cut into a planet. It looked like an obsidian geode.”

Stanford opened his eyes to look at Jheselbraum and saw that she looked notably shaken by the locations he described, possibly shocked by the scope of how much Bill could see in the blink of an eye.

“He showed you that? All of it?”

“Just for a split second.” Stanford shrugged as he answered, like it was no big deal. “Once I was in his head he let me take the reigns so to speak, and I just kept blinking non-stop. It’s not like I’d get an opportunity to see all of that just any day, I wanted to make the most of it. To see everything.”

“He let you –“ Jheselbraum still seemed shocked, although now her intrigue was winning out and she was leaning forward, sitting on the edge of her seat by the pool, looking at Stanford with interest now. “You’ve seen so much. You could provide details. The world on fire, what do you remember of it? Where there any distinguishing details? Any shapes, places?”

“Just fire.” Stanford answered, surprised by her zeal.

“I’ve always been dying to know what happened to his dimension, and there’s a chance that you’ve seen more of it than anyone in the multiverse. You have no idea what I’d do to find out what happened there. To see what you’ve seen.”

“I thought you said I shouldn’t care about what happened in Bill’s past.” Stanford sat up onto his elbows, frowning at the Oracle. “That it didn’t matter?”

“Of course, it doesn’t matter.” Jheselbraum faltered, before remembering her poise, sitting back rather than looming over Stanford zealously. “It’s just curiosity, that’s all. You should disregard what you’ve seen, unless you can use it in your favour.”

“I’ll try. Do you know some of the places I saw but can’t name? There might be something there I can use in my favour, something I don’t understand yet.” Stanford asked, sitting up properly now, crossing his legs beneath him.

Jheselbraum pursed her lips before contemplating, tapping her finger to her chin.

“The brick building would be what Bill calls his Quadrangle of Quonfusion. It’s his stronghold in the nightmare realm, impervious to invasion, as the rooms and hallways are constantly changing. Stepping foot inside the Quadrangle without Bill’s explicit permission is tantamount to losing yourself in his maze forever.”

That sounded grim, but adrift in the haze of cosmic sand induced gaiety Stanford felt like this was all quite novel, like gathering information for an epic game of D & D & More D. Whatever he could learn would benefit him for his final assault on Bill.

“The purple beach would be the home planet of the Amaphabons. Nearly all of its inhabitants were slaughtered by Bill and his cronies in an attempt to draw the great axolotl’s ire. No doubt why it was so empty when you gazed upon it.” Jheselbraum continued. “You would have met some Amaphabon refugees in the temple here. I collected them when their society was at risk and embraced them to our cause. They have greater reason than many to work against Bill’s evil, although that could be said for anyone living here in this dimension.”

“It’s funny.” Stanford began, picking up straight away from Jheselbraum’s censorial glance that him positing something ‘funny’ right after her tale of displacement and genocide would not be well received, but he continued his train of thought anyway, his inebriation convincing him it was a good idea. “In a way, you almost have Bill to thank for this gathering of allies you’ve amassed. Like a symbiotic relationship. We have quite a few of those on earth you see, and its when the smaller weaker creature benefits from –”

“I know what a symbiotic relationship is.” Jheselbraum snapped, cutting him off. “However I do not have ANY relationship with Cipher, nor am I the weaker creature.”

“But you’ve built your society up from the dregs of his attacks. The more people he displaces, the more recruits you have. You can’t deny there’s a correlation.” Stanford foolishly argued.

Jheselbraum seemed to stop and force herself to take a deep breath here, reigning back her temper as it strained to burst out. Eradicating this frustrating human was becoming more tempting with every passing moment of impudence, yet it was clear from all that Bill had shown him that Stanford Pines was important to the triangle. He’d been inside his head, he knew more about Bill than Jheselbraum did in some ways, and he clearly would play a seminal role in taking Bill down due to those factors, but it was how gratingly similar he could be to Bill that had Jheselbraum itching to knock him into the pool and hold him under the water until he stopped twitching.

Pulling herself together again, Jheselbraum answered smoothly. “I would call that cause and effect more than correlation, wouldn’t you?”

Stanford shrugged, and drummed his fingers against his calves, still watching Jheselbraum attentively. Or as attentive as he could be while absolutely hammered.

“The satellite city you saw may benefit you.” Jheselbraum added, steering the conversation back to the matter at hand. “It sounds like it may be Artisanal Logos, a commerce hub built up around the ruins of Central Logos. There is a lawyer who resides there who, it is rumoured, holds a loophole that can free a person from one of Cipher’s onerous deals completely. If you’ve any lingering stipulations that prevent you from attacking Cipher directly, or conspiring to end him, it may be worth your while to present your case to Mr Loophole and see if he can sever those final ties between the two of you, once and for all.”

“We did have a deal.” Stanford nodded, tilting his head to consider it. “I’m not sure it prevents me from acting against him though. If it were restrictive like that I’m sure I would have noticed by now.”

“What was your deal?” Jheselbraum asked, blinking her seven eyes at Stanford curiously.

Stanford laughed awkwardly and looked away at the surface of the pool, his cheeks heating up with embarrassment.

“It’s not relevant. It won’t interfere with what we’re trying to do.”

“But don’t you want to break it? To cut the last remaining tie you have to him? To rid yourself of him completely?” Jheselbraum pressed expectantly.

Stanford chose to study the water instead of providing Jheselbraum with a direct answer.

It was daunting, to break his deal with Bill, the deal that seemed so beneficial to him at the time it was made. The deal ensured that Stanford would never be alone, but Bill’s company was no longer as reassuring as it once was, and he couldn’t keep justifying going back to the God. There was something that had become familiar and reassuring about having the God in the back of his mind, and severing that final link seemed like a point of no return to Ford, while everything he had done thus far seemed at least somewhat redeemable.

Studiously ignoring Jheselbraum’s attempts to pry, studying the water, Stanford rubbed a hand through the stubbly growth on his head, and was surprised when his concerted scrutiny of the water revealed something new to him amidst the iridescent swirls.

“What happened to my hair?”

“Well, it’s not there anymore. That’s generally what happens when you shave it.” The Oracle retorted dryly.

“No, I mean – the colour.” Stanford reiterated, puzzled by his own reflection.

“Is it not natural for older humans to have grey hair? You are approaching sixty, Stanford. What did you expect?”

“I just –“

He realised why his reflection felt so jarringly wrong. His hair wasn’t growing back its customary auburn and when he realised why he suddenly looked sufficiently senior the epiphany threw him a loop.

“It’s true. With me in your head you won’t have a single grey hair. That’s the sort of longevity you get from sharing headspace with a God. You thought you weren’t getting any perks from this arrangement?”

“He really is gone then, isn’t he? From my head I mean. The metal plate worked.” Stanford realised, stunned by this.

“There is a chance he could still use his dominion over dreams to contact you, however he would no longer have the ability to lurk there while you’re conscious, nor would he be able to take possession of your body again with the plate installed. That was the intended use, although if grey hair is the only side effect we should count ourselves lucky.” Jheselbraum remarked.

Stanford was still processing this change, his ability to adapt to the realisation somewhat stilted by the amount of cosmic sand he’d imbibed. It was slowly dawning on him that, deal or no deal, he had found a way to cut Bill out of his mind, and the decision to do so was utterly permanent.

Unlike getting his deal dissolved by a lawyer, Stanford couldn’t ever change his mind and come back asking for a new deal with Bill to let him into his head. The metal plate was absolute. It was implanted into his skull now, shielding his thoughts through and through. There was no way he could undo what he had done, barring slicing his head open, and that didn’t seem like the sort of thing he could safely do anywhere but here.

Unlike his dramatic separation on the Bibliosphere there was no going back from this. He had cut Bill off, for good this time.

Without the option to go back and waver along that line of indecision, the only way for Stanford to move was forward, and as hard as that seemed, it was much easier to comprehend now that he’d effectively burned the bridges behind him.
“He really is gone.” Stanford repeated, and then huffed a hysterical laugh, cradling his head in disbelief.

Stanford’s laughter petered off into relief, and when that wild whoop of frightening freedom wore off, he looked up at Jheselbraum’s face, her features baring understanding in all seven of her eyes.

“We’re not free of him yet. Not truly.” She said solemnly, before her lips turned up at the edges slightly. “However, I have seen a path towards such freedom.”

“Would that have anything to do with my destiny?” Stanford probed eagerly, that old familiar fervour filling him once more. It was rekindling, that belief that he was destined to do great things, and he was sitting in the presence of an Oracle, the most qualified person to verify this for him. “You mentioned speak of destiny before. Just recently.”

“I did indeed.” Jheselbraum nodded and leaned closer to Stanford. “You will be instrumental in the strike. There is a very special part to play for you. I have devised a plan for a weapon that is strong enough to dispatch Bill once and for all, and I need you to gather its components from across the galaxy and assemble it.”

“So I’m building a weapon? That’s my destiny?” Stanford raised his eyebrow, taking that in. “Well that’s not much different from building the portal, really, is it?”

“The portal was not yours to wield, however the difference here is that you will build this weapon and deliver the killing blow yourself.” Jheselbraum divulged, her central blue eye gleaming brightly, her fervour contagious almost. “You are needed Stanford Pines. Needed to blot out the stain of Bill Cipher’s existence before he devastates the entire multiverse leaving only fire and destruction in his wake. You are called by a crucial destiny to become what you were always meant to be. You are involved in a great prophecy.”

“The zodiac spell in the cave?” Stanford questioned, trying to piece this all together. His hand was in the spell’s circle, the six fingered symbol the same as the one adorning his journals.

“More than that. I have seen it.” Jheselbraum reached down, her hands cupping either side of Stanford’s face for emphasis, her central eye glowing azure and true. “You have the face of the man who kills Bill Cipher.”

Stanford was stunned, taking that in.

It seemed like something nearly impossible, but The Oracle said it with such intensity that Stanford couldn’t help but believe it was true. Maybe that was the power of prophecy, true prophecy. When divulged, everything suddenly clicked into place. The stars aligned, the world made sense, and every setback and failure plaguing Stanford’s life all pointed him in the direction of what he was meant to do.

Of course, he was meant to be the one to kill Bill Cipher. He had to be the one to do it, the only one who could do it. Thinking back on all that had passed between them, all the heartache and harm and danger Bill had put him through, thinking on Bill’s weaknesses, how he alone had been shown these weaknesses, it all made sense.

Of course, he should be the one to kill him. It seemed only fair, that after Stanford’s long journey the answer was the one that should have presented itself to him in the first place. He had to end Bill, to destroy him. He was the only person in the universe who understood exactly what and who he was, and why he needed to be stopped, and it would be bittersweet but exactly the right thing for Stanford to take Bill’s life from him, after Bill had taken so much from Stanford as well.
Bill had taken his future from him, it was only fair that Stanford did the same.

Rather than the prospect of killing Bill seeming like an abstract impossibility, now that Stanford knew the Oracle had seen it happen and had a plan for a weapon that could accomplish the task, his hope was renewed. He could live a life free from Bill’s influence, free from his influence on the people around Ford. He could learn to trust again, learn to live again, learn to be free of these constant thoughts of Bill that plagued him every waking and sleeping moment.

It was the checkmate that he was waiting for, and this time he wouldn’t be blundering into it.

He’d be charging towards it, with both eyes open. No more running.

“How do I do it?” Stanford blurted out eagerly, reflecting Jheselbraum’s fervour in the back of his blue grey eyes.

“You will collect the components to build a quantum destabiliser to disintegrate Bill’s form on a molecular level, and when the device is complete you will return to the Nightmare Realm and stop Armageddon.” Jheselbraum said with a smile, delighting in Ford’s zeal.

Releasing his head and leaning back, she stood and walked over to the counter on the edge of the balcony, grabbing a piece of paper. In her hand it looked like a palm card, but it would need to be folded several times over to fit in Stanford’s pockets.

“I have written down instructions and coordinates for where you will find the parts needed to build the destabiliser, and when it is complete you will rendezvous with some of my agents who will outfit you with further weaponry, in case it is needed. I have chosen your path carefully, so that you may still find the answers you seek, while reaffirming your choice to stand against him.”

Handing him the paper, Jheselbraum looked down at Stanford as he got to his feet, drying his feet on the nearby towel and rolling his trousers back down before standing to face her, holding his hand out for the paper.

“I imagine by now it is clear what must be done, but just to rid you of any lingering doubt you will see for yourself what you will be stopping.”

“I know what I’ll be stopping.” Stanford accepted the paper Jheselbraum passed him, along with all he had been charged to do. “I’m not trying to excuse him anymore. Bill is a monster.”

“So, he is.” Jheselbraum’s serious expression stretched into a sly smile. “It’s so nice to finally meet someone with whom I can see eye to eye with on this issue.”

Stanford smiled back at her, although his smile didn’t hit the same tone hers did. There was something hiding behind her smile that Stanford couldn’t fully comprehend.

“Shall we have a toast? To your success? Another drink?”

She was already turning around, back to the bar, preparing another hefty refill of his glass of cosmic sand.

“I still have questions.” Stanford replied, unable to see what she was doing up at the bar.

“And they will be answered. Perhaps we should take this inside and have our drinks there. It’s getting quite late. You can put your shoes on.”

Ushered into re-dressing, Stanford obliged, still wanting the answers to his questions. Without waiting for him, Jheselbraum walked through the curtained archway leading back into her room, holding both drinks in her hands.

Ford tugged his boots on, threw his coat over his shoulder, and hurried to follow her.

She sat on her large chaise lounge, holding her drink daintily, and lowered Ford’s drink down to him, holding it out for him until he accepted it.

“About the things Bill showed me—” Stanford started.

“A toast!” Jheselbraum interrupted him. “To the man who saved the world. To you, Stanford Pines.”

She raised her glass, and Stanford did the same, politeness dictating he take a gracious sip of his beverage as she did. Stanford didn’t notice Jheselbraum merely wetting her lips against the brew, watching him with calculating eyes.

When he finished his large sip, Ford exhaled a breath, before continuing on with his train of thought.

“About the obsidian cave. Do you know what it was? Who lives there? It felt like someone was watching me when I saw it.”

Jheselbraum smiled, although the smile looked a little blurry to Ford, and he absently wondered if there was steam from the pool fogging up his glasses. The room seemed to be tilting, and as swept up in Cosmic Sand as he was, that didn’t seem as unnerving as it should have been.

He just saw slivers of Jheselbraum’s smile as the fog grew thicker, smothering his vision, pulling him into unconsciousness.

“Oh yes. I know who lives there.” She replied, and the world was growing darker. “And he’s always watching. In fact, he’s likely watching us right now.”

Ford hit the ground with a thud.

Jheselbraum looked down at his unconscious form and the smile slid from her face, unimpressed disdain taking its place.

Reaching into the sleeve of her robe she withdrew her remote and pressed a button, and within a few seconds Oestia stepped into the room from a side door near the leg of the chaise lounge.

“Did you get what you needed from the human, Mistress?” Oestia asked.

“Certainly, many things that were not known to me before. However, nothing else of importance will come from this man. He knows nothing of the fire.” Jheselbraum curled her lip and waved at Ford’s body.

“Wrap him in his garments with the supplies we’ve prepared for him and port him out of here, near to the closest transport hub. I have set him on his path. He can take it from here.”

“Is he really going to kill Bill Cipher for you, O’ Venerable One?” Oestia questioned curiously, hurrying to manoeuvre Stanford into his coat.

“He will.” Jheselbraum answered. “Or he’ll die trying. Either way he serves my purpose.”

Oestia paused while picking Stanford up off the floor, looking somewhat perturbed by that, and when Jheselbraum registered Oestia’s hesitation she turned her glowing blue eye to Oestia, exuding waves of calm and reassurance to the soldier with a purposefully saintly smile.

“Do not worry child. He is not only serving a use to me. This is the will of the axolotl.”

Out in the vast expanse of space, amidst a cradle of stars, the Great Axolotl’s gills twitched in irritation, but, like all things, the moment passed, and the God slumbered ever on.

Purple sand and green waves lapping at the shore set an idyllic scene, Pyronica lounging on a sunbed with a cocktail, and Bill hovering beside her doing the same. If not for the blue flames dancing on the water’s surface you’d think this peaceful paradise was being treasured for what it was, instead of the land bearing the brunt of Bill’s latest tantrum.

“Do you feel better now?” Pyronica turned on her sunbed to look at Bill, lowering her white rimmed sunglasses to eye off the triangle.

“I feel slightly less murderous.” Bill replied, keeping his own sunglasses up, a straw poking up underneath them as he continued to sip his drink with his eye-mouth.

The sunglasses were completely unnecessary as the light from the nearest star wouldn’t harm either of them, but they added a sense of whimsy that was sorely needed at this point.

“Is that because we already murdered everyone here?” Pyronica clarified, waggling her eyebrow humorously.

“There’s no point feeling murderous in a place where you can’t murder anyone, is there?” Bill countered flippantly.

“Feel like a change of scenery?” Py suggested with a grin.

“No.” Bill said after a thoughtful pause. “I think this is good.”

“What are you thinking?” Pyronica probed, still watching her friend closely, Bill slurping the last of his drink up through the straw.

“I think…” Bill seemed to inhale a sigh, before exhaling, the lingering tension leaking out of him like a dam breaking. “I think I’m going to try again.”

“Bill.” Pyronica moaned, her bottom lip jutting out, clearly displeased with this conclusion.

“Just one more time. Just one last – it’s just that - I could have handled that better Py. I maybe didn’t mean it, he probably didn’t mean it – I mean, he knows how to lie now and I taught him that trick. He’s probably just mad that I burned his dumb books.”

“You’re going to go back and he’s going to yell at you, and you’re going to blow up all over again.” Pyronica pointed out. “You should have just killed him last time and you wouldn’t be having this conversation right now.”

“Killing him is taking the easy way out Py, and if I haven’t done that yet why should I do it now? No, you’ll see. He wants good Bill, then he’ll get good Bill. He’s easy to manage when he thinks he’s getting what he wants. I just need to approach this calmly and give him a proper explanation and he’ll get over his whole ‘you’re a monster’ phase and realise what he really wants. You’ll see.”

“So, you’re what? Going to go explain away to him why you burned up his dumb books and he’ll forgive you just like that?” Pyronica asked bluntly.

“I’m going to explain everything. He wants the truth, he can have the whole story. From the beginning. And then he’ll understand.”

“You’re going to tell him everything?” Pyronica sat up straight on her sunbed, pushing her sunglasses up onto her forehead now, shocked. “Like, everything everything?”

“I have to find him first.” Bill said, discarding his empty drink with a wave of his hand and pushing his own sunglasses up away from his eye. “He’s not been sleeping and he’s getting much better at not being found, so it’ll take more than a few wanted posters and a vague reward this time. I’m going to have to find his exact location and meet him in person, lay it all out on the table for him once and for all.”

“You don’t mean you’re going to –“ Pyronica was already shaking her head, perturbed at the very thought of it.

“I have to.” Bill nodded, and threw his sunglasses onto the beach, discarding them to reveal his somewhat bloodshot eye.

“It’s time to go suck up to my old teacher.”

In an obsidian cave in the Dimension of Eternal Night, the ancient being Argus Panoptes heaved a sigh as he watched several occurrences play out across his expansive vision, only half-heartedly looking at the millennia of occurrences he was able to see.

He’d lost the will to look centuries ago, finding the constant squabbles of a multi-verse of beings tiring, their wars and feuding a disenchancing reminder of how some things never change. Seeing the same patterns repeated over and over again made seeing the universe feel less like a wondrous gift and more like being stuck on the couch, watching TV, with a billion channels to choose from, yet every show has the same tired plot repeating itself in reruns where ever you look. The time when he was invested in the world was when he had respect enough for his sight to teach others to see, and since his students had disappointed him so thoroughly, well…

He didn’t seek out things to view anymore, but sometimes he couldn’t help the visions when they came to him. Like prophecies, they usurped his mind most rudely, while he was trying very hard not to see anything at all.

Sucking in a sharp breath, inhaling one of the lingering eye bats in the process, Argus Panoptes let his most recent vision roll over him, and when it finally ceased, he exhaled the eye bat with a large sigh.

“The exact time and date of my death, huh?” Argus grumbled to himself, plucking an eye bat out of the air and throwing it back into his mouth, crunching it between his teeth. “Never thought I’d see the day come, personally, but it’s about damn time. He taught me that trick too. What a pity.”

Standing up, his movements shaking the entire crystalline cave, he trudged from his current resting place towards his inner sanctum, where he kept his few possessions. The ones he hadn’t eaten or destroyed that is.

Picking up a slab of obsidian that he had placed face down on what could have been a mantlepiece in this empty room carved into the rock, Argus turned the slab over and ran his eyeball covered fingertips over what was etched on the rock. A childish picture, burned by laser point into the black crystal, of a happy looking triangle surrounded by eye bats. At the bottom of the slab the picture was signed by the artist, four letters scrawled in chicken-scratch scribble, tugging at Argus’ heartstrings, even now.

“Don’t know why I didn’t see this coming.” He murmured, blinking his many eyes at the drawing. “Maybe I missed something along the way, something that could have prevented this. God knows the kid wasn’t always a killer.”

Moving to sit down at the carved stone table in the centre of the room, Panoptes closed the majority of his eyes wearily, before reluctantly opening them again, actively choosing to look in the one place he might find answers, and some semblance of understanding as to why his student was going to kill him.

He opened his eyes and looked into the past.

“I think I should know before I die. I think I should know what happened to Bill Cipher.”

Chapter End Notes

Thank you for your patience folks. I worked on this for two months and got one person assuming the fic is abandoned lmao, so I personally don’t think my turnover for 60+ page chapters is too bad. To that person, do not be shocked when this story continues to update, because it will until I explicitly say otherwise. This chapter is dedicated to you hahaha!

I hope folks enjoyed Jhieselbraum’s chapter. She is a very interesting character imo, and she makes some valid points about blindly forgiving or excusing Bill of his crimes, but she also has her own agenda which is fun. I’m curious to see what people think about her, and what exciting comments you write. I am having fun writing the next chapter too, finally getting to weave that deep Bill lore (or at least my take on it). So stay hype for the next chapter, which will have grumpy old giants, competitive and charitable circumstances, and our understanding of Bill comes full circle.
Sometimes when I'm lonely I sit and think about him. And it hurts to remember all the good times when I thought I could never live without him. And I wonder does it have to be the same? Every time when I see him, will it bring back all the pain?

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

When Stanford came to, he found himself in a different dimension entirely, passed out on a bench by an interdimensional bus stop, nursing a headache and a powerful hangover. An elderly amphibian was sitting on the bench beside him, an appropriate distance away, reading a newspaper while waiting for the bus.

Groaning as he righted himself, Stanford noticed a brand new dimensional translator on his wrist, equipped with dimensional navigation and GPS. There was a message beeping on the screen of the wristband.

_The plans are in your pocket. Good luck, destined hero._

_J._

Patting the pockets of his trench coat Stanford rifled through his belongings, finding a large folded piece of paper that wasn’t there before.

“Quantum destabiliser … assemble the pieces … destiny unfolds in the Nightmare Realm – ugh.” Stanford mumbled, squinting at the page. “What did I sign up for?”

Looking between his tech wristband and the sign on the edge of the bus stop now, Stanford tried to figure out where he was. He wasn’t in Dimension 52 anymore, that was for sure.

“You must’ve had some night, huh?” The geriatric salamander wheezed in a friendly way, looking over his newspaper at Stanford.

Ford blinked and looked over at the man, surprised this stranger was speaking to him. Most of the creatures he encountered in the multiverse chose not to speak to him, and that suited him just fine. Judging from the pale glassy look of the salamander’s eyes he didn’t have the best vision, perhaps that was why he couldn’t discern enough of Stanford to discriminate.

“I used to be a party-lizard back in the day myself. Hoo boy, those days are behind me now, I tell you.” Continued the old man.

Stanford supposed his party days would theoretically be behind him now, considering he was approaching sixty and finally had the grey hair to match, but he wasn’t quite ready to feel his age just yet.

He couldn’t remember much of his time with Jheselbraum last night, to be honest. There was a point in the evening where he just blacked out entirely, but rather than admit he couldn’t hold his spectral liquor Stanford preferred to believe that he was as spritely as this old lizard seemed to infer. Partying all night long was much more favourable than passing out after two stiff drinks.

“Not much for conversation, are ya? Must be some hangover you got.” Pressed the lizard in a
Looking back down to the construction itinerary Jheselbraum had outlined for him, Stanford strained to figure out how much he could remember from last night. He knew they had some helpful discussions about Bill, and how to stop him. They’d formulated a plan to take him down. The Oracle had told him about his destiny, that he was destined to take Bill down himself. His face was the last thing Bill would see.

It was all very encouraging after so much uncertainty, to have a purpose like this again, and for it to make so much sense to him. Everything he’d gone through seemed to be for a reason now that he knew what he must do. Jheselbraum’s prediction had validated all the things Stanford was agonising over, reiterated his moral high ground in slighting Bill, over and over. It was really very freeing, being absolved of guilt like this.

Now Stanford’s compulsion to find out about Bill’s past had lessened greatly. He had no need to look for things to pardon Bill, when he was not to serve as Bill’s defender. He was to be his judge, jury and executioner now, and that role felt far less subjective when told through the eyes of another.

Scanning Jheselbraum’s instructions, Stanford could see she’d left him at this particular bus stop because it ran directly to an interdimensional interchange, and from there he was to go on to Federation Port Kaitz to source materials for the destabiliser.

Skimming through the rest of the plan, Stanford realised there was one thing Jheselbraum left out of the itinerary, perhaps something she hadn’t deemed necessary for his journey. Stanford was curious to see it through though, and it was with that in mind that he turned to the elderly lizard sitting beside him and asked.

“You wouldn’t happen to know how to get to Artisanal Logos, would you?”

While he was by nature, an observer, Argus Panoptes was not an observant man. Pay too close attention to the details happening in the world, and it only served to leave the giant embittered and miserable. So many of his eyes were wilfully blind, as it was just too painful to go on knowing all with any compassion in one’s heart.

Regretfully, Argus always had that sliver of compassion jammed within his ventricles, and he’d had it for as long as he could remember, all the way back to the garden where his only charge was a girl the gods wanted too much. It was why he chose to remain a hermit, why he chose to remain alone, a feared being. Fewer people could manipulate that sliver of compassion when they didn’t know it existed.

Hiding one’s compassion was hardly an effusive way to live one’s life, however, and Argus remembered he wasn’t always like this, miserable and alone.

Many centuries ago, Argus Panoptes had fewer eyes than he had now, but still a great deal too many. What his past self lacked in eyeballs, he made up for in company.

“Really, it’s about time you got back into the swing of things.” Polyphemus said, sitting at the large obsidian table in Argus Panoptes’ crystalline cave, feeling the bumps on the top of his playing cards, sharing an afternoon cup of wine with his friend.

It was happy hour in the dimension of eternal night, which could technically be any hour really, as there was no sunlight to mark the passage of time, but that didn’t matter to either of the giants. Happy hour was happy in the loose sense of the term, of course, as both giants were generally considered to be miserable sods. Polyphemus had no eye to see with, so clocks and sundials had no relevance to him, and Argus Panoptes, while blessed with many eyes, never cared one jot about being on time for anything.

“Taking on a student is exactly what you need.” Polyphemus continued. “You’ve been a miserable depressed bastard for too long, cut off from the world –”

“Purposefully.” Argus interjected, but his friend continued as if he had said nothing at all.

“And what better method to regain a savage blow to the confidence after losing the little nymph than by bullying some twerps into doing whatever you want them to? I’m really quite proud of you, you know.”

“I don’t need your pride.” Argus replied, flicking through his cards, measuring his play. “And don’t make this out like it’s anything other than what it was. A moment of weakness. Just you watch, I’ll regret this decision within the next hour, you mark my words.”

“Well the advertisement’s already been up on EntropiCraig’s-list for a month so there’s no use whining about it now. When some ingrate shows up at your door, you’ll either have to teach them or eat them.” Polyphemus said gruffly.

“That is if they get to the door in the first place. You see, I set a series of impossible tasks in the advertisement, for all prospective students, to dissuade the gullible. By the time some fool scales hysteria peak, or steals me a thousand pairs of eyes with their bare hands, or bathes in the skin of an acidic bloatfish, they’ll have likely reconsidered, given up and gone home, and everyone goes away happier.”

“You’re never happy, a miserable old bastard through and through, you know that?” Polyphemus pointed out.

“Most students never even get to the door, spooked by the illusion in the cave.”

“It’s never bothered me.” Polyphemus retorted.

“That’s because you’re already an eyeless lump. It’d be like looking in the mirror.” Argus snorted a laugh.

“I remember mirrors. Always bumped into them though, no depth perception with just one eye.” Polyphemus remarked, before he set his cards face down. “Got any threes?”

“You don’t even have any threes. Are you sure you know how to play this game, or do I need to remind you again?” Panoptes scoffed, leaning his elbows on the table.

“Look at you, trying to teach already. The apprentices will love you.”

“Well, I’d rather teach nobody.” Panoptes retorted with a huff, setting his cards down on the table and taking a sip of his tankard of wine.

“I wouldn’t if I were you. Nobody’s an asshole.” Polyphemus laughed, before patting the table until he found his tankard, lifting it in a gentle toast, taking a sip as well.

In that moment, both giants’ affable laughter was all that could be heard echoing through the caverns that wove through the obsidian planet, and things were as they should be. Simple, contented, uncomplicated.

They continued to play their card game, switching to dominos as it became apparent that Polyphemus had no idea what he was doing, and Argus Panoptes felt unburdened and happy, a nice change of pace for him.

An echo of the shrieking of the eye bats bounced off the cavern walls, drawing Argus from his game for a moment, annoyance colouring his features, before abruptly the shrieking stopped.

Polyphemus raised his head at that, listening intently.

“They’re not very good guard dogs are they. Why did they stop?”

Argus shrugged, refusing to extend his eye to go look. He was less inclined to flex his talents as of late, as it had only revealed misery to him, but refusing to look to see who was at the door was just pure laziness.

“Do you think it’s a prospective student?”

“I bloody hope not.” Argus fiddled with his dominos, before looking out into the carved hallway again.

“Perhaps they petrified the intruder?” Suggested Polyphemus.

Both giants were still for a while longer, listening as the silence broke once more, the eye bats now trilling giddily, cooing in a way Argus didn’t often hear. They didn’t seem to be bringing any petrified bodies down the tunnel to present to Argus, so he had no choice but to go investigate.

“I’ll take care of this. You wait there. Don’t look at my tiles.”

“Ha ha, very funny.” Polyphemus said, as if he hadn’t been reaching for Argus’ dominos in that very moment.

Thundering along the cavernous hallway littered with the trophies and tributes of the past, in the direction of the noise, Argus’ footsteps rattled the ground, seismic stomping signalling his imminent approach.

If the intruder wasn’t adequately spooked by the eye bats, or the obsidian illusion, Argus’ arrival ought to do the trick. Only a fool or an idiot would linger when faced with his approach. A wise coward would flee.

Yet as he rounded the corner, out into the alcove where his eye bats were stationed, the old giant saw something that surprised him.

His eye bats were crowding around a small glowing polygon, their wings flapping, their eyes closing gleefully as they nuzzled the smaller creature, who seemed to be petting their eyelids.

The creature in question was a small yellow brick triangle, very small, with black arms and legs dangling out of its edges. It had one wide eye set into his face and wore a small black bowtie upon his bricks, neatly fastened to the mortar. For such a simple creature, he seemed quite expressive, and right now he was clearly having a great time cooing over Argus’ guard dogs.
Despite Argus’ obvious approach, the triangle chose not to acknowledge the giant immediately, fixated, instead repeating ‘who’s a good flying eyeball’ to the eye bat closest to him, who seemed grossly endeared by the affection.

After standing there in the cavern with his arms crossed, his intimidating approach being ignored for a good five minutes, eventually Argus cleared his throat.

“Oh wow. Hi! You must be the eyeball guy!” Observed the triangle giddily, his voice an odd echo of itself, although that didn’t seem to be something he could help.

“The eyeball guy?” Argus repeated flatly.

“They really weren’t kidding.” The triangle laughed.

Argus narrowed his many eyes at the triangle, who stared back openly, blinking his long eyelashes his way. “What a peculiar creature. Alright, who are you and why are you accosting my watch bats?”

“That seems like kind of a redundant question for an all knowing, all seeing being to ask.” The triangle retorted cheerfully.

“I never said I was all knowing.” Argus clarified.

“No, but it’s good press.” The triangle replied with a shrug, going back to scritching the closest eye bat’s eyelid. “You should think about it, Eye Guy. I reckon you could pull it off.”

Argus didn’t know what he was more affronted by, the nickname ‘Eye Guy’ or the fact that this shape seemed utterly unphased by him in all his eyeball covered glory. Running through whatever vague osmosis knowledge he had about shape societies, triangles generally weren’t educated well enough to know about manipulating press and marketing, nor were they ever seen outside of their societies, at the bottom rung of the social ladder more often than not. So to see a triangle, and one so small and young, exploring the universe freely, unphased by the abnormal and bizarre was unheard of to say the least.

Rather than comment on this, Argus decided to act unphased as well, treating the triangle as he would any other prospective student.

“Are you here for the apprenticeship? Because I must say, if you haven’t completed the required tasks and brought me a fitting tribute, you’ll be sent away. Or eaten.” Argus crossed his arms and bared his teeth in a parody of a smile, looking down at the small shape, raising many eyebrows at its diminutive form. “Despite being no bigger than a toothpick.”

“You could choke on a toothpick.” The shape pointed out, its eye curving into a responding smile. “Not the most dignified thing to put on your tombstone, especially if you already paid for it to say ‘he died doing what he loved’. Sounds like eating me would be a waste of your time.”

“So do many things. This conversation included. Have you completed my tasks?”

The shape waved its hand in the air dismissively. “I skimmed through the small print there. Those tasks seemed stupid and unnecessary, not to mention boring. They’re like an idiot filtration system, right? I ignored that stuff and just came straight here. I figure you’ll either teach me or you won’t.”

Argus seemed rather taken aback by that apt observation, and he narrowed some of his eyes at the triangle, trying to place its age. He seemed quite young at first glance, but clearly the being was savvy.
“Well I won’t.” Argus eventually replied, blunt as ever. “Now leave.”

“Nope.” The triangle replied in that same cheerful tone with a brief laugh. “I’m gonna stay until you change your mind.”

“Well I won’t.” Argus argued.

“I think you might.” The triangle shrugged and continued to smile winsomely.

Argus scowled at that, deciding that this facetious creature was clearly angling for a good scare.

Drawing himself up, Argus inhaled deeply before leaning forward, a deafening roar rattling the caverns, the eye bats scattering with fright, one even daring to hide behind the diminutive triangle, but the creature held its ground, staring at Argus all the while.

When Argus finished roaring, the triangle’s eye remained curved into what could only be a smile. It said nothing, merely smiling at the giant, who was unaccustomed to such blatant stubbornness.

Harrumphing, Argus straightened his back, looking down at the triangle.

“You have until I finish my dinner to leave. I want you gone by then, or else I’ll pluck your eye out and eat it. Do you understand?”

Still the triangle said nothing, maintaining unrelenting eye contact with the giant until he had no choice but to lumber away, grumbling all the while.

“Was that a student?” Polyphemus asked when he heard Argus return to the room. “Scare ’em off, did you?”

“That remains to be seen.” Argus grumbled, sliding into his chair once more and checking to see that his friend hadn’t stolen any of his dominos.

“Completed all your impossible tasks, did they?” Polyphemus raised his eyebrow, his hollow eye socket as expressionless as always.

“No. Said they were stupid tasks.” Argus replied, rattled in a way he didn’t want to admit to.

Polyphemus barked out a laugh at that. “Well, there’s no denying that. You wanted to dissuade the gullible, didn’t you? It looks like the first student fate has sent your way is stubborn enough not to fall for your bullshit. Ah, the gods love their irony, don’t they?”

“So they do.” Argus pondered, lacing his fingers together and resting them under his chin, lost in thought.

“Why beat about the bush then? They’re there. You want to teach them, don’t you?” Polyphemus prompted.

“No, I don’t.” Argus answered, his lies lacking tenacity. “I just want to be left alone. I don’t want to teach anyone.”

Looking back on this moment, on this transparent lie, Argus could tell this was when the trouble began. It was all downhill from there.
Stanford had spent the past week travelling to Artisanal Logos, and now he was here he had the perfect opportunity to follow up on the loophole Jheselbraum mentioned in passing.

There was a charity gala hosted in one of the establishments on the busy commerce satellites that orbited the dead planet. Very much a ‘who’s who’ of Artisanal Logos compiled together to bid on expensive things of no real value, in order to effect some charitable good, or so it was presumed.

Sneaking into the gala, having pressed and cleaned the tuxedo that was printed for him when he was Raha’s prisoner, Stanford was trying his best to blend in with the crowd, but the more he tried the more he noticed the divide between the rich and the poor. He may as well have been an entirely different species to these affluent bidders. It was apparent that any one of these moneybags could have funded whatever charitable cause they were bidding over with the loose change in their deep pockets but chose not to do so until such a time as they could be seen doing it. It was all to make themselves look good, and this only made them less appealing in Stanford’s eyes.

Oh well, it wasn’t like he’d be rubbing elbows with them for long.

Spotting his target, Stanford zeroed in to make his play.

“And so really, investing in equities at this point in time, sustainable or not, makes not one jot of difference my boy –“

“Oh, pardon me.” Stanford stepped into the circle of beings gathered around this peculiar figure.

The lawyer, Loophole, looked a lot like if someone knocked a blue figure eight on its side, stuck two eyes, a nose and a moustache onto it, and left it hovering over a floating ball wearing a suit jacket. These things combined to create the illusion of a rather portly rich personality, and the lawyer turned to eye Stanford up and down as he interrupted his ambling speech.

“Are you Messer Loophole, the most renowned contracts lawyer in the galaxy?”

“In several galaxies my boy.” Loophole confirmed, raising an eyebrow at Stanford. “What can I do for you?”

“Well, I was hoping I could discuss a legal matter with you –“

“Within office hours my boy, you’ll have to make an appointment like everybody else.” Loophole cut him off, already turning back to his cohort.

“And I was hoping you could sign a copy of my book!” Stanford blurted out, causing the lawyer to turn around again. “Just briefly, please?”

“Oh very well.” Loophole eventually conceded, flattered, turning around to face Stanford as he began reaching into his pocket. “I have always been a supporter of the arts. Shall we?”

“Perhaps if we come over here for a moment, just while I get it out.” Stanford said, ushering Loophole to float with him over to the corner of the hall, where they could have a private conversation.

Loophole waved his colleagues off, and followed Stanford, while Stanford fiddled with the nano briefcase in his pocket, trying to surreptitiously retrieve the notebook he’d compiled with Bill’s
“Oh, I won’t be signing any first drafts, my boy. Published works only please.” Loophole began as Ford pulled the loosely bound, handwritten sheets from his pocket, but Stanford cut him off, pushing his book towards him and flipping through to the page he had made on deals, and the breaking thereof.

“I don’t need you to sign it, I just need you to listen.” Stanford began hurriedly. “I’ve been told you possess the one perfect loophole out of a deal with Bill Cipher and you need to give it to me. It’s of the utmost importance that I –“

“Oh, it’s about that loophole is it? Well I’m afraid it’s not to just be given out willy nilly, dear fellow. I stand to make a substantial profit from that loophole, and I won’t be able to capitalise on it if I hand it out to just any random stranger who comes begging. There’s a vetting process, and an auction running, and it will continue to run up til a point wherein I feel I am being adequately compensated for my loophole, and that is unlikely to happen for another few centuries, so if you don’t mind.”

Retrieving the page on Bill’s initial body blueprints, Ford shoved the paper in Loophole’s face insistently.

“No look, listen. You need to give it to me. 30 years ago I made him a body, and we were working on a portal, but he was going to –“

“Oh goodness me. This is your work?” Loophole examined the paper, looking impressed and then amused. “Hmm, you’re certainly not what I expected, but I suppose superficial assumptions make fools out of the best of us. Delightful to see the original blueprints up close, of course.”

“You know about this?” Stanford gawked at the lawyer, adjusting his glasses.

“Oh it was a while ago, yes. Can’t tell you the exact date, of course. Client confidentiality and all.” Loophole hummed, twitching his moustache pensively.

With the thought stewing nastily in Ford’s mind that Bill might have known about the brick binding from the beginning thanks to this man, that he could have been playing Ford for a fool the whole time, concocting everything, their relationship, their trust, just to unbind those bricks, his embarrassment and frustration enraged him.
Looking up at the lawyer angrily, Stanford demanded. “You need to give me that loophole. I need it.”

“Well, I’m sorry my boy, but I’m not just going to hand out the most valuable thing in my possession, and you haven’t even offered me anything for it yet.”

“I don’t need to offer you something for it. You wouldn’t have it in the first place if it wasn’t for me!” Stanford growled, frustrated, knowing he had nothing of real value to offer. “You owe me that loophole. If it wasn’t for you, he wouldn’t have been able to manipulate me into –“

“You surely aren’t going to push your own foolishness back onto me now, are you? You must be joking.” Loophole scoffed.

“By withholding that loophole from me, you’re enabling him to get away with countless evils!” Stanford aggrandised. “The deals he’s making – you’re practically aiding and abetting him! That loophole could be saving the universe, and you’re going to sell it to the highest bidder.”

“I certainly am! It’s incredibly valuable.”

“So you just don’t care about the universe, you’re just a soulless, money grubbing, slimy –“

“I’m a lawyer, boy. You can’t guilt me into doing the right thing, I’ve heard it all before. And I’m not about to give in and sell my loophole to some demanding vagabondish fool wearing an old silk weave suit that reeks of fabric renovators and poverty. I think it best you leave, human, lest I call security over to evict you from the establishment immediately. I’m not running a bloody charity.” Loophole said decisively before turning his back on Stanford and walking back over to the socialites in the centre of the hall, ready to bid on another charitable artwork.

Clutching onto his papers, Stanford released his frustration with a huff, his shoulders slumping as  his loophole out of his deal with Bill was denied.

Maybe that’s why Jheselbraum hadn’t included a trip to Artisanal Logos on her itinerary. Maybe she knew this venture was doomed to fail.

On that fateful day, once Polyphemus had packed up and returned home, Argus Panoptes cleaned up his dining room, procrastinating while he dwelled on the possibility of that little shape still sitting out in his hallway, trying not to look into the creature’s circumstances. It would come easily to Argus if he let himself look, but he was trying not to see in that way. He didn’t want to get attached.

Polyphemus was the one who suggested Argus open an apprenticeship spot. Polyphemus said Argus was lonely, that he was worried about him, that he didn’t want his best friend to die alone and miserable in a dingy cave, and that he should at least have some company. Argus suggested Polyphemus could have one of his eyes just so he could poke it out again for him, but the sentiment hit its mark and Argus gave in.

Eventually he couldn’t keep wiping down the same spot of obsidian over and over, so he put his cloth away with a sigh and looked out into the cavernous hallway.
His footsteps shaking the ground as he walked out through the caverns, when Argus arrived in his hallway he leaned against the closest wall, crossing his arms with a sigh.

“You’re still here.” Argus sighed, scowling at the little triangle, sitting in the midst of a cluster of Argus’s eye bats, the creatures cuddling up to the polygon peacefully.

The triangle looked up at Argus expectantly but said nothing.

“Don’t you have a home to go to?” Argus asked scathingly, frustrated by this creature’s persistence.

The triangle still said nothing, but it looked down and to the side, seeming far sadder than a shape with only one eye to express itself with had any right to be. Clearly that was the wrong question to ask. Argus was always a soft touch for a sorry tale, but he was attempting to quash that sticky sliver of compassion, and furrowing his brows, he persisted.

“Well, you should go away anyway. Eternal sight will only make you miserable, you know. It will only disappoint you. Don’t know why you would want to learn it from me in the first place.”

The triangle looked up at Argus again, before answering simply. “I want to fix something, and I don’t know how.”

“What makes you think I know how to fix whatever it is you’re wanting to fix? I’m not a damn carpenter.” Argus grumbled.

“I don’t want you to fix it. I want to fix it.” The shape replied sharply. “I can’t see a way to fix it, but that’s because I can’t see everything yet. There’s something I need to see. I need to know.”

“Know what?” Argus prompted.

“What I need to.” The shape answered evasively.

“And so you want me to teach you to see everything.” Argus surmised, sounding unimpressed. “So you can find someone else who can fix your problem, and then you can squat in their hallways. Look, if you want a referral to your solution, you can pay me my price, I can look for your answer, and then you can leave.”

“I’m skipping the referral.” The triangle said brusquely, the irritation flashing red across his bricks. “I just told you I don’t want you to fix it.”

“And what makes you think you can do what I do? That you have the aptitude to see? You’ve only got one bloody eye.” Argus pointed out, somewhat unkindly.

“You don’t know what I can do.” The triangle shot back. “I can do lots of things.”

“Ah, accomplished, are you? Some puffed up over-achiever? A scholar, from a far off land? And you’ve decided to add far-sight to your considerable resume? Is that it?” Argus squinted several of his eyes at the shape, who seemed unphased by his hostility, instead granting Argus a very sly look.

“Well I figure why pay for milk when you can buy the cow.” At that the shape seemed to waggle its brow at Panoptes, alluding to his still somewhat fresh failure at protecting Io. Argus had presumed this triangle was but a child, but he was playing him like a master. He growled low in his throat.

“You beseech me to teach you, and then you insult me with my failures? Tell me, what exactly do you think you’ll gain from this?”

“Far-sight.” The shape answered simply before shrugging. “I have nothing left to lose and nowhere left to go. So, it’s all uphill from here.”

Argus was thrown by this, not expecting the creature’s glib brevity to be laced with sincerity like so. As much as he wanted to hate this irritating being and send them away from here, their attitude was tweaking that compassion Argus tried so desperately to smother.

If he were a strong man, he would do just that right now, banish the creature and ignore that niggling sympathy, but he was weak to the suffering of young people.

Hating himself for it, Argus caved slightly, giving the triangle an in.

“Do you have a tribute for me? If you’ve decided so rudely to bypass my trials.”

“Uhh.” The triangle looked around the cavern for a moment, as if deliberating what he could give Argus that would satisfy him, before he clicked his fingers and summoned a tall black hat from thin air, levitating it over to the giant. “You can have this. Apart from me it’s the only thing left from my dimension. Used to belong to the head honcho. I guess you could call it a collector’s item. That’s gotta be valuable, right?”

For a moment, Argus thought he saw the triangle look somewhat panicked when the giant closed his hand around the hat, examining it, which only reconfirmed it’s worth. Despite acting blasé, clearly the shape did not wish to part with it, which made it a valuable tribute.

“It will do.” Argus kept the hat clutched in his hand and looked back at the triangle expectantly. “You have a name, do you?”

The triangle blinked at Argus for a moment, before responding. “Bill is good. Call me Bill.”

“Well Bill. I feel it is my duty to tell you that the level of far-sight I offer to teach is as much of a burden as it is a boon. It is a curse, and I tried to get it advertised on the curse section of EntropiCraig’s list, but that damn fiend Polyphemus voted against that, and put it in the personals. You see, to glimpse even a fraction of what I see constantly is enough to drive lesser beings to madness. It breaks the mind to do it, and I would not advise you to do so lightly. You have your whole life ahead of you to enjoy some semblance of an unburdened mind, and the freedom that brings.”

“But you are offering to teach me, is that what you’re saying?” Bill probed, his molecules seeming to vibrate with enthusiasm at the prospect.

“If you prove to have the aptitude for it, yes.” Argus sighed. “But it may cost you your sanity.”

“Sanity’s just another lie, and I don’t care about lies.” Bill answered, extricating himself from the pile of eye bats by flattening himself and turning on his side, sliding away from the snoozing animals to float up alongside Argus, extending his hand. “I want to know why. I want to learn the truth.”

Argus clasped his large hand around Bill’s small wiry black wrist, surprised when a cool burst of flame sprung around their conjoined hands when they shook on it. The triangle flinched a little, as if surprised by the burst of fire, but laughed it off reflexively.

“The truth is a terrible thing to learn, but I can teach you. Gods help you. I guess you’re my student now.”
His eye curving into a giddy smile once again, Bill floated closer to Argus his molecules vibrating happily and nudged him with his elbow, the limb extending like a rubbery hose.

“Don’t you mean your pupil? Eye-m your pupil. Get it?”

Cupping his hand behind the triangle, albeit a little roughly, guiding him further into the obsidian cave, Argus chuckled fondly.

“It’s not too late to eat you, you know.”

Pulling into Federation Port Kaitz, rather than purchasing the materials he needed on the main strip from standard retailers, Stanford decided to go to the back-alley dealers, making use of his contacts in the scrap vandals to have the credits Jheselbraum gave him stretch further.

She’d provided funding enough to complete this project, but after so long of scraping by with hardly any money, living on the streets, Stanford was hardly inclined to waste money paying for these devices at retail mark-up.

And so, pinging into the network, Stanford hunted down the nearest scrap vandal outlet post, and found himself face to face with the Angolean shop keep, the lizard standing on a step ladder to achieve optimal eye contact.

The parts Stanford needed were displayed on the bench in front of them, now it was just a matter of bartering the price.

“So, you’ve got your chassis for 200 credits, your propulsion core for 700, precision trigger for 350 and various software and circuitry you’ll have to install but we can give you a brick-a-brack bundle for 545. Power source is a different issue, we don’t have anything powerful enough to fit the bill for what you’ve described, so you might have to look around for that one, but all up what we can offer you is everything you see here on the table for 1795 credits. Whaddaya say?”

Fiddling with his nano-briefcase, eyeing off the parts on the table, Stanford tried his luck at a better price.

“Is there any staff discount on that price? My unit was stationed in the pinwheel galaxy, about 20 years ago. I still have my old tablet and uniform, if that helps.”

“One of us, are you? Sure, I’m always happy to do a deal for a fellow scrapper.” Came the lizards amenable reply, but he was cut off by a voice behind him, as another Angolean crept out from the back room.

“Pinwheel galaxy. That’s not old magic hands, is it?”

It took Stanford a while to pick where he knew this particular Angolean from. It wasn’t very polite for him to admit, but he did have trouble telling the lizard folk apart sometimes, and this lizard seemed to be getting on in age, but eventually it registered.

“Arnold?”
“Don’t you Arnold me.” Hissed the lizard, climbing up the stepladder alongside his co-worker, taking an extra step up so he could look down on Stanford, the height of disrespect for Angoleans. “We know what you did magic hands. When Sandeep finally escaped the Noire he came back and told us all. You sold them out, your entire crew! We should charge you a million times more for whatever you want to buy, and it still wouldn’t cover the wrong you’ve done. You’re a stain on the good reputation of the scrap vandals!”

“That’s not true! I didn’t sell them out.” Stanford argued, pulling his nano briefcase open as he twisted it in his hands. “I bargained to save their lives.”

“Oh, yeah. Heard you got real cosy with Diñeiro, sipping cocktails on his couch in a tux, yucking it up together. Heard you backstabbed him too, leaving him to die on Lottocron 9. You’re a real saint.”

“That’s not what –” Stanford sighed and set his nano briefcase down on the table in a resigned sort of way, frustrated knowing that there was no way he could clear his reputation now. Not now that he knew how these things went, just from watching Bill work. People would believe what they wanted to, and the truth would do little to change their minds. “Arnold, can I just buy the parts please?”

“There’s no way we’re sellin’ you nothing, traitor.” Arnold spat on the floor, still looking down at Stanford, his colleague stepping up the ladder as well to mimic his disdain.

“Fine.” Stanford shrugged, and then mumbled something under his breath. “I’ll just take it from you when you’re not looking.”

“What?” Arnold asked, raising his voice, no doubt developing hearing problems in his old age. So to assist him, Stanford repeated himself more clearly with a smile.

“I said I was going to rob you.”

Stanford pressed the button on the end of the nano briefcase and the contents on the table were sucked into the miniature dimension, both ends of the nano briefcase closing with a click once the matter on the table was absorbed. Scooping his briefcase up from the table with one hand, Ford kicked the bottom of the ladder in one swift move, causing the ladder to topple over backwards, falling on both of the Angoleans as Ford ran out the door with his stolen loot.

He could hear the scrap vandals calling after him, but Stanford quickly vanished into the crowd and made his way to the nearest transportation hub, knowing the virtue of a speedy exit.

The ends justified the means here and stealing these parts from the scrap vandals would serve to rid the world of Bill Cipher once and for all, at which point the universe would owe a debt to Stanford, negating his misdeed.

It would be worth it, everything, when Stanford saved the world.

Argus had Bill for a week, before things changed in the Dimension of Eternal Night. There was training, focusing one’s inner eye, and Argus had discerned that Bill did indeed have an aptitude for far-sight when he could slow down enough to focus. There was also recreation, frivolity and fun, something Argus hadn’t had enough of in quite some time.

Bill was a bundle of enthusiasm and energy, making jokes with the giant, playing games with the eye bats, trying to pull pranks on Argus’s many eyes, for all the good it did him. He seemed to crave distraction and stimulus, and Argus was prone to indulging in distraction himself, as it was better than staring at the atrocities of the universe. The obsidian caves were shaking with sound, vibrations from Argus’ booming laugh sounding out more in that one week than they had for centuries.

Bill was a quick learner, certainly, and if Argus tried he could find ways to make most of the activities they shared resemble a training exercise, enough so that he could excuse the liberties he was taking with his sight.

Nursing a tankard of ale while sitting in front of one of the glass walls of his cave, Argus was showing Bill a trick that projected the sights he was seeing onto the wall, filtering his vision through the stone. It sounded like a training exercise when phrased that way, but really they were people watching, and it was enjoyable, Argus laughing and enjoying the company his new student provided.

Argus had been lonely for a long time, and Polyphemus couldn’t come around as often as he used to since he was blinded by Odysseus, so having this bright little shape in his life was a breath of fresh air for the ancient giant. He was loathe to admit it but Polyphemus was right. This was good for Argus.

“Change the channel?” Bill requested, idly patting one of the eye-bats while watching the screen. The creatures wouldn’t leave the triangle alone, they loved him. Argus had never seen the dumb animals so enamoured with anyone. “Not that this isn’t hilarious, but we’ve been watching that one judge pick his nose for the past twenty minutes.”

Argus looked down at the triangle hovering next to his eye encrusted knee, the eye bat crooning as Bill continued to pat it.

“Not entertaining enough for you, is that it? Not what the kids are into these days?”

“Nose picking would be funnier if I had a nose.” Bill’s eye curved into a cheeky grin.

“This is about sustaining focus.” Argus blustered, then looked slyly down at his charge. “If you want to look at something different so badly, you change it.”

Bill looked up at Argus, his eye widening with excitement as it always did when Argus let him try a new technique. While his form was still clumsy, Bill was picking up on far-sight quickly, instinctively, and over the past week it became clear to Argus that there was a well of power within this little creature. A potential that could be nurtured into something great, if done correctly.

“How?”

“You’re watching this now, how would you turn your gaze to something else?” Argus prompted, watching Bill turn his eye back to the images playing out on the black glass. “What changes from one glance to another?”

Thinking on this, Bill’s arm snaked out long, tentatively resting his palm against the obsidian, and very deliberately, he blinked.

The black glass was now showing a homeless shelter in one of the federation ports, Acolytes of the Axolotl ushering the destitute inside, handing out ration bars and bubbled beverages to the poor.

“Very good!” Argus cheered, bringing his gigantic hand down to pat his pupil on the back, pushing the shape forward through the air several feet as he attempted to bestow praise. “You’re getting the hang of this.”

Bill blinked again, changing the view once more, and now the glass displayed the inside of one of the Axolotl’s churches, a whale-ish cleric standing before an altar of bubbled benedictions, looking expectantly down at the floor below, holding out his fin.

Turning his gaze from the screen, Bill looked expectantly up at Argus. “This is only showing me things I’ve seen before. How do I see other things?”

“Ahh.” Argus smiled at his pupil, ignoring the images flickering on the glass. “You need more eyes to see things your own eyes haven’t yet. There’s a trick to it, claiming eyes for your own.”

“Do I have to eat them?” Bill questioned bluntly, sounding displeased.

“Eyes are quite the delicacy, I’ll have you know, however you do not need to consume the eyes to claim their sight.” Argus chuckled. “You can borrow the eyes of others to look through, and their sight becomes yours. It need not be simply an eyeball, the trees have eyes, the stars are always winking, and the sun stares down with a blinding heat in many dimensions. There is a beginners spell to assist with such scrying that shouldn’t be too hard for you.”

“I want to try that! Can you teach me?” Bill asked eagerly, his hand coming off the glass, just as on the wall black wiry hands reached out to receive one of the glowing bubbles from the church.

Several of Argus’ eyes crinkled with fondness, and he patted Bill on the back again, more gently this time. “Tomorrow. For now, relax, and I’ll find something else for you to watch, since you like ‘channel surfing’ so much. What else are the kids into these days?”

Resting his hand against the obsidian floor, Argus changed the scene on the screen, hoping to gift his pupil with a little recreation. On the glass, today’s temporal battle played out, two contestants fighting Globnar for Time Baby’s regard, often a fight to the death. That should do for a little light entertainment.

“There. Globnar. That’s always popular.”

True enough, Argus could see Bill’s eye widen, enraptured with the scene on screen, watching the battle play out intently while the eye bat closest to him nuzzled the triangle sweetly.

When the victor claimed triumph and approached the podium to be gifted their time wish, Bill turned to look at Argus once more.

“What’s that he’s winning?”

“A time wish.” Argus answered. “The Globnar victor can win themselves a time wish by facing a combatant of Time Baby’s choosing, and with it, they can go to any point in time that they wish, and mould it to their fondest desire.”

Bill looked back at the screen with a wistful inhale, clearly quite infatuated with the thought of winning a time wish. “I want one.”

“It’s a nonsensical desire.” Argus scoffed. “Like wanting to win the lottery, winning a time wish. The probability of success is so vastly skewed, Time Baby vetos half of the requests for one before you even make it into the ring. You’d be better off turning those daydreams into something productive, like honing your craft, or contenting yourself with the dreariness of existence as it is. There’s no place in life for silly daydreams about reshaping reality.”

Argus realised that this was a moment he should have looked more closely into, as in hindsight he could see that his words hardly dissuaded Bill at all.

The next day, as Argus was setting up the spell work for rudimentary scrying, Bill practically bouncing off the walls with excitement as Argus etched markings on the edges of the mirrors he had placed on the floor, the eye bats alerted them to a ruckus in the cave by the entrance.

Rather than the fond cooing the eye bats made when Bill arrived, Argus could hear hissing and squealing, the sort of commotion that could only mean some bull-headed intruder.

“Wait here.” Argus instructed Bill, before he thundered down the obsidian hallways, investigating the source of the noise.

When he came out into the opening chamber the cause of the ruckus was made plain enough.

An adolescent giantess with pale purple skin, seven eyes, and fiery red hair cut into a sharp bob, clad in the garb of a prospective warrior, was aiming her golden shield at each of Argus’ eye bats, refracting their petrifying sight back onto the bats, batting them away from her with the surface of her shield, the petrified eye bats falling onto her like crumbling boulders.

She could hear Argus’ approach, and when he rounded out into the chamber fully, looming over her, she whacked the last eye bat away from her and immediately knelt down on one knee in supplication.

“Argus Panoptes, seer of all? I have come from afar and defeated many enemies to train at your side.”

“Oh, here we go.” Argus mumbled under his breath as the warrior girl stood up, reciting her deeds to impress him.

“I have scaled Hysteria Peak and retrieved you a lily from the cusp of the mountaintop. I have wrestled the bloatfish from the quagmires of Boggrah, slit it’s throat and bathed in it’s flesh, I have ransacked a planet for it’s eyes to gift you and that planet is now known as the Land of the Blind as a testament to my dedication, not a single being’s sight spared. I have –”

“Wow. Look, could you skip the boring bits and wrap it up, Legs? I have a lesson to get back to.”

The warrior girl paused and looked down beside Argus’s leg, the location of the voice, where a small one-eyed yellow triangle hovered with his hands on his sides.

Argus looked down at his leg and hissed at Bill unstably. “I thought I told you to wait in the cave?”

“I got bored of waiting.” Bill replied with a flippant shrug.
“Who is this?” The warrior girl asked, her voice suddenly icy.

Argus reluctantly answered. “Bill is studying under –“

“Is he your student?” The girl interrupted, sounding scandalised.

“Yep!” Bill answered callously, while Argus was inwardly fretting.

He didn’t think anyone would live through attempting his many impossible tasks, let alone succeed. He deliberately made each task a fools errand, each proving trial more dissuading than the last, yet here this child was, standing before him, beseeching his tutelage.

Her stubborn presentation stirred guilt in Argus, guilt because he never assumed someone would be so foolishly headstrong to complete his impossible tasks.

Learning from the Gods, he thought setting impossible tasks would absolve him from all teaching obligation, as impossible tasks were never meant to be surmounted, but Argus forgot that for each labour, there was a Hercules.

“Did he complete your chosen tasks?” She asked, still sounding deathly serious.

“Well…” Argus dithered, while Bill took the initiative to answer for him.

“Nope. Just strolled right in through the front door and asked. Got yelled at for it, but other than that it was surprisingly easy.”

“No!” The giantess turned and stomped her foot, pointing to Bill accusingly. “No that’s not fair then! He can’t be your student if he didn’t fulfil your tasks. He didn’t do any of the work. I did! I climbed the mountain! I did every single thing you wanted.”

“Now, uh, let’s just –“ Argus held his hands out, trying to cut her off before – but it was too late.

The warrior girl turned on the waterworks, pricking at that oft buried compassion of his in a much more direct way than Bill’s downcast expression had. Tears began to well up in all seven of her eyes as she continued speaking her case, her voice hitching with sobs as she spoke, her disappointment, desperation and disbelief evident.

“I have the eyes. I have them all.” She untied an expanding bag from her shoulder and threw it on the cave floor, eyes spilling everywhere. “Here! I got them for you! I - I left my home for you! I bathed in disgusting bloat fish juice for you. I did! You can’t choose him over me, I did what you wanted. I did it. He didn’t! I deserve it! I should be the one you share your sight with! Me! I have more eyes than him! I’m bigger and stronger than him! I’m gifted! I’ll work hard, I promise, you can’t just – please! I’ve worked so hard for this, I’ve - and I can work harder! Please teach me, please!”

She discarded her shield and fell down onto her hands and knees, bowing before Argus even as tears continued to stream down her face, making her the most pitiful thing the ancient giant had seen for a long while.

Covered in eyes, there was only so many of them that could look up at the ceiling right now, away from this convincing display, and wrestling with his conscience, finally Argus broke.

“All right fine! There’s no need to – there’s no need to make such a fuss.”

“Will – will you -?” The warrior girl asked hesitantly, looking up, her bottom lip wobbling just enough to take the choice out of Argus’ eyeball covered hands.

“Yes, yes I’ll teach you.” Argus conceded with a sigh. “You did all the bloody tasks. So you can dry your eyes already.”

“You will? Thank you! Thank you venerable one, I – thank you for choosing me over him, I won’t let you down.” She stood up and bowed once more from the hip, just as Argus raised his hand.

“Now hold on just a minute, young lady. I see no reason why I can’t teach the both of you.”

“But your advertisement said you would only take on one pupil.” The girl looked up, taken aback by his decision. “And I completed everything you tasked in the advertisement, and proved myself worthy, so your pupil should be me. That’s how these things work. It’s only logical.”

Argus could see Bill glaring at the girl, his bricks pinking with agitation, still hovering by Argus’ leg, and he smothered another sigh of frustration.

Seeking to diffuse the situation, Argus crossed his arms, before gesturing to himself. “Now child, if anyone can handle having more than one pupil it’s me. The longer you question me, the less inclined I am to be so gracious. The both of you are to be my students, and I want you both to accept my decision and get along. Learning is not a competition. Is that understood?”

“Yes Master.” Chirped the purple giantess immediately in a saccharine tone that didn’t seem quite sincere.

“Define ‘get along’.” Bill looked up at Argus’ face, unimpressed.

“What is your name dear?” Argus directed his question at the warrior, who still looked a little watery.

“Jheselbraum.” She answered, wiping her eyes, her saccharine expression lasting only a second before sharpening into a glare when Bill snorted a laugh at her name. In a somewhat stronger voice she continued. “I was known as Jheselbraum the Unswerving back in my tribe, for my dedication and diligence to excellence. I never fail.”

“Yeah, I’m sure.” Bill snarked, rolling his eye, floating over to poke at one of the petrified eye bats with mild concern.

“That’s very nice dear.” Argus absently replied, deciding that ignoring his students antagonism would be the best way to diffuse it. “Leave the eye bats alone Bill, they’ll wake up soon enough.”

Shrugging off the tension of the situation, Argus turned and walked back into the main chamber, resigning himself to what he’d gotten himself into. “Alright children. Lesson one on scrying is this way, let’s get on with it.”

Argus walked away at this point but looking back this would be another time he should have looked a little more closely.

As Argus’ thunderous footsteps led the way, the noise masked Jheselbraum’s words, all traces of her waterworks display vanishing in an instant as she leaned over to sneer down at Bill.

“I don’t care what trick you played to pull the wool over his eyes, you’d better just leave now, rather than waste time embarrassing yourself, triangle. I’m the one who should be Panoptes’ pupil, his sole pupil. I proved myself worthy, but you’ve only proved yourself as a nuisance and a burden. You don’t deserve to learn his sight, you don’t even deserve to stand in his cave. I earned this, but you don’t belong here.”

“I was here first.” Bill glared at Jheselbraum, still hovering over the stone eye bat protectively.

“And you’ll leave first. I always win. You’ll see. Or you won’t, I guess. What does a one-eyed shape know about far-sight anyway?”

“More than you.” Bill narrowed his eyes gamely, committing himself to the competition.

“We’ll see about that.”

Argus’ voice echoed from the cave ahead. “Children?”

“Coming!” Jheselbraum said in a too sweet voice, before smirking venomously at Bill and skipping along behind the giant.

Argus Panoptes was the most content he’d been in a long time, overseeing the studies of his two new pupils. There was something about watching over their progress that reminded him of happy memories, of watching over Io in the fields, that he found he quite enjoyed. Plus, watching two initiates struggle to learn something that came naturally to Argus was quite the boon to the ego.

“Focus your scrying mirrors children. You are to concentrate on the eye on my forehead and look through that specific eye to see what card I’m holding. No cheating now Bill.”

“But the card is right there!” Bill argued, having been attempting to float up over Argus’ shoulder to sneak a peek at the card he was holding.

“This is a test of your abilities. Focus children.”

Argus said nothing, amused at how the studious girl’s guessing amounted to just the same as Bill’s peeking, an invalid answer. They were supposed to be seeing, not guessing or cheating.

Bill made a frustrated noise behind him, and Argus could hear the clank of a scrying mirror hitting the floor.

“This isn’t working! I just keep seeing your teeth falling out. Are you even holding a card right now, old man?”

“The card is in my hand. Why would you be seeing my teeth falling out? I happen to take very good care of them.” Argus questioned sounding amused.

“I’m concentrating, but this mirror keeps showing me everything but the card you’re holding. I keep seeing your teeth falling out, some girl chained up in a field, you playing dominos with your blind buddy but this time he actually has an eye – no cards.”

All of Argus’ eyes swivelled around to look at Bill at that, regarding the triangle with interest and Jheselbraum looked between her teacher, her mirror, and Bill, leaning over to try and glimpse whatever the triangle was seeing in his mirror, wondering what she was doing wrong. It wasn’t fair that Bill was seeing something, and she wasn’t. Part of her thought Bill was simply making things up.

“What did the girl look like?” Argus questioned intently.

“White dress, blonde hair, chain around her ankle.” Bill listed, squinting at the image in his mirror. “She’s eating grass, if that helps?”

As much as Jheselbraum craned her neck, she couldn’t see anything in Bill’s glass, the spell work attuned to the individual seer. She wanted desperately to see something, but all she saw was her own frustrated reflection staring back at her, and now their teacher was watching Bill with awed interest in several of his riveted eyes.

“How fascinating.” Argus murmured, turning around and setting the card face down on the table, squatting down so he could look at his student more closely.

“What was I looking at? Is that the present? The past? Where is it? Why were you looking at that? Are you looking at that right now?” Bill rapidly questioned, hardly leaving room for Argus to answer.

Argus held his hand up, halting Bill’s onslaught, and blinked at him. “It seems you have an innate gift for sight, Bill, and a specialisation growing already, however you were not seeing a thing that exists in reality, past or present.”

“So, he’s making it up?” Jheselbraum quickly surmised, eager to discredit Bill.

“No Jheselbraum.” Argus corrected, smiling lightly. “Bill is seeing into the most malleable and unfathomable reality of all, into a place that is both truth and illusion, real until it is not.”

“Where?” Bill pressed, wanting to understand.

“In dreams.” Argus answered, baring his jagged teeth in a fond grin. “A place where Polythemus regained his sight, where Io remained in the garden, but as she was meant to be, where despite being perfectly healthy, sometimes all your teeth can fall out for no reason. Your innate sight is showing you something I cannot, Bill. A different plane altogether.”

Bill seemed impressed for a moment, looking back to his mirror with curiosity, before he looked back up at Argus. “But that doesn’t tell me what’s actually happening. Or what did happen. The past. I want to see the past. How do I see that?”

Clapping his hands to his knees, Argus stood up again, chuckling at how single minded his student was, even when faced with the revelation of his truly unique skill. “Practise. Back to work then children. Focus on the card.”

Bill resumed concentrating on his mirror, oblivious to the way Jheselbraum was glaring daggers at him, seething with jealousy.
The obsidian caves were vast, vast enough for Argus’ students to carve out their own living spaces closer to the surface. Argus endeavoured to give his students privacy in their rooms, or as much privacy as living with a being whose existence inspired the word ‘panopticon’ could give, but now looking back, he was starting to feel he may have been remiss in doing so.

Jheselbraum’s cavern was the largest, housing her golden shield and the other weaponry she brought with her on her long journey, books and resources packed around the black space. She did not need to choose the largest cave, her height did not impede her from choosing one of the smaller ones. She chose it because she did not want Bill to have it.

By her estimation, the triangle already had far more than he deserved.

Creeping through the tunnels, Jheselbraum trekked up to the smaller cave nestled high on the obsidian mountaintop that Bill had picked out, wanting to spy on Bill, or confront the triangle, or continue her crusade to bully him out of the apprenticeship, and as she was undecided between the three, when she reached Bill’s room, she paused in the doorway, watching him.

Bill had taken his scrying mirror up to his room and was attempting to practise projecting his sight into the eye of another, the technique Argus had been teaching them for the past several weeks.

The lesson plan Argus laid out meant that first he would teach them to look through eyes into the present, as that was easiest, then in theory he would teach them to look through eyes into the future, which was a little trickier and not always accurate, but far more achievable as seers see into the future all the time, and lastly he would teach them to see through the eyes of the past, the most difficult thing of all, as it often meant borrowing the eyes of the dead. At the moment he was only teaching them to borrow eyes in the present, and they hadn’t yet progressed beyond that for some reason.

Argus was teaching them both the theory and rudimentary practical spells to enable them to accomplish the manual side of seeing, and should they study diligently, Argus would graduate them to the effortless level of sight he possessed. He was making them create all their seer spells physically now, as it was important practise, the giant stated, but when they had proved themselves worthy his students were to undergo a proving test elsewhere that would grant them full sight.

Jheselbraum wanted to know where elsewhere, as currently she was hardly succeeding at this, despite how much she wanted to, but Argus wouldn’t say.

“A bit rich coming from me, but you have to keep some things a mystery.” Was the Giant’s chipper response, and as much as it infuriated Jheselbraum, she couldn’t argue with her teacher.

Jheselbraum was watching Bill practise, staring into his mirror, but rather than focusing on Argus’ eye, as they had been instructed to, Bill was looking through another with limited success.

Jheselbraum could hear him mutter. “Where are you?” In frustrated, desperate tones.

His triangular form was glowing, and blue flames were sputtering out of his hands around the edges of the mirror, the fire leaking from him as he attempted to focus his energy into seeing.

The scrying mirror glowed on and off, lighting with visions, before the light would flicker, die, then start up again.

Jheselbraum watched this with interest, taking in the little details that made Bill’s late night practise a pitiful thing indeed, despite his sporadic success rate. She could see his arms shaking as he gripped onto the mirror, fire tumbling into wispy piles beneath him before being extinguished as fat drops of moisture fell from Bill’s open eye.

She could hear him pleading with the mirror, his voice breaking. “Please be a lie. I didn’t – come on, where are you? Where?”

It was gratifying for Jheselbraum to see Bill crying, trying so hard and failing. She wanted so badly for him to have a taste of his own bitter medicine. He was the constantly chipper one-eyed prodigy, and here he was, miserable when alone. Now that was satisfying to see.

Eventually the exercise grew too taxing for Bill, and he threw his mirror to the ground with a sob, wiping his eye with his hand as he muttered a thick. “Why?”

“You’ll break the mirror like that.” Jheselbraum called out across the room, gleeful, her voice echoing on the walls, startling Bill, who spun around to face her defensively.

Taking this in, his panic, and the flames that still fell from his hands, Jheselbraum decided that she would try a different tactic, and she bowed her head as she squeezed in through the entrance of the cave.

“Oh relax. I’m not going to tell anyone you were crying like a baby because you couldn’t get a spell right.”

Crossing the room, Jheselbraum shooed away the flames that lingered on the cave floor and sat cross legged on the ground beside Bill, reaching for his mirror.

“So, what were you looking at?”

“None of your business.” Bill hissed back at her.

Jheselbraum picked his mirror up from the ground, acting unphased by his hostility. “I’m impressed you’ve been able to see anything, honestly. I’ve been trying for just as long as you have, but I barely get glimpses.”

Surprised to hear praise from Jheselbraum, Bill’s eye widened, and the angle he held his shoulders at softened a little, watching her curiously now.

“Holding a sight for several seconds like you just did is good. I counted three seconds of sight for a while there. I hate to admit it, but you’re a natural. I could learn a lot from you.” Jheselbraum sighed, before passing Bill’s mirror back to him. “Which is awful, because I think we got off on the wrong foot.”

“Gee, you think?” Bill frowned, but he was still watching Jheselbraum openly, wondering where she was going with this.

“You see, my people are an elite race of warriors. I never had to worry about how my words came across before or how to ‘get along’ with my peers, really. I just had to win. I never had many friends. Only competitors. But Argus wants us to ‘get along’, so this is me trying. What do you say? Do you think perhaps we could start over?” Jheselbraum extended her hand to Bill, pasting a fake smile on to see if it would work. “Friends?”

Bill hesitated for a moment, considering her hand, before he clasped it with his own, blue flames spurting erratically around the gesture. “Sure. I could use some friends.”

Pulling her hand away from the fire, shaking off the remnant flame, Jheselbraum looked curiously at the cool flames. “Does that always happen? The ‘setting fire to everything you touch’ thing? I can ask you that, because we’re friends now.”

    “Hah. I’m working on it not doing that, just so you know. It’s kind of new.” Bill explained awkwardly, patting the fire down around him.

“'You’re quite new to all of your powers, aren’t you?” Jheselbraum probed. ‘If you’d grown with them you’d have better control by now. Have you always been able to observe dreams like that?’

“'That’s new too.” Bill shrugged. “Only since I came here.”

“So, it’s not innate, or something you’ve had your whole life. You can teach me then. Teach me how to do it.” Jheselbraum demanded eagerly.

“I don’t know how I’m doing it though. It’s new, I told you.”

“That doesn’t mean you can’t tell me how, though. Tell me how you’re doing it. I’ll do exactly what you do, come on. Show me.”

Bill’s eye narrowed, and he looked Jheselbraum up and down before answering shrewdly, a hint of mischief to his tone that the giantess had yet to pick up. “Sure, friend.”

Jheselbraum clapped eagerly and turned to face him.

“Start by standing up.”

Jheselbraum sprung to her feet.

“And close your eyes.”

She slammed her eyes shut immediately.

“Raise one foot slightly.” Bill dictated, and Jheselbraum did so, balancing adeptly on one leg.

“Place one hand on your head and the other on your stomach.” Jheselbraum complied, although she was starting to question Bill’s methods.

“Now hop up and down and sing ‘perfect symmetry’ at the top of your lungs.”

Stomping her foot down, knowing she was being played, Jheselbraum yelled, just as Bill started laughing. “BILL!”

The triangle didn’t react to her ire, still laughing, his legs kicking in the air behind him as he clutched his bricks, giggling in a contagious way that eventually had Jheselbraum joining in, if only to save face.

Down in the caverns below, Argus smiled, hearing the echoes of his children’s laughter fill the empty caves of the mountainside.

What he didn’t think to look for, however, was the way Jheselbraum would narrow her eyes at Bill’s back when he went to fetch the mirror again, her expression snapping back to an amenable one as they sat down to practise together, disingenuous, cunning, and deplorably insincere.
In the years that passed, Argus supervised his student’s training, honing their craft in the methods of far sight. Things were becoming a comfortable pattern. He’d instruct his students in the morning, teaching them spell forms, runework, meditation techniques (that they often ignored in favour of pranking each other) and further insight into sight. They’d bicker and learn, a competitive camaraderie struck up between the two of them that seemed much more light hearted than it had at the start, and in the evenings all three of them would gather in the caves, showing Argus what they had learned, playing card games together, and choosing what dimension to watch on the obsidian screen.

Occasionally Polyphemus would still visit Argus, the two giants holing up in one of the caves to drink and play dominos, and Argus would banish the children for the night, although he was absolutely certain they snuck in to listen to the giants chat, Jheselbraum thirsting to overhear any words of praise or commendation Argus dispensed in private to the other giant, and Bill lingering because it was fun to irritate Jheselbraum.

His suspicions were confirmed when, one evening, while drinking with Polyphemus, his words engendered a response from the little urchins lurking outside of the cavern door.

“You’ve been sounding a lot better these past few years, you know. Happier, I can hear it in your voice. It suits you.” Polyphemus observed, stacking his pile of dominos up at the end of their game. “I haven’t seen you like this since, well, since her.”

“That was such a long time ago.” Argus answered wistfully. “Io.”

“With Io you were softer. Not such a difficult bastard. You’d laugh more. You’d smile. I always wanted to see you smile again, but that was before —“

Polyphemus sighed and brought his hand up to feel the crusted edges of the hollow of his eye.

“Friend.” Argus said solemnly and reached his hand across the table to hold Polyphemus’ wrist. “I’m smiling now.”

Polyphemus paused for a beat at that, before speaking. “You sound pretty bloody serious for a bloke who’s supposed to be smiling.”

Argus barked a laugh before yanking Polyphemus’ hand across the table and pressing it to his face. “Here, see for yourself, you miserable bugger.”

Polyphemus laughed as he felt the curve of Argus’ smile, his large hands smoothing over the eyeballs that dotted Argus’ face like they were braille, visualising his friend’s smile through touch.

“There it is. That’s what I wanted to see. Now aren’t you happy I made you put up that advertisement?”

“This is not an ‘I told you so’ moment.” Argus forbade. “I never wanted to teach —“

“Even if you are good at it.” Polyphemus interjected.

“How good am I supposed to be? It’s been years and my students are still using mirrors to scry.”

“Do you think they’re not ready?” Polyphemus asked.
“No.” Argus answered honestly. “They’ve been diligent in their studies. They have the aptitude for it. They could do it.”

Polyphemus listened to this, and then insightfully pressed. “Are you not ready?”

Argus was silent, Polyphemus’ only clue that his assessment was on the money. Allowing terse silence to reign, Polyphemus knew eventually Argus had to break it, and he did, blurtin out.

“Well I won’t have anything to teach them then, when they do it. And then what will they stick around for? Me? Certainly not. I’ll go right back to being just as lonely and miserable as you seemed to think I was, and nothing will have changed. Nothing.”

When Polyphemus still continued to say nothing, his judgemental silence saying it all, Argus’ defences crumbled, and his shoulders sagged with a sigh.

“You’re right, I shouldn’t be holding back their progress out of selfishness, it’s petty of me. I’ve just come to enjoy having the little ones around so much. They’re both so bright and unique, very special children, and I really feel like, having them here with me is like having my own little family, and I rather like that. Family.”

When Polyphemus continued to say nothing, Argus worried that he’d been a little too sappy for his tastes, that or Polyphemus fell asleep, but instead the other giant was sitting very still in his chair, his nostrils flaring.

“Do you smell that? Something’s burning.”

Argus paused to scent the air, and turned around, the burning smell coming from just out the door where tell-tale blue flames were skirting along the floor.

Grumbling, Argus got up and rounded the corner, his two students standing outside in the hallway, Bill surrounded by a pool of involuntary flame.

“He did it.” Jheselbraum said immediately, pointing at Bill, dobbing him into teacher. “He just exploded flames just now. We weren’t eavesdropping. It was his idea.”

Rather than baulk at her accusations, Bill was saying nothing, his eye scrunched up with indescribable emotion, looking up at Argus as if the giant’s words had both pained him deeply and made him unbelievably happy all at once. The fire was still leaking from him slowly, cascading onto the ground, his eye rather shiny, welling with painful hope.

“Did you mean it?”

Argus’ expression softened, and he lowered himself down onto one knee to address the triangle, still towering over him but making an effort to get level with the child.

Reaching his hand out, Argus waved away the flames that fell from Bill and rested his hand gently on the triangle’s side.

In a kind voice Argus said. “Now what have I told you two children about eavesdropping, hmm? If you’re going to do it, do it from your rooms so it counts as practise.”

“But did you?” Bill pressed.

Argus smiled at Bill as his answer, inclining his head ever so slightly as he looked down at them. “Off to bed with you now, come on. I’ll be teaching you something new tomorrow and you’ll need your rest. Off with you, both of you.”

Jheselbraum was already tugging Bill away, her instant obedience merely another way of sucking up, dragging Bill down the hall without an answer.

Swatting her hand away in agitation, Bill was surprised when, from the doorway, Argus called out again, the majority of his eyes twinkling fondly.

“And be nice to your sister.”

Argus had never seen a shape glow so brightly as Bill did then.

The next day Argus began teaching his pupils in earnest, more than just seeing through the eyes of the present but seeing through the eyes of the past and future as well.

“While we live our lives one event after the other, it is a mistake to comprehend time as a linear construct. We assume there is a distinct separation between the past, the present and the future because we are constrained by our own circumstances, but time itself is a fluid untenable thing.” Argus lectured, strolling in front of his students, scratching diagrams on one of the obsidian walls, much to the displeasure of all those who had ears in the vicinity.

“If that’s the case, why do we have to wait for the future to happen?” Jheselbraum asked, putting her hand up.

“Or why can’t we go back and change the past?” Bill added to the inquiry, raising his own hand, deliberately stretching his limb out higher than Jheselbraum’s.

“Because a linear timeline is enforced.” Argus replied, pointing to a crude drawing of a baby he’d scratched into the wall. “By Time Baby. He is a time god, and he abhors anything that disrupts the linear timeline, or anything that could create a temporal paradox. Ironic, because he himself is a temporal paradox, and it is uncertain as to whether temporal paradoxes existed before Time Baby came into being, or if the consequences of temporal paradoxes are merely a result of Time Baby’s tantrums. As you know there are offshoot dimensions that parallel the occurrences of another dimension with slight temporal changes that exist uninterrupted by Time Baby’s enforcers, yet most of those dimensions split from their root dimensions to run parallel with them as a result of some sort of time paradox, so the differences between what is an acceptable time paradox and what is not seems entirely reliant on Time Baby’s whims. It could be as simple a matter as regulating dimensional real estate, or it could be something much more complex, or yet again something entirely incomprehensible and meaningless. We aren’t sure what governs his tantrums, but his tantrums govern the timeline, which is why time is linear.”

Pacing again, Argus pointed to several other diagrams labelled ‘past’ ‘present’ and ‘future’, continuing his lecture.

“Seers have a little leeway when it comes to flying under the radar of Time Baby’s enforcers. Seeing into the future is not a precise art, as there are many offshoot timelines that are constantly changing with every passing event, and prophecy as an art is especially imprecise, as fated events must be recounted as intentionally vague to avoid impacting fate enough to create yet another temporal paradox. Give me some examples of situations where seeing into the future and informing someone of it can be detrimental to that future eventuating.”

“Ooh, if you were to tell, say, Odysseus that at the end of his journey he’d come home to find his house full of suitors for his wife, he might have never left on his journey in the first place.” Jheselbraum suggested, waving her hand in the air to compete with Bill’s rubbery appendage.

“Or you could tell someone the exact date and time of their death.” Bill suggested, sounding eager. “And why would doing that impact the timeline?” Jheselbraum turned to question him.

“It’d be funny.” Came Bill’s glib answer, his arm shrinking back down to its normal size so he could float with his hands behind the top point of his body casually. “Good way to mess with them.”

“Now seeing into the future and delivering predictions can do one of two things.” Argus continued, his question less about wanting his students input and more to check that they were listening. “Firstly, by divulging the future it could negate that future from happening, as the recipient of the prophecy could take steps to avoid it, or secondly it could cement that timeline as the only possible future outcome, as once prophecies are spoken they have a way of asserting themselves as the dominant timeline out of potential millions of unspoken outcomes. Time Baby sanctions certain seers – by which I mean he does not eliminate them – and those seers are usually the ones who either do not speak their prophecies, or who deliver their prophecies in the vaguest possible terms. So when it comes to divulging your future sight the thing you must bear in mind is – loopholes!”

Argus scratched the word ‘LOOPHOLES’ on the obsidian, while his two students winced at the sound, the eye bats screeching in harmony with the noise. When the cacophony dimmed and the word was adequately inscribed, Argus pointed to the word for emphasis.

“It is important to be aware of the loopholes before you attempt future sight, so as to avoid temporal elimination, but once the loopholes have been seen to, I imagine you’ll find future sight quite simple to grasp, if somewhat time consuming, as in order to find the correct future outcome you must parse through quite a few. In summary, with future sight, either don’t talk about it, don’t talk about it to the parties involved, or keep it vague, and you won’t be arrested. Understood?”

“Yes teacher.” Jheselbraum answered obediently, while Bill echoed her sentiment with a less formal. “Yep.”

“Now. Seeing the past.” Argus turned and pointed to the word ‘past’ etched on the board, missing the way Bill leaned forward, his bricks glowing brighter as he inhaled eagerly.

“Seeing the past is a much more difficult. In terms of the temporal loopholes, seeing the past does not have the same effect that seeing the future does. Very few timelines are changed through seeing past events, as history has a tendency to repeat itself regardless of the best intentions of historians. That is one of the traps past seers fall into, as even with the ability to see what happened in the past, there is no way to change it. It often drives seers to great despair and sometimes madness, seeing what they cannot prevent. Seeing into the past requires one to borrow the eyes of someone who lived through that past, and in many cases, to borrow the eyes of the dead. Past sight is more difficult to achieve in this way, because it is technically a form of necromancy, which is just as prohibited as timeline meddling.”

Argus turned around to face his students, directing his words specifically at Bill who was listening.
with a too-wide eyed expression, obviously more than taken with the prospect of past sight, despite its dubious legality.

“The phrase ‘a man’s past is his own’ exists for a reason. Seeing into the past can bring about consequences from the time police, from the forces that govern life and death, and from the horrors of reality itself. Once you delve into the past once, you can never go back to the shelter of ignorance. The past holds more than just legal consequences from outside forces, there are personal consequences to knowing the truth of the past. Through the eyes of the dead there is no place for the lies of the present to hide.”

Rather than deter Bill, the triangle only looked more determined than ever, and Argus sighed, resigning himself to the rest of the lesson.

“Alright, let’s get started then.”

In the years that followed Argus began instructing his students on the techniques that would enable them to skirt the dimensional loopholes and see beyond the present. More runes, spells and rituals were required to achieve this but his pupils were studious, each one motivated strongly by things that could only be implied.

Argus had never asked, he felt it wasn’t his place to, and he didn’t want to open the floodgates to that sort of intimacy, but he knew that Jheselbraum lusted to know of her future successes and Bill was driven to comprehend one of the sorrows of his past.

Jheselbraum took instantly to future-sight and prophecy and delighted in saying vague potentially menacing things to Bill in the mornings just to watch him fret as the day stretched on. Argus presumed this was merely an escalation of their pranking war and turned a blind eye to it for the most part. He did notice a few more of his eye bats were paralysed around this time, Bill usually finding them in his room, Jheselbraum insisting this meant her grave portents were coming true, and Bill insisting that Jheselbraum was paralysing the eye bats and putting them there to mess with Bill.

Argus decided not to intervene in the squabbles of children and refused to play the mediator here, neither confirming nor denying Jheselbraum’s chosen portents despite how most of them seemed to concern Bill’s unending future suffering. Argus just presumed Jheselbraum was being a pill and left it at that.

Bill was less interested in future sight though, and keener to get to the lessons on seeing into the past. He passed Argus’ rudimentary tests about future sight, but it was clear this was not where his passion lay.

When they got around to the intricacies of past sight, Bill was a quick study, the boy something of a prodigy really, as it was in hardly any time at all that Bill managed to succeed.

Argus insisted on supervising their initial attempts at past vision so he could intervene if something went wrong. It just so happened that while Bill’s first attempt at past sight was technically perfect, the results were disastrous.
Bill’s mirror was glowing with the power of a sustained image, the triangle glowing powerfully, his eye fizzing with bright static as he fixated on the screen. Argus could see his brow was furrowed and his form was shaking with the effort it took to zero in on this past event, borrowing the eyes of the dead to do so.

At first his expression was simply that of concentration, uncharacteristically serious and fixated, but after a while Argus could see Bill’s eye scrunch with remembered pain and venom. He was narrowing his eye at the mirror intently, tracking every detail and back and forth, until his eye widened with shock, blue flames abruptly flaring up around Bill and spreading through the room.

Jheselbraum abandoned her own meagre attempt at past sight and shrieked, jumping away from Bill’s fire, running over to Argus, her mirror abandoned on the floor.

“It was hot this time. He’s doing it on purpose.” She insisted, hiding behind Argus’ leg.

Argus could see wetness gathering at the edges of Bill’s eye now and hear him making aborted noises that could have been sobs, if not for the way they hitched up at the end repetitively.

“Bill.” Argus called out, worried that his pupil had fallen too far into a trance, but there were none of the signs of spell work backfiring. Whatever was causing this fire was all Bill, and it was becoming an inferno.

The hitching sound Bill was making was becoming clearer, sounding less like sobs and more like a mangled mixture of laughter and crying heard over the roar of the fire.

“They were telling the truth. All this time they were right.” Bill eventually spoke through the hysterical laughter. “It was me. I did it. I – everything they ever said about me was right.”

Argus looked hesitantly at the static fizzing away from Bill’s eye, despite the fire still rising all around them.

“I am defective. An aberration. I really am a monster. Irregular. Wrong. It was my fault. I should’ve just –” The fire flared up around Bill in that moment, the increase in heat evident from where Argus was standing, and the flames attempted to consume the little triangle, swirling up around him.

Argus had enough.

Sucking in a deep breath, Argus immediately exhaled the air in his giant lungs, his breath a gale that whipped through the caverns, snuffing out Bill’s fire in an instant.

Crossing the room before Bill could light it again, Argus knelt down and cupped Bill’s triangular body with his hands, hoping that whatever fondness Bill had for his teacher meant that he wouldn’t try to immolate himself again.

While Bill’s bricks were hot, making the eyes on Argus’ hand water, they were whole, and unaffected by his student’s suicidal rampage.

“Bill, enough. Listen to me.”

The triangle seemed shocked, his eye still leaking, staring up at Argus like he was astonished that someone would dare to brave the flames to console him, even at the risk of being burned.

“I am going to tell you what I said to Io in the garden. What other people say you are does not define you. What other people look at when they see you does not define you. You define yourself, and it is from there that you take charge of your future, control your actions and forge a path ahead. Others can see outward appearances, but only you can see inside yourself and recognise your own truth. Do you understand me?"

Hesitantly Bill nodded once, his rampage stilled by the grounding sensation of Argus’ hand on his side.

“Now control yourself.” Argus ordered. “Control your powers, and control what you seek out to see. Don’t go looking if you’re not ready for what you’ll find. Past sight is to be used tactically, not flippantly, and not at the risk of the people around you.”

“He singed my robe.” Jheselbraum chimed in, quick to blame Bill while he was already being told off.

“Apologise to your sister.” Argus stood upright, considering the matter dealt with.

Bill glared at Jheselbraum and bit out a meaningless forced apology, which Jheselbraum took much pleasure in.

Settling back down on the charred ground beside Bill, picking up her mirror, ready to resume the lesson, Jheselbraum paused to lean in to whisper to Bill.

“What were you looking at?”

“None of your business.” Bill hissed back, retrieving his own mirror and wiping his eye, returning his focus to the mirror.

“I’ll find out.” Jheselbraum insisted, looking down at Bill with a smug smile.

Bill looked up at her at that, narrowing his eye defensively.

“Just you wait. Soon I’ll know everything, friend.” Jheselbraum laughed meanly, the word friend lacking any sort of fondness or sincerity, said almost as if it were an insult.

As Argus continued to scratch his teachings on the cave wall, preparing his students for the final test to granting effortless sight, Bill began to dread his past being laid bare, just as Jheselbraum anticipated it eagerly.

At the time of his student’s final test, Argus was initially bittersweet and nostalgic, sad to see the point at which his students need for his teaching would cease but proud and pleased at how far they had come. They had both practised and applied themselves diligently to the practicalities of sight. They were proficient in seeing and all the rituals that it entailed, and now they were ready to see all places effortlessly, having earned that privilege thoroughly.

Being able to see more than one place at a time was the final step to becoming all-seeing, and Argus, as much as he hated the gift himself, was pleased to be passing it on to his children, as he had come to want to give them everything he could pass on out of sheer fondness.

“Allright children, this is it. Your final test. You’ve studied hard, and I believe you are ready for this step, but it is crucial you follow my instructions to the letter, as there is only ever one chance to receive all-sight. So, don’t mess this up.”

Jheselbraum nodded obediently, but Bill seemed off in his own head somewhat, no doubt fretting about this final assessment.

“Birds hold great symbolic reverence in many cultures, and sight is especially relevant to the birds eye view of all. I was granted the title of ‘Peacock’ for my many eyes by the gods, and the bird itself is made in my image. The being you are about to meet was crafted from the collective wisdom of Athena and is known as The Owl. The Owl reflects the gifts of wisdom Athena bestows back onto those who seek it out. It will give you the wisdom to see all things at once, but to do so you must maintain eye contact with The Owl and hold in your mind the wisdom that has brought you to this point to prove you are worthy. When I call the portal to open, you will travel to the silent realm and when you arrive you are to find the owl and sit in its presence, meeting its gaze in utter silence, until such a point that you are enlightened, and then you must leave immediately. Do you understand?”

“Yes teacher.” Jheselbraum nodded again, barely containing her enthusiasm.

“Don’t say anything, stare at an owl, think real hard and leave. Got it.” Bill answered, sounding bored by the prospect.

“See that you do.” Argus said seriously. “Any errors in this process and you will be ejected from the silent realm and will never be permitted to return.”

After that final warning, Argus straightened up and clapped his hands together, the eyes there blinking in tandem. “Right then. I’ll call up the entrance and give you two some time alone to compose your thoughts. When you are ready, just walk though. I’ll be waiting for you back here.”

Picking up one of the trinkets that littered Argus’ cave, Argus placed the wooden owl figurine on the floor, tapped on it once and began to chant.

“A wise old owl lived in an oak, the more he saw the less he spoke, the less he spoke the more he heard. Why can’t we all be like that wise old bird?”

The figurine’s eyes blinked open and projected a swirling void into the space in front of it.

Giving both of his students an encouraging thumbs up, Argus exited the cave, and gave his students some privacy.

Looking back on this moment, Argus was coming to realise that his penchant for respecting the privacy of those around him as an all seeing being was really quite excessive. The more he saw of his students looking back, the more he realised it was remiss of him to believe that they weren’t abusing that privacy to be duplicitous.

Jheselbraum certainly was.

Turning to face Bill, her hands clasped behind her back, Jheselbraum taunted Bill in a sing-song voice.

“I’ve got it all figured out, you know. A working theory. And after today I’ll be able to confirm it.”

“A working theory about what?” Bill asked with a defensive frown.

theory. The first thing I’m going to do when I receive the power of all-sight will be to look back through your past, find out exactly why you blubber away at night when you think no one is paying attention – I think it’s because you did something irredeemable, something so bad you can never forgive yourself, much less have anyone else forgive you for what you’ve done - and then I’m going to tell everyone all the horrid things you did, so you can’t escape the consequences.”

“What?” Bill’s eye was wide with shock and betrayal, staring up at Jheselbraum, thrown by the reveal of her sudden vindictiveness. “Why?”

“Because I’ve found your weak spot, silly. And I intend to use it.”

“No – but why would you even – I thought we were friends?” Bill blinked up at Jheselbraum, the last vestiges of hope shrivelling up in his glistening eye.

“What kind of idiot makes friends with their rival?” Jheselbraum answered coldly. “You didn’t seriously believe that, did you? You’re my competition, of course we’re not friends.”

Jheselbraum began pacing circles around Bill as she continued her hateful speech.

“And to think Panoptes picked you to be his student. You were never worthy, an abnormal freak of nature, through and through. An aberration, just like you said you were. And Argus may think you’re some kind of prodigy, but clearly, you’re no genius. Then again, neither is he if all it takes to sway him is a few tears. Oh, there’s no use crying Bill. You may as well just give up now.”

Betrayal was slowly overtaking the shock, Bill’s expression turning to anger and outrage now, but Jheselbraum wasn’t done yet.

“Actually, there’s an idea. If you deliberately fail this test, I promise I won’t tell anyone what kind of a monster you are. It’ll just be our little secret. What do you say?” Jheselbraum tilted her head at Bill deviously, her true colours as a master manipulator revealed.

“V fnl lbh'er n tvnag ovgpu.” Bill growled, his hands clenched into fists.

“I’m guessing that’s a no.” Jheselbraum’s smile widened, and she shrugged, stepping back into the portal. “Oh well, you’ll have time to think it over while you’re supposed to be concentrating on the test. Good luck passing, buddy. I’ll see you, and everything you’ve ever done, on the other side.”

She gave a venomously sweet smile and retreated through the portal at that, having successfully rattled Bill right before their final exam.

It was true, Bill was rattled. His whole body was shaking, glitching with rage, and his eye was turning red the more he thought about it, his pupil small and panicked. Fire was spurting around his fists, and he knew he was close to losing control, but that would mean letting her win.

Jheselbraum was obsessed with winning, and clearly she thought she’d already won.

Inhaling deeply, Bill attempted to centre himself with the meditation techniques Argus had been teaching them, holding onto his anger, the heat of his temper focusing into a concentrated flame of rage he used to wrestle back his composure.

If Jheselbraum thought her little power play would scare Bill off at this point, she was clearly not as smart as she thought she was.

Bill followed her through the portal, and it closed behind him.
Peering through Jheselbraum’s eyes at this point, Argus was looking into his student’s final exam. Jheselbraum was sitting cross legged on the plinth before The Owl, staring up at it when Bill arrived.

The Owl was a cosmic creature, a colossal giant, larger than Argus, than the obsidian planet he lived on, larger than anything Jheselbraum had seen before, perched on a broken planet in the boundless chasm opposite, it’s two eyes like piercing pools reflecting the universe back at her. The gaze of The Owl was chilling to the core, like the creature was seeing into her soul, looming above her, it’s beak and claws ready to strike her down any second.

The Owl was intimidating and awe inspiring, and utterly silent to the point of being intensely unnerving. Just as Argus remembered it to be.

Jheselbraum registered Bill’s arrival in her peripheral vision, one of her seven eyes sliding over to look at him.

Bill wasn’t looking at her, he was staring determinately forward at The Owl, his eye furrowed into an intense look of concentration. Jheselbraum frowned, frustrated that her attempt to emotionally sabotage the triangle had failed. She didn’t want Bill to be on par with her. Forcing him to fail this exam would have been the only way she surpassed him as he was incredibly gifted and she hated it.

Her only hope to beat him now was if he spoke during this test but judging from the way he wouldn’t even look at her, focusing on The Owl, he was unwilling to self-sabotage this time.

Disgruntled, Jheselbraum turned her eye back to the front, committing herself to focusing on The Owl when she felt it.

A tickling heat at her ankle.

One of Jheselbraum’s eyes snapped down to see flickering blue light shining through the fabric of her skirt, and her other eye flicked over to Bill, the triangle still staring stubbornly forward, her other five eyes maintaining eye contact with The Owl.

The heat was growing now, not the playful cold fire Bill seemed to exude occasionally, not the warm heat he sometimes created for her on cold nights in the caverns, this was a purposeful burning heat, and it was beginning to sear at the flesh on Jheselbraum’s ankle. It was starting to truly hurt.

Two of Jheselbraum’s eyes turned to Bill now, utterly outraged by the retaliation. If Bill thought he could make Jheselbraum sabotage her own sacred rite, he had another thing coming. She was Jheselbraum the Unswerving. The most feared and accomplished warrior in her tribe, possibly her entire planet. It would take more than a little pain to break her.

Her refusal to budge must have signalled this to Bill, as after a while the flames started to spread from one small spot on her ankle, creeping up her calves, blistering the purple skin there.

Jheselbraum could smell her own skin cooking, and she was pressing her tongue to the roof of her mouth, grinding her teeth to hold back any sound. Tears were pricking at the corners of her seven eyes and she was livid, the only scream she was permitted to make sounding within her mind.

She looked to the side again, and saw Bill slowly raise a single figure to his eye, silently shushing her.

In his mind he must be laughing at her. He must think this is all a hilarious grand joke, just another in the long line of jokes he made at her expense, how hilarious it must be to outshine Jheselbraum, to sabotage Jheselbraum, to ruin everything for Jheselbraum with his very presence.

When the fire reached her thighs, Jheselbraum’s nails digging into her palms, she thought she saw Bill’s eye curve, smiling, and that was it for her.

She shrieked and stood up, her burnt legs weak and shaky.

Before she could lunge at Bill and ruin his test too, one of The Owl’s mammoth claws came down on her from above, stomping her out of its dimension forever.

Argus recognised the instant her sight aligned with his own, as it was when Jheselbraum was thrown back into the dimension of eternal night, landing in Argus’s obsidian cavern, screaming bloody murder.

Argus noticed now upon his second review that Jheselbraum’s screaming was enraged at first, born of utter frustration and anger, but the instant she realised Argus was in the cavern her screams became more pained and scared, mingling with sobs that became more believable when she fell forward onto the floor, her skirts hoisting with the movement, exposing the charred blistered skin on her legs.

“Jheselbraum my child, what happened to you?” Argus rushed over, helping her off the ground, examining her burns in horror.

“It was Bill. He sabotaged me. He was biding his time until we were at the final test and he burned me.” Jheselbraum accused, standing on shaky legs with Argus’ help. “He made me scream so he could have the power of all-sight all to himself. He was smiling when he did it. He’s evil, duplicitous – a monster. And to think I - I thought he was my friend.”

“Bill did this to you?” Argus was thrown by this, the thought jarring in his mind. “It can’t be.”

“It’s true.” Jheselbraum maintained. “He tricked you. He’s been playing us all. This was his plan all along, to steal the secrets of all-sight and prevent anyone else from doing the same. I’ve no doubt that when he comes back here, he means to kill you.”

“Why would Bill do that?” Argus boggled, the thought never having crossed his mind once before Jheselbraum suggested it, but now that she had things were aligning in his mind that he would have never pieced together.

“His past. He doesn’t want anyone to see what he did.” Jheselbraum insisted, her words ringing with a surety and authority she shouldn’t possess. “He’d kill you, he tried to kill me. We can’t let him do that. We can’t let him win.”

“What would you have me do child?” Argus looked down at Jheselbraum in askance, supporting her weight as she hobbled over to the nearby chair, sitting on it so Argus might inspect her injuries.

“An eye for an eye.” Jheselbraum hissed, as Argus gently touched her leg, the charred skin irreparably damaged. “It’s the only way.”
“An eye for an eye?” Argus repeated, meeting the steely look Jheselbraum was giving him, tears still pricking in all seven of her eyes but doing nothing to hide the determination and ferocity that dwelled within them. “Very well, my child. You shall have your justice.”

When Bill returned from The Owl’s dimension, it was with an expression of bitter resignation in his eye. His trial was completed successfully, and now, now he could see everything.

Every detail of the past, and the capacity to see every detail of the present and future as well, all at once.

However, Bill knew what he was looking for, and he was devastated to find it.

Looking in the past consumed his thoughts.

It was a shame, really, that he didn’t pay a little more attention to the present.

Floating through the obsidian hallways to Argus’ main chamber, Bill was not prepared for what was to happen when he turned the corner.

Without warning, he was grabbed, Argus’ giant hand holding his form steady as his free hand flew forward, steady as a crane’s beak, jamming his fingers into the socket of Bill’s eye.

Bill let out a pained cry, and began to struggle in Argus’ grasp, his small black arms clawing at Argus’ hand ineffectively as the giant began to pull out Bill’s eye, snapping the root of the optic nerve with a mighty yank.

Tears welled up in the hollow of Bill’s eye, the glow of his bricks flaring with distress as the giant released him and straightened up to examine the eye in the palm of his hand.

“Why?” Argus could hear Bill croak weakly, sobbing outright now.

Looking down at the broken triangle, Argus decided against keeping or eating Bill’s eye, and flexed his hand, crushing Bill’s eyeball into a fine paste before wiping his hand against the wall.

“You know what you did.”

“I didn’t mean to.” Bill pleaded, clutching at his surface, hands running over the space where his eye was, horrified. “It was an accident.”

“I will have no excuses from you. That was no accident.” Argus scowled, looming over the triangle before pointing at the ground below Bill’s feet, a black hole opening there to suck Bill out of the dimension of eternal night and spit him out somewhere far far away. “You are to leave this place, and never return, Bill. You are no longer my student.”

Bill felt the black hole’s pull and struggled against it for a moment, before his brow furrowed up at Argus irately, even while his eyelids were jammed shut. Raising a hand, Bill clicked once, summoning the top hat he gave to Argus from the giant’s storeroom, grasping it in his hand.

“You won’t mind if I take this back then.”
Sparing no more time for banter, Argus gestured for the black hole to rise, swallowing the triangle up into its unfathomable centre before closing behind him, sealing off forever.

The caves were quiet after that. Too quiet, and Argus frowned at the space where Bill had been for a while until a gentle voice called out from behind him.

“You did the right thing.”

Turning back to look at Jheselbraum, Argus sighed.

“Maybe so, but it hurts my heart to do so.”

“You still have one student you can rely on.” Jheselbraum hobbled closer to Argus on her makeshift crutches, raising her hand up to place it on the back of Argus’ leg in a consoling fashion. “I know what will make you feel better. How about teaching me something new?”

Resigning himself to his actions, Argus sighed again, before following Jheselbraum to the practice rooms. “Very well.”

Argus had to look away, well aware that he had just revisited what may very well have been the greatest mistake of his life.

Tracking Bill down after he left Argus’ dimension was tricky business. Argus had taught the triangle himself how to block others from seeing through his eye, and Bill was always a quick study, employing the technique immediately after his banishment.

It took some searching before Argus could find another eye he could use to see the triangle through. Thankfully this eye was quite observant, large, and pink.

“So, what are you in for?”

Pyronica blinked down at the yellow triangle in the typical striped black and white prison garb staring back up at her from down by the floor. The uniform hung off his angles in an unfortunate manner, and for some unfathomable reason he had a black and white prison cap floating above his topmost point.

What kind of triangle needed to wear a hat?

Even Pyronica didn’t wear the hat.

Choosing to narrow her eyes bitterly, Pyronica said nothing, but that didn’t seem to deter her new roommate, who laughed and waved his hand at her casually.

“So, nothing, huh? Yeah, I’m in for nothing too.”

When Pyronica only continued to glare at the triangle from the other side of their shared cell, resolutely ignoring him, the triangle shrugged nonchalantly and settled down in his own bunk, crossing his legs and drumming his fingertips against the rim of the bed melodically, purposefully irritating.
Eventually his eye curved at her in an evident smile, and he glowed a bright gold as he told her.

“I can tell we’re going to be best friends.”

When Pyronica rolled over in her bunk, turning her back to him, she heard him speak again, his voice echoing with certainty.

“Yep. Best friends forever.”

It seemed he was being serious, as from that first day he was brought into the Infinitentiary, Bill Cipher stuck to Pyronica like glue.

He followed her to and from mealtimes, playing pranks on the other inmates, flipping their trays over and levitating the food to dance around them in the air to squeeze a laugh out of Pyronica. He sat beside her in shop hours, nattering away about interdimensional comedies while they assembled cosmic birdhouses and licence plates. He claimed the brittle fold out chair beside her during prison sanctioned movie nights, throwing popcorn at the screen and singing along with the musical numbers.

Every night before it was lights out in the prison, Bill would whisper “Goodnight best friend” to her from across the other side of the cell, and Pyronica would curl up on her cot and pretend the words didn’t delight her, pretend she wasn’t listening.

She wasn’t stupid. From the moment he entered the Infinitentiary, Pyronica heard the rumours floating about.

That this was Bill Cipher. The same Bill Cipher who challenged Time Baby himself. Who blew up the Globnar colosseum. Who tried to kill Time Baby in front of his entire assembled police force. Who tried to steal a time wish.

He had quite the reputation already, the sort of reputation he could be using to rule this prison, to become one of the big bosses here, the head honchos. He could have made the inmates eat from the palm of his hand, if he was really as dangerous as his wrap sheet indicated.

But for some reason, rather than climb up the food chain within the prison system, he was sucking up to Pyronica, the one inmate who didn’t have criminal contacts on the outside, who could never leave the Infinitentiary without surrendering herself to the state, and who didn’t care about the petty squabbles that happened within the prison’s ecosystem.

She was more likely to eat inmates who bothered her than contribute to their machismo power struggles, and she wasn’t sure what exactly Cipher had to gain from hanging around her.

Unless his goal was to be eaten, the only thing there was to gain from following Pyronica around like this was… a friend.

That night, after Bill had elbowed her several times throughout the film, pointing out the outfits and pizazz and charm that these old human movies oozed aplenty, they were ordered back to their cells for the night, and, same as always, when the warden shut the lights out, Pyronica heard Bill whisper.

“Goodnight best friend.”

Tonight, rather than ignore him, Pyronica paused, and then rolled over in her cot to face him, staring at the glowing gold triangle, his form acting like a nightlight in the dingy dark cell.

“Why do you always say that?” She whispered back to him curiously.

“What? Goodnight? Time is an illusory construct, I know, but it’s more of a social nicety really.” Bill responded, cosying up on his side too, pillowing his hands beneath his hypotenuse, mirroring her posture.

“No. The other thing.” Pyronica pressed, before forcing the words out in a pained whisper. “Best friend.”

“Because you are my best friend.” Bill answered simply. “And if you’re not now, you will be.”

“Because you can see the future? That’s what everyone’s saying.” Pyronica shifted on her thin cot, blinking her eye at Bill.

“Seeing into the future is a waste of time.” Bill replied. “I can do it, but it takes so long, and nothing about it is set in stone. One small thing could change, and then the future you’re looking at just disappears, and you have to do the looking all over again. It’s not worth it.”

“Then how do you know we’ll be best friends?” Pyronica whispered.

Bill fidgeted for a moment, looking away almost nervously, before he met her gaze again, his eye almost apologetic.

“Because I’ve seen your past.”

Pyronica’s eye widened with horror, and before she could process her shock into outrage, Bill flung his hands out.

“Wait, wait, wait! I meant our pasts are similar. We’ve been through the same things. I understand you. How can we not be friends?”

“How could you understand what I’ve been through?” Pyronica asked thickly, anger brewing in her voice. “How?”

“You’ve lost your parents, your family, your entire people. It wasn’t fair how it happened, and it will never be fair. Because you’re the only one left it feels like it was your fault. Everyone treats you like a monster because of it, or maybe just because of you and what you are, but it isn’t who you are.” Bill’s eye was wide with understanding, beseeching her to see that he knew what it felt like, that he really did understand her, because judging from the emotion in his voice, it had happened to him too. “You’re not a monster. You weren’t one before, and you’re not one now. You’re just a kid.”

Pyronica stared at Bill until her eye hurt, tears welling, her eye shiny in the reflected light of his glow.

“No one’s ever said that to me.” She eventually said, the words coming out more like a sob.

“What, that you’re a kid?” Bill joked, quirking his brow.
“That I’m not a monster.” Pyronica answered, her throat clogged with feeling.

“If I’m not a monster, you’re not a monster.” Bill said resolutely.

“And how do you know you’re not a monster, when everyone tells you that you are?” Pyronica questioned, hanging desperately on the answer.

“Because I have to believe it.” Bill said solemnly. “It’s the only lie that matters.”

Pyronica chewed this information over for a while, also chewing on the inside of her cheek as she mulled it over.

“I think you’re right.” She said eventually, looking up at Bill, her eye alight with optimism.

“About what?” Bill prompted, and Pyronica’s face split into the widest grin she’d made in years.

“We are gonna be best friends. I’ve never had a best friend before.”

Bill’s expression was distant for a moment, before his eye curved in a sad smile.

“I guess I haven’t either.”

“So, best friend, what do you think?”

Grabbing their lunch trays, Bill and Pyronica were walking to their regular table in the cafeteria, Bill floating by Pyronica’s elbow.

Looking down at the triangle with a smile brewing, Pyronica asked. “What do I think about what, best friend?”

“How about getting out of here. What’s your escape plan?”

Pyronica sat down at the too small table, her knees bunching up as she attempted to perch on the tiny bench provided. She set her tray in front of her and frowned, her brow pinching as she looked at Bill.

“No one’s ever escaped the Infinitentiary. This place is a fortress. It’s impossible.”

Passing the food from his tray onto hers, Bill countered her. “Just because nobody’s done it yet, doesn’t mean it’s impossible.”

“People have tried everything though.” Pyronica insisted. “Prison riots, impersonating the guards, taking hostages, hijacking the system, dissolving the cell bars with acid. None of it worked because the Infinitentiary exists within one of Time Baby’s loop enforcements. Every time someone escapes, the guards just wind back to before the attempt happened and stop it from ever happening.”

“Damn.” Bill set his tray down and rubbed the bricks beside his eye, thinking. “Does the loop enforcement exist outside the prison, or only within its walls?”
“I mean, it’s Time Baby’s loop, so who knows what he could do.” Pyronica shrugged and started scooping some unidentifiable meal sludge up with a deep-fried fish stick, shovelling the goop into her mouth, continuing to talk with her mouth full. “As far as I know though he doesn’t pay that much attention to the prison. Real lock ‘em up and leave ‘em. Once the loop was set up, he just crawled away to focus on something else.”

“We need to find out how far outside the prison the time loop extends.” Bill said, counting down on his fingers, growing more fingers as needed for his checklist. “Then we need to find out how the guards, dignitaries and other officials leave the time loop, if there’s some sort of process to check them out. Then we need to find out everyone who’s ever attempted to escape before and how far they got. Then we need to find out the routines for the guards who monitor our cells, and how long we’d have until someone notices we left. Then we need to find out what backup security measures we’d face if we managed to escape the actual loop of the prison. Then we need to find out where they’re keeping our stuff.”

“How?” Pyronica blinked at Bill curiously.

“I want my hat back.”

“Oh.” Pyronica nodded. That made sense. She didn’t know why anyone would want to keep wearing the unflattering Infinitentiary prison cap, but Bill still did, perhaps as a placeholder for his original hat. She hoped the hat he wanted back was nicer than this one.

“There must be some kind of power dampener on the prison, as ever since I got here, I haven’t been able to use my fire.” Bill mused, rubbing under his eye pensively.

“You have fire? That’s so cool. I wish I had fire.” Pyronica pouted, imagining breathing fire on her enemies.

“I’ve noticed though that that’s all that’s been blocked by the dampeners.” Bill continued. “I’m thinking the prison only blocks the powers they’re aware of, and since I have other tricks up my sleeve they don’t know about, I’ve still got options there.”

“Did you use fire against Time Baby?” Pyronica asked curiously.

“Yeah, if you call losing my temper using it.” Bill muttered. “For all the good it did me.”

“Is it true you tried to kill Time Baby?” Pyronica probed, trying her luck.

“What’s it to you if I did?” Bill asked shrewdly, narrowing his eye at Pyronica.

“If I’d have known you could do that, I’d have tried the same, that’s all.” Pyronica said with a shrug. “I would’ve thought the consequences for trying though would make it not worth it. I mean, you are in prison.”

“A temporary consequence.” Bill waved his hand dismissively. “If there’s one thing that I’ve learned from discovering Time Baby is a thing, it’s that nothing we do matters. None of our actions have consequences in a world where the timeline isn’t fixed. If the only thing holding us accountable in life is a diaper wearing tyrant holding the reigns to a linear timeline, as soon as he’s out of the picture, we control the timeline. No decisions are permanent, no mistakes are unfixable, we can pick and choose what things stick in our universe. Until I get to a point where I can do away with timeline dictators, I’ve decided nothing I do counts. All of it can be redone, so none of it really matters.”

“So, everything just gets redone? You don’t think before then you’ll reach a point where you like how things are going enough to let it play out normally?” Pyronica asked, picking fish sticks out of her teeth.

“Highly doubtful, but if I find a moment I like enough to postpone abolishing the known laws of the universe for, I’ll let you know.” Bill said sarcastically, raising his brow at the cyclops.

“I guess that means as your best friend, I get to make sure you have a damn good time until the day you do kill Time Baby, just in case something grabs your attention.” Pyronica smiled at Bill and waggled her brow back at him.

“I like the way you think Pink. Indulgence, and then total universal domination.” Bill clicked his finger and nodded, obviously pleased with her response. “Good to know you’ll get me there in style.”

“Makes sense now why you didn’t bother climbing the dumb ladder here within the prison. You’ve got better things to focus on than who gets the most cigarettes or whatever. You’ve got a universe to liberate, and a giant baby to kill.”

“If you feel like joining me, you can be there when it happens. For killing Time Baby, subverting reality and taking over the universe itself, not to mention all the fun stuff that comes after it.” Bill offered, extending his hand out to Pyronica lightly.

“Oh, I’d love that.” Pyronica bared her teeth in a vicious grin. “I’d gladly help you rip him apart.”

“And when we remake time, we can fix my past, we can fix your past, we can bring our parents back. If we get that far, I can promise I’ll do that for you.” Bill said with sincerity, still holding his hand out for her, glowing brightly now. “So, what do you say? You’ll stick with me to the end? Best friends forever?”

“It’s a crazy plan. Like some sort of fantastical dream.” Pyronica said bluntly, before her grin blossomed again. “But if anyone’s crazy enough to pull it off, it’s you. I’m in. Best friends forever.”

She extended her hand out and grasped Bill’s tiny hand in her massive claw, missing the jolt of power flowing through him when she shook his hand, sealing the deal.

“You’ve gotta get us out of this prison first, dreamer.” She reminded him.

“I’m working on it.” Bill said, still holding onto Pyronica’s hand. “I’ve gotta search for the answers to our prison break questions. If I start looking, will you lead me around for a while and cover for me?”

“I mean, sure I guess, but what do you mean cover for yo – WOAH!” Pyronica tried to moderate her shout, drawing the attention of the inmates briefly. Bill had zoned out completely in that instant, his eye fizzing with static, held afloat only by Pyronica holding his hand at this point.

Pyronica guessed that meant he was looking for their answers, but it seemed like while he did she’d have to tote him around the prison so nobody would disturb him while he looked.

Her frustration lasted only for a moment, as she regarded the small triangle who offered so much to her, only asking for loyalty and friendship in return.

There were worse things, Pyronica reasoned, than holding hands with your best friend for a while.
Bill still seemed to be meditating in their cell, hovering with his legs crossed and his fingers pressed together in the shape of an upside-down triangle, static fizzing in his half-lidded eye, when Pyronica started stretching, getting ready to leave.

“I don’t know if you can hear me like that, but in a while they’re gonna come get me for training. Will you be okay to wait here? You’re not gonna explode or fall over or get beat up if I leave you like this?” Pyronica asked, holding her arm across her chest, stretching her shoulder.

“Training?” Bill asked, without looking up.

“Yeah, the prison makes me do combat training every three months, and some Federation stooges come watch. They want me to agree to join their enforcement team, and they try to recruit me every time.” Brushing her hair back from her face, Pyronica bent down to check her reflection in the small mirror above the sink. “I’ve been practising new and creative ways to say no to them. This time I think I’ll go with ‘I’d rather pull your intestines out and wear them as a scarf’. I think it sends the right message.”

“You always say no?” Bill asked, seeming to withdraw from his trance now, rousing to interest in Pyronica’s situation.

“Well, I mix it up, but yeah. They just have to get used to disappointment.”

“What if you said yes?” Bill’s eye was open now, watching Pyronica shrewdly.

“I’m never going to say yes.” Pyronica said reflexively, not catching Bill’s drift just yet. “Those bastards killed my family.”

“But what would happen if you told them Y-E-S?” Bill stared at her, unblinking, waiting for her to get it.

“I’d have to go work for them.” Pyronica answered with a frown. “Guard diplomats and hold doors open for people with superiority complexes and beat up innocent criminals whenever the Federation wants. I’m not going to do that.”

“You would go work for them where?” Bill pressed.

“I just said I’m not going to work for them Bill.” Pyronica stomped her foot on the ground in frustration. “Not ever.”

“Py, darling Py.” Bill floated up from his meditative position, reaching out for her hand before patting it fondly. “I’m not asking you to work for them, I’m asking if a yes would get you out of this prison? As in would they physically escort you off the premises?”

“Oh.” Pyronica’s eye widened with understanding, before she looked down at Bill, nodding, in on the idea now. “Ohhhhhhhhh.”

“They would?”

“Yeah. They definitely would. That’s their selling point. ‘Wouldn’t you like to get out of this prison’ that sort of bullshit. But I’m not going to leave you behind like that. Best friends forever,
“I’m not asking you to sell out Py. I’m planning our escape attempt. It will only work if we leave together.” Bill patted her hand again, coaxing her over to the idea. “But I think you’ve just got our ticket out of here sorted.”

“Does this mean I don’t get to use my no? I thought about this one for ages.” Pyronica pouted.

“Tell them no this time.” Bill said, giving her hand a squeeze before floating back over to the bed, crossing his legs and assuming the meditative position again. “Make it a really good one. You say they come every three months?”

“Uhuh.” Pyronica nodded.

“That gives us three months to plan, make alliances we can use on the outside, and create diversions.” Bill tented his fingers again, glowing gold with promise. “This will be our last three months inside the Infinitentiary. We’ve got to savour them.”

Pyronica gave Bill a funny look at that, but already his eye was fizzling with static again, scanning through the past escape attempts to perfectly plot their own prison break.

When the guards came to get Pyronica, for once she was smiling as she was led away to combat training, and when the Federation asked her again, she was positively beaming as she delivered her politest and most effusive no fucking way.

Bill had been sparing with details about the plan, keeping Pyronica in the dark for the most part, pulling the strings behind the scenes, and that suited her just fine. She saw him schmoozing with the various gangs within the prison, sweet talking the lunch lady, winning his weird tall hat back in a game of cards and heckling the guards in a friendly manner, all to lull them into a false sense of security. He ensured that on the day of their escape there would be so many simultaneous factors going off that something was sure to slip through the cracks of the Infinitentiary, that something ideally being them.

Now, fifteen minutes before go time, Bill was finally explaining the plan to her, although Pyronica was only half listening, practising her punches and combat forms in between fixing her hair in the cell mirror.

“So then while that’s going off in the kitchen, Biggs will start a riot in the rec yard when I give the signal, and the guards by the control room start their routine changeover and smoke break. By that time, we’ll be with the Federation delegation, out of the Time Loop, and on our way to freedom.”

“That’s great. So, when do I get to beat them up again?” Pyronica asked distractedly.

“When I give the signal.” Bill said with a sigh, trying to ensure all the pieces of his plan were in place.

“Which is when?”
“You’ll know when. It’s a pretty big signal. You can’t miss it.”

Pyronica shrugged, taking Bill at his word, and made a few more elbow jabs at the mirror, finishing off her routine with a roundhouse kick, her foot just brushing the surface of the glass.

Beside her, Bill concentrated, squeezing his eye shut, his molecules vibrating before splitting, his yellow bricks wrenching away from him to form a mirror image of his triangular form beside of him, his double blinking and waving independently.

“Alright, we’ve got our handsome devil decoy in position.” Bill gestured to his illusory double, who saluted him and winked before floating over to sit on Bill’s bunk, pretending to meditate. “The guards are coming in a few minutes. Now all that’s left is for you to eat me.”

Pyronica halted her routine and swung around to look at Bill in shock. “What???”

“I’m not going to eat myself. Chop chop! Open up!” Bill floated upwards and reached for Pyronica’s jaw, trying to prise it open.

“Are you saying it wouldn’t be gross if we weren’t friends?” Bill raised his brow quizzically, teasing her.

“That’s not the point! I thought we were gonna be best friends forever? How is me eating you going to achieve that? Unlike the other people I eat, I sort of actually like having you around, you know.”

“Relax, Py. It’s only temporary. Just until we get out of the Time Loop, then I just phase right through your stomach and we’re copacetic. Easy as Py.” Bill poked her cheek, his eye curving with a smile. “Come on, if I’m not inside you when we escape, you’ll miss out on the best part.”

“What best part?” She narrowed her eye at him suspiciously.

“Haven’t you always wanted to breathe fire on your enemies?” Bill waggled his brow temptingly.

It was tempting indeed. Pyronica thought about the prospect for four wonderful seconds, before she straightened up.

“Right. Bottoms up!”

Her tongue shot out and wrapped around the triangle, surprising him as he was yanked swiftly into Pyronica’s mouth and swallowed immediately.

Pyronica could feel the heat of him sinking down her throat and settling into her belly, and she felt guilty for a few small seconds before Bill’s double gave her an approving thumbs up.

She swallowed him just in time too, as several seconds after one of the guards came to escort her to combat training.

“Don’t have too much fun without me.” Bill’s double waved at her cheerfully as the guards led her away.

“Don’t worry.” Pyronica smirked, feeling confident with her best friend’s warmth heating her from within. “I won’t.”
When the space bus reached the end of the line, stopping by a floating restaurant on the edge of a swirling nebula, Stanford thought the logo on the front of the restaurant looked familiar, oddly so.

It reminded Stanford of the crop circles he’d seen etched onto the cows back in the field near the crash site nearly thirty years ago. It was nearly identical.

Bill had said the cow circles were simply interdimensional graffiti left by a rebellious alien teen, striking out against authority figures with all of the renegade zeal teenagers were presumed to have, but Stanford had come to know better than to simply accept what Bill had told him by this point.

Running it past his dimensional translator, the readout displayed the translated phrase: Glarbo’s Intergalactic House of Pancakes & Weapons! Come for the breakfast, stay for the dark matter hyper cannons!

“Oh another lie. Why am I not surprised?” Stanford muttered, tapping his translator once to minimise the holographic screen, lifting his duffel bag full of scrapped parts over his shoulder and heading towards the restaurant.

He had already separated the necessary parts for the gun from the rest of his things in the nano-briefcase he inherited from Raha, having come to learn that whipping out a nano-briefcase in a public place was likely to attract police attention due to the illegality of the item. The duffel bag was less convenient, and a great deal heavier than storing his things in the nano-briefcase but if it meant Stanford wouldn’t get arrested, a sore back from carrying the duffel was a price worth paying.

The bell above the restaurant door chimed when Stanford walked in, and the attendant behind the counter gave Stanford a friendly ‘Welcome to Glarbo’s’, wiping down the countertop while an array of weaponry was displayed in the cases behind him, the sweet smell of pancakes and maple syrup bracketed with harsh metal and chemical scents wafting through the establishment.

There were few patrons in the restaurant, an old porous looking vagabond in one of the corner booths, snoozing into a plate of pancakes, a miserable amphibian fellow openly crying into his meal sitting up by the counter, and the resolutely cheerful pink-skinned three-eyed four-armed server, humming a tune as he cleaned the surfaces down with a cloth.

Stanford eyed off several of the weapons and parts displayed on the wall, mentally going over what items he could incorporate in the design for his Bill-blaster, before his eyes lit upon the menu, his stomach grumbling assertively.

Considering how frugal he had been with sourcing the rest of the parts for the gun, finding exorbitant discounts, and occasionally outright stealing parts for the weapon (the old six-fingered discount), he reasoned he had a little leeway with spending the QUID Jheselbraum gave him on some sustenance, as it had been so long since he’d had real food. Ration bars were affordable, but his disdain for the bars only percolated, remembering the way Bill had wrinkled his nose at them knowingly.

Nostalgia for the food he once made gripped him, fuelling his decision, fond remembrance of Stan-cakes and sunlit mornings in his kitchen, watching the jam jars float in time with the song playing on the radio cementing his choice and he approached the counter to place his order.

“A stack of pancakes please.”

“Coffee would be nice.” Stanford conceded, taking the table marker the server slid his way. “I’ll get back to you on the grenades.”

“Excellent choice. Excellent. I’ll bring you out a weapons menu with your meal. Won’t be too long.” The server took down Stanford’s order and slapped the paper print out on the rack leading back into the kitchen, dinging a bell to let the articulated crustacean in the kitchen know to start cooking Ford’s order. “Stack of pancakes and a shot of joe for table bleven!”

Taking his table marker with him, Stanford slid into one of the booths along the wall of the diner, far away from the oozing homeless fellow who smelled more pungent than the food, claiming the other corner booth on the far side of the restaurant so he could keep his back to the wall.

Unfortunately, this put him in close proximity to the catfish faced patron who insisted on seasoning his pancakes with tears, his whiskers dripping with his own fluids, but Stanford had enough experience with emotional repression to ignore this gentleman’s outburst.

He set his duffel bag on the booth chair beside him and began pulling out parts, continuing work on the assembly of his blaster while he was waiting for his food.

The blaster had been coming along nicely. Stanford was following the loose blueprints Jheselbraum had given him, putting his own flair on the weapon, taking a little extra time to ensure he was triple checking each component he installed in the gun, having learned his lesson about following gifted blueprints blindly before.

This weapon wouldn’t be like the portal, Stanford reasoned. With the portal, Stanford was blinded to the truth of what he was building by the rose-coloured glasses he wore, naively trusting the benefactor of the blueprints, assuming he was doing things right because he didn’t think Bill would steer his progress astray.

The old adage fool me once, shame on you, fool me twice shame on me ran on loop in Stanford’s head, conveniently ignoring just how many times Bill had fooled him throughout their time together.

He wouldn’t repeat the mistakes of the past now. He was determined to analyse every aspect of these blueprints, to personalise the weapon to ensure it was just as much about what he wanted as it was what Jheselbraum desired it to be. Not just fulfilling her idea of Stanford’s destiny, but doing it with flair.

Personalisation was a wonderful thing, Stanford thought to himself as he took a sharpie from his duffel bag, carefully penning a triangle shape dead in the middle of the sights on the ray gun, making sure all the edges were perfectly symmetrical just as Bill was. Personalisation was in the little things, like creating this weapon to aim perfectly at the shape of his ex. It was in the satisfaction of a job well done, those little personalised details. That flair. That panache.

The server came over to Ford’s table, holding his plate of pancakes, some cutlery, a mug, and a jug of dark black coffee in his four arms, pausing to peer at the scope Stanford was currently working “Wow, you sure are good at that. Perfectly symmetrical that equilateral. I don’t know how you do it.”

Peering down his nose through his glasses Stanford penned the final lines on the edges of the scope, his mouth hanging slightly open as he drew, ensuring the rifle blast would aim directly into the centre of Bill’s eye, his lines perfect given the hundreds of drawings of Bill he had made throughout the years.

“Lots of practice.” Ford admitted absently, fixing one final line before setting the scope and pen down and clearing the table to make room for the food.

“You’re working on quite the project, aren’t ya?” The server set down Ford’s food, gesturing to the weapon with his free hand. “I bet that packs a punch.”

“It will.” Ford said, patting the gun’s scaffold fondly before reaching for his coffee cup, inhaling the pleasantly noxious scent of industrial strength caffeine. “It’s still a work in progress.”

Passing Stanford a weapons menu, the server removed the table marker from Ford’s table. “Well if you see anything you fancy from here you want to add onto that big boy, you just let me know.”

“Thank you. I will.” Stanford promised, and began to tuck into his meal, pausing every few bites to flip through the weapons menu.

Over by the counter, Stanford couldn’t help but overhear the server speaking with the patron sitting up by the bar, still sniffling wetly into his meal.

“Hey Ingénue, you want me to heat those up for you again? They’ve gotta be getting cold. No one likes cold pancakes.”

“It’s what I deserve.” Sobbed the miserable man, his pale blue skin glistening, either from the tear tracks or the scales that covered his body, oddly enough matching the shining silver accents he wore on his clothing, and the ornate metal cuffs on his wrists. “I don’t deserve to eat hot pancakes after what I’ve done.”

“Come on, Ingénue, man, you’ve gotta let it go. It’s been thousands of years. You can’t keep holding onto this, and I can’t keep wiping your tears off the counter, it’s bad for business. What would Glarbo say if he knew I let you in here to cry in front of the weapons display every day. I’d get the sack.”

“I’m sorry Glarbon.” Ingénue sniffled. “You’ve been so generous to me but you remind me of him so much and whenever I think of him I –”

“Woah. Don’t go comparing me to a God Ingénue. Glarbo knows my ego doesn’t need it.” Laughed Glarbon lightly.

Stanford’s ears pricked up proverbially at the mention of Gods, having finished his meal, pretending to focus on tweaking his weapon whilst attempting to actively eavesdrop now.

“It’s not that you look like him. It’s not. You’ve got four arms, and he only had two and he was an ethereal being of unquantified proportions and you’re –“

“I get it Ingénue, you don’t need to spell it out for me.” Glarbon said flatly, not enjoying the unflattering comparisons.
“But you’re so generous, just like he was. You didn’t have to let me stay here. You could have kicked me out ages ago. You give me food, a place to stay, free breadsticks on weekends. I feel so bad for taking from you like this.”

“You’re not taking anything Ingénue, I’m giving it to you, and you’re also paying for it, so it’s not like I’m going wanting here buddy.” Glarbon said, leaning two of his elbows against the counter and pillowing his chin with his other two hands, watching the blue scaled man with sympathy.

“I’ve already been given so much. Longevity, health, wealth, happiness, knowledge. It was just in his nature to give, and then people took, and thought it would be okay because he never said otherwise.” Ingénue explained tearfully. “I tried to give back, but I should have given more, done more. When I made the transference bracers, he jumped at the opportunity to give his power, to save the people, but no one ever thought to save him. He never asked to be saved, but he never asked for anything, he was just that generous.”

“So you’ve said before.” Glarbon sighed, and pushed back off the counter, wiping down another puddle of tears from the countertop. “I’m not asking for you to save anything Ingénue I’m just suggesting, there’s gotta be a way for you to move on from this. You can’t keep holding onto the past forever, and you can’t keep crying all over my restaurant. I’m burning through mops here, it’s ridiculous.”

“What happened is my greatest regret. How do you expect me to just move on from it? How do you get over the God who gave you everything?”

Deciding to speak up, chiming into the discussion while polishing the barrel of his blaster, Stanford said. “Personally, I plan to just kill him.”

Ingénue twisted on his chair to look at Stanford, his whiskers twitching miserably at Ford’s dramatic statement, before he asked. “What do you do if you’ve already done that? What comes after?”

Stanford was thrown by this question, especially in relation to what happens after he kills Bill. Honestly, he didn’t think there would be an after, but there would certainly be a legacy from that sort of destiny fulfillment. He didn’t know what he’d do after Bill was out of the picture. It wasn’t like there was another evil world-destroying triangle he could obsess over.

“You think you’re doing the right thing.” Ingénue continued, his voice thick with emotion. “And you’ve got all of the right reasons backing up your logic, and no one is telling you no, but when it’s all over and things can’t be undone you’re the one who’ll have to live with it, and it never goes away.”

Stanford uncomfortably wiped his mouth with his napkin, dabbing away maple syrup rather than engaging with this amphibious fellow’s emotional struggle, no matter how closely it related to his own.

Cottoning on that Stanford wasn’t about to contribute to his pity party, Ingénue turned back to the counter, his head hanging low above his pancakes. “It hurts, being loved, loving someone, and then letting them down. It hurts knowing that my actions contributed to his demise, and I’ll never get the chance to fix those mistakes. I can never undo what I have done. I can’t get him back and I miss him every day.”

Setting his napkin down, Stanford packed away his gear in the duffel, slid out of the booth and brought the weapons menu up to the counter, pointing to the grenades menu. “I’ll have a dozen of these, please.”
Glarbon retrieved the grenades for Stanford, throwing in a complimentary grenades belt, and processed his payment, packaging them up for Ford, forcing his usual cheerful customer service demeanour despite the emotional downer that was Ingénue crying into his pancakes once more.

Picking up his purchases, Ford packed them in the duffel, deciding that waiting for the next space bus to the depot would be better than sitting in here listening to the blue fish man blubber loudly about his personal problems to anyone who would listen.

“If only he could see me now, I wonder what he would say.” Ford heard Ingénue sob as he headed out the door, the ring of the bell obscuring Ingénue’s final word on the matter, swallowed by circumstance and copious dramatic irony.

“Antelias.”

After witnessing what may just have been the most infamous prison escape in Infinitentiary history, Argus was convinced that it wasn’t prison that warped Bill into a someone who would kill his mentor and destroy worlds. Certainly, the boy had killed to escape, a mirthful light-hearted spree with his friend, breathing fire on the Federation delegation and blowing an enormous hole in the wall of the Time Loop, enabling the escape of several other prisoners as well, but it wasn’t that crucial point of no return. Argus still didn’t understand yet.

Prison wasn’t where Bill had gone wrong, where he had strayed from the path. Argus was hoping, with growing trepidation, that his betrayal wasn’t the straw that broke the camel’s back, that it wasn’t the defining moment that cemented his death at Bill’s hands.

It was with a weary resignation that the giant realised that if Bill’s turning point wasn’t his incarceration, and it wasn’t Jheselbraum’s carefully constructed betrayal back as a student and his own blind complicity with the deed, then it must have been before then, during a time Argus had purposefully up til this point, refused to examine.

A man’s past is his own, goes the saying, but those who do not study history are doomed to repeat it, and Argus needed to know which of his own mistakes secured his doom at his student’s hands. He needed to know.

As Bill had warded his eye, Argus couldn’t see through it into the triangle’s history, but there was still one option available to the all-seeing giant.

Although it wasn’t a very pleasant one.

Trudging through the obsidian halls, Argus stopped at the room in which he had banished Bill, staring hard at the wall, lost in thought for a moment, before drawing on some old, lost magics, dust stirring up on the floor.

Slowly, several molecules rose from the dusty ground, compiling together until a vague shape began to form. The dust collated and hardened, until a grey, patchy sphere hovered in the air between Argus’ hands.

The sphere was cracked, missing parts, hardly the perfect shape it once was, but after several moments of intense concentration it became clear that this was as whole as it was ever going to be.

Bill’s old crushed eye, reformed, unwarded, would have to do.

If Argus were to see his past without letting Bill know he was doing so, this reconstruction would be necessary to glimpse the turning point that lead to his destruction.

Focusing his power onto delving into the mysteries this eye held, initially Argus found the reception patchy, glitching, images and shapes flickering vaguely across the eye, as colours do flit across the back of the eye when one dreams.

After pouring more energy into the endeavour, eventually an image came into focus.

An orange tinted one eyed triangle with long lashes was leaning over the eye, long black arms reaching down to straighten a bow-tie onto the viewer, who could only be Bill, the orange triangle taking great care to affix the bow tie perfectly.

“My funny little angle. You look very smart for the Circles.” Despite the bow tie being tied perfectly, the orange triangle still took time to adjust it unnecessarily, almost as if she was delaying to prolong her affection. “Very smart.”

The image glitched again, colours and shapes whirling past, the boisterous shouts of children playing heard amid a familiar voice shouting. “Who wants to see a magic trick?!”

Fire flared and then the image glitched back to the orange triangle, a pale yellow triangle standing beside her, wearing an office tie on his bricks, his hand stretching around the orange triangle, resting on her shoulder. His eye crinkled in a fond but condescending manner.

“I’m sure we’ll see you real soon, kiddo. Those Circles know what they’re doing.”

“Be good for them Bill. We’ll be waiting for you.” The orange triangle said with more warmth in her tone. “They’ll fix everything, and then we can be a family again.”

Through the crumbling eye Argus could feel more than he could see the ice cold touch of a hand on Bill’s upper arm, leading him away, and the image of his parents went up in flames.

“We’ve got another one.” Came a stern voice, Bill’s eye alighting briefly on an imposing square, frogmarching Bill into a room and throwing him forward slightly, before a cohort of Circles, all wearing pompous headwear to showcase their wealth, the Circles looking imperiously down on the little yellow triangle.

“He doesn’t look like an aberration.” Commented one Circle, looking over Bill’s lines. “He’s a perfect equilateral.”

“They’re becoming more insidious.” Another Circle replied, and it felt as if the vision had skipped ahead in the discussion substantially, all the Circles now frowning with concern. “This requires further examination.”

“Put him with the others.”

The images faded, became blurry for a while, just colours and sounds flashing by, too loud yet muted all at once, unintelligible. Argus concentrated more power into the eye, and the image cleared upon a room full of abnormal shapes, all children, or at least far smaller than the imposing Squares that guarded the door.
There was some sort of altercation with one of the guards, and while Argus could not see the whole picture, he got the sense that Bill intervened from the way the images jumped from the perspective of one side of the room to being right in the middle of a smaller shape and a looming guard, a Circle hovering just behind the guard, narrowing his eye at Bill ominously.

“Trying to play the hero, are we? Let’s show you what happens to heroes in our world.”

Argus felt from the eye a great deal of pain all at once, and was surprised when the grey reconstructed eye began to moisten, damp dusty tears leaking down from the eye into the palms of his hands.

The image in the eye seemed to open again, blinking into a brightly lit examination room, glowing blue restraints pinning Bill’s wrists and ankles onto a table, several Circles wearing goggles looming over the table, examining Bill like a specimen.

“What’s the root of it?”

“Levitation is the standard for his kind. Triangles should have no more than that. It would decimate the current hierarchy.”

“Have the parents been sterilised?”

“Soon. First, however, let’s open this one up and find out how it works.”

Argus could see a pointed glowing object being lowered towards his eye, and he could feel his own eyes watering in sympathy, the image blurring, perhaps deliberately, disassociation setting in.

“So, when do they fix you?” Argus could hear Bill say to a shell-shocked looking Parallelogram hovering close to the ground.

The Parallelogram only laughed and told Bill with a bitter smile hinting in their eye. “I like your sense of humour.”

The images in the eye seemed to flicker, circling back to memories of Bill’s parents over and over again, the same image of them waving him off repeating itself almost like Bill were trying to hold that image in his mind. Fire began to overlay the memory more frequently until it came to the point where Bill was unable to remember his parents without seeing them both immersed in an inferno.

“Do they ask about you? Is that what you’re imagining?” One of the Circles asked in a patronising tone, a tall top hat visible above the girth of him, this Circle wearing the same goggles the others wore in the lab.

They were in a room, another examination room, although this one was less well kempt, looking more like a torture chamber than any sort of sterile lab.

“That our admin Hexagons keep having to turn them away. When will you fix him, they ask. When can he come home? They might be doing that, then again I might be lying.”

Argus could feel Bill’s eye narrow, rage seething through his tiny body, but he only glared at the Circle, which seemed to amuse them.

“No fire, aberration? Don’t children get so very angry when they find out adults lie to them?”

“I was told to be good for the Circles. I don’t think setting you on fire qualifies.” Bill gritted out.
“The squares were right. You are a funny child. Will you show me some real fire maybe, if I tell you your parents were glad to be rid of you? Grateful to be freed of the burden of an imperfect child, of a freak, an abomination? That having you ruined their lives, and that they’re better off without you? Hmm?”

“You already told me that you’re lying.” Bill countered stubbornly, clinging to that fact.

“I could be lying about lying as well. And you’d never know. Come now, if you show me where you’re hiding the fire, I can cut it out and send you back home with your family, wouldn’t you like that?”

Bill flexed and called the fire into his hands, a weak blue flame flaring to life, sputtering on and off in his palms before extinguishing completely.

The Circle tsked. “Now that won’t do.”

And the pain began again.

The images all seemed to swirl together now as the integrity of Bill’s crushed eye began to dissipate, the reconstituted tears pulling more molecules from the dusty surface of the eye as every drop fell, and things became a psychedelic swirl for a while, answers no more forthcoming than sense in this cruel warped reality Bill lived in.

Images splattered back and forth, jumping through time, the fire more rapidly interspersed between them all. Argus saw empty space, a wormhole, the top-hat wearing circle spending time alone with Bill, the words “Isn’t this fun?” overlayed above the images, resonating on loop, a bustling town, and the same bubble filled church, all consumed by roaring blue flames, the images interlacing and twisting, refracting in on itself over and over until there was hardly an image retained in Bill’s eye that wasn’t lit on fire.

The eye snapped into focus again in that same examination room from before, a cohort of circles surrounding Bill, holding implements, Bill’s bricks peeled back from his surface, light pouring out from within, the pain agonising.

One of the Circles was saying something, but the words were muffled. Something about narrowing down the source of the anomaly. Bill’s whole frame was tense with pain, barely holding onto sanity at this point, consciousness disassociating into abstractions of madness before snapping back into focus to hear the Circle with the top hat whisper.

“Did you know your parents are here, in the other room? They still think we’re going to fix you.”

Bill’s eye snapped into focus, staring desperately at the Circle, shaking with the effort to hold onto that thought, that his parents were waiting for him.

“Don’t give the kid false hope.” One of the other Circles cajoled, elbowing the one wearing the top hat as if this sort of behaviour was commonplace for him.

“He can’t help being an all-round bastard.” One of the other Circles quipped and all of them laughed, while Bill was still racked with pain, strapped down with the glowing blue restraints.

“Maybe they’re not here.” The Circle wearing the Top Hat said gleefully. “Maybe they couldn’t care less what happens to you. To an imperfect shape. Or maybe, for having made you in the first place, they’ve already paid their dues.”

The Circle’s implements struck deep into the core of Bill, to the core of the bright blue fire that kindled in his palms, and sliced it open, carving through the barrier that kept the rest of it at bay, unleashing it onto the world at the same time the Circle whispered.

“Maybe they’re already dead.”

Argus stumbled back from the eye as the sound of Bill’s screaming dominated his senses. It felt as if the obsidian caverns were shaking, but really it was just the blood pounding in the giant’s head, shock and horror overwhelming him as Bill’s crushed eye continued to crumble, flames bursting all over the eyeball, the spell fading rapidly.

Lurching forward, trying to wring one last glimpse of intelligible history from Bill’s past, Argus poured his focus onto the eye, and saw a memory that was entirely crisp, unblemished by thoughts of endless flame.

Bill was being led into a church, elaborate carvings and bright glowing bubbles decorating the spacious hall while peaceful whale song echoed sonorously throughout the religious domain. A priest was leading Bill, one fin resting on the triangle’s back, speaking to him kindly as they walked down the aisle to the altar.

“We shelter many orphans like yourself, but very few truly seek out the Axolotl’s pure message of redemption. Most think themselves beyond it or lack the drive to truly make amends in this life, but an existence redeemed is what the Almighty Axolotl envisions for us all. He breathes it out into the universe as each soul passes through his godly gills, and –“

“I didn’t ask for a sermon.” Bill interrupted the priest abruptly, staring up at the many glowing bubbles that gathered above the altar, each one resonating with a divine frequency. “I want to know how he does it. What kind of power does he use? How does he make things better? Fix things?”

“I – well the Axolotl embodies the potential for redemption.” The priest stumbled to explain. “He controls existence itself. Redemption lies in the defiance of entropy, in the chances we have to change for ourselves to better represent his design. It’s not a power like a party trick, it’s like an essence, a way of being –“

“If it’s not a power, what are those then?” Bill said bluntly, pointing up at the glowing bubbles, the spheres all floating above the altar just out of reach.

“Those are the Bubbles of Opportunity.” The priest explained stiltedly, his conversion attempt going off course with every interruption. “The Axolotl breathes enlightenment and potential for change into each of these bubbles, like a crossroads or a spell or a mantra, and they descend to benefit the chosen few. Again, they’re not a party trick and they don’t descend for just anyone. Not even to the most devout of us. It is not for us to decide who the hand of fate favours, or for whom the chance for redemption is promised. We –“ “Oh look, one’s coming down.” Bill pointed out as a small pink bubble began to float gently from the top of the altar, ambling down to rest in front of Bill and the flabbergasted priest.

The priest stammered. “A bubble hasn’t descended for over 80 years, even to the most devout –“ “Cool, so how do you open it?” Bill asked, already reaching out to grab the bubble, pressing the sides of it curiously until the film of the bubble disintegrated in a puff of pink smoke, leaving a small piece of paper in Bill’s thin black hands.

Bill held the paper up for a moment, reading it, before he turned to face the priest. “Can I use this on someone else?”
“I –“ The priest pressed his fin to his large head, staggered by the event of seeing a bubble descend, and then he double took, processing Bill’s question, craning his neck to look down at Bill in confusion. “No, the contents of the bubble only benefit the receiver. I – they’re not – you can’t swap them. What you’ve received from the Axolotl will only work for you.”

Bill scoffed at that, narrowing his eye at the paper dismissively, before he crumpled it and threw it to the floor, floating out of the church, calling over his shoulder.

“Well what good is it to me then?”

The whale-priest scrambled to pick up the paper, desperate to read what the Axolotl had gifted this small cranky orphaned triangle, and as he smoothed the page out the words baffled even his advanced religious comprehension.

\[A-X-O-L-O-T-L– MY \text{ TIME HAS COME TO BURN. I INVOKE THE ANCIENT POWER THAT I MAY RETURN!}\]

The words lingered for only a minute, and then blue fire scorched the paper, crisping it to ash instantly, a trail of the same flame catching on the carpet that draped down the aisle, following the triangle’s path out of the hall of praise.

Argus’ glimpse of Bill’s past dissipated as the fire surrounding Bill’s reconstituted eyeball incinerated the last of its molecules, degrading the reformed eye into a crisp pile of ash on the floor of the obsidian cavern just as Argus heard a loud whistle ring out through the caverns, followed by the enthusiastic flapping of thousands of wings.

“PUPPIES! Did you miss me?”

Argus remained glued to the spot, still reeling from what he had seen, struggling to process what he had managed to glimpse from the eye he had ripped from Bill’s socket all those years ago, burdened by the truth.

Blue flames lingered on the ground where Bill’s eyeball had been, burning steadily even as the yellow triangle floated into Argus’ cavern, flanked by eye bats, both hands on his cane and a deluge of harvested eyeballs floating in the air behind him, ready to make a business proposal.

“Oh Teeeeach!”

Bill stopped in the mouth of the cavern, his eye immediately drawn to the small patch of blue fire, darting between it and the expression on Argus’ face, piecing things together.

Now, Argus realised with surprising clarity, he knew why his student was going to kill him.

Chapter End Notes

Sorry for the wait with this one! 75 pages worth of story takes a while to write down, it turns out. I very much hope you enjoyed this chapter folks, it's un-beta-ed so please excuse any grammatical errors, I figure I can pick through and fix them all when I am a leisurely retiree instead of a busy 26 year old lmao. You may notice that this interpretation of Bill's past does not align perfectly with Flatland and that's because I'm putting my own spin on it, so this is just preempting any comments trying to compare the two to an acute degree.

This chapter I'm dedicating to the patient folks who stick around, and still love reading this story and serving up those juicy meaty comments for me to swoon over. I could name several names here, but I will leave this dedication open ended as I appreciate the feedback from all of you very much, and that you take the time out of your busy days to enjoy what I humbly offer.

Please let me know how you liked it! Next chapter stay tuned for Zippy's revenge, Alternate Fiddleford, a Sock Opera or two and a big damn hero.
There's a part of me that seems to be a little sad. Sometimes when I scream there's a voice in me that says "You shouldn't be so mean". Oh no. Part of me is acting while the other stands beside. Yes, I am to myself what Jekyll must have been to Hyde.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Bill’s mind was racing as he looked between the blue flame dissipating on the floor of the cavern and the pitying guilt-laden look his old mentor hid poorly, anger beating out a swift bassline in the current composition of Bill’s emotional state, conclusions being reached rapidly.

“That’s not yours.” Bill looked pointedly at the fading fire, and when Argus’ brows merely furrowed at that, the old giant looking surprisingly apologetic, Bill decided he wasn’t in the mood for belated pity from the man who plucked his eye out.

Without giving Argus a chance to speak, Bill threw his collection of eyeballs at the giant, the eyes rolling across the floor, bouncing up against Argus’ legs as Bill glared at his old mentor.

“There’s your payment. Where’s Sixer?”

“Bill. I’m sorry. I –“ Argus began, but Bill wasn’t interested in hearing it.

“Sixer’s location.” Bill raised his voice sternly, drumming his fingers on his cane, trying to hold his anger back. “Idiot human, big ears, nose and glasses, pointy elbows, just under six-foot, with a death wish. This shouldn’t be news to you, old man.”

“I know what he looks like.” Argus admitted.

“Seen his wanted poster?” Bill sneered caustically. “Or have you been spying on us? Got nothing better to do?”

Argus sighed and leaned back against the cavern wall dejectedly. “I’ve been asked to look for him before.”

Bill’s pupil sharpened into a thin spike, staring up at Panoptes expectantly, panic stirring into intensity. “Where is he?”

“It’s too late, Bill.” Argus revealed, sliding down the obsidian wall, sitting on the ground amongst the eyeballs with a loud thud. “It’s too late.”

“Where?!” Bill demanded, his voice warping, shrieking overlayed with an echo of his words, clearly on the edge.

“He has already left her dimension. Jhes-“

Argus’ words were cut off by Bill’s frustrated scream, a pillar of fire shooting up from the triangle, containing his tantrum. Bill’s bricks were red and his eye was black, his gold pupil slitted thin and dangerous, and Argus wearily watched his ex-student spit out a trail of expletives, processing this revelation.

“I’m sorry.” Argus repeated, drawing his student’s ire by speaking up.
“You told her where he was?”

“I did tell her. She’s been asking regularly, for quite some time. I didn’t know –“

Bill started laughing, a sharp maniacal sound, the fire around him not faltering for a second.

“You didn’t know? You, the Panopticon didn’t know?”

“I didn’t look. I was giving you privacy. Both of you. I didn’t know what she was intending to do. I didn’t know about the metal plate and I didn’t know what she’d been doing to you for all these years.” Argus maintained, as if ignorance would absolve him of guilt.

“What metal plate?” Bill questioned sharply, the fire dying down as he focused on more than his anger.

“She installed a metal plate in this Sixer’s head. He asked for it. To block out your influence. She’s moulded him into one of her own, one of her soldiers. He’s building her weapon now. He means to kill you, Bill.”

Bill swore again, a long unintelligible phrase, looking away as he processed that information, the fire dimming around him as he figured out the implications of this.

“He’s made a big mistake.”

“He didn’t know either.” Argus insisted. “None of us knew. Perhaps things would have been different, if we did. If we understood why.”

Bill wasn’t listening to Argus now, wrapping his mind around Stanford installing a metal plate in his head to keep him out. While it sounded like exactly the sort of defiant nonsense Sixer would do, Jhasilbraum’s influence meant that whatever effect the plate had was more likely to stick, not even touching on what kinds of insidious things she could have been saying to him to turn Stanford against Bill.

This would make Bill’s attempt to charm Sixer back to his side more difficult, having to counteract Jhasilbraum’s sophisticated bullshittery, which was a spanner in the works that Bill really didn’t need right now.

“I understand now and I’m sorry.” Argus continued to speak, his words a mere irritation until Bill realised what he was saying. “I’m sorry about … your parents.”

Everything froze in that moment.

Bill’s eye widened, staring unseeing ahead at the shining obsidian floor, Argus’ words reverberating inside his head like an unpleasant memory, like an echo chamber of misery and shame, crashing over him again and again and again.

He knew.

“If I had known –“ Argus attempted, but Bill looked up at him, the giant recognising the danger in Bill’s glare even without any overt violent overtures on Bill’s part.

“I’m sorry-“ Argus tried again, but his words were cut off once more by laughter, verging on deranged.

“So, you’re telling me you only just found out? I thought you knew all along. That’s rich, it really is. This means that when you pulled my eye out and cast me aside it wasn’t to punish me for any genuine wrongdoing, you did it just because you could!” Bill accused, the fire flaring along the floor of the cave as he reached his conclusion, burning his offering of eyeballs.

The eye bats scattered out of the cavern, shrieking and chirping in the outer caves now, steering clear of danger.

Argus was baffled by Bill’s conclusion, anger and bewilderment dawning in his many eyes and he looked at his pupil as if he were unrecognisable.

“You burnt Jheselbraum!”

“She HAD IT COMING!” Bill shouted and his words were so loud they rattled every black glass wall in the dimension of eternal night, shattering stalagmites of glass with the frequency.

Argus stood up again, the flames burning at his feet now, hot and aggressive, not cool and harmless as he knew these flames could be. When he stood up, Bill grew rapidly in size, unwilling to let Panoptes tower over him.

“She was always your favourite, wasn’t she? Well, your favourite pupil isn’t here now. Only the disappointment! Jheselbraum was always so well behaved and perfect and faultless and I was the screw up. The one who went wrong. Your greatest regret and now you say sorry? Like an apology would make anything better? It’s hilarious!”

Bill’s laughter was littered with hiccups of hysteria now, the fire only continuing to rise around them both, climbing up Argus’ legs, the eyeballs there watering, blistering, and charring with a gristly sounding pop.

Argus looked at his pupil with his remaining eyes and knew, this was the exact date and time of his death, and he knew it was the tipping point to push the triangle completely over into madness and he knew as those who see into the past often do, that this was history repeating itself and there was nothing he could do to stop it.

Bill raised his hands, the fire raising with it, burning white hot around what was once his found family.

“You wanna hear another joke? This one’s about the eyeball encrusted teacher who couldn’t control his PUPILS!”

And the fire roared up around him.

Argus did not scream as the fire consumed him, even though it was excruciating. Instead he just closed his eyes, a single tear slipping out of his central eye as the roar of the fire said it all for him and closed the book on the long and lonely life of the giant known as Argus Panoptes.

He was not afraid.

He knew someone would be waiting for him.

In the garden.

When the last of Argus’ charred corpse crumbled into ashes, Bill hovered over the remnants of his old teacher, his bricks heaving as he breathed heavily, panting from the exhilarating exertion that came from destroying what had once been sacred.
Argus was gone, just like that, and it had been so easy.

Toning down the fire somewhat, composing himself, Bill regarded Argus’ corpse.

“Well, I guess I should thank you for one thing. You really opened my eye to some much-needed perspective.” Bill said disdainfully, the eye bats beginning to creep back into the room now the danger had passed, chirping as they called out to Bill hesitantly.

Bill looked over to the eye bats and considered them, before turning back to glare at the pile of ashes on the floor.

“Actually, scratch that. Thanks for nothing.”

Bill waved his hand, corralling the eye bats into a group, levitating them together before resting his hand on the force field that surrounded them, getting ready to teleport them all away, unable to resist the urge to throw one last sentence at the corpse of his old teacher.

“And I’m taking the puppies.”

“I’m writing in a complaint. This game isn’t lots of fun and it ain’t number one either.” Teeth complained, throwing down his Uno cards.

“Complaining about it won’t do anything.” Pyronica picked her teeth with a skewer, reclining in the crumbling garden with the rest of the henchmaniacs, her cards spread out on the ground in front of her. “You’ll just have a repeat of the BopIt debacle.”

“False advertising is what it is.” Teeth grumbled, holding his Uno cards up to his incisor as if he were squinting at them. “Hasbro are the big pharma of party games.”

“Hasbro are the big pharma –” Keyhole muttered as he wrote down Teeth’s words in a notebook. “Of party games. Nice.”

Noticing the way Pyronica raised her eyebrow at this, Amorphous Shape filled her in. “Keyhole is going to make a book of Teeth’s quotable phrases.”

“I’m thinking it’d make a nice coffee table book. You know, the sort people gift to each other at office Kris Kringle’s when they don’t really know anything about the person they’re gifting it to.” Keyhole explained. “I think it’d be a hit.”

“An unlicensed hit, because you still haven’t agreed to my cut.” Teeth added, crossing his arms stubbornly.

“A date with my sister doesn’t count as a percentage of the sales.” Keyhole corrected Teeth idly while finishing his latest quote with a flourish of his pen.

Before Teeth could open his mouth to counter this, the sky of the Nightmare Realm seemed to rumble, rubble from the asteroid belt above raining down on the garden in patches, the air charged with static like the sea before a storm.

The Henchmaniacs looked up eagerly, recognising that foreboding feeling.
As if a hole were torn in the fabric of the Nightmare Realm, the sky seemed to burst in, and a familiar yellow triangle appeared amidst a storm of hundreds of eye bats, their screeching and flapping wings providing just the sort of dramatic entrance that had been long overdue from the boss.

“Bill!” The Henchmaniacs cheered, their enthusiasm ramping up as they recognised in an instant that Bill was back on form.

“Well well well well well!” Bill shouted dramatically, leaning heavy on his typical bombastic bravado. “Why all the bored faces, people? Don’t we have a party to plan?”

One by one the henchmaniacs seemed to realise what Bill meant by this and they leapt to their feet, cheering, hooting and hollering.

“You mean the party’s back on?” Kryptos questioned, having scrambled up from where he was reclining in the garden, his break from Bill over now that the boss was back.

“When was it ever off, Kryptos?” Bill countered, twirling his cane in circles as he floated down to the group. As Kryptos opened his mouth, Bill pointed his cane at the compass and the motion summoned a square of duct tape that slapped over Kryptos’ mouth. “Don’t answer that. We’ve got a Weirdpocalypse to arrange, people! I want action stations for all of you, that means Teeth and Keyhole, you’re back to your standard duties. Pyronica, I want you sussing out prospective pawns in the mirror room, whoever and whatever is going to get us back into that po-dunk town and give me my party door back. Eight-Ball, Paci-Fire, and Xanthar, buddy, you’re going to start making noise, enough to make the cosmos sweat, let ‘em all know we’re here, and we’re back in business. And Kryptos, how many investors do we still have?”

Kryptos gave a muffed reply and tried to tug the tape off his mouth to no avail before gesturing at the tape redundantly.

“Great, round them all up and tell them the party’s on, so it’s now or never, or no party invite.” Bill stopped spinning his cane, neatly landing on the table in between the Henchmaniacs.

Looking briefly around the crumbling Nightmare Realm, Bill remarked, “Yeesh, this place is a mess. Well, we’re not getting the bond back on this dimension, but we’re moving up in the world, so I hope you’ve all picked out what country you want to decimate and mailed wherever you’ve got magazine subscriptions for them to change your address! We’re moving to Earth!”

The Henchmaniacs all cheered, stamping their feet and howling, Paci-Fire beating his chest and Eight-Ball picking Kryptos up and shaking him like a maraca.

Amidst their cacophony of revelry, one particularly unwise henchmaniac chose to speak up, the rest of the Henchmaniacs falling silent at his question.

“Hey, what happened with that Sixer human?” Hectorgon asked blithely, oblivious to how quickly the mood changed. “Wasn’t he important or something?”

His tone icy, Bill glared at Hectorgon before responding. “Sixer’s a traitor to the party cause. He’s old news now. For bothering me with inane questions and being a quantifiable party downer, it’s off to the Dimension of Eternal Screams for you, Hectorgon.”

Bill clicked his fingers and Hectorgon was swallowed up by a blue ball of flame, his scream disappearing from the Nightmare Realm the same time that he did.

“Maybe if I’m feeling generous, he can come back for the party.”
A little more uneasy now, the Henchmaniacs regarded Bill, recognising that the easy-going, understanding and otherwise lenient triangle they’d shared a toast with in the penthouse of the quadrangle all those years back was long gone, the unpredictable, callous, and altogether dangerous chaos demon Bill had once been taking his rightful place.

Ignoring the sudden shift in mood, Bill began to press each of his bricks in a specific sequence as if he were dialing a phone before the bricks in his middle warped into a screen. A dial tone sounded out for a few seconds before a familiar carroty complexion came into view.

“Who ish it?”

“Well, if it isn’t Mrs Of-Flames. Congratulations on the nuptials, champ. How would you like a belated wedding present, free of charge?”

Zippy narrowed her black almond shaped eyes on the screen suspiciously, before asking. “What ish it?”

His eye lidding with smug pleasure, Bill began to spin his cane again, his pleasant expression screaming danger and impending chaos.

“I’m about to go kill your old mistress. If you come with me, I’ll let you spit on her grave.”

After jumping from bus-stop to bus-stop, all-night interdimensional diner to all-night interdimensional diner, making use of the table tops, fluorescent lighting and semi-free workspace to engineer his quantum destabiliser, Stanford Pines found himself in the corner booth of another underfunded franchised diner, sipping on his obligatory purchase of a glass of water like a lifeline, as it was the only thing preventing the teenaged manager of this establishment from kicking him out.

His blaster was coming together now and it finally looked like a weapon more than a mass of jumbled parts, the scaffolding complete, the sights perfected, the mechanism sorted and the trigger altered to accommodate his six fingered hand better. Now all he needed to complete his gun was the power source.

With Jheselbraum’s instructions spread out across the tabletop Ford eyed off the last corner of the notes she’d given him, puzzling over her instructions for discovering the power source.

You will find what you need here. She wrote next to a shorthand set of dimensional coordinates. Where you will also find all you lost and all that could have been.

That sounded more than intentionally vague. Was it so difficult to give Stanford straight forward instructions?

Jheselbraum’s blueprints were deliberately cryptic compared to Bill’s portal blueprints. At least when Bill wanted Ford to collect the hyperdrive from the crash site, he wrote ‘collect hyperdrive from crash site’ on the blueprints.

Not that he was defending Bill anymore, but Stanford privately thought that Jheselbraum could stand to learn a thing or two about project management from the triangle.
Finishing the rest of his water, Stanford folded up the instructions and picked up his blaster, heading for the door.

Vague or not, his next destination was outlined clearly.

Ford had to simply trust The Oracle to know what was best.

Everything was on fire.

Civilians were running, screaming, as the forests burned around them, the fire creeping to the stone steeples and towers of Jheselbraum’s mountainside temple.

Soldiers were scrambling for their weapons, lieutenants barking orders at the troops to mask their panic and, in the highest tower, Jheselbraum raced out to the balcony, her deep blue skirts flying out behind her, watching her domain burn all around her, the culprit hovering, large and yellow in a rip in the sky above.

“OH, GLORIOUS BATTLE! SOUND THE TRUMPETS, PEOPLE! IT’S JHESELBRAUM’S TIME TO SHINE!”

Jheselbraum curled her lip and heard from the halls below one of the hymnal musicians tentatively blow wind through their instrument before thinking better of it.

Oestia was at her side in an instant.

“Mistress, there have been no sightings of his henchman. The time for battle is here. Shall we attack him directly?”

“Man the blasters if you must. It won’t kill him but your efforts might slow him down. He’s here for me. I knew this day would come.” Jheselbraum said gravely, smothering the giddiness she felt inside.

Turning on her heel, Jheselbraum paced inside, reaching up for a cabinet high above Oestia’s head, withdrawing her ancestral armour, her shield, her sword, and her cape, affixing it while Oestia barked orders into her communicator to the troops below.

Outside Bill’s voice could be heard echoing throughout the land, accompanied by the groan of two oak trees as he ripped them from the ground, holding the mighty trunks like drumsticks as his great eye searched Dimension 52 for her, knowing full well where she was.

“Here’s a lady who needs no introduction. You know her as The Oracle, I know her as Jheselbraum the Unswerving, the multiverse’s most mediocre swot! Come on out Jheselbraum, wherever you are. A-DRUMROLL PLEASE!” Pounding the oak trees against the mountainside, Bill rattled the landscape with deafening drumroll, the earth quaking with the impact.

Outside the temple, the soldiers with steady footing began firing blasters at Bill, launching projectiles through the air towards Bill’s angular form, but the projectiles fizzled out like comets, catching fire in Bill’s immediate vicinity and crumbling into dust before they could make impact. The blasters were met with similar flame, neutralising their attacks, Bill barely blinking an eye at them. His immediate atmosphere was so blindingly hot, he was burning the forests to a crisp just through proximity, the oak trees crumbling to ash in his hands as Bill discarded them, throwing them over his shoulder and looking around expectantly.

“That was your cue! Come on. It’s not like Miss Perfect to avoid taking centre stage. Are you hiding from me O’ Mighty Oracle? Are you scared?”

Jheselbraum tsked, and walked brusquely down the stairs, dressed appropriately now, heading out towards the courtyard where her soldiers had amassed, finding Bill’s destructive running commentary as grating as he was.

“Aww, she’s hiding. Maybe applause will do it? Come on everyone, let’s give her a hand!” Bill shouted like a conductor on a stage, his magic encircling the hands of every supplicant in the temple, forcing them all to clap their hands together until the applause reached a deafening crescendo.

The screaming and fright nearly outweighed the applause, Jheselbraum’s supplicants promised some measure of protection against Bill’s wiles in her land, the safety and security promised clearly not delivered as Bill’s overwhelming power could affect them even here, no matter how devout they’d been. If he could affect them now, he likely could this entire time, and that realisation was just as much a cause for screaming as the sudden lack of autonomy was. They had placed their faith in the wrong protector.

Bill seemed to delight in turning her followers against her, or perhaps turnabout was fair play, but either way Jheselbraum was not going to stand for it.

Storming out into the courtyard below, her sword in hand, Jheselbraum shouted up at Bill’s fearsome silhouette. “I HAVE NEVER HIDDEN FROM YOU, YOU MONSTER! RELEASE MY PEOPLE!”

The clapping stopped in an instant and Bill floated down, looming above the courtyard, stretching his form out to the size of an Olympic swimming pool to angle over the soldiers cowering below, blocking out the sun in the process, the courtyard now lit by Bill’s own golden glow like a triangular spotlight.

“There she is!” Gesturing his hand at Jheselbraum, his magic glowed at the wrists of all her worshippers once more and mashed them together, turning them all to face Jheselbraum, forcing them to clap loudly again. “Let’s give her a warm welcome, folks. Jheselbraum the Unswerving. It’s her closing show. People come on, you can do better than that!”

“Unhand them!” Jheselbraum demanded, swiping her sword out in the air in front of her menacingly.

Bill shrugged above her. “Whatever you say.”

At that the magic encircling the wrists of Jheselbraum’s attendants and soldiers sharpened and simultaneously each of Jheselbraum’s supplicants were unhanded, their hands severed at the wrists, falling to the floor to their shock and horror.

The clapping stopped but the screaming that took its place was louder, each humble servant to the purple skinned giant sobbing in horror as they became collateral to Jheselbraum’s war with the powerful being looming over them.

“Put them back right now! If you came to fight me, fight fair.” Jheselbraum demanded imperiously, holding her chin up high.
Clicking his fingers again, Jheselbraum’s people were restored to their former handy-capability, left stunned by the sudden shift in their reality.

“I don’t see how having thousands of soldiers at your disposal to fight me is a fair fight, if it’s supposed to be just you and I? Mano a mano. The ultimate battle to see who really is the very best student since that’s what you really want. If you’re their all-powerful leader, using them as a shield is just a waste isn’t it? Unless that’s all they’re good for?”

Shouting a holy battle cry, aiming to prove herself, Oestia lunged forward for one of the blasters, aiming it skywards, raising her restored hand to slam down on the ignition, intending to shoot Bill down from the sky in retribution.

Before her hand could make contact, it was offset by a flash of orange, a flying kick striking Oestia on the chest, toppling her over.

Teleported in by Bill through a similar rip between dimensions, standing in front of the blaster, tall and triumphant, her long red braid spiked up into a partial mohawk, her mercenary robes replaced with a spiked leather jacket, ripped jeans and combat boots, zips and chains dangling down from her new look at every opportunity, stood a ghost from Oestia’s past.

“Shailesh?” Oestia gasped, staring up at the Taronjan warrior and former friend in shock. “But you – he killed you! We mourned you.”

Shailesh snorted and crossed her arms, sneering down at Oestia. “Do I look dead to you, dumbassh?”

“You – you’re on his side! You must have joined him. You … you traitor!” Oestia snarled, trying to push herself back up into a fighting stance. “You were better off dead!”

As Oestia sprung forward again, Shailesh knocked her back to the ground with a harrowing headbutt, fire flaring out briefly like a halo, the metal around her mouth gleaming as she bared her teeth down at Oestia.

“I’m not dead because your Mistressh forgot to kill me. But not before she murdered my entire people right in front of me!” Shailesh screamed her words at Oestia, making no attempt to lower her voice, wanting everyone in the courtyard to hear. “She doesn’t care about you schtitic cannon fodder and she never did. There is no noble caushe, just her endless shit fight with Cipher and it’s about to end. You’ve got the rest of your schitty lives to think about, sho you can be schtupid and keep fighting for her, or you can shtay down and let us end this, you boot-licking bitch.”

“Couldn’t have said it better myself.” Bill leaned his giant elbow against one of the tower spires, watching Shailesh deliver her lisping speech with pride. “Anyone who wants to jump ship and flee, I suggest you do so now. There’s not going to be a whole lot left of this place when I’m done burning it to the ground.”

“You alienate my people. You threaten their home.” Jheselbraum said gravely, swinging her sword, working her spin. “You bring this deformed monster into their home and have it pretend to be one of our fallen, our beloved Shailesh, to lie to them.”

“I’m not lying.” Shailesh insisted, sneering up at Jheselbraum. “I’m here to schpit on your grave.”

Jheselbraum shouted a catechism and swung her sword with a shout, hurling it in a spinning arc upwards, directly towards Bill’s eye, but before her blade could land, Bill plucked it out of the air between two enormous fingers and flicked it to the side, impaling it swiftly in one of the temple walls.

“Aw. Is that all you’ve got? Honestly, I thought you’d at least put up more of a fight than old Panoptes did but that was truly pathetic.” Bill taunted and Jheselbraum’s seven eyes widened dramatically.

“What did you do to him?”

“You’re the Oracle, you tell me.” Bill stretched his hand down, tip-toeing his fingers down to the courtyard to flick away the blasting turrets and Jheselbraum’s faithful, creating a clear path between the purple giantess and him. “Or should I give you a few minutes to start scrying? You never were any good at seeing into the past.”

“I see now. You’ve only gotten more power-hungry with time. Killing the great Argus Panoptes to steal his secrets.” Jheselbraum insisted for the benefit of her followers.

“He was trying to steal my secrets, lady. Just like you have, for centuries. I should have killed you long before now but offing old Teach was just the push I needed to put your endless bullshit into perspective. Don’t miss him too much though, you’ll be joining him soon.”

Bill reached his hand forward to grasp Jheselbraum, but with surprising agility for a giant her size Jheselbraum dodged his hands, springing about the courtyard evading him, her acrobatics giving hope to the rest of her remaining attendants that their faith was not misplaced.

Wrenching one of the remaining blasting turrets from the ground Jheselbraum hurled it at Bill’s eye once more, the triangular god batting it away, slightly irritated now. The turret exploded on contact with Bill’s hand, distracting him, but the fire did not seem to faze him.

“Man the remaining turrets. Fire at will!” Jheselbraum ordered her troops, commanding the situation again. Bill wasn’t having it, clicking his fingers to conjure glowing blue cages around the turrets to keep them out of reach of Jheselbraum’s troops.

“It’s just you and me, Jhessy. Don’t pull them into this. If you didn’t want to fight me, you shouldn’t have crossed that line.”

Baring her teeth bravely up at Bill, Jheselbraum sneered. “And what line have I supposedly crossed, triangle?”

“The line of don’t touch my things.” Bill glared at Jheselbraum dangerously and reached forward again to swipe at her, the purple giantess dodging out of his way.

“How pathetic.” Jheselbraum taunted as she sprinted away from Bill’s hands, avoiding his attempts to corral her. “I’ve been attempting to thwart your plans for centuries, unhindered, and the one line I supposedly cross is claiming your stupid human pawn as my own? That makes it almost worth his incessant whining, his agonising over whether poor Bill Cipher is really a monster or simply misunderstood? If he was in the wrong? If only there were some way to explain away your countless misdeeds and pardon you? Thankfully, I cured him of those nonsensical reservations.
Now he sees you for what you really are. Nothing but an aberration – a monster!"

Losing patience with this game of cat and mouse, Bill manifested hundreds of black lengthy arms from his sides, the arms snapping around Jheselbraum in an instant, binding her in Bill’s grasp where she stood.

Regardless of her tenuous position Jheselbraum was still smug, continuing to taunt Bill even as he lifted her in the air, glaring at her, his bricks turning red.

“You’ve got no chance to change his mind now. I made sure you can’t access it, courtesy of a healthy chunk of metal guarding his thoughts. Since he didn’t die on the operating table, he gets to live on to spite you, just out of your reach for eternity. I almost think that’s better than if I’d killed him.”

“I’ve never wanted to burn someone alive as much as I want to burn you.” Bill replied, blue flames slowly trickling down his arms now, inching towards Jheselbraum like a lit fuse towards dynamite.

“Do it then. Kill me.” Jheselbraum challenged Bill, tilting her head to gesture at the remaining followers cowering in the courtyard, hiding from the battle in the archways surrounding. “If you kill me in front of them you’ll only make me a martyr and I’ll just come back stronger. I’ve studied the same old ways you have. Destroy me and their worship will grant me the means to avenge myself and return stronger than ever.”

“Is that so?” Bill lidded his eye at Jheselbraum. “See, somehow, I thought you’d say that. Poor little Jheselbraum, always so quick to play the martyr. Well, don’t let me stop you.”

Small hands snapped away from Jheselbraum, jettisoning back into Bill’s sides until there were only two larger hands holding her, but as the other hands retracted it became apparent that they had placed something on Jheselbraum’s person.

Two glowing silver cuffs.

“What -?” Jheselbraum looked between the cuffs on her wrist and Bill in confusion, comprehension coming a little too late.

Bill set her down on the ground and briefly squeezed her middle and flames flared down his arms to pool in his hands, the blue fire encircling Jheselbraum, her skin blistering as her first furious scream sounded out.

Her huddled followers watched her incineration with horror, clutching the holy symbols their robes were embroidered in, hoping and praying for some kind of divine intervention, or that Jheselbraum’s words were true, that she’d grant herself the power to avenge herself with this sacrifice.

The power of their worshipful thoughts were flowing through her, certainly, but Jheselbraum realised with burgeoning terror that the power wasn’t remaining within her, instead it was steadily leeching down her arms and out through the cuffs on her wrists with a barely perceptible ebbing feeling.

She began to tire, her magic draining out of her through the cuffs, draining through her body as she utilised spells to shield her from the flames, her spells sputtering out while the fire did not. Her limbs grew heavy and weak and her head nodded forward, lethargy draining her, causing her to slump forward onto Bill’s hands, the fire biting into her now.

“No. How are you -?” Jheselbraum questioned weakly, glaring at Bill’s hands.
Panic setting in as she realised that Bill had once again out-played her, stripping her of her final ploy to defend herself and destroy him for good, Jheselbraum mustered her remaining strength and began thrashing, clawing at Bill’s large smooth hands, scrabbling for purchase, hitting and kicking him even as the fire surged hot around her, breaking down her dwindling shields and peeling back her skin.

Like a saint on a pyre, her shrieks drowned out by the momentous weight of the occasion, Jheselbraum’s grisly incineration played out in front of a courtyard of her faithful, many turning their faces away from the unholy reality of the martyr’s burning flesh and fevered screams.

Two people did not turn their gaze away from the harsh reality of her death, their eyes reflecting the flames light, taking in every detail.

Those two people were Zippy, watching Jheselbraum’s demise with a vicious vindication, and Bill, bitterly taking in every detail as he burnt the life from his former classmate with his own two hands.

“I can’t die yet! I still need to know!!” She sobbed while her tongue blistered in the heat, her pleas going unanswered.

Jheselbraum’s final cry came out as a wail, the word ringing around the courtyard, echoing.

“WHY?”

Bill narrowed his eye and the fire flared hotter, no longer burning her slowly to draw out her death, letting the flames envelop her truly, the fire as intense and deadly as it always was, killing her quickly.

“You’re the one who always wanted to know what happened to my family.” Bill hissed at her, dropping her corpse to the floor, the fire falling with her, razing her molecules to ash. “Don’t say I never did nothing for you.”

The silver cuffs levitated out of the ashes and followed Bill as he turned away from the wreckage of his former classmate, floating back towards the rift in the sky, having done what he’d come here to do.

Behind him in the courtyard, Zippy approached the fading cinders of Jheselbraum’s corpse and spat on the ashes, her hands shaking, but simply spitting on her old Mistress’s grave wasn’t enough and after several tremulous seconds of staring at the remnants of her family’s killer Zippy stomped her heavy black boots on the pile, shrieking and stomping on her again and again, shouting.

“That’sch for my family you bitch. That’sch for Tarno, that’sch for Telen, that’sch for Emitty, that’sch for – that’sch for-“ Her words were warbling now, snot dripping down from her nose as she was overcome with tears, her knees shaking beneath her and eventually collapsing, Shaileshe continuing to beat the blackened ground with her fists, outright wailing now. “That’sch for Jenima. You’re fucking ash now just like them and I’ll nev – I’ll never –“ Oestia stared at Shaileshe’s outburst, her face blank with shock as she watched her Mistress be utterly destroyed by the being she was supposed to protect them from, her fiery unravelling almost as painful as the realisation that Shaileshe hadn’t been lying.

The obelisk in the foyer wasn’t engraved with a list of names the demon Bill Cipher had taken from them.

He didn’t take Shaileshe, she was alive, but clearly her family was not, and given her reaction to their Mistress, Jheselbraum hadn’t been as faultless and benevolent as she appeared to be.

The names inscribed on the obelisk held hardly any relevance compared to Shailes’s recitation of them, beating those names into the soot, the words on the obelisk revealed to be merely pretty lies. A religious illusion to blanket the harsh truth, the stinging reality.

Jheselbraum really had killed them all.

Shailes’s words had devolved into outright wailing now, her long red braid trailing on the ground as she threw her head back crying. “I’ll never get them back.”

Oestia looked up to see Cipher hadn’t fully fled this dimension yet, the triangle hovering in front of the rift, his back to the courtyard, the cuffs hovering in the air beside him, delaying his departure for a moment to listen to Shailes’s lament. Oestia could only see the bricks at his back, his expression hidden from her.

Oestia stared, dumbfounded, watching him listen to as much of Shailes’s mournful crying as he could bear before he eventually moved forward into the rift and vanished from Dimension 52, the rift closing behind him, leaving a flaming forest and a dimension still standing, far less destruction than promised, in his wake.

Shailes was openly crying, horrible messy crying, wind whistling through her zippered lips as she bowed her back down over the ground, her fists blackened with ashes as she grieved her avenged family.

One of the more sympathetic acolytes approached Shailes, resting a timid hand on her shoulder, but Shailes reared up and slapped their hand back.

“Don’t touch me!” She snarled, before making an attempt to wipe her face with her sleeve, soot smearing on her cheek. She fished a communicator out from her pocket rather than seeking solace from the crowd of Jheselbraum’s cult of abandoned acolytes and dialled, her voice still thick with emotion.

“Jolene. Can you come and pick me up?”

The dimensional wormhole Jheselbraum’s map directed Stanford to wasn’t the sort of well-regulated wormhole that was generally used for interdimensional travel. It wasn’t a predictable wormhole that spat travellers out in specific dimension as per a schedule. This was the type of wormhole whose final destination could only be discerned by discerning seers.

Stanford was prepared for anything when he entered the wormhole but the last thing he expected was this.

Dimensions warping around him, Ford found himself spat out in the middle of a very familiar looking forest.

Birds were chirping in the trees, the familiar cooing of the question quail and the susurrus of the Hide-Behind pinning down the destination for Stanford in an instant. He didn’t know any other place but Gravity Falls to house such peculiar and weird creatures, even throughout all his interdimensional travels.
The Hide-Behind chittered in surprise at seeing Stanford and without wasting too much time looking for the creature, Stanford waved a hand behind his back, choosing to look through the forest instead.

“Shoo.”

Stanford walked further through the forest, the Hide-Behind skulking away behind him and he pushed back the foliage with his hands, murmuring to himself. “She couldn’t have brought me home, could she? Where -?”

As he made his way through the forest, parting the branches, he came out onto a clearing on the side of the mountain overlooking the valley below.

His eyes widening, Stanford saw that he had been sent to Gravity Falls, but it was not Gravity Falls as he knew it.

“What the devil?”

The lush valley set between the fractured mountainside with its cut-out UFO shape knocked through the rock was familiar enough, but what was glaringly unfamiliar was the scaffolding and structures set up around the crash site, large plastic tent-like buildings surrounding the periphery of the entry latch.

The opening entry way to the spaceship in the meadow was ripped wide open, the metal of the spaceship’s hull peeled back, with dozens of white coated scientists and workers carrying equipment to and from the spaceship, loading them onto magnetised rail carts and sending those carts away from the site and back into the forest.

Banners were emblazoned on the tents, a stylised logo repeating the same letters.

IlofO.

Clearly some sort of corporation or scientific research body had discovered the crash site in this dimension and claimed it for their own, peeling back the unassuming veneer of this small town and mining its core for its fantastical properties.

“Those vultures.” Stanford clenched his fist, watching these other scientists discovering and broadcasting to the world what was his.

Narrowing his eyes, he decided to investigate and began making his way down the cliffside stealthily, intending to infiltrate the research base.

Employing his considerable experience at hiding from various interdimensional parties that were consistently hunting him down, Stanford stuck to the shadows, his black coat disguising him. The sun was setting on Gravity Falls and the shadows were long and stretching, enabling Ford to slink up to the edge of the compound, pressed against the wall of one of these white plastic tents.

Listening closely Stanford could hear two of the workers inside chatting to one another.

“Reckon the boss is going to love this alien solvent. Haven’t seen anything like it. Maybe he’ll raise this find to his boss. Maybe it’ll go all the way up to Mr F.”

So, this ‘Mr F’ was the person running this compound, Stanford reasoned, narrowing his eyes. Whoever he was, he was making a goddamn free for all of the alien site and who knows what else. Gravity Falls was full of weird and wondrous things that could easily be capitalised on by the unscrupulous.

Stanford wondered who this shady character could be, this Mr F, and what he had to do with Stanford discovering his power source. Would he have to liaise with this fellow?

“A swab of alien glue isn’t going to get you in a meeting with Mr McGucket, and only the CEO can call him Mr F. He doesn’t like it when we call him ‘Mr F’ so don’t believe everything you hear in orientation,” came the other worker’s dismissive reply.

Their conversation moved onto other topics, but Stanford was stuck on what had been said.

Mr McGucket? F?

It couldn’t be?

“Quit daydreaming and load these samples on the cart.” Ford heard the dismissive worker advise his colleague. “You’ve got to get them to the Institute first before you get congratulated for it.”

Stanford looked between the tent and the magnetic railway line that cut through the forest, seeing other carts primed and ready, waiting to deliver their cargo to the Institute.

Clearly the crash site wasn’t the central hub of this organisation and it wouldn’t be where he’d find this dimension’s Fiddleford McGucket. If his power source was coming from F, Ford had a better chance of obtaining it, rather than haggling for it with some power-hungry executive, considering he had absolutely no money right now. While he knew Fiddleford could be reasonable, he didn’t know if his boss would be as level-headed and wondered if he would have to haggle regardless for the power source.

Stanford idly wondered who F’s boss was, as he couldn’t imagine Fiddleford working underneath the sort of person he was imagining this mysterious CEO to be.

Crossing the field over to the railway carts, Stanford waited until the workers attending the carts had moved on to collect their next shipment of cargo before he advanced.

Eyeing off the carts, Ford found several crates in the back of each cart, and no driver’s compartment, the magnetic railway line seeming to have only one destination, the carts circling in a loop autonomously from the crash site to the main compound.

Climbing into the back of one of the carts and hiding inside one of the empty crates, Stanford held the lid down and used the laser penknife from his coat pocket to cut a small peep hole through the crate, then he turned the laser to a lower setting to melt the plastic along the top flap of the crate so the workers wouldn’t be able to open it and discover him.

From his peep hole in the side of the crate, he could see one of the workers returning to deposit another tray of alien metals in the cart. When the worker couldn’t open the crate, they simply set the tray on top of it.

“We’ve got a bung crate here.”

“Just send it on through. They’ve got replacements back at the Institute.”

The worker stepped off the back of the cart and rapped his knuckles on the door, and Stanford could feel the cart beginning to move, the cargo being delivered on the magna-rail.

Checking first to see that there was no one else in the cart, Stanford clicked his laser penknife on again, and cut a larger hole through the side of the crate, shimmying out of it.

Looking around the rail cart, Stanford could see that several racks along the walls were empty, waiting for the same sort of tray the workers placed in the cart. It seemed they were collecting whatever they could find of scientific merit from the crash site and transporting it to the lab, the samples cut cleanly, almost as clean as Stanford could manage with the laser gun Bill gave him.

Perhaps he was in the future if that sort of technology was available to these workers or perhaps Fiddleford developed it himself along the way. He was always very talented at inventing things.

Looking at the items on the tray, Stanford could see they were removing chunks of molybdenum from the cafeteria on the ship and several of the alien spark plugs Fiddleford enthused over were also resting on the tray on top of a sheet of dark blue tissue paper imprinted with another logo.

Corporations and their logos were ridiculous, Stanford mused as he shifted the spark plugs, curious to see what was underneath. They couldn’t invest in scientific venture without spitting their brand all over the project. It baffled Stanford. The absolute gall of these investors.

Shifting the spark plug to the side completely, Stanford’s disdainful internal monologue dried up when he saw what the logo printed on the tissue paper was.

A golden six fingered hand.

Teleporting back into the mirror room with a flamboyant bang, Bill saw Pyronica dutifully kneeling on the floor beside one of the mirrors, watching images play out on the screens.

“Py in the sky! What have you got for me?” Bill’s voice rang out, cheerfully echoing throughout the mirror room.

“I found you the perfect puppet!” Pyronica said with a grin, pointing at the screen she was staring at. “Come look.”

Bill floated down to hover by Pyronica’s shoulder, watching the mirror swirl to reveal what looked like a dream of some kind, with blue skies and doves flying through the idyllic clouds, which seemed reasonable enough, until the dream’s occupant began singing, making it clear that this wasn’t a dream at all.

It didn’t even have the dignity to be a nightmare.

It was an advertisement.

“Who’s cute as a button and always your friend? Lil G-I-D to the E-O-N! Wink!”

“Ugh. Seriously?” Bill narrowed his eye in disdain at the evangelical looking child on the mirror’s screen.

“It’s Lil Gideon!” Pyronica said with enthusiasm, waggling her hands at the screen like a magician’s assistant. “What do you think?”

“I think out of all the hicks in that town you could have picked anyone but a literal child with a ‘Can I Speak To The Manager’ haircut, Py. He looks like a god botherer, as in he will likely bother me. I can already tell he’s going to be a pain in my eye.”

“No, but he’s the perfect mark.” Pyronica insisted, listing reasons on her fingers. “He already has one of Six Finger’s journals, he’s ambitious, he’s trusted by the community, he’s addicted to power, I mean he’s been terrorising his family with a magical amulet for a while, so that’s gotta count for something. Plus!”

Pyronica looked back to the mirror and Gideon’s advertisement continued to play out on the screen, as if by looking away she merely paused it before.

“Lil Gideon.” Came a schmaltzy voice over the advertisement, continuing to spruik. “Come on down to Lil Gideon’s Tent of Telepathy, opening soon at this location.”

Lil Gideon’s Tent of Telepathy then came crashing down on a ramshackle tourist trap of a building, labelled ‘The Mystery Shack’ in bright tacky signage, the ‘S’ falling off the building slightly, Gideon’s Tent crushing it into a pile of rubble.

When Bill continued to squint sceptically at the advertisement, Pyronica then wound back the vision in the mirror for a while, pausing it on the Mystery Shack just before Gideon’s tent crushed it, elbowing Bill until he got what she was showing him.

“Huh? Huuuuh?”

Bill’s eye widened in recognition before a jubilant laugh burst out of him.

“Is that?”

“It is.” Pyronica said smugly, smirking at the triangle’s mirth.

“Ohohoh. Hohohoh, hahahahaHAH! That’s too good, that’s hysterical! Ohhhh. That’s his house? Sixer’s going to hate it. He would hate that with a passion. That’s just THE BEST THING I’VE EVER SEEN!” Bill rubbed his hands together gleefully, still cackling at what Sixer’s house of science and enlightenment had been reduced to.

“Right?”

“It’s a funhouse! A tourist trap! An unscientific, fund mongering, sideshow attraction of a place. It’s practically one of those hokey hellholes from back in New Jersey where Sixer grew up. Ohhhh, I bet it has a gift shop. Does it have a giftshop?”

“You bet it does.” Pyronica confirmed, crossing her arms. “And its very own interdimensional portal in the basement.”

“PYRONICA YOU’RE A GENIUS!” Bill enthused and shut his eye, puckering his lips to press a big enthusiastic smooch on Pyronica’s large pink cheek.

Giggling, Pyronica accepted her friend’s jubilant affection and then pointed at the mirror again.

“Well, if you want to go for it, you’ll barely have to do any legwork at all. Lil Gideon’s already got the journal. I’m pretty sure he’s about to read your invocation now to try and steal the deed to the shack and move in. It’ll be like taking candy from a baby.”

“Surprisingly harder than it looks.” Bill remarked, before looking back at Lil Gideon’s image in the mirror, and then down to his bricks, one of them glowing as a summons call came through. “Perfect timing.”
“Besides, if he asks to speak to the manager, just tell him you’re the boss.” Pyronica shrugged, laughing. “It shouldn’t be that hard to intimidate one little kid. That’s half the fun of taking candy from a baby.”

“Oh, I’m going to enjoy this.” Bill rubbed his hands together and then reached down to press on his glowing brick. “Wish me luck.”

As Bill answered the call, reality dissolved in a whirl of black and white, until the dreamscape spat itself out in Earth’s plane, forcing everyone in Gideon’s direct vicinity to fall into a micro-sleep immediately.

The tubby evangelical child was clutching his stomach, his eyes glowing blue as he chanted the tongue in cheek invocation left in Sixer’s journal (the scientist knowing back then that it didn’t matter what you said, Bill would come and go as he pleased no matter what backwards message you chanted) and so Bill made his dramatic entrance.

“Egassem sdrawkcab! Egassem sdrawkcab! Egassem sdrawkcab!”

The colour drained out of the world and time slowed to a halt, a triangular void appearing in the clouds above, cutting through the earth’s atmosphere up to the stars above. The edges of the triangle lit with fire and a singular eye opened from within the void, a vapourwave nightmare.

Bill started laughing and Gideon cowered away in terror.

Bursting into form from the triangular void, taking shape in black and white, Bill looked around Gideon’s dreamscape for a moment, recognising the clearing by Stanford’s shack gleefully. This was perfect.

“Oh, Gravity Falls. It is good to be back!”

Customary yellow lit his bricks and he floated down towards Gideon, hands on his sides, ready to examine his latest dupe of a customer, floating around the boy.

“Name’s Bill Cipher. And I take it you’re some kind of living ventriloquist dummy?” Bill presumed, making a note to turn Gideon INTO some kind of living ventriloquist dummy the moment he made earth his new home. Laughing at the thought, Bill floated closer and gestured to Gideon. “I’m just kidding. I know who you are, Gideon.”

“W-what are you? H-how do you know my name?” Gideon questioned cautiously, obviously scared of Bill, and, really, that only helped matters at this point in the negotiations.

“Oh, I know lots of things.” Bill said, impressing the point with a demonstration, his bricks fizzing with static, images and scenes from throughout history flickering in a montage of cryptic locations across Bill’s body. His voice dropping to a more suitably demonic timbre, Bill repeated himself.

“LOTS OF THINGS.”

When Gideon looked sufficiently awed, Bill snapped off the illusion, returning things to ‘normal’ with jarring briskness.

Now for the fun part.

Party tricks.
“Hey, look what I can do.”

Reaching his hand out, Bill pointed at a deer in the forest grazing peacefully by the shrubbery. The deer looked up and Bill beckoned with his finger, but he wasn’t beckoning the deer.

The deer’s mouth opened almost mechanically, and one by one each of the animal’s teeth were uprooted from its gums, flying across the clearing to deposit themselves neatly in Bill’s waiting hand. It was funny how even in the animal kingdom one could still have dreams about all your teeth falling out, or at least it was funny to Bill.

Passing them to Gideon like a present, Bill bequeathed the teeth to the shrill tubby kid, enjoying the way the reality of it registered with Gideon a split second after the fact.

“Deer teeth. For you kid!” Bill laughed and Gideon dropped the teeth with a frightened shout, his eyes flitting back up to Bill with the appropriate amount of fear now.

“You’re insane!”

“Sure I am. What’s your point?” Bill shrugged, and waved his hand in the air, rewinding the motion of the teeth with the gesture.

In tandem they levitated off the floor around Gideon’s feet and flew back into the deer’s mouth, rooting themselves in the creature’s gums once more. When the deer was reunited with its teeth, it bounded off into the forest as if nothing had ever happened.

Gideon still looked terrified. Chumps like him never appreciate a good party trick.

“Hhhn. Listen to me, demon!” Gideon shouted, having mustered his resolve to be angry in the face of his obvious fear, pointing his finger at Bill aggressively. “I have a job for you.”

This was about what Bill expected, from the moment he first saw Gideon’s ridiculous hair-do. Bill sure could pick a demanding customer from a mile off.

What he didn’t pick though was what Gideon would ask.

“I need you to enter the mind of Stanford Pines and steal the code to his safe!”

Bill laughed on principle. Getting paid to enter Stanford’s mind. He practically lived there and if Sixer had a safe, the sequence would probably either be something incredibly pretentious like a Fibonacci sequence or something incredibly dumb to do with his anomalous fingers, like 1212 or 6666. Finding the code would be a cake walk.

But last he recalled Sixer didn’t have a safe.

What he did have was an identical twin. An unscrupulous identical twin.

“Wait… Stan Pines?”

Bill turned away from Gideon and did a quick scan of the events leading up to Sixer’s dip into the portal, viewing the fight he had with his brother and the symbol from the diagnostics equipment that was burned into his back.

Stanley Pines was still in Gravity Falls?

This could be interesting.
“You know what kid? You’ve convinced me! I’m sold. I’ll help you with this and in return you can help me with something I’ve been working on. We’ll work out the details later.” Bill said, floating down to Gideon and extending his hand, relying on the fact that this kid was too stupid and revenge mad to question what those details could be before sealing the deal.

Predictably, Gideon jumped at the chance, already holding his hand out for Bill with an eager grin, plunging his pudgy palm forward into the blue fire that sprung up around Bill’s thin black hand with all the confidence of a dreaming child.

“Deal!” Gideon bared his teeth in a sinister smile.

The deal sealed, Bill quickly withdrew his hand from Gideon’s meaty palm and floated back a little from the kid, bending his arm at the elbow to swing his fist across his bricks with a jaunty wave, eager to get his part of the deal over with.

“Well, time to invade Stan’s mind. This should be fun!”

Scouring through the mind of Stanford’s estranged twin brother would be fun. Nothing on poking through Sixer’s head of course, but since Jheselbraum cut him out of that mental property market, it, couldn’t hurt for Bill to shop around elsewhere.

He couldn’t wait to see what embarrassing childhood memories Sixer’s brother had about his twin and discovering all the juicy details of what became of Sixer’s life when he left Earth was too tempting to ignore. Not to mention what happened to the science hut. Bill really wanted to find out more about how the science hut dropped the ‘s’ and became the Mystery Hack.

Now came the key part of any good customer interaction with some jerk you just duped into a deal. A speedy exit.

Levitating higher and disappearing in a flash of light, Bill gave his parting words to Lil Gideon, imparting some cosmic wisdom to the chubby kid so he didn’t walk away from this whole interaction with nothing.

“Remember, reality is an illusion, the universe is a hologram, buy gold! BYE!”

And with that Bill withdrew the mindscape from the clearing, travelling through it to a different mind.

A vulnerable mind.

Stanley Pines’ sleeping unprotected mind, inside the Mystery Shack.

---

When the magnetic cart finally rolled out of the dense Gravity Falls forest, it came into a clearing that was the exact same clearing Stanford remembered surrounding his shack, but again with several key differences.

The main difference being the enormous scientific compound built up around the minuscule structure of Stanford’s original house, countless glass windows reflecting the dimming light of evening from the multi-story buildings, large white parabolas mounted on the roof of each building, beaming satellite signals to the wider world beyond.
The magnetic cart crossed through the chain link fencing surrounding the compound, passing through the security protocols that Stanford noted on his way in. His eyes scouring the compound from within the cart, Stanford decided to discard all pretence of subterfuge when he saw the gold symbol on the side of the largest building.

It was his symbol.

A six fingered hand.

This was HIS compound. His institute, his research facility.

The signage on the front of the building declared this place to be the International Institute of Oddology, making sense of the branded acronym Ford had seen emblazoned over the tents near the crash site. That combined with the Six Fingered hand on the wall indicated that in this universe Stanford must have been ultimately successful, achieving the goals he dreamed of since university.

With that in mind, Stanford discarded his initial infiltration plan to impersonate one of the guards by knocking them out and stealing their attire and settled on a much less violent infiltration option. After all, it couldn’t be too difficult to impersonate himself. He just had to act like he belonged here and nobody would think to question him.

If his alternate self was the one who ran this place, by that logic Stanford should have no issues simply walking in through the front door of the compound. He had no need to sneak in with the cargo and, with that in mind, he set the large wrench back down on the tray in the back of the cart and focused on plan B.

Jumping off the back of the magna-cart before it could wheel itself into a parking garage, Ford landed in a crouch on the grass, straightening up and surveying the building.

How ironic that Jheselbraum must have sent him to retrieve the power source he needed from himself.

All that could have been, indeed.

Given his alternate self’s relative success, Stanford couldn’t imagine his dimensional double would have any trouble parting with the power source he needed to defeat Bill, considering it was likely in their combined interests to do so.

Ford smoothed his hair back off his face, tried to exude the sort of confidence Bill assured him was all that was needed to infiltrate the US government and walked across the green like he belonged here.

Striding directly for the building’s entrance, various interns watched him with an awe that only cemented Ford’s theory. This was his institute and retrieving the power source he needed would be a cake walk.

It was only when he was stopped by one of the Institute’s security guards by the main door that he ran into an issue.

“HALT! Don’t come any further!” The guard double took when he saw Stanford and then raised his hand defensively.

“I beg your pardon?” Stanford asked, attempting to bluff his way past the guard, acting as if he were meant to be here.
“We have a doppleganger of the CEO on the front lawn, clothing tattered, stubble, cracked glasses, attempting to neutralise.” The guard muttered into his walkie talkie, keeping an eye on Stanford.

Ford raised his hands, showcasing his six fingers, attempting to calm the guard down. “Now I’m certain this isn’t necessary –“ “What’s your favourite snack? Tell me, NOW!” shouted the security guard, reaching for the weapon at his belt.

Putting his hands up higher, Ford blinked briefly at this odd request before answering honestly. “J-jellybeans? Wh –“

“Not a shapeshifter.” The security guard spoke into his hand-held radio, signalling to the rest of the security team. “I repeat, we have a doppleganger situation in the front courtyard. Subject is not a shapeshifter and is taking the form of Doctor Pines. Attempting to detain.”

“Proceed with caution,” came a response from the radio.

Stanford began backing away from the guard now, not liking the sound of being ‘detained’.

“No, let’s just settle down. You can put that away. That really isn’t necessary,” Ford frowned as the security guard withdrew his weapon, some kind of stun gun, aiming it at him.

“Sir, I’m going to have to ask you to put your hands behind your head and kneel on the ground, slowly now.”

Stanford began to reach for his coat pocket slowly, holding one hand out in front of him defensively. More security staff began to run out into the courtyard, the lingering interns rushing inside to safety. The security guard raised his gun higher as Ford’s hand reached into his coat pocket.

“Don’t move!”

“Don’t move, put your hands on your head, kneel on the ground. Your instructions don’t exactly line up. I’m just trying to –“ Ford grumbled, still reaching for his plans for the weapon, hoping to explain his situation to the man, watching the five other guards assemble and aim their weapons at him.

“He’s got a gun!” One of them shouted, one of Ford’s blasters holstered in his trench coat pocket revealed when he reached for the plans.

That was all it took for the security team to let out a volley of shots, Stanford abruptly dodging the various blasts, reminded strongly of Bill’s target practise from 30 years ago.

“They’re blueprints!” Ford shouted back in between dynamic rolls, jumps, crouches and pirouettes, dodging the laser blasts. “For a power source. I need to speak to the person who runs this place. Oh for goodness s-”

The guards didn’t seem to be listening though, still firing shots rapidly.

One of the shots grazed Ford’s ankle, and while the blast didn’t seem to be lethal or deadly, Ford suddenly felt an encroaching lethargy, the energy draining from his body, his agility slowing down substantially until another shot landed, hitting him in the chest.

Falling backwards and collapsing on the ground, blueprints clutched within his grasp, Ford could vaguely hear the crunch of boots on grass as the security guards came closer, peering down at him as his eyelids grew heavier.

The last thing Ford heard before losing consciousness was one of the guards speaking into their walkie talkies.

“Mr McGucket. You’re going to want to see this.”

The forest was thick with ominous fog, grey skies clouding the dilapidated shack, the moonlight above coming from a glowing ethereal eight ball as opposed to the moon itself. Children’s toys were floating through the air, unanchored to the ground below, the shack barely moored to the ground, crumbling apart, while the weather vane above the shack squeaked with the discordant intensity of the neglected.

Floating past a broken down swing set and a duck shaped rocker, remnants from a past playground decaying and bereft, Bill examined Stanford’s brother’s mindscape and noted the way his memories littered the exterior of the shack like illegally discarded debris, taking it all in with a long whistle.

“Geez, this place is a dump.”

Putting his hands on his sides Bill scanned the area, noting school desks and lounge chairs and a kid’s trailer cart sticking out of the mossy forest floor, the teddy bear resting within the cart losing an eye as mould overtook its plush fabric body.

“You’d think Sixer’s brother would know how to compartmentalise better.” Bill remarked to himself. “It’s like he just let his shame and regret bleed out all over the place. How does he live like this? At least Sixer could shove all his regrets and disappointments into that wheat field out back. This is just depressing.”

Squinting up at the eight-ball looming over the shack in the sky above, following him as he moved throughout Stanley’s mind, Bill idly wondered if that represented something that wouldn’t leave Ford’s brother alone? His past maybe? Or maybe he was just really bad at hustling pool?

Bill wasn’t really that invested in finding out, and so he floated into the shack itself, gliding through the front door.

“Come on, giftshop.” Bill rubbed his hands together, looking for some kind of souvenir he could take home with him. A tacky reminder of Sixer’s failures would be nice, but the code to Sixer’s brother’s safe would be nice too and, at least, it would get Gideon off his back.

The foyer of the shack wasn’t how Bill remembered it from his brief scan of Gravity Falls back in the clearing with Gideon. In Stanley’s mind, it had undergone some serious remodelling, becoming an escherscape of floating staircases trailing off towards various shifting corridors, doors lining the walls, petering off around every hallway and clearing.

There were millions of doors here, each one of them leading to different memories, thoughts, and dreams. However, none of them seemed to be labelled clearly. At least Sixer’s obsession with the Dewey Decimal system meant that Bill didn’t have to try too hard to find what he was looking for.
Stanley Pines’ mind was like a labyrinth.

“Okay, so maybe he does know how to compartmentalise.” Bill conceded with a scowl.

Floating down one of the broken staircases, Bill opened the first door on his left to see into one of Stanley’s memories.

“My ex wife still misses me. But her aim is getting better!”

“Ugh.” Bill slammed the door shut and floated away.

He opened several more doors, getting a cursory glance of Fez hiding arrest warrants under a mat in the shack as if that would make them less legally binding, seeing the big lug crying like a baby when he held two freshly minted infant humans in his arms and catching a childhood memory of Stanley and Sixer testing out one of Sixer’s inventions.

“Now you don’t have to put your pants on one leg at a time like everyone else, transcending the needs of the everyman. You can just spring out of bed and put them on in one swift motion!” A gangly teenaged Sixer explained, positioning his trouser applicator just off the edge of the top bunk’s frame, Stanley sitting on the top bunk by the ladder getting ready to play test dummy.

“Oh boy. Here goes nothing.”

Stanley jumped down into the trouser applicator machine and succeeded in giving himself an unfortunate wedgie while Sixer fretted about the result beside him.

“Heh heh heh.” Bill laughed at that memory, lingering in that doorway for a while before realising he was being distracted from the mission at hand.

Stanley’s childhood memories of Sixer were too intoxicating. Back then Sixer was naïve enough to be earnest, untouched by cosmic agendas, deception, or betrayal. This was Sixer at his core, an optimist, an idealist, an inventor with an open mind. Seeing him like that was painful yet addictive but Bill wasn’t here to collect memories about Sixer. He needed to find Stanley’s memory of the code to his safe. Once Bill fulfilled his end of the deal then he could waste time poking through Fez’s mind.

It would take him forever to isolate and discover the individual memory of Stanley inputting the code to the safe and Bill didn’t have that kind of time.

Spending eternity searching through the mind of Sixer’s twin didn’t have the same sort of appeal that squatting in Stanford’s mind had especially considering how every door he could open in Stanley’s mind was like a slap in the face, reminding him of all the doors in Sixer’s mind that were closed to him now.

There had to be an easier way to do this.

“Woah. This is Stan’s mind?”

“I figured there would be more hot old ladies.”

Bill’s eye widened when he heard that and used his all-sight briefly to see who else had encroached upon Stanley’s mind.

Giving himself a quick overview of events he could tell that not only did he invade Stanley’s mind, but so did his grand-niece and nephew, along with some kind of rodent man they kept as
It was curious that these three all bore symbols from Jheselbraum’s zodiac throughout the summer. Considering she was dead, that wasn’t likely to cause problems, but it did not go unnoticed.

Now, not only was Bill’s curiosity piqued at the thought of getting to meet the key elements of Jheselbraum’s zodiac (getting to meet Stanford’s newer relations before he got to was a plus as well), but one of the kids had one of Sixer’s journals.

Very interesting.

That made it two children who managed to get their hands on Sixer’s hidden journals, stashed away in places that his paranoid mind thought no one would ever find it. Just goes to show how childish Sixer’s paranoia was if his journals were found by a bunch of infants.

It was probably like an adventure to these kids, uncovering the secrets of Ford’s journals. There were codes and mysteries and Sixer’s diagrams were practically cartoons, incredibly appealing to the juvenile mind. Privately Bill wondered if these kids had the sort of IQ to keep up with his own cryptic additions to the journal or if it would take a few more years before they’d be able to decrypt his own coded commentary.

From a cursory glance he could tell that the two kids, Dipper and Mabel, were reasonably capable, having run into some supernatural mishaps already exploring the woods around Gravity Falls.

They were only here for the summer, staying with their ‘Grunkle Stan’ (oh Bill just loved it, the identity theft, the indignities, Sixer would be throwing a fit when he saw this) but already they’d been diving headfirst into the sort of whimsical mystery this town had to offer.

They went on the same sort of adventures Bill loved when he was corporeal and sharing the Shack with Sixer. Bill would bet those kids had some fun stories to tell and if he wasn’t in such a rush with the whole organising the apocalypse thing, he might have enjoyed hanging around to ask them about it.

But unfortunately, he had a world to destroy – theirs. And while Bill didn’t have time to chit chat with Sixer’s family, he could use them.

Those kids probably knew their great uncle well enough to know where he would keep the memory of the code to his safe.

They followed Bill here to protect Stan’s mind from him. If Bill made them think they could stop him by finding the memory first, they’d be doing the hard work for him and he could just sit back and relax, watching them lead him straight to the memory. Bill had almost forgotten how fun it was to manipulate chumps to do his bidding.

It wasn’t that he wanted to watch Sixer’s family, oh no. And he definitely didn’t want to compare the kids to Stanford, finding out who inherited his stubborn jaw and who inherited his fascination with the weird and unusual. Cataloguing each similarity and difference between this new generation of Pines twins with the old, maintaining his mental tally of obsessiveness with his ex-worshipper.

Technically Sixer wasn’t worth obsessing over, given how stupidly he defected to Jheselbraum’s side, implanting that plate in his head traitorously, but old habits were hard to shake, and obsessing over Stanford was practically Bill’s only hobby at this point, if you didn’t count planning Weirdmaggedon as a hobby. That was more like work, multi-dimensional event planning. Day drinking wasn’t a hobby either, so really Stanford was all that he had.

Dissipating from the inside of the shack, Bill reappeared outside, floating above the porch just in time to hear the kid with the braces say.

“Remember everyone, we’ve got to look out for the triangle guy.”

“Yeah! Look out for the triangle guy!” Bill called out, twirling his cane as he descended.

The trio spun around, having been walking backwards towards the shack, surveying the misty forests behind them.

“It’s him! It’s the guy!” pointed out Question Mark, somewhat redundantly.

The kids gasped, but wasting no time the girl with the braces gritted her teeth with the same sort of gung-ho stupidity Bill recognised from every time Sixer decided to dive into a confrontation for the sake of his own heroism. She gets one tally in her ‘how much are you like Sixer’ chart.

“You leave our uncle’s brain alone, you isosceles monster!” She shouted and came running at Bill, just like Sixer, running into danger.

When Shooting Star dove forward to tackle Bill, he just sucked her into the surface of his bricks, giving her a little time to cool down.

She sure didn’t get her geometry skills from Sixer, or else she’d know that Bill was no isosceles, he was a perfect equilateral. Either she was trying to insult him, or she was too young to know better, and for her sake Bill presumed the latter.

Materialising a pocket watch, observing it briefly, Bill decided Sixer’s niece had enough of a time out and let her charge right back out of his bricks, landing on the ground closing her arms around nothing.

“Gotcha! Wait, what?”

“Ah, Stan’s family. We meet at last.” Bill looked over each intruder in Stanley’s mind, identifying their places on Jheselbraum’s zodiac and pointing his finger as he spoke. “Question Mark, Shooting Star, Pine Tree. I had a hunch I might bump into you!”

The hunch was Jheselbraum’s scheming, which Bill was coming to realise had a lot more follow through than he thought her capable of, and with that in mind, Bill shot a laser blast out of his fingertip at Sixer’s nephew, blasting a hole through the kid’s torso callously.

He screamed in fright and clasped his hands on his head, looking just enough like Sixer in the midst of his paranoid phase to make him entertaining. Bill was delighted by the kid’s reaction. He gets a tally mark too.

His twin was less phased by this perversion of reality, more adaptive to the whimsical cruelties of dreams, sticking her hand through the hole in Dipper’s chest while he panted in fright, laughing.

“Boop!”

“Mabel.” Pine Tree chastised her, frustrated by the way both Shooting Star and Question Mark laughed carelessly at his predicament.

So, this kid inherited Sixer’s killjoy tendencies clearly. Also, his singlemindedness.
“What do you want with our uncle’s mind anyway?” The kid demanded, and Bill saw the in for his agenda.

“Oh, just the code to the old man’s safe. Inside the shack is a maze of a thousand doors representing your uncle’s memories. Behind one of them is a memory of him inputting the code. I just need to find it and Gideon will pay me handsomely.”

“Not if we stop you!” Shooting Star shouted combatively, pointing at Bill, proving that she was just as easily led as Sixer.

Now to set the challenge.

“Hah! Fat chance. I’m the master of the mind.” Blue flames encircled Bill for dramatic effect, wiggling his hands at the girl, casting his powers forward into Shooting Star’s mind. “I even know what you’re thinking right now.”

“That’s impossible. No one can guess what I’m thinking.” Shooting Star declared presumptively, her hands on her hips, believing herself so innovative that Bill couldn’t possibly comprehend her genius, just like Sixer.

Well, we’ll see about that.

Glimpsing inside Shooting Star’s head, Bill saw all that he needed to see, confirming that out of the two twins, Mabel was definitely the most like Stanford Pines.

Clicking his fingers, Bill summoned from the forefront of Mabel’s mind her ideal dream boys.

Two brightly coloured athletic 80’s fashioned young men sprang into being, everything that Mabel Pines pined for, and Bill observed, unimpressed, as these dream boys proved as vapid and doting as Stanford expected him to be when he summoned Bill down into the carefully designed body of his dream muse.

“Well, we’ll see about that.

Glimpsing inside Shooting Star’s head, Bill saw all that he needed to see, confirming that out of the two twins, Mabel was definitely the most like Stanford Pines.

Clicking his fingers, Bill summoned from the forefront of Mabel’s mind her ideal dream boys.

Two brightly coloured athletic 80’s fashioned young men sprang into being, everything that Mabel Pines pined for, and Bill observed, unimpressed, as these dream boys proved as vapid and doting as Stanford expected him to be when he summoned Bill down into the carefully designed body of his dream muse.

“Whoa, where are we, bro?” asked Xyler.

“We must be in heaven, cause I just saw an angel.” Craz squatted down, looking directly at Mabel who squealed and threw herself at her dream boy.

“I’m never letting go of your leg!” Mabel enthused, as delighted by her fantasy taking form as Stanford was so long ago.

Well, that was Shooting Star taken care of. Bill knew how to handle her now.

“You’re out of your league, kids.” Bill advised, before granting them a cursory warning. “Turn around now before you see something you might regret.”

Glowering at them for a loaded second to push the point across, Bill laid the last line of bait down, crashing backwards through the wall of the shack, waving to them as he departed.

“Later, suckers!”

Turning his eye to observe the Pines twins as he flew further into the house, Bill saw Pine Tree take the bait.

“We’re going in,” squinting, Dipper held a hand up to shield his eyes in the face of Mabel’s dream boys. “Mabel, can we leave those guys out here? Looking at them hurts my eyes.”
“No, they can help us!” Mabel insisted, much like Stanford, summoning his fantasy to life and immediately enlisting them. It would be enough to make Bill bitterly nostalgic, bringing back all those warm fuzzy memories if Mabel’s dream boys weren’t so utterly moronic.

“Totally! Arm throne!” Mabel’s dream boys bent down and linked their arms together to literally enthrone Shooting Star, Mabel giggling with glee all the while and Bill could tell which twin inherited Sixer’s bloated ego.

Rolling his eyes, Bill focused on the many doors that opened when he flew past them, taking a curious glance as he floated by. He was looking for more juicy Sixer memories but instead he kept finding more boring Stanley moments.

Stealing his dad’s gold medallion to clumsily get it engraved, pouring hours of wasted effort into making his own comic books as a kid, boxing lessons, peeking through the bars of a jail cell in Albuquerque, a woman inside the cell crying, lit by slivered moonlight. Typical boring stuff. Bill almost flew past it all, finding Stanley’s life so utterly disinteresting, until he flew past one door and had to double back.

“Hell-lo. What’s this?”

There was Stanley Pines, pulling on his brother’s six fingered safety gloves, standing in front of the deactivated portal with a tool box and one of Sixer’s journals, cross referencing the machinery in front of him with a ‘quantum engineering for dummies’ textbook, scratching his belly as he squinted at the page.

“This isn’t so hard.” Stanley remarked, unscrewing one of the panels in the side of the portal fuel tanks. “Looks like mom and dad wasted all that money, sending Stanford to that fancy school of his. Any lug with a textbook can do this kinda crap. Now let’s see, unscrew to the left – AHH!”

Sparks flew from the side of the panel, and Stanley jumped back, narrowly avoiding electrocution. He wiped his brow, huffed a determined sigh, and approached the portal once more, ready to try again.

“Hmm. Guess you’re good for something after all. Interesting.” Bill rubbed his hands together, before resting his hand on the doorframe, trying to get some more exact statistics from the memory.

Stanley was much younger here. This must have been about twenty years ago or so. Bill could only imagine how much progress could have been made by a layman with only one journal over the past twenty years, but it was more progress than he could have hoped for.

If Fez was already working on the portal, trying to bring his brother back, no doubt, then Bill didn’t have to go looking for another stooge to reactivate the portal. He already had a willing one right inside the shack.

Sure, Stanley was no genius, but he was obviously determined and resourceful enough to at least get the portal functioning eventually. Skimming past several other doors, Bill could see the portal progressing, a little more slapdash than the polished product Sixer and Fiddleford put together, but the rudimentary basics were sound enough, and Bill didn’t need the portal to work perfectly. He just needed it open long enough to get his foot in the door.

It would almost be a shame at this point to turn the portal over to Gideon when he gave him the deed to the shack, considering it looked like Sixer’s brother wasn’t that far away from a successful first attempt. It would be up and running by the end of this summer if Fez could find the other journals, and since the other two books were in the possession of two kids, well you know what they say about taking candy from babies.

Still, a deal was a deal, and Bill flicked his attention back to the twins and their housekeeper, keeping track of their gradual exploration.

It seemed like Shooting Star was splitting off from Pine Tree, the sweaty kid lingering by one of Fez’s doorways labelled ‘Dipper Memories’, reluctant to carry on.

“We already know how Stan feels about us. He loves us! We’re great!” Shooting Star insisted and headed off down the corridor, expecting Pine Tree to follow her.

“Yeah, let’s just keep moving.” Question Mark concurred, following the obvious leader.

“More moving?”

“Yes! I love motion!” cooed Mabel’s dream boys, taking turns sharing the same brain cell, or maybe using it as a hackey sack.

Ugh.

Bill could see Pine Tree make to follow his sister as well, before thinking the better of it and doubling back to prise open the door to his uncle’s memories about him, curiosity getting the better of him.

“Oh, just a quick peek.”

Bill honestly wasn’t that interested in seeing the kid’s emotional roller coaster journey reconciling how his uncle felt about him and this kid clearly wasn’t the dynamic thinker of the two. Shooting Star was racking up the Sixer Similarity tally marks and this kid was barely scoring. Bill would be better off following Sixer’s mini-me, Shooting Star, instead of wasting time trailing after Pine Tree.

Flexing a little of his powers, letting his mastery of the mind speak for itself, it was easy enough to make the winding corridors of Stan’s mind a little more precarious, to trick the fat one into taking a wrong turn, to assume Question Mark’s shape and follow Shooting Star through the hallways while her handyman got stuck watching one of Stanley’s more entertaining memories.

This would be easy.

“Hello? Code to Stan’s safe? Where are you?” Bill called out, feigning Soos’ voice perfectly, keeping Shooting Star’s keen mind nicely on track.

“Opening and closing doors is fun!”

“I can do it also!” crowed Mabel’s brightly coloured dream boys, and Bill maintained his poker face by contenting himself with the thought of disintegrating her fantasy boyfriends down to their finer molecules the minute he got his hands on the code to the safe.

Joining in the search, Bill opened one of the doors in the corridor at random, watching Stan input a code on the outside of the vending machine in the lobby, the vending machine swinging forward to reveal a secret door behind it, no doubt leading down to the basement where Bill’s portal was.

“If only people knew the truth. That hidden behind this vending machine, I secretly have a –“

“BORING!” Bill yelled out and slammed the door shut, preserving the secret of the portal from any meddling Sixer’s adept little niece could do to Bill’s plan.

Meanwhile Mabel was honing in on a promising looking door, the words ‘Top Secret’ written on the wood. She gestured to the group, drawing their attention to the door.

“All right guys, I have a good feeling about this door.”

Swinging the door open, rather than finding the top-secret code to Fez’s safe, instead the door opened to a rather peculiar tableau, Stan standing in the bathroom in front of the mirror, squeezing his belly.

“Hey Mr Tummy. Hey Mister Stan!” Sixer’s brother seemed to be entertaining himself with some gross fleshy puppetry, jiggling his stomach fat and conducting a conversation with it, voices and all. “Are you hungry? Yes!”

“Ahh!” Bill winced, recoiling from the door, disgusted more than he was intrigued.

“Eat your crackers! Yum, yum, yum.”

“Sweet Sally.” Mabel proclaimed in disgust and mercifully swung the door shut.

As Mabel paced away from the Top-Secret door further down the corridor, Bill decided to prod her back on track once more, relying on her imaginative child mind to make the informed leaps Bill was relying on.

“Aw, we’ve been searching forever. What if the triangle guy finds the memory before we do?” Bill said, resting his hand against his forehead like a bad stage actor.

“If we wanna find Stan’s memory, we gotta think like Stan. He’s always hiding stuff, right?” Mabel deduced aptly, tapping her chin like how Sixer did when formulating a hypothesis.

Scouring his mind for something believable to say, Bill remarked. “Yeah! Like how he hides his arrest warrants under that rug in the gift shop?”

“Soos, that’s it!” Mabel enthused, hurrying down one of the corridors to point at one of the rugs littering Stan’s mind, pulling it back to reveal a trap-door beneath it. “Look!”

Mabel’s dream boys gasped gleefully as if her discovery was a shocking revelation on their favourite TV show and Bill joined in with their idiotic chorus to maintain his cover.

Mabel opened the trap door, the group crouching down to look within, and inside of the memory Stanley was kissing the deed to the shack, locking it away in his safe.

“There ya go. And now to input the code. 13, 44, and finally…”

Bill closed the door quickly, preferring to steal the memory in its entirety rather than let Shooting Star hear the full code in case she rushed to retrieve the deed from the safe before Gideon could.

“Dude! We found it!” Bill said, borrowing Question Mark’s lexicon to really sell it.

“Yeah!” Mabel said, delighted by their success.

“But what do we do now? Jinx!” Posited Mabel’s dream boys simultaneously, their voices a vapid echo.

“Um… um…” Mabel looked around Stan’s mindscape, her quick little mind thinking of a course of action before settling on one, her eyes alighting on an axe held by a decorative suit of armour by the wall. “Let’s just destroy the door before Bill can find it!”

She grabbed the axe and was already teetering over towards the door with the heavy weapon in her hands, raising it to strike the wooden memory door.

It was amazing how she intuitively picked the one course of action that could really inconvenience Bill here. She had a knack for knowing just what would disrupt Bill’s plans, just like Sixer had.

Throwing his arms out to halt her potential devastation, Bill quickly spoke up, slipping somewhat out of character here, although he wasn’t exactly putting in an Oscar winning performance, imitating this dumbbell.

“Wait! Maybe I should do it! My big fat arms are great at destroying stuff!”

“Oh. Okay.” Mabel conceded quickly with an eager smile, setting the axe down, barely noticing anything was amiss.

She’d find out soon enough, but by the time she did it’d be too late.

Bill extended his hand, frowning with concentration, the door creaking then glowing blue as it levitated up from the floor, wrenching from the floorboards until finally Bill had it floating in the air above him.

If that wasn’t enough of a clue for Shooting Star that things were awry, the real Question Mark strolling in from down the hall probably gave the game away for sure.

“Hey guys! I just saw a memory of Stan roller skating and wearing short shorts! Didn’t look… didn’t look that bad. Hey, something weird is goin’ on here.”

Bill started laughing, quickly shedding Question Mark’s robust form, his two eyes melding into one, Soos’ fleshy arms pressing against his sides until he could reform in a whirl of colour, his customary yellow bricks and angular shape returning as he held the door to the memory of the code to the safe in his hand, looking down on Shooting Star and her dream boys with amusement.

“Boy, you kids sure are gullible. I knew you’d lead me straight to the code.”

Bill took a moment longer to chuckle at the dumbstruck expressions on their faces, finding the familiar mix of shock and outrage on Mabel’s face enough like Sixer’s cute expressions of betrayal to be truly entertaining.

When they still seemed slow on the uptake, like they didn’t get what was so hilarious about being tricked, Bill decided to spell it out for them.

“It’s funny how dumb you are.”

That explanation still didn’t wipe the outrage off their faces, so Bill shrugged it off, continuing with his victory banter.

“The combination to Stan’s safe. Boy, that was even easier than I thought!”

“Oh yeah? Well you’re a – a stink face!” Mabel accused Bill, wracking her little child mind for a suitably scouring retort in the face of Bill’s betrayal, or maybe she just couldn’t let being called dumb slide, just like Sixer.
“Awesome comeback, Mabel!” cheered one of Mabel’s dream boys.

“Don’t treat me like a child, Xyler.” Mabel snapped at the figment of her imagination, growing impatient with her own creation.

Job done, Bill had no more need to stick around and he flew away down the long corridors of Stan’s mind, memory in hand, ready to deliver the code to Gideon.

“Later, suckers!”

More doors to various memories opened as Bill flew past, but he didn’t linger to snoop this time. He didn’t need to wait for Sixer’s brother to get smart enough to kickstart the portal. Gideon likely had enough resources to do it just as well as Fez could, although the downside was that Gideon was more likely to be a pain in Bill’s eye while doing so.

Even now the kid was trying to call Bill, checking up on his progress. Talk about being micromanaged.

The urgency of Gideon’s summons rang through Bill’s body, and he landed on the floor in one of the hallways. Answering the call, he pressed his bowtie, a screen opening out on his bricks below.

“Y’ellow?”

“Bill! Did you find the memory with the combination yet?” Gideon barked, demanding as ever.

“Relax, short stack. I got it right here.” Bill drawled, holding out the door with the memory inside.

“Hahahah! Perfect. Now, give it to me and we’ll finish our bargain.”

Bill had no qualms about following through on his end if it meant his apocalypse would be within reach. Gideon seemed to be keen to follow through as well, or he would follow through if he didn’t want to be plagued by eternal nightmares.

“Finally! It’s – you got a pen there? It’s 13, 44 –“ Squinting at the code Fez inputted, Bill paused to take in the number, holding the door out at arm’s length.

Before he could reveal the final digits a small orange projectile hit the door, knocking it out of Bill’s grasp.

“Ah! No no no! Wait, no!” Bill scrambled after the door, but it flew away down the stairs and through one of Fez’s memory doors, down a fathomless hole within, no doubt Stan’s very own effective memory shredder for that self-imposed repression he likely relied upon, the mental gimmick fashioning itself after one of the gimmicks he sold tours to at his Shack.

“And none more bottomless than the bottomless pit!” A memory of Stan said, gesturing to the black hole through which Bill’s stolen memory fell. “Which as you can see here is bottomless. Woah, whatever that was it’s gone forever.”

The door to the memory of the bottomless pit slammed shut, and Bill clapped his hands to his sides in shock, Gideon doing the same on the screen on his torso. Bill looked behind him to see Shooting Star standing triumphant with a nyarf gun in her hand, blowing on the top of it, holding it with all the confidence Sixer did when he mastered the laser gun.

“Ha ha! Boom!”
“Mabel did it!” cheered the dream boys.

“The Shack is safe!” concurred Question Mark with equal enthusiasm.

On the screen below on Bill’s bricks, Gideon scowled dismissively, clutching his little piggy hands tight before shouting.

“The deal’s off!”

“Wa-wait! No, wait!” Bill panicked, his part of the deal not done yet. He could still fix this. He could find the memory. Everything had been falling apart for him lately, despite finally dispatching his old mentor and that two-faced seven eyed hack that fancied herself his nemesis all in one day. Things were supposed to go right for him now. He just wanted the Shack. His portal was in the basement! This was supposed to be easy!

“I’m switchin’ to plan B.” Gideon announced, before shutting off his connection to the call, the screen fading away on Bill’s bricks like a TV set being turned off.

If there was one thing Bill hated more than anything, it was a deal breaker, and even worse was a deal that was broken because he was made to look like an idiot. In front of a 12 year old for that matter. BY a 12 year old! On what was becoming one of the top ten worst days of his life! This was humiliating!!

Bill had never lost out on a deal like that before, EVER. It was shattering.

Bill literally shattered, his triangular form breaking like glass and falling to pieces before reforming, his bricks turning red with rage.

This kid had lost Bill the chance to activate his portal again, to follow through on all the promises he made to his henchmaniacs, the new home they sorely needed. This kid had put off, once again, Bill’s party, just like Sixer had, and there was only so many times you could postpone a party before people just decided to not show up at all. That was even more humiliating than having to postpone in the first place. The only thing worse then throwing a delayed apocalypse was throwing one that barely drew a decent crowd. He’d be an interdimensional laughing stock for all the wrong reasons.

Mabel stood, proud and triumphant at the end of the corridor with the same cocky assuredness Sixer had when he foiled Bill’s plans. It was the same smug victoriousness that he often saw on Jheselbraum’s face, whenever she thought she got one over on Bill, and right now that comparison made Bill’s bricks boil.

This kid had it coming to her.

“YOU! You can’t even imagine what you just cost me!”

Looming over the girl, Bill’s tone dropped to a more demonic register, aiming to wipe that smug grin off her braces covered mouth. Fire flared in both of his hands, his palms still tingling from when he’d burned the life out of Jheselbraum, clutching her crisping corpse between his bare hands.

It was the wrong day to piss Bill Cipher off.

“Do you have any idea what I’m like WHEN I’M MAD?”

Letting everything that frustrated Bill come to the forefront, the Behenian sigils around the edge of the portal began to flash across his eye with increasing speed, the ground shaking below him. Fire arced out in a circle around the group and Bill raised his hands in the air, the fire flaring higher.

From under the floorboards of Stan’s mind came a gigantic stone replica of Stan’s head, like some sort of head-ception, raising like a high speed elevator up out of the dingy corridors of the shack, breaking through the roof into the cosmos above, the force and speed of their ascent causing Shooting Star and Question Mark to stumble.

Bill stretched his form out, red and imposing, lightning crackling over his bricks, shock finally bumping the triumph off Shooting Star’s familiar little face.

“So, I guess he gets really mad when he gets mad.” Soos pointed out redundantly, that understatement the final nail in the coffin of their fate, the last indignity Bill would allow from these glorified chimps, bearing the symbols from Jheselbraum’s zodiac so impertinently.

Looming over them, Bill decided he was done with playing nice just because these people were Sixer’s relations. If anything that meant Bill had even less reason to hold back.

“EAT NIGHTMARES!”

Finally Bill got the reaction he deserved for all his hard work, and those two dimwits started screaming, appropriately frightened of him now.

“One nightmare, coming up!” Bill promised, deciding which of the two’s worst nightmares he’d inflict on them first.

“Nightmare? Hope he doesn’t mean that British dog man I’m always dreaming about,” fretted Soos, helpfully, volunteering to be Bill’s first target.

Reaching into his mind, Bill pulled the image of said British dog man to the fore and summoned it into being, much to Question Mark’s dismay. An anthropomorphised British Bulldog wearing a monocle and a bowler hat walked towards Soos on it’s hindlegs, wacking the handyman in the stomach with a cane.

“Ello ello ello! Who’s crike for a stick in the pudding?” enunciated Soos’ nightmare and Bill idly wondered how his subconscious got stuck on this particular perversion of reality. Was it cartoons? The internet? An aversion to dogs or the British? Seems like a stretch that for a 20 year old man this would be his greatest nightmare.

Nonetheless Soos screamed and clutched his head, running away from the dog man, shouting. “It’s everything I’ve ever feared!”

With Question Mark taken care of, Bill turned his eye to Shooting Star, pointing at her and unleashing all the venom he usually reserved for Sixer on the girl, being particularly vicious with her nightmare.

It shot from Bill’s finger like a beam and instantly Mabel was transformed, her skin melting, swelling, deforming, although the transformation wasn’t the nightmarish part for her. It was the end result, her ego unable to stand it as she became a green ugly hunchback, hideous to behold.

“My cuteness!” Mabel screamed, clutching her face in horror. “What did you do to my cuteness?”

Her agonising over her looks told Bill pretty clearly that Shooting Star had just as much of an overdeveloped ego as Sixer did, and destroying her self image was particularly worthwhile, considering how much weight it seemed to hold for the girl.
Personally Bill thought she looked better that way, monstrous and freakish, and idly considered giving the entire Pines family the same makeover, before his attention was drawn to Mabel’s dream boys, recoiling from her deformed image in horror, responding the way she thought they’d react, with shallow disgust.

“You’re next!” Bill pointed at Xyler and Craz and the figments proceeded to high-five each other and dance enthusiastically.

“Cool! We’re next!”

They were so stupid. Pretty idiotic fantasy fodder and it burned Bill to compare the two of them to him, doing to Mabel’s dream boys what he should have done to the vessel Sixer made him the moment he landed in that good for nothing meat sack.

A blast of solid energy jettisoned from Bill’s fingertip and incinerated the dream boys, blasting them off the edge of the platform to send them spiralling as they burnt, down into nothingness.

“My dream boys!” Mabel lamented, rushing to the edge of the platform, her hand outstretched, sad to see them go.

“And now to finish you all, once and for all.”

Bill reared back, getting ready to blast these meddling kids out of Stan’s mindscape and back into the real world with a killer migraine and possibly some lifelong trauma as a souvenir for their misdeeds, but as he was mustering his concentration, Shooting Star’s brother flew up to the platform on top of Stan’s head, shouting to get Bill’s attention.

“Hey Bill!”

“What?” Bill turned from his concentration, frustrated that he couldn’t do a single thing he set out to do today and it was all because of these damn Sixer mini-me’s.

“Nice bow tie.” Pine Tree quipped and shot laser beams out of his eyes, similar to the energy beams Bill had been shooting at the dream boys, blasting a hole through Bill’s bricks and incinerating his bow tie. A hole burnt all the way through Bill’s surface, turnabout being fair play for what he did to Pine Tree earlier.

Bill let out a shout of surprise and frustration, looking down at the hole in his bricks, aghast.

“Dipper!” Mabel cried out.

“Dude!” Soos remarked, impressed.

Floating over to them, Dipper spoke quickly. “Guys! I just learned that you can conjure whatever you can conceive in Grunkle Stan’s mindscape!”

“Huh?” questioned Mabel, slow on the uptake. Maybe Bill had given her mental gymnastics too much credit before.

“Just think of cool fighting stuff and it will happen.” Dipper explained, turning his gaze to Soos’ nightmare man. “Like this.”

Lasers shot from Pine Tree’s eyes again, disassembling Soos’ nightmare into nothingness efficiently and effectively.
“Ha ha. He’s dead now.” Soos pointed out, relieved.

“What? Who told you that? Don’t listen to him!” Bill urged, trying to avoid this levelling of the playing field, feeling himself losing the upper hand as the moments ticked by.

“We can do anything?” Mabel questioned, before concentrating on the changes she wished to effect in the mindscape, showcasing a talent for lucid dreaming as she restored her body to its former cuteness, the possibilities dawning on her as she effected the change. “Like have kittens for fists?”

Her fists morphed into pink fuzzy kitten faces, their eyes bulging with all the exaggerated cuteness of a beanie baby.

“Po-pow! P-p-pow! Pow!” Mabel shouted, making her own sound effects as she sent the kitten faces flying across the void towards Bill like furry little missiles, the kittens launching directly onto Bill’s eye.

Bill screamed again, in imagined pain now thanks to the sharp teeth and pointy whiskers of the cats launched at him.

Sure, the cats hurt Bill, but they were licking Mabel’s face, pressing little kitten kisses on her cheeks while she giggled. “Well hello, friends.”

“Anything, huh?” Questioned Question Mark, before he pulled his shirt up, revealing his sizable stomach. “Soos love stomach beam stare!”

A rainbow light in the shape of a question mark beamed out of Soos’ stomach, sheer indignity knocking Bill off the platform, the triangle spinning in the void to right himself.

That was the last straw.

Smoothing over the hole in his stomach and floating back onto the platform, Bill decided to get serious with the kids. “Enough games!”

Three laser blasts shot from Bill’s eye, aiming for both of the kids and Question Mark, but Sixer’s niece took initiative once again, her quick chaotic imagination coming up with the perfect solution just in time.

“Hamster Ball shields activate!”

“Activate!” repeated the other two, hamster ball shields springing up to defend each of them, causing the laser beam to redirect back and hit Bill in the eye.

“AH! Oh, my eye! AAAAAH!” Why was it always the eye?

“Rise Xyler! Rise Craz!” Mabel raised each hand decisively, calling from the void her two dream boys who rose playing electronic instruments, creating a soundtrack to her chaotic rebuttal.

“No, synthesised music! It hurts!” Bill complained, his hands covering his sides, near his eye. At least the human music of Sixer’s generation had taste although, since this was eighties electronica, it suited Sixer’s age bracket more so than Mabel’s.

“And now to imagine your worst nightmare! A portal out of Stan’s mind!” Dipper declared, pointing at the triangle valiantly.

“Out of Stan’s miiiind.” Mabel emphasised, singing into a conjured microphone.
“Mabel.” Dipper chastised, before focusing intently. “Everyone together.”

Their collective imaginations were enough to conjure a black hole beneath Bill’s feet, the gravitational pull becoming more convincing the harder they thought.

“No no no!”

They might actually have a chance to kick Bill out of Stanley’s mind for good if they kept this up, which would be a serious dent in Bill’s plans, not to mention one mental eviction too many. Clearly, he underestimated them.

“ENOUGH!” Bill spread his hands out and removed them all from Stanley’s mindscape himself, depositing them in empty white space out in the wider mindscape, halting their imaginary warfare.

Resuming his typical yellow form Bill dusted his bricks off and spoke frankly with the trio.

“You know, I’ve been impressed with you guys. You’re more clever than you look. Especially the fat one.”

“He’s talking about you.” Soos said in an exaggerated whisper, poking Shooting Star in the elbow.

“So, I’m gonna let you kids off the hook.” Bill decided, being much more reasonable with Sixer’s family than he might have been to some of his own henchmaniacs. “You might come in handy later.”

“But know this! A darkness approaches. A day will come in the future when everything you care about will change.”

At least these kids got a warning. Bill was being gracious by giving them a heads up, after all it was better knowing in advance than hearing ‘things change’ at the very last second before your own personal apocalypse.

Shrugging off that telling thought, Bill fell back on his old routine. A snazzy, paranoia inducing departure. It was always a hit.

“Until then I’ll be watching you. I’LL BE WATCHING YOU!”

And at that Bill dispersed them all from the mindscape with a blinding beam of light.

Waking up slowly, Stanford spared a moment to complain inwardly at how often he’d passed out or been knocked unconscious in this last leg of his journey. For someone who successfully avoided sleep for several years, the frequency was getting ridiculous.

Although it wasn’t like Bill could possess his body while he slept anymore, or so Jheselbraum assured him. That didn’t rule out visitations in his dreams but Bill had been thankfully absent from Ford’s mindscape in this brief involuntary siesta.

Coming to his senses gradually, Stanford’s head was resting on the cool metal surface of a table, his wrists cuffed to a loop protruding from the middle of the table.

This looked like some sort of interrogation room, which seemed like overkill by Ford’s estimation.
Whoever captured him didn’t need to intimidate or interrogate the information out of him, he came here to share his situation and hopefully collaborate for a mutually beneficial result.

The destruction of Bill was mutually beneficial. It would benefit everyone.

Lifting his head from the tabletop, Ford rolled his shoulders and looked around the empty mirrored room curiously, noticing that his coat was missing. They must have confiscated it and were most likely going through his pockets now, harvesting the alien tech from his clothing the same way they harvested it from the ship in the valley.

That certainly scuppered the majority of his preliminary escape plans, robbed of his pen laser, his nano briefcase, his quantum destabiliser prototype and his infinity sided die. He hoped that he’d have some small chance to get them back.

They’d also taken the blueprints from him. Hopefully, that would convince whoever detained him that he wasn’t a threat, that he came here with a goal. Although his goal was to build a large and dangerous gun so Stanford didn’t know how reassuring that would be.

A voice sounded out from over the room’s speakers, someone from the other side of the two-way mirror engaging with Ford, likely with the same soundproofing technology employed in the bunker.

“Could you take yer glasses off and look directly at the wall opposite you please? Just fer a second.”

Stanford complied, taking his glasses off and looking wearily into the two way glass, recognising the voice to be Fiddleford’s. It had been so long since he heard it.

“I’m not possessed.”

“It don’t hurt to be too careful, that’s all.” Fiddleford’s voice responded from over the intercom, letting out a nervous chuckle. “Just gonna shine a light in real quick, will be over in a second.”

Stanford held still, only wincing slightly as a bright light beamed out of the far wall, before dimming instantly. Despite being inconvenienced by them, he was impressed with the security protocols.

It meant at least that they knew what they were dealing with. He shuddered to think of the chances of getting his weapons back if this dimension’s inhabitants were somehow in league with Bill.

“Alright, just sit tight. I’ll be in in a second.” Fiddleford assured him, and the intercom switched off.

Stanford put his glasses back on and drummed his six fingers on the metal countertop idly, attempting to show this alternate Fiddleford that he was relatively harmless, here to co-operate and negotiate, hoping to live down his athletic blaster fight in the courtyard.

Eventually the door to the left opened and Fiddleford’s alternate self entered.

He looked similar to the Fiddleford Ford knew, with a few more wrinkles around the edges of his eyes, clean shaven, still wearing the same rounded spectacles he favoured back in the eighties. He still had a kindly face, a slim frame, but this dimension’s Fiddleford also showed signs of relative wealth, wearing a tailored white labcoat over pressed slacks, a patterned button-up shirt, and a silk tie with a gold tiepin and cufflinks accenting the look. The tie-pin and cufflinks bore the logo of the institute, the six fingered hand, and Stanford noted that Fiddleford also wore a ring bearing the While Stanford was scrutinising this alternate Fiddleford, F was doing the same to him, taking in Ford’s greying hair growing out of the post-surgery buzzcut, taking in his unkempt stubble, chipped glasses and dirty clothes. Shailesh’s scarf was somewhat tattered now, the grey sweater underneath it fairing little better, that combined with Stanford’s messy fingerless gloves made him look like some sort of interdimensional vagabond, which wasn’t that far off the mark.

“DNA testing confirms it. You really are Stanford Pines. You’ve been through the wringer, haven’t you?” Fiddleford finally said, putting a hand on his hip, holding a clipboard under his arm. “Bet you’ve got a real good story to tell about whatever happened in your universe. Must be an alternate dimension, is that right?”

Stanford raised an eyebrow at Alternate Fiddleford’s astute observation, and the fact that they’d managed to DNA test him while he was out, which Alt-Fiddleford must have taken to be sure of his manners.

“Sorry, mighty rude to not even introduce myself. My name’s Fiddleford M-”

“I know who you are, F.” Stanford cut him off, forgoing introductions. “It’s nice to see a familiar face. Not too familiar though.”

“Ah, so you are from a parallel dimension. I must look like the Fiddleford you knew from your universe no doubt.” F presumed. “With a few, oh, let’s call ‘em dimensional differences.”

“Well, I haven’t seen the Fiddleford from my own dimension for nearly 30 years, so for all I know, you could be exactly identical.” Ford spread his cuffed hands out and shrugged, attempting to make himself appear as nonthreatening as possible. He needed this Fiddleford’s help after all.

“It’s funny how alternate dimensions work like that. Sometimes everythin’s the same, sometimes just the slightest details change, sometimes small things changin’ can cause massive differences. Although you have to be travellin’ enough to know it.” Fiddleford smiled and then gave a theatrical shudder. “Don’t know if you’ve heard about the baby dimension?”

“It was singularly disturbing and illogical and that’s not even touching on the lack of child labour laws there. A bit difficult to legislate when nobody matures past the age of two.” Ford said with wry amusement, an amusement that was mirrored by F, so much so that it felt like talking to the F from his own dimension back in the day, an odd thirty years or so ago.

“Well, they don’t let that stop ‘em.”

“They certainly don’t.”

“So you’ve been dimension hoppin’ too? You haven’t just travelled to this dimension specifically from your own?” Fiddleford probed and Stanford leaned back in his chair as much as he could with his hands cuffed to the table and tried to make himself comfortable.

“Oh no, I’ve been all around. I’ve been practising interdimensional travel for the past thirty years, I’d say.”

“And how didja get here, might I ask?” Fiddleford asked, raising his pen to note down Stanford’s answer on his clipboard, a gesture that did not go unnoticed.

“Well there’s a rip in the forest that I left open leading to the ravenous chipmunk dimension, so be on the lookout for those.” Ford commented lightly, enjoying the way alternate Fiddleford’s expression dropped in horror, aghast at the thought. Before he could get too worked up at the prospect of a chipmunk invasion, Stanford cracked a roguish grin. “I’m just kidding.”

“Okay, well, you really are Stanford Pines, because that’s exactly the kind of confounded joke he’d find funny. I’m sure he’s grinnin’ at me from the other room too, jokin’ about dimensional rips.” Fiddleford huffed, and sat back in his seat, fighting a smile. “Ain’t a joking matter.”

“Is he in the other room?” Stanford asked curiously, looking to the two-way mirror. “The me from this dimension, that is?”

“Yep, he’s here. It’s not every day an alternate version of yourself stumbles through an unregistered wormhole right up to your front door. I’d wager he’s as curious as you are.” Fiddleford explained.

“Can I meet him?” Ford asked hopefully, excited to ask his alternate self a million questions. How his life differed from Ford’s own, what were the turning points that secured his successes, did he get to shake hands with Carl Sagan in this dimensional timeline? Did he receive the acclaim he sought?

Fiddleford’s expression became guarded and hesitant, looking down at his clipboard then back at Stanford with a frown. “That wouldn’t be a good idea.”

“Why not?” Ford asked, raising his eyebrows.

“Don’t know if it’s much the same in your dimension. This explanation gets trickier if the similarities between our worlds stop at a certain point. In your dimension, didja ever get around to building a trans-dimensional portal in yer basement?” Fiddleford probed, trying to set the groundwork for his explanation.

When the portal was mentioned however, Ford’s eyes widened, and he tried to stand up from his chair, his hands still cuffed to the middle of the table.

“You built the portal? You can’t! It’s too dangerous. The portal is not what it seems! Bill –“

Holding his hands up to wave off Stanford’s sudden fervid paranoia, Fiddleford’s assured body language stopped Ford’s panic short.

“I know, I know. Bill tricked us. The portal was never what it seemed, and if he’d managed to get away with it, he’d have used it to rip a hole through our dimension, throw his own apocalypse, and line-dance on our graves with all his little monster friends. I’m guessing you clued onto his act in time, else you likely wouldn’t be here.”

“So… so he tricked you too?” Ford sat down, his words stilted in his shock.

“He tried to for sure, but we were tipped off and managed to stop him just in time. Installed a Dimensional Vortex Neutraliser on the portal so we could come and go as we pleased, but it wouldn’t let the pests in. A bit like a fly-screen door back on the farm, but with devestatin’ lasers. It was my idea.” Fiddleford divulged proudly. “A good thing you listened to me too, or we wouldn’t have been able to get to where we are today.”

“So… you defeated Bill in this dimension.” Stanford mulled that prospect over, weighing up how he felt about it, his emotions more ambiguous about Bill’s defeat than he would like. “Is he dead?”

“He’s not tricking us anymore, that’s for sure.” Fiddleford confirmed, and Stanford looked down to his lap, stewing on that thought.
Despite his current goal being to kill Bill, he was surprised to find himself saddened by the thought of Bill being dead in this dimension. The thought that the triangle could come to an end at all was disheartening in ways Stanford couldn’t justify with words.

As he processed this information, the lights in the interrogation room began to flicker, and Fiddleford looked up to the ceiling, frowning at the power surge.

Looking back to Stanford, the space refugee eventually meeting Fiddleford’s gaze after the silence dragged on, Fiddleford continued his explanation with a concerned frown.

“Well, since we got our portal stable with the Neutraliser we’ve been usin’ it to explore other dimensions here at the institute. We send officers on expeditions to different dimensions to gather information and technology we can use to better ourselves here and now. On one of our trips to a more dangerous parallel dimension one of our security officers ran into his alternate self and the moment their hands touched the entire dimension began to warp and fizz with static. Reality was collapsin’ around us. We had to run back to our portal entrance as quick as we could to avoid the whole dimension comin’ down around us. That particular officer didn’t make it. He fizzled right out of existence, along with that entire dimension. We’ve never found it again in all of our searchin’. That’s why we can’t risk you meeting the Stanford in our dimension. Don’t feel like having our dimensional reality dissipated today.”

“That… that makes sense.” Stanford accepted the explanation, somewhat disappointed that he wouldn’t get to grill his alternate self. “I suppose this means I won’t be able to stay long in this dimension.”

“You’ll have to be on your way fairly soon, yes, but that don’t mean we can’t offer some hospitality or help you with what you’re fixin’ to do.” Fiddleford said kindly. “Our security staff said you mentioned needin’ a power source? Mind tellin’ me what for?”

“Well, since you took my blueprints along with my coat and personal belongings, I’m guessing this question is merely a formality for you.” Stanford guessed astutely.

“Indulge me anyhow. In your own words.” Fiddleford insisted, tapping his pen against his clipboard.

With a sigh, Stanford sat back in his chair and laced his cuffed hands together. “Very well. As you no doubt know from what you confiscated, I’m working on building a quantum destabiliser, a weapon that could be powerful enough to confront Bill head on. Protecting the multiverse from him is my priority, as unfortunately I haven’t been as successful as you have at stopping him in time. This would be my chance to venture directly into the Nightmare Realm and defeat him on his own turf, before he gets the opportunity to breach through to another dimension. If he gets a foothold on Earth in my dimension and has access to the portal there, I have no doubt he would spread his chaos further outwards, throughout the multiverse. There is a risk he could eventually spread his influence through to this dimension if he succeeds with conquering my own, and there is no doubt he would find this better world incredibly tempting to utterly destroy. A world where I lead a successful happy life is the last thing he wants. It would be in both of our interests to collaborate, finding a viable power source for my weapon, to stand against him.”

“So you’re sayin’ the Bill from your dimension would be fully empowered, and would have the ability to access different dimensions through your unguarded portal? That while he don’t have one now, if he broke through to your world he’d have physical form?” Fiddleford clarified.

“I’ve no doubt creating himself a physical form would be the first thing he would do when freed from the Nightmare Realm.” Stanford confirmed, trying not to dwell on wondering exactly what that physical form would be. The lights in the room hummed a little brighter for a moment once more, Fiddleford noticing the difference while Stanford stared stubbornly forward. “He would be able to reshape reality, not just my reality. Everyone’s.”

Chewing on the end of his pen for a moment, Fiddleford contemplated this before muttering. “Well, we don’t want that.”

“I was advised by a reputable source that I’d be able to find a suitable power supply here and looking at this institute I can see you aren’t lacking in scientific resources.”

“I reckon we probably have what you need.” Fiddleford confirmed finally, still looking rather pensive. “You’ll need to integrate it properly though, and that may mean some tweakin’ of your blaster’s design. How to manage having you in the institute while you work on it is the issue.”

“There’s a lower chance of any cross dimensional dissolution if you were to set me up in a room like this one while I work on the blaster. As much as I’d like a tour of your facilities here, that might be the safest option.” Stanford conceded, still secretly hoping he’d get a tour of the facilities anyway.

Fiddleford seemed to mull that over for a moment, before a rather mischievous look sprung across his features. “What the heck, let’s give you a tour anyway. It won’t hurt Stanford to be a shut in for a few hours, and it’s not like you don’t wanna know how the other side lives.”

Reaching across the table, Fiddleford unlocked Stanford’s cuffs, and pocketed the key with a grin. “Thank you.” Stanford said, rubbing his wrists, surprised.

“Now y’all can stay in there for a while, alright Stanford?” Fiddleford stood and turned around, addressing the two-way mirror. “Put your feet up. Force you to take a break for once in yer life.”

“Very funny F.” Came an identical voice to Stanford’s from over the intercom, and Stanford was delighted for a second by the confirmation that he really was existing in a reality where two of him existed simultaneously. “I’m docking your pay.”

“I’m gonna be writin’ you up to HR again.” Fiddleford taunted in return. “Besides, ain’t like a pay cut’s gonna make me less of a millionaire.”

“You’re a millionaire?” Stanford gawked at alternate Fiddleford, the gold cufflinks and tie pins painting a very different picture now that Ford had the context to take it all in with.

“Well, what do you think happens when you create an international institute that sources the most cuttin’-edge technology for development from all over the multiverse?” Fiddleford turned back to Stanford with an assured grin, the kind he almost didn’t expect to see on the Fiddleford he once knew. “While I’ll admit the main purpose for all ‘o this is the betterment of mankind, if we weren’t makin’ money out of it, yes we’d be a bunch of geniuses, but we wouldn’t be smart, that’s fer sure.”

Stanford nodded to himself, taking that in. He couldn’t help but cast another curious glance over to the mirrored wall as he was escorted out of the interrogation room, wondering if on the other side of that glass his alternate self was watching him too.

Staring at his own reflection looking back at him curiously, it wasn’t that hard to imagine.
Kryptos floated through the halls of the Quadrangle, his Bill-less workload having increased exponentially since the triangle came back with a bang, wanting his party plans back on track after a 30 year pin was put in them. Kryptos was mostly convinced that in pulling the pin out of Bill’s flawless dimensional invasion plans from 30 years ago it was like pulling the pin out of a grenade and this venture was just as likely to blow up in his face.

It wasn’t as if they had a lot of options at this point. Most of the investors had lost interest. Their backing and support had dwindled to a few key monsters and cronies, and given Bill’s reaction after his initial attempt to weasel the portal out of the mortals living on top of it recently, his efforts to regain the upper hand weren’t going as well as he insisted.

The frustrating thing for Kryptos was that once again, all of the interdimensional busywork was left to him, Bill refusing to take care of any of the nitty gritty details himself, instead choosing to focus on that trite human town he intended to invade.

Floating past the mirror room, Kryptos flinched as the wall lit up and the door opened. Pyronica strode out of the room, casting a brief look down at Kryptos before striding out into the hallway, her heels clacking on the brick floor.

Looking past her into the mirror room Kryptos could see Bill, surrounded by various mirrors, noting several of the cosmic energy cubes he kept in the safe turned into makeshift cocktail glasses, tiny umbrellas and lemon slices wedged into the top edges of the cube.

Taking a chance, Kryptos slid into the mirror room just before the door could close on him, floating over to Bill. He wasn’t answering Kryptos’ requests for a meeting to go over what he’d chased up for him so far, and he hardly seemed busy now.

“Bi- uh, boss?”

“What do you want, Kryptos? I’m busy,” came Bill’s default answer, the triangle not even turning around, sipping on cosmic energy through a straw and watching the lives of the residents of Gravity Falls play out on the screens around him.

“I uh, I wanted to check in with you about the party planning. See how things are going. Do we have an ETA yet? I still need a time and date to put on the invites, not to mention how restless the investors have been about signing up to the cause again without having clear cut expectations about when this whole Armageddon is happening. It’s been very difficult to manage.” Kryptos explained, although it came out more like a complaint.

“I’m working on it,” was Bill’s brusque reply, the triangle still resolutely ignoring the compass in favour of replaying an image of a crazy bearded hobo fishing a racoon out of a dumpster before smooching it senseless.

Kryptos waited for a more comprehensive answer to his question about an ETA but when all he received for his trouble was the sound of Bill’s straw rattling as he slurped more cosmic energy up and rewound the image of the racoon scratching the hobo’s face, laughing under his breath, Kryptos was unable to stifle his frustrations anymore.

He’d been biting his tongue ever since Bill came back to the nightmare realm, even after he got that tape off his mouth, knowing that a Bill in all his former glory was someone not to be questioned. The Bill who came back to the nightmare realm in a bursting cloud of eye bats was a being to be obeyed, a fearsome force of nature, but after having dealt with his investors, filled out his interdimensional paperwork and acted as his unpaid assistant for the past however many years, Kryptos was less inclined to mind his tongue and more inclined to speak his mind.

He felt, since he was really the one pulling this all together, that he had a say in this apocalypse.

“Say, Bill?”

Bill made a distracted noise in response, only half listening to Kryptos.

“Don’t you think it would be more… expedient – or efficient I guess, to not obsess over the same town like this forever and just… build another portal somewhere else?” Kryptos suggested and Bill stopped slurping on his energy cube, the silence a warning Kryptos was deafened to. “It would be much faster to just pick another planet on another dimension, send an engineer there with the blueprints and materials, and get them to build you a portal. Rather than wasting time with –”

“No.”

Kryptos paused, Bill cutting him off with a single word.

“No?”

“That town is mine.” Bill said, his tone that dangerous sort of calm that brokered no discussion, leading the compass to the conclusion Bill expected him to reach. The conclusion that it was smarter and safer to back down now. “Every single idiot being in that town belongs to me, from the ants to the aunties, every creature, every mountain, every tree, every insignificant speck of dirt in that backwater dump of a civilisation belongs to me, and do you know why, Kryptos?”

“No boss. Why?” Kryptos answered dutifully.

“Because the portal that I MADE - that was made FOR ME - is in the middle of that ugly monstrosity of a domicile in the heart of that sorry excuse for a community and I want it back. It’s not about what’s efficient or expedient or what you want. It’s MY PARTY, and it’s about what I WANT!” Bill’s form glitched out massive in an instant, the cosmic energy juice flowing through him, towering over Kryptos, teeth and hands gouging out up from his bricks, his form becoming 3 dimensional and just as unhinged as he was right now.

Fire raced out along the walls, blue flames lighting the terror on Kryptos’ face at this sudden intense reaction from the triangle. “And I want that place. I want my party to be there specifically, because there is no place I want to burn to the ground more than humble little GRAVITY FALLS, although where you’re standing right now comes in at a close second, do you understand Kryptos?”

“B-but Boss. You - you can’t kill me. We had a deal.” Kryptos stammered, Bill’s sudden promise of immolation feeling like a very immediate threat on Kryptos’ life.

“You know what, people break deals all the time.” Bill said flippantly, reaching a clawed hand down to flick Kryptos across the room, the compass falling back against the brick wall. “A twelve year old can break a deal. Any ingrate can break a deal.”

“You don’t break deals.” Kryptos insisted, clinging to that crumbling fact.

“I don’t follow rules either. And you can’t tell me what to do.” Bill rested his palms against the floor, the room rattling with the impact, as he pillowed two other arms against his bricks, watching Kryptos as a cat watches a mouse when it’s cornered. “You’ve forgotten your place in these past 30 years, Kryptos. I wouldn’t cling too tightly to that deal of ours if I were you. When I change reality, the only thing holding me accountable for a deal will be me.”

“Wh-what are you saying?” Kryptos stammered, pressed against the wall in fright, trying to get away from Bill’s looming intensity.

“I’m saying don’t get too comfortable. Things change after all.”

Bill reached out a clawed hand and as it came nearer and nearer to Kryptos the compass shrunk back more and more, quivering where he stood until Bill’s hand was right in front of him, razor sharp claw tip dangerously close to Kryptos’ eye. The compass was nearly hyperventilating, worried that each panicked breath he took might be his last.

Pausing for a second, enjoying Kryptos’ tangible fear, Bill chose to abruptly poke his finger forward.

“Boop!”

His claw tip hit the bricks of the wall behind Kryptos, opening the door to send the compass tumbling out into the hallway. Kryptos fell into the corridor, panting, and watched as Bill’s monstrous form abruptly compressed and he floated back over to the mirror screens, picking up his energy cube once more.

“Tell Pyronica to bring more of those tiny umbrellas next time. And some cocktail onions wouldn’t go amiss. Chop chop now, Kryptos, there are parties to plan.”

The brick wall closed up swiftly, the door essentially slammed in Kryptos’ face as Bill carried on his chaotic merry way, choosing once again to scrutinise that inconsequential town leaving Kryptos with the donkey work and, thankfully, his life.

For now.

“Mr McGucket.”

Stanford watched in awe as what must have been the fifth scientist at this institute nodded a respectful greeting to Fiddleford while eyeing him curiously, this alternate McGucket striding confidently through the halls of the facility, obviously well respected. They went out of their way to greet him with a cultish fervour.

Stanford was surprised that he wasn’t being bombarded with a swath of people questioning Stanford’s presence, existing as a tattier unkempt looking version of the head of this company. Instead they all seemed incredibly eager to greet F. Privately, Stanford wondered why Fiddleford was so respected and approachable to the institute’s workers, but they all gave Stanford Pines such a wide berth.

As if catching onto Ford’s train of thought, Fiddleford uttered a congenial aside to the interdimensional traveller. “They’re all mighty curious about you, but we’ve got a company policy for interdimensional travellers. You need a special clearance to disclose information to dimensional travellers so if you don’t have clearance it’s best not to say anything, for security purposes. You can tell they’re curious though, goin’ out of their way to say hello to me to get a glimpse of you. It ain’t even my birthday.”
Stanford chuckled at Alternate F’s quip, still marvelling at the institute and its extensive staff and grounds.

“That you have these policies in place – it’s incredible. How many years have you been operating the portal, to have formulated all of these procedures?” Stanford asked, looking into every passing window and room as Fiddleford set a brusque pace through the facility.

“About 30 years now, we had our silver anniversary five years ago, got to refurbish a lot of the institute. That’s why I’m taking you through all the shiny new departments now.” Fiddleford grinned. “It’s not every day a dimensional double of the institute’s boss stumbles into town. Gotta impress you somehow.”

“Believe me, I’m impressed.” Stanford assured Fiddleford, his eyes boggling at everything, from the uniforms of the workers, to the facilities in the various labs, to the staff kitchens and rec rooms. “This is like seeing 30 years worth of achieved potential in one convenient tour. I could never even allow myself to imagine achieving this.”

Fiddleford gave him a sympathetic look at that, the moment stretching on while something inscrutable passed behind Fiddleford’s eyes before he clapped Stanford on the shoulder.

“Well, now you don’t have to. Come on, I bet you’re itchin’ to see the portal. It’s this way.”

Leading Stanford through a series of elevators down to the lower levels of the institute, when Fiddleford cleared the various security checks for them and the double doors opened, Stanford stared, wide eyed at this dimension’s version of his downfall.

The portal stood at the far end of a cavernous hangar, Stanford’s basement refurbished with metal covering the dirt walls of the once simple room, wooden beams replaced by metal pylons, futuristic machinery humming and beeping around the room, the rudimentary safety line that Stanford fell prey to replaced by a plastic security room, separating the main part of the room from the portal entryway itself.

Behind the plasti-glass walls was Stanford’s portal, modernised and updated in some ways, the red mesh of Fiddleford’s laser fly-screen door protecting this dimension from the consequences awaiting in the multi-verse, and behind that, Stanford’s portal hummed its eloquent resonance, blue light beaming from within the portal as around the edges a rainbow of colour swirled, the triangular structure of the portal just the same as it had once been some 30 years ago.

Walking right up to the glass, Stanford pressed his six-fingered hands against the plastic and gazed in awe at the fully functioning portal humming away within the security room, ignoring the various personnel manning the machines, the curious scientists milling about, instead choosing to focus on all that could have been.

“It’s beautiful.” Stanford intoned mournfully.

“It sure is.” Fiddleford stepped beside Stanford, regarding the portal with a less complicated fondness than Stanford’s. “Took a lot of work to make it happen, considerin’ it was just me and you gettin’ it off the ground. Well, not you, my dimension’s Stanford Pines. But it really was worth all the effort. Now it’s the central point of progress on Earth, the lynchpin of the most cutting-edge technology humankind can access. It’s the place to be.”

Hearing that, for a brief moment Stanford’s view of the portal was overlaid by a similar view he once had so many years ago, of the same portal, scaffolding holding the structure up, and of the person sitting in the middle of the eye.
“Oh, it’s the place to be, Sixer.”

“You kept the Behenian fixed stars.” Stanford noted of the updated design, his voice as far away as his thoughts were.

“We figured they were important. Turns out they were coordinates. Of course, we inputted the coordinates into our records as well, but kept the symbols for décor since they look so fancy. We still haven’t explored every one of them, the doors that these coordinates lead to. Still, there’s nothin’ more exciting than untapped potential.”

“I know you like to explore.”

“That’s true.” Stanford sighed and took his hand off the glass, finding it almost too painful to look at the portal with all the conflicting images jarring his closed mind.

“We like to call it our very own wonder of the world.” Fiddleford continued to boast, having hardly taken his eyes off the portal since they entered, obviously proud of his creation.

“Yes.” Stanford agreed, wistfulness creeping into his tone, competing with the bitterness there. “It really is a treasure of the universe.”

Looking away from the portal then, choosing instead to examine the rest of the room as it was far less painful, Stanford missed the way the portal seemed to beam a little brighter at his words of praise, also missing the slight frown that crossed Fiddleford’s face at that, exchanging a glance with the scientists manning the computer stations.

“If it was just you and the Stanford from this dimension, I imagine you managed to convince me to hire labourers after all.” Stanford remarked, trying to pick up a regular conversation and discard his melancholic thoughts. “It wouldn’t be feasible for just the two of us to assemble the structure on our own.”

“Well, I wanted to hire labourers.” Fiddleford answered, shaking off his own distraction. “But you were so against it. Didn’t want to let other scientists in on our work until it was done. Vultures, you called em.”

Stanford inclined his head sheepishly, conceding that it was highly likely his alternate self would have done just that.

“Turns out you’re so stubborn you found a way to put the pieces together on your own. Some kinda magic amulet you found in your research.” Fiddleford explained.

“Hmm, I hadn’t considered the practical applications of –” Stanford rubbed his chin before looking over to F and cracking a smile. “Magic amulet? That sounds rather unscientific, doesn’t it?”

“Well you tried callin’ it Geniuses Little Helper, but there weren’t no way in hell I was callin’ that freaky little tie-pin such an awful goshdarned name. I said you oughta be ashamed of yourself.”

Stanford laughed loudly at that, his amused smile and unhindered laughter drawing the attention of nearly every scientist in the room who all watched Ford with awe, Fiddleford grinning fondly beside him.

“It’s been a while since I’ve seen you laughin’ like that.” Fiddleford remarked. “Maybe the years in the multiverse ain’t done you such a wrong after all.”

“You say that now, but you’ve never been so hungry you’ve been reduced to eating rocks, have you?” Stanford quipped, enjoying the way alternate Fiddleford’s eyebrows raised. “Or your own shoes.”

“Alright, well we got none of those here.” Fiddleford wagged his finger at Ford, and then placed a hand on his shoulder, leading him out of the portal room. “But I’m sure we can fix you up with some real food and some clothes and a shower if you’re up for it. What do you say?”

“I’d say that’s the nicest way someone’s told me ‘you stink’ in the past 30 years.” Stanford said with a wry grin.

“Well, don’t let me sugarcoat it now. Come on.”

As Fiddleford led Stanford out of the portal room with a friendly arm slung around his shoulder, the security cameras in the portal room whirred, zooming in on the two retreating figures.

Several rooms away, a man fingered a glowing blue brooch and followed the interactions of the two men on the monitors with narrowed eyes.

Chapter End Notes

My lovely beta reader advised I split the chapter in half, because it was becoming a behemoth and ‘if a chapter is as long as a small book it should be chopped in half at least’ and because I can occasionally take good advice lmao I did just that. Next chapter is sock opera! Sorry for the switcheroo.
This week’s Abba lyric is from Me and I and this chapter's dedication is for baronohm who just caught up with the fic and I have been loving your comments! I'm really glad you've been enjoying it and you didn't have to wait very long at all for a new chapter hahaha. To everyone who has been waiting, thank you, this is also dedicated to you! As always I am keen to hear what you think of this chapter! Pls tell me if you cried in Zippy’s scene bc I bawled my eyes out every time I read over it haha.
Next chapter we ponder the theatre, water towers, humanity and all that could have been, not to mention some funky lil fight scenes. I'm pumped! Stay hype!

Works inspired by this one: Chaos of the Spheres ▲ [fanarts] by Thelema_Rhoias

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!