The Unexpected Journey

by joschroefanfic

Summary

The Unexpected Journey is the story of a young woman who sets out on a mission and finds a surprising, royal, detour. I began writing this story on Tumblr several years ago and followed a suggestion to post it here. It's a tad fluffy, a dash dramatic, but a lot of fun.

One small Author's Note: Because I am not sure I can write about another country with authority without knowing more about it, I am creating a country-for storytelling purposes. It is in Southern Africa. It has a rich cultural history with proud, wonderful people but it has also been host to poverty and famine and more recent outbursts of violence and trauma. The country will be known as Bendal and has absolutely NOT been modeled after any one particular country. I hope you will allow me these small creativities.
Chapter 1

From the very moment she had stepped foot on the dry, honey colored ground of Bendal, she had known the importance of this experience. She had specifically sought out Doctors Without Borders. She had worked meticulously on her application, she had gone through a series of interviews, signed the contracts, received the vaccinations; all with the knowledge that this journey would be one of the most impactful of her life. And she was ready for that.

She needed that.

She had wanted to leave, to escape all that had happened at home; wanted to be as far away from her life as she could possibly be. And this, this warm, rural countryside of Bendal was exactly that. Though, when Madeline "Maddie" Forrester had taken this position, less than a year after finishing her PhD in Child Psychology, she had never imagined the unexpected road this journey would take her down; or who would be on that road by her side.

Ten months into her year-long contract, Maddie had become a part of the community. Though her blonde hair, pale skin, and "American accent" had initially caused her to be the center of discussion and a fair amount of curiosity among the children, her unassuming position and sweet personality had won over the community leaders she worked with and the children she served. They had accepted her as one of theirs and she felt more at home with them than she had in her own home just before she had left the states.

Later in life when she would remember that morning, she would remember that it had been unseasonably warm. She woke to find the heat already invading the small flat she shared with Ella, a nurse out of the Ireland office. Ella had grown up in Dublin and had wanted to see the world. She was bubbly and bright and an instant friend to Maddie. This particular morning was the start of a big day in the community. Despite the recently growing violence among two long-feuding tribal sects, leaders in the small, rural area were coming together to open what Maddie would call a Food Bank; a Co-op of sorts where people could come together and trade, barter or exchange services for goods. Though it was a local initiative, it had backing from big names across the country and through outside charitable organizations. Just the night before Maddie had listened loosely as Ella had, for the fifth time that week, listed off a multitude of famous names involved with such groups. Though Maddie had very little interest in such things, she would smile and nod—because Ella loved it and she loved Ella.

Maddie was excited for the Food Bank. It was something that brought purpose to the community; a sense of identity and unity. Many of the children she worked with were working to prepare for the Grand Opening that afternoon and the confidence she saw in them as they worked was priceless. Pulling on a loose pair of Bermuda shorts, a t-shirt, sunglasses and sturdy sandals, she tied her hair back in a curly mess of a ponytail and set out for the building that would house the food bank. There was still much work to be done.

When she arrived, she was pointed to a truck loaded with boxes that needed to be moved from the truck to the building. Hopping up onto the trailer of the truck, she went straight to work. About midway through, she heard a voice call up to her from over the side of the trailer. She smiled down at a man; late twenties, tall; dressed casually with a ball cap on to shield his eyes. He must be new; she thought. Maybe he was with the Peace Corps or here on a Gap Year excursion. Taking a moment to pause from her work, she leaned against the side of the truck and called down to him.

"You look a little lost." She watched as he looked around for a second before turning his head up to see her.
"I suppose that I am," he grinned. "Do you think you might be able to point me in the right direction?"

"Well, if you're here to help, I have a whole truck full of boxes that need to be moved inside." She gestured behind her. "Think you can handle some heavy lifting?" There was a moment, a tiny brief moment where he seemed slightly startled; confused. But he recovered quickly and nodded.

"I believe that I can."

"Fantastic! Now...get up here."

"Yes ma'am."

"Wait, I'm sorry, I didn't get your name." She shielded her eyes with her hand as she looked down at him.

"I'm Harry," he smiled, reaching his hand up towards where she stood on the back of the trailer.

"Nice to meet you Harry. I'm Maddie," she returned his smile and his outstretched hand.

"It's a pleasure, Maddie." His handshake was warm and firm and put her at ease.

Seeing the light freckling across his nose and the wisps of red hair sticking out from under his cap, she hoped he had been generous with the sunblock. So many of the newbies had suffered from a scorching sunburn. It was almost a rite of passage. "Now...how about you stop standing around and help me unload this food?"

"Absolutely," he grinned; instantly falling victim to the elation he felt when he encountered somebody who had absolutely no idea who he was. He glanced around with slight paranoia for a sign of the group of people that usually followed where he went. Finding that they had been successfully distracted, he lifted himself up onto the truck and, with a sigh of relief, did as he was told.

They were about half way through the boxes when they fell into step with each other. Finding the silence to be slightly disconcerting, she went for small talk.

"So..." Maddie smiled at him as they moved past each other. "Where are you from?"

"Um..." He lifted a box into his arms. "I'm from England. You?"

"The United States."

"How long have you been here?" He asked as he followed her to where they were stacking the boxes inside.

"Ten months," she smiled; surprised at how fast the time had passed. "You?"

"I arrived today."

"I guessed as much." He grinned at the way she smiled at him; couldn't help it. "Well, welcome to Bendal."

"Thank you," he nodded, returning to the truck. "I appreciate that."
"Of course," she stepped aside so that he could walk past her with another arm full. Out of the corner of her eye, she saw Ella moving quickly in her direction. Deciding it might be time for a quick break, Maddie hopped off the truck and met her friend.

"Ella love, how are you?" She smiled sweetly, but Ella shook her head and reached for her friend's arm. "What is going on?"

"What are you doing?!" Ella's voice was hushed as she pulled Maddie to the side. But something about the tone made Maddie feel like she was being yelled at.

"I'm...I'm unloading the truck," she glanced back towards the trailer in confusion.

"No!" Ella's teeth clenched; her eyes growing pointed. "What...are...you...doing?" The long pauses between her words were meant to drive home her point.

"I am unloading...the...truck..." Maddie mimicked the pauses, but Ella was not amused.

"Do you have any idea who that is?" Though Ella's eyes didn't move in the slightest, Maddie knew exactly who she was talking about.

"As a matter of fact, I do. His name is Harry. He arrived today. He was standing around looking lost, so I put him to work. It's not a..."

"You put him to work?!!"

"Yes of course. He said he was here for the opening and asked for direction and..."

"Ohmygod," Ella's words ran together as she whispered frantically to her friend. "He's coming over. He's coming...Oh God. Do I look okay?"

"You look fine," Maddie snickered. "What is wrong with..." Her words trailed off as he joined them. Maddie could feel Ella's fingers digging into her arm and she desperately wanted to pull her friend aside and splash some cold water in her face. Maybe the heat was going to her brain. She smiled up at him apologetically. "Harry, this is my friend, Ella. Ella, this is Harry." And as she turned towards her friend, she prayed that she had pulled it together. And she had; mostly.

"Ella," Harry's eyes were dazzling as he extended a hand. Ella managed to take a breath before she held out her hand and uttered the words that would bring Maddie's world to a halt.

"Your Royal Highness."

And in the split second that followed, three things happened all at once. Ella—well versed on the ways of the Monarchy—dipped into the slightest of curtsies. Harry—realizing he was no longer incognito—hid his disappointment with a well-trained smile that had been the result of a lifetime of publicity. And Maddie—Maddie who was normally witty, intelligent, at the top of her game—felt absolutely thrown.

"I'm sorry," her headed moved quickly as she looked from Ella to Harry and back again; the confusion causing her to feel slightly off balance. "Did you just say..."

Her brain kicked into overdrive just as her words seemed to fail her. Looking back at Harry, she finally saw it. The red hair, the light freckles, the deep blue eyes and the million-dollar smile. It was surreal. She had never, in her wildest dreams, expected to see him here. "I'm sorry. You..." She shook her head in disbelief. "Are you Prince..."

"Harry," he finished for her. This he was used to; people discovering who he was. "Yes."
"THE Prince Harry?"

"One and the same."

"Of course," Maddie could feel the flush of embarrassment warm her cheeks. "Well I feel incredibly foolish."

"Please don't," he reached a hand out to her; hating the discomfort that went along with moments such as these.

"I just ordered the Crown Prince of England to unload a truck full of food." She was having a hard time believing it, even as she spoke the words out loud.

"Yes," Ella whispered with narrowed eyes. "Yes. You. Did."

"No," Harry shook his head. "You didn't order me to do anything. I asked, you answered and..." He sighed and rolled his eyes. "And I'm not a Crown Prince. We don't really..."

"Oh God..." Maddie groaned; her hands moving to her stomach.

She hated this feeling. She was educated, well-read and, by most accounts, had an understanding and appreciation for the world outside of the country she had grown up in. Yet here she was, so daft that she hadn't recognized one of the most recognizable faces in the world. It was just short of humiliating. And he was being so nice about it; it almost made it worse. Taking a deep breath, she forced her nerves to calm down. Turning to him with pleading eyes, she smiled. "I have to apologize."

"No, you don't." He was quick with the protest.

"But I insist."

"As do I." His voice lowered and he leaned closer to her. "Please. There is no need for you to apologize. I should have told you but I...I actually prefer it when people don't recognize me and...and I was happy to help with the truck."

"But, I..." Maddie began again. But before she had a chance to explain, she was interrupted by a small group of men with urgency in their step and relief in their voices.

"Sir!" One of them looked Harry over and let out a breath. "We've been looking for..."

"It's quite alright," Harry assured them all with a smile. "I was just speaking with Maddie and Ella." He nodded to the two of them and Maddie could have sworn she heard Ella squeal just a tiny bit.

"Hello," the gentleman nodded at the two of them and turned his attention quickly to Harry. "Sir, they are ready for your briefing now. We really should be going."

"Of course," he nodded. "Ella, it was lovely to meet you. And Maddie," he turned his eyes on hers, hoping she would see that he was being genuine. "It was truly a pleasure working with you this afternoon. Thank you." And with a blink of an eye, he was escorted away from them; taking all of Maddie's humility with her as he left.

"Oh my God..." Ella muttered as her friend let out a breath; finding no better words to describe the moment. Prince Harry of Wales had stepped into their day, unloaded box after box, and then—with grace and aplomb—he had stepped out; leaving behind an elated Ella and a shaken Maddie in his wake.
Chapter 2

As the morning gave way to the afternoon, the preparations gave way to the event. Though Ella would not be able to attend—as she was working that night at the makeshift Emergency Room housed in their main facilities, Maddie would be going to support the project and the efforts of many of their friends and coworkers. Ella was sure to school Maddie on royal etiquette, should she happen to run into the Prince again. While Maddie assured her she would do all she could to avoid him altogether, Ella insisted and Maddie caved.

Armed with her crash course in behavior, Maddie arrived at the site just in time to see Khenda and Collins take the stage and begin the small ceremony they had planned. Khenda was the Site Director and, for all intents and purposes, Maddie's direct supervisor. She was a native of Bendal; having moved to France at a young age. After attending University, she had traveled around the world and had been with Doctors Without Borders for over ten years. Bendal had once again become her home. She lived with her long term partner Collins. He was a tall, muscular bald man who spoke several languages and loved Khenda unlike anything Maddie had ever been witness too. They were wonderful people to be around and they had a deep appreciation and knowledge of local customs and culture. Maddie smiled as Khenda invited the Prince to the stage to cut the ribbon and just like that, the party was underway.

Waiting for the swarms of people to enter, she spoke to a few coworkers, said hello to a few of the children she worked with, and eventually made her way inside. She was standing close to an anesthesiologist she had met from Spain, sipping on a cold drink when Khenda flew into her line of vision.

"Maddie, come with me," Khenda commanded; holding tight to her arm as she led her through the crowd. "There is somebody I want you to meet." She knew exactly where this was headed; the surprise guest that had everyone chattering. Yes, she knew exactly where this was headed. She opened her mouth to protest; to tell her friend and mentor that she had already met him—already humiliated herself enough for one day, thank you very much. But it was too late. Before she could even mutter a polite no, Khenda was tapping his shoulder. He turned towards them; his face brightening immediately.

"Khenda!" He leaned in to place a kiss to her cheek, his eyes sweeping to meet Maddie's for a second.

"Your Royal Highness," Khenda responded with a jocular familiarity; having known him for many years. "I would like you to meet my good friend and colleague, Dr. Forrester." She smiled affectionately at Maddie. "And this is Prince Harry the founding patron of Sentebale. I was just telling him what an asset you have been to the community."

"Oh wow, thank you," Maddie blushed at the compliment.

"I'm sorry," Khenda interrupted apologetically. Her eyes were focused on something across the room. "I see that my attention is needed elsewhere. Please, excuse me," she looked to Harry who smiled warmly.

"Of course," Harry nodded and waved her off. "We'll be fine without you." And, as she hurried away, he turned a wide smile to Maddie. "So, we meet again." And she couldn't help the smirk that played at her lips. Her initial anxiety about the mornings' meeting had faded and she found herself much more relaxed this time around.

"Your highness," a twinkle of playfulness shone in her eyes as she looked up at him this time.
"You'll forgive my American ignorance; am I supposed to curtsey to you each time I meet you or just the first?"

"Ha," he masked his grin by taking a sip from his drink. "Well, it's all a matter of your own comfort level. You are, in fact, not required to bow or curtsey at all, Doctor." His lips twitched at the new bit of knowledge he now had about the woman who stood before him. "It seems like I'm not the only one who kept their title a secret, no?"

"It's not quite the same thing," she protested; enjoying the liveliness persona he exuded.

"Oh I think it is." He nodded. "So, Doctor..."

"It's Maddie," she waved her hand; instantly realizing that interrupting a Prince was probably high on the list of Ella's 'Do Not' list. "I'm sorry. But, if you don't mind, please call me Maddie, Sir."

"Sir?!" He laughed. "It's Harry," he pointed at his chest. "Remember? I'm just Harry."

"I'm not sure it's appropriate for me to call you that. My friend Ella would just..."

"It is," he interrupted her. "I assure you."

"Fine. Harry it is."

"Thank you."

"Harry," her voice was low; growing serious in the moment. "I really must apologize."

"I thought we had settled this already."

"Yes, well..."

"No," he shook his head again; his voice more forceful. "Do you have any idea how refreshing it is to meet people who do not know who I am? People who treat me like...like a new arrival in Bendal who simply needs to help unload a truck?"

"No. I guess I don't."

"No, you don't. Now please, please stop apologizing. I enjoyed my time with you this afternoon and you apologizing for it is..."

"Getting old?" She offered with a laugh.

"Yes."

"Fine. I cede your point. I will refrain from apologizing for the rest of the evening."

"Thank God," he sighed; a relaxed smile lighting up his face again.

"But you have to know, I am not normally daft and uninformed."

"I never imagined that you were." And in the beat that their eyes met, her breath hitched in her lungs. "And for the record, not knowing who I am—in no way indicates a person's level of intellect."

"Point taken," she smiled and softened. "But truly, that must not happen to you very often."

"It doesn't," he shook his head. "But it's really nice when it does."
"So strange," her eyes squinted slightly as she watched him nod hellos to people as they passed.

"Did you just call a Prince strange? To his face?" He smirked and, because she didn't know what else to do, she nodded. "Well okay then." A moment of comfortable silence settled between them and Maddie was unsure of what to do next. Was it impolite to occupy his time when he should clearly be talking to people much more important than she? Was it impolite to excuse herself and leave a Prince standing alone? Before she could formulate an answer, Khenda was returning. She smiled first at Harry and then turned expectant eyes to Maddie. She knew that look well, she was about to ask a favor.

"Madeline," her voice was warm. "I hate to impose upon you, but do you think that you might be able to help me out with something?"

"Absolutely," Maddie nodded. "Don't worry about it. What can I do?" She looked across the room, wondering what it was she was being sent off to handle.

"I promised Harry a tour of the new facility we're working out of across camp and I am being pulled into something here that needs my attention." She glanced behind her and smiled to Harry. "Would it be okay if Doctor Forrester accompanied you on the tour I promised?"

"I think that it would," Harry nodded and tuned to Maddie. "If that is alright with you Doctor?"

She could see the smirk tugging at his upper lip.

"Of course," Maddie nodded, forcing her eyes wide and innocent. "It would be a pleasure, your highness."

"Thank you," Khenda, oblivious to the back and forth that was occurring, leaned to kiss them both. "There is a car waiting outside to take you both over, with your security team—of course."

"Thank you Khenda," Harry nodded and, stepping aside, he gestured for Maddie to lead the way. "After you." As Maddie lead the Prince from the room towards the awaiting car, she could almost hear Ella chastising her for walking before the Prince. Shaking her friend from her mind, Maddie smiled and stepped into the car.

As she ushered him through the new facility, pointing out various features, she was more purposeful in her pacing. She was more aware of the conflict inside her. Though she knew there were protocols, ways to be around royalty, she knew none of them. And it certainly didn't help that he made her feel so at ease that she forgot who he was and was most likely committing what Ella would deem as high crimes. His security team kept a respectable distance as they made their way through the complex.

"So," he leaned closer to her. "You're a doctor."

"A PhD," she corrected him with a smile. "Not an MD."

"Are you here with the Peace Corps?"

"No," she grinned as she recalled the two years she spent in the Dominican Republic through the Peace Corps a few years ago.

"Do you work for the State Department?"

"No," she shook her head. "Though maybe someday I will."

"Well..." He held his hands out in surrender. "I give up. What do you do?"
"I am a licensed Psychologist; a therapist."

"A therapist?" He raised his eyebrows. "I cannot imagine that is a profitable business here."

"I'm not here for the money."

"Then why are you here?" And he couldn't help but notice the way she instantly tensed at the question. There was a palpable moment of anxiety between them; one that she broke with a radiant smile that only served to lower his own defenses.

"I am here through Doctors Without Borders," she explained with a casual shrug. He could tell there was more to her reasoning that what she was providing, but he wasn't one to push. "I am a Child Psychologist and..."

"You work with..." He interrupted and then caught himself. "I'm sorry that was terribly rude of me." She smiled and shook her head; dismissing it. "You work with the kids?"

"I do," she nodded, her smile growing warm as she thought of them. "My specialty is in childhood trauma." She watched as his eyes grew darker and they shared a moment of silence for the trauma and violence they both knew was all too prevalent among the youth of the population they were both serving in very different ways. "So I spend a lot of time with the children in the area."

"That must be..." He trailed off, needing to clear his throat of the lump that grew there.

"It is," she agreed. "How about you?"

"Me?"

"What brings you here?"

"I have an organization; a charity which I oversee."

"So I've heard," she smiled as she thought of Ella; who would most assuredly fall over if she saw her now. "But certainly you can oversee such a thing from London. What brought you all the way down here? For the opening of what is essentially a Food Bank?" He paused for only a moment before answering.

"I love it here," his voice was soft; low—honest. "Since the first time I visited, I have loved it here. It's wide and open and the people are so...welcoming. It's such a warm culture; such happy people—even when they have circumstances that, by most standards, should make them unhappy, they seem so..."

"Content?" Maddie offered. The corner of his mouth turned up in a half smile.

"Yes," he took a deep breath. "And I owe Khenda multiple favors." They both laughed at that. "Of course there is the added benefit that the majority of the people here have absolutely no idea who I am."

"Ah yes," her cheeks flushed light pink. "The anonymity you seek—even at the cost of deception."

"The anonymity which you take for granted."

"I suppose," she agreed.

"You like it here," he observed.
"I love it here," she corrected.

"How long have you been here?"

"Ten months," her eyes stared off into the distance as she thought over the last ten months of her life. "Ten of twelve."

"You leave in two months?"

"I can stay longer," she smiled. "My original contract is up in two months. But, if I want, I can stay longer."

"You're thinking about it," he commented, watching the way her eyes danced as she spoke.

"I really am." She looked down at her hands, clasped together in front of her. "My mother would love for me to come home. She doesn't think it's safe here. She worries."

"Of course," Harry nodded. "And your father? What does he think?" And suddenly, Maddie's feet simply stopped moving. Harry slowed to a stop next to her. "I'm sorry did I say something wrong?" He was confused by the look on her face.

"No," she shook her head, her eyes welling with tears she was fighting to halt. She sniffed and smiled clumsily. "My father is... He died; about six months before I came here. He had been battling Cancer for years and right after I finished my doctorate, he...lost."

"Oh, Maddie, I..." Harry swallowed at the lump in his throat, his hand reaching out to touch her shoulder. "I am so sorry. I..." He took a step closer and allowed for a moment of silence before he spoke again. "I lost a parent too and..." He blew a breath out through his lips; of course she knew that. Everyone knew that. "I know it's not enough but...I am truly very sorry to hear that."

"Thank you," she nodded and, taking two slow deep breaths, she recovered and let her eyes rise to meet his and it hit her again; this strange sort of flutter that must have been a part of who he was, the way he smiled sweetly at her. "And I'm sorry for your loss. Though it's never..."

"I know...and thank you," he smiled and rubbed her shoulder with his hand that had not moved since they had stopped. Maddie shifted her weight and looked away, not sure how to proceed in this moment; the connection that she felt with him made her slightly uneasy. Sensing this, he cleared his throat and removed his hand from her. "Do you like candy?"

"What?" She laughed at the question.

"Humor me," he grinned. "Do you like candy?"

"Yes. Why?"

"Tell me...out of all the candy in the world, what is your favorite?"

"Ooooh...." Her smile widened and they began walking again. "That's difficult."

"Give it a moment."

"Hmmm. Oh!" Her eyes lit up. "There were these peppermints that my grandmother used to have around Christmas time. They were red and white with these little Christmas trees in them. They were soft you know...not the hard peppermints..." She smiled wide. "I used to eat so many they would make me sick and they would stick in my teeth and..." Her eyes caught the smile on his face and she grew quiet; impressed with how he had moved her from such a sad story to such a happy memory with the simplest of questions. "Nicely done." He opened his mouth then, ready to ask her more but just as he did, the gentleman from earlier that day whose job must have been to keep him on schedule, stepped up to them.

"Sir," he seemed apologetic as he looked from Harry to Maddie and back again. "If we're going to get you to the plane on time..."

"We have to leave," Harry finished his sentence with regret in his voice.

"Yes sir," the man nodded and turned to Maddie. "There is a car here to take you back to the party as well." He gestured towards the two awaiting vehicles.

"Thank you," she nodded with a smile and the man stepped away. "Well, your highness," he snickered at her choice of words. "It was very nice meeting you today."

"As it was you," he bit his lower lip slightly as he smiled down at her. "Thank you for the tour...and the conversation."

"And the anonymity?"

"Definitely that," he grinned; feeling the inexplicable desire to stall—wanting to stay longer, continue the conversation, the tour...talking to her. But, surrendering to duty and itinerary, he held his hand out to shake hers. "It was lovely meeting you Maddie. Best of luck to you here."

"Thank you," she whispered, her voice having faltered at his touch. With the tiniest of squeezes, he let her hand drop from his and nodded towards the car awaiting her. She nodded again and took a step towards the open door.

"Maddie?" He called out. She turned towards him as he moved to her side. "I just wanted to..." He took a deep breath. "It gets easier." The sadness in his eyes told her exactly to what he was referring; her father. "After a few holidays pass without them...it gets a little easier." Swallowing the lump in her throat, she nodded and blinked. He mimicked her expression and then, in a softer voice, "goodnight."

"Goodnight," she watched as he turned towards his car and, with one last sigh, she slipped into the backseat and let the door close behind her. And for the second time that day the Prince was swooshed away, leaving Maddie confused, elated and more than a little surprised at how the day had turned out.
Chapter 3

Two and a half weeks had passed since the opening of the food bank and Maddie's routine had returned to normal. She was back in her office seeing clients; some adults but mostly children. There were a few times a month when she was called out to a remote location—when there was an instance of localized violence. But things had been mostly in her office. She was finishing up some notes from her last session when Ella arrived. Knocking as she flew through the door, she bounced into the room; full of energy and spirit.

"Hello Ella," Maddie smiled up from her notebook.

"You are never going to believe what I heard at work last night," the smile on Ella's face was wider than Maddie had ever seen.

"Um...Stevenson is finally getting a haircut?"

"No," she shook her head, slipping into the chair across from Maddie's desk. "It is way, way, WAY better than that."

"Oh really?" Maddie tossed her notebook to her desk and shifted her attention to her friend. "Tell me." Ella paused for dramatic effect.

"He's coming back."

"Who is coming back?"

"You know who."

"I really don't," Maddie shook her head with a laugh. "Wait. Is this a character from one of your shows, because, if it is, that is not you know...actual news."

"Hey!" She feigned offense for only a moment before folding her hands in her lap and smirking. "But no."

"Well then..."

"The Prince."

"The..." Maddie felt her heart jump in her chest. "You mean Harry?"

"What did I tell you about calling him that?"

"He told me to call him that!" Maddie rolled her eyes. "And is that who you're talking about when you say..."

"Yes!" Ella threw her hands up in the air. "Yes. Prince Harry of Wales. Returning to Bendal. In one week."

"Wow..." Maddie smiled as she recalled the conversations she had shared with him less than a month ago.

"Yes, wow!" Ella nodded emphatically. "And why do you suppose that is?"

"I have no idea," Maddie shook her head, her mind working overtime; excited that he would be coming back and embarrassed to admit her excitement at such a thing.

"No idea at all?" Ella's head tipped to the side as she studied her friend.

"Nothing," Maddie looked up, catching Ella's pointed gaze. "What? You think this is somehow related to me?"

"Maybe," she shrugged.

"Ella please!" Her eyes grew wide at the absurdity. "I spoke to him for what...an hour?"

"You gave him a tour."

"And how many tours do you think a guy like that goes on in a week Ella?"

"I don't know Madeline," she sighed. "But how many of those tour guides order him to unload a truck load of food?"

"Ella," Maddie's voice dropped in warning. "He doesn't remember me. I promise you. I...I would bet on it."

"How much?" Ella leaned forward.

"He has a foundation! That is housed here! He knows Khenda and Collins! He said he owes her many favors! There is no way..."

"How much?" She seemed un-deterred by Maddie's points.

"What do you want?"

"Fifty dollars—American dollars—says The Prince remembers you."

"Without your interference," Maddie pointed at her friend.

"All on his own," Ella agreed, holding her hand out to seal the deal.

"You're on," Maddie met her friend's hand and shook it. "Start saving."

"Please. You have no idea what you're talking about."

"We'll see," Maddie shrugged. "One week."

"One week."

As the week passed by, the plans for his visit became the center of attention throughout the community. This time, his arrival was not going to be a surprise. Khenda had meeting after meeting; putting together a host of events for the five days he was going to be in Bendal. He would be meeting with dignitaries, attending lunches with community elders, entertained by student groups and local dance houses. As Khenda was still responsible for the functionalities of the camp and all who worked there, Collins was her right-hand man in all aspects of the word; taking meetings on everything from who would sit where and what sort of food they would be serving. The official word was that the Prince wanted to draw attention back to the region; showcasing the work that was being done and moving to the front of the discussion the work that was still needed. Though Maddie accepted that answer without blinking, Ella refused. She had been in the area for almost two years and she had seen the Prince twice and one of those times had been three weeks ago. She held her ground. And Maddie held hers.
When his arrival date approached, many of Maddie's colleagues were traveling together to greet him; some even making signs and bringing flowers. A group of children she worked with on a regular basis were going to wave at him. And, though she tried to underplay her own excitement, Maddie had to admit; the Prince's return was a big deal; a great moment for the community. So, she smiled as the kids talked about it and nodded as they made their plans. But when the day arrived, she stayed in the office. She had a few standing appointments that would not be making the trip to meet the plane and her expertise was definitely needed more in the office than at the airport.

Hours after he had arrived, the throngs of people began returning to camp, finding their way back to offices and classrooms; staffing their posts. As Maddie returned to her office from slipping out for a drink, she smiled a hello to the young woman who staffed the main reception desk before stepping past her to her office. And when she saw what was there, or who, her drink nearly tumbled from her hands.

"Good Afternoon Maddie," his voice stunned her as her face snapped towards the sound.

"Oh my God!" She exclaimed scattering to catch the glass bottle before it crashed everywhere.

"You know," his smile was teasing as he moved quickly to her side and reached a hand out to help steady her. "You really shouldn't leave your office door open like that. There's no telling who might wander in." Smiling her thanks for his stable arm, she regained her composure and smiled.

"That is an excellent tip, your highness," his lips pulled up in a smirk. "Who knew that they just allowed the Crown Prince to roam about freely."

"Oh-ho!" He laughed out loud; clapping his hands together. There was something about her spunk that kept him hanging. "You do know that I am not actually a..."

"I do," she nodded, her initial shock wearing off and giving way to the warm happy feeling that was washing over her as she spoke. "But the look on your face when I say it is hilarious."

"Hilarious?" His face twisted up.

"Cute?" She offered.

"Cute?" His face softened and she blushed.

"I'm sorry," she took a breath. "I have to admit, I am incredibly surprised to find you here; alone even." She looked around for the group that usually accompanied him.

"I'm not alone," he glanced at his watch. "I have a meeting down the hall in about two minutes. When Khenda told me that your office was so close, I had to stop by and say hello."

"Well," Maddie tried to quiet her pounding heart. "That was very sweet of you."

"Yes well," he moved towards the door then, turning to smile at her. "I'm not sure if you heard, but I'll be in town for five days."

"I did hear something along those lines."

"Okay," he stalled in her doorway. "Maybe I'll see you again?"

"Maybe," she nodded, her eyes dropping from his in nervousness.

"Oh!" He exclaimed. "I almost forgot. I brought you something."
"You..." She watched as he moved across her office towards the bookshelves he had been standing near when she had entered. "I'm sorry, you brought me something?"

"Yes. I thought you might enjoy these," and when he turned to face her, in his hands was a bag full of the chewy peppermint candies she had remembered eating with her grandmother as a child. Her throat grew tight and her eyes grew slightly teary as they traveled from the bag in his hands to his face where he had the most wonderful expression.

"I..." She breathed. "I don't know what to say."

"Thank you is usually customary," he ribbed her playfully as he sat the bag onto her desk and looked at his watch before heading back towards the door. Maddie watched in stunned silence as he moved past her.

"Harry," she called out. He turned to face her, seemingly nervous. Her eyes met his as her hand moved sub-consciously to rest over her heart. "Thank you."

"You're welcome," and with one final smile, he stepped from the room; late for his meeting.

Maddie moved to her desk; her legs slower than she remembered and, as she sunk into her chair, her eyes stayed focused on the bag of peppermints. Her mind spiraled around her; sorting through what had just happened and the many reasons why it just happened and the only thing that she knew for sure?

She owed Ella fifty American dollars.
Before Maddie had the chance to enjoy a piece of the candy Harry had presented her with, she was pulled from her office and off to work with a patient who had just come into the Emergency Room. And from that point on, her day was bustling. She met with child after child until, finally, that evening she had a chance to pause. She caught up on her notes and moved around; tidying up her office, putting things away and preparing for the next day. As she slid some books back onto her shelf, she heard a knock on the door and turned towards it; sleepiness evident on her face. Though she brightened instantly when she saw who it was.

"You're still here?" He smiled.

"I am," she returned the grin. "You're finished with your meeting?"

"Just," he nodded. "May I come in?"

"Since when do you ask permission?" She teased, but gestured for him to enter. He stepped into the room and, with more time this time, he looked around; taking it all in. "How was the meeting?" She almost laughed at how easy the small talk slipped from her mouth.

"It was good," he answered without turning to look at her, his eyes scanning the shelves and bins. "You have...a lot of toys in here."

"Yes," she chuckled. "I use them with the children."

"You play with the children?" His eyebrows rose in question.

"Sort of," she moved to stand next to him. "It's a technique; play therapy. There are ways to use the toys, ways for them to tell their story and...well...children tend to talk more when their hands are busy, form alignments easier."

"Do you find the same to be true for adults?"

"Sometimes," she nodded; watching as his fingers traveled over the labels on the bins, stroking the fur of a few of the stuffed animals she held on a shelf.

"Khenda was telling me that sometimes you are called out to a site, to work in an emergent situation. Is that true?" Maddie tried not to get hung up on the thought of Khenda discussing her with Harry and focused on what he was asking.

"Yes. That's true."

"Are you ever frightened?"

"For myself?" She thought for a moment before shaking her head. "No. I know it's naïve of me, but in the moment, I'm not thinking about those sorts of things. We usually have others with us who are trained to think of those sorts of things. When we go out like that, I'm trained to do other things, so I do them. That's how it works. Each person does their particular piece. The time is generally limited in the field so..." She noticed how intently he was listening to her speak and it brought a smile to her eyes. "But...am I ever frightened? By what I see? By what the children have experienced? By what that means for them in the long term? By what could possibly happen to them the next day? Yes. I am...at times...horribly frightened."

"Yes..." He nodded slowly, having no words to follow up what she had said; having nothing that could possibly articulate the understanding he had for what she was saying. A heaviness settled over the room and it was Maddie's turn to break it.

"Would you like some candy?" His face lightened and he smiled to himself. "This very kind Crown Prince of England dropped by with a new bag." He chuckled and then moved his eyes to hers; not even bothering to correct her.

"I suppose I should try a piece of this lauded concoction."

"I suppose you should," she smiled; gesturing towards where the bag still sat on her desk. Reaching into the bag, she retrieved two pieces; handing one to him and working on the wrapper for herself. She couldn't help the small moan that escaped her lips as she bit into the candy; memories flooding her senses. He raised his eyebrows, amused, and took a bite.

"Hmmm," he studied the treat in his hand. "Minty."

"Amazingly so," she smiled. "Thank you for bringing these with you."

"You're welcome."

"This was very slick, by the way."

"Slick?"

"The candy. Remembering the story I told you, going to the trouble to find them..."

"It was really not much trouble," he interjected, finishing off his piece.

"Bringing them all the way to Bental..."

"Well, I was coming this way anyway," he shrugged; giving his best effort at nonchalance; moving to sit in one of her chairs.

"Is that something you do with all of the women you meet?" Her eyes narrowed slightly as she sat across from him. Now that she felt so much more comfortable around him, she was curious. She had never imagined that he would even remember her, but the five crisp ten dollar bills in her pocket said otherwise.

"I hardly ever meet women," he avoided the question.

"That is absolutely untrue. You meet hundreds of women."

"Well, not exactly. I am introduced to hundreds of women. I find that I meet very few. There is a distinction." He shrugged. "And the answer is no. I do not normally deliver childhood treats to the women I meet."

"Hmmmm..." She leaned back in her chair; contemplation etched across her face. "And what does your girlfriend think of all of this?"

"Excuse me?" His eyebrows shot up in surprise.

"I'm sorry," her forehead scrunched up. "I didn't mean to...I just....here you are, in Bental for a week and you're bringing candy to a woman you barely know, stopping by her office after work hours and..."

"Am I being analyzed right now?" He leaned forward, his elbows resting on his knees; hands pressed together. "Shouldn't I be allowed to at least play with a toy while we do this?"
"Would you like to pick one out?"

"Did you want me to leave you alone? If I'm making you uncomfortable or..."

"I'm not uncomfortable," Maddie cut in leaning forward, matching his position. "I don't mind that you stop by my office. I certainly don't mind that you bring candy when you do..." He laughed at that, easing just a bit. "I just thought that maybe your girlfriend might have some questions."

"I think maybe you have some questions," he pointed his finger at her with a small smirk.

"Maybe," Maddie shrugged. Maybe she had a lot of questions. Maybe Ella was going to have more. "Do you blame me?"

"No," he let out a deep breath and leaned back, deep into the chair. "No, I don't blame you. I have some questions too." Sitting with the silence, she watched as his mind processed it all. "I'm not here to screw around. I...I didn't come here just on a whim. I am actually working; the meetings...they aren't for show."

"I believe you."

"We're having meaningful discussions in there," he rubbed a hand over his face. "And as much as I hate to admit it, me being here...my name...it brings attention to what's happening here, to the violence, to the humanitarian violations, to the economic and agricultural issues the people are facing..."

"Harry?"

"Hmmm?" He looked up to her.

"You sound like you're trying to justify why you're here."

"Yeah," he sighed and leaned up again. "Maybe I am."

"But why?" She smiled. "Nobody doubts your work here. Not one person. I've heard everything from this end and I've seen the coverage outside of Bendal. Nobody questions your motives or..."

"I do," his voice was small, not at all what she had grown used to. "This is a part of my work that I don't mind at all; coming to Africa. I love it here. The people, the culture...I feel like I can almost...hide. I can runaway here and take a break."

"Is that what you're doing? Running? Taking a break?"

"No," he shook his head. "But it doesn't hurt that I can do that."

"It's okay to get something for yourself out of the work that you do. It's okay to take a break while you're bringing attention to what's happening down here."

"I know," his eyes shifted from the spot on the wall he had been studying as he thought to meet hers. "And then...there's you."

"Me?" Her voice came out in a shaky whisper. "I...I'm sorry I don't know what you..."

"I didn't come here to see you," he flinched as he said the words. "That sounded terrible. I just mean that my trip to Bendal was not planned so that I could see you."

"Never in a million years would I have imagined that it was," she found her voice. "I actually lost money to Ella betting that you wouldn't remember me."

"You thought I wouldn't remember you?" His nose crinkled at the thought.

"I thought there was a chance."

"You were wrong," his eyes were wide and open, as if he were opening himself up to her.

"I see that now." Their eyes met and held for a breathless moment before he tore away.

"How much did you lose?" They both cracked a smile.

"Fifty dollars—US." She shrugged and looked down at her hands. "But I gained a bag of candy out of the deal. So it all worked out in the end."

"Well there you go..." His grin widened and he took a breath. "What I meant to say earlier was that...while I didn't come to Bendal to see you...it doesn't exactly hurt that you're here."

"Oh?"

"I enjoy talking to you," he waved a hand towards her. "You're funny and smart and not at all intimidated by my title. And the last time we spoke I thought...I thought there was a connection."

"You did?" Damn him, Maddie thought; Damn his soft voice, sweet smile, and his eyes for looking at her in such a way that her mind seemed to have trouble with normal thought processes.

"Did I misread that? Was there not something there?"

"No," she shook her head and let out a breath she didn't realize she was holding and he balked at her answer. "No! I'm sorry. I meant...I don't think you misread that."

"Good," he breathed, his smile widening; making his eyes twinkle. A small knock on the door drew their attention from each other. "Thomas," Harry smiled up at the man who had now become quite familiar to Maddie. "I'm guessing you're here to pull me off to something else."

"I am, Sir." He was older, almost fatherly as he looked at the young Prince with a warm smile.

"Of course," Harry clapped his hands together and rose to his feet. Maddie, holding on to the tiniest bit of her self-control stood. "Thomas, I think it might be time for you to meet Dr. Madeline Forrester." He nodded in her direction. "She is a Child Psychologist from the United States working with Khenda and Collins through Doctors Without Borders. Maddie, this is Thomas Smith, my boss." There was sarcasm in his voice as he introduced the two of them; bringing laughter around the room.

"Dr. Forrester," Thomas held his hand out to her.

"Mr. Smith," she took his hand in hers.

"I do apologize for interrupting, but we're scheduled to be in a dinner meeting across town," he turned empathetic eyes to the Prince.

"Sure," Maddie smiled; she wondered if she knew his schedule just as well as he did, having heard so much about it from her friends.

"Would you..." Harry struggled for a moment a she looked to her with hopeful eyes. "Would you like to join us for dinner?" The surprise in Maddie's eyes was matched in Thomas'.
"I..." Maddie felt her throat go dry. "I'm sorry, I am not sure if that would be...appropriate." And though it was minuscule, she could see Thomas relax at her decline. "Thank you, though. For the offer."

"Of course," Harry nodded. "Another time maybe?" He wanted very much to not take her answer personally.

"Another time," Maddie agreed, her face flushing. "Absolutely."

"Okay then," he clapped his hands together; satisfied. "I'll be seeing you."

"Have a good night," she nodded to him and to Thomas. "It was nice to meet you."

"You as well," Thomas nodded in return before stepping out of her office.

"Good night Doctor," Harry's eyes met hers with a gleam of playfulness.

"Your highness."

"Oh and Maddie..." Harry turned in the doorway and met her eyes. "The answer to your question is...there is no girlfriend. No questions, no wondering what I am doing in Bendal delivering candy to a doctor from the United States. There is no girlfriend."

"Oh...okay then," Maddie swallowed.

"Okay then." And then, with a smug grin and a wave, he disappeared into the hallway.
Chapter 5

As Maddie sat at her desk, waiting for the first of her clients, she was startled by the sudden appearance of Khenda in the doorway.

"Okay," her voice called into the room, arms crossed; her eyes watching closely. "You want to tell me what exactly is going on with you and Harry?"

"Excuse me?" Maddie looked up in surprise.

"You heard me." She stepped into the room.

"Nothing!" Maddie exclaimed. "Why? Did Ella tell you something? It was just a bag of candy. It's not that big of a deal."

"Candy?" Khenda's face registered confusion as she sank into a chair opposite of Maddie's desk. "What are you talking about?"

"Wait..." Maddie paused. "What are you talking about?"

"He asked me to get you on the list for the event this evening."

"Whaa..." Maddie was stunned. "He what?"

"My reaction exactly," Khenda pointed at her shocked expression. "Especially since you were on the list before and you asked to be taken off."

"Khenda, I..."

"You know if you wanted on the list, all you had to do was ask. You didn't need to send the Prince," there was something sarcastic about her tone.

"I didn't send the...I had nothing to do with this." Maddie saw a tiny smirk on Khenda's face; she was enjoying this.

"Yes, I know," Khenda smiled. "Now, what's this about candy?"

"I..." Maddie looked to the floor, her mind wrapping around the information her boss had just shared. "When he was here last month I told him I really enjoyed a particular candy and when he showed up this week he...he brought me a bag."

"Ooooh...This is all starting to make sense now." Khenda shook her head, a knowing, smug grin on flashed her face. "He is going to owe me huge for this."

"Khenda..."

"Do you want to go?" She raised her eyebrows. "I'm being serious now. If you don't want to go, if you want to avoid this altogether, say the word. I can handle Harry. He'll understand."

"No I..." Maddie laughed nervously and ran a hand through her hair. "What am I doing? I mean...why would he even want me to...what does that even..." She trailed off, not even knowing how to finish her thoughts at this point. The two women shared a moment; one of them asking silent questions, the other providing silent answers—all with their eyes.
"Collins and I will pick you up at five," Khenda's reply was matter of fact as she clapped her hands together and stood. In her mind the decision was made. Harry had not wavered once when he asked her to bring Maddie along and though she seemed to be unsure about it all, Maddie clearly had something that drew her to him. And Khenda had known them both long enough, had a deep enough affection for each of them, that she wasn't going to step in and prevent this from going wherever it was meant to go.

"Khenda, I don't know..." Maddie fidgeted, pulling her lower lip in between her teeth.

"Yes you do. I'll see you tonight." And then, with a wink and a grin, Khenda left Maddie in her office.

Maddie's day grew incredibly busy and, by the time it was over and she was forced to go home by her colleagues, she was exhausted. After a semi-hot shower, she very much wanted to slip into her pajamas and get some much needed sleep. Fortunate or not, Ella had the night off and she was waiting, with a touch of giddiness and some wise words, to help Maddie prepare for her evening.

As they picked through the few dresses they had between them (because who really brought fancy clothes when coming on a mission such as this), Ella explained some small protocol details. There would be cameras, there would be dignitaries and, although Maddie was likely to not be at all involved in the official pieces of the evening, Ella did not want her friend to make a fool out of herself should she happen to end up in the background. When Maddie emerged from her bedroom, dressed and made up she felt good; slightly unsure about dressing up and going to dinner when there were so many other things she maybe should be doing. Ella assured her that she was fine; that there were other people working, that this was her time off; that she would have been forced out of the office regardless of what she was doing that night and that she shouldn't feel bad about using that time for her.

"Wow..." Ella breathed as Maddie stepped into her view. It was a rarity to see people so dressed up; it was almost a surreal experience. "Maddie. You look amazing."

"Thank you," Maddie smiled, feeling shy.

"I just...I cannot believe you're going on a date with a Prince."

"That's because I am not going on a date with a Prince."

"What would you call this?"

"I would call this nothing. Ella. A date is when a man comes to your home, picks you up, takes you to dinner, and brings you home."

"Seems like a lame date to me."

"Yes, well...there may be more to it than that. But this..." Maddie looked in the mirror hanging in their hallway and shrugged. "This is not a date. This is an event."

"An event he asked you to attend."

"He didn't ask me. He asked Khenda to put me back on the list. Maybe he wants me to serve appetizers."

"Oh yes," Ella rolled her eyes. "I'm sure that's it." She took a deep breath and sank back into the couch, her eyes getting a far off, dreamy look in them. "Maybe he wants you to serve him..."
"Ella!" Maddie tossed her clutch at her friend with wide eyes.

"A girl can dream," Ella giggled, catching the bag and setting it on the table.

"Why aren't you coming to this thing, by the way?"

"I am going to head in and pick up a shift for Tracy. She had a rough night last night and needs a break."

"Yeah," Maddie nodded, having heard about the rush they had the night before. They were mostly used to the craziness, the upset that came with the jobs they had, but occasionally it was too much. Occasionally it hit harder and they needed a break. "That's sweet of you," she smiled genuinely at her friend.

"She would do it for me," Ella shrugged. And she was right. They were a family here, they looked out for each other. Maddie, feeling sentimental, moved to hug her friend, roommate and peer. Ella hugged her tight and then, bringing humor back to the room, she smacked her backside. "You go out there and have fun." A knock on the door rang out. "And don't embarrass yourself...or me!"

"Yeah, yeah," Maddie laughed, moving to answer the door. On the other side was Khenda and Collins, both dressed in traditional tribal garb reserved for the highest of events. Khenda smiled wide and Collins let out a long slow whistle.

"Look at you, Doc," Collins looked her over approvingly.

"You look amazing," Khenda leaned in to kiss her cheek.

"As do you," Maddie blushed as she turned the attention to them. "You ready for the show tonight?" Both of them would be dancing in the entertainment portion of the evening.

"I am always ready," Collins grinned, his white teeth sparkling along with his confidence. "How about you Doc? You dancing with us tonight?"

"Not on your life," she shook her head with a warning glare. Reaching for her purse, she waved to Ella who grinned and called out.

"You make sure she behaves herself!"

"I promise!" Khenda called out as Maddie stepped through the door; pulling it closed behind her. And they were off.

Maddie was seated at a table close to the front of the room. Though Harry would be dining with local dignitaries, Maddie was close to the action and next to Khenda and Collins and a few others from the facility they all shared. It was strange, she thought, seeing everyone together in this way. Most often they were in their small, makeshift space with no air conditioning and their hair pulled back haphazardly. But on this night, the air was cool, they were in a beautiful room and, if their hair was pulled back it was softly and with intent. She wondered if her colleagues were having the same adjustment issues she was.

Even though she didn't see him, she could tell the very instant he entered the room. There was an audible sigh, all eyes shifted together towards the entryway and, in waves the room rose to their feet. Slowly she turned towards where all eyes were watching and when she saw him, she had to admit, her knees weakened just slightly. He looked stunning. It wasn't quite a black-tied affair, but he wore an unbelievably well cut blue suit and, even from across the room, his eyes were bright and his smile was charming. As he maneuvered through the tables, he seemed to be scanning the room and, when his eyes found hers, his entire face shone. With the slightest of nods in her direction, something most wouldn't even see, he turned to his table and began greeting his mates for the evening. As the room settled and everyone sat, Maddie could feel Khenda's eyes upon her. Ignoring her friend, she turned her attention to the moments at hand.

A small introductory speech was made while salad was served. As Harry took the podium to address the enchanted crowd, Maddie couldn't help but wonder how often he did events like this. And, if they were during meals, did he ever get a chance to eat? And did that mean that he ate beforehand?

Shaking the random questions from her head, she turned her attention to him and, along with everyone else in the room, she was spellbound. He spoke magnificently. Yes, he had a wonderful voice. Yes, he had great speaking skills. But there was something else; an essence that he simply exuded that have the guests hanging on his words and rising to their feet in applause when he finished. And it only made it better, in Maddie's mind, that the words he said were authentic and she knew, with no real reason for knowing so, that he meant every one of them.

As dinner drew to an end, Collins and Khenda excused themselves in order to prepare for the entertainment portion of the night. The host for the evening encouraged mingling and Maddie knew, because this wasn't her first show, that the dancers preferred to come into the room and move about the people, not to be on a stage as the main focus.

Before long, Maddie found herself seated alone at her table, sipping on a drink and watching the interactions around her. Having always enjoyed people watching at any level, she easily slipped into a place of contentment. She was so focused on an elder couple who sat off to the far back of the room that she failed to see him sit next to her until he cleared his throat and drew her attention to him.

"Harry!" Her eyes flashed wide in surprise. "I'm sorry," she coughed, glancing around to see if anyone other than he caught her gaffe. "I'm sorry, your highness, I did not see you sit down." His eyes sparkled as he smiled at her.

"So I gathered," though his attention stayed focused on her, his eyes moved around the crowd; smiling and nodding as needed. "I'm sorry that this is the first time I've been able to speak to you."

"Please," Maddie turned serious eyes on him. "Think nothing of it. You're...a very busy man and I'm here with my friends. And...I'm a big girl. I am an excellent conversationalist and, I don't know if you've noticed, but there is plenty of champagne." She tapped on her half empty glass.

"I did notice," he nodded and, with a raise of his hand, got two new glasses of champagne for them. "Thank you for coming, Maddie. I know it sounds crazy, but knowing you were out here...I felt a little less nervous."

"You were nervous?" She laughed lightly. "You couldn't tell. Your speech was phenomenal." He smiled, looking down at his drink and then to her.

"Either way, I appreciate you coming." As his eyes held hers, she found it slightly more difficult to breath.

"Yes, well, I had nothing better to do," she shrugged, trying for nonchalance and failing miserably. Deciding to go with the authenticity that he was full of, she smiled warmly and told the truth. "I am happy to be here."
"Good," he grinned wide and, as he opened his mouth to say something more, the music began. It was loud and rhythmic and instantly drew the room to a point of excitement. They all knew what was coming, with the possible exception of the Prince. He looked around, slightly confused as one after another of the dancers came back into the room. "I thought they would make some sort of announcement," his voice was louder as he spoke over the music.

"That's not how it works," Maddie responded; joining in on the clapping that was traveling around the room.

The music grew louder as the dancers continued to file in and, when the drum beats grew silent for the quickest of moments, the crowd rose to their feet and applause rang out. They all knew what was coming. Harry followed suit and clapped along, his eyes smiling along with his mouth. This was exactly what he enjoyed about the area; the spirited, lively people that cared less and less about who he was.

And the show began. The music blared and the dancers moved around. No sooner had Harry been spotted, a few young girls came to him, beckoning him to them. He laughed aloud and spoke to Maddie.

"Ever since I danced in Jamaica during the Jubilee, they have been trying to get me out of my chair."

"So...are you going to?" She watched as he laughed at himself; shaking his head. "Khenda did say that you owed her." He turned to watch her, his eyes moving from her eyes to her lips and back again.

"She's correct. I do owe her," he agreed and took a sip from his drink before sitting it on the table. "I owe her a lot." He watched her for two seconds longer than he probably should have before he turned to the young girls and surrendered; giving the crowd exactly what they were looking for.

Though Maddie's head tossed back in laughter, if she was honest, she would have had to admit that he was quite the dancer. Though his moves were nowhere near Collins' and the troupe, he could hold his own. And the crowd loved it. And, deep down in places where Maddie was honestly afraid to explore, she loved it too.

Later that night after a round of good-byes and well-earned yawns, Collins and Khenda saw Maddie home. And, after she had locked the door behind her, she pulled on her pajamas and, lying awake in her dark room, all she could see was those bright blue eyes full of laughter and enjoyment; those bright blue eyes looking right back at her. She pulled the covers tighter and sighed. Clearly she would be getting little sleep that night. And, somehow, she didn't seem to mind too much.
Chapter 6

Doctor Stevenson was leaving. His time in Bendal was coming to a close. And, as was customary, Khenda and Collins were hosting a party to say good-bye. The entire Doctors Without Borders crew had been invited. Maddie and Ella, with levity in their hearts, were excited to cut loose with their coworkers and enjoy an evening full of food and conversation.

"I heard you were chatting up the Prince last night," Ella grinned as she sat in the bar stool next to Maddie while Collins stood at the bar and chopped up some vegetables to snack on. A few people had already arrived and were mingling.

"Please," Maddie snickered.

"It's true," Collins nodded with a knowing smile. "Just before we pulled him out to dance, he was deep in conversation with the Doc."

"I knew it!" Ella and Collins shared a laugh at Maddie's expense.

"Enough," Maddie reached across the bar and refilled her drink. "You are all reading way too much into nothing."

"Mmm Hmm." Collins wasn't deterred. He knew what he had seen the night before.

"How was the Prince today Maddie?" Ella continued to poke.

"I actually have no idea. I haven't seen him all day." She popped a piece of fruit into her mouth. "So there."

"Yeah, well. That's about to change." Collins finished the veggies and placed the tray on the counter with a flourish.

"Wait. What?" Maddie seemed slightly panicked.

"Khenda invited him over tonight. He was in the city all day but..."

"KHENDA!"

"Maybe I wasn't supposed to tell you that." Collins winked at Ella and sat back; waiting to watch it all unfold.

"KHENDA!"

"What?!" Khenda poked her head into the room with confusion. Seeing the look on Maddie's face, she knew instantly what the screaming was about. "Now. Before you start yelling...remember, I am your boss."

"Not here you're not!" Maddie called out.

"Okay now listen...."

"No! This is...a private party. This is for DWB personnel. This is NOT a chance for you all to play matchmaker and..."

"Now come on," Khenda laughed, moving slowly towards her. "We've invited civilians before. I have known Harry forever and...he's the Prince for goodness sake."

"Khenda..." Even Maddie hated the whine in her voice.

"And so what if I have happened to notice that you have eyes for each other?"

"Not true!" Maddie exclaimed while her three friends laughed at her response.

"Madeline," Khenda sighed. "You are, by most standards, a genius. Why do you insist on keeping your head in the sand about this?"

"And what exactly are you hung up on, Doc?" Collins wrapped an arm loosely around Khenda's shoulders. "He seems like a nice guy. He's smart, funny. He's not...terrible to look at." He shrugged. "Why are you trying so hard to avoid that?"

"What is it you people would like me to do?" Maddie crossed her arms. "He is only here for a few more days! He lives in London and I...on my best days I live here. Otherwise I am in the states! A relationship would never work out. It just wouldn't."

"Hold on..." Ella spoke up. "I think you're getting a little ahead of yourself. I'm not talking about making a relationship work out."

"Oh!" Maddie laughed. "So you're saying I should just have a one night stand with the Prince."

"No," Khenda shook her head. "That is not what I'm saying."

"YES!" Ella clapped her hands together while Collins laughed; thankful he was off the market. "That is exactly what I am saying."

"Lovely," Maddie rolled her eyes at her friend and roommate. "Classy."

"Come on Maddie..." Ella swallowed some of her drink and shrugged. "There's something going on here. And don't try to tell me there's not. You can normally go out with a group, relax, and have a good time. Why is it that you're having such a hard time doing that now? With him? He likes you. Clearly he likes you. And don't even try to tell me that you don't like him. I know better."

"I don't..." Maddie started to protest but gave up. Ella was right; Maddie liked him. Though she had no idea if he felt the same way. "Ugh! This is ridiculous. He's only going to be here for a few more days and we're...friends. I should be able to just....relax. I want to be able to relax. Do you think I am ever going to be able to relax?"

"Well..." Khenda planted a kiss on Collins' cheek and moved towards the door. "Let's find out shall we? I see his car outside."

"Oh God..."

"Don't worry, Doc. You look great," he winked at her while Ella laughed.

"I hate you," she scowled playfully. "I hate you both."

"You love us!" Ella grinned. "Admit it! Admit it!"

"Admit what?" Harry's voice cut in; drawing their attention to him. He was dressed casually with a ball cap and wide smile. Khenda handed him a beer as he reached out to shake hands with Collins.
"Nothing," Maddie shook her head; resigning herself to the night—to his blue eyes and charming wit. "I'm admitting nothing."

Though she did do as she had hoped; she stopped avoiding him. She stopped avoiding it—whatever it was. Which was good because, from the moment he walked in the door, he seemed to be near her. If he wasn't in conversation with her, then he was watching her. If he would take up conversation with any of the other twelve or so people in the room, every so often his eyes would scan the room, find her, offering a smile and a nod.

The night proved to be exactly what they had all needed. There was great food, good wine, and plenty of music and laughter. Everyone felt relaxed and at peace; including Maddie. She was sitting on the small loveseat in the living room, watching Collins talk to a man she didn't recognize, when Harry returned to her side; a refreshed glass in his hand.

"Mmm..." Maddie smiled warmly, taking the glass from him. "Thank you, your highness."

"You're welcome," he laughed; settling next to her.

"So...a day full of meetings?" She settled back, trying not to think about the fact that they were touching in at least three places on their bodies.

"Yes," he breathed. 'Good stuff though."

"Good," she smiled. "How do you keep it all straight? You seem to recognize them right away and you know so much about them... It's impressive, actually."

"Yes, well, don't be too impressed," he shook his head. "You remember Thomas?"

"Yes."

"Well, before we came here, he wrote me a one page briefing memo on just about everyone I would meet while I was here."

"Really?" She giggled slightly; feeling like she was being let in on a secret. He nodded and took another drink. Feeling brave, she asked, "did he write you one on me?"

"No," he grinned. "But he certainly should have. I guess he had no idea how integral you would become to the trip."

"Oh I'm sure," she laughed. And, if it had been anyone else, anyone other than Prince Harry, she would have known exactly what was happening in that moment; a mild, friendly flirtation getting dangerously close to the non-friendly variety. But, because it was him, she seemed to be in denial.

"Well tell me, Doctor," his voice lowered as he leaned closer to her. "If he had written me a briefing memo on you, what might it have said?"

"Hmmm..." Maddie was thankful that night had fallen as the dark helped to mask the deep flush she felt in her face. "How much time do you have?"

"I have all night," he grinned. And that did it. She gave in. Turning her body towards his, she met his eyes and just like that, the conversation began.

And once it started, it flowed like a river. There they sat on the loveseat, with people mingling around them and they talked. The talked about everything; about her experience at University, his in the army, about their homes, about their families, about the roads they had taken to this moment, to Bendal.
They talked about what it was like to be famous, for simply being born into a family. He talked about the army and how much he loved his time spent in the military. He talked about the people he had met, the places he had seen; how he wouldn’t trade that for anything—even a chance to avoid all the publicity and scrutiny that came with it. There had been times when it was more annoying, when he understood it less. But he was growing to understand it was a necessary evil that came along with all of the things he loved about his life; the travel, the people, the capability to do some actual good in the world.

They talked about his brother getting married and how that shifted things for him. He explained that it had brought his future into focus; made things more clear all while making him a little sad and lonely. One thing was for sure, he felt less likely to ever settle for anything than absolute perfection in his choice of a wife.

She talked about growing up in rural Colorado where her dad farmed throughout her childhood; about how crazy it had been when she moved to the city for college. They talked about her mother; her lovely, simple mother who had only ever been a stay at home mother. She talked about how nervous she had been when Maddie went away to college; how proud she had been when she graduated. They talked about her father; the connection they had shared, the things he had taught her and how she missed him terribly; even still. And there was this moment, this small moment when she was telling Harry about how her dad used to call her every morning to give her a 'word of the day', when she felt tears come to her eyes and Harry reached out and, thinking absolutely nothing of it, he took her hand in his. And that was right where her hand remained until Gary, a surgeon with them out of Canada, came running back into the house—demanding that everyone come out and watch Collins and a few other dancers out in the yard.

On reflex, the moment Maddie saw Gary, she pulled her hand from Harry's; reality crashing back to her. And, with a slightly awkward smile, she suggested they follow the crowd outside. Though he debated the decision for the briefest of moments, he ultimately agreed.

Standing next to each other at the railing of the deck, they watched—along with everyone else—while a small group of people began to dance and play music. Maddie smiled wide as the air blew through her hair. And Harry, he couldn't help but be captivated by her—despite the music and the dancing which he was growing to adore.

"What's on your mind?" He asked. She glanced at him, her mind seemingly far off.

"...how do I ever leave this?" She gestured out at the crowd. "I'm supposed to go in a month and my mother... It's just her and I now. I mean, my aunt is out there with her but..."

"She misses you."

"Yeah," Maddie nodded. "I should go home. But then there's this..."

"Big decision."

"Huge."

"Listen," Harry moved closer, his voice lowering. "I know this is going to sound...crazy. And it's quite alright if you say no..."

"Do you want a piece of my candy?" Maddie cut in sarcastically. "Because I have to tell you I'm kind of getting low and..."

"No, no," he held up his hands in laughter. "I don't want any more of your candy. I promise."
"Good," she nudged him lightly.

"I was wondering, actually, if maybe you would give me your phone number...so I could, maybe, keep in contact with you. You know...find out what you decide to do." Fighting as hard as she could to keep the overwhelming excitement that rushed over her from showing on her face, Maddie shrugged.

"Maybe."

"Maybe?" He raised an eyebrow and grinned.

"Do you have your phone?" Her voice was low, sultry even; she was done trying to hide from this feeling. He nodded and quickly pulled it from his pocket; handing it over to her. She opened it up, pressed a few buttons and slipped it closed. Holding it out to him, she smiled wide. "Maybe." Harry found himself speechless as he held tight to the phone in his hand.

"Will you excuse me?" Maddie smiled up at him; finding she needed to use the restroom.

"Of course," he nodded and watched as she turned towards the house. As she approached the door, taking two deep breaths, she heard her phone ring in the pocket of her skirt. She hurried to find it, confused.

"Hello?" She asked.

"Hello..." She knew the voice in an instant.

"Harry?" She spun around. He stood, leaning against the railing, grinning from ear to ear. Cocking her head to the side she raised her eyebrows. "Can I help you with something, your highness?"

"No," he shook his head. "I was just checking to make sure you gave me your actual number and not a fake one."

"That happen to you a lot?" She chuckled.

"Never. But I am surely not taking any chances with this one." And with that, he ended the call, sliding his phone back into his pocket. With a deep blush, Maddie turned and continued on into the house.

When she returned from the restroom, they were both pulled in to the yard, into the dancing and the revelry. At the end of the night, though Harry had offered to see her home, Collins had stepped in and insisted. Everyone was tipsy and sleepy and, knowing that it wasn't the best idea, Maddie said her good-byes to Harry in a group and then, with a happy sigh, allowed Collins to take her and Ella home; where she fell asleep with his name on her lips.

Yes, he only had a few more days in Bendal. And yes, she had no idea if or when she would ever see him again. But, in those moments as she lay in her bed with Ella giggling next to her, she didn't seem to care.
The day that had begun slowly, allowing everyone time to recover from the party the night before, soon slipped into a sort of busy that bordered on chaotic. There was a wave of illness that had spread through one of the communities in the area and the medical staff had been running since early morning. It was days like this that Maddie felt the most useless. Her colleagues were massively busy while she saw a normal round of clients. Yes, she was busy, but they were much more so. At times, Khenda allowed her to help out in small ways; checking people in, asking basic questions, handing out various items.

Maddie was in her office, preparing to meet with a family she had been seeing for almost the entire time she had been in Bendal. It was a mother of two young boys who had lost their father to a violent surge in the area just before Maddie had arrived. Jemima, Geru, and Mante. Jemima was struggling to keep her family together, to put food on the table, and to keep her boys from the world that had taken away their father much too early. As she skimmed through her notes from the last meeting, Ella popped in quickly; a bit to eat in her hand.

"Hey!" She called out to Maddie as she swallowed a bite. "Tonight's Harry's last night in Bendal."

"Is it?" Maddie raised her eyebrows, trying for ignorance.

"Is it?" Ella mocked; her eyes narrowing at her roommate. "Does this act work on the general public? Because I don't buy it." She sighed. "Anyway. Collins said that he and Khenda were planning on taking him out to Perini for some local food and, knowing your love for food, I thought maybe we could join them..." Her smile faded into a smirk. "Unless you had something more intimate planned for the Prince."

"Ella..." Maddie glared playfully.

"Come on! Don't you want a great story to tell your grandchildren?"

"My grandchildren?" Maddie laughed; pushing the folder to the side.

"About the time you shagged the third in line to the throne...on one hot sweaty African night?" Her voice lowered as she drifted into the office.

"Shhh!" Maddie waved her hand. "You act like all I would have to do is suggest it to him and he would..."

"He would," Ella interrupted with a smug smile. "I know he's proper and sweet and, truly, lovely. But he has a wild side. I can tell."

"You can tell?"

"I can tell."

"Of course," Maddie shook her head. "While I hate to kick you out of my office, as I think you could certainly benefit from some Mental Health attention, I do have people on their way to see me, so..." She waved her hand; dismissing her friend.

"Yeah, yeah," Ella moved through the door; Maddie following her. "So? Do you want to go or not? Collins wants to have a firm count." Maddie sighed.

"Yes. I would love to go to Perini with you."
"And the Prince..."

"And the Prince," Maddie laughed. "Now go! I know you are busy down there."

"We are," she nodded and began down the hallway. "The Prince is done with official functions at six. We're meeting at reception desk at half past!"

"See you then!" Maddie called back. And then, as she turned back towards her office, she heard the doors to the building fly open and a loud, piercing scream that would change the course of her day. She spun around and there, standing in the entryway was part of the family she was supposed to be seeing in two minutes. The mother, who had fought and fought to keep her boys safe, was holding, in her arms the bloodied, limp body of her youngest son. Maddie's heart stopped.

Her eyes flew to Ella; meeting her gaze for a split second before her training kicked in. The two women broke into a run; directly for where the mother had fallen to her knees; her son slumping into her lap. There was so much crying, so much blood.

"Oh my God!" Maddie couldn't help it as the words slipped from her mouth.

"Maddie!" Ella, for all of her wild, spirited nature, was a consummate professional. Her hands began moving about, checking for pulses and blood pressure and trying to stabilize the young boy though his mother refused to let him go. "Maddie!" Maddie's eyes snapped to Ella's; her mind snapping back. "Get Howard. Now. Run." Maddie rose to her feet and ran through the hall. There were people scattering towards Ella, towards the scene; but she stayed focused. Ella wanted the Cardiac Surgeon for a reason. When she found him, she reached for his arm and, seeing the look in her eyes, he followed her pace without question.

When they returned to the scene, the doctor went directly to the son, who Ella had managed to extract from the mother. Ella held her hands tightly to the side of his neck and she was covered in blood. Maddie's eyes scanned the small gathering of people and fell on the mother, Jemima who, in the shuffle, had been pushed off to the side. Focusing her mental capacities, swallowing back the sorrow she felt creeping into her throat, her eyes, she took a breath and moved towards her. This was her expertise, this was where her training was needed. Ella and Howard and the others would attend to the boy. Maddie would attend to the mother.

Sitting on the floor next to her, Maddie reached out a hand and, in a soft but commanding voice, "Jemima. It's me. Maddie. Doctor Forrester. Can you...can you look at me?" She turned small, water filled eyes towards Maddie. "Can you tell me what happened?"

"They came. They came and threatened to take me and Mante, he..." Her sobs cut her off. "They shot him. He's just a boy! Just eight and they shot him like a man!"

"Jemima..." Maddie couldn't fight the tears that welled in her eyes. "Where is Geru? Was he there when they came or..."

"I don't know!" Jemima's cries increased as she thought of her oldest son. "I held him back but when I went to Mante to bring him...Geru left...oh God....I don't know what he is going to...." Maddie's eyes flashed wide as a multitude of scenarios flew through her mind—all of them including the little twelve year old boy stepping into something that would only bring more horror to this family.

"Collins!" Maddie's head turned around, looking to tell him of the wayward boy. "Collins!" She called out above the chaos and, within moments he was by her side. "Geru is...he was there when Mante was shot and he took off. She...she doesn't know where he is." The gravity of the situation registered on his face as he nodded to Maddie. Patting her on the shoulder, he hurried away from the crowd; leaving Maddie to her work and rushing off to his. Maddie turned back to Jemima and did all she could in that moment; hold tight to her hand and stay with her while they awaited news on both of her sons.

It was a quarter past six when Harry returned to the complex. He had finished up what he considered a great day. He had been in meetings, but they had been productive and during the lunch hour he had been able to eat with groups of young children from the local schools and was treated to a musical show they had put together. Despite his growing sadness at having to leave the next day, he was in a good mood.

He pushed through the main doors and his smile instantly faded. He could see that there had clearly been an upset that day. The faces of those around him were somber. The laughter that he had grown used to hearing had taken leave of the hallways. There was a crew scrubbing at a large spot on the floor that he knew could have only been blood. An uneasiness settled in his stomach as he took steps towards Maddie's office. Standing outside her closed door were a tensed Khenda and Collins; deep in conversation.

"What happened?" Harry's voice, well soft and unassuming, surprised the couple as they looked up to him.

"Your Royal Highness," Khenda addressed him first.

"Sir," Collins nodded his head. Harry shook his head. The easy way they slipped into formality only indicated how shaken up they must have been.

"Something happened here today."

"Yes," Khenda nodded. "Something happens here almost every day."

"She's fine," Collins stepped in to reassure the young man. "She's...she lost a client today."

"Two," Khenda corrected him with teary eyes. "She lost two clients."

"Yes," Collins nodded; his stomach clenching. "She had been working with a family since she arrived; a mother and two sons. Their father died just before Maddie arrived and today..."

"Today the two boys were killed; one right after the other," Khenda finished. Collins reached out to stroke her arm. "It's been a long day for Maddie. For everyone but..."

"Wow..." Harry breathed, scrubbing a hand over his face and into his hair. "Is she..." He nodded towards the door.

"She's in her office but Harry..." Khenda's hand reached out, as if to stop him. But before she could say anything else, the door to Maddie's office opened and their attention shifted to her. She had just changed from her clothes that morning—clothes that were now soaked in blood—into scrubs that Ella had given her. Her hair was pulled back; her eyes blood shot and puffy behind her glasses, were tear free for the moment. She looked from Khenda and Collins to Harry, her breath catching slightly.

"Perini," she pointed at him, her lips turned up the tiniest bit. "We were all supposed to take you to Perini for dinner..." She exhaled.
"Yes," he nodded. "But Khenda told me what happened..." And the depth in his eyes, the genuine concern there cracked the control she had just worked to gain and she looked away from him; her eyes filling with tears—sobs aching in her chest. She tried for a moment to stuff it down but failed, miserably. "Is there anything I can..." He trailed off as she shook her head; surrendering to the emotions.

"Damn it!" She smacked her hand against the door frame as tears spilled from her eyes. There was this moment, this tiny moment, when Harry moved a fraction of an inch—as if to go to her. But, in that second, Maddie shook her head, waving her hand at all of them before she reached for a tissue. "I..." She wiped at her eyes and discarded the tissue. "I'm really sorry, but I'm not going to be able to go out with the group tonight. I am going to go out with Collins to the family and talk to....talk to their mother and..." She looked just at Harry. "I know it's your last night and..."

"Don't worry about it..."

"I have to go..." She took a breath; hoping to compose herself. "We just need to check on the rest of the family. They had an absolutely horrible...." Maddie swallowed. "Everyone else is still headed out—they need a night out. But I just..."

"Think nothing of it," Harry offered a small smile and a wave of his hand. He watched as she pulled on a light sweater and nodded to Collins. Collins kissed Khenda's cheek and then, nodding at Harry, he followed Maddie down the hallway and out of the complex; leaving Harry and Khenda to watch them go.

It was five hours before Maddie returned to her office.

Five hours it took to travel to and from the home and to sit with the family.

Five hours of intense mental work; of intense therapy and techniques designed to immediately intersect the fall out that comes with a trauma such as this.

And when she returned to the complex with Collins to grab a file before heading home, she was more than a little surprised to find Harry waiting for her; right where she had left him outside her office. He was sitting in a chair that, even if it had started out comfortable, certainly couldn't have been at that point. She stopped in her tracks when she saw him; her mouth opening slightly.

"Am I seeing things?" She rubbed at her eyes; tired from the late hour and the emotional turmoil she had experienced that night. "Are you really here?"

"You're not seeing things," he rose to his feet and closed the gap between them. "I'm really here."

"But I...why?"

"I'm not entirely sure..." He exhaled and, for the first time since Jemima had burst through the doors, Maddie's emotions lifted. He glanced away from her in a nervous sort of way; a way that made her stomach flutter slightly. "I went with the group for a while, but I thought maybe you might...need somebody to..."

"That is..." She bit her lip; desperately wanting to stop crying. "You really are incredibly sweet, you know?" And the tears returned; her efforts to stop them all in vain.

"Hey..." And then, because he was done being proper and careful, Harry moved; pulling her into his arms. And she went, without thinking and without reservations. She stopped listening to the voices in her head telling her to be careful, be cautious. And instead, she stepped into his arms; arms that only took half a second before they wrapped around her in a warm, tight, comforting hug; a hug that made her feel safe and protected and taken care of.

She knew it was dangerous; that this was only fueling the feelings she had tried to stuff away. But she did it anyway. She needed this. And if he was willing to give of himself, she was taking. No matter what it meant for later.

They stood in the hallway like that for more time than Harry cared to count. He held her close and she cried. And, with the late hour and the long day, there were very few people around to see; nobody around who would question. When she finally pulled away, she smiled up at him—slightly embarrassed at her breakdown.

"Oh no!" She waved her hand at his shirt, turning to reach for tissue from the reception desk. "Look at your shirt!"

"Don't worry about it," he shook his head.

"But..."

"Hey Doc..." Collins' voice cut into the just seconds before he appeared around the corner. Coming to a sudden stop, he took in the sight. Surprised, and impressed, Collins nodded to Harry. "I'm sorry, I had no idea you were here."

"Yes, I..." Harry stammered, unable to find a valid reason for being there so late at night. Clearing her throat, Maddie stepped completely from his arms. Harry let his arms fall to his side; instantly feeling her absence.

"Sorry," Collins smirked; enjoying the awkwardness that had settled over the two of them. "I was planning on seeing Maddie home, but if you..."

"No, no," Harry spoke up, his proper upbringing taking over. "It's been a long night. You should go home, get some sleep. And...I have an early morning."

"Sure," Collins nodded. "Will we see you before you leave?" He could almost feel Maddie's eyes boring into the back of his head.

"You absolutely will," Harry nodded. Tentatively, he reached a hand out; squeezing her shoulder lightly before he glanced towards his security team outside. "Take care of yourself Maddie. I'll see you in the morning."

"Yes," she sniffed; her eyes met his. "Thank you, for..."

"Of course," he tried his best to remain nonchalant, to brush it off; but he had already given away too much. The only one still unable to see it all for what is worth was Maddie—the only one who should really be seeing. "Well," he clapped his hands together. "Goodnight. Maddie, Collins."

"Goodnight," Maddie smiled.

"Goodnight," Collins nodded. As Harry passed through the doors, Collins turned to watch for Maddie's reaction. "Mmm Hmmm." He saw exactly what he thought he would.

"Shut up," she demanded, not even looking at him. And for the first time that night, she laughed; a muffled sort of snicker. With an arm wrapped protectively around her shoulders, Collins lead her outside. What a day it had been.
Maddie had no idea what time it was when she was jarred awake. It was still mostly dark outside so she surmised it was some time in the very early morning. She had tossed and turned all night, unable to sleep and now, as she had finally drifted off, somebody was insisting on waking her.

She groaned into her pillow as she again heard the knock that was stirring her from her slumber. Tossing back her quilt, she pulled herself out of bed; begrudgingly going to the door. And when she pulled it open, she truly wished she had taken the time to at least run her hands through her hair.

"Harry?" Her voice cracked.

"Good Morning," he smiled softly, slightly nervous. He, on the other hand, was wide awake ready for the day.

"Harry?" Her eyes squinted as she pulled her robe tighter. "It's...early and I haven't been able to sleep all night. What are you...what are you doing here?"

"I am sorry about the time," he looked down sheepishly, his hand clasped together in front of him; fidgeting. "But I am working on a tight schedule today and I thought... Well, this may be incredibly presumptive of me, but..." He took a breath. "If you could go put on something comfortable, something you can walk in...you're coming with me."

"What?" She laughed. "I'm sorry but...what?" Harry grinned. At least she hadn't slammed the door in his face. Emboldened by that, and his now nearly undeniable feelings, he continued.

"I know you don't have to go to work today. Khenda told me you have the day off and I thought..." He stopped, refocused and gestured for her to go back into her room. "There's something I want to show you, but you need to change first."

"First," Maddie folded her arms across her chest. "You should know that I detest being told what to do."

"Let me rephrase," Harry arched an eyebrow and lowered his voice, knowingly moving into the more persuasive version of himself. "Madeline, there is something I would really like to show you. Today is my last day in Bendal and I would greatly appreciate it if you would please go put on some comfortable clothes and join me in this one, small, request." His eyes sparkled and she knew; he was trouble.

"Niiice," she shook her head slowly. "I'm not entirely sure what to say to that."

"Say nothing," he shrugged. "Change." And, because she did have the day off and she did not want to sit around and wallow; she did as he had requested. Maddie changed quickly, left a note for Ella and then, nodding a hello to his security team, she slipped into the car with Harry.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Though Maddie had been bold in stepping out with him that early morning, her nerves started to dwindle. As they drove through town, further and further out, she grew increasingly anxious and unsure. The ride was a quiet one; full of small, sidelong glances. And when they finally came to a stop, far out towards the edge of the valley, she turned to him, question in her eyes.

"Your highness?" Her voice was soft as she addressed him.
"Doctor?" He chuckled.

"What are we doing here?"

"We're hiking," he grinned before he stepped out of the car.

"We're what?" Stunned, Maddie turned towards her already opened door and exited. "Thank you," she smiled to the man who closed the door behind her. "Hold on. We're what?"

"We're hiking," he nodded toward the trailhead as he took a backpack the driver had retrieved from the trunk of the car.

"I'm sorry, let me understand this," Maddie watched as he pulled on the bag. "You woke me up early, on my day off, to bring me...hiking."

"Yes," he nodded.

"Harry!" She was surprised at how casually she called to him. "What if I'm not a hiker?"

"You are," he shrugged and began moving towards the trailhead. His security staff stayed near the car; having agreed to stay behind.

"But..."

"You live in Bendal, one of the most...you're a hiker, Maddie. I know these things." His expression was smug, sure; happy. "Besides, I ran it all past Khenda and she..."

"Khenda," Maddie breathed her name, trying to avoid the way her name evoked feelings left over from the night before. "I'm not entirely sure how I feel about all of this; the ambush, the planning."

"Yes, well, you have a good mile and a half in and a mile and a half out to think it over," Harry shrugged and motioned for her to join him. Maddie groaned in protest, but followed. "Don't worry. I have water and food in the pack should you need it."

And they walked. Though Maddie had balked initially at the hike, she had to admit; it was wonderful. The physicality it required, the scenery, the fresh air; all served to clear her mind and ease some tension. There was little conversation as they weaved through the path; gaining more elevation as they walked.

"Did you bring me out here so that I would talk about what happened?" She asked as they made their way through a particular rocky area.

"No," he shook his head, watching as she maneuvered.

"Good. Because I don't want to talk about what happened. I'll take today off because Khenda makes the rules and then tomorrow I'll meet with another psychologist onsite. I'll debrief and..."

"You don't have to talk," he interrupted her softly. "I brought you here to hike. I said nothing about talking."

"Good..." She sighed.

"Good," He echoed and, satisfied that they had both made it through the rocks, kept walking.

Having been on the hike before, Harry knew they were nearing the summit. But just before the summit, they had a particularly steep incline to traverse. He warned Maddie, who smiled and moved ahead of him; confident and sure of her abilities. She really was a hiker.

As they climbed, he would occasionally offer his hand for leverage and she would occasionally point out a potentially easier route—which he would happily take. And, when they conquered that particular slope, looking towards the final stretch, he suggested they stop to re-hydrate. Pulling the pack from his shoulders, he held a bottle of water out to her and then retrieved one for himself.

"So..." He started.

"Uh-uh," she waved a finger. "You said no talking."

"I..."

"No talking."

"I'm really supposed to sit here in silence?"

"You woke me up before sunrise to kidnap me and..."

"Kidnap you?" He laughed.

"And take me hiking," she finished. "Yes. You sit here in silence."

"It's good to see we've passed the point of propriety; it was getting a little strange with you calling me sir and bowing to my every need."

"It would serve you well to watch yourself, your highness," she bantered back; thankful for the playful look in his eye.

"What if I promise not to bring up anything that has anything to do with..."

"Bendal," she finished for him. "We can talk. But it has to have nothing to do with Bendal."

"Fine," he took a breath, going for casual; and decided to lead with a question he was only realizing he should have started with when he first met her. "Is there a boyfriend at home?"

Maddie's eyes gave tell of her surprise.

"No, no," she shook her head; her heart hanging delicately as her mind raced. "There's no boyfriend."

"Good," he refrained from breaking into a goofy grin; controlling his features. Trying to cover, he explained, "I mean...I would hate for somebody at home to know that you spent time with me and think that there was anything untoward about it."

"Oh?" Maddie raised her eyebrows, his explanation bringing her insecurities to the surface for one crucial moment. Forcing her heart to continue normally, she shrugged. "Besides, we're friends, right? What could be untoward about that?" Harry, having flinched at her choice of words, cleared his throat and looked out at the sky.

"Friends," he tried to hide the disappointment by taking a drink from his bottle. "You're right. There's nothing untoward about that."

"No." And she instantly regretted her response; instantly regretted that far off look in his eyes. "No there is not." And, as their eyes moved back to the trail, Maddie was mentally berating herself.

"Come on," Harry rose to his feet, reaching out to put their bottles back in the pack. "Let's keep "Come on," Harry rose to his feet, reaching out to put their bottles back in the pack. "Let's keep going." She nodded and followed; too confused to say much.

Their pace was a little slower as they both contemplated their conversation, as they both contemplated the other. Maddie was almost too caught in her mind to notice when they reached the summit.

Almost.

She rounded a sharp corner with Harry right behind her and she came to a sudden, stunned halt. Her eyes widened as her heart swelled. Harry, with a self-satisfied smile in place, stood next to her; looking out over the sprawling countryside below them. All of the uncertainty about what was happening between them washed away from her as she reached her hand out to grip his arm.

"Oh my...Harry. This is..."

"I know," he smiled, glancing at her hand on his arm. "This is one of my favorite places in all of Bendal."

"I cannot believe I've never been here," she spoke so softly, he almost couldn't hear her.

"I thought..." He stubbed his toe against a small rock; knowing he was treading on dangerous ground. "I don't know. I thought that maybe it might serve you well to wake up this morning and see some of the best that the country has to offer...since yesterday you saw the absolute worst."

And because she couldn't fight it any longer, because the beauty of the moment was colliding with the horror from the night before; Maddie surrendered and began to cry. There she was, standing at the top of a cliff in the highlands of Bendal next to Harry, the Prince of Wales; with tears slipping down her cheeks. He stood very still as she moved away from him then; walking closer to the edge and sitting down. Harry removed the pack from his back and moved to her side. Allowing her some space, he sat down to rest and take in the view.

As she calmed down, Maddie wiped at her eyes and glanced in his direction. "Wow..." She sniffled. "I wasn't quite expecting that."

"I don't know why not," he spoke softly. "It's a very tragic thing to have to witness; death and destruction."

"I'm supposed to be stronger than this. I'm supposed to be the one the others turn to for..."

"We all need to breakdown, Maddie," he shrugged. "I've seen grown, seasoned soldiers do it. I can't imagine they would expect more from a therapist who carries around the burden of hearing everyone else's sadness."

She nodded, unable to find her voice. He was so wise, so together. And then, with a timid smile, he held his closed hand out to her. She looked at it and back to him; confused. And when he lifted his fingers revealing, in his palm, a piece of her favorite minty Christmas tree candy, she almost started crying all over again.

Almost.

Instead she gingerly took it from his hand and opened it. Without even thinking, she tore it in half; offering him a piece. Letting out a breath he hadn't realized he was holding, Harry took the piece from her and there, on the high hill in Bendal, they sat in silence; enjoying each other—and a piece of Maddie's childhood.

"I feel so..." She struggled to find the right word. "Up in the air. I have been trying to decide what happens next. Do I go home? Do I stay longer? Do I try something else entirely?" She chuckled lightly. "I just feel so out of sorts lately. I usually have terrific gut instincts; a solid confidence in my decisions. But something happened and it's really shaken me up. I wish I could figure out..." She sighed and smiled at him. "It's like I figure something out, find an answer and then—in twenty four hours, I'm back at square one again. And after last night...I just don't know what to do."

"It will come to you," he seemed absolutely certain.

"How do you know that?"

"You've your head on straight, Maddie. You're smart and caring and...and you have great instincts. Even if they are throwing you off right now. Just give it some time. It will come to you."

"Yeah..." Maddie agreed cautiously. "I'm sorry, how old are you exactly? You sound like an ancient sage." They both laughed at that.

"Na," he shook his head. "I just have great instincts too. And my instincts tell me you'll figure it out."

"Okay..."

"And once you do, you'll let me know?" He raised his eyebrows, hopeful.

"I will," she whispered.

"Good." Both sets of eyes moved to look out at the view; the sun coming up over the land. Without looking at her, he sighed. "I'm leaving today."

"I know." She hated the way it made her sad to think of. There was a long moment of silence, a long pause where they both contemplated what to do next.

"I'll see you again..." He turned to look at her, hoping she would hear what he wasn't saying.

"I know." She turned in time to see him smile wide; shocked at how honest it all felt.

"Please be careful while you're here."

"I am always careful while I'm here."

"I'll be calling you," he patted the phone in his pocket.

"I look forward to it."

"And you...you know how to reach me if you ever need..."

"Candy?" She cut into the heaviness with a moment of humor; bringing a loud laugh from him.

"Yes," he nodded. "Candy. It's good to see you still have your priorities in order."

"Yes," he nodded as the moment faded to seriousness. "I really hate to say this, but I think we should..."

"Yes..." As she moved to stand up, he held a hand out to her. Without hesitation, she took it; allowing him to help her to her feet.
Holding onto her hand; contemplation danced across his face before, with a small squeeze, he let it go.

Their return to the trailhead was quiet; thoughtful. They spoke of the things that one speaks of when trying to avoid the elephant in the room. They pointed out plants they had missed on the way up. They cursed the weather and the lack of rain. And, when they emerged from the trail to find not only his car and security team, but another car that Maddie knew was meant for her, they talked about how the drive home always seemed to take less time than the drive there.

But they never talked about "it." Not once did he put voice to his desire to take her to dinner, to walk her home, to listen to her talk for hours. Not once did she burst out with the admission that she didn't want to be his friend, that maybe Ella and Khenda and Collins had all been right, that maybe there was more happening here, that maybe—maybe she wanted a really good story to tell her grandchildren.

They never addressed any of it. It was too late. He was getting in his car and heading directly to the city where he would have one last meeting and then board a plane for home. And she, she was headed back to the fallout from the night before and the preparations for many nights to come. And the thought of "it" was destined to be just that; a fleeting thought.

"Well, doctor," his voice lowered as he moved closer to her.

"Your highness," she smirked, offering the most of a curtsy he had seen from her on the entire trip.

"I guess this is goodbye."

"It would appear so." They stalled for a beat before he gave in.

"Goodbye Maddie," Harry's voice was gruff as he leaned in to press a kiss to her cheek. Maddie couldn't help but think that all she would have to do is turn her head just to the left and they would be kissing.

But she didn't turn.

And he pulled away.

And with one final wave, she was in her car heading back to her small, shared apartment in Bendal.

That afternoon, as Harry took his seat on the charter that would return him to London, he was happy and content knowing he had military obligations to keep his mind busy. He hoped against hope that the space that was now occupied by the young American he had met in Bendal would soon be replaced with tales from the front line. Though he knew, there was a small chance of that.

And, as Maddie crawled back into her welcoming bed, she couldn't help but wonder what had just happened. The day had been so exactly what she had needed; the hike, the tears, the candy. And how had he known that? This Prince who she had barely met...could he really have known her well enough to know what she needed in order to find this peace she now felt? Or were his instincts and abilities to read people really just that good? As she closed her eyes and cuddled close to her pillow, her mind was at ease enough to finally admit that she hoped she would someday have a chance to really find out the answer to those questions. But, until then, she was happy to finally, peacefully, fall asleep.
Chapter 9

If Maddie was honest with herself, she would have to admit that there was a tiny part of her that thought, even though Harry had asked for her phone number, had taken the time to verify it and promised to call, that he would arrive home in London and never call. She had thought that his life would take over and he would simply forget. But she quickly learned she could not have been further from the truth.

And that was not the only thing she learned over the course of the next few months.

They both learned a lot about the other. She learned that he actually stayed up much later than she could even imagine. He laughed and told her it was because he was not nearly as busy as she. She groaned and told him it was probably because she was older. He would point out that they were merely a month apart. And then she would sigh and end the conversation because, as he would learn, she valued her sleep above most other things.

And they became close; becoming much better friends than either of them would have guessed. He was the first one she called, even before her mother, to tell him that she had decided to extend her contract another six months. He congratulated her on the announcement and helped her walk through how exactly she was going to break the news to her mother. Though he offered to make the phone call for her, she declined. Her mother would find no humor in what she would mostly likely assume was a prank phone call.

She was one of the three people outside of the family that knew of the opportunity he had to head back to the frontlines in Afghanistan; flying the Apache helicopter. And she was the one he called in the apex of frustration when they cancelled it a month later. She listened as he yelled, she agreed while he ranted and, when he had calmed down, she sat in silence for two minutes before he sighed and moved the conversation elsewhere.

He told her about the trips he was taking, the events he was attending and he listened endlessly whenever she talked about The Community Garden, the newest endeavor in Bendal. It was a wonderful project they had been working on with the children who lived in the home for parentless children just a short distance away. When the Director of the home had approached her to help out, she had jumped at the opportunity; knowing the confidence and ownership it would give to the kids. But even she hadn't foreseen the enormous amount of pride it would bring about to everyone involved. They had all worked together as a community to build a green house, till the ground and plant the seeds. They had developed a schedule to help with the upkeep. It had been a fantastic idea; something she would remember forever.

There were moments where they came close to talking about what was happening between them. Maddie would have a long night, watching people lose those closest to them and she would call him, her intentions to live in the moment, to put words to the excitement that would bubble up when she would see his number on her phone.

There were nights when Harry would have a little too much to drink and he would sit at home, turning the phone over and over in his hands; debating his next move with great intensity. Call her and face the wrath that came with waking her or put the phone down and sober up. The phone would go down and the dance would continue.

Harry would continue on with his duties, with his family and Maddie would dismiss the feelings and move forward. Being a friend of Harry's was proving to be much more fulfilling than she would have imagined and, based on his almost daily phone calls, he was enjoying it too. There was no need to mess with a good thing.
Ella had almost exhausted her reservoir of innuendo and jokes. Khenda remained supportive and hopeful that someday the two of them might figure it out. And Collins remained silent. Though his eyes spoke volumes when they met and held Maddie's; as if he knew something he wished she would see. And in London, Harry's brother and sister in law had heard extensive tales from Bendal; every one of them laced with Maddie.

And then, one day, Harry decided it was time to stop dancing. With a glare from his brother and a gentle nudge from his sister in law, he made a few travel plans and placed one very important phone call. Going straight to her voicemail, he took a breath and left a message.

"Maddie, it's Harry. I hate to leave this in a message but...I'm boarding a plane and I wanted to let you know..." His nerves waned slightly as he looked at the floor. "I'm coming back to Bendal. I'm stopping in South Africa first and then I'll be there on Thursday. I'll only be able to stay for a few days." He sucked in a breath. "And this trip...has nothing to do with business or meetings or anything official. This is all about me needing a break and running and...and it has everything to do with seeing you; which I'll be doing soon. Seeing you." And then, before he could take advantage of the delete and re-record option her voicemail gave him, he ended the call; stuffed his phone in his pocket and took another deep breath. "Well...that ought to do it."

After the initial shock wore off, Maddie was inexplicably excited by the voicemail Harry left. She had been in a meeting when he had left it and, seeing his number on her missed calls list, she had tried to call him back. Unable to reach him, she pressed the button for her voicemail. And she listened. She could tell from his inflection that he was smiling and, when she heard him speak the words—she came to a sudden, abrupt stop.

"Oh my God." Her lips pulled into a wide smile. She glanced around quickly looking for somebody, anybody who she could share the news with. Finding nobody, she did the only thing she could think of.

"Ella!" She called out; her feet moving faster than normal as she rushed back to the main complex. "Ella!" She hurried through the doors and down the hall looking for her friend.

"What are you yelling about?" Maddie turned around to find her friend sitting at one of the desks she had passed; taking a well-earned break.

"Come with me," she reached out for Ella's arm and, dragging her friend behind her, she hurried back to her office.

"What the hell is..." Ella laughed as Maddie shut the door behind her. Without a word, Maddie dialed her voicemail and handed Ella her phone.

"Listen." She commanded. Though she looked at Maddie as though she had gone crazy, she took the phone and did as she was told. And then, when her eyes snapped up to meet Maddie's, she started bouncing on her heels.

"He's coming?" Ella shut off the phone and passed it back to Maddie. "He's coming..."

"On Thursday." Maddie nodded.

"He's coming to see you," Ella clapped her hands together. "In two days. He'll be here in two days."

"Oh my God..." Maddie shook her head; her heart racing in her chest at the thought.

The next two days went by painfully slow. Maddie's nerves were an absolute wreck. It was as though her body knew that she was on the precipice of something big; something monumental. And it made her slightly uneasy. Yes, she had known him for around six months and yes, they had been speaking on the phone for almost four. But knowing that he was going to be there, standing in front of her, brought back all the excitement and jitters she had been able to tamper down since he had left months ago.

But above all, she was elated. And everyone could tell; her colleagues, her friends, the kids she worked with. Everyone. Though his trip was a personal one, there were still arrangements being made. His security team, smaller than during his official trip, were making plans while Khenda and Collins did their best to keep the visit under wraps.

When Thursday finally came, Maddie made it a point to stay busy. She hadn't heard from him at all since the message he left. He could very well have changed his mind, though she knew better. Trying for as much normalcy as possible, Maddie went out on her routine run of home visits on Thursday morning and, when she returned to her office after lunch, she knew instantly.

He was there. Though he wasn't standing in her office, he had been. And the reason she knew that was because there, on the middle of her desk was a brand new bag of chewy, minty Christmas tree candy.

"Oh!" She gasped; her hand flying to her mouth as she stepped closer. Her chest tightened as she looked down at the treats he had brought with him. There was a hand written note next to it. Her fingers lifted the paper from her desk.

M~
My flight was early and I came straight here.
While I was waiting, one of the children wanted to show me the new Community Garden...I couldn't say no.
I'll see you when you return.
~H

Letting the note rest next to the candy, Maddie spun around and, without another thought on the matter, she went directly to the Community Garden, excited that he was going to finally see it. As she neared the garden, she could hear the laughter from inside the fence. She slowed her pace, spying on the interactions inside.

And when she saw him, she sucked in her breath; almost giving herself away. There he was, tanner and taller than she had remembered; sitting in the dirt with a boy in his lap. He was smiling and nodding animatedly while the children gave him quite the tutorial on how to plant a seed. And as Maddie watched, her heart swelled in her chest, her pulse quickened and she finally, finally recognized the surge of feelings that had been building up over the last six months. And she was, quite suddenly, terrified that he might not feel the same way.

"Maddie!" The loud, giggly voice of one of the younger girls called out as she pointed towards the fence. All eyes turned in her direction and, for a split second, he caught her gaze with a wide, warm smile full of relief. As the children rose to their feet and ran, full speed towards her, Harry was forced from his trance. Standing, he brushed the dirt from his pants and followed behind the group of children, now swarming around Maddie; hugging tight to her legs. They were laughing, telling her about the progress in the garden, the events of their day, and how they were teaching Harry how to plant.

"Your highness," she offered him a small curtsy as he shook his head, humor glinting in his eyes.

"Doctor," he nodded wondering if it would ever cease to be humorous when she did that.

Though it took some work, Maddie focused her attention on the children; nodding and smiling, ooh-ing and ahh-ing. And, when they were satisfied with her response, they ran back to their makeshift playground; high-fiving their new friend Harry as they went.

"I have to tell you," Harry spoke first, his voice making her skin flush. "I love that you're much more of a celebrity here than I am." Her head tossed back; joining him in the light laughter they both needed to break the ice. It felt so strange; having spoken to each other for so many hours over the last few months and yet, feeling so nervous around the other.

"You're really here," she turned to him shyly.

"I am," he took a deep breath and then, surprising her, he leaned in; pressing a lingering kiss to her cheek. "It's good to see you again, Maddie." He was so close and he smelled so wonderful, she couldn't help but sigh. When he pulled back, his cheeks were stretched wide with a smile. And he knew. He owed William and Kate a Thank You. They had been right to push him here. This was exactly where he was supposed to be.

"It's good to see you too Harry," she felt herself relaxing slightly.

"I assume you saw my note?"

"Next to the candy? How could I miss it?" They laughed; relaxing even further. She could feel their friendly nature returning. "Thank you for contributing to my addiction."

"You're very welcome," he laughed; following her lead. Their pace was slow as they walked back towards the complex.

"So..." She took a breath and decided to open up the discussion. "You're on the run?"

"Ha!" He nodded. "Yes. I am on the run."

"Care to tell me what you're running from?"

"Who says I'm running from anything?" His stress on the word caused her heart to jump in her chest.

"Okay," she swallowed. "Care to tell me what you're..."

"Running to?" He finished for her; his voice soft as his eyes searched to meet hers. "I would love to..." He nodded. "Though, I was actually hoping I could speak to you in private."

"Of course," she smiled; hoping he couldn't see the fear that flashed across her face. "Is my office okay?"

"It's perfect," he nodded as he reached out to hold the door to the complex open for her.

"Thank you," she moved past him and, as soon as they stepped inside, they were bombarded. News had traveled fast and a small group had gathered to welcome Harry back to Bendal. And he was thrilled to see them all. He hugged Khenda tight; kissing her cheek hello before he turned her loose. He shook Collins' hand, thanking him for welcoming him back on such short notice. He even kissed Ella's cheek—causing no small amount of grinning on her part. Maddie smiled as she watched it all unfold. He seemed so at ease among them; and them with him. She knew, from her many conversations with him, that as a child he had secretly longed to abandon his royal status and live in a faraway jungle. It was one of his fantasies from childhood; one that he knew would never come to fruition. She wondered if this was as close to that fantasy as he was able to realistically get.
"So, tell me," Khenda nudged him. "What does your schedule look like?"

"There is no schedule."

"Really?" She seemed impressed.

"None," he shook his head; exhaling in the relief he felt. "I'm not here on business."

"Wow..." Ella beamed at her friend. "So for the next three days, you're all ours?" A light rumble traveled around the group.

"I am," Harry joked. "For the next three days, I'm all yours."

"Yea!" Ella clapped her hands.

"Oh God," Maddie groaned playfully. "You have no idea what you just signed up for."

"I am not the least bit nervous," he winked at her mischievously.

"Yes well," Khenda watched the interaction between the two of them. "I think that we..." She waved at Ella, Collins, and herself. "Should get back to the hospital."

"Yes," Collins nodded. "We are having our first 'harvest' tonight..."

"From the Community Garden?" Harry's eyebrows rose in interest.

"Yes. There will be a celebration, some food..."

"Dancing," Maddie pointed out with a nudge towards Collins.

"Fantastic," Harry grinned.

"Will you be coming?" Ella looked to Harry who then, in front of everyone, looked to Maddie as if to ask her.

"I..." She glanced around, surprised. "I was planning on it."

"Then yes," Harry clapped his hands together. "Yes, I will be there."

"Great," Khenda smiled as she began to usher Collins and Ella away from the two of them. "We will see you both tonight."

"Yes you will," Maddie met Khenda's eyes with a silent thank you and then, as they slipped down the hall, she turned towards Harry—who was watching her closely. His smile widened. "Shall we?"

"After you," he stepped aside; following her into her office. He stood next to her bookcase, leaning casually against it while she shut the door behind them. He watched her walk across the room to stand in front of her desk.

"Candy?" She waved her hand nervously.

"No, thank you."

"Suit yourself. More for me." She shrugged smugly and he chuckled.

"God Maddie, it's so good to see you," he exhaled; visibly relaxing. Maddie laughed softly.
"A little strange too, no?" She leaned back against her desk.

"Strange?"

"We've spoken to each other so much that it feels like we're...I don't know." She shrugged; struggling for the right words. "I felt like we were close enough that I could hug you. I felt this urge to hug you earlier but then we haven't seen each other in months and it didn't feel like we were really..." She trailed off; rolling her eyes at herself.

"You can hug me," he cut in, his eyes dancing at the thought. "I know it's a little...strange...but you can. Even though we haven't seen each other, I think we're definitely in a place where you can...if you want to..."

"Okay," Maddie nodded, but stayed put. She was waiting for him to take the lead; curious about what he had to say. She watched as a whole host of emotions passed across his face. "Harry, is everything okay?"

"Yes!" He exclaimed, looking up. "Yes...everything is great. I just...I wanted to talk to you about some things."

"Things we couldn't talk about over the phone?" Her head cocked to the side.

"Nah," he shook his head. "Not really." Pushing away from the book shelf, he took a few steps closer to her. Maddie couldn't help but feel slightly panicked at that. They had talked about so much over the phone; his mother's death, his father's infidelity, his top-secret, red-lighted deployment to Afghanistan. Her mind raced trying to figure out what it could possibly be that he couldn't tell her over the phone. Seeing the anxiety on her face, he reached out; his hand resting on her crossed arms. "Don't worry. It's not bad." Maddie looked from his hand to his eyes and raised her eyebrows.

"Harry?" He nodded, cleared his throat and clapped his hands together. This was it.

"There are two things you should know about me Maddie." He began to pace slightly in front of her. "First, I am...honest—painfully so at times. I prefer things to be on the table; out in the open. I have been accused of being blunt and I may be. But I really don't want things to be left up to interpretation. I much prefer open, clear communication. Even when it hurts." He took a breath and continued. "If you didn't know that about me before, you should know that now. From here on out, I am an open book. There is not a question you could ask that I won't answer."

"Really?"

"Absolutely."

"Tell me this, why does a round pizza come in a square box?"

"I'm sorry?" The corner of his mouth tugged up at her question.

"OR this one; If the professor on Gilligan's Island can make a radio out of a coconut, why can't he fix a hole in a boat?"

"Maddie..." He laughed.

"I've always been curious." Her lips tugged up in a tiny smirk as he shook his head; amused at her ability to keep things light and airy. "Sorry, I couldn't resist." She smiled sweetly. "Go ahead. You're honest."
"Yes," his pacing ceased as he stepped towards her. "I am honest and..." He held up two fingers; moving on to his second point. "I place a very high value on friendship and loyalty; both in others and in myself. I very rarely allow people to get too close to me."

"That makes sense."

"With...very few exceptions, if somebody is in my life now, they have most likely been in my life for a very long time." His eyes met hers and she knew he was counting her as one of the exceptions and it made her heart race. "And...once I care about you...I care about you forever. It doesn't end just because our relationship does."

"Why are you..." Maddie took a breath. "I'm confused. Why are you telling me these things?" Was he here to end their friendship?

"Because..." He came to a stop in front of her; his eyes locking on her face, watching as he continued. "Because I wanted you to know that I will always consider you a friend, I will always tell you the truth. It's been like that with women in my past; we've remained friends, we've remained loyal. And I want you to know that...no matter how it is you feel about what's going to happen next." He swallowed the lump in his throat and held his eyes on hers. "About what I hope is going to happen next."

"What's going to happen next?" Maddie whispered; the confusion evident on her face.

"Ha!" He laughed; astonished at her naivety in this moment. "You really don't know?" And just in case she didn't, he reached out, with a steady hand to take one of hers into both of his. "Maddie..." She looked down at where their hands were connected, where the heat in the room seemed to be radiating from and, as his thumb absently stroked the back of her hand, it hit her. Her eyes grew wide as she looked up to him.

"Me?" She whispered before clearing her throat. "Are you talking about me?"

"I hope so." His admission was so sweet, so innocent—and it stole her heart completely. Her breath hitched in her throat.

"Harry do you...Are you saying that you...like me?" He chuckled lightly; her inability to believe it only endearing her to him more.

"I think I'm saying more than that, but we can start there."

"Wow..." she shook her head; looking down at their joined hands again in disbelief; waves of the moments they had shared washing over her.

All of the jokes, all of the laughter, all of the late nights and the long talks.

As each moment crashed back into her brain, it became more and more clear what, or more accurately who, he was speaking of. The corners of her mouth turned up cautiously. Her eyes rose to meet his and his smile stretched across his face; his eyes crinkling as he beamed. She wasn't bolting. She shook her head again; slowly.

"Will you...will you please say something?" He raised his eyebrows; hopeful.

"I..." And she wanted to, she wanted to say many things but for whatever reason, her mind was completely stumped. "I am...confused."

"Confused?!" He laughed out loud; inching closer to her. He was finding, as the words poured from him, he couldn't help but want to be closer to her. "I cannot imagine how you could be "Confused."

"It's just...me?"

"Yes. You," he sighed. "Maddie, you're amazing. You're smart and funny and warm. I mean, just watching you with the kids today... You're laid back and not easily rattled." He took a deep breath and let it out slowly. "And you're not at all afraid to boss me around." That did it; that cut through the nerves in her stomach. She tossed her head back and laughed and his smile deepened. "You know exactly what you want. You know exactly who you are. And...you have this confidence that is just so real and so damn sexy."

"Harry..." She felt her face flush at his words.

"And you're humble and gracious and...beautiful..." He stopped and cocked his head to the side thoughtfully. "And you know, I am really laying it all out for you, aren't I? So much for suave and in control, no?" He looked down slightly embarrassed at his own ramblings.

She knew that this moment was big; that he was out on this limb all by himself; exposed at such a vulnerable level and more than anything, she wanted him to not be alone on that limb. But her mind was simply failing her.

So she did what she could; her hands turned around in his, so that she was holding onto him as well and squeezed gently. And it was enough. His eyes met hers and they twinkled the bright blue she had grown so fond of. She sighed and relaxed slightly; thankful he was allowing her time to process it all.

"Harry...Can I just ask..."

"Hmm?" He lifted his eyebrows. "Anything."

"I'm an American."

"Yes," he chuckled softly. "Yes, I know."

"I'm a commoner."

"Really now?" He eyed her, disapproving of her choice of words.

"And you..." She looked him over, feeling slightly more herself. "Well, you're a Crown Prince."

"Oh for Heaven's sake!" His voice grew as he rolled his eyes in exasperation; pulling away from her slightly. "I am not a Crown..."

And then, since her mind was failing her, she turned control over to something else entirely. Her hands, intertwined in his, pulled him forward; closing the distance between them and her lips; smiling and warm; captured his—putting an end to his sentence, to the banter; to his entire thought process.

It took him only a second to recover from the surprise; only a second and his arms were wrapped around her, holding her body closer to his. Only a second before his lips parted slightly, pulling her deeper into this intoxicating moment.

"Wow..." He breathed; pressing his forehead to hers; catching his breath. "You kissed me..."

"Well," she sighed. "You did tell me it was okay to hug you and, since you seem to have a thing for me..."
"A thing?" He laughed. "It's slightly more than a thing."

"Either way, I figured it was okay to..." Harry nodded his agreement as his lips sought hers again.

"It is more than okay..." His voice was low near her ear; his breath warm against her skin. "It's just, the first time...I usually have to take the lead and..."

"Oh no! Did I ruin the moment for you because..." She pulled back to look at him. "Because I..." He kissed her again. "I didn't mean to step all over your manhood..." She hurried to speak between kisses. "But I've always been a bossy, take charge kind of..."

"Maddie would you please..." While one hand moved up, entangling itself in her hair, the other snaked around her waist and then, with a tad more force, he pulled her face to his. "I adore your bossy, take charge ways..." And, as his lips moved against hers, as her mouth opened under his—deepening the kiss—they both seemed to have lost track of what they had been talking about.

Maddie sighed into him; her arms wrapping around his neck. And Harry, strong and sure, held them both up; fused together in this moment that had been six months in the making.

And totally worth it.
Chapter 10

But for the knock on the door and the arrival of Maddie's patient, she may very well have stood there kissing Harry for the rest of the afternoon. And, from the light in his eyes and the grin on his face, he would not have objected much to that. With a promise to see her later and a small wink, he left her to her job.

As Maddie had to work up until the party that evening, Harry agreed to meet her at her office. He had gone to Khenda and Collins' place, where he would be staying, to settle in. When he returned, Ella was waiting outside of Maddie's closed door.

"She's changing," Ella smiled as she moved to stand. Harry, slightly embarrassed by the formalities that came with his title, waved his hand for her to sit. She did and he joined her; taking a chair across from hers.

"How have you been Ella?"

"Very well, thank you." She smiled as she studied him. "How about you Harry? Can I call you Harry?"

"Of course," he smiled. "I'm doing really well."

"Good," she nodded; watching him carefully. Harry couldn't help but notice the way she was looking at him.

"Everything okay Ella?"

"Mmm Hmm. You know..." She leaned forward in her chair. "I think you're a really great guy."

"Oh-kay." He blinked.

"And I have been pushing Maddie towards...this...since I first saw the two of you interact..."

"Oh?" His smile widened.

"Yes," she took a deep breath; contemplation taking hold of her mind. "I'm not sure if you know but...Maddie is my best friend. I absolutely adore her."

"I do know that," he nodded. "And she feels the same way about you." Ella agreed with a small smile.

"And she...tells me things..." Her voice was soft, quiet; wanting him to know that she was being serious. "Things about you. Well not you, but you and her."

"Ah..." He breathed; seeing where this was headed. "I would imagine that she does." He brought his hands together in front of him; leaning closer to her.

"And I would imagine, given you are who you are, that it probably takes a lot for you to trust somebody."

"I suppose it does," he admitted.

"And you don't know me at all," she shrugged and offered a smile. "I'm basically a stranger to you and yet, I know that this afternoon, Prince Harry of Wales flew to Bendal to kiss an American" doctor. That's...that's a lot of information to have."

"Ella, I..."

"But I just...I want you to know that, even though at times I seem flighty and a little crazy, I am actually trustworthy and...loyal. To Maddie." She looked towards the floor for a moment. "And I thought you should know that anything that I learn about you through girl talk will never go beyond me. I would never betray Maddie's confidence and...I don't know. I just thought that maybe it might help if you knew that. Maddie trusts me. And you trust Maddie and...I just thought you should know. You don't know me. But you can trust me."

"Thank you Ella," his smile was genuine. "That means a lot. Though..." He moved to the edge of his chair and cleared his throat. "I think that you should know that I never doubted that about you. Not once."

"Really?" She was surprised.

"Of course not," he shrugged. "You and Maddie are...like brothers in arms."

"Sorry?" She raised her eyebrows.

"You've been to battle together." She could see the seriousness in his eyes. "You've stood over death together. There's really not a bond quite like that, is there?"

"No," she shook her head solemnly. "No, there's not."

"To trust Maddie is to trust you," he tried for a smile. "Though I appreciate you thinking of it...and me... You're a good friend."

"I really am," Ella grinned, the wilder version of her personality taking over.

"You really are what?" Maddie called out as she emerged from her office. Harry's attention completely diverted as he stood.

"You look fantastic," he grinned; leaning to kiss her cheek.

"Thank you. You would be surprised at what a new skirt can do for a girl."

"See, I was going to say the opposite," he watched her with adoring eyes.

"What a girl can do for a new skirt?" Ella asked, amused by the back and forth between them. "Well played. Hey, can I call you Prince Charming?"

"No," Harry laughed with a firm shake of his head. "You can never call me that."

"Fine..." She sighed dramatically. "Harry will do." Maddie laughed at her friend.

"Thank you," Harry smiled at her. "Shall we?"

"Absolutely," Maddie nodded.

"Ella?" Harry raised his eyebrows at her.

"Let's do this," standing Ella joined the two of them as they made their way outside of the complex and across the street to the Community Garden. As they rounded the main building, they could already hear the music playing, the laughter and conversation. And as soon as their presence was noticed, they were pulled right into the middle of it all.
And the night began. They all joined in on the picking of the foods from the garden. Harry carried a basket while Maddie and Ella added to the load. Once all of the ready items were harvested, Collins lead a group of children in the washing and preparing of a salad of sorts. There was a traditional dance and a blessing before they all enjoyed some of the fruits of their labor. And, as it grew darker, the kids began to disperse; running and playing and laughing. Though the food was put away for later consumption, the party continued; singing and dancing and a little drinking. Maddie joined Daniel, the other Psychologist who shared her office, in making the rounds; talking to the families they worked with. They knew that it was moments like this, moments where they could interact with the community in a neutral, relaxed setting that made their therapeutic moments more impactful. It was difficult for people to open up to somebody, even more so a stranger, even more so a stranger who looked nothing like them who was from another country. So they took advantage of these genuine moments of community to build those relationships; opening those barriers.

Harry, enjoying the complete lack of attention he was receiving, took a drink and slipped off to the side; watching the action unfold. Maddie chatted animatedly with an older couple while Collins worked with three little boys to show them how to complete a series of dance moves.

Khenda, finished with her role in the evening, spotted Harry sitting in solitude and was compelled to join him. She could remember the very day she met him. She was a young teenager and he was a short, scrawny little boy. He had come on a visit with his mother. Khenda had been the fortunate one chosen to escort the Princess and the young Princes around and had developed something of a relationship with them. A relationship that had withstood many, many years and one horrifying death. Choosing a drink for herself, she made her way over.

"Hi there," she grinned at the young man she had known for years; the boy she watched grow from a boy to the man who sat before her.

"Khenda," his face brightened as he rose to his feet. She leaned in to kiss his cheek and they sat together; one chair next to the other.

"You've done amazing work here," Harry waved a hand around the area.

"Thank you," she smiled. "Though I did nothing on my own. It takes a team. You know that."

"Yes," he nodded. "A team with a great leader."

"Well, thank you," she blushed slightly. "You seem happy, Harry."

"I am," he was quick to nod.

"No. I mean...happy." His eyes turned to meet hers for a beat.

"I am." And even he knew the helpless look that flashed across his face when he said it. But it didn't matter, he had no control over that any more.

"Wow," Khenda breathed with a chuckle.

"I know."

"Are you having a good night?" She looked pointedly at Maddie and he nodded. "Sitting back and watching?"

"Yes, I am," he sighed and leaned back in his chair. "I'm just...taking advantage of the time before the whole world knows. I can't sit back and watch once the whole world knows. Everything changes once the whole world knows." Khenda nodded her understanding. She had never been able to wrap her mind around all the attention that he and his brother and, before that, his mother had garnered—nor how difficult it would be to live that way.

"Tell me," she took a sip of her drink. "Is the whole world going to know about Maddie?"

"I don't know," he looked down, a soft smile on his face. "I haven't even talked to her about that yet. I haven't asked her...I thought it would be best to let the idea of me sink in...before I broached the idea of all the baggage that comes with me."

"Thoughtful."

"I try." He looked at the satisfied smile on her face. "Now you tell me. Was this your plan all along? When you called in a favor and asked me to come to the opening six months ago? You know her. You know me." His eyes focused on her intently. "Khenda, did you bring me down here with the intention that I would fall for her?" Steeling her expression, Khenda blinked.

"Have you fallen for her?" Though he remained absolutely silent, Khenda smiled wide. She didn't need an answer, she could see it in his face, in the way his eyes glazed over as he looked to where Maddie sat. When his gaze broke, he shook his head in confusion.

"Oh my God...What am I thinking?" He ran a hand over his face and into his hair. "I've only known her for six months."

"And?" Khenda shrugged.

"And I only just kissed her today..." Khenda fought to control her urge to clap her hands at the thought.

"And?" She raised her eyebrows in challenge.

"And we haven't even gone on a proper date. And...And this is crazy! Khenda, who falls for somebody they hardly know?!"

"You hardly know her?" Khenda balked. "Please. I know she talks to you every day. I know she talks to you about her father dying, about her mother wanting her to come home, about her desire to be here despite all of the evidence stacking up that she maybe should take a break. Hardly know her? Really now?" He knew she was right.

"But..." He stammered. Feeling gutsy, Khenda continued. She hadn't seen him this happy in a long time and she wasn't about to let him toss it aside because of something superficial.

"Are you telling me she hardly knows you?"

"No...she knows me. She..." He gulped; the conversations they had shared ran through his mind. "It's a little scary sometimes just how she knows me." Khenda watched him for a moment; watched him struggle, watched him stall and then, she reached out and placed a warm, comforting hand on his. He looked up to her; a vulnerable look in his eyes.

"Care for some advice? From a slightly older, though devastatingly stunning, sister-type person?"

"Yes," he breathed. "Please."

"Stop overthinking this. Just stop. If you were sixteen and had known her for six months, I would slap you around until you got your head on straight." Harry laughed at that.
"You know that nobody would stand by and just let you slap me around. You would get into a lot of trouble for that." He lifted his drink to his lips but Khenda remained serious.

"But you're not. You're almost thirty. You've...you've been to Sandhurst. You've been to war! You've grown up in this great big fish bowl and you've turned out so well."

"Ah Khenda, you're going to make me blush."

"Your mother would be so proud." She felt a lump in her throat as she brought her up.

"And now you're going to make me cry," his drink lowered; his eyes growing soft, his heart clenching in the way it always did when they talked about his mother.

"You know who you are, Harry. You know what you want, who you want." She sat in silence for a moment. "Go with your heart, Harry. Get out of your head and lead with your heart. How did she say it?" Khenda searched her mind for the famous quote from Diana. "If you find someone you love in your life, then hang on to that love."

"Some days, I hate that you knew her." Harry gulped.

"No you don't." Khenda squeezed his hand in hers.

"No. I don't." He squeezed back. A moment of contented silence settled over them as they thought of her.

"I'm sorry if I made you sad. That was the exact opposite of what I intended to do."

"You didn't," he shook his head, though his eyes remained soft; thinking of his mother, of Maddie, of what Khenda had said. "It's a lot to ask of somebody, Khenda." He nodded to Maddie. "The press, the gossip; it's endless and overwhelming. I can stop this all now and prevent all of that from happening for her. I can leave on Sunday and that could be it. The world doesn't know yet. It's not too late."

"Isn't it?" Her eyes met his and he knew exactly what she was asking. And she knew exactly what his answer was.

"God..." He breathed, feeling slightly uneasy at the realizations he was having that night. "I am in so much trouble."

"She's a big girl, Harry. She's tough and strong. She was a farm girl from rural Colorado. She has plowed fields and weathered devastating storms. She was the first person in her family to go to college. The first person. She made a decision to go, to start a new road for her family and now she has a PhD. She watched her dad battle cancer for ten years before he died and now...she's a rock for her mother. She spent her whole childhood in the same town and now...she's here. In Bendal working with children who need her help the most. She has seen more death and devastation than anyone should and she's still here; smiling and playing and helping these kids." Khenda smiled as she watched Maddie from a distance. "Do you know what it takes to go through those changes and come out as put together as she is? She's amazing...and she's strong and resilient and if all that she has faced hasn't shaken her, the machine that is the press isn't going to touch her."

Harry felt the lump in his throat again and laughed it away. What was with him tonight? He shook his head. This was all so new to him.

"I hope you're right..."

"Right about what?" Collins came from behind to join them.
"Nothing," Khenda smiled up at him and then, in a matter of fact way, "Harry's in love with Maddie."

"Khenda!" Harry's eyes grew wide as he looked to her with shock on his face.

"I can't say I'm surprised," Collins laughed as he kissed Khenda; taking a seat next to her.

"See!" Khenda waved her hand at Collins. "Time doesn't matter, Harry. You feel how you feel. And nobody is going to be that surprised."

"Can we keep this between us please?" Harry's voice lowered as he looked from Khenda to Collins. "It's just this kind of thing that sends women running for the hills."

"The hills?" Collins snickered.

"Not this woman. Not this time," Khenda shook her head. "But yes. My lips are sealed. That particular confession is all yours."

"How very sweet of you," Harry rolled his eyes.

"I try," she shrugged and, though the moment was full of lighthearted ribbing, their eyes met for a moment and they shared a glance full of depth and seriousness. And Khenda knew what a special thing she was witnessing; the beginning of something very, very big.

"Yes, well," Harry finished his drink and rested the glass on the ground. "I'm going to enjoy the party and go see if I can get the good doctor to join me in a dance."

"Ha!" Collins laughed. "Good luck. I've been working on her for over a year!"

"Well, I've been told I have a way with the ladies," Harry joked.

"Oh God help us!" Khenda rolled her eyes and watched as Harry made his way through the crowd of people laughing and dancing.

Harry approached Maddie just as she finished up with the couple she had been chatting with. Moving stealthily to her side, he lowered his voice.

"I need your help with something."

"Oh?" She turned to him, surprise lacing her smile. "What exactly did you need my help with?"

"Well, you see," he reached for her hand; causing her to shiver at his touch. "Collins has challenged me..."

"To a dual?" Maddie raised her eyebrows. "Pistols at dawn?"

"Ha!" He shook his head in amusement. "Worse."

"Worse?" She wrinkled her nose. "Sounds serious." She tried to focus on his words and not on how the way he stroked her hand made her skin tingle.

"It is," he nodded. "You see, he said that there was no way I would be able to come over her and convince you to dance with me."

"Okay, look..." She began her protest, but he continued.

"And I told him, he was crazy. That there was no way that Maddie Forrester was scared of something as simple and easy as dancing..."

"Scared?" She could feel the defiance bubbling up inside of her.

"I told him that was preposterous." He was getting the exact reaction he was looking for.

"Here's the thing..." Maddie took a calming breath. "I actually don't dance."

"You can't dance?"

"No." She hated the way his words made her rebel. "I can dance. I just...don't."

"Hmmmm. Why is that exactly?"

"I just...don't."

"Yeah," Harry shook his head. "That's not working for me. I mean...are you really going to let Collins win here?"

"I know what you're doing right now," her eyes narrowed wanting to kiss the smug look right off his face.

"Is it working?" He grinned.

"A little bit, yes," she huffed. "And I hate that it is."

"Come on," he moved closer to her; stepping into her space. "Come dance with me. Show Collins he has no idea what he's talking about."

"Harry..." Her protest was weakening.

"I'll owe you one Maddie...Please..." The way he was looking at her made it impossible for her to refuse him. "Don't let him be right about this. Dance with me..."

"Ohhhhh...." She shook her head but surrendered; allowing him to pull her towards the group. "You're good."

"I am," he agreed with a wink and, as they began to move with the music he looked up to where Collins and Khenda sat. Collins, with an impressed expression, offered Harry a salute before Harry turned his undivided attention back to Maddie.

"I can't believe I'm doing this," she shook her head as they danced.

"I can't believe you were so petulant about it," he grinned, moving closer. "You're doing fine."

"Please!" She laughed. "There's a slight chance your opinion is biased."

"There's a great chance," he pulled one of her hands up and over his shoulder, nudging her closer to him.

The heat was intense; outside and between the two of them.

Maddie breathed deep as she gave in to the moment, gave into the feeling. She could feel his hand at her waist as their hips swayed in time with the music, in time with each other. Feeling brave, she moved her other hand up around his shoulder; allowing her fingers to tickle the skin of his neck. His eyes were intense, his body so close. And for the life of her, Maddie could think of nothing else than her intense desire to kiss him.
"Harry..." She breathed; her voice barely audible.

"Hmm?" He lifted his eyebrows, leaning closer to her. But before she could even open her mouth to ask him, her mission was halted. Because a bright flash of lightning lit of the sky followed by an enormous clap of thunder and then, for the first time in a long time, the sky opened up and rain began to dump in buckets.

Screams of laughter rang out as the party-goers scattered; disbursing to buildings seeking shelter. Instantly drenched, Maddie looked up at the sky with humor across her face.

"See!" She yelled over the sound of the surprise storm. "This is why I don't dance! Something bad always happens when I do!"

"It's raining!" He laughed. "That's something good! Come on!" He held tight to her hand; pulling her with him in the direction opposite of the crowd. He opened the door to the greenhouse, moving them both inside and shutting the door.

"Wow..." Maddie breathed, looking down at her wet clothes, her hands wandering over her wet hair. "That came fast."

"Yes," Harry chuckled, shaking his head; water flying from his hair. When their eyes met, Maddie sucked in her breath. The wet clothing that clung to him stirred up something deep in the pit of her stomach. Harry smiled sheepishly, trying to cover for the way his pulse quickened as he looked her over.

"Well..." He looked slightly nervous as she approached him. "I think we have a little time alone in here while the rain settles."

"Yes," she nodded, stepping closer. "I believe we do."

"There was..." He took a breath. "There was actually something I wanted to talk to you about. Maybe we could..."

"Maybe..." Maddie took a step closer to him; invading his space. "Or maybe..." Her hands moved to rest on his chest; rising and falling with the calming breaths he was taking. "Maybe we could save the talking for later?" She peered up at him through lowered lashes.

"Why Doctor Forrester, are you coming on to me?" His hands moved around her then; resting on her hips and drawing her into him.

"Mmmmm." She nodded, tilting her head up towards his. "I am your highness. Is it working?"

And in answer, Harry offered a tiny smirk seconds before his head bowed to meet hers; lips seeking hers. And he knew; Khenda was right. It was much, much too late for him to turn back now.
Chapter 11

Maddie wasn't entirely sure what it was that made her blood so damn warm. It could have been a great number of things. Maybe it was because she hadn't really been kissed in a long time and her body had forgotten what this was like. Maybe it was because she had been drinking and was soaking wet. Or maybe it was because Harry had these amazing lips; firm and soft and making an art form out of the dance they were doing with hers.

Her hands were greedy as they traveled up his arms, over his shoulders; planting in the hair at the base of his neck and pressing him closer. She wanted more of this, so much more of this.
"Harry...." Her voice came out in a small moan, falling into his mouth and making him groan and she wondered if maybe she was making him just as crazy as he was making her.

This moment between them had started out slow and soft, with Harry asking silent permission for his actions. But when she called out his name like that, when she pressed her hands against him like that—his passion was ignited and he gave in to his instincts. Stepping closer to her, his mouth moved over hers, blazing a path across her cheek towards her jaw.

"I have...wanted to do this since..." His mouth blew warm air under her ear as he spoke. "Since you forced me to unload that truck six months ago."

"Oh?" She sighed at the rush she felt as he nipped and sucked at the soft skin of her neck. "You like to be bossed around huh?" Her voice dropped low and heavy. "I should make note of that."

He nodded in agreement; his eyes dancing as he pulled back just enough to smile at her, to offer her this warm, smug, smirk that took over his lips at the idea of her ordering him around. When she smiled back her promise to do just that, his want surged. His large, strong hands moved to her waist. With very little effort he lifted her up off the ground; placing her on the table she had been leaning against, bringing her up to his eye level. Full of desire, he nodded his head. "You really should."

"Mmmm..." She bit at her bottom lip, moving her legs to make room for him between them. His hands ran up and down her thighs as he leaned in and kissed her again. The heat between them was compounding with every stroke of his fingers, with every pass of his lips. Without putting much conscious thought to it, Maddie reached out and grabbed a fistful of his shirt, pulling him tighter to her.

And he went. With a groan his lips moved back to her neck. With a sigh, Maddie let her head fall back, granting him the access he was requesting. As he kissed and caressed his way from her chin to her collar bones, she felt nothing but warmth. Behind her pressed-closed eyelids, she could see nothing but deep, warm colors.

Harry's hands were hot as they slid up her throat, they were gentle when he cupped her face and tipped her head upright. And when he breathed her name against her lips, her eyes drew open and she smiled. When she caught the look in his eyes and her stomach flipped. There was so much going on in those deep blue eyes; it was almost too much to take in.

Their breathing was labored, their hearts pounding and everything around them seemed to have faded into the backs of their minds. Unable to pull her eyes from his, Maddie's hands released the bunch of shirt she had been holding onto and slipped down his chest, over his flat stomach and, with an absolute purpose in mind, she lifted the hem of his shirt. Sucking in a breath, her hands slipped up underneath; skin meeting skin.
And his mouth returned to hers.

His body had a visceral reaction to her touch; his muscles jumping and flexing under her fingers, a groan escaping his mouth, his lips pressing more urgently to hers.

Maddie's heart skipped at his response, her lips curling up into a smile as they kissed his. Spurred on, her fingers continued their glorious walk up his chest, taking the fabric of his shirt with them.

"Off..." She ordered with a breathless grin.

With a deep, rumbly chuckle, Harry nodded and stepped away from her, more than happy to oblige her, ready and willing to follow her orders. With her bottom lip tucked in between her teeth, Maddie watched him slip his shirt up over his head and hold it out to her—cheeky grin in place. Taking it from him, she sighed and, in the most unceremonious way possible, she tossed it to the ground.

Right next to the last of their resolve. As he moved back to her, they could feel months of phone calls and banter and flirting surging, tangling up between them. His fingers, once soft and gentle, were more insistent as they passed over her body. His hands ran down her sides, over her hips and along her legs that were tucking around him, that were bringing him in and closer to her. When he met the edge of her skirt, he took in a steadying breath, he swept aside the fabric and his fingers met the soft, warm skin of her thighs.

Shivering at his touch, Maddie's body arched out closer to his, longing for more of his touch; more of him. She could feel her mind slipping away from her, could feel her senses taking over and it was the most glorious thing she had felt in a long time. Maybe this was happening too fast, maybe they had only known each other for six months. But she didn't care. She was done trying to stuff her feelings for him into some controlled little box. She felt how she felt. And, in this moment, she felt amazing.

And he did too. Her hands passed over his wide, solid, bare chest as his slid up the slick skin of her legs. With their hands inching higher and higher, their mouths stayed locked together; lips pressing, tongues dancing. Maddie was quite certain she hadn't felt the heat that was radiating between the two of them in a very long time--if ever.

She wanted him; at a gut, instinctual level. Every part of her wanted him. Every inch of her skin was alive with want, itching for his fingers to take hold of her. As his fingers teased higher and higher under her skirt, Maddie's hands flattened out on his chest and gave him the lightest of nudges. Pulling his lips from hers, he watched with dark, heavy eyes as Maddie lifted her own shirt up and over her head.

Harry exhaled; deeply, painfully, at the sight of her there on the table, smiling up at him with bright eyes and a well kissed smile. His fingers pressed tighter against the flesh at her thighs and he pulled her closer to the edge of the table; closer to him. His motives were divided. While one hand continued the quest up her leg, the other moved out from under her skirt to meet his lips as they dipped to tease at the soft pink skin of her chest.

And it was good; no, it was great. Maddie's heart soared, this feeling of abandon and euphoria coursing through her veins. Her pulse quickened at every kiss from his lips, every swipe of his tongue, every soft caress from his strong, firm hands. She wondered if his lips could feel her heart pounding as they kissed across her chest. When the fingers under her skirt swiped higher, when the fingers on her chest slipped just under the strap of her bra, Maddie knew they were moving closer and closer to a decision she had never imagined she would be making this night.

She felt light and dizzy and so incredibly turned on.
Yes, this was unlike her. Yes, this was quick and unexpected. But yes...as he moaned against her stomach, she knew. She was absolutely going to do this.

As Harry kissed his way back up her stomach, through the peaks of her chest, she pulled his face to hers; her lips seeking the return of his. Feeling brave and bold and more certain of herself than ever, her hands moved to his waist; finding the buckle of his belt with ease. It was then, as she tugged him closer, as her fingers tucked into the waist of his jeans, that Harry felt himself pause. Confusing and surprising himself, Harry's hands left the warmth of her body and moved to stop hers.

"Wait..." He was nearly panting as his fingers circled her wrists, halting the progress she was making to unbuckle his belt.

"Sorry?" Maddie breathed; unsure she heard him correctly. "Is something wrong?"

"No, no," he shook his head. Gulping, he leaned to kiss her once, twice, and a third time before pulling back; searching her eyes. His fingers moved to sweep strands of hair from her face. "Nothing's wrong. Nothing's..." He kissed her forehead, fighting to settle the conflicting urges he was having. "Maddie...this..." He glanced down at their half-dressed bodies. "You really want this to happen now?"

"Yes," she breathed; her smile reaching her eyes. God did she ever. He couldn't help the grin that spread across his face at how sure she seemed.

"Here?" He raised his eyebrows; glancing around the small greenhouse with half a smirk on his face.

"Listen, if you don't want to do this..." Maddie began.

"Oh, I want to do this," he assured her quickly; pulling her tight to his body and she could feel him; hot and rigid and so evidently turned on. She leaned in, her lips finding his easily.

"Harry..." She moaned into his mouth as she kissed him. "Please..." Her eyes were hazy and half open as she looked up to him. "If you need me to, I can order you to..." With a crook of her eyebrow and a teasing smile, she leaned her body into his and she kissed him again.

And that was all it took. He tossed aside his reservations—reservations that had only been born out of concern for her—just like she had tossed aside both of their shirts. Wrapping his arms around her, he gathered her closer, gathered her tighter and they began to melt together.

Hot, slick skin. Warm, insistent mouths. Hands that couldn't quite seem to decide where they wanted to explore first. They were colliding and dancing and twisting up in each other and neither of them wanted it to stop.

"God Maddie..." He spoke feverishly against her skin.

"Mmmmm..." She smiled, reveling in the way he made her body feel. As his fingers found purpose and pushed at the thin straps to her bra, Maddie could feel the anticipation electric over her skin. But then, with a stir, she paused; her body sitting suddenly alert. "Wait...wait..."

"I'm sorry," Harry immediately removed his hands from her body, misreading her move as he took half a step back. "We can wait. We can..."

"Shhhh..." She grinned; placing her fingers over his lips to quiet him. "Do you hear that?" She pointed to the sky and, realizing her intent, he stepped closer and he listened.
"It sounds like..." His forehead creased. "Sirens?"

"Sirens..." Maddie's eyes flashed wide and she pushed at his chest to move him away from her. "Oh my God..." She jumped off the table, pulling on her shirt as he watched her, confused.

"Want to tell me what's happening?" He pulled his shirt over his head and followed her as she moved to the windows where she was trying to peer through the streaks of rain still falling from the sky.

"Something's wrong," she twisted her hair around, securing it up and out of her face with an elastic. "Those sirens are coming from the complex. Somebody has, quite literally, sounded the alarm. Something's wrong."

"Wait..." He watched, confused, as she pulled her shoes on. "Like what? What could be..."

"I don't know. There's been a bit of tension running through the community but...I don't know," she leaned up on her toes to press a kiss to his lips. "I'm going to go find out. I'll be right back." She moved away from him then, towards the door.

"Whoa. Hold on," He reached out; grabbing her arm. "I'll be right back?" He let out a light laugh, shaking his head at her. "I'm coming with you."

"No," she smiled, pulling her arm easily from his hold. "You're not."

"Excuse me?" His eyebrows shot up.

"I can't tell from here what's going on, Harry. It could be dangerous."

"You're joking, right?" His arms crossed over his chest.

"Not at all." She mimicked his posture.

"You know I've been to Afghanistan..."

"Yes Soldier," she nodded. "I know. But this is different."

"How?!"

"Listen, your security team might have been fine with you venturing in here alone with me, but I seriously doubt they would be fine with..." She sighed, placing her hand on his chest. "I can't do this right now. I have to go find out what is going on. Just...wait here. I'll go check it out and I'll be right back." Spinning on her heels, she moved towards the door.

"Oh yeah, that's definitely how this is going to go," Harry's voice was rich with sarcasm as he ignored everything she had said and followed her through the door. As the rain poured over head, they hurried through the garden, pausing under an overhang from another building. As soon as they stepped into the small bit of dry space, Maddie turned to him.

"Did you not hear a single word I said?!!"

"Did you really think I was going to wait in the greenhouse while you ran around out here..." His thoughts were cut off as the doors from the building opened and Ella emerged, surprised to see them.

"Hey!" She had the same business-like expression on her face that Maddie had.

"Hey," Maddie turned her attention away from Harry's defiance for a moment. "What's going on
"Hey," Maddie turned her attention away from Harry's defiance for a moment. "What's going on with the sirens?"

"No idea," Ella shook her head quickly. "I just heard them and am on my way over..." She looked them over and a smile spread over her face as the urgency of the situation faded briefly. "You know...I'm sure it's inappropriate that I noticed...and even more so for me to say something, but—your shirt is on inside out...your royal highness." Maddie's head snapped to look as Harry's face flushed red.

"Yes," he nodded, not even bothering to look down. "Yes of course it is. That's lovely."

"Ahem," Maddie shook her head at the moment. "The sirens."

"Yes," Ella clapped her hands together. "We should get over there. But just so you know...once the sirens stop...we're getting back to this."

"Sounds about right," Harry murmured and then the three of them set out again.

As they rounded the corner and emerged towards the street that separated the complex from the home for the children, things became clearer. There appeared to have been a car accident just up the block. Two cars had smashed into each other and into a building that was now burning. But that couldn't have been the only thing that had happened because, even over the sirens and the pounding rain, they could hear screaming coming from all around.

"Oh my God..." Ella called out and pointed. Harry and Maddie both looked to where she was pointing and saw, in multiple windows along the side of the complex, bullet holes with shattered glass.

A look passed between them; a look that spoke to the gravity of the situation.

And they broke into a run. As they neared the gate, they saw Collins running towards the complex from another direction.

"Collins!" Maddie called out to him. "What the hell happened?"

"I don't know!" He tried to yell over the rain. "Everyone moved inside when it started raining and then there was this loud crash and shots and..." As Collins told the story, Harry, out of the corner of his eye, thought he saw something move. He turned his head, squinting as he tried to focus in on it. And when he did, he saw a child balled up on the ground. Acting on instinct, he hurried towards her, the group following behind him. When he reached her, he knelt down next to her and could see more clearly. She had either fallen or had been pushed during the riot. Her leg was badly damaged with lots of blood and what he was almost certain was bone. She cried out that she couldn't move and, without thinking, Harry scooped her up into his arms.

"Let's get her inside," Collins waved for them to follow him. As they moved through the gates, Harry's security team came running towards them. A mixture of relief and grave concern on their faces as they insisted he come with them.

"No," he refused. "This is ridiculous..."

"Sir..."

"I am not going anywhere right now," Harry shook his head at the man. "Not when all of this is going on."

"But sir..."
"No."

"Harry," Collins' voice was authoritative as he addressed Harry, wanting to end this stand off before it even started. His mind was already working through all that needed to happen in this moment and he was in no mood to argue. "I'm sorry but...it will be easier for us to do our jobs if you let these guys do theirs." Harry met his eyes and opened his mouth to protest but, seeing the seriousness there, he decided against it.

"Fine," he nodded; surrendering. "Fine. Just let me take her inside and then I'll go wherever you'd like." Though Maddie could tell that it pained him to do so, he didn't want to hinder whatever it was that Collins was going to orchestrate in this situation. His team agreed quickly and they all continued on; the little girl still safely enveloped in Harry's arms.

Once they pushed through the doors, Maddie's heart leapt. Most of the staff was already running around, busy with other casualties of the chaos.

"Over there!" Ella yelled out, pointing towards a cot off to the side. They moved as a group and as Harry worked to lay the girl carefully on the cot, Ella's hands were pulling on gloves, already working.

"Maddie..." He started.

"You have to go," she glanced up at him as she reached for the little girl's hand. "That was the deal. You have to go now."

"Come with me?" He already knew the answer, but he had to ask.

"What?" Her eyes flashed to his for a second. "No. I can't go. They need me to..." A loud crash rang out over all of the noise in the room. All eyes turned towards the entrance as a man with wild eyes and a bloodied nose burst through the doors screaming at the top of his lungs. He looked around the room before his gaze focused on the little girl on the table between Maddie and Harry. Maddie, being closest to him, felt her heart thud. Something was off; she could tell.

She couldn't have been more right.

By the time any of them saw the gun, it was too late. He had pulled it from his pocket, aimed and fired. Maddie, acting only on instinct, turned her body to face him; her mind thinking only of the people who stood behind her.

The very next second, one of the men protecting Harry pulled his weapon and dropped the guy where he stood. Though it was one second too late.

Maddie's eyes met Harry's and she blinked; the pain she now felt pulsing from her shoulder almost blinding her. She had been shot in the shoulder. Of this she was absolutely sure. Looking at the source of the pain, she suddenly felt woozy; the amount of blood oozing from her shoulder making her sick.

"Maddie..." Harry's hands flew out to catch her as her knees buckled underneath her. "Khenda!"

He cried out for help.

"COLLINS!" Ella moved away from the little girl, towards her best friend. Her best friend who felt weak and dizzy and in so much pain.

Maddie blinked once. She could hear people hurrying around her. She could hear Khenda screaming out directions to the other staff. She could hear Ella shouting for somebody to hand her new gloves. She could hear Harry saying her name.

Maddie blinked twice. Something was happening to her senses. Maybe it was shock. She had never been in shock before. Her eyes were hazy. Her hearing dulled. And she had the strangest taste in her mouth; like copper pennies.

Maddie blinked a third time; a heavy-lidded third time. And her world went black.
Chapter 12

When Maddie awoke the first time, it took a moment for the confusion to fade. Blinking away the blurriness in her eyes, she looked around the room. She was in a hospital room—not a makeshift hospital room she had become accustomed to—but something with four walls, a door, guest chairs...

And Harry. Her eyes welled up and she breathed in relief at the sight of him.

He had pulled a chair over next to her bed, his head situated towards her feet so he could see her. He was reclined back and, with a blanket draped clumsily over him, was fast asleep.

Smiling despite the dull ache she felt in her shoulder, Maddie looked around again; taking inventory of her surroundings. There was a security guard stationed outside her door—no doubt due to Harry’s presence. It was still dark outside, still night time though she couldn't tell for sure if was still the same day or very early the next morning. Her shoulder was wrapped up in bandages, held close to her in a sling. She had an IV in her other arm and there was a tube pushing oxygen into her nose.

And her throat was unbelievably dry. Swallowing, she reached for the cup of ice and water she could see on the stand next to her. The movement brought about a stabbing pain from her shoulder. She hissed through her teeth as she grabbed the cup and laid back against the bed. Harry, having heard her slight movements through his weak attempt at sleeping, stirred and opened his eyes. Seeing she was awake brought a wide smile to his face. He blinked and sat forward; his blanket falling to the side.

"Maddie..." He breathed, his hand folded around hers. Relief washed over his face as he moved to stand; kissing her softly and carefully.

"Where am I?" She asked as he moved to sit back down; pulling his chair closer to the head of the bed, keeping her hand in his.

"South Africa," he answered. "You had surgery after you were airlifted here. You've been out for a few hours."

"Are you..." She squeezed his fingers. "Are you okay?" She looked him over.

"Me?" His eyes flashed wide. "Yes, Maddie. I'm fine. You..."

"And everyone else?" She cut him off, her mind reeling back to what had happened to land her here. "Is everyone else okay?"

"Yes," he nodded. Though he wanted to focus all of his attentions on her, he could understand her need for more information. "There was a bit of a scuffle. Collins broke his arm. He's actually here in the hospital...somewhere..." Harry had no idea where, he hadn't left this room. "Khenda is with him and she's fine. Ella is here. They had an extra room down the hall, she went there to get some sleep. She put in a hell of a night but she's okay." His eyes grew dark as he remembered the details. "My security team took out the shooter right after he..." His eyes traveled to her shoulder; growing teary as he took it in.

"I'm fine..." Her voice was warm, soft; reassuring.

"But..." He croaked.
"It was just my shoulder," she winced as she thought of it. Seeing this, Harry reached for the clicker laying next to her good hand.

"Here," he slipped into her hand. "Use this. It will help." Nodding, she pressed the button.

"My mother..."

"I called her," he hurried to ease her concern. "I hope that's okay. I didn't want her to worry. She wanted to come..."

"She's not coming here, is she?!" Maddie grew slightly panicked.

"No," he shook his head. "She doesn't have a passport Maddie. I told her I would keep her updated and I would have you call when you could."

"Okay," she breathed; not wanting her only remaining parent anywhere near some of the things she had seen. Maddie relaxed slightly. "My mother taking a call from Prince Harry of Wales," she grinned slightly. "I wish I could have heard that conversation."

"Yes, well," Harry smiled. "She didn't seem all that surprised to hear that I knew you." Maddie blushed slightly.

"I may have spoken of you once or twice," she shrugged then; a simple action that made her cry out in excruciating pain. He moved to his feet at once; cringing at her pain.

"Don't do that," his fingers brushed at the hair on her forehead. "Just sit back and relax. The medicine will kick in soon..." Her eyes grew heavy as he continued to stroke her hair. She blinked heavily and smiled up at him.

"You snore, you know?"

"Oh?" He smiled down at her adoringly.

"Mmm Hmm..." She sighed then, her eyes closing completely. And then, with much warmer images in her mind, the medicine took over and she went to sleep.

The second time Maddie woke up, she woke to a warm, unassuming smile from a young nurse. It was still night and Harry was in the same chair, in the same clothes; though clearly more relaxed. The nurse moved around her, checking the numbers on the machines before she reached for her arm; needing to check her blood pressure, pulse, etc.

Maddie smiled at her and asked what she knew about her condition. In hushed tones, the nurse explained a great deal to her. She explained how the bullet had entered her shoulder, barely nicking a bone as it did. She explained that the bullet had never exited and how the surgeon had to remove it. Yes, there would be an extensive recovery time; one to two weeks in the hospital, three months in the sling with physical therapy. With luck and hard work, she could be healed completely in three to six months. She was lucky, the nurse informed her. They were all very lucky.

Maddie nodded and thanked her before pressing the button again. This time, the medicine took over with great ease and Maddie drifted back to sleep.
The third time she awoke, it was finally morning. The sun had finally risen, giving the horrible night before cause to leave. Squinting at the light, Maddie could see that Harry was gone, but the sound of movement next to her told her she was not alone.

"Good morning," an accented voice, slightly different from Harry's came from the other side of her bed. Turning slowly, she settled on the source of the voice; recognizing him instantly. Maddie took a deep breath. "I'm sorry, I didn't mean to startle you. I promised my brother I would stay with you till he returned from a phone call..." He rose to his feet, offered her a smile and moved closer. "I'm William; Harry's brother."

"Yes, I..." She nodded as her dry throat caused her voice to crack. "I'm sorry. I'm..."

"Maddie," his smile widened slightly, reaching out to shake her good hand. "Yes. I know. I've heard a great deal about you. Here, let me..." He moved towards her nightstand and gestured towards the cup of ice and water. "Can I get you some water?" She cleared her throat and nodded.
Without hesitation, he brought the cup to her, bringing the straw to her lips.

"Thank you," she smiled; her voice returning. "It's nice to meet you."

"You as well," William sat the cup back on the stand and returned to his chair. "Is there anything I can get for you?"

"No," she shook her head. "Thank you though."

"I think maybe it is I who should be thanking you," he looked down at his hands and then back up to her.

"Whatever for?"

"Well, by all accounts of the night, you just may have saved my brother's life." Maddie exhaled at the absurdity of the thought.

"I hardly..."

"You did," he insisted. "Had you not moved when you did, the bullet would have hit him...only not in the shoulder." He met her eyes. "Intentional or not...you saved him."

"No." Maddie shook her head. "That's...That is crazy."

"Well," Harry stepped into the room with a smirk; the door closing behind him. "It's good to see you still have that defiant streak in you," he crossed his arms and looked to her. "Did I really just hear you call the future King of England crazy?"

Maddie's eye went wide with panic. "I...I'm sorry. I..."

"Stop," William shook his head at his brother. "He's joking."

"I'm not," Harry grinned at her. Maddie was happy to see that the fear in his eyes had faded; giving way to this witty, happy look she was used to. Even if it was at her expense.

"Don't you think she's been through enough?" William turned to her then. "There's no need for formalities here, I assure you." The two brothers shared a smile that was born of mutual respect and a lifetime of brotherly ribbing before Harry turned his focus back to her.

"How are you feeling this morning?" He moved to her side, reaching for her hand.
"Better," she smiled as he brought her hand to his lips for a kiss. "You were on the phone?"

"My commander," he sighed with a quick glance at William. "I am due to report back on Sunday." Ah yes, she thought, he had only been coming to Bendal for a few days before going back for more training.

"Is everything okay?"

"Yes," he nodded. "He had heard what had happened and was checking to make sure I was okay and on schedule to return as planned."

"And you are...right?"

"Yes," Harry smiled. "Due in no small part to you."

"Oh are you going to start in with that too?" She rolled her eyes.

"See!" Harry glanced at his brother. "What did I tell you?"

"What did you tell him?" Maddie's eyes narrowed at Harry and William laughed at the exchange. Before Harry could open his mouth to save himself, the doors to the room opened and Ella burst through, her eyes moving directly to Maddie.

"You're awake!" She exclaimed, her eyes instantly filling with tears. "God Maddie I've been so damn..." She did a double take and stopped in her tracks. "Your Royal Highness..." Harry chuckled as Ella curtsied slightly to William.

"Ah..." Harry exhaled. "This is great. Ella, this is my brother William. Will, this is Ella, she's a nurse who worked with Maddie in Bendal and Maddie's best friend."

"Nice to meet you," William rose to shake her hand.

"The pleasure is all mine," Ella smiled sweetly and then moved to hug Maddie; being mindful of her shoulder. Under her breath, she muttered, "just gets stranger and stranger around here every day."

"You're telling me," Maddie smiled, kissing Ella's cheek. "So..." She looked from Ella to Harry and back again. "I'm awake and, surprisingly not completely dazed. Who wants to fill me in?"

Ella and Harry looked at each other, sadness clouding their eyes as they remembered the horrible experience they had shared.

"I'll go?" Ella raised her eyebrows at Harry who nodded. She moved to sit at the foot of Maddie's bed and, in a quiet voice, she began to catch Maddie up to what they knew. "Apparently the irritations that had been rumbling in the outskirts had escalated to some fighting in the surrounding neighborhoods during the day and, as the day grew on, the fighting spilled over into the area around the Community Center. Right after the rain started, a few cars slammed into one of the buildings. They sort of...exploded and the building caught on fire—though the rain certainly helped with that." Ella swallowed and continued. "The two rivaling sides were blaming the other for the accident and the arguments escalated. And the shooting began. People were running for safety and...most of the injuries from that night were from the mob trying to flee. Though...there were some bullet injuries," her eyes rested on Maddie's shoulder. "Thankfully, the only fatalities were the drivers of the cars and...and the guy who shot you." Ella had to press her lips into a thin, tight line to keep from crying.

"Hey..." Maddie reassured her with a smile.
"There were a few other doctors who were injured; there was quite the scuffle after you were shot. Each side didn't like that we were treating the other side. But after you were hit, double-oh-seven out there," Ella waved towards Harry's security team. "Took out the shooter. This guy calls in the cavalry..."

"Not exactly the cavalry," Harry offered with a smile.

"And they airlifted you, Collins, and a few others out."

"And the complex? I know there were shattered windows...anything else?"

"There were minor damages to the garden when everyone ran, but nothing that can't be fixed."

"Is that all?" Maddie took a deep breath; feeling better now that she knew the extent of the fallout.

"I think so..." Ella looked to Harry who nodded.

"Okay," Maddie sighed. "Okay. And Collins?"

"Just down the hall," Ella smiled. "He's doing great though. Cussing his new cast."

"Of course," Maddie chuckled. "So what happens next?"

"I'm sorry?" Harry raised his eyebrows.

"Well," she fought her urge to shrug. "You're leaving on Sunday, right?"

"Yes," Harry nodded, saddened at the thought. "My father offered to call and do what he could to postpone that but..."

"That's not really who you are," Maddie finished his sentence.

"No," he smiled up at her; thankful for her understanding. "Though I could, if you wanted me to." William's eyes went wide at what his brother was offering.

"Of course not," she shook her head. "You're leaving on Sunday. The nurse last night told me that I could be here for two weeks..." She looked to Ella. "What about you? Collins? What happens in Bendal?"

"I don't know," Ella's eyes were sad even as she offered a smile. "The incident brought a lot of international attention and..." Maddie noticed Harry look away; feelings of guilt evident on his face. Surely, had he not been there when it all happened, it wouldn't have made such a hit in the news. "And they have to go in and assess the damages, the security threats. Once they okay our re-entry, we can go back and repair the damages and, hopefully, get back to what we were doing before."

"Good," Maddie nodded.

"But Maddie," Ella reached her hand out, resting on her friend's leg. "You were shot. You have a long recovery ahead of you. I doubt they are going to let you..."

"Let me?"

"Let you go back any time soon." Maddie's head sank deeper into the pillow as tears threatened at her eyes. She knew Ella was right. There were protocols and procedures in place; to prevent burnout, to watch for PTSD. She knew it and she understood it. But it didn't mean she liked it. She blinked at her tears, wishing them away.
"I'm so sorry, Maddie," Harry's voice was soft as his fingers stroked her arm.

"It's fine," she shook her head, though the one tear that slipped from her eyes defied her statement. "It will be fine." She took the tissue Ella held out to her. "What can I do, you know?"

"You can heal," Harry shrugged. "You can make sure you take the time you need to heal."

"Yeah," she sniffed and took a deep breath. "Yes I can."

"And...you can have this..." He held his hand out to her, full of her favorite candy. "I smuggled them in for you. But don't tell that nurse. I'm afraid of her." The candy had the intended effect. Maddie grinned wide as she reached for one of them. His eyes twinkled in delight as she opened it and took a bite.

"Thank you," she breathed; feeling slight, slightly better.

"For the candy?" Harry's face scrunched up. "You saved my life, it's really the least I could do."

"Oh God," Maddie rolled her eyes. "You're never going to let that go are you?"

"Never." He assured her.

And so it began.

Eventually they disbursed. William returned to England that afternoon, after making sure his brother was safe and protected; after wishing Maddie a speedy recovery. Khenda visited during lunch time and had only reiterated what Ella had told her. They would know more in a day or two, but as of that second; everything was suspended.

And Harry, feeling terrible about all of it, remained by her side until the absolute last minute possible. At which time, he told her he would be unreachable for ten days. He told her if she needed anything to call his brother; he had programmed his number into her phone. Maddie felt slightly uneasy at having such access, but she agreed; as it was the only thing that would get him to back off. He kissed her, softly and carefully, promised to see her as soon as he was finished. And then, after privately imploring Khenda to watch after her, he left the hospital to board his plane home.

As he flew away, he accepted the truth that had been inside him all along. His heart was completely surrendered; it was all hers. Now all he had to do was figure out how this complicated situation could begin to play out. With him in England going through training he was likely to never use and her in a hospital in South Africa recovering, neither of them had any idea what their future held; except they both knew, without a doubt, that it had to include the other—even if they weren't ready to admit that out loud.
Chapter 13

The next ten days of Maddie's life were the most draining she had experienced since her father's death; physically, mentally and emotionally. The immediate days after her surgery had been full of pain and adjustment and, after Harry left, her focus turned to recovery. Physical Therapy began as soon as her treating doctor gave the green light. Maddie had never been more thankful for the friendship she had developed with Ella. The young nurse never left her side. She was there to make her laugh; providing light conversation and amusing tales. She was there to make her work; taunting her as the Physical Therapist pushed her to do more.

As the days continued, her mood would rise and fall. Some days were great, her PT would go well, the pain would be mild and her outlook was good. Then the very next she would wake in pain, with an achy body and a dulled motivation, PT would be frustrating, and her optimism would fade. It was such a roller coaster of emotions. None was as much as the day Khenda came into her room to update her on the situation in Bendal.

The proper authorities had gone in to inspect the area and had eventually deemed it "safe" enough to return. Doctors Without Borders would be allowed back in. However, DWB had some guidelines for how the staff would be allowed back and who would be allowed to go back in. Most of the personnel had been evacuated to South Africa after the incident. A large portion of the old team would be heading back to help with reparations and then a new crew would take over while the old team were sent on a recovery break. Ella, Khenda and Collins would be going to help repair the complex and then Ella would head out. Khenda and Collins would be staying in Bendal, but only because they had their own personal residence. Khenda informed Maddie that they were in the process of bringing everyone who would be headed back to Bendal to one central location before they went back.

And then, with very sad eyes, Khenda told Maddie that, though she was being released from the hospital, she would not be allowed to go with the rebuild team. Her injuries were too extensive, her recovery time too intense. They would be in and out before Maddie would be recovered enough to help and at that point, the new crew would be in place and she would be sent off.

And Maddie hated it. In two days' time, she would be released from the hospital and be attending a reception for everyone heading into Bendal the next day, but she wouldn't be a part of the group. She felt rejected and let down and more frustrated with herself and her situation than she probably ever had been before in her life.

She hated being told no, hated that there was nothing she could do about it. She hated everything about it. But how she felt didn't matter. This was just how it was. Rules were put into place for a reason and she had no choice but to suck it up and deal with it.

Khenda wasn't full of only bad news. With a knowing smile, she sat on the edge of Maddie's bed and with a lowered voice told her that she had received communication from London informing her of an unexpected royal guest. It seemed Harry was anxious to attend the send-off for the workers returning to rebuild. He would be flying in immediately following the conclusion of his training and would be going to the reception where he would address the group the night before they embark on their efforts.

Harry was coming.

Processing it all felt like a whirlwind, a true roller coaster of emotions. She would be released from the hospital, but would not be going back to Bendal. That alone was devastating. And the thought of sitting through a reception that would serve as a reunion and motivator for the expedition...the expedition she would not be on, made her incredibly sad. But Harry would be there and that, as crazy as it sounded, managed to leave Maddie on a slight upslope.

It had been so long since she had heard his voice, since she had taken in his laugh. She had expected as much, she had known that she wouldn't hear from him during his training. He had told her before he left that he would be virtually unreachable while at training. She had, however, received one phone call from William. He was warm and friendly and had heard she was being released and wanted to check in on her. She had smiled, assured him she was fine, and then thanked him for his concern.

Maddie was released the day before the reception, the day before Harry was set to arrive. DWB had been kind enough to set her up with a room at the hotel where everyone was gathering before they went back to work. So she moved into the room, hung up her dress for the evening and, after arranging her toiletries in the bathroom, after flipping mindlessly through a magazine on the desk, she sank down onto the bed with a sigh.

And her mind drifted to him.

Things had been so good, so close between them when he had been there last. The night in the greenhouse when they had almost, the days following the shooting when he had stayed at her side; bringing her water, making her laugh. She had been so sure, so confident about him, about her; about them. But, as time had passed, as so many things in her life had been shaken up, her insecurities had gotten the best of her and she was slightly unsure how things would go when he arrived. Khenda told her she was being ridiculous; that his affections were not that easily swayed. And Ella reminded her that she had been standing next to Harry the night Maddie had been hurt, she had seen his reactions, the look in his eyes, and there was absolutely no doubt in her mind how he felt about her.

"Just wait and see," Ella assured her.

And she did. She waited. With pent up frustrations and a shaky self-confidence, she waited.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

When the morning of the reception arrived, Maddie was already starting the day out with a deficit. She hadn't slept well the night before and when she woke up, she was achy and sleepy and moody. Right away she had an uneasy feeling about the day. She had woken early, taken another pill and tried to sleep more. Instead, she drifted for an hour and woke feeling more groggy than she had before.

She attended her PT session with Ella along for provocation. It was rough and left her sore but she continued to push. When the day gave way to the night, Maddie dressed for the event and, with no small amount of butterflies in her stomach, she joined her friends in the grand reception hall to begin the evening. She knew she should be happy, she was happy. But there were too many things churning in her stomach, too many mashed up feelings to see clearly. She was exhausted and her body ached and all of those things did nothing to help the anxiety she felt about her impending reunion with Harry. A very large part of her wanted nothing more than to go back up to her room, curl up in her bed and spend the night in the dark—away from all of it.

But that wasn't her fate for the night and, despite it all, the party began. There were cocktails and appetizers; music and laughter. They were all so excited that; excited to be together, to see their colleagues. The room was practically buzzing with life. They were excited that they were being allowed back to Bendal, back to their work. Those from the old shift were excited to go back to restore their home to what it had been. And those from the new shift were excited to get to work, to step foot on the red sands of Bendal.
Naturally, everyone was over the moon to see those among them who had been injured up and about, alive and healing. Maddie in her sling and Collins in his cast were quite the pair; trading tales about the best ways to navigate around menial tasks with their respective limitations. And, despite her initial sullen mood, Maddie found the energy in the room to be contagious. She was surprised to catch herself laughing and enjoying the conversations about the place she had loved so much, surprised at how much she enjoyed watching the seasoned vets bringing the new people up to speed.

Of course, there was a steady hum of gossip about the Prince; the Prince who was coming straight from training to be there for this night. The Prince who had been there the night it had all come crashing down. They felt a sort of brotherhood with him and they were all honored that he thought enough of them to come to the event. Every time somebody mentioned him, which was often, Maddie's stomach would flip over; battling between a deep desire to run far away to hide and an innate need to run straight into his arms.

She was sitting at a table laughing with Collins and Ella when he arrived. She could tell the very second he stepped through the doors as an audible reaction rippled through the room. Before she could think about it, her eyes darted reflexively towards the center of the excitement.

And there he was.

Her heart thudded, her lungs paused, and all of the feelings that had been building before he left came flooding back to her. Maddie's cheeks flushed as she looked him over. He must have slept and changed on the airplane because he was wearing a suit and tie and looked more rested and put together than she did.

As he walked through the doors and into the room, she could see he had a small group of people with him; one of which was clearly a reporter out of England, taking notes as he moved. Maddie smirked as she watched; knowing he must be loving that particular tag-a-long. But, since he was now publicly involved in what had happened, what was happening, the public was too. He immediately went into work mode, shaking hands and greeting people. As he worked, the buzz in the room began to dissipate; people settling back to what they were doing as he made the rounds.

"Hey Doc," Collins smiled at her; a knowing look in his eye.

"Collins?" Maddie smiled back.

"Want to go over and say hello?" Collins nodded his head towards where Harry stood in a small group. Though Maddie recognized the teasing look in Collins eyes, she really only thought for a second before she left her chair.

But as she closed the distance between them, her stomach was in knots. With every step she took towards him, it twisted up more and more and she felt a slight panic begin to creep in. It had been so long since they spoke, it had been so crazy when he left. What did she even say? What did she do? She glanced nervously at the reporter standing at his side, at the other people surrounding him, at those who were watching. At the last minute, she decided to do what Ella had suggested. She would follow his lead.

If somebody had been paying close attention to Harry's face in that moment, they would have noticed the instant he saw her. His entire face lit up, his smile stretched all the way to his eyes and he made a small move, as if to go to her.

They also would have seen the very moment he caught himself; the very moment his surroundings came back to him. With a side glance at the reporter with him, he quickly schooled his reaction; putting a warm smile on his face and planting his feet firmly on the ground.

If somebody had been able to read his mind, they would have known just how confused he was about what to do next. They would have been able to see the battle going on inside his struggling mind.

He and Maddie, they weren't 'among friends' in this room. This wasn't Khenda's living room or Maddie's office in Bendal. This was a reception hall full of people taking pictures, a reporter taking notes. Harry battled internally about how this moment was going to unfold, knowing that depending on which side won, this could be a moment that was calm and insignificant. Or it could be blown wildly out of proportion.

Because he hadn't been able to talk to her first, because they really hadn't ever had a chance to talk about what it all meant, he decided to go with the safer route. He decided to hold his ground, to maintain his composure—at least until he had a chance to talk to her.

As she approached the group, he tried desperately to meet her eyes, tried to convey his thoughts, but he couldn't catch her gaze.

Maddie was too busy to catch the look on his face, too busy searching the room for a source of support, for some divine guidance for this moment. She was too busy taking deep breaths and mentally preparing herself for this moment.

This moment that would ultimately be full of misunderstanding. This moment that would leave them both more confused than they had been before.

Before Harry could catch her eyes, before Maddie would read his mood, she was finally there. Standing in front of him. And all of the awkwardness that could have materialized did. Everyone seemed to stall, to pause and nobody seemed to know what to do next. Finally it was Collins, never afraid of taking the lead, who stepped up first.

"Your royal highness," Collins bowed his head slightly to Harry; the presence of the reporter taking precedence over any lack of formality Collins had grown accustomed to.

"Collins, it's wonderful to see you," Harry extended his hand to greet him. Turning to the reporter, he explained. "Collins was the gentleman in charge of logistics at the complex. And this," he turned a controlled smile to Maddie. "This is Doctor Forrester. She was a Child Psychologist I met in Bendal." Trying to fight his urge to pull her to him, Harry avoided meeting her eyes. "Doctor."

"Your highness," she brought a smile to her face and dipped in a small curtsy; confused and unnerved by the coldness she thought she read in his demeanor.

"This is Harold," Harry explained. "He is a reporter with a local London paper. He's here covering the event for the people back home." Harry stayed focused, hoping beyond hope that they couldn't hear the way his heart sped up at her presence.

"Good to meet you both," Harold nodded his hellos.

"Ah look!" Harry exclaimed, catching Khenda out of the corner of his eye. Thankful for a reason to step away from Maddie before he did anything that would bring all of the attention to her, he moved to lead the reporter towards Khenda. "Let me introduce you to the site Director. She's fantastic and, I'm sure, will be able to answer some more questions for you. It was good to see you both." And then, with a small, curt nod to Collins and Maddie, he let his eyes meet Collins' for a split second before leading the man away from them.

"Oh..." Maddie stood, rooted to her spot, as sadness washed over her. She watched as he walked away from her without so much as a passing glance and her stomach lurched. What the hell had just happened? She looked to Collins with wide, teary eyes. Struggling to maintain control over her tired mind, Maddie swallowed the lump in her throat. "Well that was..."

"Don't do it," Collins was quick to shake his head; knowing exactly where her mind was headed. "You don't know what that was about. He was with a reporter. He just walked from military training to a plane into this event. All eyes are on him. Don't assume that had anything to do with how he feels about..."

"Shh..." Maddie waved her hand; taking a breath. "I'm sorry. I don't want to...I don't want to talk about it right now." And she didn't. She knew she was being irrational. She knew that her mind and her heart weren't at 100%. She knew she had been through a lot and that she was tired and emotional and that, under normal circumstances, this would roll off her back.

But these weren't normal circumstances and, as much as she hated it, his dismissal hurt.

"Come on Doc..." Collins wrapped his good arm around her good shoulder; steering her back to their table. "You know that he..."

"Collins," her voice was still quiet but more direct. She was cracking on the inside; deflating. "Please. I can't talk about this without crying. And I know that it's crazy and that it's irrational. And I really don't want to be that girl."

"You're not that girl. You've been through a lot and you're tired. But he..."

"Collins," her glare met his eyes and, in interest of self-preservation, he backed down.

"Fine," Collins nodded, not wanting to push.

"Fine," Maddie took a breath and let it out slowly. "Fine."

Before anything else could be said on the matter, the event began. Maddie was ever thankful for the distraction, thankful that she would be able to focus on something other than her unexplainable emotional reaction. She knew better than this! Had that bullet that hit her shoulder also impacted her brain?! She hated that she felt this way, so uneasy, so unsure. And she hated that there seemed to be nothing she could do to shake it.

Sipping her water, she forced herself to focus on the event. Setting her glass on the table, she turned her eyes to the stage just in time to see him. Taking the stage with the command and grace he had fine-tuned over the years, he looked out at the crowd and began. Maddie sat, glued to her seat, as Harry gave quite an emotional speech about what he had seen during his visits to Bendal; the very worst and the very best. He talked about the hard work they had all put in or were about to put in. He talked about a very deep, personal connection he had developed to the region and he wished them all the best of luck with their endeavors. He was saddened that he would not be able to join in the efforts, but he was quite sure that his involvement would only hinder their progress and he wanted, more than anything, for them to be able to get back to the work they adored. As he finished, the room rose to their feet with applause and Maddie, with a lump in her throat, couldn't help but think that there was a part of him that was talking to her, about her. This deep connection that she had thought they shared. His words had spoken to her in a deep, profound way and she knew he had felt it too.

And just like that, she had never felt more confused.

It had been a roller coaster of two weeks. Everything seemed to be up in the air; her relationship with Harry was no exception. He had stayed in her room for three days straight, followed by ten days of silence, then her excitement to see him being tampered down by his cold, calculating response to seeing her. And then there was this speech, this speech that brought up all of the bonds they had shared. She was having a hard time figuring out which way was up.

Maybe it was good that she was being forced to take a break. Maybe her mind needed a rest.

Maddie's eyes scanned out over the room, finally finding him talking to one of the new doctors who would be leaving the next day. As if he felt her gaze, his eyes rose to meet hers and, from across the room, he managed to tug at her heart. Glancing down at her hands, Maddie took a deep breath. The stress of it all was becoming difficult. She had only been released from the hospital the day before. She was still on pain medication and this up and down of emotions when it came to him was exhausting. When her eyes rose to look at him again, he was already gone; being pulled in another direction. And something inside of her surrendered a little. If this wasn't going to happen, she wasn't going to fight. She had very little fight left in her as it was.

With a sigh, Maddie decided it was time to retire. She was tired and in pain and wouldn't have been able to stay up and party with the newcomers. It was their night to celebrate. But it was time for her to go to bed. Saying her goodnights to Khenda, Collins, and Ella, she managed to speak to a few other colleagues before she slipped quietly out the side door and to her room.

Taking her time, she walked slowly through the large, opulent main lobby. She stopped at the small shop to purchase a ginger ale and some crackers. She needed to take her medicine and her stomach was in such knots. Taking the stairs instead of the elevator, she felt that she had a chance to wind down before trying to sleep.

She quickly opened the door to her room and moved inside. It took her some time to put her pajamas on and just as she moved to step into the bathroom to wash her face and get ready for bed, she heard a knock at her door. Though her mind wondered who it might be, something in her heart already knew.

"Maddie, it's me. Harry..." And her heart leapt into her throat. This wasn't going to be as easy as she had hoped.
"Maddie..." His knuckles were soft on the door as she stood on the other side, debating if she was going to open it or not.

You're being ridiculous, she told herself. If this was it, if he was there to tell her they were done, she wanted to get it over with. Taking deep breath, she forced her insecurities to quiet down and she swung open the door. He smiled wide at the sight of her.

"Look at you..." His eyes scanned her, unbelievably happy to see her. "You have jammies." The look on his face, the tone of his voice—it took all she had not to cave, her mind hazy from the meds, tired from the day.

"What can I do for you sir?" Her cold response gave him pause. The way she tacked on the sir at the end made his eyes narrow in confusion.

What was this? Maybe she had changed her mind about him. Maybe during her recovery she had come to her senses and decided this wasn't for her; that he wasn't for her. Maybe she had decided that the baggage that came with him—simply wasn't for her. Though it broke his heart, he understood.

"Sir? I'm sorry, can I come in?" Though she knew that she should probably shut the door in his face if she had any hope of remaining strong, she really didn't want to have this particular conversation in the hallway. Nodding, she stood aside and allowed him to enter. She noticed that he had lost his suit coat and loosened his tie; and he was carrying a backpack with him. Shutting the door behind him, she took a deep breath and steeled her nerves before turning to face him.

And it was a good thing because the soft look on his face was disarming. He smiled wide and his eyes twinkled.

"Maddie..." He breathed moving to take a step towards her. Seeing the stone look in her eyes halted his movements; keeping him from going directly to her.

"What can I do for you?" She raised her eyebrows, barely hanging on to the tiny bit of control she had over herself. Still not understanding her need to do so. Maybe it was the pain pills she had taken, maybe it was her intense desire to just let her mind rest. Maybe her stubborn, defiant streak was making a comeback in the strangest place possible.

"What can you..." His lips curled down into a frown. "Okay. What is happening right now?"

"You tell me," Maddie countered; he truly was the only one that could clear things up at this point.

"Me?" He pointed at his chest. "I don't know. When Khenda told me you left, I...I thought maybe you were sick or...Maddie, today I left right from training and flew here to see you..." He trailed off.

"Why?" She arched her eyebrows. "Why would you come all of this way if you were just going to brush me off? You could have ended things over the..."

"Ended things?!" His face registered utter shock. "Brush you off? Maddie that's absurd. That's..."

"Absurd?" Maddie laughed bitterly.

"Yes! Why would I brush you off, Maddie I..."
"I don't know. I haven't quite..."

"...Maddie, I'm in love with you..." The words were out of his mouth before he could stop them; surprising the both of them.

"...figured it out yet...wait." Her entire thought process came to a screeching halt. "Wait. What?"

"I..." He exhaled. He hadn't wanted it to come out this soon. He really hadn't wanted it to come out like that, but it was too late. There she was, watching him with wide eyes; waiting for him to continue, waiting for him to explain. "I know that it sounds...irrational but I am."

"Wh...wh...?" Maddie stammered, her mind had been swirling around in confusion all day, gaining speed and momentum in her spiral. But his words had drawn her to a complete and sudden stop.

"I knew it before I left you ten days ago but I just...I don't know. I was nervous and confused...I haven't felt like this before, so soon and so...much. And I didn't want to misreading my feelings after what had happened that night but..." He shook his head with a wide smile. "The whole time I was away, all I could think of was...coming here and telling you. Maddie, I..."

"Wait..." Maddie's mind was on overdrive as she cut him off. "When I came to say hello, you just...you looked right through me. You barely even said..." She shook her head, hoping it would help clear the muck she was sorting through.

"You mean tonight?" He pointed towards the door.

"Yes tonight!"

"But I was standing with a reporter and..." Harry finally began to understand her demeanor, her reaction to him. Realization washed over his face, a small smile peeking through. "Oh Maddie...I didn't know if you wanted the world to know that I..." He moved closer to her then. "I didn't know if you wanted the reporter to know the scope of my feelings for you. I hadn't had the chance to talk to you before we walked through that door and...I erred on the side of caution. I had no idea it would make you feel..."

"Oh..." An embarrassed flush rising to her cheek as it all began to dawn on her. "You mean that...oh God..." Her good hand moved to her throat and she lowered into one of the chairs in the room as she thought over all the terrible thoughts she had been having; about the doubts she had allowed to work their way into her mind. "I'm so embarrassed."

"Don't be," he shook his head dismissively. Oddly enough, he was used to this strange stage in a relationship; where protocol and appropriateness was a discussion. He had it in every one of his relationships, though the women he had dated had only had it with him. "Don't be sorry. Don't be embarrassed." He brought her hand to his lips for a kiss, relieved they had found the source of the problem.

"It's too late..." She smiled weakly, her shoulder aching. His attention moved immediately to the way she grimaced.

"How are you?" He nodded to the source of her pain, her hand still sandwiched between his.

"I'm okay," she sighed. "The doctor said my progress is faster than most."

"Not surprised to hear that," he grinned.

"Yes, well, I have to wear this for at least a few more weeks. Then I'll see a doctor and we'll go from there."

"Sure," Harry nodded. "Khenda told me that you're not going with them to Bendal."

"No," her lips turned down in a frown. "I have to keep my arm stable. I can't do anything with it. I can't push or pull or lift anything more than two pounds. I'm afraid I would be more of a liability than an asset at this point."

"I'm sorry to hear that," his words were genuine. "I know you wanted to go back."

"I really did," she sighed. "And I will. Just...not now."

"So then..." Harry took a deep breath. "What now?"

"Hmmm..." Her mind drifted in thought. "Tomorrow evening I'm heading to the states. I'm going to spend a week with my mother; let her see that I'm okay."

"I'm sure she's thrilled."

"She is," Maddie nodded with a smile. "And then I'm going to go spend some time with Ella in Dublin."

"Dublin?" His ears perked up. "How long are you going to be there?"

"I don't know," her smile widened. "I have three months mandatory furlough to get well and decide what I want to do next; three months before they will discuss the possibility of me going back to Bendal or...somewhere else. So I figured, I might as well do some traveling; take a long holiday."

"Might as well," he agreed; his body warming at the possibilities. "Is there any chance that, sometime during those three months of travel, you might be willing to consider a stopover in London?"

"Hmmm..." Maddie tried to pretend to give it some thought, tried for a serious expression but failed miserably. Her eyes danced at the thought. "Well, I have always wanted to see Big Ben."

"Who hasn't?" He chuckled.

"And take a trip to Stonehenge."

"Sure..."

"And I have heard that London has some of the best pubs in the world..."
"I would agree with that statement," Harry grinned. "And you could probably use a good drink."

"I really could. Also..." She felt her heart swell with feeling as her confusion and embarrassment faded, leaving her mind clear to focus on his quick and hasty admission. "Also there's this guy...I'm not sure if you've heard of him...Harry of Wales?" She cleared her throat and met his eyes. "Well, I have it on pretty good authority that he's...in love with me."

"Ah...you heard that, did you?" He blushed; slightly nervous.

"I did," she grinned. "So...you know. A stopover in London could be a distinct possibility."

"Excellent," Harry breathed. But, before he could relax completely, there was one more thing he needed to handle. His smile faded slightly as he dropped her hand and moved from the chair.

"Where are you going?"

"Well, before we move on to anything else, I do think it would be helpful for us to have that talk I tried to have with you the night you assaulted me in the greenhouse."

"Assaulted?"

"Don't pretend like you don't remember," he turned to wink at her as he opened the backpack he had brought with him.

As he began to remove what appeared to be magazines and newspapers from the bag, his face grew more and more serious. Laying them out on the desk in the room, he pulled the final one out and stepped back. Curious, Maddie moved to his side, looking down at them. On the desk laid approximately twenty periodicals; all containing salacious headlines about various members of his family; including himself, his brother, and both of his parents.

"Harry..." Her good hand reached out to touch his arm. "What is all of this?"

"This," he scowled down at the collection. "This is what happens when the world finds out."

"Finds out about what?" Maddie's eyes scanned the headlines, the disgust mounting inside.

"You." His voice was strong, stoic as he turned to watch her. "We haven't talked yet about where this is going or where you want it to go. You know how I feel about you and...and I want you to come to London. I want to take you out on an honest to God date; you know...where I pick you up and we eat dinner and have beer and I worry about whether you'll call me or not..." Maddie laughed at the picture he was painting. "But before you make a decision about that, a decision about me, you need to know what you would be walking into."

"Harry..." She shook her head, but he continued.

"We have to talk about it Maddie. This is a very real part of what comes along with me. They are relentless. And ruthless. And always there. There is...very little thought or tact involved. Very little concern for the truth or what is right or the damage it might cause. They will watch and watch and the one moment out of a hundred that you slip up, it's on the front page of every single daily." Maddie opened her mouth, wanting to offer words of comfort, but he wasn't quite done. "I do my best to ignore them and you know what? I've been mostly successful at it. It used to bother me when I was younger but now, I don't care. They can write whatever they want about me. I can take it. But I have been dealing with this my entire life. They...they have questioned my paternity; questioned my father's honor and integrity and his ability to raise us." Harry swallowed, his eyes growing dark. "They presumed the worst possible things about my mother. They said she was..."
crazy and unstable and...and I don't even want to get into their role in her..." He took a deep breath, trying for calm.

"Harry..." Her hand reached out to him then.

"I cannot even tell you how many times Chelsy cried because of what was yelled at her from across the street or because she was scared by the ten huge men shoving cameras in her face. They called my cousin, my wonderful, beautiful cousin fat and ugly. And at the time in her life when calling her that would only serve to drive her deeper into..." His face was red, his jaw hard and set.

"Hey..."

"And then there's Kate." He sighed. "They tear her apart; her clothes, her hair, her makeup, her degree, her family. Kate who...all she is trying to do is love my brother. She is just trying to love my brother and do you know how hard that is? Loving one of us?" His eyes met hers. "This makes it damn near impossible!" He turned from her then, trying to calm the anger that boiled inside as he thought over all of it.

"Are you...are you trying to scare me?" Her question brought him back to the moment, back to her. "Is that what this is? You're trying to scare me off?" He turned to face her. "So I'll end things first?"

"No," he shook his head; softening. "No. I'm not trying to scare you."

"Because if you don't want to do this... If you don't want to be with me then you just have to tell me. I'll walk away. I won't throw a tantrum or run to a reporter or..."

Harry, with a great sense of purpose, moved directly to her then; pulling her flush to him. Mindful of her arm, he cradled her body close to his and, without another word, he kissed her; the deep, warm, intoxicating kiss she had been expecting when she first saw him. And when he pulled away from her, she was nearly breathless.

"Wow..." She breathed; it was so much better than she had remembered.

"That. I have been wanting to do that for..." He pressed a kiss to her lips, her forehead. "That is what I wanted to do when I saw you, the second I saw you."

"But..."

"But I do that and..." He swallowed and waved his hand at the collection of newspapers and magazines. "All of this begins."
His hands were slow as they traveled over her shoulder to her arm; rubbing up and down in a soothing fashion. "I just...tonight, with the reporter, I couldn't throw you into all of that without at least talking to you first. If I could, I would keep you away from it forever. Though I'm not entirely sure how that would be possible given how very much I enjoy this..." He wrapped his arms around her protectively; nuzzling his nose to hers.

"Me too," she moved slightly; capturing his lips with hers. Sighing, she settled even closer to him. "Harry?"

"Hmmm?" He lifted his eyebrows; the casual smile on his face warming the room.

"I can take it." His eyes blinked at her words, at the certainty he saw in her smile.

"You don't have to decide right now," he shook his head. "You can have as much time as you like..."

"I don't need time." She laughed as she brushed it off. "I am tired of waiting and wondering and overthinking things. And I'm not afraid of them; of this." She glanced over at the magazines lined up. "They can question my paternity. They can assume the worst about me. They can call me names. They can make me cry. They can pick apart my clothes and my hair and my education and my citizenship and..." She pulled from him slightly, wanting him to really see that she meant it. "And I don't care because, really...I know that you really only started kissing me but it's been months since I've realized...it's really not that difficult."

"What's not that difficult?" He blinked.

"Loving you..." She seemed suddenly shy as she confessed; all of her confusion had left her heart and she was absolutely clear. She was done being wishy washy and unsure. She was done trying to let her head talk her heart out of this particular emotion. She felt how she felt and if he could admit it, so could she. "If anything I would say it's damn near impossible not to."

"Careful..." He warned, sucking in a shaky breath. "There's no turning back once you throw that out there. I'm not joking around here. You can say no and walk away and...I'll understand. And I won't be angry and I will always, always care about you." His eyes grew sad at the thought, but he forced a smile.

"I don't think you're hearing what I'm saying to you," Maddie sighed and moved to the table. With her good arm, she stuffed the magazines back into the bag before dropping it onto the floor. With a satisfied grin, she turned to look at him. "I hope you meant what you said earlier, about loving me...because, scandalous headlines or not, I'm not going anywhere."

"No?" He felt a tug at his heart.

"Not a chance."

"And to think...when I walked in here, you had every intention of throwing me out," he eyed her playfully. "What changed your mind?"

"Well," she shrugged. "You are the Crown Prince and all..."

"Ha!" He laughed; tugging on her chin with his fingertips; the reunion of their lips seconds behind him.
"Wait," she pulled back. "Aren't you supposed to be at the party?"

"No," he shook his head. "I made my speech, did the rounds. I'm a free man."

"But... What happened to your reporter, how did you lose him?"

"I had a little help," Maddie raised her eyes in question, to which he answered, "Ella."

"Ella..." She grinned as she thought of her best friend. "She's wonderful."

"She is," he nodded. "Though, if you wanted to go back down and let everyone in on our little secret, we could certainly make an announcement. I'm sure Harold would appreciate the exclusive."

"Ha!" Maddie tossed her head back in laughter. "I am sure he would. But no, not tonight."

"Your call." Harry shrugged his shoulders, easily dismissing it.

"Is that what you're going to do?" She grew curious. "Make an announcement?"

"No," he laughed with a shake of his head. "It's much easier than that."

"Do tell."

"I just stop trying to hide it. I go about my life, acting as I normally would. I'd take you to dinner. I'd hold your hand." His eyes shifted a shade darker. "I'd kiss you in public."

"Oooohhh..." Maddie slid in closer to him.

"They would figure it out," his mouth frowned only slightly. "Sooner rather than later."

"Okay," Maddie nodded, thinking it over, studying his expression. "And when does that happen?"

"That is completely up to you," he nodded in her direction. "They already follow me around. You get to control this part."

"Wow..." Maddie sighed, leaning back against the desk. "What a strange decision..."

"I know," he agreed; did he ever. "Can I make a suggestion?"

"Of course."

"Warn your family first. Your photo will eventually end up in a magazine or on TV and it seems to go over easier when people know it's coming. Don't get me wrong..." He ran a hand through his hair. "I meant what I said—we can leak it now if you want."

"No," Maddie smiled. "I'll go to the states, speak to my mother and then, when I see you in London..." She waved her hand, her smile increasing. "They can figure it out."

"Deal," he grinned; clapping his hands together.

"Besides," she shrugged with her good arm; a move that had taken her days to master. "I kind of like the idea of having you all to myself for the night."

"I do too."
"Do I?" She let her head tip to the side, let her voice drop soft and sweet. "Get to have you all to myself tonight?" With her bottom lip between her teeth, she lifted her eyebrows.

Chuckling at her expression, his heart warming at her smile, Harry nodded. "I'm all yours."

"Finally!" She exhaled sharply, relief flushing her face as Harry laughed. "Sorry, it's been a long time."

"Ten days," he pointed out, watching her closely as she pushed away from the desk and took a step towards him. "I know."

"And you have said some of the most wonderful things to me tonight..."

"Well..." He ran a hand over the back of his neck, suddenly feeling just a little bit nervous.

"And what I really want to do is..." She stood in front of him, her eyes lifting and locking with his—the look in them darker and not nearly as sweet as they were only moments before. "Finish what we started in that greenhouse."

"...you mean without the sirens..." His eyes were full of something between youthful adoration and an intense, heavy desire.

"Yes," she nodded, her fingers stretching, resting on his chest. "And the rain..."

"Come here," he nodded for her to come closer, his eyes flashing to her lips.

"But there's this sling and..."

"Come here," his voice dropped an octave as he pulled her to him; his fingers sweeping over her skin as he cupped her head in his hands.

"And my pain pills are..." His mouth closed over hers then.

This was it, she thought. This tingling sensation that ran through her veins when he touched her. This warm heat that traveled over her skin when he kissed her. This was worth all of the ups and downs she had been through just that day. This was the feeling she had been searching for; this overwhelming feeling of happiness. She was content, serene; blissful.

Sighing into his mouth, she leaned her body closer to his. Harry, spurred on by the way her tongue teased between his lips, moved to wrap his arms around her; wanting there to be no small distance between them. The move jostled her arm slightly, bringing out an involuntary gasp.

"Whoa..." Harry pulled back slightly; his lips pink from the kissing. "Maybe we shouldn't..."

"No, it's okay," Maddie shook her head with a slight flinch, moving her lips back to his.

"Maddie..." He smiled against her lips.

"Harry..." She hated how her voice had a whiny tone to it. "I want to do this."

"I do too," he chuckled. "But I am not going to do something that's going to cause you to flinch like that. I really don't want to hurt you."

"It's fine," she huffed, frustrated with her body. "I took a pain pill right before you got here. I promise, I won't feel anything!"

"Ouch," he smirked as laughter danced across his eyes.
"I meant..." She narrowed hers; blushing slightly. "I meant that it wouldn't hurt my shoulder...not that I..."

"Maddie..." He whispered his protest between kisses to her jawline. "You are recovering from a gunshot wound. Surely you're not supposed to be..."

"I'm not supposed to lift anything, or put weight on it, or raise my hand above my head. And, while those do pose some interesting challenges...I thought you might be up for it. But if you're not..."

"Shhh..." He grinned against her neck; pulling her tighter to him. His lips continued their quest past the soft skin where her shoulder met her neck. She sucked in her breath as he planted warm kisses there, as he stirred up wonderful memories from their moment in the greenhouse. "I promise...if you wait until the doctor gives you clearance...until I see you in London in less than a month...I promise I will be more than happy to make up for any and all of the lovely things I want to do to you right now."

"Oh..." Maddie moaned, her head rocking back slightly.

"But I am not about to cause you..." His head moved away from her body as the journey his lips were on ended at her shoulder. "Any more pain." With a light kiss to her still bandaged shoulder, he took a full step away from her. Yes, his pulse was racing. Yes, his desire was boiling. And he wanted her, God how he wanted her. But he could wait; even if it took all of the strength he had to resist the way she was looking at him in that moment—a sexy little pout on her lips.

"But...I was really hoping to spend the night with you."

"You still can."

"I can?" She smiled, her pulse slowing down. "You would stay here with me tonight?"

"Yes," he breathed, relieved that she had given up on her quest to take him down. "I would love to stay here with you tonight."

"Okay," she sighed.

"Though, I don't have cute jammies like you do."

"It's okay," Maddie smiled up at him. "We have a very loose dress code around here."

"Fantastic!" He clapped his hands together.

Maddie excused herself then; going to the bathroom to wash her face, brush her teeth, give her reflection a much needed knowing look. And when she returned to the room, Harry was laying back on her bed, his head propped up on two pillows; having dressed down to just a t-shirt and boxers. Maddie's breath sucked in.

"You okay?" He lifted his eyebrows to her, catching the look on her face.

Sighing, Maddie nodded. "I was just thinking that it's too bad my mother didn't raise a more...chaste daughter." As Harry laughed, Maddie shook her head. This waiting was going to be more difficult than it should be.

"Come on, love." He smiled lazily up at her, waving at her to join him. "Time to enjoy some markedly innocent snuggling." With a slight laugh and a steadying breath, she did just that.
Her arm held tightly to her in her stabilizing sling, she moved to his side, nestling up to him as though it were the most natural thing in the world. Just as naturally, Harry's arm moved around her; squeezing gently as he pulled the blankets up around them. He pressed a kiss to the top of her head; inhaling her shampoo and relaxed into her bed. As they both reveled in this new level of comfort between them, Maddie could not contain her wandering thoughts. Her mind alternated between her future with him and her past before him; reconciling the two of them as she faced this new fork in the road.

"Harry..."

"Hmmm?" His eyelids were growing heavy.

"You know," she moved to look up at him. "I've smoked pot before."

"Oh-kay," his eyes opened with a laugh.

"More than once."

"Maddie..." His laughter rumbled in his chest.

"And I went through this period when I was twenty two when I drank and partied...a lot," he opened his mouth to speak, but she hurried ahead of him. "And I've had sex...with more than one man."

"Madeline!" His eyes flashed wide in amusement.

"Not at the same time!" She clarified unnecessarily. "Just...I'm not some innocent virginal girl and..."

"I never imagined that you were," he watched her with tender eyes. "Maddie, why are you telling me these things?"

"I want you to know what you're walking into. I don't want anything that I've done to be bad for you and..."

"Are you kidding me?" He laughed. "You think your past boyfriends and partying days are going to make me want to not be with you? They have stories about my drug use, pictures of me punching reporters and...dressed as a Nazi, for God's sake."

"Ah yes," Maddie relaxed slightly; feeling better. "What the hell were you thinking?"

"It is a long story." He shook his head and settled back into the pillow; kissing her forehead. "One I'll tell you sometime over one of the many beers we are going to share..."

"I can't wait."

"I bet," he laughed. "And I don't need to know those stories about you right now. We can learn them as we go. But tonight...can we just...it's been a long day..."

"A long week," she interjected.

"Can we just sleep?"

"Mmm..." Maddie nodded before turning her mouth up to kiss his. "Maybe a little of this first?"

"Yes..." He grinned, turning to bring his mouth to hers. "Absolutely."
That night, as Maddie drifted off to sleep snuggled close to Harry’s side, thoroughly kissed and satisfied, she finally felt as though her roller coaster ride was coming to a stop.

She never would have imagined that it was, in fact, just beginning. Though this time, she knew for sure, she wouldn't be on it alone.
Chapter 16

Maddie found that, that night with Harry, she had slept better than she had since before the shooting. And Harry found that, that morning when he woke, leaving her side was growing increasingly more difficult.

But they both had plans; plans that involved planes and other countries, other people. Plans that had nothing to do with the other—no matter how much they wished they did. She offered to call for some coffee and he offered to help her take a shower with her sling.

Both politely, and regretfully, refused.

His plane was leaving earlier than hers; within hours in fact. So he kissed her; again and again before prying himself from her arms. Then, with his bag full of irrelevant magazines, disheveled hair, a rumpled shirt, and a giddy look in his eyes, Harry left her room to head back to England—but only after he secured a promise he would see her in a month.

Maddie, rolling her eyes at the wide, goofy grin on her face that she could not seem to remove, hurried through her morning routine—as much as she could hurry with her arm in the shape it was in—and went to meet with her friends before they all left South Africa for their varied destinations.

Collins rose to his feet as she approached their breakfast table and was the first to notice a drastic change in her demeanor from the night before. Khenda watched her contemplatively and Ella, having assisted Harry in occupying the reporter, made no bones about it. With a smug smile, she looked to her best friend and asked,

"Sleep well last night Doctor?"

The flush that came to Maddie's cheeks was bright red and the smile that flew to her face was indescribable. Then, in a small, quiet voice, she let them in on the night before; on the promises that had been made, on where she was headed and with whom. And she wasn't quite sure which one of them was happier about the news; herself included. Of course they would keep it quiet, of course she could trust them. They were the three most important friends in her life and, in a show of solidarity, Collins rose his glass to salute her. As the four of them drank to Bendal, to what had occurred, to what was about to occur, they sat in a warm, happy hope for the future.

And then, one by one, they passed hugs around the group; warm, tight hugs that spoke of a loyal love and adoration they had developed. They kissed cheeks and foreheads and promised to meet again. And then they would load up their one bag—the one worn bag that spoke of a well-seasoned traveler, they said their good-byes and they departed.

All knowing they would meet again.

As Maddie flew over the vast continent of Africa, across the depths of the Atlantic, she felt torn between her worlds. Her life at home, her life in Bendal, and that wonderful unknown life that lie ahead. She hoped that she wouldn't soon be forced to choose between them, that somehow she would manage to have them all at the same time.

And when she landed, finally, in the dry, chilly air of Colorado, she embraced her mother; her mother who couldn't stop crying. She let her mother fuss over her and then, together; hand in hand, they made their way to Maddie's first home. And she settled into that life—at least for the moment.
Maddie spoke with Harry nearly every night that she spent apart from him. They would trade off during whose night they would call. Sometimes she would lay awake in her bed, trying to keep her eyes open while waiting for his call. And then there were nights when she would swallow the nervousness in her chest and call him; knowing she would be waking him. But neither of them ever complained; the end result was just too sweet. Their knowledge about each other continued to flourish. Their attraction solidified as they grew closer. And it was these talks that helped propel them forward. Just as they had months before.

They talked about everything. They spent hours talking about those small, mundane things that they never managed to cover during the hot nights in Bendal.

Maddie's middle name was Jae, named after her father Jay. Harry embarrassingly admitted that he had a total of four names; Henry Charles Albert David. Each one had been carefully, meticulously selected for him; drawing from a long line of history.

He liked them all but...no, she could not call him Albie—no matter what she tried to bargain with.

"What about all four?" She had dared. "Can I call you by all four?"

"Only if I'm in a whole host of trouble," he had resigned.

"Fair enough."

They had discussed topics of greater importance; though none were as significant as the night Harry made a small request of her during her time in London.

"I'm sorry, what did you just say?" She sat up in her bed; her eyes wide awake.

"I said that my father would love to meet you when you are here," Harry repeated, trying to force the amusement from his voice.

"Your father?" Maddie swallowed, trying to wet her now dry throat. "Prince Charles."

"Yes," Harry chuckled. "And my step-mother Camilla. My brother and his wife have offered to host a dinner at their place so that you can meet them and Kate."

"Oh wow..." Maddie took a deep breath.

"Madeline," Harry's voice was low, soothing; comforting. "Don't overthink it. Try not to think of it as meeting the next King of England..."

"Well that doesn't help!"

"Think of it as my father... He's just my father. He has heard me speak of you for months. He knows what happened in Bendal, he's heard of you from William. And now he knows that you're going to be here in London. He...he wants to meet you; see what all the fuss is about."

"The fuss?" Maddie sighed. "Can I just say...this makes me more nervous than when I had to tell my mother that she may soon see photos of me in some of the gossip magazines..."

"Ah yes," Harry smiled and continued. "But you told me that went incredibly well."

"It did."

"Then there's no reason to believe that this will be any different." Harry shrugged. "Maddie, he's going to adore you. Please let me tell him you'll meet him."
"Well I have to agree to it now," Maddie allowed a small smile to grace her face. "It would be incredibly awkward to refuse a dinner request such as this, right?"

"I suppose it would," he agreed.

"Okay," she breathed. "You may set that up. I will...I will meet your family."

"Excellent," Maddie could hear the grin on his face. "You know, if it will make it seem more equal, I would be happy to meet your mother."

"Ha!" Maddie laughed. "She doesn't have a passport. You would have to fly to Colorado to meet her."

"Say the word," Harry shrugged and it quickly became one of those moments when Maddie was reminded just how much her life was changing.

"Wow..." She took a breath. "You know, maybe we should do London first."

And so they would.

In the end, Maddie had ended up spending two weeks at home with her mother. She slept in her childhood bed, had coffee and muffins every morning on the deck and brewed sun tea while they caught up with each other.

And the catching up proved to be helpful for both of them. For example, her mother had decided to start taking classes at the local community college. She had started with some easy ones; computer literacy and the like. And now that she had a hang of it, she was hoping to extend her studies to something more challenging—maybe nursing. She was feeling more independent, more confident; and she had made some great new friends. This was a relief to Maddie—who often worried about her mom alone in their big house.

And then Maddie told her mother about Harry. She had been nervous about telling her mother about the young Prince she would be flying to see and the imminent media attention. But, much to Maddie's surprise, her mother was very calm and seemed open to the idea. She only wanted her daughter happy—and if he made her happy and that happiness outweighed the drudge of the media and gossip. Then it was worth it. Plus, he had been so wonderful to keep in contact with her after Maddie had been injured. For that she would be forever thankful.

Maddie had visited with her grandmother, a sassy old lady who censored her opinion for nobody but whom Maddie adored uncontrollably. She spent time with her only uncle; a financial broker who lived in Denver and her three cousins, all adult men with careers and families of their own. It was these visits that always made Maddie consider moving back to Colorado. Since her father had died, this was the first time that they had all been together when there was nothing but smiles; no tears and heartache. And of course, her cousins were amazed with the horror and wildness that their little cousin, the one they had always looked after, had been shot in South Africa. They had always been incredibly protective of her and now she was quite the superhero in their eyes.

Not one member of her family balked at the idea that she might be going on dates with the red headed Prince. They made jokes; about curtsying and high tea—jokes that Maddie was scared to admit were closer to her fears than they realized. But ultimately, they weren't terribly surprised that Maddie had caught his eye and they promised to keep their lips sealed should anyone come to them for some dirt on her. And he seemed like a decent guy—from what they knew of him. One cousin, a former pilot in the Air Force, particularly liked that Harry was a military man. And his wife particularly liked the blue of Harry's eyes. But all agreed that they hadn't seen Maddie smile like that about any of the men in her past.
Either way, they were all on board. Not one member of her family wanted Maddie to see one more moment of distress and upset. She had been through enough with her father's sickness and deserved some happiness.

While at home Maddie had worked diligently in Physical Therapy; pushing herself more and more every day. By the time she was packing to leave for Dublin to see Ella, she could spend an extended amount of time without the sling before it started hurting again.

And when it was time for her to leave, she kissed her mother, hugged her extra-long, and finally—after three trips back to her arms—walked through security towards the terminal. Though she was excited for the trip; excited to reconnect with Ella and revive her spirit in a completely different way than the two weeks at home had, she found she had missed home, missed her mother more than she had ever really let on.

But she continued on. She settled into her seat and let out a breath she hadn't realized she was holding. Soon she would be with her best friend; laughing over beer. She couldn't wait.
Chapter 17

Seeing Ella brought on a feeling of "coming home" that Maddie hadn't expected to feel at all. But seeing her friend waiting for her with excited eyes, brought tears to her eyes and an overwhelming warmth to her heart. She ran straight into her arms and held on tight. And then, Ella asked the magical question that would set the tone for Maddie's visit.

"Coffee or a pint?" She raised her eyebrows in anticipation while Maddie debated for only a moment.

"A pint."

And so it began. Dropping her bags at Ella’s flat, the two girls headed out on the town. Ella toured Maddie through some of her favorite old haunts; running into person after person who had known her for some time in her life. Maddie jumped feet first into the revelry; enjoying the amazing drinks that were continuously offered up to her and watching as Ella was reunited with people who adored her almost as much as Maddie did.

If Maddie's time at home with her mother had provided peaceful, quiet time to rest, Maddie's time 'at home' with Ella was the fun, wild abandon that both ladies needed to purge their minds of the tragedies they had witnessed; allowing them to just be friends, not comrades. Though they spoke of Bendal and their friends and colleagues who were there; it was with tipsy fondness and love.

The two ever constants? Intense Physical Therapy for her arm and talking to Harry. Regardless of what she was doing; having coffee and cake in the café, touring any one of the historical landmarks, or enjoying a tall one at a club with Ella; Maddie spoke with Harry every night. And, as their time together grew closer, they both grew more and more impatient for the impending reunion.

"Come to London!" He demanded one night while out drinking with his mates.

"No!" Maddie laughed at him as Ella eyed her from across the booth. "I'll be in London soon enough. Tonight I'm with Ella."

"But I can hardly stand that you're so close to me and yet, tonight, I'm sleeping alone here and you're sleeping alone there."

"I'm not sleeping alone. I'm sleeping with Ella." She took a long drink from her glass.

"Ohhh..." His response was somewhere between a groan and laugh. "Don't say things like that to me Maddie."

"I miss you Harry," her voice lowered.

"Definitely don't say things like that..."

"I cannot wait to kiss you again," she could feel her skin tingle at the thought.

"That's it! I'm on my way!"

"No!" She laughed.

"Yes! Dublin is incredibly close! I can be there in like...two hours by air and..."
"You don't know where I am in Dublin. I barely know where I am in Dublin," she looked around the bar with a smile.

"I'll bring my friends. They'll help me find you."

"You're talking crazy."

"I am crazy..." He paused, catching his breath. "Maddie..." His voice was lower, more serious.

"Harry?"

"Come to London..."

"I will. Soon. I promise."

"Please hear the sincerity in my voice when I tell you...I cannot wait to see you."

"Hmmm..." She grinned and winked at her best friend who returned to the booth. "Well, until then, I'm going to get pissed and sleep with Ella."

"I am never going to make it through this week."

"See you soon your highness..."

"Not soon enough Doctor..." And then he was gone, leaving Maddie grinning like a fool in a booth in Dublin. Sighing, she met her best friends' eyes.

"Ella...I love him."

"I know," she answered without blinking.

"No. I love him."

"I know."

"I know."

"Hmmm..." Maddie took another drink. "I miss him."

"I know you do darling," Ella patted her hand. "You want to go to London tonight? It's only two hours by air. I'm sure he would be thrilled to send a car to the airport for you."

"Don't tempt me!" Maddie laughed but settled further into her seat. "But no...I'm here with you. And this is where I want to be right now. It's just sometimes his voice and...ugh...the way he talks and..."

"You want to jump him."

"Ella!"

"Maddie! Don't feign innocence with me." She let the laughter die down for a moment before she leaned in closer to her friend. "Okay, I have to ask...and I know that it's crass, but I just can't..."

"What is it?"

"How is he?"

"I'm sorry?"
"Harry...how is he? I have been dying to know because while he seems incredibly sweet and affectionate, I also have to believe that he has this wild streak and I have seen the man play polo and..."

"Ella!"

"What?!"

"I...I don't know."

"What do you mean you don't..." Ella sat back in her seat; eyes wide with astonishment. "You mean, you haven't..."

"We haven't." Maddie looked away nervously.

"Why not?!"

"We've come close but...ugh..." Maddie groaned as her body reacted to the memories of their time together. "We were in the greenhouse when the sirens went off and..." Maddie waved at her shoulder; still propped up by the sling. "And after that he...he didn't want to hurt my arm. So we're waiting..."

"Wow."

"I know."

"So..." Ella nodded towards her arm. "When does that thing come off?"

"According to schedule...a week after I arrive in London."

"That's going to be a long week."

"Ha!" Maddie laughed. "It really, really is."

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

Maddie's time in Dublin went by much too fast and, as the day grew closer to her trip to London, Maddie became slightly nervous; her mind giving her insecurities one last go round before the big day. Thankfully, Ella was there to stomp them down. One night, after a night out, the girls took a bottle of wine up to Ella's rooftop terrace and, laying under the stars, Ella listened as Maddie confessed.

"I'm a little...scared."

"Scared?" Ella's voice was soft; tired. "Scared of what?"

Maddie gulped before she could answer. "Harry."

"Why?" Ella leaned up on her elbows to look over at her friend. "Has he done something to you?"

"No, no!" Maddie was quick to shake her head. "I just...in two days I'm going to be in London with him—in his normal life, in normal surroundings and..."

"Are you worried he won't like you anymore?" Ella rolled her eyes at the thought.

"No," Maddie smiled nervously. "I'm worried that he will."
"I...I guess I don't understand what you're saying."

"It's an entirely new world to me. His family, his friends...his... God, Ella. It's not like in Bendal when it was easy to forget that he had this enormous role, you know? He would unload trucks and get his pants dirty playing with children and..." Maddie took a deep breath. "And in two days...he lives in a castle and has a staff and...there are all of these people around him who might disapprove of me and then what? I just...I'm nervous. What if I don't measure up and..."

"Stop it right now," Ella cut in; angrier than even she thought she should be. "Just, stop it. You think Harry invites you to London, to meet his family if he didn't...God. He's not stupid, Maddie. And he's not new to this. He's lived with this his entire life. You are well educated and charitable. You are sweet and kind and you carry yourself well—even after you've been shot, even after you've been out at the pubs with me for a week—you carry yourself better than most. And he is quite smitten with you." Ella took a calming breath. "You're just nervous. And, while I get that, you need to pull it together. What the hell happened to the strong, independent woman that I saw go out into the rural areas of Bendal, facing down big men with guns so that she could check on her clients. The Royal Family?! They are a walk in the park after that."

"Wow..." Maddie's face went blank as a small smile cracked at her lips; her mind snapping back to reality almost immediately.

"Pull it together Forrester. I mean it," Ella's eyes narrowed, though the same smile played at her lips.

"I suppose I needed that."

"I suppose so." Ella relaxed as Maddie smiled wider. "What happened to you?"

"I don't know," Maddie laughed; laying back down to look up at the sky. "I fell in love with a Prince."

"A sexy Prince."

"A very sexy Prince," Maddie agreed with a smirk.

"You feeling better?"

"Yes," Maddie sighed. "How did you know I needed that?"

"I just know," Ella shrugged.

"I love you Ella."

"Oh baby, I love you too," Ella reached her hand out to hold Maddie's. "And I promise...through all of what is about to come your way, I'll be here...to kick you in the ass if you need it."

"Ha!" Maddie laughed. "I am sure I will."

"Me too."

"Thank you..." Maddie turned her head to smile at her best friend.

"You're welcome," Ella turned her head and winked. "Two days?"

"Two days." Maddie took a deep breath and let it out slowly. "God, I can't wait to see him."

And, now that her best friend had dismissed the last remaining shred of anxiety she held, the next
And, now that her best friend had dismissed the last remaining shred of anxiety she held, the next two days couldn't go by fast enough.
The next two days of Maddie's stay in Dublin went by painstakingly slow. Thankfully she was with Ella who provided nonstop entertainment and a crash course in Royal Family preparedness. She armed Maddie with protocol highpoints; when to curtsy and how, the appropriate way to address various members of Harry's family, and a few tips on appropriate attire at a variety of functions.

"How do you even know this?" Maddie had asked about midway through.

"I don't want to talk about it," Ella had dismissed the conversation while avoiding Maddie's eyes.

And they continued on. Maddie found herself torn; she wanted to stay with Ella—not wanting the time with her to come to an end, yet she wanted to run headstrong to Harry. Having waited for so long, having worked so hard to heal her arm, her body and her soul—she was ready. Ready to see him, ready to be with him; ready to move forward into wherever this journey took her.

So, when Harry suggested she bring Ella with, she nearly jumped for joy and hurriedly handed the phone to Ella so that Harry could do the asking. It was more appropriate for him to make the request and, Maddie was sure that if it were him instead of her, Ella would find it nearly impossible to refuse. She was right. Though Ella glared at her friend, she accepted Harry's invitation and began to pack her things. She would travel with Maddie to London, though she wouldn't stay long—certainly not after Maddie was released from wearing the sling—she had promised with a wink.

The flight to London was a short one. It was later in the night and there was relatively little turbulence and no upsets. Maddie had spoken to Harry just before they boarded the flight and he had told her there would be a car waiting for her and Ella when they arrived and that, finally, he would see her soon.

The plane landed safely and Maddie and Ella gathered their items and began the walk from the plane to the terminal; Maddie's excitement growing with every step.

They were half way down the jet way when it happened. Two girls, teenagers Maddie assumed, let out a loud squeal and came running back down the tunnel to another girl who was seemingly a friend of theirs.

"OHMYGOD!" One of them flailed her hands.

"Sara! You're not going to believe who's out there!" Though both girls were trying to keep their voices down, trying to remain inconspicuous, their excitement was clear.

"Who?!" People continued to file around them as they moved off to the side, fluffing their hair. The first girl pulled the friend close to her and, with wild, crazy eyes she said,

"Prince Harry."

"No!"

"Yes!"

"Nooooooooo."

It was then that Maddie turned to Ella, eyes wide as she forgot about the three girls and focused... only on what was waiting for her at the end of the jet way.

"Wow. I wonder what Prince Harry is doing here?" Ella grinned sarcastically at her best friend.

"Oh God..." Maddie took a breath. "How do I look?"

"You?" Ella laughed. "How do I look?"

"Hey!" Maddie snapped her fingers at her friend. "I'm serious. You heard those...girls. He is standing out there and this could...oh wow, Ella. This could be it."

"It?" Ella bit her tongue as she tried not to laugh.

"When the whole world finds out," Maddie took a deep breath and Ella decided to let her jokes fall to the side. She reached out to smooth a wayward hair down, glanced at Maddie's face and turned her around to check for anything that might be tuck into the wrong place. And with a sincere smile she assured her friend,

"You look amazing."

"Thank you," Maddie smiled gratefully. And then, passing the three girls who continued to primp, she held her head high and continued towards the terminal; Ella standing proud by her side.

When they emerged, her eyes quickly scanned the busy airport; finding him instantly. He was standing off to the side; dressed casually and holding a small bouquet of flowers in his hand. And when he saw her, he stood taller, smiled wider and Maddie instantly felt silly for any of the doubts and anxiety she had felt as this moment had grown closer.

Though there were a few people who clearly recognized him, glancing his direction inconspicuously or nudging their travel mates and nodding towards him, Maddie didn't care. With a deep breath, she smiled and walked right up to him.

"Your highness," she smirked.

"Don't you dare curtsy to me right now," he smirked back, his eyes dancing as he spoke.

"What are you doing here?"

"Well, I was told that it was often customary when a lady flies in, for her boyfriend to pick her up at the airport. Was I misinformed?"

"Her boyfriend?" Maddie's eyebrows shot up.

"But you're not the Crown Prince," she glanced at the flowers in his hand, trying to ignore the onlookers.

"No I'm not," his grin widened. Noticing her moment of pause, he offered one last 'out'. Standing tall, he lowered his voice. "You sure you're ready for this?"

"A little late for that don't you think?" Her eyes were wide and...ready.

"Nah, I could hand these off to Ella, kiss her hello and we could leave you at the airport a free woman." He flashed Ella a suggestive smile.

"Ooooh. Let's go with that plan," Ella grinned; her heart soaring for her best friend.
"Watch it," Maddie warned them both and then, taking a breath, she stepped into his personal space; taking the flowers in her hand and placed a soft kiss to his lips. "And I am sure."

"Welcome to London," his voice was low against her ear as he hugged her close; his heart beating in his chest. He had waited so long for this moment.

"Thank you," she whispered back; inhaling his scent before pulling away.

"Ella," Harry turned to kiss her; first one cheek and then the other. "It's wonderful to see you."

"You too," she nodded. "Thank you for inviting me along."

"The more the merrier," he shrugged. In truth, he thought that having Ella there might ease some of the nervousness he thought might come along with what was about to happen. Of course, he enjoyed spending time with her as well; they had certainly bonded during those late nights next to Maddie's bed. But he genuinely thought it might be easier for Maddie to take in this version of his life that was new to her with Ella by her side. "Right this way," he nodded and pointed towards the exit of the terminal and towards baggage claim.

As they made their way through the airport, talking about the flight, about their travels, Maddie watched him closely; noticing tiny details she hadn't necessarily noticed before.

For instance, he was such a gentleman; it was almost an innate manner about him. He immediately took Maddie's carryon bag from her, despite the lovely purple shade. He stood to the side, allowing the two ladies to walk through doorways first; his hand often finding its way to the small of Maddie's back to lead in her in the right direction. He was attentive to Ella, making it a point to not make her feel like a third wheel. Once they reached their luggage, he loaded the cart and insisted on pushing it to the car that was waiting outside where the driver took over. He waited while Maddie and Ella situated themselves in the car, before climbing in behind them.

And he was sweet. He was unassuming; not once thinking he deserved precedence over anyone else. He didn't cut in front of people or expect special privileges. If it weren't for the security officer with him, Maddie wasn't sure if people would ever think he was the Prince. And, for those people who did a double take, thinking they might recognize him, he offered a small smile and a nod.

As the car pulled away from the curb, Maddie took a deep breath. This was it; the beginning. Though there was certainly not a mob of people and there was zero sign of the paparazzi, she was sure there were at least a few cellphone photos. Maddie smiled at Ella as Harry reached for her hand, his relief at finally having her there was evident to anyone who could see the look on his face. Sighing, she settled back into the seat, into him; ready for whatever happened next.
Since Maddie and Ella's flight was later in the night, Harry wanted to get them back to his home as soon as he could, giving them time to unpack, to relax; to catch some sleep. Feeling slightly nervous, Maddie held tight to his hand as they entered the grounds at Kensington Palace. She was thankful for the dark the night provided; making it all seem less massive somehow. The realities of who Harry actually was had become more and more real as her time in London had drawn closer and now that she was here, driving through the ornate gates of the palace, it was settling.

If Harry noticed, he wasn't letting on. After he helped his driver unload their bags into the house, he told him goodnight and closed the door to the outside world. As all three of them relaxed slightly, Harry clapped his hands and offered a tour, showing them around his home, to their rooms. Ella smiled wide when she stepped into the recently redone guest suite; complete with modern amenities and a traditional feel. Harry smiled as Ella yawned, looking longingly at the large bed. She was sleepier than she thought.

"I am just down the hall to the right if you need anything," he offered.

"Sure," Ella glanced between the two of them. "And I'll just be in here—sleeping soundly—with ear plugs."

"Good to know," Harry smirked as Maddie blushed. After a round of hugs and good nights, Maddie allowed Harry to lead her down the hallway.

"And this..." He swung open a door. "This is your room."

"Oh..." Maddie breathed as she stepped into the opulent room.

"Oh?" Harry arched an eyebrow; catching a slight disappointment.

"Sorry," she smiled sheepishly. "It's lovely. I don't think I've ever stayed in something so...ornate." Harry laughed. "I guess I just thought, I don't know. I thought I would be staying with you."

"Oh thank God," Harry breathed, pulling her from the room.

"What is happening right now?" Maddie asked as he led her across the hall, confused.

"It would have been terribly inappropriate of me to just assume that you wanted to stay with me."

"And accurate," Maddie interrupted with a grin. "It would have been terribly accurate."

"Here we are," he reached out to push the door open; his hand on the small of her back, ushering her inside.

"Your room," Maddie smiled as she walking into the enormous room. Her eyes traveled around it; taking in all of the things that were so, entirely him. The colors of the fabric, the build of the furniture; it seemed so Harry that she instantly felt welcome.

"And yours," he stuffed his hands into his pockets somewhat nervously. "For as long as you would like."

"Thank you," she called out to him as she continued her mental inventory of the room; the books on the shelves, the prints on the wall, the hardwood floor and the thick, massive rug, the way it smelled just like him—only homier. Her eyes rested on his bed; large and comfortable and inviting. She looked to one of the pillows where she saw, propped up against it, a bag of her favorite candy. "And what do we have here?" She reached for the bag.

"I know it's a little silly, but I couldn't resist," he explained with a shrug. Harry stood in his doorway and watched as she tossed the bag of candy onto the bed and turned to face him.

He was gorgeous; tall and fit and the way he was watching her move about his room made her skin flush. It as surreal. After all of the phone conversations, the flirty texts, the warm tension—she was finally here in his home. They could give this a chance, a normal chance. A light laugh rippled through her as she fought the need to roll her eyes at herself. She was standing in Kensington Palace, in the bedroom of a Prince.

There was nothing normal about any of this.

Except for the way he was looking at her. Except for the light in his eyes and the curve of his smile. Except for the way she was drawn to him. All of that felt incredibly normal, the same as it had in the desert of Bendal. It was natural and easy and she wanted so much more of it. Her head tipped the side and her cheeks tinted pink and she moved right over to him.

Without so much as a word, she leaned up on her toes and pressed her lips to his.

His response was automatic, innate. His arms were warm as they moved around her, tight as they drew her to him. His lips were gentle against hers as he kissed her back once, twice, and on the third time, the gentleness began to slip giving way to hot and insistent.

Maddie felt her knees give just a little as her lips parted below his. Her fingers twisted up in his shirt and pulled him more tightly to her, not wanting to have any distance between them. She pressed her body closer and closer still; closing in on fractions of inches; her hands traveling over his taught muscles.

For the life of him, Harry could not seem to remember any one of his four names. He was mesmerized. Instantly pulled in. Hooked. And when Maddie moaned into his mouth, he almost fell right over. His hands moved from her waist, planting themselves in her thick, blonde hair. With a collective breath, the kiss deepened.

Since they had first planned this trip, Maddie had been thinking about what this moment would feel like, what it would be like to be here. In every scenario she had imagined it would take her a good minute or two to move past the fact that she was standing in his home, in his room, kissing him—before she would be able to enjoy it. But, when it actually happened, when his lips touched hers, all thoughts had simply shattered and fell from her mind, making way for this. This amazing feeling of euphoria and excitement and comfort that she was now experiencing wrapped in his arms.

Harry, as had proven tradition, was the first to slow them down. With no small effort, he pulled his mouth from hers but made no attempt to extricate her from his arms. She groaned as he pulled away, to which he smiled the biggest, goofiest grin she had ever seen on his face. He leaned in one more time to place another soft kiss on her pouty, swollen, pink lips.

And before he could even open his mouth to remind her of the reasons he was pulling away from her, she rushed ahead; determination set in her eyes.

"There's something I want to show you ..." With great purpose, she moved around him; shutting the door and pulling him further into the room with her. Pushing him back so that he was sitting on the edge of his bed, she took a deep breath and, with her good arm, moved her sling up and over her head.
"Wait. What are you..." His eyes grew wide in alarm; his hands moving to stop her. But, with one well-placed finger to his lips, she shushed and halted him all at once.

"The shooting was almost two months ago," her voice was steady as she laid the sling on a dresser. "I have been in Physical Therapy for six weeks." Her good hand moved to massage her un-bandaged shoulder; bringing heat and relieving the tension there. She was very careful with her reactions, making sure that any hint of a grimace stayed away from her features.

"Maddie, what are you doing?" He asked; his eyes following her every movement.

"I just want to show you the progress I've made," she smiled sweetly and then, with a deep breath, she extended her "bad" arm out in front of her; holding it shoulder height as her fingers extended out towards him.

With her eyes on his, she moved it up and over her head, out to her side. Her movements were fluid and easy and normal. With a satisfied smile, she let it relax to her side and she moved closer to him.

"We're still working on strength building..." Both of her hands moved to his cheeks, her fingers stroking as she moved to stand between his legs. His hands went immediately to the backs of her thighs, grazing up under her skirt, his eyes looking up at her in awe. "But my arm is okay. I can lift things over two pounds. I can brush my teeth. I can wash my hair—mostly. And...and I can do this..." Maddie took in a slightly shaky breath and in one, slightly stunted movement, she pulled her shirt up and over her head. Though her good arm did most of the work, there was no pain in her bad arm. And then she was standing there in nothing but a white lacy bra and her skirt. Harry swallowed as he looked up to her.

"Maddie..." He breathed; his heart rate quickening. His eyes focused instantly on the rough pink skin of her scar; the constant reminder of that night, of what had happened.

"Harry," her hands moved to hold his face as she dipped hers to kiss him again; pulling his attention back to her and not to their past. "You know I caught what you said at the airport; about me being your girlfriend..." Harry chuckled as his hands moved from her thighs, up over her waist to the soft, warm exposed skin of her sides. She was standing so close to him that she could feel his breath on her stomach.

"Are you mounting a protest right now?" His voice was low and rough and it brought chills to her skin—which were instantly warmed by strokes of his fingers.

"Not about that," she shook her head, bringing her bottom lip in between her teeth; her hands running over his strong shoulders.

"Maddie..." He shook his head as his fingers moved up to the exposed skin of her shoulder; tracing lightly along the lines of her scar. "I don't know..."

"What don't you know?" She laughed lightly, leaning in closer to him. "I know I want this. I know that I want you...that I've wanted you since that night in Bendal. Don't you want this?"

"Of course I want this," he confessed, his restraint slipping away from him as her fingers tickled the back of his neck. Leaning in, his lips grazed over the soft skin of her stomach. She let out a small gasp at the contact, pulling him closer; continuing on her quest.

"And when you left me at the hospital, you told me to go home and heal and I have! I have been working so hard, twice as hard as I needed to just so that when I came here I could finally...have you." His eyes grew darker as she spoke; lifting to meet hers.
"But, I don't want to..."

"If you're going to say that you don't want to hurt me, than stop. You won't hurt me Harry," she tugged his face up so that he could see her eyes. "You can't hurt me. But if... if you really don't want to do this, if you're just not ready, I will stop pressuring you and..." Her teasing surrender was silenced when Harry moved to stand.

With serious eyes, his hands reached out to her, tugging her close and all the evidence she needed of how much he wanted this was pressing against her hip. Electricity ran through her veins as he kissed her, as he leaned her body into his. "Harry..." She groaned into his mouth.

"You have to promise me something," his voice was low as he bent to kiss her scar, this spot that had been the source of so much worry, so much anxiety.

"Anything," she breathed, her hands in his hair, pressing him to her.

"If there is any pain in this shoulder, any at all, you'll tell me." He licked and sucked and kissed. And Maddie nearly lifted her hands in the air in victory.

"Absolutely," she nodded; a flush running through her as this moment, this much anticipated moment seemed to be coming to fruition. Victory had never felt so sweet.

"Maddie. I just..." He took a deep breath, hoping to control all of the feelings he was having, wanting to explain to her that it had taken everything he had in him to resist her up until that point; that his protests were only about not diminishing all of the progress she had made. But, before he could tell her any of that, she reached out and, in a move that impressed him, pushed him back so that he was sitting on the bed, stepping into the space between his legs.

And then she gave him the look that he would, for many, many years, find impossible to resist; her eyes wide and pleading, her head tilted slightly to the side, her bottom lip sticking out slightly further than her top. If he hadn't wanted to take her in his arms right then and there, he may have been amused.

But when she ran the tip of her finger over his lips, when she looked to him with half-open eyes and smiled a breathy, "Please?"—humor and laughter faded and there was nothing but a deep, heavy want.

"Oh God help me," he shook his head, pulling her into his arms in surrender. He was doomed; blissfully doomed.

Feeling brave, feeling bold, Maddie leaned in. Her hand slipped around his neck and her lips pressed to his; soft, easy, familiar. As she moved back slightly, his hand reached out to her good arm, holding her close. His lips sought hers this time; with more pressure, more desire. When her lips parted and slipped between his, he paused pulling back; his eyes open wide.

She watched the look that flashed in Harry's eyes and her breath stopped in her lungs. Before she could offer up a comment any further, he was pulling her back to him in a crushing kiss. He was giving in to her and it made her feel like she was floating there in his room. She moaned as he moved, stretching his neck so that he could kiss her properly. His hand moved into her hair, holding her lips to his; his tongue darting into her mouth.

"Maddie..." He groaned into her mouth, tugging her down to him. He held her face to his as his lips moved across her cheek to her jaw. "Come here..." He sat further back on the bed, pulling her with him.
"Mmmmm..." She smiled as she moved; her knees settling on either side of him as she settled into his lap.

"I do want this. I have wanted this since you first kissed me in Bendal..." Harry's voice was gruff with heavy honesty. "And we have waited and ...." He groaned; wrapping an arm around her waist and pulling her tighter into his lap. She was so soft and warm. "God...you feel so amazing." A current ran through her veins; the electricity awakening every nerve ending in her body.

"Harry..." She sighed but Harry was quick to silence her with his lips; his hand moving up over her hip, along her waist. His fingers traced over her chest, causing her to stir in his lap. Maddie made tiny gasps for air, not wanting to pull her mouth away for any small amount of time. In the brief, flitting moments of thought that drifted through her head, she wondered if she had ever really felt this way; so aroused and turned on and yet so safe and at ease all at the same time.

She had been nervous, wondering if it were really possible, to feel the strong, magnetic pull without abandoning the calm reassurance she felt whenever she was with him. When Harry's lips left hers, when they bent to blaze a trail of heat and desire down her neck to the soft spot just above her collarbone, that she felt an amazing tug in her heart. This wasn't just sex for her and she had this feeling in her gut, this wild, hot feeling that made her believe it wasn't just sex for him either.

Pulling his face back up to hers, her lips took control of his. The heat, the need, the desire—all of it was there, building and boiling and though she felt on the verge of bursting, when she moved in this time it was slower. It was purposeful and it was full of all of the emotions she was juggling. Her lips and tongue moved slowly and deliberately and Harry must have sensed the change. His eyes opened to meet hers in this heavy moment and his body tightened around hers.

She heard him groan when her hands moved down his back. She heard his breath catch when her hands found their way to the skin under his un-tucked shirt. She felt his muscles flex under her hands as he moved. Emboldened by his lips, his hands, the way his skin felt against hers, Maddie took control. She pulled at the fabric under her fingers, sliding his shirt up and over his arms; exposing his soft tan skin.

"Oh...Harry...I..." She muttered, biting at her bottom lip as she shook her head. Looking down at his disheveled hair, his tan, taught chest; she felt tingly and warm.

And she wanted him. She wanted him.

A soft, breath of a moan pushed from her mouth. And when he heard her, he knew instantly that he had made the right decision. He had to be with her and he could barely remember why he had been putting this off in the first place. He had to connect with her and share this emotional and physical build up that had been boiling between them. There was simply no denying it any longer.

"God, Maddie..." His voice was gruff as he pulled her tighter to him. His lips found hers in that easy, familiar way one found home. He buried his hands in her hair and he kissed her again. There was something different about this kiss. She could tell. There was something more to the way his hands were holding her. There was something more to the way his lips were caressing hers. There was something more to his quick breathing and his warm body. It was intense and powerful and it made her face blush and her legs weak.

He kissed down her collar bone until he reached the small strap of her bra. He pushed it aside and moved his lips lower to kiss the soft pink skin of her chest. He heard her gasp as his tongue dipped below the lace that covered her breast seconds before his handiwork tossed the garment to the floor. He heard her moan as his hands pushed up under her skirt, allowing him access to her flesh. His hands began their journey higher, kneading and massaging, becoming familiar with her skin, her curves.

She groaned in disappointment when he moved away from her and sighed in happy fulfillment when he moved them both so that she was lying back against his pillows. With a swiftness she had yet to see, he pulled her skirt over her long, lean legs; allowing it to flutter to the ground next to his bed. After quickly shedding what was left of his own clothes, he moved to lay over her, gently nudging her legs further apart. He moved to settle himself there, his lips joining his hands on their effort to render her delirious. He was gorgeous, sexy in a way that should be illegal. And he was naked and turned on and looking her over with fire in his eyes. She pressed her eyes closed, fighting for control of her pounding heart as he kissed his way down her stomach.

"Oh God..." She sighed as she felt his warm breath on the outside of her panties. Her heartbeat skipped as he ran his hands over her long legs; pulling her last shred of clothing off as he went. When Maddie's hands plunged into his hair and tugged, Harry groaned at the conflict, at the great need that was building inside of him.

But when she pulled, he went. Moving up over her body, he rested one hand beside her head on the pillow and brought the other to her cheek as his eyes met hers. Their breathing was ragged and their eyes were intense as they spoke silent words between the two of them. It was dark and intense and heavy.

"Maddie...I..." He fought to control his breathing, his concern for her shoulder flashing across his face. "Are you..."

"Shh..." She brought his hand to her lips and kissed his palm. Her eyes stayed focused on his as she reached out and began pulling him closer. Her legs moved up around him as her hands slid down his chest, to his waist. "I need you..." She pulled him closer then, an adorable smile playing across her lips. "I...I love you," She bit her lower lip and looked innocently into his eyes—a look she managed to master just this day. "Harry...please..."

For one, silent moment, their eyes connected and neither of them could move. For one, silent moment, she thought that he might be on the verge of tears. For that one, silent moment, he swore that he could hear her heart beating out of her chest.

"Harry..." she whispered and brought a hand to his cheek. When he heard her voice and felt her hand, that moment came crashing to a halt and his senses came flooding back. He could hear the need in her voice. He could see the want in her eyes. With great skill and grace, he bent to kiss her lips and reached into the nightstand for protection.

When he returned to her, he settled above her, returning right to this heated moment between them. When her hips arched up towards him, he groaned. His fingers circled around her ankle, lifting her leg higher around his hip. When he kissed her, he could taste the salt on her skin, her could feel her desire beating in her pulse and the look in her eyes—nearly took every clear thought he had ever had.

And when he entered her, Maddie's mind slipped off to that far off place his had drifted to. She had no choice but to let go of everything else but this.

She forgot that they were in a palace in London. She forgot that this was supposed to be a man she would never have access too. She forgot that they were supposed to be careful. Hell, she was surprised she didn't forget to breathe.

And it all felt so amazing that she let herself forget. She wrapped her arms around his neck and sank into the warm, comforting embrace he was offering to her.
Very slowly and with great control, Harry began to move above her; the feel of her around him making his vision hazy.

"God....Maddie..." He breathed against her ear, her neck, running his hand down through the peaks of her chest, over the flat plane of her stomach; settling at the place where they were connected. The slightest of touch drew a gasp from Maddie and a smirk from Harry. Maddie's head lifted up off the pillow so that she could really kiss him, her hair pooling behind her.

Together they moved, they sighed, they moaned, they groaned. And Maddie, in love with the sight of him above her, with the way he felt, the way he moved; she kept her arm relaxed and still for as long as he could. But when her breathing drew quick and her skin began to flush, she knew she was close and she couldn't help it any longer. Her arms moved tighter around his neck, her hands pressing into the skin of his shoulders; urging him closer and closer still. She wanted all of him. As much as he could give her, she would take.

Sensing she was close, Harry brought both hands to her hot skin. Moving up her legs, over her hips, to grip her waist; pressing her closer to him. And when her head tipped back and her moans turned to cries, he wrapped his arms around her and held her tighter to him.

And as she went, she found her hands grabbing for him, finding his hand and holding tight as her orgasm shuddered through her; rocking her from head to toe. She cried out between gasps for air; cried out for him, cried out for God. Burying his face in her neck, he licked and sucked and fought to wait for her. And he did, though barely.

As they rode out the final waves of a shared orgasm, Harry's kisses grew softer, slower; bringing them both slowly down from their high. She relaxed her hold on him and he moved slightly so that his weight was not resting fully on her. As Harry kissed across her neck, her chest, moving up to meet her lips; watching as she steadied her breathing, her skin flushed pink, her eyelids fluttered. He kissed the inside of her wrists, up to her elbow, landing a warm, firm kiss to the scar on her shoulder and she came back to Earth, back to him.

Harry moved only to clean himself before returning to her side; his hands working to adjust the blankets underneath and around them.

When she finally opened her eyes, he was looking down at her, propped up on one elbow, his head resting on his hand. There was the tiniest of moments when she felt a little embarrassed, a little exposed. But when their eyes met and locked, those feelings faded and were quickly replaced with ones of love and desire. Tired, she cuddled close to him, moving her legs under his blankets and laying her head on his chest; nuzzling the spot in his neck that she had, just that night, discovered held the ability to render him speechless.

"I'm sorry," he whispered in a soft voice.

"For what?" She laughed, surprised at this admission.

"Making us wait to do that..." They both chuckled at that.

"It was well worth it...if that makes any difference," she sighed into his neck.

"Mmmm...." He agreed, sleepy and blissfully happy.

He wrapped his arms around her then; pulling her closer, holding her tighter. He wrapped his blankets up and around them and, with one hand, he stroked her hair. He kissed her forehead and the sleepiness began to take hold of both of them.
Chapter 20

The very next morning, Harry was jolted awake by the sound of his door slamming shut. Sitting bolt upright, he looked first to the bed beside him; searching for her. His eyes moved quickly from his empty bed to the door that had slammed. There she stood; dressed in a pair of his boxers and a t-shirt. Her one arm was back in her sling, her other arm up; covering her face.

"Maddie?"

"Oh my God..." She groaned. "I am so embarrassed."

"What?" He smiled. "Why would you be embarrassed? Where were you?"

"Ugh..." She sighed heavily, letting her hand fall from her face as she moved back to the bed. "I woke up early and I didn't want to wake you..."

"And?" He reached for her hand as she neared him.

"And I went downstairs to make coffee and maybe some breakfast..."

"Oh?" He chuckled, knowing what was coming.

"And there are people here."

"Yes," he nodded. "Well, there are a couple of people on staff here and you're bound to run into them."

"Dressed like this!" She waved her hand over her attire and Harry laughed loudly. "Stop laughing!"

"Don't worry," he pulled her hand to his lips for a kiss. "There can really only be two people here right now and both of them have been here for a very long time and they are incredibly discreet. Maddie..."

"In your boxers!" She nudged his shoulder. "I am wearing your boxers!"

"Yes you are..." His voice went low as his eyes scanned over her. Pulling her to him for a kiss, he felt her tension relax in his arms. "You know, one of those people you ran into, Bernard, he can actually bring us breakfast here, in my room."

"I don't know that I could face him now," she groaned, crawling back into his bed beside him.

"Ha!" Harry laughed, reaching for the phone beside his bed. Maddie snuggled back into his bed, back into her pillow as Harry called Bernard, politely requesting a tray with coffee and a light breakfast to be delivered to his room and Ella's room as well. "Don't worry," he assured her after disconnecting the phone call. "You are certainly not the first woman in underwear they have encountered."

"Oh really?" Her eyebrows arched.

"Not here!" He shook his head quickly. "They have been employed by my family for a long time, is all I meant."

"Oh I'm sure that's..." A knock at the door called for both of their attentions. "That was fast."
"It was probably ready before you went running around half naked," he winked at her as he rose from his bed; pulling sweatpants on as he went.

"Hey!" She threw a pillow towards him. Narrowly dodging it, he laughed and pulled open the door.

"Bernard, won't you come in," Harry stepped aside as the older gentleman brought a wheeled tray into the room; complete with two place settings, coffee and a variety of breakfast items. Maddie quickly jumped to her feet, pulling on a robe Harry had laid in a chair next to her side of the bed. "Bernard, this is Doctor Madeline Forrester. She is one of the guests I told you we were expecting. Maddie, this is Bernard. He's in charge of the Household."

"It's great to meet you Bernard," Maddie, swallowing her pride, extended her hand to shake his.

"A pleasure, Ma'am," he smiled; something in his eyes telling her she need not be worried about their previous encounter.

"When Thomas arrives, will you be sure to let him know that our guests are here?" Harry asked.

"Of course, Sir."

"Thank you," Harry smiled with a nod as Bernard moved towards the door.

"Thank you for breakfast Bernard," Maddie called out. He turned, offering her a smile and a nod and then, quite discreetly, he left them alone; off to deliver Ella's cart.

"See," Harry smiled, pouring coffee into the two cups. "That wasn't too bad, was it?"

"No," she smiled, reaching for a pastry. "I suppose that it wasn't."

"And you already know Thomas and most of my security staff."

"Yes," she agreed, taking a cup of coffee from him and climbing back into his bed. "Do you have other staff members? Like...a cook and a housekeeper and the like?"

"Kind of," he shrugged, joining her in bed. "There is a housekeeper that comes around once a week to do big things; take care of whatever Bernard sees fit. I am responsible for the day to day stuff."

"You do your own laundry?"

"Mostly," he smirked at her surprise. "I don't mess with some of the dressier, dry clean stuff and I never touch the celebratory uniforms...but I can do a load of jeans, no problem."

"Good to know," she smiled. "And a cook?"

"The same. It would be silly for me to have a cook just for myself, but for large events or special dinners, there is one under the employ of my family who can come in."

"So, it's just Bernard who is in charge of your home."

"Yes."

"And then there is Thomas, who is in charge of your professional duties." Harry nodded. "And then your security team."

"A few assistants in the office, but basically you've got it."
"Wow..." Maddie sipped her coffee. "It really is quite something."

"My thoughts exactly," Harry smiled; eyeing her teasingly.

"Why your highness," Maddie batted her eyes. "Are you coming onto me?"

"Oh no," he shook his head even as he moved to kiss her; long, unhurried kisses that spoke of his want to stay in bed with her all day. Though his words spoke otherwise. "I have to be in to work and you..." He moved to kiss her shoulder gently. "You have an appointment with a doctor."

"Boo..." Maddie protested; frowning as he stepped out of bed. She had known he had prior commitments that he would be following through with while she was visiting. And though she completely supported that, she already missed his presence.

"Sorry," he leaned to kiss her again. "I need to get a shower and get ready."

"I know..." She sighed. "I think maybe I'll take my coffee down to Ella's room, see how she's doing."

"Perfect," he drank from his cup and then with one last kiss, he stepped into his bathroom. Maddie finished off her pastry and then, pulling her robe tight, she refilled her cup and headed to Ella's room; checking the hallway carefully before stepping out.

Taking a deep breath, she knocked lightly at the door and was immediately greeted with a bright and chipper Ella; wrapped up in a large fluffy robe, drinking from her cup of coffee.

"You know..." Ella sighed as she looked at the pastry in her hand. "I've lived in some of the poorest places on the planet and I've been fine...happy in fact..."

"Sure," Maddie nodded.

"But I could really, really get used to this," her eyes met Maddie's and she smiled. "Come on in."

"You slept well?" Maddie asked, following her friend into the room and shutting the door behind her.

"Oh God, you have no idea!" Ella moved to sit on the bed; Maddie right next to her. "How about you? How did you and the Prince sleep?"

"Good," Maddie brought her coffee to her mouth; trying to avert her eyes. "We slept fine."

"Good..." Ella shrugged and then, out of the corner of her eye, she caught something on Maddie's face; a slight flush, a gulp. Ella's eyes grew wide, her mouth dropping open. "Oh my God....Madeline Forrester. Did you sleep with him last night?"

"What?" Maddie tried for surprise but she had never really been a good liar, or an actress.

"Oh my God!" Ella sat her cup down on the bedside stand. "You did! I thought your arm was...I thought he...Maddie!"

"Shhhh!" She hushed her friend. "I am not going to discuss this with you."

"Fine," Ella shook his head; smug in her knowledge. "Fine. You don't have to admit it to me. I know. I can tell. But you can keep this to yourself. I mean...I've only stood by you during this crazy ass last year but who am I?"
"Ella." Maddie's eyes were stern, but her lips curled up in a smile.

"I just...I want to live vicariously through you for just one moment. You don't even have to say yes or no. Just tell me...how was it?"

"Ella!"

"Just once."

"Fine. Just this once...just today and then, I will forever be mum on the topic."

"Fair enough," Ella's eyes twinkled as she held her breath. Maddie raised her eyes to meet Ella's and then with enough sparkle there to light up the room, she smiled wide and admitted.

"Amazing."

"Oh I knew it!" Ella jumped back on the bed as both women began to laugh. A swift knock on the door rang out. "Come in!" She called out.

"Is everyone decent in there?" Harry's soft voice called out.

"I don't know that I would go that far," Ella grinned. "But we are all dressed. Come on in."

Harry stepped through the door, looking impeccable in a deep blue suit. Maddie could feel the heat rise to her cheeks as she took him in.

"I am headed out and wanted to remind you both that we have plans this evening..."

"With your friends, right?" Maddie recalled.

"Yes," he smiled at her. "Bishop is just returning from a trip to Spain and they are all anxious to meet you. That's fine, right?"

"I can't wait," Maddie nodded excitedly.

"Great, well," he clapped his hands together. "Good luck at the doctor and, Ella, good luck at the shopping."

"Thank you," she laughed.

"Now, avert your eyes," he nodded to Ella who rolled them instead. Leaning in to kiss Maddie, he held onto her for a beat longer than would be deemed appropriate in front of anyone else. "I'll see you this afternoon."

"Yes you will," she nodded; her grin never fading as he kissed her once more before leaving the room.

"Seriously though," Ella sighed, leaning back against the pillows. "I could get used to this."

"Me too," Maddie sighed; talking about something else entirely.
Maddie made it to her appointment with time to spare and, after a solid work out of her arm, received fantastic news.

The sling was ready to come off. Permanently.

While she would need to continue to do the exercises from Physical Therapy and continue to come in on an as-need basis, she was done. She could resume normal functions and, as long as she continued to do her stretches, she should be able to have full range of motion in no time. After reminding her to see a doctor should she experience any setbacks or pain, the doctor bid her good-bye and good luck.

To say that Maddie was ecstatic was a massive understatement. She was exhilarated; on a high. And she couldn't wait to tell everyone. As the car took her back to Harry, nothing could possibly bring her down; except what she encountered as she hurried into his home. With a wide smile and a breezy voice, she called out,

"Henry Charles Albert David! I hope you're well rested and hydrated because you are in a whole host of..." She heard a movement behind her and spun around towards it. And her blood ran cold. There in front of her, looking more handsome and regal than he did in the media, was Harry's father; His Royal Highness Prince Charles. Maddie's heart stopped. "Oh. My." Her voice croaked as Harry stepped out into the room, just over his father's shoulder. "God." She breathed. Trying not to laugh, Harry waved his hand.

"You must be Madeline?" When he spoke, his voice was just as luxurious as he looked

"Yes," Maddie snapped out of her momentary catatonic state and moved forward; a warm smile spreading across her face. "I'm sorry. Your Royal Highness..." Harry moved out from behind his father then.

"Father, this is Doctor Madeline Forrester," the pride was evident in his voice. "Maddie, this is my father, Charles."

"It is an absolute pleasure to meet you," she held her hand out as she dipped down to curtsy to him; silently thanking Ella and all of her obsessive ways.

"Oh I do believe the pleasure is mine," Charles smiled warmly, her hand held in both of his. And, as she moved to stand, he pulled a completely stunned Maddie into a hug. As her arms moved to hug him back, her eyes flashed over his shoulder to Harry who was beaming at the scene. Charles pulled back, but moved to hold one of her hands. "William told me all about what happened in Bendal and..." Oh so it was back to that, Maddie thought; glancing to Harry who shrugged with a smirk. "I hear you're recovering well?"

"Yes, thank you Sir," she smiled. "I actually just today was told that I can discontinue the use of my sling and resume normal function of my arm."

"Really?" Harry perked up.

"Well that's wonderful dear," Charles patted her hand. "Oh! Let me go to the garden and tell Camilla you're back. She was anxious to meet you as well." With a smile and a nod to Harry, he excused himself.

As soon as he was out of ear shot, Maddie let out a breath as Harry hurried to her side.
"Well rested and hydrated?" Harry's voice was low; full of laughter.

"Oh my God!" Maddie shook her head in disbelief. "Are all of my most embarrassing life moments happening today?"

"Well, at least you're dressed for this one," Harry smirked, his arms moving to pull her closer to him.

"And you!" She smacked his arm. "You didn't think to tell me they would be here when I returned?!"

"I didn't know!" He laughed. "They had something come up last minute and they can't make it to William and Kate's tomorrow for dinner. They didn't want to wait to meet you..." He moved closer to her then, looking down at her sling-free arm. "Are you really done with the sling?"

"Yes," she nodded.

"That's...wow..." Harry's lips dipped to kiss hers just as she pushed him away.

"None of that! Your father is just..."

"Doctor Forrester," his voice called out as he returned to the room.

"Maddie," she called out reflexively; her eyes flashing wide. "I'm sorry Sir, but I prefer to be called Maddie, if it's alright with you."

"Of course," he nodded; his eyes twinkling as he turned to his wife. "Camilla, this is Doctor Madeline Forrester, or Maddie as she prefers. Maddie, my wife; Camilla." For the briefest of moments, Maddie's eyes met Harry's and she took a breath and smiled. As she stepped forward, curtsying and nodding, Maddie could not quite believe the company she was currently keeping.

Harry, his hand resting on the small of Maddie's back, suggested they move into the study; which they promptly did. Bernard served tea and Maddie held their attention as she answered their questions with ease and humor. And, by the time they rose to leave, she had won them both over — Charles with her wit and wisdom and Camilla with the way she looked at Harry and he, in turn at her. Neither of them able to recall a time in which they had seen Harry so happy, so content.

Pressing kisses to Harry and Maddie's cheeks, they bid them both good-bye. Harry gave one final wave and shut the door behind them before he turned to her with wide eyes.

"You are amazing!"

"Please," she shook her head; the nervousness she had felt easing from her body.

"Are you kidding?" He pulled her into his arms. "My father adores you! Did you see the way he was hanging on your words?"

"He was just being polite."

"No! He doesn't really do that; not in private. And he invited you to Highgrove for the weekend—which, by the way, you don't have to do..."

"What?" Maddie laughed. "He promised to show me around the gardens. They sound lovely."

"They are lovely," he nodded, holding her even closer.
"Can we please go?"

"Yes," he was quick to agree. She grinned and wrapped her arms, both of them around his neck. Taking notice, he rubbed his hands up her sides, over her shoulders and down her arms.

"Your arm..."

"Has been cleared for all normal activities. Yes."

"Mmm," his head tilted to kiss her.

"So..." Maddie kissed him back. "Do we have some time before we need to meet your friends?"

"We do," he nodded.

"Good," Maddie sighed as she tugged on his tie; pulling his lips to hers.

And then, unable to think of anything else but his lips on hers, he cupped her face in his hand, lifting it towards him, lowering his face to kiss her. Maddie, emboldened by the moment, tightened her arms around his neck and surrendered to the kiss. Her mouth opened under his and she moaned slightly, pressing her body into his.

He moved then, walking her backwards, his hand held out to meet the wall, cushioning her as he leaned into her, pressing her up against it.

"Oh!" Maddie gasped. "Where is this coming from?"

"The arm is good to go..." He explained, moving his lips to the crook of her neck; sucking, licking, and kissing his way down to her collar. "You have no idea what you're in for."

"Oh..." Her breath shuddered. "I can't wait."

"Fortunately, you don't have to," his breath was hot against her neck as his hand slid down to the hem of her blouse; slipping up underneath. Maddie's laughter rang out into his home as her hands moved to pull at the knot on his tie.

"Harry..." Maddie gasped, hearing the familiar jiggle that could only mean one thing. "The door..."

"The door?" He pulled back to look at her; confusion etched across his forehead. He took a step away from her then, just in time for the front door to swing open; nearly running into them both.

"Oh!" Ella stopped in shock as she nearly walked right into Harry; her bags jostling in her hands. As she looked between the two of them, her surprise turned into a smirk. "Ooooh...what do we have here?" Maddie blushed, but Harry remained cool and collected.

"Welcome back Ella," he smiled, moving to take her bags from her. "Here, let me..."

"You sure?" She looked at Maddie's slightly swollen lips. "Cause I can head right back out...give you some time..."

"That's not necessary," Harry shook his head with a grin before he turned to head up the stairs with her things.

"Of course not," Maddie took a deep breath and smoothed down her shirt. "Besides, we need to get dressed to head out anyway." Shrugging, she moved to link her arm through Ella's as they both began towards the stairs.
"Ah yes!" Ella's mind bounced back. "Oh! I bought this amazing new pair of shoes. I think I'll wear them tonight... Wait." She turned to look at Maddie; eyes and smile wide. "The sling." She pointed.

"Gone."

"Really?"

"Really."

"Oh God! That's great news!" Ella pulled Maddie into her arms; hugging her tightly. "Oh Maddie..." And to even Ella's surprise, she grew teary—all of the memories of why there was a need for the sling came crashing back to her.

"Hey..." Maddie's voice was soothing. "What's this?"

"Nothing," Ella sniffed. "I just...I remember the night it all started."

"Yeah, me too." Maddie hugged her again; allowing them a moment to let the emotions settle. "Oh, hey! Do you want to hear how I made a fool out of myself in front of The Prince of Wales?"

"Harry?" Ella seemed confused.

"Oh no," Maddie shook her head with a chuckle. "His father, THE Prince of Wales."

"Oh God yes," Ella practically jumped at the idea.

Arm in arm the two women hurried up the stairs; full of tales and laughter, to prepare for a night out on the town with Harry and his friends.
As the car pulled to a stop in front of the pub, Maddie was admittedly nervous. Though Harry had met them at the airport the night before, this was truly a public place—in the daytime. Though she had long ago committed to whatever came along with being with him, the thought that this might be it seemed to be hanging over her head. And the unknown when and how left her slightly unsettled and more nervous than she would ever admit out loud.

While she had dressed earlier, she found herself wondering if Harry and his family were constantly checking themselves in the mirror before they walked out the door; looking for tops that were too low-cut, hems that were too high—bound to reveal too much. She had never really been that girl; checking herself out constantly. She had solid, classic tastes and made sure to buy clothes that fit her well. And, after she was dressed for the day, she very rarely gave herself another glance. Yet, as she had prepared to leave that night, she found herself checking. And she sincerely hoped it was not a new part of her daily routine. But, Ella had turned her around and nodded her approval and Harry had smiled wide before leaning to kiss her; so she felt ready.

Harry was the first to emerge from the car, waiting for her to step out, followed by Ella. Shutting the door behind them, he immediately reached for Maddie's hand. The excitement was rich in the air; almost celebratory. And the smiles on their faces, the lightness in their steps were evidence of that. Ella's eyes twinkled as she looked up and down the street; at the people, the music, the laughter. She had missed this. Her time in Bendal had been wonderful, but she had missed this part of living in the city; the liveliness.

Maddie watched Harry as he moved to open the door for them; his head held high, smile in place. Glancing around, she noticed that there was no mob, no throngs of people running to see him. Maybe, just maybe, he was going to be incognito tonight. As they stepped into the pub, they were greeted with the most wonderful sense of welcome-ness. The lights were lower and the music was great. There were groups of people around the bar watching the TV with interest. There were booths and tables full of crowds of people enjoying drinks and food. And nobody was watching them as they moved through the crowd.

Pausing for a moment, Harry scanned the room for his friends. Spotting them, he squeezed her hand in his and led the two of them to an inconspicuous table in the back of the bar where three men and three women sat pouring beer and chatting. When they noticed Harry coming their way, they slowly began rising to their feet.

A chorus of hellos were spoken as Harry dropped her hand and moved to offer hugs and place kisses on cheeks. He then turned back to Maddie with an adoring smile.

"Everyone, this is Maddie and her best friend Ella," he winked at Maddie as he spoke. "And this menacing crowd is Penelope, Anna, Kiki, Leo, Sean and Bishop—whose actual name is Ian." He introduced one after another. They each smiled warmly and moved to greet both Maddie and Ella.

"It's so very nice to meet all of you," Maddie smiled her hellos as they all moved to situate themselves around the table. It wasn't lost on Maddie that the group naturally shifted so that Harry was sitting in the least visible spot at the table. They seemed to reflexively protect him. Harry pulled a chair out for her and Ella right next to him. For the most part, they seemed very open and inviting. Anna seemed to be more on the shy type, but Kiki and Penelope were bright and chipper. Penelope immediately commented on Ella's new shoes; becoming an instant soul mate to Ella. Kiki seemed to be involved with Sean, though Maddie wasn't entirely sure on that one.

"So, what are we drinking?" Harry looked around the table.
"I was just heading up," Bishop stayed standing. "What can I get you ladies?" Bishop nodded to the two of them. Maddie and Ella locked eyes and, in unison, replied, "Castle Lager."

"Really?" Bishop double checked as Harry crinkled his nose.

"They must be feeling sentimental tonight."

"A little," Ella admitted, leaning to kiss Maddie's shoulder.

"Got it," Bishop smiled and raised his eyebrows to Harry. "You?"

"I'll take the same." With a nod, Bishop moved away from the table, taking Leo with him for assistance.

"We've heard quite a lot about you, Maddie," Sean offered with a smug look in Harry's direction.

"Yes," Kiki smiled warmly at her. "It's great to finally put a face with all of the accolades."

"Oh really?" Maddie turned to Harry with raised eyebrows.

"Yes, I talk about you." He shrugged with a total lack of shame or embarrassment. The girls at the table chuckled. They had heard so much about her during the last six months, they felt like they knew her.

"She talks about you too," Ella nudged her. "For the last two weeks it's been Harry this and Harry that and...."

"Ella!" Maddie turned to her friend with mock betrayal written across her face.

"What?" She grinned as Bishop and Leo returned with drinks.

"Thank you," Maddie smiled up at Bishop as she took the drink from him.

"Harry this and Harry that?" Harry wrapped his arm around the back of her chair smugly.

"Fine," she sighed dramatically. "I do tend to go on and on about how wonderful you are..."

"Wonderful?" Bishop laughed. "First time out Maddie?" A rumble of laughter circled the table.

"Hardly!" She exclaimed.

"Hardly?" Harry grinned, his eyes narrowing in on her.

"I mean..." Maddie blushed slightly and then, with a guilty shrug, she turned to her best friend and tried to cover. "Ella. Save me."

"Okay..." Ella thought for a moment; taking a long pull from her bottle. "Who wants to hear about the time Maddie made Harry unload an entire truck full of food?"

"Me!" The hands shot up as they leaned in. Harry had been over it and over it, but for some reason, they found great humor in this woman ordering him around. Maddie met Harry's eyes for a brief moment before settling into her chair; ready to be the butt of many jokes.

As the laughter began, the stories tumbled out. They ordered drinks and appetizers, swapped memories. They were having a good time in the corner of the pub. Especially when they all watched as Maddie took Bishop to town at the dartboard.

When Bishop held his hands up in resignation and hung his head on his way to the bar, Maddie decided to take a moment to rest. Ella had long since hit the dance floor with Penelope, Leo and the no-longer shy Anna. Harry had moved to the booth and was catching up with Sean and Kiki while watching her school Bishop with utter adoration.

It had been an eye-opening evening for him. He had always thought she was beautiful, smart and funny. But that afternoon with his father and step-mother and this night with his friends, she had been charming and down to earth and he was so incredibly proud that she was there with him.

Of course, the fact that she had beat the crap out of Bishop's skills and ego while making Anna laugh, well, that only made her that much more attractive.

"Taking a break?" He asked as she slid into the booth next to him.

"It's hard work, killing Bishop," she shrugged.

"I see that," Harry laughed, moving closer to her.

"Come on Sean...you owe me..." Kiki pulled Sean towards the dance floor with a knowing look at Harry.

"Your friends are great, you know," Maddie took a drink from her beer.

"Yeah I know," he looked back around the bar. "They think you're pretty great too, or at least they did until you took all of Bishop's money." They both laughed.

"We're going to play again. He'll have the chance to earn his money back."

"I'm not too worried about him. I'm glad you're having fun, though"

"I am having a great time. A really, really great time," she smiled up at him; suddenly struggling with the desperate need to kiss him.

"Honestly, Maddie, they are quite taken by your charms."

"Oh?" She raised her eyebrows.

"I am too," his voice was barely above a whisper. "Quite taken by your charms."

"Oh," she tilted her head to the side, closer to his.

"So..." he moved so close that she could feel his breath on her neck. "How about you tell me about these multiple men you've loved."

"Ha!" She laughed out loud, her mind going back to their night together in southern Africa, to her earlier blunder. "Who said I loved them?"

"Oh!" He laughed along with her. "Touche."

"What is it you want to know?" Her beer infused grin was wide as she leaned into him; his arm draped around the back of the booth around her shoulders.

"No details," he shook his head. "How important were they? Are they? I just want to know what I'm up against here..."
"You're up against nothing," she let her hand rest on his thigh under the table. "You're up against nothing..." His eyes met hers and she raised her eyebrows slightly. "There were two. One was my first love; the big boyfriend. We went to prom together and the movies on the weekends and he was sweet and kind and...sweet. But not for me."

"And number two?" He leaned to kiss behind her ear; causing her to giggle slightly.

"Number two was a big mistake," she sighed. "A great big, wonderful, make-it-all-over-again, mistake. He was never my boyfriend, nor would I ever want him to be. He was..." Her eyes drifted off for a moment before she pulled her attention back to Harry. "I'm not even sure I remember his name...or if I even had his actual name. I was being young and wild and trying to get over Number One. It was everything that a wonderful mistake should be...and then it was over." She took a sip from her bottle; watching his reaction carefully. He was contemplative for a moment and then turned a smile to her.

"I think I'm more worried about number two than I am about number one."

"You should be," she winked and then, seeing his eyes fall slightly, she nudged him. "Stop it. Stop...whatever it is that's going through your head..." She waved her finger around in the air. "They were both, relatively speaking, insignificant parts of my life. Number One was the safe choice. Number Two was the opposite, the anti-safe choice. Neither of them came close to Number Three. He was...phenomenal. Made me feel things I had never felt before. He...he changed the game really."

"Hold on..." Harry held up a hand. "I thought you said there were two..."

"I'm talking about you," she rolled her eyes before her voice dropped and she leaned into him seductively, bravely; her lips kissing under his ear, along his jaw towards his mouth. She was buzzed when she spoke, but she meant the words just the same. "You've made me feel things I never even imagined possible. As far as I'm concerned...the count started over with you..." And when her lips finally met his, he was hungry for her. Forgetting completely where it was he was sitting, Harry moved so that he could kiss her; his head tilting over hers. Neither of them even noticed as Bishop came hurrying over to them; a mission in his heart.

"Alright, Maddie, let's go...I'm ready to take my money back." He called out before he realized the situation at hand. But it was too late. They had already separated and turned to face him. Maddie looked slightly embarrassed, while Harry fixed his gaze on his friend.

"I'll be right there Bishop, thank you," Maddie smiled sweetly.

"Yes, Bishop, thank you," Harry's voice was dripping with sarcasm.

"Great, I'll just...I'll meet you..." he said looking apologetically at Harry and nodded towards the dart board. Maddie smiled sheepishly at Harry, shrugged, and moved to slip out from the booth.

"Hey, not so fast," Harry called out. She turned to look at him Before she knew it, he had pulled her back to him, his lips meeting hers in a heated exchange. After what seemed not nearly long enough, she pulled back with a radiant glow on her face.

"Wow," she breathed.

"Yes," he nodded in agreement.

"I think that I should get back," she motioned towards the dartboard. "Bishop has money that he wants to give me."
"Okay," he grinned and offered a small wave. "Good luck." And then Harry watched as she walked away from him towards one of his best friends. It was a great night.

Hours later, the group was beginning to fade. They were walking down a mostly abandoned street after closing down the third bar they had visited that night. They had managed to enmesh Maddie and Ella into their lively group. Bishop, now broke, had grown quite fond of the two new additions; his eyes eventually settling on Ella, who couldn't help but flirt with Harry's lifelong friend. Anna had come out of her shell and was quite the conversationalist with Maddie. Leo and Sean were incredibly intoxicated, challenging each other to at least three duals as the night wore on. And Kiki had enjoyed watching the interaction between Harry and Maddie. Having always been the most protective in the group, she was significantly more relaxed about this woman who seemed to have stolen the Prince's heart. She laughed as Bishop seemed to just be catching up with the conversation.

"So, when you were working on your PhD..." Penelope was in the middle of asking Maddie questions when Bishop perked up.

"Hold on!" He called out, his arm draped around Ella's shoulders. "You're actually a doctor?! It's not just...it's not just something the two of you play?" Laughter burst from all of them.

"Ha!" Maddie's cheeks hurt from how much she had been smiling. "No. I really am a doctor, a psychologist."

"My God she has a brain inside that beautiful head of hers. Listen...if you get tired of the palace, you give me a call," he offered her a wink.

"What are you doing?" Harry whacked his shoulder. "Step it down, Bishop. She is not going to call you..."

"She might," Maddie shrugged playfully.

"What?!" Harry looked to her while the others laughed.

"Sure," Maddie smiled. "He's funded at least one new pair of shoes for me tonight. And a girl's gotta eat, no?" She glanced between them for a beat before the group erupted into laughter. Harry pulled her tight to him as they laughed at his friend's expense.

"Ohhhh...I love you," he nuzzled her nose with his before he kissed her; a tender, private moment that was not at all lost on his group of friends.

"Hmmmm..." Maddie grinned; wrapping her arm around his waist. "I know..."

"You ready to go?" Harry kept his hand on the small of her back as he looked around the group. "Ella...you ready love?"

"Actually," she took a breath. "I think I'm going to go home with Bishop here."

"Fantastic." Bishop nodded; clearly ensorcelled with Ella.

"What?" Maddie felt her protective nature spike. "Harry?"

"She's a big girl Maddie...and it's Bishop. I would trust Bishop with my sister..." Harry ran his hands over the tops of her arms as he nodded to his friend.

"Fine," Maddie sighed, moving to kiss her friend goodnight. "You watch it Bishop." She did her best to glare at him through her laughter.
Harry pulled on her hand, moving her towards a parked car; leaning her against it, he took her face in his hands and kissed her right there in front of all of his friends and the ever-present possibility of a few cameras.

"Mmmm..." Maddie moaned against him. Absentmindedly, her hands moved down his sides into the pockets of his coat. And her eyes flashed open wide. "And what do we have here?" Slightly embarrassed, Harry watched as she pulled out a few pieces of her candy. "Harry?" She whispered.

"I thought you might want a piece while we were out tonight," his voice was low as he brought one of her hands to his lips for a kiss. "I thought it was best to be prepared."

"Oh you are most definitely a game changer," Maddie felt slightly teary as she pulled him to her for another kiss.

"Let me take you home...okay?" Harry's eyes searched hers.

"Okay," she nodded; in that moment, she would follow him anywhere. "Sorry guys! We're heading out."

"Booo!!!" Chorused throughout the group.

"I know, I know," Maddie called out, pulling Harry with her back to the group. "It was so nice to meet you...." And the goodnights began; rounds of hugs and kisses. And when Kiki hugged Harry, she held him close for a longer moment and when they pull away from each other they shared the same smile full of happiness; hers was there because his was.

Harry could hardly wait until the car door was shut before he pulled her to him. His desire, his want for her had increased as the night had gone on. She had blended in so well with all of them and them with her. It had been a day full of greatness; her sling was gone, his father adored her, and she could drink his friends under the table—all while maintaining her wits—and beating Bishop at the boards.

Maddie sank into him; surrendering her mouth to his. She had meant what she had said. The two that came before him were not even close when stacked up next to him. She hadn't really known this feeling was out there; certainly not where she ended up finding it. And now, they had put off this moment long enough; first to have tea with his father and Camilla, then to greet Ella and finally to be with his friends. But now, there was nothing holding them up.

They barely made it through the door before he turned to her. Pressing her back against the door, his lips met hers; hot and ready. She moaned into his mouth as his hands ran up her body; leaving a trail of desire behind them.

"Harry..." She gasped when his mouth left hers only to move the mission down her neck to her collar bone. Her hands twisted in his red hair as he moved to the peaks of her cleavage barely peeking out of the top of her shirt. Pulling his face back to hers, she regained a small amount of control; her hands tossed his coat aside and went to his shirt, making quick work of the buttons. Pushing it back and off his shoulders, she sucked in her breath as her hands met the hot flesh of his chest.

He was equally as nimble; pulling her blouse up and over her head, sending it to meet its fate next to his. And as his hands moved to tease her chest through the light lace of her bra, Maddie was thankful for the door behind her; otherwise she knew, with absolute certainty, she would have fallen long ago.
Her hands moved to the top of his pants, pulling at his belt, tugging at his zipper. When her hand slipped inside his boxers, he let out a guttural groan; forcing him to stop and take a breath. He pulled back from her slightly, his heart pounding in his chest.

"God, Maddie, I want you..." His eyes met hers in the brief second he took to collect his breath.

"You have me," she held his gaze; her eyes pouring all of her soul out to him. "You have me..." She took a step away from the door then, leaning up on her bare toes to kiss his cheek, she whispered. "Now take me."

And that was all he needed. With no more need for words, he lifted her up into his arms; her legs wrapping around him instinctually and, with a balance he hadn't known he had, he moved them both up the stairs to his room. Her laughter and sighs echoed behind them.

"You know..." Maddie's voice was soft as she rested on his chest. They had woken late in the morning and, after enjoying some coffee and light pastries, they had climbed back into his bed; enjoying the down time. "You never told me about yours."

"Mine?" He raised his eyebrows, his arm caressing her shoulder lightly.

"All the women you've loved before..." She laughed lightly.

"Ah..." He blushed slightly. "No I suppose I didn't. Come here..." He pulled her up to him and she went; resting her arms on his chest and looking at him. He took a deep breath and was honest. "There have been a handful of women along the way. They all meant something, but when you start talking about love...there was only one before you. I suppose she was my safe choice and my anti-safe choice." He brushed a strand of hair away from her face and moved to kiss her then. "And now I love you. It's really quite simple I suppose."

"Wow..." She paused; searching his eyes for a moment before she continued to kiss him. As his hands pulled at her, she swung her leg over his; effectively straddling him. "Who knew?"

Leaning over him, her hair fell around his face. His hands moved up her thighs, over her hips, to her back; pulling her down closer to him. His head lifted off the pillow, not wanting to break contact with her lips.

This time when they made love, it was sweeter, softer; longer. The night before had been all about passion and want; the desperate need to be with the other. That morning was about the tenderness, the compassion; the joy and surprise that they felt to have found the other.

But neither was without the love they felt; neither was without the connection they had made. And, as Maddie gasped his name, she didn't know how she was ever going to be able to leave his bed, his side; him ever again.
Dinner with William and Kate was quiet, reserved and told tell of the small, tight, protective circle that surrounded Harry. No doubt, Harry's friends had been protective only in a slightly different way. Meeting his brother, again, and his wife was a wonderful experience for Maddie.

William was warm and welcoming; noting that the last time they had met were not the most ideal circumstances, and congratulating her on her recovery. He was smart and funny and Maddie could sense that, given the opportunity and the right group of people, he could really cut loose. Of course, he had met Maddie before, he had sat at her bedside with his brother sick with worry—so his familiarity with Maddie was on a different level than his wife's.

Kate was the more reserved of the two. She was sweet and lovely and much more beautiful than her photos did her justice. She was soft spoken and slightly modest. Maddie quickly attributed that to the presence of a complete stranger; a newcomer to the circle. And she understood that. Maddie imagined that this particular circle was very careful about who they let in, who they opened up to.

Though Ella had, appropriately, turned down the offer to attend dinner with the four of them, Maddie wished she could have snuck her in, if only so that she would have somebody to turn to, somebody to witness with her what she was witnessing. Instead, she had made plans with Bishop and politely excused herself.

As the dinner ran on, the group eased into friendly conversation with Harry as the willing ring-leader, offering up humorous and harmless tales about all three of them. When Maddie followed Kate into the kitchen to help bring out dessert, Kate smiled somewhat apologetically about her shy demeanor and told her that if, in the process of becoming Harry's girlfriend publicly, she needed anything; to feel free to contact her. Maddie was thankful for the offer that would prove to be incredibly useful in the not too distant future.

And when they finally left, after finishing off a bottle and a half of wine, Maddie tucked her arm into Harry's and sighed with a warm smile. It had not been as immediate as with his father and step-mother, nor as wild and boisterous as with his friends, but the approval of his brother and sister-in-law was there.

"Ella..." Maddie's voice called out as she knocked on the door to her friend's room. Harry had left for a meeting and the two of them were heading out to do some shopping.

"Come in!"

"So..." Maddie pushed into the room. "Are you and Bishop like...a thing now?"

"No," Ella shook her head. "We were for two glorious nights, but no. He is a really sweet guy but, I'm a lot to handle."

"Oh I know," Maddie giggled as they made their way downstairs to head out.

"But truly, he is a great guy and...he couldn't speak more highly of Harry."

"Sure," Maddie nodded as they stepped into the waiting cab. "Harry loves him too."

"And...Bishop really likes you..." Ella smiled at her best friend. "He thinks you're a great match for Harry."
"Well sure, He would have to tell you that."

"Na," Ella shook her head. "He meant it. I can tell."

"That's sweet," Maddie sat back in the car. "So, are you ready to do some shopping for Highgrove?"

"Hmmmm..." Ella bit her lip. "Yes and no."

"What do you mean; yes and no?"

"Well..." Ella took a breath and smiled, knowing what she was about to say was going to surprise her friend. "I am ready to go shopping. But not for Highgrove. I'm not coming with you."

"What? Why?" Maddie turned her body to look at her.

"Well, my love, there are a few reasons."

"Care to share them with me?" Maddie was not mad; simply curious.

"First...this is time that you should be spending with his family; alone." She hurried before Maddie could cut in. "AND, you're doing really well here. They all seem to really like you and...well, you haven't called any of them by the wrong title and you have the curtsy down pretty well. You just don't need me here anymore."

"Ella..." Maddie began.

"I know that's not the only reason I'm here," she rolled her eyes; reading Maddie's mind. "But those are not the only reasons I'm not coming."

"Continue."

"Yesterday I was at lunch with Bishop and I started talking with this woman who was sitting across from me and she's a flight Paramedic through a hospital here in London. And..." Ella took a breath. "After a long story and a few drinks...she told me the hospital she's working at is hiring a flight nurse. So...tomorrow I am going to interview and then, on Saturday, I'm doing a fly-along with her."

"Ella!" Maddie's eyes went wide with excitement. "You've mentioned that as a possibility in the past but...wow... Wait." Maddie's smile faltered slightly as the car pulled to a stop outside the shops. "You're not going back to Bendal?"

Ella took a breath, looked down at her hands before meeting Maddie's eyes. "No, Maddie. I'm not going back to Bendal."

"Wow..." Maddie tried to process it all; unsure of her feelings on the topic. "And you're going to live here in London?"

"If all goes well," Ella grinned, pulling Maddie out of the car with her.

"I don't know what to say..." She felt a little overwhelmed; happy yet nostalgic and a tiny bit confused.

"How about..." Ella lowered her voice as she linked her arm with Maddie's. "Long live The Queen?"
And then, with muffled chuckles, they hurried into the store; ready to shop for their respective weekends.

On Friday morning, Maddie hugged Ella extra tight, kissed both of her cheeks, and then wished her the utmost of luck as she interviewed and went for her flight. Harry helped load her bags into the car that would be taking her to the hotel she was moving into and, with a warm hug, he thanked her for staying with them and offered to put in a good word for her at the hospital; which she quickly declined.

After waving good-bye, Maddie and Harry began packing up to head to the country. Maddie had purchased some wonderful, warm items for the trip to Highgrove. And, as their departure grew closer and closer, she found that she was incredibly excited.

They were loaded and sitting comfortably in the car before long. Holding onto Harry's hand, Maddie watched as the world flew by; the trees, the hills, the homes. England was truly a beautiful place. Without moving to look at him, Maddie spoke.

"Ella's moving to London..."

"It appears that way, yes," Harry nodded; watching her thoughtfully.

"I'm excited for her..."

"But?" He arched an eyebrow.

"AND," Maddie corrected, turning a grin in his direction. "I'm surprised."

"Why?" He laughed; not at all surprised that Ella, who he had known about as long as he had known Maddie, was ready to live in the city and experience something new—it seemed completely like her.

"I don't know," Maddie shook her head. "I suppose that I've just always known her in Bendal. And I just assumed that once they gave us the okay, she would be going back."

"Sure," he nodded and took a deep breath. As the topic of Bendal moved front and center, he suddenly felt slightly uneasy and nervous. "You know...your mandated furlough is almost over."

"It is," she sighed. "I actually have a meeting scheduled with some DWB personnel in exactly one week."

"Really?"

"Yes," she smiled. "Next Friday at noon. We'll be going over my paperwork, doctors' records and the like. She'll give me my options..." Her thoughts trailed off as her eyes caught his; seeing a hint of sadness in there.

"Tell me," Harry cleared his throat. "What are you hoping to hear at that meeting?" Maddie held her breath, her heart pounding in her chest and, in the most honest way possible, she shrugged.

"I really, really don't know."

"Hmmm..." He let out a breath tailed by a chuckle. "I really, really don't know." He echoed, smiling sincerely.
And that was the most honest either of them could be in that moment.
Camilla and Charles were there to greet Maddie and Harry as soon as they walked through the door. The valet was quick to take their bags up to their rooms as they stepped into the opulent home. Maddie was enchanted; from the moment they turned up the long front drive, she had been enchanted. There appeared to be miles and miles of green plants and flowers and trees. They were certainly in the country and Maddie felt a sort of homey connection to the place—almost instantly.

Before he had moved their luggage upstairs, the valet had handed Harry a folded card. Harry scanned it quickly and excused himself. He had a phone call he needed to make that was of imminent importance. He kissed Maddie's cheek with an apologetic look in his eyes, nodded to Charles and Camilla and slipped off to his room to make the call.

In a little under twenty minutes, Harry finished his phone call and hurried back down the stairs; eager to return to Maddie's side. Finding the foyer empty, he began to make his way through a few rooms until he found Camilla alone in the study.

"Hello," Harry stepped into the room.

"How did the phone call go?" She asked.

"Better than expected actually," he shrugged and looked around. "Where are dad and Maddie?"

"Well," Camilla sealed an envelope and turned to smile up at him. "She asked about the garden..."

"Oh God," he glanced towards the windows nervously.

"And he started to tell her about the orchards..."

"Where are they?" Harry moved to the windows; his eyes squinting as he searched.

"They were going out through the Walled Garden and then over by the Tree house..."

"You let him take her to the Tree house?!"

"Let him?" She looked to him with a grin. "He's your father..."

"I know, but..."

"Relax, Harry. She wanted to go. It's not as though he dragged her out there."

"Of course not," Harry sighed at himself; relaxing a bit.

"She seems wonderful," Camilla commented as she stood and followed as he walked towards the back of the house.

"She is," Harry smiled, the corners of his eyes crinkling. Even as his mind debated staying in the house or heading out after Maddie and his father, the mention of her made him pause. "I honestly don't think I've stopped smiling since she..."

And then, as clear as day, the sound of a shotgun echoed through the grounds; reaching Harry's ears. His eyes went wide as he stood tall.

"Yeah, that's it. I'm going out there." And with that Harry hurried out the door with Camilla chuckling as he moved.

Moving quickly, Harry found them exactly where he thought they would be; standing in the Meadow with the trap shoot set up. Maddie had the shotgun in her hand as Charles pointed in a couple of places. Maddie was listening intently to what his father was saying. Harry could tell they were both somewhat mesmerized with the other. Harry waved so that they would see them.

"Well, well, what do we have here?" Harry stuffed his hands in his pockets as he stepped up to them.

"Your father was telling me about the biodegradable clay pigeons he ships in from Laporte and I asked if they flew the same as the others..." Maddie smiled at Charles, who finished the story.

"So I put a gun in her hands."

"Sounds dangerous," Harry chided.

"No!" Charles shook his head. "She's an excellent shot. Go ahead." He nodded at her encouragingly. Maddie smiled and moved the gun shoulder height.

"Pull!" Maddie called out; expertly aiming, shooting, and hitting the pigeon. Charles chuckled approvingly.

"Wow! I had no idea you were such an amazing shot!" Harry watched her in awe.

"Yes, well, I'm the daughter of a farmer," Maddie shrugged, feeling the tiniest bit embarrassed. "There were coyotes that might stalk the animals and...my father made sure I could hit what I was aiming for."

"Your father is a farmer?" Charles perked up.

"He...he was," Maddie smiled warmly at the thought of her father.

"Oh? Is he retired now?"

"No," she shook her head. "He died; almost two years ago."

"Oh Maddie, I am terribly sorry to hear that." She could feel Harry's eyes on her, but she took a breath and smiled at Charles.

"Thank you," she met Harry's sympathetic gaze for a moment. "He would have loved what you've done to the grounds here, though; especially the delphiniums. They were his favorite."

There was a moment then between the three of them; a moment where, despite the cool chill of the evening, it felt warmer. Maddie sighed as she thought of her dad, as she thought of Harry and his mother. And, sniffing back the impending tears, she raised her gun shoulder height and called out, "Pull!"

She aimed.

She shot.

She hit.

With a warm laugh, Charles looked to his son and smirked, "be sure to keep her away from your grandfather."
To which Harry laughed loudly. "That's great advice. Thank you."

"So..." Maddie lowered the gun and turned to Harry. "Let's see what you've got, Captain."

"Me?" Harry grinned; eyebrows rising.

Maddie nodded and, with great ease, Harry stepped up to the plate. He managed to hit a few before they were called back to the house; dinner was at the ready. Maddie, needing to change before they were seated for dinner, excused herself.

"Thank you for allowing me to show off some of the grounds," Charles took her hand in both of his; pressing a kiss to the top.

"It was quite an honor, Sir," she blushed slightly before she nodded to Harry and turned back to the house.

"Did you enjoy showing Maddie around the orchard?" Harry looked to his father as they gathered up the shotgun and headed in.

"I did," Charles nodded with a smile. "Did you know that she grew up on a farm?"

"Yes, I did."

"She has a great appreciation for the land," Charles looked out at the grounds. "She knew most of the plants by sight and she gave me this great tip on how to..." Charles trailed off, noticing the wide grin on his son's face. "She's really quite something," he offered words for what Harry was feeling.

"Yes, she is Sir," Harry agreed.

"She's met your brother and Kate. She's come to Highgrove for the weekend," Charles watched his son closely. "It seems serious."

"It feels serious," Harry looked off over the grounds; his pulse beating faster. "Does that make me crazy?"

"No, no." Charles was quick to shake his head. "You've always known what suited you best; what you wanted. Clearly you want to be with her."

"I really do," Harry nodded.

"This might be completely overstepping my bounds," Charles took a risk; a risk that was spurred on by the never-seen-before look in his son's eyes.

"Oh-kay," Harry stopped walking; his focus shifting to his father who now seemed completely sincere as he smiled wide and spoke softly,

"Nothing, nothing in your private life—or your public life to some extent—is as important as choosing your mate; the person to stand next to you," Charles swallowed the lump in his throat that had grown as he thought over this incredibly hard learned lesson. "Nothing."

Harry was speechless for a moment; his mind spinning as he thought about what his dad said, why his dad said it and what...what exactly it was he was supposed to do with that. It made his skin shiver and his heart swell; the heavi ness of it weighing on his entire body.

"Is that..." Harry cleared his throat, meeting his father's eyes. "Is that some sort of warning or omen or...

"It's encouragement, it's support, it's..." Charles patted Harry's shoulder. "She's lovely son."

"Yes," Harry took a deep breath. "Yes she is."

And together, the two men began walking back to the house.

Dinner with Harry's parents was as warm and soft as the candlelight that flickered from the table. Maddie had changed, touched up her makeup and twisted her hair up and back in a soft, loose bun. Simple, classic, understated; much like the guest suit to which she had been assigned. She smiled to herself as she wondered where Harry was going to be sleeping that night.

On her way down the stairs, she glanced at the art work hanging on the walls; the family photos that were mingled throughout. And, as she stepped into the study where they were all waiting; dressed and smiling, the two men rose to their feet instantly. Camilla followed them, linking her arm through Charles' as they followed the young couple in to dinner.

The rest of the night was relaxed and familial. Maddie shared stories of growing up on a farm; drawing them all in to some of the hilarious occurrences. Charles offered entertaining tales of Harry as a child, threatening to pull out photo albums. While Harry blushed, Maddie loved seeing the interaction between father and son. And it was incredibly clear to Maddie that Camilla adored the both of them.

Following dinner, the four moved into the study for after dinner drinks. Due to Maddie's light prodding, despite Harry's pleas not to, Charles broke out old record albums and the conversations continued. And when, finally, Charles and Camilla retired to bed, Harry smiled lovingly at the opposite end of the couch where Maddie sat. Reaching down, he pulled her feet into his lap; tossing her shoes to the floor.

"Mmmm..." She relaxed as he began to rub them. "I could get used to this—all of this." She waved her hand out towards the property.

"You like it here," Harry pointed out.

"I love it here," she corrected taking a sip from her glass.

"Well, I am sure I heard my father extend an open ended invitation so..." He took a deep breath. "It appears you can stay as long as you would like."

"He's lovely," Maddie nodded in the direction that Charles and Camilla had gone. "Your father, he's absolutely lovely."

"Hmmm..." Harry agreed with a nod. "He's not here, you know. You don't have to go on and on and on..." His eyes were playful.

"Oh is somebody jealous of the attention?" She nudged him with her toe.

"Not at all," he laughed softly. "I think he likes you too."

"I hope so," she looked down in her glass, her mind sorting through all of the emotions that she was feeling; her attachments to Harry, her growing attachments to his family, the way her heart ached when she thought of the decision she was going to have to make soon.
"You know..." Harry dropped her feet and moved to sit closer to her on the couch. "This evening, when you were shooting and my father asked about yours...you smiled."

"Oh?" Maddie lifted her eyebrows.

"Yes," he took her hand in his, playing with her fingers. "You used to get sad when people would mention him. But tonight you smiled." When his eyes lifted to meet hers he could see a mixture of sadness and memories and warmth there.

"Hmmm."

"It was nice," he kissed the top of her hand. "To see you smile."

"It was nice to remember him..." Maddie let her fingers run along his jaw. "Especially here. He really would have loved Highgrove. He would have loved to see what your father has done here and I think...imagining his reactions...made me happy. I love that being here reminded me of him."

"Me too," Harry watched as she sighed and smiled. "You know, you should invite your mother out sometime. If this brought on this kind of reaction for you, I'm sure she would enjoy it as well." Maddie felt her heart clench at the thought. Bringing her mother here, to England, to Harry—to Harry's family home. That was quite the thought.

"Hmmm...maybe." Her smile was lazy; tired. But her mind was reeling. Despite the meaning behind his offer, he was right. Her mother would adore Highgrove, and Harry. Catching her yawn, Harry rose to his feet, pulling her up behind him.

"Come on Doctor," he grinned. "Let's get you to bed."

"Whatever you say, your highness."

With muffled laughter, they held each other close; his arm wrapped around her shoulders, hers around his waist and they made their way upstairs. Though the valet had unpacked their items in separate rooms, Harry insisted on staying with her.

Though Maddie pushed him away, telling him that they were probably placed in separate rooms on purpose, Harry insisted—assuring her that was all for show and that his father would most likely not be checking in on them.

Harry endured and Maddie finally relented—allowing him to slip into her bed.

But that was where the concessions ended. As they pulled the covers up over them, she made it incredibly clear as to just what side of the bed his hands were to remain on.

Pushing his luck, he pulled her to his side where she cuddled close and with a sleepy smile, drifted off to sleep.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Harry woke before her the next day, just before her. Not moving an inch, he pressed his lips to the top of her head; inhaling her shampoo. Maddie's eyes blinked open and she stretched awake—snuggling closer and closing her eyes.

"Good Morning," he breathed in her ear.

"Not ready to wake up," Maddie groaned through smiling lips. Harry chuckled; her hair puffing up from his breath.
"Sleep well?"

"Oh my yes," Maddie nodded. "It must be the fresh, country air here."

"It must be."

"And this bed is amazing. It's like the whole purpose of it is to keep people in bed as long as possible."

"Ha!" Harry laughed. "Well, we don't have to leave. I can call up for breakfast and we can eat right here."

"Shouldn't we dress and join your father and Camilla for breakfast?"

"No, they left first thing this morning, remember."

"Ah yes," Maddie recalled with a frown. "I feel bad that I didn't say good-bye."

"Well, now that they're gone," Harry ran his fingers along her spine. "Maybe you'll let me on your side of the bed?"

"Not a chance," she slapped at his hand.

"Fine." He laughed and rolled over, reaching for the phone.

When breakfast arrived, the valet pushed the tray into the room and informed them both that Charles had left a note with the small bouquet of hand cut delphinium lying next to the food before stepping out of the room.

"Hey, it's for you," Harry handed her the envelope with her name on it.

"Oh?" She smiled, looking at the beautiful bunch of flowers that she was almost certain he had cut himself. Pulling the card from the envelope, she read.

Harry watched as her eyes teared up.

"Madeline,

I am terribly happy to have spent time with you this weekend, happy to have met you, and happy that Harry has found you.

You are a wonderful young woman and I am absolutely certain that your father would be beyond proud to call you his daughter.

Please enjoy the rest of your stay here and know that you are welcome back here any time.

~Charles"

"Wow..." Maddie brought her hand to her mouth as she held the card out to Harry. She reached for the delphinium and was incredibly touched by the gesture.

"Smooth," Harry shook his head in awe. "My father is incredibly smooth."

"Must run in the family," she winked at him.

"You think I'm smooth?"
"You? Oh no," she shook her head as she moved to his coat pocket, successfully locating what she was looking for; two pieces of her Christmas candy. She tossed one in the air to him and unwrapped the other. "No. You're not smooth at all."
Chapter 25

It was early Saturday afternoon and Maddie and Harry had eventually made it out of bed. Dressed for the day, Harry offered to give her a tour of the house. When they stepped into the library, Maddie's eyes grew wide and her heart skipped a beat. Taking in the tall shelves full of books that looked old and loved, she wanted to curl up in this room for at least a day.

"Wow..." She breathed, clearly in awe.

"Really? The library?" Harry crossed his arms and watched as she went to the shelves; her fingers reaching out to touch the stacks with reverence.

"I've always wanted a library," she confessed somewhat shyly.

"Well..." Harry smiled in amusement. "Do you want to spend some time here? I can grab my laptop and do some work, you can read whatever you like and..."

"Yes," Maddie nodded, not bothering to look back at him.

"Okay," he laughed at how quick her response was. "I'm just going to go grab my laptop and I'll be back. Need anything?"

"No," she shook her head, tossing a quick smile in his direction. "I'm just going to pick a book...or twelve." Harry shook his head as he stepped from the room, certain he had just lost his girlfriend to a shelf of books.

When Harry returned, Maddie was stretched out on one of the couches in the room; a book in her hands and two in her lap. With a tender smile, he took residence on the couch across from her. Opening up his laptop, he settled on the opposite end as she did; wanting to be able to watch her face as she dove into the books.

And there they sat for at least an hour. Harry answered emails and read briefings as Maddie scanned the books. She would occasionally offer up a light chuckle or a groan at whatever was occurring in the book. Harry would look up, watch her face for a moment and then, with a grin, return to his work. It was not lost on him how easy it was for them to sit in the same space, be wrapped up in completely different tasks yet—still be so at peace with each other. It felt safe, content.

He loved it.

He had grown so used to her silence, to her attention being focused on the books that when he glanced up from his computer to see her watching him, it surprised him.

"Hi," Maddie smiled, seeing his slight flinch.

"Hi," his voice was cautious at the curve of her grin. "What's on your mind?"

"I was just wondering..." She closed the book in her lap; her finger holding her place in the pages. "What would you consider our first date?"

"Well..." Harry gave it some thought. "I guess I don't know..."

"Would you say it was the Community Party?" Maddie's eyes narrowed as she thought it over. "Or the night of the reception when we finally figured it out...I don't know...that first night in London when we went out with your friends?"

"God. I really don't know," Harry shook his head, leaning forward. "I'm not sure we've been on an actual first date. Jesus. I'm a terrible boyfriend."

"No," she shook her head, waving her hand. "Sorry. I didn't ask that to...I'm not complaining. Maybe we just...happened, without a first date. Is that how things normally work for you?"

"Well," Harry moved his laptop to the side; turning to face her. "Things don't work out normally for me ever. So...nothing is out of the question, I suppose."

"It's kind of nice actually," Maddie sighed. "Not having to worry about what to wear or if he's going to like me or if he'll kiss me at the end of the night...you know...none of the first date stuff." Harry watched as she shrugged and turned back to her book.

He studied her thoughtfully for a moment before rising to his feet. Pulling his phone from his pocket, he pressed a few buttons. As Maddie's ringtone rang out, she looked confused as she pulled it out. Her eyes rose to his.

"Harry?"

"Hmmm?" He raised his eyebrows; phone pressed to his ear.

"You're calling me?" She held up her still ringing phone.

"Yes," he nodded. "Are you going to answer or what?"

"I'm right here."

"Answer the phone Maddie." He instructed. With a suspicious look on her face, she pulled the phone to her ear.

"Hello?" She smirked.

"Hello," Harry grinned. "It's me, Harry."

"Yes, I can see that."

"How is your day going?"

"How is my...Harry? What is happening right now?" She pulled her phone from her ear. Harry shook his head, motioning for her to get back on it. With a small huff, she did so. "My day is going well, thank you."

"Fantastic!" He ran his free hand through his hair and met her eyes. "Listen, I was wondering if, maybe, you would be free tonight to join me...for a date."

"Oh for Heaven's sake," she laughed. "I didn't say that earlier to make you feel like you had to..."

"Like I had to?!" He laughed. "I don't have to do anything. I want to take you out tonight. I'll pick you up, we can do dinner, drinks...something else I have in mind." He shrugged. "You won't have to worry about if he likes you or rather or not he'll kiss you at the end. Both are a resounding yes. But we'll have a good time. I promise."

"You're asking me on a date?" Maddie's heart melted slightly as a mushy smile spread across her lips.
"Not very successfully, but yes," he nodded.

"Hmmm..." Maddie watched him, her bottom lip pulled between her teeth. "I don't know, I have a pretty busy schedule and this is kind of last minute..."

"Oh-ho!" Harry laughed, his hand resting on his chest over his heart. "Be kind, Madeline."

"Well, I'm not sure I want to leave the country and go back to the city just yet."

"We won't. I promise."

"Okay," she sighed with a wide smile. "Okay. I would love to see you tonight."

"Wonderful. Can you be ready at seven?"

"I can."

"Then, it's a date."

"Yes, I suppose it is."

With a matching wide smile, Harry ended the call and, tossing his phone in the air and catching it, "I'm going to go make plans. You...enjoy the house, the grounds....and I'll pick you up at seven." He turned from the room; his mind working through the plans. "Oh! And wear pants. And real shoes."

"Real shoes?" One eyebrow lifted in confusion.

"You know, nothing strappy. Something sturdy."

"Oh-kay..."

"Wait!" He hurried back in, leaning to kiss her upturned mouth and then, with a quick peck to her cheek, he smiled and left her alone.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

As Maddie put finishing touches on her hair, she glanced at the clock—worried that she hadn't seen the least bit of Harry since he left her in the library. After finishing the first of three books she had pulled from the shelf, she had sat the other two aside and began to prepare for the evening. She slipped into her first-date-appropriate-pants-required-no-strappy-shoes outfit, spritzed on some perfume, grabbed her clutch and stepped out of the room.

Feeling suddenly nervous, and more than a little silly, she made her way through the halls. It was ten till seven as she knocked on the door to his room.

"Harry?" She knocked again, pushing the door open. She glanced around quickly. Though he had certainly been there, the room was empty. Closing the door behind her, she made her way towards the staircase. Looking down over the railing, she saw him. He stood in the foyer, oblivious to her presence as he checked his hair in the mirror. He looked absolutely stunning. Maddie rolled her eyes at the butterflies stirring in her stomach. With a deep breath she began down the stairs. At the sound of her footsteps, he turned to look up at her.

If she had been watching carefully, she would have seen his eyes widen slightly as he took her in, she would have heard the way his breath caught in his throat and she would have sensed that his heart rate had picked up the pace. She would have known that he suddenly felt just as inexplicably nervous as she did. Nevertheless, Maddie was too caught up in the warmth of his smile, the twinkle in his blue eyes and the way her heart flip flopped in her chest to register anything else.

"I've been wondering where you were," Maddie smiled as she joined him at the bottom of the stairs.

"You look...wonderful," he leaned in to kiss her. Maddie breathed him in; he smelled amazing.

"Thank you," she took a breath. "Are these pants okay?" She waved down at her outfit. "And the shoes?"

"Perfect," he smiled and stepped away from her. She watched as he retrieved a large bag from where it sat on a nearby table. Holding it out to her, "this is for you."

"Oh?" Her eyebrows lifted. "A gift?"

"Yes," he smiled. "Also something you can use tonight."

"Oh-intrigue," Maddie opened the bag and gasped. "Harry!" Pulling out a cute, chic leather jacket, she looked up at him with confused eyes. "This is fantastic but..."

"Here, let me," he took the jacket from her; setting the bag aside. Maddie turned and slid her arms into the jacket as he held it up for her. "How does it fit?"

"Perfect," she looked down. Though she wouldn't have thought to pair a leather jacket with the outfit she was wearing, it gave it a funky, edgy look that she instantly adored; her purple flowy shirt in stark contrast to the slick black leather. "I...thank you," she kissed him. "I'm just confused..."

"Sure," he laughed and reached for her hand. "Come with me." Holding onto her, he opened the front door and led her outside. There, in the drive was his motorcycle.

"Oh wow..."

"I would like to take you out on the bike tonight," Harry explained as they hurried down the steps to it. "You can say no if you want to, I know it's not the best on the hair and..."

"Yes," she interrupted; her excitement evident as she nodded with a grin.

"That easy huh?"

"Are you kidding? My uncle had a bike and when we were younger, he would take us up in the mountains and..." She trailed off as he pulled on his own jacket. "Look at you." Her voice lowered. "You look amazing."

"Thank you," he winked as he lifted a helmet from the seat and moved to her. "May I?" He nodded to her head. Maddie twisted her hair back into a ponytail at the base of her head and nodded to him.

"Be my guest." Harry was careful as he put the helmet on her head, loving that she wasn't too stuffy or concerned about her hair to go with him. He fastened the strap under her chin and leaned in to kiss her. Pulling back, he adjusted his own helmet and swung his leg over the bike.

When he reached out for her hand, Maddie wasn't entirely sure what she wanted more; to slide onto the back of the bike or to pull him back into the house and have her way with him.
"Are you coming?" He grinned devilishly—not making her decision any easier.

Remembering that this was their first date, she decided to go with the former; she could have her way with him later. Taking his hand, she moved onto the seat behind him. He guided her hands around his waist. Leaning close to him, she could feel the hum of the bike below her, and the hum of her want for him inside of her. Harry's hand came back, sliding along her thigh and patting her.

"Let me know if you've had enough."

"Okay," she spoke into his ear—though she was absolutely certain that that would never be the case.

And then with expert ease, Harry drove them down the drive and away from Highgrove. Maddie watched as the scenery flew by, felt the wind around her and her spirit soared.

The night was an unmitigated success. They dined at The Snooty Fox. They had after dinner drinks at The Royal Oak. Harry helped her off the bike before stepping off himself, securing the helmets before escorting her inside. He held doors and pulled out chairs and fell in love with the way her hair mussed after wearing a helmet. Maddie was funny and chatty and smiled wide as she ate until she was full and not once did she have to run off to the restroom to check, check and double check her hair and makeup. Yes, it was a first date of sorts; they were picking up on traits in the other that they hadn't caught before then. Maddie liked her salad dressing on the side. Harry preferred rye over wheat. But the ease between them told of the well-established relationship that was far past the first date.

At The Royal Oak Maddie had three drinks and, because he was driving, Harry had only one. Maddie felt warm and giddy and completely taken by the man who sat next to her, whispering fun facts about Tetbury in her ear. The people around them seemed very unaffected by Harry's presence; it was almost disarming. She wondered if they didn't recognize him, if they recognized him and didn't care, or if they had grown so accustomed to having him and his family around that they had grown to think of him as one of their own and, therefore felt protective of him—just like his friends and family. As they stepped out of the pub, a light mist was settling over the town; the night air had grown chilly.

"You want to head back?" Harry ran his hands over her arms; as though the friction might warm her.

"I was hoping to see more of the countryside," she took a deep, crisp breath. "But if you think we should..."

"Nah," he shook his head. Looking down at her with adoration in his eyes, he pulled her into his arms; hugging her tight to him. "You'll be warm enough?"

"Snuggled up to you?" She held him just as tight; her head tilting up to look at him—her chin resting on his chest. "Most definitely."

Harry laughed; a loud, happy, from the gut laugh; and then, pressing a kiss to her forehead, her nose, then her lips, he patted her ass and released her from his bear hug. Maddie laughed as he handed her the helmet; pulling his own onto his head. Harry climbed onto the bike and then, with his hand holding her steady, Maddie climbed on behind him.

Both were acutely aware of the warmth that passed between them, of the way the town—grown hazy with the mist—made the landscape even more breathtaking. But neither of them were aware of the young college student who stood almost two blocks away; her camera phone out—snapping as they drove off into the night.

Through many winding roads, over hill after hill, Harry and Maddie traveled along the English countryside. She held tightly to him, taking it all in. Yes, her nose was growing cold. Yes, she could feel the chill. But the rewards; the scenery, the closeness, the abandon, were all worth those costs. Maddie could feel Harry move one of his hands over hers; for a long beat, his fingers intertwined with hers. He moved her hand higher; up over his heart and with a warm squeeze, he returned his hand to the bike; steering them back to Highgrove.

Harry helped her from the bike first, before stepping off and reaching for her helmet. Though he chuckled at her hair as she pulled it from her head, he honestly could not have found her sexier than he did in that moment.

"Are you laughing at my hair?" She narrowed her eyes at him.

"I am," he confessed. "But only in the most loving way possible."

"Laugh away Wales. I don't even care," she shrugged, tucking her hands into her pockets for warmth. "You've seen me in a hospital bed after three days without a shower. This is nothing."

"Excellent point," he smiled and, finished with the bike and the helmets, wrapped his arms around her. "And I think this look is cute."

"Ah, you're just jockeying for a goodnight kiss," she grinned.

"Maybe," he laughed. "Are you freezing?"

"No," she shook her head. "Why? What did you have in mind?"

"Come with me," he released his hold on her and took her hand. Pulling her with him, they walked into the house; quickly through the halls. On his way through the living room, he grabbed a plush, warm blanket draped over the back of the couch. As they walked briskly through the kitchen, he went straight to the wine cellar, his eyes squinting as he read the labels. "Here we go..." He grabbed a bottle, quickly retrieved an opener and two glasses. And, before Maddie could offer to carry anything, he was pulling her back outside.

"Where are we going?" She tucked her arm in the crook of his elbow; her voice lowered to a whisper.

"Where you never ended up with my father," Harry's smile was sweet, endearing as he looked to her. Maddie shook her head in confusion. But she held tight to him. They walked quickly through the thyme, they hurried past the Gladiator sculpture and stepped along the path on the far side of the orchard. As they walked past the Temples, Maddie felt Harry's muscles flex. Focusing her eyes, she saw it.

"The Tree House," she sighed.

"The Tree House," he confirmed; the excitement in his voice clear as day.

Maddie let go of his arm so that they could successfully navigate up the stairs and onto the small deck that surrounded the house. Laying the blanket out on the ground, Harry gestured for Maddie to have a seat; which she very quickly did. Harry followed behind her as he opened the bottle of wine.

"Now this..." Maddie smiled as she took a glass of wine from him. "This is a tour."
"Yes," he sat down the bottle and moved closer to her. "Yes it is." Leaning back against the tree house, Harry pulled her to him. And she went, snuggling up under his arm; close to his side. Tipping his glass slightly towards her, he toasted, "to you."

"To you," she nodded; clinking her glass to his before taking a sip. They settled into silence; looking up at the sky, the stars, the surrounding trees. Maddie leaned against him as she turned her head to look at the house that was supporting them. "This is a pretty great set up you have here."

"Yes," Harry chuckled. "It certainly was."

"Did you and your brother spend a lot of time here?"

"Not a lot," he shook his head. "But enough. We used to pretend we were soldiers at war..." He took a drink from his glass. "It's nothing like actually being a soldier at war—in case you were wondering."

"Hmmm," Maddie smiled sadly; as she did anytime she thought of him in that scenario. "Do you think you'll ever go back there? To the front line?"

"I don't know," he shook his head. "I doubt they'll send me back. This last time I was going to be in the air and they still pulled me..." He let out a breath and looked to her. "How about you? Are you planning on returning to the front line?"

"Sorry?" She looked up at him quizzically; her heart skipping a beat.

"Well, Bendal was at times just as much a war zone as some of the places I've been."

"You think?" She was surprised at this; that this topic was coming up in this moment.

"I know that wasn't the first time you saw a man with a gun, Maddie. As much as I hate to think of it, I know that was a common thing, wasn't it." She sat upright, turning to look at him; trying to read what was going on in his mind. Sighing, she nodded.

"You're right. That wasn't the first time I saw a man with a gun."

"Just because you weren't armed, doesn't mean you weren't fighting."

"That's very profound," she reached for his hand. "Where is this coming from right now?"

"I was just thinking about you and Bendal and..."

"Don't," she interrupted with a nervous smile.

"Sorry?" A small laugh escaped his lips.

"Don't" she smiled; shaking her head. "Not tonight. Not...here..." She waved her hand at their surroundings. "Think about this. Think about...think about how great those tomatoes were in the salad. Think about that poor man trying to get that lady's attention at the pub. Think about...think about riding in the dark with just me and the wind and..." She took a deep breath. "And let's not get worked up about something that may never ever be an issue."

"Maddie..." His voice was so sad, his eyes so tender that she felt her heart ache in her chest. But she held his gaze, squeezed his hand, took a deep breath and avoided the topic.

"I had a lovely time tonight," she smiled. "Truly. It was perfect—as far as first dates are concerned." Maddie bit her lip as she watched him process it all; as she watched him debate what to do next. Should he take her direction and avoid what was hanging just ahead of them or should he dig in and force the issue. He swallowed the lump in his throat and nodded; she would win this round.

"Are you saying I have a shot at a second date?" He raised his eyebrows. His efforts meant the world to her as he allowed her to avoid this for at least the moment.

"Yes," she laughed; blinking back the tears that had risen to her eyes. "You absolutely have a shot at a second date." She took a drink from her glass and swallowed. "Truly, there is only one thing that would have topped this all off..."

"This." Without blinking Harry held out a piece of her candy. Her eyes went wide, and the tears returned.

"Wow..." She breathed. "You really love me don't you?"

"I really do," he laughed; at himself, at this predicament he found himself in.

"Hmm..." Maddie grinned, plucking the candy from his hand. "I'm a lucky gal, you know."

"Oh I know," he laughed again as she chewed. Leaning in to kiss her, he nuzzled his nose to hers and pulled back. "You're freezing."

"Am not," she shook her head; her rosy cheeks betraying her.

"Come on," he rolled his eyes and stood; holding his hand out to her. "Come on Madeline, let's go inside and get warm."

"Fine," she sighed. Taking his outstretched hand, she rose to her feet. Harry leaned down, scooping the blanket up.

"Here we go," he wrapped the blanket around her and gathered their glasses and the wine. Harry's free hand remained at her neck, just off to the side as they walked towards the house.

The contented silence returned as they stepped inside. They removed shoes and jackets and, after wrapping herself back up in the blanket, she followed Harry upstairs; her hand held tightly in his. They slipped into his room and, before he could shut the door, he paused.

"You know, I'm going to run to the library and get my laptop. I want to plug it in before we go to bed."

"Oh! I'll come with you," Maddie perked up slightly. "I want to grab those books. Maybe I can sneak in a little reading in the morning."

"You stay here," he kissed her forehead. "I'll bring your books back with me. Get comfortable."

"Okay," she smiled up at him; thankful for his chivalrous natures. "Thank you."

"No problem." With a smile, he was gone.

Maddie sat on the edge of his bed for a moment; allowing the blanket to warm her. And then, her mind wandered; remembering the entirety of their date. It had been such an amazing night; from... start to finish. She closed her eyes and tried to burn every single moment into her mind; the leather jacket, the way he looked on the bike, the way he pulled her to him, the food, the drinks, the tree house; the way he knew her, the way he loved her, the way he caved to her when she knew he wanted to talk about it, the way he touched her and held her and kissed her...the way she longed to be close to him, the way her mind kept reminding her that she had a career, a life, to return to that had nothing to do with this man, and the way her heart kept shouting down that noise with an overwhelming argument in favor of Harry.

Maddie opened her eyes and stood. Letting the blanket lay across his desk, she felt snug and cozy in his room, in his space. With very little debate, Maddie shed her purple silky blouse, tossing it aside. Her pants slid off easily, joining her shirt with a flick of her ankle. And there she stood, in nothing but a silk and lace camisole and boy shorts; her hair mussed, her cheeks pink.

She could hear him coming back to the room; his footsteps giving him away. When he stepped into the room, his eyes were focused on one of her books, his voice low and dramatic as he read from the pages, "Words! Mere words! How terrible they were! How clear, and vivid, and cruel! One could not escape from them. And yet what a subtle magic there was in them..." His eyes rose to her then; his words and his feet halting. Maddie smiled as seductively as she could manage.

"I was thinking of allowing you onto my side of the bed tonight."

"Are you sure?" He sat his laptop and the other books on his stand before walking over to her. "It is a first date and I don't want to take advantage...you are drunk, right?"

"Maybe a little," she giggled; stepping into his space, pressing her body to his and looking up at him through half-lowered lashes. "Keep reading."

"Really?!" His eyebrows lifted as he looked from her to the book and back again. "You're turned on by Oscar Wilde? The Picture of Dorian Gray does it for you?"

"It's not the book," she laughed, her hands slipping into his shirt; between the buttons. "It's your voice. You could be reading the phonebook and I would let you have your way with me; here and now."

And suddenly, she was standing alone while he moved around the room; searching shelves and his desk. "What are you doing?" She crossed her arms.

"Looking for a bloody phonebook!" He called out to her; his eyes meeting hers as she laughed.

"Come on," and he was on his way. When he reached her, he captured her in his arms, pressed his body flush to hers; his lips moving against hers. Maddie took a step backwards, towards his bed, but he remained still; halting her movement. His eyes swept over her and desire coursed through his veins. She was undeniably attractive; sweet and sassy and incredibly sexy.

"Wait." Her determination faded as Harry's hand rested firmly on her hip spinning her around and moving her back; sandwiching her between him and his desk.

"Here?" She asked with a glance at his desk.

"Now." He answered; his grin sending a chill down her spine.

"Oh..." She breathed. His hand at her hip slid down her side to the hem of her boy shorts. Slipping up under the fabric, his fingers drew a shiver from her skin as they moved higher and higher.

"Are you sure this arm can support your weight now?" His other hand moved to trace the scar that was at her shoulder.
"Yes..." She gulped. Harry bent to kiss the scar and then, in one fluid motion his hands were slipping out from under her shorts to grip firmly at her hips; sitting her up on the edge of his desk. The blanket underneath her provided a soft cushion.

Pressing closer, his lips caught hers; strangling the moan she had no control over. In an instant, her hands were at work; tugging his shirt from his pants; pulling him closer and closer still.

Quickly, and slightly clumsily, Harry pulled her camisole up and over her head and looked down at the shorts. He stood, dumbfounded by the sight; Maddie in nothing but those tiny, sassy shorts, perched on his desk with mussed up hair and flushed cheeks from their time outside. He had the slight presence of mind to wonder if she would forever have this effect on him.

"Harry..." Maddie breathed; pulling at his loosened shirt in effort to bring him closer and rid him of his clothing. His lips never leaving hers, Harry's hands took over for her, finishing off his buttons; his shirt falling to the floor. Maddie made quick work of his belt and just as soon, his pants were in a pool at his feet. Maddie's breath sucked in as she looked him over in his boxers; the image of him on the bike burned in her memory.

Surprise washed over her face when Harry pulled his lips from hers, moving down the column of her neck to her chest. Her breathing stopped when he continued down her stomach to the lacy top of her boy shorts—her only remaining clothing item. And when his hands ran down her legs, taking those shorts with him, to her ankles, slipping them off her feet with a toss, she felt her skin scorch.

His hands gripped her hips and moved them closer to the edge. Then, as he took a seat in his desk chair, he moved her feet so that they were resting on the arms of his chair. Her breath sucked into her lungs.

When he looked up to her with a devilish grin and naughty eyes, she gulped. He had another idea entirely.

And when she felt his hot breath against her, in that most intimate of places, her head fell back and a groan escaped her lips. "Oh God..." Her hands fell back to the surface of his desk; her elbows struggling to keep her upright. This was exactly why he had checked on her arm; he had every intention of turning her muscles into mush.

He chuckled lightly; the sensation of which almost sent her over the edge. His mouth was magic; his lips tantalizing, his tongue...

"Harry..." She moaned his name, hoping to lure him back up to her. But any hopes she might have had of him relaxing or giving her a moment to catch up were dashed completely as he pressed on.

Diligent.

Thorough.

"Harry..." She panted wanting desperately to pull one hand into the thick red hair that was tickling the inside of her thighs. But she didn't dare move for fear of collapse.

And he refused to budge.

"Please..." She moaned in a tone so close to begging that at any other moment she would be embarrassed. But she couldn't bring herself to care. "Harry. Please. I want you..." Pausing to collect her breath; he was tenacious. "I need you inside of me Harry...please."
And Harry, never one to turn down a request from her, obliged happily; though not quite the way she had in mind. When his tongue plunged inside of her, she could hear items falling from his desk to the floor, she could feel her arms weaken. And she hoped that nothing on the desk was irreplaceable.

But he remained steady, he remained focused and when she began to gasp and tighten her legs around him, he held onto her, unwilling to let her fall.

Refusing her attempts to pull him higher, ignoring his own throbbing desires, he stayed in place. And he was rewarded for his efforts; with moans and groans and the sound of her calling his name out in the breathy, sticky way that made him weak in the knees.

That night had been a rollercoaster for him. He had worried initially about just how far he had fallen for her and then, later in the date, he had worried about the distinct possibility that she could leave him; absolutely brokenhearted.

But, as she tightened around him and allowed him to bring her over the edge, he worried about nothing; felt nothing...except for an intense desire to bring her to that point again.

Maddie had zero time to recover, barely at the end of the intensity that had just flooded her body, when he moved. The chair pushed behind him as he stood. His arms pulled at her hungrily, gathering her close and pulling her flush to him. His hand cradled her neck, still loose and tilted back as his lips sought her skin. He planted big, wet, open mouthed kisses along the hollow of her neck.

Acting on instinct, her legs wrapped around his waist; aching for more contact, greater friction. Lifting her up off the desk, Harry moved them both. With blind faith, he turned them back towards his bed. Regaining a semblance of herself, Maddie's hands moved up his arms over his shoulders, to his face; pulling it to hers. Her lips pushed onto his, her tongue entering his mouth in a vain attempt to communicate the enormous amount of desire she had for him in that moment, in every moment. Yes, she had doubts about what was going to happen for her in the future, but her doubts were never, EVER about how much she wanted to be with him; how much she loved him.

"Hold on," he whispered into her ear. And she did; her hands held tight to him as he lowered them to the bed. Her back felt the luxurious fabric as she laid back, pulling him with her. His boxers pulled from his body in one blink of Maddie's eyes; heavy with lust.

Her mouth opened, ready to plead for him to take her. But her pleas were quickly replaced with his tongue. Without another thought, another word, he entered her. A happy moan escaped her lips as her body reacted reflexively; her hips moving up to meet him.

"Madeline..." He groaned into her ear, his body pressing against hers in a mixture of sweat and desire; his voice making a melody of her name.

"Yes..." She gasped, her eyes opening to watch him; to watch as he moved above her, to watch as his own passion grew and grew and drew him closer to where he had always managed to take her.

"Maddie..." His voice held warning and she knew he was close. Wrapping her arms around his neck, she smiled up at him and nodded ever so slightly.

"Yes..." She encouraged him; her legs tightening around his waist. "Yes Harry...yes...yes..." She arched up then, her lips seeking his; her hands stroking down his back and when she felt him tense slightly and speed up, she let her breath loose and felt her own moment building. "oh...." She moaned; slightly surprised, more than ready. Sensing this, Harry adjusted slightly and pressed on. And then, as her fingers pressed into the skin of his back, Maddie was going for the second time... that night and he was right behind her.

"I love you," she breathed into his ear; his face buried in her neck as their hearts worked to steady themselves. "I love you...I love you..."

Eventually their hearts would slow, their breathing would steady and that night, Harry would fall asleep with her voice in his heart. She loved him. He was certain he could work with everything else.

The next morning Maddie awoke to the buzz of her cellphone on the stand next to her. Harry remained asleep, his light snore now a source of comfort for her. Moving cautiously, she slipped from the bed and wrapped up in her robe; not wanting to wake him. She stepped out into the cool morning air of the balcony and answered the phone.

When she stepped back into the room with the phone cradled close to her chest, Maddie was beaming.

"Who was that?" Harry called to her from the bed. He had barely woken just moments before but even he could see the tiniest of flinches cross her face as she looked to him.

"Khenda," she took a breath and held it. "She wants me back in Bendal."
"Khenda," she took a breath and held it. "She wants me back in Bendal."

"Wow..." Harry let the word tumble from his mouth as he sat up in bed; his heart and mind racing against each other.

"It's not what you think," Maddie moved quickly; tossing her phone aside as she climbed back onto the bed, moving towards him. "It's...I'm not..." Her eyes looked to him, wanting to take the sadness away. "She said that the community has recovered, mostly, from what happened the night..."

"The night you were shot," he provided the words she couldn't seem to say.

"Yes," she nodded. "They have repaired buildings, replanted the garden, and for the most part, morale has been lifted."

"But..." Harry's arms rested on his raised knees.

"But the kids..." Maddie smiled softly as she moved into professional mode. "Children have a more difficult time with the abstract. They are more concrete thinkers; more linear. And the last time some of them saw me..." Maddie trailed off as she met his eyes; hard and cold as he remembered. "Even though they tell the children that I'm fine, that I've recovered, they are having a hard time believing it. Almost all the people they know that are shot...die."

"Sure," Harry nodded; sad as he thought of it.

"So the staff Psychologist asked Khenda if she had any way to contact me, to see if I could come down—for a short visit—so that the kids could see with their own eyes that I am alive and well somewhere in the world."

"Okay," Harry breathed; feeling a little less tense.

"It's important, Harry. It's important that they know I'm okay, that sometimes people make it. And I'll only be gone Monday through Thursday really. I have to be back to meet with the DWB staff on Friday and...the psychologist, Khenda, they would not have called if it weren't important. My going down there could be a big turn for some of these kids and..."

"You don't have to explain," he held his hand up with a genuine smile. "I get it, Maddie. It makes sense. When do you leave?"

"When do I..." She shook her head with a chuckle. "Just like that? You're fine with it. Just like that."

"Hey..." Harry reached for her hand. "I'm sorry if I made you feel like you had to explain things to me, like you had to find an excuse for doing something other than you wanting to do it." He kissed the back of her hand. "You don't have to do that Maddie. I want you to...I want you to be wherever you want to be, to do whatever you want to do."

"But..."

"When do you need to be back in London?"

"I...I don't know. I was going to..." She looked around the room, her mind a little off as she took it all in. Harry; clearly saddened by the mention of her returning to Bendal yet being totally, completely supportive of her going. She almost didn't know what to do with that kind of support—even from him. "Hey, do you..." She took a breath and took a chance. "Do you want to come with me?" Stunned, Harry opened his mouth, but nothing came out. Maddie rushed ahead of him. "Sorry, I know you have stuff to do, a busy schedule and you probably..."

"Yes," Harry cut in.

"What?"

"What?" He laughed. "You asked if I wanted to come with you. I said yes."

"You don't have stuff to do?"

"I do," he shrugged. "But most of it is stuff I can do on the road. I have one meeting on Wednesday that I can reschedule for Friday morning when we return. It won't be a problem at all. It's a standing meeting, nothing urgent."

"Wow."

"Were you being serious? When you asked...did you mean it or were you just trying to pacify me?"

"I meant it," she smiled wide. "I...you're coming with me?"

"Well, if I could get you to tell me when we need to be back in London, I would love to come with you, but so far..." Harry's light ribbing was cut short as Maddie wrapped her arms around his neck and kissed him; all of her excitement pouring through to him.

"Thank you," she breathed between kisses. "Thank you..."

"For what?" He raised his eyebrows, his arms moving around her.

"Being you..." She met his eyes for a moment; a heavy, love-flooded moment, before she hugged him tight again.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

From the moment Harry agreed to go with her on the short trip to Bendal, their lazy Sunday morning quickly gave way to a whirlwind of preparations. They were packed and in the car faster than Maddie could have ever imagined. As the car pulled away from Highgrove, she felt such conflicting emotions. She was happy to return to Bendal, to see her friends, her family and to help ease some of the angst that the children were dealing with. But, as the trees disappeared from her sight, she felt sad, upset even, to be leaving this wonderful part of the country that reminded her so much of her past, of her home—and provided a glimpse into what could be her future. Reaching for Harry's hand, she took a deep breath. At least he was coming with her.

When they returned to his place at Kensington Palace, Harry shifted quickly into work mode; he made phone call after phone call, arranging travel (she had offered, he had insisted) and moving around his schedule. Maddie, feeling the need to ground herself slightly, called Ella.

Ella was lively and boisterous and shared the great news that she had accepted a job offer to be a flight nurse in London. She would be apartment shopping this next week. And when Maddie told her that she and Harry were preparing to return to Bendal, she grew quiet.

"Are you coming back?" Ella asked tentatively.
"Of course," Maddie laughed. "I have that appointment on Friday. I can't miss it."

"Maddie..." Ella began and, just as quickly, ended. She knew her best friend well. Though she very much wanted to yell at her to stay in London, to come apartment shopping with her—most hopefully for something with two bedrooms—she knew better. Telling Maddie what to do was never a good idea, even when it was a great idea. So she wished her friend luck, demanded that she be careful, and made her promise to meet her for lunch when she returned—longing for details about Highgrove.

When Maddie finished her call with Ella, she found Harry in the kitchen, searching his fridge for a drink. He looked up to her when she entered the room, and smiled wide.

"So?" She smiled back.

"You ready to leave?"

"Now?" She was shocked.

"Two hours," he answered. "We leave for the airport in about thirty minutes. Does that work for you?"

"Yes," she sighed. "That was pretty impressive work on your part."

"Yes, well," he shrugged. "Most of the time, it takes me weeks to draft a memo but, occasionally—when it's important—I can make things happen."

"Harry..." Maddie's voice took a serious turn.

"Hmm?" He raised his eyebrows.

"I love you for this," she took a breath. "For a lot of reasons. But this...this is pretty high on the list."

"Good to know," he grinned and then, remembering something, he moved towards the counter—reaching for something. "I thought you might want this for the trip." Her eyes moved to the book in his hand.

"The Picture of Dorian Gray?!" Maddie laughed. "Did you steal that from your father's library?"

"I borrowed," he corrected with a smirk. "It is a library after all."

"Nicely done."

"You love me for this now, don't you." He winked at her.

"You know it," she laughed; reaching out to snatch the book from him. Leaning up, she kissed his lips. "Thank you."

"Mmm..." He nodded; his lips brushing hers as he did. Kissing her one more time, he patted her ass and pulled away. "Let's get packed up. Those kids in Bendal have waited long enough to see you, don't you think?"

"Wow...you are really knocking it out of the park today." And, with an adoring smile, she followed him out of the kitchen.
Two hours later, they were in the air; on the first leg of this spur of the moment trip to Bendal. Harry had his laptop open, reading through information that had been waiting for him to look through on Monday; wanting to get as much work done before they landed as he could. Maddie, sighing happily, reached into her bag for the book Harry had confiscated for her. As she pulled it out, a piece of her Christmas candy fell out along with it. Knowing she hadn't packed any candy, there could be only one other way. Holding the candy in her fingers, she looked over at him; the man who had, in less than a year, turned her entire world on its head. Her heart was full as she settled back into her seat, pulling the wrapper off the candy and opening her book.

Bendal and all of the questions this trip was bound to raise, were miles and hours away. Soon—they would be there very soon.
Arriving in Bendal brought about a rush of feelings for Maddie. It was later Monday when they finally touched down. The heat immediately hit her; warming every inch of her skin along with her smile. And as they drove closer and closer to the place she had called home for a year, her lungs opened up; breathing in the essence that was Bendal. They were early; earlier than anyone expected them. And, when the car pulled up to a stop on the street outside of the main complex that had been the last place Maddie remembered being, she felt her heart ache in her chest.

"Well, Doctor," Harry's voice broke into her thoughts. "You ready for this?" She turned to him then, finding a wide smile on his face.

"Actually," she lowered her voice. "I wanted to do one thing before we go in."

"Oh?" He raised an eyebrow. "What's that?"

"Come on," she gestured and, together, they stepped from the car. Of course, in Bendal as in London, Harry had a security officer with him. This had become such a fixture in her life that it no longer felt strange to have a third person along with them most of the time.

Taking his hand in hers, she led him across the street towards the home where the children lived. Knowing that there was an event planned, knowing the psychologists were preparing the children to see her, she didn't want to disturb them. Though she desperately wanted to see them, to see some of what she loved most about her time there. Careful not to make noise, they peeked through the gate. Harry held his hand to his lips; suppressing a chuckle as he watched her. The garden was back; growing and blooming. The children were off in the distance; playing and laughing.

Maddie's eyes scanned around, looking at the green house that had remained relatively undamaged in all the craziness. She nudged Harry in the side and pointed.

"Care to give it a go for old time's sake?" She joked easily.

"Don't tempt me," Harry grinned. It seemed as though she wasn't the only one relaxing into the air and the sun of Bendal.

"Maybe later?" She offered.

"Say the word." Maddie laughed, knowing he was completely serious. Taking his hand back in hers, she turned back to look at the main complex. It looked not at all different than it had when she had last been there. She took a breath as she remembered the last time she was there. They had taken almost the exact same route they were on now. Though it had been raining heavily. And there was much more screaming. Feeling her shiver, Harry looked to her; concern in his eyes.

"You okay?"

"Yeah," she nodded and continued on. They passed through the main gate and, without any issue, stepped right through the main doors; and that night came crashing back. Harry's jaw clenched as his hand squeezed hers. Maddie took a deep breath and let it out slowly; her eyes looking around, scanning the room—remembering everything.

Just as Maddie opened her mouth to ask him the question he had asked her, she was interrupted.

"Maddie!" Her smile stretched across her face.

"Khenda!" Maddie turned just in time to see her friend's matching smile before she was pulled into a bone-crushing hug.
"Collins!" Khenda shouted out. "They're here!" And then she moved to pull Harry into her arms; breaking nine kinds of protocol—and not caring one bit. As she did, Collins came through the door and with his wide, bright smile, he pulled Maddie to him. Hugging her tight, he lifted her right off the ground.

"It's so good to see you Doc," his voice was welcoming as he kissed her cheeks.

"Oh God, you have no idea," Maddie looked around at all of their happy faces.

"You look amazing," Khenda looked her over. "So refreshed and happy."

"I am," Maddie allowed a glance to Harry. "I am refreshed and happy."

"Thank you for coming," Khenda's face grew slightly more serious. "It's going to mean the world to them that you are here."

"No problem at all," Maddie shook her head.

"So, do you want to come in and meet the two new yous?" Khenda asked; nodding towards her old office.

"Not really," Maddie laughed nervously. But Khenda insisted. It was time for her first meeting. They are going to meet with the new Psychologists to discuss what was going on with the children and find out what their game plan was in reintroducing her to the community.

"I have to tell you," Harry spoke up with a grin. "I love that I don't have to rush off to a meeting."

"Me too," Collins clapped his hands together. "Actually, I'm going to take Harry back to our place to get you all set up and maybe have some drinks."

"Perfect," Harry nodded as Maddie laughed.

"And start dinner?" Khenda looked pointedly at Collins.

"Of course," he rolled his eyes playfully.

"You okay?" Harry checked on Maddie one more time; bending his head to hers.

"I am," she grinned; tilting her head up to meet his lips for a kiss that lasted one beat longer than normal. "Hmmm. Better now."

"I'll see you tonight," he smiled as he released her. Maddie caught the look that passed between Khenda and Collins; a mixture of surprise and awe. As the two men left the complex; already laughing and planning, Khenda nudged Maddie lightly, a knowing smile in place.

"You seem to be...doing well."

"I am," Maddie grinned wider. "I am doing quite well."

"You are going to fill me in on everything, right?"

"Ah, come on, a lady never tells..." Maddie linked her arm through Khenda's as they turned towards her old office.

"That's fine," Khenda sighed. "I'll call Ella. She'll fill me in."
Their laughter filled the hallway as it had not so very long ago.

Their first night in Bendal continued that laughter long into the night. After a successful and informative meeting, Maddie and Khenda packed up and went to join the boys at Khenda and Collins’ home. And they had settled in quite nicely; having finished off an abundance of beers, they had dinner ready and waiting.

They ate and laughed and caught up with all that had occurred since they had all last seen each other. Staying up way past late, they finished off bottles of wine and had smiled so much their cheeks hurt. And that night, after a round of good nights, Harry held Maddie close; both of them supporting the other, as they made their way to the room they would be sharing while they were in Bendal.

Harry helped Maddie change into her pajamas and then she helped him pull the covers up over the both of them. And together, with warm smiles still in place, they drifted off; closing off their first day back in Bendal with nothing but happiness.
Chapter 28

The next day went just as the team of planners had intended. In the late afternoon, after the children had been fed lunch, there would be a private meeting at the Children's Home. The kids would gather in the community room and the two staff Psychologists would go in first; followed by Maddie.

This private meeting would be followed up by a community dinner in the courtyard; complete with a standard Bendal welcome—food, drink, music and dancing into the night. And as Harry, Maddie, and Khenda waited outside the Community Room for the other doctors to call Maddie in, they smiled at the good memories that evoked, instead of focusing on that one terrible moment that had proceeded their departure.

"Why am I nervous?" Maddie looked up to Harry as she fanned her face with her hand.

"I have no idea," he shook his head. "This is going to be the easiest thing you do all day."

"I know," she laughed. "Maybe I'm just excited and..."

"Doctor Forrester?" Maddie turned towards the voice of Lara, the Psychologist who had replaced her. "Are you ready?"

"Yes," Maddie breathed, turning nervous eyes to Harry.

"Okay kids," Lara spoke into the room. "We have a very special guest today..."

"You got this," his voice was full of absolute certainty. Maddie nodded and, smiling wide, she stepped through the door.

Harry and Khenda could hear the uproar of excitement that erupted in the room as Maddie stepped in. Khenda felt tears come to her eyes and Harry watched in awe as the children swarmed around her. Some were crying, some were clapping their hands and jumping. But all of them were smiling wide and beyond thrilled to see her. He had always known she was a bigger celebrity in Bendal than he was.

"Look at that..." Harry's voice carried pride.

"They were right," Khenda grinned. "Those kids are so happy to see her."

"Of course they are," Harry nodded. "Look at how they watch her."

"Look at how you watch her," Khenda's voice lowered as she smiled at him.

"I can't help it," he blushed slightly.

"That bad, huh?"

"God yes," he chuckled.

"So," Khenda turned her full attention to him, seeing that Maddie's reunion was going well. "What happens next for you two?"

"I don't know," he shook his head as they turned away from the room. "I'm waiting for her to tell me."
"Oh wow," she laughed. "You're in the worst way, aren't you?"

"You have no idea Khenda," his eyes narrowed then. "And I blame you completely for this mess."

"Yeah, yeah," she rolled her eyes. "And you're welcome."

Maddie emerged from the room three hours later. It had been an emotional meeting for her as well. She had seen some of the children she had been working with when she left; children who had been dropped when she had been forced out of Bendal. Seeing them, hearing how they were doing, took a toll on Maddie. Even good emotions, good feeling—still took energy. When she stepped back through the door, Harry took one look at her red, puffy eyes and pulled her into his arms where tears slipped easily from her eyes.

"Are you okay?" Khenda watched, concerned that maybe this had been too much for her friend.

"Yes!" Maddie tossed her head back with a hearty laugh. "I am most definitely okay." Stepping away from Harry, she accepted a tissue from Khenda and wiped at her eyes. "That was...really great for my soul." She sniffed and smiled; her eyes shining, a smile fixing permanently to her mouth.

"Oh thank God!" Khenda exhaled.

"Seriously," Maddie gained control of herself; the tears fading along with all of the negative feelings she had left over from that night. "You two should go in there. It's better than a massage. It's better than therapy!"

"Ha!" Khenda clapped her hands together as Harry laughed, his hand stroking Maddie's shoulder.

"Okay," Maddie took a deep breath and let it out. "Let's do this."

Following her lead, the three of them moved down the halls towards the courtyard. Maddie reached for Harry's hand and leaned into him; her head resting on his arm.

"Thank you for being here for this," she smiled up at him.

"Thank you for letting me be here for this," he placed a kiss to her forehead.

As they stepped out into the evening sun, they were greeted with music and laughter and, upon being spotted, a round of cheers. Looking out into the crowd, Maddie wasn't the only one who had returned for this event. There were a few other familiar faces intermingled with the locals; all of whom were excited to see the Doctor back and in good health.

And the party began.

As the day gave way to the night, the heat gave way to a slight breeze and the feeling of home had returned, for the locals and Maddie alike. She had made the rounds; talking to the families who had come to see her and those who she had been able to work with in the community. Some of them talked about that night, but most talked about all that had improved since that night. Catching up with them felt like catching up with old family members. Maddie was delighted and felt such a surprising amount of relief to know that everyone was. And they, of course, felt the same kind of relief in seeing her and hearing what she had been doing since then.
Of course Maddie remained tight-lipped about Harry, though everyone could see that he was with her. She spoke, instead, of her time at home with her family, her time traveling with Ella (who most everyone remembered) and that she was very, very happy.

As usual, Harry easily folded into the mix of people. The lack of attention was one of the things that had always drawn him back to Bendal—before Maddie, that is. There were a few new staff members there who were surprised by his presence but for the most part, he was regarded as everyone else was. And, as Maddie made the rounds, he was more than happy to blend into the background.

Seeking solace with his thoughts, Harry had ventured off to a second floor terrace; looking down at it all. He was standing at the railing, leaning against it as he watched the dancing that had naturally commenced. He watched as Maddie laughed with the locals; that enormous laugh that had drawn him to her initially. He watched as something inside of her seemed to find peace; to find completion. He could see that it was good for her well-being to be back in this place she had loved so much, giving her the opportunity to replace that last terrible memory with something like this one.

As he watched, he felt emotions that he hadn't felt in a very long time; emotions that tugged at all of his heart strings. Being back in a place where she had almost lost her life, a place where he could still see, in vivid details, the look in her eyes after she was shot. It was a lot for him to balance with his longstanding love for the country.

And of course, there was the matter of his heart. As Maddie laughed and danced and sang along with the children, Harry knew he was witnessing the woman he loved fall back in love with Bendal. He had always known this was a possibility. But now, as he watched in happen in front of him, he wasn't sure he was prepared to deal with it. He didn't know if he was ready for her to leave him; even if she was leaving him for this beautiful place that he adored. He sighed heavily, wishing he could stop the spiraling thought process; and failing miserably.

Maddie was getting a drink when she spotted him. Meeting Khenda's eyes, she gestured; letting her know that she was headed up to him. Gathering another round of drinks, she made sure people weren't watching before she slipped off, climbing the stairs to where he was.

"Marco..." She called out lightly as she neared him. Sliding up next to him, she nudged him with her hip. "You're supposed to say 'polo'. It's a pool game..." She took a sip from her drink and held one out to him. "Did you ever play..." Her question came to an end as she saw the expression on his face. She turned then, leaning back against the railing so she could look at him. "Harry?"

"Maddie?" He offered a small smile; the best he could do.

"What's on your mind?" Maddie studied his face thoughtfully.

"My mother," his voice was soft as he took the drink from her hand and brought it to his lips.

"Oh..." Maddie breathed; her free hand moving to his arm that was braced next to her hip. "Want to talk about it?" He took a breath and smiled out at the people over her shoulder.

"I was just watching you talk with everyone and...it reminded me of her. She adored Bendal too."

"Really? I didn't know she had been here."

"Yes," he nodded and leaned closer; dropping a kiss to her shoulder. "The first time I came here was with her."
"I guess I didn't know that," she turned her head so she could kiss the side of his.

"Yes. I was ten, I think. It wasn't too long before she died." He surprised Maddie when he chuckled as he remembered. "Actually, Khenda was the first person we met on our first trip."

"Really? I had no idea that you had known Khenda that long."

"Yes," said Harry, wistfully. "Years and years. She's become a bit of a...she looks out for me."

"That's sweet," Maddie ran her fingers up his arm.

"Actually," Harry swallowed a drink. "I'm ninety-five percent sure that is why she had me come to that food bank opening a year ago."

"Why?"

"To meet you." His eyes met hers with great intensity. Maddie swallowed the lump in her throat.

"Really?" She felt teary—not an uncommon event that particular day.

"Well, I think so...but you would have to ask her for sure." Harry looked off in the distance again; as though he was looking into the past. "My mother would have loved you Maddie; everything about you. Your drive, your defiance, the work you do, your heart...she would have loved you."

"Harry...that's..." Maddie felt like crying as thoughts of his mother, memories of her father flooded her heart.

"I think Khenda knew that; when she met you. I think she knew that you were, that you are...a great match for me."

"Well..." Maddie knew she was reaching when she tried for levity. "My father would have been....okay...with you."

"Ha!" Harry laughed through the tears in his eyes. "I do appreciate your honesty."

"I'm only kidding..." She snuggled close to him; his arms dropping from the railing to wrap around her. "He would have liked you. A lot. Though, he would have thought you lived too far away for me."

"I suppose that I do," he agreed and watched as Maddie's eyes grew incredibly serious. It had been an incredibly emotional day and it looked as if she was going for the big one.

"Harry..." She bit her lip; her stomach tossing as she prepared for the conversation that she was about to jump into.

But this time, he wasn't ready.

"Shh..." He held his fingers lightly to her lips. Her eyes flew to meet his. "Please Maddie. I've been sitting here thinking about how much my mother would have loved you, how she would have been happy that I was..." He swallowed the lump in his throat. "I can't talk about it tonight. I can't have a conversation that might end with you leaving. I just really can't. Not tonight. I'm sorry."

Unable to speak, Maddie nodded and moved closer to him; his arms tightening even more. She felt him press a kiss to the top of her head, his hands rubbing up and down her back in a soothing fashion. And, for the first time since she had met him, she felt the overwhelming urge to take care of him.

He had always been this tall, sturdy, strong man who carried the weight of his role with grace and ease, who looked out for those less fortunate, who fought in a war.

But now, as he laid his vulnerabilities out in front of her, all she wanted to do was to protect him; shield him from any harm. And somewhere deep inside, she knew that the hurt she was protecting him from in that moment was hurt that only she had the power to wield.

And it made her sad.

And sick.
When Maddie woke the next day, she was sick to her stomach. And she was absolutely certain that it had nothing to do with the food she had eaten the night before—and everything to do with the wonderful man who was sleeping peacefully next to her.

She loved him.

Her eyes stung with tears as she thought of just how she loved him. But even that fact couldn't erase the way she felt being back in Bendal, the purpose that came with simply being there. That purpose, that sense of duty was so much a part of her, she wasn't sure if it would ever be something that she could move past.

Glancing at the clock, she realized just how early it was. Regardless, she wasn't going to be able to go back to sleep. She had tossed and turned all night thinking over and over of the way he had pleaded with her not to bring up The Discussion; thinking about the great sadness and bit of fear she had seen in him.

She sat up in bed and hugged her knees close to her. Watching the rise and fall of his chest, she smiled. At least he was sleeping now. She was careful as she slipped from the bed they shared. She was quiet as she moved to the large windows that looked out into the dawn of the morning. Taking a deep breath of the air breezing in the window, she longed for a way to clear her head, to sort things out.

Looking down at the floor, she had an idea. She moved softly around the room as she changed into loose, breathable clothing—something she could walk in. She pulled on her running shoes and a ball cap and, after pressing a kiss to Harry's temple, she left the room.

She hadn't planned for this when she left London, so she need to gather a few items. Looking through Khenda's hall closet, she found a backpack and a few supplies. Moving to the kitchen, she looked for a bottle for water and some snacks.

"Are you running away?" Harry's voice, rough with sleep, called to her. She looked up to see him watching her thoughtfully.

"Yes," she smiled. "You want to run away with me?"

"Absolutely," he grinned, moving closer to her. "Where are we going?"

"France?" She offered and chuckled as Harry's face twisted up.

"France?! Why in the world would we go to France? Do you even speak French?"

"Un peu," she held her fingers close together and he laughed at her. She was happy to see him smiling after the night before.

"Seriously though," he watched as she tossed a granola bar into a backpack. "Where are you going?"

"Remember that hike you took me on after Geru and Mante were killed?"

"Yes."

"I'm going to do that."
"Sorry?"

"I need to clear my head, Harry. I need to be outside, moving around, sweating. I need to get out and clear my head."

"Okay," he smiled. He could appreciate that. "Can you give me ten minutes so I can get ready?"

"No," she shook her head with a sweet smile.

"No?"

"I’m going alone," she zipped up the backpack and moved away from the kitchen.

"Alone?" He followed her.

"Yes. Alone."

"You think that’s a good idea?" Even he had issue with the protective way he suddenly felt.

"I think it’s a great idea," her defiant streak that he adored made an appearance.

"You know, you..."

"Spent an entire year down here without you here to protect me," she cut in; her arms folded across her chest. "Yes I do know that."

"Oh God," he groaned; scrubbing a hand over his face.

"Hey..." Collins' voice grumbled as he moved towards them. "Somebody want to tell me why you two are up at this God awful hour in my kitchen..." He glanced at Maddie. "Are you going to work out?" There was small snicker at the end of his question that he quickly tried to cover—seeing her glare. "Seriously though, what are you doing?"

"Going for a hike," she shrugged.

"A hike?" He blinked.

"Alone," Harry offered.

"Alone?" Collins' face twisted. "You think that's a good idea?"

"She thinks it's a great idea," Harry offered.

"I need to clear my head, Harry," she lowered her voice pointedly. "I need to think, I need to...figure things out and you just...you can't be there while I do that. You muck up the thinking process." And it dawned on him. This head clearing hike was about him; about the two of them...and what happened next.

"How about I go?" Collins offered; sensing what was happening. They both looked to him then. "I'll be there so you won't be alone and...and I'm just guessing here...but I'm pretty sure there's nothing to figure out when it comes to me."

Harry looked to Maddie, his eyebrows raised awaiting her answer.

"Fine," she sighed. "If you want to come, you can."

"Great!" Harry was happy. He wanted her to have time and space to think clearly; hoping that it would ultimately work out in his favor. But he hated the idea of her out in the wilderness alone.

"Great," Maddie smiled; feeling slightly better than she thought she would at the news of company.

"Great..." Collins clapped his hands together and yawned. "I'll be back in ten minutes. Would you mind packing some water and stuff for me?"

"Not at all," Maddie agreed and returned to the kitchen.

"Thank you," Harry nodded to Collins. "I owe you."

"Yes," Collins smirked and patted Harry's back as he passed him. "You owe me huge."

Collins had always felt a strong sense of loyalty and brotherly love towards Maddie. Even when she first arrived in Bendal, he had kept an eye out for her. And when she was shot, when all hell broke loose, he had been terribly worried about her. So, this time with her in the hills of Bendal, watching as she pushed herself physically and mentally, was precious to him. Seeing her with his own eyes; all recovered and lively, made him feel more at peace with everything. And knowing what she was tossing around in her mind made him want to push her to push harder; to really dig deep and make the right decision—even if it wasn't the easiest.

"You look great, Doc," he called out to her as they neared the summit. Honoring her request for silence for the majority of the hike, he just couldn't help himself any longer.

"Thanks Collins," she smiled warmly at him and looked out at the land below them. "It's so beautiful here."

"It is," he nodded; he had always thought so.

"Did I tell you...Ella is staying in London," she went for small talk, not quite ready to discuss what was really on her mind. "She's going to be a flight nurse there."

"Oh yeah?" He grinned. "That sounds exactly like her."

"You think?" Maddie's nose scrunched up. "I was having a hard time believing she wasn't coming back here."

"Really?" Now it was Collins' turn to look at her confused. "I'm not at all surprised. I figured she would never come back."

"Why do you say that?" Maddie stalled; her breath coming out in short bursts.

"Well," Collins took a deep breath as they came to a stop; resting for a moment. "Her last night here was...terrible."

"Yeah, I remember. But..."

"No," he interrupted her. "You don't remember. I mean...it was hard enough up until you were shot. Things were pretty chaotic but after you were hit...it was pandemonium. People were running everywhere; screaming and...and Harry and Ella were just...they were covered in your blood." Collins took a steadying breath. "Who knew that shoulders bled so much?"

"I..." This was the first time she had heard this part of the story.
"It was terrible. Just terrible. And poor Ella...she was running the save on you for a few minutes all on her own while we pulled the surgeon and..." Collins gulped and shook his head; the memory giving him a headache. "I'm actually surprised that Harry could walk back in the complex after what happened...if it had been Khenda, I don't know if I could have ever returned."

"Collins..."

"So no," he smiled lightly. "It doesn't surprise me that she won't step foot back here. And it's good...she was here for a long time. She needs to do something else." He pulled his courage and continued. "Just like you."

"Excuse me?" Her eyes went wide; her mind flying from the past to the present.

"You heard me." Collins began back up the trail.

"But..." Maddie followed after him. "You think I should leave Bendal?"

"I think you left Bendal," he corrected. "And I think you're thinking about coming back. I think you're thinking about leaving that man...that man who held you on the floor of the complex after you had been shot and..." He was getting almost angry with her and that wasn't what he wanted at all. Taking a breath, he tried for calm. "I think you're thinking of coming back. I can see it in your eyes."

"I..." Maddie was flustered, this show of feelings from Collins so unexpected it threw her. "I am thinking about coming back." And it was the first time she had said it out loud; and it caused her heart to pause in her chest.

"I thought so," Collins huffed. "And what does Harry have to say about that?"

"We haven't talked about it."

"Oh sure," he laughed; rolling his eyes at her. "Of course you haven't. Because what good would talking about it do? I mean, it's not like clear, honest communication is a cornerstone to a healthy relationship...right, Doc?"

"Collins..." She warned.

"Madeline," he countered. "You wanted to clear your head. You wanted to come out here and let your sweat and your feet pound it out. But so far all we're doing is talking about Ella...who has her life figured out."

"But..."

"No buts," he shook his head. "Big, life-altering decisions aren't easy. If they were, they wouldn't be life-altering. So stop with the bullshit. You have this man at home who adores you...though why exactly that is completely escapes me at the moment."

"You're an ass," she narrowed her eyes at him; knowing fully well he was far, far from it.

"An ass who's trying to stop you from making a big, life-altering mistake."

"You know," Maddie's voice grew clipped. "I hate you sometimes."

"Aw, come on Doc," Collins chuckled. "You hate me most times."

And then, with a quick burst of energy, Maddie surged ahead of him; trying to power out of hearing range. There was nothing more frustrating than having somebody call her out on everything she had been keeping at bay. And there was nothing more annoying than somebody speaking the truth that she longed to avoid.

Yet there he was; calling her out, speaking the truth.
Chapter 30

The entire way home from the hike, Maddie had remained silent. She had gone out that morning seeking clarity and she just didn't know if she had found it. If anything, walking with Collins had only drudged up more for her to think about, more for her to consider. And he had pushed her; pushed her to see the reality of what was happening—called her on her own avoidance. As the car drew closer to their place, Maddie knew what she needed to do.

She needed to talk to Harry. Yes, she had put this off all on her own accord. Yes, she had hoped that the stress of it all would simply go away. But now, as she made her way closer to him, she felt like laughing at herself. What had happened to her? When had all of her years of professional training gone out the window.

The only way through this was to go through it. And that meant that she needed to tell him. She needed him to know...that she was considering Bendal, why she was considering Bendal, and why never in a million years would she have ever imagined considering him over Bendal—even though she was. She needed him to know what was happening in her head; in her heart. It was the very least she could do in return for all he had done for her.

The car pulled to a stop and Maddie rushed from the car.

"Doc..." Collins called to her, the weight of his words was beginning to get to him. He knew that he had been the final push for the avalanche of emotions that his friend was handling. This was what he wanted, but he hoped it wasn't too much for her.

But she didn't answer; her entire mind, her entire body focused on a different mission. Pushing into the house, she looked around for them.

Harry and Khenda were out on the deck; enjoying drinks and laughing loudly. Seeing him made Maddie's heart leap in her chest. Blinking back a surprising burst of tears, Maddie took a breath and moved out to the deck. Collins followed behind her.

"Hey!" Harry was the first one to see her; his eyes lighting up as he grinned up at her.

"Welcome back," Khenda smiled at Maddie before catching the look on Collins' face. "How was the hike?" Ignoring Khenda completely, Maddie looked at Harry—her emotions exposed for everyone to see.

"What do you love about me?" Her voice was soft.

"Sorry?" He looked up to her, his smile still in place. Khenda's laughter faded as she glanced to Collins.

"What do you love about me?" She repeated, stepping closer to him. "And you can't say my ass because there are plenty of women in this world with better asses than mine."

"I wasn't going to say your ass," he laughed tenderly. "I mean...it's a great ass, but that's not why I..."

"What is why?"

"You want a list?" He glanced to Collins, wondering what the hell had happened on the hike. Collins shook his head; he had no idea.
"Please," she nodded. He cleared his throat, looking slightly embarrassed, but willing to play along.

"Okay. Well...you're funny. Not just good-at-telling-jokes funny but, you can laugh at yourself, you don't take things too seriously. And you're thoughtful and considerate and you're so damn smart." He shook his head. "I love how smart you are. You can hold your own with anybody in the world, I am certain. You're determined and independent and...you care so much about the people around you, about what's happening around you. You have this intrinsic warmth that instantly draws people to your side..." He looked down at his hands and back up to her. "I don't know Maddie. What is it you're looking for with this?"

"All of those things you just listed," Maddie's eyes grew soft. "All of those things you love about me...All of those things are what brought me to Bendal in the first place. All of those things are because of my time here. All of those things about me are so tied to this place....I..." She trailed off as tears rose to her eyes and just like that the entire mood shifted. Maybe that hike had jarred more loose than she had thought.

Khenda glanced at Collins who nodded. As they passed by Maddie, they patted her arm and smiled at Harry.

And then it was just the two of them. And the great big elephant in the room they had been avoiding.

"So we're going to talk about it," Harry took a deep breath; his heart feeling the oddest combination of fear and relief.

"I want to be really honest with you right now," she blinked back her tears as she moved to sit in the chair directly opposite of him. "Even if...even if it hurts. I want to be honest with you right now."

"Maddie, I saw the way your face lit up when you saw Khenda and Collins. I noticed the relaxed way you walk through town; like you're...home. And last night, when you were dancing with the kids..." He had to look away for a minute; had to gain control. The last thing he wanted was for his emotions to take over this moment. Exhaling, he met her eyes. And she held them; tears and all, she held his look. "You're coming back, aren't you." It wasn't a question. She took a long moment to collect her thoughts before she could speak. And when she did, her voice was small, soft; quiet.

"If I don't live here..." Her eyes grew wide. "Where do I live? Colorado? I can't even imagine that anymore..."

"You could..." He let out a breath and steeled himself for her response. "Wow...you could live in London."

"London?" A small laugh burst through her lips.

"You say it like it's the craziest thing you've ever heard."

"Well...it is." Though it wasn't the first time the thought had crossed her mind. "In some senses, it is."

"Maddie...." Harry tried to make his voice sound soothing. "It can't be the first time it's crossed your mind." She was stunned as he put voice to her thoughts.

"No," the admission made her eyes water even more. "It's not the first time I've thought about moving to London. But..."
"But what?" Harry hated how eager he felt; how hopeful. "Think about it Maddie. Ella's going to be there. I'm going to be there. Bishop is going to be there."

"Bishop?" Maddie felt a burst of laughter push through her lips.

"Well, in case you need spare cash." Harry grinned; a moment of laughter passing between them, lightening the mood.

"I don't know what to...What would I even do there? I...my work is here, with DWB. Even if they don't offer me this on Friday, they are going to offer me another location where I could do the same kind of work and..." Maddie took a deep breath. "Harry, I don't even have a job possibility in London."

"Yes, but, up until last week Ella didn't have a job possibility and look what happened. A job fell in her lap!" He countered.

"Those kinds of things only happen to Ella. I doubt a job is going to fall into my lap."

"But you're educated and experienced and you're amazingly talented and..."

"And where would I live?" She threw up the next obstacle that raced through her mind.

"I don't know," he shook his head. "But there are plenty of flats for rent and until you found something, you know that you would have a place to stay. Me, Ella...I know my father would be more than happy to have you at Highgrove for an extended holiday..."

"Wow..." She breathed; her face a scattered mess that mirrored her emotions. She sat back in her chair; wiping at her eyes. This was crazy; absolutely crazy. Leaving Bendal for London—yet, something inside her felt...excited. Something in her felt alive. But that something was waging an enormous battle against something that had been anchored in her for so long.

"Maddie..." Harry reached for her hands; pulling them into his. "What do you want me to say here? That I don't want London on the table? I can't say that," he shook his head; his stomach turning as he said it, knowing this could very well be the moment she walked away from him. "If this is an honest-if-it-hurts moment then...then I want you in London; with me. I...I don't have a list of pros or great reasons. I just...I want you there. I love you, Maddie."

"I love you too," she squeezed his hands.

"I know that," he moved to the edge of his seat then, his legs moving to the outside of hers, his arms resting alongside hers. Locking his eyes with hers, he spoke clearly. "I am not trying to tell you what to do or make decisions for you or force you into some corner full of ultimatums, Maddie...I want you to be happy." His eyes seemed so sad, so full of heartache and she hated that she had anything to do with that. "If that means that you live in Bendal then...then you live in Bendal. I won't say I like it. I won't say that's what I want. I won't lie to you."

"And..."

"And... I want...you. I want us. And not the 'once in every three months' version of us. I want the everyday us. And I know it's not fair but...I feel like that can only happen if you're in England."

"Wow..." Maddie felt tears in her eyes.

"Please don't hate me for wanting you to be close, Madeline."
"I don't hate you, I..." She smiled through the sadness. "I couldn't hate you. I just...we're talking about my entire life, my career, my goals. I always swore that I would never put myself in a situation where I would even consider dropping it all for some guy." Her insecurities rushed forward, this old wall of protection building.

"Some guy?" His eyebrows shot up; his heart aching at her words.

"Even if he is you." And somewhere, in the back of her spiraling mind, there was a voice shouting at Maddie; warning her of grand mistakes and life-altering decisions. But she couldn't hear it. There were just too many voices shouting at her.

"Wow..." Harry leaned back in his chair, reaching for his drink. His eyes shifted away from her as he tipped back his bottle of beer; draining it. Maddie moved towards him then, leaning in, her hands on his chest; trying to pull his attention back to her. And when his eyes shifted back to hers, she looked sad and young and afraid.

"Harry..." She whispered over the lump in her throat. "When my dad died..." Her voice hitched and Harry shifted in his seat; catching her hands in his again. "When he died...I fell apart. I...I cracked. I was so lost." She blinked as tears escaped her eyes. "I didn't know what to do or where to go or even what mattered anymore and...and I came here. And I FOUND myself here. In Bendal. If it weren't for this place, if it weren't for this experience, I don't know what...I don't know what would have happened to me. And when I think of leaving here..." She shook her head, wishing she could stop the damn tears. "I know it's not rational and that it makes very little sense to anyone...but what if leaving here would...what if I lost myself again? What if that woman that you fell in love with here only exists here? What if I lose hold of myself again?"

And then, because it was the only answer he could think of in the moment, Harry's hands cupped her face; his lips meeting hers. Pressing soft, sweet kisses to her lips, her cheeks, her forehead, he shook his head. "I know that right now you're kind of..."

"Crazy?" She offered, closing her eyes as she rested her forehead against his lips. Rediscovering herself after the shooting had proven to be so tiring, so complicated. She felt crazy sometimes.

"I was going to say scattered," he chuckled lightly and pulled back to look at her; wiping at the tears on her cheeks with his thumb. "You've been through a lot Maddie. You were shot and sent home and you've been basically traveling for three months and...and now you have this big decision looming overhead and...I know that it's hard for you to see things clearly right now but...I also know that under all of this you know just as well as I do...that woman I fell in love with was in there long before Bendal. And she's going to be in there long after Bendal."

"Hmm..." She sighed with a small smile. "You seem so sure."

"I am sure."

"Harry?"

"Yes?"

"If I decide to stay here, if I...if I moved back to Bendal...then..." She smiled sadly at him. "What happens to us?" Harry felt a lump in his throat as her question washed over him. How did he begin to answer that question? There were a number of possibilities.

They could make it work. He knew it was possible. He could travel more freely, he could visit her. She had breaks, holidays she could take. The first part of their relationship had been apart. It was only the last few weeks that they had actually been consistently in the same place. He knew they could make it work.

But he also knew the other side. He had been here before; a long distance relationship with southern Africa. He had done the phone calls and the trips and the missing somebody more than he could put words to. He had been to that agonizing place where all he wanted to do was be thousands of miles from where he was. He had been through that moment when the woman he loved needed him and there was absolutely no way he could be there; when he wanted to hold her and wouldn't be able to for months.

And he had sworn he wouldn't do it again. When it all fell apart, he had sworn he wouldn't put himself in that situation again.

And then Khenda had called in a favor; bringing him to Bendal for the Food Bank opening.

And he had met Maddie.

And the love affair with South Africa began. What was it about this woman that made him toss everything out the window—he would never know.

"I don't want to let you go Maddie. I can't imagine walking away from you, from this...but what happens to us if we try to do this on separate continents..." He let out a breath, tightened his hold on her, and gave her the honest-if-it-hurts answer. "I don't know."

"Yeah," Maddie nodded; tears in her eyes, smile on her lips. She knew that was the answer. She had always known that was the answer. They watched each other for two full minutes; allowing it all to sink in, allowing it all to settle. And they were at an impasse. Everything was out in the open, on the table—thought nothing was decided. Sensing this, Maddie decided to call a time out. "Okay..." She sniffed and wiped at her eyes. With a shake of her head, she widened her smile. "Can we...can we take a break from this conversation for a minute?"

"Sure," Harry breathed; his lips turning up at the corners. He could see her coming to terms with what they had discussed; coming to terms with all that was happening for her.

"I won't even know what I'm dealing with until Friday and...and I just wanted you to know what was going on in my mind...though..." She laughed. "Though I'm not sure anything is any clearer."

"You need to hike that trail again?" Harry joked. "Cause I think Collins would be up for another round."

"Ha!" Maddie's head tossed back in laughter. "I'm surprised Collins didn't leave me out there." Maddie watched him for a second before moving to his lap. Straddling him, she settled over him; his eyes watching her with surprise. Her fingers moved to his face and then, her lips were on his; strong, warm, and full of all she felt for him. His mouth opened under hers as his arms wrapped around her; holding her close.

"What was that?" He breathed when she pulled back.

"I do love you," she sighed. "In all of this indecision, that has never even been up for debate. Do you know that?"

"I..."

"Know it," she insisted before leaning to kiss him again. "Now...I need to apologize to Collins and then...I need to take a shower. And then, we are going to enjoy our last night in Bendal with our friends and we can get back to this when we have to. How does that sound?"
"Perfect," He smiled as she rose to her feet.

"You'll be here when I get back?" She asked as she moved away from him.

"Yes," he answered. Always, he thought.
The next morning Maddie woke with a slight hangover. She wasn't sure exactly what to attribute that to; the emotionally draining conversation with Harry, the bottles and bottles of wine the four of them consumed before dancing—and laughing hysterically—in their living room, or the intense sex Harry talked her into in the early morning hours before they both passed out. Either way, she was in desperate need of a long shower and hot coffee before they even began to pack up their belongings. They had an early flight, and an even earlier car ride to prepare for.

After they were dressed and recovering, the car pulled up and the good-byes were upon them. As Harry and Collins helped load the bags, Khenda pulled Maddie aside; hoping for one last chance to impart some wisdom to her young friend.

"We need to talk," she linked her arm through Maddie's, steering her off in the opposite direction of the car.

"About?" Maddie smiled at her friend.

"Collins told me what happened on the hike," an eyebrow arched sharply over her eyes.

"Oh. Good for him," Maddie sighed and prepared to hold her ground.

"Well..."

"Well, I know you too well for this Khenda. So why don't you just say what it is you're dying to say and..."

"Maddie...that man adores you." Khenda didn't think twice about taking the invitation.

"Khenda..." Maddie stopped walking and lowered her voice, wanting to keep this particular conversation between the two of them. "I know he does."

"Tell me you don't love him," Khenda turned to face Maddie. "Go ahead. Tell me you don't love him and I'll walk away with my mouth shut."

"It's not that easy."

"It is that easy."

"He wants me to..." Maddie grabbed Khenda's arm and resumed their walking. "Khenda, he wants me to move to London."

"Then move to London."

"What?!" Maddie laughed; astonished at the words that came from Khenda's mouth.

"You heard me."

"Please," Maddie shook her head. "You have a career, Khenda. You worked to get here, just like I did. Tell me you would ever leave Bendal!"

"If Collins left? In a heartbeat." Khenda answered without blinking.

"What?!" Again, Maddie was shocked.
"I wouldn't even think about it. I would pack and go. Or just go...no packing."

"I'm sorry...I just...what?"

"Collins makes Bendal home for me Maddie," a soft, fuzzy look came over Khenda's face as she spoke. "Without him, it's not even close to home."

"I..." Maddie almost couldn't process it fast enough to respond. Khenda, the strongest, most independent woman she knew—giving it all up to move away with Collins.

"And I don't even care if people think that makes me a part of some antiquated patriarchal order...the feminist movement was about women making their own decisions. And mine is to be with Collins. He's my home."

"That is..." Maddie swallowed a lump in her throat. "I don't even know what to say. That's incredibly...sweet."

"Maddie, please listen to me..." But Khenda's words of wisdom were drawn short as the men caught up with them. Collins' arm went around her shoulders and she smiled up at him.

"We're all packed up," Harry smiled at Maddie, his hand resting on her back.

"Great," Maddie returned his smile and then looked to their friends; sadness washing over her.

Khenda moved to Harry, pulling him to her and Maddie went straight into Collins' open arms.

"You know I don't hate you," Maddie spoke into his ear as he held her tight. "In fact I adore you."

"And I you," Collins pressed a kiss to her cheek. "Be brave Doc." And then, with one final squeeze, he released her to extend his hand to Harry. Maddie turned to Khenda, both women looking at the other with such love.

"Oh I am going to miss you," Maddie sighed as they wrapped their arms around each other.

"I'll miss you too..." Khenda pressed her lips to Maddie's cheek and lowered her voice. "Go to London Maddie. Go where Harry goes."

And then Maddie was released; free to go. Looking into Harry's bright blue eyes, she couldn't deny the way he warmed her heart.

"Ready?" He nodded towards the car.

"Yes," she smiled. And, with final waves and promises to keep them updated; Maddie and Harry were driving to the airport—leaving Bendal behind.

The smile remained on Maddie's face until about halfway home. They were mid-air when she asked Harry for a pen. He gestured to his bag and, when she opened it up to look, she found a well-stocked supply of her candy.

And suddenly she found it difficult to breath. As a tear slipped from her eye, she tried her best to cover; reaching for a tissue and blowing her nose. Forgetting the pen, she replaced his bag and turned her face towards the window of the plane. Looking out over the clouds, she took long, deep breaths.

She hated the feeling of not knowing; of having two wonderful options but no idea which way to go.
Pressing her eyes closed, she tried for calm. In less than twenty four hours, all of the options would be on the table and maybe, just maybe, the decision would be made for her.
Chapter 32

As Maddie neared the London DWB office for her meeting, she was stuck on how surreal this moment was. At the beginning of the mandated three months off, she had thought they would never end; that she would be stuck in the endless purgatory. But it was coming to an end in a flash.

Harry had left her that morning to attend the meeting he had rescheduled in order to go to Bendal. He had kissed her and wished her luck and clarity. Maddie took a deep breath as the cab pulled up to the office. She paid and thanked the driver and then, she was facing her future.

She sat in the waiting area for less than ten minutes before she was pulled into an office with a wonderfully sweet woman named Marquita. She was tall and beautiful and Maddie wondered as she followed her why it was she wasn’t modeling somewhere exotic. But she kept those thoughts to herself.

After offering the obligatory water or coffee, Marquita shut the door to her office and sat down across from Maddie. Opening her file, they went over the doctor's notes, the releases that had been signed and then Marquita asked her the most popular question,

"What do you want to do next Maddie?"

And Maddie still didn't know. She shook her head and looked down at her hands. Unsure, confused, she explained that she was kind of hoping the options available to her would help with that decision.

"Well," Marquita sighed. "You recovered well from the incident in Bendal. Physically, you're good to go. I see you met with our staff psychologist and he has signed off on your mental status."

"Good to know," Maddie chuckled lightly.

"Though Bendal remains a contentious area to live in, it isn't any more or less dangerous than it was before you left—and we still have a team down there. At the time of your mandated furlough, you were in the middle of serving out an extended contract. So, if you wanted to return, we could absolutely send you there. One of the Psychologists is getting ready to end her tenure and I'm sure the community would welcome you back. You have some great recommendations in your file from the staff down there. So, that is certainly an option for you."

"Wow..." Maddie breathed. She should be thrilled to hear that. She had wanted to hear that—didn't she? "Wow. I just...that's what I was hoping to hear." She spoke the words though she wasn’t nearly as sure as she thought she would be.

Was it? She thought. Was it what she wanted to hear?

"Of course, if you were thinking of trying one of our many locations, we can certainly talk about that. Or, if you wanted to be done with the service for a while, that would be perfectly understandable."

"Done?"

"Some people need a break," Marquita smiled warmly. She had been through this meeting thousands of times; had seen this reaction and confusion thousands of times. Glancing back down at Maddie's file, she saw an additional note. "Oh...wait..." She pulled the piece of paper to the top of the stack.
"What is it?"

"Well," Marquita allowed the tiniest of smirks to cross her face as she read the note. "It seems as though..." She looked up to Maddie with a conspiratorial look in her eyes. "Normally I'm not supposed to pass on any opportunities that are outside of Doctors Without Borders. I mean, if you asked for resources, I could give them. But normally I'm not supposed to tell you about anything outside of the organization."

"Okay..." Maddie's eyes narrowed. "I'm sorry. I'm confused, are you..."

"It seems as though somebody wants you to consider staying in London," the young woman smiled at Maddie as she said the words.

"Somebody wants me to stay in London?" Maddie's throat grew tight as she repeated the words.

"Yes," Marquita passed a piece of paper across the desk. "There is an opening at the Children's Hospital, for a staff Psychologist—handling inpatient treatment and working with the trauma team." Marquita read from the paper. "It's a really great hospital. I know a med-tech there and he loves his job."

"Hold on," Maddie held up her hand, her face growing warmer and warmer as she sat with this news. "Somebody...found...me a job in London?"

"Well, kind of," Marquita seemed a little uneasy. "Somebody set up an interview for you. It's not a guaranteed job. You would still have to go through the process. But yes, somebody put in a good word for you and wanted to make sure that this..." Marquita shrugged. "They wanted to make sure that this fell in your lap."

"My lap," Maddie was certain her face was growing red as the anger took over her thought process. "But you said that you don't normally connect people with outside employment and..."

"Well, it seems as though this came from somebody with quite a bit of influence," Marquita leaned closer. "It's happened before but only in very rare circumstances and...and it almost always comes down from the top."

"The top," Maddie laughed bitterly. Somebody intervening in her life—from the top.

"Anyway," Marquita smiled and closed the folder. "As you can imagine, time is of the essence on these issues. I can give you forty-eight hours to think about it but twenty-four would be ideal. Only because I need to process paperwork—rather you decide to go back to Bendal or to the interview here in London."

"Sure," Maddie nodded; too angry to elaborate any further.

"Do you have any other questions before..."

"No," Maddie shook her head and took the file along with Marquita's business card. The young woman escorted her to the waiting area and wished her luck with her decision.

"I look forward to hearing from you," she smiled before she turned to greet another client. Clenching her teeth Maddie pulled her sunglasses on and stepped out onto the street to hail a cab.

As she neared Kensington Palace, her anger mounted exponentially. She hoped Harry had his security officer close by because, as she held the job interview that had fallen in her lap from the top, she was absolutely certain of one thing.
She was going to kill him.
Chapter 33

When Maddie stepped into Harry's home, she was fuming. Even more so when she realized that he hadn't returned from his meeting. Taking a seat on the stairs, ensuring she would be the first thing he saw, she thought over what had just happened.

She hated being told what to do.

She hated people doing what they thought was best for her.

And she hated somebody stepping into her professional life to make things happen.

And he had just, in her mind, done all three.

Holding the paper in her hand, she sat and waited; her anger intensifying with every tick of the clock.

It was eleven minutes before the door opened; eleven minutes for Maddie's mind to spiral out. Eleven minutes before Harry stepped back into his home—the scene of his eminent demise.

"Hey," he smiled wide when he saw her. Taking a breath, he tried to ready himself for what was about to unfold. "How did the meeting go?"

"The meeting went..." Maddie laughed bitterly as she rose to her feet. "I think you know how the meeting went."

"What? I don't...I don't know what you mean," he sat his briefcase down in the foyer and moved further into his house; loosening his tie as he went.

"You know exactly what I mean." Harry stopped what he was doing then and really looked at her. She was mad—no, pissed. And he was incredibly confused.

"Maddie I..."

"You want to tell me what the hell this is?!” She waved the piece of paper in the air.

"Oh!" He grinned. "Is that the gift I left for you..."

"Gift?!" Her voice echoed in the foyer. "This is your idea of a GIFT!"

"I..." His forehead wrinkled. "I thought you would like it."

"Like what?!" Maddie couldn't believe this was happening. She couldn't believe that he had stepped over her in such an important way. "You thought I would like you playing royal puppet master with my life? With my career?!"

"What?" Harry almost laughed because it was almost funny. Almost. "I don't know what you're..."

"I mean...even if you weren't going to stay out of it out of respect for me, I would think you would stay out of it because of the nature of your life!" She was so furious she could barely form complete sentences. "I mean honestly, Harry! What would your people think if they knew you were finding jobs for..."
"Finding jobs? My people?" His eyes were wide with confusion as he watched her pace his main floor. "Okay seriously, Maddie, what in the hell are you talking about?" His initial amusement at this craziness was dwindling, making way for frustration.

"The job interview. In London. That magically fell in my lap." She slapped the paper against his chest and walked away from him.

"Wait..." He caught the paper in his hand and looked to her. "You were offered a job in....

"Oh pretend you don't know about it! Right after she offered me Bendal, she tossed that in my face." She threw her hands in the air. "She said it came from the top! She said it was falling in my lap...That's incredibly coincidental, don't you think?"

"Maddie why would you think I would ever do something like..."

"You told me you wanted me in London. You told me you wanted me close..."

"Yes!" His voice rose to match hers; tired of beating around the bush. "Yes! I want you here in London! But because you WANTED to be! Not because you had to be tricked or...God DAMN it Maddie!" He yelled in frustration. "I am not somebody you should have to be talked into! Being with me is hard enough when you want to be! If I have to talk you into it, it will never be worth it! Don't you get it?! Yes. I want you here. I told you that. But I want you to WANT to be here."

"This is my life, Harry! I have worked all of my life to be where I was in Bendal. Years of school and training and...do you have any idea the amount of responsibility and devotion that comes with something like this?!"

"You really think I don't understand the sense of duty and obligation?!" He hated how out of control he felt in the moment; hated that they were yelling over each other over something he didn't yet fully understand. "I get it. I really do. I understand it on a level that most people never even get a glimpse of but..."

"BUT?!"

"But yes, YES!" He was not afraid to admit it. "Yes. I want you here. I want you to stay in London with me. I don't care what kind of man that means that I am. I want you here! But I would never, in a million years go over your head and..."

"Then who in the hell did?!" Harry opened his mouth to protest; opened his mouth to tell her that he had no earthly idea who had done something like this, but she rushed ahead of him, too furious to argue. "You know what, I can't do this anymore." Turning on her heel, she headed for the stairs.

"Can't do what? Maddie!" He reached for her arm, but she jerked away from him, moving swiftly up the stairs. He followed her through the hallway to the room he had offered her the first night she arrived in London.

"Stop!" She turned on him. "I am really mad at you right now and I want to storm off but I can't because I'm in Kensington Palace! And I don't know where to go! Or how I would even get back if I did! So I'm going in here!" She pointed at the room that she had never slept in. "...I need to be able to storm away from you right now and this is the only place I can go! I want to be alone, Harry! Please respect that!"

His hands moved up in surrender, his eyes growing incredibly sad. And Maddie, full of fire and anger and confusion, walked into the room; slamming the door behind her.
Stepping into the room, Maddie's anger began to slip as every other emotion bubbled to the surface. She looked around the room frantically. She felt suddenly claustrophobic, which was absurd since the room was massive. She moved to a window, seeking fresh air. Taking deep breaths, she tried to calm herself.

What in the hell had just happened? What was she doing? What was she thinking?

She needed help. She needed advice.

She needed her mother.

Without a thought or concern about the time difference, she pulled her phone from her pocket and dialed.

"Madeline? Are you okay?" Her mother was full of concern. Just as water released by a broken dam, Maddie let go. She gushed tears; flowed emotion. Through her sobs and deep breaths, she told her mother the entire story; meeting Harry at the Food Bank opening, the candy, the dancing, the greenhouse, the shooting, the recovery, the time in London, the time at Highgrove. She told her mom about her loyalty to Bendal, to the kids, to the community.

She told her that Bendal was what saved her when her dad died.

She told her that Harry was what saved her when Bendal was pulled out from underneath her.

And then she told her about the meeting; the meeting where everything she had believed to be true about Harry was tossed up in the air—how she felt betrayed and manipulated and controlled and how he had denied every bit of it when she had confronted him.

And when she was done, her mother allowed a minute for her to calm down, a minute for her to breathe before she told her the last thing Maddie ever expected to hear.

"Hold on," Maddie shook her head as she sat on the large, fluffy bed. "Mom, are you really telling me to...give up my life just to be close to some guy?"

"Oh Maddie, you're seeing it all wrong," her mother's voice was soft, caring; that of a wise sage bestowing advice on a young child. "Choosing to be closer to the person you love, who loves you...that's not giving up your life, that's living it." Maddie's heart thudded.

"But..." Her protest was already weakened; already dwindling. And her mother delivered the next hit.

"And since when is Harry just some guy?"

"So he's a Prince, big deal. I didn't think that sort of thing mattered to you."

"It doesn't," she laughed. "I don't care that he's a Prince. I care that he is good to you, that he is there for you, that he makes you happy. Does he do those things?"

"Yes, I..." Maddie moved her legs up onto the bed then, knocking against a gift wrapped box that had been waiting for her. And then, as her mother continued, Maddie curiously opened the box.

"Yes. He does. And when your life fell apart, after you were shot in Bendal, who was right there, the entire time? Slept by your bedside, called your mother three times a day, gave you space when you needed it, sheltered you from..." And though her mother was talking, Maddie could no longer hear her.
Because there, in that box was a gift.

From Harry.

Maddie pulled a piece of paper from the box and tried to read the words. Her eyes were teary as she tried to figure it out. It appeared to be a map and maybe a plane ticket and...

Oh God.

Maddie held the paper in her hand as she began to cry. This was what he had been talking about. Could it be possible that he really didn't know about the interview?

"Oh my God. Mom...I think I made a mistake."

"Yes I think you did."

"Mom!" Her heart ached in her chest.

"What do you want from me Madeline? I will always be honest with you. That's what family does..."

"Honest and loyal...." Maddie repeated; sure she was going to be sick. "I have to go mom. I'm sorry I called you so upset...I love you."

"You too dear. Be smart. Be brave."

Maddie couldn't disconnect the phone quick enough. Tossing it to the bed, she held tight to the paper from the box and hurried to the hallway; determined to find him.

She didn't have to look far. Defeated, Harry was sitting on the floor about halfway between his room and hers.

"It was Khenda," he spoke to her without looking up. "I made some phone calls and, the royal puppet master...was Khenda. ..." He pulled himself up to a standing position; avoiding her eyes. "She wanted you to have what you wanted and she stupidly thought that was me. She asked that you call her so she can explain...so..."

"Harry," Maddie's entire body ached as she looked to him. "In the box..." She held up the paper and his eyes focused on that.

"I found a place halfway between London and Bendal. There's a resort and..." His eyes teared up. "It's a map and an open ticket for you to meet me there. I figured that you would choose Bendal and I wasn't quite ready to give you up..." She had been so horrifically wrong. And this was the outcome; this look on his face, this coldness in his voice.

"I..." Maddie couldn't find words over the tears she was crying. But it didn't matter, because Harry was all but done.

"Let's not go round and round, Maddie. I do not want to fight with you. If you'll be happier in Bendal, then you should...you should be there." Maddie moved to go to him then, wanting to kiss away all of the hurt she saw in him. But he held up a hand, stopping her in her tracks. "I really want to be alone right now Maddie...I'm not mad. I am tired and confused and I just...I need some time to...deal with this. Please respect that." And then, his head hung low, Harry moved away from her into his room; closing his door quietly behind him.
When Harry woke the next morning Maddie was gone. He had stalled in his room for less than an hour before he called Bernard, requesting breakfast be sent to her room. And, when he was informed that she wasn't there, he hated the surprise he felt; hated the way his stomach turned. At least her stuff was still there; he looked around his room, seeing her pajamas, a pair of shoes. She had to come back for her stuff. Right?

He was instantly filled with regret. He should have fought harder. He should have begged, pleaded; made her understand. Had he learned nothing at all over the last year? Had he learned nothing at all in this lifetime? Women like Maddie came along only once and when they did, they deserved a fight. And he had held onto his pride, tucked his tail, and left her standing in the hall.

He was mad; at himself, at the situation, at her. But at least she had stood and fought. She was pissed—mislead but pissed and she had stood and fought. Yet, when he was faced with his moment to be pissed, he had turned and left her in the hallway.

And now she was gone.

And he was tired.

He had a bit of coffee, half a piece of toast and then, needing to clear his mind, he pulled on his running shoes, called his detail and went out the front door; ready to pound the pavement. Ready to purge his mind of all that had occurred.

Three miles later, he had nothing to show for it but a lack of breath and a tired security officer. He was no further from thoughts of her than he had been before. He jumped in the shower, dressed and meandered downstairs. Pulling his cellphone out, he was debating his next move when the front door creaked open.

His head turned quickly, just in time to see Thomas walking through the door. And then, by some miracle he was sure he didn't deserve, Maddie followed him in. Harry was on his feet instantly; feeling shy and nervous. And when his eyes met hers, his heart cracked in his chest. Her eyes are puffy as though she'd been crying and what he really wanted to do was pull her into his arms and never let her go.

But he held his breath and waited. He knew better than to force her into anything at this point; even if it was his arms. Maddie waited until Thomas had stepped from the room before she spoke.

"I found my way out," she smiled slightly; her voice cracking.

"And back in," his smile matched hers; nervous and wavering. "Where were you?"

"Well..." She took a deep breath and met his eyes; holding them for a long beat before she exhaled slowly. "I had to get back to Marquita from DWB to give her my decision. She said time was of the essence so..."

"Oh..." Maddie could see Harry's face wash with disappointment and hurt. And she hurried along.

"And then...and then I went shopping."

"Sorry?" His eyebrows lifted lazily; as though his energy was completely drained.

"Well," she took one small, calculated step in his direction. "I didn't really bring anything with me that would be suitable for an interview; a suit, an appropriate bag..."

"Interview..." Harry's heart jumped into his throat.

"And I need to get a haircut and..."

"Wait," Harry held up a hand. "You mean. You're..."

"Staying," her voice cracked as she nodded. She had found that after making the decision, her lungs felt less tight, her heart less strained—an enormous sense of relief had flooded her entire body. She felt free. "I scheduled an interview for Monday afternoon and if everything works out...which it should with the recommendation that Khenda sent up...I'm...I'm staying."

"But last night I thought..." He could feel the adrenaline racing through him as he took it in. "What changed your mind?"

"You..." She grew teary; her fingers fumbling with each other. "And my mother."

"How?" His eyes were dancing as he scanned her face. His mind was slowly allowing his heart to be happy about this news.

"Well, she told me to stay. And you, you told me to go..." Maddie wiped at her eyes and took a deep breath. "But essentially you were both saying the exact same thing."

"I don't understand."

"That you both love me enough to put my happiness, my needs, first." The tears in her eyes were not from sadness at turning down Bendal, they were from this realization that she now shared with him. "My mother knew that I would balk at giving up Bendal to be with you, but she also knew that you would make me happy. And you...you wanted me to stay..."

"Want you to stay." He cut in, wanting to be clear. "I want you to stay."

"Yet you told me to go...putting my happiness over what you wanted." She shrugged and wiped at the tears under her eyes. "Once that became clear...there was no doubt in my mind. So, first thing this morning, I called Marquita and I...I chose you over Bendal." Her lips twitched in a smile as she said it out loud.

"You chose me..." He wasn't sure he had ever heard those words before. And it almost brought him to his knees.

"You know, if you don't kiss me soon, I'm going to just..."

Harry nodded and moved to her then. Though his movements were quick and purposeful, his lips urgent; he held her with soft hands, his fingers moved delicately to her face. Whispering over her skin, they embedded in her hair; tilting her face to his.

And then he was kissing her. And it was life altering—in all senses of the word. Twenty-four hours earlier he had been certain he would soon be kissing her good-bye, watching this woman drive away from him en route to Bendal. And he had spent that entire morning in the worst case of uncertainty.

And now she was in his arms; sighing into him, parting her lips under his—surrendering to him in a way that touched him on the deepest of levels. It was big and bold and brave. He knew what it meant to her, he knew how important it was. And if he could have found words in that moment, he would have promised her everything; his entire life.

But words always seemed to fail in moments like these. So he tightened his hold on her and refused to move his lips from hers—even when she tried to.

"I'm so sorry," she spoke into his mouth.

"For what?" His face twisted in confusion.

"For last night," she pulled back slightly; wanting to be sure he heard what she had to say. "I don't know why I automatically assumed that you..." Maddie swallowed. "She just said the same words we had used in conversation and I just jumped all over you and...I don't know what happened in my head but I am so, so sorry."

"It's okay," he shook his head, too blissful to be angry.

"No it's not." Her voice was strong as turned apologetic eyes up to him. "You've always been above reproach when it comes to being honest with me and I didn't even give you a chance to..." She took a deep breath. "You know, it's only fair for you to have a go at me. You want to yell, please...."

"I am not going to yell at you," he laughed lightly, his arms around her waist, pulling her close. "You had a moment of weakness in a long, stressful week. I get it." He kissed her forehead. "Just please, please, please...I need you to trust me."

"I do," she was quick with the reply. "It will never happen again. Ever." Harry's eyes scanned her face and then he smiled.

"Okay."

"Ever." And everything inside of her stood behind this promise to him. Now that the decision was made, now the felt the overwhelming sense of rightness that came with the decision—she couldn't imagine faltering when it came to him ever again.

"I believe you," he dipped his head; kissing her again. "You're really staying?" His smile stretched across his face as it all began to settle.

"I am," she let out a breath, her smile following his. "It's crazy really. I worried about this, stressed about it...spent so much time trying to figure it all out but when it came down to it..." She ran her hands up his arms. "It was the easiest thing in the world."

"I meant what I said last night, though. This isn't something you can be talked into. Convincing yourself won't work, you..."

"I want to be here." She interrupted. "I know I wavered. I know I blinked. But I'm done wavering. I'm done blinking. I...I signed my exit paperwork, Harry. I'm...wow..." she sighed at the emotions that came with what she was saying. "I'm moving to London."

"You're moving to London," he repeated; his eyes shining. "Tell me, is there anything, anything at all that you need from me? I can put you in touch with somebody who can help you find a place or I can call my father about Highgrove..."
"Actually," Maddie smiled as she stepped out of his arms. "I do have a favor to ask."

"Anything."

"Anything?" She laughed at his immediate response.

"Name it."

"You don't want to hear it first?"

"Nah," he shook his head with a chuckle. "I can make just about anything happen. I'm a royal puppet master, remember?" Her eyes flew to his suddenly. And he laughed.

"So that's how it's going to be?" Maddie smirked.

"For a while, yes," he shrugged.

"Okay then," Maddie shook her head; she deserved that. And God she loved him. "So, about this favor."

"Yes?"

"I need you to give me a week."

"Give you a week?" He was confused.

"Well," Maddie took a breath. "This morning I left something very important, something that was an enormous part of me so that I could stay here," he opened his mouth to say something, but Maddie hurried ahead of him. "And I'm glad I did. I am...thrilled that I made the right decision. And it was the right decision, Harry. It was time to leave. It was time to do something new, something different, something for me." Her voice tripped over the words. "And this," she waved her hand between them. "This is for me. But...and...it's also wrapped up in you. Because, let's face it, if it weren't for you, I don't know that I would be considering London. So...in order to keep this in perspective, to make this decision mine and not about..."

"Some guy?" He offered with a knowing smile.

"Exactly," she reached out to stroke his cheek. "I need to do this next part without you."

"This next part?" His hand reached up to take her hand in his.

"The interview, the job search, the apartment hunting, buying furniture, moving in..." She thought over all of the things that needed to happen. "I need to settle into London on my own and then..." Her face lit up as she stepped closer to him. "And then bring you into my London. Does that make any sense at all?"

"No," he shook his head with laughter. "But if you want to do all of those things without me, I'm not going to put up a fight. Though...I do have an excellent eye for draperies," he joked.

"Oh I bet you do," she nodded with a smirk; leaning up to kiss him. "Also...I'm going to go stay with Ella."

"Wait," he pulled back. "Hold on."

"Harry..."
"You know you can stay here."

"I do know that. And I have really enjoyed being here with you. But, if we're going to settle in and give this a go, we need to give it a go. And me living here just isn't...it's lovely but it's not where we're at and moving too fast is a sure fire way to destroy this before it even gets going."

"Okay," he nodded. "But you can stay here while you find a place."

"Yes. Or I could stay with Ella. It will be great. I've already talked to her and she's beside herself. We're going to do girl things. We're going to spend the week shopping and looking for an apartment and...and we're going to do touristy things; Stonehenge, Big Ben, Buckingham Palace."

"You know I actually know somebody who could probably get you into Buckingham Palace."

"I know that," she laughed. "But I want to do it this way first. I want to be a newcomer to London who doesn't have the benefit of this boyfriend with amazing access. I want to do the touristy things, I want to figure out what part of the city speaks to me, I want to find a place that fits me, I want to blow this interview out of the water and then...at the end of the week, when, hopefully, everything settles, I want you to come to my new place with a bottle of ridiculously expensive wine and I want you to hear all about my week. I want you to make fun of my decorating sense and make love to me on the kitchen counter and sleep in my bed and be my boyfriend again."

"You know my security team is going to have to look the place over first," his heart warmed as she moved closer.

"I do know that," she grinned. "I'll be sure to hide my weapons."

"Okay," he sighed. "But a whole week?"

"Yes, a whole week." She held her ground. "A whole week that will make me feel like this is mine and not yours."

"Well, that is important."

"It is," she nodded. "Think you can handle that, your highness?"

"I think so. Though...I think you're going to miss me terribly."

"I know I'm going to miss you terribly."

"Just so you know," he smirked. "Also, you're probably going to want to toss this week time frame out and sneak in my window late at night..."

"Well it's a good thing I have Ella there to enforce the rules."

"She's actually always struck me as a rule breaker." His eyes danced; happy to have their banter back; happy to have them back. Maddie bit her lip for a moment, the levity a nice relief.

"I'm staying in London." Each time she said it, her whole body felt more alive and awake and full of excitement about what was to come.

"You're staying in London." And then, because there wasn't really anything else to add to that, Harry pulled her back to him; his lips hungry for hers. Not knowing when her week apart was to begin, he wanted to waste no more time with the back and forth.

She was staying in London. On her own accord, without pressure or interference, she had stood up and chose to stay.

And victory had never, ever felt so satisfying.
Sunday

And so the week apart began. Prying herself from Harry's arms proved more difficult than Maddie had anticipated, but she finally succeeded. Kissing him good-bye once, twice, and three times, she left him in a state of bliss and made her way to Ella's. Maddie knew herself well and, with the decision finally made, she could feel her sense of confidence and autonomy returning. She knew that, although she would prefer to spend the entire week in Harry's bed, it was best for her to get settle in her own space, in her own mind before she launched forward.

Harry watched as she moved away from him, away from Kensington Palace and, with a smile that hurt his cheeks, he pulled out his phone. There were a few phone calls that needed to be made. Harry called his dad and brother, who were genuinely thrilled for him—both commenting on how happy he had been this last year. He called Thomas who smiled warmly, having grown fond of the young woman, who would immediately let the appropriate people know. Bishop who couldn't stop grinning and would likely spread the news to the rest of their friends.

Harry wasn't the only one on the phone. Maddie called her mom and thanked her; for knowing her so well, for being available at all hours to knock some sense into her. She called Collins and Khenda who hooted and hollered and didn't need the apologies she offered. And then, as she stepped up to Ella's new place, she slipped her phone into her pocket. She had no idea at that time just how much time she would be spending on that phone; her one connection to Harry during her self-imposed week of solitude. And Harry had every intention of using it.

"I'm never going to make it Madeline."

"Ha!" He could almost hear her smirk over the phone. "It's been one night."

"One looong night."

"We've been apart for months at a time."

"Yes, but just yesterday you gave me the best news I've ever received in my entire life."

"A bit dramatic, no?"

"You couldn't have given me one night with you before you imposed this ridiculous..."

"Watch it."

"Ridiculously important...week apart?" She laughed at his save.

"I couldn't. I had a hair appointment this morning."

"What did you do to your hair?"

"I spent a year in Africa Harry. I needed a bit of a cut, a dash of color."

"What color?"

"You'll see," she teased.

"Why don't you stop over? I can see now."
"No way."

"How about I meet you and Ella for lunch?"

"We've had lunch."

"Tea, then."

"Harry..."

"Fine," he sighed dramatically. "What are you doing now?"

"Trying on clothes for Ella."

"What?"

"We're trying to decide what I should wear to the interview tomorrow."

"I could probably provide useful input."

"You're not coming over. You should let it go."

"Fine," he sighed. "And you're wrong..."

"Wrong? About what?"

"I'm not being dramatic. You staying in London—best news. By far."

"Harry..." Her voice grew soft.

"Hmm?"

"You're not coming over."

"Damn it!" They shared a laugh.

"Nice try though."

"Thanks. Listen, good luck tomorrow Maddie."

"Thank you. I hope they like me."

"I hope you like them."

"I'll talk to you tomorrow night?"

"Absolutely...I love you."

"And I you."

Monday Night:

Harry shrugged out of his suit coat and loosened his tie before he pulled his phone out; seeing that she had called when he had been busy networking. Dialing her number, he sat down to rid himself of his shoes.

"Buongiorno!" Maddie giggled into her phone.
"You just told me Good Morning in Italian," the corner of Harry's mouth lifted into a smirk. It only took one attempt at an Italian word for him to know she had been drinking.

"Oh!" She laughed.

"I was going to ask how the interview went, but I'm guessing well."

"Oui."

"You're switching languages you know."

"I know," she sighed. "I've been practicing a few. You see...now that I'm going to live in London, I have every intention of spending weekends traveling to the not so distant countries of Italy, France, Germany, Spain..."

"You're going to be busy."

"Si," Maddie giggled again.

"So the interview..."

"Oh God, Harry it went magnificently well," she was grinning. "I was smart, I was pithy and I think they absolutely loved me. Oh! The chair of the committee knew Khenda from Graduate school and couldn't speak more highly of her..."

"That's great!" He exclaimed; knowing Khenda had put in a good word for Maddie. "Did they tell you when they would let you know?"

"She said I would know one way or another by the end of the week."

"Fantastic. What do you say we celebrate?"

"Ella and I are two steps ahead of you...or two bottles ahead of you," she laughed again as Ella joined in on the laughter in the background.

"Ahh..." Harry groaned. "Let me come to you."

"Nein!" Her voice grew stern.

"Come to me," his grew low and gruff. "Maddie please...come see me."

"I can't," she shrugged.

"I want to celebrate with you..."

"On Saturday."

"Do you have any idea how many days are between now and Saturday?"

"Not really...but only because I'm not sure if it's still last night or early this morning you know. Ella!" Maddie yelled into the room. "Ella! Why don't you have a clock?" Harry listened to mumbled conversation before Maddie returned her attention to him. "Harry?"

"Yes love?"

"I adore you."
"Thank you. I adore you too."

"I mean it. I just...you're such a great guy; supportive and loving and..." Her voice lowered as she rambled. "And when you kiss me, something happens..."

"Come over, Madeline, let's make that something happen right now."

"Hmmm...I do like that thought."

"You would like the reality better, I promise."

"You promised you would give me a week and look, not even a day or two in and you're already trying to lure me there...."

"Lure?"

"Yes. Lure. But I can't come over there. You know that...." Maddie's voice trailed off as she collected herself. "Harry?"

"Yes?"

"I am so happy I chose London."

"Maddie?"

"Yes?"

"I am never going to tire of you saying that."

"Hmmm." She yawned into the phone. "You know what Ella's place doesn't have?"

"Me?"

"And..." Maddie laughed. "And my candy. It's sad Harry. You've spoiled me. I've become accustomed to a certain lifestyle and..."

"I have candy here with me now. I could bring it to you or you could come and get it."

"You're not going to stop with that are you?"

"Never," he shook his head. "Saturday?"

"Saturday."

"Okay. But only because I love you."

"Okay."

"Good night love."

"Good night."

Tuesday Afternoon:

"Hello?" Harry pulled his phone from his pocket as he stepped into the car on his way to a luncheon.
"I have great news," Maddie was beaming on the other end.

"Go."

"They called me back. I'm going to have an interview with the hospital board tomorrow morning."

"That's fantastic!" He let out a breath he had been holding. "I know people on that board. Do you want some tips?"

"No!" She exclaimed. "This is mine. Sink or swim, this is mine."

"Have it your way."

"God Harry..." She stopped walking and took a deep breath. "This could be it."

"Do you want it to be it?"

"Yes," she breathed. "More than anything."

"Then it will be."

"Where are you?"

"On my way to a luncheon."

"Sounds fun."

"In Wales."

"Really? For how long?"

"Tomorrow night."

"Spur of the moment?"

"Kate isn't feeling well, my brother called and asked me to join him."

"You're a great brother."

"Yes, well, what can I say?"

"You can wish me luck."

"Wished. You'll call me?"

"I will."

"You're smart, compassionate, quick on your feet and incredibly sexy. Knock 'em dead, Doctor."

"Well, thank you for that, your highness."

Wednesday Morning:

"Well?" Harry bit his lip, knowing she had gone into the interview an hour and a half earlier.

"I want you to know that I'm calling you before Ella or Khenda. Harry, I'm calling you before my mother."
"And I want you to know that I am standing at the door to a reception hall full of people waiting for my brother and I to walk through the door. Are you going to kill me with anticipation or are you going to..."

"I got it."

"You got it!" He called out, immediately lowering his voice. "You got it?"

"I did! They want me to start on Monday. I'll work three twelve hour days and have four off and the salary is fantastic and...Harry. I'm staying in London."

"It gets better and better every time you say it."

"I...wow. I'm going to go look for an apartment and...oh I wish you were in London. I want to see you."

"Ohhh..." He groaned. "Why are you doing this to me?!"

"I'm sorry!" She laughed. "Now go. I'll talk to you later. You need to walk into that reception hall and do your job."

"Okay, okay," he sighed. "I'm so proud of you."

"Thank you."

"I'll call you tonight."

"Harry?"

"Yes."

"I love you."

"Hmmm..." He smiled. "And I you."

Wednesday Afternoon:

BEEP

"Hi Harry, it's Maddie. I am guessing you're still at the reception or...maybe on a plane or...I don't know. But I signed a lease; on a two bedroom, two bathroom flat in this beautiful area by... The security is fantastic and I...Wow. I wish you were here. I am just...I have a job. And a place to live and I would love to show it to you and...Saturday, right? My stupid rules." She laughed. "Okay. I'm going to go. Ella and I are getting dressed and going out. Have a wonderful night. Love you."

BEEP

Wednesday Night:

"Hello?!" Maddie's voice was loud, trying to call out over the music as she moved through the nightclub towards the deck out back.

"Maddie?"

"Hold on! I'm heading outside! I'm just...hold on!" Harry could hear music and talking and then suddenly she was back. "Please tell me you're still there."
"I'm still here," he laughed.

"Thank God!" She breathed. "Are you back?"

"Only just. Where are you?"

"Some club that Bishop brought us to."

"You're with Bishop?! How did you end up out with Bishop?"

"We wanted to go out dancing. We didn't know where to go. Ella called Bishop."

"Damn traitor."

"Me or Bishop?"

"Bishop! That man is my best friend and he's out with my girl and..."

"Your girl?" Maddie snickered. "Did we just time warp back to the fifties. Your girl?"

"Make fun all you want Madeline. Just tell me where you are."

"I don't know."

"Aw come on. Your message said you wanted to see me and..."

"I'm not being coy. I really don't know where we are. Bishop picked us up and we've kind of been under his influence all night."

"Bastard."

"Stop calling Bishop names," she laughed. "He's been great to us tonight."

"I bet he has."

"And he said my place is a perfect place for you to run away to; secure and..."

"Hold on," Harry shook his head. "Bishop has been to your place?"

"He picked us up there."

"Have you been drinking?"

"A lot, yes," she giggled. "And dancing. I've been drinking and dancing and Harry..."

"Yes?"

"I miss you. I know I said I needed a week... But I miss you terribly."

"I warned you."

"I know," she sighed. "I want you desperately."

"If you tell me where you are, I will come there now."

"I don't know, remember?"

"Put Bishop on the phone."
"I don't know where he is."

"What do you mean you don't know where he is? He left you there?"

"No!" Her laughter increased. "I was dancing with him when you called and I came outside to hear you and..."

"You're outside right now?"

"Yes."

"Tell me what you see."

"I don't know," she looked around. "I see...I see lots of people. I see...I can see the bar across the way. There are some...streetlights and I can see water from here but it's kind of hazy and...wow. I suck at this." At least she could laugh at herself.

"Oh-kay," Harry thought for a moment. "Can you go back inside?"

"Yes."

"Go to the bar, the one closest to the doors you just went out. Tell me what it looks like."

"You really know the bars in London well enough to know where I am based on a description of the bar?"

"Let's find out, shall we?"

"Are you really coming here?" She grew increasingly excited at the prospect of seeing him that night.

"Do you want me to come there? Be honest. I can take it."

"I..." She took a deep breath, tossing her stance out the window. "I really really do."

"You sure? Because I don't want you to regret this in the morning and..."

"Harry. Come to me. Please."

"You're going to kill me."

"Not on purpose, I promise."

"Please, go back inside and..."

"Going," she couldn't help the way her heart picked up as she moved back inside. Scanning the room quickly, she hurried towards the bar. "Okay. It looks like...it's tall and there's this half-door thing to the side and. You know what. What if I just ask somebody..."

"Can I buy you a drink?" A voice to her left cut in.

"I'm sorry, but I..." She turned towards the voice and about dropped her phone.

It was Harry.

"Oh my..."
"Your hair looks amazing." He was close to gawking as he took in the new cut, the few highlights.

"Thank you," she blushed, still speaking into the phone. "How did you know where to..."

"Bishop." Harry was smiling wide; looking sexier than she had even remembered.

"That damn traitor," Maddie grinned, letting her phone leave her ear.

"Yes," Harry agreed. "But also my best friend."

"You know, if Ella sees you, you're in trouble."

"Bishop is running interference for me. So, are you going to let me buy you a drink?"

"I don't need another drink. Harry..."

"Who's Harry?" He winked, stepping closer. "Harry was told to stay away from you for a week. I'm...Paul."

"Paul?"

"Yes. Come on. Dance with me." His hand stretched out to her.

"I don't know Paul. I have this boyfriend. He's incredibly powerful and protective and..."
Maddie's thoughts were lost as he stepped even closer. Then she sighed and smiled up at him blissfully. "I've missed you."

"You have no idea," Harry shook his head; taking her hand in his. Walking backwards towards the dance floor, he pulled them into the sea of people. It was dark and the music was fantastic. People were moving to the beat and so caught up in their own worlds that he went almost completely unnoticed.

Not that Maddie cared. She didn't. Notice, don't notice; she didn't care.

He stopped moving and pulled her closer; his hands moving around her waist as they began to sway. God, she thought, she had made the right decision. There was so much she wanted to tell him; the job, the apartment. But in that moment, his body dangerously close to hers, his eyes staring at her in that way, all she wanted to do was move closer. And closer still.

The music changed then; shifting to something a bit slower, more sultry; a teasing sort of a beat. His hands held her tight as he tilted his head slightly to talk in her ear; his warm breath tickling her skin.

"Come home with me." She felt a chill travel over her skin.

"I can't."

"You can. You've been there before. I've made love to you there. I want to do that again. Come home with me Maddie."

"You have no idea how tempting it is but..."

"Well, well, well," Ella's voice cut in as she and Bishop moved next to them.

"Ella!" Harry exclaimed, moving to kiss her cheek. "Don't be mad, love."
"I'm not mad," she shook her head, her eyes narrowing in on her best friend. "You know you could have just invited the man over."

"Yes, Madeline," Harry grinned. "You could have just invited the man over."

"Yes well," Maddie shrugged. "I like to do things the hard way. Which reminds me..." She turned to Bishop then. "You..."

"Now listen," he began his defense but was silenced as Maddie threw her arms around his neck in a hug.

"Thank you Bishop!" She giggled as he hugged her back.

"Thank you Bishop!" Harry laughed, tossing his arms around the both of them.

"Oh for the love of..." Ella shook her head and rolled her eyes. "Come on you three. We have less than an hour before they kick us out of here. Now. This isn't the warm nights in Bendal, but the music is great and I want to dance."

The group hug dissipated and they began to dance. Though Harry tried once more, Maddie could not be convinced. He was going home alone. And, though he liked to tease her, he was perfectly fine with that. He was fine with waiting a week. Hell, he would have waited longer had she asked.

Alerted to the presence of the paparazzi outside, Harry left first and he left alone; insisting that if she walked out the door with him now, she was not going to be able to shop alone the next day. Unfortunately he was right. So, as Bishop went out the back door with Maddie and Ella, Harry put on a smile and took the flashbulbs out the front door.

Seeing him had been brief but it had been exactly what she needed. That night she fell asleep with a wide smile on her face and, with a new job and a new place, this was becoming hers.

Thursday Afternoon:

"Tell me you don't regret seeing me last night."

"Seeing you?" Maddie smirked. "I spent last night dancing till the wee hours with a lovely man named Paul."

"Lucky guy."

"He was," she nodded. "And no, no regrets. I needed that. Besides, I'm back to my lockout today."

"Yes I know," he grumbled. "What is on the itinerary?"

"Well, this morning we went to the Changing of the Guard and we toured Buckingham Palace. Did you know that there is a chapel, a post office, and a pool inside?"

"I did," he laughed. "I've been swimming in that pool."

"I'm not sure my tourist mind can quite wrap around that fact just yet."

"Fair enough."

"We're getting ready to have lunch and then we're buying furniture."
"Furniture?"

"Yes. I'm not sure if you noticed, but I brought very little with me when I came to London. I need a bed and a couch and a desk...among other things."

"Sounds expensive."

"Not really. I have quite a bit of money set aside and we're finding some great stuff."

"Good to hear," Harry grinned. "Are you going to let me buy you a housewarming present?"

"Like what?"

"A couch, a tv..."

"Ha! No. Those are not housewarming presents."

"They are!"

"In what world is a television a housewarming gift?"

"It pains me to say what I'm about to say, but you remember who I am right? In my family housewarming presents are usually...like, I don't know; another house."

"Absolutely not."

"I have to get you something."

"I'll think about it."

"When are you moving in?"

"Tomorrow. Ella has the day off. We're going to get drunk and decorate the place."

"Charming."

"I'm sure it will be."

"Maddie. In all seriousness...I cannot wait to see you on Saturday."

"Hmmm..." Maddie sighed. "In all seriousness; neither can I."

Friday Evening:

Maddie and Ella had worked tirelessly throughout the day. The furniture had mostly been delivered that morning and they went right to it; adjusting placement, hanging pictures. Finally, Maddie had ordered takeout and opened a bottle of wine and the two friends were sitting down to enjoy dinner—at the couch in the living room as the dining table was still covered with kitchen items.

"Can I just say..." Maddie took a drink from her glass. "Moving couches, hammering nails; you are the best friend I have ever had."

"My dear," Ella sipped. "I would have to say the same for you."

"Cheers?" Maddie offered.

"I cannot believe I live in London."

"Well," Ella shrugged with a smug grin. "I live here, where else would you be?"

"Ha!" Maddie laughed. "That is an excellent point. Seriously...thank you for all of your help Ella. I couldn't have done it without you."

"Of course you could have," Ella rolled her eyes.

"I don't just mean today, or this week even," Maddie's eyes grew watery as she smiled. "You were my best friend in Bendal. And I couldn't have made it through that year without you. And then when I was..." She took a breath, surprised that this was where she was headed. "Collins told me what you had to do that night and..."

"Shhh..." Ella held her hand up. She was smiling but her eyes were sad and full of tears. "I can't talk about that right now. I'm...I'm okay I just...every time I think about it all I see is you laying there in Harry's hands just covered in..." She looked away and wiped at her eyes. "I don't want to think about that tonight."

"I'm sorry," Maddie moved then; abandoning her dinner so she could move to Ella's side. Sitting next to her, she wrapped her arms around her. "I just wanted to say thank you for saving me. In Bendal and in London."

"You're welcome," Ella hugged her back.

"I love you Ella."

"I love you too Maddie." Ella sniffed as Maddie pressed kisses to the top of her head. "So..." Ella held tight to her friend's hand as they both leaned back against the couch. "You have a job, a place to live, and an amazing best friend..."

"Yes," Maddie grinned.

"Think you're ready to Prince Harry's girlfriend?" Maddie couldn't help the way her grin stretched wide as she thought of him.

"Yes," she sighed dreamily. "Think he still wants me to be?"

"Nah," Ella shook her head. "Did you see the way he looked at me Wednesday night? I think he's moved on."

As their laughter rang out into the room, the buzzer at her door called out. Confused, Maddie moved to press the button.

"Hello?"

"It's Bishop. Can I come up?"

"Sure," Maddie pressed the button and waited by the door, opening it before he could even knock. "Come on in."

"Thank you," he nodded. "Look at all this furniture and..." He spotted the wine and candles. A smirk spread across his lips. "Am I interrupting something?"

"You wish," Ella rolled her eyes.
"I do. I really do."

"What are you doing here?"

"Ella!" Maddie shook her head. "Sorry Bishop. Is there something we can do for you?"

"Actually," he turned a sweet smile to Maddie. "I come bearing gifts."

"You have Harry with you?" Her eyes perked up; hopeful.

"No," he laughed. "But I could make a call and he would be here in like a minute flat."

"No...I mean...that would be...but no. I see him tomorrow."

"Your loss."

"Oh I know," Maddie arched an eyebrow.

"Oh-kay," Bishop held out a small gift bag. "I was asked to bring this over; it being your first night in your new place and all."

"From Harry?" She took the bag from his hand and he nodded. Maddie peered into the bag and, because she had just been crying with Ella, tears jumped to her eyes. Slightly embarrassed, she pulled out a beautiful jar full to the lid with her favorite candy. "Would you just..."

"Candy?" Ella seemed confused.

"It's a long story," Maddie grinned happily. "One where Harry just..." She sighed and Bishop couldn't help but shake his head with a grin.

"I suppose this should probably be when I give you my speech."

"Your speech about what?" Maddie called to him as she placed the jar in her kitchen.

"About being good to Harry, how if you hurt him I'll hunt you down...that sort of thing."

"Oh please," Ella rolled her eyes.

"It's okay," Maddie winked at Ella and turned to Bishop. "Go ahead. I would love to hear your speech."

"Nah," he shook his head; leaning in to kiss her cheek. "I just...I've never seen him this happy and I would hate to see it fade."

"I would hate that too." She patted his arm.

"Okay. Well. Candy is delivered. I think I'll take off," he nodded to Maddie and turned to where Ella was sitting in the living room. "Ella love, you want to come home with me?"

"I'm staying with Maddie tonight," she declined. "Another time maybe?"

"Indeed," he grinned. "Ladies."

"Bishop," Maddie grinned, tossing a surprised glance at her best friend.

"Good night Bishop," Ella called out, waiting for the door to close and lock behind him before she burst into laughter.

As Maddie settled back on the couch next to Ella, she returned to her dinner, to her wine, to her friend.

Only one more night before absolutely everything fell into place.

Friday Night:

"Hello?"

"Maddie."

"Harry, it's...it's midnight. What's going on? Is everything okay?"

"Yes, everything is fine. I just...it's Saturday and I thought maybe, maybe there was a chance you would come over and..."

"Oh Harry." Maddie chuckled sleepily. "I'm in bed. In my pajamas."

"Perfect. I'll come there."

"No," she shook her head. "I'll see you tonight."

"You want me there at six?"

"Yes. We're cooking dinner."

"Oh?"

"My father always said I could tell a great deal about a man by cooking a meal with him."

"And of course you're dating a man who would never really have to cook a meal if he didn't want to."

"Of course," she closed her eyes. "But I have faith in you."

"Sorry I woke you."

"S'okay..." Maddie yawned again.

"Go back to sleep. I'll see you soon."

"Hey Harry...thank you for the candy. You're just racking up the good boyfriend points these days."

"Well, I need to stockpile them for those moments you wish you were anywhere but standing next to me." Harry laughed lightly as Maddie opened her eyes and sat up in bed.

"I can't imagine a moment where I won't want to be standing next to you Harry."

"I was just joking, mostly..."

"Are you okay tonight?"

"Yes," he sighed. "I'm just missing you is all. It's been a long week and not seeing you has been hard and...Yes. I'm okay."
"Will you meet me at the gate?"

"Sorry?"

"To the Palace? I don't know how to get in there without you. Thomas helped me last weekend but I'm guessing he's asleep."

"Get in here?"

"I'm coming to you."

"But...You wanted to wait a week and..."

"I don't care. I...I'm on my way. I just need to find...shoes...damn it. Did I not pack shoes or a coat or...." Maddie sighed. "How do I get in?"

"You're not coming here, Maddie."

"I am. Right now."

"Stay put," he laughed. "I appreciate the gesture but it's not necessary."

"I'll never not want to stand next to you Harry."

"I believe you. You don't have to stand there right now."

"Are you saying I'm on my own at the gate? I'm scrappy, but the security there is pretty tight." He laughed and she joined in; sitting back on her bed. "I'm happy it's Saturday."

"Me too. I'll see you soon love. Get some sleep."

"I love you Harry of Wales."

"Hmmm...I love you Madeline of London."

Saturday Night:

The buzzer rang out into her place; her meticulously decorated and recently cleaned place. Maddie checked her hair in the hallway mirror as she moved to the door; smoothing her skirt. Ella had helped her finish up and had been gone for hours before Maddie had begun to prepare for Harry’s visit. Taking a breath, she pressed the button.

"Hello?"

"It's me." Even his voice over the system made her sigh.

"Come on up," she released the door and waited; feeling slightly ridiculous at how nervous she was.

This was Harry; Harry who had seen her at her absolute worst, Harry who had anchored her to London. There was a soft knock on the door and, after checking the peep hole, she pulled it open.

"Hi..." She breathed. He looked amazing; casual and smiling wide.

"Do you mind if my friends take a look around?" He nodded to the two men beside him who Maddie recognized.
"Not at all," Maddie's eyes stayed locked with Harry's as she stepped aside; letting his protection team inspect her place; checking rooms, closing curtains.

"All good," they smiled. Satisfied with her place, they reminded Harry where they would be and stepped out of Maddie's apartment. "Good night Sir, Doctor."

"Good night," Maddie grinned.

"Good night," Harry called out, with no shame. "So, are you going to let me in or..."

"Get in here Wales." Maddie reached out for his hand and with one strong tug, she pulled him to her, pushed the door closed behind him and then him up against it.

"Wow, I..." Harry began, but she shushed him. With one hand, she pressed her fingers to his lips as her other moved to lock the doors' three locks and then type in the security code; effectively enabling the security alarm. When the light blinked green, Maddie turned to him and he could see her confidence, her strength, her wit...all things that he adored about her. All things this week apart had reinforced. And every single day way from her was worth it. "It's..." He cleared his throat. "It's Saturday."

"It is," she grinned; her hands snaking up around his neck as she leaned into him.

"You said something about a kitchen counter..." And before his smug grin could even form, Maddie had pulled his lips to hers.

It was Saturday. The week was over. She had spent the last seven days making this move to London about her.

And now, it was time to make it about him.
Chapter 36

Saturday:

When Harry had arrived, Maddie had wasted no time at all. She had been wanting him all week; needing his hands on her body, his lips against hers. And it took Harry no time at all to catch up to where she was. Finally they were free of all that had been looming over them. Her arm was completely healed, there was no possibility that she would be leaving him for Africa any time soon, and she felt settled and free and home. And all of that was translating into this nearly embarrassing insatiable need to be with him—though Harry had zero issue rising to the challenge.

She had pushed him up against that door and he had dropped his overnight bag without a second thought. Moving from the door, to the kitchen, to the couch—they rid the other of their clothes along the way. And now, Harry was underneath her in a tangled mess of limbs and post-coital bliss as they both tried to catch their breath.

"Wow..." Maddie breathed against his bare shoulder as she slumped forward; letting her body rest on his chest.

"Yes," Harry chuckled, his hand traced a lazy line along her spine; tickling her as it went.
"Welcome to London."

"Ha!" She tossed her head back with laughter; moving so that she was sitting up. "That was some Welcome Committee. Does the Visitors' Center know about you?"

"No," he shook his head, his hands resting on her bare thighs that were straddled over him. "And don't tell them. I could get in a whole host of..." Harry laughed against her lips as she leaned down to kiss him again, a moan escaping her lips. "Maddie, love, I appreciate your spirit but I am going to need to rest for a moment before we..." She kissed him again; longer and with more passion. Both of Harry's hands moved to her hair as he responded in kind.

"Five minutes?" Maddie pulled back slightly.

"Sorry?" Harry smirked.

"You need to rest," her eyes were sultry as she looked him over. "Will five minutes do or do you need longer?"

"Ohhhhh..." His laughter rumbled in his chest. "I had no idea a week apart would ignite such a..."

"Fire?" She finished for him. "I didn't either. Though I have to admit, I thought you would be more up for the task." And with a wicked wink she lifted herself off of him and moved towards her bathroom.

"Oh come on Maddie!" He called after her. "I asked for five minutes! It's not like I..." He heard the bathroom door shut. "And now I'm just yelling like a maniac, to myself." Moving off the
When he returned, he could hear Maddie moving around the kitchen. He pulled on his boxers and a t-shirt as he moved to join her. He saw her a moment before she saw him and he stopped to watch her as she moved. She was wearing his blue button down with the sleeves rolled up and her lacy panties underneath—as she pulled items out of the fridge and the cupboards.

Moving up behind her, Harry put his hands on her hips; pulling her back to him. His lips planted kisses on her neck as she moved to him.

"Mmmm..." She moaned, her hand reached back to twist in his hair. "Is five minutes up?"

"No...." Harry chuckled into her neck. "And I may very well need ten. What are you doing?" He reached out and took a cherry tomato from one of the bowls in her hand; plopping it into his mouth.

"We are going to cook dinner," she turned in his arms then; pressing a kiss to his cheek. "I think we're going to need refueling."

"I think maybe you're right," he couldn't help the smug grin on his face as he watched her move away from him; continuing her search through the kitchen. "Oh! I brought wine." Leaving her to what she was doing, he went back to the entryway where his bag sat, just as he had left it. Harry moved the bag into her room and returned to the kitchen with the wine in hand. "Would you like me to open this?"

"Yes please," she nodded; retrieving a cork screw and two glasses. "Do you know how or do you usually have people who do that for you?" Her eyes glinted with laughter. "I mean, you said you were the guy who would never have to cook for himself, so..."

"Wow," he shook his head as he maneuvered the cork screw expertly. "You sure are on tonight, aren't you?"

"I know," she grinned wide. "I think I'm finally starting to settle into myself."

"Fantastic," he pulled the cork and poured two glasses. "Look at that. All on my own."

"Nicely done," she took the glass he offered.

"Welcome to London," he raised his glass in a toast.

"Thank you," she clinked hers to his and took a sip. "Though I'm pretty sure you already did that." Harry shook his head with a smirk as he took a drink. "This is wonderful."

"I'm glad you like it," Harry took another drink.

"I do. Oh! I've decided what you can give me as a housewarming gift," she moved to him then, her hands resting on his chest as she smiled up at him sweetly.

"Oh? What's that?" His smile mirrored hers.

"This shirt. It's lovely; so soft and it smells just like you." She turned her nose to the collar and inhaled; her eyes closing.

"You want my shirt?"

"I do," she nodded and stepped away from him then; turning all the way around so he could get a good look. "I think it looks fabulous on me."

"No arguments here," he shook his head. "If you really want the shirt..."

"Please."

"It's yours."

"Thank you," she leaned up on her toes to kiss him. "But you can feel free to try to take it back from me anytime you like." With a swift pat on his ass, she turned away from him then.

"You're killing me Madeline." Harry shook his head. "Absolutely killing me." His eyes turned then to the spread of food she had assembled on the counter. "Tell me, what exactly is it you're hoping to do in here tonight?"

She arched an eyebrow suggestively.

"Besides that," he laughed as Maddie cracked; her smile reaching her eyes.

"Well, I want to make a salad, some pasta with sauce and some garlic bread." She waved her fingers in the direction of the foods as she spoke. "It's relatively well-balanced, filling and pretty simple. Even you can't mess up pasta."

"Well now, let's not get ahead of ourselves," Harry warned. "What do you want me to do first?"

"First..." Maddie looked around. "First, I want you to wash and chop these veggies for the salad while I get the sauce going."

"Done." Setting his wine glass aside, Harry followed her orders and the cooking adventure began.

"Well," Maddie swallowed her last bit of pasta and looked across the table at him. "That wasn't half bad, Wales."

"Half bad?" He laughed. "I thought it was fantastic. Particularly that salad..."

"Enough about the expertly chopped radishes; it makes you sound like a crazy person."

"Fine, fine," he spread his hands up in defeat. "So...what did you learn?"

"Sorry?"

"You said that your father told you that you could learn a lot about a man by cooking a meal with him. So...other than my amazing skills with a chef's knife, what did you learn?"

"Hmmm..." Maddie smiled warmly; he had remembered. "I learned...I learned that you take orders well..."

"Of course you knew that already—having been ordering me around since the very beginning," he poked and she laughed.

"And you're a great listener; very attentive." Maddie pushed back from the table. "You pay great attention to detail, you want to make sure you get it right—even if it means you have to start over." Leaving her chair, she moved closer to him. "You are really great with a knife—and that shows agility and dexterity; control and determination."
"You were really paying attention, weren't you?" Harry's voice was low as she moved to stand next to his chair.

"Most importantly," she sighed as she pushed him slightly back in his chair, making room for herself in his lap; her knees on either side of him. "You wanted to please me."

"I do want to please you," his hands made their way around her waist; pulling her closer to him.

"Has it been five minutes yet?" She cocked her head to the side suggestively.

"God yes," Harry breathed moments before his lips crashed into hers.

Forgetting the food on the table, the dishes, the dessert she had prepared earlier that still remained in the fridge; Maddie held tight to Harry as he stood, taking her with him. She wrapped her legs around him and pressed her fingers into the flesh at his shoulders as he took the party to her bedroom—leaving everything else behind to be dealt with in the morning.

"Hello?" Maddie answered the phone as her eyes drifted to the clock. It was Sunday afternoon and they were still in bed, though Harry had risen at her request to bring back coffee and the dessert from the night before. They had eaten, made love, and fallen back asleep until now.

"I'm so sorry," Ella was on the other end. "I know you were with him last night and I wouldn't bother you if it weren't important..."

"It's fine," Maddie smiled as Harry lifted her hand and placed a kiss on her wrist; slowly moving up her arm. "What's wrong?"

"Nothing is wrong, it's just...." She took a breath. "I was looking at a royal blog late last night and..."

"A royal blog?" Maddie laughed. Harry's eyes glanced up at her from where his lips were stationed at the inside of her elbow. "What are you doing..."

"They have your picture." Ella interrupted. "Well a couple of pictures."

"They what?" Maddie sat up straight in bed, her arm pulling from Harry's fingers.

"Is he there with you?"

"Yes," Harry moved so he could take her hand back in his; his lips starting their journey over again.

"Don't freak out."

"I'm not," Maddie took a breath. "How bad is it?"

"It's not bad," Ella looked it over again. "It's night and it looks like it was raining. You can really only see the back of you but you can totally see him. Your hair looks terrible. Maddie, were you riding on the back of that motorcycle?"

"Tetbury," Maddie breathed; remembering their date.

"Tetbury?" That drew Harry's attention. His mouth left her skin as he sat up and focused.

"The good news is, they don't know who you are. Right now you're just mystery blonde. Some girl was visiting the area on holiday, saw Harry and then took some photos from quite a distance, posted them on twitter. She was interested in him, not you."

"What's the bad news?"

"The bad news..." Ella chuckled. "Well, it is incredibly clear that Harry is in love with you. The girl who posted it said that he seemed very in to you; attentive, doting. He has his hand on your ass in one and the way he is looking at you in this one..."

"Sorry, how is that bad news?" Maddie's hand rested in Harry's lap as he watched her closely.

"Because now..." Ella took a deep breath. "Now they are really going to want to know who you are."

"Oh..."

"There are some theories; some British actress, a college student...one poster even suggests he's back with Chelsy. But nobody's even close. You okay?"

"Of course," Maddie sighed; sitting back against her pillow, leaning closer to him. "It was bound to happen eventually."

"I suppose you're right. Sorry that I bothered you. I just thought...I thought you would want to know."

"Well, I appreciate the heads up."

"Great. Now I'm going to let you get back to...whatever it was you were doing before I called," Maddie could almost hear the smirk on Ella's face. "Tell Harry hello."

"Will do. Thank you Ella. Good-bye."

"Good bye dear." Maddie hung up the phone and turned to Harry.

"Ella says hello."

"Okay, are you going to tell me what that was about?" He raised his eyebrows.

"There's a picture; on the blogs."

"Of?"

"Us. In Tetbury." Maddie sighed and turned so that she was looking at him.

"Ah...I see." His jaw grew tight.

"It's night. You can see the motorcycle and you," her fingers ran down his arm. "And the back of me...Ella said my hair looks terrible and your hand is on my ass."

"Ha!" Harry laughed; his hands running over her legs. "Of course it is. Do they know who you are?"

"I am mystery blonde woman right now," Maddie chuckled at the idea. "The hypotheses include a British actress, a college student, and a reunion with Chelsy."

"Yeah," Harry breathed; running a hand through his hair. "They're never going to let that one go."
"So there you go."

"You okay?" His eye squinted as he watched her as though he were searching for something.

"What? Yes!" She scooted closer to him; pulling on his t-shirt to bring him in for a kiss. "A picture was bound to surface eventually. And, I would imagine it is going to get worse than mystery blonde with bad hair and your hand on my ass."

"Yes." Harry thought for a moment. "It's going to get a lot worse. You know, maybe we should talk about how you want to handle the press."

"How do you mean?"

"Well, there's an office at the palace that sifts through everything about us. Do you want me to ask them to pass the stuff about you onto you? Or would you rather not see it?"

"Wow...I don't know. I guess I haven't..." Maddie's mouth turned down in a frown. "Can I have some time to think about it?"

"Of course," Harry nodded. "Just let me know."

Though it would still be some time before the world discovered the identity of the mystery blonde, Harry was already gearing up, already preparing for what he knew was just around the bend. He watched as Maddie slipped from the bed, telling him something about needing to shower and make an effort to keep her hands off of him and he hoped that what was about to come towards her would be met with the same smile and shrug that she had met everything else so far.

"Harry?" Maddie's voice called to him as she peeked around the door.

"Yes love?" He raised his eyebrows.

"You coming with me?"

"I'm going to need a vacation to recover from this weekend," Harry grumbled playfully as he tossed the covers back and hurried to join her in the bathroom. At least she would accomplish one of her two goals.
Maddie's first two weeks at her job went by in a flash. It was great; hard work, long hours, but it was great. The staff was friendly, the children were fantastic and she felt like she had in essence returned to some of the work she had left in Bendal.

As Maddie fell into a routine, she and Harry evened out. On the nights that Maddie was on, they wouldn't see each other. She was working three back to back twelve hour shifts and her down time was hers—a stance he smartly decided not to challenge. Harry was busy as well; working and sometimes traveling for official functions.

When he was home and she was off, they would see each other and they relished those moments together; both if they were at home cooking dinner together or jetting off to night clubs with Harry's friends and Ella—dancing into the morning. They had become quite the circle.

And when Harry was gone, Maddie would occupy herself with a variety of interests. She helped Ella repaint her bedroom, shop for some new artwork and choose between two of the men she was thinking of pursuing. And Maddie knew exactly who to go to when she needed help preparing for an upcoming date with Harry.

"What do you know about polo?" Were the first words out of Maddie's mouth as she slid into a booth across from her friend at lunch one afternoon.

"Lots. Why?" Ella's smile pulled at her cheeks as she leaned closer to her friend. "Are you going to a polo match?"

"Harry is playing in a charity event in two weeks and he wants me to go. I watched a video on youtube about the rules, but I thought you could fill me on the other stuff."

"Oh God! I am so...unf... Polo players are unbelievably sexy—with their legs wrapped around the horses and their arms buff from swinging that stick and..." Ella coughed and sipped her water. "Sorry. Is it inappropriate for me to talk of your boyfriend that way?"

"Do you remember when we first met Harry and you scoffed at me calling him Harry? And now...you're going on about his toned arms and his muscular thighs...You've come so far."

"I said nothing about the thighs," Ella pointed out. "And if you want me to stop..."

"Oh no, continue." Maddie laughed at her best friend. "But seriously, when you say lots, do you mean more than just how sexy the players are?"

"Yes."

"Great! Think you can help me out? I'm American. We don't do polo. At least not where I'm from and I think it would behoove me to have a better understanding of it than say...how sexy my boyfriend's arms are."

"But they really are," Ella sighed dreamily. "Sorry. Serious. Yes. I can teach you the basics about polo."

"For real this time?" Maddie's eyes narrowed at her friend. "Not like when you explained the intricacies of rugby only so I would look like an absolute fool when I suggested that Harry..."

"For real this time," Ella laughed remembering that particular conversation. "Now. Let's start with the most important thing."

"You're going to tell me what to wear now, aren't you."

"I am going to tell you what to wear. Yes. See...you know me so well," the two women faded into laughter as the waitress came to their table to take their order.

Ella had done her job as Maddie's friend and had, thankfully, prepared her quite well for her first Polo Match. When Harry picked her up that crisp Saturday morning, she felt ready to go.

"You look beautiful," he scanned her before leaning in to kiss her.

"Thank you," she smiled warmly. Reaching for her sweater and clutch, she followed Harry out to the waiting car. "Hold on. They let you drive?" She saw one protection officer in the back seat, the two front seats open.

"Excuse me?" He laughed, opening her door.

"They let you drive? I...wow. I really didn't think they let you drive around London." Maddie slid into the car and he shut the door behind her; rounding to the other side. "Good Morning Jim."

"Good Morning Doctor Forrester."

"You're never going to drop the formalities are you?"

"Afraid not ma'am," he shook his head with a smile as Harry stepped into the car.

"Maybe you tell me your last name so I can call you...Mr. Jim instead of just Jim." She watched as he shook his head. "Fine." She turned her attention to Harry. "They let you drive?"

"Not all the time," he shook his head and pulled into traffic. "Occasionally I get to drive; when we're going to be out of traffic and on country roads. Today, I get to drive."

"Fantastic," Maddie smiled and settled into her seat. "Any chance you can talk Jim into calling me Maddie?"

"Ha!" Harry laughed at the thought. The people who worked with him were incredibly professional. "I doubt it. But I'll see what I can do."

Maddie grew more nervous as they pulled to a stop and stepped from the car. The day was warming and the sun was making a slight appearance. The grounds were beautiful; lush and green. And there were already a large amount of people there. Taking a deep breath, she took it all in. Tents full of well-dressed people sipping champagne and eating from passed trays. It was an immaculate scene she had never seen before. Harry pulled his bag from the trunk and took her hand; leading her over to a large tent.
Slipping inside, Harry made quick work of introducing her to the tent host and saying hello to a few people. William and Kate were there with their dog Lupo and a few friends. They were both happy to see them; welcoming Maddie to London and congratulating her on the new place. William ribbed Harry about the upcoming match and Harry muttered disparaging comments under his breath while Kate and Maddie laughed. It was incredibly clear that these two men were close to each other. For a moment Maddie was jealous; having never had that experience with a sibling—that bond that comes with knowing somebody your entire life.

"You okay?" Harry nudged her lightly as she looked out over the grounds.

"Yes," she breathed; pulling a smile. "Sorry. I'm fine. Just taking it all in." Maddie glanced towards the horse trailers. "You ride a thoroughbred?"

"Yes," the side of his mouth pulled up in a half smile. "You ride?"

"I had a Quarter Horse at home. She's old but she's beautiful. I've been riding since I was young."

"I would like to see that sometime."

"Maybe you will."

"Maybe," Harry's smirk shifted to a wide smile as he waved to the people approaching them. Maddie turned to see Kiki, Sean, and Bishop heading their way. Maddie's smile widened; she had just seen the three of them a few nights before when they were drunk and dancing at a rooftop bar. While Bishop remained a favorite, Kiki was lovely and incredibly kind to Maddie. She enjoyed spending time with her.

"Madeline!" Bishop was the first to bring her to him. "It's been ages!"

"Bishop, not long enough," Maddie rolled her eyes and kissed his cheeks before she turned to Kiki who embraced her. "I'm so glad to see people I know. Sean," he pulled her to him with a soft smile; quieter than usual. If Maddie had to guess, he was recovering from a hangover.

"Harry, can we take Maddie with us?" Kiki linked her arm through Maddie's with a warm, friendly smile. Harry raised his eyebrows at Maddie who nodded.

"I suppose," he eyed Bishop. "I have to go change and stretch and... This is her first match. You'll bring her back by the tent and introduce her and..."

"We'll take care of her," Bishop nodded with a wink to Maddie.

"I'm not sure I like the sound of that," Maddie joked.

"I'm not sure I do either," Harry narrowed his eyes at Bishop before leaning in to Maddie. "Stick with Kiki, she's been coming to these since she before she could walk. Don't let Bishop get you drinks and...if you need anything...the tent host knows who you are; she'll help you out." He pressed a kiss to her lips; oblivious to all the onlookers. "I'll see you when this is over."

"Good luck," she smiled and watched as he walked away from them. "So, the last time I saw you, the two of you were debating who would make the better...sorcerer?" She waved a hand between Sean and Bishop. "Did you ever settle that?"

"Oh God," Kiki groaned.
"As a matter of fact..." Sean spoke up.

"We've decided to battle it out," Bishop finished.

"Battle it out?" Maddie smiled as they began to walk along the grass.

"We're going to have a Sorcerer-off."

"Sorry, what in the world is a..."

"Sorcerer-off?" Bishop finished. "Glad you asked."

"Oh God..." Kiki groaned louder as Maddie began to laugh. This was going to be an interesting day, no doubt.

Kiki took Maddie under her wing; showing her around, introducing her to people Maddie was sure she was never going to remember. She pointed out the different players; the different guests. And, in a very loyal fashion, she stayed by her side. Maddie was incredibly grateful to her; thanking her more than once.

As the match was about to begin, Maddie had settled on a large blanket with Sean, Kiki, and Bishop who had just returned with a tray of drinks. They were just off to the side of the tent which still housed Kate and Lupo and her friends. Bishop sat down to the side of Maddie and nudged her.

"Here you are Doctor," he offered a glass of champagne.

"I don't know," she eyed him playfully. "Harry told me not to take drinks from you."

"Give me that," she glared, reaching for the glass. "Well played. You should have no problem out-sorcering Sean."

"Hey!" Sean mocked offense as he reached for a drink and pointed towards the field. "Ah! Here we go."

And when Maddie looked up, the riders were coming out on the field. Her eyes scanned the men looking for him and when she found him, her breath sucked into her lungs. Ella was right; those strong arms, the muscular thighs. "Oh holy hell..." Her hand flew to her mouth, embarrassed.

"What?" Bishop turned to her. "What was that?"

"Nothing. I just...Harry..." She shook her head and swallowed some champagne to calm herself. "I think he's the sexiest thing I've ever seen."

"Ew..." Bishop groaned as Kiki laughed.

"Sorry to offend your pretty little ears Bishop," Maddie nudged him with her foot. "But that man is...wow."
"Stop!" He swatted at her foot as the three of them laughed.

"With those boots and that whip..." Maddie's voice was low as she continued to torture him.

"Okay that's it," he stood up defiantly. "I'm going for more champagne. While I'm gone, you...control yourself!" And in a wave of laughter, Bishop turned towards the bar.

"Who's the sorcerer now?" Maddie raised her eyebrows and turned her attention to the field as the whistles blew and the playing began.

Bishop eventually returned, with more champagne and a running commentary that Maddie found not only amusing, but educational as well. She paid close attention to the action; watching as Harry scored a particularly difficult shot and rode the length of the field in great joy with his stick in the air. She clapped and laughed and made plans with Kiki for an upcoming lunch date with Ella and Penelope. And, as the game neared the five minute half-time, Bishop drained his glass, straightened his tie and turned to Maddie.

"Come with me?"

"Where?" She smiled nervously.

"To the tent," he nodded. "Peter's here with Autumn and the girls. Harry asked me to make sure you were introduced to the right people."

"Oh..." Maddie took a deep breath and smiled; Harry's cousin. "Sure." Bishop stood and held his hand out to her. She stood, smoothed down her skirt and nodded at him before they began over to the tent. She couldn't help but be impressed by the way Bishop went from slightly crazy party guy to the epitome of propriety and protocol in a second flat. Maybe it was something that came with growing up in this world. She wondered if she would ever develop that skill. "Hey Bishop?"

"Yes?" He leaned in slightly.

"Sorry, I'm new to all of this and I don't want to look foolish but, Harry's cousin, do I..." She rolled her eyes at the absurdity of the question.

"No," he answered with no judgment. "Peter doesn't hold a title. And, honestly, if he did I think he would prefer that you not. I think most of them are uncomfortable with it." He smiled to her then; friendly, encouraging. "You can relax Maddie. Peter and Autumn are amazing. They'll like you."

"Oh?"

"Absolutely," Bishop came to a stop and stepped aside; gesturing for her to step in first. "You're incredibly difficult not to like."

"Thank you," she smiled sweetly; appreciating the kind words from Harry's best friend. "You're difficult not to like too."
"Ha!" He laughed, leading her across the tent. "Don't get too carried away. We have another half to go and you're slacking on your champagne intake. We're never going to get you drunk enough to judge the Sorcerer-Off at this rate."

"Bishop!" Peter noticed the two of them heading in his direction and his face brightened. Already Maddie felt better.

"Peter! Good to see you," Bishop shook his hand; allowing him to pull him into a hug before he turned to Maddie. "Peter, this is Doctor Madeline Forrester."

"Maddie," she cut in apologetically as understanding washed over Peter's face with a wide grin.

"Yes, Maddie," Bishop winked at her. "And Maddie, this is Peter Phillips, Harry's cousin."

"Maddie," Peter repeated, reaching for her hand. "It's lovely to finally meet you. I've heard so much about you I was beginning to wonder if you weren't a figment of Harry's imagination."

"No, not quite," she smiled. "It's nice to meet you as well."

"You enjoying the match?"

"Oh yes," she nodded enthusiastically. "It's been a great day so far."

"Fantastic!" He smiled and glanced to where his wife was playing outside with their two children. "Do you have a minute? I would love to introduce you to the girls."

"Absolutely," Maddie smiled; feeling more and more at ease.

Bishop stayed off to the side, but close by as Maddie followed Peter outside the tent. Peter introduced her to Autumn, Savannah, and Isla and Maddie felt instantly in her element. Autumn was bubbly and funny; making Maddie feel relaxed.

And the girls. Maddie was drawn to the girls; giggling and clapping as they played in the grass and the adults talked. Savannah was enchanted by her necklace, which she promptly handed over to the young girl; watching as she eyed the sparkles that reflected from it. The Phillips' were so incredibly welcoming; asking Maddie about her time in Bendal, her work with children and, when Maddie wasn't watching—sending each other knowing looks. Harry was in deep, deep trouble with this one.

Bishop watched, making sure Maddie was fine; knowing Maddie was more than fine. And then he slipped away; returning to the blanket with the other two.

"You left her alone in there?" Kiki nodded towards the tent.

"Don't worry," Bishop shook his head. "She's got this."

The match was incredibly close and, as it neared the very end, everyone was drawn out of their tents. Peter with Savannah on his shoulders, Autumn with Isla in her arms. Even Lupo joined in on the excitement standing next to Kate and her friends. As Maddie stepped up to the line, she was joined by Bishop, Kiki and Sean.
"You left me," Maddie smiled at Bishop.

"In good hands," he smiled back. As the horses ran past them, their attention focused on the action.

She had to admit; watching a polo match had turned out to be more adrenaline producing than she had anticipated. And watching Harry ride in a polo match had done more to draw her to him than she would have ever imagined. Even after the match was over and he, along with his team, had been presented with the trophy, she still couldn't wait to have him back by her side.

So, when he finally made it over; sweaty and exhausted, it took all she had not to draw him into the tent and close the sides. A small round of applause made its way through the group as he and William stepped up to the tent where their friends and family now mingled—champagne flowing freely. Hugs and congratulations were passed around and then he moved to where she stood chatting with Autumn about when she first moved to London. Her eyes lit up as he approached.

"Ladies," he smiled, leaning to kiss Autumn's cheeks.

"Nicely done," she nodded towards the field.

"Thank you," he grinned and turned to Maddie. With something of a smirk on his face, he leaned down to kiss her; his hand at her cheek.

"Congratulations," Maddie blushed slightly as he pulled away.

"Enjoy your first match?" He raised his eyebrows accepting a bottle of water from a waiter. "Thank you."

"More than you know," she smiled as a wicked gleam caught in his eye.

"HARRY!!" The sound of Savannah's adorable voice reached them only seconds before she came running to him full speed; Peter right behind her with Isla in his arms. Harry bent to scoop her up; blowing kisses on her cheeks.

"My darling!" He cooed as she giggled. "Look at you! You've grown so tall and...look at this..." His eyes fell on the necklace he knew Maddie had been wearing. "Now, where did you find this? Was it in your dessert?"

"No!" The little girl giggled.

"Was it in a hole full of dirt?"

"No!"

"Well then wherever did you find it?"

"Maddie," Savannah explained, pointing to her before whispering to Harry. "She's very nice."

"Yes," Harry nodded meeting her eyes. "She is very nice."

"Okay love," Autumn stepped forward, pulling Savannah into her arms. "Let's leave Harry and very nice Maddie to their afternoon. We have naps to take."
"Boo!" Harry grumbled as the little girl left his arms. Autumn smacked his arm and took the necklace from Savannah.

"Tell Maddie thank you," she instructed her daughter as she returned Maddie's necklace.

"Thank you," she stretched her arms out to hug her. And Maddie, moved by the sentiment, hugged the little girl tight.

"You're very welcome precious." And then, with a round of hugs and nice-to-meet-you's, Peter and his family were off. Harry watched as they stepped away and then looked at Maddie with a wide smile. Lowering his voice, he stepped closer to her.

"You are so getting lucky tonight," he reached for her hand. Maddie laughed.

"I was just thinking the same thing about you." And then, as Bishop, Kiki and Sean moved to their side, she sighed. "But first. I have been invited to be a guest judge in the first ever Sorcerer-Off."

"Sorcerer-Off?" Harry chuckled. "You let Bishop bring you drinks didn't you? What did I tell you about that?" And then, with another kiss for Maddie, Harry slipped away to change before the five of them slipped off into the night.

The next morning, Maddie awoke next to Harry in his room. Amazingly, she had no headache left over from the night before. As she recalled the ridiculous way the night had unfolded, she couldn't help but laugh.

"What are you laughing at?" Harry grumbled from under his pillow next to her.

"Sean and the...Sorcerer-Off," as she said the words, her laughter increased. "I cannot believe he..."

"Oh believe it," Harry pulled the pillow from over his head and looked to her. "I have crazy friends."

"You have great friends," she sighed and leaned up on her side; resting her head in her palm as she looked at him. "I had a great time yesterday; from start to finish."

"I am happy to hear that," he leaned up to kiss her. "Did you ever decide on a winner?"

"No," she shook her head. "Penelope, Kiki and I decided that we needed to have a round two some other night."

"Give them another opportunity to make fools of themselves?"

"I mean, why stop now," she shrugged.

"Of course," he kissed her again. "Want me to call up for breakfast."

"Actually," Maddie smiled as she sat up all the way. "I need to be going."

"What? It's Sunday."
"Yes, well, I have a lunch meeting with a man named Gerald..."

"A man named Gerald?" Harry's eyebrow arched as he watched her leave his bed. "About what?"

"Actually, I wanted to talk to you about that; get your opinion on something," she moved to his side of the bed and sat down next to his legs. "Kelly at work gave me his number. I told her I was looking to volunteer some time and he works at Saint Joseph's in Veterans' Services..."

"You're going to volunteer in Veterans' Services at Saint Joe's?" Harry raised his eyebrows.

"I think so," she nodded. "I'm going to meet with Gerald today to talk about it. I only work three days and I am used to being much busier so...I thought I could spend two days running a group or two and seeing a small client load. I would work with soldiers who are having difficulties reintegrating, some PTSD issues and their families. I would have a small client load, but...I don't know. You once said that Bendal was like a war zone and I have all this experience in trauma work. I thought...why not."

"You..." Harry trailed off as he caught up with her; his emotions taking hold of him for a moment. "You're going to work with returning soldiers and their families."

"Yes," she watched him for a moment. "Is that...sorry. Is that okay with you? I know I'm an American and these are British soldiers, but I have this skill set and Gerald doesn't seem to think that will be a problem and..." And his lips were on hers.

"It's...it's more than okay with me." He kissed her again. "I think it's a wonderful thing for you to do."

"Good," she breathed.

"Though there is one small issue," Harry took a breath.

"What's that?"

"I'm going to have an even more difficult time letting you leave this bed." And with that, he pulled her down to him; his lips meeting hers as her laughter rang out.

In that moment a multitude of things were happening. Maddie was unknowingly stepping into a role that would follow her throughout the rest of her life; advocating for assistance for servicemen and women and their families. Harry was growing closer and closer to solidifying a decision he had subconsciously made long ago. And across the UK, people were opening up their computers, thumbing through their newspapers to read about the charity polo match and were getting a better glimpse of the mystery blonde woman who had enchanted the Prince.

The handful of photos of their date in Tetbury had eventually faded into the blogosphere and Maddie had all but forgotten them. But as readers and watchers scanned over the photos of the young blonde playing with the youngest generation of royalty, sitting on the sidelines with the inner circle and finally—receiving a kiss from 'The Spare', a whole new level of interest was beginning to bud.

Unbeknownst to them, their relationship was about to unfold to the nation, to the world and all either of them could do was hold on; to themselves, to each other, to the foundation they had worked to build before it all hit.
Maddie would never have been able to guess just how crazy her life would become over the next six weeks. It was the strangest sort of dichotomy. As Maddie's professional life settled, her personal life was tossed up into the wind.

She began volunteering at Saint Joseph's co-leading one group of returning soldiers, one group for families of deployed men and women, and she began seeing new individuals as the need arose. This, along with her continued work with the children provided her with the mental and intellectual stimulation that kept her mind lively and engaged.

Her personal life was an entirely different story. Harry was drawing her further into his life; closer to his family. And as Harry introduced her to the family, the press was slowly discovering who she was and introducing her to the world.

After the pictures from the polo made their debut, it was easy to see that the mystery blonde was not the supposed British actress, nor was she the return of Chelsy. But so far, that was all they knew. She was back to mystery blonde. Though Maddie knew that with every outing, with every meeting, they were all growing closer and closer to a time when the mystery would lift.

Maddie met Harry's cousin Eugenie and her boyfriend Jack at a concert. Maddie was nervous initially but when the four of them met up at Harry's before heading out, her nerves were instantly tamed. Eugenie was warm and funny and incredibly sweet. And Jack, having been in Maddie's shoes offered jokes and hilarious tales of the family—putting Maddie at ease.

After the concert, they stole away for drinks in the corner of a dark and crowded pub as tales of a royal childhood tossed back and forth across the table. And after they finally parted ways well into the next morning, Harry confirmed his suspicions. Eugenie and Jack loved her...and he had a picture message on his phone of them both offering two thumbs up to prove it. Maddie allowed him to take a similar picture of her to send back to them. She loved them too.

Though photos never emerged of this night out, at least none with Maddie in them, there was a series of tweets that went out telling of Harry's whereabouts and that he was indeed out with the Mystery Blonde who was very clearly not just a flash in the pan for the young prince.

More pictures emerged shortly after Maddie's second polo match where she met Harry's cousin Zara and her hilarious husband Mike. Zara was quick to agree with her brother's read on Harry's feelings for the young American who held genuine interest in hearing about Zara's Olympic experiences all while matching Mike's quick witted jabs; punch for punch. That night, when she and Harry had drinks with the Tindalls, Maddie felt a part of the group, completely comfortable in this new environment.

As the press was focusing in on her, the photographs from that day were clearer, her face more detailed.

Ella called the next morning with the good news;
"Your hair has improved significantly since the first photos."

And the bad news;

"If Harry doesn't learn to keep his hand off your ass, people are going to start to talk."

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

It was on a return trip to Highgrove House that the press gained their greatest advantage in the search for the mystery woman. Taking an extended weekend, Maddie and Harry had packed up with Harry's crew and Ella in tow and left the city. The trip was amazing; late mornings, later nights. They ate amazing food, drank fantastic wine and enjoyed the relative freedom from onlookers at the local pub fare.

It was in one of those pubs, when Maddie was overheard ordering a drink at the bar, that the hunt for her identity reached a turning point. A tweet went out, then a blog post and before the end of the extended weekend, the world knew.

The Mystery Blonde was an American.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Harry had made it a point for the two of them to spend more time with William and Kate; going for dinner at their place on more than one occasion. William continued to kid with Maddie while Kate continued to warm to her; finally allowing herself to cut loose and open up a little. They even spent a night at their place in Wales; Kate offering up some private childhood photos she had inherited of the brothers. Harry had watched with warm pride while his sister-in-law bonded with his girlfriend; knowing that it was important that the two women at least get along.

There were lots of moments from that weekend that Maddie would take with her; the sweet way William spoke to Kate, the way the two brothers held an infinite amount of love and devotion to the other, and of course, the way the three of them made her feel a part of their tiny circle.

But Maddie would never forget the moment her mother called her, a week after her trip to Wales, speaking the words Maddie never thought she would hear,

"Madeline," her voice was a whisper. "You're in this weeks' edition of People."

"What?" Maddie had stopped in her tracks; almost causing Ella to run into her as they were shopping.

"You are..." She could almost see her mother crouched low, watching for people that might overhear her—even though she was at home alone. "There is a picture of Kate Middleton walking her dog on the beach with...God, they are still calling you The Mystery Blonde...The headline says Who is this woman?" Her mother took a breath. "They know you're an American, but they haven't figured out your name."

"Does anyone there..." Maddie looked around before she spoke again. "Does anyone recognize me?"

"Not at all," her mother chuckled; knowing the family had already received strict instructions to remain quiet. "I saw it at the salon while I was getting a pedicure and nobody had a clue... You look great though Maddie; so much better than the last time I saw you."
"Well, the last time you saw me I had just been shot..."

"Which reminds me," her mother's voice returned to normal. "Tell Harry that if he doesn't watch where he puts his hands, I'm going to show him just how great of a shot I am."

"Will do mom," Maddie laughed at the image. "Will do."

It was right after Eugenie and Jack announced their engagement that Maddie had her first tiny freak out moment and finally insisted on some assistance understanding proper royal protocol and etiquette. Ella was fabulous and ready to lend her knowledge, but she wasn't an expert and Maddie had a suspicion that with an engagement party on the horizon, she would very soon be under the scrutiny of many, many people.

"What if I didn't know to curtsy to Anne?! " Maddie asked that night as they readied for bed. "What if I meet somebody and I'm not sure...You know it would help if I had a list of some kind."

"You do know that it's not something that anyone requires. It's not something that anyone expects. Even the Queen doesn't expect people to..."

"That's easy for you to say," Maddie cut him off. "Nobody is watching to see if you know proper Royal protocol. I can see the headlines know; Naïve Mystery American makes Royal Ass of herself."

"That's funny," he eyed her, not laughing at all. "You can't let the press decide how you're going to live your life..."

"And you don't get to tell me what I can care about. This is your family! Your career! This is...this is everything about you! And if I mess this up, it's about me not you. Now. Are you going to help me or not?"

"Sorry," he reached out for her hand. "Of course I'll help you. How about I set up a lunch with my Aunt Sophie? She would be a great person to talk to about protocol and the like. She's been in your shoes, she married into this non-sense." Maddie was too scattered at the moment to catch Harry's hint at his intentions—she was just grateful for the help.

"That would be wonderful," she sighed and climbed into his bed. "Now do I..."

"Yes," he rolled his eyes; pulling her to him. "Though she would prefer that you didn't, she would be somebody that you would curtsy to."

"Thank you," she nuzzled close to him then; relaxing considerably.

"Goodness," he chuckled. "I had no idea you were so passionate about this."

"I'm passionate about you."

"Aw..." His heart warmed.

"And if you don't fall in line, I'm going to start curtsying to you in public."
"You wouldn't."

"Try me." And he decided it was in his best interest to...not.

Lunch with Sophie was an unmitigated success. Maddie instantly likened to her. She was smart and funny and truly did understand what it was like to be walking along unnoticed one day and then the next day be all over the news. She hadn't grown up with the attention like Harry had so she could sympathize with Maddie. And she was more than happy to help. They talked about titles, curtsying, proper protocol and what it was like to be in the room with such a family. When the lunch was over, Maddie felt infinitely better about the watchful eyes that were only increasing.

"How was lunch?" Harry asked her that night over dinner.

"You know how all this time I've been calling you Your Highness?"

"Yes," his face twisted.

"I shouldn't have been doing that."

"That has been my point all..."

"I should have been calling you Your Royal Highness," she interrupted.

"I can see I'm going to regret introducing you to Sophie," though there was a hint of a smirk on his face with the knowledge that Sophie found Maddie incredibly endearing.

"Massively so, I would imagine." Maddie shrugged and kissed him. She felt so much better about walking under the watchful eye of the public. She could not control so many things about how this all unfolded, but she felt more in control of the way she conducted herself.

The press was curious, more than curious. There were pictures floating around blogs, on websites trying to discern her identity; but by and large they were from a great distance as the couple had managed to elude them for longer than Harry ever thought they would. As Maddie grew closer to Harry and his family, the paparazzi grew closer to discovery.

And then, one night, it all came crashing to a head.

It was two in the morning and they had been out all night with their regular group of friends celebrating Anna's new job. They had just finished their last of many rounds of drinks and the group was starting to disperse. As it was an off night for her, Maddie would be going home with Harry and she had already dropped her bag at his place. Seeing her yawn, Harry reached for her hand and gestured towards the door.

"Come on love, let's get you to a bed."

"Sounds like a line to me," Maddie joked, "but I'll take it." She followed him from their seats.

"We're right behind you," Kiki nudged Sean who obediently nodded and stood. They said their good-byes, wished Bishop luck with his self-appointed task of getting Anna home that night and headed towards the door. Harry was helping Maddie with her sweater when Kiki let out a gasp.
"Oh my God..." She pointed and the other three sets of eyes followed to where hers were already focused.

"What in the..." Maddie squinted; confused.

"The paparazzi," Sean groaned. Maddie could see the strain in Harry's jaw as he turned to look at her.

"Well, Doctor," he sighed in defeat. "I'm not sure you're going to be Mystery Blonde much longer. I think they've found us." Maddie's eyes grew wide as Harry turned to the Protection Officer who was with them. They spoke briefly before he got on a radio and called for another body man and the car.

"You mean they are here for..." Maddie trailed off, her finger pointing at her own chest. "Oh God."

"It'll be fine, I promise," Harry reached out to smooth her hair; tucking a strand behind her ear. "You going to be okay?"

"Yes?" She asked with a nervous laugh.

"Listen..." Sean stepped up. "Do you want us to..."

"No," Harry shook his head with a smile of gratitude. "I appreciate it, but you should go ahead and get out of here before it goes nuts."

"You sure?" Kiki looked from Harry to Maddie.

"Yeah, of course," Harry smiled as he leaned to hug her and then Sean.

"Good luck love," Sean leaned to kiss Maddie's cheeks and was followed by Kiki who did the same.

And then Maddie watched as they walked away.

"Harry?" She moved closer to him. People in the club were starting to notice the commotion outside and the cause for commotion and Maddie felt the urge to move closer to the protection he offered.

"Come with me," he took her hand and followed Jim, his PO, off to a corridor that would lead them outside; pressing closer to her as they were joined by the other member of the security team. With an apologetic smile to the two men, he turned his focus to her as he explained. "Okay Maddie, this is how this is going to go. Jim is going to head out first. Then I'll go so I take the brunt of the hit...with you right behind me. I will hold your hand the entire way. When you walk out the door, look first for the car, so you know where you're headed. The flashbulbs are going to be insane, so don't look directly at them or you'll be blind all night. Once we're in, Brad jumps in after you and the car takes off. Don't panic, hold onto me and we'll get you there. Okay?"

"Okay," she nodded slightly nervous.

"You ready to make a run for the back door yet?"

"No," she shook her head trying to remain calm and collected. "It will be fine, right?"
"It will be fine," he smiled reassuringly and leaned to kiss her.

"Ma'am," Jim cleared his throat. "I'm sorry but, your skirt..." He pointed down to where Maddie's skirt had bunched up, leaving her backside slightly exposed.

"Oh God!" Maddie quickly adjusted it with a nervous laugh. "Thank you Jim. Really..." She met his eyes. "Thank you very much."

"No problem ma'am." The car pulled up out front and Maddie took a deep breath.

"Ready?" Harry raised his eyebrows and held out his hand. With a nod, she placed her hand in his. Harry nodded to Jim who glanced at Brad and then, the door opened and Maddie's breath sucked in. The distance between the main corridor and the outside door was a small one and she could see the throngs of people and cameras that were waiting outside.

And then, as the door was pushed open, the cold air rushed in and the flashbulbs started. Just as he had told her she looked for the car and held tight to his hand.

And she stepped outside.

Never in her life would Maddie ever be able to explain just how surreal that moment was. Stepping out of the nightclub and into the sensory overload that awaited them. The clicks of the camera, the flashes of light; she was simultaneously amazed and confused at the plethora of photos that must have been taken in those ten feet from the door to the car.

Just as he had told her, she held onto his hand.

Just as he had told her, she looked straight ahead to the car.

And then, in a moment of surprise, she made one vital, amateur mistake. Just as Harry stepped into the car, just as she was about to follow she heard among the crowd somebody call out,

"Madeline!"

Without thinking, without blinking, without any thought to controlling her reflexes, Maddie turned towards the voice.

And as the flashes and clicks multiplied, the mystery was over. Somebody knew.

Just as quickly as she had been pulled off track, she snapped back on. She stepped into the car, slid right next to Harry. In a second Brad was next to her and they were in motion; leaving the photographers behind them. Taking a deep breath, Maddie blinked her eyes; her mind trying to process all that had just happened.

"You okay Maddie?" Harry's thumb stroked her hand in his. Maddie turned to look at him and laughed lightly.

"I can't see your face..." She blinked again.

"You're okay," he chuckled; pressing a kiss to her temple. "The flash will fade in a minute. Just hang on to me and you'll be fine."
"Okay," she sighed; leaning back against him. "Harry?"

"Hmmm?" His lips where pressed to her forehead.

"I think I made a mistake," she felt slightly shaky as she remembered.

"A mistake? If you're going to say you wanted to run for the back door, it's way too late for that." He joked but she wasn't laughing.

"Somebody said my name and I...I turned to look. Harry...they know who I am. I..." He could feel her hands tremble in his.

"Hey..." His voice was low, calm, reassuring. His hands clasped hers. "Look at me."

"I can't," she hated the way her voice teetered. "I just see this big white light."

"So they know who you are? Who cares? They were going to figure it out eventually. And clearly somebody did. All you did was confirm it. And that was going to happen sooner or later."

"Yeah?"

"Of course," he chuckled and pulled her to him. "Don't worry about it. Come on...don't worry about it." He kissed her lightly as she took a deep breath; calming. "Okay?"

"Okay..." She sighed and leaned back; slightly embarrassed at her moment of breakdown. "Okay."

Neither of them would ever know exactly how it was her name was discovered or who it was that discovered it but by the time they woke the next morning the whole world would know.

Prince Harry had fallen for the American born Doctor Madeline Forrester.
Chapter 39

Maddie had one day, twenty four hours, before it all came crashing down around her. The day after they discovered her name had been the calm before the storm. There were posts and articles but most of them contained merely the newly founded identifying info. The Mystery Blonde was a Psychologist from the United States by the name of Madeline Forrester. That was all they knew.

Over the next twenty-four hours they began to print more than what they knew; digging deep for a story, for a piece of gossip to attach to this no-longer mysterious blonde. And when the calm passed; the storm raged.

Maddie woke to blogs, tweets, even a newspaper article; all featuring her name and photo. Her mother had called; worried about her welfare. Managing to convince her mother that, despite the photos and the stories, she was doing just fine, Maddie pulled on her running clothes and shoes for the first time ever and headed outside; ready to sweat it out. And when she did, the now familiar click of the cameras from across the street sent her back inside. Closing the curtains, Maddie sank to her couch; her mind struggling to keep things in perspective. Her phone rang out and she answered it quickly.

"Ella..." She breathed; feeling the strangest of comforts knowing she was connected to her best friend.

"So," Ella took a breath. "They know."

"Apparently."

"You've been sleuthed."

"Yeah," Maddie sighed. "You want to come over and help me..."

"On my way."

"You're the best."

"Yeah, well..."

"I mean it."

"I know. I'll see you soon."

It took Ella less than twenty minutes before she was ringing Maddie to let her up.

"Wow. You didn't tell me I would need full hair and makeup for this meeting," Ella laughed as she stepped into Maddie's place. "You know there are cameras down the street."

"No! You're kidding!" Maddie's voice was dripping with sarcasm as she shut and locked her door.

"Okay, okay," Ella kicked off her shoes and sat on Maddie's couch. "What can I do for you?"

"Well..." Maddie came back into the room with two coffees. "I was wondering if you could be my filter."
"Your what now?"

"I can't read it all. I started and...it'll make me crazy. So I was thinking you could read it and pull out the important stuff; let me know how it looks."

"Okay..." Ella reached for the open laptop on the table and pulled it into her lap. She clicked and read; clicked and read, and clicked again before, five minutes later, she looked up to Maddie and sighed.

"Well?" Maddie bit her lip.

"You know I love you right?"

"Oh God."

"It's not that bad...." Ella was quick to comfort her. "It's not. It's just....well. They don't know much about you so they are running with what they know. Which is that you're an American and he's British Royalty. And the writers can't seem to get enough of all the possibilities that presents. You know the history of the US and the UK....and the headlines...it's just, you know the options are endless." Ella glanced at the computer. "For instance, here they are playing on the Declaration of Independence. Here, it's the Constitution...in order to form a more perfect union...that sort of thing. Oh!" Ella's lips pulled up in a smirk. "And one particularly trashy magazine makes an interesting yet smutty parallel to the Revolutionary War."

"A smutty parallel to the Revolutionary War? How do you even..."

"Something about 'The British are Coming' though...well, you know..." Ella snorted as she laughed at the line. Maddie glared. "Sorry. I can't help it. The British are...Harry's British. Okay, well you get the idea."

"Oh God," Maddie moaned as she sank into the chair opposite Ella and the couch.

"But, you know...the plus side is..."

"There's a plus side?" Maddie raised her eyebrows.

"Well, it's out now. You're not waiting for the other shoe to..." Ella's eyes caught another headline and went wide. "Oh..."

"Oh what?"

"Nothing," Ella shook her head.

"What?!" Maddie turned the computer towards her and read. "Wallis Simpson!? How can they...."

"She was an American, you're an American..."

"She was married and divorced. Twice! And that was in the Thirties! Haven't we moved on from this?!"

"Yes well..." Ella's half-hearted explanation was interrupted by Maddie's phone ringing.
"It's Harry," she smiled despite her stress and answered it. "Hello."

"Hi. I finished up with my meeting and I wanted to check on you."

"I'm...I'm okay. Ella's here," she smiled at her friend who had gone back to scanning everything. "Have you seen the stuff they are printing?"

"No, but I'm going to guess you have."

"The Declaration of Independence, really? You have to really want it to be able to...."

"You're going to make yourself crazy if you keep reading."

"The train's already left the station if you know what I mean."

"Hey," Ella called from the couch as she read the Wallis Simpson article. "Ask Harry if he would abdicate the throne for you!"

"I am not asking him that." Maddie rolled her eyes at her friend before speaking to Harry. "What do I do?"

"You turn off the computer. You stop reading," Harry took a breath. "And you tell Ella that I can't abdicate a throne that isn't mine."

"Stop reading?" Her voice was quiet.

"Stop reading. They don't know you Maddie. They will never know you. They are searching and grasping and nothing you read is going to make any difference in your life or in mine. You stop reading."

"You make it sound so simple."

"It is."

"Harry..." Maddie glanced down at the newspaper on her table as her eyes teared up defiantly.

"You know what, I'm coming over."

"You can't," she shook her head; wiping at her eyes frustratingly.

"Why not?"

"They're here. They are outside, across the street and down a block but they'll see you and..."

"And what?" He laughed. "They'll know that I'm seeing you? Know where you live? The cat is out of the bag with that one love."

"Wow...I guess you're right." She let her mind spin on that for a moment. "So this is it huh? Cameras wherever I go?"

"Makes you wish you were standing anywhere but next to me?"

"Makes me wish I was standing right next to you." Her love for him, her loyalty to him, surmounting any of the anxiety this was bringing in to her life. Harry took a breath; steadying his heart before he continued.

"I'm on my way. Are you free for lunch?"

"I am," she smiled her first real smile that day. "Though I think I owe Ella more than that."

"I'll take you both out. We can't let them dictate how this is going to work Maddie. They are going to write what they want to write rather we stay inside or not. I say we go out."

"Okay," Maddie let out a deep breath. "You're on your way?"

"I am," he smiled. "Madeline?"

"Hmmm?"

"I love you."

"You had better," she cracked a laugh.

So they went out. Harry was right after all. They couldn't stay inside, they couldn't hide and they most certainly couldn't alter their entire lives. So they went out.

That day it was for lunch with Ella. And over the next week they would continue to emerge; hands clasped and heads held high. Maddie stood on the sidelines with Harry's family at a polo match in Beaufort. She went shopping with Anna and Penelope. They stayed out late dancing with Bishop and Ella. And the paparazzi continued to document, continued to write

Their friends and family rallied around them. Maddie would be forever thankful for the way his family reached out to her in those first few hectic days; Sophie, Eugenie, Kate. They had been there, they knew. Maddie took a deep breath and watched as her life, her history was pulled out for the world to see.

Her schooling. Her resume. Her family. It was strange, sickening at times, how much access the world now had to everything about her. But at least people were starting to get a better picture of who she was—not just a blonde American.

And then the most wonderful thing started to happen.

People started to stand up for them. While their close circle remained mum; the palace declined comment, Maddie's family remained blissfully silent despite the inquiries, others began to speak out. Harry's friends moved into action; circling around them when they were out—looking out for Maddie while maintaining the code of silence. Maddie watched in awe as these people—these people who were wild and crazy and could party with the best of them—rose to their feet and stood tall in protecting Harry and by association her. They were loyal, they loved him. And not one of them was going to stand for anyone disparaging something that had brought one of them so much happiness. So they stood, they defended; Harry and Maddie.

It wasn't just their close friends, it was people who had met them along the way; people who had benefited from their strong characters and warm personalities; people who had no obligation to do so were offering up their support.

A mother of one of her clients was quoted by a newspaper columnist calling Maddie "professional, compassionate" and credited her with saving her child in their darkest of moments. "The doctor has been a blessing in our lives and we are forever thankful that she chose to be here in London; for whatever reason that might be."

And Maddie watched as Harry grew emotional when one of the men from the Walking With The Wounded expedition went on camera to offer his support. "For many, many years my government has asked me to arm myself and stand next to the Americans at war; to be injured with them, to die with them. Prince Harry was asked to do the same and he did and...I don't know. Is it really too much to ask that he wants to stand next to an American and love her? I just don't see how that can be any worse than what we've been asked to do. If he's happy, who am I to decide who he's happy with? You know?"

This was far from the last time the media would come at Maddie and the young couple. But this was also far from the last time that people would rise to their defense. Maddie only hoped that if she simply followed the directions he had given her the night they found out—look at where you're going and hold onto me—they would make it through together and intact.
Chapter 40

As the media attention leveled out and Maddie adjusted to this new normal, her relationship with Harry was rising to the challenges that were placed before them. Though some of the articles and attention most certainly could have driven them apart, it had in fact had the opposite effect. They had grown closer. Not once had Maddie thought of walking away from him, from all of it. And everyone around Harry noticed how serious this was to him; how important—his family, his friends and, to some extent, the media. And the media was out in droves the night they attended what would be their first true public appearance together—though they would not prove to be the biggest issue for the couple that night.

Harry's friend Leo had been working tirelessly for a year in preparation to open a posh club that would cater to London's elite and Harry's circle of friends would be out in full force to show their support. So that night Harry and Maddie dressed up, hopped into the car they were sharing with Ella and Bishop—who were on again; at least for the night—and joined in the celebrations.

As the car rounded the corner, Maddie could see the paparazzi already lined up outside; waiting for the arrival of any one of the numerous famous people that would be attending.

"You look beautiful," Harry whispered in her ear as she looked over her dress; checking for any revelations she didn't want to make. The car pulled to a stop out front.

"Thank you," she smiled. "You know, I would kill for a mint candy right now."

"Well, you are in luck," he reached into his pocket and placed a piece of candy in her palm. "No killing required."

"Look at that," Maddie grinned as she took it from him. "You're the best."

"There's more in my pocket if you need them," he patted his suit coat pocket.

"Oh I'm sure it wouldn't make headlines if I were to stick my hand in your pocket," Maddie laughed as he stepped from the car; flashbulbs clicking away.

"Shall we find out?" He winked and held out his hand. Ignoring calls for her and Harry, they went straight for the doors with Bishop and Ella right behind them.

They were quickly whisked inside and handed drinks as the party began. The club was beautiful and everyone seemed to be having a massively good time. Maddie laughed and danced and had the most spectacular mixed drink she had ever been handed. And when, later into the night when Leo was finally able to briefly join the group of friends stationed around a table towards the back, she was quick to tell him that.

"This is really amazing, Leo," she kissed his cheek. "Well done."

"Thank you," he sighed with an appreciative smile. "I can't believe the turn out," he took a drink from Bishop and relaxed slightly. "Oh! Harry. I wanted to tell you, Wally is around here somewhere."

"Wally? No shit?" Harry smiled as he explained to Maddie; his hand at her waist, "Wally went to school with us at Eton. I've known him forever, though he's been gone for a bit."
"He's been in Spain doing...I don't really even know what he's been doing," Leo laughed and glanced back at the mass of people still partying. "But if I seem him again, I'll send him over."

"Great," Harry nodded.

"Okay friends, back to work," Leo nodded to Anna and Penelope who were sitting at the table with Bishop and Sean; he hugged Kiki and Ella who stood next to Maddie and patted Harry on the back before he slipped away; back into the wonderful atmosphere he had created.

Maddie was laughing with Ella and Kiki; gently poking fun at Bishop's new haircut when the group was joined by their longtime friend.

"Wally!" Harry called out; reaching his hand out to the dark haired man that approached them; drink in hand.

"Wales!" He pulled Harry close; slapping his back in; his drink sloshing in his hand.

"How have you been?" Harry watched him with humor as he slapped hands with Bishop and Sean; leaning to kiss Kiki's cheeks.

"I've been good. I've been..." His eyes passed over Maddie and Ella; his eyes hazy with drunkenness. "Well, well, well...what do we have here?" Ella raised her eyebrows and bit her tongue; already sensing she wasn't going to like this guy.

"Ah yes," Harry smiled wide, his hand running along Maddie's back. "Maddie, this is Wally. Wally, this is Maddie and her friend Ella."

"Good to meet you," Maddie smiled as Wally took a long sip from his glass.

"Yeah..." He sighed; the drink teetering in his hand as he stayed focused on Harry. "I heard tell that you had brought something back with you from Bendal..." He laughed into his glass. "But I have to admit, I was shocked to find out it was an American."

"Excuse me?" Maddie shifted uncomfortably at the way he was looking at her, the tone of his voice. Harry's hand moved to her shoulder and tightened.

"Oh I heard the cute story floating around," Wally finished his drink and placed it on the table in front of Bishop before he crossed his arms and looked to Maddie. "Didn't recognize Prince Harry of Wales? That's quite a tale Ms. Forrester."

"It's Doctor Forrester," Maddie unflinchingly met his gaze; holding her ground as he took a step towards her.

"Of course it is."

"Hey," Harry's eyes hardened as he moved between him and Maddie, not entirely sure what was happening.

"Wally, man, what are you doing?" Bishop rose to stand next to Maddie.

"Trying to figure out what exactly is going on here," Wally's posture adjusted as he stepped up to Harry.
"What is going on here?" Harry moved to match his stance.

"A middle class farmer from the United States, Harry..." The disdain in his voice made Maddie want to slap him.

"That is enough," Harry's face was red as his hand met Wally's chest.

"It would serve you well to watch that hand," Wally glanced down at his chest.

"And it would serve you well to..." As Harry took a step forward; Sean moved to his feet and, along with Bishop, moved to separate the two of them.

"Whoa..." Bishop's eyes were wide.

"Okay, here we go," Sean patted Harry on the back as he nudged him back a step.

"Harry," Maddie's hand rested on his arm; his muscles straining underneath.

"If you have something to say to me Wally, spit it out!"

"You know what," Anna spoke up as she noticed a few watchful eyes. "Maybe this isn't the time and place for this."

"I would be more than happy to take this somewhere else," Wally was smug as he shrugged Bishop's hands from his shoulders.

"Yes. Why don't we," Harry's jaw was taut; his shoulders squared.

"Come on," Penelope stepped up, reaching for Wally's arm. "You don't want to do this here, not like this. Why don't you let me get you to a cab."

"Ah, I see how things are. You're all on board with this?" His eyes traveled around the group; the group who stood ready to intervene, not one of them sympathizing with his rant. "You're just going to let him..."

"Let him?" Harry took a step in his direction but Maddie held tight to his hand; wanting to avoid an altercation at all costs.

"Here," Bishop moved to help Penelope. "Come on man. This wouldn't end well for you. You're drunk and it's late...let's get you into a car."

Wally grumbled something incoherent as Penelope and Bishop maneuvered him away. And just as quickly as it had started, it had ended. As the group settled back into their seats, Harry turned to Maddie; his eyes searching hers.

"Hey..." His fingers ran along her face; smoothing her hair back. "You okay?"

"What? Of course," she managed a smile as her mind processed what had just transpired. She squeezed his hand. "I'm just going to...sorry...I just need a minute and..." She shook her head. "I'm going to go to the restroom. I'll be right back."

"Maddie," Ella moved to her.
"I'm fine," she smiled to her friend; purposefully avoiding her eyes. "I just need a minute. Okay?" She leaned to kiss Ella's cheek and then Harry's lips. "I'll be right back."

"Okay," he nodded and released her hand; taking a breath as she walked away from him and through the crowd. Meeting Ella's eyes, Harry took another breath and shook his head; his adrenaline still flowing through his veins.

"She'll be okay," Ella nudge him with her elbow. "She's taken on bigger assholes than that guy."

"Ha..." Harry's laugh had a bitter clip. "That doesn't make me feel any better."

Maddie hurried down the long hallway towards the relatively private confines of the bathroom. Passing through the lounge area to the stalls, she stepped inside and locked the door behind her; her breath coming out of her lungs in a long, staggered sigh.

Back in the club Ella ordered Harry another drink; forcing it into his hand while neither of their eyes left the hall through which Maddie had just disappeared.

And out on the street, Penelope and Bishop were pushing Wally into a cab while he put up little objection.

"You should watch her Bishop," Wally patted Bishop's arm as he slumped into the backseat of the cab.

"And you should watch yourself Wally," Bishop leaned close; slapping his cheek lightly. "Someday, you're going to be bowing to that woman." Bishop paid the driver, gave him an address and then, with a knowing look from Penelope, he escorted her back inside. He had known Harry almost his entire life and having watched the two of them together, he knew without a doubt, Maddie wasn't somebody who was going to fade into Harry's history—as long as Harry had something to say about it.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

Taking a deep breath, Maddie composed herself before she stepped out of the stall. She wasn't upset, she was angry. She was confused. She was taken off guard by Harry's friend. And now she was trying to let it all go. Stepping out of the stall, she moved into the small lounge area, washing her hands and checking the mirror quickly before turning to leave and then she saw her walk in the door.

Chelsy Davy.

"Wow..." Maddie let out a breath. This night just kept coming at her.

"Hi," Chelsy smiled sweetly; a slight hesitation as she waved her hand. "This is odd, right?" She was breaking the ice; putting it out in the open.

"Meeting you in the bathroom? Yes," Maddie chuckled. "Though right on par with my evening."

"Sorry, I shouldn't assume..." Chelsy moved, stretching her hand out. "I'm Chelsy Davy."

"Yes," Maddie smiled. "I'm..."

"Doctor Forrester," Chelsy nodded; shaking her hand.
"Maddie, please." She let out a breath. "It's good to meet you. I've heard wonderful things about you."

"As I have about you," Chelsy smiled. "I've been looking forward to meeting you. Though I would imagine this is one of the very few times we will be see each other."

"What makes you say that?"

"The comparisons, the media..." Chelsy rolled her eyes. "Harry loves you. He'll do all he can not to fuel that particular fire."

"Ah yes," Maddie nodded. She was right—she could only imagine the headlines.

"Listen, I may be overstepping my bounds, but..." Chelsy moved closer to Maddie. "Can I give you some advice?"

"About Harry?"

"No, not about Harry," she laughed. "You don't need advice on Harry. About...everything else."

"Sure."

"Don't let it get to you. I know, I know...easy thing to do right?" They shared a laugh. "But really. You seem to be doing so well, you seem to be handling it fantastically well. Just...rely on those who were closest to you before it all hit and stay true to yourself. It's clear that he adores you—and it's clear that you have your head on straight. So just...don't let it get to you and you'll be fine."

"Thank you," Maddie smiled grateful for the words of encouragement. "I mean it. That's very sweet of you to say, thank you."

"You're welcome," Chelsy smiled and took a step towards the door. "Oh. And don't pay any attention to what Wally said. He's an ass who has always been jealous of Harry. He just...he wants what he sees in Harry's eyes and...and nobody pays attention to him anyway."

"Ha!" Maddie laughed. "Good to know. Thank you."

"Of course. It was good to meet you Maddie. You look great standing next to him. And he looks...happy."

It was funny to Maddie that these words were the first that night to bring tears to her eyes. With a nod and smile, Chelsy slipped from the bathroom. Meeting her reflection in the mirror for a moment of composure, Maddie took a breath and returned to the party.

"Hey," she nudged Ella who turned worried eyes to her. "I'm fine. I promise," with a genuine smile, Maddie looked around. "Where's Harry?"

"He needed some air," Ella pointed towards the deck out back. "And I'm guessing he could probably use a little reassurance that you haven't gone around the bend."

"Well, let's not get carried away," Maddie winked. Patting Bishop's shoulder as she passed, she made her way to where Harry was leaning against the railing; looking out over the city.
"Your royal highness," she smirked as she nudged him with her hip.

"Doctor," he chuckled; moving to wrap his arm over her shoulders.

"I think I'm going to reach into your pocket for some candy now," she pressed a kiss to his jawline.

"Knock yourself out," he hugged her shoulders tightly; pressing a kiss to the side of her head.

"Hmmm..." Maddie smiled as she unwrapped a piece and took a bite. "You okay?"

"Yeah..." He sighed. "Listen, Maddie, I'm so sorry."

"For?" She lifted her eyebrows.

"For all of it. For Wally acting like a prick, for the press outside your place, for the fact that you can't leave the curtains in your front windows open for any long amount of time."

"You don't need to apologize for any of that."

"It's a lot."

"It's not a lot."

"Well, it's not a little."

"No...it's not that either."

A moment of silence settled over them as they looked out across the night sky. Maddie's voice was low as she spoke first,

"You know...I expected to hear all of those things..."

"Hey..." He shook his head.

"No really. I did. I knew all along that eventually somebody would have issue with me being an American, with the unlikely story that I really didn't recognize you, that I'm the daughter of a middle class farmer..."

"Maddie..." He interrupted her; his heart hurting at the words she was repeating.

"I just didn't expect it to come from one of your friends. That's all. It threw me for a moment."

"He's not my friend Maddie."

"Don't say that. He's just looking out for you."

"No, he's not. He's...I don't know what he is. But any friend of mine would know that this is the happiest I've been in...forever. They would know that and they wouldn't care if you were an American, if you were middle class. Hell, they really wouldn't even care if you DID recognize me. Because who cares? That's what a friend would say. Not what he said to you." Maddie nodded and swallowed the lump in her throat.
"Do other people feel that way? Your family or..."

"No," he cut her off; turning to face her. "Look at me. I'm telling the truth. Nobody feels that way." Her eyes met his and she believed him; honest even if it hurt. She nodded and sighed; a bubble of a laugh escaping her lips.

"What does it say about me that it was easier to walk into a community surrounded by violent militants than to walk into a party filled with the aristocratic elite?"

"Nothing," he laughed. "It says nothing. Except that maybe you're even better suited for me than I had previously thought. Which I suppose is saying a lot."

"It gets easier?"

"It does." He kissed her forehead. "And in the meantime, you can take all of your frustrations out on me."

"Oh?" She grinned; stepping into his welcoming embrace. "What did you have in mind?"

"Nothing I can say with out loud in public," he laughed moments before his lips met hers; soft and firm. Sighing, Maddie leaned into him; letting him kiss her there on the deck—despite the fact that there could very well be cameras capturing every second of their private moment. The cameras, the Wallys; Maddie wasn't going to let any of it come between her and Harry and this. This feeling that he sent through her; from her hair to her toes.
Chapter 41

The night of Eugenie and Jack's engagement party was full of significant moments for Maddie and Harry; from start to finish. The event was black tie which, after seeing Harry in his tux, Maddie was infinitely thankful for. And when Harry saw her dressed and done up, he honestly debated the ramifications of missing his cousin's party. With promises of revisiting the images in his head, Maddie convinced him it was in both of their best interests to remain clothed and attend the party.

It was also a private event which meant two things. First, once they were inside the private estate, there would be no press, no cameras. Second, it meant that Harry's entire family would be in attendance. Having met most of them, Maddie felt considerably more at ease than she had before. And when Harry told her that after the "adults" left many of their friends would be joining the all night extravaganza, Maddie relaxed even further.

Even though it was a private party at a private residence, the press was still lined up outside; ready to snap pictures of the royal family as they made the short walk from the car through the arched gate that was the entry to the party. As per usual, when Harry stepped from their car and took her hand, pulling it through his arm, the cameras went crazy. But Maddie didn't care. It was a night of celebration and they weren't going to be able to chase the smile from her face. So she held tight to Harry and watched where she was headed and the glaring white light in her vision only lasted for a brief moment. It wasn't until the next day when Ella saw the pictures that Maddie would learn of the significance of Harry arriving at such a high profile family event with Maddie already on his arm; the level of seriousness it implied.

Once inside, Maddie was in awe. It was amazing. The home was grand, immaculate; with a large pool out back and a deck built with entertaining the masses in mind. The gardens were well manicured and expansive. They had set up a large tent complete with floors, lighting and overhead fans to help with the heat. And inside the tent was no less than impressive. Maddie was certain she had never been to a party that was quite this caliber. She glanced at the house, the mansion, and wondered which of the multitude of rooms she would be staying in and if they had put her and Harry in separate rooms for the night. Though Maddie had initially been unsure about staying, after Eugenie insisted that all of their friends were staying, she gave in. This amazing property would be their playground for the next twenty four hours.

As they walked along the candlelight path to the tent, champagne was handed to them by well-dressed waiters and waitresses. Harry held tight to her hand as he passed her one before taking one for himself.

"To Eugenie," he held his glass to hers.

"To Jack," Maddie countered; clinking her glass to his before drinking.

"Did I tell you how beautiful you look tonight?"

"You did," Maddie nodded as they continued on. "Right about the time you were trying to convince me to lose the dress."

"Well, it wasn't because I didn't like the dress."

"Fair enough," Maddie laughed.
"Think it would be entirely inappropriate for me to pull you off the path for a quick..."

"Entirely, yes," she nodded and then, tugging him to her lips, she gave into impropriety for a moment.

"That's lovely," Harry sighed when she stepped away from him. He reached out to wipe at a bit of smudged lipstick with his thumb.

"Thank you," she turned her head so she could kiss his hand before it left her face to pick her hand back up.

As they neared the tent, they could hear the band playing lively, fun music and the atmosphere was complete. It was going to be a glorious night full of family and fun and wild celebrations that Maddie had only heard tale of. And now there she was, right in the middle of it all.

When they stepped into the tent, they were instantly greeted by family members. Autumn and Peter were already there, without the girls for the weekend, Kate and William were seated with Harry's father and Camilla. Stopping to greet them first, Kate hugged her close and complimented her on her dress and Charles asked her if she had seen the gardens on the way to the tent.

As Harry guided Maddie to where they would be seated with Autumn and Peter and Zara and Mike, he lowered his voice and told her,

"One of the benefits of being with me instead of William is that you are never sat at the big kids table...it's always the party table with me."

"I'm sure that's not the only benefit," Maddie winked at him and smiled wide as they approached their table. Their four tablemates were already there—drinks flowing. They rose to hug Maddie and Harry and were quick to pass more champagne to the two of them. And the pre-party began. Beatrice and her boyfriend Dave made a beeline for the table; having been dying to meet Maddie. As they fussed and fawned over this new side of Harry, Beatrice pulled her parents over to the table, pointing out Harry's new girlfriend. Maddie smiled and dazzled and sat down in quite a haze. No matter how comfortable she had grown with Harry, meeting a new member of his family always caused her to pause, breathe and take it all in.

Maddie knew the instant Harry's grandparents entered; the room hushed and rose to their feet. Yes, it was mostly family but she was still the Queen and there wasn't a person in the room who thought twice about standing. As she and Prince Phillip joined Charles and Camilla and William and Kate, the room eased up and the party began.

Feeling bold, Mike had ordered a round of shots and though Maddie initially protested, Harry threw out a dare and she gave in; hating that she did.

"All in good fun," she muttered as she took the shot. As she followed the shot up with some water, she missed the look between Harry and Peter just before Harry turned to her and leaned close.

"I have something very important to ask you."

"After you gave me a shot of tequila?" Maddie raised her eyebrows. "I can't wait." The smirk on his face faltered as he took a breath.

"How do you feel about meeting my grandmother tonight?" Maddie's eyes grew wide; her face flushing.

"When you say grandmother, you really mean..."

"The Queen, yes."

"But I just took a shot!" She waved at the empty glass as evidence.

"You wouldn't be the first person in the world to do that," he laughed.

"Harry!"

"It's okay," he held his hands up. "If you're not ready, it's fine. Don't worry. I'm going to go with Autumn and Peter to say hello and then I'll be back."

"Are you sure?" She watched as he rose to his feet and gestured to Peter and Autumn.

"Of course," he bent to kiss her. "Hang out with Mike for a few minutes and I'll be back." Maddie nodded and watched as he moved away from her before she turned back to Mike and Zara who were watching her with matching grins.

"You know you're going to have to meet her sometime," Mike nudged her lightly.

"You think so?" Maddie bit her lip.

"Ha! Yes, I think so," he laughed at her. And before she had time to mount a defense, Harry was back at her side.

"That was quick. How did it go?" She smiled up at him; glancing to Autumn and Peter who followed right behind him.

"Great," Harry clapped his hands together and handed her a glass of champagne he had acquired on his way back. "Here, try this."

"Thank you," she took a sip. "This is really marvelous."

"It is," he nodded and took a deep breath. "Okay, listen, what I'm about to say is going to freak you out a bit, but..." He held out his hand. "She wants to meet you."

"Who wants to...NO..." Her eyes went wide as Mike laughed out loud. "I think I'm going to vomit."

"You're going to be fine," Harry shook his head with a grin. "It will be quick and easy. Andrew is going to be making a toast soon anyway."

"Here, take this," Peter offered another shot. But Maddie brushed it away with a glare.

"I can't really refuse the Queen can I?" She looked from Harry to Zara who shook her head.

"Not really," Autumn smiled sympathetically and offered her gum.

"Thank you," Maddie took it and smacked Harry's arm; eyes narrowed. "It would be really great if I hadn't already been drinking."
"Here, look at me," Harry pulled his chair close to hers and sat down facing her. "Take a breath. This is just my grandma. She's heard about you from my father and Anne and Eugenie. She knows you're responsible for the smile on my face and now she just wants to meet you. My granny. Come on, Doctor. You've got this."

"But if I mess this up, I'll never get to..." Maddie trailed off as she caught herself. Harry grinned wide.

"Well, we're going to revisit the end of that sentence in a bit, we have to do this first." He held out his hand. Maddie nodded and took it.

"What if I don't curtsy correctly and..." She stood and followed behind him.

"She doesn't care if you curtsy to her..."

"You always curtsy to the Queen!" She spoke through a clenched jaw and he knew she was freaking out just a bit.

"Okay," he smiled and pulled her off to the side and into his arms; holding her tightly to him, he whispered in her ear. "Listen to me. Close your eyes and listen to me..." Her eyes fluttered closed and she tuned to his voice; his breath on her cheek, the way his hands held her flush to him. "You are a strong, amazing woman. You are the daughter of amazing parents. A father who would stand tall with pride next to you. A mother who bragged endlessly about your brilliance and devotion. You were the first in your family to go to college and you went all the way to the top. You've traveled to the poorest corners of the world to save children. Maddie, you are amazing. You are smart and kind and you use your powers for good. And right now, Prince Harry of Wales is so madly in love with you that, if you asked him, he would follow you to the ends of the earth. Nobody can touch you. Nobody. Now...open your eyes." She did as he instructed. "Take a breath." Though she would never know how—she did. "Give me your gum and let's go." Maddie put her gum in the napkin in his hand and nodded; her heart overflowing at his pep talk—at his words.

Holding her hand in both of his, he turned her in the right direction and took ten steps and then with a wide smile and pride that could be seen across the room, he took their relationship forward to a whole new level,

"Granny, Grandpa, I would like you to meet Doctor Madeline Forrester. Maddie, this is my grandmother and grandfather...."

"Your Majesty," Maddie's knees held out as she dipped. "Your Royal Highness."

And the night had only just begun.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

For the rest of her life, Maddie would remember the night she met The Queen, Harry's grandmother. She would remember how sweet she was, how lovely; how the anxiety Maddie had built up was without reason. She would tell the story over and over; at least ten times before the sun rose. But the most amazing part of the story, the part she never told anyone else, was that meeting The Queen—as monumental and amazing as it was—was nowhere near the most memorable moment of that night.

From the second Maddie stepped away from The Queen and Prince Phillip, she had moved into this permanent state of elation; she was giddy. Not only had she curtsied correctly, she had held a conversation—albeit two minutes long—with one of the most respected and revered women of the last two centuries. She had even managed to make Harry's grandfather laugh and nudge Harry in the ribs teasingly. And, as Eugenie's father made his way to the stage for a toast, The Queen had smiled and said, "It was lovely to finally meet you Madeline." And then Maddie allowed Harry to escort her back to her table. And it was a good thing she had his arm to hold onto otherwise she might have just floated away.

"So?" Mike arched his eyebrows as Harry and Maddie rejoined the table.

"How did it go?" Autumn smiled warmly; knowing enough to know it had gone well. Maddie looked to Harry who deferred to her.

"Oh it went so well," Maddie sighed with a wide grin.

"There you go," Peter nodded in her direction.

"Yea!" Autumn clapped her hands quietly as the rest of the table smiled and nodded.

"And you were so worried," Mike nudged her playfully.

"Who me?" Maddie rolled her eyes jokingly.

"So, we can have these shots now?" Mike waved his hand at the table.

"Oh God yes," Maddie nodded; a rumble of laughter rounding the table.

"To Eugenie," Zara raised hers.

"To Eugenie," they echoed. And down they went. When Maddie turned to look at Harry, his eyes were already fixed on her and when she smiled, he winked in a way that was a little wicked, a tad naughty and somewhere inside, Maddie just knew that this night was going to be a party the likes of which she had never seen.

Eugenie's father Andrew took the stage then, bringing all conversation to a halt. He was charming and well with words and told tales of his daughter growing up, meeting Jack, and how proud he was to be able to welcome such a wonderful young man into the family. There were hugs and applause and quite a few happy tears. Harry held her hand as they watched; pressing a kiss to the top of it when he thought nobody was looking.

And the festivities continued. There was dinner, toasts and an overall merriment. And when the band kicked up and the dancing began, Harry rose to his feet, buttoned his coat and offered his hand. Closing her eyes and leaning against him, Maddie sighed happily. She felt so...free.

Maybe it was the high from meeting The Queen. Maybe it was the champagne and shots. Maybe this was what happened when you were doing exactly what you were meant to be doing in life. She didn't know, but she loved it. As she looked at the crowd, Maddie could see the same sort of serene smile reflected on the faces of everyone else. Maybe it was just a magical sort of night.

Eventually the party-goers began to filter out. The Queen and Prince Phillip left and the atmosphere relaxed slightly. They spent time talking with Charles and Camilla before they too departed; the first of the parents to leave. While Harry caught up with William, Maddie chatted with Kate about their upcoming trip and then the two of them retired to the house; Kate not feeling
As Eugenie and Jack's friends began to arrive, the party moved locations. The more formal, family event gave way to a more raucous occasion by the pool. Harry carried a bottle of champagne as he led Maddie down the path to the expansive veranda/pool area. There was a DJ spinning lively dance music. There were stations set up throughout with drinks and food and Maddie could see that this particular group of people had no intention of retiring anytime soon. Acquiring two glasses as he passed a station, Harry and Maddie moved to a small table and he poured more bubbly—which she happily drank. Beatrice and David joined them; curious about this woman whom they had heard so much about. They danced and they laughed as they watched the crowd. By the time Bishop showed up with Sean and Kiki, the second phase of the party was well underway.

"Well, well, well...what do we have here?" Bishop's voice was low as he stepped up to the table. Harry rose to hug his friends; with Maddie right behind him.

"Bishop!" She exclaimed; tossing her arms around his neck. "Bishop I met the Queen!"

"Like this?" He smiled as he hugged her back; his eyes meeting Harry's; impressed and not the least bit surprised by this news. "I am sorry I missed that."

"Well, not quite like this," she laughed and turned to greet Kiki and Sean. The group settled at the table as Bishop unloaded a tray of drinks he apprehended along the way.

"Well," Bishop took a long drink. "When are we getting in the pool?"

"Don't know," Harry shook his head and nodded towards his newly engaged cousin. "She's been eyeing the water though, so I think it'll be soon."

"Sorry, we're going swimming?" Maddie raised her eyebrows.

"The adults are gone," Bishop explained. "Everyone is well pissed...I think moving the party into the pool comes naturally don't you?"

"It's something of a tradition," Harry added.

"An insane tradition," Kiki rolled her eyes. "A bunch of drunk people swimming around in their black tied finest? Excellent idea."

"Well I didn't see you putting up a fuss at Anna's birthday party last year," Harry raised his eyebrows and the rest of them laughed as they remembered that particular evening.

"I didn't say I didn't participate...just that it was an insane way to finish out the night."

"Hold on," Maddie held up her hand. "You end all of your parties by jumping into the pool fully clothed?"

"Mmm Hmm," Bishop nodded. "There are games and competitions. Everything's better in the water."

"Except for Bishop," Sean laughed.

"I can't believe I've never heard of this before..." Maddie shook her head.
"Well, there are some things that the public doesn't get to be a part of." Harry nodded out towards the crowd. "There's no press, no outsiders..."

"But I'm here," she pointed out and Harry chuckled.

"You're not exactly an outsider, love," Bishop winked at her.

"No? I've just met some of these people tonight." Bishop shrugged and continued.

"You cannot be an outsider if you're sleeping with Prince Harry."

"Hey!" Harry shook his head.

"Do you have to be so crass?" Kiki smacked his arm.

"Sorry," Bishop actually looked embarrassed as he turned to Maddie. "My apologies, I simply meant..."

"It's okay," she patted his hand and smiled smugly. "Though we actually don't get much sleep—if you know what I mean." Harry nearly choked on his drink.

"OH!" Bishop called out with a loud laugh; clapping his hands together.

"I don't know, Harry," Sean warned. "She gets along much too well with Bishop."

"I think so," Harry laughed and took a drink just as Jack and Eugenie walked towards them. Eugenie grinned wide as she sat her drink on their table, pulled off her shoes and then with a wink to her cousin, she turned and ran, hand-in-hand with Jack before they jumped straight into the pool.

And the crowd erupted; hoots and howls, applause and laughter.

"Finally!" Bishop drained another drink and shrugged out of his jacket. "Wales, Doctor," and with a laugh, he was off—following the exodus of people towards the pool. Maddie looked over to Harry and raised her eyebrows.

"Care to join me in the water?" Harry held his hand out to her. Maddie kicked her shoes from her feet and took his hand. With a wide smile she nodded and they were out of their chairs. Maddie could hear laughter and applause as they joined the party in the water.

The water was warm, inviting and the liveliness in the pool was intoxicating. There was laughing and splashing and a carefree ease that was addicting. The music played on, the drinking continued and as Harry reached out to take hold of her, Maddie felt the last bit of anxiety she had about being in Harry's inner-circle slip away from her.

"You okay?" He smiled; his hands wrapping around her waist.

"Oh my God!" Maddie laughed as she bobbed in the water; pulling at her skirt. "It's so much more difficult to swim in a dress than I thought it would be!"

"It's okay....I got you, I got you," Harry laughed and held onto her as they treaded water. "You could always take the dress off...if that would help."
"Oh you would like that wouldn't you?" She laughed.

"Na," he shook his head. "There are way too many people here for that."

"Harry?" She held on his shoulders as he moved them closer to the edge of the pool; away from the splash-fest that was beginning.

"Yes love?"

"I'm a little drunk."

"A little?" He chuckled; smoothing a hair away from her forehead.

"I blame you."

"Sounds fair." As they reached the edge, he moved them so that Maddie's back was against the side of the pool. Maddie moved her hands up over her head to hang onto the ledge. Harry placed his on each side of hers.

"Hi," she grinned up at him as they dipped up and down in the water.

"Hi," he grinned back.

"Promise me something?" She lifted her eyebrows.

"Anything." He answered without blinking.

"Anything?"

"Yes."

"What if it's something crazy?" Her face twisted up. "I mean...you shouldn't just go around agreeing to anything."

"Didn't you hear me earlier?" He moved closer to her; his face inches from hers. "Massively in love with you...ends of the Earth."

"Ends of the Earth?" She whispered.

"Mmmm." His eyes danced like the water. And there in their little corner of the pool she felt like they were alone; in their own private, heated, weighty banter.

"You really shouldn't talk to a lady like that, you know," Maddie was smirking. "It's dangerous."

"Dangerous?"

"She might start to think that you have...intentions." She arched one eyebrow and Harry's face flashed serious for the briefest of moments before his grin returned.

"Well, maybe I do." His voice was strong, sturdy; his eyes trained on hers and for a split second, her heart stalled.

"Maybe..." Maddie breathed before she cracked, allowing laughter to break the tension, she shrugged. "Or maybe you're just as drunk as I am."

Harry laughed and leaned in to kiss her. His lips were warm and wet and Maddie was thankful they had found the ledge to hold onto.

"Actually..." He began.

"Harry!" Beatrice called out. "Harry! Come on! Genie wants to do our synchronized swimming routine from when we were kids!"

"Synchronized swimming routine?" Maddie giggled.

"Ah come on!" Harry turned to his cousins. "Haven't we made big enough fools of ourselves?!"

"Peter's going to do it too!" Eugenie yelled back. "And it's my night! So you have to!"

"Fine!" He yelled and groaned to Maddie; placing a peck to her lips. "You should come and watch this...I promise it'll be memorable." He kissed her one more time and let go of the side of the pool; pushing back from the wall and swimming backwards away from her a bit. "I meant what I said. Ends of the Earth, Madeline. Ends of the Earth."

She watched as he turned away from her then; laughing as he swam to where his cousins were assembling; drunk and happy and full of celebration. Maddie took a deep breath and moved closer. In her entire life, she never would have imagined the way this night had unfolded before her. She had met The Queen. She had jumped fully clothed into a pool with an entire generation of the British Royal Family and now she was getting ready to watch them perform a synchronized swimming routine from their childhood. It was surreal. And far from over.

And of course, as she situated next to Bishop on the stairs in the pool—taking the glass of champagne he offered—she watched as Harry lined up, already taking direction from the guest of honor. He caught her watching and, with a wink, made her heart skip. Eugenie nodded to the DJ who changed over to a new song and the show began; laughter and applause exploding throughout the water.

Intentions? Maddie shook her head. It was much too soon to be obsessing over Harry's alleged intentions. Wasn't it? Focusing on the entertainment, she forced her mind away from that place where she had heard what Harry had just said to her, from that place where all she could do was analyze what Harry had just said to her and she took a breath and a drink and tossed her head back in laughter. There would be other times for that. This night was about celebrating; drinking, laughing and celebrating.

Besides, just that night, she had met The Queen. Her smile widened so much that her cheeks hurt. Ella was never going to believe this.
If Maddie's weekend had been the ultimate high of the week, Monday was the ultimate low. When she woke that morning, she was chipper and smiling...still reeling from the party and all that had transpired; still laughing from the image of Harry trying to perform with his cousins, still sighing from his words.

She was at the hospital that day and her morning began with her usual rounds; checking on the patients who had been admitted over the weekend; reading over notes, visiting rooms. The morning flew by and, after a quick lunch, she would be heading down to the clinic to see a few out-patients all while remaining on call for the Emergency Room. As she pulled her lunch from the fridge, she glanced out the window; it was a nice day and she was going to eat outside. On her way through the hallways, her phone rang in her pocket. Pulling it out, she grinned.

"Ella my darling, couldn't wait till after work to talk to me?"

"Listen, Madeline, we need to talk."

"Whoa..." Maddie exhaled. "You sound serious."

"Where are you?"

"At work."

"No, like...where? Are you in public or private?"

"A hallway, Ella," Maddie smiled as a coworker walked past her. "What's happening?"

"I think you should sit down somewhere."

"Just tell me."

"Or find an office or..."

"God Damn it Ella, stop playing coy and..." Maddie groaned as her phone beeped. "That's weird. Harry's supposed to be in a meeting..."

"Is he on the other line?" Ella asked.

"He...he was. He went to voicemail. Ella, would you please just..."

"Is there any chance you let somebody take nude photos of you?" Ella spoke quickly and quietly.

"There is a gossip website that says that they have nude photos of you and..."

"WHAT?!" Maddie's lunch fell to the floor as her entire body halted.

"They haven't posted them yet, but they say they have them and..."

"How in the world would they have..." Her phone beeped again. "That's Harry. Oh God do you
"Knows? Yes!" Ella cut in. "Answer that. Call me back."

Following Ella's directions, Maddie clicked over to the other call.

"Do you know?" He skipped right past the pleasantries.

"Ella just called to tell me. Harry, you have to believe me, it's not me."

"I know," his voice was strained and she could tell he was mad.

"I would never pose for something like that, I swear!"

"I know," he was walking through a hallway to a private room.

"Do you think somebody took a picture of me without me knowing it or..."

"It's not you," he cut her off. "I guarantee it."

"How do you know?"

"Because I've fucking seen them." Scratch that. He was furious.

"How did you see them?" Her voice was hoarse as her face flushed. "Are they already out?"

"No," he pushed through the door and slammed it behind him. "They sent them to my office for comment. I'll give them a fucking..."

"Harry!" She cut him off. "Where are you?"

"I'm on my way back to London."

"But I thought you had the meeting and then the lunch at..."

"I am cancelling and heading back to London."

"Harry," she felt a wave of sadness wash over her. "Don't do that. Stay where you're at."

"And do nothing!?!" He yelled into the phone; quickly shaking his head. "I'm sorry. I don't mean to yell at you, I just. I can't sit here and do nothing while they run with this trash!"

"What would you be able to do here?" She sank to a bench; her eyes welling up slightly. "What could you do here that you can't do there?"

"Maddie..." He breathed; his muscles tense.

"What do I do?" Her voice was small and it broke his heart. "I'm serious. I don't know what to do."

"You call an attorney. They can get a cease and desist letter out to stop the photos until this is sorted out."
"Okay," she took a deep breath. That made sense. "Do you know an attorney? I mean...I'm new in town and I..."

"I can have the family attorney call you and he can recommend somebody. I will call him right after I hang up with you. He'll call you and then you need to talk to whomever he recommends right away. I'm not joking. This can't wait until after work."

"I figured as much," Maddie's mouth twisted into a crooked smile. "See. You just did all you can do."

"This is not even close to all I can do," there was warning in his tone.

"Have the attorney call me, go to the meeting, go to lunch and then..." She let out a long breath. "Then come home to me?"

"Maddie I'm so sorry," his voice grew soft. "I am so, so, so very sorry that this is happening to you right now. I know it'll never be enough but..."

"Please stop," she cut him off; biting her lip. "I'm trying to be calm and cool about this but if you keep that up I'm going to..."

"Got it," he gave in. "I will have the attorney call you and I will see you as soon as I hit town."

"Thank you."

"Maddie...I love you."

"I know you do," she smiled; despite herself. "I love you too."

Maddie disconnected the phone call and sat there; in the hallway on the bench. Her mind was spiraling as it all began to settle. If Ella knew, other people knew. If Harry knew, the rest of his family knew. Her stomach turned. As sick as she felt, she wanted to see these pictures; these pictures that had no way of existing short of a clear and serious invasion of her privacy. Heat rose to her face as her anger overtook her sadness. Taking a deep breath, she let her head lean back against the wall. Her reflexes remembered her time in Bendal, her training—she knew how to pull it together in the moment, hold it in until the end of the day. In that minute between Harry hanging up and the phone ringing again, she reverted back to that training. And it was the only thing that kept her from cracking. And, less than a minute after she had hung up with Harry, the phone rang.

Harry had come through with his word. The attorney he usually worked with was on the phone with three names. He would recommend all three of them very highly but wanted her to have some choice in the matter. Once she chose, he would put in a call to explain the situation and they would get things moving right away. Having no knowledge of any of them, she asked him to choose for her.

He did as she asked and within three minutes she was talking to her attorney; Christopher Michaels. He had handled private matters for celebrities and many high profile personalities. He was smart and friendly and had a cease and desist letter out within twenty minutes. Within an hour the website had pulled their claim and the entire situation was put on "pause" while legal counsel went to work. When he called her with the good news, she wanted to burst into tears; knowing she would never be able to thank him. And, according to him, she wouldn't be able to pay him either—as Harry's attorney would be covering all costs via Harry.
It wasn't over, but it was a start. At least she would be able to go about the rest of her day without the possibility of her "nude" pictures floating around in the blogosphere. As she had waited to hear from Christopher, she had moved on to her office and when she had hung up with him, she let out a long breath and finally took a drink from her bottle of water. There was no way she was going to be able to eat but the water was refreshing; and much needed. And then there was a knock at her door. Taking a deep breath, Maddie moved to open it.

"Doctor Colvin," she smiled at her boss. "Is everything okay?" She glanced back at her phone; no missed calls.

"Can I come in?" Her boss was a lovely man; old enough to be her father. He was kind and warm and trained in an era when doctors were allowed more professional courtesies; spending more time with their clients, becoming more of a family member. He was phenomenal with the children they worked with and had this lovely gleam in his eye that reminded her of images of Santa Claus. But as he requested entrance into her office, he seemed concerned—curious; more professional than she had really ever seen him.

"Of course," Maddie nodded and stepped aside. He waited for her to close her door and take a seat before he took the chair across from her.

"Doctor Forrester," he folded his hands in his lap and looked to her with a smile that was a stark contrast to his professional demeanor. With a breath, he began, "I know we haven't known each other very long but I have enjoyed working with you. Your professionalism is above reproach, you have a great rapport with the children and their families and you have adapted to living in London quite well. I hope you know that you have become quite the asset to this department and to the hospital..."

"Why do I feel that there is a 'but' coming?" She was uneasy.

"No but," he shook his head; leaning closer to her, a move that counselors used to demonstrate closeness with their clients. "While I personally find great benefits in getting to know my coworkers and staff on a more personal level, not everyone shares that appreciation. And I want to respect that. So, I try to stay out of my staffs' lives; unless I'm invited in...or unless I have to."

"Oh?" Maddie felt her throat tighten. Oh God. Did he know about the photos? "Is this about the..."

"Cameras?" He finished her sentence unexpectedly.

"The cameras?" Maddie's face registered her surprise. "I'm sorry, I..."

"I've been told that you were seeing Prince Harry," he seemed almost embarrassed to even be discussing it with her. "And while I don't care to get into the gossip mill, I just assumed when I saw the paparazzi outside that there were here hoping to get a glimpse of you or hoping that the Prince would..."

"The paparazzi are..." She shook her head. "I'm sorry, did you say they are outside?"

"Yes," he nodded towards the window. "I thought you knew. You seemed a little off and when I mentioned..." He trailed off as Maddie moved to the window; looking down to the ground two stories below.

"Oh. My. God." Her heart stopped as she took it in. There were at least twenty people gathered around the main entrance to the hospital. She shook her head. They couldn't be there for her, could they? She glanced back at her boss as he smiled up at her in the comforting way that was well rehearsed with therapists—in the way that made her want to scream. "I don't know what to say. I don't know why they're here..." And it hit her. They had all seen the same post Ella had; promising nude photos of the Prince's girlfriend. Maddie sank back into her chair; unable to control the tears that rose to her eyes—despite her boss' presence.

"Doctor?" He reached his hand out to hers, the contact of which brought her eyes up to meet his. "Are you okay?"

"Yes," she answered though her head betrayed her; shaking a slow 'no.' "It's been...a long day and..." She took a deep breath; blowing it out slowly. "I'm sorry that they are here. I'm sorry they are blocking the entrance and..." She shook her head again. "I don't know what to do? What do you want me to do?"

"Maybe you should go home for the day?" He suggested. "Come in tomorrow afternoon and we can meet and talk about what we can do."

"Tomorrow?" Maddie felt a new panic rising; one that warned of an employer not appreciating the hassle that came with employing her, one that told of the domino effect that hassle might have on her staying employed; staying in London. And her training failed her for a split second as tears pricked at her eyes.

"Everything's going to be okay, Doctor Forrester," he smiled calmly. "I just think it would be best for everyone if you took a day and we came up with a game plan tomorrow."

"Okay," Maddie nodded; forcing herself to pull it together—straining to keep her professionalism from disintegrating in front of him. "I'll just...get my stuff together and then..."

"Okay," he smiled, seeing that she needed, or more accurately wanted, to be left alone. "I'll see you tomorrow at two then?"

"Two?" Maddie sniffed and nodded. "Your office or mine?"

"Mine," he moved to the door and then, in a moment that was more fatherly than anything, he turned back to her. "Maddie; from one professional to another—are you going to be okay?"

"Ha...." She smiled in a scattered sort of way. "Yes. Yes...I usually am."

"Good," He nodded. "Is there anything I can do?"

"No," she met his eyes; grateful for the offer. "But thank you."

"Of course," he nodded and then, with one last, small smile, he slipped out her door; closing it behind him.

This was far from over.

She wanted to cry. She wanted to throw something; hit something—cause destruction. And then she wanted to curl up into a ball and cry. But she couldn't; not quite yet.

Taking three deep breaths; in and out, in and out, in and out. She wiped at her eyes and reached for a piece of hard candy—knowing that the act of sucking on something stayed off the tears at least for the moment. She pulled out her purse, checked her make up in her compact. With a quick swipe of her lip-gloss, she pulled out her sunglasses and closed her purse.

Feeling as though she were on a mission; get out, get home, breakdown; she pulled all her strength, all of her nerve and she opened the door to her office. She couldn't control what was going to happen the next day and, if they were going to ask her to leave, she didn't want this last moment to be a moment of weakness. So she smiled at her coworkers, locked her door and, with a wave, she made her way through the halls; down the stairs.

Before she stepped into the corridor, into the view of the cameras, she pulled her phone from her purse and placed one imperative phone call; leaving a message.

"Ella, it's me. I'm leaving work early and I would give anything if you were able to meet me at home. I need..." She took a deep, shuddering breath. "I need somebody to pull me back to Earth for a minute."

She ended the call, returned her phone to her purse and then, pulling a smile from the depths of she didn't know where, she stepped out into the corridor. With her head held high and her eyes shielded from the glare, she walked past the cameras that were flashing wildly, she ignored the questions—the wildly inappropriate and unfounded questions—and she went directly to her car.
Slipping behind the wheel and turning the ignition, she only hoped that her façade could hold until she made it past the group of cameras that was most certainly waiting for her at home before the weight of the day came falling down on her shoulders with a fury
Chapter 43

One of the things Maddie treasured the most about her friendship with Ella was that there were these moments where they didn't even need words; moments when a look conveyed the multitude of what was passing through their hearts and their minds. And, when Ella stepped into her apartment and met Maddie's eyes, it was one of those moments.

Without a word, without question, Ella pulled Maddie with her to the couch where they slumped together in one big clump of friendship; both with tears in their eyes—Ella's because of Maddie's. Maddie had changed into her pajamas—her comfy flannel pants and Harry's shirt; not caring that the smell of him made her cry. And there they sat; arms crossed over the other, feet tucked up under them. Ella kissed Maddie's forehead as she cried.

And then, when Maddie sniffed and sat up, Ella knew without words—that she was ready to talk about it.

"Well," Ella sighed as Maddie reached for tissues. "I haven't seen your naked ass online yet so..." Maddie bust out laughing; her tears pressing from her eyes as Ella joined in.

"Harry put me in contact with an attorney; he filed a cease and desist letter. They can't post them until we...figure this all out I guess."

"That's a relief," Ella sighed.

"It wasn't me. The photos...somebody must have photo-shopped them or..."

"I figured as much," Ella nodded. "Have you seen them?"

"No," she shook her head. "But Harry has."

"How's he taking all of this?"

"Well, as far as I know he hasn't killed anybody so..."

"Not so good?"

"Not really," Maddie sighed and leaned back against the couch. "I'm not sure I've heard him this pissed in the entire time I've known him—even when they pulled him out of going to Afghanistan for the second time..."

"He's on his way back?"

"He should be," Maddie glanced at the clock. "Why would somebody do this? Put my face on somebody else's body and try to...why would somebody do that?"

"I don't know."

"And then all the cameras at work..." She groaned. "At least the lawyer stopped them from publishing them but God, Ella...I have no idea what the hell is going to..." She shook her head. "I really, really don't want to obsess on this. If I obsess about this, they win and I don't like losing. And I know that once Harry gets here it's..." Ella met her friend's teary eyes and nodded; she knew without words.

"Well then," she clapped her hands together. "Let's talk about something else."

"Okay," Maddie sniffed and pondered for a moment. "Tell me what's going on with you."

"Well," Ella couldn't help the smile that crept to her lips. "I've kind of started seeing someone."

"What?" Maddie turned to her; surprised. "Just last week you were single and loving it."

"That's why I said kind of started," Ella grinned. "His name is Matt. He's one of the helicopter pilots at the hospital. I would love for you to meet him."

"I would like that too," Maddie smiled. "I do have a fondness for helicopter pilots. Maybe the four of us could have dinner sometime."

"That would be good," Ella nodded.

"Look at you...bringing somebody home to meet the family," Maddie nudged her friend; clearly enamored with Matt.

"What can I say? He makes me laugh."

"Good. Good. That's important."

"It is..." Ella agreed.

"Oh! I met the Queen this weekend," only Maddie's eyebrows perked up as she let her friend in on the news. "I was going to tell you tonight after work but...Harry introduced me to his grandparents."

"He did?" Ella's interest was genuine; her intrigue a reflexive part of her nature. "Oh my God, Maddie. That's huge. Was it amazing?"

"Yes," Maddie nodded. "She is so beautiful in person. And she smells fantastic."

"Of course she does," Ella nodded as though it were the most obvious thing in the world. "Was she nice?"

"She really was," Maddie thought over the night and sighed heavily; leaning into Ella's arms, unable to avoid the reality of her day for much more than a moment. "I can't believe this is happening."

"Yeah," Ella took a breath. "Me neither." When the buzzer rang out into the room, Maddie squeezed Ella's hand and hurried to answer it.

"Hello?"

"It's me," he sounded tired, angry, confused; just like she felt. Hitting the buzzer, Maddie opened the door and waited. In mere moments Harry and his body man were up the stairs. When Harry saw her, he stalled; he could tell she had been crying, that she was upset and it only fueled the fire he had worked all day to tamper down. It as such conflict; wanting to comfort her all while wanting to pummel something to a bloody pulp. Maddie tore her eyes from him.
"Hi Jim," she waved her hand with a tiny smile.

"Doctor Forrester," he nodded his hello and moved to the bench in the hallway across from her door.

"Hi," Maddie's eyes lifted to meet Harry's. He was still dressed in his suit, bag in his hand; having come directly from his meeting and luncheon.

"Hi," his hand reached out to stroke her cheek and she pressed her face into it. "Can I come in?"

"Please," she stood aside as he moved past her. With a small nod to Jim, Maddie closed the door; locking it and setting the alarm. Harry dropped his bag by the door and shrugged out of his coat; draping it over the back of her chair—making himself at home. If Maddie hadn't been so caught up in the scandal of the day, she would have been touched by the sight.

"Ella," Harry forced a smile for her as she rose to her feet to greet him properly.

"How you doing?" She rubbed his shoulder as she stepped out of the hug.

"That depends," he turned to look at Maddie. "How are you doing?"

"Well," Maddie sighed and looked between them. "I'm in my pajamas...but I haven't started drinking. So...Somewhere in the middle."

"Yeah," he understood the feeling. "I'm sorry I wasn't here earlier."

"It's okay," Maddie smiled through teary eyes. "Ella's been with me."

"Yes, she has," Ella cleared her throat. "And now that Harry's here, I think it's time for me to..."

"No," Harry shook his head. "That's not necessary."

"You don't have to go," Maddie looked to her best friend.

"I actually do," Ella kissed Maddie's cheek, "I love you," and patted Harry's shoulder. "Take good care of her."

"Of course," he smiled up at her. And then, with a knowing glance at the couple, Ella slipped through the door.

Maddie, after seeing Ella out, leaned against the door and looked to Harry where he was leaning back against the arm of her oversized chair. His tie was loose, his jaw set, his shoulders tense. Maddie couldn't figure out what to do first; where to go. Her eyes fell on the bag he had with him and curiosity paved the way.

"Do you have them?" He looked up sharply. "The pictures."

"Maddie..." He shook his head.

"Don't lie to me, Harry. Do you have them here?" There was a moment of pause; he held her eyes and gulped. Nodding, he pushed away from the chair and went over to his case. Opening it up, he pulled out a large manila envelope. He stepped over to her and held it out; hating what she was about to open.

"Thank you," she breathed; taking it from him. Her fingers were cautious as she opened it, as though she could be dismantling a bomb. Pulling three photos from the envelope, she gasped; her eyes wide. "Oh my God...It's me."

"It's not you," he shook his head; absolutely certain.

"It looks like me." If she hadn't known better, she would be easily convinced. "She looks exactly like me."

"No she doesn't. Her body is different from yours. The curves aren't right and she has a mole on her left..." Harry pointed. "And you have a mole just above..." He took a breath and rubbed at the back of his neck; pacing away from her.

"Okay," she sighed. "Okay, you're right. You're..." She nodded and, strangely enough, a small laugh came out.

"You're laughing?" His forehead crinkled in confusion.

"Well...that's just...incredibly perceptive of you; noticing the moles and all..." She caught his glare and tried to control her laughter. "Sorry."

"It wasn't quite so funny when I was explaining to the communications office and my father how it was I knew this wasn't you."

"Oh God." Maddie's stomach turned.

"There we go," he waved his hand; that was more the response he had expected.

"Your father knows you've seen me naked?"

"Yes."

"What about...The Queen? Did she..."

"Not at the time."

"But now?"

"I would imagine," he let out a breath; reclaiming his spot at the arm of her chair.

"Okay, now I'm horrified. I can't believe you told them..." The images of the conversation passed through her mind like a terrible movie.

"You would rather them think that this was you?!"

"No, no," she shook her head and looked back at the photos. "These are really good. Whoever did these..."

"Is going to wish for the day before he knew how to use photo shop," Harry's hands clenched into fists.
"Hey..." Maddie stuffed the pictures back into the envelope and tossed them onto her table before she moved to him. Her arms went to his shoulders as she stepped into his space, standing between his legs. As if on reflex or instinct, his hands moved to her body; resting on her hips. He looked up to her then; eyes heavy with the responsibility he felt for this. Swallowing back her tears, Maddie dipped her head to kiss him. It was a soft, sweet kiss; one meant to ease his tense shoulders, his taut jaw. But when their lips met, the weight of the day was behind them—pulling them closer together. His hands on her hips were tight; pressing her closer to him. Her fingers moved to his neck, pulling him to her. A moan moved from her mouth involuntarily; the heat between them intensifying quickly; like a blast of hot air from a suddenly lit fire.

"I'm so sorry," he whispered against her lips.

"It's okay," she whispered back.

"No," he pulled away; his eyes growing dark. "No it's not." He sighed; his anger and frustration taking hold of his emotions as he nodded towards the street. "I saw them all out there. They are going to be all over you."

"They already are," she sighed. "You know they came to the hospital."

"What?"

"They were waiting at the entrance when my boss sent me home," Maddie felt her tears return as she remembered what had happened in her office.

"They were what?" Harry stood; forcing Maddie to take a step away from him. "God damn it!" He pulled his phone from his pocket and started dialing. But Maddie was quick and pulled it from his hand. He looked to her with great surprise. "Give it back."

"No!" She stepped back from him.

"Damn it Maddie!" He reached for the phone. "That is a private hospital! You are a private citizen and they don't need to be stalking you in the bushes!"

"I know!"

"This is bullshit! Absolute bullshit!"

"You think I don't know that?! This is happening to me! These are photos of me! Or at least they are supposed to be and..."

"And..." He tried to cut in but she rushed ahead of him.

"And I need my boyfriend right now!" Her voice rose to his level as she stood up to him. "I need him to sit down and listen to me rant about my rough day and NOT feel the need to swoop in; threatening to take people down at the knees and make it all go away!"

"They can't be there!" His face was bright red.

"I know that!" She yelled and then blinked; hating the way they were going at each other. "$I...I know that. I know you're mad and I'm just as pissed as you are. It's just... I just...I need to you to be my boyfriend with a sympathetic ear right now. Not put-them-in-their-place guy."
"Maddie..." He was trying; she could see that—deep breaths and all.

"Please Harry," she reached for his hand. "I don't know how to do this if I can't talk to you. If I have to worry about you flying off every time something happens, I'll want to keep things from you and that is never going to..."

"Fine," Harry sighed; relenting. "You're right. I know you're...fuck!" He huffed. "I'm sorry. You're right. I can do that. I can..." He breathed and focused on her; moving back to his spot on the arm of her chair. "You said that your boss sent you home?" Maddie bit her lip and nodded; moving closer to him.

"He did. He told me to take a day and come back tomorrow for a meeting..." She took a deep breath. "I don't know what they're going to tell me. What if they want me to leave?"

"Why would they want you to leave?"

"Because. People bring their kids to us because they are experiencing some serious traumas, Harry. Part of the process is anonymity. I would guess these people don't want the world to know that their children are seeing me, us."

"Maddie..." He shook his head; his sadness taking hold over anger for the moment. "You really think they would let you go because of this?"

"I don't know," she shook her head and wiped at her eyes. "He was very sweet about it all, helpful really. But this is the first time I've ever encountered something like this and..." She blew air from her mouth and gestured to the envelope. "Hey, at least the world isn't looking at those tonight, you know."

"Yeah," he breathed.

"You want to hit something, don't you?" She cracked a half smile.

"I want to hit somebody," a burst of laughter came from his lips as he stood again; pulling her into his arms and kissing the top of her head. "But I'm trying to remain calm."

"You're doing well," she smiled up at him; her chin resting on his chest.

"I don't want you to feel like you can't talk to me," he brushed the hair from her forehead. "I don't want you to be afraid to tell me how you're feeling."

"I'm not sure if you've noticed, but I have no problem speaking my mind."

"I have noticed," he kissed the tip of her nose.

"So...tell me. How is this all going to play out? What happens next?"

"Well..." Harry sighed; his hands moving to rub her shoulders. "Your attorney stopped the photos and the website pulled the announcement. Next some experts are going to take a look at those photos and they should be able to prove that they've been altered and then they can't print them...or if they do you can sue the shit out of them and retire."

"Ha!" Maddie laughed. "That sounds wonderful. But...how is this going to play out? In the press, in the media, with...you know...all of that," she waved a hand towards the street.
"I don't know."

"Harry..."

"I honestly don't know," he shrugged. "They know that there were photos that were allegedly you. They know that the photos were stopped. I don't know why they did this. I don't...maybe they wanted a reaction from me. Maybe they want a reaction from you. Maybe...I don't know. Maybe you're getting too popular and somebody wanted to knock you down a peg or two?"

"Too popular?" Maddie laughed.

"Well, the press has been mostly good lately. They've figured out all the great things you've done. Maybe somebody decided they needed to ruffle the feathers a bit. I don't know."

"Does your..." She cleared her throat. "Does your father believe you? He doesn't think that I..."

"He believes me," He sighed and shook his head. "As much as that particular conversation pained me, he believes me."

"I would hate for your family to think that this is me."

"They won't," he assured her; this wasn't their first scandal, wasn't their first time being accused of something that was inaccurate and Sophie had already reached out to him to offer her support to Maddie. "Speaking of family; have you talked to your family yet?"

"No," she shook her head. "I wanted to calm down first, to know what I was dealing with before I called home."

"Makes sense," he nodded; his head hanging down.

"What's on your mind right now?" Maddie lifted his chin so he would look at her.

"I don't want to tell you," he took her hand in his and pressed a kiss to the top of it and gave in. "I'm thinking of all you've had to do to be here, all you had to leave and...and...God...how much you have to put up with to be here with me." Her heart ached as she watched him; full of guilt and responsibility.

"You know what...let's get out of here."

"What?" He looked up to her.

"Yeah, let's...I don't want to sit here and do this; be sad and angry and...they only get to control what they get to control. And we can't let them decide how we do this, right?"

"Okay," Harry sighed and took her hands in his. "What did you have in mind?"

"Where is your favorite place in London? When you need to get away from it all and escape in the city, where do you go?"

"I don't know..." He shook his head in thought.

"Well, figure it out. I'm going to go change and when I get back, you're taking me there."
"What?" He watched as she walked towards her room.

"You heard me!" She called from the hallway.

By the time Maddie had returned, dressed casually and comfortably, Harry had figured it out and they were leaving. Stepping outside, they were greeted with the expected cameras. Reaching the relative safety of the car, Maddie sighed and leaned into him. Having already given the driver directions, Harry sat back as the car drove into the night and away from the flashbulbs.

Maddie looked up at him in confusion when they arrived at Kensington Palace; driving swiftly through the gates towards his house. But she remained silent and followed. She followed him into his house where Bernard had to-go containers of food waiting. He grabbed a blanket and the sack and gestured for her to follow him. They walked through the grounds, around to the main building and straight inside. Maddie was weary; where were they headed? His family lived here? But they by-passed the residences, they walked up stairs and through halls and when she thought they couldn't get any higher, any further, they walked some more.

And finally, with a wink to her and a push on a door, they were outside again. Only now, they were on a roof.

"Oh my God..." She stepped out and was looking out over the lights, over the trees; over London.

"Come on," he nodded his head and she followed. Setting the sack of food aside, he laid out the blanket and kicked off his shoes. Maddie followed suit and joined him. Harry pulled containers out of the sack and handed her one.

"Pizza?" She grinned.

"I love Bernard's pizza."

"Fair enough," she smiled. "The roof of Kensington Palace?"

"There is nobody here; it's just me. The family doesn't come up here. The press can't get up here. And this view is..."

"It is," she agreed; taking a bite from her pizza. "Mmmm. Good God that's amazing."

"I told you," he grinned; watching her savor the food. "This was a good idea."

"I'm full of good ideas," she shrugged.

"You are." They settled into their spots; eating pizza, drinking the wine Bernard had put in the bag, and looking out over the city. Occasionally Harry would point something out or Maddie would ask a question but for the most part, they ate in a contented silence as they allowed their world to return closer to normal. When they finished, Harry put the containers back in the bag and they laid flat on the blanket as they looked out at the city and up at the stars.

"You are handling this incredibly well," Harry turned his head to look over at her with loving eyes and she knew exactly what he was talking about.

"Yeah, well, what choice do I have?"
"What choice do you have?" He laughed; scrubbing his hand over his face as he turned on his side; propping himself up on one elbow so he could look down at her. "God Maddie, you could choose to walk away and it would just...fade."

"Harry..." Her hand reached up to stroke his cheek.

"Nobody would blame you. And you could be done with all of this," he snatched her hand; playing with her fingers. "The press, the fans, the critics, the family, the...all of the baggage that comes with me."

"You know I hate it when you call it baggage."

"And you know I hate it when you pretend it's no big deal." Their eyes locked; Maddie was the first to blink.

"What do you want me to say? I told you a long time ago, I want to be with you, to stand next to you; no matter what they throw at me."

"What about the pictures?" His jaw hardened as he thought of it.

"I don't know Harry," Maddie moved to her side; propping herself up, mirroring his position. "Everyone that matters knows that it's not me. My excellent new attorney is working on it and in the meantime...the woman in the photo has less cellulite than I do..." She shrugged and rolled back to her back.

"Wow. You really can find a silver lining in everything, can't you?"

"I really have to reach sometimes," they shared a small laugh.

"What about all the blogs?"

"What about them? I'm almost thirty and I'm comfortable in my skin. Some blogger talking about how fat I am or another talking about how scrawny my legs are doesn't affect me like it might have when I was twenty."

"Wally?"

"Oh Please." She laughed. "I've refused to be pushed around by big men with guns. Wally doesn't phase me."

"My family?" His voice was soft as his eyebrows lifted.

"Your family is just as...interesting...as mine, just with more crowns and titles."

"How about..."

"How about you're worth it. All of it." She leaned halfway up; her arms supporting her as she narrowed her gaze on him. "Face it Harry, if Bendal couldn't pull me from you, nothing here is going to." His heart warmed in his chest; his emotions from the day cluttering his throat.

"You know it's dangerous to talk to a man like that."

"Dangerous?" She arched an eyebrow; grinning at his throw back to the weekend.
"He might start to think you have...intentions."

"Maybe I do." She was smiling wide as she said it.

"Ha..." He pulled her to him then; relaxing back onto the blanket as she settled against his chest. She felt safe and protected and loved. And Harry felt a whole host of emotions that he had never in his life felt before. Looking out at the night sky, he took a breath, "Can I let you in on a secret?"

"Of course." Her voice was soft, not wanting to disrupt the peacefulness.

"Someday..." His chest rose and fell under her cheek.

"Yeah?"

"I'm going to ask you to be my wife." And it was so simple; so innocent—so honest. Maddie turned to look at him; searching his eyes and his face remained calm; sure. His words had hit them both; her with surprise and a sudden rush of emotions—him with absolute clarity.

"Harry..." Her voice was shaky.

"Does that scare you?" He blinked; watching her process his confession.

"No," she shook her head; tears in her eyes. "It doesn't. It..."

"Good," he sighed with relief; his hand twisting up in her hair to pull her lips down to his.

"You know..." She spoke against his mouth, pulling back slightly. "You really shouldn't say those things to a woman before you've met her mother, her family. That might change your mind. It might...."

"Shush," he kissed her again. "When can we go?"

"Go where?" Maddie pulled back. "To Colorado?"

"Did your mother move?" His fingers played with her hair.

"No."

"Then yes. To Colorado."

"Harry..." She couldn't help the way her eyes lit up at the thought. She couldn't help the excitement that grew at his suggestion.

"We can go for your birthday," he suggested; his hand cupping her neck as his lips kissed her jaw.

"But that's in two weeks. Can you really just up and leave?"

"I really can," he nodded; his lips brushing the skin of her neck. "Can you?"

"Ha!" She laughed into the night. "I won't even know until tomorrow if I'm still employed." Harry pulled back then, his memory of the day's events catching up with him. "Stop," she warned. "We came here to get away from it."

"She felt safe and protected and loved. And Harry felt a whole host of emotions that he had never in his life felt before. Looking out at the night sky, he took a breath, "Can I let you in on a secret?"

"Of course." Her voice was soft, not wanting to disrupt the peacefulness.

"Someday..." His chest rose and fell under her cheek.

"Yeah?"

"I'm going to ask you to be my wife." And it was so simple; so innocent—so honest. Maddie turned to look at him; searching his eyes and his face remained calm; sure. His words had hit them both; her with surprise and a sudden rush of emotions—him with absolute clarity.

"Harry..." Her voice was shaky.

"Does that scare you?" He blinked; watching her process his confession.

"No," she shook her head; tears in her eyes. "It doesn't. It..."

"Good," he sighed with relief; his hand twisting up in her hair to pull her lips down to his.

"You know..." She spoke against his mouth, pulling back slightly. "You really shouldn't say those things to a woman before you've met her mother, her family. That might change your mind. It might...."

"Shush," he kissed her again. "When can we go?"

"Go where?" Maddie pulled back. "To Colorado?"

"Did your mother move?" His fingers played with her hair.

"No."

"Then yes. To Colorado."

"Harry..." She couldn't help the way her eyes lit up at the thought. She couldn't help the excitement that grew at his suggestion.

"We can go for your birthday," he suggested; his hand cupping her neck as his lips kissed her jaw.

"But that's in two weeks. Can you really just up and leave?"

"I really can," he nodded; his lips brushing the skin of her neck. "Can you?"

"Ha!" She laughed into the night. "I won't even know until tomorrow if I'm still employed." Harry pulled back then, his memory of the day's events catching up with him. "Stop," she warned. "We came here to get away from it."
"Okay," he nodded; summoning all of his will to do as she asked. "You'll let me know tomorrow if you can get away?"

"I will," she sighed. "I will let you know tomorrow."

"Excellent," and then, with a wicked gleam and a smug grin, he pulled her body closer; rolling them so that she was underneath him. This time when his lips kissed hers; it was with hope and promise. And when Maddie kissed him back; it was with total abandon.

The next day would bring back to light all that they were trying to forget in that moment; the photos, the attorneys, the cameras, the questions. It would all be there when they returned from Harry's favorite place to escape. But, in that moment, it was just the two of them in the dark on a roof; together.
Chapter 44

The first time she woke the next morning, Maddie's eyes fluttered open to see that it was barely morning; the sun only beginning to peek out over the horizon. Harry, spooned up behind her, his arm loose around her waist, was breathing the deep, steady breath of slumber into her ear. It was as if their bodies knew, after the strain of the day before, that they needed this closeness; this contact—even in sleep. She wasn't ready to wake yet, she wanted more of this before the day and all of its realities returned. Reveling in the warmth he provided, she sighed and willed herself back to sleep. Just as her eyes grew heavy and began to close, she felt him stir. His arm tightened around her waist, pulling her closer.

"You awake?" He muttered sleepily in her ear; his breath tickling her neck.

"Mmmm..." She nodded slightly and then took a breath as he moved, only slightly, to press a warm kiss into the hollow of her neck. "Oh..."

"Good morning," his voice was rough as his hand let go of hers and moved achingly slow up her side; pushing under the t-shirt he had leant her for the improv sleep over. Something about the way they had moved through the stress of the day before, something about how they had made it to the morning still entangled in each other drew out an overwhelming want for her.

"I could get used to waking up like this," her laughter was low and ceased when his hands reached her breasts, moving over them with a teasing warmth that instantly aroused her attention.

"Good to know..." He licked up the side of her neck, nipped at her earlobe. Tightening his hold on her, he pulled her so that her body was flush with his and she felt him. Hard. Warm. Ready.

His mouth remained close to her head; sucking at her shoulder, her neck. His hand ran over the length of her body, lightly over the mole that he had committed to his memory, and pushed into the small speck of fabric that was her panties, her body arched towards his fingers; aching at his touch.

"Harry..." She breathed heavily. She was barely awake, barely able to think a coherent thought, but at the same time she was completely in tune with him with this moment. The night before had been full of negative feelings and exhaustion but after getting away, getting much needed sleep, she couldn't help but respond to him.

His right arm went underneath her head, moving around her in a warm, strong hold. His left gently drew her top leg up, resting it on his; giving him greater access to where his hand truly longed to be. He moved his hand back to her center, stroking with firm, steady fingers. There were no words, only shallow breaths and soft moans as Harry slowly and steadily roused her body awake.

Maddie took a deep breath, her hands clutching at the arm wrapped around her; her hips pushing against the hand that teased her. He pressed his body closer to hers. He was mind-numbingly hard; aching to be inside of her—needing to make love to her. Turning only her head, Maddie's lips sought his—her hand pulled his face towards hers and their mouths met in a long, slow, deep kiss. Maddie felt her breath suck right out of her and pour into him.

When he pulled his lips away from hers, she missed them instantly. And when they began to kiss down her neck again, she wanted to be closer; always closer. With hooded eyes and a sultry voice, Maddie pleaded. "Harry..." And he knew what she wanted. Moving only to rid them both of their underwear and find protection, Harry settled back against her and drew her to him; his hands returning appreciatively to her body.

Harry lowered his head to suck at her shoulder and then, with a strangled groan, he clutched at her thigh and slipped into her from behind. Maddie moaned and gasped at the sensation she felt when he plunged into her. With one hand planted on her hip to hold her in place, he began moving within her. Maddie's hand reached back, tangling in his hair and holding his lips in her neck; aching for more. He was holding her so close, she felt like she could melt into him.

Trusting she would keep up the rhythm they established, he moved his hand from her waist; lower, to stroke at her center as he continued to push into her. Maddie smiled sleepily; wanting him to hold her closer and closer still. As she pressed back into him, moaning and gasping at every thrust, the friction was almost unbearable. Harry took long, deep breaths, struggling to maintain control. Burying his face in her neck, he kissed and sucked and licked; he moaned in encouragement and groaned in restraint. He watched as Maddie fought to control her breathing, fought to be closer to him. He watched as her breathing began to come quicker, less restrained. He grinned when she sucked her lip between her teeth and her head rolled back onto his shoulder; that was her tell—she was close.

Maddie's hand moved down her own body; stopping to rest on his; still stroking her. Sucking in a breath, she pressed his hand closer. A wave of electricity ran through him as he watched her take control of her own pleasure; pushing them both closer to the edge. And then, as she began to clench around him, her hand holding his in place; the groan that came from deep within her was all it took to send Harry over the edge. His mouth rest close to her ear, where she could hear every ragged breath that came from his lips; he thrust faster, harder, holding her tighter and closer to him. And then, in that hazy way that comes right before the explosion, Maddie uttered his name. Just as her words fell from her mouth she was exploding against him. Harry groaned into her ear; so, so close. Her eyes were heavy, her body slick, her breath coming out in gasps. Amidst her falling apart, her eyes opened, met his and she smiled; warm, welcoming, satisfied. And then, with a great intensity, he pushed into her; his lips meeting hers and he followed—blissfully—over the edge.

As their breathing subsided and their hearts calmed, Harry pressed a kiss to her shoulder and moved to brush her hair from her forehead and sweep it away from her face. There was so much to say, so many feelings he wanted to convey; about the day before, about how much it meant that she was still there, about how his confessions had been the truest thing he could have said to her. But the connection they had just made was so much more powerful than anything he would be able to articulate in that moment; so he let the words fade. Maddie brought his hand to her lips for a kiss and sighed; settling back against him. As they adjusted in the bed, Harry held her close—though not as tight—and with one final, loving kiss, they drifted back to sleep; satisfied and tired.

The second time she woke up, Maddie sensed two things. She was alone in Harry's bed and, from the warm aroma wafting into the room, he was eating breakfast somewhere. Luring her from the coziness of the bed, she stretched her arms over her head and moved to find him. Glancing at the clock, she knew he would be leaving for work soon. Knowing there were people around, she pulled on a pair of his sweat pants; laughing at how loose they were and his big fluffy robe before she left his room. Stepping into the dining room Harry sat at the table, a phone pressed to his ear; his hair wet from a shower. She took a few steps closer and watched him; loving how normal this looked.

Clearing her throat, she made her presence known. He looked up to her with a smug smile and shining eyes. He held his finger up as he finished his conversation. Standing, he tossed his phone to the table and made his way over to her. Cupping her face in his hand he leaned in to kiss her,

"Good morning," his voice was low and intoxicating.

"It really was," she held his hand to her face for a moment; leaning into it before she released it; tipping up on her toes to kiss him again. "Hello."

"Hello."

"Working?" She raised her eyebrows as he led her to the table with a chuckle.

"I just got off of the phone with Thomas."

"This early?" She arched an eyebrow as she settled into her chair and reached for a cup of tea.

"He's in the office already," Harry smiled at her concern. "I had to check my calendar with him and...I'm clear to leave the Thursday before your birthday. You can stay as long as you like, but I have to head back on Monday. But, I'll be with you for your birthday on Saturday. Of course the security team would want to talk with your mother and..."

"Wait," Maddie sat her cup back on the table. "You were serious? About Colorado and..."

"I was serious," his eyes met hers with no hint of a joke or sarcasm. "You thought I wasn't?"

"I thought there was a chance," she laughed nervously. "Harry, yesterday was a stressful day and last night you said a lot of things..."

"I did," he cut her off; his shoulders square, head held high. His lips twitched into a grin. "And you said it didn't scare you."

"It doesn't." Her reply was quick as her heart thudded.

"Oh-kay," he chuckled; not completely believing her. "I wish you could see the look on your face right now."

"It's just..." She fidgeted with her napkin. "You've only known me a year..."

"Fifteen months."

"And we've only been together...God I don't even know how long we've..."

"It depends on when you start counting," he answered; taking a bite of fruit. "I met you fifteen months ago and I could argue that we had our first date when I came back a month later..."

"When you brought the candy?" She smiled at the memory.

"Yes," he nodded with a matching nostalgic grin. "You gave me your number and I would have kissed you then if you would have stopped avoiding me for one damn..."

"I wasn't avoiding you," she countered with a laugh.

"Sure," he nodded. "We went on that hike and...you didn't know then?" He moved so that he was facing her; pulling her hands into his. "I knew then. So you could say we've been...something for about fourteen months...but for arguments' sake, I'll give you those few months over the phone...bringing us to nine months ago. We started nine months ago. I was just about six months in when I got out of my head and followed my heart...

"You flew all the way to Bendal to kiss me," her cheeks were warm as she remembered.

"I did," he nodded. "And then you went right ahead and stomped all over my moment..."

"You said it was fine!" She nudged him.

"It was fine. It was more than fine...God...Khenda could read me like a book." He shook his head. "I knew I loved you then—before then, but definitely that night. I knew that night."

"And then..." Maddie took a breath. "And then I was shot." Harry swallowed.

"Standing in front of me," she opened up her mouth in protest and he continued before she could talk. "Let's call it what it was Maddie. I don't bring it up now because I know it makes you uncomfortable but...you saved my life that night."

"I..."

"Saved my life that night." He let the weight of it sit in the room before he tightened his hold on her hands; pressing kisses to the tops of them. "Two weeks later, despite your best judgment and my warnings, you jumped in head first. And now...you've been living in London for three months? Four?"

"Almost five," she corrected; her smile timid, shy almost.

"Yes, it's been a short amount of time but you have to admit, we've been through more than a year's share of trials, no?"

"No, you're right..."

"And though you continue to be firm in standing next to me, assuring me that none of the bullshit that comes along with me is going to push you away—refusing to be budged by any of it...the moment I give you the same kind of assurances, the moment I tell you that I'm not going anywhere, you get nervous..."

"I'm not nervous," she moved closer; her hands resting on his thighs as she slipped her knees between his. "Look at me Harry. I'm not nervous. I just don't want you to say something that you don't mean or that you'll want to take back or..."

"Neither of those things is going to happen," he held her face in his hands.

"No?" Her voice was small; hopeful.

"No," he shook his head; tearing his eyes from hers with a chuckle. "But, you said we can't talk about it until I meet your mother. So..." He shrugged and turned back to his seat.

"I did say that," she sighed into a laugh and relaxed into her chair, reaching for her tea. "You would think I would learn to keep my mouth shut."

"God I hope not," he winked at her and, in the sort of ease that was so much a part of who they were together, returned to his breakfast.
Chapter 45

The days immediately following the nude photo fiasco were long, emotional, and full of an outpouring of support from all around. Before she left Harry to return home, she had received calls from Sophie and Eugenie and after she had showered and dressed for the day, she spent half an hour on the phone with Khenda and Collins. Talking to them was exactly what she had needed before she headed back to the hospital to meet with her boss.

Sitting across from him in his office, she was mentally prepared for the worst. But instead of reprimand and talks of leaving, he surprised Maddie by telling her about the new protocol that had been worked out in response to what had happened the day before. He informed her that the hospital was private property and the press simply couldn't be there. A strongly worded statement had been delivered on behalf of the hospital and, should they show up again, security would be called. Maddie almost burst into tears when he reached out to pat her hand and offer his, and the hospital's, support with matters such as this. Though Maddie assured him she had legal counsel, she thanked him and thanked him again. And then, with a smile that took over her face, she hurried to her office—her office—where she called Harry with the news. His shout of satisfaction was followed by a sigh of relief—thankful that his life hadn't taken from her something that was so essentially a part of her.

And three days later, when Christopher Michael called to tell her that three independent professionals had studied the photos and could prove, beyond a doubt, that they were fake, Maddie pulled Harry into her bedroom to show him just how happy she was that he had known on first glance, and without a doubt, that the moles on her body were different than the moles in the photo. The website turned over all copies of the photos, which Maddie promptly destroyed in the fireplace at Ella's after a bottle of wine. They were forced to print an apology and, though there were still people—conspiracy theorists mostly—who thought the almighty hand of the British Royal Family had stepped in to prevent these photos, people began to focus their attention away from the incident altogether.

But the support continued. Maddie received a lovely handwritten note from Kate, the next time she saw Charles he had hugged her tight; wishing he could have prevented the incident. And even William reached out and invited her to lunch. Though it was to bring her in on the planning of Harry's upcoming birthday with him and Bishop, it was in public, it was photographed and it was a strong sign of support. And when she thanked him for the gesture, he left her speechless with his retort,

"Think nothing of it," he had smiled warmly. "I know that you had to sacrifice a great deal to be with my brother. And I know that the sacrifices only increase along the way...your privacy, your pride, sometimes your sense of self...but I've never seen him happier. Never in my entire life. So thank you, for that."

Maddie never told anyone what Harry had said to her that night on the roof of Kensington Palace—not even Ella. Though they didn't talk about it after that morning, the feeling continued on with them; in the way he held her, the way he touched her and Maddie had made a decision. This journey, however long or short it might be, was going to remain exclusively theirs—for as long as she could keep it that way.

As Maddie returned to work, to normal; the planning for their trip to the US was underway. Her boss had approved the time away and Harry let Thomas know to go ahead with the plans. Her mother about fell over when she told her she was coming; going immediately into planning mode.
She agreed to only let the immediate family know, to keep it as quiet as possible and to work with Harry's Security Team who would be contacting her to make sure everything was ready for their visit. Maddie implored her mother, at Harry's firm and persistent request, not to curtsey to him when they met. With the slightest bit of trepidation born from a lack of understanding about how it all worked, her mother agreed and promised to inform the family.

They were just over a week out when they went to dinner with Ella and Matt; who turned out to be a nice guy who Harry took a liking too—spending the majority of dinner asking him question upon question about his flight experience. And, when they finally split from the couple, Maddie sent Ella a picture message of she and Harry with their thumbs up—they liked him. And from the way Ella had watched him throughout dinner, Maddie could tell that Ella did too.

When the day finally arrived that they were leaving, Maddie was excited. For as nervous as she was about the moment Harry would step into her childhood home and meet the people who had known her during that awkward time when she wore braces and coke bottle glasses, she was ready. She wanted to show him her roots. He had let her into his inner sanctuary; introducing her to his family, feeling comfortable enough to lose his cool in front of her, taking her hand as they faced the world outside. And now she was eager to show him who she was, at the same vulnerable level that he had shown her.

She had packed her bags, checking and rechecking to make sure she was prepared for any number of encounters while she was home. With her mother's help, Harry's team seemed happy about staying in the large home on the fifty acres of farmland in the middle of the Colorado plains. Maddie had put together an itinerary that had been approved by her mother and Harry—in that order—and now she was ready. Harry was going to pick her up shortly and then they were headed directly to the airport. As she rechecked her purse for her kindle and her ipod, the buzzer rang out.

"Hello?" She was downright chipper.

"It's me."

"On my way."

"No no!" He stopped her. "Let me up."

"Okay..." She buzzed him up and waited. Stepping out of the elevator with Jim, Harry was holding onto something wrapped in white paper; large, thin and rectangle. "What's that?"

"You'll have to wait," he smiled as Jim checked out her place and stepped back outside; allowing them in.

"Okay," Maddie shut the door behind him. "What's that?" Her curiosity made him laugh.

"It's a present," he leaned it against her wall on the floor. "For you."

"A present?" Her eyebrows went up. "For me?"

"Yes," he laughed. "You seem shocked—which is strange since your birthday is in two days."

"But...we're going to Colorado for my birthday. I just assumed that was my gift..."

"You should never assume such things."
"Well a trip is a pretty extravagant gift."

"I think maybe you need to get used to extravagant gifts, love."

"But..." Her eyes danced in the way they always seemed to do just before Christmas; with expectation and joy and anticipation. It made Harry want to gift her something every day. "What is it?"

"Well, I know that you've been missing Bendal. I know I miss it and last week when you were talking to Khenda and Collins, I could tell that you were a little...homesick. And sometimes I hate that you can't be there, even though it means that you get to be here," he reached for her hand. "So, I had a painting commissioned..."

"You had a painting commissioned?" Maddie chuckled. "I have literally no idea how to do that...is there—sorry. Is there a listing in the yellow pages or..." Her eyes fell on the large painting resting against her wall. "What is the painting of?"

"Only one way to find out," he nodded toward it.

"I can open it now?"

"Of course." Maddie clapped her hands together and moved to the present. Harry watched with great humor as she pulled the paper meticulously from around it and when she gasped and took a step back, he moved to stand behind her; hands on her shoulders. "Harry..."

"It's the view from the summit..." He explained. "My favorite place in Bendal."

"The best the country had to offer," she repeated the words he had spoken to her when he had taken her up there for the first time.

"Yes," he nodded; dropping a kiss to her shoulder. "Save for you."

"Ooohhh," Maddie turned to face him then; her eyes bright and shining. "You're good."

"Thank you," he grinned smugly.

"No, thank you," she tilted her head up to kiss him; her arms wrapping around his neck. "I love my present. It's...breathtaking..." Her lips met his again; his arms tightening around her waist.

"I'm glad you like it," he whispered against her lips.

"Will you help me hang it when we get back?"

"I will. Now..." His hand patted her ass playfully. "Are you ready to return to the US?"

"Are you ready to meet my mother?" She arched an eyebrow as she stepped from him.

"Absolutely," he huffed and reached for her bag. "I'm great with mothers."

"I would imagine that you are," Maddie's voice was dry.

"Hey!" He feigned offense. "What's that supposed to mean?"
"Ah come on," Maddie smiled as she pulled her bag to her shoulder and moved towards the door. "Of course you're great with mothers. The voice, the charm, the propriety. They don't stand a chance! Who would guess that underneath it all is a wild, crazy heartbreaker that's going to wreck their daughters for every man that comes after him?"

"Heartbreaker?!" He laughed out loud as she opened the door. "Wait. Every man that comes after him? I thought we already discussed this. There will be no men after me..."

"Okay," she winked and stepped into the hall and smiled at his bodyman. "Jim."

"Doctor," he smiled back.

"Maddie," Harry's tone was serious as he followed them to the elevator. "I mean it."

"Okay," she sighed.

"I said..."

"And I'm agreeing with you," she smirked and waved her hand. "Now get in the elevator your highness. We have a plane to catch."

"I don't find you amusing in the least," he muttered as he stepped into the elevator.

"Oh we both know that's not true," she tucked her hand in his arm and smiled up at him; his body relaxing under her hand.

"And it's your royal highness," he corrected her with a wink. Maddie's laughter rang through the halls even as the door closed and the elevator moved.

"Thank you for the painting," she held tighter to him as they stepped out of the elevator and moved towards the outside.

"You're welcome for the painting."

"And for the trip..." She paused then, holding him so that he stopped. Her eyes looked up to him; absent of the sarcasm and banter from only moments before. "Seriously Harry. I know that this trip; the planning, the logistics and everything. It's a lot."

"It's not a lot," he shook his head.

"I appreciate it," she smiled. "I just...thank you for doing this. It means a lot to me and I...I appreciate it."

"You're welcome," he leaned to kiss her cheek. "Now," he pushed open the door to her building and stood aside. "Let's go meet your mother, so I can charm her with my voice and my...what was it? Charm? My wild heartbreaking ways?"

"Oh it's going to be a long trip," Maddie giggled as she moved towards the car. In front of a few watchful cameras, their bags were loaded and they stepped into the backseat. Their weekend in the states was just a roughly 10 hour flight away.
"Wow..." Maddie snickered as she, Harry, and the three security officers collected their luggage after landing in Colorado. "I cannot believe there were not swarms of girls running after you."

"I told you, I get along easier in the US." Harry seemed at ease; casual and relaxed.

"How is that possible? They adore you here." Even before she had known him, she knew that he was a fan favorite. Yet, as they walked through the airport there were a few people who noticed, potentially a few camera phone shots of him, but nothing like she had thought.

"They don't expect me to be here," he explained. "They tend to think I'm somebody who looks like me. It's nice actually."

"Oh..." Maddie nodded and then, out of the corner of her eye, she spied two young girls who were pointing in their direction. Leaning closer to him, she lowered her voice. "I spoke too soon. You've been spotted." As inconspicuously as possible, Harry glanced in their direction. They saw him and giggled; waving at him. Always kind, Harry nodded with a small smile and a wave; sending the girls running from them in laughter. "You're so sweet with them," Maddie smiled as they stepped away with their luggage towards a bank of elevators.

"I don't think it was me that caught their attention," he grinned at her.

"What do you mean?"

"You didn't see the shirt the shorter one was wearing?" He chuckled.

"No..."

"It said 'Team Maddie'." It was amusing to him. Maddie had always been a bigger deal than him in Bendal and he couldn't help but chuckle at the surprised expression on her face as she discovered her own popularity.

"What?" Her eyes went wide as she glanced back hoping to catch a look. "Really?! I have a Team? Wow...look at me. I have a team," her smile was goofy as she pondered it. "Wait. If there's a 'Team Maddie', then...who is on the other team?"

"The other Team?" They all stepped into the waiting elevator.

"When Brad Pitt left Jennifer Aniston for Angelina; there was a Team Jennifer and a Team Angelina. Harry, is there another team...for somebody else?" Harry looked to her; his eyes narrowed, voice flat.

"Yes Maddie, I have time to do this with two women and keep it from the press. Definitely seems like something I would do..."

"Fine, fine...you're right..." Maddie rolled her eyes; immediately seeing the ridiculousness in her question. "I'll ask Gary's wife what they're about. She's up to date on all the gossip; she'll know. Maybe it's not even about me. Maybe there's another Maddie and I'm just not as up on things as I should be."
"I'm sure that's it," Harry laughed as the elevator opened and they stepped out.

"We're right over there," Jim spoke up; pointing to a set of doors. It was a short walk and then they were outside in the crisp, fresh air.

"Welcome to Colorado," Maddie took a deep breath as they stepped out of the airport to the two cars that were waiting to transport them to her childhood home about an hour away.

"Look at that view..." Harry nodded to the mountain range as pulled sunglasses onto his eyes; the sun shining bright in the cloudless sky.

"That..." Maddie tucked her hand in his elbow and pointed with the other. "Is Mount Evans. It's over 14,000 feet high which is what? At least 4000 meters."

"Jesus," Harry shook his head. "I bet the view from there is..."

"Spectacular," Maddie grinned. "I hiked it with my cousin Kyle after graduation."

"And you tried to pretend you weren't a hiker," his eyes danced as he thought of one of their earliest interactions. "Are we going to hike that while we're here?"

"No," she shook her head. "It's a pretty serious summit and I'm not sure that drastic of an altitude switch would be good for either of us. But...we will be in Denver all day Saturday and Saturday night. So...maybe we could go in for a drive?"

"Excellent," he smiled as they began loading their bags. "Which way are we headed today?"

"That way," Maddie pointed in the opposite direction.

"Well," Harry looked for miles and miles over flat land. "There are certainly no mountains that way."

"Nope," she grinned and stepped up to the driver's door. "Just farmland."

"Yeah..." Harry let out a long slow breath and stopped; his face twisting up as he looked at her. "Sorry, what are you doing?"

"Driving."

"Wait, hold on..." He glanced to his body man and back to her. "Who said you get to drive?"

"I asked Jim if I could drive one of the cars out to my parents' and he said it was okay."

"Jim!"

"It's nothing but open highway and she's been cleared as zero threat to your safety." His response was matter of fact. "What can I say?"

"What can you..."

"See," Maddie grinned. "We should get Jim a Team Maddie shirt," she slid into the car as they laughed.
"Of course, if you prefer, we can take the other car," Jim suggested. "Sir."

"Yeah," Maddie smiled at him. "You and your three friends can take the other car and I'll meet you there."

"Oh is that so?" He smirked and stepped to the passenger door.

"Get in the car Wales!"

"Mighty bossy, no?" He raised his eyebrows as he climbed into the passenger seat; Jim slipping in behind him. Brad and Nathan would be following them in the car behind.

"Your title means nothing here," her smile was smug as she leaned across the seat to kiss him. Starting the ignition, she sighed and pulled away from the curb. Harry couldn't help but be taken by how free and relaxed she looked; ready to see her home and her family.

Harry could tell as they grew closer and closer to Maddie's mother's home; the excitement was evident on her face, in her mannerisms. Her knee was bouncing slightly, her lip pulled into her teeth. He chuckled as he watched her.

"Hey..." His hand reached out to steady her knee. "I thought I was the only one who was supposed to be nervous."

"Hmmm," she grinned at him; glancing down at his hand on her knee. "I'm not nervous. I'm anxious and...wait. You're nervous?"

"Of course I'm nervous."

"I thought mothers loved you."

"They generally do," Harry nodded.

"Hey..." Maddie watched him for a moment. "This is not a big deal. You've met Presidents and Sultans and..."

"It's different," Harry ran a hand through his hair. "Before I meet Presidents and...Sultans? Really? You think I've met a lot of Sultans?"

"Well, maybe not a lot," Maddie shrugged. "Haven't you?"

"Not really..." He laughed; bringing his hands together in front of him. "Usually I go into those meetings having read up on the people I'm about to meet."

"Maybe you should have asked Thomas to write up a memo on my mother," Maddie's lips twitched into a smirk.

"Don't laugh," Harry's eyes narrowed playfully. "I thought about it. I really did."

"You'll be fine," she laughed. "I don't know what you're so worried about."

"No?" He raised his eyebrows. "You weren't nervous meeting my family?"
"I was ambushed with the majority of your family," she laughed. "Think about it. I woke up in the hospital and met William; hospital gown and all. Then, I came back from my doctor's appointment and made an absolute fool out of myself in front of your father and Camilla." Harry started to laugh at the reminder. "I didn't have time to really be nervous about it."

"But you did alright with my granny," his hand moved back to her knee.

"I did alright with The Queen," one hand dropped from the wheel to pat his. "And you'll do alright with my mother...what worries you the most?" He swallowed and looked out the window.

"That she googled me," Harry breathed. "That she's read up on me and has already formed an opinion."

"She has already formed an opinion," Maddie squeezed his fingers. "A great one. Don't forget that you were on the phone with her three times a day for those first few days after I was shot. Don't forget that when I was trying to decide what to do next, it was my mother who threw her full throated support to London...and that wasn't because she's a fan of Big Ben, if you know what I mean. She does have an opinion of you already, but it's...God Harry, it's a great one."

"Yeah?" He smiled, taking her hand in his.

"Mmm," Maddie nodded. "Besides, my mother doesn't google things."

"Okay," Harry laughed and relaxed a bit. Maddie studied him from the corner of her eye; certain this was the first time she had seen his ego shaken slightly. "Now you said that your uncle is going to be here?"

"Yes. My uncle Patrick, my dad's brother."

"The financial planner who lives in...Denver?"

"Yes," Maddie nodded. "He does but he has clients in town and stops in to check on my mother. He was going to be there for dinner anyway."

"And your cousin..." Harry's lip pulled into his mouth as he thought about it. "Gary. The farmer."

"He lives on a small plot of land not far from my mother and when my dad died, he took over management of the farm; logistically."

"And he's married."

"To Jenna."

"And they'll be at dinner tonight?"

"They will," Maddie grinned. "And that's it for today. You'll meet everyone else when we're in Denver on Saturday."

"Okay," Harry let out a breath and smiled. "I can handle four people."

"That's the spirit," Maddie smirked.
"What about the others?"

"My cousin Kyle is an architect. He lives in Denver with his girlfriend Amy. And then there's Derek. He's married to Dena. They have two little kids; Molly and Casey. And finally, my grandmother; Ruth. But I can tell you all about them before we head to the city Saturday morning."

"Or you could tell me now..."

"I can't," Maddie shook her head with a wide smile and pointed to a gated entrance just off the road. "We're here."

"We're..." Harry looked just past the gate. There was a long drive through trees and then a large house at the top of a hill. "...here." Maddie entered the code to the gate and waited for it to open before she pulled inside and pulled over.

"Okay, listen..." Putting the car into park, she turned to face him; forgetting Jim in the backseat. "You are an amazing man. You are a Captain in the British Army. You've lead men in battle. You've formed a charity to help the poorest children in the world. You spend your time ping-pong between serving your country in the military and serving the people as an ambassador of...good. Harry. You are a Prince and yet, you came to the corner of the world and played in the dirt and made me fall for you; made me follow you...made me..." She took a breath and looked towards the house. "My mother told me to be where you are. My mother who, after I was shot, wanted me to move into my old room and never leave the house again...told me to move to London to be with you. She already loves you. She already thinks you're an amazing man and...and she's right." Maddie's eyes met his wide, watery eyes. He wasn't used to hearing such things. "Now come on. You got this." With a quick kiss to his lips, Maddie turned back to the wheel and began up the drive. Harry took a breath and tried his best to calm his pounding heart.

The gravel under the tires crunched as they drove; the trees offering something of a shaded path under the hot summer sun. Looking out the window, Harry took in the view. There were acres and acres of sprawling land out front; trees, wild flowers, what appeared to be a stream through the property. Looking forward, he could see the large house—more modern than the image that came to mind when one thought of a farm house. Behind it was a hint of the barn and typical farm accompaniments. In front was a good sized, well-manicured lawn and a wrap-around porch. And on the porch—he took a deep breath—was Maddie's family.

He spotted her mother instantly; she had the same eyes and the same mess of hair on her head. She was standing at the railing, waving to the cars as they approached. Despite his nerves, he couldn't help but warm at how excited Maddie's family was to see her.

"That's my mom," Maddie pointed out unnecessarily.

"She's beautiful."

"She's nervous," Maddie parked the car and turned a wide, bright smile to him. "Go easy on her okay?"

"Me?!" He laughed.

"She's never met a Prince before and you can be intimidating and..."

"Come on," Harry grinned and took her hand; enamored by her sudden need to protect her mom.
"Let's go meet your mother."

Without another thought, another word, Maddie opened the door, stepped out of the car and rushed across the gravel into the grass; stepping right into her mother's waiting arms. Harry was thankful for the sunglasses as his eyes teared up embarrassingly at the scene on the lawn. He stood off to the side with his three security officers as Maddie hugged and kissed her mother; both women wiping at tears and sighing over the other. And when Maddie took her mother's hand and turned to look at him, he took a deep breath and pulled his sunglasses from his eyes.

In meeting Maddie's mother, he wasn't sure what hit him the most; the pride in Maddie's eyes as she looked at him, the welcoming way her mother accepted him into her home or the way his heart ached at the gravity of the moment—at the history he already had with her mother, sharing news with her of Maddie's injuries, knowing it was her he had to thank for sending Maddie to him. But he didn't have time to sort it out in that moment, he just let it all hit him.

"Mom, I would like you to meet Harry Wales," Maddie's eyes twinkled as she introduced him as he had asked her to. "Harry, this is my mother; Hannah Forrester."

"It's nice to finally meet you Harry," her mother smiled as she extended a hand to the young man in front of her.

"The pleasure is all mine," Harry took her hand in both of his.

"I appreciate you bringing my daughter here for her birthday."

"It was no trouble at all. Thank you for welcoming us into your home; all of us." He gestured towards the three security officers with him.

"I'm happy to have you," she smiled to the three men. "All of you." Harry stepped back then as Jim stepped forward.

"Mrs. Forrester, this is Jim Anderson, he's the head of my Security Team."

"Mrs. Forrester," Jim stuck out his hand. "We've spoken on the phone a few times."

"Yes," she smiled; amused at the formality and propriety that was unfolding in front of her.

"Ma'am, this is Brad Fitzgerald and Nathan Woodford." The two stepped up to shake her hand and offer hellos before Maddie's mother clapped her hands together and smiled at Jim.

"Well, why don't I take you inside so that you can look around and get set up," she leaned to kiss Maddie's cheek. "You can introduce Harry to Patrick, Gary and Jenna. Oh!" She turned to them all then. "One more thing. I would rather prefer to be called Hannah, Mrs. Forrester is so..." She let off with a shrug; something Harry had seen Maddie do on numerous occasions.

"I'm sorry ma'am" Jim shook his head. "We're simply not allowed to do that; regulations."

"Fair enough," she nodded and looked to Harry.

"I'm not sure if my upbringing is going to allow me to actually do that," Harry laughed. "But I'll try."

"Please do," her eyes gleaming alongside her smirk. "Or I just may be forced to call you your highness for the rest of your trip,” Harry's eyes flashed wide for a second before he saw Maddie's lips twitch out of the corner of her eye. She was sassing him.

"Wow..." He chuckled; shaking his head.

"It's your royal highness," Maddie corrected her mother with a matching smirk.

"Ah yes," Hannah nodded, managing not to laugh as she winked at Harry. "Well, we'll see how it goes." She patted his arm and turned to Jim. "Gentlemen, right this way." Jim and Brad followed as Nathan stayed behind with Harry who turned to Maddie with an amused expression.

"That wasn't so bad, was it?" She smiled up at him as she took his hand.

"No, no," he shook his head; allowing her to pull him towards the house. "Also, it's very clear from where you get your sass."

"Hmmm..." She laughed. "She's much better at it than I. You should keep on your toes."

"Thanks for the warning."

"No problem. Ready for round two?"

"Absolutely." When they reached the bottom of the stairs, they were met by the rest of the group. Maddie dropped his hand to hug them; first the older man, then the younger, and finally the young woman.

"Everyone, this is Harry. Harry, this is Patrick, Gary, and Jenna." Maddie smiled wide. "Go easy on him. He's nervous and mom's already messing with him."

"Thank you," Harry narrowed his eyes at her before stepping forward to greet them as they laughed. He could already tell; the fiery personality that he loved so much about Maddie was something that came from her family. And he was in for quite the weekend.

And it had only just begun.
Chapter 47

After rounds of introductions and an all-clear from Jim, they entered the large house that Maddie’s parents had built when she was in high school. Her family stepped aside and allowed them to unpack and settle into their rooms. The three bedrooms upstairs would be occupied by Harry and his team; one for Harry, and the other two for the three security officers to do with as they wished. Maddie would be sleeping in her old room on the main floor with her mother in the master suite in the walk out basement. Maddie had sighed internally when her mother had directed her to her old room and Harry upstairs, but complied without argument.

When they finished settling in, the group from England made their way back to the main floor where they were greeted with a festive atmosphere. There was lively music and the savory aroma of dinner. Hannah had opened up the glass doors that made up the entire back wall of the main level of the house and they had all moved outside. There was a massive deck built off the back. On it was a built in grill, a long, heavy table with chairs all around and a few grouped seating areas with outdoor couches and chairs. The home was beautiful. Hannah had a flare for design; making everything impeccable. Maddie had always been impressed; having completely missed that particular gene.

Maddie met up with Harry and his team; already settled on the deck with her family. Everyone was relaxed—drinks were being passed while Gary manned the grill. Maddie stepped up behind Harry; her hand falling to his shoulder. He looked up with a smile at her touch.

"How is everything?" Maddie looked around.

"Everything’s great," Hannah grinned at the two of them and then nodded to Maddie. "Dinner's ready. Maddie, would you come and help me bring out some of the side dishes?"

"Here, let me help you," Harry moved as if to rise from his chair.

"Oh no," Hannah shook her head with a laugh. "You're a guest in this house. You stay put. Besides, it'll give Maddie and I a moment to catch up."

"Exactly," Maddie patted Harry's shoulder. "You stay put and I'll be right back. You'll be okay?"

"Of course he'll be okay," Patrick waved her off with a laugh. "What do you think we're going to do to him? Other than get him drunk and tell him stories about you as a child. Would you like a beer?" He offered a bottle to Harry.

"Yes, thank you," Harry grinned and took the beer. "I think I'll be fine." He appreciated her concern, though having now met them, he was completely at ease. "Besides, I would love to hear stories about you as a child."

"That's what I'm afraid of," she glared playfully at her uncle. Patrick offered bottles to Harry’s team, though they politely declined. "And you should wait for the stories until I'm here to defend myself," she warned her uncle; though as she followed her mother into the kitchen, she could hear laughter erupt from outside. And she knew better.

"Oh lovely," Maddie groaned; as Jenna looked up from the salad she was mixing with a smile.

"You didn't think you would have him here for five days and manage to keep them from talking, did you?"

"No," Maddie groaned again, this time with a laugh. "Though I didn't think it would start on night one."

"So naïve," Jenna winked and Maddie laughed; so thankful for the close, though feisty, family she had.

"Soooo..." Maddie's voice lowered as she slid up next to her mother and Jenna at the counter. "What do you think?"

"Oh my goodness, Madeline," Hannah glanced towards the deck and lowered her voice. "He is so...charismatic."

"I know," Maddie grinned at her mother.

"He's polite and well-spoken and..."

"And he's unbelievably hot," Jenna added.

"Jenna!" Hannah's eyes went wide.

"Sorry but he is." "He really is," Maddie chuckled softly and focused on her mother. "Are you feeling better now that you've met him?"

"Yes," she sighed. "I know you think I'm crazy because I was nervous, but he is a Prince."

"Yeah, but, he's a Prince that's dating Maddie," Jenna offered. Maddie's eyebrows lifted; smirk in place. "Sorry! What I meant is that...Maddie's not going to bring home some pompous ass. Prince or not—she's too good for that."

"Aw, thank you," Maddie wrapped her arm around Jenna's shoulders for a side hug.

"Well, Prince or not...hot or not..." Hannah glanced between the two women. "He looks at you..." She grew silent as her emotions bubbled to the surface and Maddie knew without knowing that she was thinking of her father. "He just..." Hannah swallowed a lump in her throat and smiled. "He really looks at you."

"Mom..." Maddie's voice wasn't much more than a cracked whisper.

"None of this," Hannah waved her hand in front of her face and reached for a bowl. "Come on. We need to get this stuff outside or he's going to think we're in here talking about him." And then, with bowl in hand, she turned and left Maddie and Jenna standing in her wake.

"Well..." Maddie cleared her throat and reached for a tray of food. "I'm pretty sure he knows that we're talking about him because, not only is he polite, well-spoken..."

"And hot," Jenna supplied.

"And hot," Maddie agreed. "He's also brilliant."
"Of course he is," Jenna rolled her eyes with a laugh; lifting a bowl from the counter. "Incidentally...I'm pretty sure Gary has never really looked at me."

"Ha!" Maddie laughed; knowing better than that. "Come on. Let's go." Jenna followed behind Maddie in a trail of laughter. Laughter that was overshadowed by that just outside the doors. As Maddie stepped outside, placing her bowl on the table, the laughter only increased.

"Okay," Maddie sighed into her seat next to Harry. "What did you tell him?"

"Nothing," Gary shook his head and pointed at Harry. "He told us."

"Oh God..." She groaned and looked to him. "What did you tell them?" Harry smiled lovingly at her; wrapping an arm around the back of her chair.

"They asked how we met..." Harry shrugged innocently.

"And you told them..." Maddie sighed, reaching for a drink.

"That you bossed me around from the very beginning."

"And we were not surprised," Gary shook his head as a bubble of laughter rounded the table; plates being filled.

"Not in the least," Harry looked to her with a smirk. "Turns out you were an incredibly bossy child."

"I was the only girl around for years. I had to be bossy," she defended.

"Hey, I told you, I'm a fan of the bossy."

"Oh! That reminds me," Maddie turned to Jenna who sat across from her. "We were at the airport and we saw this girl wearing a shirt that said Team Maddie. It was really strange and...I'm not up on what's happening these days. You know anything about it?"

"Ha!" Jenna laughed and swallowed the food in her mouth before she continued. "Actually, I do know what you're talking about. You really want to get into it?"

"No?" Maddie eyed her. "Yes."

"Well," Jenna smiled at Harry in an apologetic way; slightly shy and a little embarrassed about how much she knew about him and his family and his reported courtship with Maddie. "It all started when magazines and newspapers started reporting about you and a mystery blonde..."

"Newspapers?" Gary nudged his wife playfully.

"Fine," she rolled her eyes. "Mostly magazines. And gossip blogs. Anyway, once it was reported that the mystery blonde was an American, people went crazy..."

"People?" Gary laughed and Hannah smacked his arm.

"Girls," Jenna nodded, knowing he was right. "Mostly girls went...crazy."

"Good crazy or bad crazy?" Maddie asked.
"I'm not sure there's a distinction in this sense," she laughed. "They love that you're dating an American and, once they had your name," Jenna gestured to Maddie and sighed. "There was this big movement...a show of support for you. For...Maddie..." Jenna rolled her eyes. "Can I just say, it's incredibly strange that it's you who I'm talking about."

"I know," Maddie smiled sweetly; she understood how surreal it could all seem.

"I think they felt like...if Harry...if you would date an American, that somehow translated to them having more of a chance with you than they thought."

"Really?" He laughed. "I would think that me dating anyone would mean there was less of a chance."

"Logically, sure," Jenna grinned and shrugged. "Though you can't always factor logic into these things."

"I suppose not."

"At any rate, there's a Maddie fanbase now. You have...you have fans. You're actually quite popular in the U.S."

"Does anybody else find that incredibly weird?" Maddie chuckled as her family raised their hands; smiles in their eyes.

"Absolutely," Jenna laughed. "I mean. I've always been a fan, but it seems that the membership has grown since you...ahem...bagged a prince." Clearly Maddie and her mother weren't the only ones with sass.

"Wow..." Harry's eyes grew wide with humor as laughter rumbled around the table.

"Sorry," Jenna's eyes were apologetic though her lips turned up in a smile—as though she was testing his sense of humor, seeing if he could hang with the spirited family she had grown to love.

"Don't worry about it," he shook his head; amused by it all. "Tell me though, how do I get my hands on one of these shirts?"

"What?" Maddie laughed at him. "You're joking."

"Not at all," he shook his head. "If anyone's Team Maddie, it's me. In fact, I think I should be the Captain of the team." Even Hannah laughed at the expression on her daughter's face.

"Lovely." Maddie wasn't sure if she should be impressed or concerned.

"I can probably help you out with that," Jenna nodded to Harry; smiling at the unspoken interaction between the two of them.

"Excellent." Harry clapped his hands together.

"Jenna," Maddie eyed her.

"What do you want from me?"
"A little support would be nice."

"I'm not sure how much more supportive I can be, I already own a Team Maddie shirt." Harry nearly spit his drink as laughter escaped his mouth. The rest of the family joined in on the laughter; the banter and Harry settled into his seat—feeling at home, in his element. He shook his head with a grin; Maddie's family would fit in well alongside his friends—even give Bishop a run for his money.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

Later that night—long after Patrick, Gary and Jenna had gone home, Hannah smiled at Maddie and Harry and brought an end to the conversation she was enjoying; hearing about Bendal and London and Maddie's new life. She was in awe at the new things her daughter was doing, at the people she was meeting. She wanted to know more, so much more, but she was exhausted and had a big day the next day. So, reluctantly, she excused herself—ready for bed. She leaned to kiss Maddie's cheek, patted Harry's shoulder and then, with a yawn she made her way towards the stairs, towards her suite. Maddie watched as her mother disappeared before she turned tired eyes to Harry.

"Well, Wales..." She yawned; leaning closer to him. "I think we can call today a success."

"Agreed," Harry's arm dropped from the back of the couch to hug her shoulders; pressing a kiss to her forehead. "Your family is amazing."

"No arguments from me," she shook her head and ruffled his hair. "You're not so bad yourself."

"I do what I can," he laughed through a yawn.

"Come on," Maddie scooted off the couch, pulling him behind her. "Let's get to bed. It's late; even later in England and..."

"Whoa..." Harry tugged on her arm; halting her on her way up the stairs. "Where do you think you're going?"

"To your room," Maddie gestured.

"No, no, no." Harry shook his head; dropping her hand from his, crossing his arms across his chest.

"What?" She almost laughed.

"Your mother was incredibly clear, Madeline. You sleep downstairs, I sleep upstairs."

"You're joking."

"I am not," he shook his head. Maddie studied his face; her jaw falling open. He wasn't.

"Harry!" She exhaled, stunned. "When we were at Highgrove, you were the one who..."

"That was Highgrove," he shrugged.

"What does that mean?" She mimicked his shrug.
"That this is your mother's house and if you don't see the difference than...well I'm afraid I can't help you. But there is absolutely no way you are sleeping up there with me tonight."

"I cannot believe this," Maddie shook her head in disbelief.

"Believe it," he relaxed slightly then, moving to her. "Now kiss me love, it's late and we're exhausted and I need my rest in order to keep up with your family tomorrow."

"We'll be mostly alone tomorrow," Maddie allowed him to pull her into his arms. "Mom has class most of the day and then her book club. I told her not to cancel. It'll be mostly you and I. I thought I would show you around..." She sighed. "You're really not going to let me into your room tonight?"

"No," he shook his head and kissed her. "Thank you for being disappointed about it though."

"I'm going to remember this for later," she smiled despite herself as she kissed him again.

"I have no doubt," he chuckled and then, with one final kiss, he stepped from her arms. "Good night love."

"Good night," Maddie watched with a slight pout as he moved up the stairs. She stood, slightly frustrated and incredibly happy, alone on the main floor of the house for a moment before she scooped a blanket from the back of the couch, wrapped it around herself and moved towards the stairs to her mother's room. She knocked softly and waited for her mother to allow her in before she stepped through the door.

"Hi," Maddie smiled sleepily. Hannah was already in bed with the lights off. "Can I..."

"Come on," Hannah chuckled and pulled back the covers. With a wide smile, Maddie hurried to climb into bed with her mother. No matter how old Maddie was, no matter how educated, how long she had been away, what she had seen—she would always seek and find an indescribable comfort climbing into bed with her mother. She tugged the blankets up around them and rolled to her side to look at her mother.

"So..." Maddie's voice was soft; speaking to the vulnerability she felt in that moment. "Do you like him?"

"Oh Maddie," Hannah chuckled softly; reaching out to tuck a strand of hair behind her daughter's ear. "Since when did you care what I thought of who you were dating...or what you did for that matter? You have always been strong and independent and self-reliant and..."

"Mom," Maddie cut in, reaching for her mother's hand; her eyes wide and childlike—so serious her mother stopped talking. Seeing the questions she wasn't asking, seeing the feelings she couldn't quite articulate, Hannah reached out and cupped Maddie's cheek in her hand.

"Oh honey, I love him." Maddie's wide smile shone even in the dark.

"Okay," Maddie breathed; feeling relief and reassurance and confirmation of what she already knew to be true. Letting out a deep breath, she leaned to kiss her mom and slipped from her bed. As she crossed the room towards the door, Hannah sat up in bed and cleared her throat.

"I especially loved that he rebuffed your multiple attempts to sneak upstairs to his room," Maddie stopped dead in her tracks and cringed; feeling like she had just been caught sneaking in after breaking curfew. "Good night Madeline."

"Good night mom," Maddie called out; hurrying from the room—her mother's laughter following her up the stairs.

It was around two in the morning local time when Harry woke; restless and unable to fall back asleep. It made little sense; he was tired, the bed was amazingly comfortable and the quiet, calm air was perfect for slumber. As he sat up in the bed, he looked to his side and he knew; it was her presence that he missed. Mumbling about karma, he rose from his bed and walked through his door to the one next to his—designated for the on duty agent—and knocked softly. Nathan was on that night; watching TV and eating popcorn.

"I can't sleep," Harry's voice was low. "I'm just going out onto the back deck and get some air."

"Sure," Nathan nodded and rose to his feet. Harry smiled sheepishly and made his way downstairs. Nathan eased onto the sofa, content with watching Harry through the glass doors.

Slipping outside, he pulled a sweatshirt over his head, shut the door behind him and looked out at the night sky. The stars were bright and he was sure he could see for miles.

"Trouble sleeping?" Maddie's mother startled him as she called out. Harry's eyes whipped to where she sat on an outdoor couch; feet tucked up underneath her with a blanket on her lap.

"A little bit, yes," he nodded.

"Join me?" She waved her hand at the spot next to her.

"Sure," Harry moved to sit down; smiling at her as he did. They sat that way for a moment; quiet and peaceful before Hannah took a breath and looked to him.

"You know, I realized that not once this evening did I find a moment to thank you."

"Thank me?" Harry's eyes went wide. "Whatever for?"

"For what you did in Bendal," Harry felt his heart ache as Maddie's mother's eyes filled with tears; ached at the shared memory, the shared pain. "I was so incredibly worried about her; being so far away and in so much..." She wiped at her eyes and sniffed. "And your updates and knowing you were there and that you...that you cared about her...made it infinitely easier to handle."

"I'm not sure what to say..." Harry took a breath and tried for a smile. "I was happy to do it. Well, not happy but..."

"I understand," she interrupted; her hand reaching out to pat his before reaching to the table next to the couch to a large, stone box. Opening the lid, she pulled out a box of cigars and an ashtray. "Do you mind?"

"No, of course not," Harry shook his head. "I didn't know that you smoked."

"I don't," she smiled wistfully. "Not really I don't. Only these..." She pulled two cigars out of the box and held one out to him. "Would you care for one?"
"Ha..." He chuckled; giving it only a moment's thought before he shrugged and gave in. "Why not."

"That's the spirit," quite expertly, she cut the tips and handed him a cigar and the lighter.

"Thank you," Harry lit hers and then his; easing back into the couch—wishing Bishop could be there to see him, smoking a cigar with Maddie's mother at two in the morning.

"Maddie doesn't know I do this," she confessed as she exhaled. "She would be...disappointed if she knew." Hannah was looking up at the stars as she spoke to Harry. "Her father smoked them."

"Oh?" Harry's eyebrows lifted. This was the first time she had mentioned her husband in front of him.

"It's not what..." Hannah had to swallow the lump in her throat. "He died of skin cancer, not...not lung cancer." Harry remained absolutely silent as she continued. "He used to have one of these once a week—you know on Friday night. He would pour a glass of whiskey and sit outside and smoke a cigar. After he was diagnosed, Maddie wanted him to stop but he refused..." She laughed lightly. "She gets her stubborn nature from him, you know." She looked up at him then. "So good luck with that."

"Hmmm," Harry smiled; not wanting his words to effect the moment at all.

"He told her he already had cancer so...what was the point?" She took a long drag and blew it up into the sky. "So he continued until he was too sick to come outside. And then when he died..." She looked at the cigar in her hand with a nostalgic smile. "I found this old sweater of his and it smelled like these...like him. And I missed it. So, when I found a couple of these stashed in his office, I lit one and it was...I don't know. It made it easier for just a moment. So now, I have one once a week."

"On Fridays?" Harry asked; having a deep understanding of the rituals that were kept in memory of the dead.

"Yes," she smiled at him. "I do it early in the morning or late at night, so nobody knows."

"Why are you..." Harry met her eyes. "I'm sorry, but why are you telling me this?"

"You seem like somebody who could keep a secret," she smiled warmly. Harry nodded and took a drag.

"Where's the whiskey?" Hannah's smile widened at the way he took mental notes.

"I've never really been much of a drinker. But if you would like one, I could..."

"No," Harry shook his head. "Thank you though. You know...I think Maddie would understand—your wanting to remember him. I think she would get it."

"Maybe," Hannah took one final drag and snuffed the cigar out before she turned her attention to him. "Can I ask you something?"

"You can ask me anything." The unflinching way he said that gave Hannah a moment's pause. Taking a breath, she asked.
"How is she doing over there?"

"She's doing...amazing," Harry's eyes grew soft as he thought of her. "She's working with the children at the hospital and they adore her; of course they adore her. She has this way with kids...it's fantastic to watch actually," he leaned forward; his elbows resting on his knees. "On her days off, she volunteers her time with Veteran's services; helping men and women reintegrate into their previous lives. She is..." He looked up then, realizing that maybe he should be a little embarrassed about going on like that in front of her mother. He blushed slightly as he sat back up. "Sorry. I just...I'm impressed with how well she's adapted to living in London, to being a part of this...craziness that follows me. She's remarkable; there's no way around it." Hannah watched him in silence for a moment; processing it all.

"You really care about her, don't you." It wasn't a question.

"I..." Harry adjusted in his seat. "I love her. Very much."

"I can see that," Hannah nodded.

"You know," Harry took a breath. "I realized that not once this evening did I find a moment to apologize to you."

"Apologize?" She looked to him; shocked. "What do you need to apologize for?"

"For..." He exhaled. "For dragging your daughter into a media frenzy where nothing is sacred and anything goes..."

"Stop," Hannah's hand rested firmly on his arm. "Let's not do this. Maddie is a big girl. She's strong and independent and smart and wily. She's stubborn and relentless and cannot be talked into doing anything she doesn't want to do, much less dragged. And you know that. I know you know that. I can see that you know that. So let's not do this thing where we pretend that you dragged her anywhere. I know my daughter. If anything, she held her head high and walked, willingly, right into the middle of it all." Hannah's lips curled up in a smirk. "She got that from her father too; fearlessness."

"I don't know," Harry smiled warmly at her. "I think I see quite a bit of you in her."

"That's very sweet of you. But if anything, she's inspired it in me...not the other way around," Hannah sighed, squeezed his arm and released it. "Now, I'm going back to bed. I have a full day tomorrow. It was nice sharing a smoke with you Harry."

"Not as nice as it was with you...Hannah." There was a gleam in his eye as he forced himself to call her as she had asked.

"Oh! Well done," Hannah's eyes flashed wide as she leaned in to hug him. "Good night."

"Good night," Harry hugged her back; surprised at the lump that formed in his throat. And then she was gone; leaving him there on the deck with a half smoked cigar, millions of stars, and the undeniable urge to crawl into Maddie's bed and snuggle close.

Snuffing out the cigar, he cleared the ashtray from the table; stuffing it into the large stone box. With a deep, refreshing breath, he stepped back in the house. Had he really just smoked a cigar with Maddie's mother in the middle of the night? As he made his way towards the stairs, Nathan close behind, Harry wasn't entirely sure he wasn't still sleeping.
When Harry woke later that morning, he was refreshed; having slept much better after his encounter with Maddie's mother on the deck. He chuckled at the memory as he rose from bed and made his way into the bathroom attached to his room. After he was showered and dressed casually for the day, he stepped out of his room. With a good morning to Jim, he made his way downstairs; Jim following behind him.

Maddie and her mother were already up; dressed and eating breakfast on the deck. Harry pulled his sunglasses onto his face—was it always this sunny in Colorado—and stepped outside. Both women looked up with matching smiles as he joined them.

"Good morning," Maddie beamed as he moved to the seat next to her.

"Good morning," he leaned to kiss her. "Good morning Hannah." Hannah's eyes met his in a silent thank you.

"Good morning Harry. Good morning Jim," she called out; waving her hand towards the fourth place setting at the table. "Join us, won't you?"

"Thank you Mrs. Forrester," he smiled and sat at the table with the three of them; with quite the breakfast spread available.

"Well kids, I hate to eat and run, but I have things to do today," Hannah wiped her hands and put her napkin next to her plate with a grin. "I'll be in class until four and then I'll be home to change and say hello and then I'm off to meet the girls."

"The girls?" Maddie laughed lightly.

"My book club," Hannah narrowed her eyes at her daughter. "Truthfully it should more accurately be called a wine club, but for appearances sake we bring books..."

Harry laughed. "Sounds amusing."

"It is," she nodded; rising to her feet.

"How long will you be with your...book club?" Maddie watched as her mom moved to hug her.

"Six till Ten," she smoothed her daughter's hair back from her forehead. "But I can always cancel, Madeline. It's very rare that you're in town and..."

"No, no, no," Maddie shook her head. "Don't change your day. I have you all weekend. Besides, I have plans for Harry."

"Ah yes," Hannah winked and patted his shoulder as she passed him. "You two have fun. I'll see tonight."

A chorus of good-byes followed as she slipped back into her house to get on her way. Harry swallowed a bit of orange juice and turned his focus to Maddie.

"So, these plans you have for me..." He began, but her attention was elsewhere.

"Hold that thought," Maddie held up a finger as she watched her mom gather her bag and slip from the front door. "Okay." And when she was sure her mother was gone, she was out of her seat, moving away from the table.

"Where are you going?" He watched with a half a smirk as she moved around the deck, peeking into potted plants, looking under cushions. And when she moved to the stone box he remembered from the night before, his eyes flashed wide under his sunglasses.

"There it is..." Maddie sighed happily; a soft smile covering her face as she pulled the box of cigars from the box. After a moment of silence, she turned to Harry. "My dad used to smoke these and...after he died...my mom started to. I don't know when or really how it started but...I think she does it because she misses him and the smell reminds her so much of him..." Maddie took one out of the box and ran it under her nose; inhaling. "She doesn't know that I know and...I know it's silly, but I kind of like that she still does it. I like that she still misses him. Is that wrong you think?"

"No," Harry shook his head with a warm smile; his mind flashing back to the night before. "I think you're probably right."

"Yeah," Maddie smelled the cigar one more time before she put it back in the box; returning it to the hiding spot. "Okay..." She took a breath and gave him a bright smile. "Where were we?"

"Plans for today," Harry reached for her hand as she moved to stand next to his chair.

"Ah yes!" She grew excited; biting on her bottom lip. "Are you ready for this?"

"I'm not entirely sure," He chuckled at the way she bounced on her feet.

"Today, we are going to be farmers."

"I'm sorry, what?" Harry laughed.

"You heard me right. I gave my cousin Gary the day off. We're going to run the farm." Maddie took a breath. "I know you're no stranger to hard work, Wales and I thought I would show you how things work around here. We're starting with irrigating. We have to go start the water in the corn out back..."

"But..." Harry glanced out over the acres of farm land behind them. "I've never irrigated before. What if I..."

"And I never curtsied before I met you. We learn new things," she smiled smugly. "Now, finish your breakfast. You're going to need your energy. And you're going to get dirty—just in case you want to change. I'm going to go grab my boots and pull the truck around."

"You're incredibly serious, aren't you."
"Are you afraid?" She arched an eyebrow; mounting a challenge.

"Of hard work?" Harry laughed. "No way. Of messing up the farm that helps sustain your family? Absolutely."

"Ha!" Maddie tossed her head back in laughter. "You can't mess it up. I'll be with you the entire time and I know what I'm doing." With a quick kiss to his cheek, she moved towards the house.

"I thought you were a child psychologist!" He called after her.

"I am!" She paused in the doorway to call back. "But before that I was a farmer's daughter. Now finish your food and meet me out front in five minutes."

"Bossy, bossy, bossy," Harry muttered, reaching for a bite.

"You love it!" Maddie laughed as she slipped into the house. Harry chuckled as he shook his head, looking up at Jim.

"I'm going to be a farmer today."

"Very well Sir," Jim smiled; almost unable to hold back his laughter—unable to contain his amusement at the young woman who had been a part of his life for a year. Though he remained silent about his work, about his charge, he had known Harry for years—watched him grow into the man he was now. And he was happy that he had finally found the match he had with the young American. Happy to see the smile on his face, the way the weight had lifted from his shoulders.

Harry had finished his breakfast and gone to change and, when he stepped out the front door, Maddie was waiting with Jim. She had told him where they were going to be and he had agreed to take one of the cars they brought along and wait at the end of the road; feeling comfortable with the safety the property provided and with his view of Harry. Harry rounded the older pick-up truck to where the two of them were standing and about fell over. Maddie, in denim cut off at the knee, a wide brimmed sunhat and red rubber Wellies—he felt his heart jump in his chest.

"Wow..." He breathed as she stepped up to him as Jim moved into the second car. "Look at you..."

"If you're going to make fun of me now, you can just stop. There's mud and water and these are incredibly practical."

"I was not going to make fun of you," his hands moved around her waist, pulling her to him. "I was going to do this..." His lips moved against hers.

"Oh..." She sighed into him; her fingers tugging at his shirt, bringing him closer.

"If you had been dressed like this last night, I'm not sure I would have been able to refuse," he confessed.

"I had no idea you were turned on by farm clothes."

"Neither did I," he shook his head; groaning as she stepped away.
"Sorry," she sighed. "While I would love to run with this new discovery, we have a list of things to do." She reached into the back of the truck and pulled out another pair of rubber boots, in a more muted green color, and handed them to him. "I thought these would fit you. You might need them later."

"They should," Harry took them from her. "Thank you."

"Okay...you ready?"

"Yes?"

"Ha!" She laughed, pulling open the driver's door. "Did you get enough breakfast?"

"Yes."

"Put on sunblock?"

"Mmm Hmmm."

"You love me?"

"God yes."

"Then get in the truck."

With a shake of his head, Harry did as he was told. And his day as a farmer began.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

"Okay," Maddie handed him a slightly bent and curved metal irrigation tube. They were standing along the road at the end of the corn field; rows and rows of corn stretching out in front of them next to the ditch full of running water. Harry took the tube and watched as she began to demonstrate what he needed to do. "Put one hand on the end, flat like this..." He did as she did. "You're going to plunge it into the water like...it's the pressure that's going to make the water suck back in. Watch..." And he did. He watched as she started one, then two, then three irrigation tubes, laying each of them gingerly into their own row; the water trickling out and down the rows.

"Look at you..." Harry was impressed. "How long have you known how to do this?"

"Since I was...five?" She laughed at his expression. "It's your turn." Her hands rested on her hips and she waited. Harry took a deep breath and went for it. She was patient, sweet, as he tried four times before water began to flow back at him. Plopping the tube into a row, he looked up at her with a wide smile.

"I did it!"

"You did," she smiled with pride. "Nicely done."

"I'm a farmer," Harry clapped his hands together.

"Okay..." Maddie laughed. "Let's not get carried away. But it's a great start."
Harry followed along as they continued to start tubes of water and set them in rows; occasionally hopping into the truck to drive further down the road. The focus and precision that he had seen in Maddie on numerous other occasions was evident in the way she handled this task as well.

"Harry..." Maddie called from a few feet away. He dropped his tube into a row and looked up to her. "Will you please bring me the shovel from the back of the truck? I need to fix this row..."

"Sure," Harry nodded and did as she asked. Handing her the shovel, he watched as she moved across the ditch; shoveling dirt from one place to another and, when she was finished, she wedged the shovel into the ground and reached for a tube. Setting it, she watched for a moment as the water flowed, making sure the fix would hold. Satisfied, she pulled the shovel from the dirt and hopped back across the ditch. Harry watched; jaw slacked as she put the shovel back in the truck and reached for a bottle of water. He couldn't move; he was transfixed with her. Glancing up at him, she caught him looking.

"What?" She laughed nervously; returning the bottle of water to the cooler in back.

"God, I love you." It was almost as though he could feel himself falling further for her—a feat he hadn't realized was a possibility up until that point.

"You love the plaid shirt and the cut off shorts," she countered.

"I do," he nodded with a smirk. "But..."

"But you would love me even more without them..." She finished with a knowing look.

"You're turning this into something dirty," he shook his head as she moved closer to him. "And it's far from it. I'm impressed with your wide range of abilities, Madeline."

"Well thank you," she tipped her lips up to meet his. "And I'm impressed with how quickly you pick up new things."

"Good..." Harry grinned; pressing his lips to hers one more time before she stepped back.

"Okay, we just need to finish up this row and then we move onto the cows."

"Cows?" Harry's eyebrows arched.

"We have cattle to feed," she called out behind her. "We have eggs to collect and then we head to the horse barn."

"Excellent," Harry took a deep breath; reaching for a few tubes and following where she led.

They had started water on the corn, fed cattle, and collected eggs from the hen house—an experience Harry would rather never repeat again in his life—despite how humorous Maddie found it. They stopped briefly for a quick lunch at the house, changed into more appropriate boots and then they made their way to the horse barn; a place Harry felt instantly more at ease. Walking along the stalls, she introduced him to the horses as they walked and, stopping outside the last two stalls, she smirked when she asked him if he knew how to saddle a horse or if that was delegated to somebody else. With a roll of his eyes, Harry moved to prove something to her. When the horses were saddled, he climbed atop Frankie and followed Maddie who rode Gilly.
They strolled out of the barn, past the corrals, across the bridge over the stream and out onto the untouched part of the property. Maddie brought her horse to a stop and Harry moved up beside her.

"You feel okay?" She nodded to Harry and Frankie.

"Yes," Harry smiled wide; his eyes scanning over the miles of open land.

"We're going to ride the perimeter and check the fence," she informed him, her horse getting antsy underneath her. "Try to keep up." And then with a wink and a slight nudge to Gilly underneath her, the horse broke free—into the run he had been gearing up for since Maddie had saddled him. Harry watched as she rode away from him, watched as she moved easily on the horse—almost able to feel how free she felt with the wind against her face.

"Okay Frankie, it's you and me," Harry chuckled and nudged the horse underneath him. And he was off—chasing Maddie and Gilly, chasing that exhilaration they both felt as they galloped over the land. He could hear Maddie laughing as she slowed to a trot; allowing him to catch up with her.

"Oh my God!" She called out to him. "It's been years since I've done this."

"Years?" He called back. "You were home for a while after you left Bendal, weren't you?"

"Yes. But I was recovering, remember? I couldn't move my arm, much less ride a horse."

"Ah yes," Harry nodded. "You look good on that horse."

"I feel good on this horse," she grinned wide. "Come on, I want to show you something." Harry nodded and let her pull out in front of him. They moved quickly along the fence line—Maddie keeping an eye as they moved. And, when she cut off course, Harry followed behind her. They moved towards the large stream of water that ran through the property; splashing into the water, ducking into the shade. And then they rounded a corner and they were standing below a bluff; as though somebody had come along and taken a chunk from the earth. Harry's eyes went wide as he looked to the west. He could see the mountain range through the clear sky. There was a cluster of trees that grew around a place where the water pooled; where the stream had expanded out. Maddie came to a stop and hopped from her horse. Guiding Gilly to the stream, she let loose the reigns and allowed her to rest, to have a drink. Harry followed suit; patting Frankie's neck before he stepped away—trying to keep track of Maddie.

"Here," she reached back for his hand, pulling him through the trees and around a corner to a wide open meadow; full of flowers and trees and the same amazing view. Harry looked in awe; surprised to find something so lush hidden out here. Maddie pulled him with her to a spot that was shaded by an enormous old tree and she moved to the ground; kicking off her boots, letting her toes sink into the wild grass below her. Without a second thought, Harry joined her; tossing his own shoes to the side. He couldn't stop smiling as he watched her sigh and lay back; flat on the ground. She pulled her sunglasses from her eyes and looked up at the sky; at the leaves as they bristled in the breeze, at the clouds as they rolled by. Her fingers ran over Harry's arm as she smiled up at him. Rolling to his side, Harry leaned on one elbow so that he could watch her—watch her tense-less face, watch her take deep breaths of the fresh air, watch her as she processed the memories that came with this spot.

Rolling to her side, she leaned up, mimicking his position. When she spoke, her voice was laden with nostalgia and memories; instantly bringing him in.

"I used to spend entire summers out here," she met his eyes. "I would help start the water and then head out here while my dad worked. I would bring toys and books and lunch. Sometimes I would stay all day..." She chuckled. "My mom would be so mad when I came back after dark. That was the rule; home before the sun went down. But I would just get so...lost. In my head, in what I was doing." She nodded towards a tree in the distance. "My dad built me a house in that tree..." She pointed. "You can still see part of it. And there's a tire swing over there..." She moved her finger. "Down by the water, there's a bit of a beach. Well...it's not a beach, but it's sandy and every year we would all come out, cousins and uncles and...and we'd have this big party with a bonfire and hot dogs and s'mores and..."

"S'mores?" He raised his eyebrows.

"You've...sorry..." Maddie sat up. "You've never had a s'more? It's...a graham cracker with chocolate and a marshmallow that has been toasted over a campfire and...wow. I guess I know what we're doing tonight."

"Hot dogs and s'mores?" Harry took a guess.

"See..." Maddie nudged him with her shoulder. "You pick up things incredibly easily." Her head dipped to kiss him. "Come on. Let's finish checking the fence. We have to collect the irrigation tubes and check the garden and then I think we'll be done for the day."

"Really?" Harry followed her as she stood.

"Mmm. We can shower, say hello to my mother and then...we'll be back."

"To start a fire?"

"Just a small one," she giggled. "Don't worry, Wales. I know what I'm doing."

"I can see that."

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

They finished their chores, they showered and dressed and they spent a little time with Hannah before she grabbed her book and a bottle of wine and bid them good night. Maddie called her cousin Gary and Jenna and invited them over for a fire by the stream. Then the two of them, along with Jim, went into the one grocery store in town to buy the additional items they would need for the night. It was a little under three hours before a picture of them appeared on twitter; laughing and holding hands while they filled their basket—completely oblivious to the young girl with the camera phone.

They bundled up with warmer clothes, loaded up the trailer to the four wheeler and then, along with Gary and Jenna and Brad and Nathan (Jim was taking some down time) they made their way out to the meadow. As Maddie and Gary arranged the wood for a fire, Jenna stepped up to Harry with a lowered voice.

"I wanted to let you know that I brought what you asked for. They are in a bag that I gave to...Nathan." She pointed.

"Excellent," Harry clapped his hands together with a big smile. "That's amazing. Thank you Jenna. Did Nathan pay you for them?"

"Yes he did."

"Fantastic. It's really great of you to do this for me."

"Not a problem just...when she finds out, if you could keep my name out of it..."

"Ha!" Harry laughed with her. "I'll do my best."

"Thank you."

"We got it!" Maddie called to them as bright flames flew up; lapping at the night sky. And the memories kicked off. As they settled into their chairs and ate their campfire food, Gary and Maddie reminisced about their childhood; something Harry was sure would reoccur the next day when they spent time with the rest of their family.

And he took it all in; the way they interacted, the way they loved each other, the way they poked fun, the way they supported, the way they made sure to include him and his security officers in on the revelry. They ate and drank and laughed until the fire began to dwindle and Jenna stood, beckoning Gary to take her home. Making sure the fire was out completely, they all loaded up and headed back in.

After Gary and Jenna drove away and Harry's Security team retired to their rooms, Maddie pulled Harry out onto the deck; two glasses of whiskey in her hand. Harry, his heart heavy with what her mother had told him, accepted the glass without question—knowing she was thinking about her father. It was Friday; he had always had a glass of whiskey and a cigar on Friday.

"You okay?" Harry asked; sitting next to her on the double lounger, their feet stretched out in front of them, their shoulders touching.

"Yes," she sighed; turning a smile to him. "Thank you for being such a good sport today."

"It was really no trouble at all," his finger reached out to pull a strand of hair from her face.

"Ah, come on," she nudged him lightly with her shoulder. "It was hard work and you rose to the occasion with no complaints." Her fingers intertwined with his. "My father would have been impressed." She took a sip from her glass; her eyes growing watery. "I'm so happy you came here Harry. I love that you get to know this place; that you get to know where I spent time with him."

"I love that too," he wrapped an arm around her then; pulling her closer. Maddie's head rested back against his shoulder and she looked up at the sky. A quiet peacefulness settled over them as they sat there; bodies pressed together, smiles on their faces—in a happy sort of sleepiness that came with a day well worked, well played.

Harry turned his head to press a kiss to the top of her head; inhaling the mixture of her shampoo and campfire. And his mind wandered over the day, over the irrigation lesson, over the teamwork it took to feed the cattle, over the lack of jokes she had sent his way during his panic in the hen house. He thought about their afternoon ride.

He couldn't get over this new side of her that she had shown him that day; in tune with the land, with the animals—no fear about hard work or exerting energy, though that wasn't entirely new. It was so easy to see how somebody raised in this world wouldn't blink at the hardships that came with going to Bendal. Though her family was clearly comfortable, they were used to a long, hard day outside; cultivating the land. And that had built something inside of Maddie that made her strong and resolute; something she had carried with her to Bendal and even again to London when she was forced to face the press and the scrutiny.

Harry felt his heart swell with love for this woman who laid in his arms drinking slowly from a glass of whiskey, listening to his heart beat in his chest. He didn't know if he wanted to laugh or cry or toss his phone into the stream and never ever return to the life he had in England.

"What's on your mind?" She spoke softly as she looked up at him.

"Hmmm," He pressed his lips together and met her eyes. "I'm not sure you want to know."

"Try me," she smiled sweetly.

"Okay. I was thinking..." He shrugged nervously. "I was thinking that we really need to be sure to spend more time here; come and visit your mother...bring our kids." Maddie nearly spit her whiskey out as he spoke the last words with conviction.

"I'm sorry," she sat up slightly; turning to look at him. "Our kids?" He couldn't help the smile that played on his lips at the look on her face.

"You don't want kids?" He raised his eyes; knowing fully well that she did.

"No I..." She shook her head; trying to steady the sudden spike in her pulse. "Of course I want kids. It was the 'our' part of that sentence that threw me off." Harry nodded, setting his drink on the table next to him and turning very serious eyes to hers.

"You told me I couldn't talk like that anymore until I met your mother. Well, I met your mother, your uncle Patrick. I met Gary and Jenna. Tomorrow I'm meeting the rest of your family and Maddie...I still have every intention of tying you down."

"Harry..." She breathed, tears welling unexpectedly in her eyes.

"I'm serious. Maddie..." He took a deep breath. "In three weeks I'm going to be twenty-nine. Next year I'll be...God I'll be thirty. I know what I want. I'm not messing around here. I'm serious."

"I see that."

"Is that..." His voice caught in his throat as he studied her for a moment. "I'm sorry. Do you not see yourself with me? Do you not want..."

"No," she shook her head quickly; her fingers moving to his lips. "I do. I...of course I do. I just...I try not to let myself go down that road with you. I just never know how things are going to settle and..."

"But you do," he interrupted, a grin beginning to move to his lips at her admission. "You should.
There are things that have to happen, time that has to pass. But Maddie...I have every intention of spending my life with you..." He took a deep breath as the weight of his statement settled over her.
"
...and our six little babies."

"Six?!" A burst of laughter pushed through her lips as she blinked away the tears in her eyes.
"Eight?" He raised his eyebrows hopefully.

"Keep dreaming Wales." She rolled her eyes; breathing in this new reality, this new state of their relationship.

"Fine..." He shrugged and waited; watching as her mind processed it all—waiting for her response. Maddie's smile was small, her heart lodged in her throat as she looked out over the property and then to him. With a deep breath in and slow breath out, she nodded.

"We will definitely bring our children here someday." The certainty in her voice hit him like a truck.

"Yeah?" He was completely unashamed at the tears that rose in excitement.

"Yeah," she sighed; her smile stretching wide at the images it provoked in her mind—Harry running around on the farm with their children. "I can teach them how to irrigate and you can teach them how to ride and..." And Harry's lips were on hers; firm and purposeful—packed full of emotion.

It was quite something, really; finding what you always wanted, what you never thought you would find...at least without compromise. And there were no words, no words that could adequately convey that feeling to her. So he moved out of his head and lead with his heart. Pulling her to him, her lips opening under his, he couldn't be close enough. So he tightened his hold on her and only hoped she could feel his heart beating in his chest; knowing she had heard his words, understood his intentions and was still there—clutching at his shirt as she kissed him back.

Chapter End Notes

I do hope you're enjoying the story!
Maddie woke on Saturday morning to a soft knock at the door. Groaning, she rolled over; covering her head with her pillow. It was barely light out and much too early, though she should have known; should have expected. The knock at the door returned and Maddie surrendered.

"Come in!" Refusing to open her eyes; she knew who it was.

"Madeline Jay Forrester..." Hannah's voice was soft, smiling, as she stepped into the room and Maddie couldn't help the grin that pushed at her lips, despite her desire to sleep longer. She felt the bed nudge as her mother sat next to her; her hands moving lovingly over her back to move the pillow. "Guess what day it is..."

"Saturday," Maddie grumbled and Hannah chuckled and took a breath before she began singing.

"Happy Birthday to you, happy birthday to you, happy birthday dear Maddie..." She leaned over to kiss Maddie's head. "Happy Birthday to you."

"Thank you," Maddie rolled over in bed to smile up at her mother. "But must you wake me every year at the precise time I was born just to sing to me?"

"I must," Hannah smiled at her daughter. "I thought about waking Harry to come with me but then I thought...what if he sleeps in the nude and..."

"Mother!" Maddie swatted at her mother who was laughing; knowing that would wake her up.

"And that would be terribly awkward."

"Yes, it would," Maddie sat up in her bed.

"Happy birthday darling."

"Thanks mom," Maddie hugged her mother; close and tight.

"So, it's your birthday, your rules." Hannah rose to her feet. "What would you like for breakfast?" Maddie grinned wide; having always loved the birthday rule when she was young.

"Anything?" Maddie raised an eyebrow.

"Anything."

"Birthday cake." Hannah rolled her eyes but nodded; rules were rules.

"What kind of birthday cake?"

"Ummmm..." Maddie's mouth twisted as she thought. "Red velvet with cream cheese frosting."

"As you wish," she shook her head as she moved towards the door. "Are you going back to sleep?"
"Nah," Maddie yawned but pulled back the covers. "I'm awake. I think I'll have coffee and help you make cake."

"Wonderful," Hannah waited for her daughter; wrapping her arm around her shoulders as they padded down the hallway to the kitchen. Maddie pulled up a stool at the bar at her mother's insistence and waited for the coffee to brew while her mother mixed up the cake.

The two women were still in the kitchen, drinking coffee as Hannah prepared to pour the cake into the pan, when Harry joined them. He looked fresh from bed in long flannel pants and a t-shirt and messy hair.

"What is going on in here?" He looked at the bright red batter in Hannah's bowl.

"I'm making red velvet cake," she smiled up at him.

"For breakfast?" He laughed and turned to Maddie, "Happy Birthday love."

"Thank you," Maddie's face brightened as she tipped her head up to kiss him. "Forrester house rules are that, on your birthday, you get whatever you want."

"All day?" Harry raised his eyebrows, taking a seat next to her.

"All day."

"It's going to be a long day, isn't it?" Harry looked to Hannah.

"Oh most definitely," she laughed and moved to put the cake in the oven.

"Well, what can I do? A rule's a rule, right?" Harry smiled at Maddie as a mischievous grin spread across her face.

"That's right Wales." Her mind was already at work with a list of things she wanted to do before the day ended. Having Harry there was only going to be icing on the cake.

Of course, there were plans that had already been made. The three of them, along with Jenna and Gary were going to Denver to attend a baseball game; one of Maddie's favorite pastimes with her cousins. Maddie's uncle Patrick had known the team manager for years and had asked to use a suite for the day; knowing that Maddie would be in town and the particular security concerns that might come along with Harry attending a baseball game. The rest of Maddie's family would be joining them to celebrate her birthday and take in an afternoon game. Harry's security team would all be coming along, though only Brad was on duty and they were incredibly pleased with the security the suite provided. That night Hannah would be staying at Patrick's and, simply for ease of things, Maddie and Harry would be staying at a two bedroom suite at the Ritz downtown with the remaining members of his team across the hall. They would have lunch at her grandmother's on Sunday before heading back to her mom's for their last night in Colorado. Jenna and Gary had taken Hannah with them and Harry and Maddie would be following along with their entourage.

Maddie dropped her overnight bag in the living room and hurried up the stairs to check on Harry. Knocking on the half open door, she pushed into the room; empty.

"Harry?" She called out.
"I'm in the bathroom," he called back, stepping through the open door as he pulled a ball cap onto his head. Maddie looked to him and about fell over.

"Ohhhhhhh no." She pointed at him.

"Come on," his eyes softened in that puppy dog way he had of getting what he wanted.

"No way. Nuh-uh." She shook her head. "You look..."

"Amazing." He finished for her. "Amazing is the word you're looking for."

"Harry, really?" Maddie couldn't help but laugh at him. "A Team Maddie shirt?!"

"Yes!" He exclaimed; thrilled to have one.

"How in the hell did you even get this...Oh!" Maddie gasped. "Jenna. That..."

"It wasn't Jenna," he scrunched up his face. "I wanted one and now I have one. That's all you need to know."

"And you think you're wearing that to the ballgame?"

"I know I'm wearing it to the ballgame," he smirked.

"You do know that people are going to be there, right?"

"At a Nationally televised professional baseball game?" Harry's eyes flashed wide with sarcasm. "You don't say."

"Somebody might recognize you. Somebody might take a photo of you. In a Team Maddie shirt."

"So?"

"So! You want your picture on twitter in a Team Maddie shirt?"

"Why not?" He shrugged; pulling her to him, his arms circling her waist. "If my picture's going to end up on twitter, why shouldn't it be in a Team Maddie t-shirt? I am Team Maddie! Nobody wants you with me more than I do." Despite her attempts to remain angry at him, she couldn't help the laughter that bubbled up at how incredibly adorable it was to see him mount his defense. "It's incredibly funny and ironic and I thought you would appreciate the sarcasm of it all."

"Harry..." She groaned as his lips dipped to kiss her neck. As her eyes fluttered to close, she caught something out of the corner of her eye that made her eyes flash open; her hands pushed at him.

"Hey!" He watched as she moved to the side of the bed to a bag full of shirts just like the one he was wearing.

She held it up as she looked accusingly at him. "Just how many of these did you buy?"

"I'm handing them out as gifts."
"The hell you are," she shook her head.

"Come on! Ella, Bishop...They are definitely Team Maddie."

"This is so embarrassing..." Maddie huffed; sinking onto his bed.

"Okay..." He grew serious for a moment. "If it really bothers you, I'll take it off. I don't want this..." He gestured between them. "To be any more difficult than it has to be. People are most likely going to recognize us and...there will likely be pictures. So, if the shirt is going to make it worse, I'll take it off."

"Nah," Maddie smiled; shaking her head. "You can wear the shirt. Though..." She rose to her feet, her fingers moving to his chest; tugging at his shirt to draw him closer to her. Her voice lowered as her head tipped to the side. "I would like to reserve the right to remove it from you later."

"Oh you would?" His lips drew up; his eyes gleaming.

"I would," she nodded; her face inching closer to his. "I think it's worth mentioning that we won't be staying at my mother's house tonight."

"No we won't," he shook his head, his nose brushing against hers. "And it is your birthday."

"It is," she grinned. "And you know the rules..."

"You get whatever you want on your birthday."

"I do," and then, with the slightest of tugs, his lips were against hers; a muffled chuckle escaping her lips as he kissed her. It was going to be a great day.

Maddie's afternoon was a whirlwind of activity; she cheered on her favorite team in her favorite sport, she ate nachos and drank beer, and she watched as Harry charmed every last member of her family; one right after another.

He was an instant hit walking in in his t-shirt; bringing yelps of laughter from Maddie's cousins and a smile of pride from Jenna when he pressed kisses to her cheeks thanking her for help with his conspiracy. And then Harry worked the room like a professional; meeting everyone, making jokes, taking notes. Maddie was in awe as it unfolded in front of her.

He lauded Gary for his day to day endeavors on the farm; telling the story of his venture into the henhouse with a self-deprecating swagger that Maddie guessed he kept in his back pocket for moments such as these; moments when he wanted to put everyone at ease, bring everyone around to his side. And he did—so well.

He traded frontline stories with Derek, Maddie's cousin who had served one tour in Iraq before he came home—eventually accepting an honorable discharge when his time was up, to stay closer to his newly pregnant wife. His wife, Dena, was impressed and much more surprised than Maddie, when Harry moved to the floor to play with Molly and Casey. He listened to them describe, in only the detail a 3 and 5 year old could, the adventures their respective dolls had had that day as they came to the ballpark. He laughed when Casey told her very best attempt at a knock-knock joke and, when he thought nobody was looking, he passed them each a piece of Maddie's favorite candy. Maddie wasn't sure which gesture hit her the most; the fact that he was passing candy to two lovely little girls or that he continued to carry her candy with him.

He sat next to her grandmother, Ruth, listening to story upon story about Maddie as a child—occasionally looking in her direction with eyes full of adoration. He laughed with her uncle, he cheered for the team, and he never failed to check in with Maddie; even as he made his rounds through the room. And Maddie wasn't ashamed to admit that she really wanted to smush his face and kiss him senseless.

But the biggest moment for Maddie was when her cousin Kyle, the closest to her of all of them, sat down next to her—after an extensive go round with Harry and Derek—patted her knee and nodded with a grin. He approved. Taking Kyle's hand in hers, she sighed with relief and leaned into his shoulder. That was just what she needed. Kyle and Maddie were born the same year. They went through school together; high school, college, graduate school. He was the closest thing she had to a sibling and his opinions had mattered most to her; second only to her parents'. He was there the night her father died; sitting silently by her side while she fell apart. He was there when she left for Bendal; taking her to the airport, shushing her concerns, and pushing her towards the security line with the tough love she needed. Though Maddie was already one hundred percent convinced about Harry—knowing Kyle liked him made it that much sweeter.

It was midway through the bottom of the seventh when their picture hit the web; sitting next to each other, Maddie in a ball cap and Harry in a Team Maddie shirt, both with beers in their hands and laughter on their faces as they cheered with the crowd for the team below. Even to the most pessimistic of people, they looked happy and adorable.

As the game wound down, Maddie endured a rousing round of Happy Birthday, blew out the candles on her second cake of the day and then her mother and uncle bid their good-byes. They were going to take Maddie's grandmother and the two little girls back to Patrick's house for the night; leaving the cousins to celebrate into the evening. There were hugs and kisses and warnings to behave and then it was just the 'kids'. Maddie and her three cousins; Dena, Jenna, Amy and, of course, Harry.

The game ended in a win for the Rockies when a player hit a home run, bringing in two additional runners at the bottom of the ninth. The entire suite was on their feet cheering and clapping; hugging and laughing. They finished their drinks and made plans for the night. Kyle knew of a place called The Lavender Lady that immediately sparked interest in Maddie and Harry. It was modeled after an old speakeasy. People would enter through what looked like a diner and would need a password to get through the hidden door. They served dinner until some point in the night when the lights lowered and the atmosphere turned into one of innocent debauchery reminiscent of prohibition times. They were in.

Assuring Maddie that it wouldn't be a problem to go out in Denver, Jim took the information down and had Nathan call ahead with their concerns and to make a reservation for the group. Though nobody had any doubt that Harry would be able to get in anywhere—even with his Team Maddie t-shirt on—he and Maddie were going to go shopping before they all met up to go out. As Maddie's cousins went to Kyle and Amy's to get ready, she and Harry, along with Jim, would head out and do some shopping.

As people had discovered Harry's presence at the game, their trip out of the ballpark brought considerably more attention than their trip in. Telling her cousins to meet them at The Ritz when they were dressed and ready to continue the party, Maddie checked her appearance in the mirror, rolled her eyes at Harry's shirt and held tight to his hand as they emerged; moving straight for the cars his team had brought around.
Twenty minutes later she received a text from Ella "Team Maddie!!!! If you don't come back with one of those shirts for me, we're officially over. Looking great Love!"

They had settled into their suite with Jim, Nathan and Brad across the hall. Maddie's cousins were all on their way up as Maddie looked out the huge windows over the city and beyond that to the mountains; having just finished putting on her new party clothes.

"Okay birthday girl," Harry called out to Maddie as he stepped out into the living area; pulling his tie into a knot. "You ready to live it up?

"What do you think?" She grinned impishly. Harry looked up from his tie and took a breath.

"I think you look amazing..." His hands reached for hers, pulling her to him.

"Thank you," she ran her hands up his shoulders as his circled her waist. "You look pretty good yourself."

"Thank you," Harry bent his head to kiss her neck. "You smell fantastic."

"Ohhhhhh..." Maddie moaned; pushing his lips to her skin, immediately catching up to where his mind was at.

"How long do we have before your cousins are here?"

"Not nearly long enough," Maddie shook her head.

"How long?" Harry's hands snuck up underneath her skirt; finding her thigh high stockings attached to a garter belt. "Maddie..." He breathed as his fingers tickled the delicate skin there.

"Less than five minutes," she gasped at the contact.

"You would be shocked and amazed at what I can do in five minutes," his lips found hers with a passion born out of such a great day with an amazing woman.

"Ha!" Maddie's head tossed back in laughter as Harry's lips moved to kiss her throat. Just as she seriously contemplated giving in, there was a knock at the door. With a groan, Harry moved away from her as Jim stepped out of his room and moved to answer the door; allowing Maddie's cousins entrance into the suite.

"Look at you!" Maddie smiled wide as they moved inside. "I don't think I've seen you three looking this good in years," she waved her finger towards the three boys who laughed and rolled their eyes.

"Can I get anybody a drink?" Harry had finished his tie, put on his fedora and was standing at the bar. "Champagne?" He eyed Maddie knowingly. To a chorus of yes's, he opened two bottles as Kyle moved to help him pass out glasses. Once everyone had a glass, Maddie was the first to speak; raising hers in the air.

"To family."

"To...meeting new friends," Jenna smiled at Harry.
"To a night of debauchery," Kyle grinned.

"To Maddie," Harry's eyes grew soft as he looked to her.

A round of cheers, clinking of glasses, and the celebration had begun.

There was this agreement; a sort of understanding that businesses had when recognizable members of society came out. Since they wanted the business, wanted the ability to boast about their high society clientele, they generally went out of their way to make their visit to their establishment as smooth as possible. In return, afterwards, they were free to brag; Prince Harry partied here last night.

And so it went with The Lavender Lady. They agreed to let Harry's team come take a sweep of the place and were exceptionally helpful in gaining a last minute reservation for a large group. Of course they were more than pleased to do what they could to accommodate the Prince and the "Native daughter".

Maddie had an amazing birthday; one for the record books. And it wasn't due to one particular thing—though most of it tied back to Harry.

Harry had flaws, this she knew. Harry came with a lifestyle that was foreign to her, one that required a learning curve on her part. But flaws and all, she believed he was absolutely unparalleled. And that night was no exception.

It wasn't just that he made her cousins feel at ease around him—it was the way he seemed to feel completely at ease around them.

It wasn't just that he shared stories of getting to know her, making her cousins laugh in awe—it was the way he told them with such reverence, with such unabashed love and admiration that she felt her cheeks flush.

It wasn't just that he held doors, stood when she returned to the table, paid attention to everyone else at the table—it was the way he tangled his fingers with hers, pulled her lips to his when nobody was looking; kept in physical contact with her the entire night.

It wasn't just that he had her candy in his pocket the entire night—it was the way he held onto her lip gloss and cigarette case wallet; as if it were the most natural, domestic-like thing in the world.

It wasn't just that he offered to pick up the tab—it was the way he graciously conceded when Kyle insisted.

It wasn't just that he danced with her until two in the morning, ignoring the onlookers—it was the way he held her close, the way he kept eye contact, the way he honored her.

It wasn't just that he walked out of the club ahead of her, taking the brunt of the flashbulbs and the attention—it was that he immediately draped his coat over her lap, helping her avoid any flashes of another kind.

It wasn't just the way he offered a tipsy smile and a wave to the group of girls who called out to him in their hotel lobby while celebrating a bachelorette party—it was the way he held Maddie's hand to his heart as he did.

It wasn’t just that the second they were alone he couldn’t help but kiss her—it was the way he immediately slowed down, wanting to savor the rest of the night.

It wasn’t just that he noticed her vintage seamed stockings—it was the way he pulled them off of her in an agonizingly slow way that made her ache for him.

It wasn’t just that he made it a point to sing Happy Birthday one more time before the night was over—it was that he was kissing his way down her body as he did it.

It wasn’t just that he made her gasp for air and scream his name—it was the way he whispered hers.

It wasn’t just that he helped her work up a sweat, bringing her to her peak twice before he reached his—it was that he brought her water afterwards, pulling her close for sweet, loving kisses.

It wasn’t just one of those things. It was all of it; the beautiful confluence that was Harry.

And it wasn’t just that he was hers—it was that she was his and he made it a point to make it a point. Having her by his side, in his life, seemed to brighten him in ways he had never known. Maddie had no idea at the time the significance of their weekend together; their time out in Denver with her cousins. She had no idea how many photos would surface as a result of her birthday. She couldn’t begin to fathom the responses; the bad (Prince Harry stood for the US National Anthem!), the good (Harry embraced by Forrester Family) and the wonderfully hilarious (Team Maddie has a Team Captain-Wales). The headlines would vary, the speculation would unfurl but there was no denying the love between the two of them in the photos that made it out—no denying the connection they shared.

The next morning, they would wake entangled in the other, they would kiss and tease and shower together. They would dress and pack and make their way to Maddie’s grandmother’s house for lunch with the family where both of them were welcomed with open arms and laughter; the kinship of an extended family already circling around him.

It wasn’t just that her family simply adored him—it was that he adored them too.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

After a long afternoon of food and drinks and the most competitive card game Harry had ever seen outside of professional play, they said good-bye to the Denver cousins and made their way back to Maddie’s home. Harry made up something about needing to catch up on reading and excused himself; wanting to allow Maddie some alone time with her mother before they left for London the next morning.

Though Maddie knew he was lying, she could see it in his eyes, she took the opportunity to have some quality mother/daughter time. They sat on the back deck drinking wine and catching up; laughing with each other until late into the night. It was just past midnight when Hannah held tight to Maddie’s hand as they lay on the lounger. She took a deep breath and watched her daughter’s face closely as she spoke.

"You're not coming back, are you?" Maddie turned her attention from the stars to her mother in the blink of an eye.
"What? Of course I'll come back."

"I didn't mean for a visit..." Though there were slight tears in her eyes, Hannah was smiling with her whole face; her whole heart.

"Mom..."

"It's okay," she squeezed Maddie's hand. "I told you to live your life. I meant it. Is that what you're doing?" Maddie thought about her work at the hospital, her time with Veteran's Services, Harry. She nodded.

"It really is. But, if you want me to..."

"Madeline," her voice was stern; forcing Maddie's eyes to level with hers. They stared at each other for one long, tension filled beat before Hannah relaxed; smiling wide and blinking back tears. "He is a wonderful young man, Maddie. He really is. I mean...I thought so from the first phone call, but this trip he has been quite the gentleman, quite the addition to the family—you know?"

"Yeah?" Maddie raised her eyebrows, surprised at her mother's words.

"Yes," Hannah nodded. Maddie took a deep breath in and let it out slowly; leaning against her mother's shoulder. Hannah pressed a kiss to her daughter's head and then with the tears that always came with this particular topic, she brought him up. "Your father would have really liked him," her voice was low; reverent and Maddie began to cry.

"You think so?" She wiped at her eyes.

"Absolutely," Hannah moved to pull Maddie into a hug. "He would have liked how easy going he is, how quick he is to try new things, the look in his eyes when he looks at you...or when he speaks of you." She took a ragged breath. "They would have got along fantastically, Maddie. I knew him better than anyone and I know that he would have really liked Harry. Take that with you when you're in London, when you're making decisions. I'm standing right behind you—with the spirit of your father."

Without words Maddie settled closer to her mother; feeling years younger than she was. And there they sat in silence, thinking of the man they had both loved and lost, thinking of the new man in Maddie's life, of the new uncertain future that Maddie was facing. Maddie would never in her life be able to find the words to tell her mother how much her words that night had meant to her. She would never be able to articulate what it was like to know that her mother's support was behind her and that, were he there, her father's would be as well.

They sat there until a light snore came from a drifting Hannah. Maddie chuckled lightly and woke her mother; escorting her to her bed. When Hannah was tucked in, hugged, and asleep, Maddie wrapped her blanket around her shoulders and went upstairs. Bypassing the main floor, she continued on to the second floor. With a small nod to Brad who was reading in his room, she went directly to Harry's room.

She was quiet as she shut the door behind her, soft with her footsteps as she moved to his bed. When Hannah was tucked in, hugged, and asleep, Maddie wrapped her blanket around her shoulders and went upstairs. Bypassing the main floor, she continued on to the second floor. With a small nod to Brad who was reading in his room, she went directly to Harry's room.

She was quiet as she shut the door behind her, soft with her footsteps as she moved to his bed. She looked down at him sleeping peacefully; his chest rising and falling with each long breath. Tossing her blanket to the side, she carefully peeled back the blankets and, without a moment of doubt, she slipped into bed next to him; moving right to his side. Snuggling close to him, inhaling his scent, taking in his warmth, she sighed into him. This was exactly what she needed; where she needed to be. Sensing her presence, feeling her there, Harry woke slightly, adjusting in the bed.

"Maddie?" Harry squinted at her. "Is everything okay?" He glanced to the clock; concern filling his voice.

"Yes," she nodded quickly. "I just...I don't want to sleep without you tonight..." He opened his mouth to protest, to remind her of her mother's assignments. "I just want to sleep. Please..." She whispered and he heard the tone of her voice, saw the look in her eye. And he gave in.

"Okay," he smiled sleepily; moving and opening his arms, inviting her closer. "Come on..." And she did. Pressing close to him, she settled into the crook of his shoulder; wrapping her arm around his torso and holding tight. His arm moved around her shoulders and he kissed the top of her head. "I love you Madeline."

"I love you too Harry," her voice was small but packed with emotion. "Good night."

"Good night," he breathed. His fingers ran along her shoulder soothingly, his breathing evened out, his heartbeat steady as Maddie let out a breath and settled in further. Feeling safe and content and happy, Maddie allowed herself to drift to sleep.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

The next morning came much too soon and continued on at that speed. They woke to the alarm he had set the night before. When they joined Hannah in the kitchen, Maddie didn't know if her mother knew they had come from the same room. If she did, she made no mention of it. They had breakfast together; laughing over the events of the weekend, talking about what their respective days looked like. They split; returning to their rooms to dress for the day, to pack their bags and before Maddie could stomp her feet and demand that time slow down, they were standing on the same drive where Hannah had first met Harry.

They spoke words of love, they said their thank you's, they made promises to return and then, amidst tears and hugs and kisses, Hannah watched as her daughter climbed into the car next to Harry, next to the next chapter in her life, and drove away from her. She was so proud of Maddie; living her life. As the car disappeared from her sight, she turned back towards the house with a new found inspiration; more motivation to continue living hers.
Friday

If Maddie's birthday was a representation of the small town, simple life she came from, Harry's was the exuberant opulence of his. As William and Bishop had planned, they would be spending the weekend, Friday through, off the coast of Greece on a large private chartered yacht. At the time Maddie had been so caught up in the nude photo catastrophe that it hadn't really set in just how crazy of a plan it was; how foreign, how elusive.

But that morning when Harry picked her up at her place in shorts, a t-shirt, and a wide smile that already told of a holiday, it started to sink in. And she kind of wished that Ella hadn't made plans to meet Matt's parents; then she would be coming too. But Harry was there and his mood was proving contagious. He was relaxed and casual as he took her bag from her and put in the trunk of the car; winking as she slid into the seat next to him letting out a long breath.

"You okay?"

"Nervous," she smiled with a shrug.

"Nervous?" Harry laughed. "You know everyone who's going to be there. You know them well. There's a captain so, you know...I won't be sailing the boat. That alone should make you feel better..." They both laughed at that. "And Jim will be there," Harry pointed to his officer.

"Hi Jim," Maddie waved.

"Doctor Forrester," he nodded his hello.

"What are you nervous about?" Harry held her hand in his. "I know you know how to swim..."

"I do," she sighed. "I don't know why I'm nervous. Maybe I'm just excited...don't worry about it," she squeezed his cheek lightly. "It'll pass."

"Okay," he agreed; leaning to kiss her. Maddie held tight to his hand as they made their way to the airport; to the waiting private chartered airplane.

It was funny; Maddie couldn't help but chuckle. All of this time she had known Harry, all of this time she had been with him; this was one of the first times when the disparity between her childhood and his hit her with full force. Their car drove right up next to the airplane that would take him and his closest family and friends off to a private, chartered yacht off the coast of Greece. For the weekend. It was a world of curtsies and bows and your royal highness. It was lush and grand and Maddie wanted to pinch herself; just to be sure she wasn't imagining things.

Boarding the plane took her breath away. It was large and luxurious and the onboard staff members were incredibly professional and helpful. Harry made his way casually around; dropping his on board bag next to a seat, tossing his hat onto a chair and moving to check out the bar.

"Drink?" He looked up to her.

"Sure," Maddie nodded, taking a deep breath; maybe it would help her relax. Just as Harry returned to her side with a glass in his hand and a kiss for her cheek, they heard Bishop's voice calling to them from the steps to the plane. When he stepped on, they both burst into laughter.

"Nice shirt," Maddie glared first at Bishop and then at Harry. "You really had to give him one?"

"I really did," Harry moved to hug Bishop.

"I think you wore that just to mess with me," Maddie nudged Bishop as he leaned to kiss her cheeks.

"I do most things to mess with you Doctor," he winked; leaning back out the door to take a bagged guitar from his driver. "Thank you." He smiled as he brought the instrument onto the plane.

"Hold on," Maddie looked to Harry. "Bishop plays the guitar?"

"Bishop plays the guitar." Harry nodded with a grin.

"Bishop does lots of things you have yet to discover love," Bishop grinned wickedly at her as he moved to a seat.

"This is going to be an amazing trip," Maddie giggled as Harry shook his head at his best friend.

Bishop was followed by Sean, Kiki, and Leo who arrived already slightly tipsy. Finally William and Kate and Eugenie and Jack arrived. It was a small but close contention of people; Harry's other cousins unable to attend. As everyone settled in their seats, drinks were passed to a few people here and there and, with a go-ahead from William, the plane was in the air.

The weekend had begun.

In just under four hours they had arrived in Greece, taken a few cars to the coast and were walking down a loading dock towards a yacht; the likes of which Maddie had only seen on TV or the internet. The group was spirited, lively; laughing and joking—ready for a weekend of partying. Maddie held onto Harry's hand as they walked but her eyes were scanning everything around her; trying to commit it to memory—it was so beautiful; colors she had never seen before.

"Oh my God...look at the water. Look at the beach. Look at..."

"Something else, isn't it?" Harry chuckled lightly.

"Seriously. I almost feel bad for getting on a boat and leaving..." She shook her head with a grin on her face.

"Don't," Harry kissed the top of her hand before letting it go so he could step onboard. "We'll be back," with a wink he held his hand out to her. "Come on."

Reaching out, she took his hand and stepped onto the boat. Everyone initially dispersed to their rooms, settling in and preparing for their trip. Maddie was not ashamed to admit that the room she would share with Harry on that boat was nicer than where she lived in Bendal. As soon as everyone had settled into their suites and rooms, they set sail; full speed.

Intrigued, Maddie made her way as high as she could go on the boat; looking out over the sea, over the water. Bishop, drink already in hand, moved to stand next to her; holding tight to the rail as he looked out.

"You kind of want to yell King of the World, don't you?" He teased.

"What?" She laughed at him. "No, of course not."

"Go ahead," he nodded out towards the water. "I won't judge."

"Ha!" Maddie laughed as she shook her head. Though she would never admit it to anyone for as long as she lived, Bishop was kind of, a little bit, mostly right. Bishop stayed up top with her for a while, pointing out landmarks as they passed; telling her stories of him and Harry as children. By the time they stopped in the water, the sun was inching closer to the horizon and Maddie was almost in tears from laughter. As they made their way down to the main deck where everyone was lounging around; lazy and restful, as dinner was being brought out, Harry looked up from his spot around the edge of the boat and shook his head at Bishop.

"I'm not sure I like the way this looks," he wagged his finger with a grin as he pulled her to his side. "Join me for dinner?"

"Mmm yes. I'm starving!"

"Right this way."

Sitting on the deck of the boat with Harry's arm draped loosely behind her on the railing, Maddie dinned on fresh, succulent shellfish and drank glass after glass of the most amazing wine she had tasted in a long time. Though their friends were tranquil and cozy, the conversations were lively and spirited; full of laughter and great fun.

As dinner died down, Harry took her hand and gestured for her to follow him. Climbing back up to the top deck, the young couple moved to the comfortable bench that surrounded the perimeter and took a seat. And as the sun set over the sea, casting the most beautiful colors up into the sky and across the water, Maddie couldn't help but feel slightly emotional. Sighing, she leaned into the crook of Harry's arm, seeking his warmth, his closeness.

"Having fun?" His eyes were heavy as he leaned to kiss her bare shoulder.

"Mmmm..." She nodded. "It's perfect out here."

"It is..." Harry's fingers played in her hair. "You know, I have something in my pocket for you..."

"Harry!" Maddie gasped with a giggle; glancing around quickly. "On the deck? With all of those people right below us...you know your birthday isn't even until Sunday."

"Ha!" Harry laughed. "I was actually talking about your candy...but it's good to know where your head is at."

"Oh..." Maddie laughed; her face flushing slightly. "Well then..." She cleared her throat.

"Sorry, did you..." Harry straightened up and turned to her. "Did you mean that if it were Sunday you might consider..."

"Well," Maddie's eyelids lowered seductively. "You know Forrester Birthday rules..." Her hand ran teasingly down his chest. "Whatever you want."

"Ooooooohhhhhh..." Harry breathed, moving to kiss her. His hand ran down her side, teasing at the hem of her sundress.

"Sunday, Wales. Sunday." Maddie giggled against his mouth and then, as she heard the first strums of a guitar from below, she pulled away. "I think Bishop is going to play."

"I think you're right," he nodded and sighed. "Want to go back down?"

"Can we?" With a nod, he stood and they made their way back down to the group.

Harry took a seat in a lounger, pulling Maddie down with him. Laying back against his chest, she wrapped his arms around her and they looked to Bishop as he began to play. Maddie was impressed; incredibly so. He actually knew how to play and, as the night wore on and the stars shone bright, he entertained them with song after song. Some Maddie knew, some they all sang along to, and some were just random musings that came from Bishop. But after every one ended, Maddie would lead a light round of applause in appreciation. Long after William and Kate had called it a night, just before Sean and Kiki would stand and retire, Maddie turned in Harry’s arms so she could look up at him.

"I have a confession..." She smiled shyly as his hands ran down over her back.

"Hmmm?" Harry smiled lazily at her.

"I have a little bit of a crush on Bishop right now..." Maddie's eyes flashed in the direction of their friend who was laughing with Leo while his fingers continued to strum at the guitar.

"Shush your mouth!" He laughed at her; moving to cover her eyes with his hands. "And cover your eyes! And ears! Off with your senses..." In a fit of giggles, Maddie let him pull her tight to him; smothering her neck with kisses.

"Get a room!" Bishop called out to them.

And so they did. With hugs and kisses and good nights, they waved to their friends and went to their room. Though it was earlier than she normally went to bed, there was something about being on the water, being in the sun; the wine, the food, the laughter—it made her more tired than a normal day on land.

When Maddie stepped out of the bathroom and into their room, Harry looked up from where he sat on the edge of the bed; already dressed down for the night. A smug grin spread across his face as he took her in.

"Is that my shirt?"

"It's my shirt," she grinned; clearly tipsy as she moved to stand in front of him. "But your smell is wearing off. You need to take it back and make it smell like you again."

"Would you like me to take it back now?" His voice was rough as she cocked an eyebrow.

"...if you think that you can..." She shrugged; silently challenging him.

As he lunged for her, she only hoped that her giggles couldn't be heard all over the boat—though
Saturday

Maddie woke the next morning to a Harry-less bed. In his place was a piece of candy and a note:

'Come up when you wake-H'

With a long stretch and a groan, she honestly contemplated rolling over and going back to sleep; wanting to luxuriate in the peaceful slumber just a bit longer. But she was sure the others were up and she wanted the chance to enjoy the sun and the water for as long as she could. So, she rose from bed, pulled on her suit and a sundress, a haphazard ponytail and sunglasses and made her way to the deck.

There were several moments over the course of the day that would stick with Maddie; moments that would ingrain themselves in her mind with permanence. The first of which was waiting for her at the breakfast table with Kiki and Eugenie and the most elaborate spread of breakfast foods Maddie had seen.

"Good Morning," Kiki was the first to spot her as she rounded the corner.

"Good morning," Eugenie turned to her with a wide smile.

"Good morning," Maddie smiled back. "Wow...look at all of this food."

"Help yourself," Eugenie waved at the table as Maddie took a seat. "The boys are fishing off the back." Maddie craned her neck to look; instantly spotting Harry's toned shoulders and back, wearing only trunks, fedora and glasses—memories from the night before flooding her mind. Her cheeks flushed. She wondered if her body would ever stop reacting with warmth and excitement at spotting him; she hoped not. Forcing her attention back to the table, she reached for a glass of juice and a plate.

"Where's Kate?" Maddie glanced around.

"They haven't come up yet," Eugenie offered, her eyes schooled on the magazine in her hand.

"Oh," Maddie reached for a croissant and looked at the stack of magazines between Kiki and Eugenie. "What are you looking through?"

"Wedding magazines," Eugenie grinned.

"Planning?" Maddie smiled sweetly. Though Eugenie nodded, Kiki groaned.

"Hoping," slightly embarrassed; she rolled her eyes at herself—the first of the three of them to chuckle at the expectant look on her face.

As Kate and William made their way up from below, a chorus of good mornings called out; inviting her to the table, directing him to the back of the boat. With a kiss to his wife and nod to the others, he did just that. Settling in her chair, Kate glanced around the table; her face lighting up at the magazines.

"You're planning," she smiled warmly at Eugenie. "Can I look?" With an enthusiastic nod, Eugenie handed her one.
"So..." Maddie sipped her juice. "What do you have planned so far?"

"Nothing, yet," Eugenie studied a page. "Though...I do kind of like this dress..."

"Let me see," Maddie reached for the magazine. "Oh wow. You would look amazing in something like that." Kate and Kiki nodded in agreement.

"Have you set a date yet?" Kate asked, gathering orange juice and a plate of fruit.

"No," Eugenie shook her head. "We're trying to decide that right now; before or after the holidays."

"Where are you going to do it?" Kiki asked. "Windsor?"

"Maybe. Probably." Eugenie shrugged; still at the very early planning stages of the whole thing.

"You're so lucky," Kate smiled wistfully. "You get to have so much more control over things."

"Definitely more than you and William," Eugenie nodded.

"That's for sure," Kate grinned; a light laughter rounded the table. "I'm so happy the wedding planning is over; now we're just...married."

"So far it hasn't been too bad," Eugenie sighed. "Of course we haven't decided on anything so..."

"I would love to be planning a wedding right now," Kiki admitted; her mind traveling to a place where she could be. "How about I help you; live vicariously through you?"

"Absolutely," Eugenie patted her hand sweetly. "You and Sean still talking about it?"

"Oh sure," she shrugged; having had this same discussion with their group of friends multiple times. "We've talked about it. We've been talking about it for over a year. You know, if much more time passes, I just may give into Bishop's monthly drunken proposals." Maddie about spit her drink from her mouth as laughter bubbled up; the table erupting in laughter again.

Spurred on by their laughter, Harry and Bishop approached the table; wet and curious. Spotting Maddie, Harry grinned wide and bent to kiss her. "Good Morning love."

"Good Morning," she smiled against his lips; inhaling his scent.

"What's going on at this table?" Bishop scanned the surface; pulling up a magazine. "Ah yes...wedding planning."

"You set a date yet?" Harry nodded to his cousin as he popped a piece of apple into his mouth; leaning against the arm of Maddie's chair.

"Not yet," she shook her head. "What do you think? Before or after Christmas?"

"Before," Harry shrugged. "Bring in the new year with a husband. How about you?" He looked to Kiki. "When is Sean going to man up and take you off the market? Or is Bishop going to outlast him?" Harry winked to Bishop.

"I could be so lucky," Bishop leaned to kiss Kiki's cheeks as she laughed out loud.
"Oh I don't know," Kiki sighed dramatically; patting Bishop's ass as he moved away from her. "You would have to ask him."

"I will," Harry laughed and put down his glass. "Come on Bishop, let's head back..." Leaning to Maddie, he tilted her chin up and pressed his cheek to hers; lowering his voice to speak in her ear so only she could hear him. "Just a warning; marrying me means it's going to be about a thousand times more stuffy than you had ever imagined..." He kissed her. "But I'll make up for it on the honeymoon." Maddie schooled her reaction; forcing a small smile to her face as she looked up to him.

"Sounds like a deal to me."

"Good," and with one last kiss to her lips, Harry and Bishop were off. Maddie took a deep breath and focused her attention back on the table where the ladies had already returned to the magazines, debating the merits of passed hours devours versus set stations.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

It was well into the night; deep into party mode. Maddie had spent the day enjoying all of the wonderful aspects of a weekend off the coast of Greece; swimming in the water with Kiki and Bishop until her legs were exhausted, reading a novel in the shade next to Kate who did the same and Leo, who caught up with the daily newspapers, and casting a few lines next to Harry—allowing him the enjoyment of teaching her a few tricks—though she clearly knew what she was doing.

The shellfish returned for dinner in a magnificent surf and turf spread that made Maddie nearly drool when she returned from changing out of her suit into a light melon colored chiffon dress. As Harry's birthday was the next day and they would be heading back, this night was destined to be the big brouhaha that Maddie had grown to expect from this crowd and they were all dressing up just a bit more than they had been.

Along with the mouthwatering food was bottle upon bottle of champagne; steel tubs full of beer and some mint leaf concoction that Kiki had insisted upon mixing.

"Hello..." Harry's voice was low as he came up behind her, wrapping an arm around her waist and dropping a kiss to her shoulder. "You look wonderful."

"Ha!" Maddie laughed; her hand moving up to tangle in his hair. "I think you've spent too much time in the sun today."

"Not a chance," he shook his head and turned her in his arms; kissing her full on the mouth. "You know we'll be celebrating my birthday this evening."

"I do know that," she sighed. "Does that mean you want your gift tonight or tomorrow?"

"Gift?" He seemed surprised. "I thought I told you my rule about gifts."

"Rule?" Her face screwed up; her finger tapping against her chin as she pretended to think about it. "I don't remember hearing any rules."

"That's because you have selective hearing, love."
"Ah, well...what can you do..." Maddie smiled up at him. "I'm a bit of a rule breaker I suppose."

"I suppose," he nodded; his eyes growing serious for a moment. "I'm not a big fan of gifts. I don't need anything. And everything I want is..."

"I know," she placed her fingers to his lips. "But I think you'll be happy with this. Just...trust me."

With a nod, he agreed. "Later then?"

"Later," she smiled. Taking his hand in hers, she lead him down to the main deck. As soon as they were spotted, a round of applause erupted with Bishop leading a raucous round of Happy Birthday. Blushing only slightly, Harry smiled and took it with ease. Maddie held tight to his hand, pressing a kiss to his cheek as a cake was rolled out in front of him; his favorite, complete with twenty-nine blazing candles.

With a wink to Maddie, Harry took a deep breath and blew. And the party had begun.

The second moment that Maddie would carry with her had nothing to do with her; nothing at all, but it was the catalyst for the third moment—the biggest of moments. It all began with a flinch; a subconscious, kneejerk reaction that Maddie was certain she wasn't supposed to catch.

Nearly everyone was tipsy, though nobody was quite 'drunk'. They were older, they were being more careful with their intake on the boat. But they were having the uninhibited kind of fun that came along with leaving your concerns at the shore and enjoying bottles of champagne.

Sean and Bishop were fencing on the deck with makeshift fencing foils while Kiki and Harry refereed and kept score. William had gone below for a moment and Leo was using the loo. Kate sat off to the side, watching it all unfold with a bemused smile. Maddie watched as the action moved along the deck of the boat past Eugenie and Jack

Sean was gaining the advantage, backing Bishop closer and closer to the group and, as he bumped a table, sending its contents toppling to the ground, Kate flinched jumping to the side. And then Maddie saw it—the way her hand drifted to her stomach; floating there lightly before she composed herself and laughed at the boys.

"I'm sure that's a deduction in points, Bishop!" She called out to them; recovering quickly.

"It is," Harry agreed with a grin as Kiki adjusted the score she was keeping.

And Maddie's mind began to reel; piecing together so many moments over the last two days, the last few weeks; the last month. Kiki left Harry with the score sheet and moved to the bar; ready to refresh everyone's drinks.

Maddie sat in thought—so many things were falling into place. At Eugenie's engagement party she had left early due to an upset stomach. She hadn't touched the shellfish on this trip. She had seemed a little preoccupied and distant. She had been sleeping later, going to bed earlier. And now...Maddie was certain she hadn't seen a drink in her hand since they left on Friday. There had been so many signs along the way; signs that Maddie had learned to read while living in Bendal, surrounded by doctors and women who were pregnant more often than they wanted to admit.

There was no way for Maddie to know it, but she knew that Kate was meandering around the group trying to avoid the moment when Kiki would offer her a drink, still not able to decide how she wanted to handle it.
Maddie let go of Harry's hand as he watched the fencing battle continue and moved inside; going first to the bar and then over to where Kate sat off to the side, looking out over the water.

"Hi," Maddie summoned her nerves; knowing that this was bound to be awkward; right or wrong—it would be awkward.

"Hello," Kate smiled tentatively. "It's beautiful out here, isn't it?"

"It is," Maddie nodded and took a breath. "Here, drink this," Maddie passed a mixed drink to Kate.

"No thank you," she shook her head sweetly. "I'm...still getting my sea legs."

"Sure," Maddie smiled; wondering if she should just let the poor woman lie to her. Taking a deep breath, she stepped closer and lowered her voice. "It's...I'm sorry. I may be completely overstepping my bounds but...it's tonic water with crushed mint. There's no alcohol in it and the mint will help soothe your stomach and..." She watched Kate's reaction as she spoke. "It looks like a mixed drink, so nobody will think anything is...different." Kate's eyes flew to hers and Maddie could see fear there; Kate was scared that she had been discovered.

"I..." Kate's voice fell off; her throat dry with panic. Maddie reached out to put a steady hand on her arm and took half a step closer so she could lower her voice.

"Listen, we don't know each other terribly well. But...I'm a therapist, a psychologist and my whole life is just...bound by confidentiality. It comes second nature to me to keep things to myself. And even if it didn't, Harry trusts me. And so can you. I won't tell anyone...anything. And in the meantime, this will stave off the questions from everyone else." In a moment full of heat and tension, a moment that Maddie assumed was incredibly difficult, Kate blinked, took a breath and decided to take a leap of faith and trust her. Reaching to take the drink from Maddie, she smiled shakily and whispered.

"We're just. We're trying and I never know when I could be and..."

"You don't have to explain." Maddie shook her head; pulling her hand back from Kate's arm. "My lips are sealed. Nobody will hear it from me."

"Harry..." Kate glanced nervously to the other side of the boat.

"...not even Harry." Maddie assured her.

"Thank you." The way Kate looked at her, almost on the verge of tears for a split second and then, well-trained and versed, she schooled her features; smiling at Maddie. Maddie knew that this was a defining moment for them; a moment when Kate took a leap of faith and decided to let Maddie in. Taking a sip of the drink, Kate leaned closer. "You know, I've been meaning to tell you—the photos of you and Harry...they look wonderful. I mean, I know the press is a pain and you would rather those photos not be out there, but you look amazing and he is clearly head over heels for you. It could be worse."

"It could," Maddie agreed; smiling across the room as Harry seemed to be mediating between Sean and Bishop.

"If there is anything I can ever do to...help you out, to make things smoother, let me know." Kate was sincere in her offer; truly extending a branch of friendship to Maddie. "When I was joining the family, Harry went out of his way to make me feel welcome, to not feel so crazy. So I intend on returning that favor. For you." Maddie's eyes flashed wide as she met Kate's eyes.

"But I'm not...I'm sorry. I'm not joining the family." Though Kate nodded, there was this look in her eyes, a twist to her smile.

"Not yet," she looked out to Harry as she spoke. "You're not the only one with a knack for observation. I see what's happening. I see how he is with you; he's incredibly serious and undeniably in love with you." She shrugged and met Maddie's eyes. "And I intend on returning the favor."

And there it was; this unexpectedly significant moment between the two of them; a moment where they let the other in slightly on their vulnerabilities—where they settled in with the knowledge that the other understood, more than anyone else could, what it was like to love one of these brothers with so much attention and responsibility resting on their shoulders. A moment where they were both acknowledging the passing of secrets in a circle so uniquely tight that Maddie felt her chest tighten as she accepted Kate's offer—and all that came with it.

"Thank you," Maddie smiled. "I appreciate that."

"You're welcome," Kate smiled back satisfied; happy to finally have a feminine addition to the circle.

"Laaadies..." Kiki sang as she approached them; pitcher in hand. "Can I get you a refill?"

"Oh!" Maddie grinned and held out her glass. "Yes please."

"Here you go..." Kiki topped Maddie off and looked to Kate. "You?"

"Actually, I'm still working on this one," Kate took a sip from the glass. "But it's really great Kiki."

"Thank you," Kiki winked and hurried back towards her table; none the wiser. Maddie and Kate looked at each other, sharing a conspiratorial smile and then in a gesture that stunned Maddie, Kate moved her hand over Maddie's and squeezed tight.

And that was it—the beginning of a trust, a friendship; the forming of a bond that would help both of them throughout some wonderful and some very difficult times ahead. And Maddie knew without knowing; Kate may not have been her friend, may not have been the first person she would have turned to; but she was and would continue to be, somebody she could rely on. It hadn't happened overnight, but there was no going back now—not that Maddie ever would. It was a nice feeling, she smiled to herself, to have somebody who understood.

"Madeline! Save me!" Bishop shrieked out; effectively ending the moment between the two women. Bishop and Harry were tangled together near the edge of the boat near the diving platform that was only a few feet from the surface of the water. Maddie moved towards them with Kate behind her.

"What is happening over here?" Maddie giggled at the expression on Bishop's face; feeling slightly tipsy herself.

"Bishop was cheating!" Kiki called out in a fit of laughter as Harry managed to nudge Bishop
"I was not cheating!" Bishop cried out in a high voice that was reminiscent of a young girl's. "I wasn't cheating! You have to believe me!"

"Bishop," Maddie crossed her arms and shook her head.

"Tell her the truth," Harry warned, managing to flash a smile in Maddie's direction.

"Come on Doctor, you have to believe me...look in my eyes...you can see that I'm telling the truth!" Even Bishop had to laugh at his plea.

"Hmmm..." Maddie stepped closer to the two of them. "Let me see..." She leaned in, her eyes narrowing as she met Bishop's eyes; howls of laughter rounded the boat. "Go ahead. Tell me what happened."

"Okay..." He tried to steady himself, still in Harry's arms. "We were fencing."

"Yes, I remember."

"And then I made a move which is totally legal..." His tone was directed at Harry who shook his head. "And when your boyfriend knocked points off, I protested."

"Oh..." Maddie's eyes shifted to Harry; her voice lowering. "You're throwing him over for protesting?"

"Tell her how you protested," Harry pinched at his side; Sean and Leo laughing in anticipation.

"I...I can't..." Bishop tried to control his laughter; failing miserably. His eyes met Maddie's in defeat before he turned to Harry with a wide grin. "Ah fuck it. I cheated. Throw me over."

"Okay," Harry shrugged. "Fine." And then, in a split second, three things happened.

One, Harry kissed Bishop's cheek and gave him a push.

Two, acting solely on reflex, Bishop reached out; grabbing for the closest thing to him.

And three, Maddie was tugged, dress, drink and all, into the sea with Harry's best friend.

Before Maddie's head reached the surface, Harry was in the water after them; leaving the entire rest of the group in a fit of laughter on board.

"Bishop!" Maddie yelled as she came up.

"I'm sorry!" He yelled back. "It was instinct! It was..."

"It was the worst idea you've ever had!" She splashed water at him and moved towards him.

"Whoa, whoa..." Harry swam to the two of them, grabbing Maddie's hand and pulling her close to him; suddenly the voice of reason. "We're drunk. We're in the sea. We don't need anyone drowning..."

"Yes Madeline," Bishop eyed her smugly. "We don't need anyone drowning."
"Out of my way Wales," Maddie moved to swim past him. Trying to control his laughter, Harry eyed Bishop.

"Watch it or I'll let her go."

"Come on Bishop!" Leo yelled from up top, letting down the ladder as Kiki returned with some big fluffy towels. "Get up here!" As Bishop swam back towards the boat, Harry turned his attention to the sopping wet woman in his arms.

"Maddie, love..."

"I see that smug little smirk on your face," Maddie's bottom lip pulled out in a slight pout.

"Yeah?" Harry chuckled; his hands pulling her tighter. "Care to do something about it?"

"You pushed me into the sea..." Maddie sighed; smudging his hair from his forehead.

"I pushed Bishop into the sea," he corrected. "And I came in right after you."

"Such a gentleman," she cocked her head to the side sarcastically.

"Alright," he laughed; swimming them both over to the ladder, reaching out for a rung. "Come on, let's get you out of those wet clothes." His eyes gleamed with double entendre. Maddie took a breath, ready to offer a snappy comeback but instead went for a more effective silencing tool.

"Okay."

"Okay? That's it?"

"Well," her voice dropped as she leaned to kiss him. "It is technically Sunday. Happy Birthday." And, leaving a stunned Harry in the water, Maddie climbed up the ladder. Taking only a minute to recover, Harry was up the ladder right behind her.

"Wait for me!" He called as he hurried past the fluffy towel and his friends; now laughing at him.

"Good night!" Bishop called out; taking the drink that Sean was offering him. "And you're welcome!"

And though the party continued on deck, there was an entirely different party in the works below.

Sunday

Maddie woke before Harry, the sun barely rising outside the windows. Rolling over to her side, her eyes zeroed in on him. He was sprawled out on his back sleeping soundly. She watched him for a moment, enjoying the steady sound of him breathing. Her eyes traveled over him, taking him in. It was an amazing thing to see; Harry quiet and peaceful. He was always so...on. Always ready for anything the world threw at him. She loved that she was able to witness these moments when he was so relaxed, vulnerable even. She loved that it was her that he allowed in enough to see this. And there was a small part of her mind, a part she reminded herself she needed to get in check, that couldn't help but drift to the place where moments such as these were a part of her future. Smiling, she looked him over, enjoying the chance to watch him without him knowing.

Her eyes took in his hair; red, spiky, and slightly smashed from going to sleep wet. Her eyes moved to his face and she grinned at the way his forehead held a slight crinkle as though he were in thought, even in sleep. Her eyes moved to his face with his slight morning scruff and his perfect, kissable mouth. Her eyes traveled further down, taking in his broad, strong shoulders; always available to her on demand. As her eyes moved further down, they fell on his chest; rising and falling with his breathing. As a reflex, her hand reached out to it, settling over his heart, feeling the heat that radiated from him. And then, as a reflex, Harry moved; shifting slightly as his hand found hers, settling on top of it, pressing it close to him. It was amazing how, even in sleep, his body reacted to her; knew she was there and responded accordingly. Wanting to be closer, she moved so that she could cuddle into his side. Her hand still sandwiched between his hand and his chest, she settled her head on his shoulder and sighed as the contentment fell over her. Somehow she didn't mind waking up with the sun if it meant she could stay right in that spot.

She loved him...so much. As she watched him sleep, the steadiness of his breathing calming her, she was taken aback by the swaying in her heart. She was over the moon in love with him. She couldn't quite put words to how much she loved him. Though it wasn't actually that long ago, it took great effort and some thought to bring up a memory from a time before she knew him; before his presence wasn't a constant in her life; when she didn't want to feel his arms around her, his lips on hers. She stifled a chuckle as she thought back to meeting him; how she hadn't even blinked before ordering him around, how appalled Ella had been when she discovered Harry unloading a truck full of food. Maddie sighed as she remembered how long it took her to give in to her feelings for him; how long it took her to get to a place where she could accept his feelings for her—to see what was happening between them. But she hadn't been ready for Harry then. But, after almost a year, after taking him home, after stepping into his world of privilege and still managing to hold onto herself, she was more than ready for a Harry now.

Giving in to the urge she had to kiss him, she moved then; leaning closer and placing a soft, light kiss to the hollow part of his neck next to his collar bone. Her lips felt warm at the touch and she felt his body stir slightly next to her. Taking a chance, she turned her head slightly to place another kiss on his shoulder. And then she was hooked. She leaned up slightly to place a kiss on the curve of his jaw. First one, then two, and just as she moved in for the third, Harry moved. His eyes fluttering so they were just barely open, he moved; rising up and turning so that he was over her, his body over hers, pulling the hand she had placed on his chest so that her arm wrapped around him, leaning down to press his lips to hers in a moment of uninhibited, unexpected passion.

Passion had been ignited in both of them nearly instantly.

His breathing was raspy as his mouth met hers. Matching his passion with her own, she immediately opened her lips under his, allowing his tongue entrance. She moaned at the desire that instantaneously overtook her body. With one hand rooted into her hair, Harry moved his other to push up under her camisole, seeking unobstructed contact. She gasped as his skin touched hers. And when he pulled away from her, only to tug her cami over her head, his sleepy eyes met hers and she was certain she stopped breathing. His eyes were dark blue like the water below them; full of passion and lust. Her hands traveled up his arms, over his shoulders and pulled at his face, bringing his lips crashing into hers. Nudging her legs with his knee, he moved to situate himself between them. His lips traveled down her neck, causing her to shiver. His hands traveled down her body, pulling at her knee, bringing her leg up and around him; causing her to tremble.

Her hands held on to his head as he kissed his way across her jaw; down her neck, across her chest and to her stomach, his hands pulling her tiny boy shorts off her legs, discarding them quickly. Teasing her in the most maddeningly delightful way possible, Harry was sucking and licking and kissing her into quite the frenzy.

As he reached her center, he slowed down to a torturous pace; breathing warmth through her satin underwear, nudging her with his nose, making her ache for more contact as he focused his attention everywhere but where she longed for it the most. He knew what she wanted. He knew what would send her over the edge but he also knew that, sometimes, drawing out the process only made it that more satisfying. While Maddie was impressed with his restraint, she wanted him now. She wanted that contact, that release that only he could give her. Her body arched closer to him, her eyes closed as her head pushed into the pillow.

"Harry..." Her voice groaned, begging him for more. He looked up to her then; his eyes peering at her; his body responding with need at the site of her in such a state. "Please..." Her eyes peeked open to look at him. Seeing the amusement in his smile, his amusement at the reactions he was drawing from her; amusement at how much she wanted him, Maddie decided it was time to teach Harry a lesson.

Summoning all of her will power, she took a deep breath and moved. Pulling his face up to hers, she brought her lips to his with force and want. She could almost feel his surprise when she pushed at him, effectively moving them both so that he was lying back on the bed and she was above him, straddling his waist. She pulled her lips from his and sat up; long and tall; pushing down onto him. And she watched his eyes grow hazy with desire as he looked her over; naked above him. His hands moved along her thighs, up her sides, along her neck, burying themselves in her hair. With a moan, he tried to draw her face back to his; longing for her lips. But she resisted. "Uh uh, Wales," she shook her head slowly. As her head turned towards one of his hands, she grabbed it and brought it to her lips for a kiss. She held his gaze as she slowly pulled his finger into her mouth; her tongue, lips, and mouth working together to elicit a strangled groan from him lips.

"Maddie..." The way her name sounded on his lips brought her great satisfaction. She pulled his finger from her mouth and then, grabbing both of his hands in hers, she drew them up and over his head, pinning them to the pillow beside him. As she leaned close to him, her hips began to move slowly; up and down; with the very intent on driving him towards the edge, she kissed his neck, just below his ear; causing him to hiss. "Oh my God..."

Maddie chuckled as she began to move her body lower on his; kissing across his chest, licking down his stomach. And when she reached the band of his boxers, she tugged them off; releasing him from their confines. She ran her nails up along his thighs, causing his hips to arch off the bed.

"Maddie..." He called out to her, reaching for her, wanting her to stop what she was doing and let him have her. But Maddie, enjoying the control she was exerting, waved his hands away and shook her head at him.

"I'm not sure you've been adequately punished for pushing me in the water last night." And then, locking her eyes with his, she held his gaze as he watched her head dip. And when she took him into her mouth, he thought he was going to lose it. Her mouth was...absolute magic. Every time she did this to him, he struggled to maintain control, to hold on to his shaky grasp on the edge of the cliff he was hanging from. As she worked her magic, she could feel him getting close and, just like that, she pulled away from him.

"You know..." He fought to catch his breath as she sat up and looked to him. "If you're going to punish me like this...it is...in no way...going to curb future misbehavior."

And when he saw her, her hair mussed, her lips swollen, her eyes hazy, he about lost it. With a satisfied and sultry smile, Maddie moved up higher towards his waist; reaching for a condom from the nightstand—which she applied with natural ease. Swinging her leg over him, she made a point of moving very slowly; very deliberately as lowered herself onto him. His hips bucked involuntarily as she settled herself there. If she was being completely honest, every single cell in her body wanted to give him what he wanted. Every single part of her wanted to speed things up and push them both to that place they were so very close to. But he had started with the teasing and she liked to give as good as she got. With a groan, his hands reached out to her, gripping her hips, longing to increase her speed. But she was quick to grab his wrists, pulling them from her body and holding them tight to the mattress at their sides. And she continued her achingly slow pace; driving Harry absolutely mad.

"Maddie..." He breathed. "Please..." He begged with a grin. "Let me touch you. It's my birthday..." And then, because he was right, because she truly couldn't stand it much longer herself, she released his wrists. His hands were immediately on her; pulling her lips to his, running along her body as though she were an oasis.

"Oh God..." She gasped as he pushed up against her, increasing their pace, increasing the friction. And when his lips moved to her neck, she knew that the end was dangerously close. As she moved to sit upright, he followed; his arms wrapping around her holding her tight to him. And when his eyes locked with hers, the pressure that was building inside of her exploded into her heart and she suddenly understood how some people felt the overwhelming urge to cry while making love.

"I love you..." His eyes held hers as he spoke. Finding that she couldn't speak, she leaned in to kiss him; pushing all of her emotion into her lips, her mouth. And then it was just too much, tossing her head back in abandon, she held tight to his shoulders and exploded around him. Following her lead, following her desires—he would follow her anywhere—Harry's mouth dropped to her shoulder and he followed her over the edge.

They held tight to each other as their pulses settled, as their breathing evened out. Holding her face in his hands, he kissed her; long, slow, emotion filled kisses before she opened her eyes to look at him.

"Good Morning," he whispered.

"Good Morning," she whispered back; the tears in her eyes blinking away as he held her.

"I'm just going to..." He nodded towards their bathroom before he, regretfully, moved away from her. Maddie reached for the shirt she had taken from him and settled back onto her pillow; the smile a permanent fixture on her face. Pulling on his boxers, Harry ducked out of their room quick enough to grab bottles of water without being seen. And then he was crawling back into bed with her. Taking the bottle he offered, she reached up, drawing his face to hers; kissing him over and over again before she sighed and released his smug face.

"Happy Birthday Harry," Maddie's hand reached up to stroke his cheek.

"Yes it is," he turned to kiss her hand. "I actually think it's quite unfair for me to be as happy as I am right this moment."

"Hmmm..." Maddie chuckled. "Good."

"How are you, love?" His eyebrows arched. "Did you sleep well?"

"Blissfully well," she sighed and looked to the window where the rays of the sun were shining in. "Do we really have to go back?"
"Well, I do. I have training on base for two weeks," he moved to lay on his back; pulling her to rest on his chest. "You, however, can stay put as long as you like."

"Oh?" Though she wasn't sure she would want to stay without him, the thought was intriguing.

"Sure," he nodded. "You might have to fly back commercially, but I can extend the charter on the boat—you can keep her as long as you would like." She was simultaneously excited and nervous at the ease at which he made the suggestion. Taking a breath, she smirked.

"I can keep the boat..."

"Yes."

"Can I keep Bishop and his guitar?" Harry's eyes narrowed playfully as he chuckled.

"Absolutely not." His voice was happy, but final.

"Well, it was a nice thought..." She let out a breath and then, as she remembered something, her eyes flashed wide, her face brightened. "Oh! I'll be right back..." And she was out of his arms, out of the bed; moving to her bag.

"Boo..." He pouted and then, as she returned to their bed; bouncing next to him with an intricately wrapped package in her hands, he sat up, serious. "Madeline..."

"Shush," she waved her hand; tucking her hair behind her ears.

"Did you just shush me?" Harry grinned.

"I did," she sat with her legs tucked up under her; her hands holding the gift as she pulled her thoughts together. "I know you don't like gifts and I get that...mostly..." She rolled her eyes. "I understand why you have your silly rule—which I did listen to, by the way."

"Oh? Because I see a gift wrapped box right here," he pointed. "So you'll allow me my confusion."

"Maybe..." Her voice had warning to it. "Maybe you should open it first. I think you'll be quite pleased." She seemed almost...shy as she held it out to him. So, bypassing sarcasm, Harry took the gift from her hands and began to unwrap it. Maddie bit her lip as she watched him; her insecurities tugging at her confidence, questioning her decision for the first time. As he pushed the paper aside, revealing a children's book, he couldn't help the confused smile that tugged at his lips.

"A book?" Harry turned it over in his hands; his eyes moving between Maddie and the hardcover in his hands. "Shel Silverstein? I have to tell you...I don't understand."

"It's kind of a long story but it will come together..." Maddie took a breath and reached for the book; flipping through the pages. "This was one of my favorite books as a child. There's a part..." She found what she was searching for and her eyes lit up; reading, "Listen to the mustn'ts, child. Listen to the don'ts. Listen to the shouldn'ts, the impossibles, the won'ts. Listen to the never haves, then listen close to me... Anything can happen, child. Anything can be." She closed the book and met his eyes. "That doesn't explain anything now does it?" She laughed and he shook his head.

"Not really," he smiled and took her hand in his. "Unless you're giving me your favorite childhood book. Is that what you're doing?"
"No," she shook her head. "Well, yes. But that's not all."

"Oh-kay..." He eyed her. "But two gifts is most certainly breaking the rules."

"Patience," she warned. "I wrote something in the cover," she handed the book back to him and gestured for him to read it. Dropping her hand, he did as she requested. "It's a quote from Johann Wolfgang von Goethe."

"You can easily judge the character of a man by how he treats those who can do nothing for him..." Harry's voice trailed off as a lump developed unexplainably in his throat. "Maddie..."

"This is where it comes together," she pressed her hands together excitedly. "I spoke to Khenda before we left for the states to visit my family," Maddie began her explanation. "And she was telling me how the Children's Center had started this small, tiny project—putting together something of a library of books for the kids to read. They had started small but the response was just...overwhelming. The kids were so greedy for the books that they were out all of the time; kids were hiding them under their pillows and... They couldn't keep up. They didn't have enough books or resources or..." Maddie took a breath and blinked at the tears that always developed when she thought of the children she had worked with in Bendal. "Obviously there are bigger concerns in the area; food, water, health care...libraries for children in what is essentially an orphanage is not exactly high on the priority list. Nor should it be, I suppose. But it's still important you know? For the kids to have something that they enjoy, that they love that much. They can lose themselves in the books, they get a sense of pride being able to read, a sense of ownership..." Realizing she had taken a bit of a detour, she focused. "The quote...the character of a man can be seen by how well he treats those who can do nothing for him... From the moment I met you, your character was the first thing that hit me; how well you treat those who can do nothing for you..."

"Maddie..." Harry felt a flush in his cheeks as she spoke; tears in his eyes.

"The kids, the community in Bendal...me..." She laughed then. "You had nothing to gain by unloading that truck; there were no cameras, no reporters. It was just me...and yet you just...you did it. In fact, if Ella hadn't come along, I'm guessing you would have just finished unloading the truck and continued on your way. You played in the dirt with the kids, you run around with them, let them hang on you and hug you and...you offer your name and your attention to Khenda again and again to help her gain some support down there. You..." Maddie's eyes glossed over. "You have an amazing strength of character Harry..." Her fingers tangled with his. "So, to honor you, and your amazing character, on your birthday...as my gift to you...I am...funding the library project at the Children's Center in Bendal."

"You're giving the children a library..." He was stunned; speechless at her words.

"Well, I'm beginning the project. They've begun construction of some shelves in a very small space and the books are on their way; three hundred to begin with—with these great book bags for the kids to use and...and this book," she tapped her fingers on his book. "I'll add more as time goes on; maybe for Christmas," she shrugged. "It's nothing big or spectacular but it's a start..."

"It's amazing," Harry's eyes were wide, his heart full. Her gesture touching his heart in a way that he would never quite be able to articulate. "It's...it's perfect really." He tugged at her hand in his, bringing her close to him. His hands moved to her face, falling back to tangle in her hair. "This is a wonderful gift Maddie, thank you." His lips were light against hers; sweet and loving.

"You're welcome," she smiled sweetly as his mind processed it all; the emotions he was feeling at her completely thoughtful and significant gift. "And since it's not technically for you, it's not technically breaking the rules." She was proud of herself.

"I suppose you're right," he took a breath. "You are wrong about one thing though..."

"Oh?" Her forehead knotted up. Harry nodded, moved the book to the nightstand and scooted closer to her.

"I had everything to gain from helping you with that truck."
When Harry returned to London, he and Maddie were solid—stronger than they had ever been. Their time in Greece had added to the already durable glue that held them together. She had allowed herself to slip further into his world of wealth and privilege and she had found a way to stay grounded there. And Harry, touched beyond words at her gift, was so certain of her place in his life, in his future that he walked with a new air of confidence, a new feeling of peacefulness in his place in the world.

In those weeks following Harry's birthday, life was incredibly busy. Harry was gone at training and Maddie had her hands full with an influx of clients at Veteran's Services and her steady load at the hospital. It was busy, but the good kind of busy. She enjoyed this kind of busy; it gave her purpose and drive. And, as the icing on the cake, it helped the time without Harry pass by much quicker. Her weekends were devoted to catching up with Ella; shopping, lunching, staying up late and drinking wine while going on and on about their wonderful boyfriends. Maddie felt young and silly and she loved Ella for it.

That's why on that cool October night, Harry's third night back from training, when Ella stopped by as Maddie was getting dressed to go meet Harry, Maddie smiled wide and invited her friend inside; without a care in the world.

"You know, I'm getting ready to go meet Harry, but we can have some wine before I go..." Maddie started towards the kitchen. "Or hey! If you want to call Matt, the four of us can go out."

"No," Ella shook her head; watching her friend closely. "I actually came here for a reason."

"Oh?" Maddie mouth drew to the side as she looked Ella over; there was a magazine clutched to her chest and a look in her eyes that made Maddie nervous.

"You know how you asked me to be your filter, to read through things and only bring you the important stuff?"

"Yes," Maddie smiled tentatively. "And you've been doing a smashingly good job."

"Thank you," Ella allowed a tiny smile.

"Is that why you're here?" Maddie's eyes rested on the magazine that Ella held; the cover pressing against her chest. "Is that important stuff?"

"I don't know," she sighed. "I don't think so. It's...I think it's nothing."

"But..." Maddie crossed her arms.

"People are most definitely going to be talking about it and I would be remiss as a filter and a friend if I didn't tell you about it before you heard about it."

"Okay," Maddie nodded; finding a bit of humor in the whole situation. If the last year had taught her anything, it was to not get worked up about something until there was reason to get worked up about something. "Go ahead."

"Okay," Ella nodded and took a breath. "But before I show you, I just want to remind you of a few things..." Ella seemed serious as she held the magazine close to her chest.

"Shoot."

"First, Harry adores you. You know that, right?"

"Yes," Maddie nodded; absolute. "Is this about Harry?" Ella ignored her question and continued.

"Second, I have been reading everything about you for the last...I don't know, six months and the press generally only has it right about...forty percent of the time, probably less if I took the time to make a chart and..."

"Ella..." She snapped back into focus.

"Third," she moved closer to her friend. "When that website said they had nude photos of you, Harry never believed it, not for one second."

"Nude photos?" Maddie's eyes went wide. "Are there nude photos of Harry in that magazine?"

"Right, as if I'm really that lucky." Ella allowed a burst of laughter and Maddie narrowed her eyes. "Sorry. I forget sometimes that I need to alter my celebrity crush list because your boyfriend is off limits, even if he's been on my free pass list for years."

"Harry's on your free pass list?" Maddie's attentions were diverted for a split second. "Does he know that?"

"God no! And please, don't ever tell him. Things would be awkward."

"You think?" Maddie raised her eyebrows. "Now. Are you going to tell me what's in the magazine or am I going to have to wrestle it from your hands."

"Ah yes..." Ella pulled it out from her chest timidly as she ran through her list again. "Harry adores you. Forty percent right. Never believed it."

"I got it," Maddie laughed at her friend; tugging the magazine from her hands and flipping it around. Her eyes scanned over the cover; a burst of air gasping from her mouth as she saw it. "Royal Romeo steps out on Doting Doctor..." Her voice fell to a whisper, "Like father, like son."

Tearing her eyes from the magazine, she looked to Ella who was standing tall and firm and ready to rebuke whatever Maddie was going to say.

"Forty percent of the time, Maddie. That means they are wrong sixty percent of the time. That's...that's a lot; a majority."

"You're right," Maddie took a deep breath and let it out slowly. "You're right. How can they print something like that? I mean...without any substance or..."

"There are pictures," Ella's voice was small.

"Pictures?!" Maddie tore open the magazine.

"Not one second," Ella repeated herself as she reached out to turn to the pages. "He didn't believe they were of you for one second."
"Okay," Maddie took a breath and, giving Harry the complete benefit of the doubt, she looked at the page. There were three photos of Harry and a woman who was clearly not her. They were clearly taken at night, dark and grainy, and snapped in quick succession. Harry leaning in, then closer, and finally with his lips on hers. There was nothing identifiable about the woman. She was tall, blonde; his standard—or so the article reported. Her heart thudded as she looked closer; studying the photos closely. Ella saw the moment her friend started to come undone and she moved towards her; placing her hands on her shoulders and forcing her to look up at her.

"Maddie, listen to me. I don't buy it. I don't think it's him. Why would he do something like this? And to be so stupid to do it out in public and...it just doesn't compute, you know."

"Shh..." Maddie held up her hand; her mind spinning.

"I only wanted to show you because I think you're going to get bombarded with this and..."

"Ella please," Maddie pleaded. "I just...let me think for just..." Maddie's train of thought was interrupted by her phone ringing out into the room. Her stomach turned when she saw that it was him. "Hello?"

"I'm downstairs. Can I come up?" He was short and to the point and Maddie knew he had seen it; certain that was why he just came over instead of calling her.

"Yes," she nodded and hung up the phone. "He's here," she muttered; moving to the buzzer.

"Oh wow..." Ella reached for her purse.

"You don't have to go," Maddie shook her head as she opened the door to wait for him.

"Yes I do," she moved towards the door just as Harry and Nathan stepped up to it. The tension was thick as Maddie tried to pull it together; wanting to give him a chance to explain before she dove off this particular cliff.

"Doctor Forrester," Nathan nodded hello.

"Go ahead," Maddie stepped aside to allow him in; avoiding eye contact with Harry while she tried to calm her crazy mind.

"You've seen it, haven't you?" Harry was never one to mince words; his eyes cast down at his shoes.

"Ella brought it over," Maddie jutted her thumb towards the magazine on the table.

"Of course she did," Harry sighed heavily, nodding to Ella. "Hello Ella."

"Hello," Ella tried for a smile as she leaned to kiss Maddie's cheek. "If you need anything, call me." Maddie nodded and Ella stepped out the door, squeezing Harry's arm as she walked past him. "I'm on your side here." Without speaking or really looking to her, Harry nodded to Ella; his eyes focused on Maddie.

"Madeline..." His hand reached out to her.

"All clear," Nathan stepped past them into the hallway.
"Come in," Maddie's lips pursed into a smile. Harry nodded and moved into her place. Shutting the door behind him, Maddie took a deep breath and turned to face him; to face the moment.
"So...how was your day?" She tried for small talk, but Harry wasn't interested.

"I wanted to get here before the magazine did."

"Sure," Maddie nodded.

"You've seen it?"

"Yes."

"All of it?"

"I saw the three photos and the article...if you can even call it that. Is there more?"

"No," he shook his head. "That's it."

"Then yes. I saw it."

"I can't help but notice that you haven't asked me if..."

"And I can't help but notice that you haven't come out with a denial."

"Listen..." His hands stretched out to her.

"Ella thinks that it's not you," she cut him off as she reached for the magazine. "She thinks that it's somebody who looks a lot like you, but she doesn't believe it's you."

"And you?" His voice cracked as he looked to her.

"There's this thing..." She stopped to collect herself; moving closer to him. "There's this thing that you do sometimes, just before you kiss me..." Her hand moved to his waist, circling around him to his back. "Your hand rests right here..." She let her hand fall to the spot on him that she was talking about. "And your top lip pulls in slightly..." She looked up to him then; her hands dropping away from him as she took a step back, holding the magazine out to him. She gulped and forced her eyes to meet his. "Look at these pictures; the hands, the lip...I think Ella's wrong."

"Maddie," he reached out to her as she walked away; his eyes wide and pleading.

"Hold on," she held up her hand; effectively silencing him. "I just... I know that the press likes to...invent something out of nothing. I know that the majority of what is printed is absolute bullshit. I know that. And I do not want to spend the rest of my life second guessing or double checking or..." Maddie took a deep breath. "You told me at the very beginning that you are unflinchingly honest; honest even if it hurts, you said. So...I want you to know that I am going to believe whatever it is you tell me next. I am going to trust you completely. I am going to take you at your word and I will never bring this up again I just...I need you to know that this moment right here, it sets the stage for how we handle this in the future. I need you to know that and I need you to be absolutely honest with me..." She bit her lip and looked away for a moment before turning her eyes back to him. "Is this...Is this you?" Without looking to the magazine, Harry blinked; his eyes holding hers as he spoke.

"Yes." His words echoed in her ears; in her heart. "It's me."
"Oh my God..." Her voice was barely above a whisper as doubt and mistrust washed over her in waves. And suddenly, it was like she was looking at somebody else—not the man she had known for a year and a half, not the man who had taken her home for her birthday, not the man who she was in love with. It didn't make any sense; none of it—it was completely out of tune with his character and yet he had just admitted..."What?" Maddie felt her stomach clench; her throat tighten as she looked at him, confused.

"Maddie..." He reached out to her.

"I need to sit down," she pushed past him and moved to the couch. "This is you?"

"Yes..." Maddie cringed. "You said honest if it hurts."

"Well it fucking hurts," she scowled at him. "I can't believe this. I..."

"But..." That wasn't all; that wasn't it. Before he could open his mouth, before he could step in and cut this off, the conversation was out of his hands.

"No buts!" Her voice rose as tears sprang to her eyes; her inability to figure out what she wanted to do next rendering her an emotional mess. "Jesus. I didn't actually expect you to say yes."

"Are you going to let me explain?"

"Explain what?!" She yelled. "It's you! You said it's you and you are clearly kissing somebody who is clearly not me! What the hell else is there to explain?! Who is she?"

"I don't know," he shook his head with a shrug.

"You don't know?! Harry!" Maddie's eyes were wide; crazy—the way her mind felt. Harry opened his mouth to speak, but she hurried ahead of him, not sure if she was able to handle hearing his explanation for things. "Don't! Don't speak. I don't think I can do this right now. I'm too mad and irrational and..." She knew her emotional upheaval had no intention of ceding ground to her calm, rational side anytime soon. "I think you need to go."

"Go?" He shook his head; desperately wanting to get a hold of the situation. It had already gone too far. "No way. I'm not going anywhere. Not until you let me..."

"Fine," Maddie's eyes narrowed into a glare as she moved to her feet.

"What are you doing?" His eyes were wide as he watched her. "Where are you going?"

"I think you should go before I scream for help and Nathan has to break down my door and come in here to drag you to safety!"

"Would you please calm down?" Harry glanced to the door; rising to his feet to follow her.

"Calm down?! No! I will not calm down! I..." Maddie blinked at the tears in her eyes. "I can't do this right now Harry. I don't want to yell and scream at you. I don't want to be this crazy person! I don't want to grill you about your...mistress..."

"Mistress?" He couldn't help the laugh that pushed through his lips; though he regretted it immediately. "You are blowing this completely out of proportion."

"Oh I am, am I?"

"Yes!" His eyebrows shot up, his hands spread out in front of him.

"Why? Because you didn't sleep with her? Oh my God..." Maddie's stomach turned. "You didn't sleep with her did you?"

"Of course not," his eyes grew serious. "Maddie if you just..."

"No," her voice was quiet, her eyes pleading as she tried not to cry. "I won't just...I can't just...I can't do this. I won't be the woman that turns the other way while you... I can't turn the other way. I'm sorry I just..."

"Please don't cry," he reached for her hand then and, in her moment of weakness, she let him take it. "Madeline, you don't understand..."

"What don't I understand?" She sniffed; hating the crazy way she felt. "This is you and another woman. You're in the park...really Harry, the park? And you're kissing her. You're kissing her the way you kiss me." Maddie took her hand from his, walking away from him then, back into her living room.

"I'm not kissing her the way I kiss you," he shook his head.

"What else is there to understand Harry? Tell me. Because...I want more than anything to hear something that's going to take away this terrible feeling that is sweeping away all of the good stuff I have been carrying around since I met you and..."

"The photo was taken a year ago." His words were quick, to the point, and threw Maddie so far off track that she almost forgot to inhale. All of the momentum that had been building came to a sudden screeching halt as she stopped in her tracks.

"What?" She exhaled.

"I was at a festival in the park a year ago. I had left you in Bendal. We were talking on the phone. It wasn't long before I flew back to kiss you to tell you that I loved you, to...I was confused and I was...I don't know. I was smashed and she was...willing and..." Harry walked towards her.

"A year ago?!" Maddie's voice rose; spinning around to face him. "You mean we weren't even together when you..."

"We weren't," he shook his head; his face open and honest. Maddie watched him for a long, solid minute while her brain tried to sort it all out.

"But the article..."

"It's wrong. It's mostly wrong. It is me. I am kissing a...stranger. But it was before you. That's the twist. It was..."
"Harry!" She smacked his arm; exasperated by the roller coaster her heart was on.

"Ouch!" He flinched; his hand moving to rub where she had hit. "Why are you hitting me now?"

"Why didn't you tell me that to begin with?"

"You wouldn't let me talk."

"That is something that you break in with! You should have started with that! Not...have you seen it? Or what do you think? You start with it was a year ago, it was before you Maddie."

"Well I know that now and I'll keep it in mind for next time."

"Next time?!!" Maddie shook her head. "I don't want a next time. I can't do a next time." And Harry's heart broke.

"Maddie," his voice was soft, soothing. "This isn't the first time that the press has made something out of nothing. It is not the first time they've twisted something like this. In a world with so many uncertainties, one thing I know for sure...there will be a next time. There probably won't be old pictures and it will definitely not be true but..."

"But..." Her voice was quieter now; her eyes less crazy, more sad as she looked to him. "I don't want there to be a next time."

"I know," he breathed.

"What do we do?" Her eyes looked to him for answers as she sank back down to the couch. Though he was thankful for her use of 'we', he couldn't help but be concerned about her; about them.

"Nothing," he shook his head; sitting on the coffee table in front of her, his hands moving to hers.

"Nothing?" Her face twisted up; not pleased with his answer. "We can't call the magazine? Or have an attorney call or...or issue a statement or..."

"No," he shook his head again. "We can do none of those things."

"But what if people just go on thinking that you're a cheater and..."

"People are going to go on thinking that I'm a cheater." The resolve in his eyes made Maddie want to cry.

"That's not fair."

"This isn't about fair Maddie. You know that. You knew that walking into this..."

"You're really not going to address this?"

"I am really not going to address this. Not with the press, not with the public. I'm addressing it with you now. I'll address it with my family and my PR people and I'll address it with any one of our friends or your family that you want me to, but I won't be making any statements or..."
"Why not?"

"Because!" Harry took a breath; trying to calm his frustrations. "Because if I address this article, I have to start addressing them all."

"Then address them all." She knew she sounded crazy but she just couldn't seem to help herself.

"That's ludicrous!" He shook his head. "I cannot possible address all of the articles and photos and...and what happens when I start to do that? What happens when I miss one? Everyone will think that's the one that must be true. He refuted all of the others but this one so... Maddie. That is a crazy, circuitous world of nonsense. One into which I will not be stepping."

"But people will think..."

"Then let them think it." He shrugged.

"That's it?"

"Yes. That's it."

"You're not going to stand up and say 'No! This is not who I am. I would never do this. I love Maddie and..."

"I will, to you, Maddie I swear to you," He moved from the table, kneeling in front of her, taking her hands in his. "This is not who I am. I would never do this. I love you and I will always love and I will never be unfaithful to you..."

"Harry..."

"You know that, don't you?" His eyes searched hers. "You believe me, don't you?"

"Yes," she nodded; she did—with every part of her.

"Then that's just going to have to be enough."

"But...when that website said they had photos of me, you jumped all over it. I got an attorney and..."

"That was different."

"How?"

"You're a private citizen Maddie. I'm not. That's the simple answer."

"What's the complex answer?"

"That my entire life has been showcased by the press, that the palace doesn't comment on the personal lives of the royal family, that meriting this with a response is below us and..." He took a breath. "And this isn't the first time a magazine has taken a shot at us."

"I know. But it's the first time it's really been you. It's the first time there have been pictures. It's the first time you admitted..."
"I should have started with it was a year ago..." Maddie nodded; wiping at her eyes and Harry rose to his feet, rubbing his hand up over his face and into his hair as he walked away from her. "You know, this is never going to work if you don't trust me." Neither of them looked to the other as he continued. "The press, they like to play me as...as the playboy. They like to make me out to be so much more smooth and suave than I really am. They like to put me in clubs that I've never been to. They like to have me kissing women I've never even met. And nothing is as good of a story as a son repeating his father's mistakes..." Maddie couldn't find her voice to speak as he continued. "They will do this again, Maddie. Maybe a week from now, maybe next year. They will do it when we're married, when we have children. They will continue to find one sensational way after another to sell a magazine. They don't have to have pictures. They have 'anonymous sources' and 'allegedly' and...it will happen again." He turned to face her then; leaning back against her wall and with the saddest eyes he asked, "is this what's going to happen every time that happens?"

"This?" She looked up at him; her eyes matching his.

"Not too long ago you said that they could throw anything at you, that you could take whatever they had lined up..."

"About me," she interrupted. "They can say whatever they want about me. This isn't about me," she waved at the magazine. "This is about you. They are tearing you apart, assassinating your character, calling you all kinds of names and..."

"Are you kidding me?" He laughed; pushing away from the wall, moving towards her. "This is about protecting me? Maddie...I can take this. I can...God..." He breathed, sitting down next to her on the couch. "I can take them inventing things about me. As long as you and I know the truth...and the people around us know the truth, I can take this. You don't need to worry about me," his hand moved to her cheek then, stroking a strand of hair from her face. "But I can't handle this," he wiped at a tear. "If you being here, being with me...if it's going to make you feel like this every time something like this happens..." His words caught in his throat; his eyes glossed over. "I can't do this forever, Maddie."

"Yeah," Maddie nodded; holding his hand to her cheek as fresh tears brewed in her eyes. "I know..." She sniffed. "I can't either."

And then, because neither of them dared speak for fear of the avalanche that might unfold, Harry's hand moved to her neck, pulling her to him. He pressed a kiss to her forehead and she settled her head onto his shoulder.

And the silence was absolutely deafening.
Chapter 53

Maddie had been walking for an hour and a half. She had been walking since she left Harry sitting on her couch. She had been the first to speak, the first to pull away, the first to get up from the couch. And, true to form, she needed to process. She needed to move and process. Things were nowhere near settled, nowhere near easy. But the yelling and the fighting and the tension was too much and she needed to take a break. Being the completely too good to be true man that he was, Harry had swallowed his words and his emotions and let her walk away without a fight. He was done fighting too; a teeming headache building behind his eyes, an ache settling in his stomach.

So she had pulled on her boots, wrapped up in her coat and tugged on her hat. And she was walking. She had walked out of her place, nodding to Nathan as she passed him, and out into the chilly, drizzly October night. It was still early evening but the sun had gone down and the air was crisp.

It was exactly what she needed to clear her mind.

She loved him; this she knew. This she never doubted. He was wonderful. He was amazing. And he deserved somebody who wasn't going to crash every time something like this came up. He deserved better than that. He deserved strong, fearless; unshakable.

She knew that.

That had been her at one point. That was who she was. She was resilient and unflinching. She was all of those things. Or she had been.

She knew that too.

With every step on the pavement, with every breath she took, she was making sure that she was still in fact, all of those things. She wanted to spend her life with this man. She wanted to marry him and take his name and have his babies. She wanted to shield him from harm and protect him and it was a staggering realization that she was never going to be able to do that. It hurt her in ways she had never been hurt that this was the reality. And it shocked her in ways that she had never been shocked that this hadn't sunk into her stubborn brain.

And then there was Harry.

He was mad. No, she shook her head. He wasn't mad. He was frustrated and confused and...

"Tired," she spoke the word out loud; seeing her breath in the cold air. Her eyes welled up. She was tired too.

She had been walking for an hour and a half when she finally came to a stop. She was standing outside a coffee house and, because she sought warmth, she went in. She ordered her drink and, when the lady smiled sweetly at her and asked her how she was, Maddie smiled big and answered,

"I'm wonderful, thank you." And then, because she sought solitude, she went outside to one of the small tables set up; choosing one off to the side and slightly secluded. Willing to trade the chill for the quiet, she sat down to drink her coffee.
Keeping her face calm and happy, she allowed her mind to wander. So much so that she began to tune out her surroundings. She didn't see the people coming and going, she didn't take in the scattered few customers who were at other tables or looking at the view from the corner, she didn't hear the music that drifted from the coffee house every time the door opened. And she most definitely didn't realize who was standing in front of her before his voice broke into her thoughts.

"Doctor," she recognized his voice instantly.

"Bishop," she smiled before her eyes lifted to his. He was bundled up with his own cup of coffee.

"Do you mind if I join you?"

"Of course not," she waved and he sat.

"I'm guessing you saw the article," Maddie spoke softly and with a well-trained smile.

"Straight to the point, huh? I like that." Bishop nodded. "Yes. I saw it."

"Is that why you're coincidentally here at...wait..." Her brow furrowed. "How did you know I was here?" She hadn't told anyone where she was going; she didn't even know where she was going when she set out.

"You don't want to know," he shook his head and when she narrowed her eyes, he sighed and held up his phone. "Twitter."

"Twitter?" She laughed. "Wow. Of course; twitter."

"How are you doing?"

"Ha..." Maddie played with the cup in front of her as she thought; taking a breath and glancing around to check for their privacy before she looked up to him. "How do you do it Bishop?"

"Stay so smashingly handsome? I work out, eat well, and I play very hard..."

"Nice." Maddie rolled her eyes.

"Do what?" He grew more serious as the chuckles faded.

"Sit by, silently, while they come at him?"

"Ah..." Bishop took a drink from his cup and leaned forward; resting his arms on the table. "Is that what this is about? You're worried about him?"

"Of course I'm worried about him."

"You don't need to be worried about him." Bishop almost wanted to laugh at the idea. "Do you have any idea how many articles and photos have alluded to his randy ways?"

"Randy?" Maddie snickered.

"Tons," Bishop ignored her.

"That doesn't make me feel any better."
"I didn't say I was here to make you feel better."

"Why are you here?"

"Coffee," he grinned with a wink.

"Does he know you're here?"

"Absolutely not." Bishop shook his head. "He would actually probably be incredibly pissed if he knew I was here."

"Are you going to answer my question?" Maddie studied him; curious. "How do you sit by and let it happen to him?"

"Let it?" Bishop laughed again. "What would you like me to do about it Maddie? Take on the British media? International media? American media? Do you have any idea the kinds of giants we're talking about? Any idea the power of the machine that is the press? The paparazzi? Is that what you're planning on doing? Taking them on? Proving them wrong? Let me tell you something...you will lose. No contest. You lose; every time. They win; every time."

"But..."

"But nothing." He shook his head. "Come on, Doctor. You're an expert in Human Behavior, let's play this out. They write an article calling Harry a cheater and that riles you up. And you being riled up, riles him up—because while I think there are very few things in this world that are going to get him to come out swinging, you are most definitely one of them. So, you're upset and that makes him mad and what do they get? Out of this two bit piece of trash article that nobody believes anyway? They get a reaction from His Royal Highness. And now the ball is rolling. Because now they know that if they want a reaction from Harry all they have to do is..."

"I get it," Maddie held up her hand; her mind turning into professional mode for the briefest of moments. "You're right. I know you are. I know..."

"Do you?" Bishop eyed her. "Because Harry knows. And we know. You most certainly should know."

"I..."

"This is Harry's world, Maddie."

"But..."

"This is Harry's world."

"Bishop..."

"This is Harry's world."

"How many times are you going to say that?"

"Until you get it. This is his world. Ignoring everything that the press throws at him; that's his world. Letting them think that he takes home women every other night. Actually I don't even think they think that...but letting them print it. That's his world. It's the same force that he takes with him when he shines the light on the children of Lesotho or the people of Bendal. It's the same machine. He starts tangling with it too much and..." Bishop trailed off; shaking his head. "This is his world Maddie. You either live in it or you don't."

"I know," her voice was soft as she looked down at her hands.

"I'm sorry if I'm being too harsh."

"You're not." Bishop was so right; so completely fucking right. She shook her head as she came to terms with that.

"This is how we do it," he reached out to pat her hand.

"What?"

"This is how we protect him. We make sure that the people surrounding him are among the strongest."

"Are you kicking me out?"

"No!" He laughed. "I'm bringing you in. Maddie...we surround him with a haven of strong friends; with people who love him, people who he never has to explain the articles to because we already know. We make him laugh, we make jokes. We place bets."

"Bets? What kinds of bets?"

"Well...for instance...I'll bet you five bucks that the follow up story is going to be about the dissed doctor," he pointed to her, "seeking solace with Harry's best friend..." Bishop pointed to himself and then nodded to a woman taking their photo with her phone.

"Oh God." Maddie groaned internally. He was right.

"You taking my bet?"

"What happened to me Bishop? I used to be strong," she sighed and looked to Bishop. "I used to be so confident and resilient and..." She so desperately wanted to be that safe haven for Harry.

"You still are," he cut in; relaxing his stance a bit. "You've been at this for six months Maddie, cut yourself some slack. It's daunting and difficult and it wears you down sometimes. Harry's been doing this forever; even I've been here for a long time. You are strong and confident and resilient. You're also human; protective and emotional and..."

"Hey."

"Am I wrong?"

"No. It's just...they've taken so much from him, you know. His childhood, his privacy, his...God Bishop....his mother..." Her voice was low as tears sprang to her eyes. Without batting an eye, Bishop kept on,

"And now you."
"What?"

"Listen, Harry is strong and loyal and I love him almost more than one man should probably love another and still call himself heterosexual. I cannot think of one single person on the entire planet who I would want on my side more than him. I have known him a very long time and I have been by his side when some serious shit has gone down and I can tell you, without a doubt, that he loves you more than...more than anything. He would go to the mats for you Maddie. But..." Bishop took a deep breath. "If he thinks that being with him—that this life is going to break you, going to take you down, he will walk away from you in a second." All of the air rushed from Maddie's lungs as Bishop's words sank in. "He won't be the reason you fall apart. It would kill him."

"Wow..." She exhaled and he rushed ahead.

"Oh God. That was too far, wasn't it. I'm sorry."

"No, no," Maddie shook her head. "It wasn't. It was...wow..." She sat back in her chair and looked at Bishop; startled by how on target he was. "How did you...That was incredibly insightful."

"Not just a hat rack, my friend," Bishop tapped his head. "You remind me so much of my friend Collins right now. It's the strangest thing; trippy really."

"Fantastic." Bishop smiled and continued. "You know, there was this band once that famously said All You Need is Love..."

"This band?" Maddie laughed. "You mean The Beatles?"

"You've heard of them!" He pointed at her.

"A little bit, yes."

"I'm not sure if that's true. I'm not sure that all you need is love. I mean, it helps but that can't be all you need, can it?"

"No," Maddie shook her head. "I don't think it is."

"Yeah," he nodded; figuring she would agree with him. "Can I be frank with you?"

"You haven't been already?" She raised her eyebrows and waved her hand, signaling him to continue.

"Only you can decide if you can ride this storm out. You have to ask yourself; is this what I want for my life? Does he love me enough for this? Do I love him enough for this? Is this person, what he brings to my life, this love...is this going to be enough to make up for all the sacrifices I am going to have to make?" He paused for a beat. "And if you decide that the answer is yes, if you decide to stay, you're going to have to toughen up about the press. Because yes, it's annoying and yes, I would imagine that it's scary. But it's going nowhere. It's a part of him and, if you're in for the long haul, it's a part of you."

"You're right," Maddie nodded; her mind moving into reflective mode. "God Bishop, you're so right."
"And..." He reached out to take her hand in his, his eyes warm and gentle. "And we'll be here for you too. We'll know without explanation that Harry would never step out on you. We'll surround you with a space where you can laugh and make jokes and..."

"And place bets?" Her eyes twinkled as she squeezed his hand. "That's very kind of you Bishop. Thank you."

"Listen, it's freezing out here. Can I see you home?" Bishop finished his coffee with one big sip.

"No," Maddie shook her head; finishing her coffee and rising to her feet. "I appreciate the offer and the talk..." She moved to hug him then. "Thank you Bishop." Pressing a kiss to his cheek, she stepped away. "You have no idea how much you've helped me tonight."

"It's still early..." He shrugged. "Want to have a drink or a dance or..."

"Ha!" She laughed; moving further away. "No. There's something I need to take care of."

"Something or someone?" Bishop grinned.

"Wait..." She turned back to him; concern washing over her face. "He's not...you don't think he hates me now, do you?"

"No," Bishop shook his head, smiling at her. "I don't think he hates you now. Did you not hear anything I just said? Do we need to do this again?"

"No, no," she shook her head with a small smile. "Good night Bishop."

"Good night Madeline." Bishop waved at her as she hurried away from him.

With a newfound warmth and mission, Maddie hurried up the street; pulling her phone from her pocket and dialing.

"Hello, it's Maddie. I'm so sorry to bother you but I was wondering if you might be able to help me with something?"
Maddie took a deep breath, knowing that if she stood there any longer without knocking she was likely to be hauled away by his protection officers. Every step she had taken to this point had been fueled by Bishop's words, by her newfound resolve but now, as she was about to face the music, the anxiety was beginning to edge out her confidence.

"Pull it together Forrester," she muttered to herself. Taking a deep breath and all of her strength, she reached out and knocked on the door.

Her eyes welled up for the umpteenth time that night as she waited those five aching seconds for somebody to come to the door. She hoped it was Jim; she knew him the best, had seen him the most often and, for some crazy reason, felt a little easier about him seeing her in this state of perpetual breakdown. The opening of the door startled her and her eyes flew up.

It was him. Harry; dressed for bed and stunned to see her.

"Maddie..." He breathed through the spike in his heart rate; glancing around outside his home. "How did you..."

"Kate," she answered. "I asked her to help me get in and..."

"Ah yes," Harry chuckled dryly, despite his headache. "I figured that someday a friendship between the two of you would come around to get me." Maddie nodded and looked to the ground.

"Do you want me to leave?" She hadn't even thought that he wouldn't want her to show up like this. Who knew what had gone through his mind during the time that she was away?

"I don't," he shook his head; his eyes registering the hurt he felt. "I just don't want to fight with you anymore tonight." He let out a long, exhaustive breath. "I hate fighting with you."

"I hate fighting with you too," she blinked at the tears in her eyes.

"I know," he nodded; softening at her tears. "But nothing about what I said earlier has changed. Nothing is going to change. This is how it is and..."

"I know..." Maddie cut in; having known this wasn't going to be easy. "I..." She looked down at her hands; remembering the gift bag she had brought with her. She held it out to him. "I brought a peace offering." Harry stepped out of the doorway, reaching for the bag. Maddie watched as he opened it, a smile spreading across his serious face.

"Are these..."

"Yes," Maddie nodded; breathing a bit easier as his smile stretched.

"You know they're my favorite."
moment and she could see the moment he decided to let her in; his jaw loosened and his shoulders relaxed.

"I'm not really a Crown Prince, you know," he arched his eyebrows over his tired eyes.

"Yeah..." Maddie nodded and gulped at the lump in her throat. "Harry..." She wiped at her suddenly teary eyes. "I don't know what to say. I don't have any...I feel like my emotions have just been put into a bag and shaken up and... It's been a long day; with the magazine and the photos and then...I'm sorry. That's what I want to say. I'm sorry. I was upset and frustrated and I was wrong to ask you to...Please let me fix things with you. Please help me fix this?" She felt a new sense of scatter move into her heart as she contemplated rejection. "Or is this...is this the end of the line for you?"

"No," his voice was full of emotion as he shook his head. "Of course it's not the end of the..." Harry moved to the side; feeling bad that he hadn't done so sooner. "Come inside? Please."

"Okay," she breathed; tears of relief coming to the surface. "Thank you." Stepping into his home, she paused in the foyer as Harry shut the door behind her. Taking a deep breath, she turned to face him. "Listen I..."

"Shh..." Harry bypassed words and instead pulled her to him; wrapping his arms around her he squeezed her tight, close. Stunned, it took Maddie a beat before her arms moved around his waist; sinking into him. "I'm so glad you're here," Harry buried his face in her hair; breathing slow; refusing to let her go. He had been sick since he left her place; worried that the other shoe had finally dropped, that this had been enough, that the idea of dealing with this forever had finally settled in. When he opened the door and saw her standing there, he had just about fallen apart; shattered from the relief he felt, from the near miss at losing everything that mattered to him. His arms tightened even more as she nuzzled her face to his chest. She felt so safe, so secure; so taken care of.

"Harry..." Maddie turned her head up, her chin pressing to his chest. He nodded, knowing there were words to be said, things to be discussed. His arms loosened around her, his hands moving up her back to the sides of her head. His fingers twisted in her hair as his thumbs ran across her temples.

"I wasn't sure that you would come back to me."

"I wasn't sure you would be here when I did," she took a shaky breath. Her hand reached up to take his; pulling it from her face but holding it tight. "Harry..."

"We should talk," he smiled.

"We should."

"Do you want to stay?" He was hopeful. "I could put on tea and we could eat these in our pajamas." He lifted the bag up.

"Hmmm," she grinned at the thought. "I didn't bring my pajamas."

"Even better," he smirked. "Maybe you should leave some pajamas here. You know, for moments such as these."

"Maybe I should," she breathed easier. "I can stay."
"Fantastic," Harry looked visibly relieved. "I'm going to go put on tea..."

"You know how to put on tea?" She arched an eyebrow playfully.

"And you..." He ignored her. "You can go up to my room and put on anything you like."

"Yeah?"

"Yeah." He nodded. Maddie watched him for a moment; letting her hand run down his arm, stopping to squeeze his hand before she turned to head up the stairs.

Maddie wasn't sure to what exactly to credit her more relaxed and comfortable feeling; the procurement of Harry's sweatpants and a t-shirt or the fact that he had invited her in, asked her to stay. Either way, when she rejoined him in the kitchen, she already felt much better than she had knocking on the door; more hopeful. Standing in the doorway to the kitchen, she watched as he stood over the tea kettle; cups already out on the informal table.

"He cooks..." She spoke softly as she stepped into the room. He looked up to her; his face brightening.

"He boils water," he corrected, looking her over. "Those look enormous on you."

"They are. But they have a drawstring," she smiled. "I strongly considered your polo socks and a button down, but I thought that might distract us both from the talk we need to have."

"It most definitely would," he nodded with a smirk. "Smart thinking. Maybe later?"

"Absolutely later." Their eyes held for a moment, bringing them back to each other before the kettle whistled out into the room.

"Tea?"

"Please." Maddie followed Harry to the table where he poured two glasses. Sitting down in a chair, she took the glass from him and smiled. "Thank you."

"You're welcome," Harry sat in the chair opposite of her and reached for one of his treats; pushing the plate to her.

"Not yet, thank you." She shook her head and took a breath. Here goes nothing, she thought. "I ran into Bishop tonight."

"Oh?" Harry's brow furrowed. "Where?"

"I was having coffee and he...I don't know; something about twitter." She shrugged. "It doesn't matter. He said something though, quite a few things, but something that really hit me."

"What was that?"

"He said..." Maddie took a deep breath. "He said that you would walk away from me in a second if you thought this was going to break me." Harry was stunned speechless for the briefest of moments as she launched them right into the discussion. Leaning forward, he rested his arms on the table; his eyes growing serious.

"Sometimes Bishop thinks he's helping when he really isn’t," she could see the anger rising with the red in his cheeks.

"He is," her hand reached across the table to rest on his. "He did. He helped me...understand things a little bit better. He helped me see it in the right perspective. I just," she swallowed a sip of tea and focused on him. "Would you? Walk away?"

"Maddie..." He breathed.

"Even when it hurts..." She reminded him; her eyes shining with unshed tears.

"If I thought my life was going to destroy yours?" Harry blinked. "Yes. It wouldn't be easy and it would most definitely not be what I wanted but...if I thought that in ten years you were going to be a fragment of who you are today, because of this? Yes. I would."

"This isn't going to break me, Harry."

"I know that."

"I don't know that you do. I think that when I left you to go for a walk, you left thinking that I wasn't going to make it, that I was going to realize I couldn't do this, that I couldn't handle this and...I think you've been sitting here contemplating walking away."

"I..."

"And maybe that's what I get for walking away without explanation," she hurried on before he could argue with her, before he could agree with her. "When I said earlier that I wasn't sure you would be here when I came back," she took a breath. "What I really should have said was...I wasn't sure I deserved to have you be here when I did."

"Hey..."

"I really dropped the ball on this one Harry. I told you I could take it and then when it hits, I walked out the door without explanation or..."

"No. Stop for just... Maddie you...you've uprooted your entire life. You've moved to London; you're living in a new place, you have a new job, you've had to buy new clothes because God knows it's colder here than it ever was in Bendal. You've jumped into this fish bowl where people follow you around with cameras, write stories about you, and show up at the worst possible moments..." He took a breath. "When I said I couldn't do this forever, I meant it. I can't watch you fall apart every time..." He took a moment. "But I didn't mean that I was walking out the door. I wasn't contemplating walking away. I think the least I can do is allow you a few moments of..."

"Craziness?"

"Your words, not mine," he smiled. Maddie's smile matched his as she nodded.

"The thing is, when I was walking around I wasn't falling apart. I was...I was pulling it together. When I said I can't do this forever, I meant it. But my walk wasn't about deciding if I was staying or going. I decided a long time ago that I was staying. My walk was about what I needed to do, how things needed to change so that I could...walk in this world a little easier."

"Really?" Harry breathed; tears springing to his eyes as his fears from earlier surfaced.

"Really," she nodded. "You know, I think maybe you and I could be a little better with the communication."

"Ha!" Harry laughed; leaning back in his chair. "I suppose you're right."

"I need to stop letting stuff like this get to me. But you need to stop thinking that every time I'm processing, I'm thinking of leaving. Because I'm not. I'm not thinking about leaving."

"Okay."

"I'm not thinking about leaving."

"Okay."

"Harry..."

"I get it."

"Do you? I really want you to. If we both worry incessantly about the other then when things happen, I'm not going to want to tell you how I feel about it because I won't want you to think I'm breaking and..."

"I get it," he reached across the table for her hand.

"Maybe it's time for the kid gloves to come off?" Maddie held his hand in hers.

"What do you mean?"

"This is whole thing, the press, the way you handle the press...it's a part of my life now, part of who I am. I just don't quite know how to negotiate it. This, today...it wasn't my finest moment. I know that. But this isn't something that comes naturally to me and I find that...terribly frustrating." She let out a deep breath. "I need your help."

"My help?"

"Yes," she grinned. "When we were in Colorado, I taught you how to be a farmer. Now, you can teach me how to..."

"Be my girlfriend?" Harry laughed.

"No," she shook her head. "I know how to do that. I need to know how to be...a royal girlfriend." Even Maddie couldn't help but roll her eyes at her choice of words.

"Ah."

"There is a difference between the two roles, you know."

"I suppose you're right," he agreed. She had a point. He had always felt that he had multiple roles in his life. "So you want me to teach you...to be a farmer."
"Yes," she chuckled. "And we can think of today like...your trip into the hen house."

"Had to bring that up did you?" He shook his head with a wide grin.

"Well, it wasn't the most graceful and it wasn't your favorite part. But it didn't send you running away, refusing to try. It didn't make you not want to do it," she shrugged and held his eyes. "I want to do it. I want to handle stuff like this better. I want to get my strength back and I want to not worry about the hits you take on a daily basis. I want to let this stuff roll off my back...I just need help. I need you. What do you say? Will you help me?"

"How could I say no to that? To you?" His hand reached up to stroke her cheek.

"I might not always get it right, but I want to," she leaned into his hand. They sat there for a moment, just like that; connected to each other in a literal and metaphorical sense. "Just don't forget, you've had years to develop through this craziness into the man you are today. Years and years; and a whole lot of family and staff. I have only you. And Bishop."

"Just me," he shook his head. "I'm going to kill Bishop."

"Don't. He's been so good to me."

"I'm sure he has."

"He has. If it weren't for him, I would probably still be walking around London and not sitting here with you now."

"Yeah..." He was smiling as he asked her, "why is it again that you're still sitting here again?"

"Because...because fuck them; that's why." Maddie threw her hands in the air; shocking Harry. He opened his mouth and nothing came out but an amused laugh.

"Because I'm not going to let this get to me. Because I'm not going to let them control me. Because tomorrow when they run the story about me seeking solace with your best friend, I want to be able to laugh at it. Because I don't want to hide. Because I can't take them down..." She grew a little sad. "I can't control what they write about you. I can't control what they've taken from you. But I can make damn sure that I am not one of those things." She took a deep breath. "I can't promise I'll be perfect at it or that it won't get to me time and again but..."

"But fuck them?" Harry smirked.

"Exactly." She pushed her tea cup across the table towards him. "Do you have anything stronger than tea Your Royal Highness?"

"Ha..." He shook his head at her and rose to his feet. "Beer or wine?"

"Beer."

"Coming right up." It was only moments before Harry returned with two opened bottles.

"Thank you," she took a long drink and sighed.
"I think we're getting better at this communication thing."

"It's a process," Maddie sighed; a moment of silence settling over them before Harry's head cocked to the side contemplatively.

"Also what did you say before about seeking solace with my best friend?" Maddie laughed at the look on his face.

"I'll tell you tomorrow," she reached out for his hand. "How are you doing right now?"

"Better. Much better."

"Do you forgive me?" Her eyes flashed vulnerable for a moment.

"There is absolutely nothing to forgive here."

"I'm sorry anyway."

"I'm sorry too."

"I promise I won't ever ask you to go to the press for me again," Maddie met his eyes.

"I promise that I will lead with the important details first," Harry offered with a light chuckle.

"I promise that I will always come back to you after I'm done processing," she let him kiss the tips of her fingers.

"And I promise that I will do my best to help you navigate this new role of yours."

"It's a lot of promises we're making tonight..." Maddie finished her beer and smiled sleepily at him across the table.

"Can I make one more?" Harry arched one eyebrow.

"Sure," Maddie nodded.

Settling his empty beer bottle on the table next to him, he stood up; his chair pushing out behind him.

With his hands resting on the table, he leaned across to her; his lips seeking and finding hers. It was the first time they had kissed since the fight, the first time that day, and it held so much in it; emotion, passion, forgiveness. Maddie felt tears draw to her eyes just as he pulled back. Opening his eyes, he didn't blink once before he said, "as long as you want me, you will be the only person I kiss, Madeline. You never, ever have to doubt that. As long as you want me..." And then, because she was always going to want him, because she just might break into tears otherwise, she moved her head slightly; bringing their lips back together.
Chapter 55

Maddie and Harry eventually moved on from the cheating scandal. Amazingly, the bloggers rose quickly to Harry's defense; having recognized the photos from a year earlier—chastising the magazine on the web for trying to push them off as new. Maddie learned a lot those first few days following the magazine fiasco. First, she was able to witness the power and research capabilities of Harry's slightly obsessive fans. And second, Bishop was right. So, while Maddie handed over five dollars to Bishop because a picture of the two of them had absolutely hit the web, the idea that Harry had cheated on Maddie in the park was all but faded from the meme.

As October gave way to November and the remains of the mild weather gave way to the cold, the two of them settled into their routine. And the press was back to reporting their every move; drinks with his normal crew, reports of late nights at Leo's club, and one picture of Maddie trying on Union Jack mittens just to make Harry laugh—a picture that was so adorable Harry honestly contemplated calling the magazine for a copy. Though he refrained.

It was a particularly chilly night when Maddie and Harry met up with Matt and Ella to celebrate Ella's birthday. With reservations at one of the more popular eateries in the city, they were all dressed up and ready for a fun night together. The waiter had taken their orders and was back pouring champagne into their glasses as Harry cleared his throat and smiled at the three of them.

"In honor of Ella's birthday, I would like to make a traditional Irish toast."

"Aw," Ella's head tipped to the side. "That's sweet."

"I'm glad you think so." With a twinkle in his eye, Harry lifted his glass. "Ella love, May you die in bed at 95, shot by a jealous spouse."

"Harry!" Maddie nudged him.

"You know me so well," Ella laughed.

"Happy birthday," Harry clinked his glass to Ella's as Matt and Maddie joined in.

"Happy Birthday!"

"Thank you," Ella smiled wide as she drank from her glass; eyeing Harry across the table. "That was perfect."

"So Maddie," Matt looked to her. "Ella was telling me about the day the two of you met."

"Oh God," Maddie groaned as Ella burst into laughter.

"Wait," Harry looked between them. "I don't think I've ever heard this story."

"And I don't think you ever want to," Maddie shook her head.

"Oh I think you do," Ella nodded at him.

"I'm going to defer to Ella's judgment on this one," Ella leaned forward; motioning for Harry to do the same.
"Ella," Maddie warned.

"Oh hush," Ella waved her hand. "It's my birthday, remember."

"Fine," Maddie sighed dramatically and took a big drink from her glass before smiling hazily. "Go ahead."

"Way to be a good sport," Harry winked at her; his hand patting her knee under the table, where it rested as he turned to Ella, "let's hear it."

"So," Ella swallowed a sip; her eyes dancing with humor. "I was actually in Bendal before Maddie and, when she was scheduled to come, there was this...infestation in one of the buildings and she had no place to stay."

"Infestation?" Matt raised his eyebrows.

"You don't want to know," Maddie shook her head with a light shudder.

"So," Ella continued, meeting Maddie's eyes for a shared smile. "I had this small..."

"Tiny," Maddie cut in.

"Tiny two bedroom place and, being the magnanimous person that I am, I offered up my second bedroom. And then Maddie arrived."

"My first day was..." Maddie looked to Ella for the right word.

"Traumatic?" Ella offered, drinking from her glass.

"Long," Maddie smiled. "Long and sweaty and... I barely had time be introduced to Ella. So, I was exhausted when I got back and I went to my room and unpacked one of my two little bags and I took a shower before we were going to have a late dinner and get to know each other. When I got out, I lit a candle."

"To get rid of the smell imbedded in your nostrils," Ella suggested with a nostalgic laugh; remembering some of their happier times in Bendal.

"Yes," Maddie nodded. "So there I was in this robe, my hair wrapped up in a towel and I don't really know what I was doing. I was reaching for something when..."

"All of a sudden, I'm down the hall in the living area and I hear Maddie just...screaming...ELLA! ELLA! Help! Help!"

"Help?" Matt's eyebrows went up.

"She was on fire," Ella snickered.

"What?" Harry's eyes swept to Maddie who was laughing.

"When I reached for...whatever it was, my sleeve touched the flame on the candle and started on fire. And when I saw that, I was surprised and lifted my arm up too quickly which lit the towel in my hair on fire and..."
"You lit yourself on fire?" Harry looked to her, a smile creeping through the serious expression on his face.

"I did," Maddie nodded. "But thankfully Ella was there. She came running down the hall and..."

"And there she was in a robe and a towel and there was fire and, acting on instinct..."

"She tears the towel out of my head, strips the robe off of me and is stomping on them and just like that...the fire was out,"

"And Maddie was naked," Ella clapped her hands together.

"What?" Harry laughed.

"Well, I tore the robe and the towel off of her..."

"And I had just gotten out of the shower..."

"So she was naked. But not on fire anymore." All four laughed.

"And there we were just...looking at each other," Maddie winked across the table at Ella.

"Maddie says 'thank you so much,'" Ella reached to hold Maddie's hand. "I tell her that dinner will be ready in five minutes and...."

"We've been friends ever since," Maddie finished.

"Well," Ella shrugged with a cheeky grin. "Once you've seen Maddie naked, you can't help but love her."

"I'll drink to that," Harry chuckled, reaching his glass out to clink with Ella's—who was laughing along with him.

"Hey!" Maddie nudged him.

"Come here," Harry leaned to kiss Maddie.

"Well..." Maddie smiled and raised her glass to her friend one more time, "to the first—of many times—Ella saved my life."

"To Ella," Harry lifted his glass.

"To Ella," Matt followed suit.

"Aw, you guys..." Ella blushed slightly but lifted her glass.

With a clink of glass and warm smiles all around, the waiter returned with their food; dinner had begun.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

When dinner ended, Maddie led the three of them—along with Harry's Security Officer Brad—back to her place where she had Ella's requested dessert ready and waiting.

"Banana cake?" Harry made a face as he looked at the creation on Maddie's dining table.

"With cream cheese frosting," Ella grinned wide; running her finger along the side, licking frosting from it greedily. "It's Maddie's specialty."

"How do you have a specialty that I don't know about?" Harry looked to his girlfriend who was adding candles to the cake.

"I have lots of other specialties that only you know about," Maddie smiled wickedly at him. "It's okay if you don't know about this one."

"Ohhh..." Harry chuckled; his eyes narrowing at her suggestively. "I like that answer."

"I would like it if you two could hold it together until I leave," Ella tried to glare at him but failed miserably. Matt just shook his head and laughed.

"I'm sorry love," Harry leaned to kiss Ella's cheeks. "I'll try my best. Can I get you anything to drink?"

"Hmmmm..." Ella tapped her lips, silently ruminating over how at home Harry made himself in Maddie's place. "More champagne?"

"Coming up!" He clapped his hands together and moved to the kitchen. Though the argument could be made that every last one of them had consumed more than their fair share of champagne at dinner, it was a party and nobody was driving. Locating a bottle quite easily, he popped the cork and reached for some glasses.

By the time he returned to the group, Maddie was lighting the last of the candles.

One round of Happy Birthday, two bottles of champagne and three and half pieces of cake (altogether) later, the four of them were scattered around Maddie's living room; tipsy and giggly. With her head in Harry's lap, Maddie stretched out on one of her couches while Harry played with the fingers on one of her hands. On the opposite couch was Matt and Ella; cuddled together. All of their glasses had been refreshed and music was playing throughout the room.

"Let's play a game," Ella suggested; Harry looked up interested.

"What kind of game?" He asked

"Truth or dare?" Ella suggested with a smirk.

"No way," Matt groaned.

"Next." Maddie agreed; waving her hand.

"Aw come on," Ella pleaded.

"Okay," Maddie pulled herself up slightly to look at her friend. "Ella, truth—who is on your 'free pass' list?" Ella about spit up her champagne.

"Okay. Different game." She held her hands out, palms up, in surrender to Maddie.
"There you go," Maddie shrugged, laying back down in Harry's lap. "How about cards?"

"Now we're talking," Matt perked up.

"I could play some cards," Harry grinned, tapping the tip of Maddie's nose with his finger.

"I'll go grab some," Maddie allowed Harry to pull her back up off his lap. "You guys get set up at the table and I'll be right back." She felt Harry slap at her ass as she walked away, heading to her room to get a deck of cards.

She was only gone for a few minutes and, when she returned to the room, the other three had cleared everything from the table with the exception of their drinks and were waiting excitedly for her to return.

"Okay, what game are we playing?" She took her seat. "Hearts?"

"Cribbage?" Matt suggested.

"Whist," Ella decided.

"Whist it is," Maddie pointed at her best friend, shuffling the cards over and over again.

"Huh, that's weird," Harry muttered to himself; pulling his vibrating phone from his pocket with confusion etched across his forehead. "I'm sorry, I'm going to have to take this." He smiled apologetically around the table as he rose to his feet.

"Go ahead," Ella waved. "I have to powder my nose anyway."

"I'll be right back," Harry's hand ran along Maddie's shoulder, squeezing gently as he stepped away from her into the living area. Maddie smiled at Matt while she began to deal; her eye watching Harry as he held the phone to his ear.

He paced; walking the length of her living room several times, slowly and methodically. And then there was this moment, he was walking and suddenly came to a stop. Turning completely around, his eyes met hers and she knew; something was wrong. He turned away from her just as quickly, but she caught it. In less than a minute, he had disconnected the call and stood still and stoic in her living room, looking up at the painting he had given her for her birthday that hung over her couch for a beat before turning to face them. Stuffing his phone back into his pocket, he rejoined them. Moving next to her chair his eyes stared off into space, as if he were contemplating his next move.

"Harry? Is everything okay?" Maddie reached her hand out to take his; feeling the instinctual need to comfort him. She watched his Adam's Apple bob up and down as he swallowed a couple of times.

"That was my father. There was an earthquake. A 6.5 on the Richter scale."

"Oh my God," Ella gasped from behind Harry. "That's..."

"Bad," Matt supplied and Harry nodded. "Substantial structural damage, foundation shifting...if it's in a populated area, massive casualties..."

"Oh my God," Maddie shook her head at the thought; her eyes looking back up to where Harry stood; tugging on his hand. "Harry, where was it?" With a deep, heavy sigh, Harry lowered down so that he was squatting next to her chair; his hands holding hers, his eyes meeting hers with great gravity. Instinctually, she sucked in a breath just a split second before he told her.

"Bendal."
Chapter 56

The room, once lively with celebration, sobered instantly. Maddie felt her stomach turn as she met Harry's eyes; her hand flying to her throat.

"Oh my God," Ella whispered as Matt moved to her side.

"Khenda? Collins?" Maddie's face drained of all color as she said the two words that everyone was thinking. Harry's eyes were heavy as he blinked; his hand flexing on her knee.

"I don't know."

"Oh my God..." Ella repeated, her eyes welled with tears.

"I'm trying to..." Harry swallowed the lump in his throat. "Destruction is pretty expansive and I can't get through to a cell phone and..."

"I'm sure the towers are down," Matt offered, his hand resting on Ella's shoulder.

"Harry..." Maddie's eyes searched his; looking for answers she knew she wouldn't be able to find there.

"My father is making phone calls right now—trying to reach them through back channels and I'm going to try a few others, but..." He fought back the tears that threatened to rise to his eyes; knowing that if he went over the edge, they were all going with him. "But, I know nothing right now. Okay?"

"Okay," Maddie nodded; taking a deep breath and trying to pull it together.

"Okay?" Harry turned to look at Ella who nodded her understanding.

And then, as if on cue, the three of them forced their minds to switch to a different mode; crisis management. Though every single one of them was right at the line of panic, they were professional enough, experienced enough to back it off—at least for the moment, at least until they knew for sure.

"Maybe..." Ella cleared her throat. "Maybe I can get through to another doctor or nurse? I've kept in touch with a lot of people over the years..." She moved then, searching for her purse to find her phone.

"I can try the main office. I met with somebody there not too long ago..." Maddie squeezed Harry's hands in her lap and moved to stand up.

Harry rose to his feet and, watching Maddie move, watching Ella move, he pulled his phone from his pocket, took a moment to collect his thoughts and dialed. Matt watched, feeling helpless as they mobilized. Ella sat next to him at the table, tapping her pen as she flipped through her planner, dialing. Maddie pulled her laptop out and powered it up while scrolling through her phone logs to call Marquita, the agent she had met with when she was coming off her furlough.

It was ten agonizingly long minutes, ten minutes filled with the worst kind of anticipation. If Maddie had been able to step back and look at the moment, she would have found it incredibly interesting, the way they all flew into action; working together but separate from each other. She would have also been able to see the way Harry bit at his fingernails nervously as he leaned against the back of her couch. She would have noticed the way Ella tapped incessantly with her pen; clicking and clicking against the table. And she would have been able to stop herself from nearly biting a hole in her own bottom lip.

It was ten, terribly slow minutes before Harry stood up straight and shouted out, "I got it!"

Abandoning the computer, dropping the pen, Maddie and Ella rushed to his side. He held his phone tight to his ear, covering the other with his other hand; answering only in nods and uh-huhs. His hand moved to cover the receiver as he caught them up,

"As per protocol, Khenda is to call and check in with a systems Administrator; reporting not only known casualties but known survivors. The Administrator knows they have some casualties, some doctors and...and some community members for sure, but he's checking to see if she's called in..." Harry trailed off, avoiding both of their eyes until the man on the other end returned. "Yes. I'm still here. L..." Harry's words stopped, his breathing halted; tears springing to his eyes. "She did? Khenda checked in..." His eyes flew to Maddie's and she saw it, the tiny crack in his interior that, had he lost her, just may have shattered. Next to her Ella let out a breath of relief as Maddie's hand moved to take Harry's free hand.

"And Collins?" Maddie raised her eyebrows.

"What about Collins?" Harry spoke into the phone. There was a moment's pause before he nodded, a moment where he schooled his features, a moment that may have been missed by a casual observer. But Maddie caught it and she felt a sob in her throat. Harry held tight to her fingers as he disconnected the call.

"Well?" Ella raised her eyebrows, having missed what Maddie caught.

"There's no word on Collins yet," his gaze was locked on Maddie's. "He was out with one of the doctor's doing a home visit when it happened."

"Of course," Maddie felt tears spill onto her cheeks as she dropped his hand and turned away from them. She had gone on many such visits with him when she had been there.

"They don't know," Harry reiterated. "They haven't heard one way or another. I'm sure that communications have dropped off as a result of the earthquake and they just haven't heard from him."

"You know," Matt spoke up. "If he was further out of town, he may have had a better chance at..." He looked down at his hands. "Sometimes being in the city, surrounded by poorly made buildings is worse than being in the country in smaller homes."

"See," Harry moved towards Maddie, letting his hand fall on her shoulder. "He wasn't reported as a casualty Maddie. They just don't know yet."

"So now what?" She turned wide, dark eyes to him. "We just..."

"We wait," he cupped her cheek. "The Administrator said he would call me as soon as he heard one way or another. We just have to wait."

"I'm not very good at waiting," Maddie tried for a smile, but her lips just twisted up.
"I know," his hand rubbed down her neck, massaging her shoulder as it moved.

"We could finish the card game?" Matt offered half-heartedly.

"No, not tonight," Ella smiled up at him for trying. "I'm too...you know...for cards."

Matt nodded as the room grew quiet; everybody's minds were somewhere else. The cards, the cake, the champagne; it had all flew from their minds after Harry's phone call.

"You know," Ella sighed. "I think maybe I'm going to head home..."

"You could stay here," Maddie looked to Ella. "You could sleep with me." Ella smiled at the thought; remembering the nights in Bendal when they would crawl in each other's beds.

"What about Harry?" Ella nodded her head to the man who stood, lost in thought.

"He'll be there too," Maddie shrugged as a very tiny chuckle passed around the group.

"Wow," Ella exhaled. "It's a rough night when nobody comments on that one."

"Yes it is," Maddie's eyes glossed over as she moved to hug Ella. "I love you."

"I love you too," she held tight to her friend; burying her head in her shoulder for a long moment before she pulled away. Turning to Harry, "you'll call me when you hear?"

"The absolute moment we hear," he nodded; holding her close. As he released her, she and Matt gathered their things and made their way out of Maddie's home. Maddie shut the door behind them and turned to face him; slumping as she leaned back against the door.

"I have a terrible feeling in my gut," she whispered to him; her eyes cast down at the floor.

"Yeah," Harry breathed. "I think that's from the four bottles of champagne..."

"Ha," Maddie felt a bubble of air burst through her lips as she wiped at her eyes.

"Maddie, look at me..." His voice was firm as he stepped closer to her. With a deep breath, she did as he requested. "We know nothing right now. Nothing. We can't freak out until there is a reason to freak out."

"I hate it when you're right, you know?"

"I do know," he smiled and held his hand out to her. "Come on. Let's go to bed."

"I'll never be able to sleep." But she pushed away from the door, taking his hand.

"Then we'll lay in the dark."

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

"I should be with her," Maddie's voice spoke into the dark room. They had dressed for bed hours ago; readying for their sleepless night as though there was nothing different about their routine. She didn't have to look over at him to know he was awake—that he would be awake as long as she was awake.

"Ella?" His voice was low, sleepy.

"Khenda."

"Love..." Harry started.

"She's all alone and waiting. She's..." Maddie's voice choked. "We can't sleep and we're thousands of miles away in a safe place and she's...God I don't even know if their house is still standing or if she has a bed and...and Collins."

"I know..." Harry's fingers, already intertwined with hers, tightened their hold on her hand.

"I should be with her. She shouldn't be alone while she waits. Nobody should be alone while they wait..." Her tears rolled, hot and plenty from the corners of her eyes to the pillow under her head.

"What would you say to her?" He asked; channeling all of his training and experience on the front lines into holding it together; don't panic until there is something to panic about. "If you were with her...what would you say?"

"Nothing," Maddie shook her head. "I would just be there." With a nod, Harry brought her hand to his lips for a kiss.

And the room grew silent; absolutely full of silence. Harry swallowed the lump in his throat, swallowed the memories that were threatening at the surface—those hours when he was waiting to hear about Maddie, to see the surgeon come from the OR, to find out if it had been too much, too late. Those hours when he didn't know if he'd kiss her again, if he'd hold her, if he'd ever get the chance to get a chance with her. He swallowed back the knowledge that a woman he adored, a woman he considered family, was sitting in the worst kind of purgatory.

He had no words of comfort for Maddie, nothing that would make any difference. And he wasn't one to try to placate her with disingenuous niceties. He had met her, had fallen for her in a world where everything was real and everything was up in the air. And neither of them had room in this moment for a bullshit, everything will be fine, answer.

So he held onto her and did as she desperately wanted to do for Khenda.

He was just there.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

There's this moment; a moment when somebody is past exhausted, when they've pushed their energies and capabilities to the end; a moment where the body steps in and simply takes over the controls. A person can only put off sleep, can only avoid slumber for so long. There almost always comes a point when the body shuts down; forcing the eyes closed, forcing the lungs to slow—trying to pull the mind into a restful place, allowing the body time to renew and refresh.

For Maddie that point came at 4:42 in the morning. She knew she had to work the next day, knew she needed her wits about her. But her stomach had protested, her heart had fought; she couldn't bring herself to rest when she knew that Khenda wasn't resting. But at 4:42 in the morning, her body took over; her eyelids thudding closed; welding shut. And finally, next to Harry, who had given in around 3:30, she drifted off to a shallow sort of sleep that was unlikely to provide her with any real rest.

And at 5:35, they were pulled from their sleep, jarred awake by the intense and alarming ring from Harry's phone. Maddie sat straight up; alert and shocked as Harry moved, fumbling with the items on her side table as he located his phone.

"Hello?" He sat up, turning away from her, his legs hanging off the edge of the bed. Maddie could hear only his side of the conversation; her heart thudded as everything from the night before welled in her chest. "This is he. Yes. Yes." And then there it was; silence. Maddie watched Harry's back, the outline of his shoulders in the dark room lit only slightly by the cloud covered moon outside. She watched as he nodded, watched as his shoulders slumped. She heard him inhale shakily before he spoke in a choked voice, a voice that spoke volumes. "Thank you. I appreciate the call. Good night." His phone fell from his fingers to the stand.

"Harry?" Maddie croaked. And then he said the words that would be ingrained in her brain for a very, very long time.

"He's fine."

"What?!" Maddie gasped, her hand moving to her chest; pressing to her flesh as though it would calm her pounding heart.

"He's..." Harry turned to her, tears in his eyes, relief etched on his face. "He called in himself ten minutes ago. He was out on a home visit and was barely affected by..." Harry's words fell flat as Maddie snatched her own phone from the stand and dialed. Holding her fingers to her lips in attempt to keep the release of the pent up tears at bay for just a moment longer, she waited for Ella to answer.

"He's fine," she blurted out; forgoing all formalities. "Harry just got off the phone with the Administrator. He called in himself. He's fine. He's fine...." Her eyes met Harry's as her tears slipped out. "He's fine. Yes. Yes." Maddie started laughing, talking to Harry, "Ella wants to know if she can come get in bed with us now."

"Ha!" Harry clapped his hands together. "I'm not sure I can handle the both of you, but I will try my hardest."

"I love you too Ella," Maddie grinned at Harry across her bed. "Yes. I'll call you tomorrow. Good night." Letting out the longest, slowest, breath of relief, Maddie let her phone rest on her stand.

As Maddie moved to him, climbing over her bed to jump into his arms, Harry felt enormous relief; relief that Collins was okay, relief that Khenda wasn't facing the worst news a person could hear, and relief that the tension filled waiting had been replaced with celebration. As the two of them toppled onto her bed in fits of kisses muffled with laughter, he had no idea that this sense of relief was only going to last a day before it was snatched away from him.
Chapter 57

The day following the earthquake was draining, to say the least. Harry had meetings lined up one after another and Maddie was at the hospital all day; and they were exhausted. Having had very little sleep, having put their emotions through the metaphorical wringer, they were both exhausted.

So, at the end of the day, when Maddie arrived at Harry's looking like one big gust of wind could topple her over, Harry wasn't the least bit surprised.

"Have you eaten?" He shut the door behind her, taking her coat.

"I honestly don't remember," a tired smile pulled at her lips.

"Bernard made pizza."

"I love Bernard," Maddie sighed, kicking off her heels. "I want to take him home with me."

"Yes well, he's incredibly loyal to the family and you can't have him," he pulled at her fingers, leading her to the kitchen. "But I will share my pizza with you."

"You do love me."

"I really do." While Maddie loaded her plate, Harry retrieved two bottles of beer from his fridge and they sat down at the table in the kitchen.

"How were your meetings?" Maddie lifted her eyebrows, an attempt at conversation.

"I don't know," he shook his head with a faded smile. "I think they were fine. Not my finest day."

"No," Maddie chuckled; relating completely. "It could have been worse, though."

"Yes. It absolutely could have."

The call could have gone in the absolute other direction; they were both keenly aware of that. Maddie watched him for a moment, judging his mood, taking in his disposition.

"Harry," her voice was soft as she put her pizza down. His eyes rose to hers; his attention on her.

"There's something I need to tell you."

"Oh-kay," he scanned her tired eyes for a clue but found none. He took a drink from his bottle and wiped his hands on a napkin. "Go ahead."

"Well, last night, when we were making phone calls, I got through to Marquita. You remember the lady from Doctors Without Borders who gave me my job options once my furlough was over?"

"Yeah."

"And..." Maddie took a breath. "She said that they are pulling together a Crisis Intervention team; a team of doctors, nurses, mental health professionals. They are going to Bendal the day after tomorrow for two weeks and..." She could see the moment it washed over him; realization. His jaw tensed. His hand moved to rub at the back of his neck as he slumped back in his chair; his eyes trained on her.
"God, please tell me you're not going to Bendal." Maddie's lips closed tightly as she held his gaze. "Maddie..."

"I can't tell you that," she was soft with him; anticipating exactly what was about to unfold. He shook his head slowly, wanting to dismiss what she had just said, wanting to just pull it from the conversation. "Harry..."

"It's incredibly dangerous there right now, Maddie."

"I know."

"There is high level destruction to buildings and highways, there has been an upheaval of..."

"I know," she cut in. "I know all of these things. I've seen the news. I've read the report from the main office. But the airport is standing and functional. DWB has connected with people there and can secure..."

"Maddie..." He groaned; his hands moving over his face.

"I cannot sit here and do nothing. I just...I can't."

"You could be hurt or..." He ran his hands into his hair, his eyes finding hers.

"Yes," she nodded. "I could. Or I can help with the intervention. I can help with reconstruction efforts. I can be there with Khenda and Collins."

"Maddie..."

"Harry," she cut him off; her eyes welling with tears. Harry took a breath, his heart aching at the conviction he saw in her; the conviction that he had always adored about her. He looked away then, his eyes staring off to the side, his teeth biting at his lip. Maddie waited and watched as he processed it all.

"I can't go with you," he spoke out into the room.

"I know that."

"I can't," he turned to face her. "The security involved and the...there is no way anyone here would let me go with you."

"I didn't ask you to go with me." He nodded and looked down at his hands, fidgeting with his plate of pizza. She was right, she hadn't asked him to go with her—this was hers alone. She had been willing and able to put herself out there long before he was in the picture—he knew that. There was a long moment of silence, a tension filled moment through which Maddie held her breath; waiting for his response. This time when he looked up, when his eyes met hers, they were pleading.

"Please stay here," his voice was so low and quiet that she wanted to hug him close. But instead she swallowed the lump in her throat and shook her head.

"I can't."
"Maddie..."

"That's not who you're in love with Harry—the girl who sits by and watches it happen. You're in love with the girl who steps in."

"I know that." He hated how well he knew that.

"I'm stepping in. I've already made the decision. They asked me to go and I've spoken with Dr. Colvin at the hospital and Gerald at St. Joe's. And honestly this might be the last time I'm able to..." Her eyes met his and she stalled.

"The last time you're able to..."

"I...I don't know Harry. You keep talking about..." She shook her head. "You've alluded to the future and my place in it. And I just...I'm guessing that once that allusion becomes a reality that...I've done stepping in to things like this. Am I wrong?"

Harry ran his hand through his hair. "The answer to that is...incredibly complicated."

"But it really isn't. You can't go there now, you just told me that you couldn't go, that nobody would allow you to..."

"Fine. Fine, you're right. Do you want to talk about this now?"

"No," she shook her head and reached across the table, pulling his hand into hers. "I don't want to talk about that now. Harry, when the time comes, I'll accept what comes with..." She met his eyes then; pleading with him to understand where she was coming from. "But right now I can still go; I can still do this. And..." She sucked in a breath, pulled at her strength and sat tall, "And I'm going to. Please don't be mad..."

"I'm not mad. I'm concerned. It's dangerous down there."

"It's always dangerous down there."

"It's been almost a year since you were shot and..."

"And you're worried it's going to happen again?" She laughed. "I think the odds are in my favor on that one."

"Don't joke," his eyes grew hard. "You were unconscious in my arms and your blood was soaked into my clothes. Don't joke about this." Harry stood, his chair screeching against the floor as he moved. He needed to move; needed a minute to steady his breathing.

"I'm sorry," she whispered; gulping at the lump in her throat. Rising to her feet, she went to where he stood, looking out a window at the grounds outside. She wrapped her arms around his waist from behind; pressing her face to his strong back. "I shouldn't make jokes. But, there was an earthquake...in a place we both love. They need help putting things back together and they need somebody to talk to about what they are witnessing." She couldn't keep away the tears that stung her eyes when she thought of it. "I'm going to go do that. I promise you that I will follow all of the rules they outline. I will pay attention to all perimeters they set up and I will not do anything above and beyond..."

"It is all above and beyond down there..." His hand moved to stroke her arm that was wrapped around him. Maddie nodded against his back, knowing he was right. With a long, deep breath, Harry turned around in her arms; wrapping his around her in return. His eyes were a mix of emotions; fear, helplessness, defeat and a great deal of pride. Maddie tightened her hold on him and continued.

"I will be careful. I will do what I need to do and I will come home to you," she met his eyes; steady and sure. "But I am going."

Because he wasn't sure he could find anymore words without crying; from exhaustion, from emotion, from the strain of the last twenty-four hours, Harry simply nodded. Pressing his lips to the top of her head, he tightened his hold on her—wishing he could tighten it enough to keep her there with him. The relief he had captured that morning slipped away from him; replaced by something else entirely.
Harry liked to think that there was very little in the world that he couldn't handle, very little that his proper upbringing in view of the world hadn't prepared him for—even less that his military training hadn't caught. But as he stood at the airport, lost in the crowd of people sending their loved ones off to help with the destruction, he was finding that he was less prepared to handle these particular emotions that came with sending Maddie off to what he had always considered far too close to a warzone for his own comfort level.

He stood off to the side; hiding under a ball cap, biting his nails as he watched Maddie and, quite surprisingly, Ella check in with the flight staff and DWB personnel. Since the flight was exclusively for DWB staff and emergency aid workers, the area was off limits to those not on the flight or not saying good-bye to somebody on the flight—allowing Harry even more space to remain unseen in his state of hyper-edgy.

"Hey," Ella smiled at him as she finished her paperwork and moved back to where he stood. "Thank you for bringing me to the airport."

"Of course," Harry nodded with a small smile. "Where is Matt by the way? I thought he would be here to see you off."

"Working," Ella smiled.

"Sure, sure," Harry shrugged with a smug grin in place. "You know, Bishop would have been here."

"Oh..." Ella grinned with a roll of her eyes. "We're on with that again?"

"I'm just saying..." He spread his hands out.

"I know what you're saying," she shook her head. "We said our good-byes this morning."

"Fair enough," he glanced over to where Maddie was finishing up. "I have to tell you, I was shocked when Maddie told me you were going. I thought you swore off the entire continent."

"Yes well, I can't have them all down there; Khenda, Collins, Maddie..." Ella let the shakiness in her body come out in her voice, not having a bit of interest in hiding her feelings. "I have a tumultuous relationship with my actual family and the three of them...Maddie likes to pretend that I've been saving her life for the last few years but in reality it's been her saving mine. I can't let her go down there to be with them without me." She looked him over; reading his anxiety. "You going to be okay back at the palace?"

"No," he shook his head. "But I don't get a say in these things."

"That must drive you crazy," her lips pulled up in half a smirk.

"It really does," he breathed; his mind turning businesslike. "You know how to get ahold of me, right?" His voice was low as he turned to face her. "If you need anything."

"Like helicopters?" Ella raised her eyebrows; straddling the line between playful and dead serious.
"Like helicopters."

"You know the cavalry doesn't roll out for her."

"The cavalry rolls out for whomever I tell the cavalry to roll out for," though they both knew he was exaggerating, his eyes were somber.

"Okay boyfriend, at ease," Ella's voice was full of love and understanding as Maddie moved to join them. "I'm just going to give you two a minute." Her hand lingered on Harry's arm, squeezing as she moved to step away from them.

"Ella," he grabbed for her hand, pulling her to him in a hug. With a flash of shock, Ella hugged him back, blushing slightly as he kissed her cheek. "The cavalry rolls for you too, you know. Be careful out there, okay?"

"Well, with a face like this, how can I refuse?" Her fingers pinched his cheek lightly as she stepped out of his arms and looked to Maddie. "I'll just be..."

"Yeah," Maddie nodded with a smile, watching till Ella stepped away before turning to him. "You know she's going to talk my ear off about that for the entire trip to Africa."

"Consider it your payback," he raised his eyebrows, taking a step closer to her.

"Payback for what?" She matched his step with one of her own.

"Leaving me here in London while you go save the world."

"I'm not going to save the world," Maddie shook her head softly.

"Yeah..." He breathed and, with slight jerk of his chin, gestured for her to step into his arms. And she went; willingly, happily. Sinking into his embrace, she pressed her nose to his sweater; inhaling—committing to memory.

He wanted to remind her to be careful, remind her to watch where she was walking, what she was passing, what was above her. He wanted to tell her to keep an eye out for anything that look suspect, to trust her gut, to—when faced with the fight or flight dilemma—to go with flight. He wanted to make one last ditch effort at keeping her there with him, to cry and beg and throw a fit in front of her colleagues until she agreed to stay by his side.

Instead he tightened his hold on her, cupped her face in his hands and kissed her; full on the lips regardless of who was watching or what they may be documenting this moment on. He had reminded her of all of those things about a hundred times during the last twenty-four hours and now was not the time for that.

Now was the time for the I love you he whispered in her ear, the tickle his breath left on her skin, the way it made her eyes tear up. Now was the time for the way her fingers roughed up the hair at the back of his neck, the way her eyes met his—full of promises; promises to be safe, promises to return, promises to be in one piece. Now was the time for her to kiss him again; lips firm and warm as her I love you too passed between them into his mouth.

"I have to go..." She pulled away from him then, worried that much more time in his arms would be the straw that tipped the scale—forcing her to stay next to him. The group was beginning to disperse; doctors and nurses lining up. Harry lent a quick glance to the others before turning reluctant eyes back to her.

"Step in, love," though his heart was full of concern and worry for her safety, everything else about him was full of pride—loving that part about her that felt the need to not just stand by. "And step back out."

"I will," she took another step away, her fingers lingering in his. They called out for her flight and she shrugged as her eyes turned up to the ceiling. "I love you. I do. But I...

"It's time for you to go, I know." He drew her fingers to his lips for one more kiss. "Good-bye Madeline." She smiled sweetly and pulled her hand from his.

"I'll see you soon Wales." And then, with a turn of her heel and one final wave of her hand, Maddie was gone—following Ella to the walkway.

Harry stood, weighted to his spot for the longest time. He watched as the last person loaded the plane, watched as they shut and locked the door behind them. Only when the plane had taxied away did he turn to leave.

Only when he was certain she wasn't going to come running back into the airport.

Resigned to spending the next fourteen days on edge with worry, Harry made his way, relatively unnoticed back through the airport to his waiting car and the next fourteen days of his life.
Arriving in Bendal had brought forward all of the emotions that Maddie had expected; anxiety, concern, upset, and an intense sort of relief that flooded her heart when they were finally reunited with their reason for boarding the plane in the first place.

Their first day had been one of adjustment; getting acquainted with the protocol, understanding the security measures, and learning their assignments. As Maddie had suspected, she and Ella were being sent out to the complex—most likely due to their previous involvement in Bendal. What Maddie had known before they came was that the complex had taken quite a hit and that the community surrounding it had suffered great losses and injuries. She had assumed they would be heading in that direction and, as they received the news, she reached out to squeeze Ella's hand in comfort.

It was late afternoon and they had finally finished the last bit of debriefing and were finally able to get out to the work they had come there to do.

The tension that Ella had built up inside of her, nervous at returning to the scene of so much anguish, washed away the instant they ran into their Bendal family. No sooner had they step foot off the van, no sooner had they taken in the destruction and devastation, they were pulled into bone crushing, lung squeezing hugs. Maddie's eyes welled with long fought tears and she wasn't sure if the arms around her belonged to Collins or Khenda or even Ella for that matter.

"My God...I cannot believe you two are here," Khenda cried openly, one hand holding tight to Ella while the other traveled over Maddie's hair; her maternal instincts in overload.

"You didn't really think we would stay away, did you?" Maddie chuckled through her tears.

"No," Khenda shook her head. "Though I did think Harry would pull a little harder to keep you there."

"Oh he pulled," Ella laughed, leaning into Collins; feeling better than she had ever expected to feel standing back in Bendal. "He just lost that particular tug of war."

"You all know that I don't take well to being told what to do," Maddie smiled wide. "Now I love him dearly but if you expected things to be different with Harry, then..."

"Na, we know better," Collins moved to kiss her forehead. "I hate to admit it, but it's really good to see you, Doc."

"You have no idea how good it is to see you," Maddie's tears increased as she hugged him. "We were so worried about you."

"You're not the only one," Khenda spoke up, her eyes narrowing at him as they shared the look that couples share; the look that speaks volumes of their history, their devotion, their love for the other.

"Okay, okay," he rolled his eyes dramatically. "There will be plenty of time for this tonight..."

"Tonight?" Ella's face scrunched up.
"You're staying with us," Khenda's voice was such that both of them knew there would be no further discussion. "We're not passing up the chance to spend time with the two of you while you're here."

"Your place made it out okay?" Maddie raised her eyebrows.

"Amazingly, yes," Collins nodded. "We were untouched by the quake. The complex, on the other hand..." All eyes moved to take in the disaster area. The devastation filled her lungs like the hot sticky air of Bendal.

"Yeah..." Maddie breathed. The reality sat in; weighing on all of them.

"You want to direct me to the infirmary tent?" Ella released her hold on Khenda's hand. It was time for them to get to work.

"I'll take you. I'm headed that way," Collins nodded, releasing his hold on Maddie. "We'll meet right here at the end of the day."

"I'll take you to the makeshift family center," Khenda spoke to Maddie. "We've instructed people to gather there if they need to talk to anyone or aren't sure what to do."

"Great."

"Be careful, okay," Collins' eyes traveled to all three of them. "Things are still pretty unstable down here. And I'm not just talking about the buildings. The people are..."

"We'll be careful," Khenda smiled at him as his protective nature took over. "We'll see you tonight. Right here."

"Right here," he leaned to kiss her; his hand lingering on her arm for a beat longer than it used too, his eyes meeting hers a beat longer than they had before their world had come tumbling down around them.

As they stepped apart, Collins lead Ella off towards the infirmary tent and Khenda and Maddie made their way in the other direction to the family center; all of them passing by the unsteady building that remained from the complex, all of them feeling the weight of what was to follow.

It was long past dark before they called it a day and even then the call was forced upon them. While Ella had seen patient after patient, cleaning wounds, stitching cuts, administering shots and antibiotics, Maddie had been bombarded with the grieving and the unsure and more than a handful of distraught staff members. They had all grown accustomed to poverty and despair—human disasters, but for most of them, this was the first time they had dealt with the fallout of a natural disaster, the first time they had dealt with the loss of a colleague. And, while Collins and Khenda were fine, the staff had lost two doctors and one nurse to the earthquake and it was hitting them quite hard.

So, when Khenda came into Maddie's corner and told her they were done for the day, Maddie was faced with the same conflict she had always been faced with when it came to this work in this place. She wanted to stay, wanted to see more people, wanted to be there to hear what they needed her to hear. AND she knew that in order to stay on top of her game, to stay ready to handle what the next day threw at her, she needed to take down time. So, reluctantly, she closed up her files and rose to her feet. Their first day was over and they were heading back to Khenda and Collins' place.
Ella was sprawled out over the couch, drink in hand, when Maddie emerged from the room, freshly showered and dressed comfortably. Collins had prepared plates of food and pitchers of drinks for them to enjoy as they all came down from their day.

"I forgot how hot it was down here," Ella groaned; holding her perspiring glass to the skin on her neck.

"You're just accustomed to the chilly London air now," Collins smiled; taking a seat on the couch across from her.

"You hear that?" Khenda snickered. "He's calling you a wuss." The laughter that settled as Maddie took her place next to Ella and Khenda took hers next to Collins was comfortable; warm and familiar as they ate and drank and revived themselves.

"So..." A crack of a smile came from Collins as he looked to Ella and Maddie. "How are things in Merry ol' England?"

Maddie looked to Ella who sighed into her grin, "Merry ol' England is wonderful."

"Maddie told us you're a flight nurse," Khenda nodded at Ella. "Is it everything you thought it would be?"

"It's amazing," Ella nodded. "Every time we go up is amazing. It gives me the same kind of rush I got here, though now I get to come down from it. I love it."

"Good for you," Khenda was so proud of how the both of them had left and grown into their new lives, their new roles.

"It doesn't hurt that she's in love with the pilot," Maddie offered her friend up for the mocking that was sure to ensue.

"The pilot?" Collins was quick to pick up the ball and run with it. "What's his name?"

"It's Matt," Ella rolled her eyes. "And I never said I was in love with him."

"Oh!" Khenda laughed. "That's even better."

"You're not in love with him?" Maddie's head tipped to the side as she studied her friend.

"I don't know," Ella shrugged, her mouth twisting into a smile. "I care for him but...but if any of us is in love with a helicopter pilot it would be..."

"Madeline!" Khenda clapped her hands, giddy that they were going to move on to a relationship that she had seen from the very beginning.

"It's true," Maddie sighed, unable to help the flush in her cheeks or the grin on her face. "I am in love with a helicopter pilot."

"How is he?" Khenda asked, tucking her legs up under her and linking her arm through Collins'.
"He's great. He's really, really great. Well...he's kind of in the middle of a pout because I'm here, but other than that, he's wonderful."

"I am so happy the two of you worked out," Khenda beamed.

"Me too," Maddie sighed. "I suppose I should thank you for that."

"I would think!" Khenda laughed.

"Speaking of Harry," Collins glanced at his watch. "Should you try to call him? Let him know you made it okay?"

"He's not expecting to hear from me," Maddie shook her head. "The towers were down when we tried to locate the two of you. There's really no way for me too..."

"Actually," Ella spoke up, groaning as she moved from the couch. "There is." Ruffling through her bag she pulled out a phone Harry had given her before they left and held it up in the air.

"What's that?" Maddie squinted.

"A satellite phone."

"From where?" Her voice flattened.

"I don't know," Ella turned the phone over in her hands. "Some store?"

"I meant from whom?" Maddie's eyes narrowed.

"Who do you think?" Ella laughed. "He slipped it to me while you were locking up your place. He wanted to be sure that if we needed anything..."

"Give me that," Maddie snatched the phone from Ella and moved towards the hallway. "I am going to kill him." She could hear the three of them laughing behind her as she turned the phone one and dialed.

Harry was out with Bishop, Sean and Leo when his phone vibrated in his pocket. When he looked at the number, he about knocked over the table trying to stand up. Leaving his friends and his drink behind, he hurried towards a door, towards quiet. Pushing out into the cold, snowy night, he pressed it to his ear.

"You sneaky little..." Maddie started before he even had the chance to speak.

"Now, before you get mad..." Harry cut in, a smirk in place.

"You should have said that five minutes ago," Maddie cut him off, trying to keep the smile from her face.

"...I wanted Ella to have a way to call Matt if she needed anything."

"Henry Charles Albert David..."
"Oh come on!" He laughed. "This is really worth bringing out all four names? You left me in London to go to a country that just had an earthquake, a country that is already unstable. I had absolutely no say in you going and I have to sit here and worry about you until you come home. The least you could afford me is the ability to know that you're okay."

"You're right."

"I'm..." He stumbled. "I'm sorry. I'm what?"

"You're right," she sighed. "The least I could afford you is that. And had you spoken to me about it, had you asked me about it, I would have been happy to take your sneaky little phone..."

"Ah I see what's..."

"Instead, you went behind my back and handed it off to Ella."

"I did," he nodded, seeing his mistake. "I...I was worried you would put up a fight. I was worried we would have a battle and the last thing I wanted to do before you left was..." He groaned. "I made a mistake."

"You did."

"I'm sorry."

"I forgive you."

"That was..." Harry chuckled. "That was fast and incredibly easy. I was expecting a bit more of a..."

"Yes, well," Maddie took a deep breath and let it out slowly. "I saw Collins today, with my own eyes. And Khenda and...it's just a mess down here. The complex is..." She trailed off, choking up. She took a moment to steady her breathing. "I miss you. I missed you the second I got on the airplane and I miss you more now that I'm here...and I'm not going to fight with you while I'm here."

"Wow..." Harry breathed. "You really know how to hit a guy, Madeline."

"Sorry," she laughed.

"Na..." He shook his head. "It's okay. I miss you too. Fourteen days?"

"Thirteen now..." She sniffed and pulled it together. "So, now that I have your little phone, what is it you're expecting? A daily check in?"

"No," he shook his head. "No. I know you're busy. I know you have a lot on your plate. If you could just call me once or twice, let me know you're still among the walking."

"I could."

"And if anything happens..."

"Yeah," Maddie smiled.
"Collins is really okay?" He really wished he could be there with her, standing next to her; hugging Collins and Khenda for himself.

"He's poking fun at Ella right now."

"Good." Harry looked out at the snow that covered the city. "Give my love to him and Khenda."

"I will."

"And you," his voice dropped. "All of my love to you."

"Hmmm..." She felt warm. "Thank you."

"I miss you terribly, love."

"Thirteen days," she reminded him. "Will you be at the airport?"

"Isn't that what boyfriends do?"

"Yes," Maddie nodded. "Though sometimes my boyfriend has to attend meetings or go to luncheons or..."

"He'll be there," he assured her. "I'll be there."

"I'll be in desperate need of a long, hot bath."

"At your service," she could hear the seductive smile on his lips.

"I love that way that sounds coming out of your mouth," she teased.

"Noted," he laughed. "Be careful down there Maddie."

"I'm always careful down here Harry."

"I know," he sighed. "Sleep well. Tomorrow's another big day."

"I will. Tell the boys hello for me."

"I will," he shook his head, loving that she knew what he was up to without knowing. "Good night love."

"Good night Wales." And then, with far more regret and sadness than she had ever felt doing so, she disconnected the call with Harry. Setting the phone on the bedside table, she took a deep breath. "Thirteen days."
Chapter 60

Chapter Notes

Author's Note: There is a bit in here that is in French. I used Google Translate for that and it doesn't really matter what is being said in the moment as you will discover it soon enough.

There's also a little time jumping. We start on Day Thirteen, then jump back in time and work our way to Thirteen again.

I hope that makes sense!

Day Thirteen

Harry was alive with excitement as he finished up at the event; shook hands, said his good-byes. It was Day Thirteen of Fourteen. At this exact time the next day he would be looking in her eyes, holding her close, making gentle fun of the way she took the phone she had jumped on him over and used it to check in with him every single day she had been there.

He couldn't wait to see her and it showed. He was smiling wide, walking briskly as he made his way from the venue towards the car. Stopping to shake hands and say hello. He was almost finished when it happened, almost done waving to the crowds when Thomas stepped forward with Harry's cell phone in hand with a light nudge. Harry glanced down and back up at Thomas; thinking maybe he had lost his mind. Harry had never taken a phone call when he was out like this; shaking hands, walking the rope line. He shook his head slightly, not once losing his focus. But Thomas was insistent, his hand resting on Harry's arm, forcing his attention.

"Sir," his voice was stern and when Harry met his eyes, he saw a genuineness there that spoke volumes. Thomas had been with Harry for a long time, with the family even longer. He would never put this out there if it weren't important.

Still, an annoyance went with him as he smiled apologetically at the people in front of him. "This couldn't have waited until we were in the car?" He muttered to Thomas who shook his head.

"No sir."

"Fine." Taking the phone from his hand, Harry stepped off to the side as much as he could to prevent himself from being seen on the telephone at an official function. Moving away from the view of the crowd, he rounded a corner and, as he pressed the phone to his ear, he heard the news that would haunt him for the rest of his life.

Day Three

"Bloody hell..." Harry called out into his dark room as he rolled towards his nightstand, tangling up in the sheets. His hand slapped at the stand, searching for his ringing phone. His eyes squinted at the clock. "Who in the hell is calling at three in the..." His heart thuddded in his ear as he answered the phone; panicked. "Maddie?"

"I'm okay." Knowing him, knowing his disposition, she went first for comfort and assurance and he was eternally grateful for that. "I'm okay. Everyone is okay." He heard her take a breath as every single molecule in his body relaxed.

"You're okay," he breathed.

"I'm okay."

"Okay," he eased back into his bed, taking the phone with him. "What's going on?"

"Promise..." Her voice was soft, whispy. "Promise not to make fun of me."

"I promise," he agreed; his heart warming at every word she spoke.

"I...wanted to hear your voice." Harry was thankful for the dark room as an embarrassingly wide grin stretched across his face. She could hear him over the phone, the way his breath drew in, the way he chuckled to himself. "It's only my second day here and already I want to crawl into bed with you and..."

"Third," he corrected her, unsure why he felt the need to do so. "It's your third day."

"Yes," she breathed with a smile. "I guess it is. I'm sorry Harry. I didn't mean to wake you. I shouldn't have called this late, I just..."

"What would you like me to say?" He raised his eyebrows sleepily.

"Sorry?"

"You..." He laughed lightly. "You said you wanted to hear my voice and I'm willing to help you out with that. I just need to know what you want me to say."

"You're..." Maddie's eyes teared up instantly. "You're willing to help me out with that? Just like that? In the middle of the night? You're not going to make fun or..."

"I'm not going to make fun," he shook his head. "Madeline, you very rarely need me. And right now, you need me. There's no way I'm going to make fun of you. Though, I will say this, it's a good thing that sneaky bastard slipped that phone to Ella before you left."

"It is," Maddie laughed; comforted by such simplicity. Her day had been horrible; long and sweaty and full of despair and, though she had tried on her own for hours, she was finding that sleeping without Harry was looking to be a trend from her past.

"Do you want me to find a phone book or..." They both chuckled at that.

"No," Maddie shook her head. "Just tell me about your day. Would you do that? Tell me what you did today?"

"Absolutely," he nodded, sinking into his pillow. "Just give me a second..."

"Hey Harry?"
"Hmm?"

"I always need you."

Harry took a moment to catch himself, a moment to collect his thoughts and then, with a wide smile and full heart, he began what would become a nightly event; him talking aimlessly and her listening. And damn it all if she wasn't falling for him further and further with every word.

Day Seven

"Harry! Harry!" Harry turned towards the voices and offered a small wave. The press was lined up as Harry exited the school gymnasium with his brother. In their father's place, they were attending an afternoon recital for a local school and to say that the children were beyond ecstatic to see the two of them was an understatement. By the time they were leaving, the children weren't the only ones excited. There were throngs of people, young and old, waiting to catch a glimpse of them.

Unable to resist a chance to interact with little ones, the two brothers veered off path for just a moment; to say hello to some kids who had been playing at the park across the way. Kids were always the first to break protocol, the first not to care that Harry was a Your Royal Highness, going straight for his first name or, at times, even a Hey You! And he loved it.

So, when a bright, happy little girl who seemed to be bouncing as he said hello asked him, "Where's Maddie?" He couldn't help but smile at her and, despite the reporter that Harry knew was within earshot, answer.

"She's...she's off making the world a better place."

"Is she helping kids?" The girl beamed at the fact that he was talking to her. "My Mum says she helps kids."

"She is helping kids," Harry nodded; pride oozing from him as he spoke.

"Will she be back?"

"Ha! If I'm lucky," Harry laughed as William caught up with him; clapping his hand on his back in a brotherly way.

"He's always been a pretty lucky guy." And then, with wide smiles and a wave, the two of them were ushered back towards the car. "Well," William spoke under his breath. "I'm guessing you knew the press was right there."

"Of course I did," Harry responded equally as hushed. They had long ago learned how to spot them, always keeping their peripheral in mind.

"Talking publically about Maddie?" William raised his eyebrows as they slipped into the awaiting car. "Things must be serious."

"Well, like you said," Harry shrugged with a smirk. "I've always been a pretty lucky guy."

Day Ten

The time in Bendal had been such a roller coaster for Maddie and Ella. There were times when things seemed to fly by; their twelve hours out in the community zipping by in a flash. Then there were days when the misery simply wouldn't end; when they weren't quite sure if they were going to make it to the end of the two weeks, the end of the day, the end of the hour. And they were almost always split up; Maddie pulled to meet with victims of the quake or of the subsequent rioting and pillaging, Ella staffing the infirmary tent treating the wounded.

On day ten, Khenda went with Ella to the tent while Collins took Maddie out in the truck to meet with some of the people who were unable to make it into the community. Even though they were going out to work, there was an odd sort of comfort that fell over them, a familiarity with the moment that often came with going home. They laughed, they made jokes; they caught up. And, when they were finally back in the truck heading home from a long, sweaty day, Collins pulled out his best rendition of a big brother and brought up Harry.

"So..." He flashed a glance her way.

"So?" Maddie sighed; letting the air whip in through the window and around her.

"When was the last time you talked to Harry?"

"Hmmm..." Maddie stared out the window, a blush rising to her cheeks. "Last night."

"You've been talking to him every night, haven't you?" He grinned from ear to ear as he caught the smile that was her admission.

"So what if I have?" She shrugged, trying to play it off. "Are you going to razz me about it?"

"Not at all," Collins shook his head. "No need to be embarrassed around me. You ever see me hide my devotion to Khenda?"

"No."

"No," he smiled. "You don't need to get all blushy like you're trying to hide something."

"I know," she smiled at him. "I guess I'm just used to being in London, surround by photographers and people who are dying to print the next salacious tale. I play it closer to the vest than I really ever have."

"That makes sense," Collins nodded.

"But it doesn't mean that I don't absolutely adore him," she spoke softly, her mind wandering through images of him. "It doesn't mean that I don't love him."

"Oh, hey," Collins nudged her. "I know you love him. Are you kidding? You left everything to go to London and have your entire life paraded out in the daily rags. You only do that if you love somebody...or if you're really sick and crazy."

"Maybe I'm sick and crazy," she grinned at him.

"Maybe you are," he chuckled.

"I have been talking to him every night," she sighed an answer to his earlier question. "I know I made a big deal out of the phone but...I couldn't help it. Once I had a way to speak to him...why wouldn't I speak to him, you know?"
"I do," he nodded.

"He's really great, Collins," her voice was low, her smile soft. "He's been so amazing with all of it; adjusting to London, to my new...life. And when I told him I was coming here...I know he put up a fight about it but I could see it in his eyes..." She felt teary, emotional.

"See what?"

"Pride," she smiled, her head resting back against the seat as she turned to look at Collins. "He's proud of me, he's proud that I'm down here. You know he loves this place, loves the people. I think he would be here with us if he could. But he can't. His life is too complicated for this."

"Yeah," Collins nodded. He knew Harry enough to know all of those things. He watched Maddie for a moment, watched as her mind wandered over Harry; watched as a peaceful happiness settled over her features. "Someday that's going to be you, huh? Unable to travel without security because your husband is..."

"Shhh..." Maddie hushed him immediately, despite the grin on her face. "You can't just say things like that."

"Oh yeah?" He laughed at her, pulling the truck up outside the home he shared with Khenda. "That mile wide smile on your face says otherwise."

"Yes, well," Maddie opened her door and stepped out with a slight groan. Collins came around to her side, watching her as she paused in thought. "There may be a small amount of truth to what you say..."

"There may be," he laughed. "Come on Doc. Let's get inside, check on those two, get you some food and then you can check in with your man at home."

"I wish hearing you say that didn't make me sigh..."

"But it does," he finished her thought as they ascended the stairs.

"But it does." She grinned.

"No need to hide your devotion here," he held open the door for her, waited till she passed to follow behind and shut it. "Khenda my darling! Are you and Ella home?" Maddie snickered at him as she took off her work boots; pulling her hat from her head. "Khenda!"

"Hey," Khenda's voice was in direct contrast to Collins' drawing both of their attention as she rounded the corner to greet them.

"What's wrong?" Collins looked her over with a quick glance. "Ella?"

"What happened to Ella?" Maddie's pulse quickened.

"She's fine," Khenda reached a steady hand out to Maddie's shoulder. "She had a terrible day. I think the heat and the patients and...she's really feeling it today."

"Where is she?" Maddie dropped her bag onto the floor.
"She's in bed. I was in with her when I heard you two come in."

"I'm heading that way," Maddie reached out to pat Collins on his shoulder and went straight for the hallway.

"I'll make some tea and meet you down there?" Collins raised his eyebrows to Khenda.

"You're the absolute best," she sighed into a smile; leaning to kiss him. "Thank you."

And just like that, the three women were gathered in the bed; snuggled close to the friend who needed them the most at the moment. This wasn't the first time they had rallied around one of their own, nursing the wounded heart back from the atrocities they bore witness too. There were very few words; more hugging and kissing, stroking of hair and holding of hands. As soon as Maddie had hit the bed, Ella had turned in to her, resting her head on her shoulder as Maddie wrapped her arm around her; kissing her forehead. Khenda took her place on the other side, scooping Ella's hand back into one of hers while she reached out with the other to smooth back Maddie's hair.

It was there that Collins found them, just like that, when he made his way in with tea and cakes and a smile of understanding.

"You brought tea?" Ella sat up; tears in her eyes, in her voice. "How fucking perfect are you?" And, without missing a beat, Collins moved into the room.

"Pretty fucking perfect," he responded. And the room erupted in laughter. He winked at Khenda and leaned to kiss Ella's cheeks. "You going to pull through darling?"

"Yes," she sniffed and wiped at her eyes; taking tea from him. "I usually do, right?"

"Sure," Collins nodded, handing tea to the other two women before sitting on the edge of the bed.

"You want to talk about it?" Maddie met Ella's eyes.

"Yeah..." Ella pushed a great big breath from her lungs and inhaled. "There was a mother who brought in her three little kids today; I mean, no older than four. She was convinced that her husband had..." Ella cracked a defensive smile as tears pushed from her eyes. "She was concerned that after quake, with all of the devastation, that her husband had...poisoned the kids; thinking he could let them...go peacefully instead of in hunger or thirst or..." Ella's train of thought ran off as she began to cry again. Maddie felt tears in her own eyes as Ella pushed the tea to Collins and returned to her spot on Maddie's shoulder. "She was right. He had. I helped them but the dad came in and was yelling and screaming and...he wanted me to just let them go and..." And the story was over for Ella. She couldn't process it any longer.

"The kids are okay," Khenda finished. "But it was..."

"Terrible," Ella finished. "It was just absolutely terrible."

"I'm so sorry," Maddie whispered into her hair as she hugged her. "I'm so sorry that was your day Ella." As Maddie comforted her best friend, Khenda looked to Collins who was watching with abject horror.

"See, Khenda, this is..." He shook his head and looked away; clearly upset by the story. "This is exactly what I was talking about. This place is..."
"Hey," Khenda reached her hand out to his arm. "It's okay."

"No, it's not okay," Collins shook his head, the conversation between them private and personal as he moved to their first language. "C'est exactement pourquoi je veux partir en France."

"Encore une fois avec la France?!" Khenda rolled her eyes; allowing the tiniest of glances to the other two in the room.

"S'il vous plaît ne pas prendre à la légère cette Khenda! Je m'inquiète pour toi tout le temps ici et maintenant ..." Ella perked up slightly, looking to Maddie confused as Khenda and Collins moved into an entirely different moment right there in front of them.

"Are they..." Ella squinted. "Are they speaking French?"

"I think so," Maddie whispered, just as confused by what was happening; though the arguing continued. "Do you know any French?"

"A little bit," Ella sat up. "Mostly medical terms though. You?"

"No," Maddie shook her head; moving closer to Ella. "Harry does though."

"Great. Why don't you go get the phone I...."

"God damn it Collins!" Khenda yelled, rising to her feet. "Je suis enceinte, pas impuissant!"
Maddie flinched in surprise as Ella's eyes grew wide as saucers.

"Oh my God!" She pointed. "I know that word. I...."

"Oh my God..." Khenda groaned as it registered that Ella and Maddie were there.

"Khenda!" Ella moved to her knees, her face twitching into a smile. "You're pregnant."

"Oh!" Maddie gasped, her hand clasping over her mouth.

"You are!" Ella grinned. "I know pregnant in about seventeen languages and French is one of them and..." Her eyes moved to Collins who, underneath all of the fighting and craziness, couldn't control the smile on his face. "Collins."

"Yes?" He tried to avoid the stares as Khenda remained unfazed.

"Were you just yelling at a pregnant woman?" Ella's voice was accusatory though her face remained excited.

"I..." He looked to Khenda; eyes soft and pleading and, with a deep sigh and roll of her eyes, she caved.

"Yes. He was just yelling at a pregnant woman."

And the room erupted.

Ella and Maddie were on their feet, jumping on the bed as they clapped their hands. Collins stood to pull Khenda to him, protective and loving; making the other women ooh and aww. As Maddie and Ella rushed to congratulate them, rushed to hug them, the torment from the day slipped away from the room without another thought. Love had a way of doing that.

Day Eleven

"Mmm..." Harry's voice was muted as he answered the phone, just after midnight. "You're a little late tonight," she could hear him smiling.

"I'm so sorry darling," she crooned; her grin taking over her face.

"Darling?" He chuckled; waking up enough to speak to her.

"Can I call you darling? Or...Sunshine. How about sunshine?"

"Sunshine?"

"Or puppy!"

"Not puppy." They shared a laugh at his quick retort.

"Sunshine it is."

"Have you been drinking?" Something about the levity in her voice made him happy, more at ease.

"Only a very little," she sighed. "I had a sip of champagne...or a few glasses. But that's not what this is. This isn't me drunk. This is entirely celebratory."

"Oh?" He was confused. "You're in Bendal on a Crisis Intervention team after an Earthquake. What exactly are we celebrating?"

"I don't want to tell you." She bit her lip with an unshakable smile.

"You don't?" He laughed.

"No," she shook her head. "I want to tell you in person. I want to see the look on your face when I tell you."

"Then why did you bring it up?"

"I couldn't help it," she shrugged. "You think I'm drunk and I'm not and...it's big and wonderful and it makes me giddy and happy and...Oh Harry. I love you."

"I love you too."

"No I..." She sighed back into her pillow; her eyes welling with tears that were part sad but mostly joyous. "I love you. So much. I...I can't even talk to Collins about you without blushing. I can't even get out your name without feeling all tingly and...oh I hate it. I hate the kind of power you have over me. But I love it all the same. Am I making any sense at all right now?" Her efforts at explaining her heart and her mind seemed lost as she looked out into the dark. She didn't really have a name for the emotion she felt when she thought of him—need, love, want—it was so foreign to her; to miss him like this, to need him—or anyone—like this. It was a strange moment in her life; realizing how much of her heart was his.
"Come home to me Maddie," Harry's voice was strained with the loss he had felt at her absence. "Make up some excuse and come home to me right now. I want to celebrate with you too."

"If I could..." Her heart flittered at the thought.

"You can."

"I only have three more days. Three more days and I'll be with you."

"And you'll tell me why you're celebrating?" He let up, knowing she was struggling.

"I will," she laughed. "I will tell you all about it and then...well, you're probably going to want to make love to me."

"Probably?" He couldn't deny the stir in his stomach as he thought of her.

"Probably," Maddie repeated with a sigh, allowing a moment of silence between them. "Are you too tired tonight? To tell me about your day? To let me hear your voice? Because if you're too tired then..."

"I'm not too tired," he cut her off, shaking his head. "I'm not too tired at all."

"Okay," she beamed; settling into her bed and closing her eyes. "Okay. I'm ready."

"So...for breakfast..."

Day Thirteen

Maddie was alive with excitement as she hopped from the truck and made her way towards the Infirmary Tent. She and Collins had finished up early and now they were going to meet up with Ella and Khenda and see what they could do to help out around the complex. Maddie had a pep in her walk as she moved and everyone knew why.

It was Day Thirteen of Fourteen. At this exact time the next day she would be with him; in his arms, against his lips. She couldn't wait. This trip to Bendal had been about many, many things; asserting herself, staying true to her roots, claiming her independence—away from the media that surrounded her new life. It started out being about reconnecting with who she had been and it ended up being about longing for who she was now.

"Hey there stranger!" Ella's voice called out as she approached Maddie, on her way from the tent Maddie was heading to. "Back early?"

"Crazy, I know," Maddie laughed with a nod. "Where are you headed?"

"Can you keep a secret?" Ella looped her arm through Maddie's and turned her around so she was walking with her.

"Sure," she shrugged.

"I'm headed there," she pointed forward. Shielding her eyes from the sun, Maddie focused.

"The complex?" She whispered.
"Yes."

"No." Maddie halted.

"Yes," Ella tugged at her friend. "There are a few vials of antibiotics in there and I need them out here..."

"It's been roped off for a reason. It suffered damage when the quake hit. Ella..." Maddie rattled off the reasons why this was a bad idea. "You haven't been able to look at that place after what happened last year and now..."

"I know," Ella took a deep breath. "Listen. I know exactly where the vials are. It will take me about ten steps, twenty seconds to get them and then I'll be out. And isn't this what you're supposed to be about? Facing your fears head on?"

"Sure," Maddie nodded and then shook her head. "But not when it's dangerous."

"Ten steps. Twenty seconds." Ella dropped her hold on Maddie. "I'm going in." She took two steps away from her friend before Maddie reached out and grabbed her arm. "Madeline..."

"I'm coming with you," she glared as Ella opened her mouth to protest. "You haven't been able to look at this place because of what happened to me. Now, if you think I'm going to let you go in there and have some sort of panic attack, you're wrong."

"Fine," Ella sighed, rolling her eyes.

"Just let me..." Maddie spotted Collins walking their way, en route to the tent. "Hey Papa!" She yelled; bringing snickers from Ella. "We're going to run in here really quick..."

"No way," he shook his head.

"Yes way," Ella nodded.

"We're going to be fast. In and out," Maddie explained, pulling her bag over her shoulder and holding it out to him. "Watch this for me?"

"I think this is possibly the worst idea you have ever had," he shook his head but took the bag. "You need to stay out of that building. I don't know how much clearer I can..."

"We need antibiotics. In and out," Ella repeated, leaning to kiss his cheek before hurrying away from him; Maddie right behind her.

"I'm telling you no! Do you even hear me?" He yelled out to her.

"I hear you!" Ella yelled.

"Sorry!" Maddie smiled apologetically and turned on her heels; following behind Ella as they slipped through the doors to the complex; leaving a more than miffed Collins standing outside in the hot sun.

"Wow..." Ella breathed; her eyes adjusting to the lack of light. "It's so creepy in here; quiet and..." Her smile dropped as she looked just beyond Maddie, just over her shoulder to the spot of all the chaos.
"Hey," Maddie spoke softly, moving to take Ella's hand. "Come on. Don't look there. You said you knew exactly where they antibiotics were. Are they over there?"

"No."

"Okay then. Let's move. You said we only needed twenty seconds and this is eating into that time," she tugged at Ella's hand; moving her towards the hall, wanting to keep her mind off of what had happened.

"Yeah..." She breathed. "Yeah. Okay. You're right." And then, hand in hand, the two of them turned to the hospital side.

It began with a rattle; a shake that was almost undetectable, something that could have been explained away as an illusion. But, being on edge, being on high alert, both women felt it. Maddie's eyes met Ella's in confusion.

"What in the hell was..." Maddie began; her words cut off as their world began to move.

All at once, the earth was shaking under their feet. There was a creek, a loud groan of a sound that came out of nowhere as a light dust began to fall from the sky. Maddie would never be absolutely sure what it was that ultimately pushed her to move, the movement under her feet, the chunks of ceiling that fell from above. She would never be sure what it was that forced her to move, but she did. Holding tight to Ella's hand, they ran. It was sloppy and unsteady as the floor buckled underneath them, but they ran; pulling each other under the reception desk hoping against hope that it would be enough to keep them safe as the world came tumbling down around them.

To Be Continued
Chapter 61

All at once, the earth was shaking under their feet. There was a creek, a loud groan of a sound that came out of nowhere as a light dust began to fall from the sky. Maddie would never be absolutely sure what it was that ultimately pushed her to move, the movement under her feet, the chunks of ceiling that fell from above. She would never be sure what it was that forced her to move, but she did. Holding tight to Ella's hand, they ran. It was sloppy and unsteady as the floor buckled underneath them, but they ran; pulling each other under the reception desk hoping against hope that it would be enough to keep them safe as the world came tumbling down around them.

"This couldn't have waited until we were in the car?" Harry muttered to Thomas who shook his head.

"No sir."

"Fine." Taking the phone from his hand, Harry stepped off to the side as much as he could to prevent himself from being seen on the telephone at an official function. Moving away from the view of the crowd, he rounded a corner and, as he pressed the phone to his ear. "This is Harry."

It was his father; of course it was his father. Very few people would have the weight to push Thomas to hand Harry the phone when he was working. Even fewer would be on the other end waiting to deliver the news of what had just occurred in Bendal; crushing Harry in a blink of an eye.

"An earthquake, an aftershock." His entire face drained of color, his body of heat, as he took it in and let it register. It wasn't as powerful as the first one, but it had caused some buildings that were barely standing to crumble. Harry flinched; physically and emotionally.

His mind wasn't prepared for this. His mind had been ready to see her the next day, to hold her tight and close and hear about her trip—to reconnect and move forward. His mind wasn't prepared for the jolt to his system that came with this.

His voice broke as he asked. "Is she..." His heart was nowhere near prepared to handle this.

His shoulders slumped as he heard the answer. No one knew. It had just happened. There were no reports to be given. His father simply did not want him to hear about it on the radio, see it on a passing TV or—God forbid—be asked about it by a reporter while he was coming out. With a nod and the inclination to vomit, Harry passed his phone back to Thomas, fighting to breathe normally. Though he could hear Thomas talking, it was muted; all of his focus was on trying to control the spiral he was about to jump into.

Harry knew himself well enough to know that he had approximately two minutes of "together" left in him. Two minutes left of standing tall, two minutes left of his normal composure before total breakdown. Looking to Thomas with terrified eyes, his instructions came out as a plea.

"I need to be someplace else. Right now." Understanding in a way only Thomas could, he took the young man by the arm and led him back inside. As he directed him through doors, asking their hostess for a place to make a private phone call, he could feel Harry waver under his hand. He could feel the way his step faltered, the way his muscles tensed.
Maybe it was less than two minutes.

"Oh my GOD!" Ella was yelling as the world rumbled around them. "Ohmygod. Ohmygod. Ohmygod...." She was scattered, panicked; her fingers digging into the flesh on Maddie's arms. The two women were huddled together, their knees touching, under the desk that seemed to be completely covered in debris. Though the shaking had stopped, the settling was working its way through the building. And Maddie was quite certain they were buried underneath brick and mortar and drywall.

"Ella," Maddie's voice wavered as she fought to remain calm. She could feel a giant slab of something wedged up against the desk, blocking them in. "Ella..."

"I can't see! I can't...I can barely hear and....oh my God Maddie..." Maddie could feel her friend tremble. "I can't breathe...I can't..."

"Okay, listen to me," Maddie's hands moved in the dark; finding Ella's face and holding it firm. "Look at me..."

"I can't see you!" There were tears in her shaky voice.

"Look straight ahead. I'm right in front of you," Maddie held Ella's face forward and reached for her hand, bringing it to her own face. "Here, you can feel me, I'm right here. Now, take a deep breath, Ella. In through your nose and out through your mouth...a big burst, like this..." Maddie demonstrated. "Okay, your turn. Come on..." Ella did as she was instructed. "Again. In through the nose, out through the mouth." Maddie and Ella repeated the breath three times before Ella calmed; her face nodding in Maddie's hands.

"What happened?" Her voice was shaky as her lip trembled.

"I think there was another quake," Maddie allowed herself to relax now that Ella was; taking inventory of what was around them. "Or an aftershock or...I don't know. Are you hurt? Did you get hit with anything or..."

"I think I cut my arm," Ella's hands moved from Maddie as she moved to check her arm. "Fuck!"

"I think I cut my arm," Ella's hands moved from Maddie as she moved to check her arm. "Fuck!"

"What?!"

"I definitely cut my arm. It's...it's bleeding quite a bit," Ella's mind shifted to nurse duty for a moment, bringing her thought process back in order. "I don't suppose you have a bandage or a rag or..."

"No," Maddie shook her head, tears welling in her eyes. "I...I have my shirt! Hold on. I have a tank top underneath." In the dark, cramped space, Maddie managed to pull her t-shirt up and over her head.

"I'm going to need your help. I can't wrap my own arm and..."

"I got it," Maddie nodded, realizing how silly it was for her to do so given the darkness. But she moved anyway; wrapping her t-shirt around Ella's arm and twisting it into a knot. "Will that work?"

"I think it's going to have to," Ella took a deep breath and the space grew silent as it sank in; just how dire the situation was. They looked around, felt around; realizing how cramped the space was, how dusty the air was, and just how trapped they really were. When Ella spoke again, her voice was whisper quiet and afraid. "Maddie...are we going to die in here?"

Walking quickly, Harry stepped into the conference room they were offered, his staff moving to draw the blinds, to secure the space as Harry held his hand out to Thomas for his phone. With shaky fingers, Harry dialed the number to the satellite phone—knowing there would be no answer, knowing that if she were in a place where she could answer, she would have called already. She would never have left him hanging like this—it was too serious. Laying the phone down on the table in defeat, Harry pulled off his suit coat—suddenly feeling hot and crowded. He loosened his tie and leaned over, his hands resting on the back of the chair.

"Sir..." Thomas began; wanting to do whatever he could to help him out in this moment.

"Could you..." Harry cleared his throat; his eyes welling up in fear and frustration. "Could you give me the room please? And...and find somebody who knows what the hell is going on down there!"

Collins had spent almost his entire adult life in the helping profession; in one way or another. He had almost always lived in communities that were in dire need of attention and assistance. That sort of work, that sort of life came with the expectation that, at times, he would feel helpless. Though he never believed he was helpless, he was more than familiar with the feeling.

So, in that moment, standing outside the complex as the Earth shook and the building shattered and fell—with Maddie and Ella inside—the feeling of helplessness took his breath away. It was like nothing he had ever felt before. His eyes were trained on the crumbling debris in front of him. He watched, unable to look away as it unfolded almost in slow motion.

And then, like the bang from a gun, the world stopped moving and reality came crashing back to him. The chaos unfurled. People were running and screaming, alarms were sounding. But it was all muted, as though he had on ear muffs until finally, he heard his name.

"Collins!" It was Khenda; he would know her voice anywhere. His head snapped towards her as she came running up the path from the tent and tears filled his eyes. "Oh my God...Collins..." She hurried straight into his arms and, though his mind was slow, his body was quick to react to her. His arms wrapped around her protectively, his hand glinting over her still flat stomach. This part of his family was okay.

"Are you okay?" He looked her over; oblivious to all that was occurring around them. Khenda nodded, wiping at her eyes. She was fine. Collins kissed her quickly and then his focus shifted. Releasing her from his arms he turned back to the building; talking as he began to move. "I need you to stay right here," he told her as she held onto his arm. "I'm going to grab a few of the guys to help me. But I need you to stay right here. Out in the open. Where I can see you. Do you understand?"

"Ye...Yes," Khenda answered shakily. "But...where are you going?"
"In there," he nodded to the building, squeezing her hand before he dropped it.

"What? No. Absolutely not."

"I have to go get some of the guys. I have to move that concrete and..."

"Why in the hell..."

"Because..." He took a breath, really wishing he didn't have to tell her. "Just before the quake, less than a minute before the quake...Ella and..." Collins' voice croaked. "Ella and Maddie went in there."

"Wha..." Khenda blinked; her mind filling with a horror that clenched her heart. "What?"

"Khenda..."

"I'll go grab some guys. You...see if you can hear them or..." She shook her head briskly, driving away the tears, trying to force her mind into work mode. "Just be careful."

"Always," Collins nodded and then, with a new mission in mind, he dropped Maddie's bag to the ground and ran towards the rubble.

"Doc!" He yelled out; his eyes scanning the mountainous heap. "Ella!"

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

"No." Maddie's voice was quick, firm; certain. "No. We are not going to die in here."

"But..."

"No buts," she shook her head. "No buts. Collins is out there. He saw us come in. He knows we're in here. And he knows where we were headed. There is no way he leaves us in here."

"Okay," though Ella agreed, her tone was less than sure.

"Okay." Maddie took another deep breath; straining to hear something, anything from the outside. The stark silence worried her. Surely there was chaos outside, surely there was screaming. But if she couldn't hear the outside, would they ever be able to hear them inside? "Maybe we should talk about something else for a minute. Just...you know..."

"Yeah," Ella swallowed the lump in her throat; her mind scattering in thought. "Is there any chance you brought that satellite phone in here with you?"

"No," Maddie shook her head, her mind leaping to Harry. "I left it in my bag with..."

"Collins," Ella finished in a whisper. "That's what I thought. You know...he is going to be pissed that you came in here."

"Collins?"

"Harry. He's going to be so mad at me for bringing you in here."
"Stop," Maddie smiled through the tears in her eyes; her heart aching at the thought of what he might be going through in that moment.

"He is."

"Well, there are some things that Harry doesn't need to know. This will be one of them." Maddie tried for levity; tottering along the fine line between laughter and breakdown.

"What else is on the list?" Ella raised her eyebrows. "Of things Harry doesn't need to know?"

"Um..." Maddie sniffed; trying to pull her mind together. "How many times you and I have fallen asleep drunk and in each other's arms."

"I think he actually might like to know that," Ella chuckled softly, causing great pain in her cut. Her hand clenched tightly around Maddie's.

"It's going to be okay...." Maddie reached out to smooth her hair.

"Does he..." Ella let out a short breath. "Does he know about the time you made all of the staff sing Row Your Boat in rounds?" She flinched again. "Jesus Maddie. My arm really hurts."

"I know," Maddie rubbed the back of her hand with her thumb. "I know it hurts. Just...look up at me and..." Maddie's mind was scattered. "He doesn't know that I made the staff do that, though I don't think he would be surprised."

"Yeah," Ella laughed. "He knows you well, doesn't he?"

"He really does," Maddie managed a smile through her tears.

"You're..." Ella sucked in. "You're going to marry him, aren't you."

"Yes." She was absolutely certain. "I mean...I want to. I want to marry him."

"I want to get married..." Ella's eyes grew soft.

"Yeah?" Maddie smiled. "To Matt?"

"No," Ella shook her head softly. "Not to Matt."

"No? He seems sweet and he makes you laugh and..."

"That's why you marry somebody?" Ella laughed. "Because they seem sweet and make you laugh?"

"No," Maddie laughed. "No. You're right. Sorry. It must be the dust..."

"Or the concrete?" Ella let out a strangled laugh.

"Or the cramped space..." Maddie added as a silence fell over them for a moment.

"Maddie..." Ella was crying again. "You know I love you. Right?"

"I love you too," Maddie held tight to her friend. "Let's not..."
And then it happened.

"Oh my God!" Ella gasped, pulling on Maddie's hand. "Oh my God. Did you..."

"Yes!" Maddie wanted to jump up and down as she heard it again.

Collins' voice was calling out to them from above; like an angel of relief.

"COLLINS!!!" Both women started yelling at the same time; banging on the wood around them—over their heads. "COLLINS!!! WE'RE HERE!!!"

And by some miracle, by the grace of whatever spirit was looking down on them that day, he heard them. "I've got you!" He yelled back. "Just sit tight and we'll get you out of there!" From relief, from fear, from a place that one only goes to when faced with the potential end of your life, Ella began to cry; to shake.

"Hey," Maddie's hands moved to her face, forcing her to look at her. "Ella! Hey! Listen to me. In through the nose, out through the mouth." Though it took her longer than the first time, Ella responded. "Collins knows where we are. They are removing the stuff on top of us and then we'll be out of here." Her voice was purposefully low, forcing Ella to pay closer attention to her instead of what was happening around her. "Look at me. We just have to sit here, together, and remain calm."

And then they heard the loudest creak, an enormous groan and the debris above them shifted—drawing screams from both of them as Maddie flinched and Ella began to cry.

"Oh my God...Maddie..." She was starting to panic; her body shaking under Maddie's hands.

"Shhh...." Maddie scooted closer, as close as she could in the confined space. "Shhh. Listen to me. Listen, Ella. They are moving stuff above us, they are moving stuff so we can get out ..."

"Stop," Ella tugged on her hand. "Please just...I know what's happening right now Madeline. I've worked way too many emergencies to not know what's happening, what you're doing...just...stop trying to..."

"There will be a great big wedding," Maddie cut her friend off, trying to force the focus away from her train of thought, from her spiral. "Harry and I...it will be a great big wedding, won't it?"

"I..." Ella stammered; her panic tripping up on the switch in topics, just as Maddie had planned.

"Come on, you're my royalty follower. Will we have to have a great big wedding?" Maddie nudged her friend. Taking a breath, just as Maddie had coached her, Ella's mind shifted to something else.

"Yes," she cleared her throat. "Probably at the Abbey or Saint Paul's or..." Ella was cut off by a loud banging sound followed by a confetti of dust and debris and, finally, a blindingly bright light.

They were free.

"Oh my God..." Maddie gasped as the air hit her lungs, as the sunlight struck her eyes. Pressing them closed, she tried her best to hold it together—all of the emotions she had pushed aside to help Ella suddenly rushing forward like a tsunami tide.
They were free.

"Doc," Collins' voice called to her and she opened her eyes; looking directly at Ella.

They were both covered in dirt; their hair, their faces, their clothes. Ella's arm was bleeding a lot, the trail of blood smudged on Maddie's hands, on their arms, their faces. But there, in the middle of it all, were Ella's bright, shining eyes; open and alive. Maddie's eyes ran over with tears.

"Doc?" Collins called out to her again; tearing Maddie's eyes upward to look at him; like a savior sent from heaven. If he weren't having a baby with a woman she adored, if she weren't head over heels for a Prince, she would have kissed him on the mouth.

"I'm okay," Maddie spoke through her tears. "Ella's cut pretty bad. Get her out of here and over to the tent. I'm...I'm fine..." Her voice croaked on the word because, even though she was not cut like Ella, even though she had no broken bones she was aware of yet—she was far from fine.

As the others around Collins continued to pull stuff away from their sanctuary, he leaned over and held his hand out to Ella. And there was this moment, when the two friends locked eyes, when Ella wasn't sure if she could take his hand and leave Maddie there. Her eyes flashed wide and scattered.

"It's okay," Maddie nodded encouragement. "I am right behind you."

"Ella, darling," Collins was soft and sweet with her. "Give me your hand. The only way out is up...with me." Ella nodded, leaned to kiss Maddie's cheek and held her hand up to Collins.

And Maddie was alone for the briefest of moments. Just enough time for her legs to stretch a bit, just enough time for her mind to let go of protection mode and start to unravel at the reality of what had happened, just enough time to...

"Doc," Collins called down to her; snapping her attention up to him. Extending his hand, he fought to control his emotions. "Come on. Let's get you out of here." With a nod, because she had no voice, she held her hand up to him and just like that, she was out and on her feet.

She barely had time to look around her, to see that the entire building had collapsed around them, to see Khenda off to the side with her hand clamped over her mouth as she cried—following Ella and a doctor to a safe spot. She barely had time to take a deep, engulfing breath before Collins had her wrapped up in his arms.

"I told you to stay out of that building. I told you to..." He wavered; his heart and mind recovering from the terrible place he had been for the last ten minutes.

"I know," she nodded, her crying increasing. "I...I..." She took deep breaths to no avail. Feeling the aftereffects of the small space, the entrapment, Maddie pushed at his chest. She needed room. "Please...I need to breathe. I need some space. I need..." Collins dropped his arms immediately, knowing instantly what was happening. He had seen it before. She moved away from him then, wanting, needing to move off the pile of rubble.

"Here," he grabbed her arm. "Let me help you down..." Though he could see her need to flee, he also knew that stuff underneath them wasn't stable, that her legs were most likely not very strong. He helped her only to the bottom, only to the edge, before he let her loose and let her go.
"I'm okay," she called out. "I just need some space..." Rushing away from them, she moved; quickly and with great purpose, to a wide open space, away from buildings and people and everything.

And her world, her heart, her mind, her soul, came tumbling down. With her face in her hands, she cried.

She wept.

She bawled.

She sobbed.

It was loud, it was ugly, and it was beyond her control. So she let it come; the thought that this could have been it, that this could have been the end for her or Ella, or both. The thought that somewhere in Colorado, her mother may not have even heard of the earthquake, the thought that somewhere in England, Harry absolutely had. It was a lot to take on, a lot to process—and her body had its own way of handling it.

It was a while before she calmed, a while before the crying jag began to settle. She wiped at her eyes, pushing tears from her cheeks. She took deep, clarifying breaths; trying to calm her adrenaline. As her sobs subsided, she turned around to find Collins; a few feet away, but standing tall and ready.

"I'm okay," her voice was hoarse, but steady.

"I know," he nodded; eyes heavy with all that had happened. "Ella's okay too. She has a pretty serious gash on her arm. But they are stitching it up and she'll be just fine."

"Okay," Maddie smiled a tiny smile; not moving one inch. "Thank you."

"Yeah," Collins nodded. "Listen. I'm going to lecture you. You know I'm going to lecture you; about being safe, about listening to me, about following the protocol that was put in place for a reason..." He stopped himself as his voice rose, not wanting to yell at her in that moment. "I am going to do all of those things. But first..." He took a step towards her and held out his hand. "But first I think there's a man somewhere going absolutely mad with worry and I think you have a phone call to make."

And there, in the palm of his hand, was the satellite phone.
Saying good-bye to Khenda and Collins was a cluster of emotions. Though she hated the thought of leaving behind anyone she cared about in such a shattered place, Maddie was simply unable to hide the wholeness that came with returning to Harry's side.

"Any chance we could convince you to stay?" Collins teased; hugging her close after they unloaded at the airport.

"Not one single chance." Her voice was clear, firm; steady. "I am getting on that plane and I am going straight to him."

"Good answer," he grinned; kissing her cheeks. "We love you Doc."

"I love you too," she kissed him back. "Take care of Mama and baby, okay."

"No doubt," he smiled wide; already enamored with his growing family. Maddie moved to hug Khenda while Ella stepped into Collins' arms.

"You really should think about France," Maddie spoke into Khenda's ear. "Go where Collins goes, remember?"

"Ha!" Khenda laughed; recalling the time she sent Maddie away with similar advice.

"It also doesn't hurt that you would be miles closer to me."

"Yes, well, we'll keep you updated."

"Thank you," Maddie sighed as she stepped away from them. It was time to leave Bendal yet again. She couldn't help but notice that, as she took Ella's hand and moved towards the terminal, towards the plane...this time, when leaving Bendal, she felt not like she was leaving her home, but that she was on her way back to it.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

"I am unbelievably excited," Ella clapped her hands together as their descent into London began. The flight attendants had done their final check and were seated; they were almost there. "It's ridiculous really because I don't even know if Matt's going to pick me up or if I'm going to take a cab or..."

"You're not going to take a cab," Maddie rolled her eyes as she watched through the window as the ground grew closer and closer. She turned to Ella with a smirk on her face. "You really think Harry and I leave you at the airport to catch a cab?"

"No?" Ella raised her eyebrows.

"No." Maddie reached out to take her hand; inhaling deep, exhaling slowly.

"Nervous?" Ella nudged her lightly.

"A little."
"Why?" Ella's voice lowered; reading genuine anxiety in her friend's eyes.

"I don't know," Maddie sighed. "Maybe it's because I haven't seen him in two weeks. Maybe it's because when I talked to him on the phone after the quake all either of us did was cry..." She blinked back tears as she remembered. "Maybe I'm nervous he's going to see the bruises I have on my arms and freak out. Or it could be because I have this new, strange, glue-like attachment to him...I don't know." Ella chuckled. "I don't know. It's just...when Collins pulled me out of the...pile, all I could think about was him. It was a bit unsettling, but I just wanted to be next to him; close to him. I wanted him to leave London and fly to Bendal to get me."

"I'm sure he would have," Ella laughed. "Did you ask?"

"No," Maddie shook her head. "Because he would have. He would have come down there and taken me home." It was such an outlandish thing to say, but Maddie was beyond convinced that she was right. Harry wouldn't think twice.

"Wow...see..." Ella leaned back in her seat. "That's the guy you marry. The one who will fly to a poverty stricken, twice shaken country at the drop of a hat, just to bring you home. That is the guy."

"That is the guy," Maddie agreed. Her eyes turned to the window as the plane bumped to the ground and came to a screeching halt. It wasn't long before the plane was navigated to the gate, the seatbelt light flashing off and people were rising from their seats.

"Ready to go see that guy?" Ella snickered as she stood, reaching into the overhead bin to pull out their bags.

"You have no idea," Maddie sighed; watching as the other passengers lined up, making their way off the plane. "Why did we sit near the back again?"

"We were the first on the plane," Ella shrugged. "And it was quieter."

"Mmm..." Maddie smiled sleepily; leaning against her seat. Maybe it was better to wait it out.
"You really think Matt's not out there?"

"Ha!" Ella shrugged again. "I suppose he probably is." Maddie watched her friend for a moment, studied her expression—unsure about how Ella felt about Matt.

"You know..." She began, but was cut off by the flight attendant, a young man with a big smile, as he approached them from the front of the plane.

"Excuse me ladies, are you..." He read the paper in his hand. "Ella Marshall and Maddie Forrester?"

"Yes..." Ella was instantly leery.

"Fantastic!" He smiled. "Doctor Forrester?" Ella pointed to Maddie. "Great. There's been a bit of a problem with you paperwork. We're sorting it out, but in the meantime, would you mind staying on the plane for a moment?" The two looked at each other, confused.

"A problem with my paperwork? What paperwork?" Maddie raised her eyebrows to Ella who shrugged. "Is everything okay?"
"Yes ma'am. It will just take a minute," the young man nodded and looked to Ella. "And you must be Ms. Marshall?"

"Yes."

"This is for you," he held out a folded piece of paper; nice, sturdy cardstock. Even more confused, she opened it and read to herself.

"Welcome home.

Matt and a car are out here waiting for you. Give me a minute with Maddie?

Thanks love

~H"

A wide, warm grin spread across Ella's face.

"What is it?" Maddie leaned over, trying to take a look.

"Hmm..." She debated. Deciding to keep the secret, she shook her head and leaned to kiss Maddie. "Matt is out there waiting for me. You stay here and do whatever you need to do. I'll see you tomorrow for spa day?"

"What? I mean...yes. I'll see you tomorrow. But you're just going to...go?"

"Yes," Ella nodded; her smile deepening. "I'm going to go home and eat great food, take a hot shower and figure out what I'm going to do with Matt. You...you are going to do whatever they need you to do and then you're going to go meet up with Harry. And tomorrow we'll have a day of it."

"Okay," Maddie sighed, still confused. "I love you Ella."

"I love you too," Ella kissed her again. And, with one final contact of the eyes, Ella was moving away from her; at the end of a small line that was still exiting the plane.

"Is there any way you can tell me what this is all about?" Maddie leaned back against the chair, happy to be stretching her legs as the man moved around.

"It will all be cleared up in just a moment ma'am," he smiled at her; following the people as they left; clearing the aisles, checking for people and trash. Maddie stood there; propped back against the seat, her bag in the chair, her mind wandering. What was she doing on this plane? What could they possibly need from her? And what in the world could be wrong with her paperwork?

Maddie looked up, watching as the last passenger exited the plane. Soon, the pilot and co-pilot left, leaving only the two member flight crew. But when they smiled back at her and stepped to leave the plane, Maddie was absolutely confused.

"Wait! I..." She called out, slightly panicked as she took two steps. But, when she saw Jim step around the corner, her feet stalled and her heart thudded; she figured it out. There was nothing wrong with her paperwork.

This was him.
Jim, her personal favorite Security Officer, glanced around the cockpit area, into the bathrooms up front, before he moved past her. His eyes swept across the empty seats as he looked around back before passing by her again.

"Doctor Forester," he nodded with a smile. "It's good to see you again."

"Thank you Jim," she grinned; her body alive with anticipation. Jim moved back towards the galley of the plane and without another glance in her direction, disappeared towards the exit.

She knew exactly what was happening. But it didn't make the impact any less. When Harry stepped into view, her heart leapt in her chest and she felt tears prick at her eyes. All of the air rushed out of her lungs and all of her warmth into her heart.

"You really know how to make an entrance..." The corner of Maddie's mouth twitched up on its way to a smile.

"You really know how to make a man miss you." Harry took slow steps towards her.

"Yeah..." Her eyes welled up with tears and suddenly, there were no words. In actuality, there were so many words that there was room for none. She didn't know what to say, where to start. Thankfully, her body acted on instinct and before he could make a smart remark, before he could chastise her for making him worry, she was down the aisle and in his arms. Her feet left the floor and her soul felt at home.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

"You spoil me..." Maddie sighed into the bathtub full of hot water and bubbles. Once they had emerged from the plane, Harry had taken her hand protectively in his and had taken her back to his place—where he promptly fed her the pizza Bernard had made before he left, drew a bath, helped her wash her hair, and opened a bottle of champagne. He was doting, he was attentive; he was spoiling her rotten.

"Get used to it," Harry smiled down at her, his finger reaching out to pull a strand of wet hair from her forehead; his lips following behind.

"Mmmm..." Maddie grinned as he took a seat on the floor next to the tub facing her. "You were right. Coming to your place was genius."

"You like the tub."

"I love the tub. I love it. I am thinking of starting a love affair with your tub," she ran her hands along the slick surface.

"Ha!" He laughed. "Well...stick with me and the tub is yours anytime you want it."

"Sounds like a deal to me," she held her hand out to seal the deal. Taking her bubble soaked hand in his, Harry pulled it to his lips; kissing the top. As his eyes moved up her arm, he discovered her bruises, her wounds.

"Madeline..." He breathed; pulling her arm from the tub, looking her over with a shake of his head. He had known she was in the building. He had known it had crumbled around her. But for some reason, seeing the evidence of it in front of him, on her body, sucked away his breath for a moment.

"I'm okay," Maddie smiled tiredly. "I am. It's just...a little ceiling or wall I'm guessing. You should see the gash in Ella's arm." She watched as a range of emotions passed over his face before stopping on something close to gratitude and relief.

"You stood a little too close to disaster for me, love."

"For me too," her eyes were solemn when meeting his; not a trace of humor there. She knew this time had pushed him to the edge. "Don't worry. I'm no longer standing next to disaster. I'm right here with you Sunshine."

"We're really going to go with sunshine?" His eyes danced in the soft light.

"For a little bit. Do you mind?" Her eyebrows lifted lightly.

"No," he shook his head with a smile; feeling so calm, so at peace now that she was there with him that she could likely talk him into anything. "Would you like more champagne?"

"I would like more of you," she reached out, her wet fingers running into his hair.

"You have all of me..." He turned his face to kiss her hand; his voice low and heavy.

"Join me?" Her hand moved to the collar of his shirt, tugging at it lightly. Without hesitation, he nodded and rose from the floor. His hand grabbed for hers as he leaned closer, kissing her warm, wet lips. He was soft with her; slow—as though he was committing the moment to memory, mapping out the curves of her lips. Maddie let out a soft groan when he pulled away; her eyes lighting up as he tugged his shirt up and over his head, the rest of his clothes finding home in a pool on the floor. "That was easy," she giggled as he stepped into the water; bubbles splashing up around them.

"I'm easy," he smiled, sinking into the tub opposite her. His legs slid next to hers, skin slick from the water; her body perking at the sensation. Sitting up, Maddie moved closer to the middle of the tub, closer to him. Harry's hands were strong, guiding her legs around his waist, pulling her body closer to his. Her hands moved up his arms, over his shoulders, and around his neck; hugging him closer—their chests within inches of the other, their noses almost touching. Though Maddie could feel him, could tell that he wanted her as much as she wanted him, the intimacy she felt in that moment was more than just sexual—it was more than just desire. His eyes were open wide as he looked into hers; drawing for a deep connection, a place of understanding. It had been a long day for Maddie; traveling, the barrage of paparazzi at the airport, the settling down, washing herself clean from her time away—literally and metaphorically. Her mind, her body, and her soul had been wrapped up in coming down from that experience, in finding normal again. And now; clean, fed, quenched—now they were meeting on a different level.

"Hi..." Maddie whispered; her cheeks rosy from the heat, from his closeness.

"Hi," his fingers traced a path along her spine; causing her to arch closer to him in such a way that brought groans from the both of them. "Can I..." He cleared his throat, wanting to retain focus for just one moment longer. "I have a favor to ask of you."

"A favor?" She smiled; her fingers playing with the hair at the back of his neck.

"I..." He took a deep breath, gathering his courage; his nerve. "I hope you know how much I love your spirit and your independence and your stubborn nature. That I would never want to change those things about you..."

"I do," she breathed, her heart swelling.

"And I hope you know that I would never want you to be the kind of woman who would bow to my demands or let me walk all over you..."

"Yes..." Her eyes narrowed in confusion.

"Good," he nodded; moving to cup her face in his hands; his eyes holding hers with this intense gaze that made her lungs hitch. And when he spoke, his voice was pleading. "Please. Please, don't ever leave me like that again, Madeline. Ever." Maddie's eyes welled up as she watched his face change, twist into something that showed fear, concern and a whole lot of love. Though there was a part of her that wanted to be defiant, a part of her that wanted to balk at his request, the part of her that wanted to kiss away any hint of worry from his face won out. Blinking at the tears in her eyes, her hand reached up, a finger stroking his cheek.

"Okay," it was choked, but she said it; nodding. "Okay. I won't ever leave you like that again." Closing the small distance between them, Maddie sought his lips in comfort, in love, in lust. The words had all been said and now, now was the time to let their bodies reunite and love each other.

God she had missed him.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

"Collins and Khenda are having a baby?!" Harry's voice went high in surprise.

"They are," Maddie nodded with a wide grin; taking a bite from a strawberry. It was the next morning and they hadn't been awake long before Harry had called up a breakfast spread that would rival most restaurants. Sitting cross-legged on his bed, in his button down shirt, Maddie sipped coffee and picked at the food as she brought him up to date on the news from Bendal. The night with Harry had left her feeling rested, well loved, and refreshed. Her skin still felt warm with blush when she thought of him with her in the tub.

"That is amazing news," Harry shook his head, his heart full of love for his friends. His eyes were bright and his face seemed to shine.

"There you go," Maddie nodded at him. "That's the exact look I didn't want to miss over the phone." He winked at her and swallowed a bite.

"They are going to be wonderful parents."

"They are!" Maddie agreed wholeheartedly.

"And they are really thinking of moving to France?"

"Sure," she shrugged. "It's safer and Khenda lived there for some time when she was younger. And I've heard it's beautiful."

"You've never been?" Harry's forehead crinkled as he watched her.

"No," she shook her head. "I've never been."
"We'll have to fix that."

"You have?" She asked and then rolled her eyes; catching herself. "Never mind. Of course you've been to France."

"I have," he chuckled.

"And? Did you love it?"

"Hmm," he leaned across the food on the bed to kiss her. "I think I'll love it more when I'm there with you."

"Smooth," she laughed. "Always so smooth."

"How long before you have to be back to work?" He grinned.

"What is today?"

"Wednesday."

"I have to be back on Monday. So...five days, counting today."

"What does your day look like?" His hand reached out; a finger running along her leg, over her knee, up her thigh.

"Well," Maddie shifted slightly under his touch. "My boyfriend has to go to work..."

"For only a few hours," he cut in, his hand disappearing up underneath the bottom of the shirt she was wearing.

"Hmm..." She moaned; her face flushing as he teased her. "A few hours during which I am going to take Ella for a manicure and a pedicure and a long lunch...Harry..." She gasped as his hand traveled even higher; moving against the thin slip of fabric that was between his hand and her body.

"Can I have you for dinner?" He arched an eyebrow, leaning over to kiss her knee.

"You can have me for dinner," she breathed as his lips followed along the journey his fingers had just taken, moving up her thigh.

"Can I have you right now?" His breath was hot against her skin; sending a tremble throughout her body.

Though she was certain that her squeal of laughter could be heard by anyone near the cottage, as Harry moved up under her shirt with purpose in his fingers and warmth in his lips, she simply couldn't find it in herself to care.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

"I love your bed..." Maddie stretched out languorously, calling out to him as he emerged from the bathroom; freshly showered with a towel around his waist.
"Oh?" He grinned, running another towel over his wet head. "I almost lost you to the tub last night. Am I going to lose you to the bed this morning?"

"Possibly," she sighed. "Though I prefer both with you in it."

"Fair enough," he agreed; moving to sit on the edge of the bed, his face growing serious in thought. "Listen, I have something I need to tell you. Actually, two somethings."

"Okay," Maddie straightened up, turning her focus away from his body and back to his words. They had spent most of their time on Bendal, not even getting to what had gone on in England while she was away. "Go ahead."

"Good news? Bad news? What do you want first?" He held up two hands, as if judging two different weights.

"Bad news," she answered quickly. "I'm a bad news first kind of a gal."

"I'll note that," he took a breath; turning is body to face her. "Bad news. The paps are going to be on you more than they were before you left."

"What? Why?" Her face screwed up. "Did something happen?"

"Nothing new," he shook his head. "They just...they figured you out."

"Figured me out? They've know who I was for a long time, where I lived, where I worked...what else was there to figure out?" Maddie was confused.

"They dove into your time in Bendal."

"Okay. But I don't understand...they knew I was there with DWB before and that we met in Bendal and..." With purpose, Harry leaned closer. His hand reached out, sweeping the shirt from her shoulder; pressing a kiss to the scar that was a year old. His eyes moved to meet hers and she understood.

"They know that you took a bullet from a gun that was aimed at me." His words were blunt, truthful. No beating around the bush.

"But...we don't really know that."

"Maddie..."

"We don't! He could have been aiming at me! Or not aiming at all! For all we know, that was a completely random shot!"

"Well, first. That's not exactly true. He was aiming. He may not have been aiming at me but he was aiming. It was me or Ella or that little girl. And second, he was not aiming for you. You moved to step into that path. You weren't standing there to begin with and had you stayed put, you would not have been hit. But you didn't, you stepped into it. So what do we have? You stepped up and took a bullet that was met for me, Ella or that injured little girl. The papers are saying it was for me. But honestly, anyway you go, you're...a hero."

"Oh God," Maddie moaned, pulling his pillow over her head.
"Harry's Hero," he laughed as he repeated a headline.

"Tell me they aren't calling me that," her voice was muffled. Harry remained silent for a moment and then reached out to pull the pillow away from her. Leaning up slightly, she met his eyes. "They are calling me that, aren't they."

"They are," he nodded with a smug grin. "Come on...it's not so bad."

"Yes it is!" She sat up. "Harry... Calling me a hero is... Listen, I reacted on a gut level instinct. I just moved. There was no forethought to it, no decision. It was instinct. The real heroes are the men and women who make a conscious effort every day to risk their lives, to risk their livelihood, for the betterment of others, for the safety of others. Those are the real heroes."

"Okay," Harry agreed. "So tell me, how is what you just spent the last two weeks doing not an example of what you just said."

"I..." She stammered; caught.

"You can't," he smiled. "You risked your life, your livelihood, for the betterment of others. Tell me that's not what you did. Look at the bruises on your arm, think about the hole Collins pulled you and Ella out of and tell me that's not what you did."

"But..."

"And the year and half you spent down there before? Getting ruffed up and intimidated? Being threatened and shot at...all for the sake of others. Tell me that's not what you were doing down there."

"Harry..."

"So they call you a hero. Let 'em," he shrugged. "They'll write their stories, publish their photos and then they'll move on to something else."

"You make it sound so simple."

"It is." He watched as she took it in, thought it over and nodded; letting out a long breath. "This is me...helping you navigate this life. I just wanted you to know there will be more of them around for a bit."

"Okay...Okay." A smile moved to her face as she moved on; accepting what he had told her and looking forward. He couldn't help but note how much easier the process was for her, how much easier she had accepted it.

"Ready for the good news?" He chuckled as he moved from the bed towards his clothes.

"Please."

"While you were away, my grandmother called," he spoke so casually, so innocently that the impact of the conversation almost passed Maddie by. "She's requested that the two of us join her for tea."

Almost.
"Oh God..." Maddie moaned, falling back onto his bed and reaching for the pillow; Harry laughing with great humor as he readied for the day.

"Ella..." Maddie's voice sang out as she knocked on her best friend's door. "Come on Ella...open up..." Harry had been right. She had been bombarded with photographers when she left Kensington Palace to return to her place. Even after she had unpacked, showered, and set out for the day, they were still waiting for her. And, as she stood outside of Ella's apartment, two coffees in hand, there was somebody across the street watching her every move. "Ella!" She knocked again. "Come on woman! I need to talk to you. I am having tea with his Grandmother and..." She trailed off as the door swung open and her jaw dropped; shock taking over her entire body.

"Good morning love."

"Bishop?!" She blinked, almost unable to process the reality.

"The one and only," he grinned, pulling her into the apartment and shutting the door behind her. "Come here..." He gathered a stunned Maddie into his arms. "I can't tell you how good it is to see you."

"Thank you..." Though confused by his presence, she hugged him back. "Is...I'm sorry, I just... Is Ella here?"

"Yeah, she's just..."

"Bishop!" Ella came from her room, pulling her robe around her as she moved. "I thought I told you not to answer the door!"

"I couldn't leave her standing outside in the cold with the photographers," he defended before turning a smirk to Maddie. "That's really no way to treat Harry's Hero, now is it?"

"Oh God," Maddie groaned at his reference. "What are you doing here? What is he doing here?" She looked to her rosy cheeked friend; smiling wide. "Do you have Matt back there too?"

"No," Bishop spoke up. "She does not have Matt back there too."

"I don't," Ella sighed; avoiding Maddie's probing eyes for the moment. "Okay Bishop. It's time for you to go. I told you, I'm Maddie's today. We have things to do...."

"Things to explain," Maddie offered.

"You have to go," Ella spoke only to Bishop.

"May I at least put on some pants first?" He watched Ella move; eyes full of adoration and amusement.

"You may." Leaving the two women in the entry way for a moment, Bishop hurried back to Ella's room to dress. Maddie let a full beat of awkward silence pass between them before she spoke.

"Coffee?" Maddie held out one of the cups; her lips curling up at the sides.

"Thank you," Ella took it casually. "I know what you're going to say."
"You have no idea what I'm going to say."

"I can guess."

"I doubt it."

"Okay ladies..." Bishop returned, dressed and smiling wide. "Maddie, it's lovely to see you again —especially because it means Harry's going to stop walking around on edge all the time..." He kissed her cheeks. "Maybe the four of us could do dinner sometime?"

"Sure," Maddie smiled, narrowing her eyes at Ella. "Is there a four of us now?"

"Good-bye Bishop," Ella pushed him towards the door.

"Good-bye love," his voice was sweet and soft and had the same melting effect on Ella that the sun had on ice. Maddie watched as her rough exterior friend grew soft, her cheeks blushing slightly as she tilted her lips to kiss Bishop. Right there in front of Maddie's eyes. "Call me later?"

"We'll see," Ella slipped back into her mode; shrugging nonchalantly.

"Sure, sure," Bishop grinned, knowing her enough to know—she would call. With one final nod of his head, he slipped through the door. The sound of it closing behind him echoed in the room as the two friends looked at each other.

"So..." Maddie took a breath. "Matt is..."

"Gone."

"Oh-kay. And Bishop..."

"Would fly to Bendal to pick me up if I asked him to." Ella's eyes rose to meet Maddie's who swallowed at the lump that formed instantly in her throat. With a nod, she smiled; wide and warm. That was enough. That was more than enough.
Chapter 63

Christmas had always been at the top of Maddie's list of experiences. She loved everything about it; the snow, the lights, the brightly wrapped gifts, the hustle and bustle of shopping, the family, the giving, the way people seemed more friendly, more willing to help. She even loved the stuff that people normally hated; the icy streets, the way the lines at shopping centers doubled and tripled the closer the holiday drew, the way the music started playing earlier and earlier every year. At home in Colorado, there was almost always snow. Even if it was a beautiful, sunny day at her parents' home, they could drive a few hours into the mountains and be surrounded by snowy peaks and icy windows. When Maddie celebrated Christmas in Bendal, she missed the sweaters and the hot chocolate and the snuggling in front of the fire, but the spirit had remained; the sense of community. Experiencing the Holiday Season in London for the first time, amidst the snow and ice packed streets but without her family brought about the strangest feeling of nostalgia and hominess all at once.

Her time since returning from Bendal had flown by. As requested, Maddie and Harry had joined his grandparents for tea at Buckingham Palace—where Harry gave her the 'inside tour', sharing tales of his childhood and family lore that made her smile like the Cheshire cat. He had made it a point to make her laugh, to put her at ease, to show the human side of the pomp and circumstance that oozed from everything around them. So that when they finally sat for tea, Maddie felt a little less intimidated.

The afternoon could not have gone any better. The Queen of England, in fact, was still merely Harry's Granny. She was warm and welcoming and made Maddie feel at home in such a way that she was certain had attributed to her overwhelming popularity; at home and abroad. Harry had been incredibly relaxed; joking with his grandfather, talking of upcoming trips to the country. Surprising herself, Maddie was much more relaxed than she had expected to be; sitting tall and proper and taking an active part in an engaging conversation with the Queen about her time in Bendal and her experience in service to the people there. It went so well that, when it was time for the two of them to be on their way, Maddie felt the slightest bit of regret, wanting to stay longer and soak it all up. Maddie smiled wide, dipped in a slight curtsey and thanked them both profusely for inviting her to sit with them. And, as they walked away, Harry's hand draped loosely around her waist, he pressed a kiss to the side of her head and sighed. From the look in his eyes, it had gone very, very well.

As November flew by and the year grew closer and closer to an end, Harry had decided that Maddie hadn't seen nearly enough of Europe. Knowing she had a heart for travel, he made it a point to make it a priority; effectively commandeering her free weekends for quick holidays to neighboring countries. They had been to France twice; once on their own, once with Bishop and Ella—who continued to evolve as a couple. They had eaten amazing food, drank bottles of champagne, and Maddie had spent ten solid minutes looking out over a snow covered Paris from the top of the Eiffel Tower when they were allowed a private tour.

They had ventured to Germany where they became tourists; drinking bier, visiting the Black Forest. Harry even begrudgingly agreed to accompany her on a tour of Germany's castles. The reporters caught up with them as they made their way, hand in hand, through Neuschwanstein Castle; snapping a picture that they printed with the headline "House Hunting-Royalty Edition". Maddie couldn't help but laugh when she saw it and, feeling quite silly as she did, she tore it from the magazine and put it in her memory box. Something about the photo made her smile and she wanted to keep it.
Traveling with Harry was indescribable. Not only did he travel within a higher level of luxury, he was well traveled, well-schooled on other countries, other cultures and he served her well with his plethora of knowledge. Maddie was in awe as he taught her local customs, spoke in foreign languages. And Harry, Harry loved traveling with Maddie. She was relaxed and easy going, she was smart and funny, she was adaptable and flexible and she was willing to try just about anything he asked of her. During those few, quick trips to neighboring countries, Harry could already see the qualities in her that would help get her through the tours she would be taking once she stood at his side officially; he could already see her walking in that role. And he knew—she was going to love it. In those weeks leading up to the holidays, Maddie's passport was getting a workout and she just knew he had more travel plans for her after the holiday.

As December descended upon them, there was snow on the ground, cold in the air, and Maddie had caught the Christmas spirit. Of course, it didn't hurt that there were parties and events scheduled around every corner. There was the hospital Christmas party which Harry attended as Maddie's date. He was his usual charismatic self, charming her co-workers, entertaining everyone with his humor and making Maddie the envy of many in the room with the way he looked at her, the way he stayed by her side; eyes full of pride and love.

There was an official event that Harry attended at St. Joseph's honoring the soldiers and their families. Though Maddie was not allowed to accompany him to the event officially, she was on the roster as part of the staff. So she sat in the audience, next to her co-workers and she watched him work. She watched in awe as he spoke from his heart, from a place of deep respect and understanding, to the veterans and their families. He spoke of duty, honor, sacrifice. She watched the impact his presence and his words had on the patients, on the staff. It was humbling, silencing, to see the force that Harry walked with; to see the way his presence and his support moved those in the room. She felt goose bumps on her skin, a lump in her throat and a 'that's my man' smile on her face. And later, long after the official part of the night was over, after he had shaken hands and taken photos and wished the very last patient a Happy Christmas, he slipped relatively unnoticed into her office and Maddie, unable to control herself, threw her arms around his neck and kissed him deeply.

"You just keep getting sexier and sexier and..." Her lips crashed against his again; pushing him back against her closed door.

"Mmmm..." He moaned into her mouth; his mind catching up with his body. "Here? In your office?" His eyebrows arched suggestively. "I'm not saying no, I just want to be sure I understood the meaning behind that."

"Let me lock the door," Maddie was smug as her hands moved behind him, clicking the lock into place; Harry's hands clutching greedily around her waist. "What do you say Captain...feel like shocking me with what you can do in ten minutes?"

With a wry smile, Harry pulled her flush to him; his lips descending onto hers with heat and fervor. Challenge accepted.

It began and ended quickly. It began and ended with a kiss. It began and ended with instant, all-encompassing passion and desire. It began and ended with Maddie wrapped around him, clinging to his shoulders and groaning his name into his flesh. And, as their hearts settled, as their breathing calmed, he helped steady her as she lowered her feet to the ground; a feeling of satisfaction and completeness washing over her every pore.

"You know..." Harry looked around as he tucked in his shirt. "There aren't any toys in this office. I remember your office in Bendal having much more toys."
"I work mostly with adults here. The toys are at the hospital," Maddie explained, adjusting her skirt and sliding her shoes back on her feet.

"Makes sense," he ducked slightly to look in the mirror on her wall; smoothing out his hair, checking for traces of her lipstick before turning to her. "Can you come home with me?"

"I don't know," she blushed slightly as she looked up at him; her skin still hot from his touch. "You were here on business. Can I walk out the door with you?"

"The door we just had sex against?" He chuckled, smoothing a fly away strand of hair.

"That would be the one," she wrapped her arms around his waist, smiling up at him as his hands ran over her back.

"You're probably right," he sighed deeply, wanting to—in that moment—fix that issue once and for all. "I would still like to see you tonight."

"Come to my place?" She reached for her bag and shut down her computer. "I'll sneak out now. You say good-bye to whomever you need to say good-bye to and meet me there later?"

"Absolutely..." He leaned into her; kissing her fully.

"Mmmm..." Maddie smiled against his lips. "I'll see you soon, your Royal Highness..." With a glint in her eye, she stepped away from him; opening the door and stepping out into the empty hallway—save for Brad who stood guard outside. With a slight blush to her cheeks, she nodded hello. Harry stepped from her office, pulling the door shut behind him and stood, goofy grin in place, watching as she walked down the hallway.

"Thank you Doctor," he called out to her. With a turn of her feet, a bite of her lip and a shake of her head, she continued on her way out of the building—nobody was the wiser.

This wasn't the first Christmas that Maddie had spent without her blood family, it wasn't the first holiday that she had been on her own. Nonetheless, as the holiday grew closer, as the realization that Harry would be absent for Christmas as well as the days leading up to set in, Maddie found herself growing more and more nostalgic; clinging to traditions. In that spirit, she planned a small, intimate, pre-Christmas gathering for the night before Harry was set to leave for Sandringham House—as was Royal Family tradition. With three days until Christmas Day, Maddie had planned a cozy night in for Harry, Bishop, Ella and herself. Her fireplace was lit, hot cocoa warm and rich, a pot of meticulously made chili on the stove. Her home was decorated almost to the point of laughter; lights draped all over; ornaments, stockings, carefully wrapped gifts and the sound of Louis Armstrong singing White Christmas in the background. It was enough to make any Santa Claus feel at home.

Maddie was in her bedroom when Harry arrived. Taking one final look in the mirror at her red party dress, she hurried to let him in. Pulling the door open, she inhaled sharply.

"Merry Christmas," she grinned as his eyes grew wide.

"Wow..." He looked her over. "You look...amazing."
"Thank you," she smiled, tugging his coat so as to pull him inside. "Care to join me inside?"

"Absolutely," he nodded and entered. Maddie's hands were quick, sliding between his coat and his sweater; stepping into his arms.

"You're wearing my favorite sweater."

"I know. I like the effect it has on you."

"The one where I can't keep my hands off of you?"

"That one exactly."

"Hi," she smiled up at him; nestling closer.

"Hi," he smiled down at her; kissing her lightly.

"You're a little early, you know. Do you want to take me under the mistletoe before our guests arrive?" Every word dripped with suggestion as she leaned into him.

"Ha..." He laughed through a groan. "I would. I really would. But I can't."

"You can't?" She raised her eyebrows. "I hope that's not a permanent position because..."

"No, no," he shook his head; his hands running up and down her arms. "I just...I...I have your Christmas gift."

"What? I thought we were going to exchange gifts after you got back from Sandringham."

"No." He shook his head, his eyes dancing with excitement. "I'm going to open mine when I get back. You get yours right now."

"Harry..."

"Come on. Don't look at me like that. It's an amazing gift, I promise."

"Oh I have no doubt. But we made a deal."

"Please Madeline. You won't regret this." He looked so cute, so sweet, like a little boy dying to show his mother his latest find. Surrounded by love and warmth and the Christmas spirit, Maddie simply couldn't say no.

"Fine." She gave in; beaming with excitement as she did.

"Fantastic." He clapped his hands together and moved to the intercom. Maddie watched in confusion as he pressed the button. "Come on up."

"It's downstairs?"

"Yes." He was positively giddy; bouncing on his heels. In less than a minute, there was a knock on the door. "Okay, now listen, when I open this door, you are probably going to want to tear off my clothes and thank me in a way that only you know how..." Maddie crossed her arms and narrowed her eyes as he chuckled. "Just remember that now is not the time and to save your thanks for later."

"Harry..."

"Fine," his smirk turned into a loving smile as he leaned to kiss her lips; soft and sweet. Reaching for the doorknob, he grinned, "Merry Christmas."

And when Harry swung open the door, revealing his gift, Maddie's heart thudded to a stop, her eyes welled instantly with tears and there was a small, brief moment, where she wasn't entirely sure she was still conscious; that she thought that maybe she had fallen asleep while getting ready and that the entire interaction between her and Harry had been a dream.

"Mom?"

"Madeline."

It was real. She was real. Maddie let out a breath as Harry stood aside and her mother stepped into her home. Suddenly Maddie was enveloped in her mother's arms; surrounded by love and excitement.

"Oh my God...mom?" She pulled back slightly; looking into her eyes, feeling her there. "I cannot believe this. I..." She shook her head in disbelief. "Are you really here? Am I imaging this or..."

"I'm here," Hannah grinned; holding Maddie's face in her hands as she kissed her daughter hello. "I'm here."

"But...how?"

"Harry." Two sets of tender eyes turned to where he was standing next to the closed door; watching with joy.

"You..." Maddie's words were choked as she met his eyes. "I can't believe this."

"Well, I'm heading up to Sandringham and I really couldn't handle the idea of you here, alone, on Christmas so..."

"How long?" She could barely form a complete thought around this moment; could barely keep the shock at bay.

"Is it still Sunday the twenty-second here?" Hannah glanced between the two of them as Harry nodded with a smile. "I'll be here one week. I fly out next Sunday, the twenty-ninth."

"Oh my God..." Maddie hugged her tight. "I don't even know what to say or...I..." She pulled back to look at her mother. "Welcome to London, mom."

"Thank you," she grinned, wiping at a stray tear that snuck out of Maddie's eye. "Now. My understanding is that we're having a party tonight."

"We are!" Maddie laughed. "Oh God. Do you want me to call and cancel or..."

"Nonsense!" Hannah rolled her eyes. "I would love to meet your friends. Do you think, though, that you could direct me to my room or a bathroom so I can settle in a bit and freshen up? I've been traveling for quite some time and..."
"Absolutely," Maddie nodded enthusiastically, taking her hand in hers and pulling her towards the spare bedroom; Harry following behind them with her luggage. Hannah thanked them both and, wanting to pull herself together before the others arrived, slipped into her bathroom.

"I offered to put her up in a room at the Goring but she wanted to stay here," Harry explained as they walked back down the hallway to her living room.

"Harry..." Maddie came to a stop; her voice cracking as she looked at him. His eyes locked with hers and he felt nervous, a little shy, at the intensity there. "You brought me my mother."

"Yeah..."

"My mother who does not have a passport..." Maddie moved closer to him.

"Well, she does now." He smiled.

"Who hates flying..." Maddie moved closer still.

"She prefers first class." He shrugged.

"To England. You brought me my mother for Christmas. Harry..." Maddie moved into his open arms, her heart completely full of love. "I don't know what to say."

"Nothing. Say nothing," his fingers stroked her cheek as he lowered his voice. "Though you do want to tear off my clothes and..."

"I really do," Maddie's grin matched his as they began to laugh at how the very thing that brought out that desire was the one thing that would keep it from happening. "You're good Wales. Really good."

"Merry Christmas Madeline." His eyes held hers for a moment before he dipped his head; capturing her lips with his.
Chapter 64

It wasn’t long before Hannah returned to the living room, refreshed and changed. Before Hannah could pour thanks at Harry for convincing her to make the trip, the bell rang and Ella and Bishop were headed up. Maddie greeted them with amplified enthusiasm, pulling them into her place with warm hugs and introducing her mother with pride. While Ella beamed brightly at the chance to finally meet Maddie’s mother, Bishop jumped ahead of both of them; pulling her into a crushing hug and kissing both of her cheeks. Maddie laughed as her mother hugged him back; unsure if she was really able to handle someone like Bishop. Wanting her mother to taste and approve of the chili, Maddie pulled her into the kitchen, leaving Harry to open a bottle of wine for their friends in the living room.

"You flew her mother in for Christmas?" Ella spoke in a hushed voice.

"I did," Harry nodded; popping the cork out and reaching for a glass.

"Nicely done. You are going to get lucky on this for a good solid month," Ella chuckled while Bishop shook his head with a grin.

"Maybe longer." He added.

"Come on," he poured the wine into the glasses. "I'm leaving tomorrow. You're going to be with Bishop for Christmas at his parents. It makes no sense for her to be here alone if she doesn't have to be."

"Awww...." Ella's head tipped to the side, her lips pulling into a smirk. "Two months. Easy." While Bishop laughed along with her, Harry shook his head and finished off the glasses.

"The chili's ready," Maddie grinned as she carried the pot into the dining room, her mother behind her. And then, as her friends—and her family—gathered around her lovingly decorated table, as she served them her meticulously prepared meal and drank bottles of wine, her mother stepped with ease into the circle of friends. She was sweet and motherly with Ella, she laughed at Bishops insane attempts to entertain her and amused them all with tales from Maddie's childhood.

As they finished dinner and moved the laughter and the wine into the living room, Maddie sat between Harry and her mother and the party continued late into the night. Harry revealed the rest of his present; an itinerary for Maddie and her mother that included spa time, lunches at some of the finest restaurants, and tours of the highpoints around London—including a Private tour of Buckingham Palace and a trip to Highgrove at the end of the week to meet up with Harry, Charles and Camilla before Hannah had to leave. Maddie thought it was all too much, knew it was all too much, but her mother was so happy to be there, Harry was so happy that he was able to make it happen and keep it a surprise that Maddie decided to let her protests slide and simply be happy—just like the rest of them. Finally Hannah rose to her feet with a big yawn.

"Okay kids. I have been traveling for about a day and I am exhausted. I've had a great time but I'm done for the night." Her surrender was met with a series of groans; followed by a series of hugs. Bishop held onto her for the longest, drunkenly delirious as he told her good-night and slipped her his phone number in case she needed to get away. Maddie swatted at Bishop as Harry moved to Hannah. As he embraced her, she pressed a kiss to his cheek, held tight to him for an extra beat and told him thank you with such weight, it left him speechless. This trip was more than just a flight to London; he had helped her do something she had never done before; she had a passport, she was traveling internationally. And the way it made her daughter smile was something Hannah would carry with her forever. Harry watched as the two women walked down the hallway, Maddie making sure her mother had what she needed and telling her goodnight.

When Maddie returned from her mother's room, Ella and Bishop were in their coats, waiting to tell her good-bye and then, just like that, Maddie was alone with Harry. She knew her time with him was limited, he had a plane to be on bright and early in the morning. She knew he would need to leave soon and, especially following his great surprise, she was feeling reluctant to let him go. Harry watched from where he sat on the couch as Maddie moved around, flipping off the lights in the room; leaving only the glow from the tree.

"You really outdid yourself this time," she smiled down at him, her eyes sleepy.

"I want you to have a happy Christmas," he reached out to grab her hand in his; tugging lightly for her to join him. Maddie nodded with a smile; bunching her skirt up as she moved to sit in his lap, fabric pooling around them. Harry moved slightly so that her knees could fall on either side of him, his hands moving up into her hair. Her eyes searched his as she sighed into him; her hands resting at his chest.

"But the spa and the tours and..." His lips pressed against hers; wanting to silence her, wanting to use these last moments before he left for something else. "And Buckingham Palace? We could have done the touristy thing like Ella and I did when I first moved here." Harry chuckled; pressing his forehead to hers, momentarily ceasing his drive to kiss her.

"You're not exactly a tourist anymore, Love." His hands moved around her waist; holding her to him. "Think of what that would do to the tour if you were there and somebody recognized you. You've been in those halls without a guide."

"I had a guide," she tugged at his sweater; her hands at his chest.

"I don't want to talk about the palace, Maddie..." His voice was whisper soft, one hand leaving her waist to stroke her cheek.

"Me neither..." She grinned, tilting her lips to kiss him. The room grew silent around them; still. Nothing but the rustle of the fabric of her dress moving against that of his sweater as they moved closer to each other. Nothing but the soft hush of their breath, growing slightly heavier as they leaned into each other. "You know that I understand that you have to leave, right? I understand that this is not just a duty but a familial obligation and that you not only need to be there, you want to be there...you know I get that right?"

"Yes," he nodded; his lips clinging to hers, finding it difficult to focus on her words given her current position.

"And you know that I am not the type of woman who would stomp her feet and throw a fit and...you know I don't really mean it but..."

"Maddie..." He breathed against her lips. Pulling back slightly, Maddie's hands moved to his face; holding him steady so she could meet his eyes.

"I am going to miss you on Christmas, Harry. I don't like spending holidays without you. I want to wake up with you on Christmas morning and make you pancakes and open gifts and..." She trailed off, her eyes growing unexpectedly teary. "I'm sorry. I just wanted you to know that I'll miss you. I'll miss you and I love you and...and if my mom weren't here..."
"We would have on less clothing?" His eyes sparkled in the glow from the tree.

"Much less," Maddie chuckled. "Thank you for bringing her here."

"You're welcome," he wrapped his arms around her tighter; squeezing her into him.

"So...since you already broke the Christmas present rule," a grin pulled at Maddie's lips. "Can I give you yours?"

"Right now, you can do anything you want," he was under her control.

"I'll be right back..." Maddie moved quickly, despite his groan as she left him. Dipping down, she reached under the tree, pulling out a small slim box before she returned to her spot on his lap. Looking from the box to him, she seemed suddenly shy; unsure. "You know, this is nowhere near what you gave me. But truly, what can compare with my mother in London for Christmas?"

"Very little I would imagine. Your mother's pretty fabulous," he smiled sweetly, his hand reaching out to hold the box, still in her hands. "May I?"

"Yes," she nodded; releasing her hold on the gift. Harry moved slightly, bringing his hands from her to the box; pulling at the paper to reveal a Cartier box. His eyes flashed up to her face, her teeth biting at her lip as she watched him. After a beat, he pulled the lid from the box, his fingers reaching in to pull out a men's bracelet; exactly like something he would have picked out for himself.

"Wow..." He breathed. "This is..."

"Hold on," she smiled; adjusting slightly in his lap, her hand stilling his on the bracelet. "In Bendal, in Africa, there's something called Ubuntu. It's a...philosophy—a way of life really. It's centered around the idea that the group, the partnership is greater than the individual. That the whole is greater than the parts...that we," her hand moved between the two of them. "Are greater together than we could ever be apart."

"Ubuntu," Harry breathed, his heart pounding in his chest as he read the word on the bracelet.

"Ubuntu," Maddie nodded with a smile. "The literal translation is 'I am, because we are.'" turning the bracelet over so that he could read the words she had engraved there.

"I am because we are." He felt tears in his throat, his heart swelling in his chest. "Maddie..."

"I know that my...independent nature...can sometimes be frustrating..."

"Never," he shook his head; certain.

"And I often have to remind myself that even though I can do things on my own, I don't have to." She tucked her hair behind her ear as she smiled; soft and young and sweet. "I want you to know that, even when I don't always show it or act it or..." She inhaled deeply; meeting his eyes. "You've changed my life Harry. You've made me whole in a way I didn't even know I wasn't. You make me so much better when you're with me than I am when you're not. I...I am because we are. This..." She moved her hand from her chest to his, letting it rest there. "This is so much greater than I ever was without you. And I know I don't show that nearly enough; not nearly enough." Harry held her eyes, unable to pull from his overwhelmed emotions one single response. to her words that would adequately convey the way he was feeling. Blinking back the tears that formed in his eyes, he nodded and moved; leaning up, his hands tangling in her hair—his lips finding hers. She let out an involuntary moan, a gasp, at the intensity of his kiss; her eyes closing as she leaned into him, into the moment.

"Mmm..." Harry smiled against her lips, trying to reign in his desires, trying to control where this would naturally lead if they were alone. Pulling away from her slightly, his eyes smiled at hers. "Do you think I could make love to you right here without your mother knowing?"

"I don't know," she shook her head; cheeks flushed as she chuckled at the idea. "Care to find out?" She longed to connect with him on that primal level, skin to skin, beating heart to beating heart. Harry's hand was strong at the back of her neck as he pulled her to him; his lips kissing her forehead as he took deep breaths.

"Thank you," he kissed her cheek, her jaw, her lips. "I love this; very much. Thank you."

"You're welcome," she smiled; happy that it had gone over well.

"Help me?" He held it out to her, presenting his arm. With a nod, she took it from him, her fingers nimble as she fastened it around his wrist. "Perfect." He grinned, turning his hand to show her. A moment of silence settled over them, a moment of pause; a moment of reflection and gathering. With sad eyes, he smiled. "Bad news, good news..." He lifted his eyebrows.

"You have to go, don't you..." Maddie's bottom lip stuck out just slightly as she guessed the bad news.

"I do," he kissed her again; his thumb rubbing at her cheek.

"What could possibly be the good news?" She smiled, her eyes searching his face.

"That if you asked me now to stay..." He took a deep breath. "I would."

"Harry," she shook her head; a small chill passing over her at his words. "I'm not going to do that."

"I know," he sighed; his hands at her hips. "I'll see you on Friday at Highgrove?"

"With bells on," she grinned. With a final, quick kiss to his lips, Maddie moved from his lap. Harry groaned, but allowed her to take his hand and pull him to his feet. "Come on Wales, before I change my mind and lock you in."

"Ha!" He laughed at how unnecessary that would be; at how easily she would be able to get him to stay put. He pulled on his coat, wrapping his scarf around his neck loosely, before he turned to face her. "Enjoy your time with your mother."

"Well, you made sure of that, didn't you?" She was smiling as she hugged him.

"Warn her about the press," Harry's mind shifted to business for just a moment. "Let her know about the photographers that follow you around sometimes. Don't let her be surprised by that. It's a little crazy when it first happens, as I am sure you remember."

"I do," she nodded. "That's great advice. Thank you."
"Friday?" He raised his eyebrows.

"Friday," she nodded; squeezing him tighter.

"I'm better with you too, you know that, right?" He smiled down at her. "This..." His hand moved between them as hers had earlier. "Is greater than I ever was without you." Her eyes grew soft, watery, as she nodded.

"Merry Christmas Harry," Maddie leaned up on her toes to kiss him.

"Merry Christmas."

On the days when Maddie had to work, her mother enjoyed stepping out on her own; shopping, coffee, a luxurious trip to the spa. She was pampered and primped and treated like royalty; a thought that left Hannah in giggles for almost an hour. She even stopped by the hospital to see Maddie for lunch; meeting her coworkers and her boss—seeing the work that Maddie did, seeing the respect that was held for her.

When Maddie returned home from the hospital on Christmas Eve, they assumed their normal, Forrester Family routine; eating Chinese food and watching A Christmas Story in their pajamas. There was a moment, right before Ralphie's dad gave him the Official Red Ryder Carbine-Action Two-Hundred-Shot Range Model Air Rifle he had been aching for the entire film, when Maddie turned to look at her mother eating from a carton of take out, and her mind jumped into the future; the future with Harry where on Christmas Eve she would be at Sandringham, dressed in wool and silk, drinking holiday drinks with their royal highnesses. It was fate. It was set in stone. If she was a royal, when she was a royal, the nights of Chinese and Ralphie were over. It wouldn't be the first time, she had missed this during her time in Bendal, but there was something about the finality of it all that made her throat tighten. Pulling herself together, she leaned closer to her mother, resting her head on her shoulder and turning her attention the TV; appreciating Harry's gift of this moment more than she would really ever be able to convey.

"I have something for you," Hannah smiled at her daughter as the movie came to an end.

"Really?" Maddie sat up excitedly. "Like what?"

"I will be right back," Hannah kissed her daughter's cheek and hurried to her room. When she returned, she had two gift bags that she had brought with her. "This one is an integral part of our little tradition we have going on here..." She sat the green bag on the table in front of Maddie. "And this one...is a bit of a gift from home." She sat the red bag next to it.

"Oh wow..." Maddie looked between the two, trying to decide which to open first. Going with sentiment, she reached for the green bag. As she pulled it open, her breath sucked into her lungs, her eyes sweeping up to look at her mother. "Our stockings..." Maddie smiled, tears forming in her eyes as she pulled three quilted, patchwork stockings from the bright green bag; one for herself, one for her mother, and one for her father. "You brought dad's?"

"I've been hanging it up every year since..." Hannah's eyes matched Maddie's; teary and soft. "I didn't think it was right to leave his at home."

"I'm glad," Maddie wiped at her eyes and rose to her feet. Handing her father's to her mom, they moved to the fireplace; hanging them in a row, just as they had every year. "See...now everything is perfect." Maddie smiled through her sadness, through her tears.

"Yes it is," Hannah sighed; moving to wrap her arms around her daughter from behind; pressing a kiss to the side of her head. "He would be so proud of all you've done."

"You're going to make me cry..." Maddie cried; her hands resting over her mother's.

"Yes, well...I suppose it wouldn't be Christmas without a few tears." The two women stood there, observing their own moment of silence for the man they had loved, the man they had lost. And, when Hannah sniffed and pulled away, she reached for the red bag and turned a smile to her daughter. "Why don't you open this one. It's a little less sentimental."

"Okay," Maddie grinned; brushing at the tears on her cheeks. "Let me at it." Both women returned to the couch where Maddie opened up the gift bag and immediately began laughing.

From the bag she pulled a collection of small gifts from her family at home; handmade drawings and paintings from the girls, a recipe book with marked pages and words in the margins from her grand-mother, a framed photo of her entire family—each one wearing a "Team Maddie" shirt. And finally, a black and white photo of her and Harry. Somebody, she assumed Jenna, had taken a picture of the two of them on the night of her birthday. They were at The Lavender Lady, dressed to the nines and they were dancing together. Her arms were flung around his neck and he was smiling down at her as though she were the most amazing thing on the planet. The photo had been printed in black and white and was set in a stunning frame. Maddie thanked her mother, kissed her cheek and began to display her gifts around her place; all while Hannah poured some hot cocoa into mugs and settled on the couch—ready to start the movie over again.

On Christmas Day, the traditions continued; coffee and homemade banana pancakes. They talked about home, they talked about the farm, they talked about Maddie's father with warmth and remembrance. And, as they settled in to enjoy the fruits of their labor, Hannah called out, pointing towards the TV.

"Maddie!" She held her hand over her mouth, full of pancakes. "It's Harry!"

"Ah yes," Maddie smiled wide. "The family is on their way to church for Christmas service. They do this every year."

"Wow..." Hannah had swallowed her food and was watching in awe. It was so strange; she had always known that her daughter's Harry was actually Prince Harry, but seeing the young man she had hugged just a few nights earlier, walking alongside the Queen was a bit surreal. "That's going to be you someday. Isn't it?"

"Sorry?"

"Christmas Day with the Queen," Hannah pointed to the television. "You'll be walking with them someday."

"If Harry and I..." Maddie began, meeting her mother's eyes and nodding. "Yes. Someday."

"Okay," Hannah smiled at her daughter; acceptance in her eyes. This was her daughter's life, her daughter's future. "He looks very handsome..."

"He does," Maddie agreed; her hand reaching out to squeeze her mother's. "I'm happy you're here mom. Thank you for being here."
"Hmmm," she patted Maddie's hand. "This was Harry's idea."

"I know," she shrugged. "But you had to work for it too. You had to get the passport, pack, travel. So...thank you."

"You're welcome." Hannah took a breath and let it out slowly. "Want to watch A Christmas Story again?"

"Absolutely," Maddie giggled; reaching for the remote and settling in for the morning.

Hannah's time in London flew by much too fast, though Maddie fought to savor every single moment of it. Following a relaxed, quiet Christmas Day, they went to bed early, slept well and, when they woke the next morning, they set out to see as much as they could before her time was up. They shopped, they toured, they stopped by the hospital and met her boss, they rode the London Eye twice—once in the day time and once at night. They saw Big Ben, they walked across the bridge and, when they went on their special tour of BP, Maddie pointed towards the room in which she had enjoyed tea with Harry and his grandparents. And Thursday night, before they were to leave for Highgrove, they met up with Ella and Bishop for dinner and drinks.

There's a moment in a mother's life when she looks at her child and sees not the little girl who refused to let her brush her hair, not the little child with a worn blankie and the need to be cuddled—but an adult. A grown woman who walks in the world with pride and purpose and grace. As Hannah watched Maddie throughout the week, she swelled with pride. She was a beautiful, talented, wonderful woman that would make any parent proud. She had an amazing career that garnered her respect and admiration from her co-workers. She had wonderful friends who made her laugh and supported her in this crazy new world she was walking in. Hannah was so proud, so happy for Maddie; her face hurt from smiling, her heart warmed in her chest.

Even on Friday, when they slipped into the car Harry had sent for them to meet him and his family in the country, Hannah could see Maddie's growth, Maddie's strength. She was quick to ease Hannah's nervousness at the impending meeting. She chuckled at the irony of the situation; remembering her conversations with Harry, her lunch with Sophie, her rocky navigation of royal life. And then she settled in and explained it all to her mother; answering her questions about how to address Charles and Camilla, rather or not to curtsy. Though Hannah remained slightly nervous, she watched in awe as her daughter brought her into this new world, this new circle she was now a part of.

Harry was waiting for them as the car pulled up the long drive to the front of the stately home. Wrapped in a warm coat, his smile was wide, his excitement evident as they came into view. Hurrying down the steps to meet the car, he beat the driver to the door as the car came to a stop. Extending his hand to Hannah, his smile reached his eyes.

"Welcome to Highgrove," his voice was low, rich; warm. Hannah stepped from the car into the cold, crisp winter air. Leaning in to hug her, Harry pressed a kiss to each of her cheeks.

"Thank you," she sighed, looking around; taking it all in. "This is...amazing..."

"Isn't it?" Maddie called out as she stepped from her side of the car, smiling across the top of the car to the two of them. When her eyes met Harry's, she felt her skin flush. "Hi there."
"Hi there," Harry grinned; watching as she moved around the car towards him.

"I missed you this week," she confessed as he leaned to kiss her cheek.

"I missed you too," he spoke softly, moving from her cheek to her lips; not caring that her mother was standing right there, that his father was right inside waiting for him to bring in their guests. He kissed her, soft and warm and, when he pulled away, her cheeks were pink. "You ready to do this?" Maddie bit her lip and nodded. Stepping away from her, Harry turned to Hannah and led the two Forrester women into his father's home.

Meeting Charles and Camilla was something Hannah would never forget. Her expectations, her assumptions had blown it up so much that finally meeting them was such a wonderful, real moment. Camilla was warm and inviting and Charles brought her hand to his lips and invited her inside his home in such a way that Hannah knew instantly where it was that Harry got his swagger.

Not for the first time on her trip, and not for the last, Hannah wished her husband could have been there at her side. She wished he could have seen their daughter walking next to Prince Charles with aplomb and ease. She wished he could have seen the way Harry's eyes watched her move; with reverence and adoration. She wished he could have been there to see Maddie so happy, so at peace. Her eyes welled with tears that she instantly blinked away as Harry offered her his arm,

"May I escort you to tea?" She looked up at him and pulled a smile.

"Of course. Thank you," she moved her hand through his arm, meeting his eyes with a twinkle. And the weekend commenced.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

After tea, Hannah was treated to a tour of the grounds. Though it was winter and the plants were not at their best, she found that she rather enjoyed the walk; finding an appreciation for the way the snow crunched under their feet, the way the trees and shrubs held their form even under the blanket of winter. Maddie had been right, Highgrove reminded her of home; the land, the plants, the vastness; the feeling she had while walking. Charles was a gracious host, a knowledgeable tour guide. And, when they had a moment alone, he took the time to tell her how impressed he was with Maddie, with all that she had brought into his son's life, all that she had overcome and stood tall through. It was clear to Hannah, the affection this man held for her daughter. And Hannah was only too happy to return the sentiments, to return lauding words about Harry.

Harry's family made Hannah feel welcome, at home. She had settled into her immaculate room, she had sat with them for dinner; an amazing meal with wonderful wine. And she laughed at stories from Harry's childhood, sharing her own about Maddie. It was a wonderful night, one she would never forget. And that was even before Harry pulled her aside and asked her to trust him, asked her to follow him. They had finished dinner and his father, working as an accomplice, had asked Maddie to assist him in the library with some made up task; leaving Hannah and Harry alone for a moment.

With her coat in his hands, Harry looked to her with pleading eyes and asked her to follow him. Maybe it was the wine, maybe it was her newly discovered spirit of adventure, or maybe it was a sick sort of curiosity; either way, Hannah nodded, allowed the young man to help her with her coat and followed him out the front door and into an awaiting car. During the short drive, Hannah's mind was working away; wondering where they were headed, why they were alone, and what was running through Harry's mind as his grin deepened with every turn. To Hannah's
"The Royal Oak?" Hannah read the sign hanging outside.

"This is where Maddie and I came on one of our first dates," Harry smiled at the memory. "Now that I think about it, I think that was the first time they took her picture..."

"On the motorcycle?" Hannah asked.

"Yes," he chuckled. "You saw it?"

"I did," she nodded; walking through the door he held open. "I remember thinking...at least he has a helmet on her head."

"Always," Harry smiled and gestured towards a more secluded booth in the back; his favorite spot in the place. Allowing her to walk in front on him, Harry followed her to the spot, sliding into the booth opposite her. It wasn't very busy inside and those that were there were too caught up in what they were doing to take notice of the Prince. The waitress was quick to join them, smiling cheerfully as she took their drink order. Harry made small talk with Maddie's mother, pointing out a bit of history while they waited for their drinks. Once the waitress had dropped them off and left them alone, Harry cleared his throat and met her eyes; steady and confident.

"Thank you for coming with me."

"You're welcome," Hannah smiled warmly at the young man across the table from her, the young man who had swept her daughter, understandably, off of her feet. "Though, I have a hunch that we could have rounded up a glass of wine and some whiskey at your father's home..."

"I would imagine," Harry agreed.

"Yet we came here," she looked around, her lips tugging into a bit of a smirk. "Alone."

"We did."

"Care to let me in on anything?"

"I wanted to give you something," his eyes grew serious though his smile remained. "A Christmas gift."

"Sorry?" She raised her eyebrows. "A gift? But...you flew me to London to see my daughter, you arranged this amazing week, you..."

"That was my gift to Maddie," he explained, pulling a long, thin, wrapped box from his coat pocket and setting it on the table. "This..." He slid it across to her. "This is for you."

"I don't know what to say," she looked down at it and back up to him. "But...you couldn't have given me this there? With all of them?" Harry shook his head as he took a drink. "Why?"

"Maybe you should open it and find out," he nodded to the box. Hannah took a breath and looked down at it; still confused. With a hesitant smile, she lifted the box into her hands, her fingers pulling at the bow. Harry watched her intently as she tore the paper aside and lifted the lid.
And then it happened.

"Oh!" Hannah's hand flew to her mouth, the box slipping from her fingers; her eyes instantly filling with tears as she looked up to him. Swallowing the lump that developed in his throat, Harry held her eyes as he reached out, pulling the box closer to him.

"It's Friday," he explained; lifting two cigars, the exact brand her husband had smoked, from the tissue paper inside the box. "You went through a lot to be here for Christmas with Maddie and I just..." He pulled a cigar cutter out of his pocket and clipped off the ends. "I just didn't want you to miss out on your tradition, on remembering the smell of your husband..." He pulled out a lighter and held one of the cigars out to her. "I didn't want you to miss out on that just because you were here and not home." Hannah paused for a moment, trying to reign in her emotions, trying to get a handle on the hit to her soul he had just delivered in the loveliest of ways. And then, wiping at her eyes, she took the cigar from him, held it to her mouth, and let him light it. She took a long, slow drag, reveling in the way it made her feel, the way her senses perked up and she smiled at him as he lit his.

"Thank you." It was heartfelt and sincere.

"You're welcome." It was humbling and graceful.

And she understood. Everything fell into place. She had always liked Harry, since the first moment he had called her from Bendal with the terrible news about Maddie's shooting. She had appreciated his thoughtfulness, his genuine concern; his warmth. When he had come to visit in Colorado for Maddie's birthday, she had grown quite fond of him; buying into his sense of humor, his wit, the way he was around her daughter. But in this moment, she really got it. The reason her daughter was willing to leave everything she had worked for in Bendal, the reason her daughter would never be returning to the US to live, the reason Hannah knew that someday, Maddie would happily sacrifice her independence to live in the fishbowl that was the Royal Family; it was this. This way that this young man held onto the words you spoke, the experiences you shared, and used them in the most magnificent of ways—making you feel so important, so taken care of. She wondered if he did this with everyone or if it was something only a select few were able to share. But she decided it didn't matter. If he was this way with her daughter—that was all that was important.

They sat there for a moment, smoking their cigars, sipping their drinks; both watching the other in a comfortable sort of silence—the kind most often felt with family. Hannah, thinking of her initial assumption about this outing, chuckled into her glass.

"Something funny?" Harry leaned forward, his forearms on the table.

"A little," she nodded. He waited for more. "You know...I thought you were bringing me out here for something completely different."

"Like?"

"Hmmm..." She eyed him, debating rather she should admit it or not. "Can I be blunt with you?"

"Of course," he waved his hand, taking another drink.

"I thought you might be asking me for permission to marry my daughter." Without blinking, without even the smallest hint of a flinch, Harry smiled wide and nodded.
"That wasn't my intention. At least not tonight."

"Okay."

"But, since you brought it up...would I have it? If I were I to ask?"

Hannah's heart jumped in her throat. Her upper lip twitched, her natural inclination to be sarcastic coming to the surface. While the words you'll have to actually ask to find out crossed her mind, she bit her tongue. She couldn't do it. She couldn't tease him, she couldn't put him through the wringer. Maybe her husband, were he still alive, would have been able to do it—to give this young man a hard time. But she couldn't. There he was, sitting across from her in this tiny bar in the English countryside, having just brought her the two most precious things in her life, time with her daughter and memories of her husband. How could she even begin to be funny or smart with him?

Hannah took a long sip from her glass, resting it on the table with thought. She puffed at her cigar and, taking a breath, balanced it on the edge of the ashtray sitting between them. Her hands reached across the table, her fingers pulling his free hand into both of hers. With great resolve, with a sureness she could feel in her bones, she met his eyes and spoke from her heart. "All a mother ever wants for her child is for them to be happy; happier than they themselves might have been...even if they were incredibly happy. Fathers, they want different things. Of course they want their children to be happy, but they want other things too. They want them to be smart and successful and productive and they want them to be able to stand on their own, take care of themselves..." She took a deep breath. "But mothers...I think mothers just want the happiness part. They want that smile that lights up their eyes, the laugh that hits your soul..." Hannah laughed lightly. "Maddie has always been all of those things; smart, successful, able to stand on her own, take care of herself. And she's been happy. She has. She's always had this great smile..." Hannah caught herself before she wandered too far off topic. "But you...since you came along...her eyes light up, her laughter hits my soul."

"I don't know what to say..." Harry swallowed at the lump in his throat.

"I'm not finished," Hannah eyed him playfully. He laughed at her smirk; watching it fade into something more serious. "I may be overstepping my place here but...I know you lost your mother when you were young..." Harry's jaw flexed, his arm tensed. Hannah lowered her voice, holding his eyes. "But, as a mother I know, I know...she wanted those things for you too. She wanted the light to shine from your eyes, she wanted your laughter to fill the room. I know Maddie, I know her enough to know that you do those things for her. And..." She smiled softly, rubbing her hand over his. "And...if she does those things for you, if she would make your mother feel as happy for you as I feel for her...then my answer would be a resounding yes. Absolutely. You would have my permission. My blessing." Harry was stunned silent; his heart thudding in his chest. Thoughts of his mother flooded his mind and he looked down at the table, at his hand wrapped up in Hannah's hands. He had to take a deep breath, had to remind himself that he was at a pub, in public. It was all so heavy; his mother, Hannah, the thought of marrying Maddie. It was a lot to sit with. It didn't help that he hadn't seen her in days, that he had spent the entire Christmas holiday moping around his family—inviting massive amounts of poking and laughter. It didn't help that he had yet to properly thank her for the words she spoke, for the way she made him feel. His mother would absolutely see what he already knew, what his family already saw; Maddie made his eyes shine, she made him laugh from his soul.

"Wow..." He breathed.

"I'm sorry," Hannah smiled sheepishly. "My husband would have been much better at this
"I don’t know," Harry shook his head with a crack of laughter. "That was pretty good." Hannah chuckled; releasing his hand with a squeeze as the waitress approached to check in on them.

"Are you two doing okay over here?"

"I think he could use another whiskey," Hannah pointed at Harry who took a deep breath and nodded, sitting back in his seat.

"Yes, please." Harry watched as the waitress disappeared from them and looked up to Hannah, his eyes conveying nothing but love and light and happiness. "She does." Hannah raised an eyebrow. "Maddie. She brings all of those things to my life. And my mother, were she still with us, would be the first to confirm that." Hannah smiled; half of her mouth inching slightly higher than the other as she reached for her cigar.

"Well then..." She inhaled and exhaled slowly. "I guess you have your answer."
Chapter 65

Maddie was about three hours into a twenty-two hour flight when it hit her; when it really hit her. Her life had been so fundamentally altered by Harry that it didn't even phase her when he showed up at her place and told her to pack her things—that they were flying to Australia at the drop of a hat to witness the nuptials of two of their friends. Glancing at him across the cabin of the plane, she shook her head with a soft, low chuckle. Just that morning, less than ten hours ago, she never would have guessed what her afternoon would have in store for her.

TEN HOURS EARLIER

Telling her mother good-bye took a toll on Maddie. Watching her mother walk through security and out of her sight felt like Maddie imagined it felt for her mother the first time she left for Bendal; scary, uncertain. Maddie stood in her spot for a full beat before she turned to walk back through the airport. Harry had made a conscious decision not to accompany her to the airport, knowing his presence would only take away from the good-byes that needed to be said. So he said his good-byes and his love to Hannah as they parted ways at Highgrove.

Maddie had barely slipped into the car, given the driver directions, when her phone buzzed in her pocket. Pulling it out and glancing at the ID, she felt her cheeks blush.

"I'm on my way to you right now," her low sultry voice garnered a groan of protest from the Prince on the other end of the line. "No? Really? I thought for sure you would want to..."

"Please stop," he cut in with a breath. "I have a bad news, good news situation for you."

"Oh?" She was curious. "Shoot."

"Not over the phone. Where are you?"

"Just left the airport."

"Can you meet me at your place?"

"Sure. See you in ten." Disconnecting the phone, she gave the driver new directions and sat back in her seat wondering what could possibly be up now.

Maddie arrived at home and, passing Jim on the way in, realized Harry had beat her there. Stepping into her place, she found him sitting pensively on the edge of the sofa, chatting with Bishop and Ella who were smiling wide.

"You brought friends," Maddie smiled at the two of them, leaning to kiss him hello.

"I had to," his hand at the back of her neck held her to him for another. "You and Ella have some shopping to do and there's not much time."

"Much time?" Maddie chuckled. "What are you talking about? Shopping? I thought you had news for me or...is this just...I don't know, some sort of intervention?"

"Yes!" Harry's hands clapped together as he rose to his feet. "Yes. I have news. Bad news," he held up a finger. "Our New Year's plans have been cancelled."
"What? No!" She frowned. She had been looking forward to a fun night out with him, after so much time apart. She wanted to dress up and drink champagne and make love to him at ungodly hours.

"You haven't heard the good news yet." His smile was sly, his eyes full of excitement.

"Well what are you waiting for Wales?" Harry took a breath, glanced at Bishop and Ella, and blurted it out.

"Kiki and Sean are engaged."

"What?!" Maddie's face brightened. "Oh my God. That's great news!"

"And we're going to Australia."

"Wait. Hold on." Maddie's hand reached out to him; resting on his arm. "Why are we going to Australia?"

"Kiki and Sean are getting married."

"In Australia?" Maddie was having trouble tracking him as the others in the room laughed; having had similar reactions.

"Yes," Harry laughed. "Sean and Kiki are getting married in Australia."

"I...When? Today?"

"No," Harry shook his head. "New Year's Day."

"What?" Maddie laughed.

"She told him she wanted to marry him next year," Bishop spoke up. "And he told her he would marry her at twelve-oh-one. So...they're getting married on New Year's Eve."

"New Year's Day," Harry clarified as Bishop's eyes shifted into a glare.

"Oh God, here we go again," Ella rolled her eyes; sighing back into the couch. "They are getting married at twelve-oh-one on New Year's Day..."

"See," Harry waved a hand at Ella.

"Hey!" Bishop turned to his girlfriend.

"In Australia..." Ella finished, ignoring them both.

"Because it's the first place to celebrate the New Year..." Maddie was grinning widely as she thought of it.

"That's incredibly romantic."
"It is," Ella agreed.

"So, catch me up," Maddie snapped into planning mode, looking to her boyfriend for logistics. "We're going to Australia..."

"Ah yes," Harry smiled, loving that she jumped on board so quickly, without any protests. "We're leaving at six this evening."

"But it's noon now," Maddie looked to the clock.

"Yes. But if we leave at six, we get there tomorrow afternoon at four...which is actually three in the morning on the thirty-first, local time. It gives us enough time to sleep and get ready for the wedding..."

"Which is at twelve-oh-one," Maddie raised her eyebrows. "But how did they throw this together so fast?"

"Kiki has family in Sydney with an enormous estate. They will be marrying there," Bishop filled her in.

"It's a party all the way, love. Start to finish. Sean is the first one of us to wed so we're bringing the big guns," Harry kissed her cheeks.

"The big guns?" Maddie snickered. "Does that mean Jim and Nathan are coming along?"

"I'm not sure we have time for your sass," he narrowed his gaze at her, biting his lip playfully. "You need to pack. You need to pack for every possible scenario. It's a long flight, so dress comfortably but the wedding is black tie so..."

"That's where I come in," Ella cut in as she stood. "I need a new dress. You need a new dress. We're going shopping." Maddie was even more excited knowing that Ella would be accompanying Bishop on this trip.

"We're going to head out. I have to pick some stuff up from my place; my tux, the guns..." He kissed Maddie's neck as she squealed. "You two go shop, get what you need. We'll meet here at four thirty to head to the airport." Everybody began moving around, pulling on coats and finding purses. "You can take my card if you like." Harry reached for his wallet.

"Your card?" Maddie laughed. "Don't be ridiculous."

"What?" He cracked a smile.

"Well to begin with, I'm sure there wouldn't be any issues with me trying to use Prince Harry's credit card. And second..."

"It doesn't actually say Prince Harry," he cut in.

"That wasn't really my point," Maddie rolled her eyes. "And second...Wait. What does it say?"

"Same thing as my driver's license," he shrugged. "Harry Wales."

"And second," Maddie continued. "I have my own money. You can put that away. I shop on my own."
"Suit yourself," he shrugged, stuffing his wallet back into his pocket.

"I'll take it," Ella winked at him as she leaned to kiss Bishop.

"Four thirty," Harry's voice was stern as he shook his head at Ella. "Don't be late. We're on a schedule here."

"Yeah, yeah," Maddie grinned, stepping back through the door she had just come in. The whirlwind of an afternoon was only beginning.

"You're late!" Harry called out to them before they had even stepped all the way into her place. He, Bishop, Leo and Sean were there with him. As Kiki had flown out with her family and Anna and Penelope that morning, Sean was coming along with the rest of them.

"I'm..." Maddie looked to her watch and took a breath. "I'm only a tiny bit late. Ten minutes. But...we came back and packed before we went back out so...we just have to grab our stuff and..."

"Late, late, late, late. Late." Harry crossed his arms over his chest and shook his head. Though he looked mad, looked stern, Maddie could see the gleam in his eye, his tell. He was messing with her.

"I am very sorry," she held out her hands. "We gave our shopping bags to the driver downstairs. Now, if you'll just let me by, I can grab my bags and we can go..."

"I think you owe the group an explanation," Harry held his ground as Ella laughed.

"The group?" Maddie glanced to the boys who were watching in amusement.

"Mmm Hmm. The group. What was the holdup Doctor? What could be so important that it was worth keeping us all waiting?"

"Harry..."

"Maddie..."

"I actually don't think you want to..." Ella offered, growing silent as Harry's eyes shifted pointedly to her. "Okay..." She waved her hand with a knowing grin.

"Let's hear it."

"Fine," Maddie huffed, her eyes sparkling with defiance as she turned to face the boys. "Fine. If I must..."

"You must." Harry nodded.

"I was buying new La Perlas for the trip." Bishop was the first to snicker. "I have a new dress that needed some...special lingerie and...well, it's been a week since Harry and I have...you know..." Ella let out a gasp, clapping her hand to her mouth. "And I thought maybe I would surprise him with..."
"And you're done," Harry cut in, face red as the group burst into laughter. Meeting her eyes, he cocked his head to the side. "Really now?"

"You said I owed them an explanation. That was the explanation..." Maddie's lips twitched in a smug grin.

"Yeah, yeah. Get your stuff," he stepped aside, waving the two ladies to the back of the place. With laughter all around, Maddie and Ella hurried past him. "Let's get this party on the road."

They had made it to the airport in plenty of time to load the private jet that would be taking the six of them, plus Harry's security to Australia for what would go down as the craziest party of Maddie's life. Three hours into the flight, the boys were playing poker, drinking dubious amounts of champagne and enjoying their last moment of "guy time" before Sean said "I do." Maddie sat next to Ella, sipping on their own drinks, making an under-their-breath commentary on the boys that often found them in fits of unexplainable laughter. The night was young, the flight was long, and the fun had really just started.

While out shopping, Maddie and Ella had made a decision, a pact. This trip was going to be all out fun; a great time. They had made it through so much in the last year, in the last few months, and they deserved a wild, uninhibited break. And Sean and Kiki's last minute, surprise nuptials on New Year's Day in Australia was the perfect setting for that to happen. They were traveling in luxury, the group was going all out and Maddie and Ella were throwing caution to the wind and going with them. Ultimately that was what drove Maddie to buy the $2000 dress that Ella insisted was made just for her. It was what motivated her to purchase the delicate La Perlas that Harry would slip off of her the following night. And it was what fueled the cross-cabin flirtation she and Harry had been engaging in since lift off.

Somewhere around midnight, after hours of suggestive glances and thinly veiled innuendos, Harry rose to his feet, discarded his hand and sauntered over to where Maddie sat; her eyes fixed on him. He really was the only one she knew that could walk with such swagger without looking completely ridiculous.

"Your royal highness," she tried for sweet and innocent, knowing her tone would seep through. "It seems as though I've managed to snag your attention."

"You snagged my attention the moment you said the words La Perla." maddie laughed softly. "You snagged mine the moment you said, can I help you unload that truck..."

"Care to join me in our private cabin?" He arched an eyebrow and nodded towards the back of the plane.

"I don't know," Maddie smiled up at him through lowered lashes. "Are you going to punish me for being late?"

"Oh..." Harry chuckled, his face turning smug. "I certainly could."

"You certainly could..." She was feeling frisky, adventurous.
"Come with me," his voice was sexy, low and more commanding.

"Won't the boys miss you?" She raised her eyebrows playfully.

"They'll get over it," he shrugged. "Are you going to make me beg?"

"Never," rising to her feet, she flashed him a brilliant smile and then, without another word, she moved past him down the hallway. Biting his lip between his teeth, Harry shook his head with a grin. Draining a glass of champagne, he sat it down on the table and followed behind her.

Maddie didn't have to wait long for him to join her in the room. Even though she wasn't watching the door, she could tell the second he slipped in behind her. And when the door shut behind him, she felt an intense relief. After a week of time with her mother, after he had given her such a glorious gift, she was finally alone with him. Her body was already aching for his hands, for his lips.

"Finally..." She let out an involuntary sigh as he moved around her. "I've been longing to be alone with you since..." Harry's finger pressed firmly to her lips, silencing her words. The intense look in his eyes caused heat to surge through her veins. He cleared his throat and began.

"Now..." Harry's tone was firm as his hands moved to his hips; a stern look on his face. "Miss Forrester, about your tardiness..." Maddie's eyes danced with excitement. They were going to play.

"Actually," her lips turned up in a smirk. "It's Doctor Forrester." Even in the moment she had to be her.

"Yes," Despite his efforts to remain firm and in charge, his mouth turned up in a half smirk. "Doctor Forrester it is." He stood in front of her and, hands on her shoulders, leaned in to kiss just below her ear. He heard her sigh happily; her hands moving to wrap around him. Very quickly, he grabbed her wrists and pulled her arms down by her sides.

"Harry..." She protested but his finger returned to her lips. With a stern look in his eyes, he shook his head and held her arms to her sides. Moving achingly slow, his lips returned to her neck and she gasped. His mouth was so warm and firm on her skin.

"Close your eyes," he mumbled onto her shoulder, his hands pushing aside the neck of her shirt; making way for his lips. Pulling back to look in her eyes, he raised his voice. "Close. Your. Eyes."

And then, stifling her inner urge to fight back, Maddie did as he instructed. Her eyes fluttered closed and her heart sped up. It felt like minutes before she felt him touch her again. Her breath sucked in quickly when his mouth descended on her throat; her head tilting back to allow him greater access. Licking his way up the column of her neck, he nipped gently at her chin. Her lips parted, waiting for his; but he moved right past them; to her ear. Holding her head in his hand, he pressed his lips close and whispered,

"You drive me absolutely mad." She moaned her approval and reached her hand up to clutch at his arm. "No, no, no," he chuckled and removed her arm; placing it at her side. Her lips stuck out in a pout, but her body trembled with desire. This forceful Harry was one she could get used to. "No touching."

And then he stepped away from her. She could hear him move and the next time she felt him, he was behind her; pressing his body flush with hers. He was enjoying this too; the evidence of that was tight and rigid against her. A smirk spread across her lips. Reaching around her, Harry's hands began the process of removing her clothing in a painstakingly slow fashion. With the speed of a turtle, Harry tugged at the hem of her shirt, pulling it up over her head and letting it fall to the ground. He pushed aside her bra straps, licking and sucking at the skin they revealed. Running his palms down her sides and across her stomach, he gripped at her hips and turned her around to face him.

When he stepped closer to her, his scent invaded her nostrils, his skin radiated heat, she wanted nothing more than to reach out and close that last inch between them; but she remained still. The sound of her zipper to her jeans drew a breath from her parted lips. As they pooled at her ankles, she felt her body react to the chill of the air.

Harry was quick to bring warmth to her skin. Moving first to her bra, she felt his hot breath through the thin fabric and her body arched towards him involuntarily. She could almost feel the smirk on his face when he pressed his lips to her cleavage; allowing her the smallest of relief as he removed her bra. Gathering her breasts in his hands, he kneaded them, rubbing his thumb lightly over her nipples. Maddie, still in the darkness her eyelids provided, had to press her lips together to keep from crying out. Her hands balled up in fists to keep from reaching out to him. And when his mouth moved first to one breast and then to the other; drawing them in, bringing them to life with his tongue, Maddie felt her knees give slightly. Her breathing began to come up short and her skin began to tingle and just as she was about to grab his head and press him closer, he stepped completely away from her.

"Harry?" She gasped.

"Shhhh..." His finger ran slowly over her lips, dipping in slightly between her parted lips and then disappeared. And there she was, standing mostly undressed in their private cabin on a plane to Australia; breathing heavy and labored, having no idea where Harry was or what his next move might be. And she was unbelievably aroused. She fought to control herself while she anticipated his return.

And when he returned, her heart skipped a beat. His hot breath on the outside of her panties was the only thing she felt. Gulping at a lump in her throat, she reached behind her and sought support. Finding the edge of the small dresser, she grasped it and took a step back to lean against it. Allowing her to move, Harry followed, this time pressing his mouth to her. Running his hands up her thighs in a needy, hungry way, he let his fingers trace her skin back down to her feet where he slipped her socks off and quickly tossed them aside; his tongue following the trail his fingers left up and down her legs. Harry moved to the small slip of fabric that remained on her body. With his lips, he teased around the edges, his tongue dipping in, making her moan. And then, after much too long, he slowly peeled them from her body; his hands skimming her center as he removed them. Maddie shivered.

Standing only to press a too hot and too quick kiss to her lips, Harry knelt in front of her; bringing her right leg up off the ground and resting it on his shoulder. And Maddie had never been more thankful for a piece of furniture in her life. As his tongue flicked against her, she held on to that dresser with all she had; groaning and pressing against him.

When Harry chuckled against her, the sensation sent a tremor through her body. "Harry!" She gasped, dangerously close to toppling over the edge. He could feel her start to spasm and then, taking every ounce of control he had; he stopped. Moving away from her completely, he rose to his feet and took a step back.
"What are you doing?" Her eyes flew open and looked to his smug and satisfied face. He was completely dressed and breathing heavy.

"Well..." He shrugged and ran a hand over the back of his neck; his eyes twinkling with playfulness, with that playboy charm that he was rumored to have. "What kind of punishment would this be if I gave you exactly what you wanted?"

"Please tell me you're kidding..." She began to protest but the words fell from her mouth when he moved; with great purpose towards her. Gripping her waist, he lifted her up off the ground and sat her on the dresser that had held her up. "Oh!" She cried when his lips crashed against her neck; moving her back against the wall of the cabin. Her hands moved to pull him closer, but he grabbed them and pinned her hands down to the top of the dresser; arms at her sides. Maddie groaned in frustration and Harry pulled back slightly.

"Tell me what you want," his eyes locked with hers; his hands gripping her thighs, his fingers pressing into her flesh.

"You know what I want," she smirked; her breath coming out in pants.

"Tell me what you want or I'm going to leave you right here on this dresser." Maddie raised her eyebrows in defiance. Meeting her challenge, Harry's hands fell from her body and he stepped away from her; smug.

"No!" She cried out, instantly blushing at the volume of her own voice. "I want you. Inside me. Right now." She was whispering, breathlessly, trying to be mindful of the others on the plane.

"Oh?" His lips curled up deviously. Stepping back towards her, his hands moved to his belt and zipper; undressing only enough to free himself. Watching her eyes widen slightly, Harry wavered for only a moment; not sure he had it in him to be restrained any longer. And then, with little ceremony he hiked her legs up around him and plunged deep into her; pushing the breath from her lungs.

"Yes..." She hissed; loving the idea that she was completely naked while he remained almost fully clothed. Once he was as close to her as he could possibly be; buried to the hilt, he ceased movement. One hand rested on the wall behind her, holding them steady while the other moved up and over her hip and went directly to her core. Holding himself inside of her, he began to stroke her with his fingers. Her hips rocked and pushed against him, craving more friction inside, but he held back; watching in labored amusement.

"God I love you..." He groaned, his eyes never leaving her face. "I love the way your mind works. I love your body...I love the way you make me absolutely mad for you...I could do this forever." Maddie whimpered and arched against him; imploring him with her body to move; just an inch. His fingers, diligent and nimble, were pushing her to her limits.

"Harry, please for the love of..."

"Shhh..." He interrupted and then, with a soft, ghost of a kiss to her shoulder, Harry pulled out and plunged back in before halting his movements yet again. Her head rocked back, resting against the wall before she sat up and then, leaning forward, her lips sought his. Allowing her to come within centimeters of his mouth before he pulled back, Harry chuckled at her expression; frustration mixed with pleasure.

"Please Harry..." Her eyelids were heavy, her lips sticking out in an adorable little pout. And he had no control anymore—none at all. Holding her face to his with one hand, his other moved to grip her thigh; and his hips began to move in deep, hard thrusts. Abandoning his control of her hands, Harry pressed into her; knowing they were both so close, knowing he couldn't hold out on her much longer. Her hands moved up, struggling with his shirt, longing to have skin to skin contact.

She tried to break free from his kiss, wanting to focus on his shirt, wanting to rid him of his clothing, but he held her to him with his hand fisted gently in her hair; refusing to let her lips leave his. Pushing faster, Harry's breaths came up quick; ragged. With the long, slow build up he had 'punished' her with, it took very little to bring her to her peak. And when she came it was powerful and thunderous and it moved him right over the edge. Clinging to her; holding her tight, Harry let go; biting gently into her shoulder as he did. Standing there; slumped against the wall and propped up on the dresser, Maddie grinned wide, kissed his half bared shoulder and muttered,

"All this because I was late?"

"All this because you were late." His eyes were heavy as he moved her against him; more gently than before, taking her weight onto him. His need to care for her replacing his need to connect on the most physical of levels. He would always come back to that, no matter the fun they had—this was all about love for him, all about Maddie.

"I'm likely to never be on time again." She sighed and Harry chuckled against her skin, dropping soft, sweet kisses as he moved, helping her stand; helping her steady herself.

As they dressed for bed, Maddie found that she couldn't rid herself of the soft pink blush his actions had brought to her skin. She found that she couldn't stop grinning. Even as he pulled her to his side in the small airplane bed in order to catch a bit of sleep before the craziness began, she smiled into the dark room; her skin flushing as he kissed her, long and warm and full of love before wrapping his arm around her and closing his eyes.
Chapter 66

Even with all the revelry, even with Bishop playing his guitar and Leo mixing cocktail after cocktail, the flight to Australia was a long one. So, when they finally touched down on land, the entire group was relieved to finally be off the plane. Though their bodies and minds felt like it was four thirty in the afternoon, the rest of Sydney was convinced it was three thirty in the morning. Surrendering to the local culture, the group maintained a low profile—opting for checking into their rooms at the resort they were staying at for the next couple of days and taking it easy. Maddie and Harry were staying in a top-floor two bedroom suite with Harry's Security Officers in a suite of their own across the hall from them. Bishop and Ella were next door with Leo and Sean—who would only be there until that night after the wedding when he would join Kiki in the Bridal suite. Maddie laughed as Harry and his friends easily took up two floors of the resort. It was going to be a wild adventure. Because they were worn from the trip, and a little tipsy from Leo's experiments, going to sleep seemed like the most natural thing to do. So they settled and they slept. And when they woke, early afternoon on the 31st in Sydney, Australia, they had a decadent lunch, dressed for the beach, and headed for the sun and surf—such a stark contrast to what they left behind; as was the trip.

"You brought a flask?" Maddie eyed Bishop as they set up on the beach; lounge chairs, umbrellas, towels. They were quite the group. "To the beach. You brought a flask?" Her lips twitched in a smirk.

"I did," he nodded, tipping it back and then holding it out to her. "Care for a swallow good Doctor?"

"No thanks," she shook her head with a laugh as Harry caught up with them; wrapping his arm around her waist from behind and kissing her neck. "Mmmm..."

"Good morning," he growled into her ear; making her hair stand on end. "What do we have here?"

"Bishop's drinking," she turned her head to kiss him properly.

"Is he sharing?" Harry's eyes twinkled.

"He is," Bishop cut in, holding the flask out to Harry. Taking it, Harry tipped his head back and swallowed, his arm never leaving Maddie's waist.

"Thanks man," Harry handed it back to him and grinned at Maddie. "It's a holiday my darling. What is breakfast without a little scotch?"

"Gross," Maddie's eyes rolled as Ella laughed. Bishop, Leo and Sean were pulling off their shirts, slipping off sandals; preparing for the water.

"If you don't want scotch, we can get you something else," Harry turned to look towards the resort, waving at a tropically dressed waiter who was quick to move their way. "What do you want love? Orange juice? Coffee? Champagne?" He chuckled at the look on her face before turning a pleasant demeanor to the young man who stepped up to them. "Hi there."

"Good Afternoon," the young man took them all in with a warm smile. "Can I help you with anything?"
"You can," Harry smiled, pulling his key card from his bag and handing it to the young man. "This is where we're staying," he pointed to Maddie and back to himself. "She's with me. Whatever she wants...whatever it is...put it on my room. Would you do that for me?"

"Absolutely sir," he nodded; not at all put off by what was a normal request for him. "Ma'am? Can I get you anything?" Maddie's eyes were watching Harry with a grin in place.

"Tell the gentleman what you want, love. He'll get it for you," Harry's hand at the base of her neck pulled her in for another kiss.

"An iced tea would be lovely, thank you," Maddie smiled at the young man.

"Right away," he nodded and stepped away.

"An iced tea?" Harry laughed. "You can have anything you want and you go with an iced tea."

"I wanted an iced tea," Maddie shrugged, watching as he peeled his shirt off, putting his hat back on his head with a smirk. She was suddenly curious. "When you say anything..."

"Ha!" He tossed his head back; sliding his sunglasses back onto his face. "I mean anything."

"Like..." Maddie bit her lip; intrigued—playful. "Like if I wanted...a box of multicolored pistachio Macaroons?"

"Done." Harry was nonchalant as he began to rub sunscreen onto his shoulders and chest.

"What about..." Maddie's head tipped to the side in thought. "What if I wanted a Pincushion Hakea plant?"

"No problem. I don't know what that is, but I can't imagine it being a problem."

"The most recent edition of The Denver Post...hard copy, not the internet version."

"Got it."

"A Tandem bike?" She arched an eyebrow, wondering when he would say when, as Harry finished his sunblock application and moved towards her. His arms snaked around her waist and he grinned.

"Anything you want."

"Hmmm..." Maddie smiled up at him, dropping the inquiry for the moment, her arms tangling around his neck as she moved closer. "What if I want your hat?"

"Oh no," he shook his head. "That you cannot have."

"Hmmm..." Her lip stuck out in a small pout, contemplating her next move. With a curt nod and a quickness that he didn't know she had, she snatched the hat from his head and was out of his arms, running down the beach. Shaking his head with a low, menacing chuckle, Harry took off after her. When he caught up with her, he retrieved his hat, swung her up over his shoulder and headed for the ocean giving the beach-goers, and the internet, photos of a lively young couple cutting loose and having fun—forgetting completely about the iced tea.
After their time on the beach, the group loaded up and returned to their rooms for naps and showers before dressing and heading out to the estate for the wedding. They looked magnificent, the whole lot of them. Maddie was blown away by just how well this group cleaned up; the men dapper in their tuxes, the women primped and beautiful. She almost felt like they were preparing to star in a commercial for something luxurious, like a Rolls Royce or Chanel. They were beautiful, young, and full of life—even as they were seated for a wedding that was to begin at 12:01 on New Years Day.

Sitting next to Harry, she found that she couldn't keep her hands off of him; and him off of her. They sat close, her arm tucked through his, his hand on her bared knee. It was a small, intimate gathering; family and a few select, close friends. Kiki and Sean had chosen siblings as their attendants, making it so their group of friends were seated together; alive with excitement—only fueled by Bishop's hidden flask.

"I need to warn you..." Maddie whispered into his ear as it neared midnight. "I tend to get a little sentimental at weddings."

"Oh?" He was so close to her, she could feel heat radiating off of his body.

"Not you?" She cracked a grin.

"Not me," he shook his head, his thumb rubbing a pattern on her knee.

"Not even at your brother's?"

"Definitely not at my brother's," he laughed. "There were cameras everywhere....thousands of people...not really room for sentiment, you know."

"Fair enough," she nodded; understanding—her mind washing over how odd that must have been. Maddie looked up at the altar, an exquisitely decorated space at the end of the ballroom they were in; flowers and candles galore. Off to the side was a clock, counting down the minutes, now seconds to the New Year. The room was buzzing with anticipation as the clock clicked from one minute left.

"How do you think this is going to work?" Ella leaned closer to Maddie. "Like...do you think it will start at midnight or..." She grew quiet as a side door opened; the minister, Sean and his brother stepped through, taking their place at the altar. And the clock continued to count down. A soft music began to play from the band stationed towards the back of the room as a well-dressed, master-of-ceremonies looking man took the microphone in front of the band and turned his attention to the countdown clock at the altar.

Thirty seconds.

"I think they are going to start at midnight," Maddie whispered, her hand tightening its hold on Harry's arm.

She was right. As the clock ticked to ten seconds, the countdown began. The Master of Ceremonies, the family, the friends, began counting down along with the clock. Sean stood tall, proud, his eyes fixed on the back of the room, his lips marking the seconds between him and his wife. Maddie's smile grew wider and wider with every tick.
As the clock struck midnight, balloons and confetti fell from the ceiling; showering over the guests, the fireworks over Sydney Harbor boomed into the sky, and the band struck up Auld Lange Sine. Holding Maddie close to him, Harry dipped his head to kiss her; welcoming the New Year with the love of his life.

"Happy New Year," he spoke against her lips.

"Happy New Year," she echoed; closing her eyes as he kissed her again.

Then amidst the celebration, while the balloons settled and the couples partied, Kiki and her father began their way down the aisle to the jazzy, traditional tune. All attention, all focus, turned to the beaming bride whose eyes were locked with Sean's.

Maddie had attended weddings before, many weddings; family, friends. But this wedding was a different thing entirely. What an experience it was, to sit with your own great love while watching somebody declare theirs forever.

As the crowd sat, Harry and Maddie sat, holding tight to each other, unbelievably moved by the experience of watching somebody prepare to take the vows that they could see themselves taking. As Kiki reached Sean at the altar Maddie found that she could not get close enough to Harry. As the Minister greeted the group, Maddie found that she had to swallow a lump in her throat. And as Sean and Kiki repeated their vows; traditional vows that had been repeated for years before and would be repeated for years after, Maddie felt tears in her eyes. Looking up to Harry, she wiped at her eyes and held tightly to his hand in hers. Harry, always one to sense when Maddie needed him the most, turned his head, his eyes meeting hers. And, as everyone stayed focused on the Bride and Groom, he dipped his head slightly to kiss her cheek, his eyes meeting hers with a force that made Maddie breathless. Maybe he did get sentimental after all.

"Maddie..." He whispered, catching on the lump in his throat. And Maddie, unable to speak, turned her face closer to him and nodded; knowing he was asking her a silent question, knowing she would forever answer in the affirmative. Harry lightly nudged her shoulder, effectively moving her lips to his in a soft, emotion packed kiss. And, once again, she was lost in this reverent space he consistently managed to create; just for the two of them. It was only the clapping that pulled them from their trance; from each other. Snapping back to the moment, they rose to their feet and applauded their friends as they made their way back down the aisle; as Husband and Wife.

Just like that, after years of dating and a handful days of engagement, Kiki and Sean were married. The wedding was over.

The night was all but lost in a haze of celebration. As soon as the excited newlyweds reached the end of the aisle, the party began. Music played and the happy couple led their guests from the ballroom outside to the immaculate, landscaped courtyard that overlooked the ocean and their own private beach. It had been transformed into a Gatsby-esque paradise with the highest touch of class and the best elements of fun and whimsy. There were serious moments; when Kiki's parents made a toast, when the couple danced for the first time, when they cut the cake. And there were comical moments; when Sean insisted on a Conga line, when his brother made a speech.

And Maddie had surrendered to it all. This marvelous trip to paradise had been exactly what she had needed to fall into. And Harry was there right along with her; steadying her when she needed it, and falling by her side when she wanted it. He was exactly what she had needed to fall into.
So, as Kiki and Sean started out by mingling with their older guests, with their family members, Maddie smiled sneakily and, taking Harry's hand in one of hers and stealing Bishop's flask in the other she pulled him willingly off to the side; to a large lounge chair that could easily fit two. They were tipsy and smiling wide as they fell into it; her legs tangling with his as they stretched out. They sat in silence for a moment, listening to the ocean, listening to the party around them. Kicking her shoes to the ground, Maddie curled up next to him and Harry wrapped an arm around her; holding her close as the stars twinkled above them.

"Do you ever wish you could?" She kept her voice soft and low.

"Could?" He sipped from Bishop's flask.

"Run away like this? I mean...I know you have to get married in England..."

Fighting the urge to correct her you to we, he nodded. "I do."

"Do you ever wish it could be this way?" She waved a hand out at the crowd; cracking a smile at Bishop trying to embarrass Ella by dancing like a fool.

"Of course," Harry laughed at his friend before nudging Maddie with his shoulder. "Why? You want to piss off the establishment and elope right now? I bet the minister is still around." His eyes held this look that told her he was only half joking—less than half.

"Don't joke," she rolled her eyes; taking the flask from him and swallowing.

"I'm not joking." He insisted. Maddie sighed, allowing her mind to dip into the possibility for the briefest of moments.

"They would never forgive us," she shook her head thinking of his family, of the people of Great Britain.

"They would. Though it would take a while," Harry laughed, his eyes twinkling under the night sky; getting a great deal of humor out of the idea.

"Can I..." Maddie shifted slightly; her dress rustling as she moved. "Can I ask you something?"

"You can ask me anything."

"I want to talk about what it means...to be married to you."

"Oh?" He turned a smug grin to her.

"Not the love part, not the romantic part..." She paused as a waiter approached them with a tray of champagne. Harry took two glasses, smiled and thanked the man. Maddie continued. "I want to know about the...obligations. Like marrying in England...the duty part, what might be expected of...a hypothetical woman who planned on marrying you. Can we talk about that? Or is it too soon to..."

"No," he shook his head, handing her a glass of champagne. "It's not too soon. We can talk about it. I just have one condition."

"Okay."
"We drop the hypothetical." He took a drink and leaned closer to her; needing to be closer to her.
"We're not talking about some woman. We're talking about you. What it means for you to marry me. If we're going to talk about it, let's move out of the hypothetical and talk about it. Okay?" His finger reached out to brush a stray strand of hair from her forehead.

"Okay." Maddie breathed; a little nervous, a little excited.

"Okay," Harry grinned. "What do you want to know?"

"I don't know," she laughed. "I have lots of...questions...that I'm finding difficult to find words for. I guess...I don't know. Can you actually marry an American?"

"Of course," Harry shrugged, resisting the urge to laugh. This was serious. She had asked for his guidance, asked for his help and now she was trusting him to give it; this was serious. "Why wouldn't I be able to marry an American?"

"I don't know," she shook her head with a chuckle. "Because there was a war and the US separated from England and...there's this history of...I don't know. I know nothing about the Monarchy. I have a President, who is replaced every four to eight years. I know nothing of the deep historical roots of your country and your family and..." She sighed. "And I know nothing about the metric system."

"You think inches versus centimeters is going to be an issue?" He couldn't help the smirk that pulled at his lips.

"I thought me being an American would be an issue. It starts with inches and centimeters...Are you sure you can marry somebody from another country?"

"Are you kidding? If we consulted a history book, we would see that my ancestors have been overthrowing countries and taking their women for hundreds of years."

"Oh my God...you're right. I mean...I know you were trying to be funny but it's so true. Your ancestors are in history books."

"It's not going to be an issue," he shook his head; his finger running along her arm.

"If you say so," Maddie surrendered. She had no choice but to trust his answers, his lifetime of experiences.

"You know," he smiled, snatching her hand in his and bringing it to his lips. "My grandfather wasn't a citizen when he proposed to my grandmother."

"Really?" Her eyes brightened at the mention of the long, steady marriage of his grandparents.

"Yes really. You also might be surprised to find that the marriage laws in the UK are actually much more liberal than those in the US.

"But surely you're not counting yourself as just a member of the general public. I would imagine that the marriage laws for the British Royal Family are a bit less lenient."

"Fair enough," he took a breath and met her eyes; searching for what she was getting at.
"Would I need to change my citizenship? Give up my US passport and apply to be a member of the Commonwealth?"

"You wouldn't have to," he shook his head, looking down at their joined hands.

"Hey..." She tugged at his hand, forcing his eyes back up to hers. A wide smile spread over her face. "I would be willing to. I would. I just...I need to know what's expected. I need to know what people are going to want, what they are going to look for, what they are going to focus on. Don't leave me out here on my own, to figure it out as I go...bring me in. Tell me..."

"Yes," he spoke up; his eyes hazing over with an apology for all that would be asked of her. "There would definitely be questions about it. While I doubt my grandmother would demand such a thing, the public most definitely would expect it."

"How could I be a member of the British Royal Family if I wasn't willing to be a citizen?" Maddie smiled wistfully as she imagined the headlines, the stories.

"Something like that," he smiled.

"Okay then," she nodded; patting his knee. "So I need to look into the citizenship process at some point." Harry halted; pausing to give the moment the weight it deserved.

"At some point," he agreed; moved.

"So...you could marry me."

"I could," he laughed. "If you agreed to my proposal."

"Ha!" Maddie laughed; her tension easing. "Let's say, for arguments sake, I'm on board."

"Let's." He grinned.

"Then what?"

"Then..." He took a deep breath. "Then everything changes."

"Everything?"

"Pretty much."

"Would you have to get the Queen's approval?"

"It's a good idea."

"Oh God..."

"Don't worry. She likes you. There's no reason she would say no. She's not that involved in what we do."

"Okay..." She took a deep breath. "Then what?"

"Well," he adjusted in his seat, his mind working through what he knew, what he remembered from William and Kate's engagement. "You would be assigned security, almost immediately."
"Like Jim and Nathan?" Her eyes traveled across the room to where the two men sat at a table, enjoying the food.

"Yes," Harry nodded. "They would move into your life and they would be with you...basically all of the time."

"Wow..."

"Then there would be an announcement."

"An announcement?"

"On TV, in front of hundreds of cameras and journalists. There would be a photo-call. There would be an interview where somebody asks you questions to which the answers are incredibly personal and intimate. Do you love Harry? How did he propose? When do you plan on having children...that sort of thing." Finishing his champagne, he sat the glass down and continued. "And then there will be a wedding."

"It'll be big?" Her mouth turned up in half a smile; knowing the answer.

"Grotesquely so." Harry couldn't help but laugh at it all; at the circus that would commence—all because he had finally decided to commit to the woman sitting next to him.

"And televised?"

"Most definitely." Maddie nodded, taking it all in; letting it settle in her mind.

"Will I have to change my name? My first and middle names I mean. I know they aren't regal or..."

"No," he sighed. "No. You won't have to change your name. You'll still be Madeline Jay. Though, you won't be Forrester anymore."

"What will I be?"

"Well, the general understanding is that before I marry, I will be made...the Duke of Sussex."

"Mouthful."

"Yes," he laughed.

"So that would make your wife..."

"You." He corrected.

"The Duchess of Sussex?" She lifted her eyebrows.

"Bigger mouthful."

"Yes," Maddie laughed.

"So, you could be Madeline Sussex."
"Wow..." She breathed, her fingers fidgeting with the hem of her dress. "That's not so bad."

"Though people would refer to you as Her Royal Highness, the Duchess of Sussex."

"That's pretty heavy." Her gaze drifted just a bit.

"Is it?" She glanced up to him, seeing the concern in his eyes. Reaching out to take his hand, she shook her head.

"No. No...it's just a name."

"And a title," he smirked nervously; his anxiety building as it all came out. "People would curtsy to you, show deference to you, call you ma'am and..." His words fell silent as she pressed a finger to his lips. He swallowed and met her eyes; searching for how this was playing out in her head.

"Will I be your wife?" She was soft, sweet; her fingers tracing his jawline as her hand move to his neck.

"Yes," he answered quietly.

"Will I get to move in with you?"

"Yes," he nodded, calming. "At Kensington most likely."

"Will I get to wear your polo socks?" She bit her lip to keep from laughing.

"Any time you want," he relaxed; tension leaving his body and he sighed into a laugh.

"Okay then," she twirled her glass around in her hand. They had covered a lot, more than they had up until that moment. But she wasn't quite finished. "Harry?"

"Hmm?"

"Would I have to quit my job?" Her eyes were more serious as she looked to him and he knew instantly, this answer was not going to be as well received.

"That's not an easy answer."

"Yes it is," she sat up a bit. "It's either a yes or a no."

"It's not," he shook his head. "It's both...it's..."

"Harry."

"I know your work is important to you."

"It is."

"And you would be able to continue the work you do..." Maddie opened her mouth, but he rushed ahead. "But yes. Yes. At some point, you would have to quit your job." He watched as she processed; her eyes staring off into the distance. "I'm sorry. I know it's..."
"It's years and years of schooling..." Maddie spoke softly. "It's a PhD. It's licensing exams and boards and comps and..."

"I'm sorry. I..." He whispered, trying to pull it together. "I know it's a lot to take in, a lot to handle. I know that it's your entire life...Maddie. I get it. It's just that there are events to attend, trips we would have to take. I would be serving at my brother's side, I would be a full time royal. We would be full time..." Even as he said the words, he couldn't imagine anyone signing up for this. "You just wouldn't be able to do all of it while holding down a steady job, much less the two you have now. And I'm not even sure you would want to do it. Your clients would lose their anonymity, you might have people wanting to see you just to see you and..." He held tight to her hand, pulling her attention back to him. "But the work could still be the same. You...you wouldn't be able to go to Bendal to rebuild after a quake but you could go there, we could go there. We could open Community Centers. We could take the press and draw attention to the kids, to the people. Maybe you wouldn't be in the room with the vets anymore, but you could put your name, your title, the palace behind initiatives that would benefit the men and women in uniform. You could choose charities that serve them. You could start your own charity.... The job might change. But the work doesn't have to..." His eyes were scattered as he watched her; hoping and hoping that she wasn't about to bolt.

"I just..." Maddie cut in; her voice low as she stayed still, playing it out in her head. Her eyes hit his, her forehead crinkling up. "I just...what exactly am I going to DO all day?" A burst of laughter escaped her lips and Harry felt like crying at the relief that flowed through his body. "If I'm not working...what do I actually do?"

"Wow..." He breathed; his heart aching with joy at her question. "I don't know love. You do whatever you want. You...you take meetings, you have lunch..."

"Lunch?" Maddie laughed. "I'm going to get huge."

"You take up running," he waved his hand.

"Oh no," Maddie shook her head, her face moving into a scowl. "I don't run. Sorry. I don't care how bored I get, I'm not running....unless there's somebody behind me chasing me."

"Well..." Harry took a drink. "You would be able to hire somebody to do that...if you wanted." Their eyes met for a brief moment and then, with the abandon that came with the weekend, they both burst into laughter; leaning into the other with a new assurance. They were still there, falling back into their chair in a fit of champagne assisted giggles, when Bishop and Ella caught up with them.

"I cannot imagine what could possibly be so funny," he sighed; dropping to sit at their feet, pulling Ella into his laugh. "Because I just got here and I know he's not that funny."

"The game?" Maddie laughed.

"What are you two doing over here?" Ella looked them over.

"Making plans," Harry answered; his fingers tangling with Maddie's as he offered her a wink.

"Okay," Bishop's eyes flashed wide before he shook his head, dismissing it. "So. Here's the game."

"The game?" Maddie laughed.

"Ah yes...you..." He pointed at Harry. "Kiki's cousin's sorority sisters want to meet you..." He nodded to where Kiki stood, smiling in his direction with an apology in her eyes. Harry's smile remained as he groaned at the news.

"Of course they do," he sighed. Maddie turned to look towards the group of expectant women; already primping.

"Of course they do," her chuckle had a bit of a bitter edge to it.

"But we are going to play a drinking game...." Bishop intervened, waving between himself, Ella, and Maddie. "And here are the rules. Every time one of them curtsey's or tosses their hair back over their shoulder or laughs loudly at something that's not funny...we are going to take a shot..."

"How will we know if it's funny or not?" Ella asked; buying into his game.

"It's Harry. We know." Bishop grinned, his hand patting his breast pocket for his flask. "Hold on..." He looked scattered for a split second before Maddie sat up.

"Here it is," Maddie reached for his flask sitting on the table.

"Little thief," he shook his head at her; snatching it from her hand. "Go on Your Royal Highness....we have a game to play." Harry stood, buttoned his coat and leaned to kiss Maddie; holding his lips to hers for a moment.

"Don't be too long," she held onto his hand, her eyes flashing to the group of women waiting to meet her boyfriend; her eyes narrowing slightly.

"Don't be jealous, love," Bishop nudged her playfully.

"I'm not," she protested, her eyes shifting from Harry's. But he caught it; the look on her face that gave her away.

"Don't be jealous," he shook his head, leaning to put his lips to her ear. His whispered words drew a tremble from her skin. "The Duchess of Sussex..." Her breath sucked in as he kissed her neck. "I'll be right back." And then, straightening up, he moved away from them; off to fulfill his duty as Kiki's friend, his obligation as a royal. Maddie relaxed back in the chair as Ella moved up to sit by her side; all eyes watching as Harry stepped up to Kiki's side and spoke. As if on cue, all four of the women around her burst into loud, head tossing laughter. Fighting a smirk, Harry flashed Maddie a look as Bishop held the flask up in the air in a salute to him.

"Time to drink ladies!" He announced.

With a shake of her head and laughter on her lips, Maddie reached for the flask. Two of the girls flipped their hair over their shoulders and Maddie knew. She was about to get incredibly drunk.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

When Maddie woke the next morning, she found she had a serious headache and a deep, intense, but totally unjustified hatred for Bishop. Yes, he had introduced the drinking game—though it wasn't entirely his fault that the women were head tossing, curtsying, laugh at anything-ers. Yes, when Kiki and Sean kicked off their shoes and dove into the pool, Bishop had pulled Maddie and Ella from their comfortable chair into the water—though he didn't actually make her participate in the chicken fight competition that ensued. So, while he certainly was there, while he was certainly an accomplice, he shouldn't shoulder all of the blame.
Groaning, Maddie rolled to her side, her eyes peeking open to look for Harry. Surprised to find she was alone, she sat up in their bed. Scanning the room, her eyes fell on her dress that Harry had removed, her new lingerie that he had peeled from her body...the remnants of his tux that he almost tripped trying to get out of. A flush hit her cheeks, a laugh bubbled from her throat. Life with him was guaranteed to keep her on her toes.

Life with him.

Her heart swelled as the conversation they had the night before moved to the front of her mind. With a deep breath, she rose from bed; pulling on his boxers, his t-shirt, as she moved across the room—loving the access she had to his things, to him.

Stepping out of the bedroom, she was greeted with the smell of breakfast. Harry, sitting at the dining table reading the paper, looked up with a wide grin.

"Good morning, love."

"Morning sunshine," she smiled through her hangover. "You ordered breakfast?" She looked at the spread on the table; pastries, fruits, coffee, tea.

"I did," he tilted his head back to kiss her. "But if there's anything else you want, I can call down and..."

"What's that?" Maddie asked as her eyes caught something on the table next to what would be her seat; something pink and floral.

"That..." Harry pointed as she moved away from him toward it. "That is a Pincushion Hakea plant. Apparently."

"Oh my God," her eyes snapped from the plant to him. "You found it..." Her breath sucked in as she looked more carefully at the table; taking in the other items situated around her. "You got it all. Harry!" Her hand reached out. "The box of Macaroons, the plant, the..." She lifted the newspaper from the table. "The Denver Post. Oh my..." Not missing a beat, Harry swallowed his orange juice and pointed.

"The tandem bike is over there. Though...it looks a little rickety. You may have to convince Bishop to ride it with you."

"I don't know what to..." She was flabbergasted. It was all there. All of it. Everything she had listed in her mindless, pointless list. He had remembered all of it. And it was all there.

"Oh. One more thing," he moved from his seat then, lifting his hat from the table and settling it on her head. "You said you wanted to wear this." With a kiss to her speechless mouth, he winked. "It's not all duty, love."

The flight home was not nearly as lively as the one to Australia, but they all did their best to keep the party going; to keep the festivities with them until the very end. They played cards, they watched ridiculous comedies and, as their arrival drew near, they reminisced over the highpoints of the trip. Maddie felt a new ease with Harry and his life; a new comfortableness with his lifestyle— with her future lifestyle. Glancing at the tandem bicycle she had insisted on taking home, she grinned wide and sighed back into her seat. It was a big adjustment, an enormous role she was looking at—but Harry had this way of making it seem not so bad—more like an adventure they would be taking together, though not on her tandem bike—he had made that clear. This trip had been exactly what she had needed; she was relaxed and ready—ready to go back to work, ready to dig in and make it through the London winter, ready for the eventual place she would stand next to him.

Arriving in London brought a sad sort of silence over the group. But, holding tight to Harry, Maddie smiled wide as they stepped off the plane. Much to Maddie’s surprise, Thomas was standing next to a car on the tarmac; tall and stoic. She hadn’t expected to see him there and, according to the way Harry stalled, the tension in his arm, he hadn’t expected him either. With a knowing glance to Bishop and Leo, Harry grew serious.

"Thomas," Harry nodded as he stepped up to the car, Maddie’s hand still in his.

"Welcome home, Sir," Thomas nodded in returned and, as Harry expected, he held out a phone. Harry’s eyes settled on it as he breathed deep. Plucking it from his palm, Harry pressed it to his ear, already connected.

Thomas knew what none of them knew. It was Charles and, at that moment, he was calling Harry in; beckoning him to Clarence. "Fine." Harry spoke in a clipped tone. "Just let me drop Maddie at home and change and I'll..." He looked down at his clothing. "I'm in jeans and a shirt and...okay. Okay." With a heavy nod of his head, he disconnected the phone and handed it back to Thomas. "I've been summoned."

"Why?" Bishop asked; his arm around Ella’s shoulders.

"Don't know. He wants to see me." Harry’s eyes were business as the driver went about loading his stuff into the car.

"But you behaved," Bishop thought over the last few days. "You were respectful, you never took your clothes off, you..."

"It's not that." Harry ran a hand over the back of his neck.

"What is it?" Ella asked.

"I don't know." He shrugged.

"I can take Maddie home if you would like," Bishop offered.

"Thanks but he said to bring her," Harry explained, as confused as the rest of them.

"What do you think it is?" Maddie's eyes were wide.

"No idea," he looked to her with a small, tight smile. "Come with me?"

"Sure," she nodded, feeling nervous. Saying their good-byes, they slipped into the car; Thomas taking the seat next to the driver who immediately set out for Clarence House. Maddie watched Harry’s face and she could tell; he was nervous, deep in thought. She reached out for his hand. Though he let her take it, he was in another place in his mind.

When they pulled up to the door, they were immediately whisked inside; the hustle indicative of the urgency they had felt since they arrived at the airport—such a stark contrast to what they had left behind. Maddie had been to Clarence House before; for dinner and tea and once just dropping by with Harry. But this time it felt more formal, more businesslike. They were greeted by Charles who, though serious, was polite and welcoming—kissing Maddie hello, asking about her trip. William and Kate were there as well; offering their hellos, their hugs—but something was off; Maddie could tell. Either her read of the room was off and she was losing her touch or something serious was going on.

They moved as a group towards an office, a board room almost; Harry holding her hand the entire way. The doors to the room were open and there were already men seated inside. Seeing the reaction on Harry's face, she knew that he knew them. His eyes met his father's and his hand tightened around Maddie's. Stepping towards the room, Charles was kind as he asked Maddie to wait outside; nodding for Harry and William to follow him inside. Harry stopped and leaned to kiss her, avoiding her eyes as he did. Dropping her hand, he followed his father inside; William just behind him.

"Are you coming?" William looked to his wife who shook her head softly.

"I think I'll wait outside with Maddie," she felt a strange allegiance to her future sister. With a quick nod, William stepped inside; the doors closing behind him. Maddie's eyes moved to Kate's with a dazed sort of look on them. With a comforting smile, Kate gestured towards a pair of chairs off to the side. Not knowing what else to do, Maddie followed her.

"You didn't have to wait with me," Maddie's voice was small in the enormous hallway. "I'm sorry. That came out rude. It was sweet of you to sit with me but you shouldn't feel obligated..."

"It's okay," Kate shook her head with a small smile. "I don't feel obligated. I would rather be here with you than in there with them anyway."

"Sure," Maddie smiled and looked to her fidgeting fingers.

"You had a good trip?"

"Yes," Maddie sighed. "We had an amazing trip."

"What a luxury, no?" Kate shrugged thoughtfully. "Being able to run off and have a wedding with just your friends and family."

"Mmm," Maddie nodded. "It was beautiful."

"I bet." Kate glanced to the door quickly.

"You know what's going on in there, don't you." Maddie studied her closely as Kate bit at her lower lip. "You know who those men are."

"Maddie, I can't..."

"It's okay," Maddie smiled; leaning back into her chair.

"I wish I could," her eyes were wide, sympathetic and Maddie shook her head, letting her off the hook.

"It's okay. I understand. I just...is he okay? He's not in trouble or...." Their conversation came to an abrupt close as the doors swung open. Both women rose to their feet; Charles stepped out with the men; shaking hands and thanking them for coming as the door shut behind him—Harry and William still behind them. As the men disappeared from their view, Charles smiled first at Kate and turned his attention to Maddie. She did her level best trying to read his face as he reached a hand out to rest on her shoulder.

"Harry asked me to show you in," his voice was warm, fatherly. His hand was firm as he guided her to the doors, knocking on the dark, heavy wood. They swung open instantly and, with a glance back to Kate, Maddie stepped inside. Her eyes scanned the room; massive and ornate; dark and serious. Harry stood at the far end of the room, his back to her. William, standing between them, turned to her with a smile. With a pat to his brother's tense shoulders, he slipped past her.

"Excuse me," he nodded as he moved by. The doors shut again and she was alone with Harry; who still hadn't turned to face her.

She suddenly felt very young, very unsettled; scared. "Are you..." She cleared her throat and took a few steps in his direction. "Are you in trouble?"

In response, Harry chuckled bitterly, loudly; shaking his head.

"Is this..." Maddie swallowed the lump in her throat, searching for something. "Are inches versus centimeters a bigger deal than you thought?" She tried for a joke, but it fell flat. "Harry...give me something because I'm just..." He turned towards her then and one look at his face made her heart fall to her feet.

"It's not you," he had sad eyes as he shook his head. "There's something I need to tell you."

"Oh?" She felt small, dainty, and she hated it. "Bad news, good news?"

"No." His voice echoed solemnly in the room.

"You look so serious," her eyes were scattered. "Harry..." And then, with three words, Harry took her breath away.

"I'm being deployed."
When Harry was deployed, Maddie received masses of unsolicited advice; from all corners of her life. It wasn't just from family, friends, and colleagues—it was from everyone. Her high profile romance with Harry had made her more of a household name. People felt comfortable with her, like they knew her—at least well enough that they could offer her guidance on how best to navigate and survive Harry's 120 days of deployment.

Most of it she found annoying. Yes, it was sweet of people to care about her. Yes, it was thoughtful that they wanted to ease her pain, her worry. But, the vast majority of the advice givers were people who had never sent away somebody they loved to fight in a war. Most of the people had never been called upon to stand tall while their heart, their soul, pulled on that instantly recognizable camouflage uniform and walked away from them. Walked towards the hot zone.

Over the course of her time with Harry, she had watched him handle the public; watched him negotiate those awkward moments when somebody stepped into your private moments; your dinners, your fights, your need to be in solitude. She had watched his grace, his ease, his ability to slip into a space where he could hear what people had to say, offer a smile and a word of thanks and then slip back into the headspace he had occupied before. Though she hadn't had nearly the years he had to perfect that—when these people approached her with advice, she tried her level best to imitate it. She would force a smile to her face—much like the smile she wore at the reception following her father's service—disingenuous but necessary; expected. She would hear their words of wisdom, thank them, and continue on her way.

Occasionally, rarely, she would hear something that stuck with her; something that resonated deep inside of her. Almost always those words were spoken by somebody who had been in her shoes at one point in their lives. Like the twenty-two year old man she spoke to on Day 7. The man who she would see at Saint Joe's every Friday bringing his four year old daughter to a play date with other spouses and children. His wife was serving her third tour in Afghanistan. He had been in her shoes; more than once. When he approached her, he had been reserved, humble; cautious. He didn't want to intrude, didn't want to impose, didn't want to assume that her experience was anything like his experience. But he had seen the news, he had read the stories and he knew. Her heart was in Afghanistan with his.

"They say it gets easier," Maddie smiled tiredly when he offered his sympathies.

"It doesn't," he had shaken his head. "It just gets closer to the end."

Her eyes had welled with tears. He understood what most others did not; Day 1 was no different than day 71 of a deployment. Sure, time was passing, days were fading—but on day 71 Harry was no further away from danger than he was on Day 1. It wasn't easier. It was just closer to the end. The young man shared with Maddie a little ritual he and his daughter had to mark the days of his wife's deployment. In their home, in a space they would see every day, a space they both had access to, they had two large cylindrical vases. On the day his wife left, they had put 120 marbles into one of the vases—one for each day of her deployment. And every morning, he and his daughter would move one of the marbles to the empty vase. It was a visual representation of time passing; the nearing of the end.

Maddie thought that was beautiful; symbolic and sweet. This time her thank you was sincere, heartfelt, her hug was warm and appreciative. And that night, on her way home, she stopped at the store and bought two vases, 120 marbles. One for every day that Harry would be deployed. She had poured all but seven of them into one vase; placing each of the seven carefully into the other and settling them on her mantel—under the painting of Bendal, next to the photo of them at The Lavender Lady. The only thing she did differently was that she would take a marble out of the "Days Left" vase, carry it in her pocket throughout the day and, at the end of the day, she would slip it into the "Days Passed."

And that is exactly what she had done on Day 116 when she left for work that morning. She smiled as she removed another marble, rolling it between her fingers before slipping it into her pocket; staring down the last four as though to let them know that she wasn't afraid, they wouldn't take her down. She was going to make it through them just as she had the previous 115; though it hadn't been easy.

Maddie's mood was lighter that day; having learned how to cope along the way. She offered smiles and nods as she passed by her colleagues. She asked one of the younger patients at the hospital how his Playstation battle with his older brother had gone and high-fived him when he said he had won. She had an early morning meeting with the Intervention Team, a play therapy session with a little girl who had made her a macaroni necklace, and was headed back to her office when her day came to a screeching halt.

Flipping through the files in her hand, she rounded the final corner to her office and she stopped in her tracks. Standing outside her door were two well-dressed, unassuming men who she knew instantly. They were Royal Protection Officers. That could only mean one thing; Charles was there.

She could almost hear the blood rushing from her brain, leaving behind a soft hum that only faintly drowned out the sound of Harry's voice in her ear, the night before he left, telling her that if anything happened to him, his father would come to find her. She wouldn't find out about it from the nightly news—his father had sworn to that.

And there she stood, in the middle of the day on Day 116, looking at the two men waiting outside of her office—and the idea that just inside those doors was her entire life. She almost folded; almost collapsed right there on the cold tile floor. But something in her—most likely the same thing that kept her walking after her father died—something kept her upright.

She barely breathed as she studied her door; her intense fear occupying her mind in such a way that breathing never even crossed her mind. Holding her folders tightly to her chest where her macaroni necklace still dangled, her fingers turning over the marble in her pocket, she took a step in that direction. She had no choice but to face this, to face him. Oh God, she thought, tears coming to her eyes. She wasn't prepared to handle this. Not Harry.

The three short weeks leading up to Harry's deployment felt like 21 days of training; for both Harry and Maddie. When they finally left that room at Clarence House, one hour after they had stepped into it, the preparations began. Immediately, Harry's schedule was altered. The majority of his official events were cancelled, making way for more intensive training at the Army Base. As his training began, so did hers. Right away she was thrown into the world where Harry was somewhere else. He spent the weekdays at the base, coming home only on the weekends, all three of them. Maddie had to learn how she was going to manage the time without him, how she was going to manage the massive onslaught of media attention once word rang out that he was gone, how she was going to handle the way her heart felt whenever she thought of him in battle.
Harry was changing. His body was harder, more sculpted; built for the rigor that frontline duty would bring. His mind, too, had become tougher; having been put through intense mental and psychological training—including what would happen to him should he be captured—and how he should respond. She could tell it was difficult, living in this world of limbo; his mind focused on his training, on what he was being called to do while his body was in England—waiting.

But when he was at home with her, he would let his guard down; he would be soft, loving, gentle. He would smile the smile that had kept her entranced with him for all this time. He would laugh and joke and play. At the same time there were these moments of pure honesty, when his eyes would tighten, when he would allow her to witness his darker moments; the moments that sat in the very real world where he was going to a war, to fight and even kill people. There was no way to avoid it. That is what he was doing, what he was trained to do.

And the night before he would leave her for four months, for 120 days, he let his guard down completely and she saw all sides of Harry; the soft and the tough, the light and the dark, the well-trained and the uncertain. He was leaving first thing the next morning and had spent dinner with his family; quiet time with his father, signing papers, reaching an understanding. He had taken shots with his brother; saying more in their silence than they did in their words. He had kissed Kate, held her tight and, when she started to cry, he squeezed her even tighter and told her to keep William in his place, off the pedestal that everyone else seemed to think he occupied. And then, with hugs to his father and brother, he went to Maddie who was waiting for him at his place at Kensington—in nothing but his button down shirt and polo socks. None of it was necessary. He was already there, already in a space where the only thing he could do, the only way he could show her was to...show her. Pulling her to him, his hand firm at the base of her neck, he had every intention of loving her well into the night.

"Harry..." Maddie's voice was soft and quiet in the dark room. They lay together, a tangled mess of limbs and sheets, glowing in post coital delight.

"Hmmm?" His finger reached out to trace a path along her thigh casually draped over him.

"Is there..." She blinked at the tears in her eyes, really wanting to keep the emotion from the moment if she could. "Is there anything you need from me? Before you leave or..." She trailed off, preferring silence to tears. A small, tired smile played across his lips, his hand flattening out to squeeze her leg with affection.

"I need you to be careful," he called out to her without moving. "I don't want to hear about you running off to a third world country to rebuild anything or save anyone. I can't do what I need to do if I'm worried about you in a pile of rubble somewhere..."

"No rebuilding," she agreed with a sniff. "No saving. I promise." Her hand reached for his, her fingers running over his palm. They were silent together for at least two minutes; their breath stabilizing, their body temperatures cooling, their eyes growing heavy.

"Listen, Maddie..." Harry's hand closed around hers as he moved, turning so he could look down at her. "We need to have the talk..."

"The talk?" Maddie's eyebrows lifted, her lips twitching into a smile. "Don't worry big guy, my mother had The Talk with me years and years ago. We're safe. You're off the hook."

"Hmm..." Harry smiled but shook his head. "A different talk. The one you have with the people in your life before you leave for battle." He heard her suck in her breath. "Maddie, if something happens to me..."
"Harry." Her protest was on her lips in a heartbeat, it was in her body—the way it tensed, the way it moved slightly away from him—involuntarily wanting to avoid the pain it knew was associated with this conversation.

"If something happens to me..." He cracked a little; holding her face in his hands as tears rose to his eyes. That was all it took for Maddie to let the floodgates open. "My father swore to me that he would come to find you. You won't have to hear about it on the evening news or see it flashed on some magazine headlines. He will come and find you first..."

"Harry," she held onto his hand that was cupping her face; tears falling out of her eyes and down to the pillow.

"And you won't have to sit at the back of the church." She let out the smallest of whimpers at the thought. "He promised you wouldn't be at the back of the church with the Ambassador to Ecuador or some crazy shit like that. They'll take care of you, they'll take you in..." He took a deep breath. "If you have any problems while I'm gone, call Will. You have his number, he's happy to be there. If there are any issues with the press or the paps get too close or you don't know what to do, call Will. He'll walk you through it." He could feel her head nod in his hands; his head dipping to kiss at her wet cheeks. "And for God's sake, whatever you do, if I'm gone, don't let Bishop go on and on about honor and duty and try to convince you that I would want him to look after you....okay? That is not at all what I would want." Maddie began to snicker through her tears; creating a mirrored response in Harry. "Make sure Bishop stays away. You understand?"

"Yes," Maddie's voice cracked, her smile weakening as the sadness surged. "Harry...Please stop talking about what happens if something happens. I am trying really hard right now to show some of the control and serenity that I've seen other partners do but...I'm so afraid.

"Don't be afraid," his hands held her cheeks. "Don't be afraid. It's one of the safest instruments in the world. And I know what I'm doing. I...they wouldn't let me go in if I didn't know what I was doing. I'm going to be okay," he kissed her. "I'm going to come back."

"You don't know that."

"No. No I don't."

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Day 1 of 120

Day 1 was the worst. The absolute worst.

Saying good-bye to Harry was torture in a way that Maddie was not prepared to handle. He had been wise in insisting they say good-bye at his place, in his bed; far from the watchful eye of the public. Because Maddie was a mess. From the moment she woke up and rolled to her side to look at him, finding him already awake and watching her, she was a mess. She was embarrassingly blubbering and sniveling and, though she tried to turn away, tried to hide her eyes—he pulled her into his arms and hugged her tight. There was very little time left.

There was a moment, a split second when she just about lost it, when she almost gave in to her urge to beg him to stay. She wanted to remind him that on Christmas he was willing to toss aside his family tradition to stay with her, that less than a month ago, he had suggested they piss off the family and all of Great Britain and elope. She wanted to remind him of that now and then disappear with him—somewhere they would never find them, somewhere he would be safe. She wanted to cry and plead and stomp her feet. And for a split second it crossed her mind.

And the very next second, she felt incredibly guilty. He was leaving for four months and this was the good-bye she was giving him?! So she pulled it together. She channeled the strength of the men and women she worked with every week at St. Joe's. She took deep breaths, ran through the plethora of calming techniques that she had taught clients over the years and she pulled it together.

"I have to take a shower," he spoke softly, his lips against her forehead. "You want to come with me?"

"No," she shook her head, wiping at her eyes. "You go ahead." Harry nodded, kissed her again and slipped from the sheets. She felt his absence immediately; moving to snuggle into his spot, into his pillow, into his scent. Squeezing her eyelids shut, she took deep breaths and listened to the noises around her; the steady stream of the shower, the clock ticking on the wall, the wind blowing through the trees outside.

Maddie's eyes locked with his when he stepped back into the room; moving first to kiss her. She took a deep breath and bit her lip when he stepped away and began to put on the universally recognized camouflage uniform. She blinked back the levy of tears that threatened when he slid on his necklace, when he fastened the bracelet she had given him around his wrist. Standing at the foot of his bed, he stood in silence, watching as Maddie's mind worked overtime trying to keep it together; trying to maintain her cool.

"You can stay here as long as you would like," he was desperately hanging on to his control. "And you can come back whenever you want. You have Thomas' number. He can get you in here...though I should warn him about your sock thieving ways."

"You should," Maddie nodded, letting out a ragged breath. Looking down at her hands, she implored herself to keep it together.

"Maddie..." His voice cracked as he called to her. In his next breath, she was up—out from under the covers, walking across the length of his bed to where he stood at the end. His head tipped up to look at her, his hands moving around her body; pulling her close to him. Pressing his head to her stomach, he hugged her tight. Holding his face in her hands, she pulled his head up to look at her; her eyes memorizing his features.

"I love you Harry," she smiled down at him; her thumbs stroking his cheeks. "I love you so much."

"I love you too," he smiled, his eyes wet, his heart betraying his desire to stay calm and collected.

"Go and do what you need to do and then you come home to me..." She chuckled as she recalled the way he had sent her off to Bendal. "You stay safe and careful and...and remember that I need you. I need you back here with me. We have plans...I can't have those eight kids without you Wales."

"Ha!" He chuckled; his body vibrating against her as his hands rubbing along her arms. "I'm going to hold you to that."

"I don't care," she shook her head. "You come home to me and you can have as many as you want."
"Now see, I know you've lost your mind..." His grin wavered as he took a breath. "I have to go, love. Come down here and kiss me properly."

"No," Maddie shook her head, her eyes giving up the fight as tears escaped onto her cheeks. But she went. Wrapping her arms around his neck, she stepped off the bed and into his arms. Her entire body wrapped around his; his arms holding her off the ground. Pulling her face from the crook of his neck, her lips found his; kissing every bit of love and strength and promise into him.

"I'll see you in four months," he whispered, pulling his face back to look at her. "One Hundred and twenty days."

"Two thousand, eight hundred and eighty hours," Maddie bit her lip. "I did the math."

"You're a strange woman, love." He smiled, kissing her again.

"I am," she nodded, her legs unwrapping from around his waist, finding the soft pile of his carpet. When his eyes hit hers, the small bit of humor rushed from the room replaced with sadness and worry and heartache. Harry dipped his head to kiss her, one last time; his lips moved against hers, gentle at first. But when she fist his shirt in her hands and pressed her body into his, his mouth opened over hers, allowing her tongue to tease against his. His hands grabbed at her; running over her skin, over the curves of her body; pulling a groan from deep inside of her. Forcing himself from her, commanding his body to take a step back, he breathed heavily, her fingers flying to her lips-red and warm from his.

"I have to..."

"I know."

"Four months," he vowed.

"Eight babies," she promised.

When he turned away from her, she felt her balance shift. When he reached for his bag and his hat and moved towards his door, she felt her heart pull in her chest—as if it were going with him. And when, with one last crooked grin and one last wink of his eye, he stepped out of his room, closing the door behind him—she felt her knees give out.

He was gone. Just like that. Day 1 of 120.
Day 3

On Day 3, the world was let in on Harry’s deployment and the media went absolutely nuts. There was news of his departure everywhere; pictures of him in uniform plastered all over town. It was like every medium of press was shoving it in her face; taunting her with the reality that Harry was off fighting in a war. The headlines called out to her, the news anchors spoke to her. All she could hear, all she could see was how His Royal Highness was heading right into the thick of it. And then there was the article that was released saying that he was at the top of the Taliban hit list, detailing the things that could happen to him if he was captured.

It made her want to vomit.

And the paparazzi—the paparazzi was all over her. It was so much worse than when they were trying to figure out her name, it was so much bigger than when they thought they had nude photos of her. They were absolutely everywhere. They waited outside of her place. They were at the entrance of her parking lot at work. They were stationed outside of the clubs and restaurants she and Harry had been to. They knew where she got her hair done, they knew where she liked to buy her groceries. They knew the tiny little bookstore she liked to peruse at leisure. They were everywhere. And they were relentless with their questions.

How is Harry? Where is Harry? Does he call you? Are you worried? Is he still okay? Do you miss him?

Do you miss him? Are you out of your fucking mind? She wanted to yell—though she never did. They were everywhere with their inane questions, their invasions of her space, of her privacy, of her God given right to grieve his departure and be depressed until he returned.

It made her want to break things.

Day 5

On Day 5, Harry's friends began to settle around her; circle the wagons. Ella had always been there, from day one—sleeping over the first two nights and taking Maddie to her home the next. But on Day 5, Harry's friends rallied.

Bishop was first—Bishop was always. When he showed up at her office door that day, after a long day with clients, Maddie was so shocked to see him, she almost knocked him over as she hurried past him.

When he told her his car was parked in the parking garage, and that the press had no idea that he drove a car, much less what it looked like, she felt the very beginnings of an emotional melt down. And when he tossed her his keys and told her she could drive it until the press figured her out—at which time he would switch it out for something else—she had to sit down in her chair to keep from falling.

She didn't care what snarky comments Harry made about Bishop, she loved this man. And she knew Harry did too.

Next it was Penelope. Her sister's best friend's roommate worked at the salon Maddie frequented. And, as a result of some sordid tale from university, she was still in debt to Penelope. Calling in that favor, she invited Maddie over to her place where, over a bottle of wine, they both enjoyed manicures, pedicures, and a full cut and color. As silly as it seemed, the pampering made Maddie feel like a new woman. And she didn't have to hide behind a magazine or sneak in the back door to make it happen.

They were all there; Leo offering a safe, press-free haven and a booth in the back for the nights she wanted to come out, and sending food home for her to enjoy on the nights when she didn't.

Kiki and Sean returned from their honeymoon and stepped right onto the defensive team that surrounded Maddie. They were all there; Ella, Bishop, Kiki, Sean, Penelope, Anne, Leo. They were there to pull her through the crowds, there to help shield the onslaught of cameras and, when she couldn't handle it, they were there with a bottle of tequila.

They loved her—and Harry—too much to leave her out there on her own. This was how they protected him. This was how they watched after her.

Day 11

On Day 11 Maddie started to feel better. Her lungs were expanding more, her heart not quite as heavy. She wasn't crying herself to sleep as much and had found that she wasn't avoiding wearing makeup in order to sidestep any embarrassing smudges.

The media attention had begun to wane a bit. She could look at a newspaper stand. She could watch the nightly news.

Though she was nowhere near ready to say things were getting easier. She had put up her vases of marbles and she felt comfortable saying things were getting closer to the end. With every day, things were getting closer to the end. But not easier. It wouldn't be easier until Harry was home; safe and in her arms.

But she could come out of hiding. She could walk through her day without her sunglasses. She could go to the grocery store again. The media was still there, but the newness of the story had worn off and, when Justin Bieber was caught cheating on his movie star girlfriend, there were bigger stories to print.

Maddie wanted to send a gift basket to that little shit with the ridiculous hair. But instead she went back to her favorite bookstore and wasted an entire afternoon.

Day 18

Day 18 was Valentine's Day and Maddie had been dreading it for a good solid week; though when the day actually rolled around, she found that it wasn't quite so bad. She spent the morning in a meeting, met with the group she ran for early childhood kiddos and joined the staff in passing out goodies to their regular patients. Feeling gracious, she took on an extra shift that night, allowing one of her colleagues to take her girlfriend out for a romantic evening.

When Maddie finally left the hospital, she stopped off at a bakery a few blocks from her place to buy a pastry and walk the rest of the way. There was something about the crisp white snow, the brisk air, that made her feel refreshed; not as heavy. Turning the corner towards her house, she caught something out of the corner of her eye. Squinting, she tried to focus on the stairs leading up to her place. Was that...

"Goddamn it Forrester!" Bishop's voice called out into the night. "We have been sitting here for hours! Would you hurry up and let us in your bloody place before my pecker freezes, falls off, and shatters at Ella's feet!" Maddie could hear Ella giggle as she hushed him.
"What in the hell are you two doing here?" Maddie hurried towards them; looking at their pink noses, their bundled bodies.

"Waiting for you," Ella hugged her best friend; kissing her softly on the cheek. "I thought you were working early today?"

"I took an extra shift so Miranda and Jamie could..."

"DOOR!" Bishop groaned. "Could you open the door before we dive into the gossip circuit at the hospital?!"

"Wow," Maddie snickered, moving past them both to do as he asked. "Bishop is an entirely different man when he's cold." Ella smiled apologetically, moving quickly into the heated hallway that greeted them. Taking the stairs to generate more friction in their cold legs, the three of them were in Maddie's apartment in no time. "I still don't understand..." She looked them over as she shrugged out of her coat, unwrapping her scarf. "It's Valentine's Day. Don't you two have plans?"

"We did," Bishop's sighed, his fingers and his mood thawing as he took Ella's coat from her. "We had dinner, we had drinks...this is the next part of our plans."

"Me?" Maddie laughed. "Hanging out with gloomy me is part of your Valentine's Day plans? You don't have to do this, you know..." She looked to Ella. "I know you love me, but you shouldn't make him be here tonight. I'm going to be fine. I have my pastry and a bottle of..."

"It's not me," Ella shook her head, slipping off her heels and moving to Maddie's couch. "I'm not making him be here. He's making me. Well, not making me but...you get it."

"What?" Maddie's smile pulsed as she turned to Bishop. "I don't understand. Why would you..."

"This..." Bishop's arm extended and there, hanging from his hand, was a bright red gift bag. "You brought me a gift?" Her eyes flashed from the bag to his and he shook his head. "Then who..."

"A little bird. Or a big bird. An Apache bird..." Bishop chuckled at his own joke. "Harry left this with me. He asked me to bring it to you tonight and, well, the Captain gets what the Captain wants and..." Maddie's hands moved to her mouth, her eyes welling with tears. "I have a gift. I have wine and I have Ella...in case you need to cuddle. Because I am not allowed to cuddle. He was incredibly clear about that." Maddie managed a laugh through her tears, her heart confused at the overwhelming sadness that was mixing with the smile on her face.

"I don't know what to..." Maddie shook her head and, upon Bishop's coaxing, took the gift bag from him. Ella patted the spot next to her on the couch and Maddie was quick to sit there, pulling a blanket from the back and draping it over her and Ella's legs. She stared at the red bag in her lap, almost afraid to touch it; afraid of what it could to do her.

"Go ahead darling," Ella nudged her lightly as Bishop stepped out of the room to open the bottle of wine and find glasses. Taking a deep breath and exhaling slowly, Maddie steeled herself and pulled out the tissue paper that had been stuffed inside. The bag was unnecessarily large for the long, slim box that was nestled at the bottom.

The bag fell from her lap onto the floor next to the tissue paper as her fingers held onto the box carefully; almost reverently—taking in its shape, its color, its weight. Trying to push down the lump in her throat, she pulled at the silver ribbon and lifted the lid off the box. Her fingers were gentle as she lifted the delicate silver chain from the box; pulling it up and out.
"A necklace?" Ella smiled, leaning in closer as Maddie pulled the end of it from the box. Maddie's other hand reached out, cupping the small, simple pendant that hung at the end. Pulling it closer, her eyes read the word and instantly filled with tears.

"Ubuntu..." Maddie whispered; her head hanging as she began to sob.

"Oh honey, come here," Ella moved, pulling her friend into her arms; cradling her head to her like a small child. The box fell from Maddie's lap, the chain held tight in her hand, as she leaned into Ella; waves of sadness washing over her.

When Bishop returned, he had three glasses of wine in his hands, but he took one look at the couch and sat them on the table. Ella looked up at him with wide, wet eyes and he sighed heavily. Moving to sit on the table in front of the couch, his hand reached out to Maddie; rubbing down her back in a soothing way; his heart hurting for her. He let her cry for a good minute, let her wallow and sob and then, he cleared his throat and spoke softly.

"You know...I don't know if it'll help or not..." Ella looked to him as Maddie sniffed and quieted for a second. "But I thought you should know...my pecker has thawed. No worries about it crashing to the floor and shattering."

There was a split second, a pause in the room where Ella thought over just how much it would hurt if she were to punch him. And then, in the very next second, laughter erupted.

And just like that, Maddie was pulled from the darkness.

This was how they protected him. This was how they looked after her.

Eventually Ella helped secure the necklace around her neck and Bishop distributed the glasses of wine and joined them on the couch. Toasting Captain Wales, they tipped back their drinks and sighed into the moment.

That night, after an entire bottle had been emptied, after she shoved Bishop and Ella out the door to a cab—insisting they have some time to the two of them, Maddie went over to her mantle and, her fingers stroking the pendant Harry had left for her, she pulled the marble from her pocket and dropped it in the "Days Passed" vase with a smile.

Day 18. Check.
Chapter 69

Day 25

On Day 25, Maddie received a family heavy phone call from Colorado. The family was together for dinner at her Uncle Patrick’s and they decided maybe she needed to hear from them. And, though it was midnight and Maddie had been asleep, she needed it more than she thought. Her mother was first; sending her love and offering to hop on the next plane to England. Patrick was next with a completely inappropriate joke and a "buck up little camper" type motivation. Her grandmother offered to send soup and a knitted blanket. Gary offered to send something from the farm and Kyle offered to come out and go on a soul-purging hike somewhere in the English countryside. And then she spoke at length with Derek about what life was like on a base in a military zone and, knowing she needed it—knowing she could handle it—he was honest with her. She appreciated that about him, about all of them—not feeling the need to hide things from her. He was quick to note that Harry was in the air, he was flying out of a base and things were a little different for him than the frontline guys and gals who were on the ground. And, because he had been honest with her, she believed him.

Day 42

On Day 42 Maddie’s other family moved closer to her. Caving to her partner’s wishes, and the best interests of their family, Khenda finally gave in. She and Collins packed up their belongings and moved to France. They had waited to tell Maddie and Ella, waited until they had a home secured, till they had jobs secured—until they were absolutely sure. And then they about burst with happiness when they could finally tell her. Two days before they were to arrive, they called Maddie with the good news.

She immediately felt tears of happiness fill her eyes when Khenda called to tell her. As soon as she hung up, she called Ella and they made travel plans for that weekend. It was much easier to convince Ella to go to France than it was to Bendal. They packed their bags, let Bishop drive them to the airport, and in just over an hour—they were reuniting their small Bendal family.

They spent 48 hours in France; 48 wonderful, homecoming hours with Khenda and Collins. They helped them move into their place, they painted walls, they picked out baby furniture and made fun of Khenda’s cravings for chocolate shakes. They hardly slept at all; there was too much catching up to do. Khenda was due in June and they would not be finding out what gender their baby would be. She preferred surprises. Collins, elated that she finally allowed them to move to a place safer, more stable, was willing to go along with anything else that she asked. Maddie’s heart swelled watching the two of them together; watching them move around each other with such love and adoration. It was a reassuring, comforting 48 hours.

And when the 48 hours was over, Khenda stayed home sorting through her fabric samples for curtains while Collins took Maddie and Ella to the airport. There were tears, there were hugs, and there were promises of many more weekends to come. It was there that the photo was snapped of Collins kissing Maddie’s cheek with familial love in his eyes. And it was that photo that was published in a London tabloid with a headline implying Maddie was having a French Affair while Harry was off serving his country.

It was the first time she saw only red. It was the first time she wanted to track down a reporter and punch him in the face.

The bloggers were all over it though; catching the photo and recognizing Collins from pictures of Harry in Bendal. And those bloggers were amazing. They pulled down deep and produced photo after photo of Collins and Khenda laughing with Harry, standing with him at events. And the bloggers were vicious; quick to call the photographer and the tabloid to the carpet. Though there was no apology, no retraction, it was clear that the majority of the public wasn't about to fall for this particular story.

It was the first time Maddie wanted to track down a blogger and hug them.

Day 51

On Day 51, Maddie agreed to accompany Bishop to the Royal Opera House to see Swan Lake. He had taken his mother's tickets thinking that he and Ella could go but, when Ella was called in to work the weekend because somebody was sick, Bishop called on Maddie. His mother didn't want the tickets to go to waste and he promised it would be a good time. Maddie had stalled, not feeling up to the dressing up that would accompany a trip to the Opera. But she loved Bishop and he had stepped up as her friend, going above and beyond to make sure she was surviving Harry's deployment. So she smiled wide and agreed to go.

And when Bishop showed up on Day 51, Maddie was dressed to the nines with a smile on her face and her hair upswept. Bishop whistled low and slow as Maddie shook her head at him.

"I'm not sure your best friend would approve of how you're looking at me right now."

"I'm not sure my best friend would approve of what I'm thinking about you right now..."

"Bishop!" She smacked him with her clutch.

"Ouch! I'm kidding! Good God woman. What do you have in that thing? A brick?" He rubbed his arm. "You know you cannot take bricks into the Royal Opera House."

"I read that on the website," she snarked right back at him as she reached for her coat.

"Resourceful," Bishop smirked; helping her with the coat and moving to open the door for her. Maddie smiled at him and reached out to pat his arm as she moved through the door.

"Five bucks says that tabloid paints you as the next in my long line of lovers I take while Harry's out risking life and limb ..." Bishop paused for a beat, knowing that still pissed her off, and then he shrugged; pulling the door shut behind him.

"Five bucks says I'm going to be the one to leak that particular story." With another smack to his arm, Maddie chuckled.

"It's a good thing I know you're joking."

"And it's a good thing I brought liquid medicine," he patted his breast pocket. "Cause that brick isn't getting any lighter." Offering her his arm, they slipped from her building into an awaiting car and were on their way to the Opera.

Maddie had to admit, she was enjoying herself. Bishop had been right. He had promised her a good time and he was delivering. They had a lovely meal before the show, the performances had been amazing, and at intermission, he even allowed her to buy him a drink. When the lights flashed, they downed the remaining wine and made their way back towards their box.

As Maddie stepped into the dim walkway, she felt her phone buzz in her purse. Peeking inside to check the ID, she didn't recognize the number.
"Sorry," she whispered to Bishop; pulling the phone from her purse as people were taking their seats. "It might be work."

"Make it fast Forrester, they're pretty strict around here," Bishop winked at her as she pressed the button.

"Hello?" She spoke into the phone; unable to hear much of anything on the other end as the orchestra began to tune.

"Excuse me miss," an irritable usher gave her the eye.

"I'm sorry," she whispered to the usher, to Bishop. Pressing her hand to her other ear, she hurried back towards the door to the lobby. "Hello?" She asked again.

And when the voice, his voice, breathed, "Madeline..." Her lungs hitched in her chest and her eyes stung with tears.

"Harry?" She stood still, her head shaking; unable to process it. "Oh my God. Harry. Is that you?"
That same usher cleared his throat and stepped closer to her. "I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I'm leaving I just..." She broke into a run to the doors; needing to get out, needing to take this phone call. Pushing out into the lobby, she took a deep breath. "Please tell me you're still there."

"I'm here love," he was grinning. She could tell. "Where are you?"

"The Opera with Bishop," she wiped at her cheeks; a pointless act, as her tears just kept coming.

"Ha!" He laughed; the first real, from the gut laugh he'd had in a while. "Did you say the Opera with Bishop?"

"Yes," she sniffed, looking for a place to be that wasn't out in the open, a place where people wouldn't see her crying.

"Why are you at the Opera with Bishop? What bet did you lose to get yourself in that predicament?"

"I...I...I don't want to talk about the Opera. Or Bishop. Or...Harry...are you okay? Are you..."

"I'm fine," he was quick to reassure her.

"You can call?" She perked up, hurrying across the lobby to a phone booth—an old fashioned one that had the doors that would pull closed around you. It was ornate and spacious and provided just enough privacy.

"Occasionally. I only have a few minutes but..."

"I love you," she cut him off, her body folding over, her hands rubbing at her eyes, not caring in the least that she was smearing her eye makeup.

"Oh baby I love you too," his voice was low, soft. Maddie nodded, unable to speak for a moment; the lump in her throat constricting. She took a deep breath and let it out slowly. Harry knew this was hard for her, so he continued. "I saw that Khenda and Collins moved to France."

"Mmm Hmm," Maddie nodded, pulling it together.

"And you went to see them. How is she doing? How's the baby?"
"She's doing so well," Maddie smiled; her breathing leveling out as she thought of their friends. "She looks amazing and the baby is doing great. She's the most adorable pregnant woman I've ever seen. And Collins is just...beside himself."

"I would imagine," Harry laughed.

"Wait, how did you know that I saw them..." Maddie thought it over for a split second and then, her edge returned. "You saw it, didn't you?"

"The article that said you were sleeping with Collins?" He raised his eyebrows. "I heard about it."

"Assholes," she groaned. "I don't think I've ever wanted to pummel somebody as much as I did that day."

"Don't worry, love. When I come home, we'll go to Paris and I'll kiss Collins on the mouth. We'll see what they write then." Maddie burst out laughing at the image, the tears squeezing from her eyes.

"It's okay, my fans were all over it..."

"Good."

"I miss you Harry." Her voice was softer this time, she was calmer. "Are you being safe?"

"I am."

"You're coming home to me?"

"And those eight babies," he laughed and she sighed. "Are you doing okay Maddie? I know the press and the paps and...I know it's been hard. You okay?"

"I am," she nodded, her fingers lifting to play with the pendant on her necklace. "Though your Valentine's gift nearly took me down."

"You liked it?"

"I loved it," she sighed; leaning back against the wall of the booth. "I love it."

"Tell me what your day was like," Harry's voice was low as he made the request.

"My day? It was incredibly dull compared to yours I would imagine," she smiled sadly at the thought of what his day might have looked like. "I'll bore you to tears."

"Maybe," Harry shrugged. "Maybe I just really want to hear your voice..." He trailed off and she nodded.

"I woke up an hour earlier than I set my alarm clock for," she began; more than eager to meet his request. "I mean an entire hour. I'm not sure what's working against me lately, but that is just too early..." She heard him chuckle and continued talking. She would tell him every single detail of every single day if he asked her too. "For breakfast I had..."

~~~~~~~~~~~~

When Maddie emerged from the phone booth ten minutes later, she felt so many different things. She was happy she was able to speak to him, damaged that she had to let him go. She was refreshed and ready to face the remaining 69 days, yet she was tired from the major emotions that she was juggling. Stuffing her phone back into her clutch, she glanced down the hallway in search of a bathroom to check her makeup.

"Ahem." She turned to her left, towards the sound and her smile returned.

"Bishop."

"When you ran out, I was worried it might be bad," he pushed off of the wall he was leaning on and made his way towards her. "When you were in there on the phone for ten minutes, I figured you were fine. But I stuck around on the off chance you might come out of that phone booth dressed like Superman."

"Superman?" She arched an eyebrow.

"Yes!" Bishop nodded. "Clark Kent went into the phone booth and Superman came out."

"Ah...sorry," she waved her hand down at her dress. "No such luck."

"Oh well," he shrugged, reaching into his suit pocket and handing her his handkerchief.

"It was Harry," she confessed, taking it from him and dabbing at her eyes.

"Yeah?" Bishop's face lit up and it hit Maddie—here was Bishop, taking care of her, looking after her. Yet in reality, he had known Harry much longer, he had been Harry's best friend years and years before Maddie even came along. They were family. And she suddenly felt a bit foolish, and embarrassed for being so selfish with her emotions.

"Yeah," she nodded, linking her hand through his arm. "He's doing really well and he told me to give you this," with a twinkle in her eye, she tilted up and kissed his cheek. Bishop smiled down at her and patted her hand.

"I appreciate the gesture, but I know Harry very well. There is no way he told you to kiss me."

"He did!" She insisted, her eyes shifting slightly.

"Oh-kay," Bishop laughed; not believing her for a second.

"Listen, what do you say we miss the end of this show and I take you out on the town?"

"Out on the town?" Bishop perked up.

"Drinks, dancing..." Maddie shrugged. "I don't have anywhere to be. Do you?"

"I suppose not," he shook his head and began walking towards the coat check. "Though you do know if we're seen out at a club tonight, they are definitely going to write about it tomorrow."

"I do," Maddie nodded and sighed. "Five bucks says I'm the one that tips them our location." With a wink and a grin, she stepped in front of him, offering the attendant her numbered ticket. Maddie didn't care what they wrote about her, she and Bishop were in the same boat. They both loved Harry and, after hearing from him, after feeling secure in his safety for the day, they both needed a little night out.

The next day, she increased her hours volunteering at St. Joe's; eager to give more to the men and women who were coming home. Hearing Harry's voice had propelled her forward; towards doing more. And that was just the place to focus her attention.

Day 72
Day 72 was Maddie's lowest point of Harry's entire deployment. Since her night at the Opera with Bishop, the night Harry called, Maddie found that she was navigating the days a little better. It wasn't easier—it wasn't as though she was ever rid of the constant reminder that he was gone—but she was growing more adept at handling it.

With the exception of Day 72.

To be fair, it had started off pretty rough. Maddie slept through her alarm clock; rushing about to dress and make it to the hospital in time for meetings. She missed her morning coffee, she missed her morning pastry, and she missed the memo that said that lightly scattered showers in London actually meant torrential downpour. She had her umbrella, she had her raincoat and her rain boots, and she had the biggest mess of frizzy hair she had seen in years.

All she wanted to do was sink into Harry's bathtub—with Harry—in the hottest water she could handle and then crawl into Harry's bed—again, with Harry—and spend the day snuggling up in the comfort and luxury she always felt in his arms. But her day had different plans for her. The hospital was slightly organized chaos from the moment she stepped in to the moment she stepped out—and when she finally stepped out, she knew she would need assistance in shutting her brain off, in coming down from the craziness that had permeated her entire being. So she did what any smart gal would do; she called Bishop and Ella. And in less than an hour, they all met at Leo's. Sean and Kiki were already there, sitting at their booth off in the back.

"Finally." Maddie sighed her first bit of relief of the day, sinking into her spot next to Sean with a smile on her face. It had been a crazy day, but it had been productive—at least she was proud of that. Bishop and Ella were right behind her and Leo made it a point to stop by; kissing each and every one of them. The restaurant was full, the TVs over the bar were broadcasting a Football game—though Maddie would forever refer to it as Soccer—of two highly competitive rivals. Though Leo's establishment was typically catered to a less rowdy group of people, the game was a big one and it was generating quite the customer base. The mood was excited, the people spirited, and the place was absolutely packed.

There was something about it all that reminded her of home; that reminded her of drinking beer with her cousins and watching an American Football game; cheering and screaming and cutting loose from the tensions of the week. As she finished her second beer, she grew silent; her mind processing through her day—shutting the door on her caseload, closing out metaphorical files; allowing her to step away from work and into her private life—a skill that would serve her well in her future at Harry's side.

They were well into their fourth round, laughing and sighing, having just finished dinner, when Day 72 became the darkest day on the calendar.

"Oh my God!" Maddie heard one of the University students call out in a tone that was clearly not football related. Not two seconds later there was this loud, collective gasp coming from all around her; a few more gasps.

"Did somebody win?" Maddie's eyebrows rose, looking over her glass at Sean across the table; whose face had drained of all color. "What is it?" Maddie turned around in the booth before anyone even thought of answering her.

And there, on every TV in the place was Harry's picture. The anchor was cutting into the game to bring them all breaking news. Harry's picture held pride of place while in the corner, old b-roll footage of the war in Afghanistan. And then, the anchor, with a sad, stoic look in his eyes reported,

"For the first time in its existence, a British manned Apache helicopter has been shot down in Afghanistan. While the DOD has not yet commented on this breaking news, we first received word of it from the Taliban, who has been quick to claim responsibility...and to announce..." The anchor took a breath. "That they have, indeed, captured Prince Harry of Wales..." Though the anchor continued talking; explaining in more detail the news they were hearing and the sources from which they were hearing it, Maddie heard none of it. People around them began to groan, crying out at the news; removing their hats. But Maddie's hearing had faded, her ability to breathe had been hindered. She turned in the booth, turning back to her friends, with a slow, methodic shake of her head.

"No..." She whispered. "No. They would have called me if...they...." Her eyes met Bishop's and she saw a shattered, broken man looking back at her. "No." She told him; stern and angry. "He swore that if something happened, I wouldn't see it on the news. They would have called me before. Don't you get it? I wouldn't find out like this. I...." Maddie pulled out her cell phone; checking and re-checking and checking again. She had no missed calls, no messages. "See!" She held the phone out to her friends who were not easily convinced. And the frantic look in her eyes gave tell; she wasn't either.

The room, once lively with slightly drunken sports fans, calling out to the TV, calling out to their rivals, had grown quiet. Now all that could be heard was the voice from the same anchor and the University girls at the table behind them who were crying into their drinks. The nation already slipping into mourning.

Maddie shook her head, her mind refusing the tears in her eyes and she wanted to hit them. To shake them. Harry wasn't captured. He wasn't shot down. She would know that. She would know that.

"Bishop," Maddie's voice croaked. "Look at me. They are wrong. They are. I..." She felt Ella's hand on her arm as Leo hurried up to the table, his eyes scattered, his hair mussed.

"I think you should come with me," though he spoke to the group, he looked directly at Maddie.

"Wha...why?" She looked up at him, her eyes filling with tears.

"Because this place is..." He glanced uneasily at the TV. "I don't know what's going on but if that's..." He shook his head. "If people see you here they are going to be all over you in seconds. You need to come with me right now."

"He's right," Bishop nodded; pulling his voice from somewhere deep inside. "Come on. Give me your hand." He reached across the table and nodded to her.

"This is ridiculous. This is...."

"He wouldn't want you sitting here for this Maddie." Bishop's voice was firm; his eyes set on her. "He wouldn't want you to..." Maddie's hand fell into his then; both of them unable to continue with the line of thought he was heading down. She pressed her lips together and nodded and then, without another word, the group was up and moving. They followed Leo through the place, down a hallway, behind the scenes of the action. Rounding a corner, he pushed open the door to his office and stood aside, allowing all of them to enter. As the door shut behind them, Kiki let out a cry; her eyes welling over.

"What the hell is going on right now?" She was shaky; afraid.

"I don't know," Bishop shook his head, pulling his own phone out to dial.

"Here..." Leo went to the TV in his office and flipped it on; Harry flashed to the screen in an instant. This time he was in that unmistakable camouflage, walking with his squadron. Maddie felt her stomach turn.

"Shut it off," she whispered, her eyes full of water. "Shut it off! I don't want to see this. I don't want to hear that! Don't you understand? Before Harry left, his father swore that if something happened to him he would tell me himself! He wouldn't let me hear about it in a bar...Harry would never let me hear something like this in a bar...don't you..." She looked at their faces then, looked into their eyes. Not one of them believed her; not one of them wasn't crying. Her eyes flew away from them then, looking to the TV. Her heart slowly fell, straight out of her chest and onto the floor. "Please..." She begged Leo in a breathless voice. "Please turn this off. I can't..."

And then, with a sound louder than the pounding in her ears, her cell phone rang in her hands. With wide, terrified eyes, she looked down at the ID.

CoW. It read. Charles of Wales—her code name for Charles.

And whatever force had been keeping her tears at bay, gave in—surrendering to the flood that tumbled from her eyes.

"I can't," she shook her head, holding her phone out away from her; not wanting to hold it, not wanting to look at it. "Please..."

"Stop," Ella's voice spoke up, moving to her best friend as she wiped at her own tears. She stepped right up to her, taking her face in her hands and forcing her to look at her. "In through the nose, out through the mouth." Maddie shook her head, but Ella remained firm. "You need to answer that call Madeline. You need to know what he has to tell you. Now take a breath through your goddamned nose and let it out through your mouth!" The room was stunned at her words, at her force. But it worked. Maddie did exactly as she was told. She breathed twice and then, her hand clutching to Ella, she answered her phone.

"This is Maddie," she whispered. Harry's friends, her friends, watched on pins and needles as Maddie listened to Harry's father; his heavy, warm voice.

"Madeline, it's Charles," she held her breath and squeezed her eyes shut. "Harry is fine. He's on the ground, secured at the base. I spoke to him myself two minutes ago. I swear to you. Harry is fine. Madeline, do you hear me?" They watched as she heard his words, watched as she pressed a hand to her mouth and nodded; tears toppling from her closed eyes. "Madeline?"

"Yes," she croaked; her eyes opening to look to his friends, their friends. "They're wrong. It's not him. It's...he's fine. Harry's fine." Kiki let out a cry while Leo's hand slapped his wall in relief.

"I apologize that I wasn't able to reach you before now. We were not informed of the incident until after the press had been informed and made the decision to go with the...news." His disdain was clear in his tone. "I had to make a few phone calls, I had to be sure before I called you. The Ministry of Defence is going to correct this after they contact the families of the men who were injured, but I wanted to get to you first. Please know that, had I any control over this, I absolutely would have brought you in before it hit. You do know that, don't you?"

"I..." She cleared her throat. "Yes."

"Are you alone right now?"

"No," she shook her head, a grin spreading over her face as she watched them hug each other. "I'm...I'm with our friends."

"Would you like me to send for you? You can stay here if you like...or I can call Thomas and have him open up Harry's place at Kensington?" Maddie's eyes flooded again at his words. And she loved him. She loved him so much that she considered going to him, just so she could crawl into his lap and hug him for being so considerate of what she might need—even in a moment that must have been gut wrenching for him.

"No, thank you though."

"Maybe a weekend at Highgrove?"

"Definitely," she nodded; trying to gain control of her emotions so she could pass the news onto their friends.

"I'll call you to set it up," he sighed deeply. "Please take care of yourself Madeline. I promise, this will not happen again."

"Thank you sir," her voice was tired; haggard.

"Good night dear."

"Goodnight," Maddie sniffed and disconnected the phone; meeting Ella's eyes. Her voice cracked as she joined their excitement. "It's not him. It's not him. Harry's fine." And then, because she couldn't stand on her own any longer, she flung her arms around Ella's neck and let her sobs take over. The relief in the room was palpable as even Bishop shed a few tears.

"Are you sure?" He asked Maddie when she began to pull back from Ella. "Madeline. Are you positive?"

"Yes."

"But the TV, they are still reporting. They..." Bishop was more scattered than Maddie had ever seen him.

She moved then, taking his face in her hands. "Charles spoke to him himself just before he called me. There's going to be an announcement. There were no deaths but there were some injuries and the MOD wants to contact the families of the men who were actually shot down. But he swore...Harry is fine." Bishop's eyes lit up, his face brightened and, acting on adrenaline alone, he pulled Maddie into his arms; kissing her cheek three times before pressing her head to his shoulder in a hug.

They stayed there in that office, all together—hugging and laughing—until the news corrected their mistake. Maddie could only imagine the amount of flack the press was going to take the next day, the way the world would look at these journalists who jumped, gunning to be the first to report, the way the public would revolt. But that night, she didn't care too much. When they emerged back into the main bar area, the patrons had swung back from their depressive state and a celebration had ensued. Bishop tried to talk her into staying, into having a bottle of champagne with him—but she insisted that he stay with the group and tie one on. It's what Harry would want. So she kissed her friends, hugged them tight and—with Leo's assistance—she snuck out the back door and headed home.

There were a few extra paps across the street from her place when her cab pulled up. Holding her head high, she smiled a small smile and stepped out of the car. If there were going to be photos of her floating around after the incident, she wanted them to see the side of her that was saddened by the news but relieved it wasn't Harry; the side that wasn't rattled to the core.

She didn't want them to see the side of her that came out the second she shut and locked the door behind her; the side that fell apart. Allowing her tears to flow freely, she took a hot bath, she put on her pajamas—his shirt, his socks—and she crawled in her bed; pulling the comforter up and over her head.

Day 72 was over and it had taken its toll on her. She was happy it was over. She was happy he was okay.

She was deliriously happy.

AND.

And there were still 48 more days to go. This wasn't over yet. Not by a long shot.
Day 74

On Day 74 Maddie finally fell asleep. It had taken 46 hours and a trip to Highgrove, but she finally fell asleep. The night of the Apache incident, Maddie had gone home and had every intention of sleeping away the anxiety and fear left behind from those few minutes she thought the news could be right. But once she hit the pillow, her mind woke up; processing the moment over and over and over and over again; making her stomach turn, making her brain go wild. And she was wide awake.

For two days.

On the second day, Charles called her to extend an invitation to Highgrove for the weekend. Deciding that time away was exactly what she needed, Maddie agreed. So, after packing up her things and an easy drive into the country, she was being greeted by Charles and Camilla at the door to the beautiful estate Maddie had fallen in love with some time ago. It was late in the evening but they had waited to have dinner with her. As they ate Maddie decided that at some point in their lives, Charles and Camilla must have been pulled aside and schooled on the fine art of conversation because they kept the conversation flowing and lively, despite Maddie’s lackluster alertness. After dinner, Camilla suggested Charles and Maddie have hot tea in the den while she returned a phone call to her daughter. Pleased to spend time with Harry’s father, she followed him willingly. Taking her seat on the chair opposite his, she tucked a blanket around her legs and breathed in the fresh, country air.

She could listen to him talk for hours; he was so much like Harry. She wondered if it would be strange if she asked him to read to her. Deciding it would, she just smiled and continued to ask questions about his favorite topic; the grounds around them. And he kept right on talking.

Charles wasn’t daft. And he wasn’t blind. He could see her drifting long before she knew she was drifting. Her eyelids were heavy; the beats between blinking lasting longer and longer. He could see how hard this had been on her; Harry’s deployment, the attack. His heart ached for her; for his son. He had never had daughters, though he now considered Kate one of his own, but his heart ached for Maddie in a way he imagined her father’s would have were he there to see her like this.

"Madeline," his voice was syrupy as he leaned forward in his chair. She opened her eyes and nodded her acknowledgement; a bob of her head. "Perhaps it’s time for us to retire." He included himself, suspecting she wouldn’t be easy to convince.

"Maybe..." Maddie sighed with a sleepy smile. "Maybe you’re right." So she rose to her feet and let him hug her tight.

"Good night darling," he was sweet with her; comforting.

"Good night sir," Maddie smiled sweetly and stepped away from him; not thinking twice about the blanket that she had wrapped around herself. Passing Camilla on the way towards the stairs, she said goodnight and continued on.

When Maddie stepped into the room she usually took when they stayed at Highgrove, she was shocked to find the room empty; devoid of her belongings. Though she generally ended up in the same bed with Harry, her things were always in here. Stepping out, she looked up and down the hallway. Was she really that tired? Had she passed her usual room? She glanced back inside; finding the settee that Harry had christened with her on one particular drunken night. No, this was the right room. Flipping on the lights, she crossed the room, opening the bureau. The staff normally unpacked her things, turned on lights, warmed up the room...but none of that had happened. And her things were nowhere to be found.

Stepping back out of the room, Maddie made her way back downstairs, hoping to find an answer.

"Everything okay?" Charles called to her as she stepped off the last of the stairs.

"I..." She shook her head with a chuckle. "I thought that I would be in the same room, but my things aren't in there. I guess I've been moved?"

"Ah yes," he nodded. "I'm sorry. I suppose I should have asked you first. I thought you might be more comfortable in Harry's room this weekend."

"Oh?" Maddie's voice croaked; her eyes filling up.

"I hope that's okay. If it isn't, I can have your things moved right away..." He moved to stand.

"No, no," she held her hand out. "It's okay. It's...it's very okay. Thank you." She bit at her lip, her hand moving to her heart as she smiled at him. "Good night."

"Sleep well dear," he returned her smile; her connection. Without another word, Maddie returned upstairs; to Harry's room.

Pushing the door open, she felt instantly more at ease—because she was surrounded by him. She shut the door behind her and stepped inside. The staff had unpacked her things in Harry's space and it was the sweetest combination of his life and her things and it made her tired eyes swell. Bless Charles for thinking of this, for knowing this might be something she wanted; something she needed.

She moved around his room slowly, shedding her blanket and looking for her pajamas. In her search, she opened a drawer full of crisply pressed and folded shirts. Giggling at the tight, clean lines, she knew this was the work of the staff. No way did Harry put so much care and precision into the ironing and folding of what were essentially t-shirts. Her fingers ran along the edges and she was surprised by the soft fabric. She pulled one of them from the drawer, letting it unfold as she held it up. A smile spread across her face. It was a white "Walking With The Wounded" t-shirt she was certain she had seen pictures of Harry in while throwing out the first pitch when the Mets played the Twins. Tossing her blouse to the side, she removed her bra and pulled this t-shirt over her head; basking in the comfy warmth it provided. It smelled slightly of him; the same detergent, the same softener. She wondered, only briefly, what he might have to say about her going through his drawer, taking his things. And then she shrugged. If he wanted her to give him eight babies, he could handle her taking one of his t-shirts. A wide smile spread across her face as her body pushed out a yawn.

Standing, she let her pants pool around her feet, pulling off her stockings and leaning to open another drawer. Finding a pair of boxers with a tiny red pinstripe and a polo player in the corner, she pulled them on; followed by the pair of polo socks she had taken with her on Day 1—socks she had worn almost every day since. Catching herself in the mirror, she couldn't help but laugh. What a site she was; exhausted and frazzled and dressed in his clothes—all too big for her. He would love to see this, she thought. Reaching for her phone she snapped a picture. Maybe she would show him someday. Titling the photo Day 74, she plugged her phone in, turned off the lights, and crawled into his bed—her body letting go of the tension, relaxing more and more with every move she made.

She snuggled into his bed; letting him surround her. Closing her eyes she let her sleep deprived brain drift to thoughts of him. Her senses followed close behind. She was in his clothes, in his bed; and everything around her had the faint, soft smell that was almost him. Close enough that it made her long for him next to her. If she was quiet enough, she could bring his voice to her mind, almost hearing him. If she closed her eyes tight enough, she could almost feel his hands on her.

God she missed him. She stretched out; flexing her muscles, settling further into his bed. Sighing, she let out more tension; her lips curling up into a smile. The memories came easier to her as she relaxed and let her mind wander. She pulled up his smile, his laughter, the way his eyes twinkled when he was messing with her. She pulled up his kisses, his touch, the way he would drive her mad in the most delicious way possible.

God she missed him. Her hands bunched up his sheets, her entire body sighing as she let him wash completely over her. The tension flooded from her and suddenly, unexpectedly, she felt...calm; peaceful, comforted. Her eyes fluttered open and she looked out into his room; her cheeks warm. She felt at home here; amongst his things—amongst his memory.

And then it was there, in Harry's room, wrapped in his bedding, head stuffed into his pillow—that she finally fell asleep.

Day 93

On Day 93, Maddie stood at the summit of Pen Y Fan in Wales; her hands stretched out to the sun, her arms welcoming the spring air. She had talked to her cousin Kyle two days ago and she had confessed; she felt claustrophobic—cooped up. But there was nowhere for her to go. She was working, she was volunteering and the press was all over her again. So he told her about Pen Y Fan. His college roommate had been from Ireland and was an avid traveler and outdoorsman. Kyle had called him up and he had recommended the hike, and the view, quite highly.

Two days, one trip to the bookstore, and a train ride to Wales later, Maddie had arrived to the trailhead early in the morning. It was foggy and dewy, but the weather had been warmer lately and she had faith that it would pull through to be a decent day. As she pulled on her backpack, her stocking cap and the ridiculous union jack mittens Harry had gone back to purchase for her so many months ago, Maddie began the journey.

She had given some thought, in that moment, that it may have been a good idea to bring along a hiking partner. But Collins was in France, preparing for a new baby, Ella wasn't even close to a fan of hiking, and though Bishop would have come with her, she wouldn't have been able to process correctly with the jokes and the flask that followed him wherever he went.

So she went alone. It wasn't the first time she had gone alone and she hoped that it wouldn't be the last.

About half way in, she met some other hikers. They were friendly and funny and took to her quite easily. With her hair pulled back under her hat, her sunglasses blocking her eyes, and the incredibly dressed down clothing, nobody seemed to recognize her. Maddie chuckled, either that or they are completely normal people who couldn't care less who she was sleeping with. They were Welsh; clearly. Their accent and language quickly tipped her off. But the moment they learned that she only spoke English, they switched over; giving her tips about the hike, information about the area. They walked with her along the path and they even taught her a few choice words that she would hold in her mind for when Harry returned.

They let her sit with them while they all ate lunch. They let her take their picture as a group at a particularly beautiful spot along the way. And, as they neared the summit, when she grew quiet and introspective, they let her wander away from them, literally and metaphorically, without any hurt feelings or issues. That was the thing that most hikers understood—sometimes this journey was a group journey and sometimes it was a solo one; and it was perfectly acceptable to float between the two.

When she reached the top, she walked as close to the edge as she could get, inching closer and closer until she felt the air hit her before it hit the cliff. Pulling her bag from her shoulders, she lowered herself to the ground next to it. And there she sat; looking out over the beautiful landscape—the massive expanse of it all. She took deep, cleansing breaths while her muscles relaxed, while they processed the pounding she had just handed them. She loved this part; the largeness of it all. It made her feel small in comparison; humble.

Her mind wound around itself in thought; thinking of him, of the marble in her pocket, of the thirty-four days left until she saw him again. She thought of what that moment would be like. Would she cry? Would she crumble? Would she fling herself into his arms or be stunned motionless? Her mind settled on him and she worried. What was he doing in this exact moment? Was he safe? Was he headed into danger? Was he counting down the days to his return or was that too much to handle while he was there? Would he be the same man when he returned as he was when he left? Was anyone the same when they returned from war?

She knew the answer to that question. She had worked with too many returning soldiers, with too many survivors of trauma not to know the answer to that question.

Though she had never been particularly religious, she had grown up believing in God—in something higher and grander than anything here on Earth. She looked out over the vast beauty before her and, with open eyes, she said a prayer; a prayer for his safety, a prayer for his return, a prayer for her patience and understanding.

She didn't know how long she sat there. She hadn't brought a watch. This hike wasn't about time; it was barely about the summit. It was about getting out, sweating out the stress; processing her feelings. So, when she finally stood, pulling her pack onto her back and, with one last look—burning it into her brain—she turned and began her descent.

That night she stayed in Wales. She found a cozy inn. She bought pajamas from a local store and, from the recommendations of the group she had hiked with, she ate an amazing dinner. As she drifted to sleep that night, she made a mental note; she was bringing Harry here someday—Harry and their eight little babies. She laughed out loud as she thought of it. If they added some lederhosen and a bit of music, they would look like the Von Trapps. Maybe they would have to only have four.

Day 107

Day 107 was a bit of a blur; a champagne infused blur. And it all began with the Duchess of Cambridge. In Maddie's entire life, she never would have imagined that agreeing to attend a cousin's baby shower with Harry's sister-in-law would turn out to be the intoxicated adventure it ended up as. But Kate had called two days before the event, imploring her to come along with her. William was originally going to attend but had been called away to duty, Pippa was in the US, and Kate did not want to face her cousin's friends all alone. Maddie had initially put up a fight, not wanting to be the awkward third wheel—but when Kate quietly admitted that seeing her cousin pregnant was difficult for her while she and Will and been trying so hard to no avail, she won her over. So, on Day 107 Maddie put on the frilliest dress in her closet, pinned her hat on her head and, when Kate showed up at her door with her detail, she smiled and invited them in. It wasn't the only time they had seen each other during Harry's deployment, but it was certainly the craziest night they had.

"You know, I could have just come down."
"Yes, I know," Kate nodded, watching while her body man finished checking Maddie's place before nodding his okay and stepping out. "But..." Kate stepped inside and shut the door behind her as she reached into her large bag. "We can't very well drink this in the car, now can we?"

"No," Maddie smirked at the bottle of champagne in Kate's hand. "We're going to drink champagne before we go to a baby shower?"

"Yes," the tall brunette walked past her into the living room. "You know, I don't believe I've ever been to your place."

"You haven't," Maddie shook her head; reaching for two glasses before joining Kate where she stood in front of the fireplace.

"It's cute," Kate's smile was genuine as she looked around. "I like it."

"Thank you," Maddie held up the glasses.

"Ah yes," Kate pulled the bottle up; expertly working the cork and popping it open. Pouring the two glasses, she sat the bottle down on the coffee table and took a glass from Maddie.

"Should we toast to your cousin?" Maddie raised her eyebrows.

"Nah," Kate shook her head; nose crinkled. "There will be enough toasting to her today."

"Oh-kay," Maddie chuckled. "What shall we drink to?"

"Being able to drink," Kate smirked, thought Maddie was certain she saw something else behind the joke. "How about we drink to you?"

"Me?" Maddie was shocked.

"Yes, you." Kate laughed. "You agreed to come with me to this abhorrent shower. You're going to be bombarded with her University friends asking about Harry and...and you didn't even question my bringing a bottle of champagne to your house at ten in the morning. You just went for glasses..." Kate looked oddly at the glass in her hand. "Come to think of it, why didn't you question the bottle of champagne I brought to your house at ten in the morning?"

"I don't know," Maddie grinned as she shrugged. "It's just...we're dressed up like...cupcakes..." Kate laughed. "We're going to a baby shower for a woman I don't know with women you apparently do not like and...you're the Duchess of Cambridge...with a bottle of champagne at ten in the morning. Who says no to that?"

"Who indeed," Kate grinned; liking the answer. Holding her glass out to clink against Maddie's she took a small sip and sighed. "Thank you for coming with me to the shower."

"You're welcome," Maddie met her eyes. "I'm happy you thought you could ask."

"Well, we're going to be sisters someday, no?" Kate's eyes sparked with defiance as her face stayed calm; innocent. But Maddie caught it and shook her head with a chuckle.

"Oh no. It may not be too early in the morning for champagne, but it is definitely too early in the morning for that," she drained her glass and sat it on the table. "We should get going."

"We should," Kate nodded; following suit. "And don't worry. They day is long, I have plenty of champagne and we'll be getting back to that soon enough."
"Can't wait," Maddie grumbled, reaching for her bag and following Kate out the door.

Kate had been right though; the shower was a lot to handle. She had called ahead days ago and the group was expecting Maddie to be there. They were warm, they were inviting. Samantha, the pregnant cousin, was incredibly sweet and gracious. In fact, everyone had been incredibly gracious at Maddie's presence; making her feel welcome and part of the group instead of out of place and awkward. Of course, there was the other side to the women; the side that knew who Kate and Maddie were. Though some of them had grown more accustomed to seeing Kate at such functions, none of them were used to seeing Maddie. And, being just a girlfriend and not in the limelight, she seemed a bit more allusive; a bit more mysterious. So these women, who were normally high functioning productive members of society, found themselves in this strange space where they giggled nervously, where they asked about some of the things they had read that they might not normally give the time of day; where they asked about Harry and how he was doing—as if they knew him. Maddie tried her best to smile and nod and answer as simply and sweetly as possible. And Kate, bless her soul, would step in as often as she could to help divert the interrogation. And when the hostess offered them both a white wine spritzer—well, it would have been rude to refuse.

As was expected, the attention eventually turned to Samantha; the gracious expectant mother. Maddie knew right away that she was expecting a baby girl as the entire room they were in was drenched in shades of pink. Even Maddie, who had always been a fan of the color, was finding it a bit much to handle. For the most part, all of the women had babies or were having babies or were trying to talk their husbands into having babies. It was baby overload and suddenly, Maddie understood. Kate and William were trying to have a baby and had yet to be successful. This was a little too much baby for Kate to tackle alone. So she brought along Maddie; Maddie who wasn't even married yet, Maddie who was far away from baby.

Three spritzers later, Maddie sat on the loveseat in the living area, watching with a grin as the hostess arranged items for the next in the long line of ridiculous shower games they were playing. Returning from the restroom, Kate slipped into her spot next to her with a smile that was simultaneously sympathetic and thankful. Maddie was instantly warmed by the fact that Kate thought of her as a sort of confidant; leaning closer to her as the ladies took their seats.

"Oh my God," Kate groaned under her breath as she sat; smile still characteristically in place. "Why didn't I stuff that bottle of champagne in my purse?!

"I don't know," Maddie tried to hide her cringe with a warm smile of her own. "I never thought I would say this...but I wish Bishop were here."

"Bishop?" Kate's exterior cracked for a moment in confusion. "Why Bishop?"

"Because," Maddie sighed, reaching for her spritzer. "That evil genius takes a flask with him wherever he goes."

"Ha!" Kate let out a laugh. "What a grand idea. I should seriously consider that."

"You really should." Maddie agreed, clinking her glass to Kate's as the hostess took center stage and called them to attention.

As the party drew to a close, Kate rose to her feet and insisted they must be on their way; gesturing for Maddie to join her. Samantha followed them both to the door, offering kisses and hugs and apologies for some of the questions and awe her friends had brought with them. Both Kate and Maddie shook their heads and insisted it wasn’t an issue. Maddie thanked her for the last minute invitation and Samantha thanked her for the collection of classic children's books that she brought as a gift. And then, with one final wave from the Duchess, the two of them were back in the reprieve that the car provided.

"Wow..." Maddie breathed as the car pulled out into the street. "What a day."

"The funny part is how you think the day is over," Kate's eyes sparkled; her lips pulling into a smirk.

"It's not?"

"No," she shook her head. "I've decided that I want more champagne. Champagne, music and...a girls' day. What do you say, Madeline? Do you have other plans?"

"I..." Maddie pretended to think it over; her lips pressing together. "Nope. I have nothing else planned. Except...I kind of want to take this hat off." Her fingers snuck up her head, scratching at an itch that hid underneath it and, for reasons beyond Maddie's understanding at that point, Kate burst into an almost uncontrollable laughter.

"You want to take the hat off...." She wiped at her eyes daintily. "Oh wow. We have such a fascinating road ahead of us, don't we." She asked nobody in particular. "Okay...now. We could go out?"

"We could," Maddie nodded; her mind tossing it around. "Though you are pretty tipsy..."

"Who me?" Kate pressed her fingers to her chest in mock horror. "What if we go to your place?"

"My place?" Maddie was surprised. "You want to come to my place?"

"Why not? You have champagne there."

"And wine," Maddie pointed out.

"We can order pizza," Kate suggested.

"Okay," Maddie shrugged. "Let's go to my place."

Maddie had always known that there was a lot about Catherine, the Duchess of Cambridge, that she did not know. She also figured that, as she and Harry moved forward, she would grow to know more and more about this enigmatic woman. She had not, however, in a million years thought that this night would be the night where she would learn a great chunk of that information.

For instance, one of the first things she learned was that Kate liked to be called Kate—by close friends and family. Charles would always call her Catherine, because that was just how he spoke. But Harry, Camilla and William all called her Kate; as did her own family—unless they were trying to get under her skin. She also insisted that Maddie call her Kate—it reminded her of who she was; a girl, a woman with a husband and a home and desires and wants. Not just Her Royal Highness. Not just the future Queen Consort.

"You'll understand someday...Madeline," she had cooed with a wicked smug grin.

That was another thing Maddie had learned. Kate was funny; hilarious in fact. Maddie was in awe at how composed, how regal Kate could be on the surface, to the public and then how naughty she could turn at the drop of a hat. Or the draining of three bottles of wine. Either way, she had Maddie on her toes; laughing and crying and always on the lookout for her next strike.

"I like you," Kate confessed nonchalantly as she tipped the last of the bottle into her glass and sat it on the table with a thud.

"I like you too," Maddie giggled into her glass.

"No. I like you. I really do," Kate sighed into her seat. "Not just in the way I'm supposed to like the woman that Harry marries. Not just in the way that I can handle sitting next to you at family events or making joint speeches with you at openings and..."

"Don't you think you're getting a little ahead of yourself?" Maddie cut in.

"Am I?" Kate raised her eyebrows; swallowing some wine before she moved to sit more upright, bringing her hand out to hold up fingers as she made her points. "Let's take a look, shall we? Harry's met your family, no?"

"No...I mean. I mean yes. He's met my family. But..."

"No buts. Let me finish," Kate's eyes narrowed as she raised another finger. "You've met Harry's family." Maddie nodded. "You've met Granny. For tea. At Buckingham." Maddie swallowed more wine as Kate rolled her eyes in her direction. "I was with Will for years before I met Gran." Holding up another finger. "Harry's spoken to the press about you...Are you denying any of this?"

"Of course not," Maddie shrugged. "It's all happened. What do you want from me?"

"I want you to stop rolling your eyes when I say you're going to be family. I want you to stop dodging the discussion. I want you to stop pretending that he's just another boyfriend because we both know he isn't. And we both know where this is headed. And the sooner you accept that, the sooner you accept that I know that...the quicker we can move past the bullshit and really be friends."

"Wow..." Maddie blinked; unfazed. "You kiss the future King of England with that mouth?"

There was a beat, a moment of silence, when Maddie thought that maybe, maybe she had gone too far. And then, without even flinching, Kate reached for her glass and nodded.

"I do. Many, many times a day." Their stone expressions lasted only seconds before they both burst into laughter; loud, roaring laughter that came from plenty of booze and a deeper connection.

"Fine," Maddie sighed; her cheeks growing rosy as she thought of him. "You're right. He's not just another boyfriend."

"He's not."

"And, there's a good chance..."

"Good?"

"A pretty good chance..." It was all Maddie was willing to give at this point. Kate accepted it with a shrug. "That we're going to be family someday."

"See, now...was that so hard?" Kate's eyes grew wide.
"A little bit, yes," Maddie narrowed her eyes at her and rose to her feet, in search of another bottle of wine. "Do you find it at all disturbing that we're toasted at seven in the evening?"

"Not at all," Kate shook her head. "Do you find it at all disturbing that I desperately want to put on some pajamas?"

"Ha!" Maddie laughed from the kitchen. "In the back bedroom, third drawer down in the chest of drawers...take whatever you like," Kate jumped to her feet and hurried happily down the hallway to Maddie's room. Maddie opened another bottle of wine, refreshed both of their glasses and pulled off her stockings; with every intent on slipping into pajamas as soon as Kate returned.

"Guess what I found..." Kate's sing song voice called out as she rejoined Maddie in the living room. Maddie turned to look at her; her eyes scanning her over.

"Clearly not pants that fit," Maddie laughed at how short her pajama pants were on Kate. "What are you like an entire foot taller than I am?"

"Maybe," Kate shrugged; her hands tucked behind her back, a cat-like grin on her face. "I found something in your pajama drawer that I think could use a little explaining." Maddie blushed for only a second before she exhaled.

"It's a blindfold Kate. I'm sure you've seen one before."

"A..." Kate stammered, her mouth twitching as her hands came around from her back. "I was talking about this piece of candy stuffed into your socks..." She handed Maddie a piece of her Christmas candy and moved to sit next to her on the couch.

"Look at that..." Maddie's features grew soft as she turned the candy over in her fingers. "He must have stashed these everywhere before he left. I've been finding them for months."

"Blindfold?" Kate stayed on track.

"No, no," Maddie shook her head; holding out the candy. "You found candy. My favorite candy."

"Yeah, yeah," Kate waved her hand. "But you said there was..."

"There is..." Maddie corrected, unwrapping the candy and plopping it into her mouth. Kate watched her for a minute; contemplating her next move. Reaching for her glass, she took a sip and moved closer to Maddie.

"Okay...I'm just going to..." Kate cleared her throat and lowered her voice. "Can I ask you something?" Kate's lips twisted up in a Cheshire smile that made Maddie feel like she should watch for a pie to the face.

"Sure..." She giggled slightly; taking another drink.

"How is...it?" Her perfectly sculpted eyebrow shot up.

"How is it?" Maddie repeated. "The candy?"

"No!" Kate smacked her arm. "Not the candy. It."

"Are you asking me about sex right now?" Maddie held back laughter.

"Yes!" Kate's hands clapped together.

"With Harry? You're asking me how sex is with..." Maddie realized how loud her voice was and immediately quieted. "With Harry."

"Yes."

"Oh my God."

"What?" Kate's face was blank.

"Oh. My. God."

"What?" Kate laughed. "Tell me. Is he...wild?"

"What?!" Maddie burst out in laughter.

"I've always imagined him to be pretty...wild..." Kate shrugged, taking another drink.

"What?" Maddie couldn't shake the grin on her face, or the flush in her cheeks. "You've always imagined him?"

"Stop," Kate rolled her eyes. "Not like that. It's just that he's always been so frisky and randy and he has this quick wit, a sharp tongue." Her face grew smug and teasing. "I just thought he might be the same in bed."

"This is too much," Maddie's hands moved to her face. "I can't even..."

"Oh come on!" Kate nudged her with her toe. "You're an adult. You're a woman. You're a doctor. Is it really that difficult for you to talk about sex?"

"No!" Maddie shook her head. "I can talk about sex all night; all you want. It's just...sex with Harry." She took a breath; her heart needing a moment. "Sex with Harry is sacred. I don't discuss sex with Harry with...anyone. Nobody. Not even my best friend. And I trust her with my life."

"You don't want it to get out," Kate didn't need to ask. She knew.

"I really don't." And though Maddie knew Ella would never talk, she couldn't risk any accidents. Not with this.

"You can trust me, you know." Kate let the laughter in her eyes fade for a moment of solemnity. "I don't necessarily mean with this. I mean with...anything. You can trust me."

"Thank you," Maddie smiled; touched by her words.

"Do you remember Harry's birthday in Greece? When we were out on the yacht and I told you that Will and I were trying to get pregnant?"

"I do," Maddie nodded.

"You kept that completely to yourself."

"I did."

"You didn't have to," Kate waved her hand.

"I gave you my word that I would."

"You didn't even tell Harry," Kate still grew a little misty as she remembered.
"You asked me not too," Maddie shrugged. It really was as simple as that with her.

"And I trusted that you wouldn't. And it paid off. You didn't." Kate drained her glass. "And now I have a future sister who I can talk to about anything..." She sighed and smiled at Maddie. "Someday you'll feel that way about me. It will just take time. But when you're there, I'm ready. You can trust me too. Nobody on this entire island understands the...uniqueness...that comes with these boys better than I do." Maddie watched Kate for a moment; her mind pondering the discussion, her words. Taking a deep breath and a long drink from her glass, Maddie jumped in.

"He can be."

"Sorry?" Kate looked to her; confused.

"A little wild," Maddie offered; her lips stretching into a grin. "He's generally loving and attentive and...thorough. But there are times when he can be...a little wild."

"I knew it!" Kate clapped her hands together; her Cheshire grin returning. "Oh God how I miss the wild days."

"Miss them?" Maddie laughed. "What do you mean miss them?"

"Things aren't so wild at the Cambridge household," Kate's face fell slightly.

"No?"

"No," Kate sighed. "I swear, once you start trying to make a baby instead of prevent one...things get sort of...mechanical."

"Ah, don't feel bad," Maddie patted her knee. "With Harry in Afghanistan my wild nights have given way to me and my memories."

"Ha!" Kate laughed, though her mood remained the same. Her eyes shifted down to her fingers as they fidgeted together. Just as Maddie was going to open her mouth to ask what was going on, Kate continued on. "You know...they used to behead people around here."

"I'm sorry..." Maddie blinked at the strange segue. "What?"

"They did," Kate nodded; misreading Maddie's confusion. "It was before our time, but not terribly long ago. They would behead women who were unable to produce an heir to the crown."

And the entire mood in Maddie's place shifted.

"Whoa, hey..." She moved; sitting closer to Kate, reaching for her hand. "Come on now..."

"What if I can't do it?" Her dark eyes looked up to Maddie; wide and wet. "What if after all these years of trying not to get pregnant...I just can't?"

"I don't know..." Maddie shook her head. "But I really don't think William would have you beheaded."

"Yeah," Kate sighed. "You're probably right."

"Probably?" Maddie's forehead crinkled.

"I really only have one job, you know? In this marriage, I have one job and that is to produce an heir."
"That's not your only job," Maddie countered.

"It's the most important."

"No it's not," she shook her head. "I could argue that loving Will is the most important, loving yourself; taking care of your union..."

"Sure," Kate nodded. "You could argue that, but you would be wrong." She grew silent for a moment; pressing the palms of her hands into her eyes as the emotions rushed over her. "God Maddie. We've been trying for so long and I've been counting days and monitoring temperatures and telling him when we can and when we can't and...and it's not even fun anymore!"

"Kate..." Maddie's voice shook at the way she was crying; at the way this was hitting her. "It's okay. It's going to be okay..."

"But what if it's not?" She pulled her hands away from her face and looked at Maddie. "What if it's not okay? What if I can't get pregnant? Then what?"

"I don't know," Maddie shook her head. "I don't know. But I do know this. Will loves you. He clearly loves you."

"I know he does." Just the mention of him lowered the dam.

"And if you really can't have a baby," Maddie smoothed her hair away from her face. "Nobody...nobody is going to take your head off."

"Ha!" Kate laughed bitterly; wiping at her eyes.

"At least not literally..." Maddie added and Kate laughed at that too. Maddie reached for a box of tissues and handed them to her, letting her have a moment. "You know they say that sometimes the stress is too much. Maybe you need to get drunk, get him drunk; borrow my blindfold."

"Oh God!" Kate burst out then; wide, belly clenching laughter.

"What? It's fun."

"I believe you," Kate smiled; her laughter and her tears dying down a bit. She smiled across at Maddie; already feeling a bit better. Her mind shifted slightly; ready to move off topic. "You said...earlier...you said that Harry left you the candy I found in your sock."

"He did," Maddie nodded; her smile turning warm and gooey.

"Care to tell me the story behind that?" Kate snuggled into the chair as she waited.

"Sure," Maddie took a breath; allowing Kate to move them away from the topic. "When I first met Harry in Bendal, I gave him this tour and...he asked about my favorite candy and I told him it was these...these little minty, nougat, Christmas tree candies that my grandmother used to have at her house all of the time. They reminded me of my childhood, my family, Christmas. And...the next time he visited, he brought me an entire bag."

"He brought you a bag of your favorite childhood candy?" Kate's eyebrows went high.

"He did," Maddie nodded. "And now...now he keeps them everywhere. They are at his place at Kensington, I found some in a nightstand drawer at Highgrove. He has them in his pockets when we go out, he brings them when we hike. And, apparently, before he left, he stashed them in every little place he could think of...I'm guessing so that when I found them, I would think of "Wow..." Kate breathed. "Look at little Harry. He's a great listener, he's thoughtful, he's romantic. Who knew."

"Hmmm..." Maddie smiled; memories of him flooding her mind.

"You know what I want right now?" Kate's head tipped to the side as Maddie rose her eyebrows. "Ice cream. I really want some ice cream. Do you have any?"

"I don't," Maddie shook her head; she hadn't been to the store for a while.

"We could go get some," Kate suggested.

"Definitely. We should definitely do that. We're drunk, we're in pajamas and we're...well, you're you..." Maddie waved a hand to her. "We'll just walk on down to the store and get some ice cream. There's not chance the paps across the street will run that photo tomorrow."

"Fair point," Kate nodded; tapping her finger to her lips as she thought. "I got it!" Hurrying to her bag, she found her phone and dialed. While Kate spoke, Maddie hurried back to her room and slipped on some pajamas. When she returned, Kate was off the phone and refilling their glasses. "Ice cream is on its way," she announced.

"Really?" Maddie was surprised. "Please tell me you did not just call a staffer to make them bring us ice cream."

"I did not just do that," Kate smiled; sipping her drink. "I did the next best thing. I called my husband. He's on his way now." Maddie nearly spit her drink.

"You called your husband? And now he's on his way? To my house? With ice cream? The future King of England is bringing ice cream to my house."

"Yes," Kate nodded once. "Yes and yes. And why do you call him the future King of England?"

"Because he is." Maddie was going to need more wine.

"It still freaks you out a bit, no?"

"Yes." She was embarrassed to admit it.

"We're going to have to get you over that," Kate sighed, handing Maddie her glass. "We're really going to have to get you over that. Drink up."

It took him less than fifteen minutes to arrive at her door; ice cream in hand. Maddie, feeling more at ease after finishing her glass of wine, swung the door open; bending down in a curtsey to him as she did.

"Your Royal Highness," she grinned as Kate snickered behind her.

"Oh God," William knew instantly; he had walked into quite the show. Stepping into Maddie's place, he shut and locked the door behind him. Maddie returned to the living room to lay next to Kate on the couch. "You're smashed." He commented as he strolled casually through Maddie's place towards the kitchen.

"We are!" Kate called out with a grin. "Darling, did you know that Maddie refers to you as the
"We are!" Kate called out with a grin. "Darling, did you know that Maddie refers to you as the future King of England and you freak her out just a bit?!

"Hey!" Maddie nudged her in the ribs before calling out. "Do you know that Kate thinks your brother is randy in the sack?!"

"Hey!" Kate sat up.

"Okay now," William returned with three bowls; passing them around as he took their drunken state in stride. "Maddie, you really don't need to be so formal with me. Come on, we met when you were in the hospital recovering from gunshot wounds, we've had lunch. I like you. I trust you with my brother, with my drunken wife. No need to freak out." He winked at her and turned to his wife; kissing her hello. "And you. Randy? Harry? Really?"

"Ah!" Kate let out a puff of air. "For what it's worth, she agreed that he was."

"I did not!" Maddie defended. "I said he was thorough and..."

"Please for the love of God stop," William dropped his spoon in his bowl and held his hands to his ears; looking at Maddie as he spoke. "Right now, you remember that I am the future King of England and, I beg of you, stop talking about my brother in bed."

"Fine," Maddie huffed; her mouth hinting at the smile that was creeping onto all of the faces in the room. "Fine. I'll stop."

"Thank you," William smiled; lowering his hands and reaching for his spoon.

"Chicken," Kate looked to Maddie with a grin; egging her on.

"Hey Will," Maddie asked; her face remaining calm. "Can I ask you something?"

"Sure."

"Do they still behead people around here?" Kate's eyes snapped wide.

"What?" Will laughed. "Not really. Why? You have an ex-lover you want us to look into?"

"Maybe..." Maddie laughed; winking at Kate as they all relaxed. "No. I...Wait...hold on. I thought you were gone," she pointed to William who looked to Kate. "I thought you were gone and that's why she wanted me to go with her..." Maddie slowed down; her mind catching up. "You were lying." Her finger pointed to Kate.

"Me?" Her eyes widened as she took a spoonful of ice cream.

"You're checking up on me," she wagged her finger between the two of them. "Don't deny it."

"I won't," Will smiled. "We're checking up on you."

"Why?"

"Really Maddie?" He snickered and shrugged. "You know why." Without missing a beat, Maddie answered.

"Afraid I'm going to run off with Bishop?"

"Exactly," Will nodded; laughter flowing from both of them; both of them knowing how far from the truth that was.
"Sneaky, sneaky..." Maddie shook her head at them. "The Duke and Duchess of all kinds of sneakiness."

"Hey Maddie, can I ask you something?" Kate was looking up at her fireplace.

"Sure," Maddie blinked; her smile returning.

"Why are there two vases of marbles on your mantel?" All sets of eyes traveled to where Kate was looking as Maddie's tears returned.

"Well," she smiled; rising to her feet. "This one has a marble for every day that Harry has been gone.... And this one has a marble in it for every day before he's home." Her fingers fell down into her pocket, pulling out the marble she had carried with her all day.

"That's beautiful," Kate's voice cracked as Will smiled up at Maddie with a nod.

"Hmmm..." She smiled, slipping the marble into the correct vase. "One hundred and seven down. Thirteen days left."

Day 116

Flipping through the files in her hand, she rounded the final corner to her office and she stopped in her tracks. Standing outside her door were two well-dressed, unassuming men who she knew instantly. They were Palace Security. That could only mean one thing; Charles was there.

She could almost hear the blood rushing from her brain, leaving behind a soft hum. And there she stood, in the middle of the day on Day 116, looking at the two men waiting outside of her office—and the idea that just inside those doors was her entire life. She almost folded; almost collapsed right there on the cold tile floor. But something in her—most likely the same thing that kept her walking after her father died—something kept her upright.

She barely breathed as she studied her door; her intense fear occupying her mind in such a way that breathing never even crossed her mind. Holding her folders tightly to her chest where her macaroni necklace still dangled, her fingers turning over the marble in her pocket, she took a step in that direction. She had no choice but to face this, to face him. Oh God, she thought, tears coming to her eyes. She wasn't prepared to handle this. Not Harry. They only had four days left. Her vision blurred, she looked to the Security Officer closest to her; barely able to see him.

"Is he in there?" Her voice was cracking as she pointed to her office.

"Yes ma'am," the man nodded one, solid nod. Maddie blinked at the tears in her eyes, wishing she could pull it together. Turning towards her office door, she paused; desperately trying to calm down. Taking a deep breath in and letting it out slowly, she shook her head and looked at the Security Officer standing just off to her side. With a double take, she rubbed her eyes and looked at him again.

Her heart stopped beating in her chest.

"Jim?"

"Good Afternoon Doctor," he nodded his head and then, in a moment that made Maddie question her consciousness, made her question her sanity, he allowed the tiniest, crack of a smile onto his lips. Her confusion was etched in the creases of her forehead, into the way the corners of her eyes scrunched up. She had only ever seen Jim as part of Harry's detail. That could only mean...

The folders fell from her hands, crashing to the floor; papers swooshing all around her feet as she... closed the three feet between her and the door to her office. Her hands were steady as she turned the door knob and pushed it open.

Harry.

And her heart started beating again in her chest.
The folders fell from her hands, crashing to the floor; papers swooshing all around her feet as she closed the three feet between her and the door to her office. Her hands were steady as she turned the door knob and pushed it open.

Harry.

And her heart started beating again in her chest.

"You were right..." His voice was rough, tired—but still full of the same heavy charm she had remembered. "You have way more toys in this office than the one at St. Joe's." With his smug, crooked smile, he held up a tiny plastic hedgehog and placed it on the edge of her desk.

There were no words from her; none. There was nothing but a sharp intake of breath as her hands flew to her mouth. Her head started to shake; her hair moving back and forth over her shoulders. She couldn't believe it.

"Madeline..." The word was heavy with emotion as his smile faded.

"Are you...are you real?" She felt weak and exhausted and unsure. "I see you and I hear you but..."

It took him two steps; two long strides in that unmistakable camouflage uniform, to cross the room to her. Two steps for him to connect with her. Two steps for his arm to circle her waist and press her body to his like he was trying to meld them together. Two steps for his lips to find hers; with such ease and familiarity it was like he had never left—like they were still in his room with her standing on the foot of his bed and him beckoning her to come and kiss him properly.

"I'm real," he whispered; pulling back just enough so that he could meet her eyes, his fingers retracing the planes of her face, his hand reclaiming the curves of her body. "I'm real..."

She remembered thinking that his lips were too soft—too soft for somebody who had just spent 116 days in the hot, dry desert. She remembered thinking that his arms were so strong—amazingly strong and steady as they held her to him.

And then she stopped thinking altogether.

Sighing into him; sinking further and further into the warm, soul lifting space he had pulled her into. His mouth was hot against hers; pulling her lips to his, drawing gasps from deep inside of her. Her body awakening under his hands, under his assurances, began to react. Her fingers twisted around his shirt; pulling him closer and closer—though there was no way he could get closer to her in that moment, in that room—with all of those clothes. Walking her one step backwards, his fingers fanned out; his hands meeting the closed door behind her seconds before he pressed her back against it.

Maddie moaned into his mouth, her hands circling his neck; her fingers navigating into the muss of hair that she missed so much. Tearing his mouth from hers, he blazed a trail from her chin, along her jaw, back to her neck—his nose recalling her smell, his mouth remembering her taste.

"You're real..." She gasped; the heat pushed from her lungs in a strangled sort of gasp—her emotions conflicting in the most wonderful of ways. She felt hot tears come from her eyes and she couldn't help but laugh. He was home. He was safe and home and perfect. Yet the tears came anyway. Harry was quick to tend to them with a swipe of his thumb followed by his lips. His arms moved around her waist then, completely encircling her in his strong, protective embrace. He pulled her away from the door and up into his arms—lifting her feet completely off the ground. Her legs wrapped around him instinctually—as though it was their natural state.

"I'm real," his eyes were dark, intense as they met hers; his hand running along the tangle of limbs around him.

"I missed you," her thumbs rubbed at his temples, her hands fanning out on the sides of his head as she looked down at him.

"You have no idea," he shook his head; his lips curling up as they sought hers again. His mouth was hot, his lips were persistent. It had been too long since he had kissed her, too long since he had felt the way her legs moved around him; too long since he had heard the rush of air that pushed from her lips as he pressed against her. It had been much too long. When he had finally landed that morning, when he had finally touched down on British soil, his first thought, his only thought, was of her. His father was waiting, Will and Kate were waiting, but nothing—nothing—was more important than this moment; when his heart reconvened with hers.

"We can't do this," Maddie chuckled into his mouth; defying her body's desires.

"We can," he nodded briskly.

"Harry..." She breathed; his hands pushing past her white coat, up under her shirt; branding her skin with his fingers.

"I'm a soldier, home from war," his cocky grin was irresistible. "Do it for your country."

"My country?" She laughed.

"Do it for my country," he laughed along with her; his eyes dancing with hers as he eased up just a bit—still holding her in his arms.

"You do know that Jim is just on the other side of this door," her head fell back, resting against it.

"I do." Harry's hand pushed her hair away from her neck so that his lips could find home there; trying their best to convince her.

"He'll hear me."

"He's discreet." His facial scruff rubbed against her cheek as he nuzzled closer.

"There are other people out there who are not."

"You can be quiet," his finger ran across her lips.

"I don't know if I can," she answered honestly, her teeth biting into her bottom lip and...if she was trying to calm him down, trying to ease his want for her...she was failing miserably. Harry groaned; his head shaking back and forth in the crook of her neck. Her hands bunched at his shirt, struggling with her own wants. Looking down at the greens and tans, she frowned. "You're still in your uniform. You're still in...why are you still in camouflage?" Harry laughed as he pulled his face from her neck.

"Because I came straight here. We don't travel with civilian clothes and I came straight here," his eyes shining with unshed tears, his smile stretched across his face—slightly red from the sun.

"You did?" Fresh tears rose to her eyes.
"Absolutely." There was never a doubt in his mind as to who he needed to see first.

"But what about your father?"

"He knows I'm home safe. I'm going to stop by Clarence so he can see me with his eyes. Then I'm going home to shower and change and probably back for some kind of dinner," he smiled at her concern; his arms hugging her close. "Do you want to come with me?"

"I would love to come with you," she bent her head down to kiss his forehead, his nose, his cheeks, his lips; softly, reverently. "You're home."

"I am."

"Early even."

"Yes indeed," he nodded.

"Why is that exactly?"

"Hmmm..." Harry chuckled. "Do I sense a complaint in there?"

"Absolutely not," she shook her head; kissing his lips again. "You know...if we're going to your father's, you're going to have to let me down from here."

"Maybe I don't want to go to my father's," he grinned defiantly. "Maybe I want to stay right here; make love to you on your couch..."

"Hmmm..." She smiled happily. "Not here. Not now. But tonight...I'll make love to you anywhere you like."

"Anywhere?" His eyebrow spiked.

"Anywhere." She held her hand out. Adjusting her weight in his arms, he took her hand in his; shaking it to seal the deal.

"Maddie..." He sighed as he kissed the top of her hand. "I love you so much."

"I love you too," she sighed in return, running her thumb over his lips. And then, with a feeling of regret, Harry felt her legs untangle from around him and he sat her gingerly back on the floor. "Just let me call my boss and get my things and...oh! My files!" Maddie remembered the moment she realized it was Jim standing outside of her door. Turning in her heels, she pulled her door open; her eyes scanning the floor where everything had fallen.

"Here you are ma'am," Jim held out the pile he had collected from the floor.

"Thank you," she breathed, taking them from him. "Thank you." And then, with a wide smile and tender eyes, Maddie broke all kinds of protocol and threw her arms around Jim; hugging him tight and kissing his cheek. Startled, his hands moved to steady her, his eyes looking helplessly to Harry who shrugged and laughed.

"She's excited," he explained.

"She's very excited," Maddie stepped from Jim's arms. "I just need to lock these up and let my boss know..."

"Of course," Harry grinned; he'd wait forever for her. Maddie hurried around; locking cabinets, grabbing her bag, phoning her boss. In less than two minutes, she was walking out of the hospital; holding tight to Harry's hand.

For the rest of her life she would be surprised by the lack of photos taken that day. Of course the press was kept off the property and they were naturally not expecting Harry to be home for a few more days—so they didn't see him at the hospital. But other people did; Maddie's colleagues, patients and their families. As they made their way to the awaiting car in the parking garage, they passed at least twenty-five people. But not one of them pulled out a camera, not one of them reached for their phone. They smiled and nodded and one elderly man even offered Harry a sincere "Welcome home, son." But they all let him pass in peace.

Their ride to Clarence House was short but Maddie held onto him the entire time; her fingers tracing over the veins in his hand, tickling up his arm. Harry sighed back into the seat; watching London fly by him. The cold, wet air was a welcome change from what he had grown accustomed to. As the car pulled through the tall gates, he turned to look at her; catching her watching him. With a tired smile, he blinked. He could understand her initial reaction at seeing him because in this moment, looking at her, he almost couldn't believe she was real. Pulling her fingers to his lips, he kissed them and tightened his hold on her.

The car pulled to a stop and their doors were opened; forcing them apart and out of the car. Harry stood at the bottom of the small set of stairs, his hand extend back to her; waiting for her to join him before he continued in. With rosy cheeks and bright eyes, she took his hand in both of hers and, with a smile that refused to fade, she followed him inside.

His family was waiting, erupting into a ball of excitement when they entered the room. While Charles moved directly to his son; wrapping him in a pride-filled embrace, Kate's mile-wide smile was aimed directly at Maddie. Harry was reluctant to drop her hand, but did so in order to receive the hugs, the love. Maddie stood to the side, her hands clasped in front of her, as his family welcomed him home and congratulated her on making it through the few months. This was a short stop; just long enough to say hello, to be seen. Charles and Camilla hugged them and loved on them and quickly released them so Harry could stop off at home, relax and then they would return for dinner and drinks later that evening.

"So your boyfriend's back," Kate spoke under her breath as she moved to Maddie's side as she and William walked Maddie and Harry towards the door.

"He is," Maddie nodded; beaming. "Him and his sharp tongue." Her eyes met Kate's and they shared equally amused smirks before the men caught up with them.

"That's a nice necklace," William smiled, nodding to her neck.

"Oh thank you," Maddie smiled, immediately thinking of the Ubuntu pendant. "Harry gave it to me." William looked to Harry with narrowed eyes.

"You gave her a macaroni necklace?" His voice was flat.

"Oh no!" Maddie laughed, her eyes looking down. "I forgot I had that on. One of the kids made it for me during a session this morning."

"You have such a strange job," Kate commented lightly; her fingers reaching out to the macaroni around Maddie's neck.

"I really do," Maddie smiled with a nod.

"You're coming back for dinner?" William asked; his arm finding its way around Kate's shoulder.
"We'll be back," Harry snatched Maddie's hand in his. "I just want to shower and change and then we'll be right back."

"Do hurry," Kate watched as the two of them stepped outside towards the car. "They have champagne chilled and just waiting for the two of us."

"Oh no," William shook his head. "The man has just returned from battle. I'm not sure he's up for that."

"What is he talking about?" Harry looked to Maddie.

"Nothing," Maddie shook her head. "Kate and I spent a night together while you were gone. That's all I'm prepared to say about that." She dropped his hand and rounded the car with a smug smile.

"Oh really?" Harry's interest was hooked; his eyes trained on Maddie as she slipped into her seat. "See you soon!" William called out with a wave as Harry nodded good-bye and slipped into the car next to her.

"Do you think there's any way I might be able to convince you to stay with me tonight?" He moved closer to her; his voice lowering in a way which had proven useful for him in the past.

"You've already succeeded," Maddie nodded; tipping her lips to kiss his. "Listen...I have a favor to ask and I know you're tired and want to shower and not at all up for granting me favors, but it's incredibly important and I'll owe you—big time."

"Oh-kay," Harry shrugged; curious at the serious look on her face. "Everything okay?"

"Yes," she nodded. "Absolutely."

"Okay then. What's the favor?"

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

"This was a really great idea," Harry admitted as they stood outside the door; having just knocked.

"I told you it was important."

"You were right," he squeezed her hand in his; the night air making it quite cold. "I think this one is so good, you don't even have to owe me."

"Maybe I want to owe you," her voice dropped and his eyes shifted back to her.

"Maybe talking to me like that isn't the best idea when we're standing outside..." His words were cut off by the sound of the locks being moved. Maddie squealed slightly; bouncing on her feet as the door swung open.

"What are you..." Ella was confused for a split second before her eyes went wide; her hands flying to her throat. "Oh my God!" As she flung herself into Harry's arms, Jim stepped around them in order to do his walk through. "Oh my God!"

"What in God's name is going on out there?" Bishop's voice called from the back of Ella's place as he stepped from her room. He had a direct view of the front door and Maddie could see the instant he knew what was happening.

"I found something in my office today that I thought you should see," Maddie felt tears in her eyes as she smiled down the hall at Bishop. His entire face eased, his eyes lit up and she was quite certain he thought, for just a moment, about breaking into a run to the door.

Instead, he maintained his cool and sauntered casually from his room as Jim gave the okay nod and Maddie and Harry stepped inside. "Welcome home man," Bishop smiled wide as he unashamedly opened up his arms to greet him.

"It's good to be back," Harry's smile was genuine as he hugged his best friend. Ella kissed Maddie's cheeks, her excitement only multiplied seeing the smile on Maddie's face; the life back in her eyes.

"Madeline," Bishop turned to her then; his hand still planted firmly on Harry's shoulder. His eyes met hers with sincerity. "Thank you." He stepped from Harry then, pulling Maddie tight into his arms.

"No," she blinked back the tears in her eyes. "Thank you." And she meant it. Without him, without Ella, without all of them—she wasn't sure she would have made it through the 116 days that Harry was away. They had kept her sane, kept her laughing; kept her alive. And, as she looked over Bishop's shoulder at Harry's smile, at his sparkling eyes—she wasn't sure she would ever be able to thank them.

"I cannot believe you're home," Maddie shook her head in disbelief; watching from Harry's bed as he moved, toeing off his boots, pulling off his socks. They had finally pried Bishop away from them long enough to make their escape. Now, all Harry wanted to do was shower and change and spend the little time they had before they were expected back at his father's, together.

"I can't believe it either," he shook his head. "When they told me we were going early, I thought I was dreaming."

"Why did you leave early?" Her face scrunched up as she looked to him; not having got an answer when she asked earlier. Harry paused, his mind and body ceasing movement. Then with a shake of his head and a shrug, he dismissed it.

"I'll tell you all about that later," he grinned then, moving to her, his hands tipping her head up so that he could kiss her. He had been away from her for 116 days; days in which he had to force his mind not to think of her, to think only of the tasks and missions at hand. But now he was home; he was done thinking of war. He wanted to think of her.

"Mmmm..." Maddie moaned; her hands moving to his chest, resting on his buttons. "Can I help you with this?"

"You can," he nodded; his eyes twinkling as she began to undo buttons. Her hands were tentative, cautious, as they moved inside his shirt; pushing it back and off his shoulders; listening to it fall to the floor. She moved then to his pants; undoing the buttons and zipper there; pushing them away from him to meet the same fate as his shirt. It was strange for her, this moment where she was undressing him in a way that was far from sexual. He looked amazing; standing tall and in great shape, but that wasn't what she was searching for as her eyes passed over him. She looked him over; from head to toe—checking for any harm, anything out of place. Harry stood still, allowing her to do so; knowing she needed to ease her concerns.

"You're okay?" Her eyes fluttered up to look at him; her fingers stretching out to fall on his chest.

"I am," he nodded with a smile; his hand closing over hers.
"I mean, you're really okay?"

"I'm really okay," his smile stretched; his hand pulling at hers, moving her closer as he took a step in her direction. This time when his lips met hers, there was less urgency there; less insistence. This time when his arms wrapped around her it was less about the strong, firm proof of his existence. This time was about slow, steady assurance. He was home, he was fine and he was hers. In this moment, her body pressing hotly against his, he didn't belong to the army. In this moment, with her mouth opening under his—inviting his tongue to explore, he didn't belong to the family. In this moment, when he moved forward with a groan; his arms adjusting to push her back on to his bed, he only belonged to her. Just her. And, as she pulled him to her, taking his entire weight onto her, she was ready to be selfish. She was ready to be greedy.

Harry knew that his family was waiting. He knew his father was anxious to have them back; anxious to hear about his time away. He knew that there was a celebratory dinner waiting; bottles of the finest champagne. He knew all of that.

He also knew that there was no way anything was going to pull him away from her now. Now that she was surrendering to his roaming hands; her body arching under his touch. Now that she was taking his long, hot kisses into her mouth like they were air; like she needed them to stay alive. Now that she was allowing him to rid her of her clothing in a less graceful, less mindful way than she had rid him of his.

Nothing could pull him from this spot, from this moment; from her.

Making love to Harry had always been amazing; sacred—was the word she chose. But there had never been a time before this, or after really, that would ever compare to how complete she felt as they moved together. It was like a part of her had been gone and had finally come home. She felt whole again. The ache was gone; the glaring absence of him erased.

They moved so seamlessly together, like there hadn't been 116 days since they last made love, like she hadn't been nervous about this moment. And she had been; afraid that things would be different, that it would be awkward. But it wasn't. There was nothing awkward, no stunted movements, no lack of confidence. Her body sought contact with his like her lungs sought fresh air. It was just them; moving against the other, with the other, in the way their bodies had memorized long ago. In a way that drove them both to their edge much quicker than Harry had planned; quicker than he had hoped.

As they came back from that place of bliss, all he could do was smile ridiculously wide, and shower her with kisses. They had all night to reconnect; this was only the beginning. As Maddie's body recovered, her eyes welled with tears; her chest felt heavy. She was overwhelmed by his presence; by the surge of emotions she had been handling for 116 days. Harry moved then, adjusting on the bed, pulling her into his arms in a softer, gentler way. And she went; willingly. She cuddled up to him and let him hold her. She let him soothe her with feather soft kisses and his quiet, steady breathing. And finally, when she began to even out, she wrapped her arms around his waist and hugged him properly.

"You're home," she sighed breathlessly. "You're home and you're safe..."

"I am," he nodded; taking her face in his hands and kissing her; first her nose, then her chin, then her lips.

"I just had to make sure," she pressed her forehead to his chest and sighed; heavy and deep and relieved. Her hands ran over him then; his broad shoulders, his solid arms, down to his hands that had moved to cradle her head between them.
"Come on," he took her hand; wrapping his fingers around hers. "Come shower with me before we go." Not wanting to be away from him, not wanting to lose physical contact with him, Maddie followed.

Dinner that night was a celebration with Harry at the center of attention. They served his favorite meal, they opened bottle after bottle of bubbly champagne. And they didn't even blink an eye at the way Maddie couldn't quite keep her hands off of him; or vice versa. It was nothing bold or outlandish; it was a hand on his back, his arm, his knee. It was Harry pulling her hand into his, into his lap, as they sat and talked. It was the quick kiss to the cheek he would give her as they moved from the dining room to the study where they sat while Harry told them of his time away. Over drinks and light music, Harry told tales from the front lines—only the ones that brought about laughter. He kept the ones that came with tears to himself; there would be another time for that.

They stayed much later than Harry had anticipated, much later than Charles had stayed awake for some time. But it seemed that nobody wanted this moment to end; nobody was quite ready to move from the celebration that was Harry's return. But eventually the night was drawn to a close and Harry and Maddie found themselves back at his place; alone and with the night ahead of them.

It was there, hours later, when they were lying together in his bed, their clothes leaving a trail up the stairs, their hearts pattering from Harry's wild side. It was there that Harry finally began to talk to her about why he was home early. As Maddie nestled into his side, resting her head on his chest and wrapping her leg around him, he took a deep, shaky breath and offered a tentative smile.

"There's something I need to tell you."

"Oh?" She raised her eyebrows sleepily.

"Tomorrow morning the news is going to announce that I'm back, that the squadron returned four days early," his fingers twisted through hers playfully.

"Okay," she moved; turning over so that she could look at him. His hands moved to her back; shifting up and down as he continued.

"They are also going to talk about why."

"Oh-kay."

"Maddie, something happened." She wasn't sure if it was the tone of his voice or the look in his eye; but whatever it was—her throat tightened.

"To you?"

"No," he shook his head, half a grin pulling at his lips. "How many times am I going to need to make love to you before you're convinced I'm okay?" Maddie smiled coyly.

"Twenty-two?"

"Ha..." His fingers reached out to trace the profile of her nose. "I'm going to be a busy man."

"You are," she kissed his chest. "Harry...what happened?" Her voice was soft, sweet, as the mood shifted. His eyes grew darker; staring out in thought.
"Nothing big..." He sighed heavily. "The details aren't terribly important. My flight crew went in after another downed flight crew. They were deep in enemy terrain and we probably shouldn't have gone down after them. But we did. We were fired upon and we fired back. At the end of the day we got them all out with one casualty." His eyes shifted down as they welled with tears. "It will most likely blow up into a big deal..."

"A bad big deal or a good big deal?" Maddie's mind was fuzzy as she tried to imagine him in the situation he had described; all while trying to avoid imagining him in the situation he had just described.

"Well..." He adjusted underneath her; seemingly uncomfortable with all of it. "There will probably be medals awarded..."

"You're a hero," she blinked at the surprising tears in her eyes.

"Don't call me that," he shook his head; capturing her face in his hands. "They are probably going to call me that. They are going to call my flight team that. But..." He sniffed; trying to gain control of his emotions. "But Maddie somebody died. One of our men, one of my men...died. He has a wife and a mother and...please don't call me that," his head lifted off of the pillow to kiss her as she nodded. "I don't want to talk about it. I...we all have appointments to talk to somebody. I just...I wanted you to know before it hit." He kissed her again. "But I don't want that to be what we talk about." He shook his head; trying to gain control of his emotions. "But Maddie somebody died. One of our men, one of my men...died. He has a wife and a mother and...please don't call me that," his head lifted off of the pillow to kiss her as she nodded. "I don't want to talk about it. I...we all have appointments to talk to somebody. I just...I wanted you to know before it hit." He kissed her again. "But I don't want that to be what we talk about." He shook his head again; pushing the topic away; his hands closing around her arms—pulling her closer to him, pulling her body completely onto his.

"What do you want to talk about?" Her eyes were heavy as she looked down at him; doing her best to let his words rest and move on.

"You," he breathed. "I want to talk about what you've been doing for the last four months. I want to know about the night you spent with Kate. I want to know what ridiculous things you and Ella have been up to. I want to know how your kids at the hospital are doing...and how I can get myself one of those sweet necklaces..." Maddie's laughter rumbled through both of their bodies. Harry looked up at her adoringly, his hands pushing her hair back from her face. "I want to know how many days I have to squeeze in those twenty-two..."

Laughing against his lips, Maddie kissed him then—if he wanted to move on, she would move on. There would be enough time to learn more the next day. For now, she wanted to curl up next to him and bore him to sleep with how normal her life had been without him—well, as normal as it could be when the Duchess of Cambridge showed up with bottles of champagne and the paps were camped out across the street.

Everything intensified after Harry came home from his deployment. The news of his return dropped the next day and, he was right, a big deal was made. Maddie found that Harry had left out all of the gruesome details about the save he and his men had made; most likely to spare her the details, or to spare himself from having to tell her. Either way, it was much more intense than he had alluded to that night in his bed.

There would be a medal ceremony for his crew—no matter their insistence that it was just part of the job; what they signed up for. Despite his desire to avoid it, Harry and his men were lauded as heroes. He hated it; Maddie could tell. He hated the idea that something that left them one man short would also be something he was congratulated on. But, true to form, he swallowed that back and stood tall as they went out into the world.

Of course Harry's fans were back in full force; confessing their love, taking his picture, proposing marriage with signs and t-shirts and even a few tattoos, calling out to him on the street, in clubs. While Maddie found it all quite amusing, she expected his ego to inflate; to blow up the size of the entire continent but he stayed centered, he stayed calm. Because his deployment, unbeknownst to Maddie, had hit Harry hard; right at the center of his world.

When Harry returned to England, to Maddie, his focus had settled. It wasn't so much that he had a new mission in mind—he had always known this was the way he would go, the new part was the intensity of his drive; how much he wanted it. How much he wanted her.

The first time he had been deployed, he had been in an on-again-off-again relationship with Chelsy. It had been difficult to be away from her but not quite life altering—not like this.

But this time was different. This time hit him hard. Watching a fellow soldier die; watching him talk about his wife and his family as he drifted from consciousness—that was something that would stick with Harry forever. All it did was strengthen what he already knew. He wanted Maddie. He had wanted her for so long, he had known for so long. But that moment, that snapshot in time, was so intense, so real, that coming home to her was the answer to so many questions he had spent his life trying to answer.

She was the answer.

So, as the days began to pass, as he readjusted to being home, to the new level of interest from his fans, as he stood next to his crew members and accepted a medal from his grandmother, as he stood in silence as they honored their fallen brother, as he looked out at the audience and found her eyes watching him with empathy, with love—he knew what came next. He knew what lay ahead of him and he could not have been more certain or more ready.

It was then that he placed two phone calls; arranging two meetings. One with her Majesty, The Queen and the second with Hannah Forrester.
Chapter 72

Maddie's second summer in London was so much busier than her first. In addition to the work she was doing at the hospital, her work at St. Joe's remained steady; the more men and women who returned, the more Maddie's work load increased. It was a happy sort of busy. It was a fulfilling sort of busy.

And her social calendar was stock full. She attended polo matches, she had plans nearly every weekend with their group of friends; all intent on continuing the celebration of Harry's return. Among all of the craziness, there was Eugenie and Jack's wedding in July. And then one night two weeks before the big day, there was one new arrival that found Maddie, Harry, Ella and a tagalong Bishop in an airport in France running on nothing but excitement and adrenaline.

"A baby Harry. A baby!" Maddie was ecstatic as they hurried out of the airport; Ella and Bishop close behind them. "A baby..." Her voice matched the soft look on her face.

"I'm sorry are you asking me to give you a baby?" His sarcasm was in top form. "Cause I'm willing, but we're in an airport, that guy is taking our picture," Harry offered a cheery wave to the man across the way with his phone aimed at them. "And we should probably hit a few steps first..."

"No," she nudged his arm; her face scrunching up. "I'm talking about Khenda and Collins and the baby that we are about to meet."

"You're excited, I'm guessing?" Ella snickered at her best friend as she tugged Bishop along.

"And you aren't?" She countered; glancing at the bag full of baby goodies Ella carried with her. "Oh!" She exclaimed, spotting Collins just across the open terminal.

"Collins!" Ella called out; her beaming smile rivaling Maddie's. Hearing his name, he turned towards them.

The excitement was palpable as the group enveloped him in their love. Maddie thought for the briefest of moments that maybe they should be embarrassed by the shrieks and the sloppy group hug. But she wasn't. She was too happy to be embarrassed.

"Daddy!" Maddie called out; throwing her arms around his neck.

"I cannot believe you are all here!" Collins was flooded with emotions as he took them in.

"Wouldn't have missed it. Come here big guy," Harry, living up to a long ago promise, put his hands on Collins' cheeks and planted a big kiss, right on his lips. If Collins was taken aback, it was covered with hearty laughter.

"Welcome back, man," Collins clapped his hand on Harry's back; seeing him for the first time since he returned.

"Easy there killer," Ella laughed at him, pulling Bishop to her side. "Collins, this is Bishop; Bishop, Collins."

"It's great to meet you," Bishop stuck his hand out.
"Well hello," Collins eyed Ella as he shook the extended hand. "It's great to meet you too. So..." He turned to the group. "Are you ready to come meet my son?"

"Your son?" Maddie's eyes grew soft.

"Isaiah," Collins face was shining.

"Isaiah," Maddie melted.

"How's mom doing?" Harry asked; wrapping an arm around Maddie's shoulders as they moved towards the exit.

"Oh God..." Collins' hands clutched at his chest, just over his heart; his eyes beaming. "She's a goddess man. An absolute goddess." His whole aura made the group giddy. Harry pressed a kiss to Maddie's head, slipping his sunglasses over his eyes as they stepped out of the airport and into the sun.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

"I brought visitors..." Collins' voice was low as he knocked softly on the door to Khenda's hospital room; peeking in to see if she was awake.

"Bring them in," a sleepy but blissful Khenda smiled up from her pillow and Collins stood aside, allowing them all to enter.

"Oh..." Maddie breathed, her hand coming to her mouth as her eyes zeroed in on the very center of everyone's attentions tucked safely in Khenda's arms.

"Come in, come in," Khenda's smile widened as she waved them in. Maddie was in awe as she rounded the corner; the scene in that room was so precious, so sweet. They all moved in and around Khenda; hugging and kissing her—careful of the sleeping bundle in her arms. Khenda was so happy to see them, so gracious as Ella introduced a slightly reluctant Bishop—who Khenda instantly put at ease. Collins stood leaning against the opposite wall, watching his family with unadulterated pride and adoration. Ella and Bishop moved to the side of the bed, Maddie sat at the foot of the bed, reaching out to touch Khenda's foot; meeting her eyes with the love they shared for each other. And Harry, true to form, true to the dynamic of his relationship with Khenda, moved right to her side in a way a brother might.

"Khenda..." He looked her over with admiration. "You're a mother!" He leaned in to kiss her.

"I am," she nodded; letting him hug her tight. "Welcome home Captain." She kissed his cheeks; happy to see him with her own eyes. And then, with soft fingers, she pulled the light blue blanket back from the baby's face and stroked his chubby little cheeks as he yawned and fought to open his eyes. "Isaiah, this is Uncle Harry."

"Uncle Harry..." He echoed her with reverence. The look on his face, the joy in his eyes was not lost on Maddie. In fact, it made her heart swell into her throat. It made her stomach flip with excitement.

"Harry, this is Isaiah," Khenda adjusted the tiny little man in her arms and held him out to him. "Do you want to hold him?"
"Can I?" His eyes went wide, as though she had just offered him the opportunity to do the one thing he had wanted to do his entire life. He looked young, alive and happy.

"Of course," Khenda chuckled at him; finding great humor in the way her tiny little baby, now looking up at them with wide eyes, was rendering His Royal Highness into a giddy mess. Harry nodded; wiping his hands on his pants nervously before holding out his arms to cradle Khenda’s son.

He was a natural. As he took the baby from Khenda’s arms, his entire body transformed; his arms cuddled him close to his chest, his fingers moving to adjust the blanket. With an adoring smile, he pressed a soft kiss to the Isaiah's cheeks, bringing a tiny cry from the little boy and laughter from the group.

"He has the same effect on the ladies," Bishop offered with a smirk; bringing out more laughter. "Don't listen to them, Isaiah. We know better," Harry cooed; his knees relaxing as he began to bounce gently, swaying from side to side just slightly—subconsciously rocking him in his arms. A natural. Maddie felt tears come to her eyes as she forced herself to look at something else. Feeling Khenda’s foot nudge her leg, Maddie looked to the top of the bed to her friend who was watching her with a knowing smile. Harry caught the exchange and his eyes traveled to Maddie. "Do you want to hold him?"

"Yes," Maddie breathed; standing and walking to him. She was in awe as he very carefully handed Isaiah over to her; checking to make sure she was supporting his head, his neck. A grin spread across her face as tears formed in her eyes. "He's so perfect." She pressed a kiss to his forehead, pausing to inhale. He smelled amazing and all she wanted to do was curl up with him and never let him go. "Welcome to the world Isaiah. I am your aunt Maddie." She smiled up at Harry who was watching her and the baby with loving eyes.

Maddie's cheeks flushed at the way he was looking at her, the way he was watching her—it was as though she could see the promise of a whole future in his eyes; a marriage, a home, children. And Harry couldn't care less that the entire room was there to witness this moment bringing him to tears. He had never hidden his desires for a family and he wasn't starting now. It was amazing how Collins and Khenda having a baby could intensify his connection to Maddie. Forcing his eyes away, before he broke down and begged her to be his wife, have his children, he turned to Collins and clapped his hands together.

"Well done, Sir. Well done."

"Thank you," Collins grinned; his bright white smile as Harry shook his hand in congratulations. "But truly, the work was all her." He pointed to Khenda.

"Well done, Mama," Harry flashed a wide smile her way, his hands reaching out to tickle Isaiah in Maddie’s arms.

"You want one of these, don't you," Khenda laughed at his trancelike state.

"I want eight of these," Harry piped up and the room really rumbled with laughter as Maddie shook her head.

"Yes well, your birthday is still six weeks away," she met his eyes with a wink before she turned to their friends. "Ella?"
"Oh God!" She moved quickly; her eyes wide with excitement. "I thought I would never get him away from you and Mother Goose over there." She tossed a smirk to Harry who rolled his eyes. "Come here little guy..." She lifted him from Maddie's arms, her voice slipping into mothering mode. "Oh man...you are gorgeous."

And the adoration began again. They passed the baby around, they took turns-rocking him, singing to him, bouncing with him. Even Bishop who was shy at first, gave in to the prodding and challenge from Harry and took the baby into his hands while Collins winked at Ella. Gifts were opened, cigars were distributed, and stories were told.

Eventually the nurses came in and insisted that Khenda get some rest. So, the group reluctantly let go of little Isaiah for the night. They kissed Khenda and Collins and they set out to check into the Bishop hotel where they were staying for the one night they would be in Paris. They checked in, the settled their things and then...they were young, the night was early, and they were in Paris. So, after they went on a ridiculous shopping spree for Isaiah; clothes, books, toys—they went out for a celebratory drinks and dinner. But they kept it easy, kept it low-key. They were due back at the hospital for cuddling and love early in the morning before they left for London.

"Harry..." Maddie's voice was deep in his ear as she sat over him in their large bed. They had long ago said goodnight to their friends and, emotionally amped by their night, they couldn't keep their hands off the other.

"Yes love?" He looked up at her. Though he was completely naked, he was moving with an aching slowness as he peeled her clothes from her body.

"Harry..." Maddie couldn't help the words that whispered from her mouth into his ear. "I want a baby..." There she was, straddling his lap; his lips pressed to her neck while he removed her bra and she couldn't keep her mouth shut. She couldn't help it; she had been thinking it all night, ever since she saw him with Isaiah.

"What?" He pulled back; one hand resting on her bare thigh, one sweeping her hair away from her face. "Did you just say that you..."

"Want a baby," she bit her lip. There it was again. "Oh God," her eyes were frantic as they searched his face. "Was that the least sexy thing I could possibly say to you?" Harry's mouth hung open for a moment. "It was," she nodded; rising up, ready to move off of him. "I'm sorry."

"Hold on," his hands were firm on her hips; holding her in place. "Where do you think you're going?"

"I don't know," she shook her head; a nervous laugh passing through her lips. "Out?"

"At one in the morning?" He chuckled. "Half naked?" She moved again, but his hands held onto her. "Come on. Don't go. Don't leave. Talk to me. Maddie..." His finger nudged her chin; moving her eyes to meet his. "You want a baby?"

"I..." She blushed; pink covering her skin from her cheeks to her chest. "I told you before that I wanted children."

"Yes," he smiled; humored at her shyness—especially as she sat in his lap; exposed. "Though you've never said it quite like that."
"Like what?"

"Like you wanted me to give you one right now." The temperature in the room shot up; his eyes were boring into hers.

"Maybe..." She took a deep breath. "Maybe I'm ready for that."

"Oh?" Harry fought to keep his face calm; fought to keep the wide smile from his lips. He didn't want to scare her. "You're ready for...you're ready for a baby?"

"I don't know," she shook her head. "When I saw you with Isaiah, when I saw you hold him and kiss him and...God Harry, when you were swaying with him to keep him from crying...I just..." Her hands moved up his chest, winding around his neck and pulling her body closer to his. "I wanted that with you. I don't think I've ever felt such a...primal urge like that before in my life." Her heart jumped as she spoke the truth. "I want to have that with you." With a wide smile, Harry stretched his neck, kissing her; his hands holding her tight to him, his tongue seeking entrance into her mouth. Maddie groaned as he kissed her; let him render her breathless. Maybe it wasn't the least sexy thing she could say to him—maybe he was unlike almost every other man his age.

"We..." Harry was breathing heavy; his forehead pressing to hers. His hands were shaky as they roamed over her curves. "We have to be married first, Maddie. You have to be my wife. We..."

"I'm ready when you are Wales." She cut in; feeling alive and giddy and brave. His head moved back from hers; his eyes wide with surprise. Maddie's head tossed back in laughter.

"Are you messing with me right now?" He studied her face; her rosy cheeks, the laughter in her eyes. His heart was thumping in his chest. "Are you joking?"

"Would I ever...."

"Yes," he nodded. "You absolutely would. I'm not messing around here Maddie. You want me to ask you right now?"

"Don't be silly..." Maddie's hand slapped at his chest; playfully.

"I'm not being..." He moved then, pushing her gently to the side as he left the bed.

"Now where are you going?" Maddie watched him as he looked through the clothes they had flung around the room.

"I'm putting on pants," he explained. "I cannot very well tell our children that I proposed to you while I was naked and trying to make love to you, can I?"

"Proposed." Maddie's eyes snapped wide; her breath pushing from her lungs. "Wait. Hold on. Wait..." She held her hand out to him as he pulled on boxers. "Stop!" She moved to him then, her hands on his wrists holding him still. "Harry stop! You can't just..."

"I can just." His hands broke from her grasp; wrapping around her and pulling her body to his. "This isn't exactly how I had figured it would go. I don't have a ring or..."

"Shhh..." Maddie's hand slipped up to his mouth; her eyes wide and wet. "Don't ask me because I said that. Don't do it because you feel pressured..."
"Pressured?!" He laughed. "I don't feel pressured. Madeline..." His lips claimed hers; communicating something to her that his lack of articulation was struggling to do. "I've never felt less pressure. I would like to feel more...You can't mess with me like this love. I will call your bluff every time. You want a baby? I'll give you a baby. I'll give you eight babies one right after the other...an enormous house to put them all in..." His eyes were alive; his face was animated. He was so incredibly serious; so happy at the mere thought that it moved Maddie in ways she had never been moved. Her whole body ached with love for him. His hands found her face; soft and loving. "But you have to marry me first. You have to be the Duchess first. There's no way around it. That's how it works."

"I know," she nodded; her voice soft. "I know. But you can't just jump out of bed and throw on some clothes because I tell you that I want all of those things too."

"Do you? Do you want all of those things?" Maddie's lips twitched as she nodded; nervous and excited. Harry, overcome with emotion, wasn't sure if he should laugh or cry or throw her over his shoulder and take her to bed. So he did all three; in one grand sweeping gesture, they were back where they started.

Except they weren't.

Because now he knew. This place that he had been, this place where his future was lined up right in front of him and all he had to do was wait for her to be ready and then reach out and claim it, now she was in that place too. Maybe he should have known that; maybe he should have guessed. Hell, she had been with him through the press and the paparazzi. She had withstood the attacks, the fake photos, the alleged cheating stories. And she was still there; in his arms, letting him kiss her and touch her and make her sigh. She was finally telling him that she was in that place; ready to step up, reach out and claim it.

And God if he wasn't ready to offer it to her.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Leaving Paris, leaving Collins and Khenda and Isaiah, was a bittersweet moment. They were able to help the new family transition home, they were able to cuddle the sweet little bundle till they sighed and then they were loading up and heading back to London. There was, after all, a Royal Wedding in the works and there was much pomp and circumstance headed their way. They made plans to return for a longer stay, they managed to avoid Khenda's frustrations when she discovered the opulent gifts, and Bishop managed to garner approval from Collins. All in all, the trip was successful. So, with a stash of Laduree Macaroons that Harry had surprised her with in the morning, Maddie curled up next to Harry on the plane and said Au Revoir to Paris while holding onto the new feelings the trip had awakened in her.

Once they arrived home, they had very little time to digest all that had occurred when they were gone. The plans for Eugenie and Jack's wedding were in full force. There were showers and hen parties and last minute I-need-to-get-away-from-the-planning-or-I-am-going-to-explode nights on the town. And of course, there was the dress shopping.

"So..." Ella looked at Maddie over the rack of dresses they were perusing. "Are you coming with Bishop and I?"

"I am," Maddie nodded as she pushed another hanger. "Harry said I should ride with you to St. George's and somebody at the church will show me where to sit..." She pulled a dress out. "What do you think of this color?"

"What do you mean somebody will show you where to sit?" Ella ignored the dress and watched her friend.

"Well, he's coming with his father and Camilla and he wants me to sit with them but..." She explained casually; biting her lip as she looked over the dress. "Do you think this color is too flashy?"

"Hold on," Ella moved around the rack so she was standing next to Maddie. "He told you that you're sitting with him?"

"Yes," Maddie nodded dismissively.

"In the church?" Ella's hand fell on top of Maddie's. "You're sitting with him in the church at the wedding?"

"Yes," Maddie chuckled; taking in her friend's expression. "Why do you look like I just told you the Earth is flat?"

"Because you just told me the Earth is flat. Maddie...you're sitting with The Family at Eugenie's wedding?"

"Yes," Maddie put the dress back on the rack and slid the hanger along; glancing up at Ella in confusion. "What?"

"Come here," Ella was rough as she grabbed her friend's hand; pulling her through the racks.

"Ouch. Ella..."

"Shhhh..." Ella pulled her into a dressing room; shutting and locking the door.

"What the hell is..."

"Is there something you want to tell me?" Ella's eyes were wide, her voice low; her arms crossed over her chest.

"No?" Maddie wasn't sure.

"You're sitting with Harry at a wedding. The Family—at a wedding. Do you have any idea how big this..." Ella stepped even closer; her voice so low that Maddie had to lean in to hear it. "Are you hiding a secret engagement?"

"What?!" Maddie laughed out loud; stepping away from her friend. "Of course not. Goodness, Ella. It's his cousin's wedding. I'm sitting with my boyfriend at his cousin's wedding. Relax. It's not that big of a deal." And with a slight roll of her eyes, Maddie unlocked the dressing room door and stepped out.

"Yeah well, we'll see about that," Ella sighed; following behind her. Of course, Ella would turn out to be right. She usually was about things such as this. When the "Engagement Watchers" began to stalk her left hand, Maddie knew Ella had been right.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
On the day of the wedding, Maddie arrived early with Ella and Bishop and, after they had entered the church, Thomas was quick to find her and direct her to the correct location. It wasn't long before the family was making an entrance, before the parade of Windsors was walking before her. It wasn't lost on her how easily she dipped into the curtsey as Dukes and Duchesses walked past her. It wasn't lost on her how Kate looked at her when their eyes met; like she was in on some great big secret—or how Mike nodded his head to her with a smirk. And it wasn't lost on her, the way Harry moved to her side with wide smiling eyes as The Queen was the last to join them. They had merely moments before Eugenie was expected to arrive on her father's arm; only minutes really. But in those minutes, Maddie took in the regality of it all; the beautiful chapel at Windsor Castle that had seen so many nuptials in this family. She was struck by the history that was there; the level of tradition that came with it all.

Slipping her hand through Harry's arm, she leaned in and spoke softly, "Harry, this is beautiful."

"Hmm," He hummed with a smile.

"Do you think we could...You know..." Her lips fell closed as he turned to look at her. Her eyes shifted as she nodded to the altar with half a smirk. "Here?"

"You're trying to kill me, aren't you," his eyes were playful. "I should warn the security team about you. You tell me you want a baby and then you tell me to take off my pants and order me not to propose..."

"Shhh..." Maddie's eyes narrowed at him as her cheeks blushed.

"And now you want to know if we can marry here? Madeline..." He leaned closer to her; closer than he should be inside a church with his father in front of him and The Queen so nearby. "Are you going to let me take you back to my cave or what?" Maddie had to turn her face into his shoulder to keep from laughing; only egging him on. "Honestly now. I've been following you around for years. I adore you...make an honest man out of me..."

"Would you stop?" She bit at her lip, nudging his ribs to quiet him. But he wouldn't. It was too much fun to tease her. Thankfully, the music began and all eyes drifted to the back of the chapel where Eugenie was making her appearance.

"I mean what does a guy have to do to get you to just take that walk with him?" He snuck in one last question before it all began. Maddie shook her head at him with pointed eyes; amused at his naughtiness. And then, clearing her throat, she looked him straight in the eye and answered; effectively shutting him up.

"Ask."

Harry's teeth clenched together as he shook his head at her; warning in his eyes before his attention shifted entirely to his cousin who was about to be married. That small, brief conversation would be the only one like it they would have that night. As soon as they saw Eugenie appear, as soon as they saw the smile on Jack's face; they both jumped into the night of celebration. They held hands while the vows were exchanged. They held tighter when the pronouncement was made. And, when the ceremony was over and they made their way to the reception that was hosted on grounds at Windsor Castle, they joined the family and friends in a night of revelry.

That's not to say that, while he held her in his arms and turned her around the dance floor, she wasn't thinking about what it might be like to dance with him on their wedding night. And that's not to say that Harry, when he had the one brief moment alone with Ella, didn't secure her help with something that would remain top secret. And that's not to say that, when his family watched the two of them together, they weren't taking bets on how long it would be before an announcement was made.

All of those things were true. But that night, as they drank champagne and danced until dawn, it was just another night that drew them a few steps closer to the other.

Maddie's second summer in London was turning out to be a big one. She was no longer finding her way, discovering her place. She had arrived; she was home. She knew her favorite nooks and crannies. She had her regular haunts. She had become a part of Harry's tight circle of friends; leaning on them and allowing them to lean on her. And she had become a welcome guest with his family. She never would have guessed just how much her life would change over that last year.

And she never would have guessed just how much it was about to.
It was a cool August night in London; uncharacteristically so. A light rain had settled in during the afternoon, leaving the evening crisp and the ground covered in a dark wetness. When Harry stepped out of the small, chartered plane on the landing strip in London, he inhaled the scent and looked to the calm skies. He had been traveling almost non-stop for the last twenty-four hours and still had more travel ahead of him and tomorrow was Maddie's birthday. Tugging at the lapels of his tuxedo jacket; he slid the button into place and made his way down the small set of stairs unfolded from the chartered plane.

"Good evening, Sir," his driver greeted him at the bottom of the steps. "You look different than when I last saw you."

"Good evening Harrison," Harry smiled with a nod. "I changed into this about five minutes ago. Can't very well show up with wrinkles, can I?"

"No Sir."

"It rained while I was away."

"Only a bit. Should be clear for the rest of the night," he followed just behind Harry; ready to update him, ready to take orders.

"Good. We'll be back here and up in the air in less than two hours."

"Yes sir."

"Great," Harry paused, pulling his phone from his pocket and powering it up. He glanced at the car and Harrison read his mind.

"We have everything packed and ready to go, Sir."

"The Elie Saab?" Harry raised his eyebrows.

"Boxed and in the trunk; along with the shoes." Harry grinned; she was going to look ravishing in the red. He had even remembered to send Ella a thank you for helping with the sizes.

"Cartier?" He felt his heart skip as he went through the checklist.

"Bagged and in the backseat."

"Fantastic," Harry's smile stretched even further. "And the candy?"

"Same."

"Perfect," Harry clapped his hands together; pleased.

"And how was your trip to the states sir?" Harrison moved to open the car door for the young man.

"Quick," Harry chuckled; the anticipation rushing through his veins. He was ready to get on with his night; ready to see her.

"Of course, Sir."

"It went well; very, very well. Thank you." With a quick glance at his watch, Harry slipped into the car; the door shutting behind him. As the car began to move, Harry dialed. It was less than three rings before she answered.

"Maddie my love..." He hoped that the excitement in his voice gave nothing away.

"Ugh..." She groaned and his smile faded to a frown; she sounded terrible. "I tried to call you. Where have you been?"

"I thought I told you. I've been training for the last twenty-four hours. I..." He took a breath; hating that he was lying to her. "I didn't have my phone on for a bit. I'm on my way there now."

"No. You can't come here."

"What? Why not?"

"I'm sick. I'm so sick," she groaned.

"Sick? What's wrong?"

"The flu. I can't keep anything in my stomach," she breathed slowly. "I'm sorry. I can't do dinner Harry. I can barely sit up without..."

"Oh baby..." He winced; her voice sounded drained.

"I'm so sorry."

"No, hey," he shook his head; his eyes moving past the red and gold bag on the seat next to him. "Don't worry about it. Let me just call and cancel...a few things. I'll be right over."

"No!" She exclaimed. "No...you don't need to come over. Stay away. I'm sick and I'm gross and you don't need any part of this."

"Okay."

"Okay? Really?"

"No not really. I'm on my way. Go back to sleep. I'll let myself in."

"Harry, no..." Her protest matched her voice, her body; weak.

"I love you Madeline. I'm coming over. Now. What do I need to bring with me?"

"With you?"

"Yes...what do you need? Soup?" She groaned. "Come on, love. What helps you feel better? I need to know these things."

"Saltines," she sniffed. "And ginger ale. Would you bring me saltines and ginger ale?"
"Of course," he smiled; pleased that she had surrendered her position, allowing him to help her.

"Just regular saltines, Harry. Not those...fancy, royal crackers you have..."

"Royal crackers?" He laughed.

"I want the cheap ones..." She thought for a moment. "You know, maybe you should call Ella."

"I can find a box of saltines all on my own."

"You don't need to do this. You really don't. You could go home and relax and..."

"Would you stop with that?" He cut her off. "I'm coming over. I'm bringing cheap saltines and ginger ale. I'll see you soon. I love you. Good-bye now..." And though he could still hear her protesting, he disconnected the call. His hand reached up to loosen his tie as he called out to the driver.

"Harrison?"

"Yes sir?"

"Doctor Forrester is sick," Harry shook his head; sad for her, sad for the loss of their night, their weekend. "I'm going to need to stop off before we go to her place. Also, would you please call ahead and cancel the flight, the hotel...everything?"

"Yes Sir," Harrison nodded. "The entire weekend?"

Harry looked to the bag next to him and nodded. "The entire weekend."

When Harry arrived at Maddie's place, he opened the door and called out to her, "Madeline. It's me. Nathan's going to walk through and..."

"You hung up on me!" A small but firm voice called out from behind the closed bathroom door.

"Yeah," Harry sighed with a hint of a smile. "I'm sorry about that baby but you were..."

"I told you to stay away!"

"Yes well, I think we both knew better." Harry took a deep breath and nodded to Nathan who moved about his business quickly and efficiently. As he did, Harry settled the dress box and the bags off in the corner of the room; dropping his tuxedo jacket on top of them. He waited until Nathan walked past him before he closed and locked the door. Gathering the saltines and the ginger ale, he ventured down the hall to the bathroom; knocking softly, "Can I come in?"

"Would you listen if I told you no?" Her voice was tired. She had a point; he probably wouldn't. Shuffling the crackers to his other hand, he reached out to open the door. For the rest of his life, he would remember the scene that awaited him.

There she was, his beautiful girlfriend, curled up on the floor of her bathroom in oversized, mismatched pajamas; her head achingly close to the toilet. She had created something of a bed in there; complete with her comforter, a pillow, tissues and her slippers.

"Oh baby..." He instantly felt bad for her, moving to step into the bathroom.

"Wales..." She whined, waving her hand at him as if she were shooing a fly. "I told you to stay away..."

"Don't be mad," his voice was soft as he looked around, trying to decide the best place for him. "I brought ginger ale and saltines—the cheap ones, just like you asked."

"Thank you," she moaned; sitting up slightly so that her head was closer to the toilet, her face turning colors. "You can just leave them and..."

"Please. As if I would ever leave you here like this," he moved then, sitting next to her on the floor; leaning against the tub and reaching a hand out to rub her back soothingly. "I'm sorry you're sick, love. What happened?"

"I don't know," she shook her head; her hands rubbing over her face. "It hit me this morning; like a truck."

"Do you want some of these crackers?"

"No," her face screwed up. "Not yet. I haven't had any success with water."

"So ginger ale is out of the question?" He held up the bottle with a weak smile.

"Mmm Hmm..." She nodded; her mouth twisting up as she sat up even further. "Harry you have to go..." She was more forceful.

"I'm not going anywhere..." He refused, even as Maddie shoved at his hands; moving quickly away from him and towards the toilet—emptying what little there was left in her stomach.

"Ugh..." She moaned as she finished; her head resting on her arm.

"I'm so sorry..." She turned slight towards his voice as he spoke. And there he was, Prince Harry of Wales, on her bathroom floor with one hand holding her hair from her face, the other on her back.

"What are you doing?" She felt tears in her eyes; a mixture of frustration and happiness.

"I'm...here let me..." He held onto her hair as she eased away from the toilet; flushing it as she moved. He let go of her hair and reached for a tissue. "Here, love. Let me get you some water..."

He rose to his feet, filling the glass on the counter and handing it to her.

"I hate this..." She wiped at the tears in her eyes and took the water from him.

"I know baby," he looked down at her, wishing there was something more he could do.

"This is going to be the worst birthday ever..." She grumbled; looking him over for the first time since he had arrived. "Are you...I'm sorry. Are you in a tuxedo?" He chuckled and moved back to his spot next to her on the floor.

"Half of one, yes." He tugged at the bow tie; slipping it from around his neck and tossing it to the side, rolling up his shirt sleeves.

"You had plans for us tonight," she sniffed; handing him the glass of water.

"You knew that," he smiled; setting it on the counter before leaning back against the tub, resuming his spot next to her. "Come here..." He reached for her pillow; placing it in his lap and patting it. "Come on, Madeline." Eyeing him suspiciously, she moved; settling her head there on the pillow in his lap.

"I knew we had plans but...not tuxedo plans."

"Tuxedo plans?" He laughed; tugging the blanket up around her.

"Where were we going to go tonight?" She snuggled up to him; her stomach settling a bit.

"It doesn't matter," he shook his head; his fingers working magic as they stroked the hair away from her face. "No need to worry about it now. Just relax. Close your eyes and relax." And, because she had very little energy left in her to fight him, she did just as he instructed.

Eventually Maddie's stomach settled enough that she allowed Harry to help her back to her bed. He fluffed her pillows, he tucked her blankets around her and then he went about tidying up her room. He tossed tissues, dumped her old water glass—replacing it with room temperature ginger ale, just as she had requested. He offered crackers, he offered tea, he offered to run to fetch soup or make grilled cheese, but she wasn't quite there yet. Moving her trashcan closer to her side of the bed, he flipped off the lights and slid in bed next to her.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Maddie was up no less than three times that night; rushing to the bathroom, trying not to wake Harry. But every time, he was right behind her; holding her hair, handing her tissues, refilling her water. He would sit on the floor next to her for a moment while her stomach settled and then he would help her back to bed; paying no attention to her protests, ignoring her pleas for him to sleep in the spare bedroom—if he insisted on staying.

And he did. He insisted. He stayed all night, right next to her. And when he woke the next day, he was quiet as he slipped from her bed. In his boxers and an undershirt, he made his way to her kitchen on a mission to brew tea and make her some toast. It had been a good chunk of time since she had last run to the bathroom and he was hoping that when she woke, she would finally be able to put something in her stomach.

It wasn't long before he heard her; her socked feet padding down the hallway. Tipping his head around the corner of the kitchen, he smiled wide.

"Happy Birthday Beautiful."

"You're still here..." She breathed; a smile tugging at her lips.

"Of course," he stepped completely from the kitchen then; looking her over, "you look better." She had pulled her hair back into a mess of a ponytail and was wearing a warm robe. She had more color in her face than she had the night before and her eyes seemed more at ease, less stressed. "How are you feeling?" He moved to her then; an arm wrapping loosely around her waist while his other hand ran up and down her arm.
"Ugh," her hands pushed weakly at his chest. "Better, but still...gross. You don't want to be near this right now, trust me."

"Madeline," he chuckled softly; refusing to move. "You forget what we've been through together, love." He pressed a kiss to her forehead, his mind flashing to that night in Bendal and the weeks in the hospital that followed.

"I suppose," she nodded; stepping closer to him and his warmth.

"Do you think you can handle some tea this morning?" Both of his hands moved to her shoulders; massaging slightly.

"I think so," she nodded. "It's worth a try."

"Great," he smiled; squeezing her arm. "Why don't you get comfortable on the couch and I'll bring you some tea and toast?"

"That would be great, thank you," she watched as he stepped away from her. "Harry?"

"Hmmm?" He glanced back.

"I mean it. Thank you," her smile was warm; genuine.

"Think nothing of it," he shook his head and went to the kitchen for tea and toast.

Maddie, taking a deep, lung filling breath, made her way into the living room; moving to her couch and pulling her large, comfy blanket off the back; draping it over her legs as she snuggled down. She could hear Harry moving around in the kitchen; the clink of glass, the opening of the refrigerator.

She looked around her, feeling like the last twenty-four hours had been lived in somebody else's body, somebody else's world. She looked out the window, seeing the rain was still settled over London, she looked at the mantle, her vases still sitting there—just as they had been on day 116. She smiled as her eyes traveled away; towards the sound of him stepping into the room and her eyes caught it. The pile of stuff Harry had brought with him when he came from the airplane to her place the night before.

"Here we are," he smiled down at her on the couch; holding out a cup of tea.

"Thank you," she took it; sitting up as her eyes focused just past him to the pile. "Harry?"

"Yes?" He sat her plate of toast on the table in front of her and went back to the kitchen for his own tea.

"What is all of this stuff?" She called out to him; sipping her tea very slowly.

"Stuff?" He called back.

"Under your jacket," she pushed her blanket off her legs and moved from the couch; sitting her tea on the table. "There's a box and a bag and..." Her eyes grew large as she moved his jacket aside, reveling the Cartier bag at the top of the pile.

"Ah..." Harry smiled as he stepped back into the room; finding her wide eyed with the recognizable bag in her hands. "That is your birthday gift."

"Oh?" She arched an eyebrow. "My birthday gift is in this bag?"

"No," he chuckled, sitting his tea down on the table and pulling his jacket off the pile. He waved his hand at the stack. "That is your birthday gift."

"All of this?"

"All of it."

"Good God Harry, what were you trying to do?"

"Sweep you off your feet."

"And yet you managed to do that with just saltines and ginger ale." He smiled at her; leaning to kiss her shoulder.

"Do you want to open it?" He pulled the bag from her fingers.

"All of it?" She bit her lip.

"All of it," he nodded. "It is your birthday."

"Yes it is," she grinned.

"Come on," Harry's hand fell on the small of her back. "Have a seat and I'll bring it all to you." Because she was still exhausted, all of her energy drained from the day and night before, she did as he asked. Sipping slowly on her tea, she watched while Harry moved the items around; arranging them in front of her on the table.

"Are you going to walk me through it?" She waved her hand over the items. "Tell me how it would have all gone?"

"Sure," he nodded with a grin. Taking a sip from his cup, he clapped his hands together and moved to the big box. "This one would have been first." Maddie pulled the box onto her lap; slipped the bright gold bow from around it. Letting the lid fall to the side, she moved aside the tissue paper and pulled out a stunning Elie Saab dress in red and gold. Her mouth fell open, her eyes traveled from the dress to him in shock.

"Oh my...." Her hands ran over the soft fabric. "How did you..."

"Ella helped me with the size, so I'm sure it will fit."

"You were in a tux," she remembered vaguely from the night before. "And you were going to give me this..."

"Yes," he smiled and reached for another box. "And these." Maddie took the box from him; her jaw dropping even more.

"Louboutin?" She breathed; pulling out a pair of stunning gold shoes. "Harry..."

"And then..." He held out his finger, the Cartier bag hanging in the air.
"I don't even know what to..." She shook her head; slightly overwhelmed by it all.

"You open it," he nodded to the bag. Doing as he asked, she took the bag from his hand, carefully removing the box and opening it up to an amazingly stunning watch.

"Oh my God..." She chuckled. "This is unbelievable. Harry. This is too much. It's..."

"Shhh..." He shook his head, pulling her hand into his to fasten the watch around her wrist. "It fits," he grinned. "But if you want a different metal or..."

"Shhh..." Her fingers moved to his lips, her eyes taking in the beautiful timepiece. "It's perfect." She held her wrist out to get a better look. "So, once we were dressed up..."

"We were going to dinner and the symphony," Harry reached into his tuxedo pocket and pulled out the two box tickets he had been holding onto.

"They symphony," her eyes grew soft. "You had a whole night planned..."

"Something like that," Harry shrugged; knowing she was starting to feel guilty—wanting to avoid that.

"Harry this is..." She looked around her at the discarded wrapping, at the elaborate gifts. "I feel so bad that we missed it."

"Don't," he shook his head; leaning forward.

"But I do!" She ran her fingers along the soft fabric of the dress; her wrist adjusting to the new weight there. "Maybe we can still do it. Maybe we can get tickets to tonight's show or tomorrow or..."

"No," Harry shook his head; his eyes sparkling.

"No? Why not? I'm sure there are tickets available. I can call the Royal Opera House and..."

"It wasn't at the Royal Opera House."

"Well where was it?" She snatched the tickets up from the table before he could pull them back; her jaw dropping as she read. "Oslo?! We were going to Norway?! For the night?!"

"For the weekend," he corrected softly.

"But..." She shook her head; stunned into wordlessness. "Why..." And then, in a very matter of fact sort of way, he blew her mind.

"You said you've always wanted to see the Northern Lights." He leaned up from his spot then, pressing a soft kiss to her lips. "We'll do it another weekend, I promise. I've heard they are better in the winter anyway," he reached for her cup. "For now...I'm going to get you some more tea and you...you lay down and relax. We need to get your energy back."

"Yes, sir," Maddie offered a weak attempt at a salute and did as he instructed. Letting the dress rest in the box, she moved back to her slumped position on her couch; watching as he moved from the room for more tea.
An entire weekend, well thought out plans—all down the drain because she had the stomach flu. And instead of sulking around or acting frustrated, he was there; taking care of her, loving her. Sighing, she settled in further. Pulling the blanket closer to her, she looked out at the room, listened to him move and thanked God for whatever it was that she had that kept this man coming back to her side.
The thing with Harry was that he did things hard. He did things big. He worked hard. He played big. When he put his mind to something, when it became his focus, the intensity, the follow-through—it was something to be rivaled. It was something to be studied and extracted and bottled to sell. At least that’s what Maddie told him when she watched him in action; with an impressed smile on her face. He didn’t know ‘half way’. Which was why it was no surprise at all when he told her what he wanted to do for his birthday, when he presented her with The Plan—a five day itinerary that included a private dinner with his immediate family, a wild, rip-roaring party with his friends, and finally a private getaway for the two of them. He did things big. Rearranging her schedule, swapping shifts with co-workers and calling in favors, Maddie was ready for his Friday-Tuesday experience; wherever it was that it took her.

So on Friday evening, as she dined on succulent seafood served under silver while Harry’s father offered up a heartfelt speech to his son, she let Harry grip her fingers under the table and smiled at the blush that rose to his cheeks.

And when she found herself attending an elaborate private bash later that night at Leo’s, drinking champagne and toasting him over and over again—she smiled, drank up, and danced until Harry was ready to call it a night. Danced until he took her hand, kissed her neck, and told her it was time for them to go.

And when, hours later, the two of them boarded a private jet to take them to Botswana for the weekend, she had to admit, she was a bit giddy with excitement. Having planned the flight for overnight, they would be well rested and ready to explore when they arrived in southern Africa. Harry had warned her ahead of time—yes, she had been to Africa before—but never to his Africa and never quite like this. Already she knew the trip was going to be extravagant, the likes of which she had only heard tale of. But what could she say? Sunday was his birthday—his thirtieth, no less—and the rules were the rules. He got what he wanted. She laughed to herself as she settled next to him, still tipsy from the champagne. She figured birthdays for Harry were probably not dissimilar from any other day in the life of a Prince.

Saturday

When Maddie woke from her sleep, later in the morning on Saturday, she had made a decision—Harry was a genius. They had partied big the night before; with all of his friends, his brother and sister, and a wide representation of his cousins and, because of the flight schedule, they were waking up just over an hour from their destination. There was a brief moment, a glimpse of time, when she was stepping into the shower on the private jet when she wondered exactly how much something like this cost. But, as the warm water rained down on her, she decided it best to let it slide. It was his birthday, his money and, as he had informed her at the beginning of the trip—they were doing this his way.

They arrived in the late afternoon at a camp resort in Botswana, one of Harry’s all-time favorite destinations. The staff was unbelievably friendly; welcoming them with wide open arms and a willingness to do whatever it took to make their stay enjoyable. They were shown to the their luxury suite; the furthest from the main house—as far away from the other visitors as they could possibly be. Harry’s detail would be staying in the suite between them and the main house; ensuring Harry’s safety, ensuring their privacy.

They settled their items and took dinner on their deck, opting to watch the sunset over the delta from their lounge chairs. When the sky was dark, when they could only hear the sounds of the water, the sounds of the wildlife, Harry rose to his feet, reached for a lantern and extended his hand.

"Come with me?" He nodded his head towards the main house that was connected to all the suites by an elevated walkway. Maddie finished her glass of wine and slipped her hand into his.

"Where are we going?" Her head leaned against his shoulder as they walked along the path, Nathan trailing not too far behind them.

"Every night after sundown, they have a...party," he grinned mischievously. "They dance and drink and sing and there are drums and...I'm one hundred percent certain you're going to love it."

Harry was right—on all accounts. There was dancing and singing and drums and she absolutely loved it. There was a great mixture of locals and visitors—visitors who were caught up enough in themselves, in their own vacations that they hardly bothered to try to recognize Harry. And, if they did, they were maintaining their cool about it. Later Ella would explain that the particular camp they went to generally caters to the rich and famous and perhaps those people aren't as fan-crazy about Harry as others. Whatever it was, that night came with a relaxed sort of abandon that they rarely felt in London with cameras just around the corner. And Maddie was ready to soak it up as much as she could.

As she danced around the group, always in contact with Harry, a constantly refilled glass in her hand, she watched the drummers with such affection. This reminded her of the very best parts of Bendal. She participated in the dancing. Upon the insistence of one of the drummers, she took a few hits with the stick—much to Harry's delight. And when the camp hosts directed their attention to some moving wildlife, Maddie clamped her hand over her mouth and watched in awe.

"Here you are..." Harry's voice was low, his breath tickling her neck as he stepped up behind her, new drink in hand.

"You're trying to get me drunk..." Her eyes were hazy as she looked up at him; having lost count long ago of her intake. "...take advantage of me..."

"Hmmm..." He smiled; holding his own glass steady as he spun her around and wrapped his arms around her waist. They began to sway to the music. "Maybe."

"You know you don't have to work so hard," she looked at her beautiful watch he had given her just weeks before. "It's midnight darling. It's your birthday. You get whatever you want..."

"Oh yeah?"

"Absolutely." Without another word, Harry finished his drink, took hers from her fingers and leaned over to set them both on a table. Then, with one big, sweeping move, he scooped her up and over his shoulder...walking towards the elevated walkway to their room. And though Maddie knew she should be protesting, knew she should be demanding to be let down—she was much too caught up in giggles to care.

"Good night everyone!" Harry called out with a wave behind him. There was laughter, applause, and a few low whistles as they disappeared into the night. He went big. He played hard.

Sunday
Harry woke in the morning with a well-detailed itinerary and a self-imposed mission to exhaust her, at least that's how it felt to Maddie as they day unfolded before her. Over breakfast, they were greeted by two elephants sauntering by; seemingly unaffected by their presence. Harry was amused by the way she stopped what she was doing and watched them—entranced. The wildlife—from the baboons who ran across their roof at night to the hippos with their loud calls to each other—was turning out to be her favorite part of the trip.

After they finished eating, they dressed and set out on a hike. It wasn't quite the summits Maddie was used to but the scenery was phenomenal and the animals they ran across were so new to her that she felt herself being challenge physically and mentally as her brain took in this new space, this new world. Harry had been right. His Africa was different than hers—than the one she had grown used to. Though they both now held a very special place in her heart. As they neared their destination, the outlook over the vast wilderness below them, Harry nodded a challenge in her direction and then they were running—racing to the end.

"Is your birthday wish to leave me breathless?" Maddie huffed; only a few strides behind him as they came to a stop. "Because, my love, you have succeeded."

"Maybe it is," his cocky grin emerged. "But I have more detailed plans for that later."

"Ha!" Maddie's head tossed back as he looped his arms around her waist. "You're going to wear me out Wales."

"Looking forward to it," he tipped his head to kiss her before he nodded his head to the side. "Come on. You have to see this..." Stepping out of her space, he pulled on her hands; guiding her to the outlook. And Maddie went; finding herself more breathless than before.

"Oh my..." She sighed; the wind whipping around them as they looked out. Miles and miles of grassland spread before them; trees and animals and the sky was unbelievable.

"Exactly," Harry agreed; his eyes following hers. "Exactly." But he wasn't quite done. They still had more to see, more to explore. He was pushing this day to the absolute limits. And he loved that Maddie wasn't backing down—showing no sign of flinching. She was game to follow right alongside of him—wherever that took them.

When they came back from their hike, they moved immediately to a driving safari where they encountered giraffes and hippos and cheetahs and Maddie was amazed yet again. She felt like a little girl; clapping her hands together and grabbing his arm in excitement. And as Harry watched her, he leaned back in his seat, letting the sun heat him from the outside as her enjoyment heated him from the inside. This was home for him—in ways that London never could be—this was home. And he told her as much that afternoon as they floated across the delta in a boat—just the two of them, with his detail not far behind in their own boat.

"This, right here, is my absolute most favorite place on the entire earth," he broke into the stunning silence to bring her into his mind. "I would rather be here than anywhere else..." His smile was comfortable, content, at home.

"Wow..." She understood, without explanation, why he felt that way. The peacefulness, the naturalness, it was heart stopping. And then he continued.

"At least up until about two years ago...when I realized what it was that was happening between us. And then, I wanted to be wherever you were."
"Harry..." She smirked at the smile on his face, dripping with smarm.

"So bringing you here...it's just." He took a deep breath and let it go slowly. When he spoke, his voice was soft and low; causing Maddie to turn and look at him. "I can't tell you how much it means to have you here."

"You are just on fire today, aren't you?" She let a joke slip over the lump in her throat.

"I'm on fire every day," he winked and leaned to kiss her. "Thank you for coming with me."

"It's your birthday," she nuzzled her nose to his. "How could I refuse?"

When they finally returned to their room, to their suite, Maddie was exhausted. Harry had warned her, he had every intention of wearing her out that day and as far as she was concerned, he had accomplished his mission. They had hiked, they had safaried, they had taken a boat up the delta. And it had taken from her, physically and mentally, all day long. But she had never been happier. And all she needed now was a soak in their enormous tub and, being the gracious birthday boy he was, Harry started her water and hopped into the shower himself.

When he finished, Harry wrapped a towel around his waist, using another to pat at his hair, and bent to kiss her as she lay with her eyes closed; completely relaxed in the tub.

"Are you going to join me for a drink?" He smiled against her lips as she nodded.

"Absolutely. Can I just have like...five more minutes?"

"Take as much time as you like," he kissed her again.

Maddie allowed her eyes to peek open just enough to watch him walk away from her, appreciating how gorgeous he was—slightly tanned from their day in the sun, before she closed them and sank further into the water. She only stayed in a few minutes longer, preferring to be with him, preferring to celebrate his day with him instead of a bath full of water. She dried off, she adjusted the haphazard bun in her hair and she pulled on the soft, cotton pajamas she had brought with her. They weren't the sexiest things she owned but she knew that Harry found them unbelievably cute and they worked with the climate.

She felt better as she left the bathroom; refreshed. Her muscles had relaxed, her feet had recovered. Maddie stepped out into the suite, illuminated by lanterns and candles—so much better than the harsh lights they had left off since they had arrived—and her eyes searched immediately for him. Her smile stretched when she saw him. He was sitting in a chair with his back to her, pouring wine into the glasses on the table in front of him. She moved straight to him then, her fingers reaching out to run along the collar of his t-shirt, tickling his neck as she walked past him.

"Wine?" He grinned up at her; his eyes playful and alive in the soft light as he held up a glass.

"Thank you," she sighed, taking the glass from him and moving around his chair to the one directly opposite him. Sinking into the chair, she smiled across the small table between them through sleepy eyes and a smile that spoke of the long, hard day they had put in, the well-earned rest they deserved. "Do you have a frog in your pocket?" She asked him; studying his face thoughtfully.
"Sorry?" He laughed; his smile creasing the skin around his eyes. "A frog?"

"It's a...saying..." She waved her hand. "You look like you've just figured something out, or you're about to let me in on something..."

"Ah yes," he nodded, taking a big sip from his glass before sitting it on the table. Clapping his hands together, his eyes met hers, "I know what I want for my birthday."

"Oh?" Maddie was intrigued; having asked him long ago. Harry nodded and then, without moving his eyes from hers, his fingers tapped on the table, drawing her attention and her eyes downward.

And there it was; that small black box. That small black box that she swore wasn't sitting there just minutes ago when she had joined him. That small black box that could hold only one thing. Her eyes flashed up to his, her heart jumpstarting in her chest.

"Jewelry?" She whispered; even her voice knowing better. He didn't even flinch; didn't crack a laugh at her joke.

"You." He was calm, he was steady. He was sure.

"Oh my God..." Her voice was shaky, her eyes welling with tears. This was it. Her fingers flew to her lips while she tried to keep her cool, tried to keep her sense of humor, her wit.

"I've been..." Harry moved forward in his chair. "I've been thinking a lot about this moment; about how this would go. You know...I could go for sweet. I could pour my heart out to you, waxing poetic, and get on one knee and..." His voice caught on his emotions and he cleared his throat. "Or I could lay it all out there in simple terms; the pros, the cons...like a contract negotiation..." Maddie's laughter was soft across from him, bringing him back to her, back to the moment.

"Harry..." She moved in; her hand reaching out to him. "I..."

"Please. Please let me do this..." He captured her hand in his, pulling it to him; pressing it to his lips for a moment before he began. "My whole life I have been used to getting what I want. But this...this has been something that has eluded me. There was a point where I decided that I was probably going to have to sacrifice some of my high standards. That she wouldn't be as funny as I had hoped or as smart or as charitable. And then I met you...and I realized..."

"She wouldn't be as obedient as you had hoped?"

"No," he smiled. "I realized I wouldn't have to sacrifice anything at all."

"Harry..." She blinked at the wetness in her eyes.

"But you..." He grew teary; his fingers playing with hers. "Please know that I know the sacrifice that would come with a yes. I know how much you have had to give up just being with me. And I know how much more you'll have to give up so that I...so that I have to give up nothing. And I know how unfair that is. How unfair it will always be. I really don't know why anyone would ever say yes to such a thing... It's not an easy thing to do, saying yes to all of this. It's not a fair thing to ask of anyone. But. Today's my birthday. And the Forrester Family rules are..."

"You get whatever you want on your birthday."
"Exactly," he nodded, moving even closer; so that his knees knocked into the table. His face was bright. "I want this so bad, Madeline. I have never wanted something as much as I want this. As much as I want you. I have never loved anyone as much as I love you..." He took a shaky breath and then he smiled at her; a smile born of a life lived, a quest completed, a treasure found. "And if you say yes...if you are crazy enough to say yes..." She laughed, despite the tears in her eyes. "I promise that I will spend the rest of my life making the sacrifices worth it. I will love you. I will stand next to you. I will make you laugh. You will never have to want or need for anything..."

"My minty Christmas candy?"

"Absolutely." He nodded his head.

"Well, when you put it that way..." She tried for casual, tried for easygoing. But when Harry moved out of his chair, when he pushed the table to the side with a sweep of his hand, when his knees hit the floor and his hands scooped up both of hers, Maddie nearly lost her ability to breathe. This was really happening.

"Be my wife?" His eyebrows lifted, his eyes holding hers with the same soft, steady way his hands were holding hers. "Madeline...Maddie...I love you...with my whole heart. Will you? Will you marry me?"

Maddie had never been one of those girls who had spent her life thinking, dreaming, of this moment. She had never been one of those girls who had played it over and over in her head—this moment when a man would ask for her hand in marriage. In fact, she had always thought that when this moment actually came, she would feel a slight bit of fear; fear of giving something up, fear of taking on more than she could handle, fear of losing herself in somebody else.

But, looking down at Harry, she felt nothing but...freedom. Freedom and joy and happiness and love and safety and friendship and relief. She felt no fear. No apprehension. No loss. Even in the eyes of the sacrifices she understood were part of this role—she felt like she was gaining everything. Unable to find her words at first, she nodded; her hands moving to wipe at her eyes. And then, placing a hand on each side of his face, her eyes locked with his and he knew. This was what winning really felt like.

"Yes." Her voice was clear, steady. "Absolutely, yes." Her lips sought his in celebration; kissing him over and over and over again. Harry moved back off of his knees and pulled her from the chair into his lap, her legs stretching around him. In a mix of laughter and kisses, they settled there on the floor; arms wrapped around each other.

"Really?" Harry pulled back, his eyes searching hers. "Really? You said yes?"

"I did," she nodded. "Great Britain is never going to be the same..." He threw his head back in laughter; loving the smirk in her eyes.

"She said yes!" He called out into the room, ecstatic. "She said yes! She said yes!" His voice grew louder and Maddie’s hand moved to cover his mouth.

"You'll startle the baboons," she teased; sliding her hand away and kissing his mouth.

"You're going to be my wife..." His arms pulled her tighter to him.

"I'm going to be your wife." She settled closer.
"It sounds so much better when you say it," his voice was low as he kissed at her neck, her shoulder—heading down her arm.

"I'm going to be your wife," she repeated, loving the reaction he gave her. "I'm going to be your wife. I'm going to be your...hey..." She stopped as he pulled back suddenly; her hand clasped in his. "What is it?"

"We forgot something..." He kissed her fingers. "I forgot something..." He moved then, stretching around her to reach to the table. The little black box.

"Oh..." Maddie grew quiet; unexplainably nervous as Harry leaned back against the chair behind him; bringing the box between them.

"My mother left us an extensive collection of jewelry," he began his explanation with a soft smile. "Things that Kate and...and now you can have access too; things you can wear—things we can pass onto our children." Maddie felt her throat grow tight at the way he was speaking; of the past, of the future. "My brother gave Kate the engagement ring my father gave my mother and, when I told him that I was planning on asking you, we went to look at mum's stuff..." He took a deep breath. "But it just didn't feel right, you know? Asking you to marry me with something she had worn. My parent's marriage was...unhappy...and I kind of like the idea of us having a fresh start, not something that's already been worn by my mother. So I chose something else entirely." His fingers turned the box over and over again as he thought. "But, if you would prefer something from her collection, we can go there when we return and..."

"Stop," Maddie's fingers fell over his with a wide smile, halting the box in his hands. She leaned to kiss him. "I want this one. I want what you picked out."

Harry nodded—he knew she would. He kissed her again and snapped the box open. Maddie's eyes flashed wide for a split second when she saw it. It was beautiful; classic and pristine and absolutely perfect. Maddie's breath sucked in as Harry pulled the ring from the box; tossing the box back onto the chair behind him. His fingers held onto hers, "May I?" Maddie nodded and watched as he slid it into place; sealing the deal with a kiss to her hand, to her lips.

"Harry...It's beautiful..." She breathed; looking at the new addition to her hand, loving how it looked—what it signified. "I don't even know what to say..."

"Nothing," he shook his head with a gleam in his eye. "You said yes. There's no topping that."

"I love you..." Her arms wrapped back around his neck.

"Well okay..." He shrugged; his arms winding around her waist again. "That's a close second."

"I'm going to be your wife," her voice was low, seductive even as she looked down at him through lowered lashes.

"Say it again," his grin was cocky.

"I'm going to be your wife."

"Louder," he encouraged.

"I'm going to be your wife!" She yelled out; bringing them both into laughter.
"Come here," he whispered against her lips; his mouth opening, his tongue drawing her in. Just as his fingers slipped up under the hem of her top, the loud, familiar patter on the roof sounded out; bringing chuckles from the both of them. "You've startled the baboons."

"I like the baboons."

"I do too," he kissed her again. "So listen, before I take you here on the floor, claiming you in the name of Great Britain..."

"Ohhhh..." Maddie grinned; clapping her hands in excitement.

"We have two phone calls to make." He held up two fingers.

"Oh?" Her forehead creased.

"Your mother," he pulled his phone from his pocket. "She's been keeping this secret for me long enough..."

"Wait..." Maddie pulled the phone from his fingers. "She's been keeping this secret? My mother knows?"

"Of course she knows," Harry laughed. "She was the first to know. Right before your birthday, I flew to the states."

"For what?" Maddie was genuinely shocked, not only that he went to the states, but that she had no idea that he had gone to the states—that the press hadn't caught onto that.

"To ask her permission," it seemed so obvious. "What kind of man do you take me for?"

"A progressive one who doesn't necessarily need permission to ask a woman to marry him."

"I'm British Maddie. My grandmother is The Queen. I...I know how to waltz and the proper way to pen a Thank You note. There's nothing about me that isn't deeply seated in old fashioned decorum." His fingers brushed her hair back over her shoulder. "I flew to the states to ask for your mother's permission, her blessing. Which she gave, by the way..."

"Of course she did," Maddie sighed; he was just too charming for his own good—and for hers. "You know, she never said a word. She never even alluded to the idea..."

"I know," he nodded. "She promised me she wouldn't. So what do you say, should we call her, let her relax?"

"Yes," Maddie nodded enthusiastically. Harry plucked the phone from her fingers, found Hannah's contact information and dialed; handing the phone back to her. He watched while she bit her lip and waited for her mother to answer. "Mom..." Her voice went weak; a lump caught in her throat as her suddenly teary eyes rose to meet Harry's. "Mom, I'm getting married."

And Harry leaned back against the chair, his fingers falling on her thighs—still straddling his lap as she let her mother in on all of it; the trip to Africa, the safari, the hike. She told her about the baboons and the elephants, the dancing and the sunsets. And then she told her that he had asked. Yes—on his knee. Yes—with a ring. Yes—she said yes. After congratulations, after I Love You's, Maddie smiled and held the phone out to him. "She wants to talk to you." Harry took the phone from her hand, sneaking in a kiss before he pressed it to his ear.

"Mom..." He smiled as he said the word; having not said it in a very long time.

"You don't have to call me that, you know," though it made her smile wide.

"I know that." But he loved the way it sounded; loved the way it made him feel and he knew his mother would want this for him—all of this.

"Welcome to the family, son." He hadn't thought his heart could feel fuller than it had just moments ago, but it did.

"Thank you." He swallowed back the lump in his throat. "We're going to call my father next and he's going to orchestrate this...announcement," Harry chuckled at the thought of what was about to unfold. "I would like to give him your number so that the two of you can talk, so that you can be on the same page. Would that be okay?"

"Of course," she agreed. "And I promise, I'll keep it to myself until I'm told otherwise."

"I'm sorry that you have to do that..."

"Don't be," she cut him off. "Look at Maddie right now...is she smiling?"

"Yes," Harry's fingers reached out to stroke her cheek.

"Your job is done. Don't worry about the rest. You two enjoy the rest of your trip."

"We will." Harry nodded.

"Good night Harry. And good luck," he could hear the smirk in her voice; she sounded so much like her daughter.

"Good night mom," his eyes twinkled as he said it again; ending the phone call and looking up to Maddie. "She told me to tell you to be nice to me."

"She did?" Maddie's eyebrow arched; seeing the sarcasm in his eyes.

"She did," he nodded; leaning forward to kiss her neck. "She said that you should listen to what I tell you...do as I ask..." His voice grew lower as his kisses grew hotter.

"Harry..." She sighed, her head tilting back; her body responding. "But..."

"No buts," he shook his head, his lips caressing her now bared shoulder in a way that made her skin tingle.

"Your father..."

"Shh..." Harry's fingers moved to her lips. "I don't want to talk about him right now."

"Hmmm..." She chuckled against his fingers. "You need to call him. You need to...Oh!" Maddie exclaimed as Harry moved then, gripping her waist, moving out from underneath her; lowering her back down onto the plush rug beneath them—his lips returned to her collarbone as he stretched out over her. "Ohhhh..."
"I want to do this first," he smiled, his fingers reaching up under her shirt finding her skin soft and warm. And, though it took every last ounce of her strength, Maddie pushed at his chest lightly; pulling his face from the crook of her neck.

"Harry..." Her lip pulled between her teeth; barely grasping her ability to control herself. "Your father."

"Fine," he huffed; moving away from her. He sat up, his legs straddling her hips; pinning her to the rug beneath him as he looked down at her; phone in his fingers. "How long do you want love?"

"How long?" Her forehead creased her confusion.

"Before you become the main attraction in the circus that is my life?" His grin was slightly jaded. "When we get back to London, we're going to be pulled into a meeting where they lay it all out; how we'll announce it to the world, how you'll transition into...this." He shook his head. "After that, it's...there's no going back. So I just need to know...how long do you want? Before the announcement is made? You want a week? A week to be normal? A week to get settled? Two? Three? A month? You tell me. How long do you want?"

"I want..." She shook her head. "I...I want. Harry..." Her hands traveled up his flat stomach, tugging at his shirt; pulling his lips to hers. "I want to do this now. I don't want to wait. I don't think I can hide this. My poker face is terrible and I'm too excited. I..."

"You want to jump right in?" He wasn't sure if she was crazy or not, but he kind of liked the fearless look in her eyes as she kissed his jaw.

"Well, I already told the baboons."

"Yes you did," he nodded with a laugh.

"Can I? Can we?" She really didn't know. "Can we just jump right in? Do we have to wait?"

"Ha!" He laughed; loudly, heartily. "Love, we can do whatever you want...don't you get it?" He pulled her lips to his; kissing her solidly, soundly. "You're going to be the Duchess of Sussex. We tell them what we want...they make it happen."

"Oh..." It came out as a gasp, a bit of a sigh; just how big that statement was.

"Okay," Harry nodded and dialed the phone. "We'll do it right away." His eyes were serious, his smile celebratory, as he waited for his father to answer. Maddie watched as his father answered and Harry's face lit up—the first words out of his mouth made her heart skip. "She said yes." Feeling blissful, feeling frisky, Maddie's hands moved up under his shirt, teasing the skin there; his eyes snapped to hers. "Thank you, Sir. Yes...yes." He shook his head at her as her fingers traced pattern on his stomach, inching closer to the waist of his shorts. "As soon as possible..." His fingers circled her entire wrist as he caught her, pulling her hand away from him with a wicked look in his eye. "Yes sir. We're flying back tomorrow night. We'll be back early Tuesday morning..." She grinned up at him as her other hand moved into his shorts, bypassing the tease altogether. His breath sucked in as he fought to control his reaction. "Thank you. I will. I love you too. Yes. I'll see you then." Harry was quick to end the call with his father, quick to toss the phone to the chair behind him and quick to pull her other hand into his grasp; stretching her arms up over her head. "You're a naughty young lady, Doctor Forrester."
"Oh?" She bit her lip; her body tingling with anticipation.

"And you have no idea what you're in for."

As Maddie's giggles filled the room, drifting out into the warm summer night, she took that statement in—in so many ways.

Harry, his mouth and hands working together, was determined to make her pay for her distracting ways; to make her moan and sigh and call out his name. He was determined to bring back the celebration, the love, the spiritedness that came with this moment. Despite what awaited them at home, this was a joyous night; one to be marked, one to be revered. And he had every intention of doing just that. It was, after all, his birthday.

He worked hard. He played big. And this, Maddie—his life with her, was going to be no exception.
"I don't want to leave..." Maddie sighed into his shoulder on their last day in Botswana. They were packed, the car was waiting and he had come out to the deck to fetch her. It was time to go; time to leave this beautiful paradise that had given her a future husband. And, as she thought about it, about leaving, she felt tears come to her eyes laughing at herself as it happened. "Ugh...seriously? What is with the crying?!

"You like it here," he nudged her chin up with his fingers.

"I love it here..." She nodded; her head heavy. "I feel so good here...I could live here...I would give up everything I own if I could just stay right here..."

"Including me?" His grin was soft.

"I don't own you."

"Semantics," he shrugged.

"As if you wouldn't move here in a heartbeat."

"I would," he nodded, his hands moving along her arms. "You want to?"

"I really do." She sighed again; surrendering to reality. "Time to go?"

"Yes," he nodded.

"You still have that ring?" Her hands slipped around his waist, her lips tilting up to his.

"I do," he chuckled at her. "You know, I brought it all the way down here without any incidents. Perhaps I can be trusted to get it back to London?"

"Perhaps," her smile pulling wide as he kissed her.

"Forty-eight hours, Forrester," he swatted at her ass. "You can have it back in forty-eight hours."

"Forty-eight hours," she echoed, not thinking of the ring. Thinking, instead, of him; of moving on to this next phase of their relationship.

"Come on love," he reached for her hand. "London's calling." With a smirk and snicker, Maddie allowed Harry to pull her through their suite, towards the main house and the awaiting car. Their time in heaven was finished. It was time to return to England and all that awaited them at home.

When they arrived home, early in the morning on a cloudy Tuesday, Maddie was thankful they had decided to take the ring off until the announcement. Because, as they made their way from the plane to the car, a short distance that was behind the scenes in the Private Chartered area, Maddie counted no less than ten people who could have seen, who could have leaked. And the smile on her face was too much of a giveaway as it was.
"Thomas," Harry grinned at his Chief of Staff who was waiting with the car. Harry had told Maddie he would be there, he had called ahead to let the Palace know what was happening and he had done his best to prepare her for what they were walking back into.

"Congratulations Sir," Thomas grinned back, extending his hand to shake the young man's hand. Yes, he was his Chief of Staff. Yes, he was an employee—technically. But he had been around long enough to see the impact this woman had on Harry and he was genuinely happy for the both of them.

"Thank you," Harry's smile extended as Thomas patted his shoulder before turning the same bright smile to Maddie, he extended his hand to her. "Doctor Forrester."

"Mr. Smith," Maddie smiled, taking his hand. "Congratulations ma'am."

"Thank you very much," her cheeks grew rosy, her eyes sparkled and she sighed. Apparently she was going to have very little control over the visceral reaction that occurred when she thought of her brand new engagement.

"Where are we going?" Harry asked as the driver opened the door for them, the staff moving their things from the plane to the car.

"Clarence House," Thomas answered. "They are waiting for you there."

"Fantastic," Harry took a deep breath through smiling lips. "Okay my darling, are you ready for this?" He stood next to the opened door, hands clasped together in front of him. Maddie smiled sweetly at him; touched by the fact that he was still nervous—after all this time. Moving close to him, she was slow when she moved her cheek next to his—pressing a kiss there.

"I'm ready," she sighed, sliding past him into the car.

Harry watched as she took her seat and then followed her in, the door shutting behind him. As soon as Thomas was inside the car, they were in motion. Harry had spent the last part of the flight preparing Maddie for what was awaiting them when they returned. She knew they were heading to meet first with his father and then with the people who would be coordinating the announcement for the palace as well as a few, critical, others. He had warned her, things were going to be perfunctory. Yes, they were in love. Yes, they were engaged, looking forward to vows and pledges and spending their lives together. But this, a royal wedding, was so much bigger than just them. And Maddie understood. She hadn't spent the last few years as his girlfriend with her head in the sand. She knew what she was walking into—as much as she could. So, before the plane landed, she had slipped off to the bedroom, changed into a dress that was more business and less holiday—touching up her makeup and pinning up her hair. If she was walking into a business meeting, she figured it would help to be in business mode.

Harry smiled as he watched her watch the city fly by. She was focused on something entirely outside of the car. She was deep in thought, her mind miles from him. Her forehead was creased just slightly, her teeth biting tenderly at her bottom lip. Reaching across the leather seats, his fingers found hers—pulling them into his hand.

Her face snapped back to the car, back to him—her smile finding him and strengthening. Turning her hand over in his, she held onto him. Her eyes met his and there he saw confidence, certainty; he saw Maddie—the woman he had met in Bendal, the woman who stayed on his mind for months after that first brief conversation, the woman who had taken a leap of faith and come to London, the woman who held his heart in hers.

In no time they were pulling to a stop outside Clarence House. Harry was out of the car first, holding his hand out to Maddie; wanting to be the one to pull her from the car, to pull her in. It was a silly thing to feel, but he felt it anyway. Maddie let him take her hand in his, leading the way from the car, up the steps, and straight inside his father's home.

Maddie knew that Charles and Camilla were waiting for them and she assumed that they would be there to congratulate the two of them, welcome them home from their trip. What she had not prepared for was the surge of emotions she felt when she saw them for the first time—the way Charles' entire face was smiling. She hadn't been prepared for the way Harry's breath caught in his throat when his father pulled him into his arms holding tight to him, even after pressing kisses to his cheek and congratulating him for the second time. She hadn't been prepared for the way Camilla would welcome her into the family, into this exclusive little club with a sweet tenderness that radiated from her core. She most certainly had not been prepared for the way Charles took her into his arms in a bone crushing hug. It was so unlike him, she thought, to break from his standard, controlled self and let his feelings rush out of him like that. With a lump in her throat, she hugged him back. He kissed her cheeks, congratulated her; welcomed her to the family. And then he kissed her hands and hugged her again.

Maddie felt tears in her eyes, even as he pulled away and looked the two of them over again. She could tell he wanted to stay there, in that moment. She could tell that he was struggling with his roles, with his responsibilities. There was a part of him that just wanted to be a dad; just wanted to celebrate with his son over scotch and cigars—to smirk and warn his future daughter-in-law about those crazy intricacies that came with being one of "them." There was a part of him that wanted what they wanted, to just let this be a moment of excitement and celebration; a moment where this young couple had decided to spend their lives together.

But he knew better. And so did Maddie—so did they all. It wasn't quite that simple and it certainly wasn't that free of complications. She could see the exact moment that duty won out; he cleared his throat and tamed his wide grin. Harry saw it too. Reaching for Maddie's hand, he glanced towards the stairs.

"They're waiting?"

"They are," Charles nodded. Harry pulled Maddie's hand tighter in his; drawing her closer to him.

"Okay love," his eyes twinkled as he looked to her. "Shall we see what they have lined up for us?" Because it wasn't really a question, Maddie didn't really answer. She simply squeezed his hand in hers and took a step towards the stairs. Camilla bid them good luck, opting to sit this particular meeting out and Charles followed behind them—mostly for moral support. He had given up long ago with trying to control the flow of things. This wasn't his moment, it was his son's.

"Now listen," Harry's voice was low as they ascended the stairs. "Thomas is going to be up here as well as somebody from the palace..."

"Ms. Edwards," Charles spoke up.

"Claire Edwards," Harry nodded. "She's a Press Officer from Buckingham." Maddie's nod was small, quick; she was following along. "Who else?" He looked to his dad.

"A family attorney," Charles' eyes fazed out as he thought.

"An attorney?" Maddie was surprised by that; thoughts of prenuptial agreements running through her mind. Harry's eyes narrowed at his father as the same thoughts crossed his.

"To brief the two of you on your citizenship status and what your options are moving forward.” Satisfied with that answer, they reached the top of the stairs and rounded a corner.

"Security?" Harry asked and Charles nodded.

"You'll meet with the head of Madeline's security team next." Maddie stalled for a step; mentally tripping on the words Madeline's security team. Harry laughed as he and his father stopped moving, watching her face process it.

"Does that..." She coughed into her fist and smiled at Charles. "Does that start right after the announcement?"

"No, dear," he reached his hand out to rest on her arm. "That starts right now."

"Wow..." Maddie felt the corner of her mouth turn up in a grin—this was getting more and more real with every step they took. Harry chuckled again, reclaiming her hand with his.

"I have to say, I feel a certain amount of relief knowing there will be somebody with you now...keeping you out of trouble."

"Ha!" Charles laughed; clapping his hand on Harry's back. "That's not quite how it works out now, is it son?" Maddie had to laugh at that.

"I suppose not," Harry agreed, drawing to a stop outside the conference room. He looked to Maddie as she ran her hands lightly over her hair and down over the skirt of her dress. "The people you are about to sit with are going to have a plan for us, an agenda. Keep in mind that they are professionals. This isn't their first announcement, this isn't their first engagement and they absolutely know what they are doing."

"Okay," Maddie nodded, taking it all in. Harry stepped closer to her then, invading her space.

"That being said if they come up with something that doesn't sit well, something you're not too sure about, you need to speak up. This isn't a moment for body language or mind reading. You have to speak your mind and let me know what you want."

"Okay," she smiled up at him; her eyes steady and fixed on his.

"You sure about this love?" His voice was low as he teased her. "If you want to back out, now's the time."

"Hmm..." She grinned, tapping her finger to her chin. "I think I'll go ahead and give it a go, if it's all the same to you."

"Don't say I didn't warn you," Harry lifted her hand to his lips and, with a nod of his head, the large, heavy doors were pulled open and there it was. Her new life; waiting for her at the large table. There were several people sitting at the table when they entered and every single one of them dropped what they were doing and rose to their feet.

There was a moment, a brief one, when Maddie stalled; her feet declining movement as she suddenly recalled the last time she was in this room. Harry had called her in to tell her—he had been deployed. It only took her one second to recover; one second to pull her feet back in action. And in that second, Harry’s hand found the small of her back; resting there with ease and comfort. He was right there with her; standing at her side full of support.

Thomas was the first to step forward; introducing Maddie to the group of people at the table. Maddie smiled, nodded, and shook the hand of each and every one of them.

Claire Edwards, Press Officer from Buckingham Palace, seemed to be in charge of the table; running the show. Though Harry’s Chief of Staff was the heavyweight, Ms. Edwards was orchestrating the announcement. She assured them both that they were ready to announce as early as three in the afternoon the next day; that Maddie's mother had been brought in and would be informing the family an hour before they went live from Buckingham Palace.

Harry looked to Maddie with raised eyebrows, ready if she was. Squeezing his leg under the table, Maddie nodded and answered for the two of them. "We'll go ahead for three tomorrow afternoon."

"Excellent," Claire smiled and made a quick note in her notebook.

Maddie wasn't sure which part of the meeting that ensued was the most surreal. It could have easily been meeting the team of men whose job it was to stand between her and danger—the way they made copies of her keys while she sat there, the way they handed her a key fob with a panic button, or the way they informed her, quite simply, that they would be with her twenty-four hours a day until she moved into Kensington with her fiancé not long after the announcement.

It also could have been the stylist, Rosie Tellington, who took one look at her and instantly knew her sizes, her color preferences; already making a mental list of the dress options she would be sending to her the next morning at Harry's place. Or it could have been the lawyer who had delved knee deep into her visa, her travel history, her citizenship status. He made her aware that he would be filing with the UK Border Agency on her behalf, letting them know of her intent to marry. He suggested she take the two required tests for citizenship prior to the wedding and then wait until she had reached the three full years of residency upon which time he would submit her application on her behalf. Apparently quite a bit of things were going to be done on her behalf now that she was marrying into the family.

It could have been any of those moments. But, if she were pressed, she would have to say that the most surreal of them all turned out to be the one moment she should have been expecting, the moment Harry had already warned her about. It all unfolded when Thomas suggested that Maddie and Harry lay low immediately following the announcement; perhaps taking a trip to Highgrove for a few weeks. Maddie had stated, quite naively in retrospect, that going to the country wouldn't work well with her upcoming work schedule. Thomas, being the consummate professional he was, covered his surprise quite well, nodding before turning his eyes to Charles who, in turn, looked to Harry. Maddie watched the exchange and caught up quickly.

"Oh." She felt a little embarrassed and slightly amused at the three grown men passing a look around the table—as if they were challenging the other to break the news. "I'm done now, aren't I?"

"Maddie." It turned out Harry was the brave one; leaning forward, his hand resting on hers.
"No," she held up her hand and offered him a sweet smile. "It's okay. I knew this was coming."
She turned to Thomas then, her head nodding. "I understand—I get it. I just need to know, do you want me to give my notice now or wait until after the announcement?" Thomas glanced back at Harry and Maddie couldn't help the chuckle that breathed from her lips. "Ah...you want me to just not go back."

"Your employer would most certainly understand," Thomas explained; having sympathy for her predicament and, frankly, appreciating the innocence she came with. "You are working in London and the people here are quite familiar with the demands of the Royal Family."

"I understand," she nodded, taking a deep breath and schooling her face. "I am sure you are correct, my employer would understand. However...it would be ethically irresponsible of me to leave my clients without properly terminating our relationship." She felt Harry's hand squeeze hers; a show of support she imagined. "I will be happy to speak to my boss as soon as you would like and we can drastically scale back my hours. I won't take on new clients. I can stop being on call for crisis intervention. But I won't abandon the people on my caseload right now. That could do...irreparable harm. Once I process them and exit them, I will be done. But I won't just walk out the door."

There was a pause; a moment of silence where everyone in the room took a breath. Charles was the first one to move; turning in his chair to speak directly to her.

"Of course, dear," his voice was warm and calming as always. "We wouldn't want you to cause your clients any harm. How long do you think that will take?"

"Most of my clients will only need one more session, especially when they find out why..." She turned to face her future father-in-law. "But some may need two. I would say two weeks—at the very most." Charles smiled thoughtfully and then nodded.

"Two weeks then." Both Thomas and Claire made notes in their notebooks as Harry patted her knee with a smile. And the conversations continued.

It was a lot to take in, they knew that; they all knew that. Maddie was not the first prospective bride to sit at that table, or a table just like it. She wasn't the first to be surprised by the level of handling. But, all things considered, she was doing quite well. She was taking the additions to her life with ease, she was handling the subtractions with grace. And, as the meetings drew to a close,
Thomas had a pretty great hunch that things were going to go smoothly.

So, after they finalized plans for the announcement the next afternoon—3pm at Buckingham Palace, a photo call with the cameras and a sit down interview with the BBC—Claire handed them a list of potential questions and told them to get some rest. Tomorrow was a big day, a day that was going to open up a flurry the likes of which Maddie hadn't quite seen yet. There would be many more meetings following the announcement; there was a wedding to plan, a bride to move—there were things that needed to happen. But for now, for this moment, they needed to focus only on the matter at hand.

Charles let them know that he would be hosting a dinner for them and the family at Clarence House immediately following the interview, to celebrate the news. And then, with a return to being a dad, he hugged and kissed them both and sent them on their way.

"You okay?" Harry was cautious as he watched her across the back seat of the car; recognizing the stun on her face, the shock.
"Mmm..." She nodded, swallowing as she turned a smile to him. "I'm great."

"Yeah?" He raised his eyebrows with a slight upturn of his lips.

"Absolutely." She nodded. Harry nodded and let it sit for one full minute before he chuckled and shook his head. "What? What's so funny?"

"You," he sighed. "I'm great? Really, Maddie? You're going to start lying to me before we're even married?"

"I'm..." She shook her head; searching for the right words to convey her feelings.

"Great?" He laughed. "You just sat in a room where a slew of other people, most of them unknown to you, told you that you were quitting your job in two weeks, that your things are going to be packed for you and moved to Kensington Palace, that two men who you don't know are going to start following you everywhere you go...you have a strange woman picking out clothes for you and ..." He leaned closer to her; pulling her hand into his. "Come on. Don't lie to me, love. Great?"

"Okay," she blinked at unexpected tears, her nerves getting the best of her. "Okay. I'm not great. But I'm okay." She smiled at him, squeezing his fingers. "I...I don't want you to think that I don't want to do this, that I'm not ready to do this..."

"I don't," his eyes, his voice, remained steady. He didn't. He knew she was there, he knew that she was ready.

"Good..." She sighed, tightening her hold on his hand. "Because I do. I am." She smiled then. "It's just...that was pretty intense."

"Yes."

"And a little crazy."

"A little?" Harry laughed.

"A lot," she breathed a little easier. "I mean, that woman and her insistence that I wear the exact shade of beige..."

"Bisque not Taupe." Harry's voice grew harsh, his face turning serious. "Bisque has pinky undertones. It will look better with your coloring and..." Maddie's laughter made him break, made him smile. She leaned to kiss him.

"Exactly..." She sighed, acceptance washing over her body; softening her posture, relaxing the professional face she had worn throughout the meeting. "I'm fine Harry." Her hand tucked into his arm.

"Promise?" He kissed the top of her head.

"I promise." She let a grin pull at her lips. "You know what I need?"

"No," he shook his head. "But whatever it is, I'll get it for you."
"Ella," she sighed. "I need to go to my best friend and tell her that I'm engaged. I need to jump up and down and be excited about that part of all of this."

"Let's do it."

"No," she shook her head at him. "You can't come with me." She laughed at the hurt look on his face. "I need girl time, darling. I need to talk about how romantic you are, about the wonderful things you said to me. I can't do that while you're standing there."

"Fine," he huffed playfully. "But you do realize you're taking Sampson with you? That's how it works now." He nodded towards the car that trailed them.

"So I've heard," she smirked; she smirked; tilting her lips up to kiss him. "I would really like to change into something else. Do you think they've already moved me into the palace or..."

"Ha!" Harry laughed; happy she was joking about it all, maintaining her sense of humor. "Not quite yet. Why don't we stop at Kensington and then you and Sampson can take a car to your place and then to Ella."

"Take a car..." Maddie shook her head slowly. "So this is how it is now."

"This is how it is now," Harry nodded; his hand squeezing her knee.

This was only the beginning.
Chapter 76

After a brief stop at home, Maddie was quick to discover the Security Team had already moved in; checking the place out, setting up a few things in the spare room she had offered for the night officer. Maddie changed into a simple skirt—choosing to go for a casual look she figured she would be avoiding for quite some time. With a glance in the mirror, Maddie offered her reflection a shrug and a sympathetic smile. With a security officer in the living room and a car waiting outside for her, life was already changing. There really was nothing much for her to do but smile and go along with it. And, at the end of the day, Harry was going to be waiting for her.

It was time to let the world in on their secret; one person at a time. She packed a small overnight bag and slipped out the door. It was a short ride to Ella's place, a camera free ride. And, as Maddie hurried into the building, up the steps to her place, she couldn't help the excitement that flowed through her veins. Knocking on the door, her foot tapped slightly as she waited.

"Maddie!" Ella's face lit up when she saw her best friend; swinging the door open. "I'm so glad you're here!"

"I'm sorry I didn't call. I just...are you alone?" Maddie asked, her eyes looking over Ella's shoulder into the apartment.

"Yes, Bishop is working. You want to come in? Have some wine? Tell me about your trip?" Ella stood aside.

"Yes," Maddie breathed a sigh of relief; ever thankful for a friend such as this. "Do you mind if my friend takes a look around first?"

"Your friend?" Ella laughed as Sampson stepped forward. "Sure..." She stepped aside, slightly confused. "You have Harry out there with you?" Maddie's eyes meet Ella's and she couldn't control her smile any longer, it burst across her cheeks as she shook her head.

"No. Just me."

"But then why..." Ella pointed to Sampson who had finished his scan of the place and had rejoined them in the entry way.

"Everything's fine ma'am," he smiled at Maddie and stood aside.

"Thank you Sampson," Maddie nodded as Ella's eyes grew wide; understanding hitting her like a freight train.

"Oh my fucking God. That's your Security officer! Get in here!" She tugged on her friend's arm, pulling her inside.

"Shhhh..." Maddie held her finger to her lips while Ella shut and locked the door behind her. Sampson couldn't help the smile that crossed his face as he moved to his post; ready if needed.

"Tell me that that guy means what I think he means!"

"I'm going to need you to be very, very quiet." Maddie warned, a smug grin tugging at her mouth. "Silent, in fact."
"Go." Ella nodded once.

"He means what you think he means." Maddie laughed as Ella clamped two hands over her mouth, one on top of the other, in effort to avoid screaming. Her eyes welled up with tears and then her hands slid from her face.

"He asked you to marry him?"

"He did." Maddie felt tears in her own eyes.

"And you said..."

"You think they send you out with security if you say no?"

"Oh my God..." Ella hugged her arms around Maddie again; pulling back only to look at her face.

"When? Where?"

"On his birthday." The blissfulness overtook Maddie's face; her eyes shining. "In Botswana."

"On his birthday..." She cooed, her hand resting over her heart. "Come with me," Ella pulled on Maddie's arm, dragging her down the hallway to her room. She crossed the room in a few long strides, tugged the curtains closed and hopped onto the bed; sitting on her knees. "Get in here. Get in here and tell me every single last detail." Maddie giggled as she moved onto the bed with Ella; this was exactly what she needed.

"What do you want to know?"

"Everything," Ella sighed dramatically. "Starting with...where's the ring?" Her eyes zeroed in on Maddie's left hand.

"Back at the Palace. It's locked up in a safe until tomorrow at 3pm."

"3pm?"

"When we make the announcement."

"You nervous?"

"No," Maddie shook her head. "Though I know I should be, I'm not."

"Are you going to do the whole show? The cameras and the interview and all of it?"

"All of it," Maddie nodded, her mind spiraling out for just a second. "It's crazy, Ella. It's the craziest thing I've been a part of, and I've been a part of some pretty crazy things."

"It's only going to get crazier," Ella was deliriously happy as she broke the news to her friend.

"I know," Maddie nodded. "I have you though...to keep me grounded. Right?" Her eyebrows lifted and Ella could see just the slightest hint of nerves. She was quick to nod, quick to assure her.

"Absolutely." She pulled at Maddie's hand, bringing her along as she laid back into the heap of pillows. "Now. No more talk of the palace. Tell me how he did it. Did he get on one knee? Did he hide the ring in your dessert? Did he cry?" Maddie laughed as she settled in next to her best friend and began the story she would continue to tell over and over again, to their friends and family; every time with the same, giddy smile on her face.

The two friends were still lying in Ella's bed when they heard Bishop unlock the door and call out into the apartment for Ella. With giggles, she informed him to her location and in two seconds he was standing in her doorway, watching the two of them with an amused grin.

"Hi Bishop," Maddie waved to him with a wide smile.

"Madeline," he nodded, looking around the room before his eyes focused on Ella. "Okay. Where is he?"

"Who?" Ella's forehead scrunched up.

"Harry."

"Harry?" She laughed.

"Look, I know that this..." He waved a finger to Maddie and back to Ella. "Is a particular fantasy of yours..."

"Hey!" Ella threw a pillow at him as Maddie giggled.

"But it is not happening. Not as long as I'm around." He winked playfully at Maddie and crossed his arms over his chest. "Now. Where is he?"

"He's not here," Ella shook her head.

"No?" Bishop raised his eyebrows.

"It's just me," Maddie raised her hand. Bishop's focus narrowed on her, allowing for a quick glance back towards the door.

"But there's a shadow outside. I just assumed..." His speech faded as realization dawned on him. His grin stretched out across his entire face, his eyes sparkling at being brought in on a secret. "That shadow's with you." He pointed to Maddie; smug and sure of himself.

"He is."

"And Harry is..."

"At Kensington...clearing out a few drawers, I suppose," Maddie couldn't help but laugh at her own joke.

"He sent me a text telling me to come straight there..." Bishop shook his head slowly, his mind catching up and then he settled his focus on Maddie. "Get out of bed love."

"Excuse me?"

"I want to hug you and kiss you and wish you the best..." He took a deep breath and let it out slowly. "But I cannot get into a bed with my best friend's bride...with a future Duchess. Now get out here and let me kiss you."

"Well, when you put it like that..." Maddie teased, lifting herself off the bed. The second her feet hit the floor, Bishop had her in his arms. "Oh..." She let out a puff of air as he squeezed her tight. She could see Ella over his shoulder, watching with soft eyes.

"Congratulations," his voice was low, slightly rough, as he pressed a kiss to the side of her head.

"Hey..." Maddie was gentle with him as they parted, her eyes searching his. "You okay?"

"I am," he nodded, taking a deep, cleansing breath.

"You sure?"

"I just..." He chuckled lightly. "Before he met you, Maddie..." He looked down at his hands, debating his next move; what he was going to say, how much he was going to reveal. "That year before he met you, he was just...not in the best mind. You know? I don't know that he thought he was ever going to...." Bishop swallowed and shook his head. "It's harder for a prince. Everyone thinks it's easier. But it's not. And you've made him incredibly happy. I'll love you forever because of it."

"Wow..." Maddie felt tears gathered in her throat. "Who knew that Bishop would end up the most emotional in the group?" She ruffled his hair with her fingers before leaning in to kiss him. "I'll love you forever too."

"Good," he smiled sweetly for a beat and then he broke; his cocky, smarmy, self returning. "Okay ladies. Enough with this. Put on your shoes. We're going to the Palace."

"Oh we are?" Ella raised her eyebrows as Bishop leaned to kiss her; to greet her properly.

"Absolutely." He nodded. "There is no reason we should be celebrating here while Harry is all alone at Kensington. It just doesn't seem right." He kept talking as he led them down the hallway. "I'll grab some champagne. You put on your shoes."

"Okay," Maddie couldn't help but giggle at Bishop's determination, at his love for her soon to be husband. So she did as he instructed; slipping her shoes back on her feet. "Hey Ella...when Bishop said this was a particular fantasy of yours..."

"Oh God," Ella groaned; rolling her eyes. "Did he mean you and I? Or just you and Harry? Or the three of us?" Bishop chuckled at the conversation. "Because, while there is no way I let you at Harry...you and I..." Maddie wagged her eyebrows at her friend who burst into laughter.

"Not funny," Bishop narrowed his eyes at the two of them. "It is not funny to kid around like that." But the laughter refused to fade. "Come on. Let's get Maddie's shadow and go find our boy." Linking her arm through Ella's Maddie continued to grin at Bishop as they followed him out the door.

Having made it back to Kensington, Maddie was still in shock at the entirely new ease of access she had to the property; the way the gates just opened, the way she was waved through with a nod and a smile. Trying not to think too much of it, they went to Harry—who was thrilled to see them. He let Ella hug and kiss him. He let Bishop hold him for a few extra beats; thankful for the love and friendship he had with him. And then they opened the champagne.

"Oh my God..." Ella's mouth twisted up as she read through the list of questions that had been sitting on the low table in the living room.

"What is it?" Maddie glanced in her direction as Harry and Bishop returned from the kitchen with full glasses.

"These questions," she waved the paper in the air. "Are they really going to ask you if you plan on having children?"

"I think so," Maddie sighed; accepting a glass of champagne and a kiss from Harry. "Are they going to ask us that?"

"Most definitely," he patted her ass and sank down onto the couch; pulling her hand so that she went with him.

"Where did they come up with some of these?" She smiled up at Bishop as he joined her, passing off a drink.

"The Press Officer gathered them up," Harry shrugged. "Some are from the questions they asked Will and Kate, some she added based on press inquiries. I doubt they'll ask all of them but, it should be a good estimation."

"Hmmm..." Ella took a sip from her drink and scanned the list again. "Want to practice?" She looked up at Maddie with raised eyebrows.

"Practice?" Maddie smiled.

"Yeah," Ella nodded, taking another drink. "I'll ask you two the questions and you can practice how you're going to answer."

"You know what, that's not a bad idea," Maddie looked to Harry. "What do you think?"

"Whatever you want love," he drained his glass and sat it on the table in front of him.

"Okay," Maddie situated herself in her seat and nodded to Ella. "Go ahead."

"Okay..." Ella cleared her throat and sat up tall. "First...Congratulations," Ella's voice was deep, rich and made the three of them laugh out loud. Maintaining her professional demeanor, she continued. "How about you start by telling us all about the proposal..." She crossed her hands in her lap and looked to Maddie and Harry expectantly.

"Well..." Maddie turned to Harry then. "I don't know what to...what do you want to tell them?"

"What do you want to tell them?" He countered; reaching for his drink.

"Okay, now I'm nervous." She laughed lightly and took a deep breath. Harry patted her knee and turned a charming smile to Ella—who still sat in character.
"I asked her on my birthday on a trip to Botswana. It was private and intimate and perfect for us."

"And did you say yes right away?" Ella smiled at her best friend.

"I did," she nodded with a smile; that was easy enough.

"That's a very beautiful ring," Ella looked at Maddie's ring-free left hand before breaking character for a moment, "though I wouldn't really know that since I have yet to see it. Ahem." She narrowed her eyes at Harry.

"You want me to go get it right now?" Harry chuckled at Ella.

"Yes."

"Fine." Harry moved to stand.

"No!" Maddie put her hands out, one on Harry's knee, one on Ella's arm. "Stay put. This is important. This is important." She hurried before Ella could speak again. "I know you started this for fun but this is more important than the ring right now. Tomorrow I am going to go on TV and...THIS is what the world is going to know." She turned to Harry then with wide eyes. "What do we want that to be? Is it easier to be totally honest? Do I want to open myself up to review from the public? Do they need to know that you were on your knees? Does it help that you had tears in your eyes or that you flew to the states to ask my mom..."

"You flew to the states to ask her mom?" Ella's eyes went soft.

"You knew that," Harry shook his head at Ella.

"I know, but hearing her say it..." She clutched the list of questions to her heart. "You should definitely tell them he did that. People are going to go nuts when they hear that."

"What else is on the list?" Maddie's hands released the two of them and her eyes focused on the sheet in Ella's hand. "Please continue."

"Okay," Ella nodded, shifting back into her seat. "Harry...it is well known that your brother proposed with your mother's engagement ring..."

"Yes," he nodded, his fingers reaching out to twine with Maddie's.

"Is this ring a family ring as well?"

"No," Harry shook his head. "Well, I suppose that it is now."

"Good answer," Ella smiled at Harry. "Now, did you ask for her mother's permission?"

"I spoke with Mrs. Forrester on numerous occasions and had her blessing before we went to Botswana."

"Now Doctor Forrester," Ella turned her attention to Maddie who had relaxed considerably into her seat. "Can you take us back to the beginning? How did the two of you meet? What did you think of each other? What was your first impression of Harry?"

"Hmmm..." Maddie smiled as she looked down at her hands in her lap; her whole body warmed as she remembered meeting him. Her eyes rose to look at Ella, "We met in Bendal, in Southern Africa. I was there working with Doctors Without Borders and Harry was there opening up a Community Center. I asked him..."

"Asked?" Ella arched an eyebrow playfully.

"I asked him to help me unload a truck full of food and he very graciously did." Maddie narrowed her eyes at Ella; skipping over her jokes. "I thought he was...kind."

"Kind?" Harry laughed. "You thought I was kind?"

"You were kind."

"Wow. Kind." Clearly Harry was unimpressed.

"Sorry man," Bishop frowned playfully.

"What's wrong with kind?!" Maddie looked from face to face to face. "What do you want me to say? That my first thought was...damn, I hope that kid has on sunblock because this sun is going to fry his ginger ass?"

"Ha!" Bishop busted out laughing.

"I think I prefer kind," Harry laughed along.

"Would you rather me tell the world how I thought your smile was ridiculously charming? How, after I realized you were actually a Prince, I was incredibly embarrassed at my not knowing? How about how I found it difficult to form complete sentences around you?" Harry's laughter faded as Maddie moved closer to him on the couch; her leg stretching out across his lap, her head tipping to the side. "Did you want me to say that I found you witty and funny and full of this...attitude that made me want to..." She trailed off, biting at her lower lip. "I thought about you daily after you left that first time....and then you brought me my candy." Her fingers reached out to the buttons on his shirt. "You want me to tell them how romantic you are? How you dropped everything to fly to Bendal to kiss me? How still, to this day, you stash my candy everywhere...so I'm never without it? You want me to tell them all that?" Harry's eyes were scattered as he watched her; his heart pounding as he wished desperately that their friends could just disappear.

"I..." He stammered.

"I do," Ella breathed; unable to help herself. Bishop allowed a small laugh to slip from his lips as he nudged her lightly. "Sorry," she blushed slightly. "I just...I really do. I think you should tell them that."

"Okay now," Maddie laughed, pulling her hand and her leg away from Harry—straightening up in her chair. "My first impression of Harry was that he was gracious. He was caring and humble. He mixed with the townspeople with ease. He was particularly wonderful with the children. I remember being drawn to him...from the very beginning." Ella was beaming as she watched the two of them on the couch, feeling every bit the role of a fan, of a viewer who might be watching to see what this couple was all about. And she knew, if the palace was hoping to paint Harry as moving away from his playboy ways, as becoming more of a family man...they weren't going to have to work very hard at it.

"That's wonderful," Ella cleared her throat, forcing herself back into her role. "And you Sir, what was your first impression of Madeline?" Harry blinked, his lips twitching into a smile as his mind went back. Moving forward in his chair just a bit, his hands came together in front of him and his smile widened.

"My first impression was that she was..." He let a breath of a laugh out. "She was beautiful."

"Aw," Ella's head tilted.

"How is beautiful worse than kind?" He turned to her with wide eyes.

"Because at least kind speaks to your character. Beautiful is on the outside. It's superficial..." She sighed. "Beautiful."

"Hold on," he moved to face her completely. "Let's just... I was in Africa, one of my favorite places in the world. You were working for an organization that helps the sick and underserved, more specifically children. You were this incredibly sexy woman who was dressed down and unloading a truck of food...and when I asked you for directions, you looked right past the title and ordered me to carry boxes..." He shrugged, unwilling to budge. "Fuck me if I find that beautiful." There was a small beat of a moment before Maddie's lips twitched; cracking into a smile and the room eased.

"That's perfect," Ella nodded to Harry.

"Oh yeah?" He laughed; his hand moving to rest on Maddie's knee.

"Well, I'd leave out the fuck me part, but..." Bishop smirked. "But other than that, it was pretty good."

"In all seriousness," Harry sighed. "Meeting Maddie changed my life. She was a fast friend in a world where friendships are hard for me to establish; difficult for me to trust. She was a confidant and very quickly I realized that my feelings for her were more than just that. I'm thankful for a lot of things that happened that day. I'm thankful that she was there, that my friend Khenda asked me to be there for the opening, that I was a little lost and needed to ask her for direction. It was an Aristotelian confluence of events that worked out, immensely, in my favor." He clapped his hands together and raised his eyebrows at Ella. "How's that?"

"Damn..." She shook her head. "You're good at this."

"I've been doing this for a while," he shrugged, rising to his feet to fetch the bottle of champagne. "Maybe you should toss a few more at kind over there." He offered a wink to Maddie, knowing he was igniting her competitive nature.

"Toss whatever you want," she took a deep breath and looked at Ella. "I'm ready."

"Okay..." Ella scanned the list. "Ah. Here we go. Doctor Forrester, you're an American citizen..."

"Yes. I was born and raised in the US; in Colorado in fact. I grew up on a farm with my parents. My mother still lives there today."

"And you're a doctor?"
"I'm a Psychologist," Maddie corrected sweetly. "My specialty is child psychology but I'm licensed to practice clinically."

"And you were working in Bendal with Doctors Without Borders as a Child Psychologist?"

"I was. Well, I was working mostly as a general psychologist, but I spent much of my time with the children in the area."

"And then you moved to London."

"I did."

"And you continue to work as a Psychologist today."

"I do," Maddie smiled. "I work at a Children's Hospital and I volunteer at the Veteran's Hospital a few days a week; working with returning service men and women and their families."

"Excellent," Ella smiled and looked at the question on the sheet. "Now that you're marrying a member of the Royal Family," she smiled at Harry. "I would imagine that it would be difficult to maintain your employment; especially once you're a full time member of the family. Do you plan to stay at your current job?"

"Hold on," Harry moved towards Ella; looking over her shoulder. "Is that really on there?"

"It is," Ella pointed.

"I can't believe they're going to ask about your job," he shook his head.

"Of course they're going to ask about her job," Ella looked at him with puzzled eyes. "She's the first full time working commoner to marry into the family..."

"I'm not sure I like you calling her a commoner," Harry grew slightly defensive.

"But she is," Ella defended. "She is a commoner, Harry. She's an American. A full time working American and if you think that they aren't going to call her that..."

"And she's not the first," Harry countered. "Sophie was..."

"True," Ella nodded. "But if you think that the situations are anywhere near the same, then you haven't been paying attention. Come on Harry..." Her voice went soft. "You're...you. You're a Prince. You're third in line to the throne. You're the younger, handsome, playboy brother of the future Monarch. You're a bigger story than Edward and Sophie." The room was silent for a moment as Harry nodded slowly. She was right. He knew she was right.

"Ask me again," Maddie smiled at Ella encouragingly.

"Okay," Ella nodded. "Do you plan to stay at your current job?"

"You know...I don't."

"Maddie paused for a second of thought, her lips pressing together in a smile. "Though, I tend not to look at it as though I'm leaving my profession all together. There are many, many ways to serve the populations that I currently work with; children and military families. Up until now, I have been serving them by sitting in the room, practicing. But I would..."
not have been able to do that if there weren't researchers and fundraisers and marketers and writers and...there are many, many roles in my profession. And now my role is changing.” She allowed her smile to deepen. "No. I won't be in the room anymore and I will miss that. However, Harry and I can continue to serve those very same people; bringing attention to causes that effect children, bringing attention to the issues that face our military men and women. We can bring funding to the researchers who turn data over to the writers who turn techniques over to the practitioners. I won't be in the room any longer but I have every intention of continuing to be involved with the people I've served throughout my professional career." The look on Harry’s face was a mixture of pride and adoration with a tiny bit of smug mixed in there.

"Holy shit," Bishop laughed. "Maybe she should handle all of your press from here on out."

"Right?!" Harry laughed, leaning to kiss her. "I think you're ready love."

"Me too," Ella nodded, smiling up at Harry as he patted her on the back; moving past their very brief tat.

"Really?"

"Yes," Harry nodded definitively.

"Yes," Ella echoed, tossing the list of questions to the side. "Now...can I please see that ring before I...

"Yes!" Harry let out. "Yes. You can see the ring. I'll go get it and then we..." He waved his finger to Maddie. "We have some phone calls to make."

"Oh?" She raised her eyebrows.

"Your family?" He leaned to kiss her. "Don't you have a whole host of cousins to call?"

"No," she shook her head. "If I call them now, they are going to want to go on and on and...I have to focus on this interview tomorrow. Once that's over, I'll talk to them. But not tonight. Tonight I need to be focused...and you guys get that. They won't. So I'll let my mom tell them tomorrow and then I'll call them tomorrow night."

"Okay," he was fine with however she wanted to handle it. "That leaves just one call." His eyes met hers and they both smiled wide.

"Collins." She answered.

"Khenda." He nodded.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

Announcing their engagement to Khenda and Collins had gone exactly as they thought it would.
They were beyond happy for them; over the moon. Collins let out a loud yelp, bringing a cry of surprise from Isaiah, while Khenda grew quiet, reflective; sharing a solemn, touching moment with Harry while they both thought of his mother. They offered their congratulations, their love and then they promised their silence—though neither of them could wait to see the interview on television the next day.

After they hung up with their friends, they returned to the small celebration, opening more champagne and—finally—sharing the ring with Ella. When Maddie finally decided it was time for them to go, time for she and Harry to rest, they shared hugs and kisses and went along their way.

Harry held onto her fingers as they moved towards the stairs, finding he was having difficulty not touching her throughout the evening.

"How are you doing love?" He asked her as they climbed slowly.

"I'm..." She let out a long breath and met his eyes. "I'm great actually. Really, this time. I'm great."

"You ready for tomorrow?" He pulled her fingers to his lips.

"I don't know." Her voice was small. "Harry...what if I mess up?"

"You won't mess up," he shook his head.

"What if I do?" She tugged at his hand.

"Then you mess up," he shrugged. "Unless you show up naked or...I don't know...yell blasphemous things at the interviewer...I think you'll be fine."

"Ha!" Maddie laughed at the image in her head. "You'll still love me?"

"I'll still love you."

"You'll still marry me?"

"I'll still marry you."

"Okay..." She took a deep breath and let it out slowly. "Then I'm as ready as I'm ever going to be for tomorrow."

"I'll take it," he smiled, comfortable with her answer; with the lack of tension he saw in her eyes. "You know...I did want to talk to you about one of your answers." He took another step but she halted; coming to a complete stop on the stairs.

"I said you were kind!" She huffed with a grin. "Is it really a bad thing to be kind?"

"Ha!" He laughed, stepping back down to the stair she was on. "I wasn't talking about that."

"Oh?" She raised her eyebrows; deflating. "What were you talking about?" With a smug grin, he pulled on her arm, bringing her to him.

"I thought of you every day too..." His voice was soft as he wrapped his arms around her. "After I left you in Bendal that first time. I thought of you every day."

"Oh?" Maddie smiled up at him; her eyes sleepy.

"I couldn't form complete sentences, or thoughts for that matter." His head dipped to kiss at her neck.

"Hmmm..." She felt her skin flush; his shirt bunching under her hands as she pulled him closer. "I have a confession..."
"Tell me," he ordered; his mouth moving up to that sensitive spot just below her ear.

"I..." She pushed at him; forcing him to pull back from her neck, forcing him to meet her eyes. She pulled her lip in between her teeth and smiled up at him through lowered lashes. "I had a dream about you. Back then. I had a...dream...about you."

"Oh..." That caught his attention. "What kind of dream?"

"You know what kind of dream," she shifted slightly; her body rubbing against his in a way that drew a moan deep from his throat. "I was so nervous the next time I saw you; worried you would be able to see through me...worried you would be able to tell that I had imagined you...naked, that I had imagined you tearing off my clothes, that I had imagined you taking me..." Harry’s mouth closed over hers, unable to be still any longer. His hands were hot against her as he pressed her closer.

"Tell me more," he whispered against her lips, his hands running over the curves of her body, pulling up the fabric of her skirt as they moved.

"I can't," she flushed pink; partly from embarrassment, partly from the way he made her body tingle. "It's too...silly."

"I like silly," he grinned; his eyes shining when his hands successfully made it under her skirt, finding the soft skin of her thighs. "I loooooove silly."

"I can't..." She shook her head; her voice slipping from her lips.

"Maddie..." He groaned, his fingers moving to the thin slip of fabric that was between him and where he longed to be. "I bet I can get it out of you."

"Oh?" Her breath hitched, her heart thumping in her chest. "I would like to see you try."

"I bet you would," he laughed, his hands moving quickly from under her skirt, moving to pull her face to his; holding her lips against his. Maddie sighed into his mouth, her hands reached up to grip his arms in hopes of steadying her loose knees. But his arms were already moving, snaking around her waist as he began to lower them both to the stairs below them.

"Harry..." Nearly breathless, Maddie allowed him to sit her down on one stair, her feet resting two stairs below. Moving to stand in front of her, his mouth never left her body; kissing her neck, her collar bone, her jaw as she leaned back on the stairs behind her. With strong, dominant hands cupping under her knees, he moved her legs apart, making a home for himself there.

And right there, on the grand staircase of Harry's place at Kensington Palace, the future Duke of Sussex moved his hands up under her skirt—this time with more purpose, this time with more steadiness—this time with his lips close behind. Maddie let out a giggle when his red hair disappeared under the material of her skirt and she gasped when he found his mark. And, though the next day still held a ball of nerves for her and, to some extent him, neither of them thought about it again that night.

And yes. He did manage to persuade her to disclose her dream.

And then he made every effort to recreate it.
The day of the announcement reminded Maddie of the very first New Year's Eve party she was allowed to attend. Not the kind that her parents threw, where she went to bed but snuck down to watch the revelry without ever being seen. But the kind where she dressed up, where she drove somewhere—where there were boys and girls and music and she wasn't expected home until the next morning; where they would drink wine coolers and Boone's Farm Wine Flavored Product that somebody's older brother had purchased for them and snuck into the hotel room and flirt by tossing their hair.

Now it was a completely different party she was joining; to say that it was on a new, higher, level was a massive understatement. At the end of the day, a completely different ball was going to drop, but the buildup was the same. The nerves, the anxiety, the excitement that stretched to her toes, the way her breathing was lighter, her heart rate faster. The hustle to get ready, the bustle of the people around her, the craziness of hurrying to wait; the anticipation that something big was about to happen and the entire day centered around this one moment.

And it was. This entire day, this particular countdown was centered around one great big moment; when the biggest ball of Maddie's life would drop and the party would really begin.

It all began first thing that morning when Maddie woke up, warm and snuggly—next to him.

FIVE...

"Good morning sunshine," she smiled up at him; stretching out a yawn.

"Good morning love," he leaned over to kiss her lips; lingering for a moment—enjoying the laziness of the morning—knowing it was soon to change. "Sleep well?"

"I did," she nodded, snuggling back into her pillow. "You?"

"Hmmm..." He nodded and took a breath. "Thomas called."

"Oh?" Maddie grinned. "Does he want me to call him back or did he leave a message?"

"Funny," Harry smirked, his finger tracing over the bridge of her nose. "The stylist..."

"Rosie," Maddie offered.

"Is sending over dresses now. They should be here in the next fifteen minutes."

"Are they taupe?" She couldn't help the edge in her voice as she tipped her lips to kiss his fingers still hovering over her face.

"Bisque."

"I have to get out of bed now, don't I?" She watched as he tossed the blankets off his legs and stepped out of bed.

"You don't have to," he shook his head. "But dresses are on their way and your friend...what was her name?"
"Tara," Maddie laughed. "She's Penelope's sister's best friend's roommate. She's a professional, Harry. She works at a salon in town and she was very sweet to me while you were away. She's going to do my hair and makeup for this little thing I'm doing at three."

"Ah," Harry shrugged, not necessarily needing the details. "Does she know that's what she's doing?"

"Not really," Maddie smirked as she pushed the blankets aside; groaning as she moved into a sitting position. "Penelope's going to bring her here without telling her. I'll give her the rundown when she arrives."

"Anyway," Harry moved to her side of the bed, his hand resting at the base of her neck as he leaned to kiss her. "People are on their way here to dress us. I'm going to get into the shower. Do you want to join me? Or call up for some breakfast?"

"Hmmm..." Maddie's lips pressed together, her eyes twinkling in thought. "Shower. Then breakfast."

"That's my girl," he grinned, his hand moving over her body down to squeeze her ass. "Think we have time to play out that dream again?"

"Ha!" Maddie giggled as she moved past him towards the bathroom. "I doubt it."

"Damn it." He snapped his fingers.

"Don't worry love...I've had other dreams." With a sexy, come-hither nod, she slipped through his door; Harry hurrying behind her with a purpose.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

"Doctor Forrester," Thomas's knock preceded his voice as he stepped into the dining room where Maddie was just finishing up her coffee and toast.

"You're never going to call me Maddie, are you?" She let go of the hope with a sigh; as if things would get less formal as they continued on this path to marriage.

"No ma'am," he shook his head. "Ms. Tara Wharton is here to see you."

"You're never going to call me Maddie, are you?" She let go of the hope with a sigh; as if things would get less formal as they continued on this path to marriage.

"No ma'am," he shook his head. "Ms. Tara Wharton is here to see you."

"Oh!" Maddie clapped her hands together as she rose from her seat. "Thank you Thomas. Okay sunshine..." She leaned to kiss Harry. "I'm off to make myself more beautiful."

"Good luck with that," he raked his eyes over her appreciatively. With a roll of her eyes, she bounded from the room, the excitement taking over her overall disposition.

"Tara! Penelope!" Maddie's smile was wide as she greeted them. They stood in the entry way, Penelope looking completely comfortable holding onto a large case of what Maddie assumed was Tara's equipment—and Tara, looking completely out of sorts. Her features softened when she saw Maddie.

"Things are making a bit more sense now..." She breathed a little easier. Maddie grinned at her, leaning in to hug her hello.
"Welcome to Kensington," she smiled. "Have you been here before?"

"Only on the regular tour," Tara shook her head, eyes still wide.

"Ah yes," Maddie nodded, turning to kiss Penelope's cheeks. "Thank you for doing this for me."

"Any time," Penelope kissed her back.

"Okay," Maddie took a deep breath and turned back to Tara. "I bet you're wondering why you're here."

"A little bit, yes," Tara nodded, her eyes taking in the room, the ornateness of it.

"Come in, let's sit," Maddie led them to the couches in the sitting room and smiled; taking a leap of faith. "Tara...I'm about to let you in on a little secret and I'm going to trust that you'll keep it to yourself because...because you've been incredibly sweet to me in the past and your work is amazing and...and I like you."

"Oh-kay," Tara smiled nervously; glancing at Penelope who simply smiled back. Maddie took a deep breath.

"This afternoon at three, Palace officials are going to announce my engagement to Harry..."

"Oh my God," Tara couldn't help the words that fell from her mouth; her hand moved to her lips embarrassingly. "I'm sorry."

"It's okay," Maddie smiled sweetly. "The thing is...I need somebody to style my hair, to do my makeup. And...I would like it to be you. You can't tell anyone beforehand. In fact, you can't leave here until press time. You have her phone?" Maddie looked to Penelope.

"In my purse," she patted the clutch that rested on the couch next to her.

"You would have to work here. I've requisitioned one of the bathrooms upstairs where you can work. I would pay you..."

"You don't have to..." Tara began, but Maddie cut her off.

"I do have to. I would pay you for your time and services and...after the announcement, the Palace will release a statement detailing what I was wearing and who did my hair and everyone who paid any attention to that would know that it was you, that it was your salon." She took a breath. "You can say no if you want to but..."

"Yes," Tara cut in. "I...of course I will. I'm absolutely flattered that you thought of me, that you trust me. I'm in."

"Fantastic," Maddie clapped her hands together in relief. "Now. We can head up to the bathroom and get to work. Do you...either of you...need anything to eat or drink or..."

"No thank you," Penelope shook her head, shrugging out of her jacket and laying it over the arm of the couch. She was going to be there for a while; she was getting comfortable.

"Actually," Tara cleared her throat, her mind already at work. "Some water would be lovely, thank you."
"Of course," Maddie nodded, moving to rise to her feet.

"Don't move," his voice called out from behind her. All sets of eyes turned to see Harry in the doorway, leaning against the frame watching them with a bemused smile on his face. "I already asked for some water to be sent in." He pushed away from the frame and moved over to them. With his charming smile, he held his hand out to Tara who stared up at him with wide eyes. "I'm Harry. You must be Tara?"

"Yes...sir..." Her voice was slightly shaky as she rose to her feet to shake his hand. "It's an honor to meet you."

"You as well," he held her hand in his for a moment before turning to kiss Penelope's cheeks. "Maddie has raved about your services for quite some time. Are you on board for the circus today?"

"It seems as though I am," she smiled and looked to Maddie. "Would it be possible to see what it is you're wearing this afternoon?"

"Absolutely," Maddie nodded and turned to Harry, her hands falling on his shoulders. "Okay Sunshine. We're heading upstairs. I think it's probably best if you lay low for a while."

"Yes Ma'am," he nodded with a smirk, his hands running around her waist in such a way that Maddie thought maybe he had forgotten they had company for a beat. "Ladies, divert your eyes..." He gave them the smallest moment's notice before his mouth moved over Maddie's. Tara and Penelope shared a small, slightly uncomfortable smile before the moment was interrupted by the arrival of the requested water.

"Okay..." Maddie pushed at his chest, her fingers running along her freshly assaulted lips with reverence. "Okay. Let's head upstairs, shall we?" Turning a blushed smile to the ladies, she stepped away from Harry. Gathering their things, Penelope and Tara followed behind.

"Have fun!" Harry called after them; a chuckle rumbling from deep inside his chest.

FOUR...

"Madeline, my darling..." Harry called out as he stepped back into his room. "It's almost time to...holy shit."

"What?!" Maddie turned from his mirror with concern in her eyes. "What is it?" Her eyes looked down over her dress, at her hose, her shoes. "Harry..."

"You look..." He bit on his lip, his mind at work.

"Beautiful?" She teased.

"Stunning," he countered; stepping into the room. "You look stunning."

"Thank you," she let out a breath, her eyes scanning him. "You clean up pretty well yourself, Wales." He looked dapper in his dark suit.

"Do you like my tie?" He pulled at it as he moved towards her. "It's bisque-colored."
"Is it?" She laughed while he stepped into her space; looping his arms around her waist.

"Mmm. Hmm." He nodded, his eyes growing soft. "Any chance you want to skip this thing and tell me about another one of your dreams?"

"Tempting," Maddie sighed. "But I'm guessing you just came up here to fetch me."

"The car will be here in minutes. Here, let me," he took the necklace she was working on and moved to fasten it around her neck. "There you go."

"Thank you," she took a breath, her fingers resting over the pendant that sat against her décolletage.

"You okay?" He studied her.

"I am," she nodded. "Tara wanted to spray my hair one more time and then I'll be ready to go."

"Okay," he smiled; leaning in to kiss her; a feather lite kiss to her lips, her jaw, her ear.

"I found it!" Tara called out. "Oh God!" She stopped, her hand rising to her eyes. "I'm so sorry! I thought...Oh God..." She groaned as Harry stepped away from Maddie, laughing loudly.

"Come on in," Harry tried to lighten the situation. "I was just stepping out so that the two of you can finish up in here." He winked at Maddie as Tara lowered her hand and offered a smile. "Ten minutes before go time, love."

"Yes sir," Maddie offered a small, mocking salute as Harry slipped from the room.

"I'm so sorry," Tara shook her head as she moved quickly to Maddie's side, various items juggled in her arms.

"Don't worry about it," Maddie waved her hand towards the doorway. "Now, what do you have for me?"

"I made a little bag of emergency items," Tara held up a small baggie. "There is extra lip tint, some cotton swabs and a few removal wipes."

"Removal wipes?" Maddie peered at the bag. "What are they for?"

"They will take the lip tint off without taking the rest of the makeup off."

"And why would I want to do that?"

"They aren't for you," Tara's cheeks blushed as a small smirk pulled on her lips. "Forgive me but...I'm not entirely sure he's not going to try to ruin your makeup between now and three and I would hate for him to go on TV with tint all over his face and..."

"Thank you," Maddie flushed slightly as she smiled at her. "You're absolutely right in packing these. Thank you."

"You're welcome. Now...hold this over your face," she handed her the shield. "I want to spray you one more time."
"I don't understand it," Maddie smiled at him across the leather car seat as they were driven to Buckingham.

"Don't understand what?" Harry reached for her hand.

"Why I'm nervous," she shook her head.

"I understand it completely," Harry breathed, situating his tie with his free hand.

"But..." She took a breath. "I've been in high pressure situations before Harry. I've...I've been interviewed by hospital panels, I've been in front of people from all over the world. For God's sake, Harry, I defended my Dissertation in front of fifteen professors at Columbia University!"

"You did," he nodded; his smile sweet and proud.

"I shouldn't be nervous about this," she shook her head again. "I wish that I weren't nervous about this."

"Okay..." Harry took a breath and let it out slowly. "Tell me. Were you nervous before you defended your Dissertation?"

"Yes."

"And you got past it?"

"Yes."

"How?" He held his hand out. "How did you move past it?"

"I..." She bit her lower lip as a wide grin crossed her face. "Ha! I went with a friend for a shot of tequila."

"You had a shot of tequila before you defended?" He chuckled at the thought.

"Yes," she leaned back into her seat. "We just...we picked a place and had just one shot. It took the edge off enough without being obvious..." Her eyes returned to him. "I miss college sometimes."

"I would imagine," Harry lifted her hand to his lips before he moved forward in his chair. "Thomas. We need to make a stop."

"I'm sorry sir?" Thomas turned to face Harry.

"On the next block, there's a pub. Laundry's, I think. Can you stop there please?"

"Harry?" Maddie tugged on his sleeve.

"You want to stop at the pub, sir?" Thomas clarified.

"Yes. Thank you." Harry sat back in his seat as Thomas spoke to the driver.
"What are you doing?" Maddie's eyes narrowed.

"Hmmm..." Harry's face grew smug as the car slowed to a stop and his door opened. "Come with me..."

"Harry..." She warned.

"I'm buying you a shot of tequila." He held his hand out. "Now come on love, we don't have much time." Maddie blinked once, thinking that he was insane and then, with another blink she held her hand out and took his. Stepping from the car, she followed closely by his side as they hurried into the pub—their car ready and waiting at the curbside.

"This is insane, you know," she spoke low as he opened the door for her.

"Stopping for tequila or marrying me?" Harry followed her inside.

"I'm starting to think a little of both," Maddie offered a wink.

"God I love you," Harry groaned, his hand finding her ass in a firm pat as they stepped up to the bar.

The bartender was an older man, at least Harry's father's age. He was inviting and polite and looked at them slightly funny when Harry ordered two shots of tequila. Though, Maddie wasn't sure if it was because he recognized Harry or if he was confused by their level of dress. Either way, he brought them their shots, accepted Harry's cash and overly generous tip and wished them a good evening as they breezed back out the door.

They were only in there for five minutes; not enough time to cause a sufficient scene. Later that evening, the bartender would see snippets of the interview, see the pictures from the photo call and he would tell his wife that he had served shots to the two of them shortly before those photos were taken. And she would laugh, pat his arm affectionately and insist that he was mistaken.

But in that moment, when they hurried back into the car to continue onto the Palace, the shots had the intended affect. Maddie had relaxed. She was at ease and smiling and, when Harry held out one of her mints that he pulled from his pocket, her eyes turned warm and soft.

He was so perfect for her it was sickening.

THREE...

From the moment they returned to the car, they were full speed ahead. All Systems Go. It was time. The press was assembled and waiting, they had been let in on the news and now all that was missing was Maddie and Harry. A photo call. An interview. A world ready and waiting to see the couple together officially for the first time. A world waiting to hear her speak for the first time, to see if he really looked at her the way it appeared he looked at her in the pictures that had been anonymously snapped throughout the tenure of their courtship.

They flew by the remaining buildings, through the final intersections. They zipped past the press vans waiting outside. They slid seamlessly through the gates, under the arches and, before Maddie could say Buckingham Palace, they were pulling to a stop. The driver and Thomas were quick to exit the car, opening the doors for the two of them.

Taking a great breath, she stepped from the car. "Thank you," she smiled to the driver who offered a curt, professional nod. Shielding her eyes with her hand, she looked up at the sky; it was a beautiful day. She could feel his eyes on her then, even before she turned to face Harry, she could feel him watching her.

"Love?" He called out with that wide, beaming smile. Maddie turned towards his voice; her hunch was confirmed. "If you're looking for a way out..." His smile twisted into a smirk.

"I was just thinking..." She sighed; rounding the car to him. "It's a beautiful day."

"It is," he agreed as she stepped to his side.

Instantly her hand was in his. Instantly they were moving forward. They were greeted by Claire Edwards who smiled brightly as she shook Maddie's hand and dipped to a curtsy in front of Harry. And they were ushered quite hurriedly, through the grand halls. Maddie had to hold back a laugh because what she really wanted to do was to stop and take in the décor, to thoroughly study the paintings that hung on the walls. But they were on a course now; heading towards a destination and Maddie was quite certain Ms. Edwards would not approve of her lazily perusing the masterpieces. Though she adored the building and all it held, today was not about sightseeing. Today was something else entirely. Maddie felt a warm chill shudder over her skin as Harry's fingers tightened around hers. They were shown to a room off to the side; something that the Royal Family probably considered small, though was twice the size of Maddie's first apartment.

This is where they would wait. All this hurry. To wait.

The doors were pulled closed behind them and people were everywhere. Claire was speaking to Thomas, bringing him up to speed on the announcement that had been made almost an hour earlier. The stylist was there, moving silently around Harry with a lint brush; straightening his tie, smoothing out his shoulders.

She turned to Maddie then, the same brush quick at work as she checked her hem, checked her hose. When Rosie dipped down to run a cloth over Maddie's shoes, Maddie's eyes met Harry's over her bent back—a bemused smirk tugging at the corner of her mouth. Harry bit back a chuckle and shook his head. It reminded her of the time she had watched while the gardening staff at Highgrove cleaned and buffed the statues outside. Maybe that's what she was to Rosie; a statue.

Maddie's eyes turned from him then, seeking the bright light that was streaming in the enormous floor to ceiling windows. She took a deep, clarifying breath and tried to focus; through the gauzy curtains, the heavy, bullet proof glass, to a tree in the distance. Her mind clicked then, into work mode; what she needed to remember, phrasing she wanted to use. They had mere minutes left and she wanted to make sure she had it all fresh in her mind.

"Excuse me," Harry's voice called out; Maddie's eyes shifting back to look at him. "Can I have the room for a moment please?" And just like that, without any disagreement or question, the room was emptied. It was just the two of them.

"Look at you," Maddie's smile was a combination of nerves and surprise. "Clearing rooms with a snap of your fingers." He allowed a small chuckle as he studied her face; moving towards her. "Is everything okay?"

"No," he shook his head slowly; a warm, lazy smile on his face. "Not okay. Everything is perfect." His voice was low, drawn out; his accent heavy and charming. "There's just one thing missing."
"Oh?" Her eyebrows arched softly; slowly. Her hands reached out to his lapels as he stepped up to her. "I can't imagine what. The whole world is out there waiting for us and..."

"Hmmm..." Harry's lips hummed as he looked her over and then his right hand rose, lifting her left one from his lapel gingerly; bringing the tips of her fingers to his lips to kiss them.

"Hmmm?" Maddie's head tilted slightly to the left as her index finger stretched to tap his nose.

"This..." With his free hand, he reached into his coat pocket; pulling out that now familiar small black box.

"Ah..." Maddie felt tears well in her eyes even as her smile deepened. "I'm surprised Ella didn't jack it on her way out last night."

"She tried," Harry laughed; pulling the ring from the box and tossing it to the side. "But there are too many checkpoints between my place and the outside. And Nathan is hard to outwit."

"Good job Nathan," Maddie chuckled.

"Great job Nathan," Harry agreed. "Now..." He held up the ring between his index finger and thumb. "Do you want to hear my speech all over again?"

"Maybe the highlights," she winked as he stretched out her fingers, her hand flattening out between them.

"Forty-eight hours, love. You've had two days to think it over; to come down from your Botswana high and realize..."

"Shush," her right hand moved to his lips. "Put that ring on me Wales. I've spent the entire morning being primped and curled and teased and ironed and...then there's Rosie with the lint roller. I sat in that meeting and agreed to leave my job, to leave my country. I want to take your name. I want to take your title. I want to be your wife." Her voice caught as she said the words. "Now...before I cry and ruin all this makeup, would you please..."

"Okay. Okay," Harry was nodding as he fought with his own emotions. Without issue, he slipped the ring onto her finger and met her eyes. "Watch out for Ella..." He sniffed. "I'm not entirely convinced she's done trying for it."

"Ha!" Maddie laughed; sending her tears on retreat. "Don't worry about me. I'm scrappy. And I have Sampson now..." Their laughter faded as their eyes locked.

"I love you Maddie. I really do..." That low, deep voice was back.

"I love you too sunshine," she smiled; blinking at her watery eyes as her hand lifted to rub at his cheek. His face turned in her hand to kiss her palm. His hands reached for her waist; pulling her to him in a hug. His arms were warm around her; protective. Just as Harry decided to ignore the makeup warnings and kiss her and just as Maddie opened her mouth to either chastise or invite him, there was a firm knock at the door.

"Come in," Harry called; not moving his eyes from her.

"I'm sorry Sir," Thomas called, stepping into the room, the posse behind him. The chaos returned. "They are ready for us."
"Thank you," Harry's hands dropped Maddie's waist; pulling her hand to his lips once more. "Let's do this?"

"Let's." Maddie nodded.

And just like that, they were pulled from the room.

TWO...

"Do you have any idea how much I want to kiss you right now?" Harry whispered to her as they were ushered through the halls again.

"Don't you dare," Maddie's eyes narrowed playfully. "Tara spent hours getting this done and I left those little makeup remover wipes back in that room."

"If I send Thomas for them can I kiss you?" If he wasn't so damned cute, Maddie would want to slap him.

"After the photos," she offered.

"It's a date," he winked as they rounded a corner and came to a stop. Claire moved to stand in front of them; her voice low.

"They are right inside these doors." She pointed behind her with her thumb.

"How many?" Harry asked; businesslike. Maddie loved watching this transformation; Harry moving into his public persona, pulling it together.

"Thirty-five print and camera," she glanced at her clipboard. "Twenty video at least."

"Holy..." Maddie's hand flew to her mouth, catching herself.

"You know," Harry chuckled at her slip. "If you want to change your mind, now's the chance. It's not too late." Claire looked up to the couple with wide eyes.

"Actually," she shook her head slowly, unconsciously. "We've already released the statement and..." Her eyes caught Harry's narrowed ones and her mouth clamped shut.

"He was kidding," Maddie shot a side glance to Harry. "I'm not changing my mind."

"Okay then," Claire cleared her throat, slightly embarrassed. "Now. I'm going to open these doors and you're going to walk to the middle of the room, under the portrait of Mary of Teck."

"My Great-Great Grandmother," Harry winked at Maddie; hoping to keep the nervousness at bay.

"Yes I know," she shook her head with a grin and Claire continued.

"Mr. Smith is going to walk through before you. He'll wait on the other side of the room. Once the photo call is over, he'll step forward and you'll follow him out. He'll be there for the interview." She pulled her eyes away from her clipboard and looked them both over. "Do you need anything at all? Water? Anything?"
"No, thank you," Maddie smiled.

"No," Harry shook his head. Claire, finished with them, waiting for only a signal, turned her body from them, giving them a moment. Harry leaned in to Maddie, his voice lowered. "Do you remember what you said to me the first time we met?"

"Yes," Maddie's entire face smiled at the memory.

"You said, you look a little lost..." He watched Maddie take a deep breath in as Claire nodded to the go signal and moved to the door handle.

"And you said..." Maddie took another breath and forced her eyes from the door to him. "I suppose that I am. Do you think you might be able to point me in the right direction?"

"I did," he chuckled.

"Okay," Claire's voice cut into their private moment. "We're moving."

"Oh my God..." Maddie breathed.

"Listen to me," Harry's voice became slightly rushed. "I wasn't lost."

"What?" Her head snapped to him.

"I wasn't lost. I knew exactly where I was, exactly what I was doing..." His eyes locked with hers.

"What?" She repeated.

"I saw you and I had to meet you. Your smile was..." He trailed off in thought; this moment of stillness among the chaos. "You knocked me sideways, love. There was this crazy moment when all I wanted was for my children to have your smile. It made no sense and it scared me witless."

"Harry..." Maddie simultaneously hated him and adored him. Her eyes filled with tears and her heart thumped in her chest.

"Now I want them to have your heart, your spirit, your..."

"Stop. Please. Or I'm going to break down..."

"What's about to happen, Madeline...you're not lost. You know exactly where you are, exactly what you're doing. This is what was supposed to happen..." The doors swung open then and Claire nodded to them. It was time to go.

Maddie blinked at her teary eyes and let her smile rest on her face. She took half a step forward, barely a step at all, before Harry's hand halted her. Her eyes turned to him quickly and he smiled wide.

"We walk together, love," his hand took hers, tucking it warmly into the crook of his elbow. "From here on out, we walk together." He pressed a quick kiss to her head, whispered, "I love you."

"I love you too."
"I know."

And then, with a collective deep breath, a shared smile, they took that first step together.

ONE...

It was just like that first New Year's Eve party. All of the anticipation, all of the planning, all of the buildup—leading to this one fresh, new moment. As cameras clicked and flashbulbs flickered, Maddie's fingers pressed into Harry's arm and she smiled wide.

The ball had dropped. The party was starting.

If Maddie had to guess, she would have wagered that there were easily 200 photos taken that day. 200 photos of her standing next to Harry; her arm tucked into his while they smiled and answered the few, quick questions that were allowed during the brief photo call. She would have guessed that they turned out fine; she hadn't sneezed or yawned or had a coughing fit so there was precious little that could be terribly wrong.

But that next morning, when the papers hit the stands, the leading photo—the one that was printed and reprinted, blogged and re-blogged, discussed at great lengths—was not one of the 200 taken during that photo call. In fact, it was one that only a few of the photographers managed to get. It was one that neither Maddie nor Harry knew existed until that next morning.

As they had followed Thomas through the doors, smiling their final good-byes to the group of reporters, they slipped out of the room. As soon as they were out, almost immediately, Harry turned to her, his hands sliding easily in place at the sides of her neck, tilting her face up to his. His lips took hers with pride and love and a bit of ownership. And as Maddie leaned into him, sighing into his mouth and letting her body press to his, little did either of them know that a few, the lucky few, photographers had snapped a few photos. They were a little shaded, the couple slightly silhouetted from the distance, but it was clearly them. They were clearly celebrating. And the world fell in love with them. For the rest of their lives whenever a documentary ran, in print or electronic media, it almost always contained that picture. It was sweet, it was beautiful; it was that kind of iconic.

Maddie barely had time to thumb at Harry's lips, making sure he was free from the tint on hers before they were whisked into the next room. There they met another Tom; Tom Bradby, the same man who had interviewed William and Kate. He had done a good job with theirs and Harry respected and trusted him. Introducing himself to Maddie, he shook her hand and smiled. He was incredibly inviting and open, making Maddie feel instantly at ease in his hands. Of course, she guessed that was his job—to make her feel comfortable, encourage her to open up. He explained the mechanics of it all; the cameras, the microphones, how it would all unfold. He allowed them both some time to get the feel of the room before Maddie stepped out with his producer who would "mike" her up. The woman was sweet, friendly, as she helped Maddie with the wires and the microphone and when Maddie stepped back into the room both Harry and Mr. Bradby rose to their feet. After checking to be sure they were both ready and that they didn't need anything, he gave a nod to the camera man and they jumped right in.

The interview lasted only twenty minutes and it went off spectacularly. Later, after he had transcribed and edited, it was played over networks Nationally and Internationally. It was written about all over the world; dissecting Doctor Madeline Forrester—her answers, her demeanor, the way she sat with her body turned slightly in Harry's direction, the way their eyes met conspiratorially when answering a few of the questions, the way Harry's hand crept dangerously close to resting on her knee more than once. People were learning about her for the first time—shaping their opinions. And there was a lot to gather from those twenty minutes.
For instance, viewers would learn that Harry truly believed that meeting Maddie's family was far more anxiety producing than Maddie meeting his.

"For the most part my life has been chronicled, one way or another, in the media since the day I was born. All they had to do was initiate an internet search with my name and every untoward thing I've ever done is there for them to read about. You know...you don't want to be the man that her mother already thinks is a terrible match for her daughter." Harry chuckled lightly. "Thankfully Maddie's family is wonderful and they held off on forming an opinion about me until they met me—for which I will be eternally grateful."

"And the opinion was clearly a positive one," Mr. Bradby suggested.

"Clearly," Harry laughed before jokingly raising his eyebrows to Maddie.

"Absolutely," Maddie confirmed.

Viewers would learn that Maddie had in fact met the Queen on several occasions and that she found her to be warm and welcoming and a well of knowledge. Maddie beamed with pride as she explained how wonderful it had been to have the Queen ask about the work she had done in Bendal, about the people she had met.

"It is incredibly evident that Her Majesty is deeply invested in the people she serves, even in those one on one interactions." And, Harry assured the world, he absolutely had The Queen's, as well as Mrs. Forrester's, blessing before proposing to Maddie.

They had the interviewer, and later the television audience, laughing out loud when, in response to the question "Do you want to have children?", they both answered an immediate, simultaneous, and emphatic.

"Yes."

There were discussions about how they met, the impact of living on separate continents, Maddie's decision to move to London. And then he asked about Maddie's plans for her future citizenship. Yes, she would be becoming a citizen. She would be going through the same process as anyone applying to become a citizen. The Border Agency had been notified previous to the interview that she intended on marrying. She would be taking the required English Test as well as the British Life Test and would complete the required time quicker than she had originally thought, as Bendal fell under the United Kingdom and her time there counted as well. And yes, she would be relinquishing her US citizenship; she was excited and ready to join the commonwealth, to be a part of the great people she was ready to serve.

They talked about Maddie's work; both in the past and what lay ahead. Harry watched with pride as she virtually recited her practice answer verbatim. They talked about all the wonderful things that came with an engagement, the celebratory feel, the excitement in their families, the proposal. They talked about the formalities, the research questions; Maddie's history, who she was, what kind of role she wanted to have in the Royal Family. They even talked about the sad pieces; the absence of Harry's mother, the absence of Maddie's father—the impact those losses had on this moment.

In the end, the vast majority of the viewers would come to the conclusion that not only did Maddie seem to be an excellent match for Harry—the love between them was abundantly clear both in what they said and didn't say—but she was also looking to be quite the match for Great Britain.
She was bright, hardworking, charity-minded, and she had this personable nature about her that put a great many minds at ease. There was something for everyone. There were elements of the fairytale; a Prince finding his love, moving her to England to live in a castle. There were elements of modern times; with a PhD, she was easily the most educated member of the Royal family and on top of that, she had an extensive and respected work history. Yet with all of that, she still managed to come across as likable, relatable; somebody the viewers could see themselves talking to. As they reached the end of the interview, Mr. Bradby set his notes to the side and offered up the last question.

"And finally, Harry, you famously made the comment that you've longed for children since you were young and that you were searching for somebody to fulfill the role, somebody to take on the job. What made you decide that Maddie was the one to fulfill the role?"

"That's easy, Tom," Harry smiled wide. "I'm massively in love with her. I am. I can tell you all of the reasons she makes sense for me; how funny she is, how smart, how she has this way with children that impressed me from the beginning. You know...we've talked about her work with children and our service men and women and her devotion to family and friends...all of those are great reasons. But in all honestly, it's so much simpler than that. I love her. And she clearly, though not quite as understandably, loves me. I can't imagine being without her. I don't know that there was ever really a decision making process on my part she just...she has to be the one. There's really no other way around it."

"Wow," Maddie was beaming as she looked at him. "And you said you were bad at these things."

And as their shared laughter faded, Mr. Bradby stepped in, drawing the interview to a close.

As the cameras clicked off, the room fell at ease and Harry turned a wide, thankful smile to her.

"And there you go..."

"There I go," Maddie let out a breath; relaxing into the couch, his arm moving around her shoulders with familiarity, his fingers stretching to stroke her neck. "I think I did okay."

"Okay?" Harry laughed. "You did better than okay."

"Yeah?" Her eyes slid from his to Mr. Bradby who sat across from them with a warm smile; a smile of a man who had a good feeling about the two of them.

"It was wonderful," Mr. Bradby nodded. "You were very eloquent and your answers were great."

"Thank you so much for saying so."

"You're welcome," he nodded to her and then to Harry before he turned business. He explained to the new couple what would happen next, when the interview would air and then he thanked them again. With a wish of good luck, Mr. Bradby and his crew were out the door and Mr. Smith, Ms. Edwards and crew were back in. They were ecstatic about how well the interview had gone—as ecstatic as two very English individuals who worked in service to Her Majesty could possibly be. As they rushed in, full of words of appreciation and applause, Maddie watched as the look on Harry's face faded slightly; barely. His eyes grew slightly dim, the corners of his mouth turning down just so. It was hardly noticeable. But it was enough that she noticed.

"I'm sorry, Thomas?" Maddie turned away from Harry for a moment, looking up to the older gentleman who was grinning down at them—pleased with how things had gone.

"Yes, Ma'am?" He answered; quick to service.
"Would you mind...can we have the room for just a moment please?"

"Of course Ma'am," he nodded and looked to Harry. "I am actually finished with all that I need. I can file the press release and, unless there's anything that you need?"

"No," Harry shook his head. "I believe we're done for the day." He was happy that the formalities were over, that they could move on to the personal part of the day.

"Thank you, sir," he nodded to the others; gathering their things. "You're due at Clarence for dinner in just under an hour."

"Thank you Thomas. Thank you for everything today."

"You're welcome," he smiled his good-byes; shaking first Harry and then Maddie's hands before he followed his crew out the door. And just as fast as they came in, they had left. Maddie and Harry were alone. Knowing the conversation they were about to have should remain private, she shut and locked the door behind them.

"Look at you..." Harry's smile was contrasted by a sad, far off look in his eyes as he leaned back against the couch. "Clearing the room with a snap of your fingers..."

"Hmmm..." She smiled, reclaiming her spot next to him.

"You want to call your cousins now? Your mother?" He lifted his eyebrows.

"Not yet," she shook her head; her hand moving out so her thumb could rub his cheek. "Hey Harry...what's wrong?"

"Nothing," he shook his head, his hand reaching up to grab hold of hers, pulling it down into his lap.

"Harry..." Her voice went soft, her eyes vulnerable. "We just announced our engagement and you look so...sad." She was quick to the chase; cutting through the air of propriety that had existed in the room during the interview. "Are you sad?"

"No," he shook his head. "I'm not sad. I'm sorry. I'm not sad." He leaned down, kissing her hand in his lap.

"Then what is it?" She twisted her fingers into his hair.

"I feel..." He chuckled bitterly, sighing dramatically. "I feel like I just handed you over."

"What?" She was confused.

"Like a lamb to slaughter." His words matched the momentary dark flash across his face.

"Harry," she shook her head. "I don't..."

"I'm sorry, love," he reached out to stroke her face. "It doesn't matter. I shouldn't be...I'm sorry. Let's just..."

"No," she shook her head, a small laugh pushing through her lips. "You don't get to avoid me.
"Ha!" He laughed; the darkness fading. He thought for a moment; moving in his seat so that he sat more upright, meeting her eyes as he tried to explain. "Very few things in my life have ever really been just mine. I...by most accounts, I have...everything. But it's been at the expense of sharing it all with the world; living my life in the press. And I have been okay with that, I suppose. But you..." He sighed. "You are the one thing I want to keep...that I want to keep for just me. But to be with you, I have to turn you over to all of it; make you vulnerable, offer your head on a platter. It's ridiculous really. How, in order to have you, I have to give you up...to everyone."

"Harry..." She wanted so bad to make this look on his face disappear.

"We announced our engagement and I am...God Maddie, I'm so happy about that." His eyes were full of love. "I am. I love what that means. That you can finally be with me officially, that we can marry and start our lives together. But I also have to recognize, you have to recognize that tonight, just now...we made you a public figure and..."

"Stop," Maddie cut in; sweet but firm. "Would you just stop? I...I'm not stupid."

"What? Wait."

"And I'm not naïve."

"I didn't mean that."

"Like a lamb to the slaughter?" She raised her eyebrows with a bitter laugh. "Come on, Harry. I may not have known who you were when I first met you, when we unloaded that truck but...I know now. I have known, every day since then. I knew who you were when you took my number. I knew who you were when I kissed you, when I told you I loved you. I knew exactly who you were when I moved to London, when you proposed." She took a deep breath. "I remember the press coverage from Will and Kate's announcement, from their wedding. Hell, I remember it from your parents'. I know they are coming for me."

"Maddie..."

"If you really wanted to avoid that, you made some egregious errors along the way."

"No. I..."

"You should have let me stay in Bendal."

"Hold on..."

"You should have never laid any claims to my heart."

"Madeline."

"You definitely should not have asked me to marry you."

"Please don't say that. It sounds absurd."

"You please don't say that. You sound absurd." She poked his chest with her index finger. "They are coming for me Harry. No matter what we do now. They are coming. It's unavoidable. Unless you want to build a time machine, go back to that day and keep right on walking past that truck full of food."

"No," he breathed, shaking his head. "I don't want to do that. I just feel...so incredibly selfish right now."

"Then be selfish," she shrugged; her eyes dancing again as the grin from before returned.

"Be selfish?" He raised his eyebrows, his smile peeking through. "That's your moment of clarity. Be selfish?"

"Yes," she nodded; moving towards him, her entire demeanor shifting from a properly betrothed future royal to a disarmingly suggestive lover. "I plan on being selfish."

"Oh?" He relaxed as she hiked up her skirt so that she could straddle his lap. His eyes flashed wide before they settled on amusement. "How is it that you're going to be selfish love?"

"Well..." She sighed deeply; forcing her body to settle closer to his. "If you hadn't noticed I just laid claim...international claim...to the worlds' most eligible bachelor..."

"Oh God," he groaned, his hands finding home on her thighs.

"That's right ladies," she giggled, her arms winding around his neck. "Put away your signs, your letters, your baked goods..."

"Baked goods?" He laughed but she ignored him.

"He's mine." And then with a devilish gleam in her eye, she tilted her mouth over his and claimed her man. Neither of them had another thought in that moment; barely a memory of the dinner they were due to attend. As Harry's hands moved further up her legs, disappearing up under her skirt, he groaned into her mouth and pulled back.

"Jesus Christ, Madeline..." He looked down to where his hands halted on her thigh; his eyes taking in her thigh high stockings with the clips that led up to a lacy garter belt. "You've had this on the whole time?"

"Mmmm..." She nodded, biting her lip. "That's another way I made it through my Dissertation."

"Sexy lingerie?"

"When I feel sexy and smart at the same time...I feel like nothing can beat me."

"You must feel that way all the time," he couldn't help it as the cheesy line rolled off his tongue.

"Do you feel better?" Maddie's fingers ruffled the hair at the nape of his neck.

"I do. I do. Also..." His hands moved to her waist, pulling her closer to him; his lips finding their place on her neck. "I feel...aroused."

"Harry..." She started to protest, gave birth to the thought, but her head tipped back with a moan. "We can't..."

"You told me to be selfish," his fingers worked up her back, searching for the start of her zipper.
"But your family is waiting," she lifted a weak arm, pointing to the door.

"They aren't expecting us for at least forty minutes," he assured her.

"But we're in Buckingham Palace and..."

"Shhh..." His lips pressed silence against hers; his fingers finding their mark and pulling at the zipper. "You locked the door, remember." The top of her dress slacked, making it easier for his eyes to take in the top of her sexy lingerie ensemble. His breath sucked in; making sort of a hissing noise through his lips. "How did you celebrate?"

"I'm sorry?" She was caught off guard by his question, the feel of him underneath her overtaking her senses.

"When you successfully defended your Dissertation..." His fingers pushed back the neck of her dress, drawing tantalizingly slow patterns on the tops of her chest.

"Oh..." She chuckled; a mischievous, naughty sort of laugh. "I...ahem. I had wild...crazy...sex...with guy number two." Harry's fingers came to a halt, his eyes snapping from her soft pink skin to her face. She watched as he took that information in, watched as his competitive nature took over, watched as his territorial side won out. She bit her lip in nervous anticipation; knowing exactly what she had just unleashed.

"Well..." He smiled; cocky, smarmy. "That settles that." With an arm gripping tight around her waist, his lips returned to her neck—hotter, lustier than before—and his free hand went back under her skirt, tracing past the tops of her stockings, teasing up the lace of her garter belt and finding home at her core—the warm center of her body—from where he drew her surrender.

Fuck it, she thought as she braced herself for the passion infused, fast paced, breathless jaunt she was about to take. Fuck it all. This was her day. She was being selfish.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^"I cannot believe we just did that..." Maddie was shaking her head as Harry zipped her dress up, placing kisses on the back of her neck as he finished.

"Believe it," he grinned as he straightened his tie.

"Look at you," she turned to face him; her palms running over the skirt of her dress, smoothing it out. "You're positively giddy."

"What do you want me to say?" He shrugged, pulling his jacket up over his shoulders.

"You don't have to say anything," she reached out to smooth his lapels. "But it wouldn't hurt for you to wipe that cocky smirk off your face. We're about to go have dinner with your family."

"Ah, come here..." His hands pulled at her waist; drawing her close. His eyes met hers and all traces of guilt, all hints of sadness, had been washed away. "You're perfect for me, you know?"

"Because I had sex with you on a couch in Buckingham Palace?"

"Yes," he laughed; his head bobbing in a nod. "And because you knew I was feeling bad, because you knew I was being stupid, because you straight up told me to knock it off...” He kissed her; sweet and loving. "You’re perfect for me."

"Well that works out well for the both of us then," she smiled and sighed; pulling his hand from around her so that she could look at his watch. "Okay my darling...we need to go. I have no idea what time it is, but we need to go to Clarence and..."

"Don't worry, we have plenty of time," Harry nodded; an element of propriety returning as he looked himself over, checking buttons and zippers.

"Am I okay?" Maddie spun around as she checked herself. Harry watched as she moved; seeing not one thing out of place. He had been careful with her hair, mindful not to do any lasting damage to her clothes.

"Amazing," he breathed; capturing her hand in his as they moved towards the door. "You ready for tonight?"

"Are you kidding? I've had a shot of tequila, the interview is over, I'm...satisfied..." She smiled wide; eyes bright and eager to celebrate. "I'm ready for anything."

"Ha...” He chuckled, his eyes drifting for a moment to a far off place where she had no idea what was in store for her. And she really didn't. "We'll see about that."

And, as Harry unlocked and opened the door, holding it as Maddie stepped through, the day of welcoming her into this whole new world, his world, was only just beginning.
Chapter 78

One thing Maddie had failed to remember on their way to Clarence for the small family dinner was that this was The Royal Family. A small family dinner did not mean Harry's immediate family gathered around a table serving themselves from their favorite meal—she couldn't believe she had let herself entertain that idea for even a second. What a small family dinner meant in this new world was Harry's immediate family eating an impeccable meal served on fine china with crystal glasses and shiny silver. This was no casual dinner. This was how you were welcomed into The Family.

When they stepped through the door of Clarence House, visibly relaxed and holding hands, Maddie was surprised by their reception. There they all were; waiting for them. Charles and Camilla, William and Kate—just stepping into the entryway as Maddie and Harry cleared the threshold. And when Charles greeted them with a wide grin and began applauding, the others followed suit; clapping with bright smiles and a few hoots. Maddie was certain her cheeks were flushed, showing her embarrassment, her surprise. And when Harry dropped her hand in order to join in on the applause, she shook her head at him—biting back a few choice words for leaving her to take the lauding on her own.

She would later learn that this is what they did now; this is how they celebrated what had just occurred. Nobody in the world understood like the people in this room what it was like to sit before those cameras and answer those questions. Nobody in the world understood like they did what it was going to feel like the next day and the day after that when the world began to probe into their relationship, their lives. They knew it was a big day, a big step and though much of what came with it was intrusive and overwhelming, they had decided years ago to try to make the transition as special as they possibly could.

Maddie laughed at herself as she was pulled into the room; all four of them moving at once to hug her, to congratulate her, to kiss her cheeks and compliment her on a job well done. William, hugging her close and calling her sister before turning to congratulate Harry on his unspeakable luck. Kate, squeezing her hands, asking about the ring, the proposal, wondering when they could get together with a bottle of champagne and share the details. Camilla, her warm smile making her eyes sparkle as she hugged Maddie to her, offering her support, her guidance—anything Maddie needed. And finally, Charles—Maddie wondered if it were possible for a father to look more proud of a son as he pulled the both of them to him at once, celebrating the expansion of his family once again.

The dinner was perfect—even if it was fancier than some weddings Maddie had attended. They talked about the interview; impressed with her ease in front of the camera. They talked about wedding plans—though they hadn't even begun to think about it. They asked about Botswana, about their trip. They talked about Maddie's family, how Charles had spoken to her mother that afternoon just before the interview, how Maddie had called her cousins during the down time between the interview and dinner. She could feel the love around the table; the welcoming aura in the room. Despite the silver, the china, the crystal—despite the titles and the stylings—this was her new family and they were making every effort to make her feel welcome and supported...and loved.

Following dinner, there was dessert. Following dessert, there was champagne. Charles rose to his feet and welcomed his new daughter to the family—to which they all drank happily. Following champagne, there were after dinner drinks in the study. As Maddie sat next to Harry on the small couch, his arm draped lazily behind her, she felt warm, content; at peace. The hard part of the day had passed. She had made it through the interview. She had spoken to her mother for a while, received calls of love and warm wishes from her cousins, her grandmother, her uncle. All of them made her smile widen, all of them drew tears to her eyes. She just assumed that was her new state of being—wide smile and teary eyes. And now Harry's family was embracing her as one of them.

What a day it had been.

"How are you doing love?" Harry's voice was low as his finger reached out to draw a line down the side of her neck. The evening was drawing to a close and Maddie knew from experience that Charles and Camilla were nearing time to retire to their room.

"Hmm..." She smiled, leaning into his palm as it opened against her skin. "I'm doing really well; incredibly well."

"Good," he smiled.

"So," William cleared his throat, drawing their attention to where he sat across from them. "We're thinking of heading back to Kensington." His eyes met Harry's for a moment before he blinked. "Do the two of you want to share a car?" Harry's smile reached his eyes as he sat up straight, turning to Maddie.

"Sure," she sighed. "It's been a long day. A hot bath and some sleep would be nice."

"Hmm." Harry shook his head, looking as though he was biting back laughter. "I suppose it would."

"I suppose it would," William agreed with a similar smile. Something was up. Maddie was almost certain something was up; especially after Kate nudged William in the ribs, giving him a quick shake of her head before they both smiled sweetly in her direction.

She was missing something.

Without thinking about it, without a conscious intention to do so, she slipped into observation mode. She watched their interaction, the silent conversation that was happening between them as they said their good-byes to Charles and Camilla. She made note of the way Harry smiled at her as if in anticipation of something, the way Kate's lips turned up at the corners. And, as the four of them slid into the car, she was almost certain something was up. Though her three companions seemed to be in on something she was not, she decided her working day was over. She was going to relax. With a deep breath and shake of her head, she let it slide for the moment; settling in the car next to Harry who immediately pulled her hand into his.

"It's a beautiful night," Kate commented casually, her eyes shifting towards the window.

"It is," Maddie agreed. When she turned her eyes towards the street, when she watched as the car pulled out into traffic, she sat up straighter; surprise registering on her face. "Hold on..."

"See..." Harry pointed to her, his eyes looking accusingly at William.

"Where are we going?" Maddie turned back towards them.

"I told you," Harry chuckled; shaking his head.

"Told you what?" Maddie looked at William and then to Harry. "Told him what?"
"You owe me twenty dollars," Harry held his hand out to his brother. "I told you she would notice in the car."

"Notice what?" Maddie was starting to get a little irritated as she looked to Kate who smiled across the car at her. "We went the wrong way. Kensington is..." She looked to Harry. "What's going on?"

"Well..." Harry sighed, snatching the money from his brother's hand before he turned to face her. "The thing is...we're not going home quite yet."

"We're not?" Maddie's forehead crinkled as Harry reached into the small bar to open a bottle of chilled champagne; something she hadn't even noticed when they stepped in.

"We're not." William confirmed, smiling at his soon-to-be sister.

"Here," Harry handed her a full glass. "You're going to want to drink this."

"Oh?" She snickered, glancing up at Kate who nodded encouragingly. "Okay. One more time. What's going on?"

"Nothing," Kate shook her head.

"Nothing," William smiled curtly.

"Not a thing," Harry sighed, his eyes meeting hers with that wild, loose look that spoke the exact opposite of his words.

"But I'm going to want to drink this?" She raised the glass.

"Oh absolutely," he assured her. Yes, they were full of shit—of this Maddie was sure. Nothing was not what was going on. But, it was incredibly clear that they were not quick to let her in on this secret and, for the moment, she was going to have to be okay with that. And then, because she could think of nothing better to do, she raised the glass to them and tipped it back; letting the chilled, bubbly goodness slide down her throat and into her stomach.

"I think you're going to have to do it," William spoke to Harry.

"Do what?" Maddie's eyes slid to her future brother-in-law.

"Oh come on," Kate rolled her eyes. "I don't think it's that big of a deal."

"What isn't that big of a deal?" Maddie turned to her. Yet they all continued to ignore her questions as the two brothers had an unspoken conversation.

"Fine," Harry sighed; agreeing with William. He turned in his seat then, facing Maddie as she watched him cautiously. "Hey."

"Hey," her voice was flat, her mouth twisted into half a smirk. "You want to let me in on something?"

"Not really," he shook his head with a grin; reaching for her hands. "You know I love you, right?"
"Is what's about to happen going to make me question that?" One eyebrow arched.

"No," he shook his head again.

"Then yes. I know."

"And you trust me?" He bit his lower lip as the car seemed to collectively hold its breath.

"Yes," she breathed.

"Okay," dropping her hands, Harry reached into the pocket inside his jacket and pulled out a long, dark, slip of fabric—just long enough to be...

"A blindfold?" Maddie's voice went high. "Have you had a blindfold in your pocket this whole time?"

"No," he laughed softly. "It's something I picked up along the way." Maddie could hear Kate giggle across the way from her, but her eyes stayed trained on him.

"You're going to put that on me, aren't you."

"I am," he nodded, pulling the fabric between his hands; stretching it out. His eyes locked with hers as he promised, "I will not let anything bad happen to you tonight. I will be right next to you the whole time..."

"You're still not going to tell me..."

"No," he cut in with a stern shake of his head. "You're going to have to trust me, love." Maddie held his eyes for a beat; blinking her eyes and nodding with a sigh.

"Fine." She smiled a warning look at him before closing her eyes. "Fine. Put the blindfold on. I trust you." And then, with a kiss to her lips, Harry tied the slip of fabric around her eyes; gentle but firm. There was no way she was seeing through this. Settling back into her seat, Maddie chuckled. What an odd situation she was in; driving through London with the future King and Queen; blindfolded. God help them if they were seen. Maddie felt Harry take her hand in both of his, bringing it to his lips.

"It won't be long, love."

And it wasn't. They made six more turns, drove just a few miles, and they were pulling to a stop. Harry's hand was firm on her arm, holding her there with him as Will and Kate stepped out of the car. Remaining in contact with her the entire time, he moved from his spot beside her to the spot Kate had just vacated opposite of her; his hands resting on her knees.

"We're here."

"I gathered," her sass was in top form at having been robbed of her eyesight. "Are we going to get out or..."

"Just one minute," he patted her knees and waited.
"Okay," William's voice called into the car. "We're ready."

"We're?" Maddie's voice grew nervous. "Who is we? Harry..."

"It's okay," he leaned in; kissing her lips, stroking her hand. "We're getting out of the car, love. I'm going to need you to come with me."

"Or..." She was starting to feel a little nervous. "Or you and I could stay in this backseat with this blindfold." Harry chuckled at that; as did a new voice outside of the car—one she was suddenly quite curious about.

"Not tonight," he kissed her hands. "You ready?" Maddie took a deep breath in, letting it out slowly before she nodded.

"I'm ready." With great care and a gentle touch, Harry helped Maddie step from the car, making sure she was steady on her feet before he dropped one of her hands—holding tight to the other.

"Look at that," the voice belonged to his eldest cousin. "Remember how long it took to get Kate out of the car?"

"Hey!" Kate called out; a rumble of laughter flowing around Maddie.

"Was that Peter?" Her senses were on high alert as she tried to adjust to this new setting.

"It is," Peter called out; even with her eyes covered, she knew he was smiling. She could hear it in his voice. "Congratulations Maddie."

"Thank you."

"You're ring is beautiful," Autumn spoke up.

"The interview was fantastic," Eugenie offered as what Maddie assumed was her hand reached out to pat her arm reassuringly.

"I..." Maddie shook her head with a light laugh. "I don't understand what's...are you all here?"

"Yes," Zara's voice was friendly. "We're all here."

"Okay then," William clapped his hands together; addressing the group as though he were about to lead them on a journey. "Let's head inside."

"Harry..." Maddie's voice was small as she turned to where she knew he was standing.

"I have you, love," his voice was close to her ear. "We're moving." And they were. The whole group began walking with purpose. They were moving up stairs, through halls, over carpet and marble; calling out to each other as they moved. And Harry was right there with her the whole time, giving her direction, guiding her.

"Where is the bag?" Eugenie asked from somewhere in front of Maddie.

"I left it in the room," Beatrice answered from somewhere behind.
"The bag?" Maddie giggled; Harry's hand tightening around hers as Kate called to the group.

"Did we remember to bring the..."

"Yes," Autumn cuts her off. "Last time didn't work out so well without it. I remembered." The group chuckled at the inside joke and Maddie pulled Harry closer to her. Though she trusted him, the lack of control she had in the moment was starting to make her nervous. It was surreal; relying on him so heavily. Before, it had been just Harry and Will and Kate. But now, clearly more of the family had joined them; though how many of them, Maddie was still unsure. She didn't know where they were at or what they were doing. And just as she was about to voice her concerns, they came to a pause. She could hear movement, somebody passing something to somebody else and then, she and Harry were moving; a door shutting behind them.

"Harry..." Her fingers pressed into his arm. "Where are we?"

"We're..." He chuckled lightly. "We're alone right now, you and I. We're in a room together. It's...private. And safe." He was soft with her, reassuring.

"What are we doing?"

"Well..." He sighed as she heard him unzip something. "I'm going to change you."

"Change me? Like...into a vampire?"

"No!" He laughed heartily, a rustling noise hitting her ears as he pulled something from the bag. "I'm going to change your clothes."

"What? Why would you need to do that?"

"It's part of..." He trailed off in thought. "It's just something that has to happen. Okay Maddie, I'm going to take your shoes off first, then your dress and then..."

"This is the least sexy striptease ever," Maddie chuckled as she felt Harry's hands on her calves, pulling her shoes off her feet; letting them fall to the floor with a clunk.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

"Honestly," William groaned; leaning against the wall outside the room his brother was in. "What is taking him so long?"

"Well," Peter shrugged with a growing smirk. "We did send him in with a blindfolded woman. And we told him to take off her clothes..." He let out a weak laugh as the cousins glanced around at each other. Beatrice was the first to move, pounding on the door with her closed fist.

"Henry! You have to come out of there you know! You can't just keep her in there all night!"

"Brilliant," William rolled his eyes with an amused chuckle. "We're bloody brilliant."

"Ah come on," Kate nudged him with her elbow. "You don't really think they're..." The giggle that ran through the group was all the more humorous when they took into account that, in all honesty, nobody was one hundred percent sure if they would or would not.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
The laughter could be heard through the door and was matched by Maddie's on the inside. "You know, they think you're in here taking advantage of me," she spoke into the darkness the blindfold provided her.

"In all fairness, the thought had crossed my mind," Harry finished with the remaining piece of her outfit and reached back into the bag. "Now what the hell am I supposed to...hold on..." He pressed a kiss to her cheek and moved to the door. Opening it just a crack, he held the item out to them. "Where exactly am I supposed to put this?" Zara's smile was smug as she answered for them.

"It's a bumper sticker Harry. Put it wherever you like."

"Fantastic," he slipped back into the room, the door shutting behind him. "Okay my darling...you are just about done..." He slid the Union Jack bumper sticker away from its backing. "I'm going to need you to turn around."

"Henry Charles..." She warned but did as he instructed. Biting his lip to keep from laughing he stretched the sticker across her ass; a long, soft rub to keep it in a place and a swift, loving tap.

"You're done." He stepped back, admiring his work, admiring his cousins' selection. "You look fabulous. They really outdid themselves this time."

"This time?" Maddie perked up at the new information. "So this is something you've done before?"

"Oh, ho..." Harry caught on right away, his focus snapped back as he pressed a finger to her lips. "Not yet love. Not yet. Give me your hand. We're moving again."

"I hate you sometimes," she grinned; holding her hand out to him. He had been so sweet with her; talking her through everything he did, making sure she was comfortable. She forgot sometimes, just how light-handed this tiger of a man could be. "But I love you all the same."

"I know," he laughed, pulling the door open. "We're ready!" He called out to them. As Maddie stepped back out of the room, she was greeted by applause, laughter, and few hoots. She felt her cheeks flush. There was no way this could be good. After snapping a few photos, they were leaving for another destination.

This time, as they walked, the group was quieter, their pace a bit slower. But it didn't take them long to reach their destination. Before Maddie really had time to determine where they were headed in relation to where they had been, they were coming to a stop. She listened intently as a door was opened; pushed almost—it must be heavy. And then, Harry was pulling her forward, slower than before. They took about ten steps into a room before they all came to a stop.

"Are we ready?" Harry glanced around the room; his fingers stroking Maddie's softly.

"Go ahead," Beatrice spoke softly to him.

"Madeline," his voice was low and warm as he spoke into her ear, his hands moving up around her to the tied blindfold. "I'm going to take this off now."

"Should I brace myself for a pie to the face or..."
"No," a few of them chuckled as Harry untied the knot, letting the fabric fall from her eyes. "Open your eyes."

Doing as he instructed, she took a deep breath and let her eyelids slip open. Her first sight was of him; his warm eyes, his charming smile. She blinked a few times, her eyes adjusting to the light as she glanced around. "Where are we..." She looked around at them; all of them. It was all of Harry's paternal cousins and their spouses. They were all there—with the exception of Beatrice's boyfriend David. She looked past them to take in the room and gasped; her hand flying to her throat. "Holy shit."

"Nice," Harry laughed.

"We're in the Throne Room."

"Yes." Harry nodded.

"At Buckingham Palace."

"Right again," he grinned wide; finding great humor in her realizations.

"What am I doing in the Throne Room at..." Her eyes looked down at her clothing and she stopped; adjusting her focus. "Okay. What in the hell am I wearing?" She heard snickers from the group and looked up at them; her mind working fast as she caught up. "This is a hazing."

"It's not a hazing," Eugenie spoke up with a comforting smile.

"It feels like a hazing," she waved her hand down at her short, cut off denim shorts with bib overalls and suspenders, the tiny tank top covered by a flannel shirt that hung open, at the bright red cowboy boots on her feet. She twisted to look at the bumper sticker on her ass. "It feels like I'm about to be jumped into the strangest street gang in the world. That's what it feels like."

"You're not going to be jumped," Eugenie shook her head.

"This is all about love, darling," Harry's hand stroked her arm, despite the glare she shot him.

"I'm not sure I'm supposed to be in here," Maddie shook her head, looking nervously at the center of the focus of the room.

"Why not?" Mike laughed.

"I'm an American for starters..."

"Not for long," Kate laughed. "Did you see the bumper sticker?"

"But..."

"Ahem," Beatrice cleared her throat, drawing attention to herself. The room quieted and focused on their redhead cousin who smiled sweetly and began. "Madeline Jay Forrester this...is your Proem."

"God, we sound more and more like The Skulls every time we do this," William chuckled under his breath to Peter.
"My Proem?" Maddie ignored him, focusing on Beatrice.

"It means introduction," Harry offered.

"I know what proem means," Maddie smiled up at him. "You're going to initiate me?"

"We're inviting you in," Eugenie spoke next. "All who have come before you..."

"Well, not all," Peter cut in. "It started with Autumn."

"And all who will come after you..." Eugenie continued.

"Really?" Zara spoke up. "I thought we would stop with the people in this room. I mean, are we going to do this with Jack and Louise? We'll be like..."

"Ahem," Eugenie's eyes narrowed at her cousins who quickly settled their laughter.

"We've all done it," Mike clarified. "Everyone of us in this room who has joined the family. And now...it's your turn."

"I..." Maddie turned her eyes up to Harry. "You warned me about the press ten thousand times, but not once did you tell me that this would happen."

"We don't talk about this," he smiled down at her with a light shrug. "I was sworn to secrecy."

"Okay..." Maddie took a deep breath and let it out slowly. In their strange, wacky way—they were trying to make her feel a part of them. And she knew Harry would never put her in a bad spot. She trusted him. She trusted them. "Okay. Fine. I can take a hazing. I'm a big girl. What do I have to do?"

"First," Zara stepped up; moving closer to the center where Maddie stood with Harry. "We have a set of rules..."

"Of course you do."

"We never, ever, EVER talk about this. Ever. Not to the outside, not to each other. We only talk about Proem during Proem. Once tonight is over, it never existed."

"Kind of like Fight Club?" Maddie joked, but the room remained serious. She glanced at Harry who squeezed her hand in his and nodded with a smirk. He knew it sounded crazy but he loved it, they all loved it. It was one of the very few things in their lives that was absolutely theirs. And now, he was sharing it with her.

"You have to do everything we ask," Peter spoke up. "You have to participate in the entire evening. You have to complete the tasks with fidelity; answer our questions with complete honesty."

"And you have one Free Pass," Beatrice offered. "You can pass on only one thing the entire night; something you don't feel comfortable doing, a question you don't want to answer. But, if you pass, whatever the request was still has to be completed...by Harry." Beatrice pointed as Harry waved his hand; watching as Maddie processed it all.

"And, at the end," Eugenie smiled. "You have one wish."
"One wish?"

"You can ask anything of us..." Autumn spoke up quietly. "And we'll do it. As a sign of faith, a show of support..."

"Family," William offered.

"We can call bullshit on any of your answers," Jack pointed out; remembering his experience. "So if you're lying...there will be consequences." Peter, William, and Harry all rumbled with laughter at something Maddie didn't quite understand.

"I'm sorry. Questions?"

"There will be... an interview portion."

"Of course," Maddie sighed. "You're going to roast me. It's an entire night devoted to embarrassing me."

"No, love," Harry pulled her hand to his lips. "It's an entire night devoted to...welcoming you to the family."

"An entire night?" Maddie lifted her eyebrows.

"An entire night." Kate nodded.

"But once it's over, that's it. You're in." Beatrice finished up. "You're one of us."

"Any questions?" William asked her.

"Yes," she nodded. "Am I supposed to be a farmer? Is that what this is?" The room erupted into laughter. "Is this really what you think a farmer looks like? You really should know better."

"You should have seen Mike's outfit," Autumn giggled.

"The pink tutu!" Beatrice pointed her finger to her cousin as the room rumbled with the memory. The laughter settled down as Harry settled closer to her, holding out his hand.

"So what do you say love? Can you abide by those rules? Can you play with us tonight?" He saw the same fun, spirited craziness in her eyes that he knew often occupied his. His hand stretched out to shake hers. "Are you in? Or are you out?"

"Oh I am in," she grinned, slipping her hand into his with a firm shake. "I am absolutely in." Harry's face stretched with a wide smile.

"Forgive me for the secret?" His eyebrow arched.

"I'm thinking about it," her head cocked to the side teasingly.

"Kiss me," he pulled at her hand, pulling her lips to his. His arms wrapped around her, pressing her close.

"Okay, okay," Zara laughed as Harry struggled to step away from Maddie. Beatrice and Peter stepped out of the circle, finding the items they had stowed there. As Beatrice began to hand around champagne glasses, Peter opened up a bottle of champagne.

"This," he smiled warmly at her as he filled her glass first. "Is a vintage bottle from the year you were born..."

"Really..." Maddie couldn't help her grin. Even in the ridiculous clothes she was wearing, even though she had been tricked, blindfolded and brought here against her will, she felt warm; safe. She had no idea what this night had in store for her but, from the looks on the faces around her, it was bound to be something she would never forget. Peter's voice boomed when he spoke.

"Madeline Jay Forrester. Tonight is about bringing you in; embracing you with the arms of the family—and all that comes with it. We may not be without skeletons, without tarnish. But we're family—through and through. And now we're yours. In the spirit of great fun, in the spirit of the Proem, we welcome you." Peter lifted his glass; everyone followed suit. "To you we bring love and forgiveness, support and acceptance, faithfulness and undying loyalty..." Peter's eyes met Maddie's. "And to those who try to hurt you...a swift and unified wrath."

"Wow..." Maddie felt a small lump in her throat as every one of them raised their glasses to her.

"To family," Peter smiled.

"To family," the group echoed.

"To family," Maddie's voice was soft as Harry's hand found her shoulder with a squeeze.

As they all tipped back their glasses, enjoying this very specifically selected bottle of champagne, Maddie could see the excitement in their eyes, their faces alive with all that laid ahead of them that night. They had every intention of putting her in all kinds of awkwardness before the night was over—of this she was almost certain. She finished her glass with a grin and flashed a smile around the crowd.

"So..." Her eyes twinkled with excitement. "What's first?"

"I..." William stepped forward with a knowing smirk. "I am very happy you asked. Everybody follow me."

"Come on love," Harry held his hand out to her. "The night awaits."

_Oh God_, she thought. _Here we go_. Taking Harry's hand in hers, she followed as the group fell into step with William; leaving the Throne Room behind them. She wasn't entirely sure if she should feel as excited as she did or if she should be more nervous—but either way, this was bound to be a night she would never, ever forget.

To Be Continued....
The group was relatively silent as they followed William out of The Throne Room and into the halls of Buckingham Palace. Maddie stayed tight to Harry's side; her hand tucked through his arm as they moved. They went up a set of stairs, rounded a corner and stepped into one of the many magnificently ornate rooms. Crossing to a large fireplace, the group slowed to a still; all eyes forward. Maddie looked up at Harry with quizzical eyes. His smirk was smug, his eyes dancing with all he knew lied ahead of them. William, leading this particular leg of the journey, stepped forward, twisted a candelabra counterclockwise. And then, with a light push to the wall behind it; the entire wall began to move. Maddie's eyes flashed wide and she leaned to whisper to the man who had brought her to all of this.

"Zoinks Shaggy, that was amazing..." Harry cracked a grin as his family shuffled around them.

"Come on, love," he pulled on her hand; stepping through the low archway into what was, for all intents and purposes, a hidden passageway.

"This is straight up Scooby Doo stuff. You know that right?" Maddie tugged on his arm and he laughed as they moved through the corridor. For more than a minute Maddie was certain she was dreaming, that she had slipped into some alternate reality, some time in history when hidden tunnels and escapes were the norm. When they reached the end of the small corridor, there was another push. With two small steps, they were standing in a large game room; complete with couches and TVs, a fully stocked bar, a billiards table, shuffleboard, darts. There was music playing, food out on the bar and a few doors to other rooms; a bathroom, maybe a bedroom. Maddie wasn't entirely sure. In the middle of the room as a large, comfortable chair that Maddie just knew was for her. There was a small table next to it and all of the other seats were positioned towards it; like an audience to a stage.

"Okay," William clapped his hands together, more relaxed now that they were there. "Maddie, would you join me over at the bar?"

As if I have a choice, Maddie thought as she let go of Harry and smiled wide. "Absolutely."

"We're going to start off with a drink," his hand reached out to her shoulder; pulling her in. Jack, Kate, and Mike had all rounded to the other side of the bar and in front of them were three overturned silver buckets, the kind that normally had ice and champagne in them. "Jack, Kate, and Mike were the last three to marry into the family and they have each created a cocktail for you underneath these buckets. You get to choose which one you want to start with."

"Hmmm..." Maddie tapped her chin with her finger as she scanned the three of them; noticing the slightly wicked look in Mike's eyes, the bright way Kate was smiling at her. "I'm going to go with...Kate." Her hand reached out to tap the bucket as Kate clapped her hands in excitement.

"I am so glad you chose my drink because it has some meaning behind it." Kate's eyes were bright and cheery as she pulled her silver bucket up dramatically. "Champagne. In a flask."

"A flask!" Maddie bounced on her feet, remembering the baby shower they attended where they would have easily given all they had for a flask of something. Reaching for the beautifully designed flask, she read the inscription along the bottom. "Oh Baby! Hahahaha..." Maddie's laughter was joined by Kate's as she pulled an identical flask from behind the bar.
"Our names are along the bottom so that we can tell them apart..." Kate lifted them up and Maddie grinned noticing that she had inscribed them as Kate and Maddie—not Catherine and Madeline. It warmed her soul that such details were coming out of this night; the champagne from the year she was born, the flasks with their nicknames instead of their royal ones. It made the night more than just a hazing. It made it a welcoming.

"Thank you so much," Maddie leaned across the bar to hug her. When she pulled back, Kate unscrewed the lid to her flask and lifted it to Maddie.

"Welcome to the family, sister."

"Thank you," Maddie lifted hers and, tapping the flasks together, the two women drank down some of the wonderful champagne stowed inside. "Okay..." Maddie spun around, facing the rest of the family as they situated into the chairs circling the main chair. "Hit me. What's next?"

"Right this way," Beatrice waved Maddie over to the very chair she had assumed was hers. As she moved forward, walking through the other family members, she felt Mike pat her on the back, she heard Kate wish her luck, she saw Harry offer a wink from his chair in the back where he would watch the whole thing unfold.

Maddie moved to the chair and took a seat, stuffing her flask into the pocket of her bib overalls. As Peter and William arranged some shots onto the small table next to her chair, Beatrice began her explanation. "We have a list of questions we're going to ask you—they are quite different than the ones asked of you this afternoon..."

"I would imagine," Maddie sighed into her chair as the group chuckled.

"We will take turns asking questions. Everyone has at least one and anyone can tap in and change places at really anytime. Whoever is holding the scepter..." Beatrice lifted this large, gold monstrosity from the chair across from Maddie and waved it in the air. "Whoever has this is the interviewer." Maddie nodded her understanding. "You must answer every question with absolute honesty. Anyone in this room can call bullshit on your answer. You can make an argument and the interviewer will make a judgment. If he or she decides that you were lying, you have to take a shot. If he or she decides that you were not...the one who called bullshit has to take the shot. Does that make sense?"

"Yes," Maddie nodded again, her smile stretching even further as she looked at the shots lined up; wondering exactly how the others who had been in her position had done in this particular seat.

"Oh!" Zara rose from her chair and waved a small, white handkerchief. "This is your free pass. You only have one but you can use it to avoid answering one of the questions, if you wish."

"Yes, thank you," Beatrice smiled. "If you wave the white flag, your lovely fiancé will take over for that question." Harry waved his hand at her.

"Use it well," Zara winked as she handed the piece of material over to Maddie.

"Thank you," she snatched it and stuffed it into her pocket next to the flask.

"Okay..." Beatrice took her seat as everyone else settled; drinks in hands, smiles on faces. "Any questions? Need anything?"

"Nope," Maddie shook her head, sending a look in Harry's direction. "I'm ready."
"Let's begin," Beatrice laid the scepter across her lap and looked down at the notecard in her hand. "We've all heard the story about how you and Harry met. We were wondering...even though you didn't recognize him, did you fancy him right away?"

"Ha!" Maddie couldn't help the laughter that burst through her lips, jumpstarting the laughter from the group. Her eyes met his as she thought about it. "I don't know that I did. I...he was a good looking guy. He is a good looking guy. I just...I wasn't even thinking about stuff like that at the time."

"So it wasn't love at first sight?"

"No, I guess it wasn't."

"What can you do?" Harry shrugged as Beatrice continued.

"We know that you asked him to unload a truck full of food..."

"Ordered!" Harry called out, opening a bottle of beer and taking a swallow.

"Anyway," Beatrice rolled her eyes. "How soon after that did you find out who he was?"

"Immediately. My friend Ella recognized him and came over to tell me what a fool I was."

"Once you found out he was a prince...did that help or hurt his image?"

"Hmmm..." Maddie squinted; her mind working to get back to that time in their lives. "I don't know if it did either, really. It didn't change much to be honest. I guess...I don't know. I guess that knowing that he was a Prince and that he still unloaded the truck and that he wasn't pompous at all with me...that was a good thing. So maybe it helped?"

"Okay," Beatrice nodded; taking a breath. "Who would you say made the first move?"

"He did." Without a doubt.

"Bullshit," Harry called out. The crowd chuckled as they turned to him.

"Excuse me?!" Maddie sent an accusatory glare his way. "You did."

"No, no, no." He shook his head with a gotcha look on his smug face. "You kissed me first and you know you did. You even made fun of me about it afterwards..."

"She didn't ask who kissed who first. She asked who made the first move; two different things." Maddie looked to his cousin with raised eyebrows.

"Hold on. Now...Maddie...you kissed him first?" Beatrice's focus was divided for a moment.

"I..." Maddie sighed as the others began to chuckle amusedly. "Yes. I kissed him first. But only after he dropped everything and flew to Bendal to do just that." Harry shrugged, leaning back in his chair. She was right. He would own that.

"So...when you say he made the first move..."
"He did."

"Explain," Beatrice waved her hand.

"The first time I met him, I told him what my favorite candy was and when he came back the next time..." She turned to Harry then; the others snickering at them. "Listen, Ella had been in Bendal for years and she had only seen you visit once and then you met me that day and you were back in Bendal in a month. And you were there for a whole week. And you brought me a bag of my favorite candy. And you asked for my phone number. And you..." She shook her head at the cocky look on his face and turned back to Beatrice who was grinning wide at the exchange. "He made the first move."

"She's right," Beatrice decided with a nod. "Come and get your shot Henry." Applause rang out as Harry moved through the crowd. With a wink to Maddie, he lifted a glass from the table and swallowed it back.

"How are you doing love?" He sat the empty glass down.

"Pretty good Sunshine." Laughter rumbled around as Harry made his way back to his seat. The family was clearly enjoying this portion of the night.

Bea laughed and continued with her questions. "Now this kiss. Was it good?"

"It was okay," Maddie shrugged defiantly. His family rumbled with laughter.

"Bullshit!" Harry called out with a smirk and a shake of his head. "That was an amazing kiss and you know it."

"That's fine," Maddie shrugged again, reaching for one of the shots in front of her. "I'll take a hit for that one." With a smirk she drank the shot. "The kiss was okay. I'm sticking with that answer."

"Fair enough," Beatrice turned to the group. "Next?"

"Me," Autumn rose to her feet, squeezing Peter's hand before dropping it and moving to the hot seat. There was scattered applause as she kissed Bea's cheek and took the scepter from her. "Maddie."

"Autumn," Maddie smiled sweetly; having liked and respected Autumn since the day she met her at the polo match.

"Speaking of kissing," Autumn's grin was Cheshire like as she settled into her seat.

"Oh here we go," Maddie sighed.

"Geographically speaking, what would Harry say was the most unusual location the two of you ever kissed each other?"

"Hmmm..." Maddie's lips pressed together as she thought; her eyes watching Harry as though she could pull the answer from his mind. "Unusual? I...We've kissed in Bendal. Off the coast of Greece...Australia...I don't know. I'm going to say at thirty-thousand feet in the air. We've kissed quite a bit in the air; over the Atlantic, over the continent of Africa..." Autumn glanced to Harry who nodded with a smile; that was an acceptable answer.
"Great. Now. You do know that your wedding is going to be in London..."

"So I've been informed," Maddie kidded.

"If you were in a different situation and the two of you could control more of your wedding details, where would you be marrying?"

"That's a good question," Maddie's facial features grew soft. "We haven't really talked about it but...we went to this beautiful wedding on the coast in Australia right at midnight on New Year's Eve....I would say something like that. A destination wedding with our families and our dearest friends. That would be nice."

"It would," Autumn smiled warmly.

"Or you know...London and a thousand of our closest friends..." The laughter that ignited at Maddie's casual toss out was full of sympathy and understanding. The enjoyment in the audience continued to increase with every question that was asked and answered. Maddie took another sip from her flask.

"What would Harry say is the one thing you could do to make him the happiest man on Earth?"

Maddie's cheeks flushed slightly and the snickers among the group only made it worse.

"Easy now," she rolled her eyes. "Everybody stand down..." She met Harry's eyes and he winked at her—he knew what his actual answer would be—she had already done it. "I'm going to say...."

She winked back and went for it. "Eight babies."

The room went up in a roar of laughter as Autumn's eyes grew wide. Among all of the chaos, Harry held her eyes; despite Mike's light punching of his shoulder. Maddie lifted a shot glass from the table and raised it to him in a toast. With his bottle of beer in the air, he nodded to her and they drank to that.

"Please. Please Maddie, look at me..." Autumn leaned forward, forcing Maddie's eyes to hers. "Spend the weekend with my two before he makes you sign anything." And the laughter increased. Maddie barely had time to pull herself together before Mike was sitting across from her, scepter in hand.

"Mr. Tindall." Her cheeks felt warm, flushed—probably from the long day, from the alcohol intake.

"Doctor," he grinned and Maddie relaxed. She had always felt a special affinity for Mike.

"What do you have for me?"

"What does Harry do that makes you laugh the hardest? The thing that never fails?" Maddie's grin stretched out her cheeks; flashing her teeth and making her eyes crinkle at the corners.

"He raps."

"Raps?"

"Raps. With an American accent and everything." She could see Harry biting his lip as he shook his head.
"Raps what?" His whole face twitched at this new bit of knowledge.

"Old school stuff; Run DMC, The Beastie Boys. A little Jay Z..." Maddie shrugged, her eyes lighting up as she drew up images from memory. "He does an excellent Shoop by Salt-n-Pepa."

As Harry turned bright red, his cousins were rolling with laughter; clutching their sides. Mike, trying desperately to hold onto his control—saving his chiding for later—shook his head and bit his lip.

"You know..." Mike leaned forward, waving for Maddie to do the same. "If you want...we can make him do it now." Maddie laughed, loving the way he was willing to conspire with her. But she shook her head.

"Nah..." She sighed. "I think that's something I want to keep for me."

"Okay," he nodded, continuing on. "How long have the two of you been together?"

"A little over two years."

"Two shots for you." He moved two glasses out in front of her. "One for every year. Harry!" He called without turning to look. Maddie watched as Harry stepped up to her, applause following behind him. He lifted two glasses from the table.

"We have to do a shot for every year we were together?" Maddie looked up at him, pulling one of the glasses into her fingers.

"We do," Harry nodded. "You should have seen Will and Kate do this round. We about lost them both." As the group laughed at the memory, he held his glass out to her. Together they drank down two shots each and, after leaning to kiss her, Harry returned to his seat.

"Jesus," Maddie breathed. "I'm going to be toasted after this is over."

"That's the idea," Mike winked and asked his last question. "Could you tell us about your first date?"

"Yes!" Maddie clapped her hands together excitedly. "Officially, we went out in Tetbury on the motorcycle. We had dinner and drinks and we had wine in the tree house at Highgrove." She sighed happily at the memory.

"And unofficially?" Mike raised his eyebrows.

"Unofficially..." Her mind wandered. "The celebration of the new Community Garden in Bendal. The night I was shot." And the once chuckling room went completely silent. Drinks paused in the air, smiles faded from faces. All except for Maddie—who let out the tiniest bit of a laugh. Mike caught it and nodded thoughtfully—having always felt a special connection to her.

"Well. That was some first date." His face was classic; calm and collected.

"It really was." Maddie tried for stoic but failed; leading the group in a round of laughter. Smiles returned, drinks continued on their journeys.

"Thanks doll," he leaned to kiss her cheek. "I'm all finished."
"Thanks Mike," she grinned at him as he left his spot, handing his scepter off to Jack who smiled at Maddie apologetically. He was the newest to this and Maddie could tell it made him a little uncomfortable. She tried to make him feel more at ease with a grin and nod as he sat.

"I just have a few...generic questions," he shrugged. "They are easy and...kind of lame."

"That's okay," Maddie chuckled as Eugenie tossed a pillow in her husband's direction.

"Okay...if you were stranded on a deserted island...what three things would you take with you?" Out of the corner of her eye, she swore she saw Eugenie roll her eyes, but she focused on Jack and smiled at him—what a crowd this was. Thank God she was tough...a weak skinned person would have a difficult time with this group.

"Harry." To which she received groans. "Sunblock." To which she received a couple of nods and a knowing, shared secret glance from Harry. "And...a book."

"What book?" Jack followed up.

"I don't know. Anna Karenina? I've wanted to read it and I haven't really had the time. But if I were stranded..." She waved her hand and he nodded.

"Okay..." He looked down at his notecard. "If you could have a conversation with anyone, alive or dead, who would it be and what would you talk about?" Maddie's breath sucked into her lungs as the question settled over her. Her eyes flew to Jack's and she knew; he had no idea. There was a light murmur in the crowd and Maddie was instantly able to discern who among them knew about her father and who among them did not. It wasn't the first time she had thought of her father that day, far from it. Taking a breath, she forced a smile to her lips. Harry leaned forward in his seat; his beer completely abandoned as he focused on her face.

It all happened so fast. Maddie's mind spiraled. She thought about the question for a moment; knowing that Jack meant no harm, knowing he probably wasn't anticipating the way her heart stopped in her chest. For a moment she considered going with funny and saying Bishop—knowing it would get a rise out of Harry, knowing it would bring laughter to the group. She thought about going with an obvious sort of answer and saying George Clooney. Who didn't love George Clooney? Or maybe a great thinker who could provide her with some profound bit of knowledge.

But when she stopped searching for "the right" answer, the honest answer began to flood her heart. And Harry, watching her intently, saw the moment that it did. He saw the emotion on her face. Misreading it for upset about her father, he spoke up.

"Pass on the question Maddie," his voice was loud, clear, as he moved through the chairs towards her. "I'll answer it."

"No." She shook her head. She looked down at her hands and then up at Jack whose face had drained of color as he caught on; something was wrong. Offering a small smile, Maddie took a deep breath. "I...I would have dinner with Harry's mother. The entire room went still; including Harry who came to a stop a foot away from her. "I would tell her...I would tell her thank you. I would tell her that she did an amazing job with her boys. I would tell her they were happy and they had grown into wonderful young men and that I had every intention of looking after Harry. I would tell her that her grandkids will know all about her...Tell her to say hello to my father..." Her voice trailed off as the lump in her throat rose.
"Oh my God..." Jack shook his head, wishing he could go back in time and kick his own ass.

"Jack!" Eugenie's voice was harsh as she chastised him.

"I'm sorry..." Jack whispered to Maddie, ignoring everything else around him.

"Oh no," her hand went out to him as she blinked back the tears. "It's okay. It is."

"I didn't know. These are just questions I got from a deck of cards and..."

"It's fine. It's..."

"My turn," Harry cut in as he stepped up to them. As Jack moved quickly from the chair and Harry shifted in, Maddie's eyes met his and her lungs hitched at the emotion that was on his face. His hands reached out to take hers. "This isn't supposed to be like this. I'm sorry." He kissed her hands, even as she shook her head.

"Stop," she whispered. "It was just a question."

"Are you okay?" He ached inside—not for her answer but because she had come with him tonight, trusted him not to put her in harm's way and here she was answering questions about something that hit so close to home.

"I am," she nodded. "I promise."

"You want to stop?" He moved closer to her. "I can call this off. We can go home."

"No!" She shook her head. "I want to stay. I want to do this. We're having fun."

"Okay," he smiled and moved closer, pulling his lips to her ear. And then, meeting the exact goal he intended, he sang in a whisper, "Here I go, Here I go, Here I go again. Girls what's my weakness?" And Maddie burst into a fit of giggles.

"Men," she whispered in his ear and kissed his cheek. Her eyes pushed the tears out as her stomach clenched from laughter. Though the rest of the room was looking at her with mild concern, Harry had eased up; laughter in his eyes. It took her a minute to calm down, a moment to level out.

"Are you sure you're okay love?"

"Yes." She nodded; moving on.

"Okay," he smiled again; leaning up to kiss her, to rub his thumb along her cheek.

"I'm so sorry," Jack spoke up just to her left. "Is there anything at all I can do to make it up to you?"

"No," Maddie laughed. "Wait. Actually..." She leaned over and plucked up two shot glasses. Keeping one to herself and handing one to him, she raised it in the air. "To Harry's mother. And my father."

"Salute," he nodded slightly; his voice catching in his throat. And then Harry watched as the two of them downed the shots. If that was good enough for her, it was good enough for him. As he rose from his chair, he offered Jack a pat on his back.

"Okay," Maddie cleared her throat and looked out at the crowd; slightly subdued with a few teary eyes and she clapped her hands together. "We can't end on that note. Who's next?"

"I am," Peter stood, his eyes meeting Maddie's with the warm, wonderful friendliness that came naturally to him. There were a few hoots as he made his way towards her; applause in effort to lighten the mood again. "Can I get you anything?" He asked as he sat.

"Nope," she shook her head and sank further into the chair. "Thank you though."

"Okay," he nodded and cleared his throat. "Tell us...who was the first member of Harry's family that you met?"

"Will." Maddie's grin returned.

"And how did that go?" With a chuckle her eyes found her future brother's and he met her gaze with a warm smile.

"It went well. I was...I was in the hospital in Africa right after the shooting and I woke up and there he was; the Duke of Cambridge chilling by my bedside, bringing me water and ice chips," they all laughed at the image. "I was totally shocked. I know I didn't recognize Harry right away but I knew instantly who Will was and I was shocked to find him there."

"What did you think of him?"

"I thought...he must be a great brother." Her answer was met with a few aw's while both boys rolled their eyes. "But really though. He had no idea who I was but his brother had asked him to sit with me. And he did. He was very sweet and funny. I thought it went well." She glanced to William to check in.

"It absolutely did," he nodded with a smile.

"Who were you the most nervous to meet?"

"How did that go?"

"Incredibly well," she sighed. "Every time I've spent time with her has been wonderful. She's...amazing."

"She is," Peter agreed. "Was there a meeting that went drastically wrong?"

"Ha!" Maddie tossed her head back. "I don't think drastically wrong but I did have one particularly embarrassing moment." She heard Harry snicker as she spoke.

"Do tell..."

"It was after the shooting. The day I was given clearance to resume...normal activities..." She blushed slightly. "I walked into Harry's place warning him of a...fun-filled evening...And out pops Charles. First time I met him I'm yelling at his son about the things I want to do to him. I don't know if he didn't hear it or he pretended that he didn't hear it. Either way, it was mortifying."

"God that's wonderful," Peter shook his head with a wide smile and tears in his eyes. "I wish I could have been there for that."

"Yes you do," Harry called out, opening another bottle of beer.

"Okay..." Zara spoke up as she nudged her brother's shoulder. "You done?"

"Yes ma'am," he smiled up at his sister. "Thank you Maddie." He leaned to kiss her cheek.

"Thank you Peter," she grinned as he walked away, her eyes turning to Zara.

"Speaking of The Family..." Zara took a sip from her drink. "In your opinion, what is the worst thing about marrying into the Royal Family?"

"Oh wow..." Maddie lifted her flask to her lips to snickers from the audience. "I don't...I don't know."

"The paparazzi?" Kate offered.

"The curtseying?" Beatrice laughed.

"The weirdly secret initiation ceremonies?" Mike called out to rounds of laughter.

"No, none of that..." Maddie shook her head with a grin. "I think the thing that's going to be the most difficult for me is leaving my job. I love it. I love going there and working with people and...it's going to be the hardest part about all of this. Leaving my job." She could see Harry sigh in his seat at the revelation though it was no news to him.

"How about the best part?" Zara raised her eyebrows.

"Harry." Maddie's response was quick and met with a chorus of laughter and coos. "No no! Wait. I take that back! The bath tub at Kensington. Jesus. That thing is fucking amazing." Her alcohol intake was definitely having an effect on her word choice.

"Lovely," Harry shook his head. "I knew it would come to this."

"We both did," Maddie shrugged playfully as his cousins watched their back and forth with laughter.

"Okay Maddie...we're going to shift gears a bit," a strange, wicked sort of smirk moved onto Zara's face. "It's time to talk about sex."

"Oh God..." Maddie groaned as the laughter rumbled louder.

"We'll start out easy...is Harry your first?"

"Wow." Maddie shook her head, her cheeks warming. "No. He's not."

"Is he the best?"

"Absolutely." She answered without a thought, without a moment's hesitation.
"No bullshit call on that one?" Mike called out to Harry.

"No way man," he shook his head. "She speaks the truth."

"Well good for you," Zara winked at Maddie. "Let's talk...frequency."

"Oh Jesus."

"If the airlines awarded ten thousand miles for every time you two made love this past week, how far around the planet would you be able to travel?"

"Okay. Every time we..." Maddie sighed and began counting; lifting her fingers as she went. "One, two, three...four..."

"Oh come on..." Kate shook her head with a roll of her eyes; not the least bit surprised.

"Five..." Maddie pulled her other hand up. "Six..."

"Bullshit!" Mike called out, tossing a pillow at Harry.

"Six." Maddie finished. "So...sixty thousand miles. How far around is the planet?" Maddie asked.

"About twenty-four thousand miles," Peter offered.

"Two times. We could travel around the Earth two times. Two and a half." And the round of applause, the way Peter and Jack rose to their feet in an ovation, only added to the redness on Maddie's face. "What can I say? It was his birthday...we got engaged..."

"We're world travelers," Harry winked in her direction. "And that's a shot for Mike!" He pointed as his cousin begrudgingly made his way to the table, lifting a glass to Maddie in respect and drinking it back.

"Okay, okay," Zara called to her cousins. "Settle down you heathens. Who's next?"

"My turn!" Eugenie rose from her chair drink in hand, to take the scepter and the seat from Zara. "Hello Madeline."

"Eugenie," Maddie situated in her spot.

"Would you say that Harry is romantic?"

"I would," her heart warmed as her eyes met his in the crowd.

"What is the most romantic thing he's ever done?"

"Well..." She let out a long, slow breath; reaching for her flask. "There are a lot of things...it could be that he keeps my favorite candy all over the place..."

"All over the place?" Eugenie's eyebrows rose.

"His place at Kensington, his pockets when we go out..."
"Her sock drawer," Kate offered as she sipped from her glass.

"He stashed it all over my apartment before he left for Afghanistan," Maddie nodded to her future sister-in-law. "That's pretty romantic. Or...or it could be that he flew my mother to England so I wouldn't be alone at Christmas."

"Henry," Eugenie turned a warm smile to her cousin.

"Or it could be the trip he planned to Finland so I could finally see the Northern Lights..." Maddie pointed. "Though it is more romantic that he cancelled the entire thing without any grumbling because I had the flu..."

"Aww..." Autumn called out as Peter reached out to pinch Harry's cheek.

"Knock it off," Harry laughed as he swatted at Peter's hand. "She wanted the most romantic, love. Not an all-inclusive list..."

"Sorry!" Maddie laughed. "Sorry. Okay. The most romantic. Has to be..." She shifted in her chair and smiled up at him. "He doesn't know that I know this but...ever since my father died my mother has been smoking a cigar every Friday. She...she does it in secret and I think it's because it reminds her of how he smelled..." Harry's eyes grew wide as she laid it all out there. Maddie smiled warmly. "I never told her that I knew. I don't want her to feel...I don't know. I want her to have that if she needs it. But...when we were in the states, Harry smoked one with her. And then again when she was here for Christmas..."

"How do you know that?" Harry leaned forward in shock.

"You smelled like my father, Harry." She laughed. "Anyway. I think that's pretty romantic; holding such a special secret for my mother, smoking with her so she's not alone..." She let out a breath of contentment. "But Harry's big on those little things. So I shouldn't be surprised."

"Wow..." Eugenie sighed, looking back at her cousin with love in her eyes. Though Maddie was right, none of them should be surprised that Harry was this way with her mother—he was this way with all of them. "Okay...let's see. Autumn asked about the kissing..." Eugenie looked down at the card in her hand and back up to Maddie with a gleam in her eye. "Where is the craziest place the two of you have...you know."

"You know?" William laughed at his cousin's vocabulary.

"Had sex," she glared at him. "Where is the craziest place the two of you have had sex?" Her eyes shifted back to Maddie whose eyes snapped to Harry's.

His face grew smug with a fleck of humor in his eyes. He watched her lips twitch as she processed the question, as she went through their list of crazy locations. It was relatively short—he was too easily recognized for them to have gone out in public like that very often.

The corner of Maddie's bottom lip pulled into her teeth as she thought it over. There was the time they almost had sex in the Greenhouse. There was the time in the aforementioned bath tub when she returned from Bendal. There was the time in her office at Saint Joseph's. There was...

"Oh God," Maddie couldn't help the gasp that pushed through her lips as it hit her. Her eyes flashed wide as she looked to him and he laughed. He already knew. He was already there. The corner of his mouth twisted up with a smirk. He knew exactly what was coming.
Maddie lifted her eyebrows in question.

Harry lifted his in a challenge.

"Harry..." She warned.

"Go ahead, love," he encouraged; his eyes dancing with anticipation.

"Okay," she took a deep breath and, looking straight at Eugenie, she confessed. "The Drawing Room. Buckingham Palace. About six hours ago."

And the entire room burst into chaos at once. There were howls of appreciation, admiration; respect. Mike was clapping his hands and laughing out loud. There were stunned faces and shocked eyes. There was William shaking his head slowly with a humored glare in his brother's direction.

"Henry Charles Albert David!" Beatrice was out of her chair swatting at the back of Harry's head as he held his hands up in defense; catching her wrist.

"Harry!" Eugenie turned around in her chair. "I have tea with Granny in there!"

"So?"

"So!?!"

"If you think I'm going to apologize..." Harry shook his head, smirk firmly in place.

"Well, well, well," Kate's voice was low as she grinned at Maddie. "Madeline Forrester."

"What?! You wanted me to be honest. I'm being honest."

"I'm never going to be able to sit in that room again," William ran his hands over his face.

"I cannot believe you Harry!" Eugenie shook her head.

"Me?" Harry laughed as he reached out and snatched the scepter from his cousin's hand. "Madeline. How hard did I have to work to convince you to have sex with me in The Drawing Room?"

"Henry Charles..." She warned.

"How hard?" He kept his smile wide.

"Not very," Maddie confessed and the laughter increased.

"God I love you," he leaned to kiss her; despite how it riled the crowd.

"Okay, okay," William groaned as he moved forward. "Let's not add this room to the list. Have a seat baby brother." He patted Harry on the back with a grin; taking the scepter and the seat.

"You're almost done," Harry kissed her again.
"See you later," her hand reached out to pat his ass as he moved away from her, ruffling what was left of William's hair as he walked past him.

"Sister," he flashed a brilliant smile to Maddie.

"Brother," she flashed one back; feeling the effects of the shots and the champagne.

"If you had to pick one thing, and one thing only, that Harry does that made you think he might be gay, what would it be?" There were snickers around the room as Harry threw a pillow in his brother's direction.

"Well it most certainly isn't the way he can't keep his hands off me," she winked at Harry. "And it can't be the way he talks me into making love to him at the craziest times in the craziest of places..."

"Okay," William moaned with a wave of his hand as his cousins laughed at the two of them.

"I would have to say..." She thought for a moment. "Okay. There are some pictures..."

"Oh!" The crowd spoke as one.

"Stop," she warned. "Let's just say....Harry has a history of getting naked with his friends."

"I was drunk!" He called out through the laughter.

"And naked!" Maddie called back before offering a shrug to Will. "That's the only thing I can think of that would ever make me think that."

"Fair enough," he smirked. "Now. If Harry were a cross-dresser..."

"Oh come on!" Harry laughed.

"Which of your outfits would you like to see him wear because it would bring out his eyes?"

"Ha!" Maddie laughed as she thought of her closet. "God I don't know. I suppose I have this blue dress..." Her face lit up as she turned to Kate. "Actually I think he would look great in your blue engagement dress."

"That could be arranged," Kate offered with a laugh.

"Thanks!" Harry called out to her.

"Maybe for your birthday," Kate winked at Maddie who clapped her hands together, trying to refocus on William.

"Finally..." He took a breath. "What is the thing that Harry does that annoys you the most?"

"Hmmm..." Maddie thought for a moment and sighed. "I know you're looking for something funny but if I'm being honest, the only thing that really annoys me is when he says things or does things that make it seem like being with him is some sort of burden...that all that comes with him somehow carries more weight than how wonderful he is. That couldn't be further from the truth and that annoys me."
"Awww..." Zara cooed, smiling at Harry who was red in the face—unable to control the smile that pulled at his lips.

"That and...he wore socks once while we were having sex," Maddie threw it out there with a laugh.

"My feet were cold!" Harry called out in his defense, but nobody cared. They were too busy laughing. The room was getting more and more rambunctious as Kate moved to take the chair from her husband, the last of the group to hold the scepter.

"Madeline," she smiled her wide bright smile at Maddie.

"Catherine," Maddie grinned.

"I'm the last one up," she explained. "Following Will's question, what is the thing that Harry does that you love the most?"

"Well," Maddie paused to take a drink from her flask, her own mood growing more fidgety as the end neared. "He has a...great...big..."

"Maddie!" Kate's eyes narrowed.

"Heart," she finished with a smirk. "He has a great big, wonderful heart. He loves with everything he has and he cares so much about the people around him. Not just friends and family either."

"Speaking of the people around him..." Kate sat up tall. "For our final question. If something were to happen to Harry and you had to choose one of his friends to take his place in your life, who would it be?" And before Maddie could take a breath, Harry called out to her from the bar where he was opening another beer.

"Don't say it!"

"What?!" She laughed along with the group. "You don't even know who I'm going to say!"

"I do!" His eyes met hers as he returned to his seat. "I absolutely know. And I am telling you..."

"Don't listen to him," Kate waved her hand dismissively. "You have to tell the truth."

"Well..." Maddie sighed.

"Don't do it!" Harry shook his head. "Don't even say..."

"Bishop," Maddie exhaled and Harry groaned. "I'm sorry sunshine. It has to be Bishop."

"Thank you very much," Kate smiled, rising from her chair to kiss and hug Maddie. "You're all done darling."

"With this part," William warned, wide smile on his face.

"Fair enough," Maddie stood, stretching out her legs as Harry made his way up to her.

"You had to say it," Harry laughed as his cousins began to rise from their spots, moving around.
"I had to tell the truth," she grinned, moving towards him. "He's funny and sweet and..."

"No more," he pressed his fingers to her lips. "How are you? You doing okay?"

"I am," she nodded and looked around. "The interview is over."

"It is," he smiled, his hands running up and down her arms.

"Well that wasn't so bad," her fingers moved to play with the buttons on his shirt.

"Don't get too comfortable," he leaned to kiss her. "We're not even close to being done for the night."

"Oh yeah?" She raised an eyebrow.

"Mmm Hmm..." His arms moved around her in a hug. "Bishop? Really?"

"Ha!" Her head tipped back in laughter. "Who did you think I was going to say?"

"I don't know..." He shook his head slowly, his eyes looking her over. "Maybe Ella..." His lips pulled into a smug grin.

"Niiiiice," Maddie giggled. "I'm going to tell her you said that."

"Bishop. I'm not sure what I'm supposed to do about that."

"Make sure nothing happens to you," she shrugged, leaning up on her toes to kiss him again.

"Brilliant," he grinned; pulling her tighter.

"Okay, okay." William spoke up, drawing their focus to him. Harry let her out of his arms but held tight to her hand. "Very well done with the interview, Madeline."

"Thank you," she tipped her head to him.

"If you need a break; bathroom, water..." He waved towards the room, towards all of the amenities. "Now's the chance. In about ten minutes we're going to move on to the next part of the evening."

"Which is?" She raised her eyebrows expectantly; her eyes shifting from William to Harry and back again. The grins on their faces were telling. With a breath William smiled wide.

"A Scavenger Hunt."

To Be Continued....
Chapter 80

Maddie was absolutely certain this night would go down as the longest night in her entire life. Her entire life. And it was far from over. The interview was merely the beginning; the prologue to the evening. It was one long, laughter filled, alcohol infused, rite of passage. A rite at which Maddie seemed to excel.

"A Scavenger Hunt?" Maddie was confused. "I'm sorry. I just...it can't be a good idea for me to go out in public dressed like this."

"Again. Like this?" Maddie's heart sped up.

"Don't worry darling," Harry spoke up. "The grandparents are at Windsor. It's just us. And the staff."

"Here's the camera," Beatrice held it out to Maddie. "Inside the Palace there are paintings or sculptures or some sort of historical artifact that match up with every one of Harry's four names. Your mission is to go out with this camera and get a staff member to take your picture in front of each of the four. Once you have succeeded, you return here with the camera." Though Maddie was slightly concerned that there would be any kind of evidence of this evening, the cousins assured her that the memory stick would leave the palace in Harry's hands—her secrets and her outfit to remain only in their minds.

The Scavenger Hunt was a cinch; a piece of cake. Her easy going nature and ever present respect for the staff brought them to her aide quickly and with humor. Not only did she secure the photos of Henry, Charles, Albert, and David, she found a Mountbatten, Windsor, and Wales just for fun. She killed at this game.

When she returned with her camera and a slightly cocky attitude that turned Harry on more than he cared to admit, they moved onto their own version of The Newlywed Game that she and Harry easily dominated. She showed her abilities to read him like a book and he showed off his artistic side by drawing an amusing set of stick figures in what he guessed—correctly—was her favorite sexual position.

"You're such an artist sunshine."

"Thanks love." The wink he sent in her direction made William groan and insist they move on. There was more fun to be had.

There was a curtseying competition where Maddie judged while the men tried their hardest to impress her. And when Mike won, surprising her with his flexibility and balance, he became her partner in the most ridiculous drinking game she had ever participated in. The rules were outlandish, the competitive spirit at an all-time high. And Maddie would swear for the rest of her life that William was half serious when he threatened to excommunicate Harry for his alleged cheating.

They even made it up to the roof to smoke cigars and look out at the city. It was moments like that when Maddie had to pinch herself; reminding her brain that this was real. This was her life, her new family, her future husband—who, in a moment of chivalry, offered his cold fiancé his pants.
"I'm freezing!" She shivered. "You couldn't have dressed me in more weather appropriate gear?"

"Sorry!" Beatrice giggled.

"You know they make these in pants," Maddie waved her hand at the tiny shorts.

"We thought Harry would like the shorts better," Eugenie sent a wink in her cousin's direction.

"So this is your fault," Maddie turned around to shoot him a glare.

"Here..." He held his drink out to her as his hands moved to the waist of his pants.

"Whoa....hold on..." Maddie laughed.

"Hey!" Zara called out, pointing in their direction. "Why is Harry taking off his pants?"

"Why does Harry ever take off his pants?" Mike chuckled into his glass as the rest of the group rolled into laughter.

"Laugh it up," Harry waved his hand. "But my bride is cold and..."

"Your bride?" Maddie felt her eyes grow teary. "Did you just call me your bride?"

"Yes?" He asked, unsure of her reaction.

"You are just too..." She sighed and moved then, wrapping her arms around his neck, still holding a drink in each hand. "Kiss me." She smiled up at him.

"Well okay," he abandoned his mission to turn over his pants and circled her waist; pulling her close. Then to groans and howls, he kissed her.

On the roof of Buckingham Palace.

It was moments like that when Maddie had to pinch herself.

The need for Harry's pants was quickly eliminated as the group finished off their cigars and returned indoors. The party wasn't quite over yet. Without question, the cousins were impressed with Maddie's drive, her willingness to step up, and the way in which she threw herself completely in to the craziness. Not blinking or flinching or backing down.

Though she came close—only once. The one time in the entire night when she considered throwing in the towel and passing was when they told her it was time to prank call the Prime Minister. She had even tucked her fingers into her pocket, ready to toss.

But something made her stop and she didn't. They assured her the line was secure. They assured her he would have no way of knowing. They assured her that he was actually a pretty good sport. And then, after one mocking dare from Peter, Maddie snatched the phone from William's hand and dialed. After successfully waking David Cameron from sleep in order to fulfill her final obligation, she was rewarded with yet another bottle of champagne.

Just what she needed.
It was a wild, crazy night, full of hilarious antics and stories she would never have believed outside of this moment. It seemed that she wasn't the only one drawn to the truth at this Proem. So many things were brought to light. Eugenie had struggled her whole life with her weight, with the pressures to look a certain way. William had been envious of all of their freedoms, their ability to choose their life, to step outside of the destiny with which he was gifted. Jack had been terribly intimidated by the family, by the system. Peter loved not having a title, loved that his wife and his girls were without that particular set of baggage. Beatrice, who loved The Queen and loved the system, was actually quite ready for the downsizing that she knew came with Charles' eminent reign. She was ready to embrace 'normal.' It was important, significant, that this happened—that they opened up to her too. Because at the turning point of the night, at the moment when the silly began to give way to the solemn, Maddie felt closer to them all.

There was something about it all, something dark and the tiniest bit sinister—This moment with the younger generation of British Royalty. Yes, they were drunk and giggly—even William. Yes, they had been messing with her for hours, initiating her into this small, tight group. And Maddie knew it was all in good fun, it was all set in place to make her feel the slightest bit exposed, the slightest bit uncomfortable—all while in the safety of her new family. The only people who knew what it was like to feel the pressures she was about to walk into where she was more than slightly exposed, more than slightly uncomfortable. It was meant to make those moments where she was curtseying to them or they to her a little bit easier and not quite as serious. It was meant to be lighthearted and silly.

And it was.

Yet. At the core of it all was this strict adherence to tradition, these intricately woven details, this underlying cynicism, this jaded feeling at being forced into this secret moment. All of these tiny, seemingly insignificant, pieces came together inside of this raucous evening making it intense and heavy and just the tiniest bit dark.

It didn't help that there was this moment, out of the blue, when William gave a nod of his head and they all began to rise to their feet, filing out of the room—leaving her and Harry alone. It didn't help that, without a word, Harry had taken her by the hand and, with a candlestick in his other, led her through the hidden tunnel in relative darkness. When they emerged into the opulent room with the tricked out fireplace, his cousins were all waiting holding candles of their own. The loud, party nature had disappeared; replaced by a warm solemnity that told Maddie that something important was about to happen.

Without so much as a word, a peep, the group began moving. They walked slowly through the halls, the stairs, back towards the room it had all began in. As they passed back into The Throne Room, Maddie felt chills. Yes, this was a game; all for fun. But at the end of the day, she was standing in The Throne Room of Buckingham Palace with the future King of England approaching her with a seriousness in his eyes that made her swallow back a lump in her throat and tighten her hold on Harry.

This was way too much for her champagne and scotch infused mind to handle. In the soft flicker of the candles, William smiled at her and Maddie held her breath. William broke the moment and turned to Beatrice with a sigh.

"Tell me again why it always has to be me."

"Because you're going to actually be the King someday," she huffed with a roll of her eyes. The light murmur of laughter that passed around them told Maddie this wasn't the first time they had had this particular conversation. "Now. Do it." Beatrice gave her cousin a firm, loving shove and his attention turned back to Maddie.

"Madeline Jay Forrester..." The way he said her name drew breath from her lungs; so regal and stately. He was born to be King. His hand opened up before her, silently requesting hers. She glanced back to Harry who smiled, pressed a kiss to the one he held onto and let her go. With a deep breath, Maddie took her future brother's hand and forced her heart to calm down. When he moved, she moved with him. Her eyes grew more and more wide the closer they stepped to the end of the room, the reason for the room in the first place. She glanced nervously in his direction and saw it. A flicker in his eye, the tiniest twitch of his lips—his way of offering her ease. A smile drew to her lips as she regained her perspective.

This was still Harry's brother—the man who had brought her ice chips in the hospital in South Africa, the man who had delivered ice cream to her and his wife when they were too drunk to go out. They came to a stop about three feet before Maddie's line in the sand—the point at which she would throw her white flag and flat out refuse to cross. And he turned her back to the group. Lined up before her, in order of birth, were Harry's cousins—the originals, not the spouses.

In one hand they held their candle, in the other a small card with specifically selected quotes and on their faces, bright, wide, slightly sleepy smiles.

"Peter," William nodded to his eldest cousin. Peter stepped up to Maddie, standing in front of her as William passed her hand to him. He offered his warmest, most comforting smile before reading from his card.

"Be not afraid of greatness, some are born great, some achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon them." Maddie instantly recognized the words of Shakespeare. Peter leaned in to kiss her cheeks and when he pulled back, he met her eyes, whispered, "welcome to the family." And then, in a show of what was to come, he let his head fall into a bow, kissed the top of her hand before passing it back to William and taking his place in line.

"Zara," William nodded to the next in line. With a bright smile, she moved to the spot Peter had just vacated, taking Maddie's hand from her cousin and reading from the words of Jim Butcher,

"I don't care about whose DNA has recombined with whose. When everything goes to hell, the people who stand by you without flinching—they are your family," Maddie felt tears rise to her eyes as Zara leaned in to kiss her cheeks. "Welcome to the family," she grinned as she slipped into the slightest of curtseys. Maddie felt a lump in her throat, her eyes shifting to Harry who seemed to be expecting that—seemed to be expecting that moment of panic when it hit her. This was what was to come; his cousins bowing to her, curtseying to her in his presence. His gaze remained steady, assuring, even as her eyes shifted back to Beatrice who now stood in front of her, holding her hand between both of hers.

"That's what people do who love you," her voice was soft, sweet, as she spoke the words of Deb Caletti. "They put their arms around you and love you when you're not so lovable." Her soft hands squeezed Maddie's as she leaned to kiss her. Her eyes stayed locked with hers as she dipped into a curtsey. Maddie thought she might cry.

"Eugenie," William's voice was low, calling the last of his cousins to the front. Maddie blinked back tears as Eugenie took her hands and quoted Mitch Albom.

"This is part of what family is about, not just love. It's knowing that your family will be there watching out for you. Nothing else will give you that. Not money. Not fame. Not work." A kiss to each cheek. "Welcome to the family." A slight curtsey. Maddie thought she might cry.
And then Harry was at her side, taking her hand into his, pressing it to his lips. Her eyes met his and he smiled. It was his turn. Without reading from a card, he recited Charles Dickens, "You could draw me to fire. You could draw me to water, you could draw me to the gallows, you could draw me to any death, you could draw me to anything I have most avoided, you could draw me to any exposure and disgrace. But if you would return a favorable answer to my offer of myself in marriage, you could draw me to any good—every good—with equal force." Maddie wasn't sure if it was his intention to make her cry, to make her feel like he was proposing to her all over again. But regardless of his intent, her heart was swelling in her chest.

"Harry..." He kissed her hands. He kissed her cheeks. He took her lips with his. And then, with her hands held tightly in his, he turned them both to his brother.

William took three steps closer to that invisible line in the sand and with Harry leading her, Maddie followed. William took a step around a draped Prie Dieu. Next to Harry, Maddie knelt before him, this moment burning into her brain. There it would sit, alongside rituals of her past and those to come down the line. She wondered, for the briefest of moments, where this particular ritual would line up. Was it more or less important than the others? It felt momentous. It felt heavy. Her eyes shifted up to William who offered a warm, brotherly smile as he lifted a tiara—of the plastic and rhinestone variety—up in the air, floating over her head. The heaviness of the moment lifted as Maddie snickered at the juxtaposition of the tiara against the regalness of the room.

"Madeline Jay Forrester," William's voice boomed, squelching her laughter. "On this night, in this room, with these witnesses, I humbly congratulate you on the completion of your Proem activities. As you have shown your willingness to join in with us, we hope you have seen our willingness, our joy, to embrace you. It is in that spirit that we welcome you to the family." He smiled wide as he lowered the tiara to her head and spoke loudly and with great pride as he repeated the motto of England and the Sovereign, "Dieu et mon Droit. God and my right."

As Harry's hand held her steady, Maddie rose to her feet, the sweetest mixture of laughter and tears pouring over her. William took both of her hands from his brother, kissing the tops of them before he pulled her into a hug. "Welcome to the family Maddie." And, with two kisses to her cheeks, he stepped back—leading the group in applause. Maddie's face flushed as Harry pulled her into his arms; crushing her to him in a hug.

"I love you. You're amazing..." He whispered into her ear; kissing her cheeks as he did. He pulled back to look at her as the spouses came forward to hug and kiss her; Autumn, Mike, Jack, and Kate. All with wide smiles. All with bright eyes.

"How are you doing love?" Harry asked her as she was passed back to him.

"I'm drunk," she giggled, wiping at her eyes. "I am drunk and exhausted and... I will say this. You all sure know how to throw a party."

"We do," Harry laughed, the air of frivolity coming back to the room, back to the two of them. "And you know...it's not even over yet."

"No?" She raised her eyebrows. "Because the tiara on my head, and that little speech from your brother, seemed to indicate otherwise."

"Ha..." Harry laughed. "The work is over for you. But you know...a party isn't over until everyone ends up fully clothed and in the..."
"Pool!" Maddie interrupted clapping her hands together with excitement. "Oh God please tell me we're going to the pool!" She had been dying to see that pool since the very first tour she had taken of Buckingham Palace—way at the beginning, with Ella, when she first moved to London.

"You ready?" His grin stretched wide as he nodded. With wide eyes and a quick nod, Maddie took his hand.

And then they were running—all of them. With Harry pulling her along, leading the way, they ran through the halls, down the stairs, around the corners. There was laughter and yelling and a high spirit that was contagious.

And when they pushed into the room, Maddie had only seconds to take it in—the splendor, the opulence, the music, the drinks, the food that had been set up—only seconds. Because without a thought to any other option, she ran with Harry full force; jumping right into the pool. As her head bobbed above water, her tiara slightly askew, she felt Harry pull her to his side, and his entire family followed them in.

There was much fun left to be had. There were races among the cousins; across the pool and back. There was a spread of Maddie's favorite foods, Bernard's pizza, pistachio Macaroons. There were bottles of water and bottles of champagne—all from the year Harry was born. Maddie smiled as she slipped a cork into her pocket, needing some sort of memento, some sort of remembrance from this amazing evening and all of the detailed work that had gone into it.

Before the end of the night William had turned to Maddie and asked for her request, the request which all of them were lined up and ready to fulfill. She ran it over in her mind a few times, debating her move. She thought about asking them all to confess their most embarrassing moment, she thought about asking them all to answer the questions they had asked of her, she thought about having them all list their favorite things about Harry—just to make him blush.

But in the end, entertainment won out. As she sat on the stairs at one end of the pool drinking from her champagne glass, she watched as this entire generation of The British Royal Family participated in the most hilarious synchronized swimming routine she had ever seen. While the core group had some semblance of form—remembering their long ago routine—the spouses, the new additions to the family, struggled humorously to keep up. It was sloppy and funny and wonderful. Maddie clapped when they were finished and swam into the arms of her future husband. And when his attempts at kisses were met with a yawn, he called it.

It was time to go. Though the others were enjoying themselves, it was almost five in the morning and Harry's request was met with little resistance. They pulled themselves from the pool, wrapped up in big fluffy robes and called it a night. There was lots of love, a round of hugs, and then—with the memory stick from the camera secure in Harry's pocket—the newly engaged couple climbed into a car and made their way back to Kensington Palace to sleep off the night.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

They slept through the morning, straight into the afternoon and, had Maddie not set an alarm clock, had she not needed to shower and dress and head to the hospital for an appointment with Dr. Colvin, they would have slept straight into the evening. But the alarm rang out and Harry begrudgingly woke up enough to turn it off—a groan moving through his entire body.

"Don't worry darling," Maddie laughed lightly as she nudged him with her foot. "You can stay in bed but I have a meeting...to quit my job." And even in his hung-over, exhausted state, he caught the way her voice changed at the end.
"I'm sorry," he sighed, turning to look at her, his hand reaching out to stroke her hair back from her face.

"Don't be," she shook her head, offering a grin as she leaned to kiss him.

"Listen," his hand traced down her side, resting on her hip; tugging her closer to him. "About last night..." He wanted to check in; make sure she was okay—that she wasn't mad or upset or confused or any of the variety of things one might feel after being blindfolded, kidnapped, and coerced into a night of insanity. He had known from the others that sometimes the day after was not as easy as the night had been. He wanted to eliminate any bad feelings that might be left over.

"Shh..." Maddie's fingers pressed to his lips, her eyes narrowing playfully. "We don't talk about..." She leaned to kiss him again. "I don't know what you're talking about. I was here, all night, in your bed."

"I..." He didn't know what to say. He had no words. She was in. She was playing the game. You don't talk about Proem. "You're right." He kissed her back. "What was I thinking?"

"I don't know," she shook her head, her arms snaking around his neck.

"Me neither," he pressed her tighter to him; his head dipping to kiss her neck. "What time is your meeting?"

"Four..." She breathed, her body arching into his. "Why?"

"I'm just wondering if we have enough time..." His mouth moved to her collar bone, her shoulder.

"Enough time for what?"

"For me to remind you..." His lips moved back towards her neck. "Of all the benefits..." They traced along her jaw. "That come with leaving your job for me..." His lips seized hers.

"Oh!" She cried out with a laugh as he moved; positioning his body over hers with a wicked grin on his face. "I think maybe there might be enough time for that."

"Excellent."

And all thoughts, from the night before, from what lie ahead, were quickly pushed from Maddie's mind as her body, her desires took over. It was moments like this that she needed to pinch herself.

This was her life now—all of the good and the bad that came with it.
Chapter 81

Harry had been right.

He had warned her on her way out the door; despite how normal she felt, how it seemed as though very little had changed—everything had. When he finally released hold of her so that she could make it her meeting with Dr. Colvin—he had cautioned her of the eminent circus that awaited her outside of the gates of the palace. She was no longer the blonde girlfriend of a senior royal. She was the next royal bride, the soon-to-be wife of the third in line to the throne, the Peoples’ Prince. He tried to drive it home—how when they walked into that room full of reporters, when they sat down for that interview, she became public, they gave the world permission to lay claims to her. She was their future Duchess, after all. They had dropped a bomb on the world and Harry wanted to be crystal clear; people were going to be clamoring for photos of her. They wanted to see her, see the ring. They wanted to know what she was about, what she was like—they were going to be all over her. At least for a while.

He had been absolutely right.

They were waiting for her. She said a silent thank you to Harry for insisting she keep some clothes at his place—knowing that photos of her returning to her place in the clothes she wore the night before would have been all over. Having showered and dressed at Kensington, she went directly to her meeting at the hospital, her Security Officer Williams following along.

And the press attention began. Though they were well aware that they could not come on hospital property—there were throngs of photographers waiting for her at the entryway waiting to catch a glimpse, to see if she was returning to work or not.

Though there was a bustle of chaos outside, inside things could not have gone more smoothly. The meeting with Dr. Colvin could not have gone better. When she told him she was leaving, he was not at all surprised. He had seen the interview the night before and he had been around long enough to know how things worked, to know the complexity of her situation. He congratulated her, offered his support and helped her work out a plan to leave as quickly and as efficiently as possible. Her regular shift duties would end the next day. She could come in, say good-bye to any of the current in-patients she had worked with before and her Crisis Team coverage would cease immediately. Though he valued her services immensely, he knew from experience that the level of fame that was about to hit her was not the best fit for the hospital, or vice versa. She would be allowed to terminate with her current caseload based on her own professional judgment, doing what was best for her clients; transitioning them to another Psychologist.

And then she would be done. He told her they normally have a going away party for outgoing staff but—given her unique circumstances—he offered her an out. An out she did not want to take. She wanted to say good-bye, she wanted that moment, that closure. It was important for her, it was important for them. She didn't want an out. And then Dr. Colvin hugged her, told her he was proud of the work she had done and that he knew she would continue to serve the children and the families she had served at the hospital and before that in Bandal. Finally, with a warm smile, he offered an open ended invitation to seek his counsel or assistance on anything she might need in the future.

It could not have gone better. That's why—once inside the privacy of her own office—she broke down and cried. Even with all she had waiting for her, even with the life she was looking forward to with Harry—it was incredibly difficult to leave.
The very same process, the very same emotions followed her as she met with Gerald at St. Joseph’s. Initially she had been thankful to have been able to have both meetings on the same day, thinking that getting them out of the way all at once would be easier. But, after seeing Gerald and spending more than a few minutes correcting her tear-stained makeup, she thought maybe she should have spaced them out. Making sure she looked presentable—correctly guessing that the press would be waiting for her—she stepped out of the Veteran's Services Offices and began her trip home.

The press, the paparazzi had multiplied overnight. It was insane. As they drove past newsstands, past store windows, her face was everywhere. It was the strangest feeling in the world, to see her own eyes staring back at her, to see her ring plastered everywhere. And those pictures would only be replaced with the official engagement photos that were soon to come. The headlines were laughable; comparisons to Cinderella already rampant. She felt the oddest sense of relief when laughter came to her. At least she wasn’t crying. When the car pulled to a stop in front of her place, she and Williams were met with a barrage of cameras; a slew of people waiting to snap her picture. With a bright smile she passed by all of them into the safety of her own home. And once inside, once alone, she let out a breath, sank to the couch and let it settle; let it process.

Harry had been right. This was a whole new level of crazy.

As the evening gave way to the night, Maddie adjusted to the new reality, her breath coming easier. And she found that she was exceptionally thankful for her family—old and new. After a light dinner, she spent an hour on the phone with her mother, telling her about the difficult conversations she had just had—explaining how it would hurt to leave. Her mother knew; she knew her well. She also knew that Maddie had survived bigger life moments than this; leaving Bendal only slightly higher on the list. And this time Maddie did not need to be reminded of the flipside—of how wonderful the leaving would be.

She knew.

She managed to speak to every one of her cousins; fielding questions, taking jokes. They were excited for her and incredibly interested in the process of it all; what exactly it meant to marry a member of the royal family. And Jenna was beside herself knowing that soon she would be traveling across the ocean to attend the “wedding of the century”. Maddie couldn't help but roll her eyes—though she was excited too. And after laughing as her grandmother informed her of the meticulous process she was going to have to go through in order to get a passport, Maddie said good-bye and finished her conversations with the US. Changing into her pajamas, she cuddled up on the couch with a large, fluffy blanket and a hot cup of tea and allowed her mind to wander to the frivolous night with her Great Britain family—letting the smile take hold of her face. Even if she couldn't talk about it, she could think about it—and laugh.

Finally, at the end of what felt like a very long day, when Harry called asking to come over to see her, she put up no disagreement. He passed by the photographers, smiled a hello to Williams, and kissed her; good and deep.

It was only the beginning. There were many moments to come; days, weeks, months as it all settled. But that night, with all that lied ahead, they went to sleep early.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

Leaving her old life took a toll on Maddie—oddly enough. This was not the first time her world had up-ended. She had left “old lives” before. She had gone away to college, all the way to Columbia in New York for her PhD. She had left the states and her family to go to Bendal. And she had left Bendal for London. Though all of those transitions were difficult, this one had a finality to it, a surrender to another person, that the others had not had. No matter the lengthy list of reasons why Harry was worth all that she was leaving behind, the actual leaving still took a toll.
It all unfolded in a wonderful, bittersweet, succession of events over the course of about a month that left her in a moment of silent reflection waiting for Harry.

Her last day at Saint Joseph's came first. It was seven days after her initial meeting; a Tuesday.
And it was wonderful. The people she worked with, both military and civilian contractors, were excited for her. Though many of them had known that she was dating Harry, there were a few who were late to the party—and all of them shared in her joy. Everyone knew of Harry and respected him for his service and they were overwhelmingly excited not just for her, but for him.
And, as she said good-bye to Gerald at the end of the day, they both knew, without a doubt, that they would be working on the same team again someday in the future.

Her last day at the Children's Hospital was ten days after her initial meeting; a Friday. The going away party Dr. Colvin had promised was perfect. There were treats, there were kind words from her colleagues and there was a large good-bye poster made by all of the children she worked with that brought her to tears. It was heartfelt, it was emotional and at the end of the day, when she stepped into Harry's place, she held the poster out to him and insisted he find a place to hang it—which he happily did.

Ten days. She had quit her job. She had ceased her volunteer work. Ten days and her career had come to a halt. It was all over—four days earlier than the estimation she had given to Charles on their first day home from Botswana. She had always been an over-achiever.

It was less than a week later when Harry approached her with the next step in the pilgrimage from her old life to her new. He wanted her to move in with him. Her initial reaction was shock—surely the British Royal Family, steeped in tradition as it was, would not condone them living together before they were married. But, when he tempered his laughter and explained to her that not only had it been done before—Charles and Camilla, Zara and Mike, even Will and Kate—it would have other more realistic benefits as well. At the very top of the list; it was easier to protect her at Kensington Palace. Though her safety had yet to be a serious issue, the paparazzi and the fans were getting consistently closer to her and her home was not nearly as secure as Kensington. So Scotland Yard would certainly be in favor of her living behind Palace gates.

Even still, Maddie debated the issue internally. Following four days of introspection, she consulted with those whose opinions mattered the most.

Her mother—

"It does make sense Madeline."

Ella—

"Are you kidding?! Move into the Palace! Dear God. I can't even with you sometimes."

Khenda—

"You know Collins and I have been living in twelve kinds of sin for years, right?"

And finally, with the clinching argument, Harry—

"You would have full time, unmitigated access to my tub..."
She was in. It was time to move into the Palace.

She turned in her notice at her place—or more accurately, the family attorneys worked out the details of ending her lease.

She packed her things—or more accurately the two boxes of intimate items she couldn't bear to allow the professional movers to handle.

And she moved into Harry's home.

Almost all of Maddie's household items had been purchased when she moved to London from Bendal and very little of them held any sort of sentimental value. As Harry already had an established, working home, Maddie had decided to donate the majority of her things to charity—finding that they simply did not need duplicates of so much of what she had. She said good-bye to her couch, her bed, her dining set. She let go of the small things; the silverware, the pots and pans. There were a few things she kept; the funky plates she had purchased at an Estate Sell with Ella one summer afternoon, the jars of marbles that helped her through Harry's deployment, her bright pink Kitchen Aid mixer her mother had bought her when she graduated from college. Though she knew that the Palace staff certainly had better mixers, she couldn't let it go. Those small items, along with her books and her clothes and the multitude of personal mementos she had gathered fit into eleven nice, neat boxes.

Eleven nice, neat boxes that now sat at her feet in Harry's entryway. It was moving day. Due to a mishap in scheduling, Harry had been kept late at a function and had missed all of the excitement. After the movers had settled the last box, Maddie thanked them very sweetly and turned to face her new life on her own.

With a heavy sigh, she went to the fridge, her new fridge, and retrieved a chilled bottle of champagne, her chilled bottle of champagne. She moved to take a seat on the stairs, her stairs, and stared down at all eleven boxes—wondering exactly where they were going to fit, where she was going to fit, into this new place.

And that's exactly where Harry found her when he arrived twenty minutes later—sitting on the stairs, drinking from a bottle of champagne, a look of contemplation on her face.

"Wow..." Harry breathed as he stepped inside; the door closing behind him.

"My thoughts exactly," Maddie chuckled; looking up to him as he beamed—unwilling and unable to hide his excitement at having her there. "Welcome home."

"I feel like I should say that to you," he dropped his briefcase to the ground, his suit coat following behind and his hands were already working on the knot of his tie as he moved towards the stairs. "Welcome home..." He bent to kiss her.

"Thank you," her smile was genuine as he stood in front of her, their eyes almost level.

"I'm sorry I couldn't be here for the move."

"It's okay," Maddie shrugged, taking a sip from the bottle before offering it to him. "It was only eleven boxes. And I didn't have to lift a finger." She chuckled again at the memory of the professionals sent to pack and move her things.
"Sure," Harry nodded, taking the bottle from her and drinking.

"Well, except for those two..." Maddie pointed to the two smaller boxes closer to the bottom of the stairs.

"What's in those two?"

"Let's just say that if somebody were to open them...they would think we have an incredibly active and kinky sex life."

"Ah!" Harry's grin widened. "We should take extra care of those boxes."

"We should," Maddie laughed. Harry watched her for a moment, watched as her eyes glanced around the room.

"Hey..." He reached out; his fingers cupping her cheek softly. "Are you okay?" Maddie sighed; heavy and deep.

"Yes. I am." She nodded; leaning into his palm. "I just...today I shut the door on everything I built in London that was just for me. My apartment was the last to go. Now it's just me...and these eleven boxes." She snatched the bottle back and took a drink.

"Yeah," he nodded; having expected a bit of sadness from her. He watched her for a beat, studying her expression. "This is you processing, no?"

"It is," she smiled—impressed at how far they had come in their relationship.

"Okay," he nodded again, his hands reaching to undo the buttons at his wrists, rolling his sleeves up as he relaxed. "Is there anything I can do or..."

"You're doing it," she leaned to her right, her head resting against the large, wooden rails of the staircase.

"Do you want me to leave you alone?"

"No," she shook her head; reaching out to grab his hand. "I want you to stay here."

"Okay." He squeezed her hand and nodded back to the stack of boxes in the entryway behind him. "Why did they leave them here? You could have told them where to put them. They could have at least taken them up the stairs."

"I didn't know where to put them," she shrugged. "This is...wow. This is your place, you know. I didn't know where to put them, where to unpack. I mean can I really just put my books on the shelf in your office? Hang my picture of my family in the Team Maddie shirts next to the picture of you and The Spice Girls? Can I just plop my mixer down on the counter in the kitchen? What if it angers Bernard?"

"What if your mixer angers Bernard?" Harry couldn't help the laugh that came with that sentence. "Okay. Seriously. What box is the mixer in?" He dropped her hand and turned around.

"I don't know..." She watched as he opened one box, then another, then another. "Harry? What are you doing?" She laughed as he moved to yet another.
"I'm looking for...Aha!" His fist shot in the air with victory. "I found it." With a wide grin, Harry pulled her bright pink mixer from a box and walked out of the foyer.

"Harry?" Maddie followed his quick clip through his place, their place; towards the kitchen.

"Here." With a bit of a dramatic flourish, he put the bright pink mixer right in the middle of the counter, clapping his hands together with a satisfied smile. "Perfect."

"But..."

"But what?" He laughed. "Madeline. This is your home. Your home. Bernard works for you. God...Maddie..." He pulled her to him. "You can unpack. You can move things around. You...tell me where you want things and I'll put them there."

"Oh really?" Maddie laughed, feeling even more at ease. "You're going to unpack my boxes?"

"Or maybe you tell me where you want things and I'll have somebody else put them there..." He kissed her as her laughter increased.

"That's more like it," she hugged him tight; sighing into his arms.

"There's the smile I remember." He smiled down at her. "How's the processing going?"

"I think maybe I'm just about done processing," she took a deep breath, her eyes glancing to the pink mixer sitting bright and standing out in his elegant, professional looking kitchen.

"Yeah?" He raised his eyebrows. "You can take more time if you..."

"No," she shook her head. "This is...this is the happiest time of my life, Harry. The happiest. I just needed a minute to let it all fade. I'm fine now. Great, in fact. Just...one question."

"What's that?" His fingers toyed with strands of her hair, smiling as he pushed them back from her face.

"What do I...I mean. I know I need to unpack and at some point we need to talk about getting married..." Her heart swelled at the way his face lit up when she said it. Holding him closer she sighed. "What do I do then? Aside from hiring somebody to chase me while I run around Hyde Park?"

"Hmm..." He smiled, kissing her before he moved on. "How about this. You take tomorrow, the next day...however long you like to unpack. Move things around Maddie. Tell the staff to move things around..."

"Tell?" She lifted an eyebrow.

"Ask," he offered a shrug. "You can do whatever you like—whatever you like. There's nothing in this place that I'm terribly tied to where it rests. Do what you like. And then...when you're ready, when you're settled, let me know. I'll call Thomas and he'll take care of it. You want to be busy? We'll make you busy. Just tell me when. We'll hire a staff, we'll start to plan. I just want you to be settled first because Thomas takes his job incredibly seriously and if you tell him to make you busy..."

"He'll make me busy?" She guessed with a light laugh.
"Exactly."

"Okay," Maddie nodded and stepped out of his arms, taking his hands into hers as she moved.

"Okay," Harry smiled, letting her pull him with her as she walked backwards out of the kitchen. "Where are we headed now?"

"Well, I seem to remember you promising unmitigated access to a particular tub..." Harry’s head tossed back in laughter.

"Of course, of course."

"Care to join me?" An eyebrow arched.

"Can we bring these two boxes with us?" He nodded towards the two small ones that she packed herself.

"We can," Maddie grinned, biting at her lower lip. "As a matter of fact..." She took a deep breath and took a shot. "It would be incredibly sweet...remarkably chivalrous of you if you helped me move a few more than just those two."

"And here we go," Harry chuckled with a shake of his head.

"I mean..." Maddie sighed, her shoulders rising and falling. "I did donate most of my things to charity. These eleven boxes are all I have and..."

"Okay, okay," he cut in, his hand held up in the air with a smirk. "You can stop with the...you know. I'll move them. Tell me which ones go where and I'll take care of it."

"Really?" She bounced on her heels.

"Yes really," he laughed again. "Tell me where they go and then you can go soak in the tub. I know that's why you're really here..."

"I love you," she cut him off; tossing her arms around his neck, pressing her lips to his. "I mean the tub is nice and all but it's you I'm here for..." She kissed him again. "Don't forget that."

"Hmmm..." He hugged her tight, his eyes scanning hers. "I already said I would move them you don't have to..." She kissed him again. "Maddie..." She kissed him again. "Okay look. If you keep doing that, I'm going to forget about these boxes, we're going to make good use of these stairs, and you're never going to make it to the tub." She giggled at the gleam in his eye, the cock of his eyebrows.

"I love you." Her voice was soft, genuine.

"I love you too," he kissed her once more before releasing her. "Now. Where do they all go?"
Chapter 82

Moving in with Harry proved to be amazing. The benefits completely outweighed any of the tiniest bit of uncertainty she had originally felt. Maddie loved waking to him every day. She loved being there at the end of the day to greet him. She loved the way her stuff looked next to his stuff; the way he cleared space for her in every corner of his home. There were adjustments that were made; negotiations that were held over tea. But the two of them meshed well; their lives intertwined well.

For a moment, for about a week, she found herself wishing she could be a housewife; wishing she could stay home and bake and cook and put on some lovely ensemble to greet him; something that would surprise him, inspire him to drop his case and take her in the entry way, forgo dinner and make use of the kitchen counter, or the fluffy rug in front of the fireplace.

Yes. She could get used to this.

A week had passed, a week of adjustments and settling. The first day Harry had asked Bernard to stay away, allowing Maddie to have the entire home to herself. She finished unpacking, she moved some things around and then...she explored. By the time Harry made it home that night, she knew where every last kitchen utensil was and she had managed to cook up a decent pot of pasta and sauce. Though the second he saw her in the black and red lingerie she had chosen to surprise him with, the pasta and the sauce were forgotten.

It had taken six days. Six days passed before Maddie was finished with her mapping of Harry's place. Six days before she had figured out where things were, how things worked—six days of following Bernard around the kitchen with a smile, six days of trying to get him to call her Maddie, to tell her the secret to his pizza. Six days before she felt more at home than a guest at Harry's home.

It was the night of Day Six when Maddie finally spoke the words that would pull her right out of this state of lounge she had been in since she moved.

"I'm ready." Her voice was loud and clear and cut right into Harry's thoughts. She was standing in the doorway to the living room, leaning against the frame and had been watching him for at least a minute before she spoke.

"Sorry?" Harry looked up from the paper he was reading. His legs were stretched across the couch, his bare feet propped up while he sorted through a stack of folders and papers he had pulled from his briefcase that sat on the coffee table next to him.

"I'm ready," she repeated with a wide smile.

"Oh-kay," he shifted on the couch, adjusting the stack of folders. "I'm not exactly sure what you're talking about but if you give me two minutes to finish this one briefing...I could be ready too."

"No," she shook her head with a laugh, pushing away from the frame and stepping into the room. "Not for that."

"For what?" Harry moved his feet from the end of the couch and waved his hand, inviting her over.
"I'm ready to come out of hiding," she took a seat, pulling his feet into her lap. "I need my day to be about more than harassing Bernard..."

"But you were having so much fun," he cut in with a smirk.

"Yes, but he's never going to cave," she sighed dramatically, her hands rubbing his feet; moving of their own volition. "He's never going to call me Maddie and he's never going to teach me how to make that pizza."

"No, he's not," Harry shook his head, moving his files to the table so that he could settle into the couch, so that he could enjoy what Maddie was doing to his feet.

"My housewife days are over. It was fun while it lasted," Maddie grinned as Harry chuckled. "I think I'm ready for that meeting."

"With Thomas?" Harry's eyebrows lifted.

"Yes," she nodded. "I know I can't come out with you and really get to it. But I can start with the wedding, right? And you said Thomas could keep me busy with some behind the scenes stuff?"

"I did say that," Harry smiled softly, loving the idea of bringing her on board. "You sure you're ready love? You don't want another week to..."

"To what?" She laughed. "To sleep until noon and wake only to greet you in a scintillating outfit with a glass of scotch?"

"Now, now," Harry shook his head, his eyes narrowing wickedly. "Don't knock the outfits. Or the scotch. I enjoyed them both—though not nearly equally."

"I'm sure," she rolled her eyes at him, her hands working up his ankle towards his calve. Harry watched her for a minute and then reached for his cell phone. Taking a breath he dialed and pressed the phone to his ear.

"Thomas, it's Harry." Maddie rolled her eyes again; as if Thomas expected it to be anyone else. "Listen, I would like to bring Maddie in. Yes. Yes. I think...tomorrow?" He arched his eyebrows at Maddie who nodded enthusiastically. "Tomorrow is perfect. Yes. We'll see you in the morning then. Fantastic. Thank you."

And just like that, Maddie was done being a housewife.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

Maddie learned something incredibly valuable that next day. Thomas Smith did not mess around. After changing her clothes three times, and successfully shutting down Harry's snickers as she did so, the two of them left for a full day at St. James Palace. From the moment they walked in the door, they were busy. Thomas had greeted them at the car, escorting them inside where Maddie was introduced to staffer after staffer, all standing in a line as they entered. Though a pink blush rose to her cheeks at the attention, she smiled wide, shook their hands, and repeated their names. She was new to the moment, but she adapted quickly. After checking to see if either of them needed anything, Thomas escorted them to a large board room where meetings would circulate through for the rest of the day. He had cancelled Harry's regular meetings so that he could sit in on all of Maddie's. With a relaxed stature and a tiny bit of amusement, Harry sat at her side and watched as Thomas brought his fiancé into the depth of it all.
First, they discussed her potential patronages. Though she could not work in any official capacity until she was "official," Thomas had put together a list of charities that had inquired about her since the engagement announcement. There was no harm in her sorting through the list and doing some research, just as long as she wasn't placing phone calls or taking meetings. Maddie thumbed through the four page list with wide eyes before taking a breath and sliding the folder into her bag.

Then they moved on to discuss her citizenship. Once given the okay from Maddie, Thomas would be happy to schedule times for her to take the two required tests for citizenship; The English Test and The British Life Test. They wanted to have the tests out of the way before the first of the year and then, after the new year, when her residency requirement was met, they would be able to file for citizenship right away. Maddie gave her consent and Thomas made a note in his planner before sliding a slim, soft-cover book across the table to her.

"What's this?" Harry glanced down at it.

"A study guide," Thomas explained quickly. "For the British Life Test. It was rated fairly high and it contains past questions that are no longer in use. You can look it over if you think it will be helpful."

"Thank you," Maddie smiled sweetly and stowed the book in her bag.

Finally, after a brief break for lunch, Thomas brought in Joan Schuler; a stunningly dressed middle aged woman who reeked of organization and preparation. She was their Wedding Planner—thought not just. She would be orchestrating the monstrosity that would be their nuptials. She had a lengthy history with the Royal Family, having been in event planning at the Palace for years. She had worked as second in command at Will and Kate's wedding and was happy and excited to take on the task of Harry and Maddie's.

They spent nearly two hours with Joan going over details of the big day; when and where and how. She inquired about their expectations, any hopes they had for the day. She asked about any specific traditions or pieces they wanted to be certain to include. And, though they would be meeting many times over the next eight months, she asked them to start thinking about the feel they were going for, particularly for the more intimate, private parts of the evening. Like Will and Kate, they would have a gigantic wedding; playing host to thousands. Following that, The Queen would host a champagne brunch at Buckingham Palace for a slightly smaller crowd and then Charles had already contacted her to let her know of his intentions to host a much smaller, personal reception that night.

Finally, after Joan had taken copious amounts of notes and sent them away with a few homework items, Maddie and Harry were back in their car heading home after what felt like an incredibly long day.

"Wow..." Maddie breathed; a soft chuckle pulling through her lips as their car pulled away from Saint James to take them back to Kensington. "You weren't kidding about Thomas."

"No," Harry laughed. "No I was not. I warned you."

"You were right," she sighed, leaning back against the leather seats, letting her head roll back as she thought about the day of meetings they had just finished. "This wedding is going to be..."

"Ridiculous. Yes." Harry cut her off with a nod.
"I wasn't going to say ridiculous," she laughed at him, pulling his hand up off the seat and into hers. She toyed with his fingers for a moment before looking over to him. "You never told me you wanted to marry at St. Paul's."

"Hmm..." He smiled, his eyes drifting in thought. "I'm not sure I knew that until Joan asked us. You're sure you're okay with it?"

"Of course," Maddie squeezed his hand. "If it can't be just the two of us and a minister off the coast of Greece, then it's all the same to me."

"There will be comparisons," he lifted an eyebrow. "My mother and father..."

"Will and Kate, your grandparents," she countered with a shrug. "There will be comparisons no matter what we do."

"Yes, I suppose you're right."

"I suppose I am," she turned to watch him as he nodded slowly. "What's on your mind?"

"I was just thinking that..." He took a deep breath and turned his head to meet her eyes. "I was just thinking that you had surprisingly little opinions on the wedding."

"Oh?" Maddie grinned at his shock.

"Yes. You seem quite at ease with whatever Joan suggested," his body turned towards hers. "Is that because you're really at ease with this or is that because you were afraid to speak up or..."

"Afraid to speak up?" She chuckled. "Have you ever known me to be afraid to speak up?"

"No, I suppose not," he grinned. "But I thought for sure you would have some sort of idea as to what you wanted, how this would look. Don't all girls dream of their wedding day? Planning it out in meticulous detail? Running around pretending to be brides?"

"What?" She shook her head at his grin, at his assumptions. "No. Not all girls run around pretending to be brides..."

"You honestly haven't thought about it until just today?" He narrowed his eyes at her questioningly.

"No, of course I've thought about it," her voice grew soft; low. "Over the years I've thought about it—fleetingly. But, it's different now. Things are different now."

"Oh?"

"Well for starters, I'm marrying a Prince—and not of the fictional Disney variety—an actual honest to God Prince..." She chuckled at the thought, at saying it out loud. "I expected there to be very little that I had control over and honestly, I have no problems with what she was suggesting. The location is...look, I really loved Eugenie's wedding at Windsor. That might actually be my first choice. But we can't do it there." She sighed and sent a crooked smile his way. "You're just too popular."

"Ha!" He laughed, tugging at her hand. "I seem to remember her commenting on the exponentially increasing interest from the Americans. I wonder why that is?" He cocked an
"Maybe those pictures of you in Vegas garnered you more fans than you originally thought?" Maddie smirked.

"Maybe," he laughed with a nod of his head. "People want to see you too Madeline. It's not just about me. You heard Joan, they are expecting tourism from the States to skyrocket. They are considering a later time so as to accommodate the viewership. That's about you. Not me."

"Anyway," Maddie rolled her eyes, dismissing the issue. "St. Paul's, The Abbey; it makes no difference to me."

"Fair enough. How about everything else? The date? Are you fine with June seventh?"

"Well, I haven't yet consulted my day planner but I suppose I could move a few things around."

"Okay," he rolled his eyes. "I get it."

"Come on Harry. It's fine. All of it is fine. Great in fact. We have a date, we have a location, we have an Officiant. I can let my family in on it so they can plan. It's actually kind of nice to have somebody else in charge of making sure we keep with protocol and tradition. That way we don't have to worry about messing it all up."

"Sure." She did have a point.

"And everything I asked for, she gave me. I want to use a local, relatively unknown designer for the dress and she said she would pull together some work from a few names so that I can start narrowing it down. I want to have Ella as my...maid of honor, if you will, and she said that was fine. Sure, there are some expected non-negotiables; the cameras, the landau..."

"The Blues and Royals uniform..." He offered.

"Exactly," she nodded. "And I have to wear white—naturally. We'll say traditional vows, we'll sing God Save the Queen, we can't kiss inside the cathedral—though I'm certain you're going to have more of a problem with that one..."

"You know me so well," he pulled her hand to his lips for a kiss.

"Hmmm..." Maddie smiled, squeezing his hand tight. "It's fine Harry. All of it."

"Yeah?" He raised his eyebrows.

"Yeah. The dress, the songs, the thousands of people watching..."

"Millions," he cut in. Maddie's eyes met his and she took a deep breath in, letting it go slowly before she continued.

"At the end of it all...I get to call you my husband."

"I love it when you say that."

"Me too."
"So. June seventh. St. Paul's." Knowing a time, knowing a place made it so much more real to him. And it thrilled him to no end.

"June seventh. St. Paul's." She repeated with a grin.

"Okay," he let out a breath.

"Okay." Maddie's grip on his hand tightened.

"So, when are you going to tell Ella about her role in all of this?"

"I don't know," Maddie laughed. "It depends on how long I want to keep her around. Because once I tell her...she may very well implode."

"I'm coming!" Maddie yelled towards the knock on the front door as she hurried from the kitchen; laughing because there was no way Ella would be able to hear her through that solid door and the music that was filling the house. She slid in Harry's long polo socks on the hardwood floor of the entry way, finally reaching the door. With a dramatic flourish, she yanked the door open; smiling wide. "Ella!"

"Maddie!" Her best friend's grin matched her own as she stepped right into her place and wrapped her arms around her.

"I am so glad you could come," Maddie spoke into the soft wisps of Ella's hair as she held her tight.

"Are you kidding? A slumber party at Kensington Palace? Wouldn't miss it," Ella laughed as they stepped into the house and Maddie shut the door behind them. "Where is Harry again?"

"On base," Maddie groaned slightly. "He had a two week training. He'll be back in four days." With Harry away, Maddie had decided this would be the perfect time to have a girl night with her best friend—a perfect time to ask her to be a part of the wedding.

"You miss him?" Ella dropped her overnight bag in the entryway and followed as Maddie led her into the kitchen.

"Ugh..." Maddie sighed with a roll of her eyes. "It's embarrassing how much I miss him. Would you like some wine?" She held up the bottle she had been opening when the knock at the door came.

"Yes please," Ella nodded enthusiastically. "Bishop sends his love...in a jealous, territorial sort of way."

"He's mad because I get you for the whole night?" Maddie handed her a glass and poured one for herself.

"More like he's mad because he thinks we're going to have pillow fights and sleep cuddled up together in lingerie and we didn't invite him..." Ella laughed into her wine glass as she took a sip. "But basically, yes."

"Nice," Maddie grinned. "So. Do you want to change right into the lingerie or..."
"Ha!" Ella laughed. "Let's wait for a bit."

"You got it," Maddie's laughter echoed hers. The two women moved to the living room, stretching luxuriously across the two large leather couches, bottle of wine in tow. "So tell me," Maddie's eyes danced in the soft light. "How is life on the outside?"

"The outside?" Ella raised her eyebrows.

"You know...where you get to have a job and a career and go to work..."

"You have a severely twisted way of looking at life, you know," Ella rolled her eyes. "You're a Princess in a castle and you're coveting my peasant job."

"You are not a peasant," Maddie's voice grew stern. "And I am not a Princess. Now stop it."

"Not yet..." Ella chuckled; loving how it irritated Maddie.

"Knock it off," Maddie tried to school her features, tried for angry, but she couldn't force a glare towards Ella.

"Or what?" Ella continued on, taking a long drink from her glass. "You'll have me drawn and quartered."

"Ella!" Maddie tossed a throw pillow across the room in laughter, her voice moving to sarcasm. "I can't order something like that. Harry will have to do it."

"Ha!" Ella couldn't help the giggles that came. "We've sure come a long way from that tiny apartment in Bendal, no?"

"Eh," Maddie shrugged; glancing around the room playfully.

"Nice." Ella sighed, reaching for the bottle to fill her glass.

"Seriously though, how are things at the hospital?"

"They're...they're great. Matt's finally dating somebody new so I don't get the death glare from him every time we go up anymore."

"It's about time."

"Right?" Ella's eyes flashed wide as she remembered their abrupt ending and her and Bishop's abrupt beginning. "But it's fine. It's work. How about you? How is life as a royal bride-to-be?"

"Well," Maddie sighed, moving to sit up straight. "I'm glad you asked. There's something I need to talk to you about."

"Oh?" Ella was interested; intrigued. Moving to sit up, she waved her hand. "What's up?"

"Okay..." Maddie clapped her hands together as she moved to sit next to her friend, focusing her attention. "Actually, I'm going to just..." Without explanation, she reached out and took the glass of wine from Ella, settling it safely on the table away from them—knowing there was great potential for a mess if Ella kept hold of it. Ella's eyes tracked her as she moved, growing more and more curious.

"Everything okay?" She asked, turning her body to face Maddie's.

"Oh yes," Maddie grinned; matching Ella's posture. "Everything is great. Listen. I want to ask you something and I want you to hear everything I have to say before you answer. Can you do that?"

"Sure..." Ella's eyes grew suspicious.

"Okay," Maddie took a breath and met her eyes. "You have been my best friend for quite a few years now, right?"

"Yes..." The suspicion only increased.

"You have been there for me; over and over and over again—through everything in Bendal. You were there when I met Harry. You pushed me to him, you have been incredibly supportive through all of it. All of the chaos and the press and...you've been an amazing friend to me, Ella. A sister really. And I can't tell you how much I love you and appreciate all that you've brought to my life since you saved me from fire so many years ago."

"Ha!" Ella laughed through the tears in her eyes. "Do you want to make be bawl Madeline?"

"No," Maddie grinned wide. "I want you to be my maid of honor."

"Oh my God."

"I mean, there's not really a maid of honor but I would love for you to be...."

"Oh my God!" Ella's face exploded with shock; her eyes wide, her hands moving to catch the gasp that came from her throat.

"You really need to think about it," Maddie hurried to get out her entire thought before Ella lost her ability to hear. "People will talk about you, they will write about you. They will dissect your dress and your body and..."

"Yes!" Ella exclaimed; her hands reaching out to grab Maddie's in a rushed excitement. "Yesyesyesyesyesyes. Yes. Yes. I am in. I am...holy shit." She giggled. "I am totally in."

"Are you sure?" Maddie laughed at the response. "You can have some time to think about it and..."

"Think about it?" Ella's face screwed up in disgust. "What is there to think about? You're my best friend and I love you. You know I love you. Of course I would do this for you."

"But...the press and the criticism and..."

"So what!" Ella waved her hand and rolled her eyes. "People always have something to say about me. Will I get to wear a dress designed exclusively for me?"

"Yes," Maddie nodded, loving that Ella was so completely on board.

"Will I get to ride in a carriage?" Her eyes sparkled.
"Ha!" Maddie laughed; this was a dream come true for her best friend. Of course she was completely on board. "Yes. On the way out you will."

"And I'll carry your train as you walk into the Abbey?" Ella's voice grew soft and wistful as she pulled a throw pillow into her lap; hugging it to her stomach.

"No," Maddie shook her head.

"No? What the hell kind of..."

"Not the Abbey," Maddie cut her off.

"Not the Abbey?" She was confused. "Then where? Oh please tell me that Harry didn't convince the Queen to let you two run off. You know the public will..."

"Saint Paul's." Maddie interrupted her friend's spiral. "We're getting married at Saint Paul's Cathedral."

"..." Ella's entire thought process halted as she took that in. Her eyes blinked and her smile grew soft and nostalgic. "Saint Paul's?" She whispered; images flooding her mind of Harry's parents, of the history there, of her best friend in a beautiful, long white gown and Harry dressed as a soldier Prince. It was almost more than her fangirl heart could take. Tightening her hold on the pillow, she pulled it up to her face and, surprising Maddie, she let out a scream. Maddie flinched, but stayed put. Her grin stretched across her face.

"Okay. I can see you're going to need a minute to process this," her voice was low and soft as she chuckled. "Just. While you're in there, I should probably go ahead and tell you that you'll also be coming out on the balcony at Buckingham Palace to wave to the crowd and watch the flyover."

This time, when Ella screamed, it didn't surprise Maddie one bit.
"I would like to propose a toast," Bishop raised his glass, the humor evident in his eyes as they glanced around at the three other people at the table. Dinner had been cleared and they were all nice and tipsy.

"Oh-kay," Harry was smirking as he lifted his glass from the table.

"To Madeline..." He sent a wink across the table.

"Oh here we go," Maddie rolled her eyes.

"Bishop," Ella warned but he ignored her and lifted his glass higher.

"To Madeline," he smiled sweetly in her direction. "My most heartfelt congratulations on the passing of your English Test."

"Nice," Harry chuckled with a shake of his head. Maddie sighed dramatically and waved her hand for him to continue.

"I would like to say that I am particularly impressed at your ability, as an American, to adequately read, write and speak The Queen's English." His eyes sparkled in the dim light of the restaurant where they had met up for dinner.

"You're such an ass," Ella shook her head, taking a sip of her drink.

"What? They often butcher it and...are you drinking?!!" A flash of mock shock settled on his face. "I'm not finished with my toast and..."

"Finish." Ella glared, causing the other two to laugh lightly.

"To Madeline..." He turned back to her. "One step down in your return to the Motherland. Congratulations love."

"Thank you," she smiled, despite his mockery.

"Can we drink now?" Ella raised her eyebrows.

"Yes my darling," Bishop smiled at her. "To Maddie."

"To Maddie..." They echoed. They drank.

"So," Ella's smile widened, her hands coming together in front of her. "What's next on the list?"

"Which list?" Maddie lifted her eyebrows, setting her glass back on the table. "The citizen list or the wedding list or..."

At the very same time that Bishop answered, "The citizen list." Ella grinned, "The wedding list."

"Nice," Harry laughed into his drink.
"Okay, well," Maddie sighed happily; either way it brought a smile to her face. "I have three weeks before I take the British Life test and then I have to wait until February when my residency requirement is up...then I'll submit my paperwork and wait to hear about the swearing in ceremony."

"Right." Bishop nodded.

"And on the wedding list..." She sighed again. "We have been meeting with Ms. Schuler..."

"Jooooooooannnn," Harry strung out her name with his warm buttery accent, making Maddie giggle.

"Yes. Joan. Tomorrow we're meeting her at St. Paul's for our first look around the place."

"First?" Harry's eyebrows arched.

"Okay, my first look around the place. We're meeting with the Archbishop."

"Saucy," Ella's eyebrows wagged.

"No," Harry pointed his finger at her, eyes narrowed. "The Archbishop is not saucy."

"She thought you were talking about me," Bishop pointed to himself, leaning to kiss Ella's exposed neck. "Bishop. And I am saucy." Maddie rolled her eyes as Harry groaned.

"Stop it," she swatted at him. "Is there anything I can help with?"

"Actually," Maddie finished off her glass as Harry paid the bill. "I need to sort through the designer portfolios and narrow it down. Maybe you could come over tonight and help me?" Her voice turned sing-songy as she looked hopefully to Ella, then Bishop, then back to Ella.

"Bishop?" Ella leaned closer to him, her eyes batting in a way that made Maddie blush.

"Harry?" He looked across the table.

"I have plenty of scotch."

"Fine. We're in."

"Yea!" Ella clapped her hands together.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

"Okay..." Maddie dropped a stack of seven thick, black portfolio binders on the couch next to Ella before settling in on the other side of them.

"These are them?" Ella's scanned them as her fingers reached out to trace the thick, black leather.

"These are them." Maddie nodded, reaching for her glass of champagne she had sat on the table. "I need to narrow seven down to three and then Joan will contact them with a super secret mission."

"Your life is so much cooler than mine," Ella groaned, pulling the top portfolio into her lap while she sipped from her glass.

"Hardly." Maddie sighed. "I'm going to be a bride and I can't do any of the bride-y things...like try on dresses..."

"Of course you can't try on dresses," Ella rolled her eyes. "A Princess simply cannot wear a dress that a hundred other brides wear. She sets the standard."

"Are you ever going to stop with the princess stuff?" Maddie leaned in to look at the portfolio as Ella opened it up and turned a page.

"Doubtful."

"I may have you banished," Maddie warned reaching out to turn another page.

"Do what you must," Ella winked.

"Harry!" Maddie called out to him just as he and Bishop stepped back into the room.

"Yes darling?" He eyed her over his drink.

"How do I go about having somebody banished?"

"It's a little tricky. There's paperwork and a petition and..." He sighed deeply; sinking to the couch across from them. "And you only get so many banishments. It's important to use them wisely."

"Fine, fine. Forget it..." Maddie rolled her eyes; a laughter settling over the group.

"OH!" Ella exclaimed, her finger pointing to a sketch in the first book. "I like this one."

"What are you looking at?" Bishop stepped closer.

"Sketches for my wedding dress," Maddie answered without looking up at him. Her eyes were focused on the book in Ella's hand. Bishop looked to Harry who shrugged and smiled.

"Can I look?" Bishop's voice echoed in his glass.

"Sure," Maddie nodded.

"What?!" Ella looked up with disdain etched on her face. "No!"

"No? Why not?" Maddie tore her eyes from the books and looked at her best friend, laughter on her lips.

"He's...." Ella stalled for a moment. "He's a boy!"

"It's true," Bishop smirked. "I have proof."

"Easy," Harry warned.

"No thanks, Bishop." Maddie shook her head at him before turning back to Ella. "I know he's a boy, but he's not the boy I'm going to marry."
"But..." Ella stammered.

"And it might be nice to have a boy's opinion," Maddie's head nodded in thought. "I think that as long as Harry stays on that couch..."

"No problem," Harry held up a hand in an oath.

"And as long as you swear not to share anything with him..." She looked up at Bishop with a serious warning in her eyes.

"I swear on my life," he held his hand up.

"Then I say yes, you can look." Maddie's statement was met with a groan from Ella.

"Why are you always trying so hard to be rid of me love?" Bishop spoke to Ella as he took a seat next to Maddie; sandwishing her between himself and Ella. Ignoring him, Ella grumbled.

"I cannot believe you're going to ask for his opinion. He has zero taste."

"He has excellent taste," Harry offered with that smarmy grin that always won him favor. "He has you."

"Oh please." Ella rolled her eyes, entirely un-amused, as the other three laughed.

"Okay, okay," Maddie smiled and turned her attention back to the portfolios. "Are we ready?"

"Ready!" Bishop exclaimed just a bit too excitedly.

"Yes," Ella sighed; a genuine smile rising to her face as she focused on her best friend.

"Let's do this," Maddie nodded.

"Okay. Well..." Ella held up one of the books with a cringe. "I think you could probably get rid of this one right away."

"Ah yes," Maddie giggled, passing it along to Bishop.

"Wait a second." Instead of passing it on to the table and starting a 'no' pile, he held onto it. "Why not this one?"

"You're joking." Maddie laughed.

"No," he shook his head, swallowing more scotch. "What's wrong with it?"

"It's..." Maddie struggled for the right word; descriptive and non-offensive.

"Slutty," Ella offered; causing Harry to choke on his drink.

"Slutty?" Bishop laughed.

"Slutty," Ella nodded.

"Let me see this," Harry leaned forward, his hand stretching towards Bishop.
"NO!!" Maddie and Ella yelled in unison, freezing the men in their spots.

"Why not?" Harry laughed.

"Because you can't see any hint of the dress until the wedding day!" Ella reached across Maddie and jerked the portfolio from Bishop's hand.

"But you said it was slutty," Harry argued. "Surely you're not going to wear something slutty to our wedding." He raised his eyebrows at Maddie.

"Not to the wedding," she winked with a grin. "But maybe to the after party."

"Now we're talking," Bishop took the portfolio back from Ella. "Maybe we should have a separate pile for after party wear."

"Fine," Ella huffed. "We'll have a yes pile, a no pile, and a slutty after party pile." With a deep, heavy sigh, Ella waved her hand at a place on the table where Bishop made a show of setting the book.

"I have to say," Harry leaned back on the couch. "I didn't realize just how much I needed a voice like Bishop's at this meeting until just now."

By the time Bishop and Ella left, they had helped Maddie narrow it down to three potential wedding dress designers and one potential after-party ensemble. Ella had stacked the portfolios into one, tall, stack before she had kissed Maddie's cheeks, ruffled Harry's hair, and pulled Bishop towards the door while he warned her of a long night ahead. With the music still playing throughout their place, Harry and Maddie sat on opposite couches; empty glasses and bottles strewn across the table that sat between them. It was late, they were tired, and their minds were slowly drifting towards the long day of meetings and planning they had ahead of them. As Maddie's eyes flittered past the stack of portfolios a question came to mind—one that had been there before, one that had yet to be answered.

"Harry..." Maddie blinked; a slow, drawn out process that told of her sleepiness and hinted at too much champagne.

"Yes?" His grin was warm, slightly mocking; that cocky way his mouth twisted laid truth to how well he could read her—she was tipsy and feeling friendly.

"I want to ask you about something..."

"Anything," he held his hand out; palm up and fingers spread.

"Open book?" She lifted her eyebrows.

"Yes I am." His head tipped back, propped up by his own hand.

"I don't know," her bottom lip pulled into her teeth; her tell.

"Come on, love. What do you want to talk about?" He couldn't help the small chuckle that came out of his mouth—amused that even still there might be something that made her nervous. And then she said truly the only thing that would make him pause.

"Money." Maddie let the word settle, watching as he controlled his features. He took a few seconds before he moved, sitting up and leaning forward; blowing a burst of air through his lips as he moved.

"I'm guessing you're not talking about how to count back change," his lips cracked the smile that had been there before.

"No. No, I'm not." She smiled softly. "Listen. I know it's uncomfortable..."

"It's not...uncomfortable," his neck stretched as he adjusted. "It's just not something I talk about. It's not something we talk about."

"I know," she nodded, sitting up straighter.

"I was raised not to talk about it, not to give voice to..."

"I know," she sighed, pulling her thoughts together. "And I get that. I do. I just..." She swallowed and looked off into the distance for a moment. Her hands came together in front of her as her gaze shifted back to him. "I don't know that I need to know...everything. I just...Harry I've had a job since I was fourteen. I have been managing a budget and an account since I was very young. I worked through college, I...I had to budget things and be very aware of what I was spending. Granted, in more recent years it hasn't been as tight..." She shrugged. "But I always know what I have coming in and what I have coming out." She took a breath and thought for a moment. "I guess it's just strange to sit in this space where I have no job, no income, no budget. It's...strange."

Harry watched her for a moment, his mind processing her words at a rapid rate, trying to sort out any undercurrents to what she was saying. His voice was softer as he spoke. "You do know that you need not...worry...about any of that now, right?"

"No," she laughed, shaking her head. "I don't know that. I mean...of course I know that you are..." She trialed off, waving her hand around the opulent room; the wealth and décor that surrounded them. "I get that. I'm not naïve. I just...we're planning this wedding and I'm making choices about dresses and shoes and I have no idea what any of it costs nor do I know if it's ridiculously expensive or..."

"But..." He tried to step in but Maddie continued.

"I know. I know. I don't have to worry about the cost of the wedding. I know. You said that. Joan knows what to do. I just have to tell her what I want..." Maddie recited the words he had spoken to her during that initial meeting. The cost of the wedding had not been discussed except to say that it was taken care of. Harry and his father would handle everything. At the time Maddie had accepted that; a royal wedding surely cost an astronomical amount of money and she had never intended on asking her mother for anything—even if she weren't marrying a Prince. "And we haven't even talked about a pre-nup."

"Hold on..."

"Why haven't we talked about a pre-nup yet? I've been expecting it but..." Maddie laughed tiredly. "We're planning a wedding. You're third in line to the throne. Surely nobody allows you to marry somebody without a pre-nup." She stared at him; met his eyes. Neither of them moved. It was twenty seconds before Harry was the first to blink.
"No." He let out a long, exhaustive sigh. "Nobody allows me to marry without a prenuptial agreement."

"See," she smiled weakly.

"Maddie," he groaned; his hand scrubbing over his face. It was abundantly clear that this was a topic he would give anything to avoid. "I don't want to get into this right now." Maddie's eyes stayed fixed on him only for a moment.

"Fine." She shrugged; a light-hearted move that held onto tense undertones.

"Fine?" Harry questioned.

"Fine." She nodded. His eyes squinted as he studied her; wondering if this fine was a girl's fine or a guy's fine. Going for the easiest path, Harry went with a guy's fine.

"Great." He clapped his hands together and moved from the couch.

"Great," Maddie repeated. She leaned to collect the wine glasses from the table in front of her and rose to her feet. As she took a small, swoosh of a step past him, she very casually offered, "I suppose that sooner or later I'll just adapt to being a kept woman."

It was a girl's fine.

Harry's head fell back as he groaned into the large, open room.

It was definitely a girl's fine.

With a deep, heavy breath, Harry summoned his will and followed her into the kitchen.

"Madeline," he pleaded.

"Look. I don't want to know all of it. I don't need to know all of it. Just..." She stood at the sink, her back to him as she unnecessarily rinsed out the wine glasses. "Just a budget would be nice. Give me a monthly limit." She glanced at him over her shoulder. "A thousand?"

"Maddie." His eyes squinted as he stifled the laughter in his throat.

"Give me a wedding budget Harry. Those dresses are..." She turned back to the dishes. "How much is too much? What if I spend all of your money? What do I do with the money I have now? I don't need to know everything Harry. I just...not knowing anything makes me feel..." She paused to take a breath. "It makes me feel like you're taking care of me. And, you know...fine. You're taking care of me. But I don't think a monthly budget or...I don't know." She sighed, setting the glasses in the sink. "I don't think it's entirely out of line."

The room was silent for a minute. Maddie stayed at the sink, turned away from him while he processed her words. It wasn't an easy thing to do, nowhere near an easy thing to do. He wasn't lying. He never talked about this. Ever. It wasn't as though he just didn't like to, he simply never did it. It was frowned upon; for somebody of such great wealth and privilege to get into such discussions. He stared at the back of her head for a moment, his mind working much harder than he had planned on it working after taking down all that scotch with Bishop.
With great resolve he took a step in her direction. Maddie could hear him move closer and closer before he popped into the reflection from the window over the sink. She stayed put, waiting for him to say something, waiting for his next move. She watched as he pulled his phone from his pocket, dialed and pressed it to his ear. As he waited for an answer, his free hand moved around her hip to rest on the counter—as though he were blocking her in.

"Thomas," Harry's voice was distinctively more chipper than it had been only moments ago. "Tomorrow afternoon I would like to set up a meeting with the attorney and the banker..." He took a deep breath and half a step forward, closing the miniscule space between the two of them. "Yes. Yes. And if you can have him bring in a draft of a prenuptial agreement for Maddie to review..." Maddie felt the hair on the back of her neck stand up as his breath tickled her skin. "Yes. I want to take care of it tomorrow. All of it. Yes. Okay. Thank you. I'll see you then." Harry ended the call and, reaching around her other hip, he sat the phone on the counter next to the sink and let his hand rest on the edge; trapping her in. "Thomas is scheduling a meeting for us after the morning meeting with the Archbishop and before our afternoon meeting with Joan." His head dipped to kiss her shoulder. "They'll have some things for you to look at and a prenuptial agreement for you to review and..." Maddie's head tilted reflexively to the side as he kissed at the crook of her neck.

"You didn't have to do that..." She breathed.

"You're not a kept woman, Maddie." His fingers lifted from the counter, running down her arm to press on top of her hand. "You're not a mistress either."

"Harry..." She tried again; the mood in the room shifting.

"You're going to be my wife." The way his lips formed the last word spoke of solemnity and seriousness.

"Hmmm." Maddie's lips pressed together as he kissed up her neck. Her hand, still wet, moved up into his hair; pushing him closer. The tension from the moment before slipping from him, fluttering away from her.

"My partner..." He breathed into her ear; his other hand moving to her hip, flattening out and sliding around to the small of her stomach. Holding her body flush to his, he smiled against her skin.

"You know..." She breathed wanting to let out her last bit of thought on the issue before she jumped head first into where he was trying to move her. "You don't have to show me everything. You could..." She swallowed as the hand at her stomach began an achingly slow journey south; unzipping and unbuttoning before slipping into the waist of her pants.

"Shhhh..." His fingers slipped further down, prying the thin lace from her skin to make room for him. "I will show you everything. But I'll show you tomorrow." His fingers slipped further, pulling a groan from Maddie's lips. "But I am done talking about this tonight."

"Harry. I. Ohhhhhhhhh."

"Harry. I. Ohhhhhhhhh." Her head tipped back into him and he grinned—proud.

He had found her sweet spot. Her mind was effectively cleared.

"Mmmm..." His smile morphed into a hum as Maddie's knees went slightly weak; her one hand pulling at his hair, the other under his clutching the counter for support. "Can we do that?" His voice was low, knowing the answer. "Can we stop talking about this tonight?"
"Yes," she whispered, her head nodding in agreement.

"Good." Firm. Final. Swiftly, his hands moved from their spots to her hips.

"Oh!" She gasped as he turned her to face him. "Ohhhhh..." She grinned, her cheeks flushing at the look in his eye. "So..." Her fingers walked up his flat stomach, his chest; dancing up the column of his neck and over his chin. She ran a finger across his lips. "If we're done talking..."

"Oh we're done talking." He assured her.

"Whatever shall we do?" Her eyebrows lifted ever so slightly, a puff of air pushing through her lips as her lips curved upwards. Her entire body was pulsating this hot, urgent desire for his hands to return to her body. With a rough burst of laughter, Harry shook his head; shaking out the last bit of humor before his face grew serious.

And his hands returned.

They were strong.

They were insistent.

They were holding her tight and rough and close to him so that his lips could find hers with purpose. They were hot and warm and demanding. And the way his tongue pushed past her lips and into her mouth was a precursor to the way in which he was about to pursue her, the way in which he was about to draw her in and take her over. If there had been room for a moan, one would have moved through her mouth. But there was no vacancy. She was completely occupied—by him.

His hands left her hips, running up along her side, teasing past her chest as they moved to her shoulders. Settling her in her spot, they moved down her arms, pulling them from where they were wrapped around him, taking her hands and planting them firmly on the counter behind her. Her eyes opened in time to watch him leave her lips, red and swollen, to moved down her body. His hands met his mouth at her chest, offering a nip and a kiss, a squeeze and a promise to return.

And then he dipped lower. Having just moments ago initiated the steps to divest her of her pants, all his hands had left to do was tug. Gripping the waist of her pants in his fingers, he pulled them to the floor with him in one synchronized, fluid, motion. He pulled them from her body and in the morning Maddie would expect to find them across the room, under the table where he had carelessly tossed them.

His fingers pressed into the flesh of her thighs as his face pressed to the lace of her panties; the intensity of both causing her head to rock back, her elbows giving just slightly. And the animalistic groan that came from deep inside her drew Harry to the edge quicker than any dirty word, quicker than any piece of provocative lingerie. He moaned against her as the tease continued across that thin layer of black lace.

"Harry..." She breathed; a long, drawn out whisper of a word. She was warm and wet and wound up. He was hot and thorough and happy to stay exactly where he was. But when her hands found the will to move from the counter and tug, not quite so gently, at the red mess of hair on his head, he did as she demanded and moved from his knees.

Maddie wasted no time pulling his shirt up and over his head, letting it fall behind her into the sink; crystal clinking against crystal. Harry laughed against her lips as her hands moved to his belt. Struggling with the buckle made her frustrated; drawing her lip forward in something of a pout.

"Here..." He grinned, his hands leaving her body to assist. "Let me..." Harry's hands were quick at their work as Maddie pulled her own shirt up and over her head, leaving behind a mussed up mane of hair that Harry embedded his hands in. Maddie pushed against him, moving them both away from the sink till his back met the island in the middle of the room. She shoved at his pants and he stepped from them, kicking them off to the side. Harry turned them both around, lifting Maddie up onto the island. She pulled at him, wanting him with her.

As Maddie moved further back and Harry moved above her, items were sent crashing to the ground; both functional and decorative. As the last bit of their clothing was torn from their bodies and tossed unceremoniously aside, neither of them seemed to care.

Neither of them would give another thought of the mess until it was all over. Until Maddie had called out his name before biting her teeth into his shoulder. Until Harry unrelentingly held her to him, pushing her to the edge again, with him. Until they were exhausted and sweaty and marked —him from her teeth, her from his fingers at her hip.

It wasn't until it was over and Harry lifted his head from where it lay on her stomach to look out over the kitchen floor, now littered with utensils and a small amount of shattered glass, that either of them gave a moment's pause to think of where they were. Harry pressed kisses to her stomach, her hip, her thigh, her knee, her feet, as he moved to sit at the edge of the counter, looking out at the room for the clearest path out.

"Are we going to have to sleep here tonight?" Maddie giggled sleepily as she wrapped her arms around him from behind, her chest pressing up against his back.

"No, love," he pulled her hand to his lips. "Come on. Hop on my back. I'll take you." He moved from the island, securing his feet before helping her onto him. With her arms wrapped securely around him and her laughter in his ear, Harry carried Maddie from the kitchen to the soft, safety of the living room rug.

"Will you take me to bed?" Her voice bordered between a whine and a plea. "Please?" Feeling particularly chivalrous and eager to please, Harry tightened his hold on her and moved up the stairs to their room.

It wasn't until the next morning when Maddie was showered and dressed and made her way downstairs for breakfast when it really hit her. Harry stood in the kitchen, dressed in a suit, a cup of coffee in his hand as he read through a folder laying on the very same island they had depraved the night before. Her eyes traveled around the spotless kitchen, without a trace of what had occurred the night before, and she knew that Harry hadn't cleaned up the mess. She suddenly felt very guilty. She should have come down with shoes on to clean the mess. She should not have left it here for...

"Good Morning ma'am," Bernard's voice called as he joined them in the kitchen, a fresh vase of flowers in his hand. Maddie's face flushed warm as she cleared her throat.

"Good Morning Bernard," she managed to recover, despite the smug smirk that tugged at Harry's lips.

"Would you like me to make you something for breakfast ma'am?" His smile was genuine as he turned his attention to her.
And it hit her. This was how it worked. Every single person in that room knew what had occurred in that very space just the night before and Maddie was just now learning that there was no way in hell Bernard would ever speak of it. He was most definitely the one who had cleaned the mess, most definitely the one who had retrieved their clothing that they would later find washed and pressed and returned to its rightful home. He was most definitely privy to this private, intimate moment that she had shared with Harry the night before. But here he was, smiling and meeting her eyes while he offered her eggs and toast. Guilty or not, this was how it worked.

"No," she shook her head and returned his smile. "No. I'll just have coffee this morning. Thank you."

"Yes ma'am," he nodded and stepped back out of the kitchen and off to his work.

"Wow..." Maddie breathed as Harry broke from his spot, moving towards her. "He just..."

"Mmm Hmm," Harry nodded, bending to kiss the spot on her hip he knew he had bruised before moving to her lips. "I told you he was discreet."

Unable to find the words for the feeling that passed over her, Maddie smiled and kissed him back. Life as she knew it was over. Though she would absolutely find a way to set aside her embarrassment and thank Bernard, the way she went about her life had absolutely changed.

And this was only the beginning. As she pressed a kiss to Harry's shoulder, where she was certain her teeth marks were still a light presence, and moved to pour herself some coffee, she passed over her agenda for the day.

First. A meeting with the Archbishop of Canterbury at St. Paul’s Cathedral.

Second. A meeting with an attorney and a banker to go over Harry's monetary worth and sign a prenuptial agreement.

And Third. A meeting with Joan where they would discuss three designers—one of whom would end up designing a gown that would ultimately hang in a museum.

Life as she knew it was over.
As the year drew closer to the end, the wedding plans continued. Those three important meetings had set the ball rolling for all that was to come.

They had met with the Archbishop of Canterbury twice since that initial meeting and they continued to meet at St. Paul's Cathedral. Every time Maddie stepped foot into St. Paul's, she had to pause and take a moment to let it sink in, let her mind adjust. The vast opulence, the regality that it held was intimidating. Every time she stepped inside, she became more and more at ease with the grandness, more and more at home in the space. Harry, biting back his smirk, would hold her hand and walk the length of the aisle, realizing she needed the time and the moment to process.

Maddie would take notes as they walked. She would take note of the time it took to walk from one end to the other, the time it would take her to walk from the door to Harry. Three and a half minutes. She would take note of just how many people would fit inside. She would take note of where Harry would be standing, where she would meet him, where they would move to. Though the Archbishop assured her there would be plenty of time for rehearsals, seeing how it would be laid out in her mind was a sort of comfort for her.

They had met with the attorney and the banker only once. Maddie had controlled her facial features when the folder was placed in front of her, she kept her eyes focused in front of her as paper after paper was flipped over for her—drawing her deeper and deeper into the details of Harry's wealth. She was aware that next to her, Harry sat in a continual state of instability; his foot tapping on the floor, his fingers drumming on the table, his teeth biting at his nails. There was nothing about this experience that didn't make him uncomfortable. She recognized that. And she recognized how big of a moment this must be for him, to share this information with her. And, though her jaw wanted to slack, though her eyes wanted to bug wide, she held it together. She kept a small, easy smile on her face and nodded curtly at each new bit of information. And, when the attorney slid the pen across the table to her, she signed all of the documents; the one allowing her access to the newly established joint account, the one allowing her to order and charge things to the household account, and finally the small stack that outlined the details of her life in a divorced-from-Harry world; she signed them all with the same calm, the same ease. And when she was done, she clicked the pen and let it rest on the table right next to all of her questions about his money.

There were no more questions, no more inquiries. He had shown her. She had seen. And they were moving on.

And finally, they had met with Joan about the dress designer and a few small details. Maddie turned over the narrowed down pile of three designers. Joan would take them from the meeting and call them all in for a secret meeting. She would ask that they each put together drawings, fabrics, and ideas for what they would see Maddie wearing on the big day. She would ask that the send over something they had designed so that Maddie could wear it and get a feel for their style, for their cuts. Not more than three weeks later, Maddie had made a final selection. Winifred Ellis, relatively unknown until now, was brought into St. James Palace where she would enthusiastically agree to take on the biggest assignment of her life. She would sign confidentiality agreements and take meetings with Thomas, a family attorney and Joan all before she was able to sit down with Maddie. Both Maddie and Winnie, as she preferred to be called, were excited and anxious to finally meet and begin this journey that would prove life altering for the both of them. It was November, the wedding was in June and there wasn't much time to bring it all together. But it was time to begin.
"Next question please," Maddie smiled to Harry as she returned to the breakfast table.

"Yes," Harry nodded and looked to the book of sample questions for The British Life test she would be taking in a matter of days. Clearing his throat, he read the next on the list. "How many Parliamentary constituencies are there? 464, 564, 646, or 664?"

"Hmm," Maddie's mouth twisted to the side as she thought for a split second. "646?"

"Brilliant," Harry grinned. "In which year did married women get the right to divorce their husband?" His face twisted up. "What kind of question is that?"

"Harry," Maddie warned.

"Seriously now. This is how we're deciding who can be a citizen?"

"Now is not the time for a reformation movement," Maddie couldn't help but chuckle at the seriousness on his face.

"I think now is the perfect time," he held strong for a moment before bending to her narrowed eyes and repeating the question. "In which year did married women get the right to divorce their husband? 1837, 1857, 1875, 1882?"

"Oh-kay," he adjusted slightly in his chair, sipping from his drink. "Who is the sexiest member of the royal family?" Sarcasm flickered across his face. "Prince Harry," he pointed at himself. "Prince Charles..." He shook his head at her. "Or..."

"Eugenie," Maddie interrupted his silliness, snatching the questions from his hand and hitting him with it. "She is by far the sexiest member of the royal family. Now. Will you stop it?!"

"Come on...I'm just playing."

"You know I have to take this test."

"I do."

"And they are going to publish my scores in every paper in England."

"Are you kidding? They are going to publish those scores internationally."

"Exactly!" She swatted him again. "Now, can you please take this seriously? I do not want to embarrass the Queen by having to take the test again."

"Fine..." He sighed and continued. "Next question..." He cleared his throat dramatically; shaking the book in his hand for effect. But before the next question could be read, Thomas—who had been working in the residence, stepped into the room.

"Pardon me, Sir," he nodded to Harry. "Ma'am."
"Good morning, Thomas," Maddie smiled sweetly.

"Good morning, Ma'am," he smiled in return.

"How can I thank you for the interruption, Thomas?" Harry joked, tossing a wink to Maddie.

"I'm sorry, Sir. I have a request for Dr. Forrester."

"Oh?" Maddie's eyebrows lifted. It was a rare occasion for her to be singled out for a last minute request.

"Her Majesty's Secretary has called to invite you and Ms. Schuler and Ms. Ellis to view The Directory."

"The Directory?" Maddie was confused as she looked from Thomas to Harry and back.

"The Directory of jewelry Ma'am," Thomas and Harry met eyes as Thomas tried to explain.

"Jewelry?" Maddie felt her heart pause, embarrassed at her lack of understanding.

"To choose a tiara," Harry offered, his fingers pushing his plate aside.

"I'm sorry," Maddie let out a breathy laugh. "To choose a tiara? I thought that was something that was decided by...I don't know...somebody who is not me. I get to choose?" Her forehead scrunched up as she looked to the two men—the two men who were delving into this for the first time as well. Though they did have a bit more knowledge on the subject than Maddie did.

"Maybe you should explain," Harry nodded to Thomas.

"Yes," Thomas nodded. "You, Ms. Schuler, and Ms. Ellis will meet with Her Majesty's secretary at Buckingham Palace to view The Directory. The Secretary will know which options are available to you. Once a choice is made, the Secretary will send the request onto The Queen for her final approval."

"Wow..." Maddie breathed, reaching for her drink. "When does she want to see us?"

"This afternoon if possible, Ma'am."

"Okay," she nodded. "Would you please call Ms. Schuler and Ms. Ellis to see if they're free?"

"Of course, Ma'am," Thomas nodded before slipping from the room. The irony that Maddie didn't see at the moment was that there was no need to check on their availability. Both women would, upon a moment's notice, clear their entire day to make room for this appointment—to make way for this once in a lifetime opportunity. That afternoon, the three women would be sitting in an office at Buckingham Palace looking through The Directory full of timeless, magnificent pieces. And, with lumps in their throats, they would be sending up a selection for The Queen's approval.

"Well..." Maddie took a breath and smiled a slightly nervous smile at Harry. "So much for a normal day, no?"

"You ready for your next question?" He held up the book of sample questions with a smirk.

"Henry," her eyes moved into a glare that she could only hold for a beat before a bubble of laughter escaped. Her day had just become infinitely more important.

Maddie thought her heart rate had likely doubled as she slipped into her waiting car after her meeting at BP. She had sat with Joan and Winnie and had looked through The Directory, discussing historical facts, going over the feel for the wedding, the look of the dress. They had looked through pages of jewels, sitting in a respectful awe at each piece. And, after sending up their request, one that was quickly granted, they were escorted to the cars that were waiting to take them back to their respective days. Maddie kissed and hugged both women and smiled at Sampson as he shut her car door before sliding into the front seat of the car.

As they flew through the streets of London, Maddie took long, deep breaths. She focused on the passing scenery, letting her body relax. She couldn't help but giggle at surreal state of her life. She wondered if there was ever going to be a time when it all became commonplace, when she wasn't knocked sidewise by the royalty that was seeping into her once ordinary life. When she looked over the few months since Harry had proposed, when she cataloged the moments since she had said yes, she could feel her ordinary life slipping further and further away.

She really had just come from Buckingham Palace where she had chosen a tiara to wear on her wedding day.

"Wow..." Maddie breathed the word that had almost become her mantra. "Sorry. Sampson?" She leaned forward.

"Ma'am?" He turned towards her.

"I'm not ready to go back to Kensington quite yet. Can we make a stop first?"

"Of course Ma'am," he nodded. "Where would you like to go?"

"Madeline," Ella was waiting for her when she arrived. "I'm so happy you called."

"I'm so happy you're home," Maddie smiled sincerely as Sampson entered Ella's place, quickly sweeping and standing aside.

"Come on in," Ella pulled at Maddie's hand, happy to see her friend, even though they had lunch plans in two days. "What's going on?"

"Do you have tequila?" Maddie asked, shrugging out of her coat and kicking off her shoes.

"Yes," Ella laughed, moving swiftly towards the liquor cabinet. "You okay?"

"Mmm Hmm," Maddie nodded.

"You don't seem okay," Ella looked her over. "Where's Harry?"

"A meeting? Or he could be home by now. I don't know." Maddie shrugged. "He wouldn't...he wouldn't understand this. I needed somebody who would understand this."

"Understand what?" Ella laughed, pulling the bottle from the cabinet and looking for glasses.
"Tequila, please." Maddie held out her hand impatiently. "Is Bishop here?"

"No," she laughed, holding out the bottle. "Here. Tequila."

"Thank you," Maddie breathed, taking the bottle from her friend. Maddie wasted no time as she twisted the lid open, tipping the bottle to her lips for a drink.

"Whoa..." Ella watched with a smirk. "What's going on?"

"Ahem," Maddie cleared her throat, wiping her lips with the back of her hand. She took a breath and settled herself for a moment, her eyes meeting Ella's with a seriousness in them that spoke of the significance and confidentiality with which she spoke the next words. "I chose a tiara today, for the wedding. Whoo..." She let out a long breath. "I am wearing The Strathmore Rose Tiara."

"Oh my..." Ella gasped, her hand flying to her mouth; her eyes filled with tears. The romance, the warmth, the image of Maddie in that piece of artwork, overwhelmed her for a moment. Without another word, Ella held her hand out for the bottle of Tequila. Maddie nodded and handed it over, watching as Ella tipped it back. There, Maddie thought, that was the reaction, the reality she needed. She hadn't lost it quite yet. She knew she could count on Ella to feel the impact; to hold that space for her. She also knew she could count on her to get drunk and giggly and accept it all with ease and aplomb.

匆匆匆匆匆匆匆匆匆匆匆匆

"Harry!" Maddie called out into the house as she pushed inside the warm, music-filled house. "Harry darling!" She giggled at herself, kicking her shoes to the side and shutting the door.

"Darling?" He chuckled, sticking his head out of the office to watch as she clunked into the entryway. "Are you drunk?"

"No," she giggled again with a shake of her head, dropping her bag to the table and turning her attention to him, not at all convincing. "I like the music," she pointed to the living room from where the tunes blared.

"I was just finishing up some stuff in the office. I can turn it down," he offered, his eyebrows raising as he leaned against the wall; his arms crossed over his chest as he watched her.

"No, no," she shook her head again; her grin wide, her eyes bright.

"How was the meeting?" He asked, amused at the way her hips began to sway involuntarily.

"Dance with me?" She held out her hand, her head tipping to the side slightly. Harry bit his lip to keep from laughing at her and, with an easy sort of nod, he pushed away from the wall and took her hand.

"Absolutely," he smiled, tugging her hand up to his shoulder and wrapping his arms around her waist. She loved that about him; loved it. The way he didn't put up a fight, the way he didn't even ask, the way he took her hand and pulled her close, the way he dropped everything he was doing in the office to dance with her. She loved that about him so much.

"The meeting went well," she smiled up at him.
"Happy to hear it," his eyes flickered as he looked her over; moving them around the entry way.

"I had a bit of Tequila..."

"No!" He chuckled. "With Gran's Secretary or..."

"Ella," Maddie offered. "I stopped by on my way home."

"Makes more sense," Harry nodded. Maddie sighed in his arms, nuzzling into his warmth.

"I chose a tiara," she confessed; the words flowing more easily from her mouth than they had when she first spoke them.

"Are you going to let me in on the secret?"

"The Strathmore Rose tiara," the words rolled off her tongue.

"Ah," he nodded.

"It's beautiful," Maddie sighed.

"You're beautiful," Harry countered.

"Hmmm..." Her lips pulled into a grin. "It was given to the Queen Mother by her parents when she married Prince Albert...King George the Sixth." Maddie sighed closer to him. "Your Great-Grandfather."

"Yes," he smiled. "I know."

"It's quite romantic, isn't it?" Maddie thought it over. "She remained devoted to him her entire life, for years and years after he died. Fifty years, Harry. She never wavered."

"It's true," he nodded.

"And he was a second son..." She ran her hand over his shoulder then, searching his face. "There's so much history there."

"Yes," his fingers reached out to move a strand of hair from her face with an adoring smile. "Enough history to drive you to Tequila?"

"Ha!" Maddie laughed, her hand smacking against her chest. "No, no. I just...I needed a normal moment is all."

"Mmm..." Harry nodded. "I see."

"I love you Harry," she stopped moving, drawing them to a halt. "I love you so much."

"I know."

"And now I have a tiara to wear on the day I stand before God and, apparently, millions of people, to declare my undying love for you."

"You do," he watched her closely, watching her day pass over her face; her eyes adjusting to the feelings that flowed with it all. "You okay, love?"

"I am," she sighed. "Normal moment has been had and now I'm back...dancing with a Prince at the Palace." She laughed at herself and tugged at his shirt, bringing his lips to hers.

"Mmm..." He grinned against her lips, tasting the Tequila. "I have an idea."

"Ohhh..." She kissed him again. "I think I have the same idea." Her eyebrow arched suggestively.

"No, no," he laughed. "Not that."

"Boo."

"Not that yet," he clarified; his arms moving to hug her around the shoulders. "I have an idea for the weekend; something normal."

"Oh!" Maddie's eyes grew wide with excitement. "Like?"

"I thought we might invite Khenda, Collins, and Isaiah up for the weekend..."

"I love it!" Maddie bust in, bouncing in his arms.

"You take your test on Friday, they can be here in time for a celebratory dinner with Bishop and Ella and then we can spend the weekend being all kinds of normal."

"I loooooooooooooooove it," she danced around in his arms. "We should call them and invite them."

"Yes."

"We should call them and invite them now."

"Yes ma'am," he offered a small salute and, letting his arms fall from around her, he pulled his phone from his pocket and held it out to her. "Why don't you call them while I get you some water."

"Water?" She questioned as she dialed and watched as he walked away from her.

"To avoid that very normal headache you're bound to have," he winked.

"Ah yes," she grinned. "You do love me."

"You know it!"
Chapter 85

Maddie thought it was funny really, how things had changed in her life. Most people; her family, the public, noticed only the big things. They noticed the constant armed shadow she had with her wherever she went. They noticed the palace, they noticed the car and driver, they noticed the ring, they noticed the famous, royal, soon-to-be husband. What they didn't see were the little things; the minute everyday things that most people took for granted. Maddie laughed to herself as she remembered one of her first conversations with Harry—where she mocked him for coveting her anonymity.

It was the little things that made the biggest impact. It was the way the staff cleaned up after her, after them—the way it seemed to be an honor to do so. It was the way she had to go through three checkpoints to take a walk through the park. It was the way Bernard knew what she liked for breakfast, what kind of soda she liked the best. It was the way that information traveled around the staff at the other houses. It was the sheer amount of prep work that went into the simple gesture of picking up friends at the airport. Collins, Khenda, and Isaiah's arrival brought out those little things. The royal watchers who went wild with excitement at the photos of Harry carrying baby Isaiah through the airport in his newly gifted stocking cap that made him look like a dinosaur. Maddie's picture would be nowhere near; it was all Isaiah the dinosaur smiling blissfully up at his proud Uncle Harry.

Maddie laughed to herself as she remembered the giddy way Harry had prepared for their visit. The very second he had confirmation they would be coming, he had hurried about making lists—or more accurately calling out items for Bernard to order for the household; play pens, beds, toys, food, the now famous hat.

"You know, if this list gets out, people are going to think we're expecting," Maddie had giggled at him one afternoon. She hadn't quite been prepared for the way he looked at her then; that far off, blissful look in his eyes that made her chest constrict. "Easy tiger," she breathed. "We have a wedding to get through first. Remember? Duke. Duchess. Then baby." Harry had offered her a wink, a ridiculous grin, and went about his preparations.

Harry's interest in his surrogate nephew did not end with preparations. They continued straight on into the weekend.

"You know," Khenda had smirked as she sank onto the couch next to Ella, her eyes watching Harry as he carried Isaiah so casually, so instinctually, around the place with him. "Had I known that Uncle Harry would take over like this, I would have just sent Isaiah. Collins and I would have caught up on our sleep."

"There's a thought," Collins winked while Ella laughed and Maddie joined them with more wine.

"I would be happy to book you a room somewhere," Harry called to her, his eyes never leaving the baby. "I could send you off for the weekend..."

"It's appealing," Khenda winked at her husband.

"I don't think he's joking," Bishop shook his head, amused by Harry's attachment to the child, by the way he was entranced.

"He's not joking," Maddie smiled across the room at him.
"He's not." Harry confirmed, his eyes meeting Maddie's.

"You know you're going to have to share him eventually," Maddie called out, the beginnings of a playful pout on her lips.

"No way." He shook his head. "I've never had to share a thing my entire life. Except for with Will, but I don't see him around here, do you?"

"Come here little buddy," Maddie turned her focus to the more flexible of the twosome. Holding out her hands, she smiled at the bubbly bundle. "Come see Aunt Maddie. You know you wanna..." And, because he really was quite the agreeable baby, he smiled wide and held his arms up to her. She lifted him from Harry with a gleam of victory in her eyes.

"I see how it is little man," Harry joked, relinquishing his hold to her. "No hard feelings. I prefer her to me too."

"There we go..." Maddie sighed; snuggling him close. "Why don't you come tell Aunt Maddie about your day..." With only a quick glance up to Harry, she caught it; that look on his face—half adoration, half predatory—that made her cheeks blush and her skin tingle. She knew exactly what he was thinking.

"Stop it," she warned in hushed tones that spoke of a private, intimate moment.

"Make me," he countered with a cocky grin. She walked up to him then, stretching her neck so that she could kiss him.

"Duke, Duchess, then baby." Her narrowed eyes met his.

"Yeah..." He sighed. "I'm going to have to see what I can do to move up this wedding."

"I'm going to have to see what I can do to avoid vomiting all over what is most certainly a ridiculously expensive rug," Ella offered with a laugh; half annoyed, half jealous.

And so the weekend began; the three couples and the six-month-old center of attention. It was wonderful; so exactly what they all needed before heading into the holiday season. That first night was spent catching up; warm drinks, wonderful food, and stories until way past everyone's bed time. The second day, Uncle Harry and Collins took over Isaiah duties and Maddie, Ella and Khenda took the day for some much need relaxation and girl time. And on the third day, they all relaxed; comfy clothes, yummy brunch, and talk of the future—a wedding, a growing Isaiah, joint summer vacations. And when they finally said good-bye the France-bound threesome, the remaining Londoners felt refreshed and revived and ready to face the holidays.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

"All packed?" Harry's hands rested on his hips as he looked around the room at her loaded bags. It was December twenty-second. The tree was up, the halls were decked and Maddie had already decided that one of the best perks about her impending marriage and life role was that the Royal Family, the palaces, they DID the holidays right. It was absolutely beautiful and she soaked it up every chance she had. But now wasn't the time for strolling lazily through the winter wonderland around her. Now was the time for packing. She was leaving that night, taking an overnight flight to the states for what would be her last Christmas as a Forrester. Though Harry had groaned at the thought of her being so far away for so long, with his obligations to his family, he understood.
Harry smiled at her, trying to avoid the sadness that came with her imminent departure; reminding himself that it was better than her staying behind alone.

"Yes." Maddie nodded; relief washing over her. It had been a long process; preparing for this trip; preparing for the holidays. She felt emotionally and physically exhausted.

"And...are you leaving me and taking everything or..." He tried for humor, seeing the tension.

"Ha. Ha." Maddie rolled her eyes. "I'm going to be stateside for two weeks. Who knows what I'll need."

"Who indeed." He watched her for a moment as she moved around their room. "Are you okay?"

"What?" She looked up in surprise. "Why?"

"You seem..." He shrugged, unable to pin point it, unable to find the word for his hunch. "I don't know. You seem a little off."

"Hmmm..." She pressed her lips together; taking a moment to think, a moment to blink away the unexpected surge of emotion she felt when he pointed it out.

"Maddie?" His forehead knotted; his hunch moved to strong suspicion. She turned her face from him then; a quick, whip of her head. "Madeline?" His voice was soft as he took a step towards her and stopped. He blinked once, twice, three times before Maddie moved again. He heard her sniff, watched her take a deep breath and then she turned to face him; eyes bright and shiny from unshed tears.

"I just..." She took a deep breath and blew it out of her mouth, looking down at her bags stacked by the door, at her piles of notebooks and folders sitting on the dresser and she wiped at her eyes.

"Baby, are you okay?"

"Yes," she cried; half weepy, half laughing. "God..." She exhaled again, trying to gain control of her emotions. She looked to him again, shaking her head. "Would you look at me? I'm a mess."

"Yeah..." His smile was small, cautious. "You want to let me in on the mess?"

"Yes," Maddie nodded; pressing her lips tight to keep from crying. She took a moment to breathe, a moment to calm, before she could speak again. "I was just packing—you know, figuring out what I would need to take home for Christmas and I realized..." Her fight to keep the tears at bay was lost as they tumbled from her eyes. "...this is my first Christmas at home without him..."

"Ah..." It came out of his mouth as though it had been forced by a blow to the gut. His heart ached in his chest. He had experienced so many Christmases without his mother but the feelings still came steaming to the surface.

"I went to Bendal right after he died. I missed the first two and then last year..." She trailed off blowing air from her mouth, waving her hands in front of her face, trying to calm down. Last year she had been there, in London. "Sorry," she laughed.

"Don't be," he shook his head. "Baby, it's okay to be sad."

"I know..." She started to cry again. "I just...it just surprised me is all."
"Yeah," he nodded; voice soft and low—comforting.

"I was looking through some of my boxes and I found this," she lifted a framed photo from the dresser and held it out to him. "This is the day I received my Doctorate." He moved closer, taking the photo from her hand.

"You look so much like him," Harry smiled. "You have the same smile."

"Yes," Maddie nodded; reaching for a tissue to wipe at her eyes. Harry watched as she sat down on the bed in front of him; closing her eyes. She sat there for a minute; breathing, taking it in before she opened her eyes and smiled up at him. "I found the photo and it reminded me that he wouldn't be there; that I would be and he wouldn't." She swallowed the lump in her throat. "I know it's silly."

"It's not silly," he was quick to interrupt.

"I wish he could have known you." God how she wished that these two men could have known each other.

"I wish that too." Maddie nodded, her emotions getting the better part of her.

"How did you do this?" She looked up at him then; face red, eyes puffy. "How did you miss your mother in front of the whole world? I can barely handle it in front of you and you had to..." She trailed off, her heart aching for the little boy she never knew; for the man in front of her.

"I..." Harry's voice cracked as his memories came flooding back. Clearing his throat, he shook his head. "I have had years of training on how to control how much of this..." He pointed to his heart. "Makes it to the surface."

"Yeah?" She wasn't sure that made it any better.

"Yeah," he nodded; moving to place the photo back on the dresser. "I cried in private; to my father, my brother. I slept in bed with my dad for weeks...and when I went out I went with the strength she walked with." He reached down to smooth her hair from her forehead, from her cheek. "I made a lot of mistakes along the way but it got easier."

"Yeah..." She nodded, her face leaning into the warmth of his hand. And just when she thought she might be able to move on from this, just when she thought she had gained control of her tears, they flooded over and her entire chest ached.

"Hey, hey..." He crouched down, moving to her level; his hands moving to hold hers.

"And now we're getting married..." She spoke as silent tears moved down her cheeks. "We're getting married and he won't be there. He was supposed to hold my hand and walk me down that ridiculously long aisle. He was supposed to keep me steady and give me away and..." She looked so young, so innocent as she looked to him; asking for an answer he had no way to give. "Who does that now? Do I walk alone? Does my mother do it? My uncle? Who...who steps into my dad's spot that day?" And because, in that moment, he couldn't speak without breaking down, he adjusted, looking down at their joined hands and taking a breath before looking back to her.

"Listen..." his voice cracked when he spoke. "You tell me what you want. If you want to walk alone or with your mother or your uncle or Bishop..." She cracked a smile and he sighed relief.
"Whatever you want, you tell me. I'll take it to Gran and that will be it. I promise. I promise."

"Yeah?" She arched her eyebrows, fresh tears moving to the forefront.

"Yes." He nodded; heavy and so incredibly protective of this promise he was making. "You talk to your mother while you're there. You figure out what you want to do and we will do that—whatever that is. Okay?" His hand moved so he could stroke her cheek.

"Okay," she nodded. Taking a few deep breaths, she seemed to calm down, seemed to be letting it sit. Her eyes grew soft as she looked up at him. "I'm sorry. I don't know what came over me and..." She felt slightly foolish and incredibly tired.

"Don't be sorry," he shook his head. "Don't apologize for this. Please."

"Kay," she nodded, her face turning in his hand to kiss his palm.

"Okay," he nodded, offering a smile. He moved then, rising and bending to her; kissing her forehead, her lips. He moved slightly, his forehead staying to hers, to look in her eyes. His hand rested at the base of her neck, his thumb rubbing behind her ear as he smiled down at her. It seemed as though the moment was holding onto the multitude of words that had been spoken and even more that had not. Maddie's head tipped up ever so slightly so that her lips could find his again. The kiss was soft and sweet; a kiss that was generally meant to seal things, a kiss you might leave somebody with. But when Harry moved, pulling only an inch away from her, Maddie's hands reached out and her fingers clutched to his shirt; holding him there. Her eyes lifted to his and her lip pulled into her teeth. With a gentle tug, she brought his lips back to hers. She wasn't ready to seal things. She wasn't ready to leave.

"Mmm..." She sighed into his mouth, her hands pulling him closer. There was a moment, a pause, where a wordless exchange of conversation occurred.

Her mouth opened under his, her tongue drawing him in; a silent 'Please. This. Now. '

His hands closed over hers still holding to his shirt, his eyes opening to look into hers; 'Really?'

With the tiniest of nods, Maddie tugged at his shirt, sliding it effortlessly from his body and tossing it to the floor. 'Yes. Really. '

She needed this. She needed him. Since she found that photo of her and her father, her emotions had been a wreck. Thinking of the holiday and of the wedding had drained her. She needed to be replenished. She needed something to fill that empty space that had caved in when she thought of it.

Harry could do that. Harry could kiss her and bring her back to life. Harry could pull his hands into her hair, step into her space—he could fill her lungs with the smell of him, fill her mind with thoughts of him, fill her entire being with him. He could rejuvenate all of her senses, all of her nerves and leave her in a blissful mess instead of this emotional one she had just been.

She knew Harry could do that, would do that. He would do that for her.

There were no words. There was only a heightened, heated, heavy moment where the look on Maddie's face, the sentiment of her kisses passed from sad to please, please fill me up with all of the good you have in you. She needed it. She needed him.
'Heal me. Make me whole.' She pulled him to her then, needing his body over hers, his weight pressing into her.

'Anything. Anything. Anything.' He followed where she lead; willing and ready to do whatever she asked—even if she didn't ask it outright.

He would do that for her.

The mood was serious as Harry moved over her, his body pressing her back into the pillows. He had a fleeting thought that maybe he should remind her of her flight, of the time she had left to finish packing. But the thought drifted just as quickly as it came.

Her hands were possessive as she clutched at him, needing him closer, closer. Her lungs took the air from his, her lips and tongue pulling him in, taking him over. Her legs wrapped around him instantly, her feet pressing into his back as her body arched up to meet his. Her want for him was palpable. Her need for him bordering on desperation.

His attempts at foreplay were brushed aside. She didn't need that in this moment; the touches and the soft, subtle seduction. She didn't need that. She needed him, all of him, every inch of him and she needed him right then.

Hastily, their clothing was removed, tossed to the side and without warning or preamble, he was pushing into her. He was slow and steady and as he moved into her, the tiniest of cries moved from her lips. She blinked at the tears in her eyes and wrapped herself around him, holding him there. She wasn't ready for him to move yet. She wasn't ready for the friction. She just wanted him there, right there, filling every inch of her. She needed the entire length of his body resting against hers. For just a moment.

Harry stayed steady, his body over hers as his hand moved to her face. He pushed her hair from her forehead, his lips finding hers. He kissed her again and again and again, making love to her mouth before he could make love to her body. He held her, cradled her close, waiting for her to give him direction, permission.

And when she did, when she finally released her tight hold on his shoulders and arched her hips away from his, Harry took his cue and began to move. The breathy moan that came from her was primal. The heat in the room was intense. It was so intimate, so personal—the way their eyes never lost contact; the heavy, hot kisses and the deep, slow thrusts. It made Maddie's heart soar and it made Harry struggle to maintain control.

"Please..." Maddie cried out as her head tipped back into her pillow. "Please..." She breathed as Harry's lips moved to her neck, to her chest. "Don't stop. Don't..." Her words fell off her lips as she let out a small gasp.

He could tell that she was struggling. He knew her well enough, was familiar enough with her body that he knew she was struggling—unsure if she wanted fast and hot or slow and burning. He could tell by the way her hips moved to him, by the way her fingers pressed into his back, by the way she nipped at his lips when he kissed her.

Making the decision for her, his hand wrapped around the back of her knee and pulled her leg higher, allowing him deeper access. And he stayed steady; in and out, in and out.

"Please..." She begged, wanting to run from the lump that was forming in her throat, from the burst of emotion she knew would come with following him to the place he was pushing her. He watched as her eyes rolled back, her lids fluttering closed. He watched as her cheeks flushed pink and her lips pulled into her teeth. He watched and he knew.

"Look at me," his voice was heavy, gruff, as hand moved to her neck. He wrapped his fingers around the back of her neck, tilting her back to him, back to the moment. "Open your eyes..." He was not asking. He was demanding. And, because he could make her do anything in that moment, she complied. Her eyes opened and locked with his. His thumb dipped into her mouth as he held her to him. "My God...I love you," he groaned; his free arm wrapping underneath her, pushing her to him.

She couldn't look away from him if she had wanted to. With his forehead pressed to hers, his hand moved down between them, finding home where they were joined together. With the added stroke of his fingers, with his eyes holding hers, he pushed into her; deep, steady; deep and steady.

"Oh..." Maddie sucked in the air between them.

"Yes." Harry nodded encouragingly.

"Harry..." She gasped, her body constricting around him.

"Yes." He commanded.

"Yes." She echoed.

"Yes." He bent to kiss her. "Come on baby..." He whispered into her mouth. "I know you want to let go. Just..."

And she did. She let go.

Of the tension from before.

Of the sadness.

Of the hurt and the upset and the uncertainty.

Of her entire mind, body and soul.

Of any inhibition she had.

She let go.

Despite his very best efforts, Harry found it impossible to keep the smug grin from his face as he held onto her; steady and strong through the waves of her passion. And only when she met his eyes with a silent, commanding, Come with me, did he let go and join her; his hands fist the pillow under her head as he groaned into the soft concave of her neck.

~~~~~~~~~

The silence that enveloped them was so warm, so protective, so amazing that Maddie didn't want to disturb it with her voice. So she stayed there for a moment longer; wrapped around him as her breath steadied, as his heartbeat slowed. She pressed her face to his hot, bare chest and let the silence hold them for just a bit longer. His hand ran through her hair absentmindedly; his lips pressing to the top of her head in the sweetest way.

"Are you okay?" He whispered to her, wanting to protect the silence as much as she.

"I am now," she sighed into him, her head tilting up so she could meet his eyes. And they smiled, together; a bright, beautiful smile that spoke of the joy that now washed over them.

"Good," he tightened his hold on her, still in place over her, still pressing her into their bed.

"I have a flight to catch." She surrendered to reality.

"Ugh..." Harry groaned as his fingers moved along the curves of her body; down her side over her hip. "I knew you were going to say that."

"You're a genius," she smiled up at him, her hand moving up and into his hair; everything about her less tense, more relaxed. "I'm going to miss you."

"And I you," he kissed her, his eyes smiling as a thought came to him. "Listen. Do you think maybe you could come somewhere with me for a moment?"

"Come with you somewhere?" She grinned. "You mean right now?"

"Yes," he nodded.

"But I have..." She laughed at the eager look on his face. "I have a flight to catch."

"You have plenty of time before they summon you to the car."

"Less than an hour," she twisted to glance at the clock. "And if you haven't noticed, I'm completely naked."

"Oh I've noticed," he groaned, his head dipping to kiss her chest as she laughed and swatted at him playfully. As he pulled away, allowing a kiss for her stomach before he sat up, she frowned at his absence. "Come on, love. Put your clothes on, get settled and come with me. There's something I want to show you."

Maddie leaned up on her elbows, glancing around the room. She was basically done packing. All she needed to do was locate what she had been wearing and make sure her on flight bag was ready.

"Okay," she shrugged. "Just let me dress and check one thing and then...I will go with you."

"Fantastic." Harry clapped his hands together. Leaning to kiss her first, he stepped from the bed—pulling her along with him. "Clothes."

"Clothes." Maddie repeated with a matching smile. Never in her life would she be able to find words for just how cleansed she felt after Harry loved her, how whole she felt.

They both hurried about, dressing and packing and moving items to the entryway of their place where the staff would pick them up and load them into the car. The new ease and state of relaxation was evident in the way she walked, the way she spoke; the way she breathed easier.

"Okay Wales," she looked at her watch. "You have thirty minutes. Where are we going?"

"Hmm..." His grin was wicked. "Not quite yet. Coat, scarf, gloves, boots."
"Excuse me?" Maddie laughed as he reached for the landline and dialed.

"Coat. Scarf. Gloves. Boots." He ordered, ignoring her glare and focusing on her grin. "Come on Forrester, we haven't much....Hello." His voice, demeanor and posture changed as somebody answered the line. "It's Harry. We're going to eight and nine right now. Yes. Thank you."

"Eight and Nine?" Maddie was intrigued as she pulled on her second boot. "What is eight and nine?"

"I promise you if you stop stalling, you'll find out," he winked at her, reaching out to hold her coat while she slipped her arms into the sleeves. Very quickly, he dressed himself for the bitter winter nip that awaited them on the other side of the door.

"Fine," she huffed, pulling her stocking cap onto her head. "I'm ready."

"Perfect," he grinned and with a turn of the handle, they were outside. Taking her gloved hand into his, he led her past the waiting SUV, past the driver and Sampson, and across the lawn. He was moving quickly and with great purpose through the grounds.

"Well, we're not leaving the gates," Maddie observed. Harry chuckled at the way her mind instantly began to sort it out. "We left the car and the officers. We're walking alone so we can't be going out... Harry, are you taking me to the roof? I don't know if that's such a..."

"No," he grinned; his cheeks pink from the cold. "Not the roof."

"Okay..." Maddie's skin matched his. "You want to tell me what's going on?"

"No." Firm, definitive; he shook his head.

"Want to give me a hint?" Her hand tugged at his, her eyes growing soft. With a roll of his eyes, he laughed at her.

"Christmas."

"Christmas?" Her face screwed up at his one word response. "Christmas? But....oh no." She stopped short, her hand dropping from his. "Henry Charles. We had an agreement."

"An agreement?" He laughed again.

"If this is a Christmas gift..."

"What? If this is a Christmas gift than what?" He cocked his eyebrow as though she were being unreasonable. "How do you know I'm not living up to that agreement? What are the odds that what I'm about to show you does live up to that agreement?"

"Something we can share?" She turned her head slightly.

"Maybe," he shrugged; smug and smirky.

"Something we can..." Maddie studied his face, glanced around the dark, cold night before seeking his eyes. In them she recognized that flicker that told her—something was up. "What's going on?"
"Come on," he held his hand out to her, his breath coming out in visible puffs as he spoke. "I'll show you."

"Okay." She could do that, let him have this moment. He had, after all, just completely healed her. Her hand was back in his and they were moving.

They didn't walk much further before they took a quick turn and were walking up the short pathway to what appeared to be another apartment at Kensington. Who lived here? She thought. She had spent some of her endless amounts of time at home since their engagement to map out the grounds and get a grasp on who exactly was where. But she really couldn't place a name or a face with this particular residence. With a kiss to her cheek, Harry reached into his pocket for a key. As he walked up the two steps to unlock the door, Maddie chuckled at the thought that, in all the time she had known him, she was pretty sure this was the first time she had seen him with a set of keys.

"Right this way," he nodded to her, pushing the door open to an already lit room. Maddie took a breath and walked past him, her fingers reaching out to trail a path across his chest as she moved through the door; stepping into a large, spacious, empty room. Maddie's eyes scanned the place, taking in the wood flooring, the floor to ceiling windows, the crown molding, the enormous room, the grand stair case. "Harry?" She turned to watch him as he stepped inside, shutting the door behind him.

"Can I ask you something?" He turned the key over in his fingers.

"Sure." She smiled easily.

"How many babies do you really want to have?"

"What?" Maddie laughed but he was completely serious.

"The number eight gets tossed back and forth a lot," he was smiling as he spoke. "But I'm not entirely sure that's really what we want."

"No?" Maddie's eyebrows arched, unable to control the way her body lifted when they talked about children—especially after the way he had loved her less than thirty minutes ago. "The idea of trying to make eight..."

"Madeline..." His voice had warning to it. The definitely didn't have time for another go.

"I don't know Harry," she shrugged, moving freely around the room as she spoke. "I was an only child so the idea of a big family intrigues me..." She reached a bay window on the far wall and turned to look at him; lowering to the bench. "At least two. Maybe four." Her eyes met his and her smile stretched. "How many babies do you really want to have?"

"Hmm..." Harry's lips pressed together in thought, his finger tapping his chin. "I like the idea of two; one for each of us. Once they start to outnumber us..." He shook his head and chuckled. "But four would be great."

"Okay," she couldn't help the way her eyes sparkled at the thought. "Four it is."

"Four it is." His gaze held tight to hers for a moment, that dancing gleam in his eye brightening.

"Harry. I'm leaving for the States in fifteen minutes. What are we..."
"My place is too small," he cut her off.

"Too small?" Maddie laughed.

"Yes," he nodded. "The place we live in right now is too small for the two of us and four babies."

"Okay. But..."

"We can move here." He spread his hands out as if he were presenting the room to her. "I've spoken to my grandmother, to my brother and, if it meets your expectations, if it would suit you...we can move here."

"If it meets my...Harry..." Maddie's eyes were wide; she was speechless.

"There are plenty of rooms," he spoke softly. "The kitchen is incredible. We would need to do some renovations. We could put in a huge tub in the master suite, there's a room upstairs for a library..."

"Harry..."

"It was my mother's." That did it. Maddie's eyes welled with tears. She swallowed at the lump in her throat, wanting desperately not to dissolve into a mess for the umpteenth time that night.

"Your mother's?" She smiled up at him through teary eyes. "You...you lived here when you were little?"

"Yes," he nodded; sighing as he took a seat next to her. "Will and I lived here as children. She lived here until..." He cleared his throat and looked to his shoes for a moment.

"And you..." She was soft with him, gentle; giving back what he had given her when she thought of her dad. Her hand ran down his back. "Now you want to have our children here?"

"Hmm..." The smile pulled at his faced, pulled him from his melancholy. Babies did that to him, babies with her did that to him. "If you say it's okay..." His eyes seemed tired when he turned to look at her, his forehead lifting in question. Maddie reached for his hand, conviction already setting in.

"You said there was a library?" She nudged his shoulder with hers.

"There could be."

"Well come on sunshine," she moved to her feet, taking his hand with her. "I don't have much time left in London and if we're going to figure out which room goes to the babies and which room goes to the books..." She had to stop, had to take a breath; Harry's eyes were so happy, she had to pause to mark that.

"Yeah?" His thumb rubbed at the back of her hand.

"Are you kidding?" Maddie whispered; tugging at his hand again. "Absolutely yes."

"Okay," he was beaming as he stood. His hands clapped together and his face shone. "Here's what I was thinking..."
For ten minutes they went from room to room; taking in the entire floor plan. Harry was animated as he spoke, explaining what the room had been, what it could be. Maddie was warmed from head to toe as he told of his plans for their home; for their future. She was touched when he shrugged and told her that, of course, she could disregard any of the suggestions he had made. Then, standing in the room that would be theirs, he stopped moving, stopped talking. He pulled her to him; his arms wrapping around her, holding her tight and close and safe in his arms for the second time that night. His face buried into her hair as he sighed; accepting that his time had run out. He needed to get her back. She needed to get to the airport.

"I'll miss you too," Maddie put voice to his thoughts; her fingers pushing into the hair at his neck.

"I'll be out in a week. We'll bring in the New Year in..." He pulled back slightly, having forgotten the name.

"Beaver Creek," she smiled. "They have a cabin there for the holiday."

"Big enough for Jim and Nathan and Sampson and Arthur?"

"Big enough for them too," she assured him; having gone over it and over it with her cousin Kyle who had done the booking.

"Okay," he sighed; his hands moving to rub her arms. "Come on, love. They're waiting for you."

"They'll wait for just one more minute," she smiled, tipping up on her toes to kiss him. It wasn't quite the request her earlier kisses had been, but it pulled him in nonetheless.

"Hmm..." He chuckled against her lips. "I think you're going to take marvelously to your role as a Duchess."

"Ha!" She laughed, pulling away from him and taking his hand. "It was bound to happen someday."

"It was," Harry nodded, leading her from the room. Maddie held tight to him as they descended the stairs, as they turned off the lights and stepped back into the cold; locking the door behind them.

She cuddled close to his arm as they walked back to the waiting SUV, now completely packed and ready to roll. The Security officers faded into the night as Harry reached to open her door for her.

"I love you," Maddie minced no words as she wrapped her arms around him. "Thank you for..." Her cheeks flushed. "Thank you for loving me like you do."

"Hmm..." He grinned, knowing exactly where her mind had gone. "Happy to." He hugged her tight and pushed his lips to hers. "Call me when you land in Colorado?"

"Yes." She nodded. "Give my love to the family."

"Of course," he agreed. "Oh!" He dropped his hold on her then. Reaching into his pocket, he produced a set of keys with a bright red ribbon. "Merry Christmas, love."

"Merry Christmas," she echoed, taking the keys lovingly from his hand; her voice dropping to a whisper. "I can't wait to put babies in there with you."

"Come here," he pulled her in for another kiss.

"I'll see you soon," she nuzzled against him one last time before she stepped back.

"You will," he nodded, already missing her as she slipped into the warm vehicle. "I love you Madeline."

"And I love you," she grinned, leaning to kiss him once more before he shook his head slowly, committing her smile to memory as he shut her door—tapping twice on the cold metal.

As Harry stepped back from the large, black vehicle, the team stepped up. And with absolutely no haste, they were driving away from him. He stood and watched as they turned a corner and moved from his sight before he hurried to the warmth of his home; their home.

And he missed her instantly.

Maddie took a deep breath as they passed through the gates of Kensington Palace, allowing the events of the last two hours to settle over her. If it hadn't been for Harry, she would have been in a horrible mood; distraught and upset. But she wasn't. She was smiling and relaxed and thinking of their future family. Reaching into her bag for her phone, wanting to call her mother and let her know she was en route, her hand fell upon something unexpected.

"What is..." Her words ceased. There in her hand was a bag of her Christmas candy with a small note attached. 'Just as I promised. All my love-H.'

Duke. Duchess. Then babies. Maddie reminded herself; sinking into the soft leather seat and letting the warmth, the joy, flood right over her. Her smile stretched wide.

She was ready for the holidays.
Chapter 86

After a ten hour flight and close to two hours of driving, Maddie and her crew finally made it to her childhood home in the middle of the night. And her mother was waiting. Clad in a bathrobe and sleepy eyes, she greeted them at the door. She hugged Maddie tight before meeting Arthur and Sampson and inviting them in to look around and get settled in their space. Maddie loved that her mother seemed to just roll with the idea that she now traveled with an armed officer at all hours of the day and night. Hannah hugged Maddie again, kissed her cheeks and promised they could catch up in the morning. And then she watched as her mother slipped back downstairs, already half asleep.

After a short phone call to a sleepy and half-awake Harry, Maddie cuddled under a blanket on the couch; the tree twinkling in the dark room next to the fireplace and she settled into her home. She wasn't tired, not in the least. After her own personal, red-haired, sleep-aid, Maddie had slept through the entire flight. She laid there on the couch, enjoying the peaceful stillness of it all until just before the sun came up and then she drifted off to sleep. She was still there, snug on the couch, when her mother finally re-emerged from her room; refreshed and dressed. Hannah sat down next to her, watching her for a moment before she began to gently nudge her awake.

"Madeline..." Hannah sang.

"Mmm..." Maddie moaned softly, turning a bit towards her mother.

"You probably shouldn't have slept on the couch..."

"No," Maddie groaned, her eyes pulling open. "It was really only a nap."

"Gary and Jenna are on their way over for breakfast," Hannah relaxed back. "They've been dying to see you. I hope you don't mind..."

"I don't mind," Maddie shook her head as she sat up, her eyes opening wide. She was happy they were coming. One of the best things about coming home was the abundance of family, the family she missed. "Okay. I'll wake up." She ran her hand back and through her hair.

"Well, well. Would you look at this..." Hannah took Maddie's left hand in hers, smiling down at the glistening ring on her finger. "And I thought it looked beautiful in the box..."

"You saw it in the box?" Maddie smiled up at her mother.

"Harry brought it with him when he flew out before..."

"Of course he did," Maddie sighed as she thought of him, as she thought of him traveling to Colorado with the ring to see her mother. "That must have been quite the meeting, no?"

"Hmm..." Hannah grinned as she thought of it.

"Was he terribly nervous?" Maddie raised her eyebrows.

"If he was, he didn't show it," Hannah shook her head.

"He is pretty smooth."
"I would say confident," Hannah laughed lightly.

"That he is."

"Yes."

"Okay." Maddie clapped her hands together. "I'm going to go shower and change before they get here." She tossed her blanket aside and rose to her feet, walking to the tree. "You only put on the lights."

"Of course," Hannah nodded, rising to join her daughter. "We'll string the popcorn and cranberries tonight and finish decorating tomorrow on..."

"Christmas Eve," Maddie finished. It was tradition—had been since she was young. Maddie allowed both the lump in her throat and the wide smile. Her eyes drifted from the tree up to the mantel. Passing over the photos, her eyes went directly to a new addition. "Look at this..." Her hand reached for the framed photo of her and Harry, from their engagement announcement at Buckingham Palace.

"Ah..." Hannah moved closer, her eyes dancing as she took in the photo. "Charles sent that after your announcement, with the nicest note..."

"He did?" This was news to Maddie.

"He did," Hannah nodded. "It was very sweet. And incredibly thoughtful."

"Yeah. They really know how to work that English charm, no?"

"I suppose so," Hannah laughed at the look on her daughter's face. "You look incredibly happy."

"Yeah, well. It was a crazy day," Maddie nodded to the picture as she sat it back on the mantel.

"No..." Hannah crossed her arms over her chest. "I meant right now."

"Ah..." Maddie sighed and turned a wide smile to her mother. "I am happy. I'm...I'm really happy."

"Good. Now. Go shower. Gary and Jenna are on their way and we have a big day ahead of us."

"Yes." Maddie clapped her hands together. "I'm on it."

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

"Seriously Maddie, that engagement interview was fantastic. You looked so amazing..." Jenna gushed over coffee and pancakes.

"Thank you Jenna. But I take very little credit for that. I had stylists and a hairdresser and..." Maddie chuckled as she remembered it. "And a shot of Tequila."

"Nice," Gary shook his head as they all laughed.

"Thank you."

"You know...There's a pool at work over what tiara you'll wear."

"What?!" Maddie had to laugh at that.

"There is!" Jenna nodded. "It's so ridiculous. People are incredibly invested in this wedding. It's like...I don't know. The Super Bowl..."

"It's nothing like the Super Bowl," Gary shook his head and Maddie laughed.

"Fine. It's like a Disney story coming to life..."

"Oh-kay," Maddie adjusted in her chair, looking her long-time friend and cousin-in-law in the eye. "You do know that it has nothing to do with Disney, right?"

"Oh God yes!" Jenna rolled her eyes and laughed. "Sorry. I totally get it. I'm just saying the world has gone..."

"Yeah," Maddie agreed, swallowing back some coffee. "Hey. You want me to tell you?"

"Tell me what?"

"The tiara. You want me to tell you what tiara I'm wearing? You can clean house in the office pool."

"Ha!" Jenna clapped her hands a couple of times. "No, thanks though. I prefer to stay out of it all together, you know? It's easier that way. Once I start answering questions or participating, they're just going to come at me all the time. It's best if I steer clear of it all."

"Wow..." Maddie sat in awe for a moment.

"What?"

"It just...it took me so long to understand that. Nicely done," she squeezed Jenna's hand across the table. "Listen. Is everyone coming tomorrow?"

"To Christmas Eve?" Gary raised his eyebrows. "Yeah. Everyone's coming."

"Yeah, but I mean...a little earlier..." Maddie reached for her coffee.

"For the wedding informational session?" Gary's voice was sarcastic. "Yeah. Everyone's coming. You told us if we didn't come to the session, we couldn't come to the wedding."

"I did?" She smiled sweetly, defiance twinkling in her eyes.

"Yes." He glared. "And just a fair warning, if you don't have alcohol at this informational session, you're going to have a revolt on your hands."

"Got it."

"A whole different kind of tea party."
"Nice," Maddie rolled her eyes. "I'll have booze. Mom, can we add booze to the shopping list for this afternoon."

"Absolutely."

After a day of shopping, Maddie and her mother had finished their wrapping, finished a light dinner, and now—glasses of wine within reach—they were stringing up popcorn and cranberries to use the next day when they marked tradition and decorated the Christmas tree. The nervousness, the sadness she had felt before she left London had evaporated into this wonderful need to see to it that she and her mother carried through all of their old traditions; the cranberries, the stockings, A Christmas Story—they were making every effort to honor their history on what would be Maddie's last Christmas at home—even without her father being there to celebrate with them.

"Remember when you were little, how you always wanted to be the Baton girl that started the Christmas Parade?" Hannah smiled at Maddie across the bowls of popcorn and cranberries.

"I do!" Maddie laughed, covering her mouth to keep from spitting her wine. "I wanted that so bad! And it was always...what was her name..." Her eyes squinted in thought.

"Susie Bender!" Hannah exclaimed.

"Yes! Susie Bender!" Maddie sighed and then shrugged. "I bet they'd let me be the damn Baton girl now."

"I bet they would." Hannah nodded in agreement.

"Mom..." Maddie smiled as she laid the string of corn and berries onto the table. "There's something I want to talk to you about."

"Okay," Hannah answered casually.

"So." Maddie took a deep breath. "I'm getting married."

"Ah yes, I've heard," Hannah laughed over her wine glass. "To a Prince, is it?"

"Yes," she laughed, easing up slightly.

"Well, if you're asking for my approval, you know you have it. Harry is a great guy. Everyone likes him. They took a vote."

"They took a vote?" She laughed, temporarily side tracked.

"It's a thing your cousins are trying out," she shrugged and took another sip from her wine. "Don't worry. It's unanimous. Everyone approves."

"Good to know," Maddie shook her head. "But that's not what I wanted to ask."

"No?"

"No," she took a deep breath and met her eyes. "I want you to give me away." The impact of her words was visible on Hannah's face as she took the emotional hit.

"Madeline..." Hannah breathed; the sadness wafting over her. This was one of those moments—a moment he would have given anything to have been there for, a moment that she would forever feel a void in.

"I'm getting married in six months and I need somebody to walk me down the aisle, somebody to hand me over to Harry, somebody to stand next to me," she tried to hurry, tried to get it all out before she started crying. "I need somebody to keep me grounded and strong and to keep me from losing it...I need somebody to stand where dad would have stood, to be his strength for the day..."

"And you want me?"

"I do."

"What..." Hannah cleared her throat. "What did Harry say? Have you talked to him about this?"

"Harry and I talked about it and he said that I should decide what I want to do and he would take whatever that decision was to The Queen...to his grandmother and that would be it."

"Wow."

"Yeah," Maddie smiled, her eyes growing soft as she thought of the man she was going to marry, the amazing man she was going to marry. She smiled at her mother, sincerity flooding her face. "You can tell me no, mom. You can tell me that you would rather watch from your seat and that you don't want that kind of pressure or that you don't want to read the stories they would print or...you can tell me no and I won't be mad or sad or upset or...you can tell me no, mom." Hannah shook her head; one hand holding onto her daughter's while the other wiped at her eyes. Maddie hurried with her speech. "You would have to come out early. You would have to go through some serious rehearsals. You would have to wear..."

"Yes." Hannah managed to find her voice. She blinked at the tears in her eyes, took big, deep breaths.

"They'll write about you and talk about you. They will talk about dad dying and..."

"I would be honored," she cut in again.

"Yeah?" Her eyebrows lifted as the tears welled up.

"Yeah." She nodded; pushing away from her chair so she could hug her. Pressing a kiss to her cheek, she pulled her into her arms. "I would be honored to represent your father, to stand strong for you...to turn you over to Harry."

"Thank you," Maddie laughed through the tears in her eyes. "Thank you mom."

"Of course," Hannah laughed along with her daughter, both of them wiping at tears. "Of course."

"I thought we would at least make it till tomorrow night before I broke down," Maddie blew air through her lips as she fanned her hands towards her face.

"Yeah..." Hannah nodded and sniffed. "Well. For what it's worth, I'm sure it won't be the last."
"Okay everyone," Maddie clapped her hands together and turned to the room full of her family. Her mother, uncle, cousins, spouses, and her grandmother had all assembled in her mother's family room at Maddie's request. She knew long before she left London that they were all going to have a million questions for her about the wedding and she thought it would be best to answer them all at once. "I really appreciate everyone coming early so that we could talk about the wedding."

"Of course, darling," her grandmother smiled warmly as the cousins chuckled at the way she made it sound like they had a choice.

"First, I really want to tell you..." She paused for a moment and then continued. "It means a lot to me that you are all coming out. I know that it's going to be a lot...the travel, the planning, the rules...it's a lot. But it means so much to me that you're willing to take it all on."

"Wouldn't miss it," Kyle met her eyes.

"And I just want to thank you...not only for coming to the wedding but for everything. You've been so incredibly supportive and I know it hasn't been easy. I know people ask you things and say things and...thank you. Thank you for having my back on this."

"Always," Derek smiled up at her.

"Thank you," she sighed. "Okay. Here's what's happening. I wanted to give you some information, a rundown of events and protocol surrounding the wedding and then, I will be happy to answer any and all questions you might have about any of it."

"Ten bucks says she made packets," Derek muttered to the cousins under his breath.

"You're on," Gary nodded.

"So..." Maddie reached into her bag and pulled out a stack of folders. "I put together some folders for you."

"Damn it." Gary groaned, pulling his wallet from his pocket to pay his brother.

"In the folder..." Maddie's eyes narrowed.

"Packet," Derek interjected, sending a rumble through the group.

"In the packet," Maddie smirked. "Are all of the details about the wedding; where you need to be, when you need to be there. First, the wedding is at St. Paul's Cathedral promptly at eleven o'clock. I have cars lined up to have you there when you're supposed to be there which is..." She flipped through her notes. "Ten. You will be escorted to your seats. Following the ceremony, you will be taken to Buckingham Palace where there will be a luncheon for all of the guests. You will have a bit of a break after the luncheon and that evening there will be a private reception back at Buckingham Palace. This will be more in line with what you think of when you think of a wedding reception."

"Except the Queen of England will be there," Hannah offered.

"Exactly," Maddie smiled. "You will have a car and driver available to you the entire time. They will know when and where you need to be. They will pick you up at the house in enough time to have you to St. Paul's. They will take you back to the house between the receptions, allowing you time to relax and change."

"Maddie," Gary raised his hand. "You keep saying, the house..."

"Ah yes!" She grinned. "The Middleton have generously offered to allow you all to stay in one of their homes while you're in London. There is enough space for all of you to be there, over eight bedrooms on acres of land. They have made it available for three weeks before the wedding through three weeks after the wedding...in case you want to sneak in a vacation."

"Wow..." Her grandmother smiled. "That's very sweet of them to do that."

"Yes," Maddie smiled with a nod. "It is. I know that this is, for most of you, the first time you've come to England...or Europe for that matter and nobody wants you to have to live at a hotel for an extended amount of time so a house just made sense. But, if you would prefer to stay at a hotel a few nights or travel to another country, that won't be a problem. Just make sure you tell my travel agent that when you call to set up your dates. Which reminds me..." Maddie pulled out another sheet. "I need you all to contact my travel agent, Gerilynn. She needs to know when you are planning on coming, when you are leaving and what sort of plans you want to make while you're there. She will take care of the flights, the cars; everything. And then she'll send me the bill."

"Maddie..." Dena's eyes went wide, her head shaking slowly. "That is...incredibly generous. You truly do not need to..."

"Don't worry about it," Maddie waved her hand; dismissing the issues in much the same way she had seen Harry do. "Please. I want you all to be there. It's...it's so important to me to have you all there and this is not at all a normal wedding and I have quite a bit of money in savings and...it's not an issue. So please. Please just...take what time you want off from work, figure out what you want to do while you're there and just...let me and my travel agent handle the rest. Okay?"

"Okay," Dena nodded. "Thank you."

"You're welcome," Maddie smiled as the others echoed Dena's sentiment. "Moving on...You should all be expecting a phone call from Joan Schuler. She is coordinating the wedding and she will work with the men to get your sizes for your suits and she will work with the ladies to arrange for hats or fascinators to go with your dresses. Yes you have to wear them. There is no negotiating this."

"Is there a dress code?" Amy asked. "Other than the hats, is there a hem requirement or..."

"Yes," Maddie nodded. "There is a sheet in here about what is appropriate for St. Paul's and the luncheon and then a looser dress code and guidelines for the evening reception."

"Great," Amy nodded.

"Speaking of dress code," Maddie sighed. "I want to talk for a moment about protocol with the Royal Family. There are a few pages of colored pictures, with names and titles of Harry's family. If you could all take those out, I want to start with who's who."

"Hey look!" Kyle's excitement brought a bit of laughter to the group. "It's Harry. I know him!"

"Hold up," Derek moved forward in his seat, finding a serious moment in all the frivolity. "His "Actual name is Henry?"

"No," Amy shook her head. "His actual name is His Royal Highness Prince Henry of Wales."

"Seriously?" Derek looked up at her.

"No," Maddie shook her head with a smile.

"That is his title," Jenna offered. "His name is actually Henry Charles Albert David...Wales? Windsor? I don't know..." She looked to Maddie with the same raised eyebrows as Derek.

"Okay," Maddie's voice was calm. "Everyone take a breath. I'll walk you through it." She tried to bring comfort to the room. "Let's start at the top. This..." She pointed. "Is the Queen of England."

"We're not idiots, Maddie. We know who the Queen of England is," Derek rolled his eyes. "Maybe you should start at the bottom. Who's at the bottom?"

"You," Kyle nodded to his brother and laughter erupted.

"Lovely," Maddie laughed, sighed and sank onto the couch. As Maddie reached for her drink, it was her quiet Uncle Patrick who brought it all home.

"Maddie...this list...it's put together based on order to the throne, no?"

"Yes," Maddie nodded, sipping from her glass. "Why?"

"It's just..." He smiled at his niece, feeling silly for only now realizing it. "Harry is...close to the top."

"Yes," Maddie nodded, a wave of seriousness washing over the room as they all focused on the sheets in their hands.

"I mean, after the Queen, he's...one, two...three. Third."

"Yes." Maddie nodded. This wasn't news to her, but she absolutely understood the impact the realization had.

"So..." Jenna looked down at the paper in her hands. "If something happens to William before he has children then Harry would be..." Her eyes rose, large as saucers.

"The King of England," Kyle finished her thought; the solemnity in the room deepening.

"Yes," Maddie nodded. "If something happened to William before he had children then...eventually...Harry would become the Sovereign."

"Wow..." Gary breathed, sitting back in his chair.

"Yes," Maddie nodded again; trying to wade through her mucked up feelings on the issue—trying to stay focused and not get drawn off into the land of a very real 'what if'.

"But then that would mean that you..." Amy pointed at her and all eyes focused on Maddie; wide and amazed as it dawned on them.
"Yes," she gulped, took a breath, and took her opportunity to control the conversation again. "That is a possibility...an unlikely one, but a possibility all the same."

"Wow..." Even her grandmother was shocked.

"Yes." Maddie smiled and cleared her throat. "Now. The Queen..." She turned to the papers. "You address her as Your Majesty the first time you meet her. After that, it is acceptable to call her Ma'am. She is not Your Highness. She is not Your Royal Highness. She is Your Majesty. It's incredibly important that you understand that. When you speak of her, you can call her The Queen or Her Majesty..."

"Do we...I'm sorry," Jenna apologized for cutting her off. "Do we curtsy?" Maddie grinned.

"Well...here's the thing. The Queen doesn't expect you to curtsy and bow. The family doesn't expect you to curtsy and bow."

"But?"

"But...they are probably going to be the only people in England who do not." Maddie sighed. "If you do then the stories will probably be about the American's coming to England and bowing before the Queen. If you don't, then the stories will be about the Clampetts visiting Buckingham Palace, if you know what I'm saying."

"Now there's untapped movie potential," Kyle cracked a much needed joke.

"Yes," Maddie laughed. "Look, it really is entirely up to you. I just want you to know the outcomes of both decisions."

"What about you?" Kyle asked. "What would you prefer we do?"

"Hmmm..." She smiled. "I would prefer that you curtsy to the Queen, to the Duke of Edinburgh, and to Harry's father and Camilla. And, even though it would probably make him uncomfortable, Harry's brother. If you don't want to do the others, that's fine. But those four are either the current Sovereign or in direct line to be and I would appreciate it if you would."

"Seems reasonable to me," Patrick answered for the group, his eyes scanning them all. "It's a moment in our lives and I think you're the one who has to deal with the outcome of it so...I think we can all do that. Right?" He looked at the group who all quickly fell in line and nodded their agreement. Nobody in the room wanted to make this more complicated for Maddie than it needed to be.

"Wait," Amy spoke up. "I'm sorry. I know this is just my American ignorance here but...how. How do we curtsy?"

"Ah yes," Maddie smiled and reached into the folder. "On this DVD are a few short instructional videos from you tube. You can check those out. Also on the disc is William and Catherine's wedding just...so that you can get an idea as to the flow of things."

"Awesome," Amy nodded. "Thank you."

"Hey Maddie? Can I ask you a question?" Dena spoke up.

"Of course."
"You're...you're really not going to be an American anymore?"

"No," Maddie shook her head. "I'm not. I've passed all of the required tests for citizenship and after the first of the year, I will have met my residency requirement and my application will be filed. Once the application is approved..."

"You'll be what? An English citizen?"

"British," she corrected. "I'll be a British citizen."

"You're not going to do some sort of dual citizenship?" Gary asked, intrigued by the process.

"Nope."

"Wow..."

"Will you still be able to do American things?" Derek asked.

"Like what?" Maddie smiled.

"I don't know...sing the National Anthem?"

"Oh I'll sing a National Anthem, it will just be different from yours."

"You won't get to vote for the President anymore," Gary pointed out, knowing her love for that particular civic duty.

"Nope," she shook her head. "I'll have a Queen now."

"Harry's grandmother," Amy grinned, still processing the craziness in that sentiment.

"Yes," Maddie nodded. "And a Prime Minister."

"Do you vote for him?"

"It is an elected position but I won't vote. I can't."

"Because you used to be an American?" Jenna guessed.

"No. Because I'll be a member of the Royal Family. We do not vote. We remain politically neutral."

"Wow..." Dena shook her head. "The Royal Family."

"Yes," Maddie smiled sweetly, understanding how odd it sounded.

"What about the Fourth of July?" Gary asked.

"What about it?"

"It was your favorite holiday," He pointed out, remembering childhood barbeques and parties. "Surely you're not able to celebrate like you used to, like we used to..."
"No. No I can't. I suppose Harry and I will celebrate differently."

"How?" Kyle lifted his eyebrows.

"By re-enacting the Revolutionary War," Maddie responded with a straight face. "Maybe I'll occasionally let Harry win." She winked, effectively managing to lift the mood in the room as they laughed.

"I can't believe you're going to be a Princess..." Dena shook her head.

"That's because I'm not going to be a Princess," Maddie pointed out, taking another drink.

"Wait..."

"Harry will be made a Duke right before the wedding," she explained as though she had heard it a million times; maybe she had. "So I'll be a Duchess."

"Like the Duchess of Cambridge?"

"Exactly," Maddie pointed at Jenna.

"What will you be the Duchess of?"

"Hmm..." Maddie let the smile flicker across her face, an inside joke running through her mind. "Sussex. The Duchess of Sussex."

"Wow."

"Right?"

"And you'll live at the palace?"

"I will live at a palace. I'm not sure which one you're thinking of but..."

"Which one? How many are there?"

"I don't want to tell you."

"Fine. Which one will you live at?"

"Kensington," Maddie's face grew bright as she remembered Harry's gift to her just before she left London. "There are apartments there that are nothing like what you think an apartment is," she laughed. "The one we're moving into..."

"Moving into?" Hannah cut in. "I thought Harry had a place at Kensington."

"He did," Maddie was quick to answer. "He does. We do. It's just...we want to have children someday and it's not big enough so...we're moving into his mother's old apartment."

"Holy..." Jenna sat back in her chair slowly, her mind processing the information.

"You're going to live in Diana's place?" Even her grandmother was stunned.
"Yes," Maddie smiled, remembering the joy in Harry's eyes.

"Wow," Dena sighed. "Seriously, Maddie...does the history ever just..."

"Take my breath away?" Maddie finished the thought.

"Yeah."

"Sometimes," she nodded truthfully. "Being at Buckingham Palace still blows my mind and honestly, it probably always will. But the other stuff, it's kind of settled in a bit. It's become more a part of my everyday life and it gets a little easier every day to sit in it. But this wedding...it's going to be a great big deal. There are going to be foreign heads of state there; Queens, Kings..."

"Will the President be there?"

"Of the United States?" Maddie asked, laughing internally that she had to seek clarification.

"Yes."

"Yes," she nodded, glancing down at her hands. "The President and the First Lady will be there."

"I'm not even sure what to say to that," Patrick shook his head in awe.

"Yeah. I know..." Maddie smiled sympathetically.

"Forget them," Jenna chuckled. "Maddie's in laws are going to be Charles and Camilla! Can you even imagine..."

"Yeah," Maddie took a breath. "Listen. I know this is all a little crazy. I get that. I mean...it's not just a wedding. It's...there's a Queen and Prince Charles is going to be there and...and you watched his wedding to Diana, you watched them become parents. And maybe you've even read some of the books and interviews and maybe you know some of what happened between the two of them. I know that. And maybe...maybe you already have an opinion formed. But please, please. Keep this in mind. You know Harry. You've met him, you've had meals with him, you've spent time with him. And these...these are his parents, his family. Diana wasn't The People's Princess...she was his mother. So. Before you let it sweep you away, before you get caught up in that...try to remember that. Trust me, it will be hard at first. But you'll get it. And if you have any questions, please...ask me." The room stayed still, silent for a beat before Kyle cleared his throat and broke the tension.

"I actually have a serious question."

"Yes?" She smiled up at him, tired and thankful for his voice.

"Do you curtsy to Harry? I mean...you know...for fun?" His eyebrows wagged.

"Ha!" Maddie was the first to laugh, setting off the domino effect to the group. "No. No, I do not curtsy to Harry."

"Good to know," Kyle winked at her. "Wow, Maddie. You're getting married..."

"I am."
"To a Prince."

"Yes," she grinned. "Is it too much? All of this, is it too much?"

"No way." Gary answered, patting her hand.

"Of course not," Derek shook his head.

"We're in," Kyle assured her. "We like to give you a hard time but like dad said...we're all on board."

"Good," Maddie let out a long breath. "Now. Can we take a break? I need a drink."

"As you wish, your highness," Amy winked as she moved from her seat, the room shuffling around as they transitioned from meeting to party.

"Actually," Maddie sighed dramatically. "It will be Your Royal Highness."

"Oh good God," Kyle groaned. "I'm not sure I'm going to be able to handle this..."

And, with a rumble of laughter and a smattering of hugs and kisses, the group was effectively moving on.

All of their family traditions stayed in place that Christmas. They watched "A Christmas Story," they ate Chinese food, they went to church and then they came back to Hannah’s and opened gifts late into the night as the drinking and merriment continued. After everyone went home, Maddie climbed into her bed with a smile on her face and warmth in her heart. She was so incredibly thankful for her family—for the amazing group of people that had assembled into this wonderful collection of souls. She was so lucky.

And then it hit her again. This was her last Christmas at home, her last with this wonderful group of people. She willed the tears away, trying to push down the sadness that inevitably came with something like this, trying to replace it with the overwhelming love she had for Harry.

But she couldn't help it. Ultimately the tears came—even though the smile remained in place. And the next morning, Christmas Day, over the requisite pancakes and stocking stuffers, Maddie listened more closely to her mother, hugged her tighter; she made it a point to commit these moments to memory because, soon, that was all she would have of her small, quaint Christmas.
"Madeline!" Jenna called to Maddie who was loading her bag into the back of their SUV.

"Jenna!" Maddie called back, leaning around the side of the vehicle to look at her.

"Your phone is ringing!" Jenna was already inside, buckled and ready to roll. "Here!" She called as she held it out the window. Maddie, laughing at the easy atmosphere that surrounded the group, even at this early hour, as they packed up to head into the mountains for a long weekend. Maddie, Gary, and Jenna were riding together through Denver to pick up Derek and Dena (who were leaving their little girls with grandpa) and the five of them—and Maddie's security detail—would be meeting Kyle and Amy at the place they had rented in Beaver Creek. A quick glance at her screen drew a wide, silly grin to her face.

"My darling!" She exclaimed as she answered the phone. "My love...my life..." She could hear his laugh before she heard his voice.

"Good morning," he drawled. "Have you been drinking already?"

"No," she sighed happily. "I'm on a natural high. I get to see my man tonight."

"Of course."

"I can't wait to see you Harry," her voice lowered suggestively. "I want you here with me. Now."

"I'm boarding a plane as we speak, love." He didn't care that she was being bossy, ordering him around—his grin stretched further. "I'll see you before the night is over."

"Thank God!" She sighed.

"You know..." Harry laughed as he handed his bag over and looked at the plane. "I have made an executive decision. You can't be this far away from me again."

"Agreed," Maddie's cheeks hurt from the smile that pulled at her cheeks as the flirtation began.

"I've actually considered having your passport revoked."

"Well there's really no need for that as I have no intention of leaving your bed again..."

"Ha..." His laugh was low, gravelly; hiding the rush of need and want that flooded his body. "You say that now."

"I mean that now."

"What about the tub?" He lifted an eyebrow.

"Excellent point," she nodded and sighed; missing him more than she had before the call. "You're on a plane right now?"

"Just about," he looked to the steps, lowered and waiting for him. "You're on the road to the mountains?"
"The car is loaded. They are just waiting for me to get in and..."

"Go." He waved his hand as though she were there. "Get in the car. I'll see you soon."

"Call me when you land?"

"Yes."

"Kiss me when you arrive?"

"Be careful what you wish for."

"I hope you're well rested and hydrated when you get here."

"I love you Maddie."

"Love you too Harry." And with bright, shiny eyes and a blush of a smile, Maddie ended their phone call and moved to join her cousins in the SUV.

The trip into the mountains was relatively short and full of humor. They laughed the entire way in, even when the snowfall began, even as it grew heavier. And, when they finally arrived, Maddie's security team worked quickly, checking the place out before they all moved their stuff in.

They had been doing this since they were children. Their parents would rent a huge cabin and everyone would go to the mountains to celebrate the New Year. It wasn't until recently that their parents bowed gracefully out and let the cousins continue the tradition. Kyle and Amy had already arrived and had already begun the celebrations. After Maddie settled into what would be her and Harry's suite—right across from the set of rooms that would house their security detail—she hurried downstairs to the wide, open living room/game room to partake in the festivities.

And that's exactly where she was, hours later, when the sun gave way to the moon and Harry's arrival drew imminently closer. They had ordered pizza from a consistently amazing local pizza place and the bar was incredibly well stocked. And, though they had every intention of hitting the slopes first thing the next morning, they also had every intention of knocking back a few that night. Maddie kept a close eye on Arthur, knowing that he would know before she that Harry was there, and she sipped happily from her fourth glass of wine.

"Okay, Maddie..." Amy's face was flushed red from the wine and the laughter that flowed so easily with this group. "Can I ask you a few more questions about this whole...royalty thing?" Her eyes flashed wide when she smiled the word royalty.

"You can ask me anything you want before Harry gets here," Maddie waved her hand; feeling open and honest with her family around her. She preferred they ask rather than assume or go to another source for their information.

"Okay. So." Amy took a breath and grinned. "After the wedding, will people have to curtsy to you?" Maddie rolled her eyes with a sigh.

"Have to? Not necessarily..." She sighed again. "But they probably will. Not everybody though...but...yes. I will be a curtsiable person after the wedding."
"Right after the wedding?"

"Umm..." She bit on her cheek as she thought about it. "I think so. I mean...yes. I think so. Harry will be a Duke and then I'll be his wife so...Yes."

"So when we see you at any one of your receptions..." Amy's eyes flickered in a devious sort of way. "We should curtsy to you?"

"Oh God," Maddie groaned, her head tilting back. "No. No you should not curtsy to me. No."

"Will everyone else be curtsying to you?" Dena couldn't help but join in on this conversation.

"Some will—probably. I don't know." Maddie shrugged and took another drink. "This is my first royal wedding too."

"Fair enough," Amy laughed along with her. "It's really going to be something, huh?"

"Yes," Maddie nodded. "It really is."

"Hey ladies!" Kyle called out as he and the other two men rejoined them, fresh beers in hand. "What are we talking about?"

"Maddie's new life," Jenna answered him, tilting her lips up to kiss Gary as he sat next to her.

"Ah..." Derek chuckled. "I was actually wondering..."

"Yes?" Maddie turned a smile to him, amused by the direction the conversation was taking.

"Your security detail...they go with you everywhere? Or did they just have to come with you on this trip because you left England without Harry?" Maddie's eyes met with Arthur and they shared a smile—they had gone through the bumps and turns that came with the beginning of this new, unique relationship, and now they felt incredibly comfortable in it all.

"They are with me wherever I go," Maddie offered a wink at Arthur who shook his head at her with a toned down smile. "Except when we're at the Palace. When we're behind gates or secured areas, they don't have to be right with me. But when we're out in London, they are out with me. Just like they are now."

"Is it always two?"

"Nah," she shook her head. "It depends on what we're doing, where we're at. There is always one officer with me, with me. And usually there is one in the car. But again, it all depends."

"Have you had any incidents?" Derek, having been in the military, had a unique interest in it all. When Maddie's eyes met Arthur's this time, they were both more serious.

"No." She shook her head simply. "Not that I'm aware of."

"Are they really going to...I don't know...stand between you and a mad gunman?" Maddie's head whipped to look at Derek.

"Excuse me?" Her voice was high, her mood lowered for a moment. Security was not something that anyone around her in London took lightly. Members of Harry's family had been in some very dicey moments, barely sidestepping disaster in a few instances. She had to take a breath and remember—this was foreign to them. Her cousins still found it novel that she had a security detail.

"Sorry," he smiled softly. "I didn't mean to...I was just curious. You're just...you're not blood royalty. You're an American. Is the expectation still the same?"

"I..." Maddie cleared her throat and looked to Arthur who, moving forward in his seat, decided it was time for him to be an active participant in this conversation.

"If you don't mind, I would be happy to take this one?" He lifted his eyebrows in Maddie's direction; checking for her permission.

"Please," she nodded and watched as Arthur turned his attention to Derek. With a breath and a stone-serious expression, he nodded.

"Yes." It was clear. It was calm. It was concise. "The expectation is that we remove the Protectee, in this case Doctor Forrester, from a situation before it would require such an intervention. But, if it arises, yes. The Officer, myself included, is to stand between her and a mad gunman. American, non-blood—it doesn't matter."

"Wow..." Derek shook his head, easing back into his chair. Maddie looked at Arthur, suppressing the overwhelming urge she had to hug him and thank him—knowing he would most certainly balk at that. Instead she smiled at him and, taking a drink, moved the conversation away from him —allowing him to fade back out just as he preferred.

"Okay," she looked to her cousins. "What else do you have? Let's get it all out now."

"Okay," Kyle cleared his throat, surprising Maddie. "This may be none of my business and you can tell me that. I just wonder, with all of these changes you're making, all that you're walking away from—which I totally understand and support, by the way—what happens if...what happens if it all ends?"

"How do you mean?" She could see that he was concerned about her.

"Did you have to sign a prenuptial agreement?"

"Kyle!" Amy nudged him in the ribs.

"No, no," Maddie smiled at the two of them. "It's fine. It's a valid question." She took a breath.
"He's a high ranking member of the British Royal Family. Of course there was a pre-nup. Of of course. And I was not, nor am I, offended that I was asked to sign one. I expected that to be a part of this."

"What did you..."

"No," Maddie cut her cousin off with a shake of her head. "I'm not going to go into that. I'm not going to talk money details with you. I had a job before him, I could have a job after him. All you need to know is that..." She took a deep breath and let it out. "I would be taken care of. Well taken care of. More so if I had children. I will always have a place to live at Kensington if I want it and I will always have protection with me. And that is all you really need to know."

"Fair enough," Kyle nodded. "I just wanted to make sure you were going to be okay."
"Well," Maddie laughed. "I'll be well provided for. But if Harry and I don't make it...honestly...I'll be far from okay."

"Aw..." Jenna smiled at her. And then she did exactly what Maddie thought she would and she moved the conversation back towards the slightly silly, though incredibly real part of Maddie's life. "So. How's your wave?"

"My wave?" Maddie almost choked on her drink as her cousins laughed around her.

"Your wave," Jenna nodded, elbowing her husband who was rolling her eyes. "You know...in the car on the way to the church, in the carriage on the way to the palace...." She gasped with a wide grin. "From the balcony! You know...your wave..." She demonstrated amidst the giggles. "Have you been practicing your wave?"

"No," Maddie laughed, slouching back into the couch as she giggled. "I haven't been practicing my wave. Do you think I really need to do that?"

"I don't know," Jenna shrugged. "Let's see your wave."

"Yes!" Amy laughed, clapping her hands. "Let's see your wave!" And then, as the rest of them joined in on the clapping, Maddie rolled her eyes and gave them a wave and the laughter burst throughout the room.

"See!" Maddie's face hurt from her smile. "I got the wave down. I'm good. No practice for me."

"Very nice," Derek shook his head.

And just like that, the room moved back to the frivolity it had been hosting for the majority of the day.

It was less than an hour later, while the boys set up a beer pong table—a relic from their college days—and Amy helped Dena in her quest to bake chocolate chip cookies while substituting at least two ingredients, when Maddie caught the signal. She was gathering up the empty glasses on the table, laughing as Jenna added logs to roaring fire, when she saw it. Arthur glanced to the doorway where Sampson stood. With a small, discreet nod, he turned to scan the room—taking in Maddie's location—and then he stood and slipped from the room.

And Maddie knew.

Harry was there. Or he was incredibly close. Sampson and Arthur were going to greet Nathan and Jim, Harry's team for this trip, to pass on information about the location, to show them where they were set up. Though her heart instantly picked up speed knowing she was going to see him in a matter of moments, she steeled her reaction. Moving very casually, wanting to buy herself a moment of privacy, she took the empty glasses to the kitchen and smiled at Dena and Amy before she slipped out, completely unnoticed.

She hurried quietly through the halls, up the main staircase to the front door of this magnificent home that was situated on the slope of the mountain.

"Ma'am," Arthur smiled as he saw her.
"I'm onto you," she held one finger to the side of her nose as she pointed at him with the other.

"Yes ma'am," he laughed lightly.

"How close are they?" She asked, leaning against the railing; her arms crossed as she looked to the open room below and past that to the wall of windows that was the back of the house.

"Minutes," Sampson answered.

"Traffic?" Maddie raised her eyebrows.

"Little bit of snow," Sampson joked; knowing fully well the depths were increasing outside.

"Any problems?"

"None at all, ma'am."

"Good," she sighed, noticing the way her fingers were tapping against her own arm, the way she was already biting at her lip. The last week hadn't been nearly as hard to be patient with as this last minute was proving to be.

They stood in silence for less than thirty seconds before there was a small, quiet knock on the door. Maddie's natural instinct to answer the knock was quickly swiped aside as Sampson moved forward. Nathan stepped into view first and Harry's voice followed behind him.

"Christ!" He called out. She could tell by the way his voice twisted that he was smirking. "A little snow?! What the hell kind of..." He stepped inside, brushing snowflakes from his mess of red hair, with Jim right behind him locking the door.

"Little bit of a cry baby, no?" Maddie grinned as Harry turned in her direction; his eyes searching and locking with hers. "Aren't you the very same Prince who trekked across the Arctic to the North Pole?"

"One and the same," his eyes glinted happily as he dropped his bag to the side and moved directly to her. Maddie's arms stretched out, her fingers pulling at his coat, tugging him near.

"Come here Your Royal Highness...I'll warm you up," Maddie flashed her eyes to their security officers who were already moving towards the hall to their side of the house. "Hi baby..." She wrapped her arms around his neck as his encircled her waist, easily folding his body around hers.

"Hi," Harry's voice was low, gruff; his lips moving to hers on a mission. Maddie, finally feeling the ease and comfort that came with being at his side, sighed into his lips; eased into his arms.

"Mmmm..." Maddie grinned against him; her face warm from the alcohol, from the kissing. "I missed you." Her fingers tickled the back of his neck.

"I missed you too," he kissed her again; looking in her eyes, taking in her flushed neck and cheeks. "How far ahead are you in the drinking?"

"Pretty far," she giggled lightly, her hands moving down to pat his ass playfully. "You have a lot of catching up to do big boy."
"Oh love...I think you're smashed." God he was happy to see her. It had been too long for him, and there were too many people around for the way he really wanted to greet her. But DAMN, he was happy to see her.

"I think maybe you're right," she nodded and kissed him again; her hands slipping into the back pockets of his jeans. "I saw pictures of you at Sandringham. You looked sad...or tired."

"I saw pictures of you at a small country church," he countered; his hands taking in the curves of her body as they ran over her. "You looked like you were sitting far too close to the man next to you."

"You mean Arthur?" She giggled, pointing down the hallway to where they had all disappeared. "My Protection Officer?"

"Does he really need to be so close?" His head tilted. He was playing with her and she knew it.

"He had to leave his piece in the car with Sampson..." She explained anyway, her hands moving back around him to tug his coat off of him.

"Why did he have to do that?" He tossed it to the bench next to the door and immediately moved back around her.

"He couldn't take it into the church," she shrugged. "Wait. How did you see me at church?"

"Apparently while licensed Protection Officers aren't allowed to take in their weapons, teenage girls are allowed to take in their camera phones."

"Ah yes, of course," Maddie sighed. "What can you do?"

"Very little," he shook his head. "So...where is everyone?"

"Down in the family room," she stepped out of his arms, but took his hand. "But come on...get your bag. We're over here."

Harry pulled at her hand, bringing her lips to his once more before he reached for his bag and followed her down the hall; slowly and lazily—happy to finally be home with her.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

"Hey..." Maddie called as they rounded the corner back into the large living room where her cousins were now playing an active and lively game of beer pong. "Guess who I found just roaming around..."

"Harry!!!" Maddie laughed as the room erupted; greeting him just like the patrons on Cheers greeted Norm every time he walked in. He was smiling wide, beaming really, as they all moved to greet him and Maddie could tell—he was happy they were so happy to see him. And she loved how easy he fit in, how easily they accepted him.

"Welcome to the party man!" Derek extended his hand to shake Harry's.

"Thanks."

"Drink?" Gary called out from the kitchen.
"Please!" Harry nodded as he shook Kyle's hand. Greg pulled a few extra bottles out and headed back as Harry hugged Dena and Jenna hello.

"Harry," Amy grinned as she leaned in to kiss his cheek. "Oh! Wait!" She giggled as she moved from him. And then, with a quick, smirky side-glance at Maddie, Amy dipped into her very best tipsy version of a curtsy. "Your Royal Highness."

"Niiiiiiice," Harry shook his head, his smile twisting his lips. "She gave you the packets, didn't she."

"Ha!" Amy giggled as she rose to her feet. "Yep. She gave us the packets."

"Damn it!" He smacked his hands together, a laugh pushing through his lips. "I wanted to be here for the packets."

"Go ahead," Maddie rolled her eyes; sinking onto the couch with Harry behind her. "Make fun of the packets. I don't even care." She laughed. She didn't care. Harry's hand found home on the inside of her thigh as he settled next to her. They could laugh all they wanted; nothing would dampen her mood.

"Did you watch the DVD?" He asked the group as Gary handed him a beer and moved back to his spot at the beer pong table with Derek. "Thanks man."

"No," Maddie laughed, answering for them. "They haven't watched the DVD."

"You have to watch it!" He called out, taking a swig from his bottle.

"They don't have to watch your brother's wedding," Maddie sighed. "I just put it on there so they could see how it was all going to..."

"No, no," he laughed; his hand squeezing her leg lightly. "Not that. I mean...here. Who has a packet?"

"Why would we bring a packet with us to the mountains?" Gary laughed.

"Fair point," Harry laughed with a wave of his hand.

"I have mine," Jenna offered as the room rumbled in laughter.

"Of course you do darling," Gary shook his head.

"Can you go get it?" Harry asked.

"Sure," Jenna shrugged, heading out of the room.

"Really?" Maddie eyed him suspiciously. "Why would you want them to watch an hour long wedding..."

"Cause I didn't put the hour long version on the DVD."

"What?" She sat up slightly, turning to look at him. "What do you mean you didn't put the hour long version on the DVD?"
"You'll see," he smirked, offering her a wink before taking another drink.

"Harry..." She warned; nudging him with a toe.

"You'll see," he repeated; chuckling into his beer bottle.

"Here it is!" Jenna returned, mostly skipping.

"Perfect," Harry patted Maddie's leg before he rose from the couch, meeting Jenna at the large LCD TV mounted to the wall. "Okay..." Harry stepped back from the TV and addressed the group. "Trust me...you're going to want to watch this." And, since most of them were drunk and curious, they turned their attention to the TV. Standing to the side, Harry crossed his arms, bit his lip, and waited. The very second the overly British, twirly voice of the narrator came over the speakers, Maddie knew exactly what had happened.

"The Roooooooyyyyyaaallllll Wedddinnnngggg! Abridged." And so began a minute and a half of hilarity as Harry narrowly dodged the pillow Maddie threw at him.

"You had one job Wales!" Maddie called out over the laughter that now dominated the room.

"This is the best thing ever," Kyle shook his head.

"Are they going to do this to your wedding too?" Dena giggled next to Maddie on the couch.

"Harry!"

"Ah come on! This is much better than the real one," Harry turned sweet eyes to her. "You terribly mad?"

"No," she let out a breath with a roll of her eyes.

"Let's watch it again!" Jenna clapped her hands together as it came to an end.

"Let's turn it into a drinking game!" Dena smiled wide.

"How?" Derek laughed at his wife. "How do you turn it into a drinking game?"

"We take shots every time we see Harry," she raised her eyebrows.

"Fine," Derek chuckled, moving to the bar for shot glasses and tequila. "Let's do it."

And so began the most ridiculous drinking game Maddie had ever been a part of. She had no idea how many times they ended up watching that ninety second video. She couldn't remember how far in it was before her cousins began mimicking the voice of the narrator, before they began reciting the narration—word for word—falling all over each other as they laughed along.

Maddie watched as Harry held his stomach, tears in his eyes, as he laughed at Kyle taking over for the voice of The Queen.

It was wrong; wrong.

Maddie knew it was wrong. But the laughter continued and Harry led the way. So she sat back, her legs twisted up with his on the couch and watched as her family moved from the video to telling embarrassing stories to a vicious card game before, finally, they called it a night.

"Come on smudgy," she whispered into Harry's ear; kissing the pulse point just below. "Let's get you to bed."

"Now you're talking," Harry didn't think twice as he allowed her to pull him up from the couch.
Amidst a chorus of good-nights and thank you's for the video, Harry followed Maddie as she tugged him towards their room.

"Mmm..." Harry's hands were firm on her shoulders as the stepped into the room, kissing at her neck from behind. "It's about time we retire to our room..."

"What?" She laughed as she turned towards him; the door shut and secure behind them. "You said you wanted to go downstairs and..." He silenced her with his mouth; his hands cupping her neck, tilting her face up towards him. "...say hello." She grinned against his lips.

"I did," he nodded, his nose nudging hers as he moved. "I did. But now..." His grin was sly.
"Now I want to say hello to you..."

"Ohhhh..." She groaned as he pressed her body flush to his. "Good." She sighed as his lips moved to her neck. "Cause I've been saying hello to myself long enough."

"Ohhhh..." He moaned into the crook of her neck. "I love it when you talk dirty."

"And I love it when you pretend that you haven't had entirely too much to drink..." Maddie chuckled; her fingers moving through his hair.

"What's that supposed to mean?" When he pulled out of her neck, the look in his eyes was full of lust with the slightest pinch of a man who was being called to a challenge.

"It means..." Maddie bit at her lower lip, her chest rising and falling with her deep breaths. "It means that we're drunk, sunshine. Maybe we're more likely to pass out than to..." She smiled wide. "Say hello."

Somewhere in her foggy mind she then remembered that simple little rule; never tell a Windsor man what he can and, more importantly, cannot do. It was like awakening a beast. She actually saw it take over him; his eyes focusing, his tongue wetting his lips, as he pulled it together. In his mind, she had just presented a challenge.

A challenge he had every intention of rising to.

"You..." His voice was rough as his arms wrapped around her, folding her into him, as they moved further into the room. "...have waded into very dangerous territory."

"Oh?" She arched an eyebrow. "Am I in trouble?" The backs of her legs met the bed as Harry nodded.

"You are absolutely in trouble." It was a promise; a special kind of threat. Maddie's breath sucked into her lungs, her skin standing on alert—his blue eyes twinkling in the dark room.

"Harry..." She began; ready to mount a light protest, ready to offer warm, slow morning sex before they hit the slopes. But he had no intention of hearing her proposal. He was done with the discussion.

"Shh..." He shook his head slightly and then, denying her any further word on the matter, he was moving her back on the bed; his mouth capturing her gasp of surprise.

She had expected him to be sloppy, to fumble a bit as he moved over her. But he wasn't. He was in complete control. He was steady as he moved her up to the pillows on the bed. He didn't fumble once as he took her clothes from her body, pulling his off with ease. His lips were firm and warm and purposeful when his mouth returned to hers, his hands gentle as he pulled her up to meet him. His arms wrapped around her in a way that made her feel small, delicate, taken care of. His hands moved up into her hair as his lips began their assault; dancing with hers, his tongue moving against her tongue.

Fuck, she thought. She had missed him. As if he heard her, as if he knew what was going through her mind, Harry chuckled very lightly before he pulled his lips from hers only to move to that spot on her neck; that spot that made her...

"Fuck..." Maddie couldn't help the groan that came when he kissed her there, when he kissed her like that.

"Hmmm..." He grinned against her skin, his mouth moving down her neck to her collarbone. "Let's see if we can get you to say that again..."

"Harry..." She breathed, her hands being forced from his shoulders, running along his neck to his hair as he continued his trek down her body. He stopped to pay homage to her breasts; loving how close she came to the end when he pulled them into his mouth; kissing and sucking and stroking in time with the way she moved against him.

"Too drunk..." His voice was so soft she barely heard him. As he passed over her stomach, as he skimmed past her hips, he nudged her legs apart gently; making room for him. And just before he settled in, just before he committed to his mission, he looked up at her—that evil cocky grin stretching from his lips to his eyes. "Really Madeline, I would think you would know better by now than to challenge me..."

"Ha!" She giggled; feeling light and young and full of anticipation. "You would think I would..." And when his lips found her, when his breath warmed that most intimate of places, Maddie's hands clenched—one in his hair and one in hers. "Fuck..." She breathed; knowing without seeing—just how smug he must have looked.

The last time they had made love had been so intense, full of emotion; heavy with it. He had said good-bye to her with a deep, slowness; making sure she felt loved and whole. But now, as his mouth worked—tongue, lips moving together in this blindingly wonderful way—to drive her to the edge, he was saying hello with passion, with thoroughness. He was celebrating their reunion with a driving strength maybe she hadn't been quite prepared for.

"Harry..." She gasped; her head rolling back on the pillow, her hips jutting towards him involuntarily. "God...yes..."

"Mmmm..." He moaned against her, drawing short breaths from her lungs; feeling her thighs press against him; pushing him closer to her. He knew she was close, incredibly close. He knew without looking that her face was flushed, that her cheeks were pink, that her lip was pulled between her teeth; that her eyes were pressed closed and she was clenching the sheets next to them. He knew that because he knew her. He knew her so incredibly well; well enough that he knew how to bring her to this point quickly, how to move her to this edge and exactly what to do to give her that final push. Reaching for her hand, his fingers tangled with hers, the very same way her other hand was tangled in his hair; holding him to her.

"Harry..." She gasped. And then, squeezing her hand in his, he moved his tongue just so; he moved his mouth just slightly. And just as he suspected, just as he knew... "Fuck!" Maddie called out into the room.

And just like that, she was falling apart; trembling against his mouth—her moans were primal, her breath labored. But he held tight to her, he maintained his post and, when she released her hold on his hair, when she let her fingers slack their grasp on his hand, Harry finally moved. Leaving small kisses to the inside of her thigh, to her hips, to her stomach, the soft underside of her chest, the scar on her shoulder, the dip in her neck, her jaw—he moved to her side; smiling wide as he looked down at her recovering body, her eyes still pressed closed.

"Are you okay?" His voice was soft, sweet, as he moved the rumpled blankets out from underneath them.

"God yes..." She sighed, opening her eyes to his wide grin as he looked down at her; his head propped up in one hand as the other adjusted the blankets around the two of them.

"Good," he leaned to kiss her; her hands holding him to her for a deeper kiss before letting him go.

"You look...awfully proud of yourself," she felt her cheeks blush; feeling silly as they did.

"I am," he admitted shamelessly. "I'm...honored...that you let me be here," his fingers traveled over her still sensitive body down to his favorite place. "I feel privileged that you let me kiss you here, that you feel so comfortable, so relaxed, so at ease that you'll let me make home there..." He moved to kiss her neck. "And yes...I am...satisfied when you're satisfied. I get an ego boost when you hold me there while you moan my name...when you refuse to let me move while you clench around me. Yes. I'm proud."

"Harry..." She breathed; her body igniting at his words, her skin tingling.

"And if you think it doesn't make my head swell to the size of this room when you look at me like that..."

"Like what?"

"Like you want me to do it again..."

"Wow..."

"Do you want me to?" He arched an eyebrow, his voice low and rough. "Do it again?" She gulped.

"No..." She shook her head and pushed at his shoulder; forcing him to his back. "If you think I'm going to let you play all by yourself..." She moved over him then, straddling him as she bent to kiss him. Her hair made a tent around them as her tongue pushed into his mouth, his hands reaching up into her hair. And then, with a nip to his bottom lip, Maddie moved. She was only able to land two kisses, one to his neck and one to his chest, before his large hands wrapped around her arms and pulled her back up to him.
"Really?" Maddie's eyes flashed wide with surprise. "No?"

"No," he shook his head softly; moving her to his side; wrapping his arms around her, wanting her to settle against him. "Not tonight."

"I don't know what to..."

"You were right," he sighed; smiling down at her as he pressed a kiss to her forehead. "I'm too drunk."

"Well okay..." Maddie let out a breath; her arm wrapping around him as her leg moved to tangle with his. "Tomorrow maybe?" She was surprised at the yawn that came then.

"Tomorrow definitely," he laughed lightly, moving to kiss her again. "I love you..."

"Oh I love you too," she grinned against his lips; her heart feeling whole again. It didn't matter that they were thousands of miles from their actual home, that they were staying in a luxurious rented cabin, neither of them had felt more at home in the last week than they did in that exact moment. "I am so happy that this was our last Christmas apart."

"Me too," he couldn't have agreed with her more. Being with his family without her had been rough on him, made him feel lonelier than he should being surrounded by so much. He took a deep breath and let his eyes close.

"Good night..." Maddie yawned; nuzzling closer as she began to fade; happy and content and so full of peace.

"Good night." And then, with Maddie locked firmly against him; he allowed sleep to overtake him.
Harry had awoken that morning to Maddie; her mouth warm and soft and waking him up in the most magnificent way possible. And before he could pull her back up to him, before he could move her so that she was under him, she had asserted her dominance over him and had moved him past the point of protest.

Face it. She knew his body as well as he did hers and he would be bold faced lying if he said he wasn't putty in her hands. Or her mouth as the case may be.

And as Harry laid on the bed, his mind spinning, slightly dizzy as his body recovered from her wake up call, Maddie slipped from the sheets, from his grasp. With her own cocky grin and a slight bounce in her step, she made way to the bathroom; calling over her shoulder for him to join her in the shower—they had a full day ahead of them.

In no time, they were back to business; drying and dressing for the cold, snowy weather outside. As tradition dictated, they—along with Maddie's cousins and their other halves—would be spending the day on the slopes. Harry was beyond excited, noting it had been much too long since he had last snapped on a pair of skis and let gravity do its wonder. And he was admittedly no slouch in the talent department—a point he made certain to make with Maddie.

"I know you think you have this skiing thing locked down," Harry eyed her competitively as he pulled his thick socks onto his feet. "But I don't think you know who you're messing with."

"Please baby," she rolled her eyes; adjusting her pants and shirt that would be her first layer of clothing. "This is my backyard. I was slaloming these slopes before you could even say Switzerland in that lovely British accent of yours."

"Those are some mighty big words, Doctor," Harry shook his head, his natural need to win edging through. "It's going to be a long day."

"Well...your royal highness," Maddie grinned as she spoke the words. "I suppose it will be for you...trailing behind me and all."

"Ha!" He tossed his head back.

"Laugh away," she warned before moving away from him, walking to the bathroom to tie her hair back and away from her face.

"Well at least the view will be worth it," Harry shrugged; focusing on her ass as she walked away from him.

"Hey!" Maddie snapped her fingers, grinning as she did. "Eyes up here."

"Aw come on!" He groaned with a matching grin. "I'd let you stare at my ass."

"Oh yeah?" Maddie laughed; twisting a tie around her hair.

"Absolutely," he stood and turned around, making a show of bending over to retrieve his shoes. "Look away love. This ass is yours."
"My own private ass?" She raised her eyebrows as she moved back to him.

"Your own private ass," he laughed with her; moving to pull her into his arms, his shoes still on the ground. "Come here..." His face nuzzled into her neck as her head tipped back in laughter.

"Mmmm..." Maddie sighed as he kissed her there; moving up to her ear as his hands pressed against her back, pushing her into him and then suddenly, he was moving away from her. Maddie watched him, confused, as he stepped back—his eyes wide, his smile wider.

"What?" She read him so easily. His smile was beyond Cheshire, past 'cat got the canary'. "What is it?"

"I...I can't believe I forgot..." He shook his head and took a deep breath. "I have a gift for you."

"A gift?!" She sighed into a light giggle. "Harry, we had..."

"Rules," he finished her thought. "Yes I know. But it's not from me." He held up his hands; mounting a quick defense to what would most definitely be a lecture.

"Oh?" Her forehead crinkled. "From who then?" He smiled, kissed her quickly, and walked across the room.

"Kate," Harry called back to her as he moved to his bag, pulling out a small, beautifully wrapped gift.

"Well that's...odd." Maddie's forehead crinkled. "I have hers at home. I just...assumed...we would exchange gifts in London."

"Don't look at me. She asked me to bring this, I said I would..." He shrugged and held it out to her.

"Weird." Maddie took it from him. "Weird that she wouldn't wait..."

"Maybe it's edible," he offered with a chuckle.

"I'm sure that's it," she rolled her eyes and peeled away the paper. "A book. A children's book. That's..." She turned it over in her fingers and looked to Harry who was watching her with his arms crossed over his chest. "Is she...I don't know...is she helping me restock the library in Bendal after the earthquake?"

"No idea, love," Harry shook his head, though Maddie sensed something that made her think that wasn't entirely true.

"It is a good book though..." She smiled as she opened the front cover, reading the handwritten note there, and suddenly everything about her drew to a halt; her thoughts, her voice. Her eyes were the first thing that moved, snapping to meet Harry's. "Is this..."

"Yes." He nodded, that Cheshire smile returning.

"You mean..." Maddie's eyes teared up.

"Yes."
"It says 'Please read this book to me Aunt Maddie'..." She giggled as she bounced on her feet. "Harry! It says Aunt Maddie! I'm going to be an aunt?!"

"Yes!" He bit at his lip, his eyes wide; his smile contagious.

"Oh my GOD!" The book clenched in her hand, she lunged to him; her arms flinging around his neck. "Oh my God!" She pulled back to look in his eyes. "She's pregnant?"

"Yes." He caught her in his arms with enthusiasm. Harry was even more elated than she; and that was saying something. "They told everyone at Christmas. They gave us each a gift something like that..." He grew serious for the slightest of moments. "They are worried that it's going to get out before her first trimester is up."

"How far along is she?" Maddie pushed a strand of hair behind her ear. "When is she due?"

"She is about two months along and they are due at the end of July." He couldn't help the way he beamed every time he sat with the realization that he was going to be an uncle.

"Oh wow..." She sighed. "I am so happy for them. Really. I..." She felt tears in her eyes again as she remembered the conversation she had shared with Kate so long ago. "I'm so happy for her. And him! And...oh God. Your father must be..."

"Beside himself?" Harry offered. "Yes he is. I know she wanted to tell you in person but she didn't want to wait and risk the world finding out before you came home."

"Of course," Maddie waved her hand; dismissing it as she pulled the book back between them. "Harry...we're going to have a niece...or a nephew."

"I know." He kissed her quickly, loving how she chose the word 'we'.

"I can't wait to hold him and snuggle him and smell his soft little head..."

"I know," he laughed into a sigh. "And I can't wait to buy him drums."

"Ha!" Maddie shook her head at him. "They are going to love you."

"Please," he rolled his eyes. "As if they don't already."

"Wow..." She sighed, her entire face registering the blissful way she felt inside. "This is just...it's the best news ever. What a wonderful gift..." She moved to stash the book in her bag.

"Yeah," Harry nodded and moved to the bed to put on his shoes. "Hey. I know this goes without saying, but this is something that is definitely a secret."

"Oh of course," Maddie nodded, zipping her bag and turning to face him. "I won't repeat it to anyone. It's not mine to tell."

"Thank you," he tilted his head up to kiss her.

"Don't mention it...Uncle Harry," she nudged his nose with hers before she left him with a giddy smile and returned to her preparations for the day of skiing.

Maddie and Harry, her cousins, and what was becoming quite the entourage of security detail spent the entire day on the slopes. Harry had always known Maddie had a competitive edge to spent the entire day on the slopes. Harry had always known Maddie had a competitive edge to her; that she strived to be the best; that she loved to win. What he hadn't realized along the way was that this drive was something that was ingrained in her family; it wasn't just her.

It was all of them.

And so, at the end of a long day on the snow, when Kyle was throwing jab after jab towards the two of them as they clipped out of their skis on the deck of their place, Harry realized that Maddie was coming from a family closer to the Windsors than he had ever imagined. Beside him Maddie chuckled as Harry shook his head.

"I don't know why you're laughing," he eyed her. "He danced laps around you too."

"Of course he did," she sighed with a smile in her eyes. "I lived at sea level in Bendal for over a year and now I'm in merry ol' England with you. Kyle lives here. He does this all of the time..."

"And you're weaklings," Kyle called out with a smirk. Truth was, Harry had held his own. Maddie had held her own. They were both incredibly athletic and skilled in what they were doing. They were just simply no match for Kyle who had grown up in the back-country and had kept up with his love for the sport. And he was enjoying this moment, as Maddie had always given him a run for his money when they were younger.

"I'm not sure I like Kyle anymore," Harry joked, hoisting his skis up into the rack on the side of the house.

"I'm not sure I'm going to be able to sit down for a week," Maddie groaned, rubbing at her backside.

"That was quite a fall," Amy smiled sympathetically. "You sure you don't want to get it looked at?"

"My ass?" Maddie laughed. "God, can you even imagine the headlines on that one?" She and Harry shared a knowing look, a small inside joke. "Thanks. But I'll be okay. I'll get Harry to rub it for me."

"Done," he grinned as Amy rolled her eyes.

"Actually," Dena smiled. "After we eat something, maybe we should hit the pool. The hot water might help."

"Now we're talking," Maddie nodded, pulling off her ski boots and running in her socks to the door; thankful for the ski in/ski out accessibility of their place.

"So..." Jenna summed it up. "Dinner, pool, party...fireworks in town at the lake?"

"Yes," Maddie nodded as she ran it through her head. "Sounds right to me."

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

"You know, there is a big benefit to it being so cold outside," Harry leaned closer to Maddie. It was nearing midnight and, after a great dinner and a swim with her rowdy cousins, they had all decided to walk to the lake in town for the fireworks at midnight.

"Oh?" Maddie grinned, her cheeks pink from the crisp, cold air.
"Mmmm..." Harry nodded, his hand reaching for hers. "We're so bundled up that nobody knows who we are."

"Ah yes," Maddie's grin stretched as she looked around the gathering crowd; tons of people sitting together, drinking from thermoses of hot beverages, listening to the music as they waited. "The ever allusive anonymity."

"Exactly," he nodded. "For instance...I can do this..." His hand tugged on hers, drawing her to a stop before he pulled her to him. His fingers tugged her scarf down and his lips were warm against hers as he kissed her; full on the mouth in front of everyone. He pulled back just enough to wink at her. "And it won't even appear on the internet."

"Oh I like that..." Maddie giggled, tipping her face to meet his again. "We should take advantage of that."

"Agreed," he kissed her again before taking her hand and falling back into step with her family as they made their way through the crowds.

"Do you remember this time last year?" Maddie asked as her mind wandered.

"Sean and Kiki's wedding," he grinned as his mind joined hers.

"Yes."

"I remember it being much warmer than this," Harry laughed. "And I remember spending the night in that big chair with you...asking what it would mean to be married to me."

"Yes," she grinned. "And this time next year...I'll know."

"Best of luck to you love," Harry's eyes twinkled.

"Thank you," Maddie laughed and reached for the thermos full of hot cocoa that he had in his other hand. "Can I have that please?"

"Absolutely," he handed it over.

"Want to add some peppermint Schnapps to it?" Maddie raised her eyebrows, patting her flask in her jacket.

"Nah," he shook his head.

"No?" She smiled. "Not drinking tonight?"

"Laying low," he shrugged.

"Really?" She laughed lightly. "Why's that?"

"Because..." His voice dropped as he stepped closer. "I have every intention of making love to you tonight."

"Oh." Maddie's throat went dry; her cheeks flushing even more. "You do?"
"The good old fashioned way," he seemed confident, cocky even.

"You mean missionary?" She smirked.

"Ha!" he laughed. "Not necessarily. I mean...I mean I don't want the alcohol to..."

"I know what you mean," she stepped into his space, his arms moving automatically around her. "I look forward to that."

"Oh?"

"Mmm..." She bit her lip and smiled up at him. "As a matter of fact...if you want to skip this whole thing, we can head back there now and bring in the New Year on our own."

"Ohh..." Harry's hands moved to her arms; rubbing up and down as though the friction might warm her. "What about the fireworks?"

"I've seen fireworks before."

"You've had me before," he pointed out.

"But my appetite for you is insatiable."

"You're killing me here."

"Let's go. Come on. Let's go back to the place. I'll tell Kyle. We can be alone...with security but..."

"Hey stragglers!" Gary's voice called back to them where they stood. "There's a free spot over here by an outdoor fireplace. You coming with us or what?" Maddie turned her eyes up to Harry.

"Yes!" Harry called back, stepping away from Maddie and taking her hand. "We're coming!"

And then only to her, "You've missed the last few years of this. Let's not miss this year."

"Fine," she huffed though, deep inside—past her own growing desire for him—she knew he was right. "Fine. We'll watch the fireworks. We'll bring in the New Year."

"Grumble, grumble," Harry mocked her; narrowly missing the slap at his arm. "Come on baby. Let's get this year over with." With a wide smile and eyes full of love, Harry pulled her along with him towards the group.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

"Ten..."

"Harry, the moment, and I mean the exact moment we see a firework, we are walking; no, no. Running back to our room."

"Nine..."

"Aw, come on. Don't you want to stay for the musical show afterwards..."

"Eight..."
"You're really pushing your luck Wales..."

"Seven..."

"You're sexy when you're like this."

"Six..."

"Like what?"

"Five..."

"All pent up and impatient."

"Four..."

"I am not pent up and impatient."

"Three..."

"You are. Look at the way you're biting your lip and tapping your toe. And your eyes are all crazy and...sexy as hell."

"Two..."

"Harry, you are driving me absolutely..."

"One..."

"God, Madeline...you're beautiful..."

"HAPPY NEW YEAR!"

As the fireworks boomed and 'Auld Lang Syne' sounded out from the band, Maddie moved away from him, towards the house. "Come on Wales. It's time."

"Wait, Maddie..." Harry grabbed her hand. With a wide, amused smile, he pulled her close and tugged her scarf from her face.

"Wait?" She smiled warmly up at him as she settled close to his chest.

"Happy New Year," he grinned and leaned down to kiss her.

"Happy New Year," she whispered just as his lips met hers. Just as she was leaning into the kiss, into him, he pulled back. "Hey..." The beginnings of a pout on her lips.

"I'll race you home."

"Hey!" She called out; pausing for the briefest of moments before she took off after him, yelling her good-byes to her cousins as she ran.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
"Oh...my...God!" Maddie stumbled into their bedroom; taking deep, gulping breaths. They had shed their winter wear in the entryway and had hurried up the stairs to their own space. A burst of laughter made it through her lips as she shut the door behind them.

"I told you..." Harry was trying to laugh through his heavy breathing. "We should start running through the park together. I'll even chase you if you want." And though it pained her slightly to do so, she started laughing.

"It's just the altitude," Maddie pressed a hand into her side. "And we spent the whole day skiing..." She leaned back against the door for support. "So you can stop with the crazy talk and..." Catching the look on his face, the flicker in his eyes, Maddie's voice faded.

"Are you tired?" Harry asked as he took a step towards her, his smile was warm, welcoming; dangerously charming.

"No..." Maddie whispered, watching as he pulled his sweater up and over his head; his t-shirt threatening to go with it.

"Can I get you something to drink?" He tossed it aside and stepped up to her then, his body framing hers against the door. "It's important to be hydrated."

"It is," Maddie agreed, her lower lip pulling between her teeth. It was a heady thing; when Harry focused his attention like that, when his eyes swept over her as he took another step.

"And well rested." His fingers stretched out, palm pressing against the door behind her as he leaned closer; kissing her cheek.

"Yes..." Her skin felt warm to his lips.

"So?" She could feel his breath on her skin, the heat from his body.

"So..." Maddie sucked in her breath, her hands reaching out to tug at his t-shirt.

"Can I get you something to drink?" He repeated his question; amused at the way she was growing antsy, the way her once steadying breath growing uneven again.

"No," she grinned as she shook her head, her nose nudging his as she did. "I'm good."

"Good," he looked wicked, teasing as his eyes swept over her; taking her in. "Something to eat or..."

"Come on Harry," her voice tipped towards pleading. Her hand reached out to stroke the strong line of his jaw. "Would you stop with the nonsense and..."

Feeling the weight of him pressed against her, sandwiching her between him and the door, was the most wonderfully satisfying pressure. He was warm and strong and hard and his lips were pulling at hers in a head-spinning fashion.

A tiny, muffled gasp fell from her mouth into his. Her hands moved to his waist, finding the skin under his t-shirt hot and smooth and she wanted more of it under her fingers. Reaching the hem, she pulled and in one fluid motion, he was shirtless. Returning his lips to hers, his arms pulled her from the door, into the room, into his arms and into the New Year in that "old fashioned" way; laughing, sighing and moaning his name.
Waking on New Year's Day, tucked close to Harry's warm body was exactly the way Maddie wanted to start the New Year—the new year that held in it such an abundance of joy. She was marrying Harry, Kate and Will were going to have a baby. With a great big, drawn out sigh, she snuggled even closer, her feet burrowing under his legs for warmth.

"Don't get too comfortable there," his voice was heavy with sleep. "It's our last day to ski..."

"Don't care," she grumbled into his shoulder.

"Ha!" He laughed, his fists rubbing his eyes awake. "Tell me you don't want to take Kyle down a notch or two."

"I don't want to take Kyle down," she grinned against his skin.

"Right," he rolled to his side, exposing her face as he hugged her to him. "Now tell me with a straight face."

"Fine..." She huffed. "We'll ski."

"That's right we'll ski," for a reason that completely escaped Maddie at the moment, Harry was wide awake and lively; ready to take on the day. Pressing a quick kiss to Maddie's lips, he moved to rise from the bed.

"Whoa, whoa! Hang on there captain," she pulled him back to her, catching him with her lips. "Happy New Year Your Highness."

"Oh..." He chuckled against her; rolling so that he was laying over her. "Doctor..."

The slopes would wait.

Okay, who's hungry?" Maddie asked as their SUV rolled back into her hometown after a day full of skiing. They had dropped Dena and Derek at home and Amy and Jenna had gone back into Denver together as they had some post-holiday shopping to do. So it was just Maddie, Harry, Gary and Kyle—who were going to work on something at Gary's house over the next couple of days.

"Starving," Harry groaned.

"Me too," Gary stretched his legs. "Is your mom at the house?"

"No," Maddie shook her head. "She had her school Holiday party tonight. She wasn't really expecting us back until tomorrow. We could grab something in town?" She suggested as they drove through.

"We could," Kyle nodded. "You two okay with that? Nobody gives a shit if Gary and I show up in town but you..."

"It's fine," Harry waved his hand. "I'm used to it by now."

"Maddie?" Kyle lifted his eyebrows to his recently famous cousin.
"Please. Nobody around here is going to care about me."

"Right." Harry shook his head slightly with a grin; knowing better. It was amusing to him how there were still times when Maddie could sit in a space in her mind where nobody knew who she was.

"Great." Gary laughed at the unspoken interaction between the two of them. "Now. Where do we go?"

"Oh that's easy," Maddie laughed in a way that clearly communicated a sarcastic, please.

"Leachmans?" Kyle glanced back at her.

"Leachmans." She nodded, her stomach growling at the thought.

Walking into Leachman's was like walking into her grandmother's basement; familiar and ancient. She had been coming to Leachman's for as long as she remembered and it still looked exactly the same as it did when she was a child. It was old, with dark wood walls and an intricately carved bar along one entire wall. The room was dark and warm and welcoming. There were two men who sat at the bar talking animatedly across it to the bartender who Harry figured had been around for his grandmother's coronation. It looked like just the kind of "hole in the wall" that Harry knew Maddie adored; locals scattered throughout at large booths and tables. Off the back of the room was a billiards table with a bit of a rowdier crowd.

Their small group took a table off to the side with Jim and Sampson taking a smaller table next to them. Though the waitress gave them a bit of a second glance, Maddie was sure she didn't recognize them as she took their order and brought them their drinks; buckets with bottles of beer situated in ice. The food was quick, plentiful and completely satisfying. When they were done, Maddie sighed a happy sigh as the waitress gave them another bucket of beer and took the check from Gary and she rose to head to the restroom. Since Sampson had a line of sight visual on the bathroom, he stayed in his chair; watchful and alert. It wasn't long before she was heading back to the table when she was stalled on her way by somebody who clearly recognized her. Harry saw Sampson's focus shift a bit so he turned around to look.

"Hey..." Harry swallowed a mouthful of beer and nodded towards the bar where Maddie stood. "Who is that talking to Maddie?"

"Hmm?" Both Kyle and Gary followed where Harry was looking. "Oh." Gary groaned as Kyle rolled his eyes; settling back in his chair.

"That's Travis Meeks," Kyle's voice seemed less than thrilled.

"Travis Meeks?" Harry looked between the two of them as he took another drink.

"Her high school boyfriend," Gary grumbled.

"Oh really?" Harry's interest peaked as he glanced back at the two of them talking; his lip twitching into something of a smirk. So this was Number One. He looked him over, working hard to keep the annoying twinge of jealousy in check. The guy was tall; not as tall as Harry, but tall. He looked like what Harry figured was the All-American look; blonde hair, blue eyes, muscular. Probably played American football. "So that's him..." He took a breath and reminded himself who he was; who he was to Maddie. No need to sweat this.

"Yep." Gary's response was clipped, the tone crystal clear and Harry caught it.
"Why do you say it like that?" Harry nodded his head across the table at him.

"He doesn't like him," Kyle offered.

"As if you ever did," Gary shot him a look. The two men shared a glance, shared a silent conversation. And Harry caught every second of it.

"Fair enough."

"Neither of you like him?" Harry was confused. In all honesty, he and Maddie had only ever had a handful of conversations about this particular ex-boyfriend and in none of them had she mentioned that her cousins didn't like him. Silently they shook their heads. "Why not?"

"Well..." Gary adjusted in his seat, clearing his throat. Harry could tell he was debating, he could tell that he was trying to decide just how much he was going to let out, just how truthful he was about to be. Harry recognized this look, this thought process—it was a big part of his own life. He wanted to say something, to remind them that he was marrying Maddie, that he loved her—that it was acceptable for him to know what they were thinking. But it turned out he didn't need to remind them. They knew.

"Fine..." Kyle waved the universal gesture for Harry to lean forward; they were going to let him in. With a quick glance back at Maddie, Harry did just that. He glanced between the two cousins and raised his eyebrows.

"Listen," Gary was the first to speak. "He wasn't a bad guy. He was nice."

"Nice?" Kyle smirked bitterly.

"He was. Their relationship was fine. It was a high school thing, you know. Nothing big, nothing serious. Just...there. It was the ending that was bad."

"Oh?"

"I say the whole thing was bad," Kyle had never been one to beat around the bush. "I can't say I was ever a fan of the guy."

"Really?" Harry's forehead creased. He liked Kyle, he trusted Kyle and he was the cousin that Maddie felt closest to, the one she said was closest to her. And his intense dislike for this guy got Harry's attention. "What was his problem?" Harry took another drink.

"Well, from the looks of things, you're about to find out." The distaste was evident on Kyle's face.

"What?" Harry chuckled.

"She's bringing him over," Kyle sighed and nodded behind Harry's head.

"Why is she bringing him over?" Gary groaned. But before any of them could crack a joke at an answer, Maddie was approaching the table, Travis Meeks not far behind her.

"Hi," she smiled, slightly uneasy, at the three men.

"Hey," Harry met her eyes. There was something intriguing about the confusion he now sat in, the way Maddie was playing nervously with her engagement ring, the way her cousins instantly hardened when they approached the table. Harry caught all of it.

"You both remember Travis, right?" Her eyes shifted to her cousins across from Harry, willing the two of them to behave.

"Yeah," Kyle nodded and rose to his feet; his hand extended. There was a smile on his face, he was raised right, but his eyes remained cold. "Travis."

"Kyle," Travis shook his hand. "Gary."

"How's it going," Gary extended the same courtesy as Kyle.

"Good. Good." Travis nodded as Harry watched the interaction; years of practice in bullshit told him that was exactly what he was watching. It was clear that Travis was well aware of the tensions and the issues that Maddie's cousins had alluded to. This was all too familiar to Harry; the pretensions, the inevitable show that people put on. His life was full of this, but finding it here, in Maddie's hometown, with Maddie's family, was a new experience.

Finishing off his beer, Harry rose to his feet. With a wide smile he took in Maddie's Number One. Harry was definitely taller than him, by a good few inches and he didn't look that much bulkier than Harry did. Maddie's eyes sought refuge in his as she introduced them.

"Travis...this is Harry Wales, my fiancé," she grinned as she said the word. "Harry, this is Travis Meeks."

"Good to meet you," Harry was the first to extend his hand, standing tall and secure as he met Travis' eyes.

"You too," Travis nodded; an all-too-fake smile reaching his lips.

"Care to join us? We have plenty of beer." Harry waved a hand at the table and he could almost feel Kyle glaring at the back of his head. But he didn't care. Harry was not easily rattled and he was admittedly a bit curious about this guy and the history he had with this family.

"Sure," Travis nodded and moved to the empty chair next to Maddie, who sat just to the right of Harry. Maddie took a deep breath and cleared her throat, moving to explanation.

"Travis is an old friend," her fingers found Harry's knee, feeling more at ease as she came into contact with him. "From High School."

"I see," Harry's hand covered hers entirely; squeezing reassurance into her.

"Ah come on," Travis pulled a grin from the corner of his mouth. "An old friend from high school?" He laughed; a loud sort of a bark that gained the attention of the people at a table close by. "We were more than that, weren't we Mads?"

"Mads?" Harry lifted his eyebrows, prepared with a joke that fell silent as he read the reaction to that particular nickname. Reaching for another beer from the bucket at the center of the table, he took the cap off and took a drink; ready to watch.

"Ha!" Maddie tried for a laugh, tried to avoid the look on Kyle's face; the look Harry caught completely. "You know, I used to hate it when you called me that..."

"As I recall," Travis drawled, his voice dropping low. "You used to hate quite a bit about me."

Harry leaned forward in his chair, glancing around Maddie towards Travis, his shoulders squaring, his jaw tightening. Okay, he looked then to Kyle, what the hell is happening right now? Clearing his throat, Kyle adjusted in his seat. Nobody was sitting well at this table.
"Oh..." Maddie tried to laugh it off as she reached for her drink. "That was such a long time ago, wasn't it?" She gathered herself and turned her well-practiced smile his way. "Tell me, what have you been up to?"

"I'm building houses."

"Great!" She smiled easier. "With your dad or..."

"Yes," he nodded.

"And are you still living in town or did you..."

"Yes," he cut her off. "I'm still living in town. Just as you said I always would."

"Travis..." Maddie's voice was soft. "Do we really have to..."

"No. We don't," Kyle spoke up across the table and all eyes turned in his direction. If Harry hadn't been so focused on watching Maddie, on trying to read her stance, how she felt, he may have laughed at Kyle's obvious tone and stance. But he was just as surprised as everyone else at the table.

"Kyle!" Maddie hissed.

"We don't, Maddie." He narrowed his eyes at her. "We don't have to do this. Again."

"Excuse me?" Travis leaned forward. "You have something you want to say to me?"

"Actually, I really do," Kyle wasn't mincing words as he met Travis gaze for gaze.

"Kyle!" Maddie's voice grew more serious as her eyes traveled from her cousins to Harry. "Let's just...not...okay?" She wanted them to back down. She wanted them to stay in their seats. She wanted them to let her handle this. And although he was growing more and more uneasy with the situation, Harry sat back a bit and let her take it.

"Fine." Kyle held a hand up and tipped his bottle back; mad at the situation.

"I heard that you're a doctor," Travis spoke only to Maddie; his words and his smile slurred. "I am," she smiled, taking a breath; hoping they were moving on. "A Psychologist actually."

"Thank you," Harry nodded, smiling at Maddie as his arm moved around the back of her chair in a way that appeared casual and easy but was every bit of protectiveness that he intended it to be.

"I mean..." Travis chuckled into his beer. "I can't say I ever thought Maddie would end up the marrying type..."

"Excuse me?" Harry raised his eyebrows; getting less amused and more annoyed with all of it.

"I mean...you know...cooking dinner, greeting the hubby at the door with a cocktail. Thought she was 'above it all'...I thought it wasn't exactly her kind of 'job'." Feeling Maddie's hand on his knee, Harry took two seconds to take a breath and think before he responded. But Kyle wasn't interested in waiting.

"Maybe it wasn't the job she had the issue with..." His eyes met Travis'. "If you know what I mean..." Harry almost smiled at that; if Maddie weren't so tense next to him, he might have.

"Kyle..."

"Maddie this is..."

"I know," she cut him off. Patting Harry's knee before she pulled her hand back, she turned to Travis. "Look, Travis. I don't really think this is the time or the place to rehash something that happened so long ago."

"So long ago?" He laughed. "You act like it was twenty years ago." His laughter faded and his eyes grew cold. "You walked out of town that day and haven't said a word to me since..." He shook his head. "And then I came to your father's funeral..." Maddie flinched visibly and everyone at the table shifted; Harry's hand falling to her back. "And you couldn't be bothered to say a word..."

"That was..." She took a small breath. "That was a pretty rough day Travis, surely you can understand that I..."

"And now look at you," he waved his hand towards her and Harry. "Crazy isn't it? How you were so hell bent on leaving town, leaving me so that you wouldn't end up a housewife. And now...you've ended up being just that. Nothing but a housewife." He bit off the last word harshly. Maddie flinched and Harry had had enough.

"Maddie," his voice was low but the meaning was incredibly clear.

"I know," she nodded to Harry before focusing on Travis. "You know, I think maybe it's time for you to go."

"Go?!" He laughed loudly. "What? You're so high and mighty that you can kick people out of bars now?"

"No," she shook her head, desperately wanting to avoid the scene he seemed to be gearing up for. "You don't have to leave the bar. Just...this table. I think maybe it was a mistake to..."

"A mistake?!" And this time, when Maddie glanced to the side, she saw Sampson and Jim who had just moments ago been calm and relaxed and laughing over something. But they weren't calm and relaxed any longer. They were watching her. And Travis. And neither of them was laughing. "You know...maybe the papers are right..." Travis' eyes met hers and everything about him; his glare, his words; everything was meant to hurt her. "You really are quite the high class bitch. Probably always have been."

"Okay. That's it." Harry was done. Past done. The chair below him creaked against the wood as he moved to stand. "I think it's time for you to excuse yourself."

"Look at this guy," Travis laughed, a crazy sort of laugh before his face grew serious. And, when his chair rocked back and he rose to his feet, everyone else at the table followed. The tension mounting instantaneously as Maddie's cousins moved to back Harry up. "You wanna take a swing at me?"

"More than you know man," Harry took a step forward.
"Harry!" Maddie's voice was a tense whisper as she stepped between them, her hand sliding to his chest. "You don't want to do this."

"Bullshit."

"Whatcha waiting for?" Travis egged him on. "Go for it."

"Please..." Maddie's eyes were huge as she looked up at him. "Think about this..." And he did. He looked at the sadness in her eyes, he looked at Travis—drunk and steaming—and he looked out over the rest of the bar.

"Nah..." He let out a breath, his fingers flexing out of the fist they were working into. "Five years ago? I'd meet you outside and we'd finish this." His eyes were severe as he focused on Travis. "But now...if I hit you and you hit me back, then that guy right there... He has to shoot you. That's a mess of paperwork, we would have to go back to London early and of course you..." He chuckled. "You would be rightly fucked. But no. I think I'll save that hit for somebody else."

"Rightly fucked?" Travis laughed in their faces. "Sure thing buddy."

"I don't know Gary..." Kyle looked to his brother. "How much paperwork do you have to file if I hit him."

"None." Gary's voice was cold. "None at all."

"Bring it on Kyle." Travis' attentions turned.

"I've been waiting for this for a long time."

"Come on guys," Maddie kept one hand on Harry's chest as the other reached out towards them; her back to Travis. "Come on. Let this go. We don't need this right now. Let's just leave. Let's go home." She smiled towards Sampson who was on his feet, radioing Arthur to bring the car around. Maddie was ending this and, as they began to move away from the table, they were going along with it. "Let's just go. It's not worth it."

"What did you just say?!” Travis demanded and, in a split second, made a fatal decision; a grand error of judgment.

In one second his hand reached out, his fingers wrapping around Maddie's arm to pull her back to him.

And in the very next moment, his face was crashing to the table; his arm bent behind his back as a hand pressed him down with a force he would have never expected.

"Bad decision," the British accent in his ear was low and rough and spoke of nothing but business. "Really bad decision."
"Holy shit!" Gary couldn't help the wide-eyed expression on his face as he and Kyle followed hurriedly behind Maddie and Harry who were being rushed from the bar to one of the cars by Jim as Arthur waited in the car and Nathan went inside to assist Sampson.

"That was insane," Kyle shook his head. The cousins were impressed; minds blown. It really was something to see the Security Team in action. But Harry, who had been through something like this more than once, was focused. This was Maddie's first and she seemed to be the tiniest bit rattled.

"You okay?" He studied Maddie closely as she slipped into the car with him right behind her. "Madeline?"

"What?" She looked to him, a little dazed as her cousins hurried in and the two officers with them pulled away from the curb; leaving behind two agents and the other car.

"Are you okay?" His hands ran over her hair, her shoulders, her arms; patting softly, making sure.

"Of course," she swallowed and nodded. "He barely got a hand on me and..." She glanced back towards the bar in a slight panic. "Are we just leaving Sampson and Nathan there?"

"They have a car," Harry shook it off; his body and his attention turned towards her. "Jim and Arthur have to take us home." He felt so different explaining it to her; so adult-like.

"Of course," she swallowed again, looking to the front of the car, an apology written across her face. "I'm so sorry guys! I know this means more work for you and papers and..."

"Don't worry about it Doctor Forrester," Jim spoke up, his eyes meeting hers in the dark space. "You did nothing wrong. You tried to de-escalate the situation and, when it blew up, you didn't put up a fight while we pulled you from the scene. We're in the car and out of danger. Everything went just as it should."

"Okay." Maddie nodded, a slight smile crossing her face as she felt tears come to her eyes. "Okay..." She blinked and turned away from Harry then, looking out at the night.

"Hey..." He was loving with her; gentle. She was scared. She felt bad. She felt guilty. He had been there before. "It's not your fault."

"Do we..." She wiped at her eyes and turned back to him. "Are we going to have to go back to London early? I don't want to leave my mom yet. We haven't even..."

"Nah," he shook his head, his fingers reaching to stroke her face. "I'll call my father when we get back to the house but I think we'll be fine. Hey..." He cupped her face. "We're fine. It's fine."

"Jesus..." She exhaled sharply, her body finally relaxing. She seemed to recover, seemed to calm significantly as she slumped back into the seat. She took a moment, her mind running it all over in her head and when she looked up at Harry, she shook her head. "I can't believe that just happened." Harry reached for her hand, squeezing her fingers in his with a soft smile.

"I can't believe you brought him over to our table," Kyle offered from the seat in front of them.
"I know," she groaned. "What was I thinking?"

"What were you thinking?" Kyle echoed her sentiment. Harry watched the interaction between the two of them; much like the interaction he sometimes had with his father. They held eyes for a moment before Maddie nodded, giving in to the unspoken argument Kyle was making.

"I know..." She sighed again. "I know."

"You're too nice sometimes," Kyle shook his head, letting it go.

"Yeah..." She took a deep breath and leaned forward then, talking to him over the seat. "Did you know he was there?" Kyle raised his eyebrows. "At dad's..."

"Yes." Kyle answered. "I knew he was there."

"I didn't even see him."

"Look, don't even start feeling guilty about that Maddie," Kyle turned completely around to look at her. "You didn't need to worry about him that day! You didn't need to worry about anyone."

"I know..."

"Plus...he was probably drunk then too."

"Kyle..."

"He was! My understanding is that he's drunk most of the time."

"Really? Nobody told me that."

"Why would we? You left town, you moved on. You forgot about him, thank God." Kyle was on a roll, not afraid to offer his opinion. "Look at your life Maddie. Would any of it be better with him in it?"

"Of course not," she rolled her eyes. "I'm not saying that. I'm just...I had no idea what had become of him."

"Yeah well..." Kyle sighed as the car pulled up to Maddie's home. "After the way things went down, the very least he deserves is you having no idea what happened to him." With a sympathetic smile, Gary followed Kyle out of the car. But Maddie stayed put, anchored to her spot for a moment. Harry followed suit; watching her as she processed it all.

"Thank you," she spoke softly as she turned to him.

"For?" His hand ran over her back.

"Not hitting him," she offered a small smile.

"Ah yes," Harry nodded with a shrug. "Well, the not hitting him wasn't for you."

"No?" She smiled wider.
"That was for Jim," Harry grinned. "He's had to pull me out of more shit than he ever should have. I figured I should give him a break."

"Very thoughtful of you," she sighed and leaned back against the seat, leaned into him. She waited another beat, looking out the windows at her cousins who were on their way to their cars, the agents who had moved up to the porch, giving them distance. She noted that her mother was still gone.

"Come on love," Harry nudged her shoulder. "We're giving this situation too much time here. Let's get out of the car. We'll call my dad, we'll meet with the team and then we'll move on. It could have gone worse, but it didn't. Okay?"

"Okay," Maddie let out one last breath and smiled. "Okay."

Harry waited until much later to bring it up again. He waited until they had said good-bye to her cousins. He waited until they had spoken to all four members of their team, till they had spoken to his father—who was actually more concerned about Maddie's state of mind than he was about the incident. He waited until they were inside her home, till they were alone before he turned to her with curious eyes and crossed arms.

"So. Do you want to fill me in on Travis?"

"Ugh..." Maddie groaned; her head tipping back in a mix of frustration and exhaustion. "I really don't. I don't want to talk about Travis. I don't want to think about Travis. I just wanted to come home for the holiday and...God..." She exhaled; pulling her head upright. "Do we really have to talk about him?" Harry studied her for a moment before shaking his head.

"No." He shrugged. "No, we don't have to talk about him. I just...up until tonight I thought he was just some guy you dated, some guy you loved once..."

"He was!" She exclaimed. "He was just that. Some guy I dated once."

"Yeah. I don't think so." Harry chuckled. "But hey. If you don't want to tell me, you don't have to tell me. I don't need the details Maddie. I have you."

"You know when you say things like that..."

"Yeah?" He lifted his eyebrows with a smirk. For a moment she contemplated tossing the conversation altogether; kissing him mad instead. But that moment passed, leaving her with a story to tell.

"Okay." Maddie took a deep breath; in and out. "I'll tell you about Travis."

"You sure?"

"Yes..." She paused for a moment, deciding how to start. Harry watched; quiet and casual as she began. "In high school Travis was..." She looked off into the room, searching for the right words. "He was that guy."

"That guy?" Harry's forehead crinkled in confusion.
"You know...that guy..." Despite herself, she smiled. "The popular guy, the funny guy, the sexy guy, the guy all of the girls wanted to..." She stopped her list as her eyes caught his, a small smile creaking across her face. "You know—you were that guy."

"What?" Harry laughed.

"Probably still are that guy," she mumbled, amusing herself.

"You're sidetracking," Harry pointed out with a smirk.

"Fine," she sighed and jumped back into her story. "I had known his family forever because it's a small town and we both grew up here. But when I started High School, he was a year older than I was and he was..."

"That guy," Harry offered.

"Yes," she rolled her eyes; knowing he was biting back at least a joke or two. "Anyway. I was smitten. I was young and immature and naïve and silly and...smitten. So we started dating when I was fourteen and..." She took a breath. "And we dated until I left town."

"Four years?"

"Four years."

"That's a long time."

"Hmmm..." Maddie nodded, looking down at her fingers as they turned her engagement ring around her finger.

"What happened?" He studied her.

"Well..." She let out a long, ragged breath. "He wanted to stay in town, work for his father, raise a family. And I wanted to go to college. Nobody in my family had gone and I was dead set on going."

"So you broke up?" He offered, still confused about the level of hostility he saw in Travis.

"Yes..." She seemed unsure. "Though not exactly." She took another deep breath. "I was clear, the whole time we were together, that I wanted to go away to college; that I wanted to leave town and do different things. Not better things or worse things, just different things. So, I found a college. I applied, I was accepted, I made plans to go..." She shook her head, remembering. "And Travis..." She let out a long breath. "I don't know. I don't know if he just wasn't listening or if he thought I was kidding or...I don't know. But either way, he wasn't really expecting me to go. And, when I told him..."

"He got pissed?"

"He proposed." Her face grimaced as she remembered.

"Whoa." Harry's face registered shock.

"Hmm..." Maddie smiled weakly. "Thought you were the only man who wanted to shackle himself to me forever?"
"Never," Harry shook his head. "I've always known I was in the company of a wide following."

"Please!" Maddie rolled her eyes; easing a bit.

"Did you say yes?" Though he was half joking, Maddie grew completely serious.

"I've only said yes to you," her eyes narrowed a bit. "I only ever wanted to say yes to one man...to you...to the person I was actually supposed to marry." Harry nodded, quieting himself, waiting for her to continue. "He had brought it up during my senior year, tossed it out there in casual conversation. I had told him again and again what my plans were, that I wasn't ready for that kind of commitment, that I wasn't ready for that kind of decision." She looked down at her fingers. "And then...after I had graduated, after I had been accepted, we had the talk..."

"The talk?"

"I told him I was leaving. I told him that maybe we should see other people..."

"Ouch," Harry winced.

"I told him we could still see each other but that I need time and space."

"And he took that to mean that you actually wanted him to propose?"

"Yeah..."

"Well, Kyle did say that it ended badly," Harry smiled sympathetically.

"Oh I'm not done." Maddie shook her head, a tight bitter laugh pulling from her chest. "I still can't believe..." She took a breath and looked to Harry, meeting his eyes. "It was in public."

"What was?"

"The proposal," her mouth twisted as she spoke the word, as she remembered. "It was...God. It was at this event in town. Everyone was there; my family, his family—both of which stood there as he took a microphone and..."

"No," Harry shook his head in disbelief.

"He didn't." Harry wasn't sure what he felt in that moment; disgust or embarrassment."

"Yes!" Maddie exclaimed. "I just don't... You know, a public proposal is a ballsy move even if you're sure she's going to say yes. But when she's told you she's going to say no...it's. I don't even know what it is." She shook her head again, running a hand through her hair. She was getting annoyed with the conversation. "But he took the mike and right there in front of everyone he laid out his plans for our future, he went on about how much he loved me and then he got down on one knee..."

"Oh he did!" She sighed. "My parents were...My dad was so confused." She laughed then, remembering. "My mother was mortified. And when I looked down at Travis I just...I felt terrible. I know it's crazy but I felt so bad for him. And when I said no..." She shook her head again, much like she had on that day, though this time without the tears. "When I said no, he just...exploded."
"Exploded?"

"He said some terrible things. He...he called me names, told me I had wasted his time, that I was a...how did he say it? The worst kind of tease." She chuckled as she thought of that night, of the absurdity of it all. "He trashed me pretty good in front of the whole town; saying I thought I was too good, that I was too proud, that I was better than everyone else."

"And nobody did anything?"

"I think everyone was in shock. I know I was. I had never seen him like that...so mad at me. Finally Kyle stepped in between us while Gary cut the power to the microphone. My parents took me home." With a deep breath and a sigh, she shook her head. "I thought...when I saw him tonight...I thought for sure he had moved on. It's been so long and so many things have happened since. If I had any idea that he was going to go off like that I would have never..."

"I know," he nodded. "Don't worry about it."

"I can't believe he's still hung up on..."

"You?" Harry offered with a laugh. "Is it completely cheesy if I say that I understand where he's coming from? If you had refused my proposal I would probably wallow for at least twelve years."

"I never would have refused your proposal."

"Yeah?"

"Yeah," she smiled and shrugged. "So...that's Travis."

"That..." Harry shook his head. "That explains so much."

"Oh?" Maddie laughed.

"When I asked you to leave Bendal and come to London, when you thought that I found you the interview..." His mind worked back over some of the bigger moments in their relationship. "You were thinking of him; of that moment."

"No," she shook her head. "I wasn't thinking of him. I have very rarely thought of him. But...I suppose at some level...I adopted this gut reaction, this reflexive instinct to leaving what I had worked so hard towards for..."

"Some guy," Harry supplied, remembering.

"You were never some guy, Harry." Maddie's face softened. "You've never been some guy." She smiled as her mind wandered to a far off place; her eyes growing wet and shiny. "That night when my parents brought me home, my dad...He sat me down and told me how proud he was of me; that I was following my heart, my dreams, my plans. He told me how proud he was to tell his friends and our family that I was going off to school, that I was leaving town. He told me that Travis wasn't worthy and that..." She had to take a breath, had to collect herself. "He told me that when the right man got down on a knee and asked me to marry him, I would have no doubt; only absolute certainty. And that's how I would know."

"Hmmm," Harry smiled; trying to keep his own emotions checked. Maddie was silent, still, as she watched him then.
"Thank you, by the way."

"For?"

"Being that man; the one my dad told me about."

"Maddie..." He could barely speak to that.

"You were never some guy." She held his eyes till he blinked and turned away, needing a moment. Maddie looked down at her hands, her fingers moving to the ring on her hand, his gift to her in that moment of absolute certainty her father had promised. After a minute passed, Maddie sighed and shrugged. "Thank God for Travis though, you know?" Harry's eyebrows knotted in confusion. "If it weren't for him pushing so hard back then I might never have gone so far away, I might not have had the drive to continue on to Graduate school, to Bendal..."

"Well..." He moved in on her then; eyes soft and fixed on her. "Then it wasn't all for nothing, hmm?"

"No..." She stepped into him; his arms opening up for her as she moved. "It wasn't all for nothing." Maddie snuggled closer to him. "Can we be done talking about him now?"

"Talking about who?" Smirk firmly in place. His curiosity had driven him to ask about him, but his confidence and his security in Maddie, in their relationship allowed him to drop the conversation just as quickly as Sampson had dropped Travis at Leachman's. With a blink of an eye, he was gone from Harry's mind—having long been gone from Maddie's.

"Come on Wales. Let's go get settled in our room before mom gets home and we get roped into stories from her party."

"Our room?" He raised his eyebrows, allowing her to pull him down the hall. "Is this a trick?"

"No," she laughed.

"Your mother approved?"

"She assigned."

"Really?" He paused just outside the door to her childhood room.

"We can sleep in the same room now," Maddie held up her left hand, wriggling her ring finger. "You bought the cow, darling."

"The cow?" Harry laughed as she pulled him through the door. "Did you just refer to yourself as a cow? A cow that I purchased?"

Maddie's giggle joined his as the events from the evening faded completely leaving room for only this; these last few days of holiday with Maddie's mother, in Maddie's home. When she finally arrived home from her party, Hannah hugged Maddie tight and Harry even tighter before she dragged them both to the kitchen for hot tea and cookies; love warming the three of them.
Chapter 91

When Maddie and Harry returned to London, they were returning to a barrage of excitement and action. They had six months before the wedding and quite suddenly everything seemed to be rushing around them. It was the storm before the calm, Maddie would smile and nudge Harry playfully. It was a prelude to the main act, Harry would shake his head and warn.

Either way, things were moving at record speed and all they could do was move with the flow; and hang on.

Kicking off the delightful ride was Maddie's citizenship. They had been home for ten days when Thomas requested a meeting with Maddie and the family attorney. With a small smile, he informed them that Maddie had met all of the standards for citizenship, including the mandatory residency requirements. It was time to send in her application.

"I just need your signature here," the attorney had slid the paperwork across the table to Maddie with a nod to the flagged signature line.

"You sure about this?" Harry spoke up next to her; smirk on his face, gleam in his eye.

"Are you?" She arched a defiant eyebrow as she signed her name and passed it back to the attorney, her attention turning to Thomas. "What's next?"

Next was tea. With the Queen. At Buckingham Palace.

"No big deal," Harry had told her with a slight upturn of his lips. "You've been there before. You've done this before. How many times is it going to take before this is a casual cup of tea with gran?" He watched as she crossed their room in a flutter of scarves as she tried to dress for the afternoon with his grandmother.

"How many times is..." She took a deep breath and walked right up to him; squaring her shoulders and looking him in the eye. "You really want me to start treating this casually?"

"I really want you to relax," his hands met her shoulders soothingly. "She said I could marry you. She asked about you at Christmas. She wants to see how you are, make sure I haven't chased you away yet."

"Ha!" Maddie laughed; rolling her eyes at herself. "I'll relax. I just need to figure out what to wear and I'll relax." She kissed him then. "I promise."

And she did; relax. She found the scarf she had been searching for, she slipped into the perfect pair of shoes. She eased into the car, sighing into a settled mode for their ride to Buckingham. She was calm as they stepped from the car, smiling a greeting to the Queen's personal assistant as he stepped aside and escorted them into the Palace.

She was at peace, serene even, as they turned over their coats and walked through the halls—her arm linked loosely through Harry's. She was completely relaxed; right up until they rounded the corner and the assistant smiled warmly.
"You'll be joining Her Majesty for tea in the Drawing Room." The way Maddie's body halted, reflexively pulling Harry to a dead stop along with her, was instinctual; outside of her control.

Harry turned confused eyes to her, his smile warm and in place. "Maddie?" He wanted to laugh, wanted to poke fun at whatever was happening inside her mind at that moment but his grandmother was waiting; The Queen was waiting. "Everything okay?"

"I..." She stammered, glancing around as a red flush filled her cheeks. "The Drawing Room?" And it hit him. If he had any self-control, he would have tampered down the wide grin that stretched his cheeks as recalled the last time they were in this very room; what they had been doing. But his control was failing him and the amusement was just too much.

"Come on love," he tugged gently at her hand on his arm; taking the last few steps towards the infamous room. "It's time for your first lesson in behaving badly." His voice was so low she almost hadn't heard him.

"Harry..." She wanted a way out, or at the very least a word of guidance.

"What's the saying?" He asked as the assistant moved to open the doors. "Don't do the crime if you can't do the time? This is us...doing the time."

"Oh Lord, give me strength," Maddie muttered, taking a large, deep breath and pulling a smile to her face; calling upon her years of training to sustain her.

The doors opened and there she was, The Queen of England...Harry's grandmother, sitting on the very same couch Harry had taken Maddie on in a selfish, passionate moment immediately following their engagement interview. This was them serving penance for the acts they had committed on that couch. Maddie cleared her throat and Harry fought the smug, cocky smirk that desperately wanted to surface as they stepped forward and greeted his grandmother.

"Harry, Madeline," her wonderfully charming voice called out; a beautiful smile gracing her face. "I'm so happy you were able to join me for tea. Won't you come in?"

"I was pleased to see that you chose the Strathmore Rose Tiara for the wedding," Gran was smiling warmly, everything about her was open and welcoming and wanting Maddie to feel at home. And, save for the intense embarrassment that seeped to her bones, Maddie felt exactly that. It was difficult not to in such a presence.

"It's a beautiful piece of artwork," Maddie smiled, continuing in her efforts to push from her mind memories of Harry's lips on her skin, his hands on her body. "Thank you so much for allowing me to wear it."

"Of course, dear. As I am sure you are aware, my mother wore it when she married my father..." And then, as the Queen began to tell Maddie stories of her mother, of her father, stories from history that books never held, that articles never neared—Maddie's mind cleared of Harry. Her entire focus turned to what his grandmother was telling her; the world she was sharing with her. The tension flowed from her fingers and she relaxed to the melody of her voice. It was so magical; like spun sugar with the authority and importance that held stronger than the Palace they now sat in. Suddenly Maddie felt bad; sad for those who would never have the enormous opportunity to witness it in person.
An hour later they were standing, bidding the Queen good-bye; kissing her cheeks and thanking her for the tea, for the stories. Finally, when she stepped from the room and the door closed behind her, Maddie let out a sigh of relief with Harry chuckling next to her.

"You pulled through quite nicely," his voice was low as his hand moved; fingers dancing on her shoulder. With a flick of her hand she brushed his hand from her body. "Hey!"

"Oh no," she turned to him then, shaking her head. "No touching me in here."

"Ah come on," he laughed; his hands moving to her waist, pulling her to his side playfully.

"I hate you," she tried for stoic and serious but even her lips knew she wasn't being honest.

"No you don't," he laughed louder.

"That was....horrendous."

"I thought the tea was fantastic," he joked.

"I'm not talking about the tea."

"You're sexy when you're mad at me," his lips graced across her cheek before she pulled back from him.

"I want to just...go back in time before I let you pull me into your lap on that couch and slap myself."

"Really?" He lifted his eyebrows; nuzzling closer. "Because I really want to..." As his hand moved over her ass, Maddie's hand clamped over his mouth.

"If you really think I'm going to get on with you here, again, you are out of your mind."

"Let's find another room then," he held tight to her; despite her reluctance.

"Harry!" She pushed at his chest.

"There are plenty of rooms here..."

"Yes," Maddie grinned, giving in; letting him pull her tight to him. It really was fruitless with him sometimes. "I know." She let her mind wander as his lips pressed to her neck, his arms enveloping her against him. "You know...when you really think about it...I wonder how many of them your grandmother has..." Harry grew stiff around her; his lips halting their journey. "You know..."

Maddie's voice dropped, a slight giggle coming from her turned lips.

"No I do not know." His voice grew colder.

"Think about it though."

"I don't think I will."

"She has probably had sex..."

"I beg you..." He pleaded.
"In all of these rooms."

"Oh God. Would you stop?!" He stepped completely away from her then.

"Come on," Maddie's smile pulled wider. "She was twenty-five when she moved in, she is a Windsor and...I'm sorry...but your grandfather..."

"No." Harry shook his head, a finger lifting to her in warning.

"He's hot."

"No!" His hands moved to his ears.

"He is Harry."

"No. Just. No." Harry shook his head as he moved towards the door, deciding that if she wouldn't stop talking, he would stop listening. "This isn't funny Madeline."

"Oh come on Harry!" She called out to him as he pulled open the door. He could hear her laughter as he stepped through it. "Don't do the crime if you can't do the time!" Maddie let out a little sigh as she reached for her bag; feeling more and more relaxed at Buckingham Palace.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

It was the middle of January when the big bomb dropped. The heir to the heir was going to be a father. Catherine was pregnant and the world erupted. They were nearing the end of their first trimester and Kate wasn't feeling well. The admission to the hospital was simple, routine in the world of medicine. But nothing was simple and routine in this royal web they lived in. So the news was leaked.

And, though Maddie was among the first to call her, she and Harry among the first to visit, the stories of a Kate and Maddie rivalry were already running rampant.

Kate stealing the spotlight with her "conveniently" timed pregnancy.

Maddie jealous over the attention the expectant mother garnered from the Windsor Men.

The two sisters-in-law were, according to many in the press, already entrenched in a fictional tug-of-war that would follow them throughout their lives.

Maddie tossed aside the notion as Kate tossed aside the articles and, as they sat together in that private hospital room, they promised the other that should any real issues arise, they would do their very best to address them in person. And then they loved on this baby that wasn't even there yet.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

"I see you're jealous of the baby," Ella couldn't help but joke with her best friend as they sat in Maddie's bathroom at Kensington. Harry was away for the week and Tara had agreed to come to Maddie to try out a few wedding hairstyle options. Maddie only knew that she wanted her hair up and tonight was the first of three styles Tara wanted to try with her. Tara smiled at the two friends; feeling included and welcome in this exclusive circle. She had never imagined that, almost a year ago, when she did Penelope a favor and sneakily colored and cut Maddie's hair while Harry was deployed, that she was securing for herself one of the most important styles of her entire life. The engagement interview had been one thing, a royal wedding was a completely other.

"Right," Maddie laughed into her glass as Tara pulled her hair tight; finishing and spraying. "Can you even imagine that? I don't know where they come up with half of this shit."

"How is she doing?" Ella sipped from her glass of champagne as she did her main duty; entertain the bride to be while Tara worked on her hair.

"She's doing great, actually. She's so happy..." Maddie's cheeks grew warm as she thought about it. The two women had spent an entire day mooning over the baby that Kate had worried would never come, the baby Maddie couldn't wait to snuggle.

"Good," Ella nodded. "Oh Maddie. Your hair..."

"Shush!" Tara waved her hand at Ella with a grin. "Not yet."

"Sorry!" Ella laughed, her hand pressing to her lips as she tried to physically shush herself. Maddie laughed at the attempt.

"Okay." Tara took a step back from Maddie's hair, looking it over for a moment. "Now..." She turned away from Maddie's hair for a moment and reached for a box that was sitting off to the side near where Ella was perched to watch this dry run.

"What's in the box?" Maddie's neck twisted so she could see and her heart flit-fluttered.

"Oh my God..." Ella's voice dropped as Tara lifted the item from the box.

"What is that?" Maddie felt tears in her eyes.

"This..." Tara turned to face them both. "This is a weighted replica of your tiara. They are used so that you and I can make sure we're ready for the real thing on the big day. I'm just going to..."

Before Maddie could protest, before she could prepare herself, Tara was placing the weighted tiara on her head, moving around her with pins, blocking Ella's view.

And then she stepped out of the way and Maddie didn't even need to look in the mirror. The sob from Ella was all it took. She felt tears in her own eyes as she looked up at her best friend.

"You think I should have gone with a different tiara?" Maddie lifted an eyebrow in a stab for humor.

"Ha!" Ella laughed, sniffing through her tears. "I think you should have gone with a different bridesmaid. I am in no way going to be able to hold it together."

"It's okay," Tara smiled at the both of them, her own eyes bright. "You can cry...you should cry. Get it out now. Maybe it'll help you on that day..."

"Nothing is going to help me on that day," Ella grinned, moving to her knees in front of Maddie. "I know you hate it when I...but you look so much like a Princess right now I can't even..." She swallowed, her cheeks flushed.

"You really do," Tara agreed, her own face flushed with excitement for the bride. "Do you want
"I don't know," Maddie shook her head, her voice hoarse as she looked to Ella.

"Come on Doc," Ella held out her hand as she rose to her feet. "Let's get a good look at what's going to bring that Prince of yours to his knees." Without a word Maddie allowed Ella to pull her from her chair. Facing the mirror, her heart pounded in her chest.

"Oh my God..." She whispered, moving closer to the mirror in a slow cautious way—as if she wasn't sure she knew the person in the reflection. "Oh my..."

"I know," Ella was unashamedly wiping at tears.

"Do you like it?" Tara asked softly; hoping for real feedback. "What don't you like? What do you like?"

"I love it," Maddie was still whispering. She couldn't help it. "I...there's nothing I don't like. It's comfortable. It's secure...It feels easy enough but it looks...Tara, it looks beautiful."

"It really does," Ella nodded, holding tight to Maddie's hand. "And the way you worked in the tiara..."

"I think we've found a hairstyle," Maddie turned from her reflection then, wanting to pay Tara the respect of her attention. "This is perfect Tara."

"Are you sure?" Tara bit her lip as she moved closer, joining the other two women in the reflection of the mirror. "You don't want to try another or..."

"No," Maddie shook her head, smiling wide. "This is it." Her eyes welled up and she knew—she was going to be a mess on the wedding day. "This is it."

"It is," Ella agreed, pulling Maddie to her side so she could kiss her cheek. "Such a Princess."

"Stop it," Maddie's eyes focused on the replica tiara in her hair; choking up as she remembered her conversation with The Queen, as she recalled the history in the original. She turned to Ella with wide eyes and a cracked voice. "This is so crazy."

"It is," Ella nodded, her arm still wrapped around Maddie's shoulder. "You know what's crazier?"

"There's something crazier than all of this?" Maddie waved her hand around her place at Kensington, pointed to her tiara.

"In five months, people are going to start calling you Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Sussex. They are going to curtsy to you and bow and..."

"Stop." Maddie held up her hand; tears in her eyes. "Just...wow..." Maddie took a few deep breaths; letting them out slowly. "Just promise me something?"

"Yes?"

"I don't want you to ever be that person. I don't want you to curtsy to me or call me that or..."

"But you're going to be the Duchess, Maddie. I can't..."
"Ella. Please." Her eyes were pleading with Ella's. "We lived together in a tiny apartment in Bendal. We've been through an Earthquake, we've seen some of the worst...and some of the best...please Ella. You've seen me naked. It's just me; Maddie."

"Okay," Ella nodded; her voice barely there. "I can promise to never do it in private. That's all I can do."

"Okay," Maddie accepted that; wiping at her eyes and turning to Tara. "This is absolutely perfect," she took a deep breath. "But you're going to have to take it all out before I just..."

"Of course," Tara laughed lightly, moving immediately back to her station behind the chair. Maddie squeezed Ella's hand and returned to her seat. As Tara's fingers worked to remove the tiara, Maddie took another deep breath.

This was happening. So fast, so soon; it was happening.

Maddie had never felt so excited and so nervous at the same time.

This was happening.

It was the storm before the calm. It was a prelude to the main act.
Valentine's Day

With a heavy sigh, Maddie stepped into their home, shutting the door behind her with another sigh. Yes, she knew she was being overly dramatic; staging a bit of an overreaction. But dammit—she had sacrificed Valentine's Day last year to the British Army, she really hadn't planned on sacrificing this Valentine's Day to the Royal Family.

But this was her life. When the family—or in this case his father—called, they had to go. Now it was just Harry but in a few short months it would be her too. What could she do other than allow herself the briefest moment of pettiness to sulk and then suck it up and move forward?

Dropping her bag to the floor, she kicked off her shoes and turned to face her night alone.

And that's when she saw it. A small box wrapped in a red, shiny foil with a gold bow on top sitting on the middle step of the staircase. Her heart warmed, a school girl giggle coming from her lips as she moved quickly to the box. Taking a seat on the very same stair, she pulled the box into her hands and pulled the lid up.

"I'm so sorry to abandon you tonight—H."

Though she felt the slightest twinge of guilt, she couldn't help but feel giddy as she pulled the tissue paper from the box reveling a long, gold, loop necklace that took her breath from her lungs. It was stunning. As she shook her head, wishing he were there to help her with it, to receive the thanks and love she desperately wanted to bestow on him, her eye caught something nestled on the landing above her.

Another box. Larger, more square, but in the same red foil.

"What did you do?" She called out to him, a bit of a smirk on her face as she rose to her feet and hurried up to the box.

Pink suede Manolo Blahnik heels with a note "I promise to make it up to you."

This time her sigh was sad; missing him. She smiled to herself, wondering if he had some fantasy conjured up in his mind that involved just her in these shoes and necklace. Looking down the hall towards their room, she spotted another small note on the floor. Stretching out to reach for it, she opened it up.

"I sincerely hope your stomach is well and that you are not lying on the floor of your bathroom in your pajamas." There was only a flash of confusion before it hit her. The jewelry, the shoes, the stomach and the bathroom and...

"Harry?" She called out into the house. "Are you here?" Pulling herself up, she picked up the shoes and the necklace and, holding it all awkwardly in her arms, she moved down the hall to their room. Pushing the door open, she scanned the room quickly.

"I was resting on their bed; the large, bulky box wrapped in red foil. Dumping the shoes to the ground, laying the necklace on her nightstand, she bounced onto the bed on her knees. Her hands moved to the box, pulling the wrap from it as a child at Christmastime. She tossed the lid to the side with abandon and lifted the note from the top.

"You have one hour."

"Ah!" She clapped her hands together before she took into the tissue paper. She gasped when she saw it; a stunning, luxurious Elie Saab in the softest red flowy fabric.

She was giddy.

One hour. An entire outfit. That could only mean one thing. Without any further deliberation, Maddie jumped from the bed and began to strip her clothes from the day. She had one hour to be ready and dammit if she was going to waste any more time.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

It wasn't just that she felt good in the dress, it wasn't just that it fit her perfectly and flattered her figure in a flawless sort of way that came with this high end kind of craftsmanship. It wasn't just that the dress swooshed around her legs as she moved, that the neckline showed off just enough of her cleavage to tempt him for a comment, but not enough that it would bring one from anyone else.

It wasn't just those things.

It was that she felt unbelievably...sexy.

She felt it from her hair—tossed and teased—to her toes—cradled comfortably in the pink suede Manolos. She felt gorgeous and powerful and so incredibly well-loved. He knew her so well, knew her body so much so that he could gift this amazing ensemble to her—knowing how it would make her feel. Knowing it would make her radiate from inside.

As she stood in front of the floor length mirror, her eyes sweeping over her makeup one last time, she secured the necklace in place and took a deep breath. Her hour was drawing to a close. Reaching for the gold clutch that had been wrapped with the dress, she quickly transferred her essentials and stepped from their room.

She didn't know where she was supposed to be in an hour or what she was supposed to be doing, but she guessed that it wasn't primping in their bedroom. With an air of confidence and self-assuredness, she took to the stairs.

And right on time, right as the clock clicked to the hour, the doorbell rang. Without a glance in the mirror in the entryway, Maddie pulled the door open.

The car was waiting. The driver smiling wide at the door. Arthur, dressed in his black tie finest, standing off to the side. Maddie pulled her wrap around her shoulders and stepped out into the crisp night; shutting the door behind her.

"I see this plot stretches across a multitude of conspirators," her voice was light, just like her step; her smile a permanent fixture.

"Good evening, Ma'am," the driver smiled, moving ahead of her to open the car door.

"Good evening," she nodded to him gracefully. "Arthur, what do you have to say for yourself?" She looked across the top of the car to him with narrowed eyes.
"Not a thing, Ma'am," he smiled back.

"Right," she drawled out the word with a shake of her head before she sighed and stepped into the car. It didn't matter. Whatever it was they were all 'in' on, it was making her heart soar. "Thank you," she called to the driver as he shut her door and moved to his own.

It was a matter of seconds before the car was in motion and all Maddie knew for sure was that this plan of Harry's made her feel young and free and full of the most exciting kind of anxiety. Careful of her dress, she leaned back in the seat and watched as London flew past her—so happy that she didn't even try to guess their destination based on the turns they took.

It didn't matter. She was ready for anything.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

When they arrived at the airport, Maddie grew nervous; a happy sort of nervous that spoke of butterflies and hair perking on end. Her eyes were wide as they scanned the grounds for him, for a sign of him. And when the car turned around, it all came into focus.

The small, chartered plane.

And Harry—in a tuxedo standing at the base of the stairs, smiling wide as the car came to a halt. She hadn't seen him in a week and her heart reacted accordingly; pitter pattering in her chest. Maddie's hand reached for the door handle but Harry had been waiting for a long time and he beat her to it.

"Madeline," his voice was low and drew a chill to her skin as his hand held out for hers.

"Henry," she echoed his tone, her hand reaching into his; the heat warming her as she stepped from the car. Though everything moved around them—the driver pulling a bag she knew she hadn't packed from the trunk and loading it to the plane, Arthur stationing himself at the base of the steps, talking quietly and causally to Jim who was dressed just the same—for Maddie and Harry the world seemed to pause.

"You look amazing." Though he knew she would, his body, his mind was continuously stunned by her beauty.

"I don't know what to say..." She blushed and glanced down at their joined hands, unexplainably nervous. "This was...is...quite a surprise..."

"Really?" Harry chuckled softly. "I thought once you got to the shoes you would have figured it all out. Were you expecting somebody else?" His eyes gleamed in the night sky.

"Bishop," her voice and her attempt at humor was light.

"Of course," Harry rolled his eyes playfully. "You know, one of these days you're going to give me a complex about..."

"Shhhh..." Maddie cut him off, her hand slipped from his and tugged at his lapels; bringing his lips and his body to hers.

The kiss was hot and steamy and full of the edgy sort of sexiness Maddie had felt since she had slipped on the long, beautiful gown. As her tongue pressed into his mouth, she felt the stun slip from him. She felt him recover and take a step forward; taking control of the kiss as his head tilted over hers, taking control of her body as his arms wrapped snugly around her.

"Happy Valentine's Day," he whispered to her, his nose nudging against hers.

"Happy Valentine's Day," she sighed; slightly weakened by his mouth, by this extravagant plan. "Should we..." She smiled a bit bashfully under his gaze. "Should we get in the air?"

"We should," he nodded, still not moving an inch away from her. "We do have opera tickets..."

"Yes," her grin stretched across her face. "And Northern Lights?" Her eyebrows lifted curiously.

"Well..." He shrugged easily. "I did promise you I would take you..."

"You're good," she admitted.

"Better with you," he dropped his hold on her then, capturing her hand in his. Pressing his lips to the back of that hand, he nodded towards the plane. "Shall we?"

"Absolutely," Maddie nodded and with a deep breath, her lungs filled with the cold crisp London air and her heart warmed completely.

Harry had rented an apartment for their weekend stay in Oslo—though, to call it an apartment seemed to be an understatement. The building was immaculate; even the elevator was stunning. When it arrived at the top floor, Harry smiled sleepily at her and nodded towards the penthouse that awaited them. She stepped into the room, letting her eyes travel over the vast opulence as Arthur and Jim went about their business.

"Harry..." She turned a soft smile to him as she moved closer.

"Did you enjoy the opera?" He lifted his eyebrows, his arms encircled her, pulling her into the private space they created with soft voices and a close proximity that shared heat from each of them.

"The opera was beautiful," she nodded, pressing her body closer to his. "This..." She waved her hand towards the place. "...is beautiful. Thank you for this," she tipped her lips up to kiss him.

"We're not done yet," he murmured against her lips.

"No?"

"No," he shook his head, his eyes reanimating; awakening. "Come with me." Taking her hand he pulled her through the room, towards the large windowed wall on the opposite side. "Here..." He reached for one of the large, fluffy, warm coats that hung on a hook next to the door. Holding it out for her, she slipped her arms into the coat; instantly warming even further. After slipping into his own, Harry pulled open the door and beckoned her with a look in his eyes. Following faithfully, Maddie stepped out into the frigid night and, hand wrapped in his, moved with him towards a staircase. The stairs wrapped around the building as they moved up and Maddie stayed focused on her footing, one hand on the railing, the other in his.
And when they reached the landing, the rooftop, she took her first glance up.

"Look..." Harry's voice was low, solemn; his eyes focused outward as his breath made puffs of white from his lips. Maddie's eyes turned to where his were fixed and her lungs hitched in her chest.

"Oh..." It was all she could say; all she could find within her at the moment. It was beautiful. It was past beautiful. It was amazing, a phenomenon, a wonder of the world. She couldn't find the right word—she wondered if there even was a right word. "Harry..." She wanted to cry—afraid her eyes might freeze shut if she allowed tears into them. She had always wanted to be here, always wanted to see the wonder that was the Northern Lights. She had promised herself, more than once, that someday she would get here. But, life happened; things came up. And quite easily that goal had slipped from her mind.

But it hadn't slipped from his. He had heard her tell him once how much she had always wanted to see this, how she had made this a goal of hers. He had heard her, he had listened and now...he had made it a reality.

"Amazing, no?" He held her hand but made no large effort to move her to him, to invade her space, her moment.

"Yes," she nodded, gulping back the lump in her throat. "Thank you...for bringing me here, for making this happen..." She took a deep breath, the cold air stinging her lungs, and turned to face him.

"You're welcome," he smiled and looked off behind them where there was a large, comfortable looking bench with warmed blankets waiting for them. "Want to sit for a moment?"

"Yes," she nodded enthusiastically. They moved to the bench, Harry tucking the blankets around them. Settling against him, nuzzling close to his side, Maddie felt warm and safe and loved. Under the blankets, his hand found hers, his gloved fingers intertwining with hers as his lips pressed a kiss to the top of her head.

It was minutes before he spoke, his warm, deep voice breaking into the silent peacefulness that surrounded them.

"How are you doing Madeline?"

"Right now?" She smiled, her face turning up to look at him. "Or this week?"

"Sure. Right now, this week...with all of it..." He looked to the sky. "The wedding, the planning, the house, the spotlight, the press...how are you doing?" He was checking up on her, checking in; making sure. The things he had learned from studying the past.

"Great," she answered, somewhat surprised by the answer herself. "The wedding is...Well, Joan is a star. The planning is going incredibly smooth and everything seems to be coming together..."

"And you?" He watched her closely for reaction. "You're getting what you want?"

"Well..." She snuggled closer. "Are you still planning on making an appearance?"

"At the wedding?" He laughed.
"Mmm." She nodded.

"Yes. I'll be there."

"Then yes. I'm getting what I want."

"Good then," he couldn't help the wide grin that came with that.

"Renovations started on your mother's place last week. You saw that plans, approved them even."

"Ah yes," he nodded.

"You didn't look them over, did you?"

"I trust you." Was his response; shrugged out with ease. Maddie shook her head, a warm laugh in her throat.

"You know...Thomas sent over an interesting proposition for me today."

"Oh?" That roused his curiosity.

"An organization that would like me as a Chief Patron."

"I thought there was a list of organizations."

"There is."

"What makes this one stick out?"

"It's a branch of Walking with The Wounded."

"Oh?" His face brightened as her words instantly evoked feelings and memories that he had held with him for years.

"It's called Walking with the Women," she explained. "They are women soldiers who were wounded in battle. Obviously they want to tap into my association with you and your association with their founding organization." She took a breath. "They are planning their Inaugural trek for the North Pole..."

"And they want you to go with them?" His eyes were alive.

"They do," she nodded, biting on her lower lip. "What do you think?"

"When will you go?"

"Next Spring. They wanted to gauge my interest and wait to announce after the wedding. Training would start this summer and..." Her eyes scrunched up as she watched the excitement mount on his face. "You think I can do this?"

"I think you're going to freeze your ass off," he laughed. "Of course you can do this. Do you want to do this?"

"I really do," she nodded, her smile pulling her lip from between her teeth. "It's an amazing "organization..."

"It is," he agreed wholeheartedly.

"And it's aligned with work I've already done and..." She paused. "Wow. I think I've chosen my first organization."

"Congratulations," he nudged her with his shoulder. "An excellent choice."

"Thanks," she smiled; sighing closer to him, her shoulders relaxing. "I'll tell Thomas when we get back to London."

"Okay."

"When will that be, by the way?" For the first time since she opened the dress, she had questions about the trip. "How long are we staying? Do I have other clothes or is it Elie Saab for the weekend?"

"We're staying for the weekend and yes, you have other clothes. Though..." He tipped his lips into her neck. "...I'm fine with this being a clothes optional weekend."

"Of course you are," she laughed; low and deep as her hand moved around his neck, pressing his lips closer to her. "We should go inside..."

"What about the lights?" His eyes lifted to the sky.

"They'll be here tomorrow," Maddie mumbled, her lips pressing to his cheek. "It's much too cold out here for clothing optional..."

"It is," he grinned against her skin. "Come on." And he was up, pulling her with him towards the stairs in a fit of lively giggles. They navigated the stairs expertly, slipping back inside the warm apartment. Harry's hands were eager as he pulled her coat from her arms, hanging it next to his. His eyes scanned her in the dress, a wide smile of appreciation. "You're so beautiful..."

"It's an amazing dress," she stepped up to him.

"Mmm..." He nodded, dismissing the dress; his head dipping to press a kiss to her exposed collar bone, his hand finding home at her waist.

"Harry..." She breathed, feeling his fingers working their way to her zipper. "Jim? Arthur?"

"Across the hall," he knew exactly what she was asking as his fingers found their mark, tugging at the small slip of metal.

"Ah..." She sighed, feeling the dress loosen around her, feeling the warmth of his palms on the skin of her back. Not to be outdone, her hands pressed into his jacket, pushing it over his shoulders, forcing his hands from her body as it slipped from his arms to the floor behind him.

Before his hands could return to her, she was pulling at his tie, fumbling with his buttons on his shirt. Joining her in her efforts, he helped her pull both from his body before he caught her hands in his and stalled them.

Bringing both of her hands together in front of him, he kissed the tops of them; each in turn. Then he pulled them apart, his lips moving to the inside of her wrist, dropping one hand to focus his attention on the other.

A soft giggle escaped her mouth as Harry kissed the inside of her elbow, her bicep, tickling her in the slightest. Her free hand moved to his side, pulling him closer to her, seeking the warmth his body provided. With nimble fingers and infinite grace, Harry slipped her dress from her shoulders, offering his hand and his steadiness as she stepped from the mound of elegant fabric.

"Wow..." He was stunned into stillness as he looked her over. "Has that been underneath this the whole time?"

"Yes," she nodded, her head tipping to the side seductively, her eyes shining—the sexiness she had felt the whole night had only increased, leaving her with this feeling of euphoria. Clad in the lightest of lingerie and her pink suede shoes, she reached for his hand and took a step backwards; beckoning him with a curl of her finger. "Want to see what's underneath this?"

"My God yes," he nodded; his nerves on high alert, his body ready to follow her anywhere.
"Where are you going?"

"I have no idea," she laughed; pulling him with her anyway until her legs hit the couch. "Maybe right here?"

"I can work with right here," his eyes had glazed over, moving into full on predator mode as his hands hugged her waist; pulling her to him. His lips kissed hers, lightly; teasingly. "Come here..." He spoke into her mouth; her body arching into his as she met his kiss with her own.

"You come here," she smirked; her hands pulling at the waist of his pants, her eyes holding onto his as she pulled the zipper and pushed at the fabric.

"Yes Ma'am," he drawled; amused at her bossy nature, turned on by her eager hands, her impatient lips, her enthusiasm. And when she tugged him with her towards the couch, he went willingly; his arm reaching out to brace their descent, lowering them both to the warm cushion beneath them.

"Hi..." Maddie smiled wide as his body slid over hers, his hips resting between her thighs as her legs wrapped around him.

"Hi..." He breathed; his fingers moving to push her hair from her face. And just as Maddie was about to speak, just as she was about to offer up some pithy remark or smart comment, Harry's lips were moving against hers, his mouth closing over hers, his kiss taking the place of her wits. Her body arched up into his as it always did, as if it were a magnet pulling towards the source of all of its needs. His fingers left her face, tracing a light trail of sensation down her arm that was tossed over his shoulder, along her side, over her hip. It slowed when it reached her thigh, it stilled as it found her knee. Wrapping tightly around it, he pulled her leg up, away from him—allowing him to move from her grasp. Maddie groaned as he left her, moaned when he returned; pressing a kiss to the inside of her knee as he sat up on his own knees.

Looking down at her, hair askew and eyes dark with lust, he shuddered out a breath and reached for the tiny bit of garment that covered her. As he slid it slowly from her legs, he watched a sigh strangle from her lungs. She was as ready as he was. And as his head dipped down to taste her, he verified that assumption. Her hips pushed up against his mouth, her legs pressing tightly to him; her hand fisting into his hair.
This was always a double edged dance between them. These moments where it was all passion and drive. He loved to do this; make love to her with his mouth, push her to the edge with his tongue. It drove him wild to drive her wild, to make her writhe beneath him.

And she loved it, she loooooooveeed it—in that primal, animalistic moan of a way, she loved how personal it was, how close and intimate. And she loved how good he was at it; loved that it pushed everything from her brain leaving her only tie to sanity at the will of Harry's skilled lips.

The problem was—if you could really call it a problem—that sometimes this was enough for him. He would bring her to her orgasm, pull it from her shuddering body with a wicked smile and soft sort of air about him. And then he would be done. Maddie would try to reciprocate, try to pull him to her but he would shake his head and press lingering kisses to her thighs, her stomach. And the kicker was, it really was because that had been it for him; his goal, his end result. To make her come apart at the mercy of his mouth and, once she did, there was no other high for him to reach. And sometimes that was enough for her; to come apart and find herself pulled into the protectiveness of his arm, playing the role of the small spoon as they drifted to sleep together.

But sometimes that wasn't enough for her. Sometimes she wanted him deep inside of her; pushing into her in a way only he could, pressing spots so hidden that nobody else had ever reached them. Sometimes she needed him to leave her completely spent, worn and tired; unsure if her legs would even work as they were designed to. Sometimes she wanted him to lunge and pound and demand that she tumble over the edge with a fierceness that only came from an intense desire, a powerful love, a drive they shared in only these moments.

And this, this night in Oslo under the Northern Lights, this was one of those moments. She wanted him to take her in that way that was reserved only for him, in that way that reached deep inside of her and pulled his name out of her lungs in that strangled, desperate way that only made him press harder before he would tumble behind her; his own body releasing into her in a fantastic finish—leaving them both sweaty and breathless.

"Harry..." She called out into the room, her breath already labored as she tugged at the red mess of hair between her fingers. When he responded to her with a flick of his tongue, she moaned, bit her lip, and tugged again. "Harry..." She swallowed a gulp of air and found her voice. "I swear to you, if you don't fuck me tonight..." She felt his brief pause, his reaction to her choice of words and she let out a slight laugh, her hold on his hair relaxing. Maybe she had found the secret language she had been searching for. "Harry..." She called out. "Baby..." His tongue pressed into her, pulling a gasp and a moan and a conflict that Maddie would never be able to resolve as long as she lived. "I want you to fuck me Harry..."

She felt his chuckle as his lips left her body, his head shaking slightly between her legs. "Madeline..." She recognized that tone. He was warning her.

"You know you want to," her hips moved slightly, her eyes meeting his as he looked up from her for the tiniest of moments. And then, with a newfound drive, motivated by the way her words were driving his body mad, his lips returned to her; on a mission. "Oh!" She called out, hips bucking up to him.

"Mmm..." He moaned into her, his fingers holding tight to her hips, holding her to him as he continued. In seconds she was there, in seconds she was coming undone, in seconds she was pressing up into him as she fell apart around him.

"Harry...I..." She was gasping for air and before she could come down, before she could even begin to recover from that intensity, he was moving.

"You want me to fuck you baby?" His eyes were dark with heat and Maddie's only response was a gasp. And that's all she had time for because his lips smeared against hers as he captured her; her mouth and her body. Without warning, without precipice, he was plunged deep inside of her; his hands pulling at her legs, stretching them wide to make room for him.

"Oh..." He pushed breath from her lungs when he pulled out only to push back in; hard and deep. Still fresh from her first orgasm, Maddie's nerves were on end, every sensation she felt, she felt tenfold. And it was almost too much for her sensitive skin, her recovering body. His arms moved under her then, wrapping around her and holding her tight to him; wrapping his entire body around hers as he kissed her swollen lips.

"If you...want me...to...fuck you..." His words were coming out in bursts with each thrust of his hips, with each groan from her.

"Harry..." She gasped.

"Then I will..." He pushed into her, holding himself there as they both struggled with where they were headed. His breath was hot against her face as he stalled, as he held her in this amazing purgatory, her body pushed to the edge. He kissed her then, his tongue pushing into her mouth, tangling with hers as she struggled to keep up.

"I can't," she shook her head, referring to her ability to handle the feelings that surged through her body.

"Yes you can," his mouth was hot on her neck, sucking just enough to pull the skin into his mouth, but light enough so as not to leave a mark—not there. "Come on baby...You wanted to be fucked..." He pulled out, pushed back in; her head tipping back in his hands, hair tangling in his fingers as she groaned.

"I..." She gasped, the pressure and heat swelling and building and. "Harry..."

"Yes," he nodded; pushing in and out.

"I..."

"Yes." He commanded; relentless.

"Please..."

"Well, since you said please..." He chuckled into her neck and released his bear hug around her. One hand moved to her hip as the other moved to cup her breast, thumbing her nipple as he adjusted his speed, adjusted his depth. "I love you Madeline," his breath drew heavy and quick. "Come with me..."

And then he went. He was loud and strangled and heavy as he pressed into her, sending her over for the second time that night.

It was with great joy and tangled limbs that Maddie took his weight as he laid into her; his heart beating feverishly in his chest as he pressed his face to her heaving chest; allowing a soft, sweet kiss to her still tender nipples. He sighed; relaxing against her. Maddie's hands fell limp on his shoulders, her eyes blinking back tears born of relief and intensity as a giggle slipped from her lips.
"I would say fuck..." She breathed. "But after that I'm not sure my body can handle what comes next..." His laughter came from deep inside of him, traveling through her as he looked up; his chin resting on her breast bone.

"Are you okay?" He ran soft hands over her hip bone, down her thigh; soothing away the way he had roughed her up only moments before.

"Yes," she was certain, assuring him with a nod and a smile. "Beyond okay."

"Okay," he smiled, stroking her leg that was still wrapped around him. "Okay."

"And you?" She ruffled his hair.

"Hmm..." He grinned into the skin of her stomach, kissing her there before he moved away from her, leaning to kiss her lips. "Yes. Yes..." He kissed her again. "Absolutely yes. I'll be right back," he sealed his promise with another kiss before he rose to his feet and made way for the bathroom.

Maddie turned on her side, feeling warm and giddy, and watched as he walked away from her. He had an amazing body, he really did; toned and muscular and every inch of it was hers to kiss and love and call her own. It was a heady thing—to watch him move and know that she would be spending the rest of her life with him, with that unbelievable body and his equally beguiling mind. She stretched her arms up over her head and sighed into the blissful state that always followed making love to Harry.

"Are you hungry?" Harry called out to her as he returned to the room.

"You know me so well," she sighed, pulling herself into a sitting position.

"Why don't you put on some pajamas and meet me in the kitchen?" He leaned to kiss her once more before pulling his boxers up to sit low on his hips while he shrugged into his t-shirt.

"Okay," she grinned. "Care to tell me where my pajamas are?"

"Ah yes," he smiled and nodded to the hall behind her. "Our room's at the back. Your things are in there."

Maddie was quick on her feet, hurrying down the hall to the massive room that was theirs for the next two nights. Pulling open a few drawers, she finally found her stuff. A wide, sweet smile on her face, she hurried back to the living room.

"I have to say, I'm impressed."

"Oh?" He called out, confused. "How so?"

"When faced with packing my clothes for the weekend, you went with my more modest and more comfortable pajamas." He laughed to himself as he looked to the pajamas in her hand.

"Yes well, the others seemed more self-serving, if you know what I mean."

"I do. Though surely on a weekend such as this, you could afford to be a little self-serving."

"If I knew then what I know now..." He grinned.
"Maybe a compromise?" She pulled on the pajama top and slipped into her lacy boy shorts from earlier.

"Perfect." He smacked his lips as he looked her over, trying to ignore the pull in his stomach.

"Okay now..." She pressed a kiss to his shoulder. "What was this about food?"

"Ah yes," he clapped his hands together. "The kitchen. I'm going to cook."

"You're going to cook?" She stared after him in confusion.

"Yes," he laughed at her as he moved around the already stocked room, pulling out items as he did. "A very wise man once said that you can tell a lot about a man by cooking a meal with him..."

"Oh really?" She smiled.

"Yes," he leaned to kiss her lips. "And I have been preparing to prepare this meal for quite a while."

"Preparing to prepare?" She crossed her arms over her chest, taking inventory of the items he had pulled from the cupboards and the fridge.

"Bernard gave me a few...tips."

"Tips?"

"He taught me how to make his pizza."

"Shut up!" She was stunned; flabbergasted. "I've been begging him to teach me since I moved in with you."

"Yes, well..." Harry thought for a moment and shrugged. "I guess he loves me more."

"I guess!" She shook her head, moving closer to him, looking at everything a bit more closely.

"Or maybe he loves you more and wanted to make me work for it..." Harry grinned, taking in the breadth of the task he was about to undertake. "Either way...I'm about to make you some pizza."

"This is lining up to be the best holiday ever." She clapped her hands together excitedly.

"And we're not even done yet," Harry laughed at her, holding out a bottle of wine. "Would you mind pouring a few glasses?"

"Not at all," she sighed and took the bottle from his hands. She had no idea what else it was he had planned for the weekend, but it was off to a magnificent start. Moving to locate glasses and a corkscrew, Maddie sighed into herself; content and happy and warm—from head to toe.

Bliss. Pure bliss.
Chapter 93

Spring had come early in London. Or at least it felt that way at Kensington Palace. Their trip to Oslo had been the kind of reprieve the couple had needed before they returned to the uphill hike that would be the next few months leading up to their nuptials.

They had a lot to do, a lot of ground to cover. But the sun was shining. And the sun shining in London, in March, was a moment to be appreciated, and Maddie had every intention of doing just that. She slipped on a spring-y dress for the trip they would be taking to Highgrove for the weekend as guests of Charles and Camilla. She pulled her hair up, toyed with the thought of sandals but, realizing it wasn't quite that nice, she went for something a bit warmer.

She felt light and easy and the tad bit giggly as she almost bounced down the stairs where Harry was waiting for her. Their bags had been packed and loaded and they were simply waiting for her. She planted a kiss to his cheek and reached for her purse. Though he shook his head, he couldn't help but smile at her bubbliness. She could see the question in his eyes as he looked her over.

"I'm excited," she explained, running a hand across his chest as she passed him towards the door.

"I see that," he followed behind as though she had beckoned him. "Care to let me in on the joke?"

"No joke," she grinned. "I'm excited. I'm marrying you."

"In three months," he reminded, stepping out into the sunny day.

"I'm that excited," she shrugged.

"Wow..." He chuckled, slipping into the car behind her, the door closing behind him. "At least the car ride should be interesting."

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

If Maddie had stopped to really analyze her life, she would have been embarrassed to admit how much of it was becoming routine.

The security detail. The driver of the Rolls Royce they traveled in. The meetings at St. James Palace. The casual way she went to The Prince of Wales' home for the weekend.

It had become such a part of her life that it no longer seemed a dream, no longer seemed something that belonged to him, to them. It was hers now too. If she would have taken a moment to really look at that, she would have been in awe at the surreal-ness of it all.

But on that early spring day, the only thing that was out of sorts was waiting to greet them when they arrived. Instead of Charles and Camilla, it was Charles and another older gentleman who stood in casual conversation as the couple pulled up the drive.

"Charles!" Maddie burst from the car with the very same energy Harry had been teasing her about all morning. She slipped into the slightest of curtseys before being pulled into his arms for a hug and kisses—his smile rivaling hers.

"Good morning Madeline," he was joyed by her mood, even when he sent a look to his son who shrugged.

"I think Bernard's slipping something in her eggs," he hugged his father hello, finding his friend's presence a bit more confusing than his peppy partner.

"Wonderful," Charles loved his children dearly—all of them, Kate and Maddie included. But he couldn't help but become more and more amused with the young blonde who now took it upon herself to greet their additional visitor.

"Good morning," she smiled at him, her eyes taking in his appearance, skirting through her memory to place him but coming up with nothing.

"Madeline, this is Ronald Young, an old friend of mine." Charles turned his attention to her. "Ron, this is my future daughter-in-law, Doctor Madeline Forrester."

"Good to meet you," Maddie stretched her hand to his; oblivious to the way Harry was watching the exchange.

"It's a real pleasure to meet you Ma'am," he smiled warmly, offering a firm handshake.

"And you've met my son before, Harry," Charles nodded to Harry who smiled and nodded in return.

"Mr. Young," his hand took the place of Maddie's.

"Sir."

"Well, shall we go inside?" Charles turned his body towards the door, the staff already shuffling in bags from the car. "Camilla is excited to hear wedding details and I believe that lunch will be served shortly."

"Fantastic!" Maddie clapped her hands together and, as all three men stood to the side, she moved past them into the house. As she walked ahead of them she missed the way Harry's eyes met Charles', she missed the unspoken questions, the unspoken answers.

But both were soon to come to her realization, both would be spoken. After lunch, Camilla asked Harry if he would join her in the study, help her look over some papers that had been sent up regarding a project she had been working on for him for Sentebale. Agreeing, he pressed a kiss to Maddie's cheek and smiled as his father suggested they take a walk through the grounds.

Maddie easily and quite eagerly agreed. It had been sometime since they had been to Highgrove and she always felt a connection to the property, to the land. Though it was favorable weather, she slipped into her rubber wellies and pulled on a heavier sweater before joining Charles and his friend for a causal stroll through the property. The air in Tetbury was chillier than it was in London and the remaining snow on the ground crunched under their feet. But Maddie didn't mind, she kept up the pace, keeping casual conversation as Charles pointed out newly roughed in areas for more orchard space, as he debated out loud, but to himself, over which herbs would be added to the mix. Out of the corner of her eye, Maddie swore she saw a nod pass between the two men before Ronald Young cleared his throat and went for a causal air as he turned to Maddie.

"I understand you've been receiving letters at St. James Palace?" His eyes shifted to the area Charles had been pointing to and then, as if the subject wasn't serious at all, he turned to his good friend and pointed. "Those. What kind of apples grow there?"
Charles had his hands behind his back, a smile on his lips. "Those are not apple trees, Ronnie." He chuckled; low and deep. "It seems the city has finally won out over your country heart." The two men held a long laugh together as Maddie looked between them.

This wasn't the first time Maddie had heard of the letters. Thomas had brought the concern to Harry, Maddie, and Charles earlier that week. At the time, Harry had seemed more concerned than Charles who had remained calm and casual and instructed them to pass it onto the Security Team and to keep an eye on it. But now, as Maddie looked between him and his old friend from home, she wasn't so sure.

"I guess," she shrugged, looking out over the vast land, inhaling a sharp breath of fresh air. "St. James gets a lot of letters. Why should those be any more threatening?"

"We don't know that they are," Charles spoke then, his eyes trained in the distance. "But Mr. Young thinks that maybe it might be time to put some paperwork in place, an order. A precautionary measure if nothing else..." His eyes snuck to the side, wanting to gauge her response.

"Oh?" Maddie's tone shifted from dazed and casual to inquisitive. A bright smile pulled at her pink cheeks. "I'm sorry Mr. Young. We don't know each other at all. What is it that you...do?" His smile was quaint, his nod was presumptuous; he was used to this questioning look.

"Mr. Young has served as an Advisor to myself and Camilla in the past," Charles spoke on his behalf before he could even open his mouth. "He's well respected and discreet. I asked him to weigh in on this situation. I assure you, his only thought is in our best interests, in looking out for you."

"Of course," Maddie turned her smile to the only father she had in her life. Suddenly, she wished Harry were there. She wished he had come on their walk, wondered if he had been left at the house purposefully. It wasn't that she didn't trust Charles, it wasn't that she didn't know what to think of Mr. Young and his suggestion that she sign paperwork—a restraining order Maddie guessed. It was merely that her ability to read Harry's reactions was greater than her ability to read Charles' and, through his eyes, she would be better able to gauge the seriousness of this moment. Taking a deep of breath, and a great amount of faith in her father, she nodded. "Of course. If you think it's for the best then I'll do it...whatever you need me to sign."

"I do," Charles nodded, reaching out for her hand; enveloping her small fingers in his large, protective paws. "I think it's for the best."

"Okay then," she took a deep breath and nodded.

"I'll have them ready to go before dinner tonight," Mr. Young smiled, nodding between the two of them. "We can sign them before we are seated."

"Fantastic," Charles spoke the final words on the matter and moved on. Pulling his daughter's hand through his arm, he dismissed Mr. Young to his duties and spoke in his more casual, his more natural tone. "Now, Madeline. If you would humor me for a few moments longer, I would like to show you what we've done out back."

"I would be happy to," she squeezed his arm and took the first step in that direction. Mr. Young and his papers fluttered from their minds as their attention was drawn elsewhere.
"Mr. Young wants me to sign some paperwork," Maddie called out to Harry as they dressed for dinner. She stood in their bathroom, leaning towards the mirror as she slipped in a pair of earrings.

"Oh?" Harry called out from the bedroom, tugging a tie around his neck. "What kind of paperwork?"

"I don't know for sure," she shrugged as he appeared in the doorway. "Something to do with those letters Thomas told us about this week."

"Yeah?" Harry seemed more intrigued as his hands abandoned his tie, reaching for the necklace in her hands and motioning for her to turn around. "You're going to sign them?"

"Your father thinks it's a good idea," she smiled as his fingers tickled the soft skin of her neck before they pulled back, necklace in place.

"Well, if dad thinks it's a good idea..." He shrugged as he returned to his tie.

"Have you signed stuff like this before?" She watched him as he moved around the room, tucking and pulling and finishing up his look.

"Sure," he flashed a grin her way. "I've signed a ton of paperwork at my father's urging. Look..." He moved to her then, his hands settling on her shoulders as he smiled reassuringly. "I'm sure it's just a formality, just a precaution. They want to get something on paper in case they ever need to move forward on anything."

"Yeah," Maddie sighed. "That's what he said, Mr. Young. That's what he said."

"Well, I'm sure Ronnie knows what he's doing," Harry laughed lightly. "You're not worried are you?"

"What?" Maddie laughed, flipping off the light to the bathroom and stepping into their room. "No! Absolutely not. It's all just new to me. I've never had...fans...before..." Her face twisted as she said it.

"I disagree," Harry's smirk grew cocky. "Travis Meeks?"

"Ha!" She moved past it all, moved to his arms. "You're right. You're right." Leaning her head up she pressed a kiss to his lips; dismissing the discussion. "Let's go sign this stuff...I'm starving."

"Let's go," with a swift pat to her ass, Harry took her hand and pulled her with him from the room.

Maddie's early Spring chipper mood was drawn to a quick and jagged end when she was jarred from her sleep the next morning. Her phone rang out into their room, disturbing the sweet, wonderful slumber that came with the country air at Highgrove. Harry could hear her awaken, he felt her sit up. He knew she was trying to avoid disturbing him but it was all pointless. If she was up, he was up. He grumbled and pulled his pillow over his head; not the easiest person at that particular hour. He took a deep breath and pressed his eyes closed, hoping to hold onto that last thread of sleep but...
"Harry," Maddie was soft and quiet but she was most certainly waking him up. His pillow lifted away from him and the light from the rising sun joined in on her efforts. "Harry wake up."

"No," he shook his head in the slightest, his hand reaching out to her, hoping to pull her back to him, back to sleep.

"Harry, you have to wake up. Something's happened." There was just enough edge to her voice—Harry's eyes peeled open and he looked up at her.

"What is it?"

"It's Ella," Maddie swallowed the lump in her throat, blinked at the tears. "Her father's dead."

That did it. He was awake.

"Are you sure you don't want me to come with you?" Harry followed behind Maddie as she hurried to the car. As soon as she had hung up the phone that morning, she had kicked into gear. She had showered, dressed, said good-bye to Charles who was more than understanding and she was on her way back to London in a matter of minutes. Her Security detail and the driver were ready and waiting only for her.

"No," Maddie shook her head, her sorrowful eyes hidden behind her dark sunglasses. "You have to be at that meeting on Monday and I'm just going to...I'm going to go with her to Dublin. We'll be in the air tonight I would imagine."

"You'll let me know?" He pulled open the car door, leaning against it as he looked her over, wishing he could hold onto her, hug her close—but knowing she needed to go.

"As soon as I do," Maddie nodded, pressing her lips together.

"Bishop is on his way back?" He reached out, tucking a strand of hair behind her ear.

"Yes," she nodded, her eyes tearing up again. "But he's in China and...I hate that she was alone when it happened. She has such a contentious relationship with her family and..."

"Go," Harry nodded to the car. "You'll be there in over an hour. She won't be alone much longer. Travel safe. Call me."

"Okay," she smiled at him, thankful for his strength, for his support; for him.

"Are you going to be okay?" His fingers stroked her cheek and she knew exactly what he was referring to.

"Yes," she answered though her head shook slightly. A small, muffled laugh pushed from her lips. "Yes. I'll be fine." Her fingers wrapped around the back of his neck as she pulled him to her for a kiss. "I'll be fine. I'll call you with flight details and I'll be safe."

"If you need me, you call me," his eyes leveled with hers. "I can cancel meetings. I can rearrange things and..."
"I know," she grinned, kissing him one more time before releasing him and turning towards the car. "Go to your meeting. I'll call you when I get to London and know more. I'll call you when I get to Dublin. I'll call you with the plans..."

"Okay," he had to be satisfied with that. Though his heart hurt for Ella, his heart also hurt for Maddie—knowing what this was bringing up for her. "I love you Madeline."

"I love you too," she smiled a weak smile for him and then, with the slightest of waves, she slipped into the car. Harry shut the door behind her, gave a soft pat to the metal and waved as she moved away from him.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

"How is she?" Harry spoke into his phone as he stepped into the car that would take him home. He had made his Monday meeting and now all he wanted to do was get home, get to Dublin, get to Maddie.

"She's..." Maddie smiled at her friend who sat across the room, looking through old photos with her mother while Bishop boiled water for tea in the kitchen. Maddie lowered her voice and turned away from them. "She's doing...okay."

"Yeah?"

"It's weird. I wish I could put a finger on it but..." She shook her head. "I don't know. Ella's not quite herself."

"Well her father just died," it seemed completely reasonable to him.

"Yes," Maddie nodded. "But she hasn't really been able to look me in the eye and...I don't know," she shook her head. "She's okay. Better now that Bishop is here actually."

"Everything's better when Bishop is there," Harry grinned, recalling the numerous times he had alleviated the chaotic nature of his own life.

"Agreed," Maddie nodded, recalling the same. "You'll be here tomorrow?"

"Yes," he sighed, thankful to finally be joining his friends where he was needed; where he needed to be. "The viewing's tomorrow?"

"Yes," Maddie nodded.

"This is going to sound crazy but I had no idea Ella was Catholic."

"Yeah," Maddie chuckled softly. "Bishop was just as surprised. He wouldn't shut up about it."

"He's hoping to see her uniform," Harry laughed.

"Of course."

"Viewing tomorrow, funeral the day after?" Harry confirmed the itinerary, wanting to make sure.

"Yes," Maddie nodded and gulped. "I'm glad you're coming."
"I wouldn't be anywhere else," he assured her. "Hug her for me?"

"Absolutely."

"I'll see you tomorrow."

"I love you."

"I love you."

The day of Ella's father's viewing was a tense one. The time at home was beginning to wear on Ella, the time with her family beginning to drag her down. Planning a funeral for a man who had brought a lot of anger and instability to their family was only proving to highlight the anger and instability that resonated in those walls. Maddie and Bishop tried their best to be there for her, tried to shoulder some of the burden, but the fight was internal, the battle was inside. And it tugged at Ella in ways she hadn't felt since she was younger, before she left for school, Bendal, London.

Bishop, being the English gentleman he was, offered to drive Ella's mother to the church the morning of the viewing so that she could deliver her late husband's glasses and favorite tie in preparation for the services that night. Ella did not want to go. She didn't want to be anywhere near the event until she was required to do so and her brother wouldn't be there until later that night. So Bishop went and Maddie stayed.

"Is there anything..." Maddie's voice trailed off as she looked at her friend, staring out the window over the sink in the kitchen. Her face was broken, twisted as she struggled with the feelings she couldn't quite articulate. She glanced to Maddie then, wiping harshly at the tear that dared to fall onto her cheeks. With a nod, she bit off that emotion and sniffed.

"How do you feel about whiskey?"

"Whiskey?" Maddie's eyebrows shot up. "It's ten in the..." She caught herself, drew her caution back in and nodded. "Whiskey's good."

"Great." Ella clapped her hands together and moved across the kitchen. Kneeling down, she moved a few boxes of food from a cupboard; cereal, crackers and then with a crooked grin, she pulled out a bottle of whiskey. Rising to her feet she left the cupboard as it was; open with boxes scattered around. "You know..." She moved towards where Maddie stood. "When he was alive...if you touched this bottle, even if he thought that you had touched this bottle..." Her eyes welled up and her face twisted, hating that she was crying over this, over him. Swallowing she continued. "There would be hell to pay."

"Yeah?" Maddie wanted to hug her. She wanted to hug her close and tight enough so as to push these childhood memories from her mind. She knew Ella's father was a drinker and when he drank, he was mean. And he drank a lot.

"Yeah." She twisted the cap, a defiant smirk on her lips. "But he's dead now so..." She reached toward the counter, pulling a newly washed glass from the strainer and handing it to Maddie, pouring some of the dark liquid into the glass. Meeting her friend's eyes, she clinked the bottle to the glass and with the steadiest voice she had spoken with since they had arrived, "So fuck him." Maddie controlled her flinch, she held Ella's eyes and she raised her glass to her lips.
"Fuck him." It felt odd coming out of her mouth, but she said it anyway. Truth was, she hadn't known the man at all. All she knew of him was from the few stories from her past Ella would share on some hot, drunken night in Bendal or one of the few scattered times they became sentimental. She had known things were less than wonderful but she hadn't known that it was quite like this. As Ella tossed back a large slug of whiskey, Maddie swallowed back the burn in her throat and nodded.

It was ten in the morning. On the day of Ella's father's viewing. Harry was in the air as she stood there.

And she was drinking whiskey with Ella.

"If I don't remember..." Ella spoke then, smiling back another sip. "If I forget later...if I..." She laughed and reached out, her hand lingering on Maddie's arm. "Thank you for being here right now."

"Of course," Maddie's response was quick.

"It's not...pretty here. It's...ugh..." Ella groaned. "Once the family shows it's going to be so much worse and...if I forget...it saves me that you're here. You and Bishop and Harry. It saves me."

"We love you," Maddie felt tears in her eyes for the way her friend was struggling. "I love you."

"I love you too." Ella's voice drained, her head slumping down as tears slipped from her eyes. Shaking her head, she tried to fight it. She hated this more than anything.

"Hey..." Maddie moved closer, sliding next to her; their bodies touching from shoulder to hip. Ella took a moment, wiped at her eyes, and pulled her head up. Glancing at Maddie, she allowed the smallest of smiles for the briefest of moments.

"More whiskey?" She held up the bottle.

"More whiskey." Maddie nodded. If this was what Ella needed, this is what they were doing.

By the time Harry arrived at the house, Maddie and Ella had changed into appropriate clothing and had managed to put quite the dent into the bottle of whiskey. When Bishop had returned with Ella's mother, her eyes had gone instantly to the open cupboard, flashing right up to the bottle in Ella's hand. Her eyes were wide with fear.

"Would you like some?" Ella's eyebrows had lifted, her voice hot with a challenge. Her mother glanced to Maddie, to Bishop and retreated; a tired no shaking from her head. Before Bishop could ask anything, the doorbell was ringing and Arthur was stepping towards the hallway.

"Harry's here," Maddie met Bishop's eyes before she followed Arthur, Bishop sliding into the spot next to Ella that Maddie had just vacated.

When Maddie made it to the front door, Ella's mother was wide eyed and surprised as Harry shook her hand, speaking in low tones as he conveyed his sympathy for her loss. Maddie watched him for a moment, watched him work, watched him charm before she stepped out of the shadow of the hall and made her presence known with a small cough. Mrs. Marshall smiled softly at Maddie and excused herself to her bedroom. Maddie's eyes met Harry's as the door shut behind him, Arthur and Brad exchanging information. He pulled off his overcoat and smoothed down his black suit as he looked for a place to distribute the stiff wool.

"Here," Maddie reached for it, taking it to the hook next to the door behind him. Turning to him, she blinked back unexpected tears at the sight of him, the relief that came with him. "Hi."

"Hi," he offered a small smile, reaching for her.

"Mmmm..." Her voice was muffled into his neck as she hugged him tight. "I'm so happy you're here." She lifted her lips to his then, pressing a kissing into his mouth; pushing for just a moment longer than one might consider acceptable in the hallway of a mourning widow.

"Are you..." Harry’s tongue swiped over his lips as his eyes took her in; her pink cheeks, hazy eyes. "I'm sorry, are you drunk?" His voice was low as he whispered; his eyes glancing back and forth down the hallway.

"A little bit, yes," she muffled a half laugh with her hand. "I am a little bit drunk."

"You got drunk before a funeral?" He was torn between propriety and amusement.

"It's a viewing," she corrected him, taking his hand in hers and leading him towards Ella and Bishop.

"Still."

"Ella wanted to drink," she shrugged, her mind drifting to the mounting reasons behind that. "It's her father, it's...I had to."

"Had to?" Harry pulled her to a stop. "I'm sorry love, I know things are hard but..."

"No," Maddie shook her head, her eyes welling up as she stepped into him, lowering her voice.
"It's not hard. It's...it's terrible. I'm...I'm ninety five percent certain her father would drink and get violent with her and her brother and..." She wiped at her eyes and took a deep breath. "She's my best friend. I had to...I had to shut off my Psychologist brain and drink with her. I had to."

"Okay," he nodded. He understood. He got it. He'd go down that road with Bishop no questions asked. "Okay," he nodded, scanning her. "You okay? You need anything?"

"No," she smiled. "Just you."

"You got that baby." He kissed her forehead. "Come on. Let's go to Ella."

"Okay," she sighed, tugging at his hand again. "I hope you brought your drinking shoes."

"My drinking shoes?" He couldn't help the laugh.

"I don't know," she sighed with a shake of her head. "I'm drunk. Roll with it."

~~~~~~~~~~~

When Harry joined the group, Ella was quick to offer him a glass of whiskey which he took.
Though he was hesitant at first.
"What's the matter Harry?" She had teased him. "Is it too early for you? I think your English is showing."

"Nice," he had shaken his head and held out his hand. "Give me a glass."

"One glass of whiskey coming up," she clapped her hands together. "For Merry Ol' Harry." Though Bishop nearly lost his mouthful of his own drink, it caused a moment of laughter among the somber group.

And the drinking continued. Well, Maddie and Ella drinking continued. Though the men took down a few, they could both clearly see that Ella was heading towards a breaking point. Though none of them would ever think to put a stop to what she wanted, they recognized a downward spiral when they saw one. And, while Maddie went head first with her best friend, Bishop and Harry were going to be there to catch them when they hit bottom.

And they did hit.

Hours later when they were at the funeral home. The foursome had been escorted off to a side room to wait for the service to start. Ella's mother had gone in with her brother, taking a seat in the front pew while other mourners filed in.

"I think I'm going to be sick," Ella groaned as the door shut behind them.

"I told you mixing whiskey and gin was a bad idea," Harry shook his head as Maddie reached for a trashcan.

"Not from that," she rolled her eyes in his direction. "From this..." Her thumb jutted towards the room in the funeral home where her father laid in rest.

"Ella..." Maddie's voice was soft.

"All of these people? Pretending they loved him? Pretending they miss him?" She laughed; a short, harsh bark of a laugh. "It's annoying and irritating and a great big fucking joke."

"Hey..." Bishop's eyes were soft on her.

"I'm serious," she laughed again, wiping at her eyes. "Nobody loved that man. Nobody misses that man. But we're all going to go in there and pretend that he wasn't the great big asshole that he was!"

"Hey..." Maddie reached for her hand, worried that her voice could be heard among the mourners. "Come on."

"Come on?" Ella turned teary eyes to her best friend. "Madeline. I love you. I do. But you have no idea what I'm talking about."

"Ella..."

"You don't!" She yelled bringing a flinch from every person in the room. "Your father was an amazing man," she started to cry. "He loved you so much. He made you feel like you were worth something, like you were worth everything...like you mattered..." Though Bishop took a step forward, towards her, Ella took a step back. "That man out there!" She pointed; angry. "He was not like your father! He made me feel..." Her hand fell over her heart that was aching in her chest.
"He made me feel like I didn't deserve...anything."

"I'm so sorry," Maddie was crying too.

"I hate him..." Ella told her.

"I know."

"I hate him."

"I know you do," Maddie nodded. "But..." But there was a service. There were people.

"No buts!" She yelled out. "You don't get to tell me how to feel right now!"

"I'm not trying to tell you how to feel, Ella..." Maddie's own eyes spilled over.

"I hate him! I...I hate him..." Even Harry choked up at the sight of their friend folding in over herself. "I...I..." She shook her head, her fight deflating.

Maddie didn't know what to do. She wanted to go to her, wanted to pull her into her arms and run; shield her from this moment, from this day. But she couldn't. Ella didn't want that from her. She was right, Maddie had no idea what it was like to hate her father. To hate him and be expected to mourn him.

Maddie felt Harry's hand on her shoulder, holding her back and she watched as Bishop stepped forward. Tugging at his pants, he kneeled in front of where Ella sat. His hand found her knee.

"I hate him too," his voice was low, his expression stoic. Maddie bit her lip. "I hate him too Ella. Look at me love..." His hand cupped her cheek, his body inched closer. "I hate him for what he did to you and to your mother. I hate that he made you feel this way." He kissed the top of her knee. "You can hate him. Nobody is saying you can't hate him. I'll hate him with you. I'll sit right next to you and we'll hate him together. But right now...right now we have to go in there and sit in that church and...we'll tell the bastard good-bye."

"Yeah?" She met his eyes, not even minding the way her tears were falling.

"Yeah," he nodded kissing her hands in his. "We'll do this and then the four of us can head out. We don't have to be with all of these people. Harry will get us all drunk and then we can crash at the hotel till the funeral tomorrow."

"Yeah?" She glanced to Harry who nodded.

"Absolutely."

"Okay..." She took a deep breath and nodded to Bishop. When Ella rose to her feet, she clung to Bishop like he was her life line. Nothing in the entire world could have pulled them apart. She needed him like she needed air—more than she needed air.

Her eyes lifted to meet Maddie's, an apology forming on her lips. "Maddie..."

"Shhh..." Maddie shook her head, putting a stop to the words before they ever began. Her hand moved to squeeze hers as Bishop moved Ella past the two of them and into the church. Harry's hand graced his best friend's shoulder for a pause of a moment as he walked by him. And then it was just the two of them.

"Are you okay?" Harry's concern turned to his heart.

"I don't even know how to..." She shook her head and wiped at her eyes. "I'm okay."

"Okay," he plucked her hand into his, brought it to his lips and then laced it through his arm. "Come on love. Let's go tell Ella's father good-bye." Harry paused. "The asshole."

"Bastard," Maddie whispered and, though a tiny smile tugged at her lips, she was full of complete and utter disdain for whatever this man had done to her best friend. But as they took their seats next to Ella and Bishop, she felt Ella's hand slide into her own and she held onto her as tight as she could; not at all ready to let her go.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

"Thank God that's over," Ella was the epitome of relief as she slid into the booth at the pub the group had decided on.

"It was a nice service," Bishop offered, sliding in next to her as Harry and Maddie did the same on the opposite side. "What?" He smiled when Ella glared up at him. "It was."

"Should we have invited your brother?" Harry asked, relaxing into the dark leather of the booth.

"No," Ella shook her head with a yawn. "He has his wife and his gaggle of kiddos to look after. He'll be fine."

"I had no idea you had a brother," Harry laughed at himself. "Or nieces and nephews. I'm a terrible friend."

"No," she laughed. "I never talk about them, obviously."

"I am just surprised to find that there is so much I didn't know about you."

"Like what a terrible drunk I am?" Her smile wavered as her eyes focused on Maddie. "Madeline I am so sorry..."

"Please don't be," Maddie shook her head, her heart hurting at the look in her best friend's eyes.

"I didn't mean to yell at you back there, to take it out on you..."

"I know that," she reached across the table for her hand. "But you don't need to apologize to me. I love you. I adore you. You can use me as your punching bag whenever you need to..."

"Oh yeah?" Ella laughed through her tears, more upset at the way she had spoken to her friend.

"As long as we kiss and make up afterwards," Maddie winked and squeezed her hand.

"You got it," Ella squeezed back.

"Is it wrong to be turned on right now?" Bishop looked across the table at Harry, his humor returning.
"Little bit," Harry held his fingers centimeters apart.

"Ah fuck it," Bishop shrugged and kissed Ella's cheek. "I'm heading to the bar. What'll be ladies? Whiskey or Gin?" As a round of laughter passed over them, Ella decided they should lay off just a bit and suggested beer. With a small salute and a look of love, Bishop went to do their bidding.

"Now..." Maddie took a breath. "Without any judgment, I need to know. Are we going to the funeral sauced too? Because if we are...I need to pace myself. I'm not nineteen anymore."

"Ha!" Ella laughed, a solid, wonderful laugh. "No. No, I think I'll go sober to the funeral tomorrow. Maybe I've gotten it out of my system."

"Okay," Maddie nodded, leaning into Harry's arm that was wrapped around her. "I'm game though, you just...say the word."

"I love you so much," Ella stretched her hand out to Maddie's.

"I love you too," Maddie's fingers reached for Ella's.

"You two should hold off on this," Harry spoke up with a smirk. "Bishop's going to hate that he missed it."

Harry had no idea what time it was when rose from the booth and went on a mission. Maddie and Bishop had quite easily been drawn into an argument over their respective skills on the dart board and, having renewed their previous tipsy state, they had a battle on their hands. Ella had watched them leave and, with a small smile at Harry, excused herself to step outside for some fresh air.

Harry had nodded and allowed her space and time. But, as he ended the third round of "Row Your Boat" in his head, he decided it was time to check in on her. With a quick glance at Maddie and Bishop, he shrugged into his coat and followed Ella's route towards the back; Brad a quiet ghost behind him. Pushing out the door, he found her easily; wrapped up in Bishop's coat and perched on a bench towards the edge of the deck. She looked up to him as he approached; a welcoming smile in her eyes.

"They send you to check on me?" She cracked a grin. "Cowards."

"Nah," Harry shook his head, taking a seat next to her. "I came on my own. Cigarette?" He held one out to her.

"What?" She almost started laughing at him. "I don't smoke! And neither do you, or so I thought."

"I don't," Harry shook his head. "Not really. Not anymore. I just thought...we're here in Dublin, drunk as fuck. We're burying your father tomorrow so...what the hell, you know?"

Ella pondered on that for only a second before she nodded and reached for the cigarette in his hand. Harry grinned as he lit hers and then his; settling back against the bench.

"Listen..." Harry's voice was low, serious. "Maddie and Bishop; they have, had, wonderful parents." He felt Ella stiffen next to him. "Even with Bishop's parents divorced...they both had two parents who were sane and stable and loved them and..." He wasn't looking at her; was focused on something far away as he inhaled and exhaled puffs of smoke. "And weren't so caught up in their own shit that they failed to realize that children could hear you and see you and...remember."

"I..." Ella was frozen, her heart pausing in her chest as she turned to look at him; his eyes cold and focused. She wasn't really sure she should be hearing this.

"My mother wasn't a saint Ella," he inhaled and held his breath for a moment. "Neither was, is, my father. I'm not going to pretend to know what it was like for you at home. I'm not sure I can entertain the images I have of what your father did to you to instill such a reaction. But I want you to know..." His eyes broke from their focus and turned to her. "I know what it's like to have fucked up parents."

"Harry..." She blinked back the tears in her eyes; unsure if they were for her or for him.

"I just didn't want you to think you were alone in that," he shrugged, an arm moving up and around her shoulders. "But it's good that we have them, you know?"

"Maddie and Bishop?" Ella raised her eyebrows.

"Yeah," he nodded. "They balance out the fucked up."

"Ha!" She laughed; her head tossing back into his arm. "Yes they do."

"Yes they do." They settled that way for a moment, letting it sink in; letting it be.

"He hit me." Ella's voice cracked into the night. "More than once. He would get drunk and go on theses tirades and...nobody was safe. My mother, my brother...me." Harry held his breath, held back his urge to pummel her father. "It got to the point where I would barely leave my room. I would sit in there for hours on my computer and escape..." She smiled weakly as she remembered.
"I would become obsessed with a new topic for like a month. I would learn all there was to know about a variety of things...medical professions, South Africa..." Her cheeks pulled a slight blush as she brought her fingers to her mouth, muffling a laugh. With a fuck it shrug, she continued. "The British Royal Family."

"I'm sorry, what?" Harry's lips pulled up into a slight smile as he turned his attention to her.

"Oh God!" She giggled, her hands flying to her face.

"Did you just say..."

"Yes," she groaned through her fingers before pulling them from her face. "It's not what it sounds like. I...It...It was just through Queen Victoria. I was obsessed with the protocol, the pomp, the history of it all."

"Well, well, well," Harry grinned wider. "Who knew? Little Ella Marshall...a fan."

"Oh shut up!" She nudged his ribs with her elbow. "I'm not a fan. And I'm not little!"

"It's okay," he shrugged. "Don't be embarrassed. You can admit it to me...you were in love with Will."

"Stop it!" She laughed, throwing another elbow.
"Ow!" He rubbed at his side. "It's not a big deal. All of the ladies were in love with Will."

"You're being annoying."

"I know," he laughed; his eyes meeting hers.

"I wasn't a fan." Her eyes were set.

"That's too bad," he winked. "Because I've always been a fan of yours." Ella's laughter faded, giving way for a genuine smile as she leaned closer to him.

"Thank you Henry."

"You're welcome." He squeezed her shoulder tight and kissed the top of her head. It wasn't long before Ella took a deep breath and rose to her feet. Pulling Harry along with her, she made her way back into the pub, her eyes quickly spotting Maddie and a defeated Bishop.

"Hey..." Bishop smiled up at the two of them.

"How are you?" Maddie looked to her best friend.

"Better," she sighed. "Much better. And tired. I'm ready to go to the hotel." She scooped Maddie's hand into hers. "Take me to bed?"

"I thought you'd never ask," Maddie grinned and, leaving Bishop behind with a shake of his head, the two women began towards the door.

"Looks like it's you and me," Harry winked at his best friend before patting his cheeks and turning to follow the women.

"I'm entirely too sober for this," Bishop mumbled before doing the same.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

The funeral services for Ella's father were decidedly less dramatic. Not one of the four of them had anything to drink leading up to the service. Ella was less angry, allowing herself to feel the bit of sadness that came with not ever having the father she had wished she had; allowing herself to grieve the loss of the hope that she ever would.

When she dressed for the service, she felt the first of many tears that would be cried that day. When they arrived, she hugged her mother, she kissed her brother and she offered a weak smile to the others who had gathered. But before the service began, she moved from her spot up front and took her place with her family. Maddie, Harry, Bishop. And when Collins arrived with the fatherly hug and paternal love he had always offered to her, Ella nearly fell apart. Though Khenda had stayed behind with a sick little Isaac, Ella finally felt like her family was complete. It was then, with Maddie on one side and Bishop on the other, that she was finally able to say good-bye to her father, to all that had come with him and all that was now, gracefully, gone from her life.
"Good morning sunshine," Maddie's voice was sugary as she slipped quietly into Harry's office. "Good morning?" He looked up at her from his desk with a smirk. "It's noon." It was a lazy day, a casual morning. Harry was half dressed; worn jeans and a t-shirt with bare feet. Maddie had pulled on comfy clothes and tied her hair up. These moments of self-pace were few and far between and she liked to make the most use of them—even if it meant sleeping in late and lounging till lunch. "Is it?" She moved around the desk, her hands working over his shoulders from behind as she leaned into him; pressing a kiss to his cheek. "It is. And this chipper mood of yours...what's it been? Weeks now?" He patted his hand over hers, leaning to kiss the tips of her fingers. "It's starting to freak me out." "Hmmm..." She sighed and stood tall. "I'll work on doom and gloom." "Thank you," he grinned. "Welcome," she yawned, dipping into the guest chair across his desk. "We have less than three months left, you know..." "Less than three months till?" He lifted an eyebrow; playing with her. "Is this the doom and gloom you were working on?" He laughed. "No," she giggled. "But we start rehearsals in two weeks." "Where I practice walking and standing?" "Yes," Maddie snickered at his less than impressed expression. "Among other things...like pledging me your troth." "I'll pledge you my troth right now. Here. On this desk." "Oh yeah?" Maddie laughed. "Do you know what troth means?" "Not a clue." "Nice," she giggled and leaned forward, taking in his desktop. "What are you doing today? Working?" "Yeah," he shrugged, waving a hand towards the paperwork in front of him. "I have a few things to look over before Monday's meeting. What are you going to do today? Take a nap? Relax? It's been a busy morning for you." "Maybe," she shot a playful glare before she stretched out; her arms pulling up over her head. "I think I'll head out to that bookstore on Dayton. I haven't been in a long time and I wanted to pick up a book or two for Will and Kate's baby."
"You do know that we can afford to buy new books for the baby," he poked fun at her affinity for the used variety.

"I do," she sighed. "And you do know that a man who lives in a castle and is referred to as Your Royal Highness just might be able to find a deeper appreciation for the more antiquated among us."

"You would think," Harry grinned.

"You would," Maddie chuckled and pulled herself up from the chair with a sigh. "Need anything?"

"From the used bookstore?" He laughed. "No. Thanks. I'm good."

"Suit yourself." And, in her lazy sort of manner, she rounded the desk. Her hand ran up his neck to his jaw, pulling his face up towards her to kiss him. "I'll see you later."

"Mmmm..." He grinned against her lips. "For the pledging of the troth?"

"Yes," she laughed, easing towards the doorway.

"Can't wait." His smile and his eyes stayed trained on her until she disappeared from his line of vision. Only then did he return to the stack of papers before him.

~~~~~~~~~~

"Okay..." Maddie juggled the small stack of books from one arm to the other with an amused chuckle. "Let's see what I have...I'm sorry, are you laughing at me?" She looked up to Arthur with a playful glare.

"Not at all," he shook his head, fighting off a grin. "Would you like me to take those for you?"

"No," Maddie shook her head. "That's not at all in your job description, now is it? Now..." She shuffled through the books. "Paddington Bear, Winnie the Pooh...are you sensing a theme?"

"Yes ma'am," Arthur nodded his head. He had been in this very same bookstore more times than he could count. At the beginning, he found it annoying; small, cramped, full of nooks and crannies. But the more he came, the more he saw the appeal and the more it made sense that she liked to go there. It was quiet, she could be alone; be Maddie and not the future Duchess. They were most often the only people there. She liked that. He understood that.

"I just need..." She looked around, hugging the two books for the baby, and a few for herself, to her chest. "I thought they might have a copy of a book I used to read as a child..." And one by one the books slid from her arms, thudding to the floor; bringing her and Arthur to laughter.

"Okay," he shook his head, bending down to help her gather them. "I'm going to get a basket for these. You go and grab the last one and I'll get these situated and I'll meet you back here."

"You're too kind," she smiled up at him, holding out her battered and roughed copy of Paddington Bear.

"Yes well, let's not let anyone in on that secret," he took the book from her hands.
"Deal," Maddie nodded and rose to her feet. "Thank you Arthur!" She called out as she moved away from him. "I'll be right back."

Maddie was quick on her feet, knowing exactly where she was going. She rounded a corner, than another and another and then, coming to a dead end, she stopped. Blinking, she turned around the small alcove and felt a little disoriented.

"Have they moved you?" She spoke to herself, to the books; her eyes scanning the titles, her finger tapping her chin. "Have they moved you somewhere else? Have they..." As her eyes reached the end of the shelf, she saw him. "Jesus!" She jumped, her hand clutching to her chest. "Sorry..." She recovered quickly, shaking her head at the older gentleman; old enough to be her father. "I'm sorry. You surprised me."

"Hello..." He smiled warmly, his eyes looking her over, taking in her surroundings. "Sorry. I heard you talking from over there..." He pointed behind him. "I wasn't sure if you were talking to me or..."

"The books," Maddie smiled, embarrassment flushing her cheeks. "I was talking to the books."

"Do they talk back?" He smiled; his lips stretching across his face.

"You know, sometimes they do," Maddie went for kind, friendly. "Except I can't seem to find the one I was looking for."

"No?" He raised his eyebrows, his eyes sweeping her over again. For a moment Maddie felt uncomfortable, as though he were looking too closely and then she watched as his eyes settled on her ring. And she shook off the weirdness. She was still getting used to this fame thing; still getting used to the way people looked when they began to put two and two together, when they began to realize who she was. With a small, reserved smile, she moved into "public mode".

"No," she shook her head, tucking a strand of hair behind her ear as her arms crossed over her chest. "But it's been a while since I've been here. They may have moved it."

"Oh..." He nodded, his smile tugging further. "Maybe I can help you? I come here a lot."

"Oh!" Maddie laughed. "That's not necessary. I didn't mean to disturb you. Thank you though..."

"Oh it's no disruption," he shook his head. "I would be happy to help." He watched as her eyes shifted over his shoulder, looking off in the distance. Turning around, he looked to where she was watching. "See somebody you know?"

"Well, maybe I can point you in the right direction, at least. What were you looking for?"

"Um..." She took a breath, wondering how long it was going to take for her to finally be at ease with the sometimes over-eagerness of the people to help her. "It's a book called Amelia Bedelia. I read it as a child and..."

"Ah yes," He nodded. "My granddaughter loved that book as well."

"You have a granddaughter?" Maddie perked up.
"I do. Her name is Sara."

"How old is she?" Maddie sighed a bit; relaxing.

"Thirteen now," he smiled. "Anyway. Sorry to bother you, Ma'am. I'll just let you..."

"Oh you didn't bother me," Maddie shook her head, her hand reaching instinctually to rest on his arm.

"You know," his breath sucked in as his hand moved over hers. "I'm quite certain I saw a copy of that book back in the new tween section."

"Tween section?" Maddie's forehead knotted, her hand pulling out from underneath his.

"Ridiculous word, isn't it?" He laughed and held up the book in his hand. "I was picking up something for my granddaughter up in the back and I am pretty sure I saw a copy. I could...I could show you. If you want." He watched, waited; breath held.

"You know what," Maddie let out a sigh. "Sure. That would be great." She waved her hand out. "Lead the way." And, as she stepped from the alcove, she glanced around her, eyes peeled for Arthur, wanting to let him know where she was headed. But, not seeing him, she shrugged and hurried along. It was one book, how long could it take?

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

Okay, Arthur thought as he held onto the basket and looked around the spot he had just left her. What are we searching for now? Arthur knew, from experience, that his protectee could get lost in this store—having personally spent six hours there with her in the past. Looking down at the shelf with the twelve copies of Sherlock Holmes, he sighed; he was in the right spot.

"Do you have a twenty on Doc?" He spoke into his radio; eyes scanning the dark and cramped book cases that created the maze around him. He waited a moment, knocked his knuckles against the stack of Sherlock Holmes.

"Nope." The female voice on the other end of the radio responded. "She hasn't come out front yet."

Pushing away from his spot, he took a step forward. This was taking too long. Making a sharp turn left, he looked. A sharp turn right, he looked.

Nothing but books. No blonde.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

"Are you sure?" Maddie felt a nervous laugh in her throat as she scanned the shelf the gentleman had point her to. "This is...I don't know..." She reached for an old, dusty map. "References?" She laughed and tossed the map down. "Are you sure they are making this a tween section?"

"Positive." His voice was low, his attention on her.

"Maybe we..." She caught his eyes watching her and cleared her throat. "Maybe we took a wrong turn when we came up the stairs or..."
"No," he shook his head. "It was..." He snapped back to the books. "It was on a higher shelf. Maybe up there." He pointed to the top of a shelf just off to the right behind Maddie. She turned to look before stepping. Her eyes scanning over the stacks; a copy of The Babysitters Club, Anne Rice, Harry Potter.

"Ah..." She breathed. He wasn't leading her on a wild goose chase. "You may be right." Moving around the corner, she rose to her toes, stretching her neck to look. "Let me see..."

"You look just like her, you know..." He had followed her around the corner.

"Just like who?" Maddie tossed back casually. "Your granddaughter?"

"Diana."

And though he couldn't see her, Maddie's eyes snapped forward; wide and suddenly incredibly suspicious. Something was wrong. Something was very wrong. This wasn't merely an overly eager fan of the royal family. What had she been doing? Following a strange man through a bookstore without...Stop. She shook her head slightly. Now wasn't the time for that.

"You know," she laughed lightly, coming back to her footing. "I'm not sure the book is worth all this trouble. I think I'll just..." She turned to face him then, to take in her surroundings.

"Young. Blonde." He took a step closer as Maddie took a step back. "But you...you're a smart one."

"I think I'll just..." She moved to her right. He was quick, he was focused and his step to his left was right behind hers.

"You're a doctor." Her heart thudded.

"Sir, I'm sorry. But I really should be going..." Still hoping she could just move around him, just move out of this moment, just make it go away.

"He chose well this time," his eyes scanned her then, making her feel naked; dirty. "He's making better decisions now." Maddie felt her stomach turn. He was talking about Harry; Harry who was most definitely going to kill her for ever walking anywhere with this man, much less off into the confines of this maze-like bookstore.

"Yes, well..." Maddie tried for casual, thinking it might help ease him back, keep him calm. But her throat was dry and tight and...fuck...she thought. What was she doing? Her time in London had washed away her Bendal instincts.

"Did you get my letters?" He bounced on his feet; excited at the idea. Maddie's chest hurt as realization sank deeper.

"Your letters?" Her voice was whisper-like.

"I sent them to the palace. Maybe they don't give you your mail..." He shook his head, his eyes drifting in thought for a moment. "Do they keep you in the dark like they kept her?" Maddie watched as his face turned hard, as his eyes grew dark.

"Her?" Her voice cracked.
"Diana." He spoke her name like a song, like a poem; his face softening as his eyes turned to her again. "You're so much like her. So young and innocent and beautiful..."

"I...I have to go," Maddie moved again; this time with more strike. But he was quick and trained on her and he moved too.

"It's okay," he shook his head, his smile meaning to comfort, meaning to calm. "It is. I'm only looking out for you. I won't...I would never hurt you."

"I didn't think that you would," she shook her head; wanting to keep him as far away from that idea as she could.

"But they will. He will." He nodded; certain. "Just like they hurt her. But I can help you..." His voice drew low, like he was conspiring with her. "This is your chance. I can take you away from them right now and nobody would even know. I can save you...like I never had the chance to save her..."

Maddie's eyes welled up, her stomach churning a bitter, copper taste into her throat. And she wished, wished that she were back in Bendal; in the desert with the militia—where things made sense.

"I have to..." She sucked in a breath of air and tried for steady. "I'm sorry. I have to go..."

"Go?!" His voice rose, his hand reaching out to slam into the shelf of books to his right. "No! I'm trying to help you!" His jaw clenched as he lowered his voice again. "Don't you understand?! He's no good. They are...no good! It will only end badly with them! It will only end badly."

And right then and there Maddie sent a prayer up to whatever God was listening that he wasn't speaking the truth; that this wasn't going to end badly.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

"Maybe she's looking through that collection of Shakespeare again," the female voice returned in Arthur's ear. "She spent an entire day down there once."

And normally Arthur would bite; he would submerse himself into that friendly back and forth that protection officers had. But there was something inside him that kept him moving, that kept the adrenaline flowing. He turned another corner.

Dead end. Another wall of literary volumes and dusty cookbooks that hadn't been touched in years.

He made one more turn and then he saw it. An entire section of children's books; toddler to young adult. There were a few teenagers gathered around a particular section while a young mother held a sniffling baby in her arms as she looked through the board books.

But no blonde.

And that's when Arthur abandoned the basket of books.

"I'm going to need a location on Doc ASAP." He spoke into his radio, his feet pulling him towards the back. "I'm taking in from the back right now."
"I'm in the front," the female responded; the back and forth dropped for something much more serious. And they both went to work.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

"Okay...Okay..." Maddie's voice was calm, though her heart was beating out of her chest. She was mad; pissed at herself for this moment. If she had more time, she would have chastised herself for letting her training and her instincts falter so much that she ended up in this secluded, dark corner of this bookstore. But she didn't have time for that. "Listen..." She tried for a smile, tried to gain back the sweeter version of the lunatic in front of her; her therapy skills running through her mind. "I appreciate your concern..."

"Concern?" He scoffed. "I would say that it's more than mere concern."

"Okay," she nodded, her eyes scanning him for signs of a weapon. "Okay. But I really should be going. I only came for a book and..."

"You're not listening to me!" He yelled out and Maddie jumped. Why hadn't anyone heard him yelling? Would anyone hear her if she started yelling? "I'm sorry!" He began to compensate for his anger, moving forward, wanting to comfort her. "I didn't mean to frighten you."

"Please," Maddie hated the waver in her voice as she moved further away from him, further into a corner.

"I didn't mean to frighten you..." He reached his hand out to her then and Maddie's gut kicked in. This was it. Fight time. "I just can't believe they let something like you out without detail..." His eyes raked over her, settling on her eyes with a wiry smile. "Not very smart now, are they?"

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

As Arthur hurried forward, clearing another aisle of books, his heart was pounding in his head. Where the fuck was she?! And how the fuck had he lost her?! For a brief second, he contemplated calling out for her but he knew the long list of reasons why that was a bad idea. He knew it could only further complicate things.

So he sucked it up and continued moving forward; left over right, left over right. And then he saw it; a set of stairs leading up to a tucked away loft area.

"P2 heading up a set of stairs in the Northwest Corner towards References," he spoke into his radio, hand resting on the gun at his hip.

"Copy." The female voice acknowledged.

And he was climbing.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

"Okay, listen," Maddie's voice was more firm as she took a step to the side. "I don't know you and..."

"My name is Duane."
"Okay," she shook her head, not wanting to know his name, not wanting to know anything about him. "I still...I don't know you and you're starting to scare me and..."

"But I'm here to save you," he seemed so sure, so set in his mission that Maddie almost felt sorry for him. Almost.

"But I don't need saving," she shook her head and then, with a deep breath, she moved; her arms out in front of her, shoving him with all she had as she tried to move around him.

And though he tottered a bit, he did not topple. And his giant hands reached out; one wrapping around her arm as another wrapped around her mouth.

And just as she had decided to scream, it came out as nothing but a muffled gasp.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

"Son of a bitch," Arthur mumbled to himself as he moved around another labyrinth like corner and then, as he cleared the spot to his left, he heard it.

A muffled gasp.

His head snapped to the right. That was her.

"Son of a bitch!" His mind flew instantly to the letters. Those fucking letters they had spent all of that time reviewing from some lunatic saying he was going to save The Doctor from the Monarchy. Saying he would strike when they weren't looking, take her some place safe and then take them all down. One by one.

And Arthur made a decision. As he flew from aisle to aisle, he pulled out his radio and made the call. Presumptive or not, he was done taking chances.

"I'm going Code Black. Code Black!" He was intense, authoritative. "Secure all principles. Code Black."

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

"Sir!" Jim's voice was loud, firm as he landed two hard knocks to Harry's door; stepping into his home. "Sir!"

"Jim?" Harry stepped from around the corner, worn jeans, t-shirt and bare feet. "Everything okay?"

"We're securing the principles." Jim was all business as he shut the door behind him, securing it with a twist of his fingers and pressing into the house. "I need you to stay right here."

"What's going on?" Harry stayed still, a mixture of confusion with a twist of a smirk on his face; his eyes following Jim as he moved to shut the door to the office and secure the curtains in the living room. "Is this some kind of drill?"

"Red is secure." Hand on his gun, Jim spoke into his radio.

"Red?" Harry laughed. "When did that change to..."
"We've got a code black," Jim didn't even blink against Harry's attempt at small talk.

"Code black?" His heart began to pump in his chest. "Where?"

"Seventh and Dayton."

"Seventh and..." His eyes grew to the size of saucers. "Maddie..." He was moving towards the door when Jim's hand flew up meeting his chest with the force of iron.

"No." Jim was firm.

"Yes."

"You cannot leave right now."

"You think you can make me stay here?!" His chest was heaving beneath Jim's hand; his mind wild with the worst kinds of assumptions.

"We both know I can," Jim was absolutely certain.

"Tell me what's happening!" His eyes were dark, cheeks flushed; his heart beating too big for his chest; he felt constricted, claustrophobic.

"I don't know."

"Bullshit!"

"I don't know." Jim's voice was low, undeterred, unfazed, by Harry's anger. This wasn't something they discussed. "I know there was a code called. I know the location. I know you're staying here until I'm told otherwise."

"Fine. Fine!" Harry huffed, pulling his phone from his pocket. In a second it was out of his hands. "If you won't tell me what's going on..."

"You're going to call her? What if Arthur has her secured and her phone goes off? You want to risk that?!" He waited a moment; softening slightly. "When I know something, you'll know something. Now stand down or..."

"Fine!" Harry shoved away from Jim, his hand slamming against the wall next to him. "Fine."

Making the decision to bite his hand was not a conscious process, Maddie's instincts kicked in and she bit. Hard. And though it only served to piss him off, it also made him scream and move. Just enough for her to push at him.

"Get off me!" She hated the way her yell came with a whimper. And then, as if God himself were speaking to her, she heard Arthur's voice through the stacks.

"Do it!" He yelled out; gun drawn and pointed through the spacing of the books. Maddie's head snapped to her left and she almost broke down in relief at the site of him. "Do it NOW!" The man who had joked with her earlier about her predilection for worn out books was gone. This man meant nothing but business.
Maddie's eyes met the ones over her and then, with a blink of her eye, he was off her. He had pushed her aside and, taking the gamble with the angle and the way the gun was wedged, he took off running.

Arthur was around the stacks to Maddie in an instant; his first concern to secure her. Gun still drawn, he called into his radio.

"White male. Dark hair and glasses. Late fifties. Down the stairs and out the front." He turned to Maddie then, his eyes wild, his breath full of relief. "Are you okay?" His hands roamed around her, his eyes searching for injury.

"I'm fine," she shook her head, tears pricking at her eyes. "I...I'm not hurt. I..."

"I have Doc secured. Repeat. I have Doc secured." He took a breath, said a silent thank you, and continued. "Perp has gone out the front. I have secured Doc. Heading home." Rising to his feet, he held his hand out to Maddie and in much more of an order than a request, he told her. "You are following directly behind me. I go first. Down the stairs to an immediate left. Out the back to Sampson. You understand?"

"Yes." She nodded, her fingers wiping clumsily at the tears on her cheeks. Arthur wrapped one arm around her and, with gun drawn, they began their way out of the bookstore.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Harry was in the worst sort of insanity as he paced the floor of his entryway. It took all he had in him to keep upright as he waited. It made his chest hurt to imagine, as if his ribs were suddenly a size too small. He looked around him in scattered sort of way.

Where the hell could he get out? More importantly, how the hell could he get to her? It had been less than ten minutes since the code was called; ten minutes since he had plunged into his very own version of hell.

"Okay. Copy." Jim spoke into his radio as he stepped away from his lookout at the front door. He turned to Harry then. "They've secured Doc. Apprehended the suspect and..."

"When you say apprehended you better mean blown his fucking head off!" Harry's anger won out in the moment as his eyes welled with tears; every emotion inside of him bubbling to the surface. He moved forward then, towards the door.

"Sir..." Jim's heart hurt at the look on Harry's face. He had seen entirely too much tragedy in his life and Jim wasn't alone in the desire to protect him from more.

"Where is she?!" He rubbed at the tears in his eyes with the palms of his hands.

"Sir. You should stay here..."

"Has the code been lifted?"

"Yes but..."

"Then we go where I want to go now." Yes, he could be a bit spoiled and demanding at times, but Jim understood.
"Sir..."

"No! I stayed through the code. Now. We go to her."

"She's on her way here...sir."

"She's..." That drew him to a standstill.

"Arthur and Sampson are bringing her home. The Family Doctor will meet her here...just as a precaution." He hurried to explain. "She's fine. No injuries were reported. But the Doctor wants to take a look just to be sure."

Harry's face twisted up as he nodded; tears pressing from his eyes. He was done fighting.

Wanting to give him space, give him time, Jim stepped out and left him alone.

As Harry sank to the stairs, his arms hugged his knees closer to him; his mind processing all that had just occurred.

To Be Continued...
Harry was still sitting on that step, his teeth biting at his already worn nails; his every sense perked and waiting for the tell that she was there. It was a physical drain on him to wait but Jim had been right; there was nowhere for him to be but where he was. He took a deep breath and scrubbed his hands over his face a couple of times, trying desperately to keep his mind from wandering down that path that he was hoping to avoid.

And then he heard it; the familiar crunch of gravel beneath tires. Without a thought, he was one his feet; through the door and four steps down the walk before he realized that it wasn't her. The car slowed to a stop and Dr. Parker emerged; bag in hand.

"Dr. Parker," Harry tried to pull his smile up to greet the familiar face, but it was clearly a struggle.

"Your Royal Highness," he offered a small bow of his head as he took Harry's extended hand. "I was asked to meet Dr. Forrester here to look her over after the...incident."

"Yes," Harry nodded, the lump in his throat returning. "I'm afraid you've simply beat her here. They should be pulling up any moment now, I would imagine."

"Yes," the older man looked Harry over, seeing his nerves, his worry. "You know. I spoke to the agents on scene and they said that she was fine; shaken and a bit rattled, but no injuries."

"I've been told the same thing," Harry nodded, his teeth biting at his lips as his eyes stayed trained towards the gates.

"Well, maybe I'll be able to give her something for the tension," the Doctor smiled softly, his eyes following Harry's gaze. "Maybe I can give you something?"

"Ha!" Harry's laugh was bitter and short. With a shake of his head, he turned a lopsided grin to the Doctor. "I'm not sure you're going to be able to help me with this one Dr. Parker."

"Well, let me know if there is anything I can..." As a hound on a hunt, Harry's eyes perked up at the first sight of arrival. The Doctor's thoughts trailed off as he turned to look. First down the drive was a car containing Nathan and Jim who were still on for Harry for the day. He watched as they pulled up and hopped from the car. He nodded a hello as they moved off to the side, ready to greet Maddie's team; following their own set of post-incident protocol. Harry didn't know exactly what it was and he didn't care. His eyes shifted to the two cars not too far behind them.

His hand rubbed at the back of his neck, knowing that if he looked at his cell phone there was most likely a lengthy list of missed calls. A statement had most definitely been released and their friends and family all over the world were finding out about the danger Maddie had just been in.

But he didn't care. He needed to see her before he dealt with any of them. His eyes shifted to the second car. It was her. His heart thumped in his chest. Harry drew in a breath and held it, watching her car like a hawk.

Driving through the gates to Kensington brought feelings in Maddie that surprised her. She felt relief; she had been expecting that. But as they drove closer, she started to feel nervous, anxious; and that didn't make much sense to her at all. Her neck strained as she looked through the window, wanting to see her home; their home.

And suddenly they came into view; all of them. Her breath hitched in surprise. There they stood; Harry, Dr. Parker, along with a myriad of security staff. Tears sprang to her eyes; all of this attention, all of this fuss. She couldn't even look to Harry, knowing the expression that was bound to be on his face. All because she had gone against a single, simple rule and...

"Doctor Forrester," Arthur's voice was warm as it commanded her attention. He sat next to her; close and tight, he hadn't moved since he had put her in the car. Neither had she. It was funny. There was plenty of room for the two of them to move, to spread out. But neither of them could; both feeling the need to be sure of the other.

"Yes?" Her voice was weak. She cleared her throat and looked to him. "Yes?"

"Dr. Parker is here to look you over," he had told her that twice before, but he was telling her again. He wanted nothing about the rest of her day to be a surprise. He wanted her to be in the know on everything, to be in charge of everything.

"I know," she nodded. She had been prepared for him. She had negotiated for him instead of the hospital—just wanting to go home.

"Do you want..." He cleared his throat and glanced up to Sampson who smiled supportively back at him. "Did you want me to come in with you or..."

"No," she smiled, her hand resting on his arm. "I think you've done above and beyond the call of duty today, Arthur. There's no need for you to sit around while they check out my bumps and bruises."

"Okay," he nodded; not wanting to push but being completely honest when he told her. "Let me know if you change your mind."

"Thank you," Maddie smiled and, as the car slowed to a stop, she took a deep, steadying breath and readied herself for the emotions that threatened to flood her; internally and externally.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

Sampson was the first to exit the car, moving to open Maddie's door. But it was lost on no one that she followed behind Arthur, scooting and slipping from the door he took. Both Harry and Dr. Parker moved around the car, both wanting his chance to look her over.

When Harry's eyes took her in, running head to toe, he felt the tears return to his eyes, he felt the lump in his chest expand and swell and he felt his knees weaken. She was surrounded by people; the doctor, her security detail, his security detail. But she was there. She looked shaken; hair rumpled, clothes jostled. But she was...

"I'm okay," Maddie's scattered eyes met his; a whisper of reassurance on her lips. "I'm okay. I am..." And Harry couldn't really speak, he couldn't really shuffle through all of the things that were running through his mind in that moment. So he nodded. He balled his fingers into fists and he nodded. Resisting every instinct he had to take her in his arms and run far, far away from there, he pulled it together and made his best efforts to make her feel comfortable, safe. He had to do this, maintain this face, or he was going to crumble.
"This is Doctor Parker," Harry tried to focus. "He's been seeing the Family for...forever." Harry took a breath. "He would like to talk to you about..."

"I'm okay," Maddie repeated, a fresh tear slipping from her eye as her fingers twisted onto Arthur's arm; reflexively, instinctually. Resisting every instinct she had to throw herself into Harry's arms and never come up—not for air, not for food, not for anything—she put on her best version of okay and turned to the Doctor. She had to do this first, or she never would. "I'm Madeline..." Her hand stuck out with a shake they could all see.

"Good to meet you ma'am," he smiled; trying for comforting, trying for ease. "Would you like to come inside? We can speak for a few moments and then I can leave you to..." He trailed off.

"Of course," Maddie nodded and took a step towards the house.

And the entire group moved with her. The Doctor with his bag. Harry with his heart on his sleeve. And Arthur who, despite her words to the contrary, was still in Maddie's grasp; figuratively and literally.

"I'm sorry..." Maddie looked up to him then and Harry watched as she struggled to release her PO. Her fingers rattled as she pulled her hand back from him. "I'm sorry. I don't know..."

"It's quite alright," Arthur assured her with a warm smile and pat to her shoulder. "I'll be right out here." He was so sweet with her. Sweet enough that, had they not just gone through a crisis that this team of Security hadn't seen in a very long time, his colleagues would be certain to tease him for. But they didn't dare. It had been a long, intense day for every single one of them.

Maddie nodded and tore her eyes from him, turning to the Doctor who kept a respectable distance. "Okay. Let's get this over with."

"Yes Ma'am," he nodded. And then, as Maddie moved inside, the group followed behind her; cautious as they did.

Having always been 'the spare', Harry had developed a keen eye for observation. He wasn't as far out in the spotlight as his brother had always been. He attended and watched, but his level of participation had always been less. So he developed an intense ability to see things around him. And that afternoon, as Maddie moved away from Arthur and into their home with the Doctor right behind her, not one single thing was lost one him.

Not the way she had clung to her Security Officer, not the way she had met his eyes with the smallest element of fear, not the way she clung desperately to this illusion that she was fine, not the way that every single one of the men surrounding her seemed to be afraid; afraid of this moment, of this day, of what this meant.

Harry caught all of it. He caught her flinches, her resistance to moving away from the man who had protected her, the way she blinked over and over again as she told him she was okay. He knew what the blinking meant. She wasn't okay. Nowhere near it.

Hell, he wasn't okay. There was not a single cell in his body that was okay. He had thought, while he had sat on those stairs waiting for her, that seeing her would cure him of this downward spiral. But he had been wrong. Seeing her...seeing the way her hair had pulled from the updo, seeing the way her clothes had been stretched, the way her lip was plump and red, the way her eyes seemed to shake as she looked around.
Seeing her had only plunged him further down. With a shake of his head, he turned to Arthur, extending his hand—extending his thanks. But he knew it would never be enough, even if Arthur insisted it wasn't necessary.

He sucked in his fears, reeled in his emotions and he followed her inside but, as his feet moved forward, his mind and his heart sank; pulled from his body. All he had wanted to do this entire day was to put himself between her and this. And he couldn't.

Unless he did. Unless he put himself between her and this.

He brought her into it, he could show her the way out of it.

And his spiral continued.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

"How about here..." Dr. Parker's hands were warm and soft as he applied the smallest amount of pressure to her top lip. "Are you tender here?"

"No," Maddie shook her head. "It's fine." The second she had stepped inside, she had begun to thaw. Her weariness, her lack of confidence began to melt away. Being home, in their home with him, had pushed away the chill she had felt for the majority of the day. She was coming back to herself, gaining her footing again. She felt like she was breathing normal, her heart easing up just a bit.

Her eyes glanced across the room to Harry. He sat off to the side, almost in the corner. And, as he watched the doctor poke at her, as he watched him inspect the faint bruises on her arm in the shape of fingers, as he watched him apply a medical solution to the slight cut in Maddie’s lip—most likely from her own teeth—he sank deeper and deeper. As he watched this unfold before him, everything inside of him was boiling; steaming.

Finally, in frustration, he moved from his spot and slipped into the entryway. Moving to his previous home on the stairs, he pulled his phone from his pocket; hoping for distraction.

"Jesus Christ," he groaned through his hand as he scanned the long list of missed calls. Glancing back to Maddie and Dr. Parker, he took a deep breath and decided that while she was doing that, he could do this. He could take care of the phone calls.

He called her mother first.

Then his father.

He repeated the story over and over again.

He assured them over and over again.

He swallowed his guilt, his worry, his mounting anger over and over again.

Until finally he was done with the phone calls. Done with the thoughts from this day. Done with being the one who put her in this situation.
Despite the way it made his heart ache, despite the twist in his stomach, this was it for him. The final straw. The press had been one thing, the fans and the stories...but this. This was too much.

He was done.

Powering down his phone, he sat it on the step next to him and watched as Maddie closed the door to their home; offering a final wave to Dr. Parker before they were alone.

Finally. After this terrible day, she was back home with him. Exactly where he had wanted her to be all of this time.

Maddie leaned back against the door behind her and it all began to fold around her. The entirety of her day; all of the feelings, all of her longings. She was finally safe, finally free and loved and...she was with him. Just him. She could let it all out. And as she did, it hit him with an undeniable force.

There were no words spoken as she moved across the room to where he sat on the stairs. Though he looked up to her, he couldn't see her; his eyes were full of tears that he had spent hours trying to control and before he could blink, she was standing in front of him, pulling him to her. His arms moved of their own volition, tightening around her waist; pressing his face into her stomach. The time for propriety was over; the time for the royal face had passed. It was just them. Them and the emotions that had held them hostage all day long.

He loved her so much. So much. His throat was tight, his chest heavy as his mind processed for the one hundredth time that day all that had occurred, all that he had weathered; all that she had seen. The images of what happened, what could have happened, flashed into his mind as his senses took her in; her smell, her feel; the sound of her breathing.

He couldn't take it.

Harry's hands were firm on her hips as he pushed her away—pulling her body from his—as if they knew he would need physical distance for the words he was about to speak, for what he was about to do.

"Hey..." Maddie's voice was masked by the tears in her eyes, by a lump in her throat. Her hands moved to the sides of his head as he looked up at her. When she would look back on this moment, she would be able to pinpoint this moment as one she should have caught—the way his jaw was set, the cold sheen to his eyes. She should have caught it. But she was too wrapped up in the surreal-ness that had been her day, too happy to be home with him to see it.

Without a response, Harry moved from his spot on the stairs. He rose to his feet and moved past her, out of her grasp, out of her reach. Maddie watched as he began to walk, pace really, his shoulders tight and stressed.

"Harry?" She called out to him, expecting him to turn with a smile, with reassurance. She could not have been more wrong. She could hear the tick of the clock from the other room as she watched him. They were finally alone after this horrid day and yet there were feet between them and miles of confusion. His back was to her as he sat with his thoughts; his hand moving to rub at the back of his neck. "Harry?" She tried again.

"Those twenty minutes..." He paused to clear his throat, still looking away; avoiding her. "Those twenty minutes were the worst of my life." His words were like ice, his voice seemed almost foreign to her. She was frozen in her spot. "I...I buried my mother. When I was twelve. In front of the entire world. But this...worrying about you, not knowing you were ok, waiting for you to..."
He shook his head, gulped at the mass in his throat and tried to control the onslaught of feelings that were washing over him. "Worst twenty minutes of my entire life."

"Hey..." Maddie moved to him then, her hand stretching out towards him. And then she saw it; a flinch, a step. Harry sensed her presence and moved away. Her forehead knotted as she watched him, her stomach only beginning to feel the unease that was in the room.

"All I've been thinking about since they called the code is..." Though he turned towards her, his eyes stared off in the distance, as if he were looking at another time, another reality. "All I've been thinking about is how I can keep you safe, how I can protect you, how I can make sure this never happens again and..."

"Harry." She cut him off, a reflexive warning in her voice; a feeling in her bones that made her unexplainably nervous. She wanted him to stop. She didn't know exactly why, but she felt it in every single part of her body. But he continued.

"And I always end up at the same place..."

"Harry." Her voice was more stern, the panic more present.

"You can't be here," it was almost a whisper. A deep, emotion-filled, final whisper. "You can't be a part of this." His hand was weak as he waved around him.

"Stop." She shook her head, her eyes welling frustratingly with tears.

"Maddie."

"Stop."

"The only way for me to take you out of this is for me to take you out of this."

"Stop!" She yelled at him, her vision blurring.

"Madeline..." He was pleading, desperation flooding his face.

"What are you doing?" She hated, hated, the way tears were falling from her eyes. She hated the way this was making her feel; powerless and small—the same way she had felt hours ago in that bookstore. And she hated the way it made her want to slap him. "What are you saying?"

"I'm saying...I sat in this kitchen and told you that if my life was going to destroy yours, I would..." He shook his head, trying to shake off the chaos in his brain. He had made up his mind.
"I told you that I would walk away. No matter what I wanted or how hard it would be, I would walk away from you before my life destroyed yours."

"Walk away?" She whispered; a nightmare unfolding before her.

"I promised I would..."

"And then you promised to spend the rest of your life standing next to me, loving me, making the sacrifices worth it." Maddie could feel her defenses rising, her anger and upset taking control from the tears, pulling her into fight mode. "On your knees Harry. With a ring and a promise and...you said that this was everything you ever wanted!"
"It is!" He yelled back before he could stop himself from yelling. He didn't want to yell at her. He didn't want to make her cry. He just wanted this feeling to leave him, he wanted her to be okay.

"Then why are you talking like this is the end? Why are you talking like you're telling me to go?"

"I am..." The sob that pushed through his lips made Maddie's knees weak, made her heart stop. "I am telling you that it would be safer for you to be away from this, away from me..." And her anger was suddenly flooded with heartache. Her eyes welled up—despite her best efforts.

"Do you hear yourself?" She whispered.

"Maddie..." He looked so scattered, so afraid. She knew it had been a long day for him, that he had been through a lot. She had expected a reaction; tears, yelling, guilt. But not this. Nothing like this. And Maddie didn't know if she could bring him back from the edge he was on and it made her entire body hurt.

"Away from you? But we're supposed to get married and..." Her voice was so soft, her eyes so vulnerable; Harry could feel the hurt pouring from her and it nearly took him down. "Is that what you're saying right now? That you don't want to marry me?"

"I..." His palm smudged at the tears that fell from his eyes, willing himself to be stronger. "It's not that I don't want to..."

"Then what is it? Explain it to me because I don't understand what's happening right now, Harry. I don't. I made a mistake today. A great big, terrible mistake but..."

"No," he shook his head. "No. Today wasn't your fault."

"It wasn't yours either." But he wasn't hearing; he wasn't listening.

"You can't..." He started but she cut in.

"Stop this Henry," her eyes grew hard, serious. Maybe she could order it out of him. "You stop this right now."

"I'm trying to," his head hung. "I'm trying to stop this from ever happening again. Maddie, don't you get it?! Being here is dangerous for you. Being with me is..."

"Stop!" She yelled again, desperation and panic sinking in. "This isn't...this isn't fair..."

"This isn't about fair," he shook his head. "This is about you being safe and..."

"And what?!" She yelled, her face turning pink with frustration. "And what Harry?! You want me to go away? Go where?! To Bendal?! You went there and brought me here! You...you talked me into leaving and moving here and...do you even remember what it took to make that happen? Do you remember the fights? The time apart? How hard it was on us?"

"Of course I..."

"I don't think you do! Because if you really did, it wouldn't be quite so fucking easy for you to throw it all away over something so insignificant!"
"Insignificant?!" Harry's face turned bright red as he spun on her; furious. "It was a kidnapping plot! Did you see the report?! He was going to take you!"

"But he didn't!" Maddie screamed.

"He was going to take you to his apartment where he had..." He couldn't say the words without gagging. "He was going to take you Maddie! And for ten minutes I thought that he had! Goddamn it! Do you have any idea what it's like to sit and worry and wonder if I'm ever going to see you again and..."

"One hundred and sixteen!" She was seething, her breath coming in hot bursts.

"What?"

"That's how many days I sat in London worrying about you in Afghanistan! Don't lecture me like I'm a child! Like I wandered out of bounds and got lost in a department store!"

"I can't lose you Maddie," his head was shaking quickly, as though he had no control over it. That was the greater truth, the greater reality. He had been faced with not his own mortality, but hers. And he was choosing to look away, unable to face the idea.

"You do remember that it was long before London that I was shot." Her voice tempered; her heart shifting to sadness again. "You do remember that the only time you've come close to actually losing me was long before I was a part of this...don't you?"

"I..." He slumped; his heart sinking to his feet. Her words hit him so hard that she thought he just might crumble to the floor. Everything inside of him ached as those memories flooded his mind. It was too much, it was too heavy; his body couldn't take it. "I can't lose you."

"But you will," her voice went soft, her eyes pleading with his to see what she was saying. "Someday you're going to lose me. Rather it's to something like this or thirty years from now when..."

"No!" His hand slammed against the wall causing Maddie to flinch. "No."

"What are you going to do Harry?!" She struggled against her tears. "Marry somebody you can't stand so that it doesn't hurt when she's gone?"

"Maybe!"

"Harry..." Her heart was breaking; for him and for her. "You are so smart. You are such an intelligent, soulful, wonderful man...and right now, in this moment. You sound like an absolute fucking idiot."

"I'm just trying to..." He ran off, not totally sure what he was trying to do any longer. "All I'm trying to do is...and you're calling me an idiot."

"No. I called you a fucking idiot!" Her eyes got teary as the sadness washed over her, the reality sank in and she felt her heart just drift away to that place it went to protect itself. Her day had been long, exhausting and the relief she had felt coming home to him had faded when he had started down this road. She was exhausted. And he was stone set in what he was saying.

"Listen to me..."
"No! I can't! You...I can't. I can't do this. I..." She stumbled over her own feet as she moved from him then. He hated the way she looked at him, hated himself for putting that there. "You're being the worst kind of asshole right now. I love you Harry. You and your spoiled, entitled self...but I won't do this. I signed on for all of it; everything that came with this. But if you...if you can't sign on too. I can't...I can't fight with you to LET me stay!"

"Maddie..." Something deep down inside of him flickered to life, began to make a counterargument. But it was too late. He was stubborn and she was drained and it was like a train wreck that they were helpless to stop.

"I'm drawing the line Henry. Either you want this or..." Her heart cracked with her voice, tears spilling out of her eyes. "Either you want this, all of this, or you don't."

"I..." He summoned all of his willpower, all of his strength, every ounce of Windsor he had in him and pulled his eyes to meet hers. "I can't put you here. I can't take that kind of risk with something so important. I can't be responsible for..."

"You do or you don't," she pushed; knowing that it was dangerous to do so, knowing it could be fatal to do so. And just like a child pushed into a corner, faced with an ultimatum, he buckled.

"I don't." It fell from his lips before he ever had a chance to pull it back.

"Okay," the word tumbled from her mouth as if it were her last breath. "Okay."

And then, without another look, another touch, or another plea, Maddie turned and left for good. She was done fighting. Done pleading. She was simply done. She stepped away from him and never looked back.

Though he had expected her to slam the door on the way out, the way she closed it softly behind her left a much more ominous, tragic finality to what had just occurred.

She was gone.

He had spent all day struggling to get to her, to be near her; protect her.

And now. His insecurities. His guilt. His issues.

Just like that. Gone.
Harry stood, unable to move, and stared at where she had just been standing. When she left, it was as though all life rushed out with her.

He stood, breathing heavy as everything slowly began to sink in. His chest felt heavy, his head hurt, his eyes grew hazy with tears. He felt scattered, confused, angry, disgusted, upset, unsettled, off-guard, and terrorized all at the same time.

What had just happened?

What had just happened?

Had he really just watched as Maddie walked out of their home, out of his life? Had he really just told her it was over? That he didn't want to marry her? Had he really just let some asshole with a kidnapping plot put those feelings in his heart, those words in his mouth?

Had he really just trashed Maddie and everything she had given to him, everything she had given up for him? Had he really just trashed...everything?

He needed answers.

But what was the right answer? What was the right thing to do? Was her safety more important than his own needs and desires? More important than the hearts he was breaking as he spoke, as he ended things?

More importantly, maybe most importantly, was he a fool to think that he would ever really have control over any of it?

He didn't know. He had no idea. But what he did know, what was becoming abundantly clear, was that the best thing to ever cross his path had just walked out his door.

And he was still standing there. Why was he still standing there?

In that moment, Harry felt completely unable to even begin to get a handle on his emotions; everything in him was amiss.

All he could deal with were the facts. And the fact was; Maddie had been the focus of a kidnapping plot. That man had been sending letters to Buckingham Palace for months and he had finally made good on his threats; on his promise. Maddie had been in unthinkable danger. And all he had been able to focus on was how to keep her out of it. And in those moments of dire, he had searched for and found the only plausible way to keep her out of anything like this in the future. She had to leave.

And the fact was—she had left.

His heart sank. And he hadn't even realized that it was possible to sink further.
She had looked him right in the eyes and said good-bye; just as he had planned, just as he had wanted.

She had left; just as he had planned, just as he had wanted.

His eyes rose from their focal point on the floor and turned to scan the room, wondering thoughtlessly why he wasn't feeling the relief that usually accompanied getting what he wanted. As his head turned, taking in the living room, something happened.

When people go into shock—like when they faint while donating blood—their bodies go into crisis mode and all the blood in the body rushes to the core—protecting the vital organs at all costs. It's as though the entire body turns its focus to one single mission.

Survival.

And, when the crisis passes, when the shock wanes, the blood begins to slowly return to the limbs. It's the strangest sort of sensation—the way the senses come back; slowly and one by one. It's as if one is awakening to the world all over again—vision, smell, hearing.

And it can be overwhelming and confusing. It can cause a panic of its own accord.

When Harry's eyes passed over the living room, it was that jolt, the smelling salts that bring back a fainter. It was her—everywhere. That ridiculously soft blanket draped over the couch, the three pairs of heels under the coffee table that he threatened to throw out every night, the stacks of magazines that she had already read through multiple times—that she insisted were NOT clutter. He saw the running shoes he bought her as a joke—fresh and unused and sitting next to his by the door. He saw the painting of Bendal he had given her hanging on the wall. He saw the vases of marbles on the mantle.

He saw her.

And his senses began to return; slowly and one by one.

The crisis had passed and he was awakening to the world. And the confusion and panic that came with that almost brought him to his knees.

"Oh God..." Harry's hand reached out, grasping to steady himself; grasping for something. It was as if his whole world was falling apart. All of his reasoning; his entire belief system was crumbling. His eyes pressed shut, a coppery taste rising in his throat.

He was going to be sick. His senses were coming back. He was reliving the trauma.

What had just happened? What had he just said?

What had he done?

And where in the hell was Maddie?

His heart was pounding in his ears, his stomach knotted; his chest constricting.

He had made a mistake; an enormous, fatal mistake.

He had taken so many hits that day; from the moment the code was called, throughout the entire time he was left to sit with the worst possible thoughts, right up to that moment, thirty seconds ago when the door shut on everything good in his life. His mind was scattered, confused; his normal thought processes failing him completely.

That was truly the only reason why he would move unthinkingly, with complete determination, towards the door—without a plan, without a clear mission, without his shoes.

He wasn't thinking clearly—he wasn't thinking at all. All he knew was that he had to find her, he had to find her. His left hand reached mindlessly for his keys that sat on the stand next to the door and his right moved to the handle, pulling the door open with unnecessary force.

The cold air hit him like a slap. The sight before him hit him like a train; knocking the air clean out of him. He stopped in his tracks—one barefoot out, one barefoot in.

"Maddie..." Came out of his mouth in a tortured gurgle as his eyes flooded. "You're still here." His hand clutched at his chest, hoping to control the wild pace of his heart; unbelievably thankful she was standing there.

"I was going to give you sixty seconds," she cried—unable to control the tears, unable to give a shit about her red face and puffy eyes. "Sixty seconds before I took you seriously, sixty seconds for you to get your head out of your ass..."

"How long did it take?"

"Thirty," she sniffed, shaking her head; shaking away the hope his presence brought with him.

"I made a mistake." As if that weren't the underestimation of the century.

"You forgot your shoes." Her eyes were bright with tears as she looked him over.

"I forgot a lot of things." Like my fucking mind, he added in his head.

"Harry..." She whispered, afraid of the way he was looking at her; afraid of the way it made her heart lift.

"Please..." He pleaded, his hands clasping together in front of him. "Please. Don't go. I know I have no right to ask you to...but I would give anything, everything, if we could just...take back the last five minutes and..."

"Harry..." She shook her head; trying to shake off the expectation that came with his words.

"Okay," he held his hand out, having no choice but to accept what he thought was a no. "Please Madeline. Don't leave. Just come in out of the cold and...I'll leave if you want me to but please come back inside. You shouldn't be out here like this. This is your home and..."

"But it's not," she cut in, her fingers wiping under her eyes; her red, puffy eyes that simply wanted to close and rest. "You said you didn't want me here. You said you wanted me to leave, that you wanted to marry somebody else and..."

"No," his words were choked; the force of hearing his own words from her mouth was going to break him. His shoulders started to shake. "I don't want any of those things."

"But why..."
"I was so scared Maddie. So scared. And all I could think was...I have to get her out of this, I have to make sure that this never happens again. I..."

"You can't just say things like that to me, Harry. You can't just say them and expect me to..."

"I don't," he shook his head again.

"I knew this would be hard," she wiped at her eyes with her sleeve. "I knew it in that bookstore, the second I realized who he was that you were going to..." She stopped speaking, her tears taking over.

"Maddie..." He wanted to hold her, to comfort her, to take her in his arms and...

"I just didn't expect you to tell me to go..." Her words wavered with her trembling lips.

"Please let me take this back, make it go away."

"I thought you would pull me close and..."

"I want to," his voice cracked as his hands flexed, stretching and retracting; trying to hold it together. "I love you, Madeline..."

"I don't know what to say..." She crossed her arms over her chest and took a deep breath. "I'm so tired and...my mind hurts and...I don't know what to do."

"Stay," his eyebrows lifted in hope, in the tiny bit of optimism his crazy heart held onto. "Stay with me. Come inside and give me the chance to fix this, to make this better."

"I don't know if my heart can handle any more roller coaster tonight. I..."

"I won't," he shook his head vigorously. "I promise. I'll leave you alone. I'll go stay at Will's if you want me to, I...I just want you to be here, be safe, tonight. Please."

Maddie took in a breath, pushed it out through her lips slowly and met his eyes. And if there had been any part of her that was still willing to put up a fight, it would have been dampened by what she saw there. It knocked her back a bit; the sadness, the emotion, the hope.

"Okay," she nodded; small and weak, like her voice. She wasn't sure what motivated her more, her inability to think clearly enough to formulate another viable option, or her overwhelming desire to be near him—even after all of this. Either way, she wasn't going anywhere that night. Hate him or not, he was her home. "Okay." She took a step forward then and Harry felt his knees jump in his chest.

There was no way in the world that he deserved this moment. There was no way he had done enough good in his life to warrant her walking back into their home after all that had happened. But as she moved back towards him, he stepped aside, letting her pass, and thanked God for whatever it was that had happened to have set her in his direction. His eyes shifted down, staring at his bare feet as she stepped past him.

"Harry?" She stopped in front of him.

"Hmm?" He lifted his head to look at her. She didn't move, didn't turn to look at him. But her hand reached out and, taking his with the slightest of squeeze. "Please don't go to Will's. I want you to stay here...if that's okay."

"Okay. Of course it's okay," he nodded and, before he could crumble at her fingers, she dropped his hand and moved inside. Looking up at the stars, he took a long deep breath and, wiping at his eyes, he turned to follow her inside.

When Harry stepped inside, he expected a wide variety of things to happen. Half of him expected her to smack him and half of him expected her to show him quickly to the guest room. He locked the door behind them and turned to face her; ready for whatever it was she wanted to throw at him —even if it was a piece of fine crystal.

She turned to face him, her arms wrapping around her own body as she looked around; feeling slightly out of place. When her eyes flashed to meet his, he felt his breath hold in his lungs. This was most certainly one of the more awkward moments in his recent life; facing her with such trepidation; such uncertainty as to his standing. He was willing to take whatever penance she demanded; even silence.

"Maddie..." He began, wanting to take away the tensions in her shoulders.

"Can I just..." She cut him off, her eyes casting down to the floor; nervous. "Wow." She let out a low chuckle. She felt odd in the room, vulnerable as she stood before him. Her eyes lifted then, meeting his with a tremble as she spoke. "After Arthur pulled me into the car...all I wanted to do is..." She shook her head with a laugh, wiping away a stray tear with the back of her hand. "Would you..."

"Anything," he answered; his heart pounding in his ears.

"Ha!" She laughed, the tears increasing at the irony of the moment. "Would you hold me?" Her voice wavered as her eyes pleaded with him; scared of his answer to her request.

"Yes." His voice cracked; humbled and floored that she was asking, devastated that she seemed scared and unsure.

"It's just..." She hurried with her explanation, completely unnecessary. "The last person to have his hands on me was Arthur and before that it was..."

And then he moved to her, slightly hesitant as he stepped forward, arms extended and every single hope and wish riding on this moment. Maddie blinked at the tears in her eyes and, setting aside everything from earlier, she moved into him. His heart jumped in his chest; taking less than a fraction of a second before his arms were around her; folding her into his body, wrapping her up tightly.

Tears sprang to his eyes; realization sinking into him just as her body was sinking in his. He had almost lost this. He had almost pushed this away. Hell maybe he still had; maybe this was a fluke, a blip on the radar before she came to her senses and showed him the door. Either way, he was taking it; taking her in his arms, for as long as she would let him.

"Thank you," Maddie's voice was muffled against him; tired and weak.

"Shh," he whispered into her hair, struggling to keep from crying like a great big giant baby.
"Please..." Please what? Please let me hold you? Please let me offer my heart on a platter? Please let me take back everything I've said to you tonight? He didn't know what to say. So, instead of speaking, he just held her tighter.

Maddie nuzzled closer; her arms wrapping around his waist, her eyes closing in a sense of relief, a sense of home. She knew it was crazy, by almost all accounts, but she couldn't help it. Her day had been terrible. She had been so afraid in that bookstore; afraid of what that man might do, afraid of what the outcome might be, afraid she wouldn't have another chance to stand in Harry's arms and feel him around her. She had been so afraid; all day. And after Arthur had pulled her from safety, all she had wanted to do, all she had needed to do was to fold herself up in the arms of somebody who loved her and let it all wash away.

And right now, despite his earlier words and his seeming desire to retract them, she knew that Harry loved her. She could feel his arms, tight and protective, around her. She could feel his hands rubbing her back, his fingers clenching at her as they moved.

"I was so...stupid..." Her voice was shaky. "I should never have gone looking for that book without Arthur...I..." She took a shuddering breath. "I should have never let him take me to show me where...I was so stupid Harry. So stupid."

"No," he shook his head, trying to control his emotions so that he could be there for hers. "This wasn't your fault. This was...this was some crazy man who..." He dropped kisses to the top of her head as he hugged her closer. "This wasn't you love. This wasn't you..."

"I'm so sorry." She shook slightly underneath his hands and he gulped at the lump in his throat. This is what should have happened before. This is what he should have done when they were finally alone, not the horrific scene he had created.

"No..." He shook his head; shaking off the sick feeling in his stomach. "Don't be sorry. Don't be..." He brought her close and closer still. And finally she just let the words die and let the anxiety and tension flow out of her as she stayed tucked in this cocoon he was offering.

Their moment was quiet, void of questions or talk. Afraid to put his voice into the mix, he never moved past the gentle cooing and shh's that came through his lips. Humbly, greedily, he held her to him; reveling in the way it felt to have her next to him again.

When she finally pulled back, calm and more at ease, she looked up at him with heavy eyes. And he saw the exact moment that she flashed back from this painful place of release she had just been. She looked him over, searching for signs of his feelings, her heart clenching as she worried.

"I'm sorry. I don't know..." She blinked a few times, bringing her sleeve up to wipe at the few silent tears that had fallen to her cheeks. "I didn't mean to..."

"Shh.." He shook his head, hurt that she would think she needed to apologize; knowing it was his fault that she did. His hands moved, slightly shaky and unsure to her face, framing it gently as his thumbs ran over her cheeks. "What can I do? What do you need from me? Are you hungry or..."

"I want to...I want to take a shower." She let out a sigh; relief beginning to return. "I want to just...wash it off, wash him off."

"Okay," he nodded, struggling with his emotions; struggling with the images from earlier, her bruised arm, her cut lip. "Okay. I'll just..."
"Will you come up?" She interrupted him with wide eyes. Her teeth bit into her lip, holding her hopes and her heart at bay; cautious about his reaction to her request. "You can just sit in our room. I just...I don't want to be alone and..."

"Absolutely." As if there were anything she could ask of him that he wouldn't do. "Absolutely."

Maddie's shower was long and hot, making her grateful that she was at the Palace with a seemingly endless supply of hot water. She stayed under that stream until the mirrors fogged up, until her skin was pink and hot to the touch. She let it run over her face, her shoulders, her back. She scrubbed at her skin, her hair; desperately wanting to be clean of that day.

And she was getting there. She was home. She was with him, however stunted and awkward that might be. She was there and he was there and her mind was starting to clear. When she turned off the water, she stepped from the shower and wrapped herself in the luxurious, fluffy towel, twisting another around her wet hair. She took a long, solid, deep breath and let it out. Rubbing at the mirror, she cleared a circle large enough to look at herself. Leaning closer, she poked at the small cut on her lip, remembering the way her teeth had gone into her during the struggle against him. She sighed and pulled back, turning her head to look at the marks on her arm; more defined as time wore on. The bruises were most definitely fingers, his fingers. She groaned inwardly as she rubbed her fingers over them, wishing they would disappear.

Turning away from the mirror, she reached for her lotion; taking her time, being mindful as she spread the warm, soft scent over her skin. It was silly, she knew, but it made her feel better; it made her feel relaxed. She let the towels fall to the floor, seeking warmth in her robe before she ran a comb through her damp hair. Finally, after brushing her teeth, she sighed.

She felt clean. She felt better; warm and soothed and slightly rejuvenated.

And now it was time to face him; to face Harry. She honestly didn't know what to expect on the other side of the door. He had been all over the map since she had come home from the bookstore and she wasn't entirely sure which side he was going to be on when she rejoined him in their room.

But there was no use in delaying it any longer. With a deep, steadying breath, Maddie turned the doorknob and stepped out into their room.

Harry's eyes instantly lifted to her. And she cracked a smile. He was still there, sitting in the exact same spot she had left him in. She was certain he hadn't moved, hadn't budged. And for whatever silly reason, that made her smile. He was still there; not budging.

"Hey..." She offered a tiny wave of her fingers. His lips turned up and his fingers lifted from his lap and her smile stretched a bit further; she breathed easier. Moving further into the room, Maddie slid onto the bed next to him, facing him as she sat down; her robe wrapped snugly around her.

For a moment she debated her next move; unsure as to what should happen next. But it was Harry who led the way, Harry who spoke first.

"Please don't leave me." Heart on his sleeve, his eyes met hers; fragile, vulnerable, honest. Maddie gulped and blinked and, matching his honesty with her own, her fingers stretched to hook into his.

"Please don't tell me to go."
"Never." He shook his head; one fluid, solid motion. "Never again." His fingers drew her hand further into his.

"I'll go, Harry." Her heart ached as she said the words; meaning every single one of them. "Next time...I'll go. I won't wait for you." Her hand slipped into his grasp; firm and warm and steady.

"There won't be a next time." He assured her, his body turning to face hers, pulling her hand into both of his; pressing it to his chest as he swore. "Never. I'm here till the end."

"Even if the end is tomorrow or this weekend or..." She felt so much in that moment; everything seemed to be riding on this moment.

"I came too close to that today, Maddie." He pulled her hand to his lips, kissing it once, twice, and on the third time he began to cry. "I can't...I just...I promise. No more." His eyes pressed closed, his shoulders slumped and he moved; his body folding, his head finding home in her lap. "Please..." He kissed the tops of her knees; emotion flowing from him like a waterfall. Maddie's hands moved into his red hair as he sat himself at her mercy. She knew this was a rarity for him, knew it was outside of his character. "I'm so sorry. I am so sorry. I don't have any excuse for...Please." He kissed her thighs, her hands, his forehead settling on her lap; pressing against her as he took a few deep breaths. "I love you so much. Please don't leave me." He whispered against her skin.

It wasn't the biggest leap of faith she had taken, trusting him, but it was close. Her heart had hurt so much that day—more from his words than what had occurred in the bookstore. But she knew him enough to know where his moment of panic had come from; where his unshakable desire to protect her—at all costs—came from. She got it.

But she couldn't do it again. She couldn't hold onto them when he was trying to sever all ties; she couldn't hold them together again. She meant it.

But he was sorry. He had regrets and issues and she knew he meant that too.

"Harry..." Her hands moved from his, slipping around his face; pulling him from her lap, wanting him to look at her. "You broke my heart tonight."

"I know..." He nodded; his heart aching at the truth in her words. He moved then, pulling his head from her lap; inching closer to her. It was not lost on him that she didn't move away. "I know I did."

"If you ever..." She started.

"I won't." He interrupted. "I am so sorry. I'm sorry I hurt you. I'm sorry I let my own issues get the best of me. I'm sorry that I made this day infinitely worse for you. I'm sorry I made you cry. I'm sorry I made you..." His hands were on her thighs as he moved closer to her. "I'm sorry I made you believe for one minute that I didn't want you, that I didn't need you more than..." Her hand rose to his cheek then; bringing his entire being to a pause. He turned into her palm. "Please don't let this be the end of us, Madeline. I beg you. I'll do anything. I'll..."

"Shh..." Her thumb pressed to his lips; bringing him to silence, pulling him to attention. She shook her head; slowly, lazily. "I don't want to...Let's not do drama, Henry." Her eyes were warm and wet as she met his eyes. "Let's just..." She smiled as a tear blinked out. "I love you." He grinned at that, even as she held his heart, their future in her hands.
"I love you too," he felt her hand rub against his cheek as she looked him over; deciding—he guessed.

"Harry?"

"Yes?" His eyebrows lifted; his hopes sky high.

"Can I..." Her head tipped in thought; her voice wavered in nervousness. "Can I kiss you now?"

"You're asking for my permission?" Shock; nothing but shock registered across his stunned face.

"Yes," she nodded. "After a day like today, after all that's been...of course I'm asking for..." With one hand wrapping around the hand she had pressed to his cheek, Harry moved forward; his soft, warm lips silencing her.

Without a second thought, she sighed into him; her heart settling in her chest; settling home. His hand moved to her neck, fingers wrapping around to the back; holding her to him as his lips moved over hers.

He had committed kisses to memory before. Their first—when she moved full throttle ahead of him and took matters into her own hands. The one that followed that—slow and soft and lasting forever. He had mapped out her mouth with his tongue; he had tucked away the feel of her lips, the slide of her tongue. He had mentally recorded the way her breath sounded when it fell from her in ecstasy. He knew the difference between that and the growl that came when she was feeling aggressive and bossy and...

He had logged so many moments between them; sexy, erotic moments that he kept for himself, sweet and simple ones that tugged at his heart like nothing else.

But this; this moment of reunion. It was going straight to the top of the list of memories. When Maddie pulled, Harry went; no questions, no pauses. He was following her to the ends of the Earth, following her to their bed. He felt nervous as she laid back, stretching out underneath him. His hands were shaky as they ran over her, his pulse pounding through every corner of his body; full of all of the emotion that comes with narrowly avoiding disaster. His lips left hers only to pay reverence to the rest of her; her cheeks, her jaw, her neck.

"Harry..." She breathed his name; breathed life back into him.

"I'm sorry are you..." He pulled back from her; eyes looking her over, worried he had hurt her, concerned that she felt cornered or...

"I'm fine..." She smiled innocently, her lip pulling between her teeth as her hands moved to his shirt, sliding up underneath it to feel his skin.

"But you..." He relaxed; resting against her.

"Called your name?" She smiled as he settled between her legs; strong and familiar. "Yeah..." She ran her fingers into his hair; thumbs rubbing at his temples. "You make me do that sometimes." His eyes held hers for a moment before his head bowed; lips lingering on her chest, slightly exposed from the slack of her robe.

"I don't deserve this," he whispered into her; his head rocking back and forth as he shook it in disbelief.

"Shh..."

"I don't deserve you," his face turned to the side; pressing his cheek into her stomach as he wrapped his arms all the way around her body, holding her tight.

"Maybe..." Maddie sighed, knowing there was no way for her to shush away the emotions he was juggling. Her fingers moved into his hair, stroking at his scalp as she smiled down at him. "Maybe I deserve you."

"Hmmm..." He chuckled against her, moving to look up at her; his chin resting against her. "You're being punished?"

There was a pause; a turning point. She could laugh with him, ease the awkwardness and evade the emotion or she could dive right into it. Her finger traced over his forehead and she blinked. "Make love to me Henry." She was diving. Before he could turn, before he could blink away his reaction, she saw it. His eyes welled up as he absorbed the blow from her words, from her intent. Turning his lips to her stomach, he kissed again; pressing his face into the fabric. And then, with a nod, a gulp to steel his nerves, he moved; rising to meet her lips with his. His hands slid along her body as he rose, along her arms as he pulled them up and over her head; his palms pressing into her palms, fingers intertwining, pressing her hands into the mattress below them.

Just like in Oslo, when she had asked to be fucked, just as he had followed her orders then, he was following her orders now. Though, this wasn't fucking. This was making love. This was holding on, with everything he had, in the wake of what could have been the end. One hand took both of hers overhead as the other moved, fingers trembling, to the tie on her robe. Pushing aside the light fabric, his hand slid inside; the memory of her curves, of her skin, nowhere near as perfect as the reality.

Maddie tugged at his shirt, needing him bare, needing him naked; needing the closeness that came with skin on skin. Clothing fell to the side, easily and without complications; his and hers tumbling to an easily forgotten pile along with all of the apprehension from before. He looked her over then, taking it in, giving thanks; honoring this moment of forgiveness, of moving on. And then, with her freed arms around his neck, her hands pressing into his shoulders encouragingly, he pressed his face into the soft confines of her neck and he pressed into her.

And the love making began; the redemption coming full circle.

"Ohhhh...." Maddie felt the word bubble from her toes as he moved. She felt him fill her up; completely. Her head rocked back against the pillow of his hands as he rocked against her.

He moved in long, languorous strokes; savoring every inch, every second, every sensation that came with this moment. He took his time, he took great care. And Maddie could feel him in every pore. She felt his breath shudder from his lungs. She felt every ounce of emotion that came with him, every single word he wasn't speaking. She felt his hot lips against her skin, she felt his nose trace against her as he kissed. She felt his eyelashes flutter.

And she swore, as he neared the end, as she called out his name and pressed nails to his back, she swore she felt a few, hot tears slip onto his cheeks—smudged out against her skin.

It was warm and intense. It was sweet and heavenly and overwhelming—in the greatest sense of the word. It was everything she needed to feel; the longing, the want, the desire, the sweet, glorious relief. It was everything. Everything.

And when it was over, he stayed with her; wrapped around her, warm inside of her. He kissed promises into her mouth, he stroked love into the curves of her body. It pained him to pull away, to pull from her. He was quick to clean up, quicker to return. And that night, as they settled under the covers, against each other, he dared anyone—heaven or earth—to try to come between them again.

They had faced something that had shaken their bond, rattled their union. It had pushed Maddie to the limits of her resolve. It had torn at Harry's loyalties. It brought her to her breaking point and him to his knees. It forced them to face their fears and insecurities and their own mortalities; individually and as a couple. And in the end, it left them tired, worn, and closer than it had found them.

When Maddie woke, it was morning. The sun peeked through the heavy cloud cover as though it was determined to shine light on her day. Her hand reached for him before her eyes did, both coming up empty. She sat up in their bed, glancing around the room for him and found nothing. Slipping from their bed, she pulled her robe around her body and padded out of the room; in search of him.

When she found him, she smiled and shook her head. There he was, half clothed, sitting on the very same step he had been on when things had begun to fall apart. She sighed and lowered herself next to him. Her shoulder nudged his as she sent him a smile.

"Whatcha doing?" She looked him over.

"I couldn't sleep," he confessed; his left arm moving around her shoulders as his right reached for her hand. "I was just...thinking..." He pulled her closer and pressed a kiss to the side of her head.

"Harry..." Her hand squeezed his reassuringly. "I'm fine. Everything's fine."

"It's not that." He kissed her hand, bringing it to his cheek as if to warm his skin. "It's not just that."

"What is it?" She stroked his stubbled chin. He smiled at her, his eyes meeting hers without a hint of struggle. He kissed her then, his soul wide open.

"I've been trying to figure out how I can possibly apologize for..."

"Stop..." She shook her head with a light groan.

"Maddie." He was so stubborn.

"You don't have to..." But he did. He had to. She knew that about him. She could forgive him, take him in her arms, take him into her bed, but he was who he was. And God help her, she loved him.

"You don't need to do this Harry..." Her hands moved into his hair; ruffled from a restless night. "Yesterday was..." She swallowed and shook her head. "We were both not in the best space and there is no need to..."

"I'm sorry," he looked up to her; wide, sad eyes. "I'm so sorry. I messed up in the biggest way and..."

"Shhh..." Her fingers fell over his lips. He kissed the tips lightly and pulled them back into his hand.

"I need you to forgive me."

"We've been over this. I have forgiven you." She ran her thumb along his jaw. "You think I would be able to make love to you last night like..." She blushed slightly at the memory. "You think I would be able to make love to you if I hadn't?"

"Maybe I need to forgive myself."

"Well that's on you Sunshine," she gave his cheek a light pinch and moved to step away from him. As she rose from the stair, he caught her hand; holding her there in the entryway.

"Will you come somewhere with me today?"

"Where do you want to go?" She smiled. "We can't go on vacation. We have rehearsals and renovations and..."

"No no." He shook his head. "Here. In town. Will you come somewhere with me?" He watched as she gave it thought.

"Okay," she sighed. "I just need to put on some clothes and..."

"Okay. I'll be right here."

"Can I make a suggestion?" She looked him over.

"Of course."

"You should probably put on some clothes. And shoes." She pointed to his feet. "You need to start wearing shoes."

"Yes." He looked down at himself, laughing as she moved around him to their room.

Less than an hour later, they were on their way to the car. Dressed warmly for the crisp, cool day, Maddie's cheeks were pink as she smiled at their security team standing at the ready; knowing that there would be no chance she would be spending any time alone for quite a while.

"Care to tell me where we're going?" She asked as they strolled, casually, hand in hand. She watched as his face grew serious for a moment; coming to a stop next to the car.

"The bookstore," he answered.

"What?" Her heart thudded to a standstill.
"You..." He looked down at the ground, searching for his courage before meeting her eyes. "I want you to know that I'm serious. I'm not going to be shaken by this..." He sighed. "You were looking for a specific book that day and...and I want to go back there and find it. You don't have to go in if you don't want to. If you want to wait in the car while I do, you can. If you want to take all three agents with you while we shop, that's fine. I just...I don't want this to be what..."

With a tug to his hand in hers, Maddie pulled his lips to hers; silencing him.

The flowers would come; followed by chocolates and jewelry and a mini holiday to France to cuddle with Isaiah and view the city from the Eiffel Tower—when Harry went into apology mode, he went.

But this, this moment where he faced his greatest fear, the fear that almost took them down, this was the defining moment for Maddie.

Sure, she took both agents and, sure, her hand was tight in Harry's grasp the entire time but stepping into that store, buying that book—was exactly what she needed.

And the trip to France didn't hurt too much either.

Chapter End Notes

I have an Alternate Ending to this storyline in which Harry does not go after Maddie and their relationship ends. If you want to see how THAT goes, check out The Alternate Journey under "My Works". Check it out if you're curious.
"Good Evening Captain Wales," just as Maddie had expected, her call had gone directly to Harry's voicemail. He had reported to base for Captain's Training with the Army earlier that week. But before he had left, he had made provisions. "I wanted to report successful delivery of your...tenth bouquet of flowers since you left five days ago. If we keep up at this rate for another five days..." She sighed and placed the flowers onto his vacant desk. "They are beautiful Harry; all of them. The delphinium was a nice touch. Was it from Highgrove? Probably not. Too cold..."

She caught a glimpse of herself in the mirror and chuckled at the way she was having a conversation with his voicemail. "But it's been weeks since the bookstore and I'm running out of places to put them and maybe the flowers can stop? Who am I kidding? You're probably only going to increase it because it drives me nuts." She sighed. "They're beautiful Harry; particularly the purple ones that came today. I love them. I love you. See you soon."

Ending the phone call, Maddie took a look around the bottom floor of their place. There were flowers everywhere. Even before he had left, he had brought home a fresh bunch nightly. She had run out of vases long ago and, after Bernard caught her using a delicate crystal pitcher one afternoon, Harry's deliveries began to arrive with their own containers.

With a quick glance to the clock, she scooted the vase towards the center of Harry's desk and smiled. These would be there to greet him when he returned. Ella was on her way over for some quality girl time, something both ladies desperately needed, and there was still a bottle of wine to open.

Maddie had just enough time to uncork one of Ella's favorites and put pasta on the stove to reheat while she chopped up veggies for the salad. When the doorbell rang out, she was ready for her best friend.

"Ella!" She exclaimed, pulling the door open.

"Hi my darling," Ella stepped through the door and into Maddie's open arms; hugging tight.

"How are you?" Maddie spoke into her hair.

"Great," she smiled as she pulled back. "Though I have to tell you, getting in was significantly more difficult tonight than it was the last time I was here."

"Ah yes," Maddie nodded, leading her friend towards the kitchen. "You have one run in with a psychopath at a bookstore and it ruins the fun for everyone else." Ella paused for the slightest of moments, letting the reality of that statement settle before she chuckled and Maddie sighed with relief.

"Well," Ella sighed, shrugging her coat off and laying it on the back of a couch. "I'll let Peters feel me up any time he wants if it means you're safe."

"Thanks love," Maddie giggled. "Way to take one for the team."

"Okay but seriously Maddie," Ella looked around the house as they continued their journey; taking in vase after vase, bouquet after bouquet. "What in the hell is with all the flowers? You opening a greenhouse?"
"Yeah," Maddie smiled, her eyes shifting around the room, a pink flush to her cheeks. "It's Harry he..." She laughed, deciding Ella's option was the easiest to explain. "Yes. A greenhouse.

"Your back up plan?" Ella's smile grew smug; knowing it was something much more sappy and romantic than that.

"Yes. You know...in case the Duchess thing doesn't work out."

"Smart. Wise."

"You just never know," Maddie moved to stir the pasta. "Can I pour you some wine?" She called over her shoulder.

"Already on it," Ella typically made herself at home when she was there. "Do we still have your dress fitting tomorrow afternoon?"

"Yes. You still able to make it?"

"Are you kidding?" Ella rolled her eyes. "I wouldn't miss it for the world." She took a sip and perched on a stool. "Listen. Maddie. There is something I need to tell you."

"Okay..." Maddie nodded, still focused on the food. "Shoot."

"Nope." Ella shook her head. "This is a turn around, drink wine, and forget dinner kind of conversation."

"Oh. Oh?" Maddie turned on her feet, her eyes immediately scanning her friend for a hint. "Okay. Well..." She wiped at her hands and reached for a glass of wine. "What's up?"

"Okay." Ella took a sip. "First. I need to talk to you about something and you're going to want to...fix it."

"Oh-kay..." Maddie smiled slightly.

"But I need you to not go into therapist mode and I need you to be my friend and...not try to fix it."

"Okay. Sure..." Maddie shrugged, moving to one of the high stools. "Go ahead."

"Go ahead?" Ella's face twisted into a smirk. "Really? Just like that? You can do that?"

"Yes. When you tell me ahead of time, I can do that."

"Okay." Ella took a long, slow drink from her glass, draining it before she sat it down and took a breath. "I'm thinking of breaking up with Bishop."

"What?!" Maddie nearly fell out of her chair. "I..."

"Shh!" Ella held up a finger with a warning glare. "You said you would be my friend and..."

"But Bishop..."

"You were my friend first." Maddie bit her lips between her teeth and looked down at her hands; taking a moment before she took a deep breath and looked up to Ella.

"Why?" Her voice was soft, eyes sympathetic. "I thought things were going well. I thought he was a great guy?"

"He is," Ella nodded, her eyes growing a bit teary. "Bishop is a great guy. And things are going well."

"Then..."

"It's me," Ella huffed into a laugh; eyes downcast. "I'm not sure I deserve to be with somebody like him."

"Ella..." Maddie's heart hurt.

"This is when your therapist mouth wants to run rampant," Ella cut her off with a friendly grin. "I know what you're going to tell me. I know that...voodoo you're going to try on me." She snapped her fingers and pointed at Maddie with narrowed eyes. "And you're right. I need to think...oh God...I need to think more highly of myself and I need to be able to accept that people love me and I need to..." Her smile faded as her voice grew shaky. "I need to let go of all of the shit with my father so that I can make room for something wonderful, someone wonderful. For somebody like Bishop."

Maddie blinked at the teariness that sprang to her own eyes and remained silent, letting Ella sort it out.

"I need to do all of those things." She took a deep breath and let it out slowly. "I'm just not sure I can do them when I'm with Bishop...when I'm with anyone really."

"But you could..."

"Really lose him?" Ella finished the sentence, allowing a few tears to slip from her eyes before wiping at them and nodding. "I know." Maddie's hand reached out to squeeze Ella's. She took another breath and blew it out, forcing a smile. "Anyway. I don't know what I'm going to do, I just didn't want you to be...in the dark. I'm going to see somebody tomorrow."

"Somebody?"

"A therapist," Ella grinned. "One of you." They shared a light laugh. "I'll see how it goes. I just...I don't want to keep him hanging onto this mess..."

"You're not a mess, Ella."

"I don't want to keep him hanging onto this mess," Ella continued. "If I'm never going to be able to be the person he deserves."

"Ella..." Maddie began, wanting to tell her that all of this talk about deserving was ridiculous, that people could work through things together as a couple, that she was an amazing, wonderful, fantastic woman and that any man, Bishop included, would be lucky to have her. But Ella stopped her.

"Please Maddie," her eyes grew sad. "I don't want to argue with you about this. I didn't tell you this so that you would build me up. I just...I'm asking you for what I need and right now that's a lack of judgment, that's a supportive friend, that's...loving me in spite of my bad decisions, that's...a hug and more wine and..."

Maddie rose from her chair and wrapped her arms around Ella; squeezing tight. Both women edged towards tears, towards total breakdown and both edged back; sniffing and laughing. Maddie waited till Ella pulled back and then she leaned in, kissed her cheek and took a breath.

"More wine?" Ella's eyes met hers and they shared a look of undying friendship and love.

"More wine." Ella nodded.

"Good Morning Captain Wales," Maddie's voice was low and rough as she spoke into the phone. Having woken only minutes before to accept the delivery, she had crawled right back into bed. "The Pincushion Hakea Plant was an inspired choice." She yawned and snuggled back into his pillow. "I'm having lunch with Kate today. Joan called to verify our time for tomorrow night and I have to say...Rehearsal at ten at night? Because you had officer training? That's some kind of pull you have there Captain. Anyway..." She frowned. "I miss you Harry. I can't wait to see you. Tomorrow. Thank you—for the flowers. They're beautiful and I know you're sending them now just to get at me...but the joke's on you. I love them and I have every intention of putting a significant dent in your fortune filling up our home with fresh flowers. Well played Wales. I love you." Maddie ended the call and tossed the phone to her side of the bed. With a sigh and a bit of a grumble, she sank down under the covers. She still had a few hours before she had to meet Kate and his pillow smelled faintly of him.

"This is the first time we've gotten together since your...attempted kidnapping..." Kate's voice lowered as she popped a cherry tomato into her mouth. They were having lunch at Will and Kate's Kensington apartment. With great warmth she had hugged Maddie close and invited her in. Now they were seated at her dining room table eating an amazing salad, one of the few things the baby, growing and moving, approved of. Kate had been showing for a little while now and her sickness was finally starting to fade; leaving behind glowing cheeks and happy parents-to-be.

"Ugh." Maddie groaned into her iced tea. "Are we really calling it that?"

"That's what they all call it," Kate waved her hand and Maddie wasn't sure if she meant the world or the family. "Seriously though." Kate wiped her hands on the napkin, dainty and proper, before her eyes settled on Maddie. "How are you doing?"

"I'm okay," Maddie smiled; her eyes blinking as she responded.

"Really?" Kate's eyes narrowed; nothing but love and concern.

"Yes. I promise. I went and saw an old boss of mine, Dr. Colvin. We talked a few times...I'm okay." This was the answer she gave to only very close friends and family.

"And how's Harry?"

"Harry is..." Maddie smiled softly and Kate knew. Maddie knew that she knew. Kate understood better than anyone. She had known the moment she had learned the details of the Code Black that had brought security descending around her as well. These brothers were protective, fiercely so.
Kate had guessed Harry would circle the wagons; she knew Will would had it been her. Maddie took a breath and nodded. "Harry is doing better."

"Yeah?"

"Yeah. He was pretty fazed that day but...he's come around. He's doing better."

"He lets you go to the loo on your own again?"

"Oh no," Maddie shook her head with a wink. "But he's never let me do that."

"Ha!" Kate chuckled at the irony of that statement; imagining it was closer to the truth than other people might think.

"But enough about me and my..."

"Attempted kidnapping," Kate offered with a smirk.

"Yes," Maddie rolled her eyes and looked Kate over; her smile warming. "Tell me. How is my little baby doing?"

"Fabulous," Kate's hand drifted to her rounding stomach. "Though Will says you have to stop calling it your baby."

"What? Why?"

"The tabloids, the press. You know...the whole thing." Kate rolled her eyes.

"He really thinks somebody is going to run with 'the baby is Maddie's'?"

"He's...strange."

"I guess." Maddie laughed. "Fine. That's fine. But honestly. If I have to stop calling the baby mine, Harry should have to stop too."

"Oh don't worry," Kate laughed. "Will's already on that one."

"Is it really so bad if we think of the little one as ours? It takes a village you know..." Maddie shrugged.

"I know," Kate smiled. And she did. It had been that way since the announcement; all of them taking ownership of the baby, creating a protective, nurturing bubble around the mommy-to-be and the little one. "And he knows. I think he's just...you know these boys. He's protective. He wants to be the only one to lay claim to the little guy..."

"Yeah. I suppose that..." Maddie's eyes grew wide, snapping up to meet Kate's. "Wait. Did you just say little..." Maddie's hand flew to her mouth as Kate's face registered shock.

"I..." Kate tried to walk it back but she was too late and Maddie was too quick.

"You did!" Maddie pointed at her. "Oh my God! Are you having a..."

"Shhh!" Kate waved her hand, slightly rattled. "Don't say it! Don't..." She took a breath. "I cannot believe I just..."

"Oh Kate," Maddie's eyes glistened over, her hands pressing into her chest as she looked over her friend, her sister. "Are you?"

"Yes," her voice was smile, but her excitement exuded from every pore of her body. Maddie clapped her hands with an enormous grin. "We just found out this week. You cannot tell a soul. Not a soul. Not even Harry. Will wants to tell Harry."

"I promise the words will not leave my lips!" Maddie vowed and Kate trusted. "Oh my..."

"I know," Kate sighed, feeling slightly relieved that the secret was out; that somebody she trusted finally knew.

"Are you...happy? Are you okay? Are you..." Maddie trailed off.

"Yes," Kate nodded, certain. "I am...unbelievably happy."

"Good. Great." Maddie sighed into her seat. "Good."

"How are wedding plans?" Kate shifted the attention away from herself, something Maddie wished the world could see about her. "Rehearsals start this week?"

"Yes," Maddie grinned. "Just the two of us and Joan at the cathedral tomorrow night. We'll add in others as it gets closer, but tomorrow we're getting acquainted with the building." She laughed at the wording Joan had used.

"Excited?"

"In all honesty..." Maddie sipped from her glass and met Kate's eyes. "I'm just really ready to be married to him. You know?"

"Hmm," Kate smiled. "I know exactly how you feel."

Maddie giggled slightly as she settled the next in the long line of bouquets on the stand in their entry way. With a smile, she reached for her phone and dialed. "Captain Wales..." She sighed into the phone, smoothing her hands down over her skirt. "I'm dressed and waiting. We have a date in an hour and..."

Her ears perked up and she turned towards the door just as it swung open. "Never mind," she grinned. "You're here." And as she ended the call, Harry stepped into the entryway looking tired and rough for the wear, but delighted to see her.

"Hey there beautiful," he smiled wide; eyes running over her as he dropped his bag to the floor, laying his coat over it and reaching for her.

"Captain," her smile matched his as she moved into his arms; her hands moving up and around his neck, her nose nuzzling in to take in his scent. "You're later than I thought you would be."

"Yes, well," he kicked the door closed and adjusted her tighter to him. "I had to clear my voicemail inbox..." His eyes gleamed. "It took me forever."
"Strange..." She sighed, her eyes settling on his lips. "Hi."

"Hello," he whispered; putting lips to hers.

"You're still in camo," she muttered between kisses.

"Want to take it off of me?" His nose nuzzled into her neck.

"We only have an hour before we have to be at the Cathedral...you have to shower and..."

"Shower with me?" His hands clung to her then; convincingly.

"But my hair is..." She stopped short, laughing at herself. My hair? She shook her head at herself, disappointed, and slapped his ass. "You're on Captain."

"Yeah?" He smiled wide.

"I'll race you."

"Race me?" He laughed at her. "Please. I just came back from military training. I run every day and..." Her lips moved to his; slowly, sensually, pulling his thoughts to an end, leaving him breathless and, when she pulled away, she grinned wickedly.

"Go." And she was out of his arms and half way up the stairs before Harry had snapped back to the moment; bounding after her.

"See..." Harry smiled at Maddie as they hurried down the stairs. "Plenty of time."

"Hmmm..." Maddie shrugged; even she couldn't argue that rushing around to re-dress and fix her hair hadn't been worth every second of that shower.

"And you thought we would be late," he checked the mirror as he pulled his jacket on over his sweater; adjusted his tie.

"No," she laughed, holding onto his waist for steadiness as she slipped on her heels. "I said that even if we were late, it would be worth it. I stand by that statement."

"Thank you love," he turned around to face her as she pulled her jacket on over her dress and reached for her coat.

"No, no," she moved to him, sliding her hands up his chest, pressing a kiss to his cheek. "Thank you."

"Mmm..." He grinned against the lips he bent to kiss. "Are you ready?"

"I am," she nodded, stepping regretfully away from him and sliding into the coat he held out for her. "I just need..." She hurried into their living room, lifting a paper plate and ribbon creation from the bookcase and hurrying back to him.

"What on Earth is that?" Harry eyed it.
"It's..." She chuckled. "Ella made it for me one night when she was here. Women...at the rehearsal, women use it to replicate the bouquet they'll be holding. You know..." She held it in front of her as she would were she walking that moment. "You know?"

"I do know," he nodded and, with that wicked Windsor smile of his, he leaned over to where his bag was still resting. When he rose, he pulled with him a small, beautiful bouquet in deep purple. "I just thought you could use this instead."

"Oh..." Maddie gasped, her eyes welling up. "Look at you."

"You said you liked the purple ones the best."

"I did," she sighed. "Good God, Harry. When you're on, you're on."

"Hmmm..." He held it to her. "You don't think Ella would mind, do you?"

"No," Maddie shook her head as she sat the paper version to the side and took his simple creation. "Thank you."

"You're welcome," he accepted her kiss with humility and offered his arm. "Come on. Let's go get...fake married."

"Let's." Maddie grinned and slid her arm through his.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

It was really quite something, mind blowing even; having St. Paul's Cathedral to themselves, in the middle of the night. Maddie couldn't help but giggle as she looked around. It was massive, elegant; and it was all theirs. Truly the only people inside were she and Harry, Joan, and their security officers—who wisely chose to station themselves at checkpoints throughout the sanctuary; going for zone coverage instead of man to man.

"I have to say," Joan looked around the vast opulence. "I've never been in here with quite so few people."

"No?" Maddie's voice was low, reverent.

"We usually do rehearsals in the afternoon," Joan smiled warmly at Maddie and Harry as everyone relaxed and said their hellos.

"Yes well, lover boy over here had Captain's training..." Maddie winked at him; high spirited and happy.

"I hope it wasn't too much trouble," Harry smiled at Joan, his hand resting on Maddie's back.

"No, not at all," Joan shook her head. "We really don't need anyone else tonight anyway. We're simply here to run through things for the first time, allow the two of you some time to be here and become more comfortable with how things are going to work." She wanted them to feel at home in the space. "Are we ready?"

"Yes," they agreed.
"Okay. Your Royal Highness..."

"Harry," he interrupted her. "Please. It's going to be a very long night if you insist on titles."

"Harry," she smiled. "I need you to go up to the altar and wait for us to join you. I want to go over positioning and where you'll be. But, I am going to give Madeline the chance to walk the aisle at the appropriate pace as much as we possibly can."

"Absolutely," he nodded; feeling agreeable. With a squeeze to Maddie's hand, he left the two women and made his way in that direction. Maddie couldn't help the way her eyes swept over him appreciatively as he moved.

"Okay," Joan turned her smile to Maddie and moved to a box she had sitting on a pew. "Now. Let's get you dressed."

"Dressed?" Maddie's eyebrows shot up, tearing her eyes from Harry's ass.

"Yes," she nodded, reaching into the box and pulling out a large, folded sheet. "I spoke with your designer, Ms. Ellis, and she sent over a mock train."

"A mock train?" Maddie laughed lightly as Joan began unfolding it.

"This is the same length as your train," she moved about Maddie, draping it to the ground and moving the ties around her waist. "It will help you judge the weight you will be carrying that day."

"Oh wow..." Maddie couldn't help but feel silly as she looked down and behind her.

"And this..." Joan had slipped away to the box. When she turned around this time, Maddie's breath sucked in. The Strathmore replica. "This is for your head."

"Yes," Maddie whispered. "I've seen that before."

"May I?" Joan nodded to the top of her head.

"Of course," Maddie lowered slightly; allowing her to place it on her head.

"Does that feel secure enough for walking?"

"Yes," Maddie's fingers rose to adjust it slightly.

"Okay dear. Here is your bouquet," she handed her the purple flowers Harry had given her. "These are beautiful."

"Thank you."

"Now," Joan stood before her; hands clasped together. "You're going to be walking with your mother. I know we'll have her here for our big rehearsal as we get closer to the day."

"Yes we will," Maddie great more excited at the thought of her family coming; soon.

"Okay, now just hold your bouquet out in front of you like..." Joan adjusted Maddie's arm in front "Shoulders back, head high. Let's see that smile..." Maddie complied. "Fantastic. Now. Following my pace, let's walk."

As they moved, Joan spoke to Maddie; giving her details of the venue, pointing out where people might be seated, slowing her down when needed, reminding her not to hold her breath. And Maddie was thankful for all of it. Her mind was a bit of a swarm as she took it in; the fake tiara, the mock train. She suddenly felt incredibly thankful they would be doing this multiple times before their wedding day. As she neared the altar, she found herself searching for Harry—much like she knew she would that day. His smile widened when he saw them; his eyes scanning over her ensemble.

"Wow..." He shook his head, biting at his bottom lip. "I thought I wasn't supposed to see you in the dress before the wedding!" He called out to her.

"Ha, ha."

"It's beautiful," he grinned. "But maybe you could have toned it down just a bit." Defiantly Maddie flipped him off, to which he retorted, "That's lovely! Really regal. Do that on the actual day..."

"Now..." Joan smiled, bemused, and continued on with her instruction. "Madeline, you will stand here." She pointed and Maddie moved. "Harry, you'll be right here." She pointed and he moved. "Harry, your brother will be right here, just to your right."

"I saw a broom over in that corner," Harry nodded off to the side. "Would you like me to grab it as a stand in?" Maddie's head shook as she snickered at him.

"He's funny," Joan spoke to Maddie.

"Isn't he though," Maddie agreed.

"Your mother will be standing next to you here. Music will be playing. She'll raise your veil. Ms. Marshall will fluff your train and take your bouquet." Joan reached out and took the purple flowers from Maddie. "The music will come to a close and we'll begin." She stood before them, in place of the Archbishop and clapped her hands together. "There will be a lengthy greeting. He'll charge you and the congregation. He'll ask you if you will and you'll say yes." She eyed them both, knowing them well enough that a warning didn't seem entirely out of place. "Do remember that nobody finds it amusing for jokes at this point."

"Of course," Maddie smiled.

"Yes Ma'am," Harry nodded.

"He'll ask who gives you away, your mother will hand over your right hand to the Archbishop who will then give it to Harry."

"Quite a transaction," Maddie smiled as Joan moved her right hand into Harry's.

"What did she say about jokes, Madeline," Harry eyed her playfully.

Joan grinned at the two of them as she continued on with the details; finding that even as she tried to keep to point, she was too amused by the couple, too captivated by their chemistry and obvious fondness for each other to be too upset at their jokes and quips.
After about twenty minutes of explanation and direction, Joan turned to the two of them and clapped her hands together.

"Okay, Madeline. Take your bouquet and head back down the aisle. We're going to go through it all one more time."

"What?" Maddie's eyes flashed wide. "I'm sorry. I..."

"I'm going to show Harry where he'll be going when he arrives at the church and, like I said, we're going to have you walking that aisle many, many times before the day arrives."

"We are?"

"It's a big moment. The more you do it now, the easier it will be that day, when the world is watching." Joan explained simply. "Tonight is all about making it second nature so that when the cameras are here, you're not quite as nervous. Now, if you'll please..."

"But..." Maddie sighed and smiled, knowing she was being difficult. "It's so far, I think I might need a snack. You know, some form of sustenance."

"A snack?" Joan hid the surprise behind a smile.

"Here," Harry stepped forward, reaching into the pocket of his jacket. "I'm not sure if this counts as sustenance but it's all I have..." Maddie looked to his palm and laughed.

"You brought my candy..." She grinned up at him; moved.

"Of course," he eyed her and nodded towards the aisle. "Now. Get down there so that you can get back up here."

"Oh Captain, my Captain," she whispered.

"Easy," he shook his head, biting back his gut response.

Upon Maddie's second arrival at the altar, Joan had already shown Harry the route he would be taking and they were waiting for her; stagnation beginning to set in. This time when Maddie took her spot next to Harry, Joan turned to her with a strange new request.

"I'm sorry?" Maddie laughed.

"Say his name," Joan repeated her request.

"Harry."

"Not that name," Joan shook her head with a small smile. "His full name. The name you'll use that day."

"Henry Charles Albert David," Maddie recited.

"That a girl," Harry winked.

"Again."
"Henry Charles Albert David."

"Again."

"Henry Charles Albert David."

"Again."

"Henry...I'm sorry but why are we..."

"You need to feel comfortable saying it. We need you to not forget it or jumble it or..."

"We can thank my mother for that one," Harry smiled, remembering her with fondness.

"And..." Joan continued without missing a beat. "He needs to feel comfortable hearing it. We want him to smile when you say it, not cringe as though he's in a whole world of trouble," she tossed a smile in Harry's direction. "Again."

"Henry Charles Albert David."

"Again."

"Henry...Charles...Albert...David..." Maddie's voice slowed.

"Okay." Joan smiled, stifling a yawn. "Now. Let's start over from the top. Madeline. If you would..." She nodded her head towards the front of the Cathedral.

"You're joking."

"Not in the slightest." She met the young woman's gaze and held it until Maddie relented and, with a slightly dramatic, deep breath, she turned towards the beginning of the aisle.

"I love you!" Harry called out to her, sympathy mixed with amusement.

"You had better," Maddie grumbled as she moved; calling out. "Henry Charles Albert David!"

Maddie was about half way down the aisle on her way back to them when she groaned and sighed and, feeling like a diva princess for the first time in her entire life, sank to the floor. Maybe this late time, after a long week, was too much for her. Her legs felt relief, her feet the same. She giggled as she relaxed on the cool marble and looked up at the domed ceiling. What good was it to have St. Paul's to themselves if she wasn't going to take advantage of the moment and revel in her moment of luxury.

"Madeline?" Harry's voice called out to her; echoing through the air, no longer seeing her in the distance.

"I'm done!" She called out from her space on the floor; smile wide, body relaxed. "I am at ease in the space and I quit!"

At the altar, Harry flashed a charming smile to Joan who shook her head with a small chuckle. "You can't quit love! Come on!"
"Harry..." She moaned with a deep breath. "I'm stuck!"

"Stuck?" He laughed and started down the steps. "I'm coming for you! Stay put!"

"No problem," she mumbled and leaned back against a pew to wait.

"Marco!" He called out as he came down the aisle towards her.

"Polo!" She giggled at his memory as he stepped up to her.

"You're on the floor?" He raised his eyebrows; arms crossing his chest amused.

"I am," she smiled sweetly. "I'm tired. I'm hungry. It's...almost midnight. I've walked this aisle like...twenty times..."

"Twenty?" He snickered.

"And before that my future husband made my body do things that..."

"Shhh..." His eyes narrowed, despite his smug grin. "We are in church. Now, look..." He tugged at his pants, lowering himself to the floor next to her. "I know you're tired. I'm guessing your feet hurt."

"You're guessing right."

"But we have to do this. We have to finish what she asks us to do and then..." He sighed. "I'll take you home; make you pizza, rub your feet."

"Yeah?"

"Absolutely." He held out his hand. "Now come on. You ready to get up off the floor and finish this?"

"I don't know," she sighed with a smile. "This is a pretty excellent view."

"It is," Harry nodded, following her gaze to the top of the dome. "But Joan is bound to come looking for us sooner or later and I'm not sure we want to make her mad."

"Point taken," Maddie laughed. "Okay Wales. Help me up?"

"Yes ma'am," he rose first, pulling her to her feet after him. "Ready?"

"I have a sheet tied around my waist."

"Yes. It's a sexy sheet. You bringing it home for later?"

"You should have to wear the sheet."

"Hand it over." He held out his hand.

"Stop." She slapped at it.

"Anything for you, you know that."
"Now you're just making fun."

"I am." He nodded and kissed the top of her hand before releasing it. "I'll head back up there. You keep your pace. I'll see you soon."

"Soon?" Maddie laughed. "It takes me a good five minutes to walk this."

"But at the end of the rainbow..." He waved a hand over himself as he walked backwards towards the altar.

"My very own pot of gold."

"Just look out for the grumpy, bald leprechaun. He'll get you."

"We're talking about Will?"

"Yep."

"You're hilarious," she took a step forward, following behind him at her own, slower pace. "I should tell you though...you make me laugh that day, I'll finish the rest of the ceremony in my fake British accent."

"You have a fake British accent?" He called back; eyebrows lifted.

"I do," she drawled, trying her best. "And if you make me lose it in front of your family and those cameras, the papers will be writing about it for days."

"Is that it?" He nodded to her, a healthy smirk on his face. "Your British accent?"

"Yes."

"Sounds more...Australian..." He cocked an eyebrow. "But I hear your threat either way."

"Good." She laughed. "Now go. I'll see you soon."

It was considerably colder when Harry and Maddie stepped out of St. Paul's that night. It was just after midnight and they were saying good-byes and offering up unnecessary apologies to Joan—who smiled and waved them off. After seeing that she was secure in her car on her way home, they began towards their own.

"I guess we passed her test," Harry joked as he pulled his phone from his pocket, powering it up.

"Does that mean she'll let us get married?" Maddie giggled as she did the same.

"I think so..." Harry stalled as they walked. "Hold on."

"Everything okay?" Maddie turned to look at him; slowing to a stop.

"I..." He shook his head slowly as he pressed a few buttons. "Bishop called me like...seventeen times. Hold on, I'm going to listen to a message..." He pressed the phone to his ear and Maddie's heart jumped into her throat. She looked down at her own phone. One text message from Ella.

It's over. I know you're rehearsing. Call when you can.

"Oh my God." Harry's voice registered surprise as he turned wide eyes to her. "They broke up."

"I..." Maddie shook her head. Even though she had been given a warning of some sort, she still felt blindsided. "I just got the same in a text from Ella."

"He wants me to..." Harry had apologetic eyes as he hiked his thumb towards the city.

"Go." Maddie smiled weakly; understanding. "You go to him. I'm going to call her..."

"Okay," Harry nodded and stuffed his phone in his pocket. "You take the car. I'll grab a cab."

"Okay." Maddie agreed, her fingers holding tight to the lapels of his coat as though her body really didn't want to let him leave.

"Don't wait up for me," he leaned in to kiss her cheek; his hand on her elbow as his lips whispered against her skin.

"Give Bishop my love," she smiled and watched as he nodded and took three steps away from her. Then he stopped and, remembering what they were doing, what they were there for, he turned and took the three steps back up. Wordlessly, he pulled her back to him; lips crushing against lips, his hands at her waist.

"I love you," he met her eyes with a smile.

"Mmmm..." She sighed; grateful. "I love you too."

And then he was gone; off to nurse his friend's broken heart. As Maddie slid into the car, now down three people, she pressed her own phone to her ear.

~~~~~~~~~~~~

The sun was just a few hours from coming up when Maddie stirred, feeling Harry slip into bed next to her. She rolled over, her body moving instinctually towards him and her hands reached out for him.

"Hi baby," she muttered, moving closer.

"Sorry love," he responded; slightly slurred. "I was hoping not to wake you." He smelled faintly of alcohol and smoke.

"No, no," she shook her head as it moved to rest on his chest; his t-shirt soft under her cheek. "You didn't."

"Mmmm..." His arms wrapped around her as he pressed a kiss to the top of her head. "When did you get home?"

"A few hours ago," she sighed snaking her arm around his waist, the tips of her fingers tucking into the waistband of his shorts. "We had a few bottles of wine, cried, and then she wanted to be alone."
"How is she?" He asked.

"She's..." Maddie sighed and opened her eyes for the first time. "She's scared and upset and...worried you'll never let her see me again."

"Aw come on," he groaned, rubbing at his eyes with his free hand. "I'm not going to...Shit happens. I know shit happens. I'm not going to..." He took a deep breath. "Look. Ella's your best friend. Bishop is my Ella and tonight...your Ella tore out my Ella's heart."

"I know," Maddie frowned. "Is he okay?"

"No," Harry shook his head, squeezing her close. "He's not. He will be. But he's not tonight."

"Okay," Maddie felt bad for him. She felt bad for her. This wasn't easy for anyone. "You could have brought him home with you."

"I thought about it," Harry sighed, relaxing a bit. "But then he ran into this woman we went to school with and..." Harry chuckled softly.

"He took a woman home?!" Maddie was shocked; her eyes opening wide.

"Don't do that," Harry's hand moved to her hair; massaging at her scalp. "Don't judge. Women want to drink wine and be alone. Men drink whiskey and want to..."

"Not be alone?" Maddie offered, trying hard not to sound angry; trying not to be angry. Bishop was heartbroken and acting accordingly. She had gone there in her own life; trying anything to forget. She understood.

"Yes," Harry laughed into a sigh into a yawn. "Anyway. If you see pictures tomorrow...it was Bishop who went home with the brunette from school." He turned to her then, pulling her tight to him and kissing her soundly; alcohol on his lips. "I came home to my blonde." Maddie's giggles were muffled by his lips, her arms wrapping snuggly around him as she welcomed him home for the second time that night.
Chapter 98

Officially, the approval of Maddie's Citizen Application and subsequent Ceremonial attendance was not a big deal. Officially, Clarence House would release a statement that beat reporters would print and that would be that. Maddie wasn't a member of the Royal Family and it was, in no way, an official engagement. Officially.

Unofficially, however, this was the first time Maddie would be out in public with Harry in any sort of formal capacity. Unofficially, it was the publics' first chance to mingle with this woman who would be their "Princess"; for the fashion plate stalkers to assess her style at what would be considered a proper event. Unofficially, it was a slightly bigger deal.

Though none of those things concerned Maddie in the slightest when she finally received her letter of approval. It was a Wednesday and, after finishing up her morning eggs and toast, her phone buzzed in her pocket. It was Thomas at the office. The attorney had called up with some official documents for her and would like to know a good time to meet her at the office, unless of course she would prefer they come to her home.

Maddie grinned; she would be coming in. Harry had left her half-cocked and frustrated when he teased her as he dressed for the office that morning. She knew he was there; signing documents, reading reports—not a meeting on the register. She would be coming in.

In under an hour she was dressed and smiling her hellos as she made her way through the offices towards where she would be meeting Thomas. He was there to greet her, pulling her into the conference room as she followed with ease. She had to bite back laughter as she moved around the space. Her comfort level had certainly increased during the months of their engagement; she felt more at home than she probably should. Slipping into the chair that was clearly hers, she noted mentally that Harry wasn't in the meeting. They were bringing her in alone; perhaps they were more comfortable with her now too.

The attorney quickly produced the letter she had received from the UK Border Agency, already opened and marked, and informed her that her application had been approved. Though they had sent her three possible dates to attend the ceremony where she would take the oath, they had also sent along information regarding private ceremonies. The attorney had no opinion either way, though Thomas seemed to lean more towards the private ceremony. Though he made it very clear, it was Maddie's decision, he was quick to point out the benefits of a private ceremony; no muss, no fuss. Over and done. Maddie, thrilled to see yet another item on her list moving forward, told them both she would give it some thought, discuss it with Harry, and notify them in the morning of her decision.

And that was exactly her intentions as she moved towards Harry's office, after having Thomas phone ahead to his secretary that she would be coming.

"Good Morning Anya," Maddie had always taken great pains in memorizing names of the staff that surrounded her and Harry—a skill that would bode well for her in the future, a knack that would gain her favors with the staff.

"Good Morning Dr. Forrester," the young lady paused her work to offer a smile.

"Can I go in?" Maddie paused, pointing her finger at the closed door to his office.
"Of course, Ma'am," she offered a quick, curt nod and went back to the filing she had been doing when Maddie approached.

With a soft tap of her fingers to the door, Maddie pushed through.

"Yes?" Harry called up, his eyes and his mind glued to what he was reading.

"Your Royal Highness, there's somebody here to see you," Maddie pulled out her British accent as the door shut behind her. Harry's eyes flew from the pages in his hand, bright and alive and snapping right to her.

"Your accent is improving," the papers slid from his fingers to his desk as he rose to his feet. "Have you been practicing?"

"Quite a bit actually," Maddie grinned as he came around the desk to kiss her hello. "Thank you for noticing."

"So...to what do I owe this visit? Or was it just to show me your linguistic improvements?"

"Ha. Very funny." Maddie released her hold on him and waved to his chairs. "Do you have a minute? Can I sit?"

"Of course, of course, do you want me to have Anya bring you something to drink or..."

"No, no," Maddie shook her head and moved to a large, cushy chair. "My application for citizenship was approved."

"Really?" Harry clapped his hands together. "That is fantastic! I mean...I've been catching a fair amount of grief about marrying a foreigner..."

"Likewise," Maddie sighed as they both settled into laughter. And then, as Harry leaned back against his desk, Maddie brought him in on the details of her earlier meeting. She couldn't quite tell if he had actually already had the details before she had arrived but it didn't matter, he was just as excited as she that things were moving forward. He, like the two men before him, deferred the decision regarding the ceremony to her. It made zero difference to him. Hell, he teased, he could probably perform the ceremony himself. Though Maddie had laughed at that idea, she admitted she was a bit partial to the standard ceremony with other people who were doing the same thing as she. There was something about the communal aspect of it; the joining of a group, to the country. She liked the way it felt. Harry suggested they run it by his father, but was happy to go to battle for what she wanted.

In the end, there was no battle. Charles was in favor of the community ceremony if for no other reason than it was an easy concession to make for the large payoff of Maddie getting what she asked for. So, the next day over breakfast, she and Harry selected from the three dates and Thomas and the attorney were notified.

In three weeks, Maddie would become a citizen of the United Kingdom.

And in ten she would become a Duchess.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

Maddie took great care getting dressed and prepared the day of the ceremony. She had chosen a color scheme close to those flown in the Union Jack. She had coordinated with Harry; suggesting he wear his navy suit. She had been selective in designers and fabric. Because even though this was not an official function and even though she was not acting in any official capacity, Maddie wasn't naïve.

This was a moment.

"Are you nervous?" Harry asked her, his fingers stretching across the backseat of the car as he reached for her hand.

"Not at all," she shook her head.

"You ready for the oath?"

"Absolutely," she nodded. She had looked the words up online, had done her research.

"And the National Anthem," his eyes flickered. "You okay with that one?" Maddie struggled with herself, wanting to laugh with him but desperately not wanting to laugh with him.

"You're really going to bring that up now?"

"I walked in on you with your...ear buds in your ears, singing God Save the Queen at the top of your lungs..."

"I wanted to make sure I had it right."

"You sounded wonderful," his lips twitched. "Maybe you could sing for me later."

"You should be so lucky," she rolled her eyes and looked out the window. They were close. Her fingers tightened on his; enough that he caught it and grew serious, pulling her hand to his lips.

"In all seriousness..." His voice was low, drawing her attention to him in curiosity.
"Madeline...you're about to sign away your rights and responsibilities as a US citizen."

"I am." She agreed; voice soft and solemn.

"You really want to do that? Ready to give it all up?" He ran his finger over hers, tracing the small, delicate lines there. "All for some guy?"

"Hey..." She smiled, tugging at his hand. "That's not some guy. That's my future husband, the father of my children..."

"Hmmm..." His eyes met hers across the car. "You're certain?"

"I'm sure."

"Okay then."

"Okay." She took a deep breath as the car rolled to a stop. "Let's do this."

"Let's." He nodded though, before he released her hand, he pulled her in for a kiss. "This means a lot, you know?"
"I know," she nudged his chin with her knuckle. "Maybe afterwards I'll let you buy me an ice cream."

"We have lunch at Clarence afterwards." Their doors were opened, their hands fell apart. Charles and Camilla were hosting a luncheon with the immediate family to celebrate Maddie's conversion.

"That's true," Maddie smiled as she stepped from the car, nodding a thank you. "Maybe something else then?"

"Like what?" He waited for her to join him on the other side of the vehicle, hand extended and ready.

"I don't know. Maybe a drink at the party tonight?" Harry's friends, their friends, had organized a celebration at Leo's for that evening; welcoming her to the country in their own official way.

"Ha! I'll buy you a whole bottle of champagne at the party tonight." They reached the door and Harry held it open, standing aside, deferring to her.

"Perfect," she grinned up at him as she walked past.

It took them very little time to sign in. Maddie presented her paperwork, her ID, and was certain to thank the staff for making adjustments to allow for the Security personnel that were with them. And, after the wide-eyed, slightly in awe staff cleared and okayed everyone, Maddie and her posse made their way to the large community room for the Citizenship Ceremony.

^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

With a quick kiss to the cheek and a supportive squeeze of her hand, Harry and Maddie were separated for the ceremony. Harry moved to sit among other invited guests, their security detail moving with him; all except for Sampson who followed behind Maddie as she made her way to join the other new UK Citizens in a designated area. Sampson gave her a nod when he reached the place where he would watch, inconspicuously, as the ceremony went forward. With a deep breath and a glance back at Harry, Maddie moved to her aisle seat and, collecting the Program for the event from her chair, she made herself comfortable and settled in.

It didn't take too long for the murmur to start; for the news to make its way around that Prince Harry was there—Yes. That Prince Harry. And it wasn't too much longer before scanning eyes located her.

And the whispers began.

Is that her? Is that really her?

She's taller than I thought.

She's prettier in person.

Is she here alone? Is he here with her?

OMG! He's here with her!

I love that she's here and not at some sort of stuffy, private ceremony.
I cannot believe she's here and not just taking care of this privately.

Though Maddie sensed the murmur, could hear some of the whispering, could see the slight nods, the slightly hidden pointing, she kept a smile on her face, ease in her shoulders. And when a gentleman old enough to be her grandfather appeared at her row, she rose to her feet to let him in.

"Thank you Dear," he smiled at her as he stepped in, taking a seat just next to her.

"Of course," she nodded and returned to her seat.

"Is this your first time here?" He had a bit of grin to his lips as he spoke to Maddie and the slightest of accent that she knew wasn't British but was having a hard time placing.

"Yes," she smiled. "You?"

"Mmm," he nodded. "I've heard the drinks are amazing, but stay away from the Salmon." He offered a joke and a wink and Maddie's smile stretched.

"Great tip, thank you."

"You're welcome," he was kind, sweet even, as he turned his attention towards the Superintendent Registrar who was entering the room.

It was time to begin.

The ceremony was nice; it was meant to be a big deal, to highlight the gravity of the decision people were making, to showcase the importance of it. There was a sweet speech, welcoming them all to the ceremony, to London, to the United Kingdom. There was a charge, calling on them to fulfill their duties as a new citizen and then they moved on to the oath.

As a group, they rose to their feet and, at the direction of the Superintendent; everyone began their oath by speaking their name. When it came round to Maddie, with a clear, loud voice, she recited,

"I, Madeline Jae Forrester..."

And the gentleman to her left.

"I, James Barhholomew Norton..."

And it continued on until everyone had spoken. And then, as a group, they spoke.

"...swear by Almighty God that, on becoming a British citizen, I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Second, Her Heirs and Successors according to law. I will give my loyalty to the United Kingdom and respect its rights and freedoms. I will uphold its democratic values. I will observe its laws faithfully and fulfill my duties and obligations as a British citizen."

Maddie only had a blink of an eye to find humor with the allegiance she had just sworn to her soon-to-be husband's family, to her husband; a point she was certain Harry would use against her in the future.

"On behalf of The Queen, the Government, Parliament and people, I welcome you all to the United Kingdom."
And applause broke out. Instead of turning to Harry, most assuredly a move that would bring her to laughter, Maddie offered a smile to Mr. Norton, the jolly old man who had just become a citizen with her.

"Congratulations," he nodded to her.

"Thank you," she smiled wider. "You as well."

"Thank you," he smiled back. They were all encouraged to take their seats as they called individuals up to collect their Naturalization Certificates, a token gift and a handshake from the Superintendent. As people began to walk up, there was a smattering of applause, a few flashes from the guests and one professional photographer documenting the moment. "So..." Mr. Norton turned his attention to Maddie. "What brings you here today?"

"Well," Maddie sighed happily at his question; feeling quite confident he hadn't recognized her at all, thankful for that fact. "I'm marrying a man who lives here in London."

"Ohhhhh..." His head tilted, his smile stretched; finding amusement and a bit of sweetness in her response. "Well I suppose that's as good a reason as any."

"I suppose. How about you?"

"My family is here. I married a French woman fifty years ago and we made our home there. My daughter found an English lad and came back to the motherland. You know how that goes..." He ribbed her gently. "When my wife passed four years ago, my daughter insisted I join her in England." He rubbed his hands together; large, weathered hands that still looked soft to the touch. "I suppose they finally won out."

"Yes," Maddie was gentle. "I'm sorry about your wife."

"Thank you," he nodded, biting back memories. "Are you here with your groom to be?"

"I am," Maddie grew warm as she thought of him. "Are you here with your daughter?"

"My granddaughter," he nodded. "My daughter and her husband had to work. My granddaughter is home from University and she brought me today."

"Oh that's lovely," Maddie smiled.

"Doctor Madeline Forrester," The Superintendent called out and, with squared shoulders, Maddie rose to her feet. She made her way up the aisle to shake the Superintendent's hand, to collect her certificate and her gift and smile for the cameras.

There were many pictures taken of this moment in Maddie's life. It wasn't just the professional photographer there to document the moment. It wasn't just Harry with his cell phone. It was a myriad of other guests, people who had finally figured out what was happening, that they were accidental witnesses to this moment in history, this moment that would be talked about and discussed; this moment that Prince Harry was documenting on his phone with a hint of tears in his eyes and mile wide smile.

It was really quite something.
And then, as she passed James Bartholomew Norton on his way up to the front, it was over. Maddie returned to her seat to watch the rest of the group pass to the front and back to their seats. As soon as everyone was back to where they started, they all rose to sing the National Anthem.

"I'm sorry..." Mr. Norton spoke quietly to Maddie as he turned the program over and over in his hand. "I can't seem to find the words and..."

"Oh," Maddie moved his program from his hand and turned over the other sheet of paper he was holding. "There you go. Right there."

"Thank you so much dear."

"You're welcome."

And then, as her cheeks hurt from the smile on her face thinking of the look she knew was on Harry's, Maddie sang her new National Anthem; loud and proud.

Applause rang out and people began to move towards the light reception that followed. As Maddie glanced to Sampson who stood with eyes on her, she thought of the gentleman next to her.

"Sir?" She turned back to him. "Can I help you find your granddaughter? There's quite the crowd and..."

"You're afraid I would get lost?" He snickered. "Or fall down?" He laughed and shook his head. "That would be lovely. Thank you."

"You're welcome." Maddie smiled at Sampson and offered her arm to Mr. Norton. As the two of them stepped out into the mess of it all, people were beginning to find their guests, hugs and laughter surrounded them. Harry was the first to find them.

"Madeline," he oozed with pride as he stepped up to them. Maddie turned a bright smile to him. "I see that I've been replaced," he was quick with the charm when he wanted to be.

"Very funny," Maddie began her introductions but was interrupted by a young lady in her early twenties who approached them with the slightest bit of trepidation.

"Pappy?" She called out.

"Ah yes," Mr. Norton patted Maddie's arm. "There she is. You are relieved of your duties."

"It was a pleasure," she patted his hand in return.

"Amelia. Come meet my new friend." He waved her over to them. While Maddie was certain that Mr. Norton had not yet put it together who she and Harry were, Maddie was also certain that Amelia had. She seemed a bit nervous, a bit embarrassed and quite a bit shy as she smiled at Maddie and then Harry.

"I'm Madeline Forrester," Maddie made the first move, wanting to ease the oddity among them. Her hand stretched out. "I sat next to your grandfather during the ceremony."

"Nice to meet you," Amelia shook her hand. "Thank you for looking after him."
"Of course," Maddie smiled.

"We were just looking for you when this young man came to challenge me to a duel." All three of them laughed then, though none quite as loud as Harry.

"Pappy..." Amelia blushed slightly as she spoke to her grandfather, moving to his side and offering her arm. "This young man is...Prince Harry." Her voice was low.

"What?" His eyes scrunched up as he turned to look at Harry. "While I'll be...He's much taller than I thought."

"Yes," Amelia shook her head at the young couple. "I'm so sorry."

"No, no," Harry shook his head and stepped up, extending his hand. "It's good to meet you. I'm Harry and you are..."

"Jim Norton."

"Mr. Norton," Harry shook his hand; warm and firm. "It's great to meet you."

"Good to meet you too," he nodded his head. "You're here with this lovely young lady?"

"Yes sir," Harry nodded, offering a wink to Maddie. "We're going to be married in a little under two months."

"Well, well, well." He raised his eyebrows and let out a low whistle, leaning into speak to Harry as men do. "Well caught Your Highness."

"Thank you," Harry laughed as Amelia sank further into herself; disbelieving her grandfather's words even as he spoke them. "I couldn't agree with you more."

Maddie was quick to move the conversation away from she and Harry; quick to introduce Amelia to Harry and suggest that the four of them make their way to the refreshments. Mr. Norton thanked Maddie again for her assistance and released her to Harry, who was more than happy, beyond proud, to stand next to her as they followed along to the punch and cookies.

"I see you've made a new, lifelong friend," he joked; voice low, hand at her back.

"I can't help it," Maddie shrugged. "People like me."

"Yes," Harry agreed. "Yes they do."

And for some, crazy reason, Harry suddenly felt emotional; slightly choked up as he watched her. She was good at this. No. She was great at this. She had to have known, as he did, that they had been caught; people had recognized her. She had to have known that probably at that very moment, hazy cell phone pictures of her becoming a UK citizen were being posted to twitter and tumblr. She had to have known that they were being watched and that there would most likely be more people waiting for them when they exited than were there when they had entered.

But she seemed completely unfazed; not at all deterred. She kept her head high, her smile wide and she seemed so totally at ease.

Could it be? Could he really have found somebody who would flow seamlessly into the madness that was his royal life? Could he really have found somebody who would take to the people as easily as he seemed to? Who would feel as 'at home' with them as he did?

He had always known Maddie was the best match for him. He had always known that she would do well in her future role, that she would have great success there. She had a great work ethic and a big heart. He had always known that she was above and beyond anything he had ever hoped for in a partner. And he had hoped she would transition well, with as few bumps as possible.

But as he watched her move through the crowd—with him but not solely reliant upon him—he knew.

He had absolutely struck gold. And he got to take her home with him?

The pride and adoration he had for her was overwhelming, made him speechless. So he swallowed the lump in his throat, kept his smile in place and followed along—a role he just knew he was going to need to grow accustomed to.

They only stayed for a short amount of time; enough for a cup of punch, a cookie, and a few humorous stories from Mr. Norton. Maddie and Harry were happy to pose for a picture with Mr. Norton and Amelia. They smiled and nodded and spoke to a few other people before they made their quiet, and gracious, exit.

Harry had been right. There were people waiting for them outside of the building; a handful of people and even a beat reporter. Hand in hand, Maddie and Harry walked to their car, offering smiles and waves as they slid in and sped away. In less than an hour, the world would know what their friends and families already did.

Dr. Madeline Forrester was a Brit.

"I don't know why I can't stop yawning," Maddie spoke into the back her hand as they drove to Leo's club later that night.

"You've had quite a day, love," Harry's fingers ran delicately down her arm as he watched her.

He was right. It had been quite a day. While en route to Clarence immediately following the ceremony, Maddie had phoned her mother, sharing a laugh over the fact that she had just left the US behind. They verified her upcoming travel plans and sighed over the fact that they would be seeing each other soon.

Lunch with Harry's family, soon to be hers, was wonderful; as it usually was. Camilla and Charles were gracious hosts. Will and Kate were quick with the congratulations. Dinner was tasty and dessert, a wide assortment of cakes, was topped off with Maddie's favorite champagne. Charles had made a toast that was slightly sentimental, hinting of the ones to come with the wedding that was just on the horizon. It had been a day full of delight and excitement. And now they were on their way out.

"I guess you're right," Maddie sighed, allowing her eyes to close for just a moment.

"Are you going to make it?" His fingers found her hand, pulling it into his grasp. "You want me to call it off?" He raised his eyebrows. "I can call Bishop and have him send everyone home. You and I can go to bed early."
"Hmm..." She smiled, eyes looking him over. "That's tempting. But...we haven't seen everyone in a while. It might be nice to have a drink or two."

"Okay. You say the word and we're out. Okay?"

"Okay." Maddie nodded, eyes shifting outside as they neared Leo's restaurant. "It was very sweet of Bishop to invite Ella."

"Well Bishop is a sweet guy. He doesn't hate her, you know."

"I know," Maddie nodded; muffling a yawn as she shook her head. "Wow...what was that?" She laughed.

"Your body telling you to go home with me," he joked; his eyes watching her in that soft way that spoke of smitten and beguiled.

"Maybe," she caught him watching her and blushed slightly. "But we should do this first."

"Fine," he sighed deeply, dramatically as the car pulled to a stop. "As you wish."

The club was alive with excitement; people laughing and enjoying each other; groups playing darts and billiards, people dancing. The atmosphere was exactly what Maddie needed to pull her from her one foot into slumber state of being. By the time they made it through restaurant to the private room in the back, Maddie's tired eyes were perked. The moment they stepped into the room, their friends erupted with a smattering of applause, hoots and hollers; all rising to hug the two of them. Maddie watched as Harry hugged Ella, pressing a kiss to her cheek. She watched as Bishop smiled sweetly as she moved past him to Maddie. She hugged her best friend who was breathing relief as she moved back to her seat next to Penelope; who appeared to have taken Ella under her wing for the night. Something for which Maddie would be eternally grateful. Maddie and Harry were drawn further into the room as everyone settled. And then, completely within his character, Bishop rose to offer a toast.

"First," he grinned. "I feel compelled to thank the United States of America." Maddie couldn't help the giggle that pushed through her lips. "I would like to offer a great big, proper, British cheers to the US for giving up what I consider to be their most valuable asset..." He winked to Maddie as the snickers ran through the group.

"Thank you Bishop," she grinned.

"And...without really much of a fight." Maddie's head tossed back with laughter.

"Listen. I know that this isn't The Big Day. I know you have much bigger days coming ahead of you..." He grew soft for a moment. "But...on behalf of this moderately twisted group of individuals Harry lowers himself to call his friends...who are so presumptive as to call themselves your friends..." Maddie's cheeks grew warm at his sentiments. "We welcome you to the United Kingdom, to England, to our motley little family. Congratulations love and...Good Luck." He shifted his eyes to the group and lifted his glass even higher. "To Maddie!"

"To Maddie!" The group, Harry included, lifted their glasses and drank to her.

"And..." Bishop grew cheeky. "Harry...we sent you out on behalf of the Queen, to find us a lass worthy of your heart..."

"Here we go," Harry groaned with a roll of his eyes.

"And you brought us back a real gem. We couldn't be more pleased with your efforts in the name of the crown." Bishop nodded as laughter reverberated around the room. "To Harry, The Conqueror."

"To Harry The Conqueror!" Maddie joined in on the moment, on the laughter; raising her glass to Harry before tipping it to her lips.

And the revelry began.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Harry was quick to order Maddie that bottle of champagne he promised, even quicker to pop the cork and pour her a glass; he just might be taking home a drunk Brit that night.

It was about an hour in when Ella had to leave. There was a flu bug going around the hospital, they were short staffed, and she was on call. She smiled her regrets to Maddie as they held onto each other. She blinked back tears as Harry hugged her close and told her goodnight. And then, with a wave to the chorus of good-byes, she slipped out.

It was two hours in when a new face joined the group. Out of the corner of her eye, Maddie caught it. She was small, petite; beautiful. She seemed a bit shy as she stepped up to the door to the room, offering a bit of a wave. Maddie's eyes turned inside and watched as Bishop rose from his chair and moved to greet her. Kissing her cheeks, he took her hand and pulled her into the room, into the group. Maddie felt her muscles tense, even though she desperately did not want them too.

"Is that her?" Maddie whispered to Harry.

"Is that who?" Harry, still half way in a conversation with Leo and Sean, raised his eyebrows and glanced around.

"The brunette Bishop took home."

"Ah." He breathed, his eyes finding the two of them quickly. "No. That's not her."

"That's...I'm sorry. That's a different brunette than the..." Maddie shook her head. No, she told herself. You are not going to get drawn into this. This is none of your business.

"That is a different brunette," Harry nodded, reaching for his drink as Bishop and his friend stepped up to the seats across the table from them. "Hi." Harry's smile widened as he looked to the two of them.

"Hi," Bishop grinned and turned towards the new addition. "This is my very best friend in the world, Harry and his bride to be, Maddie. Guys, this is Savannah."

"Nice to meet you Savannah," Harry stretched his hand across the table; rising from his seat as he did.

"Oh! You too," she smiled sweetly. "And please. Call me Savy."
"Savy?" Maddie's voice perked as she extended her hand to the woman.

"Yes," she shook Maddie's hand; firm. "Please. It's nice to meet you."

"You too," Maddie moved a smile to her lips as Savy turned to Bishop.

"Would you be able to point me to the loo?"

"Of course," he nodded and turned to point to the hallway.

"Thank you," she turned her smile to the group. "If you'll excuse me. I'll just be a moment." And then, as she rose to her feet, Harry and Bishop rose to theirs.

"I'm going to the bar for another drink," Bishop spoke to her as she moved away. "Would you like me to order you something?"

"Yes, please." She thought for a moment. "A Fuzzy Nipple."

"Coming right up," Bishop responded and then, the two of them stepped away from the table; Harry returning to his seat with a smirk on his face—he knew just what was coming.

"Savy." Maddie repeated, pulling her glass to her lips for a sip. "This is the first time you've met Savy?"

"It is," Harry nodded.

"Where did he meet her?"

"I don't know," he shook his head, grin spreading. "I bet he'll tell you if you ask."

"Sure," Maddie sighed and sat her drink back on the table. "A Fuzzy Nipple?"

"Are we really going to do this?" Harry chuckled.

"It's just...what is that? A drink or a medical condition?"

"Madeline..." He reached for her hand, pulling it into both of his.

"You're right," she sighed, embarrassed at herself. "I just..."

"They broke up."

"I know."

"To be completely accurate, she broke up with him."

"I know."

"She wanted this. If she hadn't wanted this, Bishop would be buying her a Fuzzy Nipple now instead of..."

"Ella would never drink a fuzzy nipple," Maddie cut in, catching the catty in her voice immediately. "Oh God. What am I doing?"

"I don't know," Harry laughed, moving his arm around the back of her chair. "But you should relax. You know...he didn't bring her around when Ella was here. He's a gentleman. He waited until she left. He's not throwing it in her face."

"That's true. Why do I feel like he's throwing it in mine?"

"Ha! I don't know. But it's a good thing you have a consolation prize to take you home."

"I sound like a jealous crazy person, don't I?"

"You kind of do," he nodded, kissing her hand. He was right. Even in his good-natured ribbing, he was right.

"Okay," Maddie took a deep breath and let it out. "I'm done. I'll be done." She smiled at Harry then. "I'm done."

"Okay," he laughed. "Can I order you another bottle of champagne?"

"Will you promise to take advantage of me later on tonight?"

"Absolutely."

"Then yes please."

"Done." He met her eyes, watched as she did just as she had said she would; let it go. "Come here." He tugged her to him then, bringing his lips home to hers.

And the party continued. Kiki came over to sit with Maddie, going back and forth about wedding plans; what Maddie still had left to do, what Kiki wished she would have done. It had been a while since the two had sat down together and Maddie was enjoying catching up. And when Bishop and Savy returned, Maddie tried her best to move past it, tried her best not to think of her best friend, and just let it go. It was her night of jubilee, after all. Nothing else should be bringing her down.

-----------------------------------------------

"Your Royal Highness," a slightly tipsy Bishop moved between Harry and Maddie's chairs; crouching down to look between the two of them, his eyes settling on Maddie. Harry was already snickering. It was later, they had all been over-served, and Bishop had just left Savy talking to Anna in order to break into Harry and Maddie and Sean's discussion about honeymoon locales.

"I'm not a Royal anything," Maddie shook her head and pointed to Harry who grinned into his beer bottle. "He must be talking to you."

"Harry..." Bishop's head swung around to look at his best friend. "Would you allow me to borrow your lovely bride for a quick 'round the dance floor?"

"Borrow?" Maddie laughed, eyes meeting Harry's. "Go ahead Wales, lend me to Bishop. Let's see how this goes."

"Ha," Harry nodded back to her. "You're going to have to ask her, but you have my blessing."
"Madeline?" Bishop held out his hand. It surprised Maddie a bit that when his eyes looked up into hers, they seemed steadier, more serious than she had expected.

"Sure," she nodded, curious. "Why not." Setting her glass on the table, she let Bishop lead her from her chair, her hand lingering on Harry's shoulder as she passed.

"Hurry back," he caught her fingers and delivered a kiss before she stepped completely out of his reach.

Maddie followed behind Bishop and, when he stopped, she moved into his arms; one moved around her waist, the other took her hand at his shoulder. And they began to sway.

"Do me a favor?" Bishop's breath was warm against her ear as he moved them around the dance floor slowly.

"What's that?" She kept the smile to her face.

"Stop with the glares to Savannah?"

"What?" Maddie's head turned to look at him, throwing a hiccup into their movement. "I'm not."

"You are."

"I..." Maddie tried to pull up the last hour or so, tried to check herself. "I didn't mean to."

"I imagined that was the case," he shrugged, tugging her back into the dance. He wasn't mad, simply issuing a request. "I would appreciate you stopping all the same."

"I'm sorry." She meant it; felt embarrassed, ashamed. That wasn't her, to make somebody not feel welcome.

"I know you don't like her."

"It's not that I don't like her. I don't know her. I just..."

"You like Ella more."

"I really do." Maddie couldn't help her honesty.

"So do I." He whispered and Maddie felt her heart squeeze in her chest. Without missing a beat as they moved, he took a deep, shaky breath. "I loved Ella. I love Ella. You think I don't love Ella? I...God Maddie, I would do anything for her. Anything. The first time we tried this, she left me. She dated Matt who, let's be honest, couldn't hold a conversation for his life. Dull. Dull. Dull. And when you two came back from that earthquake and she called me..." Bishop's hands tightened around Maddie, needing to hold somebody, anybody, closer to him as he spoke of this heartache. "Tell me, Madeline. You love Harry?"

"What?" She laughed; slightly thrown by the change in conversation. "Of course."

"Would do anything for him, no?"

"I..."
"You just signed away your country, your citizenship. In two months you're signing away your privacy, a good chunk of your life, your holidays..." Bishop waved his hand to indicate the infinite amount of etcetera's he could add.

"Yes." Maddie nodded with a slight lump in her throat. "Yes. I love him."

"Nothing you wouldn't do to make him happy?"

"Nothing I can think of."

"Walk through hell?"

"I suppose I would but..."

"Tell me this," he cut her off. "How many times would it take of Harry showing you to the door, telling you to leave, forcing you out, before you actually went?"

Maddie stopped cold on the dance floor.

He was right.

Her arms tightened around him this time, her eyes filled with water and her heart sank in her chest.

"I'm..." She opened her mouth to apologize.

"You like Ella better than Savy?" He continued with a hoarse voice. "I do too. But she doesn't want me."

"Bishop, she..." Maddie wanted to make it all go away for him.

"I know," he shook his head. "I know all of the things you're about to tell me; all of the things she told you. She told me them too. And you know what? I want her to get better. I want her to feel better and be better and I want her to know in her gut that she deserves..." He ran off, needing a moment to collect himself. After a few deep breaths, Maddie could feel him ease a bit under her hands, his own growing softer with his hold on her. Pressing the side of his face to hers, he sighed. "I want everything for her. I really do. But right now, she doesn't want me. She's made it very clear that she does not want me." He shrugged; a bit resigned, a bit moving on. "And Savy does."

"I'm so...I don't know what I was thinking," she pulled back to meet his eyes, wanting him to see the authenticity there, the love she had for him. She pulled his face between her hands. "I'm so sorry Bishop."

"Don't be sorry," he shook his head and pulled her hands from him, back into the dance. "Just be my friend."

"Okay," she nodded, leaning into his shoulder.

"You know..." Bishop continued. "If the situations were reversed and Harry pushed you from his life...after I finished kicking his ass for making the biggest mistake of his life..." They both grinned at that. "I wouldn't begrudge you happiness with somebody else. Even if it was just for a night or two."
"That's very sweet of you Bishop," Maddie met his eyes for a moment of seriousness and then, with a shrug and a smirk, Bishop moved them past it.

"Of course then I would hit on you like there was no tomorrow." As Maddie tossed her head back in laughter, she made a resolution.

As soon as she was done dancing with Bishop, she was buying Savy a fuzzy nipple; maybe even one for herself.

"You know I love you Bishop."

"I do," he nodded. "But who doesn't?"

